Anselm’s organized treatment of grace and liberty takes both the Augustinian perspective and the patristic tradition and roots them deeply in the soil of Western theology. Like Augustine, he sees freedom from the standpoint of purpose. For him as for Augustine the right will is an engraced will and the only true freedom is a will rightly ordered. As with Augustine, Anselm never considers man except in his actual historical state, called to beatitude and absolutely in need of grace to attain it. Thus, to be free, one must preserve that rectitude whereby man wills what God wills. No creature, however, has such rectitude of will save through the grace of God (De concordia praescientiae et praedestinationis et gratiae Dei cum libero arbitrio 3.3). Yet this grace does not do away with free choice (liberum arbitrium) because man must choose to cooperate with grace. Grace enables the will to accomplish what it was created to do (libertas), but the will has the power to refuse this grace. The rectitude that comes with grace results from free choice and joins the free will to its proper supernatural end (ibid. 3.3). As Augustine, Anselm affirms that it is the union of grace and free choice that brings about salvation. Either by itself does not suffice (ibid. 3.5), but the primacy lies with grace (ibid. 3.4). All this explanation is informed with what has been seen as central to the patristic tradition, namely, that true human freedom is a participation in the divine freedom. St. Augustine saw this as the work of love. St. Anselm finds it in the rectitude whereby one seeks justice and so wills what God wills.

St. Thomas Aquinas. With St. Thomas there comes one of the most deeply decisive moments in the history of the doctrine of grace. His work represents a synthesis of the Christian tradition with the resources and perspectives of Greek philosophical thought. It is also, in a sense, the doctrine of Augustine rethought and reformulated in the perspective of his own theological synthesis, which is quite properly called Thomism [see F. Van Steenberghe, in A. Fliche and V. Martin, eds. Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours (Paris 1935) 13:253]. It is this speculative instrument of Christian thought that has been the common basis for the majority of theological treatises on grace since the 16th century. For this reason the teaching of St. Thomas must be considered in some detail.

In Overall Synthesis. To evaluate properly the teaching of St. Thomas on grace, it must be recognized that this doctrine is subordinate to his overall theological synthesis and so dispersed throughout his Summa theologiae. Yet the full patristic tradition finds proper place in his work. The thematic of recapitulation, already noted, finds full place in the Summa theologiae. The ecclesial emphasis of St. Augustine as to the relation of head and members is properly emphasized in his treatment of the redemption (Summa theologiae 3a, 19.4; 48.2 ad 1). The theological tradition on divinization he expresses by saying that men are beatified through participation, so that in this sense they may be called gods (ibid. 1a2ae, 3.1 ad 1). Through grace and the work of charity man is incorporated into the familial life of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Accordingly, as sharer in the divine nature man enjoys the Divine Persons (ibid. 1a2ae, 65.5; 1a, 43.3 ad 1) and is therefore deified by them (ibid. 1a2ae, 112.1). And so for St. Thomas grace is seen as the favor of God, the action of His merciful or gracious disposition. God, therefore, gives Himself to humanity by reason of a vital, creative act of love. This in turn effects a responsive action in the creature so engraced (ibid. 1a2ae, 110.1 ad 1; De ver. 27.1). Finally, taking man in his actual historical situation, he incorporates the Augustinian emphasis on the medicinal character of grace as derived from the fact of original sin (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 109.2; 109.4).

Grace Synthesis. It is grace as understood in the synthesis based on St. Thomas's notion of nature that has been most decisive in the history of the theological doctrine of grace as it has come down to modern times. Negatively, this influence manifests itself in the counterpositions taken to it particularly in the nominalist tradition. Positively, it is evidenced in what since the 16th century has been the common scholastic tradition formed in terms of the Summa theologiae. This in turn, in a variety of forms, has been the structure of the manuals of theology that have been the medium of the tradition down to the present time. There are, of course, other and quite different theological traditions, but in the limits of this article St. Thomas alone is the concern because his influence is central to the understanding of the common theological tradition on grace.

To evaluate his role in the history of the doctrine as well as the relationship of his theological work to the modern systematic theology on grace, some preliminary considerations are necessary. First, building on the scholarly achievements in the history of scholastic thought laid by such men as M. Grabmann, A. Landgraf, and É. H. Gilson, such specialists as H. Bouillard, SJ, H. Redon, SJ, and J. Auer have brought about an extensive historical reevaluation of the theological formulations of St. Thomas. The result of these studies, strongly undergirded, is the contention that St. Thomas's own theology of grace has been given perspectives and emphases by his disciples that are not necessarily present in his actual work. For example, the central role given to the problem of grace and liberty as it culminates in the De auxiliis debate is not found in St. Thomas. The compression of the treatment on grace into the categories of habitual and actual grace is alien to St. Thomas. The historical situation that made the topics of justification and MERIT treatises in themselves is equally foreign to his synthesis. It becomes clear, too, that the extensive and supple use of Aristotelian metaphysical positions results from a deep personal reflection on them so that they might serve the traditional Christian doctrine on grace. His purpose is theological, and so it is the traditional doctrine coming through the Greek Fathers and especially St. Augustine that is rethought and elucidated in terms of its ontological exigencies. Making use of the Greek philosophical resources and synthesizing them with the Christian tradition through the medium of his own personal reflection and judgment, St. Thomas endeavored to employ them to probe the depths of the doctrine of grace. In this he represents with St. Albert the transition from a refined and highly nuanced biblical theology to a deeply speculative enterprise [see J. Auer, Entwicklung der Gnade in der Hochscholastik, 2 v. (Freiburg 1942–51) 1:109–123].

Central to St. Thomas's speculation on grace is the notion of a fixed and stable nature. It is this philosophical conception of nature with its dynamism or principle and the ends proper to it that enabled St. Thomas to formulate the idea of the absolutely supernatural. In harmonizing the received theological tradition with these philosophical considerations, he makes the case that the supernatural end actually given to the intelligent being gives consistency and orientation to the NATURAL ORDER itself. Yet it should be noted that it is this very concern with nature that tends to make him give heavy emphasis in his thought to what the scholastics were beginning to call created grace (see GRACE, CREATED), a position taken up in opposition to Peter Lombard's identification of charity and the Holy Spirit [see J. Auer, Entwicklung der Gnade in der Hochscholastik, 2 v. (Freiburg 1942–51)]. St. Thomas thus explains the life of grace in terms of nature and its operations. The nature of man, according to his teaching, has three principles or dynamisms of operation, the very being of the soul (essentia animae) and the faculties of reason and will. Since God does not act less perfectly in the works of grace than of nature, there is, he finds, a parallel (see Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 65.3; 110.4 and ad 1). Just as nature, so the life of grace has principles whereby it achieves its proper end: grace itself as the supernatural principle of existence in the soul and the theological virtues perfecting the faculties [see O. Lottin, Psychologie et morale aux XII^e et XIII^e siècles, 3 v. (Louvain 1942–49) 3:468–472].

It is in the light of this parallelism that St. Thomas's notion of grace as a habit, or, more accurately, as a habitual gift (donum habituale), must be seen. Lottin traces the development of this conception of grace as a habit to two main currents. One of these, a theological conception, stems from Hugh of Saint-Victor and is Augustinian in inspiration. The other is given currency by Peter Abelard and is Aristotelian in source (ibid. 103–115). It is this second line of emphasis for which Thomas opts. It is the application of the thesis noted above that God must provide for the life of grace as He does for the natural life. And so in the natural order God gives forms and virtues that are the principles of action and incline the nature to the movements proper to it. Equally, to achieve the supernatural good, God infuses forms as supernatural qualities to accomplish it. Hence the gift of grace is a kind of quality, qualitas quaedam (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 110.2). As such, it is a permanent habitude, which is the root of the infused virtues. This idea of a permanent habitude might well signify not so much the Aristotelian habit but a permanent hold of God in man's very being; or, as C. Moeller indicates, in St. Bonaventure, to hold is to be held [see "Théologie de la grâce et oecuménisme," Irénikon 28 (1955) 32–37; H. Bouillard, Conversion et grâce chez s. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1944) 211–219].

In connection with St. Thomas's formulation of grace as a habitual gift, a word is in order on its correlative in the later Thomistic tradition, actual grace. St. Thomas himself makes the distinction between the habitual gift and divine aid, divinum auxilium (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 111.2; 110.2). He speaks in these places of God moving the soul of man to know or to will or to act. Yet he would also say that commonly the term "grace" means the habitual justifying gift. Moreover, he recognizes in the preparation for justification a divine aid by which God moves man (ibid. 1a2ae, 112.1 ad 1). Whether this divine aid is to be equated with the usage of the term "actual grace" has been a source of considerable debate since the study of H. Bouillard on the subject (op. cit.). Bouillard argues quite persuasively that the whole matter must be studied in the light of St. Thomas's own development as a theologian. The issue is a peculiarly subtle one, and St. Thomas's expressions do leave themselves open to divergent interpretations. However, in the light of Bouillard's work and subsequent debates about it, it would appear legitimate to presume this highly complex problematic historically an open issue [see H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 218–220; J. Auer, Entwicklung der Gnade in der Hochcholastik, 2 v. (Freiburg 1942–51) 1:211–219].

With regard to the relationship between grace and liberty, St. Thomas brings to its theological structuring a whole philosophical and speculative instrument unavailable to his predecessors. At no point, however, does he treat this relationship for its own sake. His concern is to integrate it into the more universal framework of his metaphysics. Grace does not violate liberty, and God will not save man without the movement of free will (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 113.3). However, God is absolutely the first cause and moves all other things (ibid. 1a, 19.8). Grace and liberty thus are set into the ontological order of the relationship between the first cause and a secondary one. Hence St. Thomas places emphasis on the fact that this first cause is neither necessary nor contingent but transcendent (In 1 perih. 14). Accordingly, while a good deal of the later debate on sufficient and efficacious grace will center on the interpretation of St. Thomas, nonetheless it will center on a question that he neither raises nor in its essence considers. It will involve also an understanding of actual grace that possibly may not have been present in his work. See in addition to the works already noted: W. A. Van Roo, Grace and Original Justice according to St. Thomas (Rome 1955); G. Lafont, Structures et méthode dans la Somme Théologique de saint Thomas d'Aquin (Bruges 1961); J. Alfaro, Lo natural y lo sobrenatural: Estudio historico desde santo Tomas hasta Cayetano (Rome 1952).

Nominalist tradition. Recent scholarship has tended to see in the nominalist tradition a much more constructive character than has hitherto been conceded it [see H. A. Oberman, "Some Notes on the Theology of Nominalism," Harvard Theological Review 53 (1960) 46–76]. More and more it is emphasized that its accepted historical title, nominalism, is based on an epistemological conception that is not central to the tradition itself but derivative from its religio-theological perspectives and preoccupations. It is because of these theological presuppositions that its teaching on grace is included here. They serve to bring out the continuing evolution and emphasis on the gratuity of grace and help to evaluate properly many of the discussions at the Council of Trent.

Essential to the understanding of the nominalist development is the fact of its very heavy accentuation on the sovereignty of God and its correlative, His absolute freedom. This accentuation, as nominalists see it, is a necessary antidote to a prevailing and dangerously deterministic Aristotelianism (represented for many of them by St. Thomas). Opposed to this must be a return to the only law open to the Christian—the law of love proposed by Augustine, wherein alone true liberty acts. For God's work is one of absolute freedom. He gives Himself in total freedom out of love and not by reason of any created structure or exigency such as a stable order of nature would set up [see R. Guelluy, Philosophie et théologie chez Guillaume d'Ockham (Paris 1947) 266–267].

In the realm of grace, this absolute sovereignty and freedom of God is preserved by what is the central religio-theological motif of the whole tradition. This is the potentia absoluta-potentia ordinata principle. The nominalists through this principle clearly articulate “the contingency of the whole order of nature as well as grace, and thus emphasize the dependence of all things with regard to a Principle that acts with a sovereign liberty and gratuity” [P. Vignaux, Nominalisme du XIV^e siècle (Montreal 1948) 22]. Through the interaction of the potentia absoluta and the potentia ordinata, divine mercy and divine justice are reconciled. Man becomes just, as he must in order to be saved, but it is solely through divine acceptance.

The stress of the nominalist tradition on acceptance in order to preserve absolute gratuity leads to a further step in the rejection of the medieval, and particularly the Thomistic, explanation of grace as a kind of habit or habitude. For, as nominalists see it, God’s acceptance alone makes man and his works worthy of heaven and thus makes the whole notion of habitus superfluous [see H. A. Oberman, “Some Notes on the Theology of Nominalism,” Harvard Theological Review 53 (1960) 65]. In addition, as William of Ockham specifically indicates, this notion of grace as a habit, a structuring of the will itself, can interfere with the concept of human freedom, which is the cause of the meritoriousness of the act. God, after all, can accept this action without any grace, since grace is only a status required by God in man’s actual situation (de potentia ordinata) (see H. A. Oberman, ibid. 64–65). This point is important in the history of the theology of grace, since attention to it can help to explain the strong counterposition taken by the 16th- and 17th-century Thomistic commentators who make of the notion of habit so central an element in their theology of grace.

Great debates. For methodological purposes this article bypasses at this point the Council of Trent and takes it up rather in the consideration of the systematic theology of grace. The next stage is represented by Baianism, the Catholic theological debate over efficacious grace, and Jansenism. These are three chronologically interrelated phases in the development of this stage. Each of them interacts on the other, and all of them affect very deeply both the direction and emphasis of subsequent theologizing on grace.

Baianism. The fundamental characteristic of Baius’s teaching may be summed up as follows. He is directly, even bitterly, opposed to the scholastic development on grace, particularly as represented by St. Thomas; and so he draws his own explanation from what he conceives to be the thought of St. Augustine. The result is that Baius rejects the whole notion of grace as a created and totally gratuitous gift that permanently elevates man and makes him a sharer of the divine nature—an understanding of grace strongly emphasized by St. Thomas (see ELEVATION OF MAN). Yet while claiming Augustine as his master, Baius ignores the role that divinization plays in the theology of the Augustine. Likewise, in his distaste for philosophical conceptions, he does not appear to see in St. Augustine’s teaching the distinction between freedom (libertas) and free choice (liberum arbitrium). He thus equates the two and gives man no freedom of choice, so that in man’s present state grace becomes a necessitating thing. In this way he opens the way to the debate on sufficient and efficacious grace and prepares the way for Jansenism as well [see X. Le Bachelet, “Baius,” Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 2.1:81–89; H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 287–293]. Finally, with all of his objections to philosophical formulas, he in fact begins with a conception of nature that desupernaturalizes Augustine’s whole conception of the relationship between grace and nature. Whereas St. Augustine sees human nature finding its fulfillment and completion in God’s gracious gifts, Baius looks upon the informing work of the Holy Spirit as being of the very nature of man and the gifts given to Adam as serving the ends of nature and not a gratuitous elevation and divinization. And thus in so radically denying the gratuity of the SUPERNATURAL ORDER, he denies the supernatural order itself. When he comes to grace in the case of fallen man, then he sees it as only extrinsic and being only a matter of mode, not of substance [see H. de Lubac, Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946) 30–37; see BAIUS AND BAIANISM].

De Auxiliis Controversy. The Latin phrase De auxiliis, meaning “On the matter of aids,” has come to be the historical title of one of the most extensive theological controversies in Western Catholic theology. It had its source in the opposing theories employed by the Jesuits and the Dominicans to harmonize grace, predestination, and human liberty. In its early stage the issue was, for the Jesuits, a decidedly practical affair. Confronting both Calvinism and Baianism in the Low Countries, their emphasis is on the role of man’s freedom in salutary activity. To be noted also is the role given to voluntary effort in the Jesuit method of spiritual direction. Likewise, in the ascetical orientation of the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of St. Ignatius, while the initiative belongs to grace, there is a mutual interaction and development with voluntary activity. It is this approach that finds in the work of the Jesuit theologian Luis de MOLINA many points that are attractive. The orientation is also particularly notable in the case of Leonard LESSIUS, who is teaching in Louvain during this period [see H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 294–295].

Essentially, the concern of Molina is with the concrete SALUTARY ACT; his aim is to preserve the free activity of man without undermining God's governance of the economy of salvation. To accomplish this aim, Molina maintains that free will cannot be touched or moved from within without destroying freedom itself. Rather, grace must look only to attracting the will to move itself. And so all grace as it is offered to man is called gratia oblata. If the will by its innate liberty consents to the proffered grace, it becomes efficacious. If the will resists the grace, then it remains merely sufficient (see GRACE, EFFICACIOUS; GRACE, SUFFICIENT). There is, therefore, only one grace offered; whether or not it efficaciously attains a salutary act derives ultimately from man's free choice. On the other hand, the divine governance of the salutary economy for humanity is preserved through the introduction of a theological concept that becomes the touchstone of much of the subsequent controversy. This is the famous SCIENTIA MEDIA, the middle knowledge, between God's knowledge of all possibles and His knowledge of what actually is. By this scientia media God knows all the futuribles, i.e., all the possibilities of a free will under an infinite variety of circumstances. Thus when God chooses a particular order, He knows infallibly how a given man will respond to grace. The divine governance then looks to infallible knowledge and in no way enters into human causality [L. de Molina, Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis, divina praescientia, providentia, praedestinatione, et reprobatione (Paris 1876); see E. Vansteenbergh, "Molinisme," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 10.2:2094–2187; H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 294 and following] (See MOLINISM).

While accepting with reservation the notion of scientia media, neither Bellarmine nor Suárez felt that Molina's explanation satisfies the biblical affirmations or sufficiently protects God's role in predestination. Bellarmine held that, while the efficacy of grace is exterior to the will, still the grace itself has a moral congruity that so accommodates it to the circumstances, the character, and the dispositions of the man that he unfailingly consents even though he could resist [R. Bellarmine, De gratia et libero arbitrio 1.12; Opera omnia, 12 v. (Vivès ed. Paris 1870–74) 5.529–531]. Suárez would accept congruent grace, but this congruency for him would appear to stem from extrinsic circumstances rather than from any special adaptation of the grace itself (see CONGRUISM). It should be noted too that Suárez's acceptance of the scientia media is reserved and is to be understood in the light of his own philosophical perspectives (F. Suárez, De gratia 5.21; Vivès ed. 8: 498–500).

Domingo Báñez and those who follow him place their emphasis on the divine will as absolute in priority if the gratuity of God's salvific economy is to be preserved. They therefore reject totally the whole idea of scientia media, describing it as a pure construct without any real object in the order of divine knowledge. God knows infallibly what will be because He has decreed that it should be. Since God is absolutely the first cause, then He must be the mover of every second cause and in the order of existence the first mover of every act. On the basis of this metaphysical position, it is maintained that the grace that moves man to a salutary act must be efficacious by its very nature and so must enter into the very structure of the free act. The reconciliation of this affirmation with man's freedom calls for a subtle and complex analysis of the interaction of intellectual judgment as formal cause and the will as efficient cause (see R. Garrigou-Lagrange, "Thomisme," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 15.1:823–1023, esp. 979–985; see BAÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM).

The presentation here on the De auxiliis debate is admittedly but a sketch of a controversy that has permeated and frequently dominated the scholastic tradition down to the present (see CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS). However, enough had to be said to throw light on the reasons why the consideration of actual grace has been so much to the fore in the scholastic treatment and in so many of the manuals. As has already been noted, this emphasis on actual grace calls for a good deal more historical perspective than is as yet available. It seems too that the penetration of the unique causal relationship between God and man in the supernatural order calls for the development of further speculative resources than are presently at hand.

Jansenism. While JANSENISM may be better remembered for its ultrarigid moral outlook, its teaching on grace has the same character. It is the work of Cornelius JANSEN, who lived, reflected, and wrote his work in the turbulent atmosphere engendered by the debates over efficacious grace. Like Baius, he is the product of the Louvain atmosphere and harbors an even deeper resentment of the Jesuits and shares his antipathy for scholasticism. The future bishop of Ypres is totally committed to Augustine and entitles his book AUGUSTINUS. Yet, as happens so often to the disciples of the bishop of Hippo, in attempting to draw out a synthesis from the master's work, he ended up forcing his own construction on St. Augustine's thought. At the heart of his position, as well as at that of the Jansenist school throughout its history, is the same distortion that blinds Baius to the meaning of Augustine. It is his conception of nature before the Fall, Adam in the state of innocence. It may be argued that the notion of Jansen does not expressly exclude the gratuity of the original state of grace, but it surely caricatures it beyond recognition. For Jansen man is created in a state of innocence and rectitude; his will is naturally turned toward God as his last end. The first man possesses liberty of indifference toward good and evil but is naturally turned toward good. Grace is given to man to accomplish the good but it waits upon man's consent. It is, in fact, the sufficient grace of the contemporary theologian (see J. Carreyre, "Jansenisme," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 8.1:345–348).

However, when Adam falls all this is radically changed. Adam and his descendants are now committed to concupiscence-self-love and have no freedom of choice. The will is free only from outside intervention. Interiorly the will is determined either to sin or to charity. If man is to be saved, then the all-powerful grace of Christ will do it of itself. In such a conception, Jansen sees sufficient grace as a monstrosity, for fallen man has no power either to consent or to resist if the grace of Christ is bestowed upon him. Once again St. Augustine's distinction between liberty and free choice is not understood, and an absolutely irreconcilable opposition is seen between man's original state and his fallen state in the matter of grace [see J. Carreyre, ibid. 349–367; H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 309–314; R. Knox, Enthusiasm (New York 1950) 204–230]. For understanding the subsequent history of the theology of grace, it is important to recognize that it was the effort to soften this radical opposition of the original to the fallen state posed by Baius and Jansen that led to so much stress on "pure nature" in contemporary and later theology [see J. Carreyre, "Jansenisme," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 362–363; H. Rondet, "Le Problème de la nature pure et la théologie du XVI^e siècle," Recherches de science religieuse 35 (1948) 481–521; H. de Lubac, Sur-naturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946) 101–127].

Petavius. The French Jesuit Denis Petau (Petavius, d. 1652) is singled out because he restores a perspective to the theology of grace that will be most important in its modern development. By the time the controversy over efficacious grace has reached its climax, and in part due to it, the whole emphasis is on created grace. The aspect of uncreated grace, of the divinization of the Christian, is being presented as a formal effect of habitual grace. The indwelling of the Holy Spirit as well as the ecclesial aspect of the grace of Christ have both been placed in the background of theology. It is due to the work of Petau, even while the Jansenist struggle is continuing under Antoine ARNAULD, that these deeply biblical and traditional aspects of the theology of grace begin to be restored to their proper proportion.

Petau himself is the first of the great positive theologians, deeply erudite in the history of dogma and particularly well versed in the Greek Fathers and Scripture. It is from the standpoint of positive theology that he studies the mission of the Holy Spirit. His guide is St. Cyril of Alexandria. As a result, he is convinced that the Holy Spirit has a far more personal role in the divinization of the Christian than his contemporaries propose [De Trinitate 8.4; Dogmata theologica, 8 v. (Paris 1865–67) 3:453–465]. The data as he interprets it seems to require that the work of sanctification be proper to the Holy Spirit. Accordingly, he maintains that the scholastic doctrine of appropriation does not suffice to explain either Scripture or the Greek patristic tradition of the role of the Holy Spirit (see ibid. 8.6; 3:481–487).

It must be admitted that the speculative capacities of Petau are limited and that he is not really able to answer the question he has posed. He frankly leaves the problem for someone else to answer and makes of his own proposal simply a tentative. His tentative is vigorously criticized in his own time as well as in modern times [see A. Michel, "Trinité," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 15.2:185–55; P. Galtier, Le Saint Esprit en nous d'après les pères grecs in Analecta Gregoriana 35 (Rome 1946)].

The problem raised by Petau is treated again by M. J. SCHEEBEN, whom Grabmann described as the greatest speculative theologian of the 19th century. Scheeben is a dedicated disciple of St. Thomas Aquinas and is also deeply influenced by the Fathers and especially the Greek patristic tradition. Like Petau, he studies the mission of the Holy Spirit in the light of Cyril of Alexandria's thought. As a result, it is his Trinitarian theology that determines his theology of grace. Avoiding any simplistic commitment to the hypostatic character of the Holy Spirit's mission of sanctification, nonetheless he maintains that each of the Divine Persons dwells in us in a manner that is personal and proper. They are present formally by what constitutes them as Persons [M. J. Scheeben, The Mysteries of Christianity, tr. C. Vollert (St. Louis, Mo. 1946) 158–180]. While more developed and nuanced speculatively than the tentatives of Petau, Scheeben's position does not find much favor and is generally rejected by the manuals. The importance of Scheeben, however, lies less in his theory than the fact that he gave very strong impetus to the return to the tradition that emphasizes the Trinitarian ground of the doctrine and theology of grace. This return is given a further impulse by the extensive and detailed patristic studies of T. de Régnon [Études de théologie positive sur la Sainte Trinité, 4 v. (Paris 1892) 4:466–498; 524–572]. While De Régnon's own resolution of the issue raised by Petau receives very little popular assent, his work insures that the study of the Greek tradition will become a theological exigency.

Contemporary. In the mid-20th century, the emphasis on the study of the Fathers joined with a renewal of biblical theology began to bring about a considerable change in the systematic treatment of the theology of grace. As has been already implied, there was considerable emphasis of the Pauline and patristic insistence on the Trinitarian ground of the whole doctrine of grace. Biblical theology as well as the history of theology more and more made theologians conscious that the categories of habitual and actual grace are unable to encompass fully the revealed reality of grace. Hence the trend in theologizing on grace was to give primacy to the supernatural economy of God's personal and saving activity. Along with this was an effort to disengage the treatment of grace from the limitations imposed on it by the polemics of the Reformation, Baianism, and Jansenism. There was also a strong trend to set the long debate over sufficient and efficacious grace into a historical perspective where it no longer dominates the treatment of grace and freedom. In the place of this emphasis, many contemporary theologians sought to restore the Augustinian distinction between liberty, or Christian freedom, and freedom of choice. By this distinction they sought to give to Christian freedom a dimension that touches the very roots of man's personal supernatural relation with the Triune God.

Even before Vatican Council II, theologians such as Hans Küng were rethinking historic Protestant-Catholic controversies about grace in the light of contemporary developments. Increasingly, both Catholic and Protestant theologians showed a willingness to recognize elements in each others' traditions as valid. Thus Catholics sought acceptable interpretations of such phrases as "justification through faith," "simultaneously justified and sinful," etc. Meanwhile, they found inspiration for their thinking in the works of such Protestant theologians as Barth, Bultmann, Tillich, and Bonhoeffer.

At the same time, Catholic thought on grace became more "secular." That is, grace was seen as the all-pervasive reality of God's love to be found in every dimension of life in this world, rather than as a discrete entity transmitted only through "sacred" channels. All constructive human activity is in some sense supernatural insofar as it is carried out under the force of God's call to friendship with Himself, and grace is thus available to all men everywhere. Reexamination of the distinction between natural and supernatural, and the discussions of "anonymous" Christianity, led to a greater appreciation of the universality of grace.

The influence of ecumenical discussions and of the secularizing trend converged in the development of personalist theologies of grace. Personalist theology offered not a new doctrine of grace but a new approach to understanding and expressing the realities found in Scripture and tradition. Grace was to be understood as an interpersonal relationship between God and man, the appreciation of which stands at the very heart of the theological endeavor. The impact of grace on consciousness, on acts of faith and hope and love, and on human psychology in general received greater and greater attention, and theologians' vocabularies and frames of reference were likely to be drawn from existential philosophy and contemporary psychology.

Finally, the need for a social theology of grace became clear in light of developments in other areas of theology. For example, Vatican II reiterated the biblical notion that God does not call us as individuals but as a people. In moral theology, the deprivatization of sin calls for a corresponding deprivatization of grace. In addition, sacramental and liturgical theology shifted their focus to the social, viewing Baptism as the initiation of a person into the Christian community, and Eucharist as the sharing of a communal meal. Traditionally, the impact of grace has been a major factor in the study of each of these areas. However, a purely personalist approach to grace proved an inadequate grounding for these social understandings. This inadequacy, in turn, led many theologians to ignore the topic of grace.

Liberation theologians were among the first to point out the general neglect of the social dimensions in theological tracts on grace. Not only did they develop a social theology of grace to counterbalance their notion of sin as systemic evil, but they claimed that human beings receive grace within society and by transforming society. More specifically, for them, grace is liberation, the freeing action of God in society.

Systematic Treatment of Grace

In the biblical perspective, grace is the generous kindness and favor of God that He witnesses to by His personal action in the PEOPLE OF GOD and each of its members. St. Thomas Aquinas speaks for this theological tradition when he declares that grace is fundamentally God's gracious disposition. This disposition for St. Thomas is, above all, an act of love that produces in the very being of man a correlative response and activity (see Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 110.1–3).

This favor and love of God that makes man pleasing to Him is not an abstract but a personal reality that finds its full manifestation in the historical reality of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. The incarnate Word is the grace and the favor of God appearing for the SALVATION of all men and "of his fullness we have all received grace upon grace" (Jn 1.16). It is the grace of the Father in Jesus Christ that is given men by the Holy Spirit. This whole approach is beautifully phrased in the Tridentine decree on justification.

The commencement of justification itself in adults must be understood as coming from the prevenient grace of God through Christ Jesus, i.e., from His vocation, by which He summons them without any anterior merits on their part so that those who have been averted from God through their sins are turned to their own justification through His grace that excites and aids. In freely consenting and cooperating with this grace [these sinners] are so disposed that God touches their heart in such a way through the illumination of the Holy Spirit that it cannot be said that man does nothing at all when he receives this inspiration, for he can reject it; neither may it be said that without the grace of God he can move himself to justice before God by his own free will. (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1525)

In this magisterial statement are the two poles central to the systematic theology of grace: the absolute primacy of God as savior and the realism of regeneration. As C. Moeller has so cogently brought out, these two poles must orient any theology of grace if it is to be true to God's revealed word and at the same time be as genuinely ecumenical as the present age demands ["Théologie de la grâce et oecuménisme," Irénikon 28 (1955) 21–23].

Absolute primacy of God in the work of salvation. "The Eternal Father by a free and hidden plan of His own wisdom and goodness created the whole world. His plan was to raise men to a participation of the divine life. God the Father did not leave men fallen in Adam to themselves but ceaselessly offered helps to salvation for the sake of Christ the Redeemer, 'who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature' (Col 1.15). All the elect, before time began, the Father 'foreknew, and He predestined them to become conformed to the image of His Son so that He should be the firstborn among many brethren' (Rom 8.29)"—Vatican Council II, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 2; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 5–6. In these words the Church reaffirms both the gratuity and the supernaturality of God's gracious favor and salutary activity.

In the conception of grace outlined above, there is found in direct focus what the Greek Fathers described as the divinization of the Christian. God became man that men might share in the divine life. By the love of the Father man is introduced into the life of the three Divine Persons. Through this freely given love is communicated to the redeemed a share (although in a human degree) of the love of the Son for the Father. It is this love of the Father in the image of the Son that is realized and vitally sustained by the Holy Spirit.

Supernaturality. In this context of grace, considered as an absolutely free and personal act through which God communicates Himself to men, the traditional usage of supernatural must be understood. Man through God's love is endowed with the divine through a personal act of God's own self-giving. Such an act by its very nature must be absolutely free; it cannot be necessitated. On the other hand, the spiritual creature must respond to this divine self-donation freely. Hence, the doctrine of grace supposes a creature already constituted in its own being in such ways that it has the possibility of entering into a free and personal relationship with the Divine Persons or of rejecting that relationship. The fact of a completely gratuitous operation on the part of God and the possibility of a free response or refusal on the part of the creature makes God's self-communication supernatural. For it means that it cannot be something owed or necessitated. God can deny it to man since it is a participation in the divine life, which belongs and is proper only to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The scholastic terminology describes it as that which by its very nature goes beyond the essence, capacity, or claim of any creature (cf. K. Rahner, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4:993).

The Church in its official teaching has given considerable emphasis to both the idea and the term "supernatural." The idea itself first appears in Benedict XII's exposition of the BEATIFIC VISION (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1000–01). The term itself is employed in the condemnation of Baius (ibid. 1921, 1923; cf. 1926). The same notion is to be found in the statements issued against QUESNEL (ibid. 2435) and in 1794 against the Synod of Pistoia (ibid. 2616). Pius IX employed the term "supernatural" to bring out the semirationalist errors of J. Frohschammer (ibid. 2851, 2854). In its constitution on the Catholic faith, Vatican Council I makes the supernaturality of God's will to give Himself to man the foundation of the necessity of grace as well as a necessary property of divine faith (ibid. 3005, 3008). The encyclical of Pius XII HUMANI GENERIS gives heavy emphasis to the absolute gratuity of the supernatural order (ibid. 3891).

Grace and Nature. The correlative aspect of God's self-revelation that is man's free response to it is also set into focus by the absolute gratuity of grace. By the very nature of the relationship of love, man must enter into communion with God freely. Yet as both the Councils of Orange and Trent affirm, he is incapable of either earning this grace of response, or preparing himself positively for it, or ever attaining it by his own acts (ibid. 373–397, 1523, 1525). For the very nature of God's personal communication of Himself requires that man's actual ability to respond freely be itself the action of God's unnecessitated grace.

While insisting on this supernaturality, one is also to be aware that, since man must respond freely, even without grace there is in the spiritual creature a capacity for this self-disclosure of God in Christ. It is this capacity that theologians have termed an OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY (potentia obedientialis). This term simply formulates this fact: what God can achieve in and with man can be impossible for man himself to do. Yet, because man is God's creature, then inherent in his created nature is the possibility of becoming what God can and does will. Although this implies no capacity for self-realization, there is a real possibility that God has the power to actualize if He so wills.

Modern theology has devoted considerable attention to the actual nature of this obediential power as found in historical man called to grace. A number of theologians have felt that the relationship between nature and grace has been too much confined to the discussions of the relationship of the supernatural with man's natural desire to see God. This itself is a source of extensive debate in the Thomistic tradition [see, e.g., W. O'Connor, The Eternal Quest (New York 1947)]. By focusing on this perspective, it is maintained, the whole relationship is reduced to a kind of extrinsicism. For one of the elements involved, viz, pure nature, is solely a speculative construct that has never had any existence. This extrinsicism would, it is maintained, make of human nature so determinable and thus so self-enclosed a system that the supernatural adds only a veneer or an extrinsic layer. Hence really to understand the relationship constructively one must return to the fact that the one thing revelation tells man is that God has created him with the purpose of giving Himself in Christ. The sole final end that is given in fact to the creation of spiritual creatures is the possession of God Himself, and this with the fact of sin foreseen.

In view of such judgments, a number of theologians have striven to reconstruct the relationship between nature and grace by centering it on historical man called to grace from the beginning of human history. Implicitly this point of view reaches back to the early part of the 20th century and the work of M. Blondel and J. Maréchal, SJ. Later it was given prominence by H. de Lubac, SJ, K. Rahner, SJ, and H. U. von Balthasar [see L. Malevez, "La Gratuité du surnaturel," Nouvelle revue théologique 75 (1953) 561–586, 673–689; H. de Lubac, Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946); K. Rahner, "Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace," Theological Investigations, v. 1, tr. C. Ernst (Baltimore, Md. 1961) 297–317; H. von Balthasar, Karl Barth: Darstellung und Deutung seiner Theologie (Cologne 1951) 278–335; J. P. Kenny, "Reflections on Human Nature and the Supernatural," Theological Studies 14 (1953) 280–287].

The best-elaborated and most carefully balanced exposition of this position is that offered by K. Rahner. As he sees it, the divine decree that calls all men to the beatific vision must have a real effect on each man so called. God could not will to make men adopted sons unless there resulted an interior orientation to this actual end that would oblige men to choose or reject it. To conceive of the call as a purely extrinsic, juridical reality is to leave an actual historical decree of God without a corresponding historical term. For the possession of God is men's only true end in fact. How, therefore, can this be if there is no actual attraction or tension in regard to this de facto situation? As a vocation, it is totally God's gift, His gracious intervention; and the resonance it strikes in man is thus the work of His own free gift. It is this supernatural DESTINY, freely conferred, that in turn engenders in man an affinity to the end for which he was in fact made. This affinity touches the very source of man's existence so that man never ceases to be called by God's love. It is this that Rahner terms the SUPERNATURAL existential, an attrait, a resonance, that results from an unconditioned and positive tendency to the vision of God derived from God's gift of a vocation to supernatural life.

It should be remarked here that Rahner is aware that some have pushed this position to extremes, as indicated in the encyclical Humani generis. He emphasizes that this position in no way attenuates the absolute gratuity of the supernatural. He insists that the concept of pure nature is necessary to defend this divine gratuity. He also accepts the validity of the notion represented by obediential power but maintains that it is not mere nonrepugnance but an inner ordination. He would, however, make it plain that because of this supernatural existential, the concept pure nature is not something clearly determinable or open to exact definition. Pure nature can only be described as what would remain in concrete human nature after the existential has been abstracted as not due. Since one does not know the full impact of the supernatural existential, one cannot say definitively what this pure nature would be.

As might be expected, this position has not gone unchallenged. Perhaps the best critique is offered by H. E. Schillebeeckx, OP. He sees the whole tentative as a shifting of the problematic from the relationship between nature and grace to a relationship between nature and a medium between nature and grace, a medium that is neither natural nor supernatural as such. He would hold that the basic error arises from a false perspective. By reason of this false perspective, the proponents of the supernatural existential hold that a sinner can be really and actually called in the concrete and yet still remain a sinner. Hence he maintains that Rahner would place in human nature as the term of man's destiny a reality present in both man in the state of grace and man a sinner. Schillebeeckx would claim that the actual and real destination to the supernatural order is sanctifying grace since only this in fact places man in the supernatural order. Hence in actuality the distinction is either acceptance and personal relationship with God or a deliberate refusal and thus being truly a sinner—these are the only terms of God’s call. Vocation by its nature remains extrinsic to man because it cannot become actual save by free response or rejection. For the destination to the supernatural order is the fruit of God’s will to save; this involves either effective assumption into FRIENDSHIP with God or, if one is not in the state of grace, the reality of being a sinner. There is no other possibility [see H. E. Schillebeeckx, “L’Instinct de la foi selon s. Thomas d’Aquin,” Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 48 (1964) 396–400].

Reality of regeneration. Theology has systematized the various aspects of grace insofar as it affects man. The variety of categories and formulas represents the effort by theologians to grasp and give intellectual precision to the scriptural affirmations that the man in grace is a new creature, a sharer of the divine nature, a son of God not only nominally but in truth.

Created and Uncreated Grace. This terminology and division has been very prominent in Western Catholic theology since the early 13th century. As the historical treatment indicated, this terminology came into use in order to signify the effect that God’s self-giving in grace produces in man. Peter Lombard had resolved the issue by identifying charity in the justified man with the Holy Spirit Himself. Since the Sentences of Peter Lombard was the textbook for theologians until the 16th century, his answer to the problematic demanded an explanation. To the great theologians who followed him, it seemed evident in Scripture that God in giving Himself to man had pledged an enduring and transforming result in man. Yet it was also apparent that if this effect was simply God Himself, one must ultimately deny any personal activity to the Christian in grace. This problematic was ultimately resolved by introducing the distinction of uncreated and created grace (see GRACE, CREATED AND UNCREATED). In this formula, uncreated grace stands for the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as out of love they communicate themselves to man. Created grace is seen correlatively as signifying the effect of this divine communication. Employing this distinction, the scholastics sought to keep clearly in the forefront the reality or the realism of man as regenerated. As they used it, they stressed the incapacity of man as regards justification and the actual reality of the sanctification that God works in man. In such a context, the concept created grace simply marks the continuous influence of God’s personal and sanctifying activity in man.

It is in the light of this same problematic but raised in the context of Lutheran teaching that the Council of Trent’s teaching on inherent grace must be understood. The Tridentine fathers deliberately eschewed the term “created grace” and used “inherent grace” and infused grace. Both of these Tridentine usages looked to emphasizing the fact that when God justifies man a true inner transformation takes place. This emphasis was given primacy because, as they saw it, the Lutheran teaching clearly appeared to deny or, at least, jeopardize the Catholic teaching on this point. In view of this, the Council of Trent taught: “Finally the unique formal cause [of justification] is the ‘justice of God, not the justice whereby He is just but that by which He makes us just.’ And this means that by this gift of His we are renewed in the spirit of our mind so that justice is not merely reputed to us but we are truly called just and indeed are just by the fact that each one receives his own justice in the measure that the ‘Holy Spirit destines to each one’ and in accord with each one’s disposition and cooperation” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1529). In the light of this statement, the subsequent declaration on inherent grace should be understood: “through the Holy Spirit charity is poured forth in the hearts of those who are justified and inheres [inhaeret] in them” (ibid. 1530). Again: “For the justice that is called ours, because we are justified by its inhering in us, is God’s justice because He infuses it into us through the merit of Christ” (ibid. 1547).

The doctrine of grace in the Council of Trent, then, concentrates on the results of God’s sanctifying activity in man. This emphasis stems from the conviction that it is grace as it affects man that is threatened by the reformers. Yet, as so often happens after a conciliar decision, what had been intended as a specific response to a determined problematic becomes in the post-Tridentine theologians the important element in the whole treatise on grace. Thus created grace viewed only in the light of the scholastic and Counter Reformation perspectives gradually was isolated from its necessary correlative, uncreated grace. The dominant Aristotelian emphasis on causality then began to show how created grace was an effect; thus it insisted on attributing grace to God not as triune in Person but as one in nature. Conceived of in this fashion, grace is seen as uniting one to the Godhead and not so much to the individual Divine Persons. Hence, to share in the divine nature is not to enter into personal relationship with the three Divine Persons but with what makes God to be God [see R. Garrigou-Lagrange, Grace (St. Louis, Mo. 1952) 153–156]. Such a position leads to a further consequence in the history of the theology of grace: the indwelling of the Blessed Trinity is described as a formal effect of sanctifying grace.

As the historical treatment in this article has indicated, the position delineated above has had a very articulate, though minority, opposition. That opposition, at best, served only to keep the question alive. It is only in recent years that it has been recognized that the notion created grace demands as its proper correlative uncreated grace (see K. Rahner, "Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace," Theological Investigations 1:319–346; this article contains a good bibliography of contemporary articles). Richer and more profound biblical and patristic studies, a more perceptive understanding of the history of the theology of grace, as well as ecumenical exigencies have combined to bring this about. Rahner sums up this contemporary situation by pointing out that in Scripture it is the Father in the Trinity who is man's Father, while the Spirit dwells in man in a particular and proper way. Such expressions of Scripture and the monuments of tradition are first of all in possession. It is necessary to prove that they may be merely appropriations and that the contrary interpretation is impossible; this cannot be taken for granted. So long as this has not been achieved, one must understand Scripture and its expressions quite precisely (cf. ibid. 345–346).

This contemporary effort to give to the notion of uncreated grace its due primacy has given rise to a number of theological tentatives. Chronologically, the first of these is the proposal of M. De la Taille [The Hypostatic Union and Created Actuation by Uncreated Act, tr. C. Vollert (West Baden Springs, Ind. 1952)]. De la Taille postulates as his point of departure the scholastic concepts of obediential power and the composition of the finite being as act and potency. He would then maintain that God as pure act can communicate Himself as perfection to this obediential power. This communication, however, is not as a form but nevertheless as an act, or actuation, and so it is capable of transforming the creature [see P. de Letter, "Created Actuation by the Uncreated Act," Theological Studies 18 (1957) 60–92; M. J. Donnelly, "The Inhabitation of the Holy Spirit," Catholic Theological Society of America 4 (1949) 39–77; see CREATED ACTUATION BY UNCREATED ACT]. K. Rahner urges as an interpretation of the scholastic conception of uncreated grace the notion of quasi-formal causality. This notion and its context of theory relate glory and grace. In this relationship, uncreated grace is not just a consequence of grace but the central gift in the life of grace ("Some Implications of the Scholastic Concept of Uncreated Grace," Theological Investigations 319–346). More recently he has maintained that this central gift is specifically the Incarnation of the Word because this is the only way in which divine self-communication can take place [see "Zur Theologie der Menschwerdung," Schriften zur Theologie (Einsiedeln 1960) 4:137–155]. B. Lonergan, SJ, in treating of the sanctifying mission of the Holy Spirit, objects to the idea of immanent actuation. He takes the position that the divine indwelling is caused efficiently by the three Divine Persons. This indwelling, however, is constituted intrinsically by the divine relation of origin that constitutes the Person of the Holy Spirit. Yet, because this indwelling is in a creature, it has a created term (sanctifying grace), which is received in the soul as an obediential potency. This created term does not enter in any way into the constitution of the indwelling but is consequent upon the union of the Holy Spirit with the soul [Divinarum personarum conceptio analogica (2d ed. Rome 1959) 206–215].

Habitual Grace. Very widely used in theology since Trent, the term "habitual grace" has frequently designated one of the basic divisions of the treatise on grace. Like the term "created grace," it too is an effort that after Trent would emphatically formulate both the reality of the effect of God's grace and the permanence of that effect in man. Martin Luther had strongly rejected this notion of habitus partly by reason of his nominalistic background and partly by reason of his own preoccupation with the absolute gratuity of grace. In the face of this, the Council of Trent placed strong insistence on the real transformation wrought in man through justification. Hence, while it did not employ the terms "created grace" or "habit," it did speak of a grace that is infused in the justified and inheres in them (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1530, 1561). This, in turn, was taken by the post-Tridentine theologians as a confirmation of the fact that the term "habit" is descriptive of the reality of grace. By reason of this and of what they conceived to be the polemical exigencies of the Counter Reformation, the notion of habitual grace became a central aspect of their presentation.

Contemporarily there has come to the fore a strong trend that would nuance much more carefully the term "habit" when it is applied to the life of grace. It is the contention of some theologians that this term, if properly nuanced, can in fact fulfill a valuable theological role. Properly understood, it can help one keep clearly in view the fact that regenerated man is truly and actually a new creature. It also enables the theologian to give proper stress to the fact that grace's transformation is a continuing reality involving a dynamic and developing intimacy of knowledge and love of the Trinity. Finally, it can be seen as a divinely conferred instrumentality through which one participates continually, vitally, and immediately in the active and continual presence of God ["Théologie de la grâce et oecuménisme," Irénikon 28 (1955) 36–38].

Actual Grace. While there has been a flood of discussion and debate on the nature and notion of actual grace, the explicit teaching of the Church about actual grace is relatively limited. The Church distinguishes between actual grace and habitual grace (as seen above) only to the extent that it teaches that elevating grace is absolutely necessary for the supernaturally good acts through which the nonjustified man prepares himself for justification (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 375). The Church also teaches against the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians that supernatural grace is absolutely necessary for every supernaturally good act (ibid. 238–249, 373–380). In treating the acts that positively prepare for faith and justification, the Council of Trent teaches that this grace comes to man without any merit on his part whatsoever (ibid. 1525). In general, the First Vatican Council makes clear the supernaturality of these graces by affirming their absolute necessity for supernaturally good acts (ibid. 3008–10).

In affirming God's will to save all men as well as the sinfulness of man, the theologians conclude that there is a sufficient grace. The sufficient grace is constantly offered by God but is not always efficacious. This theological position is clearly the significance of the teaching of the Council of Trent in chapter 5 of the decree on justification as well as the fourth canon that is attached (ibid. 1525, 1544, 1554). The same doctrine is to be seen explicitly in the series of condemnations issued against Baius and the Jansenists (ibid. 2002, 2305–06, 2621). The correlative of sufficient grace, which is efficacious grace, has been the object of decades of unresolved dispute. The crux of the debate is the determination of how the free salutary act of man can also be God's gift. As far as Catholic doctrine is concerned, the theological consensus is that although man's freedom to accept or resist remains, still the efficacy has its source in God's gratuitous election.

From the standpoint of systematic theology, several points about actual grace should be mentioned. First, whatever be the resolution of the discussion about St. Thomas's position on actual grace [see historical section of this article; also M. C. Wheeler, "Actual Grace According to St. Thomas," Thomist 16 (1953) 334–360], there is no question that beginning with the post-Tridentine theologians the general teaching is quite clear. Almost unanimously the position has been that actual graces are distinct supernatural motions ordained to man's sanctification. Additionally, in what has been the more dominant tradition of Thomism, these actual graces are held to be given for each supernatural act and to elevate man's powers in such ways that the act is at once truly supernatural yet freely placed by man.

Commonly in post-Tridentine theology a further distinction has been introduced with regard to actual graces. It is the division between indeliberate and deliberate acts.

Indeliberate acts, in this theological context, are those that are produced by grace independently of any deliberation or free election on man's part. They are, as it were, calls or invitations to salutary action that can be consented to or rejected. The way in which actual grace accomplishes this illumination of the intellect and inspiration of the will radically divides the Thomists and the Molinists. Deliberate acts are, then, those acts of the will that, consequent upon intellectual deliberation, constitute man's free choices as well as the acts commanded by such free choices. The theological debate here has centered on the free act of the will and its relationship with the absolutely gratuitous character of God's efficacious grace. Lastly, it is in view of this distinction between indeliberate and deliberate acts that modern theology has generally tended to limit the traditional Augustinian division of grace to actual graces. Thus gratia praeveniens, excitans, and operans would apply to the indeliberate act, and gratia subsequens, adjuvans, and cooperans to the deliberate act (cf. J. Van der Meersch, "Grâce," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:1654).

Account, however, must be taken of the fact that some theologians have questioned this whole systematic development. The questions raised by H. Bouillard in his study of St. Thomas, already cited, plus historical studies on the Council of Trent, as well as the Trinitarian dynamism of the traditional doctrine of grace have been the source of a number of reservations. This contemporary position recognizes the legitimacy of the distinction between actual and habitual grace insofar as the term "actual grace" is applied to the supernatural acts of the nonjustified man preparing himself for justification. These theologians hold, however, that it is an open question whether this actual grace is distinct from the self-communication of God that, when accepted, is called habitual. They also hold that there is no agreement as to whether actual grace as distinct from justifying grace in man is necessary for every supernatural act.

To sum up: "Grace is called habitual insofar as the supernatural self-communication of God is offered to man (from Baptism on) permanently and insofar (with regard to adults) as it is freely accepted—to the particular degree possible, to the particular degree accepted. This same grace is called actual insofar as it actually produces the act of its acceptance and actualizes itself in it. This act of acceptance by its very nature is existentially gradated and ever to be renewed" (K. Rahner, "Gnade," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4:996).

With regard to this contemporary opinion on actual grace, it should be kept in mind that it is tentative. As yet there has not been any confrontation either in extent or depth with the common theological teaching. Likewise, it must not be lost sight of that, whatever be the ultimate foundations of these distinctions in the manifold reality that is grace, such distinctions are inescapable if the complex reality of grace is to be opened to any systematic understanding [see M. Schmaus, Katholische Dogmatik, v. 3.2 (Munich 1951) 16]. Finally, in the present state of historical research and biblical theology, the common theological teaching on actual grace is supported by a legitimate and defensible interpretation of Scripture and the magisterial documents. Therefore, though the question may be an open one, in the present state of the case the weight of theological opinion rests with the common teaching.

Medicinal Grace. Ever since Augustine's controversies with the Pelagians, the medicinal aspect of Christ's grace has had an essential place in Western theology. Essentially this medicinal aspect of grace simply brings to the fore the fact of original sin and the redemptive character of Christ's saving work. In the history of theology, however, this fact has required a whole series of correlative affirmations. On the one hand, concupiscence as of sin and tending to sin (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1515) can only be overcome by the special help of God. On the other hand, it must also be held that this teaching does not mean that each new act of the unjustified man is thereby a sin. Out of this arises the distinction between elevating grace and medicinal grace (see St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 109.2, 3, 4, 8). Magisterially this distinction is implied by the Councils of Orange and Trent (e.g., H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 384, 1541, 1572). Trent specifically condemns the teaching that all works done before justification are sins (ibid. 1557). Against Baius and the Jansenists the Church teaches that those not yet justified can perform genuinely holy acts with the help of grace and correlatively that their (presumed) sinful state does not make each act of theirs a mortal sin (see ibid. 1925, 1935, 1937, 2307, 2311, 2445, etc.). This teaching led to a further theological distinction: supernatural grace is absolutely necessary for supernaturally good acts, but for simply honest acts, i.e., those that fulfill the natural law, medicinal grace need not be supernatural in the fullest sense but only relatively, and might even be only external. This matter is still a debated point, as well as its further refinement as to whether it need be the grace of Christ at all. The theologians in the Thomist tradition, however, have always held firmly that the perfect fulfillment of the natural law demands that this healing grace be justifying grace.

A further consequence has followed upon the condemnations of Baius and Jansen that affirm the possibility of naturally good acts that have no bearing on salvation. In view of this teaching, the greater number of theologians have maintained the existence, in fact, of such naturally good actions that have no relation to the grace of Christ. Only a small minority of theologians, including Ripalda, for example, have taught that free will could do no good without some kind of grace [see J. M. de Ripalda, De ente supernaturali, 4 v. (Paris 1870–71) 1:209–269].

In recent years there has been a strong trend toward the reconsideration of this whole point of view. It begins with Hefele's study of the councils. In his treatment of the Council of Orange, he puts forward the opinion that canon 22 must be taken in its Augustinian context. He therefore holds that when only the natural forces of man are involved, the result is the opposite of morality, namely, sin and falsehood. Thus sin is what man has on his own and not by virtue of grace in its widest sense [see C. J. von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 2.2:1100–03]. This would be correlated with proposition 27 in the condemnation of Baius ("Free will without the aid of grace avails for nothing save sinning," H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1927) by interpreting grace here as meaning the grace of justification [see H. Küng, Justification, tr. T. Collins et al. (New York 1964) 178; H. Rondet, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948) 161]. The whole thing is summed up by Schmaus: "[S]o it must be stressed that the Church's doctrinal statements only declare the possibility of a natural morality and not its actuality. The Church's teaching, therefore, leaves the way open for the position that no purely natural act exists in fact The proposition that on a purely natural level there is no such thing as a good action finds support in the fact that the whole creation is centered on Christ and nothing stands apart from this relationship with Jesus Christ. The result of this relationship with Christ is that mankind was never without grace; grace was never absent regardless of how sparingly it might have been given. Thus, humanity never had to live under a situation totally without grace nor to bear sin in its entire horror. Baius erred in thinking unbelievers to be without grace. This error gave rise to the other that all works of the unbeliever and the pagan are sins and the virtues of the philosophers vices" [M. Schmaus Katholische Dogmatik, v. 3.2 (Munich 1951) 3.2:274–275; cf. K. Rahner, "Nature and Grace," Nature and Grace, tr. D. Wharton (New York 1964) 131–134].

Grace and freedom. As the historical part of this article indicated, the question of grace and freedom is being treated in the context of a much broader horizon contemporarily. Historical studies have served to remove layers of controversy that have tended to confine the whole discussion to the matter of free choice. Contemporary biblical theology has studied freedom in Scripture independently of these controversial presuppositions as well as of the politico-philosophical formulations of the Enlightenment. Accordingly, the treatment of grace and freedom takes as its point of departure the scriptural horizon. Biblically, human freedom is opposed not to necessity but to bondage. Only those who are naturally free can suffer bondage. In the realm of the spiritual, such bondage is sin, whereby man orders his life without reference to God. Modern thinkers have tended to correlate freedom with independence, so that the greater the freedom, the greater the independence and therefore the self-sufficiency. In Scripture, however, the reverse is true. To love and be loved gives to freedom both its meaning and its development. Yet man cannot attain this of himself. It is God who out of love delivers man from sin and through His Spirit incorporates him into the redeemed community of free men enjoying the freedom of the children of God [E. La B. Cherbonnier, "Liberty," Dictionary of the Bible, ed. J. Hastings, rev. F. C. Grant and H. H. Rowley (New York 1962) 582–583; J. Marsh, "Liberty," The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville 1962) 3:122–123; J. Dheilly, "Liberté," Dictionnaire biblique (Tournai 1964) 664–666].

Both St. John and St. Paul give much prominence to this theme of Christian freedom. "[E]very one who commits sin is a slave of sin. The slave has no permanent standing in the household, but the son belongs to it forever. If the Son sets you free, you shall be truly free" (Jn 8.35–36). "Christ set us free; to be free men stand firm then and refuse to be tied to the yoke of slavery again" (Gal 4.31–5.1). Starting with this biblical perspective, a number of theologians have begun to give prominence to St. Augustine's distinction between Christian liberty (libertas christiana) and free choice (liberum arbitrium). From this standpoint, only the Christian in grace really possesses liberty since only the Christian united with God in love is able to accomplish the ends for which he was created. In terms of systematic theology with a strong personalist emphasis, this has been particularly well expressed by P. Fransen, SJ, in "Towards a Psychology of Divine Grace," Cross Currents 8 (1958) 211–232. He states that if one's exercise of free will is to become truly human, then "this early form of liberty [free will] must be directed by something deeper, more stable, supported and directed by a profound and total commitment, by a fundamental option in which I express myself wholly with all that I wish to be in this world and before God" (214). It is this fundamental, spontaneous orientation of a man's life that is at the same time actualized in a series of particular actions forming the visible woof of his life. This involves a constant interaction between one's conscious actions of the moment and his fundamental option and orientation.

Man, however, is born a sinner, and it is precisely at the depth of this fundamental option that the problem of sin is most acute. Fransen finds the essential alternative facing man's personal liberty posed by St. Augustine: love of God or love of self. Either the love of God through others and the forgetfulness of self or the love of self to the denial of God and the inclusion of all the forms of pride and hate. Only grace can overcome this solitude of sin. For the grace of Christ is first of all a call of divine love to man to make the fundamental option by which alone he will be fully free. This grace calls and urges from without and from within, and if man consents to it he is restored to that liberty that wells up out of the very center of his existence. Man, in grace, is free and able to actualize in union with the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit the total gift of himself that is God's call and grace for man. Thus grace as the love and mercy of God is the soul of Christian freedom, the very gift of the Spirit. The vocation of the Christian is the vocation to freedom, for the Christian law is the law of love, "the glorious liberty of the sons of God" (Rom 8.21) [see also A. M. Henry, OP, "The Law of the Spirit and Freedom," The Holy Spirit, tr. J. Lundberg and M. Bell (New York 1960) 119–138; R. Guardini, Freedom, Grace and Destiny, tr. J. Murray (New York 1961)].

Grace and the Church. Once grace is viewed in its full scriptural reality as the supernatural economy of God's personal and saving activity, then the ecclesial dimension of grace must also be taken into account. As the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Vatican Council II states, "He [the Father] planned to assemble in the holy Church all those who would believe in Christ. Already from the beginning of the world the foreshadowing of the Church took place. It was prepared in a remarkable way throughout the history of the people of Israel and by means of the old covenant. In this present era of time the Church was constituted and by the outpouring of the Spirit it made manifest. At the end of time it will gloriously achieve completion, when, as is read in the Fathers, all the just from Adam and 'from Abel the just one to the last of the elect' will be gathered together with the Father in the universal Church" [Lumen gentium 2; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 6].

Underlying this magisterial statement is the clear proclamation of Scripture that the grace of the Father in Christ working through the Spirit establishes a communion of fellowship with Christ. The whole economy of grace is established to draw men into the Church, the gathering together of all those who believe. Grace, therefore, cannot be seen as distinct from the Church, since both are indivisible aspects of the one saving design of God. The Church is the very heart of the redeeming work of God. Through it the Father has gathered for Himself a people sanctified in Christ through the Holy Spirit. This people, freed from sin and united with God through grace, constitutes a family of divinely adopted sons, the Body of Christ. As P. Fransen has written: "It ought to be plain that the being and substance of the Church ought not to be thought of as distinct from grace. In fact, the Church is grace par excellence insofar as she manifests visibly that aspect of grace which binds us all like brothers and sisters into a true and everlasting people of the promise and the inheritance" [Divine Grace and Man, tr. G. Dupont (New York 1962) 111].

This ecclesial aspect of grace finds its central manifestation in the worship of the Church. For in the liturgy ecclesial, communal worship is offered by the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST—head and members. The liturgical action of the Church is the supreme expression of grace in the Church. To this loving worship of the community of Christ all the actions of the Church are ultimately ordered—authority, Sacrament, and ministry of the Word. It is from this worship that the saving activity of the Church itself flows. "The liturgy in its turn moves the faithful, filled with 'the paschal sacraments,' to be 'one in holiness'; it prays that 'they may hold fast in their lives to what they have grasped by their faith'; the renewal in the Eucharist of the covenant between the Lord and man draws the faithful into the compelling love of Christ and sets them on fire. From the liturgy, therefore, and especially from the Eucharist, as from a fount, grace is poured forth upon us; and the sanctification of men in Christ and the glorification of God, to which all the other activities of the Church are directed as towards their end, is achieved in the most efficacious way possible" [Vatican II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 10; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56 (1964) 102].

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT (Paris 1951) Tables générales 1:1844–68. N. J. HEIN et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1630–45. J. HASPECKER et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:977–1000. F. STEGMÜLLER, ibid. 1002–10. K. RAHNER, ibid. 1010–14. J. AUER, ibid. 1014–15. F. LAKNER, ibid. 1015–16. I. HERMANN and J. AUER, H. FRIES, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe (Munich 1962–63) 1:548–562. J. GUILLET et al., Catholicisme 5:135–172. C. BAUMGARTNER, La Grâce du Christ (Tournai 1963). J. DAUJAT, The Theology of Grace (New York 1959). S. DOCKX, Fils de Dieu par grâce (Paris 1948). F. CUTTAZ, Our Life of Grace, tr. A. BOUCHARD (Chicago, Ill. 1958). R. W. GLEASON, Grace (New York 1962). C. JOURNET, The Meaning of Grace, tr. A. V. LITLEDALE (New York 1960; pa. 1964). H. LANGE, De gratia (Freiburg 1929). L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae, 4.1 (5th ed. Barcelona 1951). J. H. NICOLAS, The Mystery of God's Grace (pa. Dubuque, Iowa 1960). G. STEVENS, The Life of Grace (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). H. BOUILLARD, "La Théologie de la grâce au XIII^e siècle," Recherches de science religieuse 35 (1948) 469–480. G. DE BROGLIE, "De gratitudine ordinis supernaturalis," Gregorianum 29 (1948) 435–463. H. RONDET, "La Divinisation du chrétien," Nouvelle revue théologique 71 (1949) 449–476, 561–588. F. COLBORN, "The Theology of Grace," Theological Studies 31 (1970) 692–711. P. FRANSEN, The New Life of Grace (Tournai 1969). G. GUTIERREZ, A Theology of Liberation (Maryknoll 1973). H. KÜNG, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection (New York 1964). J. MACKAY, The Grace of God, The Response of Man (Albany, N.Y. 1966). W. MEISSNER, Foundations for a Psychology of Grace (Glen Rock, N.J. 1966). J. METZ, Theology of the World (New York 1969). K. RAHNER, "Grace: Systematic," Sacramentum Mundi 2.415–421; "Justified and Sinner at the Same Time," Theological Investigations 6 (1969) 218–230; "Questions of Controversial Theology on Justification," ibid. 4 (1966) 189–218. J. L. SEGUNDO, Grace and the Human Condition (Maryknoll 1973). B. J. F. LONERGAN, Grace and Freedom: Operative Grace in the Thought of St. Thomas Aquinas (Collected Works of Bernard Lonergan 1; Toronto, Ont. 1988). P. C. PHAN, Grace and the Human Condition (Message of the Fathers of the Church 15; Wilmington, Del. 1988). D. COFFEY, Grace: the Gift of the Holy Spirit (Faith and Culture 2; Manly, N.S.W. 1979). J. P. WAWRYKOW, God's Grace and Human Action: "Merit" in the Theology of Thomas Aquinas (Notre Dame, Ind. 1995). S. J. DUFFY, The Dynamics of Grace: Perspectives in Theological Anthropology (New Theology Studies 3; Collegeville, Minn. 1993).

[E. M. BURKE/F. COLBORN/S. KENEL]

GRACE, CONTROVERSIES ON

A series of disputes through the history of the Church over various aspects of the theology of GRACE.

Early Centuries. The Catholic doctrine of grace was first attacked by Gnostics, against whom St. Jude seemed to be writing "godless men . . . are perverting the life of grace our God has bestowed on us. They even deny Jesus Christ, our one Lord and Master" (Jude 4); "animal natures without the life of the Spirit" (Jude 19). St. Irenaeus continued to defend the doctrine of grace against Gnosticism, insisting on the presence of the Holy Spirit in souls. Origen emphasized Christ's presence in the Christian (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. [Paris 1857–66] 14:1037–39). Macedonianism, which attacked the divinity of the Holy Spirit, caused St. Basil to describe the role of the Holy Spirit as sanctifier and to develop the theology of grace (Patrologia Graeca 29:660, 725). Gregory of Nyssa also treated the Holy Spirit as sanctifier (Patrologia Graeca 45:1328–29) but further emphasized the divine INDWELLING in the souls of the just (Patrologia Graeca 44:1248). This doctrine became a favorite theme of St. Cyril, who even said that catechumens having the faith are already indwelt by the Holy Spirit (Patrologia Graeca 33:344). Ever since, the Greek Church has generally been content to concentrate on the divine indwelling in its doctrine of grace without trying to develop a fuller theology of grace.

St. AUGUSTINE, father of Western theology, under the stimulus of Pelagian opposition, developed a doctrine of grace and predestination that still is very influential in the West. In it he emphasized the remedial character of grace and its necessity, the gratuity of grace and of predestination, the fewness of the elect, and the divine indwelling (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 12:1–571). He himself retracted his initial erroneous belief in man's ability to reach unaided the initium fidei (Retract. 1.23.2; see FAITH, BEGINNING OF).

Pelagius was a Celtic monk who visited Rome (c. 400), and Africa (410). At first St. Augustine respected him but then opposed him vigorously (410) in De peccatorum meritis and De spiritu et littera. For Pelagius nature, free will, and moral law, the example or doctrine of Christ, and forgiveness of sins are grace. Man should ask God's pardon but not His help, for there is no free will if it needs other help of God. If other grace is needed, it is due to men's efforts and comes to crown their merits. For Augustine grace is a collection of gifts pertaining to salvation, really distinct from nature and natural perfections. Man is dependent on such grace to do good. Such grace is not only necessary but gratuitous, a free gift of God not due to man's efforts. Pelagius considered all sins mortal but held that men not only could and should achieve sinlessness but had. Augustine denied this. By making no distinction between pagan and Christian, Pelagius saw more clearly than others that men before Christ could be saved; the mistake he made was in understanding them to be saved without Christ's grace. He withdrew to Palestine, where an inconclusive investigation of his doctrine was made. His treatise on free will was condemned at Carthage (416). Nine canons dealing with Pelagianism survive from the Council of CARTHAGE in 418 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 222–230; see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM).

John Cassian and others in southern France modified Pelagius's ideas but developed the error later called SEMI-PELAGIANISM, which ascribed more to nature and less to grace than had Augustine. To unaided human nature it attributed "a certain beginning of good will" (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 49:912–913) and the power to merit or impetrate salutary graces and to "initiate faith." Prosper of Aquitaine opposed these errors, and they were rejected in the Indiculus (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 238–249). They were finally and effectively condemned by the Second Council of Orange (529), under Caesarius of Arles, which asserted vigorously that grace anticipates man's SALUTARY ACTS and causes them (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 370–397); these conciliar pronouncements now have dogmatic value.

Medieval Period. The Carolingian era experienced a revival of Augustinian theology under Alcuin

(Patrologia Latina 100: 934). But shortly afterward the Benedictine Gottschalk of Orbais taught an uncompromising predestination that permitted the letter of Augustine's thought to triumph over the spirit. Denounced by Rabanus Maurus, he passionately defended himself (Patrologia Latina 121:368) at Mainz (848) but was condemned at Quiercy (849) and imprisoned for life. At this time Frankish bishops and abbots and the Sees of Reims and Lyons differed sharply in their interpretations of Augustine. Hincmar of Reims enlisted the dubious aid of John Scotus Erigena. But John's emphasis on human liberty was so strong and his reduction of predestination to prescience was so evident that to the opposition he seemed to be a pure Pelagian (Patrologia Latina 119:101–250; 121:985–1134). Still, Hincmar's views prevailed at Quiercy-sur-Oise (853), where it was declared that God predestines the good and foresees the loss of the wicked, that man can choose if preserved and helped by grace, and that Christ died for all without exception (Enchiridion symbolorum 621–624). But a rival council at Valence (855) maintained a double predestination (Enchiridion symbolorum 625–633). This protracted struggle brought some profit to the theology of grace by its insistence on God's universal salvific will. (See OMNISCIENCE.)

In the 12th century, Abelard briefly espoused Pelagianism and argued that since original sin did not remove man's free will, pagan philosophers could have practiced supernatural virtues. But St. Bernard secured his condemnation (1140) at Sens (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 725), and Abelard retracted (Patrologia Latina 178:707).

The great schoolmen, especially St. Thomas Aquinas, while remaining Augustinian, revived the Greek emphasis on the divine indwelling. But some extreme and erroneous views appeared in the 14th and 15th centuries. Eckhart, the German mystic who identified men in grace so absolutely with God as to say, "God's eyes are his eyes," was condemned in 1329 (Enchiridion symbolorum 950–980). The Beghards, who had identified God with grace-filled souls, were also condemned (1312) at Vienne (Enchiridion symbolorum 891–899). William of Ockham (d. c. 1349), whose ideas later had a profound influence on Biel and Luther, promoted nominalism and voluntarism to such an extent as to deny any connection between grace here and glory hereafter. Thus, according to Ockham, God could arbitrarily give or refuse either, and JUSTIFICATION is extrinsic. Biel, a Pelagian, insisted that man unaided by grace could love God supernaturally and that God could declare sinners just. Nominalism thus laid a foundation for Reformation theology.

Reform and Counter Reform. Martin Luther, Ockham's heir, taught man's radical corruption through original sin, which poisons good works. Hence when one is justified by faith and Christ's merits are imputed to him, sin remains. Luther's theories answered his agonized cry, "How shall I find a gracious God?" His answer, erected into a universal system, is salvation through trust in Christ's efficacious Redemption, through grace (i.e., mercy), through God's gracious disposition to accept sinners unconditionally through baptism (whence Luther's triumphant retort in temptation to despair, "Baptizatus sum!"). The divine love and mercy live in Christ. All is given in Him. He is the word divine, i.e., the fullest expression of who God is and what God wills (Skydsgaard, 135). The word itself operates as a means of grace through which the new world comes into existence here and now. Nevertheless, although grace alone saves men, it changes nothing (see IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT).

Luther conceived justifying faith as a leap upward in confidence to the terrifying God who damns whom He wills but saves those abandoning themselves to His infinite mercy. Luther scorned the justitarius obsessed with the law (Skydsgaard, 134). Justification is not through common beliefs and observances but comes from a divine decree of justification that renders the mortally sinful actions of those thus justified only venial. Hence man is saved by a juridical fiction in a once-and-for-all event when a man grasps by faith the fact of his election by God. In De servo arbitrio (1525) Luther taught double predestination, using the analogy of a beast ridden by God or the devil, but later Lutheran theologians rejected this doctrine. In De captivitate babilonica and De libertate christiana Luther aimed to separate souls from the Church that he felt would stifle them once the means of grace became an end in themselves. He separated absolutely grace here from glory hereafter since grace is only imputed but never really belongs to the soul.

John Calvin carried Lutheran justification to its logical conclusion: absolute antecedent predestination and reprobation. Though God calls all to salvation through exterior preaching, this affects only the predestined (Institutes of the Christian Religion 3.24.8), and they cannot lose grace. Man cannot keep the law (2.5) and is incapable of merit (3.15). Yet the Church is not intangible: to obey it is to obey God.

The Council of Trent's comprehensive decrees on original sin and justification (Enchiridion symbolorum 1510–16; 1520–83) were the Catholic dogmatic answers to the errors of Luther and Calvin. The council rejected the idea of extrinsic justification and maintained that man is justified by an interior justice infused by the Holy Spirit. It declared that man genuinely cooperates through his free will in the work of his own justification and, with the grace of Christ, merits his final reward. Thus it condemned the subjectivism in justification that would stand "man alone before God alone" and emphasized strongly (1) justification's radical, ontological transformation of man and (2) the need for man's cooperation in it. But it left unsolved many problems, such as the identification of grace with charity, the existence of infused moral virtues, and the value of works done before justification.

Baius (d. 1589), a Louvain theologian, was nominalist and Protestant in his views of fallen man: grace only restores man's natural powers. Without grace fallen man can only sin, and so all the works of infidels are sins. Man must be satisfied with imperfect justice that God mercifully accepts as true justice. Condemned (1567) by Pius V (Enchiridion symbolorum 1901–80), Baius submitted and died in the Church, but his theories survived in Jansenism (see BAIUS AND BAIANISM).

De Auxiliis. The most dramatic controversy on grace, although happily not the most disastrous, was the struggle between Dominicans and Jesuits over Molinism. Luis de MOLINA, SJ (1536–1600), theologian and teacher, was opposed by Domingo Báñez, OP. The controversy revolved around the questions of predestination and, more narrowly, the infallible efficacy of grace, which both sides accepted absolutely. With regard to the former, is it antecedent or consequent upon God's knowledge of man's merits? With regard to the latter, is grace infallibly efficacious because efficacious grace is intrinsically different from merely sufficient grace, or because of the knowledge God has prior to man's foreseen acts of what use each man will make of all possible graces? Molina postulated in God middle knowledge (SCIENTIA MEDIA), a knowledge of the FUTURIBLES; the existence of this middle knowledge is basic to his whole theory.

Báñez and the theologians of Salamanca opposed Molinism, for Molina's efforts to save human liberty seemed to them, among other things, an oversimplification of the divine action. In a series of public discussions beginning in 1582 at Valladolid, Diego Nuño, OP, attacked Molina's theories; Antonio de Padilla, SJ, defended them. Nuño declared Molina a heretic when Padilla quoted the latter, saying, "With the same grace given to many, one man is converted, another is not." Bitter quarreling broke up the discussion. On May 17, 1583, a second disputation likewise ended in a battle. The struggle was augmented when Báñez published his course (1584), and Molina, extracts from his called Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis . . . (Lisbon 1588). The reception of the Concordia was very diverse. Báñez had tried in vain to prevent its publication. The Spanish Inquisition attacked it, and the fight spread beyond theological circles (see MOLINISM; BÁÑEZ AND BÁÑEZIANISM).

Ultimately Clement VIII intervened (1594), suspended the Spanish investigation, and commanded the superiors of both orders to send him statements of their teachings on grace. He decided then to hear both parties; thus began the famous Congregationes de [divinae gratiae] auxiliis, which met in 120 sessions from 1598 to 1607. They were terminated inconclusively by Paul V, who forbade further public discussions (Dec. 1, 1611). A formula for ending the dispute was imposed (Enchiridion symbolorum 1997). Paul V denied the alleged Calvinism of the Dominicans and the Pelagianism of the Jesuits and affirmed the orthodoxy of both orders. With the publication of Cardinal H. Noris's Historia pelagiana (1673), the Augustinian Order became involved in the grace controversy. J. H. Serry, OP, in 1699 and L. de Meyer, SJ, in 1705 wrote histories of the controversy from their respective viewpoints. In 1748 Benedict XIV stated that all three views of grace, the Dominican, the Jesuit, and the Augustinian, could be held (Enchiridion symbolorum 2564–65). This controversy on grace helped to clarify the question of God's universal salvific will just when the West was becoming conscious of the existence of countless pagans. (See CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS.)

Jansenism. Cornelius JANSEN (1585–1638), ignoring the theological labors of centuries, tried to present a purely Augustinian theology of grace in his AUGUSTINUS, which was published posthumously (Louvain 1640). In book 3, “De gratia Christi Salvatoris,” Jansen said that man is not really free—as Bañezians and Molinists claimed—but only extrinsically so, being interiorly necessitated by grace and consequently absolutely predestined. There is no truly but merely sufficient grace. The only true grace of Christ the Savior is efficacious grace, and this is given to the predestined alone, for Christ died for the salvation of the predestined alone. All humanity logically could have been damned, and the majority will be, including unbaptized infants and infidels. Jansen's errors were condemned in 1653 (Enchiridion symbolorum 2001–10) and in 1656 (Enchiridion symbolorum 2010–12). A formula of submission was offered the Jansenists (Enchiridion symbolorum 2020), but they continued to resist and their errors were condemned again by Alexander VIII (Enchiridion symbolorum 2301–32), and by Clement XI in 1705 (Enchiridion symbolorum 2390). Finally the bull Unigenitus (Enchiridion symbolorum 2400–2502) condemned the Jansenist errors as elaborated by P. Quesnel, who was called the second founder of Port-Royal. (See JANSENISM.)

Later Developments. The Jesuit D. Petau (1583–1652) recognized the fact of development of doctrine and the imperfections in patristic teaching. Though many of his views were almost universally rejected, he opened up again vistas on the divinization of the Christian by grace that prepared the way for the “theology in excelsis” of M. J. Scheeben (1835–88). Scheeben, a fervent Thomist, revived the scholastic tradition. But while agreeing that works of the Godhead ad extra must be attributed to the common unitary activity of the three Persons, he still felt that St. Thomas suggests that the divinization of souls is not merely a work ad extra (Summa theologiae 1a, 43.3 ad 1). Hence he taught that the Trinity dwells in the soul in grace in such a way as to set up in it personal relations with each member of the Trinity. He was sharply criticized, especially by T. Grandérath. Today the nature and mode of the divine indwelling are matters of liveliest controversy; cf. e.g., the theories of P. Galtier, S. Dockx, M. De la Taille, K. Rahner, P. De Letter, M. Donnelly, T. Mullaney, and B. Lonergan.

Many 20th-century Protestant theologians, such as K. Barth and T. F. Torrance, differed sharply from Catholic theologians on matters of grace. Contemporary Lutheran theology comes closer to the Catholic position, though there are differences.

See Also: GRACE, ARTICLES ON; GRACE, EFFICACIOUS; GRACE, SUFFICIENT; VIRTUE; SUPERNATURAL.

Bibliography: J. FERGUSON, Pelagius: A Historical and Theological Study (Cambridge, Eng. 1956). R. HEDDE and É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:675–715. Augustine's anti-Pelagian works, ed. C. F. URBA and J. ZYCHA, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum Latinorum 12:1–571. C. LAMBOT, Godescalc d'Orbais: Oeuvres théologiques et grammaticales (Louvain 1946). J. ANCELET-HUSTACHE, Master Eckhart and the Rhineland Mystics, tr. H. GRAEF (pa. New York 1958). G. BIEL, Quaestiones de justificatione, ed. C. FECKES (Aschendorff 1929). H. A. OBERMAN, The Harvest of Mediaeval Theology: Gabriel Biel and Late Mediaeval Nominalism (Cambridge, Mass. 1963). M. LUTHER, Works, ed. J. PELIKAN (St. Louis-Philadelphia 1955–64). H. JEDIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:1223–30. F. STEGMÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1002–07. L. MOLINA, Concordia . . ., ed. J. RABENECK (Madrid-Oña 1952). P. MANDONNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2.1:140–146. J. BRODRICK, The Life and Work of Blessed Robert Francis Cardinal Bellarmine, 2 v. (London 1927–28). J. H. SERRY, Historia congregationum de auxiliis divinae gratiae (Venice 1740). L. DE MEYER, Historia controversiarum ab objectionibus H. Serry vindicata (Brussels 1715; Venice 1742). N. DEL PRADO, De gratia et libero arbitrio, 3 v. (Fribourg 1907). V. MUÑOZ, Nuevos documentos acerca de las controversias “de auxiliis” en Salamanca: Salmanticensis 1 (Salamanca 1954) 440–449. G. GERBERON, Michaelis Baii opera (Cologne 1696). X. LE BACHELET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2.1:38–111. J. CARREYRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 8.1:377–448; 13.2:1460–1535. H. DE LUBAC, Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946). H. RONDET, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948). M. J. FARRELLY, Predestination, Grace, and Free Will (Westminster, Md. 1964). L. BOUYER, The Spirit and Forms of Protestantism, tr. A. V. LIT-

TLEDALE (Westminster, Md. 1956). K. E. SKYDSGAARD, One in Christ, tr. A. C. KILDEGAARD (Philadelphia 1957). W. M. HORTON, Christian Theology, an Ecumenical Approach (rev. ed. New York 1958). M. LACKMANN, The Augsburg Confession and Catholic Unity, tr. W. R. BOUMAN (New York 1963). R. NIEBUHR, The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 v. (New York 1941–43) 2:98–126, 127–212. C. MOELLER, “Théologie de la grâce et oecumenisme,” Irénikon (1955) 19–56.

[C. M. AHERNE]

GRACE, CREATED AND UNCREATED

Created grace is any grace that results from God communicating Himself beyond nature’s demands, such as the beatific vision and all supernatural creatures positively leading to it. It may be actual or habitual, external or internal, medicinal or elevating, or anything else, so long as it is a creature positively undue to the person it enhances. Since the reality signified by the term grace is found properly both in God and in created things given to creatures beyond their due, the term grace applies truly to some created gifts of the supernatural order. It is therefore some gratuitous gift of God, distinct from God Himself, positively leading to the beatific vision of God.

God Himself, given to a creature beyond any of its demands, is uncreated grace. Examples are primarily: the Blessed Trinity indwelling in the just as distinct from created gifts, the Son of God given in the Incarnation, the Holy Spirit sent men by the Father and the Son, the love of God for men that is God Himself beyond the demands of nature, and predestination, or God’s decree to glorify those who shall be saved. This concept of grace is commonly admitted by theologians; for every supernatural gift is rightly called grace, and preeminent among these is God Himself.

Bibliography: C. BAUMGARTNER, La Grâce du Christ (Tournai 1963). I. WILLIG, Geschaffende und Ungeschaffende Gnade (Münster 1964). H. RONDET, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948). P. FRANSEN, Divine Grace and Man, tr. G. DUPONT (rev. ed. New York 1965).

[F. L. SHEERIN]

GRACE, EFFICACIOUS

A division of actual internal grace, efficacious grace means today grace that infallibly obtains the free cooperation of the will. It is considered in two senses: (1) as actually producing, together with the will, the election of a free act—efficacious grace has this connection with the free act from the consent of the will; (2) as already having infallible connection with a future free act of the will prior to that free action absolutely foreseen by God.

Grace Efficacious before Will’s Consent. Some have questioned whether all efficacious grace has this efficacy. St. Alphonsus Liguori and others speak of a grace of prayer, given to everyone and rendered efficacious by the recipient’s consent. It has no more prior connection with consent rather than dissent; it gets its efficacy entirely from the recipient’s response. With this grace all can pray. If they pray, they infallibly receive grace of its nature efficacious, which is necessary for more difficult deeds.

Some modern theologians simply assert that efficacious grace means that the performance of a good act by man is due to God’s primacy in grace manifesting itself in man’s good act. Others identify efficacy with the infallibility of grace in obtaining God’s absolute will in creation prior to man’s absolute consent: the city of the blessed. Thus, grace is efficacious in obtaining good acts from mankind as a whole, the acts of individuals being left out of the direct consideration.

But the majority of theologians hold that all efficacious grace has infallible power to obtain the consent of the will prior to the will’s consent; for otherwise there could be no providence in God, nor any certain and infallible predestination of the elect, nor would there be any certain and infallible means of implementing the divine will.

Places in Scripture (Prv 21.1; Jer 31.33; Ez 11.9; Jn 10.29; Phil 2.13) bear out the idea that grace has efficacy prior to the consent of the will, but not all has; however, Christian humility has always understood that the difference between one and another in the work of salvation is always due to God’s action, which would not be true if the reason why grace is efficacious in one and not another is sometimes the consent of the will. From this follows the corollary that every good act performed by man is a special benefit of God.

Freedom under Efficacious Grace. But despite this priority of the efficacy of grace, it in no way necessitates the will’s consent, but leaves intact the ability to dissent, under the action of the most powerful grace; it does not move the will irresistibly to will that to which it solicits it. Man, even under the action of grace, which is infallibly going to obtain the will’s consent, retains the power of self-determination to will or not will deliberately that to which he is solicited by preceding indeliberate acts; infallibly he will consent, but he can dissent—efficacious grace does not remove this power. It should be noted that to predetermine the will is not the same as to necessitate it; the former effects that man will infallibly consent, but it does not thereby remove the power of dissent, which is freedom of choice.

In view of recent Catholic writing a distinction should be made between acting freely under grace, with the power not to act, and acting spontaneously, gladly, willingly. The latter is spontaneity, not freedom; a free act may be made with great reluctance, as it was in the agony in the garden.

The reformers held that every grace necessitates the will; it acts spontaneously, but not freely. The Jansenists also held that efficacious grace, stronger than the opposite concupiscence, necessitates the will. But the freedom of the will under the influence of efficacious grace is a dogma of faith; (see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1554, 2002–03). For Biblical reference (see Sir 31.8–11; 2 Cor 6.1); they show that man is able to dissent from the very grace to which he consents.

One meets here two facts. The efficacy of grace is not derived from the consent of the will, yet it leaves the will free. Theologians have striven over this problem for centuries without definite conclusion.

Bibliography: ALPHONSUS LIGUORI, The Great Means of Salvation and of Perfection, ed. E. GRIMM (Brooklyn 1927). B. BERAZA, De gratia Christi (Bilbao 1929). J. FARRELLY, Predestination, Grace and Free Will (Westminster, Md. 1964). P. FRANSEN, Divine Grace and Man, tr. G. DUPONT (New York 1965). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Grace, tr. Dominican Nuns, Menlo Park, Calif. (St. Louis 1957). S. GONZÁLEZ, Scaræ theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain, 4 v. (Madrid), v. 1 (1962), v. 2 (1958), v. 3 1961), v. 4 (1962); Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945) 3.3:295–312. H. LANGE, De gratia (Freiburg 1929). J. POHLE, Grace, Actual and Habitual, ed. and tr. A. PREUSS (St. Louis 1942). H. RONDET, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948).

[F. L. SHEERIN]

GRACE, SACRAMENTAL

This article discusses the nature and the objective efficacy of the Sacraments, and the special questions of the efficacy of infant Baptism and reviviscence from the perspective of scholastic theology. Other theological approaches to these questions may be found in the entry SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY. See also: EX OPERE OPERANTIS; EX OPERE OPERATO; BAPTISM OF INFANTS; REVIVISCENCE, SACRAMENTAL.

Nature of Sacramental Grace

In the history of sacramental theology several opinions have been offered to explain the nature of sacramental grace. Some theologians teach that sacramental and sanctifying grace are identical; others maintain a strict and real distinction between them but explain this distinction in various ways.

Sacramental and Sanctifying Grace Really Identical. There is no distinction whatsoever between them.

Although held centuries ago, this position is no longer held by any reputable theologian, for several reasons. First, it would call into serious question the wisdom of God's having instituted seven Sacraments instead of one, if they all give exactly the same kind of grace or the same grace. Moreover, it does not adequately explain the Church's official teaching that the Sacraments "are not equal to one another and that there is a diversity of worth among them" (Denz 1603).

Sacramental and Sanctifying Grace Not Really Identical. But this distinction between the two is not understood by all theologians in exactly the same way. The following variant explanations are the most common.

A Right to Actual Graces. Sacramental grace differs from common sanctifying grace insofar as it confers a right to the actual graces to be received in accordance with the demands of the Christian situation in life into which one is introduced by the reception of a particular Sacrament. This opinion was so widespread until recently that it was the one most commonly accepted by theologians. This right is something juridical, effecting nothing real in the person or his powers, not even the grace-reality or life that he receives through the Sacrament. Thus the various Sacraments would not really give a different grace or permanent Christian elevation of a peculiar kind. Rather, they would seem to give the same grace plus a juridical title to actual graces needed by the person because of his having received a Sacrament. The sacramental grace would be only this juridical title (J. de Lugo, G. Vazquez, F. Suárez, J. Gonet, D. de Soto).

Special Habitus. Another group of theologians, declaring that this explanation does not satisfy the teaching of the Council of Trent, offered another. Sacramental grace differs from common sanctifying grace insofar as it adds one or several special habitus through the intermediary of which sanctifying grace performs the acts to which the Sacraments commission a person and by which the deficiencies of the powers of the soul are partially counteracted. These additional habitus so strengthen these powers that they easily perform the acts demanded by their new sacramental status, and they formally and immediately heal the wounds inflicted on the soul by sin (J. Capreolus, B. Brazzarola, B. Leeming).

Special Mode of Sanctifying Grace. Still a third opinion claims that sacramental grace is a special mode of sanctifying grace acting as a basis or fundament for correlative actual graces to be received in view of the purposes for which the Sacrament is given. The reasoning lying behind this position is quite clear. Because the different Sacraments have different purposes for which they have been instituted and because they have a distinct signification, causality, and necessity, they seem to communicate distinct graces for their effects. Sacramental grace is distinct from sanctifying grace not as one reality is distinct from another reality, but as a reality is distinct from a peculiar mode or orientation that it has or that it assumes in order to meet new demands. Insofar as the various Sacraments make us members of Christ according to a variety of offices and commissions and functions within His Body, the Church, they confer on us those effects of this new life in Christ necessary to meet the demands of our peculiar ecclesial mission. This permanent orientation of sanctifying grace also establishes a basis or fundament, or it connotes a right to all the actual graces that will be needed to fulfill the new Christian life-situation for which we have been sacramentalized (John of St. Thomas, Salmanticenses, A. Piolanti, H. Bouëssé, R. Garrigou-Lagrange, E. Schillebeeckx).

At the heart of all sacramentalism there occurs an encounter with God. But this takes place within the framework of a visible and an ecclesial action, that is, through a visible sacramental action of Christ and the Church, which is His earthly Body or Self. Grace, or communion and encounter, is made real in a liturgical action that shows both the nature of the gift and the demands that it makes on the recipient. Thus sacramental grace is the grace of the redemption, but grace in its direction and application to the seven different situations in which a Christian can find himself within the Church. Or it is the grace of redemption having a peculiar function with reference to a particular ecclesial and Christian situation of life and to a particular need of man. We might speak of grace as being modified or tailored to meet these needs. The Anointing of the Sick, for example, has as its ecclesial effect a more specific incorporation into the Church that has been given power over death. The Church's anointing gives one in serious suffering a share in the suffering of Christ and the Church. And thus the anointed has a special ecclesial status making him the object of the special prayer and solicitude of the Church.

From this it should be clear that sacramental grace is sanctifying grace itself, but as coming to us visibly in the Church in the fullness of its power, specifically ordered and aimed to meet the particular ecclesial needs of life and the special commissions of a Christian in the Church. It is because the Sacraments give positive commissions or functions within the Church that the grace they communicate is permanently oriented to receive the actual graces needed to fulfill such functions.

Of course, extrasacramental graces are also possible to man, but these are meant to grow in the recipient to a culminating point—a personal and decisive communion with God that is had through the activity of the Church. A certain grace can be present for man apart from the Sacraments, but this would seem to have some orientation toward one or other of them. It would be a kind of inchoate grace that normally reaches full development only in the Sacraments; for it is only there that communion in grace is achieved within an ecclesial context within the Church as the fullness of Christ or as His earthly Body.

Objective Efficacy of the Sacraments

The Council of Trent has defined that “the Sacraments of the New Law confer grace EX OPERE OPERATO,” on those who place no obstacle in the way of this grace (Denz 1606, 1608). This notion opus operatum has often been misunderstood, especially by those not of the Catholic faith. For these it means automatic conferral, such that the Sacraments are considered to possess a kind of magical force that the recipient cannot resist and that does not at all require dispositions on the part of either the minister or the recipient. This, however, is not the true Catholic position.

Ex opere operato is a technical phrase opposed to EX OPERE OPERANTIS. It admits of an older interpretation dating especially from Trent up to recent times; and of a newer interpretation that is really not so new but is a return to the full meaning of the term. The older view limits the expression to the level of validity. So understood, ex opere operato means that the correct bringing together of the matter and form, or the action and formula or word, brings about the sacramental effect. While this mode of presenting the Catholic position is not inexact, it is incomplete. That is why the newer view is attempting to see the expression as having a very definite Christological character. It means exactly the same as “by the power of Christ and God.” It means that the sacramental action as an act, done in virtue of a character, is objectively and ministerially an act of Christ, an objective celebration-in-mystery of the historical redemptive mystery of Christ. This action brings about the unmerited application of the redemption and is a work of pure mercy toward the person involved. If the bringing together of the matter and form of a Sacrament communicates grace, this happens because this action in the hands of the Church and her ministers is an act of Christ by which He works His redemption in a member of His Body, and this independently of the merits (not the dispositions) of the subject, or minister, or both.

Ex opere operantis refers to the work of the minister, or the subject of the Sacrament, or both in sacramental actions. While the dispositions of these do not play or constitute a part of the sacramental action (since this is an action of Christ and the Church), still these dispositions do have a very necessary part to play in sacramen-talism considered as the actual reception of grace given through a Sacrament. A sacramental event is intended to bring about communion with Christ, and for this the religious attitude of the recipient is most important. If the sacramental action, the advent of Christ, is not personally desired and met (in keeping with the state of the recipient, of course) communion or encounter with Christ cannot occur. This implies that a Sacrament that is fully such (fruitful as well as valid) does not consist only in the visible manifestation of Christ's redemptive action or only in the visibility of the Church's will to sanctify. It must consist also in the visible expression of the recipient's personal desire for grace and his will to be sanctified. We can speak of a minimum and an optimum and intermediate grades of disposition on the part of the recipient that account for the varying degrees of encounter or fruitfulness. Moreover, there must also be some active dispositions on the part of the minister, if the Sacrament is to be effective. Here also we have a minimum and an optimum (and varying grades between) that enter in some way into the effect produced by the sacramental action. While no positive loss will necessarily occur in the case in which a minister is merely minimally disposed, still the ministrations is not everything that it ought to be when the prayer of the minister is not a real personal prayer.

Efficacy of Infant Baptism. The BAPTISM OF INFANTS has at times presented a problem, especially to some Protestant exegetes and theologians. K. Barth, for example, writes: "From the standpoint of a doctrine of baptism, infant baptism can hardly be maintained without exegetical and practical artifices and sophisms—the proof to the contrary has yet to be supplied" [The Teaching of the Church regarding Baptism (London 1959) 49]. The Church teaches that infant Baptism is profitable to children (Denz 1626), and requires that it be administered to them soon after birth since in the ordinary plan of God there is no other way open. [See BAPTISM, SACRAMENT OF; LIMBO.]

The possibility of infant Baptism's being profitable stems from the fact that not all the Sacraments necessarily on all occasions suppose a psychological awareness on the part of the recipient. This does not mean that any dispensation from a condition otherwise necessary has been granted. Rather, it follows from the very nature of the symbolic action precisely as performed for one who is psychologically an infant, just as the very nature of a symbolic action performed for a conscious adult requires his response. While it is true that the dormant personality of the child is still not capable of interpersonal rational encounter, God can still love it with His preventive grace. That a child is not yet capable of a similar encounter with its mother does not mean that its mother will wait to bestow her love on the child when the latter is capable of freely returning it. She loves it and cares for it from the very first instant, and it is just this care and love that evokes a response from the child when it is capable of such. In like manner the Sacrament of Baptism produces within the child an ontological foundation (the grace of the virtues and the gifts) for encounter with God, making this encounter possible when the child has attained the maturity to achieve it. While a person must freely will and accept the divine initiative immediately, an infant is expected to do so in its own time and then to make personally its own the grace that it received previously, in a similar way as it does its own existence. The obligation for our seeing to infant Baptism stems from the social coresponsibility that all of us have for the realization of the goal of life of our fellowmen. The Church, as the earthly prolongation of the Lord and the mother of men, has this desire and aim for all, and she realizes it concretely and visibly both in the parents and in the minister of the Sacrament.

Reviviscence. As we have seen, there are two sides to sacramentality. There is first the objective side—the ecclesial expression of God's will to link Himself with us, the opus operatum, which we discussed above. And there is the subjective side—the individual's personal acceptance of God's grace-giving intent, at least in the case of the adult. Thus some movement toward God's approach is required (part of the opus operantis). This movement can be of different kinds: that which is sufficient to make this approach valid (sufficient to establish the ecclesial link proper to the Sacrament), and that which is needed to make this approach fruitful (required to establish a personal link or encounter with God). REVIVISCENCE refers to those instances in which a sacramental action produces its personal link with God (sacramental grace) only some time after its ecclesial link because of an imperfect movement on the part of the recipient. While the possibility of a Sacrament's accomplishing this has never been defined, it has been taught from the time of the Church Fathers, and is universally accepted in the Church (at least in regard to some of the Sacraments). The reason is simple. If some of the Sacraments (those especially that are either absolutely or relatively unrepeatable) could not revive, impossible consequences would follow. For if a person did not receive the grace of these Sacraments at the time of their reception, he would be forever excluded from this benefit regardless of what he might do later in regard to his religious dispositions. Thus reviviscence of some kind or other seems to be almost a necessary postulate in such instances.

Bibliography: B. BRAZZAROLA, La natura della grazia sacramentale nella dottrina di San Tommaso (Grottaferrata 1941). E. DORONZO, De sacramentis in genere (Milwaukee 1946). B. LEEMING, Principles of Sacramental Theology (new ed. Westminster, Md. 1960). H. LENNERZ, De sacramentis Novae Legis in genere (Rome 1950). R. R. MASTERTON, "Sacramental Graces: Modes of Sanctifying Grace," Thomist 18 (1955) 311–372. J. H. MILLER, Signs of Transformation in Christ (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). K. RAHNER, The Church and the Sacraments, tr. W. J. O'HARA (New York 1963). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, Christ: The Sacrament of the Encounter with God (New York 1963). C. SCHLECK, "On Sacramental Grace," University of Ottawa Review 24 (1954) 227–251; "St. Thomas on the Nature of Sacramental Grace," Thomist 18 (1955) 1–30; 242–278. C. S. SULLIVAN, ed., Readings in Sacramental Theology (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1964). J. H. NICOLAS, "La Grâce sacramentelle," Revue tomiste 61 (1961) 165–192, 522–540.

[C. A. SCHLECK/EDS.]

GRACE, SUFFICIENT

A division of internal actual grace, sufficient grace is used in two senses: (1) grace that gives sufficient ability to perform a salutary act, prescinding from the result (grace efficacious with the efficacy of power)—grace is always sufficient in this sense or it would not be grace; (2) purely sufficient grace, which does not obtain a good, free act, but gives sufficient power to produce one—grace inefficacious in the production of a good, free act.

In the First Sense. The conferral of sufficient grace in this sense upon all human beings for their various needs is a corollary of the doctrine of a sincere universal salvific will.

Here one must distinguish between grace proximately and remotely sufficient for a good act. Grace is proximately sufficient if it gives sufficient power to perform the act without additional aid (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1536); it is remotely sufficient for an act if further aid is needed—but a grace remotely sufficient for a future good act, e.g., of confession, is always proximately sufficient for another good act, e.g., salutary fear. Thus, sufficient grace is not always given for undergoing martyrdom, because martyrdom is not always impending; but there is always given proximately sufficient grace, which may eventually lead to the heroic act of fortitude that undergoing martyrdom is. Grace is always sufficient for a good act now impending, or it would not be grace, but only remotely for good acts of the future, which may require additional grace.

Grace proximately sufficient to perform a given good act, e.g., to suffer martyrdom, may never be given, because need for it never arises, but everyone receives grace proximately sufficient for present needs. Today a person has not proximately sufficient grace to perform a difficult act that may impend in future, but that person can through today's graces perform today's duties. By doing what is possible now the person sets no obstacles to future graces and is in a position later infallibly to obtain proximately sufficient grace for greater deeds. This is God's understanding of His own word, "sufficient for the day is its own evil" (Mt 6.34).

Purely Sufficient Grace. Grace is also called purely sufficient or inefficacious. That there is such grace, which gives full power to perform a good, free act, even in the presence of contrary difficulties, but which lacks effect due to the will's resistance, is Catholic doctrine; it seems implied by the Second Council of Orange (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 397) and also by the condemnation of the first two propositions of Jansen (ibid., 2001–02). This is also the meaning of Is 5.1–7, Mt 11.21, 2 Cor 6.1, and is a corollary of the fact that grace is given to men without result.

Purely sufficient (inefficacious) grace was not recognized by the reformers, who recognized no grace but efficacious, nor by the Jansenists, who did not recognize relatively, though purely, sufficient grace. For them all grace relatively sufficient is efficacious. It is gratia magna, more intense than the contrary concupiscence, necessarily drawing the fallen will. Gratia parva, though producing velleities, is insufficient for a free salutary act. It may be called "absolutely" sufficient, because it gives power of action prescinding from contrary concupiscence. Hence, for the Jansenists, purely sufficient grace, which does not work, is not a benefit and is not given with the intention of benefiting.

However, in Catholic doctrine, purely sufficient grace is a grace that is capable of benefiting, a quality not nullified by the recipient's unwillingness. It is given with the sincere intention that the recipient receive good. The grace given is of its nature beneficent, and it is given with the sincere intent of benefiting. This intention is compatible with God's knowledge of the grace's inefficacy, because this is not intended, and with the possibility of giving another grace, for God in order to intend a benefit sincerely need not give one grace he would accept, but those he truly can.

Purely sufficient grace is given by God not because of its inefficacy, nor with the intention of inefficacy, but although it is inefficacious. It is given with knowledge of its inefficacy, but with sincere desire that it be efficacious; for the grace given is truly sufficient, and lacks efficacy only through man's unwillingness, which God does not intend, though He intends to permit it.

Catholic theologians differ in their explanations of the nature of sufficient grace in its relation to efficacious grace (see BÁÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM; MOLINISM).

See Also: JANSENISM.

Bibliography: B. BERAZA, De gratia Christi (Bilbao 1929). P. FRANSEN, Divine Grace and Man, tr. G. DUPONT (New York 1965).

R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Grace, tr. Dominican Nuns, Menlo Park, Calif. (St. Louis 1957). S. GONZÁLEZ, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain, 4 v. (Madrid), v. 1 (1962), v. 2 (1958), v. 3 (1961), v. 4 (1962); Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945–) 3.3:117–142, 284–294. H. LANGE, De gratia (Freiburg 1929). J. POHLE, Grace, Actual and Habitual, ed. and tr. A. PREUSS (St. Louis 1942). H. RONDET, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948).

[F. L. SHEERIN]

GRACE, THE STATE OF

The phrase “state of grace” refers to that permanent disposition of soul in which the divine life of sanctifying or habitual grace is present. This condition of soul is marked by sinlessness and by the fulfillment of God’s will and, once obtained, remains unless it is destroyed by willful mortal sin. It is contrasted to the state of sin in which such grace is absent. Habitual grace is first obtained through the Sacrament of Baptism in the case of infants or through either Baptism or an act of perfect contrition in the case of adults. If lost by serious sin it may be recovered through an act of perfect contrition or through ATTRITION coupled with sacramental absolution.

Unless a soul is in the state of grace at the moment of death, it cannot attain the Beatific Vision. Even in this life the state of grace is necessary for the performance of any supernatural act, for the accomplishment of acts that are meritorious de condigno of grace and glory, for the gaining of indulgences, and for the licit administration of the Sacraments. Particularly is the state of grace required as a necessary disposition for the fruitful reception of the Sacraments of the living (at least per se), since these Sacraments have been instituted to increase grace and therefore presuppose that the soul is already in the state of grace. (One says “per se” since, at least according to most theologians, if one in mortal sin receives a Sacrament of the living in good faith and with attrition, sanctifying grace will be conferred upon him per accidens.) Canon Law (1917 CIC cc. 807, 856) demands that one who is conscious of having committed serious sin ordinarily confess that sin and obtain sacramental absolution before celebrating Mass or receiving the Holy Eucharist. (The law makes an exception for those cases in which there is some necessity for celebrating Mass or receiving Holy Communion and no confessor is available.) For the reception of other Sacraments, the state of grace may be recovered either through confession or through an act of perfect contrition. The question arises as to how certain a person must be that he is in the state of grace before he can legitimately approach the Sacraments.

The problem of what knowledge a person can have of his own possession of the state of grace is a matter of considerable controversy. Lutherans and Calvinists insist that a man is justified by faith alone and that therefore he can know with certitude that he possesses grace. Catholic theologians, on the other hand, make distinctions in answering this question. All agree with St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologia 1a2ae, 112.5.c) that one cannot have the certitude of faith concerning this matter except by a special revelation from God, at least in the case of adults. Nor can an adult possess the certitude of a theological conclusion in this matter (although some theologians have defended this position), since such certitude arises only from a reasoning process in which one premise is a revealed truth and the other is an absolutely certain natural truth. Moreover, an adult cannot have the certitude of “scientific” knowledge that he is in the state of grace, since such certitude comes from a syllogism in which both premises are either self-evident or demonstrable. Man can have, however, what St. Thomas calls “conjecture” or what modern theologians refer to as moral certitude: that is, a knowledge that excludes all prudent or positive doubt. Such moral certitude is reached through definite signs that are incompatible with a state of sin: the testimony of a well-formed conscience, sincere love of God, delight in the things of God, fervor in prayer, solicitude in avoiding sin, zeal for souls, contempt for the world, the practice of mortification, etc. From such indications a prudent man can generally exclude all objectively probable doubt concerning the state of his soul. St. Thomas also taught (Summa theologiae 3a, 80.4 ad 5) that one who has committed mortal sin can possess only conjecture (moral certitude) concerning his recovery of grace, since he cannot be absolutely certain of the supernatural quality of his contrition. It suffices that he possess such signs of sorrow as regret for his past action and a firm purpose of amendment.

It does not follow, however, that it is always easy or even possible to come to a morally certain judgment regarding one’s state of soul. The scrupulous are frequently troubled by anxieties that are an obstacle to ready and confident judgment in this matter. Moreover, the data upon which judgment must be based can sometimes be obscure even to one not prone to scruple. Now a reasonable degree of positive assurance of being in the state of grace is unquestionably desirable in a recipient of a Sacrament of the living, but doubt is not per se a disqualifying state of mind. The law of the Church as formulated by the Council of Trent (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 1647) and stated by the Code of Canon Law (Codex iuris canonici [Graz 1955] c.916) does not require the recipient of Holy Communion to be certain that he is in the state of grace; rather it forbids the reception of Communion by one who is certain that he is not in the state of grace, which is quite another thing. Moralists and canonists agree that “conscious of grave sin” in this case means a morally certain consciousness of being in grave sin, and it cannot be understood to include a state of doubt about one’s state of soul.

Bibliography: J. VAN DER MEERSCH, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1616–87. H. MOUREAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 3.1:503–505. T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 3.1:955. A. TANQUEREY, Synopsis theologiae dogmaticae, 3 v. (25th ed. Paris 1947) 3:62–64. P. GAUCHER, Le Signe infallible de l’état de grâce (Le Perreux 1907).

[J. P. BROWNE]

GRACE AND NATURE

The relationship between GRACE and NATURE is one of the most fundamental problems of Christian anthropology. Grace is something really distinct from nature, wholly undue to nature, yet divinely given to nature. It confers on man a participation in the divine nature and divine life.

Historical Perspectives. The question of grace and nature’s mutual relationship has taken shape in and through a long history. The summary of the principal positions of Catholic theology on the relationship gains significance and clarity from a survey of the more important moments in this history.

Augustine and Pelagianism. In polemic with Pelagianism, the Church made explicit her belief in the absolute necessity of grace if man is to attain eternal life or perform any action positively tending to it (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 225–230, 370–397, 1551–53). Pelagius’s denial of ORIGINAL SIN, and his consequent practical ignoring of the sinful condition of man conditioned the approach of St. Augustine (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM). Augustine used by preference terms that proclaimed man’s indigence. “Nature” was one such. The term derives from natus, a participial form of the verb meaning “to be born.” Hence it can sustain the meaning of “that which belongs to a being’s pristine condition.” When Augustine spoke of nature in a proper sense, he had in mind that graced condition that should have been his and should have been passed on by natural generation. Thus he could write that man’s nature is “wounded, hurt, damaged, destroyed” by the willful disobedience of sin (Nat. et grat. 53.62, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 271 v., indexes 4 v. [Paris 1878–90] 44:277). Actually St. Augustine knew that man’s natural being remained intact, and that freedom of choice was inalienably his. Centuries later this expression and his analogous usage of “free will” would be used in support of a pessimism alien to the doctrine of Augustine.

St. Thomas Aquinas. The introduction of Aristotelianism into the West in the 13th century brought the philosopher’s clear and precise concept of nature into the Catholic theology of grace. St. Thomas is to be credited with exploiting this notion for its theological accuracy. He clearly affirmed that while grace now is necessary to heal wounded nature, its primary function, which it would have in any hypothesis, is to elevate nature to a share in the properly divine nature (Summa theologiae 1a, 95.4 ad 1). Grace is supernature, rooted in nature and making nature transcend itself. St. Thomas affirmed the existence in every intellectual nature of a capacity for this elevation—a teaching that would subsequently find many different interpretations.

Nominalism and the Reformation. The Thomist synthesis did not gain the loyalty of the centuries immediately following. A juridic mentality and a nominalist philosophy were in the ascendant (see NOMINALISM). Under these influences theological inquiry tended to fragment men’s view of the ontological union and harmony of grace and nature. The results were diffused in the schools by the works of Gabriel BIEL. The grace of adoption was seen to consist in an arbitrary divine decree and hence to be an extrinsic adornment of nature. Mere nature’s capacity to observe the moral law was extolled in a way that smacked of Pelagianism. The sense of grace as a participation in divine life practically disappeared. The Reformation burst into this atmosphere of nominalist theology. Although they were heirs of nominalism’s concept of an extrinsic grace, and its ignorance of divinizing grace, still Martin LUTHER and the reformers reacted strongly against its Pelagian tendency. Augustine’s strong indictment of sinful nature was resumed and given new dimensions. Not only had sin destroyed the liberty of the children of God, but free will itself was henceforth capable of nothing but sin. The Church countered with the teaching and the anathemas of Trent, affirming the truly inherent character of justifying grace by which nature is elevated in Christ, and its authentic healing is begun (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1525–31, 1554–61). An attenuated version of Luther’s teaching appears in the works of BAIUS and JANSEN and their disciples. The common note that binds them together is their inability to conceive of justifying grace as something that makes man transcend the order of nature. At best, grace is a medicinal agent that restores man to the primitive (natural) state that sin had destroyed. Particularly in correction of Baius the teaching Church intervened to establish the authentic gratuity of the order of grace (H.

Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1921, 1923, 1924, 1926, 1942).

Contemporary Orientations. Passing over the intervening centuries to the 20th, one finds after World War II a new theological orientation that gave rise to excesses that compromised the transcendent gratuity of the order of grace. Theologians sought to probe the link that binds man's nature to a supernatural destiny. They judged the usual conception of this link to be vitiated by an "EXTRINSICISM" that makes grace a mere superstructure added to nature and to be unable to explain how grace is inserted into nature and fulfills it. A number of historical studies appeared investigating the notion of the SUPERNATURAL, the OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY (capacity) for the supernatural, and St. Thomas's teaching on the natural desire for the vision of God. This tendency came to be spoken of as the "new theology." It tended to affirmations incompatible with the absolute gratuity of the order of grace by making an interior ordination and openness to grace a constituent of man's nature, and hence reducing the notion of "pure nature" to an unrealizable abstraction. Pope Pius XII reacted strongly against this position, speaking of it as a "deadly fruit" of theological novelties. In the encyclical Humani generis he declared: "Others destroy the gratuity of the supernatural order, since God, they say, cannot create intellectual beings without ordering and calling them to the beatific vision" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3891). Catholic theologians are continuing the task of penetrating the nature of man's actual destiny to the order of grace.

Theological Positions. The principal positions of Catholic theology on the relationship between grace and nature may be outlined under three headings.

Grace Elevates Nature. For Christian philosophy, nature signifies the essence of a thing considered as the fundamental principle of every activity and receptivity that belongs to it because of what it is. Nature is a fixed and well-determined reality with stable laws of a necessary character. A being must have certain determined constitutive elements, as well as its own powers, properties, and goals if it is to be of a particular nature. Although created nature comes into existence by a sovereignly free act of God, yet God cannot create a man without making him a finite intellectual being endowed with all the essential characteristics of human nature. Now, the fundamental revelation concerning grace is that the blessing God has granted the world through Christ constitutes a true divinization of sinful man. This emerges as the clear meaning of the Pauline and Johannine Scriptures concerning men's adoption as sons and heirs of God in Christ. The REDEMPTION means not only the remission of sin, but also a positive sharing of the divine nature. Man's divinization is revealed as an unfolding thing begun in faith, hope, and charity, and ending in the glory of face-to-face vision of God (1 Jn 3.1–2; 1 Cor 13.8–13). Obviously this completion is not within the scope of man's native powers; only a divine nature has natural powers capable of entering into an immediate union of knowledge and love with the divine being. Consequently, to divinize man means to elevate him to a level of perfection transcending his own nature. Since it entirely transcends the powers and exigencies of man's nature, divinizing grace is something to which nature can lay no claim. Arising in the mystery of God's self-giving love, grace can be received only in grateful wonder at the eternal miracle of love that it is.

Grace Heals Nature. Catholic teaching has always held that the nature of man is not totally destroyed by original sin. This is based on the Scriptures (Wis 13.1–9; Rom 1.17–28), which credit man with the radical capability of knowing God by means of his natural reason. Were nature truly destroyed by sin, how would man be capable of responding to the divine call in faith, or how could he be held accountable for his refusal to respond? (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1554–55.) While Catholic doctrine refuses to admit a total destruction of nature, it does not minimize the damage sin has wrought in man's nature (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 371, 400). There are two different explanations of this wounding. With Suárez and Bellarmine, many theologians teach that as a consequence of original sin mankind lost the supernatural gift of grace and the gratuitous PRETERNATURAL gifts, but that its natural perfections are undiminished. The Thomist school emphasizes more forcefully the reality of sin's havoc by holding that the loss of ORIGINAL JUSTICE brings in its wake a profound diminution of nature's tendency to virtue (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 85.1). The grace that divinizes man as man and does it progressively also heals the wounds of nature by restoring the elevation sin negated and by removing the obstacle that hinders nature's gravitation toward virtue. Only when divinization is total will its healing restore the equivalent of the lost preternatural gifts.

Harmony of Grace and Nature. The adequate distinction between grace and nature brings no artificial dualism with it. The Creator of nature and grace has ordered the creation of the world and of man to Christ, in whom and through whom all humanity is called to a participation in the inner life of God. This unity of the divine economy of salvation orders nature to grace, creation to Redemption. In the very structure of his nature man is "IMAGE OF GOD"; there is in him an openness to grace that no lower creature has. It is because man is an intellectual creature that he is basically capable of beatific vision—for as intellectual he is open to the total breadth of being, which includes even the Supreme Being. Consequently, unaided natural reason could conclude that it is probably possible for man to be elevated to this undue, supernatural, face-to-face vision of God. Revelation assures us that this is a real possibility and meant to be fulfilled. Not all theologians understand in the same way this basic tendency of the finite spirit toward the supernatural. Some affirm a mere nonrepugnance to being elevated, i.e., apart from the free gift of grace there is no positive tendency or desire in the finite will to possess the being of God as its supreme beatitude, though there is a natural tendency or desire in the finite intellect to come to see the real essence of the First Cause of being, who is God. This appears to be the meaning of St. Thomas's references to a natural desire to see God (he never speaks of a natural desire for the beatific vision). Others (Scotists, Suárez, Alfaro), assuming that there is an innate human longing for perfect beatitude, note that the perfect beatitude of the intellectual creature can be had only in the satisfaction of his unlimited capacity for being and goodness. Nothing short of beatific vision can satisfy this natural longing, and hence they conclude that there is in man's nature an innate natural desire for the beatific vision, though it can reach its goal only through the gracious intervention of God. Finally there are those (Mersch, K. Rahner) who consider the problem in the actual historical situation of man. By the free determination of God, man was actually created in grace and has never had any real destiny other than a supernatural one. A determination of this kind must imply a real change in the creature (the "SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL" in Rahner's terminology), otherwise the supernatural order labors under the liability of remaining artificially juxtaposed to the natural order. According to this view, although human nature as such has no exigency for the supernatural order of grace, the concrete natures of men do have such an exigency, and because of it the absence of grace in the unjustified is not a mere absence but a true privation. This notion may be implicit in Thomas Aquinas's suasio for the existence of original sin (C. gent. 4.52).

See Also: DESIRE TO SEE GOD, NATURAL; HABIT; IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT; JUSTICE OF MEN; PURE NATURE, STATE OF.

Bibliography: H. RONDET, Gratia Christi (Paris 1948). J. ALFARO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 7:830–835; "Trascendencia e inmanencia de lo sobrenatural," Gregorianum 38 (1957) 5–50. K. RAHNER, "Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace," Theological Investigation, v. 1, tr. C. ERNST (Baltimore 1961) 297–317. W. R. O'CONNOR, The Eternal Quest (New York 1947). P. J. DONNELLY, "On the Development of Dogma and the Supernatural," Theological Studies 8 (1947) 471–491; "Discussions on the Supernatural Order," ibid., 9 (1948)

213–249; "A Recent Critique of P. De Lubac's Surnaturel," ibid., 9 (1948) 554–560; "The Gratuity of the Beatific Vision and the Possibility of a Natural Destiny," ibid., 11 (1950) 374–404; "The Surnaturel of P. Henri de Lubac, S.J.," Catholic Theological Society of America. Proceedings 3 (1948) 108–121. S. DUFFY, "The Graced Horizon: Nature and Grace in Modern Catholic Thought," Theology and Life 37 (Collegeville, Minn. 1992). D. J. M. BRADLEY, Aquinas on the Twofold Human Good: Reason and Human Happiness in Aquinas's Moral Science (Washington, D.C. 1997). S. A. LONG, "On the Possibility of a Purely Natural End for Man," Thomist 64 (2000) 211–237.

[C. REGAN]

GRADUAL

In the medieval Roman Rite of the Mass, the term "Gradual" had a double usage: (1) the first of two chants sung between the readings in the Liturgy of the Word; and (2) the book containing the entire collection of chants for the Mass.

This article concerns only the chant sung after the first Scripture reading. The term is derived from early Christian usage: at one time a soloist sang this chant from the steps (Latin, gradus) of the ambo, the platform reserved for the deacon's singing of the Gospel. Yet in the oldest MSS (up to the 11th and 12th centuries), the chant known as the Gradual was called Responsorium (responsorial psalm).

History. The RESPONSORIAL PSALM is a very ancient and very simple musical form once widely used in the early Church, and it was revived in the wake of the liturgical reforms of Vatican II. A soloist intones a text in strophe form (the psalm, among the Jews), and the choir repeats a very short refrain after each strophe (Greek ὑπαχόη, or responsa). In the synagogue service there was a psalm or a canticle to be sung after the readings; the first Christians continued the same custom. In the earliest form of the Mass in the West, there were three readings: one from the Old Testament followed by a psalm, one of the New Testament epistles followed by the Alleluia verse, and finally the Gospel. The respensorial singing of the psalm is witnessed to from earliest times: Const. Apost. (2:57.6), St. Augustine (In Psalm. 119; Patrologia Latina 37:1596), St. Leo (Serm. 3; Patrologia Latina 54:145). The Roman Council of 595 deprived deacons of the privilege of singing the Gradual psalm. Probably it was at this time that the responsa lost its simple syllabic form and became enriched musically into an ornate selection, while its execution became the business of the specialists of the SCHOLA CANTORUM.

Historically, the Gradual was sung like a respensory in the Office, i.e., the first part was repeated after the verse. This system has been preserved in certain MSS for the Gradual that was traditionally assigned to June 24—R: Prusquam te formarem . . . sanctificavi te. V: Misit Dominus . . . et dixit mihi. Rep.: Prusquam . . . sanctificavi te. The Gradual Ecce quam bonum (that was assigned to the 22d Sunday after Pentecost in the Tridentine Missal) formerly had a second verse that has now disappeared. The Gradual Haec dies (Easter) has seven distinct verses that were distributed throughout Easter week during the medieval period, but they were originally part of a single gradual. In the 9th and 10th centuries the Graduals (and alleluias) were often copied into a special collection, the cantatorium, a book elongated in form, with a cover sheathed in plaques of carved ivory. In Milan the Gradual has the name of Psalmellus (short psalmody); its composition is much more elaborate than the Gregorian Gradual of Rome. In the ancient Hispanic liturgy it was called the Psallendo; after the versicle only the second part of the responsory was repeated, from the section marked “P.” (presa, repeat).

“Flagellant Brothers of the Fraternity of Santa Maria degli Carita,” manuscript illumination, from 14th-century gradual. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

Musical Aspects. The gradual, although an ornate chant, was not composed without rules proper to spontaneous improvisation. It has a musical timbre for each mode, adapted, according to rigorous rules, to texts of varying lengths. In the modes of D, a single timbre (of the type of Justus ut palma) has been adapted to 18 other texts; in the modes on E, a single timbre serves for 12 graduals; in the modes on F, 44 verses of graduals are constructed according to the same melodic outline. Whatever the mode of the Gradual, the versicle has a more extended range than does the response, as its melodic weaving is carried higher.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGSMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55). W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958) 344–63. H. HUCKE, “Towards a New Historical View of Gregorian Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 30 (1980) 437–67. R.-J. HESBERT, “Le gradual, chant responsorial,” Ephemerides liturgicae 95 (1981) 316–50. M. HUGLO, “Le répons-graduel de la messe: Évolution de la forme: permanence de la fonction,” International Musicological Society Congress Report 13 (1982) 53–77. P. JEFFERY, “The Introduction of Psalmody into the Roman Mass by Pope Celestine I (422–432): Reinterpreting a Passage in the Liber pontificalis,” Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 26 (1984) 147–55. J. MCKINNON, “The Fourth-Century Origin of the Gradual,” Early Music History 7 (1987) 91–106. R. CROCKER, “Chants of the Roman Mass,” New Oxford History of Music 2 (2/1990) 196–214. D. HILEY, Western Plainchant: A Handbook (Oxford 1993). J. MCKINNON, “Preface to the Study of the Alleluia,” Early Music History 15 (1996) 213–49.

[M. HUGLO/EDS.]

GRAFT

Graft is the acquisition of money, position, or favor through dishonest means by a person who takes advantage of his official position. Graft is a sin against legal justice, according to which an official is bound to promote the common good of the community. It is also against distributive justice, by which rulers are bound to act toward individual persons and classes in accord with their merits, needs, and capacities. Graft is also a violation of commutative justice, by which a person is bound to the faithful discharge of the obligations he assumes in taking employment.

Elected public office holders are the usual offenders in this form of dishonesty, though the injustice may be committed by those who are appointed to public office rather than elected.

In the United States a spoils system is sometimes used, according to which political offices are filled by the members of the party that is in power. It is not wrong to make appointments on a party basis, but it is wrong to appoint persons who are not qualified for office. It is sinful for a politician to demand graft of another in exchange for appointment to a lesser public office. The sin of selling an appointment is worse when the appointee is in no way worthy.

If a public official, upon compensation, favors the evasion of a law, he is bound to make restitution to the state; he is also bound to make restitution to the wronged private citizen when money is involved. If a minor official is obliged by his superior to rubber stamp an evasion of the law he should offer resistance in whatever way possible; however, he is not bound to restitution as the superior official would be.

A public servant may sin by accepting graft for an appointment or by obtaining money, favor, or position through the awarding of devious contracts for services private companies perform for the state or country. He may sin by giving secret information, e.g., to real estate companies in return for compensation or a share in their profit.

The first duty of a public official who has sold immunity is to restore the graft. If the violation of the right cannot be repaired by a recall of the immunity and by bringing of the offender to trial or punishment, the money for which the right was exchanged should be given to the public treasury as restitution. If the public official abuses his function and forces someone to give or promise graft, the prime offender acquires a greater guilt. In our modern penal code such action is called extortion.

Normally, the acceptance of gifts by judges from attorneys who practice law before them and by public officials from companies who do business with the government is not morally offensive, unless it is specifically proscribed by civil legislation.

The public official, if he is Catholic, also commits an additional sin of scandal by taking graft. Today it seems almost impossible that he could be in good faith.

See Also: BRIBERY.

Bibliography: J. AERTNYS and C. A. DAMEN, Theologia moralis, 2 v. (16th ed. Turin 1950). B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1961–). F. J. CONNELL, Morals in Politics and Professions (Westminster, Md. 1946).

[T. CRANNY]

GRAIL, THE

Founded as a movement of Catholic laywomen in Holland in 1921 by Jacques van Ginneken, SJ, a professor at the University of Nijmegen, and a group of his students. The movement unites married and single women of all races, backgrounds, and professions in a common effort to deepen Christian life and bring spiritual values to all areas of modern society. It was guided by concepts of worldwide spiritual renewal; of the share of the laity among the People of God in Christ’s redeeming mission; and of woman’s untapped capacities to inculcate God-centeredness, love, peace, and human dignity in contemporary life. The Grail extended to Great Britain, Germany, Australia, and the U.S. by 1940, but it was driven underground in Holland during the Nazi occupation. The postwar period brought its worldwide expansion to the Third World.

Grail spirituality emphasizes personal commitment to Christ and to His mission, the recognition of the primacy of personal prayer and community worship, concern for the dignity of the person and for the building of the community, readiness for service and sacrifice, and joy in the goodness of material creation. Although participation varies according to talent and state of life, it requires of every member a commitment to the spirit and goal of the Grail; active association, wherever possible, with work in a Grail center or in personal contact with other members; and participation in formation programs. Every local Grail chapter works with the approval and guidance of the local ordinary.

Grail teams work in areas of adult education and apostolic formation; religious education and teacher-training in catechetics; community development and social action, especially through work with cooperatives and credit unions; medical services; cultural programs, including book- and art-shops, production and distribution of contemporary works of art and music; ecumenism, through promotion of social and cultural collaboration with other Christians.

Bibliography: L. VAN KERSBERGEN, Woman (Loveland, Ohio 1956). E. REID, I Belong Where I'm Needed (Westminster, MD 1961).

[D. MYERS/EDS.]

GRANDE ROMÁN, JUAN, ST.

In religion Juan (Grande) Pecedor (John the (Great) Sinner), religious of the Hospitaller Brothers of St. John of God; b. March 6, 1546, Carmona (near Seville), Andalusia, Spain; d. June 3, 1600, Jerez de la Frontera (near Cadiz), Spain.

Like his father before him, Juan Grande was a cloth merchant in Carmona until he left home to discern his vocation in solitude near Marcena. Upon discovering God's will for his life, Grande moved to Jerez de la Frontera (1566). He tended prisoners and the elderly poor, first in a room off the chapel of La Virgen de los Remedios, then in a hospital (Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria) that he established next to the Church of San Sebastian. He became known for his extreme austerity, intense prayer life, and service to anyone in need including prisoners, prostitutes, and even 300 fugitive Spanish soldiers after the English stormed Cadiz. During an epidemic in 1574, he successfully mounted a campaign to help victims that involved many people, even the city council. That same year he adopted the rule of the Hospitallers of St. John of God and gathered others to assist in his apostolate. In 1576, he took the habit of the Hospitallers and transferred Candelaria into their hands. At the request of Bishop Rodrigo de Castro of Seville, he reorganized the local hospital system to provide better care to the poor. He contracted the plague which was ravaging Jerez in 1600 and offered himself to God in atonement. The epidemic ended with his death in Candelaria Hospital. He was originally buried in the hospital courtyard, but later was transferred to his titular shrine in the hospital of the Brothers of St. John of God in Jerez.

St. John the Sinner was beatified in 1853. On June 2, 1996, Pope John Paul II canonized this patron of Jerez.

Feast: June 3.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 29 (1995): 5; no. 23 (1996): 1–2, 5, 12. J. L. REPETTO BETES, El hermano Juan Pecedor: biografía crítica del beato Juan Grande O.H., fundador del Hospital Jerezano de la Candelaria (Jerez de la Frontera 1984). H. SANCHO DE SOPRANIS, Biografía documentada del beato Juan Grande, O.H., fundador del Hospital de Candelaria de Jerez de la Frontera (Jerez de la Frontera 1960).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GRANDERATH, THEODOR

German Jesuit ecclesiastical historian; b. Giesenkirchen (Westphalia), June 19, 1839; d. Valkenburg, Netherlands, March 19, 1902. After joining the JESUITS (1860), and completing his studies, he taught Canon Law (1874–76), then dogmatic theology and apologetics (1876–87) to Jesuit scholastics at Ditton Hall, England. His main scholarly contribution, which occupied his subsequent years, was the publication of the documents of VATICAN COUNCIL I and the writing of its history. After going to the Netherlands (1887), he succeeded Father SCHNEEMANN in editing the Acta et Decreta Concilii Vaticani (1890), which forms the seventh and final volume of the Collectio Lacensis (1870–90). The tome remains indispensable for its official conciliar documents and wealth of extracts from extraconciliar sources. This labor kept him in Rome much of the time between 1893 and his retirement in 1901. While there he also lectured (1897–98) at the Gregorian University.

His three-volume history of the synod, Geschichte des Vatikanischen Konzils, published posthumously (1903–06) by Konrad Kirch, was the first scholarly Catholic account. A French version also exists. It was regarded as an official history because the author gained special papal permission to consult rarely accessible conciliar documents. He refuted the biased accounts of OLD CATHOLICS, but glossed over the divergent outlooks of the bishops. His outlook on the majority group among the prelates was often uncritically favorable. The positive role and devoutness of the minority group eluded him. Later theologians have found his work lacking in theological penetration.

He also published many articles in Stimmen aus Maria Laach, Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie, and the second edition of the Kirchenlexikon (1881–86) edited by Wetzer and Weltes.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1903–1913) 3 5.2:1988–99. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–1950) 6.2:1693–94. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon (Leiden 1962) 723.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

GRANDIN, VITAL

Missionary, bishop of St. Albert, Canada; b. St. Pierre-la-Cour, France, Feb. 8, 1829; d. St. Albert, June 3, 1902. After a brief trial period with the Foreign Missions of Paris, he entered the Oblates of Mary Immaculate in 1851 and was ordained April 23, 1854. He was sent to the missions of Rivière-Rouge, Canada, took up residence in Île-à-la-Crosse, Saskatchewan (1855), and visited the Northwest Territories (1856). On Dec. 21, 1857, Grandin was named auxiliary bishop of St. Boniface, but he did not hear of the appointment until 1859. After consecration in Marseilles, France, Nov. 30, 1859, he settled first in Île-à-la-Crosse (1860–69) and then in St. Albert, to which he was appointed bishop in 1871. His efforts during the Métis revolt (1855) and in defense of the rights of native North Americans and of Catholic schools were dynamic and effective. The case for his canonization was presented in Rome in 1937.

Bibliography: P. E. BRETON, Vital Grandin (Paris 1960).

[G. CARRIÈRE]

GRANDMAISON, LÉONCE DE

Theologian, defender of the Church's teaching against the incursions of relativism and Modernism; b. Le Mans, Dec. 31, 1868; d. Paris, June 15, 1927. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1886, studied on the Isle of Jersey from 1890 to 1893, then completed his studies while a teacher at Le Mans. In 1899, the year following his ordination, he became professor of apologetics, first at Fourvière, France, then at Hastings, England. In 1908 he was appointed editor of Études, and in 1910, inspired by the anti-Modernist encyclical PASCENDI (1907), he founded the periodical Recherches de science religieuse. He was a prolific writer, whose forte was apologetic writing, and who composed over 150 extensive treatises in the various fields of religion and theology. His most significant work, Jésus Christ: sa personne, son message, ses épreuves, was published in two volumes, after his death, by his friend Jules Lebreton. His article "Jésus Christ," in the Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique 2: 1288–1538, is also a significant work. For a list of his works, see Geuser, 281–295.

Bibliography: J. GEUSER, "Mélanges Grandmaison," Recherches de science religieuse 18 (1928) 281–295. J. LEBRETON, Le

Père Léonce de Grandmaison (Paris 1932). L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt 723–724.

[B. F. SARGENT]

GRANDMONT, ABBEY AND ORDER OF

The name of a religious order of men founded by STEPHEN OF MURET at Muret, north of Limoges, France, whose motherhouse was moved from there to a new house a few miles away at Grandmont soon after the founder's death in 1124. The original community, which Stephen formed from his followers, was planned along severe lines inspired by the monastic life that the founder had seen flourishing among eremetical houses in southern Italy. At first the brethren lived in cells, but fairly soon conventual buildings of the usual, contemporary pattern were adopted. Houses were in secluded places and adopted a rule of poverty as rigorous as that which later characterized the MENDICANT ORDERS. For their subsistence, the religious relied on alms and on the agricultural labors of the CONVERSI. These latter were always a major element in the order, generally outnumbering the clerical brethren; at first almost complete control of the administration of the monastic property was entrusted to them, but this arrangement soon proved unwise and was accordingly modified. For those who were not lay brothers enclosure was complete. Monastic buildings remained small and simple, and the order's lack of parochial responsibilities partially explains why the nave of their churches was narrower than the choir, which had no aisle. The founder's way of life drew empirically on the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, the BENEDICTINE RULE, and the Rule of St. Basil (see BASILIAN MONASTICISM), but the order came to be classed among Benedictine orders. At first it did not have elaborate regulations, but these were supplied under the fourth prior, Stephen de Liciac (1139–63), and show signs of both CISTERCIAN and CARthusian influence. A custumal was produced in 1170–71.

The major reason for the spread of the order was its high spiritual reputation, but expansion was aided also by the proximity of the motherhouse to the great pilgrimage routes to SAINT-LÉONARD-LE-NOBLAT, Our Lady of Rocamadour, and SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA. Notable early patrons included both the Empress Matilda, who left Grandmont a large legacy, and her son King HENRY II of England, whose generous benefactions included a large gift of English lead for the church roof of Grandmont, which, local tradition avers, arrived in 800 carts drawn by English horses of the same color. About two-thirds of the houses of the order were in Henry's French lands;

there were only three houses in England, all founded in the early 13th century. Stephen's priorate had seen a phenomenal expansion of the Order of Grandmont, some 60 houses having been founded by the time of his death. At its peak (mid-13th century) the order had c. 140 houses and 2,000 members.

Reform was found necessary in the time of Guillaume Pellicier (1317–36); he was made the first abbot of Grandmont by Pope John XXII, and the order was reorganized. Its subsequent history was generally uneventful, but more reforms were instituted with the help of VINCENT DE PAUL. In 1768 the order was suppressed by the Commission des Réguliers of France, at which time its membership had shrunk to about 100.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) v.204, for most of the principal documents concerning the early history of the order. J. BECQUET, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.2:1504–14, for evaluation and augmentation of these documents. J. LEVESQUE, Annales ordinis grandimontis (Troyes 1662). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1326–28.

[J. C. DICKINSON]

GRANVELLE, ANTOINE PERRENOT DE

Churchman and diplomat in the service of the Hapsburgs; b. Ornans, Franche-Comté, Aug. 20, 1517; d. Madrid, Spain, Sept. 21, 1586. After studies at Padua and Louvain, the 21-year-old Granvelle, younger son of Nicholas Granvelle, minister of Charles V, already holder of a canonry at Arras, was named bishop of that diocese. Entering the imperial diplomatic service, he acted as the Emperor's representative at the opening of the Council of TREN'T in 1545. In Charles's military campaign against the Protestant princes of the SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE, Granvelle drew up the peace terms after the League's defeat at the hands of the Emperor at Mühlberg (1547). One of the chief results of the imperial victory had been the removal of John Frederick the Magnanimous from the electorate of Saxony. His successor, Elector Maurice of Saxony, quickly followed his relative in treason against the Emperor, joining with Henry II of France in a twofold attack on the imperial forces in 1551. Bishop Granvelle was in the company of Charles V when the latter was almost captured by Maurice's forces at Innsbruck. Subsequently, Granvelle negotiated the Treaty of Passau in August 1552, which brought this conflict to an end.

After Emperor Charles V's abdication and retirement in 1555, Granvelle continued as advisor to his son PHILIP II OF SPAIN. In 1559, when Margaret of Parma was named Philip's regent in the Netherlands, Granvelle accompanied her as chief counsellor. While Granvelle was serving in this post, Pope Paul IV named him archbishop of Malines (1560) and cardinal (1561). Devoting himself to the double objectives of making Spanish authority absolute and of uprooting the rapidly spreading Protestant movement, Granvelle quickly drew on himself the enmity of the dissatisfied Netherlands nobility and their leader, William the Silent of Orange. An opposition party, the Ligne Anticardinaliste, was formed, later to evolve into the confederation known as Gueux. Because of Granvelle's increasing unpopularity, Philip relieved him of his office in 1564 and the cardinal retired to Besançon, an imperial city in his native Franche-Comté. In 1565 Granvelle was transferred to Rome; in 1570 he assisted in drawing up the Holy League, an alliance between Spain, the Holy See, and the Republic of Venice against the Turks. From 1571 to 1575 he served King Philip as viceroy of Naples, being promoted in 1575 to the presidency of the Council for Italy, a post he held till 1579. In that year, Granvelle was summoned to Spain to replace the recently dismissed Antonio Perez as Philip's secretary of state. One of his administration's first acts was to put a price on the head of William of Orange and to intensify the campaign against the Dutch Protestants (January 1580). Single-handed, Granvelle administered the Spanish government that year during the military campaign against Portugal and was responsible, after the cessation of hostilities, for negotiating the formal union of the Spanish and Portuguese crowns that was to last for the next 60 years (1580–1640). In 1584 Granvelle renounced his See of Malines and was named to the Diocese of Besançon, though he never returned to take possession of his new benefice.

Bibliography: Correspondance du Cardinal de Grandvelle 1565–1586, ed. E. POULLET and C. PIOT, 12 v. (Brussels 1877–96); Papiers d'état du Card. de Grandvelle, ed. C. WEISS, 9 v. (Paris 1841–61). Jedin Trent. P. GEYL, The Revolt of the Netherlands, 1555–1609 (2d ed. New York 1958). B. CHUDOBA, Spain and the Empire, 1519–1643 (Chicago 1952). R. PALMAROCCHI, Enciclopedia cattolica 6:1002. M. DIERICKX, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4:1166, bibliog. E. HASSINGER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:1825.

[W. KELLER]

GRANZOTTO, CLAUDIO, BL.

Baptized Riccardo, Franciscan friar; sculptor; b. Aug. 23, 1900, Santa Lucia di Piave, Treviso, Italy; d. Aug. 15, 1947, Padua, Italy. Riccardo was the youngest of nine children in a family of modest means. After the death of his father (1909), he worked in the field and as a carpenter and bricklayer to help support his family. He developed a passion for art at age 15, but had to set it aside to complete his military service (1918–22). Upon discharge, he studied at the Academy of Fine Art in Venice, where he earned a diploma in sculpture (1929). He was a moderately successful artist with his own studio when he joined the Franciscans in Venice (Dec. 7, 1933) and received the name Claudio. Thereafter he expressed “the infinite beauty of divine contemplation in sculpture” (John Paul II, beatification homily, Nov. 20, 1994), completing four grottos of Lourdes, one of which in Chiampo is identical in proportion to that in Massabielle, France. The man dedicated to prayer, beauty, and compassion died of a brain tumor in the hospital at Padua and was buried at the foot of the Grotto of Lourdes in Chiampo. Bishop Albino Luciani, the future Pope John Paul I, opened the diocesan process for Claudio’s beatification (Dec. 16, 1959).

Feast: Sept. 2 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: C. CIATTAGLIA and E. PAPANUTTI, Vinto dal Signore (Chiampo n.d.). Collegio Serafico, Fede e arte di Fra Claudio (Chiampo n.d.). R. FUSATI, Beato Claudio Granzotto (Chiampo n.d.). E. URBANI, Oltre l’arte (Chiampo n.d.).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GRASSEL, LORENZ

First coadjutor-elect of the U.S. Church; b. Ruemansfelden, Bavaria, Aug. 18, 1753; d. Philadelphia, Pa., October 1793. He entered the Jesuits, but the suppression of the Society of Jesus prevented him from completing his novitiate. After ordination as a secular priest in Germany (c. 1780), he went to Philadelphia, Pa. (1787), at the request of Rev. Ferdinand FARMER. Grassel was initially attached to St. Mary’s Church, Philadelphia; in addition, he made missionary excursions into New Jersey. In Philadelphia he ministered with prudence and devotion to German immigrants and to descendants of the English and Irish settlers. At St. Mary’s he upheld the authority of John Carroll as prefect apostolic of the U.S.; Grassel was retained at St. Mary’s Church (1788) over the opposition of the German board of trustees, who in time built Holy Trinity Church, insisting on the right to choose their own pastors. In the midst of these embroilments Grassel joined in an unsuccessful effort to petition the restoration of the Society of Jesus. His pastorate soon won the recognition of his fellow priests as well as that of Bishop Carroll. In 1791 he was a promoter at the first national synod. On Sept. 24, 1793, he was nominated as coadjutor bishop to Carroll and confirmation was asked from Pius VII at an audience on Dec. 8, 1793. Formal letters of his appointment as bishop of Samosata were sent Jan. 18, 1794, but Grassel did not live to see these official acts accomplished. Within a month of his nomination, he died ministering to the afflicted in the Philadelphia yellow fever epidemic.

Bibliography: P. K. GUILDAY, The Life and Times of John Carroll, Archbishop of Baltimore, 1735–1815, 2 v. (New York 1927).

[T. O. HANLEY]

GRASSI (DE GRASSIS)

The family name of a number of prominent Italian ecclesiastics in the 16th century, of whom the most noteworthy were the following.

Antonio, bishop, papal diplomat; b. date and place unknown, d. 1491. He was appointed auditor of the Rota in 1462 by Pope PIUS II. In 1478–79 he served as Sixtus IV’s nuncio to Emperor Frederick III. In 1485, Pope INNOCENT VIII appointed him bishop of Tivoli, in which office he remained until his death.

Achilles (the Elder), Italian cardinal, statesman, and canonist; b. Bologna, 1463; d. Rome, Nov. 27, 1523. He was an auditor of the Rota and bishop of Civitá de Castello; Pope JULIUS II sent him as envoy to Louis XII of France to ask Louis to withdraw his protection from the Bentivogli, a rival Bolognese family, who were plotting to poison the pope. Achilles was nominated cardinal of S. Sisto by Julius II on March 10, 1511; this was done to please the people of Bologna, where he was then bishop. The chaplain to Julius II as well as a canonist, Achilles wrote a collection of the decisions of the Tribunal of the Rota.

Paris, brother of Achilles De Grassis, master of ceremonies for Popes Julius II and LEO X; b. Bologna 1470; d. Rome, June 10, 1528. He was successively a canonist, governor of Orvieto, master of ceremonies, prelate of the Pontifical Palace, and bishop of Pesaro (1515). Julius II had promised De Grassis a bishopric on the occasion of the solemn opening of the Council of the Lateran in 1512; he was promised the bishopric for the admirable way in which he had organized and conducted the function in St. John Lateran. Paris is chiefly known for his close association with Julius II during most of his pontificate, and with Leo X during all of his reign. His Diarium is one of the major sources for the day-by-day account of the lives of these popes. A laconic man with a dry wit who was exact in regard to ceremonies, Paris is known for such remarks as the following, made concerning Leo X: “He left Rome without a stole, and what is worse without his rochet, and worst of all with boots on. That is quite improper, for no one can kiss his feet” (Diarium, Roscoe-Henke, III, 520, quoted in Pastor, VIII, 162). He is the author of De Caeremoniis Cardinalium et Episcoporum in eorum diocesis (1564) and Ordo Romanus et Diarium Curiae Romanae (1504–21).

Achilles, bishop of Montefrascona, nephew of Achilles, and secretary of the Council of Trent; b. Bologna, 1498; d. Rome, 1555. He was sent from Trent to Rome to inform Pope PAUL III of the difficulty with Emperor Charles about translating the Council from Trent.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 12:248, 309. F. WASNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1167–68.

[R. L. FOLEY]

GRASSI, ANTHONY, BL.

Priest, Confessor, Provost b. Fermo, Italy, Nov. 13, 1592; d. there, Dec. 13, 1671. He grew up in a devout Catholic family and in close contact with the priests of the Fermo Oratory. He joined the community in 1609 and remained in it till his death. He lived a mortified life, eating and sleeping little, and praying much. He usually spent five hours daily hearing confessions. In 1625 he made a pilgrimage to Rome, to the places made holy for him by St. Philip NERI, founder of the Oratory, and he returned home with the intention of imitating this saint, who had been canonized in 1622. In 1635 Grassi became provost (an office filled every three years by election), and remained in this office till his death, being reelected no fewer than 12 times, despite regular protestations of unworthiness. As provost, he gave few orders, preferring to request and to suggest, and by his excellent example he brought to the Fermo Oratory the reputation of outstanding faithfulness to the rule and spirit of St. Philip.

Feast: Dec. 13.

Bibliography: C. ANTICI, Vita del beato Antonio Grassi (Rome 1900). A. KERR, A Saint of the Oratory (London 1901).

[J. CHALLENGOR]

GRASSI, GREGORIO, ST.

Bishop and martyr; b. Castellazzo Bormida (Alessandria), Italy, Dec. 13, 1833; d. Taiyüanfu (Shanxi), China, July 9, 1900. Grassi joined the Franciscans in 1848 and was ordained in 1856. In 1861 he went to the Shanxi Province in northern China, where he labored for four decades. He became titular bishop of Ortosia and coadjutor with right of succession (1876), then vicar apostolic of northern Shanxi (1891). During the Boxer Rebellion he was imprisoned in his residence at Taiyüanfu and put to death four days later. Martyred with him were Bp. Francesco FOGOLLA, his coadjutor; seven sisters, Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; five Chinese seminarians; and nine servants. All were beatified Nov. 24, 1946, and canonized on Oct. 1, 2000.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 41 (1949) 84, 472–473; 39 (1947) 213–221, 307–311. Les Vingt-neuf martyrs de Chine, massacrés en 1900, béatifiés par Sa Sainteté Pie XII, le 24 novembre 1946 (Rome 1946). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:59–62.

[J. KRAHL]

GRATIAN, DECRETUM OF (CONCORDIA DISCORDANTIUM CANONUM)

The Decretum of Gratian was composed in the first half of the 12th century by a Camaldolese monk about whom there exists no precise information, except that he was born in Chiusi and resided in the monastery of SS. Felix and Nabor. The work appeared in the earliest manuscripts under the title of Concordia discordantium canonum. It is one of the most important canonical collections in the history of Canon Law, despite the fact that it was never officially adopted as an “authentic” source of Canon Law by papal authority (see CORPUS IURIS CANONICI).

Contents. The Decretum is a vast compilation that includes about 4,000 capitula and is divided into three parts. Part one comprises 101 distinctiones: the first 20 define the sources of law; the remainder may be looked upon as a sort of canonical illustration of pastoral problems, dealing with clerics and various aspects of ecclesiastical discipline. The second part is composed of 36 causae, which in turn are divided into a certain number of quaestiones. Each causa ordinarily deals with a specific question, but occasionally several causae treat of the same matter, forming a distinct treatise. For example causae 2 to 7 constitute an ordo iudiciarius; causae 12 to 14 are a treatise on temporal goods of the Church and of the clergy; causae 16 to 20 present a section on monks; and causae 27 to 36 constitute a treatise on Matrimony. The third part, titled De consecratione, is generally divided into five distinctiones and is a treatise on the Sacraments.

The Decretum of Gratian is composed of texts of different origin: APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS, canons of the councils, decretals and patristic texts, all of which constitute the auctoritates. Hence Gratian’s work does not differ from the collections that immediately preceded it, namely those of ANSELM OF LUCCA, BURCHARD OF WORMS, and IVO OF CHARTRES (see CANONICAL COLLECTIONS BEFORE GRATIAN). A thorough study of the auctoritates cited in the Decretum has determined that the collections of Ivo of Chartres, particularly the Decretum and the Panormia, were Gratian's main sources. However there remain a certain number of auctoritates, taken especially from patristic texts, the origin of which has not been determined.

Gratian did not simply collect texts with rubrics in a skillful manner. He accompanied them with an original commentary, which, in a certain sense, represents the unifying element of his work. Each division and subdivision is preceded by a brief summary of the subject matter to be treated. The auctoritates or groups of auctoritates are likewise connected by means of commentaries (dicta), which vary in length. Gratian realized that the auctoritates cited often contradicted one another, and in his commentary he attempted to reconcile these oppositions. As a general rule his commentary underlines the particular features of the various opinions presented and draws the conclusion to which they lead. In addition Gratian sought to demonstrate that the conflicts among the various doctrines were more apparent than real and were frequently attributable to a different interpretation of terms. Finally, he attempted to formulate a general conclusion. It was indeed a Concordia discordantium canonum.

Gratian's Decretum was the object of commentaries from the middle of the 12th century. Among the first commentators were PAUCAPALEA and Roland Bandinelli, who in 1159 became Pope ALEXANDER III. The Decretum was used in the schools of law from the end of the 12th century, and it rapidly achieved a universal recognition that had not been enjoyed by any previous canonical collection.

Textual Questions. The Decretum of Gratian poses a number of technical problems that modern criticism is endeavoring to solve.

There is considerable discussion as to the origin of Gratian's treatment of Penance (De penitentia) and his De consecratione. His treatment of Penance is introduced without explanation in the middle of causa 33. Both treatises, and particularly the one on Penance, differ noticeably from the rest of the work. A study of the manuscripts has revealed numerous anomalies in the transcription of these two treatises, with the De penitentia appearing in some ancient manuscripts as an addition. At any rate, if the De penitentia and the De consecratione were not an integral part of Gratian's work, they must have been added to it shortly following publication since they were known to the first commentators.

It is not certain whether the summaries or rubrics, which precede the auctoritates, are to be attributed to Gratian or rather, as A. Vetulani suggests, to one of the first commentators whose summary of the Decretum is contained in a manuscript of the library of Gdansk. A careful examination of these summaries reveals the following facts: certain rubrics reproduce either the dictum that precedes them or the first word of the text that follows them; several others reproduce the summaries of the Panormia of Ivo of Chartres; finally some rubrics were formed over a period of time, as is demonstrated by the numerous differences which are found in the manuscripts.

The paleae by themselves present several problems: the origin of the term, which texts may be considered as paleae, and how they were introduced into the Decretum.

Various explanations have been given for the origin of the term palea: some see it as coming from the name Paucapalea; others, such as Huguccio, see in it a reference to straw (palea), indicating that which must be separated from the good grain; still others, in modern times, noticing that a large number of doublets are found in the paleae, see this word as deriving from the Greek palin. This last explanation seems to be hardly probable; nonetheless it is difficult to accept with certainty either one of the first two.

The paleae, which are auctoritates like all the others, present four essential characteristics: they do not appear in all the manuscripts; they frequently appear to have been transcribed in the margin at a date later than that of the manuscript; they are found scattered throughout various sections of the Decretum; from the second half of the 12th century they were often accompanied by the word palea or by a note calling them to the attention of the reader.

It has been established that all the texts considered as paleae antedate Gratian. Furthermore, even though individual manuscripts from the end of the 12th century contain fewer paleae than those of the 14th century, almost all the paleae existed as such in the 12th century. Moreover, small collections of paleae used to complete the Decretum were found in certain manuscripts dating from the end of the 12th and early 13th centuries. The collections that have been examined indicate 162 fragments taken from collections prior to Gratian and from the decretals of the popes prior to the years 1170–73; 64 of them were incorporated into the Decretum, 13 of which cannot be classified as paleae. The paleae of the Decretum probably came from these collections. The collections prepared the way for the first compilations of decretals, which flourished from the last quarter of the 12th century.

There is some doubt as to whether the texts of the Corpus iuris civilis and the treatises of Roman Law, which are found in the Decretum in a rather large number, are later additions. Most of the fragments of the Corpus iuris civilis inserted in the Decretum possess the four essential features of the paleae, even though the indication palea is often replaced by the word lex. Moreover, in many instances the interpolation is evident. However, the texts appear to have been introduced into the Decretum by a process entirely different from that used for the paleae. In the earliest glosses are often found references to the Code or the Digest. Later on there is found a marginal transcription of the text thus selected, and then the addition into the very body of the Decretum.

See Also: CANON LAW, HISTORY OF, 4.

Bibliography: Editions. A. ADVERSI, "Saggio di un catalogo delle edizioni del 'Decretum Gratiani' posteriori al secolo XV," Studia Gratiani 6 (1959) 285–451, 164 eds. A. VILLIEN and J. DE GHELLINCK, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1727–51. F. TORQUEBAU, "Corpus juris canonici," Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 4:611–627. Critical studies. Studia Gratiana, ed. J. FORCHIELLI, and A. M. STICKLER (Bologna 1953–). G. LEBRAS et al., eds., Histoire du droit et des institutions de l'Église en Occident (Paris 1955–) v.7 L'Âge classique (1140–1378): Sources et théorie du droit (Paris 1965) 51–129.

[J. RAMBAUD-BUHOT]

GRATIAN, JEROME

Theologian, collaborator with St. Teresa, and writer; b. Valladolid, 1545; d. Brussels, Sept. 21, 1614. His father was Diego Gracián, secretary to Philip II. After finishing his studies at the University of Alcalá, Jerome was ordained (1570). Attracted to the Teresian Reform, he took the habit at Pastrana (April 25, 1572), and was professed there the following year. Although professed only four months, he was appointed apostolic visitor to Andalusia and filled that office with courage, prudence, and diligence amid many difficulties. At his first meeting with the mother foundress (May 1575), he won her confidence and kept it until she died (1582). His misfortunes began with the death of St. Teresa. He was elected first provincial of the Discalced Carmelites by a narrow margin at Alcalá (1581). Soon after completing his term of office, he found himself at odds with Nicholas Doria, his successor, concerning the regime and observance; as a result, he was prosecuted on charges of rebellion and was finally expelled from the Reform (Feb. 17, 1592), in the establishment of which his collaboration had been so important to St. Teresa. After his expulsion, his misfortunes increased: his appeal to the Holy See failed; he was rejected by various religious orders; he was captured by Turkish pirates (1593). After two years of hard labor in prison, he was rescued. Finally, the pope authorized him to live among the Calced Carmelites (1596); from 1596 to 1600 he remained in Rome as private theologian of Cardinal Deza. Returning to Spain, he engaged in an intensive apostolate until 1607, when he accompanied the ambassador of Philip II to the Low Countries and took up residence with the Calced Carmelites of Brussels, where he died. He has remained a controversial figure down to the present time, although all agree that he was one of the most important persons in the first 25 years of the Teresian Reform.

Bibliography: A. DEL MARMOL, Excelencias, vida y trabajos del P. Jerónimo Gracián. . . (Valladolid 1619). SILVERIO DE SANTA TERESA, Historia del Carmen Descalzo en España, Portugal y América, 15 v. (Burgos 1935–49) 6:5–606. ALBERTO DE LA VIRGEN DEL CARMEN, "Doctrina ascético-mística del V. P. Gracián," Revista de Espiritualidad 1 (1941) 73–88; 2 (1942) 156–185. ALLESANDRO DI S. GIOV., "Spiritualità cristocentrica del P. Graziano," Vita Carmelitana 3 (1942) 57–65. J. HUIJBEN, "Gratien et les perfectionnistes," Études Carmélitaines 18 (1933) 237–243.

[O. RODRIGUEZ]

GRATIAN, ROMAN EMPEROR

367 to 383; b. Sirmium, 359; d. (assassinated) Lyons, Aug. 25, 383. Flavius Gratianus, to use his Latin name, son of VALENTINIAN I, was proclaimed Augustus at Amiens in 367 and, on the sudden death of his father in 375, became emperor in the western half of the empire in his 16th year. His uncle Valens continued to rule in the East. He had to share his own rule, in theory, with his four-year-old half brother Valentinian II, who had been proclaimed Augustus at Aquincum a few days after his father's death. However, during Gratian's reign, Valentinian II continued to occupy a subordinate position. From 369 the famous rhetor Ausonius served as Gratian's tutor and advisor. As a boy and as emperor, Gratian spent most of his life at Treves. Under the influence of Ausonius he adopted a policy of mildness, as compared with the harsh government of his father, and in his first years as emperor he issued a series of laws that in part remedied abuses and in part annulled or mitigated the actions that had been taken by Valentinian against his opponents. In 377 he won an important victory over the Alamanni. He was on his way to Sirmium when he heard the news of the disastrous defeat and the death of Emperor VALENS at Adrianople (Aug. 9, 378). Unable to rule both East and West, Gratian made General Theodosius—whose father had been executed by Valentinian—Augustus and emperor of the East (Jan. 19, 379). In the domestic sphere, Theodosius I adopted a rigorous policy of suppression against pagans and heretics, making Christianity the official religion of the state. It is precisely from this time that Gratian also adopted a similar policy under the influence of new advisors, namely, Theodosius, Pope DAMASUS, and especially St. Ambrose, the great bishop of Milan. In 379 (rather than in 375 or 382) he was the first emperor to reject the title of Pontifex Maximus, and in 382 he abolished public support for the pagan priesthoods, confiscated temple properties, and had the altar of victory removed from the Senate house in Rome, a decision that he refused to change despite the formal protest made by SYMMACHUS, the leader of the pagan party. In 379 and 380 he issued strong laws against heresy. Early in 383, Magnus Maximus was proclaimed Augustus by his troops in Britain and crossed into Gaul. Gratian hastened from Italy to suppress the revolt, but most of his own troops abandoned him and he was assassinated at Lyons as he was fleeing southward from Paris. Gratian was a young man of high moral character, but he lacked the qualities of leadership, above all, the power of independent, firm, and prompt decision, that were required of an emperor in that turbulent age.

See Also: AMBROSE, ST.; THEODOSIUS I.

Bibliography: O. SEECK, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft (Stuttgart 1893) 7.2 (1912) 1831–39. J. WORDSWORTH, A Dictionary of Christian Biography (London 1877–87) 2:721–727, old but still valuable. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire (Paris 1949–59) 1:172–202, and “Notes” 507–526. G. BARDY and J. R. PALANQUE, in Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 3:276–296, 513–524. M. FORTINA, L’imperatore Graziano (Turin 1955).

[M. R. P. MC GUIRE]

GRATITUDE

Gratitude, one of the social virtues, a potential part of justice. It falls short of the notion of justice because it does not suppose strict indebtedness nor require a full measure of equality in what is returned for benefits received. In a broad sense, gratitude can be considered as the acknowledgment of a favor received from a superior and so includes religion, piety, and observance. In these, however, a strict but not an equal payment is required. Properly, gratitude refers to a debt that is not legal but moral. It inclines men to acknowledge private favors with appreciation and to repay them with kindness.

A benefactor has no strict claim to the gratitude of the beneficiary. Because a gift is freely given, it does not give rise to an obligation in justice to repay it. There is, however, a moral obligation, in decency, to acknowledge the favor and to make some kind of return for it. This repayment involves an attitude of will rather than a material quid pro quo. Hence no one is so destitute that he cannot exercise gratitude. Like beneficence, it is measured by the disposition of the heart: “Since kindness depends on the heart rather than on the deed, so too gratitude depends chiefly on the heart” (ST. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 106.3 ad 5). It is to be directed to all from whom favors are received: “However, well off a man may be it is possible to thank him for his kindness by showing him reverence and honor” (ibid). Repayment by affection should be made at once. A return gift, however, should wait for an opportune occasion. Indeed, if repayment is hurried, it could indicate unwillingness to be indebted, which is itself a form of ingratitude. It is better to return more than received, because there is nothing gratuitous or generous in giving back the equivalent or less. However, repayment of more should not be made from the selfish motive of making others dependent, but should rather spring from the benevolent love of charity. The debt of gratitude never becomes onerous because it flows from the debt of love.

Gratitude can be violated by excess, as when thanks are given for something that should be thankless, e.g., for cooperation in evil, or when repayment is too prompt; by defect, when there is ingratitude. When it is deliberate, ingratitude involves contempt for the favor rendered or for the benefactor. There are various degrees of gratitude: recognizing the favor received, expressing appreciation, and repaying suitably. So also there are degrees of ingratitude: not acknowledging a favor, especially by evaluating it as an unkindness. Speculatively, men consider ingratitude as contemptible; practically, however, it is not uncommon.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae 8–, 106, 107. F. L. W. R. FARRELL, Companion to the Summa (Dubuque 1959). W. L. DAVIDSON, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:390–392. J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, rev. E. P. FARRELL, 2 v. (New York 1958) 2:2143–2380. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (8th ed. Paris 1949) 2:836–839.

[P. J. KELLY]

GRATIUS, ORTWIN (VAN GRAES)

Theologian and humanist; b. Holtwick, near Münster, 1480; d. Cologne, May 22, 1542. He was educated in the school of the Brethren of the Common Life in Deventer under Alexander Hegius. He studied in Cologne (B.A., 1501; M.A., 1506) and subsequently taught in the arts faculty, serving at the same time as an editor for the Quentell publishing house. He was ordained in 1514. His humanist learning was evident in his Orationes quodlibeticæ (Cologne 1508), nine orations in support of the seven liberal arts, poetry, and philosophy, containing citations from the classics. He soon alienated the humanists, however, by opposing Hermann von dem Busche, who had attacked traditional authorities; by translating into Latin various books by Johann PFEFFERKORN, who favored burning Jewish books (1507–09); and by displaying his hostility to Johann REUCHLIN. Against Reuchlin he wrote a Latin poem to accompany Arnold von Tungern's Articuli (1512); the Praenotamenta (1514), a collection of documents presenting a slanted version of the Reuchlin controversy; and a Defensio (1516). Consequently Crotus Rubeanus and Ulrich von Hutten made him the chief target of their ridicule of the Cologne scholastics in their Letters of Obscure Men (1515). His inept rejoinder, more wordy than witty, Lamentationes obscurorum virorum (1518), merely unleashed another barrage of pamphlets and letters from which Gratius' reputation has suffered unjustly ever since. He published a Fasciculus rerum expetendarum ac fugiendarum (Cologne 1535), a collection of documents from Aeneas Sylvius, Lorenzo Valla, Wyclif, Poggio, the Waldenses, and others favorable to reform and critical of conditions within the Church, a work later placed on the Index.

Bibliography: D. REICHLING, Ortwin Gratius: Sein Leben und Wirken (Heiligenstadt 1884). F. ZOEPFL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 2 4:1171–72.

[L. W. SPITZ]

GRATRY, AUGUSTE JOSEPH ALPHONSE

French theologian and philosopher; b. Lille, March 30, 1805; d. Montreux, Feb. 7, 1872. Gratry was indifferent to religion until 1822, when he received a kind of illumination concerning the nothingness of worldly ambitions. His secondary education, begun at Tours, was completed at the Collège Henry IV. While studying at the Polytechnique (1826–27), he returned to the Sacraments; soon afterward, he went to study theology under the Abbé Bautain in Strasbourg (1828), and in 1834 he was ordained. Gratry returned to Paris in 1840 as director of the Collège Stanislas. Thence, he became chaplain at the École Normale (1846–51). He entered the Oratory in 1852 and was appointed professor of moral theology at the Sorbonne in 1863. In 1867, he was elected to the French Academy.

By reason of his many works, both apologetic (De la Connaissance de Dieu, 1855; Les Sources, 1862) and polemic (La Sophistique contemporaine, 1861; Les Sophistes et la critique, 1864), Gratry contributed to the renaissance of CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY. But while his avowed intention was to oppose both rational ECLECTICISM and FIDEISM with the Augustinian tradition of the Oratory, his thought is more poetic than precise, more prayerful than profound. He assigned an excessive role to emotion and to "heart" in the discovery of truth; in considering the knowledge of God, he appealed to "a sense of the infinite" that is superior to intellect. In politics and in morals (La Morale et la loi de l'histoire, 1868) he sought to associate Catholicism with the movement toward indefinite progress, wherein he saw the law of history operating.

See Also: SPIRITUALISM.

Bibliography: R. CRIPPA, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:891–892.

[R. JOLIVET]

GRAVAMINA

Complaints of any kind, but especially ecclesiastical protests made formally to a superior authority such as pope or legate or council or king, and setting out the "burdens" (gravamina), secular or ecclesiastical, which the church or the realm had to support. Thus, in 13th-century England, gravamina listing secular infringements of church liberties were put before the legate Otto in 1239 and were later presented by representative groups of clergy (synod or council) to the king; the royal replies (e.g., of 1258, 1280, 1300) are extant. These gravamina form the substance of those submitted by the English Church to the Council of Vienne in 1311: usurpation of ecclesiastical jurisdiction; the capture, torture, and sometimes the execution of criminous clerks; the frustration of decisions of ecclesiastical courts. Complaints of this nature were, in fact, sent in to the Council of Vienne from various provinces of the church (Ehrle), but only a few received conciliar attention, chiefly because a committee eliminated many beforehand (Göller). Furthermore, official memoranda censuring the conduct of the papacy itself were not uncommon, particularly in respect of papal PROVISIONS. The practice of beneficencing foreign clergy in England was the burden of English gravamina at the First Council of Lyons in 1245; and papal provisions in general occasioned the gravamina ecclesiae gallicanae, or "Protestation of St. Louis," in 1247, when, foreshadowing GALLICANISM, it was alleged that there was no canonical authority for such practices. In the 15th and 16th centuries spirited gravamina that protested curial extortions through the COLLATIO of benefices and the collection of TITHES and annates were drawn up by German clergy, e.g., at diets in Mainz (1451, 1455), Frankfurt (1456, 1458, 1479), Worms (1521), and Nuremberg (1522–23).

Bibliography: MATTHEW PARIS, Chronica majora, ed. H. R. LUARD, 7 v. Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 57:1872–83, 6:99–112. F. EHRLE, "Ein Bruchstück der Akten des Concils von Vienne," Archiv für Literatur und Kirchengeschichte

des Mittelalters 4 (1888) 361–470. E. GÖLLER, “Die Gravamina auf dem Konzil von Vienne und ihre literarische Überlieferung,” Festgabe Heinrich Finke (Münster 1904) 197–221. G. MOLLAT, “Les Doléances du clergé de la Province de Sens au concile de Vienne, 1311–1312,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 6 (1905) 319–326. G. J. CAMPBELL, “The Protest of Saint Louis,” Traditio 15 (1959) 405–418. H. RAAB, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1174–75. F. M. POWICKE and C. R. CHENEY, Councils and Synods (Oxford 1964–) v.2 passim.

[L. E. BOYLE]

GRAY, WILLIAM

Bishop of Ely, treasurer of England, bibliophile; d. Downham, Cambridgeshire, Aug. 4, 1478. He was the son of Sir Thomas Gray of Heton, Northumberland, and nephew of Humphrey (Stafford), Duke of Buckingham. While resident in Balliol College, Oxford (c. 1430–42), he obtained the degree master of arts (1434) and became chancellor of the university (1441). To further his interest in theology he went to the University of Cologne (1442) and there added to an already unusual library by purchasing humanistic texts, as well as theological and legal works. From Cologne he traveled to Florence; he acquired books from Vespasiano da Bisticci, and moved on to Padua to secure the D.Th. degree (1445). Later, in Ferrara, Gray attended lectures by the humanist Guarino da Verona and befriended Niccolò Perotti. Upon receiving an appointment as king’s proctor at the papal Curia, Gray began a period of residence in Rome. NICHOLAS V formed a high opinion of him, appointed him prothonotary apostolic, and eventually secured for him the bishopric of ELY (1454). Thereafter he was often prominent in national affairs, serving as treasurer of England (1469–70) and in diplomatic and political matters of the highest importance. A lifelong collector of MSS, Gray frequently employed scribes to make copies of books. Clearly, his main interests were theology and philosophy, but his library contained many Latin classics, among which the works of Cicero were preeminent. He left his large book collection to Balliol College, where it furthered the classical interests of younger scholars and contemporaries.

Bibliography: W. F. SCHIRMER, Der englische Frühhumanismus (2d ed. Tübingen 1963). R. WEISS, Humanism in England during the Fifteenth Century (2d ed. Oxford 1957) 86–97. A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500 (Oxford 1957–59) 1:809–814.

[A. R. HOGUE]

GREAT AWAKENING

A movement in Protestantism in the thirteen North American colonies and precursor of the revivalism that was a major characteristic of much of the Protestantism of the U.S. The Great Awakening was an outgrowth of the PIETISM of Europe and of the Puritanism and EVANGELICALISM of the British Isles (see PURITANS). It first appeared in the Dutch Reformed Churches in the Raritan Valley in New Jersey as a result of the preaching of Theodore Jacobus FRELINGHUYSEN, who had been educated under Pietist influences (see REFORMED CHURCHES, II: NORTH AMERICA). In 1720 Frelinghuysen came to America, where he found the religion of the churches formal and conventional. In Pietist fashion he insisted on a personal experience of conversion that would issue in moral transformation. Under him the Raritan revival reached its peak in 1729 and spread to other Dutch Reformed Churches. Another contribution came from Irish-born William Tennent, a Presbyterian pastor who came to America in 1716. He began training young men for the ministry and for that purpose erected, opposite his residence in Neshaminy, Pa., a log house, called derisively by its critics the Log College. In it were educated a number of men who became preachers of the revival. Outstanding among them was Tennent’s son, Gilbert, who was long a pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., and who preached widely as an itinerant. He became a close friend of Frelinghuysen and cooperated with him. Another leader, Jonathan EDWARDS, of Northampton, Mass., in 1734 preached an awakening that had wide repercussions not only in America but also in the British Isles. The preaching of George WHITEFIELD profoundly influenced the Great Awakening also. In his first months in America (1739–40) Whitefield traveled from Georgia to New England; later he made repeated tours of the colonies; he died in Newburyport, Mass., in 1770. He was an amazing orator, with a voice that could reach an audience of many thousands in the open air and with a wide range of pathos, humor, and compelling earnestness; he profoundly influenced both Great Britain and the thirteen colonies. By his preaching throughout the length of the entire Atlantic seaboard, he helped to give a degree of geographic and interdenominational unity to the movement. In addition to the leaders, scores of other preachers contributed to the Awakening.

The Great Awakening gave rise to controversy. The emotional scenes—faintings, cryings, and bodily agitations—that accompanied many of the meetings, and the condemnation by numbers of its preachers of “unconverted” ministers and the “unconverted” members of their flocks led to dissensions and divisions. For a time the PRESBYTERIANS were split; in New England the “new lights,” as the advocates of the Awakening were known, and the “old lights,” who opposed it, denounced each other. Their differences led to the division of many local congregations. Numbers of the dissidents gathered into Baptist churches. The Great Awakening continued in many parts of the country until the political controversies that emerged in the Revolution diverted attention. In the 1790s and early 1800s, after the independence of the U.S. and peace with Great Britain, New England experienced what was called the Second Awakening, and revivals occurred in many other parts of the country.

The Great Awakening brought about a marked increase in church membership and various humanitarian undertakings; created a more democratic spirit; stimulated the founding of colleges, notable among them the College of New Jersey (later Princeton) and Dartmouth; and contributed to missions to the Native Americans, particularly the work of David Brainerd, Eleazer Wheelock, and Samuel Kirkland.

Bibliography: J. TRACY, The Great Awakening (Boston 1842). W. M. GEWEHR, The Great Awakening in Virginia (Durham, N.C. 1930). E. S. GAUSTAD, The Great Awakening in New England (New York 1957). C. H. MAXSON, The Great Awakening in the Middle Colonies (Chicago 1920). R. J. COX, "Stephen Bordley, George Whitefield, and the Great Awakening in Maryland," Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church 46 (1977) 297–307. F. LAMBERT, "The Great Awakening as Artifact: George Whitefield and the Construction of Intercolonial Revival, 1739–1745," Church History 60 (1991) 223–246. B. F. LE BEAU, "'The Acrimonious, Controversial Spirit' among Baptists and Presbyterians in the Middle Colonies during the Great Awakening," American Baptist Quarterly 9 (1990) 167–183. M. A. NOLL, "From the Great Awakening to the War for Independence: Christian Values in the American Revolution," Christian Scholar's Review 12, no. 2 (1983) 99–110.

[K. S. LATOURETTE]

GREAT SAINT BERNARD HOSPICE

A refuge conducted by CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE on the 8,114-foot high Great St. Bernard Pass over the Pennine Alps from Martigny, Valais, Switzerland, to Aosta, Italy (50 miles); it is in the Diocese of Sion, Switzerland. The pass, where there was a Celtic and then a Roman shrine (Mons Jovis), has long been used by armies, merchants, pilgrims, kings, and popes. There was a Carolingian Hospice of St. Peter, probably under Benedictines, at nearby Bourg-Saint-Pierre. The hospice founded c. 1050 by St. BERNARD OF AOSTA, with a chapel of St. Nicholas, came to be dedicated to St. Bernard by the 12th century. It was cared for by brothers (1145), canons (1191), and Augustinians of Martigny (13th century). Medieval popes and emperors who used the pass favored the hospice with privileges and benefices in many lands. In 1752 the hospice was made a provostship independent of that of Aosta, which had been commendatory (1465–1586); and the provost received pontifical privileges of miter and crozier. Napoleon favored the hospice after passing there with his army to the battle of Marengo (1801). A highway (1903–05) and a tunnel (1963) have reduced the rescue duties of the canons, many of whom gave their lives in their work; the hospice now serves tourists and skiers. In 1933 the canons extended their work to the evangelization of Tibet and China. Hospice buildings comprise a church (1669), a convent, and guest houses; the archives, library (30,000 volumes), and museum are notable. In 1964 there were 20 canons. The famous St. Bernard dogs have been used in rescue work since the 17th century.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1320–21. L. QUAGLIA, La Maison du Grand St. Bernard, des origines aux temps actuels (Aosta 1955). A. PELLOUCHOUD, Le Grand-St-Bernard (Lausanne 1954); Der Grosse Sankt Bernhard (Grand-St-Bernard 1964). M. GIROUD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 9:135.

[A. MAISSEN]

GREBEL, CONRAD

Founder of the New Testament-oriented pacifist ANABAPTISTS (Swiss Brethren); b. Zurich, c. 1498; d. Maienfeld, c. 1526, Grebel, of a patrician family, was a humanist who had studied in Basel, Vienna, and Paris (1514–20); he was interested mainly in philology and the natural sciences. Upon his return to Zurich (1520) he became associated with Ulrich Zwingli and other Swiss humanists with whom he engaged in Biblical studies in the original languages. In 1522 Grebel's marriage to a girl of more humble origin caused a break with his family. Soon after, still under the influence of Zwingli, he experienced a conversion to a personal Christian faith. Unwilling, however, to accept Zwingli's inclusive view of the church, Grebel soon broke with his mentor (1523), hoping to establish a voluntary and disciplined Christian community conforming to his idea of New Testament Christianity. This meant also the abolition of infant baptism and the introduction of "believer's baptism." Attempting to rally all groups similarly inclined, he wrote a letter to Thomas MÜNZER seeking to form an alliance and warning him at the same time against the use of force, thus distinguishing his group clearly from the revolutionaries. The letter never reached its destination and the effort to establish an alliance failed. Grebel remained a leader of the Swiss Anabaptists, sharing their trials until his death from the plague at the age of 28.

Bibliography: H. S. BENDER, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, Ind. 1950). G. H. WILLIAMS, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962). H. FAST, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–63) 3 2:1834.

[G. W. FORELL]

GRECO, EL (DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI)

Great religious painter of a visionary nature; b. Candia, Crete (a Venetian possession), 1541; d. Toledo, Spain, 1614. While popularly known as El Greco (Spanish article with Italian substantive), he signed his paintings Doménikos Theotokópoulos (in Greek letters), and on Spanish documents used the half-Italian, half-Spanish Domenico Theotocopuli.

Probably he went first to Venice (c. 1560) to study with Titian. The triptych in the Modena Gallery combining Cretan-Venetian elements, signed "cheir Domenikou" (sic) is accepted as El Greco's by some critics, while this writer and others attribute it to another artist with the same forename. The attribution to El Greco of religious panels by hack painters (Madonneri) is now discredited by responsible historians. His Italian works of c. 1560 to 1576 include two signed versions of the "Purification of the Temple" (National Gallery of Art, Washington D.C., and Minneapolis, Minn., Institute of Arts); those after 1570 display a knowledge of Florentine-Roman art as exemplified in "Christ Healing the Blind" (Parma Museum), and the "Pietà" compositionally dependent on Michelangelo (Philadelphia, Pa., Museum of Art; Hispanic Society of America, New York). The first two subjects are symbolic of the Counter Reformation.

Early in 1577 he departed for Spain, then the dominant world power, and in Toledo he painted his first masterpieces: three altars in Santo Domingo el Antiguo, whose major picture, the "Assumption," is now in the Art Institute, Chicago, Ill.; and "Espolio" (Disrobing of Christ), in the Toledo cathedral sacristy. Although its pictorial sources are Italian, the "Espolio" demonstrates a resurgence of medieval Byzantine iconography. Emotional power is projected by the dominating figure of Christ in a brilliant red tunic, surrounded and oppressed by a massive crowd of revilers. Philip II gave him only two commissions, and was dissatisfied with these: the "Allegory of the Holy League" (oil study, National Gallery of Art, London; large version, Nuevos Museos, Escorial) and the "Martyrdom of St. Maurice" (Escorial); the latter masterpiece combines startling effects of color with the Counter-Reformation ideal of glorifying martyrdom. Henceforth El Greco eliminated time and space in emphasis on spiritual exaltation, as in the "Crucifixion with Two Donors" (Louvre, Paris). His greatest achievement, the "Burial of Count Orgaz" (1586; Santo Tomé, Toledo), displays an earthly funeral with an extraordinary array of portraits of black-garbed Toledo dignitaries; an apparition of SS. Stephen and Augustine in brilliant crimson and gold vestments; and, in the vision of glory above, an assembly of saints suggesting the Last Judgment, with a white-robed Christ accompanied by the Virgin and St. John the Baptist.

El Greco, self-portrait. (©CORBIS-Bettmann)

El Greco created a vast new iconography of religious art, fully in the COUNTER REFORMATION spirit. His various interpretations of Francis of Assisi (ten different compositions), Peter in tears, Dominic, Mary Magdalen, and Jerome symbolize miracle and repentance. Other devotional subjects are the Holy Family, the Agony in the garden, Christ carrying the cross, Christ crucified, and the Apostles series. All his late compositions stress the supernatural: the "Fifth Seal of the Apocalypse" (1608-14, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York); "Annunciation" (1596-1600; Museum, Villanueva y Geltrú, near Barcelona); and the "Adoration of the Shepherds" (c. 1612-14; Prado, Madrid), in which tall distorted figures, shadowy setting, and sharply contrasted vivid colors create intensity of mood. The last picture was planned for the altar of his tomb in Santo Domingo el Antiguo.

El Greco was equally great as portraitist, beginning in Italy in pure Venetian style with "Giulio Clovio" (Capodimonte Museum, Naples) and "Vincenzo Anastagi" (Frick Collection, New York). Later portraits of Spanish dignitaries and churchmen have remarkable psychological insight and superlative technique, e.g., "Cardinal Niño de Guevara" (Metropolitan Museum of Art) and “Fray Hortensio Paravicino” (Museum of Fine Arts, Boston) are surpassingly great in characterization and pictorial beauty. His sculpture includes the “Miracle of St. Ildefonso” (cathedral, Toledo) and “Risen Christ” (Hospital Extramuros, Toledo). His architectural designs begin with altars, Palladian in style, in Santo Domingo. Late Mannerist design appears subsequently in the high altar (1597) of the chapel of St. Joseph, Toledo, high altar at Illescas (1603), and sepulchral retable, Santo Domingo el Antiguo (1612).

Differences of opinion prevail about the importance of his Byzantine heritage in iconography and style. Some critics (as Kelemen) regard it as predominant, whereas others consider his Venetian color and technique and his knowledge of MICHELANGELO and Italian mannerism (precedent for tall figures) as the basis of his art. All agree that El Greco was a unique genius of unparalleled visionary nature, one of the greatest religious painters of all time.

Bibliography: H. E. WETHEY, El Greco and His School, 2 v. (Princeton 1962), monograph, classified catalogue, bibliog. p. KELEMEN, El Greco Revisited (New York 1961), supports Byzantine thesis. H. SOEHNER, “Greco in Spanien,” Münchener Jahrbuch der bildenden Kunst, 3d ser., 8 (1957) 123–194; 9–10 (1958–59) 147–242; 11 (1960) 73–217, catalogue of pictures in Spain. M. B. COSSÍO, El Greco (Madrid 1908). E. ARSLAN, Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959–87) 6:835–845.

[H. E. WETHEY]

GRECO-ROMAN SCHOOLING

The Greco-Roman school exerted a profound influence on ancient culture as it evolved between the 5th century B.C. and the 3d century A.D. It first appeared in ancient Athens, developed with the early SOPHISTS, and then, thanks to Plato and especially to Isocrates, assumed a form that it kept through the whole Hellenistic period. The Romans had only to adapt an already perfected institution to their own use. As they expanded, they introduced it into all sections of the empire.

Organization. The school of the magister ludi or litterator (elementary school) accepted a child at seven and taught him to read according to the analytical method (letters, syllables, words). First he read short moral texts, fables, or the DISTICHA CATONIS. At the same time, he learned to write by copying words on wax tablets. Then he was taught basic arithmetic, in particular how to calculate on his fingers (digital computation). The techniques of instruction at this stage were rather basic and the rod was not spared (Augustine, Conf. 1.9.14–15).

When about 12 years old the child went to the school of the grammaticus (grammarian), who taught him the mechanics of language and introduced him to the classical authors: Homer and Hesiod in the East; Vergil, Terence, Sallust, and Cicero in the West. For three years the student devoted much time to the poets. The Iliad or the Aeneid were studied verse by verse, both for form (verbal expression and scansion) and for content. As the people and events treated by the poets were identified, broad excursions were made into mythology, history, geography, and even the sciences. The student thus acquired a knowledge that made him “a bright young man.” Then, in accord with the ideas of the Greek masters, he embarked on studies preparatory to rhetoric, designed to help him learn to write and speak well.

He began his “higher studies” in the school of the rhetor, Greek σοφιστής, where his goal was to master the art of oratory. Quintilian in his Institutio oratoria offers a complete picture of the stages of this study upon which the student was engaged between the ages of 16 and 20. The rhetor taught the various steps involved in the composition of a discourse: how to find topical material or common places (topoi) and construct a speech (dispositio) from the exordium to the peroration; and how to deliver it in words (elocutio) with gestures (actio). A study of ancient orators (Isocrates, Cicero) and historians taught him to use exempla (fictitious legal cases, commentaries on historical subjects) with which to enrich the exercises assigned by the rhetor. Studies in dialectic prepared the student to overcome the objections of future adversaries. He left the rhetor’s class a well-versed lecturer or, as the case might be, a formidable lawyer.

Studies. To understand the school of antiquity at the moment during the 3d century when Christians began to take an interest in it, one must distinguish developments in the West from those in the East. Studies in Roman schools were essentially literary and oratorical, diverging from the Greek tradition, which placed a high value on the liberal arts, the three literary disciplines (grammar, rhetoric, dialectic) and the four sciences (arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy). These seven branches of learning were introductory to the supreme art, philosophy. Among the Romans, however, scientific and philosophical studies gradually disappeared as the knowledge of Greek came to be restricted to an elite. In the East, on the other hand, the philosophical tradition continued. There, the student learned logic, physics, and especially ethics that prepared him to attain the supreme good and happiness, the goal of all his studies. Under the Later Empire, however, the school was employed to produce officials for the constantly increasing governmental bureaus, and the state became more and more interested in the municipal schools, favoring them even in the farthest reaches of the empire. The more totalitarian the state became, the more it encroached in this area. After JULIAN THE APOSTATE, only persons approved by the municipal council, or even the emperor, could teach. In the 5th century Theodosius II founded an imperial university in CONSTANTINOPLE and gave it a monopoly in higher education.

Early in its development, Christianity was faced with a dilemma. Could the Church ignore this Greco-Roman school and develop its own religious schools, as the Jews had done with the Synagogue? Or would they try to enter into the school and Christianize it? Would they find another solution? The matter was important, for on the decision of the Church would depend the future of Mediterranean culture.

Christianity and the School

Two possible positions confronted each other from the beginning: to reject the school or to compromise. Opposition between Christian principles and those of the school of antiquity seemed absolute. Christianity as a religious way of life apparently had nothing in common with Hellenism. "Where is the 'wise man'? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputant of this world? Has not God turned to foolishness the 'wisdom' of this world?" Paul had asked (1 Cor 1.20).

Rejection. At first the wisdom of the Greeks was considered incompatible with the true wisdom of the Gospel, and the early Christians who were regarded with contempt as "barbarians" by learned pagans took great pride in that epithet (Tertullian, Test. anim. 1). The Christian seeking an education had no need to go to the school of the pagans. The third-century DIDASCALIA APOSTOLORUM represents the attitude of the early Christian communities: "Do not even touch the books of the gentiles. What have you to do with these alien words and laws, or these false prophets who so easily bestow error on inconstant men? What do you lack in the word of God that you should turn to pagan fables? If you wish to read history, you have the Book of Kings; if you need philosophy or poetry, you have the Prophets. . . . If you desire songs, you have the Psalms; if you wish to know the beginning of the history of the world you have Genesis. . . . Abstain therefore absolutely from all these profane and diabolical works" [1.6, Latin fragment, ed. Connolly (Oxford 1920) 13]. This rigorist idea of Christian culture was originally adopted by the monks, for whom true philosophy was not to be learned in the school but in solitude, by meditating on sacred writings. What would the Christian student find at the pagan school but immorality in the legends of mythology, and idolatry in the cult of false gods? As John Chrysostom said, "Why send Christian youths to masters where, before the art of speaking, they will learn evil?" (Adv. opp. vitae monast. 3.95).

The Dialogue Begins. If Christianity had developed apart from the Hellenic world, all Christians would probably have taken the position of the rigorists. But the Gospel had been written or translated into Greek, and borrowed much of its vocabulary from Hellenism, beginning with the all-important concept of the LOGOS (Jn 1). Thus Christianity simply could not escape the influence of the cultural atmosphere in which it developed. From the second century learned men who had been graduated from the school of antiquity had been turning to the new religion. In their writings they could not abandon their early training. In his Dialogue with Trypho JUSTIN MARTYR (d. c. 163) recalls how he arrived at the knowledge of the God of the Gospel by stages, following the development of pagan philosophy, and in his Apologies, he proves that Christianity provided answers for the questions posed by Greek thinkers. The Christian apologists (see APOLOGISTS, GREEK), who created the first Christian philosophy, took over many ideas from ancient philosophies, especially from Stoicism.

Christian Schools. GNOSTICISM showed that the encounter of Christianity with ancient philosophy was not without dangers, and many Christians felt that the philosophers were "the patriarchs of the heretics" (Test. anim. 3). In order to refute heretical teaching in Rome, Justin opened a school (a Didaskaleion) where he taught in a toga, "the dress of a philosopher" (Eusebius, Hist. 4.11.8). At the beginning of the third century, HIPPOLYTUS, a Roman priest and possibly a disciple of Irenaeus, author of the Philosophumena (Refutation of all Heresies), was honored with a statue representing him as a philosopher (Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabrol, H. Leclercq, and H. I. Marrou, 6.2:419-60).

In this same period, St. Clement of Alexandria, a former philosopher and student of the Stoic PANTAENUS, gathered a group of disciples whom he advised to study the pagan disciplines with a view to entering more deeply in the mystery of the faith. For him education and culture were "the most beautiful and the most perfect goods that we possess in this life" (Paedag. 1.16.1). Like an earlier Alexandrian, PHILO JUDAEUS, Clement found material in secular culture with which to improve his scriptural studies. He too sought "to dress as a philosopher" in order to demonstrate the proofs of the true wisdom to the pagan philosophers.

Again in Alexandria, in the middle of the third century, the former grammarian ORIGEN founded a school that became famous, and taught more than philosophy. Less favorable than Clement to the currents of ancient thought, he saw in classical studies a propaedeutic or preparation for understanding the Scriptures. The school he directed was a center of higher religious studies where students, Christian and non-Christian, after having studied the liberal arts and the philosophical systems, received exegetical and theological instruction. Eusebius of Caesarea describes Origen's school (Hist. 6.18.3–4): "Many well educated men came to him to test his competence. Thousands of heretics and a large number of the most distinguished philosophers studied under him and quite openly learned not only divine truths but even things concerning secular philosophy. The disciples whom he saw to be naturally gifted he directed also to the study of philosophy, geometry, arithmetic, and other fundamental studies. Then he conducted them further into the teachings of the sects found among the philosophers, explaining, commenting upon, and examining their writings one by one." When he left Alexandria and took his school to Caesarea in Palestine, Origen had among his disciples the future saint GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, for whom he explained the principle that to reach Christianity more surely the student must "take over from Greek philosophy the course of disciplines that can serve as an introduction to Christianity and those theories in geometry and astronomy that may be useful in the explanation of the Sacred Books." Then, employing a favorite image, he compares the Christians making use of the learning of the pagans to the Hebrews in Exodus who took with them the spoils of the Egyptians with which to adorn the Tabernacle (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 11:88–89). For the first time a Christian scholar had worked out the elements of Christian culture, and the lesson was not to be forgotten.

Christians Attend the School

Such was the synthesis of Christianity and classicism that in the end Christians had no choice but to send their children to the Greco-Roman school. Not to attend this school was not only to cut oneself off from the general culture but to make it impossible to take part in any activity within the empire. Even Tertullian, who had severely criticized pagan classicism, saw that it was necessary to attend the school: "How would one do anything according to human prudence, or receive any mental formation without literature, the instrument of life?" (Idol. 10). The Christian youth had to receive instruction from the pagan masters, but care had to be exercised lest the poison harm him, as Jerome would point out in his observations on education in the 4th century in pueris necessitas (Epist. 21.13.9). It seems that Christian children had continued in the schools even during the persecutions, occasionally being subjected to anti-Christian propaganda, such as resulted from an edict of Maximian requiring teachers to make their students learn the Acts of Pilate, which were filled with blasphemies against Christ (Eusebius, Hist. 9.5.1).

Christian Professors. Tertullian had been a rigorist; discouraging Christians from teaching in the pagan school. He judged that the risks run by the Christian teacher would be too great: he would have to lecture in detail about the pagan gods and take part in their ceremonies and feasts (Idol. 10). But the Church did not follow the African apologist. Thus, the Apostolic Tradition (see APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS), composed in the circle of HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME, lists as professions that prevented catechumens from entering the Church: procurers, actors, and those who make idols; in regard to teachers, however, the text states (16): "If anyone teaches children the learning of this world he should give it up, but if he has no other means of livelihood he will be excused."

A number of Christians were teachers by profession. PRUDENTIUS speaks of a Cassian of Imola martyred by his students who stabbed him with their pens. Origen had opened a school of grammar to support himself after his father died. In 264 Anatolius, future bishop of Laodicea, held a chair of philosophy at Alexandria. In 268 the priest Malchion directed a school of rhetoric in Antioch. The Africans Arnobius and Lactantius were rhetors. LACTANTIUS was even invited to teach rhetoric at Nicomedia under Diocletian. For the fourth century the evidence in texts and inscriptions is plentiful. In Rome the conversion of the rhetor MARIUS VICTORINUS caused a scandal in pagan circles. Prohaeresius in Athens and the grammarian APOLLINARIS OF LAODICEA were Christian teachers, as were St. Basil and his father in Caesarea of Cappadocia. It is easy to understand, then, the painful surprise of the Christians when Julian the Apostate, intent upon reviving the pagan cults, forbade Christian masters to teach in the public schools.

Julian's Persecution. In a law of June 17, 362, Julian ruled that professors should be nominated by the municipalities and appointed by the emperor, who thus could pass sentence on their morality. In an accompanying letter, Julian explained what he meant by morality: a perfect accord between what one preached and what one practiced. For Christian teachers were explaining Homer and Hesiod, in whose words they saw only a tissue of diabolical fabrications. They were thus hypocrites and unworthy to teach: "If they believe that these authors are mistaken with regard to beings of the greatest veneration, let them go to the churches of the Galileans and explain Matthew and Luke" (Epist. 42).

This step created consternation in university circles, among both Christians and pagans. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, in his Invectives against Julian echoed the feelings of the Christians, while even pagans were disturbed to see the state interfering with the schools (Ammianus Marcellinus, 22.10.7; 25.4.20), for fear lest, in the service of a pagan revival, that institution might become a denominational school. Many Christian professors gave up their positions rather than abjure their faith. Others attempted to adorn the sacred writings of the Scriptures with a classical grace. The historian SOCRATES gives an account of a father and son named Apollinaris: "Since they were both scholars, the father in grammar, the son in sophistic, they proved of great use to the Christians at this pass. The father composed a Christian grammar by rendering the books of Moses and everything of a historical character in the Old Testament in the meter called heroic, employing now the dactylic meter and now the tragic style to treat the subjects dramatically. The son, skilled in eloquence, presented the Gospels and the apostolic beliefs in dialogues, after the manner of Plato among the Greeks" (Hist. 3.16, Patrologia Graeca 57:417). Since these writings are lost, the results of this endeavor cannot be evaluated. But at least it shows that Christian professors were devoted to the classicism of antiquity. When the edict of Julian was rescinded on Jan. 11, 364, thanks to the succession of a new emperor, Christian masters resumed their activities in the schools of the state. It should be noted that the scholastic persecution of Julian did not cause the Christians to open denominational schools. The only scholastic centers where the Psalms were learned instead of the short classical texts used in the schools were on the outskirts of the empire, in upper Egypt (the school of Protogenes at Antioch discussed by Theodoret of Cyr, Ecclesiastical History 4.18. 7–14) and in the "barbarian" lands ignorant of classical culture.

Christian Classical Culture

Even before the undertaking of the two Apollinarises, some learned Christians decided that the language of the Bible was too crude and attempted to provide their contemporaries with the sacred texts in classical form. The Spanish priest Juvencus c. 330 put the Gospels into verse so that the content of the divine message could be remembered better. The Roman Proba succeeded in translating biblical stories in hemistichs of Vergil. In Gaul, Cyprian offered a versified translation of the Heptateuch. His exploit was repeated by the rhetor Marius Victorinus in the 5th century and by AVITUS OF VIENNE in the 6th. Christian poetry of the fourth and fifth centuries flowed effortlessly in the classical mold giving new life to a literary genre that had been dying out.

Christian Oratory. Sacred preachers also availed themselves of the devices of the traditional rhetoric when they presented their message. In the East a renaissance of pagan eloquence had a great influence in learned Christian circles. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, student of Libanius the rhetor of Antioch, Basil of Caesarea and GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, former students at the school of Athens, did not forget the lessons of their masters. Gregory of Nazianzus, apropos of the school law of Julian, cried: "I have given up riches, nobility, glory, power, but I hold fast to eloquence" (Or. 4.100, Patrologia Graeca 35:636). In the West in the sermons of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, appear the topoi (common places) dear to rhetors. To be sure, the Fathers of the Church as a rule avoided the bad features of rhetoric, but many preachers of the period sought to please rather than to instruct and courted applause in their own churches.

Christian Learning. The presence of Christian professors in the school of antiquity not only enabled them to present Christian thought in classical guise, but offered them the means to construct a basically Christian scholarship. Following principles proposed by Origen, they saw in the program offered in the school a propaedeutic for the scientific study of Holy Scripture. In his Admonitions to Young Men on the Profitable Use of Pagan Literature, Basil of Caesarea suggested that "as dyers begin by exposing an object to be dyed to certain preparations, if we wish our idea of the good to be indelible, we will demand of these external sciences a preliminary initiation whereby we can better understand the holy teachings of the mysteries." Clearly, one had to know how to choose what was good for the soul and reject what was harmful. JEROME took the same position: "When books of worldly wisdom come into our hands, if we find something useful we take it over for our doctrine, but what is in excess or alludes to idols, love, or worldly matters we cut out" (Epist. 21.13.6). Jerome, caught between his classical education and his monastic vocation, did not want to be "more Ciceronian than Christian." While he cautioned his correspondents against the dangers of profane literature, he realized nevertheless that neither Christians nor clerics could be ignorant of secular branches of knowledge. He compared this learning to the comely captive that the Israelite could marry after shaving her head and paring her nails (Epist. 21.13.5, 70.2.5).

Augustine had the same concern to take over from classical culture everything suitable for the building of a Christian body of knowledge. He had been a brilliant student in the schools of Africa and had taught at Thagaste, Carthage, and Rome. He got his passion for philosophical inquiry from the Hortensius of Cicero (Conf. 3.4). At the end of the 4th century, pursuing ideas already broached in his De Trinitate and De Ordine, he set forth in the De Doctrina Christiana his convictions on the use of profane literature. He presented this treatise, which has been called "the charter of Christian culture," as an initiation to the reading of the Scriptures. In Book 2 he demonstrates the use that the exegete must make of ancient languages, grammar, rhetoric, dialectic, and also the sciences—history, botany, mathematics, astronomy, and music—in order not only to be able to understand Holy Scripture, and to recognize the figures of style there employed, but to explain all the literary and scientific allusions found there (animals, herbs, trees, plants, numbers, etc.). The only things to be rejected absolutely are the arts that serve the cult of demons, in particular astrology and the fables of the poets. Likewise, philosophy not only should initiate the mind into the handling of abstractions but should prepare it for the spiritual life. Rhetoric should be taught not “to plead both truth and falsehood” but to preach Christian truth with artistry. Augustine thought, as did Jerome, that Christians in using the liberal arts were only reclaiming the riches that divine Providence had given to mankind but which had been wrongly used by the pagans.

The Counter-Offensive

The Fathers of the Church in the 4th century gradually evolved a via media between the exigencies of Christian morality and the necessity for a worldly education. But hardly had they laid the bases for a Christian culture, when a violent attack was directed against Greco-Latin classicism and even against Christian classicism.

Hostile Monks. The development of MONASTICISM dates from the 3d century, first in the East, then in the West. From the start, the abbots organized schools offering only religious instruction for the pupils admitted to the monasteries. The students learned to read and write, and their first reader was the Psalter. When Jerome devised a course of instruction for a young nun, he centered it on Holy Scripture and excluded literature and secular arts. Theoretically, the monastic school was for monks only, but SS. Basil and John Chrysostom thought that resident students should be accepted who after their studies would return to the world. They could obtain a purely religious education, which would protect them from the dangers of the world. But the further hope of influencing secular education was not fulfilled, and the monasteries remained primarily centers of asceticism for centuries.

During the barbarian invasions in the West many former monks were selected as bishops, and their ideas about Christian culture began to prevail. While the political crisis had grave repercussions on the ancient school system, it is not true to say that the barbarians caused the school of antiquity to disappear. In Milan, Ravenna, Rome, and Carthage the traditional instruction was still given in the 6th century; but the standards declined. The grammarian and the rhetor could impart to a few aristocrats a mundane culture in which form was considered to be of more importance than content. It was natural then for men coming from monastic circles to react against the vanity of the intellectual trifles with which learned men, even Christians, were amusing themselves. The monks, with only a superficial knowledge of classicism, regarded it as a block to the reception of the evangelical message. Classical studies seemed to them to be a danger to morals. Cassian deplored the fact that the monk who had studied the pagan poets would remember this poison all his life (Conl. 14.12) and felt that such studies were also a danger to faith, for philosophical speculation gave birth to heresies (Inc. Dom. 3.15.2).

The important work of CLAUDIANUS MAMERTUS and BOETHIUS, who put philosophy at the service of Christian truth, was not understood by many of their contemporaries. Classical studies, moreover, threatened to raise a wall in the Christian community between the learned and other Christians. Hence it was felt that to be understood by all, preacher and writer had to abandon the florid style (sermo scholasticus) and adopt a plain and forthright one (sermo rusticus), for salvation had been preached not by orators but by fishermen (Sulpicius Severus, Mart. 1.4). Cassian (Inst., pref.), SALVIAN OF MARSEILLES (Gub. 3), POMERIUS of Arles (1.24), and PETER CHRYSOLOGUS (Serm. 43) manifested a desire to break with the traditional rhetoric, which was more concerned with words than facts (verba, non res). At a time when the Church was bringing its efforts to bear on the evangelization of the masses who were still pagan and when rural churches were multiplying, it seemed necessary to adopt a new way of speaking.

Prohibitions. Going back to the prohibitions of the 3d century in the Didascalia apostolorum, the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, attributable perhaps to GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES [ed. C. Munier (Strasbourg 1960)], forbade bishops to read pagan books (ut episcopus gentilium libros non legat, can. 5). Some historians have held that this canon was not binding upon the whole Church and that it did not prevent learned bishops of the 5th century from occupying their leisure with literature. But at the end of this century and at the beginning of the next, cultured ecclesiastics such as SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, AVITUS OF VIENNE, and ENNODIUS of Pavia had scruples about returning to books they had read previously. For Ennodius of Pavia, this prohibition applied to clerics as well: “Christ does not reject those who come to Him from liberal studies (disciplina saecularia), but He will not suffer anyone who leaves His splendor for them” (Epist. 9.9, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Auctores antiquissimi 7:297). He wrote this apropos of a young cleric who wanted to pursue classical studies. Influenced by the example of the monks, clerics began to regard secular learning as unworthy of their religious vocation, and they no longer dared to participate in the interests of the world of students. To deal with the problem of providing future clerics with the minimum instruction necessary before they could proceed to religious learning, recourse was had to the monastic solution.

Thus were created the first parish schools in the West (Council of Vaison in 529) and the first episcopal schools (Council of Toledo in 527). These were boarding schools with a course similar to that of the monastic schools: the study of sacred texts beginning with the Psalter, chant, and exegesis for the more advanced. Moreover, to make it unnecessary for youths to waste time in the schools of rhetoric, CASSIODORUS and Pope Agapetus thought of founding in Rome a school of higher religious studies modeled after the 3d-century school of Alexandria and the school of theology that was open in NISIBIS under Persian rule. The wars that afflicted Italy made this "Christian University" impossible, but Cassiodorus took up his plan again for his monks at Vivarium. Unfortunately, after his death this project disappeared. The end of the Roman Empire in the West was marked by a predominance of Christian culture and a return to the rigorist principles of early Christianity. Not until the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE would the synthesis of classicism and Christianity again take place.

In the East. Things were different in the East, for the empire there was able to withstand the invasions, and the public schools were able to maintain the quality of instruction. The University of Constantinople, founded in 425, was the chief center of studies until the Turkish invasion in the middle of the 15th century. Relations between learned circles of clerics and laymen continued to be close. THEODORET OF CYR (d. 458) showed in his "Cure for the Pagan Diseases" that, on a basis in ancient philosophy, one could discover the truth of the Gospel. LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM in the 6th century sought to adapt the philosophy of Aristotle to Christian dogma, while a revival of Neoplatonism served as a basis for the predominantly mystical elements in the theology of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS.

Only in the 10th century is there certain evidence for a school of religious learning founded in connection with the cathedral of Constantinople. But the patriarchs who were professors in this school did more than give courses in exegesis. They taught the liberal arts and philosophy as a propaedeutic to the study of Sacred Scripture, resuming the curriculum that Origen had followed many centuries earlier.

Bibliography: M. ROGER, L'Enseignement des lettres classiques d'Ausone à Alcuin (Paris 1905). H. I. MARROU, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique (Paris 1938); A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1956). C. N. COCHRANE, Christianity and Classical Culture (New York 1957). P. DE LABRIOLLE, Histoire de la littérature latine chrétienne, ed. G. BARDY (3d ed. Paris 1947). E. IVÁNKA, Hellenisches und Christliches im frühbyzantinischen Geistesleben (Vienna 1948). P. COUR-CELLE, Les Lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore (new ed. Paris 1948). G. L. ELLSPERMANN, The Attitude of the Early Christian Latin Writers Toward Pagan Literature and Learning (Washington 1949). M. L. W. LAISTNER, Christianity and Pagan Culture in the Later Roman Empire (Ithaca, N.Y. 1951). M. SPANNEUT, Le Stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église (Paris 1957). H. HAGENDAHL, Latin Fathers and the Classics (Göteborg 1958). A. M. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Antioche païenne et chrétienne (Paris 1959). P. RICHÉ, Éducation et culture dans l'Occident barbare, VII^e-VIII^e siècles (Paris 1962).

[P. RICHÉ]

GREDT, JOSEPH AUGUST

Benedictine philosopher of the Thomistic revival inaugurated by LEO XIII; b. Luxembourg, July 30, 1863; d. Rome, Jan. 29, 1940. The son of a teacher, he made his philosophical and theological studies in Luxembourg, was ordained in 1886, and studied in Rome under F. SATOLLI, A. LEPIDI, T. ZIGLIARA, and G. Pecci. He became a Benedictine in 1891 at Seckau, Austria, and served as philosophy professor at San Anselmo, Rome, from 1896 to his death. His main work, based on T. de VIO CAJETAN and FERRARIENSIS, is the comprehensive manual Elementa philosophiae aristotelico-thomisticae (2 v. Rome 1899–1901). Under the influence of some neoscholastics, the SALMANTICENSES, and especially JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, he notably altered the second edition in arrangement and in several theses, while retaining the rigidly scholastic method. Long quotations from Aristotle and Aquinas are of special value. The emphasis is on metaphysics; Gredt argues that aliquid is one of the TRANSCENDENTALS and proposes a sexta via to God's existence from the ordering of the soul toward the Infinite. In cosmology he makes extensive use of the positive sciences. His "natural realism" (De cognitione sensuum externorum, 2d ed. Rome 1924) defends the objectivity of all sense qualities against experimental psychologists and "critical realists." His criticisms of other philosophers, however, are not always reliable. His articles are concerned mostly with cosmology and psychology, and develop Aquinas's doctrine of the real distinction between act and potency.

See Also: SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography: J. A. GREDT, Miscellanea philosophica R. P. Josepho Gredt (Rome 1938); Divus Thomas (Fribourg) v.16–18 (1938–40) passim.; "De entitate viali qua in schola thomistica explicatur causalitas instrumentalis," Divus Thomas (Piacenza) 41:413–424; "De activitate creaturarum," ibid. 43:339–344; Acta Pontificiae Academiae Romanae S. Thomae Aquinatis v.3–5 (1936–38); Elementa philosophiae aristotelico-thomisticae (13th ed. rev. Barcelona 1961).

[A. W. MÜLLER]

Capital: Athens.

Size: 50,944 sq. miles.

Population: 10,601,525 in 2000.

Languages: Greek, English, French.

Religions: 10,389,465 Greek Orthodox (96%), 62,000 Catholics (.6%), 99,800 Muslims (1%), 30,000 Protestants (.3%), 20,260 follow other faiths or are without religious affiliation.

Archdioceses: Athens and Rhodes, both of which are directly subject to the Holy See; the Ionian Islands of Corfu, Zante, and Cephalonia; and Naxos, Andros, and Mikonos, with suffragans Chios, Melos and Syros, Santorino, and Candia (on the island of Crete). There is an apostolic vicariate in Thessaloniki on the Greek mainland. The Greek Byzantine Catholic Church has an apostolic exarch in Athens. There is also an ordinariate in Athens for the Armenian Catholic Church.

GREECE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Hellenic Republic, or Greece, is a peninsular region located in southern Europe bound on the north by the former Yugoslavian Republic of Macedonia and Bulgaria, on the northeast by Turkey, on the east by the Aegean Sea, on the southeast by the Sea of Crete, on the south by the Mediterranean Sea, on the west by the Ionian Sea, and on the northwest by Albania. A mountainous country with ranges transforming into small islands at the coast, Greece has a temperate climate, characterized by hot summers and mild, rainy winters. Earthquakes are common and range in severity. Natural resources include bauxite, lignite, magnesite, oil and marble. Wheat, corn, barley, sugar beets, olives, tomatoes and dairy products comprise the bulk of Greece's agricultural sectors.

THE EARLY CHURCH

The region was inhabited as early as the Paleolithic period and by 3000 B.C. had become home to a sophisticated people. Crete was home to the Minoan empire by 2000 B.C. and gained connections to Egypt and Sicily. The Mycenaean eventually replaced the Minoans, establishing a system of small city-states, which became the basis for the Roman organization following its incorporation into the Roman Empire.

The name Greece occurs but once in the New Testament (Acts 20.2), and refers to the Roman province Achaia. The exact boundaries of this administrative unit of the Roman Empire varied, but at the beginnings of Christianity it most probably comprised the area of ancient Hellas that extended northward from the southern tip of the Peloponnesus to the borders of Thessaly, Aetolia and Acarnania (Strabo, Geography 17.3.25). Euboea and most of the Cyclades also belonged to this province.

Corinth was the capital, where the Roman proconsul had his residence.

The Apostolic Age. The scriptural record concerning the beginnings of Christianity in Greece is limited mainly to the Acts, which discusses Athens and Corinth; Cenchræ, the eastern seaport city of Corinth, is mentioned only briefly in passing. In the course of his second missionary journey, St. Paul stopped for a time in Athens (Acts 17.16–34), where he had “discussions in the synagogue with the Jews and those who worshiped God, and in the market place with those who were there.” Some Epicurean and Stoic philosophers debated with him. The scriptural narrative reports the address Paul delivered on the Areopagus and notes: “certain persons became believers; among them Dionysius the Areopagite,” the first bishop of Athens, according to Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 4.23.3), “and a woman named Damaris, and others with them.” From Athens Paul traveled to Corinth, where he lodged at first with Aquila and Priscilla and preached in the synagogue every Sabbath (Acts 18.1–18). After the arrival of Silas and Timothy from Macedonia Paul spent his time preaching to the Jews until they contradicted him and blasphemed. Thereafter he preached to the Gentiles and resided with Titus Justus. “Crispus the president of the synagogue believed in the Lord and so did his household, and many Corinthians . . . believed and were baptized.” After some time the Jews made a concerted attack against Paul, who was summoned before the tribunal of Gallio, Proconsul of Achaia. The case, however, was dismissed, and after he had spent 18 months in Corinth, Paul departed. He stopped briefly at Cenchræ, where Phoebe “was in the ministry of the church” (Rom 16.1). During his third missionary journey Paul came once more to Greece (Achaia) and remained for three months (Acts 20.2, 3). The Apostle's two letters to the Corinthians close the scriptural account of events in Achaia.

Other sources attempt to complete the narrative about apostolic times. As quoted by Eusebius, DIONYSIUS, bishop of Corinth (c. 170), made a surprising statement about Peter and Paul: “both of them taught together in our Corinth and were our founders” (Hist. eccl. 2.25.8). The apocryphal Acta Andreae (c. 260) and the still later Passio, purporting to be a letter of the priests and deacons of Achaia, claim that Andrew preached in that province, suffered martyrdom on November 30 in Patras, and was buried there. In spite of doubts about the historicity of these events, a strong local tradition still links Andrew with Achaia and Patras, as Pope Paul VI's decision in 1964 to return the head of St. Andrew to the reputed place of his martyrdom supports. According to still other traditions, Saints Matthew, Thomas and Luke are reputed to have visited Greece in the course of their missionary journeys.

The Post-apostolic Age. Very little is known about the Church in Greece during the period immediately following the apostolic age. Only the Church of Corinth with its deplorable factions is mentioned in the first Epistle of Clement of Rome. Persecution severely afflicted the Church of Athens during the 2d century. While its Bishop Publius died as a martyr, his successor, Quadratus, worked successfully to revive the faith of the sorely tried Christian community. ARISTIDES, the philosopher who wrote an Apology addressed to Emperor Hadrian and ATHENAGORAS, who composed the Supplication for the Christians directed to Marcus Aurelius and Commodus, brought glory to the Church of Athens.

Corinth was famous for two of its illustrious bishops. Dionysius rendered special service by his letters to the churches in Athens, Sparta, Nicomedia, Crete, Amastris, Pontus and Rome. He considered the Church at Rome worthy of special praise for its efforts in behalf of the needy and of those Christians who had been condemned to the mines (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 4.23.10). Bacchylus was an active participant in the EASTER CONTROVERSY and wrote a useful letter concerning this question (Jerome, De viris illustribus, 44).

In the first half of the 3d century ORIGEN visited Athens, where he completed his commentary on Ezekiel (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.32.2) and was edified by the exemplary conduct of the Athenian Christians, as he later wrote (Contra Celsum 3.30). The Decian persecution, however, dominated the history of the Church in Achaia at this time. Because of fragmentary evidence, the names of only a few who died for the faith are recorded: Leonides, Bishop of Athens and his companions from Corinth; QUADRATUS (CODRATUS) and his Corinthian companions; Irene and Adrian from a city in Achaia, whose feast day is kept March 10.

Surviving evidence for the progress of the Church in the 4th century is meager for Achaia. From this province two bishops were present at the First Council of NICAEA: Pistus of Athens and Strategius of Hephaestia on the island of Lemnos. The presence of Strategius at Nicaea is the earliest extant evidence for the Christianization of the islands in the Aegean Sea.

During the 5th and 6th centuries ecclesiastical jurisdiction in Greece shifted with the political alignment between Rome and Constantinople. The metropolitan of Thessalonika served as vicar of the pope, while Thrace was taken under the control of Constantinople. Emperor Leo III (717–741) made eastern Illyria part of the Byzantine Empire, and Basil I (867–886) directed a missionary enterprise for the full Christianization of the Peloponnese. With the Eastern Schism in 1054, Greece became part of the Orthodox Church and was gradually subdued by the Ottoman Turks, who gave the hierarchy a limited independence in their elections and internal activities, as well as in their relations with the patriarch of Constantinople.

In 1209, during the occupation of Greece as part of the Crusade against Constantinople, Pope Innocent III created a Latin archiepiscopal see in Athens with 11 suffragan sees. The Cistercians, Dominicans, Franciscans and other orders founded residences in Greece and particularly in Crete. After the Council of FLORENCE, Catholic colonies flourished in Crete, Methone, and Coronea with Greek-rite Catholic priests. The invasion of the Ottoman Turks in 1453 sent the Church into decline under an Islamic government.

Bibliography: C. BRANDIS, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al., 1.1 (1893) 193–198. A. VON HARNACK, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, ed. and tr. J. MOFFAT, 2

v. (2d ed. New York 1908) v.2. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, eds., F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 1.1:321–340. S. VAILLÉ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 1:300–304. R. JANIN, ibid. 5:16–18; 13:876–878. F. DVORNIK, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew (Cambridge, MA 1958) 181–222. O. VOLK, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 6:553–554. J. BAYOT, Catholicisme, 5:215–216. H. JEDIN, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, 6 v. (Freiburg 1962–) 1:122–123, 241. J. DANIELOU and H. I. MARROU, The First Six Hundred Years, tr. V. CRONIN v.1 of The Christian Centuries (New York 1964–) 1:26, 33, 51. E. HONIGMANN, “La Liste originale des Pères de Nicée,” Byzantion, 14 (1939) 27–76.

[H. DRESSLER/EDS.]

THE MODERN CHURCH

In 1821 a holy war led by the Lavra Monastery of Patras culminated in the defeat of Turkish rule in Greece. A year later the country's first National Assembly proclaimed the Greek Church autocephalous, breaking its dependence on Constantinople. After nine years of revolt aided by France, England and, later, Russia, in February of 1830 the Protocol of London recognized the Peloponnese, certain Aegean Islands, and the mainland as far as Epirus and Thessaly as an independent country, with Greek Orthodoxy as the state religion. Under the authority of the Bavarian-born King Otto, over 400 monasteries were abolished, their goods distributed among the fighters for freedom. The Megali concept, which involved uniting all Greeks of the declining Ottoman Empire within an independent Greek State, began to come to fruition during the mid-19th century. The Ionic Islands were given to Greece by England in 1863, Thessaly was annexed in 1881 through the Conference of Berlin and in 1897 Crete gained its independence, but reverted to Greece in 1913. During the Balkan War of 1912–13 Greece took possession of South Macedonia, West Thrace and the Aegean Islands; it gained Western Thrace in 1918 and the Dodecanese Islands in 1947.

World War I brought great suffering to both the Greek Church and State. After the war Greece joined the Allied occupation of Turkey. During a 1921 attack on Ankara, Greek forces were defeated by Mustafa Kemal (later Atatürk), and the resulting refugee problem ended the Megali push. From now on Greeks focused on the constant struggle between monarchists and republicans. In 1924 Greece was proclaimed a republic, and during the early 1930s the government attempted to interfere with the Orthodox Church by systematizing the control of parishes and the idiorhythmic or self-ruling monasteries. With the reestablishment of the monarchy under George II (1934), the Orthodox Church came under royal control.

On Oct. 28, 1940 the Italians invaded Greece, forcing the nation into World War II. The Greeks successfully repulsed the Italians, but were not as fortunate against the Germans when Hitler attacked in April of 1941. With Greece under the dictatorial control of General J. Metaxas, German forces remained in the country until October of 1944. During the war, the country's Jewish population, which had numbered 75,000, was decimated, as 60,000 Greek Jews were sent to Auschwitz or executed. Following World War II, several communist resistance groups began a struggle for power that escalated into civil war by 1946. Violence continued, killing thousands, until in August of 1949 a government-led offensive forced the remaining insurgents to flee into Yugoslavia. On Jan. 1, 1952, the monarchy was restored under King Paul I, and from 1952 to 1965 the country experienced relative stability. In 1967 a military dictatorship under Colonel George Papadopoulos took power in Greece, forcing the king into exile and suspending many liberties granted under the constitution. On Dec. 8, 1974, the country returned to civilian rule, drafted a new constitution, held democratic elections, abolished the monarchy and created a parliament. Greece joined the European Union in 1981.

Under the constitution of June 1975, the Greek Orthodox Church was the prevailing religion of the state. As such, it received financial benefits such as state payment of clergy salaries, the funding of church buildings and tax exemptions. The Muslim minority, concentrated in Thrace, which was given legal status by provisions of the Treaty of Lausanne in 1923, was Greece's only officially recognized minority faith. As a faith unrecognized by the state, the Roman Catholic Church in Greece was not allowed to own property except through a created legal entity, although in 1999 the government extended legal recognition to those Catholic churches in existence prior to 1946.

Relations between the Faiths. During the 17th century many Orthodox prelates wrote to the Holy See for assistance, as did the monasteries of Athos, Chios and Patmos. The Jesuits, Capuchins and Lazzarists (Vincenians) founded schools in Athens, Piraeus, Salonika, Crete, Chios, Naxos, Syros and Corfu. Relations with the Orthodox, however, became increasingly difficult because of accusations of attempts at proselytism and Latinization. In 1938 laws were passed to prevent proselytism among the Orthodox by Catholics, and difficulties arose over mixed marriages. Such laws were reinforced by the 1975 constitution, which stipulated that the practice of non-Orthodox worship should not offend or disturb public order.

After World War II many younger monks from Mt. Athos and the monasteries became involved in parochial activities, creating an atmosphere that translated into a move toward Christian reunion. In 1965 Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras I began a dialogue that planted the seeds of reconciliation by nullifying the mutual excommunications imposed during the schism of 1054. The government's decision, in 2000, to remove religious affiliation from national identity cards, reflected a growing tolerance for religious diversity among some Greek people, although such tolerance was not reflected by the Orthodox leadership, which opposed the government's move. While Orthodox Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew, head of the Orthodox Church, began a discourse with the Vatican, Greek leaders were among those objecting to his efforts at bridging the two divergent faiths. In response to a request by Pope John Paul II to visit Greece in 2001, a metropolitan objected to the proposed visit, noting the efforts of the Catholic Church to aggressively proselytize in Greece. The Eastern Catholic churches, noted Metropolitan Kallinkos, in September of 1999, "are the Trojan Horse of the Catholic Church." The pope's visit, which took place in May, was done as part of a trip retracing the steps of St. Paul. During his historic meeting with Orthodox Archbishop Christodoulos, the pope apologized for the treatment of the Orthodox by Latin Catholics, beginning with the sacking of Constantinople.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 64 parishes tended by 50 diocesan and 45 religious priests. Other religious included 35 brothers and 127 sisters, although foreign religious, such as members of the Missionaries of Charity, had difficulty obtaining or renewing visas. Most Catholics, who were descendent from Venetian settlers, resided in Athens, Thessaloniki or Patrias, or on the islands of Tinos, Naxos, Syros and Corfu. Polish and Philippine immigrants also comprised part of the Catholic community.

Bibliography: P. JOANNOU, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 4:1231-34. C. KONIDANS, Christian Greece (Athens 1953) 1-22. P. HAMMOND, The Waters of Marah (London 1956). R. JANIN, Catholicisme, 3:1456-57. J. KARAYANNOPOULOS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 2:1857-60. Staatslexikon, ed. Görres-Gesellschaft, 8 v. (6th, new and enl. Ed. Freiburg 1957-63) 3:1023-24. Oriente Cattolico (1962) 420.

[F. X. MURPHY/EDS.]

GREEK CATHOLIC CHURCH (EASTERN CATHOLIC)

The Greek Catholic Church is a very tiny church that owes its existence to the reunion movement launched by Father John Marango (d. 1885) among Greek Orthodox in Istanbul. Father Isaias Papadopoulos formed a small group of zealous Greek Catholics in northern Greece. Bishop George Calavassy succeeded him and worked until his death in 1957 to make the Greek Catholic Church known in Greece by the works of corporal and spiritual mercy that he launched. The Catholic group in Turkey was practically dissolved when the Greeks were repatriated to Greece. Since 1957 the exarchate in Turkey has been directed by an apostolic administrator. In Greece the Greek Catholic Church has a resident Greek bishop in Athens. The Greek Orthodox Church has never warmed up to the Greek Catholic Church in its territory, viewing it as an intruder. It remains illegal for Greek Catholic priests to dress in Byzantine clerical style.

Bibliography: R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed (Rome 1999).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

GREEK LANGUAGE, BIBLICAL

This term is used for the language of the Greek Old Testament and the Greek text of the New Testament. It is a form of Koine ("common") Greek that evolved in the time of Alexander the Great from the diverse dialects of classical times through leveling and assimilation and became the everyday commercial and cultural language of the Mediterranean world for more than ten centuries. Spoken in many lands by peoples with different native languages, it was subject to variations caused by foreign influences. Biblical Greek shows many types of Semitic interference phenomena, not only in the use of words with different meanings than in classical or Hellenistic authors, but also in the use of many non-Greek grammatical constructions.

The Greek Old Testament circulated most widely in the Septuagint (LXX) translation, which also preserves the original text of some (deutero)canonical books (Wisdom, 2 Maccabees) and the basic form of others, either in whole (Tobit, Judith, Baruch, 1 Maccabees) or in part (Esther, Daniel, Sirach). Hardly a unity, its style varies in quality from a faithful translation of the Hebrew (Pentateuch) to a slavishly literal rendering (Qoheleth), which was the result of periodic revisions that culminated in the later word-for-word translations of (proto-) Theodotion and Aquila and the more idiomatic version of Symmachus.

The Greek of the New Testament is similarly diverse. The letters, especially those of Paul and Hebrews, represent good Koine Greek, not unlike that found in documentary papyri from Roman Egypt. The Gospels and Acts preserve more of a Semitic tone and flavor, though the Gospel according to Luke begins with a well-constructed prologue in contemporary literary style. The Gospel according to John is written in simple but elegant language. Revelation is written in the poorest Greek.

Bibliography: W. BAUER, F. W. GINGRICH, and F. W. DANKER, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, 3rd ed. (Chicago 2001). F. BLASS and A. DEBRUNNER, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, tr. R. W. FUNK (Chicago 1961). F. C. CONYBEARE and S. G. STOCK, A Grammar of Septuagint Greek (Grand Rapids 1980). J. W. MOULTON, W. F. HOWARD, and N. TURNER, A Grammar of New Testament Greek, 4 v. (Edinburgh 1908-76). J. VERGOTE, "Grec Biblique," Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928-) 3:1320-69. M. ZERWICK, Biblical Greek Illustrated by Examples, tr. J. SMITH (Rome 1963).

[F. T. GIGNAC]

GREEK LANGUAGE, EARLY CHRISTIAN AND BYZANTINE

At the beginning of the Christian era, Greek was widely spoken in the Mediterranean basin. In morphology, syntax, and vocabulary it was derived from the Attic-Ionic dialect, but it bore the imprint of subsequent linguistic developments. Contacts with other languages and cultures in the Hellenistic world left their mark, especially in vocabulary and syntax. Two factors in particular helped mold this spoken Greek into the vehicle for the dissemination of Christian teaching.

Basic Elements. First, the Septuagint (LXX) translation of the OT crystallized Greek terminology for theological concepts completely foreign to ancient Greek, added Hebrew and Aramaic loanwords to the vocabulary, and through literal renderings of the Hebrew, introduced Semitisms into Christian Greek. Second, the books of the NT, deeply influenced by LXX terminology, gave specifically Christian meanings to current words and coined words to explain new concepts. Other formative elements of early Christian Greek are the language of the early liturgy, the terminology of the mystery religions, and the ethical and moral contexts of pagan philosophy. The earliest extant works of Christian literature outside the NT, those of the Apostolic Fathers and their immediate successors, were written primarily to instruct Christian converts. In language and style they generally echo the OT and NT. Rhetorical figures and balanced sentence structure, characteristic of classical Greek, yielded to an almost unmitigated parataxis. This unadorned diction became the norm and was later approved in the dictum of Isidore of Pelusium (d. c. 435): "If they seek elaborate diction let them know that it is better to learn truth from an unlettered man than falsehood from a sophist" (Letter to Theognostus, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. (Paris 1857-66) 78:1124).

Apologists. The apologists of the 2nd century addressed a different audience, their non-Christian contemporaries, and defended Christianity against its enemies. Accordingly, the content rather than the literary style of their works was affected. St. Justin Martyr is not conspicuous for style or orderly arrangement of thought, but he knew Homer, Plato, Euripides, and Menander. The notable exception to the usual disregard of style, the Supplication for the Christians of Athenagoras of Athens addressed to Marcus Aurelius and Commodus, in spite of its literary merit, was soon forgotten in Christian antiquity. The apologies, ranging from friendliness to open hostility toward the content of Hellenism, made a contribution in theology but not in the development of an artistic Christian Greek literature. This literary development did not appear before the beginning of the 3rd century.

Christian Literature. As Christianity penetrated the ancient world, it gained more converts from educated circles. The need for teachers competent to instruct such catechumens on a level commensurate with their culture gave rise to the catechetical schools. The most famous of these was at Alexandria, where Eastern, Egyptian, and Greek cultures had long ago met and commingled. Here the LXX in large part had been translated. A Hellenistic Jewish literature flourished and culminated perhaps in the works of Philo, who exerted a great influence on early Christian writers. Such a cultural environment conditioned the Alexandrian catechetical school for an interest in the philosophy of Plato, the allegorical interpretation of Scripture, and the metaphysical investigation of the content of faith. The content of Hellenism soon appeared in Christian writings that began to rival ancient artistic prose. This was the age of Clement, "the pioneer of Christian scholarship," and of Origen, whose influence extended to Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine where he founded the famous school of Caesarea. Christian Greek was indebted to Eusebius of Caesarea more for an encyclopedic learning that preserved excerpts from pagan and Christian works no longer extant than for his literary excellence. Chronologically he falls in the age of Constantine, but he was not significantly influenced by the new literary developments characteristic of that period.

Epidicxis. Pagan Greek was dominated by the New or Second Sophistic with its emphasis on pure Attic diction and its preoccupation with rhetorical devices and adornment. The influence of the New Sophistic was felt in Christian Greek at the time of Constantine and reached a climax in Basil the Great, the two Gregories, and John Chrysostom (d. 407), all of whom had studied at famous pagan schools of rhetoric. When Gregory of Nazianzus became bishop of Constantinople (c. 379), hostile factions objected to his sermons, which were richly adorned with pagan rhetoric. Gregory's answer, it may be noted, implied that the rhetorical devices compensated for his lack of the gift of miracles (Oratio 36, Patrologia Graeca, 36:266). A generation later Christians expected to hear a display of oratory in church, at least in the larger cities, and applauded the speaker when the rhythmical cadences of his sentences pleased their ears. Chrysostom says that he met opposition when he sought to ban applause and that many speakers deliberately sought acclaim and keenly felt the lack of approval from their hearers (Homilia 30 in Actus Apostolorum, Patrologia Graeca, 60:225,266). The impact of pagan epideictic oratory on Christian Greek was certainly paramount. Other pagan literary genres, however, such as the letter, the dialogue, and the consolation, were also cultivated. In artistic form they rival, and in content surpass, their pagan counterparts. Gregory of Nazianzus, the "Christian Demosthenes," is known also for poetry of genuine feeling and beauty. Gregory of Nyssa, the "Father of mysticism," illustrates how Christian ascetical authors pressed into service Platonic and Neoplatonic terminology.

Thus was Hellenism Christianized. The masters of Christian Greek were profoundly influenced by Hellenic thought and culture; consequently, Christian Greek literature cannot be appreciated apart from the Hellenic background against which it was written.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950-), in progress. 1:186-253; 2: 1-152. W. SCHMID and O. STÄHLIN, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur (Munich 1924) 2. Teil, 2. Hälfte 1105-1492, esp. 1106-22 and 1274. L. R. PALMER, The Greek Language (2nd ed. London 1980). L. RADERMACHER, "Koine," Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien 224 (1947) 1:74. G. BARDY, La Question des langues dans l'église ancienne, 2 v. (Paris 1948) v. 1. E. SCHWYZER, Griechische Grammatik, 3 v. (2nd ed. Munich 1950-53) 1:116-130.

[H. DRESSLER/F.T. GIGNAC]

GREEK PHILOSOPHY

Greek philosophy gave the first strictly rational answers in Western thought to basic questions about the universe and man. The origin and nature of the visible universe concerned the earliest philosophers, the pre-Socratics, from Thales in the 6th century B.C. to Democritus in the 5th, with a gradual shift to dominant interest in ethical or political life. In reaction against Sophistic relativism and the rhetorical basis of traditional Greek education, Socrates emphasized virtue as scientific knowledge. His disciple Plato and, in turn, Plato's student, Aristotle, mark the peak of Greek philosophy. Both attempted, in different ways, to establish firm scientific principles as guides for the investigation of the universe, the human mind, and human conduct. Other influential philosophies, such as Stoicism and Epicureanism, arose in the wake of this period of keen intellectual activity. Finally, Plotinus's fusion of Platonic spirit with Aristotelian doctrines and some elements from Stoic thought is the last great movement in Greek philosophy.

Aristotle teaching Alexander the Great, after a painting by J.L.G. Ferris. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

The term "philosophy" itself is of Greek origin. Meaning "love of wisdom," it was attributed in biographical tradition (Diogenes Laërtius, Lives 1.12; 8.8) to Pythagoras, and suggested that wisdom is something divine and a man cannot be truly wise but only a lover of wisdom. Designating men who pursue wisdom, the term "philosophers" appears in a fragment of Heraclitus cited in the 2d or 3d century A.D. (H. Diels, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, ed., W. Kranz, 3 v. [10th ed. Berlin 1960–61] 22B 35). At any rate, it was used in the 5th century B.C. by Herodotus as an established Ionian word. At that time the Greek term for wisdom (σοφία) signified skill in a quite general sense, while philosophy (φιλοσοφία) seems from the start to have been restricted to the intellectual. Yet it was never divorced by the Greeks from its bearing on practical and moral life. In its ancient use it also included natural history. In the time of Isocrates it could mean the proficiency given by rhetoric, and for Aristotle it still embraced mathematics and literary theory. (See PHILOSOPHY.)

Ionian. Western philosophy originated in the Greek city-states of Ionia, along the coast of Asia Minor. By both ancient and modern historians it is seen assuming its distinctive form either with Thales of Miletus (fl. c. 585 B.C.) or with his townsman and pupil Anaximander (c. 610–546 B.C.). For generations, it is true, various conceptions of the world's origin had been handed down in mythological lore, and a treasury of aphoristic wisdom had accumulated with the traditional customs and laws. But none of these teachings had reached a level that could be called genuinely philosophical. With the better opportunities and greater leisure for thought in the progressing culture of the city-states, however, these active traditions helped to focus the attention of inquiring Greek minds upon the problems of the nature and origin of the visible universe and upon the questions of human destiny. The efforts to answer the questions from an all-embracing viewpoint and in strictly rational rather than in mythological terms constituted the beginnings of Greek philosophy.

Thales and Anaximander. To Thales is attributed an attempt to explain the whole universe in terms of development from one basic nature, water. For him the visible universe seemed to grow from water as from a seminal plasm, and to be continually nourished by water in the manner of a living organism. His teachings are known only through a vague oral tradition preserved in writings that do not go back further than Aristotle (4th century B.C.). Of his successor Anaximander there remains but one continuous fragment. In mythological language it proclaims that all existing things come from and pass away into a basic nature, indeterminately described as "the unlimited" (Gr. τὸ ἄπειρον), in a process by which they "make amends to one another for their injustice, according to the ordering of time" (Diels, 12B 1). Detailed testimonia in later tradition ascribe to Anaximander a well-developed rational explanation of this process of becoming and perishing. The continual cosmic change takes place through an eternal and intrinsic motion, conceived apparently after the manner of living development.

Anaximenes. In a short extant fragment the philosophical successor of Anaximander, Anaximenes of Miletus (fl. c. 525 B.C.), located the primitive vital nature in the air that surrounded the visible universe and that sustained it and kept it together as soul does body. Anaximenes explained the changes in the universe by rarefaction and condensation. His philosophical successors, Anaxagoras of Clazomenae and Archelaus (5th century B.C.) transferred their activities to Athens. Together with Diogenes of Apollonia (5th century B.C.), these men continued or deepened Anaximenes's conception of the universe as developing from a basic vital principle conditioned in one way or another by the character of air. From Anaximenes on, there was present the notion of soul as something of an airlike nature that guides and controls a living being.

Anaxagoras. With ANAXAGORAS, the greatest of the Ionian physicists, there emerges the notion of mind (Nous) as a principle that regulates the whole cosmos and is participated by some things but not by all. For him, however, mind like soul seems to have remained on the level of a material thing in its nature and functioning. The philosophical notion of the spiritual was not yet present to be either affirmed or denied. The conception of the universe as growing from an original plasm in the manner of a living organism implied failure to encounter the problem of a first extrinsic cause such as a creator. At least in point of fact the question of an outside cause did not arise among the Ionians.

Heraclitus. The best known of all the Ionians, HERACLITUS OF EPHEBUS, was classed as a "sporadic" philosopher because he did not fit in with the Ionian or any other philosophical succession. He is the earliest philosopher the fragments of whose works are sufficiently numerous to exhibit a thoroughly meditated philosophy. These fragments reveal a penetrating view of the unity of things in the cosmos, a dynamic unity worked out through an all-pervading common direction and maintained by a continually changing balance of opposite tensions. The moral wisdom of Heraclitus in striving to establish a common pattern of action amid the perpetually varying circumstances of human conduct is astonishingly profound and has proved abiding in its philosophical appeal.

Italy. In the latter half of the 6th century B.C. an Ionian, Pythagoras of Samos, had emigrated to the southern coast of Italy and founded there a religious and cultural organization (see PYTHAGORAS AND PYTHAGOREANS). The history of the Pythagoreans is very obscure. They cultivated the study of mathematics, and tried to explain the cosmos on a mathematical basis. Their efforts are rightly seen as the beginnings of the quantitative account of the physical universe. They emphasized education and moral guidance, explaining the virtues in mathematical terms. They are credited with a doctrine of transmigration of souls, and of the imprisonment of soul in body as in a tomb. In accord with the general pre-Socratic mentality, however, they do not seem to have reached any notion of the supersensible, nor to have shown any interest in seeking a creator for the cosmos.

Parmenides. Further north along the west coast of Italy, probably early in the 5th century B.C., PARMENIDES of Elea wrote hexameters giving a vivid account of the universe in terms of being. From the viewpoint of being, all things formed for him one strictly limited and continuous whole, everywhere equal in respect to their being, without origin, change, or end. Through ordinary human cognition, nevertheless, a multiple and changing cosmos is set up for men by the ever varying proportions of two basic forms, light and darkness. This may be called the world of seeming (δόξα). Parmenides's achievement began a long chain of attempts to explain things in terms of being, proceeding through different types of dialectic and culminating in the development of metaphysics as a science.

Eleatics. In the middle of the 5th century B.C. the dialectical phase was operative in the teaching of ZENO OF ELEA, whose paradoxes on motion are still controversial, and in the doctrines of Melissus of Samos. Melissus, about whose life nothing is known with certainty, seems to have applied the Eleatic dialectic of being to the unlimited basic reality as conceived by the earlier Ionians. For that reason he is classed as an Eleatic. Xenophanes of Colophon (570–478? B.C.), an Ionian rhapsodist who traveled throughout the mainland of Greece, has been regarded traditionally as the founder of the Eleatic school, though without strictly historical foundation.

Other Centers. In Sicily, EMPEDOCLES of Acragas stereotyped the four traditional Ionian opposites, hot and cold, dry and wet, into the more concrete fire, earth, air, and water. He called them the "roots of all" (πάντων ῥιζώματα), as though the cosmos grew from them in the fashion of living things. They became known in later tradition as the four Empedoclean elements. They were composed of ingenerate and indestructible particles, in accord with the Parmenidean doctrine that a being could not be generated or destroyed. Through mixture continually changing under the impulse of the two fundamental cosmic forces, love and strife, they were always combining and separating to form the actual universe.

Atomists. At Abdera in Thrace, Leucippus (5th century B.C.) and DEMOCRITUS gave a more profound explanation of the physical world in a doctrine known as ATOMISM. The basic particles were "atomic" in the sense of indivisible, and were not subject to generation or alteration or destruction. In this way they were "being," and were in perpetual motion in a void that was existent yet characterized as "nonbeing." They were all of the same nature, differing only in shape, position, and arrangement. By joining and separating through the perpetual cosmic motion they constituted the universe. The soul consisted of spherical atoms, which on account of their shape were most mobile, and were identified with fire and heat. Most of the 300 and more fragments attributed to Democritus, however, are concerned with moral matters. They teach an ethics in which cheerfulness, coinciding with self-sufficiency and imperturbability and well-being, is the goal of human action. This goal is attained by moderation in accordance with the mean between excess and deficiency, and is promoted by wisdom just as health is promoted by the science of medicine.

Sophists. Protagoras of Abdera (c. 490–420 B.C.) and Gorgias of Leontini (c. 480–380 B.C.), a pupil of Empedocles, were outstanding representatives of the career teachers known in the 5th century as SOPHISTS or professors of wisdom. Throughout the cities of the Greek world they taught the rhetoric that could sway public assemblies and lead to political power. The fragments that remain from Protagoras and Gorgias indicate a conception of the universe in which everything is changing and relative, as though set up by ever-changing human cognition in the fashion of Parmenides's cosmos; this provided an excellent philosophical basis for a world that could be ruled by rhetoric.

Athens. In the last half of the 5th century B.C. Athens became the center of Greek philosophical activity. SOCRATES, about whom very little detail is known except chronology and the manner of his death, exercised through his conversations a profound influence upon Athenian youth. He emphasized virtue, and taught that it consisted in knowledge. He wrote nothing, but became the central figure in a literary genre known as "Socratic discourses." In these discourses various writers exploited him, using him as a mouthpiece for their own teachings. His insistence on virtue as knowledge meant, according to Aristotle's comments, that virtuous conduct had to be based upon common and abiding notions of what virtue is, notions that could be expressed in stable definitions. This was in direct opposition to the rhetorical training given by the Sophists.

Lesser Socratics. The influence of Socrates's name was spread through the writings and teachings of his disciples. A number of these such as Aristippus of Cyrene (see CYRENAICS), Euclides of Megara, and Antisthenes of Athens, are grouped under the designation "Lesser Socratics." In this way they are distinguished from Socrates's greatest pupil, Plato. Followers of Euclides, such as Eubulides of Miletus, Diodorus Cronus, and Philo of Megara, made notable contributions to the development of logic as a science (see LOGIC, HISTORY OF).

Plato and Aristotle. In PLATO and ARISTOTLE Greek philosophy reached its greatest splendor. The philosophical conception of realities above the whole order of extension and time, and therefore completely immaterial, made its first appearance in Western thought. For Plato these were the Ideas, the eternal natures of things. For Aristotle they were forms separate from matter, and different from the natures of any sensible things. The Platonic Idea and the Aristotelian form provided philosophical bases for the common definition urged by Socrates, and for the scientific knowledge built upon it. Both Plato and Aristotle developed highly articulated moral doctrines that aimed to achieve the common good by virtuous action, and in which one's private good was attained in the common political good. For both philosophers the norm of virtue was the mean between excess and defect. In the teaching of Aristotle, logic and the classification of the sciences reached a form that endured for centuries. The philosophical schools that stem from Plato and Aristotle are called respectively the Academy and the Peripatos (see PLATONISM; ARISTOTELIANISM).

Other Schools. In Aristotle's time a movement known as Cynicism (see CYNICS) had been started by Diogenes of Sinope (c. 410–320 B.C.). It rejected Greek social conventions and advocated living in accord with the simplicity of nature. It was a type of life made possible only by rigorous ascetic training, and was offered as a shortcut to virtue and happiness. Two other widespread schools originated at Athens toward the close of the 4th century B.C., the Garden, or school of EPICURUS, and the Stoa, or school of Zeno of Citium (see EPICUREANISM; HEDONISM; STOICISM). Both rejected the supersensible. Further, two types of SKEPTICISM developed among the Greeks, the one taking its name from Pyrrho of Elis (c. 365–275 B.C.), the other from the Platonic Academy in the 3d and 2d centuries B.C. (see PYRRHONISM). During the first two centuries of the Christian Era the period of the Academy called "Middle Platonism" carried on the original Platonic traditions with the incorporation of teachings from other schools, while interest in Pythagorean doctrines resulted in a tendency called Neopythagoreanism. An eclectic school is reported (Diogenes Laërtius, Lives 1.21) to have selected its teachings from all the other schools (see ECLECTICISM). Finally, the last Greek form of Platonism, called in the 19th century NEOPLATONISM, was developed by PLOTINUS. It penetrated deeply into Patristic thought. In A.D. 529 the schools at Athens were closed by Justinian and original movements in Greek philosophy came to an end.

Influence on Christian Thought. Philosophy was consistently looked upon as a way of life by the Greeks. Accordingly it was regarded by St. Paul (Col 2.8) as opposed to the new and divinely inspired way of life, Christianity. Nevertheless the influence especially of Stoic and Neoplatonic philosophy soon made itself felt in the vocabulary and external structure of Christian thinking, and in the 13th century direct contact with the works of Aristotle made a profound and lasting impression on the molds of Christian teaching. Acquaintance with Greek philosophy is therefore necessary to understand the written tradition of Christian thought. In this contact, however, Christian genius proved equal to the task of profiting by Greek intellectual methods without imbibing the accompanying pagan doctrines. The revival of scholastic methods in Catholic theology and philosophy during the late 19th and the 20th centuries has given renewed importance to Greek philosophy as an indispensable tool for the study and presentation of Christian doctrine on an intellectual basis.

See Also: PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF; GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS); GREEK RELIGION.

Bibliography: The only general history of Greek philosophy remaining from ancient times is DIOGENES LAËRTIUS, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, tr. R. D. HICKS, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; New York 1925, reprint Cambridge, Mass. 1950). The fragments of the pre-Socratics are edited in H. DIELS, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, ed. W. KRANZ, 3 v. (8th ed. Berlin 1956), and those of the early Stoics by H. F. VON ARNIM, Stoicorum veterum fragmenta, 4 v. (Leipzig 1903–24). The best established modern history of Greek philosophy is E. ZELLER, Die Philosophie der Griechen, 3 v. in 6 (5th–7th ed. Leipzig 1920–23). In English, a comprehensive history was undertaken by W. K. C. GUTHRIE, A History of Greek Philosophy, of which the first volume (Cambridge, England) was published in 1962. Shorter surveys are numerous, e.g.: E. C. COPLESTON, Greece and Rome, v. 1 of A History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–). A. H. ARMSTRONG, An Introduction to Ancient Philosophy (3d ed. London 1957). I. C. BRADY, A History of Ancient Philosophy (Milwaukee 1959). J. OWENS, A History of Ancient Western Philosophy (New York 1959). On the significance of Greek philosophy, see C. J. DE VOGEL, “What Philosophy Meant to the Greeks,” International Philosophical Quarterly 1 (1961) 35–37. Phronesis (1955–), a journal appearing twice a year, is dedicated largely to Greek philosophy. Studies in the field are listed in the Louvain quarterly Répertoire Bibliographique de la Philosophie, “Antiquité Grecque et Romaine” section.

[J. OWENS]

GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS)

Two viewpoints respecting philosophy are in evidence from the 5th century B.C. to the end of antiquity. On the one hand, philosophy was regarded as a subject in higher education that should receive the attention of students completing their course in rhetoric and interested, to some extent at least, in metaphysical and ethical questions. The tenets of the various philosophical schools were examined in a sterile manner, and in the end many students took refuge in skepticism. For the majority of the educated class, philosophy remained a fashionable subject for discussion rather than a really vital one affecting their lives and conduct. The Emperor Marcus Aurelius undoubtedly wished to develop a more serious attitude toward philosophy when in A.D. 176 he established four chairs of philosophy at Athens, thus giving official recognition and support to the teaching of Platonism, Aristotelianism, Stoicism, and Epicureanism.

On the other hand, philosophers themselves, beginning with Socrates and Plato, had insisted that philosophy should be concerned with all aspects of life if it was to form men useful to the state and capable of living a happy life, to say nothing of earning the rewards of an existence beyond the grave (cf. Plato, Republic 497C–498C). This text alone suffices to suggest that Greek philosophy presented religious aspects during its history.

Main Religious Aspects. The religious aspects of Greek philosophy can be illustrated by four general views: 1. The philosopher as superior being. He can be considered a divine messenger and a miracle worker. His death can resemble that of a martyr, and he can become the object of worship as a hero or god. 2. The philosopher as teacher and missionary. The philosopher conforms his life to his principles, separating himself from the world and its possessions. He goes about preaching his doctrine and tries to convert others. He may become even a founder or member of a kind of pagan monastic community. 3. Philosophy as a school for life. Among intellectuals, especially, it often held the place occupied by religion in modern times. Conversion to philosophy often signified a radical change in values and the beginning of a new existence. 4. Philosophy as an explanation of the world and a way of salvation. It offered its adherents a clear and certain explanation of the world. For some centuries philosophers were the only men who pondered over the composition of the universe and its laws. At times it taught a way of salvation, in rivalry with or parallel to that presented by religions. The philosopher was a physician who took care of souls, and he was sometimes capable of achieving a mystical union with God.

It must be understood, however, that these different aspects are not found in all periods and at the same time in all the philosophical systems. They evolved gradually, and it is important to be precise with respect to the date at which any particular philosophy is being studied. However, it is not absolutely necessary to examine the teaching of each sect in detail throughout its history for two reasons. On the one hand, complex reactions of one system on another entailed syncretism respecting certain points of doctrine; and on the other, in the case of each sect, there were periods of decline followed by periods of renewed vitality.

Important Historical Facts. In the perspective of primary concern to this article, four historical facts must be explained and emphasized:

Major Interest in Moral Questions. From the time of SOCRATES, there was a current that, according to Cicero, “forced the descent of philosophy from heaven to earth” (Cicero, Tusc. disp. 5.4.10) or, in other words, assured the priority of moral questions over metaphysical problems. This current was the chief factor in the success of Stoicism in the Roman world to the end of the second century A.D. The moralists of the Roman period were not really attached to any precise system. The maxim “hidden life” was adopted with enthusiasm by the Platonists and the Pythagoreans, and, although it was Epicurean, the Platonists attributed it to Pythagoras. The inscribing of Epicurean thoughts on tombstones became a common custom. Seneca admired the counsels of Epicurus as much as those of the Stoics, and Epictetus used to warn his disciples not to devote too much study to Stoic logic and physics, as he considered these subjects useless for the improvement of morals. Marcus Aurelius did not think that moral precepts should be changed according to one’s belief in Providence or atoms, and Cicero’s De officiis does not contain a word on Stoic physics. Thus, the ideal of human wisdom, divested of all social, political, or metaphysical complications, exercised a great influence not only on thinkers in the last period of antiquity, Christian as well as pagan, but also on those in the modern world, for Descartes returns repeatedly to the Stoic theme of philosophical resignation.

Common Agreement on World and World Order. In the first centuries A.D., philosophical and religious systems, however diverse, were in accord in their view of the world and the order of its parts. The universe was an organized whole, in which each part had its place as in a living organism; the universe was conceived of as finite and harmoniously arranged, a worthy object of religious contemplation, a model of order and regularity, to which all have the duty to conform their conduct. This vision of the universe was first presented by Plato in his Ti-maeus, and was accepted by Aristotle, who proclaimed the eternity of the world. The Stoics emphasized the living character of the universe, maintaining that it was inhabited by a soul that extended into all its parts. The doctrine of universal sympathy made the parts of this universe members, as it were, of the same body, and thus gave the Stoics a foundation for their astrological predictions and other forms of divination. Finally, Plotinus made a synthesis of earlier systems. He excluded the demiurge, but he did not exclude the intelligible model. He retained the world soul, but he was at pains to show that this soul was not an absolute principle, and he put the transcendence of the Aristotelian intellect above the immanent soul of the Stoics. [See J. Moreau, L’Idée d’univers dans la pensée antique (Turin 1953)].

Mystic Element in Pagan Philosophy. At the beginning of the Christian era, there was present, in the very heart of Hellenism, a body of ideas that can be called mystical. There are echoes of them in Cicero, Seneca, Plutarch, and Philo, and, among modern scholars, the name of Posidonius long sufficed to explain them. P. Boyancé has shown, however, that, while this current was opposed to the clearest teaching in the systems dominating thought after Aristotle, it had its roots in an idea found in philosophy itself, an idea connected with the social organization among the guilds of the Muses. The conception of music as having power to free and purify, a concept fundamentally ancient and Greek, played an essential role in the appearance of mystical ideas [see P. Boyancé, Le Culte des Muses chez les philosophes grecs (Paris 1937)].

Vogue of Religion in Second Century. In the 2d century A.D., the vogue for religion was evidenced at all levels of culture. The masses gave themselves over to Oriental and Egyptian cults and embraced magic with enthusiasm. Philosophers found in Plato the strongest encouragement to fuse philosophy and religion, so that the religious spirit among educated people in this period was colored by Platonism—a Platonism, it must be admitted, that was rather questionable and spiritless. In the literature of the age, texts repeatedly proclaim the identity of religion and philosophy. For Maximus of Tyre (A.D. 125–185), philosophy is man’s sole faculty for prayer (Disc. 5.8). According to Apuleius, in commenting upon Plato (De Platone 2.7; 2.23), justice, queen of the virtues, is often identified with holiness, and the last word of wisdom is “Follow the footsteps of God.” See M. Caster, Lucien et la pensée religieuse de son temps (Paris 1937). All Greek philosophy was hardly summed up in Neoplatonism, but that school did finally bring together all the religious forces of paganism, and it did last as long as ancient Greek culture itself, i.e., down to the 6th century.

Philosopher as a Superior Being

Veneration of the philosopher as a superior being and his deification are apparent in several schools. The best-known examples are Pythagoras, Socrates, and Plato.

Deification of Pythagoras. from the age of Aristotle, Pythagoras was regarded as a miracle worker who became renowned for numerous prodigies and prophecies (Aristotle, Rhetoric 1398b). It may be surmised that he was honored as a hero. In any event, the Pythagoreans played an important role in the development of hero worship (Boyancé, op. cit., 223–247). According to Aristoxenus (4th century B.C.), they thought of heroes as disembodied souls and as intermediaries between God and mortals. From the end of the Roman Republic, study of astral eschatology by intellectuals increased (see Cicero’s Dream of Scipio), and the subject was influencing public opinion. The name of Pythagoras was connected with that of the Pythian Apollo, and this alone was enough to reveal his divine mission and put into relief the Apollonian origins of his teachings (Diogenes Laertius, Vita Pyth. 8.21). His disciples called him divine, and, while not wishing to make him a god in the strict sense, they regarded him as belonging to an intermediate category between the divine and the human Aristotle, Fragments 187).

By the 1st century B.C. there was no longer any doubt about the divinity of Pythagoras, and his house at Metapontum (in Sicily) had become a temple in which he was worshiped (see Pompeius Trogus ap. Just. 20.4.17–18). His legend was continually enriched, and its progress can be easily traced from Heraclides Ponticus (c. 390–310 B.C.) to PORPHYRY and Iamblichus. The Life of Pythagoras by Iamblichus, followed by the detailed account of the subject's virtues, inaugurated a type of biography that was destined to become a vogue (see Marinus's Vita Procli, 5th–6th centuries). The Pythagoreans claimed they had a supernatural knowledge (gnosis) and had no need of proof beyond the word of the master; "He said it" (ἀὐτὸς ἔφα), was an affirmation that could not be questioned (see Cicero, Nat. deor. 1.5.10).

Among the later Pythagoreans, special mention should be made of P. Nigidius Figulus, a friend of Cicero, who devoted himself to astrology and assumed a prophetic role, and Apollonius of Tyana, the famous miracle worker and seer. Both gloried in being Pythagoreans and prided themselves on their divinely inspired prophecies.

Religious Veneration of Socrates, Plato, and Others. Pythagoreanism undoubtedly should be regarded as a religion supported by philosophy rather than a religious philosophy proper. But similar phenomena are found in Platonism.

Socrates. From the day that the oracle at Delphi told Chaerephon that Socrates was the wisest of men, Socrates began to question his fellow citizens about the principles governing their conduct; he considered this inquiry a mission assigned to him by the god at Delphi. He was aware of signs that warned him against certain actions (Plato, Apol. 31 A–D) and could experience a kind of ecstasy (cf. Plato, Symp. 175 A–B). All antiquity venerated Socrates almost as a divine being.

Plato. Plato in turn was honored as a hero, doubtless not long after the eulogy delivered by Speusippus. Speusippus had related in his Life of Plato that wise men from the Orient had built an altar to the master. This homage was connected with the number of years in Plato's life, namely, 81, the Apollonian number obtained by multiplying the number of the Muses (9) by itself. Legends at once arose on the Apollonian birth of Plato, and, thus, like Pythagoras, he was deified after his death.

Epicurus. Even the most irreligious of the philosophers adored their founder as a god. Undoubtedly, as Boyancé assumed (op. cit.), the Epicurean school remained a religious society, and Epicurus became the object of a formal cult in both Greece and Rome. Epicurus had provided by will for annual commemorations of his birth, and four centuries later, according to Pliny the Elder, they were still being celebrated (Pliny, Hist. nat. 35.2.5). Although the Epicureans did not believe in the survival of the soul, they offered to it the customary sacrifices. They even venerated the physical features of Epicurus, and, again according to Pliny, they had images of him in their bedrooms and carried his effigy on the stones of their rings. This veneration really had a very precise spiritual meaning, for Epicurus had counseled his disciples: "Act always as if Epicurus were looking at you."

Other Examples. These are the most important examples, but there are many others. For Cercidas, Diogenes the Cynic (c. 400–329 B.C.), 100 years after his death, was a celestial being. Epictetus (c. A.D. 55–c. 135) became the object of a cult. CELSUS believed that Orpheus, Anaxarchus, and Epictetus were men truly worthy of homage. The Carpocratians, a Gnostic sect, kept images of Christ beside those of Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle (see Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 1.20.4). Porphyry did not hesitate to attribute a thaumaturgic power to Plotinus, stating that he was aided by a demon (Vit. Plot. 10). Iamblichus, finally, is represented as one inspired, living among the gods, causing spirits to appear in fountains, and giving rise to the belief that when he prayed his garments took on a beautiful gold color, and his body was raised 10 cubits above the ground. In short, he was a wonder-worker (see Eunapius, Vit. soph. 458–).

All the schools are not represented, but Pythagoreanism, Platonism, Epicureanism, and Neoplatonism furnish the chief witnesses. Two schools, in particular, were more concerned with the exact sciences than with religion, namely the Sceptics and the Peripatetics. The Sceptics especially were accused of ruining thought and morality. The Emperor Julian forbade his priests to read Sextus Empiricus, the famous Sceptic philosopher of the 2d century A.D. The school of Aristotle studied nature objectively and avoided the temptation of mixing magic with the natural sciences.

Philosopher as Teacher and Missionary

The pagan priest did not preach. However, philosophers, beginning with Pythagoras, taught or preached their doctrines, especially to their followers or disciples.

Pythagoras and Plato. Despite the skepticism of A. J. Festugière [“Sur une nouvelle édition de la Vita Pythagorica de Jamblique,” Revue des études grecques 50 (1937) 470–494], Iamblichus’s description of the “rule” of the Pythagorean community would seem to be substantially reliable. The group of converts around T. Statilius Taurus, by whose order the Pythagorean basilica at Rome was built, deserves special mention. See J. Carcopino, La Basilique pythagoricienne de la Porte Majeure (Paris 1927). Plato conducted his school in the gardens of the Academy at Athens and admitted only selected listeners. So far as is definitely known, he was the first philosopher to attempt to frame political constitutions and to become an advisor to princes. Aristotle became the tutor of Alexander the Great, and Alexander’s successors in the Hellenistic kingdoms had philosophers as consultants or advisors. See, e.g., F. Ollier, “Le philosophe stoïcien Sphaeros et l’œuvre réformatrice des rois de Sparte Agis et Cléomène,” Revue des études grecques 49 (1936) 536–570.

Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus. Plotinus, the founder of Neoplatonism, experienced a revelation while listening to Ammonius Saccas, and became a convert to philosophy. He followed the lectures of his master for 11 years and agreed to keep the teachings secret (Porphyry, Vit. Plot. 3)—a proof that they were considered to be concerned with the whole spiritual life. Plotinus attracted a number of enthusiastic disciples, among them Amelius, who followed his instruction for 24 years, and Porphyry, who introduced beginners to the study of logic and wrote numerous commentaries on Plato and Aristotle. Plotinus encouraged his disciples to ask questions and conducted his lectures in an informal and friendly manner.

Iamblichus, according to Eunapius (Vit. soph. 455), had a large following and exercised a kind of fascination on his hearers. That he must have played the role of a director of souls is indicated in the extracts from his moral epistles preserved in Stobaeus. One of his correspondents compares him to Aesculapius; he was regarded as a savior-god of Hellenism in peril. See J. Bidez; “Le philosophe Jamblique et son école,” Revue des études grecques 32 (1919) 29–40.

Cynics. Socrates, as it has been noted, carried out his apostolate in a quite different fashion from those already mentioned. In this respect, the true successors of Socrates were the Cynics, with Diogenes as their ideal type. They formed a part of the street scene. Throughout antiquity they were seen traveling about, in short mantles, with long hair and beards, barefoot, with staff in hand and knapsacks on their backs. Everyone heard their simple talks interspersed with witticisms and jokes, and witnessed their capricious and histrionic conduct. They enriched the public squares with their character sketches and sonorous diatribes. St. Augustine mentions them along with the Platonists and Pythagoreans as the sole survivors of paganism. From the outset they created a tradition of public preaching, which had an influence on a famous New Testament incident: when the philosophers heard St. Paul debating in the synagogue, they brought him to the Areopagus so that he could explain his ideas publicly.

Undoubtedly there were many charlatans among the Cynics; however, their unselfishness, their call to human brotherhood, and their promise of a better future made a deep impression. One of the greatest converts was the famous orator Dion Chrysostom (c. A.D. 40–after 112). He regarded himself as a vigilant physician of souls, and he fulfilled his mission with evident sincerity. His Cynicism was closely related to Stoicism. Cf. L. F. François, Essai sur Dion Chrysostome, philosophe et moraliste cynique et stoïcien (Paris 1921).

Stoics. Stoicism lasted at least five centuries (from the 3d century B.C. to the end of the 2d century A.D.), but only late Stoicism, represented especially by Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius, is well known through complete extant writings. That was the age also when Stoicism was concerned almost exclusively with preaching and moral meditation. The Stoic philosopher became a spiritual director. For a long time at Rome, private instruction was given to the sons of great houses by a philosopher in residence, and leading statesmen regularly attached such persons to themselves as friends and counselors. Let it suffice to mention as examples: the association of Metrodorus with Aemilius Paulus, of C. Blossius with Tiberius Gracchus, of Panaetius of Rhodes with P. Scipio, of Athenodorus of Tarsus with Cato of Utica, of the Stoic Diodotus with Cicero, of Athenodorus and Theon with Augustus, and later, of Rusticus with Marcus Aurelius.

Yet the real center of Stoicism in the 1st century A.D. was the family. Tacitus was at his best in describing the death scene of Thrasea Paetus, who, after conversing with friends and relatives in his gardens, withdrew to his bedchamber, opened his veins, made a libation with his blood to Jupiter the Liberator, and died with his eyes fixed on the Cynic Demetrius (Tacitus, Ann. 16.34–35). Seneca did not limit his activity to a single family, but became the guide of Paulinus, Marcellinus, Serenus and Lucilius. He made the letter the medium of psychological and moral consultation, and he gave advice in the manner of a private physician (see Seneca, Epistles 22.1). His contemporary, Cornutus, played a similar role, and the poet Persius has described this beloved master [Sat. 3.66–; 5.34–44; see R. Chevallier, “Le Milieu stoïcien à Rome au premier siècle après Jésus-Christ,” Lettres d’humanité 19 (1960) 534–562].

Epicureanism. Epicurus founded a kind of community fired with a great urge to win souls, and his influence spread not only over Greece and Italy but even over barbarian lands (see Cicero, De fin. 2.15.49). He addressed himself to both intellectuals and the masses, and included women and slaves among his disciples. As the Christian Lactantius said many centuries later, he invited all men to accept his philosophy (Div. inst. 3.25.4). The famous 2d-century inscription of Diogenes of Oenoanda in Asia Minor, with its detailed presentation of Epicurean principles, gives an excellent idea of the form and spirit of Epicurean propaganda. [See Paulys Realenzyklopädie der Klassischen Altertumwissenschaft, Suppl. 5 (1931) 153–170].

The Epicurean school must have had a formal organization somewhat like that of a monastic order, with novices subject to the counsels of the older and more advanced members. See M. N. De Witt, “Organization and Procedure in Epicurean Groups,” Classical Philology 31 (1936) 205–211. This life in common had an important educational value that Seneca emphasized by saying that this contubernium had made great men out of the disciples of Epicurus (Epistles 6.6.). Epicureanism sought to give peace to the soul by overcoming certain fears, especially that of death, and found no better means than fostering friendship. It had a long life, and its continued influence in their time provoked the repeated attacks of Plutarch and Galen. At the beginning of the 4th century, Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria, still considered it necessary to refute Epicurus in a book, On Nature. The Emperor Julian, however, states that by the middle of that century the sect had died out.

Philosophy as a School for Life

In the Imperial age all the philosophies more or less agreed on the practical answers to apply to the problems of existence. From the moment a man became a philosopher he knew that he must bear pain, scorn death, be patient with sickness, keep an untroubled soul, and content himself with the happiness achieved through a virtuous life. These five rules are summarized, for example, in the five books of Cicero’s Tusculans. About 140 B.C., the Stoic Panaetius wrote a treatise On Duty. This treatise inspired Cicero in the first two books of his De Officiis; and Cicero’s work, in turn, inspired St. Ambrose to write a Christian treatise under the same title.

Epicureans. In spite of widespread rumors that the Epicureans were debauched, Epicureanism actually required an exacting morality. The peace that they offered could be achieved only by imposing a strict discipline over physical desires, and by rejecting all that was neither natural nor necessary. A man could turn to Epicureanism if he were seeking to free himself from the burden of human miseries. Epicurus deserves recognition for developing a fine sense of interior contemplation and harmony within the soul. It is against this background that the conversions—sometimes transitory—of men like Maecenas, Horace, or Vergil, can be explained. [See P. Boyancé, “L’Épicurisme dans la société et la littérature romaines,” Lettres d’humanité, 19 (1960) 499–516].

Cynics. The Cynic sect experienced a revival in the 1st century, probably as a reaction against the luxury of Rome and political oppression. Cynicism refused to take seriously either family or state conventions. In social relations this attitude was demonstrated by their outspokenness; they had to be self-sufficient and unencumbered with material goods. The wise man lived by reason, and knew no other happiness than its realization through hard effort. Above all, Cynicism despised the body. Although their sect was founded on pride in human strength, the Cynics had a strong feeling of the baseness of man under the sway of his body, and an equally strong feeling that happiness was possible for the man who was able to make his soul prevail. A distinguishing feature of their doctrine was its conciseness. Their philosophy of life was so simplified that their ideal could be realized by a man in his lifetime.

Stoics. Stoicism was distinguished from Cynicism, from which it derived, by its scientific work; when this work passed into its second plane of interest, the Cynic base reappeared. Moreover, the attitude of the Stoic wise man had changed: pride, and the paradoxical proclamations concerning the royalty of the wise man, had given place to a certain humility. The wise man must neither hurt nor scandalize people. Panaetius had repeatedly advised his followers to be polite; the Stoic must not be insulting, pedantic, or dirty (Epictetus, Discourses 3.2.89). For Epictetus, the origin of philosophy was the awareness of human misery and the passionate desire to overcome it. Yet, in spite of all, Stoicism retained its taste for a certain pedantry, tortuous reasoning, and detailed interrogations.

Although undeniably eclectic, the teaching of the Stoics remained rigid in its morality and seems to have ignored true charity; egotism and pride were essential elements. The Stoic ethic achieved its end in mysticism by a resigned acceptance of natural laws and submission to destiny. The same was later true of the Neoplatonists.

Philosophical Resignation and Courage. The philosophers quite often showed examples of resignation and courage in their personal lives. Socrates, the first martyr to wisdom, was a perfect model of courage before death, furnishing antiquity with an almost inexhaustible theme. Philosophy was often looked on with suspicion and its practitioners exiled or put to death. About the year A.D. 65 the Stoics Musonius Rufus and Cornutus were exiled; in 71, under Vespasian, all philosophers were banished from Rome; in 85, Domitian had Maternus, Rusticus Arulinus, and Herennius Senecio executed (Dion Cassius, Hist. Rom. 66.12–19; 67.13). In 93, the same emperor again banished the philosophers from Italy. Epictetus thereupon retired to Epirus and opened a school at Nicopolis. There were probably religious motives behind the banishment, as the Stoics appeared to violate the official religion. It was also possible to confuse their doctrine with certain foreign cults. An Oriental seer, e.g., the Egyptian Chaeremon, proclaimed himself a Stoic (Martial 11.57).

Even under the worst emperors, philosophers stood for the affirmation of virtue and taught people how to die gracefully. The death of Thrasea Paetus has already been mentioned. Seneca reports the peaceful death of Julius Canus (Dialogues 9.14.7–9), and the example of Rubellius Plautus can be added. One of his freedmen advised him to resist the order to die sent by Nero, but the philosophers Coeranus and Musonius persuaded him to prefer death (Tacitus, Ann. 14.58–9). Seneca himself died nobly (ibid. 15.62–3). Epictetus, while a slave, suffered without complaining. There should be no cause for wonder at the declaration of Marcus Aurelius that philosophy is necessary to accept death (Med. 12.5).

Ethics was based on a psychological analysis, which, for example, creates the charm of Seneca's Letters to Lucilius. Among all philosophers the practice of asceticism is evident. E. Bréhier noticed, even in Plotinus, what he called alarming symptoms of fatigue and nervous weariness [Plotinus: Ennéades (2d ed. Paris 1954) 1.8]. When Porphyry knew Plotinus, bad eating habits, intellectual overwork, and lack of sleep had impaired his health. "A man must reduce and weaken his body . . . he will even want to have the experience of suffering" (Ennead 1.4.14). This sentence, taken from one of the last writings of Plotinus, goes beyond Stoic indifference because it actually reaches the point of desiring pain. See L. Robin, La Morale antique (Paris 1938).

Explanation of the World and Way of Salvation

Even after Socrates had given philosophy the essential goal of knowing man's inner nature, and positive sciences had developed outside philosophy, philosophers continued to search for the inner nature of things. Some who, it seems, like the physicians, must have remained detached from metaphysical speculation more than others, often continued to devote themselves more or less to philosophy. The Methodist School, for example, claimed that it followed Zeno. The extraordinary and complex activity of Apuleius shows clearly the compromises that continued to befall science. This is perhaps one of the reasons that can be given for the astonishing fact that the Romans contributed practically nothing to ancient science. Science and philosophy were borne along on the mystical current that was the chief phenomenon of the 2d century A.D. Men were more preoccupied with their salvation than with scientific knowledge of things; they sought only an explanation of the world with a view toward salvation and decided to use the least rational means to achieve the saving vision. This grave deterioration of Greek thought was occasioned by the development of the mystery religions and Oriental cults.

Stoics. Religious feeling among the Stoics came from a rational conception of the universe. They achieved the paradox of teaching a religious philosophy combined with materialism. In fact, this philosophy became entirely religious when the later Stoics spoke of God as a personal being, as Providence. Zeno of Citium was a pantheist and a materialist; to him the world and God were one. God, who is fire, was the active element in the world, the rational and organizing force. From him emanated the gods of the stars, the divine forces of nature, heroes, and even man's reason. Stoicism thus furnished a material explanation of polytheism. Since the gods originated in the manner indicated, they were not eternal, and would be reabsorbed into the Whole at the time of the world conflagration. Stoicism kept the spiritual life absolutely separate from any religious interference. The purpose of man, they believed, was to live in conformity with nature, to accept fate, and to live according to reason as manifested by nature, and through its impetus, which is virtue. See A. Jagu, Zénon de Citium (Paris 1946).

Consequently, when the distinction between soul and body was sharpened by philosophers like Epictetus, ancient monistic materialism was practically at an end. The germ of dualism, which Posidonius had introduced, began to develop; and the mystic tendency, to assert itself. The soul, feeling itself exiled in the body, sought to rejoin the divinity of which it was a spark. Stoicism thus became colored by Platonism and Pythagoreanism. Marcus Aurelius, through his bent for contemplation, was on the way to achieving Neoplatonic ecstasy.

The soul of the Stoic was sustained by the conviction that God loved it and watched over it, that He had created the world for man, and that His providence was perpetually concerned with the world. All this was a bold development and interpretation of ancient fatalism. The messengers of Providence were spirits, as were the gods of the popular legends. By adoring them with proper understanding, the Stoic rendered homage to God; the wise man was thus a sort of priest.

M. Spanneut has shown the influence of Stoicism among the Fathers of the Church [Le Stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie, (Paris 1957)]. Even without considering the purely moral aspects of Stoic influence, such as the points on which there was general agreement among the sects (cosmology has been mentioned) and the clearly related influence of Neoplatonism, the Stoic influence appears to have been profound. In their theodicy, the Fathers owe the idea of an intimate link between God and the world to the Stoics. In physics, they appreciated the monism of the early Stoics, and consequently became receptive to the idea of a universal kinship and a cosmic sympathy among all things. The most intellectual among them took the trouble to read Soranus or Musonius for themselves, and then used their ideas, incidentally, without mentioning their names.

Syncretism in Various Philosophies. In the syncretism made by the Romans, Stoicism and Epicureanism were only in conflict with each other as religious systems. Epicureanism recognized the official cults, but only as social conventions. Cynicism, for its part, was not interested in the afterlife. It was opposed to polytheism and to the various cults, and scorned oracles because they denied man's freedom. The Peripatetics merged Providence strictly with the order of the universe. Alexander of Aphrodisias declared that Providence, as generally understood, would be incompatible with the ideas of God and the world, for man would become the end and God the means (De fato 30). He admitted divination, but the gods left men free to use their oracles or not as they chose (ibid. 31). He believed in prayer and magic, but remained fully aware of the majesty of natural laws (ibid. 16–17).

Revival of Mystic Aspect of Platonism. The Neoplatonists brought out the mystic side of Plato's doctrine, a Plato seeking, like Plotinus, the foundation of the hierarchy of realities in the intuition of pure being (the Good or the One). A number of texts support this phase of Plato's thought, and the Neoplatonists were the first to make use of them. Plato was unable to speak of the knowledge of the supreme reality without employing the terminology of the mysteries. For instance, in the Symposium, he speaks of the unexpected and immediate knowledge that makes the complete ascent toward the beautiful and that in the Republic attains, in the good, the common cause of the thought and of the realities that it knows. But for Plotinus, intuition of the first cause does not call for intuition of the intelligible world, as if the first were necessarily to draw enrichment from the second. On the contrary, intuition of the intelligible world can arise only through a marked change in conditions. Far from suggesting the intuition of the world of which it is the first cause, the vision of the One causes the man who attains it to forget all else, including himself. Neoplatonism developed out of Platonism when mystical contemplation had been isolated from progressive dialectic, and when this dialectic had become "procession."

The dialectic of Plato perceived in the tangible world deficiencies that did not meet the requirements of the intelligible. The multiplicity of changeable things was organized into species, each with a realizable model, which could be explained only through entities outside itself. These entities were forms that themselves constituted an ordered multiplicity, their order being explained by a higher unity, the form of the Good. In the famous text of the Republic (508b–), Plato asserted that the Good, the sun of the intelligible world, was at once producer of knowledge and of being (the same Good that was the object of mystical contact); however, he never developed this theory further.

On the other hand, the constructions that he erects in the Philebus, in the Sophist, or in the Timaeus take their point of departure below the Good in a multiplicity of elements; such as the five types in the Sophist, the four species of being in the Philebus, or the geometrical and arithmetic schemata in the Timaeus. Between the point of arrival in the ascent, the One or the Good, and the point of departure in the descent, the multiplicity of the elements of being, there is a hiatus; so much so that, in Plato, the contemplative life and scientific knowledge remained detached from each other. In other words, there was a mystic Plato and a scientist Plato.

Neo-Pythagoreanism and Its Influence. In the 2d century A.D. the mystic trend of Platonism was subjected to strong contamination, mainly from Pythagoreanism. The best known of its representatives mixed the two doctrines without scruple. Numenius (c. A.D. 150–200) considered himself a Pythagorean and extolled the union of Pythagoras and Plato as heirs to the wisdom of the Brahmans, the Egyptians, and Moses. Wishing to keep the idea of God pure, they removed the divinity as far as possible from the material world, although that same divinity, at the time of its creation, had arranged the world by means of number-ideas. Here Pythagorean speculations revealed themselves. This pronounced dualism between God and the world required spirit intermediaries; it saw in the soul a divine particle, and in the body an evil spirit. Through asceticism, the purification of the body and return to God could be hastened. There was a marked development in the role of spirits or demons in Pythagoreanism, a fact that confirms the extent to which its thought was imbued with religious and other influences from the East. Pythagorean monotheism had become very complaisant. The true god, according to Apollonius of Tyana (cf. Eusebius, Praep. evang. 4.13), could be honored only by an uplifting of the soul; but lesser gods were quite satisfied with ceremonies. Furthermore, since most mythological legends had an allegorical meaning [see J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie: Les Origines grecques et les contestations judéo-chrétiennes (Paris 1958)], the Pythagoreans carefully refrained from criticizing them. The basis of their thought was that man was a god in power. The doctrine of μετενσωμάτωσις, or transmigration, was traditional with the Pythagoreans.

Plotinus and Neoplatonism. The change that Plotinus made in Platonism had connections with Gnostic speculations. Plotinus did not reject hypostases or lower steps of divinity, nor allegorical myths; nor did he exclude the names or the myths of polytheism. The One could be called Uranus, the Intelligence, Cronus, and the Soul of the World, Zeus. But both his metaphysics and his conception of the inner life were original. He believed that the life of suprasensible principles, the One, Intelligence, the Soul, was independent of the sensible world. All teaching suspected of assigning human feeling or attributes to these divine beings was rejected. Plotinus gave no place to astrology, although he did not deny the influence of the stars. He showed the magicians and the astrologers that their techniques could succeed only in the sensible world, which was subject to determinism. It was not right that divine being should depart from its proper character. Plotinus likewise condemned the Gnostic theory of salvation (Ennead. 2.9; 2.3). Man should not wait for God to bend down to him; rather, man should ascend to God. On the other hand, it is not by freeing oneself from nature, but by uniting with it, that the soul can rise above material things. The inner life above all consists in coming out of itself. It is not the life of an individual soul that is isolated, but the innermost life of all things. The peak of the inner life is complete ecstasy, a union with the One, in which the feeling of unity alone persists, without any further distraction. [See M. de Gandillac, La Sagesse de Plotin (Paris 1952)].

An episode related by Porphyry is very instructive in this regard. When Amelius wanted to lead Plotinus to the sacrifices that formed a part of the ceremonies for the new moon, he received this answer: "It is for the gods to come to me, not for me to go to them" (Vit. Plot. 10). This is not really in contradiction to what has just been said, but it shows the gap that separated Plotinus from his disciples and that widened further with Iamblichus.

Before the time of Iamblichus (c. A.D. 250–c. 325) the Chaldean oracles—a sort of higher form of magic—was considered only as a second-rank instrument of initiation. See S. Eitrem, "La Théurgie chez les néoplatoniciens et dans les papyrus magiques," Symbolae Osloenses 22 (1942) 49–79. Iamblichus was the first to raise this theurgy to the point of regarding it as the true means of bringing souls to God. See J. Bidez, "Le Philosophe Jamblique et son école," Revue des études grecques 32 (1919) 29–40. Bidez supposed that the Neoplatonists had organized genuine mysteries, but this is a hypothesis only. There is no solid reason for believing that the hymns of Proclus (c. A.D. 410–484) served any other purpose than to furnish intellectual entertainment at the meetings of the school. In any case, from this time on, philosophy is completely merged with some form of religion. The African Martianus Capella (early 5th century A.D.) in his Marriage of Mercury with Philology described the apotheosis of mystical knowledge, and reconstituted beneath "the Abyss of the Father" a whole pantheon of gods presiding over the intellectual world: a triad, seven astral divinities, a Virgin-Fountain, powers "beyond," the Flower of Fire, and Primordial Truth. All this is done as if polytheism were going to be reintroduced into the framework of monotheism.

See Also: CYNICS; EPICTETUS; EPICUREANISM; GREEK PHILOSOPHY; NEOPLATONISM; NEOPYTHAGOREANISM; PLATO; PLATONISM; PLOTINUS; STOICISM.

Bibliography: H. I. MARROU, A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1956) 206–216. A. D. NOCK, Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo (New York 1933). G. BARDY, La Conversion au christianisme durant les premiers siècles (Paris 1949) 46–649. P. AUBIN, Le Problème de la "conversion": Étude sur un terme commun à l'hellénisme et au christianisme des trois premiers siècles (Paris 1963). A. E. TAYLOR, Plato: The Man and His Work (6th ed. London 1949; reprinted 1955). M. POHLENZ, Die Stoa: Geschichte einer geistigen Bewegung, 2 v. (2d ed. Göttingen 1955). A. JAGU and M. SPANNEUT, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.1:822–849. N. W. DE WITT, Epicurus and His Philosophy (Minneapolis 1954). D. R. DUDLEY, A History of Cynicism from Diogenes to the 6th Century A.D. (London 1937). A. H. ARMSTRONG, An Introduction to Ancient Philosophy (London 1947) 175–204. P. MERLAN, From Platonism to Neoplatonism (The Hague 1953). P. COURCELLE, Les Lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore (new ed. rev. Paris 1948) 3–36, 195–209. H. A. WOLFSON, Religious Philosophy: A Group of Essays (Cambridge, Mass. 1961).

[P. LANGLOIS]

GREEK RELIGION

The term is employed to designate all the religious practices and beliefs of the ancient Greeks throughout their hundreds of communities in the Mediterranean world and the adjacent areas. The study of ancient Greek religion embraces the long span of time from the Mycenaean period (1600–1100 B.C.) to the age of the Emperor Justinian (A.D. 527–565).

INTRODUCTION

At the outset it must be emphasized that the ancient Greeks and Romans were religious people and convinced believers, and that among the Greeks the Athenians especially should be so characterized. Let it suffice to cite the testimony of St. Paul in his Areopagus discourse, in which the Latin word religiosiores would be a better translation for the Greek δεισιδαιμονεστέρους than the Vulgate superstitiosiores (Acts 17.22; cf. Festugière, “Aspects de la religion populaire grecque,” 28).

Religion of the Masses and of the Philosophers.

The pagan Greek differed from the Christian (ibid. 28–29) in two essential ways: he lacked a sense of sin as an offense against God [(cf. É. des Places, “Péché dans la Grèce antique,” Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. Pirot, et al., 7:471–480 (Paris 1928–)], and he was a polytheist. On the latter point, a distinction must be made between the masses and the philosophers. Although even Plato remained a polytheist in many respects, from the period of the pre-Socratics, both Ionians and Eleatics, all Greek philosophy tended toward monotheism, while the popular religion continued to tend toward polytheism. Accordingly, the distinction made between “popular religion” and the “religion of the sages or philosophers” provides in the study of Greek religion a convenient division, which, in the long run, is quite justified.

Sources. The sources themselves actually fall into two categories, namely, archeological monuments, epitaphs, ex-voto inscriptions, and oracles; and literary works in the strict sense. The latter rarely furnish detailed information on current religious beliefs and practices, except when Plato, e.g., toward the end of his life, undertook to codify them in his Laws [cf. Festugière, “Aspects . . .,” 19; id., “Le fait religieux dans la Grèce ancienne,” in Permanence de la Grèce (Paris 1948) 77–87]. But the literary sources have a deeper significance. A. Harnack goes so far as to say: “Real, deep devoutness, such as controls the whole life, is certainly a power that is only to be found in a few. But it is on the basis of those few that the nature of an age’s piety must be determined, just as we must determine the art of a period on the basis of the real artists. For in those devout men, as in those artists, lives the eternal, ever-moving spirit of religion and of art, and they compel the rest, even though slowly and gradually, to follow after them, and at least to acknowledge as form and authority that which they cannot receive as spirit. But many out of the throng do receive a ray of the spirit, and warm their cold life with it” (The Hibert Journal 10 70).

Homeric religion occupies a place between popular religion and philosophic religion; it is closer to the first, but the second is in part dependent upon it, just as all Greek literary genres are indebted to the epic [cf. É. des Places, “Style parlé et style oral chez les écrivains grecs,” Mélanges Bidez (Brussels 1934) 267–286].

POPULAR RELIGION

Characteristic features of popular religion are (1) faith in the power and omniscience of the gods—nothing can be achieved without them; they are consulted on all doubtful matters (e.g., Zeus at Dodona); (2) trust in the god who is served well; (3) gratitude for the gifts that he sends; (4) friendship (φίλος is a favorite word of Euripides and Theocritus) and even intimacy with him; (5) an atmosphere of joy and festivity that surrounds worship, a “respite” in the hard routine of daily life (cf. Plato, Laws 2.653C-D, 654A; Festugière, “Aspects . . .,” 20–21, 23–24, 26–27).

The Olympian gods were honored in a spirit of gladness (cf. Plato, Epin. 980B), while the chthonian deities (the inferi of the Latins) inspired fear primarily and had their own special rites (cf. Plato, Laws 828C). Each category accordingly had its corresponding ritual, one of service and the other of aversion.

Homeric Religion. The gods of the Iliad, and their counterparts, more highly conceived characters, in the Odyssey, already comprise the pantheon of Olympus, which retains its worshippers until the end of paganism; and the principal forms of sacrifice and prayer are likewise established from Homer on. Homeric morality, which is less closely bound to religion than in other systems, juxtaposes elevated concepts—honor, hospitality, and the solidarity of the genos or clan—and ideas and practices that are vestiges of barbarism.

Zeus. In Hellenic polytheism the supreme god is called Zeus. He is a combination of the Cretan Zeus, a god of fertility, and the Indo-European god of the sky and of lightning, thus reconciling Aegean religion, the sun-cult of the indigenous farmers, and the sky-cult of the aristocratic conquerors. He is the “father of gods and men.” As father of the gods, he is like a patriarch among his own people, the sovereign divinity to whom all others show a profound respect. He is also the father of men, although the Iliad opposes the race of men to that of the gods (5.441–442), and Pindar does the same at the beginning of Nemean Ode 6.

But at all times, the Greeks tended to bring themselves closer to their gods or to bring their gods closer to themselves. This dual movement produces either anthropomorphism or a tendency toward perfection. Between man and divinity, assimilation could operate in two directions, from above to below or from below to above. In the case of the Greeks of the Homeric Age, it operated from below to above; they fashioned gods in the image of man, debasing divinity by attributing to it the crimes of mankind and thereby justifying them. But the origin of anthropomorphism can be found also in the feeling of kinship with God: "Anthropomorphism involves theomorphism" (cf. Adam, Vitality of Platonism, 124). The solidarity of the family in Greece, strongly knit through the conception of the genos or clan, favored the idea of an intimacy with God that reached even the point of likeness. Since the ideal of parents was to have children like themselves (cf. Hesiod, Works 182 and 235), kinship with divinity would necessarily be expressed by a resemblance.

Other Gods. Besides Zeus, two goddesses have dominant positions, Hera in the Iliad and Athena in the Iliad and Odyssey. Hera never stops reminding Zeus that he agreed to let Troy be destroyed. Her affection for the Achaeans is not altered by their quarrels; she loves equally Agamemnon and Achilles (Iliad 1.196–209). Hera, an Argive goddess, appears in the Feudal Age as the consort of the Father of the Gods and the protectress of marriage. Her sacred union (hierogamy) with Zeus, which a metope of one of the temples at Selinus (Sicily) represents under the aspect of her unveiling, consecrates the marriage of Sky and Earth. Athena helps Achilles to achieve self-control, and in describing her role in the Iliad, which is a little like that of grace in the Christian sense, one could construct a tableau of the highest stages of psychological life. It is especially in the Odyssey, however, that the solicitous assistance that she gives to Odysseus makes it possible for the poet to attribute to her the noblest sentiments, thoughts, and advice, which are far more elevated than the capricious interventions of the gods of the Iliad in favor of or against a specific human personage.

The other Homeric divinities of the ancient pantheon are: Poseidon, ruler of the sea; Hades, king of the Lower World; Demeter, also a chthonian divinity, the Earth-Mother; Artemis and her brother Apollo, "masters of beasts" (πότνιοι θηρῶν), great protectors of the Trojans; Hermes, the shepherd god who multiplies flocks, god of travelers, and guide of souls that he leads to Hades (ψυχοπομπός).

Apollo is also the brother of Dionysus. These two relatively recent foreign gods represent two aspects of Greek religion, the difference between which has often been exaggerated. Actually, the devotees of Apollo, beginning with the Pythia of Delphi, pass through states of trance or ecstasy that connect his worship with that of Dionysus and explain the ultimate reconciliation of the two brothers and their association at Delphi. It is not possible to oppose the Dionysian to the Apollonian—to use the terminology of Nietzsche—in such a way that the Apollonian element does not contain germs of its opposite. The rational and the irrational have always coexisted. The religion of Apollo with its ritual observances and maxims may approach Jewish legalism, yet the mystic movement depends more on the cult of Dionysus, although the bacchants did not regard themselves as exalted or spiritually regenerated. The religious thought of the Greeks always wavered between a feeling for the human condition, beyond the limits of which it was not possible to rise, and assimilation with God, the goal of the philosophers and mystics. A wise man like Empedocles was a combination of both and, as E. R. Dodds (156) put it, the double "Orphic" faith in metempsychosis and in an original offense reconciles "the 'Apolline' sentiment of remoteness from the divine and the 'Dionysiac' sentiment of identity with it."

Destiny. In Homer, Zeus tends to merge with destiny, which is called μοῖρα, μέρος, αἶσα, literally "part, portion" [cf. K. von Fritz, Review of Religion 15 (1950–51) 50–51]. Destiny and divinity, while often independent or juxtaposed, can come into conflict; sometimes the gods are subordinated to destiny, but much more frequently destiny expresses their will, Διὸς αἶσα. A scene like the weighing of lots (or of souls, psychostasia), which precedes the death of Hector, furnishes a good example of the interpenetration of the personal will of Zeus and the anonymous force that presides over the destinies of men (Iliad 22.209–). The Homeric idea of destiny can be clearly comprehended in the long labor of synthesis that produced the Homeric religion in its totality. In the Homeric poems there is not merely a compromise between the concept of destiny and the concept of divine power, for the idea itself of destiny is an idea of compromise.

Prayer. The prayers found in "Homer are ordinarily formulaic and traditional. Those of Chryses in bk. 1 of the Iliad contain the three essential parts of all liturgical prayer in Greece: (1) invocation of the god, "hear me" (κλῦθί μευ, 1.37, 451); (2) the reasons for being heard: sacrifices offered, services rendered, favors already obtained; (3) conclusion: statement of the petition. Those of Diomedes to Athena, in bks. 5 and 10, begin in the same way: κλῦθί μοι (5.115), κέκλυθι ἔμετο (10.284). Odysseus, before Diomedes, had prayed in the same terms (10.278, 282), and Nestor and Achilles also address Zeus in like manner. Priam (24.108) employs numerous epithets ("Father," "Master of Ida," "most glorious," "very great"), in accordance with the style that was to become that of all hymns down to the Hymn to Zeus of the Stoic Cleanthes.

There are also less official prayers, outside all ritual and sacerdotal presence, and perhaps more intimate, such as those of Hector (Odyssey 5; Iliad 6). Hector takes his son Astyanax in his arms and asks Zeus and all the other gods to give him a valor even greater than that of his father (Iliad 6.474–481). The shipwrecked Odysseus calls on the god of the river to give him access to the shore: “Hear me, O Lord, whose name I do not know [again κλῶθί] . . . receive in your pity, O Lord, the suppliant who calls out to you” (Odyssey 5.445–450). On Homeric prayer and on Greek prayer in general, see K. von Fritz, “Greek Prayers,” Review of Religion 10 (1945–46) 5–39.

Conclusion. A religious character cannot be denied to poems where the interpretation of the world and life is completely religious, and where the gods intervene in almost all experiences of physical and psychological life. While one may hardly speak of a religious morality in Homer, it must be acknowledged that the ancient bard never ceased emphasizing the divine, in spite of the obscurities or seamy elements in the mythology of which he sang.

RELIGION OF THE PHILOSOPHERS

While it is possible roughly to contrast the popular religion with that of the “sages,” it does not necessarily follow that all philosophers professed the same religion. Their belief in a single principle, which tended toward monotheism, took various forms, and among most of them it did not exclude a residue of faith in the traditional gods. On the other hand, the term “philosopher” is used here in a very broad sense. Originally the term “sage” (σοφός) was applied to poets. These sometimes had a theology—if Hesiod or Pindar did not, probably at least Euripides and certainly Aeschylus did.

Aeschylus. Aeschylus developed to perfection the idea of a morality at the same time divine and human. The idea had been elaborated by Hesiod in his Works and Days and by Solon in his Elegies (cf. Solmsen), but neither Hesiod nor Solon transferred justice to Olympus. On the contrary, the transformation of a system of violence into a system of divine justice is the problem underlying the two trilogies, Prometheus and the Oresteia. In the Oresteia, particularly in the third play, the Eumenides, the coming of justice upon earth depends on the gods; the reconciliation of the chthonian goddesses with the gods of Olympus, as with the judges of the Areopagus, requires fairness in human decrees. The conflict of Prometheus Bound, which opposes an older god, a Titan, to the new master Zeus, shows a trend toward a compromise and gives, besides, the noble lesson that the gods, like men, learn through suffering.

Xenophanes and Parmenides. Xenophanes and especially Parmenides were poets, but poet-philosophers in the full sense of the word. To Xenophanes religious philosophy owes a lofty conception of the dignity of God, of “what is suitable to him” (θεοπρεπές); to Parmenides, the idea of an unconditioned existence of being on which the epithets, lavished as in a hymn, are those bestowed on the “Infinite” (ἄπειρον) by Anaximander, “unbegotten,” “deathless,” “without beginning or end.” The attitude of Parmenides regarding Being is truly a religious one. Even if this Being is not a personal God, it is divine, as later was the Platonic form of the Good.

Plato. Of an eminently religious mind, Plato professed at the same time: (1) the traditional religion, (2) a religious philosophy, and (3) an astral religion.

Adherence to Traditional Religion. Whatever the importance of an “Orphic” or “Pythagorean” element in the Platonic myths, which for the most part are eschatological, Plato, beginning with his Euthyphro, but particularly in his Republic and the Laws, revised traditional beliefs and mythology. In all his writings, without breaking with the heritage of his ancestors, “the inherited conglomerate” (G. Murray), he purified the legends, which were only too often immoral, in order to restore a religious meaning. Plato was scandalized by the denial of the existence of the gods, by the denial of Providence (the gods exist, but they are not interested in human affairs), and by attempts at corruption of the gods (they occupy themselves with men, but the latter can buy and seduce them by sacrifices and offerings). This is the triple impiety exposed by Adimantus in bk. 2 of the Republic (365D–E), and refuted in the Laws, bks. 10 (888A–D; cf. 885B) and 12 (948C), and in the Epinomis (980D). Plato resented less the gods of mythology than the fables that disfigured them, such as the mutilation of Uranus and other horrors (Euthyphro 5E–6C; Rep. 2.377E–378E). Cult itself was not condemned. On the contrary, Plato, like Socrates, seems to have accepted it in good faith along with the names of the gods. In this regard he said: “One must conform to the law” (Tim. 40E), and all the more so “because men are ignorant of the true name of the gods” (Crat. 400D–E).

Among all the Olympian gods, Socrates and Plato revered Apollo most. His importance, which is so marked in Plato’s ideal state, increased even more in the “Apolonian” city of the Laws. In both, the following order governs worship: (1) Olympians, (2) chthonian divinities, (3) demons (δαίμονες), (4) heroes (cf. Laws 4.717A–B). The demons, who were above heroes, served as intermediaries between the gods and men, as is clear from corroborative narratives in the Banquet (202E) and in the Epinomis (984E–985A).

Religious Philosophy. The religious philosophy of Plato is based on the relationship of the soul to the Forms—a relationship that implies the soul's immortality. Metempsychosis and reminiscence, which flows from metempsychosis, postulate a former life where the soul contemplated the Forms. On earth, joined to a body, which Pythagoreanism represents as a prison, the soul retains a yearning for the other world where it lived as in its true family. Indeed, spiritual relationship, συγγένεια, is at once the foundation for worship of the gods and for the intuitive knowledge of the Forms. To indicate the stages of religious knowledge, four steps are differentiated in the Republic: opinion, faith, reasoned knowledge, and pure intelligence (bk. 6 end, bk.7); and at the end of the dialectic process in Epistle 7, the superior degree of intelligence that apprehends the real object is likewise intuitive knowledge.

Eternal being, perpetually the same, is grasped through the intellect and reasoning, while becoming is the object of opinion combined with unreasoning sensation. Is this eternal being God? The Form of the Good is never identified with God by Plato, although it does have god-like attributes. This Form, "which gives to the objects of knowledge their essence and their being, while not itself essence, is still above essence in power and in dignity" (Rep. 6.509B), sometimes appearing even superior to God, who only contemplates it and imitates it in his operations. If one sticks to the letter of the texts, "the fact remains that Plato himself has never called the Good a god. . . . The reason for it might be that he never thought of it as of a god. And why, after all, should an Idea be considered as a god? An Idea is no person; it is not even a soul; at best it is an intelligible cause, much less a person than a thing" (Gilson, 26).

Astral Religion. Late in his life, perhaps under the influence of a Chaldean associate at the Academy, Plato seems to have been converted to the astral religion. Having once accepted, and as early as his Phaedrus, that motion is caused by a soul, nothing prevented him from identifying the Olympian gods with the souls of the sun, moon, planets, and other celestial bodies. This doctrine, which is found in the Timaeus and in the Laws, was expanded in the Epinomis (e.g., 982B–E). As the Greeks know how to embellish and bring to perfection everything they receive from the barbarians, so the oracles of Delphi will teach them to honor these new gods with a care that will surpass that given them by their Eastern worshippers (987E–988A).

Although a faithful adherent of the traditional religion right up to his conversion, Plato nevertheless introduces the astral religion into the whole framework of his ideal city, concerned only with establishing it in conformity with the Delphic oracles. The worship of the stars is thus to coexist with that of the Olympians, even if little by little it is to supplant the latter. To Eusebius (Dem. evangel. 4.9, 10–11), worship of the stars was not far from monotheism and could soon lead to the pure and true origin of things. There remained, however, an essential difference between the attitude of the Jew, who saw in the heavenly body a creation of the one God, and that of Plato, who worshipped the star itself as a god. There was always an obstacle for the Greeks, namely, that they had so many gods that it was practically impossible for exclusive monotheism to take root among them. What must be remembered at least is that there was a very strong tendency toward monotheism, even though it did not reach a full development. It remained a polytheism oriented in some respects toward the one true God.

The Stoics. As compared with their predecessors, the Stoics emphasize at least the appearances of a monotheism. God is universal reason present everywhere. Men, each of whom possesses a particle of this divine reason, must consider each other as brothers. On the other hand, this God allows neither temples nor statues; his true sanctuary is the sky filled with stars. If Zeno thus rejected polytheism, it was scarcely out of a feeling of intimacy with God. This feeling is more evident in Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus (so well commented on by Adam in his Vitality of Platonism, 108–189); Zeus is presented not merely as the master of nature, but as a father who saves men from fatal ignorance of true goods. In its religious feeling as in its poetic quality, the hymn of Cleanthes anticipates Epictetus, the nightingale and swan of God (Diatribes 1.16.20–21). For Epictetus even more than for Plato, philosophic religion expresses itself in a filial piety, of which the principal elements are perhaps (1) submission to the will of God, (2) pride in one's condition as man, and (3) the feeling of one's divine affiliation. The wisdom of consent, which in the beginning sums up Stoicism, changes with Cleanthes into prayer, and with Epictetus it rises to the height of a mystical doctrine. What he lacks is an understanding of human weakness and sin, the meaning of human misery; Plato had a greater sense of our misery, at least in the Laws. No Greek philosopher, any more than the Greeks in general, had a clear conception of sin in the Judeo-Christian sense.

See Also: CRETAN-MYCENAEAN RELIGION; DELPHI, ORACLE OF; GREEK PHILOSOPHY (RELIGIOUS ASPECTS); MYSTERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL; SACRIFICE.

Bibliography: L. R. FARNELL, J. HASTINGS, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:392–425. É. DES PLACES, "Les Religions de la Grèce Antique," Histoire des religions, ed. M. BRILLANT and R. AIGRAIN (Paris 1955–) 3:159–292. F. R. WALTON, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed.

Greek Orthodox bishop carries Mary's Icon, Jerusalem. (©Hanan Isachar/CORBIS)

Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1860–67. A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, “La Grèce: I, La Religion,” Grèce et Rome, in Histoire générale des religions, ed. M. GORCE and R. MORTIER, 4 v. (Paris 1944–51) v.2; Personal Religion among the Greeks (Berkeley 1960); “Aspects de la religion populaire grecque,” Revue de théologie et de philosophie 11 (Lausanne 1961) 19–31. J. E. HARRISON, Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion (3d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1922). E. R. DODDS, The Greeks and the Irrational (Berkeley 1951). W. K. C. GUTHRIE, The Greeks and Their Gods (London 1950). G. MURRAY, Five Stages of Greek Religion (2d ed. New York 1930). M. P. NILSSON, Greek Popular Religion (New York 1940); Greek Piety, tr. H. J. ROSE (Oxford 1948); Geschichte der griechischen Religion (Munich, v.1, 2d ed. 1955; v.2, 2d ed. 1961). J. ADAM, The Religious Teachers of Greece (Edinburgh 1909); The Vitality of Platonism and Other Essays (Cambridge, Eng. 1911). W. JAEGER, The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers (Oxford 1947). F. SOLMSEN, Hesiod and Aeschylus (Ithaca, N.Y. 1949). É. H. GILSON, God and Philosophy (New Haven, 1941). H. J. ROSE, A Handbook of Greek Mythology (6th ed. New York 1958).

[É. DES PLACES]

GREEK THEOLOGY

On May 29, 1453, when the Muslim Turks captured Constantinople and put an end to the Byzantine Empire, the development of Byzantine theology ceased. From 1500 on theology was written by Greek-speaking Orthodox and Catholics inhabiting what had been the Byzantine Empire. This body of material that is often designated Byzantine theology, but a more exact term would be Greek theology of the Byzantine tradition.

This article deals with Greek theology: (1) from 1500 until the patriarchate of Cyril LUCARIS (1612); (2) from Cyril Lucaris to the Synod of Constantinople (1723); (3) from 1723 to the constitution of the autocephalous Church of Greece (1833); (4) from 1833 until 1923; and (5) from 1923 to the beginning of the ecumenical movement.

First Period: 1500 to 1612. Even though the patriarchal school continued to function in Constantinople under the guidance of Matthaëus Kamariotas during the reign of Muḥammad II, theological centers of learning were gradually suppressed. Among the Orthodox, the Slavs, especially in Kiev and Moscow, utilized their independence of Constantinople and began to develop their own Slav theology (see RUSSIAN THEOLOGY). Greek students migrated to theological universities in the West, especially in Germany, Italy, and England. Their initiation into non-Orthodox theology resulted eventually in grouping into three types of theologian depending upon one or another emphasis: (1) the conservative, rigid followers of early Byzantine theology who would accept no influence from the West and assumed a polemical attitude in the attempt to preserve their traditional Orthodoxy; (2) those who came under the influence of Protestant doctrines and incorporated them into Oriental theology; and finally (3) those who favored Latin theology and strove to introduce Latin concepts and terminology into Orthodoxy.

The abortive attempt made by the Council of Florence (1439) to heal the schism between the Western and Eastern Churches had prepared the ground for fresh, anti-Latin writings. Catholic missionaries entered Orthodox countries intent on proselytizing to bring about unity of faith and practice particularly in the Near East and in the Polish kingdom. The reunion of Brest-Litovsk (1595), which united millions of Orthodox Ukrainians with Rome, further stiffened Greek opposition to Latin theology. From the middle of the 16th century many Byzantine writers who had studied in Italy and Germany manifested interest in Catholic as well as Protestant theology. This development was looked upon with disfavor by the conservative Greek theologians.

Augsburg Confession. Early Protestant leaders, beginning with MELANCHTHON, had sought the friendship of the Orthodox. The Reformers were eager to obtain Greek approval of their AUGSBURG CONFESSION. When Patriarch Joasaph II sent his deacon Demetrius Mysos to Wittenberg to investigate the newly reformed Christianity, Melanchthon gave him a Greek version of the Augsburg Confession, but the patriarch quickly rejected its teaching (1559). In 1573 the professors of the University of Tübingen, through Stephan Gerlach, tried to obtain approval for their doctrines from Jeremias II. Three documents sent by way of response, in 1578, 1579, and 1581, completely rejected the Lutheran Confession. These were the first Greek writings to sound the alarm at Protestant infiltration.

The principal author of these responses was Patriarch Jeremias, but others collaborated, such as Joannes and Theodosius Zygomalas, Leonarus Mindonios, Damascene the Studite, and probably Gabriel Severus. The Council of TRENT's doctrine was upheld in the Orthodox presentation of their teaching on justification and free will, on the Sacraments, on the invocation of the saints, and on the monastic life. However, with regard to procession of the Holy Spirit, the FILIOQUE doctrine was rejected. In general, the fundamental tenets of the Augsburg Confession were repulsed with an exhortation that the Protestants return to the doctrine of the Church Fathers and the definitions of the first seven ecumenical councils.

Meletius Pigas. Catholic influence is seen more in the Orthodox theologians after Jeremias, who remained up to his death strongly anti-Catholic and attacked the Roman authorities for their forceful tactics in bringing about the union of Brest. But many of the Greek theologians who had studied at the University of Padua openly accepted Catholic teachings. The first Greek theologian of note to study in Italy was Meletius Pigas (1601). He was born on the island of Crete, and after completing his studies at Padua he took the monastic habit and began to preach and teach. He was made patriarch of Alexandria in 1590.

After the union of Brest Pigas turned from his earlier Catholic sympathies and began to write sharply against Roman teaching. "Concerning the Primacy of the Pope in the Form of Letters" was his first polemical attack. Three of these letters were sent to the Ukrainians living in the Polish kingdom, urging them to repudiate the union of Brest, while the fourth was directed to the Orthodox faithful on the island of Chios where there was a similar movement in favor of reunion with Rome. Little originality is shown by Pigas, who repeated the standard objections of his Byzantine predecessors against the primacy of the pope, filioque, Communion under one species, purgatory, fasting on Saturday, and use of unleavened bread. His main theological works are "The Orthodox Christian," a long discussion on the procession of the Holy Spirit, Penance, and purgatory (published at Vilna in 1596 and later at Jassy, Rumania, 1769), and "Concerning the True Catholic Church and Its Genuine and True Head and Concerning the Primacy of the Pope of Rome" (1585). His archdeacon Maximus of Peloponnesus followed in his footsteps leaving among his other anti-Latin writings an "Enchiridion against the Schism of the Papists" in which, like Pigas, he attacked the doctrine of the primacy, procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son, and the use of unleavened bread. But both Pigas and Maximus follow the Catholic position in presenting the Sacraments.

Two other alumni of Padua University were Maximus Marguinos (1602) and Gabriel Severus (1616). Maximus had disputed with Gabriel Severus at Venice in favor of the Catholic doctrine expressed in the word filioque. He presented his arguments in three treatises, which he sent to the Patriarch Jeremias II in 1683, and staunchly supported Jeremias II against Protestant influences in Orthodoxy. Gabriel Severus, Metropolitan of Philadelphia, spent most of his writing career in Venice where he was in charge of the Greek Orthodox church of St. George. In his "Brief Tract on the Holy Sacraments" (Venice 1600) he used terminology borrowed chiefly from the Latin scholastics to describe the theology of the Sacraments in a refutation of the doctrines of the Protestants.

Second Period: 1612 to 1723. The 17th century was a period of controversy both within the Greek Orthodox Church itself and on the part of Catholics and Protestants who fought to draw the Orthodox to themselves. The Protestants seemed to have had the first success in attracting Cyril Lucaris to Calvinistic doctrines, which he expressed in his Confession of 1629; but soon both Russian and Byzantine theologians reacted strongly, and, in various synods and confessions of faith, the Orthodox rejected Protestant errors.

Cyril Lucaris. Of the theologians sympathetic to Protestantism, Cyril Lucaris was the most influential. Born in 1572 on the island of Crete, Cyril studied at Padua and Venice where he became proficient in Latin and Italian. Meletius Pigas in 1584 sent him to the Ukraine where he took part in the Council of Brest. He became patriarch of Alexandria in 1601 and held this office until 1620. In various letters to Calvinists he showed his sympathy toward their doctrine, especially in the matter of the Eucharist, free will, and justification. He was elected patriarch of Constantinople in 1620, a dignity he held on and off six different times, until, by order of the Turkish ruler, he was drowned in the sea.

In violation of the traditional teaching of the Orthodox Church, his Confession (1629, augmented 1633) accepts Calvinistic teaching: Holy Scripture is the only rule of faith (art. 2); justification comes by faith alone (art. 13); free will is abolished (art. 14); predestination is presented according to the teaching of Calvin (art. 3); consequently a false concept of the Church is taught (art. 11). He admitted only two Sacraments, Baptism and Eucharist, and believed that Christ is present only at the time of Holy Communion (arts. 15, 17). He rejected purgatory (art. 18), the cult of images (q. 4), and the deuterocanonical books of the Old Testament (q. 3). Some Orthodox, such as Chrysostomos Papadopoulos, claimed that Cyril was not the author of the Confession. But his correspondence with Calvinist theologians demonstrates his sympathies toward their doctrines, and an extant autographed codex leaves little doubt that Cyril Lucaris was its author.

Lucaris gave the impetus to other Orthodox theologians who openly proclaimed their Protestant teachings. Theophilus Corydalleos, Zacharias Gerganos, Joannes Caryophyllos, Maximus Callipolita, and METROPHANES CRITOPoulos all followed this example. Critopoulos was a pupil of Lucaris, who sent him to universities in England, Germany, and Switzerland. In his travels he strove to bring about a union of Orthodox and Protestants. On his return to Greece he was created patriarch of Alexandria and abstained from manifesting Protestant tendencies. He even took part in the Synod of Jassy (1642), which condemned the Confession of Lucaris. His adherence to Protestantism is clear, however, from his Confession of Faith of the Catholic and Apostolic Oriental Church, composed in Helmstadt in 1624 but printed only in 1661. There has been much discussion about the Confession. A. Palmieri maintains that it is a clear expression of Lutheran faith; others, with I. Mihalcescu, concede that in some points Critopoulos deviated from common Orthodox opinion. Finally there are those who hold it as one of the chief symbols of Orthodox faith and quite genuinely in keeping with the Byzantine theological tradition.

A synod held in 1925 on Mt. Athos vindicated Critopoulos and his Confession. Yet an influence from Protestant theology cannot be denied, e.g., in his definition of the Church, in his treatment of the Sacraments, in his accepting only three (Baptism, Eucharist, and Penance), and in his rejection of the deuterocanonical books. Critopoulos's Confession is valued highly by contemporary Greek theologians who accept his Protestant opinions and his arguments against Roman Catholicism concerning the filioque, the Immaculate Conception, and the Roman primacy. They favor the mystical concept of the Church, which is derived mostly from Protestant sources.

Polemicians. A chief characteristic of Greek theology in the 17th century was the role played by polemical writings against both Catholics and Protestants. Meletius Syrigos (d. 1667) had studied both at Padua and Venice and was commissioned by Parthenios I, Patriarch of Constantinople, to correct the Confession of Peter MOGHILA and translate it into modern Greek. It was his corrected version that was accepted as a confession of faith for all the Orthodox in the Council of Jassy (Romania) in 1642. Moghila had protested the changes made in his original Latin text by Syrigos, and the Greek text was not edited until 1667, after the death of Moghila. D. Balanos claims that the original Confession of Moghila was a compendium of the Catholic Catechism of St. Peter CANISIUS. But Syrigos removed most of the Tridentine doctrine found in the original text and brought it into closer harmony with the Greek thinking of his day. His chief theological work was a polemical monograph against Calvinist doctrine: Orthodox Refutation of the Chapters and Questions of the Confession of Cyril Lukaris. Except for the chapter concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit, most of this work is consonant with Catholic theology. Both Greek and Latin Fathers as well as Scripture are quoted frequently.

Dositheus of Jerusalem. Syrigos was employed by Dositheus, Patriarch of Jerusalem (d. 1707), one of the leading Byzantine figures in the polemics against non-Orthodox groups. His own Confession proved of great importance in checking Protestant infiltration into Orthodoxy when it was accepted at a synod in Jerusalem (1672) by all the Orthodox patriarchs. More intent on fighting Calvinistic errors than Latin Catholicism, Dositheus demonstrated his dependence on Latin theology, not only in the opinions expressed but even in terminology, particularly in the theology of the Sacraments where words never before used by Byzantine theologians, such as confirmation, satisfaction, and transubstantiation, were introduced into Greek theology. As expressed in the Confession, his doctrine on free will and predestination (decrees 3, 14), on justification and good works (decree 13), and on the seven Sacraments (decree 15) is in perfect harmony with the teaching of the Council of Trent. He did not use the word purgatory, yet he holds a third state between heaven and hell that would correspond to Catholic teaching on purgatory. Dositheus is the author of An Enchiridion against the Errors of Calvinism (Bucharest 1690); he established a printing press at Jassy, Rumania, to spread the polemical works of both earlier and contemporary Byzantine writers against Calvinism and the Roman Church.

Other theologians include George Coressios (d. 1641), who studied medicine in Pisa and returned to Greece to write polemical tracts against both the Protestants and the Catholics; and Paisy Ligarides (d. 1678), who embraced Catholicism as a boy in Rome but later left the Church to become a sharp controversialist against Protestant and Catholic theological doctrine. Nectar, Patriarch of Jerusalem (d. 1676), wrote a tract Concerning the Primacy of the Pope, which Dositheus printed at Jassy. The two Lichudes brothers, Joannes (d. 1717) and Sophronius (d. 1730), both studied in Venice and Padua. Dositheus sent them as instructors to the seminary of Moscow where they wrote polemical tracts attacking the theological school of Kiev for its Catholic tendencies. Sevastus Kymenites (d. 1702), Elias Meniates (d. 1714), and Nicolaus Kerameos (d. 1672) must also be listed among the polemicists of this period.

Catholic Sympathizers. Amidst so many Greek theologians dedicated to polemics, a few with Catholic sympathies wrote works that never became popular. Agapius Landos, with his ascetical writings printed at Venice, was the most esteemed of this group. Among his writings are: Salvation of Sinners and New Paradise (lives of the saints taken from Symeon Metaphrastes), and Eklogion and New Eklogion (more selected lives of the saints). Gregorius of Chios published a compendium of the Divine and Sacred Dogmas of the Church (Venice 1635). Nicolaus Kursulas (d. 1652), an alumnus of St. Athanasius Greek College founded in Rome by Pope Gregory XIII to bring about concord between the West and East, wrote a Synopsis of Sacred Theology using the scholastic method and permeated by a Catholic mentality. Nicolaus the Bulgar studied in Padua and edited his Sacred Catechism (Venice 1681), which has been used by more recent Greeks in an effort to correct errors in later Orthodox speculation.

Two outstanding Byzantinists, also alumni of St. Athanasius College, Rome, were Peter Arcudius (d. 1633) and Leo Allatius (d. 1669), who held various offices in the Vatican and used their Oriental background in the service of the Church. Arcudius was mainly responsible for effecting the union of Brest while Allatius collected innumerable Greek and Syrian manuscripts under Pope Gregory XV, thus preserving in the Vatican Library an important Eastern heritage that otherwise would have been lost.

Third Period: 1723 to 1833. The nadir of modern Greek theology, the period from 1723 to 1833 was typified by an increase in theological compendia, polemical writings against Roman Catholics, and synopses of Byzantine spirituality. In the 18th century many Christians of the Antiochene patriarchate united with Rome and constituted the Melkite Greek Catholic Church. Hatred against Catholics mounted. In 1755 the Ecumenical Patriarch Cyril V declared Baptism by infusion, as administered by the Latins, invalid. The chief theologian of the period was Eugenius the Bulgar, even though he showed no great talent. His main writing, a theological compendium called Theologikon, was printed in Venice in 1872. Other authors who collected the past theological traditions into compendia were Vincent Damodos (d. 1752), Antonius Moschopoulos (d. 1788), Joannes Kontones (d. 1761), and Theophilus Papaphilos (d. c. 1785).

The chief compiler of Byzantine spiritual writings was Nicodemus, the Hagiorite of Mr. Athos (d. 1809). Together with Agapius Leonardos he compiled The Pedalion (Rudder), which today is the most famous Byzantine collection of commonly accepted (in the Greek-Slavic Churches) canons from ancient ecumenical or local councils. The two authors also provided commentaries on the canons. But Nicodemus is more popularly known as the editor of the Philokalia, a five-volume collection of ascetical writings, drawn mostly from the spiritual writers of the Hesychastic tradition. This was first printed in Venice in 1782; a third edition was printed in Athens in 1957.

Fourth Period: 1833 to 1923. There followed a period chiefly of eclecticism. Political freedom had been won in 1833, and the Greeks were able to form their own nation. This brought them freedom to have their own universities and faculties of theology. The University of Athens' theology faculty was founded in 1837. Theology in the other Orthodox patriarchates of Antioch and Alexandria was practically nonexistent, due again to Muslim oppression. The theology that did develop in the newly liberated Greece was not very original but came under the influence of three principal sources: some theologians favored positions held by Protestant theologians; others, those of Catholics; while a third group became followers of the more creative Russian theologians, especially of the Khomiakovian school. Thus their eclecticism brought about many diverging opinions. Meanwhile, from 1867 onward, many sought reunion with the Anglicans.

Count Protasov. In 1833 Greece won autocephaly for its own Church and took as its model the independent Church in Russia. Protestantism had been spreading, but, recognizing the possibility of having its own theology schools, the Greek Church, like the Russian Church under Count Protasov, the procurator of the Holy Synod of Moscow, began to react against the infiltration of Protestant thinking in Orthodox theology. In 1836 Patriarch Gregorios VI of Constantinople issued an encyclical in which he condemned the errors of Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, and followers. The Greek Orthodox faithful were forbidden to read Protestant books and, above all, to read the Protestant versions of the Holy Scripture.

Encyclical of the Four Patriarchs. A document that exacerbated relations with the Catholics was the Encyclical of the Four Patriarchs of 1848. On Jan. 6, 1848, PIUS IX in his encyclical In Suprema Petri Apostoli Sede had addressed himself to the Orientals, inviting them to reunion with the Roman Church. In May 1848 the four chief Greek-speaking Orthodox patriarchs, Anthimus VI of Constantinople, Hierotheus II of Alexandria, Methodius of Antioch, and Cyril II of Jerusalem, along with 29 metropolitans, signed the Encyclical of the Four Patriarchs. The author of this document was Constantius I, Patriarch of Constantinople, who several years before (1834) had written an anti-Latin document as M. Popescu has shown. The contents of this encyclical summarized all the main points of the polemical literature of the prior centuries. Papism is claimed as a heresy that embraces several errors: that expressed by the word filioque; Baptism by aspersion; the defect of an epiclesis; Communion under one species; and the use of unleavened bread. The chief difficulty was the confusion of religious with civil power, which the Roman pontiffs abused by imposing an intolerable yoke on others. Thus the encyclical appeared more as a violent diatribe against the Roman pontiff than an answer to Pius IX.

Another document that became the source of authority for polemical writers of the period was the Encyclical of Anthimus VII. Pope Leo XIII, who was respected by many Orthodox for his zeal in promoting unity, sent to the Orientals his encyclical Praeclara gratulationis (June 20, 1894). Anthimus VII, Patriarch of Constantinople, answered at the end of 1894 with a long list of denunciations against the innovations of Latin Catholics. The list repeated the charges of the former 1848 Orthodoxy encyclical and added an attack on the idea of the fire of purgatory, immediate retribution, the newly defined dogma of the Immaculate Conception (1854), and that of the primacy of the pope and his infallibility, which had been declared dogma in the Vatican Council of 1870.

Theological Compendia. Russian theologians at this time excelled in theological manuals, and many of these were translated into Greek and used by the Greek Faculties. Popular Russian compendia that had great use in Greece included that of Antony Amphiteatrov, rector of the Academy of Kiev, Dogmatic Theology of the Eastern Catholic Church (Kiev 1848), and that of Macarius Bulgakov, Introduction to Orthodox Theology (St. Petersburg 1847). It was not long, however, before the Greek theologians were producing their own compendia. Nicolaus Damalas, Zikos Rhosis, Crestos Andrusos, K. J. Dyovuniotis, D. S. Balanos, I. Mesoloras, Nectarios Kephala, and Nicolaus Ambrazis all made useful compendia for use in Greek-speaking seminaries.

Meanwhile, during this period internecine controversies arose among the Greeks concerning the relation of the newly liberated Church and State in Greece and the primacy of the patriarch of Constantinople in ruling this Church. The Greek Orthodox divided into two factions: those, led by Theoclitus Pharmakides (d. 1860), who favored full ecclesiastical autonomy and autocephaly rendering the Church subject to the State in all that pertained to external administration and jurisdiction; the others, led by Constantinus Economos (d. 1857), who favored complete independence of the State and submission in all Church jurisdiction to the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople. These two factions quarreled among themselves concerning the use of Protestant Bibles. In 1823 Protestant Bible societies began to disseminate Bibles printed in the modern Greek tongue. Pharmakides and Neophyte Vamvas (d. 1855) upheld the usefulness of these versions, while Economos argued theologically that the Protestant translations from the Hebrew had many discrepancies from that of the Septuagint, which alone he held to be infallible.

Theosevia. A new religion appeared in Greece about this time, a mystical rationalism promulgated by Theophilus Kairis (d. 1853). It was a type of the Modernism later condemned in the West by Pius X. The Synod of Greece condemned this so-called Theosevia religion as heretical, and Kairis was expelled in 1841. He returned only to be imprisoned by the state and soon died.

Theological journals began to appear as a greater spirit of creative speculation awoke among the Greek theologians. The Constantinople patriarchate published Ekklesiastike Aletheia ("Church Truth"), which was suppressed in 1923 when the majority of Greeks emigrated from Turkey. It was replaced by Orthodoxia in 1925 and Apostolos Andreas, the latter being the official voice of the ecumenical patriarch; but it printed theological articles also. Both of these periodicals were suppressed in 1964 by the Turkish government. Holy Cross Seminary in Jerusalem prints Nea Sion; the former Ekklesiastikos Pharos by the Alexandrian Patriarchate has been replaced by Pantaïos.

Fifth Period: 1923 to the Ecumenical Movement.

The modern era witnessed a renaissance in Greek theology. Under the inspiration of two leading archbishops of Athens, Meletius Mataxakis and Papadopoulos, theological studies and learning among the clergy and laity were fostered. Yet much of this modern Greek theological literature displays certain common defects. The majority of the older professors studied abroad, particularly in Germany. They mastered the critical techniques of the German schools of theology of the latter part of the 19th century, but because of nationalistic circumstances they had little contact with the more relevant theology developed in the 20th century among the Russian Orthodox émigrés and the Western Catholic world. They produced a theology almost wholly academic, confined to manuals and bearing little relation either to the spiritual contemporary world or to the patristic tradition of the past.

Contemporary Development. Paradoxically, in the 1950s and early 1960s the professors of the two leading theological faculties in Greece were almost exclusively laymen. They included Chrestos Androutsos, P. N. Trembelas, P. I. Bratsiotis, A. Alivisatos, B. Vellas, I. N. Karmiris, B. Joannides, C. Bonis, G. Konidaris, and Archimandrite Jerome Kotsonis, all of whom taught in the theological faculties of the universities of Athens and Salonika, and produced many serious theological writings.

A suspicion grew among the monks and pastors of souls as well as among the members of new movements such as Zoe (Life), Aktines (Action), and the two Apostoliki Diakonia (Apostolic Services) of Athens and Salonika, that this academic theology was irrelevant for confronting the materialism of modern Greece. A gradual change became noticeable among these Greek theologians, especially with the impetus received from the Zoe movement, also known as the "Brotherhood of Theologians." This was started by Father Eusebius Mathopoulos in 1907 as a semimonastic order whose members remain celibate but take no formal vows. A quarter of the brothers are monks, the rest are laymen. Through their teaching of theology in the two faculties of Greece and in their innumerable printed works, they are making theology less academic and more Biblical, liturgical, and relevant for modern men in a rapidly changing society.

Ecumenical Interests. Active participation in the various ecumenical discussions launched throughout Europe in the 20th century, especially in the World Council of Churches from the very first assembly of 1948 in Amsterdam, brought closer contact with Protestants and Roman Catholics. Greek theologians sought to emerge from the national narrowness in an attempt to understand forms of Christianity other than their own. The late 20th century witnessed in Greek theology a flexible approach to theology, a return to the Bible, the Eastern liturgies, and the writings of the early Fathers. The new Greek theology aimed for relevance to the modern Christian developments.

Bibliography: C. ANDROUTSOS, Dogmatic Theology of the Orthodox Eastern Church (2d ed. Athens 1956), in Greek. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959). P. I. BRATSIOTIS, "Greek Theology in the Last 50 Years," Theologia 19 (1941–48) 83–112, 271–86, in Greek; ed., Die orthodoxe Kirche in griechischer Sicht, 2 v. (Stuttgart 1959–60). F. GAVIN, Some Aspects of Contemporary Greek Thought (Milwaukee 1923). M. JUGIE, Theologia dogmatica christianorum orientalium ab ecclesia catholica dissidentium, 5 v. (Paris 1926–35) v.1. E. S. KIMMEL, Monumenta fidei ecclesiae orientalis, 2 v. (Jena 1850). K. KRUMBACHER, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur (Munich 1890; 2d ed. 1897). A. PALMIERI, Theologia dogmatica orthodoxa, 2 v. (Florence 1911–13). D. SAVRAMIS, ed., Aus der neugriechischen Theologie (Das östliche Christentum, Neue Folge 15; Würzburg 1961).

[G. A. MALONEY]

GREEN, HUGH, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Ferdinand Brooke; b. London, England, c. 1584; d. hanged at Tyburn (London), Aug. 19 (or 28?), 1588. Hugh, son of Protestant gentry, took his degree at Peterhouse, Cambridge (1605), and was converted to Catholicism while a student at Gray's Inn. Thereafter he undertook seminary studies at the English College, Douai (1610–12). Following his ordination (1612) he tested a religious vocation as a Capuchin, but left for reasons unknown. Instead he became chaplain to Lady Arundel of Lanherne at Chideock Castle, Dorsetshire. Although he attempted to comply with Charles I's banishment of priests (March 8, 1641), he was late in embarking for the Continent. He was arrested, tried, and condemned in August. He had a profound effect on fellow prisoners, who sought his absolution before mounting the gallows. Green made a public confession of his sins and was absolved by a disguised Jesuit. Contemporary descriptions expound on the barbarity of his execution. The disembowelment took one-half hour, then witnesses played football with his severed head. Fr. Green was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), II, 113. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GREENE, GRAHAM

Novelist; b. Berkhamsted, England, Oct. 2, 1904; d. Vevey, Switzerland, April 3, 1991.

After completing public school Greene was sent to Balliol College at Oxford in 1922, where he studied modern history. In 1925, he began a career in journalism, first with the Nottingham Journal for six months and then as subeditor with the Times of London, where he stayed until 1930. His efforts at getting published were ineffectual until his third novel, The Man Within (1929), which proved a success with both readers and critics.

Among Greene's early successes were Stamboul Train (1932; American title, Orient Express), A Gun for Sale (1936; American title, This Gun for Hire), and The Confidential Agent (1939). During this early period Greene experienced two important changes: his conversion to Roman Catholicism and his marriage. The events were linked by the fact that his future wife, Vivien Dayrell-Browning, was Catholic. He took instructions from Father Trollope at the cathedral in Nottingham and was accepted into the Church in 1926. The next year he married Vivien, and from that marriage came a daughter, Lucy Caroline (m. Bourget), and a son, Francis. By the close of 1939, however, the marriage had begun to disintegrate, and after the war Greene and his wife separated permanently.

The publication and reception of Brighton Rock in 1938 pointed the way toward Greene's strengthening grip on stories that brought issues of faith and politics to bear on each other. Brighton Rock was followed by The Power and the Glory (1940), The Heart of the Matter (1948), and The End of the Affair (1951). In each of these novels Greene depicts a character whose actions and beliefs force the reader to question the nature of the life of faith, of the ways in which saint and sinner are two halves of one being, and the difficulties that lie in the way of defining goodness and evil in conventional moral terms. In Brighton Rock that character is the malevolent teenage hoodlum Pinkie; in The Power and the Glory, the deeply flawed but committed whisky priest; in The Heart of the

Graham Greene. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Matter, the excruciatingly conscientious Major Scobie; and in The End of the Affair, the emotionally trapped and burdened Sarah Miles. In these protagonists and in others in his later fiction Greene created personalities that speak to readers of all faiths about abiding issues of religious belief and commitment.

During World War II Greene was an air-raid warden and later an agent in MI6, the counterintelligence arm of the British Secret Service. From 1941 to 1943 he served in Freetown, Sierra Leone, and from 1943 to 1944 he served in London in the Iberian section under the notorious Kim Philby. Greene remained a friend and staunch defender of Philby after the latter's defection to the Soviet Union in 1963. Greene's career in intelligence came to an end in 1944, but his fascination with it found voice in several novels, most notably The Ministry of Fear (1943), The Third Man (1950), The Quiet American (1955), Our Man in Havana (1958), and The Human Factor (1966).

In the 1950s and 1960s Greene continued to produce novels and short stories, plays, children's books, and essays. He also wrote two remarkable film scripts (The Third Man and The Fallen Idol), and accounts of journeys to areas of political and social crisis, such as Malaya, Kenya, Indochina, Haiti, Cuba, and the Congo. He reported on events for Life, Paris-Match, the Sunday Times, Le Figaro, and the Sunday Telegraph, and conducted a soberer but no less distinguished career as a director of the publishing firm the Bodley Head. His retirement from the business side of publishing came in 1968, but his writing career continued unabated until 1985, when he experienced a waning of his writing powers. Most of his last years were spent in residence in a small flat in Antibes, France, writing and giving occasional interviews. To the time of his death from complications caused by a blood disease at age 86, Greene remained a dedicated writer, producing late in life one of his finest books, The Honorary Consul (1973), in which he blends his usual concerns with both politics and religion in a tale of terrorism. Greene considered it his best work, though many readers continue to prefer the earlier novels of faith and disillusionment.

Although Greene came to detest the epithet "Catholic novelist," it is difficult not to think of him as one of the preeminent Catholic novelists of the twentieth century. Like his fellow authors Georges Bernanos, Ignazio Silone, and François Mauriac, Greene brought issues of faith and creed to bear powerfully on the lives of his characters. In his writings he raised important questions about the nature of evil, of God, of sin, and the relationship between conventional moral imperatives and the deeper, more profound question of the reality of evil. Although his fictional techniques strike many critics today as conventional and "high modern," it is no secret that his works continue to draw large readerships and to increase yearly in stature.

Bibliography: J. ADAMSON, Graham Greene and Cinema (Norman, OK 1984). M.F. ALLAIN, The Other Man: Conversations with Graham Greene, G. WALDEMAN, trans. (New York 1983); originally published in French as L'autre et son double (Paris 1981). M. COUTO, Graham Greene: On the Frontier (New York 1988). A. A. DEVITIS, Graham Greene (rev. ed.; Boston 1986). S. HYNES, ed., Graham Greene: A Collection of Critical Essays (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1973). R. H. MILLER, Understanding Graham Greene (Columbia, SC 1990). R. SHARROCK, Saints, Sinners, and Comedians: The Novels of Graham Greene (Notre Dame, IN 1984). N. SHERRY, The Life of Graham Greene, Vol. I (London and New York 1989). P. STRATFORD, Faith and Fiction: Creative Process in Greene and Mauriac (Notre Dame 1964).

[R. H. MILLER]

GRÉGOIRE, HENRI BAPTISTE

French Constitutional bishop; b. Vého, near Lunéville (Meurthe-et-Moselle), Dec. 4, 1750; d. Paris, May 28, 1831. He was the son of a poor tailor. After his ordination (1775), he was a teacher at Pont-à-Mousson, a curate at Marimont, and in 1782 a pastor at Embermenil.

Grégoire was at once a Jansenist and an admirer of the Enlightenment, who was distinguished by his tolerance and by his campaign in favor of the Jews. His election as representative of the clergy to the Estates-General in 1789 started his political career. In the Estates-General his aversion for the aristocracy led him to oppose the nobles among the bishops. He was one of the first clerical deputies to rally to the third estate, and he participated in the Oath of the Tennis Court. In the Constituent Assembly Grégoire campaigned for the liberation of Negroes and pronounced in favor of the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY. He opposed putting a limitation on the authority of the pope or on that of the bishops. After taking the oath to support the Civil Constitution, he was elected constitutional bishop of Blois, and was consecrated by Jean GOBEL (March 13, 1791). He scarcely ever resided in his diocese, except during the Legislative Assembly (1791–92), from which members of the Constituent Assembly were excluded. Grégoire was a member of all the remaining assemblies during the FRENCH REVOLUTION, with which he wished to reconcile the Church in order to save religion. When he was summoned in 1793 to abdicate his ecclesiastical functions, he imperiled his life by his refusal to do so. Even during the Terror he retained his episcopal costume. In the National Convention he was prominent especially on the Committee of Public Instruction, where he contributed to the foundation of the Academy of Arts and Crafts, the Central Astronomical Office, and the Institute of France. Also, he helped save from vandalism the treasures of religious art. A mission to Savoy saved him from voting on the execution of Louis XVI. After Thermidor, Grégoire defended religious liberty in the National Convention, and labored to restore the Constitutional Church, of which he became the effective head. He animated the two synods of this Church in 1797 and 1801.

During the Directory he was a member of the Five Hundred; and during the Consulate and Empire he was a member of the Legislature and then of the Senate. Grégoire opposed the Napoleonic regime and the CONCORDAT OF 1801. In the Senate he spoke in 1804 against the establishment of the Empire; and in 1814 he proposed that the Senate vote for Napoleon's deposition. Grégoire showed himself no less indomitable toward the Bourbons after the restoration. He was elected a deputy from Isère in 1819, but was excluded from the Chamber.

Grégoire resigned as bishop of Blois in 1802, but remained faithful to the Constitutional Church. He was responsible for the continuance of contacts between former Constitutional bishops and priests, and maintained an active correspondence with them and with the Jansenist Church of Utrecht. When Pius VII came to Paris in 1804 for Napoleon's coronation, Grégoire refused to approach him. Repeatedly he declined to retract his oath to the Civil Constitution. Despite the pleas of Archbishop de Quelen of Paris, the “patriarch of the Gallican Church” died unreconciled with the Holy See. Although the Archbishop forbade it, Abbé Guillon, the Queen’s chaplain, administered to Grégoire the Last Rites. De Quelen also prohibited religious ceremonies at the funeral, but they were celebrated in the Abbaye-au-bois, Paris, by order of King Louis Philippe. Grégoire’s theology was doubtfully sound and his outlook was somewhat confused, but his disinterestedness and his dignified priestly life deserve some recognition. Most of his numerous publications were polemical. His Histoire des confesseurs des empereurs, des rois, et d’autres princes and Histoire des sectes religieuses were placed on the Index (1827, 1828).

Bibliography: A. POUGET, Les idées religieuses et réformatrices de l’évêque constitutionnel Grégoire (Paris 1905). J. TILD, L’Abbé Grégoire d’après ses mémoires (Paris 1946). P. F. J. GRÜNEBAUM-BALLIN, Henri Grégoire, l’ami des hommes des toutes les couleurs, 1789–1831 (Paris 1948). P. PISANI, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1854–63. J. A. G. TANS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1177.

[J. LEFLON]

GREGORIAN CHANT

The revival of monasticism in the 19th century by Dom P. GUERANGER of SOLESMES ABBEY and the concomitant revival in liturgical studies brought about a renewed interest in the history of Gregorian chant. This chant was seen as belonging to the golden age of the formation of Roman liturgy and thus as holding priority of place in the history of sacred music. Although terms such as plainsong or plainchant (cantus planus, unmeasured chant, in contradistinction to cantus mensuratus or rhythmically organized song) also are used, Gregorian chant has become the most popular term because it can be easily differentiated from AMBROSIAN, MOZARABIC, GALLICAN, and BYZANTINE chant. Gregorian chant was first written down in the 9th century and has continued in unbroken use in the Roman rite to the present day. In each period of music history it has been influenced by the contemporary musical idiom, and constant attempts to find out what its original character was like have been made during the centuries. Present scholarship has unearthed many problems that remain unsolved. More important historical perspectives have been opened up by: M. Huglo, H. Huckle, J. Handschin, B. Stäblein, D. Levy, D. Hughes and J. McKinnon. Valuable contributions have been made by E. Wellesz, Dom L. Brou, and O. Strunk on the relationship between Gregorian chant and other

Illumination of the nativity annotated in Gregorian chant, from Pius II Book of Psalms, Orvieto Cathedral, Bethlehem. (©David Lees/CORBIS)

Eastern and Western chants. Scholars such as E. Jammers, J. Vollaerts, S. Corbin, and H. Husmann have probed specific areas such as paleography, rhythm, rhymed Offices, drama, Sequence, and trope. Work on the medieval theorists has not ceased, and valuable re-editing and interpreting of texts has been done by J. Smits van Waesberghe, H. Oesch, and H. Hüschen. A most comprehensive and complete study on Gregorian chant, bringing together all of the information thus far arrived at by scholars and offering a balanced judgment on recent theories, was made by Willi Apel (Gregorian Chant, Bloomington, Indiana 1958). This present brief survey of mid-20th-century scholarship indicates the renewed interest in the field and the areas that are the subject of most concern.

Problem of Origin. General histories of music had too easily assumed that Gregorian chant dates back to at least the 6th century and was put in its present form by Pope Gregory the Great (590 to 604). Although this theory was often seriously challenged (see F. Gevaert, Les Origines du chant liturgique de l'église latine, Ghent 1890), it persisted in vogue, carried along by centuries of tradition. It must, however, be recalled that the first manuscripts containing Gregorian chant came from the 9th century from the Frankish empire. Many of these manuscripts, especially the Graduales, contain a famous introductory trope, Gregorius praesul. It is a kind of Carolingian publicity technique to advertise the fact that the new chants were in the Roman style, the cantilena romana. It cannot be proved that Gregory the Great is the Gregory here alluded to, and the possibility that it refers to Gregory II (715 to 731) must also be considered. Even if one accepts the assumption that Gregory the Great is referred to, it remains dubious how much of the music that is first written down in the 9th century goes back to Gregory's time in an oral tradition.

Gregory's Role. What can be said with certitude concerning the activity of Gregory the Great is that he sought to bring order into the liturgical texts by compiling from various sources the antiphonarius cento. This could not have been done without reference to the music accompanying the texts, but about this nothing is known. His concern for music can be seen also in the founding of monastic groups to serve the basilicas and in the impetus he gave to the SCHOLA CANTORUM. The general principles of music-making that lead to Gregorian chant and especially the principles of formulae that form its psalmodic structure must have existed in his day, but there is no way of proving that any given piece of Gregorian chant goes back to that date. In the lists of popes in the Liber pontificalis, other pontiffs also are included as contributing to the history of the annual liturgical cycle (annalis cantus omnis), but the lack of accurate musical examples from the period makes it impossible to assess the contribution of any particular individual to the formation of the chant corpus.

The Role of Rome. The problem of the origin of Gregorian chant is complicated by the difficulty of ascertaining the nature of chant at the Roman basilicas until the 11th century. It can be accurately documented that Roman chant from the 11th to the 13th century was not the same as Gregorian chant. Five manuscripts dating from that time contain a tradition that is unique. They are: Vat. lat. 5319, a Graduale from the last quarter of the 11th century; a Graduale dated 1071 and written for Santa Cecilia in Trastevere, now in the M. Bodner collection, Cologny-Genève, Switzerland; Vat. Bas. F22, a Graduale from the first half of the 13th century; Vat. Bas. B79, an antiphony, 12th century; and British Museum, Add. 29, 988, an antiphony from the 12th century. The theory that the tradition contained in these manuscripts dates back to the Carolingian period and beyond and is thus the "Old-Roman" repertoire has had strong support among scholars ever since the theory was seriously proposed by Bruno Stäblein (see Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. Blume, 2:1265–1303). In general, Old-Roman chant is more ornate than Gregorian chant, but the melodic contours and formulae are too close to deny some original relationship between the two. That the Gregorian was simply derivative from the Old Roman without other influences seems impossible. It is also impossible to assert that the Old-Roman is simply an ornamented version of the Gregorian. Other solutions proposed make both chants of Roman origin, the Gregorian being the "monastic" practice that was carried northward by the monks into England and France. Such a solution does not explain the relationship between the two chants, however. The best solution still seems to be that proposed by M. Huglo and arrived at also by W. Apel, that the Old-Roman version comes closest to the Roman practice at the time of Charlemagne and that it combined with the Gallican usage to give birth during the 8th century to the version now called Gregorian. The testimony of Amalarius of Metz (early 9th century) certainly supports this view. The role of Gregory in the formation of the Old-Roman repertoire remains just as dubious. A solution to the problem, without the unexpected discovery of yet-unknown documents containing the Old-Roman version and dated before the 11th century, will have to rely on internal evidence and comparative studies not yet completed.

Repertoire. When Gregorian chant was first written down in the 9th century, the type of notation employed merely indicated the direction the melody was to take, up or down, without accurate pitch differences. Until that time the repertoire had to be retained by memory without such an aid. It is remarkable, nevertheless, that the oral tradition, written down almost simultaneously throughout the vast area of present-day France, Germany, and Italy, showed such great uniformity. The retention of this repertoire by memory must have been an ever-increasing burden to the choirmaster, and the necessity of teaching it to the monks and succeeding cantors gave added impetus to the search for a system of notation. The repertoire for Mass and Office at the beginning of the 9th century must have comprised well over 2,000 pieces. These pieces were not all different one from another, and the early cantors and chant theorists exploited such similarities in inventing didactic processes.

The Recitative and Psalmody. Since the texts for most of the liturgical services are taken from the Old and New Testaments, musical systems for their proclamation had to be devised that could be altered to suit prose texts of various lengths. Simple formulas for the Old Testament reading, the Epistle and Gospel at Mass and for the readings at Matins consisted of a single recitation pitch with variants from the pitch to indicate inner and final pauses in the texts. More solemn tones were devised for the greater solemnities. Special tones were reserved for the lamentations on Good Friday and the reading of the Passion. The tones for the orations of the Mass and the Prefaces followed the same general principles of a recitation tone with cadential figures but respected the nature of the text by having two types of inner cadences. This simple principle served also for the frequent singing of Psalms at Mass and Office, where the antithetical structure of the text was clearly outlined by the musical cadences. There is some indication that the second half of the verse was not always sung on the same pitch as the first and that the text structure was delineated more clearly by a second reciting tone.

Responsorial and Antiphonal Chants. Although Gregorian chant may have arisen out of the recitation system just described, individual pieces—at first derived almost exclusively from the Psalter—became a part of the entire system. The greatest body of these pieces are the antiphons of the Mass and Office. Their counterpart are the responsories. The antiphons may originally have been sung as a kind of refrain after two groups alternated verses of the Psalter; but this practice had disappeared before the 9th century, and the antiphons that are found in Gregorian chant are larger and more elaborate and were sung only before and after the Psalm. At Mass the Introit and Communion were sung in this fashion; at the Office the many Psalms of all the hours had antiphons to be sung with them. The tonary of Regino of Prüm (d. 915) contained 1,235 such Office antiphons. It was evident to the Carolingian cantors that these antiphons could be catalogued according to certain melodic characteristics. From this one can surmise that the preceding oral tradition for the antiphons must have had a kind of repertoire of melodic formulae to which new texts were adapted. These formulae, it can be seen, often have a kind of psalmodic structure to them, consisting of a recitation tone with cadential figures. If such was the primitive state of the music of the antiphons, with the passing of time they tended to become independent pieces in their own right.

In origin the Responsory too consisted of a refrain sung after verses of a Psalm, but this time the verses were sung by a solo cantor. By the time Gregorian chant was written down, this form had lost much of its primitive shape, except that its soloistic nature had tended to make the responsory more elaborate, especially the psalmodic verses. At Mass the Gradual and Alleluia are responsorial in nature. The Offertory seems to have passed from being antiphonal to responsorial in character shortly before the chant repertoire was written down. Even in the responds, especially in the substructure of the elaborate verses, one can see the original psalmodic principle of reciting tone and cadential figures. At Matins the responsory follows the scripture readings as a kind of musical commentary on the Scriptures. Their original improvisational nature had been lost before the 9th century.

Other Pieces. The chant repertory included other specific pieces that were needed to complete the Mass and Office services. Some of these chants may originally have been quite simple in nature, somewhat in the style of a litany, but later developed into full-blown, ornate pieces. This had become true of the Ordinary of the Mass by the late Carolingian period. Elaborate Kyrie's, Gloria's, Sanctus's, and Agnus Dei's can be found in all Graduales and form one of the most complicated groups of the chant repertoire. Only the Ordinary and the Alleluia cycle seem to have remained areas for new compositions after the 9th century. They were the last pieces of the standard repertory to be fixed; the composition of new chant Ordinaries continued even after the high Middle Ages. All of these items were affected by the new forms of the TROPE and SEQUENCE.

Sources. Various claims have been made periodically by scholars that they have found fragments of musical notation that go back to the 8th century. But each of these items, such as the Orationale of Verona, when subjected to closer scrutiny, has been declared as non-musical in nature or as additions by later hands. The first verified fragments are still from the mid-9th century with the first full manuscript from the end of the century. The fragments are usually of isolated pieces that do not belong to the standard repertoire or are newly composed—evidence that these first attempts at mnemonic notation had a practical, didactic purpose. The treatise of Aurelian of Réomé (written about 850) has several passages that imply a knowledge on his part of a primitive notation. Of special interest are the paleofrankish fragments from the end of the 9th century that show a different system from that which became standard throughout the West. A treatise such as Hucbald's De institutione harmonica (written about 900) shows the growing concern on the part of cantors for a more precise notation than that of the mnemonic neumes then in use. (A list of full manuscripts from about 900 can be found in Suñol, Introduction . . . 32.) Not until a century later (about 1000) was the staff invented, and then it required another half century before it was perfected to the point where melodic accuracy could be perfectly ascertained. For this reason chant scholars must search for the pieces of the earlier MSS in later 11th- and 12th-century manuscripts to transcribe with accuracy. In sum, the first manuscripts containing Gregorian chant in an accurate unequivocal melodic notation came from shortly after the year 1000; the repertory can be traced back to 900 in a mnemonic notation, but only in fragments and descriptions before that.

Theorists. In addition to the manuscripts containing the chant repertory, there exist the chant theorists, who furnish invaluable information on the repertory and how it was performed. The first such theorist is Aurelian of Réomé, who wrote his Musica disciplina about 850. A fragment of this treatise has been erroneously attributed to Alcuin. Aurelian in the first eight chapters of his work gives a résumé of the theory of music inherited from the ancient Greeks through Boethius and Cassiodorus. He makes no attempt to reconcile this theory with the chant practice of his day. Boethius in particular was used in the Carolingian schools as the auctoritas in music. From chapters 9 to 20, however, Aurelian makes a first attempt of cataloguing the chant repertory according to the toni. For the first time he speaks of the Byzantine octoechos, or eight modes, and of the manner in which the Psalms sung in these modes are to be joined to the antiphons and responds. Subsequent chant theorists, such as Regino of Prüm (d. 915), Hucbald of St. Armand (d. 930), and Remy of Auxerre (end of 9th century), began the arduous task of trying to combine these two divergent theoretical systems and to use them for an explanation of Gregorian chant. The octoechos became identified for the first time with the eight-mode Boethian system in the treatise De alia musica (late 9th century). It is not until the 11th century that the amalgamation is completed in the treatises of GUIDO OF AREZZO, BERNO OF REICHENAU, and HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS. There is evidence that the inherited Boethian theory had an effect on the chant that may have been altered at times to fit the auctoritas. Boethius continued to be taught as the authority in the schools and universities of the Middle Ages, while Guido became the infallible guide to the cantor.

Gregorian Chant Style. To the 20th-century ear, accustomed to the gigantic sounds of the orchestra of the romanticist period and the striking contrasts of dynamics and timbre inherent in the romanticist style, Gregorian chant seems unemotional and less expressive. To a listener of the Middle Ages, however, this was not true. The Gregorian style was broad in its expressive content, even though more austere than the music of recent centuries. Since it had to accommodate so many prose texts, it ranged from formulalike patterns such as psalms and antiphon types to highly expressive melismatic passages such as the jubilus of the Alleluia. These extremes in the style have often been labeled syllabic and melismatic, or accentus and concentus. Such terms, however, are not synonymous. Syllabic chant refers to those pieces in which each syllable has predominantly one note, seldom more; melismatic chant has expressive vocalises on important syllables. In between these two lie most of the chant pieces. The Sequence, for example, is syllabic; the Alleluia is melismatic. Most of the Intros, Offertories, and Communions lie in between. Accentus refers to the recitative formulas used for orations and readings—the heightened speech patterns, while the concentus refers to true melody. In the latter the laws of music itself have their role.

Chant Rhythm. Perhaps no other aspect of Gregorian chant has been so feverishly debated by scholars as that of the original rhythm of the chant. The following facts are accepted by all: The earliest chant manuscripts (from c. 900) show various ways of writing the same neume and these variants imply rhythmic differences. Many of these manuscripts reinforce this notational difference with letters (called Romanian letters) to signify rhythmic alteration. Other differences in notation involve vocal phenomena (such as the liquescents and the quilisma) that also have rhythmic implications. The basic difference in interpretation of these signs among scholars centers around the length of the altered notes in relationship to a given pulse. Further dispute arises as to the rhythmic organization of the given pulse. It was in answer to this latter question that Dom MOCQUEREAU developed the theory of rhythm, usually called the Solesmes theory, in which the basic pulses are related by groups of two or three and with the unifying factor being called the ictus. This ictus is conceived as the end of rhythmic motion in its fundamental state of movement—repose. Mocquereau attempted to show at great length that this is the natural rhythm of the Latin word, which gave its rhythm to the chant. Such a theory has much merit in dealing with psalms and other pieces belonging to the accentus group; it proves more difficult to maintain in dealing with the concentus. Here the ictus, or rhythmic subdivision, corresponds at times with the end or repose of the Latin word, at times with accent or force (as when it corresponds in larger phrases with the accent of the text), at times with length, or even at times with melodic contour. There is no doubt that Mocquereau's theory grew out of the accentualist or oratorical theory of Dom Pothier, where the textual accent of the Latin word was the organizing principle, and that he broadened the concept so that it could serve also for the melismatic passages. To introduce it into present books, an elaborate system of vertical and horizontal bars was invented.

The Solesmes theory was rejected at the turn of the 19th century by most German scholars who ranked themselves among the mensuralists, i.e., those favoring various time values with accent as the chief unifying factor. The former mensuralist theories of Dechevrens, Peter Wagner, Dom Jeannin, and Bonvin have all but been forgotten. Chief exponents of mensuralism today are E. Jammers and J. Vollaerts, although their theories admit of only two or three time values and are a kind of free rhythm with irregular occurring accents. It can be said that the weakness of the Solesmes theory lies in its historical justification in the nature of the Latin word since it presupposes that this rhythm was established for chant in the 5th and 6th centuries during its formative period, a supposition that is hard to maintain. The historical evidence in favor of the long and short time values comes chiefly from the theorists, and it seems a less forced interpretation of the early neumes and the different ways in which they are written. More recent rhythmic studies by T. Agostoni and E. Cardine are tending to a modification of the Solesmes theory that brings it closer to the interpretation of J. Vollaerts. It is unfortunate that the introduction of polyphony and the tendency to clearer pitch indications in notation saw at the same time a less accurate rhythmic care. The notation in campo aperto, i.e., without lines, and thus mnemonic in character, is less accurate in pitch but more accurate in rhythm, while the later diastematic manuscripts, i.e., with lines, are more accurate in pitch but less so in rhythm and vocal nuances.

Formal Aspects of Gregorian Chant. All patterns found in later Western music are found also in chant. Musicologists have taken great pains to find ABA and Rondo forms in various chant pieces. All of this is true but says little about the formal structures of the chant melody. Being pure melody, the chant relies on purely melodic motives for its formal structure. In general, the high point of the line is arrived at rather rapidly and tapers off gradually. The length of the line is frequently dictated by the text and its components. There is no music where the shape of the text so affects the shape of the line. Sequential structures are found but never stressed as formative elements. The general punctuation of the text determines the inner cadences, which, as a rule, do not stress the final tone. Later melodies tend to have larger leaps in succession, while the older melodies use the leap beyond a third with great discretion. The word accent does not always receive musical development but frequently is higher in pitch than the unaccented syllables. There is some evidence that interest in the Latin rhythmic cursus may have had some influence in cadential formulas, especially of the psalm tones. The manner in which a typical pattern can be altered to fit a new text shows a keen appreciation of text declamation and a freedom within a given form that is always expressive and sensitive. The subtlety was lost or obscured by the advent of polyphony.

The Modal System. The chief unifying element in Gregorian chant is its modal structure. The oral tradition from which chant arose was undoubtedly one of a group of melodic formulae or phrases that could be adapted to various texts. These formulae were traditionally grouped into eight divisions depending on the melodic contour, the manner of beginning, and the relationship between the reciting or dominant tone and the ending formula. There is reason to believe that originally the beginning was most important in such a grouping, but certainly after the influence of the classical Greek theories inherited through Boethius the ending or final note and its relationship to the reciting or dominant note proved the vital factor in determining mode. Also from Boethius is derived the influence of range as an important element. The Byzantine theory that was inherited spoke of four authentic modes and four plagal or derivative modes. A plagal mode shared with its respective authentic mode the same final but usually had a lower dominant or reciting tone, thus throwing the whole range somewhat lower. In the authentic modes the final or cadential figure comes at the bottom of the range; in the plagal modes, it is in the middle. The accompanying table presents the standard modal theory as it was fully developed in the treatises of the 11th century. This theory cannot be applied rigidly to all chants. By the introduction of the B^b the general flavor of a mode can be altered and transpositions can be effected. There are no other accidentals possible in chant, and thus chromaticism is impossible. The tritone (interval of the augmented fourth) was avoided also in later chant, although the treatise of Hucbald De institutione harmonica cites this interval without prejudice and gives examples of it. Later tonaries give model modal melodies that embody the characteristics of each mode and served didactic purposes, but the repertory itself is much freer in its adherence to modal structure. Some of the more elaborate verses of the soloistic responsories use both the plagal and authentic ranges of the same mode and thus exploit all of the melodic possibilities of the mode.

Subsequent History of Gregorian Chant. After the Carolingian period the interests of the chant composer turned to tropes and Sequences and the rise of polyphony. The standard repertory remained in use, but it lost its rhythmic piquancy and became the source for polyphonic treatment. Several new Offices were written that exploited the modal theories by presenting the antiphons of the night Office in modal succession, but general interest in chant composition waned.

The Council of Trent. By the 16th century the condition of chant was truly lamentable, and a reform was badly needed. Unfortunately the Medicean edition that resulted from an attempt at reform (see CHANT BOOKS, PRINTED EDITIONS OF) was not founded on scholarly principles and reflected more the aesthetics of the late Renaissance than the early Middle Ages. This edition, however, remained the source for all subsequent editions until the 19th century. Pioneers in musical research in the 19th century, such as Lambillotte, La Fage, D'Ortigue, and Nasard, laid the basis for the subsequent more accurate work of the Solesmes school. To this latter, under the directorship of Dom Pothier and Dom Mocquereau, belongs the lasting credit of making available the original mnemonic manuscripts in facsimile editions in the series Paléographie musicale grégorienne and of initiating a series of monographs that made scholars search out the original documents. The treatises of the theorists were gathered together by M. GERBERT and E. Coussemaker. The controversies that arose in opposition to the Solesmes theories, with P. Wagner and F. Gevaert as chief protagonists, gave rise to intensive chant studies that are still accurate sources for information.

Present Practice. As a result of chant scholarship since the mid-19th century, the present practice can be said to come closer to the original in its melodic precision than that of any previous century. However, the rhythmic controversies still continue; there are more performances in the mensuralist style, and there is less adherence to the Solesmes school. Frequently the chant is accompanied on the organ, which thus adds a third dimension never intended by the original composers. Often this accompaniment totally falsifies the underlying modal structure. True chant must be unaccompanied. Attempts at congregational use of the chant repertory in the 20th century have been limited to the simple Mass Ordinaries and have not been universally successful. It is generally found to be too alien to 20th-century aesthetic tastes. Various systems of arm and hand motions also have been invented to direct chant (called chironomy) and have been most successfully used. With the increase of the vernacular in the liturgy, less interest has been shown in Gregorian chant, although many attempts at adapting its melodies to new English texts have been made.

Bibliography: A complete bibliography of Gregorian chant to 1935 can be found in G. M. SUÑOL, Introduction à la paléographie musicale grégorienne (Tournai 1935), and an extension of the same Bibliographie grégorienne, 1935–1937 (3d ed. Solesmes-Rome 1958). A further extensive bibliography is found in B. ST-ÄBLEIN, “Choral,” Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 2:1265–1303. The two most extensive works on Gregorian chant are P. WAGNER, Einführung in die gregorianischen Melodien, 3 v. (Leipzig), v.1 (3d ed. 1911), v.2 (2d ed. 1912), v.3 (1921); repr. (Hildesheim 1962) and W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Indiana 1958). The following works in English are comprehensive and useful: G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). J. SMITS VAN WAESBERGHE, Gregorian Chant (London 1949). H. ANGLÈS, “Latin Chant before St. Gregory” and “Gregorian Chant,” New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP, 11 v. (New York 1957–) 2:58–127. Indispensable sources are: M. GERBERT, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 3 v. (Milan 1931). H. COUSSEMAKER, Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series, 4 v. (Paris 1864–76). Paléographie musicale (Solesmes 1889–). H. M. BANNISTER, Monument Vaticani di paleografia musicale latina, 2 v. (Leipzig 1913). Selective list of other important works follows. R. J. HESBERT, ed., Antiphonale missarum sextuplex (Brussels 1935). W. H. FRERE, ed., Antiphonale Sarisburiense (London 1901–26); Graduale Sarisburiense (London 1894); The Winchester Troper (London 1894). P. M. FERRETTI, Esthétique grégorienne (Paris 1938). A. GASTOUË, L'Antiphonaire grégorien (Paris 1907); Le Graduel et l'antiphonaire (Paris 1913); Les Origines du chant romain (Paris 1907). F. A. GEVAERT, La Mélodie antique dans le chant de l'Église latine (Ghent 1895); Les Origines du chant liturgique de l'Église latine (Ghent 1890). A. MOCQUEREAU, Le Nombre musical grégorien, 2 v. (Tournai 1908–27). J. POTHIER, Les Mélodies grégoriennes (Tournai 1880). P. WAGNER, Einführung in die gregorianischen Melodien, 3 v. (Leipzig), v.1 (3d ed. 1911), v.2 (2d ed. 1912), v.3 (1921); repr. (Hildesheim 1962). O. URSPRUNG, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931). R. VAN DOREN, Étude sur l'influence musicale de l'Abbaye de Saint-Gall, VIII^e au XI^e siècle (Brussels 1925). F. TACK, Gregorian Chant (Cologne 1960). L. AGUSTONI, Gregorianischer Choral (Freiburg 1963). Études grégoriennes, 5 v. (Solesmes 1954–62). W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Indiana 1958). H. HUCKE, “Toward a New Historical View of Gregorian Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 33 (1980) 411–87. H. VAN DER WERF, The Emergence of Gregorian Chant (Rochester, New York 1983). D. HUGHES, “Evidence for the Traditional View of the Transmission of Gregorian Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 40 (1987) 377–404. K. LEVY, “Charlemagne’s Archetype of Gregorian Chant,” Journal of the American Musicological Society 40 (1987) 1–30. J. MCKINNON, “The Emergence of Gregorian Chant in the Carolingian Era,” Antiquity and the Middle Ages (London 1990) 88–119. D. HILEY, Western Plainchant: A Handbook (Oxford 1993).

[R. G. WEAKLAND/EDS.]

GREGORIAN REFORM

This term is traditionally used to designate the vast movement of reform of the Church, beginning toward the middle of the 11th century and continuing into the 1st decade of the 12th. GREGORY VII, who has been made the patron of this movement, was neither its initiator nor its final consummator. Yet the importance of his reign, the measures taken by this pope and implemented by his legates under his impetus and the prestige that he was able to restore to the PAPACY justify in large measure the application of the adjective Gregorian to the reforming movement. The works to which Augustin FLICHE devoted the greater part of his academic labors have contributed to popularizing the expression. In recent years new studies have underscored the part played by CLUNY in this reform movement (especially K. Hallinger, Gorze-Kluny) and have restored to their proper proportions the contributions of Gregory VII.

The history of the Gregorian reform could be traced from the PAPAL ELECTION DECREE (1059) of NICHOLAS II to the First LATERAN COUNCIL (1123). Such an exposition would cover a period of moderate reform (1049–73), the harder Gregorian line (1073–85) and the conciliatory tendency after URBAN II (1088–1123). The narrative, however, would exceed the scope of this article. But three lines along which the reformers were working must be distinguished: (1) reaffirmation of papal primacy; (2) reform of the clergy; and (3) freeing the Church from lay ascendancy. Nor is this the place to discuss the important reform that progressed simultaneously in the monastic establishment or in canonical renewal; for these, although essential aspects of the Gregorian movement, are such vast and complex subjects as to require special studies [J. F. Lemarignier, Histoire des institutions françaises au moyen-âge, 3 (Paris 1962) 115–138].

Although for the sake of clarity the three problems have been held distinct, it is evident that in actual fact these questions were intimately connected and that measures considered for any one of them could not but have an effect on the others. All these measures tended in fact to substitute for the Carolingian and Ottonian dream of an ecclesia universalis, grouping sacerdotium and regnum into one politico religious community, the organization of a Church independent of secular powers, having its own institutions and law and profiting from the weakness of princes to assume the leadership of Western Christendom.

REAFFIRMATION OF PAPAL PRIMACY

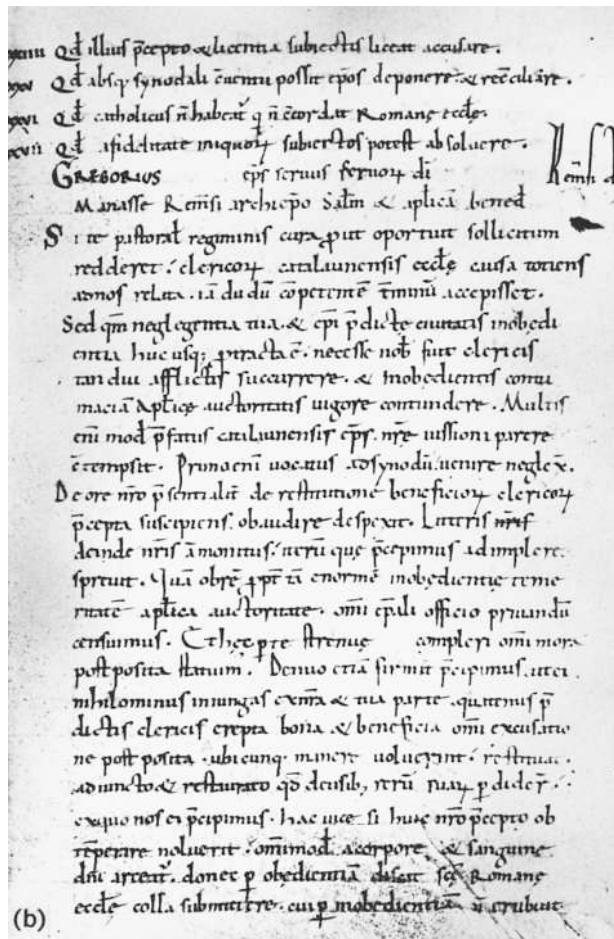

The Gregorian age marks a crucial stage in the history of papal PRIMACY. This primacy had indeed been strongly asserted in the fifth century by INNOCENT I and LEO I. The CANONICAL COLLECTIONS of the Gelasian era were at once a manifestation and an assertion of it. But the papacy in the tenth and in the first half of the 11th century had experienced a period of crisis, weakness and at times disgrace. A prize contested by the factions of Rome, dependent on the will of the German emperor, given over to men who were often mediocre and at times unworthy, the papacy could not exercise its role of leadership in the Church.

Pre-Gregorian Reforms. Thus the decree of Nicholas II, promulgated at the Lateran Synod (April 13, 1059), a few weeks after his accession, was of crucial importance. It reserved to the cardinal bishops the tractatio culminating in the designation of a new pope. The other cardinals were to be consulted only after the fact and the clergy and the Roman people were merely to acclaim the candidate so designated [Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Constitutiones, 1:529; the imperial version of this text (ibid. 1:543) is a forgery dating probably from 1084]. In practice, the rights of the emperor simply disappeared. Despite the opposition of the Roman nobility and the emperor, the new procedure was confirmed and even stiffened the following year in another Lateran Synod (April of 1060; ibid. 1:550). Thus the papacy recovered an independence that was the preliminary condition to any reform in the Church.

“Dictatus Papae,” list of 27 propositions, possibly titles for Gregorian canonical collections, manuscript folios from a Register of Gregory VII.

Although the decree of 1059 was crucial, it was not a complete innovation. The election of STEPHEN IX (1057) had already been effected without German intervention and the Adversus simoniacos of HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA [Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite (Berlin 1826—) 1:95–253] had demanded freedom of ecclesiastical elections. Nicholas II’s successor, ALEXANDER II, had, as bishop of Lucca, striven against the immorality of the clergy. His advisers, PETER DAMIAN (Opusc. 4: Disceptio synodalis; Opusc. 5: De privilegiis Romanae ecclesiae) and Hildebrand, were convinced that the reform could come only from Roman authority, and the pope strongly asserted the Roman primacy in his bulls. The legates, among them Peter Damian, HUGH OF REMIREMONT and Gerard of Ostia (d. 1077), made it felt in France, Spain, England and even in Scandinavia, Bohemia and Dalmatia. In Germany the pope profited from the minority of HENRY IV and gained control of the Church in the empire. Finally, Robert Guiscard had some years previously declared himself a vassal of Nicholas II for the Norman lands in southern Italy and Alexander II, who organized the French crusade in Spain, reserved to the Holy See the overlordship of lands that might be retaken from the infidels.

Page 2 of the "Dictatus Papae."

Gregory VII. But it was GREGORY VII (1073–85) who by his policy toward the princes, especially the German sovereign, as well as by his doctrinal pronouncements, maintained most dramatically the Roman primacy. At the beginning of the reign his letter to the faithful of Lombardy (Reg. 1.15; July 1, 1073) and later the DICTATUS PAPAE (Reg. 2.55a; 1075) and the letters to Hermann of Metz (Reg. 4.2; 7.21; Aug. 25, 1076, and May 15, 1081) set forth the foundation, the principles, and the practical consequences of the primacy. It is of divine origin: the pope is only the intermediary, charged with making known the will of the Trinity and of the Apostles Peter and Paul. As Leo the Great before him, Gregory identified himself with Peter. The 27 propositions constituting the Dictatus papae articulate in lapidary and unrestrained terms the universal power of the pope; his authority over bishops, clerics and councils; and his right to depose the emperor, to certify every canonical text, to make law and to deliver judgments from which there is no appeal. "Founded by the Lord alone" (Dict. 1), the Roman Church cannot err (Dict. 22). The judge of all, the pope cannot be judged by anyone (Dict. 18–21). Thus the pope is overlord of the Church; he controls the hierarchy and can modify its institutions. The authority of Rome is no less with respect to secular princes and Gregory demonstrated papal power in the struggle with Henry IV, as well as in several letters that formulate the theory of the supremacy of the Holy See over temporal rulers (Dec. 8, 1075 and May 8, 1080; Reg. 3.10, 7.25, etc.). Gregory exercised this authority over the Church in councils in which he achieved the adoption of his reforming views and by the action of his legates who were his representatives all over Christendom and, as such, took precedence over all local authority (Dict. 4).

The Gregorian policy was given significant support in a series of occasional, politically inspired writings (especially the Liber ad Gebehardum of MANEGOLD OF LAUTENBACH, c. 1084; Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite, 1) and still more in the so-called Gregorian collections (P. Fournier and G. Lebras, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien, 2). To the collections of the preceding period, stressing the powers of the bishop (especially the Decretum of BURCHARD OF WORMS, beginning of the 11th century) were added a series of collections, mostly Italian in origin, which had been inspired by the desire for reform and by the concern that reform be founded on a restoration of papal authority. Some of these collections appeared prior to the pontificate of Gregory VII [the Collection in 74 Titles under LEO IX, called by Fournier the "first canonical manual of the reform"; it may actually have been preceded by the Collection in Two Books, which its recent editor, J. Bernhard (Strasbourg 1962), dates for c. 1053]. The most important collections date from Gregory's pontificate and were often composed at his urging: the Capitulare of ATTO OF VERCELLI; the Collection in 12 Books of ANSELM OF LUCCA, close collaborator with the pope, c. 1083; the Collection of DEUSDEDIT, begun under Gregory, but published only c. 1085; later under Urban II, the Liber de vita christiana of BONIZO OF SUTRI, etc. All these collections exalt the Roman primacy. Often they commence with a section titled De primatu romanae ecclesiae. They are in accord with papal policy and serve its purposes. The texts produced by these compilers establish the divine institution of the Roman Church, the dogmatic primacy of the sovereign pontiff, his right to legislate for the whole Church, to judge any case, to direct all the members of the hierarchy and all the faithful, including secular rulers.

The stockpile of texts thus collected corresponded to the tenets of the Dictatus papae and was to be of great service to the Roman policy in the difficult years following the death of Gregory VII.

The exaltation of Roman primacy was continued by the successors of Gregory VII. It led the papacy, especially under Urban II, to accede to the requests for exemption of monasteries that were thus removed from Episcopal jurisdiction and put directly under Rome. Accordingly, the renewal of the privileges of Cluny occurred in 1088; so too the exemption of La Cava, 1089 and especially 1093; of Saint-Victor de Marseilles, 1089; Marmoutier, 1090; Fécamp, c. 1093 etc. [see J. F. Lemarignier, Privileges d'exemption . . . des abbayes normandes . . . (Paris 1937); P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 5714, 5715, 5773, 5782, 5783, 5787, 5791, 5792, 5802]. Urban II, moreover, continued the centralizing efforts of Gregory VII and declared: "The important matters of individual churches must be judged by Apostolic authority" (Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, L 5519).

REFORM OF THE CLERGY

In furthering clerical reform, another major objective of the Gregorian movement, the papacy continued along lines set by the Cluniac reformers. Lay intrusion into the assignment of bishoprics, abbeys and parishes had entailed two evils affecting the clergy: acquisition of ecclesiastical dignities for money or some material advantage (SIMONY) and immorality of the clergy, who were often married or living in concubinage (Nicolaitanism).

Simony. This abuse had been denounced by Cardinal Humbert in his treatise Adversus simoniacos. The author considered simony a heresy and denied any validity to the consecration of a bishop who had bought his see. Consequently, any ordination conferred by a simoniacal prelate was null and void. This was a rigorously logical solution but one that ran the risk of setting aside a great portion of the hierarchy. For many had been branded as simonists either by their own act, or by that of the prelate who had given them orders, or via some preceding prelate (see the possibly excessive but alarming estimates made by Bonizo of Sutri, Liber ad amicum, 6). Peter Damian was more moderate and perhaps more realistic: he contented himself with imposing on simoniacal clerics a severe penance and suspension from the exercise of their office. But the rigorous position was still being defended by Bonizo of Sutri (Liber de vita christiana, 1089–94) and Deusdedit (Libellus contra invasores et simoniacos, prior to 1095).

The fight against simony was joined by c.6 of the Lateran Synod of 1059, which forbade anyone "to receive a church from the hands of a layman, either gratis or for money" (see c.9 which speaks of "simoniacal heresy"). The prohibition of simony was renewed in the synods of 1060 (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 19:899) and November of 1078. The legates were energetic in citing the prohibition and in having it respected in Italy, France (Council of Vienne and Tours, 1060) and Germany, where simony was general during the minority of Henry IV. The fight waged by Gregory VII was continued by Urban II, who in several bulls proclaimed the deposition of simonists (Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, L 5381, 5396, 5743). The Council of Melfi (1089) renewed the condemnation (c.1). However, in several cases the pope showed a sometimes excessive tolerance, which was reproved by Bonizo of Sutri. As against the rigorist stand of the Italian canonists, IVO OF CHARTRES, though reproducing the canons against simony and Nicolaitanism (Decretum 5.81—), authorized in the prologue of the Decretum (where he took up again the theory of dispensation expounded some years previously by BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE) certain relaxations justified by the necessitas temporis or by considerations of mercy. Simony was again condemned by the Councils of Autun (1094), Piacenza (1095; c.2–7), and Clermont (1095; c.6–8), which again adopted the rigorist doctrines of the Italian canonists.

"Simoniacal heresy" continued to rage, however, in the final years of the 11th century, especially in France. CALLISTUS II denounced it again at the Councils of Toulouse (1119; c.1, 6, 8, 9) and of Reims (1119; c.1, 4). In Hungary the Council of Gran (1114) likewise forbade simony (c.42–43). Simony was solemnly condemned in c.1 of the First Lateran Council (1123). The large number of such measures shows how difficult they were to implement practically. However, the persevering action of the popes and their legates, the end of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE in the Empire and the gradual decrease of lay pressure resulted, toward the first quarter of the 12th century, in a noticeable improvement in the recruitment of the episcopate. Although simony had not ceased entirely, it was no longer the scourge that a half-century previously had discredited the hierarchy.

Celibacy. Simultaneously with their fight against simony, legislators and reforming prelates attacked the immorality of the clergy. The Synod of 1059 forbade priests living in concubinage to celebrate Mass and ordered the faithful not to assist at the offices of an unworthy minister (c.3). This assembly recalled the regulation, traditional in the Latin Church, imposing CELIBACY on clerics from the subdiaconate onward. Contrary to these norms, a pamphlet of 1060, probably the work of Bishop Ulric of Imola, maintained that the only means of averting clerical immorality was to permit the clergy to marry [Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite 1:254–60; A. Fliche, Revue des sciences religieuses, 2 (1922) 127–139]. This pamphlet was revised and expanded in a Norman version [ibid. 5 (1925)] and again in the Tractatus Eboracenses (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Libelli de lite 3:645). It was against such tendencies that Peter Damian published his De celibatu sacerdotum [Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 145:379–388]. Gregory VII fought energetically against the incontinence of the clergy [Council of Rome, Lent 1074 [see Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. Borino (Rome 1947—) 6:277–295]; by letters of the pope to bishops, for example, Reg. 2.61, 64, 66, 67, 68; 3.3, 4; by excommunication of unworthy prelates; and by local action by legates]. The reform work was carried on by Urban II [Councils of Melfi (1089), c.2, 37; of Constance and Autun (1094); of Clermont (1095), c.9–10; of Nîmes (1096), c.12], by Callistus II [Council of Reims (1119), c.5, again adopted by the Council of Rouen (November 1119) and by the First Lateran Council (1123), c.7]. In England ANSELM OF CANTERBURY convoked a council in London (1108), which recalled the precepts of ecclesiastical celibacy and renewed the traditional measures to assure its observance. In Hungary the Council of Gran (1114) also proclaimed the law of celibacy but with certain mitigations.

FREEING THE CHURCH FROM LAY ASCENDANCY

By mid-11th century the dominant institution of the PROPRIETARY CHURCH allowed feudal lords to appoint the clergy serving such churches, which were considered a part of their domain. Parochial functions were thus too often exercised by mercenary and ignorant priests who were married or living in concubinage. Emperors, kings and feudal lords disposed of bishoprics to their relatives or liegemen, without any great concern for their value to the episcopate. The goods of parishes, dioceses and abbeys were for the most part in the hands of laymen. Deflected from their pious or charitable purposes, CHURCH PROPERTIES thus became the object of traffic, feudal concession, hereditary transmission and partition. The Gregorian reform strove to free the hierarchy and the goods of the Church from this lay control.

Selection of Pastors. The decree of 1059 had restored to the Roman Church the selection of the sovereign pontiff. The struggle against lay INVESTITURE restored the independence of the episcopate. That of the lower clergy would come later. Sketched in outline form in mid-12th century by the Decretum of GRATIAN (Corpus iuris canonici ed. E. Friedberg, C.16 q.7), which limited the effects of lay dominium on the churches (U. Stutz, "Gratian u. die Eigenkirche," Zeitschrift der Savigny- Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung), it was to be fully actualized only by ALEXANDER III at the end of the 12th century and by the first decretists who would substitute the ius patronatus for the dominium. In the Gregorian era, however, various measures had aimed at restoring the authority of the bishop over the local clergy (for example, the letters of Alexander II, Pascal II and Callistus II for Lucca in L. Nanni, La parrocchia nei documenti lucchensi). The creation of collegiate churches was likewise an effective means of organizing and controlling the local clergy. Renewing the decrees of 1059 (c.6–7), the reforming councils of the late 11th and early 12th century [Rome (1078); (1080), c.2; Clermont (1095), c.15; Rome (1099)] decreed excommunication for laymen who granted investiture of churches, clerics who accepted such churches and bishops who ordained such clerics. The Councils of London (1106), Troyes (1107), etc., forbade clerics to receive a church from the hands of a layman (GRATIAN, Corpus iuris canonici, C.16 q.7 c.16–20). The First Lateran Council (c.3, 4) removed episcopal elections and selection of pastors from lay interference. Toward the middle of the 12th century the principles advocated by the reform movement concerning election of bishops by chapters and the designation of local clergy by the bishop had triumphed in almost every diocese.

Recovery of Temporalities. This was likewise a cardinal concern of the reform. The restitution of churches, church lands and tithes that had been usurped by the laity was ordered by numerous councils from mid-11th century [for example, Toulouse 1056, Tours 1060, Avranches 1072, Rouen 1074, 1096, Rome 1078, 1080, Gerona 1078 and Lillebone 1080; see Schreiber, Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung (1947) 31–171]. Placid of Nonantola and Deusdedit declared that after the consecration of a church, a layman can have no right to it [thus, the Council of Reims (1131), c.10]. An attempt to draw a distinction between ecclesia (building) and altare (altar and revenues thereto attached) was to have no success. ABBO OF FLEURY refused to admit any distinction, and finally the Lateran Councils of 1123, c.15, and of 1179, c.14 (Corpus iuris canonici, C.10 q.1 c. 14; X 3.38.4), anathematized unlawful holders of church goods (Thomas, Le droit de propriété des laïcs sur les églises).

The recovery of churches and tithes was the work of the reforming bishops. Feudal lords and kings sometimes helped (see, for example, numerous charters of Philip I, in the Acts of Philip I, published by Prou). Often the goods were restored not to the parishes themselves but to monasteries, chapters and bishops in whom persons making restitution had more confidence.

Thus the long fight waged for more than a century by the reformers had by 1130 led to tangible results regarding Roman centralization, ecclesiastical buildings and patrimonial rights.

Bibliography: General. A. FLICHE, La Réforme grégorienne, 3 v. (Louvain 1924–37). Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, eds., A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935—) 8–9. E. VOUSEN, Papauté et pouvoir civil à l'époque de Grégoire VII (Gembloux 1927). E. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945—) v.1–3. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 3–4. G. TELLENBACH, Church, State, and Christian Society at the Time of the Investiture Contest, tr. R. F. BENNETT (Oxford 1959). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh., v.1, 2, 4, 5 (Leipzig 1931–41) 3. J. F. LEMARIGNIER, "L'Influence de la réforme grégorienne" in Histoire des institutions françaises au moyen âge, ed. F. LOT and R. FAWTIER, v.3 (Paris 1962) 78–139. Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO, v.1–7 (1947–60), esp. studies by G. BARDY, O. J. BLUM, G. B. BORINO, L. DE LA CALZADA, G. DRIOUX, H. E. FEINE, G. and K. HOFMANN, N. N. HUYGHEBAERT, S. KUTTNER, L. DE LACGER, A. MICHEL, G. MICCOLI, and W. ULLMANN. Gregory VII. Das Register Gregors VIII, ed. E. CASPAR, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae selectae (Berlin 1826—) 2. W. WÜHR, Studien zu Gregor VII. Kirchenreform und Weltpolitik (Munich 1930). R. MORGHEN, . . . Gregorio VII (Turin 1942). H. X. ARQUILLIÈRE, Saint Grégoire VII (Paris 1934); "La Deuxième lettre de Grégoire VII à Hermann de Metz (1081)," Recherches de science religieuse, 40 (1951–52) 231–242. Special studies. G. MOL-LAT, "La Restitution des églises privées au patrimoine ecclésiastique en France du IX^e au XI^e siècle," Revue historique de droit français et étranger, 27 (1949) 399–423. A. MICHEL, Die Sentenzen des Kardinals Humbert: Das erste Rechtsbuch der päpstlichen Reform (Stuttgart 1943; repr. 1952). J. CHOUX, Recherches sur le diocèse de Toul au temps de la réforme grégorienne: L'Épiscopat de Pibon (1069–1107) (Nancy 1952). J. J. RYAN, Saint Peter Damiani and His Canonical Sources (Toronto 1956). E. MAGNOU, "L'Introduction de la réforme grégorienne à Toulouse," Cahiers de l'Association Marc Bloch (Toulouse 1958). H. G. KRAUSE, Das Papswahldekret von 1059 und seine Rolle im Investiturstreit, Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO, 7 (1960). R. MORGHEN, "Ricerca sulla formazione del Registro di Gregorio VII," Annali di storia del diritto 3–4 (1959–60) 35–65. M. MACCARRONE, "I papi del secolo XII e la vita comune e regolare del clero," La vita comune del clero, 1 (1962) 349–411. G. MICCOLI, "Pier Damiani e la vita comune del clero," ibid. 186–219. J. T. GILCHRIST, "Canon Law Aspects of the Eleventh Century," Journal of Ecclesiastical History, 13 (1962) 21–38. K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny (2 v. Rome 1950–51). Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Constitutiones (Berlin 1826—). P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD, 882–1198, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956). J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98).

[J. GAUDEMET]

GREGORIAN SACRAMENTARY

The history of this service book is a complex one. It is convenient to deal with its evolution by reference to three distinct books: (1) the primitive or pre-Hadrian Sacramentary, (2) the eighth-century group of service books commonly known as the Eighth-Century Gelasian or Frankish-Gelasian Sacramentaries, and (3) the Hadrianum and Supplement of Alcuin. To have a clear idea of the problems involved in the course of its history, the table of dates and events may be useful.

Dates/Events

590–604 Reign of Gregory I, traditionally regarded as the author of the primitive Gregorian Sacramentary.

c. 614 Dedication by Boniface IV of the Pantheon, in which he imitated Gregory's style in composing the collect.

625–638 Reign of Honorius I, date of an early primitive Gregorian Sacramentary (Gamber's Urgregorianum).

715–731 Reign of Gregory II, under whom the Gregorian Sacramentary was reorganized.

747 Council of Cloveshoe in England decreeing the use of a Sacramentary lately received from Rome.

741–768 Reception by Pepin, King in the Frankish dominions, of liturgical books from Rome.

772–795 Reign of Pope Adrian I, who sent a copy of the Gregorian Sacramentary to Charlemagne. This is called by scholars the Hadrianum.

c. 730–804 Lifetime of Alcuin, traditionally held to have adapted the Hadrianum to the needs of the Frankish clergy by giving it a Supplement. This book is known as the Gregorian Sacramentary of Charles the Great.

10th–11th centuries A period during which the Hadrianum and Alcuin's Gregorian were fused, with numerous additions that eventually evolved into diverse types of mixed Sacramentaries.

The Primitive or Pre-Hadrian Sacramentary. The name of Gregory the Great has been linked with the composition of a Sacramentary ever since the mid-eighth century. A tradition to this effect is found at York at the time of Archbishop Egbert (732–766) and at Rome when John the Deacon wrote his life of St. Gregory in the years 873 to 875. It is unfortunate that no MS of this service book has survived. Two centuries elapsed between the death of Gregory and the earliest extant copy of a Gregorian Sacramentary. The Cambrai MS 164, written for Hildoard, bishop of that see in 811–812, is in all probability, according to N. Abercrombie, [Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 3 (1953) 99–103], a direct copy of the Sacramentary sent by Pope Adrian I to Charlemagne sometime between 784 and 791; hence its title the Hadrianum [H. Lietzmann, ed., Das Sacramentarium Gregorianum nach dem Aachener Urexemplar (Liturgiesgeschichtliche Quellen 3, Münster in Westfalen 1921)]. It has long been the goal of liturgical scholars to get behind this text and to find the primitive form of the Gregorian Sacramentary. This quest seemed to have met with some success in 1927, when Mohlberg edited the famous MS D. 47 of the Chapter Library of Padua. In his introduction, Mohlberg expressed his opinion that the "Gregorian archetype used by the compiler of MS D. 47 was probably the oldest attainable form of the primitive Gregorian text," and he added that he thought St. Gregory had composed his Sacramentary for the year 595. Not all scholars were convinced. In his Wage zum Uregregorianum [Texte und Arbeiten 46 (Beuron 1956)], K. Gamber rejected the thesis and claimed that the Paduan MS D. 47 was nothing more than a new type of the eighth-century group of Sacramentaries. In this he was in agreement with W. H. Frere, who looked upon D. 47 as "a somewhat eccentric member of the group representing the eighth Century Mixed Sacramentaries" [Studies in Early Roman Liturgy, I: The Calendar (Alcuin Club Collections 28, Oxford 1930) 59].

Date and authenticity are the main subjects of debate today concerning the Gregorian Sacramentary. If scholars such as Mohlberg, Gamber, and Chavasse have taken the authenticity for granted and have suggested the years 595, 593, and 594 to 596 as the probable time of its composition, others have been far from convinced by the evidence they have produced. G. Baron d'Eckhart expressed doubts concerning the authenticity of the Gregorian Sacramentary as long ago as 1729, and the controversy flared up once more in 1890, when the traditional view was vigorously defended by G. Morin. More recently Capelle and H. Ashworth have examined the text of the Hadrianum for evidence of Gregory's authorship. From this examination it became evident that a certain number of prayers must be definitely assigned to St. Gregory, yet a good deal of caution is still needed in assessing the value of this evidence. The Sacramentary, as it stands, is not the work of one person, and therefore not of Gregory alone. There are grounds for the inference that the Sacramentary may well have been drawn up after his death (Ashworth, "The Liturgical Prayers" 107–161). No very precise answer can be given to the question of how soon after. It may well be that Boniface IV first began the process. Mohlberg and Gamber may well be right when they trace the archetype of Padua D. 47 to the pontificate of Honorius I (625–638). The Gregorian Sacramentary certainly received its definitive form under Gregory II (715–731), for this is evidently the book spoken of by the Council of Cloveshoe in 747 as having been "lately received from Rome," the companion volume of Gregory II's Antiphonale Missarum, or Cantatorium, i.e., the Gradual (See S. J. P. Van Dijk, 338).

Eighth-Century Gelasian Sacramentaries. Long before the Carolingian liturgical reform, that is before the Hadrianum reached Charlemagne at Aachen, numerous copies of a new type of service book were being made in monastic scriptoria. This book was a hybrid, for it mixed material drawn from the old Gelasian Sacramentary, the archetype of Reg. 316, and from a seventh-century Gregorian Sacramentary. E. Bishop christened it the Missal of King Pepin, under the impression that it was the service book enforced by Pepin and St. Boniface. It is more commonly known as the Eighth-Century Gelasian Sacramentaries or the Frankish-Gelasian Sacramentaries. Extant copies of this book differ widely in their content. The earlier MSS have drawn most of their material from the Old Gelasian; the later MSS have a more Gregorian character about them.

Concerning the date and origin of this hybrid service book, there is a good deal of disagreement. The earliest-known MS of the type is Paris, Bibl. Nat. Lat. 12048, the famous Sacramentarium Gellonense. Wilmart and P. de Puniet have dated it 770 to 780. Lowe was content with saying "end of the eighth century." More recently Chavasse and J. Deshusses placed it in the last decade of that century. Various guesses have been made concerning the place of its origin. Leroquais and Bourque pointed to the scriptorium of Flavigny. Lowe suggested Saint-Croix of Meaux. The latest opinion, that of Chavasse and Deshusses, ascribes it to Cambrai, on the grounds that Bishop Hildoard was one of the ardent supporters of the Carolingian reform. Thanks to Hildoard's zeal the Cambrai library possesses the only copy of Alcuin's Lectionary without the Supplement (Cambrai MS 553) and the earliest-known copy of Hadrian's Sacramentary (Cambrai MS 164). Indeed, if these authors are right, the earliest-known copy of the eighth-century service book (Gellonense) should be added to the list. As to the date and origin of this type of service book, it is difficult to give a precise answer. As the work of modern scholars proceeds, it becomes evident that all extant copies of this type of service book depend on a lost archetype. It can be conjectured with some confidence that it existed before the reign of Pepin. It is significant that all extant liturgical fragments emanating from the Anglo-Saxon Church or Continental Anglo-Saxon centers point to a liturgical service book of a type represented either by the Old Gelasian Sacramentary or this eighth-century Gelasian Sacramentary. It was evidently known in northern Italy [Gamber, "Il sacramentario di Paolo Diacono. La redazione del Gelasiano s. VIII in Pavia," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 16 (1962) 412–438].

The Hadrianum and Alcuin's Supplement. The common opinion of liturgical scholars is that the aim and purpose of the Carolingian renaissance and reform was one of unification. Charlemagne's policy was to unify his empire, and one of the chief means of doing so, it is said, was adoption of Roman liturgical books that were to be made obligatory throughout his realm. It is commonly supposed that he accordingly sought from Pope Adrian I a copy of a Sacramentary, which Adrian described as immixtus (pure) and as being in accord with the tradition of the Roman See. This Sacramentary reached Aachen some time between 772 and 795, and in the judgment of Abercrombie the Cambrai MS 164 is an exact copy of it [“Alcuin and the Text of the Gregorianum: Notes on Cambrai Manuscript No. 164,” Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 3 (1953) 99–103]. This interpretation of the motives behind the Carolingian liturgical reform has been questioned by recent writers. Van Dijk (p. 336) has argued convincingly that Carolingians were eager to establish a western empire that would rival Byzantium, and therefore they adopted and propagated papal liturgical books with impressive ceremonial. Be this as it may, the Hadrianum was found insufficient for the aims of Charlemagne. Alcuin was commissioned to bring it up to date. This he did by adopting a good deal of material found in the eighth-century type of service book and forming it into a supplement. Nor did he hesitate to use material from Gallican and Mozarabic sources. Between the material of the Hadrianum and his Supplement, he placed a preface beginning with the word Hucusque, in which he stated that the first part of the Sacramentary was that of St. Gregory the Great and the Supplement was his own to be used at each priest’s discretion. This Supplement contained the following items: (1) additional matter for the rites of Baptism, Ordinations, and the Paschal vigil and vigil of Pentecost; (2) Masses for the Sundays after Epiphany, Easter, and Pentecost; (3) a full extract from the Pontifical contained within the pages of the eighth-century service book; (4) the full series of prefaces contained therein; and (5) a series of episcopal blessings, very close to those still found in the eighth-century Sacramentaries of Angoulême and Godelgaudus, but with an edited and corrected text.

This use of the eighth-century service book and the fact that such books were still being produced in the Carolingian monasteries well into the ninth and tenth centuries demands an explanation. It is no longer sufficient to repeat what has been so confidently stated without very precise evidence for too long: that the Hadrianum was immediately copied on its arrival at Aachen, given a Supplement by Alcuin, and subsequently imposed by royal decree. C. Hohler has observed well that what evidence there is points to no such interpretation. What the evidence does suggest is that Mass had to be celebrated according to the Ordo Romanus, and that all Gregory’s prayers had to be used [Journal of Ecclesiastical History 7 (1957) 233–234]. In this he is supported by Deshusses, who has deduced that the service book imposed by royal decree, probably at the Council of Frankfurt in 794, was in effect the eighth-century service book. All early extant copies of this book date from the last decade of the eighth century. Alcuin’s Supplement was not written until toward the end of his life (d. 804). Nor does it seem to have been known at Cambrai in 811 and 812, for the copy of the Hadrianum made at that date for Bishop Hildoard was not modeled on the text of Alcuin’s edition with its Supplement, but on the older and faulty text of the book received from Adrian. H. A. Wilson based his edition of Alcuin’s Gregorian Sacramentary on two ninth-century Vatican MSS: Reginensis 337 and Ottobonianus 313 (HBS 1915). It was only during the reign of Louis the Pious (814–841) that Alcuin’s edition of the Gregorian Sacramentary began its career. Nor did it keep for long the form given it by Alcuin. During the course of its reproduction, the copyists found it more convenient to omit the preface Hucusque or to push it further and further toward the end of the book. Others simply inserted portions of the Supplement into their logical places during the course of the liturgical year. The result was the fusion of the original material from the Hadrianum and that of Alcuin’s Supplement, and it is this form that, after being supplemented during the ninth and tenth centuries, found its way back to Rome and was subsequently adopted there.

Bibliography: Critical Edition. Le sacramentaire grégorien: Ses principales formes d’après les plus anciens manuscrits, ed. J. DESHUSSES, v. 1 (Fribourg 1971), v. 2 (Fribourg 1979), v. 3. Commentaries. E. BOURQUE, Études sur les sacramentaires romains, pt. 1, Les Textes primitifs (Rome 1948); pt. 2, Les Textes remaniés, v. 1, Le Gélisien du VIII^e siècle (Quebec 1952), v. 2, Le Sacramentaire d’Hadrien: Le Supplément d’Alcuin et les Grégoriens mixtes (Rome 1958). B. CAPELLE, “La Main de S. Grégoire dans le sacramentaire Grégorien,” Revue Bénédictine 49 (1937) 13–28. H. ASHWORTH, “The Liturgical Prayers of St. Gregory the Great,” Traditio 15 (1959) 107–161. Concerning St. Gregory and the Chant see S. J. P. VAN DIJK, “Gregory the Great Founder of the Urban Schola Cantorum,” Ephemerides liturgicae 77 (1963) 336–356. B. MORETON, The Eighth-Century Gelasian Sacramentary (London 1976). For overview and further bibliographies, see: C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to Sources (Washington, DC 1986); and E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books: From the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville, Minn. 1998).

[H. ASHWORTH]

GREGORIUS AKINDYNOS

14th-century Byzantine monk, priest, and theologian; b. Prilep, Bulgaria, c. 1300; d. c. 1349. Akindynos studied under Thomas Magistros and Gregory PALAMAS in Thessalonika and taught grammar in Beroea. A friend of both BARLAAM OF CALABRIA and Palamas, he tried to mediate between them in 1335 during their controversy over HESYCHASM. However, in 1338 he sided with Palamas and wrote against Barlaam, who was condemned (June 10, 1341) as an outsider who had no appreciation of the Taborite Illumination and was intent upon destroying the monastic ideal.

Further study, however, convinced Akindynos that Barlaam's theological approach in dealing with the distinction between the divine essence and the divine energies was correct, but he failed in his attempt to win Palamas over to his views. After the political changes of October 1341, the patriarch of Constantinople, John XII Calecas, encouraged Akindynos to write against Palamas. Between March and April 1343 Akindynos prepared a report on the origins of his dispute with Palamas and by 1344 had composed seven treatises against the Palamite doctrine. Abetted by Theodore Dexios, he combatted the Palamite teaching in Thessalonika. Then, although he had been considered for the bishopric in Thessalonika, he was condemned instead by a synod in 1347. Again in 1351, two years after his death, his writings were condemned by a synod and his name was placed in the list of heretics anathematized on Orthodox Sunday. He was considered a most dangerous opponent of hesychastic monasticism, and his teachings were combatted by the Emperor John IV Cantacuzenus, the Patriarch Philotheus Coccinus, and Nilus Cabasilas.

Some supposed that he had knowledge of scholastic philosophy, because of a confusion between himself and Prochorus CYDONES. Akindynos rejected the teachings of Palamas that the light of Mt. Tabor was uncreated and visible, and he defended the simplicity of God, the identification of the divine essence and operations, and other anti-Palamite theses. Among his works, which are still mainly unedited, are a Tract in five books against Barlaam, a Diatribe in six books directed against Palamas, two professions of faith most probably submitted to the Empress Anne of Savoy, and a corpus of letters connected with the Palamite controversy. He is credited also with 509 iambic verses describing the errors of Palamas and an Apology to the Patriarch John Calecas.

Bibliography: H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 716–717. M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 1:340–341. M. T. DISDIER, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:263–268. V. LAURENT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1205. R. J. LOENERTZ, Orientalia Christiana periodica 23 (Rome 1957) 114–144, 18 letters. M. CANDAL, ibid. 25 (1959) 215–264, confession of faith. J. MEYENDORFF, A Study of Gregory Palamas, tr. G. LAWRENCE (London 1964).

[H. D. HUNTER]

GREGORY

The name of many ecclesiastics and statesmen in church history. Among the more prominent not given separate articles were the following.

Gregory of Agrigentum (Agrigento), St., 6th-century Byzantine prelate and writer; b. near Agrigentum, Sicily, c. 559; d. after 603 (Feast: Nov. 23). At 18 he traveled through northern Africa and the Near East, and at the age of 31, became bishop. By defamatory accusations, his enemies had him imprisoned; but when he appealed to Rome, Pope GREGORY I adjudged him innocent, and he was received with honor by the Emperor MAURICE. His ten-book commentary on Ecclesiastes has been preserved, and he is known to have written many sermons. He had an influence on the development of Byzantine ecclesiastical and literary styles. His vita was written by Leontius, hegumen of St. Sabas Monastery in Rome.

Gregory of Antioch, patriarch from 570 to 593, Byzantine preacher and writer. Gregory was a monk at the Byzantine monastery in Jerusalem and Sinai and at the Laura of Pharan; Justin II elected him as patriarch of Antioch after the deposition of ANASTASIUS I. He calmed a rebellion of a Byzantine army at Litarba with a speech preserved by Evagrius (Historia ecclesiastica 6.12), and he was esteemed by the Emperors Maurice and Tiberius as well as by Pope Gregory I. Of his many sermons and writings, one discourse on the Resurrection and two on the Baptism (theophany) of Christ have been preserved.

Gregory Dekapolites, St., Byzantine monk; b. Eirenopolis, in the Isaurian Dekapolis, c. 780; d. Constantinople, 842 (Feast: Nov. 20). He became a monk and hermit in Isauria and entered into the dispute over ICONOCLASM. Displaced from the monastery, he traveled to Greece, Sicily, Rome, Thessalonika, and Constantinople, where he resided during the reign of Leo V, the Isaurian. His biography was written by Ignatius the Deacon. A short "History of the Conversion of an Arab," attributed to him, was later enlarged with dragon legends of St. GEORGE.

Gregory Magistros, Armenian prince; b. Armenia, c. 990; d. 1058. The son of Prince Vassak Pahlavuni, he became Prince of Betšni (1021), but under Turkish pressure surrendered his dominions to Emperor Constantine IX Monomachus (1045) and dedicated his last years to letters. He taught at the University of Constantinople and wrote poetry, including a verse paraphrase of the Bible, a panegyric on the Holy Cross, and a collection of 88 letters of dogmatic, philosophical, and literary content. He also translated into Armenian some works of Plato, Euclid, and Olympiodorus the Younger and a commentary on the Grammar of Dionysius Thrax.

Gregory Narek, Armenian mystical theologian and poet; b. 951; d. 1001 (feast, Armenian Church, Feb. 27). He was the son of Bishop Chosrov the Great; he lived and died in the monastery of Narek in Eastern Armenia. Gregory became a priest and Vardapet (prelate) and wrote a commentary on the Canticle of Canticles, influenced by GREGORY OF NYSSA, a commentary on ch. 38 of the Book of Job, an Epistle against the Thondrakians (Armenian Paulicians), a history of the Cross of Aparan, liturgical hymns, and prayers. His writings are characterized by deep thought and the use of mystical imagery. His most important work is a collection of sacred elegies, or Book of Lamentations.

Gregory II Vkakaser, or Martyr-lover, Armenian catholicos and translator; d. 1105 (feast in the Armenian Church, Aug. 3). Gregory Vkakaser, related to the family of Gregory the Illuminator, was the son of Gregory Magistros, and became catholicos in 1065. He journeyed to Rome in 1074 to discuss union with Pope GREGORY VII and remained in correspondence with Rome. As a result of further travels in Palestine and Egypt he collected and published the Armenian acts of the martyrs and with his disciples translated into Armenian a commentary on the Apocalypse and the panegyric and the life of JOHN CHRYSOSTOM by Proclus.

Gregory III Pablav, Armenian catholicos (1113–66) and ecclesiastical writer; b. c. 1093; d. 1166. The nephew of GREGORY II, he was elected catholicos in 1113, and was faced with a schism on the part of Abp. David of Aghtamar. Pursuing the contacts with Rome initiated by his predecessor, he corresponded with Popes HONORIUS II and INNOCENT II. With his brother Bishop Nerses he attended the Latin Councils of Antioch (1139) and Jerusalem (1142), and accepted the doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon. Upon rejection of his advances by the Greeks, he sent an embassy to Pope EUGENE III at Viterbo and received the pallium in return. He retired in old age and appointed his brother Nerses IV Schnorhali as successor. He left a legacy of correspondence, hymns, and liturgical writings.

Gregory IV Tegha, Armenian catholicos and writer; b. 1133; d. 1193. He was the nephew and successor (1173) of Nerses IV Schnorhali as catholicos, and he pursued union with the Byzantine Church. In the Synod of Hromela (1179), with 33 bishops, he subscribed to a profession of faith that was rejected by the Greeks on the death of Manuel I Comnenus (1143–80) but accepted by Pope LUCIUS III, (1184) who sent Gregory the pallium. His Elegy on Jerusalem decries the Islamic siege of that city in 1187, and his letters describe his difficulties with antiunionist priests and monks.

Gregory of Tat'ew, 14th-century Armenian theologian, b. Vayo Jor, 1340; d. Tat'ew, 1411. He is honored as a saint by the Orthodox Armenian Church. A pupil of John Kachik, he had studied both Eastern and scholastic philosophy and theology in the monastery schools of Aprakouniq, Tat'ew, and Mecop', and achieved renown as a preacher. He opposed both the Armenian Catholics and the schismatics of Aghtamar and wrote commentaries on almost all the books of the Old Testament, as well as on Porphyry, Aristotle, and the Armenian philosopher David.

Bibliography: Gregory of Agrigentum. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 98:741–1182. J. KRAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1205. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich. Gregory of Antioch. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 88:1847–66, H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 399. O. VOLK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1206. Gregory of Decapolis. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 100:1199–1212. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 579. F. DVORNIK, Le Vie de saint Grégoire Décapolite (Paris 1926). F. HALKIN, Analecta Bollandiana 69 (1951) 393–394. H. HUNGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1206. Gregory Magistros. H. HUNGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1208. V. LANGLOIS, “Mémoire sur la vie et les écrits du prince Grégoire Magistros,” Journal Asiatique, ser. 6, ser. 13 (1869) 5–64. M. LEROY, “Grégoire Magistros et les traductions arméniennes d’auteurs grecs,” Annuaire de l’Institut de Philologie et d’Histoire Orientales et Slaves 3 (1935) 263–294. Gregory Narek. J. SALAVILLE, Catholicisme 5:255. M. VAN DEN OUDENRIJN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1209. Gregory II Vkakaser. H. F. TOURNEBIZE, Histoire politique et religieuse de l’Arménie (Paris 1910) 163–167. H. HUNGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1209. Gregory III Pablav. H. F. TOURNEBIZE, op. cit. 235–239. V. INGLISIAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1213–14. Gregory IV Tegha. H. F. TOURNEBIZE, op. cit. 253–258. V. INGLISIAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1215–16. Gregory of Tat'ew. M. VAN DEN OUDENRIJN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1215.

[E. EL-HAYEK]

GREGORY II CYPRIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

1283 to 1289; b. Cyprus, 1241; d. Constantinople, 1290. He was baptized George. Gregory studied at a Frankish school in Cyprus, but traveled to Ephesus, Nicaea, and Constantinople in search of the learning of his Greek heritage, which he found under Gregory Acropolitans (1266–73). He became lector and cleric in Constantinople, and under the Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS (1259–82) strongly supported the movement for reunion with Rome.

However, in 1283 he changed his position; he supported the Emperor ANDRONICUS II, took part in the synod that condemned John Beccos, and wrote against Beccos. On the death of the Patriarch Joseph (1283), Gregory was selected to succeed him. In his attempt to refute Beccos on the procession of the Holy Spirit, he published a new theory in his Tome on Faith (Tomos pisteos), and was attacked by both the enemies and supporters of reunion. He defended himself in an apology, a confession (homologia), and a letter to Andronicus II; but in 1289 he had to resign as patriarch and retire to a monastery, where he died the following year. Gregory composed encomia in honor of his patron St. Gregory, St. Marina, Dionysius the Areopagite, and St. Euthymius of Madyta. He wrote also a life of the monk St. LAZARUS THE CONFESSOR of Mt. Galesius. He wrote an autobiography (Diegesis Merike) as an introduction to a collection of his letters and several treatises on rhetoric and mythology.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 142-19-30, autobiography, 233–300. F. CAYRÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.1:1231–35. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 677–679, 685–686. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1207–08. G. MISCH, Zeitschrift für Geschichte der Erziehung 21 (1931) 1–16. W. LAMEERE, La tradition de la correspondance de Grégoire de Chypre (Brussels 1937). Acta Sanctorum Nov. 3:588–606, St. Lazarus. His letters have been edited by S. EUSTRATIADIS (Alexandria 1910).

[F. CHIOVARO]

GREGORY III, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

1443 to 1451, apostle of reunion; b. Constantinople, 1400; d. Rome, 1459. Of the family of the Melissenoi, called Mamme, Gregory became a monk (1415–20), superior of the monastery of the Pantocrator, and confessor to the Emperor JOHN VIII PALAEOLOGUS (1425–48), who selected him to represent the patriarch of Alexandria at the Council of Ferrara-Florence (1439–41). At first, strongly opposed to Rome, he countered the unionistic efforts of the Emperor at Ferrara. However, in 1439 he accepted and signed the formula of union and engaged in a campaign to offset the antiunion opposition in Byzantium, particularly that on the part of Mark EUGENICUS, Metropolitan of Ephesus, and George Scholarius (later Patriarch Gennadius II). He composed the Emperor's letter to the patriarch of Alexandria on the reunion of the Churches, two Apologies against Eugenicus, a commentary on the Creed for the Emperor of Trebizond, and still unedited tracts on the primacy of the pope, the use of unleavened bread, and celestial beatitude. As patriarch of Constantinople, he encountered the hostility of the antiunionists, particularly among the monks and his own clergy. In 1450 he retired to the Peloponnese Islands and then (1452) to Rome, where he presided over the Greek territories under Venetian control until his death.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 160:13–248. L. MOHLER, Kardinal Bessarion 3 v. (Paderborn 1923–42); “Zwei unedierte griechische Briefe über das Unionskonzil von Ferrara-Florenz,” Oriens Christianus 6 (1916) 213–222. L. PETIT “Documents relatifs au Concile de Florence,” Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. GRAFFIN and F. NAU (Paris 1903–) 17 (1923) 309–524. J. GILL, The Council of Florence (Cambridge, Eng. 1959). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 763–764. V. LAURENT, Catholicisme 5:273–274; “Le Vrai surnom du Patriarche de Constantinople Grégoire III,” Revue des études byzantines 14 (1956) 201–205. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1208.

[L. VEREECKE]

GREGORY (THE GREAT) I, ST. POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 3, 590, to March 12, 604; Doctor of the Church; b. Rome, c. 540.

Early Years. The son of Gordian, a minor official in the Church, and Sylvia, Gregory belonged to a patrician family that had ties to the papacy. FELIX III (483–492) was Gregory's grandfather, and Gregory may also have been related to Pope AGAPETUS (535–536). Considering the tumultuous nature of his time, Gregory received an excellent education, especially in law. Gregory of Tours said that he was dedicated to God from his youth; and his Christian alignment was fostered by the holiness of his mother and two aunts, Aemiliana and Tharsilla. Having entered the civil service, Gregory was prefect of the city by 573. In this position he provided for the defense, food supply, finances, and policing of Rome, as well as handling judicial matters for member of the Senatorial order (the Senate having ceased to function by this time). The experience thus garnered gave him a knowledge of business affairs as well as a sense of responsibility and a respect for authority. He had been in office for only a short while when his father died and he decided to become a monk and follow “the grace of conversion that he had put off for a long time.” Soon after 573 he turned his family home, on the Clivus Scauri of the Coelian Hill, into a monastery dedicated to St. Andrew and provided for the founding of six monasteries on his family's property in Sicily. By meditation and study he acquired a wide knowledge of the Latin Fathers and a profound acquaintance with the Scriptures. His excessive fasting undermined his health and brought on the stomach trouble that remained a lifelong trial for him.

Apocrisiarius in Constantinople. Gregory was called back to public life in the service of the Church. Between 575 and 578 he was ordained a regional deacon by either Benedict I (575–8) or by Pelagius II (578–590). In 579 he was sent to Constantinople as APOCRISIARIUS, the papal representative at the Byzantine court under the emperors Tiberius II and Maurice. While the extent of his knowledge of Greek learned here is debated, he did acquire wide experience of the problems both political and ecclesiastical then troubling the empire, vainly sought Byzantine military aid against the Lombards who had invaded Italy, and made the acquaintance of many outstanding personalities of the time, including LEANDER OF SEVILLE, John the Faster (patriarch of Constantinople) and Anastasius (ex-patriarch of Antioch). He had acquaintances in the royal court and served as godfather to Emperor Maurice's eldest son. During this time, he also entered into a theological debate with the patriarch Eutychius over the nature of the resurrection body. It seems that Eutychius held an Origenistic understanding of the subtlety of the resurrection body, which Gregory found unorthodox. In Constantinople Gregory lived a monastic life with the monks he had brought with him. At their request he delivered a series of conferences in the form of a commentary on the Book of Job. These conferences were later developed into his largest work, the Moralia.

Return to Rome. Gregory was recalled to Rome c. 585/6, and while it seems that he did not assume direction of the monastery of St. Andrew, as deacon of the Roman Church he served as counselor to Pope Pelagius II. He was involved in the effort to heal the schism between Rome and the bishops of Istria, which had endured since the condemnation of the Three Chapters by Pope Vigilius I at the Council of Constantinople II (553). During 587 the tenuous peace held with the Lombards was broken and war ensued. This was followed in 589 by an overflow of the Tiber that brought a new outbreak of the plague during which Pelagius II died (January 590). Gregory was elected as his successor by popular acclaim, but he insisted upon waiting for the approval of the Byzantine Emperor Maurice before being consecrated. Gregory dedicated himself to the people, who were dying off as though they were "shot down by arrows from the sky." He organized a three-day penitential procession in which the clergy and laity, arranged in seven groups, met at designated churches, then, under the leadership of the clergy of the seven regions, marched "to meet together at the basilica of the Blessed Mother." Gregory suggested to the people that the plague was a divine affliction that they should accept as a means of turning to God, and with fatherly encouragement he raised their panic-stricken spirits. His reluctance to assume the papal office gave rise to legends, particularly the story of an attempt to flee Rome hidden inside a basket. With the emperor's approval Gregory was consecrated. His early letters as pope betray his acute consciousness of the oppression he experienced in leaving the safety of life as a contemplative monk and being preoccupied with business matters and the care of the whole Church, which he felt had been entrusted to so weak an agent. In the language of the times, however, he confessed that he "obediently followed what the merciful hand of the Lord had been pleased to bring about in his regard," and sent his synodical letter to the patriarchs of the East, together with a brief profession of faith. Gregory's letter was addressed to considerations of the pastoral and priestly office, enunciating a concerted program of high ideals for the universal Church.

Pope Gregory I.

The Lombards. Italy had been invaded by the Lombards in 568; they set up their kingdom in the north and succeeded in establishing duchies near Rome in Spoleto and Benevento. The territory embracing Rome and Ravenna, in which the exarch (the emperor's representative) lived, was still an imperial possession. While Emperor Maurice did not send help, he refused to enter a truce lest this legalize the presence of the barbarians, and the exarch was entrusted with this unrealistic policy. After vain representations, Gregory made a truce with Ariulf of Spoleto, who threatened an invasion of Rome in 592. When the Byzantine exarch broke this agreement, Agilulf, the Lombard king, descended on Rome from Turin bent on destroying the city (593). Gregory rallied the defenders and personally dealt with Agilulf. He saved Rome by paying out a large sum of money and agreeing to a yearly tribute. Intent on achieving a general peace, Gregory appealed to the exarch, who turned a deaf ear to the pope's plans and wrote a critical report to the emperor. Maurice replied in what has been termed the "Fool" letter. Under the euphemistic word "simple" (fatuus), Gregory claimed, Maurice had called him a fool, and in return he sent off a letter "such as few emperors had ever received from one of their subjects" (Dudden 2.26). The pope admitted he was a fool for staying at his post and suffering "amid the swords of the Lombards." But he defended his work "for my country," and informed the emperor that his trust was in the mercy of Jesus Christ at His coming, rather than in the justice of the emperor. The restoration of peace had to wait until 598. Gregory's dealing with the Lombards led to important consequences. The people thereafter looked to the pope as their true protector since he had recognized the failure of the civil government and had saved Italy by personally assuming responsibility. This action made him a de facto, but not de jure, civil ruler and constituted one of the steps leading to the creation of the Papal States when the pope became a de jure temporal ruler.

The Papal Patrimony. The papal patrimony consisted of lands in Italy, Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, Gaul, Africa, and Illyricum. The pope was the landlord of these properties, whose revenues were used for the many needs of the Church. Each patrimony was controlled by a rector appointed by the pope. With his fine sense of justice as an administrator, Gregory rebuked agents who enlarged the estates by ruthlessly disregarding the rights of others or who kept back goods in time of plenty to sell them at a higher price in time of need, and he insisted that the purse of the Church was "not to be polluted by sinful gain." The patrimonies were Gregory's means of helping the poor, the destitute, and families displaced or separated by war. Upon his appointment, Gregory had admonished each rector "to care for the poor," and "to promote not so much the worldly interests of the Church but the relief of the needy in their distress." Gregory insisted that he was dispensing not his own property, but the property of the poor, that the goods belonged to St. Peter, who was caring for his flock through Gregory. The papal treasury was used to ransom captives and restore them to their families and to buy peace by paying off the Lombards.

In this respect, he ironically called himself the paymaster of the Lombards and the Emperor's paymaster.

The Liturgy. Gregory's contributions to the liturgy have been extremely difficult to assess. His involvement in the Gregorian Sacramentary continues to be hotly debated. The Gregorian Sacramentary, basically a modification of the Gelasian Sacramentary, was continually worked and reworked until the ninth century thus making any definitive statements very difficult. Gregory seems to have been involved in a revival of the station churches as is seen in his ordering of a penitential procession upon Pelagius' death and his election. At various times it has been posited that he was perhaps responsible for standardizing the practice of having the Kyrie Eleison and the Christe eleison sung alternately by the clergy and laity; decreeing that the Alleluia should be used throughout the entire year except on penitential days; limiting the deacons to the singing of the Gospel; stressing the importance of the homily; and adding to the Hanc igitur these words: "Dispose our days in your peace. Also, save us from eternal damnation and command that we be numbered in the flock of your Elect." The present position of the Pater Noster is most likely his work. Others have also asserted that many of the prayer texts in use today stem from Gregory, for example, the Christmas Preface, the Oratio for Epiphany, and the Prefaces of Easter and Ascension [J. A. Jungmann, The Mass of the Roman Rite 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 1:63].

Gregory and the East. The synodical letter to the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem indicates that Gregory accepted the precedence of the sees, ranking Constantinople first. From at least the fourth century, ecclesiastical union was achieved among the sees by the acceptance of such letters, and each patriarch ruled in his own jurisdiction. Gregory continued this custom and would not directly contact the bishop of another patriarchate without going through the patriarch. However, the right of appeal over the patriarch to Rome was generally recognized, and Gregory did reverse the decision against two priests handed down at Constantinople. Friction between Rome and Constantinople was occasioned by John IV the Faster's use of the title "ecumenical patriarch." Pelagius II had refused to acknowledge a council held at Constantinople in 587 since it was held without his authorization and because in the acts of the council the patriarch was called ecumenical. Great import was attached to the title since the council had cited the patriarch of Antioch to appear before it. Actually, the title was not new. It had been used by the Constantinopolitan patriarchs during the Acacian Schism (484–519) and the reign of Justinian I (527–565). In 595 Gregory received an appeal from two priests condemned at Constantinople. In the acts he saw that “practically on every page the patriarch of Constantinople was designated as ecumenical.” His opposition to the term was not mere ecclesiastical sensitivity, but reflected pastoral and ecclesiological concerns. Gregory appears most of all to have been upset by the “pride” he felt was entailed in the title. In apocalyptic tones he compares this title to the “name of blasphemy” (Ep.V.37; cv V.44). Gregory taught that all bishops were in one sense “ecumenical” and that the use of this term to refer to a specific bishop was “robbing” another of his due. In response to the Patriarch of Constantinople who, in calling Gregory ‘universal pope’ had misunderstood Gregory’s problem with the term, he wrote, “I am correctly honored when each is not denied the honor due him; for if you call me ‘universal pope,’ you deny that you are what you call me universally” (Ep. VIII.29). In his counterclaim he asserted the universal jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome, but made it clear that this should be used with humility, and he referred to himself constantly as the Servant of the Servants of God. Although not new, this title was typically Gregorian and was incorporated into the list of titles of the popes. As Servant of the Servants of God, Gregory taught that the Apostolic See is “the head of all the churches.” It is the See of Peter “to whom was committed the care and primacy of the whole Church”; as such it is the caput fidei. Gregory asserted that “the See of Constantinople is subject to the Apostolic See,” and that there was no bishop who was not subject to the See of Rome, “which is set over all the churches.” He also recognized the fact that other churches had their own accepted territories of jurisdiction. If he defended his own rights, he was careful “to observe the rights of the different churches.” The jurisdiction of each of his brother bishops had to be safeguarded, otherwise “the ecclesiastical order is destroyed by us through whom it ought to be preserved.” Gregory further contended (and has been quoted with satisfaction by Pope Paul VI): “My honor is the honor of the universal Church. It is also the solid authority of my brothers. I am truly honored only when the honor due to each and every one of them is not denied to them.”

Gregory and the West. As Patriarch of the West, Gregory’s jurisdiction embraced the three prefectures of Italy, the two Gauls, and Eastern Illyricum. In this vast territory, his jurisdiction was complicated by the civil rule of the Byzantine exarch in Africa and by the independent kingdoms resulting from the barbarian nations who invaded Gaul and elsewhere. He met this challenge generally by acting through the metropolitans, whom he recognized as adequate in their proper jurisdictions.

Italy and Africa. As Bishop of Rome and metropolitan of the suburban regions, Gregory had immediate ecclesiastical control of all Italy from Tuscany south. He looked to the canonical regularity of the election of bishops, who were then consecrated in Rome; he supervised their lives, championed their rights, and helped them in need. Charges against bishops were judged in Rome by the pope, usually during their annual assembly in Rome on the feast of St. Peter. The bishops from Sicily came every three years; aware of the difficulties of traveling such a distance, Gregory changed this to every five years. The other Italian metropolitan sees were Ravenna, Milan, and Aquileia. Aquileia called for special attention. Istrian bishops in that province were still in schism because of the condemnation of the Three Chapters. By insisting that the belief of Rome was the teaching defined at Chalcedon and that the Council of Constantinople II did not reverse the work of Chalcedon, Gregory succeeded in winning over some of these bishops, but the schism was finally healed only after his death. In his dealings with Africa Gregory acceded to the request of the bishops of Numidia that their local customs be maintained, and insisted only that no convert from Donatism be made primate. Regarding ecclesiastical privileges, he informed Donatus of Carthage that the pope not only defends his own rights but respects those of others. His aim was “to honor my brothers” and “to maintain the honor of each one, provided there is no conflict.” Letters to Africa were frequent and called for episcopal vigilance, the holding of councils, and the help of civil and church leaders in curbing the troublesome Donatists.

Spain, Gaul, and England. To Gregory, the conversion of the Arian Visigoths in 589 was “a great miracle.” Relations with Spain had been delicate because of Visigothic nationalism and the token of Byzantine power in the south. But with St. Leander as bishop of Seville, Gregory found the Church in Spain in good hands. A request from Gaul in 593 to restore the papal vicariate at Arles was well received by Gregory, who “was glad of the opportunity to extend his influence in the kingdom of the Franks, and too clever not to profit by it” (Batiffol, 203). The Merovingians had split the kingdom into separate units, and each ruler looked upon the Church as “his church.” In restoring the vicariate, Gregory linked the Church in Gaul with Rome and the Church universal. Numerous letters were sent to the vicar, bishops, and rulers denouncing simony, lay interference, and ordinations of laymen without the proper preparation. Gregory called for a council to carry out Christian renewal. The council, held in 614, ten years after his death, reflected Gregory’s program for reform and peace, even though the Merovingians kept their hold over the episcopate of each kingdom. The mission to the Anglo-Saxons was inaugurated when Gregory discovered that these invaders had not been evangelized by the native clergy of Britain. Stirred to action, he decided to use monasticism in furthering the missionary projects of the papacy. From his monastery of St. Andrew he sent St. Augustine of Canterbury and 40 monks to carry out his project. The work began in 597 and was helped by Bertha, the Catholic wife of King Ethelbert and a descendant of Clovis. In time, Celtic monks from Iona joined in the evangelization being carried on by the Benedictine monks from Rome, and the Byzantine Theodore of Tarsus was sent from Rome in 668 to reorganize the mission.

Gregory as a Writer. In a period of decline, Gregory stands out as the proclaimer of the Christian message accommodated to every situation and class. He is a bridge over which the wisdom and culture of the past were passed on and preserved. To have done this in an age of chaos is a significant achievement. In a special way he was the expounder of the Christian way of life, reaching to the heights of mysticism and contemplation. He presented his teaching not in a speculative or theoretical manner, but in the existential setting of the concrete human person with his immediate capacity for greatness and smallness, for response and refusal.

Scriptural Homilies. Gregory's textbook was the Bible, and many of his writings are scriptural homilies or conferences. The 40 Homilies on the Gospel, delivered in 590–592, show the importance of the homily in the liturgical celebrations of Sundays and feasts. These are pastoral talks in which he often introduces stories to make the doctrine graphic. In this he is a pathfinder. The historical conditions in which he lived, with wars and plagues as constants, explain his stress on the end of the world, death, hell, and heaven. His aim was to have the people constantly ready to meet their Judge. The 22 Homilies on Ezekiel (592), revised eight years later, are much more profound. Based on the first four and the fortieth chapters of Ezekiel, these sermons contain sublime passages dealing with Christ, the Church, the active and contemplative life, suffering, ideals of the priesthood, and the Christian life as rooted in faith, hope, and charity. They contain precious historical eyewitness accounts of Italy and the Lombards. The concluding passage is a literary masterpiece. With Agilulf's army at the gates of Rome, Gregory dispensed with instruction and turned to comfort his terrified people, urging them to give thanks even in the midst of their tears and sorrows, "for He who created us has also become a Father to us by the spirit of adoption that He gave us." The Homilies on the Canticle of Canticles are now generally agreed to be genuine, although only a portion of the work seems to have survived. (See Ep. XII.6) This work is similar to the Moralia in tone and, like it, seems to have been compiled as spiritual reflections to be delivered to a monastic audience. It most likely dates from just prior to his pontificate to shortly thereafter (593–597). There is another work titled Expo- sitions on the First Book of Kings which is most likely Gregorian, although its authenticity has recently been questioned. This work seems to date from the middle period of his pontificate. It was revised by the Abbot Claudius as well as retouched again by Gregory toward the very end of his life.

Moralia. Gregory's longest work is the Book of Morals, an exposition of the Book of Job. The text was begun during or shortly after 579 in Constantinople, but not completed until at least 595 when Gregory sent an early copy to his friend Leander of Seville. The work must have been revised again after this time as well because the final edition of the work in 35 books mentions the Augustinian mission to England which was not begun until 596. Begun as conferences to the monks when Gregory was in Constantinople, the work opens with the literal meaning of the Scriptures, delves most liberally into the mystical and allegorical interpretation, and then points out moral applications. Although it is not strictly a work of scriptural exegesis by today's standards, it is impossible to follow it without constant reference to the Book of Job. The texts are used as starting points for spiritual conferences. It is a summa or storehouse of dogma, moral asceticism, and mysticism. It deals with the totality of Christian doctrine from God the Creator to God the Rewarder. These truths are not treated in a topical and unified manner; nevertheless there is unity in the work because moral teaching and asceticism are not fragmented disciplines but vital parts of the one, undivided science of theology, whose object is God. As a storehouse of theology, the Morals was a vade mecum for the later centuries.

Pastoral Care. In the Pastoral Care, written in the first months of his pontificate, Gregory defended his attempt to escape the papacy by setting forth his ideas on the office of bishops and the care of souls. In four books he delved into (1) the type of person and the proper motives for the pastoral office, (2) the virtues required in a pastor, (3) the manner of preaching to different types of people (40 types in all, described with psychological acumen), and (4) the need for an examination of conscience so that the pastor will not neglect himself in caring for others. During Gregory's lifetime this book was translated into Greek. Under King Alfred the Great it was translated (901) into Old English (West Saxon). During the Middle Ages Gregory's Pastoral was for bishops and priests what the Rule of St. Benedict was for monks. The Pastoral parallels the Dialogues, for the Dialogues were to the simple and uneducated people what the Pastoral was for bishops and priests.

Dialogues. The authenticity for the dialogues has been recently brought into question by Francis Clark, however, most scholars are comfortable in maintaining Gregorian authorship. In 593–594 Gregory wrote The Four Books of Dialogues on the Life and Miracles of the Italian Fathers [i.e., Saints] and on the Immortality of Souls. In the form of a conversation between Gregory and Peter the Deacon, the first three books detail, with emphasis on the miraculous, the holiness of sixth-century saints. The entire second book deals with the greatest of them all, St. Benedict. Gregory insisted that the true value of life is measured in virtue and not in miracles and that there are saints who, even if they do not work miracles, are just as good as those who do (Dial. 1.12). In these stories he shows that holiness is not confined to the days of old, that God is wonderful in His saints, and that the intercession of holy people is powerful with God even to the working of miracles. The fourth book, on the immortality of the soul, treats of death, purgatory, heaven, and hell. This book is important both psychologically and doctrinally. To the simple-minded people, driven to despair regarding not only this life but also the next, Gregory insisted upon the immortality of the soul and life everlasting by vividly describing the death scenes of the wicked surrounded by devils and of the good surrounded by saints and angels. Visions of saints point to the immortality of the soul in everlasting happiness. His goal was to encourage people to bear the trials of life and to fix their sights on heaven. Gregory's doctrine on heaven is important because he was the first to teach categorically the possibility of the immediate entrance of the soul into heaven. For him there was no intermediate stage where saintly souls wait to enter heaven only on the last day. For those not yet ready to behold God face to face after death, there is purgatory. Gregory explained this very clearly and pointed out the value of the Eucharistic Sacrifice in helping these souls to attain heaven more speedily. Frequently misinterpreted as oversimplifications and miracle-filled legends, the Dialogues are basically a literary genre in which Gregory used stories to give doctrinal information and moral and ascetical stimulation to the simple and uneducated. The stories show that God is still with His own, always present and helpful, despite human wickedness and opposition. "The Dialogues were The City of God rewritten for the simple" (Batiffol, 182).

Letters. The 14 books of Gregory's Letters are a source of information of the first order for his pontificate. They deal with the Church, the empire, the Germanic invaders, bishops, monasticism, and the missionary and social aspects of the Church, and are a rich source for an understanding of the theology, liturgy, history, psychology, and sociology of the age. The letters reveal Gregory as a capable administrator and throw light on his teachings as they were applied to particular persons and situations. Most of all, they reveal Gregory in his accomplishments and failures, his talents and limitations; they portray the sixth-century Roman who became the saintly man of God. It should be cautioned, however, that the papal scrinium, which was responsible for the correspondence of the popes, had established a system for writing "form letters" and one must be careful in teasing out any great doctrinal or spiritual truths from a few letters.

History. By his position as the bridge between the ancient and the medieval world, Gregory was an instigator of the Anglo-Saxon and the Carolingian culture. The Benedictines looked to Gregory as their own and gave his works worldwide diffusion. To the Middle Ages he was the mouthpiece of the Christian way of life and was a first-class authority in moral, ascetical, and mystical theology. In moral theology Gregory is the most frequently cited of the Latin Fathers. In 242 articles of the second part of the Summa theologiae, St. Thomas Aquinas cited him 374 times; and Gratian showed the influence of Gregory in the field of Canon Law. Gregory was officially named among the "great Doctors of the Church" by Boniface VIII in 1298. Gregory's influence continued in the age of the German and Spanish mystics and on through the Enlightenment and declined only in the 19th century, with its emphasis on nationalism in historical method and research. The rediscovery of Gregory was a phenomenon of the 20th century. In 1904 Pope (St.) Pius X wrote an encyclical to commemorate the 13th centenary of Gregory's death. Gradually, deconfessionalized research recaptured the mentality of the ages that called him great. H. Marrou remarked: "We can understand why writers in the Middle Ages. . . accorded him a place beside and equal to St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine as one of the four Doctors of the Latin Church. . . . Only in our own day are we beginning to recognize the truth of this judgment."

Art. The representation of Gregory in art continues a tradition widespread in the Middle Ages that he received his teachings directly from the Holy Spirit. He is usually pictured as writing or dictating to Peter the Deacon, with a dove, the symbol of the Holy Spirit, resting on his head, and its beak in his mouth. Peter the Deacon of Rome affirmed that he saw this happen. A passage in Gregory's Homilies on Ezekiel (2.2.1) supplied a further basis for this tradition. He said there that often the meaning of a scriptural text came to him while he was actually preaching, that God gave it to him for the sake of the people, and that he himself was learning while he was teaching.

Feast: March 12.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) v.75–79. Gregorii Magni opera = Opere

di Gregorio Magno CCSL text. 7 volumes, (Rome, 1992). Registrum epistolarum, ed. P. EWALD and L. M. HARTMANN, Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–) division: Epistolae, v.1–2; Expositiones in Canticum Canticorum et in Librum Primum Regum, ed. P. VERBRAKEN (Corpus Christianorum. Series latina [Turnhout, Belg. 1953–] 144; 1963). Commentaire sur le Cantique des cantiques, ed. and tr., R. BELANGER, Sources chretiennes 314. In Librum primum Regum expositionum, ed. and tr., A. DE VOGUE, Sources chretiennes 351, 391, 432, 449. Dialogues, tr. O. J. ZIMMERMAN, Fathers of the Church Series (New York, 1959). Homiliae in Hiezechielem prophetam, ed. and tr. C. MOREL, Sources Chretiennes 327, 360. Moralia in Iob, ed. and tr. A. DE GAUDEMARIS, Sources chretiennes 32, 212, 221. Ibid. ed. and tr. M. ADRIAEN, Corpus christianorum series latina 143. Morals on the Book of Job, tr. J. BLISS, (Oxford, 1844–50) Library of Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, vol. 18, 21, 23, 31. Liber regulae pastoralis, ed. F. ROMMEL, tr. C. MOREL, Sources chretiennes 381, 382. XL Homiliarum in Evangelia, ed. and tr. R. ETAIX, Corpus christianorum series latina 141. Forty Gospel Homilies, tr. D. HURST, (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1990). The Book of Pastoral Rule and Selected Epistles of Gregory the Great, tr. J. BARMBY (Grand Rapids 1979). Pastoral Care, ed. and tr. H. DAVIS (Ancient Christian Writers, ed. J. QUASTEN et al. [Westminster, MD 1946–] 11; 1950). R. GODDING, Bibliografia di Gregorio Magno (1890/1989) (Rome 1990); and, “Les dialogues. . . de Gregoire le Grand. A Propos d’un livre recent,” Analecta Bollandiana 106 (1988): 201–29. P. AUBIN, “Interiorite et exteriorite dans les Moralia in Iob de saint Gregoire le Grand” Recherches de science religieuse 62 (1974): 117–66. F. CLARK, The Pseudo-Gregorian Dialogues 2 vols. (Leiden 1987). C. DAGENS, Gregoire le Grand: culture et experience chretiennes (Paris 1977). F. H. DUDDEN, Gregory the Great, 2 v. (London 1905). L. BRÉHIER and R. AIGRAIN, Gregoire le Grand (A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l’église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours [Paris 1935–] 5; 1938). N. SHARKEY, St. Gregory the Great’s Concept of Papal Power (Washington 1956). M. FRICKEL, Deus totus ubique simul (Freiburg 1956). J. LECLERCQ, “La doctrine de saint Gregoire,” Histoire de la spiritualite chretienne. Vol. 2 (Paris 1961): 72–83. J. P. MCCLAIN, The Doctrine of Heaven in the Writings of St. Gregory the Great (Washington 1956). R. A. MARKUS, Gregory the Great and His World (Cambridge 1997). P. MEYVAERT, “The Enigma of Gregory the Great’s Dialogues: A Response to Francis Clark,” Journal of Ecclesiastical History 39 (1988) 335–81. C. STRAW, Gregory the Great: Perfection in Imperfection (Los Angeles 1988); and, Gregory the Great (Brookfield, VT 1996). L. M. WEBER, Hauptfragen der Moralthologie Gregors des Grossen (Fribourg 1947); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1177–80. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Streenbrugge 1961). A. C. RUSH, Theological Studies 23 (1962) 569–589, martyrdom.

[A. C. RUSH/K. HESTER]

GREGORY II, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: May 19, 715 to Feb. 11, 731. Born c. 669, Gregory was a member of a wealthy noble Roman family. At a young age he entered the papal curia where he was educated for service in the papal bureaucracy. He was made a subdeacon and appointed to a major financial office (sacellarius) responsible for dispensing the funds of the papal government by Pope SERGIUS I (687–701); subsequently he served the curia as librarian (bibliothecarius). As a deacon he accompanied Pope CONSTANTINE I (708–715) to Constantinople in 710 where he played an important role in negotiations with Emperor JUSTINIAN II that addressed issues arising from the disputed canons of the QUINISEXT Council in Trullo of 692.

Gregory II’s pontificate was one of the most important of the 8th century, marked by the confluence of several trends that redefined the position of the papacy in the political and religious scene. The forces that had been working for some time to dissolve the ties linking the papacy to the imperial regime in Constantinople were dramatically accentuated during Gregory II’s pontificate, a development that pointed toward greater independence for the papacy but also threatened to deprive Rome of its long-time protector, the emperor. In no small part because of the decline of imperial power in Italy, the Lombard kingdom became increasingly aggressive to the point where it threatened to absorb the duchy of Rome and to reduce the Pope to the status of a regional bishop. But there were new opportunities that allowed the papacy to expand its influence north of the Alps into the world dominated by the Franks. Gregory II responded to the changing scene with actions that marked a decisive point in establishing the independence of the papacy, securing its control over Rome and the surrounding territory, and expanding its ties with the Frankish world.

The Clash with Constantinople. The most dramatic events of Gregory II’s pontificate centered around his confrontations with the eastern Roman emperor. The relationship between Rome and Constantinople had been relatively peaceful since the settlement of the Monothelite dispute at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE in 680–681. In part, the peace was due to the weakness of the eastern Roman Empire, under attack from external enemies, especially the triumphant Muslim forces, and torn by internal dissent. All that changed with the accession of Emperor LEO III (717–741). His reign began with a decisive victory over the Muslim forces besieging Constantinople that blunted their westward advance into the heart of the empire. Following that victory, he initiated measures to restore internal order in the empire, including reforms of the military and administrative systems. In 717 he decided to replenish the imperial treasury by imposing new taxes, especially on his Italian subjects. Faced with a major loss of revenue resulting from the new burden on the papal patrimonies, Gregory II refused to comply with imperial orders. His defiance earned him a hero’s role among all in Byzantine Italy who were opposed to paying taxes imposed by a distant ruler whose policies had little bearing on their interests or well-being in Italy. Leo III and his agents responded by organizing plots aimed at murdering Gregory II, but those plans were repeatedly thwarted by local military forces in Rome and elsewhere in Italy which came to the defense of the Pope. That resistance made it clear that the imperial military establishment in Italy could no longer be trusted to defend imperial interests or enforce imperial policies; its concerns, interests, and allegiances had become local.

Leo III soon provided an even stronger cause for challenging his authority. In 726 he undertook on his own authority to introduce a major change in religious policy aimed at ending the use of images (icons) in religious ceremonies and church decoration. This was a policy fraught with major doctrinal implications, certain to threaten deeply rooted cult practices sacred to many of the faithful, and destined to alienate important elements in the Byzantine ecclesiastical system, especially the monastic establishment. In the face of an imperial order to recognize the new policy, Gregory II denounced ICONOCLASM as heresy. He dispatched two letters to the emperor the authenticity of which is highly doubtful in the form in which they have survived, but which likely reflected the papal position on the theological error involved in Leo's position on icons and the papal challenge to the competence of a secular ruler to define orthodox doctrine. For the remainder of his pontificate the pope stood fast in his opposition to iconoclasm, denouncing Leo's decree of 730 making iconoclasm official policy, protesting his deposition of Patriarch GERMANUS for resisting iconoclasm, and refusing to recognize the new patriarch chosen by Leo. Gregory II's stance won wide approval in Italy, greatly enhancing the papal position as defender of orthodoxy and further weakening the ability of the emperor to direct affairs in Italy. However, despite the hostility between the Pope and the emperor over taxation, doctrine, and ecclesiology, Gregory II repeatedly acted in ways that demonstrated his deep commitment to the papacy's traditional place in Roman imperial structure and his respect for the imperial office as the key agency sustaining civilized Christian society. Among other things, he thwarted an attempt by Italian separatist factions to elect a new emperor to replace Leo III, and he brought pressure to bear on the Lombards to restore to their rightful owner territories seized from the empire, including Ravenna. In reality, however, Rome and Constantinople were parting company politically and religiously, and the papacy as represented by Gregory II was increasingly a major force in shaping and giving momentum to that trend.

Gregory II's somewhat ambivalent relationship with the imperial regime in Constantinople was due in part to his deep commitment to the Roman imperial tradition. But it was also prompted by his concern with the growing power of the LOMBARDS and the consequent threat to the autonomy of Rome and its de facto ruler, the Pope. That prospect forced Gregory to be hesitant in cutting off all ties with Rome's long-time protector, the eastern emperor. Although Gregory II's relations with the Lombards was generally peaceful, in part because the Lombards shared papal opposition to iconoclasm, the Lombard threat became ever clearer as Gregory's pontificate advanced. For the papacy the matter of finding a new protector loomed ever more urgent.

Growing Ties with the North. Gregory II contributed in significant ways to expanding ties with northern Europe from whence a papal protector would eventually come. He received numerous pilgrims from north of the Alps, including King INE of Wessex, whose visit to Rome symbolized a growing reverence throughout the West for St. Peter and his successors. Duke Theodo of Bavaria came to Rome to pray and to seek papal assistance in organizing the church in his still not completely Christianized principality. Of especially great significance was the support that Gregory II gave to St. BONIFACE for his missionary work in Germany. Even before the Anglo-Saxon monk began his evangelizing effort there, he came to Rome in 719 to seek papal blessing, which he received along with letters authorizing him to preach in Germany. Upon learning of Boniface's successes in Germany, Gregory II commanded him to return to Rome in 722 to receive consecration as bishop and to swear an oath of allegiance to the Roman pontiff; the new bishop left Rome with canon law books containing guidelines for imposing discipline on his converts and with a letter of introduction to CHARLES MARTEL, mayor of the palace in the kingdom of the Franks, who in turn provided letters indicating his support of Boniface's missionary effort. On several occasions Gregory II supplied Boniface with directions on how to proceed in winning converts and in drawing them into full participation in Christian life; in their substance these instructions demonstrated Gregory's firm grip on Christian tradition relative to such matters as marriage, liturgy, and theology. His guidance assured that the religious establishment which Boniface was creating in Germany would bear a strong Roman mark. Eventually, Boniface utilized that model when he became the directive figure in the CAROLINGIAN REFORM of the Frankish church, thereby establishing another important link between the papacy and the Franks.

Gregory II was active in other spheres. He undertook to strengthen the fortifications of Rome. He continued the work of his predecessors as a builder and restorer of churches, contributing substantially to the physical transformation of Rome into a Christian city. He took an interest in promoting monastic life in Rome and elsewhere. His action in coping with a major flood of the Tiber demonstrated the extent to which the papacy had assumed responsibility for civil administration and public welfare in Rome. His ability to muster resources for such activities indicates that he was an effective manager of papal revenues. He was willing to intervene in ecclesiastical affairs outside Rome to assure the well-being of the Church, illustrated not only by his support of Boniface but also his role in ending a conflict between the sees of Aquileia and Grado. In every way his pontificate marked a strengthening of the papal role as ruler of Rome and its surrounding territory, as a moving force in the tangled web of Italian politics, and as an authority figure in spiritual affairs affecting Christian life in the West

Feast: Feb.13.

Bibliography: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957), 1: 396–414, English translation in The Lives of the Eighth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of Nine Popes from AD 715 to AD 817, trans. with intro. by R. DAVIS (Liverpool 1992) 1–16. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v. (2nd ed. Leipzig 1885–88) 1:249–257. P. CONTE, Regesto delle lettere dei papi del secolo VIII: saggi (Milan 1984) 46–79; 192–200. Epistolae Langobardicae collectae, Epp. 8–12; ed. W. GUNDLACH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae: Epistolae Merovingici et Karolini aevi (Berlin 1892; reprinted 1994) 697–702. Concilia aevi karolini, Part 1, ed. A. WERMINGHOFF, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Concilia, v. 2.1 (Hannover and Leipzig 1906; repr. 1997) 19–20. Die Briefe des heiligen Bonifatius und Lullus (S. Bonifatii et Lulli epistolae), ed. M. TANGL, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae Selectae 1 (Berlin 1916; repr. 1989), English translation as The Letters of St. Boniface, tr. E. EMERTON (New York 2000). Vita sancti Bonifatii archiepiscopi Moguntini, ed. W. LEVISON, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptorum rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum 57 (Hannover and Leipzig 1905; repr. 1999), English translation as “Willibald, The Life of Saint Boniface,” tr. C. H. TALBOT, in Soldiers of Christ. Saints and Saints’ Lives from Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, ed. T. F. X. NOBLE and T. HEAD (University Park, Penn. 1985) 107–140.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

GREGORY III, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: March 18, 731 to Nov. 28, 741. Of Syrian origin, Gregory was ordained to the priesthood before his election as Pope. He was the last Pope who sought confirmation of his election from the emperor in Constantinople or his agent, the exarch of Ravenna; thereafter, the emperor had no role in the process which determined who would serve as the successor to St. Peter. At the time of his election, Gregory III faced a tenuous situation, marked by an aggressive Lombard ruler seeking to dominate Italy and by an emperor attempting to impose his iconoclastic policy at a moment when imperial power in Italy was eroding. At stake for the papacy was the quasi-independent position of Rome and its surrounding territory that Gregory III’s predecessors had succeeded in establishing. That position required a protector for the papacy, a role that had long been filled by the Byzantine emperor. But at the moment the emperor’s attitude toward Rome was sorely tested by the leadership role taken by Pope GREGORY II (715–731) in resisting the attempts of Emperor LEO III (717–741) to impose new taxes and to enforce his policy of ICONOCLASM. And those same imperial policies had sorely tested the allegiance to the emperor not only of the Pope but also of many of the emperor’s subjects in Italy.

Immediately upon assuming office Gregory III moved to reaffirm his predecessor’s repudiation of iconoclasm. Perhaps hoping to persuade Emperor Leo III to abandon his iconoclastic policy, Gregory III attempted to establish a dialogue with Leo III by letter. Receiving no response, he summoned a Roman synod which met in 731–732, attended by a large number of bishops from Italy who in a show of solidarity with the Pope condemned iconoclasm and decreed that anyone who destroyed or profaned sacred images would be excommunicated. Leo III responded by sending a fleet to Italy to force the submission of Gregory III, a venture that came to naught when the fleet was wrecked by a storm. Then he confiscated papal patrimonies in Sicily and Calabria and transferred the ecclesiastical province of Illyricum, embracing most of the Balkan Peninsula, Sicily, and southern Italy, from the jurisdiction of the pontiff of Rome to that of the patriarch of Constantinople. The loss of income from the properties in Sicily and Calabria was a major blow to the papacy. But Gregory III apparently found ways of offsetting his losses, since he had the revenue to build and decorate many churches in Rome. Thus he contributed substantially to the effort begun by his predecessor that led to the physical transformation of classical Rome into a medieval Christian city. Although the papal claims on the province of Illyricum became a bone of contention between Rome and Constantinople in the 9th century, there is no evidence that Gregory III saw its loss as a major papal setback. In fact, papal authority was negligible there. Leo III’s measures were interpreted by many in Rome as another sign of his tyranny; however, his action more likely represented a move to solidify his position in a place where imperial control was still effective and to abandon Italy, where his power was growing weaker. During the remainder of Gregory III’s pontificate there was little interaction between Rome and Constantinople; Rome had gained de facto freedom from imperial control.

During the first part of Gregory III’s pontificate papal relations with the LOMBARDS were relatively quiet; the agreement of 728 between Pope Gregory II and King LIUTPRAND (712–744) served to keep the peace. Gregory remained aware of the Lombard threat, as indicated by his restoration of the walls of Rome and his efforts to regain strategic strongholds seized by the Lombards. In 738 Liutprand seized Ravenna and forced the exarch into exile; Gregory III played an important role in restoring the exarch, an act that Liutprand considered hostile. Liutprand's main objective was the subjugation of the dukes of Spoleto and Benevento, whose efforts to remain independent threatened Liutprand's plans to unify the Lombard kingdom. Gregory III's support of a rebellion of the dukes increased the hostility of the Lombard king. Liutprand's success against the dukes and subsequent march on Rome with the intention of forcing Gregory III to abandon his alliance with dukes prompted the Pope to send an embassy to CHARLES MARTEL in 739, pleading for Frankish intervention to save St. Peter's church and his "special people" (peculiarem populum). Charles declined to act in defense of Rome, probably because Liutprand was a Frankish ally who at the moment was providing invaluable help to Charles in his effort to check Muslim intrusions into Provence. But Charles did send an embassy to Rome that prompted a second appeal from Gregory III. In his letters to Charles, Gregory spoke in terms that suggested that he and most Romans believed that a Roman political entity had come into existence whose leader could deal with other princes as an independent agent. In the meantime, Liutprand retired from the Roman scene, perhaps because of the intercession of Charles Martel on behalf of the Pope, but more likely because his threat to Rome had convinced the Pope to give up his alliance with the Lombard dukes of Spoleto and Benevento. Peace, albeit tenuous, had been restored in Italy.

Meanwhile, Gregory III continued expanding papal ties with the world north of the Alps. Already noted was his interaction with Charles Martel, a step in establishing closer relationship with the kingdom of the Franks. He became involved in ecclesiastical affairs in England when he responded favorably to a request by Bishop EGBERT OF YORK to restore that see to the metropolitan status that had originally been awarded it by Pope Gregory I (590–604). He continued to follow closely the missionary work of BONIFACE in Germany. On the basis of reports of Boniface's successes in Hesse and Thuringia and his continued requests for guidance, in 732 Gregory III elevated Boniface to archiepiscopal status without a fixed see but closely linked to Rome; Boniface was instructed to proceed with the establishment of bishoprics in Germany and to appoint qualified clerics to serve as bishops in the new sees. Boniface gave his immediate attention to establishing an episcopal structure in Bavaria to which Gregory III gave his approval, and then he continued his organizational work by establishing episcopal sees in Hesse and Thuringia. As his work progressed, the Pope provided his legate with letters soliciting support for his work and providing guidance on a wide range of disciplinary, liturgical, and theological matters pertaining to the establishment of Christian life among the partially Christianized and newly converted peoples in Bavarian, Hesse, and Thuringia. On occasion, Boniface responded by reminding his spiritual mentor of rumors about religious matters in Rome that needed correction. In 737 at the Pope's command Boniface visited Rome for the third time, and then returned north armed with papal letters to various parties urging support for his work and with instructions to continue organizing the lands in which he had been working. By the time this phase of his career was completed in the early 740s, Boniface was ready to move into a new realm that would involve the papacy, the reform of the Frankish church along lines that promised to increase papal influence in the Frankish realm.

Gregory III died in 741, a year that also witnessed the deaths of Emperor Leo III and Charles Martel. New leaders would now continue to transform the power structure in Italy, which had changed considerably during the pontificate of Gregory III. It was marked especially by his exploration of new ways to replace the eastern Roman emperor as protector of the Pope and the territories he controlled against the Lombards.

Feast: Nov. 28.

Bibliography: Le Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, 3 v., 2nd ed. (Paris 1955–1957) 1: 415–425, English translation in The Lives of the Eighth-Century Popes (Liber Pontificalis). The Ancient Biographies of Nine Popes from AD 715 to AD 817, tr. with intro. by R. DAVIS (Liverpool 1992) 17–28. Regesta Pontificum Romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum MCXCVIII, ed. P. JAFFÉ, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1885–1888) 1:257–262. P. CONTE, Regesto delle lettere dei papi del secolo VIII: saggi (Milan 1984) 200–207. Codex Carolinus, Epp.1–2, ed. W. GUNDLACH, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae: Epistolae Merovingici et Karolini aevi (Berlin 1892; repr. 1994) 475–479. Epistolae Langobardicae collectae, Epp. 12–17, ibid., 702–709. Die Briefe des heiligen Bonifatius und Lullus (S. Bonifatii et Lulli epistolae), ed. M. TANGL, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae Selectae 1 (Berlin 1916; reprinted, 1989), English translation as The Letters of St. Boniface, tr. E. EMERTON (New York 2000). Vita sancti Bonifatii archiepiscopi Moguntini, ed. W. LEVISON, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptorum rerum Germanicarum in usum scholarum 57 (Hannover and Leipzig 1905; repr. 1999), English translation as "Willibald, The Life of Saint Boniface," tr. C. H TALBOT, in Soldiers of Christ. Saints and Saints' Lives from Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, ed. T. F. X. NOBLE and T. HEAD (University Park, Penn. 1985) 107–140.

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

GREGORY IV, POPE

Pontificate: Sept. 827 to Jan. 25, 844. A native Roman, he was cardinal priest of St. Mark's at the time of his election. His consecration (March 29, 828?) was delayed until a missus of LOUIS THE PIOUS had reviewed the election in accord with the Constitutio Romana of 824 (see EUGENE II, POPE).

Christ with Saints, mosaic in the apse of the church of St. Mark in Rome. Pope Gregory IV is at the left; St. Peter is the center figure (the mosaic was commissioned by Pope Gregory IV in 833).

Subsequent to the revolt of Louis's older sons, LOTHAIR I, Pepin, and LOUIS THE GERMAN (830), and the veiling of the Empress Judith at a convent in Poitiers, a diet at Aachen (Feb. 2, 831) restored Judith to her husband on the mandate of the pope and other bishops (Thegan: Vita Ludov. 37; Patrologia latina 106:419). Two years later, during another uprising of the imperial sons, Gregory was present in the camp of Lothair [Ann. Xantenses 833; R. Rau, ed., Quellen z. karoling. Reichsgesch., 2 (1958) 340], whence at Easter 833 he appealed to Abp. AGOBARD OF LYONS and Abbot WALA OF CORBIE for aid in bringing concord to the royal family. To the reluctance of the imperial bishops to meet with him, Gregory replied by strongly justifying his intervention (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 5:228–232). A conference of pope and emperor near Colmar (June 24, 833) was followed closely by Lothair's perfidious seizure of power and Gregory's acquiescence in Louis the Pious's deposition (Vita Walae 2.18; Patrologia latina 120:1640). After Louis's restoration as Emperor (Mar. 1, 834) and Lothair's harassment of church property in Italy, Louis censured his son and in 837 sent Abbot Adreald to Rome to consult with the ailing pope. A papal embassy of gratitude to Louis was turned back by Lothair at Bologna, though Gregory's letters secretly reached the emperor (Astronomer: Vita Ludov. 55–56; Patrologia Latina 104:970). After Louis's death Gregory tried in vain to keep peace among the sons by dispatching Abp. George of Ravenna as his legate (Ann. Bertiniani 841; Rau, ed., Quellen 2:54; but cf. Agnellus. Liber pontificalis episc. Raven.; Patrologia latina 106:747–750).

He endowed Roman churches and fortified Ostia (called Gregoriopolis in his honor) against Saracen pirates from Africa. AMALARIUS OF METZ [De ordine antiphonarii, prol. (J. M. Hanssens, ed., 1948)] notes that in 831, on his visit to Rome, Gregory assigned an archdeacon to instruct him in Roman liturgical usages. Four years later, at the pope's urging, Louis the Pious extended the Feast of All Saints (November 1) to the Frankish domains (Chron. Sigeberti 835; Patrologia latina 160:159). In 831–832 this pope bestowed the pallium upon (St.) ANSGAR and named him papal legate to Scandinavia [Jaffé E 2574; F. Curschmann, Die ältesten Papsturkunden d. Erzb. Hamburg (1909) 13–15].

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92; 1958) 2:73–85; 3:122–123. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖENFELD et. al. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1:323–327. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 2.1:187–231. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 2:513–521. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). L. HALPHEN, Charlemagne et l'empire carolingien (Paris 1947). F. X. SEPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (2d ed. Munich 1955) 2: 214–221. H. X. ARQUILLIÈRE, L'Augustinisme politique (2d ed. Paris 1955). R. BENERICETTI, La cronologia dei Papi dei secoli IX–XI secondo le carte di Ravenna (1999) 23–24. P. JOHANEK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3 (3d ed. Freiburg 1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 102–103.

[H. G. J. BECK]

GREGORY V, POPE

Pontificate: May 3, 996 to February or March 999; b. Bruno, 972, the second son of Duke Otto of Carinthia, and the great-grandson of the Emperor OTTO I. Destined for the clerical life, he received an excellent education and served in the imperial chapel. After the death of JOHN XV, who had previously requested OTTO III to invade Italy in opposing Crescentius (see CRESCENTII), the emperor appointed his 24-year-old chaplain as pope and presented him to the Roman legation that had come to Ravenna (996). Accompanied by his teacher, Archbishop WILLIGIS OF MAINZ, and by the Chancellor Hildibald, Gregory was accepted at Rome without opposition—the first German and the first non-Italian pope in more than a century. One of his first acts was to crown Otto III (Ascension Day, May 3, 996). In the fall of 996, however, the pope had to flee Rome because of aristocratic oppression, headed by Crescentius, whom the emperor had previously pardoned at Gregory's request. In early 997 Abp. John Philagathos of Piacenza was promoted as antipope John XVI; but even with Byzantine aid he was unable to secure his hold on Rome. On his second campaign into Italy (February 998), Otto assisted Gregory's return to the city and there dealt severely with the insurgents: Crescentius was beheaded; John XVI was blinded and kept in a monastery. Gregory, however, reigned for barely more than a year and died suddenly. His personal integrity and strong reforming purpose produced the first notable example of harmonious cooperation between pope and emperor. Yet Gregory's awareness of the need for independent decision and of the rights of the Holy See often produced a degree of tension in his relations with the emperor. His independence is evident in his handling of affairs in the Church of REIMS, where he supported the claims of Archbishop Arnulf against the opposition of Gerbert (SYLVESTER II), suspending the French bishops who cooperated (Synod of Pavia, 997). Overlooking the incident, however, Gregory sent Gerbert the pallium upon his appointment by Otto as archbishop of Ravenna (998). Also against the will of the emperor, he restored the See of Merseburg after it had previously been absorbed into the metropolitan See of Magdeburg.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2:261–262. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (882–1198) 1:489–495. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935—) 7:64–67. F. X. SEPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:387–392. K. and M. UHLIRZ, Jahrbücher des Deutschen Reiches unter Otto II und Otto III v.2 (Berlin 1954). H. ZIMMERMANN, "Papstabsetzungen des Mittelalters," Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 69 (1961) 270ff. K. GÖRICH, "Der Ganderseimer Streit zur Zeit Otto III. Ein Konflikt um die Metropolitanrechte des Erzbischofs Willigis von Mainz," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. Germanistische Abteilung 110 (Vienna 1993) 56–94. K. GÖRICH, "Otto III. Romanus, Saxonicus et Italicus. Kaiserliche Rompolitik und sächsische Historiographie," Roxznik Historyczne 59 (1993) 132–35. V. HUTH, Erzbischof Arnulf von Reims und der Kampf um das Königtum im Westfrankreich. Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Reimser Remigius-Fälschungen (Sigmaringen 1994) 85–104. T. E. MOEHS, Pope Gregory V (996–999): A Biographical Study, (Stuttgart 1972) A. SOMORJAI, "Sant' Adalberto e il Cristianesimo ungherese nel contesto centroeuropeo," La civiltà Ungherese e il Cristianesimo. Atti del IV Congresso Internazionali di Studi Ungheresi (Rome-Naples 1996) 36–43. J. WARMINSKI, Encyklopedia Katolicka (Lublin 1993). H. ZIMMERMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4 (1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 134–35.

[F. DRESSLER]

GREGORY VI, POPE

Pontificate: May 1, 1045 to Dec. 20, 1046; b. John de Gratiano; d. probably Cologne, Germany, c. November 1047. He was possibly related by marriage to both the converted Jewish family of Benedict the Christian (see

Sarcophagus and inscription of Pope Gregory V, located in the Grotto of St. Peter's Basilica, Rome, 6th century. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

PIERLEONI) and to Hildebrand (see GREGORY VII, POPE). John was a respected member of the Roman reformers and archpriest of the church of St. John at the Latin Gate. The godfather (?) of the reigning Pope BENEDICT IX, he was already past middle age, and was a man of unblemished character when, deeply disturbed by Benedict's unworthiness, he arranged to provide the pope with the money that would induce his resignation. Benedict reportedly accepted the sum of 1,000 to 2,000 pounds of silver pennies of Pavia (about $150,000) and departed. Gregory was elected pope the same day. At first his accession was hailed by PETER DAMIAN and other reformers; but as it became evident to the German party that SIMONY had been involved in the transaction, (Emperor) HENRY III was persuaded to intervene, especially as both the CRESCENTII and the TUSCULANI threatened the peaceful rehabilitation of Rome. Henry was perhaps further motivated by the desire to materialize in a somewhat altered form the dream of OTTO III: he would not rule the Empire from Rome, but would govern the affairs of Italy through his proxy, a German pope. Coming south with his army and a great assembly of churchmen from Germany, Burgundy, and Italy, Henry held a synod at Pavia (October 1046). Learning of Henry's approach, Gregory traveled north and met the king at Piacenza. Henry received the pope courteously but denied him recognition, demanding an investigation of his title to the papacy. At the synod of SUTRI (Dec. 20, 1046), about 26 miles north of Rome, the pope's claims were judged. Since Benedict IX and the antipope Sylvester III had months before departed from the scene, it was necessary only to declare them removed from office. After due consideration of the charges of simony brought against the pope, Henry and the synod deposed the well-intentioned Gregory, opening the way for the selection of the first German pope in 50 years (see CLEMENT II). At Henry's order, Gregory was taken into exile in Germany (January 1047), accompanied by his chaplain Hildebrand.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. LÖWENFELD (882–1198) 1:524–525. G. B. BORINO, "L'elezione e la deposizione di Gregorio VI," Archivio della Società Romana di Storia Patria 39 (1916) 142–252, 295–410. "Invitus ultra montes cum domno Papa Gregorio abii," Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO (Rome 1947—) 1:3–46. R. L. POOLE, "Benedict IX and Gregory VI," Proceedings of the British Academy 8 (1917–18) 199–235. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:572–576. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1955) 2:415–418. R. AUBERT, Diction- naire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 21 (Paris 1986), s.v. "Grégoire VI." H. H. ANTON, "Die Synode von Sutri, ihr zeitgeschichtlicher Kontext und Nachklang," Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. Germanistische Abteilung (Wien 1997) 576–84. J. LAUNDAGE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 4 (1995), s.v. "Gregor VI., Papst." T. STRUVE, Lexikon des Mittelalters, 7 (München-Zürich 1992), s.v. "Sutri Synode v. 1046." O. WIDDING, "An Old Norse Version of a Pamphlet on the Papacy of Gregor VI," Analecta Romana Instituti Danici 15 (Odense 1986) 51–65. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 144–145.

[O. J. BLUM]

GREGORY VI, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: May to December 1012. Nothing is known of Gregory until he emerges as the Crescentius family's choice for pope during a period when Rome was free from imperial control. After the death of Emperor Otto III in 1002, the Crescentii had nominated and installed three popes (John XVII, John XVIII and Sergius IV) under the leadership of John II Crescentius, who had been acting as dictator of Rome from 1003. When Pope Sergius IV (1009–12) died less than a week before John II Crescentius (they died May 12, and May 18, respectively), there was a struggle for control of the city between the Crescentii and their rivals, the Tusculan family. In a successful bid to wrest power away from the Crescentii, the Tusculans selected Benedict VIII (1012–24) to be pope, while the weakened Crescentii chose Gregory. Gregory's position was precarious from the start, and by the end of summer he had been forced to leave Rome. He went to Germany and appealed to King Henry II (1002–24) for help. Henry promised to investigate Gregory's claim, but he was already in the process of negotiating an agreement with Benedict, whom he soon recognized. From this point we hear no more of Gregory, and the Tusculans began a decades-long rule in Rome.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.268. THIETMAR OF MERSEBURG, Chronicon 6.101, in Monumenta Germaniae historica, Scriptores (new series) 9.394–95. H. JEDIN and J. DOLAN, eds. Handbook of Church History (New York 1965–81) 3.249. K. J. HERRMANN, Das Tuskulanerpapsttum, 1012–1046 (Stuttgart 1973) 5, 7, 25–7. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (Oxford 1986) 141. P. VIARD, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1986) 21.1423. T. STRUVE, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1989) 4.1668 for additional bibliography.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

GREGORY VII, POPE

Pontificate: April 22, 1073, to May 25, 1085; b. Hildebrand, probably at Sovana (Tuscany) c. 1015; d. Saler-

Pope Gregory VII, 1844, drawing by Karl Herman. (Christel Gerstenberg/CORBIS/Bettmann)

no. He became a monk, probably at S. Maria on the Aventine at Rome where he had relatives, and there he seems to have attracted the attention of the papal household in the Lateran palace—the household of St. Peter to whom he always professed an overriding loyalty. It is improbable that he was ever a monk at CLUNY, although its great abbot, HUGH OF SEMUR (1049–1109), was his friend and confidant. In 1046 he accompanied GREGORY VI into exile, going to Cologne and then encountering the Lorraine circle of reformers. When Bp. Bruno of Toul in 1049 became Pope LEO IX, he took to Rome with him a number of personally and morally outstanding churchmen; amongst them was Hildebrand, whom Leo made subdeacon and also economus (administrator) of the basilica of ST. PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE-WALLS. From this time Hildebrand's activities multiplied both in Rome and more widely. In 1054, he presided as papal legate over the synod of TOURS which considered the eucharistic teaching of BERENGARIUS. Visits to Germany established a strong link with the Salian royal house. Hildebrand was concerned in the elections of NICHOLAS II in December 1058 and of ALEXANDER II in 1061. Probably in 1059 he became archdeacon of the Roman church; in the same year he was present at Melfi when Nicholas concluded an alliance with the South Italian Normans. Under Alexander, Hildebrand seemed to many to be the power behind the papal throne. As his own register shows, his eventual election as pope was a tumultuous affair which bore no resemblance to the procedure envisaged in the PAPAL ELECTION DECREE (1059); he was promoted by popular acclamation. The considerable delay before his consecration (he was ordained priest on May 22, 1073, and raised to the episcopate and to the full exercise of the papal office on June 30) had nothing to do with a wish to obtain confirmation of his election from the German king, HENRY IV, who had in fact incurred excommunication by association with counselors banned by Alexander II.; he postponed his consecration until the Sunday after the feast of St. Peter (June 29), thereby emphasizing his life-long devotion to the Prince of the Apostles.

The Program of Reform. Gregory took his papal name, and in many respects his vision of the papal office, from Pope GREGORY THE GREAT. Yet in him, a man of exceptional caliber, wisdom, vision, and single-mindedness ascended the throne of St. Peter (Gregory habitually referred to himself as vicar of St. Peter, never as vicar of Christ); in many respects he is unique among the popes, and with much justification has been called “the great innovator who stands alone” (E. Caspar). Such a pre-eminence is reflected in the style of his letters and decrees, many of which are preserved in his register but some only elsewhere (his epistolae vagante). As W. Peitz showed and others have confirmed, the register is the original working record of the papal household; it is the earliest entire and contemporary papal register to survive, and many letters both in and outside it bear the marks of Gregory’s personal dictation. His letters testify to the profoundly spiritual and religious motivation of his pontificate. In the spirit of Gregory the Great he aspired to preach the claims of Christianity to all peoples, near and far, and to revive the pristine fervor of a church in which the faith of its early years had become tarnished. Near the end of his life he declared that “I have above all sought that holy church, the bride of God and our mistress and mother, should return to her proper glory and should stand free, chaste, and catholic” (Ep. vag. 54).

In such terms, few popes have had so clear a vision of their duty and of their program; but much remained to be done in order both to establish and warrant assured principles of papal authority and to apply them in practice and reality. Gregory’s thinking developed over the years. While archdeacon, he asked Cardinal PETER DAMIAN to work through the decrees of ancient popes and to abstract and arrange systematically whatever seemed especially to bear upon the authority of the apostolic see. The 27 lapidary formulations of papal prerogatives inserted in the register in 1075 and headed Dictatus papae (II.55a) are perhaps best understood as headings under which ancient canonical material might usefully be sought, deployed, and appraised. Progressively more assured and documented statements occur in the letters in which Gregory justified to Bp. Hermann of Metz his sentences of 1076 and 1080 against King Henry IV (Reg. IV.2, VIII.21). In the second letter especially, Gregory proclaimed the immeasurable superiority of the priestly dignity (sacerdotium) over the kingly (regnum) on account of the powers that they respectively exercised. He also drew a moral contrast between secular rulers as driven by human pride and religious popes made holy by the merits of St. Peter. Kings like bishops owed a duty of obedience to the pope as the upholder of a Christian righteousness (justicia) which was the power and purpose of God in action upon a fallen world. The force of Gregory’s thought led him, in the case of Henry IV, to deviate from his usual advocacy of strong and hereditary—and obedient—monarchy into an argument for election.

A necessary condition for the realization of Gregory’s vision of a renewed church which should be “free, chaste, and catholic” was the moral purification of both clergy and laity. Especially at his Lent synods of 1074 and 1075, he reinforced the requirement that all clerks in major orders (subdeacons and above) should refrain from marriage and practice chastity (see CELIBACY, CLERICAL HISTORY OF). Laity were to marry only within the permitted degrees of kinship. (For Gregory, this was a safeguard of the vitality of princely lineages.) Upon clergy and laity alike, Gregory rigorously imposed a duty of refraining from SIMONY (the buying and selling of orders and offices in the church); this was an aspect of Gregory’s progressively intensified concern for “free” ecclesiastical elections, i.e. elections from which improper lay intervention was excluded. Such demands upon clergy and laity had been made during preceding pontificates, but especially in Germany and France Gregory’s requirement of strict clerical chastity gave rise to anger and resistance.

The synods in the Lateran at which decrees for reform were often passed were held during Lent during most years of Gregory’s pontificate, and occasionally also in the autumn. They were usually well attended by clergy and laity who experienced Gregory’s reforming zeal first hand and their decrees were widely disseminated. If the Lateran synods brought many from throughout Latin Christendom to Gregory in Rome, an increased use of papal legates who represented the apostolic see brought its authority to bear in localities of Christendom. Gregory often dispatched legates, in pairs, to perform and report back on specific matters. Of especial usefulness to Gregory were the standing papal vicars who represented his authority in extensive areas for periods of years, especially Bp. HUGH OF DIE (later Abp. of Lyons) and Bp. Amatus of Oloron in France, Bp. ANSELM II OF LUCCA in Lombardy, and Bp. ALTMANN OF PASSAU in South

Germany; all were staunch Gregorians who did much to implement and commend Gregory's reforming purposes. As for archbishops, Gregory expected them normally to come to Rome for their PALLIUM—the vestment which signified their participation in the pope's pastoral office. They were also expected to pay regular visits to Rome and thus to confirm their solidarity with papal purposes; when paid, such visits anticipated the AD LIMINA journeys which later would become general practice. By such means as these Gregory sought to add effectiveness to his apostolic authority over the church.

Gregory and Henry IV of Germany. At the outset of his pontificate, Gregory wished to build upon his regard for the Salian royal family by training Henry IV not only for the royal but also for the imperial office; this was despite Henry's youthful peccadilloes and Alexander II's excommunication of his five counselors. But a major problem arose over filling the Lombard metropolitan see of Milan: when Henry nominated a royal candidate, the PATARINES of the city elected a rival whom the papacy warmly supported. At his Lent synod of 1075 and in the context of Milanese affairs, Gregory probably passed the first of his decrees against lay INVESTITURE, to which he had not hitherto in principle objected. Henry persisted with his establishment of bishops, not only at Milan, but at Fermo and Spoleto. Upon receiving a menacing rebuke from Gregory in December 1075 (Reg. III.10), Henry sought to seize the initiative by summoning an assembly at Worms for the end of January 1076; an assembly of 26 bishops initiated a series of impassioned Henrician manifestos which denounced "the monk Hildebrand," calling for his deposition. Soon after, at his Lent synod, Gregory suspended Henry from the government of the Kingdom of Germany and Italy, absolving all Christians from their oaths to him and forbidding them to serve him; thereafter he excommunicated him. The falling away of his support in Germany compelled Henry to seek and receive absolution from Gregory at Canossa in January 1077, though Gregory did not consider that he had restored him to the exercise of the kingship. Matters were greatly complicated when, on March 15, 1077, without Gregory's permission, an assembly of German princes elected an antiking, Duke Rudolf of Swabia. In Germany there followed a complex period of civil war, propaganda, and negotiation. Gregory sought to act as arbitrator. His desired means was an assembly or colloquium over which he or his legate would preside; its aim would be to establish which of the rival kings divine righteousness favoured (cui parti magis justitia faveat). However, by 1080, Gregory became convinced that by renewed disobedience Henry had revived the sentence of excommunication against himself. At his Lent council he himself excommunicated Henry and then took from him his whole kingdom and office; the reversal of order of the sentence and its intensification by comparison with 1076 should be noted. He proclaimed Rudolf of Swabia for his proven humility and obedience to be king of the Germans.

Henry's response came on June 25, 1080, when his synod of Brixen chose Abp. GUIBERT OF RAVENNA to be antipope; this betokened a papal schism. In an age that deemed the outcome of battle to be a judgement of God, it was a grave blow to Gregory when, on the following October 25, Rudolf of Swabia suffered mortal injuries in the battle of Hohenmölsen; it was some nine months before a new antiking was elected—the unimpressive Count Hermann of Salm. The upshot of the momentous events of 1080 was that from being a would-be arbiter in the settlement of the German kingdom Gregory became a protagonist: Gregory against Henry. Henry had learned some of the skills of kinship, and to a papal sacrality patronized by St. Peter, prince of the Apostles, he sought to oppose a royal sacrality under the yet more exalted patronage of Mary, Queen of Heaven. In a Germany racked by war and war-weariness, the rival parties contended by words and by arms with results that, by 1085, were not to Gregory's advantage—this despite a heroic effort by Cardinal-Bp. Odo of Ostia, later Pope URBAN II, to rally the Gregorian cause. In 1081, 1082, and 1083–4, Henry undertook campaigns in Italy. In 1084, after the defection from Gregory of 12 or 13 cardinals, Henry entered Rome. He declared "Hildebrand" deposed; Guibert was acclaimed pope with the name Clement III, and on Easter Day (March 31) he crowned Henry as emperor. Gregory took refuge in the Castel Sant'Angelo whence he was rescued by the Norman duke Robert Guiscard. The Normans sacked the city so savagely that Gregory accompanied Guiscard home to Salerno where he spent his last months in active furtherance of his cause. His reported last words, "I have loved righteousness (justicia) and hated iniquity, therefore I die in exile," are probably to be regarded as expressing, not bitterness and disillusion, but invincible confidence in the blessedness of those who suffer persecution for righteousness' sake (Mt 5.10).

France. The very large number of Gregory's letters that concern France testifies to its importance for him. Broadly, whereas in his dealings with Germany the demands of righteousness were emphasized, with France he gave fuller scope to restraint and to the exercise of apostolic mercy. Except for a tempestuous few months in 1074 when he canvassed the deposition of King PHILIP I, he was conspicuously reticent about his shortcomings; he did not press such decrees as those concerning lay investiture, so that in France there was no "investiture controversy," let alone "contest." He was conspicuously sparing of French bishops. His patience with Abp.

MANASSES I OF REIMS before his eventual deposition in 1080 is remarkable. Accused bishops who appealed to Gregory at Rome found there a mercy that contrasted with the rigor of a legate like Hugh of Die; the effect was to commend Roman authority and to encourage direct recourse to it.

Other Regions. Gregory corresponded with most of the rulers of Christendom; besides the Norman princes of South Italy who were papal vassals, letters were sent to the Spanish kings and to kings of England and Ireland in the west, to the Scandinavian kings in the north, and in the east to rulers of Poland, Russia, Bohemia, Hungary, and lands across the Adriatic. Gregory sought to foster strong, hereditary dynasties which, in obedience to the papacy, built up the church and provided peace and justice for their subjects. He sought good relations with the emperors of Byzantium and the fostering of concord between the Eastern and Western Churches. In 1074, his projected military expedition to the East to defend Christian peoples against the savagery of the Seljuk Turks was part of a re-evaluation of Christian warfare which helped to prepare for the CRUSADE. A somewhat different approach is apparent in Gregory's letters to a subject Christian community and to a well disposed Muslim ruler in North Africa.

Other Concerns. Gregory was zealous in promoting the defense, good order, and well-being of monasteries and monks whose intercessory and other services he valued. His relations were especially strong with MONTE CASSINO as a southern bastion of papal security (its great abbot, Desiderius, briefly succeeded him as Pope VICTOR III) and with Cluny as an exemplar of ecclesiastical liberty. Gregory's support of the HIRSAU reform was a major feature of his impact upon South Germany. Indirectly he was instrumental in promoting the CARTHUSIANS, founded by BRUNO OF COLOGNE, who in 1084 started his first community near Grenoble. Of his many other concerns mention may particularly be made of liturgical matters. He defended and promoted the ROMAN RITE, especially against the MOZARABIC (Hispanic) usage in Spain. He permanently fixed the EMBER DAYS for fasting throughout the Latin Church. He was influential with respect to the practice and understanding of penance.

Conclusion. Gregory undoubtedly ranks amongst the greatest popes of all time and makers of the Middle Ages, but in modern times, no less than his own, the most contrasting judgements have been passed on him. He is perhaps best regarded as a bridge figure between the outstanding popes of Christian antiquity whose pastoral and moral authority he aspired to renew and the papal monarchy of the central Middle Ages. His comprehensive view of Christendom and exploration of the prerogatives of the apostolic see effectively prepared the way in principle and in practice.

From his death until the Reformation, he was referred to surprisingly seldom in sources of all kinds, but in the sixteenth century interest revived amongst both Protestants and Catholics. His canonization, therefore, came slowly: in 1583, Pope Gregory XIII caused him to be included in the Roman Martyrology; in 1609, Pope Paul V authorized his commemoration at Salerno; in 1728, Pope Benedict XIV extended his feast to the whole Church.

Feast: May 25.

Bibliography: L. JAFFÉ Regesta pontificum romanorum a condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Leipzig 1881–88) 1:594–649. E. CASPAR ed., Registrum Gregori VII Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae selectae, 2 (Berlin 1920–3), Eng. tr. H. E. J. COWDREY (2000). H. E. J. COWDREY ed. and tr., The Epistolae vagantes of Pope Gregory VII (1972). L. SANTIFALLER ed., Quellen und Forschungen zum Urkunden- und Kanzleiwesen Papst Gregors VII, 1: Quellen: Urkunden. Regesten. Facsimilia (Studi e Testi 190). H. E. J. COWDREY Pope Gregory VII, 1073–1085 (Oxford 1998). I. S. ROBINSON, The Papacy, 1073–1198 (Cambridge 1990) Studi gregoriani, ed. G. B. BORINO. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in Middle Ages: A Study in the Ideological Relation of Clerical to Lay Power 3d ed. (London 1970).

[W. ULLMANN/H. E. J. COWDREY]

GREGORY VIII, POPE

Pontificate, Oct. 21 to Dec. 17, 1187; Canon of St. Augustine, b. Alberto de Morra, Benevento, c. 1110, d. Pisa. Prior to his election to the papacy at Ferrara, Gregory had been a canon regular at Laon and a professor (magister) of law at Bologna, before becoming cardinal in 1155–56 and chancellor of the Roman Church in 1178.

As cardinal Gregory was sent on important missions to England, Dalmatia, and Portugal by Pope Alexander III. He was involved in settling the dispute between the Curia and King HENRY II of England after the murder of Archbishop Thomas BECKET in 1170. It is no longer certain if, as Roman chancellor, Gregory wrote the Forma dictandi, an influential tract on the rhythmic prose of papal documents, which has in the past been attributed to him. Shortly before becoming pope, Gregory asserted his reformist tendencies by founding a monastery at Benevento and providing it with a rule based on austerity and evangelical simplicity.

Gregory's 57-day pontificate was dominated by his response to the Muslim conquest of Jerusalem (Oct. 2, 1187). Only eight days into his pontificate Gregory announced a major new crusade to the Holy Land. Gregory sought speedy conciliation between the Curia and Emperor Frederick I and promoted peace between Genoa and Venice in order to gather support for his crusade project. Despite his short pontificate, the impact of Gregory's policies were far-reaching. His crusading bull Audita tremendi not only marked an important stage in the development of crusading thought, it eventually also triggered what was perhaps the greatest crusading effort in aid of the Holy Land ever to occur, known as the Third Crusade.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, comp. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1844–64) 202: 1537–64. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum, ed. G. WATTENBACH (Leipzig 1885–88) 2: 528–35. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92) 2: 349, 451. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages (London 1902–32) 10: 312. G. KLEEMANN, Papst Gregor VIII (Bonn 1913). P. KEHR, “Gregor VIII. als Ordensgründer,” Miscellanea F. Ehrle vol. 2 (Studi e Testi 38; Rome 1924) 248–75. W. HOLTZMANN, “Die Dekretalen Gregors VIII” Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 58 (1950) 113–123. F. X. SEPPÉL, Geschichte der Päpste (Munich 1954–59) 3: 301–4. A. DALZELL, “The Forma Dictandi attributed to Albert of Morra and related texts,” Mediaeval Studies 39 (1977) 440–65. V. PFAFF, “Sieben Jahre päpstlicher Politik. Die Wirksamkeit der Päpste Lucius III., Urban III., Gregor VIII.,” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. Kanonische Abteilung 67 (1981) 148–212. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of the Popes (Oxford 1988) 182–3. P. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 21: 1436. U. SCHMIDT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3d ed. (Freiburg 1995) 4:1018. B. ROBERG, Lexikon des Mittelalters 4: 1671.

[C. MAIER]

GREGORY VIII, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: March 10, 1118 to April 22, 1121. He died c. 1140. Mauritius Burdinus (Bordinho or Bourdin, meaning “donkey”) was born in southern France and became a Cluniac at Limoges, but he was educated in Spain, where he had traveled with Archbishop Bernard of Toledo. He was archdeacon of Toledo, and was made bishop of Coimbra in 1099. After spending part of the next decade on a nearly four-year pilgrimage in the Holy Land, he was made archbishop of Braga by Paschal II in 1109. As archbishop he appeared before the pope twice to defend his rights, once in a boundary dispute with Archbishop Bernard of Toledo, and again to protest decisions that benefited Santiago de Compostela at a cost to his diocese. In 1116, Paschal sent Mauritius on an embassy to Henry V (1106–25); while on this mission he defected to the emperor's cause. After Paschal had been forced from Rome by pressure from the Frangipani family in 1117, Henry appeared in the city with a large entourage, and on Easter Sunday (March 25) Mauritius solemnly crowned Henry emperor. In response, Paschal held a synod in Benevento where he deposed and excommunicated Henry and removed Mauritius as bishop of Braga.

Paschal died within a year (Jan. 24, 1118) and was succeeded by Gelasius II (1118–19). Henry immediately returned to Rome in the hope he could negotiate an end to the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY. Gelasius, however, remained in the town of Gaeta and had no intention of returning for negotiations with the emperor. Upon the advice of Irnerius of Bologna and other jurists, the imperial party annulled Gelasius' election, and on March 8, 1118 Mauritius was proclaimed pope with the support of the Frangipani. He took the name Gregory VIII, an odd choice if one considers Gregory VII's strong opposition to imperial involvement in the church. Gelasius excommunicated Henry and Gregory on April 8, and began to circulate letters throughout Europe denouncing Gregory's elevation.

Gregory's position became even weaker when Henry returned to Germany and dropped his support for the anti-pope upon the election of Callistus II (Feb. 2, 1119). Callistus and Henry began negotiations in 1119 while Callistus made consistent progress in controlling Lombardy and Tuscany. As a result, Gregory had to leave Rome for Sutri in 1119. In June 1120, Pope Callistus entered Rome, and in April 1121 he besieged Sutri. The citizens of the town turned Gregory over to the increasingly popular pope, and Callistus, in a final show of victory, forced Gregory to proceed through Rome seated backward on a camel. Gregory was then confined in various locations until his death. They include monasteries in Rome and Passerone, Holy Trinity at La Cava (near Salerno, and the place of confinement for antipopes Theodorich, 1100, and Innocent III, 1179–80), Rocca Iemolo (near Monte Cassino), and finally Castel Fumone. We know that he was alive at La Cava as late as August 1137; after this he disappears from the historical record.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, ed. Liber Pontificalis (Paris 1886–92; repr. 1955–57) 2.315, 347; 3.162–69. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig 1885–88; repr. Graz 1956) 1.821–22; 2.715. I. M. WATTERICH, Pontificum Romanorum (Leipzig; repr. Aalen 1862) 2.15, 119ff. C. ERDMANN, “Mauritius Burdinus (Gregor VIII),” Quellen und Forschungen aus Italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 19 (1927) 205–61. P. DAVID, “L'énigme de Maurice Bourdin,” in Études historiques sur la Galice et le Portugal (Lisbon 1947) 441–501. F. X. SEPPÉL, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Munich 1954–59) 3.152–159. C. SERVATIUS, Paschalis II (Stuttgart 1979) 128–131, 332. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1986) 21.1433–36. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 163–64. K. SCHREINER, “Gregor VIII, nackt auf einem Esel,” in Ecclesia et Regnum...Festschrift für F.J. Schmale (Bochum 1989) 155–202. T. STRUVE, Lexikon des Mittelalters (Munich 1989) 4.1671.

[P. M. SAVAGE]

Gregory IX consecrating the chapel of St. Gregory, detail of a 12th-century fresco in the lower church of the Sacro Speco at the monastery of Subiaco, Italy.

GREGORY IX, POPE

Pontificate: March 19, 1227, to Aug. 22, 1241; b. Hugo[lino] at Anagni, c. 1170; d. Rome. Hugolino was a member of the family of the counts of Segni. His father was a certain Mathias, who died prior to 1192, and his brother Adenulphus served as rector of Anagni. Hugolino was educated in Paris. There is no contemporary evidence that he studied in the law schools of Bologna, despite later tradition.

He was named cardinal deacon of St. Eustachius in 1198 and emerged as one of the leading cardinals in the reign of Innocent III, to whom he was closely related. He served in the negotiations with Markward of Anweiler in the kingdom of Sicily, and, in 1206, he became cardinal bishop of Ostia and was recognized as a leading figure in the papal curia. Under Honorius III, his influence increased. He was papal legate in Liguria and Tuscany in 1217 and remained Honorius's chief representative in this region and in his negotiations with the young emperor, FREDERICK II, whose confidence he enjoyed through most of Honorius's pontificate. Hugolino worked tirelessly to bring about peace among the warring factions in the communes of northern Italy and to recruit contingents for the crusade.

Following the death of Cardinal John of St. Paul, who had been one of St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI'S key supporters in the curia, in 1220, Hugolino became the first cardinal protector of the Franciscan order. He assisted Francis in the composition of the Franciscan rule, the regula bullata of 1223. He was also a supporter of St. Dominic and the Dominicans.

On the death of Honorius III, he was immediately elected pope. It was a critical period. The last years of Honorius's reign had seen not merely the defeat of the crusader army at Damietta, but the continued frustration of the papal effort to persuade Frederick II to fulfill his vow to undertake a crusade. The emperor delayed past the August 1227 deadline for his departure, using illness in the army as his excuse. His explanation may have been true, since there was illness in the army, but this delay triggered his automatic excommunication under the terms to which he had agreed in 1225. The excommunication was renewed in early 1228, while he was involved in delicate negotiations with the Egyptian Sultan, al-Kāmil, that were aimed at reviving the sultan's offer, made during the Fifth Crusade, to surrender Jerusalem and other holy places in return for a truce. The excommunicated emperor had little choice but to go to the Holy Land to attempt to reach an agreement with al-Kāmil and to rescue his reputation in the West. It was only after the re-fortification of Jaffa and a show of force that Frederick succeeded in getting an agreement with the sultan. Despite the propaganda efforts of both sides, there was no denying that it was a flawed treaty. Moreover, Frederick, who was regent of the kingdom of Jerusalem for his son, was unpopular with many in the kingdom, both because of his intervention in Cyprus before his arrival in the Latin Kingdom, and for his strained relations with many of the nobles, as well as with the Templars and Hospitalers. In the meantime, trouble erupted in Italy, where Gregory claimed that Count Rainald of Spoleto, who represented Frederick, was invading the Patrimony of St. Peter. Leaving a bailli in the Latin Kingdom, Frederick returned to Italy and quickly defeated the papal forces under John of Brienne and entered into negotiations with the pope, which resulted in the Treaty of Ceprano in 1230.

For the most part, Gregory and Frederick cooperated during the 1230s. Among the most notable accomplishments of this period was the promulgation of the Liber Extra (vagantium), compiled by Raymond of Peñafort in 1234. The Decretales, as it was called, was the most important collection of canon law down to modern times. It established the central role of the papacy in the legal structure of the Roman Catholic Church, marking the completion of the work begun by Gratian in the mid-twelfth century. In this connection, it was formerly thought that the promulgation of the Decretales represented Gregory's reaction to Frederick II's promulgation of the Constitutions of Melfi for the Kingdom of Sicily in 1231, but that was not the case. In fact, Frederick came to the aid of the pope in 1234 when the Romans rebelled, and Gregory supported Frederick's effort to re-assert imperial authority in northern Italy.

Inevitably papal and imperial interests clashed. Only after imperial forces invaded Sardinia, over which the papacy claimed feudal overlordship, however, did the rupture become permanent. The ensuing propaganda war brought out some of the strongest letters of condemnation from both sides. Frederick himself was excommunicated on March 20, 1239. Behind the rhetoric lay the influence of some members of the mendicant orders, particularly the Dominicans, who were quite influential at the papal court. Brother Elias, the deposed minister general of the Franciscans, sided with Frederick, but seems not to have had a direct role in the propaganda war. The correspondence on both sides, however, reflects some Joachimite imagery that was beginning to be felt in the mendicant orders. It should not be surprising that both Gregory and Frederick, as well as their chanceries, adopted some of the current strands of thought.

Emphasis on papal-imperial conflicts has distorted our view of Gregory's pontificate. To some extent, the same is true of his approach to the issue of heresy. He is regarded as the founder of the papal Inquisition, although both of his predecessors have received some credit or blame, and the full-blown Inquisition only developed after 1250. Gregory's views on heresy were deeply influenced by those of Innocent III that combined strong legal sanctions with a willingness to work for healing. To some degree he favored the rights of the counts of Toulouse, although they were regarded by many as supporters of heretics. On the other hand, he was very much caught up in the wave of religious enthusiasm that swept through Europe in the 1230s. One aspect of this, represented in the extreme anti-heretical activities of Conrad of Marburg and Robert le Bougre, received considerable support from the pope. He enlisted the Dominicans as preachers against heresy in Provence and was passionately involved in its suppression. This region, where the French monarchy was taking the lead in the suppression of heresy, at the same time integrating this with Capetian France, was a central focus of his concerns. There, as in other parts of Europe, it was often difficult to separate charges of heresy from political rivalries and personal quarrels. If some of those pursuing heretics went far beyond their authorization, Gregory's efforts were sometimes their justification. One difficult problem not easily dealt with is the degree to which concern over heresy was exaggerated by an intensification of religious zeal and the preaching of the friars. Perhaps Gregory more accurately reflected the attitudes of his time rather than attempting to moderate them.

The pope was also involved in the missionary efforts of his time, especially in the Baltic. These had been going on for many years, but were increasingly complicated by the political interests of secular rulers. Moreover, the military orders intended to maintain peace and security in the region, the Sword Brothers and the Teutonic Order, were themselves rivals and sources of conflict. The latter order would, in fact, emerge as a secular principality in the latter part of the thirteenth century. Gregory supported the DOMINICANS as preachers and tried to protect converts from economic and political exploitation. His concerns were chiefly pastoral, but they had almost no long-term impact.

The major achievement of Gregory's pontificate was the firm backing he gave to the FRANCISCANS and Dominicans, as well as to other new religious orders. He was deeply imbued with the spirit of reform that motivated these communities. He issued privilege after privilege aimed at freeing them from episcopal jurisdiction, encouraging their preaching, and drawing on them for the work of the church. He was chiefly responsible for using them as a kind of special force in the employ of the papacy against heresy. He admired the educational attainments of the Dominicans and saw in them a way to educate and persuade those who might otherwise fall into heresy. He also participated in an abortive discussion with the Greek Church, but his adherence to the Latin position on the azymes and filioque questions resulted in disappointment. A man of strong and emotional character, he was more capable of flexibility than some have thought. For example, in spite of his breaks with Frederick, he was capable of recognizing specific imperial and royal rights.

Bibliography: Sources: L. AUVRAY, Registre de Gregoire IX: recueil des bulles de ce pape publiées ou analysées d'après les manuscrits originaux du Vatican, 4 v. (Paris 1890–1955). J. L. A. HUILLARD-BRÉHOLLES, Historia Diplomatica Friderici II Romanorum imperatoris, 6 v. in 12 (Paris 1852–51). G. LEVI, Registri di Cardinali Ugolino d'Ostia e Ottaviano degli Ubaldini (Rome 1890). Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Leges, 2.1. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae, 1. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptorum, 16:22. B. GUI, Rerum Italicarum Scriptorum, III. (Life of Gregory by Bernard Gui). Secondary Works: P. BALAN, Storia di Gregorio IX e dei suoi tempi, 2 v. in 1 (Modena, 1872–73). J. FELTEN, Papst Gregor IX (Freiburg 1886). H.K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 13: 165–441. F.X. SEPELLT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jahrhunderts (Munich 1956) 3: 411–52. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (2d. rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 4:47–160. C. THOUZELLIER, “La legation en Lombardie du cardinal Hugolin,” Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, 45 (1950), 508–542. J. M. POWELL, Anatomy of a Crusade, 1213–1221 (Philadelphia 1986). C. MORRIS, The Papal Monarchy: The Western Church from 1050 to 1250 (New York 1991). J. STRAYER, The Albigensian Crusades (Ann Arbor 1992). B. SCHIMMELPFENNIG, The Papacy (New York 1992) 174–187. M. LAMBERT, The Cathars (Oxford 1999). E. CHRISTIANSEN, The Northern Crusades (New York 1997).

[J. M. POWELL]

GREGORY X, POPE, BL.

Pontificate: Sept. 1, 1271, to Jan. 10, 1276; b. Teobaldo or Tedaldo Visconti, Piacenza, Italy, 1210; d. Arezzo, Italy. The death of Clement IV was followed by one of the longest interregnums to occur in the history of the papacy. The conclave at Viterbo lasted nearly three years, largely because of the inability of French and Italian factions to agree upon a suitable candidate. As the debate continued, public indignation grew, and in the summer of 1270 the civic authorities of the town of Viterbo attempted to force the vote by locking the cardinals in the papal palace, removing the roof, and threatening to withdraw daily rations of food. These stern measures failed to secure a compromise, however, and the stalemate continued. After royal intervention the deadlock was eventually broken and the fifteen-member Sacred College of Cardinals agreed to designate six of their body to cast the final vote. On Sept. 1, 1271 Tedaldo Visconti was elected to the See of Peter.

By most accounts, Tedaldo Visconti was a remarkable man, who had a peaceful and conciliatory spirit. The English historian David Knowles even went so far as to describe him as the most spiritual pope after Celestine V. Yet when he was elected, Tedaldo was neither an ordained priest nor a cardinal. Nevertheless, he had served the church for several years outside of Italy, and by the time of his election he had earned an excellent reputation as an archdeacon of Liège. As a young man, Tedaldo had worked for years with Cardinal James of Praeneste, and he had helped to organize the first council of Lyons in 1245. Between the years 1245 and 1248, Tedaldo attended the University of Paris, where he may have met both St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Bonaventure. In 1265, Tedaldo traveled with Cardinal Ottobono on his mission to England, while there he served as the confidant of both the French and English royal families. Five years later, Tedaldo left England and accompanied the future King Edward I on a crusade to the Holy Land. They were in Saint-Jean d'Acre when they heard the news of the papal election. Responding to the summons of the Cardinals to return home immediately, Tedaldo left Acre on Nov. 19, 1271 and reached Viterbo on Feb. 12, 1272. Upon his arrival, Tedaldo Visconti accepted the papal office and took the name Gregory X. One month later, the pope-elect traveled to Rome, where he was ordained to the priesthood on March 19. His consecration took place in St. Peter's on March 27, 1272.

When Gregory ascended to the papal office, he was immediately confronted with a set of potentially dangerous political situations remaining from the reign of his predecessor. For example, the execution of Conradin in 1268 ended the Hohenstaufen line and held the possibility for the end of imperial authority in Germany with the resulting instability. Charles of Anjou, the brother of Louis IX of France and the Count of Provence, who had defeated Conradin at the Battle of Tagliacozzo, became king of both Sicily and southern Italy. He was now a powerful neighbor of the pope with the potential to recover Constantinople for the West. Yet this possibility had to be balanced against the cause of Church unity, which the Byzantine emperor, Michael Paleologos, dangled before the pope in the hope of keeping King Charles at bay.

On May 1, 1274, approximately four days after his coronation, Gregory called a general council at Lyons (Council of Lyons II) to deal with what he perceived as a serious situation. Gregory himself sought wide support for his council, whose significance is perhaps best reflected by the postponement of Edward I's coronation in order to ensure the attendance of a large delegation from England. In fact, Thomas Aquinas died on route to the council. Gregory remained a crusader at heart and the deliverance of the Holy Land was a central concern. At his request, the Council called for a new crusade, and Gregory laid the plans to fund it by adopting a resolution by which one tenth of all benefices accruing to all churches would be set aside for a period of six years. To create the necessary conditions for a crusade, the new pope needed to secure greater unity within Europe. In Lombardy and Tuscany this meant making peace between the Guelphs, a pro-papal party, and the Ghibellines, a pro-imperial party. Gregory also worked toward stability by encouraging the election of a new German king. Although there were a number of rival claimants to the crown, Gregory was instrumental in securing the election of Rudolf of Habsburg on Oct. 1, 1273. This action undoubtedly annoyed Charles of Anjou, who favored Philip III of France, but by supporting the Habsburgs, Gregory managed to prevent Angevin domination in Italy.

Gregory was an enthusiastic advocate of Church unity, which he saw as desirable in its own right, but which would have strategic value for a crusade. So despite protestations from King Charles, the pope sent envoys to Constantinople as early as October 1272. Gregory openly expressed his desire for unity and invited Michael Paleologos to send a delegation to the Council of Lyons. The union that Gregory wanted was accomplished when the Emperor Michael renounced the schism, and the eastern ambassadors agreed to the Roman creed, including the double procession of the Holy Spirit. Yet the patriarch of Constantinople was not represented in the Greek delegation, and the results of the Council were not accepted in the East. Despite all of his preparations, Pope Gregory's crusade never took place.

Nevertheless, Gregory's pontificate was successful, since many of his other policies had consequences that were far reaching and positive. He is particularly remembered for his famous bull Ubi Periculum, that established the rules for the election of popes and was intentionally designed to prevent prolonged vacancies in the papacy, like the one that preceded his election. It was proclaimed at the Council of Lyons on July 7, 1274. In the interest of wider moral reformation, Gregory also attempted to curtail long vacancies of benefices; he attacked pluralism, and he placed restrictions on the religious orders, with the exception of the Dominicans and Franciscans.

In October 1275, Gregory traveled to Lausanne to meet Rudolf of Habsburg and to discuss plans for his coronation as emperor. Gregory then crossed the Alps and visited Milan, Florence, and Arezzo. In the latter city, he was stricken by fever and he died on Jan. 10, 1276. He was buried in the Duomo and is revered as a saint in Arezzo, Placenza, and Lausanne. In fact, he was declared blessed by the Church in 1713. He is remembered as a pope who de-emphasized the temporal authority of the papacy and concentrated on spiritual revival and the restoration of Christian unity.

Feast: Jan. 28 and Feb. 4.

Bibliography: Registres de Grégoire X, ed. J. GUIRAUD (Paris 1892–1906). Vita in L. A. MURATORI, Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500 (Milan 1723–51) 3.1:597–598; 3.2:424–426. G. PACHYMERES, Michael Palaeologus, Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 143:822–854. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ (Paris 1907–38) 6:153–209. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio (Graz 1960–) v. 24. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 15:361–454. S. KUTTNER, "Conciliar Law in the Making," Miscellanea Pio Paschini, 2 v. (Rome 1948–49) 2:39–81. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 10:487–503. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) Tables générales 1925. D. J. GEANAKOPLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West, 1258–1282 (Cambridge, MA 1959) 258–304. L. GATTO, Il pontificato di Gregorio X, 1271–1276 (Rome 1959). B. ROBERG, Das Zweite Konzil von Lyon (Paderborn 1990) 17–31. The New Cambridge Medieval History, ed. D. ABULAFIA (Cambridge 1999) 107–163. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:1187–88.

[J. A. SHEPPARD]

Allegory in praise of Gregory XI, detail of the pope's tomb in Sta Maria Nova, Rome, carved by the Roman sculptor Pier Paolo Olivieri in 1584. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource)

GREGORY XI, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 30, 1370 to March 26, 1378; b. Pierre Roger de Beaufort, in the Limousin, 1329; d. Rome. This final representative of the AVIGNON PAPACY studied law at Perugia after having been made cardinal (May 1348) by his uncle, Pope CLEMENT VI. When elected pope in Avignon, Gregory was considered a pious, knowledgeable, and modest priest bothered by a weak constitution. He proved, however, a more resolute pope than he has often been credited with being. His reign was preoccupied with three problems, primarily with peace. Arbitration between the houses of Anjou and Aragon resulted in the recognition of the latter's right to the Kingdom of Trinacria, on condition of homage to the pope (1374). Negotiators were dispatched to the Anglo-French talks at Bruges. In Italy, where there was already violent fighting against the Visconti, Gregory alarmed Florence when he sent agents to reassert papal power in central Italy; Florence, backed by the Visconti, went to war, unleashing a general revolt in the STATES OF THE CHURCH (1375). The pope was compelled to wage a painful war to recover his lands; Florence ended it by negotiation in December 1377. The second concern of Gregory was for the reform of the religious orders, especially the DOMINI-

CANS and HOSPITALLERS. His third problem was heresy. The INQUISITION was reactivated, especially against the WALDENSES in the Alps. Certain of WYCLIF's theses were condemned.

Like Pope URBAN V before him, Gregory always cherished the idea of taking the papacy back to Rome, and in September 1376 he actually left Avignon, entering Rome on Jan. 17, 1377. His death there 14 months later marked the beginning of the dissension that gave rise to the WESTERN SCHISM.

Bibliography: Lettres . . . se rapportant à la France, ed. L. MIROT et al. (Paris 1935–57); Indices, ed. G. MOLLAT and E. R. LABANDE; Lettres . . . intéressant les pays autres que ta France, ed. G. MOLLAT (Paris 1962). É. BALUZE, Vitae paparum Avenionensium, ed. G. MOLLAT, 4 v. (Paris 1914–27). P. AMEILH, "Itinerarium domini Gregorii papae XI" in Rerum italicarum scriptores, 500–1500 3.2:690–712; Fr. tr. P. RONZY (Florence 1952). J. P. KIRSCH, Die Rückkehr der Päpste Urban V. und Gregor XI. von Avignon nach Rom (Paderborn 1898). G. MOLLAT, "Grégoire IX et sa légende," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 49 (Louvain 1954) 873–877; The Popes at Avignon, tr. J. LOVE (New York 1963). F. CARDINI, "L'idea di crociata in santa Caterina da Siena," Studi sulla storia e sull'idea di crociata (Rome 1993) 423–56. M. HARVEY, "The Household of Cardinal Langham," The Journal of Ecclesiastical Studies 47 (1996) 18–44. U. NICOLINI, "Perugia e l'origine dell' osservanza francescana," Scritti di Storia (Naples 1993) 447–58. A. I. PINI, Città medioevali e demografia storica: Bologna, Romagna, Italia (Bologna 1996). H. SCHMIDINGER, "Die Rückkehr Gregors XI. nach Rom in den Berichten des Cristoforus von Piancenza," in Ecclesia peregrinans. Josef Lenzenweger zum 70. Geburtstag (Vienna 1986) 133–41. P. R. THIBAUT, Pope Gregory XI: The Failure of Tradition (Lanham, MD 1986). ST. WEISS, "Kredite europäischer Fürsten für Gregor XI. Zur Finanzierung der Rückkehr des Papsttums von Avignon nach Rom," Quellen und Forschungen aus Italienschen Archiven und Bibliotheken (Tübingen 1997) 176–205. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 225.

[E. R. LABANDE]

GREGORY XII, POPE

Pontificate: Nov. 30, 1406 to July 4, 1415; b. Angelo Correr, at Venice, c. 1325; d. Recanati, Italy, Oct. 18, 1417. During his pontificate the Western Schism was finally ended. Little is known about his early life and career. In 1380 he became bishop of Castello and in 1390 was named Latin patriarch of Constantinople. Becoming associated with Pope INNOCENT VII, he was made apostolic secretary, then legate of Ancona, and, in 1405, cardinal. Each cardinal who met in Rome in 1406 to elect a successor to Innocent VII promised that if elected he would resign the papal see providing the schismatic antipope in AVIGNON would do likewise: the dual resignations would free both Avignon and Roman cardinals to elect a new pontiff and thereby end the paralyzing WESTERN SCHISM in the Church. Gregory XII was elected on Nov. 30, 1406, and accordingly on December 12 he informed the antipope at Avignon, BENEDICT XIII, of his election and asked for a meeting at which the resignations could be arranged. Benedict agreed to meet with Gregory, but difficulties arose over the location of the conference. Benedict was in fact unwilling to resign despite his announced intention of discussing the matter, and Gregory, although sincerely interested in doing so at the outset, gradually lost interest in the project. Angered at the failure of the two popes to resolve their differences and end the schism, cardinals from both parties met at a "council" at PISA in 1409 and proceeded to declare both popes deposed and to elect a third, who took the name ALEXANDER V. The Pisan pope died in the following year and was succeeded by antipope JOHN XXIII. On Dec. 12, 1413, at the insistence of Emperor SIGISMUND, John XXIII called a council to convene at CONSTANCE. When the council met (Nov. 5, 1414), John XXIII was deposed (May 29, 1415) and Gregory XII was recognized as the lawful pope. Gregory in turn reconvened the council and then resigned the papal office (July 4, 1415), paving the way for the eventual election of a new pope, MARTIN V, by the assembled cardinals. The Avignon pontiff, Benedict XIII, still refused to recognize the proceedings at Constance, but the Council declared him guilty of heresy and deprived him of all rights to the papacy (July 1417), whereupon he fled to Spain and remained there until his death. Gregory XII was made cardinal bishop of Porto and legate of the March of Ancona for life.

Bibliography: Acta Concilii Constanciensis, ed. H. FINKE, 4 v. (Münster 1896–1928). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) 1:166–202. M. DE BOÛARD, Les Origines des guerres d'Italie: La France et l'Italie au temps du grand schisme d'Occident (Paris 1936). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1957) 4:228–248. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 14. L. R. LOOMIS, J. H. MUNDY and K. M. WOODY, The Council of Constance (New York 1961). R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 25 (Paris 1994), s.v. "Hugolin de Camerino, OP." M. FANUCCI, L'estimo di Pisa nell'anno del Concilio (1409) (Pisa 1986). M. GAILL, The Three Popes: An Account of the Great Schism—when Rival Popes in Rome, Avignon and Pisa Vied for the Rule of Christendom (London 1972). D. GIRGENSOHN, Theologische Realenzyklopedie 26 (Berlin 1996), s.v. "Pisa, Konzil von (1409)." D. GIRGENSOHN, "Über die Protokolle des Pisaner Konzils von 1409." Annuario Historiae Conciliorum 18 (Paderborn 1986). M. KINTZINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 6 (1997), s.v. "Konrad v. Susato." A. W. LEWIN, "'Cum Status Ecclesie Noster sit': Florence and the Council of Pisa (1409)," Church History 62 (Chicago 1993) 178–89. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 234.

[J. M. MULDOON]

GREGORY XIII, POPE

Pontificate: May 14, 1572, to April 10, 1585; b. Ugo Buoncompagni, Bologna, Jan. 1, 1502. The fourth son of Cristoforo, a merchant, and of Angela Marescalchi, he studied at Bologna under celebrated jurists and became a doctor of canon and civil law at 28. From 1531 to 1539 he taught at Bologna as professor of law, including among his pupils Otto TRUCHSESS, Cristoforo MADRUZZO, Reginald POLE, Francesco Alciati, and Alessandro FARNESE. In 1539 Cardinal Pietro Paolo Parisio brought him to Rome. Paul III made him successively judge in the Capitol, abbreviator (secretary) of the Council of Trent, and vice-chancellor in the Campagna. Until that time he had not been ordained to the priesthood, and while at Bologna, he had a natural son, Giacomo. He was ordained when he was about 40 years of age. Under Paul IV Buoncompagni was made datary to Cardinal Carlo CARAFA, the pope's nephew, whom he accompanied twice on important legations, namely, to France in 1556 and to Brussels in 1557. In July 1558 he was made bishop of Viesti. Despite his association with the Carafa family, he escaped being involved in their downfall after the death of Paul IV. In 1561 Pius IV sent Buoncompagni, as an expert in Canon Law, to Trent with Cardinal Ludovico SIMONETTA, the legate.

When the Council of Trent ended in 1563, he returned to Rome. On March 12, 1565, Pius IV created him cardinal priest with the title of St. Sixtus. He was then sent to Spain to review the case of the Archbishop of Toledo, Bartolomé de CARRANZA, whom the Inquisition had imprisoned on suspicion of heresy. Felice Peretti (later Sixtus V) accompanied him as theologian on this mission. Pius IV died while Buoncompagni was in Spain. He did not reach Rome for the conclave that elected Pius V. The new pope gave Buoncompagni the Segnatura of Briefs (1566). In the conclave that followed the death of Pius V, Cardinal Antoine Perrenot de GRANVELLE dissuaded those who favored the election of Cardinal Alessandro Farnese and helped secure, with the favor of Philip II, the election of Buoncompagni on May 14, 1572. He took the name Gregory in honor of Pope Gregory the Great, on whose feast day he had been made cardinal.

Religious Restoration. Gregory was fervently concerned with religious restoration. Some of his efforts were inconclusive, as in France, where the outcome in favor of Catholicism would not be decided until after Gregory's death. But the massacre of ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY occurred barely three months after Gregory's election. The letters of Antonio Maria Salviati, the legate in Paris, were read in consistory on Sept. 6, 1572. These alleged, on testimony of the French court, that the HUGUENOTS had plotted to kill Charles IX and the royal family and that they had therefore been sentenced to death. Cardinal Charles de Lorraine (1524–1574), a GUISE, then urged the Pope and Sacred College to join in a Te Deum the following week. The event was celebrated not merely as the defeat of a political treason, but as defeat of a conspiracy against the Church. Although Gregory continued to support the League in France, he sensed the ambition of the Guises. He stressed that members of the League should work primarily for religious and not for political ends.

Gregory XII, engraving by Panvinio.

He failed in moves against England and the Turks, and his efforts in Sweden and Russia were likewise fruitless. He acted against Elizabeth mainly because of her persecution of Catholics, but also because she was aiding the Huguenots surreptitiously and because of MARY STUART's situation. He was unsuccessful in his hopes for an Irish invasion, when the first attempt, organized by Thomas Stucley (Stukeley), became abortive in 1578 and the second ended in the killing of his confederate James (Fitzmaurice) Fitzgerald in a skirmish after landing in 1579. In Sweden John III (reign 1568–92) secretly ab-

Pope Gregory XIII, statue by the 16th-century sculptor Pier Paolo Olivieri, in S. Maria in Aracoeli, Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

jured Lutheranism and began negotiating with the papacy, but his stipulations (including clerical marriage and suppression of the invocation of saints and of prayers for the dead) were unacceptable. John III then reverted to Lutheranism. The efforts of the pope to secure union of the Russian Church with Rome failed because Gregory and his envoys, mediating between Stephen BÁTHORY of Poland and Ivan IV, underestimated the religious inflexibility of the Russians. Gregory failed also in the attempt to sustain a crusade against the Turks. Despite the victory of Lepanto in 1571, Venice made peace with the Turks in 1573, the Spaniards were driven out of Tunis in 1574, and Spain negotiated a peace in 1581. Hope of organizing a combined Polish-Russian crusade, however, was never realized.

The religious restoration succeeded in Poland, the Low Countries, and parts of Germany. Poland was definitively won for Catholicism. The southern provinces of the Netherlands remained predominantly Catholic, and Michel Baius at Louvain abjured his errors. In Germany Duke Albert of Bavaria and Emperor Ferdinand II halted and reversed Protestant gains in Austria, Carinthia, and Styria. The Jesuits flourished in Ingolstadt, Regensburg, and at the University of Graz. Fulda, Mainz, and Cleves were held for Catholicism. Cologne was saved from the attempt of Gebhard Truchsess to convert that ecclesiastical principality into a holding for his family.

Gregory's nepotism was limited. His son Giacomo was made governor of Castel Sant'Angelo and gonfalonier of the Church. Two of his nephews were made cardinals. But the persons who most influenced his decisions were men imbued, like Cardinal Charles BORROMEO, with the ideals of Trent.

Reforms. Gregory supported the Jesuits both in Europe and in such lands as India, China, Japan, and Brazil. He also favored the Franciscans, the Trinitarians, and the Capuchins. In 1575 he sanctioned establishment of the Oratory under Philip NERI, and approved the reform of the Spanish Carmelites under Teresa of Avila. Wishing to defend the faith with an effectively trained clergy, he fostered such schools as the German, the Greek, and the English colleges. In 1572 he reconstructed the Roman College, later known as the Gregorian University. Many schools outside Rome also owed their foundation to him. He enriched the Vatican Library by donating his own private library to it and opening it to scholars. Calendar correction, undertaken by a commission of scientists, provided a unique memorial to Gregory. The reformed calendar, which dropped ten days and interjected a lead year, was solemnly published in February 1582. Gregory continued and completed Pius IV's commission for a new edition of the Corpus Iuris Canonici, and produced a new edition of the Martyrology. He established the feast of the Most Holy Rosary (1573) and that of St. Anne (1584). In 1575 a jubilee brought over 300,000 pilgrims to Rome.

His stand against Henry of Navarre, against Elizabeth of England, and against the Turks cost great sums. So, too, did his support of schools and missions. He constructed, among many works in Rome, the Quirinal palace, the Gregorian chapel in St. Peter's, and the fountains in the Piazza Navona. His expenditures exhausted the papal treasury and led him to seek additional revenues from papal monopolies and customs. But he also charged escheatments and arrearages against extensive feudal holdings so that many fiefs were reclaimed by the papacy. Widespread banditry then arose on the part of dispossessed nobles, but the pontifical government was lax in countering disorder, and lawlessness came to prevail through the Papal States, even in Rome itself. Commerce declined. Despite the economic and administrative failures at the end of the reign, Gregory's was a great pontificate, especially in the actualizing of the aims of the Council of Trent.

Bibliography: M. A. CIAPPI, Compendio delle attioni et vita di Gregorio XIII (Rome 1591). P. HERRE, Papsttum und Papstwahl im Zeitalter Philipps II (Leipzig 1907). L. KARTTUNEN, Gregoire XIII comme politicien et souverain (Helsinki 1911). G. LEVI DELLA VIDA, Documenti intorno alle relazioni delle chiese orientali con la S. Sede durante il pontificato di Gregorio XIII (Studi e Testi 143; Rome 1948). P. MONCELLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1809–15. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v.19–20. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 2 4:1188–90. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 5:245–248. C.A. FERNANDEZ, Gregory XIII y Felipe II (Toledo 1991). J. DULUMEAU Catholicism between Luther and Voltaire (London 1977). P. CARAMAN, University of Nations: The Study of the Gregorian University (New York 1981). J.W. O'MALLEY The First Jesuits (Cambridge, Mass. 1993).

[D. R. CAMPBELL]

GREGORY XIV, POPE

Pontificate: Dec. 5, 1590, to Oct. 16, 1591; b. Niccolò Sfondrati, Somma (near Milan), Feb. 11, 1535, of an ancient noble family from Cremona, which transferred to Milan. His father, Francesco, after the death of his wife, Anna Visconti, entered religion and in 1550 was named cardinal by Pope Paul III. Niccolò studied law at Perugia and Padua, received his doctorate at Pavia, and then entered clerical life. He was a follower of (St.) Charles Borromeo, who had an important influence upon him. At the age of 25 he was named bishop of Cremona by Pius IV (March 12, 1560). As bishop he participated in the third period of the Council of Trent (1561–63) and sought to execute its decrees in his diocese. He was named cardinal of St. Cecilia by Pope Gregory XIII on Dec. 12, 1583; as a cardinal he was a close friend of (St.) Philip Neri, whom he tried to imitate. On Dec. 5, 1590, after a conclave lasting for more than two months and marked by intrigue, Niccolò was elected to succeed Urban VII, largely because he was favored by the Spanish party. Though honest and pious, Gregory was not suited by disposition or by experience for the heavy burden of the pontificate; moreover, he was often in bad health. Most unwisely he chose his nephew Paolo Emilio SFONDRATI as his secretary of state, creating him a cardinal at the age of 29 on Dec. 19, 1590. Both the pope and his secretary were ignorant of political affairs.

Gregory tried to free Rome from the triple scourge of epidemic, scarcity of food, and brigandage. During the pestilence of 1590 he received the aid of (St.) Camillus de Lellis, whose congregation he erected into a religious order the next year. He gave his support to the French League, which was guided by the Guise family and Spain, and took measures against Henry of Navarre, renewing on March 1, 1591, the sentence of excommunication of Sixtus V and ordering the French to renounce him (see HENRY IV, KING OF FRANCE). In this action he was influenced by his nephew Paolo Emilio, who was pro-Spanish and quite dependent on the Spanish ambassador in Rome. The pope granted a monthly subsidy of 15,000 gold scudi to the city of Paris and dispatched his nephew Ercole Sfondrati to France at the head of the papal troops, followed by Marsilio Landriano as special nuncio to unite the Catholics against the Protestant Henry. The French, however, rejected the papal edicts; Landriano was not permitted to present the papal brief either to Cardinal Philippe de Lenoncourt or to Cardinal Charles Bourbon. At this time the pope was taken ill and removed to the Quirinal. Although still sick in August 1591, he moved to the Palace of S. Marco to discuss with Duke Alfonso II of Ferrara the succession to the throne of Ferrara, since the duke had no children. This question and its connection with the bull of Pius V on the alienation of the fiefs of the Church disturbed the pope until his death.

The pontificate of Gregory XIV, though brief, was important in furthering the internal reform of the Church. Gregory enforced more strictly the rules of episcopal residence and visitations of religious houses, and required an examination of the worthiness of those aspiring to episcopal office. He forbade the celebration of Mass in private homes and the making of wagers on papal elections. He assigned commissions to revise the Pian Breviary and the Sistine Vulgate. The latter had been edited by his predecessor, Sixtus V, but withdrawn from circulation because of errors. On May 24, 1591, he published a constitution regulating the right of sanctuary, suspending all previous enactments. He also gave orders for the completion of the work at St. Peter's and for the erection of a chapel at St. Mary Major for his own tomb. His friend Giovanni Pierluigi da PALESTRINA dedicated several of his musical works to the pope's memory. However, his nepotism disturbed the cardinals while the masses in the Papal State resented the prevailing lawlessness.

Bibliography: M. FACINI, Il Pontificato de Gregorio XIV (Rome 1911). L. CASTANO, Nicolò Sfondrati, vescovo di Cremona al concilio di Trento 1561-1563, (Turin 1939). L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London-St. Louis 1938-61) 22:351-408 and passim. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 4:1190. P. PARTNER, "Papal Financial Policy in the Renaissance and Counter-Reformation" Past and Present (August 1980) 17-62. M. CARAVELE and A. CARACCILO, Lo stato pontificio de Martino V a Pio IX (Turin 1978).

[R. L. FOLEY]

GREGORY XV, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 9, 1621, to July 8, 1623; b. Alessandro Ludovisi, Bologna, Jan. 9, 1554. Alessandro came from a noble family that had been in Bologna since the twelfth century. In 1567 he went to Rome to study under the Jesuits. On account of his health he returned home in 1569, but later that year he was again in Rome. In 1571 he began studying law at the University of Bologna and received his degree in 1575. Then he decided to become a priest.

Early Career. Gregory XIII gave him his first appointment, that of chairman in the College of Judges. Sixtus V selected him to accompany the legate to Poland, but illness prevented his going. When Clement VIII was a cardinal, he became Ludovisi's patron. Pope Clement VIII appointed him to the Segnatura di giustizia, where he solved the difficult cases. He advised the pope and settled disputes: one between the French and Spanish ambassadors; another between the Farnese family and the pope; another, with the assistance of Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, later Urban VIII, between the pope and Naples over Benevento. Paul V appointed him vicegerent for the cardinal vicar; in this office he arbitrated disputes among Romans. He also helped in settling the disagreement between the pope and the Venetian government. He was appointed archbishop of Bologna in 1612, but did not remain there long, since the pope needed him as a negotiator between Charles Emmanuel I of Savoy and Philip III of Spain about Monferrato. His assistance pleased both rulers and the pope. On his return to Bologna he began reforms, especially for the training and supervision of his clergy. Paul V made him a cardinal in 1616.

Pontificate. When elected pope, Gregory appointed his brother Orazio general of the Church and created his 25-year-old nephew Ludovico Ludovisi cardinal secretary of state. The favors bestowed on the cardinal made him very wealthy.

In spite of the shortness of this pontificate, there were two important and far-reaching reforms of this first Jesuit-trained pope. The first changed the method of electing a pope, thereby abolishing abuses. The practice of electing by adoration or acclamation had several weaknesses, especially the influence some cardinals or rulers wielded over timid cardinals. Sometimes there had been bargaining before the death of a pope. Immediately after the election of Gregory XV, which had some abuses, several cardinals proposed a reform. The first bull, published November 26, contained the following major changes: an election could take place only after the closing of the conclave and a candidate must receive at least two-thirds of the votes by secret ballot; no candidate could vote for himself; each cardinal must take an oath that would prevent the casting of votes as compliments. The second bull, March 12, 1622, amplified the first by regulating every part of an election. These provisions were followed in all succeeding elections until the time of Pius X.

The second important reform established the Congregatio de Propaganda Fide (see PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE) for missionary work on January 6, 1622. Three preceding popes, Pius V, Gregory XIII, and Clement VIII, had seen the need for improvement and had started plans, but nothing was done by Paul V. The new Congregation consisted of 16 persons: two bishops, 13 cardinals, and a secretary. Juan Vives, one of the bishops, gave his palace in Piazza di Spagna as a center. The cardinals appointed were outstanding. One was Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, who as Gregory's successor continued the reform. On January 14, only eight days after its foundation, the Congregation met. From its meetings twice a month and once a month with the Pope, there followed the bull of June 22 and later additional provisions by Gregory XV. The Congregation brought unity. It gathered information, decided the regions to which missionaries would go, settled disputes, supervised colleges in Rome, and restricted the claims of Spain and Portugal to patronage (see PATRONATO REAL). The work of the Congregation was not limited to the non-Christian parts of the world, as it sought to revive faith and to extend it in the European countries. These were divided into groups, and each group was placed under a nuncio. In 1922 he canonized several heroes of the Catholic revival including Ignatius Loyola, Francis Xavier, Teresa of Avila and Phillip Neri.

Two other achievements were in keeping with Gregory XV's religious goals. Since the restoration of Elector Frederick in the Palatinate in the first phase of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR would have extended the Protestant faith, the pope greatly increased his subsidies to the Catholics. Catholicism was restored in Bohemia, and Maximilian of Bavaria became the Palatine elector. In gratitude he gave the Palatine library to the pope. In the quarrel between France and Spain over the territory of the Valtellina, there was the possibility of war, and of Catholics losing their religious rights. The pope succeeded in preventing war by having the Valtellina placed temporarily under the Holy See. He also sought to improve the status of Catholics in the British Isles by granting a dispensation for the marriage between Prince Charles of England and a Spanish princess. The marriage never took place.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, (London–St. Louis 1938–61) v. 27, passim. L. VON RANKE, The History of the Popes During the Last Four Centuries, tr. MRS. FOSTER, ed. G. R. DENNIS, 3 v. (London 1913) 2:209–259, 3:220–243. D. ALBRECHT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1190. P. MONCELLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1815–22. F. HAMMOND, Music and Spectacle in Baroque Rome (New Haven 1994). G. LABROT, L'Image de Rome: Une arme pour la Contre-Reforme, 1534–1677 (Seysssel 1987). J.W. O'MALLEY, ed. Catholicism in Early Modern History (St. Louis, Mo. 1988).

[M. L. SHAY]

GREGORY XVI, POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 2, 1831, to June 1, 1846; b. Bartolomeo Alberto (Mauro) Cappellari, at Belluno (in Venetia), Italy, Sept. 18, 1765.

Prepapal Career. He was the son of Giovanni Cappellari, a lawyer, and Giulia (Cesa-Pagani) Cappellari, both of noble birth. In 1783 he joined the monastic order of CAMALDOLESE and entered the monastery of San Michele di Murano near Venice, taking Mauro as his religious name. After ordination (1787), he became in 1790 professor of science and philosophy. Sent to Rome in 1795 to assist the order's procurator general, he was chosen abbot of the monastery of San Gregorio on the Caelian Hill in 1805. In 1807 he became procurator-general of the Camaldolese. His opposition to the French during the Napoleonic occupation led to his expulsion from the Eternal City (1807). He went then to his monastery in Murano and later dwelt in Padua. In 1814 he returned to Rome, remaining there the rest of his life. In addition to his duties as abbot and as professor of theology, he served as consultor to the Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, the Holy Office, and other Roman congregations, and as examiner of prospective bishops. Leo XII named him apostolic visitor to four local universities.

Pope Gregory XVI. (Engraving by Henriquel-Dupont, after a drawing by Paul Delaroche.)

Cappellari became vicar-general of the Camaldolese in 1823. After declining the sees of Zante and Tivoli, he was proclaimed a cardinal (March 13, 1826). He acted as consultant to the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH from 1821 and as prefect from 1826 until his election as pope (Feb. 2, 1831). Between this last date and his enthronement (February 6) he received episcopal consecration.

Previous to 1831 Cappellari was noted for his interest in theology and in the missions. As a theologian he revived the teachings of Augustine and Aquinas in Catholic institutions. In 1799 he published Il Trionfo della Santa Sede e della Chiesa contro gli assalti dei novatori combattuti e respinti colle stese loro armi (The Triumph of the Holy See against the Assaults of the Innovators).

At the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs Cappellari sought to establish contact with the new political order created by the FRENCH REVOLUTION. At Propaganda he strove to promote the interests of the Church in the diverse, far-flung countries under the jurisdiction of this congregation, which then had under its charge the Church in Great Britain, Ireland, the Low Countries, Prussia, Scandinavian lands, Africa, Asia, Oceania, and the entire Western Hemisphere.

Profiting by the religious liberty recently inscribed in the Fundamental Law of the Netherlands, he collaborated efficaciously in the conclusion of a concordat with this government (1827). In 1829 he regulated the manner of making episcopal nominations in Ireland. He helped draft the brief of Pius VIII (March 25, 1830) to the German bishops concerning the growing dispute over mixed marriages in Prussia.

These activities revealed Cappellari's apostolic realism. He displayed the same qualities in his dealings with mission territories, where he created numerous vicariates apostolic. In every way open to him he facilitated the administration of the Sacraments, especially Baptism. His decree (July 2, 1827) distinguishing between the religious and purely civil significance of certain rites permitted Catholics in Siam to participate in them by classifying them as merely civil.

The conclave in 1831 remained in session nearly 50 days before selecting Cardinal Cappellari as pope. Two groups among the cardinals, the conservative zelanti and the more liberal politicanti, opposed one another differing in their appreciation of the relevance to the papacy of the politicoreligious consequences of the French Revolution and the intellectual unrest caused by the ENLIGHTENMENT. Cappellari, who was regarded in the 1829 conclave as papabile, received 33 of the 41 votes and the support of Metternich. Only after receiving an order from his confessor and fellow Camaldolese, Cardinal Zurla, did he accept the papal dignity.

Papal Doctrinal Pronouncements. By temperament he was cold, but his relations with ROSMINI-SERBATI prove his capacity for friendship. All during his pontificate, however, he retained his austere monastic mode of life. "I am always a monk," he declared. At the time he ascended the papal throne, faith was menaced by RATIONALISM and INDIFFERENTISM, and traditional civil authority by LIBERALISM. Gregory XVI attacked their underlying principles. In his solution of the practical problems stemming from these trends he sought accommodations.

One of his dominant views was clearly inscribed in Il trionfo. . . . Although written in a heavy style, replete with digressions, it was reprinted several times in Italian between 1831 and 1846, and appeared in a German translation (1833, 1838). The book was directed against the partisans of JANSENISM and those who upheld the power of the state to control religious matters. It repudiated the liberties that these protagonists claimed for the state in opposition to the rights of the Holy See, because Christ established the Church as a monarchy. Although the author insisted that this ecclesiastical monarchy enjoyed full liberty to exercise its power, he did not envision it as a despotism but neither did he regard it as an aristocracy or as a democracy. The pope is unable to alter this form of government, continued the argument, because the Church's constitution is divine in origin and, therefore, unchangeable, unlike civil governments, which are subject to essential modifications.

This fundamental thesis of Il trionfo was not, strictly speaking, a doctrine of CHURCH AND STATE; it concerned, rather, the Church's internal life. From this thesis the author concluded that the Church is independent of the civil power and, secondly, that the pope enjoys INFALLIBILITY when he speaks as head of the Church, but does not when he speaks merely as a theologian.

"Mirari vos." Some of the essential ideas of Il trionfo appeared in Mirari vos (Aug. 15, 1832). Two sets of circumstances moved the pope to publish this famous encyclical, forerunner of the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS (1864). The first was the increasing influence of Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, the champion of Catholic liberalism. The other was the political situation in ITALY, particularly in the STATES OF THE CHURCH. Added to this was the continual conservative pressure on the Holy See applied by Metternich.

In his eagerness to effect a religious renovation, Lamennais sought first a reorganization of theological studies. In this program he had the support of Leo XII until 1826. After this date, Lamennais, in his opposition to GALLICANISM and to the ancien régime type of government restored in France after the fall of Napoleon I, came to demand liberty for the Church and, consequently, complete separation, at least temporarily, between Church and State. Undoubtedly Lamennais intended to enfranchise the Church from servitude to the civil power. At the same time, his passionate polemics, especially in his journal L'Avenir, defended theses that would lead to political democracy, if not to revolution. Around him Lamennais gathered MONTALEMBERT, LACORDAIRE, GERBET, de COUX, and other talented disciples who promoted Catholic liberalism. Outside of France the influence of Lamennais penetrated Belgium, the Rhineland, Italy, Poland, and Ireland. In philosophy Lamennais taught TRADITIONALISM. This combination of philosophical and political concepts in the writings of the French publicist manifested a naturalism that was perhaps unconscious but undoubtedly displeasing to some upholders of ULTRAMONTANISM and to many conservatives.

Gregory XVI became increasingly alarmed by the program of Lamennais because of the serious political unrest current in Italy, especially in his own temporal domain, where revolution broke out in 1831. Demands for civil and national emancipation kept increasing throughout the peninsula. The situation in Italy was a factor that necessarily weighed heavily on the pope's mind as he composed the encyclical.

Mirari vos affirmed rigorously the supernatural character of the Church's constitution and the primacy of its teaching power. But the encyclical, at least insofar as it concerned Italy, confused the Church's divine constitution with the clericalized monarchical institutions of the States of the Church. Gregory XVI seemed to hold that, by reason of the divine origin of papal authority, his own political authority in the Papal States was immutable. Therein could be discerned the ROMAN QUESTION, badly posed.

In Mirari vos the pope dealt with principles and abstractions, addressing himself to the entire Catholic world. Before his mind were those countries where the union of throne and altar promoted the Church's supernatural goals and also mission territories in which the union of Church and State could produce great temporal and spiritual advantages. For these reasons the encyclical disapproved separation of the two powers, castigated all revolutionary movements, and demanded support of monarchical regimes. By assuming these positions and by refusing to admit any change in the Church's government, the pope made a frontal attack on modern liberties while resisting political liberalism. He reproved these liberties insofar as they manifested an individualistic and subjective desire for human liberty and affirmed certain rights as belonging to men without taking into account God or the Church. Mirari vos contained also a confrontation between the rights demanded by the Church in virtue of its constitution and modern liberties that might conflict in various ways with the Church's rights.

Gregory XVI held that modern liberties were at once the expression and the origin of an indifferentism that admitted as simultaneously true doctrines of the most diverse, even contradictory, kinds. Repeatedly during his pontificate he denounced this intellectual attitude, as in the encyclical Inter praecipuas machinationes (May 8, 1844). Moreover, the pope detected in modern liberties the origin of a type of ecclesiastical liberalism that developed in Belgium (1830), Hungary (1841), and Switzerland (1846). In these countries liberalism based itself on natural rights or on rights of citizens, but its effect was to oppose a group of the clergy to the divinely established hierarchy. To him this was an extension of Gallicanism utilized to profit the lower clergy. This tendency received a more explicit papal reproof in the encyclical Quo graviora (Oct. 4, 1833).

Rationalism. Naturalism was manifested in rationalism as much as in political liberalism. Rationalism sought to reach satisfactory solutions in matters of FAITH by applying human reason alone, while stripping faith of its rational or its supernatural character. This happened in traditionalism as propounded by Lamenhais, in FIDEISM, ONTOLOGISM, and perhaps in the writings of Louis sa Bautain. HERMESIANISM, as proposed by Georg HERMES and his disciples, also manifested rationalistic tendencies. Gregory XVI revealed his opposition to these ideologies in the encyclicals Singulari nos (June 25, 1834) and Dum acerbissimas (Dec. 26, 1835).

The papal documents did not mention explicitly which doctrines were held by the different authors. Pope Gregory condemned the fundamental errors inherent in these ideologies, even if not explicitly stated.

Relations with States. In his relations with various governments, Gregory XVI was aided by two conservative secretaries of state, Tommaso BERNETTI and Luigi LAMBRUSCHINI. The papal policy was one of firm opposition to secularizing tendencies of civil authorities, yet it did make some concessions to them that were noticeable in the concordats concluded during these years. State encroachments on the Church were of diverse kinds and occurred as frequently in Protestant countries as in Portugal, Spain, Italy, Latin America, and other Catholic lands. CAESAROPAPISM in Protestant countries acted on the maxim, cujus regio, eius religio. Naturalistic liberalism in Catholic nations undoubtedly contributed to LAICISM, but modern, constitutional liberties, supported by Catholic liberals, assured advantages to the Church at the same time. In the United States and Canada, Protestant influence was largely responsible for the adoption of religious freedom.

Gregory XVI strove everywhere to obtain all possible guarantees to permit the Holy See to control episcopal nominations. Continually he insisted on the Holy See's right to appoint bishops. In practice, however, he did not abolish local customs at variance with this ideal. Thus he chose Irish bishops from ternas submitted by local clergies. In France, Spain, Portugal, and Austria nominations continued to be made by the government; in the U.S., bishops were selected from lists drawn up by the resident bishops.

Papal States and Italy. In the States of the Church the papal policy was guided by the desire to maintain papal control and to segregate the area from the influences of political liberalism. To curb insurrections the pope was willing to summon help from Austria but tried to avoid antagonizing France, England, and other European powers. He was eager also to retain clerical control of government administration while introducing a limited amount of administrative innovation. In return for Austrian military support the pope agreed to receive the Memorandum (May 22, 1831) submitted by England, France, Prussia, and Russia demanding changes in the legations, in Rome, and throughout the provinces of the Papal States. The Memorandum further required greater lay participation in administrative and in communal and provincial councils. Gregory XVI did not implement all the contents of the Memorandum, but he did introduce some of the administrative, financial, and judicial reforms that were demanded. Only to a limited extent were breaches made in the traditional clerical monopoly of governmental posts. The most important improvements were in the economic field and concerned insurance, banking, chambers of commerce, and taxation.

These changes did not satisfy the hopes of the supporters of the RISORGIMENTO throughout Italy. Divided as it was between the aims of the NEO-GUELFISM advanced by GIOBERTI and Capponi, and the republican aims of Mazzini and Young Italy, the peninsula remained in the preparatory stage of liberal and political emancipation and unification. Gregory XVI opposed this trend, but his police methods could not reverse it. When he died, the States of the Church were close to the revolution that drove PIUS IX into exile in 1848. The heavy encumbrance of public debt in 1846 and the worsening financial situation served to increase discontent.

Iberian Peninsula. Portugal was the scene of a conflict between the rival claims to the throne made by Don Pedro and Don Miguel (1827–33). Gregory XVI came to an agreement with the latter to ensure the nomination of worthy bishops. By 1833, however, Don Pedro prevailed. Don Miguel fled the country and came to Rome, where the pope received him with great honor for his loyalty to the Church. Diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Portugal were severed in 1833. Despite this, the pope gave his approval to the government's episcopal nominations. When an appeasement was gained (1840), the pope dispatched to Lisbon one of the best papal diplomats, Francesco CAPACCINI, who succeeded in reopening the nunciature (1844).

In Spain dispute broke out between Don Carlos and Maria Cristina after the death of Ferdinand VII (1833). Gregory XVI recalled the nuncio from Madrid (July 31, 1835) and protested (Feb. 1, 1836) against the violations of the Church's liberty and the seizures of ecclesiastical properties. He remained firm in his opposition when Espartero, who came to power in 1840, proceeded along the course of laicism. Not until 1845 were negotiations opened for a concordat, which was concluded only in the following pontificate.

France. France presented a different situation. In Spain and Portugal difficulties arose because the heads of state, inspired by naturalistic liberalism, were intent on monopolizing to themselves the rights of the Church.

In France, where Church-State relations were regulated by the CONCORDAT OF 1801, the government recognized the Church's rights, which were to some extent institutionalized. This situation led to a revival of Gallicanism among the bishops and in the government. Gregory XVI was eager to gain assurance that bishops be nominated from other than political considerations. Thanks to the efforts of the internuncio, Antonio Garibaldi (1797–1853), he was on the whole successful. The Holy See sought also to still the opposition to exempt religious orders manifested by the government and by Abp. QUELEN of Paris and other members of the hierarchy. The pope had been largely instrumental in restoring to France the Dominicans, Benedictines, and Jesuits, but he submitted to governmental pressure and, with apostolic aims in view, permitted the expulsion (1845) of the Jesuits, although they had been in charge of most Catholic schools for young men. The struggle against Gallicanism and the departure of the Jesuits alerted the former disciples of Lamennais. Bishop Parisi and other bishops, together with the Catholic liberal political forces under Montalembert, sought to obtain in the national legislature religious freedom, especially for Catholic schools. Gregory XVI, fearing lest the Catholics demand unlimited freedom of education, did not support them effectively. Soon after the pope's death there was enacted the Falloux Law, whose educational provisions were very favorable to Catholics.

Switzerland and Germany. When Switzerland enacted the Articles of Baden (Jan. 21, 1834), which practically eliminated papal authority over Swiss Catholics, Gregory XVI condemned the law. The papal brief Commissum divinitus (May 19, 1835) reiterated the theses on the Church's independence propounded in Il Trionfo.

Prussia was the object of considerable concern to Gregory XVI because of the legislation concerning mixed marriages enacted by this Protestant government, which had recently acquired the Catholic Rhineland and Westphalia. Since 1803 Prussia had insisted that children born of mixed marriages must follow the religion of the father. In his briefs of March 27, 1832, and Sept. 12, 1834, Gregory XVI recalled the statements on this matter by Pius VIII, in the drafting of which he had collaborated while prefect of Propaganda. The quarrel was embittered by King Frederick III's protection of the followers of Hermes. When Abp. DROSTE ZU VISCHERING of Cologne was arrested, the pope protested firmly in his consistorial allocution (Dec. 12, 1837). When Frederick William IV succeeded to the Prussian throne, the pope's eagerness for peace induced him to consent to the archbishop's retirement from the see of Cologne. By his previous resistance, however, and perhaps also by his later conciliatory attitude, Gregory XVI contributed to the gaining of spiritual independence by the Rhineland Catholics (see COLOGNE, MIXED MARRIAGE DISPUTE IN).

Russia and Poland. The Church suffered severely in Russian territories during this pontificate. Emperor NICHOLAS I was responsible for persecuting the Ukrainian Catholics in an attempt to unite them with the Russian Orthodox Church. He was ruthless also toward Latin Catholics. The pope's efforts to stem the Czar's intolerant absolutism met with some success. He complained vigorously to Nicholas I. When the Czar visited Rome (1845), the pope met him, reproached him to his face, and recalled the duties of conscience that the imperial power itself imposed on him. Negotiations, begun at this time, resulted in the signing of a concordat between the Holy See and Russia in 1847.

Discontent in Poland led to insurrection (1830–31) against Russia. Gregory XVI responded with the encyclical Cum primum (June 9, 1832), addressed to the Polish bishops and containing a condemnation of revolutionary movements. The pope took this attitude toward the suffering Polish Catholics mainly because he rejected solutions to problems by recourse to violence. He noted also the duty of subjects to obey legitimate authority, but he did not regard political regimes as immutable. Thus his bull Sollicitudo ecclesiarum (Aug. 5, 1831) recognized the de facto government of Don Miguel in Portugal. His outlook was similar in 1832 toward the king of Belgium. In countries with a liberal constitution the pope distinguished between abstract principles and concrete realities. In this respect his reaction to the liberal Belgian constitution of 1831 was very significant. He did not condemn the modus vivendi arranged between Belgian liberals and Catholics that prepared the way for the famous distinction between the thesis and the hypothesis.

Ireland. Soon after Ireland gained emancipation for Catholics in 1829, Daniel O'CONNELL began another peaceful agitation to repeal the legislative union with Great Britain. The repeal movement won active support from the Catholic priests and from members of the hierarchy, notably Abp. John MACHALE OF TUAM. The British government, which did not have diplomatic relations with the Holy See, was able to bring pressure on the Vatican to condemn the movement and enlisted the support of Metternich to plead its case. Rome refused to issue a public condemnation of the involvement of the clergy in the movement. After considerable urging Cardinal Filippo Fransoni, prefect of Propaganda, wrote a private admonitory letter (Oct. 15, 1844) to Abp. William Crolly of Armagh urging him to counsel the Irish clergy to avoid political and secular concerns.

Missions. The revival of the missions in the 19th century dates from the pontificate of Gregory XVI, who ranks as the greatest missionary pope of his century. During the 18th century, missionary activity plunged into a precipitous decline that could not be reversed in the early decades of the following century. Gregory XVI utilized the more favorable situation to rebuild the missions and to enlarge their sadly depleted personnel. In reorganizing the missions he brought them directly under papal control, where they have remained ever since. This put an end to the enormous power formerly exercised over the Church in mission territories by Spain and Portugal in virtue of their PATRONATO REAL and padroado privileges. Gregory XVI also worked out sound guiding principles and methods for missionaries. He was active in urging religious orders and congregations to staff the missions and chose the territories each one was to evangelize. The rapid expansion of the missions during these years is indicated by the fact that Gregory XVI created more than 70 dioceses and vicariates apostolic and named 195 missionary bishops. The apostolic letter In supremo (Dec. 3, 1839) condemned SLAVERY and the slave trade and forbade all Catholics to propound views contrary to this. The instruction of Propaganda promoting an indigenous clergy and hierarchy in mission lands received the pope's approval (Nov. 12, 1845). To assure financial support for the missions, which no longer could depend on Catholic governments for their material needs, Gregory XVI afforded papal protection to the work of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and the Pontifical Association of the Holy Childhood, founded in 1843.

India. Indicative of Gregory XVI's firmness and originality in dealing with the missions was his handling of the difficulties that arose in India. When Portugal proved unequal to its obligations as protector of the missions, the pope created a number of vicariates apostolic subject directly to Propaganda rather than to the padroado. This move provoked lively Portuguese resentment, particularly after the issuance of the papal brief Multa praeclare (April 24, 1838), which suppressed four padroado dioceses, confided their territories to the newly created vicariates, and limited the jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of GOA to Portuguese areas. So resentful was the archbishop of Goa that he began what is sometimes called the "schism" of Goa.

Western Hemisphere. Latin America, where independence movements were freeing one colony after another from Spanish and Portuguese control, greatly preoccupied Gregory XVI. Illustrative of his policy was the apostolic constitution Sollicitudo ecclesiarum (Aug. 5, 1831), which asserted that political vicissitudes must not prevent the Holy See from ministering to the spiritual needs of countries with newly established regimes. While prefect of Propaganda, Gregory XVI had become involved in this problem. Refusing to bow to Spanish demands, he determined in 1826 to establish residential bishops in Latin America. In 1829 he did so in Mexico. At his first consistory (Feb. 28, 1831) he named six residential bishops and soon after (July 2, 1832) raised to this status the vicars apostolic appointed by his predecessors in Buenos Aires, Santiago de Chile, and elsewhere. In this way he demonstrated his determination to establish the hierarchy in these countries. Despite Spanish opposition he favored the national emancipation of the Latin American republics.

North America was the object of special papal solicitude. Although Propaganda retained jurisdiction over this region, it did not enforce it in the same manner as in strictly mission territories. Gregory XVI took into account the political stability of Canada and the United States, their vast extent, and the variety of apostolic needs because of the great influx of immigrants from many European countries. He created four Canadian dioceses between 1834 and 1843 and reorganized the see of Quebec in 1844. In the U.S. he erected ten dioceses and reorganized that of Baltimore (1834). It was perhaps in the U.S. that Gregory XVI manifested to best advantage his sense of adaptation and his religious and political realism, and thereby attained substantial success. In his conversation with Czar Nicholas I (1845) the pope referred to the U.S. thus: "In this country Catholics are perfectly free to exercise their religion and they are not the less observant of civil laws and constitutions."

Other Activities. Gregory XVI displayed interest in scholarship and the arts by encouraging and helping Angelo MAI, Giuseppe MEZZOFANTI, Gaetano MORONI, and others. Besides assisting artists such as Johann Overbeck and Bertel Thorvaldsen, the pope opened the Museum of Egyptian and Etruscan Antiquities in the Vatican and furthered the reconstruction of the Roman basilica of St. Paul.

Conclusion. In his opposition to naturalistic liberalism, Gregory XVI did not disassociate it sufficiently from political liberalism. This neglect placed him in the position of trying to block a development that was inevitable. Nonetheless he was impelled by a certain apostolic realism that allowed him to open the way to the future. Even in the political order he prepared for the distinction between the thesis and the hypothesis. He enlarged mission activity and advocated native clergies and hierarchies. His untiring defense of the rights of the Holy See in episcopal nominations promoted the Church's independence in liberal states. His pontificate saw Catholicism solidly established in the Americas. Another service of Gregory XVI was the upholding of the unalterable supremacy of the supernatural. His 15 years on the papal throne marked a milestone in the remarkable 19th-century progress in the effective exercise of the authority of the PAPACY throughout the world.

Bibliography: Actu Gregorii papae XVI., ed. A. M. BERNASCONI, 4 v. (Rome 1901–04), defective. Bullarii romani continuatio, ed. A. BARÈRI, 20 v. (Rome 1835–57) v.16–20, to 1835. A. MERCATI, Raccolta di Concordati . . . (Rome 1954) 1:724–750. J. SCHMIDLIN, Papstgeschichte der neuesten Zeit, 1800–1939 (Munich 1933–39) v.1. J. LEFLON, La Crise révolutionnaire, 1789–1846 (A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 20; Paris 1949); Catholicisme 5:249–251. Gregorio XVI miscellanea commemorativa, 2 v. (Rome 1948). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, 5 v. (New York 1958–62). E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1846 (Garden City, N.Y. 1960). R. BELVEDERI, in I Papi nella storia, ed. P. PASCHINI and V. MONACHINO, 2 v. (Rome 1961) 2:903–930. È. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1822–36. N. P. WISEMAN, Recollections of the Last Four Popes and of Rome in Their Times (London 1858). F. HAYWARD, Le Dernier siècle de la Rome pontificale, 1769–1870, 2 v. (Paris 1927–28). H. BASTGEN, Forschungen und Quellen zur Kirchenpolitik Gregors XVI, 2 v. in 1 (Paderborn 1929). G. MOLLAT, La Question romaine de Pie VI à Pie IX (2d ed. Paris 1932). A. VENTRONE, L'amministrazione dello Stato Pontificio, 1814–1870 (Rome 1942). L. PÁSZTOR, "I cardinali Albani e Bernetti e l'intervento austriaco nel 1831," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia 8 (Rome 1954) 95–128. E. MORELLI, La politica estera di Tommaso Bernetti, segretario di stato di Gregorio XVI (Rome 1953). N. NADA, L'Austria e la questione romana dalla rivoluzione di luglio alla fine della conferenza diplomatica romana (Agosto 1830-luglio 1831) (Turin 1953); "La polemica Fra Palmerston e Metternich sulla questione romana nel 1832," Bollettino storico-bibliografico subalpino 52 (1954) 89–153; Metternich e le riforme nello Stato Pontificio: La missione Sebregandi a Roma, 1832–36 (Turin 1957). W. MATURI, "La convenzione del 29 agosto 1839 tra la S. Sede e il Regno delle Due Sicilie," Archivio storico per le provincie napoletane, NS 34 (1955) 319–369. R. E. CAMERON, "Papal Finances and the Temporal Power, 1815–1871," Church History 26 (Philadelphia 1957) 132–142. A. QUACQUARELLI, La ricostituzione dello Stato Pontificio (Bari 1945). D. DEMARCO, Il tramonto dello Stato Pontificio: Il papato di Gregorio XVI (Turin 1949). J. P. MARTIN, La nonciature de Paris . . . (1830–1848) (Paris 1949). A. SIMON, Le Cardinal Sterckx et son temps, 2 v. (Wetteren 1950); Catholicisme et politique (Wetteren 1955); ed., Correspondance du nonce Fornari, 1838–1843 (Brussels 1956); ed., Documents relatifs à la nonciature de Bruxelles (Brussels 1958); ed., Lettres du nonce Pecci, 1843–1846 (Brussels 1959). A. BOUDOU, Le Saint-Siège et la Russie, 1814–1883, 2 v. (Paris 1922–25). J. F. BRODERICK, The Holy See and the Irish Movement for Repeal of the Union with England, 1829–1847 (Analecta Gregoriana 55; Rome 1951). S. DELACROIX, ed., Histoire universelle des missions catholiques (Paris 1956–59) v.3. J. SCHMIDLIN, "Gregor XVI. als Missionspapst," Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 21 (1931) 209–228. P. DE LETURIA, "Gregorio XVI y la emancipación de la América española," Miscellanea historiae pontificiae 14 (1948) 295–352; "La primera nunciatura en América y su influencia en las Repúblicas hispanoamericanas," Razón y Fe 86 (1929) 28–48; both articles are repr. in his Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica, 3 v. (Analecta Gregoriana 101–103; Rome 1959–60). G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65)² 4:1190–92. A. REINERMAN, Austria and the Papacy in the Age of Metternich: Revolu- tion and Reaction, 1830–1838 (Washington, D.C. 1989); "Metternich, Pope Gregory XVI, and Revolutionary Poland, 1831–1842," The Catholic Historical Review, v. LXXXVI, n.4 (2000) 603–619. A. M. BERNASCONI, ed. Acta Gregorii Papae XVI, 4 v. (Rome 1984). L. GUILLOU, Le condamnation de Lamennais (Paris 1982). E. E. Y. HALES, Revolution and Papacy, 1769–1846 (Notre Dame 1966).

[A. SIMON]

GREGORY IX, DECRETALS OF

The first authentic general collection of papal decretals and constitutions, promulgated by Pope Gregory IX in 1234. When Gregory became pope in 1227 the chief collection of the legal tradition of the church was still the Decretum of GRATIAN, then almost 90 years old. Although in the interval the activities of the DECRETISTS, and later of the DECRETALISTS, had resulted in many other collections of papal legislation, notably in the QUINQUE COMPILATIONES ANTIQUAE, there was a lack of coherence between these collections that made for confusion. In 1230 Gregory IX, a lawyer of quality himself, called on the Spanish Dominican, RAYMOND OF PEÑAFORT, a former professor of law at Bologna, to remedy the situation. From the bull, Rex pacificus, promulgating Raymond's compilation some four years later, it appears that his mandate from Gregory was to "collect into one volume," for "the use of schools and tribunals," the numerous constitutions and decretals of Gregory's predecessors that were scattered through the various collections, as well as Gregory's own constitutions and any decretals "circulating outside the usual collections" ("quae vagabantur extra").

The result of Raymond's labor was a systematic volume based upon the Quinque compilationes antiquae. These, indeed, provided him with the division into five books (iudex, iudicium, clerus, connubia, crimen), with 179 of 185 titles and with 1,767 of the total 1,971 chapters; of the remaining 204 chapters, 195 are from constitutions of Gregory IX, seven from Innocent III, and two from an unidentified source. Far from verifying the texts taken from the Compilationes, Raymond perpetuated their errors, false ascriptions, and mutilations. What is more, in imitation of the compilers' methods, decretals were dissected and then dispersed through various chapters: thus fragments of Innocent III's Pastorali officio (A. Potthast, Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a. 1198 ad a. 1304, 2 v. 2530) occur in 13 chapters (Corpus iuris canonici, ed. E. Friedberg (Leipzig 1879–81) X.1.3.14; 1.6.1; 1.29.28; 1.31.11; 2.1.14; 2.22.8; 2.25.4; 2.28.53; 3.10.9; 3.24.7; 3.30.28; 3.38.29; 5.33.19). Obeying Gregory's order to "eliminate superfluous matter," Raymond shortened some passages and modified others; on ambiguous points Gregory provided him with some pithy ad hoc decretal letters by way of clarification (see REX PACIFICUS and Corpus iuris canonici, X.1.13.2; 4.20.8; 5.19.19; “Gregorius IX. Fratri R.”; 5.32.4). As a result, the compilation was in reality a fresh edition of decretal law; universal in character, it was also exclusive of all other decretals and collections, to the exception of the Decretum. Neither Gregory nor Raymond gave it a title, but it became known as Liber extravagantium (see EXTRAVAGANTES). It occasioned a host of commentaries, etc., and is the heart of the official CORPUS IURIS CANONICI of 1582 [a modern printing of which is that of A. Friedberg (Leipzig 1881)]. The usual method of citation is by book, title, and chapter, thus: X. (for Extravantium) 1.13.11.

Bibliography: Corpus iuris canonici, ed. E. FRIEDBERG (Leipzig 1879–81) 2:IX–XLIV. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 1:243. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini: v. 1, Historia jontium (Turin 1950) 237–251. P. TORQUEBAU, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 4:627–632. A. M. STICKLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:66.

[L. E. BOYLE]

GREGORY OF BERGAMO

Theologian and bishop; b. Bergamo, Italy, late 11th century; d. June 9, 1146. A VALLOMBROSAN monk, he was created bishop of Bergamo in 1133. With his friend BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX he attended the Council of PISA in 1134, and was active in ecclesiastical reform, introducing the CISTERCIAN ORDER into his diocese. He also played an important part in the Eucharistic controversies of the period. In opposition to the teachings of BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, he wrote, between 1130 and 1140, his Tractatus de veritate corporis et sanguinis Christi, upholding the Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament, which he regarded as symbolizing also the Mystical Body of Christ, the Church. Gregory is reported to have suffered a martyr's death.

Bibliography: Tractatus de veritate corporis et sanguinis Christi, ed. H. HURTER in Sanctorum Patrum opuscula selecta, 48 v. (Innsbruck 1874–85) 39:1–123. J. DE GHELLINCK, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 5.2:1236–37. F. HOLBÖCK, Der eucharistische und der mystische Leib Christi (Rome 1941) 33–35.

[M. M. MCLAUGHLIN]

GREGORY OF CERCHIARA, ST.

Abbot; b. Cassano al l'Jonio, Calabria, Italy, c. 930; d. Abbey of Burtscheid, Germany, 1002. He became monk and abbot of the BASILIAN monastery of San Andrea at Cerchiara. The Saracen invasion drove him to Rome, where, with the generous endowment of the Empress Theophano (d. 991), he founded the monastery of San Salvatore c. 990. At her request Gregory went to Germany and founded at Burtscheid the Greek monastery dedicated to SS. Apollinaris and Nicholas. This place became the center for the diffusion of Byzantine culture in German lands. There Gregory died as abbot and was buried. His life and early cult, fact tangled with fancy, are known only through Latin sources. Nothing certain remains to document his cult, which seems confined to Burtscheid and to his fellow Basilians. His relics are preserved at Burtscheid and at FULDA.

Feast: Nov. 4

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2:463–477. S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1192. F. RUSSO, “Sulla vita Gregorii abbatis,” Bollettino di badia greca di Grottaferrata 2 (1948) 193–205. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:258–260.

[N. M. RIEHLE]

GREGORY OF EINSIEDELN, BL.

Abbot; d. Einsiedeln, Germany, 996. Of an English royal family, Gregory left his virgin wife, with her consent, and became a monk in the Mount Coelius monastery, Rome. In 949 he entered the BENEDICTINE monastery of EINSIEDELN, a foundation not yet 25 years old. Familiar with the English reforms of DUNSTAN OF CANTERBURY, he gave Einsiedeln the norms of its cloistral life along the line of the English Regularis concordia when he became the third abbot in 964. The German Emperor OTTO I, related to him by marriage, accorded the abbey great material benefits and confirmed all its privileges. OTTO II and OTTO III also treated Gregory well. His community's reputation caused Gebhard II of Constance to ask him to supply religious for the monastery of PETERSHAUSEN. After his death his tomb near the altar of St. Maurice was the site of miracles. His relics were enshrined in 1609 at Einsiedeln.

Feast: Nov. 8.

Bibliography: P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'ordre de Saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Belgium 1942–56) 1:180. O. RINGHOLZ, Geschichte des fürstlichen Benediktinerstiftes U. L. F. von Einsiedeln, 1 v., no more publ. (Einsiedeln 1904) 43–53. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:281–283. R. TSCHUDI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1192.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

GREGORY OF ELVIRA, ST.

First known bishop of Elvira (c. 357–392); b. Baetica (modern Andalusia), Spain, c. 320. An opponent of ARIANISM at the Council of Rimini, Gregory defended the Nicene Creed in action and in writing. Bp. St. EUSEBIUS OF VERCELLI wrote him a letter (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 65:46) commending his resistance to Hosius of Córdoba when the latter capitulated at Sirmium in 357, and JEROME praised his De fide (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 23:703). Gregory is said to have adhered to the schism of LUCIFER OF CAGLIARI in the Libellus precum (Patrologia Latina 13:89), written by the Luciferians Faustinus and Marcellinus c. 383, which hints that Gregory rejected the synod at Alexandria (362), and upon the death of Lucifer, became head of the party.

St. Jerome (Patrologia Latina 17:505–506) associates him with Lucifer but concludes only that “he had nothing to do with the Arian evil.” No trace of Luciferianism appears in his writings. The literary investigations of A. WILMART restored authorship to Gregory of many Latin homilies and scriptural commentaries, indicating his importance as witness for the early Latin translations of the Bible and the development of Western Christology and ecclesiology. His homilies are marked by a strong anti-Jewish bias, traces of millenarianism, a gradually developing theology of the Holy Spirit, and an insistence on faith and holiness in Christians.

Feast: April 24.

Bibliography: J. COLLANTES LOZANO, San Gregorio de Elvira (Granada 1954); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1192–93. H. KOCH, “Zu Gregors von Elvira Schriften und Quellen,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 51 (1932) 238–272. F. REGINA, Il De Fide di Gregorio d’Elvira (Naples 1942). B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 434–435.

[F. J. BUCKLEY]

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, ST.

Bishop of Constantinople (381), Father and Doctor of the Church, called “the Theologian” in the Eastern Church; b. Arianus, near Nazianzus in Cappadocia, c. 330; d. Arianus, c. 390.

Career. Gregory was born of well-to-do parents on the family estate in southwest Cappadocia. His father, Gregory Nazianzen the Elder, had been a member of the sect of the Hypsistarians, whose beliefs were an amalgam of Jewish and pagan Gnostic elements, but had been converted to Catholic Christianity under the influence of his wife, Norma, a Christian born of Christian parents. At the time of Gregory’s birth, Gregory the Elder was bishop of the nearby city of Nazianzus. An earlier date of birth (c. 325) alleged by BARONIUS and others (Acta Sanctorum) was based on the erroneous view that celibacy was universal for the episcopacy at this time. A brother, Caesarius, and a sister, Gorgonia, were born later.

Gregory received his early education at Caesarea, the capital and metropolitan city of the Province of Cappadocia, where BASIL OF CAESAREA was a fellow pupil. He continued his studies at Caesarea in Palestine, made famous as a Christian center by both ORIGEN and EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, and continued his literary studies in Alexandria before journeying to Athens.

The voyage was a decisive spiritual event in his life. When he was involved in a near shipwreck, the imminent presence of death, especially in the absence of Baptism (he was still a catechumen), had a profound effect on his already devout nature, and he vowed to dedicate the rest of his life to God (Carm. 2.1.1:307–338; 2.1.11:124–210). At Athens Gregory pursued his rhetorical studies under the pagan rhetors Himerius and Prohaeresius. There he met Basil again and cemented the intimate friendship that was to have so deep an effect on his life, to both his advantage and his disadvantage. Among his contemporaries were also JULIAN, the later apostate and emperor, and GREGORY OF NYSSA. The idea of a monastic vocation was already taking shape in Gregory’s mind when (c. 357 or 358) he departed after approximately eight years of study to return to Nazianzus by way of Constantinople.

Baptism and Priesthood. In Cappadocia he received Baptism, which he had probably delayed in order to receive it from his father’s hands. For a time he put aside his inclinations to monastic solitude and yielded to the importunities of family and friends to practice rhetoric in his native city, but presently he withdrew to join Basil in his monastic venture on the river Iris in Pontus. There he assisted his friend in the composition of his monastic rules, and it was probably at that time that he and Basil edited the Philokalia, an anthology of the sayings of Origen. He was also influential in enlisting Gregory of Nyssa in the venture.

Yielding to his father’s entreaties, especially that of failing health, he returned to Nazianzus and received ordination during the Christmas season of 362, but almost at once he regretted the step and withdrew; he was not persuaded to return until Easter, at which time he preached the apologetical oration On His Flight (Orat. 2). The next ten years were spent in assisting his father in both ecclesiastical affairs and family business matters. Both father and son played an influential role in the ecclesiastical politics of the province, including the election of Basil of Caesarea to the metropolitan see in 370 (Epistolae 41). Earlier he had been successful in persuading his brother, Caesarius, to resign his position in Constantinople under Julian and to return home (Epistolae 7). Following the Emperor’s death, Gregory preached two invectives against him (Orat. 4 and 5). The sudden death of Caesarius (c. 369) after his return to the imperial service under Jovian affected Gregory deeply and also involved the family in serious financial difficulties (Carm. 2.1.11:365–380).

“St. Gregory of Nazianzus,” 15th-century baroque oil sketch on panel by Peter Paul Rubens. (©Burstein Collection/CORBIS)

An administrative action by Emperor Valens in 372 was to have disastrous results for Gregory; it divided the Province of Cappadocia into two. Anthimus, the bishop of the new capital city of Tyana, claimed metropolitan rights over the newly created Province of Cappadocia Secunda, and a dispute over territorial jurisdiction arose between him and Basil. The latter, seeking to strengthen his position, erected a new suffragan see at Sasima, a mere posting station of the imperial road system, and prevailed upon Gregory, much against his will and better judgment, to accept consecration as its bishop. Gregory did so, but never took possession of the see; and Anthimus made it quite clear that he was ready to have recourse to violence if necessary to prevent any such attempt. The result of the affair was a rift in the friendship of Gregory and Basil, and the old intimacy was never restored.

Gregory remained at Nazianzus, assisting his father in discharging his episcopal functions; and after his father’s death in 374, he continued to do so for a time while declining to accept the see himself and petitioning for a successor to be appointed. When it became evident that none was forthcoming, since Nazianzus lay under the jurisdiction of Tyana, Gregory attempted to bring matters to a head by withdrawing to the shrine of St. Thecla at Seleucia in Isauria. [For an interesting account of the archaeological excavations of this shrine and monastic community see R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d' Antioche (Paris 1945) 144–145.]

Constantinople. Gregory remained in Isauria from 375 until shortly after the death of Emperor Valens in the Battle of Adrianople (Aug. 9, 378). Sometime between that time and January 379, Gregory answered a summons to discharge the episcopal functions for the tiny Nicene minority in the capital city of Constantinople, which had long been without a bishop. The immediate occasion of the summons was, in all probability, the edict of Gratian (autumn 378) confirming earlier steps toward toleration, taken shortly before his death by Valens under the pressure of the Gothic menace, that assured free assembly to all Christian factions. Gregory himself alluded vaguely to the summons as coming from many of the faithful and their shepherds, i.e., the bishops (Carm. 2.1.11:595–598). It is not improbable that these bishops represented the adherents of Meletius of Antioch and that they included Basil, who, anticipating a Nicene victory with the change in regime, desired to see someone sympathetic to their cause ultimately installed at Constantinople. Whatever the motive in the minds of the bishops, there was only one in the mind of Gregory, the restoration of the Nicene faith in the city of Constantine, where he arrived sometime before the death of Basil (Jan. 1, 379).

The nearly three years spent at Constantinople were to be the most eventful, and personally the most heart-rending, of his life. Upon his arrival Gregory rallied the tiny group of adherents to the Nicene Creed in a small House, located outside the city's walls, that had been converted into a church, the Anastasia, or church of the Resurrection. From the Arian majority under their bishop Demophilus, the Nicenes encountered bitter opposition that reached violence. Further trouble arose from an unforeseen quarter. Maximus, a self-proclaimed Cynic philosopher, actually a crude adventurer acting in connivance with Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, first ingratiated himself as a disciple of Gregory, then had himself stealthily consecrated (380) with the aid of bishops secretly dispatched from Egypt by Peter. Peter apparently preferred to see someone indebted to himself in the capital rather than someone favorable to the See of Antioch, Alexandria's age-old rival. Not only the Nicenes, but also the Arians and pagans, united to expel Maximus, whose pretensions were likewise rejected by Emperor Theodosius I and Pope Damasus. Theodosius himself returned to the city in November 380 and restored the cathedral church of the Holy Apostles and the other churches to Gregory, who refused formal installation.

Shortly thereafter the emperor summoned the bishops of the East to a general council that convened at Constantinople in May 381, although the Macedonian and Egyptian bishops failed to appear. It was presided over by Meletius of Antioch, and its first act was the formal election and installation of Gregory as bishop of the see. This was followed shortly by the unexpected death of Meletius, whose funeral sermon was delivered by Gregory of Nyssa. The death of Meletius proved most untimely, for it plunged the council, now under the presidency of Gregory, into bitter controversy over the succession at Antioch. Gregory ardently urged the recognition of the rival claimant Paulinus, in the hope that it would bring an end to the MELETIAN SCHISM that had so long strained relations between East and West. He failed to prevail, however, and Flavian was elected, thus prolonging the controversy. At this crucial juncture occurred the long-delayed arrival of the Egyptian and Macedonian bishops. They promptly challenged the validity of Gregory's own installation as a violation of the 15th canon of Nicaea, which forbade translation of bishops. Rather than press his claims and see the Church rent asunder by still further schism, Gregory chose voluntarily to resign the see, an act of self-sacrifice that more than any other attests the greatness of his moral stature and spirit.

The Macedonian bishops acted under instructions from Pope Damasus (Dam., Epistolae 5), who was following the established, if misguided, Roman policy in the East to support Alexandria and suspect the Meletians. Nectarius of Constantinople succeeded to the see, and Gregory retired to Nazianzus, where he acted as bishop until he finally found a successor in Eulalius (383). His last years were spent upon his estate at Arianus in literary composition and spiritual direction of the local monastic community. Upon his death he bequeathed his property to the bishopric.

Writings. Orations are the literary productions upon which Gregory's principal claim to fame is founded. Forty-four in number (Orat. 35 is spurious), they were published soon after his death and represent only a fragment of the number actually composed and delivered. Best known are the five Theological Orations (Orat. 27–31) preached at Constantinople. They represent not only a classic exposition of the Nicene Creed, but also a further precision of Trinitarian doctrine. In his development of the personal properties (ιδιότητες) as distinctive characters of the three Divine Persons (unoriginate for the Father, begottenness for the Son, procession for the Holy Spirit), Gregory also insisted, against the Macedonian heresy, on the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Oration 27 serves as an introduction to the entire group; 28 investigates the existence and nature of the Divine; 29 deals with the oneness of the Trinity; 30 establishes, against the Arians, the true doctrine concerning the Son; and 31, that of the Holy Spirit. The oration on his flight (Orat. 2) appears to have been rewritten during his lifetime and constitutes a treatise on the priesthood that influenced both JOHN CHRYSOSTOM in his Six Books on the Priesthood and, in Latin translation, GREGORY I's Pastoral Rule. Gregory's panegyric orations are artistically more perfect and give freer scope to his rhetorical style, which has been approvingly characterized by E. Norden as a "restrained Asianism" (Die antike Kunstprosa, 564). A good example of this class is the Oration on the Holy Lights for Epiphany (Orat. 39). Rightly esteemed also are the funeral orations, which are at the same time valuable sources for biographical material (Orat. 7 on Caesarius, 8 on Gorgonia, 18 on his father, and 43 on Basil). In these he followed classic models for the Epitaphios Logos, but with Christian adaptations. Poignantly moving is his Final Farewell in 381 (Orat. 42). In all the orations, whether acting as dogmatic theologian, exegete, moralist, spiritual director, or pastor, he remains always the rhetorician.

Letters and Poetry. Gregory's letters were published for the most part during his own lifetime at the request of Nicobulus, grandson of his sister, Gorgonia, and many were written during his retirement with that intent in mind. Of the 244 published by J. P. Migne (Patrologia Graeca [1857–66] 37) three are spurious (42 is by Gregory the Elder; 241, by Basil; 243, by Gregory Thaumaturgus). Published separately is one to Basil with his reply. Epistles 51 and 54 set forth his theory of epistolary style: brevity, clarity, charm, and simplicity. Epistles 101 and 102 are refutations of APOLLINARIANISM; 101 was adopted as a doctrinal statement by the Council of CHALCEDON (451) in testimony to the fact that Gregory's CHRISTOLOGY, with its emphasis on the union of the two natures in one Christ, anticipated the later teaching on the HYPOSTATIC UNION.

The poetry (Patrologia Graeca 37–38) comprises more than 16,000 lines. It is topically divided in the Migne edition into two books: 1, theological, and 2, historical; and each book is divided into two sections, with further subdivisions in the sections. The books and sections are usually cited accordingly. Thus the Carmen de vita sua is Carm. 2.1.11. Among the spurious poems, besides Christus Patiens, are 1.1.28; 1.2.18, 20, 23, 32, and 39; 2.2.8; and Epitaph 129 (1.1.37). Dubious are 1.1.31 to 35; 1.2.3, and 19; and 2.1.99. Rhythmical poems are 1.1.32 and 1.2.3.

So vast a production, most of it composed between 381 and 390, would automatically give rise to doubts about its artistic merit. The verdict of B. Wyss is a just one. Gregory's productions are not great poetry, but humanistic versifying; yet in particular passages, especially those touched with originality, we encounter, if not great artistry, certainly genuine talent. Most important and most interesting of the entire corpus is the Carmen de vita sua (Carm. 2.1.11). Here his originality appears in his deft combination of literary forms. Treating his departure from the See of Constantinople as tantamount to his demise (lines 11 and 1919), Gregory adopts the form of a consolatory address (558–589), directed here to his orphaned (spiritual) children of Constantinople, as the basic framework of the poem. He incorporates into it an apology for that demission, maintaining that the canons were not violated and that his resignation was voluntary. He also inserted two lengthy digressions, one didactic (1146–1257), cast in the Christian literary form of The Two Ways, and the other an invective against Maximus (736–938). The presence of the consolation is detected in the triple temporal division: introduction (1–50), dealing with the present; main body (51–1918), treating of the past; and conclusion (1919–49), concerned with the future. In the topical development of the main body Gregory discusses his ancestry (51–68); birth (69–81); nature (82–92); training (93–111); education (112–211); conduct (212–262); and deeds (263–1918). The apology concludes with the formal consolation (1919–22) and a final prayer (1947–49); it is characterized by outbursts of grief and protest scattered throughout. The apology itself receives a separate proem (40–50) and conclusion (1923–33). It serves as the norm for selection and emphasis in the topic on his deeds and sets the tone for certain passages with its own rhetorical features (e.g., anticipation of objections, appeal to judges). The two topics are harmoniously united since it is the apology that constitutes the principal element of the consolation (558–561); it is not confined to the brief formal statement (1919–22). The result is an apologetical autobiography constituting an important advance in the development of the autobiographical genre. The poem reveals with striking impact the personality of the author: sensitive, producing the elegiac tone of his finest lines, and passionate, as seen in the four great enthusiasms that successively dominated his life—literature, monasticism, restoration of the faith, harmony in the Church.

Influence. Gregory's theological productions proved a profound force in the East. His works are found in Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopian, Armenian, Slavonic, and Arabic versions. He was considered not only "the Theologian" but also "the Christian Demosthenes"; and in due time scholia began to be composed on his writings. Among the important ones are those of Elias of Crete (tenth century). For the Byzantines, Gregory was a model of style. In the West he enjoyed high prestige because of the laudatory notice accorded him in De viris illustribus by his former pupil St. JEROME; but his influence was limited to the translation of nine of the orations by Rufinus (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum [Vienna 1866–] 46). Rediscovered in the Renaissance, a large selection of Gregory's poetry appeared in volume three of the Poetae Christiani Veteres of Aldus Manutius (Venice 1504). The first attempt at a complete edition was that made by Protestant scholars at Basel in 1550; this was superseded by the Opera Omnia of J. Billius, with important commentaries (Paris 1609–11), which was in turn superseded by the Benedictine edition (Paris 1778–1840) that is reprinted in Migne. The breadth of Gregory's appeal is seen best in the diversity of his admirers; they included Erasmus, Melancthon, Gibbon, and J. H. Newman. His relics repose in St. Peter's Basilica, Rome, in the Capella Gregoriana, beneath the altar of Madonna dell Soccorso (Our Lady of Help).

Feast: May 9 in the West; Jan. 25 in the East; commemorated again with St. John Chrysostom and St. Basil the Great on Jan. 30, the "Feast of Greek Letters."

Bibliography: Editions: CPG 3010–3125. Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1857–66) 35–38. SC (1969–) vols. 149, 208, 247, 250, 270, 284, 309, 318, 358 with French translation and extensive bibliographies. CCSG (Corpus Nazianzenum 1–; 1988–) vols. 20, 27, 28, 34, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45 Arabic, Armenian, Georgian and Syriac versions and studies. Fontes Christiani (1996) vols. 22 and 75 with German translation. Cambridge Medieval Classics (1996) vol. 6 with English translation. Poemata Arcana (Oxford 1997) with English translation. English translations: NPNF 2nd series (1894), vol. 7. LCC (1954) vol. 3. SVC (1991), vol. 13. Literature: R. R. RUETHER, Gregory of Nazianzus: Rhetor and Philosopher (Oxford 1969). F. TRISOGLIO, San Gregorio de Nazianzo in un quarantennio di studi, 1925–1965 (Turin 1974); Gregorio di Nazianzo: Il teologo (Milan 1996). D. F. WINSLOW, The Dynamics of Salvation: A Study in Gregory of Nazianzus, PMS 7 (Cambridge 1979). G. A. KENNEDY, Greek Rhetoric under Christian Emperors (Princeton 1983); A New History of Classical Rhetoric (Princeton 1994); Classical Rhetoric and Its Christian and Secular Tradition from Ancient to Modern Times (Chapel Hill 1999). F. W. NORRIS, Faith Gives Fullness to Reason: The Five Theological Orations of Gregory Nazianzen, SVC 13 (Leiden 1991). Holy Cross Conference on Gregory the Theologian, Greek Orthodox Theological Review 39 (1994). A. MEREDITH, The Cappadocians (Crestwood 1995). K. DEMOEN, Pagan and Biblical Exempla in Gregory Nazianzen: A Study in Rhetoric and Hermeneutics, CCLP 2 (Turnhout 1996); J. P. EGAN, "αἴτιος/author, αἴτια/cause, ἀρχή/origin: Synonyms in Selected Texts of Gregory Nazianzen," Studia Patristica 32 (Louvain 1997) 102–107; B. E. DALEY, "Building a New City: The Cappadocian Fathers and the Rhetoric of Philanthropy," Journal of Early Christian Studies 7 (1999) 431–461. Acta sanctorum May 2:366–457. S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (Paris 1693–1712) v.9, indispensable. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Maryland 1950–) 3:236–254, bibliog. and eds. P. GALLAY, La Vie de Saint Grégoire de Naziance (Lyon 1943); Langue et style de S. Grégoire de Naziance dans sa correspondance (Paris 1933). F. LEFHERZ, Studien zu Gregor von Nazianz (Bonn 1958), very valuable. Select Orations and Select Letters of Saint Gregory of Nazianzen, tr. C. G. BROWNE and J. R. SWALLOW (A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, ed. P. SCHAFF and H. WACE [New York 1890–1900] 2d ser. 7; 1894). J. H. NEWMAN, Historical Sketches 3 v. (London 1872–73), v.2. M. GUIGNET, Les Procédés épistolaires de Saint Grégoire de Naziance (Paris 1911); Saint Gré- goire de Naziance et la Rhétorique (Paris 1911). M. M. HAUSERMEURY, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors von Nazianz (Bonn 1960). B. WYSS, Museum Helveticum 6 (1949) 177–210. E. NORDEN, Die antike Kunstprosa, 2 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1915–18). J. PLAGNIEUX, Saint Grégoire de Naziance théologien (Paris 1952). J. MOSSAY, Questions liturgiques et paroissiales (Louvain 1921–) 4 (1964) 320–329. S. GIET, Sasimes, une méprise de Saint Basile (Paris 1941). G. MISCH, A History of Autobiography in Antiquity, tr. E. W. DICKES, 2 v. (London 1950) 2:600–624. L. F. M. DE JONGE, De S. Gregorii Nazianzeni carminibus (Amsterdam 1910). J. T. CUMMINGS, "Towards a Critical Edition of the Carmen de vita sua," Studia Patristica (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 1965). H. WERHAHN, "Dubia und Spuria unter den Gedichten G. von N.," ibid.; ed., Synkrisis Bion (Wiesbaden 1953), in Gr. F. BOULENGER, ed. and tr., Discours funèbres (Paris 1908). A. J. MASON, ed., The Five Theological Orations (Cambridge, Eng. 1899). R. KEYDELL, "Die literarhistorische Stellung der Gedichte G. von N.," Atti del VIII Congresso internazionale di Studi Bizantini (Rome 1953). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 6.2: 1667–1711. K. WEITZMANN, Greek Mythology in Byzantine Art (Princeton 1951). P. GALLAY, ed. and tr., Les Lettres, v.1 (Paris 1964).

[J. T. CUMMINGS/K. B. STEINHAUSER]

GREGORY OF NYSSA, ST.

One of the three Cappadocian Fathers; b. Caesarea, between 335 and 340; d. Constantinople, c. 394. His grandmother, Macrina the Elder, was converted to Christianity through the teaching of GREGORY THAUMATURGOS, and his famous Christian family had suffered during the DIOCLETIAN PERSECUTION. Youngest of the three Cappadocian Fathers (sometimes called the Cappadocian Theologians so as to include the eldest sibling MACRINA), he was known as the philosopher and mystic while his brother, Basil of Caesarea, was considered the administrator and GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS the theologian. His sister, MACRINA, who had a formative influence on the education of her brothers, was the teacher and ascetic. Two of his ten brothers were bishops, namely, Basil and Peter of Sebaste.

Destined at first for a career in the church, Gregory was ordained a lector, but apparently he abandoned this vocation to follow that of his father, a rhetorician. He married and, after the death of his wife, was persuaded by Gregory of Nazianzus to enter the monastery founded by Basil in Pontus near the Iris River. At Basil's insistence, he was consecrated bishop of Nyssa, a suffragan of Caesarea in Cappadocia, in 372. Lacking Basil's administrative talents, he was accused of negligence in financial matters and deposed by an Arian dominated synod in 376. However, after the death of the Arian emperor Valens in 378, the pro-Nicene Theodosius I ascended to power and Gregory was able to return to Nyssa. When Basil died in 379, Gregory labored to continue his brother's work, essentially becoming his heir. He took part in the Council of Antioch in 379 and was named metropolitan of Caesarea in 380. He played a major role at the Council of Constantinople I in 381, at which he was acknowledged as a pillar of orthodoxy and continuator of the thought of Basil. At the same time he replied to the radical Arian theologian Eunomius. In his last years he was involved in a bitter controversy over Apollinarianism. He died shortly after attending a council in Constantinople in 394.

Miniature detail of St. Gregory of Nyssa, from "Menologian of Basil II" (Vat. Gr. 1613).

WORKS

Ascetical Writings. There are problems concerning authenticity in the list of works attributed to Gregory, but they do not involve his major writings, and the authentic list is long and impressive. His letters appear to be incomplete. Written after 370, but perhaps as late as 379, De Virginitate was his first published work. In addition, there is the life of his sister, De vita Macrinae, and three short treatises, De perfectione, De instituto Christiano, and De castigatione. His ascetical writings manifest Platonic, Stoic, and Pythagorean influences. The De anima et resurrectione, a Christian parallel to Plato's Phaedo, is a dialogue with his dying sister, Macrina, that presents

Gregory's Christian views of immortality and the future life.

Dogmatic Writings. A number of Gregory's writings were concerned with the refutation of heresies and the clarification of the corresponding orthodox positions. His Trinitarian writings were produced between 380 and 384. Most important among these is Contra Eunomium, a lengthy refutation of the writings of the Arian Bishop Eunomius, who asserted that the persons of the Trinity were radically dissimilar from one another. Against the Arians is a short tract, Ad Simplicium de fide sancta, addressed to a tribune, Simplicius. There are two pieces directed against the Macedonians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, Sermo de Spiritu Sancto adversus Pneumatomachos Macedonianos and Ad Eustathium de sancta Trinitate.

Another major work, Oratio catechetica magna, is a summary of catholic teaching, presented in contrast to the teaching of the Jews and the pagans. It stands in the line of systematic works between Origen's De principiis and the De fide orthodoxa of John Damascene. After 385 Gregory wrote a vigorous refutation of the Christological heresy of Apollinaris, Antirrheticus adversus Apollinarem, which quoted frequently from Apollinaris's work.

It is the most important extant writing against Apollinarianism. In Adversus Apollinaristas he rejected the Apollinarian charge that he holds there are two sons of God. A small tract, Contra fatum, defends the freedom of the will against a pagan philosopher. Ad Graecos ex communibus notionibus was written in 397. Ad Adlabium quod non sint tres dii, utilizing the distinction between person and nature, explains how one can speak of three persons without asserting the existence of three gods.

Exegetical Writings. A large portion of Gregory's writings is devoted to the exposition of scripture. Two early works (written ca. 379–389), having a scientific intent, that is, attempting to expose the teaching of scripture in harmony with right reason or true philosophy, are the Explicatio apologetica in Hexaemeron and the De opificio hominis. The first is a continuation of a task undertaken by Basil to explain Genesis in the light of the scientific and philosophical accounts of the formation of the world; the second continues with a concentration on the creation of human beings. The particular exegetical technique which Gregory inherits from Origen is akolouthia, that is, connection or sequence of thought, which he utilizes to give meaning and order to the apparently random events of biblical text.

Two short pieces are concerned with theological interpretation, the De phytonissa and a homily on 1 Cor 15.28. The other exegetical writings develop the doctrine of Christian perfection and, particularly, the way of mystical union taught by scripture. They include the De vita Moysis, In psalmorum inscriptiones, In Ecclesiasten homiliae, In Canticum Canticorum, on the Old Testament; De oratione dominica, De beatitudinibus and another homily on 1 Cor 6.18, on the New Testament. Of particular interest is De vita Moysis, which describes Moses's mystical ascent to God through the three theophanies recorded in the book of Exodus.

TEACHING

Above all, the intellectual basis of Gregory's theology was Greek. His thought represents the encounter between Greek classical philosophy and Christian biblical revelation. Hellenistic Judaism was the religion of Judea and Galilee during the life of Jesus. Widespread Hellenism had been the environment for the expansion of primitive Christianity, and the New Testament had been written in koine or common Greek. However, the Hellenism of the Cappadocians was profoundly different both in form and in content. Gregory's language was in no way common. His writing was more literary and more polished than the language of the New Testament. His thinking was more rational and more sophisticated and especially dependent upon pagan sources. The Cappadocians in general and Gregory in particular were on the forefront of creating a new and genuine Christian culture, namely, a Christian version of classical Greek paideia. The philosophy of antiquity is so evident in the works of Gregory that some scholars, not without cause, have considered him more a Neoplatonist than a Christian. The point of view from which to understand Gregory's teaching is precisely this context of Christian paideia. In his thinking, scripture and philosophy are in a sense parallel. Both teach a higher doctrine and both have the same goal, the practice of virtue and final union with God. Gregory writes: "If one can give a definition of Christianity, we shall define it as follows: Christianity is an imitation of divine nature. . . . Christianity, therefore, brings man back to his original good fortune" (De Professione, FC 58, p. 85). The Neoplatonic type and archetype are evident in his definition. The practice of virtue is the imitation of divine nature while salvation is union with God. This salvific union is more precisely a reunion with God or the restoration of human beings to their original state in the garden before the fall.

Allegorical Method. Although Gregory was aware of the Antiochene criticism of the Alexandrian allegorical method of scriptural interpretation and was much more concerned with the literal sense than were the Origenists, he maintained nevertheless that the ultimate purpose of scripture is not its historical teaching, but the elevation of the soul to God. This requires the allegorical method, which makes possible the extension of scripture to include much philosophy that is not directly contained in the historical sense. Within this context Gregory admitted the ability to know God from reason, but vigorously objected, against Eunomius, to the univocal application to God of categories and names derived from creatures. The distinction between creator and creature is fundamental for Gregory, and as a result the creator remains in a realm of mystery. He made much of the incomprehensibility of God and may have been one of the principal sources of the negative theology of Pseudo-Dionysius.

Trinity. Gregory maintained that the Son and Holy Spirit are equally creator and God, although the Son is generated and the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and Son. In the fashion that became traditional in the Greek Fathers and Orthodox Christianity, he saw the Holy Spirit as proceeding in a line from the Father through the Son. His attempt to explain the unity of nature and diversity of persons is tinged with a Platonic realism that has difficulties as well as attractiveness. The divine persons are distinct by their relations to each other, correctly enough, but they share one nature in the way that several men share the same human nature. This could suggest tritheism, but Gregory conceived the unity of nature more as the unity of a group than as a nature individually repeated in each member. In his viewpoint "man" means the whole human race, which has been inserted into matter in time and which will not be complete until the history of the human race has run its course. He had, as a result, a very strong sense of the unity of all human beings, which suggests a Stoic as well as a Platonic influence. In the Platonic tradition, however, he spoke of two creations of man, an ideal and an historical creation. With regard to the ideal creation, he held the peculiar position that human beings did not have by nature the sexual mode of reproduction. Humans were historically created male and female only because the creator foresaw the fall of the human race.

The Incarnation. This sense of the solidarity of the human race also contributes to the theology of the incarnation. Just as the human spirit made it possible for the physical universe to praise God with its own voice when it entered into matter, so when Christ became incarnate he entered into the whole human race and made it possible for mankind to praise God through his Son. The second person, however, assumes an individual human nature in such a way that there is only one person who is both God and man. Gregory taught the communication of idioms between the two natures in Christ, and accordingly insisted, against the Apollinarists, that Mary was the mother of God (theotokos) and not just the mother of man (anthropotokos).

Image of God. Part of the creationist pattern as applied to man is the doctrine of man as the image of God. This becomes a central notion in Gregory's anthropology and mystical theology. Man is the image of God as Creator and thus it is as lord of the universe and as a free agent that man's likeness to God is most often found. Because of this freedom man was able to fall into sin, and the image was soiled. It can be recovered through Christ and the practice of virtue. Christian perfection consists in becoming more and more like God. The quality of likeness also makes mystical knowledge possible, for as Greek philosophy taught, like is known by like. The attributes of God can be known through the image that is in man, although the essence of God transcends any knowledge of concepts or qualities.

Human Freedom. Despite the strongly intellectual character of his conception of Christian perfection, Gregory put a high value on human freedom, perhaps in opposition to Manichaeism, and he stressed greatly man's own responsibility and choice, even in the matter of faith and the attainment of the highest perfection. Yet there was a final optimism in Gregory. He did not accept the Origenist theory of the pre-existence of individual human souls, but he did support the doctrine of apokatastasis or the ultimate reconciliation of all creatures to God. The metaphysical argument for this rested on the Platonic doctrine of the negative character of evil and on the Platonic doctrine of the dynamism of the good. Evil cannot be absolute and infinite. Neither can there be an unending endurance in evil, for all being is good, and the good must eventually work its way through finite evil. The dynamism of goodness continues even in the final possession of God, and beatitude is conceived as a state of perpetual progress.

Bibliography: Editions: Clavis Patrum Gæcorum 3135–3226; Patrologia Graeca ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 35–38; W. JAEGER et al., Gregorii Nysseni Opera (Leiden 1952–). English translations: A select library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, 2nd series (1893), vol. 5; Library of Christian Classics (1954) vol. 3; Ancient Christian Writers (1954) vol. 18; Fathers of the Church (1967) vol. 58; Classics of Western Spirituality (1978). Literature: M. ALTENBURGER and F. MANN, Bibliographie zu Gregory von Nyssa: Editionen, Überstezungen, Literatur (Leiden 1988). J. DANIELOU, Platonisme et théologie mystique: Doctrine spirituelle de saint Grégoire de Nysse (Paris 1954); “La Chronologie des sermons de Grégoire de Nysse,” Recherches de science religieuse 29 (1955) 346–372. W. VÖLKER, Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker (Weisbaden 1955). D. L. BALAS, “Metousia Theou”: Man's Participation in God's Perfections according to Saint Gregory of Nyssa, Studia Anselmiana philosophica theologica 55 (Rome 1966). E. MÜHLENBURG, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa: Gregors Kritik am Gottesbegriff der klassischen Mystik (Göttingen 1966). M. HARL, Écriture et culture philosophique dans la pensée de Grégoire de Nysse, Actes du colloque de Chevetogne, 22–26 septembre 1969 (Leiden 1971). R. E. HEINE, Perfection in the Virtuous Life: A Study in the Relationship between Edification and Polemical Theology in Gregory of Nyssa's De vita Moysis, Patristic Monograph Series 2 (Cambridge 1975). H. DÖRRIE et al., Gregor von Nyssa und die Philosophie, Zweites internationales Kolloquium über Gregor von Nyssa, Freckenhorst bei Münster, 18–23 September 1972 (Leiden 1976). A. SPIRA et al., The Easter Sermons of Gregory of Nyssa: Translation and Commentary, Proceedings of the Fourth International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa, Cambridge, England, 11–15 September, 1978, Patristic Monograph Series 9 (Cambridge 1981). A. SPIRA, The Biographical Works of Gregory of Nyssa, Proceedings of the Fifth International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa, Mainz, 6–10 September 1982, Patristic Monograph Series 12 (Cambridge 1984). H. R. DROBNER and C. KLOCK, Studien zu Gregor von Nyssa und der christlichen Spätantike, Supplements to Vigiliae christianae 12 (Leiden 1990). M. D. HART, “Gregory of Nyssa's Ironic Praise for the Celibate Life,” Heythrop Journal 33 (1992) 1–19. V. E. F. HARRISON, Grace and Human Freedom according to St. Gregory of Nyssa, Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity 30 (Lewiston 1992). J. PELIKAN, Christianity and Classical Culture: The Metamorphosis of Natural Theology in the Christian Encounter with Hellenism (New Haven 1993). S. G. HALL, Gregory of Nyssa, Homilies on Ecclesiastes: An English Version with Supporting Studies, Proceedings of the Seventh International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa, St. Andrews, 5–10 September 1990 (New York 1993). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, Presence and Thought: Essay on the Religious Philosophy of Gregory of Nyssa (San Francisco 1995). M. AZKOUL, St. Gregory of Nyssa and the Tradition of the Fathers, Texts and Studies in Religion 63 (Lewiston 1995). D. F. STRAMARA, “Gregory of Nyssa's Terminology for Trinitarian Perichoresis,” Vigiliae Christianae 52 (1998) 257–263. A. MEREDITH, Gregory of Nyssa (New York 1999). J. ZACHHUBER, Human Nature in Gregory of Nyssa: Philosophical Background and Theological Significance, Supplements to Vigiliae christianae 46 (Boston 1999). J. P. CAVARNOS, St. Gregory of Nyssa on the Human Soul: Its Nature, Origin, Relation to the Body, Faculties, and Destiny (Belmont 2000). H. R. DROBNER and A. VICIANO, Gregory of Nyssa, Homilies on the Beatitudes: An English Version with Supporting Studies, Proceedings of the Eighth International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa, Paderborn, 14–18 September 1998, Supplements to Vigiliae christianae 52 (Boston 2000). M. R. BARNES, The Power of God: Dynamis in Gregory of Nyssa's Trinitarian Theology (Washington, DC 2001).

[R. F. HARVANEK/K. B. STEINHAUSER]

GREGORY OF OSTIA, ST.

Bishop and papal legate; d. Logroño, Navarre, Spain, May 9, 1044. Little is known for certain of Gregory before his election to the See of OSTIA except that he was a BENEDICTINE monk and abbot of the monastery of SS. Cosmas and Damian in Rome from 998 to 1004. He was undoubtedly a man of both learning and holiness and was favored by Pope BENEDICT IX. Under this pope he was elected bishop of Ostia in 1033–34 and was employed either as the librarian of the Roman Church or as chancellor. In 1039 Benedict appointed him papal legate to the Kingdom of Navarre in Spain. He is often invoked against attacks by locusts and other harmful insects, since he reportedly freed the Kingdom of Navarre from a plague of locusts by a simple sign of the cross. His cult was approved for Navarre in 1754.

Feast: May 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 2:463–465. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis 1:3670. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:262. A. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 2:165.

[R. E. GEIGER]

GREGORY OF RIMINI

Augustinian philosopher and theologian; b. Rimini, Italy, toward the end of the 13th century; d. Vienna, November 1358. Gregory entered the Hermits of St. Augustine and studied in Italy; in Paris, where he received the degree of bachelor of theology (c. 1323); and in England. He taught at Paris, and at Bologna, Padua, and Perugia in Italy. He then returned to Paris, where he was given the title of Magister cathedralicus (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis 2:557, n. 1097) in 1345.

Gregory returned to Italy. In 1351, he was appointed regent of the Augustinian house of studies at Rimini and prior of the monastery. After the death of the prior general, THOMAS OF STRASSBURG, in 1356, Gregory served as vicar general. A year later, he was unanimously elected prior general. Gregory was considered by his contemporaries to be one of the most subtle philosophers and theologians. Posterity has awarded him the honorary titles of Doctor authenticus and Doctor acutus.

Gregory was influenced by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, although he was less prone to skepticism. Gregory admitted the validity of the proofs for the existence of God and held that it is possible to demonstrate philosophically the spirituality of the soul. He opposed Ockham on the question of the plurality of forms. He assigned a great deal of importance to experience, claiming that the intellect knows the singular before the universal, and that intuitive knowledge precedes abstractive knowledge. For him, the universal has no foundation outside the mind; hence, it is only a fictitious concept, formed by the intellect—a sign, arbitrarily instituted (ad placitum institutum). The immediate object of knowledge and science is not the object that exists outside the soul but rather the total, overall meaning (complexe significabile) of the propositions of a syllogism. His followers not only identified Gregory with NOMINALISM but considered him one of its foremost proponents.

Gregory defended what he believed to be the doctrines of St. AUGUSTINE, including some spurious teachings. He suspected Pelagianism everywhere and fought against it. He overemphasized the corrupt state of human nature, the incapacity of free will, and the need for a special grace in order to perform a morally good act. For him, predestination was entirely gratuitous and independent of the prevision of the good use of free will. He held that children who die unbaptized will never see God and will suffer the punishment of eternal fire, thus earning for himself the nickname of “infant torturer” (tortor infantium).

Gregory's most important work is his Lectura in primum et secundum librum sententiarum. In addition, he is the author of the following: Epistolarum divi Augustini tabula; Tractatus de imprestantiis Venetorum et de usura (ed. Reggio Emilia 1522 and 1622); Tractatus de conceptione B. Mariae Virginis; In omnes divi Pauli epistolas; In divi Iacobi epistolas; De quatuor virtutibus cardinalibus; Tractatus de intensione et remissione formarum corporalium; and the Registrum epistolarum sui generalatus.

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). D. TRAPP, “Augustinian Theology of the Fourteenth Century,” Augustiniana 6 (1956) 146–274. W. KÖLMEL, “Von Ockham zu Gabriel Biel. Zur Naturrechtslehre des 14. und 15. Jahrhunderts,” Franziskanische Studien 37 (1955) 218–259. Analecta Augustiniana 4–5 (1911–14), 18–23 (1940–54) passim. G. LEFF, Gregory of Rimini (New York 1961). J. BIARD, “La science divine entre signification et vision chez Gregoire de Rimini,” Vestigia, Images, Verba (Turnhout 1997) 393–408. E. MEI-

Saint Gregory of Tours, engraving after a painting by L. Boulanger. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

JERING, Klassieke gestalten van christelijk geloven en denken. Van Irenaeus tot Barth (Amsterdam 1995) 137–154. K. SMITH, “Ockham’s Influence on Gregory of Rimini’s Natural Philosophy,” Dialexeis 1996–1997 (Leukosia, Cyprus 1999) 107–144.

[G. GÁL]

GREGORY OF TOURS, ST.

Frankish historian, bishop of Tours from 573 to 594; b. Clermont-Ferrand, probably Nov. 30, 538; d. Tours, Nov. 17, 594. Georgius Florentius Gregorius, the son of Florentius and Armentaria, was related through his mother to Bps. St. Gregory of Langres, St. Tetricus of Langres, St. Nicetius of Lyons, and St. Euphronius of Tours, and through his father to Bp. St. Gallus of Clermont. After Florentius’s death Gregory’s mother transferred to the vicinity of Cavaillon and Gregory’s education was undertaken by his grand-uncle, the future Bishop Nicetius, and by his uncle, Bishop Gallus, and the latter’s archdeacon, (St.) Avitus, subsequently bishop of Clermont. Having been ordained to the diaconate apparently at Clermont under Bishop Cautinus (d. 571) in 563, Gregory was chosen bishop of Tours following Euphronius’s death in 573 and, after a 19-day vacancy, was consecrated by Bp. Egidius of Reims. Political control of Tours lay first with King Sigebert of Austrasia (561–575), then, during (561–584), with Chilperic of Neustria, thereafter with Guntram of Burgundy (561–593), who in November 587 relinquished the territory to Childebert II of Austrasia (575–595); although it was Sigebert who authorized Gregory’s consecration, Gregory was on intimate terms with all of these rulers.

Gregory assisted at episcopal synods held at Paris in 577, at Berny in 580, and at Poitiers in 590 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Concilia, I, 151, 152, 175–6). In his diocese, Gregory put an end to murderous feuds (Hist. Franc. 7.47), obtained relief from excessive taxation (Hist. Franc. 9.30), rebuilt the Tours cathedral, and blessed many churches (Hist. Franc. 10.31; see also Fortunatus, Carm. 10.5, 6. Gregory’s record of these activities appears in the epilogue to his History, which he composed in the 21st year of his own episcopacy and the fifth year of Pope Gregory I’s pontificate. The Vita Gregorii, a tenth-century biography, testifies to the veneration that his name evoked in the Middle Ages.

The following literary works of Gregory are extant: ten books of Histories, seven of Miracles, the Lives of the Fathers, a commentary on the Psalms, and a treatise on Church Offices (de cursibus . . . ecclesiasticis). The first two books of his Historia Francorum relate events from Creation to A.D. 511; the remaining eight give the story of the Franks to 591. Books 1–4 were completed by 575; Books 5–6, between 580–584; Books 7–110, in 584–591, with subsequent revision of Books 1–6 and an epilogue (10.31) added in 594. The seven books of Miracles, Librii IV de virtutibus s. Martini, fashioned from 574–575 to 591–594, relate the prodigies attributed to the patron of Tours; and the Liber de passione et virtutibus s. Iuliani reports the alleged wonders of the fourth-century martyr of Brioude. Its final chapter (50) was penned after 590. The Liber in gloria martyrum describes in 106 chapters the miracles worked by Our Lord, His mother, the Apostles, and the Gallic martyrs. The Liber in gloria confessorum gives stories of saints, mostly Gallic; its present preface dates from 593–594, though an earlier prologue (ch. 44) may belong to 584. The Lives of the Fathers in the Liber vitae patrum seems to have been composed originally as individual biographies. The concluding 20th chapter of the collection mentions the death of Leobard, which occurred on Jan. 18, 593. Gregory’s In Psalterii tractatum commentarius, which is fragmentary, and De cursu stellarum ratio, with its catalog of the world’s wonders and a method for determining the night hours of the Divine Office, belong to his episcopal period.

Gregory states that, with the aid of a Syrian, he had made a Latin version of the legend of the SEVEN SLEEPERS

OF EPHEBUS (Glor. Mart. 94). This translation is extant as Passio ss. martyrum VII dormientium. F. Dvornik believes the Liber de miraculis b. Andreae apostoli was written by Gregory in 591–592 as a Latin adaptation of a Greek original; similarly, the De miraculis b. Thomae apostoli may be a work of Gregory.

Without the bishop of Tours, our knowledge of sixth-century Gaul would be incalculably poorer. In large measure, our insight into the history, the geography, the language, and the religion of the period depends on him. While his historical methods are faulty and his credulity concerning the saints is naive, his conviction as to the centrality of the Church for human progress still speaks eloquently to us.

Feast: Nov. 17.

Bibliography: Opera in Patrologia Latina 71; Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 1; 7:707–775; The History of the Franks, ed. and tr. O. M. DALTON, 2 v. (Oxford 1927); Selections from the Minor Works, tr. W. C. McDERMOTT (Philadelphia 1949); Glory of the Confessors, tr. R. VAN DAM (Liverpool 1988). C. LELONG, Grégoire de Tours: sa vie et son oeuvre (Chambray-lès-Tours 1995), selected texts. Literature. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie 6.2:1711–53. B. ALTANER, Pathology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German edition (New York 1960) 571–572. S. DILL, Roman Society in Gaul in the Merovingian Age (London 1926). S. H. MACGONAGLE, The Poor in Gregory of Tours (New York 1936). O. CHADWICK, "Gregory of Tours and Gregory the Great," Journal of Theological Studies 50 (1949) 38–49. H. G. J. BECK, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France during the Sixth Century (Analecta Gregoriana 51; 1950). J. M. WALLACE-HADRILL, "The Work of Gregory of Tours in the Light of Modern Research," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 1 (1951) 25–45. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 1:216–223. G. DE NIE, Views from a Many-Windowed Tower: Studies of Imagination in the Works of Gregory of Tours (Amsterdam 1987). A. H. B. BREREUKELAAR, Historiography and Episcopal Authority in Sixth-Century Gaul: The Histories of Gregory of Tours Interpreted in Their Historical Context (Göttingen 1994). Grégoire de Tours et l'espace gaulois, Proceedings of Intl. Congress, 3–November 5, 1994, eds. N. GAUTHIER and H. GALINIÉ (Tours 1997). J. SCHMIDT, Grégoire de Tours: historien des Francs (Monaco 1998). M. HEINZELMANN, Gregory of Tours: History and Society in the Sixth Century, tr. C. CARROLL (New York 2001). F. DVORNIK, The Idea of Apostolicity in Byzantium and the Legend of the Apostle Andrew (Cambridge, Mass. 1958) 183–186, 192. G. QUISPÉL, "An Unknown Fragment of the Acts of Andrew," Vigiliae christiannae 10 (1956) 129–148. H. DELEHAYE, "Les Recueils antiques de miracles des saints," Analecta Bollandiana 43 (1925) 305–325. P. R. L. BROWN, Relics and Social Status in the Age of Gregory of Tours (Reading 1977). W. A. GOFFART, The Narrators of Barbarian History (Princeton, N.J. 1988).

[H. G. J. BECK]

GREGORY OF UTRECHT, ST.

Associate of St. Boniface; b. near Trier, c. 707; d. Aug. 25, 776. Born of a leading Merovingian family, he was educated by his grandmother, the abbess of Pfalzel. Gregory met (St.) BONIFACE in 722 and became his devoted follower and constant companion for more than 30 years. In 754, Gregory was made abbot of St. Martin's in Utrecht. The following year Boniface and Bishop EOBBAN were martyred and direction of the Frisian mission fell to Gregory; he conducted it for 20 years while administering the Diocese of Utrecht, although he was never consecrated bishop. Building upon WILLIBRORD's early work, Gregory developed a school that became the leading intellectual center of the northern Low Countries, and in it he trained several outstanding religious leaders, the best known being the Frisian, LUDGER. Gregory's head is preserved at Susteren, Netherlands.

Feast: Aug. 25.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 15.1:63–79. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:402–403. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 2:356–359. T. SCHIEFFER, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954). P. VIARD, Catholicisme 5:265–266.

[R. BALCH]

GREGORY OF VALENCIA

Theologian; b. Medina del Campo, Spain, March 1549?; d. Naples, March 25 (April 25?), 1603. While a student of law, Gregory entered the Society of Jesus at Salamanca in November 1565. He reviewed philosophy with his fellow student Francisco Suárez, and made his theological studies at Salamanca (1566–68) and then at Valladolid (1568–70). Gregory was ordained at Rome and sent to Germany, where he taught theology at Dillingen (1573–75) and then at Ingolstadt (1575–92). While emphasizing a return to Scripture and the Fathers, philosophical depth, and literary form, Gregory developed a new generation of theology professors (e.g., J. Gretser, A. Tanner). His success as a teacher was crowned by Pope CLEMENT VIII with the title Doctor Doctorum.

During these years of religious ferment in Germany, Gregory wrote more than 40 polemical essays against Lutheran and Calvinistic teachings, especially in defense of the Mass, the Blessed Sacrament, and the veneration of the saints. Their immoderately sharp tone, reflecting the spirit of his times, drew complaints, even from Peter Canisius. In 1591, Gregory collected and published his controversial writings, with additions, in one volume, entitled De rebus fidei hoc tempore controversis (Lyons 1591; Paris 1610). Especially noteworthy is the section Analysis Fidei Catholicae (Ingolstadt 1585; Waldsassen 1932), in which some of his theses on infallibility anticipate the Vatican definitions of 1870.

As consultant to the dukes of Bavaria and to the Holy See, Gregory was influential in other lively questions of his day. He defended a mutually rescindable rental convention as a moral basis for the “five per cent contract” for interest on loans, which thereafter became the legal norm in Bavaria. However, his defense of the existing laws against witchcraft, at a time when witch hunting in Germany had assumed appalling proportions, lacked the humane approach of his later confrere Friedrich von Spee.

After resigning his professorship in 1592, Gregory focused his energies on completing his principal work, Commentariorum theologicorum tomi quatuor (Ingolstadt 1591–97; revised 1603), based on the Summa of Thomas Aquinas. This first complete corpus of systematic theology by a Jesuit anticipates the modern return to Scripture and the Fathers as the basis for theological reflection. Herein is found Gregory’s “pre-Molinist” theory of free will under grace, called “Valencianism.” The work went through 12 editions within 20 years and had a deep and widespread influence.

Called to Rome in 1598 to the leading post at the Roman College, Gregory became actively involved in the famous dispute between Jesuits and Dominicans on grace and free will. In 1602, when Clement VIII personally assumed presidency of the congregations de auxiliis, Gregory defended Molina’s book and doctrine so competently that all concurred in his praise. Although Clement allowed him to sit during his discourses, Gregory, weakened from illness and overwork, collapsed near the end of his ninth debate. He went to Naples to recover but died there in 1603.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 8:388–400; 9:897. H. HURTER Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1926) 3:401–404. W. HENTRICH, “War Gregor von Valencia Prämolinist?” Scholastik 4 (1929) 91–106; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1194–95. B. ROMEYER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 15.2:2465–97. B. DUHR, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge, 4 v. in 5 (Freiburg 1907–28) 1:665–668.

[G. VAN ACKEREN]

GREGORY SINAITES

Oriental monk, mystic, and ascetical writer; b. Lydia, end of the 13th century; d. Paroria, Bulgaria, Nov. 27, 1346. Gregory became a monk in Cyprus and later on Mt. Sinai. He traveled to Palestine and Crete, where he met the monk Arsenius, who taught him the excellence of mental prayer. Later, he returned to MOUNT ATHOS and gained disciples for his moderate form of HESYCHASM. Forced to flee before the Turkish invasions, he went to Sozopolis on the Black Sea. On Mt. Paroria in Bulgaria, he founded a famous monastery (c. 1325) that became the intellectual and spiritual center of the Balkans. Through his writings, Gregory’s influence spread in Europe to the whole Orthodox world. His great work, 137 Chapters or Spiritual Meditations, contains a collection of spiritual aphorisms interspersed with dogmatic opinions, e.g., on the processions of the Holy Spirit, the way of the quietist, and illuminated living. The influence of St. JOHN CLIMACUS is evident.

Gregory wrote shorter tracts on Hesychasm, prayer, and passions that hinder spiritual advancement. His writings are concerned chiefly with the explanation of his method of prayer. His edited works do not contain all of his ascetical writings, and there are many variants in the unedited MSS. He also wrote tropes of the Trinity and liturgical kanones, or hymns on the Holy Cross, and on controversial themes such as the FILIOQUE and Christocentricism. His life was written by his disciple, later Patriarch CALLISTUS I.

Feast: Nov. 27 (Greek Church), Aug. 8 (Slavs).

Bibliography: Eds. of the Life by P. SYRKOU (Monuments de la Société des amis de l’ancienne littérature et de l’art 174; St. Petersburg 1909), Slavic; and by I. POMYALOVSKY (St. Petersburg 1894), Gr. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 694–695. V. LAURENT, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:266–267. V. GRUMEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (Freiburg 1930–38) 4:683. M. JUGIE Theologica dogmatica christianorum orientalium ab ecclesia catholica dissidentium (Paris 1926–35) 1:432–436. E. TURDEANU, La Littérature bulgare du XIV siècle (Paris 1947) 5–15. C. ÉMEREAU, Échos d’Orient 22 (1923) 432.

[F. DE SA]

GREGORY THAUMATURGUS, ST.

Bishop of Neocaesarea in Pontus, the Wonderworker; b. Neocaesarea, c. 213; d. there, c. 270.

He was born Theodore into a well-to-do family, but was called Gregory. He studied rhetoric, Latin, and law. Then, with his brother Athenodorus, he spent five years (probably 233–238) as a disciple of ORIGEN at Caesarea in Palestine. On returning home the brothers were consecrated bishops by Phaedimus of Amasea; however, the bishopric of Athenodorus is unknown. During the Decian persecution Gregory retired into the mountains with a large part of his flock, and after peace was restored instituted feasts in honor of the martyrs. With his brother, he assisted at the first Synod of Antioch (c. 264), which condemned PAUL OF SAMOSATA; but he did not assist at the second synod, and died probably under Aurelian (270–275).

The cult rendered him by SS. Basil and Gregory of Nyssa as well as the legends that surround his name testify to his successful apostolic work. Five legendary lives (in Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Armenian) narrate the miracles that merit him the title of thaumaturgus (miracle worker). Only the Vita by Gregory of Nyssa, whose grandmother was a convert of his, seems trustworthy; but information is supplied on him also by St. Basil in his De Spiritu Sancto, Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 7.14), and Gregory himself in his Panegyric for Origen, a farewell address he preached on separating from the master at the end of his studies. It provides a résumé of Origen's teaching and describes his attitude toward pagan philosophy, the Christian "philosophy" that he taught, and the students' admiration for the master. Origen responded with a letter. The Exposition of Faith preserved by Gregory of Nyssa in his biography is a brief Trinitarian Creed. Gregory's Canonical Epistle answers questions of ecclesiastical discipline raised after the invasion of Pontus by the Goths and the Borades between 254 and 258, and includes decisions regarding violated women and Christians guilty of pillage and apostasy. Canon 11 enumerating different types of penitents is not authentic. His Metaphrasis of Ecclesiastes is an adaptation of the Septuagint text in classical Greek; and his To Theopompus, On the Passible and Impassible in God is an apologetic dialogue for pagans, giving an explanation of Christ's Passion in view of Hellenistic dogma on the divine impassibility, which was exaggerated to a conception of an "indolent" God.

Other works preserved under his name are not authentic: the Exposition of Faith is by Apollinaris of Laodicea; and the 12 Chapters On the Faith is perhaps of Apollinarist origin. Gregory is also credited falsely with 11 Homilies in several languages and a Dialogue with Aelian (Basil, Epist. 210). Also doubtfully authentic are: The Treatise on the Soul for Tatian; the Letter to Evagrius (or Philagrius) in Greek and Syriac, which is disputed; and the letters mentioned by St. Jerome (De vir. ill. 65; Epist. 33.4).

Feast: Nov. 17.

Bibliography: Opera, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 10:963–1232; De passibili et impassibili in Deo, J. B. PITRA, Analecta sacra spicilegio Solesmensi parata, 8 v. (Paris 1876–91) 4:103–120, 363–376; Address to Origen, tr. W. METCALFE (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; London 1920). GREGORY OF NYSSA, Vita, Patrologia Graeca, 46:893–958. H. CROUZEL, Sciences Ecclésiastiques 16 (1964) 59–91, panegyric. L'Homme devant Dieu: Mélanges. . . Henri de Lubac, 3 v. (Paris 1964) v. 1. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 238–239. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 2:123–128. W. TELFER, Journal of Theological Studies 31 142–155, 354–363; Harvard Theological Review 29 (Cambridge, Mass. 1936) 225–334. A. SOLOVIEV, Byzantion 19 (Brussels 1949) 263–279. F. J. DÖLGER, Antike und Christentum 6 (1940) 74–75 (Logos theology). M. SIMONETTI, Rendiconti del Istituto lombardo di scienze e lettere 86 (1953) 101–117, ad Philagrius. C. MARTIN, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 24 (1928) 364–37 (homilies).

[H. CROUZEL]

GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR, ST.

Fourth-century apostle of Armenia; b. Valarshapat, or possibly Caesarea in Cappadocia, c. 240; d. Armenia, c. 332. An Armenian tradition says that Gregory was the son of Anak, a Parthian noble, who assassinated Armenian King Chosroes I. Gregory was saved from the massacre of his family, received a Christian education at Caesarea in Cappadocia, and returned to Armenia to convert his countrymen. According to Agathangelos, he destroyed the temple of the native gods at Ashtishat, was tortured by King TIRIDATES III, and was condemned to incarceration in a grave (chor virap), from which he was rescued later. He converted the king and his people and was consecrated a bishop by Leontius of Caesarea (c. 315) and enthroned as bishop in Armenia by St. Peter of Sebaste. He evangelized the region of Armenia conquered by the Romans under Galerius (292) and baptized the kings of Caucasian Iberia (see GEORGIA, CHURCH IN ANCIENT), Lazes, and Albania.

Gregory consecrated his two sons, Vhartanes and Aristakes, as bishops; the latter took part in the Council of Nicaea I (325). The office of the catholicos or metropolitan of Armenia remained in Gregory's family down to the time of St. ISAAC THE GREAT (d. 438). Nicephorus Callistus asserts that Gregory visited CONSTANTINE I in Rome in the company of Tiridates (Hist. eccl. 8.35; Patrologia Graeca 146:609). Sometime before his death, Gregory retired to the life of a solitary in the wilderness. The 33 letters and homilies attributed to his authorship are spurious. The principal source for the life of Gregory is the history of Agathangelos, who claimed to be the secretary of King Tiridates. The fifth-century recension of this work is full of legendary material, making it most difficult to sort out the facts in the life of Gregory, who is not mentioned by any contemporary Greek ecclesiastical writers. A vita was written by George the Syrian during the eighth century.

Gregory's relics, which had rested in Naples, were solemnly handed over to the Armenian Apostolic Church on Nov. 10, 2000. He is the patron of Armenia.

Feast: Sept. 30.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, 712–713e. Bibliotheca hagiographica orientalis, 76–80. Acta Sanctorum Sept. 8:295–413. AGATHANGELOS, The Teaching of Saint Gregory, tr. R. W. THOMSON (Cambridge, Mass. 1970); History of the Armenians, tr. R. W. THOMSON (Albany, N.Y. 1976). V. G. ZHIRSKY, The Conversion of Armenia: A Retelling of Agathangelos' History (New York 1985). V. LANGLOIS, ed., Collection des historiens anciens et modernes de l'Arménie, 2 v. (Paris 1867–69). G. GARITTE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1206–07; ed., Documents pour l'étude du livre d'Agathange (Studi e Testi, 127; 1946). P. DE LAGARDE, Analecta Syriaca (Leipzig 1858) 122–128. P. PEETERS, Analecta Bollandiana 60 (1942) 91–130. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1951), Tables générales 1:1928. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:182–185. V. GRUMEL, Catholicisme, Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:252.

[F. X. MURPHY]

GREMILLION, JOSEPH BENJAMIN

Catholic social justice and ecumenical pioneer, author, educator, and pastor, b. Moreauville, Louisiana, March 11, 1919; d. South Bend, Ind., Aug. 9, 1994.

Gremillion attended Louisiana State University, St. Benedict's College in Covington, Louisiana, Notre Dame Seminary in New Orleans, and The Catholic University of America before being ordained a priest for the diocese of Alexandria, Louisiana, December 1943. Traveling across Louisiana as State Future Farmers of America (FFA) president, he witnessed firsthand the miserable conditions of the black sharecroppers. It led him into the Catholic Rural Life Conference (CRLC), where he became a protégé of CRLC executive director Luigi Ligutti. He became involved with the U.S. Bishops Conference's National Catholic Resettlement Committee to promote resettlement of Europeans displaced by World War II in the rural United States. Gremillion founded and served as pastor of St. Joseph Parish, Shreveport, La. from 1949 to 1958, where he was very involved in civil rights work.

After earning a doctorate in social science at the Pontifical Gregorian University (1960), Gremillion served as director of socio-economic development for Catholic Relief Services (1960–1967), executive secretary of the Pastoral Aid Fund of Latin America (1964–1967), an officer of the Committee for Inter-American Cooperation (C.I.C.O.P.) from 1964 to 1967, and a Vatican observer to WCC Conference (1966). Together with Barbara WARD, James Joseph NORRIS and Arthur McCormick, Gremillion was a leader of the lobbying effort for concrete actions on social justice at the Second Vatican Council. Their lobbying bore fruit in the two paragraphs calling for the creation of an international social justice organization of the Catholic Church that were included in Article 90 of the final version of Gaudium et Spes. In early 1967, the Pontifical Commission Justice and Peace (PCJP) was established with Gremillion as its first general secretary (1967–1974) and with Ward and Norris as founding members.

Once the PCJP was securely established, Gremillion established the Society for Development and Peace or SODEPAX, a joint committee of the PCJP and the World Council of Churches (WCC) to promote worldwide ecumenical work for integral human development and social justice. After stepping down as PJCP secretary in 1974, Gremillion became a faculty fellow at the University of Notre Dame (1974–1978). He was the co-founder and co-ordinator of the Muslim Jewish Christian Conference (1975–1981), Regent's Lecturer at the Boalt School of Law, University of California at Berkeley (spring 1976), director of ecumenical and social ministry for the Diocese of Alexandria-Shreveport (1978–1983), co-director of the Notre Dame Study of Catholic Parish Life and the director of the Institute for Pastoral and Social Ministry (now the Institute for Church Life) (1983–1986). Following his retirement from Notre Dame in 1986 until his death, Gremillion worked with the Research Program on Religion, Church and Society in the Center for the Study of Contemporary Society. The Gremillion Papers are housed at the University of Notre Dame Archives.

Bibliography: Many articles under his own name and the pseudonym of Louis G. Martin as well as nine books including Continuing Christ in the Modern World: Christian Social Concerns in the Light of Vatican II; Food, Energy, and the Major Faiths: Journal of a Southern Pastor; The Church and Culture Since Vatican II: The Experiences of North and Latin America; and The Gospel of Peace and Justice.

[P. M. PELZEL]

GRÉTRY, ANDRÉ ERNEST MODESTE

Composer of light opera and sacred works; b. Liège, Belgium, Feb. 8, 1741; d. Montmorency (near Paris), Sept. 24, 1813. His father, a Walloon, was a church violinist, and Grétry was trained as a choirboy at Saint-Denis. At 12 he qualified for more specialized study and was drawn first to instrumental and church compositions, producing six symphonies from 1758 and, c. 1759, a solemn Mass. Through the influence of Henri Moreau, Grétry was sent to Liège College in Rome (1760–66). There he composed motets, De Profundis; a string quartet, and a flute concerto, among other works. In 1765 he composed his first light opera. He determined then that his career lay in light opera, and by 1767 he was in Paris. Though he found his forte late, he had assessed himself well: no contrapuntist, he had vocal, melodic gifts that carried excellently to the theater. He contributed over 60 works to the repertory of the Opéra-Comique, and achieved the success associated with popular theater. Best known of his dramatic pieces are Le Tableau parlant (1769), Zémire et Azor (1771), L'Amant jaloux (1778), and Richard Coeur-de-Lion (his masterpiece; 1784). Grétry was a diarist of merit, and his observations on the effects of music on the human pulse comprise an early example of experimentation now bearing fruit in music therapy.

Bibliography: Music. Collection complète, 49 v. (Leipzig-Brussels 1883–1937). Literary works. Oeuvres complètes, ed. L. SOLVAY and E. CLOSSON, 4 v. (Brussels 1919–22). O. STRUNK, ed. Source Readings in Music History (New York 1950) 711–727, from the Mémoires. S. CLERCX, Grétry (Brussels 1944). G. CHOUQUET, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 3:792–797. D. J. GROUT, A Short History of Opera, 2 v. (2d, rev. and enl. ed. New York 1965). J. BELLMAN, “Aus alten Märchen: The Chivalric Style of Schumann and Brahms,” The Journal of Musicology 13 (1995) 125–126. D. CHARLTON, Grétry and the Growth of the Opéra Comique (Cambridge 1986). Y. LENOIR, ed., Documents Grétry dans les collections de la Bibliothèque Royale Albert I (Brussels 1989). L. M. STONES, “André-Ernest-Modeste Grétry” in International Dictionary of Opera 2 v., ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993) 553–556; “Zémire et Azor” in International Dictionary of Opera 2 v., ed. C. S. LARUE (Detroit 1993) 1479–1480. P. VENDRIX, ed., Grétry et l'Europe de l'Opéra-Comique (Brussels 1992).

[E. BORROFF]

GRETSEK, JAKOB

Jesuit theologian, liturgist, polemicist, patristic scholar, philologist, and playwright; b. Markdorf, Baden, March 27, 1562; d. Ingolstadt, Jan. 29, 1625. Gretser entered the Jesuit novitiate at Landsberg (1578), studied humanities at Fribourg (1584–86), and attended the University of Ingolstadt, where he became a professor of metaphysics (1589–92). He succeeded his teacher, Gregory of Valencia, to the chair of scholastic theology (1592–1605) and then taught moral theology (1609–16). During these years, his erudition appeared in a great variety of writings. As a polemicist, Gretser wrote against the Protestants Franciscus Junnius (1545–1602), Aegidius Hunnius (1550–1603), Johannes Pappus (1549–1610), and others. He also defended Robert Bellarmine [Controversiarum Roberti Bellarmini. . . amplissima defensio (2 v. Ingolstadt 1607–09)], the Index published by Philip II of Spain [De jure et more prohibendi. . . libros hereticos et noxios (Ingolstadt 1603)], pilgrimages, the lives of the saints, the Society of Jesus, ecclesiastical feasts and rites, relics, and the Roman pontiffs. Gretser's De cruce Christi (3 v. Ingolstadt 1598–1605) contains a wealth of learning that treats not only Christ's cross, but images of the cross, cross-bearing coins, eulogies of the cross, a defense of veneration of the cross, and the Crusades. Other works include: Rudimenta linguae graecae (Ingolstadt 1593); Institutiones graecae (Ingolstadt 1593); D. Gregorii episcopi Nysseni commentarius duplex in psalms inscriptiones (Ingolstadt 1600); Vetera monumenta contra schismaticos (Ingolstadt 1600). His works total 234 printed books (including 23 dramas) and 46 MSS. The printed works have been edited by P. G. Kolb, Opera omnia (17 v. Regensburg 1734–41).

André Ernest Modeste Grétry, engraving. (©Michael Nicholson/CORBIS)

Bibliography: B. DUHR, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge, 4 v. in 6 (Freiburg 1907–28), v. 1. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jesus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1743–1809. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1866–71. H. LIEBING, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1856. T. KURRUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1223.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

GREY NUNS

The Sisters of Charity of Montreal (#0490), commonly called Grey Nuns (SGM), a pontifical congregation of religious women, was founded in 1738 at Montreal, Canada, by (St.) Marie Marguerite d'YOUVILLE.

Grey Nuns of Montreal. The original foundation developed slowly. On Dec. 31, 1737, Madame d'Youville and three companions, Louise Thaurmur, Catherine Cusson, and Catherine Demers, privately professed their dedication to the poor and sick, without any intention, however, of forming a religious community. The following year they began to live together in a rented house in order to receive the destitute and give them better care. This beginning of their community life enraged many citizens, who could not believe that the widow of François d'Youville, confidential agent of the governor-general in illegal trade with the Native Americans, would honestly help the poor. In spite of violence and invective, including their title, les soeurs grises (the drunken nuns), the women persisted in their dedication, under the spiritual guidance of a Sulpician priest, Louis Normant du Fardon. In 1745 they made the first formal promises anticipating their rule, when they agreed to live together in charity for the rest of their lives under a superior and according to a rule; to practice entire poverty; to consecrate their time and labor to the care of as many poor persons as they could receive; and, for this purpose, to put their individual resources into a common fund. Moreover, they agreed to wear plain black dresses, uniform only in simplicity.

In 1747 the administrators of the General Hospital of Montreal, established by the Charon Brothers in 1692 for aged men, appealed to Mother d'Youville to take charge of the institution. King Louis XV confirmed the appointment (1753) and authorized the foundation of a religious community. The first papal approval was granted on July 21, 1865. In 1755, when the community numbered 12 members, it was decided to design a habit. Having been called les soeurs grises for 18 years, they chose grey—also gris in French—for the color of their costume, thus giving a new meaning to an old title. The General Hospital, now restored, became the first motherhouse of the Grey Nuns, as well as the center of all kinds of work for the blind, the mentally ill, destitute and aged men and women, those suffering from contagious diseases, abandoned children, and needy seminarians. In 1855 a foundation was made in the United States, which later developed into the American province with headquarters at Lexington, Massachusetts.

Grey Nuns of St. Hyacinthe. The first independent foundation, the Sisters of Charity of St. Hyacinthe (SCSH, Official Catholic Directory #0610) was made in 1840 at St. Hyacinthe, near Montreal. From this foundation another was made at Nicolet in 1886, but in 1940 it became a province of the original institute in Montreal.

The Sisters of Charity of St. Hyacinthe (SGSH) made their first United States foundation in 1878. The generalate is in St. Hyacinthe, Canada; the United States regional administration is in Lewiston, Maine.

Grey Nuns of Quebec. Another self-governing mission from Montreal was founded in 1849 in the city of Quebec at the request of Bishop Pierre-Flavien Turgeon. These Sisters of Charity (SCQ, Official Catholic Directory #0560) subsequently established provinces in the civil Province of Quebec. In 1890, they established their first foundation in Massachusetts, Massachusetts. The sisters work in schools and hospitals, and care for the elderly.

Grey Nuns of the Cross. In 1845, under the leadership of Mother Elizabeth Bruyère, the Grey Nuns of Montreal founded an autonomous congregation in Ottawa, Ontario. Their rule received pontifical approbation in 1889. Their work includes education, nursing, pastoral work, and care of the aged and orphans. In the United States, the sisters made a foundation in 1857, which eventually became an independent branch, the Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart in 1921.

Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart. In 1857 an autonomous congregation was founded from the Grey Nuns of the Cross that became known as the Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart (GNSH, Official Catholic Directory #1840). At the invitation of Cardinal Dennis Dougherty of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, they established their motherhouse there in 1921. The sisters are active in schools, hospitals, care for the aged, parochial and pastoral ministries, outreach programs to the homeless, youth ministries, counseling, and campus ministries.

Grey Sisters of the Immaculate Conception. In 1926 a group of English-speaking members of the Grey Nuns of the Cross established a separate motherhouse in Pembroke, Ontario. Besides hospitals, orphanages, and schools (both elementary and secondary), the congregation had also maintained Chinese missions in Canada, which were completely destroyed by communists.

Bibliography: Archives, Grey Nuns of Montreal. T. A. KEEFE, The Congregation of the Grey Nuns. 1737-1910 (Washington 1942).

[L. R. CAYER/M. P. FITTS/EDS.]

GRIFFIN, BERNARD WILLIAM

Cardinal, archbishop of Westminster, England; b. Birmingham, Feb. 21, 1899; d. New Polzeath, Cornwall, Aug. 20, 1956. Griffin was educated at Cotton College, Oscott, England, and at the English College and the Beda College in Rome. Ordained in 1924, he was secretary to the archbishops of Birmingham from 1927 to 1937. Griffin was chancellor of the archdiocese from 1929 to 1938 and was a notable administrator of archdiocesan charitable homes from 1937 to 1943. He became an auxiliary bishop of Birmingham in 1938, and in 1943 he succeeded Cardinal Arthur HINSLEY as archbishop of Westminster. Griffin was made a cardinal in 1946. His previous association with social welfare helped him to assess and encourage the work of the Labour government whose effect was to change English social life profoundly after World War II. As the leading English Catholic prelate, he often journeyed abroad until the last years of his life, when he suffered from illnesses that severely restricted his activities. Seek Ye First, a collection of his sermons and other addresses, was published in 1949.

Bibliography: M. DE LA BEDOYÈRE, Cardinal Bernard Griffin (London 1955).

[E. MCDERMOTT]

GRIFFIN, MARTIN IGNATIUS JOSEPH

Journalist, historian; b. Philadelphia, Oct. 23, 1842; d. there, Nov. 10, 1911. Griffin's parents, Terence J. and Elizabeth (Doyle) Griffin, were immigrants from Ireland. Griffin was educated in parochial and public schools. He began his journalistic career as a contributor to Catholic newspapers. Griffin edited a Sunday school journal (1867–70) and served as assistant editor of the newly established Catholic Standard (1870–73). An energetic promoter, Griffin organized Philadelphia's first Youths' Catholic Total Abstinence Society. In 1872, he was one of the founders of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America. He was secretary of the Irish Catholic Benevolent Union for 22 years. Griffin founded and edited its I.C.B.U. Journal (1873–94), continuing its publication as Griffin's Journal until 1900. Griffin was also active as a historian and compiler of historical documents. In 1884, he founded the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia. From 1886 to 1911, as proprietor and editor of the American Catholic Historical Researches, a quarterly miscellany of documents, comment, and correspondence, Griffin campaigned for authenticity in American Catholic historical writing. His works include a number of parish histories, compilations of documents, and the following books: History of Rt. Rev. Michael Egan, D.D. First Bishop of Philadelphia (1893), Commodore John Barry (1902), General Count Casimir Pulaski (1909), Stephen Moylan (1909), and Catholics and the American Revolution (1907–11). Despite occasional deficiencies of method and judgment, his work provided a documentary foundation for later historians of American Catholicism.

[F. GERRITY]

GRIFFITH, PATRICK RAYMOND

Missionary bishop; b. Limerick, Ireland, Oct. 1, 15, 1798; d. Cape Town, South Africa, June 18, 1862. After joining the Dominicans and studying in Lisbon and Rome, he was ordained (1821). He then returned to Ireland, where in Dublin and elsewhere he became well known for his oratorical powers, charity, and zeal, and particularly for his work among the stricken during a cholera outbreak. When Pope Gregory XVI created the Vicariate Apostolic of the Cape of Good Hope (1837), he appointed Griffith as the first vicar apostolic. After being consecrated in Dublin as bishop (August 1837), Griffith arrived in Cape Town on April 13, 1838. In 1841 he began the construction of St. Mary's Cathedral, which was opened a decade later. Bishop Griffith established missions at Rondebosch, Wynberg, and Simonstown in the Cape Peninsula, and at Grahamstown and Port Elizabeth in the eastern Cape. Griffith's vicariate was divided in 1847 when the Vicariate Apostolic of the Eastern Districts of the Cape of Good Hope was created. Griffith consecrated Aidan Devereux as its bishop, the first ceremony of episcopal consecration in South Africa. In 1862 Griffith resigned his post after receiving Thomas Grimley as coadjutor in 1861. Between the time of Griffith's arrival in 1838 and his death 24 years later the number of Catholics in the Cape Colony had increased from 700 (mostly military personnel) to more than 30,000. Griffith was buried in St. Mary's Cathedral, the mother church in the present Republic of South Africa.

Bibliography: J. E. BRADY, Trekking for Souls (Cedara, Natal 1952). W. E. BROWN, The Catholic Church in South Africa (New York 1960).

[J. E. BRADY]

GRIFFITHS, BEDE

Benedictine monk, writer; b. Walton-on-Thames, England, 1906; d. Shantivanam Ashram, Tamil Nadu, India, May 13, 1993. In 1932 Bede Griffiths entered the Roman Catholic Church; a few months later, he joined the Benedictine Abbey of Prinknash. For 15 years he hardly left the cloister and relished the order and peace of monastic life. However, his study of Indian religion and philosophy stirred another level of his search for wholeness, and, in 1955, he left for India "to find the other half of my soul." There he learned Sanskrit and in 1968 took over direction of the Benedictine ashram of Shantivanam, which had been founded by the two great pioneers of an Indianized Christianity, Jules Monchanin and Henri le Saux (Abhishiktananda).

In India Griffiths formed a small, fragile community of great international influence that symbolized his deepest beliefs and intuitions. Among these were the need for a truly Asian Christianity reexpressing its faith through the terms of its own philosophy and scriptures. He saw modern Christianity at a crossroads comparable to that faced in the primitive Church when a Jewish framework of ideas and symbols struggled with those of the Gentile world. In his early days in India he met with official and semi-official opposition to his ideas and to his new form of ashramic-monastic life, but toward the end of his life he received official approval. He was always quick to confront and debate the reactionary forces of a eurocentric Christianity, either in India or in the West, and to point out what he saw as general inherent tendencies of all Semitic religions. For him these were the centrality of the dualistic model of seeing God, the domination of male symbolism and leadership, and the intolerance of exclusive claims to truth and salvation. In this spirit, for example, his revision of the psalter for ashram worship excised curses and denunciatory verses.

Prior Dom Bede Griffiths performing silkworm blessing during service at St. Michael's Abbey. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

An anthology of world scriptures published posthumously illustrated Griffiths's belief that all religions originate in an intuition or experience of advaita or nonduality. They then decline into excessive rationalism, with its consequent rigidities of dualism and exclusivism, before ascending back through their contemplative traditions to a vision of simplicity and universalism. This latter belief underlies the importance he attributed to the influence of his fellow Benedictine John Main in restoring a method of contemplative meditation to Christianity from within the Christian monastic tradition. Griffiths's last book, The New Creation in Christ, takes Main's ideas on contemplation and the modern pursuit of community and personal wholeness as its inspiration for affirming a renewed tradition of lay monasticism. This book dispels any idea that Griffiths's universalist vision of religion resulted in any ultimate syncretism or dilution of Christian specificity.

With characteristic lucidity and elegance of literary style, Bede Griffiths wrote on Indian Christianity, modern Church controversies, Indian scripture, the meeting of East and West, and the encounter of modern science and religious mysticism. Despite his prophetic contemporaneity and inclusivity of vision, Griffiths harbored a deep distrust of modern technological civilization. He believed in the evolutionary movement toward global unity but saw irreconcilable self-contradictions at the core of modern society. He lived and taught from this tension without personal dogmatism and with a growing sweetness of nature that touched the hearts of his listeners around the world during the extensive travels of his last years.

After his stroke in 1990, Griffiths described a personal transformation and affective liberation that he attributed to the awakening of the muladara chakra. At Oxford he had struggled through an intellectual journey that took him from fin de siècle aestheticism to twentieth century Romanticism. In this he was accompanied by C.S. Lewis, a friend for 40 years, who described him as “one of the toughest dialecticians of my acquaintance.” Yet, it was only after a battle with religious faith and an experiment with utopian living that he accepted the fully spiritual context of his pursuit for truth and wholeness.

Bede Griffiths, in his life and teaching, symbolized the meeting between Christianity and the other world religions, which he considered the most significant event of the twentieth century. As such a symbol (don and sannyasi), he and his writings have continued to inspire the interfaith movement since his death.

Bibliography: Griffiths was the author of a number of books, more than 300 articles, and several audio and video recordings. His books include an autobiography entitled The Golden String (London 1954); Christian Ashram (London 1966); Vedanta and Christian Faith (London 1973); Return to the Centre (London 1978); The Marriage of East and West (London 1982); The Cosmic Revelation (London 1983); The River of Compassion (Warwick NY 1987); A New Vision of Reality (London 1991); The New Creation in Christ (London 1992); Psalms for Christian Prayer (Shantivanam 1993); Pathways to the Supreme (Shantivanam 1994); Universal Wisdom (London 1994). S. DU BOULAY, Beyond the Darkness: A Biography of Bede Griffiths (New York 1998).

[L. FREEMAN]

GRIFFITHS, THOMAS

Vicar apostolic of the London District; b. London, June 2, 1791; d. London, Aug. 12, 1847. Griffiths was baptized a Protestant, but became a Catholic while a boy. He was educated at St. Edmund's College, Ware, and lived there (1805–33). Ordained in July 1814, he became president of St. Edmund's at the age of 26. His careful administration saved the college from complete collapse, and he was consecrated there as titular bishop of Olens and coadjutor with right of succession to Bp. James Yorke Bramston of the London District (Oct. 28, 1833). Succeeding Bramston (July 11, 1836), he was the first modern bishop educated wholly in England and the first to introduce ecclesiastical dress for the clergy in place of lay clothes. Griffiths' views tended to be conservative. He did not believe in the possibility of large-scale conversions and distrusted converts from the OXFORD MOVEMENT. He represented the outlook of a Catholic Church that had long suffered under restrictive penal legislation. This outlook was soon dated by the restoration of the English hierarchy (1850). Griffiths was pious, humble, industrious, and capable as an administrator.

Bibliography: B. N. WARD, The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation, 2 v. (New York 1915); The History of St. Edmund's College, Old Hall (London 1893). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 8:690.

[B. WHELAN]

GRIGNION DE MONTFORT, LOUIS MARIE, ST.

Founder of the Missionaries of the Company of Mary (Montfort Fathers) and of the Daughters of Wisdom, influential Marian author; b. Montfort-la-Canne, France, Jan. 31, 1673; d. St. Laurent-sur-Sèvre (Vendée), April 28, 1716.

A childlike devotion to the Mother of God was characteristic of Montfort's life from the outset. At confirmation, he took the name of Mary and later dropped his family name, wishing to be called Louis Mary of Montfort. He studied with the Jesuits at Rennes and then at the Sorbonne and Saint-Sulpice. During these years, Montfort became familiar with the French school of spirituality and, as he himself declared, read nearly all of the books that treat devotion to Our Lady. He was ordained at Paris, June 5, 1700, and, in 1710, he was received as a tertiary in the Third Order of St. Dominic.

In the brief 16 years of his priesthood, Louis de Montfort fulfilled a career of founder, missionary, and writer. Two years after his ordination, Montfort organized the nursing and teaching congregation of the Daughters of WISDOM. In 1705, he founded his missionary congregation of men, the MONTFORT FATHERS. Having been named a missionary apostolic by Pope CLEMENT XI, Montfort spent the greater part of his priestly years as a traveling missionary, preaching retreats and missions throughout western France.

St. Louis Marie Grignion de Montfort, sculpture located inside St. Peter's Basilica, Rome.

Montfort was also the author of numerous works inspired by the needs of his apostolate. He composed more than 23,400 verses of hymns and wrote the rules for the two communities he founded. Among his other writings are The Love of the Eternal Wisdom, The Secret of the Rosary, and The Secret of Mary. However, Montfort's renown as an author and theologian is due primarily to one of his manuscripts, which was discovered in 1842 and called The True Devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary by its first editors. The title is a misnomer, for the work is actually a fuller explanation of what Montfort calls The Love of the Eternal Wisdom, the greatest secret of achieving union with Christ, a tender devotion to Mary. He explains that the foundation for devotion to Mary is her role in the economy of salvation as mother and queen. That total consecration accompanies the formal and active recognition of the role that Mary plays in human lives, a recognition that entails the renewal of baptismal promises. Montfort advocates the surrender to Christ, through Mary, of the value of all good actions, past, present, and future, so that they may be used in any way God wishes. Following the authors of his times, he terms this consecration "Holy Slavery of Love," a slavery devoid, of course, of pejorative connotations. PIUS XII sums up the praise of the Church for Montfort's doctrine when he describes it as "burning, solid, and correct."

Louis de Montfort is buried in the basilica dedicated to his honor at Saint-Laurent-sur-Sèvre. He was beatified in 1888 and canonized on July 20, 1947.

Feast: April 28.

Bibliography: J. GRANDET, Vie de messire Louis-Marie Grignion de Montfort (Nantes 1724). L. LECROM, Un Apôtre marial (Tourcoing 1946). G. RIGAUT, Saint Louis Marie Grignion de Montfort (New York 1947). P. J. GAFFNEY, "The Holy Slavery of Love," Mariology, ed. J. B. CAROL, 3 v. (Milwaukee 1954–61) 3:143–161. L.-M. CLÉNET, Grignion de Montfort: le saint de la Vendée (Paris 1988). L. PÉROUAS, Grignion de Montfort et la Vendée (Paris 1989). L. SANKALÉ, Avec Marie, au pas de l'Esprit: Le secret de Marie de saint Louis-Marie Grignion de Montfort lu aujourd'hui en paroisse (Paris 1991). B. GUITTENY, Grignion de Montfort, missionnaire des pauvres (Paris 1993). R. LAURENTIN, Dieu seul est ma tendresse (Paris 1996).

[P. GAFFNEY]

GRIJALVA, JUAN DE

Born in Colima, Mexico, date unknown; died in Mexico City, Nov. 4, 1638. Grijalva joined the Augustinians and made his religious profession on Nov. 5, 1595, at Guayangareo (now Morelia). Later, he studied at the University of Mexico, where he obtained his doctorate in 1612. Grijalva served in various offices in his order, including that of prior in each of the two principal monasteries in Mexico City, San Agustín and the Colegio San Pablo. In 1624, he published Crónica de la Orden de N.P.S. Agustín en las provincias de la Nueva España en quatro edades desde el año de 1533 hasta el de 1592. This work is the first published of the Augustinian chronicles and is of major importance for the 16th-century history of the order since the friars spread from New Spain to South America and the Philippines. Many of the sources upon which it was based are no longer extant; therefore, Grijalva's extensive quotations from other documents are especially important. The style is clear and the chronology unusually exact. The chronicle is divided into four books. The first treats the arrival of the first Augustinians in New Spain (1533) and the areas in which they worked; it also includes information on expeditions to the Far East. Mission methods are the topic of book two, which also tells of the cocoliztli epidemic among the Native Americans. Book three is primarily concerned with missions to the Philippines and China, though it also covers the founding of the Colegio de San Pablo in Mexico

City and mission work among the Tarascans. Book four contains Augustinian biographies. In general, the account is trustworthy. The original edition is very rare, but an edition published in Mexico City in 1924 is virtually a facsimile reproduction.

Bibliography: G. DE SANTIAGO VELA, Ensayo de una biblioteca ibero-americana de la Orden de San Agustín, 7 v. in 8 (Madrid 1913–31) 3:301–307; “Historiadores de la provincia agustiniana de México,” Archivo histórico hispano-agustiniano 9 (1918) 241–255.

[A. J. ENNIS]

GRILLPARZER, FRANZ

Austrian dramatist; b. Vienna, Jan. 15, 1791; d. there, Jan. 21, 1872. Grillparzer studied law at the University of Vienna, and during that time he wrote his first drama, Blanka von Kastilien (1807–09). He entered civil service (1813), advanced to the directorship of the imperial archives (1832), and was pensioned in 1856. Although many circumstances in Grillparzer’s life (official displeasure over his historical plays, for example) gave reason for his persistent melancholy, much of Grillparzer’s suffering was self-caused by his hypochondria and fear of involvement in life. Die Ahnfrau (1817), a fate tragedy, made Grillparzer famous, but his first great drama was Sappho (1818). Written in classical Goethean style, it states clearly the thesis that the poet must be “uncommitted.” Even in such “thesis” plays, however, Grillparzer was fascinated by psychological nuances. If this interest weakened his thesis, it helped shape him into a very modern poet; his plays mark the beginning of the psychological drama in Austria and fully support his reputation as one of the greatest of the Austrian playwrights.

Das goldene Vliess (1821), a powerful trilogy, treats a theme of which Grillparzer never tired—that man upsets not only his own inner equilibrium but that of his environment when he aspires to a status that is not his due. This anti-Faust, quietistic attitude is portrayed quite clearly in Der Traum ein Leben (1834). Two tragedies, König Ottokars Glück und Ende (1826) and Ein treuer Diener seines Herrn (1826), based on Austrian history, provoked governmental censorship. In Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen (1831), a dramatization of the Hero and Leander love tragedy, Grillparzer’s dramatic style reached its high point. Weh dem, der lügt (1838) was Grillparzer’s only comedy. Its failure when produced caused him to withdraw from play-writing.

After his death, his three greatest works were found among his papers: Libussa, Ein Bruderzwist in Habsburg, and Die Jüdin von Toledo. Bruderzwist is a historical drama; in it Rudolf II (1552–1612) attempts to preserve the Habsburg Empire through highly conservative politics, a policy of inaction. The effect of his failure, telescoped magnificently in the fifth act, is the chaos of the Thirty Years’ War. Grillparzer’s best prose piece is Der arme Spielmann (1847).

Franz Grillparzer.

Bibliography: Historisch-kritische Gesamtausgabe, ed. A. SAUER et al. (Vienna 1909–), 43 v. to date; Sämtliche Werke: Ausgewählte Briefe, Gespräche, Berichte, ed. P. FRANK and C. PÖRNACHER, 4 v. (Munich 1960). Trans. A. BURKHARD of Medea (3d ed. Yarmouth Port, Mass. 1956); King Ottocar: His Rise and Fall (1962); and Hero and Leander (1962). J. NADLER, Franz Grillparzer (Vaduz 1948). A. BURKHARD, Franz Grillparzer in England and America (pa. New York 1961). C. D. BERND, ed., Franz Grillparzer’s “Der arme spielmann” (Camden East 1988). C. H. MUNSCHEN, Franz Grillparzer (Regensburg 1960). W. C. REEVE, The Federfuchser and Penpusher from Lessing to Grillparzer: A Study Focused on Grillparzer’s “Ein Bruderzwist in Habsburg” (Montreal 1995). I. F. ROE, Franz Grillparzer: A Century of Criticism (Camden East 1995). E. WAGNER, An Analysis of Franz Grillparzer’s Dramas: Fate, Guilt, and Tragedy (Lewiston 1992).

[C. B. GIORDANO]

GRIMBALD, ST.

Monk, teacher under ALFRED THE GREAT; b. Théro-uanne (Flanders), c. 820–830; d. Winchester, England, July 8, 901. Dedicated when seven years old in the nearby Benedictine Abbey of SAINT-BERTIN, Grimbold was ordained deacon by 867 and priest c. 868 to 873; he was chosen prior there before going to England at King ALFRED's invitation. Arriving c. 886, he participated in the Alfredian revival as a devout Churchman, skillful musician, and royal tutor and mass-priest. Grimbold apparently declined the Archbishopric of Canterbury (889). He encouraged Edward the Elder to build New Minster, Winchester, which Alfred had planned. Although said to have been New Minster's first abbot, he died before its dedication and was buried there.

Feast: July 8.

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 8:695–697. P. GRIERSON, English Historical Review 55 (1940) 529–561.

[W. A. CHANEY]

GRIMSTON, RALPH, BL.

Martyr; also known as Ralph Grimstow; b. Nidd, Knaresborough, Yorkshire, England; d. June 15, 1598, hanged at York. Arrested with Fr. Peter SNOW with whom he was traveling to York about May 1, 1598. He was charged with felony for having aided a priest and having attempted to prevent Snow's apprehension. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GRISAR, HARTMANN

Church historian; b. Coblenz on the Rhine, Sept. 22, 1845; d. Innsbruck, Austria, Feb. 25, 1932. At the completion of his early studies with the Christian Brothers in Coblenz, Grisar took courses in philosophy and theology at Munster under a renowned Bavarian neo-Thomist, Albert Stockl. Further theological study at the University of Innsbruck led to a doctorate in 1868. That year, Grisar was ordained and joined the Society of Jesus, beginning his Jesuit training in Rome. Returning to Austria after two years, he was appointed unexpectedly to the professorship of Church history at Innsbruck in 1871. At this point, Grisar dedicated himself to the serious study of Church history. His association with the University of Innsbruck continued until 1889. The lifelong influence of Von Rankean historiographical principles upon Grisar's prolific writings had already become evident in this early period of his career (see RANKE, LEOPOLD VON; HISTORICISM; HISTORIOGRAPHY, ECCLESIASTICAL). In 1877, Grisar became one of the founders of the Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie; and his occasional, lengthy visits to Rome produced several articles for the Civiltà Cattolica.

To encourage Grisar's special talents, his superiors relieved him of teaching duties at Innsbruck and transferred him to Rome, where he undertook historical and archeological research. The first fruit of this work was the Analecta Romana (Rome 1899), a collection of 15 studies on the early history of Rome. This was followed by his Geschichte Roms und der Päpste in M.A. (Freiburg im Breisgau 1901; Eng. tr. 1908), undertaken partly in criticism of the Geschichte der Stadt Rom im Mittelalter (1859–72) by Ferdinand Gregorovius. After the publication of the first volume of this classic history of Rome and the popes, Grisar's health forced him to return to Austria, leaving the completion of the work to others. At Innsbruck, he turned his attention to research on Martin Luther that produced Luther (3 v. Freiburg im Breisgau 1911–12; Eng. tr. 1913–14), Lutherstudien (6 v. Freiburg im Breisgau 1920–23), Der deutsche Luther im Weltkreis und in der Gegenwart (Freiburg im Breisgau 1924), and Martin Luthers Leben und sein Werk (Freiburg im Breisgau 1926; Eng. tr. 1930). Grisar's analysis of Luther is, by his own description, psychological rather than biographical in orientation. Though intended to be more objective and moderate in tone than previous Catholic studies such as that by Heinrich Seuse DENIFLE in 1903, it tends to emphasize negative qualities in Luther's personality. Contemporary Catholic appraisals of the Reformer appear more balanced than Grisar's without totally replacing it. Among his other works are the publication of addresses given at the Council of Trent by the Jesuit Diego Laínez, Jacobi Lainez disputationes Tridentinae (Rome 1886); S. Gregorio Magno (Rome 1904); Das Missale im Licht der römischen Stadtgeschichte (Freiburg im Breisgau 1925); Marienblüten. Systematische Marienlehre aus dem grossen Marienwerk des Petrus Canisius (Freiburg im Breisgau 1930).

Bibliography: An autobiography is found in Die Religionswissenschaft der Gegenwart in Selbstdarstellungen (Freiburg 1927) 37–56. Necrologies appear in F. S. BETTEN, American Catholic Historical Review 18 (1932) 229–232. Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 56 (1932) 145–147. La civiltà cattolica 1 (1932) 567–571. For the place of Grisar's study on Luther, see E. W. ZEE-DEN, Martin Luther und die Reformation im Urteil des deutschen Luthertums, 2 v. (Freiburg 1950–52) v. 1, tr. R. M. BETHELL, The Legacy of Luther (Westminster, Md. 1954). A. HERTE, Das katholische Lutherbild im Bann der Lutherkommentare des Cochläus, 3 v. (Münster 1943). J. GRISAR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER (Freiburg 1930–38) 4:707–708. R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1238. K. G. STECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1878–79. A. M. BOZZONE, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:276–277.

[C. SEVILLA]

GRISSOLD, ROBERT, BL.

Lay martyr; also known as Robert Greswold or Griswold; b. at Rowington, Warwickshire, England; d. July 16, 1604, hanged at Warwick under James I. Grissold, who was in the service of Mr. Sheldon of Broadway, was attending Bl. John SUGAR, when they were arrested in his hometown on July 8, 1603. The two martyrs shared a year's captivity before Grissold was charged with refusing to attend church and for assisting Sugar, a seminary priest. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GRIVOT, IRMA, ST.

In religion Marie Hermine de Jésus; martyr, religious superior of the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary; b. April 28, 1867, Beaume, France; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, Shanxi, China. Irma, the daughter of a cooper, completed her elementary studies in 1883, then worked as a private tutor. Her parents did not support her religious vocation, perhaps because of her poor health. She joined the Franciscan Missionaries at Vanves near Paris (1894). Then she began her novitiate (July 1894) at Les Châtelets, near Saint Brieuc, where took the name Marie Hermine de Jésus. After making her first vows, she returned to Vanves to serve as bookkeeper. In Marseilles she received training as a nurse in preparation for her assignment to China in 1898. At the time of the Boxer Uprising, she was superior of the mission at Taiyüan. She surprised the bishop by insisting the sisters would rather die for Christ than seek safety. Her offered sacrifice was accepted by God. She and her religious sisters were beatified by Pope Pius XII, Nov. 24, 1946, and canonized, Oct. 1, 2000, by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, Valiant women: Mother Mary of the Passion and the Franciscan Missionaries of Mary, tr. G. TELFORD (London 1936). M. T. DE BLARER, Les Bse Marie Hermine de Jésus et ses compagnes, franciscaines missionnaires de Marie, massacrées le 9 juillet 1900 à Tai-Yuan-Fou, Chine (Paris 1947). L. M. BALCONI, Le Martiri di Taiyuen (Milan 1945). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47 (Rome 1955) 381–388. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GROENENDAEL, ABBEY OF

Augustinian monastery located five miles from Brussels in the forest of Soignes, founded in 1350 by two priests, Jan van RUYSBROECK, the Dutch mystic, and Francone de Coudenberg, as a priory of canons regular dependent on the abbey of SAINT-VICTOR of Paris. The site had been a hermitage since 1304, and the founders, after retiring from the collegiate church of St. Gudule in 1343, had lived there under the patronage of John III, Duke of Brabant. The first prior was Ruysbroeck, who held the office until his death in 1381. In 1412 the monastery joined the congregation of WINDESHEIM, remaining a simple priory. Its religious were famous as copyists and writers, and it had a rich library. In the disturbances of the 16th century it was sacked by the Calvinists, but restored by imperial authority. At the time of its suppression by the French revolutionists in 1796, it was in a state of decadence.

Bibliography: É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (Brussels 1945–) v. 3.

[C. FALK]

GROOTE, GERARD

Deacon, preacher of moral reform, author of ascetical and canonical treatises, father of the Devotio Moderna; b. Deventer, Netherlands, Oct. 1340; d. Deventer, Aug. 20, 1384.

Son of patrician parents, Groote took his master of arts degree at the University of Paris in 1358 and specialized further in Canon Law. He held prebends at St. Mary's Cathedral, Aix-la-Chapelle, and St. Martin's Cathedral, Utrecht. In 1374, Groote gave up most of his possessions, resigned his prebends, and withdrew to the Carthusian monastery of Monnikhuizen, near Arnhem, where he stayed more than two years as a guest. Longing for a moral reform of the Church, he left the monastery, became a deacon, and received permission to preach throughout the Diocese of Utrecht. Starting in early 1380, Groote endeavored to revive the faith and morals of the laity, contributed to monastic reform, and insisted on stricter application of ecclesiastical laws against simony and clerical marriage. He attacked the latter most severely on the occasion of a synod at Utrecht in 1383. Although in large part successful, Groote experienced much opposition, particularly from the higher clergy, and was finally forbidden to preach. An appeal was made to Pope URBAN VI but, before receiving the answer, Groote died of the plague.

Groote attached great importance to apostolic poverty and common life, even when not sanctioned by vows. Changing his house into a hospice for pious women and giving them statutes, he founded the Sisters of the Common Life. Some of his disciples lived together at Deventer and Zwolle and organized themselves as BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE. Groote's plan to establish a community of Canons Regular of St. Augustine, probably inspired by Jan van RUYSBROECK, was forestalled by his death. In 1386, Groote's disciples founded the monastery of WINDESHEIM, which became the center of a spiritual revival, known as DEVOTIO MODERNA.

Groote's spirituality is Christocentric (Sermo de nativitate Domini; Sermo in die palmarum; Epistola de paciencia). There is no evidence that Groote wrote the IMITATION OF CHRIST, but his ideas influenced its author. Deeply concerned about the WESTERN SCHISM, he stressed the invisible unity of the Church and desired a general council (Epistola de scismate). His De matrimonio lacks appreciation for marriage. The De simonia ad beguttas, De locatione ecclesiarum, and Sermo contra focaristas reveal the vehement temperament of the reformer.

Recent editions and studies of his writings include: Gerardi Magni epistolae, ed. W. Mulder (Tekstuitgaven van Ons Geestelijk Erf 3; Antwerp 1933); Tractatus de quatuor generibus meditationum sive contemplationum of Sermo de nativitate Domini; ed. A. Hyma, Archief voor de Geschiedenis van het Aartsbisdom Utrecht, 49 (1924) 296–326; Geert Groote en het Huwelijk: Uitgave van zijn Tractaat De Matrimonio en Onderzoek naar de Bronnen, ed. M. H. Mulders (Utrecht 1941); "Geert Groote's Sermoen voor Palmzondag over de vrijwillige Armoede," ed. W. Moll, Studiën en Bijdragen op het Gebied der historische Theologie 2 (1872) 425–469; De simonia ad beguttas: de Middelnederlandse Tekst, ed. W. de Vreese (The Hague 1940); "De locatione ecclesiarum," ed. J. Clarisse, Archief voor kerkelijke Geschiedenis (1937) 119–152; Sermo magistri Gerardi Magni, dicti Groot, de focariis, ed. T. A. and J. Clarisse, in article "Over den Geest en Denkwijze van Geert Groote (Groot, de Groet), kenbaar uit zijne Schriften," Archief voor ker- kelijke Geschiedenis (1829) 355–398, 2 (1830) 245–395 3 (1831); "Bijlagen," 1–90, 8 (1837) 3–383.

Bibliography: K. C. L. M. DE BEER, Studie over de spiritualiteit van Geert Groote (Brussels 1938). J. G. J. TIECKE, De Werken van Geert Groote (Utrecht 1941). R. R. POST, "De onderlinge Verhouding van de 4 oude Vitae Gerardi Magni en haar Betrouwbaarheid," Studio catholica 18 (1942) 313–336, 19 (1943) 9–20. T. P. VAN ZIJL, Gerard Groote: Ascetic and Reformer, 1340–1384 (CUA Studies in Mediaeval Hist., NS 18; 1963). C. C. DE BRUIN, E. PERSOONS, A. G. WEILER, Geert Grote en de Moderne Devotie (Zutphen, Germany, 1984). E. F. JACOB, "Gerard Groote and the Beginnings of the 'New Devotion' in the Low Countries," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 3 (1952) 40–57.

[T. P. VAN ZIJL]

GROSJEAN, PAUL

Jesuit, Bollandist, and Celtic scholar; b. Uccle, Belgium, May 26, 1900; d. Brussels, June 13, 1964. After brilliant studies at the College of St. Michael, Brussels, Grosjean entered the Society of Jesus (Sept. 23, 1917). He was selected by Hippolyte DELEHAYE for training as a Bollandist in 1921. Grosjean studied at Oxford under C. Plummer and E. A. Lowe, returned to Belgium for military service, and spent two years perfecting his knowledge of Celtic in Dublin. Ordained in 1932, he returned to the College of St. Michael, Brussels, for the rest of his career. He prepared the life of St. Benignus of Armagh for the November 4 volume of the Acta Sanctorum and published many unedited vitae of Celtic saints in the Analecta Bollandiana and the Irish Texts series. Grosjean had a gift for solving complicated problems of chronology and enigmas. He contributed numerous articles to the principal journals of history and philology. His studies on the problem of St. Patrick's life and works, the Celtic paschal controversy, the sources of Bede's Ecclesiastical History, the Hisperica famina, and the Roman Martyrology revealed a tireless and conscientious scholar with a flair for humanist Latin and great generosity in aiding other scholars. He served as chaplain to the Royal Union of St. Raphael and spiritual adviser to the officers of the Belgian Grand Quartier Général. Grosjean was a member of the British and Irish Academies and received a doctorate honoris causa from the National University of Dublin.

Bibliography: M. COENS, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 59 (1964) 1025–26; Analecta Bollandiana 82 (1964) 289–318, life and bibliog.

[F. X. MURPHY]

GROSOLI, GIOVANNI

Journalist, senator, Catholic lay leader; b. Carpi (Modena) Aug. 20, 1859; d. Assisi, Feb. 20, 1937. As a young man, after his studies and early religious and charitable activities in his city, he dedicated his life exclusively to the civic, religious, social, and political functions of the Catholic movement. He was among the developers and directors of the Catholic associations of the Romagna, and for several years the communal counselor for Ferrara. In 1902, Pope Leo XIII named him president of the Opera dei Congressi e Comitati Cattolici, which since 1875 had coordinated all public activity of Italian Catholics.

Because of his lively temperament and his origin in a region where social agitation was sharp and far-reaching, Grosoli wanted to bring a new, progressive spirit into the Opera to counteract the more conservative attitude of the group of Venetians who were in control. After the death of Leo XIII (1903), Grosoli's approach did not find favor with the new Pontiff who disbanded the Opera (1904). For the rest of Pius X's pontificate, Grosoli remained outside the Catholic movement, dedicating himself completely to journalism. He organized the Società Editrice Romana, which began and managed the leading Catholic dailies of that time, especially Il corriere d'Italia (Rome), L'Italia (Milan), and L'Avvenire d'Italia (Bologna). This last paper was edited by Cesare Algranati ("Rocca d'Adria"), the principal support of Grosoli during these years. In 1912 Pius X declared the papers under the Società "out of conformity with pontifical directives," a judgment reversed by the new Pope, Benedict XV, in 1914. In the meantime, however, Grosoli had spent virtually his entire inheritance to maintain the papers abandoned by the bishops.

In 1919, Grosoli was among the founders of the Italian Popular Party (the first political party of Italian Catholics). In 1920 he was its first representative in the Senate, but he abandoned the position in 1924 to found the Italian National Center, which was favorable to fascism. Among his reasons for joining the Fascist movement was his hope of saving the Bank of Rome and with it the Catholic dailies. When the National Center was dissolved following a clearcut reproof from the Holy See, Grosoli abandoned all activity, distributed his means to charitable organizations, and retired to Assisi where he lived his last years in Franciscan poverty. Before his death he destroyed his personal letters and documents.

[E. LUCATELLO]

GROSS, NIKOLAUS, BL.

Lay martyr, journalist; b. Sept. 30, 1898, Niederrönnern (now a suburb of Hattingen near Essen), Ruhr, Germany; d. Jan. 23, 1945, Plotzenzee Prison, Berlin, Germany. After completing his elementary education (1905–12), Nikolaus Gross, the son of a smith, worked in a sheet mill (1912–15) and intensively sought to further his education in his free time. As a coal miner (1915–20), he joined the Christian Miners' Union (1917), the Central Christian Party (Zentrum, 1918), then the Antonius Knappenverein (St. Anthony's Miners Association, 1919). From 1920, he held various union positions in the Ruhr, Schlesien, and Saxony, while acting as assistant editor for the Bergknappe (The Miner) and as its editor from 1922. On May 24, 1923, he married Elisabeth Koch with whom he had seven children (b. 1924–39).

Thereafter he was assistant editor (1927–29), then editor-in-chief (from 1929), of the Catholic Workers tabloid, the Westdeutsche Arbeiterzeitung (later called Kettelerwacht). He used his position with the Kettelerwacht to awaken the consciences of Christian workers to the evil of National Socialism. For this reason the newspaper was shut down in 1938. Nevertheless, Gross continued to publish pamphlets underground to rally opposition to Nazism. He was arrested by the Gestapo (Aug. 12, 1944) and interred at Ravensbrück concentration camp, then in Berlin's Tegel (from September 1944), where he was tortured. Gross was condemned to death by Roland Freisler on Jan. 15, 1945. Following his execution by hanging, his body was incinerated and its ashes scattered.

Nikolaus's cause for beatification was opened in 1997 in the Diocese of Essen. After the issuance of the decree of martyrdom (July 7, 2001), he was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 7, 2001.

Bibliography: J. ARETZ, ed., Nikolaus Gross. Christ—Arbeiterführer—Widerstandskämpfer. Briefe aus dem Gefängnis (Mainz 1993). V. BÜCKER, B. NADORF, M. POTTHOFF, Wie sollen wir vor Gott und unserem Volk bestehen? Der politische und soziale Katholizismus im Ruhrgebiet 1927–1949, (Münster 1999) Christen an der Ruhr, ed. A. POTHMANN and R. HAAS (Essen 1998), 200–220; Martyrologium Germanicum des 20. Jahrhunderts, ed. H. MOLL, (Cologne 2000), 165–169. B. HERMANS, ed., Nikolaus Gross und die katholische Arbeiterbewegung in der NS-Zeit Begleitbuch zur Ausstellung des Bistums Essen in der Alten Synagoge (Essen 1995) 16–25.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GROSS, WILLIAM HICKLEY

Archbishop; b. Baltimore, Md., June 12, 1837; d. Baltimore, Nov. 14, 1898. Gross was the fourth of seven children born to hardware merchant and customs inspector James Gross and Rachel (Haslett) Gross. After attending St. Vincent de Paul parochial school in Baltimore, Gross studied at St. Charles College, Baltimore. Leaving school, he worked as a clerk in his father's store until 1857, when he became a Redemptorist novice. He made his profession in 1858 and undertook philosophical and theological studies at the Redemptorist seminary in Annapolis, Md., where he was ordained on March 21, 1863. For a short time, Gross was chaplain at a nearby Civil War prison camp, after which (1863–71) he specialized as a pulpit orator preaching parish “mission-revivals” in the eastern U.S. His sympathy for the Confederate cause made him particularly successful in Georgia.

William Hickley Gross.

After two years as rector of the Redemptorist Mission Church in Boston, Mass., Gross was named bishop of Savannah, Ga., and was consecrated in Baltimore on April 27, 1873. His diocese contained only 12 priests, and its 20,000 Catholics constituted less than two per cent of Georgia’s postwar population. In his episcopate, the progress of Catholicism was not spectacular. However, a new cathedral was erected in Savannah, a combination college and seminary was established in Macon, and the number of Catholics increased by 25 per cent. Gross was an active participant in the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884, where he contributed to the discussions on the African American apostolate, seminary curriculum, and irremovable pastors. He later supported Cardinal James Gibbons and the “progressive wing” of the American hierarchy on such topics as parochial schools, the rights of labor, the problems of immigrants, the Native American apostolate, and the Catholic attitude toward nativist groups.

In February 1885, Gross became the first native American prelate in the Far West when he was appointed archbishop of Portland, Ore. Included in his province were Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Alaska, and British Columbia. Oregon’s 30,000 Catholics were only eight per cent of the state’s population, and Gross continued to be a missionary bishop. Special concern for Catholic education, the care of orphans, and the needs of the Native American missions marked his thirteen-year episcopate in Oregon. His successful appeals to religious orders led to the establishment of new parishes and schools. The Benedictines and the Christian Brothers opened two colleges and a seminary, and Gross himself founded the Sisters of St. Mary of Oregon.

Bibliography: J. J. O’CONNELL, Catholicity in the Carolinas and Georgia 1820–1878 (New York 1879).

[A. H. SKEABECK]

GROSSETESTE, PSEUDO-

A designation for the author(s) of the many spurious writings (more than 65) attributed to ROBERT GROSSETESTE. Of these works only two, both included in L. Baur’s Die philosophischen Werke des Robert Grosseteste [Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 9 (1912)], are discussed in this article, viz, the Tractatus de anima (242–274) and the Summa philosophiae (275–643).

Tractatus de anima. This is not a complete treatise, but a series of questions on the nature and powers of the soul. In the only known MS (Oxford, Bodleian Library, Digby 104) it is ascribed in a later hand to “Blessed Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln,” but this ascription cannot be maintained. Internal and external evidence led its editor to regard it as “of very doubtful authenticity” (Prolegomena, 113–120). Later research has conclusively shown that this treatise is a mere borrowing from the Summa de Bono (1230–36) of PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, sometimes literal, sometimes free, with many abbreviations, omissions, and transpositions. Hence neither the assertion that it is “one of Grosseteste’s earliest works, written at Paris c. 1208–10,” nor the conjecture that it is a reportatio (a student’s notes) of Philip’s lectures made by Grosseteste while studying at Paris is tenable. Its date is after 1230. Doctrinal considerations also militate against Grosseteste’s authorship.

Summa philosophiae. The question of authorship of this work is still unsolved. Bartholomew of Bologna, ROGER BACON, and ROBERT KILWARDBY have unsuccessful-fully been proposed. Since many features of the Summa seem to indicate an Oxford setting about 1260 to 1270, Bartholomew, suggested by M. Grabmann, is ruled out. Again, although many affinities with some of Bacon's theories are traceable in the Summa, they are insufficient to establish his authorship. Further, the praise of ALEXANDER OF HALES and the unmistakable admiration for ALBERT THE GREAT, whom the author quotes with deference even when disagreeing with his views, contrast strikingly with Bacon's genuine works. The conjecture that St. THOMAS AQUINAS wrote the De ente et essentia against Kilwardby's De ortu scientiarum and that the Summa is Kilwardby's riposte to confute De ente et essentia and to defend his De Ortu [M. Chossat, Archives de philosophie 9 (1932) 480] is most unlikely. Two things are certain; that it is not Grosseteste's and that its author is unknown. But whoever the author, the Summa "expresses with remarkable clarity the reaction of a representative of the early Oxonian tradition against the novelties introduced into theology by St. Thomas Aquinas" (É. H. Gilson, Les Arts du Beau, 274). The Summa is a systematic and impressive restatement of the main theses of the old school: there is the binarium famosissimum (universal hylomorphism and plurality of forms), the soul united to the body by natural inclination rather than by its essence, Intelligences differing individually and not specifically, Platonic Ideas, knowledge by remembrance of innate ideas, denial of distinction of essence and existence, and the rest. The author's estimate of Plato and Aristotle is well balanced: whereas Plato is in many respects superior to Aristotle, Aristotle exceedingly surpasses him in scholarship and is more reliable in philosophy.

Bibliography: Tractatus de Anima. S. H. THOMSON, The Writings of Robert Grosseteste (Cambridge, Eng. 1940); "The De Anima of R. G.," The New Scholasticism 7 (1933) 201–202. L. W. KEELER, "The Dependence of R. G.'s De Anima on the Summa of Philip the Chancellor," ibid. 11 (1937) 197–219. D. A. CALLUS, "Philip the Chancellor and the De Anima ascribed to R. G.," Medieval and Renaissance Studies 1 (1941) 105–127; Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 13 (1946) 225–229. E. BETTONI, "Intorno all'autenticità del De Anima attribuito a R. G.," Pier Lombardo 5 (1961) 3–27. Summa philosophiae. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 265–274, very good. C. K. MCKEON, A Study of the Summa Philosophiae of the Pseudo-Grosseteste (New York 1948). E. BETTONI, "La Dottrina platonica delle idee nella interpretazione dell'autore della S.P.," Mélanges Olgiati (Milan n.d.) 1–24.

[D. A. CALLUS]

GROTE, FEDERICO

German Redemptorist leader in Catholic social action in Argentina; b. Munster, Westphalia, July 16, 1853; d. Buenos Aires, April 30, 1940. Grote studied the humanities at the Gymnasium Paulinum and entered the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer at the age of 17. As a result of the KULTURKAMPF, he was exiled in 1873, lost his German citizenship, and participated in the Catholic socialist movement. In Luxembourg, he studied philosophy and theology and was ordained in 1877–78. Grote was sent to Ecuador as a missionary in 1879. When transferred to Buenos Aires in 1884, he arrived at a grave time for the Church. Grote joined with José Manuel Estrada, Pedro Goyena, and Emilio Lamarca, outstanding leaders of the Catholic Action movement. To help in this militant work, Grote founded the Convent of San Alfonso in Salta. He went out on missions all over the country, spreading the Argentine Catholic social movement. Grote founded Vincentian conferences in the interior and Catholic workers' groups in Buenos Aires. He gave conferences, organized pilgrimages and workers congresses, and fostered insurance organizations. Grote epitomized the first confrontation of modern social problems by the Argentine Church. With the assistance of Bp. Gregorio Ignacio Romero, he prepared a proposal for Argentine labor legislation. Grote attended the dedication of the statue "Christ of the Andes" and on that occasion gave an invocation in Santiago de Chile. In this invocation, he stressed the idea that peace between the two republics was essentially peace between the workers. He founded the Catholic daily El Pueblo (1900), the Christian Democratic League, the weekly Justicia Social (1907), and El Ahorro, a credit union for all Catholic workers' organizations in the country.

Bibliography: A. SANCHEZ GAMARRA, Vida del padre Grote, redentorista: Apóstol social cristiano en hispanoamérica (Madrid 1949).

[V. O. CUTOLO]

GROTIUS, HUGO

Jurist, statesman, humanist, known as the father of international law; b. Delft, Holland, Oct. 10, 1583; d. Rostock, Germany, Aug. 28, 1645. Born into a respectable burgher family, Grotius (Huigh de Groot) was considered a child prodigy. While a boy, he gained international fame for skillful compositions of Latin poetry and was accomplished in the use of Greek and Hebrew. At 15, Grotius had completed not only his studies in jurisprudence at the University of Leiden but also mastery of philosophy, theology, history, and belles lettres.

Career. Grotius began legal practice in 1599 as an advocate at The Hague. In 1604, before the Prize Court of the Dutch Admiralty, he successfully proved the right of a ship commander of the Great United Company of the East Indies to take as a lawful prize the ship and cargo of Portuguese who were harassing Dutch trade in the East Indies. On the basis of this litigation, he wrote his De iure praedae commentarius (Commentary on the Law of Prize) in which he developed his initial system of the law of nations. The manuscript remained unpublished until after its accidental discovery in 1868, except for a portion developing the doctrine of freedom of the high seas that was published in 1609 under the title of Mare liberum. In 1607, Grotius became attorney general of Holland and, in 1615, he became first magistrate of Rotterdam. The Dutch phase of his career then ended abruptly during the religious strife between the moderate, liberal Calvinists (Arminians), to whom he belonged, and the uncompromising, conservative Calvinists (Gomarists). Grotius was profoundly disturbed by the continuing divisions in Calvinism and strove sincerely for unity among all Christians. In 1619, under Prince Maurice of Orange, Grotius was condemned to life imprisonment. He escaped in 1621 and remained in exile virtually all of his remaining life. In 1625, while in France, he completed his monumental work De iure belli ac pacis libri tres (On the Law of War and Peace), which was an immediate success. From 1635 to 1645, he served as the Swedish ambassador to the French court.

Although the hostility of his countrymen was aroused chiefly because of his theological writings, it was Grotius's work in jurisprudence that earned him lasting fame. He wrote several books on Dutch law and history. De iure belli ac pacis was the first concise and systematic treatise on international law, although already formed in nucleus in the earlier De iure praedae. His political theory and legal system did not represent a break but rather the continuance and summation of ideas that had their origin in the writings of Aristotle and the Stoics and came through the medieval school to the modern age. In particular, Grotius was aware of and in accord with the ideas on the law of nature and the law of nations developed shortly before him by the Spanish theologians, among them Francisco de VITORIA (c. 1480–1546) and Francisco SUÁREZ (1548–1617), to whose works he referred.

Natural Law Theory. Grotius held the primary bond between men to be their common rational and social nature. The principles of the latter are known to every mature man and form the basic law governing human relations in all phases, namely, the NATURAL LAW. This law is in conformity with the divine law, although it exists of itself and can be known without revelation. Indeed, Grotius held that it would be the same even if, per impossibile, there were no God, thus admitting for subsequent development a principle that, by reducing reason to nature, radically transformed the concept of natural law. In the theory of Grotius, the natural law is a real law, enforceable by men in case of infringement by a wrongdoer.

It consists in the first place of certain strict commands and prohibitions. These are self-evident, or can be arrived at by conclusions from self-evident principles. However, principles of the law of nature can also be arrived at in another way, "in concluding, if not with absolute assurance, at least with every probability, that that is according to the law of nature which is believed to be such among all nations, or among all those that are more advanced in civilization" (De iure belli 1.1.12.42). Acceptance of the broad consensus on principles of right and justice is thus the second method of determining the law of nature.

But the law of nature is not the only law valid in human communities. It can be supplemented by volitional laws, established by the lawgiver within states based on the consent of the governed, or by custom observed as binding among nations: "For whatever cannot be deduced from certain principles by a sure process of reasoning, and yet is clearly observed everywhere, must have its origin in the free will of man" (ibid.). Thus, according to Grotius, nations are subject in their mutual relations to two laws, the basic law of nature and the supplementary, customary law of nations. It is noteworthy that this distinction was made also by Suárez (De Legibus ac Deo Legislatore 2.19).

As real laws, both the law of nature and the law of nations have their outward sanction in force. The use of force is morally permissible in order to vindicate or defend one's rights, or to punish a wrongdoer. Its ultimate form is WAR, which can be waged when there are no authorities or courts above the wrongdoing and suffering parties. Grotius recognized in substance the scholastic doctrine of the just war (see WAR, MORALITY OF). Every legal right can eventually form a just cause for war. The bulk of his treatise is the quest for these various rights of nations culminating in a system of the law of nations.

As an observant lawyer and practicing statesman, Grotius had to admit that there exist customs among nations that are not necessarily in conformity with the law of nature. Specifically, wars are not always fought for just causes only. He admitted that inevitable ignorance on the part of statesmen sometimes makes recognition of just causes impossible. Similarly, Vitoria had recognized the ignorantia invincibilis. However, Grotius admitted that wars fought between sovereign nations are legal and produce lawful consequences because the customs of nations—sometimes contrary to the law of nature—consider them as such. Thus, he made the important distinction between the "just war" and the "legal, formal, public war." According to Grotius, it is a lesser evil to admit the legality of war and to grant legal status to both belligerents when the latter are sovereign nations. The belligerents and third states thus can be subordinated to strict rules of war and neutrality, which is better than to leave application of force without any check. Nations, while entitled to use force, must observe the agreed upon limitations and should introduce certain temperamenta or mitigations to avoid unnecessary suffering. It is out of these that subsequent developments produced the body of humanitarian rules applicable to belligerents.

The deemphasis of the necessary agreement that must exist between the law of nature and the law of nations and the emphasis on the voluntaristic principle of the consent of nations that Grotius introduced in his justification for the so-called "legal, formal, public or lawful war," where both belligerent parties are legally equal and lawfully employing force, was slowly taken over into all fields of international law. It was not Grotius's intent that this should be so, but nevertheless his teachings became a source of the later development of the positivist conception of international law. In this view, the consent of nations became the highest criterion and basis of all legal obligations. The criterion of the rational and social nature of man, on which Grotius based his legal system, was slowly lost to sight.

See Also: NATURAL LAW IN POLITICAL THOUGHT.

Bibliography: J. TER MEULEN and P. J. J. DIERMANSE, Bibliographie des écrits imprimés de Hugo Grotius (The Hague 1950). H. BASDEVANT, "Hugo Grotius," Les Fondateurs du droit international (Paris 1904). A. H. CHROUST, "Hugo Grotius and the Scholastic Natural Law Tradition," The New Scholasticism 17 (1943) 101–133. J. KOSTERS, "Les Fondaments du droit des gens," Bibliotheca Visseriana 4 (1925). R. FRUIN, "An Unpublished Work of Hugo Grotius," ibid. 5 (1925). W. S. M. KNIGHT, The Life and Work of Hugo Grotius (London 1925). H. LAUTERPACHT, "The Grotian Tradition in International Law," British Yearbook of International Law 23 (1946). P. P. REMEC, The Position of the Individual in International Law according to Grotius and Vattel (The Hague 1960).

[P. P. REMEC]

GROTTAFERRATA, MONASTERY OF

A famous abbey about 12 miles southeast of Rome, Italy, an abbey nullius since 1939, it has long been a center for Greek Catholic BASILIAN monks in the West.

Early History. It was founded near the site of ancient Tusculum by NILUS OF ROSSANO on the ruins, still visible, of a Roman villa, and near a 5th-century chapel. Work on it progressed under Abbots Paul, Cyril, and Bartholomew the Younger (d. 1055). The last-named finished the construction of the church dedicated to Our Lady in the romanesque style with a narthex and atrium, and Pope JOHN XIX consecrated it on Dec. 17, 1024. Through the centuries the building underwent various alterations that changed its original appearance. The interior was remodeled in 1754 in the baroque style, a far from happy choice, by Cardinal Bernardo Gaetano GUADAGNI, to whom the abbey had been given in COMMENDATION, but in 1930 the exterior was restored to its original design. At the entrance of the church there is a portal with excellent bas-reliefs and a mosaic on the tympanum depicting the Deësis, both dating from the 11th century. Within there are lovely mosaics, such as that of Pentecost, from the 12th and 13th centuries, and paintings, such as that of the Trinity, dating from the 13th century, found on the triumphal arch. The icon of the Madonna, dating from the 12th century, is exhibited in a splendid marble shrine by BERNINI. The church is flanked by a small building from the Roman period in the opus quadratum style, employed as a Christian chapel in the 5th century, with windows that have double bars, and this accounts for the name Crypta ferrata given to the monastery and also to the town. The chapel of SS. Nilus and Bartholomew, built in 1131 by Abbot Nicholas II and restored and enlarged in 1610 by Cardinal Odoardo Farnese (d. 1626), is covered with frescoes by Domenichino (d. 1641). Other important work was done on the church and monastery under the patronage of the commendatory Cardinals Alessandro Farnese (d. 1589), Francesco Barberini (d. 1679), and F. Colonna. In particular, Giuliano della Rovere, later Pope JULIUS II, had the abbey palace built between 1485 and 1490 and fortified the monastery by surrounding it with a moat and towers.

Spiritual and Intellectual Life. Originally, the community of Grottaferrata, composed of about 60 members, was organized to observe Byzantine monastic discipline, and was noticeably influenced by the development of STUDION at Constantinople. The records of the first centuries of its existence reveal an intense ascetic and cultural activity and record the growth of its holdings and of the privileges conferred on it by princes and popes. Among the latter was CALLISTUS II, who exempted the monastery from the jurisdiction of the Tusculan bishop. In its monastic SCRIPTORIUM a group of highly skilled copyists worked on a sizable number of codices, many of which are still preserved in situ or in other libraries. Outstanding monks such as Arsenius (fl. 11th century), Luke (fl. 12th century), Sophronius (fl. 12th century), and in particular Bartholomew the Younger, successfully pursued HAGIOGRAPHY and Byzantine HYMNOLOGY. The monastery's vast land holdings made it possible to reclaim some of the wooded and boggy region nearby. A period of decline ensued as a result of the baronial rivalries of COLONNA and ORSINI and coincided with the transfer of the popes to Avignon (see AVIGNON PAPACY) and with the WESTERN SCHISM. From 1462 to 1824 the monastery was under abbots who held the abbey in commendation, all but one of whom were CARDINALS. The first of this series was BESSARION, who fostered a return to earlier ascetic and ritual observances and a renewed interest in studies; but because a compact internal organization was lacking, no lasting effects were noted. This need was supplied in part by the Basilian monastic reform in Italy brought about by GREGORY XIII in 1579; the order accorded Grottaferrata first place in the Roman-Neapolitan province, at the same time establishing a novitiate at the abbey. Another consequence of the reform was the revival in 1608 of the post of claustral abbot, which allowed the restoration of the internal organization, thus creating the atmosphere essential to a reflowering of the religious virtues and a renewed interest in intellectual pursuits.

The Modern Period. The Napoleonic era, during which the community was dispersed, was followed by a slow revival that became more pronounced after LEO XIII; at the request of the monks, Leo decreed in 1881 through the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH the Byzantine character of the monastery. In 1904 the 9th centenary of the founding of Grottaferrata was celebrated with religious and cultural events and programs that created widespread interest. In 1929 the Latin parish was separated from the Greek parish [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 22 (1930) 134–37] and finally in 1937 PIUS XI gave the abbey definitive juridical status, creating it an abbatia nullius, or an exarchal monastery [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 30 (1938) 183–86]. The monastery was granted a pontifical seminary, erected in 1918 by BENEDICT XV for priests of the ITALO-ALBANIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 10 (1918) 419].

The abbey possesses also a specialized library with a valuable collection of Greek codices and a museum with ancient, medieval, and Renaissance works of art, pagan and Christian inscriptions, publications, and coins. Since 1909 it has had its own print shop, which publishes numerous Greek and Slavic liturgical books, and a laboratory for the restoration of old books. Grottaferrata has as dependencies a monastery in Calabria, two in Sicily, and an office in Rome, which serves also as a student center. Two mission houses formerly maintained by the abbey in Albania were closed by the Communist regime in 1945.

Bibliography: A. ROCCHI, De coenobio cryptoferratensi eiusque bibliotheca . . . commentarii (Tusculum 1893); La badia di Grottaferrata (2d ed. Rome 1904). T. MINISCI, Santa Maria di Grottaferrata: La chiesa e il monastero (Grottaferrata 1955). S. KAMBO, I castelli romani: Grottaferrata e Monte Cavo (Bergamo 1922). C. CECHELLI, L'etimologia criptoferratense (Rome 1946). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:1831–42. E. GUAITA BORGHESE, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 2:278–79. G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia (Rome 1961), passim.

[M. PETTA]

GROU, JEAN NICOLAS

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Calais, France, Nov. 23, 1731; d. Lulworth Castle, England, Dec. 13, 1803. He entered the Society of Jesus in November of 1746 and taught humanities at the College of La Flèche from 1751 to 1755. After the suppression of the Jesuits in France, he moved to Lorraine, first to the novitiate house in Nancy and then to the University of Pont-à-Mousson, where he was professor of Greek for two years. During this time he was particularly interested in the study of Plato and Cicero, and produced several important translations of Plato, the République (2 v. Paris 1762), the Lois (2 v. Paris 1769), and the Dialogues (2 v. Amsterdam 1770). With the suppression of the Society in Lorraine in 1766, he returned to Paris and directed a convent of nuns as a secular priest.

After 1770 he turned to the writing of spiritual treatises, for which he is best remembered. His first works were Caractères de la vraie dévotion (Paris 1778), Morale tirée des Confessions de s. Augustin (2 v. Paris 1786), and Maximes spirituelles avec des explications (Paris 1789). Because of the French Revolution, he went to England (1792), where he enjoyed the hospitality of the Thomas Weld family at Lulworth Castle, and remained there the rest of his life. The Méditations en forme de retraite sur l'amour de Dieu (London 1796) provoked accusations of QUIETISM. Grou denied the charge but sought for more precise expression in preparing his next work, L'intérieur de Jésus et de Marie (2 v. Paris 1815). Along with some other Jesuits who sought to reconstitute the society in England, Grou was able to renew his profession shortly before his death.

Grou's spirituality is reminiscent of that of Pierre de BÉRULLE and was strongly influenced by the teaching of Jean Joseph SURIN. While suspicious of the manifestations and jargon of mysticism, he stressed the idea of pure love of God, untainted by self-love. His teaching on the virtue of hope needs to be properly qualified. Among the voluminous manuscripts left after his death, a number have been subsequently edited and published, including Le chrétien sanctifié par l'oraison dominicale (Paris 1832); Manuel des âmes intérieures (Paris 1883), perhaps his best known work; L'école de Jésus-Christ (2 v. Paris 1885); Retraite sur les qualités et les devoirs du chrétien (Paris 1913); and Retraite spirituelle sur la connaissance et l'amour de Jésus-Christ (Paris 1920). Very widely read, Grou's works have gone through numerous editions and have been translated into English, German, Italian, Spanish, Flemish, and Polish.

Bibliography: A. A. CADRÈS, Le Père Jean-Nicolas Grou (2d ed. Paris 1866). P. POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. W. H. MITCHELL et al., 4 v. (Westminster, MD 1922–55) 4:278–284. P. BERNARD, in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1888–90. E. QUÉLÉNNEC, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 5:313–314. C. SOMMERVOGEL, et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932 v. 12, supplement 1960) 3:1868–82. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) ; v. 1 (4th edition 1926) 5.1:830.

[J. C. WILLKE]

GRUEBER, JOHANNES

Jesuit missionary to China and explorer; b. Linz (Austria), Oct. 28, 1623; d. Sárospatak, Hungary, Sept. 30, 1680. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1641 and was sent to China in 1656. There, his knowledge of mathematics brought Grueber to the court in Beijing as an assistant to Father Johann Adam SCHALL VON BELL. In 1661, Grueber was commissioned to go to Rome to explain the extent to which Schall's scientific work as chief of the Bureau of Mathematics and Astronomy involved his cooperating with superstitious attitudes of the Chinese. Since the Dutch were blockading Macau, Grueber boldly set out overland from West China through Kokonor, Tibet, and Nepal to India. His companion on the journey, the Belgian Jesuit Albert D'Orville, died at Agra from the rigors of the trip. News that Grueber had traversed Tibet and the mountain passes of the Himalayas caused a sensation in Europe and gave rise to hopes for an all-land route to the Orient. However, Grueber's accounts of Lhasa and the Himalayas seem to have been quite colorless, and his reports concerning the work and manner of life of Schall were considered severe and unsympathetic. In 1664, Grueber tried without success to return overland to China through Russia. It is known that Grueber took sick and returned to Florence, but his later life is clouded in obscurity.

Bibliography: C. WESSELS, Early Jesuit Travellers in Central Asia (The Hague 1924) 164–204. L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et biographiques sur les Jésuites de l'ancienne mission de Chine 1552–1773 (Shanghai 1932–34) 1:319–322.

[J. H. CAMPANA]

GRUENTHANER, MICHAEL

Scripture scholar; b. Buffalo, N.Y., Oct. 1, 1887; d. St. Marys, Kans., Sept. 14, 1962. Born of German emigrant parents, Gruenthaner completed his elementary and secondary schooling in Buffalo; he entered the Society of Jesus on Aug. 31, 1905, and was ordained on June 27, 1920. He pursued graduate studies in Sacred Scripture at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome, where he earned the doctorate in Sacred Scripture (1928), becoming one of the first Americans to hold this degree.

Gruenthaner's Biblical career coincided with the exciting years of great advancement of Catholic Biblical studies, and his pioneering work contributed much to this movement in the United States. He taught Sacred Scripture and allied subjects at St. Mary's College, St. Marys, Kans. (1931–61), The Catholic University of America (1941–51), and St. Mary's College, South Bend, Ind. (1943–56), where he served also as chancellor of the Graduate School of Sacred Theology for Laywomen. He was one of the founders of the Catholic Biblical Association of America; he served as the second editor (1941–51) of The Catholic Biblical Quarterly, to which he contributed many scholarly articles, especially on the Book of Daniel. His diligence, skill, and faith in the competence of his colleagues not only assured this journal's survival, but also raised it to its present recognized status. Gruenthaner died 17 days before his 75th birthday, which was marked by the appearance of a testimonial volume in his honor: The Bible in Current Catholic Thought.

Bibliography: F. A. PETRU, The Bible in Current Catholic Thought, ed. J. L. MCKENZIE (New York 1962) 1–6. R. NORTH, "A Frontier Jerome: Gruenthaner," American Ecclesiastical Review 148 (1963) 289–302; 398–411; 149 (1963) 41–50. F. S. ROSSITER, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 24 (1962) 432–434.

[F. A. PETRU]

GRUNDTVIG, NIKOLAI FREDERIK SEVERIN

Danish writer and theologian whose ideas of education resulted in the folk high school movement; b. Udby, near Vordingborg, Sealand, Sept. 8, 1783; d. Copenhagen, Sept. 2, 1872. His forefathers for generations had been civil servants and clergymen of the Danish State Church, and his father was rector of Udby. Grundtvig won his degree in theology in 1803 but did not take orders immediately, as he was, according to himself, "without spirit and without faith." After a few years as a private tutor, he engaged in studies of Scandinavian mythology and history. Nordens Mytologi (1808, Scandinavian Mythology) was a result of this interest, as are his translations of Saxo Grammaticus and Snorri Sturluson. In 1820 he published his translation of Beowulf, and in the following years devoted much of his energy to the study of Old English literature. Ordained in 1811, he was for a few years curate to his father, and then briefly rector of Praestø, Sealand.

For the rest of his life Grundtvig lived in Copenhagen, studying and producing an almost endless series of pamphlets and articles on Christianity, history, education, nationalism, and politics. His fearless writings brought him into conflict with ecclesiastical authorities, and he was for some years under censure. In his theology he opposed the Lutheran neorationalism and stressed the importance of the sacraments of baptism and communion. His teaching (known as Grundtvigianism) has had many followers and is still a force in the established church. Related to his pastoral work as minister to an independent congregation in Copenhagen (1839–72) are his c. 1,400 hymns, of which 270 can be found in the hymnal of the State Church (the most important contribution by one author). In Salme-og bønnebog, the hymnal of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Copenhagen, 27 of Grundtvig's hymns are included. A great number of Danish versions of medieval Latin hymns and sequences are notable. He was, however, an ardent patriot; he emphasized the importance of Danish literature and history over Latin and other traditional academic disciplines in his plans for the folk high schools, which he conceived as schools of "the living word." A church in Copenhagen is dedicated to his memory.

Bibliography: N. F. S. GRUNDTVIG, Værker i udvalg (Copenhagen 1940–49). F. V. RÖNNING, N. F. S. Grundtvig, 4 v. (Copenhagen 1907–14). C. S. PETERSEN and V. ANDERSEN, Illustreret dansk litteraturhistorie, 4 v. (Copenhagen 1924–34) 3:141–217, 4:853–855 (references). S. JOHANSEN, Bibliografi over N. F. S. Grundtvigs skrifter, 4 v. (Copenhagen 1948–54). H. KOCH, Grundtvig, tr. L. JONES (Yellow Springs, Ohio 1952).

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

GRÜNEWALD, MATTHIAS (MATHIS GOTHART NITHART)

A great German religious painter whose works are marked by deep emotional content; b. Würzburg, 1455–80; d. Halle, August 1528. Grünewald spent most of his life in the upper Rhine area and received commissions mainly from the archbishop of Mainz, the Dominicans in Frankfurt, the Antonites at Isenheim, and the cardinal Albrecht of Brandenburg. At the time of his death, he was siding secretly with the Reformation.

The "Portrait of a Young Artist" (c. 1495; Art Institute, Chicago), considered by some as an early work of Grünewald, shows affinities with the style of Master WB. With the "Mocking of Christ" (c. 1504; Pinakothek, Munich) and his various Crucifixions, Grünewald manifests the intensity of his own style. Fascinated by the subject of the Crucifixion and inspired by the Revelations of St. BRIDGET OF SWEDEN, Grünewald created masterpieces that document the spirit of his time. His greatest work, the Isenheim Altarpiece, a polyptych, was commissioned by Guido Guersi, preceptor of the Antonites at Isenheim (1512–17; Unterlindmuseum, Colmar). It consists of nine painted panels showing the Annunciation, Nativity, Crucifixion, Lamentation, and Resurrection, and scenes from the life of St. Anthony. The Crucifixion is a unique and deeply moving creation that combines horror and mystical elevation. The Resurrection, with its etherealized Christ, probably expresses the concepts of the SPIRITUALISTS. His other masterpiece is the "Meeting of St. Erasmus and St. Maurice" (Pinakothek, Munich). Grünewald's works have provided 20th-century expressionism with a source of inspiration.

Bibliography: H. A. SCHMID, Mathias Grünewald, Gemälde und Zeichnungen (Strasbourg 1907–11). H. NAUMANN, Das Grünewaldproblem (Jena 1930). G. SCHOENBERGER, The Drawings of Mathis Gothart Nithart, Called Gruenewald (New York 1948). N. PEVSNER and M. MEIER, Grünewald (New York 1958). A. WEIXL-GÄRTNER, Matthias Grünewald (Vienna 1962). K. SITZMANN and E. BATTISTI, Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959–) 7:182–191, extensive bibliog.

[G. GALAVARIS]

GUADAGNI, BERNARDO GAETANO

Cardinal bishop; b. Florence, Sept. 14, 1674; d. Rome, Jan. 15, 1759. He received his doctorate in civil and Canon Law in Pisa in 1694 and was a canon in the cathedral at Florence when he entered the Discalced Carmelite Order in 1700, taking the name John Anthony of St. Bernard. After serving as provincial of the Tuscan Province, he was named bishop of Arezzo in 1724. When Clement XII was elected pope, Guadagni, his nephew, was summoned to Rome, created a cardinal in 1731, and appointed to the Curia. During three pontificates he served as secretary to the Consistory, counselor to many other congregations, and vicar of Rome, from 1732 to 1759. He was made bishop of Frascati in 1750 and of Porto and S. Rufina in 1756. He was a man of eminent virtue, devoted to the reform of morals and the care of the poor; his cause for beatification was introduced in 1761 and 1763. He was the first cardinal of the Discalced Carmelites. (see CARMELITES, DISCALCED)

Bibliography: Bibliotheca Carmelitana, ed. P. WESSELS (Rome 1927). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico 2:280. V. A. S. MARIA, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 4:1256–57.

[P. T. ROHRBACH]

GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.

Also known as Martyrs of the Cristero Movement, or Cristobal Magallanes and 24 Companions; d. 1915–1937, Mexico. Jubilee 2000 was a watershed year for Catholicism in Mexico. In 1992, after 150 years of antireligious laws that forced the Church into near obscurity, laws such as those forbidding the wearing of a religious habit in public were rescinded. In 2000, the first National Eucharistic Congress was convened since just before the latest government persecution (1924–34), which sparked the uprising of the Cristero Rebellion (see MEXICO, MODERN). Most of the 22 priests and three lay martyrs (David Roldán Lara, his cousin Salvador Lara Puente, and Manuel Morales) included in this group were victims of that persecution in the area around Guadalajara; however, a few testify to the sufferings of earlier periods. The causes of martyrs from other areas of Mexico have been opened, but are on a different course.

The martyrs by year of their deaths, with their age in parentheses, are:

1915: David GALVÁN BERMÚDEZ (34 years old).

1926: David ROLDÁN LARA (24); Luis BATIZ SAINZ (55); Manuel MORALES (28); and Salvador LARA PUENTE (21).

1927: Agustín (Augustine) CALOCA CORTÉS (29); Cristóbal (Christopher) MAGALLANES JARA (57); David URIBE VELASCO (37); Jenaro SÁNCHEZ DELGADILLO (50); José Isabel Flores VARELA (60); José María Robles HURTADO (39); Julio Alvarez MENDOZA (60); Margarito Flores GARCÍA (28); Mateo Correa MAGALLANES (60); Miguel de la MORA (49); Pedro Esqueda RAMÍREZ (46); Rodrigo Aguilar ALEMÁN (52); Román Adame ROSALES (68); and Sabás Reyes SALAZAR (about 43–47).

1928: Atilano Cruz ALVARADO (26); Jesús Méndez MONTOYA (47); Justino Orona MADRIGAL (51); Toribio Romo GONZÁLEZ (27); and Tranquilino Ubiarco ROBLES (29).

1937: Pedro de Jesús Maldonado LUCERO (44).

These courageous martyrs were beatified Nov. 22, 1992, by Pope John Paul II. He approved a miracle attributed to their intercession on June 28, 1999, and canonized them in Rome during the Jubilee of Mexico, May 21, 2000. Cardinal Juan Sandoval Iñiguez laid the first stone of the “Shrine of Martyrs,” Oct. 25, 2000, which will seat 20,000 once it is completed for the 2004 International Eucharistic Congress.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). D. C. BAILEY, ¡Viva Cristo Rey! The Cristero Rebellion and the Church-State Conflict in Mexico (Austin 1974). V. CEJA REYES, Los cristeros: crónica de los que perdieron (México, D.F. 1981) 2 v. J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979). F. P. DOOLEY, Los cristeros, Calles y el catolicismo mexicano, tr. M. E. MARTÍNEZ NEGRETE DEFFIS (México, D.F. 1976). P. GULISANO, Viva Cristo Re: Cristeros: il martirio del popolo del Messico, 1926–29 (Rimini 1999). V. GARCÍA JUÁREZ, Los cristeros (Fresnillo, Zac. 1990). L. LÓPEZ BELTRÁN, La persecución religiosa en México: Carranza, Obregón, Calles, Portes Gil (México 1987). J. A. MEYER, La cristiada, (México 1997), 4 v.; La cristiada en Colima (Colima, México 1993); La cristiade (Paris 1975), Eng. tr. R. SOUTHERN, The Cristero Rebellion: The Mexican People between Church and State, 1926–1929 (Cambridge 1976); Apocalypse et révolution au Mexique (Paris 1974). Y. PADILLA RANGEL, El Catolicismo social y el movimiento Cristero en Aguascalientes (Aguascalientes 1992). J. RODRÍGUEZ INZUNZA, El mundo de los cristeros campesinos: iglesia y estado en conflicto, México, 1926–1929 (Azcapotzalco, D.F. 1988). M. ROMO DE ALBA, El gobernador de las estrellas (México, D.F. 1986)

Engraving of Matthias Grünewald.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GUADALUPE, OUR LADY OF

Founded on an old tradition, this image and sanctuary is one of the most famous in all Latin America, and devotion to it has increased in modern times. According to tradition, on Dec. 9, 1531, JUAN DIEGO, a man more than 50 years old, saw the Virgin Mary at Tepeyac, a hill northwest of Mexico City. She instructed him to have the bishop build a church on the site. Three days later in a second appearance she told Juan Diego to pick flowers and take them to the bishop. When he presented them as instructed, roses fell out of his mantle and beneath them was the painted image of the Lady.

Pilgrims carrying image of the Virgin of Guadalupe to Church of Our Lady of Guadalupe, San Cristobal de las Casas, Mexico. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Documentary Basis. The oldest documentary evidence of this event comes from the interpreter. Since Juan Diego did not know Spanish and Bishop Zumárraga did not know the Indian language, Juan González served as interpreter. González was, at 18, a fortune seeker whom the bishop had sheltered, taught, and ordained, and who became a canon of the cathedral. After Zumárraga died, González gave up his canonry and devoted himself to the evangelization of the native peoples. At the same time he left his papers to Juan de Tovar, whose brief summary of them in Nahuatl was kept in the library of Tepozotlán because Tovar entered the Society of Jesus in 1572. The summary is preserved in the Biblioteca Nacional de México and is of importance as a document based on the evidence given by a witness to the meeting of Juan Diego and Bishop Zūmárraga. However, it is not a detailed account.

A better-known document is the Valeriano Relation, drawn up between 1560 and 1570. It was written by Valeriano and a group of Native Mexicans under the direction of Fray Bernardino de SAHAGÚN. First used by Miguel Sánchez, the document was published by Luis Lazo de la Vega in 1649. There are manuscript copies in several North American libraries, and in Paris a version prepared by Picardo in the 18th century. It has two parts: a direct account of the event, the nucleus of the tradition, and an account of the miracles worked in the sanctuary or through the invocation of the Virgin Mary in this manifestation. The first part, prepared by the students of Tlatelolco under Sahagún's direction, is arranged in a literary fashion, according to Nahuatl stylistics, but the facts coincide with those in the Tovar document. The account of the miracles, also written in Nahuatl, is much later and includes events of the 17th century. Thus it is most important for the study of the progress of the devotion and the cult in that century. Some have attributed this part of the Relation to Carlos de Alva Ixtlilxóchitl. There is little evidence for this, although the document is contemporary with the Texcocan historian.

Among the minor documents are at least 15 Anales de los Indios. These give communal testimony of the most notable happenings in the native world and include many references to the Tepeyac apparitions. While it has been stated that Bishop Zumárraga made special reports on this event, none are extant; and it is probable that none were ever written. Reports on such supposed supernatural events were not required until the Council of Trent.

The second archbishop of Mexico, Alonso de Montúfar, was a great promoter of the devotion to Our Lady of Guadalupe. In the Provincial Council of 1555, he, along with other bishops, formulated canons that indirectly approved the apparitions, for the order to abolish and prevent the worship of images and the propagation of traditions not well founded did not mention the Guadalupean image and devotion to it. Canon 72 ordered the examination of songs sung at native feasts and dances for taint of paganism; some testimony indicates that these included songs in honor of the apparition of Mary, but no authentically Guadalupean songs are extant. In 1666 a formal inquiry was made from February 18 to March 22 in order to give authority to the tradition. Information concerning the endurance of the tradition and the general belief in it was given by witnesses, some of them centenarians. References to early events are vague and rather weak. The investigation was not canonical or timely, since it was held 135 years after the event. Another was made in 1723, by order of Archbishop Lanziego y Eguilaz. These have no value except to bear witness to the permanence of the tradition. Of even less value are some of the inquiries that were held during the 19th century.

Cult and Its Extension. The first sanctuary was erected about 1533. It is the little hermitage that rests in the foundations of what was for many years a parish church. In 1556 Archbishop Montúfar began the erection of this second church. In 1695 the first stone of the new sanctuary was laid in the place it now occupies. The sanctuary was solemnly dedicated in 1709. With the additions made in 1893 and the following years, and again in the 1930s, this was the basilica of 1964. However, plans were then being made for a new church.

The image was carried to various parts of the world, particularly after the religious of the Society of Jesus were expelled from the Spanish dominions (1767). But the diffusion had started even earlier. In Italy and France the image and the tradition were already known. In 1564 Andrés De URDANETA carried an image with him on the first formal expedition to the Philippine Islands. One was taken to Puerto Rico. Those who returned from the Indies spread the devotion in Spain. A well-known image is to be found in Trent and another, which made miraculous demonstrations in 1796, is now located in Rome, where it is enshrined in the church of S. Nicola in Carcere Tulliano.

Image of Our Lady of Guadalupe, preserved in the sanctuary of Guadalupe.

In 1746 the knight BOTURINI BENADUCCI promoted the solemn and official coronation of the image. The coronation took place in 1895, with pontifical authority and the attendance of a great part of the episcopate of the Americas. This coronation was made later in various parts of the world: in Santa Fé, Argentina (1928) and later in Los Angeles, Calif., in several places in Europe, and even in Asia, where the image was placed in a Hindu temple.

In 1737 the Most Holy Mary of Guadalupe was chosen as the patroness of the city of Mexico. In the course of the year, other important cities of the country followed suit. In 1746 the patronage was accepted for all of New Spain, which then embraced the regions from Upper California to Guatemala and El Salvador. In 1754 Benedict XIV approved the patronage and granted a Mass and Office proper to the celebration of the feast on December 12. In 1757 the Virgin of Guadalupe was declared patroness of the citizens of Ciudad Ponce in Puerto Rico. In 1910 Pius X declared the Virgin Patroness of Latin America, and in 1935 Pius XI extended the patronage to the Philippines. Pius XII, speaking in 1945 on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the coronation, stated that the Virgin of Guadalupe was the “Queen of Mexico and Empress of the Americas” and that she had been painted “by brushes that were not of this world.” John XXIII assisted at a coronation in a church in Rome and gave the image special praise in his brief discourse. On January 22, 1999, Pope Paul II declared Our Lady of Guadalupe the Patroness of the Americas. By a decree dated March 25, 1999, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of Sacraments mandated the obligatory celebration of the Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe on December 12 throughout the Americas.

Bibliography: A. M. GARIBAY K., “La maternidad espiritual de María en el Mensaje Guadalupano,” La maternidad espiritual de María (Mexico City 1961). D. DEMAREST and C. TAYLOR, eds., The Dark Virgin: The Book of Our Lady of Guadalupe: A Documentary Anthology (Freeport, Me. 1956). J. GARCÍA ICAZBALCETA, Investigación histórica y documental sobre la aparición de la Virgen de Guadalupe (Mexico City 1952). P. F. VELÁZQUEZ, La aparición de santa María de Guadalupe (Mexico City 1931). J. RODRIGUEZ, Our Lady of Guadalupe: Faith and Empowerment among Mexican-American Women (Austin, Tex. 1994). S. POOLE, Our Lady of Guadalupe: The Origins and Sources of a Mexican National Symbol, 1531–1797 (Tucson, Ariz 1995). V.P. ELIZONDO, Guadalupe, Mother of the New Creation (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1997). L. L. DE LA VEGA, trans. L. SOUSA, S. POOLE, et al. The Story of Guadalupe: Luis Laso de la Vega’s Huei tlamahuiçoltica of 1649 (Stanford, Calif. 1998). D.A. BRADING, Mexican Phoenix: Our Lady of Guadalupe: Image and Tradition Across Five Centuries (Cambridge, UK/New York 2001)

[A. M. GARIBAY K./EDS.]

GUAL, PEDRO

Franciscan missionary, apologist, founder and restorer of influential religious institutions in Peru; b. Canet del Mar, Barcelona, Spain, 1813; d. Lima, 1890. Gual was educated in Italy. He arrived at the Peruvian Missionary College of Ocopa in 1845 and, in 1852, he created the famous missionary college of the Descalzos in Lima. Gual became a general commissary of the order, in charge of missionary colleges and visitor of the Franciscan provinces. From the beginning, Gual was the soul of the religious restoration initiated by Andrés HERRERO in the South American Pacific republics. Gual founded or consolidated the string of Colegios de Propaganda Fide that arose in Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Ecuador, and Colombia. He was an untiring promotor and organizer, by his example and writings, of the missions popular among the faithful. He attacked the enemies of the Church, Jansenists, Liberals, Masons, and atheists, with his vigorous lectures and publications, which he directed especially against Renan, Jacolliot, and De Santis. These publications were widely circulated among the educated Peruvians. He also successfully refuted Vigil and other Peruvian writers who spread heretical and demoralizing doctrines in his Equilibrio entre las dos potestades (1852), La Moralizadora del mundo (1862), La Vida de Jesús (1869), La India cristiana (1880), and many others.

Bibliography: H. A. BIERCK, Vida pública de don Pedro Gual (Caracas 1976).

[O. SAIZ]

GUALA OF BERGAMO, BL.

Dominican bishop; b. Bergamo, Lombardy, Italy, c. 1180; d. Astino, Sept. 3, 1244. When (St.) DOMINIC preached at Bergamo in 1217 Guala (Walter) Roni (Romanoni) received from him the habit of the DOMINICANS. In 1221 he became prior of the convent at Brescia. At this time he had a vision of the glory of Dominic, whose death, unknown to Guala, had just occurred. He founded the convent at Bergamo (1222), was associated with the founding of the nuns' convent of St. Agnes at Bologna (1225), and soon after became prior of St. Nicholas in that city. Both HONORIUS III and GREGORY IX recognized his prudence and tact by employing him on difficult missions. In 1229–30 he became bishop of Brescia where he continued his diplomatic activities. Exiled from his see in 1239, Guala spent his last years in penitential retirement with the Benedictines at Astino. Pius IX beatified him in 1868.

Feast: Sept. 3.

Bibliography: Année Dominicaine, September 1:67–77 (Lyons 1900). A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 2:282. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:482–483. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1258.

[M. J. FINNEGAN]

GUANELLA, LUIGI, BL.

Religious founder; b. Fraciscio di Campodolcino (Sondrio), Italy, Dec. 19, 1842; d. Como, Italy, Oct. 24, 1915. The son of poor parents, Guanella entered the seminary (1854) and was ordained (1866). During his pastoral labors in the village of Savogno, he showed so much concern for the spiritual and temporal needs of his parishioners that they erected a monument in his honor shortly after his death. While pastor in Pianello Lario, Guanella opened a hospice for orphaned and abandoned children (1878) and then transferred its headquarters to Como, where he opened the House of Divine Providence (1886).

He started similar institutions in several other Italian cities. To perpetuate his work, Guanella founded the DAUGHTERS OF ST. MARY OF PROVIDENCE and also a religious congregation for men, the Servants of Charity, originally (1904) known as the Sons of the Sacred Heart. The Servants of Charity (or Opera Don Guanella), who received definitive papal approval in 1928, had 600 members in 1963. Both institutes have spread to Switzerland and the Western Hemisphere. Visits to these regions stimulated Guanella to aid Italian immigrants. Through his friendships with Davide ALBERTARIO and Giuseppe TONIOLO, he also became a pioneer leader in solving the social question. Guanella promoted the apostolate of the press and wrote about 50 popular devotional, historical, and pedagogical works. He was beatified Oct. 25, 1964.

Feast: Oct. 24.

Bibliography: L. MAZZUCCHI, La vita, lo spirito e le opere di don Luigi Guanella (Como 1920). A. TAMBORINI, Don Luigi Guanella (Como 1943). L. CARINI ALIMANDI, Luigi Guanella: per le vie del quarto mondo (Rome 1978). P. PELLEGRINI, Don Guanella inedito: negli scritti di Piero Pellegrini, ed. A. DI GUEZ and N. MINETTI (Rome 1993).

[V. A. LAPOMARDA]

GUARANTEES, LAW OF

Law of Kingdom of ITALY that was intended to solve the ROMAN QUESTION after the Seizure of the STATES OF THE CHURCH, including Rome itself, by legislating certain guarantees for the dignity and independence of the pope and the Holy See and by separating Church and State in peninsula (May 13, 1871).

Contents. In the preliminary discussions a moderate Catholic group in the Chamber opposed the proposed act as unilateral, injurious to the Church's liberty and lacking in international standing. Laicists among the delegates insisted that concessions to the pope, save very limited ones, would be incompatible with national security, integrity and sovereignty. The final text represented a view moderately liberal, yet hostile to the Church. The principal provisions of its 19 articles follow. The pope's person is declared sacred and inviolable (art. 1). Attempts against his person are punishable and are as serious as those against the king (art. 2). Sovereign honors and the preeminence of honor recognized by Catholic rulers are to be rendered by the Italian government to the pope, who may maintain his customary number of guards (art. 3). The Holy See is to receive in perpetuity an annual, tax-exempt grant of 3,224,000 lire (art. 4). The pope shall continue to enjoy the Vatican and Lateran palaces and the villa at CASTEL GANDOLFO, which are inalienable and tax-exempt, as are the museums, library, art and archeological collections therein; but the Holy See must defray the costs of maintenance and salaries (art. 4, 5). State officials are forbidden to enter the papal palaces or the place of a conclave or ecumenical council, or to examine or seize documents of papal congregations engaged in spiritual functions (art. 7, 8). Foreign envoys to the Holy See are to enjoy all the usual prerogatives and immunities accorded in international law (art. 11). The pope may engage unhindered in correspondence by mail or telegram with the entire episcopate and Catholic world (art. 12). The royal exequatur and placet are abolished, except for acts disposing of ecclesiastical property or benefices outside Roman and its suburbicarian sees. Civil laws concerning ecclesiastical institutions and the alienation of their goods remain in force (art. 16). The conservation and administration of church properties in Italy are to be handled in later laws (art. 18). [For the full Italian text, see H. Bastgen, Die romische Frage, 3 v. (Frankfort 1917-19) 1:676-677. For an English translation, see J. Carrere, The Pope (London n.d.) 264-268]

Papal Attitude. A very grave defect in this legislation was its unilateral character, its attempt to determine the prerogatives of a sovereign whose rights could not be subject to limits or conditions set by another authority. This flaw resulted from the desire to establish the pope's juridical position "within the Italian state" by domestic legislation subject to revocation or suspension at any time at the will of the civil power and bereft of international recognition.

PIUS IX (1846-78) solemnly repudiated the law in the encyclical Ubi nos (May 15, 1871) and refused the financial offer. He and his successors abstained from any act implying recognition of the legislation and withdrew into the Vatican as voluntary prisoners. Thereby they avoided the law's application insofar as it involved equality of pope and king in the reception of formal honors. They also escaped the possible reproach of traversing the Eternal City as claimants.

Ineffectiveness. In carrying out the Law of Guarantees the Italian government did not always live up to its promises, as is clear from the incidents at Pius IX's funeral and the criticisms of the popes allowed in the Italian press. The one point in which the law proved operative was in its recognition of the right of active and passive diplomatic representation. Even here grave difficulties arose during World War I. Many jurists and publicists then sought an authoritative act suspending the law, thereby demonstrating the precariousness of prerogatives unilaterally conceded to the papacy. Italy limited the right of representation by insisting that the Holy See suggest to the Central Powers the transference of their diplomatic headquarters to Switzerland.

See Also: ROMAN QUESTION.

Bibliography: H. BASTGEN, Die romische Frage, 3 v. (Frankfurt 1917–19) 1:676–677. J. CARRERE, The Pope (London n.d.) 264–268. F. SCADUTO, Garantigie pontificie e relazioni tra Stato e Chiesa (Turin 1884). A. GALANTE, Manuale I diritto ecclesiastico (Milan 1914).

[R. MORI]

GUARDINI, ROMANO

Philosopher of the Christian world view and prolific writer on theological topics; b. Verona, Italy, Feb. 17, 1885; d. Munich, Germany, Oct. 1, 1968. Guardini grew up mostly in Mainz, where his father was Italian consul. His education, however, was German and he decided to stay in Germany as an adult. (His “European” rather than nationalist spirit was recognized in the conferral of the Erasmus Prize on him in 1962.) After trying chemistry and economics at the university he turned to theology and the priesthood (1910). From 1923 to 1939 (when he was turned out by the Nazi regime) he occupied a chair created for him at the University of Berlin as “professor for philosophy of religion and Catholic Weltanschauung.” After the war similar positions were made for him first at Tübingen and then in Munich (1948–63).

Guardini’s eminence among leaders and inspirers of Catholic renewal in the years between the two world wars started in 1918 with the publication of The Spirit of the Liturgy. There soon followed The Church and the Catholic (1923), introduced by words for which he has become famous: “A religious process of incalculable importance has begun—the Church is coming to life in the souls of men.” He showed himself perceptive in the extreme in thus picking up and nurturing the elements of spirituality which would characterize all that was best in the life of the Catholic Church of the next decades. In German-speaking lands there is no one who deserves more to be called a precursor of Vatican Council II.

His influence was enormous, not only through his university position in Berlin, but above all by reason of the inspiration he gave to the vigorous German Catholic youth movement as chaplain of the Quickborn. His writings include works on meditation, education, literary figures such as Dante and Rilke, art, philosophy, and theology. His life of Christ, The Lord (1937), became his most famous work. Das Wesen des Christentums (1939, untranslated) explained the approach he took in The Lord. The common background of the immense variety of subjects he treated was his philosophical theory of polar opposition (Der Gegensatz, 1925). This proved to be an extraordinarily fruitful starting point from which to bring revelation (Religion und Offenbarung, 1950) and worldly reality (Welt und Person, 1939; The End of the Modern World, 1950; Power and Responsibility, 1951) into a synthesis.

Bibliography: A. BABOLIN, Romano Guardini, Filosofo dell’Alterità (Bologna 1968–69). H. URS VON BALTHASAR, Romano Guardini: Reform aus dem Ursprung (Munich 1970). W. DIRKS in Tendenzen der Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert, ed. H. J. SCHULTZ (Stuttgart, Olten 1966) 248–252. H. ENGELMANN and F. FERRIER, Romano Guardini (Paris 1966). F. HENRICH, Die Bünde katholischer Jugendbewegung (Munich 1968). K. HOFFMAN, “Portrait of Father Guardini,” Commonweal 60 (Sept. 17, 1954) 575–577. J. LAUBACH in Theologians of Our Time, ed. L. REINISCH (Notre Dame 1964) 109–126. H. KUHN, Romano Guardini. Der Mensch und das Werk (Munich 1961). B. MONDIN, I grandi teologi del secolo ventesimo (Turin 1969) 1.89–120. R. A. KRIEG, Romano Guardini: A Precursor of Vatican II (Notre Dame 1997). Wege zur Wahrheit: Die bleibende Bedeutung von Romano Guardini, ed. J. CARDINAL RATZINGER (Düsseldorf 1985). La Weltanschauung christiana di Romano Guardini, ed. S. ZUCAL (Trent 1988).

[P. MISNER]

GUARINUS OF PALESTRINA, ST.

Cardinal bishop of Palestrina; b. Bologna, Italy, c. 1080; d. Palestrina, Italy, Feb. 6, 1159. Guarinus was already a cleric when he joined the AUGUSTINIANS at Mortara (c. 1104). When the bishop of Pavia died (c. 1139), Guarinus was elected to the see by popular acclamation. Imprisoned for his steadfast refusal to accept that honor, he managed to escape his confinement only to be required (1144) by order of Pope LUCIUS II, a Bolognese, to become cardinal and bishop of Palestrina, one of the suburbicarian dioceses of Rome. Guarinus’s exemplary youth, studious and mortified monastic life, love of the poor, and extraordinary virtue as a bishop prompted Pope ALEXANDER III, another Bolognese, to effect his CANONIZATION immediately after his death. The hospital of St. Job at Bologna reveres him as its founder, and the Canons Regular of the LATERAN honor him as a patron. His life was written by his contemporary, Augustine of Pavia.

Feast: Feb. 6.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 1 (1863) 923–925. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 1:264–265.

[N. M. RIEHLE]

GUARINUS (GUÉRIN) OF SION, ST.

Bishop of Sion; b. Pont-à-Mousson, Lorraine, France, c. 1065; d. Aulps (near Geneva), Savoy, Aug. 27, 1150. Guarinus entered the BENEDICTINE Order in the Abbey of MOLESME c. 1085. In about 1094, he joined a group that had left Molesme for a more retired life at Aulps in Savoy, and he became second abbot of the new foundation c. 1110. St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX visited Aulps c. 1133–35 and later wrote a fine letter of congratulations to Guarinus, who had his monastery incorporated into the CISTERCIAN Order in 1136. In 1138, Guarinus became bishop of Sion in Switzerland. He died during a visit to Aulps and was buried there. He is still venerated extensively in Savoy and the Valais.

Feast: Jan. 6, Aug. 30 (Diocese of Sion), Jan. 14 (Cistercians).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 1:347–348, 730. J. F. GONTHIER, Vie de saint Guérin (Annecy 1896). U. CHEVALIER, Répetoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge: Topobibliographie (Paris 1894–1903) 1:1919. A. DIMIER, “San Guarino, abad de los Alpes y obispo de Sion,” Cistercium 4 (1952) 89–95. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Epistolae 142 and 254, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 182:297–298, 459–462. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux salon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 1:125–128. C. LUGON, “Une Étape vers l’indépendance du Valais. Saint Guérin chef temporel,” Bulletin du Diocèse de Sion 6–7 (1965) 271–302; Saint Guérin, abbé d’Aulps, évêque de Sion (Geneva 1970).

[M. STANDAERT]

GUASTALLA, COUNCIL OF

Reform council held under Pope PASCHAL II in Guastalla, a town between Verona and Mantua, in northern Italy. When legates of the new emperor, HENRY V, invited Paschal to Germany to stabilize the Church’s position there after the upsets of the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE, the pope held a council in the church of St. Peter near Guastalla on Oct. 22, 1106, attended by Henry’s embassy, many bishops, priests, and laymen. The pope renewed the prohibition of lay investiture; granted general pardon to bishops and priests excommunicated during the recent empire-papacy conflicts; confirmed ordinations conferred by schismatic ministers, except in cases of intrusion, SIMONY, and concubinage; and took measures to restore discipline. The council detached from the province of Ravenna the Dioceses of Piacenza, Parma, Reggio, Modena, and Bologna.

Bibliography: C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d’après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 5.1:496–497. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98); reprinted and continued by L. PETIT and J. B. MARTIN, 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–) 20:1209–16. N. PELLICELLI, Concilio di Guastalla (Parma 1906). U. BLUMENTAL, “Some Notes on Papal Policies at Guastalla, 1106,” MELANGES G. FRANSEN, vol. 1 (Rome 1976), 59–77.

[A. CONDIT]

Capital: Guatemala City.

Size: 42,042 sq. miles.

Population: 12,639,939 in 2000.

Languages: Spanish; more than 20 Amerindian languages are spoken in various regions.

Religions: 7,583,963 Roman Catholics (60%), 4,423,978 Evangelical Protestants (35%); 631,998 other, including indigenous Mayan beliefs.

Archdioceses: Guatemala City, with suffragans Escuintla, Jalapa en Guatemala, Santa Rosa de Lima, Vera Paz, and Zacapa y Santo Cristo de Esquipulas; Los Altos/Quetzaltenango-Totonicapán, with suffragans Huehuetenango, San Marcos, Sololá-Chimaltenango, Suchitepéquez-Retalhuleu, and Quiché. There are apostolic vicarates located at El Petén and Izabal.

GUASTO, ANDREA DEL

Founder and superior of the Congregation Centorbi; b. Castrogiovanni, Sicily, Aug. 16, 1534; d. Regalbuto, Sept. 7, 1627. Under the direction of Philip Dulcettus, Guasto joined a group of about 200 hermits on the mountains around Argira. Guasto possessed a reputation of sanctity. At his suggestion, the hermits changed from the Third Order of St. Francis to the First Order of St. Augustine. On Feb. 2, 1579, Pope GREGORY XIII approved the change, but only after the president of Sicily lent his support did Andrea and 12 confreres receive the Augustinian habit on May 22, 1585, from Melchior Testai of Regalbuto, their first moderator. In 1591, the remaining hermits were disalced and led a common life, living from the work of their hands. The Congregatio heremitarum Siciliae, called the Congregatio Centum Urbium, after Centorbi, their first monastery, from 1602, grew to 19 houses and was united with the order until suppressed in 1873.

Bibliography: Registers of the Priors General, Rome. J. LANTERI, Additamenta ad Crusenii Monasticon, 2 v. (Valladolid 1890) v. 1. W. RÜGAMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:516.

[F. ROTH]

GUATEMALA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Central American Republic of Guatemala borders the North Pacific Ocean on its south, Mexico on its west and north, and Belize, the Caribbean, Honduras and El Salvador on its east. A mountainous region prone to earthquakes and volcanic eruptions, Guatemala derives a quarter of its wealth from coffee, sugar and bananas, and agriculture employs half its labor force. Natural resources include petroleum deposits, fish, chicle, and rare woods from the country’s many forests. A poor country where scarcely more than half the adults are literate, Guatemala’s government has waged an ongoing battle against drug trafficking. More than half of all Guatemalans are Mestizo (Amerindian-Spanish), with the remainder predominately Amerindian.

Colonization and Early Christianization. Prior to the coming of the Spanish conquistadores in the 16th century, Guatemala was home to great Mayan cities such as Tikal, Piedras Negras, Uaxactún and Zacualpa. Spaniard Pedro de Alvarado founded the city of Santiago de los Caballeros on July 25, 1524. With Alvarado came the first missionaries: Augustinians, Mercedarians, Franciscans, Dominicans and Jesuits all contributed to the evangelization of the Mayan natives and the fostering of Western culture through schools of various types. Among the early missionaries were Juan Torres, who wrote a catechism in Quiché; Francisco Pontaza, who prepared one in Kakchiquel; Juan Godínez, author of catechisms in both Indian languages; Francisco Parra, who in preparing catechetical material invented five characters not in the Catholic church, Guatemala. (©Arvind Garg/CORBIS)

European alphabet to express Indian sounds; and Pedro de BETANZOS.

Calling it the “Audiencia,” Guatemala’s Spanish conquerors transformed the region into a powerful political entity, and it served as a high court for Spain’s American outposts. It was also the scene of a special missionary effort by the Dominicans. The Province of Tezulutlán was called the “land of war” because of the ferocity of its unconquered inhabitants. A group headed by Bartolomé de LAS CASAS including Rodrigo de Ladrada, Pedro de Angulo, Luis Cáncer and Domingo Antonio de Vico composed poems in the native language telling the biblical accounts of the creation of the world, the life of Jesus and the Redemption, and put them to simple music. These songs were spread by Christian peddlers. The four friars had great success with such methods. An episcopal see was erected in Verapaz in 1599, but it was suppressed in 1607. The missions nevertheless continued in the charge of the Dominicans.

Ecclesiastical Organization. A diocese was erected in Guatemala in 1534, and it was raised to an archdiocese in 1743. The last bishop and the first archbishop was the Peruvian Pedro Pardo de Figueroa, a patron of arts and cultural activities. De Figueroa built the church of Santo Cristo de Esquipulas, which would become a center of pilgrimage for Central America and southern Mexico. This shrine has been erected as a prelatore nullius in the charge of the Benedictines of North America.

Spanish missionaries and the Church hierarchy firmly reshaped social and family life around Catholicism. Their efforts fostered vocations among men and women of all social classes, gradually enabling the orders and the seminaries to replace those who had come from Spain. The Church also fostered scholarship. Pedro de Lievana, dean of the cathedral at the time of Bishop MARROQUÍN, founded the first literary academy in the Americas, with the assistance of Eugenio de Salazar y Alarcón. Chroniclers and linguists included Antonio REMESAL, Francisco VÁZQUEZ, Rafael de Landívar y Caballero, Francisco Ximenez and Bachiller Domingo de Juarros. Juarros' History of the Kingdom of Guatemala was translated into English and frequently consulted by historians. Scholars of the late colonial period were philosophers Pedro de Zapiain and Miguel Francesch; scientist José Antonio Liendo y Goicoechea; and educator, poet and social writer Matías de CORDOVA.

Church and State in Modern Guatemala. In 1821 Guatemala gained independence from Spain and went on to join the short-lived United Provinces of Central America. In 1839 it declared itself an independent republic. In 1853 the country's democratic government signed a concordat with the Holy See. However, the liberal revolution of 1870, led by García Granados and Justo Rufino Barrios, repudiated the concordat, suppressed the religious orders, took possession of all their property and of the seminary, exiled priests and religious, closed the Catholic schools, established civil marriage and divorce, secularized cemeteries and schools, separated the Church from the State and persecuted Catholics. The churches were left without funds and the faithful, without the Sacraments. Protestant evangelicals took advantage of the situation and spread especially among the poorest classes; they continued to make inroads even into the 21st century, albeit within an atmosphere of increased toleration.

In 1951 a liberal government took power, and the Church was allowed to regain independence. Diplomatic relations were eventually resumed with the Holy See. However, the left-wing government was able to enact few reforms under pressure from entrenched conservative powers. For the next three and a half decades the country witnessed continued political upheaval, including guerilla violence, military intervention, manipulation by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and numerous government-sponsored human rights violations. The church spoke out constantly against abuses, and was active in efforts to mediate an end to years of civil war. On Dec. 29, 1996 Guatemala achieved peace through a new government, and efforts to rebuild the country's floundering economic base were achieving success by 2000.

During 36 years of civil war, it was estimated that over 140,000 Guatemalans lost their lives through violence, while another 50,000 were listed among the "disappeared". In an effort to document that violence, the Church created an archdiocesan human rights office to follow up reports of deaths, disappearances and other human rights abuses. Auxiliary Bishop Juan Berardi Conedra led this office, and in late April of 1998 presented his report. The Guatemalan army and other paramilitary organizations came up for criticism, and were cited as responsible for 80 percent of the deaths that occurred; the guerillas were held responsible for the remainder. Tragically, Conedra was found dead two days later, his murder believed to be a political assassination. While several members of the Guatemalan military were arrested in January of 2000, events continued to delay the trial and further investigation.

Following the civil war, the Church saw its core beliefs reflected in the new government, as March 25 was proclaimed the Year of the Unborn Child, according to the country's press office: "to foster the culture of life and the defense of life from the moment of its conception." By 2000 Guatemala had 412 parishes, 340 secular and 576 religious priests, 448 brothers and 1,627 sisters. Religious congregations ran primary and secondary schools, as well as performed other much-needed social works: care of the sick, providing homes for foundlings and orphans, operating psychiatric centers and running reformatories. The Jesuit fathers directed the Rafael Landívar University with the privilege of granting academic titles as respected as those given by the autonomous University of San Carlos. The missions of Huchuetenago remained under the care of the Maryknoll fathers and those of Petén by Spanish missionaries. During his visit to Guatemala in February of 1996, Pope John Paul II reinforced the need for Catholics to continue working among the nation's increasing poor and to continue their "vigorous and dynamic effort to evangelize" in the face of increasing threats from Protestant sects working among Guatemala's rural Amerindian tribes. Following the end of civil war, the Pope prayed that the nation would "enjoy . . . a future of peace and progress, spiritual and material, in which the rights of every person will be respected." Guatemala's president, Alfonso Portillo Cabrerias, was a member of a Protestant sect; his first term of office was set to expire in 2004.

Bibliography: C. L. JONES, Guatemala: Past and Present (Minneapolis 1940). V. KELSEY and L. DE J. OSBORNE, Four Keys to Guatemala (rev. ed. New York 1961).

[B. TRESSERRAS/EDS.]

GUBERNATIS, DOMENICO DE

Franciscan historian; b. Sospitello, Diocese of Turin, date unknown; d. Turin, 1690. Little is known about the life of Gubernatis. His fame as a historian rests on his authorship of the monumental work whose six-line title is usually shortened to Orbis Seraphicus. Gubernatis was commissioned to undertake this work about 1670 by the minister general of the Franciscans. As conceived by Gubernatis, it was to be a universal history of the Franciscan Order in 30 volumes. Only seven ever appeared, but the work remains a singular specimen of 17th-century historiography. It is probably the most valuable history of the order, with the single exception of Wadding's Annales. The first four volumes, published by Gubernatis himself at Rome and Lyons between 1682 and 1685, concern the internal history of the order. He also published one volume on the missionary history at Rome in 1689. Gubernatis's plan was continued by Sigismundo Cavalli da Cueno, who produced a volume on the history of the provinces at Turin (1741), and by Marcellino da Civezza and Theophil Domenichelli, who authored a second volume of missionary history that was published at Quaracchi in 1886.

Bibliography: A. CHIAPPINI, "Orbis Seraphicus: A Bibliographical Note," The Americas 8 (1951–52) 77–81. MARCELLINO DA CIVEZZA, Saggio de bibliografia geografica storica ethnografica sanfrancescana (Prato 1879) 181. J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo, 4:217.

[C. J. LYNCH]

GUDULA, ST.

Virgin, patroness of Brussels; b. Brabant, mid-seventh century; d. c. 712. The mother of Gudula (or Goule), St. AMALBERGA, was a niece of Pepin, mayor of the palace. After receiving an education at the abbey of Nivelles under her cousin ST. GERTRUDE, Gudula returned to her home at Ham, near Alast, to lead a life of constant fasting, vigils, and prayers. In gratitude for her abundant alms, a large number of poor and afflicted accompanied her body to burial. Charles, duke of Lower Lorraine, translated her relics to Brussels (977–88). In 1047, her relics were placed in the parish church of St. Michael (now St. Gudule) but they were scattered (1579) by the Calvinists. In art, Gudula is represented holding a lantern. According to legend, a wax taper was miraculously relighted after a jealous demon had extinguished it while she was praying.

Feast: Jan. 8.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 1:513–530. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:3684–86. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 1:165–166. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945) 1:197–200. N. HUYGHEBAERT, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:321.

[J. E. LYNCH]

GUDWAL, ST.

Missionary in Brittany also known as Curval, Gural, and Goal; d. c. 640. Probably one of the earliest evan-gelizers of Brittany, Gudwal is third on the list of the seven pioneer saints of that region, although he was very likely a native of Cornwall in England. He founded the monastery of Plec on the island of Locoal-Mendon, which is still an important center of his cult. Gudwal made other settlements on the neighboring mainland and a more distant one at Guer in western France, which has his holy well. The chapel of St. Stephen at Guer is probably his hermitage. He seems to have died in one of his woodland monasteries, but was buried on Locoal-Mendon. With the 10th-century invasion of Britain by Northmen, his relics were moved first to Picardy and then to Ghent, to the Abbey of St. Peter. He may have been a regional bishop, perhaps of Aleth, but not of Saint-Malo, for the see had not yet been founded. The history of Gudwal presents many problems and has occasioned many conflicting interpretations.

Feast: June 6.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum, June 1 (1863) 716–736. F. DUINE, Memento des sources hagiographiques de l'histoire de Bretagne (Rennes 1918) 74, 146, 454, 459. S. Gudwal, évêque et confesseur (S. Briec 1934). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:3687–90. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:285–286. A. BUTLER The Lives of the Saints (New York 1956) 2:489–490. U. CHEVALIER, Répetorie des sources historiques du moyen-âge (Paris 1894–1903) 1:1998. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:432. The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 8:759.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

GUELFs AND GHIBELLINES

The words Guelf and Ghibelline are Italianized forms (Guelfo, Ghibellino) of the German Welf and Weibelungen. They are originated from the rivalry in twelfth-century Germany between the Welfs of Saxony and the dominant Hohenstaufens of Swabia (whose rallying cry was "Weibelungen," after a castle at Weibelung). Possibly the words became convenient shibboleths after Welf VI, lord of the German fiefs of Tuscany and Spoleto, had defected in 1162 to join the alliance of the Papacy, Sicily, and the LOMBARD LEAGUE against the Hohenstaufen Emperor FREDERICK BARBAROSSA.

However, the emergence in Italy of a Guelf or papal party as opposed to a Ghibelline or Hohenstaufen party belongs properly to the reign of FREDERICK II (1218–50), grandson of Barbarossa. Elected King of Germany in 1215 and Emperor in 1218, on both occasions with papal support, Frederick II failed to abide by the solemn promise he made at his coronation to resign his kingdom of

Painting depicting mounted fight between Guefs and Ghibellines, by G. Sabattelli. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Sicily. Thus by breaking his promise he provoked a vicious struggle between the Papacy and the Emperor that extended from the pontificate of GREGORY IX (1227–41) onward and in which whole cities from Rome to Milan and Genoa went Guelf (papal) or Ghibelline (imperial), often according as the political wind blew. The Ghibellines, weakened by the deposition of Frederick at the Council of Lyons in 1245 and by his death in 1250, looked for leadership first to Frederick's son CONRAD IV OF GERMANY, and then to his illegitimate son MANFRED. After Pope ALEXANDER IV (1254–61) had secured the backing of the powerful Guelf bankers of Florence, and the French Pope URBAN IV (1261–64) had persuaded Charles of ANJOU to accept the kingdom of Sicily, the Ghibelline cause deteriorated; the mortal blow came in effect with the defeat of Conradin, the son of Conrad IV and the last of the Hohenstaufens, by Charles at Tagliacozzo in 1268. Some Ghibelline strongholds, such as Siena and Pisa, survived for a time, and there was even a brief resurgence of Ghibelline hopes after the successful anti-Angevin revolt of the Sicilian Vespers in 1282; but by 1300 Guelf and Ghibelline by and large represented only local or family, rather than papal and imperial, persuasions.

Bibliography: C. POULET, Guelfes et Gibelins, 2 v. (Paris 1922). J. P. TREVELYAN, A Short History of the Italian People (4th ed. New York 1956). G. PEPE, Lo stato ghibellino di Federico II (2d ed. Bari 1951). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 10:217–247. S. RUNCIMAN, The Sicilian Vespers (Cambridge, England 1958). C. W. PREVITÉ-ORTON, The Shorter Cambridge Medieval History, 2 v. (Cambridge, England 1960). G. BARRACLOUGH, The Origins of Modern Germany (2d ed. Oxford 1957; pa. New York 1963). D. P. WALEY, The Papal State in the Thirteenth Century (New York 1961). R. CELLI, Pour l'histoire des origines du pouvoir populaire: l'expérience des villes-états italiennes: XIe–XIIIe siècles (Louvain 1980). P. HERDE, Guelfen und Neoguelfen (Stuttgart 1986); Von Dante zum Risorgimento (Stuttgart 1997). s

[L. E. BOYLE]

GUÉRANGER, PROSPER

Benedictine scholar, liturgist; b. Sablé-sur-Sarthe, France, April 4, 1805; d. Solesmes, Jan. 30, 1875. Guéranger was largely responsible for setting in motion the modern liturgical revival by his prodigious literary campaign in defense of Roman ritual forms. He must also be credited with having had a central role in the rejuvenation of contemporary Benedictine monasticism.

Ordained for the Diocese of Le Mans on Oct. 7, 1827, Guéranger fulfilled several pastoral assignments there. While studying for the secular priesthood, he already had developed a lasting interest in divine worship, convinced that Catholic spirituality must be linked closely and continuously with Catholic worship in order to develop normally and fruitfully. His desire was to unite liturgy and monasticism in order to restore each. Guéranger secured permission from his bishop to devote himself exclusively to this apostolate. In 1833, with the help of friends, he purchased the ancient and long since deserted priory of SOLESMES, just an hour's walk from his birthplace. There, with five other priests, he began to live in strict accordance with the Rule of St. Benedict, in which everything revolved around the daily chanting of the Divine Office in choir.

With the support of his bishop, Guéranger began negotiations with the Holy See to incorporate his community canonically into the Order of St. Benedict and to obtain approval of his new, and somewhat revolutionary, constitutions. His requests were granted by Pope GREGORY XVI in a papal brief, Sept. 1, 1837; by it, Solesmes was constituted an abbey. Guéranger was elected its first abbot on October 30, having already made profession on July 26 of the same year at St. Paul's-Outside-the-Walls in Rome.

Despite financial hardships, the new foundation progressed rapidly. It soon became the center and rallying point for the liturgical revival and kindred movements throughout France and won the esteem of intellectual leaders, both clerical and lay. As the legitimate heir of Cluny, St. Vannes, and St. Maur, Solesmes dedicated itself to the best scholarly and liturgical traditions of the Order of St. Benedict.

Guéranger was indefatigable in propagating his ideas through the written word. The best-known and most influential of his publications are his Institutions liturgiques, 3 v. (Paris 1840–52), a polemic against the prolixity of local diocesan liturgical usages in France, and his L'année liturgique, a commentary on the feasts and seasons of the Church year. Despite several incorrect historical arguments that it advanced, the first of these works eventually brought about the elimination of the evil that it attacked. The second treatise, a series of 15 volumes that began to appear in 1841, was completed by L. Fromage in 1866 and has undergone numerous translations and editions.

Guéranger's monastic followers subsequently upheld and propagated the ideals that he stood for, both in the realm of liturgical scholarship and in that of a liturgically oriented Christian life. The influence of his monastic program is exemplified in the Beuronese congregation; along with its many establishments in Germany and Belgium, it owes much to the advice and inspiration Guéranger gave to its founder, Maurus Wolter, in 1860.

Bibliography: P. DELATTE, Dom Guéranger, abbé de Solesmes (Solesmes, 1984). C. JOHNSON, Prosper Guéranger (1805-1875): A Liturgical Theologian: An Introduction to His Liturgical Writings and Work (Rome 1984). R. W. FRANKLIN, "Guéranger and Pastoral Liturgy: A Nineteenth-Century Context," Worship 50 (1976) 146–162. L. SOLTNER, Solesmes et Dom Guéranger 1805–1875 (Solesmes 1974).

[M. DUCEY]

GUÉRIN, MOTHER THEODORE, BL.

Founder of the SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE OF SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, Indiana; b. Oct. 2, 1798 at Etables-sur-mer, Brittany, France; d. May 14, 1856 at Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana.

Christened Anne-Thérèse by her parents, Laurent, a lieutenant in Napoleon's navy, and Isabelle Guérin, she was one of four children, two of whom died tragically by fire in early childhood. Her father was attacked and killed by brigands in 1813 as he was returning home from military service. Taught by her mother as a young child, Anne-Thérèse later attended a local primary school for a brief period. A young seminarian cousin, who lived for some time in the Guérin household, tutored her in theology, history, and philosophy.

At the age of 16, Anne-Thérèse became both the caretaker of her invalid mother and the teacher and guardian of her younger sister Marie Jeanne. After ten years of devoted service to her family, Anne-Thérèse was able to fulfill her cherished desire to enter the Congregation of the Sisters of Providence at Ruillé-sur-Loire, where she received the religious name Sister St. Theodore. Having pronounced her vows on Sept. 8, 1825, she was appointed the following year as superior of a school in the industrial town of Rennes, where she remained for eight years. After being transferred to Soulaines, Sister St. Theodore, in addition to teaching and administering the local school, studied pharmacy and medicine with a local doctor. At this time the Academy of Angers (Université de France) awarded her a medal for excellent teaching methods, especially in the field of mathematics.

In the summer of 1839, the bishop of Vincennes, Indiana, Celestine de Hailandière, came to the sisters' motherhouse in Ruillé seeking volunteers to bring, as he said, "the French religious spirit" to the United States. The superior general, Mother Mary Lecor, agreed to send sisters should any volunteer for this mission. There were five, and Sister St. Theodore was asked to be their leader. She accepted the call and with two professed sisters and three novices left France in July 1840. On Oct. 22, 1840, the six French sisters arrived at the little clearing in the forest already named Saint Mary-of-the-Woods. There they established an academy for girls, the first in Indiana, and began the foundation of a new religious congregation modeled on the one they had left in France. During her 16 years in America, Mother Theodore as she was now called, founded 16 schools, both academies and free schools for the poor as well as two homes for orphans.

Bp. Francis S. Chatard authorized initial proceedings for the cause of the beatification of Mother Theodore, but there were long delays before the apostolic processes were begun in the United States and France in 1956. They were completed in 1958 and the material was forwarded to Rome for examination by the Congregation of Rites. Mother Theodore Guérin was the sixth citizen of the United States and the first in Indiana to be designated as blessed on Oct. 25, 1998 by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: October 3.

Bibliography: Mother Theodore Guerin, Journals and Letters, ed. M. T. MUG (Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Ind. 1937). M. B. BROWN, History of the Sisters of Providence. Vol. 1:1806–1856 (New York 1949). K. BURTON, Faith Is the Substance (New York 1959). P. B. MITCHELL, Mother Theodore Guérin: A Woman for Our Time (Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Ind. 1998). M. T. MUG, Life and Life-Work of Mother Theodore Guérin (New York 1904). J. E. RYAN, Positio Super Virtutibus ex officio Concinnata (Rome 1987); Call to Courage; A Story of Mother Theodore Guérin (Notre Dame 1968).

[M. R. MADDEN]

GUERRA, ELENA, BL.

Foundress of the Oblate Sisters of the Holy Spirit; b. Lucca, Italy, June 23, 1835; d. there, April 11, 1914. Elena was born of a wealthy, pious family and was educated privately. From an early age, she was active in works of charity. Eventually, she grouped a number of young girls into an association following a common life, calling it the Pious Union of Spiritual Friendship. From these disciples she chose the first members of her congregation, established in 1872 in honor of St. ZITA and dedicated to the spread of devotion to the Holy Spirit. The institute received the approval of the Holy See in 1911 as the Oblate Sisters of the Holy Spirit, but it is more commonly known as the Sisters of St. Zita. In her efforts to promote devotion to the Holy Spirit, Elena wrote frequently to Pope LEO XIII, whose brief of May 5, 1895, and encyclical, Divinum illud munus (1897), rewarded her efforts. Elena wrote some short devotional works and was the teacher of St. Gemma GALGANI. Elena was beatified April 27, 1959.

Feast: April 26.

Bibliography: P. SCAVIZZI, E. G., apostola dello Spirito Santo (Lucca 1939). L. CRISTIANI, Apôtre du Saint-Esprit (Paris 1964). I. TUBALDO, A ação do Espírito Santo segundo Helena Guerra (Belo Horizonte 1964). D. M. ABBRESCIA, Elena Guerra: profetismo e rinnovamento (Brescia 1974). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 51 (1959) 337–342.

[F. G. SOTTOCORNOLA]

GUERRERO GONZÁLEZ, ANGELA DE LA CRUZ, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of the Cross; b. Jan. 30, 1846, Seville, Spain; d. there March 2, 1932. The growing sanctity of Angela, the uneducated daughter of a simple family, was recognized by Father Torres Padilla as she was working in a shoe factory in Seville. After she was initially rejected by the Carmelites of Seville, accepted, then forced to leave because of illness, Father Torres suggested (Nov. 1, 1871) that she adopt a rule of life to live as a religious in the secular world. Thereafter she professed a private annual religious vow and recruited peasants as sisters in the Company of the Cross to serve the sick and needy in rural areas. Shortly after the founding of the congregation (Aug. 2, 1875), the sisters heroically ministered to victims of an epidemic in Seville (1876). Angela was beatified at Seville by John Paul II, Nov. 5, 1982, for her service to the poorest of the poor, and for her spirituality of the Cross in a life of poverty, detachment, and humility.

Feast: March 2.

Bibliography: ANGELA DE LA CRUZ, Escritos íntimos, ed. by J. M. JAVIERRE (Madrid 1974). J. M. JAVIERRE, Madre dei poveri (Rome 1969); Sor Angela de la Cruz (Madrid 1982).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

GUERRIC OF IGNY, BL.

Cistercian spiritual theologian; b. Tournai, c. 1070–80; d. monastery of Igny, Diocese of Reims, France, Aug. 19, 1157. Guerric was initiated into intellectual and ascetical disciplines by Odo of Cambrai. He was first a cathedral canon, the magister scholarum at Tournai until his entry into the Cistercian Order at Clairvaux c. 1125. Elected abbot of the monastery of Igny in 1138, Guerric demonstrated an astonishing mastery of Scripture and a perfect command of the homily genre in his 53 authentic sermons for the liturgical year (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 185:11–214). For Guerric, the spiritual life consists in the formation of Christ in men according to His “spiritual form,” i.e., their life of grace in Christ, who by His mysteries is both principle and exemplar of supernatural life. Particularly noteworthy is Guerric’s emphasis on Mary’s maternal role in this formation of Christ in men. Growth is described by him in terms of an ascent into light, culminating in wisdom and contemplation. Some of his writings have been attributed to St. BERNARD. Guerric’s local cultus was approved 1889.

Feast: Aug. 19.

Bibliography: D. DE WILDE, De beato Guerrico, abbate Igniacensi eiusque doctrina de formatione Christi in nobis (Westmalle, Belgium 1935), includes an edition of Guerric’s curious dialogue, “De languore animae amantis,” 189–196. L. BOUYER, The Cistercian Heritage, tr. E. A. LIVINGSTONE (Westminster, Md. 1958) 190–203. R. MILCAMP and A. DUBOIS, “Le bx. Guerric: Sa vie, son oeuvre,” in Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorem 19 (1957) 207–221; quasi-complete bibliography of authentic and spurious works, manuscripts, editions, and studies, 212–221. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme 5:363–364. B. BETTO, Guerrico d’Igny e i suoi sermoni (Abbazia di Praglia 1988).

[C. WADDELL]

GUEVARA Y LIRA, SILVESTRE

Fifth archbishop of Caracas, Venezuela, who fought the secularizing laws of Guzmán Blanco; b. Chamariapa, Anzoátegui, Dec. 31, 1814; d. Caracas, Feb. 20, 1882. Having been vicar-general of the old Diocese of Guayana and senator in the National Congress, Guevara was consecrated archbishop of Caracas on Feb. 6, 1853. The first 17 years of his episcopate were characterized by fruitful activity in which he commanded respect and admiration. Guevara completely restored the cathedral, in ruins since the earthquake of 1812. He reorganized the studies and the discipline of the seminary and thus raised the prestige of the clergy. He succeeded in getting the Venezuelan government to accept a concordat with the Holy See and went to Rome to sign it as the representative named by the government. Unfortunately, Venezuela did not ratify that concordat because of a sudden change in government when the federal revolution triumphed. In 1869–70, Guevara attended Vatican Council I.

For the next 12 years, during the regime of Antonio Guzmán Blanco, Guevara was the focus of the most serious political-religious conflicts in the history of Venezuela. A disagreement over the date on which a Te Deum requested by the government was to be celebrated was the opportunity and the pretext for the president to expel Guevara from the country on 24 hours’ notice. However, the autocratic ruler still had to contend with the courage with which the archbishop sustained the rights of his position during seven years in exile. Other ecclesiastical dignitaries making common cause with the archbishop also suffered exile and severe criticism. Exasperated with the determination of the prelate, President Guzmán began a series of persecuting actions: he closed all of the convents and confiscated the property of the nuns; he closed the seminaries and revoked the autonomy of the university courses in ecclesiastical studies; he secularized the cemeteries; he substituted civil registration for ecclesiastical as a previous condition to Baptism and Matrimony; he established civil marriage, for which he declared priests legally competent; and, finally, he tried to create a national church separate from Rome.

Such a deplorable situation became more serious because the archdiocese was without a pastor. Since Guzmán continued his pressures, the pope, through an apostolic delegate, suggested to Guevara that he make the sacrifice of resigning so that a new archbishop could be named. With great humility and understanding, the archbishop presented his resignation to the pope. In November of 1876, the new archbishop of Caracas was consecrated.

In 1877, with the end of Guzmán’s regime, the new president authorized the return of Guevara. The reception that Caracas accorded the famous exile was moving. The prelate spent the last five years of his life surrounded by affection and widespread veneration of the faithful.

Bibliography: H. FANGER, Silvestre Guevara y Lira (Washington 1907). Apoteosis del Ilmo. Silvestre Guevara y Lira (Caracas 1907). M. WATTERS, A History of the Church in Venezuela (Chapel Hill 1933). N. E. NAVARRO, Anales eclesiásticos Venezolanos (2d ed. Caracas 1951).

[P. P. BARNOLA]

GUIBERT, JOSEPH DE

Jesuit ascetical and mystical theologian; b. L’Îsle-sur-Tarn, France, Sept. 14, 1877; d. Rome, March 23, 1942. De Guibert studied at the Collège du Caousou in Toulouse before entering the Society of Jesus on Oct. 19, 1895, at Toulouse. His younger brother Bernard followed him into the society. De Guibert pursued his Jesuit studies at Toulouse, Vals-près-Le Puy, France, and Eng-hien, Belgium, where he was ordained Aug. 26, 1906. In 1899, he received a licentiate in literature from the Sorbonne, and from 1901 to 1903 he studied history at the Sorbonne. De Guibert taught theology at the regional seminary in Lecce, Italy, and at Enghien. From 1914 to 1918, he was an army chaplain. When he founded the Revue d'ascétique et de mystique in 1919, it was De Guibert's intention to establish a periodical that would apply the methods demanded by contemporary scientific research to the study of spirituality. From 1922 to 1942, De Guibert taught ascetical and mystical theology at the Gregorian University, Rome, and from 1932 to 1942 he was a consultant to the Congregation of Rites. His writings were primarily the fruit of his teaching. The first edition of Theologia spiritualis, ascetica et mystica (Eng. tr. of 3d ed. by Paul Barrett, OFM Cap, New York 1953) appeared in Rome in 1937. His posthumous work La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus (Rome 1953; Eng. tr. by W. J. Young, The Jesuits: Their Doctrine and Practice, Chicago 1964) is primarily historical and documentary.

Bibliography: J. DE GUIBERT, Leçons de théologie spirituelle, v.1 (Toulouse 1946), preface F. CAVALLERA and M. VILLER. P. GALTIER, in Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 26 (1950) 97–120.

[J. F. MULLIN]

GUIBERT OF NOGENT

Historian and ecclesiastical controversialist; b. Clermont-en-Beauvais, 1053; d. Nogent, 1124. Born to noble parents, Guibert was dedicated to the religious life in his infancy. He received his early education at the Benedictine abbey of Flavigny. At first, he was interested in the classical Latin poets. However, under the influence of (St.) Anselm of Bec, he later turned to the study of theology. However, Guibert's literary style shows the influence of his earlier interests. In 1104, Guibert became the abbot of Nogent-sous-Coucy in the Diocese of Laon. He is best remembered today for his writings, especially his autobiography De vita sua, which was written toward the end of his life. His work is a prime source for information about life in castle and monastery, educational conditions and methods, and, most especially, about the commune of Laon. Almost as well known is Guibert's history of the first crusade, Gesta Dei per Francos, which was written about 1110. This is largely a paraphrase of the anonymous Gesta Francorum, but Guibert still manages to impart considerable color to his narrative; he is also often critical of what he recounts. Perhaps Guibert's most controversial work is his treatise on relics, De pignoribus sanctorum, in which he was highly critical of the use of relics (see RELICS). In addition to the works mentioned, Guibert wrote a treatise on homiletics; ten books of Moralia in Genesim based on Gregory's Moralia; five books of Tropologiae on Hosea, Amos, and Lamentations; a treatise, De Incarnatione, against the Jews; and a letter, De buccella Judae et de veritate Dominici corporis, which attacked Berengarius's heresy.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 156; 184:1031–44. The Autobiography of Guibert, Abbot of Nogent-sous-Coucy, tr. C. C. S. BLAND (New York 1926). B. MONOD, Le Moine Guibert et son temps (Paris 1905). J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:367. J. GEISELMANN, "Die Stellung des G. von N. (—1124) in der Eucharistielehre der Frühscholastik," Theologische Quartalschrift 110 (1929) 66–84, 279–305. Histoire littéraire de la France (Paris 1733–1768) 10:433–500.

[V. L. BULLOUGH]

GUIBERT OF TOURNAI

Franciscan spiritual writer, teacher, preacher; b. Tournai, France, c. 1210; d. Tournai, Oct. 7(?), 1284. He was born Guibert (Wibert) Aspiès de Murielporte and was of noble lineage. Guibert had only one brother, Henry, also a teacher, who died before him. After being brought up by Bp. Gautier (Walter) of Marvy (d. 1251), Guibert studied at Paris, where he eventually became a master in theology (c. 1256). Attracted to contemplation, Guibert became a Franciscan (c. 1235), but his superiors assigned him to teaching. He may have been a participant in the First Crusade of LOUIS IX (1248–54), for it is known through the De viris illustribus, attributed to HENRY OF GHENT, that Guibert wrote a history of this Crusade in Hodoeporicon. Furthermore, several sermons addressed Ad cruce signatos are extant. If Guibert did go, he was back in France preaching (in Latin) before the clergy of Paris in 1250. He published his Sermones dominicales et de sanctis (ed. Paris 1518) some time before Aug. 27, 1255, when Pope Alexander IV congratulated him and asked him to give a copy to his penitentiarius, Mansueto of Castiglione. In October 1259, Guibert finished Eruditio regum et principum, which included three letters, the first dedicated to Louis IX [ed. A. De Poorter (Louvain 1914)]. From 1260 to 1262, Guibert produced Erudimentum doctrinae, a work on the four reasons for teaching, followed by De modo addiscendi [ed. E. Bonifaccio (Turin 1953)]. Succeeding Eudes of Rosny, Guibert was master regent at Paris from 1260 to 1263; in 1267, he asked Louis IX for a franchise for the city of Tournai. Guibert wrote the Collectio de scandalis ecclesiae [ed. A. Stroick, Archivum Franciscanum historicum (1931)] in 1274, the treatise De pace [ed. E. Longpré (Quaracchi 1925)] in 1275–76. One of his sermons for Ash Wednesday survives (March 3, 1283). His epitaph read: "Christo servivit qui totum scibile scivit."

Besides the above works, Guibert was also the author of a commentary on the Sentences, Quodlibeta, and Comm. in epistolas s. Pauli, but all are lost. Before 1258, he wrote De officio episcopali et ecclesiae caeremoniis (ed. 1571, 1677); Vita s. Eleutherii (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 3:180–208) and De miraculis s. Blasii (lost). His homiletic production included the Ad varios status (London 1473), which completed the De modo addiscendi. His works on asceticism included Epistola exhortatoria ad b. Isabellam [ed. A. De Poorter, Revue d'ascétique et de mystique (1931)], De morte non timenda, De 7 verbis Domini in cruce, and De nomine Jesu (ed. E. Bonelli, 1774). He collected excerpts from the Fathers and Seneca in Pharetra (ed. 1866). Guibert's writings are effusive and wander from the main topic. A mystic, he often followed St. BONAVENTURE, but was at times an original thinker.

Bibliography: L. BAUDRY, "Wibert de Tournai," Revue d'histoire franciscaine 5 (1928) 23–61. C. BERUBE, "Guibert de Tournai et Robert Grosseteste sources inconnues des Saint Bonaventure: Rudimentum doctrinae de Guibert de Tournai," in Sanctus Bonaventura 1274–1974, vol. 2 (Rome 1973), 627–654. P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) 2:56–59.

[J. CAMPBELL]

GUICCIARDINI, FRANCESCO

Italian historian and statesman; b. Florence, 1483; d. Arcetri, May 22, 1540. From his parents, Piero di Jacopo and Simona Gianfigliuzzi, he inherited an attachment to the Medici party. He studied law in Ferrara and Padua and gained his doctor's degree at Pisa. He married Maria Salviati in 1508, established a lucrative law practice, and wrote the Storie fiorentine dal 1378 al 1509, showing wisdom and judgment beyond his years. Early in 1512, before reaching the statutory age of 30, he was named ambassador to the court of Ferdinand V of Castile, whose portrait he so deftly drew. Upon his return to Italy in 1514, he entered the service of the Medici, who had become rulers of Florence in 1512. In 1516 Leo X appointed him governor of Modena and later of Reggio and Parma, which he successfully defended against the French in 1521. Leo X also named him commissioner general of the papal army, a post Clement VII confirmed. In 1523 he was made president of the Romagna. He fulfilled these offices conscientiously and with ability and firmness. After the battle of Pavia (1525), he was instrumental in forming the League of Cognac against Charles V, and became lieutenant-general of the papal forces. His desire to save Italy was hindered by the dilatory tactics of the Duke of Urbino, commander of the League's troops. During the siege of Florence by Charles V, Guiciardini kept to his villa at Finocchietto to study and write. But after the Medici returned to power in 1530, he served as adviser to Alessandro and even defended him against the Florentine exiles at Naples. His efforts assured the independence of Florence from Charles V, but they did not prevent the assassination of Alessandro by Lorenzino in January 1537. Guicciardini was instrumental in the election of Cosimo de Medici, but his later attempts to check the duke's absolutism led to his political decline. He retired to his villa in Arcetri, spending the leisure of his last years in the composition of the Storia d' Italia.

Francesco Guicciardini, by sculptor Luigi Cartei, Florence. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

This work, translated into all Western European languages, is an eyewitness account of the period from Charles VIII's expedition (1494) to Clement VII's death (1534). Guicciardini is noteworthy for having broken away from the narrow concept of local municipal chronicles. The era that Guicciardini treated—the time of the Borgias, Leo X, Clement VII, Ferdinand of Spain, Luther, Columbus, Francis I, and Charles V—was also the period of Italy's greatest political intrigues and a time of war.

Guicciardini's attempt at dispassionate narration does not conceal his sorrow at Italy's fate. To him it was clear that the events of history were subordinated to a conflict of interests, in which la cupidità was the sole motivating force of the individual protagonists. Emphasis is therefore on political rather than social, cultural, or religious factors. The Storia d' Italia was esteemed by Ronsard, Bacon, Raleigh, and others.

Among his other writings in the ten volumes of the Opere inedite, ed. G. Canestrini (Florence 1857–67) are many letters; the Ricordi, 403 maxims, some duplicated; the Considerazioni intorno ai discorsi del Machiavelli sopra la prima Deca di Tito Livio, notes that illustrate the ideological differences between Guicciardini and his contemporary; 16 Discorsi politici; the Dialogo del reggimento di Firenze, revealing his theory of rule vested in a senate composed of an aristocracy of merit rather than one of class; nine Discorsi intorno alle mutazioni e riforme del governo fiorentino; the Storie fiorentine; the Relazione di Spagna; the Istruzioni delle cose di Romagna; and minor works, mostly of an autobiographical nature. Many letters have since been published, as well as his Diario del viaggio in Spagna (1932), and Le cose fiorentine (1945), a eulogy of the Florentine oligarchy.

Bibliography: Scrittori d'Italia (Bari 1910–). R. RIDOLFI, Vita di Francesco Guicciardini (Rome 1960). U. SPIRITO, Machiavelli e Guicciardini (2d ed. Rome 1945). R. PALMAROCCHI, Studi Guicciardiniani (Letteraria 6; Florence 1947). V. DE. CAPRARIIS, Francesco Guicciardini (Bari 1950). V. LUCIANI, Francesco Guicciardini and His European Reputation (New York 1936). F. GILBERT, Machiavelli and Guicciardini: Politics and History in 16th-Century Florence (Princeton 1964). R. RIDOLFI, Studi Guicciardiniani (Florence 1978). P. BONDANELLA, Francesco Guicciardini (Boston 1976). G. SASSO, Francesco Guicciardini, 1483–1983 (Florence 1984).

[V. LUCIANI]

GUIDO DE BAYSIO

Canonist; b. Reggio d'Emilia; d. Avignon, 1313. He studied in Bologna under the canonist Johannes de Anguissola and the professor of civil law Guido de Suzaria. Guido de Baysio first held ecclesiastical offices in Reggio, and in 1295 he received from Boniface VIII a canonicate and precentorship in Chartres. In 1296 he was made archdeacon of Bologna, from which office he is usually styled archidiaconus. He taught Canon Law in Bologna and was installed as professor of the Decretum of Gratian in 1301. Among his pupils were Alvarus Pelagius, Mattheus Romanus, and notably, Johannes Andreae. He is mentioned as auditor litterarum contradictarum in 1303.

His principal work was the Apparatus ad Decretum, called Rosarium, completed on Jan. 25, 1300. It is a Canon Law classic and is indispensable for a knowledge of older canonical writings. Guido de Baysio's chief ail in this work was to append material from the DECRETISTS and earlier DECRETALISTS not used in the glossa ordinaria on the Decretum of Gratian, as well as supplementary material written after the glossa ordinaria. His sources for pre-Johannine material on the Decretum are HUGUCCIO and the Glossa Palatina, which he ascribes in toto to Laurentius Hispanus. He also cites, from among the decretists, Bazianus, Bernardus Compostellanus Antiquus, Johannes Faventius, Melendus, P (Petrus Hispanus), and from among the post-Johannine decretists, he cites Bertrandus and Johannes de Phintona.

His Apparatus ad Sextum, written between 1306 and 1311, was the third classical commentary on the Liber Sextus, after the apparatuses of Johannes Monachus and Johannes Andreae. Following his usual pattern, he made use of the thought of older canonists, especially the early decretalists; the regulae iuris are not commented upon. The Tractatus super haeresi et aliis criminibus in causa templariorum et D. Bonifacii D.P. papae VIII, written at the time of the Council of Vienne, deals with the question of the Templars and is a defense of Boniface VIII. His Quaestiones, written in Reggio between 1283 and 1289, has never been printed.

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des Kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 (Stuttgart 1875–80) 2:186–190. F. GILLMANN, "Die Abfassungszeit der Dekretsumme Huguccios," Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht 94 (1914) 246, note; "Guido de Baysio und Johannes de Anguissola," ibid. 104 (1924) 54–55; "Johannes von Phintona, ein vergessener Kanonist des 13. Jahrhunderts," ibid. 116 (1936) 446–484. S. KUTTNER, Repertorium der Kanonistik (Rome 1937); Studi e Testi 71 (Rome), 87–88. S. KUTTNER, "Bernardus Compostellanus Antiquus," Traditio 1 (1943) 309. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v.1–5 (Mechlin 1928–); v.1, Prolegomena (2d. ed. 1945), 1:455, 460. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65), 5:1007–08. A. M. STICKLER, "Decretisti Bolognesi dimenticati," Studia Gratiana 3 (1955) 386–388. F. LIOTTA, "Appunti per una biografia del canonista Guido da Baisio, arcidiacono de Bologna," Studi Senesi 76 (1964) 7–52. S. KUTTNER, introd. to repr. of Venice 1581 ed. of J. KUTTNER, In quinque decretalium libros: Novella commentaria, 5 v. in 4 (Turin 1963) 1:xi–xii, also in Jurist 24 (1964) 405.

[K. W. NORR]

GUIDO MARAMALDI, BL.

Dominican preacher and inquisitor; b. Naples, Italy, mid-14th century; d. there, c. 1391. Born of noble Neopolitan parents, Guido entered the DOMINICANS at San Domenico in Naples, studied philosophy and theology there, and enjoyed a reputation as a pulpit orator. In Ragusa the citizens erected a Dominican convent as a tribute to his preaching, and later he was appointed inquisitor (see INQUISITION) for the Kingdom of Naples. He was buried at the chapel of the Rosary in the church of San Domenico, and the popularity of his cult soon caused the chapel to become known as the chapel of Blessed Guido. The cult never received official approbation, but Domenico Marchese (d. 1692) prevailed upon the BOLLANDISTS to insert a brief notice on Guido in the Acta Sanctorum in 1612.

Feast: June 25.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 7;130–131. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis praedicatorum 1.2:702. D. M. MARCHESE, Sagro Diario Domenicano, 6 v. (Naples 1681–88) 3:333–344. Année Dominicaine, 12 v. in 23 (Lyons 1883–1909) 6.2:534–536.

[P. M. STARRS]

GUIDO OF ANDERLECHT, ST.

Confessor, known as St. Wye (in Flemish) and the “Poor Man of Anderlecht”; d. Anderlecht, Belgium, Sept. 12, 1012. The only details concerning the life of Guido come from a vita composed 100 years after his death. According to this text, Guido was the son of peasant parents in Brabant and become a sexton at the church of Our Lady in Laeken, near Brussels. After engaging in business for some time as a merchant, he undertook a seven-year PILGRIMAGE to Rome and Jerusalem as expiation. After his return, Guido lived out the few remaining days of his life in Anderlecht. He began to be venerated as a result of miracles reputedly worked at his almost forgotten tomb in that city.

Feast: Sept. 12.

Bibliography: Acta sanctorum, Sept. 4 (1868) 36–48. J. LECLEERCQ, Saints de Belgique (new rev. ed. Tournai 1953). F. MORTIER, “La Légende De S. Guidon à Anderlecht,” Folklore brabançon 10 (1930) 46–55. J. LAVALLAYE, “Notes sur la culte de S. G. à A.,” Annales de la Société royale d’archéologie de Bruxelles 37 (1934) 221–248.

[L. KURRAS]

GUIDO OF AREZZO

Medieval music theorist whose principles prepared the foundation of European music notation; b. Arezzo?, Italy, c. 992; d. probably in the Camaldolese monastery at Avellana, 1050. Guido was educated in the Benedictine abbey at Pomposa, where he evidently made great use of the music treatise of Odo of Saint-Maur des Fossés

The Guidonian Hand from Picitono, the “Fra Angelico of Music,” an illustrated-palm, 11th-century medieval musical scale, first system of learning music by assigning notes to parts of hand, solmization (sightsinging), developed by Guido of Arezzo. (©CORBIS/Bettmann)

(see M. Gerbert, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum, 1:265–284 and 1:251–264), and also must have developed his principle of staff notation. He left there c. 1025 when fellow monks resisted his musical innovations; whereupon Theobald, Bishop of Arezzo (1023–36), appointed him a teacher at his cathedral school and commissioned him to write the Micrologus de Disciplina Artis Musicae (c. 1025–26; also versified by Guido for teaching purposes before 1028 under the title Regulae Rhythmicae). Theobald also arranged in 1028 for Guido to give Pope John XIX (1024–33) an Antiphonary that he had at least begun in Pomposa. This book (no longer in existence) was probably written in staff notation, and it was accompanied by an explanatory preface to the new method, preserved as the Aliae Regulae (c. 1020). The prologue to the Dialogus of Odo of Saint-Maur (Gerbert, op. cit., 1:251) is probably also by Guido (Oesch, 73–76).

Guido must have returned to Avellana from Rome, where he probably wrote in 1029 the Epistola de ignoto cantu to Brother Michael, his friend in Pomposa, and also perhaps a letter condemning the simony of Abp. Heribert II of Milan. No other works attributed to Guido may be regarded as genuine (Gerbert, op. cit., 2:33, 37, 50; Scriptorum de musica medii aevi nova series, 2:78, 110, 115). Guido himself and the Camaldolese brought about his future fame, which may be assessed not only in the triumph of his new method of notation, but also in the fact that no medieval treatise is preserved in so many sources spread over so wide an area as the Micrologus. Moreover, the oldest MSS notated in this way are of the 11th century and from Camaldolese houses—e.g., MS Florence, Biblioteca Laurenziana, 158 (from Struma), and MS Vallombrosa 247 (from Vallombrosa).

In the new method there are two fundamental innovations: the construction by thirds of the system of lines; and the use of letters as clefs and/or the coloring of certain lines (yellow for C, red for F), indicating with reference to the other lines the position of the semitone. The two innovations together mark the fulfillment of the principle of diastematic writing. Both elements—letters and lines—antedated Guido, but their combination in this manner made possible the first unambiguous notating of neumes. At the same time Guido was developing a second epoch-making technique—that of solmization (see Harvard Dictionary of Music 690–691), which enabled one to sing a notated song correctly from the written page through use of the syllables ut, re, mi, fa, sol, and la (described in Epistola de ignoto cantu). In a musical setting, not found earlier than Guido, of the hymn to St. John Ut queant laxis . . . (by PAUL THE DEACON?, 8th century), the first syllables of each of the half-lines of the poem fall on tones c, d, e, f, g, and a, in order. This hymn is intended as a mnemonic aid, enabling students to become familiar with the sound (proprietas) of the tones of the hexachord, so that as they read neumes on the staff they would grasp the arrangement of whole and half tones within a section of a melody. There is nothing to suggest that Guido used this mnemonic melody in connection with the principle of solmization (mutation), which appeared at the end of the 11th century (see Oesch, “Hexachord,” Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6:349; Harvard Dictionary of Music 330–332). Hence the “Guidonian hand” came into use only after Guido’s death. Neither Aribo Scholasticus (c. 1078) nor Johannes Affligemensis (c. 1100), both of whom discuss Guido, refer to solmization.

Bibliography: H. OESCH, Guido von Arezzo (Bern 1954). J. SMITS VAN WAESBERGHE, De musico-paedagogico et theoretico Guidone Aretino (Florence 1953); “The Musical Notation of G. of A.,” Musica Disciplina (Rome 1947–), Yearbook of the History of Music, American Institute of Musicology, 5 (1951) 15–53; “G. of A. and Musical Improvisation,” ibid., 55–63; Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:1071–78. W. APEL, Gregorian Chant (Bloomington, Ind. 1958). G. REESE, Music in the Middle Ages (New York 1940). P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). M. A. LEACH, “Historia perspectis: A Practical Supplement to Guido of Arezzo’s Pedagogical Method,” Journal of Musicology, 8 (1990) 82–101. C. V. PALISCA, “Guido of Arezzo,” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 7 (New York 1980) 803–807. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge 1996) 339–340. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 682–683.

[H. OESCH]

GUIDO OF CORTONA, BL.

Franciscan priest; b. Cortona, Tuscany, Italy, c. 1187; d. Cortona, June 12, 1247. A wealthy young bachelor, in 1210 he welcomed FRANCIS OF ASSISI in his home with such kindness that the saint praised courtesy as one of God’s qualities and prayed that Guido would join the new FRANCISCAN order. He did so after seeing Francis in levitation (cf. FIORETTI ch. 37 with note in R. Brown ed.). Guido founded the hermitage of Le Celle near Cortona and became an ascetical priest. Usually eating only one meal a day, he acquired fame for miracles reported in his vita: when gravely ill he was cured by water that he had changed into wine; he healed a priest’s paralyzed arm; multiplied a widow’s flour during a famine; and brought back to life a girl who had drowned in a well. St. Francis appeared to him twice in his last days. His cult was approved in 1583.

Feast: June 16.

Bibliography: U. SERNINI CUCCIATTI, La leggenda del beato Guido (Cortona 1900). Estudios franciscanos 11 (1913) 43–44. L. DA CORTONA, Il primo convento francescano (Florence 1915). N. BRUNI, Le reliquie del beato Guido da Cortona (Cortona 1947). O. ENGLEBERT, St. Francis of Assisi: A Biography, tr. E. M. COOPER, 2d augm. ed. by I. BRADY and R. BROWN (Chicago 1966). W. FORSTER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1268.

[R. BROWN]

GUIDO OF POMPOSA, ST.

Benedictine abbot; b. Casamari, near Ravenna, Italy, c. 1010; d. Borgo San Donnino, March 31, 1046. After living as a hermit for three years in the spirit of St. ROMUALD, he came to the Abbey of POMPOSA, where he was shortly afterward elected abbot. During his tenure, Pomposa became one of the more celebrated monasteries of northern Italy. At Guido’s invitation, PETER DAMIAN visited the abbey and for two years (c. 1039–41) lectured on Sacred Scripture. When Emperor Henry III entered Italy in 1046 on his way to the Synod of SUTRI, Guido joined the imperial retinue at Henry's request, but he took sick en route and died near Parma, where he was temporarily buried. In 1047 his remains were brought to Speyer, Germany, and they are buried at the present time in the Sankt Guidostift.

Feast: May 4, translation; March 31 in Speyer.

Bibliography: Acta Santorum, March 3:912–915, legendary. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 8876–78. A. M. ZIMMERMAN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktineordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:394–396. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:709–710. J. E. GUGUMUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1269.

[O. J. BLUM]

GUIDO THE LOMBARD, BL.

Founder; b. probably Milan, Italy, c. 11th century. Two contradictory accounts of Guido's life exist, enabling the historian to affirm little but the fact of his existence and a connection with the HUMILIATI, probably as their founder. The Humiliati, who came into prominence c. 1180, were associations of men and women working in the wool trades of the Lombard cities. They were dedicated to an evangelical life, and their status, at first lay, was later that of tertiary religious. One legendary account has it that Guido, c. 1134, received the rule of the order from the hands of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. The male branch was suppressed by PIUS V in 1571 for refusing to reform, but a few communities of women still exist in Italy. Besides being revered by these sisters as their founder, Guido is regarded as one of the glories of the Church of Milan.

Feast: Dec. 6.

Bibliography: J. E. STADLER and F. J. HEIM, Vollständiges Heiligen-Lexikon, 5 v. (Augsburg 1858–82) 2:549. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 7.1:311–321.

[N. M. RIEHLE]

GUIGO I

Carthusian legislator and spiritual writer; b. 1084; d. July 27, 1136. Guigo entered La Grande-Chartreuse in 1106 and was elected its fifth prior in 1109. After an avalanche destroyed the monastery in 1132, Guigo rebuilt it on the site where it still stands. St. Bernard venerated him as a master of the mystical life; Peter the Venerable considered him one of the most remarkable men of his time.

Between 1121 and 1127, Guigo wrote the Consuetudines Cartusiae, a codification of the customs that regulated the life of the earliest Carthusian monks and lay brothers. The main sources of this, after the Scriptures, as Guigo mentions, were the letters of St. Jerome and the Rule of St. Benedict. With regard to the "other writings of incontestable authority" to which he refers, recent research has been able to identify many of them and has thus shown that the first Carthusians were widely read in ancient and contemporary literature on the monastic and the eremitical life. The Consuetudines of Guigo became the rule of the Carthusian Order, shaping in outline and in many particulars its semi-eremitical character as it lived to the present day. Subsequent collections of statutes provided for changing circumstances, but the Consuetudines remained the backbone of the order's legislation. The first general chapter (1140 or 1141), establishing liturgical uniformity for the whole confederation of charterhouses, made Guigo's codification of the liturgy and the chant of La Grande-Chartreuse normative for all other houses. During the last years of his life, Guigo wrote a life of St. Hugh of Grenoble (d. 1132), the cofounder of La Grande-Chartreuse. In his Meditationes, Guigo left us one of the spiritual and literary masterpieces of his century. Nine of his letters are extant.

Bibliography: M. LAPORTE, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUET 5:375–376. Consuetudines Cartusiae, Patrologia Latina 153:631–760. Critical ed. in Aux Sources de la Vie Cartusienne, stenciled Collection to be consulted in Carthusian libraries, v.4 (1962). Lettres des premiers Chartreux (Sources Chrétiennes 88; Paris 1962) v.1. GUIGUES DU CHASTEL, Meditationes Guigonis prioris Cartusiae, ed. A. WILMART (Études de philosophie médiévale 22; Paris 1936), critical ed.; Meditations of Guigo, tr. J. J. JOLIN (Milwaukee 1951). S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1964–66.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

GUIGO II

Carthusian spiritual writer; d. probably 1188. Guigo was elected ninth prior of La Grande-Chartreuse and general of the order in 1173. He resigned from this office in 1180. Guigo wrote the Scala Paradisi (also known as the Scala Claustralium) about 1150. The work was variously attributed in the past to St. Augustine, to St. Bernard, and to Guigo I. It distinguishes four stages of spiritual occupation: "Reading, you should seek; meditating, you will find; praying, you shall call; and contemplating, the door will be opened to you." This formula was later borrowed by St. John of the Cross. A Middle English version of the treatise under the title A Ladder of Four Rungs of Guy II was published at Stanbrook Abbey in 1953. Guigo also wrote a volume of Meditationes (ed. M. M. Davy, La Vie spirituelle, supplement 1932–34). Unlike those of Guigo I, these meditations are more effective than profound, and their complicated symbolism makes reading difficult. The Liber de quadripertito exercitio cellae, until recently ascribed to Guigo, is now known to have been written by ADAM SCOTUS.

Bibliography: M. LAPORTE, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et deman, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:376. S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1966–67. J. M. DÉCHANET, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire. 2.2:1959–61. Text of Guigo's Scala among the works of St. Augustine, Patrologia latina ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 40:997–1004, and of St. Bernard, ibid. 184:475–484.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

GUIGO DE PONTE

Also known as (Guigue du Pont), Carthusian mystical writer; d. Oct. 29, 1297. He was prior of the Charterhouse of Mont-Dieu from 1290 to 1297. When a monk at La Grande-Chartreuse he wrote a still unedited treatise De contemplatione known chiefly, until recently, from the Contemplationum libri tres of DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN. Guigo distinguished three main types of contemplation: “natural,” which arises from finding the Creator “mirrored” in His creation; “scholastic,” which is an acquired “wisdom,” an experimental knowledge, that results from finding God in the Scriptures; and “divinely infused,” which is truly mystical. Denis in his classifications and descriptions was dependent on Hugh of Balma and Guigo, but he assimilated their teaching in his usual personal way. In matters of contemplation Guigo accentuated the affective element rather than the intellectual, though this emphasis is less marked in him than it is in Balma. Real mystical contemplation consisted for him in an odumbratio caliginis in cubiculo cordis (an overshadowing of darkness in the chamber of the heart), much as in The CLOUD OF UNKNOWING. His dependence on Pseudo-Dionysius is evident.

Bibliography: A. M. SOCHAY, Catholicisme 5:374–375. J. P. GRAUSEM, “Le De Contemplatione du Chartreux Guigues du Pont,” Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 10 (1929) 259–289. DENIS LE CHARTREUX, Opera omnia, 44 v. (Tournai 1896–1935) 41:252–253.

[B. DU MOUSTIER]

GUILDAY, PETER K.

Educator, church historian; b. Chester, Pa., March 25, 1884; d. Washington D.C., July 31, 1947. Guilday was the second of 12 children of Irish-born Peter Wilfred Guilday and Ellen (Keenan) Guilday of Eddyston, Pa. Guilday attended Catholic schools in Chester and Philadelphia. In 1902, he enrolled at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary, Overbrook, Philadelphia, as a candidate for the priesthood of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. Guilday was awarded a scholarship in 1907 and went to the American College at Louvain, Belgium, for the last two years of theology.

Following his ordination on July 11, 1909, Guilday did graduate work in history at the Catholic University of Louvain. He spent a year of research in the archives of France, Belgium, Spain, and Italy, and another year of study in London. Upon the publication of his dissertation The English Colleges and Convents in the Catholic Low Countries, 1558–1795 in 1914, Guilday was awarded the doctorate by Louvain. The outbreak of World War I interrupted his labors on a second volume, which was never completed. In 1914, the rector of the Catholic University of America, Thomas J. Shahan, asked for his services. Shortly thereafter, Guilday arrived at the institution with which he was to be associated until his death 33 years later.

In April 1915, the Catholic Historical Review was launched, at his instigation. This was a quarterly journal to which Shahan lent the prestige of his name as editor-in-chief; five of the University professors served as editors. Of these, Guilday had the most active role. He continued as the principal editor until 1941, when failing health compelled his practical retirement. During the last six years of his life, Guilday had the title of editor-in-chief, although the editorial work had largely devolved upon the other editors. The AMERICAN CATHOLIC HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION (ACHA), which he founded in Cleveland, Ohio, in December 1919, was designed to further interest in Catholic history through annual meetings of scholars and teachers and the encouragement of research and writing. As the useful character of the ACHA was realized, its membership gradually increased. By the time of its founder's death, the original band of 50 had grown to about 800 members.

Aware of the neglect that had overtaken the history of Catholicism in the U.S. since the death of John Gilmary SHEA, Guilday inaugurated a program of courses in that field leading to the master's and doctor's degrees at the Catholic University of America. For many years, the program he began was unique in American Catholic higher educational circles. Guilday gave tremendous impetus to the revival of American Catholic history through his own writings. Six years before his death, a bibliographical article appeared in the Catholic Library World that had an accompanying list of Guilday titles that filled more than two closely printed pages. There was a steady stream of scholarly publications from his pen, beginning with The Life and Times of John Carroll, First Archbishop of Baltimore, 1735–1815 (1922). His publications also included An Introduction to Church History (1925), a manual of historical method for beginners; a two-volume biography of John England, first bishop of Charleston (1927), which was perhaps his best work; and the useful general account, A History of the Councils of Baltimore, 1791–1884 (1932). Besides these, Guilday edited the joint pastorals of the American hierarchy in 1923 and, later, three volumes containing the papers read at annual meetings of the ACHA. He also wrote a monograph on the lay trustee troubles of the Church in Virginia (1924) and the only real biography of John Gilmary Shea (1926). Moreover, Guilday had gathered a good deal of material and had completed some rough drafts of chapters for a life of John Hughes, first Archbishop of New York. However, he was forced to abandon this project because of ill health.

In 1925, the University of Notre Dame was the first of eight institutions to confer an honorary degree on him; the last of these institutions was Fordham University, which conferred an honorary degree to him in the year of its centennial, 1940. In 1926, Guilday was decorated by the king of the Belgians for efforts on behalf of the restoration of the University of Louvain library. In 1935, Guilday was made a domestic prelate by PIUS XI. Death came to Guilday after a long period of suffering. According to his wishes, his funeral took place from the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, and he was buried in the University lot in Mt. Olivet Cemetery in Washington.

Bibliography: J. T. ELLIS, "Peter Guilday: March 25, 1884–July 31, 1947," American Catholic Historical Review 33 (1947) 257–268. J. J. KORTENDICK, "Contemporary Catholic Authors: Monsignor Peter K. Guilday, Historian of the American Catholic Church," Catholic Library World 12 (May 1941) 263–269, 282.

[J. T. ELLIS]

GUILT

Guilt is the fact or awareness of having done wrong, of violating a norm or prescription. It is a universal phenomenon and a basic trait of human nature. To speak of guilt is to presuppose a world where there are norms and laws and persons with freedom and responsibility who, if they choose, can act against that established order.

Peter K. Guilday. (The Catholic University of America)

There are varying types of guilt relative to the nature of the wrongdoing. Legal or juridical guilt refers to the guilt associated with committing a crime, a violation of law, to which penalties are often attached. Ethical or moral guilt focuses on violation of moral norms. Religious guilt comes from injuring one's relationship with God through breaking divine law. Collective guilt refers to the wrongdoing of a group such as a family or nation. The multi-dimensional reality of guilt invites interdisciplinary investigation, especially from the perspectives of theology, psychology, and anthropology.

Subjective and Objective Aspects. Guilt viewed as a subjective reality brings to the fore a person's awareness of having done wrong and the feelings aroused by knowing that one has transgressed in some way. Psychology has given primary attention to guilt feelings which are at times inappropriate or disproportionate responses and not necessarily related to any wrongdoing. Psychology is helpful in sorting out inauthentic guilt feelings from a true consciousness of guilt. Often in a given instance there is a mixture of both authentic and inauthentic guilt.

The degree of awareness, knowledge, freedom, and responsibility has direct bearing on the imputability of guilt but may or may not diminish or eliminate the presence of guilt feelings. Such feelings include unpleasant experiences of distress, such as self-reproach, self-blame, remorse, and anxiety. Guilt feelings typically trigger in the person experiencing them various remedial or expiatory actions such as confession, repentance, and reparation. The positive social role of such feelings is to impel a person to take responsibility and to mend broken relationships.

Objective guilt designates either the condition of the person who has committed the wrong or the behavior which constitutes the violation of the community's values and laws. Thus, in a court of civil law one is pronounced guilty of a particular crime even though one may not feel subjectively guilty or culpable. Objective guilt refers to the misdeed, a true violation of the law, whether or not it was freely intended by the transgressor.

Historical and Phenomenological Perspectives. In primitive societies guilt was related to a disturbance of the social or religious order. To incur guilt was to bring misfortune on oneself and one's community. Various means of expiation developed to restore the former equilibrium. Sacrifices and other ritual actions were efforts to undo the damage and to remove the guilt through various symbolic mediations such as a scapegoat.

Paul Ricoeur's study of the language of confession throws further light on the epigenesis of guilt. He traces a movement from the primitive sense of defilement, characterized by the feeling that one is infected and the experience of dread because of such contamination, to the sense of sin. With the notion of sin the sense of a relationship with God becomes prominent. Sin represents a refusal of God's demand. Guilt internalizes and personalizes the consciousness of having sinned. It anticipates the punishment due to sin by the burden it places on consciousness.

Guilt itself evolves and represents according to Ricoeur a significant advance in human comprehension of fault. In contrast to a simple fear of punishment, guilt acknowledges that an injustice has been done, an interpersonal relationship has been damaged. Guilt ultimately leads to a transformation such as Job experienced where in the face of suffering he surrenders to an order that transcends him. The perceived inescapability of guilt in human life leads to the relinquishing of narcissistic goals and embracing a life focused not on one's own righteousness but on a transcendent Other.

Psychological and Developmental Perspectives. Guilt as a psychological reality has been discussed by Freud and a host of other psychologists. Freud saw guilt feelings as arising when there is tension between a strict superego, the internalized authority of parents and other significant figures, and the ego, the executive agency of the personality. The superego emerges into prominence with the resolution of the Oedipal struggle somewhere around the age of five. Guilt, for Freud, makes its appearance toward the end of early childhood. The sources of such guilt are dread of authority and more specifically a fear of the loss of love of those on whom one depends. Freud saw the positive role that guilt can play in life. He was particularly aware of how it functions in human society as a control on destructive aggression. Freud's attention, however, was focused especially on the unconscious and displaced guilt that often stands behind neurotic symptom formation. According to Freudian psychodynamics, guilt feelings aroused in one area of conflict can be shifted and displaced onto another so that the person remains unaware of the true source of the guilt feelings. Various attempts at atonement are largely ineffective in bringing relief. Sometimes the guilt feelings are not conscious at all but stand behind a person's repeated failures or other self-punishments. Freud's explanation of the origin of religion tries to make comprehensible humanity's need for reparation by postulating a primal parricide for which humans still have guilt even though oblivious of it and its origin.

Erik Erikson, building on Freud's theory, has described a crisis in the life of the play-age child around the issues of initiative and guilt. The child desires to do things like others do but struggles with the awareness that some things are forbidden. Erikson suggests that conscience steps in as the governor of initiative. A healthy resolution of the crisis has the child moving forward unhampered by an excessive sense of guilt and with the sense of initiative prevailing.

Some psychological theories place the emergence of guilt earlier than did Freud or Erikson and see its appearance as an important developmental milestone. Melanie Klein sees the emergence of guilt in the first year of life and links it to the child's growing ability to tolerate ambivalence. According to Klein's formulations, the life of every infant is replete with both gratifications and frustrations. The normal infant responds to frustrations with a desire for retaliation; in other words, he or she would like to respond to the sources of frustration by punishing the inflicting party. In the course of infant development, the child senses that the "good mother" who provides food and the "bad mother" who frustrates its desire for immediate satisfaction are one and the same person. The child begins to sense its mother is a whole person in which it finds both good and bad. It senses, too, that the very one on whom its well-being depends is the same one it has wished to destroy. But now the child begins to feel concern for the mother and goes through a period of anxiety related to the feeling of almost having lost or destroyed the mother on whom it depends. An experience of guilt over such possible damage signals the ability to tolerate the ambivalence of conflicted feelings of love and hate directed to the same object. The child deals with this guilt through reparation and various restitutive gestures.

The British pediatrician and psychoanalyst D. W. Winnicott, building on Klein's ideas, connects the emerging sense of guilt in the infant with the beginnings of a capacity for concern. He draws attention to the importance of the stable emotional environment provided by the primary care-givers for all this to unfold appropriately. Deprivation in that environment is seen as contributing to the genesis of the antisocial tendency marked by the absence of any sense of guilt.

Guilt Pathologies. Two forms of guilt pathology are commonly recognized. Scrupulosity has to do with an experience of guilt that is too intense and disproportionate or focuses on acts that are not immoral or are beyond the responsibility of the subject. Such excessive guilt feelings seem to arise because of very aggressive, even sadistic, internal monitoring. On the other hand, an absence of appropriate guilt feeling characterizes people with character disorders such as the antisocial or narcissistic personality disorder. In these cases, the etiology often has to do with serious deficiencies in the early interpersonal environment.

Abnormal versus Normal Guilt. In sorting out guilt that has more a psychological origin from guilt in the more properly religious sense, it may be helpful to distinguish between the conscience and the superego. Conscience, in psychoanalytic terms, is an ego function acquired through healthy appropriation of the values and norms of the society to which the individual belongs. As such, it intends love rather than commanding that observance of some rule. It is other-directed, value-oriented, and dynamic in the sense that it looks at the nuances of a particular situation. The experience of guilt engendered by conscience is proportionate to the value at stake.

In contrast, superego is a more primitive agency that censors behavior in terms of past commands. It tends to induce guilt that is often disproportionate to the value at stake. It is more static and does not pay attention to the nuances of situations. It simply enforces past commands of authorities in a blind fashion.

In the average individual, guilt is an ambiguous experience inasmuch as it can respond to a genuine violation of a value or norm as well as to commands internalized during childhood development and still operative in the dynamic unconscious. As Karl Rahner has correctly pointed out, guilt is truly a borderland between theology and psychotherapy, an area where both ministers and psychotherapists may have vital roles to play.

Bibliography: C. BAUDOUIN and L. BEIRNAERT, "Culpabilité," in Dictionnaire de spiritualité (Paris 1953) 2:2632–2654. S. FREUD, Civilization and Its Discontents, tr. J. STRACHEY (New York 1961). J. W. GLASER, "Conscience and Superego: A Key Distinction," Theological Studies 32 (1971) 30–47. M. KLEIN, Envy and Gratitude and Other Works 1946–1963 (New York 1975). K. RAHNER, "Guilt and Its Remission: The Borderland Between Theology and Psychotherapy," in Theological Investigations 2, tr. K.-H. KRUGER (Baltimore 1963) 265–81. P. RICOEUR, Freud and Philosophy: An Essay on Interpretation, tr. D. SAVAGE (New Haven, Conn. 1970); The Symbolism of Evil, tr. E. BUCHANAN (Boston 1967). A. VERGOTE, Guilt and Desire: Religious Attitudes and Their Pathological Derivatives, tr. M. H. WOOD (New Haven, Conn. 1988). D. W. WINNICOTT, Through Paediatrics to Psycho-Analysis (New York 1975).

[R. STUDZINSKI]

GUILT (IN THE BIBLE)

In the Bible many Hebrew and Greek words, which are usually translated as "sin," should in many contexts be rendered as "guilt," i.e., the condition that follows upon the act of sin and perdures. This shows that the Israelite and the early Christian did not make much of a distinction between sin and guilt.

In the Old Testament

Connected with a dynamistic concept of SIN was the term 'āwōn, especially when it was used in the sense of something borne or removed; e.g., in Ps 37(38).5, "For my iniquities ['āwōn] have overwhelmed me" (i.e., became too great a burden to be borne); in Ps 31(32).2, "Happy the man to whom the Lord imputes not guilt. . . ." The original background of the term pictures a twisted body [Is 21.3; Ps 37(38).7]. Traditionally, 'āwōn was translated as iniquity, connoting something monstrous and intolerable. Thus to bear one's iniquity signified to be guilty. Cain said, "My punishment is too great to bear" (Gn 4.13). Here 'āwōn meant both the misfortune inflicted as punishment and the state of guilt. Suffering brought with itself the sense of guilt. The Septuagint translators used ἀνομία (literally, "lawlessness") to translate 'āwōn; St. Paul and St. John used the same Greek term for the mystery of iniquity or sin.

The word peša, a very profound theological term for rebellion, generally indicated a transgression against God and defiance of His rule. In Jb 33.9, however, it signified the guilt accompanying sin: "I am clean and without transgression; I am innocent; there is no guilt in me." The word heṭ' often designated the penalty following guilt, e.g., "Anyone who curses his God shall bear the penalty of his sin" (Lv 24.15; cf. 19.17; 20.20; 22.9; Nm 9.13; 18.22; Is 53.12; Ez 23.49).

The word 'āšām quite clearly expressed ideas relative to guilt; however, its use was confined mainly to matters of ritual law and it often connoted a material and objective quality, such as ritual uncleanness. Such guilt did not necessarily involve voluntary sin, but it could be incurred unintentionally. Yet an inadvertent error or mistake (šegāgā) still bound one to a voluntary atonement (Lv 4.2; 5.15, 18). Even though one was not aware of the error, he became ritually unclean and guilty (Lv 5.2). The verb ʾāšām (be guilty, condemned) and the noun ʾašmā (guilt, guiltiness) referred also to moral guilt, “And the Chaldean land is full of guilt to be punished by the Holy One of Israel” [Jer 51.5; cf. Ps 67(68).22]; the wrath of God was upon Juda and Jerusalem because of the ʾašmā of the people, i.e., false worship (2 Chr 24.18). The term ʾāšām was used also for a guilt offering (1 Sm 6.3–4, 8, 17 where the golden boils and mice were presented as gifts of reparation). Thus, one and the same word was used for the state of guilt as well as its remedy.

Guilt and Its Consequences. Guilt incurred the wrath of God. Since guilt involved a transgression of the divine will, the wrath of the Holy One of Israel was enkindled. In the early history of Israel the most evident examples of this were the earth’s swallowing of the rebels Dathan and Abiram, and their families (Nm 16.32), and the punishment of Achan for appropriating some spoils of Jericho, which had been put under a ban; Achan’s guilt was also the reason for the Israelite defeat at Ai (Jos ch. 7). The guilt incurred by the sons of Eli aroused Yahweh’s wrath upon the priest and his family (1 Sm 2.27–36; 2.11–14). As a result of his census David, too, incurred the wrath of God; even though he was pardoned, the people were struck by a plague (2 Sm 24.10–17). For the wickedness of Manasseh, Yahweh brought evil upon Jerusalem and Judah (2 Kgs 21.10–15).

The notion of collective guilt was basic in these examples. Yahweh’s anger was conceived as not ending with the punishment of the responsible individual but as perduring for generations: “I will not be quiet until I have paid in full your crimes and the crimes of your fathers as well” (Is 65.7), and “We recognize, O Lord, our wickedness, the guilt of our fathers” (Jer 14.20). The Prophets looked at the misfortunes Yahweh would inflict on His people as a result of the people’s guilt, especially of their leaders, the king, nobles, priests, and false prophets.

Sense of Collective Guilt. From their earliest days the Israelites showed a sense of collective guilt (see RESPONSIBILITY [IN THE BIBLE]). Although they considered that God held all responsible for their individual sins, they felt especially bound as a people to the obligations of their COVENANT with YAHWEH. The covenant’s blessings were parallel to the guilt that they incurred by breaking it. Solidarity in blessings led to solidarity in guilt. Thus, the individual suffered for the community’s sin and the community for the individual’s. The expression of this outlook is found in Ex 20.5–6, “For I the Lord, your God, am a jealous God, inflicting punishment for their father’s wickedness on the children of those who hate me, down to the third and fourth generation; but bestowing mercy down to the thousandth generation.” The family group too was a significant moral entity; its head transmitted guilt to its every member (Jos 7.24–26).

Later, the DEUTERONOMISTS modified this notion: “Fathers shall not be put to death for their children, nor children for their fathers; only for his own guilt shall a man be put to death” (Dt 24.16; cf. the application of this rule by Amaziah in 2 Kgs 14.6). Yet during the Exile the older opinion so perdured [“Our fathers, who sinned, are no more, but we bear their guilt” (Lam 5.7)] that Ezekiel argued against it at length: “‘Fathers have eaten green grapes, thus their children’s teeth are set on edge?’ As I live, says the Lord God: I swear that there shall no longer be anyone among you who will repeat this proverb in Israel. For all lives are mine; the life of the father is like the life of the son, both are mine; only the one who sins shall die” (Ez 18.2–4 and the rest of ch. 18). Without denying collective guilt, Ezekiel brought personal guilt to the fore and accentuated personal responsibility. Thus, despite national calamity there was hope for the individual.

Because of their deeper knowledge of God and of sin’s reality, a more spiritual sense of guilt was developed by the Prophets and the Wisdom literature. Along with the evolving of a profound realization of sin as a personal offense against the loving kindness of the covenant God, these writers linked the sense of guilt with a deep sorrow and shame. Guilt and sin became for them an overwhelming burden: “There is no health in my flesh because of your indignation; there is no wholeness in my bones because of my sin, for my iniquities have overwhelmed me; they are like a heavy burden, beyond my strength” [Ps 37(38).4–5; cf. Is 1.5–6; Ezr 9.6].

Prayers for Forgiveness. Mindful of Yahweh as a loving husband and forgiving father, of His justice as equaled by His mercy, of His anger enduring only for a moment whereas His kindness endured forever, the Israelite confessed his guilt and expressed his sorrow in prayer. Examples are numerous: “As long as I would not speak, my bones wasted away with my groaning all the day, for day and night your hand was heavy upon me; my strength was dried up as by the heat of summer. Then I acknowledged my sin to you, my guilt I covered not. I said, ‘I confess my faults to the Lord,’ and you took away the guilt of my sin” [Ps 31 (32).3–5; see also Ps 50(51).11; 24(25).11; 78(79).9]. Isaiah and Jeremiah have other examples: “Behold you are angry, and we are sinful; all of us have become like unclean men, all our good deeds are like polluted rags; we have all withered like leaves, and our guilt carries us away like the wind” (Is 64.5); “Even though our crimes bear witness against us, take action, O Lord, for the honor of your name—even though our rebellions are many, though we have sinned against you” (Jer 14.7; Ezr 9.6–15). This yearning for forgiveness became even more evident in late Judaism, e.g., in Dn 9.4–19, which ended with these words, “O Lord, hear! O Lord, pardon! O Lord, be attentive and act without delay, for your own sake, O my God, because this city and your people bear your name!” Basic to all these concepts was the conviction that adversity was always a sign of guilt for the Israelite, indicating that Yahweh was angry with him and wanted him to beg forgiveness by confessing his guilt.

Guilt as Debt. The Septuagint (LXX) translators apparently introduced a more juridical category of guilt—that of debt, which became prominent in later Judaism. Sin as an act against God Himself belonged to the order of religion and its remission depended solely on God; the consequence of sin was not a stain that man could wash away. By sin, therefore, man incurred a debt that only God could remit. This concept was introduced by the LXX’s use of ἀφίημι (to cancel or pardon a debt) in the technical formula for atoning for sins (Lv 4.20; 5.10, 19). In Lv 19.22 and Nm 14.19 the LXX used the same Greek term. Other Hebrew terms for taking away and pardoning sin, never associated with the idea of remitting a debt in the Hebrew, were also translated by this verb. The substantive ἄφεσις was used for the releasing of property to its hereditary owner during the JUBILEE YEAR and for messianic liberation [Is 61.1; Jer 34(42 LXX).8, 15, 17]. In Sir 28.2 ἀφίημι translated forgiving another man’s injustice to oneself and not God’s forgiveness of the debt of sin. Also, in non-Biblical Judaism the notion of sin and guilt developed as a debt toward God, and God’s RETRIBUTION for sin’s debt became involved in the concept of guilt.

In the New Testament

The terminology of guilt, its connotations in the Synoptic Gospels, in the Pauline Corpus, in Hebrews and the Catholic Epistles, and in the Johannine literature are of significance in considering guilt in the New Testament.

Terminology. The common New Testament word for sin, ἁμαρτία, was used also for the notion of sinfulness and guilt. Primarily it meant a sinful act, but at times it connoted an internal condition of guilt. St. Paul and St. John used it for a sinful way of life and a state of alienation from God. The word ὀφείλημα (debt) in Mt 6.12 (cf. Lk 11.4) expressed a notion of guilt—the debts that the sinner bore in God’s sight. Another term, ἔνοχος, meant guilty of a fault or liable to punishment (e.g., Mk 3.29; Mt 5.22). The term ἀνομία (lawlessness or iniquity) translated the common Hebrew term for guilt, ‘awōn.

In the Synoptics. A context of FORGIVENESS OF SINS or the remission of guilt or debt was usually the background for the Synoptics’ consideration of guilt. The Judaic concept of sin as debt toward God was basic to their thought, although it was not the only notion involved with guilt. In the LORD’S PRAYER, Christ inculcated that charity, in the form of the mutual forgiveness of offenses against one another, was necessary to receive God’s forgiveness of the debt of guilt (Mt 6.12). The original meaning of debt signified a financial debt and had been adopted from the language of commerce; but in its religious meaning it signified failure toward God with the consequent burden of guilt. It expressed the totality of man’s feeling of indebtedness for having offended God and, in its context, connoted that only the Father’s gratuitous love could pardon His children’s debts. St. Luke’s version of the Lord’s Prayer was less Judaic in its use of ἀφρτία in place of ὀφείλημα.

In the parable of the unmerciful servant (Mt 18.21–35), again, in a context of cancelling a debt (18.21 is antithetical to the 70 times 7 vengeance of Lamech, Gn 4.24), the notion of guilt and sin as an enormous debt was implied (18.24: “one was brought to him who owed him 10,000 talents”—a fantastic debt). The lesson of the parable was that, unless men forgave each other their comparatively small debts (10,000 talents had a relationship to 100 denarii of 600,000 to 1), they would not be forgiven the enormous debt they owed to God. (For being guilty of an everlasting sin in Mk 3.29, see SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.)

On the DAY OF THE LORD those guilty of iniquity (ἀνομία) would be excluded from the KINGDOM OF GOD (Mt 7.23) and would be cast into GEHENNA (Mt 13.41). Thus, the lawlessness of evil acts was clearly connected with divine JUDGMENT. The Synoptics further described sin as resulting in slavery to the DEVIL, an idea that entered into their concept of guilt. Thus, Christ’s victory over the devil led to freedom from sin and guilt.

Pauline Teaching on Guilt. Paul followed the Judaic concept for sin as a debt in his references to sin’s remission and sinful man’s REDEMPTION (Col 1.14; Eph 1.7; Rom 3.24–25); his notion of remission, however, included the taking away of sin as well as the paying of a debt. Sin for Paul was not merely an external debt but something very much interior to man, almost natural to him. In Romans, Paul crystallized his doctrine on sinfulness and on the need that it caused in man. All men were subject to sin (Rom 3.9–18, 23) and could be justified only by receiving, through faith, the grace of Redemption won by Christ's propitiatory death (Rom 3.24–25). The believer, once justified, could then be saved through the internal gift of the Spirit and the life that he lived in Christ (Rom 5.1–11). Without the Spirit man could do no good; even though he delighted in the law of God, sin held man back, for he was dominated by sinful flesh. The flesh led to death; the Spirit, to life and peace. Sinfulness, then, brought with it its own condemnation, enmity toward God and death, i.e., a guilt that could be overcome only by a new life vivified by Christ's Resurrection from the dead (Rom 8.1–11).

Guilt in Hebrews and Catholic Epistles. Although specific terms for guilt or debt were scarce in these Epistles, sin and its consequences certainly were not. The notion of sin in Hebrews was that of disobedience, lack of confidence, and failure to follow the way indicated, i.e., faults that had characterized the Israelites in the desert; it was also a stain that had to be washed away and purified (Heb ch. 3). In Heb 2.15 Christ's mission was to deliver those "who throughout their life were kept in servitude by the fear of death," through His own death. As eternal high priest Christ made atonement and took away sin and guilt by offering Himself as a sacrifice: "But as it is, once for all at the end of the ages, he has appeared for the destruction of sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb 9.26). Because of His sinlessness Christ could do what was beyond the power of the former sacrificial system (10.2–4, 11). With the new covenant sealed by Christ's blood came the means whereby there would no longer be consciousness of sin (10.2). Now there was a "new and living way" of access to God (10.20–22).

In the Epistle of St. James sin and guilt had Judaic overtones as in Paul's thought. Man's passions, i.e., his evil desires, were the source of sin (1.14), which led eventually to death. Evil desire, sin, and death followed upon each other. Lack of a loving mercy brought the severest condemnation of guilt (2.8–13). For James, friendship with this world (4.4), a sterile faith (3.14–26), condemnation of brothers (4.11–13), and even the omission of good works (4.17) incurred the guilt of sin. The injustice of the rich was especially condemned by him (5.1–6). The guilt of sin, however, could be removed by turning to God in humble sorrow (4.6–10) and by the prayers and sacramental actions of the community, coupled with the sinner's acknowledgement of guilt (5.14–17).

For 1 Peter, Christ's death and Resurrection were the source of the forgiveness of sin and guilt. The mystery of sin and guilt had been solved by Christ's suffering, although He was innocent; the Christian, even when he was guiltless, had to suffer with Christ (2.18–25). When Christians suffered, therefore, it was no longer because of their personal guilt alone, but because of their part in God's plan for destroying all sin and guilt through Christ's death because of sin (3.17–4.2).

Guilt in Johannine Writings. St. John proclaimed the universality of sin and guilt when he reported John the Baptist's description of Jesus as the lamb of God who was to take away the sin of the world (Jn 1.29, ἀμαρτία in the singular). Sin was the fundamental hostility of the world against God; by succumbing to it, a man rejected Christian vocation, divine filiation, and communion with God, and continued to accept the devil's domination (Jn 8.34–47; 1 Jn 5.18–20).

The consequences of sin led even further to the point of hatred. The worker of evil "hates the light" (Jn 3.19). The guilty world hated Christ precisely because His mission was to destroy sin by performing His Father's works (Jn 15.18–25). By the divine paradox, however, the working out of this hatred, namely the Crucifixion, effected the destruction of the devil's domination through sin and guilt (Jn 12.31–33).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 912–18. J. HASTINGS and J. A. SELBIA, eds. Dictionary of the Bible, 5 v. (Edinburgh 1942–50) (1963) 354–55. For additional bibliography, see SIN (IN THE BIBLE).

[J. LACHOWSKI]

GUILT, THEOLOGY OF

From the standpoint of theology guilt is a willing and knowing violation of a person's relation to God. Such guilt may generate guilt feelings which may be an appropriate response to the perceived violation. To be guilty in a theological sense is to find oneself feeling personally responsible before God and others for the evil that was intended or has been done out of one's freedom. Conditions for real, theological guilt include knowledge and freedom. To the extent that knowledge is lacking or freedom is in some way impaired, guilt is lessened.

Inward and Social Aspects. Theological guilt can be further seen as having both an inward element and a social element. The inward element has to do with the awareness an individual has of personal wrongdoing. The individual may find authentic moral awareness obscured by guilt feelings that have their psychic origin in various types of environmental and social conditioning. Psychological analysis can be helpful in sorting out authentic from inauthentic guilt. The social element of guilt pertains to the consequences that result from someone having posited the evil act. Here it is common to speak of juridical guilt, which implies there is a penalty to be paid or compensation to be made. Juridical guilt may remain after the wrongdoer has dealt with the inward element through a process of repentance. Some of the consequences of guilt include the loss of grace and a wrong frame or mind.

Deed and State. Theological guilt, like sin itself, may be categorized as either a deed or a state. As a deed it is equivalent to what has traditionally been called actual sin. As a state it is equivalent to habitual sin. It is important to avoid conceiving guilt viewed theologically as merely an offence against legal custom or as a wrong action with various unwanted effects. Most radically guilt means a total and definitive decision of the human person against God. It is what makes sin sin. In the concrete this guilt must be weighed according to the degree to which it fully involves the person in his or her freedom. In a radical “no” to God who addresses humanity in an ongoing dialogue the person denies the very supporting ground of his or her activity and existence. Guilt is a falsification of the reality of the human person.

Origin of Personal Guilt. Determining or pinpointing the origin of personal guilt in one’s life is not as easy as it might seem. Upon reflection people find themselves confronting a cloudy picture in which current acts are always set against a series of decisions already made. In other words, it is impossible to recall a state of complete moral indifference or to trace one’s guilt to any one particular act with absolute certainty.

Furthermore, the arena in which human persons live and act is itself an influence on them which is difficult to sort out. It is in fact a realm of interpenetration to which individuals contribute by their actions and in which they receive in turn the impress of other persons’ activity—both virtuous and sinful. In analyzing his or her own guilt, the individual is once again in an ambiguous situation. It is difficult to assess the influence various forces have had on one’s decision making and the extent to which they may qualify the decision made. Such considerations have made modern Christians aware of how human freedom is limited. Yet over the course of a life freedom orients and shapes who a person will be. Guilt as the ultimate refusal of self to God indicates what the human person can choose to become in virtue of human freedom.

A somewhat different view of the human person and guilt is found within Protestant theology, especially in that branch influenced by existentialism. Paul Tillich found in existentialism an analysis of the human predicament that invited correlation with the classical Christian interpretation of human existence. Human existence for Tillich involves a movement away from humanity’s own essential being and from God, the ground of being. Tillich expresses this by speaking of human persons in their existence as being estranged from the ground of being, from other beings, and finally from themselves.

Human persons find themselves in present finitude as beings united with nonbeing; they find themselves separated from that which they ought to be and to which they are strangely related. Here is the duality of essential and existential being as it is concretized in the human person. According to Tillich, human persons as they judge and look over what they have done are struck by a profound ambiguity between good and evil. Just as they experience contradiction within themselves, their own existential being separated from essential being, being limited by nonbeing, so they discover in what they do that a mixture of being and nonbeing emerges and expresses itself in the ambiguity between good and evil. Human persons thus render a negative judgment on themselves and experience this judgment and the ambiguity that occasioned it as guilt. Guilt, for Tillich, is the person’s awareness of the ambiguity that characterizes what is done and leads him or her to render a negative judgment on the self. In Tillich’s view, what the human person must do in spite of the anxiety of guilt and condemnation is to courageously affirm the self. It is God’s acceptance of the person that alone gives courage to take within the self the threat of nonbeing which is at the root of the anxiety of guilt and condemnation. For Tillich all human acts are simply expressions of estrangement; all bring about guilt. It is never possible for humans to perform good and salutary acts for all existence is itself guilty. In contrast, the Catholic position stresses cooperation with grace through good works in the overcoming of guilt and a fuller conversion to God.

In the Catholic perspective the guilty person knows that he or she can repent, be forgiven, repair damage, and continue to grow through good works. In line with the Protestant emphases the guilty likewise should know that they cannot earn God’s love but must simply respond to and accept God’s gift of forgiveness.

Bibliography: K. RAHNER, “Guilt—Responsibility—Punishment within the View of Catholic Theology,” Theological Investigations 6, trans. K. H. KRUGER and B. KRUGER (Baltimore 1969) 197–217. P. SCHOONENBERG, Man and Sin: A Theological View, trans. J. DONCEEL (London 1965). P. TILlich, The Courage to Be (New Haven 1952). J. D. WHITEHEAD and E. E. WHITEHEAD, Shadows of the Heart: A Spirituality of the Negative Emotions (New York 1994).

[R. STUJINSKI]

Capital: Conakry.
Size: 94,926 sq. miles.
Population: 7,466,200 in 2000.
Languages: French; Malinke, Poulor, and local languages are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 149,530 Catholics (2%), 6,346,290 Sunni Muslims (85%), 223,980 Protestants (3%), 523,450 (7%) follow indigenous beliefs, 222,950 without religious affiliation.
Metropolitan See: Conakry, with suffragans N'Zérékoré and Kankan.

GUINEA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Republic of Guinea is a tropical, largely agricultural country located in western Africa. It borders the North Atlantic Ocean and Guinea-Bissau on the west, Senegal and Mali on the north, the Ivory Coast on the east and Liberia and Sierra Leone on the south. Guinea also includes several islands, including Tombo. Its marshy seacoast rises to hills and an eastern plateau region crossed by several rivers. Guinea's major crops include rice, bananas, coffee, ground nuts and pineapple; natural resources such as iron ore, bauxite, gold and diamonds are also found within its borders. Formerly known as French Guinea, the country left the French community and became an independent republic in 1958.

Dependent on the Vicariate Apostolic of Sierra Leone until 1897, Gambia was created the Prefecture Apostolic of French Guinea (vicariate in 1920), when it numbered 300 Catholics. The hierarchy was established in 1955 when the Vicariate of French Guinea was made the Archdiocese of Conakry and metropolitan see for the country.

History. Beginning in the 5th century and lasting for 300 years, Guinea was part of the kingdom of Ghana. Portuguese traders first explored the area in the mid-15th century, and missionaries occasionally visited the coastal region in their wake. The region became part of the Mali Empire in the 1500s, and Islam was introduced in the 17th century. After the encroachment of the region by the French, Guinea became a French protectorate in 1849, and joined French West Africa in 1895, despite efforts to unite and Islamicize the eastern half of the region by African militant Samori Touré. Meanwhile, organized evangelical efforts had begun in 1877, when the HOLY GHOST FATHERS established a mission in Boffa. Their presence in Guinea was at the invitation of King Katty's sons, who had attended a mission school in Senegal. The White Fathers began to evangelize the northern section in 1896 and established a mission at Bouyé in 1897. By 2000, although Christianity had made headway in the cities, along the coast and in the forest region, little progress was made in the rest of the predominately Muslim country, particularly the central Fouta Jallon region, which remained vehemently Muslim.

Made an overseas territory of France following World War II, Guinea finally achieved independence on Oct. 2, 1958. President Ahmed Sékou Touré's repressive and isolating measures led to the nationalization of all schools, the suppression of Catholic youth organizations and the placing of restrictions on missionary activities. When Archbishop Gérard de Milleville protested, he was expelled from the country and replaced by Raymond Tchidimbo, an African, in 1961. Six years later all foreign missionaries were expelled from the country. By 1971 Tchidimbo, too, had proven to be problematic; amid a storm of accusations against Portugal for attempting to topple the government, the archbishop too, was charged with trying to overthrow the government and imprisoned until August of 1979. Touré, who was considered a brutal dictator, died in April of 1984, allowing the more liberal Committee of National Redress to assume power.

During the last decades of the 20th century the military government began to relax, repealing its curbs on missionaries and permitted the minor seminary at Kindia to reopen. One thousand political prisoners were released, several of them Catholics. Major seminarians were allowed to attend the regional seminary in Sebikhotane, Senegal. After 1984 the Church was once again allowed to operate Catholic schools in the country. By 2000 Guinea had 51 parishes, 63 diocesan priests, 18 religious priests, 16 brothers and 91 sisters working within its borders, as well as aiding refugees fleeing the violence spilling over the borders from Sierra Leone and Liberia. The constitution allowed for freedom of religion, and the government extended tax breaks and other subsidies to the Church as a member of its Association of Churches and Missions.

In 1993 free democratic elections were held in Guinea for the first time in over 40 years, although the military government which had been in power since 1984 was elected amid accusations of fraud. By 2000 the sluggish economy, burdened by foreign debt service and the need for humanitarian aid created by hundreds of thousands of refugees, prompted concerns regarding Guinea's political future. Church leaders and religious worked closely in support of United Nations' relief efforts, as well as advocating peaceful resolutions to the political conflicts of neighboring countries.

Bibliography: Bilan du Monde, 2:425-429. Annuario Pontificio. For additional bibliography see AFRICA.

[J. BOUCHAUD/EDS.]

GUINEA-BISSAU, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Formerly known as Portuguese Guinea, the Republic of Guinea-Bissau is located in west Africa, and is bound by the Atlantic Ocean on the southwest and west, by Senegal on the north, and by Guinea on the east and south-east. With its marshy terrain rising to only 800 feet above sea level in the southeast, Guinea-Bissau’s agricultural products include cashews and peanuts, rice, palm oil, timber, fishing, and beeswax, while natural resources consist mainly of phosphates, bauxite, and yet-unexploited deposits of petroleum. The region’s tropical climate is punctuated by a long dry season in winter that is characterized by harmattan winds.

In 1951 Guinea-Bissau was made an overseas territory of Portugal. Gaining its independence in 1973, the country held its first multiparty elections in 1994, beginning more than a decade of government instability. Reliant for much of its wealth upon agriculture, the region has been increasingly threatened by overgrazing, deforestation and the desertification caused by the encroachment of the Sahara. By 2000 it was one of the 20 poorest nations on earth. Most of the country’s Muslims resided in the interior and the life expectancy of an average citizen of Guinea Bissau was 49 years in 2000.

History. After its discovery by the Portuguese in 1446 Guinea-Bissau became a Portuguese colony. Beginning in 1462 the Franciscans were entrusted with evangelization of the region, which depended ecclesiastically Capital: Bissau.

Size: 13,948 sq. miles.
Population: 1,285,715 in 2000.
Languages: Portuguese; Crioulo and tribal languages are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 41,320 Catholics (3%), 578,572 Muslims (45%), 24,766 Protestants (2%), 641,057 practice indigenous religions (50%). Most Catholics, as well as other Christians, live in Bissau.
Diocese: Bissau, immediately subject to the Holy See.

on the bishop of the CAPE VERDE ISLANDS. Zealous slave traders who made no distinction between pagan and Christian Africans seriously hampered missionary activity, which was confined to the coastal area. In 1694 Cape Verdean Bishop Vitoriano do Porto became the first bishop to visit the area. Missionary activity remained sporadic until 1866 when a few Portuguese secular priests arrived in an attempt to revive the missions. British claims to the area were withdrawn in 1870, and Guinea-Bissau's boundaries were formalized by 1905.

As late as 1929 there was only one priest in the country. Restoration of the mission began in 1933 when French Franciscans established a mission. Priests from the Milan Foreign Missions Seminary arrived in 1947. After the Portuguese concordat with the Holy See in 1940 the situation improved greatly. The Prefecture Apostolic of Portuguese Guinea, with its seat in Bissau, the capital, was created in 1955 and placed under the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs; it was created a diocese in 1977. Pope John Paul II visited the country in 1990.

During the 1950s a nationalist movement took shape in the region and armed resistance against the Portuguese colonial government began in 1962. The country gained its independence 11 years later, on Sept. 24, 1973, and a new constitution was put into effect in May of 1984. Four years after a new government was put in place during the elections of 1994, a military uprising against the new leaders triggered civil war, despite the efforts of Bissau Bishop Settimio Ferrazzetta to avert the coup. Further violence erupted in June of 1998 when the country was invaded by Senegalese troops. A military junta wrested control in 1999, and appointed a transition government, which ruled until February of the following spring, when Koumba Yalla was elected president. Further efforts to unseat the government were diffused through the efforts of other Church leaders, although nationalist sentiments continued to simmer among members of certain ethnic groups. The country's constitution reflected its political history: modified several times after its initial adoption, it nonetheless continued to provide for freedom of religion and imposed no state church.

During almost a decade of civil war, the Church worked to provide humanitarian aid for the region's growing refugee population. By 2000 there were 29 parishes, 11 secular and 54 religious priests, 15 brothers and 132 sisters at work among Guinea-Bissau's people. Catholic-run schools included 23 primary and four secondary schools. Faced with an economy devastated by a brutal civil war, Guinea-Bissau drew the attention of Pope John Paul II in the late 1990s. In addition to repeated calls for peace and a plea in 1998 to end "the immense displacement of population," the pope asked that nations take steps to put a halt to the trafficking of arms to the region.

Bibliography: R.A. LABBAN Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Guinea-Bissau (Metuchen, NJ 1996). R. PATTEE, Portugal na Africa contemporânea (Coimbra 1959). R. WILTGEN, Gold Coast Mission History (Techny, IL 1956). Bilan du Monde, 2:429-430. Annuario Pontificio has data on all diocese. For additional bibliography see AFRICA.

[R. PATTEE/EDS.]

GUIRAUD, JEAN

French historian, journalist; b. Quillan (Aude), June 24, 1866; d. Saint-Martin-de-Brethencourt, near Paris, Dec. 11, 1953. Jean Baptiste Hippolyte Guiraud, brother of the historian Paul Guiraud (1850-1907), was a brilliant student in Carcassonne and at the Lycée Saint-Louis in Paris. In 1885, he went to the École Normale Supérieure. As a member of the École Française in Rome (1885-89), Guiraud specialized in the study of medieval religious history. The École Française had undertaken the publication of the 13th-century papal registers. Guiraud participated in this project by editing the Registres d'Urbain IV in four volumes and the Registres de Grégoire X in one volume. These researches in Rome permitted Guiraud to become a docteur ès lettres in 1896, after he published his main thesis, L'État pontifical après le Grand Schisme, and his complementary thesis in Latin (then obligatory) on the Dominican monastery in Prouille: De Prulianensi monasterio ordinis Praedicatorum incunabilia (1206-1345). In 1898, he was appointed professor of medieval history on the faculty of letters at Besançon. His Cartulaire de Notre-Dame de Prouille (1907) completed his study of the monastery in Prouille. Its lengthy preface contained a very important study of the Albigensian heresy in the 12th and 13th centuries.

Guiraud's scholarly activities were interrupted by the law separating Church and State (1905) and by the other religious difficulties then disturbing France. As an ardent Catholic who opposed the law of separation, Guiraud published several brochures on La séparation et les élections (1906), delivered numerous lectures, and created Catholic associations for heads of families. In 1917, he quit the university and until 1940 he acted as director of La Croix in Paris. He contributed much to the high quality of this important Catholic newspaper and exercised great influence on the French Catholic press. Late in his career, Guiraud returned to historical studies and set out to produce a history of the medieval Inquisition to the end of the 15th century, based on a detailed study of documents. However, his two volumes on the Histoire de l'Inquisition au Moyen Âge (1935–38) did not complete his project. The first volume was in great part a reproduction of the preface to his Cartulaire de . . . Prouille. The second volume did not deal with the period after the 13th century. The work has been criticized for its lack of synthesis and its inexact references.

Guiraud published historical works of a more popular type that gained a wide reception. Saint Dominique (1899) and L'Inquisition médiévale (1929) were both translated into English. In this class were also L'Église et les origines de la Renaissance (1902), Questions d'histoire et d'archéologie chrétienne (1906), and Histoire partielle. Histoire vraie (4 v. 1911–26). Some of these popularizations, particularly the last one mentioned, were marked by a tone of apologetics that Guiraud's more scholarly books avoided.

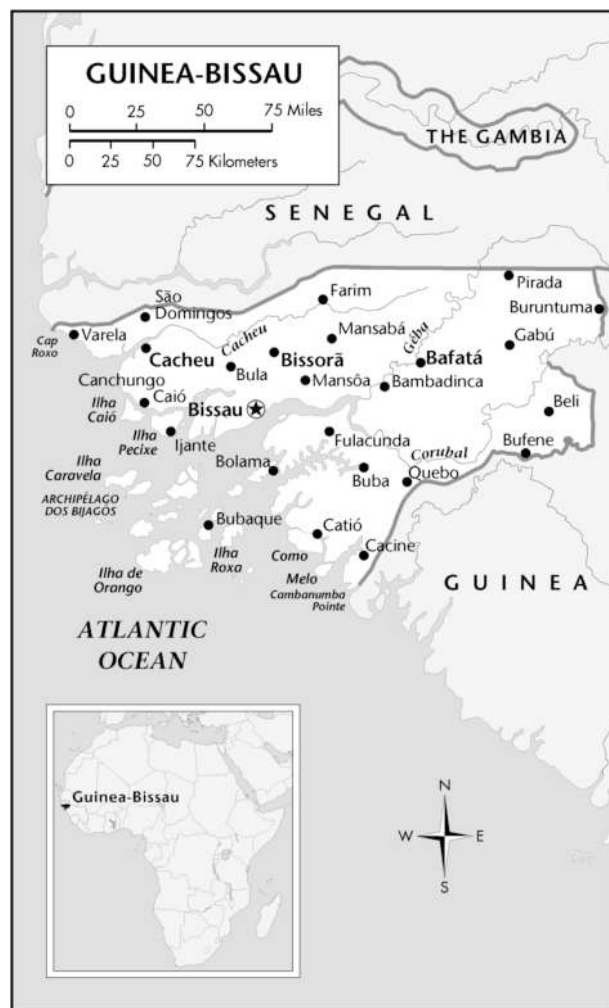

Bibliography: J. TOUTAIN, "Jean Guiraud (1886–1953)," Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 67 (1955) 341–344.

[Y. DOSSAT]

GUISE

The most illustrious branch of the House of Lorraine, named after the town of Guise. It rose to the peak of its power in the 16th century.

Claude, first Duke of Guise, fifth son of René II, Duke of Lorraine; b. Castle of Condé, Oct. 20, 1496; d. Joinville, April 12, 1550. He settled in France as a result of the contest with his elder brother Antoine over the succession to the Duchy of Lorraine. Claude accompanied King Francis I to the war in Italy and received 22 wounds at the battle of Marignano (1515). He defeated the English at Hesdin (1522), drove the Germans from Champagne (1523), and suppressed the peasant revolt in Lorraine (1527). King Francis I created him duke, and he was made governor of Champagne, and distinguished himself in the campaign of 1542 in Luxembourg and in the defense of Landrecies in 1543. It was he who established the eminence of the Guises. In 1513 Claude married Antoinette de Bourbon, sister of Charles, Duke of Vendôme. Among their 12 children were Francis, second Duke of Guise; Charles, Cardinal de Lorraine; Louis, Cardinal de Guise; René, Marquis d'Elbeuf; and Mary, mother of Mary Stuart of Scotland. According to his son Francis, Claude was fatally poisoned.

Mary, daughter of Claude; b. Nov. 22, 1515; d. Edinburgh Castle, June 10, 1560. She married first (1534) Louis II d'Orléans, Count de Longueville, and then in 1538, James V of Scotland, who died in 1542, leaving her with one child, Mary, Queen of Scots. Mary of Guise became regent in 1554.

Francis, second Duke of Guise, one of France's greatest generals, son of Claude; b. Château de Bar, Feb. 17, 1519; d. Orléans, Feb. 24, 1563. He early acquired the reputation of an intrepid soldier; he fought his first battles at Montmédy (1542), Landrecies (1543), and Saint-Dizier (1544) and was scarred by the wound received near Boulogne in 1545 and hence known as "Le Balafré." In 1551 Francis took part in the campaign that won

Francis, the second Duke of Guise, leads the French forces that captured Calais in 1558. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Metz, Toul, and Verdun for France; in 1552 to 1553 he defended Metz against Charles V of Germany and distinguished himself at the battle of Renty (1554). Francis later commanded the expedition against Naples (1556), after which he was nominated lieutenant-general of the kingdom by Henry II. He also fought against the English, and his capture of Calais (1558) and other places (Guines, Ham, Thionville, Arlon) led to the Treaty of Cateau Cambrésis (1559). With his brother Claude, Francis became all-powerful during the 16-month reign of Francis II, who married his niece Mary Stuart. The duke lost direct influence over Charles IX, who was dominated by Catherine de' Médicis. He formed a triumvirate (with Constable Anne de Montmorency and Marshal de Saint-André) to oppose the policy of Catherine, who was bent on concessions to the Huguenots. On March 1, 1562, he was involved in the Vassy Massacre of the Huguenots, which began the Wars of Religion. After capturing Rouen (October), he defeated the Huguenots at Dreux (December) and besieged Orléans. He was mortally wounded by a pistol shot fired by the Huguenot Jean Poltrot de Méré (February 18). In 1549 he had married Anne d'Este, daughter of the Duke of Ferrara. His children were Henry, third Duke of Guise; Catherine; Charles de Mayenne; Louis, Archbishop of Reims. Francis was the author of Memoirs.

Charles, brother of Francis; b. Joinville, Feb. 17, 1525; d. Avignon, Dec. 26, 1574. Charles was archbishop of Reims (1538) and cardinal (1547), known as Cardinal de Guise until 1550 and as Cardinal de Lorraine thereafter. Extremely intolerant, he tried to bring the Inquisition to France and was responsible for the cruel suppression of the Huguenot conspiracy of Amboise against the Guises (1560). He became head of the family after his brother's assassination (1563) and conducted an ineffectual and cowardly policy. He was a patron of men of letters such as Rabelais and Ronsard and founder of the University of Reims (1547-49). His daughter Anne d'Arne married Besme (Jean Yanowitz), who was responsible for killing Adm. Gaspard de Coligny during the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day. Charles left many letters and sermons, e.g., Oraison prononcée au colloque de Poissy (1562). He also participated in the Council of Trent.

René, Marquis d'Elbeuf, brother of Francis; b. 1536; d. 1566. René took part in the defense of Metz (1552), the battle of Renty (1554), and the recapture of Calais (1558). He was general of the galleys. René was father of Charles de Lorraine, who was later created duke. It is through his line that the House of the Guises has survived to the present day.

Henry I, third Duke of Guise, Prince of Joinville, son of Francis; b. Dec. 31, 1550; d. Blois, Dec. 23, 1588. Scarred by a wound received at Dormans (1575), like his father he was named "Le Balafré." Early in life he participated in campaigns against the Turks (1566) and against the Huguenots at Saint-Denis (1567) and at Jarnac and Moncontour (1569). Henry forced Coligny to raise the siege of Poitiers (1569), directed the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (1572), and was instrumental in 1576 in organizing the League, of which he became leader. He had ambitions of becoming King of France. On May 12, 1588 ("Day of the Barricades"), he became the idol of the Parisians and master of the crowds in revolt, but he found circumstances unfavorable for a coup against royalty. Guise was assassinated by order of King Henry III at the States-General of Blois. He had married Catherine de Clèves in 1570 and had 14 children, of whom five survived.

Louis, son of Francis; b. Dampierre, July 6, 1555; d. Blois, Dec. 24, 1588. He became archbishop of Reims in 1574 and cardinal in 1578. He supported the League, and like his brother Henry, was assassinated by command of King Henry III.

Charles, Duke of Mayenne, son of Francis; b. March 26, 1554; d. Soissons, Oct. 3, 1611. Charles went to war with his brother Henry and participated in the defense of Poitiers and in the battles of Moncontour and Brouage. He became lieutenant-general of the realm. After the death of his brother Henry, although pressed by relatives (especially his sister Mme. de Montpensier), he refused to contend for the crown; instead he concentrated his ability on giving the League a strong organization. After submitting to King Henry IV in 1596, he served him faithfully. Mayenne married Henriette of Savoy; they had four children, of whom three survived.

Bibliography: H. FORNERON, Les Ducs de Guise et leur époque, 2 v. (Paris 1877). R. DE BOUILLÉ, Histoire de ducs de Guise, 4 v. (Paris 1849–50). DU TROUSSET DE VALINCOUR, La Vie de François de Lorraine, duc de Guise (Paris 1681). A. BAILLY, Henri le Balafré, duc de Guise (Paris 1953). H. D. SEDGWICK, The House of Guise (Indianapolis 1938). For additional bibliography, see WARS OF RELIGION; LEAGUE, THE HOLY; ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, MASSACRE OF.

[W. J. STANKIEWICZ]

GUITMOND OF AVERSA

Theologian; b. Normandy, at the beginning of the 11th century; d. Aversa, between 1090 and 1095. Guitmond entered the Benedictine monastery of La Croix-Saint-Leufroy (Evreux). He then went to the Abbey of Bec to benefit from the teaching of Lanfranc (d. 1089), by whom he was strongly influenced. During Gregory VII's pontificate (1073–85), Guitmond was on the verge of being nominated a bishop in England by William the Conqueror. URBAN II (d. 1099) named him bishop of Aversa (southern Italy) in 1088, but we know little of his activity as bishop.

Doctrine and Influence. Guitmond's theological importance comes from his work De corporis et sanguinis Domini veritate, a controversial and apologetical book that was written as a dialogue with the monk Roger and directed against BERENGARIUS of Tours. The latter was challenged especially by Durand of Troarn, Lanfranc, Guitmond, and Alger of Liège since, invoking certain texts of St. Augustine, he seemed to deny the reality of the Real Presence. Nevertheless, it must not be forgotten that, in the 11th century, sacramental terminology was still defective; the Berengarian controversies corrected it. This is not the place to study Berengarius's beliefs; rather, we will treat only the principal points of Guitmond's exposition. The latter refutes two categories of Berengarius's teaching: the doctrine of the umbratici (for whom the Eucharistic Body is only the shadow and the figure of the historical Body of Christ) and that of the impanatores (who believe in a hypostatic union of Christ and the bread). Guitmond's arguments are scriptural, patristic (especially St. Augustine and St. Ambrose), and rational; he also appeals to the magisterium. Christ is neither impanatus nor invinatus by the conversion of the bread and wine to His Body and Blood. After Consecration, the sensible appearances—which Guitmond was the first in the history of Western theology to call accidentia—continue to exist, but are "converted"; the term "transubstantiation" is not used yet, but its meaning is implied. For Guitmond, the Eucharistic accidents by God's will remain after the conversion of their substances into the Body and Blood of Christ. Berengarius was also troubled by the paradox of the double presence—historical and Eucharistic—of Christ's Body. Guitmond explains to him that Christ's Eucharistic Body is not subject to the laws of material division and of corruption. It is wholly present in each part of the consecrated Host and is not broken when the Host is. However, Guitmond erred when he declared that the Real Presence remains after the corruption of the species, or their consumption by animals, etc. This doctrinal imperfection can be excused, for the theology of the Sacraments was just beginning to make progress. This treatise, which takes apart and refutes Berengarius's De sacra caena, seems to anticipate the scholastic dialectic. Although it borrows its arguments and patristic texts from its ancestors, it contributes to the development of the terminology and the dogma of the Eucharist. It was used later, especially by Alger of Liège and Gregory of Bergamo (d. 1146). Its influence is already noticeable in the canonical collections of the end of the 11th century; the scholastics also quote Guitmond. Thanks to him, we possess a precise exposition of the Eucharistic opinions of the 11th century. Thus, he is one of the principal sources of information about Berengarius of Tours.

Works. Of his Epistola ad Erfastum (Patrologia Latina 149:1501–08), G. Morin has published the unedited ending [Revue Bénédictine 28 (1911) 96–97]. It is an answer to an inquiry from Erfast, Abbot of Lyre (Normandy), about the Trinity; in it, Guitmond lists his other writings: Confessio de sancta Trinitate, Christi humanitate corporisque ac sanguinis Domini nostri veritate (Patrologia Latina 149:1495–1502), and De corporis et sanguinis Domini veritate libri tres (Patrologia Latina 149:1427–94). J. Leclercq has found an authentic and unedited gloss on this treatise [Revue Bénédictine 57 (1947) 214]. It may have been written between 1075 and 1078; the original title is perhaps that of the manuscript Vat. Reg. lat. 237: De corporis et sanguinis Christi veritate in eucharistia. The Oratio ad Gulielmum I Anglorum regem, which was attributed to Guitmond (Patrologia Latina 149:1509–12), is very likely an apocrypha that was written by Odoric Vitalis.

Bibliography: G. MORIN, “La Finale inédite de la lettre de Guitmond d’Aversa à Erfast, sur la Trinité,” Revue Bénédictine 28 (1911) 95–99. J. LECLERCQ, “Passage authentique inédit de Guitmond d’Aversa,” ibid. 57 (1947) 213–214. P. SHAUGHNESSY, The Eucharistic Doctrine of Guitmund of Aversa (Rome 1939). F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1989–92. J. R. GEISELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1272. P. DELHAYE, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd’hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET, 5:422–423.

[R. GRÉGOIRE]

GUÍZAR VALENCIA, RAFAEL, BL.

Bishop of Veracruz, Mexico; b. April 27, 1878, Cotija, Michoacán, Mexico; d. June 6, 1938, Mexico City.

Rafael was one of 11 children born to the wealthy hacendados Prudencio Guízar González and Natividad Valencia Vargas. A brother, Antonio, became bishop of Chihuahua. Rafael's studies were begun at home and completed in the seminary of his native Diocese of Zamora; he was ordained on June 1, 1901.

Missionary Work. From the first, the future bishop felt an overwhelming impulse to work as a home missionary. He had physical and spiritual gifts that fitted him for this work, and eight days after his ordination he began his first missionary journey, which lasted almost two years. While assigned to the diocesan seminary as spiritual director, Rafael continued his mission work by founding with his own funds a school for poor girls and on June 3, 1903, a Congregation of Missionaries of Our Lady of Hope with a special college in Jacona, Michoacán, as well as another college for boys in Tulancingo, whose graduates he hoped would enlist in large numbers in his missionary congregation. The missionaries were to dedicate themselves to work in Mexico and the neighboring nations. In June 1910 Guízar was forced to order the dissolution of his foundation of missionaries. Neither the disappointment of the failure of his personal foundation nor the honors that he received dimmed the zeal of this priest for the missions, and by 1910 he had preached innumerable missions in six Mexican states, especially in southeastern Mexico.

The chaos in Mexico consequent on the fall of Porfirio Díaz ended the home missions but opened for the young priest new opportunities to serve the souls of his fellows. Disguised as a peddler, a homeopathic physician, or an accordion player, he traveled with the armies of the revolution, ministering to the wounded and preaching whenever the opportunity presented itself. Often he returned from these missions of mercy with his hat and clothes pierced with bullet holes. Often too, his priestly ministrations would rouse the anger of the revolutionary leaders and on numerous occasions he was condemned to death. His success in escaping this supreme penalty made him a marked man in so many areas that he finally fled to Guatemala in 1916. Under the name of Rafael Ruíz he was able to take up again his life as a home missionary and in one year married 7,000 couples. In 1917 Guízar landed in Cuba and until the end of 1919 he preached 143 missions there. While preaching a mission in the cathedral of Havana in August 1919, Guízar was told that he had been named bishop of Veracruz. His first reaction was to flee to Colombia where he preached for about four months. But on Nov. 30, 1919, he was consecrated bishop in Havana, and on Jan. 4, 1920, he arrived in Veracruz. His arrival coincided with a disastrous earthquake in a number of cities of his diocese and the new bishop immediately went to help his stricken people.

With the permission of his brothers, he sold the beautiful pectoral cross of gold set with precious stones that they had given him, used the money for the poor, and thenceforth wore a cross made of brass.

Reaction to Persecution. During his episcopate, Guízar had to suffer persecution, as did his brother bishops, especially after Plutarco Elías Calles came to power. Guízar had his own particular cross in the person of the governor of Veracruz, Adalberto Tejada, who on June 17, 1931 decreed that he would permit only one priest for each 100,000 inhabitants. Guízar, recognizing that this decree made it physically impossible for the priests to carry out their duties, closed all the churches in the state in order to force the situation on the attention of the people. Tejada answered with a decree ordering that the bishop should be shot wherever he was found in the state. Guízar at the time was in Mexico City but he ordered his secretary to drive as rapidly as possible to the governor's palace in Jalapa. Guízar boldly walked into the governor's office, stating that he respected authority and that he wished to spare the governor's lieutenants the trouble of shooting him. The daring move paid off because the surprised governor did not dare shoot the bishop. Thus, Guízar was free to organize more than 300 Eucharistic centers, where his priests could minister to the people in ever-increasing numbers while the churches were closed. He was even able to maintain a seminary with more than 100 seminarians, who, though forced to move from place to place, were able to complete their studies and be ordained. In this way the diocese counted more priests at the end of the persecution than at its beginning. Worn out with his work, the bishop died in Mexico City.

In 1950 his body was exhumed and found to be incorrupt. Thereafter his remains were transferred to his titular chapel in the cathedral of Veracruz. The cause for his beatification was introduced in Rome Aug. 11, 1958. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on June 29, 1995.

Bibliography: E. J. CORREA, Mons. Rafael Guízar Valencia: El obispo santo 1878–1938 (Mexico City 1951). J. DE LA MORA, Breves apuntes biográficos del Excmo. y Rvmo. Sr. Dr. D. Rafael Guízar Valencia, obispo de Veracruz (Mexico City 1955). J. A. PEÑALOSA, Rafael Guízar, a sus órdenes (Mexico City 1990). E. VALVERDE TÉLLEZ, Bio-bibliografía eclesiástica mexicana, 1821–1943, 3 v. (Mexico City 1949).

[E. J. CORREA]

GUMBERT OF ANSBACH, ST.

Benedictine abbot bishop, date and place of birth and death unknown. Before 748, Gumbert (or Gundebert) founded St. Mary's Abbey on family lands. In 786, in return for immunity and the free election of abbots, he donated it to CHARLEMAGNE, who c. 800 gave it to Bishop Bernwelf of Würzburg in exchange for other possessions. The abbey, called St. Gumbert by 911, was collegiate when the community moved to St. Stefan in WÜRZBURG (and St. Gumbert's feast was moved from March 11 to July 15). The foundation was suppressed in 1563. Data about Gumbert and the early years of Ansbach derive from Charlemagne's document (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Diplomats 12:205–207). A legendary vita c. 1110 (Acta Sanctorum 4:61) makes him a great lord who renounced the world and gave his possessions to the bishopric of Würzburg and Ansbach. He is not to be confused with Bishop Gumbert of Würzburg (832–842), or with the little-known St. Gumbert (d. c. 675; feast: Feb. 21), CHORBISHOP of Sens, who founded (661) the monastery of Senones in the Vosges, to which he retired.

Bl. Rafael Guízar Valencia.

Feast: July 15 (Vilchband).

Bibliography: S. HAENLE, Ansbach in der deutschen Geschichte (Berlin 1886). A. PONCELET, Analecta Bollandiana 28 (1909) 272–280. L. H. COTTINEAU Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:119–120; 2:3006. K. NECKER-MANN, Heimatscholle Vilchband (Mannheim 1937). A. BAYER, S. Gumberts Kloster und Stift in Ansbach (Würzburg 1948).

[P. COUSIN]

GUMMAR, ST.

Hermit and nobleman; b. Emblehem, Belgium, c. 717; d. Nivesdonck, c. 775. The extant account of his life was written at the end of the 11th century to honor him as the patron saint of Lier. The author, Theobald, claimed that his vita was based on an earlier version, but no earlier life has survived. Gummar (Gomer; in French, Gommaire) is said to have fought in many campaigns under PEPIN III. After building a small oratory at Lier, he divided the rest of his life between solitary prayer and the administration of his estates. He is regarded as one of the outstanding wonder-workers of the Low Countries.

Feast: Oct. 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 5:674–697. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3694–99. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:363–365. É DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945) 1:320–322. T. PAAPS, De heilige Gummarus in de literatur, de liturgie en de volksvereering (Antwerp 1944).

[J. E. LYNCH]

GUNDECAR, BL.

Bishop of Eichstätt; b. Aug. 10, 1019; d. Eichstätt, Aug. 2, 1075. He was educated at Eichstätt cathedral school, was canon of Eichstätt cathedral, and c. 1045, was the chaplain of the Empress Agnes, under whose influence HENRY IV named Gundecar bishop of Eichstätt (1057). He devoted himself to diocesan affairs, notably education. For his clergy he prepared the so-called Gundecarianum, dealing with ritual and liturgy and containing a catalogue of Eichstätt's bishops, which was carried on by successors until 1697. It is important for its miniatures (11th–16th centuries). He undertook the building of the cathedral and consecrated more than 100 churches. Miracles at his grave led to his cult, which spread beyond the diocese after the translation of his relics in 1309.

Feast: Aug. 2.

Bibliography: GUNDECAR, Liber pontificalis Eichstetensis, ed. L. C. BETHMANN and G. WAITZ, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 7:239–253; 25:590–609. Acta Sanctorum August 1:175–189. J. SAX, Die Bischöfe und Reichsfürsten von Eichstätt, 745–1806, 2 v. (Landshut 1884–85) v. 1. F. HEIDINGSFELDER, Die Regesten der Bischöfe v. Eichstätt (Erlangen 1938). R. GRABER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1274.

[D. ANDREINI]

GUNDLACH, GUSTAV

Social philosopher; b. at Geisenheim (Rheingau), Germany, April 3, 1892; d. Mönchengladbach, June 23, 1963. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1912 and was ordained priest in 1923. After graduate studies at the University of Berlin he became professor at the seminary of Sankt-Georgen in Frankfurt-am-Main. In the first years of the National Socialist regime he transferred his teaching activities to the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome. At his retirement, he returned to Germany to become director of the Catholic Social Sciences Center, created by the bishops at Mönchengladbach, but died soon after.

Gundlach was a continuator of the school of Heinrich Pesch, founder of solidarism, whose economic and social thought was inspired by natural law and new scholasticism. He had a powerful influence on Catholic social thinking in the 1940s and 1950s and is reputed, not without foundation, to have had a decisive part in the preparation of various social statements of Pope Pius XII. The introduction of the term “subsidiarity” is attributed to him. In the postwar years he became particularly involved in discussions in Germany over the relation of Catholic social doctrine to socialism, and related questions such as codetermination. His postulation of an absolute right of self defense, however, met with criticism by contemporary theologians.

Bibliography: Die Ordnung der menschlichen Gesellschaft, 2 v. (Cologne 1964–65).

[R. A. GRAHAM]

GUNKEL, HERMANN

Prominent OT scholar; b. Springe (Hanover), Germany, May 23, 1862; d. Halle, March 11, 1932. After teaching NT exegesis for a year at Göttingen (1888), he taught OT exegesis and the history of Israelite literature in Halle (1889–93), Berlin (1894–1907), Giessen (1907–20), and again Halle (1920–27). He was a popular teacher and scholar and had as students Protestant scholars from all over the world. With A. Eichhorn, W. Wrede, and W. BOUSSET, he founded the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (comparative religion school) of interpretation as a reaction and complement to the literary-critical school. He began by freeing the entire Bible from all dogmatic principles; it should be inserted into its proper place in universal human history as an integrating part. In so doing, he concluded that the Bible was the end product of a long preliterary process. He thereby initiated research into the numerous infraliterary stages [Gattungsforschung (study of Biblical literary genres) for the OT, Formenforschung (FORM CRITICISM) for the NT]. He categorized various sayings, legends, and myths, but considered the Sitz im Leben (situation in life) as the most important object of research. This method was applied particularly in his Genesis (Göttingen 1961), Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (Göttingen 1885), and Die Psalmen (Göttingen 1926). He did pioneering work also in the determination of Jewish Apocalyptic literature. His research caused a lively discussion and opposition, particularly among theologians, and resulted in much further work by his students and followers. He was the founder, editor, and substantial contributor to the first edition of Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart. With Bousset he initiated the collection of Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des A.T. und N.T. His suggestions for further research in OT worship, prophecy, and law were carried out in the important works of A. Alt, J. Begrich, M. Noth, and G. von Rad.

Bibliography: H. J. KRAUS, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments (Neukirchen 1956) 300–334. L. HENNEQUIN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 3:1374–77. K. GALLING, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1908–09. J. SCHARBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1274–75.

[L. A. BUSHINSKI]

GUNTBERT OF SAINT-BERTIN

Monk; b. probably at Cormont (Pas-de-Calais), c. 810; d. after 868. He was the son of Goibert, a rich landowner of Morinia, who during a trip to Rome (826) dedicated Gunibert to St. Peter. Upon his return Gunibert entered the monastic school of SAINT-BERTIN as a resident student. In 831 father and son jointly made gifts to the monastery on Sithiu and the collegiate church of Sainte-Marie, which, although separated after 820, remained on good terms. Gunibert copied and illuminated antiphonaries for Sainte-Marie and the abbeys of Bergues-Saint-Winnoc and Saint-Bertin. At Saint-Bertin he founded the scriptorium, which became famous under Odbertus. After being named provost, he was ordained in 844. His relations with the abbey deteriorated and in 868, old and ill, he left for Rome to petition the Pope for justice. There is no further record of him.

Bibliography: G. COOLEN, "Gunibert de St-Bertin: Chronique des temps carolingiens," Revue du Nord 40 (1958) 213–224. B. GUÉRARD, ed., Cartulaire de l'Abbaye de St-Bertin, 2 pts. (Paris 1840–67).

[G. COOLEN]

GÜNTHER, ANTON

Catholic theologian; b. Lindenau in (what is today) Czechoslovakia, Nov. 17, 1783; d. Vienna, Feb. 24, 1863. His parents were staunch Catholics and quite poor. He attended the village school of Lindenau, secondary schools in Haide and Leitmeritz, and the University of Prague (until 1809). As a student he was frequently obliged to support himself by tutoring children. He was versed in the writings of such philosophers as Descartes, Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. At one time he experienced difficulties about his faith, but these were dispelled by his reading of Sacred Scripture and by his association with (St.) Clement HOFBAUER, among others. Subsequently he completed legal studies. Then he undertook the study of theology, and in 1820 he was ordained.

For two years (1822–24) Günther was a Jesuit novice. Leaving the Jesuits, he settled in Vienna for the remainder of his life. He devoted himself to tutoring, assisting in the care of souls, acting as government censor of philosophical and juridical books (until 1848), and writing. His works include the following: Vorschule zur spekulativen Theologie des positiven Christentums (1828–29), Süd- und Nordlichter am Horizont spekulativer Theologie (1832), Der letzte Symboliker (1834), Thomas a Scrupulis (1835), Die Juste-Milieus in der deutschen Philosophie gegenwärtiger Zeit (1838), and Eurysthesus und Herakles (1843). In addition, he produced a number of books in collaboration with others, as well as articles and book reviews.

In the course of his life, Günther received invitations to join the faculties of such universities as Munich, Bonn, and Breslau, but he refused these, possibly because he hoped to obtain a professorial chair in Vienna, a hope that was never realized. His influence in German theological circles was widespread during his lifetime, not only because of his writings, but also because his pupils occupied chairs in German universities. Nevertheless, Günther also experienced opposition to his theological point of view, especially from Redemptorist and Jesuit theologians. His writings were examined in Rome, and despite the efforts of his friends, some of whom even traveled to Rome, nine of his works were prohibited by the Congregation of the Index on Jan. 8, 1857 (see H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 2828–31). The author announced his acceptance of the prohibition of those works Feb. 10, 1857.

See Also: SEMIRATIONALISM for Günther's views.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 1:2005. P. WENZEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1276–78. G. MARON, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1902–03. H. THURSTON, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion & Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:455–456. F. P. KNOODT, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 10:146–167.

[E. J. GRATSCH]

GÜNTHER OF NIEDERALTAICH, BL.

Monk; b. probably 955; d. Hartmanice, Bohemia, Oct. 9, 1045. A Thuringian nobleman, perhaps of the family of the counts of Schwarzburg, he was more a pagan than a Christian in his youth, but under the spiritual direction of GODARD OF HILDESHEIM he began to reform his life. After a journey to Rome he entered the BENEDICTINE abbey of HERSFELD as a conversus, and he later received the TONSURE in the Abbey of NIEDERALTAICH. He was invited to become abbot at Hersfeld or Göllingen but with a few companions turned instead to a hermit's life in the Bavarian forest. He founded Rinchnach, as affiliate of Niederaltaich, and, penetrating even farther through the Bohemian forest, opened up the Golden Ladder, the trade route from Passau to Bohemia. His hermitage became the goal of many pilgrims. He was an adviser to three emperors, a missionary to the Lusatians, and a friend of STEPHEN I of Hungary, in whose territory he founded several monasteries. He obtained the release of German prisoners by his intercession with Duke Bretislav of Bohemia (d. 1055), and he mediated difficulties between Bretislav and HENRY III. He became the patron of the Abbey of Brevnov, where his tomb was located until 1420, when it was destroyed by the HUSSITES.

Feast: Oct. 9.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 8:419–428. E. HEUFELDER, 1000 Jahre St. Gunther, Festschrift (Cologne 1955). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:155–159.

[G. SPAHR]

GUNTHER OF PAIRIS

Cistercian author; d. Abbey of Pairis, Alsace, c. 1220. Gunther was a minor literary figure of the late 12th and early 13th century. Probably he came from Basel or near there, and before entering the monastery he lived at the court of FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA, where he taught Conrad, the Emperor's third eldest son. This would indicate considerable knowledge of letters before his entrance into monastic life at the Cistercian Abbey of Pairis. His earliest work, the Solimarius, written c. 1180 and dedicated to Conrad, is a verse narrative of the First CRUSADE and, in large part, a poetical version of the Historia Hierosolymitana of Robert of Reims. Obviously interested in the crusading movement, he wrote another work, Historia Constantinopolitana, part prose, part poetry, on the Fourth Crusade, which purports to give an eyewitness account of the expedition supplied by a certain Abbot Martin. His third work, Liburinus, is a poetical version of OTTO OF FREISING'S Gesta Frederici 2–4. H. O. Taylor praised it as “still another good example of the long narrative poem,” and stated that its author “shows himself widely read in the classics.” J. Raby claims that he “was not a mere uninspired imitator” but asserts that “he was not a great poet” but a man who was “a witness to German patriotism and pride.” The authenticity of his works, first claimed for Gunther toward the end of the 17th century, was long questioned until two scholars, G. Paris and A. Pannenberg, working independently, established it in 1870.

Bibliography: Works. Ligurinus, ed. C. G. DÜMGÉ (Heidelberg 1812); Solimarius, ed. G. WATTENBACH, in Archives de l'Orient latin 1 (Paris 1881) 555–561; Historia constantinopolitana . . . , ed. R. Riant (Geneva 1875). Literature. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge. Bibliographie, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris 1905–07) 1:1832–33. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:698–701. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2:128, 217. G. PARIS, Dissertation critique sur le poème latin du Ligurinus attribué à Gunther (Paris 1872). A. PANNENBORG, “Über den Ligurinus,” Forschungen zur deutschen Geschichte 11 (1871). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages, 2 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1957). F. BRUNHÖLZI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1276.

[H. MACKINNON]

GUNTHILDIS, SS.

Possibly three saints who bore this name:

Gunthildis of WIMBORNE, England, an Anglo-Saxon nun who with her daughter, Bertgitha, accompanied LIOBA to Germany and became an abbess in Thuringia. One of the letters of BONIFACE (n. 67) is addressed to her as well as to Lioba and Abbess THECLA.

Feast: Dec. 8.

Gunthildis of Eichstätt, an abbess, whom Gundecar II, bishop of Eichstätt (d. 1075) lists in his Pontifical. He transferred her remains from Suffersheim to his cathedral, where she was honored among the 12 founders of Eichstätt.

Feast: Sept. 28.

Gunthildis of Plankstetten, a servant girl venerated at the Abbey of Plankstetten in the Diocese of Eichstätt, though buried at Suffersheim. If it could be proved, as Bauerreiss suggests, that the servant-girl story (which is found only after 1517) was fiction, both the abbess and servant girl might prove to be one and the same saint who in turn might prove to be the follower of Lioba.

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 6:530–533. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:405–407. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, (Paris 1935–56) 9:448–449. R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns (2d ed. Munich 1958) 1:56.

[L. MEAGHER]

GURY, JEAN PIERRE

Jesuit moral theologian; b. Mailleroncourt, Haute-Saône, Jan. 23, 1801; d. Mercoeur, Haute-Loire, April 18, 1866. He entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Montrouge on Aug. 22, 1824, and in 1828 was sent to study theology at the Roman College. Upon his return to France he spent a year doing ministerial work in Lyons, and then became professor of moral theology at the scholasticate of Vals, near Le Puy, in 1834. He was called to Rome in 1847 to teach moral theology at the Roman College, but was forced to leave because of the revolution in 1848 and he returned to Vals.

His Compendium Theologiae Moralis was published at Lyons in 1850. In it he followed closely the doctrines of Busenbaum and St. Alphonsus Liguori and made use of the works of Cardinal Gousset. Gury aimed especially at the application of general moral principles to contemporary issues. His clarity, careful reasoning, and attention to detail caused his manual to be adopted in many seminaries, including the major ones in Rome. By the time of the author's death, it had reached 17 editions, not to mention adaptations published without his knowledge in Belgium, Germany, Italy, England, Austria, and Spain. Gury was accused of Gallicanism for some of his opinions regarding the obligations binding in France on papal decrees, but replied that he had never called into question the authority of the pope but was merely tolerating the existing situation. Nevertheless he removed certain objectionable paragraphs from the fifth edition of his work. He went to Rome in 1864, and at the bidding of Father Beckx, general of the society, consulted with many outstanding theologians who had been using the Compendium as a text. Profiting by their suggestions, he published a definitive edition in 1865.

Gury's other major work, Casus conscientiae in praecipuas quaestiones theologiae moralis, published at Le Puy in 1862, enjoyed the same widespread success and fame as his earlier work and together with it exercised a considerable influence on moral theology on into the 20th century. More notable among the many later revised and annotated editions of Gury's works are those made by Dumas in France in 1890, Ballerini and Palmieri in Italy in 1907, Seitz in Germany in 1874, Ferreres in Spain in 1909, and Sabetti and Barret in the U.S. in 1902. Gury's influence contributed much to overcoming remnants of the spirit of Jansenism. He was instrumental in bringing back into vogue the old casuistic method, for which he was criticized by his opponents, especially in Germany.

During his years as professor, Gury kept in close contact with the spiritual life of the people by often preaching and hearing confessions, especially while giving missions in the countryside. He was also active in the spiritual direction of priests and religious communities, and in teaching catechism in the villages.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:1956–59. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–1913) 5.1: 1384–85. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1993–95.

[J. H. CAMPANA]

GUTENBERG BIBLE, THE

A three-volume, double-column, 1,282-page printed edition of the Latin Vulgate so-called after its printer, Johann Gutenberg (b. 1394–1399, d. 1468), also known as Forty-two-line Bible, or Mazarin Bible. The name "Forty-two-line Bible" derives from the fact that the text was printed in 42-line columns, while "Mazarin Bible" refers to the first catalogued copy in the Paris library of Cardinal Jules Mazarin. Produced circa 1452–1455 in Mainz, the Gutenberg Bible is the oldest book printed using the movable-type technique.

Little is known about Gutenberg's early life and career. He achieved fame for his invention of the technique of movable-type, which facilitated the mass printing of books in a quick and efficient manner. Differing from the traditional block printing that necessitated the laborious engraving of type on plates, Gutenberg's technique comprised uniform type that could be mass produced in individual molds and assembled on plates, and books printed using a movable printing press derived from wine-press. He used his previous professional experience as a goldsmith to develop special techniques for cutting punches, stamping matrices, and casting individual pieces of type. He experimented with the use of steel alphabets in a press with iron screws and other contrivances. In an effort to literally “reproduce” European books that were hand written by scribes, in a gothic script with many flourishes and ligatures, Gutenberg fashioned a font of over 300 characters. He then invented a variable-width mold and perfected the blend of lead, antimony and tin for casting the type.

Gutenberg Bible. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

While Gutenberg’s discovery changed printing history, it did not immediately change his financial situation. The perfection and success of his invention came at enormous expense. Gutenberg formed a partnership with Johann Fust, a lawyer willing to loan him money. Unfortunately Fust later foreclosed on the loan and acquired all of Gutenberg’s printing equipment in 1456. Gutenberg died three years later and was buried in the Franciscan church at Mainz.

Approximately 180 copies of the Gutenberg Bible were printed and significant parts of 48 copies still survive. The British Library houses two complete copies of the Gutenberg Bible and a small but important fragment of a third copy. One copy, printed on paper, was transferred in 1829 to the British Library with the library of King George III (1738–1820). The other copy was printed on vellum and was bequeathed by Thomas Grenville (1755–1846). Other perfect vellum copies are held by the Library of Congress and the Bibliotheque Nationale de France. In the United States, near complete copies are in the Huntington, Morgan, New York Public, Harvard University, and Yale University libraries.

Bibliography: J. PELIKAN, The Reformation of the Bible (New Haven 1976). J. M. DODU, The Gutenberg Bible: A Commentary, Historical Background, trans. J. M. DODU (Paris 1985).

[J. P. HARRELL]

GUTHLAC, ST.

Anglo-Saxon monk, hermit; b. c. 667–674; d. April 11, 714. He was of royal stock and the brother of St. Pega (feast: Jan. 8). His vita, written by Felix c. 740, the main source of information, states that he began a successful military career at 15, but nine years later took monastic vows at the double MONASTERY of Repton, where his asceticism aroused the dislike of his brethren. There he learned to read and chant, but longing for the spiritual warfare of the hermit’s life, he settled on a remote island in the Lincolnshire fens called Crowland, arriving on St. Bartholomew’s Day, Aug. 24, c. 699. He spent the rest of his life there in meditation and spiritual combat, and had many strange experiences: on one occasion he was attacked by Welsh-speaking devils, on another he was carried by devils to the mouth of hell, whence his patron St. Bartholomew rescued him. Many people came to seek his advice including Ethelbald, afterward king of Mercia. He was ordained priest about eight years before his death. Twelve months after he died, his incorrupt body was elevated and placed in a shrine that Ethelbald later rebuilt. A monastery was eventually established on the site. His relics were twice translated in the 12th century, and are still in CROWLAND ABBEY church. Two Old English poems on Guthlac survive, written c. 1100 and both based on Felix’s Life. His cult was widespread in the Middle Ages, especially in the Midlands.

Feast: April 11; Aug. 30 (translation).

Bibliography: K. NORGATE, Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. 1908–38) 8:816–817. Felix’s Life of St. Guthlac, ed. and tr. B. COLGRAVE (Cambridge, Eng. 1956; repr. 1985). J. ROBERTS, ed., The Guthlac Poems of the Exeter Book (Oxford 1979). A. H. OLSEN, Guthlac of Croyland (Washington, D.C. 1981).

[B. COLGRAVE]

GUTIÉRREZ RODRÍGUEZ, BARTOLOMÉ, BL.

Augustinian missionary in Japan; b. Mexico City, 1580; d. Nagasaki, Japan, Sept. 3, 1632. On June 1, 1597, he pronounced his vows in the Augustinian monastery of his native city. On Feb. 22, 1606, he left for the Philippines. In 1612 he was sent to the Augustinian missions in Japan, and in May 1613 he became prior of Usuki. Because of a decree of banishment, he went into exile in October 1614, but he returned to Japan in 1618. He spent 15 years in Japan in the midst of a bloody persecution. On Nov. 10, 1629, he and his catechist (Bl.) Brother John Shozuburo, were arrested at Kikizu in Arima. After two years of imprisonment at Omura, Gutiérrez was taken with six others, among them two women, to Mt. Unzen to be tortured in the hot sulphur springs for a month. They were then taken to the Cruzmachi prison of Nagasaki. On Sept. 3, 1632, they were carried to the Hill of Martyrs to be burned alive. The firewood was arranged in a wide circle. In the midst were six columns to which one of their fingers was tied with a light string. Many people witnessed the martyrdom. The Christians formed processions and sang psalms. After the fire had died down the charred bodies of the martyrs were burned completely and the ashes thrown into the ocean. Bartolomé was beatified on July 7, 1867.

Bibliography: M. CLAVER, El admirable y excelente martirio en el Reyno de Japón de los Benditos Padres fray Bartolomé Gutiérrez, fray Francisco de Gracia y fray Tomás de San Agustín, religiosos de la orden de San Agustín nuestro Padre, y de otros compañeros suyos hasta el año de 1637 (Manila 1638). A. HARTMANN, "Blessed Bartholomew Gutiérrez, O.S.A.," The Tagastan 22 (1961) 39–52; The Augustinians in 17th Century Japan (Louisvain 1965).

[A. HARTMANN]

GUY DE MONTPELLIER

Founder of the Order of the HOLY SPIRIT at Montpellier; d. Rome, 1208. Very little is known about him. Some historians credit him with an illustrious birth, but the documents call him only Fra Guido or Master Gui. He founded the hospital and the Order of Hospitalers of the Holy Spirit at Montpellier (c. 1180), a lay community for the care of the sick, and wrote for it a rule, which INNOCENT III confirmed (April 23, 1198). This same Pope, having called Guy to Rome (1204), confided to him the hospital of Santa Maria in Saxia, which became the model for similar Holy Spirit hospitals throughout Europe. The order spread into various countries, and soon received not only lay members making simple vows, but also clerics binding themselves by solemn vows. It came to be regarded as a military order, but the religious confined their work to the care of the sick.

Bibliography: Histoire Littéraire de la France 16:599–600. P. A. J. PAULINIER, Gui de Montpellier (Montpellier 1870). P. DE AN-

Guthlac receiving the tonsure, miniature in a roundel, detail from the "Guthlac Roll," of drawings of scenes from the life of the saint, c.1200.

GELIS, L'ospedale di Santo Spirito in Saxia e le sue filiali nel mondo (Rome 1958).

[J. DAOUST]

GUYANA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Co-operative Republic of Guyana, along with neighboring Suriname and French Guiana, occupies an area in northern South America between the mouth of the Amazon and the Orinoco River that was once known as Guiana. Formerly a colony of Great Britain, Guyana is bordered on the north by the Atlantic Ocean, on the east by Suriname, on the south by Brazil and on the west by Venezuela. The marshy coastal region to the north rises to inland plains and thence to densely forested mountains in the west and south. Numerous rivers run through Guyana, and the climate is tropical, marked by rainy seasons and flooding in summer and winter. Agricultural products include sugar, rice, shrimp and timber, while natural resources include bauxite, gold and diamonds. The population is highly diversified and includes a large proportion of East Indians. Guyanese Catholics are predominately people of Portuguese descent. Hinduism and Islam also have large numbers of followers, the majority being East Indians, though a few blacks are Muslim. Many Guyanese also practice the Caribbean Rastafarianism or Obeah religions, often in conjunction with another faith.

Capital: Georgetown.
Size: 83,000 sq. miles.
Population: 697,286 in 2000.
Languages: English; Amerindian dialects, Creole, Hindi, and Urdu are spoken in various regions.
Religions: 140,455 Catholics (20%), 62,755 Sunni Muslims (9%), 208,226 Protestants (30%), 285,850 Hindus (41%).
Diocese: Georgetown, which is suffragan to the archdiocese of Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago. It shares its metropolitan with diocese in Barbados, Suriname, and Aruba.

History. English explorer Sir Walter Raleigh, who in 1595–96 made the first investigations into Guyana, was followed by the Dutch, who also did some exploring in the same decade. The first Dutch colony in Guyana was a trading post established c. 1616, while the Dutch West India Company founded the colonies of Berbice in 1624, and Essequibo and Demerara in 1645. The wars of the late 17th century devastated all European colonies in Guiana, and the upheaval continued through the colonial rivalries of the 18th century and the Napoleonic Wars. The division among European powers was regularized in the conventions and treaties of 1814 and 1815, with Great Britain losing its hold over neighboring Suriname but making Guyana a crown colony in 1831.

After the British took control of the region in 1813, only the Church of England and the Church of Scotland were tolerated in Guyana, and in 1825 the parishes were arranged by alternation between the two Churches. After 1899, however, all religions were extended equal legal status and Guyana received her first native bishop in 1971. On May 26, 1966 the region was granted its independence and it became a republic on Feb. 23, 1970. Under the new socialist government, schools were nationalized in 1979, and the economy was heavily controlled. Through the Guyana Council of Churches, a faith-based Christian coalition, Catholic leaders became increasingly outspoken with regard to government policies. A new constitution was implemented on Oct. 6, 1980, after which restrictions on private religious schools were relaxed and eventually abolished. A coalition government elected in the late 1980s implemented a free-market economy designed to promote an upturn in employment and improve the overall standard of living in the country.

Despite government efforts, drought and political instability resulted in continued economic problems through the end of the 20th century. In addition, the country was burdened by interest payments on large amounts of foreign aid loaned by industrialized nations. In 1999, 20 percent of Guyana's foreign debt was forgiven by the nations holding such debt. The Vatican, which had encouraged such an action through its Jubilee 2000 campaign, while noting its gratitude also expressed disappointment that the forgiven amount was not more. However, the release from some debt service, plus other reform measures, signaled an economic upturn by 2001.

Despite an improving economy, at the beginning of the 21st century Guyana remained among the world's poorest nations. However, it maintained a long history of religious tolerance and the government allowed all faiths to worship freely. In 2000 Guyana had 24 parishes tended by four secular and 50 religious priests. Also working among the faithful were 15 brothers and 132 sisters, who served by teaching at the country's 102 primary and 63 secondary schools or providing other humanitarian aid, such as medical efforts to cope with the spread of AIDS. The Church-run newspaper, the Catholic Standard, was praised for its continued efforts to promote social and political awareness as well as reinforce Church doctrine. Of concern to Catholics within Guyana was the legalization of abortion in 1995, and the Catholic Standard publicized the continued efforts of the nation's churches to overturn that law.

Bibliography: R. T. SMITH, British Guiana (New York 1962). B. N. MOORE, Cultural Power, Resistance, and Pluralism: Colonial Guyana, 1838–1906 (Toronto, 1995).

[J. HERRICK/EDS.]

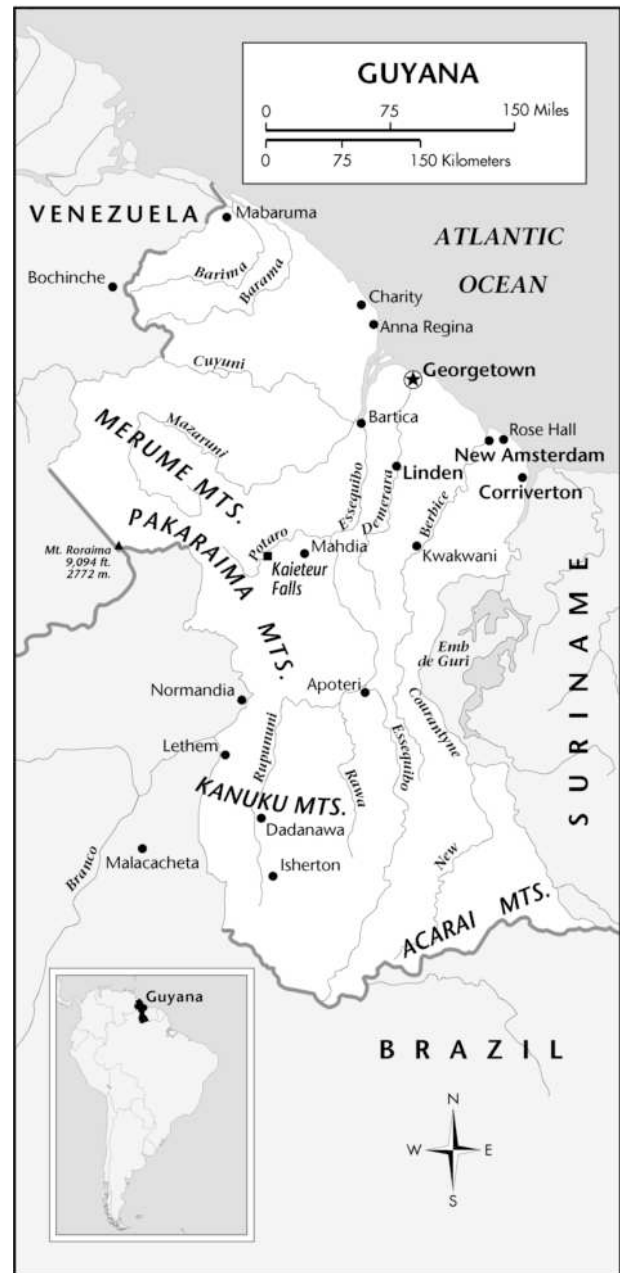

GUYON, JEANNE MARIE BOUVIER DE LA MOTTE

Spiritual writer, famous for her quietist doctrines and the controversies they provoked; b. Montargis, France, April 13, 1648; d. Blois, June 9, 1717.

Life. Her family belonged to the petite noblesse, but the father was old and twice-married, and the mother neglectful, although both were devout; so Jeanne Marie spent most of her childhood in various convents. Her happiness lay largely in the reading first of romances and then of mystical literature, and she developed a strong though unguided attraction for prayer and the interior life. At 16 she was married to Jacques Guyon du Chesnoy, an invalid nearing 40; she was left, after 12 unhappy years, a widow with two children (1676). In 1681, she felt called to the apostolate; she left her son with relatives and took her daughter to Gex, near Geneva, where, at the invitation of the bishop, she assisted in the establishment of a group of converted HUGUENOTS, or Nouvelles Catholiques. Here she encountered the Barnabite Father François La Combe (1643–1715), whom she had once met at Montargis. In Rome La Combe had absorbed some of the ideas of QUIETISM propagated by the Spaniard Miguel de MOLINOS (1640–96), but after becoming Madame Guyon's director, he was before long led by her into a more complete quietism, which she had developed independently and now conceived it to be her mission to spread. From 1681 to 1686 she traveled about Switzerland, Italy, and southern France, often in the company of La Combe. They then went to Paris, under suspicion both as to doctrine and morals. It was known that ever since the Middle Ages, moral degradation had sometimes resulted from the quietist attitude of passivity with respect to virtue or temptation. La Combe was arrested (1687) and imprisoned for life; Madame Guyon was detained in a Visitation convent in Paris (1688). After eight months she was liberated through the interest of Madame de Maintenon (1635–1719), who had secretly married Louis XIV in 1684, and she became the center of devout circles at Court and at Saint-Cyr (Madame de Maintenon's school for girls), and finally the storm center of the quarrel about quietism between Jacques Bénigne Bossuet (1625–1704), Bishop of Meaux, and the Abbé François de Salignac de la Mothe Fénelon (1651–1715), later archbishop of Cambrai. Madame Guyon voluntarily spent some months (1695), at the Visitation convent of Meaux, which she also left freely, but was accused (perhaps through misunderstanding) of fleeing. Now in danger, she hid in Paris, but was arrested and imprisoned at Vincennes (1695–96); then detained at a convent in Vaugirard for two years; later imprisoned in the Bastille (1698–1703). Finally, she was permitted to spend the rest of her life in Blois, at the estate of her son-in-law.

Personal Character. Madame Guyon's personality and history have puzzling aspects. The principal source, her 700-page autobiography, begun in 1687 and concluded just before her death, is revealing but so riddled with contradictions and extravagances that often it cannot be taken at face value. She charmed her hearers, and was quick to find a sympathetic following. Copies of her Moyen Court (1685, Short and Easy Method of Prayer) were carried in the pockets of most of the pious aristocracy. Great schemes for universal reform were built up, only to end in conflict or other disappointing eventualities. Historians are hampered by incomplete, inexact, and often contradictory evidence, even apart from Madame Guyon's own account. Further, the whole history of both quietism and orthodox mysticism bristles with moot points, so that it is not surprising that some modern scholars have tended to approve Bossuet's part in the matter, others Fénelon's; or that some are sympathetic toward Madame Guyon, while others are not. However, the main factual lines in the picture stand out fairly clearly. Madame Guyon's virtues are undeniable, though she often went to extremes, as when her charity led her to abandon not only the greater part of her own fortune but that of her children as well. She can hardly be accused of cowardice, for, when freed from one stretch of imprisonment, she straightway risked another through continuation of the activities that had gotten her into trouble. It is even admitted that she had the makings of a saint, and A. Poulain, SJ, is "led to regard it as probable that she really had the prayer of quiet in her youth" (The Graces of Interior Prayer, 16.38), that is, the first stage of genuine infused contemplation. She has been called half saint, half lunatic, good in heart but weak in mind, and these characterizations appear to be a fair summing-up. In spite of constant apostolic zeal, she lacked prudence and that humility that made the great saints and mystics distrust their own revelations. Although many pages of her writings might find a counterpart in orthodox works (as she was wont to emphasize), the marks of delusion are plain in the whole. She composed a dictionary of mystical terms, assigning to each her own definition, so that while the uninitiated might suppose they were reading the same things the saints had said, adepts of quietism understood her meaning, which was often not at all what the saints had meant. She constantly professed docility to the Church, but was nevertheless so unshakably convinced that she was a prophetess with a great mission that she could have no real understanding of docility. She pushed to strange, often unacceptable, lengths concepts of spiritual motherhood, oneness with her protégés, and her mediation between God and them. Yet so meek was her manner, so subtle her approach, and so apparently wholesome her first influence, that she could boast of having received approval from several prelates, although they later regretted having given it. Even Bossuet found himself in that embarrassing situation.

No proof exists of moral delinquency on the part of Madame Guyon; and La Combe's letter (1698), confessing "sins" supposedly committed with her years before, was extracted under duress, if not actual force, from a man on the way to the complete madness in which he died. Madame Guyon repudiated the charge, even though she readily admitted a familiarity in which she saw no harm. Historians have generally exonerated her, especially in view of her constant obsession with "motherhood," and the want of evidence of interest in any other relationship.

Quietism and Semiquietism. Madame Guyon claimed that she had never heard of Molinos until his condemnation (1687). It appears that besides absorbing quietistic ideas that were in the air at the time, she developed her own doctrine from ideas gathered from her own abundant reading, and colored by her own fantasy. Some cardinal points of her doctrine are: (1) Perfection, even in this life, consists in a continual act of contemplation and love, which includes in itself all the acts of religion, and which, once produced, subsists permanently unless expressly revoked. (2) Therefore, a soul that has reached perfection is no longer obliged to specific acts, distinct from charity, and must suppress generally and without exception all acts proceeding from its own industry, as contrary to perfect repose in God. (3) Such a soul must be indifferent to all things concerning either the body or the soul, and either temporal or eternal goods. (4) In the state of perfect contemplation, the soul must repulse all distinct ideas, and consequently even the attributes and mysteries of Christ. Besides the Moyen Court and the Life, her chief works amplifying these ideas are the Ex- planation of the Canticle of Canticles (1685) and the Spiritual Torrents, circulated only in manuscript during her life.

Madame Guyon met Fénelon in October 1688, at Beynes, near Versailles, in the home of the Duchess of Charost. Fénelon, little impressed at first, was soon not only befriending Madame Guyon but following her guidance, and the great drama was underway. He did moderate her rashness of expression, so that later he was really defending a guyonisme fénelonisé (Calvet). One key to the Bossuet-Fénelon quarrel is the fact that whereas Fénelon had scarcely bothered to read Madame Guyon's earlier effusions, Bossuet fastened on every detail, frequently with horror. Guyon herself, after seeking pronouncement on her doctrine, took no part in the quarrel, and during most of it was in prison. The chief focal point of the long dispute came to be disinterested love (pur amour), pushed to the point of formally giving up any desire for eternal salvation. Orthodoxy was concerned for hope, and would permit such disinterestedness only on condition that it were God's will, a proviso that could not be fulfilled. Historians generally agree that the extent of Madame Guyon's hold on Fénelon is regrettable, especially in view of the so-called "secret letters" brought to light by Philippe Dutoit (1767). The authenticity of this correspondence from the first two years of their acquaintance has been questioned, but most scholars accept the "proof" of M. Masson. No doubt touches Fénelon on moral grounds; it was a matter of spiritual intimacy, and domination by Madame Guyon, more complete than had been suspected in the lifetime of the principals. On the other hand, it must be admitted that Bossuet knew little about mysticism, at least at the beginning, and was at length carried into a certain violence by the heat of polemics.

Although Fénelon did not see Madame Guyon in their later years, he neither repudiated her as a person nor questioned her good faith. There was some indirect communication between them when members of their respective circles traveled between Cambrai and Blois. She was under the surveillance of a friendly bishop, and entertained visitors, though few were orthodox Catholics, and she went on expounding her ideas of pure love to the end. Her writings spread to other countries, and many Protestants, especially from England and Holland, became interested. They saw in her a victim of ecclesiastical persecution and managed to give some of her teaching a Protestant interpretation. She received all comers as her "children," did not speak of specifically Catholic doctrine or practice, but did keep to the latter in her life, and at her death wrote a testament of adherence to the Church. After her death, she continued to have a following among non-Catholics. Madame Guyon's works have no literary value, and she would almost certainly be unknown to history had she not encountered Fénelon and touched off the great controversy, whose reverberations have not yet entirely subsided.

Bibliography: Oeuvres, ed. P. POIRET, 39 v. in 12 (Cologne 1713–32). T. C. UPHAM, Life and Religious Opinions and Experience of Madame de la Mothe Guyon, 2 v. (New York 1855), “interpreted” translation to make her sound Protestant. R. A. KNOX, Enthusiasm (New York 1961). J. CALVET, La Littérature religieuse de François de Sales à Fénelon (Paris 1956). A. LARGENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:1997–2006. P. POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. W. H. MITCHELL et al., 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1953–55). A. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. Y. SMITH (St. Louis 1950). P. M. MASSON, Fénelon and Madame Guyon (Paris 1907). H. BRÉMOND, Apologie pour Fénelon (Paris 1910); Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, 12 v. (Paris 1916–36). The last two works favor Fénelon and are sympathetic to Madame Guyon; the last work is epoch-making for the entire period.

[L. TINSLEY]

GUZMÁN Y LECAROS, JOSEPH JAVIER

Franciscan priest and first historian of Chilean independence; b. Santiago, 1759; d. there, 1840. While still very young he entered the Franciscan convent and was distinguished for his culture and intelligence. After his ordination in 1782, he became a teacher of grammar and sacred theology. He took advanced courses in the University of San Felipe, obtaining the bachelor’s and doctor’s degrees. On the eve of the independence movement his adherence to the doctrines of the Catholic Enlightenment led him to support the cause of the patriots against Spain, and he influenced his colleagues in the order with his preaching. When the republic was proclaimed (1817), he was hailed as a benefactor of the country. His ecclesiastical career was brilliant: he was the Franciscan prior four times, and only his death prevented his being made bishop of Santiago. His literary career began with the simple autobiographical pages Noticias peculiares a mi and culminated in 1833, when the government entrusted to him the editing of a history of Chile. This was published in popular editions under the title of El chileno instruido en la historia, topográfica, civil y política (Santiago 1834). Modeled after the Historia of Abbé Molina, it employed the didactic form of a dialogue between uncle and nephew, with a division into lessons on the following subjects: geographical environment; conquest and colonization of the country; spiritual and temporal government; preliminaries of, and struggle for, independence; and a vigorous defense of the aborigines. The merit of the work rests more in its magnanimous spirit than in its content, which was not based on historical research. The pages devoted to description of the life of the capital in those years are interesting. He died at an advanced age, high in public esteem, as expressed in the obituary notices written by the famous humanist Andrés Bello and by the liberal historians Diego Barros Arana and Miguel Luis Amunátegui.

Bibliography: G. FELIÚ CRUZ, Historiografía colonial de Chile (Santiago 1958–).

[E. PEREIRA SALAS]

GWYN, RICHARD (WHITE), BL.

Welsh martyr; b. Llanidloes, Montgomery, date unknown; d. Wrexham, Oct. 17, 1584. Gwyn, descended from Bleddyn, Prince of Powys, who ruled Wales in 11th century, was a poet, schoolmaster, and wit. At 19 or 20, he went for a short time to Oxford, then to St. John’s College, Cambridge, where he was supported chiefly by its master, Dr. Bullock. On his return to Wales he became a schoolmaster at Overton in the Maelor, a small district of Flintshire encircled by Denbighshire. There he married and had six children, three of whom died in infancy. As Gwyn’s influence spread, Downham, the bishop of Chester, threatened him with imprisonment if he did not attend the Protestant Church. In weakness Gwyn submitted, but he later repented. Leaving Overton, he went to Erbistock, where again he opened a school, meanwhile living with his family in an old barn. In 1579 he was recognized in Wrexham market place, denounced, and imprisoned. The next day he escaped. In June 1580 he was again seized and this time confined in Ruthin Castle. On one occasion he was carried, heavily shackled, into the Protestant church at Wrexham, but he rattled his chains so loudly that the minister was unable to make himself heard; on another he baited a red-nosed minister, who argued that St. Peter had no more been given the keys of the kingdom of heaven than any Protestant minister, by saying, “The keys you have received are obviously those of the beer cellar.” In all he was indicted seven times before magistrates, was placed in the stocks, fined heavily, and tortured before October 1584, when he appeared at his eighth assizes at Wrexham and was there indicted for treason on the ground that he had tried to reconcile one Lewis Gronow to the Church and had maintained the supremacy of the Pope. Although the jury had been hand-picked, they refused to return a verdict of guilty until, after a night of discussion, they were finally coerced by the judge. The next day when the long sentence was read out, Gwyn said, “What is all this? Is it more than one death?” Mrs. Gwyn, brought into court with her baby, was cautioned not to imitate her husband. She retorted,

GWYN, RICHARD (WHITE), BL.

“If you lack blood, you may take my life as well as my husband’s.” She was imprisoned for her brave words. Gwyn refused an offer of liberty if he conformed. On Oct. 17, 1584, as he left prison for his execution, he said to the sorrowful crowd, “Weep not for me, I do but pay the rent before the rent-day.” At the marketplace the hangman knelt to ask his forgiveness. As the executioner tore out his heart, Gwyn said, “O good God, what is this?” The hangman replied, “It is an execution for the Queen’s Majesty.” Gwyn replied “Jesu, trwgarha wrthyf” (Jesus, have mercy on me). Gwyn is the protomartyr of Wales. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1932 (see ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF).

Feast: Oct. 25.

Bibliography: Blessed Richard Gwyn (Postulation Pamphlet; London 1960). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). A. BUTLER, The Lives of Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York, 1956) 4:202–204. T. P. ELLIS, Catholic Martyrs of Wales (London 1933).

[G. FITZ HERBERT]

H

HAAS, FRANCIS JOSEPH

Bishop, educator, writer, and labor relations expert; b. Racine, Wis., 18 March 1899; d. Grand Rapids, Mich., Aug. 29, 1953. He was the son of immigrant parents, Peter and Mary L. (O'Day) Haas. After attending (1904–13) St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wis., he was ordained for the Archdiocese of Milwaukee on June 11, 1913. For two years he served as curate in Holy Rosary parish and then began teaching and study, becoming one of the American priests most closely identified with Catholic ideals of social justice. He was an instructor at St. Francis Seminary, later studied at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md., and received a Ph.D. (1922) at the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. In 1922 he returned to Milwaukee, where he served as professor of sociology at St. Francis Seminary and Marquette University, and from 1922 to 1931 as dean of the college departments of the seminary and editor of the Salesianum, the college's quarterly publication. He was rector of the seminary (1935–37), director (1931–35) of the National Catholic School of Social Service, Washington, D.C., and dean (1937) of the School of Social Service of Catholic University.

In June 1933, Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt named him a member of the Labor Advisory Board of the National Recovery Administration (NRA) and in October of that year called on him to accept appointment to the National Labor Board. He was appointed (1934) labor representative on the General Code Authority of the NRA and member of the National Committee on Business and Labor Standards. Haas won national renown as a strike mediator; he was widely commended for his work as Federal mediator of a Minneapolis, Minn., truck drivers strike (1934), and he was chosen (September 1935) by Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins to be impartial chairman of a board to arbitrate a labor dispute involving 13,000 cigar makers in Tampa, Fla.

In 1943 Fr. Haas was appointed by President Roosevelt as first chairman of the U.S. Committee on Fair Employment Practices. In the same year he was named bishop of the Diocese of Grand Rapids and was consecrated on November 18 by Abp. Amleto G. Cicognani, Apostolic Delegate to the U.S. Haas continued his work on social problems while administering the Diocese of Grand Rapids. In 1945 he was named by Pres. Harry S Truman to serve on a 15 member Committee on Civil Rights. Haas wrote Shop Collective Bargaining (1922); Man and Society, An Introduction to Sociology (1930); and, as member of the Committee on Long-Range Work Relief of the National Resources Planning Board, Security, Work and Relief Policies.

[G. C. HIGGINS]

HABAKKUK, BOOK OF

The Old Testament Book of Habakkuk presents a variety of literary forms in its three chapters. Exegetes have not arrived at any general agreement about these forms. A look at the contents shows reason for the divergence of opinions, which are presented here with the solutions proposed for the date of composition and the unity of authorship. The commentary from Qumram is also considered briefly.

Nothing biographical is known of the Prophet from Scripture, although he is the subject of a midrashic story in Dn 14.33–39.

Contents. The first two chapters of the book contain a twofold complaint against God, whose answer is given in two oracles. The second oracle is developed in the five "Woes" of ch. 2. A psalm with liturgical annotations is contained in ch. 3. The psalm, which contains indications of having been adapted from a Babylonian cosmic myth, begins as an ardent prayer of supplication and develops into a hymn of praise whose theme is a THEOPHANY of Yahweh advancing to save His troubled people.

The Prophet is primarily concerned with the mystery of evil. Outraged by the sight of injustice, the Prophet, Illumination at the beginning of the Book of Habakkuk in the "Great Bible of Demeter Neksei-Lipocz," the prophet Habakkuk kneeling in prayer, c. 1350.

perhaps speaking as a representative of the righteous, complains of God's seeming indifference (1.2–4). God answers that Chaldea is being raised up as His instrument of vengeance on the unjust. Proud, cruel, and rapacious, the CHALDEANS will suddenly descend on their prey and swiftly depart, having carried out the judgment of the Lord on evildoers (1.5–11). Continuing his complaint, the Prophet still demands an explanation of the suffering of the just (1.12–2.1). The response of the Lord is that "the just man, because of his faith, shall live" (2.2–4). As for the unjust, their evil will be turned back onto their heads (2.5–20). The psalm of ch. 3 is the reconciliation of the Prophet to the Lord's wisdom. Like Job, he states that humble trust in the saving God and acceptance of His will is the only answer to the evils that plague the life of the innocent. The Prophet reaches one of the heights of religious sentiment for the Old Testament in ch. 3.17–19. (See RETRIBUTION.)

Interpretation. This article treats the book as a unit. Since Chaldea is the instrument of God's vengeance, the evildoers would be the wicked Judaites under King Joachim. The language of the condemnatory oracle reflects that used by other prophets in castigating God's people for violations of the covenant. The prophecy should, on the basis of these factors, be placed around 601 B.C.

Other opinions identify the oppressor as Assyria and hence place the prophecy between 625—the year of the appearance of Chaldea—and 612 B.C.—the year of the capture of Niniveh by the Medes and Chaldeans. Still others, assuming Babylonia to be the tyrant, place the Prophet after 605, when the Babylonians gained control of Palestine, and before 597 B.C., when they took Jerusalem for the first time. Some see the Judaites as the first oppressor; Chaldea is God's instrument of judgment. To this the Prophet adds his second complaint, that the last state of the just man is worse than the first. This again places the prophecy about 601 B.C. Positing a growth similar to that of the PENTATEUCH, others claim that to the first preexilic complaint, a second was added during the Exile, adapting the earlier message to a pre-Persian situation around 550 B.C. Finally, understanding Chaldea in 1.6 as referring to the Greeks, some regard Alexander the Great as the oppressor (c. 334). These opinions for the most part consider the psalm to be the work of an editor who lived some time between 600 and 100 B.C.

Qumran Commentary. The pēšer or commentary among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS from Qumran (1QpHb), written in Hebrew, applies the first two chapters of Habakkuk to a situation contemporary with the QUMRAN COMMUNITY; the enemy is probably Rome. The absence of the psalm in this commentary is not an argument against the unity of the three chapters, since the Qumran commentaries in general present no continued development of thought. The psalm is found in the Septuagint as well as in the Masoretic Text.

Bibliography: F. HORST, Die zwölf Kleinen Propheten (HAT 14; 2d ed. 1954). J. TRINQUET, Habaquq (BJ; 1953). C. TAYLOR, JR., G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Bible, 12 v. (New York 1951–57) 6:973–1003. P. HUMBERT, Problème du livre d'Habacuc (Neuchâtel 1944). W. A. IRWIN, "The Psalm of Habakkuk," Journal of Near Eastern Studies (1942) 10–40. W. H. BROWNLEE, "The Jerusalem Habakkuk Scroll," The Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 112 (1948) 8–18. M. BURROWS, "Prophecy and the Prophets at Qumran," Israel's Prophetic Heritage, ed. B. W. ANDERSON and W. HANESON (New York 1962).

[D. J. MOELLER]

HABERT, ISAAC

Theologian; b. Paris, c. 1598; d. Pont-de-Salars, near Rodez, Sept. 15, 1668. Early in his career Habert tried to carry on the literary tradition of his family by publishing several books of poetry. In 1623 he became a fellow of the Sorbonne, licencié and doctor in 1626.

About 1639 it was rumored that Cardinal A. J. RICHELIEU was planning to set up a French patriarchate to achieve greater independence from Rome. Against the Oratorian Charles Hersent, who publicized this idea under the pseudonym of Optatus Gallus, Habert launched his De consensu hierarchiae et monarchiae adversus paraeneticum Optati Galli schismatum factoris libri VI (Paris 1640). Noteworthy is his Latin version of the Greek pontifical entitled Ἀρχιερατικὸν Liber Pontificalis Ecclesiae graecae (Paris 1643).

After 1626 he was canon theologian of Notre Dame Cathedral and preacher at the royal court. In 1642–43, on Richelieu's orders, he vigorously opposed Cornelius JANSEN's AUGUSTINUS in three sermons at the cathedral. In these he compared the book's doctrine with that of Calvin. A. Arnauld attacked these sermons in an apologetic diatribe; Habert responded in his La défense de la foy de l'Église et de l'ancienne doctrine de Sorbonne (Paris 1644). Against an expression in the preface of Arnauld's Fréquente Communion presenting Peter and Paul as the "two-fold heads of the Roman Church," Habert issued his De cathedra seu primatu singulari S. Petri (Paris 1645).

He was named bishop of Vabres in April 1645. The following year at Paris he published against Jansenists and Augustinians his most significant dogmatic work, Theologiae graecorum patrum vindicatae circa universam materiam gratiae libri III, an exposition of the Greek Fathers' doctrine of grace.

Bibliography: F. X. BANTLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:1297. J. ORCIBAL, "Le patriarcat de Richelieu," in Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, abbé de Saint-Cyran, Appendices (Paris 1948), 108–132. L. CEYSSENS, "L'anijanséniste Isaac Habert," Bulletin de l'Institut historique belge de Rome [=Jansenistica minora XII] 42 (1972), 237–305

[C. R. MEYER/J. M. GRES-GAYER]

HABIRU (HABIRI)

Certain groups of people located in the Near East during the second millennium B.C. The Habiru first became known to historians with the publication of the Amarna letters at the end of the 19th century. Since that time the available sources of information on them—in Sumerian, Akkadian, Hittite, Ugaritic, and Egyptian—have increased to almost 200 documents. These sources span at least seven centuries and concern the geographical area along the Fertile Crescent from Lower Mesopotamia to Egypt. The earliest certain reference to the Habiru is from Anatolia in the 19th century B.C., the latest from Egypt in the middle of the 12th century B.C. The Habiru must therefore have existed during the second millennium B.C., and the documentation poses two major questions: who were they? And what was their relationship, if any, to the HEBREWS of the Bible?

The Identity of the Habiru. The Habiru are frequently referred to by a Sumerian expression SA.GAZ (with variants) that has been interpreted to mean murderer, tendon-cutter, head-smiter, and the like. The context in which it occurs makes its pejorative sense clear, and this sense also appears in an Akkadian lexical text that translates the Sumerian as habbātu (robber).

Etymology. The etymology of Habiru is still uncertain; it is not universally agreed that the word is even of Semitic origin. Ugaritic and Egyptian occurrences, 'pr*m* and 'pr*w* respectively, resolve the ambiguity of the cuneiform writing with h, whence the conventional Habiru, and show that the first consonant is the 'ayin-sound, a voiced laryngeal. Earlier explanations of Habiru as "confederate" or "Hebronite" (cf. the biblical city HEBRON), based on a root hbr, are certainly wrong. The Ugaritic and Egyptian spellings also indicate p rather than b as the second consonant; likewise, the cuneiform writing with BI is ambiguous and can stand for pi as well as bi. The form 'apiru, however, is still capable of several interpretations: one provided for (A. Goetze, M. Greenberg; cf. Akkadian epēru, to provide for), dusty one, covered with dust (E. Dhorme, R. Borger, R. De Langhe, W. F. Albright according to his latest view; cf. Hebrew 'āpār, dust), one equipped, and member of a labor gang (Albright according to an earlier view; cf. Egyptian 'pr, to equip). Moreover, since Semitic b occasionally appears as p in Egyptian and Ugaritic, J. Lewy believes 'br is the original root and a Habiru is one who has crossed over, an immigrant.

A Socio-legal Term. Common to these proposals on etymology is the view that Habiru is an appellative without national or ethnic meaning. This view is supported by the wide geographical diffusion of the Habiru, the indications in their personal names of various ethnic origins, the morphology of the term, and the Sumerian equivalent. With the increasing evidence, the much more common opinion is that Habiru is a socio-legal term.

Characteristic of the Habiru is that they are almost always dependents, either on the state, city, or other individuals. In Egypt they perform forced labor for the crown, at Nuzu (Nuzi). In Mesopotamia both male and female Habiru offer their services to a master in exchange for their keep. Most commonly, however, the Habiru serve as soldiers, often organized in special contingents; it is in this role that we find them at Larsa in Babylonia, Mari on the Middle Euphrates, Alalakh in North Syria, and Boghazköy in Anatolia.

Their social status varies from place to place, but with the exception of that of a few individuals, it is an inferior one. In Egypt and at Nuzu they are virtually slaves, although in the latter place they seem to enjoy a higher position than the ordinary slave. At Alalakh, the individual Habiru may occupy a prominent rank, but the majority are inferior to the peasantry. Hittite Habiru are ranked between the freeborn and the slaves.

Very often the Habiru are foreigners. The Nuzu and Alalakh texts are explicit on this point, and it is implied in the Hittite texts, in which the Habiru are frequently placed in parallelism with the Lulahi, foreigners from the east. Since the Egyptian Habiru are usually, if not always, prisoners of war, they do not belong to the native population.

The ranks of the Habiru are increased by the presence of fugitives; some scholars, in fact, believe that this is the common characteristic of all Habiru. The Hittite king promises to extradite all subjects of UGARIT who flee to the territory of the Habiru. King Idrimi of Alalakh escapes from his native land and finds refuge with the Habiru in Canaan. A Habiru mentioned at Mari is a fugitive from Eshnunna in the south, and an old Assyrian document perhaps attests a similar flight because of unpaid debts.

Freebooters. The Habiru could constitute a grave threat to the peace. The Mari letters speak of them as endangering a city and engaging in razzias in which men and sheep are carried off (cf. the pejorative SA.GAZ and the Akkadian translation as robber). In the Amarna Letters, to be a Habiru is synonymous with being a rebel against the Egyptian power in Palestine and Syria; it is the Habiru who are most frequently mentioned as supporters of the leaders of revolt, to whom they occasionally bind themselves by a solemn pact. At Alalakh a year is dated by the treaty of peace between the king and the Habiru; this suggests the importance that could be attached to coming to terms with them. They are not, however, to be thought of as marauding nomads, from whom they are at times explicitly distinguished; often too they are found in fixed settlements. The Habiru appear rather as bands of freebooters who, when political authority is strong, are organized as a kind of foreign legion, but who in times of political upheaval or weakness prey on villages or cities and support subversive elements in society. Of course, seminomads may have often joined their ranks.

Outlaws. Since men do not leave their native lands and enter an alien society as dependents, or hover on the fringes of their own society as outlaws and rebels, unless they are forced to, the Habiru must have been men under duress. In the political, social, and economic context of the second millennium the principal sources of their hardship are obvious. The hand of the crown lay heavy on the populace, especially in vassal territories, where the inhabitants not only had to pay tribute to the suzerain, but had to lodge and feed his troops and officials as well; it is not by chance that the principal source of information on the Habiru is the Amarna Letters, written by Egyptian vassals. The oppressive demands of kings in general are well described in 1 Sm 8.11–17, and the accuracy of this passage has been completely confirmed by the administrative texts from the palace archives of Ugarit. A large part of the Syro-Palestinian population were serfs whose lives must often have been a struggle for survival. Because of the precarious nature of the ancient agrarian economy, unpaid debts could accumulate, and the insolvent debtor was subject to personal seizure by his creditor. It should be recalled that legal reforms and general cancellation of debts were constantly necessary in Mesopotamia to redress social and economic imbalances that arose with dangerous regularity.

The motives, therefore, were many for abandoning one's society, and he who did so thereby rejected its political authority and, consequently, forfeited his legal rights. In fact, to judge from the Amarna Letters, in which a whole city may become Habiru, it is not flight that constitutes the essence of a Habiru, although this was usually involved, but it is the refusal to accept any longer the legal power controlling one's society. Ordinarily, only individuals or small groups became Habiru, and in their situation they would naturally tend to band together with others in the same position. They might remain close to home in the less inhabited areas or move on into foreign lands. As the Nuzu texts show, the individual might attach himself to a private master, and these service contracts seem inspired primarily by a concern for protection under a master. This was one way of securing legal rights. Other ways were military service for the state—both parties, king and Habiru, bound themselves by oath according to Hittite sources—or a pact in which the Habiru acquired some legally recognized status. At times, therefore, the Habiru seem to trade one yoke for another, but there is not sufficient information to be able to say whether their new status did not still represent a considerable improvement on their old one; besides, it was not easy to be an outlaw, and for the individual it was virtually impossible.

Unquestionably the term Habiru had particular nuances in different regions and periods that cannot be grasped, and probably many of its social and legal implications still escape modern scholars. But with the present evidence "outlaw" seems the best definition of a Habiru.

Reference, however, should be made to Albright's latest view, which unfortunately he has only stated, without elaboration or documentation. He maintains that a Habiru was primarily a donkey driver or caravaner, whence his name "the dusty one." It was only when he could not make a living at his trade that he entered someone's service, bore arms, banded with others to become a robber, and so forth. While it would be incautious simply to reject this solution of the Habiru problem without first seeing the evidence on which it is based, what immediately strikes one is the anomaly that the sources consistently present of the Habiru as, so to speak, unemployed. Unless this anomaly can somehow be explained away, it is doubtful whether Albright will enlist many followers.

The Habiru and the Hebrews. Until the discovery of the Habiru in the Amarna Letters, two explanations were commonly given to the term Hebrew: (1) "the one from the other side" (of the Euphrates), and (2) a descendant of Eber or Heber (Gn 10.21–25; 11.14–26). The Amarna Letters seemed to offer a third possibility, and the invading Israelites of the Conquest were identified by some with the Palestinian Habiru—some even claimed to find the person of JOSHUA, SON OF NUN, in the Amarna Letters—or in some way connected with them. Many objections were raised, and the discovery of the Habiru from Mesopotamia to Egypt necessarily modified earlier and simpler theories. The relationship of Habiru and Hebrew remains a moot question of ancient Near Eastern history.

Reasons for Identification. Favoring the equation of Habiru with Hebrew are a number of considerations. First, Hebrew was almost certainly not originally an ethnic designation. None of the Israelites' neighbors ever refer to them as Hebrews. Their language is never called Hebrew until the late postexilic period (cf. Is 19.18; 2 Kgs 18.26; Neh 13.24; Prologue of Sir). When Moses defends a Hebrew, the author finds it necessary to add "among his brethren" (Ex 2.11); a Hebrew, therefore, was not necessarily an Israelite. In 1 Sm 14.21, and perhaps in 1 Sm 13.3, 7; 14.11, the Hebrews are distinguished from the Israelites. The range, too, of usage is too narrow for the term to be an ethnic designation; it is largely confined to the Israelites in Egypt (time of Joseph: Gn 39.14, 17; 41.12; see also 40.15; 43.32; the age of Moses: Ex 1.15–16, 19; 2.6–7, 11, 13, 21; 3.18; 5.3; 9.1, 19; 10.3).

Second, there are many striking correspondences between the Hebrews and the Habiru. Joseph and the people in Egypt are foreigners, and the latter are engaged in forced labor on crown property. Yahweh is the God of Hebrews (Ex 3.18; 5.3; 9.1, 19; 10.3—cf. the gods of the Habiru in Hittite texts), and reference is made to the land of the Hebrews (Gn 40.15), which recalls the territory of the Habiru. In 1 Sm 29.3 the Philistines speak of David and his band as Hebrews. David is a fugitive from his King Saul, and his followers are composed of debtors and malcontents (1 Sm 22.2) and other fugitives (1 Sm 22.20–23). They live in the desert and raid the flocks of others (1 Sm ch. 25). David puts himself and his men at the service of the king of Gath (1 Sm ch. 27). In 1 Sm 14.21 it is said that the Hebrews desert the Philistines and join the Israelites in a shift of loyalties characteristic of the Amarna Habiru. The Hebrews are also men in revolt (1 Sm 4.6, 9). Abraham the Hebrew is a foreigner, capable of surprise attack at the head of his band of followers (Gn ch. 14), and he gains rights through covenant (Gn 14.13; 21.22–24). A Hebrew slave is one who accepts limited service under a master (Ex 21.2–6), and the law on this subject has a number of similarities with the service contracts of the Nuzu Habiru.

Third, like the term Habiru, which disappears in the first millennium B.C., Hebrew is virtually confined to traditions of the second millennium B.C.; it reappears after the Exile as an archaizing ethnolinguistic term.

Objections against Identification. There are objections against equating the two terms. The first is linguistic: 'apiru and 'ibrī (the Hebrew form of "Hebrew") are too dissimilar to be related. However, for 'apir-'ibr we have the parallel dialectal variants malik-milk (king), and for the change of p to b we have other examples of the shift of surd to sonant under the influence of sonorous r. Popular etymology may also have contributed to this development; 'ipru may have been connected with being a foreigner and therefore with 'ibru, "the other side." A few possible occurrences of Habiru in Akkadian texts of the late second millennium B.C. may show the same development: 'apir to 'abir; if so, they also provide the only cases of Habiru with a gentilic ending comparable to the Hebrew ending -ī.

This leads to the second objection: beside the ending -ī, in Gn 10.21–25 (cf. 11.14–26) there is further evidence that Hebrew is an ethnic designation, for Eber (Heber, in Hebrew 'ēber) and the benē 'ēber cannot be dissociated from the Hebrews. However, even in Gn ch. 10–11 an awareness is reflected that originally all Hebrews were not Israelites and descendants of Abraham, for Eber (10.25) fathered two sons whose progeny extended far beyond the Israelite line; moreover, it was Sem who was the ancestor of "all the sons of Heber." This cutting across tribal divisions fits the Habiru perfectly. Perhaps too, as seems to have happened in Mesopotamia, in the late second millennium B.C. the Habiru became associated especially with a few interrelated ethnic groups; this would foster a new meaning for the old term now falling into desuetude.

Without therefore denying the value of these objections, the mass of evidence certainly supports the view that ultimately Habiru and Hebrew originally designated the same social class.

Bibliography: J. BOTTÉRO, Le Problème des Hābiru (Paris 1954). M. GREENBERG, The Hābiru (American Oriental Ser. 37; New Haven 1955). M. P. GRAY, "The Hābiru-Hebrew Problem in the Light of the Source Material Available at Present," Hebrew Union College Annual 29 (1958) 135–202. J. LEWY, "Origin and Significance of Biblical Term Hebrew," ibid. 28 (1957) 1–13. M. G. KLINE, "The Hā-bi-ru—Kin or Foe of Israel?" Westminster Theological Journal 19 (1956) 1–24, 170–184; 20 (1957) 46–70. G. E. MENDENHALL, "The Hebrew Conquest of Palestine," The Biblical Archaeologist 25 (1962) 66–87. W. F. ALBRIGHT, "Abram the Hebrew: A New Archaeological Interpretation," The Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research 163 (1961) 36–54. H. OTTEN, "Zwei althethitische Belege zu den Hāpiru (SA.GAZ)," Zeitschrift für Assyriologie 52 (1957) 216–223.

[W. L. MORAN]

HABIT

In common usage, habit designates a person's dress or attire, especially if this is distinctive, as a riding habit or religious habit (see RELIGIOUS HABIT). It is used also to describe repetitive physical, mental, and moral behavior, such as nervous habits or habits of thought and action, and in this sense is synonymous with custom, wont, use, and practice. Again, it designates a disposition underlying such behavior. In scholastic philosophy, the word "habit" can designate one of the four post-predicaments, or a special category referred to in English as condition (see CATEGORIES OF BEING).

In its most important sense, habit designates one of the species of the category of QUALITY and is defined as a quality difficult to change that disposes a subject well or badly either in itself or in relation to action. In this acceptance, habit is one of the fundamental realities studied in the psychological sciences, and, as such, is discussed in this article. We here consider the general nature of habit, the different kinds of habits, the effects of habits on life, the causes of habit formation, the causes of habit loss, and the physiology of habits. The discussion is based principally on the psychology of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, with additions from modern psychological research.

Nature and Kinds of Habit

As Aquinas observes in his analysis of habit, the word is derived from the Latin habere meaning to have (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 49–54). But the "having" signified by the term habit is not the possessing of some object, as the having of a hat or a coat, but an internal having of oneself in a certain state or condition, as when a man holds himself or has himself ready. This having, an internal disposition or orientation by which an organism is ready or prepared for something, furnishes the fundamental notion of habit.

Habit as Quality. Analyzing this concept further, St. Thomas places it in the category of quality, which is the aspect of a thing by which it can be described as such and such. Color, odor, and texture are examples of sensible qualities; the capacities to walk, to fly, and to burn are examples of power qualities; round, square, and oval are examples of qualities as shapes. Habit is the kind of quality that designates the way the parts or elements of a thing are disposed in relation to each other. It implies that the interrelationships of elements are flexible, and that they can assume different positions or proportions among themselves. These various dispositions constitute the habits of a thing, the ways it has itself.

It is evident, therefore, that habits presuppose certain characteristics on the part of their possessor—the subject of a habit must be plastic or potential to different dispositions; it must therefore have several component parts, and these several parts must be capable of various forms of organization among themselves. Given these prerequisites, habits can be formed. Unless, however, the interrelationships that are formed among the component elements of the subject can be fixed and made stable, no true habit is developed, for habits imply a firmness and permanence in structure. Transitory and labile dispositions are merely dispositions, and remain mere dispositions as long as they lack structural rigidity (see DISPOSITION).

This notion of habit, which is abstract and generalized, is broader than the modern understanding of the term. It is broad enough to cover what St. Thomas calls entitative habits, namely, habits that affect the disposition of various elements in the nature of a thing, and operative habits, namely, habits that dispose and develop the powers or capacities of a thing. This latter notion is closer to the modern understanding of a habit.

Entitative Habits. Entitative habits comprise all aspects of a thing resulting from various dispositions of its component parts—physical strength and health are entitative habits resulting from good size, proportion, and function of the various organs of the body; weakness and illness are habits resulting from bad interrelationships of bodily organs. TEMPERAMENT is an entitative habit that results from various proportions of energy, emotionality, activity, passivity, etc., in various organisms. In all these cases, several physical or functional elements can be variously disposed among themselves; if the dispositions are firm and stable, they are called entitative habits, but if they are unstable and transitory, they are designated simply as dispositions.

Operative Habits. Entitative habits are of less interest to psychologists than operative habits, and therefore the rest of this treatment concentrates on the latter. Operative habits are acquired dispositions that prepare the powers of an organism for stable patterns of action (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). Such habits are theoretically possible in the intellect; in the will and sense appetites; in the imagination, memory, and cogitative sense; in the external senses; and in the muscles and any other organs having a physiological function. In fact, however, not every power has habits, and some powers have many habits; for not every power presents all the prerequisites for the formation of a habit, while some powers have these in abundance.

Habits of Practical Intellect. In Thomistic psychology, the human INTELLECT is the seat of almost numberless habits, which can be subsumed under six general headings: art, prudence, understanding, science, wisdom, and faith.

Art and prudence are habits of the practical intellect, which organizes action and behavior. Art is the right way of making things. It becomes a habit when, after much practice, an individual has tested out the various ways a thing can be made and has learned the right way to make it. The stability of this habit derives from the experience's having proved so successful that the maker would not think of changing his methods. Prudence dictates the right way to behave in order to maintain given moral standards or norms of conduct. Like art, it acquires its stability or fixedness through successful experience (see ART [PHILOSOPHY]; PRUDENCE).

Speculative Habits. Three categories of intellectual habit belong to the speculative intellect, which comprehends the natures of things and their relationships. The first of these habits is called UNDERSTANDING (intellectus); this grasps the universal and necessary principles of speculative thought, as, for example, whatever comes to be has a cause. The fixedness of such intellectual understanding comes from intrinsic self-evidence. The second such habit is SCIENCE (scientia), which deals with demonstrations of truths from evident principles. The stability of scientific conclusions stems from the rigor of DEMONSTRATION. Science thus differs from opinion, which cannot be demonstrated, and hence lacks firmness. The third speculative habit is WISDOM, which views and orders all truths in the light of ultimate truth. The firmness of wisdom depends on the strength by which the intellect is able to grasp ultimate truths and see lesser truths as subsumed under them.

Faith as a Habit. A sixth habit in the intellect, and this can be both speculative and practical, is FAITH. Faith is assent to the truth of a proposition on the basis of an authority that is both competent and veracious. The fixity of beliefs held by faith depends on the trust put in the authority whose word is being accepted; if the authority is thought to be indubitable, faith takes on the firmness of a true habit.

Habits in Will and Appetite. Habits that have their locus in the WILL are, if anything, more numerous than those in the intellect. Wherever there is a stable and firm attachment to some purpose or way of acting to attain a purpose, there is a habit of willing. Devotion to people, nations, and causes can assume the proportions of habits, as can hatreds and fears of them. The determination to be just in all things can generate habits of honesty, fairness in word and deed, truthfulness, patriotism, obedience, courtesy, industriousness, religion, etc. A willingness to take advantage of others can produce habits of dishonesty, cheating, stealing, embezzling, lying, sloth, insolence, disobedience, and so on. A determination to control one's own feelings can lead to habits of continence, by which passions are reined and checked, while an unwillingness to restrain oneself can lead to habitual forms of emotional excess.

If habits such as continence are formed in the will, the passions of sense APPETITE are restrained within bounds, and new habits are formed in the appetites themselves. Habits of sobriety, abstinence, and chastity are formed in the pleasure-seeking concupiscible appetite; habits such as meekness restrain the passion of anger in the irascible appetite; courage and patience restrain tendencies toward cowardice, softness, and timidity; habits of humility govern urges toward arrogance.

Interrelationship of Habits. These four powers, intellect, will, and the two sense appetites, are the major seats of true operative habits. They are the most plastic of human capacities, and therefore subject to the greatest number of variations, but they are also most capable of being formed into the stable modes of action that constitute habits. As is evident from the examples given above, the numerous habits informing these powers are not developed at random, but are able to interlock with each other in fairly well-defined hierarchies. For instance, a habit of understanding is presupposed to habits of science, for understanding gives science its principles. Wisdom in turn presupposes science, for it orders the verities of the various sciences in the light of ultimate verities. Moreover, a habit of moral science (ETHICS) is presupposed to habits of prudence, for moral science establishes the norms toward which prudence orders actual behavior. But prudence in turn is ineffective unless the will has a habit of continence, for if the passions are not governed, a man seldom succeeds in behaving the way he would want to behave, and so on.

Senses and Bodily Processes. St. Thomas did not assign any true operative habits to the internal SENSES, which include IMAGINATION, MEMORY, and the COGITATIVE POWER, nor to muscular power. He did not deny that these powers could be organized so that they would respond with stable patterns of action, e.g., physical skills and well-ordered trains of imagery, memories, and practical estimations. As he conceived them, however, these physical and imaginative activities are assumed into the service of the higher powers, so that the stable modes of action they acquire do not constitute true habits in themselves, but rather quasi habits subordinated to the higher habits of which they are instruments. Thus a good memory of past experiences, a clear imagination about the consequences of a given act, and an accurate estimate of the present situation are necessary components of a prudent act; yet the stable modes of action induced in these internal senses by repeated prudent acts are not so much distinct habits in themselves, as component parts of the higher habit of prudence. Similarly no art can be perfected without some physical skills in handling materials; but these skills are subordinate parts of the higher habit of art, which is essentially a matter of the practical intellect. Another point arguing against the presence of true habits in the internal senses and muscular powers is their susceptibility to disturbances. Habits should be stable and firm; but imagination, memory, and physical skills are subject to disturbances from illnesses, injuries, fatigue, drugs, etc. Contemporary psychology, in treating of habits, treats for the most part of these quasi-habitual dispositions that can be formed in the internal senses and physical powers [Dashiell, 363].

There are no operative habits of any sort in the external senses and simple physiological processes such as digestion and circulation. These operations are simple functions of their organs, without the possibility of being ordered in a variety of ways, and therefore without the need of being organized to operate in one way rather than another. Loosely speaking, one can say that there are habits of visual activity or auditory activity—a doctor naturally notices symptoms, a mother can pick out her baby's cry when no one else can detect it. But such so-called habits are really cases of attention, training, and orientation; they are dispositions of mind and will, rather than developments of visual or auditory powers strictly speaking.

Supernatural Habits. The human SOUL in its substantial aspect is not the subject of natural habits. Since the soul is the ultimate entity in human nature, toward which everything else is ordered, the soul itself is not ordered toward another, and is therefore not susceptible to being disposed or oriented in various ways. Supernaturally, however, the soul can be oriented toward something else, and thus be the seat of habit. Theology treats of this supernatural habit of the soul under the title of sanctifying GRACE [see HABIT (IN THEOLOGY)].

Good and Bad Habits. Because habits dispose their subject in relation to something else—entitative habits ordering the subject in reference to its nature, and operative habits disposing the subject for action—habits can be designated as good or bad. An entitative habit that disposes the nature well is good, for example, that of health, whereas sickness is a bad entitative habit because it denotes a defect in the way the nature is disposed. Operative habits such as science or humaneness are good because they orient the intellect and will respectively toward activities that are desirable; error and selfishness on the other hand are bad dispositions because they organize mind and will toward actions that are negative and undesirable. Moral science treats of good and bad habit under the respective titles of VIRTUE and VICE (see MORAL THEOLOGY).

Influence and Causes of Habits

The pervading psychological effect of habit is economy of effort. By habit, man performs acts quickly, easily, and with pleasure. He performs acts quickly, because the operative powers are predisposed toward the acts; easily, because habits eliminate false and unnecessary motions; and with pleasure, because successful action without waste of energy gives more immediate satisfaction with less fatigue. Habitual operations become so smooth and effortless that habit is called "second nature." The higher habits, such as art and science in the intellect, and honesty and industriousness in the will, are generally used consciously and deliberately, so that St. Thomas frequently refers to habits as things we use when we want to (e.g., Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 50.5). But physical dispositions in the body, and to some extent, dispositions in the imagination, memory, and sense appetites, tend to become unconscious as they become more and more ingrained; and thus a secondary effect of habituation is that one can execute patterns of action and behavior without adverting to their component parts.

The greater part of man's daily routine, as the word routine indicates, is performed by series of acts of which he is almost unaware. This has the great advantage of freeing his mind for more important matters, but it also has disadvantages. If the habit patterns are defective, they are hard to improve, because one has to re-form, along new lines, patterns of behavior formerly executed without thinking, and it is easy to fall back into the former patterns. Moreover, since habituation makes action easier, a tendency toward laziness realizes itself in a reluctance to re-form old habits. Again, people become emotionally attached to familiar ways of behavior and are uneasy with innovations, and therefore many retain poor habits, even when they realize their defects, rather than experience the uneasiness that novelties engender. There is a kind of "force of habit" that keeps people treading the familiar paths long after these have lost their effectiveness. Habit thus is a great conservator, keeping men in accustomed ways. The deleterious effects of habit formation emphasize the importance of developing good habits early in life, and of developing a "habit" of being flexible about habits.

Causes of Habit Formation. Supernatural habits, such as the infused virtues and gifts, are implanted directly by God, but the study of these pertains to moral theology rather than to psychology. In the natural order, action is the cause of operative habits. The formation of a habit by action presupposes the existence of both active and passive principles in the organism. The active principle moves the passive principle, and in moving it, disposes it to be moved again the same way; after repeated actions, the passive principle becomes completely responsive to being moved. The disposition to respond is the habit.

Generation of Habits. Thus by a deliberate act of will (the active power), a beginner goes through the motions of playing scales and chords on a musical instrument, and his hands (the passive principle) gradually acquire facility in picking out scales and chords; when this is mastered, he goes on to more complex patterns, and gradually builds up the habit of playing the instrument. Similarly, the mind learns the rules of logic, and applies these rules (as an active principle) to various data (the passive principle); as the process of logical thought is strengthened in different areas, habits of science are developed.

If the active principle is dominant in respect to the passive principle, a habit can be generated in a single act; for example, a clear demonstration of a proposition in geometry is so convincing that, once the conclusion has been proved, the mind holds it with the fixity of a habit. But when the passive principle does not receive impressions easily from the active principle, as is the case, for instance, of the concupiscible appetite in relation to the will, habits can be formed only by repeated acts. Hence a habit like chastity is usually the result of a long process of formation. Because the role of the active principle is crucial in the acquisition of habits, the process of learning should be initiated with a strong and decided attack.

Development of Habits. When habits have been begun, they can develop further in two distinctive ways. In one way, they can become more extensive. A person who has learned a dozen demonstrations in geometry has the science of geometry, but can develop it further by learning more demonstrations. One who is friendly with five people can become friendly with five more. Again, habits can retain the same extension but become more intense. A student who knows some demonstrations in geometry, but is slow and awkward in presenting them, can develop facility and ease, and thus the habit becomes more deeply rooted; or a person who is mildly friendly with some people can become more friendly with the same people.

Natural Dispositions. Action is required for the formation of all operative habits, but in some cases, natural dispositions toward such formation are so definite that the habit can be said to be partly from nature. The habit of the understanding of FIRST PRINCIPLES is one such habit. The intellect is so disposed to see self-evident truths that, when they are first presented, they are immediately recognized for what they are. Some people have calmer and more reflective dispositions; for them the acquisition of science is easier, since their memory and imagination tend more naturally to orderly thought. Some have natural dispositions to courage that make it easier to face dangers and develop a habit of courage. Physical dispositions that facilitate acquiring arts and skills also vary greatly in different individuals, giving those with natural tendencies toward dexterity and speed a special advantage. Since people tend to do the things that come easily and naturally, they tend to develop the habits toward which they have a proneness. Conversely, to develop a complete life, most people must take special pains to develop the habits toward which they have no natural leanings.

Time and Habit Formation. Habits are most easily developed early in life, partly because a person then has greater quantities of energy at his disposal, and therefore his active principles are more effective, but principally because he is more plastic and capable of receiving impressions quickly and deeply. In his first few years a child acquires a vast number of highly complex habits, even though he is still too young to undertake habit formation consciously and deliberately. To learn to speak a language, to walk, to eat, to dress and wash oneself, to handle simple tools, to read and write, to do arithmetic, to be familiar with the routine of home, school, church, playground, etc., are only a few examples of the habits children acquire before they are 8 years old. Moreover, deep-seated emotional attitudes, which can persist almost unchanged throughout life and profoundly affect CHARACTER and moral development, can be formed in the earliest years, sometimes in the first year or two. Habits of trustfulness or suspicion, of greediness or generosity, of selfishness or cooperation, of timidity or courage, and many others, are grounded in the experiences of the earliest years. One of the major contributions of modern depth psychology has been its unearthing of such early stages of habit formation.

After the earliest years, habit formation becomes more and more a matter of deliberate choice. Man begins consciously to develop habits of skill, knowledge, attitude, etc. By persistent effort, various actions or modes of behavior become fixed; in typical cases, the improvement is rapid at first, and then gradually tapers off as a given level or plateau of achievement is reached. For the most part, the rate of habit development is a function of the amount of practice and the accuracy of practice. One curious anomaly in habit formation, not satisfactorily explained to date, is that a given amount of spaced practice (i.e., practice with periods of rest in between) is more effective, all else being equal, than an equal amount of uninterrupted practice. It is almost as if the habit becomes fixed in the periods between practice sessions.

Habitual Behavior. Besides operative habits strictly speaking, certain quasi-habitual components of human behavior can loosely be called habits. Psychiatry speaks of “habit spasms” such as tics and bed-wetting, which are acquired modes of behavior that serve somehow to release psychological tensions. Some varieties of neurotic symptoms also are fixed modes of action stemming from unconscious psychic factors. Certain drugs, such as alcohol, morphine, and phenobarbital, are called habit-forming because they produce physiological and psychological changes that result in almost uncontrollable cravings for more. These “habits” are caused by physiological and psychological factors other than simple repeated actions.

Loss of Habits. Habits can be diminished by the performance of actions contrary to them; for instance, a habit of honesty is corrupted by dishonest actions, and a habit of science by careless observation or reasoning. Habits diminish also by cessation of the actions that generated them, especially if natural tendencies oppose the habit. A scientist who ceases for many years to consider his subject will find he has lost some of it when he returns to practice, but a man who does not restrain his appetites by continence will find he has lost the habit of continence in a very short time. However, it is remarkable how habits of learning and skill can be retained even if neglected for long periods; some psychologists, impressed by this, hold that once formed a habit is never entirely lost [Dashiell, 420].

Injuries that destroy powers destroy also the habits in the powers; athletic skills are lost when muscles are crippled, science may be lost when the brain is injured, and so on. Physiological factors such as use of drugs and fatigue can interfere with the use of habits, as can psychological factors such as repression. In old age there are certain typical patterns of habit deterioration. As perceptiveness and flexibility are diminished, ambition decreases, and more time and effort are required for ordinary activities, an insistent repetition of habitual movements sets in, and the aged person settles down into the use of fewer and simpler behavior patterns. These become crystallized so that even small changes of routine provoke discontent. Similarly mental processes decay, not so much because the component elements are lost—for these seem to remain intact, especially those learned earliest—but because alertness and the energy to activate and sustain the higher, controlling habits are gone.

Physiological Aspects of Habits. The physiological aspects of habit formation constitute a special area of inquiry. The development of physical habits, for example, involves acquired modes of neural organization in the motor parts of the brain and spinal column; the formation of mental habits implies the opening and fixation of new paths of neural communication in the higher parts of the brain; the establishment of emotional and drive patterns involves changes in the brain centers and perhaps also in the nerve systems innervating the viscera. Much research has been done to isolate and specify the parts of the nervous system that are affected by habit formation and the kinds of changes involved, but much remains to be done. Many modern psychologists tend to define habits in terms of their physiology: J. B. Watson considers them as complex, conditioned responses whose basic explanation belongs to physiology [Behaviorism (New York 1930) 207]; William JAMES, as “nothing but a new pathway of discharge formed in the brain, by which certain incoming currents ever after tend to escape” [Psychology, Briefer Course (New York 1908) 134]; and Karl A. Menninger, as the set patterns by which impulses or stimuli entering the brain are resolved into impulses going to muscles and organs [The Human Mind (second edition, New York 1937) 164]. The exact delineation of the nature of these neural changes and the modes of path formation constitute the physiological approach to the study of habit formation.

See Also: HUMAN ACT; PERSONALITY.

Bibliography: R. E. BRENNAN, Thomistic Psychology (New York 1941). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Philosophy of Human Nature (New York 1953). American Handbook of Psychiatry, ed. S. ARIETI, 2 v. (New York 1959). W. D. COMMINS and B. FAGIN, Principles of Educational Psychology (2d ed. rev. New York 1954). J. F. DASHIELL, Fundamentals of General Psychology (3d ed. New York 1949). W. JAMES, The Principles of Psychology, 2 v. (auth. ed. unabridged, New York 1962). C. T. MORGAN and E. STELLAR, Physiological Psychology (2d ed. New York 1950). F. L. RUCH, Psychology and Life (6th ed. New York 1963). J. B. WATSON, Behaviorism (rev. ed. Chicago 1958).

[M. STOCK]

HABIT (IN THEOLOGY)

In theology the word “habit” is used specifically to designate a SUPERNATURAL entity. Although the word is not found in the Scriptures, scholastics borrowed it from philosophy to categorize the realities brought about in the soul by JUSTIFICATION. The intimate nature of these realities transcends man's understanding; however, theology attempts to represent them analogously by means of human concepts and terms. It is in this sense that one speaks of supernatural habits.

Nature. Supernatural habit in general may be defined as a supernatural, internal, permanent quality modifying the soul or its faculties in relation to the supernatural ultimate good. This is a scholastic or Thomistic concept. Aquinas conceives the supernatural structure in man in analogous but parallel lines to the natural structure. Just as in the natural order man is endowed by God with nature, faculties, and dispositions that enable him efficaciously to pursue the natural good, in similar manner, taking for granted man's supernatural elevation, God provides him with supernatural qualities to enable him to attain his ultimate supernatural good (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 110.2–4). The existence of these supernatural realities or qualities in man, described in revelation, and further developed in theology, is amply discussed elsewhere (see GRACE). These belong to the realm of entitative and operative supernatural habits. It may be superfluous to add here the qualification of goodness to these habits, since by their very nature they imply an ordination to the Eternal Good. In this respect they fall under the term of VIRTUE in a broad sense.

Division. Catholic theologians consider sanctifying grace to be a supernatural entitative habit of the soul (Catechism of the Council of Trent 2.2.50; Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 110.3 ad 3). They maintain that in consonance with revelation it must be thought of as a created ACCIDENT that informs the soul, characterizing it or qualifying it supernaturally. It is said to be created, not in the sense that it is produced as a being subsisting in itself and then added to the soul, but in the sense that the soul begins to exist in a new manner because of it, with a new quality of being produced wholly by God without any efficient cooperation or intervention of man. On the other hand, it is an accident truly distinct from the soul, adding a new perfection entirely different from the natural constituents of the soul. Finally, this accident is conceived as a permanent entitative quality because it is a stable principle of supernatural life in man, a second nature so to speak, produced by a regeneration or a REBIRTH (Jn 1.12–13; Ti 3.5). On account of this, man "has himself" entitatively or substantially oriented to his supernatural end.

Theology speaks of no other supernatural entitative habit outside of grace. However, it numbers many supernatural operative habits, namely the infused theological and moral virtues (see VIRTUE) and the gifts of the Holy Spirit (see FAITH; HOPE; CHARITY; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF).

These are permanent qualities or determinations of the soul's faculties that orient them and their activity to the Eternal Good.

Through the theological virtues man is furnished with the fundamental principles that direct his faculties immediately to God as his supernatural end (see DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL). They connect him directly with God. Through the supernatural moral virtues man is given the power to render his acts morally right in proportion to his supernatural elevation and in view of his supernatural end. The gifts of the Holy Spirit are also considered supernatural operative habits since they are permanent qualities that perfect the faculties and direct them to supernatural activity. They differ from virtues because they have in them something superior to the common characteristics of virtues, as well as a certain passivity (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 68.1).

Distinctive Characteristics. Supernatural habits differ from natural entitative and operative habits not only because of the very superiority of their constitution but also because of their origin, growth, and effects. Regarding origin and growth, supernatural habits are beyond the capability of nature's activity or nature's repeated acts—a characteristic in which they differ from natural habits (see NATURE; GRACE AND NATURE). They are produced and augmented entirely by God alone. They are said to be infused by God, with man remaining totally passive in the process. Aquinas speaks of man's OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY (De virt. in comm. 10 ad 13). The Sacraments act merely instrumentally under the power of God. According to present theological opinion, all supernatural habits (grace, virtues, and gifts) are infused by God in man at the moment of justification (see Decrees of the Council of Vienne, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 904; Trent, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1528–1531; Catechism of the Council of Trent 2.2.51).

Supernatural habits also differ from natural operative habits in the role they play or the effects they cause in human activity. Natural habits render activity fast, easy, and pleasurable. Supernatural habits merely provide the power to act supernaturally. In this sense they assimilate themselves to faculties rather than to habits; yet they are not faculties, as they presuppose and inform existing faculties. Whether a certain external facility or ease of operation is gradually conferred by the exercise of supernatural habits, and how this facility is conferred, is a matter of discussion. Some theologians explain it only in terms of a natural good disposition and a removal of obstacles on the part of the individual. Others speak of a gradual formation, exercise, and consequent growth of a natural habit alongside the supernatural habit. The natural habit would persist even after the loss of the supernatural habit.

Bibliography: J. HASPECKER et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:977–1000. J. AUER, ibid. 4:1301. J. VAN DER MEERSCH, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:1554–1687. A. MICHEL, ibid. 15.2:2739–99. K. RAHNER and H. VORGRIMLER, Kleines theologisches Wörterbuch (Freiburg 1961) 154. C. M. LACHANCE, “La Grâce est en nous par mode d’habitus entitatif ou l’ontologie de la grâce,” Revue de l’Université d’Ottawa 26 (1956) 23*–51*, 75*–89*. M. LIMBOURG, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 9 (1885) 643–669; 10 (1886) 107–141, 277–312, 603–628, a series of articles on supernatural habit. M. J. SCHEEBEN, Nature and Grace, tr. C. VOLLERT (St. Louis 1954). T. GRAF, De subiecto psychico gratiae et virtutum secundum doctrinam scholasticorum usque ad medium saeculum XIV. Pt I, De subiecto virtutum cardinalium, 2 v. (Sudia anselmiana 2, 3, 4; Rome 1934–35).

[R. J. TAPIA]

HADALINUS, ST.

Patron of Visé, Belgium (known also as Adelinus, Hadelin, Haulin); b. Aquitaine; d. Celles, Belgium, mid-seventh century or 690. Of noble parentage, he left home together with his teacher, St. Remaclus (d. 675), to live as a recluse in the wilderness of Cougnon. Later he lived in the Abbey of STAVELOT, founded by Remaclus. Assisted by him and by Pepin of Heristal, Hadalinus founded the monastery of Celles near Dinant-sur-Meuse; its 11th-century Romanesque church is extant. In 1338 the monastery was removed to Visé; it was suppressed in 1797. Hadalinus is invoked against children’s ailments; in iconography his attribute is a dove.

Feast: Feb. 3, Oct. 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 1:370–381. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique et littéraire sur les Vitae des saints mérovingiens de l’ancienne Belgique (Louvain 1907). D. DE BRUYNE, “La Translation de s. Hadelin,” Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882–) 42 (1924) 121–125. H. DEMARET, Notice sur saint Hadelin (Liège 1928). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 2:70–71. The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947) 281. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l’art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:631.

[M. CSÁKY]

HADELOGA, ST.

Virgin, monastic foundress (a.k.a. Adeloga, Hadelauga, Halloie); d. Kitzingen (Upper Bavaria), Germany, c. 750. According to a 12th-century vita and laudatio replete with legend, Hadeloga was the daughter of CHARLES MARTEL. When about to be forced into marriage, she fled from court and founded a double MONASTERY (745?) at Kitzingen in Franconia. St. BONIFACE, who had allegedly inspired Hadeloga’s vocation, kept in touch with the foundation; Charles Martel, once reconciled with his daughter, richly endowed it. Hadeloga enjoyed the regard of the whole countryside for her care of the poor. Her body is interred in the church of St. Mary in Kitzingen. Her monastery was secularized in 1544.

Feast: Feb. 2, March 20.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 1:306–311 Vita, 952–967 Laudatio. J. B. STAMMINGER, Franconia sancta (Würzburg 1889) 360–378. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:156; 4:17. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l’ordre du calendrier avec l’historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 2:46. The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947) 10.

[M. CSÁKY]

HADES

Hades was originally the name of the Greek god (ᾍδης, unseen) of the nether world, but later applied to the abode of the dead itself. The Septuagint generally adopted the term to render the Hebrew word se’öl (SHEOL), the final resting place of the dead.

In the New Testament, Hades, formerly translated as HELL, has a neutral character in contrast to GEHENNA, which is the place where the wicked are punished. The New Testament, like the Old Testament, locates Hades in the depths of the earth (Mt 11.23; Lk 10.15; 16.23) in contrast to heaven above the earth. Hence, passage to Hades involves a descent (Mt 11.23; Eph 4.9). The expression “the gates of Hades” in the well-known Petrine text (Mt 16.18) refers not to diabolical powers but to the kingdom of death. Peter’s power reaches even into the kingdom of death; death will never overcome it. The phrase “gates of the nether world” occurs also in the Old Testament (Is 38.10; Jb 17.16; Wis 16.13). It shows that Hades was envisaged as a city, which is not so strange in view of the fact that Hades, like Sheol, death, and the rest, lends itself also to personification (Rv 6.8; 20.13–15). From the New Testament it is evident that Hades is not to be equated with Gehenna, for the good as well as the bad descend to Hades (Mt 12.40; Acts 2.27, 31; Rom 10.7; Eph 4.9); Christ, too, descended into Hades (Acts 2.24; 1 Pt 3.19); (see DESCENT OF CHRIST INTO HELL). With the resurrection of the dead on the last day, Hades will cease to exist (Rv 20.13–14). There seems to be only one reference in the New Testament to Hades as a place of punishment for the wicked (Lk 16.22), but even here the Hades in which the rich man is in torment may be regarded as merely a general term for the abode of all the dead, even though "a great chasm" (16.26) separates him from the other part of Hades where Lazarus is in ABRAHAM'S BOSOM.

Bibliography: J. JEREMIAS, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 1:146–150. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 922–923. M. SALLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1305.

[I. H. GORSKI]

HAEDEWIJCH, BL.

Flemish woman writer of the 13th century. No historical information is available about her, but the language and atmosphere of her writings seem to indicate that she was a lady of noble birth of the Brabant of her time. She probably was the leader of one of many small associations of pious women that had come into existence without any formal organization, and that attracted women intent on works of mercy and on mutual sanctification. These associations, many of which originated at the end of the 12th century, were organized into béguinages in the second half of the 13th century (see BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS). Hadewijch and her companions had not yet received the status of the béguines; she must, therefore, have lived before 1250, and her main literary activity fell most probably between 1230 and 1250.

For her companions Hadewijch committed to writing her 11 Visions; she translated her religious experiences into imaginative "visions" of genuinely intellectual stature; in a few places she refers to moments of oneness with God, experiences she considers to be of the same nature as the BEATIFIC VISION. Her 31 Letters gave her an opportunity to clarify for the benefit of her followers her ideas about God's love of man and man's love of God, though she never tried a systematic treatment. Her mystical vision of love was influenced by the French spirituality of the 12th century, which she recast in the way that characterized the mystical writers of the whole Middle-Dutch period. The 17 Poems in rhyming couplets are in fact letters that repeat the same doctrine. With her 45 Poems in Stanzas Hadewijch gave rise to the lyric poetry of mystic love; she portrays her yearning for God through the themes, imagery, and technique used by the troubadours to exalt COURTLY LOVE.

Bibliography: The Complete Works, tr. C. HART (New York 1980). T. WEEVERS, Poetry of the Netherlands in Its European Context, 1170–1930 (London 1960) with bibliography and translations. T. M. GUEST, Some Aspects of Hadewijch's Poetic Form in the "Strofische gedichten" (The Hague 1975). F. WILLAERT, De poëti- ca van Hadewijch in de Strofische Gedichten (Utrecht 1984). E. DREYER, Passionate Women: Two Medieval Mystics (New York 1989). G. J. LEWIS, Bibliographie zur deutschen Frauenmystik des Mittelalters (Berlin 1989). Der Berg der Liebe: europäische Frauenmystik, ed. H. UNGER (Freiburg im Breisgau 1991). S. MURKJANSEN, The Measure of Mystic Thought: A Study of Hadewijch's Mengeldichten (Göppingen 1991). J. G. MILHAVEN, Hadewijch and Her Sisters (Albany 1993). Meister Eckhart and the Beguine Mystics, ed. B. MCGINN (New York 1994).

[N. DE PAEPE]

HADOINDUS, ST.

Bishop of Le Mans; d. August 20, c. 653. Reportedly he was born of a noble family, but little else is known about him before he succeeded BERTRAM in the See of Le Mans, c. 623. As bishop, Hadoindus founded the abbey at Évron (L. H. Cottineau, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. 1:1089–90) and is said to have aided in the founding of the monastery of St. Lonesisilus (L. H. Cottineau, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. 2:2769). He attended the councils held at Clichy c. 627 and at Reims from 627 to 630 (Monumenta Germaniae Concilia 1:202; J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10:594); but at the council that met at CHALON SUR-SÂONE in 650, he was represented by Abbot Chagnoaldus (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 10:1194). On Feb. 6, 643, Hadoindus made his last will and testament, in which he designated the church of Le Mans as his heir, leaving it much property, a large portion of which he had received from a wealthy man named Alan. The bishop also requested that he be buried in the church of Saint-Victor. In the ninth century the cult of Hadoindus is clearly attested by the fact that ALDRIC, bishop of Le Mans, exhumed the relics of the holy bishop and placed them in the cathedral church (Gesta Aldrici episcopi Cenomannensis 44).

Feast: Aug. 20 (Diocese of Le Mans).

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 15.1:323. Acta Sanctorum Jan. 2:1140–43. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 80:565–574; 115:850. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 10:1521–27. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 5:470. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 3736. C. DUCHESNAY, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 16:214–219.

[H. DRESSLER]

HADRIAN, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned 117 to 138; b. Publius Aelius Hadrianus, Italica, southern Spain, A.D. 76; d. Baiae, July 10, 138. On the death of his father in 85 he became the ward of Marcus Ulpius Traianus (Trajan), the future Emperor, who was himself childless. After serving in the army, Hadrian became governor of Lower Pannonia in 107, suffect consul the following year, and in 114 governor of Syria. Although he had been designated consul for 118, on the death of Trajan he became emperor (Aug. 11, 117), whereupon he abandoned Trajan's conquests beyond the Euphrates as untenable. He enlarged the civil service, making extensive use of the Roman knights in newly created posts. He traveled through the empire to satisfy his highly curious mind, to organize the defenses of the frontiers, e.g., Hadrian's Wall in Britain (122–128), and to acquaint himself with the provinces. His able administration was marred by the decision to erect a shrine to Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the temple of Jerusalem. This precipitated a revolt of the Jews under Bar Kokhba (132–135). A rescript that he wrote to Minucius Fundanus on the treatment to be given to Christians in court has been preserved by Eusebius (Historia ecclesiastica 4.9.1–3), but its interpretation has been disputed. At best it seems to have been an attempt to protect Christians from popular outcries, insisting that proof be advanced to show that they were "acting illegally." A fair number of Christians suffered for the faith during his reign, the most famous being Pope TELESPHORUS, martyred apparently in 136. Hadrian was buried in the Moles Hadriana, preserved as the Castel Sant'Angelo on the right bank of the Tiber.

Bust of the Roman Emperor Hadrian found at Tivoli. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Bibliography: B. W. HENDERSON, The Life and Principate of the Emperor Hadrian (London 1923). Pauly's Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 1.1 (Stuttgart 1893): 493–520. S. PEROWNE, Hadrian (New York 1960). A. R. BURLEY, Hadrian: The Restless Emperor (London 1997). M. T. BOATWRIGHT, Hadrian and the City of Rome (Princeton 1987).

[M. J. COSTELLOE]

HADRIAN OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Abbot of ST. AUGUSTINE'S Abbey, Canterbury; b. Africa; d. Canterbury, Jan. 9, 709. Hadrian (Adrian) helped to stabilize papal influence and to establish a tradition of sound learning in Anglo-Saxon England. As a BENEDICTINE, perhaps in Africa and certainly at Niridan near Naples, where he became abbot, he was well formed in Greek and Latin secular and sacred literature, as well as in monastic and ecclesiastical discipline. Chosen by Pope VITALIAN to succeed in the See of Canterbury, he demurred, but together with BENEDICT BISCOP and the new archbishop, Theodore of Tarsus (THEODORE OF CANTERBURY), he was sent to England to serve as guide, counselor, and assurer of orthodoxy (670). As abbot of St. Augustine's at Canterbury, he established schools for liberal and ecclesiastical studies to compete with those of the Celts (Scoti). These became centers for better instruction in Greek and Latin and were noted for their adherence to the ecclesiastical customs of Rome, especially the form of baptism, tonsure, and the dating of Easter. They promoted close ties with the papacy and unity of the Anglo-Saxon Church with the universal Church. His cult is evidenced in early MARTYROLOGIES of England and Germany.

Feast: Jan. 9.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 4.1, 2; 5.20, 23; Historia abbatum in Opera historica, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1896; 2d ed. 1956). ALDHELM, Epistola ad Leutherium, Monumenta Germaniae Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1825–) 15:476–478. A. S. COOK, "Hadrian of Africa. . .," Philological Quarterly 2 (1923) 241–258. E. S. DUCKETT, Anglo-Saxon Saints and Scholars (New York 1947). F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 131–132, 180–183. R. H. HODGKIN, A History of the Anglo-Saxons, 2 v. (3d ed. London 1952).

[T. A. CARROLL]

HADRIANA COLLECTIO

Dionysio-Hadriana, an official canonical collection of the Roman Church, transmitted by Pope ADRIAN I to CHARLEMAGNE, at Easter 774, the time of the latter's stay in Rome. It was received officially as the Code of the Frankish Church at the Assembly of Aix-la-Chapelle in 802.

The core of this collection consists in the DIONYSIANA COLLECTIO. However, the prefaces of Dionysius are replaced by an epistle in verse addressed by Adrian to Charlemagne. The conciliar series is preceded by a list of titles. It contains the Nicene Creed and the Creed of Constantinople, the definitio fidei of Chalcedon, the list of the Fathers of the various councils, and a few canons from them. The canons of Carthage are divided into two groups. The collection of decretals was increased by 15 fragments inserted in chronological order.

Early in the ninth century, the Hadriana Collectio was adapted to practical requirements in the Breviarium ad inquirendas sententias and in the Epitome Hadriani. It was used also by almost all the collections prepared between the ninth and the 11th centuries. As early as the ninth century, it was joined to the HISPANA COLLECTIO to form a composite collection, the Hadriano-hispanica. It is found in the penitentials of RABANUS MAURUS, the Capitula episcoporum, the False Capitularies, the FALSE DECRETALS, the ANSELMO DEDICATA COLLECTIO, the libri de synodalibus causis of Regino of Prüm, the collection of ABBO OF FLEURY, the collection of Verona, and others. The authors of the great collections of the 11th and 12th centuries, BURCHARD OF WORMS, St. IVO OF CHARTRES, and even the Decretum of GRATIAN reproduced, in many instances, the version of texts given in the Hadriana Collectio.

Bibliography: A. M. KOENIGER, Grundriss einer Geschichte des katholischen Kirchenrechts (Cologne 1919). C. DE CLERCQ, La Législation religieuse franque (Louvain 1936). Maassen 441–452, 965–967. R. NAZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique (Paris 1935–65) 5:1083–84. P. FOURNIER and G. LEBRAS, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien (Paris 1931–32) 1:93–97. P. EWALD, "Studien zur Ausgabe des Registers Gregors I," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 3 (1877–78) 433–625.

[J. RAMBAUD-BUHOT]

HADRUMETUM

Hadrumetum, a prosperous Phoenician colony (Salust, Jugurtha 19) with an excellent harbor situated on the eastern coast of modern Tunisia, was founded long before its powerful rival, CARTHAGE, to which it later became subject. After the Punic Wars Hadrumetum was made a free city (oppidum liberum) by the Romans. Under Trajan it became a Latin colony and in Diocletian's reorganization of the empire, the capital of the Provincia Valeria Byzacena. The Vandals destroyed it c. 434 and JUSTINIAN rebuilt it, giving it the name Justinianopolis. Arab invasions in the 7th century left the region of the ancient city desolate. With the arrival of the French in the 19th century the ancient site was rebuilt into the modern Susa (Sousse).

Christianity gained an early foothold in Hadrumetum. Tertullian mentions a certain Mavilus, who suffered martyrdom under the proconsul Scapula (Ad Scap. 3.6). Polycarp, Bishop of Hadrumetum, appears third among the 87 bishops listed by seniority who attended the Council of Carthage in 256 at which St. CYPRIAN presided, and he expressed the sentiments of the council briefly and bluntly: "Whoever admits the validity of baptism conferred by heretics makes void our baptism" [Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866) 3.1:437]. Hadrumetum continued as a center of Christianity and the scene of several important councils until the 7th century. Excavations begun at the ancient site in 1885 yielded rich archeological evidence of the Roman and Christian cultures that flourished in ancient Hadrumetum. Together with Roman burial grounds, five Christian catacombs were discovered, the oldest of which dates back to the last half of the 3rd century.

Bibliography: BÖLTE, Paulys Realenzklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 7.2 (Stuttgart 1912) 2178–80. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:1981–2010. A. AUDOLLENT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 10:1460–1500. A. VON HARNACK, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, tr. and ed. J. MOFFATT, 2 v. (2d ed. rev., New York 1908) v.2.

[H. DRESSLER]

HAEC SANCTA

Also called Sacrosancta, a decree of the Council of CONSTANCE asserting the authority of ecumenical councils over popes. It was issued April 6, 1415, as a part of the council's effort to end the WESTERN SCHISM. Finding their authority to deal with the schism at issue, the council fathers included language in the decree that has made it the historical high-water mark of CONCILIARISM.

The standard view within the Catholic Church has been that the decree was not valid or universally binding, and after definition of papal authority reached the explicit terms of Vatican I, Haec sancta became little more than a matter for academic analysis. In the aftermath of Vatican II, the decree received fresh consideration from some historians who contended that Haec sancta was not an aberration but the logical outgrowth of a development in orthodox ECCLESIOLOGY going back several centuries.

Constance was called to reestablish unity in a church whose members were divided by the simultaneous claims of three men to the papal throne. The Council of PISA (1409) sought to deal with the scandal of two men claiming to be pope, but succeeded only in adding one more to the number. At the instigation of Emperor Sigismund, Constance was called by John XXIII (now considered an antipope) of the Pisan line. But when John saw the council would not support his claims, he sought to force its dissolution by leaving—on the assumption that it could not function without a pope. To meet this challenge, the council fathers issued Haec sancta, declaring:

This holy synod of Constance . . . declares in the first place that legitimately convened in the Holy Spirit, forming a general council and representing the militant Catholic Church, it has its powers immediately from Christ, and that each and every one of whatever state or dignity, even if it be papal, is bound to obey it in those things which pertain to faith, the rooting out of the schism and the general reform of the Church of God in head and members.

It made the same claim for any other council legitimately convened.

On July 4, 1415, Gregory XII (now considered to have been the true pope) of the Roman line resigned (through a legate) after having a bull read in which he convened the council. It has subsequently been argued that Haec sancta was not valid because it was issued before the council was convened by true papal authority.

John XXIII was deposed by the council on May 29, 1415, and it deposed the third claimant, Benedict XIII of the Avignon line, on July 26, 1417, though Benedict never accepted the action. The council then elected Oddo Colonna as pope, and he served as Martin V, bringing the schism to an end. According to a report of the council, Martin stated that he endorsed its actions, but it has been questioned whether his words applied to Haec sancta or whether his verbal statement was in the proper form to give legal standing. However, he did not repudiate the decree, and the validity of his own election and the overall accomplishment of ending the schism depended upon the legitimacy of the council. The condemnation of Hus was also a part of the council's work, and Martin ordered in the bull Inter cunctas (Feb. 22, 1418) that anyone suspected of holding Hussite doctrines should be made to swear acceptance of Constance, no exception being made for Haec sancta. However, a disputed question is whether Haec sancta should be considered a dogma of faith, which if validly defined would be irreformable, or a constitutional enactment, which even if valid at the time would not necessarily be applicable outside the historically unique situation for which it was issued.

In the decades following Constance, the popes reasserted their authority against the conciliarists, and in 1460 Pius II issued the bull Execrabilis, forbidding appeals from a pope to a council. The last remnants of conciliarism were thought to have been eliminated by Vatican I. But while contemporary Catholic scholars have not questioned papal primacy, they have begun to give greater attention to collegiality and the role of councils as a balance to papal power. From this standpoint some scholars see Haec sancta as support for the position that in extraordinary situations—a pope mentally ill, under the control of a political power, or for some other reason unable to function normally—councils can act independently of papal authority.

Bibliography: R. E. MCNALLY, SJ, "Conciliarism and the Papacy," Proceedings of the Catholic Theological Society (1970) 13–30. A. FRANZEN, "The Council of Constance: Present State of the Problem," Concilium 7 (1965) 29–68. H. KUNG, Structures of the Church (New York 1964). B. TIERNEY, "Hermeneutics and History: The Problem of Haec Sancta," Essays in Medieval History, ed. T. A. SANDQUIST and M. R. POWICKE (Toronto 1969). R. E. MCNALLY, "Conciliarism and the papacy," CTSA Proceedings (1971) 13–30. T. E. MORRISSEY, "After Six Hundred Years: The Great Western Schism, Conciliarism, and Constance," Theological Studies 40 (1979) 495–509. P. H. STUMP, The Reforms of the Council of Constance, 1414-1418 (Leiden, 1994). For the Latin text see J. ALBERIGO et al., Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta (Freiburg 1962) 385–86. For an account of the Council see E. ISERLOH, Handbook of Church History, ed. H. JEDIN and J. DOLAN, IV (1970) 448–473.

[T. EARLY]

HAGAR

Egyptian slave girl of Abraham's wife Sarah. When Sarah gave up hope of providing Abraham with an heir, she offered Hagar to her husband, a procedure which, according to marriage contracts found at Nuzi, was expected of a barren wife (see Gordon, 3). In both of the Genesis accounts (Yahwist source in 16.1–16; Elohist source in 21.9–21), Hagar, after incurring Sarah's jealousy, is driven out of the household with her young son, Ishmael. In the desert she is visited by an ANGEL OF THE LORD, who, besides saving her from perishing, promises that Ishmael will grow into a powerful nation. Thus, as mother of the 12 tribes of Ishmael (Gn. 25.12–26; cf. Bar 3.23), Hagar is the first in a series of non-Israelite women (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth) singled out for a special role in salvation history.

In Galatians 4.21–31 St. Paul utilizes the Hagar story "by way of allegory" to illustrate the contrast between the Old Law and the New. Just as the offspring of Hagar are slaves, since they are born of a slave, so, too, they who are offspring of the Old Law are slaves. The New Law, however, like Sarah, gives birth to free offspring. In contrast, Hagar's offspring was "born according to the flesh," i.e., as a purely natural phenomenon, whereas the birth of Sarah's son Isaac was in fulfillment of a divine promise; so, the Jews are but the natural descendants of Abraham, whereas Christians are "the children of the promise." Finally, St. Paul contrasts the Old Covenant given on Sinai, which is "a mountain in Arabia," the land of Ishmael, with the New Covenant, which is bestowed from the New Jerusalem above. These contrasts are climaxed by the Pauline conclusion: "cast out the slave girl and her son."

Bibliography: M. NEWMAN, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962), 2:508–509. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 40–41. J. GABRIEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Friburg 1957–65) 4:1314. G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 1:55–56. C. H. GORDON, "Biblical Customs and the Nuzu Tablets," The Biblical Archaeologist 3 (1940) 1–12. R. T. O'CALLAHAN, "Historical Parallels to Patriarchal Social Custom," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 6 (1944) 391–405. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959).

[E. MARTIN]

HAGGADAH

The nonlegal content of Jewish tradition as distinguished from HALAKAH, the legal portion. The term Haggadah (or Aggada), derived from the Hebrew verb higgîd (to narrate), denotes narration, story, legend. The material of Haggadah is wide-ranging and includes homilies, ethics, theology, history, science, and folklore. Indeed, whatever cannot be construed as strictly legalistic is subsumed under this term, although Haggadah and Halakah may serve each other for interpretive purposes. Their relationship is often depicted as comparable to that which exists between the emotional heart and logical mind.

Although the TALMUD is the major source of Halakah, about one-third of the Talmud, mainly in the GEMARAH, is devoted to haggadic material. The lengthy and involved deliberations of the Talmudic rabbis on fine points of the law are periodically deflected momentarily through association of ideas into such bypaths as edifying reflections on life's meaning, an incident in the life of some sage, or a discussion of the authorship of the biblical books. One tractate of the MISHNAH, PIRKE AVOTH (Ethics of the Fathers), is devoted exclusively to a presentation of the life philosophies of several generations of Tannaim (rabbis cited in the Mishnah) by means of their pithy maxims.

The largest collection of Haggadot (plural of Haggadah) is in the MIDRASHIC LITERATURE, a term applied to a number of such collections that serve to interpret the Bible according to its inner meaning rather than its literal purpose, i.e., according to the spirit rather than the letter. Although the midrashic method was used also to establish or validate legal propositions, it found a most fruitful outlet in the uninhibited expositions that sought to derive, from the plain text of Scripture, ideas and ideals not readily apparent or support for notions already accepted. The speculative character of Haggadah is indicative of the disinclination of Judaism for creedal formulas and a systematic theology comparable in definition to Halakah. Whereas the latter ordered the interrelationships of men in the community, for their mutual protection, the former offered guidelines for personal behavior and outlook that were by no means so definitive as to exclude alternate options, as the needs of man and his life view changed.

Haggadahs at a Judaica store. (©Seth Joel/CORBIS)

Haggadah is also the name given both to the Seder ("order" of the service) of the Passover meal and to the ritual book used for the occasion. In keeping with the biblical prescription (Ex 13.8) that a father should explain to his son the meaning of the observance, the highlight of the celebration lies in the Four Questions asked by the youngest present concerning some of the customs peculiar to the festival: the use of unleavened bread and bitter herbs, the dipping of the latter into the haroseth (relish) and the parsley in salt water, and the reclining at the Seder table. The reply is a lengthy recitation of midrashic interpretations of the kind discussed above, in order to elaborate on the importance of the holy day and the miraculousness of the deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. Included are selections from Psalms and the Mishnah, as well as several folk songs. The Haggadah book itself has been, for some centuries, the object of artistic endeavors; it contains, in many of its editions and manuscripts, pictures depicting the conduct of the Seder and the festival's themes.

Illuminated initial of the Book of Haggai in the "Great Bible of Demeter Neksei-Lipocz," c. 1350 (Pre. Acc. MS 1, v. 2, folio 194v).

Bibliography: J. JACOBS, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 6:141–146. S. LEVINSON et al., Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1939–44) 5:156–174. A. MARMORSTEIN, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Berlin 1928–34) incomplete, 1:951–979. R. WISCHNITZER-BERNSTEIN, Ibid. 7:788–813. A. COHEN, ed., Everyman's Talmud (New York 1949). L. GINZBERG, Legends of the Jews, 7 v. (Philadelphia 1947). J. GOLDIN, The Fathers according to Rabbi Nathan (Yale Judaica Ser. 10; New Haven 1957). H. SCHAUSS, The Jewish Festivals, tr. S. JAFFE (New York 1958) 38–85.

[R. KRINSKY]

HAGGAI, BOOK OF

The tenth of the 12 MINOR PROPHETS according to the biblical arrangement of books, but the first of the postexilic Prophets. His name (spelled Aggaeus in the Vulgate and Aggeus in the Douay Old Testament), is a derivative from the Hebrew hag, meaning feast. Though probably not a priest himself (Hg 2.11), he may have exercised some official duties at the national sanctuary of Jerusalem, perhaps as a cult prophet or preacher.

A wholly new style of prophetic preaching is discernible in the short compilation of Haggai's sermons.

While the earlier Prophets upbraided the nation for excessive concern over Temple ritual and called for a return to strong and sincere morality (Hos 6.4–6; Is 1.11–17; Jer 7.1–8.3), Haggai, instead, was entirely preoccupied with the reconstruction of the Temple and the correct compliance with ceremonial laws (Ezr 5.1; 6.14). Here, as in almost all postexilic writing, the preponderant influence of the priest-prophet Ezekiel is manifest. Not only do Haggai's ideas manifest little or no originality, but his style is prosaic and unimpressive, especially when compared with the poetic rhythm and rich imagery of the earlier Prophets. Attempts to versify his lines remain hypothetical.

An ancient editor of the book indicates that the Prophet spoke four or possibly five times in the second year of DARIUS I, KING OF PERSIA, between Aug. 29 and Dec. 18, 520 B.C. [Hg 1.1; 2.1, 10, 15, 20; conversion of the dates are based on R. A. PARKER and W. H. DUBBERSTEIN, Babylonian Chronology 625 B.C.–A.D. 75 (Providence 1956) 30]. The land of the Jews in Palestine had shrunk to about 20 by 25 miles, with a population no greater than 20,000. It belonged to the province of Samaria, which was part of the fifth Persian satrapy of 'Abar Nahara ["across the River" (Euphrates)]. The country was harrassed with drought and depression (Hg 1.6, 9–11; 2.15–17); grasping, quarreling Jews were guilty of much injustice, even selling their fellow citizens into slavery (Neh 5; Mal 3.5). The neighboring districts, Samaria to the north and Edom to the south, were despised and hated (Ezr 4; Mal 1.3; Ob); and they, in their turn, threatened to invade Judah.

The first discourse (Hg 1.1–15a) presents Haggai's blunt condemnation of the people for living in "paneled houses, while this house [the Temple] lies in ruin" (1.4). The prophet attributed the crop failures to the nation's religious laziness and therefore demanded immediate action on the Temple's reconstruction. He obtained a favorable reaction from the people. Some exegetes transfer the speech of 2.15–19 immediately after 1.15a, which is regarded as the date introducing it, on the basis that a date is prefixed to every one of Haggai's discourses. In that case, this short book would contain five instead of four sermons.

The second discourse (1.15b–2.9), the most important of all from a theological point of view, was spoken on the second-last day of the octave of the Feast of BOOTHS (cf. Lv 23.34; Dt 16.13). Haggai's words ring with high messianic hopes, possibly because the feast included a thanksgiving service at the Temple for the year's harvest (Lv 23.39–41; 1 Kgs 8.2). He would have thought of the final harvesting of messianic blessings at the same Temple. The messianic hopes can also be accounted for by international events: Darius's quick seizure of the throne and his repulsive measures against all rebels. God too could act as decisively and quickly as Darius. Although the Vulgate recognizes a personal Messiah in 2.7, e.g., "the Desired One of all the nations," the Hebrew text and the Greek Septuagint refer to "the treasures," i.e., the contributions and talents of all nations flowing into the Temple and having a part in the liturgy.

The third discourse (2.10–14 or 2.10–19) centers on the power of evil to spread and propagate more surely than goodness. Haggai may here be rejecting the Samaritan offer to help on the reconstruction of the Temple (Ezr 4.1–5) for fear that they might contaminate the chosen people.

In the last discourse (2.20–23) Haggai reiterated the hope in a marvelous intervention when Yahweh would save His people through a Davidic king.

Bibliography: P. R. ACKROYD in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1962) 562a–563i. S. BULLOUGH, Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture, ed. B. ORCHARD et al. (London-New York 1957) 543a–544k. T. CHARY, Les Prophètes et la culte à partir de l'Exil (Tournai 1955) 118–138. A. GELIN, "Introduction aux prophètes," Bible de Jérusalem (Paris 1957—). T. H. ROBINSON and F. HORST, Die zwölf kleinen Propheten, [Handbuch zum Alten Testament, ed. O. EISSFELDT 14 (Tübingen 1954)]. J. SCHILDENBERGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:188. R. BACH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 3:25–26. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 42–43.

[C. STUHLMUELLER]

HAGIA SOPHIA

The church of Hagia Sophia (Holy Wisdom in Greek) was commissioned by the Byzantine emperor Justinian I (527–565) and built by the mathematicians Anthemius of Tralles and Isidore of Miletus. The church was inaugurated in 562 after more than five years of labor by over 10,000 workers. It replaced an earlier structure, the Great Church, which was destroyed by fire in the Nika rebellions of 532. The destroyed building was a conventional timber-roofed basilica. In replacing it Justinian and his architects combined elements from basilican—and centrally—planned structures to create a new architectural plan most frequently characterized as a domed basilica. The individual elements used in the building were not new; it was rather their combination that was innovative. Hagia Sophia was originally fronted to the west by a porticoed atrium with a central fountain. Multiple doors then opened onto a double entrance hall, or narthex. This gave access to the great open space of the nave, a rectangle measuring 229 by 245 feet (70 by 77 meters). Above this is the circular dome, 100 feet (30.5 m) in diameter, which rests on pendentives supported by four immense stone piers linked by four massive arches. These supports are not clearly evident, as in classical buildings, but are hidden behind a screen of columns on the north and south walls. On the east and west walls two half-domes are set immediately beneath the main dome; beneath each semi-dome are three apses. The circular dome thus seems to float unsupported 180 feet (55 m) above the nave floor. Prokopios, a historian in Justinian's court, captured the dome's effect on the viewer: "It seems not to be founded on solid masonry, but to be suspended from heaven by that golden chain." (De aedif. I, i, 23).

It is difficult to convey in words the tremendous scale of Hagia Sophia. It is the largest Byzantine church ever built; it was the largest church in medieval Christendom; it encloses a vaulted space larger than that of any building built before it. The scale of the building reflects its importance. Hagia Sophia was in many ways as symbolic of Byzantium as was the nearby Great Palace complex of the Byzantine emperors. It was the showpiece of the empire, proudly displayed to every foreign diplomat, and was equally the object of devout pilgrims and gawking tourists. It gave employment to more than 600 members of the clergy and served as the primary church of the patriarch, whose palace abutted the south facade and connected directly to the gallery. Hagia Sophia was the site of many of the empire's most important celebrations, including the investiture of new emperors. On the major feast days of the Orthodox Church the emperor and patriarch joined together to take part in the liturgy.

The interior decoration matched the splendor of its architectural underpinnings. According to Prokopios, 40,000 pounds of silver was used to decorate the sanctuary. Acres of multicolored marbles were quarried to create the columns and revetments that sheath the walls and floors. Marble was also used for many of the liturgical furnishings, such as the ambo, the elevated platform from which scriptures were read. The upper vaulting was covered with gold tesserae (cubes), which reflected the light streaming in through the tympana and dome windows. Cut marble (opus sectile), arranged in the form of vines intertwined with fruit and birds decorated the north and south colonnades at the levels of the aisles and galleries (upper stories). Cloths woven with gold thread covered the solid gold altar and draped the interior doorways. The low screen separating the sanctuary from the nave displayed silver relief icons of Christ, the Virgin, angels, and saints. The full extent of the figural decoration of the building prior to ICONOCLASM is not known. After repairs to the dome in 563, a mosaic depicting a cross was placed in its apex.

Hagia Sophia, designed by Anthemius of Tralles and Isidorus of Miletus for Emperor Justinian I (532–537), Istanbul. (©Archive Photos)

In 867, after the end of Iconoclasm, Hagia Sophia was the first church to undergo official redecoration. One of the first images to be installed was the mosaic still visible in the eastern apse depicting the enthroned Virgin and Child. It was originally flanked by mosaics of the archangels Michael and Gabriel; only the latter survives today. At the same time mosaic icons of the Church Fathers were placed at the base of the tympanum. In the tenth through twelfth centuries imperial portraits were added to the south gallery and placed above the doors of the narthex, and in the fourteenth century a mosaic of Christ as Pantokrator (Ruler of All) was placed in the dome.

The building has of course undergone repairs and alterations. In the Byzantine period frequent earthquakes necessitated repairs to the dome and the strengthening of the exterior buttresses. When Constantinople fell to the Ottoman Sultan Mehmet II in 1453 the church was converted into a mosque. Christian liturgical furnishings were removed and replaced with those necessary for Muslim worship, and four minarets were added to the exterior. The Byzantine buildings that clustered around the church were replaced with Ottoman and, later, Turkish structures. The majority of the Byzantine mosaics were not removed but were painted over in the eighteenth century. Hagia Sophia is now a museum administered by the Turkish government and preserves aspects of both its Christian and Muslim history. In 1930 restoration of the Byzantine mosaics was begun and conservation work continues today on both the Byzantine and Islamic interior decorations.

Bibliography: R. CORMACK and E. J. W. HAWKINS, “The Mosaics of St. Sophia at Istanbul: The Rooms above the Southwest Vestibule and Ramp” Dumbarton Oaks Papers 31 (1977) 175–251. R. J. MAINSTONE, Hagia Sophia: Architecture, Structure, and Liturgy of Justinian’s Great Church (London 1988). G. MAJESKA, “The Emperor in His Church: Imperial Ritual in the Church of St. Sophia” in Byzantine Court Culture from 829–1204, ed. H. MAGUIRE (Washington, DC 1997). C. MANGO, The Art of the Byzantine Empire 312–1453 (Toronto 1986); Materials for the Study of the Mosaics of St. Sophia (Washington, DC 1962). R. MARK and A. ÇAKMAK, eds., Hagia Sophia from the Age of Justinian to the Present (New York 1992). T. E. MATHEWS, The Early Churches of Constantinople: Architecture and Liturgy (University Park, PA 1971). W. MÜLLER-WEINER, Bildlexikon zur Topographie Istanbul (Tübingen 1977). T. WHITTEMORE, The Mosaics of Saint Sophia at Istanbul; Preliminary Report on the Year’s Work, 1931–32 (Paris 1933).

[L. JONES]

HAGIOGRAPHY

The name given to the branch of learning that has the saints and the worship of them for its object. Writings relating to the worship of the saints may be divided into two categories: (1) those that are the spontaneous product of circumstances or have been called into being by religious needs of one kind or another, and these belong to what may be called practical hagiography; (2) writings devoted to the scientific study of this material, and these constitute critical hagiography.

Practical Hagiography

The cult of the saints has given rise, in both the East and the West, to a very considerable number of documents, varying in form and in tenor with the author's object. In primitive times lists of martyrs were drawn up in particular churches with a view to the celebration of anniversaries; those lists became the nucleus of the MARTYROLOGIES [see H. Delehaye, Cinq leçons sur la méthode hagiographique (Brussels 1934) ch. 3].

Martyrs and Heroes. Side by side with the martyrologies and calendars there are narratives of martyrdoms and biographies written by contemporaries in memory of the heroes whom the Church celebrates: e.g., in Greek, the Martyrdom of St. POLYCARP and the Life of St. ANTHONY OF EGYPT by St. Athanasius; in Latin, The Passion of the Scillitan Martyrs, the Life of St. Augustine by Possidius, and the Life of St. Martin by Sulpicius Severus. There are accounts composed by writers who lived later than the events recorded and whose object was to edify the faithful or satisfy a pious curiosity. These hagiographers write either in prose, as the author of the Acts of St. CECILIA, or in verse, as PRUDENTIUS and many others. Finally there are texts composed or arranged for liturgical use from historical documents or from artificial compositions.

Hagiographic Collections. The various classes of hagiographic works—historical memoirs, literary compositions, liturgical texts—existed at first as monographs, but soon the need was felt of gathering into a collection separate pieces of the same nature. The most ancient hagiographic collection of which mention is made is EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA's lost compilation of the Acts of the Ancient martyrs, containing the passions of martyrs previous to the persecution of DIOCLETIAN. Out of this work, Eusebius wrote, in one volume, On the Martyrs of Palestine, the story of the last persecution in his own province. THEODORET OF CYR afterward compiled his Historia religiosa from a series of 30 monastic biographies that he had previously authored. Thus there are two types of collections, to one or other of which may be attributed all those to be mentioned hereafter—a grouping of pieces from various origin under one title, and a series of narratives from the same pen.

Among the most famous collections of the early Middle Ages were the In Gloria Martyrum and In Gloria Confessorum of GREGORY OF TOURS, the dialogues of St. GREGORY THE GREAT, De Vita et Miraculis Patrum Italianorum, the three books of EULOGIUS OF CÓRDOBA (d. 859) entitled Memoriale Sanctorum.

Legendaries. The order in these early collections was dictated by the historical setting of the particular subjects—saints' lives or passions—that they incorporate; later there appear collections of a more artificial character in which the passions and the biographies of the saints follow each other according to the dates of their anniversaries in the calendar. In the West such collections are known as passionaries or legendaries. In time every region came to have its own; the Roman legendary constitutes a common foundation of all with individual additions determined by local cults. The legendaries usually consist of biographies and passiones of relatively great length.

Legenda Aurea. Beginning in the 13th century, collections of a more convenient size began to appear, containing the matter of the legendaries in a condensed form. Unquestionably the most famous of these is the Legenda aurea of the Dominican JAMES OF VORAGINE, MSS of which were plentiful before printed copies became available. This work was translated during the Middle Ages into several modern languages. A large number of saints' lives in the vernacular, which are now of interest chiefly to students of philology, may be traced to Latin originals. The importance of this body of literature may be estimated by a perusal of Paul Meyer's memoir "Légendes hagiographiques en français," Histoire Littéraire de la France 33:328–459; Bossuat 297–322 and Supplement (1955) 73–74; F. Wilhelm, Deutsche Legenden und Legendare (Leipzig 1907).

Other hagiographical compilations that date from the Middle Ages are also worthy of mention, even though they have not all enjoyed the same popularity. Such are the Sanctoral of BERNARD GUI, Bishop of Lodève (d. 1331), still unedited (see L. Delisle, Notices et Extraits 27.2, 1879); the legendary of the Dominican Pierre Calo (d. 1348), also unedited [see A. Poncelet, Analecta Bollandiana 29 (1910) 5–116]; the Sanctilogium Angliae of John of Tynemouth (d. 1366), which became the Nova legenda Angliae of John Capgrave (1464), of which there is now a critical edition by C. Horstmann (Oxford 1901); the Sanctuarium of B. MOMBRIUS, printed at Milan before the year 1480, in two folio volumes, and especially precious because it reproduces the lives and the passions of the old MSS without reshaping or rehandling (new ed., Paris 1910); the great compilations of John Gielemans, a Brabantine canon regular (d. 1487), under the titles Sanctilogium and Hagiologium Brabantinum, Novale Sanctorum [see Analecta Bollandiana 14 (1895) 5–88]; and Hilarion of Milan's supplement to James of Voragine (Legendarium . . . supplementum illius de Voragine, Milan 1494).

Lippomano and Surius. After the middle of the 16th century, the lives of the saints were collected by Luigi Lippomano, Bishop of Verona [Sanctorum priscorum patrum vitae (Venice-Rome 1551–60)], and later by the Carthusian Lawrence SURIUS [De probatis sanctorum historiis (Cologne 1570–75)]; both collections were offered as edifying reading and at the same time as a polemic arsenal against the Protestants; they enjoyed a considerable reputation. Surius's Historiae was several times reprinted. Pedro de RIBADENEYRA's Flos Sanctorum (1st ed. Madrid 1599) had a greater popular success and was translated into several languages. It was followed by a large number of lives of the saints for every day in the year.

Alban Butler. Among the most famous of these collections is Alban BUTLER's Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and Other Principal Saints, which first appeared in 1756 and was often reprinted (see the entirely new ed., 4 v. London 1956). Msgr. P. Guérin's Les petits Bollandistes is an uncritical collection that has nothing in common with the Acta sanctorum or with the publications of the Bollandists. Much better, at least from June on to December, are the Vies des saints et des bienheureux edited by the Benedictine Fathers of Paris (13 v. 1935–59). Initiated in 1961, the Bibliotheca Sanctorum forms a vast dictionary of the saints, written in Italian and aiming at serious documentation.

Most collections of lives of the saints, particularly those in modern languages, are inspired by the idea of interesting and edifying the reader, without great solicitude for historical truth. There are, finally, isolated biographies, the number of which grew incessantly during the Middle Ages and in later times and served to swell the collections.

Greek Menologies Among the Greeks, the development of hagiography was, at least outwardly, the same as among the Latins. The passions of the martyrs, biographies, and panegyrics of the saints were similarly collected, and were arranged in the order of the calendar, viz, in the menologies mentioned as early as the ninth century, and in the panegyrics. Most famous is the menology of Symeon Metaphrastes (tenth century), on which depend the imperial menologies of the 11th century and several later collections.

The Greeks, in addition, have their shorter menologies, composed of abridged lives. The SYNAXARIES, the use of which is chiefly liturgical, are mainly compositions in which the more extended lives and passions are reduced to the form of brief notices (see H. Delehay, Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, Acta Sanctorum Nov. Propylaeum, 1902). Neither is there any lack of collections in popular or modern Greek, for the saints' lives of Maximos Margunios, Agaprios Landos, NICODEMUS THE HAGIORITE, and others down to the Megas synaxaristes of C. Dukakis (14 v. Athens 1889–97) are widely read in Greek-speaking countries.

Slavonic and Oriental Hagiography. Closely connected with Greek hagiography is Slavonic hagiography. The reader is referred, for purposes of orientation, to I. Martinov, Annus ecclesiasticus graeco-slavicus in Acta Sanctorum Oct. 11, 1863 (repr. Brussels 1963), and the critical edition of the Russian Menaea of Macarius (1868–1914; publication interrupted).

The Orient has been the scene of an analogous development. Passions of the martyrs, lives of the saints, collections, and synaxaries are all found in the various Oriental languages; but in spite of the praiseworthy efforts of the specialists, there is still insufficient detailed information. Those desiring a summary account of the hagiography of the different peoples of those regions are referred, for the Armenian, to the Vitae et Passiones Sanctorum, published (2 v. 1874) by the MECHITHARISTS of Venice, the great Armenian Synaxary of Ter-Israel (tr. and ed. G. Bayan in the Patrologia orientalis, ed. R. Graffin and F. Nau [Paris 1903–]) and the Acta Sanctorum pleniora of Aucher (12 v. Venice 1810–35); for the Coptic, to H. Hyvernat, Actes des martyrs de l'Égypte (Paris 1886), I. Balestri and H. Hyvernat, Acta martyrum in Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium (Paris-Louvain 1903), Scriptores Coptici (1907–50), the Coptic Jacobite Synaxary (ed. I. Forget in Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium, Scriptores Arabici, and R. BASSET in the Patrologia orientalis); for the Ethiopian, to E. Pereira, Acta martyrum, and C. C. Rossini and B. Turajev, Vitae Sanctorum indigenarum, Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium, Scriptores Aethiopicum, the Monumenta Aethiopiae hagiologica of Turajev, and I. Guidi et al., Ethiopian Synaxary in the Patrologia orientalis (Eng. tr. by E. A. W. Budge, 4 v. Cambridge 1928); for the Syriac, to S. E. Assemani, Acta martyrum Orientalium (2 v. Rome 1748) and P. Bedjan Acta martyrum et sanctorum (7 v. Leipzig 1890–97); for the Georgian, to G. Sabinin, Sakart'hvelos Samot'khke (St. Petersburg 1832), and C. Kekelidze, Monumenta Hagiographica Georgica (2 v. Tiflis 1918–46); see also G. Garitte, Le Calendrier palestinien-géorgien du Sinaiticus 34 (Brussels 1958). For fuller details, see the three reper-ories published by the Bollandists: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina (2 v. 1898–1901 and suppl. 1911); Bibliotheca hagiographica graeca (3d ed., 3 v. 1957); Bibliotheca hagiographica orientalis (1910).

Scientific Hagiography

Criticism of documents belonging to the categories enumerated above is called scientific hagiography. It involves two operations that are hardly separable: the study of written tradition for the purpose of establishing texts, and research into sources to determine the historical value of those texts.

Methodical Criticism. The earliest attempts at methodical hagiographic criticism date from the beginning of the 17th century. It is known that the Jesuit H. Rosweyde (d. 1629) first conceived the project of forming a collection of the Acta Sanctorum, which since 1643 has been put into execution by J. Bollandus and his collaborators (see BOLLANDISTS) and which has for its essential aim the critical sifting and the publication of all the hagiographic texts that have come down to us relating to the saints venerated everywhere in the world—quotquot toto orbe coluntur.

Beginning with the first volumes, Bollandus and his colleagues submitted their documents to a criticism as severe as the means of information and the state of historical science permitted. With the development attained by all branches of science in the course of the 19th century, the importance of archeological discoveries in that period, the progress of philology and paleography, the possibility of using rapid communication and photocopy to obviate the difficulty of scattered material, hagiography could not but take a new orientation.

The Bollandists. Side by side with the compilation of the Acta Sanctorum, the Bollandists have been induced to undertake studies that, without modifying the spirit of their work, assure for it a broader and firmer basis and a more rigorous application of the principles of historical criticism. They have not been alone in their devotion to the science of hagiography as constituted since the inauguration of their work; J. MABILLON, in Acta SS. O.S.B., T. RUINART, in Acta martyrum sincera, and S. E. ASSEMANI, in Acta martyrum Orientalium, have furnished important supplements to the work.

Contemporary Hagiography. After the middle of the 19th century, a host of solid works made their appearance, furthering hagiographic science to a notable extent. Such are the fine editions of the lives of Merovingian and Carolingian saints in the Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–), the Vitae Sanctorum Hiberniae ed. C. Plummer (Oxford 1910), the numerous Greek texts brought to light by A. Papadopoulos-Kerameus and other learned Hellenists in various countries, the recent publications of Oriental writers mentioned above, and a mass of labors in minute details that have often opened new paths for the science of criticism.

Of particular value are the researches of R. A. LIPSUS and M. Bonnet on the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles and the studies of P. FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI on a selection of Acts of the Martyrs. The Bulletin des publications hagiographiques (of Analecta Bollandiana) may fill in for the reader the gaps left by this rapid review. Progress has likewise been made in hagiographical criticism as applied to MARTYROLOGIES, notably, by the edition and commentary of the so-called MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME (Acta Sanctorum, Nov. 2, 2 parts, 1894 and 1931). The critical researches on historical martyrologies brilliantly inaugurated by the Bollandist Sollerius (Martyrologium Usuardi in Acta Sanctorum, June 6–7) have been enlarged and brought into line with modern criticism by H. QUENTIN (Les martyrologes historiques, Paris 1908).

Science and Piety. As will be readily understood, the distinction established between practical and scientific hagiography is not always sharply defined. More than one attempt has been made to conciliate science and piety and to supply the latter with nourishment that has been passed through a sieve. The first collection of saints' lives conceived in this spirit is that of A. Baillet, Les vies des saints (Paris 1701), the first volumes of which (January 1 to August 31) were put upon the Index. A series of separate saints' lives, edited in France under the title Les Saints, was inspired by a similar idea of edifying the reader with biographies that should be irreproachable from the historical point of view. It is hardly necessary to add that more than one hagiographical publication of erudite and critical pretensions possesses no importance from a scientific point of view.

Twentieth Century. In the first half of the 20th century, hagiographical studies profited from the research accomplished in cognate disciplines, known as auxiliary sciences in history and philology. Epigraphy played a crucial part in H. DELEHAYE's Les origines du culte des martyrs (1912; 2d ed. 1933); see also F. Halkin, "Inscriptions grecques relative à l'hagiographie," Analecta Bollandiana 1949–1953. In liturgy, V. Leroquais drew up inventories of Sacramentaries, Pontificals, Psalters, Breviaries, and Missals in MS, and the Henry Bradshaw Society in England as well as M. FÉROTIN, F. CABROL, L. Mohlberg, etc., published editions of the ancient liturgical texts. M. Coens made a study of the ancient litanies in Recueil d'études bollandiennes (Brussels 1963).

In HYMNOLOGY, U. Chevalier's monumental Repertorium hymnologicum (6 v. 1895–1921) and G. Dreves

and C. Blume's Analecta hymnica (55 v. 1886–1922) are indispensable. In toponomy, the place name societies of England made precious contributions [see H. Delehaye, "Loca Sanctorum," Analecta Bollandiana (1930)]. Iconography likewise remained a constant interest of researchers and particularly of art historians in all lands and was well represented by K. Künstle, Iconographie der Heiligen (1926), and G. Kaftal, Iconography of the Saints in Tuscan Painting (Florence 1952). Finally for lipsanography, or the study of RELIQUARIES, see H. Delehaye, Cinq leçons sur la méthode hagiographique, ch. 4.

Bibliography: R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie: Ses sources, ses méthodes, son histoire (Paris 1953). H. DELEHAYE, The Legends of the Saints, tr. D. ATTWATER (New York 1962); Les Passions des martyrs et les genres littéraires (Brussels 1921); Sanctus: Essai sur le culte des saints dans l'antiquité (Brussels 1927). A. EHRHARD, Überlieferung und Bestand der hagiographischen und homiletischen Literatur der griechischen Kirche von den Anfängen bis zum Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts, 3 v. (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 50–52; 1937–52).

[F. HALKIN]

HAID, LEO MICHAEL

Bishop; b. near Latrobe, Pa., July 15, 1849; d. Belmont, N.C., July 24, 1924. He was the son of German immigrants. Entering the scholasticate of St. Vincent Abbey, Latrobe, he was admitted in 1868 to the novitiate and made his profession on Sept. 17, 1869. Following ordination on Dec. 21, 1872, he served at St. Vincent College, Latrobe, as professor, chaplain, and secretary. On July 14, 1885, he was elected first abbot of Maryhelp Abbey (Belmont Abbey) in Garibaldi, N.C., which had been a priory since 1876. He received the abbatial blessing on Nov. 26, 1885, in Charleston, S.C. In 1886 he opened a seminary and began construction of buildings for the lay school, which was chartered as St. Mary's College. He persuaded the townsfolk to call their settlement Belmont and in 1913 the school was renamed Belmont Abbey College. On Dec. 7, 1887, Haid was appointed vicar apostolic of North Carolina and titular bishop of Messene. He was consecrated at Baltimore, Md., July 1, 1888, by Cardinal James Gibbons.

The interests of the abbot-bishop were necessarily divided. At Belmont the seminary trained diocesan priests; the college grew; and an abbey church was constructed. Throughout the vicariate churches, schools, and charitable institutions were established. In 1889 Haid was placed in charge of the Florida Benedictine missions, which became St. Leo Conventual Priory in 1894 and an abbey in 1902. From 1890 to 1902 he was president of the American Cassinese Congregation. He founded St. Joseph's Institute near Bristow, Va. (1893), Sacred Heart Priory, Savannah, Ga. (1902), and St. Benedict Priory, Richmond, Va. (1911). On June 8, 1910, Pius X withdrew eight counties from the vicariate to constitute Belmont an abbey nullius. Haid was named assistant at the pontifical throne and count of the apostolic palace on July 15, 1914.

Bibliography: T. OESTREICH, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 10 v. (reissue New York 1957; suppl. 1958) 4.2:88–89.

[A. G. BIGGS]

HAIL MARY

The form of prayer also known as the Angelic Salutation consists of three parts: the words of the Archangel Gabriel (Lk 1.28), "Hail [Mary] full of grace, the Lord is with Thee, blessed art thou amongst women;" the words of Elizabeth (Lk 1.42), "Blessed is the fruit of thy womb [Jesus]," and a formula of petition, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now and at the hour of our death. Amen." The prayer is the result of a gradual development from the sixth century to the 16th when the present wording was adopted as general liturgical usage.

Origins. In the sixth century, the texts of the Archangel and Elizabeth are found as a single formula in the ancient liturgies of St. James, St. Mark, the Ethiopic of the 12 Apostles, and the ritual of Severus of Antioch (d. 538). To the formula have been added the words: "Because you have conceived Christ, the Redeemer of our souls" [F. E. Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western (Oxford 1896) 1:56, 128, 218]. This first part of the prayer appears also in two Egyptian ostraca of the sixth or seventh century (H. Leclercq, Monumenta Ecclesiae Liturgica 213, 236). In the seventh century, it is found in the Roman antiphonary as an offertory text for the feast of the Annunciation, the Ember Wednesday of Advent, and the fourth Sunday of Advent. It is in this original form that it was used in the Middle Ages. It is found also in the Church of Santa Maria Antiqua (seventh–eighth century) in a mutilated inscription that accompanies a painting of the Annunciation [W. de Gruneisen, Sainte-Marie-Antique (Rome 1911) 433, 445]. Sometimes the combination of both texts as a single formula is ascribed to the Archangel Gabriel, an interpretation derived from the Latin Gospel of the pseudo-Matthew. This interesting adaptation can be seen in the ninth century hymn, Deus qui mundum crimine jacentem [G. Drevés, Analecta Hymnica Medii Aevi (Leipzig 1886–1915) 50:143]. The same erroneous observation appears in Peter of Celle, about 1157 (PL 202:654, 711, 724).

Popular Devotion. The Hail Mary was not adopted before the 11th century as a popular form of devotion. It was about this time that the practice of reciting the two-fold salutation as versicles and responses in the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary developed and became diffused in monastic communities. Peter Damian called it the angelic or evangelical versicle and recommended the practice of its recitation (De Bono Suffr. 3; PL 145:564). The oldest prescription relative to the recitation of the Hail Mary is found at the end of the 12th century. Bishop Odo of Siliac in the Synod of 1198 required the clergy to see that the faithful recited not only the Our Father and the Creed but also the Hail Mary (Statuta Odonis, n.1; Mansi 22:681). Shortly after, the councils of many other nations made similar prescriptions; the practice attained such popularity that the prayer came to be regarded almost as an appendix to the Our Father.

Later Evolution. The addition of the word "Jesus" is attributed by some to Urban IV (1261–64). The second part of the Hail Mary appeared only later. Because the form consisting of the two salutations was considered merely a greeting, the need was felt for an addition of an element of petition, and the second part of the Hail Mary appeared. Through the initiative of individuals there began to appear a paraphrase of the text. St. Bernardine of Siena preached a sermon in 1427 wherein he spoke these words: "Ave Maria Jesus, Sancta Maria, mater Dei, Ora pro nobis" [Serm. 29, ed. Banchi (Siena 1884) 2:429]. The present form was introduced into the canonical hours of the Breviary by the Mercedarians in 1514, the Camaldolese in 1515, and the Franciscans in 1525, and was finally fixed in the reformed Breviary of Pius V in 1568. On March 23, 1955, by the decree Cum nostra, the obligation of its recitation in the Breviary was abrogated.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, "Prière à la Vierge Marie sur un ostraken de Louqsor," Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétienne 2 (1912) 3–32; Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 10:2043–62. H. THURSTON, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932) 1 (1932) 1161–65; E. CAMPANA, Maria nel culto cattolico, 2 v. (Turin 1933) v.1. G. M. ROSCHINI, "L'Ave Maria: note storiche," Marianum 5 (1943) 177–185. J. JUNGSMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 1:1141. L. EISENHOFER and J. LECHNER, The Liturgy of the Roman Rite, tr. A. J. and E. F. PEELER (New York 1961) 63. P. LAZZARINI, Il Saluto dell'Angelico: Studio Storico, Critico, Esegético dell'Ave Maria (Milan 1972). J. E. MARTINS-TERRA, "Ave Maria à Luz do Antigo Testamento," A Oração no Antigo Testamento (Sao Paulo 1974), 191–221. NICHOLAS AYO, The Hail Mary: A Verbal Icon of Mary (Notre Dame 1994).

[A. A. DE MARCO]

HAIMO OF AUXERRE

An important medieval exegete; d. c. 855. A BENEDICTINE monk, he taught at his Abbey of Saint-Germain in AUXERRE, where his most outstanding student was HEIRIC OF AUXERRE. The 12th-century Anonymus Mellicensis, probably also a monk, noted (Patrologia Latina 213:977C) that Haimo wrote many works, especially a very large book (librum infinitae quantitatis) on St. PAUL, excellent explanations of the Book of REVELATION and of the SONG OF SONGS, as well as a treatise on the 12 Minor Prophets. Through an error in the Catalogus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum compiled by Abbot John TRITHEMIUS in 1494, almost all the works of Haimo of Auxerre were attributed to Haimo, Bishop of Halberstadt (d. 853). Recent studies have tended to correct this long-standing error, and the following works are generally regarded as written by Haimo of Auxerre: In divi Pauli epistolas expositio (Patrologia Latina 117:361–938), Expositionis in Apocalypsim libri septem (Patrologia Latina 117:938–1220), Commentarium in Cantica Cantorum (Patrologia Latina 117:295–358), Homiliae de tempore (Patrologia Latina 118:11–746), and Homiliae de sanctis (Patrologia Latina 118:747–804). To this list may possibly yet be added the Homiliae in aliquot epistolas Pauli (Patrologia Latina 118:803C–816) and the Ennarratio in duodecim prophetas minores (Patrologia Latina 117:11–294).

Bibliography: B. HEURTEBIZE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.2:2068–69. C. SPICQ, Esquisse d'une histoire de l'exégèse latine au moyen âge (Paris 1944) 50–51. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS, 873, 902, 910, 1220. P. CLASSEN, *Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart*³ 3:30. J. GROSS, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 4:1325. G. MATHON, Catholicisme 5:538–539. R. QUADRI, "Aimone di Auxerre alla luce Dei Collectanea di Heiric di Auxerre," Italia Medioevale e Umanistica 6 (1963) 1–48.

[H. DRESSLER]

HAIMO OF LANDECOP, BL.

Cistercian renowned for his visions and piety and, after his death, for his miracles; b. Landecop (Saint-Étienne-en-Coglais), in Brittany; d. April 30, 1173. A monk of SAVIGNY, he was friend and confessor to King HENRY II of England and gave advice to King Louis VII of France; in his own monastery he acted as spiritual director to Peter of Avranches. His reputation brought Savigny many gifts that enabled the the community to begin rebuild the abbey church just before Haimo's death. None of his works of edification have survived, but the annals of Savigny include many of his visions and miracles.

Bibliography: Vitae b. Petri Abrincensis et b. Haimonis, ed. E. P. SAUVAGE, Analecta Bollandiana 2 (1883) 475–560. Ex libro

de miraculis sanctorum Savigniacensium, M. BOUQUET, Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France (Rerum gallicarum et fancicarum scriptores) (Paris 1738–1904) 23:587–605. Histoire littéraire de la France (Paris 1865–) 13:592. C. AUVRY and A. LAVEILLE, Histoire de la congrégation de Savingny, 3 v. (Paris 1896–98) 3:194–195.

[M. M. CHIBNALL]

HAINMAR OF AUXERRE, ST.

Martyr, bishop of AUXERRE from c. 717 to c. 731. The Historia episcoporum Autisiodorensium (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores 13:394) styles Hainmar (or Haimarus) “vocatus episcopus,” which probably means that, like his predecessor, he was never consecrated bishop. Moreover, the same source presents him more as a military commander than as a bishop. It appears that on two occasions CHARLES MARTEL put him in command of expeditions against the people of Aquitaine. But Hainmar quarreled with the king and was imprisoned in Bastogne, in the Belgian province of Luxembourg. He escaped, but was caught near Toul and executed.

Feast: Oct. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 12:369–371. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:559. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1907–15); 2:448–449. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 1:381.

[E. BROUETTE]

HAIR SHIRT

A penitential garment woven from the hair of mountain goats or of camels, called in Latin a cilicium because the cloth from which it was made originated in Cilicia, where mountain goats abound.

Cloth woven of animal hair was in common use in the Near East from pre-Christian times. It was used for sacking, tents, and bad-weather clothing because of its impermeable quality. Worn next to the skin it becomes a true mortification and was used as such from early Christian times. It became the proper garb for public penitents, and ascetics seeking works of supererogation adopted its use for clothing and bedding.

Ancient and medieval rules of religious communities are silent on the use of the hair shirt. St. JEROME spoke of it as the distinctive sign of the monk in the East. But, in the West, CASSIAN denounced it as a form of monastic exhibitionism, a parading of virtue. However, it appears in the lives of many devout souls, in and out of the cloister. St. GERMAIN slept in a hair shirt and on a pile of ashes. St. Thomas BECKET was found, at his death, to be wearing a hair shirt that covered most of his body. St. LOUIS of France wore one under his regal robes. In the late Middle Ages, the wearing of a hair shirt became standard practice for LENT and ADVENT, but it was reduced in size and form to a narrow strip of hair cloth worn around the waist or as a scapular.

Bibliography: J. VAN DODEWAARD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 2:120–304. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 1:1623–25.

[P. MULHERN]

HAITI, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of the poorest and most politically unstable countries in the Western Hemisphere, the Republic of Haiti occupies the western third of the island of Hispaniola in the Greater Antilles, located between Cuba and Puerto Rico. The name Haiti, given to the entire island by the Carib and Arawak Indians, means mountainous land; about 30 percent of the region is over 1,600 feet above sea level, and only 20 percent of its land mass is arable. With the lowest per capita income of any country in Latin America, Haiti's inhabitants live, for the most part, in a subsistence economy. Agriculture produces the export crops of coffee, sugar cane, sisal, cotton, cacao, and bananas. There are virtually no industries. In spite of the beauty of the island and its tropical climate, tourism has not developed because of the unsettled political conditions.

The ethnic composition of the population—95 percent of Haiti's inhabitants are of African descent—reflects its roots as a French colony. Seventy-five percent of Haitians are peasants who work in the towns, speak a dialect called Créole, and understand little French. Five percent of the population, made of French-speaking whites and wealthy people of color, comprise a ruling class whose members have inherited the privileges of the French colonizers. The island's middle class, about 20 percent of the population, consists of people of color ranging economically from a high standard of living to abject poverty. As a group they understand French but usually speak Créole. Beginning in 1957 the middle class began to replace the upper class as the exploiter of the peasants.

The Colonial Era. Christopher Columbus arrived on the island he christened Española on December 6, 1492. Placed under Spanish control from 1492 to 1697, Hispaniola was administered under the PATRONATO REAL.

It suffered from the depredations of the Carib people, from the greed of the CONQUISTADORES, and from European diseases. Ultimately the native population was exterminated. African slaves were brought to the island as early as 1512. After the conquest of Mexico the island became a colony of reduced importance to Spain.

While French and English buccaneers began to use the little island of Tortuga to the north of Haiti as their headquarters early in the 17th century, the English were driven out of the area by 1640. At that time a governor was appointed by the king of France and the Catholic religion was reestablished in the area. In 1681 Capuchins came to the island to take charge of evangelization and to found parishes. They succeeded in bringing some order out of the religious chaos. By the time they left in 1704, six parishes had been established. Then the Jesuits took over, to remain until 1763, the date of the suppression of their order in France. The Capuchins returned in 1768 and continued the work of founding parishes.

Haiti was a flourishing French colony until 1804 when it secured its independence, forcing the last prefect apostolic to flee the island for fear of his life. From 1804 to 1860 Haiti remained in schism from Rome, leaving the nation's various governments to attempt to run the Church as they tried to run the state. What few clergy there were were defrocked religious from various countries and seculars driven out of their own dioceses. While the first Protestants made inroads into the island's population, six separate papal delegations also tried to enter Haiti, but were not recognized by the government.

The Church under the Concordat of 1860. On March 28, 1860, a concordat was finally signed by Haitian President Geffrard and Pope Pius IX. The concordat recognized national patronage, which gave the government the privilege of presenting candidates for bishoprics and provided for the establishment in Haiti of an archdiocese and four dioceses. What Haiti likely needed at this time was the establishment of missionary prefectures or vicariates. It was a land where evangelization had to begin again.

In the cities the reestablishment of the Church organization and the presence of priests, together with the almost immediate foundation of schools, extended Catholicism, and a religious veneer was quickly attained by the upper classes. However, at the same time Marxism also was making a strong impression on the same intellectual elite, and the two ideologies would continue to conflict into the next century.

Despite the concordat, in rural areas religious services still consisted largely in the priests' performing baptisms, giving the Last Sacraments, and presiding over Capital: Port-au-Prince.

Size: 10,714 sq. miles.

Population: 6,867,995 in 2000.

Languages: French; Creole is spoken by many people.

Religions: Catholics 5,493,600 (80%), Protestants 1,098,720 (16%), other 275,675 (4%); approximately 50% of Haitians also practice voodoo.

Metropolitan Sees: Cap-Haïtien, with suffragans Fort-Liberté, Hinche, Les Gonaïves, and Port-de Paix; Port-au-Prince, with suffragans Jacmel, Jérémie, and Les Cayes.

burial services. This kind of missionary endeavor, which made little fundamental impression upon the Haitian masses, was largely responsible for the continuance of superstition in the country's interior. What teaching was done was fruitless for the most part. Up to 1951 missionaries still used French catechisms, unintelligible to 75 percent of the people. About 1900 Bishop KERSUZAN wrote a catechism in Créole, but it was never widely used. Forty years later Bp. Robert of Gonaïves started a campaign not only for the use of a Créole catechism but also to allow the people to use their own language in hymns. His work would only be partially successful; for the next two decades, when Créole was used at all, churchgoers often sang hymns that were literal translations of French lyrics. In 1959 a much-needed school for the training of lay catechists was opened.

In 1871 a major seminary was established at Pontchâteau, France, under the direction of the Montfort Fathers, to recruit missionaries for Haiti. In 1893 this establishment was taken over by the secular clergy and transferred to Saint-Jacques-par-Lampaul-Guimiliau. In 1922 the École Apostolique, a seminary for the training of a native clergy, was founded by order of the Holy See in Port-au-Prince. In spite of continued directives from Rome, the ecclesiastics in Haiti were slow to encourage a native clergy. In the 1940s Bishop Collignon began to press for implementation of these wishes of the Holy See, but it took another order from Rome, putting Canadian Jesuits in charge of the seminary in 1953, to get any action. The Jesuits were charged to bring the standards of the seminary up to those in the rest of the Catholic world. By 1962 the institution had received 72 seminarians. However, in February 1964 the Jesuits were expelled by the government, and the seminary was closed. It was opened again in October 1965 under the direction of the Viatorians.

[J. M. SALGADO/EDS.]

The Duvalier Years. In 1957 François "Papa Doc" Duvalier came to power. He quickly established his own private army, the notoriously brutal Tonton Macoutes, which enabled him to control the military, churches, voodoo priests, and rural sheriffs. Virtually all commercial and agricultural enterprises fell under Duvalier’s official and unofficial tax schemes. Upon his death in 1971, he was succeeded by his son, Jean-Claude Duvalier. The younger Duvalier, known as “Baby Doc”, assumed the title “president-for-life,” and thus continued the brutal family dictatorship.

During the period from 1971 to 1986, a new understanding of the Church’s mission, involving a prophetic outreach to rural Haitians and away from the urban, mulatto elite was reinforced by Vatican II, LIBERATION THEOLOGY, an increase in native clergy, the growth of the Ti Legliz movement (the Haitian version of basic Christian communities), and various spin-off Catholic Action groups. The Church shifted its attention to the countryside, working in education, economic development, health, literacy, and the training of peasant leaders. This changed approach—clearly a preferential option for the poor—included a scripture-based adaptation of Catholic social thought and liberation theology. The use of Créole in the liturgy became more common, and the role and ritual of voodoo and its implications for Catholic sacramental theology were also studied.

In 1983 Pope John Paul II visited Haiti. The Holy Father’s cry that “things must change” resonated throughout the country and put the dictatorial government on notice. The pope’s plea provided cover for the efforts of priests, sisters, and lay leaders. Local Catholic organizations sprang into action, mobilizing the rural sector and urban slums. The Haitian Conference of Religious, Caritas organizations, justice and peace commissions, Ti Legliz groups, and peasant organizations were linked together by the Catholic station, Radio Soleil. In December 1983, the Haitian bishops outlined their social plan in the Charte de l'Eglise d'Haiti pour la promotion humaine. The document, a commitment to solidarity with the poor, announced plans for a massive literacy campaign, Misyon Alfa. Another important result of the pope's visit was that the concordat of 1860 was changed, giving Rome full authority to appoint bishops.

Jean-Bertrand Aristide and Democracy. As Church involvement in social change increased, so did the arrest, torture, and exile of Church workers. Although on February 7, 1986, the Duvalier dictatorship fell, and Baby Doc was ushered into exile, "Duvalierism without Duvalier" ruled. An overwhelming positive vote on a new constitution on March 29, 1987, was followed by a bloody summer and fall of strikes and killings. In August 1987 a group of priests was brutally attacked after celebrating mass for the victims of the earlier Jean Rebel massacre. The first attempt at democratic elections in Haiti's history on November 29, 1987, ended in a blood bath. The country was then ruled by a series of generals or puppet politicians. It was during these events that a young Salesian priest, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, left his work among urban homeless children to emerge as a major voice for change. On September 11, 1988, forces attacked the church of St. Jean Bosco where Aristide was celebrating mass. Uniformed police and army stood by and watched as at least 12 people were killed and numerous others wounded. Aristide's strong rhetoric was the cause of conflict not only with the dictatorial government but also with the hierarchy. Less than one month after the attack he was expelled from the Salesian order. In an earlier episcopal letter the Haitian bishops, in an obvious reference to Aristide's popularity, had decried a "people's church" opposed to the hierarchical church and accused him of inciting the poor to violence.

The events at St. Jean Bosco inspired a curious turn of events. Out of the ashes of the church arose Haiti's first democratically elected president. On December 15, 1990, Aristide was elected with over 67 percent of the vote. A coup attempt in January 1991 by Duvalierist forces almost prevented his inauguration. Moreover, the events increased tension with the hierarchy and the Vatican. During protests in Port-au-Prince in favor of the president-elect, the papal nuncio's residence was attacked. Nonetheless, Aristide was inaugurated and presided over the government for eight months, initiating efforts to re-establish peace, protect rights, and aid the poor. On September 30, 1991, a military coup overthrew the government and President Aristide was forced into exile.

Catholic cathedral, Port-au-Prince, Republic of Haiti, Hispaniola Island. (©Tony Arruza/CORBIS)

Haitians again suffered severe oppression, including an international trade embargo of the country. Military and paramilitary violence claimed over 4,000 lives. During this period community groups, especially the Ti Legliz, were severely repressed. Government infrastructure was totally demolished. Priests, nuns, and lay activists were harassed and arrested. Montfort Father Jean-Marie Vincent was murdered, and Bishop Rornélus of Jérémie was attacked. Despite attacks against the Church by the government, the internal controversy between the hierarchy and Aristide supporters continued.

On October 15, 1994, U.S. government troops landed in Haiti to return President Aristide to power and restore the democratic initiative. The president began the process of rebuilding a government and attempting to build a Haitian economy. U.S. forces remained in control until April 1995 when U.N. troops assumed a peacekeeping role. Aristide's restoration to power reminded Haitians of Bishop Laroche's remarks at the Te Deum of the mass at the president's inauguration. The then-president of the Bishops' Conference likened "cher Père Aristide" to Moses leading his people out of a desert of suffering. Laicized by the Vatican, Aristide was married in January 1996; by the end of the year he had handed over the reins of government to political colleague and former activist Rene Preval, who was elected by a wide margin with Aristide's support.

The Continuing Catholic Presence. For the most part secular clergy took charge of the Church in Haiti during the 20th century. Among the religious orders working there were Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Holy Cross Fathers, Brothers of the Sacred Heart, Montfort Fathers, and Salesians. By 2000 there were 336 secular clergy, a small portion of them Haitians; 257 religious clergy, 323 teaching brothers, and 1,034 sisters.

In 2000 approximately 65,000 pupils were taught in schools conducted under the auspices of the Catholic Church. Following the example of the state-supported lycées, religious establishments provided for the secondary education of young men in two schools in Port-au-Prince, and one each in Cap-Haïtien, Jérémie, and Port-de-Paix. Sisters of St. Joseph and the Filles de la Sagesse each conducted schools for girls in Port-au-Prince; Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi, in Les Cayes; and Sisters of the Holy Cross, in Cap-Haïtien. Normal schools and primary schools, with support from the state, were also conducted by religious congregations. In addition, Salesians directed schools of arts and crafts, financed by the state, in Port-au-Prince and in Cap-Haïtien.

Improving the Quality of Life. In addition to dealing with language differences, Catholic clergy made several attempts to establish social cooperatives, such as credit unions, which numbered ten by 1970. After the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1964, a Jesuit-owned radio station was operated by the episcopacy as Radio Soleil. In 1939 Joseph Le Gouaze, Archbishop of Port-au-Prince, founded the daily La Phalange, which operated until it was closed by the government in January 1961. More influential was L'Action Social, published by a group of lay Catholics; it stopped publication because of lack of funds. Its place was taken by Rond-Point, which was closed down by the government in January 1964.

Religious congregations of women served in nine state hospitals and several private hospitals and clinics. Nursing schools were established in connection with the hospital of Father Riou on Tortuga, with the government hospital in Les Cayes, and with several state-supported homes for the elderly. Despite the efforts of the medical profession, the Church, and the government, the fact that many in Haiti continue to subsist in impoverished conditions resulted in an infant mortality rate of 10.2 percent and an average life expectancy of 48.5 years due to the AIDS epidemic by 2000.

Challenges of the Missionary Church. Even apart from the political vicissitudes that began with the Duvalier takeover in 1957, the Church had obstacles to overcome in developing an active Catholic life throughout Haiti. Inroads were made by fostering native vocations and by using Créole for religious instruction. During the second half of the 20th century concubinage still persisted among the peasant class, partly because of the social situation, partly because of economics, and partly because of the shortage of clergy. To remove the social stigma involved in getting these unions regularized, Bishop Collignon organized "campagnes de mariages," which proved quite successful.

Even in the modern world, Haitian freethinkers accepted the practice of voodoo as a "religion of the race" and often incorporated a sophisticated version of it into their practice of Catholicism. Missiology demanded that such practices be treated from an ethnological point of view, then combated with both patient catechetical work adapted to the level of the people and a living liturgy that takes into account the misery and illness that fosters voodoo.

Although Haiti is officially considered a Roman Catholic nation, the Episcopal, Methodist, and Baptist churches operate long-standing missions. More recently U.S.-based Evangelical and Pentecostal groups have grown significantly. Certain Protestant sects recognized from the beginning of their penetration of Haiti the importance of native recruitment and medical dispensaries as well as an evangelical appeal. Their success is a result of that knowledge: in 1915 there were only 12,000 Protestants, but in 1949 there were 127,000 and by the mid-1960s approximately 400,000.

Beginning the Next Millennium. Entering the 21st century Haiti's future remained uncertain: poverty, illiteracy, unemployment, an unstable government, the flight of boat people, political obstructions to receipt of much-needed economic aid, and devastation of the environment all loomed as major obstacles. At the local level the Haitian Church continued to be a vital force for positive change.

Bibliography: J. M. SALGADO, Le Culte africain du Vodou et les baptisés en Haïti (Rome 1963). J. M. JAN, Collecta: Pour l'histoire du diocèse du Cap-Haïtien, v.3 (Port-au-Prince 1958). J. B. ARISTIDE, In the Parish of the Poor (Maryknoll NY 1990). CONFÉRENCE EPISCOPALE D'HAÏTI, Réponse à quelques questions d'actualité dans l'Eglise d'Haïti (Port-au-Prince 1987); Charte fondamentale de l'Eglise catholique sur la promotion humaine (Port-au-Prince 1983). A. GREENE, The Catholic Church in Haiti: Political and Social Change (East Lansing 1993). "Haiti: Security Compromised," Human Rights Watch/America and National Coalition for Haitian Refugees publication (New York and Washington DC 1995). C. POPPEN, ed., Beyond the Mountains, More Mountains: Haiti Faces the Future, EPICA Report (Washington DC 1994). J. RIDGEWAY, ed., The Haiti File: Decoding the Crisis (Washington DC 1994). A. SYLVESTRE, Ti Kominote Legliz Yo, LIV-1, 2, 3, 4, (Port-au-Prince n.d.).

Thousands of Muslims gather in the courtyard of the Great Mosque in Mecca for the ḥajj. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

[J. P. HOGAN/J. M. SALGADO/EDS.]

ḤAJJ

The ritual pilgrimage to the holy city of MECCA (Makka), called in Arabic ḥajj [cf. Hebrew ḥāg, a feast of the Lord, from the verbal root ḥ-gg (also ḥ-w-g), to circle around]. One of the Five Pillars of Islam, and commanded by the Qur'ān: "Pilgrimage to the House of Allah is a duty owed to Allah for those who find a way thereto" (3.91, 97). According to Islamic law every adult Muslim, who is free and of sound mind, and who is able to afford it, is obliged to make the ḥajj at least once in the lifetime. A man who has made the ḥajj is known as a hajji, and a woman, a hajjah. The present Islamic ḥajj generally combines two ancient Arabian rites, viz, the 'umra and the ḥajj proper, following a precedent set by the Prophet MUḤAMMAD on his "farewell pilgrimage" in the year A.H. 10 (see HJRA), though it is probable that the two had been previously associated in pagan practice.

The ritual begins with the entrance of the pilgrims into the sacral state of ritual purity ('iḥrām), either as they first set out for Mecca or as they enter the sacred area (al-ḥaram) and pronounces the talbiya, i.e., the formula labbayka ["we stand here before You (O Lord)"]. Upon their arrival at the sacred mosque they perform seven times the ritual circumambulation (ṭawāf) of the Ka'ba; then, going to Ṣafâ, some 50 yards away they make the sa'y, which consists in running seven times from Ṣafâ to Marwa, a small hill not far away, praying at each. This much of the ritual belongs properly to the 'umra.

Thereafter the ḥajj proper begins. On the eighth day of dhu l-Ḥijja (the yawm al-tarwiya) the pilgrims leave the city for the plain of 'Arafât where, on the ninth day the rites officially begin with the ritual halt (wuqūf) or standing before the Lord, from noon till sunset, while the pilgrims listen to homilies and shout out the talbiya. After this they make the 'ifāda, a run to Muzdalifa, which is accomplished with much tumult of shouting, shooting, and music, and is followed by the two evening prayers. On the tenth day (yawm al-naḥr) another wuqūf is made at the mosque before sunrise. After this the pilgrims depart for Minâ, where each throws seven stones at the jam-rat al-'aqaba, one of three heaps of stones found there.

This symbolic stoning of Satan, with the shouting of the talbiya, officially ends the ḥajj. There follows the Great Feast (al-ʿīd al-kabīr) or the Feast of the Morning Sacrifice (ʿīd al-ʿadhā), which is celebrated as an obligation throughout Islam with the sacrifice of goats and sheep and perhaps a few camels by the wealthy. The pilgrim may then shave his head and put off the ʾihrām. During the ensuing three days (ʿayyām al-tašrīq) the pilgrims stay at Minā where they throw seven stones each afternoon at each gamra of the three.

Originally, it would seem, the ʿumra and the ḥajj were quite distinct, the former a spring festival in the month of Rajab (the seventh month of the Islamic calendar), the latter a feast involving a great common fair at the autumnal equinox. However, because of inadequacies in intercalation, the ḥajj fell during the spring in the time of Muḥammad, the original significance having been lost altogether. Since the rise of Islam, because of the use of a strict lunar calendar, the ḥajj may fall at any season of the year.

Bibliography: D. E. LONG, The Hajj Today: A Survey of the Contemporary Makkah Pilgrimage (Albany, NY 1979). M. WOLFE, The Ḥadj: A Pilgrimage to Mecca (London 1994). F. E. PETERS, The Hajj: The Muslim Pilgrimage to Mecca and the Holy Places (Princeton, N.J. 1994). M. WOLFE, One Thousand Roads to Mecca: Ten Centuries of Travelers Writing about the Muslim Pilgrimage (New York 1997). M. W. HOFMANN, Journey to Makkah (Beltsville, Md. 1998).

[R. M. FRANK/EDS.]

HALAKAH

Halakah is the legalistic content of Jewish tradition as distinguished from HAGGADAH, the nonlegal portion that comprises largely homiletical, ethical, and folkloristic material. The term Halakah, from the Hebrew verb hālak (to walk), means the way to walk, conduct. In the singular it denotes either an individual law or law in the abstract all-inclusive sense; in the plural (Halakot) it refers to collections of laws.

Jewish law begins with the Torah (Pentateuch), upon which the rabbis of Palestine and Babylonia erected a legal superstructure whose main formulation is the TALMUD. The traditional view is that the Sinaitic revelation of the Written Law was accompanied by an equally authoritative Oral Law, which expanded and clarified its often general statements, and that the rabbis, through interpretation, validated for later generations the sources in the former that authenticated the latter. The modern critical opinion, however, is that, as the Torah became firmly established as the constitution of the Jewish people after the institution of the Second Commonwealth in postexilic times, the rabbis, through interpretation and reinterpretation, fulfilled a need to develop its provisions for a different time and other conditions into specific legislative enactments that would comport with new thinking and new problems, though they generally believed that their understanding of the Biblical text conformed with its original intention.

The efforts of the early rabbinical authorities, the Tannaim, were, after sifting and analysis, compiled (c. A.D. 200) by Rabbi JUDAH HA-NASI into a code, the MISHNAH. For the next 300 years it became the vehicle of discussion and instruction in the academies of Palestine and Babylonia, where the later sages, the Amoraim, sought to clarify ambiguities and to harmonize Mishnaic statements with other equally authoritative but seemingly contradictory external traditions contained in the Baraitot. The record of these deliberations is the GEMARAH, which together with the Mishnah forms the Talmud. The Babylonian version of the Talmud is considered more authoritative than the Palestinian one.

Subsequent scholars elucidated the Talmudic tradition through juridical replies to specific questions of law arising from practical cases, and the conclusions form a vast Jewish RESPONSA literature, which continues to the present. But the major achievement was in the area of codification of the Talmud's contents, whose rambling discussions and unindexed material made it as unwieldy for the scholar as it certainly was for the layman. Of the various attempts, the codes of Moses MAIMONIDES (the Mishneh Torah of the 12th century) and Joseph CARO (the Shulḥan Aruk of the 16th century) were among the most successful, with Caro's work becoming for most traditionalists the authoritative statement of the Halakah.

Bibliography: J. Z. LAUTERBACH, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER, 13 v. (New York 1901–06) 8:569–572. H. FUCHS, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 10 v. (New York 1939–44) 5:172–175. S. BIALBOCKI, Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 10 v. (Berlin 1928–34) 7:836–848. H. L. STRACK, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, tr. 5th Ger. ed. (Philadelphia 1931). A. COHEN, Everyman's Talmud (New York 1949). S. B. FREEHOF, The Responsa Literature (Philadelphia 1955). L. GINZBERG, On Jewish Law and Lore (Philadelphia 1955) 77–124, 153–184.

[R. KRINSKY]

HALF-WAY COVENANT

An important doctrinal development in New England Congregationalism in the 17th and 18th centuries. According to the first New England Congregationalists, a true church was composed of those who, having an experience of salvation, were bound together by a covenant.

To enter church membership the applicant related publicly the story and nature of his experience. All such members were entitled to present their sons and daughters for baptism as children of the covenant. The question arose (c. 1650) as to whether these children of the covenant, even though they could not relate a personal experience of conversion, could also present their children for baptism. Many churches permitted them to do so if they were of upright character, gave their intellectual assent to the principles of the Gospel, expressed their willingness to submit to the discipline, and promised to promote the welfare of the church; but they were not admitted to the communion and could neither hold office nor vote for church officers. This practice, usually called the half-way covenant, became a warmly debated issue. A majority representing the churches in the conventions of 1657 and 1662 approved the practice, but a minority dissented and held to the original requirements. Eventually many churches administered baptism to children of parents of worthy life. Early in the 18th century the practice spread of admitting to the Lord's Supper all baptized adults who were not leading scandalous lives in the hope that by coming to the communion they might experience conversion. Solomon Stoddard, long the pastor of the church in Northampton, Mass., and the father-in-law of Jonathan EDWARDS, followed this procedure, and from him the custom spread widely in western Massachusetts and the Connecticut Valley. The GREAT AWAKENING in New England, of which Jonathan Edwards was the outstanding figure, led in many churches to the rejection of the half-way covenant and the renewal of an experience of conversion as a prerequisite to church membership. Here, again, divisions occurred between those who held to the new theology, as that which stemmed from Edwards was called, and the practices that were associated with the half-way covenant.

Bibliography: W. WALKER, History of the Congregational Churches in the United States of America (New York 1894) 170–182.

[K. S. LATOURETTE]

HALIFAX, CHARLES LINDLEY WOOD

Second Viscount Halifax, Anglo-Catholic leader who worked for reunion of Catholics and Anglicans; b. London, June 7, 1839; d. Hickleton, England, Jan. 19, 1934. His mother was the daughter of Charles Grey, British prime minister. As a student at Christ Church, Oxford, he developed a great interest in the OXFORD MOVEMENT that remained the chief enthusiasm of his long life. For-saking a promising political career, he accepted in 1868

the presidency of the English Church Union, a society organized to promote Tractarian principles. Retaining the presidency until his death, except for an 8-year interval, he made the Union a powerful force. Under his talented and courageous leadership, it frustrated the attempts of enemies to defeat TRACTARIANISM in the courts. As a Tractarian he was convinced that ANGLICANISM was, despite aberrations, a part of the historically continuous Catholic Church and, as such, the possessor of valid orders. He believed it only a matter of time before the entire Church of England would return to the ANGLO-CATHOLIC tradition. In this sanguine frame of mind and with the encouragement of his friend, the French priest E. F. Portal, he submitted the question of the validity of ANGLICAN ORDERS to Pope Leo XIII. A papal commission, after minute investigation, concluded that the continuity of Anglican orders had been broken at the Reformation. This conclusion, officially embodied in the apostolic letter APOSTOLICAE CURAE (1896), was a profound disappointment for Halifax.

Several developments induced Halifax and Portal to renew their efforts for reunion after 1920: the progress made by the Anglo-Catholic party in the Church of England, the great appeal for reunion of all the churches made by the Anglican bishops at the Lambeth Conference in 1920, and finally the warm reception given to their ideas by Cardinal MERCIER at a meeting in 1920. Under Mercier's chairmanship representatives of both communions engaged in the MALINES CONVERSATIONS between 1921 and 1925. These terminated with the deaths of Mercier and Portal in 1926 without producing any definite results.

Bibliography: J. G. LOCKHART, Charles Lindley, Viscount Halifax, 2 v. (London 1935–36); The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 919–921.

[T. S. BOKENKOTTER]

HALLAHAN, MARGARET MARY

Foundress of the English Congregation of St. Catherine of Siena of the Third Order of St. Dominic; b. London, Jan. 23, 1803; d. Stone, Staffordshire, England, May 11, 1868. She was the only child of poor Irish parents who died when she was nine. She received a rudimentary education during the next two years at an orphanage at Somers Town before entering nearly 30 years of service as a maid and nurse. In the employ of a Catholic family, she went to live in Bruges, Belgium (1827), and there became a Dominican tertiary (1837). After failing in her effort, about 1840, to establish a community of tertiaries at Bruges, she was sent in 1842 to work as a schoolmistress under William ULLATHORNE, who was then in charge of the Benedictine mission at Coventry, England. In 1844 she began there a new community of tertiaries. Moving to Clifton (1846), she made another foundation in the Potteries (1851). This was transferred to Stone as the novitiate and motherhouse (1853). John Henry NEWMAN, a close friend, preached at the opening of the church (1854). Mother Hallahan's devotion, energy, and administrative ability led her subsequently to found five convents, several schools and orphanages, four churches, and a hospital for incurables. Her motto was "God alone." Her cause for beatification was introduced in 1936, and the diocesan stage was completed in 1957. Her writings were approved in 1963.

Bibliography: T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 8:980. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 3:96–102. A. T. DRANE, Life of Mother Margaret Mary Hallahan (new ed. London 1929). F. W. GUMBLEY, Mother Margaret Hallahan (London 1938). SR. MARY CATHERINE, Steward of Souls (London 1952).

[D. MILBURN]

HALLER, JOHANNES

Historian; b. Keinis (Estonia), Oct. 16, 1865; d. Tübingen, Dec. 24, 1947. He studied at Dorpat, Berlin, and Heidelberg. From 1892 to 1897 Haller worked in Rome at the Institute for Prussian History. Having been professor at Marburg (1902), he went to Giessen in 1904 and in 1913 to Tübingen, where he taught until his death. Early in his career Haller demonstrated a profound knowledge of both medieval and modern European history. He acquired fame with the publication of his Concilium basiliense (5 v. Basel 1896–1904). However, his reputation rests on his extraordinary history of the papacy, Das Papsttum, Idee und Wirklichkeit (3 v. Stuttgart 1934–45; 2d ed. 5 v. 1950–53). Das Papsttum is not so much a history as it is a thorough and nearly exhaustive discussion of the papacy as an institution based upon tradition, theology, and law, strongly polemic, often basing its conclusions on challenging hypotheses. In addition Haller wrote Die Epochen der deutschen Geschichte (Stuttgart 1923), a provocative work in which he discussed the major epochs of German history. In the later years of his career he turned his attention toward papal officials and decretals, showing their influence upon the history of medieval Germany.

Bibliography: BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65)

4:1334–35. H. DANNENBAUER and J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 5:409–417.

[B. F. SCHERER]

HALLER, LEONHARD

Theologian; b. Denkendorf, Germany, early 16th century; d. Eichstätt, March 23, 1570. He was engaged in the pastoral ministry at Munich in 1533. Shortly afterward he went to Eichstätt, where he distinguished himself as a preacher and served in several posts. In 1540 he was named auxiliary to Moritz von Hutten, Bishop of Eichstätt. Later he served as vicar-general of the diocese under Bp. Martin von Schaumberg. From July 16, 1562, until July 15, 1563, he represented Bishop von Schaumberg at the Council of Trent. At this time the council was considering the possibility of acceding to the demands of Luther to the extent of allowing reception of COMMUNION under both species. Haller strongly opposed any such concession in Germany, although he confessed that he did this on his own authority, and not as the spokesman of the bishop of Eichstätt. Haller was author of Grund und Kundschaft aus göttlicher Geschrift und den hl. Vätern dass Fleisch und Blut Christi in der hl. Mess wahrhaftiglich geopfert wird (Eichstätt 1553).

Bibliography: A. FRANZEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1335.

[C. R. MEYER]

HALLERSTEIN, AUGUSTIN VON

Jesuit missionary in China and scientist; b. Ljubljana, Yugoslavia, Aug. 27 (or 2, or 18), 1703; d. Beijing, Oct. 29, 1774. After finishing his theological studies in Austria, he embarked for China from Lisbon in 1736. He was sent immediately to the court at Beijing, where his reputation as a mathematician had preceded him. The young Emperor Quianlong quickly became fond of him, appointing him to the Bureau of Astronomy and Mathematics in 1739. He succeeded to the presidency in 1746, the last Jesuit to hold this post made famous by Johann Adam SCHALL and Ferdinand Verbiest. For more than 30 years Hallerstein was continually busy with the astronomical observations and computations so esteemed by the Chinese and so necessary to draw up their yearly cycle of holidays and feasts. Although he especially, even more than other Jesuit scientists at the court, had to endure the frequent interference and intrigues of jealous court mandarins as well as the indifference and vagaries of the fickle Quianlong, his scientific work was so highly valued that it gained tolerance for the preaching of Christianity by his fellow missionaries throughout the provinces of the empire. Hallerstein engaged in correspondence with the leading scientists of Europe, and was elected to the Royal Society of London as a foreign associate.

Bibliography: L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques sur les Jésuites de l'ancienne mission de Chine 1552–1773, 2 v. (Shanghai 1932–34) 2: 753–761. C. TESTORE, C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:49–52.

[J. H. CAMPANA]

HALLINAN, PAUL

First archbishop of Atlanta; b. Painesville, Ohio, April 8, 1911; d. Atlanta, Georgia, March 27, 1968. After elementary and secondary schooling in his native diocese of Cleveland, he graduated from the University of Notre Dame in 1932 and completed theological studies at St. Mary's Seminary, Cleveland. He was ordained to the priesthood on Feb. 20, 1937. Hallinan's ministry as a priest had a threefold aspect: parochial; military chaplain in World War II with the Army Corps of Engineers (winning at New Guinea the Purple Heart); and 11 years as chaplain to the Catholic students at Western Reserve University, Cleveland. On Oct. 28, 1958, the day of Cardinal Roncalli's election to the papacy, Monsignor Hallinan was ordained bishop of Charleston. Twelve years later he was appointed first archbishop of Atlanta. He was installed on March 29, 1962.

As parish priest, military and student chaplain, bishop and archbishop, and even in the singular status of a bishop-graduate student determined to gain an earned doctorate in spite of multiple distracting duties in his episcopal office (Ph. D. from Western Reserve University, 1963), Hallinan instinctively drew others to him by his kindly and considerate manner, his optimistic outlook, and his smile. This combination of talents and traits, plus a discerning and perceptive mind, enabled him to advance the cause of better race relations in Charleston and Atlanta, promote liturgical renewal following the Second Vatican Council, and foster the ecumenical movement. Less than three weeks after the council's opening, Archbishop Hallinan issued a plea for liturgical renewal, declaring, "The more we can do to render the Mass understandable to all, not just to those equipped by learning or formed by habit, the more we open new avenues to the minds and hearts of Christians who are not Catholic."

Bibliography: V. A. YZERMANS, ed., Days of Hope and Promise: The Writings and Speeches of Paul J. Hallinan, Archbishop of

Atlanta (Collegeville 1973). J. T. ELLIS, "Archbishop Hallinan: In Memoriam," Thought 43 (1968) 539–572; Catholic Historical Review 54 (1968) 407–409. T. J. SHELLEY, Paul J. Hallinan: First Archbishop of Atlanta (Wilmington, Del., 1989).

[J. T. ELLIS]

HALLUM, ROBERT

Bishop; b. Warrington, Lancashire, 1362–70; d. Gottlieben Castle (near Constance), Sept. 4, 1417. Educated at Oxford, he had received his doctorate in Canon Law by 1403, when he became chancellor of the university. In 1407, he was consecrated bishop of Salisbury by Gregory XII in Rome. He attended the Council of PISA (1409). Antipope JOHN XXIII created him cardinal, but Hallum declined when Henry IV objected. Hallum served as president of the English nation at the Council of CONSTANCE where he worked closely with the Emperor SIGISMUND to effect Church unity and reform. He was influential in obtaining John XXIII's suspension and served on a committee investigating charges brought against the deposed antipope BENEDICT XIII. He was buried in the cathedral at Constance.

Bibliography: J. LE NEVE, Fasti ecclesiae Anglicanae, ed. T. D. HARDY, 3 v. (Oxford 1854) 2:601. R. L. POOLE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1908) 8:983–985. H. VON DER HARDT, Magnum oecumenicum Constantiense concilium, 7 v. (Frankfurt-Leipzig 1697–1742). J. H. WYLIE, History of England under Henry the Fourth, 4 v. (London 1884–98). E. F. JACOB, Essays in the Councilar Epoch (rev. ed. Notre Dame, Ind. 1963). A.B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the Scholars of the University of Cambridge before 1500 (Cambridge, Eng. 1963) 2:854–855.

[J. F. JOLLEY]

HALLVARD VEBJÖRNSSON, ST.

Patron of Oslo; d. near Drammen, Norway, 1043. According to legend, a relative of King OLAF II, he was murdered while trying to defend a woman falsely accused of theft. Soon after his death, his relics were enshrined in Oslo. Besides the Latin legend and fragments of an Old Norse life, a Hallvard sequence also is extant. His cult was not widespread outside Norway, except in Iceland and in the Swedish Diocese of Skara. He appears in medieval Norwegian and Swedish iconography, usually bearing a millstone.

Feast: May 15.

Bibliography: Monumenta historica Norvegiae, ed. G. STORM (Oslo 1880). Heilagra manna sögur, ed. C. R. UNGER, 2 v. (Oslo 1877) v.1. S. UNDSSET, Saga of Saints, tr. E. C. RAMSDEN (New York 1934). F. PAASCHE, Norsk biografisk leksikon (Oslo 1923–)

“Christ Pantocrator,” detail of the apse mosaic in the royal church of Monreale, Sicily. Christ’s halo with cross superimposed denotes divinity, late 12th century.

5:275–276. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:322.

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

HALO

Greek ἅλως, in Christian art a symbol of the moral excellence of the person whom it adorns. It is usually a circle of gold surrounding the head, though at times it is shaped as a triangle or square. Gold is ordinarily employed as most expressive of effulgence. When triangular, the halo designates the Holy Trinity or God the Father; when circular, a saint or (with cross superimposed) Our Lord; when square, a living person. This latter form is not now in common usage, though in ancient iconography it frequently was placed behind the head of the donor portrayed in a fresco or painting. The square was used because in symbolism it represents the earth and temporal things and is inferior to the circle, which expresses eternity and heaven. The triangular, or Trinitarian, halo is often composed of three broad rays of light issuing from the head. The halos of the Blessed Virgin are often elaborately decorated, whereas those of the saints are usually simple gold bands. The blessed, those beatified but not yet canonized, are depicted with a halo less explicit, formed by shafts of light radiating from behind the head.

See Also: AUREOLE (NIMBUS).

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 12.1:1272–1312. G. FERGUSON, Signs and Symbols in Christian Art (New York 1959). W. LOWRIE, Arts in the Early Church (New York 1947), profusely illustrated.

[C. J. CORCORAN]

HAMANN, JOHANN GEORG

German philosopher of faith and of feeling; b. Königsberg, Aug. 27, 1730; d. Münster in Westphalia, June 21, 1788. Known as the “wise man (Magus) of the North,” he was associated with J. G. HERDER and F. H. JACOBI and was a precursor of S. A. KIERKEGAARD. Though a friend of I. KANT, Hamann was opposed to the cult of reason of the Aufklärung (see ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF). To him it seemed that the intellect merely succeeds in dissecting the universe into many unities, whereas in reality all is held together in a vital unity and even opposites are brought together in a coincidence of opposition. Hamann adopted this idea from G. BRUNO. It can be traced back from Bruno to NICHOLAS OF CUSA, but Hamann was no more aware of Cusa than were other philosophers who profited from Cusa’s thought. To arrive at this unity, Hamann used a concept of experience different from that of Kant, viz, an experience not based on perception and conceptualization but rather on lived experience and intuition, on faith and devotion. The ABSOLUTE, in particular, is accessible only to faith. Man must live in God if he would find Him and the truth. Philosophy must not be directed to intellectual knowledge; rather, wisdom must lead one to see what the wise men from the East saw in the star; hence the title “Magus of the North.” Hamann’s philosophy can be regarded as a reaction against the rationalism of the Enlightenment, his theology as the foundation of the theology of the irrational (F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER, A. RITSCHL), and his literary efforts as a manifestation of the Sturm und Drang period. Finally, Hamann’s thought was rooted in Lutheran religious sentiment, for which reason G. W. F. HEGEL regarded him as a true Christian philosopher. He was, however, also influenced by D. HUME and Lord Shaftesbury. Whether one sees in Hamann a mystic or a pietist depends on one’s definitions; he certainly was not a mystic in the sense of Meister ECKHART and J. TAULER. Perhaps he can be regarded as a proponent of sin mysticism, for he was basically conscious of the “unclean spirit” of man in the sense of the Lutheran doctrine of original sin. While he was aware that man is affected in matters of sex, his teaching does not entail a “philosophy of the Mystical Body of Christ with sex at its center” (J. Nadler). There is merit in his philosophy of language: reason is language; sense and spirit come together in the word; philosophy is the grammar of the meaning-filled word. To understand Hamann one must read his correspondence, as well as his works; studies of his thought are sometimes colored by the enthusiasm of his followers.

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke: Historisch-kritische Ausgabe, ed. J. NADLER, 6 v. (Vienna 1949–57); Briefwechsel, ed. W. ZIESEMER and A. HENKEL, 7 v. (Wiesbaden 1955–), 4 v. to date. Literature. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster MD 1946–63) v.6. F. BLANKE and L. SCHREINER, J. G. Hamanns Hauptschriften erklärt (Gütersloh 1956–). J. NADLER, J. G. Hamann: Der Zeuge des Corpus mysticum (Salzburg 1949). J. C. O'FLAHERTY, Unity and Language: A Study in the Philosophy of J. G. Hamann (Chapel Hill, N.C. 1952). "Hamann in America," Hamann News-Letter (Winston-Salem, N.C. 1962). H. A. SALMONY, J. G. Hamanns metakritische Philosophie, v.1, Einführung in de metakritische Philosophie (Zollikon 1958). R. G. SMITH, J. G. Hamann: A Study in Christian Existence, with Selections from His Writings (New York 1960). M. SEILS, Wirklichkeit und Wort bei J. G. Hamann (Stuttgart 1961). R. KNOLL, J. G. Hamann und F. H. Jacobi (Heidelberg 1963).

[J. HIRSCHBERGER]

HAMBLEY, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. c. 1560 at St. Mabyn, Bodmin, Cornwall, England; d. July 20 (?), 1587, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Salisbury. He was a Protestant who was converted by reading one of Fr. Persons' books in 1582. He took up seminary studies at Rheims, and was ordained at Laon (Sept. 22, 1584). The following year he returned home and worked in the Western Counties. On his way to witness a wedding, he was betrayed and captured around Easter 1586. He was tried and condemned at Taunton, but saved his life for the moment by denying his faith, then managed to break prison, and fled to Salisbury. The following August, however, Hambley was found during a methodical search of Catholic homes on the eve of the Assumption. Again his resolve wavered; he offered conformity and the names of most of his Catholic friends, and was released. Around Easter 1587 he was apprehended a third time and pledged conformity, but recovered quickly, confessed his faith, and suffered "manfully, and inveighing much against his former fault." In this final test, encouragement came from his fellow inmate, Bl. Thomas Pilchard. Hambley was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

St. John Chrysostom, 12th-century Byzantine mosaic in the Capella Palatina, Palermo, Italy, his halo denoting sainthood.

HAMER, JEAN JÉRÔME

Cardinal, theologian, Dominican friar; b. June 1, 1916, Brussels, Belgium; d. Dec. 2, 1996, Rome. Upon joining the Order of Preachers in 1934, Hamer took the name of Jérôme and began his studies at the Dominican Studium Generale, La Sarte, at Louvain; he received a doctorate in theology from University of Fribourg, Switzerland. At the beginning of the Second World War he entered the military, and in 1940 spent three months in a prisoner-of-war camp. Following his ordination to the priesthood, Aug. 3, 1941, he continued his theological studies. In 1944 he joined the faculty of theology at the University of Fribourg; he taught at the Pontifical Angelicum Athenaeum, in Rome (1952–53), and served as rector of the Studium Generale of Saulchoir, France (1956–62). His most influential works from this period were his books Karl Barth, a major study of BARTH's dogmatic method, and The Church Is a Communion, prompted by Pius XII's encyclical Mystici corporis. In 1962 he was appointed secretary general of studies for his order and general assistant for the French Dominican provinces, a position he held till 1966.

Hamer was an expert at the Second Vatican Council for the Secretariat for Christian Unity; in 1966 he was made secretary adjunct for the secretariat, and in 1969 appointed secretary. Shortly after the council he published a commentary on the declaration Dignitatis humanae in La liberté religieuse (Paris 1967). In 1973 he was named titular archbishop of Lorium and appointed secretary of the Congregation for Doctrine of Faith, receiving his episcopal ordination from Pope Paul VI in Vatican City.

Miniature from a 10th-century manuscript of Egbert, Archbishop of Trier, with square halo, indicating that the subject is a living person, in the Stadtsbibliothek, Trier, Germany.

Hamer was appointed pro-prefect of the Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes in 1984 and was elevated to prefect after being made cardinal deacon, with the deaconry of St. Saba, the following year. He attended several assemblies of the Synod of Bishops, including the first special assembly for Europe (1991), before resigning his prefecture in 1992. He died Dec. 2, 1996, in Rome, and is buried in Rome's Campo Verano Cemetery.

[J. A. DICK]

HAMILTON, PATRICK

Patrick, protomartyr of Scottish Protestantism; b. place unknown, c. 1504; d. St. Andrews, Scotland, Feb. 29, 1528. He was a younger son of Sir Patrick Hamilton of Kincavel, Linlithgow. He was intended for the Church, but it is uncertain whether he was ordained. He studied at the University of Paris and graduated there in 1520. He left Paris in 1523 to study at Louvain. Later that year he returned to Scotland and became a student at St. Andrews University. Hamilton, who was early attracted to Lutheranism, came before Beaton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, because of his heterodox views. Beaton caused him to be formally accused of heresy, and to avoid further trouble, Hamilton fled in the spring of 1527 to Wittenburg, where he met Luther and Melancthon. Later that year he enrolled at the new university of Marburg and became acquainted with Tyndale. In the autumn he returned to St. Andrews, but, because of his unorthodoxy, he again appeared before Beaton, who, however, dealt leniently with him. But Hamilton proved to be recalcitrant, and a further examination by Beaton on articles of faith eventually led to his condemnation and execution by burning.

Bibliography: P. LORIMER, Precursors of Knox: Or, Memoirs of P. Hamilton . . . (Edinburgh 1857), a scholarly life. J. KNOX, The Historie of the Reformation of the Church of Scotland . . . , ed. D. BUCHANAN, 2 pts. (London 1644). J. FOXE, Actes and Monuments . . . (London 1563). J. CUNNINGHAM, The Church History of Scotland . . . , 2 v. (2d ed. Edinburgh 1882), old but important.

[J. E. PAUL]

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, SIR

Scottish philosopher; b. Glasgow, March 8, 1788; d. Edinburgh, May 6, 1856. He was educated at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Oxford, and called to the Scottish bar in 1813. In 1821 he became professor of civil history at Edinburgh and in 1836 was appointed to the chair of logic and metaphysics. In 1844 he suffered a severe stroke that left him partially paralyzed, but his mind was unaffected and he was able to continue his work until he died. Hamilton contributed three important articles on his philosophy to the Edinburgh Review; these he republished in Discussions on Philosophy and Literature, Education and University Reform (London-Edinburgh 1852). About 1836 he began his edition of Thomas Reid's Works, which he published in 1846 without finishing the "dissertations" he planned to include in it. After his death the four volumes of his Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic (Edinburgh-Boston 1859-60) were published by two of his disciples, H. L. Mansel (1820-71) and J. Veitch (1829-94). Hamilton was a man of extensive learning but not an original thinker, being too eclectic to be equal to the task of constructing the synthesis for which he was working. The great influence he had during his lifetime was short-lived. It never survived J. S. Mill's Examination of Sir W. Hamilton's Philosophy (London 1865).

See Also: SCOTTISH SCHOOL OF COMMON SENSE.

Bibliography: V. MATHIEU, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:971-973. S. V. RASMUSSEN, The Philosophy of Sir William Hamilton (Copenhagen 1925). J. VEITCH, Hamilton (Edinburgh 1882). W. H. S. MONCK, Sir William Hamilton (New York 1881).

[E. A. SILLEM]

HAMMURABI (HAMMURAPI), KING OF BABYLON

Sixth king of the first dynasty of Babylon, Hammurabi is famous for having established Babylon as the political center of the Mesopotamia of his time, for his extensive military and building activities, and for the cultural development of his country, typified by his well-known code of laws. His Amorrite name, more exactly Hammurapi (Hammu-rāpi, “the sun-god heals”), was also borne by several lesser known kings.

To establish the precise dates of Hammurabi’s reign, most scholars follow the “low” chronology, advocated by W. F. Albright and F. Cornelius, that places Hammurabi’s reign from 1728 to 1686 B.C. and the first dynasty of Babylon c. 1830 to 1530. Another opinion is that of S. Smith who assigns to Hammurabi the period 1792 to 1750 B.C., but a third opinion, expressed by A. Goetze and B. Landsberger using the “high” chronology, has placed Hammurabi in the 19th century B.C.

On his accession, Hammurabi found his country threatened by invasion from both the north and the south. His military effectiveness minimized the challenge from his neighbors and began the Babylonian empire that eventually controlled most of the river plain between the Zagros Mountains and the desert, south to the Persian Gulf, and parts of Elam. Scholars assign the famous staged temple tower or ziggurat E-temen-an-ki, “The House of the Foundation Platform of Heaven and Earth,” one of the wonders of the world—to Hammurabi’s reign. This giant structure influenced the Biblical author in the narrative of the TOWER OF BABEL (Gn 11.4–9). Hammurabi placed MARDUK, a local deity, at the head of the Babylonian pantheon where he remained throughout subsequent centuries.

Hammurabi is also known for economic policies that stabilized wage scales, fostered trade, and improved the canal systems and river navigation. An important product of his reign was a new burst of cultural activity in science and literature. Progress in algebra was unmatched till the Hellenistic period; astronomical observations resulted in valuable compilations; pseudoscience gave attention to astrology, magic, and similar fields. Concerns about literature raised successful efforts to preserve and standardize the great epics of the past, the GILGAMESH EPIC and the ENUMA ELISH.

One of his greatest accomplishments was the Code of Hammurabi, discovered in 1901 at SUSA and now in the Louvre at Paris. It comprises 51 columns of cuneiform text, incised in black diorite stone, that record almost 300 paragraphs of laws pertaining to business, moral, and social life. This code was a new formulation of legal traditions stretching back to the third millennium B.C. and can be found in the older codes of Ur-nammu, Lipit-Ishtar, and Eshnunna (see LAW, ANCIENT NEAR-EASTERN). The once popular identification of Hammurabi as the Amraphel of Gn 14.1, 9 has gone out of favor with Biblical scholars and linguists. There is no evidence that Hammurabi ever campaigned in the West, nor can the equation of the two names be justified linguistically.

Stele of Hammurabi, ca. 1792–1750 B.C. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

See Also: MESOPOTAMIA, ANCIENT.

Bibliography: C. F. JEAN, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 3:1379–1408. F. M. T. BÖHL, King Hammurabi of Babylon in the Setting of His Time (Amsterdam 1946).

[J. B. HUESMAN]

HANDEL, GEORGE FRIDERIC

Baroque composer noted for his oratorios (German form: Georg Friedrich Händel); b. Halle, Germany, Feb. 23, 1685; d. London, April 14, 1759. He was educated at Halle and originally for the law, but became organist at the Domkirche there (1702–03). After a period in Hamburg, working mostly for the opera (1703–06), and at various towns in Italy (1706–10), he was invited to George Frideric Handel.

London to compose operas (1710–11). In 1712 he returned to England, where he was naturalized in 1727 and remained till his death, apart from a few visits to the Continent. He held appointments at court (having been Kapellmeister to George I when he was still elector of Hanover) and for a time under private patrons, but was chiefly engaged in the production of Italian operas (1712–17, 1720–41) and English oratorios (1732–59) in London. He gave one season (1741–42) in Dublin, where the first performances of Messiah took place. Handel was primarily a dramatic composer, as his 25 oratorios (written for the theater, not the church) and 100 Italian cantatas demonstrate as clearly as his 40 operas. His church music, though marked by spaciousness and a sense of occasion, is relatively unimportant. He was brought up and died a Lutheran, but composed for the rites of each country in which he lived: for Lutheran Germany two settings of the Passion story; for Catholic Italy a group of Latin psalms and motets (it has been suggested by J. S. Hall that they formed a set of Vespers for the Carmelite church of Santa Maria di Monte Santo in Rome); for the Anglican Church 25 anthems with English words. Many of these were for special occasions such as the Treaty of Utrecht (1713) and the coronation of George II (1727). One or more of his four coronation anthems have been sung at every British coronation since.

The operas, long forgotten on account of their obsolete convention, have recently been revived with considerable success. The oratorios won Handel a great but ill-founded reputation as a sacred composer, since his music reflected an unmystical quality. Two, Israel in Egypt and Messiah (the only one given in a sacred building during his life), are settings of Biblical words. The majority, based on Old Testament or Apocryphal stories, scarcely differ in spirit or design from similar works (Semele, Hercules) in the tradition of Greek tragedy. This tradition he inherited through RACINE, whose plays formed the basis of his first English oratorio (Esther) and first masterpiece in the form (Athalia). Handel used the chorus in the Greek manner, particularly to draw out the action's moral; this, together with the splendor and variety of the choral counterpoint, gives the oratorios an extra dimension not possible within current operatic conventions. Nevertheless, Esther was written with stage action in mind and was so performed. Only a ban by the bishop of London (1732) prevented its transference thus to the opera house. This initiated the tradition of performance in the theater without action, eventually confined to Lent. Even Messiah, as the compiler of the text said, was an "entertainment," designed to recall the audience to the limitations and duties of mortality. Handel's spirit speaks clearly through his art; his sympathy embraces the entire human race.

Bibliography: G. F. HANDEL, Hallische Händel-Ausgabe, ed. M. SCHNEIDER and R. STEGLICH (Kassel 1955–), 4 ser. in 12 v. pub. to date; The Sacred Oratorios, 2 v. (London 1799). R. A. STREETFELD, Handel (2d ed. New York 1964). W. DEAN, Handel's Dramatic Oratorios and Masques (New York 1959). G. E. H. ABRAHAM, Handel: A Symposium (New York 1954), broad, inclusive study. F. CHRYSANDER, G. F. Händel, 3 v. (Leipzig 1858–67). O. E. DEUTSCH, Handel: A Documentary Biography (New York 1955). J. MÜLLER-BLATTAU and W. SCHMIEDER, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:1229–86. J. S. HALL, "Handel among the Carmelites," Dublin Review 233 (1959–60) 121–131. S. GODDARD, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 4:37–59. J. M. COOPERSMITH, I. An Investigation of Georg Friedrich Händel's Orchestral Style. II. A Thematic Index of the Complete Works of Georg Friedrich Händel (Doctoral diss. unpub. Harvard 1932). P. M. YOUNG, The Choral Tradition (New York 1962). Georg Friedrich Händels Werke, ed. F. CHRYSANDER, 96 v. (Leipzig 1858–94, 1902). M. CHANNON, "Handel's Early Performances of Judas Maccabaeus: Some New Evidence and Interpretations," Music and Letters 77 (1996) 499–526. G. CUMMINGS, "Handel's Compositional Methods in His London Operas of the 1730s, and the Unusual Case of Porò, Rè dell'Indie (1731)," Music and Letters 79 (1998) 346–367. R. G. KING, "Classical History and Handel's Alessandro," Music and Letters 77 (1996) 34–63. S. C. LARUE, Handel and His Singers: The Creation of the Royal Academy Operas, 1720–1728 (Oxford 1995). H. J. MARX, "Ein Beitrag Händels zur Accademia Ottoboniana in Rom," Hamburger Jahrbuch für Musikwissenschaft 1 (1975) 69–86. K. NOTT, "'Heroick Vertue': Handel and Morell's Jephtha in the Light of Eighteenth-Century Biblical Commentary and Other Sources," Music and Letters 77

(1996) 194–208. J. A. SADIE, “Handel: In Pursuit of the Viol,” Chelys 14 (1985) 3–24. J. E. SAWYER, “Irony and Borrowing in Handel’s Agrippina,” Music and Letters 80 (1999) 531–559. R. SMITH, Handel’s Oratorios and Eighteenth-Century Thought (Cambridge, Eng. 1995).

[W. DEAN]

HANDMAIDS OF CHARITY

A religious congregation (Ancillae a Caritate) founded in 1840 in Brescia, Italy, by St. Maria Crocifissa DI ROSA, with Monsignor Faustino Pinzoni and Gabriella Echenos Bornati as cofounders. Approval by the Holy See came in 1847 and 1921. Members take simple perpetual vows and are active mainly in educational and hospital work. During the first few decades after their foundation the Handmaids worked in hospitals in Brescia, Cremona, Mantua, Udine, Trieste, and elsewhere in that region and ran schools in Ragusa and Spalato (Split) in Dalmatia. In 1848 and 1849 the sisters aided the sick and wounded in hospitals and battlefields in northern Italy. The congregation survived the hostility of the government during the early years of the kingdom of Italy.

Bibliography: L. FOSSATI, Beata Maria Crocifissa di Rosa (Brescia 1940); Storia della Congregazione durante il governo di Madre Teresa Pochetti, v.2 (Brescia 1958) 415–508.

[L. FOSSATI/EDS.]

HANDMAIDS OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT AND OF CHARITY, SISTERS ADORERS

A religious congregation with papal approval (1859, 1866), whose official title is Instituto de Hermanas Adoradoras Esclavas del Santísimo Sacramento y de la Caridad (AESC). The foundress, St. María DESMAISIÈRES, began her work in Madrid c. 1850 by establishing a home for the rehabilitation of the wayward girls with whom she had come into contact through her charitable work in the San Juan de Dios hospital. She founded her congregation to educate and assist them. In the homes established in several Spanish cities her sisters cared for young women between the ages of 14 and 25. As a complement to this work, the sisters established also workshops or trade schools where the girls, after their rehabilitation, might continue to live. Following a period of spiritual formation, they could be admitted to a kind of semireligious life with private vows, and were then called Mínimas de Santa María Miguela del Santísimo Sacramento.

The Handmaids are engaged also in the education of children. In addition to those sisters who devote themselves to the adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and to the works of the congregation, there are coadjutor sisters who do domestic work in the convents. The congregation is active especially in Spain, Portugal, Italy, Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, Venezuela, Colombia, and Japan.

[A. J. ENNIS/EDS.]

HANDMAIDS OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS

A religious congregation, Ancillae Sacri Cordis Jesu (ACJ, Official Catholic Directory #1870), with papal approval (1887, 1894), founded in 1877 in Madrid, Spain, by St. Rafaela PORRAS Y AYLÓN and her sister Dolores. The Handmaids devote themselves to prayer of reparation before the exposed Blessed Sacrament and to various apostolic works. They are also engaged in works relating to education, catechetics, retreats, chaplaincies, and parochial and diocesan ministries. The generalate is in Rome; the United States provincialate is in Haverford, Pennsylvania.

[A. J. ENNIS/EDS.]

HANEBERG, DANIEL BONIFATIUS

Orientalist, Biblical scholar, abbot, and bishop; b. Lenzfried, near Kempten, Bavaria, June 16, 1816; d. Speyer, Rhine Palatinate, May 31, 1876. After his seminary studies at the University of Munich, where he came under the influence of J. J. I. von DÖLLINGER, he was ordained in 1839. During his student years he learned most of the Semitic languages. From 1841 to 1872 he taught OT and Oriental studies at the University of Munich. In 1850 he entered the Benedictine Abbey of St. Boniface in Munich and in 1854 was elected its abbot. Meanwhile he maintained his teaching post and his ties with the German intellectuals, particularly Döllinger, C. M. Brentano, J. J. von GÖRRES’s circle, and the Bavarian royal family. Opposed at first to the definition of papal infallibility, he accepted it after VATICAN COUNCIL I. Although he had refused the bishoprics of Trier (1864), Cologne (1865), and Eichstätt (1866), he consented to be consecrated bishop of Speyer (1872). A deeply religious and zealous man, he hastened his death by overwork in his pastoral duties as bishop.

Haneberg is remembered mostly for his theory that the subsequent approbation of the Church constitutes the inspired nature of the books of the Bible, a doctrine that he repudiated after it was condemned by Vatican Council I. He should be remembered rather for his many scholarly works on Biblical and Oriental subjects, among them Die religiösen Altertümer der Bibel (Munich 1844, 2d ed. 1869), Geschichte der biblischen Offenbarung (Regensburg 1850, 4th ed. 1876), and his edition and Latin translation of the Canones S. Hippolyti arabice (Munich 1870).

Bibliography: J. TRINQUET, Catholicisme 5:506–507. H. LANG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) (1966) 4:1351. P. FUNK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 4:815–816. S. FURLANI and F. E. GIGOT, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 7:127–128.

[M. STRANGE]

HANNA, EDWARD JOSEPH

Archbishop of San Francisco, Calif., scholar, civic leader; b. July 21, 1860, Rochester, New York; d. July 10, 1944, Rome, Italy. He was the first child of Edward Hanna and Anne Clark, both Irish immigrants from Ulster. In 1879 he graduated from the Rochester Free Academy, where he was friends with the future promoter of the “social gospel,” Walter RAUSCHENBUSCH. He entered the Urban College in Rome that same year, was ordained at St. John Lateran in 1885, and was awarded a doctorate in sacred theology in 1886 without the need for examination, so impressed was Pope Leo XIII with his academic brilliance.

Hanna returned to Rochester in 1887 and was assigned to St. Andrew’s Preparatory School. When the diocese’s new seminary, St. Bernard’s, opened in 1893 he took up the position of professor of dogmatics. He was a beloved teacher and became an internationally known scholar through contributions to leading journals. In 1907 he was the primary candidate for coadjutor bishop of SAN FRANCISCO, having received the support of his own ordinary, Bernard MCQUAID, and that of the archbishop of San Francisco, Patrick RIORDAN, but accusations of Modernism in his writings—arising most strongly from a series, “The Human Knowledge of Christ,” in the New York Review; an essay, “Some Recent Books on Catholic Theology,” printed in The American Journal of Theology; and an entry, “Absolution,” in the first edition of the Catholic Encyclopedia—delayed his appointment until Dec. 4, 1912 when he was consecrated as auxiliary to Riordan.

Almost immediately after his arrival in the city, and especially after his appointment as archbishop in July 1915, Hanna became well known in the civic arena on city, state, and national levels. He was one of the founding members of the Commission of Immigration and Housing of California, beginning in 1913, and served as president from 1923 to 1935. Noted in the city for his fairness, he was appointed chairman of the Impartial Wage Arbitration Board, which set pay rates from crafts in San Francisco between 1921 and 1923. Between 1931 and 1932 he served as chairman of the California State Unemployment Commission, which sought to gain people employment during the dark days of the Great Depression. In the spring of 1934, at the request of President Franklin Roosevelt, Hanna led a team that negotiated an end to a dock strike that had paralyzed the west coast. His civic presence was noted through his reception in 1922 of the “Commander of the Crown of Italy” in recognition for his services toward and sympathy for the people of Italy, especially immigrants, and in 1932 the American Hebrew Medal, for his promotion of understanding between Christians and Jews.

Hanna was equally well respected in Church circles. On the national level he was the founding chairman of the Administrative Committee of the National Catholic Welfare Council, serving from 1919 to his retirement in 1935. During this period he was highly influential in assuring that the Church’s view was heard and appreciated in several national issues, including the Oregon School case of 1922, the national immigration acts of 1921 and 1924, the political instability and persecution of the Church in Mexico during the 1920s and 1930s, and the question of American recognition of the Soviet Union in 1933. On March 2, 1935 Hanna resigned as archbishop and retired to a villa outside Rome where he died. His remains were returned to San Francisco in 1947.

Bibliography: R. MCNAMARA, “Archbishop Hanna, Rochesterian,” Rochester History 25, no. 2 (April 1963): 1–23. J. P. GAFFEY, Citizen of No Mean City: Archbishop Patrick Riordan of San Francisco (1841–1914) (Wilmington, N.C. 1976), 275–318. R. GRIBBLE, “Church, State, and the American Immigrant: The Multiple Contributions of Archbishop Edward J. Hanna,” U.S. Catholic Historian 16, no. 4 (Fall 1998): 1–18; Catholicism and the San Francisco Labor Movement, 1896–1921 (Lewiston, N.Y. 1993), 119–49, 163–67.

[R. GRIBBLE]

HANNIBALDUS DE HANNIBALDIS

Dominican theologian and cardinal; b. Rome; d. Orvieto, 1272. He was a nephew of Cardinal Richard (1239–74), and entered the Dominican Order at Santa Sabina, Rome. He later studied theology under St. THOMAS AQUINAS at Saint-Jacques in Paris. There he lectured on the Sentences (1258–60) and succeeded Thomas as master in the chair for foreign Dominicans (1260–62). His commentary on the Sentences, formerly attributed to Aquinas, is one of the earliest expressions of THOMISM, although it includes excerpts from Peter of Tarentaise (Pope INNOCENT V) and St. BONAVENTURE. Returning to Italy, he was created cardinal priest in December 1262 by URBAN IV and given the titular church of the Twelve Apostles. In 1265 he was legate of CLEMENT IV to support the claims of Charles I of Anjou. After the death of Urban IV, Aquinas dedicated the last three books of the Catena aurea (1265–68) to his former disciple, who lived to take part in the election of GREGORY X.

Bibliography: J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 5 v. (Paris 1719–23) 1.1:261–262. P. GLORIEUX, Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIII^e siècle (Paris 1933–34) 1:117. G. GIERATHS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1352. A. DUVAL, Catholicisme 1:597. F. DU CHESNE, Histoire de tous les cardinaux français, 2 v. (Paris 1660) 2:277–278. M. GRABMANN, Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, 3 v. (Munich 1925–56) 3:283, 291, 296–299.

[P. GLORIEUX]

HANSE, EVERARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Northamptonshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), July 31, 1581. The Cambridge-educated Everard Hanse rejected the attempts of his brother William, who had been ordained in 1579, to convert him to Catholicism. Nevertheless, he came to an understanding of the truths of the Faith upon reflection during an illness. Upon his recovery he completed seminary studies at Rheims (1580–81) and was ordained. Shortly after his return to England, he was apprehended while visiting Catholics imprisoned in the Marshalsea because his foreign-made shoes roused the suspicion of the jailer. He was questioned and admitted his priesthood, which was not yet a capital crime. Nevertheless, he was held for closer examination. During his indictment he was tricked into denying the royal supremacy in spiritual matters and admitting that “I would have all to believe the Catholic faith as I do.” He was found guilty of persuasion to popery, which was high treason under Elizabeth, sentenced, and executed. Afterwards the Spanish ambassador wrote, “Two nights after his death, there was not a particle of earth on which his blood had been shed, which had not been carried off as a relic.” He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); July 30 (Diocese of Northampton).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1904–05), II, 249–65. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farn-borough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891); ed., Briefe Historie of the Glorious Martyrdom of Twelve Reverend Priests (1582; London, 1908), 98–106.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HANTHALER, CHRYSOSTOMUS (JOHANNES ADAM)

Cistercian historian; b. Mehrnbach bei Ried, Austria, Jan. 14, 1690; d. Lilienfeld, Sept. 2, 1754. He joined the Cistercian community of Lilienfeld in 1716 and subsequently studied at the University of Vienna. There he developed an interest in medieval history, numismatics, and genealogy. He returned to Lilienfeld, became librarian, and dedicated his life to the collection and publication of historical documents. At his death his works amounted to 24 volumes in folio, although only a fraction of this material was published in his lifetime. In addition to studies in genealogy and numismatics, his chief work was the Fasti Campillenses (3 v., Linz 1747–54), a heavily documented history of Austria from the beginnings to 1500. The continuation of the same history was left in manuscript form until it was edited in Vienna in 1818. His patriotism and professional pride induced him to forge several alleged chronicles of early Austrian history, Notulae anecdotae (Krems 1742), which, although cleverly composed, were soon exposed as fabrications.

Bibliography: KRONES, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 10:547–549. F. LOIDL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:3–4.

[L. J. LEKAI]

HANXLEDEN, JOHAN ERNST

Jesuit missionary in India; b. Osterkappeln, near Osnabrück (Germany) 1681; d. Palur, India, March 21, 1732. He entered the Jesuits in 1699, volunteered for the East India Mission, and went through his novitiate on the journey. He started from Augsburg on December 8, 1699, in the company of Fathers Weber and Mayer, both of whom died on the voyage. He was an eminent linguist, knowing East Syrian, Malayâlam, and Sanskrit. To Hanxleden and his confrères, Roberto De Nobili and Heinrich ROTH, belongs the credit of having been the pioneers among Europeans in the study of Sanskrit. Hanxleden compiled a Sanskrit-Portuguese and a Malayâlam-Portuguese lexicon. He composed numerous religious poems and songs in Malayâlam. The Carmelite Paulinus a S. Bartholomaeo brought back Hanxleden's manuscripts and made use of part of them. Most of the writings of Hanxleden are preserved only in manuscripts; a few are extant in the Vatican Library and the library of the University of Coimbra.

Bibliography: A. M. MUNDADAN, "An 'unknown' Oriental scholar: Ernst Hanxleden," Indian Church History Review 23 (1989) 39-63.

[J. WICKI]

HAOMA

The sacrificial liquor made of the juice of a plant pounded in a mortar in the course of the principal Parsee or Mazdaean ceremony, during which it was offered and consumed. It was also a god. Sacrifices were offered to this god, and certain parts of the victim were reserved for him. Although a god, he was killed as he was crushed. The Brāhmanas in India describe Soma in the same way: "For Soma is a god and they kill him as they press him." The sacrifice of Haoma is, therefore, that of a dying god offered to a god. If one recalls that, after the offering, the priest and the faithful swallow the victim and, thereby, partake of the god's immortality, the sacrifice may seem to resemble Catholic Mass. However, the Mazdaean and the Catholic concepts are essentially different. The sacrifice of the Mass, which is the very center of the Catholic liturgy, is hardly surmised in the Mazdaean ritual, which is not based on an historical fact, such as the Crucifixion of Jesus.

Bibliography: J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN, La Religion de l'Iran ancien (Paris 1962).

[J. DUCHESNE-GUILLEMIN]

HAPPINESS

Happiness, or beatitude, is the personal possession of a desirable GOOD, ultimately the perfect good of an intellectual nature. Accordingly, God, the sovereign uncreated good, is happiness itself. Inasmuch as creatures participate in the perfect good, they possess created happiness under various forms and in different degrees. Happiness may be considered objectively or subjectively. The good that is capable of giving a person his ultimate perfection by fulfilling his every need is called objective happiness; this is God alone, who by His infinite goodness can satisfy creatures (see GOOD, THE SUPREME). The actual perfection experienced by the person through a realization of his potentialities is subjective beatitude; it is the possession of the desirable object. When this actualization is ultimate, the person possesses perfect subjective happiness; until then, it can only be imperfect. Ultimately, man has but one goal: perfect happiness, which is the full realization of his potentialities through intimate, personal union with God in the BEATIFIC VISION (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1000). In this life, however, a limited participation in the perfect good through human activity (physical, spiritual, SUPERNATURAL, both individual and social) produces a form of happiness, natural and/or supernatural, that, although imperfect, is a beginning of perfect happiness.

Each type of happiness can be discussed further within a philosophical-theological framework according to the historical development of the concepts. While philosophy has generally considered what object constitutes man's happiness, theology has always asked how a person through his intellectual and voluntary activity truly possesses the sovereign good in the beatific vision.

Objective Happiness. Philosophers have frequently placed objective happiness in the goods of this life: material goods—refined pleasure (the HEDONISM of Aristippus, Helvétius), social prosperity (L. BENTHAM, L. S. MILL, K. MARX); spiritual goods—virtue (STOICISM), human perfection (C. WOLFF, F. SCHLEIERMACHER, W. Wundt); or PROGRESS—cultural-moral (J. FICHTE, I. KANT), political (G. HEGEL), positivistic (A. COMTE, H. SPENCER). Others see the object of happiness in God, the supreme good transcending experience—PLATO, all scholastics, some moderns (e.g., R. DESCARTES, N. MALEBRANCHE), and Christian existentialists [e.g., S. KIERKEGAARD, G. Marcel (see EXISTENTIALISM)]. For Aristotle, contemplation terminates the successive types of happiness in this life. The systematic Christian approach to objective happiness begins with St. Augustine, who held that God, the true and sovereign good to be loved for Himself alone, and not merely as the object of philosophical contemplation proposed by Plato and PLOTINUS, is the object of happiness. Arguing from imperfect to perfect good in the realm of essences, BOETHIUS further developed the notion of objective happiness by concluding that God is indivisibly one with goodness, whose possession by participation makes man happy. The Platonic and Neoplatonic notion of the transcendent good (especially in PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS) and the Aristotelian concept of happiness as the last end (sovereign good) in the writings of the Fathers prepared the scholastics, notably Thomas Aquinas, for their systematic approach to happiness: only an infinite being can fully satisfy the spiritual faculties whose object is unlimited being and unlimited good; every other finite good, especially temporal goods, is incomplete. Emphasis on Biblical studies has led some contemporary theologians to return to the eschatological aspects of early patristic writings rather than to the philosophical notions of the scholastics in treating man's last end: the victory of Jesus Christ over death (see RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, 2).

Subjective Happiness. The actual possession of God in the beatific vision (perfect subjective happiness of the SUPERNATURAL order) essentially requires acts of both INTELLECT and WILL. Augustine indicates this by considering happiness as a person's perfect knowledge of truth, truly enjoyable (frui) through apprehension by LOVE. Applying Platonic notions of beatitude, Pseudo-Dionysius focused attention on intuitive vision: beatitude conceived as objective divinization of the intellectual nature, although some Greek Fathers (e.g., Theodoret of Cyr) were reluctant to state that happiness is the vision of the divine essence. More precisely, the scholastics of the medieval period attempted to determine the formal constituency of happiness as the possession of the sovereign good: intellectual vision (Thomas Aquinas); voluntarist love (Duns Scotus); vision and love (F. Suárez). The scholastics also attempted to explain how the souls of the elect behold God directly without any created intermediary: God Himself becomes the intelligible form, effecting what is necessary (e.g., the LIGHT OF GLORY) to let reason enter into the possession of its object. Some mid-20th-century theologians (e.g., R. Troisfontaines, SJ) stress a personalistic viewpoint that true happiness consists in perfect dialogue between God and man, in the I-Thou relationship of Sacred Scripture, in which "to see" (vision) means to live in conscious, personal union with divine, angelic, and human persons.

Unending joy, rectitude of will, full appreciation of creatures, expansive FRIENDSHIP and ultimate glorification of the body accompany perfect happiness. While each person possessing God in the beatific vision is completely happy by reason of his full actualization of potentials, the degree of participation in the perfect good differs according to merit.

A purely natural happiness after death consisting in an acquired knowledge of God through created things (i.e., analogously) and a natural love, while speculatively possible, does not in fact exist: it cannot be a true termination of the natural DESIRE TO SEE GOD (the opinion held by many scholastics up to the 17th century). In this life, however, man can possess an imperfect natural felicity through virtuous activity in which temporal and spiritual goods, including friendship, are conditionally necessary. The problem, however, is to explain a purely natural happiness in a supernatural economy of SALVATION. In the supernatural order, the wayfarer actually possesses God, but in a manner proper to his state: operations of the theological VIRTUES, the moral virtues, and the gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT are most perfectly manifested in the BEATITUDES, which produce a happiness that is both terrestrial and a beginning of perfect happiness.

See Also: DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN; HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); MAN, 3; PURE NATURE, STATE OF; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, 2.

Bibliography: A. GARDEIL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 2.1:497–515. R. A. GAUTHIER, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932) 4.2:1660–74. G. SIEWERTH, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl. Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 4:973–976. M. and L. BECQUÉ, Life after Death, tr. P. HEPBURN-SCOTT (New York 1960). J. BUCKLEY, Man's Last End (St. Louis 1949). R. GUINDON, Béatitude et théologie morale chez saint Thomas d'Aquin (Ottawa 1956). S. M. RAMÍREZ, De hominis beatitudine, 3 v. (Madrid 1942–47). Collegium Fratrum Discolceatorum . . . , Salamanca, Cursus theologicus Summam Theologicam angelici doctoris d. Thomae complectens, 20 v. (Paris 1870–83) v. 5. A. G. SERTILLANGES, La Fin dernière ou la béatitude (Paris 1951). R. TROISFONTAINES, "Le Ciel," Nouvelle revue théologique 82 (1960) 225–246.

[T. F. MCMAHON]

HAPSBURG (HABSURG), HOUSE OF

The Hapsburg family (also the House of Hapsburg-Lorraine, the House of Austria) is the most European of the former ruling dynasties of Europe (it played a role in the history of Germany, Switzerland, the Danubian states, the Lowlands, and the Iberian Peninsula) and the one usually associated with Roman Catholicism and the Holy Roman Empire. Its history as a family is the history of the old dynastic Europe in microcosm; it also furnishes an excellent case study of the impact on European affairs of one biological community with its own set of traditions and possessions. A description of that family history will be followed by a brief discussion of Hapsburg relations with the Catholic Church and an assessment of its contributions to European art and culture.

Origins. Though legend would trace its lineage back to the Trojans and the ancient Romans, the actual origins of the family remain obscure. Guntram the Rich (c. 950), who may have been one of the Etichonen of Alsace, a great Carolingian noble clan, is usually regarded as the first historical, rather than legendary, member of the family. His descendants flourished in the southwestern section of Germany, and one of them, Bp. Werner of Strassburg, constructed the Habichtsburg (shortened to Habsburg and meaning the "hawk's castle") from which the family would take its name. Though they were far less powerful and prestigious than the great local families such as the Hohenstaufen, the Kyburger, and the Zähringer, an early display of the Hapsburg talent for intermarriage and for survival enabled them to inherit large amounts of territory when those families became extinct.

Engraving of the Hapsburgs' Schonbrunn Palace, Vienna, by Fischer von Erlach, 1721. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

The resulting concentration of family property was large enough to be partitioned in the years 1232 to 1238; the senior line also recovered the lands of the junior line (Hapsburg-Laufenburg) when it died out in 1408.

The Hapsburgs' first appearance in European politics took place with the election of Count Rudolph IV of Hapsburg as King Rudolph I (1273). This was the beginning of an almost continuous association between the family and the Reich—in the process the Hapsburgs provided the Holy Roman Empire with its rulers from 1273 to 1308 and again from 1438 to its dissolution in 1806 (with the brief interim reign of the Bavarian Wittelsbach, Charles VII, 1742–45). Rudolph hoped to restore the central authority in Germany by establishing his Hausmacht (family holdings) in southeastern Germany, where he managed to acquire the Babenberg inheritance, chiefly the duchies of Austria and Styria, for his sons Albert and Rudolph (1278–82), thus establishing a family interest in the Danubian area that was to endure for more than 600 years.

This sudden accretion of power and property was quickly followed by a less glorious chapter in the family's history; Rudolph's heir Albert I was murdered by his nephew John the Parricide in 1308 and the imperial title passed out of the family for nearly a century and a half. In this period of retrenchment the family devoted itself to its Austrian lands and to establishing the customary ties of relationship with the dynasties of eastern Europe.

This growing involvement in the east led to a weakening of the family influence in the area of its origin; the Swiss cantons began to assert themselves against their Hapsburg overlords and in the battles of Morgarten (1315) and Sempach (1386) revealed the superiority of their peasant army over the feudal levies of the Hapsburgs. The reign of Duke Rudolph IV, the "Founder" (1358–65), was a brief yet promising exception to the general pattern of decline; he rounded out the Austrian possessions (Carinthia and Carniola had been acquired in this period) by the addition of the Tyrol. In 1364 he signed a treaty of mutual succession with his father-in-law, Charles IV of Luxembourg, which provided that the dynasty that outlived the other would inherit fill its territories—an anticipation of the situation at the end of 1437, when the last Luxembourg emperor, Sigismund, was succeeded as king of Bohemia and of Hungary by Albert of Austria, Albert II, as Holy Roman emperor.

The Imperial Hapsburgs. The outlines of the Hapsburg monarchy in central Europe were already discernible, but Albert's death in 1439 in the struggle against the Turks and the establishment of George Podiebrad in Bohemia and Matthias Corvinus in Hungary postponed the real foundation of this state until 1527. Emperor Frederick III (1440–93) found it almost impossible to carry out his political program, but he gave an imperishable expression of his faith in the family's historic mission in the motto A.E.I.O.U., variously rendered as Austria erit in orbe ultimo ("Austria will exist at the end of the world") and Alles erdreich ist österreich unterthan ("The whole Earth is subject to Austria"); he also gave imperial sanction to the spurious Privilegium maius that the equally hopeful Rudolph IV had used to support a claim to the archducal title and to precedence over the other members of the empire's college of princes. This faith in the future was more than justified by the marriage of Frederick's son Maximilian to Mary, the heiress of Charles the Bold of Burgundy in 1477; family interests gravitated then to dynastic and political involvement in western Europe.

Hapsburg-Valois Rivalry. The house of Austria and Burgundy inherited the traditional Burgundian rivalry with the French Valois, and the life and death struggle of the House of Austria and France remained a basic component of European politics until the middle of the 18th century. Maximilian's innumerable, inimitable plans—he dreamed of creating Austrian and Burgundian kingdoms, of becoming pope, of securing for his family the crowns of Bohemia and Hungary, of reforming and reinvigorating the Holy Roman Empire—often remained plans. Yet at his death (1519) his grandson, Charles, fell heir to the largest single inheritance in European history: Castile and Aragon with the Spanish possessions (in Italy and overseas), the Burgundian lands (chiefly the Netherlands), and the Hapsburg lands in Austria now reunited after a partition that had lasted from 1379 to 1496. The relatively unimportant feudal dynasty in southwestern Germany had progressed to the point where it could lay claim to being the first world empire and becoming possibly a "universal monarchy" in Europe.

At this zenith of Hapsburg power the magnitude and the diversity of the problems facing Emperor Charles V and his brother Ferdinand I made another partition of the family properties mandatory: Charles retained Spain, the colonies, and the Netherlands, while Ferdinand received the Austrian lands. (The death of Louis II of Hungary at Mohács in 1526 brought about the union of Austria, Bohemia, and Hungary in Ferdinand's person.) Both men remained loyal to the universalistic conceptions of empire and Church (they could be described as old family traditions at this point) and sought to prevent the spread of the Reformation and the rise of newer political and social forces on the European scene. The common family background and the close personal ties, reinforced by excessive intermarriage, did not obscure the fact that there were two houses of Austria rather than one, as dynastic interests often came into conflict with policies dominated by more localized perspectives: the rivalry with France, the affairs of the empire, the war with the Turks, and concessions to the various estates of a measure of religious freedom.

While Hapsburg Spain was widely regarded as the most powerful state in Europe in the reign of PHILIP II (1556–98), the German Hapsburgs played a secondary role in European affairs; there was a tripartite division of the Austrian lands in 1564 and a protracted period of dissension in the family councils on the ways and means of dealing with the Protestants and the estates, which often represented their interests. Emperor Rudolph II (1576–1612) revealed so little appetite for governing that members of the family combined against him in the Treaty of Vienna (1606) and supported his brother Matthias, who it was hoped would provide more effective leadership. This unattractive quarrel of brothers (Bruderzwist) ended with the triumph of Matthias and a renewed sense of self-reliance in the various estates, which profited from these Hapsburg differences.

The Thirty Years' War. Matthias was succeeded in 1619 by FERDINAND II (1619–37), the head of the Hapsburg Styrian line and an exponent of the Counter Reformation and confessional absolutism. The beginning of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR was followed by the defeat of the Bohemian estates and the "Winter King" of Bohemia, Frederick V of the Palatinate, at the battle of the White Mountain (1620). It was a decisive victory for the preservation of the Hapsburg dynasty and Roman Catholicism in the Danubian lands, but although possible at that regional level, it could not be repeated for Germany as a whole, for there the territorial princes (Catholic as well as Protestant) and Germany's powerful neighbors, especially Sweden and France, resisted the effort to improve the position of the emperor and the Catholic Church. In the Peace of WESTPHALIA (1648) the German Hapsburgs had to recognize the existence of a constitutional compromise between the emperor and the princes, the Catholic and the Protestant communions.

The Ottoman Empire and Spanish Succession. Disappointed, the German Hapsburgs turned a large portion of their attention to the war against the Turks and to securing for themselves the inheritance of their childless relative, Charles II of Spain. In the reign of Leopold I (1658–1705) the Turks were decisively defeated at the gates of Vienna (1683) and forced to relinquish their hold on Hungary (1699). A heroic period of Austrian arms under the great leadership of Prince Eugene of Savoy assured the Austrian monarchy a place as one of the great powers of Europe.

These striking successes of the Althabsburger (the old-Hapsburgs) were paralleled by the decline of the Spanish monarchy evident in the figures of Philip III (1598–1621), Philip IV (1621–65), and Charles II (1665–1700). In the last decades of the 17th century Europe waited expectantly for the death of the childless Charles: both Leopold I and Louis XIV of France laid claim to the Spanish Hapsburg possessions. His death in 1700 and his will, which bequeathed his possessions intact to Louis XIV's grandson Philip, brought the expected Austrian response in the War of the Spanish Succession (1701–13). European statesmen were not at all anxious to see the Spanish dominions joined to the power of France or of Austria, and when Archduke Charles, the Austrian claimant in Spain, succeeded his brother Joseph I in 1711, the maritime powers pressed for a compromise. In the peace settlement Philip received Spain and the colonies; Charles VI received the Spanish Netherlands, Lombardy, and the Two Sicilies.

The Austrian Succession. The family that had once been so blessed with male heirs now found there was only one surviving male Hapsburg—Emperor Charles VI. In the Pragmatic Sanction (1713) he took steps to ensure the succession of male and female heirs by primogeniture to a single and undivided bloc of family possessions. This family law that was also a decisive moment in the constitutional development of the Austrian monarchy received the official recognition of most of the European states. It did not, however, prevent Frederick II of Prussia from invading and occupying Silesia on the death of Charles VI. His daughter MARIA THERESA found herself required now to fight for the continued existence of the Hapsburg state in the War of the Austrian Succession (1740–48). She had married Francis Stephen of Lorraine in 1736, and their numerous progeny would be formally reckoned members of the House of Hapsburg-Lorraine. Francis had exchanged Lorraine for the Grand Duchy of Tuscany (1738), thus establishing a separate Hapsburg line in Tuscany (1738–1859); a similar arrangement would be made for Modena (Hapsburg-Este).

Austria survived the war weakened by the loss of Silesia but strong in Maria Theresa's determination to revamp its government and to bring its society into line with the more advanced states of western and central Europe. Her reign and those of her two sons, JOSEPH II (1780–90) and Leopold II (1790–92), demonstrated a Hapsburg willingness to carry out basic reforms whether in the pragmatic and moderate manner of the mother or the more radical and precipitate manner of Joseph II.

Austria took a vigorous part in the Seven Years' War (1756–63), and though it failed to win back Silesia, its interests had to be reckoned with in the three later partitions of Poland. The Bukovina was also annexed in 1775 without resistance on the part of the Turks. On the eve of the French Revolution the Austrian monarchy could lay justifiable claim to an enlightened public policy and to Hapsburgs who possessed impressive credentials as "enlightened despots."

The French Revolution and Napoleonic Wars. Reform from above, no matter how well intentioned and judicious, could not long delay the confrontation with the notions of nationality and democracy that were powerful moving forces in the revolution. Leopold I and his son Francis II could do little to save the life of their sister and aunt, Marie Antoinette, but Austrians did fight valiantly to contain the Revolution and NAPOLEON's brilliant effort to establish French hegemony in Europe.

In the face of Napoleon's coronation in 1804, Francis II established the Austrian Empire; a combination of French pressure and his own insensitivity to the old imperial traditions of the family led to his formal abdication of the imperial crown (1806). If Francis marked a new decline in the quality of Hapsburg emperors, his gifted brothers, Archduke Charles, the victor at Aspern, Archduke John, one of the most genuinely popular Hapsburg princes of modern times, and Archduke Joseph, who created an impressive reputation as Palatine of Hungary, revealed that there was a creative response to the needs of the dynasty and its subject peoples.

For a few years (1805–09) Austria appealed to the forces of local patriotism and incipient nationalism in preparing for a showdown with Napoleon; its defeat at his hands in 1809 brought Klemens von Metternich to power and with him a more conservative position in foreign and internal affairs. In 1810 Francis I consented to the marriage of his daughter Maria Louisa to Napoleon; in 1814 in rather different circumstances he played host to one of Europe's most brilliant political and social gatherings, the Congress of Vienna. Austria then became synonymous with the preservation of the status quo in Europe, the suppression of the national aspirations of its peoples, and the uninspired bureaucratization of society. Such policy or lack of it could not long delay the confrontation between the new and the old, the principle of national self-determination and the principle of dynastic rule.

The Revolutions of 1848. In the revolutionary year of 1848 the peoples of the Austrian Empire experienced the exhilaration of political freedom and national renaissance; in the first months of that year the future of Hapsburg Austria seemed bleak indeed with the general expectation that it would dissolve into its component parts. The Germans, the Magyars, the Italians, and the Slavs looked to their own interests rather than to that of the preservation of the dynasty and the state machine. But the system was still viable enough to defeat the forces of revolution by sheer force of military power and with the support of the army of Czar NICHOLAS I. In the wake of counterrevolution there was a renewed will to recapture Austria's unity, strength, and prestige, and this was the program with which the young Francis Joseph ascended the throne in December of 1848.

Absolutism, even with a modernizing air about it, was a costly business: the huge army and bureaucracy that it required were burdens on an economy already backward by comparison with western Europe and northern Germany. Austria discovered that her pretensions as a great power were more often than not at variance with the facts; in 1859 she was defeated by France and in 1866 by Prussia and thus effectively removed from any further participation in German and Italian affairs. Francis Joseph was then forced to come to terms with the Hungarians and to concede them a large measure of independence in the compromise (Ausgleich) of 1867.

The Balkans and World War I. Deprived of their historic base in Germany and their age-old interest in Italian affairs, the Hapsburgs hoped to discover yet another "Austrian mission" in the Balkans, but this led almost inevitably to a collision with nascent South Slav nationalism and Russian interests in the area. Austrian statesmen and military leaders professed to believe that the status of Austrian relations with Serbia constituted the life and death questions for the dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary. The desire to preserve Austrian prestige as a great power at all costs and to eliminate the source of South Slav irredentism (a disruptive force in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which had been annexed in 1908) helped to bring about the war that would seal the fate of the Austrian monarchy; it was the assassination of a Hapsburg, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, the heir apparent at Sarajevo (June 28, 1914) that touched off World War I.

Growing political difficulties were accompanied by troubling signs in the dynasty itself whose members found it more difficult to imitate the selfless devotion to duty of Emperor Francis Joseph. Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian had allowed himself to become involved in the Mexican adventure of Emperor NAPOLEON III of France and with the substantial French support was proclaimed Emperor Maximilian I of Mexico (1864). When the French troops were withdrawn, he made a quixotic effort to save his throne only to be defeated and captured by the forces of Benito Juárez; he was executed at Querétaro on June 19, 1867. Crown Prince Rudolph took his own life at Mayerling (1889); his mother, the Empress Elizabeth, was the victim of an assassin in 1898. A number of archdukes abandoned their titles to seek anonymity as simple citizens abroad. Even Francis Ferdinand, a most militant supporter of the dynastic traditions, married morganatically.

Francis Joseph in his old age came to be the last surviving link between the peoples, an almost ageless symbol of the political anachronism over which he ruled; his death in November of 1916 removed the system's last important prop. The excessive strain of the war had already weakened it beyond repair, and when his youthful successor, Charles I, sought to secure a peace that would permit the monarchy to continue on more democratic and federalistic lines it was already too late; the people were no longer satisfied with a minimal program of that kind. The defeat of the Central Powers in the autumn of 1918 produced an almost instantaneous fragmentation of the Hapsburg Hausmacht; the imperial government in its last days was simply charged with the peaceful transfer of its remaining power to the succession states. On Nov. 11, 1918, Charles I renounced any further participation in state affairs and thus brought the long history of the dynasty's involvement in Danubia to a close. In 1920 he attempted on two occasions to prolong that involvement, in this case in Hungary, but pressures from Hungary's neighbors and the lack of real enthusiasm in the country precluded his success. He was then removed to a more remote place of exile (he had originally gone to Switzerland) in the Madeira Islands, where he died in 1922. Dr. Otto Habsburg-Lothringen, Charles' eldest son, applied to return permanently to Austria as a private citizen, but he was denied by the Austrian government (1965). In 1981 his son and heir, Karl von Habsburg (1961-) became a resident of Salzburg. Memories, pleasant and unpleasant, of Hapsburg rule continue to excite lively political controversy in modern Austria.

The Hapsburgs and the Catholic Church. By the 19th century the Hapsburgs had acquired the reputation of being the most Catholic of all European reigning houses. The historical tie with the triumphs of the COUNTER REFORMATION had left an indelible impression on the European consciousness, and as if to give their own expression to it a special form of Hapsburg piety had evolved, the Pietas Austriaca, in which family traditions clustered about the devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, the Holy Cross, and the Immaculate Conception. The presence of members of the dynasty at the annual Corpus Christi procession in Vienna testified to the vitality even in the 20th century of such family traditions. But unquestioned piety and filial loyalty to the pope were usually combined with a refusal to make concessions in disputes with the papacy and to regard its requests as unwarranted interventions of the Roman Curia. Throughout the 17th and 18th centuries Hapsburg policy often dominated religious affairs, a tendency that reached its zenith in JOSEPHINISM. The Hapsburgs had inherited a conception of state intervention in religious affairs from the Hohenstaufens, and this played a continuing role in their policy. The Catholic Church undoubtedly owed its survival in Danubia and other parts of Europe to the Hapsburgs, but their great zeal in the cause of Catholic Christianity was not without its unfortunate consequences for the inner life of the Church—all too often the Church was regarded as the spiritual arm of dynastic policy.

The Hapsburg Legacy. In their more than 600 years at the center of European affairs the Hapsburgs had revealed more than political gifts and an instinct for survival; they were often generous patrons of the arts and in the process left imperishable monuments to their unique sense of mission and to the greatness of the artists who worked for them. The palace as the center of a dynastic cult took Hapsburg form in the Escorial and Vienna's Hofburg; the character of a number of European cities—Vienna, Innsbruck, and Prague—owed much to Hapsburg builders. Rudolph II was perhaps the most famed of Hapsburg art collectors, but others were quite as active, and the family collections form the core of the great art museums of Madrid and Vienna. The grandeur of the dynasty attracted the musical genius of the classical period of Viennese music, while the portraits of individual members by Dürer, Titian, and Velásquez are a priceless source for the understanding of the family's character and its role in European culture.

Every family eventually acquires its own tone, a set of characteristic traits physical as well as psychic, and the Hapsburgs were no exception. The most obvious and famous of these was the pronounced "Hapsburg lip" that appeared in the course of the 15th century and attained to classic proportions in the physiognomies of the last generations of the original Hapsburg line. There were other qualities, too: a love of music, a passion for hunting, a gift of languages easily acquired that assisted them in the family business of ruling so many different peoples, and a predisposition to mildness (Clementia Austriaca). Because a Hapsburg ruler had such a compelling sense of the grace of God that had established his family in such a position of authority he tended to be excessively scrupulous in making decisions and in weighing their moral implications; this provided the family with a reputation for lethargy and procrastination. Since the Holy Roman Empire had been virtually a family monopoly for so many centuries, other dynasties seemed to be recent arrivals even when their claim to recognition was beyond doubt. The Hapsburgs had often followed in the wake of other dynastic achievements and had often been most prominent for their ability to husband their resources and to allow intermarriage to take the place of creative political programs—Bella gerant alii, tu felix Austria nube (Other nations make war, you, happy Austria, marry). But there had been great visionaries in the family—Rudolph IV, Maximilian I, Joseph II—and individuals whose fame rested on their mastery of practical politics—Rudolph I, Ferdinand I, and Maria Theresa. Though it often seemed that they had been motivated by dynastic interest rather than ideals, the very quest for power had produced as its legitimate consequence a number of political communities in various parts of Europe, and European nations would find shelter and security under Hapsburg rule. The recent tragic experience of the peoples who once composed the most outstanding of these Hapsburg creations, the Austrian monarchy of Danubia, has encouraged observers to take a more nuanced and positive view of the truly unique Hapsburg achievement.

Bibliography: A. WANDRUSKA, The House of Habsburg, tr. C. and H. EPSTEIN (Garden City, N.Y. 1964), with convenient genealogical tables. H. RÖSSLER, and G. FRANZ, Biographisches Wörterbuch zur deutschen Geschichte (Munich 1952) 289–296. Gestalter der Geschichte Österreichs, ed. H. HANTSCH (Innsbruck 1962). A. CORETH, "Pietas Austriaca: Wesen und Bedeutung habsburgischer Frömmigkeit in der Barockzeit," Mitteilungen des Österreichischen Staatsarchivs 7 (1954) 90–119. H. HANTSCH, Die Geschichte Österreichs, 2 v. (2nd ed. Graz 1947–53). R. A. KANN, The Multinational Empire: Nationalism and National Reform in the Hapsburg Monarchy, 1848–1918, 2 v. (New York 1950). A. J. MAY, The Hapsburg Monarchy, 1867–1914 (Cambridge, Mass. 1951). O. JÁSZI, The Dissolution of the Hapsburg Monarchy (Chicago 1929). Z. A. B. ZEMAN, The Breakup of the Hapsburg Empire, 1914–1918 (New York 1961). A. WANDRUSZKA, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1957–66) 4:1301–02. E. CRANSHAW, The Habsburgs (London 1971). R. J. EVANS, The Making of the Habsburg Monarchy, 1500–1700 (New York 1979). P. FICHTNER, The Habsburg Empire (Malabar, Fla. 1997). C. INGRAO, The Habsburg Monarchy 1618–1815, 2nd ed. (Cambridge 2000). R. A. KANN, A History of the Habsburg Empire, 1526–1660 (Ithaca, NY 1971). A. WHEATCROFT, The Habsburgs (New York 1995).

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

HARCOURT, WILLIAM, BL.

Jesuit priest and martyr; vere Barrow, alias Waring; b. Weeton-cum-Prees, Kirkham, Lancashire, England, c. 1609; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), June 20, 1679. After completing his studies at the Jesuit college in St-Omer, Flanders, William joined the Society of Jesus at Watten (1632). He was ordained (1641) in Flanders. Upon returning to England (1644), he labored in the environs of London for 35 years. On May 7, 1679, the year after he became superior of the Jesuits in London, Harcourt was arrested and committed to Newgate Prison on the charge of complicity in the fictitious Titus Oates Plot to kill the king. Beginning June 13, 1670, he was tried with fellow Jesuits Thomas WHITBREAD, John FENWICK, John GAVAN, and Antony TUR-NER. Although their accusers were demonstrably guilty of perjury, Justice Scroggs was determined that the jury convict the priests of high treason. Harcourt's cause was introduced by papal decree (Dec. 4, 1886) under the name of William Harcourt. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); Dec. 1 (Jesuits).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). J. N. TYLEND, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 179–81.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HARDESTY, ROBERT, BL.

Lay martyr; b. in Yorkshire, England; d. Sept. 24, 1589, hanged at York. He was arrested for harboring and aiding a seminary priest, Bl. William SPENSER, with whom he was executed following internment at York Castle. Hardesty was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HARDEY, MARY ALOYSIA, MOTHER

Religious superior; b. Piscataway, MD, Dec. 8, 1809; d. Paris, France, June 17, 1886. Her parents were Frederick William and Sarah (Spalding) Hardey, descendants of colonial Maryland Catholics. The family moved to the South, and Mary Ann grew up with her eight brothers and sisters on the Hardey plantation at Opelousas, La. She was educated at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Grand Coteau, La., and entered the novitiate there in 1825, taking the name Aloysia. She was professed in 1833 and three years later became superior of the convent at St. Michael's, La. where she met (Bl.) Philippine Duchesne, first missionary of the Society of the Sacred Heart in America. Mother Aloysia left the South in 1841 to begin her work on the Atlantic seaboard as foundress and superior of the first house of her society in New York City. The convent on Houston Street later became Manhattanville College, situated at Purchase, NY, since 1955. She was superior at Manhattanville for 25 years, and in 1844 became superior vicar of all the houses of the society in the eastern states and Canada. To the six foundations that she made in New York, Philadelphia, Pa, Buffalo and Albany, N.Y., Detroit, Mich., and Cincinnati, Ohio, she added two in Canada, Montreal and Halifax, and one in Havana, Cuba. She was appointed (1871) assistant general representing the houses of the British Empire and North America and was stationed (1872) at the motherhouse in Paris. Her office obliged her to travel widely and in the following years she returned several times to North America.

Bibliography: M. A. WILLIAMS, Second Sowing: The Life of Mary Aloysia Hardey (New York 1942). L. CALLAN, The Society of the Sacred Heart in North America (New York 1937).

[M. M. GREEN]

HARDOUIN, JEAN

Jesuit church historian, numismatist, controversialist, philologist, and librarian; b. Quimper, Brittany, Dec. 22 (23?), 1646; d. Paris, Sept. 3, 1729. Hardouin, the son of a book dealer, was admitted to the Jesuit novitiate, Sept. 25, 1660. At the Collège Louis-le-Grand in Paris he served as librarian and taught rhetoric and then theology (1683–1718). During these years he performed extensive research. In his writings on numismatics, which include Nummi antiqui populorum et urbium illustrati (Paris 1684), Numismata aliquot rariora Augustorum . . . (Luxembourg 1700), and Chronologia ex nummis antiquis restituta (2 v. Paris 1697), Hardouin displayed an industrious scholarship, though his works were not free from errors, and his methods of establishing chronology from the dates on coins were criticized. His skill in linguistic science appears in Themistii orationes XXXIII (Paris 1684) and Plini Secundi historiae naturalis libri XXXVII (Paris 1685).

Hardouin was associated with the publication of the Journal de Trévoux, contributing innumerable articles on Scripture, numismatics, history, and patrology, from its first appearance in 1701 until his death. He also engaged in written polemics, notably with the Oratorian Bernard LAMY, over the date of Christ's last paschal supper, De supremo Domini paschate (Paris 1685), and with Pierre François Le Courayer on the validity of Anglican orders, Le Défense des ordinations anglicanes réfuté par le P. J. Hardouin (2 v. Paris 1727). His fame rests principally on his history of the councils of the Church, Conciliorum collectio regia maxima: Acta conciliorum et epistolae decretales, ac constitutiones summorum pontificum (12 v.

Paris 1714–15). It was based on the 18-volume collection by Philippe LABBE and Gabriel Cossart (Paris 1671–72), which it surpassed; it is also conceded to be richer and more reliable than the later 31-volume collection of Giovanni Domenico MANSI (Venice 1757–98). For this work Hardouin was granted a pension by the Assembly of the French Clergy (1687); Louis XIV assumed the expense of its publication. Though it was printed in 1714–15, its distribution was delayed for ten years by order of the French Parlement after a commission of the Sorbonne found that it contained maxims contrary to Gallican Liberties.

Hardouin was a scholar of great erudition, but he held several convictions that caused amazement. He believed that the Cephas rebuked by Paul was not Peter the Apostle; that Christ and the Apostles preached in Latin; that the Alexandrine and Hebrew versions of the OT and many writings of early Christianity (e.g., FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE, Marius Mercator, parts of JUSTIN MARTYR, CASSIODORUS, and ISIDORE) were not authentic; that the odes of Horace, Vergil's Aeneid, the orations of Cicero, and a great number of other classics were fabrications of the 13th century; and that Louis THOMASSIN, Cornelius JANSEN, Antoine ARNAULD, Pasquier QUESNEL, Nicolas MALEBRANCHE, Blaise PASCAL, and René DESCARTES were atheists. The appearance of such theses led to the posthumous condemnation of three of his works by the Inquisition: J. Hardouini . . . opera selecta (Amsterdam 1709; condemned April 13, 1739), published without consent of Hardouin; J. Hardouin . . . opera varia (Amsterdam 1733; condemned April 13, 1739); Commentarius in Novum Testamentum . . . (Amsterdam 1741; condemned July 28, 1742).

Bibliography: G. DUMAS, Histoire du Journal de Trévoux, depuis 1701 jusqu'en 1762 (Paris 1936). P. C. SOMMERVOGEL, Table méthodique des Mémoires de Trévoux, 1701–1775, 3 v. (Paris 1864–65). H. QUENTIN, Jean-Dominique Mansi et les grandes collections conciliaires (Paris 1900) 38–54. P. MECH, Catholicisme 5:510–511. P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2042–46. F. X. BANTLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:5.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

HARE KRISHNA

The Hare Krishna movement, more formally known as the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), was founded in New York City in 1966, one year after the arrival of its charismatic leader, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada, from India. The mission of ISKCON's founder was to gain recognition for his Hindu beliefs, which derived from a tradition originating in Bengal, India. While aligned with orthodox Hinduism, the Krishna Consciousness preached by Swami Prabhupada traces its roots to the Krishna bhakti movement founded by Sri Caitanya Mahaprabhu in the 16th century. Their beliefs derive from scripture contained in the Vedas, but the movement's central religious text is the Bhagavad-Gita, in which the devotional activity of bhakti is first fully detailed. Swami Prabhupada preached to his young followers that love for and devotional service to Krishna (God)—the basis of the bhakti-yoga tradition—would lead to spiritual realization. To gain this spiritual fulfillment Krishna devotees are required to take part in a number of religious practices: chanting the Hare Krishna mantra and living an austere lifestyle which avoids meat, intoxicants, illicit sex, and gambling.

The initial growth of the Krishna movement during the late 1960s and early 1970s in America was sustained largely by the involvement of middle-class countercultural youth, who were protesting against the traditional values and socio-political structures of American society. Krishna members have joined ISKCON on the basis of a variety of social, psychological, and religious motivations: a search for spiritual enlightenment, the desire for meaningful primary relations, disenchantment with the materialism of contemporary culture, or an attraction to the Krishna lifestyle. The movement gained considerable notoriety during the 1970s as its members were often seen chanting and distributing religious literature in airports and other public settings. Hare Krishna, branded by the public and the media as one of the major “cults,” was thought to subject its members to “mind control” and various forms of “exploitation.”

Reorganization. As the counterculture faded from America and other Western countries, ISKCON's membership pattern changed. At its height in the mid-1970s, ISKCON claimed a membership of approximately 5,000 in North America and 10,000 worldwide. Since that time, ISKCON's full-time membership in North America has declined somewhat. However, it has grown worldwide due to an expanding congregation of as many as several million part-time members, many of whom are East Indians. In the mid-1980s, ISKCON had 200 centers and communities on every continent, with over 70 in North America alone.

Following Swami Prabhupada's death in November of 1977, ISKCON was reorganized politically and spiritually. Eleven of Bhaktivedanta's closest disciples were appointed to serve as gurus, responsible for initiating new members into Krishna Consciousness and for helping to oversee the affairs of the movement's communities worldwide. Within a year following the leader's death, however, ISKCON faced a series of succession problems as the authority and legitimacy of the gurus was challenged by many long-time members. In the 1980s ISKCON faced factionalism, schism, the expulsion or defection of four of the original eleven appointed gurus, and the departure of countless other long-time members from the movement. This stabilized somewhat in the 1990s, as the remaining leaders consolidated the movement.

See Also: NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS; CULTS; SECT.

Bibliography: A. BURR, I Am Not My Body: A Study of the International Hare Krishna Sect (New Delhi 1984). F. DANER, The American Children of Krishna: A Study of the Hare Krishna Movement (New York 1976). S. J. GELBERG, Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna (New York 1983); "The Catholic Church and the Hare Krishna Movement: An Invitation to Dialogue," ISKCON Review 2 (1986) 1–63. S. D. GOSWAMI, Prabhupada (Los Angeles 1983). G. JOHNSON, "The Hare Krishna in San Francisco," C. GLOCK and R. BELLAH, eds., The New Religious Consciousness (Los Angeles 1976). J. S. JUDAH, Hare Krishna and the Counterculture (New York 1974). T. H. POLLING and J. F. KENNY, The Hare Krishna Character Type: A Study of Sensate Personality (Lewiston, N.Y. 1986). E. B. ROCHFORD, Hare Krishna in America (New Brunswick, N.J. 1985). "Dialectical Processes in the Development of Hare Krishna: Tension, Public Definition and Strategy," D. BROMLEY and P. HAMMOND, eds., The Future of New Religious Movements (Macon, Ga. 1987). L. D. SHINN, "The Many Faces of Krishna," J. FICHTER, ed., Alternatives to American Main-Line Churches (New York 1983).

[E. B. ROCHFORD, JR./EDS.]

HARENT, ÉTIENNE

Theologian; b. Gex, France, Dec. 25, 1845; d. Dôle, Feb. 5, 1927. He entered the Jesuits in 1864, and later taught dogmatic theology at Meld in 1883, at Lyons in 1899, at Canterbury in 1901, and at Ore-Place-Hastings in 1906. His theological treatises De vera religione, De fide, De ecclesia, De gratia, and De ordine have been published many times. He published also studies in various reviews, and is especially remembered for the important monographs he wrote on belief, faith, hope, and salvation of the infidels for the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, and for his article on the papacy in the Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique. Although Harent is chiefly remembered as a scholastic theologian, he took an interest also in history and religious psychology.

Bibliography: B. SCHNEIDER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:6. H. RONDET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) Tables Générales 1:2019.

[L. B. O'NEIL]

Hare Krishnas, c. 1974. (Archive Photos)

HÄRING, BERNARD

Moral theologian; professor; Redemptorist priest; b. Böttingen, Germany, November 10, 1912; d. July 3, 1998. It is commonly acknowledged that Häring had a crucial role in the reshaping of moral theology in the twentieth century. From 1941 to 1945, having been conscripted into the German army, he served as a medical orderly in France, Poland, and Russia. From 1949 to 1953 and from 1957 until his retirement in 1988, he was a professor at the Alphonsian Academy in Rome.

In 1964, Paul VI named a papal commission on birth control, of which Häring was a member. The pope issued the encyclical Humanae vitae in 1968. Responding to what he saw as an urgent pastoral need, Häring spoke out on the role of conscience. On other occasions also he expressed controversial views that did not escape the attention of ecclesiastical authorities. However, he was never formally censured.

Häring engaged in a critical discussion with Rudolf OTTO, Max SCHELER, and others. He developed a person-alist religious ethic based on experience, feeling, and value, rather than on abstract rational analysis. The role of such an ethic is to evoke dispositions and form character, rather than enunciate principles and deduce norms.

In Häring's place in the history of moral theology depends primarily on his early work, Das Gesetz Christi [ET The Law of Christ (1961)]. Instead of a legalistic system of precepts and sanctions, Häring offered a Christian moral message founded on the Bible. The moral life is empowered by grace, that is, by a new being in Christ. Moral theology, therefore, must be integrated with a theology of the sacraments as historical events of grace. Biblical leitmotifs provide the vision, and Christian virtues the framework. Although subordinate to the Bible, the NATURAL LAW is still normative. Much of the content of The Law of Christ is similar to that of the earlier manuals. What is new is the vision and the openness to dialogue with the secular sciences, sociology, and psychology. The biblical orientation provided an opening for ecumenical dialogue, which the author cultivated assiduously. His medical ethics, rather than solving dilemmas, provided a distinctive theological interpretation of life and death.

A major work, Free and Faithful in Christ (1978–81) developed the themes of Christian freedom and the liberty and creativity of CONSCIENCE. In saying that conscience is creative he did not mean that it is autonomous or arbitrary; it is bound by fidelity to Christ. While affirming the historicity of natural law, he rejected relativism. This book contributed to developing and popularizing the idea of the FUNDAMENTAL OPTION. Always alert to contemporary issues, the author discussed the ethics of ecology, the media, and peace. Häring's thinking on peace and war continued to develop. By 1986 he was arguing that we must move toward abandoning the just-war theory and replacing it with an ethic of nonviolence. Responsibility is fundamental. The "goal-commandment," as distinct from a negative limit or mere ideal, expresses a summons to organized action toward an end. "Reciprocity of consciences" indicates the way in which Christians ought to seek truth, namely through a community endeavor, governed by mutual respect. Responding to controversy, Häring held that there is an intimate connection rather than a dichotomy between a "faith-ethic" and an "autonomous ethic." For him, the deontological dimension of ethics means God's call to a loving response, and the teleological, a movement toward sanctity. Moral theology is to be pastoral, personalist, and communitarian; an embodiment of the healing role of faith rather than a system of control by law.

Bibliography: Häring has published over 80 books and hundreds of articles. The following are some of the more significant: Das Heilige und das Gute: Religion und Sittlichkeit in ihrem gegen- seitigen Bezug (Krailling/Munich 1950); Das Gesetz Christi (Freiburg im Breisgau 1954; 8th. ed. 1967); The Law of Christ (Westminster 1961–1966); Medical Ethics (Slough 1972); Ethics of Manipulation: Issues in Medicine, Behavior Control and Genetics (New York 1975); Free and Faithful in Christ (New York 1978–1981); The Healing Power of Peace and Nonviolence (Mahwah 1986); No Way Out? Pastoral Care of the Divorced and Remarried (Slough 1990); My Witness for the Church (Mahwah 1992).

[B. V. JOHNSTONE]

HARLAY

According to conflicting sources, the Harlay family originated either from the French-Comté (France) or from England, and was extinguished in 1717; it gave to France several distinguished magistrates and prelates.

Achille de, jurist; b. March 7, 1536; d. Oct. 21, 1619. He succeeded his father, Christopher, as court president of the Parlement of Paris in 1572, becoming in 1582 first president of this body. He was among the most respected men of the legal profession of his age and a leader of the Gallican movement. He served faithfully King Henry III and opposed vehemently the Catholic League and the Guise family. After the Day of Barricades (May 12, 1588), when Paris was temporarily taken over by the Guises and the king had fled, Harlay contemptuously rejected an offer of cooperation with the League. After the assassination of Henry of Guise (1588), instigated by Henry III, the prominent jurist was arrested by the League rebels and imprisoned in the Bastille. Liberated a few days after the assassination of Henry III, Harlay joined Henry of Navarre, the Protestant pretender to the vacant throne. When Henry had won the religious-civil war, and had abjured Calvinism, Harlay became one of Henry's most intimate advisers. Under Henry IV he continued his Gallican struggles against papal supremacy in the interest of absolute monarchy. He always disliked Jesuits, and after the assassination of Henry IV, he openly accused them of instigating the crime. As an ardent opponent of ULTRAMONTANISM, he took the initiative in the royal condemnation of the books of Juan de MARIANA and Robert Cardinal BELLARMINE. He resigned in 1611 because of ill health. His only book, entitled Coutume d'Orléans, was published in 1585.

Achille de (Baron de Sancy), littérateur, bishop; b. Paris, 1581; d. Paris, Nov. 20, 1646. As a young man he received three abbey and became bishop of Lavour. After the death of his older brother in 1601, he first became a professional soldier and then served as French ambassador to the Sultan of Turkey (1610–19). He was a protector of the Jesuits against the Turkish persecutions and thus suffered the violent hostility of the Turkish government. He resigned, returned home, and entered the Congregation of the Oratory. He loyally served Louis XIII and Cardinal de RICHELIEU, was confessor of Queen Henrietta of England, and received from Richelieu the bishopric of Saint-Malo (1631). There he acted as one of the ecclesiastical judges who persecuted, on the instruction of Richelieu, several bishops of Brittany involved in the rebellion headed by the Duke of Montmorency. An expert in modern and Oriental languages, his famous collections of ancient Hebrew Bibles are preserved in the National Library of Paris. He also wrote Latin poetry and political tracts, and was editor of Richelieu's Memoirs.

François I de, theologian, archbishop of Rouen; b. Paris, 1586; d. Chateau de Gaillon, March 22, 1653. As a brilliant and young student of theology, he received at the age of 17 the benefices of the very rich Abbey of Saint-Victor. His Roman sympathies brought him recognition and some opposition from his Gallican superiors. Appointed coadjutor of Cardinal Joyeuse, Archbishop of Rouen (1614), he succeeded Joyeuse as archbishop (1616). His zealous religious and social reforms soon caused conflict with the Jesuits, resulting in the creation of the theological school in the archiepiscopal palace. When his well-known ambition to become a cardinal was not satisfied, he turned angrily against the papal court with a satirical pamphlet entitled Ecclesiasticae historiae liber primus. This pamphlet was considered a complete reversal of the archbishop's previous attitudes in theological matters. He avoided official censure only by a full retraction.

Harlay-Chanvallon, François de, archbishop, nephew of François I; b. Aug. 14, 1625; d. Conflans, Aug. 6, 1696. After a distinguished collegiate career, he began, immediately after graduation, his outstanding career as prelate and courtier. As a graduation gift he received the rich Abbey of Junièges from his uncle, the archbishop of Rouen. He succeeded upon the latter's resignation (1651) despite the opposition of (St.) Vincent de Paul, who criticized the political ambitions and the private life of the young prelate. He became archbishop of Paris in 1671 and an intimate adviser of Louis XIV in Church matters. The great ambition of his life was to succeed Cardinal Mazarin as prime minister. The archbishop had to be satisfied with an appointment as director of the affairs of the regular clergy. The king, however, transformed the Archdiocese of Paris into a ducal peerage for the archbishop and his successors. Archbishop Harlay-Chanvallon consecrated the secret marriage of Louis XIV and Mme. de Maintenon and had an important part in the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685). He was a relentless enemy of Jansenism and Protestantism. He was a brilliant and successful administrator of the most important diocese in France. However, he had many political and ecclesiastical critics, and his private life was much criticized.

Bibliography: F. T. PERRENS, L'Église et l'état . . . sous Henri IV et la régence de Marie de Médicis, 2 v. (Paris 1872). A. JEAN, Les Évêques et archevêques de France depuis 1682 jusqu'à 1801 (Paris 1891). V. MARTIN, Les Origines du gallicanisme, 2 v. (Paris 1939). K. HOFMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 5:13.

[E. GONDA]

HARMEL, LÉON

French industrialist; b. La Neuville-Lez-Wasigny, Ardennes, Jan. 17, 1829; d. Nice, Nov. 25, 1915. At the age of 25 he was chief of a textile plant that had been founded by his father at Val des Bois, near Reims. Believing that the "most important work of our age is the work of the salvation of our brothers the workers" he transformed his enterprise into a Christian corporation that was also an archconfraternity under the patronage of Our Lady of the Factory (Notre Dame de l'usine). A chapel was placed at the center of the buildings and the principal objective was to maintain the cohesion of the "family" of workers. Committees of workers participated in the management of the project. Harmel lived among the workers with his large family and was known as the "good father." He was encouraged in his endeavors by Abp. Langénieux of Reims and by Father Vincent de Paul BAILLY, Albert de Mun, and C. H. R. de LA TOUR DU PIN, early leaders of Catholic social action. His work became known throughout France and abroad, and it was blessed by Pius IX.

Harmel belonged to the ultramontanist wing of French Catholicism. After he was widowed in 1870, he renounced the idea of the priesthood only after the personal intervention of Pius IX, whose advice he had sought. His bond with Rome was further strengthened under Leo XIII and was not weakened under Pius X. In 1887 he directed the first pilgrimage of French workers to Rome; 100 employers, 1,400 workers, and 300 priests participated. In 1889, a pilgrimage of "France at work" (la France au travail), which he had prepared by lecture tours, attracted 10,000 participants. These pilgrimages helped to hasten the publication of the encyclical RERUM NOVARUM (1891), which became the charter of the movement led by Harmel.

To make the social doctrine of the Church better known, Harmel established Secrétariats du Peuple, popular lectures, and Christian circles of social studies throughout France. From 1893 on, he organized congresses of Christian workers that exemplified the growing preference given to the action of workers over the action of employers. These organizations were constitutive elements in the formation of French Christian Democracy. Harmel was one of the promoters of the movement, which explains his role at the congress of Reims in 1894, and later, first at Reims, then at Lyons, in 1896. Yet, when plans were made to make Christian Democracy a political party, he joined the national council only with reservations, as he preferred social education to politics. This was prior to the publication of the encyclical Graves de communi (1901).

Harmel felt that social education belonged to priests. After 1887, therefore, he organized at Val des Bois annual vacation sessions where seminarians and young priests met men who were involved in social action and where they received appropriate theological instruction. These sessions were forerunners of the Semaines Sociales de France instituted in 1904.

Léon Harmel belonged to the Third Order of St. Francis. As a result a large part of French Catholic social action follows Franciscan spirituality.

Bibliography: G. GUITTON, Léon Harmel, 2 v. (Paris 1907). H. ROLLET, L'Action sociale des catholiques en France, 1871–1914, 2 v. (Paris 1947–58) v.1.

[J. CARON]

HARNACK, ADOLF VON

Church historian and patrologist; b. Dorpat, Estonia, May 7, 1851; d. Heidelberg, June 10, 1930. Of a staunch Lutheran family, Harnack studied in Dorpat and Leipzig and achieved his doctorate in Church History at Leipzig with a dissertation (Habilitationsschrift) on the sources of Gnosticism. During his professorship at Leipzig (1874–79) he produced 90 publications; entered into friendly relations with E. Schürer, W. Graf Baudissin, O. v. Gebhardt, and F. Loofs; and became acquainted with the liberal theology of A. RITSCHL in reaction to the Tübingen school of F. C. BAUR with its application of the Hegelian dialectic to historical and theological studies. Unsympathetic with metaphysics, he judged the influence of Greek philosophy on early Christianity as perverse, and accepted Ritschl's moralistic interpretation of the eschatological quality in Christ's annunciation (kerygma) of the kingdom of God. He taught at Giessen (1879–86) and Marburg (1886–88) and was called to a professorship at the University of Berlin despite the opposition of the Lutheran Church Senate, which felt that his Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (3 v. Tübingen 1885–89; 4th ed. 1909) was a betrayal of early Christianity. In 1905 he became an influential member of the Berlin Academy and wrote his Geschichte der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Berlin 1900) for the 200th anniversary of that institution, thereby gaining the friendship of the kaiser and court.

An excellent organizer as well as a meticulous scholar, Harnack participated in many projects for the furtherance of science and knowledge and served as president of the Evangelical Social Congress (1903–11). His primary writings are divided between historical and doctrinal theology. His friendship with Theodore Mommsen led to the formation of the Kirchenväterkommission devoted to the edition of the Greek Fathers of the first three centuries (the Berlin Corpus or Griechischen Christliche Schriftsteller) whose foundation he laid in his edition of the Patrum Apostolicorum Opera (3 v. Leipzig 1875–77; 2d ed. 1920) with O. v. Gebhardt and T. Zahn, and in his Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur: I Überlieferung und Bestand (2 v. Leipzig 1893); II Die Chronologie (Leipzig 1897–1904; 2d ed. 1958). The last, together with O. Bardenhewer's similar work (though a dispute broke out over the title, Bardenhewer opting for Ancient Church writers) is a standard source for a critical approach to the Fathers. He likewise founded a series of publications known as the Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (ed. by O. v. Gebhardt and A. v. Harnack, 15 v. Leipzig 1882–97; Neue Folge, 15 v. 1897–1906; Dritte Reihe, ed. by A. v. Harnack and C. Schmidt, 1907–).

Harnack's Das Wesen des Christentums (Leipzig 1900) is a history of the development of Christianity, tracing its evolution from the Old Testament to the Gospels, the recession caused by doctrinal preoccupations introduced with Greek metaphysics, and finally its emancipation through Luther's rejection of dogma, and the modern return to the simplicity of the original Gospel teachings.

In his Marcion, Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott (Leipzig 1924) he demonstrates a mépris for the Old Testament, and stripping Marcion of his Gnostic leanings, describes his teaching as a kind of dualism not far removed from Luther's, but concentrating on an ethical approach to the God of goodness. J. WELLHAUSEN judged him devoid of true philological appreciation, and that would account for his distrust of comparative religion concepts. His desire to return to the simplicity of primitive Christianity made him undervalue the institutional Church, the Creed, dogma, Sacraments, miracles, and consecration rites; and he moved closer to R. Bultmann than BARTHIANISM in his final evaluation of early Christianity, adopting an almost traditional approach to the authenticity of the New Testament.

Out of his circle of students developed the influential periodical Christliche Welt, and with E. Schürer he founded and edited (1881–1930) the Theologische Literatur-Zeitung. As a scholar he resembled Erasmus rather than the German humanists, in the opinion of E. Peterson. As the most learned non-Catholic proponent of early Church history at the turn of the 19th century, he had an incalculable influence on historical scholarship; and although Catholic scholars such as P. BATIFFOL opposed his conception of early Church institutions and doctrines, in many instances his judgments and discoveries have proven a support to Catholic positions.

Bibliography: J. DE GHELLINCK, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 26 (1930) 962–991. J. DE GHELLINCK, Patristique et moyen-âge: Études d'histoire littéraire et doctrinale, v.1 (2d ed. Paris 1949), v.2, 3 (Brussels 1947–48) 3:2–102. A. VON ZAHN-HARNACK, Adolf v. Harnack (2d ed. Berlin 1951). W. VÖLKER, Theologische Zeitschrift 7 (1951) 209–227. Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme 5:516–519. E. PETERSON, Theologische Traktate (Munich 1951). A. SEITZ, “Harnack als Zeuge für die Katholische Kirche,” Die Schönere Zukunft 5 (1930) 958–959, 962–984. L. DIXON, “Adolf von Harnack,” Historians of the Christian Tradition (Nashville 1995) 389–409.

[F. X. MURPHY]

HAROLD, FRANCIS

Franciscan historian; b. Limerick, Ireland, early 17th century; d. Rome, 1685. He had five Franciscan relatives: Luke WADDING, uncle; Bonaventure Baron, cousin; and Anthony, Thomas, and Francis (junior) Harold, nephews. After having studied in St. Isidore's College, Rome (from Jan. 9, 1639), he was sent to teach in Prague (Oct. 28, 1642), Vienna, and finally Graz, whence he returned to Rome (1651) to succeed his uncle, Luke Wadding, as annalist of the order (April 12, 1655). Considerably inferior to Wadding as a historian, he collected much but published little.

Bibliography: Franciscan Library, Killiney, MSS D 1, 5, and 17. Archives, St. Isidore's College, Rome, MS W9. J. T. GILBERT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 8:1310. G. CLEARY, Father Luke Wadding and St. Isidore's College, Rome (Rome 1925) 108–112. B. MILLETT, The Irish Franciscans 1651–1665 (Rome 1964), passim., esp. 124, 127, 467–469. B. JENNINGS, “Miscellaneous Documents,” Archivium Hibernicum 14 (1949) 5, 7, 11, 12. M. O'N. WALSH, “Irish Books Printed Abroad 1475–1700,” The Irish Book 2 (1963) 16–17. J. WARE, The History and Antiquities of Ireland . . . with the History of the Writers of Ireland, ed. W. HARRIS, 2 v. in 1 (Dublin 1764) 200–201. J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo, 2 v. (Rome 1806; new ed. in 4 v. 1906–36) 3:229.

[B. MILLETT]

HAROLD, WILLIAM VINCENT

Missionary; b. Dublin, Ireland, c. 1785; d. Dublin, Jan. 29, 1856. He entered the Order of Preachers at the Corpo Santo, Lisbon, Portugal, where he was ordained, and then returned to Ireland. He later immigrated to the U.S. and went to Philadelphia, where Bp. Michael Egan named him copastor of St. Mary's Cathedral in 1808 and later, vicar-general. His unusual eloquence soon made him popular. In 1811, his uncle, Father James Harold, arrived in Philadelphia and became involved in a conflict with the bishop. When Egan attempted to transfer James to Pittsburgh, the younger Harold protested so vehemently that the bishop removed him from the vicar-generalship. The Harolds then resigned, and in April 1813, William returned to Ireland.

After Egan's death, the trustees of St. Mary's petitioned Rome that William Harold be named bishop of Philadelphia. Finally Henry Conwell was named instead. Bishop Conwell invited Harold to Philadelphia, assigned him to St. Mary's, and in 1821 appointed him vicar-general. At the time, the William HOGAN schism at St. Mary's was growing worse, and Harold successfully defended the Church's rights against the Hoganites. However, before long he began to have differences with the senile bishop, who removed him from the vicar-generalship. Harold refused to accept the removal and was suspended. The Haroldites protested to Rome that Harold's removal was a violation of a pact, but the Congregation of the Propaganda procured an order from the master general of the Dominicans transferring Harold to Cincinnati and added its own mandate. He refused to obey and, as a citizen, appealed to the U.S. government against this transfer order from his religious superior.

When James Brown, the U.S. minister to France, discussed the problem with the papal nuncio in France, the nuncio explained that Harold had willingly assumed the vow of obedience and that, in view of his vow, the Holy See had transferred his residence. This closed the case for Washington. Rome then warned Harold that if he remained in Philadelphia he would lose his faculties and be suspended. Harold temporized until he incurred the penalties. A month later he sailed for Ireland, where he was reinstated. He became once more a successful preacher and was provincial of his order from 1840 until 1844.

Bibliography: V. F. O'DANIEL, The Dominican Province of St. Joseph (New York 1942). H. J. NOLAN, The Most Reverend Francis Patrick Kenrick (Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History 37; Washington 1948).

[H. J. NOLAN]

HAROLD II, KING OF ENGLAND

Reign: January 1066 to October 1066. From his deathbed in January 1066, Edward the Confessor (r.

1042–66) designated his brother-in-law Harold Godwinson his successor. More than one man had looked covetously at the throne the childless Edward would vacate, including his cousin William, duke of Normandy, and Harold's cousin Swein Estrithson, king of Denmark. Edward's sudden choice of Harold met with immediate approval by nobles and church magnates who had gathered around the dying king for the Christmas court and dedication of the newly completed abbey church of Westminster. Harold was duly crowned the same day Edward was interred.

Despite having won Edward's designation and the court's confidence, Harold lacked a royal genealogy linking him to the ruling House of Wessex. Although English preference dictated that a successor be connected by blood to the royal family, election outside it was not without precedent, most notably, for English magnates, the Danish kings who had come to power earlier in the 11th century. Harold had the further advantage of wide support because of the vast amounts of land that he controlled in England.

Harold was well qualified to assume the reins of government. Edward's subregulus by 1065, Harold had been an earl since his first appointment to East Anglia in 1045. In 1053 Harold had taken over the administration of the key earldom of Wessex, held by his father Godwin until his death in that year. Able to count on the loyalty of two younger brothers, Gyrth and Leofwine, also earls, Harold could not be as certain of his sister Edith, Edward's widow and queen. She apparently had sided with their brother Tostig when Edward, upon Harold's advice, had removed Tostig from the earldom of Northumbria in the fall of 1065. Harold had recommended that Edward allow the Northumbrians their earl of choice, Morcar, the younger brother of Edwin, who administered Mercia. Tostig, angry and convinced that his loss of Northumbria was Harold's fault, entered exile at his father-in-law's court in Flanders.

Harold had gained a reputation as a formidable opponent in battle that complemented his administrative abilities. He had challenged the Welsh more than once, the last major campaign having occurred in 1063. The outcome brought Harold unprecedented prestige when the Welsh turned against their own King Gruffydd ap Llewelyn and presented Harold with his head to underscore their oaths of loyalty to both Edward and Harold. At some time following Gruffydd's death, Harold married Gruffydd's widow Ealdgyth, sister of Edwin and Morcar. Clearly a political marriage, it probably took place early in 1066. With his brother Tostig no longer earl in Northumbria, Harold needed to forge firm ties with the northern magnate. An alliance through marriage was a well-tried form that had been used before by several of his predecessors, including Aethelred II (r. 978–1016), Edmund Ironside (r. 1016), and Canute (r. 1016–35).

Although Harold was the patron of WALTHAM Abbey, where tradition claims he is buried, his relationship with the Church was of mixed report. As his father before him, Harold may have held some of his lands at the expense of the Church. While Domesday Book describes some of these as disputed or illegally held, without records of the competing claims, Harold's culpability is difficult to assess. He did have the support of leading churchmen including Ealdred, Archbishop of York, and Wulfstan, Bishop of Worcester. Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, also was his friend, but since Stigand's legitimacy as archbishop had been questioned, his friendship may have cost Harold as much as it gained. During a pilgrimage to Rome, probably in 1058, Harold had also earned recognition for his generosity to the church.

Those who coveted Harold's crown arrived on England's shores in the fall of 1066. Surprisingly his cousin Swein had stayed at home, but the redoubtable Viking king of Norway Harold III (r. 1045–66) had not. Accompanying him was the still angry Tostig. Harold met and defeated them at Stamford Bridge on September 20. Then, with the knowledge that William, Duke of Normandy, had landed at Hastings, Harold and his men marched across the country to meet this second invader, who, with his troops, carried a papal banner endorsing William's cause. Edwin and Morcar did not arrive in time to participate in the fateful, day-long battle between Harold and his Norman adversary that October 14. At dusk Harold lay dead on the battlefield surrounded by his fallen, loyal troops, including the faithful Gyrth and Leofwine. The very short reign of Harold was over, and William, soon to be called "the Conqueror," was crowned king at London on Christmas Day, 1066.

Bibliography: G. N. GARMONSWAY, The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (Rutland, Vt. 1992) 163–200. R. R. DARLINGTON and P. MCGURK, The Chronicle of John of Worcester (Oxford 1995) 543–607. F. BARLOW, Vita Edwardi Regis (London 1962) 5–55. H. R. LOYN, Harold, Son of Godwin (The Hastings and Bexhill Branch of the Historical Assn. 1966) 3–19. I. W. WALKER, Harold, the Last Anglo-Saxon King (Sutton, Eng. 1997).

[P. TORPIS]

HAROLD OF GLOUCESTER, ST.

Alleged martyr; d. March 17, ca. 1160–68, Gloucester, England. Harold was another young boy whose death was attributed to Jewish blood rituals. The story appears to have been handed down orally because many details of the written Peterborough and Brompton accounts are anachronistic. The boy's terribly abused body was retrieved from the Severn River and buried in Gloucester Cathedral. The cultus was permitted locally.

Feast formerly on March 25.

See Also: MEDIEVAL BOY MARTYRS.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HARRINGTON, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Mount St. John, Felixkirk, North Riding, Yorkshire, England, 1566; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Feb. 18, 1594. Inspired by St. Edmund CAMPION, whom his father had entertained in their home in 1581, William Harrington pursued seminary studies at Rheims, even though his family had conformed to Anglicanism. He continued his studies with the Jesuits at Tournai (1582–84) until he contracted a serious illness that kept him home-bound for years. He returned to Rheims in February 1591, where he was ordained before entering the English mission in midsummer 1592. His ministry was interrupted by his arrest in May 1593. After his death he was calumniated by a woman named Friswood or Fid Williams, who falsely claimed he had fathered her child before he became a priest and made many other preposterous accusations against him and other Catholics. Harrington was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves (London 1875), 104–107. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HARRIS, HOWELL

Lay preacher and a key figure in the establishment of METHODISM in Wales; b. Trevacca, Wales, Jan. 23, 1714; d. Trevacca, July 21, 1777. He was the third son of Howell and Susanna Harris. Howell, intended for the ministry, received a good education. At the death of his father in 1730 he opened a school. In 1735 he spent one term at Oxford University. Harris began to conduct worship in his mother's home and his evangelical fervor attracted large crowds. He soon was preaching as often as five times a day. As a result he was deprived of his school in 1737 because of its connection with the Anglican Church. On three occasions he was denied ordination so he had to continue his career as a lay preacher. Harris was encouraged in his work by George Whitefield and later in his life he preached in Whitefield's chapel in London. When Whitefield broke with John Wesley over the issue of predestination Harris sided with Whitefield's Calvinistic concepts. As a result Welsh Methodism was strongly tinged with this doctrine. In 1752 Harris founded a Protestant "monastery" that by 1755 contained some 120 disciples. He ministered to this group and to other families that settled in the area to be near him. Harris joined the militia in 1759 during the war with France because he feared a French invasion might bring about the establishment of Catholicism.

Bibliography: W. J. TOWNSEND et al., eds., A New History of Methodism, 2 v. (London 1909) v.1. T. REES, History of Protestant Nonconformity in Wales (2d ed. London 1883). R. J. JONES, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 9:6–7.

[A. M. SCHLEICH]

HART, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest and martyr; b. Wells, Somerset, England, 1558; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, March 15, 1583. Hart was elected Trappes Scholar at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he took his baccalaureate in June 1574. Thereafter he converted to Catholicism and followed his rector, John Bridgewater, to the seminary at Douai, then Rheims. He finished his studies at the English College, Rome, and was ordained (1581). Almost immediately he entered the English mission, where he labored in Yorkshire. He escaped the priest hunters who arrested Bl. William LACEY only by standing in the chin-high, muddy moat of York Castle. Finally he was betrayed on Christmas Day 1582. After being manacled in double irons in a verminous dungeon, he was examined by the dean of York and Council of the North. He was tried on three counts: (1) under 13 Eliz. c. 2 for bringing papal writings (his certificate of ordination) into the realm; (2) under 13 Eliz. c. 3. for traveling abroad without royal license; and (3) under 23 Eliz. c. 1. for having reconciled others to popery. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on December 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1905), II, 600–34. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HARTFORD, ARCHDIOCESE OF

The Archdiocese of Hartford (Hartfortiensis) comprises the counties of Hartford, New Haven, and Litchfield in the state of Connecticut. The area measures 2,288 square miles, and in 2001 had a Catholic population of 745, 069, about 41 percent of the general population of 1.8 million. Established as a diocese Nov. 28, 1843, and raised to an archdiocese Aug. 6, 1953, this see originally embraced the states of Connecticut and Rhode Island. It was restricted to Connecticut alone with creation of the Diocese of Providence, R.I., in 1872, and reduced again when the Dioceses of Bridgeport and Norwich were established within Connecticut in 1953. With Providence, Bridgeport, and Norwich as suffragan sees, the Province of Hartford embraces the same area as the early diocese.

Early History. The first priest known to have visited Connecticut was Gabriel Druillettes, SJ, who went to New Haven from Quebec in September 1651 to plead for the Abenaki Native Americans of Maine against the Iroquois. The earliest Catholic residents included a scattering of Irish convicts and redemptioners deported to America in the 17th and 18th centuries, and 400 Acadian exiles assigned to the colony in 1756. A further trickle of Irish and some German Catholics began to immigrate voluntarily into the state after the American Revolution. The Diocese of Boston was created in 1808 for all New England, and its first bishop, Jean Cheverus, visited the Catholic communities in Hartford and New Haven in 1823. In 1828, Benedict Fenwick, the second bishop, charged Rev. Robert D. Woodley, who resided in Providence, with care of the Catholics in Connecticut, as well as Rhode Island.

Organized church activity in Connecticut began in July 1829, when the first Catholic newspaper in New England, the Catholic Press, started weekly publication in Hartford, and the first Sunday school in the state was inaugurated in the newspaper's office. Fenwick visited Hartford in the summer of 1829 to purchase the old Christ Episcopal church and to appoint Bernard O'Cavanagh pastor in Hartford, with jurisdiction throughout Connecticut. The wooden Christ Episcopal church was moved to another site, renamed Holy Trinity, and dedicated as the first Catholic church in Connecticut on June 17, 1830. That fall the pioneer Catholic school in Connecticut, a day school staffed by laymen, opened in the church basement.

In October 1831, James FITTON became pastor in Hartford, and a year later James McDermott was made pastor in New Haven, where there were 200 Catholics, 74 more than in Hartford. In 1834, with the construction of Christ's Church in New Haven, the state had its second Catholic church and, operating in the sacristy, a second day school.

Diocese. At the Fifth Provincial Council of Baltimore, 1843, Fenwick outlined the disadvantages of having Boston the only diocese in New England. The council decided to petition Rome for a division of the diocese, and Gregory XVI established the Diocese of Hartford in 1843.

Tyler. William Tyler was ordained June 3, 1829, at the age of 23, served parishes in Maine and Massachusetts, and was vicar-general in Boston when named first bishop of Hartford. He was consecrated in Baltimore, Md., March 17, 1844, and installed in Holy Trinity, Hartford, on April 14. A census that same year showed that, with 5,180 Catholics in Rhode Island and 4,817 in Connecticut, the population of the diocese was only 2 per cent Catholic. Connecticut had three priests, and parishes in Hartford, New Haven, and Bridgeport, and a mission in Middletown. There were as many priests and churches in Rhode Island. The city of Providence, however, had two parishes with 2,000 members compared to Hartford's one parish with 600 members. Tyler therefore petitioned the Holy See for a transfer of residence and moved to Providence in June 1844. The diocese was so poor that, even there, his residence was a mere shack and his best chalice was made of brass. Within five years, the emigration from Ireland and the rapid growth of industry and railroad construction in New England doubled the Catholic population of the diocese.

O'Reilly. Tyler died June 18, 1849, and was succeeded by Bernard O'Reilly, vicar-general of the Diocese of Buffalo, who was consecrated bishop of Hartford on Nov. 10, 1850. At that time, there were seven priests serving parishes in Hartford, New Haven, Bridgeport, Waterbury, and Norwalk, and numerous missions in Connecticut. Litchfield County was given its first pastor in 1850 when O'Reilly appointed Christopher Moore to Falls Village. The bishop brought the Sisters of Mercy from Pittsburgh to Providence in 1851, and then in 1852, to Connecticut. Four sisters arrived in Hartford on May 11 to staff the school in the basement of St. Patrick's Church (Holy Trinity had been rebuilt and renamed in 1851), and four others traveled to New Haven, May 12, to teach at St. Mary's Church. A girls' academy was soon opened by each group and, eventually, an orphan asylum. Late in 1855, O'Reilly went to Ireland to recruit teaching brothers for the diocese; on Jan. 23, 1856, he set sail for the U.S. on the S.S. "Pacific" out of Liverpool. The ship was lost at sea. For two years William O'Reilly, vicar-general and brother of the late bishop, administered the diocese.

McFarland. Francis Patrick McFarland, pastor of St. John's Church in Utica, N.Y., was named third bishop of Hartford on Jan. 8, 1858, and consecrated in Providence, R.I., on March 14, the first bishop consecrated in New England. During his 16-year episcopate, Hartford experienced an industrial expansion that attracted a constant influx of workers. McFarland arranged for the second community of nuns to enter Connecticut in June 1864, when he brought the Sisters of Charity from Mt. St. Vincent, New York City, to take over the orphan asylum in New Haven. The next year he appointed the Order of Friars Minor, the first religious order of men in the state, to St. Joseph's Church, Winsted. In 1868 the first national parish in Connecticut, St. Boniface, was organized for the Germans of New Haven.

The Diocese of Providence was established in February 1872, with a Catholic population of about 60,000. Connecticut alone had 140,000 Catholics (representing about 23 per cent of its population), 76 churches, 60 chapels and mission stations, and 77 priests. McFarland transferred residence from Providence to Hartford and, upon his arrival, created St. Joseph cathedral parish from the western half of the two parishes in Hartford. A home-stead was purchased on Farmington Avenue, and a brownstone and brick convent was consecrated there in 1873 as the Connecticut motherhouse for the Sisters of Mercy. Its chapel was used temporarily as a procathedral. McFarland died on Oct. 12, 1874.

Galberry. Thomas GALBERRY, first provincial of the Augustinians in the U.S., was named fourth bishop of Hartford on Feb. 12, 1875, and was consecrated March 19, 1876, in St. Peter's Church, Hartford. In April 1876 he established the Connecticut Catholic, a weekly paper that was taken over by the diocese in 1896. Renamed the Catholic Transcript in 1898, it continued to serve the dioceses of Connecticut. Galberry laid the cornerstone of St. Joseph Cathedral on April 29, 1877.

McMahon. Galberry died on Oct. 10, 1878, and was succeeded by Lawrence Stephen McMahon, first vicar-general of the Providence Diocese, who was consecrated bishop of Hartford in St. Joseph's Cathedral basement on Aug. 10, 1879. During his episcopacy, Polish, Lithuanian, Italian, and French-Canadian immigrants swelled the number of Catholics in the state, and among the 48 parishes he created were 13 national parishes and chapels. A second religious order of men entered the diocese in 1886 when the Dominican Fathers took over St. Mary's parish, New Haven. In 15 years of effort, the bishop raised $500,000 for the completion of St. Joseph Cathedral, which, built of local Portland brownstone along French Gothic lines, was dedicated, debt free, on May 8, 1892. McMahon died suddenly at Lakeville, Conn., on Aug. 21, 1893. It was in Bishop McMahon's time that the Reverend Michael McGivney founded the KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS, in New Haven in 1882.

Tierney. Michael Tierney, the sixth bishop of Hartford, was ordained May 26, 1866, in Troy, N.Y. He served as McFarland's chancellor and rector of the cathedral at Providence and held pastorates at Norwich, New London, Stamford, Hartford, and New Britain. He was consecrated in St. Joseph Cathedral on Feb. 22, 1894, the first priest of the Hartford Diocese to become its bishop. During his 14-year episcopate, Catholics in the diocese increased from 250,000 to 395,000; parishes from 98 to 167; schools from 48 to 80. Tierney opened St. Thomas Minor Seminary in 1897, with 15 boarding and 22 day students. St. Francis Hospital, Hartford, was founded in 1897 and within 10 years other hospitals were built in Waterbury, Bridgeport, Willimantic, and New Haven. St. Andrew's Home, New Haven, was opened by the Little Sisters of the Poor in 1901, the House of the Good Shepherd was established in Hartford in 1902, and St. John's Industrial Home for Boys was opened in 1904. Tierney also organized the Connecticut Apostolate, a group of diocesan priests who conducted missions for both Catholics and non-Catholics. The bishop's death on Oct. 5, 1908, was followed by a long interregnum, during which John Synott, vicar-general and rector of St. Thomas Seminary, acted as administrator.

Nilan. John Joseph Nilan, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Amesbury, Mass., was named seventh bishop on Feb. 14, 1910, and consecrated April 28 in Hartford. Nilan strengthened, expanded, and further organized the charitable efforts begun by his predecessor. St. Agnes Infant and Maternity Hospital was founded in West Hartford in 1914. The diocesan bureau of social service, which had begun as a small scale charities office in Bridgeport in 1916, was put on a state-wide basis in 1920. The Connecticut branch of the Council of Catholic Women was organized. During the Depression of 1929, at his own expense, Nilan maintained a house on the cathedral property caring for as many as 80 unemployed men at a time. The first Catholic college for women in the state, ALBERTUS MAGNUS, was opened by the Dominican Sisters at New Haven in 1925. In 1930, a new St. Thomas Seminary was constructed in Bloomfield.

McAuliffe. Nilan died April 13, 1934, and was succeeded by his auxiliary, Maurice Francis McAuliffe, who had been consecrated in 1926 and was installed as Hartford's eighth bishop on May 29, 1934. His major project was renovation of St. Joseph's Cathedral where the foundations needed replacing. A second college for women, ST. JOSEPH's, which opened in Hartford in 1932, was moved to West Hartford in 1936. The Diocesan Labor Institute was founded to foster Christian social principles; two interracial centers, to promote the work of the Church among Black Americans, were opened—Blessed Martin Center, New Haven, in 1942, and St. Benedict Center, Hartford, in 1944. During World War II, McAuliffe was the first American bishop to provide Mass in a war plant for the convenience of its workers when he approved the plan for Colt's Fire Arms, Hartford.

Archdiocese. O'Brien. Henry Joseph O'Brien was consecrated auxiliary bishop of Hartford on May 15, 1940, and installed as ninth bishop on June 5, 1945, following McAuliffe's death on Dec. 15, 1944. O'Brien immediately set up a diocesan resettlement committee to assist individuals displaced by World War II. In the years immediately following the war, Hartford grew numerically to become the second largest diocese (after Brooklyn, N.Y.) in the U.S. On Aug. 6, 1953, the Dioceses of Bridgeport and Norwich were created and Hartford was made an archdiocese and O'Brien the first archbishop. The old St. Joseph Cathedral was destroyed by fire of unknown origin on Dec. 31, 1956; a new one was begun at the same location on Sept. 8, 1958, and completed in 1962. The archdiocese held its first synod in 1959 (previous diocesan synods had been held previously in 1854, 1878, and 1886), but it was soon overtaken by the Second Vatican Council. Archbishop O'Brien had attended the sessions of Vatican II, and after the Council took initial steps to implement its directives in the archdiocese, but it was left to his successor to deal with change in the Church during the 1970s and 1980s. O'Brien resigned in November 1970 and was given the title "Former Archbishop of Hartford." (He died July 23, 1976.)

Whealon. O'Brien's successor was the bishop of Erie, Pa., John F. Whealon, who had previously served as the seminary rector and appointed auxiliary bishop in Cleveland in 1961. He attended the session of the Second Vatican Council. In his 22 years (1969–1991) as Archbishop of Hartford, Whealon inaugurated, and more often than not, took a hands-on approach to a variety of pastoral programs like the formation programs of permanent deacons, parish renewal, team, ministry involving laity, and the cause of social justice. He was one of the first U.S. bishops to support a ministry to individuals with AIDS. Active in the Christian Conference of Connecticut, the state council of churches, Archbishop Whealon gained a reputation for his ecumenical interest and activities.

Whealon had an indefatigable capacity for and willingness to work that brought him a number of assignments from the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. He chaired the NCCB committee that produced (and is reputed to be the principal author of) the document Basic Teachings for Catholic Religious Education in 1972. In 1977 when John Cardinal Deardon's health did not permit him to journey to Rome for the Assembly of the Synod of Bishops on "Catechesis in Our Time," Archbishop Whealon replaced him in the American delegation. It was at this time that Whealon was deeply involved in the production of the National Catechetical Directory Sharing the Light of Faith. He both chaired the USCC's ad hoc committee of Policy and Review that had oversight for the project and acted as liaison with working committee that compiled it. The respect that Whealon enjoyed from his fellow bishops and the visibility he had because of his work especially in religious education, made Hartford the focus of national attention. Archbishop Whealon died on Aug. 2, 1991 of cardiac arrest during a routine surgical procedure.

Cronin. In January 1992, Most Reverend Daniel A. Cronin who had been Bishop of Fall River, Mass., since 1970, was installed as the third Archbishop of Hartford. To meet the pastoral needs of the archdiocese whose population is predominantly urban and suburban population, Cronin maintained an Office for Urban Affairs and other offices and agencies for specialized ministries. He created the Office for Hispanic Evangelization under the direction of Auxiliary Bishop Peter A. Rosazza to work with the burgeoning numbers of Spanish speaking Catholics, especially the Puerto Ricans in and around Hartford, Waterbury, Meriden, and New Haven.

Catholic colleges in the archdiocese include Mt. Sacred Heart College, Hamden (sponsored by the Sisters of Community of Apostles of the Sacred Heart of Jesus), Albertus Magnus College, New Haven (sponsored by the Dominican Sisters) and Saint Joseph College, Hartford (sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy). Of these three, Saint Joseph College remains principally a college for women, with a very small population of male students in its weekend coeducational college for working adults and its graduate school. Albertus Magnus College was originally founded as a women's college in 1925, before going coeducational in 1985.

Bibliography: T. S. DUGGAN, Catholic Church in Connecticut (New York 1930). A. J. HEFFERNAN, History of Catholic Education in Connecticut (Washington 1935). A. F. MUNICH, Beginnings of Roman Catholic Church in Connecticut (New Haven 1935). B. L. MARTHALER, John Francis Whealon (1921–1991): In Memoriam, The Living Light, 28:2 (Winter 1992):180–182.

[M. J. SCHOLSKY/EDS.]

HARTLEY, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. c. 1557, Wilne (or Wyn), Derbyshire, England; hanged at Shoreditch, Oct. 5, 1588. Having completed his studies at St. John's College, Oxford, the well-born Hartley became the college's Protestant chaplain. Expelled following his conversion to Catholicism (1579) by Vice Chancellor Tobie Mathew, Hartley fled to Rheims on the Continent. He was ordained priest at Châlons (1580), then returned to England, where he assisted Jesuit Frs. Edmund CAMPION and Robert PERSONS in printing and distributing their books. He was arrested Aug. 13, 1581, and sent to Marshalsea Prison, London. There he was discovered saying Mass and was placed in irons (Dec. 5, 1583). Although he was indicted for high treason on Feb. 7, 1584, he was never brought to trial. Instead he was sent into exile the following January. After time for recuperation in Rheims, he made a pilgrimage to Rome then returned to the English mission. He was arrested in Holborn (London) in September 1588 and executed the following month together with Bl. Fr. John HEWETT, son of a York draper; Bl. Robert Sutton, a tutor or schoolmaster in Paternoster Row, London; and John Harrison, alias Symons, who had carried letters between the priests. Harrison, unjustly accused of being a spy, has been dropped from the rolls of English martyrs in part because of confusion with Matthias or James Harrison, priests, who suffered martyrdom in 1599 or 1602 respectively. Hartley was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: T. W. BALDWIN, William Shakespeare Adapts a Hanging (Princeton 1931) R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891), 272.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HARTMANN, ANASTASIUS, VEN.

Baptized Alois; bishop, missionary to India; b. Altwis, Lucerne canton, Switzerland, Feb. 20, 1803; d. Patna, Bihar, India, April 24, 1866. He joined the Capuchins at Baden, Germany (1821) and was ordained in 1825. After acting as novice master and teaching philosophy and theology in Switzerland and Rome, he left for India as a missionary, arriving at Agra in 1844. Appointed first vicar apostolic of Patna (1845), he was active in securing additional missionaries and building new schools in Patna and in the Bombay vicariate, to which he was transferred (1849). After obtaining approval for dividing the vicariate by the separation of Poona from Bombay (1854), Hartmann returned to Rome as an adviser on India to the Congregation of Propaganda (1856–58). Having helped to establish the first Capuchin foundation in the U.S. in 1857, he served as the Roman director of Capuchin missions (1858–60). He returned to Patna as vicar apostolic (1860) and helped to promote Church expansion by building new churches and orphanages. In 1865 he successfully sought exemption for Catholics from the Christian Marriage Act. Hartmann's writings included a Hindustani catechism (1853) and New Testament (1864), and two works on pastoral psychology (1907, 1932). The cause for his beatification was introduced in 1906. He was declared venerable on Dec. 21, 1998.

Bibliography: R. STREIT and J. DINDINGER, Bibliotheca missionum (Freiburg 1916) 8:134–139. A. JANN, Monumenta Anastasiana, 5 v. (Lucerne 1939–48); Die Autobiographie des A. Hartmann (Ingenbohl 1917). W. BÜHLMANN, Pionier der Einheit: Bischof Anastasius Hartmann (Zürich 1966). E. EBERLE, Anastasius Hartmann: ein grosser Missionsbischof aus dem Kapuzinerorden (9th ed., Freiburg, Switz. 1974). FULGENTIUS OF CAMUGNANO, Bishop Hartmann (Allahabad, India 1946; rev. ed 1966). L. FÄH, "Die Bibelübersetzungs-Arbeit von Bischof A. Hartmann 1803–66," Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 20 (1964) 1–9. Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 724–726. J. H. GENSE, The Church at the Gateway of India, 1720–1960 (Bombay 1960).

[E. R. HAMBYE/EDS.]

HARTMANN, EDUARD VON

German philosopher; b. Berlin, Feb. 23, 1842; d. Gros-Lichterfelde (Berlin), June 5, 1906. The son of an army officer, Hartmann himself had a brief military career before retiring and devoting his energies to philosophy. From G. W. F. HEGEL he took the view that a rational idea runs through creation; from A. SCHOPENHAUER he adopted the notion that a blind, irrational will rules the world, forming it into an existent reality. His resulting philosophy is a curious combination of OPTIMISM and PESSIMISM.

From his first work, Philosophie des Unbewussten (Berlin 1869), Hartmann was known as the philosopher of the unconscious. In his systematic treatise, System der Philosophie im Grundriss (8 v. Bad Sachsa 1906–09), he adopted an inductive metaphysics based on the thought of G. T. Fehner. Hartmann opposed E. Haeckel and his naturalism, and, in general, rejected mechanical explanations of the world; he himself inclined toward VITALISM. He discussed modern science in his Weltanschauung der modernen Physik (Leipzig 1902) and wrote a worthwhile history of metaphysics, Geschichte der Metaphysik (2 v. Leipzig 1899–1900). Equally significant was his Kategorienlehre (Leipzig 1896), which influenced the Neo-Kantian theory of the categories.

In his philosophy of religion Hartmann was an adversary of Christianity, substituting for it a teaching that was decidedly monistic and pantheistic. He made known his views in a series of works published under the general title of Religionsphilosophie, among which the more important are Das Krisis des Christentums in der modernen

Theologie (Berlin 1880), Das religiöse Bewusstsein der Menschheit (Berlin 1882), and Die Religion des Geistes (Berlin 1882). These give clear indication of the practical impossibility of constructing a religious philosophy without belief in a personal God.

Bibliography: E. DI CARLO, Enciclopedia filosofica 2:980–981. H. WACKERZAPP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 5:20. F. J. VON RINTELEN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3 3:82–83. P. SIWEK, The Philosophy of Evil (New York 1951); “Pessimism in Philosophy,” New Scholasticism (1948) 249–297.

[H. MEYER]

HARTMANN, NICOLAI

German philosopher; b. Riga, Feb. 20, 1882; d. Göttingen, Oct. 9, 1950. The principal features of his philosophy include a “critical ontology,” an ethics of material values, and a study of man as creative spirit (demiurge) with Godlike prerogatives. Hartmann moved from the methodological formalism of the Marburg School to a concern, similar to that of PHENOMENOLOGY, with “things themselves.” Unlike the phenomenologists, however, he recognized that man’s natural consciousness, which he “critically” verified through its experience of opposition, was fixed on the real world. Yet, influenced by E. HUSSERL and M. SCHELER, he retained an ideal world and regarded man as a mediator between the spheres of the real and the ideal.

Critical Ontology. In his “critical ontology,” Hartmann held that knowledge does not engender the object but is the comprehension of being-in-itself (Ansichseienden). Real being (nature) is beyond consciousness in the in-itself (An-sich) and is wholly indifferent to being known. The bridging of the two establishes the “fundamental categorial relation” by which a partial identity, at least, is established between the categories of knowledge and those of being; this makes possible the grasping of the An-sich. Knowledge and being are not comprehended in a common logos, as in the old ontology. Spirit is something in being, the highest level of being, though it is also imbedded in the “homogeneous” mass of being. Hartmann’s “new ontology” lays claim to being critical in that it does not rely on a transcendental insight but is directed to the physical concrete object alone. In the structuring of the real world into levels, one resting on the other but with the higher not derivable from the lower, lies both the strength and the weakness of his physical ontology, which may more properly be termed “ontics.” The place that being occupies in the old ontology is taken in critical ontology by the connectedness of things existing in the world.

Ethics. Hartmann’s ethics is full of insight into moral values. The domain of values has an ideal Ansich- sein. For this, man requires a moral faculty, a value sense (Wertgefühl). In ethical matters values must be introduced into the real world through volition. But how can values reach into real individual wills? This question is the experimentum crucis of Hartmann’s ethics. Values are autonomous and unconditional, and the human will has itself an autonomous and absolute freedom. The will has no connaturality for values but is merely an organ for their attainment. Thus, at least in the case of a conflict of values, it can rule effectively against moral values. In this way the unity of morality is disturbed. Nevertheless Hartmann did not undermine the fact that man is by right a moral being or person. As he put it, the solution of this difficulty can be resolved only by answering the question as to the ultimate source of moral being. This, however, is a metaphysical problem and as such is as insoluble as the question of the origin of the world. Hartmann was cognizant of the fundamental metaphysical problems. Yet he so blocked himself off from any solution to them that he displaced value, as he did real being, to the level of An-sich, to which neither the person nor the knowing subject is ordered in the interior of his being. The grounding of person and values and of knowledge and being on a common basis would be to point directly to a personal Creator. Hartmann denied himself this view because of the so-called critical boundaries within the world man is able to experience. In his view, the world is, in ultimate analysis, “absolutely accidental.”

God’s Prerogatives. “In man, the world closes into a unity,” for man brings together being and value and so establishes a creative sense in the course of history. To look for meaning in being itself is to have recourse to an anthropomorphic subjectivism. Hartmann was a radical opponent of those who saw an indissoluble unity in the concepts of being and meaning (e.g., the lumen naturale of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and the Seinsverständnis of M. HEIDEGGER). The determination of meaning in absolute freedom is man’s privilege. If God existed, man would be neither free nor a moral being (postulational atheism). “To man falls the metaphysical heritage of God.”

For Hartmann, systems disappear and problems alone live on in history. He distinguished, however, between problems that are neutral and independent of one’s particular viewpoint and those that are not. The problem of religion is of the latter type: this no longer lives on—it disappears with time. Although the question of religion continues to cry out against disposal, for Hartmann it does not exist as a true problem.

Hartmann’s so-called OBJECTIVITY is oriented toward the natural sciences, and indeed is taken over from them. His theory of the categories in his physical ontics is of value. Philosophy itself, however, can never be restricted merely to categorial analysis.

Bibliography: Works. Grundzüge einer Metaphysik der Erkenntnis (4th ed. Berlin 1949); Das Problem des geistigen Seins (Berlin 1949); Ethik (Berlin 1949); Zur Grundlegung der Ontologie (Meisenheim 1948); Möglichkeit und Wirklichkeit (Meisenheim 1949); Der Aufbau der realen Welt (Meisenheim 1949); Philosophie der Natur (Berlin 1950); Teleologisches Denken (Berlin 1951); The New Ways of Ontology, tr. R. C. KUHN (Chicago 1952). Literature. Nicolai Hartmann: Der Denker und sein Werk, ed. H. HEIMSOETH and R. HEISS (Göttingen 1952). A. GUGGENBERGER, Der Menschegeist und das Sein (Munich 1942). J. N. MOHANTY, Nicolai Hartmann and Alfred North Whitehead (Calcutta 1957). H. HÜLSMANN, Die Methode in der Philosophie Nicolai Hartmanns (Düsseldorf 1959). H. BECK, Möglichkeit und Notwendigkeit (Pulach 1961). H. M. BAUMGARTNER, Die Unbedingtheit des Sittlichen: Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Nicolai Hartmann (Munich 1962). G. M. MEYER, Modalanalyse und Determinationsproblem (Meisenheim 1962). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy, tr. D. NICHOLL and K. ASCHENBRENNER (Berkeley 1956). J. SCHMITZ, Disput über des teleologische Denken (Mainz 1960).

[A. GUGGENBERGER]

HARTMANN OF BRIXEN, BL.

Abbot and bishop; b. Polling, near Passau, Germany, c. 1090; d. Brixen (Bressanone), Italy, Dec. 23, 1164. Hartmann was educated in Sankt Nikola in Passau, the first AUGUSTINIAN settlement in that area and an important center of reform. When Abp. Conrad of Salzburg decided in 1122 to reform his cathedral clergy according to the Rule of St. AUGUSTINE, he chose Hartmann to lead the new community. In 1128 Hartmann became prior of the Augustinian house at Herren-Chiemsee, also reformed by Conrad, and in 1133 Margrave LEOPOLD III OF AUSTRIA called him to head the new Augustinian community of KLOSTERNEUBURG. Because of his apostolic zeal and saintly life, he was made bishop of Brixen in 1140 or 1141. To renew the spiritual life in his diocese he founded an Augustinian priory at Neustift near Brixen in 1142 and obtained an imperial privilege for it in 1157. Although he always remained loyal to Pope ALEXANDER III and to his metropolitan, Eberhard of Salzburg, FREDERIC I BARBAROSSA respected him for his learning and sanctity. Since 1784 his veneration is permitted in the Diocese of Brixen.

Feast: Dec. 23.

Bibliography: J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 12:621–622. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:601–602. A. SPARBER, Leben und Wirken des seligen Hartmann, Bischofs von Brixen, 1140–1164 (Klosterneuburg 1957); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:19.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

HARTSHORNE, CHARLES

Philosopher, b. June 5, 1897, Kittanning, Pennsylvania; d. October 6, 2000. The son of an Episcopalian minister, Hartshorne left college to serve in the Army Medical Corps in the First World War. After the war, he entered Harvard University, from which he received a Ph.D. in philosophy. He pursued postdoctoral work as a Sheldon Fellow in Germany, with stints in England and Austria, before returning to Harvard in 1925 as instructor and research fellow. At Harvard, he was a teaching assistant to A. N. WHITEHEAD, who exercised enormous influence on his thinking. He edited (with Paul Weiss) the Pierce papers. In 1928, he left Harvard for the University of Chicago where he taught for 27 years. During this time he met and married Dorothy Cooper, with whom he had one daughter. He left Chicago for Emory University in 1955, and upon retirement at the age 65, went to the University of Texas at Austin as Ashbel Smith Professor of Philosophy, becoming emeritus in 1978. He authored more than 20 books and some 500 articles. He is regarded with Whitehead as the foremost representative of PROCESS PHILOSOPHY. Also an accomplished and noted ornithologist, with a specialty in bird songs, he wrote Born to Sing: An Interpretation and World Survey of Bird Song, and several articles. He also wrote an intellectual autobiography, From Darkness to the Light, which provides useful background to the development of his philosophy and anecdotes connected with his career. He published his last book, The Zero Fallacy and Other Essays in Neoclassical Metaphysics at the age of 100.

In a philosophical era that was dominated by an anti-metaphysical and to some extent antireligious attitude, Hartshorne persisted in developing, in dialogue with classical theism, his “neoclassical metaphysics” which is thoroughly theistic and is most systematically presented in Creative Synthesis and Philosophic Method. His effort was to apply logical thinking to religious insights, develop them in dialogue with other philosophical traditions, and systematize them into a coherent and adequate metaphysical system. The result was a major contribution to metaphysics and to philosophical and theological thinking about God. Acknowledging the criticisms of metaphysics made by HUME and the positivists, Hartshorne grounded his metaphysical system in concrete experience, which he regarded as both the departure point and the yardstick for any abstract metaphysical scheme. Developments in contemporary physics also informed his metaphysical thinking. Using modal logic, Hartshorne developed a new version of the ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT for the existence of God, set out mainly in The Logic of Perfection and in Anselm's Discovery. His argument was not intended to produce an actual proof, but rather to reduce the alternatives to atheism or theism.

Insisting that the classical theistic conception of God as absolute and immutable does not do justice to religious claims to a personal God and to the philosophical demand for consistency and adequacy, Hartshorne developed the concept of a dipolar God, particularly in Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism, The Divine Relativity, and A Natural Theology for Our Time. He conceived God as having a concrete pole and an abstract pole. In the abstract pole, God has all the attributes applied by classical theism: absolute, infinite, eternal, immutable, etc.; in the concrete pole, God is said to be relative, finite, temporal, mutable, etc. The predication of these pairs of contrary predicates hinges on the law of polarity, which Hartshorne borrows from Morris Cohen: contraries can be predicated of the same reality at the same time but under different aspects. It is also dependent on a crucial distinction that Hartshorne makes in his metaphysical system between concrete actuality (how something exists) and abstract existence (that something is). Concrete actuality is the more inclusive category; hence, the relationship between the two categories is asymmetrical. The concept of a dipolar God is also premised on the claim that God is not an exception to, but an unrivaled exemplification of, metaphysical categories.

Bibliography: L. E. HAHN, ed., The Philosophy of Charles Hartshorne (La Salle, Ill. 1991). S. SIA, ed., Charles Hartshorne's Concept of God: Philosophical and Theological Responses (Boston 1990). S. SIA, God in Process Thought: A Study in Charles Hartshorne's Concept of God (Boston 1985). J. COBB and F. GAMWELL, eds., Existence and Actuality: Conversations with Charles Hartshorne (Chicago 1984). E. PETERS, Hartshorne and Neoclassical Metaphysics: An Interpretation (Lincoln 1970).

[S. SIA]

HARTWICH OF SALZBURG, BL.

Archbishop; b. c. 955; d. Dec. 5, 1023. The last member of the Aribo-Sponheim family, he was archbishop of Salzburg, 991–1023. His nephew ALBUIN became bishop of Säben-Brixen. Recognizing the abundant charity of Hartwich, OTTO III gave him the rights of market and coinage (996), and from the Emperor HENRY II, Hartwich received large grants of property. Hartwich renovated the cathedral school and a great number of monasteries. He has been venerated as blessed since the 13th century. When the cathedral of Salzburg was destroyed by fire (1598), his remains were lost.

Feast: June 14.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 3:11–20. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptorum 11:95–97. Salzburger Urkundenbuch, ed. W. K. HAUTHALER and F. MARTIN, 4 v. (Salzburg 1910–33) 1:188–209; 2:113–129, codex Hartwici. P. KARNER, Austria sancta: Die Heiligen und Seligen Salzburgs (Vienna 1913). J. WODKA, Kir- che in Österreich (Vienna 1959). J. OSWALD, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 5:22.

[V. H. REDLICH]

HARTY, JEREMIAH JAMES

Archbishop; b. St. Louis, Mo., Nov. 5, 1853; d. Los Angeles, Calif., Oct. 29, 1927. He was the son of Andrew and Julia (Murphy) Harty, Irish immigrants. Educated at St. Bridget's Parochial School, St. Louis University, and St. Vincent's Seminary, Cape Girardeau, Mo., he was ordained on April 28, 1878. After he had devoted 25 years to pastoral duties in the St. Louis archdiocese, his name was proposed for auxiliary bishop by Abp. John J. Kain, and in 1902 he was appointed temporary administrator of the archdiocese pending appointment of a coadjutor. In June 1903 he was elected to the Metropolitan See of Manila, Philippine Islands, and was consecrated by Cardinal Francesco SATOLLI in the Church of St. Anthony, Rome, Aug. 15, 1903, although consistorial promotion came only on November 9. En route to Manila, Harty visited Pres. Theodore Roosevelt, who gave assurances of friendly governmental assistance.

Harty took possession of the See of Manila on Jan. 16, 1904. Two of his American suffragans, Bishops Dennis DOUGHERTY and Frederick Rooker, preceded him, while Bp. Thomas A. Hendrick followed shortly afterward. At this time, Church unity was endangered by the Aglipayan schism; Protestant proselytizing was bitterly aggressive; antifriar sentiments divided the faithful; and the native clergy were too few and too badly educated to combat all these attacks. Financial problems arising from change of sovereignty and abolition of the patronato privileges further complicated administration. Hospitals administered jointly by the Spanish government and the Church were claimed by the new government; friars' estates were under attack by nationalists; and Church properties seized by schismatics were recovered only through expensive lawsuits. In facing these problems, Harty was handicapped by his ignorance of Spanish and native languages, by misunderstandings with government officials and higher clergy, and especially by the sudden death of the Apostolic Delegate, Abp. John B. Guidi, shortly after calling the first Provincial Council of the Philippines. Nevertheless, Harty reorganized seminaries, rebuilt churches and schools, fought to recover Church property, and stemmed the tide of Aglipayanism before ill-health necessitated his transfer to America as archbishop-bishop of Omaha, Nebr., in May 1916. Installed in Omaha on Dec. 17, 1916, Harty found a diocese that still lacked many agencies incorporated elsewhere. He, therefore, erected 13 parishes and 9 parochial schools; established the first diocesan school board; organized CATHOLIC CHARITIES, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC WOMEN, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC MEN, and Society for the Propagation of the Faith; aided Father FLANAGAN with Boys Town; and planned a diocesan seminary. In 1925 continuous illness forced him to leave the diocese, and Bp. Francis J. L. Beckman was appointed diocesan administrator on Nov. 5, 1925.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of St. Louis. Archives, Archdiocese of Omaha. National Archives, Washington, D.C.

[M. D. CLIFFORD]

HARVEY NEDELLEC (HERVAEUS NATALIS)

Dominican theologian and philosopher, referred to as Doctor rarus; b. Brittany, c. 1250–60; d. Narbonne, c. Aug. 7, 1323. He entered the Order of Preachers in the diocese of Tréguier in 1276. Nothing further is known of him until 1301, when he is listed among those present at the Dominican provincial chapter at Rouen. He was at Saint-Jacques in 1303 and supported King Philip the Fair against Boniface VIII. It is probable that Harvey read the Sentences of Peter Lombard at Paris in 1301–02 or 1302–03. He became master of theology in 1307 and occupied one of the magistral chairs at Saint-Jacques until his election as provincial of France, Sept. 17, 1309. On June 10, 1318, he was elected master general of the order at the general chapter in Lyon. During his generalate Harvey worked extensively on behalf of the canonization of THOMAS AQUINAS. His efforts were crowned with success on July 18, 1323, but Harvey was not himself present. On his way from Barcelona to the ceremonies at Avignon he fell sick at the Dominican convent in Narbonne and died there.

Harvey's literary output was not inconsiderable, either in quantity or in breadth of interest. He wrote Quaestiones super sententias (Venice 1505; Paris 1647), Quaestiones disputatae (Venice 1513), and various Quodlibets. Although the Venice edition (1513) of his Quodlibets contains 11 of these disputes, only Quodlibets 1–4 appear to be authentic. His philosophical works include In 1 perihermeneias, Quaestiones de praedicamentis, De cognitione primi principii, and De secundis intentionibus (Paris 1489; Venice 1513). He was an almost indefatigable controversialist and polemicist. He was head of a commission appointed to examine the writings of DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN, which found 91 objectionable propositions. He attacked JAMES OF METZ in Correctorium fr. Jacobi and PETER AUREOLI and directed a long series of treatises against HENRY OF GHENT.

Although Harvey had a wide acquaintance with the works of St. Thomas Aquinas and wrote a valuable Defensio doctrinae fr. Thomae, he sometimes adopted positions incompatible with the Thomistic metaphysics of being. In particular, he rejected Aquinas's position on the interrelationship between ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE (esse) in creatures. Yet, though Harvey's philosophy may seem more eclectic than Thomistic, he considered himself an ardent follower of Aquinas. And, in this regard, it was the canonization of Thomas, in which Harvey played a major role, that assured the continued influence of Aquinas in the intellectual life of Christendom. (See THOMISM.)

Bibliography: É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 747–748. P. GLORIEUX, La Littérature quodlibétique, v.1 (Kain 1925), v.2 (Paris 1935) 1:200–208; 2:138–139. B. HARÉAU, "Hervé Nédélec: Général des Frères Prêcheurs," Histoire littéraire de la France 34 (1915) 308–351. C. O. VOLLERT, The Doctrine of Hervaeus Natalis on Primitive Justice and Original Sin (Analecta Gregoriana 42; 1947). E. ALLEN, "Hervaeus Natalis: An Early 'Thomist' on the Notion of Being," Mediaeval Studies 22 (1960) 1–14. A. DE GUIMARÃES, "Hervé Noël (1323): Étude biographique," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 8 (1938) 5–81. E. A. LOWE, The Dominican Order and the Theological Authority of Thomas Aquinas in the Early Fourteenth Century: The Controversies between Hervaeus Natalis and Durandus of St. Pourcain (Ph.D. diss., Fordham University, 1999).

[E. B. ALLEN]

HASIDAEANS

Also known as Asidaeans, members of a religious group among the Jews about the middle of the second century B.C. Described in 1 Mc 2.42 as "the stoutest of Israel, every one that had a good will for the law," the Hasidaeans took their name from the Hebrew word hāsīd, plural hāsīdīm (Aramaic, hāsīdayyā; Gr., Ἀσιδαῖοι), meaning pious. Having been among the first to join with Judas Maccabee in his guerrilla warfare against the Syrian armies of ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES in 166 B.C., the Hasidaeans were still fighting in the time of Demetrius I in 161 B.C., when they were accused to Demetrius by Alcimus, a Hellenistic HIGH PRIEST, of being seditious (2 Mc 14.6). The passage in 1 Mc 1.14, in which they are represented as favorable to Alcimus because he was "a priest of the seed of Aaron," indicates that they were supporters of the legitimate priesthood and were interested in religious rather than political ends. Thus, when the illegitimate high priests, Jason and Menelaus, had been disposed of and Alcimus had been recognized as high priest, the Hasidaeans were ready to make peace. However, they were betrayed by Alcimus and Bacchides, the Syrian commander of Demetrius I (1 Mc 7.15–16), and they may have rejoined Judas to continue the struggle.

Little is known about the Hasidaeans after the time of Judas Maccabee, but it seems that the ESSENES and the PHARISEES continued in different ways the original Hasidaean movement of early Maccabean times. The Essenes, or at least the group of them that formed the QUMRAN COMMUNITY, remaining loyal to the old Sadocite (Zadokite) line of high priests, probably left the main stream of Jewish life after 140 B.C. when Simon Maccabee took for himself and his HASMONAEAN successors the title of high priest (1 Mc 14.41–47). The Pharisees, on the other hand, continued the main line of the Hasidaean movement, opposing all compromise with Hellenism and insisting on a punctilious observance of the Law. The Jewish religious movement of the 18th and 19th centuries called HASIDISM has nothing in common with the Hasidaeans except the name.

See Also: MACCABEES, BOOKS OF THE; MACCABEES, HISTORY OF THE.

Bibliography: M. SCHLOESSINGER, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 6:250–251. D. B. EERDMANS, “The Chasidim,” Oudtestamentische Studiën 1 (1942) 176–257. M. J. LAGRANGE, Le Judaïsme avant Jésus-Christ (Études bibliques; 1931). F. M. CROSS, JR., The Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies (Garden City, N.Y. 1958) 98–107.

[P. F. ELLIS]

HASIDISM

A large movement of inner renewal that arose in the 18th century among the poverty-stricken Jews of eastern and southeastern Poland. Hasidism was founded by Rabbi ben Eliezer (c. 1700–60). It resembled, in some ways, the Franciscan movement of the 13th century.

Historical Background. When, in the aftermath of the plague epidemics of the mid-14th century German Jews had to flee persecution, they were received into Poland. For most of the 15th century their life seemed secure. But as they became economic buffers between the Polish Catholic landlords and the Ukrainian Orthodox peasants in eastern and southeastern Poland (Polkynia and Podolia), they courted the hatred of the oppressed. In the middle of the 17th century Ukrainian cossacks waged a “holy war” against the Poles and the “accursed breed of Jews.” So cruel was this massacre that an Italian rabbi thought that it was the greatest since the destruction of Jerusalem and indeed, that it was the birth pangs preceding the coming of the Messiah.

Not long after this blood bath there arose in Smyrna an adventurer who fancied himself the royal messiah: triumphantly he would take the Sultan’s crown, make him his slave, and change the fate of Jewry. When Shabbatai (Sabbatai) Şevi (Tzevi) proved a coward and apostatized to Islam (1666), Jews all over Europe, who for months had lived in eager expectation, fell back into dejection. Devotees continued the fraud and explained his fall as martyrdom necessary for his final rise—a rise that never came. (See SHABBATAÏSM).

Having been fed this travesty of Christianity, the people witnessed also the spectacle of penitents “pressing” for the messianic days of glory by the severest mortifications. The rabbis, in the meantime, clung to the study of the minutiae of the law. Thus without comfort in a world of fear, the poor Jews of Poland turned to magic healers who pretended to have power over demons by the shuffling of the letters of YHWH (YAHWEH), the ineffable name. Hence their title Baale Shem, “Masters of the Name.”

The Founder. Among these healers, yet different from them, was Rabbi Israel. He breathed such kindness that he was called Baal Shem Tov, “Master of the Good Name” or “Kindly Master,” frequently abbreviated to Besht from the initials (B-SH-T) of this name. He had prepared himself for his work among the downhearted through the study of the Lurianic CABALA (see LURIA, ISAAC) and by prayer and solitude in the mountain wilderness. The manner in which he met death tells the man. “I want to busy myself with God a bit more,” he said of his desire to pray, and he confessed to those around him, “Now I know for what I was created.” Together they asked: “Let the graciousness of the Lord, our God, be upon us.” His own final words were: “Let not the foot of pride overtake me” [Ps 35(36).12].

The Message. The Besht’s main teachings were these. God is everywhere, the darkest corner is not without Him, and the smallest thing is filled with His glory. He loves the simple and unlearned no less than the Talmudic students; even without much knowledge, a Jew can be pure and just and carry the Holy Spirit within him. The heart of God is always open to the penitent, the man who turns from sin and self, and to the humble, the man of prayer who comes before Him like a beggar whose hands are empty. Unavoidable though sadness is in this world, it must ever be a herald of joy. A man should cast away his cares and live in the glad certainty that, as he looks up to his Creator (Blessed be He!), the Creator looks upon him. To serve God, then, is to love, and to love is to rejoice.

The Tzaddik. It was not by tenets but by emphasis and custom that the Hasidim, “men of piety” (hence the movement is called Hasidism), differed from the Orthodox norm. Yet the difference was strong enough to force their withdrawal from the mainstream and their founding of separate congregations. A group would gather around a charismatic leader, a tzaddik, “just man.” For miles they would travel to spend the Sabbath with him, eat at his table, listen to his words. They saw to his material needs, while he cared for their spiritual advance. He acted as their mediator with heaven, and they surrendered their lives to him.

Hasidic men praying at Western Wall, Jerusalem, Israel. (©David Katzenstein/CORBIS)

The tzaddik’s credentials were not learning but communion with the upper world. A cabalistic myth tells that in primeval times some of the vessels of light broke and sparks fell into the world. These long to be freed and return to their sources so that divine harmony may be restored. It is the tzaddik’s task and power to end the exile of holy sparks by “lifting them up.” Thus he is considered the “heart of the world,” one who transfigures and sanctifies the things he touches and the men admitted to his presence.

Song and Dance. Hasidic accent on joy, brotherly love, and communal worship made delight in God a corporate experience. Together, the Hasidim sought to move closer to God. The tzaddik’s table was regarded as an altar that one approached with awe. After the third Sabbath meal, they would sit in a darkened room, listen enraptured to their rebbe’s (rabbi’s) wisdom, and sing ecstatic songs. Their song and dance was not an amusing pastime but an essential part of their Sabbath and Holy Day celebrations, an expression of their brotherly affection and their craving for God.

On all festive occasions the men took each other by the hand and danced in a circle, while they hummed or sang a wordless melody. Now and then they clapped their hands to rouse their joy and speed their rhythm. Suddenly one of the dancers might burst into prayer or all of them might sing: Tate ziser, helf!, “Sweet Father, help!” The most famous Hasidic song is the “Song of You”: “Lord of the world . . . , I will sing You a song of You: You, You, You! . . . Where I wander—You. Where I ponder—You. Only You, You again, always You! You, You, You! . . .”

History. The faster Hasidism spread, the fiercer became the opposition. Its adversaries, the Mitnaggedim, “opponents,” branded it heretical. The Besht was called an “empty well,” his followers “thorns and thistles to be rooted out,” “impure men who had deserted the way of God.” Appeals to the government asked for their suppression, their books were burned, and repeatedly the great ban of excommunication was pronounced. Later, however, when the existence of both groups, the Hasidim and the Mitnaggedim, was threatened by a new movement, the HASKALAH, they made common cause. Soon, with much of their spontaneity gone, Ḥasidism became even more rigid in its orthodoxy than its former opponents in theirs.

The Besht had been fortunate enough to find great and faithful disciples. But in the course of the years, the movement grew into several distinct branches. One is the Ḥabad school (the word is formed from the first letters of the Hebrew words ḥokmâ, bînâ, and dē'â—wisdom, understanding, and knowledge). It stresses man's intellectuality; hence, it is a faith engaging the mind with the tzaddik acting as teacher. When the charismatic leaders of its early generations gave way to the rulers of hereditary dynasties, the movement declined. Some of the ruling seats even became centers of greed and superstition. Yet, for all its misfortunes, Ḥasidism endured.

Several Ḥasidic leaders escaped even the Nazi extermination machine. They took up residence in the U.S. and Israel: the Lubavitcher rebbe and the Saltmarer rebbe in different parts of Brooklyn, N.Y., the rebbe of Beltz in Tel Aviv, and the rebbe of Ger in Jerusalem. These and others are from eight to ten generations removed from the time of the Besht. The movement, which once embraced half the Jewish population of Europe, has diminished. Yet its influence on Jewish thought and life outweighs its numbers.

Bibliography: E. MUELLER, A History of Jewish Mysticism, tr. M. SIMON (Oxford 1946). T. YSANDER, Studien zum B'ēstchen Hasidismus (Uppsala 1933). S. A. HORODEZKY, Religiöse Strömungen im Judentum (Bern 1920). P. P. LEVERTOFF, Die religiöse Denkweise der Chassidim (Leipzig 1918). M. BUBER, The Origin and Meaning of Hasidism, ed. and tr. M. FRIEDMAN (New York 1960); The Tales of Rabbi Nachman, tr. M. FRIEDMAN (New York 1956); The Tales of the Hasidim, tr. O. MARX, 2 v. (New York 1964). J. LANGER, Nine Gates to the Chassidic Mysteries, tr. S. JOLLY (New York 1961). J. M. OESTERREICHER, "The Hasidic Movement," The Bridge (New York 1958) 3:122–186. Z. SCHACHTER, "How to Become a Hasid," Jewish Heritage 2 (Spring 1960) 33–40. W. GOODMAN, "The Hasidim Come to Williamsburg," Commentary 19 (1955) 269–274. G. SCHOLEM, "Martin Buber's Hasidism," ibid. 32 (1961) 305–316; "Religious Authority and Mysticism," ibid. 38 (1964) 31–39. H. WEINER, "The Lubovitcher Movement," ibid. 23 (1957) 231–241, 316–327; "The Dead Hasidism," ibid. 31 (1961) 234–242, 420–427; "A Wedding in B'nai Brak," ibid. 40 (1965) 39–46. S. M. DUBNOW, Geschichte des Chassidismus, 2 v. (Berlin 1931–32).

[J. M. OESTERREICHER]

HASKALAH

Hebrew term (ḥaskālâ, literally "the bringing of understanding," hence "enlightenment"), first used by Judah Jeiteles, designating the movement among East-European Jews from c. 1750 to c. 1880 to add to the traditional Jewish Talmudic studies the knowledge of the literature and culture of Western Europe. As a distinctly Jewish movement, Haskalah resembled only in part the general movement of the ENLIGHTENMENT, with which it was connected. The leaders of the movement, who were called Maskilim (Heb. maskîlîm, those who bring understanding), were convinced that Jewish Emancipation would not be effective unless the Jewish religion were modernized and Westernized. It thus sought a compromise between strict orthodoxy and complete assimilation.

Germany. Although the modernizing movement had forerunners in the 17th century among the Jews of Holland and Italy, the cradle of Haskalah as such was in Berlin, where the Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86) in 1750 published a short-lived periodical written in Hebrew but modern in content. In 1778 he established in Berlin a Jewish school that combined the traditional subjects of the ghetto heder (elementary school) with the study of German, French, and secular sciences, "the studies of man," as the Maskilim called the humanities. In 1783 he published his German translation (printed in Hebrew characters) of the Pentateuch, accompanied by a rationalistic commentary. In his treatise Jerusalem (1783) he stated that Judaism, though a revealed religion, does not contain any truth that could not be attained by rational thinking. Religious observance, not belief, was for Mendelssohn the hallmark of Judaism.

In the reign of FREDERICK II (the Great), King of Prussia, Polish intellectuals who were often tutors in wealthy immigrant Jewish families intermingled with followers of Mendelssohn in Germany, furthering the movement toward Western culture but retaining Jewish orthodoxy in rationalized form. They regarded the modernization of Jewish education as a prerequisite for the emergence of Jewry from its medieval ghetto into the full freedom of European civilization. A group of young Maskilim formed a society for the promotion of the Hebrew language and founded a literary monthly, Ha-Me'assēf (The Miscellany), published from 1783 to 1811. Thus Hebrew became the vehicle of the Haskalah movement. The pioneer Maskilim learned to use the holy tongue with ease, a noteworthy achievement because Hebrew had long since degenerated into confused scholastic jargon. Although the Haskalah inspired also a rich literature in Yiddish and other languages, the Maskilim, who opposed assimilation movements and addressed themselves to Jewry as a whole, made a point of using Hebrew.

Russia. The Haskalah reechoed convincingly in the Russian Empire in the early 19th century, where the first generation of Hebrew writers sought to defend the new secular ideas against the fierce opposition of orthodox Jewry. The outstanding figure of this period was I. B. Levinsohn (1788–1860) in the Ukraine, whose work, Te'ûdâ be-Yiśra'el (Testimony in Israel), printed in Vilna in 1828, virtually inaugurated the Haskalah movement in Russia. The book was published with a grant of 1,000 rubles from the Russian government, which regarded it as a contribution to their policy of assimilation. In this work, as well as in his Bêt Yehûdâ (The House of Judah, 1839), Levinsohn undertook to convince his fellow Jews that the program of the Haskalah, which advocated the study of the Hebrew language and grammar, the acquisition of secular sciences, and the pursuit of handicrafts and agriculture, was not opposed to the Jewish religion. In proposing that at least one-third of the people be encouraged to engage in agriculture, Levinsohn was a forerunner of one aspect of Zionism. Russian Jewry, as a whole, did not support Levinsohn's ideas. The orthodox leadership rejected them outright, considering the Haskalah a dangerous innovation and a threat to the preservation of Judaism, being convinced that it would ultimately lead to atheism or conversion to Christianity.

Two outstanding authors are representative of the second generation of Russian Haskalah, Abraham Mapu (1808–67) and Judah Leib Gordon (1831–92). The former introduced historical romance into Hebrew letters. The subject matter of two of his novels is drawn from biblical times, while his 'Ayit Šāvû'a (The Hypocrite) depicts the life of his own generation, denouncing corrupted community leaders and bigoted rabbis, while presenting in favorable light the young Maskil perplexed between religion and science. With Mapu the Haskalah became militant. The same offensive tone appeared in the work of Gordon, one of the greatest Hebrew poets since the Middle Ages. He attacked the tyrants of the Jewish community as responsible for the backward condition of his beloved people and declared that his desire was not to destroy the Jewish religion, but to seek the golden means to unite pure faith with reason and the needs of the time.

Meanwhile, independently of the Haskalah movement, profound changes had taken place in Russian Jewry. The young generation of the 1860s and 1870s had abandoned not only Jewish practices but Judaism itself. The Maskilim, with their plea for national consciousness, were now considered outdated. Peretz Smolenskin (1842–85), the most representative author of the expiring Haskalah, still struggled for the spread of light and knowledge but recognized that secular knowledge and the mastery of languages were not the panacea for all the ills of the House of Israel. In his opinion, Jews who pretended to be adherents of the Mosaic faith only were no longer Jews. "In Judaism," declared Smolenskin, "religion and national belonging are inseparable; the Torah is not only the religious guide of the Jews but also the witness of their peoplehood." If in an earlier time Maskilim endeavored to save the man in the Jew, Smolenskin wanted to save the Jew in the now enlightened and emancipated man. By asserting the distinctiveness of the Jewish people and by considering the Hebrew language as the mainstay of its national consciousness, Smolenskin paved the way for Zionism

Bibliography: S. BERNFELD, Encyclopedia Judaica (Berlin 1928–34) 3:667–681. P. WIERNIK, Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 6:256–258. J. S. RAISIN, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 5:242–245; The Haskalah Movement in Russia (Philadelphia 1913). S. HALKIN, Modern Hebrew Literature (New York 1950). M. WAXMAN, A History of Jewish Literature, 5 v. in 6 (New York 1961) v. 3. L. GREENBERG, The Jews in Russia, 2 v. (New Haven 1944–51), bibliog. 1:190–199, esp. 196.

[M. J. STIASSNY]

HASMONAEANS

A Jewish dynasty of the 2d and 1st centuries B.C., the descendants of Mattathias's son Simon and successors of the Maccabees. (See MACCABEES, HISTORY OF THE.) The name Hasmonaeon is derived from that of Hasmonaeus, who according to Josephus was Mattathias's great-grandfather. Seven members of the dynasty held actual power.

John Hyrcanus (135–104 B.C.). He succeeded his father Simon as king and high priest. In the first year of his reign Antiochus VII Sidetes of the SELEUCID DYNASTY of Syria besieged Jerusalem and forced Hyrcanus to pay tribute for Jewish possessions outside Judea. In 130 B.C. Hyrcanus had to aid Antiochus in a campaign against the Parthians, during which the Syrian king died.

Hyrcanus took advantage of the resulting power vacuum to seize some of the surrounding territory—Medaba (Medeba), SICHEM (SHECHEM), Adora, and Marissa—and to force the Idumeans to accept Judaism; in later years he captured Samaria. Syria's internal problems and wars with Egypt meant effective independence for the Jewish state from 128 B.C. on. Hyrcanus's policies of conquest and national expansion clearly showed the secular character of the Hasmonaeon dynasty and brought about a break with the PHARISEES, the successors of the HASIDAEANS, whose religious convictions the Machabees had fought to uphold. Some of the Pharisees whom Hyrcanus persecuted joined the QUMRAN COMMUNITY.

Aristobulus (104–103 B.C.). Known also as Judas, Aristobulus, the eldest of Hyrcanus's five sons, was to have succeeded only to the priesthood; Hyrcanus wished the government to pass to his widow. Instead, Aristobulus put her and three of his brothers in prison; later, because of reports of a plot, Aristobulus had his fourth brother, Antigonus, killed. Aristobulus died, apparently of remorse, soon after. During his reign he had extended his territory northward and Judaized the Ituraeans who lived in Galilee.

Alexander Jannaeus (103–76 B.C.). The eldest of the three remaining sons of Hyrcanus was Alexander Jannaeus, known also as Jonathan. Aristobulus's widow, Salome Alexandra, made him king and high priest and married him. Alexander's reign was occupied with territorial expansion through military campaigns. The first of these, against Ptolemais (Accho), led to defeat through Egyptian interference. More successful were his campaigns against Gadara, east of the Jordan, and, c. 96 B.C., the old Philistine cities of Raphia, Anthedon, and Gaza. The Pharisees continued to oppose the warlike Hasmonaeen policies of secular nationalism. When Alexander returned to Jerusalem after a campaign in which he had subdued the Moabites and Galaadites but then suffered a reversal from the Nabataean King Obodas I, he met with rebellion. For six years, with the aid of mercenary troops, he fought against civil uprisings; reportedly 50,000 Jews were killed. At last, in 88 B.C., the people appealed for aid to the Seleucid Demetrius III, who defeated Alexander at Sichem. Patriotism, however, brought many Jews back to Alexander, and he was able to expel Demetrius and finally to put down the rebellion. Alexander was pressed by the Nabataeans under Aretas III, but between 83 and 80 B.C. he expanded Jewish territory east and north, as far as Seleucia in Gaulanitis. By the end of his reign Alexander controlled the same territory that had formed the kingdom of David and Solomon. He died in 76 B.C., worn out by excesses, at the age of 51.

Alexandra (76–67 B.C.). She was the widow of Jannaeus and succeeded him as ruler; the heir, Hyrcanus II, became high priest. Though this position satisfied the unambitious Hyrcanus, his younger brother Aristobulus chafed at being subordinate and powerless. Whereas Jannaeus had alienated the Pharisees, Alexandra gave them decisive influence. Aristobulus, however, took the part of the Hellenized, more secular-minded Sadducees. While he was plotting to gain power for himself, Alexandra died at the age of 73.

Aristobulus II (67–63 B.C.). Although Hyrcanus was the rightful heir, his younger brother Aristobulus II, son of Jannaeus and Alexandra, used force to supplant him. In a battle near Jericho, in which many of his troops went over to Aristobulus, Hyrcanus was forced to flee to the citadel of Jerusalem; and there he surrendered himself, the kingship, and the high priesthood to his brother. But a royal official, the Idumean Antipater, persuaded Hyrcanus to seek to regain his rights with the aid of Ar-etas III, king of the Nabataeans, to whom at Petra Hyrcanus fled. When Aretas besieged Aristobulus in the Temple citadel, the Jews took the part of Hyrcanus. At this point, however, the Romans intervened. Coming from the campaign against Mithridates and Tigranes, Pompey's general Scaurus received delegations from both sides in the dispute, decided in favor of Aristobulus, and ordered Aretas to lift the siege. This decision was subject to reversal by Pompey, however, and when he reached Damascus in 63 B.C., he was met by three delegations. The Jewish people countered the two brothers' arguments by asking that the monarchy be abolished and the priests given power. Pompey postponed a final decision, but Aristobulus defied him and fled to Jerusalem. Although he surrendered there, his partisans would not admit Pompey's general Gabinius to the city. When Pompey himself came, Hyrcanus's followers surrendered the city, but the war party that supported Aristobulus took refuge in the Temple citadel. After a three-month siege Pompey forced his way in, and 12,000 Jews were massacred. Pompey's entrance marked the end of Jewish independence. Judea and Jerusalem were made tributary; and all coastal possessions, Samaria, Scythopolis, and the non-Jewish towns east of the Jordan were lost. These Pompey incorporated into the newly organized province of Syria. Judea now consisted of Juda, Perea, Galilee, the southern districts of Samaria, and Idumea. Aristobulus, with his sons Alexander and Antigonus, was taken to Rome to march in Pompey's triumph of 61 B.C., but Alexander escaped on the way.

Hyrcanus II (63–40 B.C.). Hyrcanus now was high priest, but lacked political power for most of his reign. In 57 B.C., after an attempted rebellion by Alexander, Gabinius divided the land into five districts and placed these under the Roman governor of the province of Syria. The following year Aristobulus and Antigonus escaped from their Roman captivity and led a revolution; after a two-year siege Aristobulus was again captured and taken to Rome. The freedom granted his sons permitted another revolt, led by Alexander, in 55 B.C. Subsequently Gabinius, reversing the five-district division of 57 B.C., decided to strengthen Hyrcanus's position against his rivals and restored the high priest's power. When the Roman civil wars began in 49 B.C., Caesar planned to use Aristobulus to fight for him in Syria, but both he and Alexander were murdered by the Pompeians. Hyrcanus and Antipater joined the Caesarean party after Pompey's defeat at Pharsalia in 48 B.C. and furnished aid in Caesar's Egyptian campaign. For this service Caesar confirmed Hyrcanus as high priest and appointed him ethnarch; Antipater was made Roman procurator of Judea. After Caesar's assassination (44 B.C.) and again after the Battle of Philippi (42 B.C.) Hyrcanus gave his allegiance to the victorious faction, first to Cassius, then to Mark Antony. Antony confirmed Hyrcanus as high priest and made the sons of Antipater, Phasaël and HEROD (later known as the Great), tetrarchs.

Antigonus (40–37 B.C.). Antigonus, however, who was known also as Mattathias, took advantage of the Parthian invasion of Syria to have himself installed as king and high priest under the protection of the Parthian garrison in Jerusalem. Phasaël and Hyrcanus were captured by a ruse, and Antigonus had his uncle's ears cut off, to make him legally unable to be high priest again, and sent him into exile with the Parthians; Phasaël committed suicide. Herod, who had avoided being taken by the Parthians, was himself pronounced king by the Roman Senate at the end of the same year. In 37 B.C. he captured Jerusalem and had Antigonus executed. Hyrcanus was brought back from Babylon, but in 30 B.C. Herod executed him, at the age of 80, to remove his last possible rival for power.

Other members of the Hasmonaean dynasty figured in later Palestinian history. In 37 B.C. Herod married Mariamme, whose parents were Hyrcanus's daughter Alexandra and Alexander, the son of Aristobulus II. At Alexandra's urging Mariamme's brother Aristobulus was appointed high priest by Herod in 36 B.C., but within the year he was murdered by him. In 29 B.C. the jealous Herod had Mariamme herself killed; their sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, he had executed in 7 B.C. Aristobulus's son AGRIPPA I was king of Judea from A.D. 37 to 44. Agrippa I's son, AGRIPPA II (d. A.D. 93–94 or 100), was the last descendant of the Maccabees-Hasmonaean to have any political power.

Bibliography: F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion Arabe, 2 v. (Études bibliques [Paris 1903–] 1952) v. 1. T. H. ROBINSON and W. O. E. OESTERLEY, A History of Israel, 2 v. (Oxford 1932) 2:217–349. E. R. BEVAN, "Syria and the Jews," The Cambridge Ancient History, 12 v. (London and New York 1923–39) 8:495–533; "The Jews," ibid. 9:397–436. G. H. STEVENSON and A. MOMIGLIANO, "Rebellion within the Empire," ibid. 10:850–865. M. J. LAGRANGE, Le Judaïsme avant Jésus-Christ (Études bibliques 1931). R. DE VAUX, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIRTO et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:773–775. D. SCHÖTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:23.

[J. WALSH]

HASSARD, JOHN ROSE GREENE

Journalist, critic, biographer; b. New York, N.Y., Sept. 4, 1836; d. New York, N.Y., April 18, 1888. The son of Thomas and Augusta Greene Hassard, he was reared as an Episcopalian. He became a Catholic in 1851 and graduated from St. John's College, Fordham, New York City, in 1855. He served as secretary to Abp. John Hughes until the prelate's death in 1864, then wrote a biography (1866) based on the archbishop's private papers. He also compiled articles for the New American Encyclopedia and became literary editor of the New York Tribune.

In 1865, Hassard became first editor of the Catholic World, and helped in forming its distinctly literary character. Later the same year Charles A. Dana persuaded him to join the short-lived Chicago Republican. In 1866, Hassard returned to the Tribune permanently, working chiefly as music and literary critic and editorial writer, and as managing editor for a time after the death of Horace Greeley in 1872. He was also New York correspondent for the London Daily News and wrote essays and reviews for the Catholic World and American Catholic Quarterly Review. In 1872, he married Isabella Hargous; they had no children. Although restricted by ill health, he traveled extensively, pursuing scholarly interests in English, French, and German literature. He died of tuberculosis and was buried at St. Ann's Church, New York City.

Hassard's History of the United States (1878) was long used as a text in Catholic schools. His works include: The Wreath of Beauty (1864), A Life of Pope Pius IX (1877), Richard Wagner at Bayreuth (1877), A Pickwickian Pilgrimage (1881), and New York Tribune's History of the United States (1887).

Bibliography: I. T. HECKER, "John R. G. Hassard," Catholic World 47 (June 1888) 397–400. J. J. WALSH, "John R. G. Hassard," Catholic World 97 (June 1913) 349–359.

[J. L. O'SULLIVAN]

HASSE, JOHANN ADOLPH

Composer of opera and church music of the preclassical period; b. Bergedorf (near Hamburg), March 25, 1699; d. Venice, Dec. 16, 1783. He was trained first under his father, and at 18 left for Hamburg to try his musical vocation. After singing in the Hamburg Opera for four seasons and producing his first opera in 1721, he pursued his studies in Naples with PORPORA and A. SCARLATTI and taught in Venice. There he married the noted singer Faustina Bordoni in 1730. In 1731 he was appointed musical director of the Dresden Opera, and remained in Dresden most of his life, taking time for extensive travels. During a stay in London he attempted, unsuccessfully, to challenge HANDEL's domination of the lyric theater. Besides opera he composed instrumental and sacred music (twelve oratorios, including La conversione di Sant'Agostino, ten Masses, three Requiems, Psalms, motets, litanies, a Te Deum, and a famous Salve Regina).

They are operatic in style, with recitatives, arias, and a few choruses, and also, like his operas, melodious and expertly orchestrated.

Bibliography: W. MÜLLER, J. A. Hasse als Kirchenkomponist (Leipzig 1911). A. A. ABERT, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:1771–88. H.-B. DIETZ, “The Dresden-Naples Connection, 1737–1763: Charles of Bourbon, Maria Amalia of Saxony, and Johann Adolf Hasse,” International Journal of Musicology 5 (1996) 95–130. S. HANSELL, “Johann Adolf Hasse” in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, v. 8, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 279–293. W. HOCHSTEIN, “Wer war Johann Adlof Hasse?,” Musik und Kirche 69 (1999), 99–101. F. L. MILLNER, “The Operas of Johann Adolf Hasse” (Ph.D. diss. University of California at Berkeley, 1976); The Operas of Johann Adolf Hasse (Ann Arbor 1979). N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker’s Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (New York 1992) 727–728.

[W. C. HOLMES]

HATRED

As a passion or emotion, hatred is the exact opposite of love. It is the reaction of repugnance of an appetite toward an object conceived as an evil. As a sin it is the opposite of Christian love or charity, or, in other words, it is a voluntary hostility to God and the children of God. Since love of others supposes a true love of self (Mt 22.39), hatred of God and of fellow man presupposes a false love of self, which is truly a form of self-hatred. Charity is the highest Christian virtue and the source of every other virtue, and consequently hatred of God is the gravest of sins, for it is directly and immediately corruptive of charity. It is accounted by theologians as a special sin against the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of love.

The hatred contrary to charity is an act or habit of will essentially opposed to the benevolence of charity. It is therefore voluntary and deliberate, and should not be identified with feelings of hostility or ANTIPATHY or repugnance that arise spontaneously on the sense level and not infrequently are stubbornly resistant to voluntary control. Feelings of this kind may be quite involuntary, and they are not essentially associated with any malevolence of will. They may exist in persons whose deliberate attitudes and behavior are unexceptionable when measured by the rule of charity.

The formal object of charity is God, first in His own person, and then in His relationship to men. The formal object of hatred, as opposed to charity, is also God, but God as seen under the aspect of evil. God is all good, indeed goodness itself, and seen as He truly is He cannot be hated. He can nevertheless appear to man as an evil, as when He is considered to be the cause of things man sees as odious to himself, or as forbidding sin, or inflicting punishment.

Hatred of neighbor always involves hatred of God, for just as charity toward one’s fellows is identifiable with charity toward God because it loves the realization of the divine good in neighbor, so also hatred of neighbor rejects the divine good and its realization. Hence, “he who says he loves God and hates his neighbor is a liar” (1 Jn 4.20). One must not hate even his personal enemies or the enemies of the church, since all men in this life are potentially at least members of Christ’s Mystical Body (1 Tm 2.4), and hence to hate any other person is to hate Christ (cf. Mt 25.41–46).

Indirectly and by inference there is an element of hatred of God in every mortal sin, for one who sins mortally deforms the image of God. However, this is hatred only in a relative and attenuated sense, for the sinner does not commonly detest the divine good except in the sense that he values it less than he does some created good.

Those with charity hate the evil that deforms, whether it be sin or error. Thus, just as God hates deceit and pride (Prv 6.16–19) and other sins, so do the saints (Ps 96.10). One must, however, love the sinner while he hates the sin, as did Our Lord (Mt 9.11, 13). One must not confuse error with the person who errs, whether in morality, religion, philosophy, or in any other respect.

Bibliography: B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1961–) v.2. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963). D. VON HILDEBRAND and A. JOURDAIN, True Morality and Its Counterfeits (New York 1955). A. M. HENRY, ed., Man and His Happiness, tr. C. MILTNER (Chicago 1957).

[J. M. GIANNINI]

HAUTECOMBE, ABBEY OF

Benedictine monastery of Our Lady in Savoy, France, Archdiocese of Chambéry. Founded in 1121 by Benedictines from Aulps, an abbey affiliated with MOLESME, it joined the Cistercians in 1135 at the suggestion of St. Bernard. St. AMADEUS, later bishop of Lausanne, became abbot in 1139, and the abbey moved to a better location on Lake Bourget donated by the Count of Savoy. From 1184 to 1502 members of the house of Savoy were buried in the abbey, of which they were patrons for many years. From 1439 to 1451 and after 1505 Hautecombe was a commendatory abbey and suffered a decline. It was administered by the government of Savoy from 1700 to 1742. Under Spanish occupation (1742–48) it regained its independence and was rebuilt in baroque style. Suppressed in 1792, it fell into ruin. The restoration begun by King Charles-Felix in 1824 was completed by Maria Christina in 1843; both sovereigns were buried in the abbey. Italian Cistercians from La Consolata in Turin were replaced by French from Sénanque in 1864, and in 1922 Benedictines from SOLESMES occupied the abbey, which has edited translations of the Missal.

Abbey of Hautecombe, on the shore of Lake Bourget, Savoie, France. (©Michael Busselle/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1383–84. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET 5:531–533. B. GRIESSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:37.

[L. J. LEKAI]

HAUTERIVE, ABBEY OF

Cistercian abbey five miles south of Fribourg, Diocese of Lausanne-Geneva-Fribourg, Switzerland. Founded by William of Glâne (d. 1143) and settled with Cistercians from Cherlieu in Burgundy (1138), it was endowed by William, whose family (Counts of Neuenberg) became advocati. Subsequent patrons were the Counts of Aarberg (1299) and the city of Fribourg (1455). Haute- rive founded Kappel (1185) and flourished under the protection of the Bishops of Lausanne and the Counts of Zähringen. It was plundered by mercenaries (1387) but revived under Abbot Pierre d’Affry (1405–49), who received pontifical rights (1418). Wars, the rule of weak abbots, and a fire (1578) reduced it to poverty. A revival under Abbots Pierre Python (1604–09), Antoine Du Pasquier (1609–14), and a Guillaume Moënnat (1616–40) was followed by debt and a decline. The abbey was suppressed by Fribourg in 1848 and became an agricultural school and a teachers’ college. The archives and library went to Fribourg’s cantonal and university library. The church (12th–14th century, restored 1722–84) with its frescoes, stalls (c. 1480), and stained glass (1322) was restored along with the cloister as a Swiss art monument (1903–13). In 1939 Cistercians restored Haute- rive as a priory under WETTINGEN-MEHRERAU.

Father Bonaventure Loots standing with parishioners outside of grass church in Pua, Hawaii.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1385–86. M. REYMOND, Les Sires de Glâne et leurs possessions (Fribourg 1918). R. PITTET, L'abbaye d'Hauterive au moyen âge (Fribourg 1934). F. KOVÁCS, Stalles d'Hauterive (Fribourg 1953). M. H. VICAIRE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:37–38.

[A. MAISSEN]

HAWAII, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Roman Catholic Church grew from banishment, persecution, and tragedy to become the largest religious body in the state of Hawaii. For most of its history, it was a mission territory administered by missionary personnel from Europe and the United States, until the establishment of the Diocese of Honolulu in 1941, weeks before the United States was plunged into World War II with the bombing of Pearl Harbor on Oahu. Hawaii became the 50th state of the union in 1959, growing rapidly from an economy dominated by agriculture into a major tourist destination and the communications, trading and military hub of the central Pacific. The Diocese of Honolulu, a suffragan see of the Archdiocese of San Francisco, spans the entire state. By the start of the 21st century it had grown into an active multi-ethnic community blending native Hawaiian and American traditions with the cultures and contributions of immigrants from Asia and the South Pacific.

Hawaii is an archipelago of more than 100 islands of which only seven are large enough to sustain permanent populations, stretching through more than 1,500 miles of mid-Pacific Ocean bisecting the Tropic of Cancer in a southeast to northwest arch. Geologically, they are the tips of volcanic mountains resulting from ocean floor eruptions that began perhaps as long as 40 million years ago and which continue today.

The oldest island is Kure Atoll at the archipelago's northwest end. At its southeast tip is the youngest and largest island, Hawai'i, which gives the entire chain its name and is also commonly known as the Big Island. In relative close proximity are the rest of the populated islands—Maui, Molokai, Lanai, Oahu, Kauai and Niihau.

Oahu, the third largest in size after the Big Island and Maui, is the location of the capital city of Honolulu, the center of government and commerce in Hawaii, and home to eight-tenths of the state's population. Honolulu is also where the Catholic Church has its central administrative offices and bishop's residence.

Polynesians from Pacific islands to the south and southwest of Hawaii were the first to populate the Hawaiian Islands, arriving in waves of migration that began as early as 600–800 A.D. When British explorer Captain James Cook arrived in 1778, nearly 300 years after Columbus landed in the new world, he had “discovered” the last significant territory on earth to be visited by Europeans. Captain Cook named his discovery the Sandwich Islands after the Earl of Sandwich in his native England.

In Hawaii, the British explorer found a highly developed, albeit stone-age, civilization with its own unique religion, a complicated caste system, and sophisticated capabilities in open-ocean navigation, featherwork, woodwork, stone carving, fishing and agriculture. He also found a people whose centuries of isolation from the rest of the world had left them free of many of humanity's most common diseases and who consequently lacked any immunity toward them. The result was disastrous. In the first 100 years since Captain Cook's arrival, diseases introduced into Hawaii devastated its population, reducing it from an estimated 250,000 to 40,000.

The first recorded Catholic baptisms in Hawaii, that of two high chiefs, occurred in the summer of 1819, although a Spanish layman and resident of Hawaii named Don Francisco de Paulo Marin claimed to have baptized 300 natives earlier. The more significant of the 1819 baptisms, performed by a chaplain on a visiting French vessel, was conferred on Boki Kamauleule, the governor of Oahu. He would later prove to be a vital supporter of the growing Catholic mission of Hawaii.

It was not until 1827 that the first official Catholic missionaries arrived in the islands. They were members of the French-based Congregation of the SACRED HEARTS OF JESUS AND MARY to whom Rome had given the assignment. The missionaries were Father Alexis Bachelot, Father Patrick Short and Father Abraham Armand, and three religious brothers. They arrived on July 7, 1827, celebrating the first recorded Mass on Hawaiian soil six days later in Honolulu on July 13. They secured mission property in Honolulu which remains in use by the church today as the site of the present Cathedral of Our Lady of Peace.

The Catholic missionaries were not warmly welcomed by the Hawaiian Kingdom. They had been preceded seven years earlier by members of the American Protestant Mission of Massachusetts, whose Congregationalist and Presbyterian ministers had solidly established favor with the Hawaiian royalty. The Protestants had made great progress in a short amount of time, establishing an alphabet for the Hawaiian language which previously had only been spoken, setting up a printing operation, and opening schools. Their influence also resulted in the rulers of Hawaii outlawing the ancient Hawaiian religion with its many idols and stone temples.

The Protestants saw the Catholic priests as rivals. Although the Catholics proceeded peacefully and were non-confrontational, they faced opposition and disapproval. Because of their statues and crucifixes, they were accused of illegal idol worship. However, as long as Boki was governor of Oahu, they had a faithful defender in a high place. When Boki was lost at sea in 1830, the persecution of Catholics began, led primarily by the powerful Queen Kaahumanu, and later by her successor Kinau.

One of the immediate results of Kaahumanu's hard-line policies was the expulsion from the islands of Fathers Bachelot and Patrick Short on December 24, 1831. Father Armand had departed two years earlier because of illness. The Sacred Hearts Brothers were left to maintain the Honolulu mission.

The islands were without a Catholic priest until the arrival of Sacred Hearts Father Robert Arsenius Walsh on Sept. 30, 1836. Being a British subject, he was permitted to stay but prohibited from converting native Hawaiians. Father Walsh's presence in Hawaii prompted the return of Fathers Bachelot and Short on April 17, 1837, and a few months later, the arrival of Sacred Hearts Father Louis Maigret. But all three were met with renewed opposition and were expelled before the year ended. On December 5, the sickly Father Bachelot died at sea and was buried on the tiny reef island Na, off Ponape, in the Caroline Islands.

During this period, the natives were given harsh punishments for the “crime” of being Catholic. Hundreds were imprisoned and forced into hard labor. In December 1837, the Catholic religion was declared illegal by official ordinance. Father Walsh escaped deportation only because he was British.

It took a threat of war to stop the persecution. On July 9, 1839, the French warship L'Artemise dropped anchor in Honolulu Harbor. Its captain, Cyril Laplace, demanded religious freedom for Catholics in Hawaii. If not granted, he would retaliate by firing his ship's cannons on the city of Honolulu. That declaration, later called “Laplace's Manifesto,” was enough to pressure King Kamehameha III into a concession and he stopped the persecution.

Under the new mantle of religious liberty, the Catholic mission enjoyed a quick revival. Bishop Stephen Rouchouze, vicar apostolic of eastern Oceania of which Hawaii was a part, arrived with other priests on May 15, 1840. Rouchouze laid the cornerstone for the Cathedral of Our Lady of Peace. It was dedicated, Aug. 15, 1843, and remains one of the oldest Catholic cathedrals in continuous use in the United States. It is also the oldest building structure in downtown Honolulu and the oldest Catholic church in Hawaii.

Rouchouze's efforts to initiate missions through the islands soon suffered a tragic setback. In order to meet the challenge of his expanded mission, Bishop Rouchouze went back to France in 1841 to have a ship built and outfitted, and missionaries recruited for the islands. The ship, the Marie Joseph, on its maiden voyage to Hawaii, was lost at sea in March 1843 near the Strait of Magellan, taking with it the bishop, six priests, one seminarian, seven brothers and nine sisters. It would be 16 years before another ship would bring Sacred Hearts Sisters from Europe around Cape Horn to Hawaii.

In 1845, King Kamehameha III gave land in Kahaluu, Oahu, to the Catholic Mission for the building of a school. The following year, Ahuimanu College, the first Catholic school in Hawaii, began operation. Meanwhile, Catholic religious education on the island of Maui was prospering without the benefit of any priest. In a circumstance unique in Hawaii Catholic history, thousands of Maui natives had been instructed in the faith by a young lay catechist named Helio Mahoe and a few others. By the time two priests arrived on the island on April 21, 1846, 4,000 Hawaiians were ready to be baptized.

In 1847, Father Louis Maigret was consecrated a bishop and named the first vicar apostolic of Hawaii. May 4, 1859, marked the arrival of the first nuns in Hawaii, the SACRED HEARTS SISTERS. They established a convent school next to the cathedral, the first of several schools for girls they would eventually open. The Sacred Hearts Academy is the largest Catholic girls school in the state.

Blessed Damien de Veuster. Damien de VEUSTER arrived in Honolulu on March 19, 1864. Born Joseph De Veuster, Jan. 3, 1840, in Tremelo, Belgium, at age 18, he joined his older brother Auguste in the Congregation of the SACRED HEARTS OF JESUS AND MARY (SS.CC.) taking the religious name Damien after the ancient physician-saint. After ordination to the priesthood in the Cathedral of Our Lady of Peace, a few months after his arrival, his first assignment was on the Big Island of Hawaii where he spent ten years.

During this time, Hansen's disease, or leprosy, was ravaging the native Hawaiian people who were particularly susceptible to its virus. The Hawaiian government responded to the dreaded incurable affliction with a solution as old as the Bible—quarantine and isolation. King Kamehameha V decreed that anyone with leprosy would be sent to the small Kalaupapa peninsula on the island of Molokai, inaccessible except by sea or a treacherous cliff trail. There, hundreds of leprosy patients of all ages were left to fend for themselves and to die in squalid and lawless conditions.

Bishop Louis Maigret was extremely concerned about the plight of those abandoned in Kalaupapa but was reluctant to make the place a permanent clergy assignment. Father Damien was the first of four priests who volunteered to go there on rotation. He arrived on Molokai on May 10, 1873, and soon after wrote his bishop that it was "absolutely necessary" for a priest to remain there permanently and that he would be willing to be the one. Father Damien spent the next 16 years bringing dignity to a settlement the rest of the Hawaii had abandoned. He served as priest, doctor, nurse, carpenter, plumber, gravedigger, and coffin maker. Disregarding medical precautions for himself, he ate with the people, accepted them into his house and touched them. He brought normalcy to a condemned world, organizing a choir and a children's band, supervising religious organizations, and directing religious education. He eventually contracted the disease himself and succumbed on April 15, 1889, the Monday of Holy Week, at age 49. He was buried beside his church, St. Philomena. At the request of the Belgian government, his body was returned to his home country in 1936. A cure for Hansen's disease was found in the 1940s and in 1969, the State Board of health ended its policy of segregating those with the disease.

Hawaii received its first major influx of Catholic immigrants with the arrival of the first Portuguese farm laborers from the Azores in 1878. By the end of the 19th century, more than 18,000 would settle in Hawaii. With the decrease of the Hawaiian population, Catholic missionary efforts began shifting their ministry toward these newcomers.

Bishop Maigret died on June 11, 1882, after laboring 42 years in Hawaii, 35 years as its bishop. His administration had seen a Catholic conversion of the Hawaiian people rivaling and exceeding the Protestant efforts. As primary builder of the cathedral, he was buried below its sanctuary. Succeeding him was Bishop Hermann Koeckemann.

The year after Bishop Maigret's death, 1883, saw the arrival of two religious orders that would have a tremendous affect on Hawaii. The first, landing in September, were the educator brothers of the Society of Mary, or MARIANISTS. They opened Catholic boys' schools on Oahu, Maui and the Big Island. Their Honolulu school, St. Louis, continues to be one of the state's most prominent educational institutions.

Two months later, on November 8, six FRANCISCAN SISTERS from Syracuse, NY, led by Mother Marianne COPE, arrived to assist the Hansen's disease patients at the Kakaako Branch Hospital in Honolulu. Marianne Cope had been superior of the Franciscan Sisters of Syracuse, NY, in 1883 when she responded to a plea from King Kalakaua for a nursing order to care for the unattended sick, including 200 leprosy patients, in Honolulu. Not only did Mother Marianne quickly fulfill the Hawaii government's needs, she also opened a hospital on Maui. In 1888, five months before the death of Father Damien, she and two sisters arrived at Kalaupapa to run the settlement's two homes for the sick and homeless.

She remained in Kalaupapa after Father Damien's death. As medical professionals, she and her sisters treated the patients with compassion and without fear, following proper sanitary precautions. She predicted that none of her sisters would ever contract leprosy, and none ever did. She died on August 8, 1918, of natural causes at age 80 and is buried in Kalaupapa.

Church comes of age. Bishop Gulstan Ropert was appointed the mission's third vicar apostolic on June 3, 1892. On April 6, 1903, Bishop Libert Boeynaems was named its fourth vicar apostolic. The fifth vicar apostolic, Bishop Stephen Alencastre, grew up in Hawaii having immigrated to the islands at age five with his family. He was named to head the Catholic mission on May 13, 1926. During his administration, he established Catholic schools and orphanages, launched Honolulu's first Catholic hospital, and set up a small seminary. In 1929, he divided the Honolulu Mission into nine "quasi-parishes." Bishop Alencastre also invited to the islands the MARYKNOLL FATHERS and MARYKNOLL SISTERS who played a large part in the shaping of the island church in the 20th century.

Two events in 1940 forecast the Hawaii mission's coming of age. First was the ordination of the first three local-born "diocesan" priests, though the church was not yet a diocese. The second was the unexpected death on Nov. 9, 1940, of the beloved Bishop Alencastre. With his death, the Hawaii Catholic mission era came to an end.

On Sept. 10, 1941, the Catholic Church in Hawaii, at age 114, was elevated to the status of Diocese of Honolulu. Father James J. Sweeney, a priest of the Archdiocese of San Francisco, was consecrated as the first diocesan bishop. At that time, the new diocese had 112 churches, 17 schools, 82 priests, 78 brothers, 250 sisters, and 120,000 faithful.

The Diocese of Honolulu. For its first four years the diocese was in "war-support-mode" because of the central role that Hawaii played in the Pacific war effort. But with the war's end in 1945, the fledgling diocese came to life with energy and enthusiasm. In 1946, St. Stephen Diocesan Minor Seminary opened. The late 1940s and early 1950s saw the introduction of Catholic Charities and other new diocesan offices, a flurry of church and school construction, the introduction of new religious orders, and the flourishing of lay organizations, sodalities and societies. In 1957, Bishop Sweeney convened the first diocesan synod.

The diocese continued to grow through the 1960s, conscientiously embracing the renewal introduced by the Second Vatican Council, even as it went through the same social and religious turmoil as the rest of the country. Bishop Sweeney died in 1968 and was succeeded by his auxiliary, Bishop John J. Scanlan.

In 1970, in spite of strong opposition on the part of Bishop Scanlan and the Catholic diocese, Hawaii became the first state in the union to liberalize its abortion laws, predating by one year, the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe vs. Wade decision which essentially legalized abortion for the rest of the nation.

The church of the 1970s responded to the times, welcoming refugees from the Vietnam War, establishing a residence for pregnant unwed mothers, and seeing growth in such groups as the Charismatic renewal movement, MARRIAGE ENCOUNTER and CURSILLO. A drop off in vocations to the priesthood led to the eventual closing of the seminary in the early 1980s. During his administration, Bishop Scanlan also invited a number of religious orders to the islands from Asia, including Carmelite Sisters from Hong Kong and sisters from the Philippines to staff the local parochial schools.

Upon Bishop Scanlan's retirement in 1982, auxiliary Bishop Joseph A. Ferrario was named the third bishop of the Diocese of Honolulu. Bishop Ferrario had come to Hawaii from Scranton, PA, as a seminary professor in 1957 and was incardinated in the diocese in 1966. As bishop, he presided over a maturing of liturgical practice in the diocese, an increase in ecumenical outreach and adult religious education, and a significant expansion of Catholic Charities and parish social ministries. In 1985, Bishop Ferrario renovated and elevated St. Theresa Church in Honolulu to the status of co-cathedral to ease the smaller and less accessible Cathedral of Our Lady of Peace of some of its liturgical burdens. Bishop Ferrario retired because of health reasons in 1993 and was succeeded by Bishop Francis X. DiLorenzo, a Philadelphia native and auxiliary Bishop of Scranton.

As the fourth bishop of Honolulu, DiLorenzo was formally installed on Nov. 30, 1994. He introduced a diocese-wide parish renewal and review program called the “Welcoming Parish,” and in June 2000 convened the diocese’s second synod in order to prepare the church in Hawaii for the 21st century. He also increased and strengthened the diocese’s ethnic ministries to serve newly arrived immigrants, in particular the Filipinos, Vietnamese, Samoans, Koreans, and Chinese. The Filipinos, who are largely Catholic, were by far the largest of these groups and therefore became the diocese’s biggest ethnic ministry challenge. According to the Diocesan Office of Ethnic Ministries, Filipinos make up about one half of the Catholic population of Hawaii.

By the beginning of the 21st century, the Catholic population of Hawaii had grown to 236,688, and it continues to grow with the population. This figure does not include the Catholics in the armed services who fall under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Military Archdiocese. Routinely the dozen or more Catholic chaplains assigned to the military bases operate independently of the Diocese of Honolulu but enjoy a cooperative relationship with it. The second largest religious group after the Catholic Church is Buddhism, which counted about 100,000 adherents at the end of the 20th century, all sects combined.

The Catholic Church in Hawaii mirrors the multi-ethnic blend that makes up the local population where no single ethnic group holds a majority. In fact, because of the commonly accepted practice of interracial marriage, one of the largest population groupings belongs to those of mixed ancestry. Other larger racial blocks include part-Hawaiians, Caucasians, and Asians. They are served by 66 parishes, three ethnic Catholic parish communities, and one Eastern Catholic Apostolate.

The Congregation for the Sacred Hearts and the Marianists continue to remain among the largest communities of religious men in Hawaii. In the 1980s, the Capuchin Franciscans added Hawaii to its Guam vice province, and the Philippine province of the La Salette Fathers increased their presence in the islands. On the other hand, the Maryknoll Fathers, who manned a large number of parishes during much of the 20th century reduced their numbers to only a handful by the year 2000. In most places parishes are staffed by at least one or two priests, a small but increasing percentage of whom come from Asia, particularly the Philippines. Hawaii also has 50 active permanent deacons. Among the orders of religious women, the largest are the Sisters of the Sacred Hearts, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet, the Franciscan Sisters of Syracuse, and the Maryknoll Sisters.

Bibliography: R. SCHOOF, S.S.CC., Pioneers of the Faith (Honolulu 1978). M. D. PIRES, S.S.CC., Shrouded in Mystery—The Marie Joseph: A Remarkably Courageous and Tragic Missionary Venture (Honolulu 2000). L. LUERAS, editor, Hawaii (Hong Kong 1981). G. DAWES, Holy Man (New York 1973). M. L. HANLEY, O.S.F., and O.A.

BUSHNELL, Pilgrimage and Exile—Mother Marianne of Molokai (Honolulu 1991).

[P. DOWNS]

HAWKINS, DENIS JOHN BERNARD

English Catholic philosopher; b. Thorntown Heath, London, July 17, 1906; d. Godalming, Surrey, Jan. 16, 1964. He was educated at the Whitgift School, Croydon, and at the Gregorian University, Rome, and received his doctorates in philosophy and theology. Ordained priest for the Diocese of Southwark in 1930, he devoted his life to pastoral as well as to intellectual work. He became rector of Claygate (Surrey) in 1940 and parish priest of Godalming in 1950. In 1956 he was made an honorary canon of the diocese. Canon Hawkins was a Thomist who devoted himself to the task of meeting the challenge of D. Hume and I. Kant to the possibility of metaphysics. He rethought the principles of St. Thomas’s metaphysics and presented them anew in the climate of English academic philosophy. His most original works are his Criticism of Experience (London 1945) and Being and Becoming (New York 1954). The Essentials of Theism (New York 1949) and Sketch of Mediaeval Philosophy (London 1946) have been the most widely read of his books, but the former suffers from the brevity at which he always aimed in presenting his ideas. In Crucial Problems of Modern Philosophy (New York 1957) he discussed the bearing of contemporary ideas on his own critical approach to metaphysics; in Man and Morals (New York 1961) he sketched the outlines of a system of ethics. He wrote numerous articles in reviews and symposia and was well known as a lecturer.

[E. A. SILLEM]

HAWKS, EDWARD

Teacher, writer; b. Abergareddy, South Wales, Feb. 17, 1878; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 22, 1955. He was the son of Edward and Theresa (Hallam) Hawks and lived an uneventful youth in Wales before the family settled in Bristol, England. At 21 he immigrated to Canada to prepare for the Anglican ministry. He studied for a time at Bishop’s College, Lennoxville, Canada, and then spent several years as a lay missionary in the mining camps of northern Canada. In 1903 Hawks entered the Episcopal seminary at Nashotah, Wis., where he received orders and became a member of the faculty, teaching Latin and Greek. At Nashotah, Hawks joined the Companions of the Holy Saviour, which had been founded in Philadelphia by William McGarvey, an advocate of clerical celibacy and Anglo-Catholic ideals.

When the Episcopal Church altered its canon law in 1907 to permit non-Episcopalians to preach before its congregations, the Companions regarded this “open pulpit” amendment as a denial of the historic priesthood and episcopacy. After resigning his position as instructor at Nashotah, Hawks entered the Catholic Church in 1908, and was soon followed by McGarvey and most of his congregation. In 1911 Hawks became a priest in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, where he served for several years as a parish curate. During World War I he was a chaplain in the Canadian Army. Upon returning to Philadelphia in 1919, he established the parish of St. Joan of Arc, where he remained until his death. For many years Hawks wrote a column on current events for the diocesan newspaper, the Catholic Standard and Times. From 1936 to 1938, after becoming a domestic prelate, he toured Spain to gather accounts of the civil war for his column. His efforts on behalf of the Nationalist cause won him a decoration from the Spanish government.

[D. A. QUAINANCE]

HAY, GEORGE

Scottish bishop; b. Edinburgh, Aug. 24, 1729; d. Aquhorties, Aberdeenshire, Oct. 15, 1811. An Episcopalian, he trained as a surgeon, a profession then barred to Catholics, and in this capacity accompanied the Jacobite army in 1745. After becoming a Catholic in 1749, he entered the Scots College, Rome (1751). After ordination (1758), he was missionary at Preshome, Banffshire, until his consecration as coadjutor bishop of the Scottish Lowland District (1769). Appointed vicar apostolic (1778), he was chiefly concerned with the welfare of seminaries and with efforts to repeal Scottish anti-Catholic laws. He also wrote a series of instructional works, which influenced English Catholic thought, and was responsible for publication of the first Catholic Bible in English printed in Scotland (1796–97). Hay did much to sustain the Church in Scotland during a period of persecution, riots and repressive penal laws.

Bibliography: A. C. KERR, Bishop Hay (London 1927).

[J. QUINN]

HAYDN, FRANZ JOSEPH

Master composer of the classical period; b. Rohrau, lower Austria, March 31, 1732; d. Vienna, May 31, 1806. When the seven-year-old boy’s pleasant voice and general musicality aroused the interest of the imperial Kapellmeister Reutter, Haydn was taken to the court chapel at Vienna. As a choirboy he received a thorough general and musical education, with opportunities to sing in the cathedral and at court. In 1749 his voice changed and he was unceremoniously dismissed. Hard years followed, during which he “barely managed to stay alive by giving music lessons to children,” as he recalled. At the same time he continued to study and compose. A position as music director at a small court materialized in 1759; two years later he entered the service of the Esterházy family in Eisenstadt. Under Prince Nicholas I (reigned 1762–90) the musical establishment that Haydn directed grew in size and quality; his arduous duties included the composition of sacred music, primarily Masses. For the cathedral of Cádiz, Spain, he wrote the Seven Words of the Savior on the Cross (1785), a cycle of seven adagios for string quartet (a later version includes voices and additional instruments).

Franz Joseph Haydn.

Under Prince Anton (1790–94), musical activities in Eisenstadt and at the summer residence, Esterháza, were greatly reduced. For the first time Haydn was free to travel, though he kept the court appointment. His two extensive journeys to England (1791, 1794) brought successes and honors, including a doctorate from Oxford. They also provided opportunities to hear impressive performances of HANDEL’s oratorios, in the strong choral-singing tradition of 18th-century England. Partly as a result of these impressions Haydn composed his own oratorios, The Creation (1798) and The Seasons (1801), which, despite some critical reviews, established his international fame more than any other works; their rousing choruses in particular achieved widespread popularity. Prince Anton's successor, Nicholas II, showed greater musical interest, particularly in sacred music. Haydn was asked to compose a series of Masses to be performed on the name day of the princess; he responded with his last great Masses: the Pauken messe or Missa in tempore belli (1796), Heiligmesse (1797), Nelson Mass (1798), Theresia Mass (1799), Schöpfungsmesse (1801), and Harmoniemesse (1802). His earlier sacred works included a Missa Brevis (c. 1750), the Grosse Orgelmesse (1766), the Missa Sanctae Ceciliae (c. 1770), Missa Sancti Nicolai (1772), Missa brevis Sti. Joannis de Deo (c. 1775), and Missa Cellensis (1782). In most of these the orchestra, though sometimes large, remains in the background. There are many vocal solos, some quite elaborate, others of simple, lyrical beauty. The Missa Sanctae Ceciliae is Haydn's longest—a solemn Mass in cantata style in which the subdivisions of the text (especially in the Gloria and Credo) are treated as independent movements. There are several extensive fugues. Among shorter compositions are two Te Deum and two Salve Regina settings; several motets are of doubtful authenticity.

After the Missa Cellensis, Haydn wrote no Masses for 14 years, chiefly because of restrictions imposed on church music during the reign of Emperor JOSEPH II (see JOSEPHINISM). The style of the last six Masses reflects his development (aided by his experiences in England) during the intervening years, notably in the handling of the orchestra. Vocal solos are in large part replaced by quartets. Individual movements are more compact, and the general tone tends to be more serious, especially in the Nelson Mass, perhaps his most frequently performed Mass today. Yet even in these late works passages occur in which the musical treatment seemed inappropriately gay. For this reason and others the Masses have often been considered inappropriate for the Catholic liturgy, despite their spirit of joy and exuberant faith. Haydn's often quoted reply to this accusation was, "When I think of the Lord my heart is so full of joy that the notes come running by themselves. Since God gave me a joyful heart He may forgive me for serving Him joyfully."

Bibliography: K. GEIRINGER, Joseph Haydn (rev. ed. New York 1963). R. HUGHES, Haydn (London 1950). H. E. JACOB, Joseph Haydn, tr. R. and C. WINSTON (New York 1950). R. G. PAULY, Music in the Classic Period (New York 1965). C. F. POHL et al., Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 4:145–205. J. P. LARSEN et al., Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:1858–1934. P. H. LÁNG, Music in Western Civilization (New York 1941). Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL, 2 v. (Paris 1960–63); v. 9, 16 of Encyclopédie de la Pléiade v. 2. K. G. FELLNERER, The History of Catholic Church Music, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (Baltimore 1961). H. BAETEN, "Auf den Spuren Joseph Haydns: Een bezoek aan de Haydnstage in Eisenstadt," Musica Antiqua 14 (1997) 186–188. D. BARTHA, "Folk Dance Stylization in Joseph Haydn's Finale Themes," Hungarian Music Quarterly 6/1–2 (1995) 2–12. A. ESPINOSA, "Félix Máximo López, Franz Joseph Haydn, and the Art of Homage," Early Keyboard Journal 16/17 (1999) 133–155. M. HEAD, "Music with 'No Past?' Archaeologies of Joseph Haydn and The Creation," 19th Century Music 23 (2000) 191–217. P. H. KIRBY, "The Impact of Haydn's Conducted Performances of The Creation on the Work and the History of Conducting," Journal of the Conductors' Guild 13 (1992) 7–22. M. LORBER, "Das Joseph Haydn zugeschriebene Singspiel Die reisende Ceres," Die Musikforschung 50 (1997) 80–86. N. A. MACE, "Haydn and the London Music Sellers: Forster v. Longman and Broderip," Music and Letters 77 (1996) 527–541. L. SOMFAI, The Keyboard Sonatas of Joseph Haydn: Instruments and Performance Practice, Genres and Styles (Chicago 1996). G. TABOGA, "Le relazioni tra A. Luchesi, J. Haydn, e la Spagna," Recherca Musicologica 13 (1998) 165–200. H. WIRTH, "Joseph Haydn's Symphonie mit dem Paukenwirbel: Ein Betrachtung," Hamburger Jahrbuch für Musikwissenschaft 1 (1975) 87–99.

[R. G. PAULY]

HAYDN, MICHAEL

Church composer of the classical period; b. Rohrau, Lower Austria, Sept. 14, 1737 (baptized Johann Michael); d. Salzburg, Aug. 10, 1806. Like his older brother, Franz Joseph HAYDN, he began his career with the choristers of St. Stephen's cathedral in Vienna. His three-octave soprano voice won for him the place of soloist in the choir after his brother's voice changed. The training he received at St. Stephen's was supplemented by his mastery of J. J. FUX's Gradus ad Parnassum, which proved very influential in his compositional technique. After a period in Hungary and Grosswardein as Kapellmeister to Archbishop Count Firmian, he was appointed music director in 1762 to Archbishop Count Schrattenbach, uncle of Count Firmian. This brought him to Salzburg, where he married Maria Magdalena Lipp, daughter of the cathedral organist and herself a noted court singer (she sang the role of Rosina in MOZART's early opera La Finta Semplice and the Regina Caeli, K. 127, that he wrote for her). Haydn also provided music for the Salzburg Benedictine church, St. Peter's, and much of his music is still in its archives.

With the succession of Hieronymus Collaredo to the Salzburg archbishopric, the course of liturgical music in the Austrian center took a new direction. Collaredo, a prominent clerical figure during the Enlightenment, attempted to simplify the celebration of the liturgy in the light of JOSEPHINISM. After Mozart's departure from Salzburg, Haydn took full responsibility for the archbishop's liturgical music and wrote 117 Graduals and 45 Offertories to reinstate the performance of these liturgical items. His idiom combined the symphonic instrumental emphasis of the classical style with the polyphonic background he had absorbed from the Gradus ad Parnassum. In addition to these Mass Propers, he wrote 30 Latin Masses, 4 Vespers, 10 litanies, 6 Te Deums, many motets, "German Masses," and other religious music. Symphonic and chamber works number more than 100, and he composed also one opera and several vocal works. His music has been compared frequently and unfavorably to his brother's; yet considered on its own merits, it reveals a craftsmanship of the highest order by a musician who understood well symphonic form, counterpoint, and the happy combination of the two. His religious music was readily admitted by Franz Joseph to be superior to his own in style and treatment. Bound closely to his Salzburg circle, Michael enjoyed friendly relations with the Mozart family and many other musicians, as well as clerics and students, including (briefly) Carl Maria von WEBER.

Bibliography: H. JANCIK, Michael Haydn (Zurich 1952); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 5:1933–44. E. TITTEL, Österreichische Kirchenmusik (Vienna 1961). R. G. PAULY, "The Reforms of Church Music under Joseph II," Musical Quarterly 43 (1957) 372–382. Most of his music is still unpublished, but his Masses are ed. by A. M. KLAFSKY in Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich (1893–; repr. Graz 1959–) v. 45, 62. R. ANGERMÜLLER, "Geistliche Werke von Michael Haydn in der k. k. Hofkapelle in Wien 1820–1896," Kirchenmusikalisches Jahrbuch 78 (1994) 83–93. R. D. MILLER, The Graduals of Johann Michael Haydn: Performance Editions and Studies of Selected Works (Ph.D. diss. Texas Tech University 1998). R. G. PAULY, Michael Haydn's Latin Proprium Missae Compositions (Ph.D. diss. Yale University 1956). R. G. PAULY and C. H. SHERMAN, "Michael Haydn," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 8:407–412. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 369–370. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 740–741.

[F. J. MOLECK]

HAYDOCK, GEORGE, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. ca. 1556 at Cottam Hall, Preston, Lancashire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered Feb. 12, 1584 at Tyburn (London). He was the youngest son of devout Catholics: Evan Haydock and Helen Westby of Mowbreck Hall, Lancashire. About 1574 or 1575, he followed his father and brother to Douai, then continued his studies at the English Colleges in Rome and Rheims. After his ordination at Rheims, Dec. 21, 1581, he returned to England. In February 1582 he was arrested in London and spent 15 months in the Tower, where he was able to administer the Sacraments to his fellow prisoners even though he was suffering from a recurrence of malaria. He was indicted with BB. Wm. DEAN, James Fenn, Silhouette profile of Michael Haydn.

Thomas Hemerford, John Munden, John Nutter (all beatified 1929), and two other priests on Feb. 5, 1583, on charges of conspiracy against the queen at Rheims. They were found guilty on Feb. 7 and sentenced to death. The other four were shackled to "the pit" in the Tower, but Haydock, still weak from malaria, was sent back to his quarters lest he cheat the executioner by dying in prison. He said Mass early on Wednesday Feb. 12, before being drawn in hurdles to Tyburn and disemboweled while alive. An eyewitness account of the execution, which is included in Pollen's Unpublished Documents relating to the English Martyrs (London, Catholic Record Society, 1908, v. 5), describes Haydock as "a man of complexion fayre, of countenance milde, and in professing of his faith passing stoute." He was especially known for his devotion to the successor of Peter and to St. DOROTHY. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with 84 companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: Catholic Record Society publications (London, 1905–), II, V, passim, III, 12-15; IV, 74. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924).

Patrick Joseph Hayes.

H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 74, 103. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891) 252, 253, 304.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HAYES, PATRICK JOSEPH

Cardinal; b. New York City, Nov. 20, 1867; d. New York City, Sept. 4, 1938. His parents, Daniel and Mary (Gleason) Hayes, came from Killarney, Ireland. His mother died when Patrick was five, and he was brought up by her sister and brother-in-law, Ellen and James Egan. After attending Transfiguration School, the De La Salle Institute, and Manhattan College, all run by the Christian Brothers in New York City, he entered St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, N.Y., in 1888. He was ordained on Sept. 8, 1892, by Abp. Michael A. Corrigan and then went to the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., where he received his S.T.L. degree in 1894. On his return to New York City, he was assigned as curate to St. Gabriel's parish, where he became secretary to the pastor, John M. Farley. When Farley was named archbishop of New York in 1902, Hayes was appointed (1903) chancellor of the archdiocese and president of Cathedral College, a new preparatory seminary housed in the chancery building. He retained these offices until Oct. 28, 1914, when Cardinal Farley consecrated him titular bishop of Tagaste. Hayes served as pastor of St. Stephen's parish, New York City, from 1915 until he was appointed military ordinary on Nov. 24, 1917. The U.S. entry into World War I had necessitated rapid expansion of the Chaplain Corps of the U.S. Armed Forces. To meet this need Benedict XV had created a U.S. military ordinariate and named Hayes as its first head. Within a year, the U.S. Army and National Guard increased the number of their chaplains from 25 to nearly 900. Hayes visited military camps in America, but did not get to the European front partly because of the illness of Cardinal Farley, who died Sept. 17, 1918.

On March 10, 1919, Hayes became the fifth archbishop of New York; on March 24, 1924, he was made a cardinal priest. The major concern of his administration was the founding (1920) of Catholic Charities, a widely copied organization that unified and expanded Catholic charitable works. Although he supported temperance and opposed the child-labor amendment on states' rights grounds, Hayes tended to shun controversy and involvement in public issues and restricted his activities mainly to his archdiocese, where he founded 60 new parishes by 1929. Though he was stricken by a severe and lingering illness in 1932, he retained his post as military ordinary until his death. He was one of the four signatories of the Program of Social Reconstruction (1919) issued by the National Catholic War Council and gave firm support to its successor, the National Catholic Welfare Conference. He served also as president of the Catholic Near East Welfare Association and attended the National Eucharistic Congress at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1935 as the personal representative of Pius XI. Hayes was the recipient of numerous foreign, papal, and civic awards.

Bibliography: Archives, Archdiocese of New York, St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, N.Y. J. B. KELLY, Cardinal Hayes (New York 1940). PARISH VISITORS OF MARY IMMACULATE, ed., The Cardinal of Charity (New York 1927). G. J. WARING, United States Catholic Chaplains in the World War (New York 1924).

[F. D. COHALAN]

HAYMARUS MONACHUS

Florentine monk, Patriarch of Jerusalem, and poet; d. 1202. He was the author of the De expugnatione civitatis Acconensis (De expugnata Accone liber tetrastichus), a poem first printed by John Basil Herold in the appendix to his continuation of WILLIAM OF TYRE (Basel 1549). Herold identified the author as Monachus, a Florentine, who was bishop of Acre. Paul Riant gave him the full title of Haymarus Monachus de Florentia. Since Monachus was also a common Florentine name, there has been some disagreement among scholars about his identity. It is generally believed that he was a monk of Corbizzi in Florence, who became chancellor of Jerusalem in 1171, archbishop of Caesarea from 1181 to 1192, and patriarch of Jerusalem from 1192 to 1202. Since Jerusalem was then occupied by the Muslims, Haymarus established his residence in Acre; hence the confusion with Acre. His poem was edited by William Stubbs. Monachus is also credited with the Narratio patriarchae or De viribus Agarenorum, written in 1199 at the request of Innocent III, and later incorporated into the De sancta cruce of JACQUES DE VITRY.

Bibliography: P. É. D. Riant, De Haymaro monacho (Paris 1865). Chronica Magistri Rogeri de Houedene, ed. W. Stubbs, 4 v. (Rolls Series 51; 1868–71) 3:cv–cxxxvi. M. Manitius, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:701–703. J. de Ghellinck, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2:126, 127, 130.

[V. L. BULLOUGH]

HAYMO OF FAVERSHAM

Franciscan liturgist, the only English minister general; b. probably at Faversham in Kent, England; d. Anagni, Italy, 1244. He was already a priest and a theologian of established reputation when he joined the Franciscan Order in Paris in 1226 or 1228 (see FRANCISCANS). From the first he was an influential figure; he held office as custos of Paris and as lector at Bologna, Padua, and Tours, and was a member of a papal mission to the Eastern Church in 1233–34. He became the ringleader of the group of Paris masters who, from 1236, organized opposition to ELIAS OF CORTONA, and he was their spokesman in the chapter in which Elias was deposed in 1239. He succeeded Albert of Pisa as provincial minister in England in 1239, and as minister general in 1240. He was deeply committed to a program of reform that ensured that the new constitutional framework, inaugurated in 1239, became established on a secure basis. He modified some of the new statutes, noting criticisms from other Franciscans and what the Dominicans were doing. His legislation gave the general chapter a clearer control over the minister general, and fundamentally altered the composition of the order by disqualifying lay brothers from holding office and virtually ending their recruitment. His other outstanding achievement was his scholarly revision of the liturgy. The Ordinals he produced were so convenient and comprehensible that they were adopted throughout the Church.

Bibliography: Sources. THOMAS OF ECCLESTON, De adventu Fratrum Minorum in Angliam, ed. A. G. LITTLE (2d ed. Manchester 1951). S. J. P. VAN DIJK, ed., Sources of the Modern Roman Liturgy:

The Ordinals by Haymo of Faversham and Related Documents, 2 v. (Studia et documenta Franciscana 1 and 2; Leiden 1963). Literature. A. PISVIN, Catholicisme 5:539–540. R. B. BROOKE, Early Franciscan Government: Elias to Bonaventure (Cambridge, Eng. 1959). L. HARDICK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1325. S. J. P. VAN DIJK and J. H. WALKER, The Origins of the Modern Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1960).

[R. B. BROOKE]

HAYMO OF HALBERSTADT

Bishop and theologian; b. late 8th century; d. March 28, 853. There are relatively few known details of Haymo's early life, but he was a monk at Fulda and was sent to the celebrated school at Tours (c. 802), where he became a fellow pupil of RABANUS MAURUS and was able to attend the lectures of the renowned ALCUIN. Shortly before Alcuin's death (May 8, 804), Haymo returned to Fulda, where he taught in the monastic school as testified by several documents of the years 815 to 820, written probably in his hand. Haymo seems also to have been at the abbey of HERSFELD for some time, and it was while there that he was named bishop of Halberstadt in 840. As bishop he participated in the synods of Mainz in 847 and 852. TRITHEMIUS calls Haymo "a most learned man, a penetrating interpreter of the Scriptures," basing his judgment on the numerous works that have been attributed to him; but the ascribed homiletical and exegetical works are nearly all spurious. Several works formerly attributed to Haymo are now thought to belong to Haymo of Hirschau (d. c. 1107), but it is difficult to know which of the two authors composed any particular work that has survived. Some of Haymo's works are: De corpore et sanguine Christi (Patrologia Latina 118:815–818), a treatise on the dogma of transubstantiation; De vanitate librorum, sive de amore coelestis patriae libri tres, a treatise on detachment from the world and the desire of heaven, valuable largely because it is a testimony to the piety of the 9th century; and Historiae sacrae epitome (Patrologia Latina 118:819–874), which is derived from earlier historians (Eusebius) and records the principal events of Christian times up to the death of Emperor THEODOSIUS (395). A biography of Haymo (Archiv 11:285), written c. 1000 by Rochus, a monk of Ilsenburg, is no longer extant except for a few fragments. No official cult of Haymo exists, but he is often given the title saint or blessed, and he appears in the Benedictine martyrology for March 27.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) v.116–118, passim. J. GAUTIER, Catholicisme 1:248. M. MÄHLER, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 1:261–262. Histoire littéraire de la France (Paris 1733–68)

5:111–126. G. ALLMANG, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 1:1187–88. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:292, 295, 500, 516–517. G. BAADER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:1325–26. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:383. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 5:583–586.

[V. A. SCHAEFER]

HAYNALD, LUDWIG

Cardinal; b. Szécsény, Hungary, Nov. 3, 1816; d. Kalocsa, Hungary, July 4, 1891. After studies in Budapest and Vienna he was ordained (1839), taught law and ecclesiastical history, and then acted as secretary to Abp. József Kopácsy of Esztergom (1845–49). In 1851 he became coadjutor bishop, and in 1852 bishop of Alba Iulia in Transylvania. The separation of Transylvania from Hungary, which was then in force, brought Haynald into conflict with the Hungarian government. He had to resign his see and leave the country (1861). When the political situation in Hungary changed, Haynald was recalled from his Roman exile and named archbishop of Kalocsa (1867). At VATICAN COUNCIL I Haynald was a leading opponent of the definition of papal infallibility. He wanted to cast a negative vote in the final ballot “in the sight of pope, kings, peoples, and of the future.” On the day of the definition, however, he submitted to the council’s decision. Haynald was a zealous bishop and a promoter of education and sciences, especially of his favorite science, botany, which he himself studied.

Bibliography: L. TÓTH, “Le Cardinale Haynald,” Nouvelle Revue de Hongrie 64 (1941) 11–19. T. V. BOGYAY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:42. E. C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 1869–1870, 2 v. (New York 1930).

[F. MAASS]

HAZE, MARIA THERESIA, BL.

Baptized Jeanne, known in religion as Marie-Thérèse du Sacré-Coeur de Jésus, founder of the Daughters of the Holy Cross of Liège; b. Feb. 27, 1782, Liège, Belgium; d. there, Jan. 7, 1876. Haze experienced considerable hardship in her early life because the French Revolution forced her parents into exile and caused the loss of their property. With the guidance of Canon Jean-Guillaume Habets (d. 1876), the co-founder, Maria founded her religious congregation in Lüttich (1833) with five companions using the Rule of the JESUITS. The sisters conducted schools, nursed the sick, took care of women who were penitents or prisoners, and tended the destitute in public poorhouses. During Maria’s lifetime the congregation, which was recognized by the Vatican on Oct. 1, 1845 and approved on May 9, 1851, spread to Germany, India, and England. Her cause for beatification, introduced by Pope Pius IX (1851) and formally opened with the commissio introductionis causae by Pope PIUS X (1911), was concluded by Pope John Paul II, who beatified her on April 21, 1991.

Bibliography: L. HUMBLET, La Vénérable Mère Marie-Thérèse Haze (Liège 1924). J. DE MARCHI, The Venerable Mother Marie Thérèse Haze (1928). M. E. PIETROMARCHI, La venerabile Maria Teresa Haze, fondatrice delle Figlie delle Croce (Rome 1946). A. VÄTH, Unter dem Kreuzesbanner (2d ed. Düsseldorf 1929).

[M. B. BLISS]

HEALING, CHRISTIAN

The Christian message of salvation presents sickness as connected with sin, if not personal sin (cf. Jn 9.2–3), at any rate with the original Fall. Hence arises the question of a religious approach to its cure. In fact, Christians, besides seeking recovery by means of medical care, have always believed in the help of prayer and religious blessings, or in Christian healing.

History. In the Old Testament the cure of sickness was also sought in prayer and sacrifice. Sick persons seek the blessing of priests or Prophets and implore healing as a grace. Miraculous cures are mentioned in 1 Kgs 17.17–24 (the son of the widow of Sarephta called back to life by Elijah), 2 Kgs 4.18–37 (Elisha raising the son of the Sunamite woman), and 2 Kings ch. 5 (Elisha curing Naaman of his leprosy). Sickness is often attributed to the devil. Together with sin and the reign of the devil it is to be excluded from the last messianic times.

In the New Testament Christ’s miraculous healing of the sick is one of the signs that the last messianic times have come (cf. Mt 11.4–5). Not only He Himself but the Apostles also heal the sick (Mt 10.1), sometimes by anointing them (Mk 6.13). Faith or trust on the part of the sick is required as a condition for the cure; it is not its cause (cf. Mt 13.58).

In the nascent Church, the CHARISM of healing shows itself in the miraculous cures wrought by the Apostles (Acts 3.1–16; 8.7; 9.32–42). St. Paul mentions it in his list of charisms (1 Cor 12.9, 28, 30). Besides, there is mentioned in Js 5.14–16 an Anointing of the Sick by the presbyters not only for a bodily cure but also for a spiritual effect (forgiveness of sins). The Church later recognized here the Sacrament of Anointing of the Sick.

“Christ Healing the Paralytic,” from the “Predis Codex,” 1476 manuscript painting by Cristoforo de Predis. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

In the early centuries St. James’s text is invoked to justify both a liturgical anointing of the sick by bishops or priests for spiritual and corporal healing alike (the Sacrament) and a private anointing by the sick person himself or others mainly for recovery (a SACRAMENTAL; cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 216). The practice of praying for recovery from sickness in private or liturgical prayer is found throughout the Christian centuries. The Church sanctioned prayers and blessings against sickness, whether preventive or curative, and also recourse to PATRON SAINTS against particular diseases. Here, however, superstitious deviations were not always avoided.

When the doctrine of the Sacraments became explicit in the awareness of the Church (11th–12th centuries), the Anointing of the Sick was counted among the seven Sacraments, and bodily healing came to be considered as its subordinate and conditional effect (cf. Enchiridion symolorum, 1696).

The presence of the charism of healing in the Church was attested in the miraculous cures effected by saints (modern critical hagiography admits many as authentic). The norms for canonization of saints fixed by Benedict

XIV required authentic miracles, usually cures, as signs from heaven confirming their heroic virtue. Another category of miraculous cures are the ones that occur at places of pilgrimage, those in honor of Our Lady in particular, such as LOURDES. The Church after due examination recognizes some of these cures as genuine miracles. Although miraculous cures of this kind are linked to faith, they are not to be confused with the “faith healing” that refuses ordinary means of medical treatment and therapy.

Catholic theology accepting the reality that in human beings body, soul, and spirit constantly interact encourages interdisciplinary cooperation between medical professionals, psychologists, and clergy in the care of individual patients. Most healing is a process involving a time and sequence known only to God. It calls for a community of persons, professional and lay, willing to spend time with those who suffer and love them into wholeness, using the best medical and spiritual means available.

Healing and the Sacraments. The renaming and ritual revision of two important channels of healing, the Sacraments of Reconciliation and of Anointing proposed by the Second Vatican Council, highlight Christ’s will for all to become whole in body and spirit. In administering the Sacrament of Reconciliation, the priest has new opportunities to spend time with the penitent, discovering with the help of the Holy Spirit the root causes of sin. He is thus able to encourage penitents to realize the spiritual and emotional healing available to them as they enter into the forgiving love of Jesus and the Father. The Sacrament of Anointing in its new format places more emphasis on the building of faith for direct physical healing in the sick person, as is clear from its ritual formula: "May the Lord, who frees you from sin, save you and raise you up." By making this Sacrament available to persons other than those in imminent danger of death, the Church reaffirms its belief in the restorative power of her anointing, in accordance with Js 5.14–16.

Throughout the centuries the healing Sacrament par excellence has been the Eucharist, an occasion for Christians to enter into greater wholeness on all levels, spiritual, emotional, and physical. Special Masses for healing, sometimes combined with the Sacrament of Anointing for the sick, are held to call the attention of the faithful to the healing power of the Eucharistic Liturgy. Christian healing, which finds its culmination in the Eucharistic celebration of a community gathered in love and prayer, extends beyond personal concerns for bodily and spiritual fulfillment: it calls Christians to work and prayer for the unity of the Body of Christ and the healing of society.

Church-related health services pledge themselves to minister on all levels to the sick and disabled, providing a witness of Gospel values through an environment of love and respect for human dignity, especially important in the experience of death. Entered into with faith and joyful acceptance when it is ultimately seen to be the will of God, a Christian death, graced by the Sacraments, is the most complete healing of all, an entrance into the eternal fullness of life won for all Christians by Christ on Calvary.

In conclusion it should be emphasized that belief in Christian healing does not dispense one from having recourse to medical care. Religious factors do not replace medical care; they help for recovery, not (as medicine does) by directly acting on the level of biological or chemical or physiological realities, but by strengthening the grace life of the sick person or by miracle.

See Also: ANOINTING; ANOINTING OF THE SICK, I (THEOLOGY OF); ANOINTING OF THE SICK, II (LITURGY OF).

Bibliography: J. GIBLET and P. GRELOT, "Maladie-guérison," Vocabulaire de théologie biblique, ed. X. LÉON-DUFOUR et al. (Paris 1962) 566–570. Le Christ et les malades (Cahiers de la vie spirituelle 6; Paris 1945). Z. ALSZEGHY, "L'effeto corporale dell'estrema unzione," Gregorianum 38 (1957) 385–405. M. KELSEY, Healing and Christianity (New York 1973). F. MACNUTT, Healing (Notre Dame, IN 1974); Power to Heal (Notre Dame, IN 1977). J. SANFORD, Healing and Wholeness (New York 1977).

[P. DE LETTER/J. HILL]

HEALY, JAMES AUGUSTINE

Bishop; b. Macon, Ga., April 6, 1830; d. Portland, Me., Aug. 5, 1900. He was born on a plantation in Jones County, Ga. His father, Michael Morris Healy, was an Irish immigrant from County Roscommon. His mother was a Negro slave, Eliza Smith. In 1837 James was placed in a Quaker school at Flushing, Long Island, N.Y. He was sent in 1844 to the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass., from which he graduated in the first class (1849). After two years in the Sulpician seminary in Montreal, Canada, he entered the Sulpician seminary in Paris. He was ordained in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, Paris, on June 10, 1854. Healy was transferred to the Diocese of Boston, Mass., by Bp. John Bernard Fitzpatrick, and served there for 21 years in various capacities. He was the bishop's secretary, the first chancellor of the diocese, the assistant at St. John's Church, the rector of the cathedral, and the pastor and builder of St. James Church in Boston. Healy, active in welfare work and civic life, played a decisive role in the development of the Home for Destitute Catholic Children, the House of the Good Shepherd, St. Anne's Foundling Home, and the Catholic Laymen's Union.

In February 1875 he was named to the See of Portland, Me., where he was consecrated on June 2, 1875. For 25 years he governed his large diocese, supervising also the founding of the Diocese of Manchester, N.H., when it was cut off from Portland in 1885. His administration added to the diocese more than 60 parishes, 68 mission stations, 18 new schools and convents, and a well-developed series of welfare institutions. Healy also achieved recognition as a pulpit orator and appeared frequently as the featured speaker at civic and ecclesiastical functions in the New England states. Among his other activities were his contributions to American Church law at the Baltimore Council of 1884 and his work as a consultant to the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. On his silver jubilee as a bishop he was named assistant at the papal throne.

Bibliography: A. S. FOLEY, Bishop Healy: Beloved Outcaste (New York 1954). W. L. LUCEY, The Catholic Church in Maine (Francestown, N.H. 1957). A. S. FOLEY, Dream of an Outcast: Patrick F. Healy (Tuscaloosa 1989). C. DAVIS, The History of Black Catholics in the United States (New York 1993).

[A. S. FOLEY]

HEALY, PATRICK JOSEPH

Church historian and educator; b. Waterford, Ireland, July 26, 1871; d. Washington, D.C., May 18, 1937. After ordination (1897) for the Archdiocese of New York, he attended The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., for graduate study in Church history (B.Th. 1898, L.Th. 1899, S.T.D. 1903). His unpublished licentiate thesis, "An Inquiry into the Origin and History of Origen's Allegorical System," is available in the Mullen Library of Catholic University. His doctoral dissertation, The Valerian Persecution: A Study of the Relations between Church and State in the Third Century, A.D. (New York 1905), received wide acclaim. He did further study at the Universities of Bonn and Heidelberg.

After a short period as an assistant in Holy Innocents' parish in New York City, he returned to Catholic University as an instructor. In 1910 he was elevated to the Patrick Quinn professorship of Church history and was chosen dean of the faculty of theology, a post he held at various times subsequently. He offered courses in early Church history, patrology, the history of monasticism, and the history of Church-State relations. Healy was the editor (1911–14) of the Catholic University Bulletin in the final years of its existence as a scholarly publication. He contributed many book reviews to it, as well as articles on monasticism, on Constantine and toleration, on Constantinople, and on Justinian and Charlemagne.

Bibliography: The Catholic University Bulletin 5.4 (Aug. 1937) 9. Archives, The Catholic U. of Amer., rector's files.

[A. K. ZIEGLER]

HEART (IN THE BIBLE)

In the Old Testament the word for heart is lēb or lēbāb; in the New Testament it is καρδιά or νοῦς. The definition and use of these terms will be treated in this article.

The Hebrew word lēb is derived probably from a root that etymologically means "agitated motion." It is seldom used in the proper sense, referring to the vital organ that pumps blood through the body (1 Sm 25.37; Jb 41.16; etc.). In the Bible the term "heart" is used mostly in a transferred sense, referring to the inner resources of the total person as capable of acting, with the accent more specifically on his will or intellect, less often his emotions; it is characteristic of Semitic thought that heart never prescind from the total person.

In 1 Sm 16.7 heart refers specifically to the invisible inner man: "man seeth those things that appear; but the Lord beholdeth the heart." In Ps 83(84).3 the Psalmist wishes to say that his total being yearns for God, and so he includes his heart together with his flesh and SOUL. Heart in this context is equivalent to the most noble inner part of man, i.e., his SPIRIT (rūah), as is the sense of heart in the great commandment of love [Dt 6.5; see also Ps 118(119).2].

Heart appears in the sense of person as source of thought in Nm 16.28: "Moses said 'This is how you shall know that it was the Lord who sent me to do all I have done and that it was not I who claimed it.'" "Not I who claimed it," is literally "not from my heart" (see also Nm 24.13; 1 Kgs 12.33).

Heart is used in the sense of person as the source of volition in 1 Kgs 8.17; "And David my father would have built a house to the name of the Lord, the God of Israel." "And David my father would have" is literally "it was with the heart of David my father."

Heart is used less often to signify the emotions. In Jer 49.22 heart is used in the sense of courage: "on that day the hearts of Edom's heroes shall be like the heart of a woman in travail" (see also Dt 15.10; 28.47).

In the New Testament two words translate the Hebrew lēb, καρδιά and νοῦς. They both denote the inner person as the source of action; καρδιά more specifically denotes volition and emotion while νοῦς denotes intellect.

In Lk 16.15 καρδιά specifically denotes the invisible inner man: "You are they who declare yourselves just in the sight of man, but God knows your heart (cf. 1 Thes 2.4; Rom 8.27). However, καρδιά is also used to refer to understanding (2 Cor 4.6; Mt 13.15) and to willing (2 Cor 9.7; Lk 21.14).

In the New Testament νοῦς is used for lēb only in Pauline literature with the exceptions of Lk 24.45; Rv 13.18; 17.9. In Rom 7.23 νοῦς, parallel to "the inner man," signifies the higher mental part of the natural man; it is transformed by Baptism to a new mode of being (Rom 12.2; Eph 4.23).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 947–48. J. BEHM, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament 3:609–16. J. P. E. PEDERSEN, Israel: Its Life and Culture, 4 v. in 2 (New York 1926–40) 1:99–81. R. BULTMANN, Theology of the New Testament, tr. K. GROBEL (New York 1951–) 1:190–259. C. TRESMONTANT, A Study of Hebrew Thought, tr. M. F. GIBSON (New York 1960) 83–124. M. BAILY, "Biblical Man and Some Formulae of Christian Teaching," Irish Theological Quarterly 27 (1960) 173–200.

[W. E. LYNCH]

HEART OF JESUS, INSTITUTE OF THE

A SECULAR INSTITUTE of diocesan priests, founded by Joseph Pierre Picot de Clorivière, SJ, in Paris in 1791 and revived there by Reverend Daniel Fontaine in 1918. This society became a secular institute in 1951 and was introduced in the United States by Reverend Yves M. Guenver in 1957. The priest members remain in their diocesan assignments under the complete authority of their bishops. The purpose of the society, to develop fully the grace of the priesthood and total dedication to priestly work, is accomplished by means of the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; a flexible rule of life; regular spiritual direction; and a fraternal community. The spirit of the institute is that of Christ's redemptive love, symbolized by the Sacred Heart, sustained by prayer, and exercised by fraternal and pastoral charity. Members make an hour's daily meditation, report regularly on their spiritual exercises and finances, and meet monthly. Their poverty is marked by simplicity and generosity, and is adapted to their secular state; property ownership is retained, but under the superior's control. Since the society exercises no control over its members' apostolate, obedience is due to the superior only in matters of the spiritual life.

[S. J. PLATT/EDS.]

HEART OF MARY, DAUGHTERS OF THE

(DHM, Official Catholic Directory #0810), a religious community with papal approbation, founded in France in 1790 by Pierre Joseph Picot de Clorivière, a Jesuit priest, and Marie Adelaide de Cicé. The immediate object was the preservation of the religious life, the very existence of which was then threatened by the French Revolution. Following the Rule of St. Ignatius of Loyola, the members of this society take public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but they do not wear a religious habit and they have no cloister. Initial approval of this unique community was granted by Pius VII in 1801; final approbation of the constitutions was given by Leo XIII in 1890.

The work of the sisters varies greatly according to needs and circumstances. Some members live together in common houses (convents) and engage in such organized activities as teaching, retreat work, catechetical instruction, social service, and missionary outreach. Other sisters who are retained in the world by family obligations or apostolic commitments continue to pursue their religious duties and ideals while engaged in professions or other occupations. In this way it is possible for them to exercise a Christian influence in areas that are hostile to religious wearing a habit. The community first established itself in the United States in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1851. Its members in the United States are sometimes referred to as Nardins, a name derived from Miss Ernestine Nardin, a Daughter of the Heart of Mary who founded Nardin Academy in Buffalo, New York, in 1857. The congregation is found throughout Europe, Africa, Asia, and the Americas. The general motherhouse is in Paris; the United States provincial headquarters, in Holyoke, Massachusetts.

[W. J. DONOVAN/EDS.]

HEATH, HENRY, BL.

Franciscan priest, martyr; known in religion as Paul of St. Magdalen; b. c. 1599 near Peterborough, Northamptonshire; hanged, drawn, and quartered April 17, 1643 at Tyburn (London) under Charles I. He was the son of the Protestant John Heath. After receiving his degree at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge (1621), he became the college librarian. In 1622, he was received into the Church by George Muscott. After a short stay at the English College at Douai, he entered St. Bonaventure's convent there c. 1624–25, where he led a frugal and scholarly existence for many years. Upon obtaining permission to join the English Mission in early 1643, he crossed from Dunkirk to Dover disguised as a sailor, then walked from Dover to London. On the night of his arrival in London, he was arrested as a shoplifter. When papers found in his cap betrayed his religion, he was taken to Compter Prison. The next day he was brought before the lord mayor, and, on confessing he was a priest, was sent to Newgate. Examined by a Parliamentary committee, he was indicted for his priesthood. At his place of execution, Heath reconciled one of the criminals that was to die with him. In an unusual act of mercy, he was allowed to hang until he was dead. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924), II, 175. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HEATH, NICHOLAS

Last Catholic archbishop of York; b. London, 1501?; d. Tower of London, December 1578. He was the son of Agnes and William Heath, a "citizen and cutler of London" in comfortable circumstances. Nicholas's family was related to the Heaths of Twickenham in Middlesex and of Apsley, Tamworth. Nicholas was educated at St. Anthony's, London (where Thomas MORE was also a student), Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and Christ's College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1521. After ordination he was appointed vicar of Hever, Surrey (1531–32), and in 1534 archdeacon of Stafford. The following year he took the degree of D.D. at Cambridge. His witty exposure of the supposed revelations of Elizabeth BARTON, holy maid of Kent, brought him court notice. In December 1535 he was sent on embassy by Henry VIII to the German princes assembled at Schmalkald, where Philipp Melancthon is said to have admired his learning. Through the patronage of Archbishop CRANMER, he was appointed king's almoner and in 1539 was schismatically elected bishop of Rochester. He was later transferred to the See of Worcester (1543).

Heath's real views on the religious issue became clear in his opposition to the extreme reforms under Edward VI. In 1550 he refused to subscribe to Cranmer's new form of ordination, or to obey the order to take down altars and set up tables in the churches. He was committed to Fleet Prison, March 4, 1550, and shortly afterward was deprived of his see. This was restored to him upon the accession of MARY TUDOR as queen. As he had been appointed bishop during the schism, this restoration was not confirmed by the pope, through Cardinal Pole, until 1555, at which time the queen immediately appointed him archbishop of York. He received the pallium Oct. 3, 1555. Heath procured the restitution of many properties belonging to the see that had been alienated by his reforming predecessor, Robert Holgate. This return of properties was facilitated by Heath's appointment in 1556 as lord chancellor of England. In suppressing heresy under Mary he acted with prudence and advocated moderation, but as lord chancellor he was obliged to issue the writ for execution of his former patron, Archbishop Cranmer. As papal legate, Heath consecrated Cardinal Pole as archbishop of Canterbury, while as chancellor of England he proclaimed ELIZABETH I as queen at the death of Mary in 1558.

Immediately upon Elizabeth's accession, he surrendered the Great Seal, but remained in the Privy Council. Heath's speech in the first Parliament under Elizabeth dissenting from the Bills for Supremacy and changes in religion, still extant, is courageous and clear in principles. On July 5, 1559, having refused the oath of supremacy, he was deprived of his see, and committed to the Tower where he remained until 1571. He was allowed to reside at his own estate at Chobham Park, Surrey. Heath seems to have been recommitted to the Tower shortly before his death. He was buried in Chobham Church, next to his brother William, under a plain marble stone.

"Angels Welcoming the Saved into Heaven," engraving by William Morris from "The Earthly Paradise," 1896. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Bibliography: L. B. SMITH, Tudor Prelates and Politics (Princeton 1953). P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963). G. E. PHILLIPS, The Extinction of the Ancient Hierarchy (St. Louis 1905). H. N. BIRT, The Elizabethan Religious Settlement (London 1907). T. E. BRIDGETT and T. F. KNOX, The True Story of the Catholic Hierarchy (London 1889). N. SANDERS, "Report to Cardinal Moroni," ed. J. H. POLLEN in Catholic Record Society Miscellanea 1 (1905) 1–56. W. R. TRIMBLE, The Catholic Laity in Elizabethan England 1558–1603 (Cambridge, Mass. 1964). J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present time, 5 v. (London-New York 1885–1902; repr. New York 1961) 3:242–251.

[J. D. HANLON]

HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE)

In the Old Testament the word heaven is used both with cosmological significance as part of the physical universe and with religious significance as the dwelling place of God, particularly as the source of His salutary blessings. In the New Testament heaven is, on the one hand, the place from which Christ came and to which He returned and, on the other hand, the ultimate home of the blessed who die in the Lord.

In the Old Testament. Cosmologically the Hebrew word for heaven or the heavens (šamayim) is often used as the equivalent of firmament. In such contexts heaven indicates the solid vault that holds back the waters above the firmament (Gn 1.8; Ps 148.4–6). In this vault are windows or floodgates that open to let rain fall on the earth (Gn 7.11; 2 Kgs 7.2, 19; Mal 3.10). The heavens are like a huge inverted bowl whose rim rests firmly on foundation pillars (2 Sm 22.8; Jb 26.11). The stars of heaven are suspended from this solid dome (Gn 1.14). The Israelites were impressed particularly by the unshakable solidity of the heavens (Ps 148.6; Is 40.22, 44.24, 45.12). At the end of time, however, their structure will be shaken and destroyed (Mt 5.18, 24.29; Mk 13.25; Ap 6.13, 8.10, 9.1). Whereas the firmament (rāqîa') is a technical term designating this vault, šamayim has a more general meaning; it often means all that is above the earth. Thus the birds who fly in the air are called the “birds of heaven” (Gn 1.26, 1.28, 1.30, 2.19–20). Heaven describes also the region above the firmament where God has built His storehouses for snow, hail, and wind [Jb 37.9, 37.12, 38.22; Jer 49.36; Ps 134(135).7]. Since Hebrew had no single word to express the concept of world [see WORLD (IN THE BIBLE)] or universe, the phrase “heaven and earth” was used to indicate the sum total of all that God had made (Gn 1.1, 2.4). [See COSMOGONY (IN THE BIBLE)].

Heaven is God’s abode (Dt 26.15; Ps 2.4). In all the cosmological contexts the heavens are spoken of as God’s handiwork, for He spreads them out (Is 40.22, 44.24) and establishes their foundations (2 Sm 22.8). Heaven belongs to God in a special way as His dwelling place. God gives men the earth as their special domain [Gn 1.28; Ps 8.6–10, 113B(115).16], but He reserves heaven for Himself. It would be colossal pride on man’s part, such as the pride of Babel (Gn 11.1–9; Is 14.13–14; cf. Lk 10.15; 2 Thes 2.4), to attempt to force one’s way up to heaven. God rules all things from His throne in heaven. The throne is pictured as resting upon the firmament (Ex 24.10; Is 66.1); His palace is built above the waters of the heavens [Ps 103(104).3, 13]. There the King is surrounded by His heavenly court (1 Kgs 22.19–22; Jb 1.6; Is 6.1–3). Israelite tradition strove to express in various ways the truth that the transcendent God, dwelling in the heavens, was also Yahweh present and active in the midst of His people upon earth. In the YAHWIST narratives Yahweh “comes down” to earth to intervene in the affairs of men (Gn 11.5, 11.7, 19.24; Ex 19.18). He also “comes down” to meet with Moses or the people at the tent from time to time (Ex 33.9; Nm 11.17, 11.25, 12.5). The BETHEL narrative (Gn 28.10–12) shows that the earthly sanctuary is the site of God’s special presence because it is the point of contact between heaven and earth. When Jacob had a vision at Bethel of angels descending from heaven, he called the place “the gate of heaven” (Gn 28.17). The theology of the DEUTERONOMISTS places greater emphasis upon heaven as the dwelling place of God in order to underline the divine transcendence. God sends before the people His angel in whom “His name” resides (Ex 23.21); He is present in His temple by “His name” (Dt 12.11), but God Himself remains always in heaven. In Deuteronomy Yahweh speaks to His people from heaven (Dt 4.36) rather than from Mt. Sinai itself (Ex 19.11, 18, 20). God cannot dwell upon earth since even “the heavens and the highest heavens [i.e., the region above the firmament] cannot contain” Him (1 Kgs 8.27). This transcendence, however, does not result in remoteness, for God dominates all things and knows them intimately [Jer 23.23–24; 2 Chr 2.6, 6.18; Ps 138(139).8–12]. In the later sections of the Old Testament, those dating from the Persian period, “the God of heaven” becomes the usual title for Yahweh [Dn 2.18–19, 28, 37, 44; Jon 1.9; Ps 135(136).26; Ezr 1.2; Neh 1.4–5; 2 Chr 3.23].

Israel looked to heaven as the source of salvation and of all blessings (Gn 49.25; Dt 33.13; 1 Kgs 8.35). In the heavens God had established His grace and His salvific word [Ps 88(89).3; 118(119).89]. Israel looked back with nostalgia to the time before man on earth had been shut off from heaven. Man had then enjoyed familiarity with God and the fullness of blessings (Gn 2.8–14; 3.8, 17–19). Israel longed for the day when God would rend the heavens to bring SALVATION to earth (Is 63.19; 45.8). On his part, man expressed the desire that he himself should somehow be lifted up to heaven, where he would find perfect salvation in communion with God [Ps 72(73).23–28]. This special privilege was accorded ENOCH (Gn 5.24) and ELIJAH (2 Kgs 2.11). Salvation would somehow consist not only in a descent of God to earth, but also in a return of man to God in heaven (Is 55.10–11).

In the New Testament. The desire that God would “rend the heavens and come down” (Is 63.19) was fulfilled in the coming of Jesus Christ. At the beginning of His ministry “the heavens were opened” (Mt 3.16 and parallels) in order that salvation might descend to earth (cf. Acts 2.2) and that God might reveal His Son to men (Mk 1.11, 9.6, 15.38–39). Of himself man could not ascend to heaven to behold the revelation of “the mystery hidden in God” (Eph 3.9; Jn 1.18, 3.13; Rom 10.6). God sent His Son to bring this revelation to earth (Mt 11.27; Jn 1.19, 3.11, 14.9). The Old Testament concept of the sanctuary as the place where earth was opened up to heaven (Gn 28.12) found its full realization in the person of Christ (Jn 1.47–51), who was Himself the new Temple (Jn 2.19–22). Christ returned to the Father in heaven (Jn 6.62, 13.1; Heb 9.11–12) as the first fruits of the Resurrection (1 Cor 15.20), as the firstborn among many brethren (Rom 8.29). As forerunner (Heb 6.20), He enters heaven to prepare a place for his followers (Jn 14.3).

The ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST into heaven thus inaugurates a period of eager expectation. The Christian longs for Christ's PAROUSIA from heaven (Mk 14.62; Mt 25.31; 1 Thes 1.10, 4.16; 2 Thes 1.7), when He will seek out His own and raise them up to the clouds of heaven (1 Thes 4.17; Phil 1.23; 2 Cor 5.6–8). Christ will introduce them into the kingdom of His Father (Mt 25.34; 1 Cor 15.24), the new Jerusalem (Rv 3.12, 21.3, 10–14). Heaven is the consummation of SALVATION HISTORY when the world will be transformed into a new heaven and a new earth (Is 65.17; Rom 8.19–23; 2 Pt 3.13; Rv 21.1), and God will be all in all (1 Cor 15.28).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 948–951. J. SCHMID, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*², ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:354–355. G. GLOEGE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:331–333. G. VON RAD and H. TRAUB, in G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 5:496–535. J. M. FENASSE, "Le Ciel dans la tradition biblique," La Vie spirituelle 107 (1962) 604–623. U. E. SIMON, Heaven in the Christian Tradition (New York 1958).

[J. PLASTARAS]

HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF)

This article will deal with heaven as (1) the culmination of SALVATION HISTORY and (2) the state of heavenly glory. The second section will be divided into the essential element in the state of heavenly glory and consummated heavenly glory.

Culmination of Salvation History

Heaven is the state of HAPPINESS of those who have died in Christ. Although it is often thought of as a place, this is of secondary importance. In 1950, Pius XII, defining the ASSUMPTION OF MARY, referred only to her having been "taken up to heavenly glory" without making any express reference to her going to a place. Her Assumption is modeled on the ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST into heaven. We understand heaven as the final state of those who die in Christ by reference to the final state of

Ceiling fresco depicting Jesus Christ enthroned in heaven, 18th century. (©Mimmo Jodice/CORBIS)

Christ Himself, who is the SAVIOR and head of His Mystical Body. While this refers first to those who have lived as members of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST, it must not be thought necessarily to exclude those who have preceded Christ in history, or who have never heard the call of Christ explicitly during their lifetime. We think of heaven as the state of happiness that brings full, lasting satisfaction to the whole of our being through our union with the Holy TRINITY in Christ.

We exist to give God glory and to find our happiness, but we find our happiness only in giving God glory; and it is only in Christ that we can give God glory. Thus the primary purpose of our lives is to give God glory in and through Christ, so to achieve our happiness. Likewise the primary aspect of heaven is that of the members of the totus Christus glorifying God by their participation in Christ's glory. Christ is the final temple, heaven its sanctuary in which God is perfectly adored. The picture in Revelation (ch. 4–5, 7–8) of God's glorification in the adoration of the Lamb describes heaven graphically.

Heaven is the fulfillment of the life of GRACE begun already on this earth, that life of union with the Blessed Trinity through Christ. It is the fulfillment of God's salvific plan for the whole world; hence heaven exists in the fullest sense only after the PAROUSIA of Christ at the END OF THE WORLD. Together with this will come the resurrection of the dead now in their GLORIFIED BODIES. (The body that is restored to the damned would hardly be thought of as glorified.) Even the fabric of this world will be restored as a dimension of the final condition.

God's salvific plan is accomplished in two stages: first, in the glorification of Christ, when, having risen from the dead and ascended to heaven, He sits at the right hand of His Father; and, second, when a like glorification has been given to the total community of the redeemed. (Only after Christ had entered heaven in glory was it possible for those who had died before then to pass from the limbo patrum to heaven.) The second stage, the process of transforming the human race into a like glorious state, began at the first PENTECOST and is continued through the history of the Church until it is finally achieved at the last day, when Christ comes in glory. The heavenly Jerusalem (Rv 21.2) will then manifest the final application of this SALVATION to humankind: then we human beings, fully glorified in body as well as in soul, shall in Christ share with the angels the beatifying union with the Blessed Trinity. Further theological speculation is difficult since revelation casts no further light on the matter.

State of Heavenly Glory

Theologians teach that the essential element in the state of heavenly glory is the union with the Blessed Trinity in mind and heart (called the intuitive or BEATIFIC VISION, the beatific love) resulting in the beatific joy; they further teach that other factors round off this bliss, notably the glorification of the body and the enjoyment of the renewed universe and the company of the blessed. Although essential glory is possessed by all who die in the state of grace as soon as their purification is completed, the fullness of glory is theirs only after Christ's Parousia, when they receive back their bodies in the reconstituted universe. We shall speak first of the essential element of heavenly glory and then of its consummated state after the last day.

Essential Element in Heavenly Glory. Heavenly glory is the destiny for which God intends man. Happiness is what the human person desires. Human happiness can be seen to lie in the possession of heavenly bliss.

Human Happiness. Since the attainment of its final end is the attainment of human happiness, heaven must bring a human person to a state of perfect bliss. Humanity's final end must give satisfaction to the person as a whole; it cannot therefore consist primarily in the satisfaction of our corporeal nature but must rather be concerned with our spiritual nature, which is the nobler aspect of human nature. The material aspect enables a person to find pleasure and comfort in purely material things, but the person is aware interiorly that abiding contentment cannot be dissociated from the nobler aspirations of the spirit. Aesthetic and intellectual experiences give a deeper satisfaction than bodily enjoyments, but we find our most satisfying experience in the FRIENDSHIP and LOVE of others. At the same time we have an urge to realize our potentiality to the full, and we gain deep satisfaction when we do so. We are obscurely aware that our potentiality includes even a union with the supreme GOOD itself—God. Thus the human person may be regarded as having a natural desire for union with God.

Man's Natural Desire for God. Is this desire a desire for union with God as He is in Himself? It seems so, although the Church teaches that such a destiny is SUPERNATURAL and, as such, beyond human powers to attain (see DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL). By its natural powers alone the human person could attain to a merely indirect union with God corresponding to the kind of knowledge of God that natural reason involves. Such a knowledge does not make the person aware of what God is like in Himself; it merely makes one aware that the maker of a universe containing so much that is good, beautiful, and orderly must Himself be supremely perfect and desirable. Such knowledge is knowledge about an unseen God rather than of a God with whom one is in immediate contact. Pius XII taught in HUMANI GENERIS (1950) that we may not hold that God could not create human nature without giving it a supernatural destiny and equipping it for this. Hence man has no right to the supernatural destiny that unites him to God; such a destiny is super-natural, i.e., above the due of human nature, and so is something that God gratuitously gives. However this does not imply that human nature does not have an aptitude for it and even, as many theologians would hold, a positive desire for it even before one has received the graces that equip one for it. Although some theologians assert that man would have been perfectly content with his natural destiny so as never to hanker after the much greater union with God that the supernatural destiny brings, other theologians hold that history shows humans always to have wanted this closest union with God, even though by their natural powers they are unable to attain it. The best solution, perhaps, to this problem is to say that in point of fact no one has had a destiny other than the supernatural one, since humankind has always been intended for the supernatural union with God. This is as true of man after the Fall as it was before it. Hence one should expect humankind always to have evinced a desire for union with God, even though no one was able to implement that desire until the reception of grace [J. P. Kenny, Theological Studies 14 (1953) 280–87; K. Rahner, Theological Investigations 1 (Baltimore 1961) ch. 9]. We conclude that the state of heavenly glory brings utter satisfaction to man's deepest desires so that the human person finds full happiness in the union of immediate contact with the Blessed Trinity (see DESIRE TO SEE GOD, NATURAL).

Permanence. If this happiness be complete, it follows that it is a happiness that cannot be lost either for a time or permanently; otherwise the mind and heart would not be at rest, fearing its loss; such a condition is incompatible with complete happiness. Thus Scripture (Rv 21.4) says that God wipes away every tear, indicating the absence of anything that can diminish this happiness.

Since this complete happiness is found only in union with God, its permanency involves our permanent avoidance of sin, which would affect that union with God. Theologians differ as to the precise explanation of this IMPECCABILITY of the blessed.

Teaching. Revelation teaches the existence of heavenly glory, and the Church has always taught that heavenly glory is the final destiny of all members of the KINGDOM OF GOD who live as its members should. This teaching naturally grows in precision, but it is hardly ever obscured by denial or doubt. Western theology seems to have shown more speculative interest in heaven than Eastern, but in both there are many references to our enjoying untold bliss, the possession of God, in the same abode as that of the angels. A natural curiosity prompted more questions than could be answered with likelihood, much less certainty; accordingly, profitless speculations as to the whereabouts of heaven and its internal arrangements were made.

The only divergent stream of thought was that of those who taught that Christ would reign on this earth with the good for 1,000 years before the final casting down to hell of SATAN and the transformation of this world into the new heavens and new earth. This view is known as CHILIASM (from the Greek word for a thousand) or MILLENARIANISM (from the Latin word); it originated in a misunderstanding of Rv 20.4–5, where the earthly phase of the kingdom of God is referred to. In apocalyptic literature numerals often have a special significance other than their literal one; 1,000 meant “indefinitely large,” hence “1,000 years” referred merely to the long period of the Church’s existence on earth. This belief, though held by various early Fathers, was always distinguished by them from the official teaching of the Church; furthermore it did not prevent their acceptance of the orthodox belief in heaven as the final state of the blessed.

As the understanding of the nature of heavenly bliss developed there arose doubts in the minds of some Fathers as to whether it is only at the last day that the good enjoy this intimate union with God; even St. Augustine wavered on this point. The general stream of teaching was that heavenly bliss is granted to the disembodied soul immediately after whatever necessary purification follows death. The matter was finally settled when Benedict XII in 1336 defined that we possess the beatific vision as soon as we are worthy to do so after death (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1001–02).

This definition was prompted by the private view of his predecessor, John XXII, that we must await the last day for heavenly bliss (see BENEDICTUS DEUS).

In one other matter also was there a deviation from Catholic teaching. Eunomius of Constantinople (a fourth-century Arian) thought that a human person unaided by grace could attain to direct, comprehensive knowledge of God. Hesychasts (see HESYCHASM), whom Gregory PALAMAS (d. 1359) supported, had an analogous view in that they thought that it was possible by various practices attain to union with God. Both these views, as also those of the BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS and of Michael Baius, do not adequately safeguard the supernatural character of the beatific union with God (see BAIUS AND BAIANISM). In opposing Eunomius a few Fathers (Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory of Nyssa) seem to go too far in the opposite direction; not only do they oppose the position of Eunomius, but they seem to hold that even with grace we cannot attain direct knowledge of God, so that our union with God is something less than intuitive vision; most theologians excuse them of objective error, but there are those who do not [see V. de Broglie, De fine ultimo humanae vitae (Paris 1948) 122]. The followers of Palamas actually agree with this second error since they hold that it is not God’s essence but the divine radiance with which we are united; however, in Catholic theology, because of God’s simplicity the divine radiance cannot be really distinguished from the divine essence.

These aberrations do not obscure the main stream of Catholic teaching which consistently taught that heavenly bliss is both attained immediately after death (or PURGATORY, as the case might be) and consists in the intuitive vision of God as He is in Himself. Benedict XII’s definition is a legitimate conclusion to a steady line of teaching; henceforth the points he defined are a necessary part of the Catholic proposition of Christ’s revelation concerning heaven.

Nature of the Beatific Vision. Its basic nature is clear from the above. Clearly, since the beatific union with God occurs before the last day, when the blessed receive back their bodies, the essential part of heavenly bliss does not involve bodily activity; hence neither senses nor imagination are required for it. The beatific vision and love are the activity of the nobler aspect of the human person, namely, the spiritual faculties. Theologians differ as to whether the part played by the intellect or that played by the will is primary, the Thomists favoring the intellect, the Scotists the will; however, the reason why each school follows its view is not so much theological as philosophical: its understanding of human nature. The divergence is of secondary importance since all agree that it is the whole person who receives this glory.

Just as in the earthly phase of the kingdom of heaven man's natural faculties of intellect and will have to be perfected by the supernatural VIRTUES of faith, hope, and charity to make possible the supernatural knowledge and love of God, so too in the heavenly phase of the kingdom of heaven man's faculties will require a similar elevation, only more so. Heavenly bliss is the final consummation of everything that justification on earth leads to; hence an even greater ennoblement and strengthening of the spiritual faculties will be required if a person is to have the closest possible union with the Blessed Trinity. No longer do faith and hope suffice; hope is no longer relevant when the soul is in possession of that for which it hoped; and faith is not so much dispensed with as replaced by the yet higher elevation of the human intellect to perform a still nobler activity. Faith gives true knowledge about God in the form of ideas about the Trinity, but in heavenly glory it is the mystery of the divinity itself, not just ideas concerning God, that is the object of our knowledge. Hence a higher elevation of our intellect than that given by the virtue of faith is necessary; it is the lumen gloriae (LIGHT OF GLORY) that brings this about. Hence lumen gloriae is the name given to the permanent ennoblement of our intellect by which we are enabled to be united to the Trinity by intuitive vision. The Council of Vienne in 1312 defined the need for the lumen gloriae (Enchiridion symbolorum 895).

To understand this we must contrast our natural manner of knowing with the way in which we shall know the Trinity in the beatific vision. The normal human method of acquiring knowledge is by forming ideas from the impact that the external world makes on our senses; these sense impressions are the raw material from which our mind abstracts concepts or ideas. Even angels require these ideas, though in their case they are not abstracted from sense impressions (the angels being pure spirits), but are directly infused by God. Hence, short of the beatific vision, both angels and humans can know God only by having ideas about the mystery of the divine. In the beatific vision the divine reality itself replaces these ideas so that God is in direct contact with the human mind. Since the human mind, and angelic intellect likewise, is of itself vastly inferior to such a union, it needs to be elevated by the lumen gloriae in order to be capable of this activity. God accordingly is sometimes termed the species expressa, i.e., the object immediately actuating the mind of the blessed, in the beatific vision.

Object of the Beatific Vision. The Blessed Trinity is clearly the primary object of the beatific vision. As infinite truth God alone is able to satisfy fully the human and angelic intellect which is made for the possession of truth; also, as infinitely desirable God alone is able to satisfy the desires of the human heart or angelic will. Thus

God alone is the primary object of our mind and will in heaven. In heaven we know and love God as He is in Himself, i.e., as the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in whose divine life we along with all the other blessed fully share. The infinite perfection of the Blessed Trinity and the infinite love which we shall then fully possess provide a never-ending source of satisfaction to our entire selves. Our restless hearts have at last found rest where alone they can, in the Blessed Trinity. If our imagination is unable to envisage how this happiness does not cloy, it is because we envisage it in human terms that are inadequate to express the divine reality. We are better able to appreciate the absence of those factors that destroy happiness because we can picture that absence. Our imagination cannot help us to envisage a situation in which our potentialities are fully realized so that no unfulfilled element remains. The only happiness that cloy is one that is mixed with material pleasure, which of its nature cannot last; the essentially spiritual nature of the beatific joy excludes cloying.

There is also a secondary object of the beatific vision and love. We are united to God as individuals who take their past history, now purged of imperfection and sinfulness, with them. We are always the children of our parents, we retain our affection for our background and contacts. God does not destroy our past but enables it to contribute to our present happiness. Thus, the secondary object of the beatific joy is our continuing knowledge and love of created beings with whom or which we have a relationship by reason of our earthly life.

Consummated Heavenly Glory. In addition to the essential element of heavenly bliss, theologians speak of certain elements that can differ from one person to another and without which heavenly bliss would remain intact. Thus heavenly bliss varies from one person to another: since heaven is the reward for our good activity while on earth, our degree of heavenly bliss will correspond to our degree of union with God at death; this was defined in 1439 by the Council of Florence (Enchiridion symbolorum 1305). Furthermore theologians commonly teach that there is an accidental source of heavenly glory that is given only to some of the blessed, namely to martyrs, virgins, and teachers of the faith. It is called an AUREOLE or special reward that marks the recognition of their special dedication to Christ or His work during their earthly lives.

Other elements additional to essential glory are the company of the other blessed ones, the resurrection of the body, and the renewal of the world. The differing degrees of heavenly glory, the aureoles, and the company of the elect are found in heaven before the last day; the resurrection of the body and the renewal of the world occur only after the last day. From then on the state of the blessed is termed consummated heavenly glory.

Company of the Elect. While union with God is all-sufficient to make the blessed entirely happy, nevertheless, because all the blessed show forth the wonderful works of God in Christ, each one takes delight in coming into contact with other blessed ones. This contact includes all the inhabitants of heaven: Our Lady, the angels, the saints. While one must not envisage these contacts in exactly the same way as human contacts, nevertheless the differences of individuals among themselves as well as their differing formation on earth will explain affinities that unite them with certain of the blessed rather than others, while, however, there is full accord of spirit of all with all. This common union of all in spirit with all others is the natural fruit of the common fulfillment of all within the Mystical Body of Christ: since all in Christ live for the glory of the Blessed Trinity, all are united when the purpose of their existence is attained.

It is sometimes felt that the absence from heaven of individuals to whom one was closely attached on earth will necessarily introduce an element of sadness. However in heaven one clearly perceives, as one does not on earth, that there is no happiness except in God and no sadness except in departing from this complete union with Him. Accordingly we do not, and in fact cannot, maintain an attachment that would take us away from this union with God: all our delight in such an attachment melts away so that we feel no sadness at its obliteration.

Resurrection of the Body. The most notable addition to the essential element of heavenly bliss at the last day is the restoration to the elect of their bodies. This is a mysterious truth raising many questions to which no certain answer can be given, but its truth is manifestly contained in the revelation of humanity's final lot. Here too the principle applies that Christ's glorification is the model for ours, although this does not mean that we shall necessarily have all the perfections that Christ's risen body had.

Two preliminary questions are usually asked. First, will there be a sense of incompleteness in the blessed before the last day, knowing as they do that their bliss is not yet rounded off by the possession of their glorified bodies? The answer is given that since they are completely united in will with God, they fully accept this situation as His will and so are incapable of being saddened at waiting for its fulfillment.

The second question is of greater importance: shall we have the same bodies as those we had on earth? The answer is that we shall, since Scripture and the Fathers clearly teach this. A few theologians do not think that this will entail the restoration of the very same matter into which the mortal body disintegrated; they hold that, since the matter that constitutes our bodies is made into our bodies purely by the presence of our soul in it, it is basically the soul as joined to any matter at all that constitutes such matter as our body. Hence, irrespective of what matter is united to the soul at the resurrection, such bodies as result will be our bodies in exactly the same sense as the body in which we died was ours. This question concerns the mechanics of the resurrection.

All glorified bodies shall have splendor, agility, subtlety, and impassibility. While these qualities do indeed glorify the body and make it quite different from its earthly condition, they do not make it cease to be a body: glorification is not dematerialization. Here lies a difficulty to the attempt to penetrate into the nature of the glorified body: while maintaining the reality of the change in our bodies, we must avoid overspiritualizing them. And revelation gives us little help.

Splendor is that quality which they have whereby they appear beautiful to behold; it gives them a supernatural radiance (as shown in the practice of depicting the saints with HALOS as symbols of their supernatural radiance).

Agility is the property that enables the glorified body to move about without being impeded by the limitations our body imposes on us now; it will probably still have to pass through space to get from one place to another, but an act of will will transfer it with very little lapse of time.

Subtlety has sometimes been identified with the ability to pass through other bodies, as Christ passed through the closed doors of the upper room; this, however, is not certain since many Fathers thought this to be a special miracle of divine power. St. Thomas (Summa theologiae 3a suppl., 83.1) has better reason on his side when he identifies it with the complete subordination of the matter of the body to the soul so that both are perfectly integrated; the body henceforth is the perfect manifestation of the soul, fully contributing to, instead of impeding, its life.

Impassibility removes from the glorified body not only its liability to suffer in the way our bodies do now, but also its need to preserve itself from possible harm and wear from either inside or outside. It is generally taught that, as there is no marrying or giving in marriage in heaven, so too there is no vegetative life, i.e., no need to eat or sleep. This was the teaching of the scholastics, and it seems eminently suited to the conditions of an eternal existence such as that of heaven. However the suggestion has been made that, although we need not, we may eat and drink if we wish to (De Broglie, Appendix 6). (See RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.)

Renewal of the World. This, together with the restoration of the body, constitutes the final completion of God's salvific plan. This is the ultimate glorification of Christ, inasmuch as the place He holds at the center of creation and of history is finally acknowledged by the extension of His saving influence throughout the material universe. Revelation (e.g., 2 Pt 3.13) tells us of the renewal of the universe at the end of time as the completion of God's salvific plan. This is what is referred to by the cosmic significance of Christ's work. This renewed universe contributes to the happiness of the blessed; as it finally rounds off Christ's work, so too it finally rounds off our joy in Christ.

See Also: HELL (IN THE BIBLE); HELL (THEOLOGY OF); ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; GOD, INTUITION OF; CREATED ACTUATION BY UNCREATED ACT.

Bibliography: P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 2.2:2474–2511. A. MICHEL, ibid. 6.2:1393–1426; 7.2:2351–94. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique: Tables générales, ed. A. VACANT et al. (1951–) 1:609–13. J. RATZINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:355–58. S. MORENZ and G. GLOEGE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:328–33. L. BILLOT, Quaestiones de novissimis (8th ed. Rome 1946). G. C. VAN NOORT and J. P. VERHAAR, Tractatus de novissimis . . . (Hilversum, Neth. 1935). C. DAVIS, Theology for Today (New York 1962). R. GUARDINI, The Last Things, tr. C. E. FORSYTH and G. B. BRANHAM (New York 1954). A. PIOLANTI, ed., Problems of the Future Life, tr. T. F. MURRAY (London 1962). A. VONIER, The Life of the World to Come in v.3 of Collected Works, ed. B. FEHRENBACHER, 3 v. (rev. ed. Westminster, Md. 1952–53). A. WINKLHOFER, The Coming of His Kingdom, tr. A. V. LITLEDALE (New York 1963). J. PAPIN, ed., The Eschaton: A Community of Love (Villanova 1971). B. VIVIANO, The Kingdom of God in History (Wilmington 1988).

[B. FORSHAW]

HEBBLETHWAITE, PETER

Catholic journalist, broadcaster, author; b. Ashton-under-Lyne, England, Sept. 30, 1930; d. Oxford, Dec. 18, 1994. Hebblethwaite joined the Society of Jesus in 1948. After the novitiate at Manresa, Roehampton, he was sent to Chantilly, France, to study philosophy, mastering the French language in the process. He was ordained a presbyter in 1963.

Shortly after his ordination, Hebblethwaite became assistant editor of the Jesuit journal the MONTH, launching a noteworthy career in Catholic journalism. The editor of the Month, Ronald Moffat, SJ, sent Hebblethwaite to Rome to report on the final session of Vatican II in 1965. Hebblethwaite was overwhelmingly excited by the promise the council held for renewal, particularly the possibilities for the relationship of the Church with the modern world articulated in the discussion over Gaudium et spes.

In 1974 Hebblethwaite left the Society, obtained a dispensation from his vows, and married Margaret Speaight. After his marriage in 1974, Hebblethwaite took up residence in Oxford, where he lectured in French at Wadham College. From 1978 to 1981, he resided in Rome where he served as correspondent for the National Catholic Reporter (NCR). In 1981, he returned to Oxford, and continued as Vatican affairs writer for the NCR. He also produced a steady stream of articles for other newspapers and periodicals. His scholarly acumen, theological training, courageous voice, and loyal Catholic faith aided him in his prodigious contributions. His grasp of the workings of the Vatican and his bold, if often aggressive, criticism of Church affairs and teachings earned him a unique place in English Catholic journalism. In addition to his other writings, Hebblethwaite authored two widely acclaimed biographies, one on John XXIII and the other on Paul VI.

Bibliography: In addition to the articles of Hebblethwaite to be found in the issues of The Month, The National Catholic Reporter, The Tablet, and others, Hebblethwaite wrote several books, including: The Council Fathers and Atheism: The Interventions at the Fourth Session of Vatican Council II (New York 1966); Theology of the Church (Notre Dame IN 1969); The Runaway Church: Post-conciliar Growth or Decline? (New York 1975); Christian-Marxist Dialogue: Beginnings, Present Status, and Beyond (New York 1977); The Year of Three Popes (Cleveland 1978); The New Inquisition?: The Case of Edward Schillebeeckx and Hans Küng (San Francisco 1979); The Man Who Leads the Church: An Assessment of Pope John Paul II (San Francisco 1980) [with J. Wahle]; The Papal Year (1981); Introducing John Paul II: The Populist Pope (San Francisco 1982); John XXIII, Shepherd of the Modern World (Garden City NY 1985); Synod Extraordinary (Garden City NY 1986); In the Vatican (London 1986); Paul VI: First Modern Pope (New York 1993). His last work appeared posthumously, The Next Pope (London 1994). On Hebblethwaite himself, see "Peter Hebblethwaite," The Tablet 248 (24–31 December 1994) 1676–77; and T. FOX, "Peter Hebblethwaite Wrote of the Church He Knew and Loved," National Catholic Reporter (January 6, 1995) 2.

[R. E. MCCARRON]

HÉBERT, MARCEL

Philosopher, proponent of a religious symbolism that denied personality in God; b. Bar-le-Duc, France, April 22, 1851; d. Paris, Feb. 12, 1916. As a priest, educated at Saint-Sulpice, he wrote on modern philosophical questions, Kant, Schopenhauer, Voltaire, and Renan. During his subsequent religious evolution his two most famous works were Souvenirs d' Assise (1899) and the article "La Dernière idole" (1902). Attacking the Thomistic proof for the existence of God along broadly Kantian lines, he rejected personality in God, which he saw as merely a way of affirming the reality and objectivity of "the Ideal, the Divine, the Absolute." God seemed to him the category of the Ideal, immanent and unknowable. For refusing to retract the ideas in Souvenirs, he was suspended from priestly functions. In 1903 he gave up the soutane and went to Brussels, where he dedicated himself to the Belgian workers' party and to "the religion of the human conscience." He held that certainty in a future life was not part of religious belief, but he died "with hope." Hébert was a man of winning personality and of mystic rather than strictly speculative temperament, whose importance lies in his position as perhaps the first philosopher to appear within the phenomenon of MODERNISM.

Bibliography: J. RIVIÈRE, Le Modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929). A. HOUTIN, Un Prêtre symboliste, Marcel Hébert (Paris 1925) includes bibliography of his writings.

[J. J. HEANEY]

HEBREW LANGUAGE

One of the Semitic languages, more precisely a Canaanite dialect among the dialects of Northwest Semitic. The Northwest Semitic branch of the Semitic languages extends over Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria. In Isaiah 19.18, Hebrew is called "the language [literally, lip] of Canaan," while in Isaiah 36.11 and Nehemiah 13.24 it is referred to as "the language of Judah." Monuments in this language range from the 10th century B.C. (Gezer Calendar) down to the present. This article is limited to a description of Biblical Hebrew.

With the exception of the small sections in Ezra 4.8–6.18; 7.12–26; Jeremiah 10.11; Daniel 2.4b–7.28 that are written in the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, the proto-canonical books of the Old Testament are written in Hebrew. Among the deuterocanonical books, Baruch, Judith, Tobit, 1 Maccabees, and the deuterocanonical parts of Daniel and Esther, written originally in Hebrew or Aramaic, are extant only in Greek versions, apart from the Qumran fragments. Sirach, though composed in Hebrew, was known only in a Greek version until 1896, when about two-thirds of the chapters in Hebrew were discovered.

Script. Hebrew was written in the common Canaanite alphabet that was used alike by the Israelites, the Moabites, the Phoenicians (from whom the Greeks borrowed it c. 800 B.C.), and the Aramaeans. The earliest Hebrew examples of writing are in the Phoenician script, but in the postexilic period a transition was made to the Aramaic "square script," which is that generally found at Qumran and in modern printed Hebrew Bibles. The discovery of thousands of fragments of scrolls at Qumran and in the region of the Dead Sea (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) has permitted Hebrew paleography to reach such a point of precision as to make possible the dating of a style of writing to within a generation. Like Arabic, Hebrew is written from right to left.

The alphabet numbers 22 consonants, and as this is less than the 28 of Arabic and Ugaritic, some of the characters, such as het and 'ayin, represent both the harsher and the softer sounds. In certain periods the six consonants b g d k p t were aspirated or not according to position (thus b and bh, g and gh), so that the number of sounds in the alphabet was augmented. At first the writing was purely consonantal, but later the consonants he, waw, and yod were adopted to indicate respectively the pure long vowels â, û and ô, and î and ê. These vowel letters are technically known as matres lectionis. With the gradual cessation of Hebrew as a living language—the Qumran discoveries show that it was still well understood at the turn of the Christian era—the need was felt to safeguard the pronunciation of the consonantal text, authoritatively fixed toward the end of the 1st Christian century. Thus a vowel system was devised by the Masoretes in about the 5th century and elaborated by them over the following centuries. Two main systems were invented: the Babylonian with mainly superlinear signs, and the Palestinian, or Tiberian, in which the signs were placed mainly under the lines. The Tiberian system is that found in modern Hebrew Bibles generally. The system attained such a degree of precision as to show all the vowel changes occasioned by lengthening, by tone, by laryngals, etc. The rigid uniformity achieved by the Masoretes had the unfortunate side effect of effacing dialectal variations, necessarily existing in the Biblical books that were composed in different places and over a millennium (c. 1200–c. 200 B.C.); but with the aid of the Ugaritic texts (c. 1400–c. 1200 B.C.; see UGARIT) and the Qumran scrolls, scholars are slowly recovering the dialectal elements that are still identifiable in the Masoretic text.

Morphology and Vocabulary. Hebrew shares the characteristics of the Semitic family of languages, which may be briefly summarized as follows. The roots or basic forms from which the words are derived are usually composed of three consonants, though biliteral roots are very early and important. Vowels do not form parts of the roots but merely serve to express various modifications of the root sense; thus, mālak (he ruled), but melek (king). The reader conversant with Hebrew does not need written vowels, as these can be supplied mentally from the context. The simple form of the verb is modified by added letters, lengthened vowels, and reduplicated radicals to express intensive, causative, reciprocal, or reflexive action. Prefixes and affixes derived from the independent personal pronouns indicate the person, gender, and number of the verb. The function of the Hebrew verb is still a matter of dispute. One view maintains that the perfect form expresses past time and the imperfect form present and future time. A more widely held opinion considers the verb forms as expressing modes of action; the perfect is the mode of completed action, while the imperfect refers to uncompleted action. Neither view can adequately account for all the data, so a less rigid classification seems called for. What has been considered the imperfect form may more fittingly be described as a universal tense because of its possible past, present, or future reference. On the other hand, the perfect form, hitherto regarded as expressing past or completed action, may equally denote present or future action; the context must be the determining factor.

The vocabulary of Biblical Hebrew is relatively small, only about a tenth of its 5,500 words being found with any frequency. It has been estimated that the known vocabulary cannot represent over a fifth of the total stock of Northwest Semitic words used between 1400 and 400 B.C. The sudden afflux, however, of some 1,800 new words from the Ugaritic tablets has made it possible to identify a good number of obscure words in the Bible, so that the Biblical vocabulary is now judged richer than traditionally assumed.

Modern Study of Hebrew. The modern scientific study of Biblical Hebrew, which began with H. F. Wilhelm Gesenius (d. 1842), has received a fresh impetus from the discovery of the Ugaritic tablets (1929–), which record an ancient Canaanite dialect closely akin to Hebrew. The preservation in this dialect of the three case endings known from Akkadian and Arabic, the four verbal modes, the rich variety of particles, such as vocative lamed, emphatic lamed, and enclitic mem, and the varied prepositions used with multifarious nuances bespeaks a language capable of expressing highly nuanced sentiments. Alerted by these characteristics of Ugaritic, Hebraists have been finding similar phenomena in the Bible that had been concealed by the Masoretic leveling. The gradual reassessment of Hebrew points to the conclusion that the language of the poetical books in particular was much more complex and nuanced than earlier opinion allowed.

See Also: HEBREW STUDIES (IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH)

Bibliography: A. SCHALL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg) 5:49–51. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 951–55. W. GESENIUS, Hebräische Grammatik (Halle 1810, 28th ed. rev. E. KAUTZSCH 1909; 29th ed. rev. G. BERGSTRÄSSER 1929; Eng. tr. A. E. COWLEY, Oxford 1910). H. BAUER and P. LEANDER, Historische Grammatik der hebräischen Sprache des. A.T. (Hildesheim 1918–22; repr. 1962). P. JOÜON, Grammaire de l'hébreu biblique (2d ed. Rome 1947). J. WEINGREEN, A Practical Grammar for Classical Hebrew (Oxford 1939; repr. 1955). G. BEER and R. MEYER, Hebräische Grammatik, 2 v. (Berlin 1952–55), the first to use, though to a limited degree, the data made available by the Ugaritic discoveries. C. BROCKELMANN, Hebräische Syntax (Neukirchen 1956). W. GESENIUS, Hebräisches und aramäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament, ed. F. BUHL (17th ed. Leipzig 1921; repr. 1949). F. BROWN et al., A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, ed. W. GESENIUS (Oxford 1906; repr. 1951). L. KOEHLER and W. BAUMGARNTNER, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti libros (2d ed. Leiden 1958). F. ZORELL, Lexicon Hebraicum et Aramaicum Veteris Testamenti (Rome 1946–), Latin.

[M. J. DAHOOD]

HEBREW POETRY

Poetry has been defined as patterned speech. This definition is ambiguous and deliberately vague, because the distinction between poetry and prose in any language is difficult and contested. Poetry is an art as well as a science, and the analysis of its patterns and its effects demand the freedom and discipline necessary for any of the arts.

The recognition and analysis of Hebrew poetry has the added difficulty of distance. The poetry of the Hebrew Bible was written more than two thousand years ago in an ancient language only recently restored as a living tongue. In addition the culture, which affects imagery and expectations, is far removed from modern life. On the positive side, the texts have been in constant use since their writing and there is a lengthy tradition of interpretation upon which to draw.

Patterned Speech

The patterns which distinguish Hebrew poetry are found at several levels: sound, meter, word, and imagery.

Sound. The two ways in which sound is brought into play are the repetition of consonants (related to alliteration in English poetry) and the repetition of vowel sounds (related to rhyme or assonance). In Pss 76:4 and 122:6 there are fine examples of the repetition of the consonant sound “sh.” In both instances the repetition of the sound reinforces the meaning of the line.

Ps 76:4: shammah shibbar rishpe-qashet (There were shattered the flashing arrows). The repetition of “sh” echoes the clashing sound of the destruction and fixes the idea of “shattering” (shibbar) in the hearer’s mind.

Ps 122:6: sha’alu shelom yerushalaim (Pray for the peace of Jerusalem). The two consonants are repeated in the last half of verse 6 (yishlayw) and in verse 7 (shalom, shalwa).

Assonance is the repetition of vowel sounds. Note, for example, the repetition of “i” in Ps 113:8:

lehoshihi 'im-nedibim / 'im nedibe ammo (to seat them with princes, with the princes of his people).

The repetition of sound may occur through the repetition of the words themselves:

Song of Songs 6:3: 'ani ledodi / wedodi li (I am my beloved's; my beloved is mine).

In Ps 47:7: zammeru 'elohim zammeru / zammeru lemalkenu zammeru (Sing to God, sing; sing to our king, sing).

In Nahum's description of the destruction of Nineveh, the sound of the words—including alliteration, assonance, and rhyme—emphasizes the totality of the devastation: buqah umebuqah umebulaqah (devastation and desolation and destruction).

Meter. No element of Hebrew poetry is more contested than that of meter. There is general agreement that meter is important and that it is a feature of Hebrew poetry. The question of analysis of meter, however, is still debated. There are two primary methods: counting syllables and counting accents.

The Hebrew verse unit is very short, often composed of only two or three words. When counting accents, each of these words receives an accent. Introductory or linking words such as conjunctions or prepositions are not counted. The most common meter in a two-unit line is 3 + 3.

Ps 47:7 Sing to-our-God sing / sing to-our-king sing.

Another frequent meter is 3 + 2. Since this meter predominates in Lamentations, it is called qina (lament).

Lam 1:3 Judah has-gone-into-exile from-oppression / and-hard servitude.

The meter in Hebrew poetry is not consistent, however. The number of accents in verse units within the same poem will vary.

Another method for analyzing meter involves counting syllables. The standard meter consists of a two-unit verse of around sixteen syllables. In this respect too Hebrew poetry is not consistent.

Word. Words are the tools of the poet's craft. Examples of wordplay, such as puns or paranomasia (the use of similar sounding words), abound in Hebrew poetry. In Ps 88:10 the poet complains: "My eyes ('eni) grow dim from trouble ('oni). The words for "eyes" and "trouble" have the same consonants. The similarity in sound makes the contrast in meaning surprising in Ps 15:3: "he does no evil (ra'ah) to his friends (re'ahu). The rhyme in Ps 88:5–6 points out the sufferer's fate: "I am like a man (geber) without strength . . . like the slain, lying in the grave (qeber)."

A frequent device in Hebrew poetry is the use of the word pair, two words that are frequently linked and usually appear in consecutive lines. Common word pairs are: hand-right hand; sea-river; understand-know. For example:

"Your hand will reach all your enemies; your right hand will reach those who hate you!" (Ps 21:9)

"God founded it on the seas, established it over the rivers" (Ps 24:2).

"You know when I sit and stand; you understand my thoughts from afar" (Ps 139:2).

Imagery. Hebrew poetry is rich in imagery. Almost every verse of the Psalter is an example. In Psalm 1 the faithful are compared to a well-watered tree (Ps 1:3). Even in old age they are full of sap, still producing fruit (Ps 92:13–15). Threatening enemies, however, are wild animals—bulls, lions, dogs—and the sufferer's heart melts like wax (Ps 22:13–15). The believer under attack is a sagging fence or a battered wall (Ps 62:4). Human beings are so inconsequential they weigh less than breath (Ps 62:10). God, on the other hand, is a rock, a tower of strength, a fortress (Pss 18:3; 31:4; 61:4; 62:7–8). The craving for God is like the craving of a deer for water or like the aridity of a dry waterless land (Pss 43:2; 63:2). Security in God's care is like the security of a weaned child on its mother's breast (Ps 131:2).

Structure

The Line. Parallelism. The basic unit of Hebrew poetry is the line. Lines are ordinarily broken into two or three parts. In the following discussion "line" will be used to refer to the whole unit, "colon" will refer to a segment of the line. A two-part "line" will be called a "bicolon," a three-part line a "tricolon."

A bicolon:

None among the gods can equal you, O Lord;
nor can their deeds compare to yours (Ps 86:8).

A tricolon: Teach me, Lord, your way that I may walk in your truth, single-hearted and revering your name (Ps 86:11)

A basic constituent of Hebrew poetry is the device of parallelism, a technique in which lines are ordinarily end-stopped and balanced according to meaning, syntax, and/or sound. For example:

You who dwell in the shelter of the Most High, who abide in the shadow of the Almighty (Ps 91:1).

The various elements balance each other: you who dwell / who abide; in the shelter / in the shadow; of the Most High / of the Almighty.

The significance of parallelism has been recognized for over a century. Robert Lowth named three types of parallelism by the relationship of the terms in the lines or cola. Synonymous parallelism occurs when the major terms mean basically the same thing:

Make known to me your ways, Lord;
teach me your paths (Ps 25:4).

When the major terms are opposites, the result is antithetic parallelism:

They will collapse and fall, but we will rise and stand upright (Ps 20:9).

Lines which do not fit either of these patterns Lowth called synthetic:

You win justice for the orphaned and oppressed;
no one on earth will cause terror again (Ps 10:18).

In the last decades of the twentieth century the discussion turned to the nature of parallelism. James Kugel refined the already existing understanding by pointing out that the essential function of parallelism was not to indicate equivalency (A = B), but rather complementarity, frequently intensification or expansion (“A is so, and what’s more B”). For example, one finds complementarity of terms such as “day” and “night”:

O Lord, my God, by day I cry out, at night I clamor in your presence (Ps 88:2).

or expansion in the second colon of a term from the first colon:

The Lord is a great God, and a great king above all gods (Ps 95:4).

or the consequence of the first colon in the second:

You are my rock and my fortress;
for your name’s sake you will lead and guide me (Ps 31:4).

or continuation in time:

Weeping stays for the night;
but at dawn comes rejoicing (Ps 30:6).

Chiasm. A poetic technique related to parallelism is called chiasm. Chiasm is the construction of a line so that the balancing elements in the first colon occur in reverse order in the second colon (ABBA). For example:

A: Have mercy on me, God, B: in your goodness
B’: in your abundant compassion A’: blot out my offense.

The notion of chiasm has been further developed with a consideration of sound as well as meaning. John Kselman named the technique in which one set of balanced elements correspond in meaning and the other set correspond in sound “semantic-sonant chiasm.” For example:

A: My birthright (bekorati) B: he took;
B’: now he has taken A’: my blessing (birkati).

The words “birthright” and “blessing” are similar in sound and form one leg of the chiasm (A).

The word “took” is semantically identical in each colon and forms the other leg (B). They are arranged in a chiasmic relationship: ABBA.

Grammar. Parallel cola are often balanced grammatically as well as semantically. Examples from Psalms 51 and 131 will illustrate:

Wash me thoroughly from my guilt;
from my sin, cleanse me (Ps 51:4).

The imperative “wash me” in the first colon is balanced by the imperative “cleanse me” in the second; the prepositional phrase “from my guilt” is balanced by “from my sin” in the second. The parallelism is not slavish. The first colon has an extra word, “thoroughly.”

Lord, my heart is not proud;
nor are my eyes haughty (Ps 131:1).

The subject “my heart” is balanced by “my eyes”; the verb “to be proud” is balanced by the verb “to be haughty,” and both are negated. “Lord” is extra in the first colon.

Stanzas. The elements which allow for the division of a Hebrew poem into larger units or stanzas are based on content and grammatical considerations. The simplest division is provided by the refrain. For example, “The Lord of hosts is with us; our stronghold is the God of Jacob,” occurs in Ps 46:8 and 12. It is commonly inserted also at the end of verse 4 to provide three balanced stanzas: verses 2–4, 5–8, 9–12. A similar situation occurs in Psalm 67 where the refrain occurs at verses 4 and 6: “May the peoples praise you, God; may all the peoples praise you!” This refrain too is commonly added at the end of the psalm to form three stanzas: verses 2–4, 5–6, 7–8.

Refrains also provide other information. The refrain, “Wait for God, whom I shall praise again, my savior and my God” (Pss 42:6, 12; 43:5), is a clue that Psalms 42 and 43 really form one poem. In Psalm 136 the refrain, “God’s love endures forever,” is repeated at the end of each verse, indicating that this psalm is a litany.

An example of grammatical indicators of stanza division is Psalm 76 in which three passive participles—“renowned” (v. 2), “awesome” (v. 5), and “awesome” (v. 8)—indicate divisions.

The division of Psalm 88 into stanzas is based on both grammar and meaning. Verses 10b–13 are a series of rhetorical questions, thus a natural grammatical division. Verses 2, 10b, and 14 all state that the suppliant cries out to God. The poem is thus divided into verses 2–10a, 10b–13, 14–19.

The Whole Poem. Hebrew poems are bound together as a whole by several devices. One of the most obvious is the alphabetic poem in which each line or set of lines is begun with a subsequent letter of the alphabet (e.g., Psalms 34, 37, 111, 112). The most extended alphabetic poem is Psalm 119 in which the sets consist of eight lines each. Verses 1–8 begin with the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet, verses 9–16 with the second letter, and so on.

The repetition of key words unites a poem. For example, the word “heart” occurs six times throughout Psalm 73. In Psalm 31 the four-fold repetition of the word “hand” emphasizes the contrast between falling into God’s hands or enemy hands.

Inclusion, the repetition of the same phrase at beginning and end, also binds a poem into unity. For example, Psalm 8 begins and ends with: “Lord, our Lord, how awesome is your name through all the earth.”

Biblical Hebrew poetry, though difficult because of the distance of time, culture, and language, is well worth the effort. The artistry speaks through the ages.

Bibliography: R. ALTER, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York 1985). J. KSELMAN, “Semantic-Sonant Chiasmus in Biblical Poetry,” Biblica 58 (1977) 219–23. J. L. KUGEL, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and its History (Baltimore 1998). M. O’CONNOR, Hebrew Verse Structure (Winona Lake, Ind. 1980). D. L. PETERSEN and K. H. RICHARDS, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry (Minneapolis 1992). W. G. E. WATSON, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to its Techniques, Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Supplement Series 26 (Sheffield 1984, 1986, 1995); Traditional Techniques in Classical Hebrew Verse (Sheffield 1994).

[I. NOWELL]

HEBREW SCRIPTURES

An alternative designation for that portion of the Bible traditionally called by Christians the “Old Testament,” preferred by people sensitive to Christian-Jewish relations.

The term “Old Testament” is not recognized by the Jewish tradition, and as it is used in the Christian (in conjunction with “New Testament”) it has often led the unwary to the unfortunate conclusion that the New Testament has replaced or superseded the Old. The Old is then thought to have lost all permanent value as a source of divine revelation. This conclusion, rising from the juxtaposition of the two terms, contradicts Christian tradition (e.g., Dei Verbum 3).

In Judaism, the Bible is normally called Tanakh, a vocalized Hebrew acronym that describes its contents: Torah (Pentateuch), Nebi'im (Prophets), and Ketubim (Writings). Tanakh, as a Christian alternative to Old Testament, presents a difficulty because of its unfamiliarity. It is also doubtful whether Jewish usage would include those portions that Catholics accept as canonical from the SEPTUAGINT (e.g., Judith, Tobit, Sirach 1–2, Maccabees), but which were not included in the Masoretic canon accepted by rabbinic tradition in the late 2d century. The term “Jewish Scriptures,” which is preferred by some Catholic journals, presents similar difficulties.

“Hebrew Scriptures,” on the other hand, presents the lesser difficulty that not all of the books included in the Catholic canon (e.g., Maccabees) can be shown to have been written originally in the Hebrew language. The term “Hebrew,” in the title, therefore needs to be understood as an ethnic or “peoplehood” designation rather than as a linguistic one. In this sense, “Hebrew” would be taken to refer to “the Jewish people in the biblical period.”

The terminological dilemma discussed here can be said to be illustrative of Catholic attitudes toward Jews and Judaism encouraged by the Second Vatican Council. While recognizing the above difficulties and even bringing into question the traditional understanding of typology as a means of expressing the essential relationship between the two testaments, the “Notes on the Correct Way to Present the Jews and Judaism in Preaching and Catechesis,” issued by the Holy See’s Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews (June 24, 1985), opted to “continue to use the expression ‘Old Testament’ because it is traditional (cf. already 2 Cor. 3:14) but also because ‘Old’ does not mean ‘out-of-date’ or ‘outworn’” (Section II). It should be noted, moreover, that the 1984 Scripture and Christology promulgated by the Pontifical Biblical Commission speaks of the “books of the Prior Testament . . . [that] remain the privileged document of those experiences of Israel” (2.1.4.1). The document of the Biblical Commission consistently uses the term “prior testament” instead of “Old Testament.”

While the phrase “old covenant” finds precedent in the Epistle to the Hebrews 7:23, other terms for what the apostolic writers accepted as “God’s Word” (4:12) can also be found in the New Testament. For example, 2 Tm 3:16 and Heb 11:15 simply use “Scripture.” Hebrews, however, does not discuss Judaism as such (whether biblical or rabbinic), but merely the Temple sacrifice, which Christ has replaced (Heb. 8:13) and itself uses the less polemical “first covenant” (Heb. 8:7) in introducing the citation from Jeremiah 31:31–34, from which the phrase “new covenant,” and hence “New Testament,” ultimately derives.

The New Testament thus presents a variety of designations for the Hebrew Scriptures. The issue is to choose one for common usage in the Church that both connotes the continuity between the testaments (covenants) from the Christian point of view and, at the same time, evinces respect for the integrity of Judaism and the Hebrew Bible.

Bibliography: L. BOADT et al., Biblical Studies: Meeting Ground of Jews and Christians (New York 1980).

[E. J. FISHER]

HEBREW STUDIES (IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH)

Though the constitution of 1311 of Clement V advised that Greek and Hebrew should be taught at every university, it cannot be said that the late medieval Church favored the study of Hebrew by Christians. The fear that the prestige of the Vulgate and the theological exegesis based on it would be impaired by a return to the original languages of the Bible explains much of the opposition of the schoolmen to Hebrew studies. But since the battle cry of the 16th-century humanists was ad fontes (back to the sources!), a clash with the traditional view was inevitable. This methodical return to the sources had two important results. By drawing attention to the original texts it was possible to go back to a tradition earlier than that of the schoolmen and thus to adduce testimonies acknowledged by everybody. The second result was the recognition that every interpretation has to start from the original and not from the translation. This assumption, which is still valid today and is one of the lasting achievements of HUMANISM, obviously led to a lowering of the value of the Vulgate. The development of humanistic thought toward a new method of Bible interpretation and translation was mainly the work of two men, Johann REUCHLIN (1455–1522) and Desiderius ERASMUS (1466–1536), whose Bible studies in Hebrew and Greek, respectively, occupied a central place in their lives.

Christian Hebraists of the Renaissance. The victory of the humanist ideal that every man of culture should be trium linguarum gnarus, that is, he should know Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, led to the founding of the trilingual colleges. In England Bp. Richard FOXE (c. 1448–1528) founded Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In Spain Cardinal XIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS (1436–1517) established the new University of ALCALÁ, which soon concentrated its attention on trilingual studies. In France Francis I (1494–1547) provided the noble et trilingue Académie, the Collège des Lecteurs Royaux, later to be called the Collège de France. In Germany Frederick the Wise of Saxony (1463–1525) endowed the University of Wittenberg with chairs in the three languages. After considerable initial opposition a trilingual college was founded at Louvain. The peculiar problem of Hebrew studies was the suspicion that they all too readily aroused. A monk of Freiburg (where Reuchlin studied) said plainly in 1521, “Those who speak this tongue are made Jews.” Jews themselves discovered that they might suffer if they taught Christians Hebrew, for they could be accused of destroying the faith of their pupils. Thus the suspicion they aroused and the fear that the authority of the Vulgate would be undermined were real obstacles to Hebrew studies at the end of the 15th century and the first quarter of the 16th.

Johann Reuchlin. The first Hebrew grammar ever to be published in a European language was by Konrad PELLICANUS (1478–1556), a Franciscan from Alsace, who later was to become a follower of Huldrych ZWINGLI. It was published at Strassburg in 1503 or 1504 and was poor in content, with types neither beautiful nor clear. Pellicanus obtained his knowledge from various sources. In addition to his early instruction from Johannes Pauli (c. 1454–1533), a baptized Jew, he had been in contact with Reuchlin and had read the books of PETER NIGRI (SCHWARZ) (1434–83). Pellicanus’ grasp of Hebrew was very elementary, since he had not yet understood the basis of Hebrew verb formation. In 1506 Reuchlin’s De rudimentis Hebraicis was published in Pforzheim, marking the beginning of Hebrew studies in Europe. From this date on, it was possible to learn Hebrew. In fact, Reuchlin could justify his own estimate of himself as the first important Christian Hebrew scholar of the West. Referring to the dictionary contained in his De rudimentis, he said, “Before me among the Latins no one appears to have done this.” This German layman, doctor of law, and professor of Greek and Hebrew set down in the preface of his De rudimentis an account of his work for the world of scholarship in Latin and Greek and complained about the amount of money he had to pay learned Jews for instruction in Hebrew. His book consists of a description of the alphabet, a dictionary in two parts, and a brief but adequate grammar of Hebrew. It is a handsome volume printed so as to be read from the back page forward, like a Hebrew Bible, in the current fashion characteristic of the pedantry of those who published works on Hebrew. It brought him what he wanted: undying fame as a scholar. Not the least of his achievements was the fact that he influenced princes and humanists to establish chairs of Hebrew in the universities of the empires, and through his pupils and correspondence on Hebrew studies, raised up scholars to fill them.

Reuchlin propounded the philological method that traces the meaning of every word in the original Hebrew. No theological argument was ever used by Reuchlin. He was no theologian and openly admitted, “I do not probe the meaning as a theologian but discuss the words as does the grammarian.” This thought epitomizes his attitude toward philological studies, and brought him into open conflict with philosophers and theologians throughout his life. His opponents, however, had to face the awkward question whether Hebrew studies should be forbidden.

Yet they could not attack him on that account, for there was the advice of Clement V that Hebrew should be studied.

Other Pioneers. There are other names to record, such as Nicolas Clénard (Cleynaerts) of Louvain (1495–1542) and Santes PAGNINI of Lucca (1470–1536), men who unlike Pellicanus and Wolfgang CAPITO (1478–1541), author of a small Hebrew grammar at Basel in 1518, remained Catholics. But the great name after Reuchlin, who remained a Catholic and died one, is that of Sebastian Münster of Basel (1488–1552). He had Pellicanus as his teacher and dedicated a lifetime to Hebrew studies, producing more than 40 books, which show a capacity for work as prodigious as his range of subjects. In 1527 he published the first Aramaic grammar written by a Christian. He made available to Christian scholars through his Latin translation the best work of Elias Levita (c. 1468–1549), the greatest of Jewish grammarians in that age. Münster wrote that “in the grammatical works written by Christians before Elias had begun his task, the true foundation was missing.” By his self-effacing devotion, Münster laid this foundation and through Levita learned how to explain the use of the dagesh point. Two Protestants might also be mentioned. Paul Fagius of Strassburg (1504–49), who in his early days as schoolmaster at Isny (Allgäu) set up his own Hebrew press, after leaving Strassburg became Regius professor of Hebrew for a time at Cambridge and translated into Latin the PIRKE AVOTH and later the Targum of Onkelos. Of less distinction was Johann Forster of Wittenberg (1496–1558), who issued a Hebrew dictionary in 1557. This did not meet the need for a dictionary of Hebrew that could match the Latin and Greek dictionaries of the ESTIENNES, nor had the similar work of others who preceded him done so. The greatest Christian Hebraist in the post-Reformation period was Johannes Buxtorf the Elder (1564–1629), whose Praeceptiones Grammaticae de Lingua Hebraea (later entitled Epitome Grammaticae Hebraeae) went through 20 editions between 1605 and 1716.

Christian Hebraists of Modern Times. The first to use Arabic in a scientific way to illustrate Hebrew grammar and to treat Hebrew as a branch of the family of Semitic languages was Albert Schultens of Leiden (1686–1750), who published in 1737 his Institutiones ad Fundamenta Linguae Hebraeae. This meant a final break with the rabbinic tradition of the incomparable lingua sacra. He placed the comparison of Hebrew and Arabic on a sound basis and so influenced all future lexical study. J. D. Michaelis (1717–91), in his Supplementa ad Lexicon Hebraicum (1786), drew out the implications of the work of Schultens for Hebrew philology. Supreme among students of Hebrew grammar was Heinrich Friedrich Wilhelm Gesenius (1786–1842), who published the first edition of his Hebräische Grammatik in 1813; the 14th to 18th editions were revised by E. Rödiger (1801–74), the 22d to 28th, by E. F. Kautzsch (1841–1910), and the 29th, by G. Bergsträsser. The 28th edition was translated into English in 1909 by A. E. Cowley. Other widely used teaching instruments have been, in German, the grammars by G. H. A. Ewald (1803–75), J. Olshausen (1800–82), H. Böttcher, B. Stade, E. König, and H. Bauer-P. Leander; in French, by P. Joüon and Mayer Lambert; in English, by A. B. Davidson and S. R. Driver, Hebrew Tenses.

Gesenius is considered the father of modern Hebrew lexicography. In 1810 he published his Hebräisch-Deutsches Handwörterbuch über die Schriften des Alten Testaments, the basis of his Thesaurus philologicus Criticus Linguae Hebraeae et Chaldaeae Veteris Testamenti (1829–42), completed by Rödiger (1853–58). Gesenius’s Lexicon Manuale Hebraicum of 1833 was translated into English by Edward Robinson, and this formed the basis of the well-known A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament by F. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs. Other notable dictionaries are those of Julius Fürst, Hebräisches und Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament (1867), F. Zorell, Lexicon Hebraicum et Chaldaicum (1940–), and L. Koehler-W. Baumgartner, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti Libros (German and English, 1953), with a Supplementum (1958) serving as a second edition.

Bibliography: A. E. COWLEY and E. KAUTZSCH, eds., Gesenius’ Hebrew Grammar (2d ed. Oxford 1910; repr. 1946) 17–23. W. SCHWARZ, Principles and Problems of Biblical Translation: Some Reformation Controversies and Their Background (Cambridge, Eng. 1955). S. L. GREENSLADE, ed., The Cambridge History of the Bible (Cambridge, Eng. 1963).

[M. J. DAHOOD]

HEBREWS

Term that is found chiefly in the Biblical traditions concerning the 2d millennium B.C., and then, apparently after centuries of desuetude, reappears in the latest books of the OT and roughly contemporary Jewish literature. The English term is derived through the Latin Hebraeus, from the Greek Ἑβραῖος, and ultimately from Hebrew ’ibri. Originally it seems to have been an appellative referring to social or legal status [for details, see HABIRU (HABIRI)]. It survived in the later period as an ethnolinguistic designation for the Israelites or Jews and for the Semitic language they spoke before the adoption of Aramaic. The ethnic meaning, though with a much wider application, goes back to the late 10th or early 9th century B.C., appearing in the Yahwistic tradition of the Patriarchs and in the Table of the Nations of Gn 10.21, 25; 11.15–26, where Eber, the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrews is mentioned. The limitation of the term to Israelites first occurs c. 500 B.C. (Jon 1.9; yet note the different reading of the Septuagint), and then is well attested in the books of Judith (10.12; 12.11; etc.) and 2 Maccabees (7.31; 11.13; 15.37), both probably compositions of the late 2d or early 1st century B.C. At approximately the same time writers begin to speak of the HEBREW LANGUAGE, for instance, in the Prologue of Sirach.

Hebrew remained a relatively uncommon term and never replaced Israelite or Jew. It connotes the ancient past and is an archaizing expression. This explains why the old language was called Hebrew; why the Phoenician script employed in preexilic times was named Hebrew by the rabbis and was thus distinguished from the later script of Aramaean origin; why Josephus, Philo Judaeus, and other Jewish writers, when speaking of Biblical times, used Hebrew only of the most ancient Israelites. Savoring of the past, Hebrew was used in archaizing or high literary language, particularly where Jew and Gentile confronted each other (as in Judith and 2 Maccabees) and, by implication at least, were contrasted. The association with the national origins inherent in the term also explains why, in a context of ever-increasing Hellenization of culture and mores, Hebrew came to be applied to what was characteristically Jewish and was used even to distinguish one Jew from another. A Hebrew was a Jew who still adhered to old Jewish customs and language; Hebrews, therefore, usually were to be found in Palestine and only rarely in the Diaspora. It is against this background that one should probably explain the struggle between HELLENISTS and Hebrews mentioned in Acts 6.1. It is fidelity to the past that is implied by St. Paul's boast to be a Hebrew as well as an Israelite (2 Cor 11.22), "a Hebrew of Hebrews" besides a member of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil 3.5). However, eventually Aramaic became with Hebrew part of the legacy of the past, and the ability to speak it was lost by many Jews, especially those in the Diaspora; hence Aramaic too was called Hebrew (Lk 23.38; Jn 5.2; 10.13, 17, 20; Acts 21.40; 22.2; 26.14).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 955–959. J. HASPECKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:44–45. A. ALT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:105–106. W. GUTBROD et al., in G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 3:359–394. (For additional bibliog. see HABIRU.)

[W. L. MORAN]

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE

The authorship and circumstances of the composition of the Epistle to the Hebrews remain obscure. Traditionally included in the Pauline corpus, it is unlikely that he is the author. The list of possible authors includes Apollos, Barnabas, Silas, and Priscilla. Modern scholars have proposed new candidates, including Epaphras, a collaborator of Paul mentioned in Colossians 4.12. Yet the arguments for any individual remain inconclusive, and Origen's judgment that "God only knows" who wrote the work is justified. The intended audience, which has been conjecturally located throughout the Mediterranean, is now thought more likely to have been at Rome than Corinth, Colossae, or Jerusalem. The problems it addresses were not unique to Jewish Christians, but would have affected any "third generation" (2.1–4) Christians of the latter half of the first century.

These problems included external hostility (10.32–34; 12.3; 13.3,13), and internal lassitude, pictured as "sluggishness" (5.11) or "lameness" (12.13). The addressees may have been attracted by some "strange teachings" (13.9), although the warning is conventional and Hebrews mounts no sustained doctrinal polemic. Whatever the causes, and they may have been unclear to the author, there has apparently been some disaffection from the community (10.25), which calls for a series of warnings about the danger of apostasy (2.1; 6.4–8; 10.26–31; 12.13–17). The date of composition can be set only within the broad limits of A.D. 60 to 95, but often repeated arguments for a date prior to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. are inconclusive. Hebrews is not interested in the existence or potential attractions of the second temple. It uses the scriptural image of the desert tabernacle primarily as the foundation for its christological exposition.

Genre and Structure. Modern authors generally take Hebrews, a self-described "word of exhortation" (13.22), to be a homily. That generic classification has been supported by the recognition that several major pericopes follow a clear homiletic pattern, consisting of introductory comment (3.1–6; 8.1–6); citation of scripture (3.7–11; 8.7–13); exegetical or thematic exposition (3.12–4.11; 9.1–10.10); rhetorical inclusion (4.12–13; 10.11–18); and parenetic application (4.14–16; 10.19–25). The structural significance of these blocks calls into question rigid concentric analyses of the text. The general movement of Hebrews is from Christ to us. In five parts, Hebrews moves from the Son's eschatological, royal, and priestly messiahship, Jesus' covenant fidelity and compassion, and His perfect priestly fulfillment of the Old Testament, to the faith and endurance necessary on our part, and to peace as the reward for pleasing God.

The traditions on which Hebrews relies are diverse and the tensions among them are not explicitly resolved. The exordium (1.1–4) indicates that Christ is understood to be a divine person who pre-existed his incarnation. The catena of scriptural citations which follows (1.5–13) suggests a perspective like that of Romans 1.3, whereby Christ is appointed to his status as Son at His exaltation. Although the text presupposes the exordium's incarnational perspective, it focuses on the exaltation as a decisive christological movement.

A related tension affects the description of Christ as high priest. The title is probably a traditional reference to Christ's function as heavenly intercessor (2.18; 7.25; 8.4). Yet for Hebrews, His chief act as high priest takes place on earth, where He suffers a self-sacrificial death (7.27). Insistence on the latter point is the key interpretive move in handling the imagery of the high-priestly action of the Day of Atonement. Christ's "entry into the heavenly sanctuary" and his resultant priestly status are inseparable from his incarnate conformity to the divine will (10.5–10).

Christological reflection grounds the PARENESIS in large part through the motif of the covenant. Because Christ's death is the sort of act it is, earthly by virtue of its shedding of blood, and "heavenly" by virtue of its spiritual dimension (9.14) and its conformity to God's will (10.9), it inaugurates the new and ideal covenant promised by Jeremiah (8.8–12). In this relationship between humankind and God, sins are forgiven (10.14–18) and the spiritual dimension of the human self, conscience, is cleansed (9.14). The act by which Christ himself is "perfected" (5.9; 7.28), that is, exalted and made fit for his office of High Priest, in turn "perfects" his followers who are now being sanctified (10.14). The covenant-inaugurating event provides a way of access (10.19) for believers to the realm where God is truly served (9.14; 12.28); but as Christ's heavenly priesthood is intimately bound up with a very earthly act, so the realm where members of the covenant worship is not the realm of pure spirit, but the earthly arena, where they "bear Christ's reproach" (13.13), while offering praise (13.15) and deeds of beneficence (13.16), the true sacrifices of the new covenant's cult. In this arena Christ's followers are called to a life of the cardinal virtues (10.19–24), but especially to fidelity, which was perfectly exemplified by the covenant's inaugurator (12.1–3).

Affinities of Hebrews. Debate about the interpretation of Hebrews continues to be conducted in terms of the religio-historical background of its images and theological concepts. Yet while its Jewish and Judeo-Christian heritage is clear, no precise genealogy for its symbolic world can be found. Parallels with Philo indicate not dependence, but common Hellenistic Jewish interpretations of traditional Biblical categories, and in both the influence of popularized Middle Platonic language can be felt. Parallels with the Dead Sea Scrolls, most striking in the Melchizedek midrash (ch. 7), do not indicate a specific connection, but are part of the general apocalyptic heritage of the early Church. While it contains apocalyptic expectations (9.28; 10.25; 13.14), Hebrews, like many other early Christian texts, emphasizes the decisive eschatological event which has already occurred and which has inaugurated the "time of correction" (9.10).

Papyrus roll with Epistle to Hebrews, 3rd–4th century A.D.
(©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Hebrews certainly uses a variety of traditions, but it cannot be seen as a simple extension or repudiation of any of them. It is a work of subtlety and sophistication that reflectively engages its heritage in order to make clear the enduring significance of Jesus Christ (13.8), the model (2.10; 12.2) and guarantor (7.22) of a life of covenant fidelity toward God.

Bibliography: H. W. ATTRIDGE, "The Uses of Antithesis in Hebrews 8–10," Harvard Theological Review (Cambridge, Mass. 1908–) 79 (1986) 1–9. R. E. BROWN & J. P. MEIER, Antioch and Rome (New York 1983). H. BROWN, An die Hebräer (Tübingen 1984). G. HUGHES, Hebrews and Hermeneutics (Cambridge 1979). R. JEWETT, Letter to Pilgrims: A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (New York 1981). F. LAUB, Bekentnis und Auslegung: Die paränetische Funktion des Christologie im Hebräerbrief (Regensburg 1980). W. R. G. LOADER, Sohn und Hoherpriester: Eine Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zur Christologie des Hebräerbriefes (Neukirchen 1981). P. J. KOBELSKI, Melchizedek and Melchirešač (Washington, D.C. 1981). D. PETERSON, Hebrews and Perfection: An Examination of the Concept of Perfection in the "Epistle to the Hebrews" (Cambridge 1982). J. SWETNAM, Jesus and Isaac: A Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the Light of the Agedah (Rome 1981). J. W. THOMPSON, The Beginnings of Christian Philosophy: The Epistle to the Hebrews, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly MS 13 (Washington, D.C. 1982).

[H. W. ATTRIDGE/EDS.]

HECKER, ISAAC THOMAS

Founder of the PAULISTS, author, editor; b. New York, N.Y., Dec. 18, 1819; d. New York, Dec. 22, 1888. He was the son of John and Caroline (Freund) Hecker. He left school in his early teens to join his brothers John and George in their rapidly expanding bakery business. Although he had received little formal religious training, in 1842 he became convinced that God was calling him away from all ordinary pursuits of life. He turned for advice to his friend Orestes BROWNSON, who suggested a sojourn at Brook Farm, a new social experiment in West Roxbury, Mass. There, with Ralph W. Emerson, Henry Thoreau, and Bronson Alcott, Hecker and his friends, George Ripley, Charles Dana, George Curtis, and George Bradford, discussed the problem of man's destiny. Hecker was dissatisfied with their answers, and guided by Brownson, he examined the various forms of Protestantism. None satisfied him and he turned to Catholicism, making his profession of faith and receiving Baptism on Aug. 2, 1844. A year later he joined the Redemptorists and was sent to Europe for his novitiate and seminary studies.

Two years after his ordination in England on Oct. 23, 1849, he returned to the U.S. With four other American convert Redemptorists, Augustine F. HEWIT, Clarence A. WALWORTH, George DESHON, and Francis A. BAKER, he gave missions to Catholics throughout the country. Although he was engrossed in the work, the conversion of his non-Catholic countrymen was uppermost in his thoughts. To interest them in the faith he wrote two highly successful books: Questions of the Soul (1855), an appeal to the longings of the heart, and Aspirations of Nature (1857), an answer to the questionings of the mind. Early in 1857, an opportunity arose for the Redemptorists to open an English-speaking house in New York City for American Redemptorist missionaries. With the encouragement of Abp. John Hughes of New York and Bp. James R. Bayley of Newark, N.J., Hecker went to Rome to plead for the new foundation before the rector major. Three days after his arrival, he was expelled by the rector major for having made the journey without the necessary permission. Convinced that his superior's action was the result of a misunderstanding, Hecker appealed the sentence to the Holy See. After months of litigation, Pius IX released the five Americans from their Redemptorist vows and suggested to Hecker that he begin a new religious community in America. Upon his return, he founded the Society of Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle, or Paulists, with Hewit, Deshon, and Baker as associates; Walworth had withdrawn because of disagreement with the objective and nature of the new community. On July 10, 1858, Hughes approved their Programme of Rule and authorized the establishment of the Paulists in his archdiocese.

With the new community established, Hecker enthusiastically began his work for non-Catholics. To correct misunderstandings and especially to convince men that the Church was not the enemy but the guardian of liberty, he took to the public lecture platform. His warm personality, ringing sincerity, and forthright manner captivated audiences wherever he spoke throughout the country. He utilized the press, which he hailed as "the most important weapon in modern intellectual and religious warfare." In April 1865 he launched a monthly publication, the Catholic World, and a year later organized the Catholic Publication Society (later the Paulist Press) to distribute inexpensive literature on a national scale. He pleaded this cause before the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) with such earnestness that he won the support of many bishops, notably Abp. Martin John Spalding. As the latter's theologian he attended Vatican Council I (1869-70). In 1870 he began the Young Catholic, an illustrated monthly for boys and girls, and in 1872 raised necessary funds to buy a secular newspaper and convert it into a first-class Catholic daily. However, failing health prevented the realization of this plan since it forced him to relinquish active work. Until his death he edited the Catholic World, wrote in defense and explanation of the Church, and guided the destinies of his community. The Church and the Age (1887) was his last book. His remains are interred in a special sarcophagus in the Paulist Fathers' Church in New York City.

Bibliography: V. F. HOLDEN, The Yankee Paul: Isaac Thomas Hecker (Milwaukee 1958) bibliog. 415-422. J. MCSORLEY, Father Hecker and His Friends (2d ed. St. Louis 1953). W. ELLIOTT, The Life of Father Hecker (1891; repr. New York 1972). J. FARINA, An American Experience of God: The Spirituality of Isaac Hecker (New York 1981). D. J. O'BRIEN, Isaac Hecker: An American Catholic (New York 1992).

[V. HOLDEN]

HEDDA, ST.

Bishop of Wessex; d. July 9, 705. His early life is unknown, but he was a Benedictine monk and abbot before 676, whether at GLASTONBURY rather than WHITBY is not at all certain. He is often confused with Hedda of Lichfield (d. 721) or with Aetla of Whitby. He became the fifth bishop of Wessex in 676 and moved the see from Dorchester to WINCHESTER c. 686, at the same time translating the relics of St. BIRINUS, the first bishop of Wessex. The diocese remained undivided until Hedda died, although elsewhere THEODORE, archbishop of Canterbury, sought to subdivide earlier kingdom-centered dioceses. After 705 ALDHELM ruled Sherborne, and Daniel (d. 745) succeeded to Winchester. Hedda worked closely with Theodore and also with King INE, who was often guided by his counsels. After his death many miracles were reported at his tomb, and pilgrims carried so much dust from the grave that a deep ditch developed. His relics may have been translated to Glastonbury and buried under the famous "Glastonbury pyramids."

Feast: July 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 2:482–483. BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 3.7; 4.12, 23; 5.18; Loeb Classical Library (London-New York-Cambridge, MA. 1912–), ed., tr. J. E. KING, 2 v. (1930) 2:66, 126, 292. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 9:361–362; 20:483. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:412–414.

[H. E. AIKINS]

HEDONISM

Hedonism, a word derived from the Greek ἡδονή, meaning pleasure, is a name used to refer to at least two different ethical positions. Ethical hedonism is the view that the only thing that is good and ought to be desired is pleasure; we can desire other things but are mistaken when we do so. Among its supporters have been EPICURUS, LOCKE, HOBBS, HUME, BENTHAM, and Sidgwick. Psychological hedonism is the view that we can desire nothing but pleasure; that other things, like learning or virtue, can be sought only as means to pleasure; and that ethical theory consists in showing men how to seek those pleasures that are most intense or lasting. Strictly speaking, this latter view is incompatible with ethical hedonism, for if we can desire nothing but pleasure, it is surely pointless to recommend pleasure as the only thing that ought to be desired; nevertheless, some ethicists, such as Epicurus and Bentham, have been both ethical and psychological hedonists. It is also useful to distinguish the individualistic (or egoistic) from the universalistic (or utilitarian) form of hedonism: the first says that one ought to aim at pleasure only for himself; the second says that he ought to aim at pleasure for all.

Historical Survey. The Cyrenaic school of hedonistic philosophy was founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, according to whom the sole good to be desired for its own sake is the enjoyment of the particular pleasure of the moment, and the only moral goal of action is present gratification (see CYRENAICS). Primary attention ought to be given to the pleasures of the body since these are the more intense; and one should seize the pleasures of the moment since life is uncertain and one may miss the pleasures put off until tomorrow. Aristippus found a metaphysical basis for this doctrine in the RELATIVISM of Protagoras of Abdera: we can know nothing of things outside us except their impression on ourselves; so the "smooth motion" of sense which we call pleasure is the only knowable good (see SOPHISTS).

Epicurus agreed with the Cyrenaics that only pleasure is good, and only pain is bad and always bad; the highest wisdom is to learn how to make the wisest choice of pleasures. But, he taught, the highest point of pleasure is to be attained by the mere removal of pain or disturbance, and so the highest form of bodily pleasure is freedom from fear and anxiety; and because of the role of memory and anticipation, mental pleasure is far more valuable than bodily pleasure. It is clear that Epicurus was not an "Epicurean," one given to voluptuous living; for him, one who is wise in his choice of pleasures chooses a virtuous and withdrawn life of study (see EPICUREANISM).

With the fairly definitive refutation by Bishop Joseph BUTLER (Fifteen Sermons, 1726) of egoistic versions of hedonism, interest tended to center on the defense of universalistic hedonism, or UTILITARIANISM, an ethical theory best known in the form given it by Jeremy Bentham. According to Bentham, actions are to be approved or disapproved according to their tendency to increase the pleasure of all parties concerned by the action; if the whole community is affected, the pleasure of all must be considered. This calls for measuring pleasures and pains, and for comparing those of one person with those of another; and Bentham proposed a "felicific calculus" which, he claimed, would make such measurements and comparisons possible.

Though only a few, apart from Kant, would want to deny that some pleasures are intrinsically valuable, the hedonist tends to claim that not only some, or most, but absolutely all pleasant experiences are intrinsically valuable; and further, that only pleasures are intrinsically valuable; and further that what is "morally good" is identical with, or instrumental to, pleasant experience.

Critique. An important source of confusion among hedonists of an empirical cast of mind is their talk of pleasure and pain as occupying opposite ends of the very same scale. Just as the prospect of physical pain makes one avoid some objects, so pleasures are construed as feelings, the prospect of which makes him seek other objects. Yet the counterpart of pleasure in the sense of a pleasurable state of consciousness, the sense that is of interest in ethics, is not pain but displeasure; while both pleasure and pain, in the sense of certain bodily sensations (e.g., ticklings, stings), are the cause, sometimes, of pleasure in the first sense, and sometimes of displeasure. To attempt an adequate explanation of human likes and dislikes, wants and aversions, by a model of human nature that has pleasure and pain as polar opposites, both of which are capable of precise quantitative variation, is surely a mistake.

One of the major objections that has been raised to hedonism is that it could tend to approve malice, the pleasurable contemplation of another's undeserved misfortune, as intrinsically good; whereas such pleasure is obviously intrinsically bad in direct proportion to its pleasantness.

Further, even if pleasure were somehow involved in our experience of all good things, it would not follow that pleasantness and moral goodness were the same things, any more than it would follow that when one sharpens a pencil the shavings and the sharpened pencil are the same thing. No experience is an experience merely of pleasure, just as nothing is colored without having size and shape; and so even if it be shown that pleasure is a necessary condition of intrinsically valuable experience, this is not to show that it is a sufficient condition. Finally, the hedonist whose whole striving is for pleasure will himself run up against the hedonist paradox: happiness to be got must best be forgot.

See Also: ETHICS, HISTORY OF; EGOISM.

Bibliography: J. WATSON, Hedonistic Theories from Aristippus to Spencer (New York 1895). W. J. OATES, ed., The Stoic and Epicurean Philosophers (New York 1940). R. D. HICKS, Stoic and Epicurean (New York 1910). A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Epicurus and His Gods, tr. C. W. CHILTON (Oxford 1955). H. SIDGWICK, The Methods of Ethics (7th ed. 1907; reissued, Chicago 1962). R. M. BLAKE, "Why Not Hedonism? A Protest," The International Journal of Ethics 37 (1926) 1–18. G. RYLE, Dilemmas (The Turner Lectures, 1953; Cambridge, Eng. 1954) 54–67.

[R. L. CUNNINGHAM]

HEDWIG OF ANJOU, ST.

Polish: Jadwiga; also known as Hedwig of Lithuania, queen of Poland, married woman; b. 1374 in Buda (now part of Budapest), Hungary; d. July 17, 1399, at Krakow, Poland.

Hedwig was the younger daughter of King Louis I of Hungary and Poland and Elizabeth, princess of Bosnia. At age nine she was betrothed to Duke William of Austria, whom she came to love; however, the Polish parliament vetoed this alliance. She demonstrated her obedience in refusing to elope with the young duke. Upon the death of her father and with the consent of the Polish nobility, ten-year-old Hedwig ascended to the throne of Poland in 1384. Her marriage at age 12 to Grand Duke Władysław Jagiello of Lithuania (thereafter King Ladislaus II of Poland) began a 400-year alliance between Poland and Lithuania and contributed to the growth of Christianity throughout the region. As part of the marriage contract, Jagiello became a Christian, destroyed pagan temples, and required the baptism of the Lithuanian people. The queen used her position to further evangelization by urging a moral reform upon her subjects. In 1397, she received permission from Pope Boniface IX to establish the Theology Faculty of the Jagiellonian University of Krakow. She founded several hospitals at Biecz, Sandomierz, Sacz, and Stradom, and she defended the rights of peasants against the Polish nobility. Queen Hedwig combined contemplation and action. She was a woman of extraordinary piety, personal asceticism, and charity, especially to the poor. Often she would kneel in meditation at the feet of the Crucified Christ on the Black Cross in Wawel cathedral to learn God's generous love from Christ himself. At age 25, she died giving birth to her first child, who did not survive. In 1896 Hedwig was beatified by Pope Leo XIII. In his impassioned homily at her canonization on Blonia Esplanade in Krakow, Poland, on June 8, 1997, Pope John Paul II praised Hedwig for her evangelization of Lithuania, the Ukraine, and Belarus, her heroic charity, and sense of justice rooted in Gospel values. The body of this patron of Poland is now venerated in the cathedral of Krakow, Poland.

Feast: July 17 (formerly Feb. 28 in Poland).

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 26 (1997): 3–5, 7. O. HALECKI, Jadwiga of Anjou and the Rise of East Central Europe, ed. T.V. GROMADA (Boulder, Colo. 1991). W. KLUZ, Jadwiga królowa Polski (Warsaw 1987). B. PRZYBYSZEWSKI, Błogosławiona Jadwiga królowa (2d ed. Krakow 1996), tr. as Saint Jadwiga, Queen of Poland, tr. B. MACQUEEN (Rome 1997). L. RYDEL, Królowa Jadwiga (Warsaw 1984). J. STABIŃSKA, Królowa Jadwiga (3d ed. Krakow 1997).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HEESWIJK, MONASTERY OF

House of the PREMONSTRATIENSIS, near 's Hertogenbosch, Netherlands—formerly of the Diocese of

St. Hedwig of Anjou, manuscript illumination. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Utrecht, today Diocese of 's Hertogenbosch. It was founded in 1130–31 by Fulco of Berne as a daughter-house of Marienweerd, at Berne, near Heusden; today nothing is left. For almost 300 years after the monastery was destroyed in 1579, the monks lived in various places of refuge without a cloister, the longest recorded ex-claustration in the history of the Church. In 1857 it reestablished itself under its old name, Berne, at Heeswijk. The monastery sent to America (1893–1902) a foundation that established St. Norbert Abbey, DePere, Wisconsin, and another to Germany (Windberg) in 1923. Heeswijk has a priory in Essenburgh, maintains a gymnasium, has nine incorporated parishes, and directs a missionary diocese in India (Jubbulpore).

Bibliography: C. L. HUGO, S. Ordinis Praemonstratensis annales, 2 v. (Nancy 1734–36) 1:329–335. A. VERSTEYLEN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 8:818–821. C. J. KIRKFLEET, The White Canons of St. Norbert (Paterson, N.J. 1943). N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 v. (Straubing 1949–56) 2:274–278.

[N. BACKMUND]

HEFELE, CARL JOSEPH VON

Bishop, ecclesiastical historian; b. Unterkochen (Württemberg), Germany, March 15, 1809; d. Rottenburg, June 5, 1893. After studying at Tübingen (1827–32), he was ordained (Aug. 10, 1833). At Tübingen he succeeded J. A. MÖHLER in the chair of Church history, patrology, and Christian archeology as lecturer (Privatdocent) from 1836, and as full professor from 1840. As representative for Ellwangen in the Württemberg legislature (1842–45), he supported Bp. Johann von Keller's efforts to free the Church from governmental tutelage. After serving as rector of Tübingen University (1852–53), he began publication of his principal historical writing, a seven-volume Conciliengeschichte (1855–74), completed to mid-15th century by him, which treats the provincial and ecumenical synods in their historical milieu, so that this work supplies almost a history of the Church. It displays vast knowledge of ancient and medieval Church history and remains a standard work in the French version revised by Henri LECLERCQ, which is outdated only in some sections. Hefeles numerous learned writings included frequent contributions to the Theologische Quartalschrift and more than 150 articles in the first edition of the Kirchenlexikon.

Called to Rome in 1868 as a member of the preparatory central commission for VATICAN COUNCIL I, he drafted the council's order of procedure. His hopes for appointment to the committee on faith were disappointed, but he was chosen bishop of Rottenburg (June 17, 1869). At the assembly of German bishops in Fulda, Germany (September 1869), he voiced strong opposition to definition of the doctrine of papal infallibility. In the Vatican Council he was one of the leading opponents of this doctrine. His arguments, mainly historical, made much of the questions concerning Pope HONORIUS I. He voted non placet at the decisive session (July 13, 1870) and left Rome to avoid voting in the public session (July 18). He had acted at the council according to his conscience as a theologian, and had repulsed pressures from the OLD CATHOLICS, who falsely claimed him as a supporter, to help the formation of their schism. After a long interior struggle, he published the conciliar decrees in his diocese (April 10, 1871), the last German bishop to do so. Hefeles prudent administration subsequently preserved his diocese from the troubles of the KULTURKAMPF.

Bibliography: Works. Conciliengeschichte, v. 1–7 (Freiburg 1855–74), to 1449; v.8–9 by J. HERGENRÖTHER (Freiburg 1887–90), to the Council of Trent; rev. ed. with many corrections and changes by Hefeles, v.1–4 (Freiburg 1873–90); v.5–6 rev. by A. KNÖPFLER; Fr. tr. with many additions by H. LECLERCQ et al., 11 v. (Paris 1907–52); Eng. tr. W. R. CLARK, History of the Councils of the Church, 5 v. (Edinburgh 1883–96), to 787; Kardinal Ximenes (Tübingen 1844), Eng. tr. (London 1860); Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie u. Liturgik, 2 v. (Tübingen 1864). Literature. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 5:1653–55. Revue internationale de théologie 16 (1908) 485–506, 671–694. P. GODET, "Ch.-Jos. Hefeles," Revue du Clergé français 50 (1907) 449–474. C. BUTLER, The Vatican Council, 2 v. (New York 1930). A. HAGEN, "Hefeles und das Vatikanische Konzil," Theologische Quartalschrift 123 (1942) 223–252; 124 (1943) 1–40; Gestalten aus dem Schwäbischen Katholizismus, 3 v. (Stuttgart 1948–54) 2:7–58; Geschichte der Diözese Rottenburg, v.2 (Stuttgart 1958). E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2111–13.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH

German idealist philosopher; b. Stuttgart, Aug. 27, 1770; d. Berlin, Nov. 14, 1831. Possessed of great speculative powers, Hegel developed German IDEALISM into an absolute system of knowledge that conceived all of reality as the self-unfolding of the Absolute.

Life and Works. The son of an official in Stuttgart, Hegel was given a staunch Protestant and humanistic education. At 18 he entered the theological school at the University of Tübingen, where he studied philosophy (1788–90) and theology (1790–93). He was a close friend of F. Hölderlin (1770–1843) and F. SCHELLING, and was influenced more by the study of Greek antiquity, contemporary philosophy (I. Kant, F. H. Jacobi, and J. C. F. Schiller), and the stirrings of the French Revolution than by the study of evangelical theology. In 1793 he was a private tutor, first at Bern and later at Frankfurt am Main; at about this time he composed his so-called Theologischen Jugendschriften (ed. H. Nohl, Tübingen 1907), in which he opposed the problems of the philosophy of religion to those of religious instruction and clarified his own philosophical position.

In 1801 he went to Jena, where he produced his first published work, Die Differenz des Fichteschen und Schellingschen Systems der Philosophie (Jena 1801), and other writings in which he took his stand with Schelling against J. G. FICHTE. Yet, in introducing his dialectical principles, he went far beyond Schelling from the start. The same year he wrote his monograph for habilitation, De orbitis planetarum. With Schelling he lectured and worked on the Kritischen Journal der Philosophie, in which he discussed contemporary philosophy and worked toward establishing the foundations of his own thought. This he eventually embodied in the introduction of his system [Jenenser Logik, Metaphysik und Naturphilosophie, ed. G. Lasson (Leipzig 1923 and 1931–32)]. When Schelling left Jena in 1803, the tenuous collaboration dissolved and the difference in spirit between them grew. It finally became evident that the gap would never narrow when Hegel took a stand against Schelling in the Phänomenologie des Geistes (Bamberg and Würzburg 1807), a work that initiated Hegel's own "system" but decreased the chances for a mutual collaboration on a philosophy of the spirit.

After a short period as editor of the Bamberger Zeitung, in 1808, he became director of the gymnasium in Nuremberg. Besides a philosophical introduction for school instruction, he composed there his metaphysical masterpiece, Wissenschaft der Logik [2 v. (Nuremberg 1812–16) also known as the Grosse Logik]. Finally, in 1816 he was invited to become professor at Heidelberg, where he wrote his Enzyklopädie der philosophischen Wissenschaften (Heidelberg 1817) to serve as a basic textbook; this proved to be a tightly woven compendium of his entire system.

In 1818 Hegel was invited to the University of Berlin, where he taught until his death, exerting a deep influence upon the whole spiritual and cultural life of Prussia. Here he published his Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts (Berlin 1821). He lectured on the philosophy of history, of art, and of religion, and also on the history of philosophy. These lectures were first printed after his death. In the midst of his work, Hegel died at 61, evidently of cholera.

Teachings. In his early writings, Hegel showed a tendency to deal with the reconciliation of contradictories, viz, of private devotion and folk religion, of guilt and fate, of particular and general, of finite and infinite. This reconciliation, for him, is accomplished in spirit, where the opposites are dissolved through love. The first and basic opposition is contained in the duality of subject and predicate; it is resolved in the otherness of spirit knowing itself.

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, drawing.

Hegel applied this dialectical procedure to the problems of his day. For instance, Kant had unsatisfactorily resolved the relation between subject and object in a transcendental unity. Fichte in turn established unity in the "absolute I," as opposed to the "not-I." This did not actually resolve the duality, but reduced it to the term of a relation, viz, an absolutely given subject that gives rise to the object. To preserve objectivity, Schelling then proffered "absolute identity" as an Absolute whose indifference is both subjective and objective, yet establishes itself in knowledge as the difference between subjectivity and objectivity. Against him, Hegel objected, as had Fichte, that no difference can arise or be understood from absolute identity and indifference. To equate the Absolute with pure identity is sterile, just as "the night, in which all cows are black, means the naïveté of emptiness in knowledge" (Ausgabe 2:14). Difference can come from identity only when it is already a component of that identity. Absolute unity is a dialectical unity derived from a thing itself and its contradictory, that is, not as Schelling had assumed, the “identity of identity,” but according to Hegel “the identity of identity and non-identity” (1:252; 3:68). This implies that spirit becomes the other in knowing itself, but rises above opposition and knows and develops itself in the other. Thus Hegel finds absolute, dialectical unity to consist in the act of knowing, which is thereby able to conceive itself as “Absolute Knowledge.”

Phenomenology of Spirit. Hegel sought to justify his dialectical “speculation” in the Phenomenology of Spirit, which constitutes the introduction to his System of Science. While Fichte and Schelling started from the immediacy of the “intellectual intuition” of an absolute principle in order to grasp therein all a priori deducible notions, Hegel forsook the immediacy of intuition and substituted the rational mediation of Absolute Mind in a reductive manifestation. To this end, he explored all the experiences of consciousness in the Phenomenology—from sense knowledge, to perception and understanding, to reason; not only in its theoretical but also in its practical aspects, as in law and morality and in art and religion; and not only subjective experiences but also objective experiences of spirit in its historical development. Here the dialectical law is already in evidence: each achieved degree of consciousness advances through self-contradiction to a higher degree that resolves the contradiction. Thus does Hegel conceive the totality of the experiences of spirit in a dialectically necessary concatenation. The highest “contradiction of consciousness,” the duality of subject and object, is finally resolved in Absolute Mind. The knowing spirit attains itself in its own opposition; in the full development of knowledge, what is known as other is raised to the identity of spirit conceiving itself. Mind experiences itself as the Absolute, thereby resolving the opposition between finite and infinite spirit. Finite spirit understands itself as the place where the Absolute comes to self-consciousness and becomes “spirit.”

Logic. From the vantage point of Absolute Mind, one can reconstruct the Absolute’s dialectical unfolding in pure thought and deduce, as a consequence, all knowledge in a purely a priori process, thereby establishing the system of “absolute science.” This is the task of the “science of Logic,” which for Hegel means “absolute Logic,” wherein the order of thought and the order of being, logic and metaphysics, become one and are grasped in the total actuality of their absolute source with logical necessity. The impetus to thought is again the dialectical law. Whereas this notion was explored only empirically in the Phenomenology, it here is enforced with logical necessity as an absolute method, as the unfolding rhythm of the Absolute Itself. Each achieved insight displays a contradiction; it grasps a partial and not a whole truth; it displays the “untrue” and therefore its negation. The contradiction leads to a higher level, so that the “immediacy” of the first notion, through the “mediation” of its negation, is resolved in a “mediated immediacy.” A thought that avoids contradiction, that abstractly differentiates, and that separates opposites from each other, is for Hegel the product of “abstract understanding,” which remains at the level of external empirical representation. When thought accepts the inner contradiction of things but resolves them into a higher unity, it then operates as “speculative reason,” which penetrates reality in its most vital movement and conceives it in one, dialectical, and self-interpreting ontological foundation. So Hegel’s logic aspires to be not only an ontology, but also a theology—“the representation of God as He is in His eternal essence before the creation of nature and of finite spirit” (3:36). The absolute system of categories of logic seeks to reconstruct the ideal design of essences and essential laws in the spirit of God. This takes place in three steps from being to essence to idea (Sein, Wesen, Begriff) in which the Absolute finally participates in the “Absolute Idea.”

Total System. Hegel’s logic is only the first phase of the total system, which is succinctly treated in the Encyclopedia (though considerably enlarged upon in the second edition). Here Hegel considers the triadic development of Idea, Nature, and Spirit, resuming the first step from the science of logic. The latter knows the Absolute in the pure form of Idea; but the Absolute, because it is essentially the absolute dialectic, must emerge from the ideal into reality, and this gives rise to the second phase, which he calls the “philosophy of nature.” This describes the externalization of self-estranged Nature in the proximity of space and the continuity of time, but in an unfolding of successively higher forms all the way to that of organic life. The opposition between Idea and Nature is in turn resolved in the “philosophy of spirit.” The Absolute as “Absolute Idea” mediates itself through the externalization of nature into spirit and attains consciousness in the finite spirit; there it goes beyond the content of human consciousness, of both subjective and objective spirit, and becomes “Absolute Spirit.”

Philosophy of History. The spiritualization of the Absolute perfects itself in the collective history of man. The universal nature of Hegel’s thought provides also for historical reality and attempts to conceptualize it from the Absolute, in the sense that the latter conciliates historical oppositions and incorporates these in its system. One finds the philosophy of history everywhere in Hegel’s thought, not only in lectures specifically concerned with the subject but also in his systematic works. Since for Hegel, however, history is the process by which Absolute Spirit unfolds, it seemed to him that historical progress must involve dialectical oppositions that are resolved in a higher content of historical being. Hegel sought to reconstruct dialectically the whole of history, that is, to comprehend it within the necessity of the Absolute. Thus not only is concrete history interpreted to a great extent in a tortuous way, but freedom as an essential element of history is reduced to absolute necessity.

Political Philosophy. In his philosophy of law and of the state, Hegel was preoccupied in supplying a philosophical basis for the Prussian state; thus he left to posterity the theoretical basis for every form of absolutist and totalitarian government. For in the state the Absolute attains its manifestation. The state is the reality of the moral Idea, of self-unfolding Spirit, and presents the divine will as present, as the real pattern and organizing factor in the world. It is true that Hegel worked for constitutional monarchy, because subjective consciousness is there also granted its right. However, for him the manifestation does not consist in the subjective self-determination of individuals, but in the objective rationality of the structured state as a whole. As elsewhere in Hegel's philosophy, the individual is absorbed into the universal, the individual subject becomes a mere "moment" of the universal Spirit; thus the universality of the state transcends the individual as its own subordinated "moment." Nevertheless, for Hegel (as is often overlooked), the state is not the highest manifestation of the Absolute; the state can still evolve in other forms wherein the Absolute is manifested as Absolute Spirit.

Philosophy of Religion. The Absolute Spirit variously manifests itself (1) as art, in the objective form of sensuous manifestation; (2) as religion, in the subjective form of representation; and (3) as philosophy, in the absolute form of pure thought wherein the opposition of objectivity and subjectivity is resolved. The first immediate form of Absolute Spirit is therefore beauty, as this is presented in art. Beauty is the Absolute (Idea) in its sensuous manifestation. Hegel's aesthetic, already sketched in the Encyclopedia, was considerably developed in his Berlin lectures. He differentiates between (1) the symbolic art of the ancient Orient in which the Idea (as form) did not entirely penetrate the content; (2) the classical art of Greece, in which the Idea was perfectly embodied in matter; and (3) the romantic art of the Christian Era, in which Idea transcends its sensuous manifestation. In religion, however, Absolute Spirit manifests itself in a higher form than in art—not objectively, but subjectively. Here (as in philosophy) there is an absolute content; that is, the Absolute is its own content. It exists, however, in an imperfect form, not in the pure form of thought but in that of representation. Thus man places God before himself in otherness, outside himself, hence in opposition, presenting a duality and estrangement that must ultimately be resolved in Absolute Mind. Hegel distinguished three phases in the development of religion: the first presents God as an objective power in nature (religion of the ancient East); the second presents Him as a subjective individuality (religion of the Jews, Greeks, and Romans); the third, or "absolute religion," conceives Him as spirit (Christianity). Hegel adopted many elements of Christian belief (from the Protestant point of view), but he interpreted them in terms of his own system. Thus, the doctrine of the Trinity had special significance for him in his absolute dialectic. The level of God-in-Himself is the "kingdom of the Father" (expressed in logic); its externalization in the finite world is the "kingdom of the Son" (expressed in the philosophy of nature), and the union of God and the faithful (the Church) is the "kingdom of the Spirit" (expressed in the philosophy of spirit). The triune Godhead is "the Father and the Son, and this differentiation in its unity as the Spirit" (9:393). Religion is for Hegel the highest manifestation of Absolute Spirit short of Absolute Knowledge, superior to everything else in the sphere of consciousness. Yet the imperfect form of religious representation must still be resolved in the purer element of thought, that is, in Absolute Knowledge, in which man grasps himself as one with the Absolute as a "moment" of Absolute Spirit. Religion, therefore, is absorbed in philosophy.

Evaluation and Critique. Hegel is certainly one of the most significant philosophers in history. With a lively sense of the fullness of experience, he committed himself to a deeply speculative and boldly constructive thought, which distinguishes him as the unique systematizer of German idealism and perhaps as the greatest systematic philosopher of modern times. His dialectical thought—although historically patterned on Heraclitus, whom he regarded highly, and influenced by Kant, Fichte, and Schelling—gives rise to a true experience of the oppositional aspects of reality, especially in the historical and social domain. This insight is no less verified, even from a Thomistic point of view, in the oppositional structure of finite being and finite spirit. Hegel's dialectic could conveniently have opened up the structures of being, which are meaningful in theology to the extent that they transcend formal-logical thought; in this way, realities that are comprehensible only in the unity and the tension of opposition could have attained fuller realization. Yet, the dialectic of Hegel was eccentric; it failed in consequence of its own one-sidedness. Even Schelling, in his later period, raised the objection (often repeated since) that Hegel's dialectic offers no principle of deduction because it provides no content in its suppositions. Reality is never deduced dialectically, but can be grasped and recognized only in experience, and thus Hegel's thought remains entirely in the logical sphere of possible being. This objection contends that Hegel "set up" every opposition in things as a contradiction whether this was required or justified. A dialectic of contradictions yields no new insights, nor does it contribute to the advance of thought.

Again, on deeper reflection, one can see that Hegel's thought is basically a pure and absolute dialectic of reason. Though in the beginning Hegel regarded oppositions as resolved in love, later he dropped this solution and ascribed the resolution to Absolute Knowing alone. With the entrance of practical existential phenomena into the picture, these were resolved in the pure act of Mind. His Absolute (following the Aristotelian νόησις νόησεως) is Absolute Mind alone, not Absolute Will, Causality, and Love. A tendency toward INTELLECTUALISM, a legacy from the Greeks and an encumbrance on Western philosophy, received its strongest expression in Hegel. Concerned only with what mind can comprehend, he fastened on what could be conceptualized, namely essence, and not on being as such, which cannot be comprehended but only ascertained and acknowledged.

In the last analysis, Hegel's philosophy is rationalistic thought, absolute essentialism in which reality as a whole is derived from the laws of being, a system based on necessity and not on freedom. To the extent that ideal being alone, and not real being, can be "resolved" into Mind, absolute idealism is grounded in the absolute fixity of essence, whose entire contents are interpreted as ideal moments in the process of Absolute Spirit.

Though Hegel defended himself against the charge of pantheism, one can hardly understand his spiritual monism as other than pantheistic (or panentheistic). On the one hand, if the finite is resolved in the Infinite and finite spirit in Absolute Spirit, the independence of individuality and of personality is lost. On the other hand, when the Infinite is resolved in the finite, Absolute Spirit develops itself in its finite moment. Not only is the "evil infinite" not actual, but neither is the "true infinite," as Hegel distinguished these; all that is left is the infinity of dialectical self-unfolding. Again, because the Absolute attains itself in the mind of finite spirit, Hegel claimed adequate comprehensive knowledge of everything in an absolute way, "the truth, without outer covering and for itself" (3:36)—the highest claim for a philosophical system that has ever been made. In this view, not only would religion be absorbed in philosophical knowledge; but since religion is a free person-to-person relationship to God and thus more than philosophy, philosophy should be resolved into religion. The possibility of supernatural revelation and the mystery of divine truth, attainable only through faith and not through reason, is also resolved by Hegel into absolute, rational, and comprehending Mind.

See Also: HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM; IDEALISM; PANTHEISM; PANENTHEISM.

Bibliography: Works. Sämtliche Werke: Jubiläumsausgabe, ed. H. GLOCKNER, 26 v. (Stuttgart 1927–1957); Sämtliche Werke: Kritische Ausgabe, ed. G. LASSON and J. HOFFMEISTER (Leipzig-Hamburg 1923–); Sämtliche Werke: Kritische Ausgabe, ed. J. HOFFMEISTER (Leipzig-Hamburg 1949–). For a list of English translations of Hegel's works see J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954) 658–659. General literature. F. A. STAUDENMAIER, Darstellung und Kritik des Hegelschen Systems (Mainz 1844). K. FISCHER, Hegels Leben, Werke und Lehre, 2 v. (2d ed. Heidelberg 1911). R. KRONER, Von Kant bis Hegel, 2 v. (2d ed. Tübingen 1961). B. HEIMANN, System und Methode in Hegels Philosophie (Leipzig 1927). H. FISCHER, Hegels Methode in ihrer ideengeschichtlichen Notwendigkeit (Munich 1928). H. NIEL, De la médiation dans la philosophie de Hegel (Paris 1945). I. A. IL'IN, Die Philosophie Hegels als kontemplative Gotteslehre (Bern 1946). T. LITT, Hegel: Versuch einer kritischen Erneuerung (Heidelberg 1953). W. T. STACE, The Philosophy of Hegel (New York 1955). J. N. FINDLAY, Hegel: A Re-examination (New York 1958). F. GRÉGOIRE, Études hégéliennes: Les Points capitaux du système (Louvain 1958). W. SEEBERGER, Hegel (Stuttgart 1961). Hegel's development. W. DILTHEY, Die Jugendgeschichte Hegels und andere Abhandlungen zur Geschichte des deutschen Idealismus (2d ed. Stuttgart 1959). R. HAYM, Hegel und seine Zeit, ed. H. ROSENBERG (2d ed. Leipzig 1927). T. HÄRING, Hegel, sein Wollen und sein Werk, 2 v. (Leipzig 1929–38). J. SCHWARZ, Hegels philosophische Entwicklung (Frankfurt 1938). T. STEINBÜCHEL, Das Grundproblem der Hegelschen Philosophie (Bonn 1933), only v.1 publ. G. LUKÁCS, Der junge Hegel und die Probleme der kapitalistischen Gesellschaft (Berlin 1954). G. E. MÜLLER, Hegel: Denkgeschichte eines Lebendigen (Bern 1959). A. T. B. PEPPERZAK, Le Jeune Hegel et la vision morale du monde (The Hague 1960). Phenomenology. J. HYPPOLITE, Genèse et structure de la phénoménologie de l'esprit de Hegel (Paris 1946). A. KOJÈVE, Introduction à la lecture de Hegel (Paris 1947). P. HENRICI, Hegel und Blondel (Pul-lach, Ger. 1958). Logic. G. W. CUNNINGHAM, Thought and Reality in Hegel's System (New York 1910). G. R. G. MURE, An Introduction to Hegel (Oxford 1940); A Study of Hegel's Logic (Oxford 1950). E. CORETH, Das dialektische Sein in Hegels Logik (Vienna 1952). J. HYPPOLITE, Logique et existence (Paris 1953). B. LAKEBRINK, Hegels dialektische Ontologie und die Thomistische Analektik (Cologne 1955). M. HEIDEGGER, Identität und Differenz (Pfullingen 1957). Philosophy of history. G. LASSON, Hegel als Geschichtsphilosoph (Leipzig 1920). S. VANNI ROVIGHI, La concezione Hegeliana della storia (Milan 1942). J. HYPPOLITE, Introduction à la philosophie de l'histoire de Hegel (Paris 1948). Political philosophy. G. GIESE, Hegels Staatsidee und der Begriff der Staatserziehung (Halle 1926). J. RITTER, Hegel und die französische Revolution (Cologne 1957). H. MARCUSE, Reason and Revolution: Hegel and the Rise of Social Theory (2d ed. New York 1955). J. BARRION, Hegel und die marxistische Staatslehre (Bonn 1963). Philosophy of art. F. PUGLISI, L'estetica di Hegel e i suoi presupposti teoretici (Padua 1953). G. VECCHI, L'estetica di Hegel (Milan 1956). J. KAMINSKY, Hegel on Art (Albany, N.Y. 1962). Philosophy of religion. H. GROOS, Der deutsche Idealismus und das Christentum (Munich 1927). H. A. OGIERMANN, Hegels Gottesbeweise (Analecta Gregoriana 49; 1948). J. MÖLLER, Der Geist and das Absolute (Paderborn 1951). P. ASVELD, La Pensée religieuse du jeune Hegel (Louvain 1953). E. SCHMIDT, Hegels Lehre von Gott (Gütersloh, Ger. 1952). W. ALBRECHT, Hegels Gottesbeweis (Berlin 1958). Other literature. W. KERN, "Neue Hegel-Bücher: Ein Literaturbericht für die Jahre 1958 bis 1960," Scholastik 37 (1962) 85–114, 550–578; 38 (1963) 62–90.

[E. CORETH]

HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM

The term Hegelianism refers to a movement in philosophy usually associated with two sorts of thinkers: (1) followers of G. W. F. HEGEL, in the strict sense of the word who, notwithstanding their personal interpretations, remain faithful to the thought of the German philosopher; (2) philosophers belonging to other schools of thought who have been basically influenced by Hegel. The first usage refers primarily to philosophers of the 19th century, the second to such contemporary movements as French EXISTENTIALISM, Marxism, and even in certain cases, THOMISM (particularly in Germany). The term Neo-Hegelianism, on the other hand, is generally applied to the revival of Hegelian philosophy that began in Europe at the end of the 19th century and then extended to America.

HEGELIANISM

The first school of Hegelian philosophers started during the latter period of Hegel's life, while he was teaching philosophy at the University of Berlin (1818–31). This group founded, in 1827, the Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik. It encompassed various thinkers who later would separate into "left" and "right" wings. The most important were G. A. Gabler, who in 1828 published the first commentary on Hegel's Phänomenologie des Geistes (pub. 1807); P. K. Marheinecke, who published the first edition of Hegel's lectures on the philosophy of religion, and on the proofs for the existence of God; K. E. Michelet, who later edited Hegel's lectures on the history of philosophy; E. Gans, who taught a course on the philosophy of law that was to have a decisive influence on the young Marx, and who was also the publisher of Hegel's lectures on the philosophy of history; H. Hotho, who edited Hegel's lectures on aesthetics; K. Rosenkranz, who was Hegel's first biographer; B. BAUER, who was to be the leader of the left-wing Hegelians who influenced Marx; and H. F. Hinrichs, whose work on the relation between religion and science (1822) had influenced Hegel's own ideas on philosophy of religion.

Most decisive in the further development of this early Hegelianism was Hegel's own review in the Jahrbücher (1823) of a work by K. F. Göschel on the relation between philosophy and faith, proclaiming the complete congruity of his own philosophy with Christian revelation. This profession of orthodoxy, as well as the political conservatism of Hegel's later thought, was responsible for the subsequent division of Hegelianism into a left and a right wing.

Orthodoxy and Liberalism. As long as Hegel was alive, his personal prestige kept all Hegelians together; but shortly after his death the radical split took place. It was occasioned by the publication in 1835 of Leben Jesu kritisch bearbeitet by D. F. STRAUSS. Although Hegelian in inspiration, Strauss's work criticizes Hegel's concept of religion on some basic points. For Hegel the contents of religion and philosophy are identical, but whereas philosophy proposes truth in the pure form of reason, religion expresses it in a sensible representation. Such identification favors the theoretical content of religion at the expense of its historical form. Against this thesis Strauss maintained that religious dogmas are irreducible to philosophical concepts, and that, far from being irrelevant, the narratives of the Gospel form the main content of the Christian religion.

These narratives, like all religious doctrines, must be considered not as symbols of rational thought, but as myths expressing the aspirations of the original Christian community. From this viewpoint the historical study of religion becomes essential, but the history of the religious myth is the history of the community that has nurtured it. Very little historical truth is to be found in the narratives themselves. This is not to say that the sacred writings are deprived of truth, but only that their truth is neither historical nor symbolic—it is mythical. Strauss's work preserved the fundamental Hegelian idea of the validity of religious truth, but it destroyed Hegel's ultimate identification of religion with philosophy, as well as the identity of the logical and the historical evolution of truth. Also, by maintaining that the fundamental truth of Christianity, the identity of the divine with the human nature, is realized in not just one exemplar (Christ), but in humanity as a whole, he divorced his brand of Hegelianism from Christian orthodoxy.

Among the many writers who attacked Strauss, the most noteworthy was Bauer, who later was to be converted to an even more radical liberalism, denying that the Gospels contained any historical truth. In the controversies over Strauss's Leben Jesu, the Hegelian school became divided into a right wing, which considered the unity of God and man to be realized in a unique and historical way (Göschel, Gabler, Marheinecke, and initially, Bauer), and a left wing, which denied the historical and unique value of the Gospel narrations. Strauss's supporters in Berlin organized themselves into the so-called Young Hegelian movement.

Young Hegelians and Feuerbach. Further developments would soon turn the Young Hegelians into a politically leftist group. Over the years Hegel's political views had become more and more conservative, and many considered his lectures in Berlin as merely a philosophical support of the regime of King Frederick William III of Prussia. Hegel justified his attitude on the principle that philosophy must explain what "is," and not what "ought to be." Its task, therefore, is never to anticipate the future. Yet, Hegel's dialectical view of history implied that no historical situation can be final: each stage is to be followed by a new one that negates the present.

The Young Hegelian A. von Cieszkowski concluded from this dialectical necessity that Hegelian philosophy must become a philosophy of action, a means to change the future (Prolegomena zur Historiosophie, Berlin 1838). The left-wing Hegelians adopted his view and decided that Hegel's static "system" conflicted with his revolutionary method; the latter alone was to be preserved. Their theories found an outlet in the newly founded Hallische Jahrbücher für deutsche Wissenschaft und Kunst, edited by A. Ruge and T. Echtermeyer (1838). This new journal gradually became the liberal counterpart of the conservative Jahrbücher of Berlin. It received its definitive bent from an article by L. FEUERBACH, "Zur Kritik der Hegelschen Philosophie" (1839). Feuerbach showed that over and above the contradiction between system and method, Hegel's philosophy suffered from yet another shortcoming that affected the dialectical method itself. The purpose of Hegel's philosophy had been to realize the identity between the real and the ideal, but in trying to achieve it Hegel had placed himself entirely on the side of the ideal. The result was one more idealistic system in which reality was reduced to a moment of thought. To curb this idealistic impetus Feuerbach proposed that the original primacy of reality be restored, and that consciousness be considered as a product of nature rather than the opposite.

Whereas Feuerbach had attacked Hegel's philosophy, Ruge for the first time openly attacked the political conservatism of the Prussian state in an article entitled "Karl Streckfusz und das Preussentum" (1839). The Berlin group of Young Hegelians, mentored by Bauer and Strauss, and recently joined by Marx, accepted the progressive ideas of their Halle colleagues and started contributing to the Hallische Jahrbücher. Bauer, now transferred to the University of Bonn, made the link between religious and political liberalism. In his Kritik der evangelischen Geschichte des Johannes (Bremen 1840) and Kritik der evangelischen Geschichte der Synoptiker (2 v., 2d ed. Leipzig 1841) he defended the view that, at its origin, Christianity was an entirely new manifestation of the World Spirit; yet at present it no longer corresponded to the current stage of universal consciousness. The task of the religious critique, then, was to liberate the State, the highest incarnation of the Spirit, from this antiquated Christian religion. Bauer implied that once the doctrinal changes had taken place, political reforms would follow automatically.

The religious critique of the Young Hegelians reached its apex in Feuerbach's important work, Das Wesen des Christentums (Leipzig 1841). It applied Feuerbach's new principle of philosophy to religion, "an object with universal significance." Rather than start from an infinite and abstract notion, Feuerbach proposed that the Hegelian dialectic start from the concrete reality of man. The real "alienation" in his philosophy is not, as in Hegel's dialectic, the finite appearance of an infinite notion, but the projection of the attributes of human nature into an imaginary religious Being outside man. In religion man is estranged from himself, and the task of philosophical anthropology is to restore man to himself by liberating him from his religious illusions.

In "Vorläufige Thesen Zur Reform der Philosophie" (1843), Feuerbach completed his critique of religion by extending it to Hegel's philosophy. Hegel's Idea is no more than an idol, and his philosophy a pseudo-theology. His dialectic, going from the infinite to the finite and back to the infinite, is only a philosophical imitation of man's religious alienation. The final purpose of Feuerbach's dialectic is to overcome this Hegelian Idea, as well as any form of religion.

Marx's Development. What Feuerbach did with the religious aspect of Hegel's philosophy, K. MARX would do with his political views. Initially Marx had shared the speculative viewpoint of Bauer, Feuerbach, and the entire Berlin group. Then, under the influence of Ruge, he became more and more convinced that a change in the established order cannot be effected by a critique of religion, but only by political and social reform.

Philosophy of the State. In his Kritik des hegelschen Staatsrechts written in 1842–43 and first published in 1927, Marx applied Feuerbach's reversal of Hegel's dialectic to the philosophy of the State. Whereas for Hegel the spheres of real life, the natural and socioeconomic relations among men, are a mere preparation for the State as Idea, for Marx the real situation is the exact opposite: The State is merely an ideal and empty structure determined by the real spheres of life. Hegel's panlogism, which culminated in his Idea of the State, Marx saw as reducing reality to the simple appearance of an Idea. The only reason why such an illusionist philosophy was successful is that it offered a faithful description of man's actual situation: the real sphere of life has become asocial, and man's status as a social being is preserved only in the ideal sphere of the State. Man's real relations with others in the economic sphere are individualistic and based on the unlimited egoism of private property. The State that is built on these economic relations is merely an ideal illusion of a social reality. Whatever is real in the State structure is, in fact, no more than a legalization of the unlimited right of private property. Marx's critique may be considered as a continuation of Feuerbach's, since he gives the ultimate reason why man creates for himself the religious illusion: being estranged from his full reality in this world, he builds all his expectations upon a better world in an afterlife.

Notion of Alienation. In a series of manuscripts, written in Paris in 1844 and first published in 1932, Marx's critique of Hegel reached the very heart of dialectical philosophy, the notion of alienation. He saw Hegel's basic form of alienation as an alienation of consciousness that consists in the outgoing movement of consciousness toward the material world. But this, according to Marx, is by no means the alienation of man, which consists rather in the fact that man relates himself inhumanly to the material world. Man's alienation is not his relation to the material world—for that is his very essence—but the fact that he is estranged from the product of this relation, from the relation itself (his work), and from the social aspects of the relation (his intercourse with others). The communist society will replace this inhuman relation to nature, exclusively directed to the production of material goods, by an authentic relation to nature in which man is able to realize himself as a free and social being.

It is obvious that in Marx, and even in Feuerbach, Hegelianism has developed into an outright critique of Hegel. Marx's early works are no longer Hegelian in the strict sense; they constitute a new philosophy, strongly influenced by Hegel. This is even more the case for M. Stirner, another Young Hegelian, who in Der Einzige und sein Eigentum (Leipzig 1845), pushes the negative principle of Hegelian dialectic to an extreme. Any moral or social affirmation is to be negated in the next moment; it is therefore false and bound to disappear. Only the process of thought remains constant and this process irresistibly destroys any religious, moral, and political value. But at the end, thought itself is to be destroyed and to be changed into its contrary, the pure, immediate, and individual will. Marx would violently attack this moral and political anarchism in his Holy Family.

Other Influences. Among the philosophers on whom Hegel exercised a strong, although negative, influence one should mention A. Trendelenburg and S. A. KIERKEGAARD. In his Logische Untersuchungen (2v., Berlin 1840), Trendelenburg attacked Hegel's Logic because of the illegitimate intrusion of movement into the realm of logic, which is essentially static. Movement can be perceived, but it can never be thought. That is why Hegel's dialectic cannot be justified within the strictures of logic. Having followed Hegel in his doctoral dissertation, Kierkegaard vehemently criticized his ethical ideas in Fear and Trembling (1843), and his logic and philosophy of history in Philosophical Fragments (1844) and Concluding Unscientific Postscript (1846).

Orthodox Hegelianism went rapidly into decline after the master's death. However, there remained two important interpreters, K. Rosenkranz and J. E. Erdmann. In addition, F. T. Vischer, the aesthetician, and K. Fischer, the historian of philosophy, may be counted as Hegelians, although Vischer was more empirical in his approach than Hegel, and Fischer remained basically a Kantian.

Hegelianism Outside Germany. Around the middle of the 19th century, Hegelianism in the strict sense had almost disappeared from Germany. Yet at about the same time Hegel was introduced into England by H. Stirling's work, The Secret of Hegel (London 1865). Stirling used Hegel in his reaction against English EMPIRICISM and DEISM. However imperfect Stirling's study was—it interprets Hegel's philosophy as a mere continuation of Kant's—it remains important for having initiated a school of profound and personal commentators: J. McT. E. McTaggart, who wrote a commentary on Hegel's Logic; E. B. McGilvary; W. Wallace, who translated the Logic; and J. B. Baillie, who translated the Phenomenology.

During the same period Hegel was introduced in Italy through the publications of B. Spaventa and A. Vera. In Denmark Hegel first became popular in theological circles, particularly through J. L. Heiberg, N. Clausen, and H. Martensen. In Russia Hegelianism also split into a right wing, religiously and politically conservative (main representative: V. G. Bielinski in his first period), and a left wing, which inclined toward Stirner's nihilism (Bielinski in his second period), and finally joined forces with populism (Bielinski in his third period) and Marxism (A. Herzen, M. A. Bakunin, G. V. Plekhanov). Russian Hegelians of both right and left connected Hegel's philosophy with some sort of pan-Slavism according to which Russia must fulfill a unique and final role in world history.

NEO-HEGELIANISM

At the end of the 19th century a Hegelian revival started. Various schools in different countries called themselves Neo-Hegelian. Their new approach to Hegel was characterized by a more personal reading of his works than was in vogue among their predecessors.

Holland. Most traditional was probably the Dutch school, in which the study of Hegel's philosophy was associated with a liberal trend in Calvinist theology. Neo-Hegelianism in Holland almost became a religious sect. Its leading figures were V. Bolland (Collegium Logicum, 1904) and J. Hessing, who wrote excellent commentaries on Hegel's Logic and on the Phenomenology. The movement produced two journals, Annalen van de Critische Philosophie and De Idee. It fell into some disrepute after World War II because of the active Fascism of some of its members, particularly T. Goedewaagen. Its major thinkers of the 1960s were B. Wigtersma and the theologian G. A. van den Bergh van Eysinga.

Italy. A similar school, but with a more personal approach, existed in Italy. B. CROCE rejected Hegel's philosophy of nature and proposed an entirely new system based on the philosophy of the spirit: the spirit as individual intuition (aesthetics), as consciousness of the universal (logic), as particular will (economic activity) and as universal will (ethics). G. GENTILE also deviated from Hegelian orthodoxy by his subjective, somewhat Fichtean interpretation of Hegel's Absolute as creative act of the spirit immanent in all reality. By his moral and political activity man participates in this creative act of the spirit. Gentile's work was discredited after the war because of his connection with the Fascist regime.

England. No less personal than the Italians were the English Neo-Hegelians: T. H. Green, F. H. BRADLEY, and B. Bosanquet. Green read in Hegel's philosophy the ultimate answers to the basic questions raised by Hume. Bradley, the most original of the group, combined his IDEALISM with a certain Anglo-Saxon EMPIRICISM. In Principles of Logic (London 1883) and Appearance and Reality (London 1893) he denies the existence of all external relations, but from this principle he does not conclude, as Hume would, to an atomistic elementarism; on the contrary, for Bradley there is but one reality and its being consists in experience. Reality appears to man in various psychic modes—pleasure, pain, feeling, desire, will, perception, and thought—but each of them is incomplete and calls for the totality of experience. "In this one whole all appearances come together and in coming together they in various degrees lose their distinctive natures." Strangely enough this unity of all experiences, which is experience in its totality, is never directly known.

America. In the U.S. this Anglo-Saxon Hegelianism took a more pragmatic turn: there was a deep concern to connect speculative thought with the requirements of practical life. Its leading figure was J. ROYCE. J. DEWEY also was originally influenced by Hegel's thought, and in his INSTRUMENTALISM one still finds some vestiges of Hegel, particularly his notion of experience as a totality that is both "spiritual" and "material."

Germany. In Germany the Hegelian renaissance was initiated by W. DILTHEY, who first attracted attention to Hegel's early writings (Die Jugendgeschichte Hegels, Berlin 1905). On the basis of this long-neglected material and of his studies of German Romanticists, he interpreted Hegel in a romantic, vitalistic way. Basic for Hegel's thought, according to Dilthey, is the early notion of life.

Dilthey's work initiated a movement toward a more comprehensive understanding of Hegel. In 1907 H. Nohl published Hegel's theological writings. G. Lasson started the first critical edition of Hegel's works, which was later continued by J. Hoffmeister. H. Glockner published a Hegel lexicon in four volumes (1940), earlier having written an authoritative study on the presuppositions and development of Hegel's philosophy (1929). Other major works on Hegel were published by T. Häring (Hegel: Sein Wollen und sein Werk, Leipzig 1929–38), R. Kroner (Von Kant bis Hegel, Tübingen 1921–24), W. Moog (Hegel und die hegelsche schule, Munich 1930), and N. HARTMANN (Die Philosophie des deutschen: Idealismus II Hegel, Berlin-Leipzig 1929). But these writers were Hegelian scholars more than Hegelians. Only in the philosophizing of the Neo-Kantian schools (Marburg and Baden) and of Hartmann did Hegel's work stimulate new creative thinking. Hartmann saw in Hegel a return to an authentic ontology. His dialectic is not a purely logical method as are deduction, induction, or analysis—it is the spiritual development of being itself. Yet Hartmann considers Hegel's application of the dialectic to nature a failure: as spiritual principle the dialectic works only in the philosophy of spirit. (See NEO-KANTIANISM.)

Indirectly Hegel influenced the DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY of H. E. BRUNNER, K. BARTH, and F. GOGARTEN, and, through Dilthey, Gestalt psychology, according to which the perception of form in its totality is more than (and different from) the perception of its individual elements. German scholasticism also was being enriched by Hegel's thought. Of particular interest are the publications of E. Coreth, B. Welte, J. Möller, and J. Hommes. The influence of Hegel on Catholic thought was likewise noticeable in Belgium and Holland, particularly among students and professors of the University of Louvain (F. Grégoire, L. van der Kerken, A. de Waelhens).

EXISTENTIALIST AND MARXIST INFLUENCES

Apart from the Neo-Hegelians and the Catholic thinkers already mentioned, Hegel's influence on contemporary thought is nowhere as strong as it is in French existentialism and in Marxism.

French Existentialism. In the 19th century Hegel never had a solid foothold in France: P. J. Proudhon, V.

COUSIN, and E. Meyerson showed some influence, but Hegel's work was never seriously studied before J. Wahl introduced his Phenomenology to the French public in Le Malheur de la conscience dans la philosophie de Hegel (Paris 1929). In the 1930s A. Kojève gave a series of lectures on the Phenomenology at the École des Hautes Études, which had an enormous influence both on existentialism and Marxism. Among his auditors were J. P. Sartre, M. MERLEAU-PONTY, J. Hyppolite, and G. Fessard. In an attempt to apply Hegel's ideas to the 20th century, Kojève gave a Marxist and Heideggerian interpretation of the Phenomenology. These highly original and provocative lectures were later published as Introduction à la lecture de Hegel (Paris 1947). According to Kojève, Marxism and existentialism are the authentic offspring of Hegel's thought. Sartre follows him in this controversial interpretation and, in his philosophy, consolidates the ties between Marxism and existentialism. French existentialists tend to prefer the interpretation of the human condition in the Phenomenology to Hegel's later works, where the tragic oppositions of life are too easily reconciled in a panlogical science of the Absolute Spirit. J. Hyppolite, who wrote an excellent commentary on the Phenomenology (Paris 1946), reacted against this one-sided separation of Hegel's Logic from his early works. His interpretation is less revolutionary, less original, but also less simplistic.

Marxism. Finally, something must be said about the enormous influence of Hegel on contemporary Marxism. After the early works of Marx, Marxism had drifted away from Hegel toward materialism. The first great Marxist to see the importance of Hegel was N. LENIN, who found that Marx's theory was to be completed by a serious study of Hegel's Logic. Without Hegel's dialectic Marxism would be unable to defend itself against the attacks of Neo-Kantians and positivists (see H. Lefebvre and N. Gutermann, Lénine: Cahiers sur la dialectique, Paris 1938). Hegel's most important commentator in the communist camp was the Hungarian G. Lukacs, who in 1948 published an excellent work on Hegel's political and philosophical evolution until 1807. Lukacs emphasized Hegel's interest in social problems and claimed that his dialectic was originally intended as a philosophy of action. According to Lukacs, Hegel perceived the contradictions of the capitalist society remarkably well, and the only reason he did not preach a social revolution is that the socioeconomic conditions were not ripe for it.

Other important Hegelian Marxists are E. Bloch (Subjekt-Objekt: Erläuterungen zu Hegel, 1951), H. Lefebvre (Le matérialisme dialectique, Paris 1939), and the excellent historian of left-wing Hegelianism and early Marxism, A. Cornu.

See Also: HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH; IDEALISM; DIALECTICS; ABSOLUTE, THE; HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF; PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography: K. ROSENKRANZ, Kritische Erläuterungen des hegel'schen Systems (Königsberg 1840). J. E. ERDMANN, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie (4th ed. Berlin 1896). H. LEVY, Die Hegel-renaissance in der deutschen Philosophie (Charlottenburg 1927). H. GLOCKNER, "Hegelrenaissance und Neuhegelianismus," Logos 20 (1931) 169–195. G. LASSON, "Hegel und die Gegenwart," Kant-studien 36 (1931) 262–276. W. MOOG, Hegel und die hegelsche Schule (Munich 1930). I. A. IL'IN, Die Philosophie Hegels als Kontemplative Gotteslehre (Bern 1946). H. MARCUSE, Reason and Revolution (2d ed. New York 1954). A. CORNU, Karl Marx et Friedrich Engels: Leur vie et leur oeuvre, 2 v. (Paris 1955–58) v.1 Les Années d'enfance et de jeunesse. La Gauche hégélienne, 1818/1820–1844 (Paris 1955). J. KRUIHOF, Het Uitgangspunt van Hegel's Ontologie (Bruges 1959). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy 7:159–247.

[L. DUPRÉ]

HEGEMONIUS

4th-century Christian author, of unknown provenance; fl. c. mid-4th century. He was the author of the Acta Archelai, one of the chief sources for our knowledge of MANICHAISM. The work is an anti-Manichaean polemic purporting to be a dialogue between Archelaus, Bishop of Kashkar, Mesopotamia, and Manes and his disciple Turbo. The Acta are known in their entirety only through a Latin translation; fragments of the original Greek are found in Epiphanius's treatment of Manichaeism (Panarion 66). St. Jerome attributed the work to Archelaus and thought that it was composed originally in Syriac and translated into Greek (De virus illustribus 72). Heraclianus of Chalcedon, as noted by Photius (Bibliotheca; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 103:288A), is the first to attribute authorship to Hegemonius, but this statement attracted little attention. Hegemonius was usually credited with being the stenographer who recorded the dialogue. The definitive study by C. Beeson established Hegemonius as the author of the Acta, Greek as the original language, and the first half of the 4th century as the date of composition.

Bibliography: HEGEMONIUS, Acta Archelai, ed. C. H. BEESON (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 16; 1906). G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2113–16. P. DE LABRIOLLE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 3:1542. B. ALTANER, Patrologia, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 360. E. STOMMEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:115. W. SCHMID and O. STÄHLIN, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur bis auf die Zeit Justinians (based on the earlier work of W. CHRIST, Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft), 8 v. (Munich 1920–48) 2.2:1440–41.

[H. DRESSLER]

HEGESIPPUS

Early ecclesiastical writer; d. c. 180. According to Eusebius, Hegesippus flourished at the time of Irenaeus (Historia ecclesiastica 4.21). He was a master of Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek, and his wide familiarity with Jewish oral traditions made him an important figure. About the middle of the 2d century he set out from his native land (possibly Asia Minor) for Rome. En route he visited many bishops and heard the same doctrine from all of them. At Corinth, he “was refreshed by the true word” and learned that the letter of Pope CLEMENT I was still read in the Church (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.22). During the pontificate of Pope ANICETUS he reached Rome, and here too, he found the teaching of the Apostles handed down incorrupt.

As quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 4.25), Hegesippus says that he made a διαδοχή to the time of Anicetus, and that Soter succeeded (διαδέχεται) Anicetus. The meaning of the Greek noun and verb is disputed. Some scholars take the noun to mean a list of bishops of the Church in Rome (possibly the source on which Irenaeus drew for his account in Adversus haereses 3.3.3) and would translate the passage: During my stay in Rome I made a list of the bishops down to the time of Anicetus whose deacon was Eleutherius; Soter succeeded Anicetus, and after him came Eleutherius.

More recent research, however, indicates that at the time of Hegesippus διαδοχή had the meaning of transmission of teaching or doctrine, and that the cognate verb did not mean to succeed, but to receive a teaching from another. Consequently, Hegesippus means that while in Rome he ascertained for himself that the genuine apostolic teaching was transmitted without interruption down to Anicetus. From Anicetus it was passed on to SOTER, who handed it on to Eleutherius.

After his return from Rome, Hegesippus wrote Memoirs in five books to refute the teachings of the Gnostics (see Gnosticism). This work today is known only through fragments quoted in Eusebius’s Historia ecclesiastica, although as late as the 17th century the complete work could be found in several Greek monasteries. The traditional account of the death of the Apostle James, “the brother of the Lord, the rampart of the people and righteousness,” and scattered bits of information on Simon, second bishop of Jerusalem, are taken from the fragments of Hegesippus.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 1:284–287. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 148–150. H. CAMPENHAUSEN, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht (Tübingen 1953). L. KOEP, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1941) 2:411. J. LENZENWEGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:60. G. W. H. LAMPE, ed., A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford 1961–).

[H. DRESSLER]

HEIDEGGER, MARTIN

Existentialist philosopher; b. Sept. 26, 1889, in Messkirch, Baden, Germany; d. May 26, 1976 and was buried in the place of his birth. Early in life he had intended to become a Catholic priest, but due to a heart condition he ended his theological studies in 1911 and switched to mathematics. He earned a doctorate in philosophy in 1913. From 1915 to 1923, with the exception of his military service, he taught at Freiburg, where he was associated with Edmund HUSSERL, who had a significant impact on Heidegger’s thought. He then was professor at Marburg until 1928, when he returned to Freiburg as Husserl’s successor. He was rector there from 1933 to 1934, where as a German nationalist and anti-communist he supported Hitler’s rise to power and joined the Nazi Party. After the war Heidegger was suspended from teaching until 1950 due to his Nazi sympathies. He retired from teaching in 1952, but continued to publish until his death.

The early influence of The Many Senses of Being according to Aristotle, by Franz BRENTANO, and his own habilitation thesis on pseudo-Scotus’s Grammatica speculativa, foreshadowed Heidegger’s lasting concern with the themes of being and speech. In treating these themes, however, Heidegger developed a characteristic style and terminology that resist translation into ordinary language. In fact, attempts to reduce his thought to usual philosophical expressions tend to distort its meaning, if only by conferring upon it a false clarity. For this reason, in what follows Heidegger’s thought is rendered in rather literal translation, in many instances accompanied by the German expression itself.

Das Sein. Heidegger develops his philosophy around the difference and interplay between being (Seiendes), the “to be” (das Sein), and Dasein, viz, man as the only being who questions the “to be” is its presence or there-ness (da) as differentiated from being. For Heidegger, the question concerning being as being, which characterized classical metaphysics and ontology, must be transcended toward the more radical question concerning the “to be” itself, the most questionable theme. The “dis-coveredness” of beings in their beingness (Seiendheit) presupposes unthematic openness and standing out (ek-stasis, “ex-sistence”) toward the “to be,” as opposed to beings; but the “to be,” obscured by the beings it illuminates and withdrawn into coveredness by being, is forgotten. The history of the “to be” is that of the epochs or difference of ways the “to be” sends and withholds itself, goes forth and returns to itself, and promises and loses its name or saying (Sage), which is variously rendered as presence out of absence (physis), being insofar as it is (das Sein des Seienden), object for subject, position (Setzung), and construct (Ge-stell).

Since the “to be” is hidden, what manifest being can one question concerning it? The answer is man himself, the only available being concerned with the “to be.” The method of investigation is phenomenological: letting be seen whatever shows itself in the way, as self-manifesting, it uses itself to show itself (Sein und Zeit, 7th ed., n.7). Truth as “un-concealment” and “un-forgetting” (a-letheia) is the inseparability of “disclosedness” and “re-collection” from hiddenness and finitude. One can speak of the veiled “to be” only by manifesting oneself as Dasein. A neutral or absolute perspective is impossible. The difference between that “from which” man questions and the theme “concerning which” he questions is constitutive of philosophy.

Dasein. The phenomenological analytic of Dasein begins with man as he exists proximally and usually, or in his everydayness. It manifests—through such pretheoretical structures (“the existentials”) as instrumentality, thrownness, call, they (das Man), inauthenticity, and fallenness—that man cannot “catch up with” (einholen) his being as disengaged from being in the world with others. Calling the analysis of the passions in Book 2 of Aristotle’s Rhetoric the first systematic hermeneutic of the everydayness of being with others (Sein und Zeit, 138), Heidegger shows that man’s fundamental way of being is disposed attunement (Gestimmtheit): man is in concern and dread. But the analytic of Dasein is neither of man as man (anthropology), nor of being as being (metaphysics), but of man in his ordinary way of “being toward” the “to be” as differentiated from beings. Thus concern and dread are neither ontic states nor abstract principles but ontological perspectives (Sein und Zeit, 57). Concern is the way in which man finds himself as “thrown forward toward . . .”; dread is the pathos of “being toward” the “not” of being as a whole, viz, toward the “to be” that makes beings be, but that is not a being. The naught is the “to be” differentiated from the perspective of worldliness. Temporality is the unity of being “already in and with,” anticipating what is not yet; being-toward-death is being already “thrown forward toward” the coming nihilation of being-in-the-world-with-others. The ontological constitution of historicity (Geschichtlichkeit) is based on Dasein’s anticipatory openness to the source: what-is-as-having-been still coming to manifestation through “re-petition” (Wiederholung). Dasein-in-world is before, between, and beyond consciousness of objects. Itself “ec-static” toward the “to be,” Dasein illuminates a purview in which beings can be obvious or show themselves. Projection (Entwurf) of and by the “to be” frees the ontological space in which beings are encountered—the world.

There being no adequate manifestation of, and speaking about, the “to be” in differentiation, the reversal (Kehre) that goes beyond the phenomenological analytic of Dasein to the limits of a nonphenomenological use of language breaks down before the impossibility of speaking clearly what is most hidden; but this reversal is anticipated in the analysis of Dasein as the phenomenon that manifests the “to be” by questioning it: Sein und Zeit, 38–39; Ueber den Humanismus (Klostermann), 17, 41–42; Holzwege, 3d ed., 286; Nietzsche, 2:353–359, 367–369, 389–390; Unterkunft der Ankunft des Ausbleibens. The logos of the “to be” in differentiation is silence, but to be silent is possible only for a being that can speak.

Heidegger speaks of the absence (Fehl) of God and is silent about the relation of God to the “to be,” although he does distinguish them. Atheism is the price of considering God the first and highest among beings (Holzwege, 240; Identität und Differenz, 71).

Heidegger’s influence has, for the most part, resulted from the misinterpretation of his earlier work as an anthropology (Wesen des Grundes, 4th ed., 43, n. 59; Vom Wesen der Wahrheit, 3d ed., 26–27).

Writings. Two-thirds of Heidegger’s writings remain unpublished; he made arrangements for the definitive edition, being published by Klostermann; see F.-W. von Herrmann, “Observations on the Definitive Collected Works of Martin Heidegger,” Universitas 17 n. 1 (1975) 29–37. The edition is divided into four parts: (1) already published works, 1914–76, with Heidegger’s marginalia (already available and of special interest are the marginalia to Sein und Zeit, also in the Niemeyer edition, 14 Aufl., 1977); (2) the lectures, Marburg, 1923–28, Freiburg, 1928–44, early Freiburg, 1919–23; (3) private monographs and lectures, 1919–67; (4) preparations and sketches, reconsiderations and indications.

Bibliography: M. HEIDEGGER, Being and Time, tr. J. MACQUARRIE and E. ROBINSON (New York 1962); Nietzsche (Pfullingen, Ger. 1961). A. CHAPPELLE, L’Ontologie phénoménologique de Heidegger (Paris 1962). O. PÖGGELER, Der Denkweg Martin Heideggers (Pfullingen 1963). R. POLK, Heidegger: An Introduction (Ithaca, N.Y. 1999). J. MCCUMBER, Metaphysics of Oppression: Heidegger’s Challenge to Western Philosophy (Bloomington, Ind. 1999). E. OVERENGET, Seeing the Self: Heidegger on Subjectivity (Boston 1998). H. PHILIPSE, Heidegger’s Philosophy of Being: A Critical Interpretation (Princeton, N.J. 1998). J. O. PRUDHOMME, God and Being: Heidegger’s Relation to Theology (Atlantic Highlands, N.J. 1997). D. A. WHITE, Logic and Ontology in Heidegger (Columbus 1985).

[T. PRUFER/EDS.]

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM

Next to the Westminster Confession (1646–48), the most important Reformed confession. The Heidelberg Catechism (Catechesis Palatina) takes its name from the capital of the Rhenish Palatinate, which became Lutheran in 1546 under Elector Frederick II (1483–1556). The growing influence of the Swiss Reformers toward the end of the reign of Elector Otto Henry (1502–59) precipitated violent controversies, especially about the Sacrament of the Altar. Otto Henry's irenically disposed successor, Frederick III ("the Pious"; 1515–76), while disclaiming any formal knowledge of Calvinism and adhering to the 1540 ("Variata") edition of the Augsburg Confession, availed himself more and more of Calvinistic theological leadership, staffed the theological faculty of the University of Heidelberg exclusively with Calvinistic professors, and reformed the worship of the church in his domains according to Reformed principles. In 1562 he commissioned his theologians to prepare what became the Heidelberg Catechism, formally adopted by a synod convened in Heidelberg in January 1563.

Since Heinrich Alting (1583–1644), tradition has ascribed the authorship of the catechism to Zacharias UR-SINUS and Caspar OLEVIANUS (1536–87). Although they are unquestionably the major contributors, available evidence points to the broad cooperation of a considerable number of others as well. The 16th-century rumor that the real authors were Heinrich BULLINGER, the successor of Huldrych ZWINGLI at Zurich, and his associates is unfounded. A second and third edition preceded the authoritative fourth edition, published in November 1563 as part of the Palatine Church Order. Prompted by Olevianus, Frederick ordered the inclusion, in the second edition, of the condemnation of the "papal mass" as a "denial of the once for all sacrifice and passion of Jesus Christ" (q. 80), presumably as a response to the Tridentine decree on the sacrifice of the Mass; the third edition added the characterization of the Mass as "an accursed idolatry."

The Catechism consists of 129 questions and answers, supported by Biblical proofs and divided, after a brief introduction (qq. 1–2), into three parts: man's misery, exposed by the divine law (qq. 3–11); man's redemption—Apostles' Creed, justification, Baptism, the Lord's Supper, the office of the keys (qq. 12–85); and man's gratitude—Decalogue (with four commandments in the first table, six in the second) and Our Father (qq. 86–129). The questions are distributed over 52 parts for annual review on successive Sundays. The tone is warmly devotional, the emphasis primarily ethical, the approach strongly practical; the theology is a mild Calvinism (there is no discussion of predestination), with elements traceable to Philipp MELANCHTHON and to Bullinger. Except in a few places—such as q. 80, the condemnation of excesses in the veneration of the saints and of the use of images, and the moderate but firm disavowal of certain characteristically Lutheran views—the Catechism avoids polemics. Widely adopted in Reformed circles almost from the start, it has been translated into some 40 languages. In 1619 the pan-Reformed Council of Dort gave the Heidelberg Catechism confessional status. In North America both major Reformed bodies, the Reformed Church in America and the Christian Reformed Church, include it among their doctrinal standards; and it is greatly cherished in the former Evangelical and Reformed sectors of the United Church of Christ. Because of difficulties that children had in understanding and learning it, Elector John Casimir (1543–92) of the Palatinate directed the preparation of a simple and popular extract, the "little Heidelberg Catechism" (1585).

See Also: CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT.

Bibliography: W. NIESEL, ed., Bekennnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der nach Gottes Wort reformierten Kirche (2d ed. Zurich 1938), 148–187, Ger. text. H. A. NIEMEYER, ed., Collectio confessionum in ecclesiis reformatis publicatarum (Leipzig 1840) 428–461, Lat. text. A. O. MILLER and M. E. OSTERHAVEN, trs., The Heidelberg Catechism (Philadelphia 1962), 400th anniversary Eng. tr. A. PÉRY, The Heidelberg Catechism with Commentary, tr. A. O. MILLER and M. B. KOONS (Philadelphia 1963). K. BARTH, The Heidelberg Catechism for Today, tr. S. C. GUTHRIE, JR. (Richmond, Va. 1964). D. J. BRUGGINK, ed., Guilt, Grace and Gratitude (New York 1963), a comment on the Heidelberg Catechism.

[A. C. PIEPKORN]

HEILIGENKREUZ, ABBEY OF

Cistercian abbey in the Archdiocese of Vienna, Lower Austria; founded (1133) by Margrave LEOPOLD III at the request of his son, OTTO OF FREISING, and settled from MORIMOND. Its name derives from a relic of the Holy Cross received from Leopold VI. Heiligenkreuz founded ZWETTL, Baumgartenberg, Cikádor, MARIENBERG, LILIENFELD, Goldenkron, and Neuberg. Under the first abbot it had 300 monks and lay brothers. GUTOLF (d. c. 1300) and Nicholas Vischel (d. 1330) wrote important works. The abbey declined because of wars (1462, 1529, 1532) and the Reformation, but remained Catholic. In the 16th century it assumed the pastoral care of its villages. In the 17th- and 18th-century revival the buildings were partly restored in baroque. United with Heiligenkreuz were the Hungarian monastery of St. Gotthard (1734– 1878) and Neukloster in Wiener Neustadt (1881). The Romanesque church (1187), with the oldest ogives in Austria, and the Gothic cloister (1240) and hall choir (1295) are famous monuments. The school of theology dates from 1802 and the undergymnasium from before 1558. There are 50,000 volumes in the library and 1,300 parchment documents in the archives.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:1393–94. Xenia Bernardina III (Vienna 1891). F. WATZL, Die Cisterzienser von Heiligenkreuz (Graz 1898). A. WINKLER, Die Zisterzienser am Neusiedlersee (Mödling 1923). D. FREY, Die Denkmäler des Stiftes Heiligenkreuz (Vienna 1926); Das Stift Heiligenkreuz (Vienna 1926). Festschrift zum 800-Jahrgedächtnis des Todes Bernhards von Clairvaux (Vienna 1953). B. KLEINSCHROTH, Flucht und Zuflucht: Tagebuch aus dem Türkenjahr 1683, ed. H. WATZL (Graz-Köln 1956).

[H. WATZL]

HEILSBRONN, ABBEY OF

Fons Salutis, Cistercian abbey near Ansbach, Germany, in the Diocese of Eichstätt; founded 1132 by Bishop OTTO OF BAMBERG, and secularized in the 16th century. It was the second daughterhouse of EBRACH and the proprietary abbey of the bishops of Bamberg. Heilsbronn reached its peak under Abbot Conrad of Brundelshheim (1308–21), who is probably the Monk of Heilsbronn, a mystical author influenced by St. Bernard of Clairvaux. In 1398, 1402, and 1408 during the Great Western Schism, Cistercian general chapters were held in Heilsbronn. The abbey suffered much damage in the first years of the Reformation and it was under the pressure of neighboring Protestant nobility that it was gradually secularized. The last Catholic abbot died in 1578. In 1581 the buildings were converted into a Lutheran school and several prominent Lutheran leaders thereafter used the abbatial title. The Romanesque church, consecrated in 1149, served from 1297 to 1625 as the burial place of Hohenzollerns. It is somewhat remodeled, and some 14th-century monastic buildings have been converted to a museum. The cloister was destroyed and the rich library is now in the University of Erlangen.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1395–96. H. P. EYDOUX, L'Architecture des églises cisterciennes d'Allemagne (Paris 1952). A. HEIDACHER, Die Entstehungs- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte des Klosters Heilsbronn (Bonn 1955). J. KIST and P. VOLK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:147–148.

[L. J. LEKAI]

Vaulted colonnade inside the Cistercian Abbey, Heiligenkreuz, Austria. (©Harald A. Jahn; Viennaslide/CORBIS)

HEIMERAD, ST.

Wandering priest and hermit; b. Messkirch, Baden, Germany; d. Mt. Hasungen, near Kassel, Germany, June 28, 1019. Apparently Heimerad was a serf who became a priest and served as chaplain to the lady of the manor on which he was born. At his request she released him and allowed him to begin his peripatetic career, which took him on pilgrimages to Rome and Jerusalem, and then through western Germany. Heimerad lived a short time at HERSFELD ABBEY but, disliking the routine, departed without taking vows. After further wanderings he built a hermitage on Mt. Hasungen where he lived until death. During his lifetime Heimerad came into contact with Empress KUNIGUNDE, Meinwerk of Paderborn, and ARIBO OF MAINZ. His asceticism and eccentricities attracted attention and respect; miracles were attributed to him even in his lifetime. His cult is popular and unofficial.

Feast: June 28.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 10:595–612. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 6:476–477. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:660–662.

[R. H. SCHMANDT]

HEIMO OF MICHELBERG

Ecclesiastical chronicler; d. Abbey of Michelsberg, Bamberg, Germany, July 3, 1138. He was an AUGUSTINIAN CANON of the church of St. Jakob in Bamberg from 1108 and is to be associated with the historical and chronological studies at Michelsberg during the first half of the 12th century. Among his teachers at Michelsberg he named FRUTOLF, Dudo, and the priest Burchard, to whom he dedicated his De decursu temporum ab origine mundi (c. 1135). Ebo related in his Vita Ottonis, written between 1151 and 1159, that Heimo attributed his extraordinary knowledge of chronology and his skill in reckoning the Church calendar and determining the dates of Easter to another teacher, the Spanish Bishop Bernard, who resided at Michelsberg from 1122 to 1155. Heimo classified the contents of De decursu temporum into seven divisions: (1–4) history of the world from Creation to his own day; (5) coordination of the years of the popes and the leaders of the Romans; (6) man's slavery since Adam and Eve's disobedience; (7) proposal of a testament for Christian liberty and the brotherhood of man, to be entered into by virtue of the Precious Blood and confirmed by the glorious Resurrection of Christ. Furthermore Heimo added to the work a table of the Paschal cycles up to 1595. The De decursu temporum may not possess real historical merit, but its contents present much material for the researcher in Church history.

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, ed., Bibliotheca rerum Germanicarum, 6 v. (Berlin 1864–73), v.5 Monumenta Bambergensia, ed. E. DUEMMLER, 537–552, 619–620. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 173:1363–68. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 10:1–4. R. CEILLIER, Histoire générale des auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques, 24 v. (Paris 1729–83) 14.1:182. A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca hitorica medii aevi (2d ed. 1896; repr. Graz 1954) 2:574. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:361–363, 320, 351, 354, 598. W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Deutsche Kaiserzeit, ed. R. HOLTZMANN (3d ed. Tübingen 1948; repr. of 2d ed. 1938–43) 1.3:485, 495.

[M. J. KISHPAUGH]

HEINRICH, JOHANN BAPTIST

Neo-Thomist theologian; b. Mainz, April 15, 1816; d. Mainz, Feb. 9, 1891. He studied law at Giessen and on Dec. 27, 1837 received a doctor's diploma in both civil and Canon law. In 1840 he began a teaching career in law at the University of Giessen. He was attracted to the ministry and in 1842–43 pursued a course of theology in the universities of Tübingen and Freiburg im Breisgau. He entered the seminary at Mainz in 1844, was ordained the following year, and was first assigned to the cathedral at Mainz. In 1851 he became professor of dogmatic theology at the seminary of that diocese. While he continued to teach he received other appointments in the diocese: titular canon in the cathedral chapter in 1855, dean in 1867, and vicar-general in 1868. In 1866 he was made a domestic prelate.

From 1850 until 1890 Heinrich was one of the editors of Der Katholik, a well-known journal of pastoral theology. He was active in the direction of a lay organization called the Piusverein, dedicated to safeguarding religious freedom in Germany. He published six volumes of a treatise on dogmatic theology. The last four volumes of this work, however, were completed by his friend K. Guterlet, Dogmatische Theologie (10 v. Mainz 1873–1904). Heinrich also wrote a protest against the erroneous teachings of J. DÖLLINGER; a monograph on German movements seeking to restrict religious freedom; and a study of Christ's existence in history in relation to His divine personality, directed against the doctrine of D. F. STRAUSS and J. E. RENAN. Finally he wrote, against Nonweiler, a treatise on the Church as the kingdom of God on earth.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2124–25. L. LENHART, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:204.

[C. MEYER]

HEIRIC OF AUXERRE

Classicist and hagiographer; b. Héry, France, c. 841; d. Auxerre, c. 876. A Benedictine, Heiric played an important role in the revival and transmission of ancient learning through the palace and cathedral schools. He studied at AUXERRE, FERRIÈRES, and Laon, and through Lupus of Ferrières and the Irishman, Elias, came into contact with the classical learning of Greece and Rome. This explains the numerous excerpts in his works from later Latin authors such as Persius, SUETONIUS, and Juvenal. At the same time he came under the influence of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. His successful teaching career was pursued mainly at Auxerre, where REMIGIUS OF AUXERRE and possibly HUCBALD OF SAINT-AMAND were his pupils. It is difficult to say exactly where Heiric stood on the question of universals, for although sections of his glosses on the pseudo-Augustinian Categoriae Decem have an Aristotelian ring, other sections sound more like Erigena. Heiric's hagiographical work is more widely known. In verse he wrote the Vita S. Germani Antissiodorensis (ed. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Poetae, Lat. Carol. 3:428–517), in six books. This was followed by a prose work, the Miracula (ed. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores, 13:401–404), in two books preceded by a prologue. Heiric also collaborated in the writing of the Gesta Episcoporum Antissiodorensium (ed. Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores, 13:393–400).

Bibliography: B. HAURÉAU, Histoire de la philosophie scolastique, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1872–80) 1:188–191. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1826–) 3:421–428. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 1:499–504. F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (11th, 12th ed. Berlin 1923–28) 2:177–178, 694–695. D. M. SCHULLIAN, “The Excerpts of Heiric ‘Ex libris Valeriani Maximi’” Memoirs of the American Academy in Rome 12 (1935) 155–184. J. DE GHELLINCK, Littérature latine au moyen-âge, 2 v. (Paris 1939) 1:117–118. G. MATHON, Catholicisme 5:651–652. J. WOLLASCH, “Zu den persönlichen Notizen des Heiricus von S. Germain d’Auxerre,” Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 15 (1959) 211–226.

[L. E. LYNCH]

HEISS, MICHAEL

Archbishop, writer; b. Pfahldorf, Bavaria, April 12, 1818; d. La Crosse, Wis., March 26, 1890. He attended the Latin school at Eichstätt, the gymnasium at Neuburg, and the Georgianum in Munich, and was ordained by Bp. Carl von Reisach of Eichstätt on Oct. 18, 1840. Two years later, Heiss went to the U.S. where he engaged in missionary work for a short time in Kentucky. In 1844 he joined the new Diocese of Milwaukee, Wis., became secretary to Bp. John Henni, and was the first rector of St. Francis Seminary (1856–68).

Heiss played an important part in preparing for the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866). When it recommended two new dioceses for Wisconsin, one at La Crosse and another at Green Bay, he was nominated for the former. After some delay, the Holy See confirmed the nomination and Bishop Henni consecrated him on Sept. 6, 1868. A year later he went to Rome to serve on the committee of discipline of VATICAN COUNCIL I. He consistently favored a definition of papal infallibility even though his friend, Henni, was opposed to such action.

During the last years of the 1870s, spirited opposition along nationalistic lines developed when it became known that Archbishop Henni wanted Heiss as his coadjutor. In the end, the Holy See honored Henni's request and Heiss was named titular archbishop of Hadrianople and coadjutor of Milwaukee. In 1881, he succeeded to that see, but latent hostility disrupted its unity and marred, to some extent, the new archbishop's career. Nationalistic hostilities flared anew in 1883 when John G. Shea published an article in the American Catholic Quarterly Review lamenting the absence of “American” bishops in the West. Eventually with Heiss's approval, a Milwaukee priest, Peter ABBELEN went to Rome in 1886 to present the case for the Germans. The Abbelen mission was strongly protested by Bps. John IRELAND and John KEANE, and the problem was further embittered by an interview that Heiss granted to the Milwaukee Sentinel in 1887. His insistence on the need for more German bishops in the U.S. and the importance of keeping up the German language aggravated the already complicated problem, which was not destined to be solved for a number of years. The BENNETT LAW (1889) conflict, which developed just before he died, underscored the cleavage between himself and his recent suffragan, Ireland. Heiss initiated the campaign to repeal the state law that included provisions for the use of English in schools, but he did not live to see it succeed (see KATZER, FREDERICK XAVIER).

Throughout his life, Heiss remained an ardent advocate of parochial schools, but he opposed the founding of a Catholic university, believing rather that the meager resources of the Church should be used to improve seminaries. When he resigned from the university committee established at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884), he pleaded his many duties in Milwaukee, the great distance he would have to travel to meetings, and the little he could contribute to the university work. Heiss's publications include De Matrimonio and The Four Gospels. He is buried in the chapel of St. Francis Seminary.

Bibliography: C. J. BARRY, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953). B. J. BLIED, Three Archbishops of Milwaukee (Milwaukee 1955).

[B. J. BLIED]

HEISTERBACH, ABBEY OF

(Vallis S. Petri), Cistercian abbey of the Rhineland, Diocese of Cologne; founded 1189; suppressed 1803. Cistercian monks of HIMMEROD, at the request of Archbishop Philip of Cologne in 1189 reclaimed the abandoned house of Augustinian hermits of Petersberg, and a few years later moved to Heisterbach, their new abbey at the foot of the mountain. Heisterbach reached the climax of its history under Abbot Henry (1208–44), builder of the great monastic church and sponsor of the literary activity of CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH. In the 14th century economic crisis and rule by unworthy abbots caused a decline. Recovery was hampered during the Reformation and the subsequent wars of religion and of Louis XIV. The 18th century was an era of prosperity, ending with the dissolution of monasteries in 1803 under French occupational authorities. The archives and the rich monastic library of Heisterbach were carried to Düsseldorf, but monastery and church were demolished, only the original apse and choir surviving.

Bibliography: H. PAUEN, Die Klostergründherrschaft Heisterbach (Münster 1913). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1397–98. H. P. EYDOUX, L'Architecture des églises cisterciennes d'Allemagne (Paris 1952) 77–81. J. TORSY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:206.

[L. J. LEKAI]

HELEN OF SKÖVDE, ST.

Fl. 12th century, Västergötland, Sweden. Helen (or Elin) became a widow quite young. According to legend she was murdered after a family strife and buried in the church of Skövde, which she had helped build. When later she was venerated as a martyr, the church was named for her. The Office of her feast, written by St. Brynolf Algotsson, bishop of Skara, praises her as the patron saint of Västergötland and all Sweden. She is not to be confused with St. Helen of Tisvilde, Zealand, in Denmark. Her cultus was widespread in medieval Sweden; several paintings and sculptures representing her are extant.

Feast: July 31.

Bibliography: J. A. DUNNEY, Saint of the Snows: A Chronicle of the Holy Elin of Skövde (Albany, N.Y. 1937). T. LUNDÉN, Credo 25 (1944) 166–182, with bibliog. Kulturhistorisk leksikon för nordisk middelalder, ed. A. KARKER et al., v.6 (Copenhagen 1961) 305–308, with bibliog.

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

HELEN OF UDINE, BL.

Augustinian tertiary; b: Udine, c. 1396; d. there, April 23, 1458. Helen was of the Valentini family and was given in marriage, at 15, to the nobleman Antonio dei Cavalcanti. The marriage was blessed with many children and was in all respects a happy one. The death of her husband, when she was only 40, grieved Helen deeply. She maintained her home and servants but, enrolling in the Augustinian THIRD ORDER, devoted herself to prayer, penance, and charitable works. Tried much in body and in spirit, she nevertheless experienced an inner joy, often associated with ecstasy. She reputedly obtained miracles for others while she lived and after her death. She was beatified in 1848.

Feast: April 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 3:249–260. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 2:155. L. FABRIS, Vita della Beata Elena Valentini (Udine 1849). W. HÜMPFNER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 5:208. SIMONE DA ROMA, Libro over legenda della beata Helena da Udene, ed. A. TILATTI (Tavagnacco, Udine 1988).

[J. E. BRESNAHAN]

HELENA, ST.

Roman Empress, mother of Constantine I the Great; b. presumably in Drepanon (now Helenopolis), Bithynia, 255; d. Nicomedia, 330. According to St. AMBROSE she was a servant girl who became the concubine of Constantius Chlorus, was abandoned for political reasons, but was named Augusta by her son CONSTANTINE I at the beginning of his reign (306). According to Eusebius she became a Christian under Constantine's influence and in 324 made one of the first pilgrimages to the Holy Land (Vita Constantini 3). She exercised an influence on her son's church-building program in Rome (Church of the Holy Cross), in Constantinople (Church of the Apostles), and in Palestine (Church of the Nativity and the Eleona Church on the Mount of Olives). Her body, transported to Rome and originally laid to rest in a splendid mausoleum on the Via Labicana (Tor Pignattara), was later taken to Constantinople. In the ninth century her relics were translated to the Abbey of Hautvilliers. Legend ascribes to her the foundation of the Thebäer Church in Cologne and others in Xanten and Bonn, and the transfer of relics of St. MATTHIAS and St. ROCH to TRIER. The story of the finding of the holy CROSS, first mentioned by St. Ambrose, depends on Eusebius (Vita Const. 3.41–47). In Byzantine iconography Helena is depicted together with her son (frequently on coins of the Comneni and Paleologi dynasties) with a crown between them. Since the 15th century she is frequently portrayed with a crown, the model of a church, and the cross and nails; she is honored as a patron in Trier, Bamberg, and Basel.

Feast: Aug. 18 (West); May 21 (East with Constantine).

Bibliography: CYNEWULF, Elene, an Old English poem, ed. C. W. KENT (Boston 1889, rep. New York 1973); Cynewulf's Elene, ed. P. O. E. GRADON (Rev. ed. Exeter 1996). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:2126–45. O. SEECK, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissen- schaft, ed. G. WISSOWA, et al. 7.2 (1912) 2820. T. ASHBY and G. LUGLI, "La villa dei Flavi. . .," Memorie della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia, 3d ser. 2 (1928) 157–192. J. W. DRUIVERS, Helena Augusta: The Mother of Constantine the Great and the Legend of Her Finding of the True Cross (Leiden 1992). G. GIANGRASSO, ed., Libellus de Constantino Magno eiusque matre Helena: la nascita di Costantino tra storia e leggenda (Florence 1999). G. GIORGIO DI SASSONIA, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte suppl. 19 (1913) 255–258. J. MAURICE, Sainte Hélène (Paris 1930). H. A. POHL-SANDER, Helena: Empress and Saint (Chicago 1995). H. VINCENT, Bethléem (Paris 1914).

[J. H. GEIGER]

HELENTRUDIS, ST.

Recluse in Neuenheerse (Westphalia) known also as Helmrud or Hiltrud; d. c. 950. Her name was entered into the martyrology of Bp. Imad of Paderborn in 1052. According to the first Passio of St. URSULA (written c. 975), Helentrudis was "visited" by St. Cordula, one of the 11,000 virgins allegedly massacred by the Huns in Cologne. In this vision to Helentrudis, Cordula described her martyrdom so that it might become known to the world. Another Ursula legend, the Regnante Domino, relates that pilgrimages were made to Helentrudis's grave and miracles took place there.

Feast: May 31; Oct. 22.

Bibliography: W. LEVISON, "Das Werden der Ursula-Legende," Bonner Jahrbücher 132 (1927). J. TORSY, ed., Lexikon der deutschen Heiligen, Seligen, Ehrwürdigen und Gottseligen (Cologne 1959) 227.

[S. A. SCHULZ]

HELFTA, CONVENT OF

A former Cistercian establishment near Eisleben, Saxony, Germany, in the former Diocese of Halberstadt. It was founded in 1228 by Count Burchard of Mansfeld in Mansfeld and was moved to Rossbach in 1234 and to Helfta in 1258. The community followed the CISTERCIAN constitutions without belonging to the order, and the spiritual direction of the nuns lay in the hands of DOMINICANS from Halle after 1271. Under Abbess Gertrude of Hackeborn (1251–92), Helfta became the most famous center of German MYSTICISM. The visions and revelations of MECHTILD OF HACKEBORN, Mechtild of Wippra (d. 1299), GERTRUDE THE GREAT, and MECHTILD OF MAGDEBURG represent a transition from the mysticism of BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX to that of the MENDICANT ORDERS. Steeped in a liturgical life centered around the Eucharist and, especially in Gertrude, the Sacred Heart, these nuns relieved their bridal relationship with Christ and praised their mystical union with the bridegroom in emotion-filled revelations that reached incomparable heights of hymnic power in Mechtild of Magdeburg. After having frequently suffered from wars in the area, Helfta was dissolved in 1545.

Fresco of Constantine I with St. Helena, Yilan Church, Cappadocia, Central Turkey. (©Chris Hellier/CORBIS)

Bibliography: H. GRUNDMANN, Religiöse Bewegungen im Mittelalter (2d ed. Hildesheim 1961). W. MUSCHG, Die Mystik in der Schweiz, 1200–1500 (Leipzig 1935) 109–113. F. W. WENTZLAF-FEGGEBERT, Deutsche Mystik zwischen Mittelalter und Neuzeit (2d ed. Berlin 1947) 48–59, 293–294. E. KREBS, W. STAMMLER, and K. LANGOSCH, eds., Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon, 5 v. (Berlin-Leipzig 1933–35) 2:43–44; 3:321–326, bibliog. H. NEUMANN, ibid. 5:673–674, bibliography; "Beiträge zur Textgeschichte des Fliessenden Lichts der Gottheit und zur Lebensgeschichte Mechtilds von Magdeburg," Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, Phil. hist. Klasse (1954) 3:27–80. W. BUNKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:209–210. J. QUINT, Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, ed. P. MERKER and W. STAMMLER (2d ed. Berlin 1955–) 2:547–550. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1398.

[A. A. SCHACHER]

HELGESEN, POVL (PAULUS HELIAE)

Carmelite controversialist against Lutheranism; b. Varberg, Sweden, c. 1485; d. Denmark, after 1534. From 1519 to 1522 he was a professor of theology at the University of Copenhagen, in 1533 and 1534, at the cathedral school of Roskilde. From 1522 to 1534 he was provincial of the Scandinavian Carmelites. As a Biblical humanist after the manner of Erasmus and Lefèvre d'Étaples, he championed a Catholic reform of the Church; in 1522 he came into conflict with King Christian II. This course of action, together with the defection of many of his former students, brought upon him the accusation of being a Lutheran. However, in the years 1524 to 1534 he appeared as their principal adversary, writing several Latin and Danish polemical works against the Danish and Swedish reformers, translating some works of Erasmus, and editing his letters of St. Paul with annotations. In his chronicle of Skiby (1534) he drew a passionate but truthful picture of the religious and political events in Denmark in which he took an active part as adviser of the bishops. His fate after 1534 is unknown.

Bibliography: Skrifter a Paulus Heliä, ed. M. KRISTENSEN et al., 7 v. (Copenhagen 1932–48). L. SCHMITT, Der Karmeliter Paulus Heliä (Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, Suppl. 60; Freiburg 1893). J. O. ANDERSEN, Paulus Helie (Copenhagen 1936). K. VALKNER, Paulus Helie og Christiern II (Oslo 1963). W. GÖBEL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:208. A. OTTO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:210.

[A. STARING]

HELIAND

The accepted editorial title of a ninth-century Old Saxon alliterative poem of 5,983 lines written, possibly at FULDA, by an unknown monk. The poem is preserved almost completely in two MSS (Munich and London), and fragmentarily in two others (Jena and Vatican). The Heliand, meaning Savior, is a product of missionary activity under LOUIS I the Pious (814–840). It is thought to be the Gospel part of a larger project presenting the entire Bible in vernacular verse. References to such a project and to its almost legendary poet survive in a Praefatio and Versus published in 1562 by the Protestant apologist, FLACIUS ILLYRICUS. Whether the documents, now lost, that he cites are authentic or not, there are extant many verses of an Old Saxon Genesis usually linked with the Heliand. Curiously, some of these Genesis verses were translated into Anglo-Saxon and constitute the interpolated Genesis B passage of the Junius MS. The Heliand and the Genesis fragments are the most important Old Saxon poetic documents in existence. The literary and scholarly associations of the Heliand are rich and broad: in general outline the poem follows the Diatessaron (Gospel Harmony) of TATIAN; in theological emphasis it reflects not only the scriptural commentaries of BEDE and ALCUIN but the more contemporary In Matthaëum of RABANUS MAURUS; its poetic tradition has two observable sources, the Latin poems of JUVENCUS and PRUDENTIUS, and the heroic songs and paraphrases of the Anglo-Saxons. Some scholars see considerable Germanization of Biblical materials in the Heliand, particularly of Christ and his Apostles, who become heroic figures in a Germanic comitatus, and of the countryside of Palestine, which becomes Saxony and northern Europe. Though there is substance to the observation, the poet is still very much the traditional Christian homilist, marking the close rather than the beginning of an era.

Bibliography: Sources. MS Cgm. 25, Staatsbibliothek, Munich, (S. IX); MS Cotton Caligula A VII, Brit. Mus., London, (S. X). O. BEHAGHEL, ed., Heliand und Genesis (6th ed. Halle 1948). Literature. J. K. BOSTOCK, A Handbook on Old High German Literature (Oxford 1955). G. EHRISMANN, Geschichte der deutschen Literatur bis zum Ausgang des Mittelalters, 2 v. in 4 (Munich 1918–35) 1:150–166.

[L. K. SHOOK]

HÉLINAND OF FROIDMONT

Noted Cistercian writer, chronicler, and poet; b. Pronleroy (Diocese of Beauvais), France, c. 1160; d. monastery of Froidmont, after 1229 (feast, May 28). A trouvère at the court of Philip II (Augustus) and member of the nobility, Hélinand entered the monastery of Froidmont c. 1194, and eventually became prior there. His many works include 28 lively sermons (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 212:481–720), some of which he preached to the students of Toulouse; though often more curious than profound, they reveal the author's grasp of theology, psychological penetration, and familiarity with Scripture and the classics. De cognitione sui (ibid. 721–736) deals with a favorite Cistercian theme—self-knowledge. De bono regimine principis (ibid. 735–746) is drawn wholly from JOHN OF SALISBURY's Policraticus. His Epistola ad Gualterum seu Liber de reparatione lapsi (ibid. 745–760), written to a former novice, contains an exposé of the singular theory that novices are not free to leave their orders. Hélinand's Vers de la mort [ed. F. Wulff and E. Walberg, Les Vers de la Mort par Hélinand de Froidmont, Paris 1915; idem. (including modern Fr. tr.), ed. J. Coppin, Paris 1930], written in Old French, enjoyed immense popularity and belongs to the earliest of the "Danse macabre" literature. A Chronicon in 49 books, of which only the last five are extant (Patrologia Latina 212:771–1082), covers the period 634 to 1204.

Fresco painting depicting the damned consigned to hell, c. 15th century, Chapel of Notre Dame, La Brigue, Arriere, Cote D'Azur, France. (©Charles & Josette Lenars/CORBIS)

Drawn in large part from SIGEBERT OF GEMBLoux, it was a primary source for VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS. A major commentary on the Canticle of Canticles, discovered by Jean Leclercq, OSB, has not yet been published.

Bibliography: M. DUMONTIER, "Hélinand de Froidmont et la liturgie," Collectanea ordinis Cisterciensium Reformatorem 14 (1952) 133–139, 213–215, 295–300; 17 (1955) 49–56, 118–125.

[C. WADDELL]

HELL (IN THE BIBLE)

The English word "hell" is derived from the common Teutonic name for the place that was, according to ancient Germanic mythology, the abode of all the dead, like the Hebrew SHEOL and Greek HADES. Nowadays, however, the word is used to signify the place of the damned, corresponding to Hebrew GEHENNA and Greek Tartarus.

Throughout almost the whole Old Testament period it was commonly believed that the dead, whether good or bad, continued to exist in the nether world, a region of darkness, misery, and futility; they lived on as unreal, half-material shades in a land of silence and oblivion [see DEAD, THE (IN THE BIBLE)]. The name for this region was rendered as "hell" by the older vernacular versions of the Bible (e.g., the Douay Version) and is still used in this sense in speaking of Christ's DESCENT into hell. Toward the end of the Old Testament period, however, the notions of RETRIBUTION and final judgment [see JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE)] led the Jews to distinguish between the lot of the good and that of the wicked in Sheol; even before the final judgment they were separated by an impassable gulf. In addition to this view of Sheol there developed in postexilic Judaism the idea of an eschatological place of punishment, Gehenna, where apostate Jews and Gentile sinners would be put at the end of the world to suffer everlasting tortures by fire. In time a partial merging of these two originally independent concepts took place; besides the indigenous element of fire in Gehenna, the darkness of Sheol was also present, and ultimately Gehenna becomes a part of Sheol and a place where the wicked suffer even before the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

In the New Testament, the abode of all the dead whether good or wicked is called Hades (Mt 11.23; Lk 10.15; 16.23), whereas the place of punishment for the wicked is generally called Gehenna (Mt 5.22, 29; 10.28; 18.9; 23.15, 33; Mk 9.43, 45, 47; Lk 12.5). Although Jesus made use of the language of His time, He did not necessarily endorse the rabbinic notions of future punishment as physical torment; yet it is impossible to soften the severity of Jesus' warning against unrepented sin, and the sentimentalism that seeks to do so is a distortion of His teaching and that of the New Testament as a whole. The chief characteristic of hell, as depicted in the New Testament, is its fire that is unquenchable (Mt 3.12; Mk 9.43; Lk 3.17) and everlasting (Mt 18.8; 25.41; Jude 7). Whatever may be implied by the terms "unquenchable fire" and "everlasting fire," they should not be explained away as meaningless. In the New Testament, hell is also described as a place of "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 8.12; 13.50; 22.13; 24.51; 25.30). Its darkness (Mt 8.12; 22.13; 25.30) is borrowed from the older concept of Sheol.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 969–970. J. GNILKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:445–446. P. ANTOINE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 2:1063–76.

[I. H. GORSKI]

HELL (THEOLOGY OF)

This article (1) outlines the theological concept of hell and then traces its development in the fields (2) of dogma and (3) of theology.

Theological Concept. To construct an adequate theological concept of hell is not easy. Christ did not speak of hell to convey information about an object beyond present experience but in the context of the decision to which the human person is called by the proclamation of the gospel. A theological idea of hell is derived from and controlled by other concepts. The ideas of hell that have appeared in the course of Christian theology have varied according to the different concepts from which they have been derived. To elaborate a theological idea of hell that will interpret all the elements, with their priorities, of Christian belief in hell, the concept of the KINGDOM OF GOD is now being used.

The kingdom of God was the dominating concept Jesus used in the proclamation of His gospel (Schnackenburg, 94). This was not a concept created by Jesus but one current, in the form of the kingdom of heaven, in the thought-world of His Jewish contemporaries. But the content Jesus gave to this concept was original (H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 1:172–84). He used the concept of the kingdom of God as an eschatological metaphor which expressed God's merciful love for the human race and the divine saving will for creation. For Jesus the metaphor of the kingdom of God gathered the whole of the history of SALVATION into a unity, as it was the focal point of the self-manifestation of God. When the theological idea of hell is derived from and controlled by the concept of the kingdom of God, its eschatological character and relation to the mercy and saving will of God receive due priority.

The advantage of deriving the theological idea of hell from the kingdom concept is that its nature as an objective reality is respected. For Christian theology, the kingdom metaphor expresses the conviction that God's saving will is realized in the exalted Jesus and the humiliated Satan. The theological idea of hell is designed to express the second part of this statement, and the construction of the idea should reflect this.

The reality that the theological idea of hell expresses has another form. It expresses a present reality as well as something that is still to come. This too is reflected in the way Jesus used the kingdom metaphor. There is the Lordship of Jesus that will continue until all things are subject to Him (1 Cor 15.27); there is what that Lordship prepares for: that God may be all in all (1 Cor 15.28). To be adequate the theological idea of hell needs to be elaborated in terms of the Lord Jesus (Jn 17.2) and of God all in all.

Given the fact of Christian belief in hell, one of the functions of the theological reflection is to make intelligible the possibility of hell in as far as that is possible. Here too the advantage of deriving the idea of hell from the kingdom metaphor is apparent. Intimately associated with the kingdom is the issue of belief (Mk 1.15). The possibility of hell is made intelligible by the concept of UNBELIEF. The theological idea of hell does not purport to explain unbelief, a problem that involves human freedom and God's will [E. C. Hoskyns, The Fourth Gospel, ed. F. N. Davey (London 1947) 295], but it should clearly indicate the eschatological character of the object, the Lord Jesus, and of the testimony, that of the Spirit, involved in unbelief. The theological idea of hell supposes the mystery of the Father sending the Son and the Holy Spirit, with the reality of the saving work within the human race (Eph 2.14) and on the cosmic level (Col 1.20) that this implies. In this way it puts the question of the understanding of the possibility of hell in its true perspective. Hell is not justified in terms of SIN alone; behind sin is unbelief (Jn 16.9). And yet the concept of sin has its proper function within the theological idea of hell. It is one pole of God's recognition of human historicity, as REPENTANCE is the other. This is the meaning the theological idea of hell is designed to convey.

Fresco painting depicting scene from hell, 1490, in the Chapel of St. Antoine, France. (©Charles and Josette Lenars/CORBIS)

A technical concept is produced by relating certain ideas according to some model. In this way the theological idea of hell uses SATAN, who "sins from the beginning. To this end the Son of God appeared that he might destroy the works of the devil" (1 Jn 3.8). Constructed on this model, the idea of hell indicates what can issue from unbelief: persons like Satan (1 Jn 3.10), since their personal attitude to the God who is disclosed in the Lord Jesus and in the testimony of the Holy Spirit is similar to that of Satan. And by using this model the ultimate meaning of the idea of hell is indicated, the meaning that is metaphorically expressed in the words: "And the light shines in the darkness" (Jn 1.5).

The classical theology of the West approached the problem of hell mainly from the angle of retribution for sin. The idea of hell is built up from the analysis of the concept of sin and developed by using analogously the concepts of sanction, perfection, and retribution drawn from morals, metaphysics, and religion. Theology today approaches the problem of hell from the angle of separation from God.

Dogmatic Development. Belief in the possibility of hell has always been present in the Church. For the form in which the primitive Church stated its belief in hell, [see HELL (IN THE BIBLE)]. Since New Testament times the doctrinal statement of belief in the mystery of hell is found in the professions of faith. The early Fides Damasi states this belief in the context of the retribution that will take place when Christ returns to judge the living and the dead: “aut poenam pro peccatis aeterni supplicii” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 72); so too the Quicumque: “qui vero mala [egerunt] in ignem aeternum” (ibid. 76). The important profession of faith used in the dialogue between East and West, at the Second Council of Lyons, 1274, and again in 1385, states belief in the mystery of hell in the context of the retribution that takes place immediately after death: “Illorum autem animas, qui in mortali peccato vel cum solo originali decedunt, mox in infernum descendere, poenis tamen disparibus puniendas” (ibid. 856). Although there is no creedal statement of belief in hell, the creedal statement that Christ will return to judge the living and the dead entails the doctrinal statement of belief in the possibility of hell.

Two points of this statement of belief in hell have been formally defined. In 543, in a definition reflecting the faith of the Church of the East and West, the punishment of the demons and the damned was declared unending. The ninth of the so-called canons against Origen reads: “Si quis dicit aut sentit, ad tempus esse daemonum et impiorum hominum supplicium, ejusque finem aliquando futurum . . . an. s.” (ibid. 411). And in 1336, the constitution BENEDICTUS DEUS, by defining the doctrine that retribution takes place immediately after death, defined that the punishment of the damned begins immediately after death. “Diffinimus insuper, quod secundum Dei ordinationem communem animae decedentium in actuali peccato mortali mox post mortem suam ad inferna descendunt, ubi poenis infernalibus cruciantur” (ibid. 1002).

These two definitions emerged in the course of the long debate within the Church concerning the content of belief in the return of Christ, the PAROUSIA, for the content of this belief is complex; with the return of Christ are associated other events, such as the END OF THE WORLD, the RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD, and the divine judgment. Eschatology, the understanding of belief concerning the last things, is difficult (see ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON).

To determine the nature of these events and the way they are related to one another and to the return of Christ is not easy. The interpretation of the eschatological statements found in the New Testament and the evaluation of the imagery they employ is beset with difficulties. In the second century Justin held that the punishment of the demons and the damned is delayed until after the final judgment (1 Apol. 28; Dial. 5.3). The great apologist (Dial. 80) deduced this opinion from his interpretation of the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body, an interpretation influenced by Jewish eschatology in the form of CHILIASM. Known as the dilatatio inferni theory, Justin’s opinion was widespread in the West until the sixth century, when the teaching of Gregory the Great (Dial. 4.27) cause it to be discarded.

Those who understood the return of Christ according to the theory of chiliasm read the eschatological statements of the Scriptures in a purely literal sense. Against these literalist believers Origen reacted strongly (De prin. 2.11.2). And in doing this he translates the sufferings of the damned into spiritualized terms (De prin. 2.10.4). The real punishment of the damned consists in their sense of separation from God. According to his theory of APOCATASTASIS, Origen (De prin. 1.6.2) understands these punishments as remedial and as ending when the final restoration is reached (In Ezech. hom. 1.2).

The influence of Origen’s opinions on the understanding of belief in hell was considerable. He was largely responsible for the disappearance of chiliasm and so restored the problem of the return of Christ to its eschatological setting. By raising the question of the purpose of the punishment of the damned, he opened the way for the interpretation of scriptural statements about remedial punishment, the FIRE OF JUDGMENT, and PURGATORY. In this way the question of retribution at death appears in connection with the individual, and so belief in hell was stated in this context.

Origen attempted to provide an intelligent understanding of traditional belief in hell. The result at which he arrived was eventually declared by the Church incompatible with that belief. What he attempted remains a problem. His positive contribution to the solution of that problem was, besides showing the folly of relying on the purely literalist reading of scriptural statements about the sufferings of the damned, to place the understanding of belief in hell within Christian belief in the saving work of Christ and in God’s merciful love for humankind.

After Origen some attempted to mitigate the unending punishment of the damned by maintaining that these punishments would end for Christians (Jerome, Ep. 119.7; Ambrose, In Ps. 36.26), or for certain categories of Christians, such as those who always retained belief in Christ, or those who had received the Eucharist. These views, under the influence of the teaching of Augustine (Enchir. 112–13), eventually gave way before the traditional belief in the unending punishment of the damned. Others, for whom this belief was incompatible with their belief in the MERCY OF GOD, resolved the problem of the punishment of the demons and the damned by means of the theory of conditionalism, according to which the demons and the damned will be annihilated; or by the theory of universalism, which postulates the final restoration of all things, including the demons and the damned. These views are excluded by the dogmatic statement that the punishment of the demons and the damned is unending. But the fact that such views continue to be held by some Christians is a reminder of the problem involved in the understanding of traditional belief in the mystery of hell. The Church has stated that belief in the form of the unending punishment of the demons and the damned, but this form is not to be equated with the total expression of the Church's belief in the mystery of hell; nor can belief in hell in that form alone provide an adequate basis for the elaboration of the theological idea of hell.

Theological Development. The various ideas of hell that have been elaborated in the course of theology have been influenced by the different categories used to integrate the theology of hell within a systematic theology. In terms of his category of apocatastasis, Origen's theological speculations produced the idea of hell as the ultimate stage in the process by which all things return to their primeval order. When Origen's speculations had been hardened by his followers into a doctrine of universalism, this idea of hell was excluded by the Church: "Si quis dicit . . . restitutionem et redintegrationem fore daemum aut impiorum hominum, an. s." (Enchiridion symbolorum 411). The clearer identification of the different eschatological events and states, both at the collective and at the individual level, that resulted from the Church's long reflection on belief in the return of Christ meant that scientific theology, when it emerged in the West during the 12th century, was better placed to work out a theological idea of hell. Peter Lombard integrates the theology of hell into his systematic theology, Libri 4 sententiarum, by means of the category of resurrection (3 Sent. prol.). This category he linked, by way of the category of Sacrament, to the category of Christ the Samaritan restoring man from the effects of sin: infirmity and death. The theological speculation of Peter Lombard about hell is mainly confined to discussing questions arising from scriptural statements and patristic opinions, especially those of Augustine, about hell (4 Sent. 43–50).

The categories used by Peter Lombard were more fully exploited by Thomas Aquinas (In 2 sent. prol.; Summa theologiae 3a, prol.). But he died before completing his own systematic theology (Summa theologiae); what is included under the rubric Resurrection (Summa theologiae 3a, suppl., 69–99) is taken from his earlier work (In 4 sent. 43–50). In his theology of hell, Aquinas traces the horizons within which an intelligent understanding of belief in hell is possible: the place of the will in fault and punishment (In 4 sent. prol.), the mutability and fixity of the created will (angels': Summa theologiae 1a, 63–64; men's: Comp. theol. 174). By working out these horizons in reference to the concrete situation, revealed in FAITH, of the creature's freedom and of God's GRACE, he indicates the mystery of hell. He was aware, too, of the relation of the theology of hell to pneumatology (Comp. theol. 147). These possibilities for the development of the theology of hell were little exploited by later theologians. During the 14th and 15th centuries theological interest was chiefly confined to Books 1 and 2 of Peter Lombard's Libri sententiarum. And when in the following century the Summa theologiae of Aquinas became the text used in the theological faculties, the incomplete state of that work caused eschatology and the theology of hell to be isolated from their traditional place within theology. L. Lessius, De perfectionibus moribusque divinis 13.24, inserts the theology of hell under the rubric Judgment and Wrath of God. C. Mazzella, De Deo creante (Disp. 6) places it with the theology of man. Until recent times, a similar treatment of the theology of hell was common in the manuals of theology (e.g., A. Tanquerey's). Retribution for sin is the dominant feature of the idea of hell developed by these theologies.

The category of revelation is increasingly used to integrate the theology of hell, and eschatology, within systematic theology (e.g., in Schmaus's work). This category of revelation introduces into the theology of hell the concepts of the kingdom of God and of unbelief. Both concepts express personal realities and entail a concept of freedom: the freedom in which a person rejects the self-giving that another freely makes. In this context separation from God is the theological idea of hell. And by reference to the divine self-giving manifested now in the Lord Jesus and to be manifested when God is all in all, this idea of hell as separation from God is worked out. The consequence of this separation from God is expressed in the idea of hell as retribution for sin; the theological concepts of damnation and hellfire are used to interpret this consequence. While respecting the mystery of God's dealings with the fact of unbelief, this theology of hell endeavors to make a statement of belief in the mystery of hell that is wider in form than the present doctrinal statement of that belief. But it is aware that the truths its idea of hell interpret cannot be held together in logical equilibrium (Jn 17.12).

See Also: ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE); ESCHATOLOGY (THEOLOGICAL TREATMENT); GEHENNA; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); SANCTION, DIVINE.

Bibliography: M. RICHARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 5.1:28–120; Dictionnaire de théologie catholique: Tables générales (Paris 1951–) 1.1179–84. J. GNILKA et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:445–50. F. C. GRANT et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:400–07. A. WINKLHOFER, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 1:327–36; The Coming of His Kingdom, tr. A. V. LITTLEDALE (New York 1963). P. BERNARD, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALÈS, 4 v. (Paris 1911–12) 1:1377–99. J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960). H. DE LAVALETTE, Eschatologie in Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte, ed. M. SCHMAUS and A. GRILLMEIER (Freiburg 1951–) 5.2. M. SCHMAUS, Von den letzten Dingen (his Katholische Dogmatik 4.2; 5th ed. Munich 1959). R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1963).

[E. G. HARDWICK]

HELLENIST

In Acts 6.1 Hellenists (Ἑλληνοιστοί) are Greek-speaking converts from Judaism as distinct from Hebrews (Ἑβραῖοι), converts from Judaism who spoke Hebrew or, rather, Aramaic. The word Ἑλληῖν (Greek) is used in the NT of Greek-speaking Gentiles (Acts 14.1; 18.4; Rom 1.16; etc.) or Greek-speaking Proselytes. Hellenists were often more fervent in Judaism than the Hebrews. They not only made pilgrimages to Jerusalem, but maintained national synagogues in the holy city (Acts 6.9). It is not surprising, then, that they provided both the greatest impetus and the fiercest opposition to Christianity.

Among the first converts on Pentecost were many Hellenists (Acts 2.5–11). Also the first seven deacons, all of whom had Greek names, were Hellenists. They were men of fiery zeal such as STEPHEN (PROTOMARTYR) and PHILIP THE DEACON, who spread the faith rapidly in Jerusalem, Judea, and Samaria (Acts ch. 6–8). It was Hellenists, too, who began the conversion of the Gentiles at Antioch (Acts 11.20), the base of St. Paul's missionary journeys. At the same time, Hellenists opposed Christianity in Jerusalem and throughout the Roman Empire (e.g., Acts 6.9; 9.29; 13.50). St. Paul, who qualified as both a Hellenist and a Hebrew (Acts 22.3; Phil 3.5), exemplified the roles of both persecutor and missionary of Christianity.

Bibliography: H. WINDISCH, in G. KITTEL, ed., Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:508–509. M. SIMON, St. Stephen and the Hellenists in the Primitive Church (New York 1958). C. F. D. MOULE, "Once More, Who Were the Hellenists?" Expository Times 70 (1958–59) 100–102.

[W. F. DICHARRY]

HELLFIRE

In theological discourse hellfire signifies the concept of physical punishment (poena sensus) that scholastic theology elaborated, in addition to the concept of punishment of loss (DAMNATION), to interpret the punishment of the demons and the damned. The theological distinction between hellfire and damnation interprets the Church's teaching about the punishment of sin (Enchiridion symbolorum, 780). But the nature of the objective reality expressed by the concept of physical punishment has not been clarified by the Church.

The analysis of sin in relation to the last end reveals not only the loss of the last end (aversio), which is God, but also, in the same context of the last end, the inordinate estimation of other things (conversio). The punishment for this aspect of sin is expressed by the concept of physical punishment (C. gent. 3.145). And from the understanding of the relation of sin and punishment to the will (Comp. theol. 121), the objective reality interpreted by this concept is seen to be material things (C. gent. 4.90).

How material things can inflict punishment on the demons and the damned has been variously understood; the reading of scriptural statements about this punishment and the available scientific knowledge have been reflected. Much of this speculation is now discarded. Aquinas approaches the problem from the metaphysical angle of the relation between spirit and matter (C. gent. 4.90) and resolves it in the sense of demons and damned souls being subjected to or constricted by material things (Comp. theol. 180). This constrictive action of matter on the damned supposes a special intervention of divine power, so that only analogously can natural knowledge be used to understand it. By this analogous use of natural knowledge, Aquinas justifies the literal reading of scriptural statements about hellfire (Comp. theol. 179). Theologians differ about the form of causality involved in the constrictive action of matter on the damned; for some it is physical causality, for others, objective causality. Aquinas understands it as physical and objective (Comp. theol. 180).

Theological opinion about what matter constricts the damned has developed considerably. Where earlier views understood this matter as some material things, the trend now is to interpret it as the whole material universe. By this constrictive action the relationship of the damned to the universe and its parts is restricted. This situation of the damned within the universe is understood in terms of the cosmic role of the Holy Spirit manifested in the RESURRECTION OF JESUS; it expresses their humiliated situation within the KINGDOM OF GOD. The material restriction of the demons and the damned, signified by hellfire, articulates their spiritual restriction, signified by damnation. The meaning of the punishment of the demons and the damned in personal terms is that they are the unfree.

See Also: GEHENNA; FIRE OF JUDGMENT; HELL (THEOLOGY OF); SANCTION; SANCTION, DIVINE; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables généroles 1951) 5.2:2196–2239. A. WINKLHOFER, The Coming of His Kingdom, tr. A. V. LITLEDALE (New York 1963) 77–98.

[E. G. HARDWICK]

HÉLOÏSE

Abbess of the Paraclete; b. c. 1098; d. Paraclete, France, May 15, 1164. She was the niece of Canon Fulbert at Paris, and was noted for her learning, her love for Peter ABELARD, and her later devotion to the religious life. As an aftermath of her love affair with Abelard, Héloïse entered a convent and eventually became prioress of the abbey of ARGENTEUIL. In 1128, when Argenteuil was closed, she and the nuns took refuge at the Benedictine abbey, the Paraclete (Diocese of Troyes), built by Abelard. This cloister, of which she became first abbess, flourished and became known for works of piety. At her death she was buried beside Abelard at the Paraclete. Their remains were later (1817) taken to Paris and interred there at Père-Lachaise.

Bibliography: J. T. MUCKLE, ed., “Historia calamitatum,” Mediaeval Studies 12 (1950) 163–213 Latin text, with review of MSS and editions; “The Personal Letters between Abelard and Héloïse,” ibid., 15 (1953) 47–94; “The Letter of Héloïse on Religious Life and Abelard’s First Reply,” ibid., 17 (1955) 240–281. E. GILSON, Héloïse and Abelard, tr. L. K. SHOOK (Chicago 1951). A. M. LANDGRAF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 1:5–6.

[P. KIBRE]

HELPERS OF THE HOLY SOULS

Also known as the Society of Helpers (HHS, Official Catholic Directory #1890), an international missionary congregation of sisters, founded at Paris in 1856 by Blessed Eugénie de SMET. Encouraged by the Curé of Ars (John Baptist VIANNEY), the Society of the Helpers of the Holy Souls early received direction from Pierre OLIVAIN, SJ; the congregation follows the spirit and rules of St. Ignatius. In 1892 the first United States foundation was made in New York City, followed by others in St. Louis, Missouri, and San Francisco and Los Angeles, California. The society’s apostolate was later extended to various parts of Asia, Africa, Europe and the Americas. Helpers engage in various ministries, including their traditional ministries of catechetical instruction and the care of the poor, sick and homeless. From the beginning, the foundress envisaged lay collaborators. Training of and retreats for volunteers and recruitment of associate members—clerical, religious, and lay—extend the Helpers’ mission. Secular members of the society, sharing fully its spiritual and apostolic formation while living in the world, were approved by Rome in the 1961 revised constitutions. The generalate is in Paris, France. The United States provincialate is in Chicago, Illinois.

Héloïse. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

[M. A. MCHUGH/EDS.]

HEMERFORD, THOMAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Dorsetshire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), Feb. 12, 1584. Having completed his studies at St. John’s and Hart Hall, Oxford, Hemerford traveled to the English College in Rome for his seminary education. He was ordained in 1583 by Bp. Goldwell at Rheims prior to beginning his work in the English mission. Hemerford was arrested the following year, and indicted on Feb. 5, 1584. Although he pled not guilty, he was sentenced to death two days later and committed to the Tower’s “pit” to await execution with BB. James FENN, John Munden, and John Nutter. (The sick George HAYDOCK was returned to his cell.) All five were drawn on hurdles to Tyburn. Hemerford, the second of the group to suffer, was hanged, but cut down and disemboweled while still alive. An eyewitness related of Hemerford, “when the tormentor did cutt off his members, he did cry, ‘Oh! A!’; I heard myself standing under the gibbet.” He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Ernest Hemingway. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 74, 103. GILLOW, Biblical Dictionary of English Catholicism (London and New York 1885–1902) III, 202; cf. III, 265; V, 142, 201. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891) 252, 253, 304.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HEMINGWAY, ERNEST MILLER

Novelist and short-story writer; b. Oak Park, Ill., July 21, 1899; d. Ketchum, Idaho, July 2, 1961. The son of a doctor and a devoutly religious mother, he spent a Tarkingtonian boyhood in a Chicago suburb and enjoyed Huck Finn summers in a still unspoiled, Native American-inhabited upper Michigan. After a job on the Kansas City Star, he took part in World War I as an ambulance driver and was wounded when barely 19. Briefly a journalist in Toronto and a correspondent during the Greek-Turkish war, he began his long expatriation in France, Italy, Spain, the West Indies, and Cuba, plus two African safaris and irregular but intimate involvements in both the Spanish Civil War and World War II. His father's suicide (1929) was a profound shock. A convert to Catholicism, Hemingway was apparently a believer to the end, though his marital status after the third of his four marriages precluded formal membership in the Church. He had three sons. He died of a self-inflicted gunshot wound after a protracted illness marked by hypertension and dependency.

The Nobel prize citation's (1954) salute to Hemingway's gift of "tragic pathos" seems prophetic in retrospect. All Hemingway's heroes are "objective correlatives" of his own attitudes; it is clear that his lifelong literary preoccupation with courage meant, in part, that he constantly dreaded that his own courage would desert him. The fact may well account for the disconcerting Byronic attitudes he struck in public. Underneath these he was a genuine saga figure creating an authentic saga art; his characteristic sardonic irony was a rationalization of his own sense of personal doom.

Classic in technique and romantic in thematics, Hemingway's fictional form is a naturalistic romance utilizing symbols from nature to capture the moral situations of his day. However limited in scope, he is a moralist, a historian of nihilism who takes his text from Ecclesiastes and who realizes in art the ritual inherent in the Catholic ethos, and sets priests and the crucified Christ high among his culture heroes.

For a time Hemingway's celebrated style, the mirror of an apparently straightforward but essentially oblique art, revolutionized world fiction. It is clean, staccato, linear, and vernacular, seeking the visual effects of a Braque, and making a curious Biblical music out of the connective "and." Though he attributes his own derivation to Twain, he displays strong affinities with such far-removed predecessors as the old poet of Maldon, and with Stendhal, Hawthorne, Thoreau, Turgenev, and Conrad. The future will probably diagnose his major weaknesses as an oversentimental primitivism and a positively adolescent bravura about sex.

Hemingway's finest work appeared between 1926 and 1936. He was the Froissart of the "lost generation" as Fitzgerald was its troubadour, and his best novels are The Sun Also Rises (1926), a brilliant, tragicomedy "Waste Land" that deploys a freshness of sensibility and incomparably cadenced dialogue; and A Farewell to Arms (1929), very possibly the best novel in English to deal with World War I. To Have and Have Not (1937) is marred by a gauche technique; and For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940) misses the inimitable tension-in-suspension that is his best work's emotional trademark. His only total failure, Across the River and into the Trees (1950), breaks down into self-parodying bathos. His single novella, The Old Man and the Sea (1952), at once Homeric and deeply Christian, demonstrates a lovely Franciscan empathy with the animal creation and incarnates, in old Santiago, Hemingway's central vision of man "destroyed but not defeated." An unusually high number of his 50-odd short stories are flawlessly executed and may well constitute his chief claim on posterity; such are "Great Two-Hearted River," "The Undeclared," "Twenty Grand,"

“The Killers,” “The Snows of Kilimanjaro,” and that archetypal parable for its century, “A Clean, Well-Lighted Place.” Hemingway’s ultimate critical status remains in some debate, but he achieved indubitable literature whose dominant note has been well described as a “clarity of heart.”

Bibliography: E. HEMINGWAY, Death in the Afternoon (New York 1932); Green Hills of Africa (New York 1935); A Moveable Feast (New York 1964), all contain valuable autobiographical details. C. H. BAKER, Hemingway: The Writer as Artist (3d ed. Princeton 1963), best biography and major critical source; ed., Hemingway and His Critics: An International Anthology (New York 1961). C. A. FENTON, The Apprenticeship of Ernest Hemingway (New York 1954), casts valuable light on the early years. J. K. MCCAFFERY, ed., Ernest Hemingway: The Man and His Work (Cleveland 1950). J. ATKINS, The Art of Ernest Hemingway: His Work and Personality (New York 1952). P. YOUNG, Ernest Hemingway (New York 1952). S. SANDERSON, Hemingway (New York 1961). E. ROVIT, Ernest Hemingway (New York 1963).

[C. A. BRADY]

HEMMA, BL.

Carolingian queen also known as Emma or Gemma; b. c. 808; d. Regensburg, Germany, Jan. 31, 876. Hemma was the sister of Empress Judith, the second wife of Charles II the Bald. The wife of Louis the German, she was the mother of seven children, including Charles III the Fat and Bl. Irmengard. She was patroness and abbess of the Benedictine convent of Obermünster, which has disputed Sankt Emmeram’s claim to her body. It seems, however, that she is buried at Sankt Emmeram’s, where her tombstone shows some of the best German plastic art of the 13th century.

Feast: June 29; Jan. 31 (Diocese of Regensburg).

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Necrologia 3:305. G. LEIDINGER, “Bruchstücke einer verlorenen Chronik eines unbekanntenen Regensburger Verfassers des 12. Jahrhunderts,” Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München (1933) 1–72. I. WEILNER, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 5:227.

[A. CABANISS]

HEMMING, BL.

Bishop of Åbo; b. Bälinge, Sweden; d. May 21, 1366. In 1338 he was elected bishop of Åbo (modern Turku, Finland) in what was then a province of medieval Sweden, and the election was confirmed by the archbishop of UPPSALA, who consecrated him. Hemming instituted the office of provost (praepositus) at his cathedral in 1340. He obtained two papal letters of indulgence from

CLEMENT VI and one from INNOCENT VI. Much reconstruction, especially new windows and portals, was undertaken in the cathedral, and two prebends were established. To his cathedral he willed his library, containing theological works and treatises on canon law; the De proprietatibus rerum of BARTHOLOMAEUS ANGLICUS was to be found in this collection. He was much appreciated by St. BRIDGET OF SWEDEN (nihil timet nec etiam mortem, bk. 4, ch. 125 of her Revelations says of him) and acted as her messenger to the kings of France and England as well as to the pope. Between 1350 and 1352 he promulgated statutes for the clergy, and for some time he seems to have been kept in custody by King Magnus Eriksson. Hemming was buried in his cathedral. The translation of his relics was authorized by the Holy See in 1514, and the shrine is still extant. He is often called “saint.”

Feast: May 22.

Bibliography: Sources. BRIDGET, Extravagantes, ed. L. HOLLMAN (Uppsala 1956). The important revelation (4.125 in the Latin text), is accessible only in older eds. The documents are ed. in Finlands Medeltidsurkunder, 8 v. (Helsinki 1910–35) and Diplomatarium suecanum (Stockholm 1829–). Literature. B. KLOCKARS, Bishop Hemming av Åbo (Turku 1961). J. GALLÉN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:228.

[T. SCHMID]

HENANA

Late 6th-century Syriac theologian; d. Nisibis (Nusaybin, Turkey), c. 610. A native of Adiabene, Henana studied in the school of Nisibis under Abraham, successor to Narses, and became director of the school in 572, a position he held until his death in spite of violent opposition. Support from rulers of Nisibis and a large following of disciples enabled him to lead a theological movement that endeavored to abandon NESTORIANISM for Chalcedonian orthodoxy in the Persian Church. He rejected the authority of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, considered an infallible interpreter of Scripture by the Persian Church, and followed JOHN CHRYSOSTOM as a guide in his scriptural exegesis. He accepted the HYPOSTATIC UNION of the two natures in Christ and, as a consequence, the COMMUNICATION OF IDIOMS and THEOTOKOS. He likewise accepted the doctrine of original sin as an explanation of human concupiscence and was consequently accused of Chaldaism or fatalism. He was also considered an Origenist; there is little evidence to support this charge, although the accusation that he denied the resurrection of the body and accepted the Origenistic teaching on the apocatastasis and possibly astral influence on human events led to the charge of fatalism.

Henana is known to have produced commentaries on Genesis, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Canticle of Canticles, the lesser Prophets, Mark, and the Epistles of St. Paul; and to have written tracts on the creed, on the Friday after Pentecost called the Golden Friday, and the so-called Fast of the Ninivites. Only fragments of his works have been preserved.

Bibliography: X. DUCROS, Catholicisme 5:597–598. A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922) 127. J. B. CHABOT, Littérature syriaque (Paris 1935) 88–89. R. DUVAL, La Littérature syriaque (3d ed. Paris 1907) 348–349. J. LABOURT, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse (Paris 1904) 215–217; 269–280.

[D. M. POSHEK]

HENDRICK, THOMAS AUGUSTINE

Bishop; b. Penn Yan, N.Y., Oct. 29, 1849; d. Cebu, Philippine Islands, Nov. 30, 1909. Born of immigrant Irish parents, Hendrick attended St. John's College (Fordham), N.Y.; Seton Hall University, N.J.; and St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, N.Y. After ordination on June 7, 1873, he served in several parishes in the Diocese of Rochester, N.Y. His interest in youth and education led to his election as president of the Rochester Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and his appointment to the N.Y. State Board of Regents (1900–04). Hendrick was closely associated with leaders of the Republican Party, including Theodore Roosevelt, and his name was proposed for the archbishopric of Manila after the Spanish American War when Spanish bishops were being supplanted by Americans. Although not named to Manila, Hendrick was consecrated in Rome, Aug. 23, 1903, as bishop of Cebu. Taking possession of a see that had suffered in the transition from Spanish to American rule, Hendrick spent months visiting the many islands that made up his diocese. He reactivated 50 elementary schools and enlisted priests from abroad to help fill the dozens of parishes left vacant by the ravages of war and the withdrawal of many Spanish friars. In criticism of U.S. authorities in the Philippines, the bishop alleged that they had failed to safeguard the rights of the Catholic Church in the Islands. He accused American authorities of favoring Aglipayans for responsible government positions, and his criticism of the occupying authorities for recognizing Aglipayan claims to Catholic Church property was later vindicated by the Philippine Supreme Court's decision sustaining Catholic ownership.

Bibliography: T. A. HENDRICK papers, MSS, Nazareth College, Rochester, N.Y. F. J. ZWIERLEIN, Theodore Roosevelt and Catholics, 1882–1919 (St. Louis 1956).

[R. M. QUINN]

HENNEPIN, LOUIS

Missionary, explorer; b. Ath, Belgium, May 12, 1626; d. probably Rome, Italy, after 1701. He entered the novitiate of the Récollet Order of Friars Minor at Béthune, France, was ordained, and served as a missionary in Holland (1673–74). On July 14, 1675, he sailed for Canada, where Bp. François de Laval de Montmorency of Quebec appointed him Lenten and Advent preacher. During this time he carefully studied native dialects and customs until appointed to an Iroquois mission at Fort Frontenac on Lake Ontario, near the present site of Kingston. In 1678, Hennepin accompanied René Robert, Sieur de la Salle, on his expedition westward. From a Niagara outpost on Lake Erie, they traveled through both Illinois and Louisiana country, navigated the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers named by La Salle, and founded Fort Crève-Coeur near Lake Peoria. Here La Salle left on foot for Fort Frontenac and Quebec while Hennepin and his companions continued toward the Mississippi River. On April 12, 1681, as they moved northward, they were captured by the Issati Sioux and obliged to accompany them in their wanderings. During one of these journeys, they stopped at a cataract in the Mississippi, which Hennepin named St. Anthony Falls. Through the intercession of the French explorer Daniel Greysolon Du Lhut the missionaries were finally released, and after a long and difficult journey Hennepin returned to Montreal, Canada, to report to Count Louis de Frontenac, the Governor General. At the suggestion of Laval, Hennepin spent the summer at the Franciscan monastery of Our Lady of the Angels, Quebec. In the autumn he returned to France to write Description de la Louisiana (1683), an account of his explorations. Experiencing difficulties with his superiors, Hennepin left Artois, where he had been stationed, and established himself in Utrecht, Netherlands. There he published two new versions of his travels, Nouvelle découverte (1697) and Nouvelle Voyage (1698), which were translated in more than 60 editions. In these books he claimed to have descended the lower Mississippi and discovered the Gulf of Mexico prior to La Salle. Rejecting his claims, historians have since debated his accuracy and originality. At this time Hennepin lost the favor of Louis XIV, and his books were dedicated to King William III of England. In 1698 Hennepin received a grant of money from William, for whom he offered to guide a fleet to the Gulf of Mexico. He did not accompany this fleet, however, but instead made his way to Italy, where his remaining days were spent in a monastery in Rome.

Bibliography: J. DELANGLEZ, Hennepin's Description of Louisiana (Chicago 1941) bibliog. 144–156, a leading American authority, who questioned the originality of Hennepin's writings. More recent, and based on documents favorable to Hennepin found in the State Archives, Mons, Belgium, are the writings of A. LO-

UANT, "Le P. Louis Hennepin: Nouveaux jalons pour sa biographie," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 45 (1950) 186–211; "Précisions nouvelles sur le Père Hennepin," Académie Royale de Belgique. Bulletin de la classe des lettres . . . 42 (1956) 215–276; "Une Confirmation de l'identification du Père Louis Hennepin," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 52 (1957) 871–876. These documents have resulted in some revision of traditional biographical details.

[J. L. MORRISON]

HENNI, JOHN MARTIN

Archbishop, editor; b. Misanenga, Grisons, Switzerland, June 13, 1805; d. Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 7, 1881. He studied at Saint Gall and Lucerne, Switzerland, and Rome, and in 1829 went to the U.S. to complete his training at the Bardstown, Ky., seminary. He was ordained on Feb. 2, 1829, for the Cincinnati diocese, where he taught philosophy at the minor seminary of the Atheneum for a short time. After taking a census of Germans in Ohio, he rode the circuit out of Canton and earned the title "Apostle of the Germans." In 1834 he became vicar-general and pastor of the Germans in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Because of the cultural void, lack of clergy, and hostility confronting immigrants, he organized the teaching of English for adults, wrote a catechism in German for children, founded a newspaper and library, introduced better Church music, and planned for a bilingual seminary to train a native clergy. Before the Ohio legislature endeavored to assimilate immigrants into American society by permitting bilingual schools in 1838, Henni had inaugurated such a system in Cincinnati. He knew that the scarcity of bilingual teachers permitted them to demand a salary beyond the ability of most places to pay. The result was a compromise allowing each school district to conduct its public schools in either English or German, or both.

One of Henni's greatest benefactions was founding Der Wahrheitsfreund, a weekly paper (1837–1907) in Cincinnati, which opposed slavery, prohibition, and autocracy. In it he claimed that Prussian autocracy made the foot fit the shoe, while his "Creed of Nineteenth Century Citizen" was a classical expression of belief in equality and tolerance. Like many of his contemporaries, Henni believed that agriculture is the foundation of all the livelihoods of man and the principal support of the state. His contribution to German literature is not excelled by any German liberal in the U.S. In 1835 he was sent to Europe to secure financial aid for the diocese. While there he published Ein Blick in's Thal des Ohio (Munich 1836), which outlined the history of the Catholic Church in the U.S.

Ordinary of Milwaukee. Wisconsin became a diocese in 1843 with Milwaukee as headquarters and Henni as bishop. In 1875 he became archbishop when Milwaukee was raised to metropolitan rank. His work there included attracting thousands of Catholic settlers, defending them against anti-Catholic groups, such as the Nativists, Know-Nothingists, and Forty-eighters, and providing them with priests, churches, schools, and institutions. He was opposed to settlement by colonization, because it was generally accompanied by regimentation, excessive land speculation, and restrictions upon industrial initiative and enterprise. Instead, he favored the American system of competitive entry, government land sale, and homesteading as being most conducive to industrial freedom and political liberty. Henni liked to point to the settlements of Catholic Irish and Germans along Lake Michigan and in the interior of Wisconsin as the ideal system of land entry and pattern of settlement. His refutation of a Whig charge that the Catholic hierarchy controlled the vote of alien Catholics appeared in print as Facts against Assertions (Milwaukee 1845) and revealed him as a remarkable apologist and historian. He was also successful in fashioning a pattern for successful missionary work with the natives at Wisconsin.

John Martin Henni.

Leader in Education. Henni concerned himself with the recruitment of teaching orders and stimulated the founding of Marquette University and St. Francis Seminary (1856), both in Milwaukee. He considered the cooperative school ventures temporary expedients, justified only in districts where farmers would not or could not support a double school system. He felt that all attempts to harmonize the conflicting views of religious and secular education by omitting the catechism and employing English exclusively produced a sort of hybrid religion that soon deteriorated into paganism. District schools under the control of lay committees that, though Catholic, might change every year jeopardized the pastor's influence. A system of parochial schools conforming to the needs of the parish group seemed far better to Henni, even though it meant supporting a dual system of schools. His policy and program conformed to the legislation of American church councils. He left a tradition of excellence in the German Catholic parochial schools of Cincinnati that was commended by the Second Provincial Council of Cincinnati (1858).

Other Activities. Henni was well known to the European missionary aid societies. Father Joseph Ferdinand Mueller, business manager for the LUDWIG MISSIONS-VEREIN, Munich, Germany, was a zealous advocate of Henni's requests to the society and was largely instrumental in settling the Norbertine Canons, Capuchins, Dominican Sisters of Racine, Sisters of St. Francis Assisi, and Notre Dame Sisters in Wisconsin. The Milwaukee Diocese became the largest beneficiary of the society. St. Francis Seminary ensured a supply of clergy not only for Wisconsin but also for the old Northwest and Middle West. Henni wrote that the life and development of the Church throughout that region depended on the seminary. In the school year 1868–69, 36 graduates were ordained for 12 dioceses.

To counter the press of the Forty-eighters, he started two weekly papers, Der Seebote (Milwaukee 1852) and Die Columbia (Milwaukee 1872). In addition, he sponsored the Catholic Vindicator (Monroe, Wis. 1870), the Star of Bethlehem (Milwaukee 1869), and merged them with the Catholic Citizen (Milwaukee 1870). His pastoral letters stressed history, divine Providence, and the Passion of Our Lord. Synods in 1847 and 1853 were called mainly to promulgate the conciliar decrees of Baltimore. Although against the inclusion of papal infallibility on the conciliar agenda of Vatican Council I, Henni finally voted for its definition. In 1880, when the Holy See honored Henni's request that Bp. Michael HEISS OF LA CROSSE, Wis., be named as his coadjutor, the selection brought on a clash between Irish and Germans.

Bibliography: P. L. JOHNSON, Crosier on the Frontier: Life of John Martin Henni (Madison 1959).

[P. L. JOHNSON]

HENOTHEISM

(From Gr. ἕν, ἑνός, one, and θεός, god) is a term introduced by Max Müller (1823–1900) to designate the Vedic religion, which he regarded as a form of polytheism without a firmly fixed hierarchy of divinities. Kathenotheism is employed in practically the same sense. Henotheism signifies a "monotheism of emotion and mood." When the believer devotes all his attention to a given god, this god becomes for him the only god, and for the moment all the other divinities and divine attributes merge in this one divinity. At present, however, henotheism is neither considered to be a stage in the evolution of religion, nor is it applied as an appropriate designation to any particular religion. On the other hand, the concept may be used in a religio-phenomenological sense, since the religious-minded man always meets God under the dominance of a given aspect—His omnipotence, love, or anger.

Bibliography: J. HAEKEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:233. W. D. WHITNEY, "Le Prétendu henothéisme du Véda," Revue de l'histoire des religions 6 (1882) 129–143. G. VAN DER LEEUW, Religion in Essence and Manifestation, tr. J. E. TURNER (London 1938). W. SCHMIDT, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee (Münster 1926–). W. HOLSTEN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:225.

[W. DUPRÉ]

HENOTICON

An epistolary decree of Emperor ZENO, prepared in 482 under the inspiration of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople (471–489), to restore religious unity between the Monophysites (see MONOPHYSITISM) and those who supported the Council of CHALCEDON (451). Chalcedon had solved the theological problem involved in the INCARNATION by defining the doctrine of two natures and one person in Christ; but its terminology was rejected by the Monophysites whose anti-imperial nationalism found an outlet in the Monophysite patriarchs of ALEXANDRIA, ANTIOCH, and JERUSALEM. In an effort to placate the Monophysite leaders, the Henoticon cites the first three ecumenical councils and affirms the consubstantiality of Christ with God and with man, but skillfully avoids the Chalcedonian use of the terms "nature" and "person." The decree was sent to all the bishops of the East for their signature, but was rejected by the Egyptian Monophysites, and considered in Rome and the West as a denial of Chalcedonian orthodoxy. It occasioned the first official estrangement between Rome and the East, a disaffection known as the ACACIAN SCHISM (484–519).

Bibliography: Text in Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Münich 1835–) phil. u. hist. Klasse

32.6 (Munich 1927), also in Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ (Paris 1857–66) 86:2620–25. L. SALAVILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 6.2: 2153–78. R. HAACKE, “Die kaiserliche Politik um Chalkedon,” Das Konzil von Chalkedon, ed. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, 3 v. (Würzburg 1953) v.2. F. STEPHANOU, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:233–234.

[J. VAN PAASSEN]

HENRICUS ARISTIPPUS

Scientist and translator; d. Palermo, Sicily, after 1162. A secular clerk of Norman origin, he became master of the palace school in SICILY and tutor to the future King William I. He was made archdeacon of Catania in 1156, and for a time in 1160 was the principal officer at William's court. After a short while, however, he lost favor and died in prison at Palermo. While royal ambassador to Constantinople in 1158, he brought back to Sicily Greek manuscripts, including a copy of the Almagest of PTOLEMY, from the library of Manuel I Comnenus. In 1156 he was the first to translate into Latin PLATO's Meno and Phaedo, hence his nickname Aristippus (cf. Meno 70b; Phaedo 59c). His interest in natural sciences led to a hazardous investigation of Mt. Etna and a translation of book four of ARISTOTLE's Meteorologica. He may also have translated Diogenes Laërtius De clarorum philosophorum vitis and the Opuscula of GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, but his work is not extant. His translations are in a distinguished Latin style, showing marked influence of rhetoric and a fondness for alliteration, asyndeton, and parallelism. He has left also some interesting notes on books and libraries in Sicily.

Bibliography: Corpus Platonicum medii aevi. Plato Latinus, v.1 Meno interprete Henrico Aristippo, ed. V. KORDEUTER and C. LABOWSKY (London 1940), v.2 Phaedo, ed. L. MINIO-PALUELLO (1950). C. H. HASKINS, Studies in the History of Mediaeval Science (2d ed. Cambridge, Mass. 1927) 159–172. L. MINIO-PALUELLO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:234; Revue philosophique de Louvain 45 (1947) 206–235.

[T. P. HALTON]

HENRIQUES, HENRIQUE

Missionary; b. Vila Viçosa, Portugal, 1520; d. Punaikāyal, South India, Feb. 6, 1600. He entered the Society of Jesus, and was ordained at Coimbra probably in 1545 or 1546. That same year he sailed to India, where he worked six months in Goa; then he was sent by Francis Xavier to the Fishery Coast, where he worked for 53 years. He succeeded Antonio CRIMINALI as superior of the mission from 1549 to 1576. His zeal was highly esteemed by Xavier, who described him as “a very virtuous person and of great edification, who knows how to speak and write Malabar [Tamil] and is loved by the Christians in an amazing manner” (Epitolaë S. Francisci Xaverii 2.13). He founded a number of hospitals for the sick. Henriques, probably the first European to write a Tamil grammar and vocabulary, spent many years improving them. Among his works are a catechism, printed in Tamil characters, dated 1578, Quilon, India; a translation of the catechism of Marcos Jorge, printed in Tamil, dated 1579, Cochin; the Flos sanctorum, also printed in Tamil (only known copy in Vatican Library), dated 1586; and numerous letters.

Bibliography: J. WICKI, Studia missionalia (Rome 1943–) 13 (1963) 113–168; ed., Documenta indica (Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu 70, 72, 74–; Rome 1948–).

[J. WICKI]

HENRÍQUEZ, ENRIQUE

Jesuit theologian; b. Oporto, Portugal, 1536; d. Tivoli, Jan. 28, 1608. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1552 and early distinguished himself for his learning and ability. He taught philosophy and theology at Córdoba and then at Salamanca, where two of his students were Francisco SUÁREZ and GREGORY OF VALENCIA. His Theologiae moralis summa (3 v. Salamanca 1591–93) occasioned serious difficulties with his order. He had earlier taken a leading role in intrigues against the general of the society, Claudius ACQUAVIVA, and in 1593 he refused to accept the changes demanded by the Jesuit censors and ordered by Acquaviva. Henríquez also attacked Suárez, denouncing him without success to the Inquisition at Madrid and at various other places. In 1594 he obtained permission from the pope to leave the Jesuits and enter the Dominicans, whose position on Molina he favored. However, with the persuasion of Gregory of Valencia, he chose to be reinstated with the Jesuits. Henríquez's other major work, De pontificis romani clave (Salamanca 1593), was condemned by the Spanish nuncio because of theses concerning ecclesiastical immunities, and was placed on the Index by decree of Aug. 7, 1603, which was later rescinded. Since the book was burned by command of the nuncio, only three or four copies remain as rarities of the Escorial. As a moralist, Henríquez was held in high esteem by St. Alphonsus Liguori.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 v. (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932; v.12, suppl. 1960) 4:275–276. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:591–592. A. AS-TRAIN, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús, 7 v. (Madrid 1902–25) 3:360–362; 4:132–134. P. BERARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2: 2197–98.

Henry I, King of England. (Archive Photos)

[F. C. LEHNER]

HENRY I, KING OF ENGLAND

Reigned from 1100 to Dec. 1, 1135; b. Selby (probably), England, 1068; d. Gisors, near Rouen, France. The fourth and youngest son of King WILLIAM I the Conqueror and Matilda of Flanders, he received an education and was literate. Immediately upon the death of his brother, King William II Rufus on Aug. 2, 1100, Henry, accompanied by two of Rufus's chief counselors, the Beaumont brothers, dashed to Winchester, seized the Treasury, and was proclaimed and crowned king of the English. His elder brother, Duke Robert Curthose of Normandy, had not yet returned from the First Crusade. Henry immediately issued his Coronation Charter, confirming the traditional rights of his barons and of the Church in England, and promising to right the wrongs of his brother. The new king also recalled from exile Abp. Anselm of Canterbury, whom Rufus had expelled and exiled from England, and he promised to rule the Church as Anselm wished. With Anselm's support, Henry quelled Curthose's invasion of 1102 without a battle, and the two brothers were reconciled. The king further solidified his rule by marrying Edith-Matilda, daughter of Malcolm and Margaret of Scotland, the latter of the old Anglo-Saxon royal lineage. Henry immediately began a policy of weeding out the most obstreperous of the barons, confiscating their lands and awarding them to more loyal followers.

But Anselm, having heard the decrees of the Papal Court, at once challenged Henry's right to invest clerics and receive their homage, beginning the INVESTITURE contest in England. King and archbishop tried to persuade Pope Paschal II to rescind these decrees for England, with Anselm even traveling to Rome to present his request to the pope in person. When Paschal refused, Henry at once offered him the choice of compliance with England's customs, or exile. Anselm chose exile. Soon thereafter, King Henry launched his attempt to conquer Normandy from his brother, Robert Curthose, but was stymied when Anselm threatened to excommunicate the king, causing some of Henry's allies to desert him. King and archbishop reconciled at a meeting at Laigle in 1105, Henry renouncing his right to investiture but retaining the right of homage of clerics; after papal ratification of the agreement, Henry and Anselm proclaimed their reconciliation publicly at Bec in 1106, and from Bec, now with Anselm's support, Henry proceeded to his victory at Tinchebray. In 1107, Henry and Anselm triumphantly held a great council at London, where king and archbishop appointed new clerics to the many vacancies in England, and Henry received their fealty.

Henry's great achievements were, first, to keep the peace in England for the entire 35 years of his reign; and second, to begin to build a bureaucracy which created the foundation for administrative kingship in England. Finally, he built a strong court of faithful and cooperative barons by judicious rewards of land and privileges, strategic marriage arrangements, particularly of heiresses; and the application of reason and order to a systematic reformulation of the government, but always based on England's Anglo-Saxon heritage. No wars disturbed England's prosperity during Henry's reign, while Normandy, touched by warfare on its borders during three crises—1111–1113, 1118–1119, and 1123–1124—also enjoyed internal peace. Law came to supercede violence as the means of settling property disputes, because of Henry's expansion and reform of the shire courts and use of royal justices in eyre. In Henry's reign began the elaborate records of the newly constituted exchequer, the Pipe Rolls; an avalanche of royal charters preserved the legal records; the first treatise on English Law, the Leges Henrici Primi, with its companion Quadripartitus, appeared; and the first evidence of a reformed royal household, with an elaborate and complex hierarchy of officials paid by fixed stipends, the Constitutio Domus Regis, issued from Henry's court. Henry's highly literate government, transformed by a new systematizing order, clearly underlay and prepared the way for his grandson, HENRY II.

Henry's foreign policy also aided England's peace. One of Henry's greatest triumphs was the marriage of his daughter, Matilda, to Emperor Henry V of Germany, but he also married many of his ‘‘natural’’ children to form alliances with many lords on the borders of the Anglo-Norman realm. The king habitually rewarded his loyal courtiers with marriages to heiresses, so that they owed their wealth and prestige to him, assuring their loyalty. The greatest challenge to the peace was the claim of Henry’s nephew, William Clito, son of Robert Curthose, to the Anglo-Norman realm—a challenge which Henry’s skillful alliances helped to quell.

Henry I’s ecclesiastical policies were energetic and benevolent. After he had reconciled with Anselm, Henry founded the sees of ELY (1109) and CARLISLE (1133). He presided over generous and rich benefactions made by his many courtiers to the various abbeys of England and Normandy. Henry himself was the most generous donor to the building of Cluny III, lavishing enormous wealth on it during the building program and involving himself in CLUNY’S building personally. He founded, as his personal foundation, READING ABBEY, and installed Cluniac monks there in cooperation with Abbot PETER THE VENERABLE. Reading enjoyed many liberties and privileges beyond those of other English abbeys. Henry also supported CISTERCIAN and PREMONSTRATENSIAN foundations, which first entered England during his reign, as did GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM and his GILBERTINES. In Henry’s reign also the traditional rivalry for precedence between the archbishops of CANTERBURY and YORK was definitely settled when York was freed from all subordination to Canterbury. It was as a consequence of this quarrel that Henry permitted papal legates access to England at last in 1125.

Henry was buried in Reading. His insistence that the English barons recognize the EMPRESS MATILDA as his successor would have passed the succession on peacefully, had not his nephew, STEPHEN, seized the throne unexpectedly, violating his own oath of fealty to the empress. There resulted widespread chaos and civil war throughout Normandy and England that threatened to undo all of Henry’s constitutional and administrative achievements.

Bibliography: JOHN OF WORCESTER, The Chronicle of John of Worcester, ed. tr. R. R. DARLINGTON, P. MCGURK, and J. BRAY 3 v. (Oxford Medieval Texts 1995–2000). Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1892–9). EADMER, Historia Novorum, ed. M. RULE [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores (New York 1964—) 81:1884]. WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, Gesta Regum Anglorum, ed. tr. R. A. B. MYNORS, R. M. THOMSON and M. WINTERBOTTOM, v.1 (Oxford Medieval Texts 1998). O. VITALIS, The Ecclesiastical History of Orderic Vitalis, ed. tr. M. CHIBNALL, 6 v. (Oxford Medieval Texts 1969–80). HENRY OF HUNTINGDON, Historia Anglorum, ed. tr. D. GREENWAY (Oxford Medieval Texts 1996). SYMEON OF DURHAM, Libellus de Exordio atque Procursu istius hoc est Dunhelmensis Ecclesie, ed. tr. D. ROLLASON (Oxford Medieval Texts 2000). L. H. PRIMI, ed. tr. L. J. DOWNER (Oxford 1972). Regesta Regum Anglo-Normannorum, ed. C. JOHNSON v.2 (Oxford 1956). C. W. HOLLISTER, Henry I, ed. and completed by A. C. FROST (New Haven 2001). M. BRETT, The English Church under Henry I (Oxford 1975). J. A. GREEN, The Government of England under Henry I (Cambridge 1986). C. W. HOLLISTER, Monarchy, Magnates, and Institutions in the Anglo-Norman World (London 1986). J. A. GREEN, The Aristocracy of Norman England (Cambridge 1997). C. A. NEWMAN, The Anglo-Norman Nobility in the Reign of Henry I (Philadelphia 1988). R. W. SOUTHERN, St. Anselm and His Biographer (New York 1963). S. N. VAUGHN, Anselm of Bec and Robert of Meulan (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1987). R. W. SOUTHERN, Saint Anselm: A Portrait in a Landscape (Cambridge 1990). The Letters of Saint Anselm of Canterbury, tr. W. FRÖLICH, 3 v. (Kalamazoo 1990–1994).

Henry II, King of England.

[S. VAUGHN]

HENRY II, KING OF ENGLAND

Reigned 1154–89; founder of the English common law; b. Le Mans, March 5, 1133; d. Chinon, July 6, 1189. By inheritance and by his marriage to ELEANOR OF AQUITAINE, Henry was lord of all western France from Normandy to Gascony, and he spent two-thirds of his reign in France. He increased his income by taking money instead of feudal military service. His greatest innovation was to create, out of scattered precedents of his predecessors, the English common law. His system was based on the circuit judge, the legal writ, and the jury. This procedure became so popular that almost all important cases came to his courts, thus increasing his power and income. The judges also sought out royal rights and revenues and checked the growth of other jurisdictions. By the end of the reign the royal courts had developed so rapidly that a formal treatise on the common law could be written.

In trying to increase the jurisdiction of his courts, Henry clashed with his former friend and chancellor, Thomas BECKET. On the issues of criminous clerks and appeals to Rome, precedents were confused, but neither man was willing to compromise. Becket was driven into exile for six years. On his return to England he promptly excommunicated some of Henry's supporters, and Henry, always a bad-tempered man, demanded vengeance. Four of his knights took him at his word and murdered the archbishop in his own cathedral on Dec. 29, 1170.

Henry took refuge in Ireland, where he completed the conquest begun by his vassals. An arrangement was finally made whereby he did public penance, allowed appeals to Rome, and gave clerics immunity from punishment in secular courts. On some other matters dealing with church property, his rules were allowed to prevail.

His last years were unhappy. PHILIP II AUGUSTUS, KING OF FRANCE, in alliance with Henry's own sons, attacked Normandy and Anjou. The old king, discouraged and disheartened, lost some frontier territories, though when he died, his empire was substantially intact. More important, the solid administrative and judicial structure that Henry had built in England continued to function smoothly, preserving the English monarchy during a dangerous quarter century when the king was either an absentee (Richard I), a neurotic (John), or a child (Henry III).

Bibliography: F. POLLOCK and F. W. MAITLAND, History of English Law, 2 v. (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1898). A. L. POOLE, From Domesday Book to Magna Carta, 1087–1216 (2nd ed. Oxford 1955) for sources and older bibliography. R. FOREVILLE, L'Église et la royauté en Angleterre sous Henri II (Paris 1943). J. BOUSSARD, Le Gouvernement d'Henri II Plantagenêt (Paris 1956). H. G. RICHARDSON and G. O. SAYLES, The Governance of Medieval England (Edinburgh 1963).

[J. R. STRAYER]

HENRY VIII, KING OF ENGLAND

Reigned, 1509 to 1547; b. Greenwich, June 28, 1491; d. Windsor, Jan. 28, 1547. Details of his early life are sparse, and not until his accession to the throne can he be seen clearly as an 18-year-old youth who was intelligent, handsome and confident, accomplished in sports (tennis, jousting, wrestling), a fine horseman, fluent in several languages, gifted in music and dancing, and set on a throne so well secured by his father that one could scarcely have begun a reign more propitiously.

Henry did not inherit his father's interest in the day-to-day business of government. Yet throughout his reign he was usually well informed and perceptive in his judgments. Moreover, he was the ultimate source of the major policies of his reign (which is not to deny that other people's ideas and outside events did much to shape them). He was a man with grandiose plans, but without the energy and, perhaps, the skill to execute them. Certainly he had not the character to apply himself to continuous hard work, and hence easily lost interest in business, excepting his own marriage problems. Henry was no working monarch; for two long stretches of his reign (c. 1513–29 and c. 1532–40), first Cardinal Thomas WOLSEY and then Thomas CROMWELL held sway, and royal government was virtually shed by the king and placed upon the chief minister. Henry always retained ultimate control and could make decisive, sometimes unpredictable, not to say impetuous, interventions. But he had no interest in letter writing; he quickly tired of reading long dispatches and did not worry about accounts. He was therefore a most difficult master to serve—now enthusiastic, cooperating with his servants; now suddenly intervening to halt or reverse a policy; now stricken with headache, bored with government, or absorbed in hunting, miles away from ministers and ambassadors.

Early Years of his Reign. Throughout his reign, but especially as a young man, Henry was hungry for glory and titles. He had been brought up in the chivalrous world of the tournament and the joust, and saw himself first of all as a warrior king. In 1512, the earliest that circumstances would permit, he led England back into her past and reopened the dynastic quarrels with France that had never really been settled in that interminable contest known as the Hundred Years' War (1337–1453). In 1513 he took a large army to Calais to repeat the exploits of Henry V, but won only a few trifling successes. To make war, to assert his title to the throne of France—this was a deep instinct. It came to the surface in the early years of his reign, again in the early 1520s (and after the French collapse in 1525 he seemed to be in sight of huge victory), and finally in the mid-1540s.

But Henry was restless, able and anxious to play several roles. Besides, he was not particularly brave and probably found the victory march more agreeable than the battlefield. By late 1516 he had given up fighting and was ready to appear as peacemaker of Europe, going so far as to preside in London (1518) over an elaborate bit of treaty-making intended to make war impossible. Several other projects occupied his mind. In 1519 he made what was, at least for a while, a serious attempt to be elected Holy Roman Emperor, an extraordinary episode owing as much to his rivalry with Francis I of France as to his taste for the flamboyant. In 1520 he was back in France on the Field of the Cloth of Gold, not this time to fight, but (as befitted his new role) to embrace his French brother and to match the chivalry of England and France in feasting and tilting.

Religions Policies. In 1521 and 1523 Henry was enthusiastic to have Wolsey elected pope. Henry, so to speak, had turned *dévo*t; he had also turned theologian. In 1521 he completed a book against Luther, the Defense of the Seven Sacraments. Doubtless, he received much help with it; but it was truly his book, that is, put together and shaped by him. The stir caused by the book led Rome to confer upon him the title of DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, which he had been seeking for years. Perhaps the book was simply an intellectual exercise, for it is unlikely that Henry's Catholicism was ever more than nominal. That he heard at least three Masses a day, was generous in his offerings, dutiful to the Holy See and so on, proves little. It seems clear that his religion was formal, external, and ritualistic. Probably Henry would have come into some sort of conflict with the Church even if the problem of his marriage had not arisen. From about 1528 to 1529 he began to put forward growing claims to a responsibility, vested in him as king, for the spiritual welfare of his people. These pastoral claims later grew into the Royal Supremacy and owed their existence more, probably, to his appetite for title and the influence of Protestantism than to the so-called divorce. The divorce was a powerful additional cause of conflict, of course, but the influence of the writings of such men as William TYNDALE and the example of Protestant princes must not be forgotten.

The Divorce Proceedings. In 1527 Henry made the first move to have his marriage to CATHERINE OF ARAGON, whom he had married 18 years previously, declared null. This was not a question of "divorce" in the modern sense of the word. He wanted to be rid of Catherine because she had not produced—and now never would produce—the son whom, as he earnestly and understandably believed, the dynasty and the nation required. For a while he toyed with the idea of bringing forward an illegitimate son, the duke of Richmond, but he recognized that this would not have been a successful venture. Nevertheless, Henry had a second reason for wanting to get rid of Catherine: he had fallen in love with Anne Boleyn.

Two main arguments were adduced against the validity of his marriage: first, he claimed that because Catherine had previously been married to his elder brother Arthur (who had died without issue in 1502) and because the consequent impediment of affinity in the first degree collateral between him and Catherine rested on divine law, as he believed Leviticus showed, the dispensation he had received from Pope Julius II to marry her had been ultra vires and his marriage therefore an odious offense against the law of God. Such an argument, besides being intrinsically weak, immediately challenged papal jurisdiction and hence threatened the gravest consequences. It also exposed Henry to the devastating riposte that, since he had committed adultery with Anne's elder sister Mary, and since affinity sprang from illicit as well as licit union, he was related to Anne in exactly the same degree as he was to Catherine; and if he could not take Catherine to wife, no more could he take Anne.

Henry VIII, King of England.

So it was that a second, humbler argument was produced: Henry now claimed not that any papal dispensation of this kind was invalid but that this particular one, for a variety of reasons, was. The two arguments ran side by side for some time until, at the end, the first was paramount. Neither argument was particularly solid, but each precipitated a large volume of polemical literature written by theologians, canonists, and Scripture scholars, Jewish as well as Christian, from all over Europe.

The Papal Commission. Henry's "great matter" quickly became a complicated and, because Catherine was the aunt of the Emperor CHARLES V, an international affair. Henry's original plan was to settle the case quietly in England and present the world with a fait accompli. But Wolsey and William WARHAM were unwilling to take so grave a step and forced Henry to seek a special commission from Rome. At last, in 1529, a legatine court presided over by cardinals Thomas Wolsey and Lorenzo CAMPEGGIO met at Blackfriars in London to hear the case. But this court failed to grant Henry his urgent desire; to make matters worse, the cause was revoked to Rome, in response to Catherine's appeal; and Henry was called to appear there in person or by proxy. In reply to this disaster, he began, from 1530 onward, to advance claims that the case belonged by law to English jurisdiction, that ancient privileges and customs of the realm forbade CLEMENT VIII's action, and that he was an emperor, subject to no earthly jurisdiction. Pope Clement, caught between Charles and Henry, obeyed his instinct and procrastinated. Maddened by delay and what he assumed was wanton obstinacy, Henry grew bolder in his claims and began to bully the Church in England, partly to frighten Clement, partly to give flesh to those ecclesiastical ambitions already mentioned. For his failure, Wolsey was violently swept aside in late 1529 and shortly afterward the Reformation Parliament met. It began immediately to attack the clerical estate.

Henrician Reform. Brandishing the weapon of praemunire and with the anticlericalism of Parliament at his side, Henry set about bringing the English Church under his control. The first trial of strength came in 1531, and Henry was largely defeated; the second test in 1532 ended with the CONVOCATION OF THE ENGLISH CLERGY yielding to him their legislative independence. This was a vital concession. At the same time, Parliament passed the first overtly antipapal legislation. In May 1532 Lord Chancellor Thomas MORE resigned, and a little later Archbishop Warham died, thus making room for Thomas CRANMER. The following year Henry and Anne were married, in open defiance of Rome. In May 1533, fortified by a solemn judgment given by the English clergy in Convocation, Cranmer declared null Henry's marriage to Catherine. Just before this, Parliament had passed the act in restraint of appeals, which declared the "imperial" status of the realm and the king; that is, it had affirmed the jurisdictional self-sufficiency of the sovereign national state and brought to a climax the arguments that Henry had been advancing since 1530. The next year saw the breach with Rome completed.

As the Convocation declared, the bishop of Rome had now no more jurisdiction in England than any other foreign bishop. The supreme head of the Church of England, as it may now be called, is the king, upon whom God has directly bestowed a spiritual authority long usurped by popes but now at last recovered by its rightful owner. So declares the Act of Supremacy (1534). Christ's Church is an assembly of local churches, subject to the prince, who directs the life of his church, guards and declares its teachings, gives its bishops their jurisdiction, and corrects its people. Such is the Ecclesia Anglicana. The plenitudo potestatis and the potestas iurisdictionis have been conferred on the king by God. Parliament has merely declared this fact and laid down penalties for those who deny it.

Henry's Success. Those who did deny it—John FISHER, More, the Carthusians and the others, and later those taking part in the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE were comparatively few. Henry carried the realm with him not because Englishmen did not understand or accept the papal primacy; they did, though they regarded Rome as the divinely appointed center of government of the Church, rather than as primarily the mouthpiece of the Church's growing understanding of revelation. Englishmen followed Henry into what was evident schism because the alternative was a cruel martyrdom or exile; because of national pride and the loyalty evoked by Tudor monarchy, which often came near to idolatry and was now a religious obedience; because Henry had moved slowly; because Clement had been provocative and negligent, giving neither guidance nor encouragement to his flock; because the case for the royal supremacy was ably backed by propaganda; because the breach with Rome might not be permanent. But above all Henry succeeded because he had allied himself with that discontent with the Church as an institution that was so obvious a feature of early Tudor life. Much of this anticlericalism may have been merely destructive and selfish. But some of it sprang from an altruistic idealism that was shocked by the condition of the Church, its wasteful absorption of so much energy and wealth, its privileges, its spiritual mediocrity (if not sterility) and an idealism that saw that a radical overhaul was necessary for the good of secular society as well as of the Church. Such anti-clericalism was a positive thing, not necessarily unorthodox (for it was present in Fisher and More), though the growing influence of Continental Protestantism would naturally tend more and more to make it so.

Henry had unleashed all this and placed himself at its head; and granted that he was a man of enlightenment, the breach with Rome, so it could be presumed, would not be merely a jurisdictional revolution but a major re-fashioning of the commonwealth. If Henry had set about cutting back this overgrown, ramshackle Church, there would have been brought back into fertile life an immense amount of wealth and manpower—with which to provide new and small dioceses, schools, colleges, and perhaps a determined attack on poverty. Add to this the hope of a new kind of hierarchy and clergy that was zealous, well-trained, and pastoral; and one glimpses the sort of expectations that some, perhaps only a small minority, had of this climacteric in English history, and doubtless still entertained in 1536 when the first steps were taken toward the greatest transfer of landed wealth since the Norman Conquest, namely, the dissolution of the monasteries.

Meanwhile, the marriage with Anne Boleyn had not produced the much-desired son. Instead Anne had had several miscarriages and only a daughter, the future Elizabeth I, had lived. Anne did not survive this failure for long. In 1536 she was beheaded for witchcraft and adultery. Henry then married Jane Seymour. She bore a son, Edward, but she died 12 days later. This was in late 1537. Two years afterward, Henry made his fourth and least successful essay in matrimony to Anne of Cleves, who, when she arrived in England, was found so disagreeable that the marriage was not consummated. It was quickly dissolved. Anne was dispatched home and replaced by Catherine Howard, who was charged with adultery and beheaded in 1542. The next year Henry married Catherine Parr, who survived him.

Development of Henrician Reformation. During the late 1530s there had been signs that, encouraged by Cranmer and Cromwell, Henry was moving toward Continental Protestantism. The Ten Articles of 1536 and the Bishops' Book of 1537, both, but especially the first, Lutheran in places, were followed by a project for a full alliance with the Lutheran princes of Germany. But by 1539 Henry had retreated from such a step, as the Act of Six Articles of that year showed, and in 1540 Henry completed the démarche by destroying Thomas Cromwell. In his eight years or so of power, Cromwell had shown himself a statesman and administrator of outstanding efficiency and versatility. Henry thus removed not only a loyal servant of the Crown but also one who left a deeper imprint on English life than, perhaps, any other minister, by his direction of the Henrician religious revolution, by carrying out widespread administrative changes, but especially by shaping English political life according to a new philosophy of state that owed a good deal to MARSILIUS OF PADUA.

Final Years. The last seven years of Henry's reign, during which ministers of the stature of Stephen GARDI-NER, rather than of Wolsey and Cromwell, were in power, were comparatively sterile. In the early 1540s Henry, who, thanks to the dissolution of the monasteries and heavy taxation of clergy and laity, enjoyed a huge income, returned to the war he had revived at the outset of his reign. In 1544 he made his last sortie to France and captured Boulogne. As in 1513, this invasion resuscitated the Old Alliance and England found herself engaged in large-scale war on two fronts. This was so expensive that the coinage had to be debased and further spoliation of the Church, especially of chantry lands was envisaged. The war with France lost momentum in 1546, however, and early the next year Henry died at Windsor. For a long time before his death there had been intense jostling for position when the old king should die and his son, a minor, come to the throne. When Henry's reign ended, power passed, according to his will, to a predominantly Protestant council, from which Stephen Gardiner and the duke of NORFOLK (now in the Tower) had been excluded.

Significance of Henry's Reign. Henry's great charm, his power to evoke loyalty (always dangerously close to the meanness and vindictiveness of the egoist), had for years been overlaid by truculence and fickleness. It is difficult to think of anything completely admirable about him at any time of his life, except, perhaps, his friendship with Cranmer; but beginning with the late 1520s, that is, after the divorce proceedings, he proved himself increasingly ruthless. Later on, illness made him yet more aggressive. Whether he suffered from syphilis, a brain disease, or, as lately suggested, gout, is not clear; but his decline seems beyond doubt. Perhaps the debate about his character will never end, but there can be no doubt about the significance of his reign. Henry may have lacked executive skill. He has been accused of being unoriginal and devoid of statesmanship. Though this may well be true and though the important ideas of his reign may have been intuitive or imitative or even supplied by others rather than born of deeply pondered strategy, he was nonetheless the prime mover of momentous change. The two provinces of the English Church had renounced their allegiance to Rome and their visible membership in a unitary Christendom, and had been united under the Crown. Monasticism had been abolished and the clerical estate humiliated.

Even if England had not subsequently undergone further theological change, what Henry accomplished would have left a profound mark on the mind, heart, and face of England. That country acquired a new political unity following the destruction of the greatest "liberty" in the land, namely, an independent Church. Between 1534 and 1536 Wales was incorporated into the political life of the kingdom; a determined attempt was made to do the same in Ireland; and the reshaping of the councils in the north and west of England was carried out under the direction of a reformed central government. Meanwhile, important things happened to Parliament. Neither Henry nor Cromwell invented Parliament or the statute; the latter was already the highest form of law-making in the land. But Cromwell proclaimed the omnicompetence of statute law and, whatever Henry may have thought about the matter, firmly placed secular sovereignty in king-in-parliament. And while this was happening, Parliament produced a body of statutes whose size and importance was not surpassed until the 19th or even 20th century. Henry's reign saw England become once more a major power in Europe and finally brought a profound transformation to the English navy.

Many of these things had caused bloodshed, uprooting, and discontent. One manifestation of this discontent was the Pilgrimage of Grace. The resumption of an aggressive European policy and the consequent wars against France and Scotland strike one today as retrogressive folly; they were certainly very costly. The debasement of the coinage necessitated by the wars at the end of the reign was a dubious tactic. Such was his preoccupation with Europe and his own domestic affairs that Henry showed no interest in the new worlds that Iberian ships were now opening up, and to which his father, albeit fitfully, had turned. As a result, when England at last entered this field later in the century, it found itself generations behind the Spanish and Portuguese. But above all Henry had failed to turn to good use the vast new powers and the wealth that the Reformation had brought him. Looking back on his reign one can see that, despite his alleged concern for the cura animarum vested in kingship, little was done to revivify the spiritual life of the English people or to cleanse the English Church. A few bishoprics were founded, and a few new professorships. Small endowments went to Oxford and Cambridge. These were steps in the right direction, but such small steps. Very little was done to raise the standard of the secular clergy or to purge the Church of its parasites. Henry had posed as a liberator of the English people from the bonds of the usurped and overbearing authority of the papacy, but the English Church found its new overlord far more exacting than the old and found royal taxation several times heavier than anything the popes had imposed. Worst of all, the great wealth of English monasticism, instead of being used, as some had hoped, for social and educational purposes, was squandered on war. Few kings have had it in their power to do greater good than Henry, and few have done less. Henry was not really interested in education, or social justice, or the spiritual well-being of his subjects and the Church over which he ruled as summus episcopus. He was scarcely touched by the ideals of the northern humanists or the reformers.

See Also: REFORMATION, PROTESTANT (IN THE BRITISH ISLES).

Bibliography: J. S. BREWER et al., eds, Letters and Papers . . . of the Reign of Henry VIII, 22 v. (London 1862–1932), basic work. G. R. ELTON, Henry VIII (London 1962); Tudor Revolution in Government (Cambridge, England 1959). A. F. POLLARD, Henry VIII (New York 1951); Wolsey (New York 1929). P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963). D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, England 1948–60) v.3. C. READ, ed., Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485–1603 (2d ed. Oxford 1959), for a complete bibliog. J. D. MACKIE, The Earlier Tudors, 1485–1558 (New York 1952). J. W. ALLEN, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (3d ed. rev. New York 1957). S. T. BINDOFF, Tudor England (Baltimore 1952). H. M. SMITH, Henry VIII and the Reformation (London 1948). F. M. POWICKE, The Reformation in England (New York 1941). K. PICKTHORN, Early Tudor Government: Henry VIII (Cambridge, England 1934). G. BASKERVILLE, English Monks and the Suppression of the Monasteries (London 1940). G. MATTINGLY, Catherine of Aragon (Boston 1941). L. B. SMITH, Tudor Prelates and Politics, 1536–1558 (Princeton 1953). W. G. ZEEVELD, Foundations of Tudor Policy (Cambridge, MA 1948). F. HACKETT, Henry the Eighth (New York 1929), a psychological study. G. R. ELTON, Reform and Reformation: England 1509–1558 (Cambridge, MA 1977). J. J. SCARISBRICK, Henry VIII (Berkeley 1968). L. B. SMITH, Henry VIII: The Mask of Royalty (Boston 1971). R. M. WARNICKE, The Rise and Fall of Anne Boleyn (Cambridge 1989).

[J. J. SCARISBRICK]

HENRY IV, KING OF FRANCE

The French king who ended the religious wars and began the Bourbon dynasty; b. Pau (Basses Pyrénées), Dec. 14, 1553; d. Paris, May 14, 1610. Henry, a direct descendant of St. Louis IX, was born to Antoine de Bourbon, the duke of Vendôme, and Jeanne d'Albret, the queen of Navarre. Although baptized a Roman Catholic, Henry was instructed as a Protestant upon his mother's wishes, and in 1568 he joined the Huguenot forces of Gaspard Coligny at La Rochelle. Upon the death of his mother (1572), he became king of Navarre and married Margaret de Valois, the sister of Charles IX. The marriage celebrations were marred by the ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY MASSACRE (Aug. 24, 1572). Henry abjured Protestantism at this time, but in 1576 he rejoined the Huguenot forces, and by the treaty of Beaulieu he was given the government of Guienne. Although he became heir presumptive to the throne in 1584 following the death of the duke d'Anjou, brother of Henry III, he was declared ineligible by the Treaty of Nemours (1585). His exclusion from the succession was also declared by a bull of Sixtus V on Sept. 9, 1585, but parlement, reacting against papal interference, refused its publication. The assassination of Henry III on Aug. 1, 1589, brought the succession issue to a climax.

Struggle for the Crown. The Holy League, composed of Catholic nobles, lawyers, bourgeois, and townspeople, and supported by the Guise family and encouraged by Spain, made the reluctant Cardinal Charles de Bourbon, Prince de Condé, King Charles X. Meanwhile, Henry tried to take Paris by force of arms, winning victories at Arques (1589) and at Ivry (1590), but failing before reaching Paris. The cardinal's death on May 9, 1590, undermined opposition to Henry's claims. Actually, few bishops had supported the Holy League, and with growing suspicion of Spanish aims, moderate members of the league hoped that the religious obstacle to Henry's recognition could be removed. On Sept. 21, 1591, an assembly of prelates at Chartres rejected the bull of excommunication sent the preceding March by Sixtus V. Since Henry's conversion to Catholicism was indispensable to his acceptance as sovereign, Jacques Davy DUPERRON, soon to be consecrated bishop of Evreux (1595), instructed him for several months. Renaud de Beaune, Archbishop of Bourges, convened a number of prelates in July of 1593 to give the final instructions and to question Henry on the Catholic religion.

Abjuration of Protestantism. On July 25 at Saint-Denis, amidst great pomp, the king abjured the Protestant religion. Negotiations to remove the last obstacle to Henry's reception into the Church were conducted with the papacy by Duperron, Arnaud d' OSSAT, Cardinal Jean de Gondi, and Alexandre Georges, SJ. On Sept. 17, 1595, Clement VIII gave Henry papal absolution upon the promise that the king's heir would be reared a Catholic, monasteries would be established throughout France in reparation for those destroyed, the Council of Trent would be proclaimed, and Catholic worship would be introduced into Huguenot towns. On April 13, 1598, at Nantes, Henry issued an edict of tolerance designed to resolve the Huguenot question. While not establishing complete equality, the edict granted freedom of conscience, civil liberty, freedom of worship in many areas, and a measure of personal security to Protestants (see NANTES, EDICT OF). On Dec. 17, 1599, Henry's marriage to Margaret of Valois was dissolved by papal decree, and on Oct. 5, 1600, he married Marie de Médicis. She gave birth to the future Louis XIII on September 27, 1601. The other royal children were Gaston, the duke of Orléans; Elizabeth, who married Philip IV of Spain; Christine, the duchess of Savoy, and Henrietta, who married Charles I of England.

Policies of State. Henry's greatness rests on his success in restoring order and tranquility to France after years of religious and political strife complicated by foreign interference. Henry's victory over the Spaniards at Fontaine-Française (1595) and his capture of Amiens brought Philip II to sign the peace of Vervins on May 2, 1598. This enabled Henry to devote his full energies to domestic affairs. Maximilien de Béthune, the duke of

Henry IV, King of France.

Sully (1560–1641), a staunch Huguenot and devoted servant of Henry, collaborated on the plan of rebuilding France. Finances were brought into order, taxes collected, a system of careful accounting instituted, and care taken in approving expenditures. Important advances were made in agriculture and industry. Canals and highways were constructed and the overseas explorations into Canada by Samuel de Champlain encouraged.

Henry strengthened royal power through a program that was continued by Cardinal RICHELIEU under Louis XIII and brought to eminence by LOUIS XIV. Determined to concentrate authority in his hands, he cajoled parlement into obedience, strictly supervised local administrations, and brought recalcitrant nobles into line. His son inherited a country ready to follow enlightened leadership. In foreign affairs, Henry aimed to make France a power by counterbalancing the Hapsburgs. To this end, alliances were undertaken with Sweden, many Swiss cantons, the duke of Lorraine, and leaders of Protestant states in Germany. To prevent Emperor Rudolf II from occupying the duchies of Cleves and Juliers, he assembled an army of 35,000 men for the campaign that he intended to start on May 19, 1610. On May 14 the king was assassinated by François Ravaillac.

Bibliography: HENRY IV, KING OF FRANCE, Receuil des lettres missives de Henry IV, ed. J. BERGER DE XIVREY and J. GUADET, 9

v. (Paris 1843–76); Oeuvres . . . lettres et harangues (Paris 1941). LEO XI, Lettres du Cardinal de Florence sur Henri IV et sur la France, ed. R. RITTER (Paris 1955). P. DE L'ESTOILE, Journal pour le règne de Henri IV, ed. L. LEFÈVRE and A. MARTIN, 2 v. (Paris 1948–58). P. FERET, Les Grandes figures de l'histoire: Henri IV et l'Église (Paris 1875). R. RITTER, Henri IV lui-même: L'Homme (Paris 1944). C. M. DE LACOMBE, Henri IV et sa politique (Paris 1860). F. T. PERRENS, L'Église et l'État en France sous le règne de Henri IV . . ., 2 v. (Paris 1872). A. POIRSON, Histoire du règne de Henri IV, 4 v. (2d ed. Paris 1862–67). P. DE VAISSIÈRE, Henri IV (Paris 1928). P. F. WILLERT, Henry of Navarre and the Huguenots in France (New York 1893). M. REINHARD, Henri IV, ou la France sauvée (Paris 1958). P. ERLANGER, St. Bartholomew's Night . . ., tr. P. O'BRIAN (New York 1962). H. PEARSON, Henry of Navarre . . . (New York 1963).

[D. R. PENN]

HENRY II, ROMAN EMPEROR, ST.

Reigned from June 7, 1002 until July 13, 1024; b. Bavaria or Hildesheim (?), May 6, 973; d. Grona by Göttingen, Germany. The son of Duke Henry II, the Quarrelsome, of Bavaria, and Gisela, daughter of King Conrad of Burgundy, and the great grandson of King Henry I of Germany, Henry received his earliest education from Bishop Abraham of Freising. Later, he began a clerical education at the cathedral school of Hildesheim, and he finished his education in Bavaria with Bishop Wolfgang of Regensburg, by whom he was introduced to the monastic reform emanating from Lotharingia. In 995, upon his father's death, he became Duke Henry IV of Bavaria and a loyal supporter of his second cousin Emperor Otto III. He married (995–97/1000) Kunigunde, countess of Luxembourg. After Otto III's death, Henry contended for the throne and had himself elected and anointed king in June at Mainz by Archbishop Willigis. Henry II's significance as king lay in his attempts to establish undiminished royal power over secular princes, his complex and manifold relations with the church, his efforts to integrate the realm, and his elevation of a sacral notion of rulership to a new height, which one finds expressed verbally, visually, and liturgically in the sources. He received the imperial coronation in Rome from Benedict VIII on Feb. 14, 1014.

Henry II's elevation to kingship did not come easily. In January 1002, when Otto III died in Italy without an heir, three main candidates emerged for the German throne. Of these, Henry had the strongest hereditary claim to succession, yet a large part of the nobility opposed Henry or did not initially support his candidacy. To fortify his position, Henry seized the regalia, including the Holy Lance, from the entourage bearing Otto III's body from Italy to Aachen through Bavaria, and in a series of ritual acts he played the role of next of kin and presumptive successor to the throne. Despite the opposition, Henry managed to have himself elected, anointed, and crowned king at Mainz in June by a small but influential group of nobles and churchmen. Thereafter, he achieved final recognition on the battlefield and made his first royal progress (Umritt) through the realm. On this progress, Henry had his election and kingship acclaimed and formally recognized by the peoples of the several duchies through a ritual repetition of ceremonial and constitutive acts.

In Henry II's foreign policy, three areas stand out: his long protracted feud or war with Boleslav Chrobry of Poland, his alterations of Otto III's policies regarding Italy and imperial ambitions, and his efforts to stabilize the West and establish the hereditary claim of the German king to the kingdom of Burgundy. One can argue that under Henry II the eastern borders of the German kingdom began to stabilize, the missionary expansion of the tenth century slowed, and Henry pursued an imperial policy within achievable limits. Henry's hostilities with Boleslav lasted most of his reign and drove him to ally with the heathen Liutizi against the Christian Boleslav. Henry's contemporaries criticized him harshly, and this criticism, coupled with the half-hearted support given Henry by the Saxon nobility, muted his effectiveness. He had to settle for compromises in 1005, 1013, and 1018, which granted Boleslav lands in the East as fiefs, yet curtailed Boleslav's takeover of Bohemia.

Henry's policies in Italy mark a pronounced shift of emphasis, of his rulership in comparison to his Ottonian predecessors. Whereas Otto III spent over fifty percent of his reign in Italy, Henry spent only seven percent of his reign there. He made only three trips to Italy, in 1004 to foil Arduin's usurpation of the Italian kingship, in 1013–14 to support Pope Benedict VIII by reissuing the Privilegium Ottonianum and to acquire the imperial coronation, and in 1022 to reassert imperial dominion over Capua and Salerno in the face of Byzantine advances in southern Italy. Despite his infrequent visits to Italy, Henry's charters, regardless of where issued, document intensive rulership activity there. Finally, Henry's initiatives in Burgundy set the stage for the acquisition of that kingdom by his successor, Conrad II.

Henry II's internal policies developed from his concept of a divinely ordained kingship with undiminished royal power in both the secular and the ecclesiastical spheres. Henry strengthened the authority of the king over German dukes, princes, and prelates, systematically augmented the wealth and the political and economic servitium regis of bishoprics and royal monasteries, and supported a general reform movement in the Church. Attempting to break up concentrations of princely power, Henry moved with varying success against dukes and princes alike. He managed to integrate the southern duchies more fully into the realm, to diminish the power of numerous magnates, and often to empower churchmen in their place. Henry's enrichment and empowerment of royal churches, both episcopal and monastic foundations, came with significant increases in royal dominion over these institutions, especially the king's right to invest, sometimes even appoint, bishops, abbots, and abbesses, and to employ candidates from the royal chapel in ecclesiastical positions throughout the realm. Thus, he used the royal church as well as itinerant kingship to bolster his power and to integrate the realm.

Nevertheless, Henry took his divinely conceded obligations seriously. He participated in monastic and episcopal prayer fraternities and became a canon in several cathedral chapters. The reinstatement of the bishopric of Merseburg (1004) and the foundation of the bishopric Bamberg (1007) count as Henry's greatest ecclesiastical achievements. He also founded numerous monasteries and imposed a Lotharingian-based monastic reform on many powerful royal monasteries. Finally, he took active part in numerous German synods and with the pope in general reforming synods of 1014 and 1022. He died in 1024 at the royal residence of Grone and received burial in the cathedral at Bamberg. Soon after his death legends began to circulate about the chastity of his marriage and his religious character. When Pope Eugene III canonized him in 1146, Henry became the sole medieval German king to be so honored.

Feast: July 15; in the diocese of Bamberg, July 13.

Bibliography: ADALBERT, Die Vita sancti Heinrici regis et confessoris und ihre Bearbeitung durch den Bamberger Diakon Adelbert, ed. M. STUMPF, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores rerum Germanicarum 69 (Hanover 1999). ADALBOLD, Vita Heinrici, ed. H. VAN RIJ, Nederlandse Historische Bronnen 3 (Amsterdam 1983). Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Diplomata regum et imperatorum Germaniae 3: Heinrici II. et Arduini Diplomata, ed. H. BRESSLAU (Hanover 1900–03). J. F. BÖHMER, Regesta Imperii 2 (Sächsisches Haus 919–1024)/4: Die Regesten des Kaiserreiches unter Heinrich II. 1002–1024, new ed. by T. GRAFF (Vienna 1971). S. HIRSCH, Jahrbücher des Deutschen Reiches unter Heinrich II., 3 v. (Berlin 1862–75 repr. 1975). H. HOFFMANN, Mönchskönig und rex idiota: Studien zur Kirchenpolitik Heinrichs II. und Konrads II (Monumenta Germaniae Historica Studien und Texte 8; Hanover 1993). R. KLAUSER, Der Heinrichs- und Kunigundenkult im mittelalterlichen Bamberg. Historischer Verein Bamberg, Berichte 95 (Bamberg 1957). B. SCHNEIDMÜLLER and S. WEINFURTER, eds. Otto III. und Heinrich II.: Eine Wende?, Mittelalter-Forschungen 1. (Sigmaringen 1997). R. FOLZ, "Le légende liturgique de saint Henri II, empereur et confesseur." Clio et son regard. Mélanges d'histoire, d'histoire de l'art et d'archéologie offerts à Jacques Stiennon, ed. R. LEJEUNE and J. DECKERS (Liège 1982), 245–58. A. WOLF, "Quasi hereditatem inter filios: Zur Kontroverse über das Königswahlrecht im Jahre 1002 und die Genealogie der Conradiner." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung, Germanistische Abteilung 112 (1995): 64–157. Kaiser Heinrich II. und seine Zeit in Historischer Verein Bamberg, Bericht 133 (1997). S. WEINFURTER, Heinrich II. Herrscher am Ende der Zeiten (Regensburg 1999).

[J. BERNHARDT]

HENRY III, ROMAN EMPEROR

June 4, 1039 to Oct. 5, 1056; son of CONRAD II and Gisella; b. Osterbeck, Oct. 28, 1017. His father named him his successor in 1026, and he was crowned as joint king in 1028. Following a good education, he was married (1036) to Gunhild (d. 1038), the daughter of CANUTE OF ENGLAND AND DENMARK; in 1043, after the death of Gunhild, he married Agnes of Poitou (d. 1077). In 1038 he became Duke of Swabia, and the following year he succeeded his father. During the more than 15 years of his reign, Henry demonstrated his deep concern for the future of the German monarchy and for the reform of the Church. The new king's first task was to enlarge and consolidate the royal domains. He attempted to retain control and to administer personally Swabia, Bavaria, and Carinthia, but he was finally forced to rule through elected dukes. He came to rely upon such ecclesiastical princes of the Empire as ADALBERT OF BREMEN, with the result that he has been blamed for weakening the monarchy, for whose future he had such genuine anxiety. Too often, the bishops he trusted betrayed his confidence and acted from motives as base as those of the turbulent lay nobility. Despite Henry's efforts at enforcing the PEACE OF GOD, private war flourished throughout his reign. Nevertheless, his efforts were rewarded, since Bratislav I did homage for his Duchy of Bohemia in 1041. Subsequently, Henry received the homage of King Peter of Hungary.

Both Henry and his second wife Agnes were persons of deep piety. Agnes' family had founded the monastery of Cluny, where the reform movement of the tenth century began. In 1046 Henry's interest in the reform in the Church took him to Italy to settle the question of papal succession, disputed by three claimants: Benedict IX, Sylvester III, and Gregory VI. For Henry sincerely believed that a healthy papacy was fundamental for a reformed Church. At Piacenza in November, Henry met Gregory, who greeted him with full honors. Nevertheless, Henry brought about the deposition of Gregory and Sylvester in a synod at Sutri and declared Benedict deposed at a later synod in Rome. He then selected a bishop from his retinue, Suidger of Bamberg to the throne of St. Peter. Suidger, who took the name Clement II, crowned Henry and Agnes emperor and empress on Christmas Day 1046. Clement also granted Henry the title Patricius Romanorum, which gave ecclesiastical sanction to his role as the defender of the Church. Henry's influence was paramount in the selection of the three popes after Clement II, the most important of whom was LEO IX. At his accession in 1049, the imperial effort at reform was reinforced by vigorous, intelligent pope, who spent most of his five-year pontificate traveling throughout Europe in an attempt to correct ecclesiastical abuses.

Henry's final journey to Italy, in 1055, when he accompanied Pope VICTOR II for his coronation, was marked by his failure to gain the submission of the Count of Tuscany, a failure pregnant with significance for future relations between the papacy and the Empire. Henry died at Bodfeld and was buried in the cathedral of Speyer. His heir was a mere boy; and the great edifice of Empire, which he had defended, had no protector.

Henry's legacy is ambivalent. He certainly succeeded in freeing the papacy from the control of Roman aristocrats, who, if the reformers' reports are to be believed, used the institution only for their own material advantage. In contrast, between 1046 and 1057 there were five German popes, but inspired by the reform movement, which was very strong north of the Alps, the papacy was not about to develop into an imperial chaplaincy. The popes took the opportunity that the minority of his son Henry IV provided to assert their independence of the empire and of lay control. In doing so they struck at the foundation of the very institution that been instrumental in initiating ecclesiastical reform, since control of the Church was integral to the success of the imperial government. In strengthening the papacy, Henry weakened the throne upon which his successors would sit. But the future seems clear only in retrospect. Henry approached his obligations with a high seriousness and fulfilled them with considerable skill. His premature death at the age of 39 and the events that flowed from it were not within his ability to foresee.

Bibliography: E. L. H. STEINDORFF, Jahrbücher des deutschen Reichs unter Heinrich III, 2 v. (Leipzig 1874–81). P. F. KEHR, Vier Kapitel aus der Geschichte Kaiser Heinrichs III (Berlin 1931). G. LADNER, Theologie und Politik vor dem Investiturstreit (Baden bei Wien 1936). T. SCHIEFFER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:180. M. L. BULSTHIELE, Kaiserin Agnes (Hildesheim 1972). K. HAMPE, Germany under the Salian and Hohenstaufen Emperors (Oxford 1973). H. FUHRMANN, Germany in the High Middle Ages, c. 1050–1200, tr. T. REUTER (Cambridge 1986). J. FLECKENSTEIN, ed., Investiturstreit und Reichsverfassung (Sigmaringen 1973). R. SCHIEFFER, Die Entstehung des päpstlichen Investiturstreits für den deutschen König, (Stuttgart 1981). U.-R. BLUMENTHAL, The Investiture Controversy: Church and Monarchy from the Ninth to the Twelfth Century (Philadelphia 1988).

[J. M. POWELL/T. E. CARSON]

HENRY IV, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned 1056 to Aug. 7, 1106; b. Goslar, Germany, Nov. 11, 1050; d. Liège, buried Speyer. In 1056, on the death of his father, HENRY III, he obtained the throne under the regency of his mother, Agnes of Poitou, and of ANNO OF COLOGNE and ADALBERT OF BREMEN. After reaching his majority in 1065, he married Bertha of Saxony and inaugurated a policy aimed at extending the royal power, which had declined during the regency. The INVESTITURE struggle arose out of Henry's concern over the weakening of his power over the German bishops, who exercised broad authority and influence in the empire, and over his unwillingness to accommodate the principles of the GREGORIAN reform.

The revolt of Saxony in 1073 had led to stern measures of repression on Henry's part, including the imprisonment of rebellious Saxon bishops. Moreover, the period of the regency had witnessed the return of open simony. GREGORY VII, elected in 1073, decided to take a firm hand in these matters. In 1075 he promulgated his decree against lay investiture and stated his theory of papal control over the bishops. Henry regarded this act as an invasion of his rights, ignored the pope, and intervened in episcopal elections in Milan. The papal legates summoned Henry to Rome. The emperor's response was the deposition of the Pope at Worms, supported by the majority of the German hierarchy (Jan. 24, 1076), an act later ratified by a meeting of North Italian bishops. Undeterred, Gregory excommunicated the emperor (February 14), forbidding his subjects in Germany and Italy to do him homage, thus virtually inviting the restive German nobility to rebel. This move was successful and Henry was ordered to appear before a German synod to be presided over by the pope and set for February 1077. He anticipated this unwelcome meeting by hastening to Canossa, where he did penance and received the absolution of the pope (Jan. 28, 1077). But the German princes, bent on preventing further growth of royal authority, ignored the reconciliation and elected Rudolf of Swabia as king. Henry faced a civil war. Again excommunicated by Gregory in May 1080, the emperor deposed the pope anew and secured the election of GUIBERT OF RAVENNA as Antipope Clement III. He then turned his attention to Rome. In June 1083 he entered the Leonine City and was crowned emperor in St. Peter's by Clement (Easter 1084). With the arrival of Robert Guiscard and the NORMANS, Henry was forced to suspend operations. He returned to Germany, where Herman of Luxembourg, chosen successor to Rudolf, led the opposition. Henry's war with Gregory continued as a propaganda struggle until the pope died in 1085. After the brief reign of VICTOR III, Henry renewed his quarrel with URBAN II. But revolt by his son Conrad (d. 1101) forced him to abandon Italy and his antipope. His attempt to arrange terms with PASCAL II failed, and he found himself once more excommunicated in 1102. Finally, his son HENRY V revolted successfully in 1104, and Henry died in battle against him. His attempt to increase royal authority in the midst of the Gregorian reform ended in his own defeat and in the weakening of the empire.

Bibliography: G. MEYER VON KNONAU, Jahrbücher des deutschen Reiches unter Heinrich IV und Heinrich V, 7 v. (Leipzig 1890–1909). T. LINDNER, Kaiser Heinrich IV (Berlin 1881). K. HAMPE, Deutsche Kaisergeschichte in der Zeit der Salier und Staufer, ed. F. BAETHGEN (10th ed. Heidelberg 1949). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v.8. B. SCHMEIDLER, Kaiser Heinrich IV und seine Helfer im Investiturstreit (Leipzig 1927). G. TELLENBACH, Church, State and Christian Society at the Time of Investiture Contest (Oxford 1959). K. F. MORRISON, "Canossa: A Revision," Traditio 18 (1962) 121–148.

[J. M. POWELL]

HENRY V, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned Jan. 5, 1106, to May 23, 1125; b. Turin, 1081; d. Utrecht. The son of HENRY IV and Bertha, he was elected German king in 1098 in place of his brother Conrad. He deposed his excommunicated father in 1106 and was crowned emperor in 1111. This scheming, crafty ruler, so adroit in negotiation, was widely respected but loved by none. He pursued his father's policy of intransigence toward the papacy, though in a different fashion. He employed nobles in government and invested even more prelates than his father, meanwhile neglecting the rising communes and the ministeriales. In 1111 when he was in Rome for his coronation, his ferocious conduct moved Pope PASCAL II to decree the Church's abandonment of all REGALIA, although this act was almost immediately repudiated by a Church synod. After Henry suffered crushing defeats by German rebels both lay and ecclesiastical in 1116, he could no longer withstand demands that he negotiate with CALLISTUS II to resolve the empire-papacy struggle (see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE). The resulting Concordat of WORMS (Sept. 23, 1122) recognized the validity of the ruler's claim in both the regalian rights and in the ecclesiastical character of the same prelate. The Diet of Bamberg made the concordat imperial law and the LATERAN COUNCIL of 1123 gave it canonical validity. Henry was defeated by the Saxons in his last year, and the electors, headed by his foe, Abp. Adalbert of Mainz, rejected the childless Henry's candidate for king and substituted Duke Lothair of Saxony. This marked the end of Salian monarchy. Thus it was demonstrated that the imperial constitution was now controlled by the aristocracy and that the hereditary principle had yielded to election in choosing the Roman emperor.

Henry V, Roman Emperor.

Bibliography: G. MEYER VON KNONAU, Jahrbücher des deutschen Reiches unter Heinrich IV. und Heinrich V., 7 v. (Leipzig 1890–1909), v.6, 7. Cambridge Medieval History 5:154–166. C. W. PREVITÉ-ORTON, The Shorter Cambridge Medieval History, 2 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1952) 1:469–500. A. HOFMEISTER, Das Wormser Konkordat. Zum Streit um seine Bedeutung, mit einer textkritischen Beilage, new edition with foreword by R. SCHMIDT (Darmstadt 1962). K. HAMPE, Germany under the Salian and Hohenstaufen Emperors (Oxford 1973). H. FUHRMANN, Germany in the High Middle Ages, c. 1050–1200, tr. T. REUTER (Cambridge 1986). J. FLECKENSTEIN, ed., Investiturstreit und Reichsverfassung (Sigmaringen 1973). R. SCHIEFFER, Die Entstehung des päpstlichen Investitungsverbots für den deutschen König. (Stuttgart 1981). U.-R. BLUMENTHAL, The Investiture Controversy: Church and Monarchy from the Ninth to the Twelfth Century (Philadelphia 1988).

[S. WILLIAMS]

HENRY VII, HOLY ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned Nov. 27, 1308, to Aug. 24, 1313; b. Henry IV of Luxembourg, between 1269 and 1279. Henry was chosen king of the Romans and emperor-elect after the assassination of Albert of Hapsburg. He was crowned in ceremonies held at Aachen on Jan. 6, 1309. He proved himself an able diplomat north of the Alps and founded his dynasty's fortunes. In Italy Henry failed. Arriving in

Henry VII, Holy Roman Emperor.

October of 1310, he had intended to arbitrate internecine disputes, pacify imperial Italy, and establish imperial rule and administration, as well as be crowned emperor. His attempts to rule, however, generated Italian opposition, especially among dominant northern Guelf lords and cities, and Tuscan communes led by FLORENCE. A lengthy siege of Brescia demonstrated his weakness, because he had to rely on local lords, especially Ghibellines, for military support, and unwillingly assumed a partisan role. Pope CLEMENT V at Avignon turned against Henry, and Robert of Anjou, king of Naples, rebelled. Henry entered Rome by force, and was crowned emperor, June 29, 1312. A six-week siege of Florence ended unsuccessfully on Oct. 31, 1312. In August 1313, Henry left Pisa to invade Naples, but died of malaria at Buonconvento, near Siena. His was the last sincere attempt of a Holy Roman emperor to establish imperial rule in Italy. The medieval Christian Empire had proven unable to defeat the combination of city-states, lay kingdoms, and a secularly oriented Avignon papacy. Henry was the “alto Arrigo” (high Henry) of Dante’s Divine Comedy.

Bibliography: W. M. BOWSKY, Henry VII in Italy: The Conflict of Empire and City-State, 1310–1313 (Lincoln, NE 1960). F. COGNASSO, “L’unificazione di Lombardia sotto Milano,” Storia di Milano, ed. G. TRECCANI DEGLI ALFIERI (Milan 1953–) 5:3–99. R.

DAVIDSOHN, Geschichte von Florenz, 4 v. (Berlin 1896–1927) 3:345–552.

[W. M. BOWSKY]

HENRY HEINBUCHÉ OF LANGENSTEIN

Conciliarist and theologian; b. Marburg, Germany, c. 1330; d. Vienna, Austria, Feb. 11, 1397. Entering the University of Paris in 1358, he became a master of arts in 1363 and taught and wrote on astronomy until he joined the theological faculty, subsequently becoming doctor of theology in 1375. He remained as a professor of Holy Scripture and became vice chancellor in 1378, the year the WESTERN SCHISM began. His Epistola pacis [ed. Von der Hardt, Magnum oecumenicum Constantiense concilium (Frankfurt 1697) 2:2–60] of May 1379 appears to be the first treatise to recommend the convocation of a general COUNCIL either by both popes or the cardinals, or by the whole episcopate. During the indecision of the new French monarch, Charles VI (d. 1422), the doctors of the university in a solemn session of May 20, 1384, declared for a general council and may have directed Henry to address all secular princes through his Epistola concilii pacis [ed. E. du Pin, Opera Gersonii (Anvers 1706) 2:809–840]. He then argued that the plight of the Church passed the norms in Canon Law and required extraordinary measures, for the Church in its totality must make its voice heard in a general council even if it must be summoned, not by papal authority, but by secular princes. The requirement was added, perhaps from the work of another German doctor, CONRAD OF GELNHAUSEN, that the Church must be reformed in capite et in membris, or totally and completely. The French political pressure that invaded the university sent Henry into exile, along with others of his fellow doctors, and he settled in a monastery at EBERBACH, from which he was summoned in 1380 by Albert III (d. 1395) to reconstitute the University of Vienna. Henry drew up the constitution of the university, which was established in 1384 by a ducal charter and a bull of URBAN VI. He was its most celebrated professor of theology and also served as its rector (1393–94). Three more works from his Vienna years show his continuing devotion to the cause of the Church and the papacy: Contra Telesphorum (1392, in B. PEZ, Thesaurus anecdotorum novissimus 26:505–564) against a propaganda prophecy by a Calabrian hermit; a poem Carmen pro pace (1393, ed. A. Kneer, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte, 1 suppl., 1893, 127–129) against the Avignonese pope; and Epistola de cathedra Petri (1395, ed. A. Kneer, op. cit. 134–145). Only a portion of Henry's varied and penetrating works has been printed as indicated (see BIBLIOG.) by Pastor, Valois, and Heilig. He was an exegete and commented on Genesis (still unpublished). Some of his writings on ascetical theology and the Immaculate Conception have been printed only in part. He was an early translator of hymns and Psalms into German, and left the first Hebrew grammar known to be composed by a German. He can certainly be counted among the Christian humanists of the dawning Renaissance, and may yet receive other laurels as his work on the natural sciences becomes better known.

Bibliography: C. J. JELLOUSCHEK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:190–191. J. ZEMB, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 8.2:2574–76. K. J. HEILIG, Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte 40 (1932) 105–176. N. VALOIS, Le France et le grand schisme d'Occident, 4 v. (Paris 1896–1902). K. HIRSCH, Die Ausbildung der konziliaren Theorie im XIV. Jahrhundert (Vienna 1903) 55–76. J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme 5:617–618.

[S. WILLIAMS]

HENRY MURDAC

Cistercian monk, archbishop of York; d. Sherborne, England, Oct. 14, 1153. Henry, who first appears among the clergy of York, was invited to CLAIRVAUX by St. BERNARD, and there he embraced monastic life. In 1135 he was sent to Vauclair in the Diocese of Laon, France, with 12 monks to establish a monastery of which he became abbot. Before long he came into sharp conflict with the abbot of a neighboring Premonstratensian house, thus revealing the pugnacity and contentiousness that were to mar his later years. On the death of the abbot of FOUNTAINS, in England, Bernard dispatched Henry there to advise on the filling of the office. Murdac was himself elected and, on Bernard's instructions, accepted. During his short term of office, Fountains reached a new peak of vigor and fruitfulness: five daughterhouses were founded (four in England and Lysekloster in Norway), greater conformity to the severe discipline of Clairvaux was imposed, and the prosperity of the abbey increased. Intervening vigorously in the disputes that divided the CATHEDRAL CHAPTER and See of York, where the appointment of WILLIAM FITZHERBERT as archbishop had aroused bitter conflict, Murdac found himself attacked by Fitzherbert's party, which sacked and burned his abbey church and reduced the monastery to ruins. Murdac at once set about rebuilding. Present at the council in Paris in 1147, when Pope Eugene III deprived Fitzherbert, Murdac crossed again to France when the chapter's vote proved indecisive. Favored for York by Bernard and the Cistercian pope, he was received with honor at Trier, consecrated on December 7, and presented with the PALLIUM. Upon returning home he met with King STEPHEN's resentment, the confiscation of his prebends, and the hostility of his clergy and the populace. He retired to RIPON; and it was only after several years of fulmination and violence that the parties were reconciled and he was at last enthroned (January 1153). Before long another quarrel broke out, this time with DURHAM. Riots at York drove the archbishop to flight, and though the quarrel was soon patched up, he never returned alive to York. He was buried in York Minster. Murdac was a man of high integrity, personal austerity, and noble ideals, but severe, unyielding, and intolerant. Yet he enjoyed the uninterrupted sympathy and support of St. Bernard and raised the Cistercians in England to new heights of influence and achievement.

See Also: CISTERCIANS.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 2 (1863) 136–144. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Epistolae 106, 206, 320, 321; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) v.182. W. H. DIXON, Fasti Eboracenses, ed. J. RAINE (London 1863) 310–320, 320–333. The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 13:1218–20; 1908) 7:173–176, summary of the conflict in York. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 255–257.

[J. H. BAXTER]

HENRY OF BLOIS

Cluniac monk and bishop of Winchester; b. c. 1090–1100; d. Aug. 8, 1171. Henry, the most influential individual in the English Church between ANSELM OF CANTERBURY and Thomas BECKET, exemplified both the virtue and the weakness of CLUNY in his day. He was the fourth son of Stephen, Count of Blois, grandson of William the Conqueror, and brother of King STEPHEN OF ENGLAND. From boyhood he was educated at Cluny, where he formed a lifelong friendship with PETER THE VENERABLE. Henry I invited him to England as abbot of GLASTONBURY in 1126 and appointed him bishop of WINCHESTER in 1129; by papal dispensation he held both offices until his death, and from 1139 he was also dean of St. Martin-le-Grand, London. As abbot and bishop he won the respect of his monks and clergy. He was a remarkable administrator, who reorganized the estates and finances of Glastonbury and Winchester; a GREGORIAN REFORMER on political rather than moral lines; a great builder; and a munificent benefactor. He failed to secure papal consent for his translation to the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1136; but his appointment as papal legate from 1136 to 1143 made him in some ways superior to Archbishop THEOBALD. He attempted unsuccessfully to secure metropolitan status for the See of Winchester. In politics he played a dominant part in the struggle for the throne. He crowned Stephen in 1135 and, apart from a brief defection to Matilda in 1141, gave him powerful support while upholding the independence of the Church. On King HENRY II's accession in 1154 he left England for Cluny, where he reorganized the abbey's finances. After his return in 1158 he exerted a moderating influence, striving especially to keep the peace between Henry II and the new archbishop, Thomas Becket.

Bibliography: ADAM OF DOMERHAM, Historia de rebus gestis Glastoniensibus, ed. T. HEARNE, 2 v. (London 1727) 305–331. The Letters of John of Salisbury, ed. W. J. MILLOR and H. E. BUTLER, rev. C. N. L. BROOKE (New York 1955–) 1:253–256, passim. The Historia Pontificalis of John of Salisbury, ed. and tr. M. CHIBNALL (New York 1956) 78–80, 91–94. L. VOSS, Heinrich von Blois, Bischof von Winchester, 1129–71 (Historische Studien 210; Berlin 1932). D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962) 282–298. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 624–625.

[M. M. CHIBNALL]

HENRY OF BOLZANO, BL.

Ascetic; b. Bolzano, Italy, c. 1250; d. Treviso, Italy, June 10, 1315. Having moved to Treviso with his wife and son, Henry (or Rigo) began, after their deaths, to live in extreme poverty, devoting himself to humble trades, prayer and penance, and also, in his last years, to almsgiving. As he was famed for his holiness at the time of his death, large crowds attended his funeral, and his tomb in the cathedral of Treviso was a constant goal of pilgrimages for more than a year. Many miraculous cures were attributed to him, and a commission of bishops established some 346 of them in the space of a short time on the testimony of eyewitnesses. Among these witnesses was the Paduan Peter of Baone (d. c. 1383), later bishop of Treviso, who wrote a biography of Henry in 1381. BENEDICT XIV confirmed the cult for the Diocese of Treviso, and PIUS VII extended it to that of Trent.

Feast: June 10.

Bibliography: B. BONIFACCIO, Il beato Enrico Trivigiano, panegirico sacro (Treviso 1653); Acta Sanctorum June 2:363–386. I. ROGGER, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961–) 4:1226–27. Il beato Enrico da Bolzano nella sua vita e nel suo culto (Treviso 1915). Analecta Bollandiana 45 (1927) 443. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:520–521. R. DEGLI AZZONI AVOGARO, Memorie del beato Enrico, 2 v. (Venice 1760). A. TSCHÖLL, Die Heiligen und Seligen Tirols, v.2 (Austria sancta 6; Vienna 1910).

[M. MONACO]

HENRY OF BONN, BL.

Rhineland noble; b. c. 1100; d. Lisbon, 1147. Henry set out from Cologne on April 27, 1147, for the Second CRUSADE. He was among those who en route responded to the plea of Alphonso I of Portugal to help free Lisbon from the Saracens. Henry fell during the siege of Lisbon. After his burial near St. Vincent's church, miracles were reported at his grave, leading to his veneration as a martyr.

Feast: Oct. 18 or 25.

Bibliography: Academia das Sciencias de Lisboa, Portugaliae monumenta historica (Lisbon 1856–), Scriptores v.1. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 8:281. O. PFÜLF, "Die Heerfahrt des sel. Heinrich von Bonn . . ." Stimmen aus Maria-Laach 47 (1894) 24–48. J. TORSY, ed., Lexikon der deutschen Heiligen . . . (Cologne 1959).

[D. ANDREINI]

HENRY OF CLAIRVAUX, BL.

Cistercian abbot, cardinal; a.k.a. Henricus Gallus; b. at the Burgundian castle of Marcy; d. Arras, France, Jan. 1, 1189, buried at Clairvaux. He became a CISTERCIAN in 1155, abbot of HAUTecombe in 1160, and abbot of CLAIRVAUX in 1176. He served the popes by a mission to Abp. Henry of Reims (1162) and by reconciling King HENRY II OF ENGLAND with the Church of Canterbury (1178). Since 1178 he had been active in reconciling the ALBIGENSES; in 1181—by then cardinal bishop of Albano—he assumed leadership of that mission. He refused election to the papacy in 1187, preferring to dedicate himself to preaching a new CRUSADE. He persuaded FREDERICK BARBAROSSA to take the cross along with thousands of Germans (1188); before his death, he had arranged for treaties between France and England and enrolled Philip Augustus and Henry II in this, the Third Crusade.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: Letters and a treatise in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 204:215–402; 185:627–628. S. STEFFEN, "Heinrich, Kardinalbischof von Albano: Ein Kirchenfürst des zwölften Jahrhunderts," Cistercienser-Chronik 21 (1909) 225–236, 267–280, 300–306, 334–343. G. KÜNNE, Heinrich von Clairvaux (Berlin 1909). Y. M. J. CONGAR, "Henri de Marcy, abbé de Clairvaux, cardinal-évêque d'Albano et légat pontifical," Analecta Monastica 5 (1958) 1–90.

[J. R. SOMMERFELDT]

HENRY OF FRIEMAR

The Elder; b. c. 1245; d. Erfurt, Germany, Oct. 18, 1340. Magister Parisiensis, noted theologian, and preacher of the Order of the Augustinian Hermits, he is principally known as the author of numerous ascetical-mystical treatises that had considerable influence on the development of piety among clergy and laity. The popularity of these treatises is attested by their transmission in an extraordinarily large number of manuscripts still preserved, the early translation of some of them into the vernacular, and the fact that several also were repeatedly printed before and after 1500. The following works deserve special mention: Tractatus de quattuor instinctibus, a discussion of the four forces moving the human soul (God, angels, the devil, man's own nature) and their characteristics; Tractatus de decem praeceptis, a detailed popular explanation of the Decalogue; Explanatio passionis Dominicae, a description of the Lord's Passion on the basis of the Gospels, with explanatory additions and short affectionate prayers; De adventu Verbi in mentem, a mystical explanation of Lk 1.26–29; De celebratione missae, a comprehensive ascetical-mystical explanation of the Mass for the clergy. A great wealth of ascetical and mystical material also is found in Henry's sermons. Henry was the first Augustinian to write a short outline of the origin and development of his order after its establishment in its modern form in 1256, the Tractatus de origine et progressu ordinis fratrum heremitarum sancti Augustini.

Bibliography: JORDAN OF QUEDLINBURG, Liber vitasfratrum (1357), ed. R. ARBESMANN and W. HÜMPFNER (New York 1943). C. STROICK, Heinrich von Friemar (Freiburg 1954). R. ARBESMANN, "Henry of Friemar's 'Treatise on the Origin and Development of the Order of the Hermit Friars and Its True and Real Title,'" Augustiniana 6 (1956) 37–145. A. ZUMKELLER, "Die Lehrer des geistlichen Lebens unter den deutschen Augustinern vom 13. Jahrhundert bis zum Konzil von Trient," Sanctus Augustinus vitae spiritualis magister, 2 v. (Rome 1959) v.2. A. ZUMKELLER, "Manuskripte von Werken der Autoren des Augustiner-Eremitenordens in mitteleuropäischen Bibliotheken," Augustiana 11 (1961) 285–337. U. STÄRMER, "Mystik, wo sie niemand erwartet. Beobachtungen am Dekalogtraktat Heinrichs von Friemar und seiner hochdeutschen Übersetzung," Jahrbuch der Oswald von Wolkenstein Gesellschaft 6 (1991).

[R. ARBESMANN]

HENRY OF GHENT

Secular scholastic philosopher and theologian, known as Doctor solemnus and Summus doctorum; b. Ghent, c. 1217; d. Tournai, June 29, 1293. After early studies at the cathedral school of Tournai, he studied arts at Paris, then theology, probably under WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE and Geoffrey of Bar. As regent master in theology, he lectured at Paris from 1276 to 1292, becoming the most illustrious teacher in the last quarter of the century. Although he was canon of Tournai from 1267, archdeacon of Bruges in 1276 and of Tournai in 1278, he was intimately connected with affairs of the university (see PARIS, UNIVERSITY OF). He actively supported the condemnation of Latin AVERROISM in 1277, joined other masters in opposing their chancellor, Philip of Thory, in 1284, and was so violent an opponent of the MENDICANT orders between 1282 and 1290 that he was strongly reprimanded by the future BONIFACE VIII on Nov. 29, 1290. He attended the Council of Lyons in 1274 and took an active part in the synods of Sens, Montpellier, Cologne, and Compiègne. His contemporaries sometimes referred to him under the titles of Doctor reverendus and Doctor digressivus.

Principal Works. Between 1276 and 1292, Henry held both ordinary disputations and disputations de quolibet that were later published as his major contributions to theology. The ordinary disputations were published as a Summa theologiae (ed. Paris 1520; Ferrara 1646, etc.) in three parts. Although the prologue announced a complete course in theology dealing equally with God and creatures, the three parts deal exclusively with the nature of theological knowledge (arts. 1–20), the One God (arts. 21–52), and the Trinity (arts. 53–75). Consequently his Summa cannot be compared with the more complete and influential Summa theologiae of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. The 15 Quodlibeta, each consisting of many varied questions posed by students, were held during Advent and Lent from 1276 to 1292 (ed. Paris 1518; Venice 1613, etc.). Henry also wrote questions on the Metaphysics of ARISTOTLE and a commentary on the Physics (1278). Of the biblical lectures he was obliged to give as master, only an exposition of the first chapter of Genesis is known. Apart from sermons and a few treatises, other works listed by P. Glorieux are doubtful or spurious.

Historical Heritage. Henry was an independent thinker in the Augustinian tradition, equally opposed to the Christian Aristotelianism of St. Thomas Aquinas and to the Averroist Aristotelianism of SIGER OF BRABANT. After the condemnation of Latin Averroism in 1277, Christian thinkers were ready for a new type of PLATONISM and Augustinianism that would replace THOMISM. Consequently, in the last quarter of the 13th century there were at least two Augustinian approaches in Christian thought: the older Platonic Augustinianism of the Franciscan school and the new Avicennian Augustinianism developed by secular masters, notably, by Henry of Ghent. His historical heritage was, therefore, mainly Platonic, Augustinian, and Avicennian. His philosophy might be described as a Christian Avicennism wherein the fatalistic EMANATIONISM of Avicenna was replaced by the Christian concept of free creation in time.

Viewing the relation of faith and reason as distinct but harmonious, Henry did not disagree with St. Thomas essentially on this point. However, for him the notion of divine omnipotence occupies the central position in theology, a position it was to retain, in opposition to Thomistic theology, throughout the 14th century.

Essential Doctrines. Explaining the process of KNOWLEDGE, Henry combined Aristotelian abstraction with Augustinian reflection and illumination. In knowing physical realities, the intellect grasps concrete, existing things, while a higher knowledge reaches the world of possible essences, in themselves indifferent to existence, and of eternal truths that govern them, both being the object of metaphysical knowledge. Possible essences he divided into three primary genera: substance, quality, and quantity; these WILLIAM OF OCKHAM later reduced to two by identifying quantity with material substance. To substance belongs esse in se; to quantity and quality belongs esse in alio. These may also have an esse ad aliud, giving rise, in human thought, to relation and the other six categories (sex principia). Thus, the Aristotelian predicaments are no longer CATEGORIES OF BEING, but classification of concepts, later to be developed by NOMINALISM. At the root of Henry's thought is a misconception of ANALOGY that SCOTISM later developed as the univocity of being.

Between real and rational distinctions, Henry introduced a distinctio intentionalis to account for essential components, such as animality and rationality in the essence man. This was appropriated by DUNS SCOTUS as a distinctio formalis and extended to the whole realm of being.

For Henry, divine causality is exercised in two stages: (1) from all eternity God produced the exemplar ideas, or possible essences (ideata) by which His essence may be imitated in various esse essentiae, (2) in time, by a free act of will, God decided to give some of these essences actual existence (esse existentiae). Thus possible essences proceed from God by an eternal and necessary emanation, as Avicenna taught, while actual existence is a free creation de novo, as Christianity teaches. Henry's contemporaries and successors found this doctrine a threat to the Christian concept of creation ex nihilo. While he tried to preserve divine omnipotence in the creation of existents, he succumbed to NEOPLATONISM and Avicennism in the explanation of essences.

As all Neoplatonic philosophers, Henry was unable to resolve the duality between ideas and individual reality. Unique among scholastic thinkers, he maintained that there are no divine ideas of individuals, but only of species. Thus metaphysics, which is the science of universal ideas and possible essences, can never reach the individual. Concrete individuals, for him, are known only by the senses and by the intellect working with the data of sense; but this "physical knowledge" is not metaphysics. No sincere truth can be expected from sense knowledge alone, but it can be expected from reason judging sense knowledge in the pure light of eternal truth and divine illumination. Henry doubted that man can know truth about anything by his own natural powers alone and without some special divine illumination; at least such truths could not be called "science." Thus, while the rational soul is created to know the rules of eternal truth, man cannot attain the pure truth naturally by his natural powers (ex puris naturalibus naturaliter), but must receive them from God, who freely offers Himself to whom He wills (Sum. theol. 1.1.2).

For Henry, the distinction between essence and existence is not a real one, since existence is not a thing (aliqua res) added to the essence of a creature (Quodl. 1.9). However, since an essence as such is something other than an existing essence, their distinction is not purely mental (ratione), but also intentional (intentione).

In natural philosophy, Henry did not conceive primary matter as a pure potentiality, but as a nature and a substance having its capacity for form from God (Quodl. 1.10). The weak and potential being (esse) of matter is not derived from form, but from God, who has a specific idea (proprium ideam) of it in His mind. Henry insisted on the unicity of form in all creatures other than man (Quodl. 4.13). A single natural generation terminates in only one form; yet the rational soul is not the term of generation, but of creation. Therefore the term of human generation is a corporeal form (forma corporeitatis) distinct from the rational form created by God.

Widely read, attacked, and defended, Henry had considerable influence on thinkers from the 14th to the 18th centuries, particularly on Platonists who wanted an alternative to Thomism. Though strongly attacked by Duns Scotus, William of Ockham, JAMES OF METZ, and DURANDUS OF SAINT-POURÇAIN, he unmistakably influenced their thought. In the 16th century, the Order of Servites, finding itself without an official doctor, thought that Henry had been a Servite and adopted him. This prompted the numerous editions of his major works.

Bibliography: J. PAULUS, Henri de Gand: Essai sur les tendances de sa métaphysique (Paris 1938); "Les Disputes d'Henri de Gand et de Gilles de Rome sur la distinction de l'essence et de l'existence," Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen-âge 15–17 (1940–42) 323–358. A. MAURER, "Henry of Ghent and the Unity of Man," Mediaeval Studies 10 (1948) 1–20. R. J. TESKE, Quodlibetal Questions on Free Will (Milwaukee 1993). W. VAN HAMEL, ed. Henry of Ghent: Proceedings of the International Colloquium on the Occasion of the 700th Anniversary of his Death (1293) (Leuven 1996).

[J. PAULUS]

HENRY OF GORKUM

Theologian; b. Gorkum, c. 1386; d. Cologne, 1431. In 1418 he was listed as a doctor at the University of Paris. The following year he taught philosophy at Cologne, and from 1420 he was director of a school of arts that apparently he founded in that city at his own expense. Later he was appointed a canon of the basilica of St. Ursula and pro-chancellor of the University of Cologne. He was active on the side of THOMISM in the famous dispute between the followers of St. Albert and those of St. Thomas Aquinas at the university. He left a fairly large number of works, some of them still unedited. Among the most important are his Conclusiones et concordantiae Bibliorum et canonum in libros Magistri Sententiarum (Cologne 1489), Compendium Summae Theologiae sancti Thomae (Esslingen 1473), Tractatus consultorii circa divinas et humanas actiones et quorundam Bohemorum errores emergentes (Cologne 1503).

Bibliography: M. GRABMANN, Hilfsmittel des Thomasstudiums aus alter Zeit (Freiburg 1923). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 2:801–803. P. WILPERT, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 5:189.

[C. R. MEYER]

HENRY OF HARCLAY

English theologian and ecclesiastic; b. c. 1270; d. Avignon, June 25, 1317. Master of arts at Oxford by 1296, he was ordained for the Diocese of Carlisle in 1297 and before 1310 was a master in theology. From Dec. 11, 1312, until his death, he was chancellor of the University of Oxford and directly involved in the university's dispute with the Dominicans over graduation in theology; as proctor of the university, he went to the Roman Curia at Avignon in 1317 to obtain a settlement of the dispute, but died without having obtained it. His importance as a theologian is represented by a commentary on the Sentences (Stegmüller, Repertorium Commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi 1:154) and by his Quaestiones ordinariae (Worcester, Cath. Lib. MS F. 3), some of which have been published. Strongly rejecting the physical determinism of pagan philosophers, he protested against those "who tried to make the heretic Aristotle a Catholic" (F. Pelster, 351). At the height of the controversy between Thomists and Scotists, he wished to remain an independent critic and skeptic. Nevertheless he inclined toward Duns Scotus, whose arguments, distinctions, and solutions he used freely. His commentary on the Sentences relied so heavily on Scotus's Lectura Cantabrigensis that passages were borrowed verbatim by ALFREDUS GONTERI, a disciple of Scotus.

Bibliography: F. PELSTER, "Heinrich von Harclay, Kanzler von Oxford, und seine Quästionen," Miscellanea Francesco Ehrle,

5 v. (Rome 1924) 1:307–356. C. BALIĆ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:190; "Henricus de Harclay et Ioannes Duns Scotus," Mélanges offerts à Étienne Gilson à l'Académie française (Toronto 1959) 93–121. A. MAURER, "Henry of Harclay's Questions on Immortality," Mediaeval Studies 19 (1957) 79–107. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:874–875.

[C. BALIĆ]

HENRY OF HEISTERBACH, BL.

Cistercian abbot; b. c. 1180; d. c. 1244. Henry, born of a noble family and educated in Paris, became a canon of the church of St. Cassius in Bonn; about 1200 he entered the Cistercian Abbey of HEISTERBACH where he later became prior. In 1208 he was unanimously elected abbot. His reign marked the high point in the history of Heisterbach; under him the abbey church was completed (1237), the abbey's land holdings were enlarged, and the daughter house at Marienstatt was founded. He encouraged the important literary activity of CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH. Henry served the Church and the secular governments as a counselor, ambassador, and preacher of a CRUSADE.

Feast: Nov. 11.

Bibliography: CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH, Dialogus miraculorum, ed. J. STRANGE, 2 v. (Cologne 1851), bk. 1, ch. 13; bk. 7, ch. 39, and passim; ed. A. HILKA as Die Wundergeschichten des Cäsarius von Heisterbach, 3 v. (Bonn 1933–37), and tr. H. VON E. SCOTT and C. S. BLAND as The Dialogue on Miracles, 2 v. (London 1929). G. WELLSTEIN, "Heinrich I, dritter Abt von Heisterbach," Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige 32 (1911) 405–418. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:290.

[J. R. SOMMERFELDT]

HENRY OF HERP (HARPHIUS VAN ERP)

Dutch mystical writer; b. probably at Erp (North Brabant), c. 1405; d. Mechlin, Feb. 22, 1477. He joined the Brethren of the Common Life, was rector of the house at Delft about 1445, and somewhat later was founder and rector of St. Paul's at Gouda. In 1450 he entered the Franciscan Observants while in Rome on pilgrimage. He held the office of guardian at Mechlin several times after 1454, and from 1470 to 1473 was vicar provincial of the Observants of the Cologne province.

His works fall into two groups: oratorical and ascetical-mystical. The oratorical writings are contained in two volumes under the titles Speculum aureum de praeceptis divinae legis (sermons on the decalogue) and Sermones de tempore. The first of these was published at Mainz (1474), and the latter at Speyer (1484). His ascetical-mystical works were composed between 1450 and 1470. They were written in Latin (with the exception of the Spiegel) and in the form of sermons. These include: (1) Eden, id est Paradisus contemplativorum, a youthful work showing dependence upon Jan van Ruysbroeck. (2) The Scala Amoris, which expounded the nine degrees of charity, and shows dependence upon Rudolph of Biberach and St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 23–27. (3) Collatio I seu Directorium Brevissimum, a résumé of Herp's doctrine about the prayer of aspiration. Three early manuscripts ascribe this work to John Bourcellii, OFM [see M. Viller, Harphius ou Bourcellii? in Revue d'ascétique et de mystique 3 (1922) 155–162]. (4) Soliloquia super Cantica, sermons describing the whole ascent of the spiritual life. (5) De processu humani profectus, sermons about the interior life. (6) Spiegel der Volcomenheit (critical edition by L. Verschueren, Antwerp 1931, 2 v.), his chief work, written 1455–60 in Middle Dutch. A complete collection of Herp's mystical writings was edited and published under the title Theologia Mystica by Theodoric Loer, OCart (Cologne 1538). This edition was placed on the Index, but a corrected edition was published in Rome in 1586.

The Spiegel has four parts. The introduction deals at length with the subject of mortification. The remainder of the work treats of three successive steps of life: the internal-active; the spiritual-contemplative; and the spiritual-superessential. Each life is considered under three aspects—its preparation, its ornamentation, and its ascent—a division borrowed from Ruysbroeck. The preparation of the active life consists in compunction; its ornamentation in the acquisition of the moral virtues; its ascent either in the exercise of the prayer of aspiration, or in the practice of the theological virtues. The preparation of the contemplative life consists in the removal of impediments and in a general refinement of mind and will; its ornamentation in the gifts of the Holy Spirit; its ascent takes place on three levels, namely, in the lower or sensory powers of the soul, in its higher or spiritual powers, and in its very essence. On the occasion of this last phase of ascent the soul is seized by an insatiable desire for God. The spiritual-superessential life (which, according to the uncommon thesis maintained by Herp, has the immediate vision of the divine essence as its final term) has for its preparation a total disengagement from things, and in this Herp distinguished nine differences of degree. In the ornamentation of this life the divine Persons themselves, directly working in the will, the intellect and the memory, effect a final purification and detachment and make the soul able to see the essence of God.

Herp accentuated the importance of the exercise of aspiration, i.e., the frequent raising of the mind to God with ardent sighs, which are not, however, to be conceived as an excitement of the sensitive emotions, but as the fervent tendency of the will to achieve union with God. The general idea was borrowed from Hugh of Balma, but whereas Hugh restricted this exercise principally to the higher phases of spiritual life, Herp saw it as playing a part, though in different forms, in all the phases. He conceived it as the moving force that carries the soul to the highest degrees of union with God.

Herp was especially influential in the 16th and 17th centuries, not only in the Low Countries, but also in Spain, France, and Italy. Though not an original writer, he is one of the most important representatives of Dutch spirituality. He joined a clear and practical précis of Ruysbroeck's mystical teaching with certain ascetical ideas that give him an almost modern air. He felicitously assimilated Hugh of Balma's doctrine about the prayer of aspiration and applied it to the whole progress of the spiritual life.

Bibliography: L. VERSCHUEREN, Spiegel der Volcomenheit, 2 v. (Antwerp 1931) v. 1; "De Heraut van Ruusbroec," Jan van Ruusbroec: Leven en Werken (Mechlin 1931) 230–262; "Harphius et les capucins français," Études Franciscaines 45 (1933) 316–329; 46 (1934) 272–288. D. KALVERKAMP, Die Vollkommenheitslehre des Franziskaners Heinrich Herp (Werl, Ger. 1940). M. M. J. SMITS VAN WAESBERGHE, Het verschijnsel van de opheffing des geestes bij Jan van Ruusbroec en Hendrik Herp (Nijmegen 1945). C. JANSSEN, "L'Oraison aspirative chez Herp et chez ses prédécesseurs," Carmelus 3 (1956) 19–48. K. FREIENHAGEN-BAUMGARDT, Hendrik Herps Spiegel der Volcomenheit in oberdeutscher Überlieferung: Ein Beitrag zur Rezeptiongeschichte niederländischer Mystik im oberdeutschen Raum (Leuven 1998).

[A. EMMEN]

HENRY OF HUNTINGDON

English churchman and chronicler; b. in the vicinity of Lincoln, England, between 1080 and 1085; d. Huntingdon, 1155. Brought up probably in the household of Robert Bloet, Bishop of LINCOLN (1093–1123), and trained by a certain Albinus of Angers as his master, he was ordained a priest before 1110 and was made archdeacon of Huntingdon the following year. At the request of Robert's successor at Lincoln, Alexander (1123–48), Henry began the composition of a Historia Anglorum that took BEDE's work as its foundation. In 1134 he accompanied Archbishop THEOBALD OF CANTERBURY to Rome. On this journey he visited the Abbey of BEC, met the Norman chronicler ROBERT OF TORIGNY, then a monk there, and became acquainted with GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH's Historia Britonum. He divided his own history into four periods: Roman, Saxon, Danish, and Norman, utilizing the conventional sources from Roman days down to the Norman period, and at times only his own imagination. However, it should be noted that he put Bede and the Old English Chronicle to good use and exhibited no race prejudice in his narrative. Between 1130 and 1154 he brought out five editions of his work, each showing not only continuations but much reworking and change. He eventually added three books, cast in epistolary form, to his Historia, viz: De summitatibus, letters addressed to high personages including King HENRY I; De miraculis, on the miracles of early English saints; and De contemptu mundi, a moralizing work in which examples are drawn from his own contemporaries. On the basis of his two extant books of epigrams it can be said that his poetical compositions did not rise above rhetorical flights in verse form. As a chronicler, Henry of Huntingdon is a valuable independent source for the period of his own lifetime, but he is inferior both as a historian and as a stylist to WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY and Robert of Torigny. The best available edition of his Historia is that by Thomas Arnold in the Rolls Series (1879).

See Also: ANNALS AND CHRONICLES.

Bibliography: H. R. LUARD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 9:569–570. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:481–485. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946) 2: 153–155. F. LIEBERMANN, "Heinrich von Huntingdon," Forschungen zur deutschen Geschichte 18 (1878) 267–295.

[M. R. P. MC GUIRE]

HENRY OF KALKAR

Carthusian writer and reformer; b. Kalkar, Duchy of Cleves, 1328; d. Cologne, Dec. 20, 1408. Of a noble family, he studied at Cologne and then at Paris, where he completed his master's degree in 1357. After teaching at Paris, he returned to Cologne, where he became canon at the churches of St. George, Cologne, and St. Swithbert, Kaiserswerth. In 1365 he entered the Cologne Charterhouse. Recognized for his learning and piety, he was made prior of the Charterhouse of Arnheim in 1368, and there exercised decisive influence on the spiritual formation of Gerard GROOTE. He was later prior of Ruremonde (1372–77), of Cologne (1378–84), and of Strasbourg (1384–96), and for 20 years was visitor of the Rhine province. In these positions he promoted a reform that enabled his order to survive the difficulties of the Western Schism.

He wrote extensively on varied topics, sermons, letters, and ascetical and historical tracts, but much of his work remains in manuscript. His published works are Exercitatorium monachale, which appeared at Cologne in 1532 under the name of DENIS THE CARTHUSIAN and was also incorporated in the Theologia mystica (ch. 1) of HUGH OF BALMA; a chronicle, Ortus et decursus ordinis Cartusiensis (ed. H. Vermeer, Wageningen 1929); and Cantuagium de musica (ed. H. Hüsch, Krefeld 1952). Henry of Kalkar was for a time proposed as a possible author of the Imitation of Christ, but that thesis is no longer accepted. He is, however, recognized as being an important influence in the development of the DEVOTIO MODERNA and upon the writers of that era. He is also referred to as Henry Eggher or Eger.

Bibliography: L. LE VASSEUR, Ephemerides ordinis Cartusiensis, 2 v. in 4 (Montreuil 1890) 4:540–542. S. AUTORE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 4.2: 2104–08. P. DOYÈRE, Catholicisme 5:621–622.

[F. C. LEHNER]

HENRY OF LAUSANNE

12th-century heretic; d. Toulouse, c. 1145. He was of uncertain origin, but St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX thought he was French. He was a black monk who had left his order. Although his theology was compendious and his morality doubtful, his influence was incontestable because of his oratorical talent and convincing external appearance—he presented himself as a prophet and reformer. His doctrine was negative: it was antisacerdotal and antisacramental; it rejected the baptism of children, Holy Eucharist, worship in churches, and probably also the invocation of saints. In 1101 he went from Lausanne to Le Mans, where he was confounded by HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN, who had returned from Rome, and was expelled. He then preached at Poitiers, at Bordeaux, and in Provence. The Council of Toulouse (1119) denounced him in its 3d and 10th canons. Sometime before 1135 he was refuted by a monk, William. When arrested by the archbishop of Arles, Henry retracted his errors at the Council of Pisa (1135), only to return to his errant life. He then met PETER OF BRUYS and was influenced by his doctrine. PETER THE VENERABLE wrote his Tractatus adversus petrobrusianos haereticos (1137–1140) against them (see PETROBRUSIANS). The LATERAN COUNCIL OF 1139 condemned them again in canon 23. But subsequently, Henry, protected by Alphonse of St. Gilles, preached so effectively in Languedoc that Bernard himself undertook a successful campaign against him. Henry was seized c. 1145, sent to the bishop of Toulouse and condemned to prison, where he died. His disciples, the Henricians, were still in existence in 1236. Though he did not profess the theses later held by the WALDENSES and the ALBIGENSES, his influence cleared the way for them.

Bibliography: HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN, Epistolae 23, 24, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 171:237–242. WILLIAM THE MONK, Contra Henricum scismaticum et hereticum, ed. R. MANSELLI, Bullettino dell' Istituto storico italiano 67 (1953) 1–63. PETER THE VENERABLE, Tractatus adversus Petrobrusianos, Patrologia Latina 189:719–850. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, Epistolae 241, 242, Patrologia Latina 182:434–437. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2178–83. J. LECLERCQ, Pierre le Vénérable (Paris 1946). R. MANSELLI, Studi sulle eresie del secolo XII. (Studi storici 5; Rome 1953). E. DELARUELLE, Catholicisme 5:622–624.

[F. GLORIEUX]

HENRY OF NEWARK

Archbishop of York; d. Aug. 15, 1299. He was probably a native of Newark, Nottinghamshire, England, and related to several other contemporary clerics of the same family name. Henry began his career c. 1270, becoming clerk to King EDWARD I shortly afterward. From then on his advancement was steady, the reward of unspectacular, unremitting service to King and Church. He held the living of Barnby, Nottinghamshire, in 1270, received a prebend in St. Paul's, London, in 1271, and on the death of Abp. WALTER GIFFARD in 1279, was named a guardian of the temporalities of York. In 1218 he became archdeacon of Richmond, with a prebend in York, where in 1290 he was installed as dean. On May 7, 1296, he was elected archbishop of YORK, but the wars prevented him from appearing before Pope BONIFACE VIII. However, his election was confirmed, the temporalities granted (1297), and the PALLIUM sent from Rome, and he was finally consecrated by the bishop of Durham on June 15, 1298. His steady advancement in the Church was accompanied, and perhaps explained, by his lifelong service to King and State. Thus, in 1277 he was at Rome on a mission for Edward; in 1281 he arbitrated in a dispute with subjects of the Count of Holland; in 1283 he was deputed to fix the dues owing to the crown by the northern knights and to collect subsidies in the Diocese of Durham for the Welsh wars; he was a commissioner at Norham, where Edward gave judgment among the claimants to the Scottish crown; in 1296 he was one of those appointed to treat with the Counts of Gelderland and Holland; and in 1297 he called a synod to consider the king's demand for a subsidy. Summoned to Parliament, he became a member of the Council of the Prince of Wales. He was buried in his cathedral church. He appears to have been a man of great competence and wise judgment, faithful in his duties, unambitious, conciliatory, and generous.

Bibliography: W. H. DIXON, Fasti Eboracenses: Lives of the Archbishops of York, ed. J. RAINE (London 1863) 349–353. J. LENEVE, Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae 1300–1541, ed. H. P. F. KING et al. (London 1962–) 2:49, 365; 3:104, 122, 137, 214, 428. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 14:310–311.

[J. H. BAXTER]

HENRY OF ST. IGNATIUS

Carmelite theologian, whose family name was D'Aumérie; b. Ath, Belgium, c. 1630; d. Wandre, near Liège, April 1, 1719. He entered the Carmelites c. 1646 and was ordained in 1652. For many years he taught theology, and he also held various administrative positions in the three Carmelite provinces to which at different times he belonged. He vigorously attacked the teaching of the Carmelite Francis Bonne-Espérance (1617–77) and his followers. An indefatigable controversialist, he wrote against the Jesuits and Molinism and roundly condemned the moral laxism he detected in the writings of many who attacked Jansenism. His best-known work, Ethica amoris, sive theologia sanctorum. . . (3 v. Liège 1709), was condemned by the bishop of Liège, the Holy Office, and the parlement of Paris. Henry stoutly maintained that his doctrine was in accord with that of Aristotle, Augustine, Aquinas, and the English Carmelite John Baconthorpe (Bacon). The accusation of Jansenism made against Henry is false if understood to mean that he actually propounded Jansenist doctrine.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2195–97. I. ROSIER, Biographisch en bibliographisch overzicht van de vroomheid in de Nederlandse Carmel van 1235 tot het midden der achttiende eeuw (Studiën en tekstuitgaven van ons geestelijk erf 10; Tielt 1950) 155–156. L. CEYSSENS, "Les Deébuts janséénistes du P. Henri de S. Ignace," Analecta Ordinis Carmelitarum Calceatorum 18 (1953) 56–122, ed. of correspondence, 186–297.

[K. J. EGAN]

HENRY OF UPPSALA, ST.

Bishop and martyr, national saint of Finland; d. Köyliö, Finland, c. 1156. He is a somewhat enigmatic figure as to date and life, but is believed to have accompanied King ERIC IX of Sweden on his crusade to Finland, where he converted many pagans. However, remaining behind after the king had returned home, he was killed by a Finnish convert. Reputedly, the murderer put on the bishop's birretum, but when he tried to take it off his flesh adhered to it. This is noted as one of the saint's outstanding miracles. In another legend, extant in only one manuscript, Henry is linked with Nicholas Breakspear, then legate to Scandinavia, who later became Pope ADRI-

AN IV. The saint's cult spread rapidly in Sweden and Finland, and with the growth of the BRIDGETTINE convents it was carried to the European continent. One historia rhythmica, Gaude cetus fidelium, and one Sequence, Cetus noster, are known. His epitaph may be found in Nousis, Finland, where his relics were kept, until they were translated in 1300 to the cathedral in Abo (Tartu). He was canonized in 1158.

Feast: Jan. 19; Jan. 20 (Finland).

Bibliography: A. MALINIEMI, De S. Henrico episcopo et martyre (Helsinki 1942). J. RINNE, Pyhä Henrik (Helsinki 1932). T. SCHMID, Sveriges kristnande (Stockholm 1934). U. VENTO, Püspa Henrikin surmavirsi. The Ballad of the Death of Bishop Henry (Helsinki 1967). Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 26:92–95; 42:217–218. T. BORENIUS, Archaeological Journal 87 (1930) 340–358.

[T. SCHMID]

HENRY OF VITSKÓL, BL.

Abbot; d. February 11, late 12th century. He joined the CISTERCIANS at the Abbey of CLAIRVAUX, where he was listed first among 90 novices on the occasion of a meeting with the saintly Abbot BERNARD, who predicted at that time that one day Henry's spiritual labors would take him far from the monastery. In fact, Henry was sent in 1143 to the Abbey of ALVASTRA in Sweden, and in 1150 he was founder and first abbot of Varnhem. He was forced to leave there because of severe external disorders, and in 1158 he assumed the direction of the monastery of Vituskól in Denmark when it was founded by King Waldemar I (d. 1182). He also undertook from there a new foundation in Oem or Clara-Insula in 1166. Although he is listed in the Cistercian calendar, there is no official cult.

Feast: Feb. 11.

Bibliography: Scriptores rerum Danicarum medii aevi, ed. J. LANGEBEK and P. F. SUHM, 9 v. (Copenhagen 1772–1878) 4:458. CONRAD EBERBACENSIS, Exordium magnum cisterciense bk. 6.10, ed. B. GRIESSER (Rome 1961) 366. E. ORTVED, Cistercieordenen og dens klostre i Norden, 2 v. in 1 (Copenhagen 1927–33) 2:53–141. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:203; 4:21.

[C. SPAHR]

HENRY OF ZWIEFALTEN, BL.

Benedictine monk; b. c. 1200; d. Ochsenhausen, Nov. 4, 1262. His family resided on Mt. Zwiefalten, Germany. As a young man he was a respected knight. From 1238 on he was prior in Ochsenhausen Priory, a dependency of the abbey of SANKT BLASIEN. He is mentioned in the abbey records between 1238 and 1243 and for the last time on Nov. 4, 1262. Henry's chief concern was the expansion of the monastery library; he also managed to mobilize large endowments for the decoration of the church. He was distinguished by great sanctity and miraculous powers. Among other things, he is reported to have miraculously quenched a fire, restored sight to a blind woman, and healed a lame boy. His cult cannot be clearly established for the early period. His vita witnesses to his reputation for sanctity. He is usually designated "blessed," and his memory is held in high esteem.

Feast: Nov. 4.

Bibliography: J. E. STADLER and F. J. HEIM, Vollständiges Heiligen-Lexikon, 5 v. (Augsburg 1858–82) v.2. Die Kunst- und Altertums-Denkmale im Königreich Württemberg: Donaukreis (Esslingen 1914), see Ochsenhausen. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, ed. by The Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 11:152–153. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:259.

[G. SPAHR]

HENRY SUSO, BL.

Dominican preacher and mystic, and leader of the Friends of God; b. Constance, March 21, c. 1295; d. Ulm, Jan. 25, 1366.

Life and Works. His father was Count Henry of Berg, a worldly minded man; his mother, a saintly woman of the Süse family (latinized Suso, modern German Seuse) probably of Ueberlingen, from whom Henry took his surname and inherited his religious disposition and tender sympathy. He received the Dominican habit at Constance at the age of 13. After 15 years of mediocre piety, he experienced a "conversion" that marked the beginning of a life of heroic austerity, prayer, and solitude. He studied at Constance, probably at Strassburg, and at the general house of studies at Cologne, sometime between 1322 and 1325, under Meister ECKHART, for whom he developed an intense veneration. About 1326 Suso returned to Constance as professor of the priory school. He wrote the Little Book of Truth (c. 1327), a speculative treatment of mystical questions, to counter the pantheistic, unsocial, and immoral tenets of the Brethren of the Free Spirit. With marked intellectual vigor, he dealt with profound questions of theology: God's being, Unity and Trinity, creation and Incarnation, man's freedom and moral responsibility, and mystical union with God without loss of personal identity. When the Wild Man whom Henry used as the personification of the heretical brethren misquoted Eckhart in support of false doctrine, Suso replied by placing obscure passages regarding God's immanence and transcendence, presence and concurrence, into juxtaposition with others, also from Eckhart, that were in full harmony with truth.

Suso's masterpiece, the Little Book of Eternal Wisdom (c. 1328), is "the finest fruit of German mysticism" (Denifle), a judgment corroborated by its unbroken popularity until displaced by the Imitation of Christ. It is a practical book containing a minimal discussion of mystical subjects and little theological speculation. "The thoughts expressed here are simple and the words simpler still, because they are from a simple soul and are intended for simple persons who have bad habits to crush" (Prol.). In dialogue (used also in the Little Book of Truth), Suso spoke "at one time as a sinner, then as a perfect man, sometimes as a loving soul; or, if the subject requires it, as a servant submissive to Holy Wisdom," and is answered by Holy Wisdom, at times by Mary, and once by the soul of one who had died unrepentant. Aiming to rekindle zeal in hearts where it has died, to warm cold hearts, to stir up the lukewarm, to provoke the indelovely to devotion, and to awaken the tepid to virtue, Suso leads the reader to the foot of the Cross to ponder the afflictions of Jesus and Mary. He shows him the enormity of sin, the rigor of divine justice, the tawdriness of earthly love and the nobility of the heavenly, and points to the joy of heaven and the treasures hidden in suffering. He instructs how to prepare for death, live inwardly, receive the Sacraments fruitfully, and praise God unceasingly. He concludes with 100 one-sentence meditations on the Passion. Suso's abstruse doctrine and defense of Eckhart in the earlier book brought him a sharp rebuke from a provincial or possibly a general chapter in 1327 or 1330. He also lost his professorship. These events may explain why he sought and obtained approval of the Little Book of Eternal Wisdom from the master general, translating it into Latin under the title Horologium sapientiae, or Clock of Wisdom (c. 1334), a free rendition, rearrangement, and fuller presentation of the same material. That the two books are in reverse relationship has also been held (Gröber).

Suso now developed an active ministry, preaching especially to Dominican nuns and the Friends of God of Switzerland and the Upper Rhine region, but he also ranged as far afield as Cologne and Aachen. During 1343–44 he was prior of the Constance community, in exile at Diessenhoven after 1339, owing to its support of the papal cause against Louis of Bavaria. During these years Suso was purified spiritually by physical hardships, the hostility of others, persecution, and calumny. He was shamefully slandered by an evil woman he had befriended. Even friends turned against him. This crisis forced his transfer to Ulm (c. 1347), where he died. His tomb was destroyed by Protestants in the 16th century. Henry's veneration began immediately upon his death and has continued without interruption. Gregory XVI approved his cult on April 16, 1831.

The Life of the Servant, "one of the most charming of Christian biographies" (Preger), had its origin in correspondence and conversations between Suso and Elsbethe STÄGEL, his spiritual daughter. Suso reworked her notes of the conversations with great literary skill and incorporated some of the letters. More the story of a soul than an autobiography, it recorded his spiritual development (part 1) and instructed Elsbethe how to advance in the spiritual life (part 2). Four extant sermons are attributed to Suso, only two of which are certainly genuine. His 27 or 28 spiritual letters (existing also in an abridged form that constitutes a miniature spiritual treatise) have been judged "the choicest spiritual letters written during the Middle Ages" (Preger). The brief Soul's Love-Book (in which Christ is the great book of love) is of doubtful authenticity. Suso collected his Middle High German works in an Exemplar (c. 1362), containing the Little Book of Truth, the Little Book of Eternal Wisdom, his Life, and abridged letters. Some scholars deny that he made the Exemplar, composed the Life, or abridged the letters, holding that the Life contains, besides a nucleus of truth, a large content of fictional anecdote, cloister legend, and hearsay. The traditional view, upheld by other scholars, is still preferred.

Doctrine. Suso's teaching, a milder, more cautious form of Eckhart's speculative doctrine, is corrected by that of Thomas Aquinas and colored by the effective mysticism of Bernard and Bonaventure. He developed a tender personal love for Christ, the Eternal Wisdom, the Eucharist, the Sacred Heart and the Heart of Mary, and the Holy Name, which he cut on his breast. Imitation and contemplation of Christ's sufferings was basic to Suso's doctrine. It leads to conformity with Christ and to the highest reaches of mystical union. Illustrated by constant references to his own experiences, Suso's teaching is psychological, practical, and largely ascetical, but touches at times on profound speculative points. He taught passivity (yet not quietistic) achieved by corporal mortification, acceptance of interior and exterior trials, total detachment from creatures, self-renunciation, and complete abandonment to God's will. Contemplation occurs through an intuition beyond created images in a union with the Divinity beyond comprehension, where the soul, losing all sense of its own identity yet remaining distinct from God, knows and loves Him without knowing that it does so.

Feast: March 15; formerly March 2.

See Also: MYSTICISM; CONTEMPLATION.

Bibliography: Editions. German works. Heinrich Seuse: Deutsche Schriften, ed. K. BIHLMAYER (Stuttgart 1907), standard ed. Modern German. N. HELLER, ed., Des Mystikers Heinrich Seuse deutsche Schriften: Vollständige Ausgabe auf Grund der Handschriften (Regensburg 1926), Eng. The Exemplar: Life and Writings of Bl. Henry Suso, O.P., tr. SISTER ANN EDWARD, 2 v. (Dubuque 1962). The Life of the Servant, abr. tr. J. M. CLARK (London 1952). The Little Book of Eternal Wisdom and The Little Book of Truth, ed. and tr. J. M. CLARK (New York 1953). Horologium sapientiae, ed. J. STRANGE (Cologne 1861); ed. K. RICHSTÄTTER (Turin 1929). Literature. J. ANCELET-HUSTACHE, Master Eckhart and the Rhineland Mystics, tr. H. GRAEF (pa. New York 1958). J. BÜHLMANN, Christuslehre und Christumystik des Heinrich Seuse (Lucerne 1942). J. M. CLARK, The Great German Mystics (Oxford 1949). H. DENIFLE, Die deutschen Mystiker des 14. Jahrhunderts. Beitrag zur Deutung ihrer Lehre, ed. O. SPIESS (Fribourg 1951). C. GRÖBER, Der Mystiker Heinrich Seuse (Freiburg 1941). D. PLANZER, "Des Horologium sapientiae und die Echtheit der Vita des H. Seuse," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 1 (1930) 181–221; "Henry Suso on the Spiritual Life," Cross and Crown 2 (1950) 58–79; Heinrich Seuses Lehre über das geistliche Leben (Freiburg 1960). R. SENN, Die Echtheit der Vita Heinrich Seuses (Diss. Bern 1930). SISTER MARY CATHERINE, Henry Suso: Saint and Poet, a Study (Oxford 1947). U. WEYMANN, Die Seusesche Mystik und ihre Wirkung auf die bildende Kunst (Berlin 1938). F. TOBIN, Henry Suso: The Exemplar, with Two German Sermons (New York 1989).

[W. A. HINNEBUSCH]

HEORTOLOGY

From Gr. ἑορτή, festival, a branch of LITURGIOLOGY devoted to the history of liturgical feasts and seasons. In the more general liturgiological treatises the Church calendar (see CALENDAR, CHRISTIAN) is usually discussed only incidentally. There have been some during the past three centuries, however, who have written special studies on the Church year; among them are: L. de Thomassin, Traité des festes de l'Église, v. 2 of Traité des historiques et dogmatiques sur divers points de la discipline de l'Église et de la morale chrétienne (Paris 1683); Benedict XIV, De festis Domini Nostri Jesu Christi, beatae Mariae Virginis et quorundam sanctorum, v. 10 of Opera (Rome 1747–51); and N. Nilles, Kalendarium manuale utriusque ecclesiae orientalis et occidentalis, 2 v. (2d ed. Innsbruck 1896–97). In 1900 H. Kellner recommended that heortology be recognized as a separate department of study (H. Kellner, Heortologie [3d ed. rev. Freiburg 1911]; English version Heortology [London 1908]). The increase since then of heortological treatises, particularly in the form of articles, is doubtless due in a measure to his influence. Broader contemporary studies on the calendar include F. G. Holweck, Calendarium liturgicum festorum Dei et Dei Matris Mariae (Philadelphia 1925); W. H. Frere, Studies in Early Roman Liturgy, v.1 The Kalendar (Alcuin Club Collections 28; London 1930); and F. X. Weiser, Handbook of Christian Feasts and Customs (New York 1958). As Weiser indicates, popular customs connected with Church festivals and seasons pertain more properly to folklore than to heortology.

See Also: LITURGICAL YEAR IN ROMAN RITE.

[R. F. MCNAMARA]

HERACLEON

2d-century Italian Gnostic teacher. Almost nothing is known of his life. According to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 4.71) and Hippolytus (Ref. 6.29, 35), he was, with Ptolemy, a leader of the Italian school of Valentinian Gnosis. He ranks as the first known commentator on the Fourth Gospel. Origen quotes some 48 passages of Heracleon's work in his own commentary on John, and Clement cites two other passages probably from the same work (ibid. and Eclogae 25.1). Largely on the basis of doctrinal similarities, H. C. Puech and G. Quispel have very plausibly assigned to Heracleon the Treatise on the Three Natures in the Jung Codex from the Chenoboskion manuscripts. At the core of Heracleon's system is the doctrine of the three natures and three classes of men: the material, associated with evil and the devil; the pneumatic, associated with the Father and the Pleroma; the psychic, associated with the Demiurge and capable of some purification by knowledge. The body of Jesus, the Italian Valentinians held, belonged to the psychic category.

See Also: GNOSTICISM.

Bibliography: A. E. BROOKE, ed., The Fragments of Heracleon (Cambridge, Eng. 1891). W. VÖLKER, ed., Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis (Tübingen 1932) 63–86. W. FOERSTER, "Von Valentin zur Herakleon," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche (1928) Beiheft 7. F. SAGNARD, La Gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de Saint Irénée (Paris 1947) 127–134; 480–520. G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2: 2198–2205. H. C. PUECH and G. QUISPEL, "Le Quatrième écrit gnostique du Codex Jung," Vigiliae christianae 9 (1955) 65–102. R. M. GRANT, Gnosticism: A Sourcebook . . . (New York 1961) 195–208.

[G. W. MACRAE]

HERACLITUS

Heraclitus of Ephesus, b. probably in the third quarter of the sixth century B.C. and reported to have died at the age of 60, was the most enigmatic and the most profound of the pre-Socratic thinkers. According to a seemingly reliable tradition, he belonged to a leading family of the Ephesian aristocracy. Nothing else is known definitely of his life.

Scroll Fragments. Most stories about Heraclitus appear to have been invented to illustrate features that emerge from sayings on a scroll handed down under his name. From the scroll there remain well over 100 fragments, as quoted in writers from the 4th century B.C. to the 13th A.D. The exact number is controversial, since in many instances an original Heraclitean saying cannot easily be distinguished from a quoting author's paraphrase. Though one comparatively lengthy fragment (fig. 1, H. DIELS, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, 3 v. [10th ed. Berlin 1960–61] 22 B) stood at the beginning and another (fig. 2) followed shortly after, the rest defy modern attempts to rediscover their order on the scroll. In style they are incisive, well rounded, and oracular, as though pointing out truth vividly rather than reasoning to it or analyzing it. They reveal a haughty, aristocratic temperament, mordantly critical of accepted views.

Because the sayings were found to be obscure when approached for teachings on nature, they earned their author in subsequent tradition the epithet of "dark" or "obscure" (Gr. ὀ σκοτεινός, Lat. tenebrosus). The picture of him as "the weeping philosopher" cannot be traced further back than late in the 1st century B.C., and may rest on a peripatetic term describing his style as "impulsive," but misunderstood as "melancholy."

Teaching. The philosophy contained in the fragments has been interpreted through the centuries in widely differing ways. In PLATO it is seen as an overall doctrine of flux in which nothing is stable, and is summed up (Crat. 439C) in the assertion that all things are always flowing (φερόντων). This was understood by Plato (Theaet. 179E–183C) and ARISTOTLE (Meta. 1005b 23–1012a 34) as a denial of being in things and an explanation of all reality in terms only of change, with the consequent rejection of definite meanings for words. From another standpoint, that of material cause, the Greek doxographers looked upon Heraclitus as a philosopher of nature. The view can be traced to Aristotle's brief statement (Meta. 984a 7–8) that for Heraclitus the basic material principle—from which all things in the universe developed—was fire. In accord with the doxographical tradition, most interpreters continue to regard Heraclitus as an Ionian cosmologist. A third view handed down from antiquity is that Heraclitus was primarily a moral philosopher, using physical doctrines only to establish his moral teachings (Diogenes Laertius, Lives, 9.12, 15).

Perhaps no more than ten of the fragments (frgs. 30, 31, 36, 64, 66, 67, 76, 90, 94, 126) have a patently cosmological meaning, and even these appear readily adaptable to driving home moral considerations. In general the fragments, including the first two, seem concerned predominantly with showing men how to live. Proclaiming that a waking life means solidarity with one's surroundings (frgs. 1, 72), they strive to base human conduct upon what is "common" (frgs. 2, 89) and ultimately upon one divine law, which is common to all (fig. 114). They are definite in the meanings they assign to words, and in the assertion of a common, enduring, unified order throughout all things. The order is achieved by maintaining the correct tensions (fig. 51) between ever-changing opposites. Hence its abiding condition is strife or war (fig. 80). Eternal, uncreated, the world order is a living fire that regulates all things according to fixed measures (frgs. 30, 66, 94). In this way fire is a medium of exchange (fig. 90) as it becomes other things (fig. 31) and all other things are exchanged for it. It guides all (fig. 64).

The notion of God or the divine seems merged in the common unity of opposites (frgs. 32, 67, 102) that is the all-pervading direction of things. To understand it is wisdom (fig. 41). By Stoic and patristic writers and by most moderns it is called the logos, in a Stoic sense, though without ground in pre-Stoic tradition and with doubtful support in the fragments. The soul is described as though a material nature (frgs. 117, 118), having depths that can never be penetrated (frgs. 45, 115), and as surviving some time after death (frgs. 26, 27).

Meaning. While there is no general agreement on the meaning of Heraclitus's thought, its vigor and depth are uncontested. Though without a philosophical notion it makes intelligence supreme in the direction of things of the supersensible in regard to either God or the soul, and penetrates deeply into the basic moral problem of the common or universal in the incessantly changing circumstances of life. The fragments continue to inspire philosophers, and can always be pondered over with renewed intellectual profit.

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: HERACLITUS, The Cosmic Fragments, ed. G. S. KIRK (Cambridge, Eng. 1954). DIOGENES LAERTIUS, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, tr. R. D. HICKS, Loeb Classical Library (New York 1925; reprint Cambridge, Mass. 1942). P. E. WHEELWRIGHT, Heraclitus (Princeton 1959). J. OWENS, "The Interpretation of the Heraclitean Fragments," An Étienne Gilson Tribute, ed. C. J. O'NEIL (Milwaukee 1959) 148–168. W. K. C. GUTHRIE, A History of Greek Philosophy (Cambridge, Eng. 1962—) 1:403–492. M. MARCOVICH, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, suppl. 10 (1965) 246–320.

[J. OWENS]

HERACLIUS, ANTIPOPE

Heraclius was a Roman who in 310 opposed the election of Pope EUSEBIUS (310) and thus earned the title of antipope. Virtually all that is known of Heraclius appears in an epitaph which Pope Damasus I (366–384) wrote for Eusebius. Heraclius apparently headed a faction which favored a harsh treatment for those who had lapsed during persecution. Public disturbances caused by partisans of the two rivals reached such a state that the pagan emperor Maxentius (306–312) exiled both Eusebius and Heraclius to Sicily where the former died and the latter disappeared from history.

Bibliography: A. FERRUA, ed., Epigrammata Damasiana (Vatican City 1942), 129–136. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1198–99. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York 1980) 1:344. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 26.

[J. F. KELLY]

HERACLIUS, BYZANTINE EMPEROR

Reigned Oct. 5, 610, to Feb. 11, 641; b. Cappadocia, c. 575. Heraclius, son of Heraclius, Exarch of Africa, who was of Armenian origin, played a principal part in his father's revolt against the unpopular Emperor Phocas (602–610). He sailed to Constantinople with an expeditionary force, overthrew and executed Phocas, and was proclaimed emperor. By his first marriage, to Eudoxia, he had a son, Heraclius Constantine, and a daughter, Eudocia. His second marriage, to his niece Martina (631), brought him both two additional sons, Heracleonas and David, and sharp ecclesiastical criticism.

Heraclius spent his entire reign in a struggle against grave external and internal dangers. In 611 the Persians overran successively Syria, Anatolia, Palestine and Egypt; and in 614 they took Jerusalem and removed the Holy Cross to Persia. In a series of brilliant campaigns (622–628), Heraclius broke the Persian power in Anatolia and Armenia, carried the war into Persia (627), and caused the fall of Chosroes and the accession of Kawadh, who consented (April 628) to restore occupied territory and the Holy Cross to the Byzantine Empire. Heraclius personally returned the Cross to Jerusalem amid popular rejoicing (March 21, 630). However, Heraclius not only was unable to prevent Slavic occupation of much of the Balkans, but also failed to check the Arab conquest of Palestine, Syria, and Egypt in the name of Islam (634–642).

Heraclius may have attempted to generate a renewal of social and cultural aspects of the Byzantine state, including, perhaps, the establishment of the themes, or military districts. To conciliate his Monophysite subjects, he issued an edict (610) that was orthodox in appearance, but that cast doubt upon the Council of CHALCEDON. Patriarch Sergius I of Constantinople induced him to accept monoenergism, which taught a unity of energy and activities in Christ as a consequence of the unity of wills (c. 621–622). Heraclius imposed this doctrine upon reconquered Armenia and other eastern provinces in 626–628, and in 631 persuaded the Jacobite bishops in a synod at Mabbug to accept monoenergism. In 633 he forced the Armenian Catholicos Ezras to accept this concept; and in the same year Cyrus, Patriarch of Alexandria, also agreed to this formula. Nevertheless, Monophysite opposition persisted in Egypt and Syria while the Chalcedonian position was strongly reaffirmed by Sophronius of Jerusalem and MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR. In 634 or 635 Heraclius forbade further discussion of the question.

Recognizing the failure of monoenergism, Heraclius officially proclaimed a new formula in his edict Ecthesis (638), asserting the doctrine of Monothelitism, which proclaimed a perfect harmony and unity of the divine and human will in Christ. Pope SEVERINUS refused to accept this explanation; and when, in reprisal, Heraclius's troops seized the papal treasures, Pope JOHN IV openly condemned Monothelitism. The Monophysite Patriarch of Alexandria, Cyrus, accepted the doctrine, but most Copts and Jacobites did not follow him. Heraclius's interventions in ecclesiastical affairs ended in failure.

See Also: MONOTHELITISM.

Bibliography: H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 430–432. O. VOLK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:237–238. F. DÖLGER, Corpus der griechischen Urkunden des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit (Munich 1924–32) 1:162–217. L. BRÉHIER, A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 5:75–150. A. PERNICE, L'Imperatore Eraclio (Florence 1905). G. OSTROGORSKY, History of the Byzantine State (New Brunswick NJ 1957) 83–100. A. FROLOW, Revue des études byzantines 11 (1953) 88–105, true Cross. P. LEMERLE, Studi medievali 3d ser. 1.2 (1960) 347–361.

[W. E. KAEGI, JR.]

HERALDRY

Heraldry, the science of hereditary symbolism, is a discipline of modern origin, deriving from the practice of medieval heralds who put together collections of coats of arms—colored emblems or devices that developed from the decorations on the coats of arms of warriors. They are hereditary when the shield is familial, and uniform or constant if they represent an ecclesiastical person. Soon after their origin, armorial bearings were adopted by non-combatants such as ecclesiastics, women, and secular and religious corporations. This article is concerned only with the evolution of ecclesiastical heraldry, its juridical aspect, its characteristics, and its application.

Coat of arms depicting the Virgin Mary and the Saints Peter, Magdalena, and Catherine, Bodrum Castle, Bodrum, Turkey, 1472. (©Chris Hellier/CORBIS)

ORIGINS

Heraldry in the Church originated with the seal. Religious seals are nearly contemporary in origin with those of barons, civil officers, and institutions having the right to use seals. The oldest is that of Richard, archbishop of Bourges (1067). The secular lord was generally represented by his arms appearing on the shield and a little later on the caparison of his horse. The ecclesiastic, on the other hand, whether he was a cardinal, bishop, canon, abbot, or priest, appeared in person on his seal, usually without arms.

Obviously the representation of mitered prelates in the act of blessing, with crosier in hand, is of great interest to the historian of ecclesiastical vestments, such as the chasuble, amice, cincture, stole, pallium, maniple, and gloves. As early as the 13th century, however, ecclesiastics are seen bearing armorial devices. Bishops at first had only the heraldic bearings of their rank or see: Miles of Nanteuil (1229), Robert of Cressonsart (1240), and William of Gretz (1261) carried the armorial bearings of the See of Beauvais—a cross cantoned by four keys. But these insignia of ecclesiastical rank were replaced by family arms by, e.g., Guy of Vergy, Bishop of Autun (1223), Guy of Rochefort, Bishop of Langres (1263), and Nicholas of Fontaine, Archdeacon of Valenciennes (1236), who became bishop of Cambrai in 1247.

From this time on, the seal and ecclesiastical arms followed a parallel development. Heraldic bearings indicate both the person of the owner of the seal, who is thoroughly identified by the arms, and the date of the document, even though prelates were often designated only by their Christian names. Armorial bearings appear also on currency to identify the authority who had the right to mint and to guarantee its value and weight. Pope MARTIN V'S currency (1417–31) exhibited for the first time his coat of arms topped by the tiara and the keys. Prior to this time, only the tiara and keys were displayed.

Abbeys, priories, and other communities employed seals at the same time that personal seals were being used by churchmen, but special arms for such institutes came into use only at the beginning of the 14th century. Ecclesiastical seals were ordinarily oblong in shape, but sometimes they were round. In the latter form, decoration became more complicated; the hagiographic seal was especially varied, with countless figures of Christ, crucifixes, simple crosses, figures of the Paschal Lamb with halo, of the Trinity, the Blessed Virgin with or without the Child. Of the saints—those appearing most frequently were Peter, Paul, John, Martin, Nicholas, and James.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL COAT OF ARMS

Heraldic bearings, which continued to be part of the decoration of the seal, became a mark of ownership placed on bindings, margins of manuscripts, small chests, sacred vessels, episcopal thrones, and portraits. Arms appearing on these objects are important means of identification. During the 17th century, blazons occupy the entire surface of seals and stamps, and ecclesiastical arms are distinguishable from nonecclesiastical only by such external ornamentation as miters, crosiers, hats, tassels, crosses, or the staff of a prior—placed in pale behind the shield.

HERALDIC CAPACITY

Entitled by Canon Law to use armorial bearing, the prelate had the duty to create a coat of arms if he had no family coat. Following this legislation, ecclesiastical arms were seen everywhere, not only as a mark of authenticity on documents, but as a mark of ownership and ornamentation. They are etched on the façades of churches and episcopal palaces, on altars, tombs, and choir stalls; candlesticks, chalices, Missals, bookbindings, liturgical vestments, stained glass windows, and grillwork were all adorned with ecclesiastical bearings. In more recent times this multiplicity of armorial bearings has been checked by reserving its use only to patrons of churches, to donors, and to funereal monuments. Thus, in general, the right to heraldic devices in the Church was determined by dogmatic, liturgical, and canonical regulations.

It is necessary, however, to note that armorial bearings were the identifying mark not only of the ecclesiastic's person, but also of his rank. For since the rules of religious heraldry are the same as those of lay heraldry, and since the family coat of arms of a pope, bishop, or abbot nullius is indistinguishable from that of the other members of the family, his device must exhibit the insignia of his office and rank. To existing family blazons, therefore, and to those that were created for new prelates, were added the hierarchical insignia of the Church.

EMBLEMS OF ECCLESIASTICAL RANK

A variety of conventional heraldic idioms has been employed to distinguish the person and rank of their bearer.

The Tiara. The most exalted symbols were naturally reserved for the pope. Of these, the TIARA has become the emblem of the papacy. The first circlet surrounding the lower band of this headdress did not appear, it would seem, until sometime between the 9th and the 11th century. The second crown was added by BONIFACE VIII (1294–1303), and the third by BENEDICT XI (1303–04) or CLEMENT V (1305–14). Together they make up the triregnum.

The Keys. Between the tiara and the shield, the pope's arms bear two keys, one of gold in bend dexter across a silver key in sinister. The keys at first surmounted the shield, but are now placed behind the pope's blazon. They designate the supernatural power of binding and loosing bestowed by Christ on St. Peter and his successors. Moreover, the golden key indicates the power that extends to heaven, the silver key, the power over all the faithful on earth.

The Banner. The banner also is a pontifical emblem. It is the symbol of the Roman Church and its temporal power.

The Miter. The MITER is the mark of episcopal dignity and represents a sacred rank. Certain abbots at times acquired the right to the miter in their heraldic bearings.

The Hat. The most frequently used ecclesiastical crest is the hat. It is a pilgrim's hat, flat and wide-brimmed. The number of tassels (houppes) has varied through the years. The use of the hat goes back to the 13th century when INNOCENT IV (1243–54) conferred the red hat on the cardinals to distinguish them from other prelates. The hat is presented to the CARDINAL in a solemn ceremony, at times given to the new dignitary by the chief of state, when, e.g., an apostolic nuncio is promoted to the rank of cardinal.

Following the cardinals, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops also adopted the hat, but one of different color as shall be seen below.

The Crosier and Miter. The crosier is the most widely used symbol in ecclesiastical heraldry, employed by bishops, abbots, abbesses, and by religious communities. Like the scepter, the crosier is a sign of higher power, the symbol of the Good Shepherd, indicating both temporal power and episcopal jurisdiction. The miter is placed on the shield at the highest line of the chief, as is also done with the upper part of the crosier.

Coronets. The coronet or crown was sometimes placed between the shield and the hat. In France there were six ecclesiastical peerages, three of which had the rank of duchy (the archdiocese of Reims and the Dioceses of Laon and Langres) and three the rank of county (Beauvais, Châlons, and Noyon, all bishoprics). The titulars of these sees wore the respective coronets of the county or duchy. The wearing of such coronets is today forbidden by the Holy See.

Decorations. From his shield the prelate may suspend the knightly orders conferred by the pope, such as the Order of the Holy Sepulcher of Jerusalem with its cross potent gules (red), cantoned by four small crosses of the same, or those conferred by the grand masters of independent orders, such as the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, known as the KNIGHTS OF MALTA or Rhodes, with its eight-pointed white cross (in honor of the beatitudes). Formerly, the king of France conferred the orders of St. Michael and of the Holy Spirit, called the orders of the king, and many prelates were arrayed with their emblems.

The Pallium. The archiepiscopal PALLIUM is placed either above or below the shield. The pallium is of great importance since its appearance distinguishes a residential from a titular archbishop.

The Cross. Patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops are entitled to use the cross, which is placed in pale behind the shield. For patriarchs and archbishops, the cross has a double traverse; for bishops a single.

The Baton or Staff. The staff is the emblem of priors and precentors. Like the crosier, it is derived from the pilgrim's staff.

HIERARCHICAL INSIGNIA

Cardinals customarily crest their arms with a red hat from which hang two red cords, each with 15 tassels. Patriarchs and primates crest their arms with a green hat, the color of chastity and of doctrine, from which hang cords of the same color, again with 15 tassels on either side. For an archbishop, the regulations are the same, except that the number of tassels is 10 on each side. Bishops, abbots, and other prelates nullius also are entitled to use the green hat, but with six tassels. For mitred and crosiered abbots and provosts the hat is black with six tassels. Both mitred and nonmitred abbots, however, may top their arms with a black hat having three tassels. The hat of the canon, the vicar, and simple priest also is black, but with a single tassel. The four prelates di fiocchetto are entitled to the black hat with six tassels as a part of their armorial bearings. Prothonotaries apostolic may crest their escutcheon with a violet hat from which hang red cords with six red tassels on either side. The arms of domestic prelates include a violet hat with six violet tassels. In short, prelates may bear four rows of red tassels if they are in the service of the papal chamber, and three rows of violet tassels if they are prothonotaries apostolic or domestic prelates of His Holiness. Other ecclesiastics, chamberlains, chaplains, canons, rural deans, minor superiors, and priests, are all entitled to heraldry. The arms of an abbess follow the same rules, although abbesses are without jurisdiction. However, they exercise authority that entitles them to a seal and consequently to armorial bearings. Their arms bear the crosier and the rosary.

COMMUNITIES

The armorial bearings of religious communities are numerous: orders, congregations, fraternities, monasteries, and bishoprics have all had ancient arms which, unfortunately, have often been replaced by pious images with no heraldic significance.

All the major religious orders have their particular arms. The Jesuits use the monogram of Christ, IHS, with the nails of the Passion; the Benedictines of the congregation of Saint-Maur have the word Pax in a crown of thorns with one fleur-de-lis in chief and three nails tapering; the Minims bear the word Charitas; the Augustinians a flaming heart; the Carmelites have a sable shield powdered with silver, alluding to the colors of their habit and to Mount Carmel; the Premonstratensians have an escutcheon powdered with fleurs-de-lis with two crosiers in saltire; the Dominicans at the chapter of Bogotá (1965) returned to the coat of arms with “gyronny of eight, sable and argent, over all a cross flory counter-charged”; and the Franciscans bear the arms of Christ and Francis in saltire, surmounted by a cross.

Some armorial bearings can be explained by a historical fact: the Abbey of Saint-Denis, e.g., included in its arms a nail from the Passion, and the Chapter of Chartres has the tunic of Our Lady, both of which are preserved in their treasury. The shield of the chapter of Sens was emblazoned with a cross cantoned with eight crosiers, one for Sens and the seven others for the suffragan sees of Châlons, Auxerre, Meaux, Paris (made an archdiocese in the 17th century), Orléans, Nevers, and Troyes. From the initials of these originated the name Campont, which has led some to believe that there was once an “Abbey of Campont.” Several abbeys exhibited fleurs-de-lis in their capacity of royal abbeys, and some Burgundian abbeys, such as Cîteaux, Vézelay, Maizières, and the Sainte Chapelle of Dijon, added the charge of Burgundy impaled with fleurs-de-lis.

As in familial and municipal heraldry, canting arms (armorial devices with a pictorial pun) are employed in ecclesiastical coats of arms. Hence the Abbey of Ourscamp has a bear (ours) in its charge; the Abbey of Chelles exhibits a ladder (échelle); of Pontigny, a bridge (pont); Fontfroide, a fountain (fontaine); Thenailles, pliers or tongs (tenailles); etc. Abbeys used the characteristic attributes of their patron saint, a key for those dedicated to St. Peter, a sword for St. Paul, shells for St. Michael (Abbey of MONT-SAINT-MICHEL), a perfume box for St. Mary Magdalen of Vézelay; often the instruments of martyrdom, such as a wheel for St. Catherine, a gridiron for St. Lawrence, stones for St. Stephen, and swords for beheadings, appear in the arms. Occasionally, abbots carry an escutcheon impaled with the arms of their abbey or order in the dexter half, and with their family arms in the sinister.

An interesting fact to note for France is that by virtue of an edict of 1696 it was no longer permissible to wear armorial bearings without registering them and paying a fee of 20 pounds. Neither ecclesiastics nor religious communities were exonerated or exempt from this decree. The number of ecclesiastical crests was great. When the arms were not presented for registration the recalcitrant was taxed automatically. In Brittany, for example, 100 curates of poor rural parishes used armorial bearings. The bishop of Avranches was forced to intervene.

CONCLUSION

After nine centuries of existence, ecclesiastical heraldry is still alive and will undoubtedly continue as long as heraldry itself exists. It is as flourishing as familial or municipal heraldry, and at times possesses a binding force that the others lack. The special richness of its symbols and tincture endows the heraldry of the Church with decorative attractiveness, although the function it fulfills is primarily juridical.

Bibliography: D. L. GALBREATH, Papal Heraldry, v.1 of A Treatise on Ecclesiastical Heraldry (Cambridge, Eng. 1930–). J.

MEURGEY DE TUPIGNY, Armorial de l'église de France (Mâcon 1938); "Héraldique" in L'Histoire et ses methodes (Paris 1961) 740–767, with good bibliog. B. B. HEIM, Wappen-Brauch und Wap-penrecht in der Kirche (Olten 1948); Coutumes et droit héraldiques de l'église (Paris 1949).

[J. MEURGEY DE TUPIGNY]

HERBERMANN, CHARLES GEORGE

Editor, author, educator; b. Saerbeck, Westphalia, Germany, Dec. 8, 1840; d. New York City, Aug. 24, 1916. He was the oldest of the seven children of George and Elizabeth (Stipp) Herbermann. In 1851 the Herbermann family came to New York City, where Charles attended St. Alphonsus parochial school and in 1858 graduated from St. Francis Xavier College, then affiliated with St. John's College, Fordham. He taught at St. Francis Xavier while continuing to study for his M.A. (St. John's College, 1860) and Ph.D. (St. Francis Xavier, 1865). In 1869 he was appointed professor of Latin at the College of the City of New York, beginning a career that terminated with his retirement in 1915. In 1873 he was also appointed college librarian. The same year he married Mary Theresa Dieter of Baltimore, Md.; after her death in 1876, he wed Elizabeth Schoeb of New York City in 1880.

In 1884 Herbermann joined John Gilmary Shea in founding the United States Catholic Historical Society. The society was inactive from Shea's death in 1892 until 1898 when Herbermann became president, an office he held until his death. During his tenure, there were published nine volumes of Historical Records and Studies and such monographs as Unpublished Letters of Charles Carroll of Carrollton (1902) and Waldseemüller's Cosmographiae Introductio (1907), a facsimile edition of the original (1507). Herbermann also contributed frequent articles to the society's publications. In 1905 he was chosen editor in chief of the Catholic Encyclopedia. Although his eyesight was severely impaired at that time, he saw the encyclopedia's 15 volumes to completion in 1913. Recognition of his activities came from Pius X who awarded him a knighthood of St. Gregory and the medal Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice; from the University of Notre Dame, Ind., which conferred its Laetare medal; and from Fordham University, New York City, Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., and the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., which gave him honorary degrees. His published works include editions of Salust's Bellum Jugurthinum (1886) and Bellum Catilinae (1900), a translation of Torfason's History of Ancient Vinland (1888), and The Sulpicians in the United States (1916).

Bibliography: P. CONDON, "Charles George Herbermann," Historical Records and Studies of the U. S. Catholic Historical Society of New York 10 (1917) 8–29.

[H. F. HERBERMANN]

HERBERT OF CHERBURY, EDWARD

Religious philosopher, historian, soldier, and diplomatist, elder brother of George Herbert, the religious poet; b. Eyton-on-Severn (Shropshire), March 3, 1583; d. London, Aug. 20, 1648. Of a noble Welsh family, Herbert was educated at University College, Oxford. Shortly after the accession of James I he was created a Knight of the Bath. He went abroad in 1610 for seven years as a soldier of fortune, and made the acquaintance of several scholars, including P. GASSENDI and H. GROTIUS. In 1618 or 1619 he went as ambassador extraordinary to the French court; he was recalled in 1621 owing to differences with De Luynes, but went back the next year as ordinary ambassador. On his return to England he received the Irish peerage of Castle Island, and in 1629 Charles I raised him to the English peerage as Baron Herbert of Cherbury. When the Civil War commenced he sided with the royalists, and in 1644 surrendered his castle at Montgomery to the parliamentarians.

Herbert is remembered as a historian for The Life and Raigne of King Henry VIII (1649) and his Expeditio Buckinghami Ducis (1656). The Life of Herbert by Himself was first printed by Horace Walpole in 1764. His Latin and English poems were published by his son in 1665. His most important work is the De veritate prout distinguitur a revelatione, a verisimili, a possibili, et a falso (Paris 1624). The third edition appeared in London in 1645 together with a short treatise De causis errorum, a tract De religione laici, and an Appendix ad sacerdotes. His De religione gentilium (Amsterdam 1663) is a kind of pioneer comparative religion.

Herbert held that man is a complex unity of body and soul, but that, while the body is passive, the mind is active in knowing. The senses bring things within the reach of the mind's activities. Presupposing a harmony between the world of things and the mind, he held that truth consists in the harmony between things and analogous mental faculties, which are as innumerable as the things with which they are in harmony. These faculties, though innumerable, can be classified in four groups: natural instinct, internal sense, external sense, and reasoning. Man knows by means of "common notions" or innate ideas, which have the distinctive qualities of apriority, independence, universality, certainty, and necessity. Herbert did not determine the number of these common notions, his main concern being to fix the common notions of religion, viz:

(1) there is a Supreme Being or Deity; (2) this Deity is to be worshiped; (3) the chief part of worship consists in the moral life; (4) man should make expiation for his sins by repentance; and (5) man's deeds will be rewarded or punished in the next life. For him, these five notions determined the character of the natural religion of reason and shaped the primitive religions of mankind before these were corrupted by the sacerdotalism that originated in the self-seeking and craft of men profiteering on religion. They became the five articles of religion held by the English deists of the 18th century; thus Herbert is considered to be the father of English DEISM. His ideas have certain affinities with those of the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS and the SCOTTISH SCHOOL OF COMMON SENSE.

Bibliography: Works. De veritate, tr. M. H. CARRÉ (Bristol 1937); De religione laici, ed. and tr. H. R. HUTCHESON (New Haven 1944), critical study of Herbert's life and work with bibliog. Literature. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster Md. 1959) 5:53–54. V. SAINATI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:1057–60. M. M. ROSSI, La vita, le opere, i tempi di Edoardo Herbert di Cherbury, 3 v. (Florence 1947).

[E. A. SILLEM]

HERBIGNY, MICHAEL D'

Theologian, Orientalist; b. Lille, France, May 8, 1880; d. Aix-en-Provence, Dec. 24, 1957. He joined the Jesuits (1897), was ordained (1910), and became professor of Sacred Scripture and theology at the Jesuit scholasticate in Enghien, Belgium (1912–21), and director of graduate studies at the Gregorian University in Rome (1921–23). As president (1923–26) and then rector (1926–31) of the Pontifical Oriental Institute he developed greatly the school and its library, and founded its semiannual periodical Orientalia Christiana. His role in the foundation of the Pontifical Russian College in Rome (1929) was important. He was special consultor for the Congregation of the Oriental Church (1923–37) and a member of the Pontifical Commission for Russia from 1926. During his journeys to Russia he was politically indiscrete, but collected abundant documents, later published in articles or resounding tracts. His activity considerably alleviated suffering during the terrible Russian famine (1922–23). He became titular bishop of Ilium (1926) and assistant at the papal throne (1934), but poor health forced his retirement (1934). His numerous articles and books were devoted to theology, ecumenical apologetics, and contemporary history of Bolshevism. His principal work was Theologica de Ecclesia (2 v. 1920–21, 3d ed. 1928).

Bibliography: Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme 5:633. H. BEYLARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales 2049–50.

[P. GOUBERT]

HERDER

The name of a distinguished international Catholic publishing house owned by the Herder family in Freiburg im Breisgau.

Bartholomew (1774–1839) founded the house in 1801. A colorful and enterprising publisher, he edited, published, and printed the army newspaper and official bulletins of Metternich, whom he served as press liaison in Paris in 1815. Eventually he established an institute for lithography and engraving, which produced highly acclaimed atlases and scholarly publications.

Benjamin (1818–88), who succeeded his father Bartholomew, was the master architect of the Herder image “Universal-verlag.” He expanded the firm's scope, emphasizing theological, encyclopedic, and other scholarly works. He published the Bible for Students (1848), which was translated into 60 languages. His contributions to Catholic publishing included the production of Kirchenlexikon (12 v. 1847–60), a monumental encyclopedia covering every aspect of theology; Theologische Bibliothek (31 v. 1882–1930), a theological library; and Konversations-Lexikon (5 v. 1853–57), a popular general encyclopedia. He published also Schott (1884), a popular layman's missal. Because of his farflung and varied publishing programs, Benjamin was a major influence in the Catholic revival of 19th-century Germany.

Hermann (1864–1937), Benjamin's son, broadened the firm's work into the fields of philosophy, political science, law, and archeology. He published papal encyclicals and initiated the publication of Ludwig von Pastor's History of the Popes (16 v. 1886–1933). Hermann also built an impressive new plant in Freiburg, and developed an international network of publishing and distributing divisions in Vienna, Rome, Barcelona, Tokyo, and St. Louis.

Theophil Herder-Dorneich (1898–1987), Hermann's son-in-law, assumed the firm's direction in 1937 at a difficult time. The Nazi regime blocked further expansion and threatened to close the house when the firm, “for reasons of conscience,” refused to have articles in an encyclopedia rewritten to conform to Nazi ideology. In November 1944 the publishing house in Freiburg was completely destroyed by bombing, but the plant was reconstructed and modernized after the war. All standard works were reissued; a juvenile division, a book club, and several new magazines were added, a chain of 16 book stores in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland was developed, and branches of the firm were established in Buenos Aires, Santiago de Chile, São Paulo, and Bogotá. Under Herder-Dorneich's direction Herder Verlag has become the world's largest international Catholic publishing house. He also supervised the publication of a Catholic catechism that has been translated into 30 languages, and continued the firm's commitment to publish work to foster the new currents in the Church, especially those devolving from the work of VATICAN COUNCIL II and world ecumenism. (See ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.)

Herder and Herder was established in New York City (1957) to carry on the firm's activities in the English-speaking world. A branch had been set up (1873) in St. Louis, Mo., but as a result of World War I it was incorporated in 1917 as a separate and autonomous firm, the B. Herder Book Company of St. Louis. The initial objective of Herder and Herder was to publish scholarly works from abroad in translation; in keeping with the spirit of the era inaugurated by Pope John XXIII, it successfully embarked upon a new program of publishing original works by U.S. scholars. An important facet of this project is the English-language publication of the ecumenical monthly for the Christian world, Herder Correspondence. The firm's affiliated organization, the Herder Book Center (New York City), distributes the publications of 25 other U.S. Catholic publishing houses, including a number of university presses.

[W. M. LINZ]

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON

German critic and philosopher of history; b. Mohrungen, East Prussia, Aug. 25, 1744; d. Weimar, Dec. 18, 1803. He was the third child of Gottfried Herder. After attending Latin school, he began (1762) the study of theology at the University of Königsberg. He went to Riga (1764) as a teacher and there accepted an assignment as preacher in 1767. His first literary and linguistic essays were Über die neuere deutsche Literatur (1766) and Kritische Wälder (1769). On May 23, 1769, he left Riga by sea to travel in France. His Journal meiner Reise, begun after his arrival but published posthumously, reflects the liberating experience of the journey. His time in Nantes and Paris served for the study of the French language and literature. After returning to Germany, he traveled, as companion to Prince Peter von Holstein-Gottorp, to Hanover, Kassel, and Darmstadt. There he met Caroline Flachsland, whom he married in 1773. In Strassburg, Herder resigned as tutor to the prince but remained in that city until the end of 1771 because of a critical eye operation. There he met GOETHE (1770), and from this association came the manifesto of the Sturm und Drang movement, Von deutscher Art und Kunst (1773), with its contribution to Shakespeare studies. The work also included Goethe's essay on the cathedral of Strassburg. In his own prize essay for the Royal Academy, Über den

Johann Gottfried Von Herder.

Ursprung der Sprache (1772), Herder developed an organic-genetic interpretation of language. In Bückeburg, where he became court chaplain in 1771, Herder experienced a crisis in his life and a religious turning point. In Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechtes (1774) he recognized the Bible as the self-revelation of God. His Auch eine Philosophie der Geschichte zur Bildung der Menschheit (1774) attempts to study history as God's action in nature and upon nations and the realization of God's action as successively different among different peoples. The first volume of Herder's collection of folk-songs, fairy tales, and myths appeared in 1779. At Wieland's suggestion and Goethe's urging, Herder went to Weimar in 1776, where he published (1778) his study of aesthetics, Plastik; it differentiates sculpture from painting and inquires into its representational potentialities. Herder attempted a sociology of poetry in Über die Wirkung der Dichtkunst auf die Sitten der Völker in alten und neuen Zeiten, which sees poetry as shaping the tribal community. In 1783, while renewing his friendship with Goethe, Herder wrote Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (part 1, 1784; part 2, 1785), a compendium of all his ideas and the most comprehensive treatment of the knowledge of his time. The meaning of world history, he held, consists in the development of humanity, which is both the essence of all human natural tendencies and, at the same time, an ethical ideal. In 1792 Herder reflected on the French Revolution in Briefe, die Fortschritte der Humanität betreffend, which opposed to the concept of revolution one of evolution, which would lead to a state government by the people. In Zerstreute Blätter (1785) he turned his attention again to poetry. In 1788 Herder traveled to Italy, which, however, he did not regard with classical eyes as Goethe had done. Personal reasons led to a separation from Goethe in 1793, and Herder was left isolated in Weimar. In 1796 Jean Paul (Richter) became a late disciple of Herder, who had made enemies among the other romanticists by his critique of Kant in Metakritik zur Kritik der reinen Vernunft (1799) and Kalligone (1800). The Christliche Schriften (1794–98) contains five collections of theological inquiries with a critique on the handing down of the Gospels. Herder's influence was enormous, especially on the development of Romanticism.

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke, ed. B. SUPHAN, 33 v. (Berlin 1877–1913). R. HAYM, Herder nach seinem Leben und seinen Werken, 2 v. (Berlin 1880–85). R. UNGER, Hamann und die Aufklärung, 2 v. (Jena 1911; 2d ed. Halle 1925). F. MEINECKE, Die Entstehung des Historismus, ed. C. HINRICHS (Munich 1959). F. MCEACHRAN, Life and Philosophy of Johann Gottfried Herder (Oxford 1939).

[I. G. MERKEL]

HERDRICH, CHRISTIAN WOLFGANG

Jesuit missionary and mathematician; b. Graz, Austria, June 25, 1625; d. Hangzhou, China, July 18, 1684. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1641 and departed for the Far East in 1656. He spent two years on the island of Sulawesi before entering the Chinese provinces of Shanxi and Henan in 1660. In 1671 he joined the group of Jesuit mathematicians attached to the imperial court of Kangxi in Beijing. He wrote what is probably the first Chinese-Latin dictionary and collaborated on a Latin translation of the writings of Confucius, Confucius, Sinarum Philosophus, sive Scientia Sinensis exposita studio et opera Prosperi Intorcetta, Christiani Herdtrich, Francisci Rougemont, Philippi Couplet, P.P. Soc. Jesu (Paris 1678). From this work European scholars became acquainted with the teachings of the Chinese philosopher. During the last nine years of his life, Herdrich was superior of the mission at Hangzhou.

Bibliography: L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt (Paderborn 1934); photoduplicated with rev. and suppl., 2 v. (Louvain-Heverlee 1962). E. T. HIBBERT, K'ang Hsi, Emperor of China (London 1940). A. H. ROWBOTHAM, Missionary and Mandarin: The Jesuits at the Court of China (Berkeley 1942).

[J. V. MENTAG]

HEREFORD, ANCIENT SEE OF

One of the dioceses (Worcester was the other) erected from lands formerly under Lichfield. At some time after 675 and before 680, THEODORE (of Tarsus), Archbishop of Canterbury, brought the huge and unwieldy see of Lichfield under the jurisdiction of Canterbury and, as one of his major administrative reforms, subdivided it. The first bishop of Hereford was probably Putta, Bishop of Rochester (669–686), who had fled to the protection of Seaxwulf, Bishop of Lichfield (i.e., Mercia), after Aethelred, King of Mercia, had devastated Kent and destroyed Rochester (676). The see of Hereford originally corresponded to the area settled by the Anglo-Saxon tribes known collectively as the Magonsaetan, but it also included areas of Celtic occupation, and its boundaries later included all of Herefordshire, southern Shropshire, and a few parishes in other counties.

The cathedral church was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin Mary and to St. ETHELBERT, King of East Anglia (martyred c. 793). The present cathedral dates from 1079–1110 and was begun by the learned Robert Losinga (1079–95) and continued by GERARD (1096–1100), who became archbishop of York. The ablest bishop of Hereford in the 12th century was Gilbert FOLIOT (1148–63), better known after his translation as bishop of London (1163–87) and adviser to HENRY II, whom he supported in the quarrel with Archbishop Thomas BECKET. The best known 13th-century bishop of Hereford was St. Thomas of Cantelupe, chancellor of Oxford University and, briefly, royal chancellor (1265) during the baronial ascendancy under Simon de Montfort.

The “Use of Hereford,” dating probably from the episcopate of Robert Losinga, was nearer to the Roman rite than the “Use of SARUM.” The former was abolished under HENRY VIII. The CATHEDRAL SCHOOL, one of the better educational institutions of the western Midlands, has a continuous history dating from the early 14th century or, probably, earlier. The cathedral has a large collection of MSS, incunabula, and relics.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1817–30) 6.3:1210–17. W. W. CAPES, ed., Charters and Records of Hereford Cathedral (Hereford 1908). A. SCHMITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:244–245. Canterbury and York Society publications, passim.

[R. S. HOYT]

HEREFORD, NICHOLAS

Wyclifite, Carthusian; d. Coventry Charterhouse, after 1417. Nothing is known of him until 1369, when he became a fellow at Queen's College, Oxford, where John WYCLIF was a regular resident for the greater part of his Oxford career. It is safe to assume that Hereford's conversion to Lollardy was due to Wyclif's influence (see LOLLARDS). About 1380, Hereford was one of the translators of the Lollard Bible, perhaps with John PURVEY. In 1382 he received his doctorate in theology. In the same year, preaching on Ascension Day at the invitation of the chancellor of Oxford, Robert RYGGE, he delivered a sermon in support of Wyclif that resulted in his own condemnation by Church and State. Failing to receive a sympathetic hearing from John of Gaunt, Hereford and Philip REPINGTON appealed to Rome in person, before their excommunication by Abp. William COURTENAY. In Rome Hereford was imprisoned, but the pope saved him from death. During a popular uprising in 1385 he escaped from prison and returned to England. His leadership of Wyclif's disciples was cut short by his renewed excommunication and arrest in 1387. Sometime before December 1391, he recanted and made a full submission. Thereafter he served as chancellor and treasurer of Hereford cathedral. In 1417 he retired to a Coventry charterhouse where he died in old age, date unknown.

Bibliography: C. L. KINGSFORD, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; 1908–38) 14:418–420. M. DEANESLY, The Significance of the Lollard Bible (London 1951). J. H. DAHMUS, The Prosecution of John Wyclif (New Haven 1952). K. B. MCFARLANE, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity (New York 1953). A. B. EMDEN, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. (Oxford 1957–59) 2:913–915.

[J. E. HEALEY]

HEREFORD USE

Hereford, on the borders of Wales, was founded as a diocese by Putta in 676. St. ETHELBERG (d. c. 793), King of East Anglia, was buried in the cathedral and in the 9th century was declared joint patron. The present cathedral was built between 1079 and 1110, a product, like so many others, of the Norman conquest, to which also is owed the organization of the chapter and the liturgical practices there established. With Hereford again it can be said with some certainty that the local use was derived from Rouen and that the borrowing took place during the episcopate of Robert de Bethune (bishop 1131–48), who restored the cathedral (damaged during the civil war that followed the death of Henry I) and reformed the liturgy there. Curiously enough the Use of Hereford penetrated to Savoy where it was adopted in 1267 (persisting until 1580) at the collegiate church of St. Catherine at Aiguebelle; the founder of this church was a former bishop of Hereford.

In the Mass rite the prayers at the foot of the altar were similar to those of the other English uses (that is, in the short form, with Psalm 42, versicles, etc., said while vesting or on the way to the altar). The Officium (Introit) was repeated three times as at Sarum. The bread and wine were set on the altar before the Offertory verse, but both were offered together with a single prayer. At the Orate fratres (et sorores) does not occur at Hereford there was no answer. At the giving of the kiss of peace the formula was similar to that of York. There were four prayers (as at Rouen) before the celebrant's Communion. A third ablution was taken in water only, and then the chalice was laid horizontally on the paten. Mass ended in the ordinary way, but there was no blessing or Last Gospel.

It is particularly in the HOLY WEEK services that the greatest affinity with Rouen is to be seen. Thus on Palm Sunday the combination of the procession of palms with one of the Blessed Sacrament, the similarities between the Mandatum at Hereford and Rouen, the Exsultet with its addition pro rege N. et principe nostro N. (the original reference being to the king of France and the duke of Normandy) show that Hereford adopted the liturgical practices of Rouen almost en bloc.

Bibliography: W. MASKELL, The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, According to the Uses of Sarum, Bangor, York and Hereford, and the Modern Roman Liturgy (3d ed. Oxford 1882). A. A. KING, Liturgies of the Past (Milwaukee 1959). W. H. ST. J. HOPE and E. G. ATCHLEY, English Liturgical Colours (London 1918). E. BISHOP, Liturgica Historica, ed. R. H. CONNOLLY and K. SISAM (Oxford 1918). W. H. FRERE and L. E. G. BROWN, eds., The Hereford Breviary (Henry Bradshaw Society 26, 40, 46; London 1904, 1911, 1915). H. J. FEASEY, Ancient English Holy Week Ceremonial (London 1897).

[L. C. SHEPPARD/EDS.]

HERESY

The words "schism" (σχίσμα) and "heresy" (αἵρεσις) both appear in the NT, but neither is a technical term in the modern canonico-theological sense. While the NT term "SCHISM" remains quite undifferentiated and undeveloped, the term "heresy" shows the remote beginnings of its later technical orientation.

In Hellenism, heresy (from Gr. αἰρέομαι, to choose) meant (1) a teaching and (2) a school, e.g., a philosophical school such as the Stoics. In Hellenic and rabbinic Jewry heresy designated a religious party within Judaism (e.g., the Pharisees or Sadducees). In these instances the word has a neutral, nonpejorative sense.

This neutral sense of the word appears in Acts, where St. Paul calls the Pharisees "the strictest sect [heresy] of our religion" (Acts 26.5; see 5.17; 15.5). Nevertheless, when the Jewish lawyer Tertullus referred to Christianity as “the Nazarene sect” (Acts 24.5), making it simply another party within Judaism (cf. Acts 28.22), St. Paul disavowed this sectarian appellation, saying: “I admit that in serving the God of my forefathers I follow the Way [ὁδός: see W. Michaelis, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament 5:93], which they call a heresy” (Acts 24.14). For St. Paul Christianity could not be a heresy, or party, in any sense, much less a heretical enclave within Judaism.

Statue of Giordano Bruno, who in 1600 was burnt at the stake for heresy at this site, Campo dei Fiori, Rome. (©Ted Spiegel/CORBIS)

When St. Paul uses the term “heresy” in a Christian context, the meaning is pejorative, standing for splinter groupings or movements within the Christian community that threaten Church unity (Gal 5.20; 1 Cor 11.19). Paul speaks also of the “heretical man” (Ti 3.10), or the sectarian-minded man, in a similar reproving way.

2 Pt 2.1 warns of “lying teachers who will bring in destructive sects,” thus marking the start of a sharper delineation of the word “heresy” in the direction of the later technical term. Here the heresy, burdened with heterodoxy, seemingly becomes a centrifugal movement dividing the Church.

Patristic Era. From the late 2d century onward the Fathers usually discriminated between heresy and schism. Both were understood not as abstract errors or as individual attitudes but rather as organized bodies or sects outside the Catholic Church. Heresy involved doctrinal error, whereas schism meant orthodox dissent. St. Augustine wrote: “you are a schismatic by your sacrilegious separation and a heretic by your sacrilegious doctrine” (C. Gaud. 2.9.10; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 53:267). “Heretics violate the faith by thinking falsely about God, while schismatics break away from fraternal love by their wicked separations, although they believe as we do” (Fid. et symb. 8.21; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 41:27). The Fathers, however, frequently used the two terms more or less interchangeably. Thus Cyprian called the Novatians schismatics and heretics without any distinction; and the first Council of Toledo (400) spoke of a man returning to the Church “de haereticorum schismate” (cap. 12; Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 3:1000). To many Fathers it seemed otiose to make a nice distinction between heresy and schism, when, pastorally and religiously, the crucial fact was that both were impious counterfeit communions living outside the true Church (see Cyprian, Epist. 69.1; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3.2:749–750). As both issued in corporate separation from the common life of the Church, it did not much matter whether that alienation came from an obdurate persistence in false doctrine or from a crooked desire to live apart from the disciplined life and ordered worship established by the Church.

Some Fathers saw in protracted schism an inbuilt bias toward heresy; there is in schism a latent theological problem that will work its way to the surface, or else some theological ground will be elaborated to bolster up the schism. St. Jerome wrote: “There is no schism which does not invent some heresy for itself in order to justify its departure from the Church” (In Titum 3.10–11; Patrologia Latina 26:598). St. Augustine also tended to look on heresy as “a long-standing schism” (C. Cresc. 2.7.9; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 52:367).

But “not all error is heresy” (St. Augustine, Haer.; Patrologia Latina 42:19); and “not every error betrays godlessness” (Pope Celestine I, Epist. 25.3; Patrologia Latina 50:550). Wherever there is simple error or misunderstanding as to the faith, there is no heresy, provided there is fundamental docility to the teaching of the Church. In order to have heresy there must be the stubborn inflexible will, once the falsity of the doctrine in question has become clear to the Church and has been made clear to the erring Christian, to persist in denying the doctrine taught and received by the Catholic Church. Such a willfully obdurate posture, which turns its face against the whole Church and which swarms to form its own conventicle, is the mark of true heresy, which the Fathers reprobated as gravely sinful. Although the presumption of bad faith, wherever heresy was present, strongly influenced the judgment of the Fathers (see J. Korbacher, Ausserhalb der Kirche kein Heil? [Munich 1963] 155–164), still St. Augustine held that those who have not fathered the error but received it from others, who do not cling to it pertinaciously but seek the truth, “are by no means to be reckoned among the heretics” (Epist. 43.1; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 34.2:85).

The Fathers emphasized the religio-moral side of heresy, with its causes and consequences under this aspect; they stressed also its corporate divisive stance.

Middle Ages and After. Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory dominated the thinking of the medieval scholastics on the theme of heresy. Like the Fathers, so too the scholastics delineated only in a very generic way what is, objectively speaking, the heterodox teaching required to constitute heresy; they laid much more stress on the moral aspect of heresy, i.e., on the sin of heresy with its willful, proud isolation from the communion of the faithful, its contemptuous rejection of Church discipline, and its tragic religious consequences for the life of the believer. It was not so much abstract heresy that was cataloged, as the guilty heretic rebuked.

Notwithstanding the scholastics’ efforts to systematize the concept of heresy, the term exhibits a notable elasticity in its use. From the Middle Ages until well beyond the time of Trent, the basic correlative concepts, faith and heresy, were often used, both theologically (see St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 11.2; 1a, 32.4; In 1 sent. 33.1.5) and in Church documents (Enchiridion symbolorum 902, 906, 1800) with a less precise content and a wider application than is customary today. Faith was often taken globally to comprise everything of vital significance for a truly Christian and ecclesial way of thinking and for a sound life of faith—everything, therefore, falling within the competence of the Church’s discipline of faith. Correspondingly, a heretic was one willfully guilty of a stubborn antagonism to this docile faith-attitude, one whose conduct jeopardized the truthfulness and soundness of his life of faith. Intractability and pertinacity, coupled with a practical contempt for the teaching authority of the Church, played a decisive role in heresy so conceived. Such a vital and pastoral view of heresy takes in a wider range of reprehensible conduct than the denial of formally revealed truths taught by the Church. It includes every serious threat to the integrity of the life of faith and every stubborn contemptuous rejection of Church discipline.

The medieval scholastics, with their optimistic view of the powers of human reason to achieve the truth, took a correspondingly poor view, morally speaking, of any error, especially heresy. Hence the conviction, long dominant, that heresy’s fellow was bad faith; and it was a long while before heresy was reckoned as falling within the ambit of inculpable error.

Since the 17th and 18th centuries, concomitantly with the fuller development of the treatise of theological criteriology, heresy became much more predominantly a doctrinal censure, designating objectively heterodox doctrine as that which contravenes a truth of divine and Catholic faith. In this orientation the religio-moral subjective aspects of heresy are not particularly attended to, although there are indications today that the factor of personal guilt is being reintegrated into the concept of heresy. See Codex iuris canonici c. 751 for the modern concept of heresy.

See Also: CENSURE, THEOLOGICAL; RULE OF FAITH; THINKING WITH THE CHURCH, RULES FOR; UNITY OF FAITH; UNITY OF THE CHURCH.

Bibliography: J. BROSCHE, Das Wesen der Häresie (Bonn 1936). H. E. W. TURNER, The Pattern of Christian Truth (London 1954). K. RAHNER, On Heresy (New York 1964). M. MEINERTZ, "σχίσμα und αίρεσις im N.T.," Biblische Zeitschrift 1 (1957) 114–118. J. DE GUIBERT, "La Notion d'hérésie chez Saint Augustin," Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 11 (1920) 368–382. G. W. H. LAMPE, ed., A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford 1961–) fasc. 1, p. 51. A. LANG, "Der Bedeutungswandel der Begriffe 'fides' und 'haeresis' und die dogmatische Wertung der Konzilsentscheidungen von Vienne und Trient," Münchener theologische Zeitschrift 4 (1953) 133–146.

[F. X. LAWLOR/EDS.]

HERESY (CANON LAW)

In canon law heresy is the offense of one who, having been baptized and retaining the name of Christian, pertinaciously denies or doubts any of the truths that one is under obligation of divine and Catholic faith to believe (cf. Codex iuris canonici [Rome 1918; repr. Graz 1955] c. 751). The element of pertinacity distinguishes heresy from inculpable error with regard to a truth of faith, although such error is sometimes called material, as distinguished from formal, heresy. The truth that is denied, or from which assent is deliberately and culpably withheld, must be one of Catholic as well as of divine faith, i.e., it must be explicitly proposed by the Church as a truth of divine faith (Codex iuris canonici c. 750 §1; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium c. 598).

The term "heresy" is no longer used by the Catholic Church in reference to those persons who are outside her visible communion (cf. Vatican II, Unitatis redintegratio 3). Total heresy, i.e., the total rejection of faith, is known as APOSTASY.

Pertinacity in error does not require a protracted period. It means simply that, despite certainty that a truth is of Catholic faith, the heretic with culpable obstinacy refuses to assent to it, even if he does not give positive assent to the contrary error. If all the conditions necessary for a deliberate act are verified, this does not demand a lapse of time, and the sin may be committed in the secrecy of the heart, although one is not subject to the canonical penalties unless the heresy has been externally manifested.

Most Catholic moralists agree that heresy destroys the virtue of faith even though the dissent or doubt concerns but a single revealed truth. To refuse assent to anything God has revealed is equivalent to refusing assent to God as revealing and thus to all He has revealed. If a heretic continues to accept other truths of faith, it is because he elects to accept them on his own authority rather than that of God.

Doubt in this context is to be understood as the deliberate suspension or withholding of assent and is by no means to be confused either with indeliberate hesitation of mind that may occur when one considers a particular truth or with temptations, even vehement temptations, to disbelief.

Propositions contrary to divine and Catholic faith are called heretical, and those who profess such doctrine are sometimes referred to as heretics. Most of these, it may be assumed, are heretics only in the material sense of the term and are either in completely inculpable error or their responsibility is attenuated to a greater or lesser degree by ignorance. Formal heresy in the full sense, implying the rejection of a doctrine known certainly to be of faith by one who sees himself as willing to accept the authority of God revealing in other matters, appears somewhat unrealistic and psychologically improbable.

See Also: FAITH, 3; HERESY.

Bibliography: J. A. MCHUGH and C. J. CALLAN, Moral Theology, 2 v. (New York 1960), v. 1. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER, v. 1 (Westminster, Md. 1961) 54–57. D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (12th ed. Freiburg-Barcelona 1955). K. RAHNER, On Heresy, tr. W. J. O'HARA (New York 1964).

[G. A. BUCKLEY/EDS.]

HERESY, HISTORY OF

The word αίρεσις in classical Greek signified a school or party. It was used by the Hellenists to designate a philosophical school and by Josephus to describe the Jewish theological sects.

1. In the Early Church

The primitive Christians were considered at first another school or sect within Judaism (Acts 24.5, 14; 28.22). But among themselves the early Christians quickly distinguished between those who accepted the doctrine as preached by the Apostles and received by the Church, or assembly of the faithful, and those who tried to adapt the Christian message to their own personal, doctrinal, or disciplinary notions (1 Cor 11.19; Gal 5.20). What the Church rejected in thought or deed was heretical. Thus both the doctrines propagated by the Gnostic sects (see GNOSTICISM) and the QUARTODECIMAN adherence to the Jewish paschal calendar were condemned as heretical (Hippolytus, Philos. 7.18.19).

In the 2d and 3d Centuries. During the 2d century little distinction was made between heresy and SCHISM, and the criterion of true faith and practice appealed to was that of the Roman Church. The earliest collection of heretical doctrines was made by JUSTIN MARTYR in his Syntagma against all heresies. This work is mentioned by Justin himself (I Apol. 26.8). Irenaeus in his Exposé and Refutation of the False Gnosis, usually quoted as Adversus haereses, used the Syntagma of Justin and mentions a Contra Marcionem that appears to be part of Justin's work (Adversus haereses 4.19.9). The exposé concentrates on the Valentinian Gnostics but also gives a résumé of the beginnings of Gnosticism with the teachings of Simon, Menander, and other early sectaries.

During the reign of Pope ZEPHYRINUS (199–217), HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME wrote a Syntagma directed against all heresies; it is cited by Eusebius of Caesarea (Ecclesiastical History 6.22) and by Photius (Bibliotheca codex 121). A fragment of this work, the Contra Noetum, has been discovered and published by P. Nautin. Hippolytus wrote also an Elenchus or collection of 33 heresies from that of the Naassenians to that of Noetus, together with their refutations. It is known under the incorrect title of the Philosophumena. The author traces each doctrinal aberration to a school of false philosophy but in general follows IRENAEUS for his information. The work seems likewise to have been synthesized by TERTULLIAN as an appendix to his De praescriptione. Jerome (De Viris illustribus 74) attributes an Adversus omnes haereses to VICTORINUS OF PETTAU (d. 304).

Treatises of Epiphanius and Augustine on Heresies. Epiphanius of Constantia between 374 and 377 composed a Panarion or box of antidotes against all heresies. He names and refutes 80 heresies, relying on Irenaeus and Hippolytus for the older doctrinal errors, and citing the writings of heretics themselves for the more recent heresies. The Panarion was used by Filastrius of Brescia (d. 397) for his Liber de haeresibus (385–391).

Toward 428 AUGUSTINE wrote a De haeresibus for the deacon Quodvultdeus; it is in the main a catalogue of 88 heresies. The last eight cited, however, including Pelagianism (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM), give evidence of his personal study and knowledge. THEODORET OF CYR (d. c. 460) wrote a compendium of heretical fables (c. 451) in five books, claiming that he culled these false doctrines from his reading of the early Church Fathers. For ARIUS, Eudoxius, NESTORIUS, and EUTYCHES, he cites primary evidence. At the close of the patristic period, JOHN DAMASCENE (d. 749) lists a catalogue of heresies as the second part of his Source of Knowledge. Only the three final heresies mentioned, namely, Islam, ICONOCLASM, and the Paulician heresy, are examined from contemporary evidence.

Bibliography: Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 5:640–642. H. PETRÉ, “Haeresis, Schisma et leurs synonymes latins,” Revue des études latines 15 (1936) 316–325. W. BAUER, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum (Tübingen 1934). J. BROSCHE, Das Wesen der Häresie (Bonn 1936). C. JOURNET, L'Église du Verbe Incarné, 2 v. (Paris 1951) 818–823. G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 986–987.

[P. ROCHE]

2. Medieval Period

During the Middle Ages both eastern and western Europe were essentially a Christian society. Thus, heresy, a body of doctrine substantially differing in some aspect from the doctrine taught by the Church, was bound to have reverberations in the secular world as well as in the Church. The early Christian community, essentially a minority Church (especially in the West) before Constantine's Edict of Religious Toleration (313), had been shaken in the 4th and 5th centuries by such major heresies as ARIANISM, DONATISM, NESTORIANISM, MONOPHYSITISM, and, in the West, by Pelagianism. In the 6th and 7th centuries, while Europe was absorbed in regrouping after the mass migrations of the barbarian nations, the BYZANTINE EMPIRE was still split over the question of Monophysitism, complicated now by the controversy over the THREE CHAPTERS, and turned to MONOTHELITISM in its attempt to reestablish religious unity throughout the empire.

Earlier Middle Ages. With the West's revival of interest in learning in the 8th and 9th centuries—a phenomenon often labeled the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE, but with its religious facets called the Carolingian Reformation—new study of the inherited theology of late antiquity resulted in the first truly “medieval” heresies. The FILIOQUE controversy had overtones of heresy, as did the contemporary predestination (see GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS) and Eucharistic Controversies, the latter spearheaded by the opponents PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS and RATRAMNUS. ADOPTIONISM flourished and died. The pantheistic concept of the world, inherent in the Stoic and Neoplatonic philosophy behind Arianism, seems to have received some impetus from the writings of JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA—although it is probable that this was the result of misunderstanding Erigena's thought. At the same time the BYZANTINE CHURCH and State were convulsed by the great struggle over heretical ICONOCLASM.

High Middle Ages. With the revitalization of all facets of life in Europe in the High Middle Ages, heresy once again became a real issue in the religious and secular worlds. Despite the CLUNIAN and GREGORIAN reforms the 11th century saw the return of the Eucharistic heresy in BERENGARIUS OF TOURS, who adopted the older teachings of Ratramnus. During the 12th century—the century of the CRUSADES, of the CISTERCIANS, and of the nascent medieval universities—occurred the rise of the CATHARI, the most serious heretical threat with which the Middle Ages had to contend. The religious equilibrium of the early 12th century had been thrown off balance by the sporadic heresies of PETER OF BRUYS and his PETROBRUSIANS, of HENRY OF LAUSANNE, and of ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, all of whom advanced certain antisacramental and antisacerdotal ideas, and by AMALRIC OF BÈNE and his AMALRICIANS, who were essentially pantheists. But only the Cathari, with their roots in the DUALISM of the BOGOMILS and PAULICIANS, had a viable doctrinal framework. The heresy, originally Eastern, was brought to Europe after the Second Crusade and by 1175 counted members in northern France, the Rhineland, and Italy, but especially in southern France, the Midi. There the orthodox Christian Church waged spiritual and material war on the strongholds of the Cathari (or ALBIGENSES). The CISTERCIANS, the Albigensian Crusade, the inquisition, the University of Toulouse and, most importantly, the MENDICANT ORDERS finally proved effective, and by 1300 Catharism was defeated in Europe.

The same 12th century also saw the rise of serious non-Manichaean heresies. Although heretical fringe groups, such as the Judaizing Passagini and the followers of radicals, such as ÉON OF STELLA or TANCHELM at Antwerp, were of only passing interest, a number of heresies arose out of the contemporary demand for extreme Church reform in the spirit of apostolic poverty and preaching (see POVERTY MOVEMENT). These heresies shook the religious foundations of all Europe. Although the same spirit had motivated orthodox reform interests among the PATARINES, HUMILIATI, and FRANCISCANS, in the WALDENSES the original ideal of evangelical poverty deviated into an antisacerdotal heresy. In 1173 Valdés of Lyons, a layman, renounced all his worldly possessions, took a vow of poverty, and then began preaching to the people. As the “Poor Men of Lyons” grew more numerous, Pope LUCIUS III and Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA agreed at Verona in 1184 that Waldenses who preached without permission or who attacked the Church’s hierarchy or Sacraments would be branded as heretics, but that others would be accepted as orthodox. Thus small sects of Waldenses stayed within the Church, although the greater number eventually fell into antihierarchical heresy. The Waldenses were never as strong numerically as the contemporary Cathari, and they were banned from the empire in 1253; from that time on their membership shrank away except in the valleys of the Piedmont and the Briançonnais, where they survive today.

In the 12th, but especially in the 13th, century, groups of heretical spiritualists became discernible in European society. Molded by essentially Catharist ideas wedded to the ideology of JOACHIM OF FIORE, the various groups all adopted an extreme stand on poverty as a protest against the possessions of the Church. Thus the Franciscan SPIRITUALS, as corrupted into the FRATICELLI under ANGELUS CLARENUS, were declared heretical by Pope JOHN XXII. Amalrician ideas, now combined with rejection of the sacramental Church, lived on among the BROTHERS AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT who were found in Swabia and along the Rhine from the 12th to the 15th century. A similarly oriented group were the APOSTOLICI, founded by Segarelli of Parma (burned 1300) and his successor Fra DOLCINO (burned 1307).

Later Middle Ages. The major heresy of the 14th century was that initiated by John WYCLIF, who adopted Berengarius’s Eucharistic position concerning the permanence of bread and wine after consecration and propounded questionable doctrine concerning the Church and the ownership of property. He was silenced in May 1377 by Pope GREGORY XI and was finally condemned after his denial of TRANSUBSTANTIATION c. 1380. The LOLLARDS, who adopted Wyclif’s radical views on lordship, grace, the Sacraments, and the temporal power of the papacy, ceased to exist effectively after 1431.

In the meantime, however, Wyclif’s teachings had become of primary importance in Bohemia, where they had influenced John HUS, leader of the reform movement in Prague. Although burned as a heretic at the Council of CONSTANCE in 1415, his only heretical deviation was his rejection of the formal and necessary primacy of jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome. His followers, however, the HUSSITES, adopted the full teaching of Wyclif, abandoning orthodoxy as they came to deny transubstantiation and other traditional Catholic teachings. Emperor SIGISMUND led “crusades” against the Hussites for 15 years until their defeat in 1436; the Catholic UTRAQUISTS (moderate Hussites), however, survived alongside the orthodox Catholics in Bohemia until the rise of Lutheranism. The radical Hussite ideas were revived in the BOHEMIAN BRETHERN, a group that provided a direct link between the Hussites and the Protestants of the 16th century.

Repression. It is to the medieval concept of “kingdom” as a morally unified society that one must turn to understand the cooperation of Church and secular power in the repression of heresy during the Middle Ages. Medieval man believed that civil society, in order to survive, must adhere to a well-defined moral system. When HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR declared that “the spiritual power must institute the temporal that it might exist,” and when Pope BONIFACE VIII asserted in UNAM SANCTAM that the Church had both swords, spiritual and temporal, they meant that the contemporary civil powers, deriving their justification from Christian moral doctrine, depended necessarily on the fountainhead of that doctrine. Thus, the temporal power was expected to react against doctrines that undermined its own position. To cite an extreme example, when the Cathari branded pregnancy and normal sexual intercourse as Satan's work, or when they counseled their members to commit suicide (endura), contemporary society felt that such action could not go unpunished. In the Church's attitude toward heresy's challenge to the religious status quo, there was always much conflict between men, such as the 11th-century Bp. WAZO OF LIÈGE or BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, who insisted that faith was a matter of persuasion, and others, such as Pope INNOCENT III or St. DOMINIC, who approved of the Church's part in the effective repression of heresy. Similar tension is found in the two attitudes of St. AUGUSTINE, one stressing the voluntary character of faith and the other underlining the right of society to compel its members to good actions. Prominent medieval Christians realized that the repression of heresy remained essentially a pastoral problem and that a delicate balance was required between justice and charity: leniency in the chastisement of heresy could endanger the faith of others, but excess of zeal in administering justice might become a major impediment to the apostolate. In practice, the Church's medieval antiheresy campaign adopted as its tools the process of legatine inquest and the cooperation of ecclesiastical and civil power (see INQUISITION) to stamp out heresy that had gained a popular following.

Bibliography: E. VACANDARD, The Inquisition, tr. B. L. CONWAY (New York 1908). J. GUIRAUD, Histoire de l'inquisition au moyen âge, 2 v. (Paris 1935–38). H. X. ARQUILLIÈRE, L'Augustinisme politique (2d ed. Paris 1955). J. RUPP, L'Idée de chrétienté (Paris 1939). M. L. COZENS, A Handbook of Heresies (New York 1947). A. C. SHANNON, The Popes and Heresy in the 13th Century (Villanova, Pa. 1949). G. SCHNÜRER, Church and Culture in the Middle Ages, tr. G. J. UNDRER (Paterson, N.J. 1956–). K. BIHLMEYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte, 3 v. (17th ed. Paderborn 1962) 1:81–85, 91–96, 207–213, 308–313, 435–444. J. N. GARVIN and J. A. CORBETT, The Summa contra haereticos Ascribed to Praepositinus (Notre Dame 1958). H. MAISONNEUVE, Études sur les origines de l'inquisition (2d ed. Paris 1960). Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) Tables générales 2051–62. H. GRUNDMANN, Ketzergeschichte des Mittelalters (Göttingen 1963). J. RUSSELL, "Interpretations of the Origins of Medieval Heresy," Mediaeval Studies (1938–) 25 (1963) 26–53.

[B. CHUDOBA]

3. Modern Period

Heresies upon condemnation do not die but reappear, often with vigorous new growth. Thus the primitivism (the search for a more authentic Christianity in the infancy of the Church) that is found in evangelical Protestantism, as well as Modernism, was already a cry of the Montanists of the 2d century. The Neoplatonist mysticism of the medieval Beghards and Beguines, condemned at the Council of Vienne (1311), appeared once again in the behavior of the Spanish ALUMBRADOS of the 16th century, and the later quietist movement. Conciliarism, formulated at the University of Paris by Conrad of Gelnhausen and Henry of Langenstein, and expressed in an extreme form by PETER OF AILLY and Jean GERSON at the Council of Constance (1414–17), persisted in the many types of Gallicanism. Moreover, the theories of Church and State that appeared during this modern period were influenced by caesaropapist ideas of the Roman emperors, the exaggerated charges of the French legists of Philip the Fair and the equally pretentious claims of the papal curialists, the doctrine of dominion by grace of John Wyclif, the proimperial theses in the Defensor pacis (1324) of MARSILIUS OF PADUA, the power politics of Niccolò MACHIAVELLI's Il principe (1513), and the Venetian theorist, Paolo Paruta's Discorsi politici (1599). Therefore many heresies of this period are more noted for their eclecticism than for their originality.

Protestantism. It is principally on the dogmas of justification, predestination, and sacramental theology that the reformers departed from orthodox belief. Though expressing divergent views on these theological doctrines, they were in agreement in demanding that the Bible be the sole source of faith to the rejection or neglect of tradition.

Lutheranism. The theology of Martin LUTHER as synthesized in the Book of CONCORD (1580) was still creedal, accepting the Apostolic, Nicene, and Athanasian formulas, but avowing Scripture as the sole and constant guide of the Christian. It taught the total depravity of man after the Fall, which left him powerless before indomitable concupiscence to perform deeds of merit, so that he is justified by his faith in Christ alone and the imputation of His merits. This rejection of all forms of synergism whereby the human will can or should cooperate with grace, leaves God the sole agent in the conversion of the soul to justification. Of the Sacraments, only two were sanctioned by Scripture: baptism, incorporating the recipient into membership of a nonhierarchical church, and the Lord's Supper, commemorating the redemptive act. In place of transubstantiation Luther defended consubstantiation in which Christ becomes present in the substance of the elements, not hypostatistically, but in a transcendent though real manner.

Reformed Theology. In the doctrines of the Reformed Churches, based upon the tenets and church organization of Huldrych ZWINGLI, Martin BUCER (BUTZER), Heinrich BULLINGER, and, principally, John CALVIN, are found a similar reliance upon the Bible as sole source of authority, and the fundamental Lutheran doctrine of total human depravity. Calvin established the principles of his system in the Institutes (1536), where he teaches that God by divine ordinance disregards the acts of the creature and predetermines him to salvation or doom (see INSTITUTES OF CALVIN). It is God's unconditioned will, independent of any foreknowledge of merit or demerit, that determines justification.

This image of an inexorable God was resisted by Jakob Arminius, the Dutch divine, who asserted against Calvin that divine sovereignty is compatible with human will and that grace is not irresistible (see ARMINIANISM; INFRA-LAPSARIANS; SUPRALAPSARIANS). The propositions of this modified conception of CALVINISM were drawn up in the Remonstrance (1610) by Simon Episcopus (1583–1643) and defended unsuccessfully at the Synod of Dort (1618). (see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT.) Though rejected by Calvinists, Arminianism spread to England and eventually divided Methodism into the moderate party of John WESLEY, and the strict Calvinists, led by George WHITEFIELD.

Zwingli, whose doctrine was formulated in the 67 theses (Zurich 1523) and in Bullinger's First Helvetic Confession (1536), was more insistent on reliance upon Scripture and upon primitivism. To restore the Church to its original simplicity he removed the liturgy and reduced the conduct of his church to congregational direction, and the ultimate control of its revenues to civic tribunals. Zwingli met with Luther, Philipp MELANCHTHON, and Johannes OECOLAMPADIUS at the Colloquy of Marburg (Oct. 1–4, 1529) to attempt a doctrinal compromise, but their theories upon the presence of Christ in the Eucharist were unreconcilable. After Zwingli's death (1531), Calvin, Guillaume FAREL, and Bullinger met in Zurich in 1549, where they formulated the Zurich Consensus on the Eucharistic presence; by 1580 ZWINGLIANISM and Calvinism became the Reformed Church (see REFORMED CHURCHES).

Radicalism. The ANABAPTISTS (Zwischau Prophets, Swiss Brethren, Jorists, Hutterian Brethren, Melchiorites, Familists, and MENNONITES) constituted a more radical Protestant motion that appealed to an infallible Scripture and an apocalyptic expectation. Their theories of Christian communism that were put into practice in the polygamic kingdom of Münster made them particularly unloved by conservative Protestants as well as Catholics. The Radicals were characterized by the phenomenon of prophetic charism that had been a by-product of Christian heresies since the primitive Church. It appeared in the hysteria of the Montanist prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilia, and the Circumcellions of the 5th century who brought Donatism into ridicule; the rantings of the 11th-century Cathars and later medieval mystics; the exhibitionism of the Jansenist convulsionnaires at the cemetery of St. Médard (1731); the prophecies of the Calvinist CAMISARDS who terrorized 18th-century France; the feats of revivalism of the American frontier; and the glosso-lalia (speaking in tongues) that has appeared in some 20th-century Protestant sects.

Baianism and Jansenism. The Council of TRENT established a body of dogma, but could not prevent further heresy in the question of grace and human justification. Michael BAIUS and John Hessels, Flemish theologians of the University of Louvain, believed that Catholic reaction to Protestantism had turned too far and that the great villain dividing the Church was scholasticism, especially in its Thomistic expression. For the dialectic of the schoolmen, Baius substituted greater use of scriptural and patristic sources, especially Cyprian, Jerome, Ambrose, and Augustine, since these were most often appealed to by Protestants. Baius's fundamental tenet was God's creation of man in a state of natural integrity, so that after the Fall all his actions were motivated by a nature vitiated toward concupiscence and thus evil to God. Accordingly, after the Redemption, only those actions that proceed from a perfect love of God are of merit. Justification is a continued process of works that merit heaven only if motivated by perfect charity in a triumphant battle over concupiscence. These elements of Baianism as found in the Opuscula and the 79 propositions condemned by Pius V in the bull Ex omnibus afflictionibus, Oct. 1, 1567, have been criticized as Pelagian, Calvinistic, and Socinian.

Far more reaching in its effect was the theology of Cornelius JANSEN, Louvain professor and bishop of Ypres, who with his friend Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, Abbé of St. Cyran and guide of the consciences of the nuns of PORT-ROYAL from 1636, planned to save the Church from Protestantism, from Jesuits, for whom Jansen had an eminent dislike, and from itself. This was to be achieved again by clearing scholasticism away from the path that led back to Augustine and to the simplicity of the primitive Church. Jansen exposed his doctrine in the AUGUSTINUS, published posthumously (1640), and for whose preparation he read the works of Augustine 10 times, and his anti-Pelagian tractates 30 times. Like Baius he asserts man's creation in a state of natural integrity, so that fallen man is radically depraved and at the mercy of concupiscence. In his redeemed state man is still drawn to earthly delectation (delectatio terrestriis), unless impelled by an irresistible heavenly impulse (delectatio coelestis). Thus man is irresistibly attracted to good or evil, depending upon which delectation prevails (delecta- tio victrix). As a corollary came the discouragement of the use of the Sacraments of the Eucharist and Penance. The first was to be received rarely and as a reward for virtue; the second held worthless unless repentance was motivated by perfect love of God. The course of this heresy was a series of ineffectual condemnations, reprisals, insincere submissions, subterfuges, and casuistry that continued even after the sweeping condemnation in the bull UNIGENITUS of CLEMENT XI in 1713. In Holland Jansenists were involved in the irregular consecration of Cornelius Steenhoven as archbishop of Utrecht (1723), which led to schism with Rome. These Utrecht Jansenists remained separated and later allied themselves with the Old Catholic party, which declared against papal infallibility in 1870.

Laxism. Contemporary with the Jansenist crisis were the disputes among theologians over the degrees of probability needed for a licit moral action. The theory of probabilism (it is licit to act on a probable opinion even though the opposite is more probable) was accepted and taught by the Jesuits, and attacked by the Jansenist Blaise PASCAL in his Lettres provinciales (1657) as dangerous casuistry. This opened an active controversy with George Pirot, SJ (1599–1659), whose L'Apologie pour les casuistes (1657) widened the scope of licit probability to the extreme of laxity. The book was proscribed by the Parlement of Paris, the Sorbonne, and censored by the Holy Office in 1659. Laxism was further condemned by Alexander VII by decrees of Sept. 24, 1665; March 18, 1666; and May 5, 1667. Innocent XI condemned 65 laxist propositions on March 2, 1679. Tutorism (it is not allowed to follow even the most probable among probable opinions) as expressed by the Irish Jansenist John SINNICH in Saul Exrex (1662), was also condemned by Alexander VIII on Dec. 7, 1690.

Quietism and Semiquietism. Mysticism is a borderland infrequently traversed, so the expression of the phenomena that occur there cannot be easily touched with precise phrase. Thus the great Rhineland mystic, Meister Eckhart (d. 1327) was accused of being pantheistic and Beghardic; SS. Ignatius Loyola, Teresa of Avila, Francis Borgia, and Joseph Calasanctius were suspected of the Neoplatonic tendencies of the Alumbrados. In the 17th century, however, there was a great revival of quietistic mysticism. Miguel de MOLINOS in his book, Guía espiritual, taught a complete contemplative passivity before God. The soul in seeking interior annihilation can allow all license to carnal desire, acts of which are not blameworthy but produce a salutary disinterestedness to sensible devotion as well as personal salvation. Though denounced by the Holy Office (1685), quietism in a modified form became prominent through the Barnabite François Lacombe (c. 1640–1715) and his more famous disciple Madame GUYON (Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Motte). They accepted the doctrine of pure love from Molinos's theology, according to which the soul becomes powerless to act in its own interest. This thesis was expanded in Madame Guyon's Moyen court et très facile de faire oraison (1685) and the Explication des maximes des saints (1697) of her follower, François FÉNELON, eminent churchman and at the time of the appearance of his book, the governor of Louis XIV's grandson, the duke of Burgundy. Madame Guyon was arrested and imprisoned (1695) at Vincennes, Vaugirard, and the Bastille, where she signed a retractation. Fénelon's book, after two years of bitter controversy with Jacques BOSSUET, was condemned by Innocent XII in the letter Cum alias, on March 12, 1699.

Caesarism. From the time of Protestantism, State interference in the affairs of the Church was much more significant than the ancient Byzantine CAESAROPAPISM or the pope-king quarrels of the Middle Ages. Now that Europe contained Christian communities no longer a part of Catholicism, opposition of monarchs to Rome was not only political but touched faith or was founded upon principles that could be destructive of it.

Anglicanism. The divorce proceedings that effected the English schism and set Henry VIII at the head of a national church did not yet place England in heresy. The six Henrician articles (June 1539) attest to the king's demand for orthodoxy. It was during the short reign of his son Edward VI (1547–53) that Continental Protestantism took hold. Peter Martyr Vermigli and Martin Bucer were instrumental in the formation of the Edwardine Ordinal (1550). Thomas CRANMER, long an admirer of the Lutheran movement, produced the revision of the Book of COMMON PRAYER in 1552, and in the next year prevailed on the king to sign the 42 Articles of Religion into the law of the land. Edward's action effectively established England as a Protestant nation, and the king as its religious arbiter, a position that was strengthened by the Stuart claim to authority by divine right within their hereditary line of succession. In the later development of ANGLICANISM, the Erastian (see ERASTIANISM) idea of State ascendancy over the Church in ecclesiastical matters took hold in the Westminster Assembly (1643), and in the ideal secularization of the church as conceived by Thomas Hobbes.

Gallican Liberties. In 16th-century France there was a distrust of Rome and its ultramontane foreign policies that sometimes resulted in papal alliances with French enemies, especially the Hapsburg emperor. When the French crown felt oppressed, it appealed to the libertés de l'Église gallicane, which it could proudly trace back to King Clovis and his Merovingian successors. The concordat between Leo X and Francis I in 1516 annulled the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438), which had accepted many of the conciliarist decrees of the Council of Basel (1431–37); GALLICANISM, however, persisted and came to a crisis when Louis XIV attempted to extend the regalia (royal right to the revenues of vacant sees) to all the sees of France. Innocent XI (1676–89) repudiated this usurpation of right and threatened ecclesiastical sanction. In reply Louis gathered the clergy of France who adopted the Four Gallican Articles of 1682, which were conciliarist and limited the exercise of papal primacy to the customs of the French Church. Though Louis and Innocent came to terms in 1693, these articles became a formula of anti-Romanism adopted when convenient elsewhere in Europe.

Febronianism and Josephinism. In Germany, the suffragan bishop of Trier, Johann Nikolaus von HONTHEIM, under the pen name of Justinus Febronius, attacked Roman power as compared to papal primacy and as founded upon the False Decretals, and advocated an ecclesiastical order that was regulated as much as possible by episcopal and civic control. These ideas, absorbed by Hontheim from the Gallican canonist of Louvain, Zeger Bernhard van ESPEN, led the archbishops of Mainz, Trier, Cologne, and Salzburg to assert their grievances against Rome at a congress at Bad Ems in Hesse-Nassau, even though Clement XIII had condemned Febronianism in 1764. The Punctuation of Ems, issued Aug. 25, 1786, restrained appeals to Rome, and declared papal bulls to be conditioned upon the acceptance of the German episcopate. The force of FEBRONIANISM was felt in the empire and expressed in the policies of Empress MARIA THERESA and her son, JOSEPH II, whose Toleration Edict of 1781 suppressed certain religious orders, placed exempt monasteries under diocesan control, and required civic authorization for the publication of papal documents. Leopold II, Grand Duke of Tuscany and brother of the emperor, introduced Josephinist ideas into northern Italy. In 1786, under the presidency of Scipione de' RICCI, Bishop of Pistoia-Prato, a synod was held that passed reform measures based upon the Gallican articles, 85 of which were condemned by Pius VI in the bull Auctorem fidei, Aug. 28, 1794.

The Kulturkampf and Old Catholics. In the 19th century Caesarism appeared in the anti-Romanism of Chancellor Otto von Bismarck. His KULTURKAMPF oppressed the Church, interfered in its educational processes, limited its disciplinary powers by the May Laws (1873), and exiled religious orders. Unexpectedly, this oppression effected a Catholic revival in Germany and strengthened the Catholic political party. The publication of the Syllabus errorum by Pius IX on Dec. 8, 1864, and the definition of infallibility by Vatican Council I (1870) aroused the resistance of Johannes J. I. von DÖLLINGER, who met with some professors at Nuremberg and Bonn, where it was agreed that these measures of the pope would paralyze the Church. Despite Döllinger's disapproval, they formed the schismatical church of Old Catholics, receiving episcopal succession from the bishops of the Church of Utrecht, in schism since 1723. The Old Catholics, with affiliated churches in the Netherlands, Poland, and the United States, retain most of the Roman rite (but in the vernacular), allow a married clergy, and make the Sacrament of Penance optional.

Traditionalism. Much Catholic thought in the 19th century grew as a reaction to the philosophies of the Enlightenment or as an attempt at adaptation. Against the primum mobile, the depersonalized god of the rationalists, the skepticism as expressed in David Hume's Treatise of Human Nature (1738), and the sophistication resulting from new technology and travel abroad, especially during England's Augustan age, some Catholic theologians proposed theories of traditionalism, placing the norm of human certitude in the sens commun rather than in distrusted individual intellectual ability. The traditionalists, Casimir Ubaghs, Louis E. BAUTAIN, Augustin BONNETTY, and Hugues Félicité de LAMENNAIS, tried to revive faith, just as the ontologists, Vincenzo GIOBERTI, Antonio ROSMINI-SERBATI, and Jakob Frohschammer, by their central tenet that God is the first object of our intelligence, established a type of optimistic rationalism. Georg HERMES attempted to adjust theology to Kantian philosophy, and Anton GÜNTHER, after studying the pantheistic idealism of Georg HEGEL and Friedrich von SCHELLING, proposed that it was within human power to deduce the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation.

All these figures were condemned. Bautain was removed from his chair of philosophy at Strasbourg by Bp. Lepappe de Trévern in 1834; Ubaghs was censored by the Holy Office, Sept. 21, 1864; Bonnetty was denounced by the Congregation of the Index, June 11, 1855; Gioberti's writings were placed on the Index, Jan. 14, 1853; Hermes was condemned by the brief, Dum acerbissimas, Sept. 26, 1835; Günther's works were doomed by the Index, Jan. 8, 1857; and propositions from the books of Rosmini-Serbati were condemned by a decree of the Holy Office, Dec. 14, 1887. Frohschammer, professor at the University of Munich, refused to submit to the condemnatory letter of Pius IX, Gravissimas inter, which found unorthodox propositions in his Einleitung in die Philosophie und Grundriss der Metaphysik (1858), and was suspended. Lammenais believed the future of the Church in post-Napoleonic France would be brighter if its dependent affiliations with the restored monarchy were replaced by a Catholic liberalism. Together with several French intellectuals, such as Charles de MON-

TALEMBERT and Jean B. LACORDAIRE, he published the brilliant L'Avenir (1830–31), advocating freedom of the press, of speech, and labor unions; the magazine, however, was suppressed for indifferentism by Gregory XVI in an encyclical Mirari vos, Aug. 15, 1832. The adherence to Royalism among many of the French clergy persisted into the 20th century, when a number rallied to the monarchist crusade of Charles MAURRAS and his collaborator, Léon DAUDET. Their publication, L'Action française was denounced by Pius XI, Dec. 20, 1926.

Modernism. A more pervading heresy was the complex of movements condemned under the name of MODERNISM by Pius X in the decree, Lamentabili sane exitu, July 3, 1903, and the encyclical Pascendi dominici gregis, Sept. 8, 1907. Attempting to reconcile the Church with the present, Modernism viewed scholastic Aristotelianism no longer suitable to illustrate and defend Christian belief. The prominent Modernists, Maurice BLONDEL, Lucien LABERTHONNIÈRE, Alfred LOISY, Edouard LE ROY, Eudoxe I. MIGNOT, Antonio Fogazzaro, Romolo MURRI, Friedrich von HÜGEL, and George TYRRELL, composed no theological school or consistent doctrine, but they agreed upon the necessity of reconciling the Church with modern times. From their writings the following beliefs appeared: dogmatic statements have a spirit that is absolute and fixed, and a form that is relative and mutable; Christ's messianic mission and His divinity are not to be sought from Scriptural sources, whose authors were subjected to the limitations of all human historians, but deduced from the conscientia christiana; the Christ of history is thus less than the Christ of faith, and it is not important to know whether He instituted a church, since the Holy Spirit guides its progress; and in Christianity there is a religious immanence that effects a continual evolution and pragmatic adaptation to historical situations.

Americanism. By the end of the 19th century the term "adaptation" meant a dangerous tampering with faith, as is witnessed in the so-called heresy of AMERICANISM. From a French translation of a biography of Isaac T. HECKER, founder of the Paulists, statements were extracted by Roman theologians that advocated the adaptation of the external form of the Church to modern American life, and extolled the active virtues (humanitarianism, democratic fellowship) to the depreciation of passive virtues (subjection to authority, humility). By an apostolic letter to Cardinal James GIBBONS of Baltimore, TESTEM BENEVOLENTIAE, Jan. 22, 1899, Leo XIII cautioned against these notions, and by referring to them as Americanism with the implication that they were widespread, created what F. Klein called a phantom heresy (Une hérésie fantôme, L'Americanisme, Paris 1949).

The Fathers of Vatican Council II chose not condemn any errors by means of anathemas. At the same time, the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes cited many errors prevalent in modern society. Debates upon the floor of the council and continual written discussions on its schema emphasized the need to consider theological realities in their place in the stream of history. The result, in terms of the understanding of heresy, has been an emphasis on the difference between the rejection of an eternal, unchanging truth and the rejection of its changing historical manifestation.

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:2208–57, bibliog. G. CROSS, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:614–622. A. DRU, The Church in the Nineteenth Century: Germany 1800–1918 (London 1963). É. POULAT, Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste (Paris 1962). M. CREIGHTON, Persecution and Tolerance (New York 1895). S. CHÂTEILLON, Concerning Heretics, tr. R. H. BAINTON (New York 1935). K. RAHNER, On Heresy, tr. W. J. O'HARA (New York 1964). M. NOVAK, The Open Church (New York 1964). For extensive bibliographies see J. LECLEER, Tolerance and the Reformation, tr. T. L. WESTOW, 2 v. (New York 1960), and La Documentation Catholique 49 (1952) 714–750.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

HERGENRÖTHER, JOSEPH

Ecclesiastical historian and canonist; b. Würzburg, Germany, Sept. 15, 1824; d. Mehrerau Abbey, Bregenz, Austria, Oct. 3, 1890. The son of a professor of medicine, he studied at the University of Würzburg (1842–44) and at the German College, Rome (1844–48), where he was ordained. After receiving a doctorate in theology at the University of Munich (1850), he taught theology there until 1852, when he transferred to Würzburg and became, in 1855, professor of Canon Law and Church history. He was appointed (1868) a consultor for the preparation of VATICAN COUNCIL I. In 1879 he was named cardinal and the first prefect of the VATICAN ARCHIVES, whose treasures he made accessible to scholars of all nations. His scholarly production was voluminous and wide ranging, although his interests centered mainly on early Christian and Byzantine history. Photius Patriarch von Constantinopel, sein Leben, seine Schriften und das griechische Schisma (3 v. 1867–69), the fruit of 12 years of research, was an objective and heavily documented study. Only in recent years has this classic study been surpassed by the writings of F. Dvornik, M. Jugie, and S. Salaville. Hergenröther edited the works of PHOTIUS for J. P. MIGNÉ (Patrologia Graeca v. 101–104) and edited separately Photii Constantinopoli liber de Spiritu Sancti mystagogia (1857). Hergenröther's history of the Church, Handbuch der allgemeinen Kirchengeschichte (3 v. Freiburg 1876–80; 3d ed. 1884–86; 4th ed. 1902–09, ed. J. P. Kirsch, excelled in its wealth and accuracy of information and mastery of sources, but it was not completely free of apologetic tendencies. More a research scholar than a teacher, Hergenröther failed to transmit to students the methods of historical scholarship. He took an active part in German Catholic life and opposed the Church-State policy and theology of the Munich school, being himself a rather moderate exponent of the Roman school. In 1860 he attacked DÖLLINGER for his lectures on the papal temporal power and his opening address at the Munich meeting of Catholic savants (1863). In Anti-Janus (1870), Hergenröther refuted the exaggerations of Döllinger written under the pseudonym Janus. His polemics against Döllinger, then considered a demigod by German scholars, exhibited a courageous personality, just as his refusal (1864) to accept the bishopric of Limburg displayed a lofty conception of the scholar's role in the Church. His other works included: Der Kirchenstaat seit der französischen Revolution (1860); Catholic Church and Christian State (2 v. 1876, tr. from Ger.); and volumes 8 and 9 of C. J. von HEFELE, Conciliengeschichte (1887–90). His incompleted Leonis X Pontificis Maximi regesta (1884–91) edited the register of Pope Leo X to 1515.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 5:1620–26. J. KIRSCH, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14; suppl. 1922) 7:262–264. B. LANG, “Zum 50. Todestag des Kardinals Josef Hergenröther, Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift 93 (1940) 302–309. A. BIELMAIR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:245–246.

[V. CONZEMIUS]

HERIBERT OF COLOGNE, ST.

Archbishop of Cologne; b. c. 970; d. March 16, 1021. Heribert, son of Count Hugo of Worms, was educated at the CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Worms and the MONASTIC SCHOOL of GORZE; he was later a canon at Worms and became archbishop of Cologne in 999. Heribert was friend, adviser, and companion of OTTO III, under whom he was made chancellor of Italian affairs in 994, and of German affairs in 998. He was present at Otto's death in Paterno, Italy, on Jan. 23, 1002. While bringing the emperor's body and the imperial insignia to AACHEN, he incurred the enmity of Duke Henry of Bavaria (later Emperor HENRY II), who wished to secure the insignia for himself. They were reconciled shortly before Heribert's death. Though the bull of his canonization by Pope GREGORY VII is almost certainly a forgery, Heribert seems to have led an exemplary life of piety and devotion to the poor. He is buried in the monastery at Deutz, which he founded with the help of Otto III.

Feast: March 16.

Bibliography: Sources. LAMBERT OF DEUTZ, Vita and Miracula, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 4:740–753; 15.2:1245–60. Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863–) March 2:459–485. RUPERT OF DEUTZ, Vita Heriberti, critical ed. with commentary by P. DINTER (Bonn 1976). Literature. J. KLEINERMANNS, Die Heiligen auf dem bischöflichen . . . Stuhle von Köln, 2 v. (Cologne 1896–98) v.2. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, 5 v. (9th ed. Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 3:397–398. W. NEUSS, ed., Geschichte des Erzbistums Köln, v.1 (Cologne 1965) 174–180. H. MÜLLER, Heribert, Kanzler Ottos III. und Erzbischof von Köln (Cologne 1977).

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

HERIGER OF LOBBES

Ecclesiastical writer; b. Louvain; d. Lobbes, Oct. 31, 1007. Heriger was a monk and scholar at the abbey of LOBBES and was made abbot there Dec. 21, 990. He trained WAZO, future bishop of Liège, and was a friend and collaborator of Bp. Notker of Liège, a fact that explains his sojourns there.

His literary activity was varied. Sometime before 980, he undertook the writing of history in his Gesta episcoporum Tungrensium, Trajectensium et Leodiensium (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores. 7:162–189) that treated of the history of Liège from the fourth to the seventh centuries. In June 980 at the request of Notker, he wrote S. Landoaldi et sociorum translatio (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 139:1111–22) for the monks of St. Bavon of Ghent. Only fragments of a Vita s. Ursuari (Patrologia Latina 139:1125–28), written in hexameters, remain. His Vita S. Adelini (Patrologia Latina 139:1141–48) and Vita S. Remacli (Patrologia Latina 139:1147–68) were both written for Notker. Heriger moved into chronology in his Epistola ad quemdam Hugonem monachum (Patrologia Latina 139:1129–36), probably done in collaboration with Notker. The Dialogus de dissonantiis ecclesiae de adventu Christi is lost.

Heriger wrote in the field of mathematics with his Regulae numerorum super abacum Gerberti and Regulae Herberti in abacum [N. Bübnov, Gerberti opera mathematicae (Berlin 1899) 205–225]. In theology he intervened in the eucharistic controversies raised by RATRAMNUS OF CORBIE, not with the De corpore et sanguine Domini (Patrologia Latina 139:179–188), which was written neither by him nor SYLVESTER II, but through the collection of patristic texts preserved under the title De Herigeri abbatis exaggeratio plurimorum auctorum de corpore et sanguine Domini, in the MS Gaud Univ. 909 f. 1–15.

Bibliography: M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 2:219–228. G. KURTH, Biographie nationale de Belgique v.9. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 11.1:808–809. J. WARICHEZ, L'Abbaye de Lobbes (Tournai 1909). J. LEBON, “Sur la doctrine eucharistique d’Hériger de Lobbes,” Studia mediaevalia in honorem . . . R. J. Martin (Bruges 1948) 61–84. A. CORDOLIANI, “Abbon de Fleury, Hériger de Lobbes et Gerland de Besançon sur l’ère de l’Incarnation de Denys le Petit,” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique 44.2 (1949) 463–487. H. PLATELLE, Catholicisme 5:652–653.

[P. GLORIEUX]

HERINCX, WILLIAM

Bishop and moral theologian; b. Helmond, Northern Brabant, 1621; d. Ypres, Aug. 17, 1678. Herincx received his preliminary education at ’sHertogenbosch and entered the University of Louvain, where he acquired a doctorate in classical studies. He then entered the Order of Friars Minor Recollect and in 1653 was named letter of theology at Louvain. He was so successful in presenting his matter to students that his superiors ordered him to compose a manual of moral theology for the use of the young friars of his province. The result was Summa theologiae scholastica et moralis in quatuor partes distributa (Antwerp 1660–63). By this time Herincx was minister provincial; he was twice elected to this office, and he also served as general definitor of the order and commissary general for northern Europe.

Herincx’s Summa is remarkable for the clarity and precision with which the doctrine is presented. The section “De conscientia,” is worthy of special note. He felt that the study of theology should contribute to the personal sanctification of students and stated in his preface that “it behooves us to make use of the truth for our own sanctification . . . and above all for kindling and nourishing in ourselves and others the love of God.” It was necessary for Herincx to make some modifications in his text after the decrees of Alexander VII in 1665 and 1666, and aided by a learned confrere, W. Van Goorlaeken, he brought out a revised edition. Like most Franciscan theologians of his day, he was officially a Scotist, but a moderate one who respected and used the teachings of SS. BONAVENTURE and THOMAS AQUINAS in his own writings.

Herincx was a probabilist; he held that the attack upon PROBABILISM in the 17th century was Jansenist in origin and that the tendency to rigorism was unknown among the theologians of the Middle Ages.

Herincx was named bishop of Ypres and consecrated on Oct. 24, 1677, in the Franciscan church at Brussels. He had barely taken up residence in his diocese and started to visit the places under his care when he died.

“St. Heribert Reconciled with Henry II,” detail of the reliquary of St. Heribert of Cologne in the abbey church at Deutz, Germany, executed by Godefroy de Hoy before 1170. (Marburg-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 4:48–49.

[A. J. CLARK]

HERKUMBERT, ST.

Bishop; d. June 7, c. 805. He is identified with the Ercanbert, first bishop of Minden, mentioned in the necrology of that see and in the medieval episcopal catalogues. He may also be the Herenbert who, according to the chronicle of Pistorianus, was installed as bishop of a great church erected in Minden by CHARLEMAGNE in 780. Most probably he was a monk of Fulda who led the mission sent by that monastery to Minden. The Acta Sanctorum notes the scarcity of information regarding him in the first chronicle of the diocese, compiled by Hermann of Lerbecke, and the lack of any mention of him in the Minden Breviarum, compiled by Johann Scheffer in 1516.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 2:727–728. K. HONSELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-

NER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:248. E. MÜLLER, Die Entstehungsgeschichte der sächsischen Bistümer unter Karl dem Grossen (Hildesheim 1938).

[M. B. RYAN]

HERLUIN OF BEC, BL.

Founder and first abbot of Bec; b. Brionne, Normandy, c. 995; d. Aug. 26, 1078. At the age of 38 he left the court of Count Gilbert of Brionne, where he had been in service as a knight, and undertook the life of an ascetic and hermit nearby. He then gathered a community of his followers on his own property near Bonneville, and in 1035 Bp. Heribert of Lisieux received his monastic profession, ordained him, and named him first abbot of BEC. Herluin's zeal attracted to the community two Italians, LANFRANC and ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, both of whom served long terms as prior of Bec and whose learning and brilliant careers as archbishops of Canterbury rapidly overshadowed the reputation of the uneducated founder. Lanfranc, who introduced the usages of Bec to England and whom Herluin visited there in 1071, returned to Bec in 1077, just a few months before Herluin's death, to consecrate the abbey church. Three prayers, apparently from a festal Mass, suggest a cult of Herluin; however, his cult has never been formally recognized. When monks returned to Bec in 1948, Herluin's relics were restored to the abbey from the nearby parish church.

Feast: Aug. 26.

Bibliography: GILBERT CRISPIN, "Vita Herluini" in J. A. ROBINSON, ed., Gilbert Crispin, Abbot of Westminster (Cambridge, England 1911). J. MABILLON, Annales Ordinis S. Benedicti, 6 v. (Lucca 1739–45) v.4 passim. D. KNOWLES, "Bec and its Great Men," Downside Review 52 (1934) 567–585. M. P. DICKSON, "Introduction à l'édition critique du Coutumier du Bec," Spicilegium Beccense (Paris 1959–) 1:599–632.

[W. E. WILKIE]

HERLUKA OF BERNRIED, BL.

Nun; b. Swabia, Germany, mid-12th century; d. convent of Bernried, near Augsburg, Germany, 1127. Although little is known about her life, she seems to have been a woman of education, knowledgeable about the affairs of her time and, in a small way, influential within her circle. She first entered the monastery of Epfach, where she lived many years and had WILLIAM OF HIRSAU as her spiritual director. During her stay at Epfach she carried on a vigorous correspondence, especially with Diemoth (d. c. 1130), a nun in a nearby convent. She was much concerned with the new spirit of reform in the Church and with the imperial-papal conflicts of the day (see GREGORIAN REFORM). Her activities on behalf of the papal cause resulted in her expulsion, along with others, from the convent at Epfach. She went to the convent at Bernried and lived out her days there. Her correspondence, which would have provided a special insight into local history, unfortunately has been lost, as has the unfinished life of her by Paul of Bernried (d. c. 1146–50), who knew her well.

Feast: April 18.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:549–554. Analecta Bollandiana 17 (1898) 159. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3835. L. ROSENBERGER, Bavaria sancta (Munich 1948) 181.

[H. MACKINNON]

HERMAN JOSEPH OF STEINFELD, ST.

Premonstratensian mystic and author; b. Cologne, Germany, 1150; d. Hoven convent, near Cologne, April 7, probably 1241. A visionary from a very early age, he joined the PREMONSTRATIENSIS at Steinfeld Abbey in the Eifel when he was 12 years old but, being under age, was sent to one of the order's houses in Frisia for schooling. He then returned to Steinfeld, where he was sacristan and a skilled clockmaker, and also served as chaplain to the CISTERCIAN nuns in the neighborhood. His blameless life as a canon at Steinfeld earned him the epithet "Joseph," which name was most appropriate because of his "mystical marriage" to Mary, mother of Jesus. One of the most noteworthy mystics in the history of medieval spirituality, he wrote a treatise on the SONG OF SONGS, now lost as is his life of Elizabeth of Hoven. He may have written the Summi regis cor aveto (Patrologia Latina, 184:1322–24), the earliest hymn on the Sacred Heart. His modern reputation is based on his surviving prayers and hymns, one in honor of St. URSULA, in both prose and verse. His piety, remarkable for the tender affection it projects, presaged the DEVOTIO MODERNA. He was with the Cistercian nuns at Hoven for Holy Week and Easter when he was taken ill and died. His vita (Acta Sanctorum April 1:682–723) was written several months after his death by his prior and friend. His relics are at Steinfeld; his cult was approved in 1958 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 51 [1959] 830) in an action equivalent to canonization.

Feast: April 7.

Bibliography: Hermanni opuscula, ed. J. VAN SPIELBECK (Namur 1899). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3845–49. F. PETIT, Un Mystique rhénan du XIII^e siècle, Le Bx. Hermann-Joseph

. . . (Juaye-Mondaye 1930); La Spiritualité des Prémontrés aux 12^e et 13^e siècles (Paris 1947) 102–115. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:48–49. K. KOCH and E. HEGEL, Die "Vita" des Prämonstratensers Hermann Joseph von Steinfeld (Cologne 1958). H. J. KUGLER, Hermann Josef von Steinfeld: im Kontext christlicher Mystik (St. Ottilien 1992). J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme 5:660–661.

[M. J. HAMILTON]

HERMAN OF SALZA

Grand master of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS; b. of a ministerial family in Thuringia, Germany, last third of the 12th century; d. Salerno, Italy, March 20, 1239. In 1209 he was elected grand master in Acre, Syria. In 1216 he became the counselor of FREDERICK II with whom he maintained a lasting friendship. Herman served as mediator between Frederick II and Pope HONORIUS III (1220) and influenced the pope in crowning Frederick as emperor. Thereafter he strove to remove the growing tensions between the two heads of Christianity, and worked tirelessly for the welfare of his order. In 1211 he accepted the assignment of King Andrew II of Hungary to patrol the border of Transylvania against pagan nomads; but the order was compelled to leave Hungary in 1225 when it attempted to establish an autonomous territory. Duke Conrad of Masovia (1226) sought the protection of the Knights against the pagan Prussians, and in Rimini, March 1226, Herman received from the emperor the district of Chelmno along the Vistula River and all the territories in Prussia that were still to be subdued and Christianized. The missionary work in these territories began only later, since Herman accompanied the emperor on a crusade to Jerusalem. He again reconciled pope and emperor in 1230. In the same year the conquest of Prussia began, but GREGORY IX (Aug. 3, 1234) placed the new mission country under the patrimony of St. Peter and reserved to the Curia any further political move in that territory. In 1237 the Livonian KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD were incorporated into the Teutonic order with Herman's permission.

Bibliography: E. L. E. CASPAR, Hermann von Salza und die Gründung des Deutschordensstaats in Preussen (Tübingen 1924). W. COHN, H. v. S. (Breslau 1930). E. E. STENGEL, Hochmeister und Reich (Weimar 1938). E. MASCHKE, "Die Herkunft Hermanns v. S.," Zeitschrift des Vereins für thüringische Geschichte und Altertumskunde, NS 34 (1940) 372–389. H. HEIMPEL, Der Mensch in seiner Gegenwart (Göttingen 1954). W. HUBATSCH, "Der Deutsche Orden und die Reichslehenschaft über Cypern," Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen (1955) 245–306.

[M. HELLMANN]

HERMAN OF SCHEDA

Abbot and author, called also Herman the Jew; b. Cologne, Germany, c. 1107; d. Abbey of Scheda, near Paderborn, Germany, 1170 (or according to some authorities 1198). Of Jewish parentage, he was converted to Christianity c. 1128, while on a business trip to Mainz, and entered the PREMONSTRATENSIAN order at the Abbey of Kappenberg. Ordained a priest in 1134, he became abbot of Scheda (1143), one of the houses dependent on Kappenberg. Herman seems to have been singularly impressed by the graces he had received; in his autobiography, Opusculum de vita sua (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 170:805–836), he stressed his conversion and traced his own religious development, following his discussions with RUPERT OF DEUTZ, from his entrance into Kappenberg through his days at Scheda. However, the main purpose of the autobiography was a stirring appeal to his fellow Jews to accept Christ. A. Potthast has called it "a pearl of medieval literature." Herman is also credited with the authorship of the Vita Godefredi (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores, 12:513–530), the life of the brother of OTTO OF CAPPENBERG, one of the early supporters of the Premonstratensians in Germany.

Bibliography: R. SEEBERG, Hermann von Scheda (Leipzig 1891). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 3575–76. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:592–593. G. MADELAINE, Histoire de saint Norbert, 2 v. (3d ed. Tongerlo Abbey, Belg. 1928) 1:190–209. J. GREVEN, "Die Schrift des Herimannus quondam Iudaeus De conversione sua opusculum," Annalen des historischen Vereins für den Niederrhein 115 (1929) 111–131. N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 v. (Straubing 1949–56) 1:190. J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme 5:656–657. K. HONSELMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:252–253. G. NIEMEYER, "Das Praemonstratenserstift Scheda im 12. Jahrhundert," Westfälische Zeitschrift 112 (1962) 309–333.

[L. L. RUMMEL]

HERMAN OF SCHILDESCHÉ

Of Westphalia, theologian and administrator; b. Schildesche (Schilditz), Sept. 8, c. 1290; d. Würzburg, July 8, 1357. Herman entered the AUGUSTINIAN ORDER at Herford, where he made his novitiate. He did his early studies at Osnabrück; his study of theology, most probably at Erfurt or Magdeburg, though he may have spent the last three of the five years prescribed at the Augustinian studium in Paris. He was ordained toward the end of these studies; his winning a lectorship crowned their completion. He taught with distinction at Magdeburg (1317?–24), at Erfurt (1324–28?), and at Paris (1330–35). In the earlier years of his stay in Paris, he obtained first a bachelor's and then a master's degree in theology. He was provincial of his own Augustinian province of Saxony and Thuringia (1337–39); in 1338 he served as one of a commission of three sent by the German bishops to AVIGNON to effect a reconciliation between Pope BENEDICT XII and Louis IV, the Bavarian. He spent his later years (1340–57) in Würzburg, where he not only lectured regularly in theology to the clerics of that diocese but, from 1342 at least, was vicar-general (the first) and major paenitentarius. His upright, gentle character won him many friends there. Of the more than 30 works that Herman wrote, only 11 are extant. They dealt with various aspects of theology (dogmatic, moral, pastoral, ascetical, and mystical), and with exegesis, philosophy, and law. Two of them—the pastoral Speculum manuale sacerdotum and his Introductorium iuris, a lexicon—were widely used.

Bibliography: Sources. A. ZUMKELLER, Schriftum und Lehre des Hermann von Schildesche (Würzburg 1959). JORDAN OF QUEDLINBURG, Liber vitasfratrum (1357), ed. R. ARBESMANN and W. HÜMPFNER (New York 1943) 240–241, 476. Literature. A. ZUMKELLER, Hermann von Schildesche, O.E.S.A., †8 Juli 1357 (Würzburg 1957); Augustiniana 7 (1957), passim; 8 (1958) 113–128; “Wiedergefundene exegetische Werke Hermanns von Schildesche,” Augustinianum 1 (1961) 236–272, 452–503. O. MAZAL, “Handschriften mittelalterlicher Augustiner-Eremiten in der österreichischen Nationalbibliothek,” ibid. 4 (1964) 291–296. A. ZUMKELLER, “Manuskripte von Werken der Autoren des Augustiner-Eremitenordens in metteleuropäischen Bibliotheken,” Augustiniana 11 (1961) 12 (1962) 27–43.

[J. E. BRESNAHAN]

HERMAN THE GERMAN, BL.

DOMINICAN missionary; fl. early 13th century. Together with Bl. Ceslaus of Silesia and St. HYACINTH, he was invested with the habit of the Order of Preachers by St. DOMINIC himself. He was the cofounder of the first Dominican house in Germany (Friesach 1219) and later worked in the apostolate in Silesia. Nothing further is known of his career.

Bibliography: B. ALTANER, Die Dominikanermissionen des 13. Jh. (Habelschwerdt 1924).

[O. J. BLUM]

HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS

Monk and polymath (called also Herman the Lame or Herman of Reichenau); b. Saulgau, Württemberg-Hohenzollern, Germany, July 18, 1013; d. Abbey of Reichenau, Germany, Sept. 24, 1054. The son of Count Wolverad II of Altshausen, he was a cripple (hence con- tractus) from birth, and although practically helpless physically, through an iron will he triumphed intellectually over his impairment, becoming skilled in theology, astronomy, mathematics, history, poetry, Arabic, Greek, and Latin. He was entrusted at age seven to BERNO, Abbot of the Benedictine monastery of REICHENAU, and he seems to have lived practically his entire life on the island occupied by the abbey in Lake Constance. He took monastic vows there in 1043 and in time became a noted and remarkably capable teacher, no less by his admirable learning than by his charm and attractiveness of manner. His Chronicon is an account of the most important events in history since the birth of Christ, in the tradition of various medieval ANNALS AND CHRONICLES but remarkable for its objectivity and careful CHRONOLOGY (ed. Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores, 5:67–133). In astronomy his De astrolabio displays wide learning (Patrologia Latina 143: 379–412), while his mathematical writings are various and important (see M. B. Cantor, Vorlesungen über Geschichte der Mathematik 1:759–889). His lengthy poem De octo vitiis principalibus [ed. F. Dümmler, Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum (1867) 13:385–434] is addressed to a group of nuns. His mouthpiece is the muse Melpomene, who converses with Hermannus and the nuns in various skillfully employed meters. Melpomene's burden of address to the nuns is de contemptu mundi, and she includes a warning against the seven capital sins. Hermannus is important, too, in the history of the SEQUENCE, though the great ALMA REDEMPTORIS MATER and SALVE REGINA have been incorrectly ascribed to him. His, however, are the De sancta cruce and the Rex regum Dei agne (ed. G. Dreves, Analecta hymnica 50:308–319), and they are composed basically in the tradition of NOTKER BALBULUS. After his death Hermannus became the object of a local cult, which was confirmed by the Holy See in 1863 and assigned a feast on September 25, although he is not generally regarded as a saint by most authorities.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 143:9–458. H. HANSJAKOB, Herimann, der Lahme von der Reichenau (Mainz 1875). K. BEYERLE, ed., Die Kultur der Abtei Reichenau, 2 v. (Munich 1925), passim. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:482–484. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 2:756–777. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian-Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1953) 225–229. F. KARLINGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:250. J. C. DIDIER, Catholicisme 5:663–664.

[W. C. KORFMACHER]

HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF

Second-century Christian apocalyptic work. From personal references it seems that Hermas had been a slave in Rome, was set free, married, and had a family, who because of his indulgence became apostate. He had been prosperous in business, but had lost his wealth and suffered in time of persecution. Some of these details, however, which are given in the first Vision, betray the influence of contemporary romantic literature.

The Muratorian Canon states that Hermas was the brother of Pope PIUS I (d. c. 154) and had written during his pontificate. Hermas himself refers to a contemporary Clement of Rome (Vis. 2.4.3) as an authority in the Church, but this is not necessarily Pope CLEMENT I (fl. c. 96). Origen's identification of Hermas with Rom 16.14 is regarded as an attempt to provide him with some kind of apostolic background. A date of composition between 140 and 155 fits the period given by the Muratorian Canon, while internal evidence indicates that the work was written after a period of peace.

The Shepherd is in three sections, and comprises five Visions (Vis.), 12 Mandates (Man.), and ten Similitudes (Sim.) or Parables. In the first four Visions, Hermas sees the Church as an elderly matron who grows progressively younger as he carries out her orders. She bids him and his family repent, sends him to the Church authorities with a call to repentance and a warning of imminent persecution; and she shows him a vision of a tower, representing the Church, in process of being built. The different stones used in the building typify varieties of Christians, and stones rejected by the builders may ultimately be used, provided that they repent now, before the tower is finished.

The fifth Vision is clearly intended as an introduction to what follows, for Hermas has a vision of the angel of repentance wearing shepherd dress; the angel dictates the 12 Mandates. The third to the sixth have some affinity with the Qumran Manual of Discipline (iii.13–iv.26), and throughout there are distinct signs of Jewish influence, as in the conflict between the good desire and the evil desire described in the 12th Mandate. Hermas also commends such practices as cheerfulness, patience, continence, and fasting.

In the Similitudes, Hermas continues to receive teaching from the angel, but in the form of parables and more visions, some of which are explained with much allegorical detail. The first five contain moral teaching, and the rest deal with penitence. The ninth Similitude repeats the building of the tower, first described in the third Vision, but with additional details and the important difference that there is a pause in the building to allow men more opportunity for penance. In the Vision, the time had been severely limited.

The most striking and debatable feature of the Shepherd is the teaching about penance. Does Hermas represent a reaction against a current of rigorism that rejected the possibility of forgiveness for any post-Baptismal sin? Is it to counter this that he brings a celestial promise of an exceptional opportunity, referred to by some commentators as a time of jubilee, for penitence? Or is Hermas simply reflecting the penitential discipline current at the time? The first seems the more likely, for the author lays down no formula for reconciliation with the Church, though clearly inclusion within the Church is assumed to be a necessity for salvation.

Hermas was more concerned with morals than with theology, and his Christological thinking is confused. He emphasizes that there is only one God (Man. 1). The Holy Spirit is identified with the Son of God before the Incarnation, and Christ becomes the adopted Son after His humanity is taken up into Heaven (Sim. 5.6.5). Christ is the rock on which the Church is built, the door through which all stones must be carried (Sim. 9), but at times He seems to be no more than an angel.

The Shepherd was regarded as quasi-canonical by St. IRENAEUS, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, ORIGEN, and Tertullian in his pre-Montanist period. ATHANASIUS set it outside the Canon (probably because of the possibly Arian implications of Man. 1), but valued its moral teaching, as did Eusebius. At Rome, however, the Muratorian Canon expressly denied its inspiration while conceding its value for private reading. Jerome states that it was almost unknown in the West. Yet it is noteworthy that it followed the Epistle of Barnabas in the great 4th-century Codex Sinaiticus.

The incomplete Greek text is based on the Sinaiticus (to Man. 4) and a 15th-century Athos manuscript (to Sim. 9). The rest is known from two Latin versions and one Ethiopic. In this century some Coptic and Greek papyrus fragments and one tiny Persian fragment have been published, and a notable University of Michigan papyrus contains Sim. 2–9, first published in 1934.

Hermas's style is prosaic, and much of his subject matter is repetitive. He is perhaps influenced by Greek literary models in his description of a woman bathing (Vis. 1.1.2), or in situating Sim. 9 in Arcadia, but for the most part his outlook is limited by Jewish and Christian modes of thought. Attempts have been made to differentiate sources, strata, separate authors. The work is indeed diffuse and inconsistent, but that is in the nature of an apocalyptic. A unifying ethos of simple and rather narrow piety characterizes the whole.

Bibliography: Editions. J. B. LIGHTFOOT and J. R. HARMER, eds., The Apostolic Fathers (2d ed. London 1912). K. LAKE, ed., The Apostolic Fathers, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; 1912–13) 2:2–305. M. WHITTAKER, ed. (Griechische Christliche Schriftsteller 48; 1956). R. JOLY, ed. and tr. (Sources Chrétienne, ed. H. DE LUBAC 53; 1958). Literature. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, MD 1950–) 1:92–105. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960) 84–88. S. GIET, Hermas et les pasteurs (Paris 1963).

[M. WHITTAKER]

HERMENEGILD, ST.

Son of Leovigild, Visigothic King of Spain; d. Tarra-gona, April 13, 585. He married (579) Ingund, daughter of SIGEBERT I, King of Austrasia, and Brunhilde. Since Ingund resisted the efforts of Goisvintha, her grandmother and Leovigild's second wife, to convert her to ARIANISM, Hermenegild was given a separate command centered at Seville. There, Ingund and Bishop LEANDER converted him to Catholicism. Almost simultaneously Hermenegild rebelled against Leovigild, with the support of the Byzantines and some Catholic Hispano-Romans. Hermenegild's rebellion damaged the country but did not spread far, and the threat it raised of intervention by the Sueves, Franks, and Byzantines did not seriously materialize. Leovigild retaliated by holding a council to facilitate conversion to Arianism (580) and, more effectively, by buying off the Byzantines (583), who retained Ingund and Hermenegild's son and sent them to Constantinople. Hermenegild, defeated and captured (c. March 584), was beheaded because—according to GREGORY I THE GREAT—he refused Communion from an Arian bishop. Contemporary Catholic authors disapproved of Hermenegild's rebellion. Gregory was the exception, and Hermenegild entered the MARTYROLOGIES from his Dialogues (3.31). At the urging of PHILIP II, SIXTUS V authorized the cult of Hermenegild in Spain (1585); URBAN VIII extended it to the whole Church.

Feast: April 13.

Bibliography: L. VÁZQUEZ DE PARGA, San Hermenegildo ante las fuentes históricas (Madrid 1973). R. GROSSE, Las fuentes de la época visigoda y bizantinas (Fontes hispaniae antiquae 9; Barcelona 1947) 161–194. F. GÖRRES, "Kritische Untersuchungen über den Aufstand und das Martyrium des westgotischen Königssohnes Hermenegild," Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie 43 (1873) 3–109. K. STROHECKER, "Leowigild: Aus einer Wendezeit westgotische Geschichte," Die Welt als Geschichte 5 (1939) 446–485. W. GOFFART, "Byzantine Policy in the West . . . (579–585)," Traditio 13 (1957) 73–118. E. A. THOMPSON, "The Conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism," Nottingham Medieval Studies 4 (1960) 4–35.

[W. GOFFART]

HERMENEUTICS

In its most general sense hermeneutics refers to the art and theory of interpretation, particularly the interpretation of texts. The history of hermeneutics from antiquity until today has been governed by the universal problem that truth exceeds its expression and that "discourse always lags behind what one wants or has to say" (J. Grondin). This gives rise to the parallel recognition that some method is necessary to understand the "inner truth" expressed in discourse without thereby delegitimizing the expression, which is a necessary precondition for this understanding.

The term is derived from the Greek verb hermēneuein (to interpret, to explain, to translate), which in turn has been connected with the messenger of the Greek gods, Hermes, whose role was to proclaim divine oracles that lay beyond human understanding in a form accessible to human intelligence. The earliest uses of hermēneuein and its cognates (hermēneus [interpreter], hermēneia [interpretation, explanation]) carry the wider connotation of a process of bringing something from ambiguity or unintelligibility to understanding, primarily through the use of language. The earliest recorded use of the term "hermeneutics" to describe a methodology or a set of "scientific" criteria seems to have been in J. C. Dannhauer's Hermeneutica sacra sive methodus exponendarum sacrarum litterarum (1654), where it referred to principles and methods of interpretation that were independent of and provided the foundation for the activity of scriptural commentary (exegesis).

Premodern Hermeneutics. In antiquity and in the medieval world the principles of interpretation were understood to apply most often to texts, particularly religious texts, and especially to individual textual cases where the meaning was unclear or difficult to extract. Greek philosophers, for example, employed allegory to interpret difficult passages within the Homeric tradition—i.e., they assumed that there was a "hidden sense" within these texts that could be reached only by employing an interpretative strategy from outside the text. PLATO suggests an even broader usage of hermēneuein: in Ion he calls poets "the interpreters of the gods" (hermēnēs tōn theōn, 435e) and the rhapsodes who perform their poems "interpreters of the interpreters" (hermēneōn hermēnēs, 535a), thus bringing hermeneutics in close proximity to divination. Post-Aristotelian philosophy, particularly the Stoics (see STOICISM), emphasized the use of allegory to rationalize passages in the mythic traditions that seemed objectionable or offensive. The Stoa in turn influenced Jewish and Christian writers in antiquity. Early Christian theologians developed principles for the "spiritual" or "mystical" interpretation of biblical texts.

For them, interpretation of the Bible had a twofold purpose: to demonstrate how the eternal word of God was mediated through contingent literary forms, and to display the unity of Scripture despite the fact that there were two different Testaments. The preferred interpretative tool was allegory, especially in the form of typological interpretations that viewed various Old Testament events as types or prefigurements of Christ and His saving actions, thereby interpreting the New Testament as the fulfillment of the prophecies found in the Hebrew Scriptures and appropriating the Hebrew Scriptures for the Christian canon. The allegorical method ultimately derived from the Stoa and more immediately from the Alexandrian school and Jewish writers such as Philo, and was taken up by Origen, Augustine, and Jerome, although the more literal interpretations proposed by the Antiochene school (e.g., Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Chrysostom) also played a role (e.g., both types are present in the Symbol of the Council of Chalcedon [451]). The classic compendium of early Christian interpretative principles is AUGUSTINE's De doctrina christiana, which develops the fundamental distinction between signum (the material sign) and res (the transcendental reality that is prior to and the referent of the sign). In the medieval period the various interpretative principles were codified and often expressed in the form of the famous schema of the fourfold sense of Scripture (literal, allegorical, moral, and anagogical [eschatological]). While allegorical interpretation was dominant earlier in the medieval period, later thinkers tried to rein in the allegorical by associating it more closely with the literal. For example, THOMAS AQUINAS, in his discussion of the fourfold sense (Summa theologiae Ia, q. 1, a. 10), is careful to note that the meanings disclosed by the latter three senses (the "spiritual" senses) are rooted in the literal sense. Thus, although the Scriptures are not univocal but multivalent, these varied meanings are not contradictory since they are signs pointing to the truth intended by the Scriptures' divine author.

Early Modern Hermeneutics. In early modernity hermeneutics began to develop into an independent discipline dealing with the general principles that governed the authentic interpretation of various types of texts. One major catalyst was the Reformation's rejection of the Catholic use of church authority, tradition, and allegory to interpret Scripture. Following Martin LUTHER's principle of sola scriptura, Protestant authors insisted that the Bible was its own interpreter (sui ipsius interpres) and developed principles to demonstrate the Bible's self-sufficiency and noncontradictory nature while at the same time helping to decipher difficult passages without recourse to any authority outside the Scriptures. Matthias Flacius Illyricus's Clavis scripturae sacrae (1567) is decisive in this regard. Flacius constructed an interpretative key (clavis) to the Scriptures by insisting that a thorough linguistic and grammatical training in the biblical languages was necessary for exegesis and by formulating a system of rules (based on the ancient rhetoric, patristic authors, and Augustine) for explicating ambiguous passages in the light of the wholeness of Scripture, thus avoiding any need to appeal to church authority. Renaissance humanist scholars pursued similar goals in their study of classical Greek and Roman texts and legal documents. They devised various philological-critical methods, applicable to wide varieties of texts, in order to assist them in establishing a text's authenticity and determining its correct (for them, the original) version. The development and distillation of hermeneutic principles into a separate humanistic discipline, applicable to religious and nonreligious texts alike, was furthered in the 17th and 18th centuries by Benedictus de Spinoza's insistence on grounding biblical exegesis in natural history and reason rather than faith (Tractatus theologico-politicus, 1670) and by authors such as Dannhauer, Johann Martin Chladinius (who defined hermeneutics as "the art of interpretation" according to rational rules, aimed at a complete understanding of "reasonable discourses and writings"), and Johann August Ernesti (who sharply distinguished between the task of general hermeneutics to understand the language and thus the meaning of any text and the task of theology to grasp the content and thus the truth of biblical texts).

Modern Hermeneutics: Schleiermacher and Dilthey. Modern hermeneutics begins with Friedrich SCHLEIERMACHER. While influenced by previous attempts to craft a general hermeneutics, his own theory decisively surpassed them. He departed radically from his predecessors in two ways: (1) by shifting the central focus of hermeneutics from the meaning of texts to the conditions for the possibility of all understanding, thus reenvisioning hermeneutics as philosophy and not merely as technique; (2) by assuming that misunderstanding was not rare but rather was the interpreter's normal situation, and that understanding must be worked out by attempting to overcome obstacles and grasp the whole. Schleiermacher defined hermeneutics as "the historical and divinatory, objective and subjective reconstruction of the given utterance" (Hermeneutics and Criticism, introd., #18) and characterized it as an "art." He based his theory upon the reciprocal relationship between thought and speech, and saw the immediate goal of the interpretation to be the reproduction of the author's or speaker's thought that originally gave rise to expression—in other words, the reconstruction of the author's intention. The two necessarily interlocking moments of interpretation are the grammatical (objective), aimed at clarifying the texts' specific linguistic aspects, and the psychological (subjective or “divinatory”) by which one “empathetically” grasps the author’s inner life, which gets expressed in the text as a whole. If the goal of discourse is to communicate thought and feeling, then the goal of interpretation is to reproduce and reexperience that thought and feeling. This immediate task is carried out in a circular fashion: “even within a single text the particular can only be understood from out of the whole” (ibid., #23) and yet the whole can only be grasped once the parts are understood. The grammatical and psychological are also reciprocally related: the “divination” of the author’s experience is not independent of the linguistic elements, yet the meaning of a text exceeds what any purely grammatical interpretation may disclose.

Beyond this, Schleiermacher saw that the more fundamental goal of hermeneutics was to examine the overall art of understanding and to articulate its elements. Thought and speech are almost two sides of the same coin: thought is linguistic, and discourse is expressed thought. “Almost,” for there is a difference as well: the same thought can be expressed in a variety of ways, and is thus somewhat detachable from language. The hermeneutical problem arises precisely at this juncture of “same” and “different”: how does one understand the other (here, the author) when the other is like myself yet expresses an individuality which is unlike my own? The text, too, is a conjunction of same and different: it is an “individual universal,” a network of shared grammatical conventions and linguistic rules applied by the author in a uniquely individual way in order to constitute a new and meaningful whole in a particular “style,” which nonetheless communicates to others. The text also expresses the author’s individual experience that participates in and clarifies those human experiences shared by all. Schleiermacher argued that interpretation is an infinite task where no absolute understanding of a text (and hence of any author) is ever possible, since the grammatical always deals with the “infinity” of linguistic choices and the psychological with the “infinity” of the author’s intuition. But a high degree of understanding can be reached; indeed, the goal remains “to understand the utterance at first just as well and then better than its author” as we “seek to bring much to consciousness that can remain unconscious” to the author (ibid., #18). This understanding also takes place in a circular manner: the author’s inner life is glimpsed through one particular text, while the particular text is understood as meaningful when interpreted in the context of an author’s whole life-experience and the whole of the semantic system within which it has been conceived. Schleiermacher’s hermeneutic “revolution,” then, consists of seeing hermeneutics as a philosophical “meta-discipline” that articulates the circular nature of all understanding, discloses the interplay of the rule-bound and the non-rule-bound in all authentic and meaningful interpretation, and recognizes the necessary risk of empathy in any attempt to understand the other.

Wilhelm DILTHEY developed hermeneutics even further as a philosophical discipline in the service of his “philosophy of life” (Lebensphilosophie). He widened its focus from textual expressions to historically situated cultural expressions of all kinds. Influenced by his research into Schleiermacher’s work, he endeavored to provide a firm methodological basis for the human sciences over against the growing dominance of the natural sciences and to support the objective value of their truth claims over against historical skepticism. He argued that there is a crucial methodological difference between the natural sciences (characterized by the explanation of natural phenomena according to a mechanistic model) and the human sciences (which aimed at understanding human life from within). The key point is Dilthey’s description of “life” as a process, a complex mixture of individual lives lived in time, which constitutes the social and historical fabric of humankind and whose truth can be grasped solely through its objective historical expressions. The range of expressions can include gestures, actions, legal codes, historical artifacts, works of art, and whole cultures. Only understanding, rather than explanation, can be adequate to the study of inner human life objectified in these expressions; by deriving its categories from life itself, it is sensitive to the temporal flow of individual experience (Erlebnis) that links past (memory) and future (anticipation) with the present. The goal of understanding is the reconstruction and reexperiencing of this individual inner world of experience behind the expression and in turn the overall life-process of which the individual is only a part.

Dilthey’s hermeneutics unites these three elements (experience, expression, and understanding) into the methodological foundation of the human sciences. Temporal lived experience, as a self-aware, pre-rational act, demands objective historical expression in order to understand itself. Expressions are objectifications of lived experience, symbols of inner life that can be adequately understood only when interpreted within their historical context. The highest and fullest expression is art, revealing not simply the artist’s personal experience but embodying the deepest aspects of all human experience. The art with the greatest disclosive power is literature, which permanently fixes experience in language. Understanding is the reverse of expression: by interpreting these expressions within their historical context, it attempts to reexperience—indeed, to re-create or relive—the lived experience of the other person and thus of the life-process within which they participate. The immediate goal of understanding is to bridge the gap between the other and myself through my empathetic reexperiencing of their “mental life.” The ultimate goal is to understand all of human life, of which the individual is only a part. The meaning of the “whole,” whether a person’s whole life, a whole culture, or the whole of life itself, can be derived only from the study of its individual parts. The parts, moreover, can be understood only in reference to the whole whose unity is presupposed and that determines the function and meaning of the parts. Dilthey explicitly articulates the “hermeneutic circle” already alluded to by Schleiermacher and others. The meaning that arises from the circle is the result of a real historical relationship between the interpreter and the objectified expressions of life and is always contextual, changing with one’s temporal perspective. Dilthey’s hermeneutics is thus left with an inherent dilemma: he abhorred relativism and wanted to render the truths of the human sciences as objectively as those of the natural sciences, yet he demonstrated that self-understanding is never the result of direct introspection but is always indirect, mediated by historical expressions and temporally shifting syntheses.

Contemporary Hermeneutics. Contemporary hermeneutics is dominated by the figures of Martin HEIDEGGER and Hans-Georg GADAMER. Heidegger’s early work, especially Being and Time (1927), shifted the hermeneutical focus yet again, this time away from texts and cultural expressions to the human person as both interpreted and interpreting. Being and Time, among other issues, presents a “hermeneutics of facticity,” a phenomenological description of Dasein (Heidegger’s term for the human being) that interprets the person’s everyday way-of-being in order to reach an understanding of Being as such. Dasein is portrayed as thoroughly hermeneutical, both in the way it lives its ordinary life (interpreting entities as meaningful within a previously constituted “world” or “totality of involvements” as well as over against a pre-understanding of the meaning of Being) and in the way it understands itself as an incomplete historical “project,” constituted in the present by its facticity (past) and its “projection” into its possibilities (future). Because Dasein is its own project and because it both constitutes and discloses its being by the actualization of its own possibilities, interpretation and understanding are not actions Dasein chooses to perform but are rather two of Dasein’s basic modes of being (“existentials”) from the outset. Heidegger surprisingly changes the traditional polarity: one does not first interpret in order to understand, but rather understands in order to interpret. Understanding is the power by which Dasein discloses what its existential choices have already presupposed, namely a grasp of its own future possibilities-for-being and “of the whole of Being-in-the-world” (Being and Time, §32). Dasein thus understands its own true being as radically temporal and projected over time rather than being merely a present “object.” Interpretation (Auslegung) is the laying-out (aus-legen) or the actualizing of the possibilities already disclosed in understanding. Its operation is guided by a threefold “fore-structure” of prejudices: a fore-knowledge of the appropriate context (Vorhabe), a “fore-sight” or situated point of view (Vorsicht), and a pre-understanding of the whole-to-be-actualized (Vorgriff). This fore-structure is the pivot upon which the hermeneutic circle turns, guiding the relationship between understanding and interpretation: what is interpreted must be already understood to some degree (to even awaken our interest in interpreting it), while understanding is articulated, actualized, and deepened by interpretation. Understanding is determined by the anticipations of meaning generated by the fore-structure, while interpretation must be guided by the fore-structure provided by understanding. “Any interpretation which is to contribute understanding, must already have understood what is to be interpreted” (ibid.). This circularity cannot be avoided; it is intrinsic to all human knowing and is itself an expression of one of Dasein’s basic modes of being. The necessity of a pre-understanding (Vorgriff) means that there is never any presuppositionless understanding or interpretation. Thus the meaning of entities within the world (what Being and Time calls their “as-structure”) and of Dasein itself is the result of a disclosure effected by Dasein, occurring within an interpretation guided by pre-understanding. This Heideggerian version of the hermeneutic circle, which considers the circularity of understanding to be ontological and not merely epistemological, has become extremely influential in both philosophy and theology.

Hans-Georg Gadamer’s philosophical hermeneutics draws from several sources, including Schleiermacher’s quest for a general hermeneutics, Dilthey’s emphasis on historicity and the recuperation of the human sciences, and the Heideggerian themes of the hermeneutics of facticity, the hermeneutic circle, and the ontological basis of understanding. His magnum opus, Truth and Method (1960), has become the touchstone for all subsequent approaches to hermeneutics, both pro and con. Behind his overt desire to critique modernity’s objectivist methods and rehabilitate the model of understanding promoted by the humanities lies a deeper concern to analyze the process of human understanding itself and to demonstrate its fundamental openness to others and to the past: “the way we experience one another, the way we experience historical traditions, the way we experience the natural givenness of our existence and of our world, constitute a truly hermeneutic universe, in which we are not imprisoned, as if behind insurmountable barriers, but to which we are opened” (Truth and Method, xxiv).

All understanding begins with prejudices, anticipatory prejudgments that are grounded in previous experiences. Prejudices are not disabling, distorting biases (as the Enlightenment claimed) but rather are enabling; they allow us to begin understanding by projecting a meaning upon something (e.g., a text) on the basis of our partial experience of it, and then to either confirm or deny that understanding in the course of further experience. These interpretative projections are both ontological and rooted in the interpreter's situation, which is formed by the tradition or history of effects (Wirkungsgeschichte) within which the interpreter stands. Thus the present temporal horizon of expectations is constituted by both the past from which it develops (the authoritative tradition that addresses us and "is already effectual in finding the right questions to ask" [Truth and Method, 301]) and the future to which it opens (new understandings that will confirm, expand upon, or deny our prejudgments). The history of effects is constituted by classics, works that embody experiences and interpretations that have endured over time and whose significance occurs within history yet appears to be timeless because they are always timely—i.e., their significance applies to situations in historical epochs beyond their own. What allows us to tell the classics from the period pieces is temporal distance, which encourages us to test our prejudgments of their enduring significance and thus permits their authoritative and universal nature to appear.

This schema allows Gadamer to make two major claims. First, the true goal of understanding is to have a "consciousness of being effected by history" (ibid., 301), the awareness that the present historical horizon is always already effected by the truths disclosed previous to the present in the history of effects. This awareness occurs by the fusion of horizons, where "old and new are always combining into something of living value, without either being explicitly foregrounded from the other" (ibid., 306). Interpretation is not the attempt to leave one's own historical epoch in order to understand a work from the past and thereby seek to erase the historical difference that plainly exists. Rather, the interpreter's present horizon is tested and expanded by coming into contact with the "otherness" that the past horizon represents. Temporality, rather than being an obstacle to understanding, enables understanding to occur: "it is the supportive ground of the course of events in which the present is rooted" (ibid., 297) and in which our prejudgments are formed. Secondly, the key to hermeneutical understanding is the application that occurs in the fusion of horizons. To interpret a work from the past is to understand it, but "understanding always involves something such as applying the text to be understood to the interpreter's present situation" (ibid., 308). The three moments are inseparable and simultaneous. Understanding, which is fundamentally linguistic, thus has the character of a moral decision: just as in ethics the general principle and the particular situation are understood in light of each other in a prudential judgment, so too the truth of a past text is grasped in the moment of application to the present situation, whose truth is disclosed by the difference represented by the past and challenged to expand its expectations in the light of this difference.

In addition to Heidegger and Gadamer, Paul RICOEUR has made important contributions to contemporary hermeneutics. Among these are his emphasis on the productive character of texts, the power of metaphor to evoke new meanings, and the character of narrative, each of which is involved in the disclosure of new possibilities of meaning. The objectifying nature of writing already assures that the finished text is autonomous, distanced from the intention of the author. This "distanciation" is productive; the work breaks free of its limited temporal horizon to be recontextualized in any number of new situations of reading, thereby disclosing the multiple possibilities of authentic interpretation (the world "in front of the text") beyond the original authorial experience (the world "behind the text") and challenging the reader to expand his horizons. Metaphors, by means of the clash of literal meanings that they embody, are a semantic signal of the "surplus of meaning" that exceeds the literal meaning and creatively subverts the reader's expectations, disclosing new possibilities of existential meaning for the reader. Narratives, as Ricoeur has claimed in his later work, are the most fundamental form that human activities take and are the necessary mediation of all self and social identity. Fictional narratives configure characters and actions according to a certain emplotted order that, however, plays out over time in unexpected ways with the final meaning intelligible only at the conclusion; the truth of the narrative is available only in a retrospective interpretation. Human identity can be similarly interpreted: it is a temporal "configuration" of concordance and discordance, of sedimented identity that is open to innovation and unforeseen responses to others, and thus to constructive "refiguration" over time that allows for self-identity to be reinterpreted without being dispersed.

Hermeneutics in Recent Catholic Theology. Hermeneutics has played an extremely important role in contemporary Roman Catholic theology, especially in fundamental or foundational theology. For example, in his Christology Edward Schillebeeckx has employed a fundamental theory of experience and a hermeneutics of tradition very similar to Gadamer's in order to articulate the relationship between divine revelation and the historically situated human experience in which it occurs, and to explain the connections between the disciples' original interpreted experience of the revelation of God in Jesus and the present-day interpreted experience of Jesus as Lord. David Tracy has used the normative status of classics to argue that the Christian tradition is constituted by its religious classics (especially the classic person, Jesus Christ), i.e., historically situated events that disclose a “radically and finally gracious mystery” (Analogical Imagination, 163). Thus systematic theology is inherently hermeneutical: by interpreting the Christian classics, it seeks to make publically accessible both the meaning of the tradition that mediates this disclosive power and the modes of reception (application) of this power within the present. Francis Schüssler Fiorenza has argued against a foundationalist approach to theology that what is essential to FOUNDATIONAL THEOLOGY is a “hermeneutical reconstruction” of the integral Christian tradition, seen as a “history of effects” composed of diverse historically situated beliefs and practices. Models of stasis, decay, or unilateral progress which search for a timeless “essence of Christianity” fail in the face of this empirical diversity. Only a hermeneutical reconstruction, attuned to the ongoing historical reception of the truth of revelation, can render intelligible the unifying Christian identity that exists in the midst of this diversity and can take into account the varying background theories, retroductive warrants, and various communities of discourse that contribute to the continual constitution and reconstruction of Christian identity over time.

See Also: EXEGESIS.

Bibliography: F. SCHÜSSLER-FIORENZA, Foundational Theology: Jesus and the Church (New York 1984); “History and Hermeneutics,” in J. C. LIVINGSTON et al., Modern Christian Thought, 2d ed. Volume II: The Twentieth Century, 341–385 (Upper Saddle River, N.J. 2000). H.-G. GADAMER, Truth and Method, 2d rev. ed., tr. J. WEINSHEIMER and D. G. MARSHALL (New York 1989). J. GRONDIN, Introduction to Philosophical Hermeneutics, tr. J. WEINSHEIMER (New Haven, Conn. 1994). M. HEIDEGGER, Being and Time, tr. J. MACQUARRIE and E. ROBINSON (New York 1962). K. MUELLER-VOLLMER, ed., The Hermeneutics Reader (New York 1988). P. RICOEUR, Hermeneutics and the Human Sciences, ed. and tr. J. B. THOMPSON (Cambridge 1981); Time and Narrative, 3 v., tr. K. MCLAUGHLIN and D. PELLAUER (Chicago 1984–88). J. RISSER, Hermeneutics and the Voice of the Other: Re-reading Gadamer’s Philosophical Hermeneutics (Albany, N.Y. 1997). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, Interim Report on the Books “Jesus” and “Christ,” tr. J. BOWDEN (New York 1981). F. SCHLEIERMACHER, Hermeneutics and Criticism and Other Writings, tr. and ed. A. BOWIE (Cambridge/New York 1998). N. H. SMITH, Strong Hermeneutics: Contingency and Moral Identity (London 1997). A. C. THISELTON, New Horizons in Hermeneutics: The Theory and Practice of Transforming Biblical Reading (Grand Rapids 1992). D. TRACY, The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism (New York 1981).

[A. J. GODZIEBA]

HERMENEUTICS, BIBLICAL

The common human experience of seeking the meaning of words, discourses, and events is elevated to a scholarly level in the science of biblical interpretation. The meaning of a text distant by millennia from today’s world is not always patent to the modern reader. Moreover, churches claiming a biblical base are constantly confronted with the multiplicity of scriptural interpretations given by other churches, some of them contradictory. Thus interpretation is required, and because the Bible is accepted as the word of God and because of the potential for greater Church unity, there is need to seek the highest degree of objectivity possible.

Development of Hermeneutics. Determining the author’s intended meaning was until recently taken to be the role of EXEGESIS, while to HERMENEUTICS was left the task of making a contemporary application. Until the Enlightenment this distinction was virtually unknown, since most analysis of biblical texts was for a pastoral purpose. The arrival of scientific tools of analysis meant that Scripture could be examined like any secular text, with the supposed abstraction from any faith stance. Once that happened, however, the need was felt to find the relevance of the ancient text to contemporary life, whence the science—and some would say the art—of hermeneutics developed. The term actually appears for the first time in the 17th century, apparently by J. C. Dannhauer, Hermeneutica Sacra, sive methodus exponendarum Sacrarum Litterarum (Strassburg 1654). Today the distinction has once again become blurred so that exegesis is understood by many, including the Pontifical Biblical Commission (The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church [1993]) to be complete only when relevant meaning and application is derived. Hermeneutics in turn normally includes exegesis as an integral part of the interpretive process.

Biblical evidence of the need for interpretation is at least as old as Neh 8:8: “Ezra read plainly from the book of the law of God, interpreting it so that all could understand what was read.” Indeed, the Bible itself shows later texts interpreting or reinterpreting older ones. This is true already in the Old Testament, as for example when Daniel reinterprets the 70 years Jeremiah prophesied for the duration of the Babylonian exile (Jer 25:11; 29:10) as now extending to 70 weeks of years, i.e., down to the time of the persecution by Antiochus the Illustrious (Dn 9:1–27). It is above all in the New Testament that the Old is interpreted in the light of the new event of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. In the gospel of Matthew Jesus says that not only the prophets but the law itself prophesied until John (Mt 11:13), reflecting his conviction, widely shared by the Jews of his day, that the biblical texts, even those not expressly prophetic, had a forward-pointing value and thus could be understood to be “fulfilled” in the present ministry of Jesus. This kind of peshet reading was common among the sectarians of Qumran, interpreting the texts as fulfilled in their community. They did not think of the texts, particularly the prophetic texts, as having a meaning for the time at which they were written but only as recording a divine secret awaiting interpretation by and application to the later community. While the NT has more respect for the original meaning of the OT, its primary interest is fulfillment in the paschal mystery, that is, in Christ and the Church. This affirmation of fulfillment in Christ, which is the literal sense of the NT, is what the Church understands by the spiritual sense. What is distinguished regarding the OT (literal and spiritual senses) becomes identical in the NT.

Spiritual Senses. In some cases the NT sees the OT realities as types finding their fulfillment in Christ or the Church. Adam, Moses, David, the Exodus, the paschal lamb, the temple, and Jerusalem are among those explicitly marked as such types. The Church knows certain persons and events to be types because they are so identified in the New Testament or in early Church tradition (e.g., Eve as a type of Mary). Typology alone does not exhaust the spiritual and prophetic potential of the Old Testament, at least according to those who propose a fuller sense for many of the OT texts. As a matter of fact, many OT texts, while focusing on a contemporary issue, are expressed in such a way as to be open, of themselves, to greater fulfillment. For example, when Isaiah pronounces his messianic prophecies (in Is 7, 9, and 11), he speaks in hyperbolic terms that the NT finds explicitly fulfilled in Christ. Or the word almah (“maiden,” 7:14), which could mean nothing more than a young woman of marriageable age, is open, though not compelled, to being narrowed to parthenos (“virgin”) by the LXX and taken in that narrower sense by Mt 1:23. This “fuller” sense is sometimes described as the sense intended by God but not seen, or not seen clearly, by the human author. Such a definition could, of course, license arbitrary interpretations. It must be qualified by including some intrinsic evidence in the text of such openness to future refinement.

The early Church Fathers were the first to face the question, “Now that we are Christians, what is the place and meaning of the Old Testament?” They did not reject it outright, as did MARCION, for obviously the New Testament appealed to the Old to substantiate its claims about Jesus. It was easy enough for the Fathers to accept the OT typology used by the New Testament, but what to do with other passages that seemed to have no prophetic or typological value, and in fact even seemed scandalous? It is a question that many readers even today have when they begin to read the Hebrew Scriptures for the first time. The Alexandrian Fathers resorted to ALLEGORY, already used extensively by Philo to make the Jewish scriptures attractive to the Hellenistic world. In this they found justification in the method used by Paul in his allegory of Sarah and Hagar (Gal 4:21–31). Though they were aware of the literal sense of the text, they had little appreciation of historical development or progressive revelation in the OT. Rather they sought to find there, in strangely different form, the Gospel itself. Thus in the story of Lot’s intercourse with his daughters (an unedifying tale), Origen sees Lot as reason, his wife (who looked back on Sodom) as concupiscence, his daughters vainglory and pride. Through a combination of scripture texts he works up to that wisdom who is Jesus Christ.

If at times the Alexandrian insights are striking, they and those who followed at times elaborated fantastic allegories that were abusive of the text. By the time the Antiochian Fathers reacted to the Alexandrian allegorization, the method was so entrenched it was not abandoned even into the Middle Ages. In the West a distinction was made between what was called the literal or historical sense and the spiritual sense, the latter being divided into three: the allegorical, the tropological or moral, and the anagogical. The allegorical interpretation demonstrated the truths of revelation, the tropological the ethical expectations derived from the text, and the anagogical the ultimate goal of the Christian life, the heavenly realities. For example, the literal Jerusalem was the terrestrial city, the allegorical Jerusalem was the Church, the tropological was the soul called to be the bride of Christ, the anagogical was the heavenly Jerusalem. When medieval authors spoke of the literal or historical sense, they simply meant what was happening in the text or the narrative. They did not mean what modern historians mean who search for “what really happened” according to the canons of modern scientific research. For this reason, even when a biblical author used metaphorical language, this was regularly considered to belong to the spiritual sense.

THOMAS AQUINAS both narrowed the typical sense and expanded the literal sense by shifting the focus to the author’s intention. The literal sense is what the author intended to convey, whether he used direct or figurative language. This opened the literal sense to the possibility, the fullness of which would be seen only in modern times, of the author’s having used various literary forms, including fictive ones, to convey his message. Thus, for example, while it is of interest to know whether Job really existed, the point of the dramatic dialogue, as in Jesus’ parables, comes across whether the protagonist existed or not. Or again, John’s extensive use of symbols in his Gospel is part of the literal sense, since it was his intention to convey his message in that form. This principle would have wide application in the OT, where modern research has revealed the authors using multiple literary forms. Thomas narrowed the typical sense by pointing out that the spiritual sense (of OT types) is always found somewhere (in the NT) in the literal sense.

A generation earlier JOACHIM OF FIORE had introduced a dispensationalist method of interpretation, which in one form or another has survived until our day. Dividing all of history into three ages or dispensations according to the three persons of the Trinity, Joachim found in Revelation a rich field for imaginative connections with the events, past, present and future, in the history of the Church. Thus the heads of the Beast become the leaders of each of the seven ages of the world and the seven persecutors of the Church. Muḥammad is the beast rising from the earth. The horses in Revelation 19 are the military orders, the “first resurrection” is the foundation of the mendicant orders, and so on. This method, which is hardly different from that of QUMRAN covenanters, has had a wide popularity in our day. The mainstream of Catholic tradition, however, has followed Augustine in taking the figures of Revelation either as referring to persons and events of the author’s time or as being symbolic of the Church and its enemies of all times.

The Literal Sense, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment. The 14th and 15th centuries were marked by the degeneration of scholastic theology into dialectics with little grounding in the literal sense of Scripture. The aridity of this approach not only brought a reaction in the anti-intellectual DEVOTIO MODERNA (e.g., THOMAS À KEMPIS) but laid the ground for Martin Luther’s cry to return to the literal sense of the Bible. With the patristic tradition he held that the central theme of the Bible is Christ, but he maintained that Scripture stands above all other authority, be it tradition, the inner witness of the Spirit, Church authority or philosophy. Scripture is its own interpreter—a principle for which the Bible itself offers no textual support. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans, with its doctrine of justification by faith, becomes the norm by which the rest of the Bible, even the books of the NT, are to be judged. This, in effect, established a canon within the canon. LUTHER’s insistence on the sufficiency of Scripture, and especially CALVIN’s stress on the interior witness of the Holy Spirit, would lead to the Catholic accusation that such principles would amount eventually to private interpretation and relativism. On the other hand, if the literal sense of Scripture is the self-determining norm, then scientific exegesis becomes a crucial tool, and ultimately the only tool in arriving at a correct interpretation of Scripture. Thus began the explosion of critical studies and commentaries that has lasted to our times.

With the arrival of the ENLIGHTENMENT, this search for the literal sense, and behind it the historical reference, resulted in establishing the professor’s lectern as a parallel pulpit, free from any control save that of the academy. But even there a great deal of disagreement prevailed, especially in the interpretation of the biblical narratives. Although there was a strong conservative wing that took the miracles as happening exactly as narrated, there were others who sought to explain them as natural occurrences that were narrated as supernatural events. Others, such as REIMARUS, maintained that the accounts of the miracles were deceptions. Others interpreted the narratives as religious or moral truths in story form. Still others maintained that the biblical authors were captive of the mythological world view, so that whatever they described was inevitably presented in the clothing of myth. In the 19th century it was common to interpret Jesus as a great teacher of moral living, but nothing more. It was commonly agreed, of course, that no external authority, such as tradition or the Church, should be consulted. In this the positivist were in sync with the mood of the Reformation.

The Catholic Response. The Catholic Church reacted slowly but authoritatively to these developments. Writings of the rationalist critics were put on the Index of Forbidden Books, Pope PIUS IX issued his SYLLABUS OF ERRORS in 1864, and Pope LEO XIII warned of the errors of liberalism in his 1893 encyclical Providentissimus Deus. But few Catholic scholars were prepared to meet the historical critics on their own field, nor were they at first encouraged to do so. In 1943, however, Pope PIUS XII issued his encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU, which affirmed the centrality of the literal sense of Scripture, upheld the authority of the original texts, the importance of textual criticism and of taking into account the different literary forms used by the authors, and the contribution of the auxiliary sciences. This encouraged Catholic biblical scholarship and opened the door to a Catholic biblical movement unparalleled in the history of the Church. The Second VATICAN COUNCIL in its Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum) incorporated many new insights developed since 1943, integrating the achievements of biblical scholarship in an atmosphere that lacked the polemics of the preceding century. Revelation is God’s communication not of mere truths but of his very self through words and deeds that are mutually illuminating; the Word of God is Jesus himself, to whom Scripture is the witness; tradition is the process by which revelation is handed on; tradition develops, perception of revealed truth grows, and while the magisterium has the final authority in determining the teaching of Scripture, the experience of all the faithful contributes to the process of understanding and transmission of the Word of God.

Meantime, new theories of biblical interpretation were coming onto the field (see below, Philosophies of Interpretation), and meetings of scholarly biblical associations were peppered with presentations using methods that varied from the traditional historical-critical, to text-centered, to reader-centered. Such a diverse array of methods led the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION in 1993, on the centenary of Leo XIII's biblical encyclical, to publish The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church, a comprehensive review and evaluation of past and current methods of interpretation. At the risk of oversimplification in a discipline where there is considerable overlapping, these methods can be organized under the following headings.

The Text as It Stands. These methods look at the text without reference to its prehistory, author, audience, or possible historical reference. Narrative criticism first determines where the text begins and ends and then looks at the function of plot, character, setting, and other techniques such as irony. It is interested only in what the text reveals about the implied author and implied reader, not the actual author or the actual reader. This method has been developed on the model of secular literary criticism. It has proved especially helpful in uncovering the theological interest of the text. As a method it is not interested in whether the character or events related actually existed, which is, of course, one of the interests of the believer and the primary interest of the historian. Rhetorical criticism assumes that the text wishes to persuade (which most biblical texts do). It then examines the various techniques used. This method can lead to a greater appreciation of the power of the text. The ancients generally did not distinguish between content and expression the way moderns do. They felt that truth should be expressed persuasively. The value of rhetoric is its power to move the emotions and elicit conviction and action. Structural criticism, also known as semiotic analysis, considers the relationship of the elements of the text to each other, as binary oppositions, contraries, contradictories, confirmations, etc. It assumes that every text follows a "grammar," that is, a certain number of rules or structures or codes. It is thus useful in showing the internal coherence of texts. Its usefulness is limited to intra-textual analysis, since it has no interest in the extra-textual world, that of the referent, the author or the reader. Deconstruction, a form of poststructuralist criticism, is connected with the name of Jaques Derrida. His method is confined to the text itself and opposes any extra-textual concern. He goes beyond structuralism in that he maintains that the meaning of every utterance is indefinitely deferred (for which he coins a French word différance), i.e., the text provides an unlimited series of signifiers without ever leaving the world of the text. This means that the text has no real-world referent and therefore means nothing. Obviously this system is incompatible with Catholic biblical interpretation or any interpretation that reads a text for its life-transforming message.

The World behind the Text. While the previously discussed methods focused on the text without reference to the text's history, more traditional methods continued to approach the text diachronically, much the way archaeologists move from one level of excavation of a site to another. Textual criticism seeks to determine as accurately as possible the original form of the Hebrew or Greek text. This involves comparing and evaluating manuscripts, parchments or papyri, making judgments or at least educated guesses, in cases where readings differ, as to which is the original. Teams of scholars have thus produced critical editions of the Hebrew Bible and the Greek NT with the textual apparatus listing textual variants, and have provided evidence for their judgments, for example in A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament, edited by Bruce M. Metzger.

Source criticism seeks to determine the written documents a biblical author may have used. The most obvious example of this is in the widely accepted two-source theory for the synoptics, that is, that Matthew and Luke used Mark and a sayings source called Q in the composition of their gospels.

Form criticism, on the other hand, is more interested in the oral prehistory of the text and the life-situation (Sitz-im-Leben) that occasioned it or shaped it. The method involves first identifying the form of the pericope (miracle story, pronouncement story, apocalyptic saying, etc.) and then tracing its history (Formgeschichte, "history of forms," is the word the German scholars used) to its present place in the Bible. Originally introduced in the OT by Hermann GUNKEL, it was applied to the NT notably by Rudolf BULTMANN and Martin DIBELIUS. Bultmann's commitment to "DEMYTHOLOGIZING" the NT and "remythologizing" it in terms of existentialist philosophy made his project suspect in Catholic and conservative Protestant circles but his highlighting of the role of the early Church in the shaping of the Gospels was a major contribution to NT studies. It is now universally accepted that the Gospels grew out of a long oral tradition in which the deeds and sayings of Jesus were remembered for their usefulness in the ongoing life of the burgeoning communities and were adapted as needed by the new circumstances in which the communities found themselves.

Historical criticism seeks to uncover what facts and events are recoverable by the tools of modern historical research. Here archaeology, epigraphy, papyrology, the study of the history of contemporary peoples, and similar historical disciplines serve as points de repère for assessing the historicity of biblical accounts. The Bible was not written according to the norms of modern historiography; it is primarily a religious document, a witness to the faith of the Jewish and the Christian communities. Both communities claim their roots in history (e.g., “suffered under Pontius Pilate” in the Nicene creed). At present there is considerable dispute concerning the historicity of the earlier events narrated in the OT. In NT scholarship, the likelihood of an event or saying of Jesus being original is considered to be enhanced when one or more of the following criteria are present: (1) Multiple attestation: the saying or event appears in more than one source. (2) Dissimilarity: if a saying or an event stands out as unparalleled in contemporary Jewish or Hellenistic sources or is not clearly a development by the later Christian community. (This criterion is a minimalist one, because it finds only a Jesus who is neither Jewish, Hellenist, nor Christian!) (3) Embarrassment: if a saying or event evokes a detectible discomfort in the Gospel tradition, it has likely not been invented by the Christian community. Jesus’ baptism by John is frequently cited in this category, since a community bent on exalting the holiness of its hero would not have invented his submission to a baptism of repentance.

Sociocultural criticism, a discipline only recently developed, looks at the enviroing world in which the text took shape, particularly the values that were at work in the culture(s) of the day, many of which differ remarkably from today’s developed world. Thus, for example, honor and shame, patron-client relations, dyadic personality, labeling and deviance, sickness and healing, were viewed in a quite different way in biblical times. These studies have been very helpful in illuminating biblical passages, as long as contemporary sociological models are not imposed on the ancient world.

Redaction criticism looks to the history of the text to see what changes an author may have made of his sources and how he has creatively arranged the pericopes. Like narrative criticism, to which it is closely akin, redaction criticism can highlight the theology of the author by means of the contextual settings in which he has placed stories and sayings. For example, the author of Matthew 18 has gathered sayings of Jesus that have to do with community. By placing in the center Jesus’ parable about the shepherd seeking the lost sheep, he has created a powerful mosaic showing how Jesus’ pastoral concern is to be shared by the community. Luke delights in diptychs, that is, placing two stories next to each other for their mutual illumination. Redaction criticism thus gives a wider view of the teaching of an evangelist than is available in the isolated pericopes used in the lectionaries of the Roman liturgy.

The World around the Text: Canonical Criticism. If redaction criticism studies the environment in which an author has placed individual passages, canonical criticism points out that the meaning of an entire book is contextualized by the rest of the Bible, that certain books and not others made it into the canon and that even the location of an individual book (and even portions within a book) has significance for the interpretation of that book. It likewise insists that it is the final form of the text, not its presumed “original” pretext that is authoritative. The process by which the canon took shape sheds light on the interpretation given it by the early community. Psalm 50, which calls the people to task for their sins against the covenant, is followed by the famous Miserere, Psalm 51, which is a response of confession. The Christian community took over the order of books in the Greek Septuagint rather than the Hebrew Bible, no doubt because the prophetic books were found there last, pointing toward their fulfillment in the NT. The selection of certain books and the rejection of others, an evolving consensus that took at least two centuries, was an interpretive process, meaning that no individual book could claim absolute authority over the others but would be read and heard as part of a symphony of voices, none of which was to be lost. It also implies that the believing community that produced the texts provides the only adequate context for interpreting the text, and, in the Catholic view, this implies the role of the teaching authority of the Church (Dei Verbum, 10).

The World in Front of the Text. The Bible is not a book floating in space; from the very beginning it has had an impact on the lives of people more than any other book of world literature. Thus the history of influence of the text (Wirkungsgeschichte) is also a discipline of hermeneutical study. Already in Jesus’ explanation of the parable of the sower, the seed represents the word (Mk 4:14) but then immediately it becomes people affected in different ways by the word (4:15–20). Saints who have lived the word, religious communities founded on the inspiration of a particular word of Scripture, communities of faith that have been inspired by the word—these are all interpretations of the word, and a study of them gives a fuller insight into the meaning of the written word by a kind of reflux enrichment. The caution, of course, is that some interpretations have been patently false, for example, when used to promote anti-Semitism.

Reader-response criticism presupposes that the text is addressed to readers (or listeners), either the reader(s) to whom the author addresses his work (the implied reader) or the possible actual reader(s), who can belong to multiple worlds. The former really belongs to narrative analysis, the latter to advocacy criticism (see below). The method considered under this rubric is reader, not text, centered. It focuses on what happens in the reading (or listening) process. Some analysts put the reader over the text, in the sense that meaning is predetermined by the defenses, expectations, or wishes of the reader—which seems to deny that one can really reach an objective meaning. Others understand the reading process to be an interaction with the text, that is, “Reading is a temporal process of making and revising meaning—the reader develops expectations along the way, and finds them fulfilled, disappointed, or revised as reading continues” (W. H. Shepherd Jr., The Narrative Function of the Holy Spirit as Character in Luke-Acts [1994] 81). Excessive concentration on this method could lead to subjectivism or “private interpretation,” but in the Catholic Church this can be avoided by checking one’s understanding of the text against the “reader response” of the entire Church over the centuries (which is a way of speaking about tradition).

Advocacy criticism focuses on the real readers and the real communities who interact with the text. The poor and the oppressed often see things in a text that others would not, since one’s ongoing experience disposes one to find a particular meaning in a text and to favor some texts over others. Thus have emerged various forms of liberationist and notably feminist interpretation, among others. These insights have often alerted other segments of the Christian community to neglected dimensions, thereby enriching the whole Church’s understanding of the Bible. The danger comes when experience dominates the word, leading to a selectivity that ignores other texts and mines the Scriptures only for what supports a predetermined stance.

Philosophies of Interpretation. Biblical hermeneutics in the late 19th and 20th centuries came under the influence of general hermeneutics and philosophical theories of interpretation, which were already moving away from the atomizing methods of the Enlightenment. Friedrich SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) reacted to the positivists by insisting that the author’s work is not something to be dissected in a laboratory; it is a human work and hermeneutics is the art (rather than the science) of getting in touch with the spirit of the author. Notice the Kantian shift from the text as object to the subject, which for Schleiermacher is intersubjectivity. William DILTHEY (1833–1911) emphasized the historicity of both author and interpreter, that is, a biblical text can take on new meaning in light of the individual’s or the community’s historical perspective. His insistence that both the text and the reader are moving targets and meaning is temporary leads him into historical relativism. Martin HEIDEGGER (1889–1976) insisted there is no presuppositionless understanding (hence it is a pretense to claim total and disinterested objectivity as the positivists did). He also insisted that being encompasses the knower rather than the other way around; it is not the interpreter who interprets being but being that interprets the interpreter, who is virtually passive before being that floods him. Hans-George GADAMER (1900–2002) is indebted to Heidegger for much of his theory, but he finds the process of interpretation more interactive. Language as the “house of being” makes possible the “fusion of horizons” between the text and the interpreter. Bernard Lonergan offers a corrective to the remnants of passivity in Gadamer by insisting on the critical role of judgment, which the interpreter must exercise. Authentic subjectivity reaches for objectivity. The critical function avoids both the unquestioned hegemony of “being” over the subject and the subjectivism of some of the reader-response theories. Paul RICOEUR’s position has had a wide impact on biblical interpretation, especially on reader-response theory. In his view, once a discourse is put in human language it has carved out an existence of its own, independent of the author’s intention, and can be recontextualized with new meanings. This is what he calls “the world in front of the text.”

Conclusion. An integral process of interpretation will make discerning use of the various methods, with the exception of deconstruction, which is self-destructing and states in effect that it has nothing to say. The Catholic approach to biblical interpretation assumes that the Bible is the Word of God embedded in human language and therefore subject to the nature of human language, with all its forms and variants. It did not fall out of the sky ready-made but grew out of a centuries-long experience of a people with their God. When the sacred writers took up their pens they believed they were committing to writing not merely their personal faith but the faith of the community, a faith that was Spirit-inspired. Consequently it is only in the continuing community that the expressions of that faith, the Scriptures, can be fully understood, and ultimately only with the assistance of the Holy Spirit who inspired the writings in the first place. That does not exclude, in fact it requires, the work of exegetes and scholars to explore the human face of the word of God. But it gives no authority to interpretations that would be at odds with the common faith of the community, a common faith that is guarded by the ultimate interpretative authority, the magisterium. Does it mean that within the parameters of the Church’s faith and tradition the nonspecialist can come to a valid interpretation of the Scriptures? Augustine offers help here. The ultimate goal of all Scripture and its interpretation, he says, is charity: “If one is deceived in an interpretation that builds up charity, which is the end of the commandments, he is deceived in the same way as a man who leaves the road by mistake but passes through a field toward the same place to which the road itself leads. But he is to be corrected and shown that it is more useful not to leave the road, lest the habit of deviating force him to take a crossroad or a perverse way" (De doctrina christiana, I, xxvi, 41). For this reason even those who use the Bible primarily for devotion should not neglect a serious study of it.

Bibliography: VATICAN COUNCIL II, Dei Verbum: Constitution on Divine Revelation. PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church (1993). G. T. MONTAGUE, Understanding the Bible (Mahwah, N.J. 1997). E. MCKNIGHT, What Is Form Criticism? (Philadelphia 1969). M. A. POWELL, What Is Narrative Criticism? (Minneapolis 1990). N. PERRIN, What Is Redaction Criticism? (Philadelphia 1969). J. H. ELLIOTT, What Is Social-Scientific Criticism? (Minneapolis 1993). E. D. HIRSCH, Validity in Interpretation (New Haven, Conn. 1967). S. L. MCKENZIE and S. R. HAYNES, eds., To Each Its Own Meaning (Louisville 1999). R. E. PALMER, Hermeneutics: Interpretation Theory in Schleiermacher, Dilthey, Heidegger, and Gadamer (Evanston 1969). P. RICOEUR, Interpretation Theory (Fort Worth 1976).

[G. T. MONTAGUE]

HERMES, GEORG

Philosopher and theologian whose thought aroused great controversy in nineteenth-century German Catholic theology; b. Dreierwalde, Westphalia, April 22, 1775; d. Bonn, May 26, 1831. During his philosophical studies at the University of Münster (1792–94), Hermes was very much influenced by his reading of Kant and Fichte. This initial contact with philosophy was a disturbing experience that unsettled his own faith and led him to study theology in an attempt to resolve his personal religious difficulties. When, however, his theological studies did not give him the certainty for which he had hoped, he resolved to hold to the fundamental truths of Catholicism, while undertaking what was to be a lifelong attempt to establish the rationality of Christian faith in a way consistent with the thought of the Enlightenment. After teaching for two years at the Gymnasium in Münster, he was ordained a priest in 1799. In 1805 he published his first work, Untersuchungen über die innere Wahrheit des Christentums, which was enthusiastically received and which led to his being named in 1807 professor of dogmatic theology at Münster. Both as a priest and as a professor of theology Hermes was highly respected by his students and colleagues, although there were some, notably Clement August Droste zu Vischering, the future archbishop of Cologne, who were disturbed by Hermes's apparent deviations from traditional methods in teaching theology. In 1819 Hermes published the first part of his major theological work, Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie: Philosophische Einleitung. This work, in which he attempted to establish the philosophical presuppositions of religious faith (i.e., the possibility of knowing the truth, the existence and attributes of God, the possibility and knowability of a supernatural revelation), was also enthusiastically received in German academic circles. Shortly after its publication, Hermes accepted a professorship in the theological faculty of the newly established University of Bonn.

Despite the continuing opposition of some professors and bishops, Hermes was greatly respected by the majority of his colleagues at Bonn and was appointed by his friend and patron Archbishop Ferdinand August von Spiegel to important posts in the Diocese of Cologne. By reason of his close association with the archbishop and his acceptability to the Prussian government, his students were, moreover, appointed to theological professorships throughout Germany; after 1826 the faculty at Bonn was staffed almost exclusively by Hermes's followers. While enjoying this academic success, he published in 1829 the second part of his introduction to theology, Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie: Positive Einleitung, in which he sought to work out an apologetic that would establish the factuality of that revelation whose possibility he had established in the earlier, philosophical, part of his work.

The opposition that Hermes's theology had aroused during his lifetime became more effective soon after his death. As a result of a denunciation made by German bishops, his works were examined at length by a group of Roman theologians, including the Jesuit G. Perrone, and in the brief DUMACERBISSIMAS (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 2738–2740), issued on Sept. 26, 1835, Gregory XVI condemned the RATIONALISM judged to be implicit in Hermes's teaching and placed his works (including part of an incomplete work, Christkatholische Dogmatik, published in 1834 by Hermes's disciple, J. H. Achterfeldt) on the Index. In the following year a subsequent decree placed on the Index those parts of Hermes's Dogmatik that had not been listed in the original decree.

This papal condemnation, which astonished Hermes's followers and which the Prussian government prevented from being published in Bonn, intensified rather than settled the controversy over Hermes's orthodoxy. The controversy became even more bitter when in 1836 Droste zu Vischering succeeded von Spiegel as archbishop of Cologne and required all his candidates for the priesthood to subscribe to 18 anti-Hermesian propositions. In 1837 two of Hermes's most prominent followers, P. J. Elvenich and J. W. Braun, went to Rome to appeal the condemnation. When Roman authorities rejected both this and all subsequent attempts to justify Hermes's orthodoxy, most of the Hermesians accepted the papal brief, and those who did not were removed from teaching. In 1852 the Hermesian Zeitschrift für Philosophie und katholische Theologie ceased publication. With that, HERMESIANISM, later to be condemned at VATICAN COUNCIL I, ceased to be an active theological movement.

See Also: SEMIRATIONALISM.

Bibliography: A. THOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:2288–2303. R. SCHLUND and E. HEGEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:258–261. A. FORTESCUE, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:624. H. REUSCH, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 12:192–196. P. TSCHACKERT, The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, ed. S. M. JACKSON, 13 v. (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1951–54) 5:242–243. R. AUBERT, Le Problème de l'acte de foi (3d ed. Louvain 1958) 103–112. E. HOCEDEZ, Histoire de la théologie au XIX^e siècle (Brussels-Paris 1800–31) 1:177–203.

[J. W. HEALEY]

HERMESIANISM

The theological system developed by Georg HERMES (1775–1831), a German Catholic theologian. The system involves an attempt to defend Catholic dogma by employing the principles of KANT especially. The attempt is unsuccessful, and the writings of Hermes contain many errors that were severely condemned by Pope Gregory XVI in DUMACERBISSIMAS and by the Congregation of the Index (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2738–40). Some of his ideas may be grouped as follows.

Theological method. Although some have expressed a contrary view, it appears certain that Hermes undertook his theological investigations with the intention of doubting every tenet really and positively, even such facts as the possibility of truth, the existence of God, and the dogmas of faith. He was prepared to admit only those ideas and judgments that could be justified rationally. In this way, he hoped to lay a solid foundation for the whole structure of theology. Hermes escaped from his state of doubt by employing the speculative and practical reasons. The speculative reason is unable to know the essences of things. Nevertheless, it affirms some propositions as true and certain without being able to act otherwise, as in the case of self-evident truths. On the other hand, what the practical reason finds in conformity with human dignity must also be regarded as true and certain.

God. According to Hermes, the best proof, indeed the only certain one, for the existence of God is the argument from contingency. The speculative reason is able to demonstrate to its own satisfaction most of God's attributes, but it cannot demonstrate that God is a pure spirit or that His attributes are infinite in extent. In this latter respect, Hermes differed from the common view of Catholic philosophers.

Apologetics. Hermes maintained that the speculative reason could not acquire certitude about the fact of revelation but must be content with probability (see REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF). By this view he opposed the position affirmed by Innocent IX (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 2121) and Pius IX (ibid. 2778). Hermes maintained further that the value of miracles as a means of identifying revelation is minimal because one cannot know whether an extraordinary event was caused by God or by the secret forces of nature [see MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF)]. Hermes believed that the means of establishing Christian revelation as true and obligatory is the practical reason with its concern for human dignity. Man must accept Christian revelation because it enables him to realize his human dignity to the highest degree.

Faith. According to Hermes, FAITH is a state of certitude with respect to a particular truth. The certitude may spring either from the speculative or from the practical reason reflecting upon its respective object. As a commentary upon Hermes's conception of faith, it may be noted that faith so conceived does not rest upon the authority of God (the real motive of faith, according to Vatican Council I, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum [Freiburg 1963] 3008), but upon human understanding. It also follows from such a conception of faith that mysteries of the first order [see MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY)], such as the Trinity or the Incarnation, do not necessarily remain mysteries once a man comes to believe them.

Grace and original sin. According to Hermes, the state of innocence prior to the fall of man consisted in the conformity of man's will to God's. ORIGINAL SIN consists in CONCUPISCENCE, or the rebellion of man's lower nature against his higher one. There are two forms of GRACE, habitual and actual. Habitual, or sanctifying, grace is the intention of God to grant to man, in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, the assistance he needs to vanquish the effects of concupiscence, or original sin. Actual grace is the assistance itself that God grants to man at the right moment for this purpose. Even though concupiscence remains after Baptism, man has regained sanctifying grace because he has regained the favor of God. Thus it is apparent that for Hermes habitual grace is not a supernatural reality modifying man's soul, but rather the permanent disposition of God to help man. By his explanation of original sin and its remission, Hermes approaches Luther's conception that JUSTIFICATION or the regaining of habitual grace is an external imputation on the part of God (see IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT).

See Also: FAITH AND REASON; GÜNTHER, ANTON; METHODOLOGY (THEOLOGY); RATIONALISM; SEMIRATIONALISM.

Bibliography: A. THOUVENIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2:2288–2303, ibid. Tables générales 2:2066. R. SCHLUND and E. HEGEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:258–261. G. MARON, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 3:262–264. H. REUSCH, Allgemeine deutsche Biographie 12:192–196. A. FORTESCUE, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:625–626. G. FRITZ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:1850–54. P. WENZEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 9:652–653.

[E. J. GRATSCH]

HERMETIC LITERATURE

Hermes Trismegistus (thrice-great) was the Hellenistic Greek name for the Egyptian god of wisdom and letters, Thoth, who was identified with the Greek Hermes or Roman Mercury. In antiquity a vast literature of magic, astrology, alchemy, philosophy, and theology (perhaps better “theosophy”) was associated with his name. In a narrower sense the Hermetic literature consists of three groups of philosophico-religious materials that originated in Egypt and were first written in Greek, not, as was once thought, in Egyptian. Though the dating of none is certain, it seems safe to assign them to the 2nd and 3rd centuries A.D. with the possibility that some are even earlier. They do not all stem from the same author, though they have a common religious viewpoint. Hermeticism should not, however, be thought of as a school or sect.

Classification of Hermetic writings. The first group of 18 writings, libelli, mostly in the form of dialogues between Hermes and one of his sons, Tat, and with Asclepius, is found in manuscripts dating from the late Middle Ages and is called the Corpus Hermeticum. It has sometimes been named after the first treatise in it, the Poimandres, which does not mention Hermes but is clearly Hermetic. This name probably reflects, not the Greek ποιμήν ἀνδρῶν, “shepherd of men,” but the Coptic p-eime-n-rē, “the knowledge of the Sun-God.” Poimandres is presented as a semi-divine figure, “the mind of the sovereignty.”

The second part of the Hermetic literature is the Asclepius, a treatise once erroneously assigned to Apuleius and preserved among his works. It is extant in Latin, in which it was known and cited by St. Augustine. Fragments of the Greek original also survive under the title Λόγος τέλειος. The third group of writings is a large collection of excerpts and citation preserved in the works of Stobaeus, including the revelations of Isis called the Κόρη κοσμοῦ.

To this literature we must add several works in Coptic translation that have appeared in Codex VI of the Chenoboskion manuscripts. One of these is a more archaic version of part of the Asclepius [J. Doresse, “Hermès et la Gnose. A propos de l’Asclepius copte,” Novum Testamentum 1 (1956) 54–69].

Evaluation. The Hermetic writings represent on one side the confrontation of Platonic and Stoic philosophy, and on the other the mingling of Greek ideas with Eastern religions, including Judaism. The whole constitutes what can best be described as a pagan form of visionary Gnosticism. The Hermetica contain many resemblances to Philo (e.g., the notion of a Logos) and to Christianity, especially to the Fourth Gospel (God as Life and Light, the cosmic role of the Logos, the idea of rebirth, etc.), but most modern scholars deny any direct influence in either direction with regard to either source. Despite some polytheistic and strongly pantheistic passages, the Hermetic writings evidence a doctrine of one transcendent God, who is all good, the Father and Creator of all. The Genesis account of creation is adapted in the Poimandres and elsewhere, and sometimes intermediaries such as Nous and the Logos are involved in the process. Salvation for man consists in knowledge (gnosis) of God, the world, and men, i.e., of the Hermetic doctrines. This knowledge leads to liberation and ultimate divinization, characterized as rebirth in Corpus Hermeticum XIII.

See Also: CHENOBOSKION, Gnostic Texts of; Gnosticism.

Bibliography: Texts (very freely emended) and tr. W. SCOTT and A. S. FERGUSON, eds., Hermetics 4 v. (Oxford 1934–36). Texts (critical ed.) and Fr. tr. A. D. NOCK, ed. Corpus hermeticum tr. A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, 4 v. (Études bibliques Paris 1945–54). R. M. GRANT, Gnosticism: A Sourcebook (New York 1961) 209–233. Studies. A. J. FESTUGIÈRE, La Révélation d’Hermès Trismégiste, 4 v. (Études bibliques, Paris 1944–54). C. H. DODD, The Bible and the Greeks (London 1935; reprint 1954) 99–248; The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, Eng. 1953) 10–53. H. JONAS, The Gnostic Religion (2nd ed. Boston 1963) 147–173. W. KROLL, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893) 8.1 (1912) 792–823. H. GUNDEL, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1893) 21.1 (1951) 1193–1207. G. VAN MOORSEL, The Mysteries of Hermes Trismegistus (Utrecht 1955).

[G. W. MACRAE]

HERMITS

Persons who have retired into solitude to lead the religious life. The term is derived through Old French and Latin from the Greek ἐρημίτης. Although there were probably Christian solitaries before his time, an Egyptian named Paul was the first to popularize the eremitic life. From the beginning of the 4th century, this life was one Engraving of Odoacer conferring with the hermit Severin.

(©Bettmann/CORBIS)

of the standard ways, especially in the East, in which Christian asceticism expressed itself. In the East, after a first period of dramatic and often excessive austerity among hermits, ecclesiastical authority (Chalcedon, 451, and the Novellae of Justinian) brought the eremitic life under control and provided that hermits should live adjacent to monasteries and under the control of superiors, as they still do at Mt. Athos and other places in the East. In the West, the 6th-century Rule of St. Benedict (ch. 1) provided for the exceptional case of the ascetic who might be permitted to become a solitary, a provision modeled on the precepts of St. Basil. In the West the cenobitic life has tended to obscure the eremitic life more completely than it has in the East, but several periods of spiritual revival have sent a comparatively large number into the desert places of western Europe; this occurred especially in the 11th century, and again with the mystical movements of the 13th and 14th centuries. From the eremitic impulse of the 11th century sprang the two congregations that have preserved a canonical form of semi-eremitic life into the modern world, the Carthusians and the Camaldolese. In a spiritual climate in which the eremitic life enjoys little popularity, these two groups provide the only institutional possibilities for its practice by Christians of the West. The Augustinian Hermits, formed in the mid-13th century from several Italian societies of hermits, became FRIARS almost immediately upon foundation.

See Also: ANCHORITES.

Bibliography: H. LECLERCQ, F. CABROL, and H. I. MARROU, eds., Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:384–386. For additional bibliog. see ANCHORITES.

[A. DONAHUE]

HERMITS OF ST. PAUL

Also known as Pauline Fathers (Ordo Fratrum Sancti Pauli Primi Eremitae; OSPPE; Official Catholic Directory #1010), a religious order of priests and brothers. It originated in 1250 with the union of a monastery in Patach, Hungary that had been founded in 1215 by Bishop Bartholomew of Pécs with another in Pisilia, Hungary established by Blessed Eusebius of Esztergom (d. 1270). The order received papal approval in 1308 and adopted a strict observance of the rule of St. Augustine (see AUGUSTINE, RULE OF ST.). It spread widely in Hungary, Austria, Germany, Sweden, Italy, Prussia, Lithuania, and also in Poland, where the famous sanctuary of the Black Madonna of Czestochowa was founded in 1382. In the 16th and 17th centuries the Reformation and the Turkish invasions caused a serious decline, but a notable revival occurred at the end of the 17th century, when the order expanded to six provinces in Poland, Hungary, Austria, Istria, Swabia, and Croatia. In 1420 Mendo Gomez introduced the Hermits into Portugal, where the membership was always small. Guillaume Callier established the order in France and drew up statutes that received Paul V's approval in 1620. The French group, popularly known as the Brothers of Death, decorated their scapular with a skull and oriented their asceticism toward a constant concern with death. The order was contemplative until the 16th century, when the Holy See assigned to it charitable, educational, and parochial works. Many members became bishops, scholars, and writers. Cardinal Georg Utjesenovich (d. 1551) was famous as a defender of Hungarian independence. Augustin Kordecki is remembered for his defense of Poland and of the shrine at Czestochowa in 1655. Martin Borkowics has been called in Croatia the father of his country. Emperor Joseph II suppressed the houses in his Hapsburg states in 1786. The Portuguese and French houses did not survive the French Revolutionary period. The congregation first arrived in the United States in 1953. The United States provincialate is in Doylestown, Pennsylvania. The generalate is in Cze-stochowa, Poland.

[V. GELLHAUS/EDS.]

HERMOSILLO, ARCHDIOCESE OF

Mexican ecclesiastical province (Hermosillensis); created a diocese in 1779; raised to an archdiocese in 1964; it then had as suffragans the Dioceses of Ciudad Obregón (1959) and Tijuana (1964), recently raised from an apostolic vicariate.

The religious administration of the modern state of Sonora was originally in the care of Franciscan and Jesuit missionaries, who arrived soon after its discovery. There were many illustrious missionaries who evangelized the primitive tribes of this distant region, but the best known is the Jesuit Eusebio Francisco KINO, who occupies an outstanding place in Mexican missiology. When the bishopric of Durango was founded in 1620, the territory of Sonora was under its jurisdiction and was frequently visited by the bishops, as the visitation records in the archives of the cathedral of Durango testify. Since the See of Durango was too large to permit good ecclesiastical administration, Pius VI created the bishopric of Sonora on May 7, 1779. The first bishop, Antonio María de los Reyes, took charge of his diocese in 1782 and made his episcopal residence in Arispe.

The bishopric included the states of Sonora and Sinaloa and the territories of Lower and Upper California, all suffragan to Durango. In 1884 the Diocese of Sinaloa was erected. Lower California was made an apostolic vicariate, and Upper California came under the civil government of the U.S. and was made a separate diocese. Thus the Diocese of Sonora was reduced in size to the modern state of the same name. When the Diocese of Chihuahua was raised to a metropolitan see, Sonora was suffragan to it, and the area then was divided (1959) into the Dioceses of Ciudad Obregón and Hermosillo. Paul VI raised the Diocese of Hermosillo to an archdiocese; the last bishop, Don Juan Navarrete y Guerrero, continued in office as the first archbishop of the see.

[I. GALLEGOS]

HEROD ANTIPAS

The younger son of HEROD THE GREAT and Malthace of Samaria. His education was at the imperial court in Rome. Herod's final will named him tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and, despite a petition by Antipas to be made king of Judea instead of his older brother Archelaus, Augustus confirmed the will in 4 B.C. The subjects of Antipas's tetrarchy, in large part descended from pagans converted only a few generations before, were zealous and even fanatical Jews. Antipas (who officially used the dynastic name Herod), like his father, checked the nationalistic fervor of his subjects and demanded absolute loyalty to the Roman suzerain; the nobility who supported him in this policy were called HERODIANS (Mt 22.16; Mk 12.13). Antipas's concern to repress any possible disturbance is seen in his imprisonment of JOHN THE BAPTIST and his opposition to Jesus' ministry (Lk 13.31; Mk 3.6). He is the Herod mentioned in the Passion narrative (Lk 23.8–12; see PASSION OF CHRIST, 1).

Antipas also emulated his father by undertaking building projects; he rebuilt Betharamphtha (modern Teller-Râmeh) and Sepphoris (modern Suffuriyeh) in Galilee and founded the city of TIBERIAS, whose name testifies to his lifelong close ties with the emperor. A dynastic marriage with the daughter of the Nabataean King Aretas IV gave way to Antipas's infatuation with his half brother Herod's wife, his niece Herodias. The divorce made Aretas his enemy, and in A.D. 36 Aretas attacked Antipas's forces in a boundary dispute; at the time Antipas was absent in Mesopotamia as mediator between the Parthian King Artabanus and the Roman legate Vitellius.

Herodias caused Antipas's final downfall. When Gaius Caligula named Herodias's brother Agrippa king over the former tetrarchy of Philip, the ambitious Herodias urged Antipas to complain to Gaius and seek the title of king himself. Agrippa's response to his uncle's attempt was to follow him to Rome (A.D. 39) and accuse him of treasonous plotting with Artabanus. Antipas was immediately exiled to Gaul, where he and Herodias lived out their days.

Bibliography: J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 5:266; Herod Antipas and Jesus Christ (Stuttgart 1947). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 101–102. A. H. M. JONES, The Herods of Judaea (Oxford 1938) 176–183. W. G. A. OTTO, Paulys Realencyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. Suppl. 2 (1913) 1–200, sep. pub. Herodes (Stuttgart 1913) 175–198. F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion Arabe, 2 v. (Études bibliques 1952) 1:438–446.

[J. P. M. WALSH]

HEROD THE GREAT

King of Judea at the time of the birth of Jesus Christ (Mt 2.1). He was born about 73 B.C., the second son of the Idumean Antipater, chief official of the HASMONAEAN king Hyrcanus II; his mother was Cyprus, a Nabataean woman.

Illustration of the Slaughter of the Holy Innocents. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Early Life. Throughout his early life, when various factions successively gained dominance in Palestine, Herod, like his father, managed always to align himself with the winning side. He first came to prominence at the age of 25, when as governor of Galilee he overreached his authority by executing some rebellious brigands; Herod escaped condemnation by the Jerusalem Sanhedrin only by leaving Judea and joining the Roman administration of Syria. When in 46 B.C. a follower of Pompey took over the Roman governor's army, Herod, his father, and his elder brother Phasael fought against him on behalf of the party of Julius Caesar. After Caesar's assassination (44 B.C.), however, they supported the republican C. Cassius, who had taken command of Syria, and aided him in preparations for the war against Mark Antony. Soon after, in 43 B.C., a personal enemy, Malichus, had Antipater murdered, and seized the government of Judea. Herod, with Cassius' connivance, had Malichus killed, and Hyrcanus reappointed Phasael governor of Jerusalem. While Cassius joined Brutus for the impending battle against Antony and Octavian, Herod and Phasael had to put down a revolt raised by Malichus's brothers and another raised on behalf of Hyrcanus's nephew and rival Antigonus. With this opposition overcome, Herod then strengthened his position by his betrothal to Hyrcanus's granddaughter Mariamme; thus the Idumean Herod, whose family had been Jewish for barely three generations, was to some extent identified with the legitimate Hasmonaean dynasty.

Tetrarch of Galilee. After the battle of Philippi (41 B.C.), Phasael and Herod ingratiated themselves with the victorious Mark Antony. Despite opposition from Jewish delegations, Antony made Phasael and Herod tetrarchs of Judea and Galilee respectively. In 40 B.C., however, the Parthians invaded Syria, and Antigonus, with the assurance of Parthian support, again marched on Jerusalem. Phasael and Hyrcanus fell into Antigonus's power, but Herod slipped away from Jerusalem with his family and household, and committed them to his brother Joseph's care in the fortress of Masada in southeastern Judea. Phasael seems to have committed suicide; Hyrcanus was mutilated and taken away to Mesopotamia.

Refused asylum with the Nabataean king at Petra, Herod went to Rome in the fall of 40 B.C. to appeal to Antony. In a formal session of the senate Antony and Octavian had Herod named king. After his arrival at Ptolemais (Accho) in the spring of 39 B.C., Herod gathered an army and relieved the besieged Masada, but he was unable to begin the siege of Jerusalem until the spring of 37 B.C., when he also married Mariamme. On taking Jerusalem Herod began his reign with a series of proscriptions, which all but eliminated the Sanhedrin. Antigonus was executed by order of Antony.

Herod faced only three dangers to his power thereafter: Cleopatra of Egypt, the surviving Hasmonaeans, and the fall of his patron, Antony. Cleopatra used her influence with Antony to acquire much of Herod's best land, including Jericho and the port of Joppe (Jaffa); she supported a plot to restore an independent Idumea; at the request of Mariamme's mother, Alexandra, she exerted pressure on Herod to appoint his brother-in-law, the young Aristobulus, high priest. As legitimate successor to the high priesthood and kingship, and as a figure attractive to the people, Aristobulus presented a threat to the parvenu Herod, who accordingly had him killed shortly after his appointment in 36 B.C. Hyrcanus, who had returned from Babylon upon the fall of Antigonus, was also murdered by Herod in 30 B.C., as the last possible rival for power. Antony's defeat at Actium removed Cleopatra as a threat to his kingship, but also put Herod in danger of removal. He quickly changed his allegiance, giving aid to Octavian's forces, and in 30 B.C. Octavian confirmed him as king and even restored the land Cleopatra had taken over, along with other coastal towns and Samaria, Gadara, and Hippos. In 22 B.C. his territory was further enlarged, to include Trachonitis, Batanaea, and Auranitis (Hauran).

King of Judea. Once established as a client king, Herod was occupied with construction projects. He required force to stay in power, and so he built or strengthened many fortresses: Masada, Alexandrium, Hyrcania, Antonia, Phasaelis, Herodium, Machaerus, and Cyprus (at NT Jericho). His army was made up mostly of mercenaries. Besides building for military purposes, Herod lavished money on cities, temples, and theaters. His outstanding achievements were rebuilding the city of Samaria as Sebaste (27 B.C.), his fortress-palace in JERUSALEM (23 B.C.), the port of Caesarea (22 B.C.), and the new Temple of Jerusalem (built between about 20 and 10 B.C.). Herod was a benefactor to many cities of the empire as well, financing expensive projects out of his immense wealth; these had the effect of protecting the interests of Jews in the Diaspora and reducing anti-Jewish feeling in the Hellenistic cities. Throughout his reign, Herod was on good terms with Augustus, until in 9 B.C. a misunderstanding over his actions in a military campaign against the Nabataeans brought him into the emperor's disfavor.

Herod's family life was complex and unhappy, full of intrigue and conflict. He was passionately devoted to his wife, Mariamme, and hence prone to jealousy. Salomé, his sister, out of resentment against the Hasmonaean Mariamme and her sons, Aristobulus and Alexander, poisoned Herod's mind against them. Convinced of Mariamme's unfaithfulness, Herod had her executed in 29 B.C., and her mother, Alexandra, within the year, again at Salomé's instigation. About 23 B.C. Herod married another Mariamme, daughter of Simon of Alexandria, whom he appointed high priest; by her he had a son called Herod, to whom Herodias was first married. Mariamme II was followed by seven other wives; the most important were Malthace, mother of Archelaus and HEROD ANTIPAS, and Cleopatra of Jerusalem, mother of Philip the Tetrarch. Salomé and Herod's brother Pheroras plotted to discredit Alexander and Aristobulus. As a result, in 14 B.C. Herod recalled to the court his first wife, Doris, and her son Antipater, and the latter, out of ambition, became a willing accomplice to the schemes of Salomé and Pheroras. On the basis of their accusations, Herod had Alexander and Aristobulus executed in Sebaste in 7 B.C., and named Antipater heir. But in 4 B.C., when he learned of Antipater's intrigues against his sons and himself, Herod had him executed too; he named Archelaus, Antipas, and Philip joint heirs. Herod himself died a short time later, apparently of cancer.

The account in Mt 2.16 of the slaughter of the Holy INNOCENTS at Bethlehem is entirely in keeping with the king's cruel jealousy.

Bibliography: FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS, Ant. 14:19; Bell. Iud. 17–2.183. S. H. PEROWNE, The Life and Times of Herod the Great (Nashville 1959). A. H. M. JONES, The Herods of Judaea (Oxford 1938) 1–155. F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion Arabe, 2 v. Études Bibliques 1:310–406. A. MOMIGLIANO, The Cambridge Ancient History (London and New York 1923–29) 10:316–339. J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65)² 5:263–265. W. FOERSTER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65)³ 3:266–268. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 988–990.

[J. P. M. WALSH]

HERODIANS

A group of men mentioned in the New Testament as united with the Pharisees against Jesus (Mk 3.6; 12.13; Mt 22.16). The Herodians (Ἡροδῖται) did not constitute a religious sect, but probably were members of a small clique of avowed partisans of the Herodian dynasty represented by HEROD ANTIPAS. After the deposition of Archelaus, c. A.D. 7, Judea was placed under a Roman procurator. The Jews resented this foreign rule and grew bitter because of the cruelty of many of these governors. Some Jews regarded the reestablishment of the Herodian rule over all of Palestine as necessary for the nation's preservation and for its eventual full independence.

Rock formations viewed from atop Herodian Fortress, Masada, Israel. (©Dave G. Houser/CORBIS)

Bibliography: H. H. ROWLEY, “The Herodians of the Gospel,” Journal of Theological Studies 41 (London 1940) 14–27. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 990–991.

[J. M. DOUGHERTY]

HERODIAS

The daughter of Aristobulus, the son of HEROD THE GREAT and the HASMONAEAN Mariamme; her mother was Berenice, daughter of Herod's sister Salome and Costobar. Herodias's first husband was her uncle Herod “Without-land” (called Philip in Mt 14.3; Mk 6.17), son of Herod the Great and Mariamme II. Some time after the birth of their daughter Salome, Herod's half-brother HEROD ANTIPAS, the tetrarch of Galilee, who had married the daughter of the NABATAEAN King Aretas IV, became infatuated with Herodias. Antipas and Herodias divorced their spouses and married (c. A.D. 27). Herodias's motive was probably ambition; Antipas was tetrarch, while Herod had neither power nor the inclination to seek it. It was at the instigation of Herodias that Antipas had St. JOHN THE BAPTIST beheaded for having condemned their marriage (Mt 14.3–11; Mk 6.17–28). When the Emperor Gaius (Caligula) made her brother Agrippa king in A.D. 37, Herodias was humiliated by his success, and in 39 she persuaded Antipas to go to Rome to seek the same title himself. When he was, instead, banished to Lyons, Herodias elected to accompany her husband into exile, where she died.

Bibliography: J. BLINZLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:266–267. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 991.

[J. P. M. WALSH]

HERRAD OF LANDSBERG

Abbess, compiler of the Hortus deliciarum; b. Chateau of Landsberg, Alsace, c. 1130; d. Hohenberg, July 25, 1195. No details are known of her early life. She was abbess of Hohenberg (Mont Sainte-Odile) from 1167 and under her rule the convent prospered materially, spiritually, and intellectually.

Her abbey's cultural level is exemplified by the Hortus, which she had compiled for the spiritual benefit of her nuns. Its theme was the history of man from creation to last judgment, told against a Biblical background. Incorporating a wide range of contemporary knowledge, it was a compendium of 12th-century thought. Herrad's personal authorship included only the preface and a few short verses, but selections comprising about 45,000 lines represented sources ranging from the Fathers to her own contemporaries. Its miniatures, numbering at least 344, were its chief claim to distinction. Some of these occupied an entire page of the manuscript, which measured 53 by 37 centimeters. They may have been produced independently of the text and by an organized scriptorium, but exact artistic responsibility is uncertain. The influence of the Canons of MARBACH has been noted in the script, however. The miniatures combined artistic influences of East and West and pictured details of contemporary daily life. The original manuscript was completely destroyed in 1870. Parts of the text have been restored and copies of many of the miniatures are extant. The unpublished portions of the text are in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

Bibliography: HERRAD OF LANDSBERG, Notitia et fragmenta, in PL 194:1537-42; Hortus deliciarum, ed. A. STRAUB and G. KELLER (Strasbourg 1879-99), fol. ed. with plates; ed. J. WALTER (Strasbourg 1952), valuable introd. and notes. C. M. ENGLEHARDT, Herrad von Landsberg (Stuttgart 1818). L. ECKENSTEIN, Women under Monasticism (Cambridge, Eng. 1896). C. WITTMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957-65) 5:269-270. G. WEBB, "Herrad and Her Garden of Delights," Life of the Spirit 16 (1961-62) 475-481.

[F. M. BEACH]

HERRERA, BARTOLOMÉ

Peruvian bishop and political theorist; b. Lima, Aug. 24, 1808; d. Arequipa, 1865. By the time he was five, Herrera was orphaned, and he was cared for by his uncles. However, his most important protector was Manuel José Pedemonte, rector of the Colegio de San Carlos, who admitted the young man to that college in 1821 on a full scholarship. Herrera at first studied to become a lawyer and took degrees in civil and canon law. On the advice of Father Pedemonte, and after a year of meditation, he presented himself for ordination in 1832. Pedemonte wished to retain him on the faculty of San Carlos, but the young priest applied for and received a small parish, far removed from Lima, in Cajacay. Herrera himself says that he wished to have leisure in which to restudy philosophy since he had begun to suspect the orthodoxy of the teachings at San Carlos, especially in its Jansenistic and regalistic aspects. During the next few years Herrera rediscovered St. Thomas and gradually became a scholastic. Archbishop Benavente had him preach the sermon at his installation (1834) and serve as his secretary for the canonical visitation of the archdiocese. Because of his weak health, Herrera requested and was granted a transfer to the parish of Lurín in 1837. He made the acquaintance of a neighboring landlord, whom a revolution made president in 1842. The president appointed Herrera rector of San Carlos, then the first center of intellectual life in Peru and famous since the days of Toribio RODRÍGUEZ DE MENDOZA. By this time, Herrera's own ideas had matured, and in San Carlos he found the medium in which to instill them in the minds of young men who would be the rulers of Peru for many decades. For him sovereignty did not come from the people but from God; the people did not have the capacity or the right to make laws since these emanated from the eternal principles placed by God with the very nature of things. Hence, Herrera wanted a strong government, without congresses or universal suffrage, based on an aristocracy of the most capable and most intelligent. These opinions projected Herrera into the political arena amid the most bitter attacks of the liberals, both ecclesiastic and lay.

Bartolomé Herrera.

In 1849 Herrera was elected deputy to congress from Lima and then elected by his fellow members president of that body. In 1851 he was chosen as member of the president's cabinet, and for a time he discharged the offices of minister of government, foreign affairs, and public instruction. As such he concluded a boundary treaty with Brazil, helped the Sisters of the Sacred Hearts to open the first formal school for girls in Lima, brought Father Pedro GUAL to Lima, sponsored the first groups of Austrian and Irish immigrants, and helped draw up a more judicious law for the election of bishops. His severity irritated the liberals, and the president, under pretext of negotiating a concordat with the Holy See, sent him off to Rome as plenipotentiary in May 1852. Herrera discovered this ruse only when he returned in 1853 for consultation to find that the Lima government had taken no action on his proposed draft of a concordat. For some years his disillusionment and an attack of tuberculosis kept him out of public affairs. He strove to restore the prestige of the Lima archdiocesan seminary and edited a Catholic journal with the help of one of his former students, Juan Ambrosio Huerta. He also began the Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul. In 1858 he returned to congress and was again elected its president. When the congress failed to repeal laws that he thought unfair to the Church, he resigned his seat in 1860.

In 1859 he had been nominated for the bishopric of Arequipa, and now he devoted the remaining years of his life to his see, interesting himself especially in restoring the glory of the diocesan seminary of San Jerónimo and in reforming the diocesan clergy. Tuberculosis was the cause of his premature death. Herrera was the first prominent Peruvian priest after independence who was completely orthodox and ultramontane.

Bibliography: Bartolomé Herrera: Escritos y discursos, 2 v. (Lima 1929–34).

[A. S. TIBESAR]

HERRERA, JUAN DE

Architect and scientist who completed the ESCORIAL; b. Mobellan (Asturias), Spain, c. 1530; d. Madrid, Jan. 1, 1597. Herrera, the son of small landowners, studied at Valladolid before following Prince Philip (later PHILIP II) to Italy in 1547. In 1563 he was appointed assistant to the royal architect, Juan Bautista de Toledo, who had already projected the Escorial. Upon Toledo's death in May 1567, Herrera gradually assumed direction of the enterprise, received full charge in 1572, and brought it to completion in 1584. He also directed work at royal seats in Madrid, Aranjuez, Segovia, El Pardo, and Toledo. The Exchange in Seville (1584; now the Archivo General de Indias) and the unfinished cathedral of Valladolid (begun in 1585) are also his designs. His work differs from that of his Italian contemporaries, Vignola and Palladio, by its functional severity, as well as by the estilo desornamentado inherited from Juan Bautista de Toledo and other military architects of the 1560s, and by the richness of its proportional harmonies. He was the author of Discurso sobre la figura cubica (after 1579), and in 1584 he helped to found an academy in Madrid for mathematical studies. He also devised instruments for navigation.

Bibliography: L. CERVERA VERA, La semblanza de Juan de Herrera (Madrid 1963). A. RUIZ DE ARCAUTE, Juan de Herrera: Arquitecto de Felipe II (Madrid 1936). G. KUBLER and M. SORIA, Art and Architecture in Spain and Portugal and Their American Dominions, 1500–1800 (Pelican History of Art, ed. N. PEVSNER. Z17; Baltimore, 1959). B. BEVAN, History of Spanish Architecture (London 1938). A. L. MAYER, in U. THIEME and F. BECKER, eds., Allgemeines Lexikon der bildenden Künstler von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, 37 v. (Leipzig 1907–38) 16:540–542.

[G. KUBLER]

HERRERA Y TORDESILLAS, ANTONIO DE

Royal chronicler of Spain; b. Cuéllar, Segovia (Spain), 1549?; d. Madrid, March 27, 1625. In Italy c. 1570 he entered the service of Vespasian Gonzaga (1532–91), Viceroy of Naples, Navarre, and Valencia, who probably recommended him to King PHILIP II of Spain. Herrera's account of Portugal and the conquest of the Azores in 1582–83 (Madrid 1591) was completed in 1586. Herrera translated Giovanni Minadoi's Historia della guerra fra Turchi e Persiani, 1576–85 (Venice 1588), and in 1589 he published a history of Scotland and England during the life of MARY STUART. His translation (Barcelona 1599, Burgos 1603) of Giovanni Botero's anti-Machiavellian study of the State (Milan 1583) and of cities (Venice 1589) was done at the command of Philip II in 1592, and in 1612 Herrera published a work on the disturbances of 1592 in Aragon. His history of the Wars of Religion (see THIRTY YEARS WAR) in France (1585–94), from a Spanish point of view, was suppressed on its appearance in 1598, the same year he published an account of the disputes over ecclesiastical and secular jurisdiction in Milan from 1594 to 1598. In 1624 he published a history of Italy from 1281 to 1599. His works, many of which are in MSS in Madrid, include a variety of translations, eulogies, and treatises, which an official might be called on to produce.

Herrera's major work, General History of the Spanish in the Indies in Eight Decades (4 v. Madrid 1601–15; 8 v., Madrid 1726–30; 10 v. Asuncion 1944–47), partially translated into French (1621, 1659–71) and English (1725–26, 1740), which caused a dispute with Juan de TORQUEMADA, established a long-lived apologia for Columbus and for Spanish rule in the New World in a detailed but disconnected chronicle of events from 1492 to the conquest of Peru in 1554. It was in great part taken from MSS and published works (some no longer extant) of B. de LAS CASAS, Bp. Juan Bernal y Díaz de Lugo (d. 1566), Francisco Cervantes de Salazar (1514–75), and other authors, to which Herrera had access after he became royal chronicler, May 15, 1596. The Descripción of the Indies (Madrid 1601), which accompanied the History and has often been reprinted and translated, resembles a text of MS Madrid BN J-15 and has been attributed to Juan López de Velasco, Herrera's predecessor as chronicler.

FARNESE correspondence (ed. C. Pérez Bustamente, Santiago 1934) shows that Herrera c. 1607 extorted money from that family to suppress data about Alexander Farnese (1545–92), Governor of the Spanish Netherlands at the time of the 1588 Armada, in the 3d part of his history of the world of Philip II, 1559 to 1598 (3 v. Madrid 1601–12). This work for the most part depended on Italian historians. At this time Herrera translated two works on the spiritual life. In 16 letters or essays (Madrid 1804) Herrera reveals a critical concern about the basic approach of a historian, whose work encompasses geographical, social, chronological, and national (or genealogical) studies; Herrera would judiciously associate historical truth with the divine and ecclesiastical order. Herrera had financial ties in the New World and with the FUGGER bankers and in his last years spent much money in fruitless suits for debts. His imprisonment from 1609 to 1611 is shrouded in secrecy.

Bibliography: A. BALLESTEROS Y BERETTA and A. DE ALTOGUIRRE Y DUVALE, annotated ed. of the Descripción and two Decades of the General History . . . , 5 v. (Madrid 1934–36), has a study of Herrera, B. SÁNCHEZ ALONSO, Historia de la historiografía española, 3 v. (Madrid 1941–50) v.2.

[E. P. COLBERT]

HERRERO, ANDRÉS

Franciscan missionary, restorer of the Colegios Franciscanos de Propaganda Fide in Bolivia, Peru, and Chile; b. Arnedo, Logroño, Spain, 1782; d. Bolivia, 1838. He arrived in Peru in 1810 at the Apostolic College of Juan De Herrera.

Moquegua. For more than 20 years he served as a missionary in the basin of the Madre de Dios and Beni Rivers during the difficult period of the wars for independence. As a firm foundation for his evangelical work, he mastered the native languages and built schools, granges, and art and craft shops in each missionary center. He continued to work under the independent republican regime with a fervor equal to that he had displayed under the patronage of Spain. In view of the almost complete disruption of the Franciscan Order in its provincial organization, missionary colleges, and missions in the South American countries along the Pacific Coast, his greatest aspiration was to bring about its restoration. With the backing of the president of Bolivia, Santa Cruz, he began in 1833 by going to Europe in search of missionaries. He was received kindly by GREGORY XVI, who named him apostolic prefect of all missionary colleges and missions in South America. He returned to Bolivia in 1835 with 12 missionaries. In 1837, he traveled again to Europe, and secured 84 missionaries. With 19 of them, the Colegio de Ocopa in Peru was restored. Furthermore, in Bolivia he promoted national vocations. The work begun by Herrera was consolidated and extended in the following decades by all the South American nations of the Pacific Coast.

Bibliography: P. DOMÍNGUEZ, El colegio franciscano de propaganda fide de Moquegua (Madrid 1955).

[O. SAIZ]

HERRISVAD, ABBEY OF

Also called Herivadum, oldest Cistercian abbey in Denmark, in the Archdiocese of Lund in Scania, now a part of Sweden. It was founded in 1144 by ESKIL OF LUND, the archbishop; the first monks came directly from CÎTEAUX. The foundation stone of the church was laid in 1158, but it is not known exactly when the church was finished. It was rebuilt wholly or in part early in the 13th century and again, after a great fire, in 1291. The abbey has been demolished but its plan is well known from recent excavations of the site. The importance of Herrisvad was soon recognized, and daughterhouses were founded in Tvis (Tuta Vallis) 1163, in Holme (Insula Dei) 1172, and in Løgum (Locus Dei) c. 1173. The church (built c. 1200–1350) and part of the monastery in Løgum still exist. After Herrisvad the next Cistercian abbey in Denmark was Esrom (no Latin name), founded c. 1153 by Eskil and inhabited by monks from CLAIRVAUX. Esrom was perhaps the wealthiest abbey in Denmark, and from it were founded a number of daughterhouses, including Vitskøl (Vitae Schola) 1158, and Sorø (SORA), founded by ABSALON OF LUND (later Archbishop of Denmark) in 1162. Esrom and Sorø had formerly been Benedictine abbeys. The church in Sorø, built soon after the foundation and several times rebuilt (after a fire in 1247 and later), is extant and is regarded as one of the finest specimens of ecclesiastical architecture from medieval Denmark. Øm (Cara Insula), founded in 1165 as a daughterhouse of Vitskøl, is remembered from the vivid record of its earliest history in Exordium Carae Insulae. Glücksburg Castle in the old Diocese of Schleswig, now a part of Germany, is built on the site of Ryd abbey (Rus Regis) founded in 1209. The Cistercian abbeys in Denmark flourished until the 14th century when a serious decline set in. After the Reformation (1536) all abbeys and other religious houses were dissolved.

Bibliography: Exordium Monasterii Carae Insulae, ed. M. C. GERTZ in Scriptores minores historiae Danicae Medii Aevi, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1917–22) 2:153–264. E. ORTVED, Cistercieordenen og dens klostre i Norden, 2 v. in 1 (Copenhagen 1927–33). V. B. LORENZEN, De danske Cistercienserkløstres Bygningshistorie (Copenhagen 1941). L. GJERLØW and J. GALLÉN, Kulturhistorisk Leksikon for nordisk middelalder, v.2 (Copenhagen 1957) 565–573, with bibliog.

[H. BEKKER-NIELSEN]

HERSFELD, ABBEY OF

A former Benedictine abbey (Hirshfeld, Herocampia, Hirsfeldia, Hersfeldense) in the Diocese of Mainz. Sturmus, a pupil of St. Boniface, established a cell there in 736. Lullus, a monk of Malmesbury, the best known of Boniface's companions and later his successor as bishop of Mainz, founded the abbey in 769–770. It was first dedicated to SS. Simon and Thaddeus, but soon after it was renamed to honor the relics of St. Wigbert of Fritzlar. A new church was erected in 850.

When Hersfeld became an imperial abbey under Charlemagne it was already rich in estates in Hesse and Thuringia, and took an active role in the mission to the Saxons. It had one of the great medieval libraries, containing the important annals of the period of Otto II. During the 10th and 11th centuries it was an important spiritual center, particularly under the reforming abbots, Godehard and Arnold. However, as an imperial abbey, Hersfeld opposed the Cluniac reform.

The more important dependencies of Hersfeld were Herrenbreitstein, Göllingen, Memleben, Kreuzberg, and Frauensee. Hersfeld's abbots ranked with the princes of the empire until the mid-12th century, and after the 13th, the abbot received investiture from the emperor. Wealth and worldly living seem to have weakened monastic discipline. Its Vogt (suzerain), the Landgrave of Thuringia and Hesse, greatly reduced its territories in the 14th and 15th centuries. There was, moreover, a bitter quarrel between the abbey and the town. The Bursfeld reform was introduced in 1510, but Abbot Crato brought in the Protestant reform. There were attempts to restore the abbey in the 17th century, but it was given to Hesse as a principality in 1648. Important ruins of the church and frescoes of the Ottonian period remain. (See illustration below.)

Bibliography: H. BÜTTNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:281. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topo-bibliographique des abbayes et prieurés 1:1410–11. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'Ordre de Saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bel. 1942–56).

[P. BECKMAN]

HERST, RICHARD, BL.

Lay martyr; name also given as Hurst or Hayhurst; b. Broughton, near Preston, Lancashire, England; d. hanged at Lancaster, Aug. 29, 1628. Richard, a wealthy yeoman who cultivated his own land, was arrested as a recusant Catholic upon the order of the bishop of Chester. In the course of the arrest one of the pursuivant's men, named Dewhurst, broke his leg and later died of the injury. Although Dewhurst himself solemnly swore that the fatal injury was an accident, Herst was indicted for murder. Herst's friends and Queen Henrietta Maria petitioned King Charles I for a reprieve; however the government countered the petition. Although the jury was unwilling to convict Herst of murder, the judge insisted on a verdict of guilt. The following day he was forcibly dragged by the legs to a Protestant church to hear a sermon. Upon the gallows he was offered his life in exchange for swearing allegiance to the king, but he refused because the oath contained attacks upon the Catholic faith. Thereupon he was executed. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), II, 97–101. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF

The first general assembly of the whole English Church (Sept. 26, 672), summoned by THEODORE of Tarsus, Archbishop of Canterbury (669–690), after 3 1/2 years of visitation, reform, and consecration of bishops to fill vacancies throughout England. By its most important canons the Council of Hertford reaffirmed the Roman calculation of Easter (c.1), prohibited bishops from intruding in the affairs of neighboring dioceses (c.2), forbade monks to leave their monasteries without permission of their abbots (c.4), provided for future episcopal synods twice a year if possible, but at least annually (c.7), established the order of precedence among bishops according to dates of consecration (c.8), and recognized adultery as the only basis for divorce while forbidding a divorced man to remarry (c.10). The council marked a new stage in the growth of Christianity in England and the end of the period of regional churches related to each other only tenuously if at all. It inaugurated an established diocesan system under the forms of synodal government to replace the earlier practice of migratory and often ill-disciplined clergy, both regular and secular.

See Also: EASTER CONTROVERSY.

Bibliography: BEDE, Historia Ecclesiastica 4.5. A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78) 3:118–122. C. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (New York 1962).

[R. S. HOYT]

HERWEGEN, ILDEFONS

Liturgist; b. Junkersdorf, Germany, Nov. 27, 1874; d. Maria Laach Abbey, Sept. 2, 1946. He entered the Benedictine Abbey of Maria Laach in 1895 and studied archeology at Sant' Anselmo, Rome. He was already an ardent supporter of the liturgical movement in 1907. With his election in 1913 as 44th abbot of Maria Laach, he was able to enlist the full force of his monastic community and thus became the revered head of the movement toward liturgical renewal. He brought to this work a profound historical sense as well as rich gifts of personality and oratory.

The extraordinary influence he exerted over his countrymen of all classes was furthered by his use of several media. He gave innumerable retreats and weekend conferences all over Europe; he was the recognized leader of the respected Katholischer Akademikerverband; in 1931 he founded the Benedictine Academy for Liturgical and Monastic Research (since 1948 the Abt-Herwegen-Institut); he also produced both scholarly and popular works. He edited the collections Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens (Münster 1912–), of which 16 volumes have appeared, and Ecclesia Orans (Freiburg 1918–), a popular series. Moreover, he published more than 30 books and articles, of which the most famous are: Der heilige Benedikt (3d ed. Düsseldorf 1926), which has become a classic; Antike, Germanentum und Christentum (Salzburg 1931); Sinn und Geist der Benediktinerregel (Einsiedeln-Köln 1944).

Bibliography: Liturgie und Mönchtum 1 (1948) 39–44, bibliography. E. V. SEVERUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:284.

[H. A. REINHOLD]

HESS, BEDE FREDERICK

Minister general of the Order Friars Minor Conventual; b. Rome, N.Y., Nov. 16, 1885; d. Assisi, Italy, Aug. 8, 1953. He was the son of Joseph and Catherine (King) Hess. He was educated at St. Mary's School and St. Francis College, Trenton, N.J. In 1900 he entered the Franciscan Order and was professed on Nov. 17, 1901. He was sent to the University of Innsbruck, Austria, where he earned the S.T.D. After being ordained on July 26, 1908, he was given teaching assignments in New York at St. Francis College, Brooklyn, and St. Anthony-on-Hudson Seminary, Rensselaer. From 1912 to 1932 he was director of the mission band and pastor of St. Catherine's Church, Seaside Park, N.J. He founded a monthly magazine, the Minorite, later the Companion, and was active in promoting the Third Order, both as commissary provincial and chairman of the National Executive Board (1925–32). In 1932 and 1935 he was elected provincial of the Immaculate Conception Province. In 1936 he became the 112th successor of St. Francis and the first native-born American general of a religious order. He was confirmed in this position during World War II by papal appointment, and reelected in 1948, thus functioning as general longer than anyone except St. BONAVENTURE. Under his direction the order expanded its activities, particularly in mission fields. He prevented the destruction of Franciscan provinces behind the Iron Curtain, and by liaison with the Nazi authorities, of Assisi, the birthplace of St. Francis. His writings on the constitutions of his order effected reform in administration and observance; there was a general reorganization of studies, liturgy, and mission norms. Besides numerous articles and a definitive encyclical on the Third Order, his writings include: The Tertiary Director's Guide (1926); De Tertio Ordine Saeculari SPN Francisci (1938); De Militia Mariae Immaculatae (1942); and Manuale de Regula et Constitutionibus O.F.M.Conv. (1943).

[A. CLARK]

HESELBLAD, ELISABETH, BL.

Also known as Maria Hesselblad, apostle of ecumenism, nurse, founder of the Order of the Most Holy Savior of Saint Brigid; b. June 4, 1870, Fåglavik (near Hundene), Alvsborg, Sweden; d. April 24, 1957, Rome, Italy.

Elisabeth was the fifth of the 13 children born to Swedish Lutherans, Augusto Roberto Hesselblad and Cajsa Pettesdotter Dag. She immigrated to the U.S. (1888) to help support her family. She earned a nursing diploma at Roosevelt Hospital, N.Y., where she tended the sick, caring not only for their physical needs but their spiritual needs as well. Here she came in contact with Catholics for the first time. After experiencing a call during a Eucharistic procession in Brussels, she was later received into the Catholic Church in Washington, D.C., in 1902. She noted in her memoirs how significant her devotion to the Eucharist was. Two days later she left for Rome, where she discerned a vocation to promote Christian unity, but then returned to the U.S., where her health deteriorated. Now gravely ill, she went to Rome to the Casa di S. Brigida to die. However, her health improved, and she joined the CARMELITES (March 25, 1904), who were established in that very house of St. BRIDGET, whose writings Maria Elisabeth long admired.

In 1906, Pope PIUS X gave Hesselblad special permission to take the habit of the BRIGITTINE SISTERS. She was unsuccessful in reestablishing a Bridgettine community in Rome with members of existing communities in Europe. On Sept. 9, 1911, she began a new branch of the Bridgettines with three English postulants, using the original order's Augustinian Rule. The order received canonical approval in 1920. She exhorted her sisters to work tirelessly for Christian unity throughout the world.

Elisabeth Hesselblad. (AP/Wide World Photos)

During World War I and especially World War II, Mother Elisabeth worked tirelessly to aid those who needed assistance. She cared for the poor and offered hospitality and a hiding place to Jews and others persecuted by racist laws. In 1947 Mother Elisabeth's longing to build bridges to those of other faiths became reality when she became an enthusiastic collaborator with Fr. Boyer, a worker in the ecumenical field.

At a Vatican ceremony (Nov. 13, 1999) shortly after the signing of a joint Catholic–Lutheran declaration (Augsburg, Oct. 31, 1999), the pope dedicated a statue of St. Bridget, Europe's co–patron, in the presence of the highest Lutheran representatives of Sweden and Finland, as well as the Swedish king and queen. John Paul II recalled that Bridget's "passion for Christian unity sustained her entire life. And, thanks to her witness and the witness of Mother Elisabeth Hesselblad, this commitment has come down to us through the mysterious stream of grace which overflows the bounds of time and space." At Hesselblad's beatification (April 9, 2000) he reiterated: "By constantly meditating on God's word, Sister Elisabeth was confirmed in her resolve to work and pray that all Christians would be one."

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 15 (2000); 2. J. HOGG, The Carthusian General Chapter and the Spanish Charterhouses, Analecta Cartusians, v. 164, which includes U. S. OLSEN, "The Revival of the Birgittine Monks in the Twentieth Century," (Salzburg, Austria 2000). M. TJADER, Mother Elisabeth: The Resurgence of the Order of Saint Birgitta (New York 1972).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HESYCHASM

A method of prayer in the Oriental Church that depended on the control of physical faculties and concentration on the JESUS PRAYER to achieve peace of soul and union with God. Originally a contemplative, monastic practice, it was popularized in the 13th and 14th centuries and became identified with Palamism.

The earliest descriptions of the hesychastic method of contemplation go back at least to the fifth century: it is mentioned in the vita of the Jerusalem monk, St. John the Hesychast, of the laura of St. Sabas (Acta Sanctorum May 3:232–238); Basil of Caesarea (d. 379) seems to have had an equivalent practice in mind in his Rules (Reg. fus. tract. 6–8; Patrologia Graeca 31:925–941). JOHN CLIMACUS (d. 649) in his Ladder of Paradise (ch. 27) described the method as characteristic of the monastery on Mt. SINAI. In this instance only certain monks, after observing the common life for several years, were permitted to retire to a private cell (celliotēs) under the spiritual guidance of the monastic superior. There they were encouraged to achieve complete control of their bodily movements while seeking an interior peacefulness by banishing thought and concentrating on a short prayer formula involving the name of Jesus. The practitioners were warned frequently against ACEDIA or spiritual listlessness, and they sought the gift of tears.

The Justinian Code (Novel. 5.3; 123.36) and the council in Trullo (c.41) warned against false and extravagant versions of this type of ascetical practice; and St. Anastasius, the founder of the laura on Mt. Athos, would allow only five of the more perfect monks in each community of 120 to attempt it. With SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN (949–1022) the mystical element in the theological foundation of the hesychastic practice became an issue. The goal of this contemplative procedure was set by Nicephorus (fl. c. 1260) as an experience of the photophaneia or light of glory that surrounded the risen Christ (PG 147:945), whereas GREGORY SINAITES (d. 1346) warned continually that visions were the work of the devil (PG 150:1924), although his ascetical system was based upon the hesychastic method.

Gregory PALAMAS (d. 1359) gave hesychasm its full theological foundation by distinguishing between two concepts of God: the transcendent, indescribable, and uncreated Being, and the experience of God's goodness that He shared with man in creation and in the divinizing process of grace. Palamas made a real distinction between the Being and the energy or outward activity of God that was experienced in the mystical realization of the presence of grace in the form of the light that surrounded Christ in His transfiguration on Mt. Tabor. This theological position was challenged by BARLAAM OF CALABRIA and became the source of a great theological controversy during the 14th century.

In 1342 Palamas's writings were condemned in two Constantinopolitan synods, but under Emperor John VI Cantacuzenus, a synod in 1347 certified the orthodoxy of the Palamite explanation of hesychasm. In 1351 the various opponents of Palamas were excommunicated in the so-called Blachernae Synod, and hesychasm was recognized as an official doctrine of the Orthodox Church with its center on Mt. Athos.

The practice of hesychastic contemplation began with a system of breath control, with the chin resting on the breast and the eyes concentrating on the navel (omphalopsychia), while the practitioner ceaselessly repeated the Jesus Prayer. This exercise prepared one for the achievement of absolute quietude of soul and for an experience of divine light; hence its practitioners were referred to also as Taborites.

See Also: TABOR, MOUNT.

Bibliography: I. HAUSHERR, La Méthode d'oraison hésychaste, Orientalia Christiania Analecta 9 (1927) 97–209. M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 11.2:1777–1818. G. WUNDERLE, Zur Psychologie des hesychastischen Gebets (Würzburg 1949). A. M. AMMANN, Die Gottesschau im palamit. Hesychasmus (Würzburg 1948). J. MEYENDORFF, Nouvelle revue théologique 79 (1957) 905–914; A Study of Gregory Palamas, tr. G. LAWRENCE (London 1964). H. C. GRAEF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, eds. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:307–308.

[F. X. MURPHY]

HESYCHIUS OF JERUSALEM

Known to Theophanes Confessor [Chronographia, ed. C. de Boor, 1 (1883) 83] as a priest of Jerusalem (c. 412) who achieved fame as a theologian and preacher; d. probably after 450. CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS records his presence with Bp. Juvenal of Jerusalem at the consecration of the church at the monastery of Euthymius (Vita S. Euthymii: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 114:629) in 428 or 429. The Greek Menology (Patrologia Graeca 117:373) credited him with having commented on the whole of Sacred Scripture, and modern research is gradually showing the justice of that claim.

Hesychius wrote a Commentary on Leviticus preserved in the Latin translation of a certain 6th-century Jerome. His Commentary on Job (ch. 1–20) has come down in an Armenian version; Hesychius regarded Job as a historical person but explained the book as an allegorical foreshadowing of Christ and the Church. He wrote some 2,680 short glosses on Isaiah in imitation of ORIGEN and scholia on the minor prophets, as well as several works on the Psalms. However, the problem of authorship for both the citations in the catenae and the commentaries on the Psalms has not been resolved. The great glosses published among the works of Athanasius (Patrologia Graeca 27:649–1344) were actually written by Hesychius, as was a long commentary (Patrologia Graeca 93:1179–1340; 55: 711–784). Despite its use of Antiochene theological expressions, a second commentary on the Psalms is also probably of his authorship; so are 147 scholia on 13 Canticles of the Old and New Testament.

Of his sermons only a few have been definitively identified and published. These include a sermon for the Purification, representing the oldest mention of that feast, and discourses on the Annunciation and the Mother of God (Deipara). Extant in manuscript are sermons on fasting, a second discourse on the Purification that is interesting for its exegesis of Lk 2.35, two homilies on the resurrection of Lazarus, and encomia of SS. Andrew, Luke, Peter and Paul, Stephen, Anthony the Hermit, and John the Baptist. Sermons on Christmas and the cross and encomia on St. Thomas and St. James have been lost.

After 428 Hesychius wrote a Church history in which he proved himself a strong opponent of NESTORIANISM. The chapter dealing with THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA was read at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II in 553 (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 9:248–249). His collection of Objections and Solutions deals with apparent discrepancies in the Gospels. It seems to be part of his lost Evangelica Symphonia (Patrologia Graeca 93:1391–1448).

Hesychius was greatly influenced by the exegetical methods of Origen and went so far as to deny that a literal meaning could be found for every sentence in Scripture (Patrologia Graeca 93:791, 1030). He opposed the use of philosophy for solving theological problems, particularly in Christology. He followed Alexandrian thought but preferred scriptural expressions reducing the Christological formula to Logos sarkotheis or Verbum incarnatum, the Word became flesh. He admitted no possibility of sin, ignorance, or moral progress in Christ and opposed Arian, Apollinarian, and Antiochene doctrine as subordinationist in tendency. He was considered a Monophysite by both Bishop John of Maïuma and the deacon, later pope, PELAGIUS I.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950) 3:488–496. G. LOESCHKE, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 8.2 (1913) 1328–30. K. JÜSSEN, Die dogmatischen Anschauungen des Hesychius von Jerusalem, 2 v. (Münster 1931–34); “Die Mariologie des Hesychius von Jerusalem,” Theologie in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Festschrift M. Schmaus, ed. J. AUER and H. VOLK (Munich 1957) 651–670. Bessarione 22 (1918) 8–46. A. WENGER, Revue des études augustiniennes 2 (1956) 457–470. L. SANTIFALLER, Zentralblatt für Bibliothekswesen 60 (1943) 241–266. A. SIEGMUND, Die Übertieferung der griechischen christlichen Literatur (Munich 1949) 87–88. C. NAHAPETIAN, Bessarione 17 (1913) 452–465. M. VON FAULHABER, Theologische Quartalschrift 83 (1901) 218–232; ed., Hesychii Hierosolymitani interpretatio Isaiae prophetae (Freiburg 1900). G. MERCATI, in Miscellanea Pio Paschini, 2 v. (Rome 1948–49) 2:205–211. V. JAGIĆ, Ein unedierter griechischer Psalmkommentar (Vienna 1906). R. DEVRESSE, Revue biblique 33 (1924) 498–521. G. BARDY, ibid. 42 (1933) 226–229.

[F. X. MURPHY]

HETTINGER, FRANZ

Theologian; b. Aschaffenburg, Jan. 13, 1819; d. Würzburg, Jan. 26, 1890. He was ordained in 1843 and took his doctorate in theology at the German college in Rome in 1845. He taught at the Würzburg seminary until 1856, when he was appointed professor of patrology at the university. His entire life centered around the University of Würzburg to which he and his colleagues J. HERGENRÖTHER and H. J. DENZINGER brought a notable reputation for theological studies. He held the chairs of apologetics and homiletics, filled two terms as rector, and succeeded his friend Denzinger as professor of dogma.

His reputation for learning spread throughout Europe. In 1859 he was made an honorary doctor of philosophy at Würzburg; in 1866, an honorary member of the college of doctors in theology of the University of Vienna; in 1884, an honorary doctor of theology at Louvain; and in the following year, an honorary member of the Accademia religionis Catholicae of Rome. In 1867 he and Hergenröther were named consultors for the preparation of VATICAN COUNCIL I. Objections were raised, which resulted in the appointment of other German consultors. These objections, however, were not against either man personally but against the exclusive choice of members of the Würzburg faculty. Yet this incident shows the high regard in which the theological faculty at Würzburg was held especially because of its three distinguished professors, who strongly supported Roman ideas particularly against those espoused by J. J. I. von DÖLLINGER and others at Munich. Hettinger accepted a role at the Vatican Council only on condition that it would not interfere with his teaching. He was named to the dogmatic commission. In 1879 Leo XIII, who called upon him to prepare the German translations of his great encyclicals, named Hettinger a domestic prelate.

Both at the beginning and at the end of his professorial career he wrote practical books for priests: Das Priestertum der katholischen Kirche (Regensburg 1851), Die Liturgie der Kirche (Würzburg 1856), Aphorismen für Predigt und Prediger (Freiburg 1888), Timotheus, Brief an einen jungen Theologen (Freiburg 1891). One of his most popular publications was a collection of essays occasioned by his travels and called Aus Kirche und Welt (Freiburg 1885). Throughout his life he was enamored of the works of Dante, concerning which he published numerous articles and important books: Grundidee und Charakter der Göttlichen Komödie des Dante Alighieri (Bonn 1876), Die Theologie der Göttlichen Komödie (Cologne 1879), Die Göttliche Komödie des Dante Alighieri nach ihrem wesentlicher Inhalt und Charakter dargestellt (Freiburg 1880), Dante und Beatrice (Frankfurt 1883), and Dantes Geistengang (Cologne 1888).

Hettinger's great contribution to apologetics, Apologie des Christenthums (Freiburg), was first published between 1863 and 1867. There were six editions during his lifetime; three more editions after his death, edited by his pupil E. Müller, the latest from 1914 to 1918; and translations into French, English, Spanish, and Portuguese. This is certainly one of the great works of 19th-century apologetics.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 5.2:1433–35. J. HASENFUSS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:314. E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.2:2324–25.

[A. ROCK]

HEUSER, HERMAN JOSEPH

Author, editor; b. Potsdam, Germany, Oct. 28, 1852; d. Overbrook, Pa., Aug. 22, 1933. Having been educated in Berlin and in Breslau, Germany, he went in 1870 to Philadelphia, Pa., where he continued his theology at St. Charles Seminary, Overbrook. He was a student teacher in the preparatory department of the seminary from 1870 to 1876. Ordained in Philadelphia on Feb. 2, 1876, he became a professor at Overbrook, teaching languages at first, and then, for most of his years, Sacred Scripture. After serving as assistant editor to Msgr. James Corcoran for the American Catholic Quarterly Review, he founded the American Ecclesiastical Review in 1899. As its editor (1899–1914, 1919–27), he influenced scholarly circles throughout the world and clerical life in the U.S. In 1897 he began to publicize the novels of Canon Patrick A. Sheehan of Doneraile, Ireland, whose My New Curate was written specifically for and appeared serially in Heuser's magazine. Heuser also organized and directed the Dolphin Press of Philadelphia, which printed many ecclesiastical books. From 1900 to 1908 he published the Dolphin, a general Catholic literary magazine that had begun as a book supplement to the American Ecclesiastical Review.

Heuser's activities were varied. In addition to clerical subjects, he was interested in art, architecture, and music. He was frequently consulted by religious orders, and helped to write the constitutions of the Sisters of Mercy of Merion, Pa., where his sister was for a time superior general, and of Mother M. Katherine Drexel's Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament. He was an adviser to the Pontifical Commission on Anglican Orders in 1896, and received an honorary degree of doctor of sacred theology from (St.) Pius X. In 1907, during the controversy over Modernism, he was appointed by the apostolic delegate as general censor for all Catholic publications in the U.S. He was the author of 15 books, principally on clerical and religious subjects. In 1927 he retired from his editorial and professorial duties, and deeded the American Ecclesiastical Review to The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Bibliography: Historical Collections of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia, St. Charles Seminary, Philadelphia, Pa. E. J. GALBALLY, American Ecclesiastical Review 89 (1933) 337–360. H. T. HENRY, "Some Memories of the Founder of the Review," ibid. 100 (1939) 8–21. J. G. HUBBERT, "For the Upbuilding of the Church": The Reverend Herman Joseph Heuser, D.D., 1851–1933, 3 vols. (Washington, D.C. 1992).

[B. F. FAIR]

HEWETT, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; sometimes spelled, Hewitt; alias Welton and Sayell; b. York, England; d. hanged at Mile End Green, London, Oct. 5, 1588. From Caius College, Cambridge, Hewett passed to the English College, Rheims. During the course of his seminary studies, he returned to England, where he was captured and banished in 1585. After his ordination the following year, he returned to England and again was captured and exiled (1587) to the Netherlands. He was unsafe even abroad. In the Netherlands he was arrested by the earl of Leicester on a false accusation and sent back to England for trial. In October 1588, he was formally arraigned on the charge of being illegally ordained abroad and entering England to exercise the ministry. The following day he was taken through the streets of London to Mile End Green, where before his execution he held disputes with two preachers. Hewett was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HEWIT, AUGUSTINE FRANCIS

Associate founder of the PAULISTS, editor, educator; b. Fairfield, Conn., Nov. 27, 1820; d. New York City, July 3, 1897. He was the son of Nathaniel Hewit, a Congregationalist minister, and Rebecca (Hillhouse) Hewit, daughter of U.S. Senator James Hillhouse. After attending Phillips Academy, Andover, and Amherst College, Massachusetts, he entered the Congregationalist seminary at East Windsor, Conn. In March 1843, influenced greatly by the writings of the Oxford theologians, he joined the Episcopal Church and went to study for the ministry under Bp. William Whittingham in Baltimore, Md. He was ordained a deacon in September 1843.

In April 1846, Hewit became a Catholic; he was ordained March 25, 1847, by Bp. Ignatius Reynolds of Charleston, S.C., and taught in the diocesan seminary there. In 1850 Hewit made his profession as a Redemptorist, but he was dispensed from his vows in 1858 in order to found the Paulists, a new society in which he played a part second only to Isaac HECKER. Hewit wrote the first constitutions of the society, trained the candidates, and ruled the society during Hecker's absence for reasons of health. When Hecker founded the Catholic World in 1865, Hewit became its principal staff writer, and in 1866, its managing editor. His contribution to U.S. theology and letters led the Holy See to award him a doctorate about 1875.

Hewit was elected second superior general of the Paulists on Jan. 2, 1889. He supported the American hier-archy's effort to open the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and on its grounds started a Paulist house of studies, later St. Paul's College, the first religious house affiliated with the University. He also directed the establishment of the Paulists at San Francisco, Calif. (1894), the inauguration of missions to non-Catholics under Walter ELLIOTT (1893), the founding of the Catholic Missionary Union (1896), and the creation of the Columbus Press (1891), which later became the Paulist Press.

Bibliography: A. F. HEWIT, Memoir of the Life of the Rev. Francis A. Baker (7th ed. New York 1889). J. P. FLYNN, The Early Years of Augustine F. Hewit, CSP (Washington 1945). J. MCSORLEY, Father Hecker and His Friends (2d ed. St. Louis 1953)

[J. P. FLYNN]

HEXAEMERON

The term hexaemeron is derived from two Greek words: the numeral "six" (ἕξ) and the noun "day" (ἡμέρα). It has been used in both the Jewish and the Christian traditions to refer to the opening of the Book of Genesis, where God's creative work brings forth the world and all its non-living and living creatures in a period of six days, followed by the seventh day of Sabbath rest. The term is also used to refer to commentaries on the six days of creation. Such commentaries became a means for patristic authors to offer a critique of cosmogonies that were widespread in the Greco-Roman culture, offering Christian writers the opportunity to present a Christian understanding of humanity and creation.

The first Jewish author to make use of this sort of terminology in reference to the work of creation was Philo, whose interpretation of the text of Genesis reflects the wider cultural context of Greek philosophy and inclines strongly to an allegorical style of interpretation. Philo wished to find some degree of harmony between the Hebrew Scriptures and the Greek philosophy current at that time. Moving from this base, he develops a theology of creation with numerous themes that will reappear in later Christian authors.

In Christian circles, the usage appears already in the second century in the work of Theophilus of Antioch and then in Origen, Basil of Caesarea, and Basil's brother, Gregory of Nyssa, among others. Following his usual, allegorical method of interpretation, Origen attempted to find the moral and allegorical meanings of the creation account, sometimes going so far as to see no real significance in the historical meaning of the text.

Basil used the Genesis text as the basis for a series of Lenten sermons that aim at laying out a Christian understanding of the created world in contrast with the metaphysical dualism of many pagan theories, which related material reality to a lesser, or even evil, principle. Basil presents a picture of the beauty of creation flowing from the work of the good and benevolent Creator. His descriptions of the world reflect the influence of Aristotle, Plato, and Plotinus, among others. He thus displays a theological style that is aware of the best knowledge of the natural science and philosophy of his time. It is this quality that made this work particularly admired during Basil's own time, but that led later critics to find fault with it precisely because of what they saw as its outdated understanding of nature.

While Basil's homilies did not include the work of the sixth day, on which humanity was created, this theme is taken up by Gregory of Nyssa in his On the Creation of Man, which Gregory himself describes as the completion of Basil's work. In terms of style, this work is somewhat like a homily; in terms of content, it is above all a reflection on the anthropology involved in Genesis 1:26. Gregory also makes it clear that, on a number of important points concerning creation, such as the doctrine of the pre-existence of human souls, he disagrees with Origen. Here and in his later Book on the Hexaemeron Gregory describes the wisdom of God the Creator and defends the writings of the Hebrew Scriptures as well as the work of Basil. Both Basil and Gregory make an explicit point of their intent to explain the biblical text literally and not allegorically.

In Western Christianity, Ambrose of Milan was a significant figure in bringing the influence of Philo and the Greek Christian authors into the Latin tradition. In a series of nine Lenten sermons known as The Hexaemeron in Six Books, Ambrose provides remarkable descriptions of the physical world and discusses a number of philosophical theories common at his time. While at one level Ambrose, like Basil before him, deals with the literal meaning of the text, at another level he moves frequently to a form of symbolism and moral teaching that made his work important for the medieval authors. Without using the term hexaemeron, Augustine treats the account of the six days at two levels (On Genesis against the Manichees, Bk. 1). He acknowledges a literal meaning of the text. But of even greater significance is the spiritual interpretation in which the six days are seen as prophecy showing the six ages of human history, the six stages of human life, and the six stages of growth in the spiritual life. At each level, the seventh day of Sabbath rest symbolizes the reality of heaven.

One of the most complex instances of literature on the six days is found in the Collations on the Six Days by Bonaventure. This is a set of 23 collations given to Franciscan students and faculty at the University of Paris in 1273. The work is structured around an allegorical understanding of the six days of creation, culminating in the seventh day of Sabbath rest and an eighth day (repeating the first) of resurrection. The six days provide the framework for discussing a rich theology of history, describing various stages of history and the various levels of knowledge and contemplation that, in principle, would have culminated in the beatific vision of the seventh day. This provides the context for the development of a profound theology of revelation. Because of Bonaventure's appointment to the episcopacy and his work in preparation for the Council of Lyons, the collations were left incomplete, bringing his listeners and later readers to the fourth day and leaving only hints as to what the final two days might represent as stages of history and as levels of contemplative experience.

More recent biblical studies have frequently compared the biblical account of the six days of creation with the Babylonian epic Enuma Elish. A critical reading of both leads many to the conclusion that there is no extensive relation between them. The biblical text, with its description of eight acts of creation spread over six days of divine creativity followed by the seventh day of Sabbath rest, reflects a distinctly biblical theology that has virtually no parallel in the Babylonian text.

In nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the six-day account of creation has been the object of much controversy concerning the relation between science and the Bible. Originally much of this was triggered by the theory of Charles Darwin concerning the evolution of species and particularly concerning the origin of the human race. More recently the conflict relates to the wider sense of the nature and development of the cosmos as a whole and not simply to theories of biological evolution. When the biblical text is taken to be a realistic description of the initial phase of cosmic history, it is seen by some to stand in radical contradiction to the contemporary scientific views on cosmic and human origins. But when the same text is read in the light of historical criticism, it is possible to distinguish between the religious message of the Bible and the physical cosmology assumed by the redactor of the present text. From this perspective, there seems to be no necessary conflict between the message of the Bible and the views of the contemporary sciences.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology, v. 3 (Westminster, Md. 1986). J. RATZINGER, The Theology of History in St. Bonaventure, tr. Z. HAYES (Chicago 1971). R. L. NUMBERS, The Creationists: The Evolution of Scientific Creationism (Berkeley 1992).

[Z. HAYES]

HEXAPLA

The body of manuscript evidence compiled by ORIGEN at CAESAREA IN PALESTINE before A.D. 245 for comparison of the existing Greek versions of the OT with the Hebrew text current in his day. The name (τὰ ἑξαπλά, i.e., βιβλία, the sixfold books) derives from the arrangement given to the pages of this work by Origen. For most of the OT books, he presented in six parallel vertical columns (1) the Hebrew consonantal text in Hebrew letters; (2) a spelling out of the Hebrew as actually pronounced, insofar as that could be represented with the Greek alphabet; (3) the rendering of Aquila; (4) the rendering of Symmachus; (5) the ancient Septuagint (LXX) rendering, modified in the light of the Hebrew and the Greek of the other columns, with critical symbols (see below) to call attention to ways in which the older Greek form and the Hebrew failed to agree; and (6) the early revision of the LXX ascribed to Theodotion. For some books, Origen had available added translations or recensions, so that in the Psalms, for instance, mention is made of a Quinta (fifth), a Sexta (sixth), and even a Septima (seventh) Greek rendering by unknown hands; the number of columns would correspondingly increase from six to at least eight. (The Septima, however, may never have been more than marginal notes.) The Hexapla was thus a complex and bulky work; it remained available for consultation at Caesarea until about A.D. 600 and was used by St. Jerome among others. Copies of it were mainly by way of extracts. Origen himself is said to have prepared an abridged edition (Tetrapla, fourfold) omitting the two Hebrew columns. The final fate of the complete work is unknown; today it survives only in fragments from the Books of Kingdoms (Samuel and Kings) and the Psalms, along with excerpts in the margins of Greek LXX MSS, citations in the patristic literature in several languages, and extensive portions of the fifth column, especially in Syriac and Arabic translations. The recompiling and critical evaluation of these materials is one of the continuing tasks of students of the LXX; attribution of a particular reading to one or another of the original columns is often either lacking or given incorrectly in the sources.

The Hebrew in Origen's first column was, like all other Hebrew OT texts from the early second Christian century onward, extremely close to the consonantal text as printed in the Hebrew Bibles of today. The second column transliteration is sufficiently consistent in its orthography (see G. Mercati, "Il problema . . .") so that one must suppose that in this form it was contemporary with Origen. It has been shrewdly conjectured, however, (T. W. Manson, cited by Kahle), that this kind of transcription is at least the heir to a Jewish practice of providing a reader's guide in Greek letters to the liturgical sections to be proclaimed from Hebrew scrolls in the synagogues of the DIASPORA. That the LXX translation was originally made from transliterations of this sort rather than from a Hebrew consonantal text is a quite fanciful theory; the true interest of the second column for modern scholars is its pre-Masoretic evidence for the historical pronunciation of biblical Hebrew. In editing the fifth or LXX column, Origen inserted, marked with an asterisk, usually from "Theodotion," the Greek equivalent of those passages in the Hebrew text not to be found in the older translation. Passages in the LXX for which the Hebrew showed no equivalent were retained, but signaled at the beginning with an obelus. The limits of either type of variant text were marked at the end by a metobelus. There is some question whether this apparatus was employed in the Hexapla itself (the Mercati Psalm fragments do not show it), or whether it was used in a resultant text drawn from the fifth column for separate circulation.

That the Hebrew text of his own day should have served as Origen's exclusive norm leaves something to be desired from the point of view of modern textual criticism; but the invaluable collection of materials is none the less precious on that account. It is simply not true, however, that this was the first critical work done on the OT in Greek; Origen was heir to a continuing process of revision carried on in Jewish circles in Palestine, both in Hebrew and in Greek, during the first century B.C. and the first and early second Christian centuries. Sometimes the basis for the fifth column was not an unrevised LXX, but the product of "Theodotion," or even, for Ecclesiastes, of Aquila. Nor was the arrangement of the columns invariable throughout the OT; in the case of Ecclesiastes, when the "LXX" column was occupied by Aquila's work, the third column apparently contained Symmachus, and this has led to faulty attributions by later writers. In the Psalms, the Quinta seems to have occupied the customary place of "Theodotion." From 2 Sm 11.2 to 1 Kgs 2.11, "Theodotion" stands in the fifth column and a "Lucianic" text in the sixth. Abridged transcriptions of the Hexapla after the time of Origen have led to further inconsistencies in the evidence for the content of the various columns.

Bibliography: F. FIELD, Origenis Hexaplorum quae supersunt, 2 v. (Oxford 1875). G. MERCATI, Psalterii hexapli reliquiae (Vatican City 1958-) v. 1; "Il problema della seconda colonna dell' Esaplo," Biblica 28 (1947) 1-30, 173-215. D. BARTHÉLEMY, Les Devanciers d'Aquila (Vetus Testamentum Suppl. 10; 1963). P. KAHLE, "Die von Origenes verwendeten griechischen Bibelhandschriften," Studia patristica 4 (Texte und Untersuchungen Zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 79; 1961) 107-117. H. B. SWETE, An Introduction to the O.T. in Greek (rev. ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1914) 59-86.

[P. W. SKEHAN]

HEXATEUCH

A term derived from the Greek, meaning six-roll, and applied to the first six books of the Old Testament. Literary analysis suggested the continuation of the four sources of the PENTATEUCH into the book of JOSHUA. Also, since the theme of the promise of the land is predominant throughout the Pentateuch, a theological truncation would result if those books were isolated from Joshua, where the theme of promise finds its fulfillment in the conquest. More recent studies have cast serious doubts on the theory of a Hexateuch.

Bibliography: D. N. FREEDMAN, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK (Nashville 1962) 2:597–598. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 996.

[E. H. MALY]

HEXHAM, MONASTERY OF

Former monastery of BENEDICTINES, then Austin canons, at Hexham, in Northumbria, England. The Benedictine abbey there was founded c. 673 by WILFRID, Archbishop of York, and grew rapidly in importance. Five years after the foundation of the abbey, the church of Hexham became the cathedral of the new Diocese of Bernicia, but c. 821 this bishopric was united to that of LINDISFARNE. Hexham was destroyed in the course of the Danish invasions in the following century, but was rebuilt, probably in 1113, as a priory of CANONS REGULAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE. The priory was dissolved in 1536 under King HENRY VIII, when the last prior was hanged for his involvement in the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE. Today the town of Hexham is famous for the priory church, now the parish church of St. Andrew, which is all that remains of the monastery.

Bibliography: W. DUGDALE, Monasticon Anglicanum (London 1655–73); best ed. by J. CALEY et al., 6 v. (1817–30) 6.1:179–185. J. RAINE, ed., The Priory of Hexham, Its Chroniclers, Endowments, and Annals, 2 v. (Surtees Society 44 and 46; Durham 1864–65). C. C. HODGES, Ecclesia Hagustaldensis. The Abbey of St. Andrew, Hexham (privately printed; London 1888). D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 140. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943–1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962), passim. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1948–60).

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

HEYTHROP COLLEGE

Heythrop College originated in the Jesuit scholasticates in penal times at Louvain (1614–24) and Liège

Hexham Abbey, Northumbria, England. (©Ric Ergenbright/CORBIS)

(1624–1794). In the wake of the French Revolution, the faculties moved to England; eventually the philosophy faculty (St. Mary's Hall, Stonyhurst) and the theology faculty (St. Beuno's, North Wales) were united in 1926 at Heythrop, Oxfordshire, eventually becoming a Pontifical Atheneum (1965–69). This status changed when, by Royal Charter, it became a college of the University of London in 1970, with F. C. Copleston, SJ, as its first principal. It has retained its Jesuit and Catholic identity, with strong ecumenical and interfaith dimensions, within the federal University of London, awarding degrees of the university. Its library, one of the finest in Britain and the property of the British Jesuit province, contains 300,000 volumes; professors number about 35 and students 530. Publications include the Heythrop Journal, Heythrop Studies in Contemporary Philosophy, Religion and Theology, Bellarmino Series and Commentary, and Heythrop Monographs.

Bibliography: F. COURTNEY, "English Jesuit Colleges in the Low Countries 1593–1794," Heythrop Journal 4 (1963) 254–263.

[J. MCDADE]

HEYWOOD

An English family distinguished for its fidelity to the Catholic Church and for its literary activity, especially during the reigns of the Henrys and Elizabeth I.

John, poet and playwright; b. Coventry, c. 1497; d. 1579?. He is the most famous member of this family, and is said to have attended Oxford University, but there are no records. For some years after 1519 he was a singer and musician at court. By 1523 he had married Joan Rastell, the only daughter of John Rastell and niece of Thomas More. They had six children: two sons, Ellis and Jasper, and four daughters, one of whom, Elizabeth, was the mother of John DONNE.

North facade of the Heythrop Pontifical Athenaeum.

In 1533–34 four of Heywood's plays were printed by William Rastell: A Play of Love, The Pardoner and the Frere, The Play of the Wether, and Johan the husbunde, Johan Tyb the wife and Syr Johan the preeste—these are indisputably Heywood's. Two other plays are attributed to him: The Foure PP and Wytyty and Wyttyles.

During the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII and the brief reigns of Edward VI and Mary, Heywood was prominent in dramatic and entertainment activities. At least five interludes, plays, and masques were written by him during this time, but nothing is known of them save the title of one (King Arthur's Knights). A certain amount of Heywood's writing was addressed to Queen Mary, whose favorite he was; his graceful "Description of a Most Noble Lady" ("Geve place, ye Ladyes") was written for her in 1534, when she was 18 and under a political cloud. His long poem, The Spider and the Flie (an allegory of some 7,600 lines, published in 1556), seems to celebrate Mary's liberation of Catholicism (the entrapped "flie") in England; the crushing of the spider perhaps represents Thomas CRANMER, who was burned at the stake in 1556. The allegory is obscure and the work is now little read.

As a result of the Elizabethan Settlement in 1564, Heywood and many other English Catholics went into exile in the Low Countries. In 1576 his son Ellis obtained special permission for him to lodge at the Jesuit college at Antwerp. He lived there through many disturbances in 1578, and seems to have died about 1579 or 1580.

As the author of widely quoted collections of proverbs and epigrams, and a famous wit, John Heywood was well known during the Elizabethan period. His interludes have been produced with success in the 20th century (especially at Birmingham-Malvern, England), and their historical importance in the history of the Tudor interlude, though generally recognized, has only in recent times been adequately understood.

Ellis, son of John; b. London c. 1530; d. Louvain, the Low Countries, Oct. 2, 1578. He studied civil law at Oxford, and received the degree of B.C.L. in 1552, having become a fellow of All Souls College (then a center for legal studies) in 1548. Leaving England (c. 1554–55) for travel in France and Italy, he served for some time as a secretary to Cardinal Reginald POLE, to whom he dedicated his Il Moro in 1556. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1566, and later became spiritual father and preacher in the Jesuit college at Antwerp. As chief executor and beneficiary of William Rastell (d. 1565), Ellis deeded his inheritance to Jesuit educational work at Louvain, Cologne, and Munich.

Jasper, son of John; b. London, 1535; d. Naples, Jan. 9, 1598. He was sent to Oxford in 1547 at the youthful age of 12, and took his B.A. in 1553 and his M.A. in 1558. In 1554 he was made a fellow of Merton College (also, the last Lord of Misrule) and served with distinction there until he was elected a fellow of All Souls in 1558. He resigned from All Souls in 1558 or 1559 because of his recusancy, and in 1561 entered Gray's Inn, but he left within the year to go abroad. Jasper is known for his translations of three Senecan tragedies (published 1559, 1560, 1561); T. S. Eliot has called him "the first and best of the translators" of Seneca. This work reveals Jasper as the associate of Thomas Sackville, Thomas North, and William Baldwin, all men of the Inns who were making distinguished contributions to Tudor literature.

After leaving England Jasper was admitted into the Society of Jesus at Rome in 1562. At Dillingen, in Bavaria, he took the degree of doctor of divinity. He was sent into England for missionary work, and arrived in the summer of 1581; he was imprisoned in 1583 and then exiled (1584–85). In 1589 he was sent to Rome, then to Naples, where he died.

See Also: RECUSANTS.

Bibliography: E. HEYWOOD, Il moro d'Heivodo (Florence 1556). W. BANG, "Acta Anglo-Lovaniensia: John Heywood und sein Kreis," Englische Studien 38 (1907) 234–249. H. DE VOCHT, ed., Jasper Heywood and His Translation of Seneca's Troas, Thyestes, and Hercules (Materialen zur Kunde des älteren englischen Dramas 41; Louvain 1913). H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–1882) 1:388. R. J. SCHOECK, "Anthony Bonvisi, the Heywoods and the Ropers," Notes and Queries 197 (April 26, 1952) 178–179; "Satire of Wolsey in Heywood's 'Play of Love,'" ibid., 196 (March 17, 1951) 112–114. T. S. GRAVES, "The Heywood Circle and the Reformation," Modern Philology 10 (1912–13) 553–572; "On the Reputation of John Heywood," ibid. 21 (1923–24) 209–213. R. G. W. BOLWELL, The Life and Works of John Heywood (New York 1921). I. C. MAXWELL, French Farce and John Heywood (Melbourne 1946). A. W. REED, Early Tudor Drama (London 1926).

[R. J. SCHOECK]

HIBERNENSIS COLLECTIO

The conventional name of the comprehensive canonical collection of the Irish Church. It is approximately dated 700 by reason of the latest authors it refers to (Theodore of Canterbury, Adamnan of Iona); the absence of references to the Venerable Bede; and the deaths of its (probable) compilers, Rubin of Dair-Inis (d. 725) and Cú-Chuime of Iona (d. 747).

It draws largely on the Bible, especially the Old Testament; on the Fathers of the Church, probably via a collection of sententiae [see S. Hellmann, Sedulius Scottus (Munich 1906) 136–144], including some Greeks (Origen, Gregory of Nazianzus, Basil, the Vitae Patrum); on the STATUTA ECCLESIAE ANTIQUA and other conciliar and synodal decrees, but rarely on papal decretals. Native sources include the acts (otherwise unknown) of Irish synods and Irish ecclesiastical writers beginning with St. Patrick. The synods referred to as Synodus Romana, or by some other similar term, are probably synods of the Roman faction of the Irish Church in the 7th century as opposed to the Celtic faction [J. B. Bury, Life of St. Patrick (London 1905) 235–239].

Contrary to the predominantly chronological arrangement of earlier collections, the 65 chapters of the Hibernensis are arranged according to subject matter, but not in a systematic order. The collection treats of the duties and privileges of the ecclesiastical grades; the relations of monks, secular clergy, and laity; liturgy and devotion; morals; ecclesiastical and, to some extent, secular law. The treatment breathes the spirit of reform of morals and discipline that was then strong in Ireland. The compilers attempted also to adjust their authorities to the peculiar pattern of Irish ecclesiastical, political, and social life. There are, e.g., no decrees concerning diocesan episcopal jurisdiction, for this had no place in the predominantly monastic Church of the 7th- and 8th-century Ireland; the Jewish jubilee year is considered as a limit for the validity of uncertain titles, and the parties to a contract are advised to have it made out in writing; the term "cities of refuge" refers to monasteries (called civitates in Ireland, then a country without towns), and the prerogatives of the monasteries are stated in patristic and canonical terms.

John Heywood, woodcut in "The Spider and the Flie," 1556.

Because of its reformatory spirit, its comprehensiveness, and its practical arrangement, the Hibernensis had considerable influence on the Continent of Europe after the 8th century. It was frequently used by the compilers of canonical collections down to the 12th century.

See Also: CANONICAL COLLECTIONS BEFORE GRATIAN.

Bibliography: F. W. H. WASSERSCHLEBEN, Die irische Kanonensammlung (2d ed. Leipzig 1885). J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland (New York 1929) 247–250, with bibliog. Fourmier-LeBras 1:62–64.

[L. BIELER]

HICKEY, ANTONY

Irish Franciscan theologian and historian; b. County Clare, 1586; d. St. Isidore's College, Rome, June 26, 1641. Hickey received his early education in his native place. On Nov. 1, 1607, he entered the Franciscans at St. Anthony's College, Louvain, and studied there under Hugh WARD and Hugh MacCaghwell. After ordination he was a professor of theology at Louvain and at St. Francis, Cologne. In 1619 he was called to Rome to collaborate with the historian Luke WADDING. He resided at the Spanish friary of S. Pietro in Montorio on the Janiculum, but on the founding of St. Isidore's College he moved there on June 22, 1625, and became the college's first lector of theology. He was active on many Roman Congregations and on commissions set up for the revision of the Roman Breviary and of the Greek and Armenian liturgies. A staunch Scotist, he defended the Immaculate Conception with ardor. Wadding's edition of the works of Scotus includes three volumes of commentaries by Hickey on bk. 4 of the Sentences. In 1639 he was chosen definitor general of the Franciscan Order, and for a time he was titular provincial of Scotland. His Nitela Franciscanae Religionis (Lyons 1627) deals with aspects of the early history of the order.

Bibliography: G. CLEARY, Father Luke Wadding and St. Isidore's College, Rome (Rome 1925) 73–78. B. JENNINGS, ed., Wadding Papers, 1614–1638 (Dublin 1953) 168, 219, 240–241, 269, 557, 558, 573, 606, 610, 614, 622. É. D'ALENÇON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 6.2: 2358–59.

[C. GIBLIN]

HICKEY, JOSEPH ALOYSIUS

Prior general of the Order of St. Augustine; b. Chicago, Ill., May 30, 1883; d. Villanova, Pa., July 9, 1955. His parents, James and Margaret (Dawson) Hickey, died while Joseph was a child, and he was raised by Maurice J. Dorney, pastor of St. Gabriel's Church in Chicago. For his secondary and college education Hickey went to Villanova College (now University), where he joined the Augustinians. He made his profession on March 18, 1903, and the following year he was sent to the Augustinian International College of St. Monica in Rome, where he was ordained on Dec. 22, 1906. Two years later he earned the degree of doctor of Canon Law at the Apollinaris. On his return to the U.S., he was assigned briefly to Chicago. Following a provincial chapter in 1910, he went to the principal Augustinian community at Villanova, where between 1910 and 1925, he became rector of postulants, provincial representative at the general chapter in Rome (1913), regent of studies, provincial definitor (counselor), provincial secretary, prior of the seminary Corr Hall, and president of Villanova College. At a general chapter in 1925 in Rome, Hickey was elected fourth assistant general. He held this office for more than 20 years, during which time he also held posts as rector of the International College and professor of Canon Law at The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. On April 26, 1947, he was elected prior general, becoming the first U.S. Augustinian to hold that office. As prior general (1947–53) he was responsible for reorganizing the Augustinian Order during the aftermath of World War II, especially in Italy. He performed also numerous services in Rome for both the Holy See and the Augustinian Order, acting as consultant, later as commissary, of the Congregation of the Sacraments, and as apostolic visitor to several religious communities. Upon completion of his term of office he returned to the U.S.

[A. J. ENNIS]

HIDALGO Y COSTILLA, MIGUEL

The father of Mexican Independence; b. at the Hacienda of Corralejo, Guanajuato, May 8, 1753; d. Chihuahua, July 30, 1811. He was educated in Valladolid (now Morelia, Michoacán) in the Colegio de San Francisco Javier. When the Jesuits were expelled in 1767, he went to the Colegio do San Nicolás. He graduated with a bachelor's degree from the University of Mexico in 1773 and, although he had no vocation for the priesthood, was ordained in 1778. Between 1779 and 1782 he taught philosophy and theology at San Nicolás. In 1784 he presented the "Disertación sobre el verdadero método de estudiar teología," in which his revolutionary spirit was already apparent. In 1791 he was rector at San Nicolás. In 1792 he was banished from Valladolid to the distant parish of Colima because of numerous accusations of heretical opinions and scandal. In 1793 he was transferred to the parish of San Felipe, Guanajuato, where he translated and produced the works of Molière and Racine. As a reader of the Encyclopedists and an admirer of the ideas of the Enlightenment, he was tried by the Inquisition in July 1800 but was not sentenced at that time. In October 1808 he received the parish of Dolores, where he devoted his efforts to the economic and intellectual improvement of the people of his parish on the principles of the Enlightenment. He gave parties, organized an orchestra, and established in his house, in the guise of a school of arts and crafts, several small industries. He cultivated silkworms, raised bees, and planted vineyards. He won the affection of his parishioners, and in his constant travels to nearby places he made friends with the most important persons. In July 1807, because of new accusations, the inquisitorial trial was resumed.

In 1810 Hidalgo was the principal figure on the Junta of Querétaro and, early Sunday morning, Sept. 16, 1810, he raised the famous "Cry of Dolores," which marked the beginning of the struggle for independence. That same day, on the way to San Miguel el Grande, in Atonilco, he gave his troops as standard the image of Our Lady of GUADALUPE. At nightfall he entered San Miguel, where the undisciplined horde accompanying him looted the city, as they later did Celaya, Guanajuato, and Valladolid. On September 21 he arrived in Celaya and was named a general there. September 24 an edict of excommunication was published against Hidalgo and his companions. Yet on they went. Guanajuato was taken on September 28, Valladolid on October 17, and two days later Hidalgo and his forces set out for Mexico City. On October 30 he defeated the royalist forces at Monte de las Cruces, but instead of attacking the capital then, he retreated toward Querétaro. On November 7 he was defeated in Aculco by Gen. Félix María Calleja del Rey. Hidalgo withdrew to Valladolid and then to Guadalajara late in November. There he put on the uniform of a generalissimo and assumed the title of Excellency or Most Serene Highness. He conferred titles and decorations and decreed the abolition of slavery. He started the publication of the periodical El Despertador Americano and ordered the secret execution of 400 Spanish prisoners. He appointed Pascasio Ortiz de Letona as ambassador to the U.S. On Jan. 16, 1811, he again met General Calleja in the battle of Puente de Calderón. The insurgents were completely defeated and their troops dispersed. Hidalgo retreated to Aguascalientes, where he was joined by Iríarte's army, and they headed toward Zacatecas. On January 25 Allende caught up with Hidalgo, deprived him of command, and took him prisoner. They then headed north for the frontier, hoping to find refuge in the U.S. They were surprised and arrested by the royalist officer Ignacio Elizondo in Acatita de Baján and sent to Chihuahua.

Hidalgo had two trials, ecclesiastical and military. As a result of the first he was unfrocked July 29, 1811. The military trial sent him to death before a firing squad the next day. The corpse was decapitated and his head and those of Allende, Aldama, and Jiménez were placed in iron cages and taken to Guanajuato, where they were hung in the four corners of the public granary.

Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla.

Bibliography: L. CASTILLO LEDÓN, Hidalgo: La vida del héroe. 2 v. (Mexico City 1948-49).

[E. DEL HOYO]

HIDULF, SS.

Name of two saints who lived in the late seventh and early eighth centuries.

Hidulf of Regensburg, founder of MOYENMOUTIER; d. July 11 c. 707. He was a monk at Saint-Maximin in Trier, later CHORBISHOP in the diocese, and finally a hermit in the Vosges Mountains around whom other hermits gathered to form the abbey of Moyanmoutier. He was chosen as the secondary patron of the 17th-century Benedictine congregation of Saint-Vanne et Saint-Hydulphe.

Feast: July 11.

Hidulf of Lobbes, count of Hainaut, monk; d. June 23, 707. A Frankish noble and close friend of Pepin of Heristal, he aided SS. LANDELIN and URSMAR in the foundation of the abbey of LOBBES (province of Hainaut, Belgium), where he ended his days as a monk with the consent of his wife, St. Aya (Austregildis or Agia; d. c. 714).

Feast: June 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 3:211–226. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 4:432–440. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 151:587–606. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 4:56. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3945–52 (Suppl. 3949b–52b). A. POTTHAST, Bibliotheca historica medii aevi (2d ed. 1896; repr. Graz 1954) 2:1369. A. MICHEL, “Die Frühwerke des Kardinals Humbert-über Hilulf . . .,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 64 (1952–53) 225–259.

[C. DAVIS]

HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS

The term “hierarchy of truths” refers to the order and relationship that Christian doctrines have with one another. While the expression came into common theological usage at VATICAN COUNCIL II, the basic idea of a differentiation in the scale and value of individual truths has long been recognized in various ways by theologians.

The Decree on Ecumenism of Vatican Council II advised Catholic theologians engaged in ecumenical dialogue: “when comparing doctrines, they should remember that in Catholic teaching there exists an order or hierarchy of truths, since they vary in their relationship to the foundation of the Christian faith” (ch. 2.11). This idea originated in a speech given by Archbishop Andrea Pangrazio of Gorizia-Gradisca (Italy):

. . . to arrive at a fair estimate of both the unity which now exists among Christians and the diversity which still remains, it seems very important to me to pay close attention to the hierarchical order of revealed truths which express the mystery of Christ and those elements which make up the Church.

Although all the truths revealed by divine faith are to be believed with the same divine faith and all those elements which make up the Church must be kept with equal fidelity, not all of them are of equal importance [Council Speeches of Vatican II, p. 191].

Distinguishing between truths on the level of our final goal (such as the Trinity or Incarnation) and truths on the level of means toward salvation (such as the seven-fold number of Sacraments or apostolic succession), Pangrazio thought that doctrinal differences among Christians have less to do with these primary truths on the level of our final goal, and deal mostly with truths on the level of means, which are subordinate to those other primary truths.

Since Vatican II did not explain the meaning of hierarchy of truths, its usage has varied since the Council.

The second part of the Ecumenical Directory, issued by the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (April 16, 1970), identified the hierarchy of truths in terms of the relationship of a particular truth to the foundations of Christian faith, but also distinguished between “revealed truths” and “theological doctrines” (ch. 2.5). The Secretariat’s Reflections and Suggestions Concerning Ecumenical Dialogue (Sept. 18, 1970) apparently distinguishes between a hierarchy of truths based on their different relationships to the foundation of Christian faith, and another hierarchy of truths related to the actual life of the Church. Accordingly, the position of a given doctrine in the life of Christians may differ from its theoretical place in relation to Christian foundations (ch. 4.4).

Similarly, a number of different emphases regarding the hierarchy of truths can be found in contemporary theological discussion. For example, some continue to categorize truths on the basis of the degree of their explicitness in scripture or the teaching of the Church. Others evaluate truths on the basis of their necessity for salvation. Still others contrast “nuclear” beliefs which are basic to the psychological functioning of a person’s belief-system with “peripheral” beliefs which have few ramifications in a person’s life.

Insofar as various principles of ordering or evaluating truths are available or possible, theologians can construct different hierarchies of truths, so that the position of a particular revelatory truth might then vary from one hierarchy to another.

See Also: TRUTH; ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.

Bibliography: A. PANGRAZIO, “The Mystery of the History of the Church,” in H. Küng, et al., Council Speeches of Vatican II (Glen Rock, N.J. 1964) 188–192. G. TAVARD, “Hierarchi veritatum,” Theological Studies 32 (1971) 278–289. D. CARROLL, “‘Hierarchia veritatum’: A Theological and Pastoral Insight of the Second Vatican Council,” Irish Theological Quarterly 44 (1977) 125–133. W. HENN, The Hierarchy of Truths according to Yves Congar, O.P. (Rome 1987).

[J. T. FORD]

HIERONYMITES (LOS JERÓNIMOS)

Name given to various congregations of the 14th and 15th centuries in Spain and Italy.

The Spanish Congregation of Hermits of St. JEROME, known as Hieronymites or Jerónimos, was organized by Pedro Fernandez Pecha, the royal chamberlain, who died in 1374. On October 18 of the previous year Pope Gregory XI had given his approbation to the order. Soon it established numerous houses throughout Spain. Among the most important were San Bartholomé de Lupiana, near Toledo; Guadalupe in the province of Cáceres; San Jerónimo el Real in Madrid; Yuste in the province of Guadalajara, to which CHARLES V retired in 1555; San Lorenzo del ESCORIAL, the palace monastery erected by Philip II outside Madrid; and others in Seville and Granada. In 1499 King Manuel of Portugal established the Hieronymites in the monastery of Belen. A community of Hieronymite nuns was founded by María Garcías (d. 1426) in the convent of San Pablo in Toledo and survived until the suppression of 1835 by the Spanish government. The Hieronymites followed the rule of St. AUGUSTINE, under the direction of a general elected every three years by a general chapter. Each convent retained a high degree of autonomy. The observance was quite strict. The habit consisted of a white tunic, a brown scapular, a capuche, and a mantle worn in the choir and outside the monastery. Black was later adopted as the color of the scapular and mantle. The Hieronymites were highly influential in the spiritual and cultural work of the Church during the late 15th and 16th century. They also participated in the evangelization of the New World. One of the most distinguished Hieronymites, Hernando de Talavera, served as confessor to ISABELLA the Catholic and after the conquest of Granada in 1492 became the first archbishop of that city. His conciliatory policy toward the Muslims, however, was unacceptable to more intransigent Spanish clerics. PHILIP II succeeded in uniting all the Hieronymite monasteries in the peninsula under a single superior, but problems of organization and discipline became acute in later days. In 1780 King Charles III obtained from the Holy See broad authority to solve these problems. Suppressed in 1835, together with other religious orders, the Hieronymites began (1957) to reestablish themselves in Segovia.

Entirely independent congregations of hermits of St. Jerome included those of Fiesole, organized by Carlo de Montegranelli (d. 1417); the congregation of Peter Gambacorta of Pisa (d. 1435); and the Observants or congregation of Lombardy, founded by Lope de Olmedo (d. 1433), who was a former general of the Spanish congregation.

Bibliography: P. DE LA VEGA, Cronica de los frayles de la orden del bienaventurado sant Hieronymo (Alcalá 1539). F. A. DE MONTALVO, Historia general de la Orden de San Jerónimo (Salamanca 1704). IGNACIO DE MADRID, "La Orden de San Jerónimo en España. Primeros pasos para una historia crítica," Studia monastica 3 (1961) 409–427.

[J. F. O'CALLAGHAN]

HIGH CHURCH

High Church is a term applied to the party within the Anglican Communion in general, and the Church of England in particular, that has sought to minimize the Protestantism of the Anglican Communion and to stress its continuity with the Catholic Church of the Middle Ages. It has fostered a "high" view of the nature of the Church, and especially since the 19th century, a reverence for retrieval of ancient liturgical usages and the acceptance of the sacerdotal nature of the ministerial priesthood. One of their earliest leaders was William LAUD, archbishop of Canterbury (1633–45). In the 17th century this group supported the theory of the DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS as applied to the Stuarts, and the JACOBITES. Devotion to the latter cause led some into schism in the 18th century as NON-JURORS. In the 19th century the tradition was taken up by followers of TRACTARIANISM and the OXFORD MOVEMENT. The High Church party, successors of the Tractarians, remain a distinctive group. Many of their clerical members have adopted Catholic practices on a large scale. Their Sunday Eucharist, for example, is practically identical to that of a Catholic Mass.

Entrance to the monastery of the Hieronymites, photograph by Eric Dluhosch. (©MIT Collection/CORBIS)

See Also: ANGLICANISM; BROAD CHURCH; LOW CHURCH.

William Laud. (©CORBIS)

Bibliography: G. W. O. ADDLESHAW, The High Church Tradition: A Study in the Liturgical Thought of the Seventeenth Century (London 1941). B. E. STEINER, Samuel Seabury, 1729–1796: A Study in the High Church Tradition (Athens, Ohio 1971). R. B. MULLIN, Episcopal Vision/American Reality: High Church Theology and Social Thought in Evangelical America (New Haven 1986). K. HYLSON-SMITH, High Churchmanship in the Church of England: From the Sixteenth Century to the Late Twentieth Century (Edinburgh 1993). R. D. CORNWALL, Visible and Apostolic: The Constitution of the Church in High Church Anglican and Non-Juror Thought (Newark/London 1993).

[E. MCDERMOTT/EDS.]

HIGH PRIEST

The High Priest was the head of the priestly hierarchy in postexilic Israel who exercised supreme authority over the Temple, worship, and Temple personnel at Jerusalem. He was the mediator par excellence between God and the people, and the most important of his duties was the carrying out of the expiation rites on the Day of Atonement (Lv 16.1–34); he also shared in the general duties of the priesthood in the Temple. Because of his liturgical position, a more than customary ritual purity was demanded of him (see Lv 21.1–23), and he was expected to remain as close as possible to the Temple; this is probably why his residence was in the Temple area (Neh 3.20). Descriptions of the vestments of the high priest are given in Ex 29.5–9, 39.1–31; Lv 8.7–9; and Sir 45.8–13. Most of this information comes from the postexilic descriptions of “the sons of AARON” in the Priestly Code (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL).

In preexilic Israel there was a priest at the head of the Jerusalem clergy, but he was apparently referred to simply as “the priest” (e.g., 1 Kgs 4.2; 2 Kgs 11.9), “head priest” (2 Kgs 25.18), or “the priest, the head of the house of Zadoc” (2 Chr 31.10); cf. the similar terms, “the great one of the priests” and “the head of the priests” in texts from Ras Shamra and in Phoenician inscriptions. The term high priest (Heb. hakkōhēn haggādōl) is found four times in preexilic material (2 Kgs 12.11; 22.4, 8; 23.4); but these occurrences seem to be later modifications of the text (cf. the Septuagint and the parallel texts in Chronicles), and the title high priest appears to be postexilic, being used at first only rarely but coming into common usage in the Greek period. The preexilic head of the priesthood did not have the importance or rank that the high priest had after the exile. The former had control over the clergy of Jerusalem only and was himself responsible to the king (2 Kgs 12.7; 16.10), who had supreme control over the Temple and its clergy.

Immediately after the exile the high priest JESHUA, SON OF JOZADAK, was in charge of the religious affairs of the Jerusalem community; and the Davidic governor Zerubbabel, whom the Persians had appointed, was in charge of temporal affairs. Later the Persians deprived Zerubbabel and his descendants of temporal power at Jerusalem and let the high priest alone administer both religious and temporal matters. From then on into the Greek period the high priest became increasingly a secular prince, regarded as the head of the nation and its representative before God, as the king had been in days gone by. During the period of the HASMONAENS the high priest even took the title of king. With the end of the Hasmonaean dynasty and the advent of Herod the Great (37–4 B.C.), the office of high priest was at the disposal of the sovereign, who appointed and dismissed nominees at his own caprice. There were no less than 28 high priests between 37 B.C. and A.D. 70, and these and their families formed a priestly aristocracy, the group of CHIEF PRIESTS that is referred to so often in the NT.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 1002–05. R. ABBA, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 3:878, 886–887. L. GROLLENBERG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:437–438. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MC HUGH (New York 1961) 378, 397–403. T. J. MEEK, “Aaronites and Zadokites,” American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 45 (1928–29) 149–166.

[A. G. WRIGHT]

HIGHER CRITICISM

A term first used by the Biblical scholar William Robertson Smith (1846–94) in his book The Old Testament in the Jewish Church [(Edinburgh 1881) 105] to distinguish the critical literary and historical study of the books of the Old and New Testaments from textual or lower criticism. Questions of authorship, time of composition, sources, theological content, purpose, and related matters are the concern of higher criticism. Textual, or lower criticism, deals primarily with the establishment of the text itself on the basis of a critical examination and comparison of readings found in MSS written in the original languages and in ancient versions. The new term was soon applied to similar critical, literary, and historical studies in the classics and other fields. However, it should be emphasized that the methods of higher criticism and their underlying principles were not new in themselves. The great classical scholar Richard BENTLEY (1662–1742) had really founded higher criticism in his exhaustive literary and historical investigation of the problems of the authorship and date of composition of the Epistles of Phalaris. In the area of Biblical studies, Richard SIMON (1638–1712), Jean ASTRUC, and Alexander GEDDES (1737–1802) were all pioneers in applying the method of higher criticism, at least in part, to the study of the Pentateuch and other parts of the Old Testament. Nineteenth-century scholars greatly elaborated the methods and principles of literary and historical criticism especially in their exhaustive investigations of Homer and the Bible. However, too many in both fields tended to adopt extreme positions that were not warranted by the limited and incomplete data on which they were based. Furthermore, in the case of leading Biblical critics, especially in Germany, many were rationalists whose approach to Biblical problems was often colored, as in the case of J. WELLHAUSEN, for example, by the principles of Hegelian dialectic. The term higher criticism was thus coined precisely at a time when its methods and results were being challenged by more conservative critics, and it acquired the bad reputation that it still has in certain quarters. However, despite its mistakes and its failures, its employment has led to revolutionary and positive advances in both the philological and Biblical fields. Its methods continue to be developed and refined, and, when applied properly, it is an indispensable instrument of literary and historical research. One may cite among its conspicuous successes, the solutions to the problems of the FALSE DECRETALS, the SIBYLLINE ORACLES, and the time, composition, and character of the works ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite (see PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS). On the Biblical side, it will suffice to mention the great progress made in the interpretation of the Sacred Books by the recognition of their literary genres, their scope, and their purpose. It must be emphasized that the mistakes made in the past by an abuse of the methods of higher criticism have usually been corrected by a proper employment of its own methods.

Bibliography: T. BIRT, “Höhere Kritik,” in his Kritik und Hermeneutik nebst Abriss des antiken Buchwesens (Munich 1913) 213–242. G. GARRAGHAN, A Guide to Historical Method (New York 1946) 168–169. H. CAZALLES and P. GRELOT, “La Critique littéraire,” and “La Critique historique,” in Introduction à la Bible, A. ROBERT and A. FEUILLET, eds. (1959) 1:121–164.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

HIJRA

The Prophet MUHAMMAD’S flight from Mecca (Makka) to Medina (Madna). In Arabic the word is hiġra; the related verb hagara means, properly, to depart from one’s people or tribe, breaking off the ties of mutual obligation with them. The word is applied to Muḥammad’s definitive break with Qurayš and his emigration, with his followers, from MECCA to MEDINA in September 622. This event, which followed a period of negotiations with representatives of the factions in Medina, marks the foundation of Islam as an autonomous political community with the prophet as its chief. During the reign of the Caliph ’Umar I (traditionally in the year A.H. 17), after some discussion of the problem of how documents were to be dated, it was decided to reckon from the year of the prophet’s establishment at Medina (in Latin, Annus Hegirae, abbreviated A.H.). The era, however, was not made to begin with the Hijra itself, which took place in the month of Rabī’ I, the third month of the Arabian calendar, but with al-Mu ḥarram, the first month of that year, since the calendar was already fixed.

See Also: CALENDARS OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST; ERAS, HISTORICAL.

[R. M. FRANK/EDS.]

HILARION, ST.

Fourth-century ascetic; b. Tabatha, southern Palestine, c. 291; d. Cyprus, c. 371. He was born of pagan parents, studied with success under a grammarian at Alexandria, and became a Christian. The fame of St. ANTHONY OF EGYPT drew him into the wilderness, where he observed the way of life of that monastic founder. On his return to Palestine he inaugurated the eremitical life in the desert, some seven miles from Maiuma, near Gaza, on the road to Egypt. He progressed in self-conquest and the practice of virtue, and as time went on performed marvels. Through him many embraced the faith and many monasteries sprang up in Palestine, but little is known of their organization. Eventually his followers became so numerous that he sought solitude farther away and traveled to Egypt, Libya, Sicily, Dalmatia, and Cyprus, where he died. He has been especially venerated in Cyprus, Palestine, Venice, Pisa, and France. Much of the available knowledge of Hilarion comes from St. JEROME, who wrote the vita (c. 391) on a basis of historical fact but embellished with rhetorical and legendary features. Jerome cites a letter of EPIPHANIUS that mentions Hilarion, and SOZOMEN gives a short account of his life and names some of his companions (Histoire Ecclesiastique 3.14; 5.10.15; 6.32).

St. Hilarion putting a dragon to flight, detail of a fresco by the 14th-century Siense artist Pietro Lorenzetti in the Camposanto, Pisa, Italy.

Feast: Oct. 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863–) Oct. 9:16–59. Synaxarium ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae. Propylaeum ad Acta sanctorum novembris, ed. H. DELEHAYE (Brussels 1902) 153–154. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:579–580. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, 3 v. (Brussels 1957) 1:751z–756n. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 23:30–54. vita; tr. M. L. EWALD in Early Christian Biographies (The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation), ed. R. J. DEFERRARI et al. 15; (1952) 241–280. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 2.2:3157–58. P. T. CAMELOT, Catholicisme 5:736. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4:163–165. R. AIGRAIN, L'Hagiographie (Paris 1953). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.2:649–650.

[F. MEEHAN]

HILARUS OF MENDE, ST.

Also known as Ilerus, Hilarius, bishop; d. c. 540. Little credence is to be given to the 10th- or 11th-century vita, according to which Hilarus lived as a hermit on the banks of the Tarn, making periodic visits to LÉRINS. A group of disciples gathered about him for whom he built a monastery, from which he was summoned to the See of Mende (Javols, Civitas Gabalum) sometime before 535. Of his episcopal activities the vita says nothing. Fortunatus records an instance of his hospitality in granting shelter to St. LEOBIN OF CHARTRES. The council signatures attest his attendance at the synod of Auvergne (Clermont) in 535.

Feast: Oct. 25.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 11:619–638. Vita s. Leobini, Monumenta Germaniae Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1825–) 4.2:74. Monumenta Germaniae Concilia (Berlin 1825–) 1:70. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. (Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911) 1:3910–12. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:850–851, gives an extensive bibliog.

[G. M. COOK]

HILARY, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Nov. 19, 461, to Feb. 29, 468. Hilary, successor to Leo the Great and archdeacon of the Roman Church, was a Sardinian by birth, whose father was Crispinus. As papal legate at the Robber Council of EPHE-SUS, he barely escaped when pursued by soldiers of DIOS-CORUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, who was angered by his support of the Patriarch of Constantinople, FLAVIAN.

His pontificate was relatively quiet; the affairs of the Western Church occupied him. The barbarian Ricimer ruled in Italy, making and unmaking emperors at will. Hilary attempted to reestablish the vicariate of Arles over Gaul as in the days of Patroclus under Pope ZOSIMUS, but without success, as the Bishop Leontius was not eager to assume a vigorous role. When Ascanius, Metropolitan of Tarragona in Spain, appealed a complaint to him against Silvanus of Calahorra, the pope convened a council (Nov. 19, 465) in the church of S. Maria Maggiore. The Spanish bishops were notified by a synodal letter after the rights of the metropolitan were upheld. This was the first such council whose exact minutes, including the pope's allocution and the acclamations of the fathers, have come down to us; according to its regulations a dying bishop was prohibited from appointing his own successor.

Since Hilary attributed his escape at Ephesus to the intervention of St. John the Evangelist, when he became pope he built three chapels adjoining the Lateran Baptistery: one dedicated to St. John the Baptist, another to St. John the Evangelist, and a third to the Holy Cross. The first two are still standing, both with their original bronze doors. He erected a monastery near S. Lorenzo fuori le Mura and was buried in this church "beside the body of blessed Bishop Xystus." The exact location of his tomb is unknown.

The commemoration of Hilary in the MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME on September 10 seems to have been an error.

Feast: Feb. 28.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 58:11–31; Patrologiae cursus completus, series latina; suppl. ed. A. HAMMAN (Paris 1957–) 3:379–381, 441–443, editions. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Streenbrugge 1961) 1662–63. A. THIEL, ed., Epistolae romanorum pontificum (Braunschweig 1868–) 1:126–170. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:242–248; 3.86. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papstums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:10–14, 745–746. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1210. G. BARDY, A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 4:337–338. G. FERRARI, Early Roman Monasteries (Rome 1957) 182, 184, 315. R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei Papi (Rome 1957) 103. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1996).

[J. CHAPIN]

HILARY OF ARLES, ST.

Bishop of Arles (430?–449); b. 401; d. Arles, France, May 5, 449. With the encouragement of his kinsman (St.) HONORATUS, Hilary become a monk at LÉRINS. He served Honoratus briefly during his episcopate at Arles (c. 428–c. 430), was present at his death (January 14 or 15), and was chosen his successor. GENNADIUS testifies to Hilary's learning (De vir. ill. 70), while PROSPER OF AQUITAINE made witness to Hilary's (a variant reads Euladius) concurrence with St. AUGUSTINE'S teaching except in the areas of grace and predestination (Augustine, Epist. 225.9). On Prosper's testimony, Hilary is considered a Semi-Pelagian.

Hilary's authentic works include an anniversary Sermo de vita s. Honorati, a letter to Eucherius of Lyons, and verses. Several other compositions may also be his. According to Gennadius (De vir. ill. 100) the Vita s. Hilarii was written by Bp. Honoratus of Marseilles (d. after 492 or 496).

Hilary's episcopacy was marked by strong pastoral action; he presided at several councils, including that of Orange in 441 (J. D. Mansi, Sacorum Conciliorum nova. Et amplissima collectio 6:433–452), and engaged in a dispute with Pope LEO I. On July 26, 428, Pope CELESTINE I had apparently restricted the metropolitan jurisdiction of the bishop of Arles to the civil province of Vienne. Hilary acted outside these limits in 443 or 444 by joining other bishops in the deposition of Bp. Chelidonius of Besançon (province of Maxima Sequanorum) and in the replacement of the ailing Bp. Projectus, whose see is unknown. Both prelates appealed to Pope Leo. Although Hilary appeared unexpectedly at a synod in Rome discussing these depositions, he was unable to dissuade the pope from decreeing (probably July 445) the restoration of the two bishops and the suppression of the Arles metropolitanate. Ultimately, a petition to Rome by 19 Gallic prelates moved Pope Leo (May 5, 450) to restore the authority of Arles over all but five bishoprics in the province of Vienne. By this date, Hilary had been dead a year and had been succeeded by Bishop Ravennius (449–452).

Feast: May 5.

Bibliography: S. CAVALLIN, Vitae sanctorum Honorati et Hilarii (Lund 1952). HONORAT DE MARSEILLE, La vie d'Hilaire d'Arles, tr. P. A. JACOB (Paris 1995). Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d ed. Streenbrugge 1961) 500–509. B. KOLON, Die Vita S. Hilarii Arelatensis (Paderborn 1925). D. FRANSES, Paus Leo de Groote en S. Hilarius van Arles (Bois-le-Duc 1948). J. CHÉNÉ, "Le semipélagianisme du midi de la Gaule, d'après les lettres . . . d'Hilaire à S. Augustin" Recherches de science religieuse 43 (1955) 321–341. É. GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine (Paris 1947–) 2.2. T. G. JALLAND, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1941). O. CHADWICK, "Euladius of Arles," Journal of Theological Studies 46 (1945) 200–205.

[H. G. J. BECK]

HILARY OF CHICHESTER

Canon lawyer, bishop, supporter of King HENRY II against Thomas BECKET; d. Chichester, July 13, 1169. Probably not of high social origin, he appears first in the 1130s as Master Hilary, clerk of HENRY OF BLOIS, Bishop of Winchester, a powerful political figure during Stephen's reign. He was an advocate of some distinction at the papal court and became bishop of CHICHESTER in 1147 through the influence of Pope Eugene III. That he was an able canonist is suggested by the frequency with which Abp. THEOBALD OF CANTERBURY sought his legal assistance or advice, and by the fact that he was often appointed a papal judge-delegate in ENGLAND. As bishop he was remarkable for his record of service to the king; e.g., he acted once as itinerant justice and twice as sheriff of Sussex for Henry II. When he was papal judge-delegate, he would, on occasion, yield to the king as against the pope in a matter of principle. During Henry's controversy with Thomas Becket (1163–64), he emerged as a sharp-tongued opponent of his archbishop. In his diocese Hilary was active in recovering the alienated possessions of his see, favored the regular clergy, and founded the treasurership and chancellorship in his cathedral. In character he has been described as "an extremely quick-witted, efficient, self-confident, voluble, somewhat shallow man. His talents were great but he used them as an opportunist" (Knowles).

Bibliography: J. H. ROUND, "Hilary, Bishop of Chichester," Athenaeum (Jan.–June 1897) 115–116. D. KNOWLES, The Episcopal Colleagues of Archbishop Thomas Becket (Cambridge, Eng. 1951). H. MAYR-HARTING, "H., Bishop of Chichester, 1147–1169, and Henry II," English Historical Review 78 (1963) 209–224; The Bishops of Chichester, 1075–1207 (Chichester 1963).

[H. MAYR-HARTING]

HILARY OF POITIERS, ST.

Bishop and Church Father; b. Poitiers, France, c. 315; d. Poitiers, c. 367 (feast, Jan. 14). Hilary came of a distinguished family and received a sound training in the classics and philosophy. He was married and the father of a daughter named Abra; he was converted to Christianity in early manhood by reading in the Bible the sublime descriptions of God, which contrasted so strongly with the gross materialism of pagan mythology. His selection as the bishop of Poitiers probably took place in 353. At the council of Béziers (356) he refused to condemn ATHANASIUS, the touchstone of orthodoxy in the Arian controversy (see ARIANISM), and was deported to Phrygia by order of the Emperor CONSTANTIUS II. In exile he studied Greek theology, composed two of his most important works, corresponded with the Western bishops, and wrote vigorously to uphold the divinity of Christ. In 360 the emperor refused him permission to debate with the Arian-minded prelates, and in 361 he was released from exile because his enemies regarded him as "the sower of discord and the troublemaker of the Orient." After his return from exile, he allowed MARTIN OF TOURS, the soldier-convert, to inaugurate the monastic movement in Gaul by establishing a hermitage at Ligugé (see MONASTICISM). Hilary spent his last years in repairing the damage that Arianism had done in Gaul and Italy.

Works. According to AUGUSTINE, Hilary was a master of Latin eloquence who modeled his style on Quintilian and had begged God to grant him "beauty of diction" when writing about the sublime doctrine of the TRINITY. As JEROME pointed out, long and involved sentences obscure his meaning at times, although usually he is more restrained than his contemporaries in employing ornaments of speech. His writings fall into four categories: theology, Scripture, controversial works, and hymns.

Hilary's De Trinitate is the first extensive study of this doctrine in Latin; he had to coin new words and expressions to convey his meaning clearly and adequately. Internal evidence indicates that he wrote the first three of the 12 books before 356 and the remaining nine during his exile.

His De synodis dates from this same period and explains why the prelates of the East were not satisfied with the term homoousios, “consubstantial,” which had been approved at the Council of NICAIA (325); it also cites the Oriental professions of faith and tells how they are to be interpreted. He wrote it to give his fellow bishops in Western Europe a more accurate understanding of the religious situation in the East. A Fragmenta ex opere historico is also attributed to Hilary. It contains some important documents relating to the Arian heresy that are not found elsewhere.

His Tractatus super Matthaeum was written before his exile, and the Tractatus super Psalmos after his return. In all probability both were originally sermons. Another scriptural work, Liber mysteriorum, is only partially preserved. His principal controversial works are directed against Constantius II, whose religious policy was dividing the Church; and against Auxentius, the Arian bishop of Milan, whom he had failed to depose at a synod in 364. Jerome informs us that Hilary introduced the singing of hymns into the West (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS) because he saw how effective they had been in propagating the heresy of Arius among the people. But only three incomplete hymns of his are extant; his hymns were not as well adapted to public singing as were those of St. AMBROSE.

Doctrine. Hilary bases his defense of the dogmas of faith on the testimony of Sacred Scripture. Its authority is unquestioned because it is the word of God Himself. Heretics who appeal to the Bible distort its meaning through ignorance or malice. His fondness for the allegorical interpretation is evident in his scriptural commentaries, and especially in the Liber mysteriorum, but he usually uses the literal meaning when citing a text in his dogmatic works.

Catholic Church. Hilary did not write any formal treatise on the Church, but he takes its authority for granted since the Church exhibits unity in Christ. It possesses what all the heretics lack: unity, universality, and indestructibility. Just as certain medicines, he says, can cure all diseases, so the doctrines of the Church provide a remedy against every kind of heresy.

God and the Trinity. Hilary teaches that the existence of God can be known by reason, but that His nature is incomprehensible. The eternal being of God, as expressed in Ex 3.14, “I Am Who Am,” had filled him with admiration, even as a pagan, and to it he related all the other divine attributes. This God, who is perfectly happy in Himself, has created angels and men in order that they might share in His happiness. The human soul, according to the better interpretation of Hilary’s words, was immediately created by God. The sublime doctrine of the Trinity was in his opinion foreshadowed in the Old Testament but only revealed fully when the Son of God came upon earth.

He marshals his arguments in orderly fashion to show that the proponents of SABELLIANISM are wrong in considering Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as only three names of one and the same divine person and that the Arians are also wrong in speaking of inequality in the Trinity. The doctrine of Trinitarian interaction, later known as circumcession, and its corollary that the Three Divine Persons act inseparably in all works ad extra are clearly implied in his explanation of the Trinity. He is often charged, as was his contemporary, St. BASIL, with not giving the name God to the Holy Spirit. One answer to this accusation is that Hilary was concerned with refuting the Arians who denied the divinity of the Son. Another is that in numerous passages he ascribes the same attributes to the Holy Spirit as to the Father and the Son, so that it cannot be seriously maintained that he denied the true divinity of the Third Person of the Trinity.

Hilary’s primary purpose in all his writings was to prove that the nature of the Son was consubstantial with that of the Father, and therefore he made no careful study of Christ’s human nature. He teaches clearly the two essential doctrines of the Incarnation: that Jesus was only one divine person, and that He had both a divine and a human nature. However, his belief that Christ did not experience interior affliction when He was scourged, crucified, and so on, shows the limitations of his Christological doctrine. He failed to recognize the state of physical weakness to which the Son of God freely subjected Himself when He became a man.

Influence. Hilary was the first Latin writer to acquaint Western Christendom with the vast theological treasures of the Greek Fathers. Augustine and THOMAS AQUINAS cite his authority in their studies of the Trinity. Hilary is rightly called the Athanasius of the West; he preached, wrote, and suffered exile in defense of the divinity of Christ. His role was providential: by strengthening the faith of the clergy and laity of Europe in this fundamental dogma, he prepared the Church for its second struggle against Arianism during the barbarian invasions. In 1851 Pius IX declared Hilary a “doctor of the Universal Church.”

Feast: Jan. 13 (formerly Jan. 14).

Bibliography: HILARY OF POITIERS, Tractatus super Psalmos, ed. A. ZINGERLE in Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 22 (Vienna 1891); Tractatus mysteriorum: Hymni Fragmenta, Spuria, ed. A. FEDER in Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 65 (Vienna 1916); The Trinity, tr. S. MCKENNA in Fathers of the Church 25 (New York 1954); Hilary of Poitiers' preface to his "Opus historicum," tr. P. SMULDERS (Leiden 1995). J. E. EMMEGGER, The Functions of Reason and Faith in the Theology of St. Hilary of Poitiers (Washington 1948). E. P. MEIJERING, Hilary of Poitiers on the Trinity (Leiden 1982). M. DURST, Die Eschatologie des Hilarius von Poitiers: Ein Beitrag zur Dogmengeschichte des vierten Jahrhunderts (Bonn 1987). L. F. LADARIA, La cristología de Hilario de Poitiers (Rome 1989).

[S. J. MCKENNA]

HILDA OF WHITBY, ST.

Foundress of Whitby; b. 614; d. 680. The daughter of Hereric and grandniece of King EDWIN OF NORTHUMBRIA, Hilda was baptized by PAULINUS OF YORK on Easter Day, 627. When 33 years old she dedicated herself to the monastic life under St. AIDAN's guidance. She became abbess of a monastery at Hartlepool and later founded the double monastery at WHITBY (657) where, at the famous Council of Whitby (664), the Northumbrian Celtic Church accepted the Roman discipline. She trained many young scholars, five of whom afterward became bishops. She was also responsible for recognizing and cultivating the gift of CAEDMON, the first English Christian poet. A woman of great devotion and ability, she exercised much influence in the Church until her death, which followed a long illness. She was succeeded by St. ELFLEDA. Her relics disappeared after the Vikings destroyed Whitby in 875. BEDE is the main authority for her life.

Feast: Nov. 17.

Bibliography: E. VENABLES, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900) 9:832–833. BEDE, Histoire Ecclesiastique 4.23. N. MOORSOM, Saint Hilda of Whitby: Historical Notes (Middlesbrough 1970).

[B. COLGRAVE]

HILDEBERT OF LAVARDIN

Archbishop and Latin author; b. Lavardin, France, c. 1056; d. Tours, Dec. 18, 1133. After being educated at the cathedral school at LE MANS, he became archdeacon there in 1091. He was elected bishop of Le Mans in 1096 and archbishop of TOURS in 1125. Although he is best known as an important literary figure, his ecclesiastical career was a significant and stormy one. Most notable was his quarrel with King WILLIAM II of England shortly after his election as bishop of Le Mans. The king accused Hildebert of using his cathedral to attack his royal castle at Le Mans and forced him to come to England as a virtual prisoner in 1099. Freed to return in 1100, he proved himself an able administrator and a courageous bishop. He successfully completed the rebuilding of the cathedral, preached with great success in his see, and had the popular but heretical HENRY OF LAUSANNE expelled from the diocese. As archbishop of Tours, he was harshly treated by King LOUIS VI of France, at the time under the influence of the notorious cleric-politician Stephen de Garlande (d. 1150). Hildebert presided at an important provincial synod at Nantes in 1127 and attended the First LATERAN COUNCIL of 1123.

Hildebert's reputation, however, rests in large part on his literary work, for he represents the very pinnacle of the literary achievement of the CATHEDRAL SCHOOLS, and his Latin style has been universally acclaimed by critics of his own day and after. PETER OF BLOIS records that he had to put to memory Hildebert's letters as models of style. He wrote on a variety of topics, both religious and secular, but the collection of his works (Patrologia Latina 171:1–1458) contains much that is spurious. Southern cites him as an early influence in the development of political theory.

Bibliography: J. B. HAURÉAU, Notice sur les mélanges poétiques d'Hildebert de Lavardin (Paris 1878); Notices sur les sermons attribués à H. de L. (Paris 1887). M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, 3 v. (Munich 1911–31) 3:853–865. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XII^e siècle, 2 v. (Brussels-Paris 1946), passim. J. DE GHELLINCK, Littérature latine au moyen-âge, 2 v. (Paris 1939) 2:118–124. V. BESSE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2466–68. A. WILMART, "Le Tractatus theologicus attribué à Hildebert," Revue Bénédictine 45 (1933) 163–164; "Les sermons d'H.," ibid. 47 (1935) 12–51. R. W. SOUTHERN, The Making of the Middle Ages (New York 1953). H. O. TAYLOR, The Mediaeval Mind, 2 v. (4th ed. London 1938). F. J. E. RABY, A History of Secular Latin Poetry in the Middle Ages 2 v. (2d ed. Oxford 1957) 2. R. R. BOLGAR, The Classical Heritage and Its Beneficiaries (Cambridge, Eng. 1954). A. DUMAS, Catholicisme 5:737–738. A. HAMMAN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:340.

[H. MACKINNON]

HILDEBRAND, DIETRICH VON

Catholic philosopher and moral theologian, outspoken defender of traditional Catholic teaching, b. in Italy, 1889, d. New Rochelle, N.Y., Jan. 30, 1977. His father, Adolph (1847–1921), was a sculptor; his paternal grandfather, Bruno (1812–78), a political economist. Von Hildebrand received his doctorate in philosophy from the University of Göttingen, Germany (1912), was converted to Catholicism in 1914, and was a professor on the faculty of the University of Munich from 1924 to 1933. When Hitler came to power in 1933, von Hildebrand, known to be anti-Nazi, was forced to flee to Florence. Later he joined the faculty of the University of Vienna, but when Austria fell he escaped and joined the faculty of the Catholic University of Toulouse, France. With the fall of France he went to Spain and then to the U.S. where he joined the Fordham University faculty in 1942. He was professor of philosophy there until his retirement in 1960. By the time he had become a professor emeritus he had already written 30 books and more than 100 articles on philosophy and morality. Among his main works Christian Ethics (1952) and True Morality and Its Counterfeits (1955) were especially praised. In the era of Vatican II in quick succession appeared his The Sacred Heart (1965) and Man and Woman (1966), as well as two books coauthored by his wife (the former Alice Jourdain), a philosophy teacher at Hunter College: The Art of Living (1965) and Morality and Situation Ethics (1966). Next came his strong summons to Catholic conservatives, Trojan Horse in the City of God (1967), a refutation of secularism and what he described as contemporary errors and horrors. Later he published his defense of Paul VI's encyclical Humanae vitae (1969) in his In Defense of Purity (1970) and Celibacy and the Crisis of Faith (1971).

Von Hildebrand's early writings reflect three dominant influences: the phenomenology of his professor E. HUSSERL, his own conversion to Catholicism, and the ethical approach of M. Schelers. Von Hildebrand's later writings were an attempt to respond to what he considered the most serious crisis in the entire history of the church. In an interview granted to E. Wakin (May 1969) he insisted there could be no change in the revealed doctrine of the church, only development, in Newman's sense of making explicit what was implicit. While von Hildebrand rejoiced over Vatican II's attempts to vivify mere convention and eliminate bureaucratic legalism, he deplored such other results as the loss of a sense of the supernatural and the eagerness to cater to the values of a desecralized, dehumanized, and depersonalized world. Progressives, he maintained, absolutize current views and relativize traditional orthodoxy. The greatest service the church can render the world is to help individual souls progress in sanctity. St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI is the model; he did not set out to change the world, but to follow Christ; by doing that, he did change the world. What is needed are a few great saints who would reverse all secularist and liberal trends and reinstate the true orthodox faith.

Bibliography: E. WAKIN, U.S. Catholic 34 (1969) 6–13.

[E. J. DILLON]

HILDEGARD OF BINGEN, ST.

Abbess of Rupertsberg, mystic, and writer; b. Böckelheim, Diocese of Mainz, Germany, 1098; d. Rupertsberg, Sept. 17, 1179. Though sickly from birth, at the age of eight Hildegard was entrusted to Bl. Jutta (d. 1136), sister of Count Meginhard of Spanheim; at 15 she was clothed in the Benedictine habit and instructed in the religious life. At the death of Jutta, Hildegard, then 38, became abbess. In 1147, accompanied by 18 religious, she transferred the monastery to Rupertsberg, near Bingen, a site that had been revealed to her. She founded a daughter convent at Eibingen prior to 1162.

When the visions she had experienced since childhood increased in later life, she confided in her confessor, Godfrey, and authorized him to submit the matter to the abbot and, later, to the archbishop of Mainz. A committee of theologians gave a favorable verdict on the authenticity of her visions and assigned the monk Volmar to act as her secretary. EUGENE III appointed a committee to review her writings, and again a favorable report followed. Hildegard's principal work, Scivias, is an account of 26 visions treating the relations between God and man in creation, Redemption, and the Church. Other writings include: lives of St. Disibod and St. Rupert; two books of medicine and natural history; hymns and canticles of which she wrote both words and music; 50 allegorical homilies; a morality play; for diversion, a language of her own composed of 900 words and an alphabet of 23 letters; and letters to popes, cardinals, bishops, abbots, kings and emperors, monks and nuns, and men and women of varied levels of society, both in Germany and abroad.

Hildegard's influence extended beyond her monastery through her extensive correspondence and because of her travels throughout Germany and parts of Gaul. She spoke to people of all classes and walks of life, exhorting them to reform and to heed the prophecies and divine warnings entrusted to her. During her last years she was so ill that she had to be carried from place to place and was unable to stand upright. Nevertheless, she remained available to all who sought her, discussing perplexing questions, encouraging and exhorting her nuns, admonishing sinners, and writing continuously. Her earliest biographer, the monk Theodoric, declared her a saint; miracles, many recorded during her life, increased at her tomb. Twice the process to collect information for canonization was instituted but never completed. She is listed a saint in the Roman MARTYROLOGY, and her cult is honored in several German dioceses. In recent years a considerable literature has grown up dealing with this remarkable mystic and pioneer in science. All manuscripts from the convent of Eibingen have been transferred to the state library at Wiesbaden.

Feast: Sept. 17.

Bibliography: HILDEGARD, Mystical writings, ed. F. BOWIE and O. DAVIES, tr. R. CARVER (New York 1990); The Letters of Hildegard of Bingen, tr. J. L. BAIRD and R. K. EHRMAN, 2 v. (New York 1994–1998); Das Speyerer Kräuterbuch mit den Heilpflanzen

Hildegards von Bingen, ed. B. FEHRINGER (Würzburg 1994); The "Ordo virtutum" of Hildegard of Bingen, ed. A. E. DAVIDSON (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1992). GODEFRIDUS and THEODERIC, The Life of the Holy Hildegard, tr. Latin to German A. FÜHRKÖTTER, tr. German to English J. MCGRATH (Collegeville, Minn. 1995); ed. including Canonizatio Sanctae Hildegardis Kanonisation der heiligen Hildegard, tr. M. KLAES (Freiburg 1998). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:580–585. B. WIDMER, Heilsordnung und Zeitgeschehen in der Mystik Hildegards von Bingen (Basel 1955). G. HERTZKA, So heilt Gott (6th ed. Stein am Rhein 1978), medicine; Das Wunder der Hildegard-Medizin (Stein am Rhein 1978) tr. as Hildegard of Bingen's Medicine, tr. K. STREHLOW (Santa Fe, N.M. 1988). M. SCHRADER and A. FÜHRKÖTTER, Die Herkunft der Heiligen Hildegard (Mainz 1941, rev. 1981); Die Echtheit des Schrifttums der heiligen Hildegard von Bingen (Cologne 1956). I. ULRICH, Hildegard von Bingen: Mystikerin, Heilerin, Geführtin der Engel (Munich 1990) tr. as Hildegard of Bingen: Mystic, Healer, Companion of the Angels, tr. L. M. MALONEY (Collegeville, Minn. 1993). L. MOULINIER, Le manuscrit perdu à Strasbourg (Paris 1995), scientific contributions. Hildegard von Bingen: Prophetin durch die Zeiten, ed. E. FORSTER (Freiburg 1997). M. ZÖLLER, Gott weist seinem Volk seine Wege: die theologische Konzeption des 'Liber Scivias' der Hildegard von Bingen (Tübingen 1997). C. BURNETT and P. DRONKE, eds., Hildegard of Bingen: The Context of Her Thought and Art (London 1998). S. FLANAGAN, Hildegard of Bingen (2d ed. London 1998). M. B. MCINERNEY, ed., Hildegard of Bingen (New York 1998). R. PERNOUD, Hildegard of Bingen, tr. from Fr. P. DUGGAN (New York 1998). W. PODEHL, ed., 900 Jahre Hildegard von Bingen: neuere Untersuchungen und literarische Nachweise (Wiesbaden 1998). H. SCHIPPERGES, Die Welt der Hildegard von Bingen (Freiburg 1997), tr. as The World of Hildegard of Bingen: Her Life, Times, and Visions, tr. J. CUMMING (Collegeville, Minn. 1998); Hildegard von Bingen: Healing and the Nature of the Cosmos, tr. J. A. BROADWIN (Princeton 1996). M. BERGER, Hildegard of Bingen: On Natural Philosophy and Medicine (Cambridge 1999), selections from Causae et curae. A. SILVAS, Jutta and Hildegard: The Biographical Sources (University Park, Pa. 1999). A. H. KINGLENZMEIER, Hildegard of Bingen: An Integrated Vision (Collegeville, Minn. 2001). R. CRAINE, Hildegard: Prophet of the Cosmic Christ (New York 1997).

[M. D. BARRY]

HILDEGARD OF KEMPTEN, BL.

Wife of CHARLEMAGNE; b. 758; d. Thionville, Lorraine, France, April 30, 783. She was born of a family allied to the dukes of Swabia and may have been illegitimate. She became the second wife of Charlemagne, to whom she bore four sons and five daughters, including LOUIS I the Pious. In 773, she rebuilt and endowed the Benedictine Abbey of KEMPTEN. She founded many churches and was a close friend of LIOBA. Hildegard was buried at the Abbey of St. Arnulf of Metz, to which she had made a considerable donation. In 872, the nuns of Kempten obtained part of her remains; these were elevated in 963, and since then she has been venerated. Fictitious elements are conspicuous in the accounts of her life.

Feast: April 30.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 3:797–811. J. LECHNER, Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 21 (1900) 37–75. A. DILGER-FISCHER in Ulm und Oberschwaben 34 (1955) 167–170. J. FLECKENSTEIN, Forschungen zur oberrheinischen Landesgeschichte 4 (Freiburg 1957) 71–136, esp. 118–. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 5:740.

[L. MEAGHER]

HILDEGUNDE OF MEER, BL.

Foundress; d. Meer, near Neuss, Germany, Feb. 6, 1183. She was born Countess of Liedberg, and married Count Lothair of Are and Meer. One of her sons, Herman, was the Premonstratensian abbot of Cappenberg from 1171 to 1210. Another son, Theodoric, participated in the sack of Rome with Emperor FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA (1167), burning the church of St. Lawrence. Hildegunde had entered the PREMONSTRATENSIA after the death of her husband in 1165, and founded the convent of Meer, where she became first prioress. After the sack of Rome she built a replica of St. Lawrence's, at Meer, in expiation for the sacrilege of her son. After her death her daughter Hedwig succeeded as prioress. Though both are recognized as venerable, their cult was never approved.

Feast: Feb. 6.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 1:925–926; for Hedwig, April 2:263–264. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints 1:265–266. J. BREMER, Das kurkölnische Amt Liedberg (Möchen-Gladbach 1930) 51–54. N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense 1:182–511.

[N. BACKMUND]

HILDEGUNDE OF SCHÖNAU

Cistercian; d. Schönau Abbey, April 20, 1188. She was the daughter of a merchant of Neuss am Rhein who made her cut her hair like a man's, dressed her in man's clothing, and gave her the name Joseph. About 1183 her father took her on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where he died. "Joseph" returned to enter the Cistercian Abbey of Schönau near Heidelberg and died there during the novitiate. Only after her death was her true sex discovered; inquiries established her real name and origin. Because of her adventurous life and the unusual way in which she had come to the monastic life, she could not help but attract lively interest, and German Cistercian monasteries especially came to venerate her as a saint. There are pictures of her dating from the 15th century. Her story is so well confirmed by her contemporaries that there is no doubt about the fact that a girl did live and die undetected as a novice in Schönau. Statutes of the general chapter of that time seem to confirm the incident. However, similar happenings date from the first days of Eastern monasticism (cf. Palladius, c. 420). The oldest biography of the novice "Joseph" was by a confrere from the novitiate, Berthold, who lived later as a monk in Bebenhausen (Acta Sanctorum April 2:782–790; probably used by CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH, Dial. mirac. 1:40).

Bibliography: Vita A by Engelhard and metrical Vita B, Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 6 (1881) 516–521, 533–536. M. HUFFSCHMID, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der Cisterzienserabtei Schoenau," Zeitschrift für die Geschichte des Oberrheins 45–46 (1891–92) 430, for sources. K. (C.) SPAHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:343. M. SCHAAB, Die Zisterzienserabtei Schoenau im Odenwald (Heidelberg 1963) 43. Cistercienser-Chronik 71 (1963) 24, for bibliog.

[C. SPAHR]

HILDELIDE, ST.

Hildelitha, Benedictine abbess; b. c. 650; d. c. 717. She was an Anglo-Saxon princess, who entered the monastery either of CHELLES or of FAREMOUTIERS, France. St. ERCONWALD, Bishop of London, founded BARKING ABBEY for his sister St. ETHELBURGA. He then invited Hildelide to Barking to train Ethelburga in the monastic life. Hildelide became second abbess there c. 678 and ruled until her death. She was admired by SS. BEDE, BONIFACE, and ALDHELM; the last-named dedicated to her and her nuns his treatise, De laudibus virginitatis. She translated the bodies of the men and women of her abbey from the cemetery to the monastic church.

Feast: Sept. 3, March 24, Dec. 22; translation feasts on March 7 and Sept. 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 3:482–485. BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 4.6–10. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 3:524–525. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:481.

[H. E. AIKINS]

HILDIGRIM, ST.

Bishop and missionary, a.k.a. Hildigrinus; d. Halberstadt, Germany, June 19, 827. (feast, June 19, March 26). Hildigrim was a brother and pupil of St. LUDGER, bishop of Münster, whom he accompanied to Rome (784) and thence to MONTE CASSINO. Later he was abbot of the monastery of WERDEN in the Ruhr Valley. In 802 he became bishop of Châlonssur-Marne; he left there to join his brother in Helmstädt. Later he became bishop of Osterwiek and, finally, in 819, of Halberstadt. Hildigrim was an active missionary bishop among the East Saxons for the last 12 years of his life.

Feast: June 19 and March 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 4:742–744. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, 3 v. (2d. ed. Paris 1907–15) 3:97. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 6:311. The Book of Saints (4th ed. New York 1947) 294. Sankt Liudger-Festschrift (Essen 1959), passim.

[M. CSÁKY]

HILDUIN OF SAINT-DENIS

Translator of the works of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS; b. c. 775; d. Prüm, Nov. 22, between 855 and 859. Hilduin's father was the Count Udalrich; his aunt, St. Hildegard of Kempton, was the mother of Emperor Louis I the Pious, whence Hilduin's influence at court. He was a student of ALCUIN; he taught HINCMAR OF REIMS, and WALAFRID STRABO. Early in 815, he was made abbot of SAINT-DENIS-EN-FRANCE.

As archchaplain of Louis, 819 to 822, he was involved in all the ecclesiastical questions of the empire. At the Council of Paris (825) he favored the Eastern legates. He was involved in the revolt of the sons of Louis against their father. When they failed in 830, he was exiled to Paderborn, then on Feb. 2, 831, was stripped of his monasteries and banished to the Abbey of CORVEY; but Hincmar obtained his recall. Hilduin then devoted himself to reforming the abbey of Saint-Denis and to study.

At the request of Louis, he wrote a life of St. DENIS OF PARIS that contributed to the identification of this bishop of Paris with Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. Between 831 and 834, Hilduin translated into Latin the Dionysian Corpus from the MS (Paris Bib. Nat. Gr. 437) sent by the Byzantine Emperor Michael II to Louis in 827. This rather mediocre translation was taken up and improved c. 860 by JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. Hilduin became archchancellor of Louis's son, Emperor LOTHAIR I (late 843–855), and accompanied him to Rome. As archbishop designate (never consecrated) he ruled Cologne from 842 to 850.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNÉ (Paris 1878–90) 106:9–50. Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–) division: Epistolae. 5.1:325–337. DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE, Dionysiaca, 2 v. (Bruges 1937). G. THÉRY, Études dionysiennes, 2 v. (Études de philosophie médiévale 16, 19; Paris 1932–37). L. LEVILLAIN, "Études sur l'Abbaye de Saint-Denis," Bibliothèque de l'École Chartes 82 (1921) 5–116; "Wandalbert de Prüm et la date de la mort d'Hilduin de Saint-Denis," ibid., 108 (1949–50) 5–35. R. J. LOENERTZ, "La Légende Parisienne de S. Denys l'Aréopagite," Analecta Bollandiana 69 (1951) 217–237. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 5:744–745. J. FLECKENSTEIN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:346.

[P. GLORIEUX]

HILL, RICHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. in Yorkshire, England; d. May 27, 1590, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Dryburn, Durham. He studied at Rheims (1587–89) and was ordained at Laon (1589) by Bp. Valentine Douglas, OSB. He traveled with BB. Edmund DUKE, John HOGG, and Richard Holiday to England, where they were soon arrested, arraigned, and condemned together. Two Protestants, Robert and Grace Maire, impressed with the courage of the martyrs, were converted. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves, 3 v. (London 1872–77), III, 40. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HILL, WILLIAM JOSEPH

Dominican theologian and editor; b. North Attleboro, Mass., March 30, 1924; d. Washington, D.C., Oct. 12, 2001. Hill was the oldest of seven children of William and Rita (Lanteigne) Hill. He entered the Order of Preachers (Dominicans) in 1943 and graduated from Providence College in 1945. After being ordained a priest in 1950, he was sent to Rome to study at the Angelicum, from which he received an S. T. D. in 1952. On returning to the United States he began teaching at the Dominican House of Studies in Washington, D.C. where he was professor of theology until 1971. The Dominican Order named him a Master of Theology (S. T. M.) in 1967. From 1971 to 1987 he was professor of systematic theology at the Catholic University of America, and from 1987 until his death, professor emeritus. His publications include five books and 44 articles. Hill also was known for his editorial work, serving as editor-in-chief of The Thomist for nine years (1975–1983), and on the editorial boards for The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Communio, and Listening. In 1979–80, he was president of the Catholic Theological Society of America (CTSA), which in 1983 awarded him the John Courtney Murray Award for Outstanding Achievement in Theology. From 1982–1985 he served on the bilateral consultations between Roman Catholics and officials of the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches.

Convinced that Thomism was a living tradition, Hill was best known for his original contributions to trinitarian theology and his creative retrieval of the insights of Thomas Aquinas in dialogue with contemporary culture and diverse theological perspectives. Of particular note are his work on analogy, his efforts to incorporate history and subjectivity into a contemporary theology of God, his original retrieval of an understanding of the Trinity as “Three-Personed God,” and his contributions to foundational theology and the theology of preaching. Even in his most speculative reflection on the mystery of inner-trinitarian relations, Hill stressed the salvific significance of doctrine. Likewise, Hill’s theology of preaching exemplified the kind of pastoral theology that brings serious and sustained systematic reflection to bear on the ministry of the Church. Referring to the theological task as a ministry of the Word, Hill described the vocation of the theologian in a homily he preached to his colleagues in the Catholic Theological Society of America as “the attempt to show who God will be for us and what human-kind must be for God” (“The Theologian: On Pilgrimage with Christ,” CTSA Proceedings 40 [1985] 230–232).

Bibliography: W. J. HILL, The Indwelling Trinity (Somerset, Ohio 1954); Theological Hope, v. 33 of the Blackfriars New English Summa theologiae (translation, critical notes, and commentary) (New York 1966); Knowing the Unknown God: An Essay in Theological Epistemology (New York 1971); The Three-Personed God: The Trinity as a Mystery of Salvation (Washington, D.C. 1982); Search for the Absent God: Tradition and Modernity in Religious Understanding (New York 1992).

[M. C. HILKERT]

HILTON, WALTER

Spiritual theologian and canon regular of St. Augustine; date and place of birth unknown; d. Thurgarton Priory, Nottinghamshire, England 1395. The day of his death was the vigil either of the Annunciation or of the Assumption. These facts are drawn from various colophons to the MSS of his works. Nothing further is known for certain of his life, though various reasonable conjectures can be made. Among the Latin works ascribed to him is a letter written to a friend, Adam Horsley, an official of the King’s Exchequer, who was seriously considering entering religion. In this letter, De utilitate et prerogativis religionis (The Advantages and Privileges of Religious Life), Hilton indicated that he was living as a solitary and implied that he himself would welcome the grace of vocation to the religious life; but meantime he must persevere in his solitary life. It has been suggested, with less likelihood, that the autobiographical references here and in another treatise, De imagine peccati (The Image of Sin), to the life of a recluse are merely metaphorical, since Hilton shortly afterward became a canon regular, thus adopting a less strict form of life. A much more probable conclusion is that Hilton was never officially enclosed as an anchorite or blessed as a hermit. The letter to Horsley appears to have been written between 1375 and 1380, and it is reasonable to conclude that he entered the priory at Thurgarton about this time or a little later. There is also evidence that Hilton studied Canon Law: a MS colophon gives him the title of commencer of decrees, which means that he took the degree but never taught the subject; and his letter to a lawyer, "To one wishing to renounce the world" (Ad quemdam saeculo renuntiare volentem), also suggests that he was a canonist.

Hilton's fame as a doctor of mystical theology and spiritual director of the first rank rests largely on one book, The Scale of Perfection, though all the other works ascribed to him, particularly The Goad of Love, which is a highly original adaptation into English of the Stimulus Amoris, and his Commentaries on Psalms 90 and 91, add to his reputation. The ancient claim that Hilton is also the author of The Cloud of Unknowing and the other works attributed to that author has never been substantiated; and though the possibility has never been completely excluded, such an attribution seems highly unlikely (see CLOUD OF UNKNOWING, THE).

The Scale is probably the most complete, lucid, and balanced treatise on the interior life that the late Middle Ages produced. It was highly prized in English Carthusian houses until the dissolution of the monasteries; it was translated into Latin by the Carmelite Thomas Fysshlake before 1400 and was printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1494; more than 90 MS copies of it are still extant, several in Continental libraries. Perhaps the most significant testimony to Hilton's high reputation as a master of the spiritual life is the fact that the legend that he was the author of the Imitation of Christ was so long in dying. It is in the Scale that he shows himself the complete master of the long spiritual tradition (christened by Cuthbert Butler, "western mysticism") whose great exponents are Augustine, Gregory, and Bernard. Hilton is equally at home with the Victorines, particularly Hugh and Richard, and with the Dionysians of the 13th and 14th centuries.

The Scale consists of two separate treatises: the first was originally addressed to an anchoress and has survived in two editions, the second of which contains the famous "Christocentric additions"; by their means Hilton detached himself from the tendency in the 14th century to a dangerous form of Dionysianism akin to pantheism. In the second treatise of the Scale Hilton firmly broke away from the medieval tradition that the perfection of the spiritual life can be attained only in the cloister. In this treatise and in his Letter on the Mixed Life, Hilton showed that the answer to the spiritual difficulties that times of change and violent unrest throw up is to adapt the Church's spiritual teaching to the life of the Christian in the world. He is perhaps the first person in the whole tradition of medieval western spirituality to see that the perfection of the Christian life is not to be restricted to any particular time or place or circumstance but must always be firmly linked to the fullness of charity. One single quotation from his very free adaptation of the Stimulus Amoris will serve to illustrate his preeminent qualities as theologian and spiritual director: "Many seek after Christ by withdrawing and fleeing from all men, in the belief that he cannot be found except in that way. But it is not so. If you would be a spouse of Jesus Christ and would find him whom your soul loves, I shall tell you where Jesus your spouse is, and where you can find him—in your sick brother who is lame or blind or afflicted with any other disease. Go to the hospital and find Christ there."

Bibliography: The Scale has gone through many eds. since 1494, without there being, as yet, a critical text. The best is still E. UNDERHILL, ed., Scale of Perfection (London 1923), though G. SITWELL'S ed. and tr. in the Orchard Ser. (Westminster, Md. 1953), based on Underhill and Wynkyn de Worde, is more immediately available and has a useful introd. D. JONES, ed., The Minor Works of Walter Hilton (London 1929), five shorter treatises, including The Mixed Life and the Commentaries on Psalms 90 and 91. C. KIRCHBERGER, ed., The Goad of Love (London 1952), an excellent edition. J. WALSH and E. COLLEDGE, eds., Of the Knowledge of Ourselves and of God (London 1961), extracts from the Scale and the Psalm commentaries (a Westminster Cathedral MS Florilegium). The Latin works are still unpub. Studies. J. M. RUSSEL-SMITH, "Walter Hilton and a Tract in Defence of the Veneration of Images," Dominican Studies 7 (1954) 180–214; see also her article on Hilton in Pre-Reformation English Spirituality, ed. J. WALSH (New York 1965). H. L. GARDINER, "Walter Hilton and the Mystical Tradition in England," Essays and Studies of the English Association 22 (1936) 103–127. E. COLLEDGE, ed., Mediaeval Mystics of England (New York 1961). D. KNOWLES, The English Mystical Tradition (New York 1961).

[J. WALSH]

HIMMEROD, ABBEY OF

Cistercian abbey in the Rhineland, Diocese of Trier; founded in 1134 by St. Bernard of Clairvaux, whose architect Achard designed the Romanesque basilica (after Clairvaux II); consecrated June 1, 1178 (see CLAIRVAUX, ABBEY OF). The abbey first flourished under Abbot Gisbert (1168–86), with more than 70 monks and conversi venerated as blessed in the Cistercian Menology. David of Himmerod is venerated by the universal Church.

Abbey of Himmerod.

Abbot Herman I (1188–96) founded the Abbey of HEISTERBACH in 1188, for which lands were acquired through clearing, gifts, and purchase.

In the 13th century the Abbey of Himmerod had 60 monks, 200 conversi, and 40 estates. The abbey's boats carried its wine from the Rhine and the Moselle as far as Holland. By 1455 the scriptorium had brought the library's holdings to 2,000 works. Today 145 extant MSS are known. Monks from Himmerod studied in Paris, Cologne, Erfurt, and Heidelberg, and conducted theological studies in the abbey. The change to a money economy, together with a decline in vocations, caused the abbey to lease its holdings in 1228. Himmerod flourished again under Abbot Robert Bootz (1685–1730), historian and friend of the sciences. Abbot Leopold Camp (1731–50) and the architect C. Kretschmar (d. 1768) built the baroque church, with a west façade of 129 feet. After the secularization of 1802, both cloister and church went to ruin. In 1919 the ruins were purchased by the Cistercians, who restored the abbey in 1922; the cloister was rebuilt (1925–27), as was the church (1952–59), according to the old dimensions. Today the abbey is a liturgical and retreat center.

Bibliography: C. WILKES, Die Zisterzienserabtei Himmerode im 12. und 13. Jahrhundert (Münster 1924). A. SCHNEIDER, Die Cistercienserabtei Himmerod im Spätmittelalter (Himmerod 1954); Himmerod 1178–1751–1960, Festgabe zur Kirchweihe (Himmerod 1960); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:366–367.

[A. SCHNEIDER]

HINAYANA

The name given to a branch of Buddhism primarily by its opponents. Between the first centuries B.C. and A.D., a new set of movements in Buddhism coalesced and came to refer to itself as the “Mahayana,” or “Greater Vehicle,” and designated its conservative opposition the “Hinayana,” or “Lesser Vehicle.” Thus, it should be clearly understood that this is a pejorative term that no Buddhist group ever adopted for itself.

The groups so labeled were found objectionable to the newly-arisen Mahayana on both moral and philosophical grounds. On the moral level, they were faulted for a lack of compassion for allegedly teaching that an individual's practice directly benefited only that individual, and that enlightened beings, or buddhas, simply escape the cycle of birth-and-death when their lives end. Mahayanists held that the merits gained from one's religious practice could be transferred to benefit others by an act of intention, and that to withhold such a transfer indicated a lack of concern for others. They also argued that a buddha, having perfected the virtue of compassion, would not simply abandon other suffering beings, but would remain in the world to assist them.

Philosophically, the Mahayanists objected to the "dharma" theory of earlier ontological works. The "dharms" posited within these systems were much like "atoms" in ancient Greek philosophy: they were indivisible, eternal units that combined and recombined endlessly to create phenomena, thus demonstrating that all things were in flux and so could not be grasped. However, the Mahayanists felt that even these dharms were not permanent and independent from their surrounding conditions, and so they promoted a philosophy of radical impermanence, stating that everything, even the dharms of their opponents, were "empty" of any claim to self-existence or independence.

In the past, western scholarship has uncritically accepted the label "Hinayana" as a way of describing the eighteen (or sometimes twenty) schools of early Buddhism, from the Sarvastivadins in the north to the Theravadins in the south. However, in recent times scholars have sought a less offensive designation. One alternative is to use the term "Theravadin," the name of the only surviving school of this group; another is to refer to it as "southern Buddhism" and to call Mahayana "northern Buddhism." All proposed solutions present problems, and so some scholars continue to use the term "Hinayana," at least when referring to the constructed, straw-man opponent of the Mahayanists.

See Also: BUDDHISM; MAHAYANA.

[C. B. JONES]

HINCMAR OF LAON

Bishop, d. 879. He was the focal point of a jurisdictional struggle among territorial bishop, metropolitan, king, and pope begun under Bp. Rothad of Soissons and his supporters. They based their opposition to the growing authority of the metropolitan bishop and to the alienation of CHURCH PROPERTY to laymen on the FALSE

DECRETALS and the firm support of Pope NICHOLAS I. Hincmar, orphaned at an early age, became the ward of his mother's brother HINCMAR, Archbishop of Reims, who secured his nephew's early appointment as bishop of Laon (858). A worldly and ambitious prelate, Hincmar of Laon soon showed himself an apt student of power politics. In 868 he began his series of challenges against the king's right to interfere in matters of church property. Seized in 869 by Charles the Bald, he retaliated by forbidding his priests to administer the Sacraments. This interdict, soon removed by the Metropolitan, Hincmar of Reims, led to a falling out of uncle and nephew that reached its climax at the Synod of ATTIGNY (870). Hincmar based his case on the sovereignty of the suffragan bishops and on the right of appeal to the pope (see ADRIAN II). The metropolitan's answer came in his Opusculum 55 capitulorum, which challenged the authenticity of some of the False Decretals. At the Synod of Douzy (871), Hincmar of Laon was deposed and sent into exile; he was subsequently blinded. At the Council of Troyes, seven years later, he was released by Pope JOHN VIII. A broken man, he died soon afterward.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 124:979–1072. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1826–) 3.2.1:416. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98); reprinted and continued by L. PETIT and J. B. MARTIN, 53 v. in 60 (Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960–) 16:572–864. H. SCHRÖRS, Hinkmar, Erzbischof von Reims: Sein Leben und seine Schriften (Freiburg 1884). E. L. DÜMLER, Geschichte des ostfränkischen Reiches, 3 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1887–88) v.2. H. NETZER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2486–87. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 6:403–411. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum, 5 v. (2d, rev. ed. Stuttgart 1950–53) 2:130–134. J. DEVISSÉ, Hincmar et la loi (Dakar 1962).

[R. B. PALMER]

HINCMAR OF REIMS

Archbishop (845–882), canonist, and theologian; b. probably northern France, c. 806; d. Épernay, Dec. 21, 882. He was educated at Saint-Denis, Paris, under Abbot HILDUIN, who in 822 introduced him at the court of LOUIS THE PIOUS. He shared Hilduin's exile at CORVEY (830–831), though he did not support the abbot against the emperor in 833. CHARLES THE BALD gave him the administration of abbeys at Compiègne and Saint-Germerde-Flay. Already a priest, he was chosen archbishop of Reims (April 845) at the Council of Beauvais and was consecrated by Wenilo of Sens on May 3, 845. Archbishop EBBO OF REIMS, his predecessor, had been deposed on March 4, 835, though for a time after Dec. 6, 840, he had reoccupied the see and had then ordained nine clerics. Sergius II reduced Ebbo to lay communion in June 844, but two years later Emperor LOTHAIR I secured from the pope a directive that a synod at Trier settle the issue of legitimacy between Hincmar and Ebbo. Ebbo refused to go to Trier and died unrestored to Reims in March 851. A council at Soissons on April 22, 853, declared for Hincmar's canonicity and ratified his suspension (June 845) of Ebbo's nine clerics. While LEO IV entertained an appeal from the clerics, succeeding popes gave qualified approval to Soissons. Upon Charles the Bald's decision to appoint Wulfad, one of Ebbo's clerics, to the See of Bourges, NICHOLAS I instructed Hincmar on April 3, 866, to withdraw the censure. Hincmar and a council at Soissons (August 866) declared themselves incompetent to reverse a sentence ratified by Rome, but in September the Crown obtained the installation of Wulfad.

On occasion, Hincmar was at odds with the papacy. On May 23, 851, Leo IV, who had granted him the PALLIUM in 847 and 851, decried Hincmar's treatment of the imperial vassal Fulkrich. When Bp. Rothad II of Soissons (c. 832–869) had been deposed by Hincmar and his colleagues, a long series of papal letters ended in Pope Nicholas's restoration of the prelate in January 865. The conflict between the archbishop and his nephew, Bp. HINCMAR OF LAON, occasioned a lengthy dossier and the younger man's deposition in 871. ADRIAN II declined to confirm the sentence until the case had been heard at Rome, but JOHN VIII ratified the judgment on Jan. 5, 876.

Hincmar's De divortio Lotharii (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 125:623–772) is a defense of a Christian wife against Lorraine's king, LOTHAIR II, and its episcopate, which in 860 had decreed the separation of the monarch from Queen Tetberga. Hincmar protested the installation of Lothair's creature, Hilduin, in the See of Cambrai late in 862; ultimately (July 866) he brought about the consecration of a canonical bishop, John. Over the opposition of the West Frankish kings Louis III (879–882) and Carloman (879–884) the archbishop was equally successful in securing legitimate prelates for Noyon in 879–880 and Beauvais in 882.

The Council of Mainz (October 848) condemned GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS for erroneous teaching on PREDESTINATION and handed him over to Hincmar, who, unable to obtain his recantation at Quiercy (849), imprisoned him at Hautvillers. In 849–850 the archbishop published his Ad reclusos et simplices, a refutation of the monk. However, a number of theologians, PRUDENTIUS OF TROYES, LUPUS OF FERRIÈRES, and FLORUS OF LYONS, attacked Hincmar's views and those of his ally, JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA. The Reims prelate assembled a council at Quiercy in April 853, which asserted but a single predestination to glory or judgment and affirmed that Christ had died on behalf of all. When interprovincial councils at Valence (855) and at Langres (859) and counter capitula by Prudentius in 856 (Patrologia Latina 125: 64–65) took issue with Hincmar, he composed a second treatise on predestination in 856–857 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 8, n.99) and a third in 859–860 (Patrologia Latina 125:55–474). The attempt by the Council of Thuzey (October 860) to reconcile the opposing theologies reflects a limited victory for the archbishop. He proved his loyalty to Charles the Bald in 858 and 875 against the machinations of King Louis the German (840–876); yet in June 876 he stoutly resisted Charles's project for obtaining a papal vicariate for Abp. Ansegis of Sens. Hincmar died in flight before Norse invaders.

The De jure metropolitanorum (Patrologia Latina 126:189–210) reveals Hincmar's concern for archiepiscopal authority. The question of his possible authorship of the Lex Salica has been diversely viewed by S. Stein [Speculum 22 (1947) 113–134, 395–418] and by J. M. Wallace-Hadrill [Tijdschrift voor rechtsgeschiedenis 21 (1953) 1–29]. More recently Devisse has argued that Hincmar mentioned the FALSE DECRETALS only after 875 and that he showed them scant respect. The archbishop's works fall into many categories: canonical (Opusculum LV capitulorum), pastoral (Capitula synodica), historical (Annales Bertiniani, 861–882; Vita s. Remigii), political (De ordine palatii; De institutione regia), dogmatic (De una et non trina deitate; the predestination opera), moral (De cavendis vitiis), and philosophical (De diversa animae ratione), along with some verse and letters, the latter of high interest.

Bibliography: Works. Opera omnia, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) v.125–126; projected ed. in Corpus Christianorum; De ordine palatii, ed. M. PROU (Paris 1884); Collectio de ecclesiis, ed. W. GUNDLACH in Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 10 (1889) 93–144; Ad reclusos et simplices, ed. W. GRUNDLACH in ibid. 258–309; Vita Remigii episcopi Remensis, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1826–) 3: 239–341; verse, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae (Berlin 1826–) 3.1:409–420; letters, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae (Berlin 1826–) v.8; Annales Bertiniani, 867–882 A.D., ed. R. RAU in Quellen zur karolingischen Reichsgeschichte 2 (Berlin 1958) 104–286. Literature. H. SCHRÖRS, Hincmar, Erzbischof von Reims (Freiburg 1884). É. LESNE, “H. et l'Empereur Lothaire,” Revue des questions historiques 78 (1905) 5–58. G. EHRENFORTH, “H. von Rheims und Ludwig III. von Westfranken,” Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 44 (1925) 65–98. F. ARNOLD, Das Diözesanrecht nach den Schriften H. s von Reims (Vienna 1935). F. M. CAREY, “The Scriptorium of Reims during the Archbishopric of H.,” Classical and Mediaeval Studies in Honor of Edward Kennard Rand, ed. L. W. JONES (New York 1938) 41–60. K. WEINZIERL, “Erzbischof H. von Reims als Verfechter des geltenden Rechts,” Episcopus: Festschrift Kardinal Faulhaber (Regensburg 1949) 136–163. M. ANDRIEU, “Le Sacre épiscopal d'après H. de Reims,” Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 48

(1953) 22–73. H. G. J. BECK, “Canonical Election to Suffragan Bishops According to H. of Rheims.” American Catholic Historical Review 43 (1957–58) 137–159; “The Selection of Bishops Suffragan to H. of Rheims, 845–882,” ibid. 45 (1959–60) 273–308. J. DEVISSE, Hincmar et la loi (Dakar 1962). E. S. DUCKETT, Carolingian Portraits: A Study in the Ninth Century (Ann Arbor 1962) 202–264.

[H. G. J. BECK]

HINDEMITH, PAUL

Leading contemporary composer and theorist; b. Hanau, Germany, Nov. 16, 1895; d. Frankfurt, Dec. 28, 1963. He learned to play violin as a child; and after attending a conservatory in Frankfurt, he became experienced as concertmaster, soloist, and quartet player, all fruitful for his composing career. From 1927 he taught composition at the Berliner Hochschule für Musik and in 1937 he published his influential Unterweisung im Tonsatz (translated by A. Mendel as The Craft of Musical Composition [New York 1941; rev. 1945]). In keeping with its principles he revised some of his own works, notably Das Marienleben (1923, 1948), a song cycle based on R. M. Rilke’s poetry. When his activities were curtailed by the Nazis, he moved to Switzerland in 1938 and in 1940 to the U.S., becoming a citizen in 1946. He taught at Yale University from 1940, then at the University of Zurich (1953–56). In later years he was attracted to Catholicism, and in 1963 he wrote a Mass for unaccompanied mixed choir. In 1962 he shared the Balzan Prize—one of his numerous honors—with Pope John XXIII. His prolific output includes music in almost every category. Best known are the symphonic Mathis der Maler (1934), derived from his opera inspired by Matthias GRÜNEWALD’s Isenheim altarpiece, and the parallel opera-into-symphony Die Harmonie der Welt (1951). His theories as well as his style constitute a rallying point for neoclassicists, although his interest in contrapuntal forms, German folk songs, and chant evoke the baroque or earlier periods. Strongly opposed to 12-tone composition, he recognized the force of tonality and assigned central importance to the major triad.

Bibliography: Paul Hindemith: Catalogue of Published Works and Recordings (Schott; London 1954; suppl. 1962). N. DEL MAR, “Paul Hindemith,” European Music in the Twentieth Century, ed. H. HARTOG (New York 1957). E. PREUSSNER, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 6:439–451. N. CAZDEN, “Hindemith and Nature,” Music Review 15 (1954) 288–306. M. BREIVIK, “Arnold Schönberg og Paul Hindemith: Individualister på funksjonalistisk grunn,” Svensk tidskrift för musikkforskning 78 (1996) 11–24. A. FORTE, “Paul Hindemith’s Contribution to Music Theory in the United States,” Journal of Music Theory 42 (1998) 1–14. P. HINDEMITH, Selected Letters of Paul Hindemith, ed. and tr. G. SKELTON (New Haven, Conn. 1995). M. KUBE, “Paul Hindemiths Jazz-Rezeption: Stationen einer Episode,” Musiktheorie, 10 (1995) 63–72. J. C. SANTORE, “Attitudes toward Sexuality and the Tonal Structure of Hindemith’s Sancta Susanna,” Opera Journal 30/2 (1997) 2–10. P. THALHEIMER, “Hindemith heute: Anmerkungen zur Aufführungspraxis seines Trios für Blockflöten,” Tibia: Magazin für Holzbläser 20 (1995) 586–593. M. VENUTI, “Morire per la bellezza: una metafora dell’artista moderno nel capolavoro di Paul Hindemith,” Rassegna Musicale Curci 52 (1999) 16–19.

Paul Hindemith. (Archive Photos)

[H. BRAUNLICH]

HINDERER, ROMAN

Missionary and cartographer; b. Reiningen, Alsace, Sept. 21, 1669; d. Changzhou, China, Aug. 26, 1744. He entered the Society of Jesus in Mainz, Sept. 29, 1686. His first task after his arrival in China in 1707 was to work with other Jesuits at the order of the Emperor Kangxi in a mapping expedition to several provinces. Afterward, the emperor wanted him at court because of his mathematical talents, but he was allowed to preach Christianity throughout the empire: Zhejiang, Jiangsu, Guangdong, Yunnan, and Shanxi. He was austere in his personal life and had a great devotion to the Sacred Heart, to which he attributed his apostolic success. He was visitor of the missions in China, Japan, and Tonkin in 1722 and 1730, difficult times for missions. He wrote works in Chinese on the Rosary and on the Mass.

Bibliography: L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques, 2 v. (Shanghai 1932–34). J. DEHERGNE, Catholicisme 5:752–753.

[B. LAHIFF]

HINDUISM

The word “Hindu” is derived from sindhu, the name that the Persians gave to the land watered by the Indus River. The inhabitants of this land were a pre-Aryan people, possibly related to the Dravidians of South India, who had developed a high civilization, akin to that of Mesopotamia, in the 3d millennium B.C., and of which the remains have been excavated at Mohenjo-Daro and Harappa in the Punjab. Toward the middle of the 2d millennium B.C., this civilization was overwhelmed by Aryan invaders from the North, who spoke Sanskrit. The invaders brought with them a new religion, of which the sacred books, written in Sanskrit, were known as the Vedas. In the course of time, the religion of the Aryan newcomers blending with the cults of the pre-Aryan population spread all over India and developed into what is known as Hinduism. Nothing in the nature of Hinduism determines a strictly logical approach to the study of it, but the present article will survey its sacred writings, schools of thought, religious teachers, popular religion, relation to the caste system, major reformers, and relation to Christianity.

It is important to note that the “Aryan invasion theory” is now being questioned by scholars. Many scholars have suggested that there is no archaeological evidence that the cities of Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro were destroyed by Aryan invaders. More significantly, archaeologists have discovered “Harappan sites” dating back to the same period in the Northwestern parts of India.

SACRED WRITINGS

They include the VEDAS with their different parts known as the Brāhmaṇas, the Āraṇyakas, and the UPANISHADS; dharmashāstras or collections of “remembered” traditions; and two major epics, the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata with its subsequently added Bhagavad Gītā.

Vedic Scriptures. Hindus speak of their religion as the “eternal religion” (sanātana dharma), asserting that the Vedas are the expression of eternal truth, made known to the “seers” (rishis) of ancient times. Veda means literally knowledge or wisdom, and the Vedas are said to be śruti (literally, “that which has been heard”) to signify that they came as revelation. The acceptance of this revelation is the test of Hindu “orthodoxy.” All systems of philosophy based on the Vedas, however much they may differ in their interpretation, are considered to be orthodox (āstika), while those that reject the authority of the Vedas, such as Buddhism and Jainism, are regarded as unorthodox (nāstika).

Originally the Vedas came down by word of mouth, and it is impossible to say exactly when they took their present shape. The earliest collection of hymns, known as the Rig Veda, was probably completed by 900 B.C. Later a collection of verses (mantras) from these hymns, arranged for chanting at the sacrifices, was added and known as the Sāma Veda. Another collection of prose formulas followed; it was used in the ritual of sacrifice and known as the Yajur Veda. Finally at a much later date a further compilation appeared, namely, the Atharva Veda, containing magic spells and incantations. To these original four books of the Vedas three additions were made between 900 and 500 B.C.: first the Brāhmaṇas, a kind of prose commentary explaining the symbolic significance of the rites; then the Āraṇyakas (or “forest-books”); and finally the Upanishads, in which a mystical commentary on the rites was developed into profound and original philosophical speculation. Each Veda eventually consisted of four parts: a hymn (mantra), a brāhmaṇa, an āraṇyaka, and an Upanishad, and these together form the corpus of sacred doctrine or śruti.

The hymns of the Rig Veda were addressed to gods who represented different powers of nature, such as Sūrya, the sun-god; Agni, the fire-god; Indra, the god of thunder; and Uṣas, the goddess of the dawn. They reflect a stage of religion not unlike that of the early Greeks, and many of them have a poetic character, which is reminiscent of the poems of Homer. Moreover, behind the lesser gods there is to be discerned the figure of a creator-god, who was known at first as Dyaus-pita (the equivalent of the Greek Zeus and the Latin Jupiter), but later his place was taken by Varuna, whom some have connected with the Greek Uranos. Varuna was a sky-god, who was worshiped as the sovereign Lord and guardian of the cosmic order (zita). Unlike that of the other gods his character was moral, and he officiated as the supreme judge who sees all and punishes the sinner. Although for a while his place was taken by Prajāpati, the “lord of creatures” and by Viṣvakarman, the “all-creator,” the image of the creator-god gradually disappeared in the course of time and retained no hold over the Hindu mind. The tendency of Hindu thought, present already in the Rig Veda, was rather to see all the gods as different forms or manifestations of one divine being. In the later hymns of the Rig Veda there are signs even of speculation on the nature of God and the universe. In one hymn, the Puruṣa Sūkta, the universe is said to have been formed by the sacrifice of Puruṣa, the primeval or cosmic Person, and to have been produced from the different parts of his body.

A Hindu Temple in Nandi, Viti Levu, Fiji. (©Jon Sparks/CORBIS)

During a Hindu wedding ceremony, the bride and groom circle a ceremonial fire three times to formalize their union, Mattan, Kashmir. (©Earl & Nazima Kowall/CORBIS)

The Brāhmaṇas. The center of the ancient Vedic religion was sacrifice. At public sacrifices animals were slaughtered and an intoxicating drink called soma was drunk, to obtain from the gods such favors as success in war, offspring, increase of cattle, and long life. Behind this lay a deeper conception than that of seeking favors. Every sacrifice was held to be a repetition of the primeval sacrifice by which the world was brought into being; the continuation of the world was believed to depend on the exactness of the performance of the ritual of sacrifice, a concept developed in that part of the Veda called the Brāhmaṇas. The sacrifice came to be conceived as having power in itself; even the gods were believed to be dependent on it. Thus the position of the priest, the Brahmin, who offered the sacrifice was of supreme importance. He alone knew the sacrificial words and actions, and he therefore was possessed of supreme power. As the sacrificing priest was known as the Brahmin, so the power that was held to be inherent in the sacrifice was known as the Brahman. The Brahman came to be regarded as the supreme power that sustains the universe. This idea, already present in the Brāhmaṇas, was developed in the Vedic writings called Āraṇyakas and in the Upanishads, and became the most fertile concept of Hindu philosophy.

The Āraṇyakas. Sacrifice lost its importance with the Āraṇyakas, which mark a new stage in the growth of the Vedas and in Hindu religion. They were the work of the “forest-dwellers,” ascetics who retired to the forest to meditate in silence on the mystery of the universe. For ritual sacrifice they substituted meditation and asceticism (tapas), developing the idea that the power in the sacrifice, the Brahman, was found in the spiritual sacrifice of the inner man. A new conception of the meaning and purpose of life began to take form with the introduction of the doctrine of transmigration, according to which the souls of all living things, plants and animals and human beings, even the gods, are subject to a perpetual cycle of rebirth (samsāra). The condition of a soul in the present life is rigorously conditioned by the actions of its past life (karma); by its good deeds the soul ascends in the scale of being, and by its evil deeds it descends; in either case there is no finality. Even the gods must die and be reborn, and though the performance of good works, especially the ritual of sacrifice, could lead to heaven, even heaven is not permanent. Against this background of belief arose the idea of liberation (moksa). Instead of the perpetuation of the round of rebirth by sacrifice, liberation from rebirth altogether, and deliverance not only from this world but also from the world of the gods with its promised blessings was sought. The goal to reach was the ultimate source of life, the Brahman.

The Upanishads. The word “upanishad” means literally to “sit near to,” and was used to signify secret doctrine containing the key to life, handed on from master to disciple. The earliest Upanishads, written in prose, were composed not later than the 6th century B.C. They were followed by others, many of them in verse, until eventually a collection of 108 was made. Of these, the original and fundamental texts numbered only 11. They contain all those profound ideas that were to germinate in the Indian soul and to inspire Hindu religion and philosophy down to the present day.

The teaching of the Upanishads is of a mystical nature. Although in Greek philosophy there is a mystical strain, the Greek genius had a bent for speculative thought; its achievement marks the triumph of human reason. The genius of India on the other hand is for mystical experience. The seers of the Upanishads were seeking not a speculative knowledge of truth attained by reason, but a knowledge that transcends reason, giving an intimate experience of ultimate truth. Their question was, “What is that which, being known, everything is known?” The answer was in the knowledge of the Brahman. Thus from being conceived as the power in the sacrifice that upholds the world, the Brahman had come to be regarded as the supreme power in the universe, to be known by meditation and asceticism. This knowledge of the Brahman was sought in the Upanishads, a knowledge of the ultimate being that is beyond this world and the world of the gods, beyond sense and reason, and that confers liberation (moksa) and bliss (ānanda).

The path of this progression of thought is traceable in India's search for the ultimate reality or ground of the universe, first, in the elements of earth, air, fire, and water; then in space (ākāśa), which embraces all matter. Then they turned to human nature, seeking its essence, the true Self (Ātman) in breath (prāna) or life or thought. Finally the discovery was made that the ultimate reality is beyond all these; it is "not this, not this" (neti, neti). It is a mystery beyond human understanding, which can be known only by direct intuition. Then the supreme discovery of the Upanishads was made. The ultimate ground of reality in nature (Brahman) is one with the ultimate ground of being in the soul (Ātman). The Brahman is the Ātman, or as it is said in one of the great sayings of the Upanishads, "Thou art That." When the ultimate reality is known, it is not by sense or reason but by the soul's direct intuition of itself. In this experience there is no more distinction of subject and object, no "duality."

The conception of the identity of the Brahman and the Ātman was essentially a mystical intuition, one that underlies all Hindu philosophy. The interpretation of it gave rise to many diverse schools of thought. The difficulty is that the Upanishads expressed profound intuitions that were not worked out logically; different systems could be derived from them. Their purpose was not to lead to systematic reasoning but to awaken the intuition of ultimate truth in the heart, and so to lead the hearer to final liberation. There appeared to be conflicting statements in the Upanishads: they declared that the Brahman is not only the source but also the substance of all being: "all this (world) is Brahman." It was said that just as the spider comes out with its thread or as small sparks come from the fire, so the world comes forth from Brahman. Or again, as all clay pots are the same clay and differ only in their forms, so all things in the universe are Brahman and differ only in their names and forms (nāmarūpa). Yet again it was said that the Brahman is not to be identified with anything in the universe; it is the "subtle essence" that is in all things but is distinct from them. It is like the soul in the body, the principle of being, life, and thought, yet apart from these.

What the seers of the Upanishads reached was an intuition of an absolute spiritual reality. The Brahman was the principle alike of being and of knowing. It was the plenitude of being, and when all the worlds came forth from it, it was not diminished. It was also the plenitude of knowing, not as that which is known but rather as that which knows. "Who," it was asked, "shall know the knower?" It could not be known by any method of human reason; it could be known only to him to whom it made itself known. As such it was the "controller," the "dweller-within," the inner Self (Ātman). It was that which was "dearer than all," for the sake of which all other things were to be desired, the bestower of joy and immortality. Thus in the later Upanishads, especially the Svetāśvatara (4.11; 6.7), the Brahman took a distinctly personal character. It was known as the Lord (īśā), the great Person (puruṣa), and was even given the name of Śiva (the gracious).

Because the Upanishads brought to an end the revelation (śruti) of the Vedas, they are known as Vedānta (literally, the "end" of the Veda). Although they contain profound insights into the mystery of being, they do not propound a system of thought. They leave unresolved the question of the relation between the personal and the impersonal character in the Brahman and the relation between the world and the Brahman. These questions therefore became the subject of subsequent debate, giving rise to the differing schools of the Vedānta. But in the meantime Hindu religion was to undergo a profound transformation. In the period following the Upanishads—between 500 B.C. and A.D. 500—their religion was gradually modified by the influence of the local cults. At the same time "unorthodox" doctrines of BUDDHISM and JAINISM became rivals of Hinduism, and it was only at the end of this period that Hinduism emerged as the religion of the greater part of India.

The Dharmaśāstras. The writings of this period were known as smṛti (literally "that which is remembered") or "tradition" as distinguished from śruti or "revelation." Among them were the law-books (dharmaśāstras), above all the laws of Manu, which laid down the basic principles on which Hindu society was to be governed. Society was divided into four castes, or more properly "classes" (varṇa, meaning literally "color"), from which the caste system later developed. The first three classes, the Brahmins (priests), kshatriyas (warriors), and vaishyas (merchants) were known as the "twice-born," because they alone could be initiated into the wisdom of the Vedas. The fourth class, the śūdras (workers), had no right to learning. Yet it was they who in the end were to transform the Hindu religion.

In the dharmaśāstras appeared also the division of an individual's life into four stages (āśramas). In the first, the student (brahmachārin) had to study the Vedas at the feet of a master and to observe chastity. The second stage was that of the householder (grhastha), who was to marry and bring up a family. The third phase was that of the "forest-dweller" (vānaprastha), which began when a man's hair began to turn grey. He was supposed to leave his home and his wife and go to live in the forest to meditate and do penance for the good of his soul. The last stage was that of the sannyāsi (literally “one who has renounced all”), when he was expected to break all attachments to the world and live as a wanderer begging his way. A great number neglected to put this ideal into practice, but all Hindu society recognized the ideal of complete detachment from the world for the sake of attaining liberation (moksa). The doctrines of the Āranyakas and the Upanishads had thus been incorporated into the framework of Hindu life.

Four ends of life. The same principle governed the four “ends” of life as they were formulated at this time. The first was pleasure (kāma) and the second wealth (artha), both frankly recognized as natural goods and meriting elaborate treatises; the third end was dharma, translated as “law,” the basic principle of order in human society. Every man was held to have his proper place with its rights and duties determined largely by his position in the framework of the four classes. The happiness both of the individual and of society was held to depend on the observance of dharma, and the whole of human society was held to be subject to divine law; human activity, economic, social, political, and religious, was given a divine sanction. It was this above everything that stamped a religious character on Hindu society. The fourth end of life was moksa, or liberation from this world. However important the place of worldly pleasure or wealth or worldly duty, the supreme end of life was liberation from this world and enjoyment of the supreme bliss of Brahman. The ideal of the Upanishads thus influenced the whole of Hindu life.

Epics. Of the same period as the dharmaśāstras and reflecting the same order of society were the two great Hindu epics (Itihāsas), the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata. The original poems were composed probably soon after 500 B.C., but both received numerous interpolations in the course of time and were not completed until the 4th century A.D. They hold a place in literature not unlike that of the Iliad and the Odyssey.

The Rāmāyaṇa. Written traditionally by the sage Vālmāki, the Rāmāyaṇa is the story of the prince Rāma, who was exiled in the forest with his wife Sītā; she was kidnaped by the demon king, Rāvaṇa. After many adventures, Rāma killed Rāvaṇa, rescued Sītā, and returned to reign in his kingdom. It is probable that Rāma was a historical person, who lived in the 7th or 8th century B.C. In the original story he was represented as a brave and noble king and Sītā, as a devoted wife. The whole story was impressed with the idea of dharma as the ruling principle of life and with moral idealism. In the later versions of the epic, Rāma was conceived as a divine being, an incarnation of the god Viṣṇu, and with this change the story was translated in later times into all the languages of India; the divine hero became the object of a universal cult. To this day Rāma remains one of the names of God to the devout Hindu, and his name was the last word uttered by Mahātmā Gāndhi.

The Mahābhārata. This epic, composed traditionally by Vyasa, is the story of a great battle between the Pāndavas and Kauravas, two families descended from Bharata, one of the ancient kings of North India. In the course of time the epic grew to vast proportions, through the addition of myths and legends, moral stories, fables, and long didactic discourses. In its present form it is said to be the longest poem in the world, consisting of 100,000 stanzas (ślokas), the whole being more than three times as long as the Bible. In this form it was a kind of encyclopedia of early Hinduism, reflecting the profound changes of the period. The ancient gods of the Vedas had faded into insignificance and two gods, Viṣṇu and Śiva, who had been obscure in ancient times, became the principal objects of worship. Not only the object but also the manner of worship had changed. Instead of the ancient Vedic sacrifices of slaughtered animals, offerings of fruit and flowers were made to the images of the temple gods, possibly because of the influences of Buddhism and Jainism. From this time, too, the ideal of never taking life (ahiṃsā) became a ruling principle of Hinduism. But the most notable change was that the worship of the gods began to take a more personal form.

The Bhagavad Gītā. In the later Upanishads, the Brahman conceived in a personal form had been worshiped under the name of Śiva. Now in the Bhagavad Gītā (“the Song of the Lord”), which was added to the Mahābhārata perhaps around the 2d century B.C., this devotion to a personal God was raised to a high level. The Supreme Being, the Brahman, was represented as Bhagavān, the Lord, to be worshiped not by sacrifices but by personal love and devotion (bhakti). He was conceived under the name of Viṣṇu, who became incarnate, or more exactly “descended” in the form of an avatāra, to deliver the world from unrighteousness (adharma) and restore righteousness (dharma). In the original story of the Mahābhārata, Krishna like Rāma was an epic hero, but by the time the Gītā was added he, like Rāma, had come to be regarded as an incarnation of Viṣṇu. Krishna in the Bhagavad Gītā, was represented as the Supreme Being (parabrahma) governing the universe; he was beyond all human conception, and at the same time the Supreme Self (parātman) dwelling in the heart of every man and manifesting himself by his grace (prasāda) to those who devoted themselves to him. Thus the Brahman of the Upanishads was transformed into a supreme personal god. Yet just as in the Upanishads there was no clear disinction made between the creator and the creature, so in the Gītā, Krishna was never clearly distinguished from nature and the souls in which he dwelt. This was the problem that was to occupy different schools of the Vedānta in their interpretation of both the Upanishads and the Gītā.

The Bhagavad Gītā became the most popular of all the sacred writings of Hinduism not only for its beautiful conception of a personal god, but also for its ethical teaching. The great lesson of the Gītā was that the knowledge of the Brahman, which had been the goal of the Upanishads, was to be reached not merely by the ascetic who renounced the world but also by the householder living in the world. It was to be attained by action (karma) no less than by meditation. Every action in accord with dharma, that is with a man's state in life, could become a means of salvation, if it was done with "detachment" and its "fruit" was renounced. Every action could become a true sacrifice, if it was offered to God in a spirit of devotion (bhakti) and thus became a means of union with God. Thus the Gītā marked a further stage on the path of ascent to the Brahman; the goal was to be attained not merely by sacrifice (yajña) as in the Vedas, or by knowledge (jñāna) as in the Upanishads, but by love (bhakti). It was the conception of love (bhakti) that was to work so wonderful a transformation in Hindu religion and to lead to its greatest achievements.

SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT

The metaphysical doctrine of the Bhagavad Gītā was based on the Sāṅkhya, which was one of the schools (darśanas) of philosophy that arose during the period when the Mahābhārata and the dharmaśāstras were being composed. Darśana means literally "point of view," and the six darśanas were not systems of philosophy so much as different points of view within orthodox Hindu doctrine.

Nyāya. The first school, Nyāya (analysis), was a system of logical realism which, although it was similar to that of Aristotle, was quite independent of it. Nyāya maintained the existence of an external world independent of the mind and sought to establish this view by logical reasoning. It never gained popularity, but the study of logic came to be regarded as a discipline for the study of philosophy and by a characteristically Indian turn of thought as a means of salvation, the end of all philosophy.

Vaiśeṣika. The second school, Vaiśeṣika (individual characteristics), was a system of philosophy based on atomism; it taught that the universe consists of five elements—earth, air, fire, water, and space (ākāśa)—each of which is composed of a number of atoms. The influence of these theories was slight, their principal interest being the remarkable fact that they had a place in Hindu thought.

Sāṅkhya. More characteristic and more influential was the Sāṅkhya (the "school of the Count"), the basis of the doctrine of the Bhagavad Gītā, tracing its origin probably to the time of the Upanishads. It was a metaphysical doctrine that the universe was derived from two principles called Purusha and Prakṛti. Purusha, which may be translated Spirit, was the principle of Being, corresponding in some ways with Aristotle's "form" or essence. Prakṛti was the principle of Becoming, corresponding to Aristotle's "matter" or, more generally, "substance." From these two principles all the elements in human nature and the natural world were derived. What was peculiar to the Sāṅkhya was the doctrine that all activity came not from Purusha but from Prakṛti. The universe evolved from Prakṛti, while Purusha remained above all action in a state of pure consciousness. In man Purusha became identified with Prakṛti through ignorance, although in itself eternal and unchanging. The ultimate state of man as pure spirit was considered to transcend this world altogether.

Yoga. Sāṅkhya formed the basis of the fourth school of philosophy known as YOGA. Yoga was a system of practical philosophy, whose purpose was to teach the way to separate Purusha from Prakṛti and so to attain liberation (mokṣa). In a sense, it may be said that this was the goal of all the different schools, since the ultimate end of all life and thought was to attain liberation, but Yoga was distinguished by concern with practical method. The word "Yoga," akin to the English "yoke," meant a discipline or method of union. The principles of Yoga were known to the writers of the Upanishads and were probably older, but the classical school of Yoga originated in the Yoga sūtras or sayings of Patañjali, around A.D. 500. It was a system of physical and spiritual discipline by which the mind was set free from all bodily and mental states dependent upon matter (Prakṛti) and realized its nature as a pure spirit (Purusha). One respect in which the Yoga philosophy differed from the Sāṅkhya was that it recognized the existence of a god (Iśvara) who was conceived as a pure spirit, who was able to assist souls on the path of liberation. Yoga was to have an incalculable influence on all Hindu life and thought and to develop many different schools that continue even to the present day.

Pūrva Mīmāṃsā, Uttara Mīmāṃsā. The other two schools of philosophy, called Mīmāṃsā, were concerned exclusively with the interpretation of the Vedas. The first, called Pūrva Mīmāṃsā, was based on the Brāhmanās and dealt with the laws of sacrifice and the duties of religion (dharma). It endeavored by rational argument to es-establish the validity of the Vedas as an eternal revelation, which was valid in itself and was the supreme authority in matters of religion. The second school, Uttara Mīmāṃsā, was what became generally known as the Vedānta; for the term Vedānta, “end of the Vedas,” applied originally to the Upanishads themselves, was later to be used for philosophical systems based on them. Uttara Mīmāṃsā was concerned with the interpretation of the Vedas not as a way of action (karma) but of knowledge (jñāna), and was based on the Upanishads. The basic text was the Brahma-sūtras of Bādarāyaṇa, written early in the Christian Era. It consisted of short aphorisms, summarizing the doctrine of the Upanishads on the subject of the Brahman. This together with the Upanishads themselves and the Bhagavad Gītā formed the “triple foundation” of the Vedānta, and the principal works of the doctors of the Vedānta consisted in commentaries on these texts.

RELIGIOUS TEACHERS

In the interpretation of the Upanishads, religious teachers (usually Brahmins) formed systems of thought that represented stages of the development of Hinduism within the orthodox framework of the Vedānta.

Śaṅkara. Śaṅkara (b. Kaladi, Malabar, Kerala, 8th century A.D.) was the great master of the Vedānta. In his time Buddhism, Jainism, and other “unorthodox” systems of philosophy were flourishing, but through him Hindu “orthodoxy” was firmly established as the religion of the greater part of India. Śaṅkara himself was a disciple of Gaudapāda, whose commentary on the Māndūkya Upanishad bears clear traces of Buddhist influence. Thus one of the reasons for the triumph of Hinduism over Buddhism may well have been its ability to incorporate the basic insights of Buddhist philosophy into its own system. Śaṅkara himself regarded the Vedas as a revelation of absolute truth and the sole source of that supreme knowledge, which brings liberation. However, in his interpretation of the Vedas he introduced a distinction between the different kinds of knowledge to be found in them. He regarded the knowledge of ritual action (karma) found in the Pūrva Mīmāṃsā to be of no value for liberation, any more than knowledge in the Vedas, which was derived from ordinary human experience. The supreme knowledge (parāvidyā) to be found in the Vedas was contained rather in certain “great sayings” (mahāvākya), which revealed the true nature of the Brahman. In comparison with this knowledge, all other knowledge was to be classed as ignorance (avidyā).

The doctrine which Śaṅkara upheld was called Advaita (nonduality) because it affirmed that the Brahman was one, “without a second.” Its nature was pure Being (sat), pure knowledge (chit), and pure bliss (ānanda), and this one absolute Being was identical with the Self, the Ātman. The true knowledge of the Brahman could not be attained by any method of reasoning, but only by a direct intuition (anubhava), in which the soul knew itself in its identity with the Brahman. It followed that all distinctions of being, as they appeared to the rational mind, based on the evidence of the senses were an illusion (māyā). They were like the figures of a dream or like the forms conjured up by a magician. It was, to use his famous illustration, as when a rope was mistaken for a snake: the form of the snake was “superimposed” on that of the rope; when the “superimposition” was removed, it was seen that there was nothing but a rope. So it was that all the different forms of being were superimposed on the pure being of the Brahman. True knowledge was simply the knowledge of the Brahman. All the revelation of the Vedas and all the reasoning based upon it had no other purpose than to lead the soul to this supreme knowledge, which was also supreme bliss. Such a state of perfect knowledge and bliss was liberation (moksa). It was a liberation from the illusion (māyā) of this world and an experience of real being in pure consciousness.

Thus the doctrine of Śaṅkara, like that of the Upanishads, was based on a mystical experience, but it was distinguished by the rigorous logic by which he refuted every argument that could be used against it; his teaching succeeded in unifying the whole body of Hindu doctrine in the light of this central intuition. Śaṅkara did not deny the validity of reason and sense experience in their own spheres; on the contrary, he firmly upheld against the Buddhists a realistic view of nature. Nor did he ever suggest that the soul (jīva), which was a relative being, was divine. But he maintained that from the point of view of the absolute, all such knowledge and all such distinctions were illusory. Thus he used reason with a rigorous logic as far as it would go, but he maintained the possibility of a knowledge transcending reason, revealed in the Vedas and apprehended by mystical intuition.

There were many who opposed Śaṅkara’s view, even though he had succeeded in giving a coherent form to Hindu doctrine. The debate turned especially on the relation of the personal god, as revealed in the Bhagavad Gītā, to the Brahman. According to Śaṅkara, the idea of a personal god with attributes or qualities (saguna), though it could be helpful to the believer on the way to truth, was itself a product of ignorance (avidyā). It belonged to the sphere of māyā and had to be transcended, if the soul was to reach the supreme knowledge of the Brahman without attributes (nirguna).

Rāmānuja. In this matter Śaṅkara was opposed by Rāmānuja, a Tamil Brahmin (b. near Madras, 11th century A.D.; d. at the famous temple of Sri Rangam near Tricinopoli, 1137). His doctrine was known as Viśiṣṭāvaita or “qualified” Advaita to distinguish it from the pure Advaita of Śāṅkara. Rāmānuja was a Vedantin who, like Śāṅkara, claimed to interpret the true meaning of the Vedas and on the authority of the same texts of the Brahma-sūtras and the Bhagavad Gītā. But his doctrine was influenced also by another current of religious thought in which the Supreme Being was worshiped under the name of Viṣṇu Nārāyaṇa or Vāsudeva, later identified with Krishna as Bhagavān or Lord. The followers of Rāmānuja’s sect were known as Bhāgavatas, and their doctrine developed in a school known as Pāñcarātra, one of the sources of Rāmānuja’s theology. The Bhagavad Gītā itself was an early expression of the doctrine, but it was in the Tamil country (Madras State) in the period between A.D. 500 and 1000 that the great flowering of devotion to a personal god took shape in the hymns of the Ālvārs, the poet-saints of South India.

Inspired by this school, Rāmānuja contended that the Supreme Being, the Brahman, had essentially a personal character and a personal relationship to his worshipers. In opposition to Śāṅkara, he maintained that the way of knowledge (jñāna-mārga) was inferior to the way of devotion (bhakti-mārga) and that in the highest state of bliss the individual soul was united with God but never wholly identified with Him. Further, while Śāṅkara had taught that the knowledge of the Brahman depended on the soul itself, which had only to realize its essential identity with the Brahman, Rāmānuja contended that the soul was assisted in its ascent to God by divine grace (prasāda).

Rāmānuja asserted the personal nature of the Brahman and the real distinction between God and nature (Prakṛti) and souls (Ātman). He maintained that the nature of the Brahman is “qualified.” It is not the absolutely simple being that Śāṅkara had conceived, but a being with many different attributes. Rāmānuja supported this view by maintaining that as a substance and its attributes are essentially one yet different, so the Brahman was essentially one but had different attributes. Nature and souls he considered to be “modes” of the divine being, which stood to them in the relation of the soul to the body. Thus nature and souls were essentially divine and had lost the knowledge of their true nature due to ignorance. The work of divine grace was to restore them to the knowledge of their true nature and to unite them with God in the love of total self-surrender (prapatti). In this state, souls were one with the divine being but did not lose their individual self-consciousness.

Madhva. A third school of Vedānta, known as dvaita (duality), arose in opposition to both Śāṅkara and Rāmānuja. Its founder was Madhva (b. South Canara, Kerala, 12th century A.D.). Against all forms of Advaita he maintained the real diversity of being. “Diverse are all the things of the world and they possess diverse attributes.” Above all he conceived of God as Viṣṇu-Nārāyaṇa, a personal being, possessed of an infinite number of qualities, a being absolutely transcendent, the supreme cause of all things and eternally distinct from them. God alone has being in Himself; all other beings are dependent on Him. Whether the world depends on God for its existence does not seem to be clear, for Madhva held that nature or matter (Prakṛti) is eternal like God; but in all other respects he maintained that nature and souls depend entirely on God. The beatitude of the soul when it attains liberation consists precisely in realizing its entire dependence on God for its being, its knowledge, and its activity. Further, the liberation of the soul depends on the grace of God, first by His revealing Himself in the Vedas and then by His giving it a teacher (guru) to instruct it in the knowledge of the Vedas; finally in giving it an interior light. There were several features in the doctrine of Madhva and in the stories told about him, suggesting that he might have been influenced by Christian doctrine. This is not certain, however.

Nimbārka. A new doctrine, called dvaitādvaita, which held that the Brahman is both different and not different (bhedābheda) from the world, was introduced by Nimbārka (13th century?). His illustration was that of a clay pot, which is both different and not different from the clay of which it is made; again, that of the waves of the sea, which are both different and not different from the sea. In other words, Brahman and the world are essentially the same, differing only accidentally.

Vallabha. A fifth innovator in the interpretation of the Vedānta, Vallabha (1473–1531), went further than Nimbārka and declared that Brahman and the world are identical and not different in anything. He called his doctrine suddhādvaita or pure nonduality, but he stood at the opposite pole to Śāṅkara. Whereas Śāṅkara, to maintain the absolute “nonduality” of the Brahman, had maintained that the world was émāyā and had no real being, Vallabha held that the world is no less real than the Brahman and is simply a manifestation of the Brahman. The Brahman is being, knowledge, and bliss. In the world he reveals his being but hides his knowledge and bliss. In souls he reveals his being and knowledge and hides his bliss. Only in his own form, identified with that of Krishna, does he reveal his perfect being, knowledge and bliss.

One of the most remarkable elements in the doctrine of Vallabha was his conception of divine grace. With the growth of devotion (bhakti) to a personal god the idea of divine grace (anugraha) had steadily developed. The idea had its origin in the Upanishads in a famous text where it is said that “Self” (Ātman) cannot be attained by the Vedas, or by intelligence or by much learning; by him it is attained whom it chooses” (Katha Up. 1.2.23). Although it was characteristic of Śaṅkara to translate this passage differently, since he rejected the doctrine of grace, it was eagerly accepted by those who worshiped a personal god. By Rāmānuja the worship of God was conceived of rather as the devotion of a servant to his Lord, and divine grace was conceived of as an act of condescension. But with the growth of popular devotion in later times, devotion came to be conceived more and more in terms of love (prema). The attitude of the devotee was that of total surrender (prapatti) in love. With this grew the idea that love itself is a gift of God. There were two schools of thought on the subject, the schools of “Monkey-Logic” and “Cat-Logic,” which were developed respectively by Vadakalai (“Northern”) and Tentakalai (“Southern”) Vaisnavism in the Tamil regions of South India. According to the first school, the soul has to cooperate with divine grace, as the young monkey clings to its mother; but according to the other, grace is wholly an act of God as a cat carries its young.

Vallabha described divine grace as pushti, a state in which the soul feels itself to be absolutely helpless and abandons itself entirely to God. God is to be loved for His own sake, and the soul itself and the world for the sake of God. The union with God, which is sought, is one in which the soul participates in the very being and knowledge and bliss of God and loves with God’s own love. Yet the soul is held to be essentially divine; it does not receive a new nature from God, but it discovers the reality of its own nature.

POPULAR RELIGION

While this great doctrinal synthesis was being built on the Vedānta, Hindu religion had undergone a profound transformation. The Vedic tradition continued to be preserved by the Brahmins, but popular religion introduced new elements into it. It is to be noticed that all the great doctors of the Vedānta came from South India, and to them is due also the fusion of the Vedic tradition with the popular religion. Popular religion found expression in a new literature, and in the worship of numerous deities.

Legends and manuals. Popular religion was represented in legends, especially those of the Purāṇas; and in manuals of doctrine and ritual, known as Āgamas, which were concerned especially with the cult of Viṣṇu, Śiva, and Śakti.

Purāṇas were the most important books of the new literature. These were collections of the myths and stories of the gods of popular devotion, confined not to the upper classes alone, but spread among people of all castes. The most notable of the Purāṇas were the Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata Purāṇas, telling the story of the avatāras or incarnations of Viṣṇu. An indication of the importance of this story was its inclusion by the later teachers of the Vedānta, such as Madhva, Nimbārka, and Vallabha, with the Upanishads, the Brahma-sūtras, and the Bhagavad Gītā as one of the bases of their philosophy.

The Āgamas were manuals not only of doctrine but especially of ritual regulating the worship of the different sects. Although the Brahman was universally recognized as one, eternal, absolute being, whose nature is Being, knowledge, and bliss (saccidānanda), nevertheless Brahman was thought to be manifested in three forms (trimūrti), Brahmā (in the masculine as distinguished from the neuter Brahman), Viṣṇu, and Śiva.

Brahmā. Brahmā was the form of the creator, Viṣṇu the form of the preserver, and Śiva that of the destroyer of the universe. In practice however, scarcely any worship was given to Brahmā; Viṣṇu and Śiva each came to be regarded as the supreme God, who is at once creator, preserver, and destroyer of the world. The followers of Viṣṇu were known as Vaisnavites, and those of Śiva, as Shaivites. Each sect had its own Āgamas, on which were based its doctrine and worship.

Viṣṇu. He was a solar deity of little importance in the Vedas, who came to be identified with Vāsudeva, and also with Nārāyaṇa, a cosmic deity of uncertain origin. As such, he was represented as sleeping in the primeval ocean on the thousand-headed serpent (Seṣa), while Brahmā, the world-creator was born of a lotus coming from his navel. This was an interesting reversal of the role of Brahmā, who was originally conceived as the supreme creator, not subject to Viṣṇu.

Viṣṇu, by his “descent” in different forms to save the world, had become incarnate. The first six incarnations, in the forms of a fish, a tortoise, a boar, a man-lion, a dwarf, and the hero Paraśurāma, were purely mythological and had little religious importance. But the incarnation of Viṣṇu as Rāma and Krishna, the heroes of the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata, had a profound influence on Hindu religion.

Rāma. The cult of Rāma was comparatively late in developing. From the early Middle Ages, Rāma was represented in literature as an incarnation of Viṣṇu, but it was not until the 11th century that a cult seems to have developed. From this time, Rāma began to be represented not merely as an incarnation of Viṣṇu but as himself the supreme god. His cult was carried from South to North India in the 14th century by Ramananda, a disciple of Rāmānuja. It inspired some of the greatest religious poetry of India. One of his disciples was Kabīr (1440–1518), whose poems were later translated by Rabīndranāth Tagore. There is evidence in his work of Muslim influence on Hinduism, a more exalted conception of the transcendence of God, and a greater universality. But the poet who more than anyone else was responsible for the spread of devotion to Rāma was Tulsī Das (1532–1623), whose version of the Rāmāyaṇa, written in Hindi, is regarded as one of the great masterpieces of religious literature. The cult of Rāma was organized in the 17th century by Rāmdās (1608–81), who established many temples and monasteries (maṭhs), besides writing poetry. A contemporary of Rāmdās, Tukārām (1608–49), contributed some of the most moving poems to this cult. On the whole, the cult of Rāma was remarkable for its moral purity, in which it often compares favorably with that of Krishna.

Krishna. The cult of Krishna, although it began with the Bhagavad Gītā, reached its culmination in the Bhāgavata Purāṇa (10th century A.D.), one of the most popular works of Hindu piety, placed by later writers on a level with the Vedas. It tells the story of Krishna's infancy, which was full of miraculous incidents and many charming stories that endeared him to the people as the child-god. But of even greater importance was the story of Krishna as a young cowherd (gopā), who won the love of all the milkmaids (gopīs). Drawing wives from their husbands, he danced with them to the music of his flute in the moonlight. The story was intended to have a mystical significance and as such it was interpreted by all the great poets and philosophers of the cult. It represented the love of God, which draws men to forsake home and family and to surrender themselves to the joy of loving God. The extreme emotionalism of this cult often led to abuse. In later times Krishna, like Rāma, came to be regarded not so much as an incarnation of Viṣṇu, as the very person of God. Just as Viṣṇu was represented with his consort, the goddess Laksmī, so Krishna was worshiped with his consort Rādhā, the favorite among the gopīs, and the model of total surrender to the love of God. The conception was found in Niṣṭhārka and in Vallabha, but it reached its highest expression in the doctrine of Caitanya (1485–1553), a contemporary of Vallabha from Bengal, where the cult has continued to the present day in the emotional form which he gave to it, accompanied by singing and dancing.

Other Incarnations of Viṣṇu. These were ten in number and of a different nature from incarnations as Rāma and Krishna. The first was his incarnation in the form of the Buddha. This was added late in the Middle Ages in the spirit of "comprehension" so typical of Hinduism. It marks the fact that Buddhism had ceased to be a rival of Hinduism in India, and its great founder could now be safely introduced into the Hindu pantheon, but the cult of the Buddha never attained popularity. The last incarnation is to be that of Kalki, the avatāra of the end of time, when Viṣṇu will appear riding on a white horse with a flaming sword in his hand to destroy the wicked and restore the age of gold.

Śiva. The other great god of Hinduism was Śiva, often known as Maheśvara, the "great god." While Viṣṇu was a god of the ocean and the sky of wholly beneficent aspect, Śiva was originally a non-Vedic god later identified with Rudra, the Vedic god of mountain and storm. Śiva had his dark side in which he was represented as the "destroyer" of the world, wearing a garland of skulls and haunting the burning grounds of corpses; but he was also an ascetic (mahāyogi), living in solitude on Mt. Kailasa, holding the world in being by the power of his asceticism (tapas). He was represented with the "third eye," the sign of supreme wisdom, with matted locks, his body smeared with ashes—like his devotees today—and with snakes, of which he was Lord, encircling his neck and arms. But while in one aspect he was the Yogi, wrapped in meditation, in another he was lord of the Dance (nātarāja), who held the world in being in the cosmic dance and would finally bring it to an end.

This strange and rather fierce deity, with his ambivalent nature and marks of many different origins, captured the imagination of India and was gradually transformed into a god of supreme beauty with dominant characteristics of grace and love. As the dance of Krishna with the gopīs became a symbol of divine love, so the linga of Śiva, a cylindrical pillar with a rounded top, seen in countless temples all over India, became a symbol of the pure godhead "without form" and the creative source of life. In South India in the Tamil country the cult of Śiva developed its most beautiful features. While, in the Middle Ages between the 5th and 10th century, the Ālvārs were celebrating Viṣṇu in their poetry, a school of Shāivite poets arose called the Nāyāṇars; of these the most famous was Māṇikka Vāchakar, one of the greatest religious poets of all time. He celebrated Śiva as a god of pure love, who yet punishes the sinner to teach him to mend his ways. Thus the worship of Śiva developed a pure moral character; the god was seen as the Lord of all, full of compassion and mercy, bestowing his grace on the sinner and drawing him by his love.

The cult also developed its own distinctive theology called the Shāiva Siddhānta. Though it recognized the authority of the Vedas, it had its own distinctive scriptures that took the form of Āgamas. Śiva was represented as the supreme God, who was being, knowledge, and bliss, as in the Vedānta. But the Shāiva Siddhānta introduced another principle, the Śakti or power of Śiva, by which he brought the world into being. By this means, the pure transcendence of Śiva as lord (pati) was preserved, and matter (paśa) and the soul (pāśu) were held to be really distinct from him. The soul was liberated from the bonds of matter by the grace of Śiva and in its final state enjoyed not absorption but self-realization in the perfect bliss of Śiva. There were other forms of Śivism, notably Kāshmīra Śivism, said to have been introduced into Kashmir in the 9th century A.D., and Vīra Śivism, introduced by Basava into Kannada (Mysore State) in the 12th century A.D. Basava's followers were called Liṅgāyats, from their custom of wearing the liṅga on their person. But neither of these cults had a distinctive doctrine.

The Śakti of Śiva. In the course of time, the Śakti of Śiva, conceived as a feminine principle, became the object of a separate cult originating probably in the worship of the Mother Goddess, according to the evidence furnished by the prehistoric culture of Harappā and Mohenjo-Daro. It was not until the Middle Ages that it appeared in orthodox Hinduism. From the 4th century onward, the mother goddess made an appearance as consort of the great gods. Thus Brahmā was represented with his consort Sarasvatī, the goddess of wisdom; Viṣṇu with Lakṣmī, the goddess of wealth; and Śiva with Pārvatī, daughter of the Himalaya Mountain. The consort of Śiva was also known as Durgā or KĀLĪ, and in this form she received worship in a special cult as Śakti. The peculiarity of the Śakti doctrine was that Śiva, who was pure being and pure consciousness, was regarded as wholly transcendent and inactive; all the activity of the world came from the power of his Śakti. Thus, Śakti was the moving principle of the universe, the source of all life and energy. She was the womb of nature, the Mother of all creation. Ultimately indeed, she was regarded as one with the supreme principle of Being, the source of the life not only of nature but also of the gods.

As Mother Nature, Śakti had two aspects, one fierce and terrible, representing the destructive aspect of nature, the other gentle and loving, the source of joy and liberation. The doctrine and worship of the Śakti cult was based on scriptures known as the Tantras (see TANTRISM). Through these writings, the tradition of the old fertility cults entered Hinduism. Since some of these rites involved orgiastic practices, the breaking of all taboos, the reputation of the cult suffered as a whole. But essentially the cult was based on the recognition of the divine power inherent in matter and the processes of nature, on the sacramental value of the body and its powers to lead the soul on the path of liberation. Its most characteristic doctrine was that of Kundalinī Yoga. According to this doctrine Śakti, the divine energy, lies coiled up like a serpent at the base of the spine in the form of Kundalinī. The purpose of this Yoga is to lead the Śakti through the different centers of consciousness (chakras) in the body, from the base of the spine to the top of the head, until Śakti unites with Śiva or pure consciousness and attains to the perfect bliss of liberation.

Worship. In addition to the great gods of Hinduism, there were innumerable lesser deities; indeed it is said in the Purāṇas that there are 333 million deities in the Hindu pantheon. These include local gods and goddesses, spirits and demigods of all kinds. India never lost the primitive sense of the "sacred," of a divine mystery present in the world of nature. Hills and mountains, rivers and streams, plants and animals, have a sacred character and may be worshiped as manifestations of the divine being. Persons of all kinds, parents and teachers, husband and wife, above all the guru, the spiritual teacher, may be worshiped as God, because they are invested with divine authority. This gives a special character to the worship of the gods. It would not be correct to describe it simply as polytheism, in spite of the multitude of gods, since each god or goddess is regarded as but a "form" or manifestation of the one Universal Being. The danger of polytheism, even among the simple people in the villages, is less evident than the sense of the divine as one infinite power extending everywhere.

Temples. From the time of the Middle Ages when the Vedic sacrifice (yajña) lost its importance, worship (pūjā) has been offered to the gods in temples. The temple itself is a mark of the later popular religion. Worship is offered by the placing of fruit and flowers before an image of the god set in a shrine (mūlasthānam) around which the temple is built. The Hindu temple is not a place of congregational worship; it is essentially the shrine of a deity, and offerings are made by the priest (pūjarī) for individuals or small family groups. The great Hindu temples have a multitude of such shrines, where different gods are worshiped, but the temple centers on the principal shrine. This is usually dark and low, representing the hidden dwelling place of the divine mystery at the heart of the universe, of which the temple is an image.

An image that is worshiped is consecrated by a special ceremony, and after its consecration it is believed that the god is really present in it. It is treated as a living being, awakened from sleep in the morning, washed and dressed and arrayed with garlands of flowers; lamps are waved before it, and it is given food to eat, the "essence" being taken by the god and the material part being given to the worshipers or distributed to the poor. This worship of idols is one of the principal elements in Hindu religion; yet it would be a mistake to regard it simply as idolatry. Generally speaking, such worship is rather the expression of a profound sacramental sense. It is not the idol as such that is worshiped, but the god who is believed to dwell in the idol, and above any particular god, Divine Being itself, which thus manifests itself to its worshippers. The true nature of this worship is expressed in a remarkable text of the 13th century: "God when present in the inanimate idol becomes in all respects subject to his devotee. Though omniscient, he seems to be without knowledge; though alive and conscious he appears to be inanimate; though independent, he appears to be entirely dependent on others; though omnipotent, he seems to be powerless; though perfect, he appears needy; the protector of the universe, helpless he is the Lord, but he hides his Lordship; the invisible makes himself an object for our senses to perceive, the inapprehensible brings himself within our easy reach." Nothing could express more clearly the sacramental character of Hindu popular worship, when it is properly understood.

Although the temple is in a sense the center of religious worship and the temples are crowded with worshippers on the great festivals and visited by pilgrims from all over India, yet the home remains, as in Vedic times, the place where most of the sacred rites are performed. An orthodox Brahmin house has a room set apart for the daily prayers, which are offered at sunrise, and almost every religious home has a small shrine in a corner of a room set apart for prayer. Every stage of life, moreover, is accompanied by sacramental rites (saṁskāras) from birth, or rather before birth, to death. There are three rites prescribed during the pregnancy of the mother and three after birth. Not all these are observed in modern times, but a special importance continues to be attached to the ceremony of the thread (upanayana), by which the Brahmin boy is initiated as a full member of his community and becomes one of the "twice-born." This is accompanied by the recital of the gāyatrī, a verse of the Rig Veda, considered to be supremely sacred and used on many occasions. A Hindu marriage is performed in the home and is invested with a solemn character. According to tradition, marriage is indissoluble and a widow is never permitted to marry again. However, divorce was introduced by the State. Marriages were arranged by the family and normally took place in childhood until recently, when it was forbidden by law.

According to Vedic tradition, the dead are cremated, but burial is common among many of the lower castes. There are elaborate funeral rites, renewed up to 30 days after the death, and offerings of rice are made to the souls of the dead at regular intervals.

HINDUISM AND THE CASTE SYSTEM

Though abolished by law, caste remains in force to a large extent, especially in regard to marriage. It is quite distinct from the four "classes" (varṇa) of ancient India, and appears merely to have been grafted on to them, having been derived from the tribal customs.

Crafts and Castes. Caste was determined partly by religious and social customs and partly by craft or trade. It was by means of the caste system that the innumerable tribal and racial groups of ancient India with their different religions and social customs were integrated into Hinduism, while preserving their own traditions. At the same time, the different craftsmen, whose work was the glory of ancient India and was always stamped with a religious character, formed themselves into guilds, which gradually formed distinct castes. In the course of time, the number of castes grew to be more than 2,000, and the restrictions on intercourse between castes grew more and more rigid. At the same time certain tribal groups and certain trades came to be regarded as base and unclean and were held to be "untouchable," so that they could not approach within a certain distance of a person of a higher caste. The caste system has undoubtedly been responsible for many injustices in Hindu life, especially as it was held to be based on karma, so that a man's position in society was determined by the actions of his former life. On the other hand, the caste system enabled each group to retain its own individuality and distinctive traditions, gave each person a clearly defined status in society, and provided a kind of social security for widows and orphans, the aged, and the poor, who would otherwise have had no one to care for them.

Persistence of the caste system. The caste system retains a strong hold over Hindu society, especially in the villages, but it has begun to break down as a result of contact with modern habits of life in the towns. The State abolished "untouchability" by law, and efforts were made to secure equality of status for all classes. A transformation in Hindu society is evident in the suppression of such customs as the immolation of widows on the funeral pyre of their husbands (satī) and temple prostitution. Child marriage is illegal and divorce is permitted. But these are changes in the social structure. Hinduism, far from having lost its hold over the people, has rather undergone a reformation and emerged stronger than before.

REFORM IN HINDUISM

In the 19th and 20th centuries, Hinduism was purified in a variety of ways by the influence of learned or saintly Hindus.

Sen, Sarasvati. The first movement of reform in Hinduism began with the foundation of a school of rational theism on the basis of the Upanishads, the Brāhma Samāj, by Rām Mohan Roy (1772–1833), a Brahmin from Bengal. It was an attempt to free Hinduism from polytheism and image worship and to construct a pure monotheism in the light of Christian and Muslim doctrine. Though the Brāhma Samāj had some influence for a time and the work was continued by Debendra Nāth Tagore (1817–1905), the father of the poet, who gave it a more Indian character, it became divided under its next leader, Keshab Chandra Sen (1838–84), on the question of the relation between the Christian and Hindu elements within it. This led to another movement of reform by Dayānand Sarasvatī (1824–83), who founded the Ārya Samāj, another attempt to abolish polytheism, image worship, and caste practices. Based on what its founder believed to be the pure religion of the Vedas, it was opposed alike to Christianity and to Islam. It continues to form a militant group within Hinduism, but its influence is not extensive.

Paraham̐sa. The greatest portent in modern Hinduism was Rāmakrishna Paraham̐sa (1834–86). He was a poor and almost unlettered Brahmin, who spent most of his life as a devotee of the Mother Goddess at the Dakshineswar temple outside Calcutta. He summed up in himself all that was best in Hinduism. A devotee of the Mother Goddess, who practiced all the tantric rites of her cult, he was at the same time a Vedantin, who worshiped God “without form” no less than “with form.” He was an ascetic, who realized the ideal of Hindu sannyāsi, and a mystic, who manifested the Hindu ideal of a “holy man” who had “realized” God. His mind was open to other religions, and for some time he deliberately meditated as a Christian and a Muslim in order to enter into the spirit of each religion. Finally he was led to the belief that “all religions are one.” His influence was extended by his disciple Vivekānanda (1862–1902), who founded the Rāmakrishna Mission, introducing a new element of social service into Hinduism and giving it a missionary character that extended its influence to Europe and America.

Gāndhi. While these movements of reform affected only a cultured minority, it was Mahātmā Gāndhi (1869–1948) more than anyone who was responsible for bringing the reform to the masses of the people. Through him untouchability was abolished and many caste barriers were removed. He introduced the ideal of nonviolence (ahimsa) as the basic principle of social and political life, and by this India was able eventually to obtain her independence. Gāndhi was deeply influenced by the teaching and example of Christ, as well as by the writings of Tolstói, but he remained a devout Hindu at heart, accepting all Hinduism’s basic principles. Through him Hindu religion acquired a new moral character, which affected the whole mass of the people.

Ghose. The doctrine of the Vedānta received further development at the hands of Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950), who in 1910 founded an ashram, or hermitage, at Pondicherry, where he lived for 40 years. He had read modern Western philosophy, and in his great work, The Life Divine, he sought to reconcile an evolutionary view of the universe with the traditional doctrine of the Vedānta. According to his theory, both being and becoming are essential aspects of the one Brahman; the world of becoming, of time and evolution, is a manifestation of the eternal Brahman. There is a movement of descent from the divine being into the world, and a corresponding movement of ascent by which the world returns to the divine being, by becoming conscious in man of its identity with the divine nature.

Maharishi. Perhaps the most authentic expression of the doctrine of the Vedānta in modern times is to be found in Ramana Maharishi (1879–1950) of South India, who left his home at the age of 17 to live in a cave as a sannyāsī on the holy hill of Aruṇācala at Tiruvaṅṅāmalai, near Madras. Without any training in the Vedānta he reached the state of absolute “identity” with the Brahman, which had always been the goal of the Hindu religious quest. He taught the doctrine of pure “nonduality” (Advaita) as it was held by Śaṅkara, but with him it was not so much a theory as an experience; he showed in his life the example of perfect detachment and at the same time sympathy and understanding, which is the Hindu’s mark of the “holy man.” Thus in different ways Hinduism showed itself capable of new life, satisfying the religious, moral, and social ideals of the majority of its adherents.

HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY

Hinduism was called by the theologian P. Johanns, SJ, “the most searching quest in the natural order for the Divine that the world has known.” In common with Christianity, it has its own idea of Trinity and Incarnation, of sin and salvation, of revelation and inspiration, of sacrifice and sacrament, of law and morality, of the ascetic and mystical life, of grace and love, and of man’s ultimate goal of union with God. It is impossible not to admire the profundity of its conception of God as saccidānanda, being, knowledge, and bliss and the degree of intimacy with God to which it declares that the soul is called.

Lack of a clear concept of creation. According to Johanns, this is its principal weakness. As a result of it, Hinduism has never been able to define a relation between God, the soul, and the world. To preserve the divine simplicity and transcendence, it must say with Śaṅkara that the world is māyā, that is, without ultimate reality; or with Rāmānuja and his school, it must say that the world itself is divine. Nor has it ever been able to clarify the true nature of personality in God. It is true that in the dualist system of Madhva and in the Shaiva Siddhānta, a real distinction between God, the soul, and the world is established, but there is no creation, properly speaking, and matter and souls are conceived as eternal like God.

Soul's union with God. Another limitation is that, the soul being never clearly distinguished from God, union with God is always conceived in terms of identity. Thus grace in Hindu doctrine is not a pure gift of God by which the soul is raised to a participation in the divine being, but a divine assistance by which it is enabled to know its true and eternal being as one with God. Hinduism's rootedness in mythology, moreover, can easily result in an unworthy conception of the divine nature and a practical polytheism. The caste system, also, with its concept of untouchability, child marriage, and polygamy, the cult of images, which may easily lead to idolatry, and such customs as ritual prostitution and the burning of widows (sati), have in practice often led to degradation. Modern Hinduism, however, has reacted against such abuses. Its profound philosophy has succeeded in effectually purifying the tangle of mythology and in constructing a noble ethical ideal in the face of corrupt practices.

See Also: INDIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Bibliography: Translations. W. T. DE BARY et al., comps., Sources of Indian Tradition (Records of Civilization 56; New York 1958). S. RADHAKRISHNAN and C. A. MOORE, A Source Book in Indian Philosophy (Princeton 1957). S. RADHAKRISHNAN, ed. and tr., The Principal Upanishads (New York 1953). General. A. L. BASHAM, The Wonder That Was India: A Survey of the Culture of the Indian Sub-Continent before the Coming of the Muslims (London 1954) ch. 7. T. M. P. MAHADEVAN, Outlines of Hinduism (Bombay 1956). S. RADHAKRISHNAN, Indian Philosophy, 2 v. (2d ed. rev. London 1941); ed., History of Philosophy, Eastern and Western, 2 v. (London 1952–53) v. 1 Indian Thought. S. DASGUPTA, A History of Indian Philosophy, 5 v. (Cambridge, Eng. 1932–55). H. LOSCH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 3:340–349. W. CROOKE and J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:686–715. J. FINEGAN, The Archeology of World Religions (Princeton 1952) 123–181. C. SHARMA, A Critical Survey of Indian Philosophy (London 1960). K. K. KLOSTERMAIER, A Survey of Hinduism, 2d ed (Albany, NY 1994). Catholic. C. REGAMEY, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 5:368–372. G. DANDOY, An Essay on the Unreality of the World in the Advaita (Calcutta 1919), tr. L. M. GAUTHIER (Paris 1932), excellent survey by Catholic scholars with bibliog. P. JOHANNIS, A Synopsis of "To Christ through the Vedanta" (Light of the East series 4, 7, 9, 19; Ranchi 1942–44); La Pensée religieuse de l'Inde, tr. L. M. GAUTHIER (Namur 1952). M. QUÉGUINER, Catholicisme 5 (1960) 1463–82. P. MASSON-OURSSEL, "Les Religions de l'Inde," Histoire des religions, eds. M. BRILLANT and R. AIGRAIN (Paris 1953—) 2:85–163. A. KRÄMER, Christus und Christentum im Denken des modernen Hinduismus (Bonn 1958). On the relations between Hinduism and Christianity, see the systematic bibliog. in E. BENZ and M. NAMBARA, Das Christentum und die nicht-christlichen Hochreligionen (Beihefte der Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 5; Leiden 1960) 33–46.

[B. GRIFFITHS/K. R. SUNDARARAJAN]

Arthur Hinsley.

HINSLEY, ARTHUR

Cardinal, fifth archbishop of Westminster, England; b. Carlton, Yorkshire, England, Aug. 25, 1865; d. Buntingford, near London, March 17, 1943. He was the son of Thomas, a carpenter, and Bridget (Ryan) Hinsley. He was educated at the Catholic school in Carlton; at Ushaw College, Durham, England, receiving his A.B. (1889); and at the English College, Rome. After ordination (1893) he lectured on philosophy at Ushaw until 1897. He was headmaster (1899–1904) of St. Bede's Grammar School, which he founded at Bradford, England. After acting as pastor in Sutton Park (1904–11) and Sydenham (1911–17), he served as rector of the English College, Rome (1917–28). He was visitor apostolic to Africa (1929) and first apostolic delegate there (1930–34). Though elderly and infirm, he was recalled from retirement to fill the See at WESTMINSTER (1935). He became a cardinal in 1937. Active in diocesan affairs, he was largely responsible for the establishment in 1941 of the SWORD OF THE SPIRIT, a movement to encourage a return to Christian principles in public and private life.

Bibliography: D. NEWTON, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1885–1900; repr. with corrections, 21 v., 1908–09, 1921–22, 1938; suppl. 1901–) (1941–50) 394–395. J. C. HEENAN, Cardinal Hinsley (London 1944).

[D. MILBURN]

HIPPO REGIUS

Ancient North African bishopric, modern Bone, Algeria. The Phoenicians are believed to have had a settlement there in the 10th century B.C. The title Regius was used to distinguish it from Hippo Diarrhytus, because it both formed part of the kingdom of Numidia and apparently served as a residence for Numidian kings. On the defeat of Pompey and his allies, including the Numidian King Juba, at Thapsus, Caesar annexed Hippo to the Roman Empire (46 B.C.). Under St. AUGUSTINE it formed part of the civil Africa proconsularis and belonged to the ecclesiastical Province of Numidia. In 431 it was taken by the Vandals and in 533 was reconquered by Justinian's army. In the 7th century the Arabs took possession and founded Bona-el-Hadida in a naturally protected area about a mile distant. This is the location of the modern port of Bone, which extends to the site of the ancient city. Lybian, Punic, Greek, Latin, Vandal, and Byzantine rulers and settlers gave the city its population and cultural pattern. Its geographical locale made it an important port, with roads running up and down the coast and into the hinterlands.

Christianity appears to have been brought to Hippo from Italy and from the East. The Christian quarter was in the port area, within the pre-Roman settlement on the outskirts of the Roman city and its forum. Its first known bishop bore a Greek name; Augustine's immediate predecessor, Valerius, still spoke Greek and had difficulty with Latin. Bishop Theogenes (Sent. episc. 87.14; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3.1:443) was a martyr under VALERIAN; another bishop, Fidentius, was one of the 20 martyrs in the DIOCLETIAN persecution (Aug., Serm. 148; 257; 325; Civ. 22.8). Its cathedral was built by Bishop Leontius (not a martyr) and named after him (Aug., Serm. 260, 262; Epist. 29). Under Emperors Constantius II and Julian, the Donatists formed a majority of citizens, particularly under their bishop, Faustinus (Aug., C. Petil. 2.83.184). Bishop Valerius, in 395, consecrated Augustine as his auxiliary bishop. Augustine became bishop of Hippo in 396, and in 411, after the religious debate at Carthage, he succeeded in restoring religious unity to the city. His successor, Heraclius, is the last bishop whose name is known (Aug., Serm. 213). The latest information on the diocese comes from the 8th and 9th centuries.

Synods, Churches, and Monasteries. An African plenary synod was held in Hippo in 393 and presided over by Bp. Aurelius of Carthage in the secretarium of the basilica of Peace (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 3:849; Possidius, Vita 7). Augustine, though still a priest, addressed the assembly (Retract. 1.17). A plenary synod was held also, probably in 427, in the basilica of St. Leontius (Mansi 3:859; 4:441; 539). Augustine gives information regarding the basilica of Leontius that was apparently the same as the basilica Maior (Serm. 260; 258; 325.2) and perhaps also identical with the basilica Pacis (Mansi 3:730; De actis c. Fel. 2.1; Epist. 213). He speaks of a Donatist church (Epist. 29.11) that (after 411) was taken over by the Catholics; of an "old church" that is difficult to identify (Epist. 99.3); a memoria of St. Theogones (Mai., Serm. 158.2); and of another in honor of the 20 martyrs (Serm. 148). Heraclius the priest built a chapel attached to the main church for the relics of St. Stephen in 425 at the request of Augustine; and miracles took place there (Serm. 318–324, 356.7; Civ. 22.8). Another priest, Leporius, constructed a basilica in honor of the eight martyrs and a hospice for strangers (Serm. 356.10).

On his arrival in Hippo after his conversion, Augustine had built a small monastery for his lay monks in the garden of the community (Vita 5); and on his election as bishop, he turned the bishop's house into a residence for his clergy, so that they lived a common life (Serm. 355.2). There were other monasteries in the vicinity of Hippo founded by Leporius and Barnabas (Serm. 356.10, 15); and Augustine's sister presided over a convent for nuns (Serm. 355.3, 6; Possidius, Vita 26).

Archeology. Excavations have unearthed a small but important part of Hippo with pre-Roman and Roman settlements, including a large forum, a theater, public baths in the north and south, temples, a market place, a port, villas, many mosaics, inscriptions, sculptures, lamps, jewelry, and coins. A five-sided island (insula), or quarter, occupied by Christian buildings bordered the sea-coast about one-eighth of a mile east of the forum, somewhat south of the northern baths and the temple and close to the market place. It contained a three-aisled, pillared basilica whose nave was about 107 feet long by 49 feet wide and had an elevated half-rounded apse, about 27 by 21 feet; it was preceded by a narthex. At the back of the apse are the positions of the bishop's cathedra and the benches for the priests. The altar with its surrounding chancel was located before the apse. The baptistery, with an anteroom and consignatorium (for Confirmation), was located on the east side near the main entrance. Around the basilica were grouped administration and living rooms, a chapel with three apses, and apparently a secretarium (sacristy, a reception room, and an assembly hall for synods). It was decorated with an apse and peristyle and contained a library. Beneath the basilica are ruins probably of a pre-Constantinian house church. Despite the group of buildings, mosaics, and graves, particularly from the time of the Vandals, it is not possible to say whether this was originally a Catholic or Donatist church. It is thought to have been the basilica of the Catholics that served as the bishop's church in Augustine's day and that the annexed chapel was that of St. Stephen, with living quarters of the bishop and the monastery in the garden (Serm. 318–324, 356–357). East of this insula, E. Marec believes he has discovered another five-aisled basilica; the graves found in the atrium might point to this, but the view has not won acceptance. It could be the "old church" mentioned by Augustine (Epist. 99.3). After 411 all the churches belonged to the Catholic community. Augustine mentions many places and holy sites, such as the Castellum Fussala (Epist. 209; 224.1) and the Municipium Tullienne (Cur. mort. 12.15), both of which became dioceses.

Bibliography: J. MESNAGE, L'Afrique chrétienne . . . (Paris 1912) 263–267. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CARROLL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 6.2:2483–2531. W. H. C. FREND, The Donatist Church (Oxford 1952). O. PERLER, "L'Église principale et les autres sanctuaires chrétiens d'Hipponela-Royale," Revue des études augustiniennes 1 (1955) 299–343; 2 (1956) 435–446. C. LAMBOT, Revue des sciences religieuses 30 (1956) 230–240. E. MAREC, Hippone la Royale (Algiers 1954). Monuments chrétiens d'Hippone (Paris 1958), cf. T. W. PHELAN, Theological Studies 20 (1959) 422–431. H. I. MARROU, Revue des études augustiniennes 6 (1960) 109–154. J. LASSUS, "L'Archéologie Algérienne en 1958: Hippone," Libyca 7 (1959) 306–323; Fasti Archeologici 15 (1963) 315–316. G. CAMPS, ". . . Massinissa," Libyca 8 (1960) 1–320.

[O. PERLER]

HIPPOCRATES

Ancient Greek physician; b. Cos, 460(?) B.C.; d. probably at Larissa, Thrace, 377(?) B.C. He is generally referred to as the "Father of Medicine," but recent scholarship has rendered this a doubtful appellation. According to his biographer, Soranus (A.D. 98–138), Hippocrates was a descendant of Asclepius, a physician mentioned in the Iliad. It is thought that he learned medicine from his father, who is believed to have been a priest physician attached to the temple of Asclepius on Cos. He is thought to have traveled widely and to have taught and practiced his art at Thrace, Thessaly, Delos, and possibly Athens. His age at death is variously estimated between 85 and 110 years.

Not much is accurately known about the details of his life, and it seems likely that none of the works attributed to him, i.e., in the Corpus Hippocraticum, were actually written by him. Nevertheless, these writings laid down logical principles upon which the practice of medicine as a science took a firm foundation.

Hippocrates.

The first collection of writings attributed to Hippocrates was made about the 3rd century B.C. for the library at Alexandria. The most ancient extant manuscripts, dating from the 10th to the 12th century A.D., are found in the Vatican Library, in St. Mark's in Venice, in the state libraries of Vienna and Paris, and in the Laurentian Library in Florence.

According to Plato, he separated medicine from superstition and primitive religion. He differentiated kinds of diseases, whereas prior to that time, all illness was thought to be just one disease. He taught that diseases had natural causes and denied that disease was the work of the gods; he taught that disease was a natural process and the symptoms of a disease were due to reactions of the body to that disease. He stressed bedside observation of the patient, recording what he observed and then making logical deductions from these observations.

The description of some diseases in the Corpus are so accurate and complete that they could, with but minimal change, still be used in teaching medicine. Actually, the methods advocated for reduction of dislocation of the shoulder are practically those of modern orthopedics.

Hippocrates and his followers possessed a deep respect for the patient as a human being. In their view the chief function of the physician was to aid the natural forces of the body to rid itself of disease.

The oath attributed to Hippocrates elevated the practice of medicine and gave it an altruistic code of ethics. The oath, with only minor changes, is taken by many graduating medical students today.

Bibliography: The Genuine Works of Hippocrates, ed. and tr. F. ADAMS (London 1849). W. A. HEIDEL, "Hippocratea" in Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 25 (1914). F. H. GARRISON, Introduction to the History of Medicine (4th ed. Philadelphia 1929). D. GUTHRIE, A History of Medicine (Philadelphia 1946). C. J. SINGER, Greek Biology and Greek Medicine (Oxford 1922). L. EDELSTEIN, in The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. M. CARY et al. (Oxford 1949) 430.

[R. A. OSBOURN]

HIPPOCRATIC OATH

The pledge traditionally affirmed by physicians upon entering their profession. It embodies the general ethical principles governing relations of a physician to his profession and to his patients. Variant readings of its text frequently represent Christian or non-Christian modifications.

The earliest form of the oath is found among a corpus of some 70 ancient Greek medical writings that have been associated with the name of HIPPOCRATES of Cos (460–377 or 359 B.C.) and have been referred to as the Hippocratic Collection. This short work shares in historical, textual, and hermeneutical difficulties besetting the general Hippocratic literary question.

Hippocrates was held in such regard, even by PLATO, his junior contemporary, that the ethos inspired by his idealized image—namely, deep medical insight and high performance of duty—accounts for the association made by history between his name and the writings included today in the Hippocratic corpus. The texts reflect a Grecian setting. The importance of these writings, however, described by some as the library of the School of Cos, composed and collected over a span of five centuries, is measured by the value consistently placed on them in succeeding ages. The present text of the oath is thought to be probably post-Hippocratic. One opinion finds a pre-Hippocratic source in Pythagorean tradition. Erotian, living in Nero's time, considered the oath to be genuine. Thus, whether from his hand or spirit, the oath is worthily deemed Hippocratic.

In addition to the usual division of the text's teaching into duties to the healing art and to the patient, there is a statement of the goal of medicine. The physician practices his art for the benefit of the patient in the form of health, a human good. Thus is it linked with the science of human good, or ethics. Hence, the second half of the oath is suitably directed to ethical matters in medicine. A further unfolding of the temperate virtues, becoming to a physician, is found in other works of the collection, for example, in "On the Physician" and "On Decorum."

Some things in the oath are difficult to interpret. The precise meaning of "oath" and "indenture" in the text, the professional import of "the craft of the knife," and the ethical connotation in ancient Greece of forswearing abortive procedures and of the giving of harmful drugs present goading questions. Despite such obscurities the physician who would use this pre-Christian document as a venerable source will find it consistent with later professional ethical principles.

The oath's hardy medical affinity has made it a symbolic vehicle for medical ideals. A professional pledge is not only written; it is also lived. The literal meaning therefore is secondary to the moral signification as this has come to be understood through doctor-patient experience acquired over centuries. With appropriate modification the ethical burden of the Hippocratic Oath has been found compatible with both Christian and non-Christian thought. Its binding force has been variously estimated from that of an obligatory promise to that of exemplary counsel. In general it has been the traditional formula pledged during graduation exercises at medical schools.

A nostalgic simplicity characterizes its presence among the modern national and international codes of medical ethics. In the face of problems arising from technical medical advance and mankind's stockpiling of scientific means that function both for human destruction and for the deterrence of aggression, ethical principles with a greater degree of explication have had to be formulated. Modern medical codes proclaim the humanistic goal of medicine and protect physicians from untoward pressures to have them participate in genocide or in the aggressive activities of ABC warfare or in certain inhumane uses of psychological skills. Although the medical practice of Hippocrates is long outmoded, his ideals are enduring.

Bibliography: HIPPOCRATES, "The Oath," ed. and tr. W. H. S. JONES, Hippocrates v.1 (Loeb Classical Library; London-New York-Cambridge, Mass. 1948) 291–301. L. EDELSTEIN, The Hippocratic Oath: Text, Translation, and Interpretation (Baltimore 1943). C. J. SINGER and E. A. UNDERWOOD, A Short History of Medicine (2d ed. New York 1962).

[A. W. MURPHY]

The Hippocratic Oath. (©CORBIS)

St. Hippolytus of Rome.

HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME, ST.

Ecclesiastical author, presbyter, antipope, and martyr; b.c. 170; d. Sardinia, 235 or 236. The identity, life, and writings of Hippolytus continue to pose challenges to scholars.

Life

Probably of Eastern extraction, although the exact place of his origin is unknown, Hippolytus became a member of the Roman clergy and distinguished himself as the foremost writer of the Roman church in the third century. His learning and talent for writing won him the admiration and support of a rigorist faction within the church at Rome who encouraged him as a rival claimant to that see. His education and intellectual abilities exceeded those of contemporary Roman bishops whom he despised and denounced. Hippolytus charged Zephyrinus (198/9–217) with ineptness and avarice. He unjustly accused Callistus I (217–222) of Sabellianism, or Modalism, and disciplinary laxity. In the last years of the pontificate of Callistus I, Hippolytus and his supporters went into formal schism, asserting his claim to the see of Rome. He persisted in this claim throughout the pontificates of Urban I (223–230) and Pontian (230–235). In the persecution launched by Emperor Maximus the Thracian

(235–238), Pontian and Hippolytus were exiled to hard labor in the mines of Sardinia where the two rivals became reconciled. Hippolytus renounced his claim to the Roman see, and Pontian likewise abdicated the pontificate in order to end the schism and to ensure an unhindered succession. The newly reunited community of Rome elected Anteros (235–236) and, upon his death, Fabian (236–250). After Hippolytus and Pontian died in exile, Fabian had their bodies brought to Rome, where he buried both of them with solemnity as martyrs: Pontian in the crypt of the popes in the catacomb of St Callistus, and Hippolytus on the Via Tiburtina.

As early as the middle of the third century, the Libertarian Catalogue lists Hippolytus among the Catholic martyrs and identifies him as a presbyter rather than a bishop. Later legends obscure his identity. Pope Damasus I, and later Prudentius, portray him as a Novatianist schismatic. Roman Passionals of the seventh and eighth centuries present him as a soldier converted by St Lawrence. Other legends confuse him with a martyred bishop of the same name, buried at Porto.

In 1551, a badly damaged statue of a figure, seated in magisterial pose, was discovered near the Via Tiburtina in Rome. The upper part of the body and the head were missing at the time of the discovery. A list of works, carved in Greek characters into the lower part of the chair, led to its identification with Hippolytus and to its restoration in the likeness of a bearded man, even though it originally was a female figure, possibly a Muse or an allegory of one of the sciences. The statue is now on display at the entrance of the Vatican Library.

Writings

Anti-heretical expositions. Philosophumena or Refutation of All Heresies is the chief work of Hippolytus. Written in ten books, the treatise describes Greek philosophy and religion (books 1 to 4, of which books 2 and 3 are missing) and various systems of Gnosticism that arose from these pagan sources (books 5 to 9). Book 10, a summary of the preceding sections, also presents a chronology of Jewish history, and outlines orthodox Christian faith. Owing to poor sources, the section on Greek philosophy is inferior to the more astute analysis of Gnosticism. In the Refutation, Hippolytus decries the mitigation of the penitential system brought about by the vast influx of pagan converts into the Church. This work is not listed on the statue.

The following works have been commonly ascribed to Hippolytus, although his authorship cannot be proven. In fact, Pierre Nautin has suggested that differences in style and theology, particularly between the Refutation and the Contra Noetum, point to two different authors between whom the works may be divided.

Syntagma or Against All Heresies. This refutation of 32 heresies no longer survives in the original. Any attempt at reconstruction depends upon the fragments and references to it that do survive thanks to its recurrent citation by later writers.

Contra Noetum, or Discourse against the Heresy of Noetus, formerly regarded as a large fragment of an anti-heretical treatise, is now recognized as a fine example of a Christian adaptation of classical diatribe.

Dogmatic and Exegetical Treatises. Antichrist, preserved in Greek, Old Slavonic, and Georgian versions, remains his sole extant dogmatic work. It constitutes the most thorough patristic treatment of the topic. Of his many scriptural commentaries, the following survive either whole or in fragments: Commentary on Daniel, preserved in an Old Slavonic version as well as in various Greek fragments, is the oldest extant Christian exegesis; Commentary on the Song of Songs, preserved in a Georgian version and fragments in Old Slavonic, Armenian, and Syriac translations; On the Blessings of Jacob, extant in the original Greek plus Armenian and Georgian versions; On the Blessings of Moses, extant in Armenian and Georgian versions; and On the Psalms, a work preserved only in several Greek fragments and treating only a limited number of psalms. Seventeen other commentaries are known, but chiefly by title alone. Jerome, in De viris illustribus, 61, is the only witness that Hippolytus delivered the exegetical homily On the Passover in the presence of Origen on the latter's visit to Rome. As an exegete, Hippolytus shows little influence of Alexandrian allegorical method.

Chronological Works. The Chronicle, extant no longer in the original Greek, but in three independent Latin translations, treats the history of the world from creation until his own period. Although it treats the nature of the universe, its chief aim was to show that the end of the world, calculated to have a term of six thousand years, was not imminent. A large fragment of the Paschal Table, devised in 222, was inscribed on the side of the chair of the 'Hippolytus' statue.

Liturgical and Canonical Writings. The Apostolic Tradition, preserved not in the original Greek, but in Latin, Ethiopic, and Coptic versions, has long been associated with Hippolytus, owing in part to its mention on the statue list. Although the attribution of this work to him enjoyed widespread currency in the twentieth century, toward the end of that century scholars have been increasingly reluctant to ascribe this work to Hippolytus. Paul Bradshaw, Marcel Metzger, and Maxwell Johnson all have challenged this attribution. According to Bradshaw, there were perhaps three distinct stages in the development of the document that has come down to us. The sections dealing with initiation reflect at least two different sources: an older Roman core with its emphasis on the bishop and a later North African source providing more specific directions for the deacons and presbyters.

The works of Hippolytus enjoyed wider currency in the East than in Rome itself. The growing dominance of Latin and the decline of Greek in the Roman church may account in part for his lack of later influence in Rome. Association with a schismatic movement also may have compromised the subsequent appeal of his writings within such a prestigious local church. His final reconciliation with the church, however, and his sufferings in persecution and exile, prepared the way for his liturgical cultus.

Feast: Aug. 13.

Bibliography: Primary Sources: J.-P. MIGNE, Patrologiae Graeca, 10 (Paris 1857–1866) cols. 261–962. H. ACHELIS, with G. N. BONWETSCH and others. 4 v. Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte. (Leipzig 1897 [Critical edition]). Ante-Nicene Christian Library, v. 6 and 9, pt. 2; M. MARKOVICH, Patristische Texte und Studien, 25 (Berlin 1986). F. LEGGE, Refutation of All Heresies, 2 v. (London New York 1921). M. LEFÈVRE, with G. BARDY. Sources Chrétiennes 14 (Paris 1947), [with French trans.] P. NAUTIN, Hippolyte contre les hérésies (Paris 1949). R. BUTTERWORTH, Contra Noetum (Heythrop Monographs, 2; London 1977) [with English trans.] P. NAUTIN, Homélies Pascales, 1 (Sources Chrétiennes, 27; Paris 1947). G. VISONÀ, Studia Patristica Mediolanensia, 15 (Milan 1988). B. BOTTE, La Tradition apostolique: d'après les anciennes versions avec introduction, traduction, et notes (Sources chrétiennes, 11; Paris 1968) [Reprinted with revisions, 1984]. La Tradition apostolique de saint Hippolyte (Münster, Westfalen 1963) [critical edition.]. G. J. CUMING, Hippolytus: A Text for Students (Grove Liturgical Study, 8; Bramcote, Nottingham 1976). [best English trans. currently available.]. J. M. HANSENS, La liturgie d'Hippolyte: ses documents, son titulaire, ses origines et son caractère (Orientalia Christiana Analecta, 155; Rome 1959). La liturgie d'Hippolyte: Documents et Études (Rome 1970). Studies on Hippolytus: A. ZANI, La Cristologia di Ippolito (Ricerche di Scienze Teologiche, 22; Brescia 1984). C. OSBORNE, Rethinking Early Greek Philosophy: Hippolytus of Rome and the Presocratics (Ithaca, N. Y. 1987). J. FRICKEL, Das Dunkel um Hippolyt von Rom: Ein Lösungsversuch: Die Schriften Elenchos und contra Noëtum (Grazer Theologische Studien, 13; 1988). J. MANSFELD, Heresiology in Context: Hippolytus' Elenchos as a Source for Greek Philosophy (Philosophia Antiqua, 56; Leiden and New York 1992). G. MAURICE, and F. GLORIE, ed. Clavis Patrum Graecorum, 1 (Turnhout 1983). G. J. CUMING, Essays on Hippolytus (Grove Liturgical Study 15; Nottingham 1978). R. CABIÉ, "L'Ordo de l'Initiation chrétienne dans la 'Tradition apostolique' d'Hippolyte de Rome," in Mens concordet voci pour Mgr. A. G. Martimort (Paris 1983), pp. 543–558. M. METZGER, "Nouvelles perspectives pour la prétendue Tradition apostolique," Ecclesia Orans 5 (1988) 241–259; "Enquêtes autour de la prétendue Tradition apostolique," Ecclesia Orans 9 (1992) 7–36; "A propos des règlements ecclésiastiques et de la prétendue Tradition apostolique," Revue des sciences religieuses 66 (1992) 249–261. P. F. BRADSHAW, "Re-dating the Apostolic Tradition: Some Preliminary

Ruins of Hirsau Monastery, Germany. (©Werner H. Muller/CORBIS)

Steps,” in Rule of Prayer, Rule of Faith: Essays in Honour of Aidan Kavanagh, O. S. B., ed. J. BALDOVIN and N. MITCHELL (Collegeville 1996) 3–17, [this work surveys recent scholarship on the Apostolic Tradition]. M. JOHNSON, The Rites of Christian Initiation: Their Origins and Development (Collegeville 1999) 80–85.

[N. ROY]

HIRSAU, ABBEY OF

The former Benedictine abbey of SS. Peter and Paul near Calw, Württemberg, in the Black Forest, in the Diocese of Speyer. Originally founded in 830 and dedicated to St. Aurelius, it was not a permanent foundation until Pope Leo IX urged his nephew Count Adalbert II of Calw to construct a new abbey, staffed by monks from Einsiedeln in 1065. The fame of Hirsau (Hirsaugia) is connected almost exclusively with the name of Abbot William, who came from St. Emmeram in Regensburg.

Abbot William reversed the secular trend particularly noticeable in imperial abbeys and revitalized monastic life. He rejected lay investiture, breaking the attachment to the state. He suppressed the numerous lay officials and inaugurated reforms. Gregory VII granted immunity to the abbey in 1075, and in the investiture struggle Hirsau was a center of ecclesiastical reform and resistance to Henry IV.

Abbot William adapted the Cluniac usages to Germany (Consuetudines Hirsaugienses, 1079). The Hirsau reform represented a final blend of the 10th-century reform movements; it was rapidly diffused among the monasteries of southern and eastern Germany and in Austria. The formation of a congregation was opposed by the bishops, but more than 100 houses belonged to the loose confederation when it was at its peak.

In William's time the community numbered about 150 monks. Its library, its style of manuscript illumination, and its music were well known. The abbey church of SS. Peter and Paul was prototype of German Romanesque and fathered a school of architecture.

The direction given to Hirsau's monastic life by Abbot William survived for little more than half a century after his death. The abbey was unable to maintain its independence. It was forced to cede a large part of its possessions to the Emperor in 1215, and ten years later elected him its Vogt. In the 15th century Hirsau took part in the restoration of regular life, and joined the Congregation of Bursfeld in 1458. However, in the next century, its Protestant prince secularized it and made it a school. For practical purposes, 1535 marks the end of the abbey, although the fluctuating fortunes of the religious wars awarded it first to one side, then to the other; the monks were finally banished in 1648.

Bibliography: S. HILPISCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:381–382. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1421–22. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'Ordre de Saint-Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous, Bel. 1942–56).

[P. BECKMAN]

HIRSCHER, JOHANN

Theologian; b. Alteggarten, Württemberg, Jan. 20, 1788; d. Freiburg, Sept. 4, 1865. Hirscher studied at the Weissenau monastery school, the lyceum of Constance, and the University of Freiburg. He was ordained in 1810 and was a curate in Rehlingen until 1812, when he became a tutor in the theology school of Ellwangen. In 1817 he occupied the chair of moral and pastoral theology at Tübingen University, and in 1837 he became professor of moral theology and catechetics in the University of Freiburg. He became a canon in 1839 and dean of the chapter in 1850. Frequently he served as delegate of the University of Freiburg to the First Chamber of the Grand Duchy of Baden. He retired in 1863. Hirscher was a prolific writer on theological subjects, especially in the area of homiletics and catechetics, and a cofounder of the review Theologische Quartalschrift.

In an early work, De genuina missae notione, he proposed sweeping changes in the liturgy of the Mass. He demanded the suppression of private Masses, the use of the vernacular, and Communion under both species for the laity. To this work he appended two suggested texts of the Mass in German. This work was placed on the Index in 1823, two years after its composition.

Much of his writing was concerned with preaching. He wished to replace the long, abstract moral considerations, which were popular in the Germany of his day, with brief homilies based on the text of the Mass for the day. In 1829 he published a commentary on the Lenten Gospels, and in 1837 a commentary on the Gospels and Epistles for the entire year, both of which were reprinted several times.

Hirscher wrote also a three-volume course in moral theology, Die christliche Moral als Lehre von der Verwirklichung des göttlichen Reiches in der Menschheit, which was reprinted five times between 1835 and 1851. He considered Christian morality as the realization of the kingdom of God in mankind. Thus his moral course differed from other manuals of his time and consisted mostly of pious meditations on the Christian life.

Despite much criticism by scholars, his many works on catechetics, especially his catechisms, were well received and were very popular. His 1842 catechism (Katechismus der christkatholischen Religion) and Der kleinere Katechismus der christkatholischen Religion were reprinted in many editions between 1845 and 1862. Through these works Hirscher exercised a strong influence on pastoral theology in Germany, and through translations of them, in France.

He also wrote, if less happily, on some of the social questions of his time, especially on the relation of Church and State in Germany. His spirit of conciliation toward the State was excessive and his proposals for Church reform were sharply criticized. A collection of his works on these matters was placed on the Index in 1849. He submitted to the condemnation of the Holy See and retracted the errors, but wrote replies to those who attacked them.

Hirscher in his own time was a controversial figure because of his very liberal views with regard to the liturgy and clerical celibacy and because of the suspicion that he was aiming at a German national church. Hence, when he was mentioned as a possible coadjutor for the Diocese of Freiburg, there was an outcry against his appointment in Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung and Revue Sion. When the government of Württemberg asked for the appointment, Rome refused. He has been referred to as an intellectual adventurer, but in some of his ideas he was only ahead of his time. This can be seen from the fact that a number of his suggestions, especially with regard to ecumenism and the liturgy, were discussed and acted upon by VATICAN COUNCIL II.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables Générales 1951–) 6.2:2512–14. F. X. ARNOLD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:383–384. F. LAUCHERT, Revue internationale de théologie 2 (1894) 627–656; 3 (1895) 260–280, 723–738; 4 (1896) 151–174. F. KÖSSING in Badische Biographien, ed. F. VON WEECH, v.1 (Karlsruhe 1881) 372–377. F. X. THALHOFER, Entwicklung des katholischen Katechismus in Deutschland von Canisius bis Dehnbach (Freiburg 1899).

[F. C. LEHNER]

HISPANA COLLECTIO (ISIDORIANA)

The most extensive and important canonical collection of the first ten centuries; it gathers and classifies all the traditional legislation in two parts: that of councils and that of papal decretals. The number of decretals, 103, is almost invariable in all the manuscripts and includes decretals from Popes Damasus (366–384) to Gregory I (604). The conciliar part, however, has met with three recensions: the Isidorian, to the Fourth Council of Toledo (633), with no manuscript in existence; the Ervagian, to the Twelfth Council of Toledo (685), in six manuscripts, three Spanish and three Gallican in form; the Vulgate, to the Seventeenth Council of Toledo (694), in eight Spanish and two foreign manuscripts. The Hispana recension, the lengthiest, comprises in geographical order, 11 Greek councils, eight African councils, 17 French councils, and 30 Spanish councils, setting in strict chronological order all the councils of the same city, thus meriting the name of Hispana Collectio.

COMPILER.

Although the oldest recension (633–35) of the Spanish collection is from the Isidorian era, there are reasons to date it to the Leandrine era, before 600 (M. Díaz y Díaz). A controversy as to whether St. ISIDORE OF SEVILLE was the author of this collection dates to the 16th century. On the affirmative side are P. Sejourné and J. Madoz; on the doubtful side, without considering it a proved fact, is G. Le Bras. The medieval manuscript tradition never attributed to Isidore the genuine Hispana, but it did ascribe to him the FALSE DECRETALS, basing its belief on the preface of Isidorus Mercator. The author is still unknown, although it seems probable that it was St. Isidore of Seville.

ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT.

The Isidorian, Ervagian, and Vulgate recensions were either written by the hierarchy or under the immediate control of the hierarchy, so that it can be called the official collection of the Spanish Church, making other collections obsolete. The three were used exclusively for almost 500 years, until the Gregorian reform.

The Hispana Collectio appeared at the beginning of the eighth century in Gaul, where it spread rapidly, representing the traditional, universal, and ecclesiastical law against the particularistic disintegration of the penitential literature. Being transcribed by itself, as in the Codex Rachionis, copied in 787 for the bishop of Strasbourg, or combined with other collections—Hispana-Adriana, DACHERIANA—it served for a century as juridical support of the Carolingian attempt at reform. Its authority served in the ninth century to conceal the greatest literary fraud of the history of Canon Law, the false decretals.

Using the Hispana Chronologica as the basis, the so-called Excerpta came into existence in Spain around 656. These Excerpta included the canons of the Isidorian recension (Fourth Council of Toledo) and the canons of the Fifth to Tenth Councils of Toledo systematically ordered in ten books according to subject matter, each one summarized in a line. They were transcribed at the beginning of the Spanish manuscripts of the Hispana, both in the Ervagian and the Vulgate recensions.

The Hispana Systematica was formed by substituting the summary of each canon of the Excerpta for the complete text. Although preserved in three French manuscripts, it is considered Spanish in origin, since it was used by the Mozarabs of the south of Spain, a fact evidenced by the Arabic version (Madrid, B.N. 4879, s. XI).

Bibliography: P. SÉJOURNÉ, Le Dernier père de l'Église: Saint Isidore de Séville (Paris 1929). P. ARIÑO ALAFONT, Colección canónica hispana (Avila 1941). C. GARCÍA-GOLDÁRAZ, El Codice Lucense de la colección canónica hispana, 2 v. (Madrid 1954). F. A. GONZÁLEZ, ed., Collectio canonum ecclesiae hispanae, 2 v. (Madrid 1808–21). M. C. DÍAZ Y DÍZ, "Pequeñas aportaciones para el estudio de la Hispana," RevEspDC 17 (1962) 373–390. J. MADDOZ, San Isidoro de Sevilla (Madrid 1960). G. LE BRAS, "Sur la part d'Isidore de Séville et des Espagnols dans l'histoire des collections canoniques, à propos d'un livre récent," Revue des sciences religieuses 10 (1930) 218–257.

[G. MARTÍNEZ DÍEZ]

HISPANA VERSIO

A canonical collection dated between 419 and 451 in Rome. The collection is known in Africa as Corpus canonum Africanum. It is known in three collations: the Antiqua-originalis contains the canons of the Councils of Nicaea (except for the last canon), Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea—all of these under the same enumeration—as well as those of Constantinople, Sardica, and the African Council of 419, and is preserved in the collections of Freising and Würzburg; the Vulgata contains all the canons of Nicaea, Ancyra, Neocaesarea, and Gangra, and is preserved most completely in the collections of St. Blaise, St. Maurus, and in the QUESNELLIANA; the Isidoriana-gallica (following the plan of the Antiqua) is preserved in the Gallic collections. According to W. M. Peitz, the Hispana Versio is the work of DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS.

Bibliography: C. H. TURNER, ed., Ecclesiae occidentalis monumenta iuris antiquissima (Oxford 1899–1939) 1.1.2:154–243; 2.1:33–142; 2.2:161–214, 218–316, 323–392, 402–420. E. SCHWARTZ, Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung 56 (1936) 83–95. W. M. PEITZ, Dionysius Exiguus-Studien (Berlin 1960). H. WURM, Studien und Texte zur Dekretalensammlung des Dionysius Exiguus (Bonn 1939).

[C. VOGEL]

HISTORICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The value of classifying certain books of the Old Testament as historical depends on a correct understanding and definition of ancient Hebrew historiography. The aims and methods of the writers of the Old Testament books have been studied and grasped more adequately during the first half of the 20th century than they had been earlier. Documents of the Catholic Church's magisterium, especially the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION'S decrees of June 30, 1909 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1 (Rome 1909) 567–569; Enchiridion biblicum (4th ed. Rome 1961) 324–331], and the same commission's letter to Cardinal Suhard of Jan. 16, 1948 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 40 (1948) 45–48; Enchiridion biblicum (4th ed. Rome 1961) 577–581] reflect this development.

Although the classical Hebrew division of the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings gives no explicit recognition of history-writing in the Bible, it has long been the custom among Christian scholars to categorize some books of the Old Testament as historical, or histories. St. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM (c. A.D. 348) divided the Old Testament into four sections: the Law, the historical books, the poetic books, and the Prophets [Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 33:500]. In the second category, the historical books, he listed Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. Pope St. INNOCENT I (c. A.D. 405) added to these, in his category of histories, the books of Job, Tobit, Judith, and 1 and 2 Maccabees [H. Wurm, Apollinaris 12 (1939) 75–76]. This listing of the historical books may find some support in the Septuagint.

Modern introductions to the Bible differ among themselves when they classify certain Old Testament books as historical. Some keep the Pentateuch distinct from the category of history, while others label it historical. Some dispense with the category of history altogether and prefer the ancient Hebrew divisions of the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings, with a fourth section for the deuterocanonical books. (see CANON, BIBLICAL 2, HISTORY OF OLD TESTAMENT.)

Modern study has shown that there is real historiography in the Old Testament, but that the classification of specific books as historical is a delicate task. Many qualifications have to be made regarding the historical character of the individual books and passages. Many distinctions have to be made between ancient and modern historiography and between ordinary historiography and the writing of SALVATION HISTORY among ancient writers of history.

There is a wide range of historicity in the Old Testament, from the chronicle-like writing in parts of the Books of SAMUEL and KINGS to the highly imaginative story of the Book of TOBIT. The literary form of the Book of JUDITH, which many in the past have designated as historical, is certainly nonhistorical.

See Also: HISTORY AND HISTORICITY (GESCHICHTLICHKEIT).

Bibliography: M. REHM, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:791–792. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1007–12. A. ROBERT and A. TRICOT, Guide to the Bible, tr. E. P. ARBEZ and M. P. MCGUIRE, 2 v. (Tournai-New York 1951–55; v.1 rev. and enl. 1960) 1:282–314. A. LEMONNYER, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 1:588–596.

[M. STRANGE]

HISTORICAL JESUS

The term “historical Jesus” refers to Jesus of Nazareth in so far as the course of his earthly life can be reconstructed by historical critical methods. The use of historical critical methods has led biblical scholars to recognize the character of the Gospels as theological interpretations of Jesus' religious significance. Directly, then, the Gospels document the beliefs of the 1st-century Christian communities for which they were composed; they are not historical biographies in the modern sense of the term. Thus a question arises: what can be known, by historical means, about the one whose religious significance the Gospels proclaim?

The “Old Quest” for the Historical Jesus. The discipline of critical history itself emerged within the context of the Enlightenment, and those who first urged the distinction between the Gospels as articulations of Christian belief and what can be known about Jesus on historical grounds exploited that difference in the service of various agendas. Albert Schweitzer conducted a magisterial survey of the first phase of historical Jesus research in The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906). Among the writings he reviewed, three tendencies were operative.

At one extreme were authors who, representing an emerging fundamentalist rejection of modernity, persisted in reading the Scriptures as simply true in every respect. Opposite them were writers like H. S. REIMARUS, D. F. STRAUSS, and B. BAUER, who seized upon historical research as a weapon to wield against the Christian church. On their respective accounts, Jesus was either (1) a failed messianic revolutionary whose followers spiritualized his message, clumsily concocted the story of the resurrection, and on this fraudulent basis kept his movement alive (Reimarus); (2) the human being whose personality inspired the myth of God-manhood recounted in the Gospels (Strauss); or (3) an hypothesis rendered superfluous to explain the origin of Christianity, since the earliest Gospel, that of Mark, can be accounted for as the result of the confluence of Jewish and Hellenistic religious streams (Bauer).

Jesus of Nazareth appearing before Pilate, 6th century mosaic.

Between these two extremes were Protestant liberals like A. von Harnack, who played their version of the historical Jesus and his simple message off against traditional doctrine in order to render Christianity appealing to their contemporaries. Schweitzer's own account built on the work of Johannes Weiss, according to which Jesus conceived his central theme, the coming of the KINGDOM OF GOD, in apocalyptic terms: at the Kingdom's approach the righteous would suffer; a final conflict, both cosmic and earthly, would erupt; and God's victory would bring the end of the world and the resurrection of the dead. For Schweitzer, Jesus believed that all this was imminent and that he himself had a role in its occurrence. Indeed, Jesus entered upon his passion and death in order to force God's hand, but as the continuing course of history demonstrates, this was a mistake; the Kingdom failed to come. Schweitzer's work marked the close of the so-called old quest; the apparent outcome was a gulf expressed in the title of a book by M. Kähler, The So-called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ (Leipzig 1892) or, as an earlier work by Strauss had more simply put it, The Historical Jesus and the Christ of Faith (Berlin 1865).

The Decline of Historical Jesus Research. There followed a hiatus in historical Jesus research that lasted until 1953. The interim period saw, theologically, the dominance of the neo-orthodox theology introduced by Karl BARTH in 1919, and, with respect to historical method, the introduction of form criticism into NT studies with the practically simultaneous publication in 1919 and 1920 of works by Rudolf BULTMANN, M. DIBELIUS, and K.-L. Schmidt. These two developments conspired to reinforce the skepticism regarding the possibility of knowledge of Jesus by historical means already articulated in W. Wrede's The Messianic Secret in the Gospel of Mark (1910). Wrede had argued that the notion of the messianic secret around which the Gospel of Mark is organized was an apologetic device invented by the author, so that even Mark, the earliest of the Gospels, offers data not on Jesus but on the community for which it was written. Wrede thus challenged the common-sense assumption that because Mark was the earliest Gospel, it must be closest to the facts and thus historically most reliable.

Skepticism like Wrede's was reinforced in the next generation when Bultmann, for example, argued theologically that any attempt to ascertain historically whether the biblical call to faith had a historical basis in Jesus and his ministry amounted to an effort to win salvation by intellectual works, while as a form critic Bultmann also judged the attempt to reconstruct Jesus' ministry practically impossible because of the nature of the sources. On this view the religious beliefs animating the Gospels formed an impenetrable barrier blocking any attempt at historical reconstruction of Jesus and his ministry.

The "New Quest." The quest for the Jesus of history took a new turn in 1953. Ernst Käsemann delivered a paper at a gathering of Bultmann's former students in which he argued that a "new quest" for the historical Jesus was legitimate, necessary, and possible: legitimate, because it cohered with the evangelists' intention to inform us about Jesus; necessary, because otherwise Christians would have no response to those who charged their religion with being simply a myth bereft of any demonstrable relation to the historic personage of Jesus; possible, because of the availability of a method, form criticism, fostered by Bultmann himself. Even Bultmann's analysis of The History of the Synoptic Tradition, Käsemann could point out, not infrequently traced some saying or deed found in the Gospels back to Jesus himself.

The "new quest" differed from its predecessor in two major respects. On the one hand, it had a positive goal, namely, to ascertain what continuity might be found to underlie the discontinuity, so stressed by participants in the "old quest," between Jesus as viewed through a historian's lens and the Christ portraits of the NT. This goal was by no means a matter of proving the validity of the latter, but it did involve an effort to show that the Christian faith expressed in the Gospels was at least one possible response to Jesus' earthly career. But if the goal was more positive, the "new quest" also assumed a far more critical attitude toward its sources than did its predecessor. From the vantage point of form criticism, nothing in the Gospels is to be acknowledged as historical simply by its presence in the texts. Rather, only those sayings and deeds ascribed to Jesus that meet a set of stringent criteria are to be accorded historical probability. The "new quest" makes no promise of achieving a full-blown biography of Jesus, but it does claim with some confidence that Jesus' characteristic manners of speaking and acting can be recovered.

Three years after Käsemann delivered his paper, another member of the Bultmannian circle, Günther Bornkamm, published Jesus of Nazareth. This first major contribution to the "new quest" established the contours of an historical image of Jesus that would enjoy consensus status for almost three decades. On Bornkamm's account, Jesus' contemporaries might have perceived him as a prophet because of his message about the Kingdom of God, or as a rabbi, because he expounded God's will. In each case, however, there was something unique about Jesus' exercise of the role. Whereas prophets spoke a word of the Lord that came to them, Jesus spoke on his own authority: "Amen, I say to you." In Bornkamm's reconstruction, by announcing the imminence of the Kingdom, Jesus also claimed that people's response to his ministry in the present would be decisive for their status when the SON OF MAN, a figure whom Jesus regarded as other than himself, came as eschatological judge.

The rabbis, for their part, expounded God's will through casuistic commentary on the text of Scripture, a role they assumed only after years of study as disciple to another rabbi to whom they presented themselves. Jesus, however, possesses no scholarly credentials, he chooses his disciples, not they him, and there is no notion that they might someday equal, much less surpass, him. In contrast to the rabbis, his style of teaching is direct and almost secular, presuming no prior knowledge of learned debates but appealing, in parables, directly to his hearers' experience. In the content of his teaching, Jesus contradicts the normative interpretation of the Law, making light, for example, of the Sabbath obligation to abstain from work. Even more audaciously, he proceeds to contradict the letter of the Law itself, abrogating the dietary regulations in favor of interior purity. Exercising the power to forgive sin, as both prophet and rabbi Jesus arrogates to himself an authority greater than Moses' and thus sets himself beyond the pale of Judaism. Unique in addressing God with filial tenderness and familiarity as ABBA, Jesus stands in sharp contrast to the casuistic legalism and ritualistic formalism of his contemporaries. Implicit in Jesus' speech and actions was a claim to authority that rendered him a blasphemer liable to death in the eyes of his fellow Jews. That same implicit claim was, Christians believe, vindicated when God raised

Jesus from the dead, and its meaning becomes explicit when they resort to titles like MESSIAH, SON OF GOD, Son of Man, or LORD to articulate his significance. Thus for Bornkamm and the many authors who followed him, the implicit claim operative in Jesus' uniquely authoritative manner of speaking and acting and vindicated by the resurrection provides the continuity between the "historical Jesus" and the "Christ of faith."

Critique and Revision of the New Quest. In time this image of Jesus became the object of severe critique and ongoing revision. The critique, laid out by scholars like E. P. Sanders in Jesus and Judaism (1985) and Paula Fredriksen in From Jesus to Christ (1988), uncovered first of all a theological bias operative in the historical portrait of Jesus that draws his features into focus by heightening the contrast between him and the Judaism of his day. The unrelieved legalism and formalism of that Judaism stem more from the confessional heritage of Bornkamm and his fellow post-Bultmannians than from the historical reality of Jesus' time. Bornkamm's Jesus emerges from a line of German Protestant scholarship that consistently historicized Luther's Law/Gospel dialectic. Scholars in this line, extending back at least as far as Bultmann's teacher, Wilhelm BOUSSET, portray a Judaism which, as a religion of works and ritual, comes to resemble the Catholicism Luther opposed and against which Jesus could be claimed as a champion of the gospel of free grace. This negative image of Judaism, the distorted result of projecting a theological a priori onto an historical situation, has traveled beyond its originally Protestant context, being put to use by European Catholics critical of their church's central administration (H. Küng) and by Latin American liberation theologians eager to parallel their context with that of Jesus. That negative stereotype of Judaism unfortunately contributes to the continuance of anti-Semitism.

Beyond this critique of the theological bias operative in the "new quest," several sources fed an ongoing process of revision of the historical image of Jesus. Archeological investigations combined with literary findings like the DEAD SEA SCROLLS to yield a considerably nuanced picture of Second Temple Judaism. In light of the pluralism extant among the Jews of Jesus' day, the notion of a monolithic, "official," normative Judaism to which Jesus can be contrasted has lost plausibility. Geographical differences also now assumed significance: Jesus was born to and exercised his ministry among Galilean villagers remote from the influence of both Temple and PHARISEES and not kindly disposed to an urban center that imposed and benefitted from a crushing burden of taxation.

Jewish scholars like David Flusser and Geza Vermes responded to the "new quest" by advancing the recovery of Jesus' own Jewishness. They highlighted his affinities with Pharisaism, denied the uniqueness of his Abba-usage, and argued that his intensification of the demands of Torah and declarations of the forgiveness of sin lie well within the parameters of Judaism. Vermes, in a series of studies beginning with his Jesus the Jew (1973), located Jesus within the tradition of Galilean wonder-working Hasidim or holy men whose model was the prophet Elijah; this Jesus was a wandering charismatic who, taking his place among the poor and outcasts, healed and cast out demons in enthusiastic expectation of the imminent arrival of God's Kingdom. Vermes used a social scientific category when he focused on Jesus as a charismatic, and thus he reflects the interdisciplinary turn biblical studies took with the addition of sociology and anthropology to their resources. That turn favored a retrieval of the full dimensions of Jesus' activity, rescuing him from the Enlightenment's relegation of religion to the private and individual sphere and allowing consideration of the social and political ramifications of his ministry as exercised concretely in the context of Roman-dominated Palestine.

Recent Approaches. Much of the ferment fostered by these developments came to a head in the work of the Jesus Seminar organized within the Society of Biblical Literature in 1985. The novel approach taken by this group of scholars to determine the historicity of sayings attributed to Jesus in the NT and other early Christian documents has received notoriety. They voted on each saying, casting colored beads coded according to degree of probability. They published the results, again color-coded: sayings in red are most probably those of Jesus, sayings in black are least probable. The Jesus Seminar also takes a novel approach to historical Jesus research by expanding the core of what it takes as basic data. In addition to the four canonical gospels, members of the Jesus Seminar argue, some of the Gnostic material discovered at Nag Hammadi in 1945 ought also to be taken into account. Maintaining that documents like the Gospel of Peter, the Apocryphon of James, and especially the collection of sayings known as the Gospel of Thomas enshrine early and independent data on the formation of the Christian tradition, seminar members particularly prize the latter document as preserving authentic sayings of Jesus. Some of these sayings are unknown to the gospels while, for others, the Gospel of Thomas provides the more original version. Seminar members also greatly expand the significance of the Q-source, the hypothetical collection of sayings of Jesus, the existence of which is deduced from the occurrence of these sayings in both Matthew and Luke but not Mark. This hypothetical collection is promoted to become the Sayings Gospel Q, and stages in its composition are discerned to yield an earliest layer which, like the Thomas material, says nothing of Jesus' death or resurrection, betrays no tincture of apocalyptic eschatology, but rather resonates with wisdom movements within and outside Israel. Indeed, the wisdom sayings of Q-source are found to bear marked similarities to contemporary traditions of Greco-Roman Cynicism.

John Dominic Crossan draws these threads together in The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (1991), subsequently popularized in Jesus: A Revolutionary Biography. In Crossan's account, Jesus changed his mind about John the Baptist's message of the imminence of an apocalyptically conceived kingdom, rejecting the apocalyptic in favor of the immediate, unbrokered accessibility of God which, shattering a social hierarchy based on honor and shame, called for a radically egalitarian way of life. This was the Kingdom of God, which Jesus acted out in an itinerant ministry to the villages of Galilee. His journeys were similar to the counter-cultural wanderings of the Cynics, whom Crossan likens to the hippies of the Greco-Roman world. What Jesus offered was healing, and, in a context where much illness both physical and mental was attributable to the poverty and systemic violence imposed to maintain the hegemony of the Temple and the Romans, such healing had political significance. In the eyes of the Jerusalem establishment, whose control over the definition of illness and over the means of relief Jesus challenged, his healings and exorcisms cast him in the role of magician or sorcerer. On one point Jesus differs from the Cynics: while they supported themselves by begging, Jesus deliberately sent his followers out without a bag for provisions. By this stratagem Jesus ensured the dependence of his itinerant ministry on the hospitality of those who would receive him. Offering healing, he sought the practice of open-table fellowship, by which he again subverted the social rankings of the day and acted out the egalitarianism consonant with the presence of the Kingdom. All of this set Jesus and his socially revolutionary movement on a collision course with the power structure of the day, centered in the Temple. Thus, Jesus' actions, symbolic of the destruction of the Temple, happening at Passover, could easily have brought about his arrest and execution. Regarding the details of Jesus' last days, Crossan invokes the Gospel of Peter to mount an argument that the passion narratives are spun for the most part from a Christian reading of the OT.

Far less iconoclastic than the work of Crossan and the Jesus Seminar is John P. Meier's multi-volume study A Marginal Jew. Meier's first volume, appearing in 1991, set the stage by considering sources, method, Jesus' background and education, and the chronology of Jesus' life. Notably, he concurs with Joseph Fitzmyer in rejecting the Jesus Seminar's claims for the early and independent provenance of material preserved in the Gnostic writings from Nag Hammadi and thus sweeps aside Crossan's strictly sapiential, non-eschatological reading of Jesus' message. Rather, in his second volume, Meier emphasizes John the Baptist's perduring influence as Jesus' mentor. While Jesus may have shifted his emphasis away from John's prospect of imminent fiery judgment to stress the glad news of the nearness of a saving God, undertones of judgment were never totally absent from his preaching, which, like John's preaching, proclaimed the imminence of God's decisive act. Centering his message on the symbol of Kingdom of God, Jesus both announced the futurity of the coming of the Kingdom and also claimed that it was in some sense already present in his own ministry, a claim that he acted out by performing not magic but miracles, especially healings and exorcisms. From this consideration of Jesus' mentor, message, and miracles, the figure of Jesus emerges as an Elijah-like eschatological prophet of a Kingdom both future and yet already in some fashion present, especially in Jesus' miracles. Meier proposes in his third volume to reconstruct Jesus' authoritative interpretation of the Law and guidance for concrete behavior, as well as the individuals and groups with whom he interacted: the Twelve and other disciples, tax collectors and sinners, Sadducees and Pharisees.

By 2000, the lines of division among those pursuing the question of the historical Jesus corresponded roughly to earlier positions on Jesus' eschatology. Weiss' and Schweitzer's construct of a Jesus for whom the coming of an apocalyptically envisaged Kingdom lay wholly in the future met its counterpoint in C. H. Dodd's assertion that for Jesus the Kingdom was wholly present in his own ministry, to which J. Jeremias responded with a Kingdom which was for Jesus both already and not-yet. In similar fashion, E. P. Sanders more recently emphasized the futurity of Jesus' expectation, while Crossan's and Marcus Borg's sapiential Jesus knows only a present Kingdom, to which Meier responded with a Jesus for whom the Kingdom is both outstanding and yet proleptically present. On all their accounts, however, Jesus is to be understood historically as a 1st-century Jew concerned in some fashion with the renewal of his people, and none would deny that such renewal involved more than a purely religious realm; for Jesus, as for the ancient world generally, religion, society, and politics formed a seamless garment.

Theological Significance. Beyond the question of the historical Jesus lies the further question of the theological significance of the results of historical Jesus research. The very nature of that research sheds some light on the issue. Inquiry into Jesus by historical means involves the historian in a subtle interplay between initial interpretive hypothesis and data, the factual status of which is to be determined; the outcome will be a set of more or less probable facts rendered coherent and intelligible by some more or less comprehensive master image or hypothesis. Historical constructs of Jesus thus involve both degrees of probability in their various components and perspectival definition of their unifying hypotheses; hence, such constructs are in principle always subject to revision. Negatively, this would preclude according foundational significance for Christian faith to anyone's particular version of the historical Jesus. It would rule out as naive and simplistic moves like Harnack's, common though such maneuvers have again become, whereby one appeals to a historical construct as the "real Jesus" who ought to take precedence over the interpretive products of Scripture and tradition. On the other hand, the limits intrinsic to the practice of history do not render that discipline's results merely arbitrary or purely subjective.

The results of historical Jesus research become significant for Christian faith in at least two ways. Most generally, they counter recurring temptations to docetism by presenting Christians with images of Jesus as fully human and historically situated. Second, when the perspectives from which historical data on Jesus are evaluated and interpreted includes Christian faith, that faith may, among other things, illumine the significance those data hold for the present. From this enlarged perspective an interpreter may move beyond a strictly historical account to produce a historically informed theological narrative. Such theological readings of historical interpretations of Jesus are distinctively modern artifacts that continue the christological process from which the Gospels emerged; they may function for contemporary Christians much as the gospels did for their original addressees, even while they serve the ongoing proclamation of those same gospels.

See Also: JESUS CHRIST, BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES OF; JESUS CHRIST AND WORLD RELIGIONS; JESUS CHRIST (THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: M. BORG, Jesus, A New Vision. Spirit, Culture, and the Life of Discipleship (San Francisco, Calif. 1987); Meeting Jesus Again for the First Time (San Francisco, Calif. 1994). G. BORNKAMM, Jesus of Nazareth (Eng. trans.; New York 1960). J. D. CROSSAN, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Peasant (San Francisco, Calif. 1991). R. A. HORSLEY, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (San Francisco, Calif. 1987). J. P. MEIER, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, Volume One: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York 1991). E. P. SANDERS, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia, Pa. 1985). A. SCHWEITZER, A Quest of the Historical Jesus (Eng. trans.; New York 1968). J. SOBRINO, Jesus The Liberator: A Historical-Theological Reading of Jesus of Nazareth (Eng. trans.; Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993). G. VERMES, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (Minneapolis, Minn. 1993).

[W. P. LOEWE]

HISTORICAL THEOLOGY

Historical theology as a scholarly discipline is difficult to define. An acceptable working definition might be "the genetic study of Christian faith and doctrine" (Pelikan xiii). But such study has been differently designated in recent centuries, with varying content and consequent confusion. The time-honored term for the genetic history of faith and doctrine is history of dogma, where "dogma" is sometimes restricted to basic orthodox affirmations of the Christian Church (e.g., Trinity), sometimes used more loosely to include less central doctrines. In the latter sense, history of theology is a term consecrated by long usage. History of Christian thought adds to dogmas and doctrines what we call ethics, as well as Christian reflection on other problems both of thought and of society (e.g., politics or such philosophical issues as the problem of universals). Historical theology itself has been used not only for the genetic study of faith and doctrine, but for the entire study of the history of the Church, and occasionally for all those theological and paratheological disciplines whose method is historical. One understanding of positive theology has been the study of Scripture and church history. Some see history of Christian doctrine as the clearest term; for it distinguishes the field from general church history and from other branches of church history, e.g., history of liturgy or of Canon Law.

Development of the Discipline. The development of the discipline has been influenced from two quarters: (1) the movement of theology, especially its stances toward doctrinal continuity and change; (2) the evolution of the historical method. If the definitive Word God spoke in Christ has been deposited with the Church, then, as early orthodoxy saw it, doctrinal change could only be distortion. In consequence, historical theology in the patristic period is largely a matter of documenting the apostolic succession of dioceses and dogmas, and the cataloguing of sects and heresies, rather than the genetic study of the mainstream of Christian doctrine (cf., e.g., the works of Irenaeus, Eusebius, Epiphanius). In this context the prevailing theological attitude came to be enshrined in the classic axiom of VINCENT OF LÉRINS: "one must take the greatest possible care to believe what has been believed everywhere, ever, by everyone (quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est)" (Commonitoria 2). Tradition was the touchstone, innovation the automatic enemy. "Let nothing be innovated," Stephen I wrote to Cyprian, "beyond what has been handed down" (Cyprian, Ep. 74).

In the Middle Ages the Sic et non theological method (e.g., in ABELARD and in its refinement by Aquinas) uncovered apparent contradictions in what had been accepted as patristic consensus. But the method is more important for the questions it raised than for the answers it proposed. It did not make use of historical criteria to account for the theological variations it was attempting to explain.

The REFORMATION controversies, while confronting the crucial allegation of a cleavage between primitive Christianity and the Catholic tradition, still pursued history polemically and evaluated change dogmatically. The task of historical scholarship was to prove that the adversary was guilty of innovation, had broken from authoritative Scripture or unvarying tradition, and therefore was doctrinally in error. In this sense the Reformation and COUNTER-REFORMATION outlook was closer to patristic and medieval than to modern historiography. On the other hand, a new temper and method were beginning to show: a more profound probing of the past and a growing sense of the pluralism of the past. In addition, the more objective methodology of Renaissance HUMANISM, especially in the area of secular history, could not but affect, if only gradually, the confessional search for the Church's historical and doctrinal roots.

In the ENLIGHTENMENT climate of the 18th century, both on the Continent and in Great Britain, the scholarly study of church history increasingly emancipated itself from ecclesiastical sponsorship and began to define itself as an academic discipline. But the golden age of historical theology was the 19th century. This for two reasons. First, research in Christian theology came to be dominated by the modern historical method, particularly by the historical investigation of the New Testament and of the development of dogma. Here some of the more influential figures, for all their recognized inadequacies, are Ferdinand Christian BAUR, Johann Adam MÖHLER, John Henry NEWMAN, and the most erudite and eloquent spokesman for historical theology, Adolf von HARNACK, with his utter commitment to the historical method as the primary means for analyzing Christian doctrine. Each faced frankly and knowledgeably the inevitable tension between history and tradition or faith commitment. Second, critical editions of the source material, e.g., patristic texts, built more extensively and profoundly upon the remarkable editions produced in the previous three centuries, stimulated in part by many discoveries of lost works, particularly from the earliest period and in Oriental languages (e.g., Syriac, Georgian, Coptic). Such editions and discoveries have increased at a remarkable rate in the 20th century and historical research has been intensified through comprehensive study of individual writers and the history of individual words and ideas.

Vatican II. The Council did not explicitly espouse any particular philosophy or theology which attempts to expose a design for the course of history. Nonetheless, the official documents of the Council take more notice of history than those of any previous council, and, hence, they at least implicitly deal with the process of the story of mankind. The Constitution on the Church, though it never loses sight of the transcendent nature of the Church, insists that the Church truly enters human history (Lumen gentium 8, 9). The introductory paragraphs of the Constitution on the Church in the Modern World even attempt an assessment of the current historical situation and venture the judgment that the human race has entered "a new age of history" (Gaudium et spes 4). This judgment concurs with, and probably reflects, the conviction Pope JOHN XXIII expressed in Humanae salutis, his apostolic constitution, Dec. 25, 1961, convoking the Council, which stated that human society was "on the edge of a new era." Other documents of the Council, especially when they deal with real or seeming changes in doctrine and discipline, evince a similar awareness of historical context and process. The desire to bring the Church up to date and to make it more effective in the contemporary world was the pervasive theme of the Council, as the term aggiornamento suggests. Such a desire in itself indicated an awareness of historical and cultural change and made possible the Council's adoption of "accommodation to the times" as its theme. Previous councils tended to assess change negatively and, in principle, to resist it in the Church.

Vatican II's attention to history was a response to the more general application of historical methods and categories to the kind of study of religion that had gained great momentum in the 19th century, especially in Protestant circles, and that in the 20th century characterized biblical, patristic, and liturgical scholarship also among Catholics. The impetus for the Council's attention to history was, in fact, derived from such scholarship rather than from systematic theology, where a rather ahistorical NEO-THOMISM prevailed for the most part. Simply by taking account of history, the Council virtually assumed the obligation to make some statements about its course or design. The pastoral nature of the Council and the fact that its decrees were documents formulated in committee precluded the possibility that any single point of view would prevail to the exclusion of others. Nonetheless, certain features of the Council's appreciation of history can be singled out as more typical than others.

First of all, the Council assesses the course of history and the current "age" with considerable optimism, speaking of its social, scientific, technological "progress" (cf. Gravissimum educationis Introd. and 1; Apostolicam actuositatem 1; Gaudium et spes 57. For qualification of this optimism cf. Apostolicam actuositatem 7; Presbyterorum ordinis 17 and 22; Gaudium et spes 10, 15, and 37). Although it recognizes the ambiguities and ambivalence of the human condition, it gives relatively little support to those philosophies or theologies of history that view the story of mankind as a decline from an earlier and better condition. Secondly, the Council consistently maintains that the course of history is under providential guidance (Lumen gentium 23) and it occasionally employs the Eusebian description of the historical process as a “preparation for the Gospel” (Lumen gentium 16), as an unfolding of a divine plan, which presumably has a beginning, middle, and end (Dei Verbum 2–3, 11, 14). The Council asserts, for instance, that Christ is the key, the center, and the purpose of the whole of human history (Gaudium et spes 10). Eschatological expectations for history are expressed in that same document (ibid. 39, 45). Thirdly, Vatican II evidences a strong sense of continuity with the past and a desire to remain faithful to it. Continuity of faith, of spiritual gift, and of evangelical tradition from the primitive Church to the present is often asserted, despite recognition that considerable change has taken place through the centuries (Lumen gentium 9, 21, 23, 33, 39, 50, 51; Perfectae caritatis 1, 9; Apostolicam actuositatem 8; Ad gentes 5). Fourthly, the Council often makes use of forward-looking terms like progress, evolution, and maturation to describe how continuity has been maintained while change has occurred (Gaudium et spes 6, 54; cf. above on optimism). When these terms are applied to doctrine, (Lumen gentium 12; 55; Unitatis redintegratio 24; Optatam totius 11; Dei Verbum 7; Apostolicam actuositatem 3; Dignitatis humanae 1, 9, 12; Gaudium et spes 63) they quite inevitably suggest the viewpoint of scholars influenced by Newman’s essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine and by the renewed interest in the doctrine of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST, which was widespread in Catholic circles for several decades before the convocation of the Council. In both instances, an organic model of change is implied. The evolutionary model for the development of the cosmos expounded by TEILHARD DE CHARDIN was probably also an influence (cf. Gaudium et spes 39, 45).

Thus there is considerable effort in the documents of the Council to break away from a style of historical thinking which would see the Church as immune to process or change, as if it moved through history unaffected by history. This effort in some instances even intimates a breakdown of the traditional dichotomy in ecclesiastical documents between the Church and the Christian people, which allowed the Church to be without fault and untouched by history while the Christian people sinned and were subject to the “injuries of time.” The use of terms like “the People of God” to designate the Church, especially in Lumen gentium, is seen by some scholars as indicating this change in mentality.

Present Views: Content and Method. The present task of historical theology is not easily expressed. The basic issues are content and method. For some, the subject matter is what the Church has believed, taught, and confessed on the basis of the Word of God. Besides admitted ambiguities (“Church,” “Word of God”), such a definition restricts the discipline unduly to what the various confessions regard as dogmas or their equivalent. It is hard to see how historical theology can disregard the genetic study of theologoumena (e.g., speculations on the human knowledge or ignorance of Christ, on religious freedom, on the human person as image of God) and moral issues (e.g., abortion, social justice). Historical theology’s subject matter should be broad enough to embrace whatever in thought, belief, and life can properly be termed Christian and has a history.

Equally controversial is the discipline’s methodology. For some scholars, the one legitimate demand on historical theology is that it be sound history, that it follow the canons of acceptable historical method, presumably determined nontheologically. Others would accept this for a history of theology, but are persuaded that a discipline which calls itself historical theology cannot disregard theological presuppositions that make for a ceaseless dialectical interaction between faith and history and in fact affect one’s interpretation of the past.

The issue so put involves the relationship between historical and systematic or dogmatic theology. Contemporary reflection sees them as inseparable, yet distinct. For Gerhard Ebeling, these are two aspects of the same hermeneutic task of theology: their common concern is the concrete event of the Word of God; their common task to foster effective contemporary proclamation. Historical theology is primarily concerned to determine the traditum: what was handed down and how. DOGMATIC THEOLOGY focuses on the contemporary observance of the tradition, participates in the actus tradendi, the tradition of a present and continuous event. As essentially systematic, it must show how all genuine theological statements are necessarily related to one another and to the reality they bring to understanding. Historical theology exercises a “disturbing” function: it upsets established prejudices, forces the dogmatic theologian to face uncomfortable facts and forgotten truths.

Wolfhart Pannenberg argues that, since Christianity is essentially a process, a history, the tasks involved in describing the essence and truth of Christianity can only be performed within a historical theology, provided that, while remaining historical, it adopt a systematic approach. Such a historical theology, he believes, would end “the opposition between historical and systematic theology.” In the present theological situation, however, a “special” systematic theology is necessary in addition to the historical disciplines.

Bibliography: G. EBELING, Theology and Proclamation: Dialogue with Bultmann (Philadelphia 1966) 22–31. W. PANNENBERG, Theology and the Philosophy of Science (Philadelphia 1976) 371–381, 418–420. J. PELIKAN, Historical Theology: Continuity and Change in Christian Doctrine (New York 1971). J. RATZINGER, Das Problem der Dogmengeschichte in der Sicht der katholischen Theologie (Cologne 1966). G. H. WILLIAMS, “Church History: From Historical Theology to the Theology of History,” in A. S. NASH, ed., Protestant Thought in the Twentieth Century: Whence and Whither? (New York 1951) 145–178. L. J. O’DONOVAN, “Was Vatican II Evolutionary?” Theological Studies 36 (Woodstock, Md. 1975) 493–502. J. W. O’MALLEY, “Reform, Historical Consciousness, and Vatican II’s Aggiornamento,” Theological Studies 32 (Woodstock, Md. 1971) 573–601.

[W. J. BURGHARDT/J. W. O’MALLEY]

HISTORICISM

A tendency to accord a primacy to history in the explanation of facts, akin to the tendencies of LOGICISM and SCIENTISM to give primacy to logic and science respectively. First used in 1879 to describe the thought of Giambattista VICO (Cecil Currie), the term is currently used in two senses.

In the first sense, historicism may be defined as a preoccupation with the individual, unique, ascertainable historical situation, without any attempt to judge the situation by any epistemological or theological presuppositions. Facts are considered in their multiplicity and totality, not as amenable to systematic interpretation, but as expressive of the endless variety of historical forms in constant transformation. All individual historical manifestations are in Leopold von RANKE’s phrase “immediate to God.” Thought structures, institutions, and cultures themselves are to be judged, not in terms of an evolving meaningful plan of universal validity, but solely in terms of their relativistic value to a given time and place. Historicism in this sense is opposed in theory to any of the classical philosophies of history that would try to discern intelligible patterns in the historical process as a whole.

As opposed to this, Maurice Mandelbaum sees historicism as a philosophical effort to explain the fact of change. He distinguishes a historicity of values, i.e., a belief that cultural values are indigenous to the age that produces them, from a historicism of knowledge, which maintains that truth and falsity must be judged with reference to the time in which they are formulated. To Martin D’ARCY, on the other hand, historicism is identical with the philosophy of history—any broad interpretative effort to assemble facts into a meaningful pattern. He considers three types of historicism: the first attempts to explain history in terms of physical laws (biological or economic); the second sees history as a meaningful drama with a beginning and end created by man’s own efforts; the third sees history in terms of divine Providence.

Karl R. POPPER is perhaps the most articulate of recent critics of historicism in this latter sense of interpretative history. He questions both the logic and methodology of a historicism that would discover a key to history through laws of historical development.

See Also: HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF; HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography: M. H. MANDELBAUM, The Problem of Historical Knowledge (New York 1938). M. C. D’ARCY, The Meaning and Matter of History (New York 1959). D. E. LEE and R. N. BECK, “The Meaning of ‘Historicism,’” American Historical Review 59 (1953–54) 568–577. N. PETRUZZELLIS, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:997–1005. A. MIRGELER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:393–394. H. G. GADAMER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:369–371.

[R. P. MOHAN]

HISTORIOGRAPHY, ECCLESIASTICAL

The development of ecclesiastical historiography depends both on the formal recognition of its object, the Church, and on the methods by which the investigator examines and presents the role of the Church in time and space. The study of this discipline may center on four distinct periods: (1) the beginnings in Christian antiquity; (2) the expansion of historical insight, both sacred and profane, in the Middle Ages; (3) Church history from the 16th to the 18th century; and (4) the modern science of Church history in the 19th and 20th centuries.

Early Christianity

If the first Pentecost is accepted as the Church’s birthdate, the ACTS of the Apostles should be credited with the distinction of being the first fruits of historiography in the Church. Nevertheless EUSEBIUS of Caesarea bears the title “Father of Church History” by reason of his Historia ecclesiastica, which in its earliest form (in seven books) appeared prior to the persecution of the Emperor DIOCLETIAN. After the conversion of CONSTANTINE he continued his account to 324, expanding it into ten books. It was Eusebius’s purpose to report “on the times which transpired from Our Savior’s day to our own,” especially on the most distinguished Christian communities and their leaders, on the rise of heresies and on the persecutions with which the Church was harassed. Accordingly, he began with the work of Christ and the Apostles (books 1–3), published the lists of bishops in the apostolic churches of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem (books 4–7), included a catalogue of ecclesiastical and heretical writer as well as a discussion of the persecutions of the Church and concluded with the “persecution of our time” (books 8–9) and the victory of Christianity (book 10). Because of the citation of numerous texts from official acts and of excerpts from documents no longer extant (for example, from PAPIAS of Hieropolis), the work of Eusebius is considered to be the most important historical source for the first three centuries of the Church’s existence. In the judgment of Eusebius, the universal Church lived pre-eminently in the local churches of apostolic origin.

Denis Pétau, by Jacques Lubin.

EUSEBIUS was fortunate in his three continuators. Of these, the best was the lawyer and historian SOCRATES of Constantinople, who, depending on excellent sources, described events from 305 to 439; in covering the period 325 to 439, SOZOMEN was superior to his collaborator in narrative skill but not in reliability. THEODORET OF CYR wove into his text many sources for the years 324 to 428, but is inaccurate in chronology and lacked impartiality as a native of Antioch. THEODORE LECTOR coordinated the three accounts and continued the relation of events to 527. Of his work, however, only an epitome has survived. The Church history of EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, down to the year 594, presents a severely orthodox account of the CHRISTOLOGICAL CONTROVERSIES of that age. From this work and from the epitome of Theodore, later Byzantine annalistic historians, for example, THEOPHANES THE CONFESSOR (d. 817) and Nicephorus Callistus XANTHOPULUS (d. c. 1335), drew their inspiration, but they considered Church history to be connected in the strictest fashion with the history of the Byzantine Empire and its rulers.

In the West, the Church History of Eusebius exerted its influence through the free Latin rendering and additions of RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA (403); his three continuators lived on in the Historia tripartite, translated by Epiphanius under the direction of CASSIODORUS. Western historical interpretation during the Middle Ages, however, while it was indebted to these works, was more deeply influenced by the creation of a Christian SALVATION HISTORY, drawn from Old Testament and New Testament sources, appearing in the world chronicles that began as early as the third century with Sextus JULIUS AFRICANUS and HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME. The somewhat free Latin recasting of the world chronicle of Eusebius by St. JEROME became both the prototype and the point of departure for Christian historiography in the medieval West. In the same category, the Chronicon of ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (to 615) was highly esteemed. The chronicles of SULPICIUS SEVERUS and of PROSPER OF AQUITAINE were also held in esteem though to a lesser degree. Employing the history of the Roman emperors as their chronological frame of reference, these chroniclers projected a profane history in the guise of a Biblically oriented salvation history. It remained for St. AUGUSTINE, however, to present salvation history in the grand manner in the 22 books of De civitate Dei, composed between 413 and 426. The City of God, identified with the Church as a sacramental society, stands in unending conflict with the Earthly City (civitas terrena). The latter Augustinian concept is not to be identified with the Roman state, but with the society of men concerned with earthly values. The struggle between faith and unbelief is the master theme of world history. Augustine sought to demonstrate that Christianity bore no guilt for the current miseries with which the Roman world was afflicted. A similar apologetic theme was pursued by Paul OROSIUS of Braga in his Historiae adversus paganos, a work inspired by Augustine, written between 417 and 418. The central focus of both profane and salvation history is the Incarnation of the Logos. In placing the birth of Christ in the year 754 ab Urbe condita, cited in his Easter table for 532, DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS became the founder of Christian chronology.

Middle Ages

Medieval historiography in the West cannot be labeled Church history; it is, rather, a combination of salvation and profane history, embellished with individual historical accounts of dioceses, monasteries and saints. The divine economy of redemption, proceeding according to medieval thought, from the creation of man through the Old down to the New Dispensation, found its ultimate expression in the last things, the Eschata. It was customary to distinguish three stages in the history of the world (ante legem, sub lege, sub gratia), or six world epochs corresponding to the six days of creation in Genesis (Aug., Civ. 22.30; Trin. 4.4). Furthermore, the organization of time periods into four world empires, associated with Daniel 2.36, suggested for the Christian Era the succession of the Roman emperors as a chronological framework.

CHRONICLES AND ANNALS

The more important chronicles of the Middle Ages depended on Eusebius and Jerome and their continuators for their reconstruction of the earlier period. But the closer they approached their own day, the more they depended on personal experience for knowledge of contemporary events. Thus, the Chronicon of REGINO OF PRÜM, a mere compilation down to the time of Louis the Pious, becomes a reliable source for the later Carolingian period. Similarly, the world chronicles of HERMANNUS CONTRACTUS of Reichenau (d. 1054) and of SIGEBERT OF GEMBLoux (ending in 1105) were expanded into histories of the German Empire. OTTO OF FREISING (d. 1158), on the other hand, in his Historia de duabus civitatibus, follows Augustine rather than the work of Eusebius and Jerome.

During the age of the evangelization of the German peoples, GREGORY OF TOURS (d. 594) described the acceptance of Christianity by the Franks; somewhat later, in his Historia ecclesiastica, BEDE (d. 735) wrote on the Anglo-Saxons and how “they were converted to the Church of Christ.” The Chronicon Bohemorum of COSMAS OF PRAGUE (d. 1125) was similarly motivated. Monastic and diocesan ANNALS, however, were to become more significant than ethnic histories in developing the history of the Church in the Middle Ages. Year by year in every great monastery (for example, FULDA, SANKT GALLEN, and LINDISFARNE), the chronicler recorded the most important events. Outstanding among the diocesan annals, which developed somewhat later, were such works as the history of the church of Reims by FLODOARD (d. c. 966) and the Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae pontificum by ADAM OF BREMEN (d. after 1081).

Daniel Papebroch.

VITAE

Perhaps the most popular form of medieval historical writing—with the exception of the ubiquitous annals—was the vita, a biography devised to serve the purposes of edification. With notable exceptions, the vita was generally the life of a saint, fashioned on classical models such as the Lives of Sallust or Suetonius and on the Christian pattern of Sulpicius Severus. Although in the later Middle Ages hagiographical writing showed a marked degree of restraint, when compared to the legendary fabrications that abounded in the Merovingian lives of the saints, they nevertheless maintained the same inspirational objective. Thus the monk Ruotger, in his life of St. BRUNO OF COLOGNE (composed 967–969), projected the model bishop of the Empire, successful in achieving both spiritual and temporal goals; EADMER accented the sanctity of ANSELM OF CANTERBURY (d. 1106), not by regaling the reader with miracles but by stressing his subject’s fidelity to the monastic ideal. WILLIAM OF SAINT-THIERRY and Gaufridus composed a life of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX based on their intimate familiarity with that great Cistercian. The lives of the great religious founders, for example, of FRANCIS OF ASSISI by BONAVENTURE and of DOMINIC by JORDAN OF SAXONY, were influenced by the concern of each order for a standardized portrait of its founder.

"Works of St. Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers," dedication page, published by Pierre Coustant.

History. With the emergence of HUGH OF FLEURY and ORDERICUS VITALIS in the 12th century, the use of the title Historia ecclesiastica began anew. Their work, however, was hardly Church history after the fashion of Eusebius. Toward the close of the century the Historia pontificalis by JOHN OF SALISBURY (d. 1180) attempted to assign to papal history the function of universal Church history, an effort that was repeated in the Historia ecclesiastica nova by the Dominican BARTHOLOMEW OF LUCCA (d. 1326). The chronicle of the Dominican MARTIN OF TROPPEAU (d. 1278) was widely used as a textbook and frequently translated and continued, as was that of the Dominican BERNARD GUI (finished in 1331). While these works may be classified as valuable late medieval chronicles of the popes, they cannot be considered as Church history in the strict sense. They failed to satisfy the requirements of the genre because, in basic structure, they conformed to the pattern of the world chronicle.

And finally, neither the continuations of the LIBER PONTIFICALIS down to B. Platina nor the Lives of the Popes of Avignon provided a proper substitute for a genuine history of the Church.

The theology of history, elaborated by the Calabrian Cistercian JOACHIM OF FIORE (d. 1202), exerted a profound influence on historical thought in the High Middle Ages and succeeding centuries. Joachim distinguished three periods of salvation history: (1) the age of the Father, in which Old Testament law prevailed; (2) the current age of the Son, dominated by faith and grace; and (3) the future age of the Holy Spirit, producing the reign of love, during which the Evangelium aeternum would be announced. In the course of the last prophetic period of salvation history the Johannine Church of the spirit would replace the current Petrine Church. Despite the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL's condemnation of Joachim's Trinitarian teachings, his ideas continued unabated among the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS (for example, PETER JOHN OLIVI), in late medieval APOCALYPTIC movements in the literature of reform, and, surprisingly, in the writings of NICHOLAS OF CUSA.

Related to Joachimism was the "theory of decline, which held that the Church in the current age had fallen from the high estate of the primitive Church and was in need of reform. The descent from the ideal of early Christianity had proceeded through several stages: the golden age of the martyrs had been followed by the silver era of Constantine, then by an age of bronze and finally by an iron age, in which both clerical and lay indifference and immorality provoked the judgment of God. Influenced by the theory of decline, Dietrich of NIEHEIM in the 15th century wrote his History of the Great Schism (see WESTERN SCHISM), and the Viennese professor Thomas EBENDORFER produced his several tracts on the same theme. During the age of religious dissension in the 16th century, however, the theory of decline was given a completely new interpretation.

Church History, 16th to 18th Century

The historical image of the Church as it appeared to Martin LUTHER was formed by the conviction that the true Biblical doctrine of salvation had been falsified by the influence of ARISTOTELIANISM on theology and the connivance of the papacy during the previous 400 years. He concluded that the repeated efforts toward the reform of the Church in the late Middle Ages—never actually implemented—demanded, as a presupposition, a return to the primitive doctrines of Redemption and justification and the removal of intervening "human institutions." Matthias FLACIUS (Vlačich) and his collaborators attempted a vindication of Luther's view in their historical project (1559–74), which was organized according to centuries and based on a systematic marshaling of the sources. They tried to prove that, in its teaching and organization, Lutheranism rather than the Roman Church corresponded more closely to the early Church and that it was, in consequence, the true Church. As a result of this position, the history of theology was compelled to assume the burden of proof and to furnish historical evidence that the Roman Catholic Church, in its teaching, liturgy and institutions, was in conformity with primitive Christianity. Simultaneously, systematic theology developed the doctrine of the MARKS OF THE CHURCH (notae ecclesiae), and through the efforts of Robert BELLARMINE and Maximilian Sandaeus (Van der Sandt, d. 1656) ECCLESIOLOGY became an integrating factor in APOLOGETICS. The need for a more precise definition of the concept of the Church and the pressure to defend it against Protestant attack actually contributed to the return of Christian historiography to the tasks of general Church history.

Obviously, both Catholics and Protestants were able to rely on the preparatory work supplied by the humanists. The published editions of the great Fathers of the Church (Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome) and of the early Church historians (Eusebius) in Latin, 1523, and in Greek, 1544, by ERASMUS of Rotterdam and his collaborators; the conciliar collections of J. MERLIN, Peter Crabbe and L. SURIUS; the editions of the ancient liturgies (for example, the liturgy of St. Basil by Georg WITZEL, 1546 and the APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS by Francisco TORRES, 1563); and the collected sources for the history of the papacy and of the Roman Church by the Augustinian Onofrio PANVINIO (d. 1569)—all provided a wealth of material for the Annales ecclesiastici of Caesar BARONIUS (d. 1607), an elaboration of the lectures that he had delivered in the Oratory of St. Philip NERI. The work of Baronius, appearing in 12 volumes between 1588 and 1605, covered the history of the Church down to the pontificate of INNOCENT III and was based on both printed and manuscript sources with copious citation of pertinent texts. The objective was patently apologetic: “against the innovators of our day, and in defense of the authority and of the antiquity of the sacred traditions of the Roman Church.” The Annales, continued by many authors, especially Abraham Bzovius (d. 1637) and Odoricus Raynaldus (d. 1671), remained the standard work of general Church history into the 19th century.

The same period saw the emergence of the history of Christian literature. The catalogues of authors, compiled by GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES (c. 480), Isidore of Seville, ILDEFONSUS OF TOLEDO and their medieval continuators, SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOUX and Johannes TRITHEMIUS, were reedited and enlarged (1580) by a fresh review of Christian literary production. Similar works appeared at short intervals: the Epitome of the Augustinian Angelo ROCCA (1594), the voluminous Apparatus sacer of the Jesuit Antonio POSSEVINO (1606) and the little work of R. Bellarmine, De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis (1613). At the same time the Belgian Albert Le Mire (d. 1640) carried on the catalogue of Trithemius and founded the study of ecclesiastical statistics.

John Bolland.

The advance of Church history in the 17th and 18th centuries can be studied under three headings: (1) the broadening of the documentary foundation of Church history by the edition of numerous texts, improved through the application of a critical method; (2) the appearance of monumental historicostatistical works on the papacy, the dioceses and religious orders, which were to remain authoritative for centuries; and (3) the rise of professional instruction in Church history in schools of theology toward the end of the period.

EDITIONS AND METHODOLOGY

By employing Greek texts for the first time, the Roman edition of the general councils (1608–12), prepared under the direction of PAUL V, surpassed all of its predecessors in the 16th century. The Sacrosancta concilia (17 v. 1671–72), edited by the Jesuits Philippe LABBÉ and G. Cossart, included both ecumenical and provincial councils and synods—as the Collectio regia (Paris 1644) had previously done. Their work was later expanded by Étienne BALUZE (1683), Nicola and Sebastiano Coleti (1728–33) and Giovanni Domenico MANSI (1748–52). Mansi's later work, the Amplissima collectio (31 v. 1759–98), is the most complete and the most frequently consulted conciliar collection. Between 1899 and 1927, L. PETIT and J. B. Martin, continued Mansi's work down to VATICAN COUNCIL I. Though inferior to Mansi in volume, the Collectio maxima of the Jesuit J. HARDOUIN (1714–15), commissioned by the ASSEMBLY OF THE FRENCH CLERGY, surpassed it in the use of critical method. The appearance of national conciliar collections paralleled the great conciliar editions of G. Loaysa (1593) and J. Catalani's second edition of the work of J. Sáenz de Aguirre (1693–95) for Spain; of J. SIRMOND (1629) for France; of H. Spelman (1639–64) and D. Wilkins (1737) for Ireland and England; of J. F. Schannat and J. Hartzheim (1759–90) for Germany.

The methodological advance that characterized the editing of conciliar documents was applied with equal success to the hagiographical collections, whose objective was the vindication of Catholic veneration of the saints. The Lives of the Saints, calendared by L. Lippomano (d. 1559) and L. Surius (d. 1578), were not only brought to completion by the Acta sanctorum (ActSS) of the Jesuits John Bolland and Gottfried Henskens but—more importantly—were superseded by the use of historical criticism. The first two volumes of the Acta sanctorum, containing the saints for the month of January, appeared in 1643. The most renowned successor of Bolland, Daniel Papebroch (d. 1714), defended the method of the BOLLANDISTS against the attack of the Benedictines and the Spanish INQUISITION. The Jesuit Denis PÉTAU (Petavius, d. 1652) founded the science of CHRONOLOGY, and the Benedictine Jean MABILLON (d. 1707) founded the sciences of PALEOGRAPHY and DIPLOMATICS. In preparing reliable texts for the Fathers of the Church, the MAURISTS refined the methods of textual and literary criticism, systematically investigated manuscript collections and solved problems of authenticity.

The edition of the works of St. Augustine by the Maurists Thomas Blampin and Pierre COUSTANT, and the edition of John Chrysostom by Bernard de MONTFAUCON surpassed all previous efforts as a result of the meticulous care employed in emending the text and by the critical approach to questions of authenticity. The De antiquis ecclesiae ritibus (1700–02), the work of the Maurists Mabillon and Edmond Martène, marked the beginning of the science of LITURGICS. Somewhat earlier, the Oratorian L. THOMASSIN, in his Vetus et nova ecclesiae disciplina (1688), had begun the scientific study of the history of Canon Law. In the field of the history of Christian literature, the Nouvelle bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques (1684–91) by the Jansenist L. E. DUPIN, replaced all earlier works because of the expanse of its coverage.

tiques (1684–91) by the Jansenist L. E. DUPIN, replaced all earlier works because of the expanse of its coverage.

PAPAL, DIOCESAN AND INSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

Among the 17th and 18th century historical works of reference emphasizing the statistical approach, the most outstanding was the Vitae et res gestae pontificum Romanorum et S. R. E. cardinalium (1601–02) by the Dominican Alfons Chacon (Ciaconius). The revised and expanded edition by A. Oldoini is still useful. For its time, the Italia sacra (1643–62) of the Cistercian Ferdinando Ughelli was a monumental work of reference for the diocesan history of Italy. Later improved by the edition of N. Coleti (1717–22), it served as the model for the Gallia Christiana, edited by Scévole and Louis Sainte-Marthe. In 1710, by order of the Assembly of the French Clergy, this work was revised by the Benedictine Martène and his collaborators and became the most perfect work of its kind. Somewhat later came the España sagrada by the Augustinian Enrique FLÓREZ (begun in 1754) and the Illyricum sacrum by the Jesuit D. FARLATI (begun in 1751). The plan of Abbot Gerbert of Sankt Blasien to produce a similar work, the Germania sacra, was never carried out.

All of the great orders provided for the publication of source collections and encyclopedic works on their own history: the Franciscans, in the Annales Ordinis Minorum by the Irish friar Luke WADDING (d. 1657); the Benedictines, in the Annales Ordinis Sancti Benedicti by the Maurist Mabillon, preceded by his Acta sanctorum O.S.B.; the Dominicans, the Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (1719–21), an outstanding catalogue of authors made through the efforts of J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD. The Carmelites, with C. de Villiers (1752), and the Augustinians, with J. F. Ossinger (1768), published similar works. The 18th century was the age of great documentary collections, of which the most distinguished was the Bullarium Ordinis Praedicatorum by P. Ripoll and A. Brémond (1729–40). The Franciscan H. Hélyot attempted to write the first general history of all religious orders (1714–19).

General Church history, however, failed to keep pace with the publication of new source material and works of a historicostatistical character. The Historia ecclesiastica of the Dominican Natalis Alexander (1699) was a collection of 230 monographs, hardly a work of historical narrative. The mosaic-like but orderly and accurate mélange of selections from the sources, the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique by L. S. de TILLEMONT (1693–1712), ends suddenly with 513. C. FLEURY, on the other hand, brought his Histoire ecclésiastique (1691–1720) down to the Council of CONSTANCE, but his work was marred by Gallican views, which were opposed by G. A. ORSI, OP, in his Istoria ec- clesiastica (1747–62). All of these multivolumed enterprises, however, lacked the necessary penetration and organization of material, which generally result from formal instruction and training.

PROFESSIONAL STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY

Although there was no dearth of planning during the 17th century to place Church history in the curriculum, it was nevertheless excluded from the program of studies in Catholic universities. In Protestant centers, however, and for the first time in Helmstedt in 1650, the new field of Church history was introduced successfully. The Summarium historiae ecclesiasticae, prepared for instructional purposes by the Leipzig professor A. Rechenberg (1697), who continued to labor under the preoccupations of the Magdeburg CENTURIATORS, abandoned their systematic divisions by centuries and substituted five distinct periods: (1) Ecclesia plantata (organization of the Church), (2) Ecclesia libertate gaudens (the Church in liberty), (3) Ecclesia pressa et obscurata (the Church oppressed and benighted), (4) Ecclesia gemens (the Church in travail), and (5) Ecclesia repurgata (the Church purified), that is, since the 16th century.

In Catholic circles, Church history was not introduced into the curriculum of theological schools until the 18th century, and even then not universally. A chair of Church history was founded at the Collegium Romanum in 1741 and Austrian schools of theology began lectures in “religious (geistliche) history” in 1752. Protestant leadership in the field was apparent in that Catholic textbooks prepared for instruction in history followed either the standard Protestant models, especially the work of J. L. von Mosheim (d. 1755), the “father of Protestant Church history,” or fell under the influence of the ENLIGHTENMENT, following, for example, such works as the Institutiones historiae ecclesiasticae and the Leitfaden in der Kirchengeschichte (1790) by M. Dannenmeyer. A progressive note appeared in the attempt, evident in the leading texts of the period, to achieve a periodization of history determined by content. Most texts, however, labored under a severe disadvantage: they were generally written from the viewpoint of a state-controlled Church, were anti-Roman in their interpretation and failed to grasp the supernatural character of the Church. Before a new advance could be made, Church history first had to purge itself of the values and outlooks of the Enlightenment that had vitiated its study. A clear reaction to rationalist Church history was already apparent in the History of the Church of Christ (1794–1809) by the Anglican I. Milner and in the General History of the Christian Church by the American Unitarian J. A. Priestley (1802–03). The decisive movement, however, was to develop on the Continent.

Scientific Church History

Two tasks presented themselves to the Church historian during the 19th and 20th centuries: a reevaluation of the Church in the light of its origins and the development of a scientific methodology to cope with its sources and their interpretation.

NEW INTERPRETATION

The distinction of having overcome the regalistic and rationalist concepts of the Church and of winning respect for its independence from the state and the acceptance of its supernatural character belongs to many authors working in the period from the French Revolution to the Restoration, some of whom were actually not Church historians. In 1799, while Pius VI was being taken to France as a prisoner, B. A. Cappellari, later Pope GREGORY XVI, wrote his Trionfo della s. sede e della chiesa, in which he predicted that both the Church and the papacy, as institutions founded by Christ, were indestructible and that they would shortly be revitalized. F. R. de CHATEAUBRIAND and J. de MAISTRE opened the perspective of the Church’s great tradition and of its cultural contributions in the Middle Ages. Meanwhile, the young H. F. R. de LAMENNAIS refuted GALLICANISM and the German Romantics steeped themselves in the piety of the much-abused MIDDLE AGES. F. L. Stolberg (d. 1819), attempted to confirm the tenets of faith, in the several volumes of his Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi, by recourse to history and identified himself as a proponent of Augustine’s and Bossuet’s interpretation of Church history as salvation history. J. T. KATERKAMP, also a member of the Münster circle of historians, wrote his history of the Church (1823–34) in the spirit of Stolberg. The decisive influence, however, in the reorientation of ecclesiastical historiography was the University of Tübingen Church historian, J. A. MÖHLER (1796–1838). Establishing the historicity of Christianity in the fact of the Incarnation, Möhler elaborated the distinction between Christian history and the history of the Church founded by Christ. His Symbolik sharply contrasted the doctrinal differences existing between Catholics and Protestants, thereby overcoming and rejecting the confessional indifferentism engendered by the Enlightenment. The Tübingen school, founded by Möhler and Johann Sebastian DREY (d. 1853), inspired the Conciliengeschichte, written by the future bishop C. J. HEFELE, which in its French edition and continuation by H. LECLERCQ is still the indispensable work in its field. The Munich school, founded by J. J. I. DÖLLINGER (1799–1890), was equally illustrious, exerting its influence on both France (C. F. MONTALEMBERT) and England (Lord J. E. ACTON).

In England, J. LINGARD’s Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church (1806) had already appeared, presenting a just interpretation of the Christian Middle Ages. The History of Latin Christianity down to the Death of Pope Nicholas V, by the Anglican H. MILMAN (1854–55), followed in the same vein and was praised by A. Froude as the “finest historical work in the English language.” The OXFORD MOVEMENT rediscovered the Fathers of the Church, producing J. H. NEWMAN, who, in his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845), while summarizing the results of his historical studies, concluded that the Roman Catholic Church had preserved intact the DEPOSIT OF FAITH committed to it, and in consequence consistently returned to its communion. By frankly acknowledging, however, the religious values to be found in the churches not united with Rome, Newman laid the foundation for a Catholic ecumenical interpretation of Church history.

CRITICAL SOURCE COLLECTIONS

Insight into the supernatural character of the Church and the removal of the Enlightenment’s indifferentism and prejudice against the Middle Ages were only one prerequisite for the flowering of Church history in the 19th century. The other was the discovery and availability of new sources, the emendation of the texts of sources already known and the application of historical criticism to their investigation. The Patrologia latina and the Patrologia graeca by J. P. MIGNE (d. 1875) merely reproduced the best existing texts of Latin ecclesiastical writers down to Innocent III and of the Greek writers to Cardinal Bessarion. Since 1903 supplementary texts have appeared in the Patrologia orientalis. The Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum, under the auspices of the Vienna Academy of Sciences (since 1860), has provided modern critical texts for the Latin Christian writers and since 1897 the Berlin Academy of Sciences has published the Griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (including some writers of the 4th and 5th centuries as well). Many other works of the Fathers of the Church have appeared in bilingual editions with French or English translations. Special mention should be made of the Sources chrétiennes.

Medieval and modern Church history has been especially enriched by the publication of great national source collections: in Germany, the Monumenta Germaniae historica (since 1819) and the Reichstagsakten (since 1867) edited under the auspices of the Historical Commission of Munich; in France, the continuation of the Rerum Gallicarum et Franciarum scriptores (begun in 1728) and the Collection de documents inédits (since 1835); in England, the Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores [Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 224 v. (London 1858–96)] and the State Papers (1856); in Spain, the Colección de documentos inéditos (1847); in Italy, the Fonti per la storia d’Italia (1887) and the new edition of the Rerum Italicarum scriptores by L. A. MURATORI [since 1900; for contents, see Repertorium fontium Historiae medii aevii primum ab Augusto Potthast digestum, nunc cura collegii historicorum e pluribus nationum emendatum et auctum: v.1, Series collectionum, Instituto Storico Italiano per il Medico Evo (Rome 1957—) 509–522].

The history of the popes in the Middle Ages was advanced by the admirable surveys of papal documents in the Regesta pontificum Romanorum by P. Jaffé (1851; 2d ed. 1885–88) and their continuation by A. POTTHAST (1873–75). Far superior to the above, however, is the collection of all papal documents to 1198, arranged by country, begun by P. KEHR and refined by new techniques of diplomatics developed by the École des Chartes in Paris and by the School of the Diplomatics in Vienna. The opening of the secret VATICAN ARCHIVES by Leo XIII in 1884 was a monumental event, marking a new era in the study of papal history and of Church history generally. Following Leo’s action, French scholarship undertook the publication of the papal registers of the 14th century and the GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT edited the sources for the history of papal financial administration and the Acta of the Council of TRENT. Next came the publication of the 16th- and 17th-century nunciature reports from Germany, France, Belgium, Poland and Spain; the status reports of dioceses prescribed by SIXTUS V; and the records pertaining to the investigation of episcopal candidates. The archives of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH provided a wealth of material for Catholic history in Protestant and mission countries. All the major religious orders exploited the Vatican archives in the interest of their own history, gradually publishing the sources pertinent to their own development, for example, in the Monumenta ordinis praedicatorum and in the Monumenta historica societatis Jesu.

REFERENCE WORKS AND PERIODICALS

The investigation of new source material was facilitated by new historical tools and works of reference. While the Series episcoporum (1873) of the Benedictine P. GAMS depended solely on printed sources, the Hierarchia Catholica (since 1898) by the Conventual K. EUBEL and his successors could draw on documents recently made available in the Vatican archives for statistical records pertinent to episcopal history. Indispensable for medieval Church history were the Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge of U. CHEVALIER (1877–88; 2d ed. 1903–07) and the Bibliotheca historica medii aevi of A. Potthast (1862–88; new ed. 1962—). H. Biaudet (1910), L. Karttunen (1912) and G. De Marchi (1957) assembled lists of apostolic nuncios from the beginning of permanent nunciatures down to the present. The Bibliotheca missionum (since 1916), begun by R. Streit, is a basic treatment of the sources and bibliography of mission history. All modern theological encyclopedias give attention to the history of the Church, the most exhaustive being the Realenzyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche (3d ed. 1896–1913) and the excellent though somewhat less comprehensive Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. 1957–62); The Catholic Encyclopedia (1908–14); the Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (2d ed. since 1957); the Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (1902–50); and the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (1924–53). The Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (since 1912), however, is devoted exclusively to Church history. All national bibliographies, for example, that of Dahlmann-Waitz for Germany and the Bibliography of British History (C. Gross: C. Read, 2d ed. 1959; G. Davies) for England, take into account the Church history of their respective countries.

To accommodate the ever-growing number of special studies appearing in the field, Church history journals began to make their appearance. The Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, founded in 1876 by the Protestant theologian T. Brieger, was shortly followed (1880) by the Historisches Jahrbuch by the Görres-Gesellschaft and in 1887 by the Römische Quartalschrift für Christliche Archäologie und Kirchengeschichte. In 1900 the Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, founded at Louvain by A. Cauchie, developed into the indispensable clearing house of international research, providing a full bibliography of all important works in the field of Church history. In France the growth of studies in ecclesiastical history were indebted to the Revue d'histoire de l'église de France (1910); those in the United States were under similar obligation to the Catholic Historical Review, founded in 1917 by P. Guilday. Important new journals of the 1940s and 1950s were the following: in the United States, Traditio (1943); in Italy, the Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia (1947); in Spain, Hispania sacra (1948); and in England, the Journal of Ecclesiastical History (1950). Before World War I several reviews specializing in the history of religious orders made their appearance: the Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner- und Zisterzienserorden (1880), the Revue Mabillon (1905) and the Archivum Franciscanum historicum (1908). Many others were begun some years later and published as organs of their own institutes, for example, the Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum (1931) and the Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu (1932).

This renaissance in the study of Church history would not have been possible without the introduction and concomitant development of basic instruction in Church history, evident almost everywhere in the theological faculties of universities and seminaries. The constitution of Pius XI, DEUS SCIENTIARUM DOMINUS of May 24, 1931, moreover, prescribed the introduction of seminars for the study of historical method. About the same time many universities, for example, Louvain and The Catholic University of America in Washington, began publishing notable series comprising dissertations in Church history.

TEXTBOOKS AND SPECIAL MONOGRAPHS

Instruction and research in Church history were constantly in need of textbooks and scholarly handbooks or works of reference. The voluminous production in the first half of the 19th century, for example, Priestley's General History of the Christian Church (1802–03) and R. F. ROHRBACHER's Histoire universelle de l'église (1842–49), had paid scant attention to research and were unsatisfactory for scientific work in the field. At the start, Protestants had the advantage with such excellent texts as those of J. K. L. Gieseler (1824–57), F. C. BAUR (1853–63), W. Möller and G. Kawerau (1889–1907). But they were soon matched by the texts of I. Ritter (1826–35), Döllinger (1836) and J. ALZOG (1841; 10 eds.), but especially by the Handbuch der allgemeinen Kirchengeschichte (1876–80; 5 eds., tr. into several languages) by (later cardinal) J. HERGENRÖTHER and the shorter texts by F. X. KRAUS (1872–75), F. X. FUNK (1886; later eds. by K. BIHLMAYER and H. Tüchle), A. Knöpfler (1895), and J. P. KIRSCH (1930–49). These works were distinguished for their exact presentation of facts, but in their earlier editions were rigid and categorical in tendency.

After the turn of the 19th century several first-rate texts and manuals made their appearance in France: L. DUCHESNE, Histoire ancienne de l'église (1906–10)—an epoch-making work; F. MOURRET, Histoire générale de l'église (1909–21); and the projected 24 volume Histoire de l'église by A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN (since 1936). In Italy texts were prepared by L. Todesco (1922–30), A. Saba (1938–43) and P. Paschini (1931); in England, by P. Hughes, A History of the Church (1934–49) and O. Chadwick, The History of the Church (London 1962); and in Holland, by (later cardinal) J. de JONG. The monumental works by Hughes, The Reformation in England (3 v. 1950–54) and by M. D. Knowles, The Monastic Order in England (2d ed. 1962) and The Religious Orders in England (3 v. 1948–60), are models of scholarship.

The numerous histories of the popes that made their appearance in this period were of great significance for general Church history. The brilliant Römischen Päpste in den letzten vier Jahrhunderten by L. RANKE (1838), written before the opening of the Vatican Archives, was superseded by the wealth of new material found in the Geschichte der Päpste by L. von PASTOR (1885–1933), a work that has been translated into many languages and that might well be considered a history of the Church from the 15th to the 18th century. Pastor's work is supplemented by E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums (1930–33), for the early Christian centuries and by J. HALLER, Papsttum, Idee und Wirklichkeit (2d ed. 1950–55), for the Middle Ages—both works of Protestant scholarship. J. SCHMIDLIN (1933–39) continued the history of the papacy into the 19th and 20th centuries. The best comprehensive treatment of papal history is that of F. X. Seppelt; and the number of popular histories of the popes is legion.

The histories of the Church in various countries form to some extent a counterpart to the history of the popes: for Belgium, the work of E. de Moreau; for Germany, that of A. Hauck; for England, W. HUNT, G. Stephens and J. R. H. Moorman; for Austria, E. Tomek; for Spain, Z. GARCÍA VILLADA; and for the United States, J. G. SHEA.

SPECIAL AREAS OF CHURCH HISTORY

One result of the constantly growing trend toward specialization was the splitting off of large segments of Church history into independent fields of study and research. The history of Christian literature, which, together with Church history, developed into an integral part of the theological curriculum at many 18th-century universities, became delimited in time and was put on a sounder basis and defined as patrology. The Oxford movement was distinguished for its study of the Fathers of the Church (Library of the Fathers, 1838–80). The German Protestant school of A. von Harnack and K. Holl improved on the methods employed by the Maurists and was rivaled by such Catholic scholars as A. EHRHARD (d. 1940), O. Bardenhewer (Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. 1913–32) and B. ALTANER (Patrologie, 6th ed. 1960).

In France the most prominent, patrologists were G. BARDY, A. Puech and F. Cayré; in Italy, A. Casamassa and U. Moricca. In the United States the most significant work is the Patrology (3 v. 1950–60) by J. Quasten. Research in Christian Latin has been ably served by the journal Vigiliae Christianae (since 1947), and the advance in the study of medieval Literature has been due partly to the studies in medieval Latin language and literature by L. TRAUBE, M. Manitius, P. Lehmann, J. de Ghellinck, the journal Speculum and other journals and partly due to the research in the history of scholasticism by H. DENIFLE, F. EHRLE, P. MANDONNET and M. GRABMANN. In the field of medieval EXEGESIS, until recently a largely uncultivated area, works by F. Stegmüller, B. Smalley and H. de Lubac are important.

Through the work of G. B. de ROSSI (d. 1894) Christian archeology was raised to the status of a philological science. The strictly limited Roman orientation given to the field by J. WILPERT (d. 1940) in his monumental works on the art of the CATACOMBS, Christian SARCOPHAGI, and Roman mosaics was greatly extended by excavations in the Middle East (DURA-EUROPOS and Ephesus), the study of early Christian architecture (R. Krautheimer) and the integration of the relations between pagan antiquity and Christianity by F. J. DÖLGER and T. Klauser.

In the field of HAGIOGRAPHY the reestablished institute of the Bollandists (1837) easily surpassed all other efforts, especially under the direction of such scholars as C. de SMEDT (d. 1911), H. DELEHAYE (d. 1941), P. Peeters (d. 1950) and P. GROSJEAN (d. 1964). The journal of this enterprise, the Analecta Bollandiana (since 1882), is also unsurpassed.

The history of dogma has been conspicuously advanced through the monographic publications of eminent Catholic scholars, such as P. BATIFFOL, A. d' ALÈS and J. LEBRETON. But despite the effort of L. J. TIXERONT, whose Histoire des dogmes de l'antiquité chrétienne (1905–12) was an exceptional work for its time, no comprehensive survey of the history of dogma exists today that can equal the great Protestant works by A. von HARNACK, R. SEEBERG and F. Loofs. However, the Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte by M. Schmaus, J. R. Geiselman and A. Grillmeier was begun in 1951.

The history of the BYZANTINE CHURCH and of the other Oriental Churches, which goes back to the work of L. Allatius and J. Assemani in the 17th and 18th centuries, has become a distinct area of study. Recent Byzantine studies were pioneered, particularly by German and French scholars (A. Ehrhard, K. Krumbacher; currently, H. G. Beck); A. Baumstark's Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (1922) and the Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur (5 v. 1944–55) by G. Graf (d. 1955) opened up relatively unknown areas of investigation. In 1917 Benedict XV founded the Istituto Pontificio Orientale, which since 1935 has published the Orientalia Christiana periodica.

The foundations for the history of liturgy were laid by the editions of the sources by the Maurists E. Martène and E. RENAUDOT. It became a distinct discipline, however, through the efforts of L. Duchesne, P. Batiffol, E. BISHOP and K. MOHLBERG, among others. Important texts were published by the Henry Bradshaw Society (since 1890), the Analecta hymnica (since 1886) by M. Dreves and C. Blume and the editions of the Ordines Romani and the Pontificale Romanum by M. ANDRIEU (d. 1956). The history of liturgy has contributed greatly to the current liturgical movement.

The history of CANON LAW was able to build on the efforts of L. THOMASSIN and BENEDICT XIV. It continued to develop during the 19th century through the contributions of such Protestant scholars as E. Friedberg, P. Hinschius and his successor U. Stutz (d. 1938) and the Old Catholic historian J. F. Schulte (d. 1914). Their efforts were matched by Catholic canonists such as J. B. Sägmüller (d. 1942), P. Fournier (d. 1935), G. Le Bras, A. Stickler and S. G. Kuttner. In 1955 Kuttner founded the Institute of Research and Study in Mediaeval Canon Law at The Catholic University in Washington (moved to Yale University, 1964).

MISSIOLOGY and SPIRITUAL THEOLOGY were introduced only recently into theological curriculums as formal disciplines. Mission history and the history of asceticism and mysticism have thus become independent studies. J. Schmidlin (1925) prepared the first serviceable textbook of Catholic mission history, later expanded and improved by A. Mulders and S. Delacroix. The best history of the missions is that of the American Protestant historian K. S. Latourette. The Revue d'histoire des missions began publication in 1924, but the general missiological journals have also from time to time carried historical articles. In 1932 Pius XI established a faculty of missiology at the Gregorian University in Rome. A similar development is to be noted respecting the history of asceticism and mysticism, which had been cultivated consistently by the contemplative orders, for example, by the Benedictines (C. BUTLER) and by the Carmelites (Études carmélitaines, 1913). Its most recent growth, however, has been the result of the introduction of the subject into the area of formal theological instruction.

The growth of all these fields of specialization, branching out of general Church history, has not, however, rendered the latter superfluous; on the contrary, modern ecclesiology requires a sound historical foundation. More than ever, Church history is an integrating component of theology.

Bibliography: General. F. C. BAUR, Die Epochen der kirchlichen Geschichtsschreibung (Tübingen 1852; repr. Hildesheim 1962). W. NIGG, Die Kirchengeschichtsschreibung (Munich 1934). P. BREZZI, La storiografia ecclesiastica (Naples 1959). Early Christianity. R. A. LAQUEUR, Eusebius als Historiker seiner Zeit (Berlin 1929). A. WACHTEL, Beiträge zur Geschichtstheologie des Aurelius Augustinus (Bonn 1960). J. DANÉLOU, "La Typologie millénariste de la semaine dans le christianisme primitif," Vigiliae christianae, 2 (1948) 1–16. A. D. VON DEN BRINCKEN, "Weltaeren," Archiv für Kulturgeschichte, 39 (1957) 133–149. B. STICKER, "Weltzeitalter und astronomische Perioden," Saeculum, 4 (1953) 241–249. R. SCHMIDT, "Aetates mundi. Die Weltalter als Gliederungsprinzip der Geschichte," Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, 67 (1955–56) 288–317. Middle Ages. J. SPÖRL, Grundformen hochmittelalterlicher Geschichtsanschauung (Munich 1935). W. LEVISON, "Bede as Historian," Aus rheinischer und fränkischer Frühzeit (Düsseldorf 1948) 347–382. W. KÆGI, Chronica mundi (Einsiedeln 1954). A. D.

VON DEN BRINCKEN, Studien zur lateinischen Weltchronistik bis in das Zeitalter Ottos von Freising (Düsseldorf 1957). H. LÖWE, Von Theoderich dem Grossen zu Karl dem Grossen. Das Werden des Abendlandes im Geschichtsbild des frühen Mittelalters (Darmstadt 1956). W. GOEZ, Translatio Imperii. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Geschichtsdenkens und der politischen Theorien im Mittelalter und in der frühen Neuzeit (Tübingen 1958). H. ZIMMERMANN, Ecclesia als Objekt der Historiographie (Vienna 1960). Ausgewählte Aufsätze und Arbeiten aus den Jahren 1933 bis 1959, ed. W. LAMMERS, (Darmstadt 1961). H. VOGT, Die literarische Personenschilderung des frühen Mittelalters (Leipzig 1934). G. MISCH, Geschichte der Autobiographie, v.2–3 (3d ed. Frankfurt a.M. 1955–62). W. KAMLAH, Apokalypse und Geschichtstheologie (Berlin 1935). N. R. C. COHN, The Pursuit of the Millennium (London 1957). M. W. BLOOMFIELD, "Joachim of Flora: A Critical Survey," Traditio, 13 (1957) 249–311. From 16th to 18th century. E. MENKE-GLÜCKERT, Die Geschichtsschreibung der Reformation und Gegenreformation (Leipzig 1912). P. POLMAN, L'Élément historique dans la controverse religieuse du 16e siècle (Gembloux 1932). B. A. VERMASEREN, De katholieke Nederlandsche Geschiedschrijving in de 16e en 17e eeuw over den Opstand (Maastricht 1941). A. HERTE, Das katholische Lutherbild im Bann der Lutherkommentare des Cochläus, 3 v. (Münster 1943). H. QUENTIN, Jean-Dominique Mansi et les grandes collections conciliaires (Paris 1900). P. PEETERS, L'Oeuvre des Bollandistes (new ed. Brussels 1961). K. VÖLKER, Die Kirchengeschichtsschreibung der Aufklärung (Tübingen 1921). E. C. SCHERER, Geschichte und Kirchengeschichte an den deutschen Universitäten (Freiburg 1927). P. DE LETURIA, "L'insegnamento della storia ecclesiastica nella Roma dell'Umanesimo e del Barocco," La civiltà cattolica, 96.4 (1945) 393–402; "El P. Filippo Febei S.I. y la fundación de la cátedra de historia eclesiástica en el Colegio Romano, 1741," Gregorianum, 30 (1949) 158–192. P. PASCHINI, "La Conferenza dei Concili a Propaganda Fide," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia, 14 (1960) 371–382. The 19th and 20th centuries. H. VON SRBIK, Geist und Geschichte vom deutschen Humanismus bis zur Gegenwart, 2 v. (Munich 1950–51). F. WAGNER, Geschichtswissenschaft (Freiburg 1951). H. BUTTERFIELD, Man on His Past (Cambridge, Eng. 1955; pa. Boston 1960). K. BIHLMAYER, "J. A. Möhler als Kirchenhistoriker," Theologische Quartalschrift, 100 (1919) 134–198. H. BRESSLAU, "Geschichte der MGH," Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde, 42 (1921) 326–330. K. A. FINK, Das vatikanische Archiv (2d ed. Rome 1951). H. JEDIN, "Die Hierarchia catholica als universalgeschichtliche Aufgabe," Saeculum, 12 (1961) 169–180. R. AUBERT, "Un Demisiècle de Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique," Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia, 14 (1960) 173–202. Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 224 v. (London 1858–96).

[H. JEDIN]

HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF

In its most general sense, the philosophy of history is interpretative history; it deals with the basic or ultimate causes of the historical process as a whole, and attempts to see a discernible purposive plan in the multitude of events. Some authors equate the philosophy of history with metahistory, which "has for its end the determination of laws regulating historical facts and the place of such facts in an explanatory view of the world" (P.

Foulquié and R. Saint-Jean, Dictionnaire de la langue philosophique [Paris 1962] 437). Since the historian is not merely a statistician, he too concerns himself with more than the recording of fact, but his historical explanations, usually influenced by his epistemological presuppositions, may emphasize or minimize factors of remote or proximate causation as these affect the factual data.

In view of the great diversity of views on the subject, this article treats first of various interpretations and usages that are current regarding the philosophy of history, and then sketches the origin of the expression and various factors affecting the growth and development of philosophies of history since the 18th century.

Various Interpretations

The principal understandings of the expression “philosophy of history,” as used by theologians, philosophers, and social scientists, may be grouped under six headings: classical cyclicism, providential history, explanatory laws, interpretative history, philosophically oriented history, and progressivist theories.

Classical Cyclicism. The first general category of historical interpretation is classical cyclicism, which envisions an eternal universe featuring a continuous recurrence of historical experience. Arnold Joseph Toynbee (1889–1975) considers cyclicism to have had its probable origin in ancient Chaldean astronomy, but it derived much of its force in the ancient world as an intellectually naive extrapolation from a world of nature that exhibited observably recurrent daily and seasonal changes. Linear creationism was practically unknown in the ancient world, and even the Timaeus of PLATO and scattered references in EPICURUS make no case for a genuine creatio ex nihilo in the Christian sense of the term. Ancient cyclicism had its psychological counterpart in the theories of METEMPSYCHOSIS that pictured successive psychic existences in historically repetitive patterns.

Karl Löwith (1897–1973) cites the main sources for the classical view of eternal recurrence as certain fragments of HERACLITUS and of EMPEDOCLES; most of the myths of Plato; Aristotle’s astronomical teaching (Metaphysics 1073a 13–1074b 14; Cael. 269b 18–271a 35); a fragment of Eudemus; and the Epist. ad Lucilium 24 of Seneca. Early Christian sources are Justin’s Dialogue with Trypho 1 and Origen’s Against Celsus 4.67 and De principiis 2.3.

St. Augustine’s City of God is Christianity’s most famous protest against a cyclicism that would confine history within itself in a series of endless repetitions. While a mode of cyclicism appeared in the medieval Aristotelianism of SIGER OF BRABANT and in the Paradiso of Dante, the cyclic theme was to have its greatest modern vogue in the philosophy of F. W. NIETZSCHE, for whom eternal recurrence was basic.

Providential History. A second general area of inquiry, considered by some as the philosophy of history, is providential history, such as that written by St. AUGUSTINE and J. B. BOSSUET. Providential history sees the historical process as initiated by a divine creative act and proceeding meaningfully to a conclusion. It is teleological, but not deterministic, as man’s free will is a part of the PROVIDENCE OF GOD rather than a competing dynamic principle. Such a theologically oriented eschatology is not, strictly speaking, a philosophy, but as it is broadly interpretative, it is included for consideration in most works in philosophy of history. Christopher Dawson (1889–1970) quite correctly observes that the Christian vision of history is essentially theological in character, reflecting an integral part of divine revelation rather than a philosophical effort elaborated by Christian scholars. (See THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF.)

Augustinian history is inevitably universal, and, as it envisages an eternal goal beyond the temporal order, it is metahistorical. As R. G. Collingwood has pointed out, Greco-Roman ecumenical history is not universal in the Christian sense, having, as it does, the particularist center of gravity that is Greece or Rome. Augustinian history, on the other hand, has a pivotal event, the Incarnation, toward which the pre-Christian era moves, and by which the Christian era is transfigured. Thus EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA sees in his Preparatio evangelica human events as preparatory to the coming of Christ, and colored, as it were, by that event. Such a Christian vision of history involves a restructuring of thought as well as a liberation from cyclicism. Although a secular scholar such as J. B. Bury sees in providential history external control rather than liberation, St. Augustine’s City of God does herald a new linear dimension in historical experience, in which free human activity, moving into an unknown future, acquires a unique meaning not destined for inevitable repetition. (See P. Henry, “The Christian Philosophy of History,” Theological Studies 13 [1952] 419–432.)

Explanatory Laws. A third species considered as a philosophy of history is a type of interpretative history that claims the existence of laws or keys revealing the metaphysic of the historical process. In its extreme form either it replaces causation itself by destiny (as with O. SPENGLER); or it overemphasizes single causative elements and sees all history determined by such factors as race, geography, climate, and economics; or it views history as given new impulses and directions by what Collingwood calls “apocalyptic” events, such as the Renaissance, the invention of printing, the Reformation, the Enlightenment, the French Revolution, or the socio-political liberal movements of the 19th century. Interpretative extremism also features history as prophecy, for if the major cosmic impulse, deterministic in character, can be sufficiently identified, then the future as well as the past can be expected to yield its secrets.

Needless to say, it is this unwarranted Gnosticism in history to which the critical historian most vehemently and justifiably objects. He may consider the insight of a Spengler or a Toynbee ingeniously formulated and reflective of a deeply felt personal view of the historical process, but he is understandably hesitant to accord this objectivity. Yet he too can forget, as Ernst Bernheim (1850–1942) has suggested, that the philosophy of history is by no means a superfluous luxury for the historian (see Einleitung in die Geschichtswissenschaft [3d ed., Berlin-Leipzig 1926]). Norman Sykes has also observed in this regard that even the most conservative of scientific historians have found it impossible to restrain their steps from divagations into the pastures of philosophy. Facts, far from speaking for themselves, are agile performers, and their performance is largely determined by the meaningful context in which they are assembled. Factual history is POSITIVISM manifesting itself in historical writing. It may well be true that the Battle of Hastings occurred in 1066 irrespective of the ideological background of the historian who records the event; but the mere recording of the event is not history, and the material selected or suppressed in judging the significance of the event inevitably involves one in value judgments.

Interpretative History. A fourth possibility is interpretative history, or history integrally taken as nondeterministic in character. While recognizing the unpredictable character of free human choice, this discerns various patterns or trends in the historical process as a whole. Jacques MARITAIN speaks of axiomatic formulas, by which he means formulas that reveal the endurance of basic relations or fundamental characteristics. He distinguishes these functional laws from what he calls typological or vectorial laws, i.e., more particularized descriptions of historical growth and development that exhibit a typical direction.

Philosophically Oriented History. A fifth category of the philosophy of history is simply philosophically oriented history. While not neglecting the factual, this is more preoccupied with relations and causes, general as well as specific, epistemological positions antecedent to investigation, and a philosophy of man with particular emphasis on human freedom. This type of philosophical history is a matter of general orientation in which philosophical factors take precedence over the methodology and the specific content of historical investigation.

Progressivist Theories. A final area of inquiry in the philosophy of history are the secular philosophies of progress produced by the RATIONALISM of the 18th and 19th centuries. History and cultural institutions came to be judged in the light of an ascending progressive evolution. Nietzsche was quite correct in seeing the philosophies of progress, which he despised, as a “trivialization” and secularization of Christian linearism, which he also despised. But the new Jerusalem of the progressivists was an earthly city that envisioned no transcendent goal. As has been generally observed, this trend to the secular had been abetted by both the Renaissance and the Reformation, and by the scientism of empiricists desirous of extending natural science to philosophy.

Bury (The Idea of Progress [London 1920, New York 1932]) and Dawson (Progress and Religion [London 1929]) have examined progressivist theory in its secular and religious forms. It is important to note that the Christian rejects, not the possibility of progress, but its inevitability. Believing that man possesses neither the naturally good nature as taught by J. J. ROUSSEAU, nor a vitiated nature as taught by M. LUTHER, but a nature wounded by original sin, the Christian recognizes the possibility of retrogression as well as the possibility of progress. Rectilinear progress had its psychological variant in the turn-of-the-century Couéism, which assured increasingly insecure man that “every day in every way he was getting better and better.”

General theories of progress are associated particularly with the writings of B. B. de Fontenelle (1657–1757); C. I. Castel, Abbé de Saint-Pierre (1658–1743); the Marquis de CONDORCET; VOLTAIRE; J. B. J. Fourier (1768–1830); C. H. SAINT-SIMON; A. R. J. Turgot (1727–81); C. DARWIN; and A. COMTE. Latent in progressivist theory is the idea that progress is a law of nature, and that such a law applies both to the processes of the natural order and the cultural development of man. The theory finds much to substantiate it in the order of technology, where the accumulated intellectual capital of the past is immediately at the service of contemporary experimentation. Academic capital is also added in each successive generation, although it is questionable to suggest that the available knowledge is acquired by successive generations with increasing skill.

Voltaire’s prejudice in favor of contemporary history, and the belief that history exhibited a constant progress from a barbarous primitive era to his own day was not only reflective of an arbitrary conviction that the only meaningful history was modern history, but it was also the consequence of a limited knowledge of the age that was held to be primitive. N. A. BERDIAEV (The Meaning of History [New York 1936]) was perhaps the progressivist's most formidable modern adversary. He considered the philosophy of progress to be a secularized Messianism, a divinization of the future at the expense of the past and present, that had not the slightest philosophical, scientific, or moral justification. But the idea of progress was a comfortable and optimistic illusion that endured until the early years of the 20th century, when the static and peaceful Newtonian universe began to collapse as empirical science expanded its frontiers, and a devastating worldwide conflict reminded free man that he was capable of going in more than one forward direction.

Were one to seek to reduce the ways of understanding history to their essential forms, one might, following the lead of Löwith, Collingwood, and H. Stuart Hughes, list cyclical recurrence and eschatological direction. It would seem advisable, however, on the basis of the influence of progressivist theories, to include secular futurism as a third possibility.

Origin and Development

The growth and development of the philosophy of history perforce is traceable to the origin of the expression itself; from this point it is affected by the various influences and climates of opinion in which philosophers of history labored, notably by Romanticism and positivism, idealism, neoidealism, and more recent movements such as those of cyclic history and modern synthesis.

Origin of the Expression. Concerning the origin of the expression, "philosophy of history," several observations are to be made. Juan Donoso Cortés refers in his Ensayo sobre el catolicismo, el liberalismo y el socialismo . . . (Madrid 1851) to St. Augustine's City of God as a "Catholic philosophy of history." In his essay on G. VICO, however, he refers to Bossuet as the "first philosopher of history." Vico himself is called by H. P. Adams "the founder of philosophy of history." Löwith, in referring to a period of crisis at the end of the 17th century, when, as he says, "Providence was replaced by progress," insists that Voltaire's essay on the manners and mind of nations is the first philosophy of history (cf. La Philosophie de l'histoire [Geneva 1765]); and Löwith considers this event the inauguration of an epoch of historical evaluation that is basically antireligious. M. C. Swabey (The Judgment of History [New York 1954]) rejects this identification of philosophical history with figures such as Voltaire, C. de MONTESQUIEU, or I. Kant, and prefers to consider the problem in terms of general orientation. W. H. Walsh claims that philosophy of history first gained recognition in 1784 with the publication of the first part of J. G. Herder's Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (Leipzig 1784–91). Collingwood maintains that the name at least "was invented by Voltaire, who meant by it no more than critical or scientific history." S. J. Case concedes that Voltaire may be said to have coined the phrase, but considers that the technique of evaluation involved is current in the thought of the ancient Hebrews. Father Gilbert Garraghan (A Guide to Historical Method [New York 1946]), considering philosophy of history "essentially a theological concept," claims that Augustine was the first to state a philosophy of history, in his City of God. Raymond Aron's use of the term in his Introduction à la philosophie de l'histoire (Paris 1938) is more like that of Case and Swabey. He is concerned with a philosophical conception of the historical process as a whole, in opposition to positivism and rationalisme scientifique.

From such a variety of opinion some basic facts emerge. The name at least, originates with Voltaire, who summarizes his position in the dictum: Il faut écrire l'histoire en philosophe. Secondly, there is no general agreement as to the role philosophy should play in historical interpretation. This difference is reflected in an oscillation between extremes of factual and philosophical history that seems to take place over the years.

Romanticism and Positivism. Interpretative history in the late 19th century was as indebted to romanticism as factual history was to positivism (see ROMANTICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL). Particularly in German HISTORICISM did the romantic spirit flourish in the attempt to capture a living sense of the past in its indigenous cultural setting. The historicists found an ideal image for this attempt in plant morphology. J. Burckhardt and Spengler could see the historical value of art forms as veritable mirrors of culture. They could explore historical change in its growth and decay by an organic metaphor that the 19th-century preoccupation with Darwinian science would render understandable. Yet evolutionism, implying as it did a linear theory of progress, was clearly at variance with such a theory as Spengler's, whose discontinuous cultures with their relative value systems were nevertheless explained as subject to the laws of plant morphology. Positivism's contribution to critical history was a respect for fact and the methodology that would lead to it, although it had a built-in inhibition about interpreting facts. Romanticism's contribution was more imaginative and profound. Although more prone to error by reason of increased subjectivity, it did attempt to penetrate the surface of fact to discover the inner dynamics of the historical process. In this it was more inferential than descriptive.

Idealism. Of particular interest to the philosopher of history is historical IDEALISM, which envisions historical knowledge as a reliving of the past in the mind of the historian. Idealism aims at capturing the spirit of an age by intellectual re-creation rather than by an excessive preoccupation with factual minutiae; its principal proponents are J. G. FICHTE, F. W. J. von SCHELLING, and G. W. F. HEGEL.

Fichte has perhaps gained his greatest fame as a systematizer of Kantian philosophy, but he is significant in German Romanticism in providing a philosophical framework within the self for analyzing historical experience. In his lectures, Die Grundzüge des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters (Berlin 1806), he sees the self's awareness of its own time as prefatory to an understanding of the past, and he sees a given culture as the living embodiment of an idea. An integral understanding of history is not derived from a study of given cultures, but from the meaningful logical relation of ideas that articulate themselves progressively and dialectically in the historical process. Being is in a sense reduced to thought, and history is therefore the history of ideas, especially the idea of freedom. The world of "representations" is the periodic unfolding of Absolute Ego, and the individual self is but part of the embracing Ego.

Schelling, a colleague of Fichte at Jena, developed a similarly far-fetched system of transcendental idealism. Schelling distinguishes nature and history, both of which manifest the ABSOLUTE. Nature is the sum total of extramental realities and their observable relationships, but history is seen as the developed phase of the Absolute—a development involving free human enterprise and providential plan. The Absolute as mind is a continuous process of self-awareness, and history is the very process by which the Absolute realizes itself as both knower and known.

Philosophical history reaches perhaps its most sophisticated formulation in the work of Hegel. Hegel's implicative philosophy is historically oriented and posits a monistic Absolute working toward the State as the objective manifestation of the divine upon Earth. History is there vaguely defined as the rediscovery of Absolute Spirit through human consciousness and time. Philosophy rather than theology is seen by Hegel as the means of demonstrating a providential plan to which man unwittingly contributes.

Neoidealism. The idealist theory of history continued to receive considerable attention in the pre-Spengler period of German historical thought in the late 19th century; of particular importance then was the work of Georg Simmel (1858–1918) and Wilhelm DILTHEY. Simmel questions the positivist's notion of historical objectivity, insisting that while the facts of nature may be subject to empirical scrutiny, the facts of history must inevitably be a spiritual reconstruction of the past from documents and external evidence. Although admittedly a subjective construction, such history is felt by Simmel to have a valid objectivity. Dilthey also was influential in the neoidealist critique of factual history, seeing in the wealth of the historian's intellectual and spiritual resources the means of interpreting the lifeless data of the past. Both Simmel and Dilthey have a common problem in establishing satisfactorily the objectivity of historical knowledge, emphasizing as they do the subjectivity of a psychological experience far removed in time from the data of the past.

Benedetto CROCE, the greatest exponent of the Italian neoidealist tradition, also considers history a spiritual recreation of the past, but like Voltaire, he sees the significance of the past in terms of its relevance to the present. He not only combines the idealistic with the pragmatic, but sees history, not as the investigation of the general truths proper to science, but as a cognitive vision of individuality proper to his definition of art.

Cyclic History. Cyclic history finds its foremost proponents in Vico, Nietzsche, and Spengler. Vico, to whom Goethe referred as a patriarch of modern thought, combines in his Principij di una Scienza Nuova (Naples 1725) a providential cyclicism and an anti-Cartesian critical method of appraising developing human societies. He sees not only similar periods in history, but a regularity of recurrence that he identifies as the divine, heroic, and human periods. The spiral rather than the circle is a better figure by which to identify Vico's Christian, but non-scholastic, approach, because he sees society moving forward and differentiated by previous experience. As Collingwood indicates, this is obviously not the old classical Greco-Roman cyclicism found in Plato, Polybius, and in Renaissance historians such as Campanella and Machiavelli.

Nietzsche rejects Christian linearism entirely and sees the world as an eternal cosmos affirming itself in periodic recurrence. Eternal recurrence is fundamental to Nietzsche's thought; but, though he was a trained classical philologist and a great admirer of Greek classicism, his cyclicism is not the classic form. He attempts to give it a scientific foundation by seeing the finite realities of matter and energy eternally reassembling themselves in space, and therefore destined to repeat historical configurations.

Spengler's Decline of the West presents the most imaginative and controversial of cyclic theories. History is there seen as a series of discontinuous cultures, each of which has its own value system and develops along strictly predictable lines of plant morphology. Before a given culture degenerates into a "civilization" preparatory to its death, its progress can be continuously charted by comparison with other cultures whose history exhibits comparable phenomena at all levels. Spengler was greatly influenced by Goethe and Nietzsche, and predicted that his work would become “the philosophy of our time.” The work is historically inaccurate, but it did spark the revival of philosophical history after World War I.

Modern Syntheses. The greatest of the modern syntheses is A Study of History (New York 1934–61) by Toynbee. Toynbee’s first six volumes represent a comparative analysis of intelligible units of historical study that he calls civilizations. These advanced societies, 21 in number, are studied in terms of genesis, growth, breakdown, and disintegration, and only five are seen to have survived disintegration. As Dawson has observed, what Toynbee starts as a relativist phenomenology of equivalent cultures, becomes, in volumes 7 to 10, a unitary philosophy of history comparable to those of the idealist philosophers of the 19th century. A syncretic faith of the future composed of the “higher religions” (Christianity, Mahayana Buddhism, Hinduism, and Islam) replaces civilization as the intelligible unit of study. This new world religion he analyzes in terms of Jung’s psychological types, and sees it as satisfying man’s diverse spiritual needs.

Although Toynbee accepts the fact of human freedom and emphasizes the importance of religion in the human experience, his point of view is not authentically Christian, and he has a pronounced bias against a theology based exclusively on Judeo-Christian sources of revelation (see M. R. P. McGuire, “Fruitful Failure on the Grand Scale,” American Catholic Historical Review 42 [1956] 322–329). Dawson and Jacques Maritain, to a lesser extent, have contributed to a basic Augustinian vision of history in recent times, and interpretative history in general endured throughout the 20th century.

See Also: HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM; MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL; PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF.

Bibliography: R. G. COLLINGWOOD, The Idea of History (London 1946). K. LÖWTH, Meaning in History (Chicago 1949). M. C. D’ARCY, The Meaning and Matter of History (New York 1959). H. MEYERHOFF, ed., The Philosophy of History in Our Time (New York 1959). S. J. CASE, The Christian Philosophy of History (Chicago 1943). W. H. WALSH, An Introduction to Philosophy of History (New York 1951). M. H. MANDELBAUM, The Problem of Historical Knowledge (New York 1938). H. I. MARROU, De la Connaissance historique (3d ed. Paris 1959); “Qu’est-ce que l’histoire?” L’Histoire et ses méthodes, ed. C. SAMARAN (Encyclopédie de la Pléiade 11; Paris 1961) 1–33; “Comment comprendre le métier d’historien,” ibid., 1465–540.

[R. P. MOHAN]

HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF

The notion of a theology of history, or the Weltanschauung based on the providential action of God in human affairs, is here discussed in terms of its concept, its relation to Holy Scripture, and its historical developments.

CONCEPT

The concept of a theology of history as distinct from a philosophy of HISTORY raises problems that affect our understanding of the field. Loose, ambivalent use of both terms is not uncommon. Several reasons may account for the confusion: (1) there is some question about the claims of each field to be properly a science; (2) both are phases of the larger problem that concerns the relationship of philosophy and theology, reason and faith; and (3) the historical development of comprehensive theories of history has occasioned fluctuations and ambiguities, such as the still prevalent tendency to include plainly theological interpretations under the loose heading of philosophies of history. On the other hand, defensible opinions hold that the key concepts of modern philosophies of history are secularized forms of older, theological concepts.

A nice, theoretical delimitation of the two fields will not exorcise concrete, historic ambiguities that are disregarded because of a passionate absorption in the central problem of history and its ultimate meaning. The driving concern, however unspoken and unacknowledged, seems to be deeply religious, and even theological.

With this preamble it may be said that the theology of history, as conceived today, is that branch of theology that studies both the uniqueness and the universality of God’s providential action in history, and the various phases of the divine plan. More precisely, it inquires into the divine action on behalf of, and in relation to, the human race and attempts to interpret this action from the human point of view. As SALVATION HISTORY, the theology of history embraces the whole of time and tries to clarify its ultimate meaning. It draws into its domain the entire sweep of history in order to discover how it comports with the intentions of God as discoverable in revelation. Theology of history necessarily regards the whole of reality, hence also the progress of cultures, but it is not concerned with the progress of cultures as such. True to its own inner principle it aims to focus the action of God in history as revealed to man and the ongoing understanding and free response of mankind to the divine action.

It is customary to contrast cyclical theories of history as typical of pagan antiquity with the linear concept of history characteristic of OT Judaism and Christianity—a concept involving a beginning in creation, an end divinely appointed, and a precarious progression of events in between through the exercise of human freedom and the governance of Divine Providence.

It is unfair and inaccurate to label all ancient cyclical theories as pessimistic and despairing subjections of man to blind fate. The ancient cyclicisms also existed in a hopeful, if vague, religious matrix. The idea of an everlasting recurrence, probably taking a leaf from nature, implied possibilities of renewal, rebirth, redemption in some sense, and salvation from frustration and meaninglessness. Pessimism and despair come later with a culture that had lost the primitive religious conception and had come to be haunted by the horror of blind DETERMINISM and meaningless repetition. To this weary culture the linear conception of Christian thought signified a new sense of purpose and meaning.

The people of Israel experienced their historical situation as God's action guiding them to the promised goal of salvation and the Messianic kingdom. Christian doctrine also is grounded in historical fact: the Incarnation, the death, and Resurrection of Christ (1 Cor 15.14). But the Christian message, going beyond the historical distinction of Jews and Greeks, extends to all mankind. Christian theology, moreover, has set itself from the beginning to think out the historical implications of the faith. The procedure has nothing in common with that of the Enlightenment philosophers who rejected revelation, secularized theological concepts, and reduced Christian teaching to a hard core of rationally accepted truths.

HOLY SCRIPTURE AND THEOLOGY OF HISTORY

Holy Scripture contains not only the fact of God's action in history but also first reflections on its meaning. In the OT God is the lord of history. He holds the nations in His hand; He chose Israel out of them to be His people and the instrument of His purposes (PROVIDENCE). He intervened to free them from Egypt. He used the Gentiles to discipline His faithless people, but the election of Israel (COVENANT) was part of a comprehensive plan for all men and the entire world. The beginning of this divine action was creation itself, a consideration that draws all of nature into the historical perspective. The Prophets speak of God's great deeds of the past in order to awaken confidence in still greater things to come at the end of ages (Is 43.18–19; see ESCHATOLOGY). In contrast to pagan religions, which reduced time to a lingering, fading shadow of a vanished golden age, the OT endows time with positive meaning and grounds a strong, forward-looking expectation. The apocalyptic writings (Ezekiel; Zechariah, ch. 9–14; Joel, ch. 3–4; Daniel) expand this eschatology into a veritable theology of history moving surely to the ultimate triumph of God over the powers of evil.

The NT emphasizes the same themes: God as lord of history, providence, freedom of divine action, and eschatology, but it adds a new element—the end of the ages and their fulfillment have come with the Incarnation and Resurrection of Christ. God's action is essentially completed in Christ, all that the Prophets had proclaimed: Judgment, Resurrection, the kingdom, the eternal covenant, the new creation. In Christ the plan of God is substantially fulfilled, God is fully glorified, and human nature has become fully participant in the divine riches. What in essence has been accomplished must now be extended to all mankind before the great day of Christ's second coming (PAROUSIA) and the final judgment. This "time-in-between" is a period of divine action that is now mainly sacramental and draws the events of profane history into its saving purpose.

This destiny of the Church seems to be the dominant theme of the Revelation of St. John and the recurrent subject of the Pauline Epistles. Romans, ch. 11 on the fate of Israel after Christ and 2 Peter on the deferment of the Parousia contribute important elements. The Parousia, the resurrection of the dead, and the final judgment will be part of this history, constituting its final phase, which according to St. Paul, will be but the cosmic unfolding of Christ's Resurrection and the full revelation of what has already been substantially accomplished in Christ and the Church.

Some theologians see a typological similarity between various phases of the history of salvation and in this typology a revelation of the constant aspects of God's action. In these constant aspects they see certain universal laws of divine action, which in their view constitute the object of a theology of history as science in the strict sense of the word (TYPOLOGY).

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

It will be convenient to discuss the theology of history during the several periods of Christian history.

Early Fathers and Apologists. In controversy with Jewish religionists, pagans, and Gnostics the early Fathers and apologists utilized the theology of history to establish continuity of God's action between the OT and NT Christianity. JUSTIN MARTYR outlined a theology of history. IRENAEUS considered history as a cosmic week of seven millenniums during which mankind, like a child, gradually grows up to understand the glory of God. Christ came, not to restore a primordial state of perfection, but to complete what was germinally present from the beginning. In the doctrine of his disciple HIPPOLYTUS and others this scheme implied CHILIASM, the reign of Christ for 1000 years in the 7th millennium (see MILLENARIANISM). CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA in his broad doctrine of the LOGOS spoke of the preparation of both Jews and pagans for the coming of the True Logos, Christ. ORIGEN continued the ideas of Irenaeus and Clement, but introduced a compromising cyclicism with his notions of the preexistence of souls and the APOCATASTASIS. EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA injected a political note: monotheism makes for world unity and peace whereas polytheism favors a fragmentation into nations, and consequently warfare.

St. Augustine and the Middle Ages. In the City of God AUGUSTINE developed a theology of history that dominated Western thinking on the subject until the 18th century. Taken as one vast effort of intellect and faith, this was theology of history in the grand style and on a grand scale. Nowhere else is there a comparable combination of sustained sublimity of theological vision with an almost harshly realistic appraisal of human events. As a theology of history Augustine's work has never been superseded; it still calls for thorough theological analysis and development.

The first ten books wrestle with a historical problem—the fall of Rome in 410 that shook the civilized world and brought public outcries against the Christians. Both the attack on the Church and Augustine's apologetic involve a total theology of history—Christian vs. pagan. Augustine's exposition proceeds along practical rather than abstract theological lines of argumentation. In books 11 to 22 the implicit theology becomes explicit. His simple, vast conception is of the "Two Loves" building two cities or commonwealths, both existing side by side as invisible protagonists from beginning to end of history (and beyond), both locked in conflict and competition throughout the ages and providing the dynamic of historical development until the issue shall be decided between them in the grand denouement of the Parousia, the Last Judgment, and the triumph of Christ and the Church. This basic conceptual framework supports the exposition and provides the theme from start to finish. Not surprisingly, as in the City of God, the problem of evil in the world serves as one of the mainsprings of theological speculation on history; it was one of the chief issues in Augustine's own intellectual evolution and conversion. It stimulated many historians to discuss Divine Providence and the role of man's FREE WILL in the dynamics of history (see FREE WILL AND PROVIDENCE). It presented the recurrent temptation, wisely resisted by Augustine but perhaps too easily indulged by Eusebius and others, to discover signs of providential favor in current political events and structures or to embody the City of God in a definite political reality such as the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE. None of this is in the work of Augustine; there is no identification of the Messianic kingdom with any earthly kingdom or any earthly culture. The City of God, an invisible spiritual polity, now grows through this new era of history, but will not stand fully revealed until the end of time. The earthly kingdom is essentially ambivalent: in justice, peace, and prosperity it will serve the City of God when it bows to the rule of Christ; but it may also be an instrument of evil to oppose that reign. On this issue Augustine allowed himself no facile optimism, nor did the evidence of political history as he knew it, or as it developed for the next 1,000 years, encourage such illusion. Soberly comprehensive, large and free of all presumptuous attempts to read the mind of Providence in political events, Augustine's theology of history does not seek assurance of divine approval from the events of history. The same reserve governs his treatment of the Chiliast controversy and similar attempts to establish a prophetic chronology of the last days. History moves on steadily toward its God-appointed goal. Worldly events and transcendent goal are distinct but related in the striving of the faithful toward the supreme objective. The attitude and position of the true Christian is always precarious, always a courageously trustful commitment to the sublimely inscrutable will of Providence in faith, hope, and love.

Augustine's work had no fully authentic continuators. His pupil OROSIUS, who wrote at his behest in 418 (Seven Books of History against the Pagans), maintained the providential principle and the apologetic purpose of Augustine, but for the rest followed the more pedestrian, political line of Eusebius. He stated that the Pax Romana at the birth of Christ was a special providence and that political events developed to favor Christianity, which in turn promoted human culture. OTTO OF FREISING in The Two Cities: A Chronicle of Universal History to the Year 1146 (1157) identified the Church with the City of God and affirmed that Christianity always moves westward. This Eusebian tendency to turn history into a theodicy seems to have continued as a subtle ingredient of medieval consciousness together with its large acceptance of Augustine's theology of history (see HISTORIOGRAPHY, ECCLESIASTICAL). JOACHIM OF FIORE introduced an apocalyptic theology of history that announced the coming age of the Holy Spirit, superseding the Petrine Church and inaugurating a spiritual interpretation of the Scripture and the "Eternal Gospel" (Rv 14.6)—a doctrine that THOMAS AQUINAS gently refuted (ST 1a2ae, 106.4) but which reverberated through the politics, civil and ecclesiastical, of the next century and possibly echoes in all the later utopias of history.

Early Modern Period. J. B. BOSSUET's Discourse on Universal History centered in the theological concept of God's providence, which he sought to justify by detailed reference to the facts of history. He assigned a special place to the French monarchy as heir to the Holy Roman Empire, to serve the ultimate triumph of the Church. His theology of history was more in the spirit of Eusebius than of Augustine, and in attempting to prove too much apologetically, he laid himself open to later refutations.

Giambattista VICO in his La scienza nuova represented the critical transition point between Bossuet and Voltaire. Abstracting from divine revelation (which Vico faithfully accepted), he was the first to point the way to a philosophy of history by adopting the philosophical principle of an eternal law of providential development to be examined empirically. His work may well be called a rational theology of divine providence. Adapting the Cartesian approach to the historical and social sciences, Vico equated the verum and the factum, because history is the creation of man who both creates and describes the fact. Through secondary causes providence operates to establish forms of order beyond human discernment or intent. Vico's work, remarkable as it was, had no influence until a century later. C. de MONTESQUIEU's Spirit of the Laws was probably the first influential attempt at a philosophy of history.

The period from the 18th century ENLIGHTENMENT to the 20th century is difficult to analyze in terms of a theology of history. The Enlightenment rejected revelation, but the old theological concepts remained in secularized form. Reason, for example, took the place of Providence, but was given the same governing function in history, now as a kind of natural law. The eschatological tension was transmuted into the idea of progress, and later, into evolution. Eternal reward became "posterity" and fame; the Parousia was reduced to some distant utopian triumph on earth. VOLTAIRE's Essay on the Manners and Mind of Nations signaled the radical shift to an antireligious interpretation of history. The work was conceived as a continuation of Bossuet's but became an attack on the traditional theology of history. Voltaire objected that Bossuet's universal history was not universal and that providence cannot be demonstrated from the empirical course of history. Voltaire's critique offered no constructive solution to the problem of historical meaning, but set the tone for the rest of the century. This development of a philosophy of history (or secularized and disguised theology) through the period of KANT to the grandiose construction of HEGEL, through COMTE's POSITIVISM and the era of German HISTORICISM down to a history-conscious EXISTENTIALISM goes beyond the scope of the theology of history.

While philosophers went their own way, sweeping transformations occurred in the theology of history. Protestant theology from the beginning seemed intensely conscious of history. At first, this occurred possibly because of the tension between LUTHER's and CALVIN's views. The former saw this world as the city of wicked man; the latter gave it importance only as the place where the Christian has a mission to help build the kingdom of God. Then in the Enlightenment one tradition emphasized God's transcendence; the other became increasingly antisupernatural and moved with the philosophic currents of empiricism, KANTIANISM, historicism, positivism, evolutionism, existentialism. This liberal Protestantism prevailed through the 19th century up to World War I. Catholic theology, facing GALLICANISM, JANSENISM, FEBRONIANISM, and JOSEPHINISM, seems to have stressed the juridical concept of the Church until J. MÖHLER, followed by C. PASSAGLIA, K. SCHRADER, M. SCHEEBEN, J. B. FRANZELIN, and K. Adam, revived the truth of the Church as the Mystical Body of Christ.

In view of these developments the theology of history generated two tendencies or preferred emphases: the eschatological and the incarnational—both orientations rooted in doctrines that are integral to the gospel and mutually complementary. The incarnational trend stresses the Christian's engagement in this world; the eschatological his disengagement. The former concentrates on the person of Christ and the Church, His Mystical Body, and the importance of man's work here and now to build up the Body of Christ, pointing up the value of God's creation and of human culture. The latter looking rather to the final outcome, the Judgment and Parousia, tends to discount the value of the present, the "time-in-between," as essentially transitory, and to be less than sympathetic to the value of human culture and man's work in the world. On the whole it is probably true that most Protestant theologians of history have been somewhat partial to the eschatological, while most Catholic theologians have favored the incarnational approach. Nevertheless, the distinction need not be overstressed, since both doctrines—the Incarnation and the Second Coming—are recognized as integral to Christianity.

Recent Protestant Theologians. Neo-Orthodoxy. In the period after World War I the relevancy of Christian faith began to erode under the impact of the historical consciousness of liberal Protestantism, in which the being of man is understood as essentially temporal and self-determinative, autonomous vis-à-vis the past and so oriented creatively towards the future. This precipitated the Neo-Orthodoxy movement in Protestantism, which capitulated to the modern notion of history as entirely secular and of itself devoid of any sacral dimension. God's act above time, however, intersects each moment and event, but in a time-transcending way hidden to the world and available only on the basis of faith in the Christ-event. This initial ahistorical cast, in which faith is rescued from historical criticism by being reduced to existential decision (BULTMANN), was later compromised by allowing for a hidden sovereignty of God over the world (e.g. in Karl BARTH's Church Dogmatics). But still history (and along with it, nature) was relativized to the point that it was no longer itself a bearer of divine purposes, but only an occasion in which God's Word confronts individuals. The inadequacies of this view appear in its ahistorical character, its fideism, and its individualism. Two major attempts to meet this objection have been Oscar Cullmann's doctrine of Heilsgeschichte, a sacred history superimposed upon world history in which the purposes of God are unfolded; and the advocacy by the post-Bultmannians of a revised notion of New Testament history as the existential life-commitment of Jesus undergirding the events recounted.

The Eschatological View. Reaction began with an emphasis upon ESCHATOLOGY, understood now not as the vertical dimension of eternity in every temporal moment (Neo-Orthodoxy), but as a thrust within history itself towards its own consummation and occurring within the present course of history rather than at the end of time. Divine revelation is universal history (Pannenberg), whose unity appears only from its end, anticipated in the destiny of Jesus. Reality is thus structured as time, in which the future is accorded ontological priority and impinges efficaciously upon the present. Thus, the transformation of history occurs not developmentally out of the past but in novel ways out of the future. This is not the telos of Aristotle and Aquinas, in which the end preexists in divine intentionality, because the mode of God's being is also future. Nor is it Hegelianism, since the future lacks all logical determination and remains open, giving rise to the religious response of hope. For Jürgen Moltmann, God's action in history continually contradicts man's own achievements (Theology of Hope, 1967); thus the Church is summoned to the cause of liberation under the Holy Spirit as the divine power of futurity (The Church in the Power of the Spirit, 1977). This emphasis upon eschatology as the decisive element in Christianity is motivated in part by a desire to meet the charges of contemporary ATHEISM, especially in dialogue with Marxists (e.g. Ernst Bloch). Questionable in all this are the ontologizing of history, the conceiving of God in terms of futurity so that he ceases to be a God of the present, an arbitrary identifying of the future with freedom and the past with sin.

Process Thought. A radical alternative is operative in the theological use of Whitehead's ontology of process, represented by C. HARTSHORNE, S. Ogden, J. Cobb, L. Ford, D. D. Williams, N. Pittenger, and a host of younger American, mostly Protestant, theologians. Here, the basic category is becoming, applicable not just to history but to all reality, which ultimately consists of a plurality of "occasions" that are self-creative actualizations of eternal ideas. God himself is dipolar, at once temporal (necessarily interacting with the world in time) and eternal (in the sense that nothing of his being perishes in his becoming). History thus becomes God's supplying of subjective aims to actual occasions, by way of his envisioning of infinite possibilities, luring them to maximum actualization. A Catholic approximation to this, in some respects only, appears in TEILHARD DE CHARDIN's theology within an evolutionary worldview. Serious reservations towards this thought arise because of its dismissal of the events of history in their particularity, which, collapsing into pure becoming, possess no perduring significance. The centrality of Christ and his resurrection are necessarily relativized and lose all claim to uniqueness.

Recent Catholic Thought. Catholic thinking likewise continues to intensify its interest in the theology of history. The preponderant effort centers on the relationship of the Christian to the world; on the Church as the Body of Christ committed to the transformation of all human history and culture, to a positive appreciation of natural and human values, and to a like engagement in human events; and on the extension of the Incarnation by building the Body of Christ and by making of this world an anticipation of the world to come. There is a cautionary attitude toward eschatology, lest man lose a sense of responsibility toward the present economy of salvation. So H. de LUBAC sees the meaning of history in the Church as the extension of the Incarnation of Christ. The Christian's conscientious involvement in the work of the world he calls the "law of the Incarnation." P. Teilhard de Chardin grasps history in an enlarged evolutionary concept by which all creation moves toward "Christogenesis," i.e., the integration of human personality with Christ as the triumph of cosmogenesis, the Parousia. Rightly understood, there is, then, nothing profane to the Christian's view.

In England C. BUTLER and M. D'ARCY deplore a misanthropic unworldliness and call for a joyous, generous transfiguration of human history in Christ. C. DAWSON focuses this transformative effort on a new recognition of the spirit of vocation and individual responsibility. At Louvain G. Thils' theology of history centers on the concept of the progressive unity between the orders of nature and of grace, and their eventual, eschatological identity in the kingdom of God.

Gradually, theologians have enlarged their view to balance this predominantly incarnational theology of history with eschatological elements from Holy Scripture. A decidedly eschatological position emerges among certain Biblical scholars of the NT. Thus, for example, L. Bouyer, influenced by K. Barth and O. Cullmann, insists that Christianity is essentially eschatological, resting on belief in the end of time, and that human history will end in a catastrophe to be interrupted by the return of Christ, the Universal Judgment, and the Resurrection. The incarnational attitude, in his opinion, tends to forget the mystery of the Cross and could easily become a pagan apotheosis of created things. E. Beaucamp, W. Bulst, H. M. Feret, and to some extent R. Guardini lean to the eschatological pole and envision a theology of history in apocalyptic terms. In the Revelation of St. John, Feret finds three elements of a theology of history: MESSIANISM; identification of Christ and truth in history; and the victory of Christ as pledge of the Christian's victory, stirring profound longing for the final consummation of the kingdom and urging action to hasten this consummation. Similarly F. X. Durrwell constructs his theology of history around the Resurrection; in the course of history the Church moves toward the splendor of the eternal Easter. This full accomplishment of the Resurrection in the Parousia is the goal of history. The Church as the Body of Christ in history still exists in a state of incomplete evolution of her resurrection in Christ.

Out of this chorus of many theological tongues, all more or less talking the language of Scripture, there rises a need, ever more strongly felt, to balance the equation if possible, and to unify all legitimate insights fairly into a comprehensive theology of history.

Thus Y. M. J. CONGAR and L. Malevez seek a harmony between one-sided incarnationalism and excessive eschatologism. The problem for Congar turns on a valuation of the "time-in-between." Is it a mere accident or is it a part of a plan? The solution, then, lies in the higher concept: God's will and plan that the Christian be in the world (incarnationalism) but not of it (eschatologism). From this resolution of the tension emerges, for Congar, the concept of the Christian's full vocation. Against an extreme eschatological disdain of the world Malevez urges: "But seek first the kingdom of God" (Mt 6.33); against an extreme incarnational valuation of human activity he invokes the cross of Christ. J. C. Murray recognizes the theoretical necessity of both positions and indicates the practical human risks attached to each. The problem and the tension lie in the practical sphere, i.e., in the often dubious capacity of man to live his faith.

In his Theology of History (2d ed. New York 1959), Hans Urs von BALTHASAR begins with the uniqueness of Christ as both God and man, and hardly lets the aforesaid problem arise. The special Christian fact, viz, Christ's uniqueness, is so constituted as to be, in all its historical singularity, the concrete norm for the abstract norm itself. In Christ the factual and the normative coincide not only in fact, but necessarily, because the fact is both the manifestation of God and the divine-human pattern of true humanity in God's eyes. "In Jesus Christ, the Logos . . .

is himself history . . . the source of history, the point whence the whole of history before and after Christ emanates: Its center.'

He expands this original and somewhat startling approach by developing the notion of Christ as the mode of time and the norm of history. By freely obeying the Father in heaven, the Son fulfills and includes in His task the whole historical dimension, conferring upon it its ultimate meaning. It was in view of Him that the venture of having any such thing as a world and world history could be undertaken at all. From the point of view of a theology of history, at least, no life or age has its own self-contained meaning. The meaning of the past and of individual destinies is not irrevocably fixed; they can always be newly defined and transformed with the passage of time.

Through the action of the Holy Spirit in a threefold process, Christ becomes the relevant norm for all of history, always involving, in new and surprising ways, the $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha\nu\omicron\epsilon\iota\tau\epsilon$ that lies at the heart of the gospel. The whole of history, then, transformed by the hypostatic union, has its ultimate justification and meaning in Christ. But this truth does not mean that created nature has no immanent meaning, no intelligibility of its own—else there could be no true Incarnation. World history, then, is not coextensive (invisibly) with the history of the kingdom of God. The two forms of Christian existence manifest the tension between natural and supernatural, plant the Cross in the structure of the Church, but do not split the unity of Christian existence. Man's act of corresponding to what God wills for world history as grace is the central core that makes history happen. Since Christ all history is basically sacred, because of the Church's presence and testimony within an all-inclusive world history. The external battle of history between the Church and the powers of evil is only the outward echo of a more essential battle fought within the womb of the Church. The historical battle is not between Jerusalem and Babylon but a deeper, more hard-fought, more crucial struggle against the Babylon within us.

Similarly, K. RAHNER's ideas on a theology of history exist only in brief sketches, or as a set of broad directives and profound intimations, and as a series of specialized relevant investigations. Even so, one senses everywhere the rich suggestiveness and the strong vitality of genuine theological thought.

Basic is his penetrating analysis of the relationship of nature and grace and his concept of a SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL in man as consequence of his God-given, supernatural destiny. This "existential" is more than a negatively conceived OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY; rather it is a positive supernatural orientation of man's being to God, an unexacted supernatural ordination to the Trinity. Rahner conceives of revelation as a saving happening and not merely the communication of certain propositions. Revelation reaches its climax and end in Jesus Christ. The beginning and the end of history are revealed data. The entire course of history obeys the plan of God, which becomes manifest only in the progressive events of history. God enters the world in Christ and reveals Himself to man, but only the man who willingly hears the Eternal Word in faith can form a concept of salvation history distinct from profane history. Revelation and covenant are important concepts for a theology of history, which can in turn support a theological history of the Church and a genuine pastoral theology.

The unfolding divine plan of history does not destroy human freedom, is not some rigid, predetermined unchanging pattern, even though it sets a goal for man that is infallibly pursued and attained. In history man receives power to respond freely to God's Word, and God's further word freely adapts itself to this free response of man. In this revelation and response history proceeds.

Nevertheless, as Rahner suggests, many questions remain uninvestigated or even unrecognized—e.g., the theological meaning of a theology of history, heresies as opinions and as churches in the light of the theology of history, the temporal mode of created being, a theology of time, the purposive unity of human history, the theology of human history before Christ, tradition as history and as the development of revelation, the sanctification of the whole sphere of the profane through the Church, and others. We are, indeed, poor in the theology of history. This complex, subtle, and crucial study touches every part of theology—and history. Many tentatives abound, and bold initiatives, and there is much that is merely personal intuition and construction, requiring a deep and solid foundationing, and many scattered valid insights. But with all of this one detects currents of genuine theological vitality and a growing sense of the theological and historical urgency of these problems.

Bibliography: C. L. BECKER, The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-century Philosophers (New Haven 1932). N. A. BERDYAEV, The Destiny of Man, tr. N. DIDDINGTON (New York 1960); The Meaning of History, tr. G. REAVEY (New York 1936); The Beginning and the End, tr. R. M. FRENCH (New York 1952). P. TILLICH, The Interpretation of History (New York 1936). B. CROCE, History as the Story of Liberty, tr. S. SPRIGGE (New York 1941). C. DAWSON, The Judgement of the Nations (New York 1942). G. B. VICO, The New Science, tr. T. G. BERGIN and M. H. FISCH from 3d ed., 1744 (Ithaca 1948). R. AUBERT, "Discussions récentes autour de la théologie de l'histoire," in Collectanea Mechliniensia 33 (1948) 129–149. E. C. RUST, The Christian Understanding of History (London 1947); Salvation History: A Biblical Interpretation (Richmond, Va. 1962); Towards a Theological Understanding of History (New York 1963). R. NIEBUHR, Faith and History (New York 1949). L. MALEVEZ, "Deux théologies catholiques de l'histoire," Bijdragen:

Tijdschrift voor filosofie en theologie 10 (1949) 225–240. K. LÖWTH, Meaning in History (Chicago 1949). H. DE LUBAC, Catholicism, tr. L. C. SHEPPARD (New York 1950); La Pensée religieuse de Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (Paris 1962). G. THLS, "Bibliographie sur la théologie de l'histoire," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 26 (1950) 87–95. O. CULLMANN, Christ and Time, tr. F. V. FILSON (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1964). W. H. WALSH, An Introduction to Philosophy of History (New York 1951). E. CASSIRER, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment, tr. C. A. KOELLN and J. P. PETTEGROVE (Princeton 1951). R. SHINN, Christianity and the Problem of History (New York 1953). M. SCHMAUS, Von den letzten Dingen (His Katholische Dogmatik 4.2; 5th ed. Munich 1953). P. CHIOCCETTA, Teologia della storia (Rome 1953). E. CASTELLI, Les Présupposés d'une théologie de l'histoire (Paris 1954). R. GUARDINI, The Lord, tr. E. C. BRIEFS (Chicago 1954). J. PIEPER, The End of Time, tr. M. BULLOCK (London 1954). K. ADAM, Spirit of Catholicism, tr. J. MCCANN (pa. Garden City, N.Y. 1954). H. R. NIEBUHR, Christ and Culture (New York 1951; repr. pa. 1956). R. G. COLLINGWOOD, The Idea of History (London 1946; pa. New York 1956). J. MCINTRYE, The Christian Doctrine of History (Grand Rapids 1957). J. MARTAIN, On the Philosophy of History, ed. J. W. EVANS (New York 1957). R. BULTMANN, History and Eschatology (Edinburgh 1957). H. W. BARTSCH, ed., Kerygma and Myth, tr. R. H. FULLER, 2 v. (New York 1953; rev. ed. 1961), tr. of selections from Kerygma and Mythos, ed. H. W. BARTSCH, 5 v. (Hamburg 1948–62), containing discussions of Bultmann and his critics from 1948–55. J. DANIELOU, The Lord of History, tr. N. ABERCROMBIE (Chicago 1958). C. MICHALSON, The Hinge of History (New York 1959). D. E. ROBERTS, Existentialism and Religious Belief, ed. R. HAZELTON (New York 1959). M. C. D'ARCY, The Meaning and Matter of History (New York 1959). G. FESSARD, De l'actualité historique, 2 v. (Paris 1960). J. C. MURRAY, We Hold These Truths (New York 1960). W. J. ONG, "Evolution and Cyclicism in Our Time," in Darwin's Vision and Christian Perspectives, ed. W. J. ONG (New York 1960) 125–148. J. MACQUARRIE, The Scope of Demythologizing (New York 1960). K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations, tr. C. ERNST and K. H. KRUGER (Baltimore 1961–64) v.1, 2; Nature and Grace: Dilemmas in the Modern Church, tr. D. WHARTON (New York 1964). J. MUILENBURG, "The Biblical View of Time," Harvard Theological Review 54 (1961) 225–252. A. H. JOHNSON, Whitehead's Philosophy of Civilization (New York 1962). J. MOURoux, The Mystery of Time, tr. J. DRURY (New York 1964). J. BARR, Biblical Words for Time (Naperville, Ill. 1962). W. DILTHEY, Pattern and Meaning in History, ed. H. P. RICKMAN (New York 1962). G. E. CAIRNS, Philosophies of History (New York 1962). I. KANT, On History, ed. L. W. BECK; tr. L. W. BECK et al. (Indianapolis 1963). J. M. ROBINSON and J. B. COBB, eds., The Later Heidegger and Theology (New Frontiers in Theology 1; New York 1963). G. A. BUTTRICK, Christ and History (New York 1963). A. RICHARDSON, History Sacred and Profane (Philadelphia 1964). T. A. O'MEARA and C. D. WEISSER, Paul Tillich in Catholic Thought (Dubuque 1964). J. M. CONNOLLY, Human History and the Word of God (New York 1965). B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ, tr. E. G. KAISER (Westminster, Md. 1961) v.1. J. DANIELOU et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:793–799. P. RIGA, "The Ecclesiology of Johann Adam Möhler," Theological Studies 22 (1961) 563–587. R. ANDERSON, Historical Transcendence and the Reality of God (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1975). H. URS VON BALTHASAR, A Theology of History (New York 1963). L. GILKEY, Reaping the Whirlwind (New York 1976). J. B. METZ, Theology of the World (New York 1969). W. PANNENBERG, Theology and the Kingdom of God (Philadelphia 1969). K. RAHNER, "The Hermeneutics of Eschatological Assertions," Theological Investigations 6, tr. K. H. and B. KRUGER (Baltimore 1969). D. SOELLE, Po- litical Theology (Philadelphia 1971). E. SCHILLEBEECKX, "The Interpretation of Eschatology," in L. COGNET, ed., Post-Reformation Spirituality. Concilium 41 (1969).

[P. L. HUG/W. J. HILL]

HISTORY AND HISTORICITY (GESCHICHTLICHKEIT)

Standard English dictionaries have not furnished a definition of historicity corresponding even roughly to that given the term Geschichtlichkeit by German existentialists. Owing to the diversity in German existentialist thought, the terms geschichtlich (historical) and Geschichtlichkeit (historicity) exhibit a fairly wide semantic range. However, it may be said in general that, from the existentialist point of view, the historically significant is not necessarily identified completely with the factually historical. Thus, because of their impact on the individual believer, the Crucifixion and Resurrection of Christ are to be regarded as historically significant, whether factually established or not. Geschichtlichkeit may be described approximately as the full, authentic, active, and durative expression of a belief or movement in terms of personal participation and in relation to a given time. It can be used in an absolute sense, but also in a relative sense as well. It has application to the general as well as to the particular, and to the individual in relation to the community. It often involves contrasts and paradoxes. Geschichtlichkeit implies a rejection of traditional metaphysics, but, despite its opposition to certain aspects of historicism on the factual side, it likewise reflects, in some of its representatives at least, a relativistic concept of truth.

See Also: HISTORY, PHILOSOPHY OF; HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF; EXISTENTIALISM.

Bibliography: A. DARLAPP, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:780–783, with bibliog. A. BRUNNER, Geschichtlichkeit (Bern-Munich 1961). W. KAMLAH, Christentum und Geschichtlichkeit (2d ed. Stuttgart 1951), esp. 7–30. G. HASENHÜTTL, Geschichte und existenziales Denken (Wiesbaden 1965).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

HITTITE AND HURRIAN RELIGIONS

Since the religion of the HITTITES had much in common with that of the Hurrians, those elements common to both religions will be treated here in connection with Hittite religion. The elements peculiar to Hurrian religion will then be treated separately.

Hittite Religion. The Hittite conception of divinity was deeply anthropomorphic (see ANTHROPOMORPHISM).

Survivals of more primitive thought are apparent in the representation of the storm-god as a bull, in the worship of mountains, rivers, and springs, and in a few other features such as certain divine images not in human form, but these are exceptional. In general the gods are very much like men: sexually differentiated, forming families, requiring sustenance, swayed by passions, etc. They are thus consistently represented in literature and art.

Hittite Pantheon. The gods, however, were immortal. They had, too, a quality called para handandatar, which they occasionally "showed" to men in extraordinary events. This is a specifically and, for us, virtually undefinable conception of numinous power. One text translates it by Sumerian nig.si.sá, "equity," and however inadequate this equation unquestionably is, it is important as indicating the ethical nature of the numinous.

The gods themselves were legion. Not only were the same gods in numerous local cults recognized as distinct, but the gods of the different peoples of Anatolia and neighboring countries, preceding and during the time of the Hittites, were worshiped with little effort at syncretism. These gods were even addressed in their "native languages." There were Hattic gods whom the Hittites inherited from the Hatti, their predecessors in the land, Indo-European gods of the Hittites, Hurrian and Babylonian gods, and a primitive group called Asianic.

The most important, even in the classical period of the Hittites (c. 1400–1200 B.C.), were Hattic, who were worshiped either under their Hattic names or in Hittite translations of their names, e.g., the Hattic goddess of healing, Katahzipuris, who was called Kamrusipas in Hittite. Supreme was the sun-goddess of Arinna, a city not far from the capital Hattusa. She was "the mistress of the Hatti lands, the queen of heaven and earth . . . queen of all the countries." Her Hattic name was Wurusemu, her Hittite name is unknown. Her husband, probably Hattic Taru, was the storm-god, worshiped as the god of rain and fertility, either under the image of a bull or as a human figure with the bull his pedestal (cf. Jupiter Dolichenus). The couple's sons, the storm-gods of Nerik and Zippalanda, had cult centers north of Hattusa like Arinna and were probably local forms of Taru. Another important Hattic god was Telepinus, a vegetation or agricultural deity. The sun-god Istanus, "the sun-god of heaven," also had his cult; in fact, in the lists of divine witnesses to treaties, the sun-god is the first to be mentioned. He is the god of justice, a conception possibly connoting Babylonian influence.

Hurrian Pantheon. The next most important group of gods is the Hurrian. In the eastern part of the Hittite kingdom, the Hurrian cults of the goddess Hebat and her consort Teshub flourished in many centers. Within the official religion there was a tendency to identify Hebat with the sun-goddess of Arinna and Teshub with Taru. King Hattusili III honored as his special protectress Shaushka, the Hurrian Ishtar of Shamuha.

Relief detail, 10th century B.C., depicting weather god of Hatti receiving libation from King Shulumeli of Melid, Eastern Asia Minor.

Hurrian gods were adopted into the Hittite pantheon; for example, Sheri and Hurri, perhaps “Day and Night,” who were Teshub’s two bulls, and the sacred mountains Namni and Hazzi, the latter being Mt. Casius in north Syria near the mouth of the Orontes. Shaushka with her maids, Ninatta and Kulitta, regularly appear among the divine witnesses of the treaties, and besides other gods, such as Shimegi, the sun-god, and Kushuh, the moon-god, the Hurrians transmitted to the Hittites a number of Babylonian deities.

Relations of Gods and Men. The fundamental relationship of gods to men was that of masters to servants. It finds its clearest expression in the cult. Each day, like masters of a household, the gods must be washed, clothed, and given their food and drink. As the real rulers of the land they must also receive their tribute in the form of first fruits, unblemished animals, etc. This was done in a fixed cycle of religious FEASTS, which in general were seasonal. At the most important feasts the king himself officiated as chief priest. This was one of his most important duties, and annually he had to make a tour of the principal sanctuaries. To perform their religious duties kings are known to have interrupted even a military campaign.

The cult took place in temples, although open-air sanctuaries also existed. To judge from the temples at Hattusa, the cella containing the cult-stature was so located that it was accessible only to the priests and usually was invisible to the general body of worshipers. However, there were processions of statues, and in the entertainment of the gods, for example, the mock battle performed before the war-god Yarris, the statues must often have been visible to general view. The cult was not without its risks. The participants and all else had to be pure (see PURE AND IMPURE). Therefore, before the cult began, rites of purification were necessary, but neglect was possible, and the god could be offended with dire results for the guilty.

The Hittite conception of sin and divine punishment is well illustrated by the plague prayers of King Mursili II. The plague, which had raged for 20 years, is first explained as due to failure to make regular offerings to the Euphrates River. This was concluded from the fact that consultation of an ancient tablet revealed that earlier kings had made these offerings, but they were discontinued in the time of Mursili's father, during which period the plague began. This Mursili promises to correct; to do so, he is on his way now to the Euphrates. Beyond this, another tablet was discovered which showed that Mursili's father had violated the oath of a treaty. Although he gained a military victory in doing so, he brought back prisoners with the plague. To remedy the evil, Mursili confesses:

The father's sin falls upon the son. So, my father's sin has fallen upon me. Now, I have confessed before the Hattian storm-god, my lord, and before the gods, my lords (admitting): "It is true, we have done it. . . ." This is what I have to remind thee: The bird takes refuge in its nest, and the nest saves its life. Again: if anything becomes too much for a servant, he appeals to his lord. His lord hears him and takes pity on him. Whatever had become too much for him, he sets right for him. Again: if the servant has incurred guilt, but confesses his guilt to his lord, his lord may do with him what he pleases. But, because he [the servant] has confessed his guilt to his lord, his lord's soul is pacified, and his lord will not punish his servant. I have now confessed my father's sin.

This beautiful prayer shows the basic concepts, the tensions, and the occasional heights of Hittite religion.

A less attractive, but very characteristic, element in this religion was its alliance with MAGIC. Black magic was absolutely forbidden and punishable by death. Where genuine sin was involved, reliance on magic was never complete; prayer, too, was needed, and the mercy of the gods was implored. Magic was seen as distinct from religion and, at least on the official level, not considered its surrogate. Magic removed impurity, which could be contracted from sexual intercourse, from contact with impure objects like corpses, from curses effected by black magic, etc. It cured impotence, drove ghosts out of houses, and gave specific form and power to a curse. In general it was governed, like all magic, by analogy. Thus, in the soldier's oath, salt was placed in his hands, and he heard the fate of the disloyal: "Just as salt has no seed, even so let that man's name, seed, house, cattle, and sheep perish"; and to this he said "Amen." Uncleanness is compared to darkness, and so the ailing, "impure" person is made to don black clothes only to be stripped of them.

Guidance might come from extraordinary divine intervention through a dream or a prophet. Usually, however, it was sought by DIVINATION: extispicy, augury, and a third means, which was probably some use of lots. The first was borrowed from the Babylonians; the techniques were elaborate, the tradition behind them long and complex. By a series of omens with their "favorable" or Relief detail depicting Hittite King Tudhaliya IV in embrace of tutelary deity, Hurrian god Sharruma, Yazilikaya, Turkey.

"unfavorable" responses, the precise information sought could finally be acquired.

Myths. In the purulliyas festival, probably the New Year festival, which honored the storm-god, the Illuyankas myth was recited. Illuyankas, a dragon, and the storm-god meet one day and engage in combat. The dragon wins. Inaras, a Hattic goddess, helps the storm-god take his vengeance. First she gives her love to a mortal who in return promises his assistance. Then she entices Illuyankas to a feast and gets him drunk. Her lover binds the drunken dragon, then the storm-god easily disposes of him. In another and more recent version, Illuyankas first deprives the storm-god of his heart and eyes. The storm-god marries a mortal by whom he has a son; the son then marries the daughter of Illuyankas. At his father's advice he requests the return of the heart and eyes. This granted, the reinvigorated storm-god sets out for battle against Illuyankas. His son, now part of the dragon's household, sides with his father-in-law, and at his request is killed together with the dragon by his father.

The interpretation of this hieros logos of the purulliyas festival is obscure, but its similarity to the myth of Typhon in Greek sources should be noted. In a fight the monster Typhon overcomes Zeus, whose strength, however, is restored with the help of Typhon's daughter. Zeus then kills the monster. Zeus lives on Mt. Casius, Typhon on the Cilician coast. The myth, therefore, was originally at home in the neighborhood of the Hittites.

Myths, besides being used in the cult, were also employed in magical rituals (see MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY). One such was the myth of Telepinus, the disappearing god. Because he disappears, he has been compared with TAMMUZ, Adonis, and other "dying gods." However, Telepinus does not die; he hides. The myth was not recited seasonally in the cult, but in a magical rite to appease an angered god. According to the myth, Telepinus disappears in a fit of anger with the result that vegetation withers (Telepinus is the vegetation god), men and animals become sterile, etc. In this calamity all search proves futile until the goddess Hannahanna sends a bee, which finds Telepinus, but only makes matters worse by stinging the god and angering him the more. Magic is required; it is successfully applied by Kamrusipas (in another version by a man). Telepinus returns, and nature is restored.

Hurrian Religion. Although our knowledge of Hurrian religion is still imperfect, owing partly to the unsolved difficulties of the Hurrian language, the broad outlines are clear. To the principal gods of the Hurrian pantheon, which have already been mentioned, might be added the gods of war, Ashtabi and Nubadig, the latter appearing as Lubadagash in the third millennium.

Distinctive of the Hurrian pantheon is the presence of many Sumero-Akkadian gods (see MESOPOTAMIA, ANCIENT, 3.): Aya, the wife of Shimegi; Nikkal, Sumerian Ningal and wife of the moon-god; Shala, in Akkadian sources the wife of the storm-god Adad, but in Hurrian religion the wife of Kumarbi, "father of the gods." In fact, as an organized pantheon, that of the Hurrians is Sumero-Akkadian, but adapted to the supremacy of the storm-god Teshub and his consort Hebat. Similar borrowings and adaptations are evident in the cult practices.

The myths of Kumarbi also illustrate the Sumero-Akkadian influence, and, more interestingly, they show Hurrian influence on Greek myths. In one myth the Hurrian god Kumarbi is preceded as king of heaven by Alalu and Anu, each having reigned for nine years. Anu is the Sumero-Akkadian god of heaven, and Alalu in the god-lists is one of his ancestors. Kumarbi is equated with Enlil; thus, in the myth, Kumarbi betakes himself to Nippur, Enlil's city; outside the myth there are also many indications of this equation. According to the myth, Kumarbi gains the kingship by biting off Anu's membrum. Whether he thereby impregnates himself or, by spitting it out, impregnates the earth is not clear, but eventually three gods are born, one of whom is Teshub who deposes Kumarbi.

In another myth, which presupposes that Teshub is ruling, Kumarbi sleeps with a huge rock, which gives birth to the diorite monster Ullikummi. Placed in the sea, it grows and grows until it threatens all the gods of heaven; only the intervention of Ea, the Babylonian god of wisdom and magic, saves Teshub his kingship. In Hesiod's Theogony Uranos, "Heaven," is emasculated and deposed by Kronos, who in turn is overcome by Zeus; the similarity with Kumarbi's victory over Anu, "Heaven," is obvious. In the Ullikummi myth, in which the conflict of Ullikummi and Teshub takes place by Mt. Casius, one is again struck by a certain similarity to the Zeus-Typhon myth. Probably it was the Phoenicians who transmitted these Hurrian myths to the Greek mythographers.

Bibliography: L. DELPORTE, Dictionnaire de la Bible suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928-) 4:60-78. A. GOETZE, J. B. PRITCHARD, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton 1955); Kleinasiens² Kulturgeschichte des alten Orients 3.1 (Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft; Munich 1957) 130-171. H. G. GUETERBOCK, "Hittite Religion," Forgotten Religions, ed. V. FERM (New York 1950) 83-107. O. R. GURNEY, The Hittites (Baltimore 1952).

[W. L. MORAN]

HITTITES

An Indo-European group, probably Aryans, who crossed over the Caucasus Mountains into Armenia and Cappadocia. Historians point out two eras, the Old or Proto-Hittite Kingdom (1700-1530 B.C.) and the New Kingdom (c. 1420-1200 B.C.). Internationally the Hittites reached their peak in the 13th century, only to see their empire collapse shortly afterwards. In the realm of religion and literature, the Hittites betray no striking originality but proved to be quite adept in assimilating the cultures of their neighbors.

Old Kingdom. Scholars do not agree on the precise area from which the Hittites migrated or the approximate time of their departure. Evidence found in the cuneiform documents of the Assyrian merchant colony at Kültepe reveals numerous Indo-European names. Hence it is clear that the Hittites were established in the area by 1900 B.C., when the Assyrian colony was flourishing. On arrival in Asia Minor they took for themselves the name of an indigenous group, the Hatti, or Hitti.

At first, the new invaders were organized in a loose system of city-states, such as Kusara, Zalpa, and Hattusa. By the 17th century B.C., however, determined efforts at unification resulted in the establishment of a Hittite kingdom. Though credited to Labarna (early 16th century?), this work of unification had its beginnings much earlier. The first efforts at spreading the Hittite power were pursued by Hattusili, the successor of Labarna, who pushed south into Syria and actually laid siege to Yamkhad (Alep). Not until the advent of Mursili (c. 1535 B.C.) did Aleppo actually fall under Hittite control. This ambitious monarch even swept eastward to sack Babylon in 1530 and put an end to its first dynasty. The destruction of Babylon, however, proved to be simply a passing raid by the Hittites, and Babylonia never became a part of the Hittite Empire.

After the death of Mursili an era of turmoil began, during which succession to the throne usually entailed violence. Simultaneously the Hurrians to the east began to exert pressure on Hittite borders. As a result of these factors, Hittite power retreated into Asia Minor and was unimportant for 100 years.

New Kingdom. Shortly before 1400 B.C. new vitality began to show itself. Expansionist pressure was directed against northern Syria, but the alliance of Egypt and Mitanni held the Hittites in check. However, when in 1375 the able politician and general Suppiluliuma came to the Hittite throne, a period of decline began for Egypt. Suppiluliuma moved south and took most of Syria and northern Phoenicia from Egypt. When the weak and vacillating Egyptians failed to help Mitanni, it too fell to the Hittites as a vassal state. On the international scene, the fall of Mitanni was the prelude to the resurgence of Assyria under Ashur-uballit. I (1354–1318; see MESOPOTAMIA, ANCIENT, 2).

So weak had Egypt become that the young widow of Tutankhamun petitioned Suppiluliuma for one of his sons as her consort in an effort to provide some stability after the chaos of the Amarna Age (see EGYPT). However, the young Hittite prince was murdered by the Egyptians. War was averted for a time by a plague that was ravaging Hittite lands, but open conflict came when the 19th Egyptian dynasty tried to restore Egyptian control over Syria. In 1286 Ramses II (1290–1224) led his forces against those of Muwattili (1306–1282) at Kadesh on the Orontes. Although Egyptian hieroglyphs tell of the brilliant victory of the pharaoh, Hittite reports of a savage slaughter of the Egyptian troops are closer to the truth. Confirmation of the Hittite account is the fact that Egyptian forces never ventured into Syria again, though the fighting south of Syria dragged on for another 15 years. It was only the rise of a new menace to the East, Assyria, that led the Egyptians and the Hittites to make peace. In 1270, then, Ramses II and the new Hittite monarch Hattusili III made a treaty that was sealed by the marriage of a daughter of Hattusili to Ramses.

From its position as a great world power, the Hittite Empire came to a swift collapse before the 13th-century tide of vigorous Aegean peoples migrating into western Relief detail, Gate god, 14th-century B.C., Hattusa.

Asia Minor. But responsibility for this collapse rests principally with the “Sea Peoples,” who were next to challenge Egypt and eventually settle the coastal plain of Palestine. Some city-states did manage to survive, among them Carchemish, Zinjirli, and Karatepe, but even these bowed completely out of history in the 8th century, when Sargon II, king of Assyria seized Carchemish.

Culture. Culturally the Hittites lagged far behind the great civilizations of the 2d millennium B.C. Study, even of their era of international prominence, shows little cultural initiative. They strove, rather, to imitate and assimilate the contributions of their neighbors. Moreover, one can point to no single Hittite religion. There was a host of national and local cults. Sumero-Akkadian deities came to the Hittites through the mediation of the Hurrians. From Nineveh came the cult of Ishtar. Egypt too was to contribute to the conglomeration of Hittite practices. And a pervading syncretism led to a refashioning of these cults in their new homeland.

Hittite legal codes belong to the same class of secular laws as those contained in the Code of Hammurabi. Their formula for overlord-vassal treaties has provided a better understanding of the important OT concept of covenant [see G. E. Mendenhall, “Ancient Oriental and Biblical Law” and “Covenant Forms in Israelite Tradition” The

Hieroglyphic inscription from Aleppo, c. 1354 B.C. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

Biblical Archaeologist 17 (1954) 26–46; 50–76]. The social order founded on Hittite law was actually more humane than the earlier codes from which it borrowed. The law of retaliation (lex talionis), “An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life,” was not in vogue. Nor were the various classes inseparably divided; even the rights of a slave were recognized.

It is the opinion of some scholars that the Hittites probably learned the secret of making iron as early as 1600 B.C., but it is doubtful when they first employed it for military purposes. Its first uses seem to have been for ornaments, not weapons. Perhaps the first effective military use of iron was by the Sea Peoples, who effected the breakup of the Hittite Empire near the close of the 13th century. Allusion to the iron monopoly of these Sea Peoples, known to Bible readers as the PHILISTINES, is to be found in 1 Sm 13.19–22.

From ancient times Hittite lands were well known for their horses. Biblical reference to this fact is seen in 2 Kgs 10.28–29, where we learn that the enterprising SOLOMON imported horses from Asia Minor and chariots from Egypt and sold both “to all the kings of the Hittites and Aram.” Hittites are mentioned in the OT under the name of Hethites.

Bibliography: O. R. GURNEY, The Hittites (Baltimore, Md. 1952). K. W. MAREK, The Secret of the Hittites: The Discovery of an Ancient Empire, tr. R. and O. WINSTON (New York 1956). G. CONTENAU, La Civilisation des Hittites et des Hurrites du Mitanni (new ed. rev. Paris 1948). A. GOETZE, Hethiter, Churriter und Assyryer (Cambridge, Mass. 1936). C. L. WOOLLEY, A Forgotten Kingdom (Baltimore, Md. 1953). E. NEUFELD, tr., The Hittite Laws (London 1951).

[J. E. HUESMAN]

HITTORP, MELCHIOR

Liturgist; b. Cologne, c. 1525; d. Cologne, 1584. He contributed to the preservation of the faith of the people of Cologne by publishing an edition of the writings of various medieval liturgists and an ancient Roman Ordinal, De Divinis Catholicae Ecclesiae Officiis ac Ministeriis (Cologne 1568). This Ordinal, as M. Andrieu has shown, is a part of the Romano-German Pontifical compiled at Mainz about 950, which formed the basis for our modern Roman Pontifical. This entire edition is still the most complete collection of medieval liturgists.

Bibliography: Allgemeine deutsche Biographie (Leipzig 1875–1910) 12:507. A. FRANZEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:394–395. M. ANDRIEU, “Melchior Hittorp et l’Ordo Romanus Antiquus,” Ephemerides liturgicae 46 (1932) 3–21. M. ANDRIEU, Les “Ordines Romani” du haut moyen-âge, 5 v. (Louvain 1931–61) 1:494–525.

[B. NEUNHEUSER]

HLOND, AUGUSTYN

Polish cardinal; b. Brzezckowice (Upper Silesia), June 5, 1881; d. Warsaw, Oct. 22, 1948. Following his early school years in his native district, he continued his education under the SALESIANS at Turin and entered their congregation in 1897. He received his doctorate at the Gregorian University in Rome in 1899 and was ordained in Cracow Sept. 23, 1905. He was appointed director of a Salesian school in Cracow (1907) and later was a schoolmaster in Vienna. From 1919 to 1922 he was head of the newly founded German-Austrian province of the Salesians.

In the reorganization of ecclesiastical affairs in Poland after World War I, he was made apostolic administrator (1922) and became the first bishop of Katowice (Dec. 14, 1925; consecrated Jan. 3, 1926). He played a major part in the negotiations leading to the concordat between the Holy See and Poland (1925). In 1926 he was made archbishop of Gniezno-Poznań and primate of Poland, and in 1927, cardinal. His able leadership in Polish episcopal synods, pastoral letters, development of CATHOLIC ACTION, and promotion of the missionary apostolate of the press, imparted new life to the care of souls in Poland. At the outbreak of World War II he traveled by way of Rumania to Rome. From the fall of 1940 he resided in southern France. On Feb. 3, 1944, he was arrested by the Gestapo and, in September, was taken to Wiedenbrück (in Westphalia), where, on April 1, 1945, he was freed by American troops. By way of Rome and Prague he returned to Poznań (July 20, 1945) and began the reorganization of ecclesiastical life in Poland, having received special authority for this work from the Holy See. In the "Western Polish" districts, belonging to the East German ecclesiastical province, he established five apostolic administrators. On March 4, 1946, Pius XII dissolved the personal union of Gniezno and Poznań. Cardinal Hlond remained archbishop of Gniezno and, in addition, was made archbishop of Warsaw. Owing to his initiative, Catholicism recovered its strength after the suppression it suffered under National Socialism during the German occupation. To the end of his life, the cardinal-archbishop defended the Church against all limitations on its freedom imposed by the Communist government. On Jan. 22, 1959, his remains were transferred to the new primate's chapel in the Cathedral of St. John in Warsaw. Monuments in the cathedrals of Poznań and Warsaw manifested the gratitude of Polish Catholics for his labors on their behalf.

Bibliography: Works. The Persecution of the Catholic Church in German-Occupied Poland (New York 1941); Na straży sumienia narodu, wybór pism i przemówień z przedmowem O. Haleckiego (Ramsey, N.Y. 1951). Literature. B. STASIEWSKI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:395–396. W. SUCKER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:371. K. M. ŻYWCZYŃSKI, "A. Hlond," Polski słownik biograficzny 9 (Wrocław-Warsaw-Cracow 1961) 545–546. W. MALEJ, "Kardynał A. Hlond, 1881–1948," Wiadomości archidiecezji warszawskiej 40 (Warsaw 1958) 510–520.

[B. STASIEWSKI]

HOBBS, THOMAS

British empiricist noted for his political philosophy; b. Malmesbury (Wiltshire), April 5, 1588; d. Hardwick, Dec. 4, 1679.

Life. Hobbes's schooling was at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. After graduation he became the private tutor of William Cavendish, later the first earl of Devonshire; this early association with the Cavendish family proved to be extremely helpful throughout his life. It provided him, for instance, with the opportunity to travel extensively through Europe, where he came to know R. DESCARTES, M. Mersenne, and G. GALILEI.

Thomas Hobbes. (Archive Photos)

By temperament Hobbes was a classicist. His first published work was a translation of Thucydides, and fully half his literary output he rendered in Latin. But by conviction Hobbes was a man of his age, and he felt the philosophical speculations and metaphysical suppositions of antiquity to be of little value in seventeenth-century Europe.

Endangered by his radical political ideas, Hobbes fled from England in 1640 and sought refuge in Paris. During an 11-year stay in the French capital, he was hired as tutor to a fellow exile, the then Prince of Wales. Later as Charles II, the former pupil ensured Hobbes a measure of safety and independence by granting him a life-long pension.

In 1651 Hobbes aroused the ire of French authorities by his remarks about the papacy, and he quickly returned to England. Commanding little if any popular support, he lived out his years with few interests save writing. But the quiet and detached life of the scholar was not to be his. Even with the relative protection afforded by his royal pension, Hobbes's later years were stormy and hectic. His godlessness was attacked in pulpit and pamphlet; the House of Commons condemned his masterwork, Leviathan, in 1666, and several of his other writings were subject to proscription and censorship.

Thought. Although there is a superficial development of Hobbes's political ideas out of a mechanistic or empirical theory of nature, the nexus is perhaps more convenient than crucial. This is a disputed point among Hobbes's present-day commentators. This issue can remain open, however, while the relevance of the political theory is examined.

Hobbes postulates a "state of nature" from which man emerges as he builds his political and social world. In this state of nature man is free, absolutely free, but his freedom is something to be quickly rid of in the SOCIAL CONTRACT. It is not an initial condition or franchise for further progress and attainment. Rather, in the state of nature freedom implies lack of order, and without order life is in dire jeopardy. So man barter freedom for security. And a social contract once entered carries strong sanctions. Indeed, the only moral imperative in Hobbes's system states that man must not break the contract, for to do so risks a return to the dangers of the state of nature.

Out of individual social contracts develops a new entity, the state. Men pool their freedoms in the construction of an artificial commonwealth, and then they find themselves totally subject to its rigid and monolithic order.

Thus Hobbes did not consider the motivation that prompts man to the building of a body politic as the seeking of a good. Indeed, man himself is not a creature who seeks to do good. He is moved to act only out of fear, especially and archetypically the fear of violent death. Life itself, sheer life, is the only good or value that Hobbes recognized, and to its protection all human enterprises are oriented. Again, for Hobbes there is no objective order of values to be recognized and implemented; there is merely a subjective desire to be fulfilled, or more properly, preserved. But even this subjective desire is not an optimistic longing to achieve any positive concept of self-identity; it is nothing but a pessimistic fear of destruction.

Assessment. Hobbes's understanding of the nature of man strikes at the very heart of any classical, much less Christian, interpretation. Devoid of any hope of seeking positive values, indeed with the denial of any notion of moral virtue, man would indeed find freedom a terrible specter. There is, perhaps, a degree of similarity between Hobbes's state of nature and the anguish of contemporary EXISTENTIALISM. Each would deny that man has any positive or intelligible essence, and each would likewise deny that man seeks to discover an external order in his political and philosophical activity. Whereas Hobbes finds nothing to do with freedom except surrender it to an artificial leviathan, the existentialist clings to his freedom but despairs of finding a solution to the very questions he has raised.

The end product of Hobbes's analysis is a state ripe for totalitarianism. Stripped of the radical individuality that Christianity won for him, gripped with a fear of violence and disorder, and blind to any vision of positive social and moral values, man held tight to the state itself, awkwardly pieced together with forfeited freedom (cf. H. Arendt).

Hobbes did not generate a school of followers, and it is very questionable whether his thought has had any direct positive influence at all. Many took strong issue with both his political and natural speculations. Benjamin Whichcote and the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS led a religious movement against the teachings of Hobbes. But perhaps his final significance lies in his having given expression to an ever-present possibility in thought—one that has been resisted in philosophy since Plato, and against which man must remain forever on guard.

Bibliography: Works. The English Works of Thomas Hobbes, ed. W. MOLESWORTH, 11 v. (London 1839–45); Opera philosophica quae Latine scripsit omnia, ed. W. MOLESWORTH, 5 v. (London 1839–45); Leviathan, ed. M. OAKESHOTT (Oxford 1957); De cive, or The Citizen, ed. S. P. LAMPRECHT (New York 1949). Literature. M. A. PACCHI, "Bibliografia hobbesiana dal 1840 ad oggi," Rivista critica di storia della filosofia 17 (1962): 528–547. L. STRAUSS, The Political Philosophy of Hobbes, tr. E. M. SINCLAIR (Chicago 1952); Natural Right and History (Chicago 1953). H. ARENDT, The Origins of Totalitarianism (New York 1951). R. POLIN, Politique et philosophie chez Thomas Hobbes (Paris 1953).

[B. J. CUDAHY]

HOCEDEZ, EDGAR

Theologian; b. Ghent, Belgium, July 1, 1877; d. Fayt-lez-Manage, Sept. 5, 1948. Entering the Society of Jesus in 1895, he combined a profound religious life with an eagerness for scientific work and a passionate interest in the history of ideas. At first, his superiors planned the career of a Bollandist for him and had him spend one year under the direction of H. Delehaye and P. Peeters, publishing articles of hagiography in the Analecta Bollandiana. He showed so marked an ability in theology, however, that his superiors assigned him to teach the subject. He taught successively at Kurseong, Bengal (1908–12); Louvain (1912–14); and Hastings, England. Returning to Louvain in 1919, he taught fundamental theology. Hocedez enriched his classes with his knowledge of medieval scholasticism, especially the work of St. Thomas, and his acquaintance with modern apologetic thought. His private study on the history of medieval philosophy and theology yielded such works as Richard de Middleton (Louvain 1925) and Aegidii Romani Theoremata de Esse et Essentia (Louvain 1930). He also published many magazine articles and was editor of the Nouvelle Revue Théologique from 1920 until 1926. From 1928 on, he was in charge of theology courses preparatory to the doctorate at the Gregorian University. Two or three years before World War II he conceived the project that was the culmination of his scientific work, the Histoire de la théologie au XIX^e siècle, 3 volumes (Brussels 1949–52). The war forced him to leave Rome hurriedly in 1940; he completed his masterwork in Belgium. He was a man of constant religious fervor, with remarkable zeal for work, and with a cordial and delicate charity. All these were expressed in his stimulating book provoked by the war, L'Évangile de la souffrance (Tournai 1946).

Bibliography: J. LEVIE, Nouvelle revue théologique 70 (1948) 786–793. C. MARTIN, Catholicisme 5:817.

[J. LEVIE]

HODGE, CHARLES

American Presbyterian theologian; b. Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 28, 1797; d. Princeton, N.J., June 19, 1878. His father, a surgeon in George Washington's army, died in Hodge's childhood. Hodge attended Princeton and Princeton Theological Seminary, where he studied under Archibald ALEXANDER. In 1822 he was appointed professor of Oriental and Biblical literature at the seminary, a post he held until 1840. On a leave of absence (1826–28) he studied at the University of Berlin under the historian John A. W. Neander and became acquainted with Otto von Gerlach's circle.

In 1840 Hodge succeeded Alexander as professor of didactic and polemic theology, holding this chair until his death. His class lectures were the basis of his Systematic Theology (1872), the most generally used seminary text of the late 19th century. Hodge carried on the theological tradition of Alexander, a blend of 17th-century Calvinist scholasticism and Scottish realism that stressed both the power of reason and a verbally inspired, inerrant Bible as the basis of faith. Although he contributed to the original division, Hodge worked actively to reunite the Old and New School Presbyterians after the Civil War, and his efforts were instrumental in effecting union in 1869. He personally taught more than 3,000 ministers, and by the time of the general assembly in 1890, his theology was almost universally held among Presbyterians.

Bibliography: A. A. HODGE, The Life of Charles Hodge (New York 1880). W. THORP, ed., Lives of Eighteen from Princeton (Princeton 1946). H. T. KERR, ed., Sons of the Prophets (Princeton 1963).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

Charles Hodge.

HODGSON, SYDNEY, BL.

Lay martyr; hanged at Tyburn (London), Dec. 10, 1591. Hodgson, a convert to Catholicism, demonstrated the depth of his passion for the Eucharist. He was assisting at a Mass said by St. Edmund GENNINGS in the home of St. Swithun WELLS when Topcliffe broke into the house searching for priests. Hodgson and other men of the congregation prevented their entry into the "sanctuary" until the conclusion of the Mass. Thereafter all surrendered, were tried (Dec. 4, 1591), and condemned for relieving priests and being reconciled to the Roman Church. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, 180, 190. J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves (London 1877), III. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

St. Clement Mary Hofbauer.

HOFBAUER, CLEMENT MARY, ST.

Redemptorist priest; b. Tasswitz, Moravia, Dec. 26, 1751; d. Vienna, Austria, March 15, 1820. He was the youngest of 12 children of Paul, a grazier and butcher, and Mary (Steer) Hofbauer (German equivalent of Dvořák, the original family name). His father's death (1757) caused him to defer his early desire for the priesthood and to work as a baker until 1780, except for a period when he lived as a hermit. He changed his baptismal name John to Clement Mary. Financial help from three elderly Viennese ladies enabled him to prepare for the priesthood at the University of Vienna (1780–84). He and Thaddeus Hübl went to Rome, joined the recently founded REDEMPTORISTS (The Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer) in 1784, and were ordained (1785). The two priests were then sent to Austria. Since JOSEPHINISM made it impossible to establish a house in Vienna, Hofbauer went to Warsaw (1787–1808) where he engaged in pastoral work, opened schools, introduced the order into Switzerland and southern Germany, and acted as its vicar-general for the regions north of the Alps. When NAPOLEON I caused him to leave Warsaw, he returned to Vienna for the remainder of his life. He worked for a time in the Franciscan church, served as chaplain to the Ursulines and as pastor of St. Ursula's Church from 1813, and established the Redemptorists in the city (1819). He gained renown for his influence over the populace, students, learned persons, artists, and writers. Especially notable was his influence over leading Romanticists such as Karl von Schlegel, Adam Müller, and their numerous friends. Hofbauer won many converts and effected a spiritual rejuvenation of the capital and of Austria. He was called the apostle of Vienna and was named patron saint of the city by PIUS X (1914). He was beatified Jan. 29, 1888, and canonized May 20, 1909.

Feast: March 15.

Bibliography: J. HOFER, St. Clement Maria Hofbauer, tr. J. B. HAAS (New York 1926). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'histoire des fêtes, ed. by the Benedictines of Paris, 12 v. (Paris 1935–56) 3:333–342. E. HOSP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER, pt. 1 (1966) 5:413–414. E. DUDEL, Klemens Hofbauer (Bonn 1970). K. FLEISCHMANN, Klemens Maria Hofbauer: sein Leben und seine Zeit (Graz 1988). J. HEINZMANN, Preaching the Gospel Anew: Saint Clement Maria Hofbauer, tr. B. J. MCGRADY (Liguori, Mo. 1998).

[D. J. SHARROCK]

HOFFMAN, MELCHIOR

Furrier and laypreacher who joined the ANABAPTISTS, contributing an esoteric-enthusiastic interpretation of Scripture that influenced both revolutionary and pacifist groups; b. Schwäbisch Hall, before 1500?; d. Strassburg, 1543. While traveling across northern Europe practicing his trade, Hoffman preached wherever opportunity presented itself. Distrusted by the clergy because of his lack of theological education, he went to Wittenberg (1525) to obtain Luther's approval. In possession of a recommendation, he returned to the Baltic countries, but his theology remained suspect. Everywhere his preaching created disorder, forcing him to flee. In 1529 he made contact with Anabaptists in Strassburg, was rebaptized, and became a spokesman of this movement in northern Europe. He returned in 1533 to Strassburg, where he was arrested and imprisoned until his death.

A prolific writer, Hoffman considered himself one of the promised two witnesses (Ap 11.3), empowered to understand and proclaim the hidden meaning of Scripture. He promised the millennial rule of the saints, profoundly influencing the revolutionary Anabaptists. The Melchiorites were named after him. His Christology, which denies the true motherhood of the Blessed Virgin Mary, influenced Menno Simons.

Bibliography: P. KAWERAU, Melchior Hoffman als religiöser Denker (Haarlem 1954); Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:422–423. G. H. WILLIAMS, ed., Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (Philadelphia 1957); The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962). W. SCHATZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:426.

[G. W. FORELL]

HOFINGER, JOHANNES

Scholar, catechist; b. Tyrol, Austria, March 21, 1905; d. New Orleans, La., Feb. 14, 1984. At age 11 Hofinger entered the minor seminary in Salzburg. He studied philosophy at the Gregorian University in Rome, entered the Society of Jesus on Sept. 7, 1925, studied theology under Josef A. JUNGMANN, SJ in Innsbruck, and in 1937 completed his doctoral dissertation on the history of the catechism in Austria and Germany from the time of St. Peter Canisius. In that year he went to China and taught in a regional seminary at Kinghsien. There he produced his second book, in Latin and Chinese, Our Good News (1946). In 1949 he went with the seminarians to Manila, where he continued to teach until 1958.

Hofinger's major contribution was to reform the Church's methods in catechesis and religious education; he called for adopting insights from the Biblical and liturgical movements and from cultural anthropology. In addition to writing several books and many articles, he founded influential periodicals: "Good Tidings" (1962) and "Teaching All Nations" (1964). These merged into the "East Asian Pastoral Review" (1979).

From 1953 to 1970 he circled the globe 16 times, lecturing on the "kerygmatic approach," proclaiming the good news of salvation history which reached its climax in Jesus Christ, and stressing God's loving gift of self and the invitation to respond.

He organized a series of international congresses in Nijmegen (1959), Eichstätt (1960), Bangkok (1962), Katigondo (1964), Manila (1967), Medellin (1968), and San Antonio (1969), bringing together Biblical, liturgical, and catechetical experts from every continent. These meetings influenced the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the Decree on Missionary Activity of the Church, and the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions at the Second Vatican Council. They also prepared the way for the International Catechetical Congress in Rome in 1971 and contributed to the Synods of Bishops on Evangelization (1974) and Catechesis (1977) and to the resulting Apostolic Exhortations of Paul VI, Evangelii nuntiandi (1975) and JOHN PAUL II, Catechesi tradendae (1979).

Hofinger was a prolific writer. Among his major works are the following: Nuntius Noster seu Themata

Predicationis Nostrae (Tientsin 1964); Der priesterlose Gemeindegottesdienst in den Missionen, with J. Kellner (Schöneck 1956); The Art of Teaching Christian Doctrine (South Bend 1957); Liturgische Erneuerung in der Weltmission, with J. Kellner (Innsbruck 1957); Worship: the Life of the Missions, (Notre Dame 1958); The ABC's of Modern Catechetics, with W. J. Reedy (New York 1964); The Good News and its Proclamation, with F. J. Buckley (Notre Dame 1968); Our Message is Christ: the More Outstanding Elements of the Christian Message (Notre Dame 1974); Evangelization and Catechesis: Are We Really Proclaiming the Gospel? (New York 1976); You Are My Witnesses: Spirituality for Religion Teachers (Huntington 1977); Pastoral Life in the Power of the Spirit (New York 1982).

A man of tremendous energy and zealous enthusiasm, in 1963 he organized in Manila the East Asian Pastoral Institute, which became a center for inculturation. He briefly taught at the Fiji Islands in Oceania. Then at age 66, in spite of failing eyesight, he learned Spanish to be able to bring the "good news" to Latin America, where he lectured, taught, and wrote. In his final years he was active in the charismatic movement, integrating that with catechetics, especially in its Biblical basis. Eventually he became Associate Director at the Archdiocesan Office of Religious Education in New Orleans. He died the day before he would have become a naturalized citizen of the United States.

Bibliography: A. MARIA DE LA CRUZ, "Johannes Hofinger Remembered: 1905–1984," The Living Light 20 (June 1984) 345–347. F. J. BUCKLEY, et al., "Panel Honors Pioneering Catholic Educator," Religious Education Association Clearing House 12 (Spring 1982) 3–6. F. X. CLARK, "Johannes Hofinger, S.J., (1905–1984). Life and Bibliography," East Asian Pastoral Review 21 (2 1984) 103–120. A. M. NEBREDÁ, "Johannes Hofinger: Catalyst and Pioneer," ibid., 120–127. R. R. EKSTROM, "He is Much Missed," Catechist 18 (Feb. 1985) 56.

[F. J. BUCKLEY]

HOGAN, JOHN BAPTIST

Sulpician rector; b. near Ennis, County Clare, Ireland, June 24, 1829; d. Paris, France, Sept. 29, 1901. With the help of an uncle who was a priest in the Diocese of Périgueux, Hogan went to France at 15 and studied for the priesthood in the minor and major seminaries of Bordeaux. When he finished theology in 1849, he was sent to Paris for two years of postgraduate work in the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice at Issy. In September 1851 he began his novitiate for the Sulpicians and was ordained June 5, 1852. The following September, at 23, Hogan began to teach dogmatic theology at Issy, where he continued to teach it and several other subjects until he turned to moral theology and liturgy in 1863. In 1884 he was sent to the U.S., where as Abbé Hogan he served as first president of St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Mass. (1884–89), as president of Divinity College, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. (1889–94), and again as president of St. John's Seminary for his last seven years. Failing health brought about his resignation and return to France, where he died suddenly. Hogan prepared occasional articles for periodicals and wrote two books, Clerical Studies, which first appeared as a series of articles in the Ecclesiastical Review (1891–95), and Daily Thoughts, a series of short meditations for seminarians and priests. Both have been translated into French.

[C. M. CUYLER]

HOGAN, JOHN JOSEPH

Bishop; b. County Limerick, Ireland, May 10, 1829; d. Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 21, 1913. He received his classical education in Ireland and came to the U.S. in 1848 for his theological course. Ordained on April 10, 1852, by Abp. Peter Richard Kenrick, he filled parochial assignments in St. Louis, Mo., from 1852 to 1857. In 1857 Hogan volunteered for northern Missouri and, with a base at Chillicothe, took up a life of travel by horseback and on the newly built railroad. In 1865 he was indicted for refusing to take a test oath required of clergy by the Missouri Constitution, but he won a victory when the U.S. Supreme Court declared this requirement to be unconstitutional. When the city of St. Joseph in northwestern Missouri became an episcopal see, Hogan was appointed bishop (March 3, 1868) and was consecrated on September 13 by Kenrick. At this time there were some 3,000 Catholics in the territory. In 1880 the Diocese of Kansas City was erected, and Hogan was transferred there while continuing to administer the Diocese of St. Joseph. He governed the two dioceses until 1893, when Bp. Maurice F. Burke of Cheyenne, Wyo., was transferred to St. Joseph. During Hogan's episcopate at Kansas City, the number of priests and Catholics increased sharply, new religious communities came to the diocese, and new churches, including the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, were built. In 1896 John J. Glennon, a priest of the Diocese of Kansas City, was appointed coadjutor. Among Hogan's published works were On the Mission in Missouri (1892) and Nautical Distances and How to Compute Them (1903).

Bibliography: J. J. SCHLAFLY, A History of the Catholic Church in the Diocese of Kansas City (Kansas City 1955).

[W. W. BAUM]

HOGAN, WILLIAM

Schismatic; b. Ireland, 1788; d. Nashua, N.H., Jan. 3, 1848. Little is known of his early years except that he was ordained in Ireland and functioned as a priest in the Diocese of Limerick. According to his cousin, Rev. George Hogan, William was suspended five years before he arrived in the U.S., and had declared his intention of becoming a Protestant clergyman. Hogan first settled in the New York Archdiocese, but in 1820, without the permission of Bp. John Connolly of New York, he moved to St. Mary's Cathedral, Philadelphia, Pa. There he ingratiated himself with the lay trustees, conducted himself in an unpriestly manner, and publicly attacked Bp. Henry CONWELL. Despite warnings, Hogan refused to reform and was suspended by Conwell. There followed a series of recriminations aired in the public press and the state courts. In the course of the dispute, Hogan proposed the founding of an American Catholic Church in which the congregation would choose its own pastor. This doctrine, known as "Hoganism," was struck down by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in 1822, but the rebellious trustees, persisting in their claim to control Church property, closed the cathedral. Hogan himself was obliged to resign because of publicity concerning his moral life. As a former priest, he was twice "married" and worked as a lecturer and author of such anti-Catholic pamphlets as Popery as It Was and Is and Nunneries and Auricular Confession. In 1843 he was appointed U.S. consul at Nuevitas, Cuba. There is no record of his having been reconciled to the Church before he died.

Bibliography: M. I. J. GRIFFIN, "The Life of Bishop Conwell of Philadelphia," rev. and ed. L. B. NORTON, Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia 24–29 (1913–18), see Indexes. F. E. TOURSCHER, The Hogan Schism . . . (Philadelphia 1930).

[H. J. NOLAN]

HOGER OF BREMEN-HAMBURG, ST.

Archbishop; d. Dec. 20, 916? His origins and early life are unknown. He became a monk at the Abbey of CORVEY, and from there was called to assist the aging Archbishop ADALGAR OF BREMEN (d. 909), whom he succeeded. Although his diocese was much troubled by invasions of Slavs and Magyars, Hoger scrupulously upheld diocesan and monastic discipline. Little else is known of his episcopal career, but ancient tradition testifies to his sanctity. He was buried in the Church of St. Michael, and c. 1036 his remains were transferred to the main basilica.

Feast: Dec. 20 or 29.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti, 9 v. (Paris 1668–1701; 2d ed. Venice 1733–40) 5:24. ADAMUS

BREMENSIS, Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae pontificum, ed. B. SCHMEIDLER in Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (Berlin 1825–), bk. 1, ch. 50–52; History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen, tr. F. J. TSCHAN (New York 1959).

[F. BEHREND]S]

HOGG, JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. at Cleveland, North Riding, Yorkshire, England; d. May 27, 1590, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Durham. He studied at Rheims from Oct. 15, 1587, and was ordained with his fellow martyrs BB. Richard Holiday and Richard HILL on Sept. 23, 1589. They were all arrested while taking up their posts in the north of England and condemned for treason as seminary priests. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

HOHENBAUM VAN DER MEER, MORITZ

Benedictine historian; b. Spörl, near Belgrade, June 25, 1718; d. Abbey of Rheinau, near Schaffhausen, Switzerland, Dec. 18, 1795. He had been a student at Rheinau since 1730 when he was professed there in 1734; he was ordained in 1741, became professor in 1744, and served as prior of the abbey from 1758 to 1794. From 1759 until his death he was monastic archivist, and during the last 19 years of his life he functioned as secretary of the Swiss Benedictine Congregation. Besides several theological works he wrote a great number of historical treatises, mostly about his abbey, the Benedictine Order, and Switzerland. Without personal contact with the MAURISTS, he nevertheless followed their historical method, stressing, however, the actual writing of history rather than historical research. One Swiss scholar considered him the “Swiss MABILLON.”

Bibliography: G. MAYER, “Leben und Schriften des Pater Moriz Hohenbaum van der Meer,” Freiburger Diöcesan Archiv 11 (1877) 1–34. G. PFEILSCHIFTER, Die St. Blasianische Germania Sacra (Munich 1921). G. HEER, Johannes Mabillon und die Schweizer Benediktiner (St. Gallen 1938); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:428.

[O. L. KAPSNER]