- Ater, Renee Deanne. "Image, Text, Sound: Aaron Douglas's Illustrations for James Weldon Johnson's God's Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse." M.A. thesis, University of Maryland, College Park, 1993.
- Carroll, Anne. "Art, Literature, and the Harlem Renaissance: The Messages of God's Trombones." College Literature, 2002.
- Cooper, Grace C. "Black Preaching Style in James Weldon Johnson's God's Trombones." Mawa Review, 4(1), 1989.
- Fleming, Robert E. "Johnson's Poetry: The Two Voices." In James Weldon Johnson. Boston Mass.: Twayne—G. K. Hall, 1987.

- Gates, Henry Louis Jr. Figures in Black: Words, Signs, and the "Racial" Self. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Jones, Gayl. Liberating Voices: Oral Tradition in African American Literature. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Kirschke, Amy Helene. Aaron Douglas: Art, Race, and the Harlem Renaissance. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.
- Koprince, Susan J. "Femininity and the Harlem Renaissance: A Note on James Weldon Johnson." CLA Journal, 1985. (See also Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson, eds. Kenneth M. Price and Lawrence J. Oliver. New York: G. K. Hall—Simon and Schuster Macmillan, 1997.)
- Rogal, Samuel J. "The Homiletic and Hymnodic Elements in the Poetry of James Weldon Johnson." Marjorie Kinnan Rawlins Journal of Florida Literature, 7, 1996.
- Sundquist, Eric. The Hammers of Creation: Folk Culture in Modern African-American Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992.

Grace, Charles Manuel

See Daddy Grace

Great Migration

"Great migration" refers to a massive exodus of African Americans from the South to the North, beginning in 1890 and culminating at the onset of World War I in 1914. During this period roughly 500,000 African Americans left their southern homeland for Baltimore, Chicago, New York, and Philadelphia, shifting much of the black population from rural settings to urban centers. The presence of African Americans in these cities had a significant impact on the changing political, economic, and social landscape; thus the great migration has been described as a pivotal time in twentieth-century American history.

The great migration, however, was not the first instance of black mobility. Since the forced migration of Africans to the Americas in the seventeenth century, people of African descent have been consistently on the move. Throughout the nineteenth century, the North represented hope and opportunity for both runaway and newly emancipated slaves. After the Civil War, more than 40,000 former slaves, known as "exodusters," headed to Kansas for economic and social opportunity. Still, at the close of the nineteenth century, the largest number of African Americans fled the South to begin new lives in the North.

While the motivations for migration were as varied and distinct as each of the migrants who made the journey north, there are, nonetheless, a few major themes. One such theme was safety. In the 1890s, the increasing restrictions of Jim Crow compounded with the lynchings and violence that ensued prompted many African Americans to leave the South in hope of finding a safer life in the North. For example, articles written by Ida B. Wells warned African Americans of the lynching spectacles that took place throughout the South; and cartoons depicted the North as a place of hope and the South as a place of terror. A second theme had to do with the environment. The late nineteenth century and the early twentieth were a time of severe environmental destruction. Floods and droughts destroyed the livelihood of many small farmers throughout the South, and the onslaught of the boll weevil devastated cotton production. As a result, tenant farmers, sharecroppers, and owners of small farms looked to the North for economic opportunity. A third, related theme was economics. African American farmers began to consider the North as a new place of settlement not only because of the environmental devastation that was sweeping across the South but also because of the industrialization that was developing in the North, because this created a demand for a black labor force. A fourth theme, related to the labor force, was World War I. During the war, restrictions were placed on immigration to the United States, leading to a labor shortage in many new factories in the North. Also, many American workers, virtually all of whom were white males, left their jobs and joined (or were drafted into) the armed forces; this exacerbated the labor shortage. Corporations responded by sending labor agents to the South; the agents actively recruited African American men to work and live in the burgeoning northern cities. A fifth theme was social equality, which seemed more likely in the North. In sum, African Americans were pushed out of the South by violence, Jim Crow, and the erosion of their farms and were pulled to the North by the promise of economic opportunity and social equality.

Relatively recent research on the history of African American migration to the North has not only explored the reasons why so many African Americans fled from the South but also uncovered provocative details about their experiences as migrants. A significant number of southern migrants never made it to their northern destinations, but instead settled in urban parts of the South and in the Upper South. Many migrants found seasonal work while on their journey to the North and ended up following the seasonal labor patterns instead of traveling farther north. Other migrants never made it to the big urban centers, such as Philadelphia, Chicago, or New York, but instead settled in Pittsburgh, where they found jobs in the steel plants.

The emphasis on economic opportunity and labor as the impetus for migration has, according to some historians, obscured our understanding of who the migrants were. Although most migrants were African American men in search of work, there were also a significant number of African American women. Current research on issues relating to gender challenges our understanding of the migration narrative and provides us with more insight into the migratory experience of many southern African Americans. Women, like men, went north for economic opportunity, hoping to find jobs as domestics, department store clerks, and teachers. Yet because many of the opportunities were first offered to men, women were often last to leave the South. Also, as mothers and caretakers of the family, they often felt obliged to remain in the South until they had enough money to establish a new life in the North. Studies of boardinghouses, sororities, and personal diaries reveal that African American women created social networks connecting southern migrants to northerners, who helped facilitate their journey to and settlement in the North.

By taking their analyses in new directions, historians have been redefining our understanding of the great migration. As the new research indicates, to focus only on economic motivations would be to underestimate the social and cultural forces that influenced many African Americans' decision to move to the North. Settling in Chicago or New York was not only an economic matter but also a cultural and social matter. The Chicago Defender, a newspaper that circulated throughout the South, gave many African Americans their first glimpse of life in the North. Articles on the newly developing grassroots black community formed the bulk of the paper, but there were also articles on the cultural activities of the newly settled migrants; there were even reports on the black baseball team. Chicago certainly attracted a huge number of migrants to its emerging black community, and one can only imagine the incalculable effects that the blossoming world of music, art, poetry, and dance had on the many migrants who chose to come to New York City.

The influx of African Americans to New York as part of the great migration is a central component in the development of the Harlem Renaissance. For many migrants, Harlem represented the culmination of their artistic imagination, creative energy, and intellectuality; it was, therefore, a popular destination. In addition to its creativity and art, Harlem was for many migrants their new capital; they called it the "promised land" or the "mecca of the New Negro." In Harlem, there were black police officers, black doctors, a black basketball team, black millionaires, black intellectuals, and black political leaders. Artistic energy, combined with a new sense of pride and protest, contributed to a new identity that transformed rural southern migrants into the "New Negro." No longer would African Americans simply be perceived as sharecroppers and tenant farmers; the Harlem Renaissance, nourished by the great migration, radically altered their identity as citizens in the United States.

The dazzling artistic innovation in Harlem attracted southern migrants such as Zora Neale Hurston (who came from Florida) and Rudolph Fisher (who came from Washington, D.C.). Moreover, although the Harlem Renaissance certainly appealed widely to southern migrants, it was a unique destination in that it also transcended the traditional migratory pattern—south to north—and enticed people of African descent from all over the United States and the Caribbean. Billie Holiday came from Philadelphia; the poet Claude McKay and the political leader Marcus Garvey migrated from the West Indies. Their arrival in Harlem has not usually been considered part of the great migration, but it does reveal the migratory impulses that shaped and influenced the experiences of African Americans in the United States, and more specifically the Harlem Renaissance.

The new presence of African Americans in the North transformed the character of the United States. The migrants left their mark not only as laborers in northern factories and as domestics in other people's homes, but also—and indelibly—on cultural expression, such as Jacob Lawrence's painting Migration of the Negro, and a possible return hinted at in the lyrics of Gladys Knight and the Pips' "Midnight Train to Georgia." The great migration has perhaps not yet ended; it has just taken a different direction.

JAMES T. DOWNS JR.

See also Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Chicago Defender; Fisher, Rudolph; Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance; Hurston, Zora Neale; Lawrence, Jacob

Further Reading

- Adkins, LaTrese Evette. "Dangers Seen and Unseen: Black Women's Mobility, Community, and Work during the Migration Era, 1915–1940." M.A. thesis, Michigan State University, 1998.
- Garber, Eric. "A Spectacle of Color: The Lesbian and Gay Subculture of the Jazz Age in Harlem." In Hidden from History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, eds. Martin Duberman, Martha Vicinus, George Chauncy Jr., et al. New York: Penguin, 1989.
- Gottlieb, Peter. Making Their Own Way: Southern Blacks' Migration to Pittsburgh, 1916–1930. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Griffin, Farah Jasmine. Who Set You Flowin'? The African-American Migration Narrative. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Grossman, James R. Land of Hope: Chicago, Black Southerners, and the Great Migration. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Painter, Nell Irvin. Exodusters: Black Migration to Kansas after Reconstruction. New York: Knopf, 1977.
- Trotter, Joe, et al. The Great Migration in Historical Perspective: New Dimensions of Race, Class, and Gender. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991.

Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance

Following the Civil War and emancipation, southern blacks, mostly former slaves, forged new lives in the South. In the 1870s, however, race relations in the South began to deteriorate. By 1890 white voters had largely driven blacks from southern politics and had imposed a pervasive system of racial apartheid that reduced all African Americans in the South to servility. In the 1890s a prolonged agricultural crisis threatened the livelihood of all rural southerners, touching off a new wave of racial violence. Lynchings of blacks by white vigilantes became common and widespread throughout the rural South. The arrival of the boll weevil after 1900 undercut cotton production, the mainstay of southern agriculture, making life even more desperate for rural southern blacks. By 1910 tens of thousands of southern blacks, despairing of life in the South, left the region altogether, setting in motion the great migration. From 1917 to 1960 between three million and five million African Americans left the South for northern cities. Several hundred thousand of these rural southern migrants came to Harlem, most from the South Atlantic states of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, forming in New York the largest and most vibrant African American community in the nation. Before World War I, northern cities offered only marginal opportunities for African Americans. European immigrants and their children claimed most of the unskilled and semiskilled jobs in the nation's factories, and white labor unions systematically barred blacks from membership. In New York City most African Americans accepted low-paying, insecure menial work as cooks, porters, domestic servants, laundry workers, and day laborers. Only a few found well-paid employment on the railroads, in the post office and the civil service, and on the city's docks.

Northern working-class whites saw the growing tide of impoverished black migrants as a threat to their own precarious livelihood. White laborers treated blacks as racial inferiors who degraded their neighborhoods. Angry and afraid, in city after city, white mobs vented their frustrations on any and all nonwhites who crossed their path, setting off a wave of urban race riots as violent and destructive as the lynchings in the rural South. World War I momentarily moderated this violence and also offered unprecedented economic opportunity to southern blacks. The outbreak of war in 1914 cut off European immigration to the United States and created an enormous demand for American manufactured war material. The United States' entry into World War I in 1917 increased the demand for factory labor even as conscription forced millions of able-bodied males into military service, creating a labor shortage throughout the nation. Northern employers sent employment agents throughout the South, promising blacks good jobs in the North. By 1920 hundreds of thousands of southern blacks had come to northern cities.

The wartime migration of rural African Americans to cities changed American urban life. In the 1920s, for the first time, every American city contained significant numbers of African Americans. Before 1900, African Americans had been primarily a rural and southern people. In 1920 they had also become an urban and northern people. In most cities the arrival of thousands of poor black southerners destabilized residential patterns. With the end of unrestricted European immigration, African Americans became the fastest-growing ethnic group in the urban North. When black migrants pushed into new neighborhoods, working-class whites fought to contain them, often resorting to the southern whites' strategy of racial segregation, enforced by police and mob violence. New York escaped the worst of this violence. Harlem's isolation from the rest of the city provided African Americans with a safe haven.

By 1920 about 21 percent of Harlem's African Americans were native New Yorkers, about 20 percent came from the British West Indies, and 55 percent came from the South. Ninety percent of the 180,000 native-born blacks who lived in Harlem in 1920 came from the five-state south Atlantic region. Southerners came to Harlem primarily to find work. The remaining native-born Americans were largely native New Yorkers, largely educated and middle-class. Most formed households of a husband and wife, several children, a relative or two, and, frequently, a boarder from back home. Nearly all were either illiterate or semiliterate and settled for low-paying menial jobs. About half of the women worked, most in the needle trades, in laundries, or as domestic help. A few found employment in beauty shops, in restaurants, and in department stores as stock clerks, and according to welfare agencies, several thousand resorted to prostitution. Males often worked as janitors, day laborers, porters, and elevator operators. About 5 percent obtained middle-class employment as undertakers, ministers, teachers, doctors, lawyers, and shop owners; 5 percent worked as skilled craftsmen such as masons, carpenters, barbers, cabinetmakers, and plumbers; about 5 percent worked either for the railroads or as postal clerks; another 5 percent worked in factories or at the Brooklyn Naval Yard; and about 10 percent worked on the West Side and Brooklyn piers.

Not all of Harlem's black migrants came from the South. About 20 percent came from the West Indies. In the 1890s the Ward Steamship Line established regular runs between the West Indies and New York. By World War I Jamaicans formed one of the largest immigrant groups in New York and by far the city's largest nonwhite immigrant community. In 1930 nearly 100,000 Jamaicans lived in New York, most in Harlem between Central Park and 115th Street, east of Lenox Avenue. The Jamaicans who arrived in New York were nearly all literate, spoke British public school English, belonged to the Anglican church, and included large numbers of middle-class professionals and merchants. They also brought with them a highly developed political consciousness and extensive experience with democratic politics, providing Harlem with much of its political leadership.

Many first-generation southern migrants tried desperately to assimilate to northern white culture. The wealthiest individual in Harlem, Madame C. J. Walker, made her fortune by selling her hair-straightening formula to black southerners. She lived in a brownstone on West 136th Street in Harlem, elbow to elbow with Harlem's poor, but she also owned a palatial mansion on the Hudson River. Southern and West Indian migrants dreamed of becoming New Yorkers. The young, especially, dressed as New Yorkers, spoke urban slang, adopted new foods, applied bleaches to their skin, and patronized beauty and barber shops that promised to remake them into stylish urban people. The jazz clarinetist Garvin Bushell observed that in the 1920s most of the Negro population in New York either had been born there or had been there so long that they were fully acclimated:

They wanted you to forget the traditions of the South and were trying to emulate the whites . . . You weren't allowed to play blues and boogie woogie in the average Negro middle class home . . . You could only hear the blues and real jazz in the gutbucket cabarets where the lower class went. The term 'gutbucket' came from the chitterlings bucket. (1988, p. 19)

Still, African Americans retained important aspects of their southern and Jamaican identity: their cuisine, their music, important elements of style, their sense of racial identity, and most of all their religion. According to Bushell (20–21), "Gradually, the New York cabarets began to hear more of the real pure jazz and blues by musicians from Florida, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana and other parts of the South." Harlem and its music remained essentially African American; in the jargon of the era, "it swung." Bushell explained: "They called it 'shout' in those days, from the church when the Baptist minister would start preaching and the congregation would get all worked up emotionally. Negro church music had a great influence on jazz. They sang the blues in church; the words were religious, but it was the blues. They often had a drummer and a trumpet player there."

In the 1920s migration from Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina reached 400,000; in the 1930s it dropped to 230,000; in the 1940s it jumped to 477,000. In 1930 more than 75 percent of Harlem's African American migrants had come from the five south Atlantic states. One-quarter of Harlem's black residents were native New Yorkers, and 15 percent were British West Indians. In the depression years of the 1930s, southern migration to Harlem slowed, but beginning with World War II it accelerated again. The Census Bureau did not compile figures specifically for Harlem. For New York City as a whole, however, the bureau calculated that in the 1940s the African American population in the city increased by 300,000, and that it increased by another 300,000 in the 1950s. Almost all of the increase derived from migration from the South Atlantic states, from natural increase, or from Puerto Rico. After 1924 restrictions on immigration barred most people of African descent from entering the United States. After World War II, however, large numbers of African Americans from the American territory of Puerto Rico immigrated to Harlem. In 1910 New York City's African American population stood at about 2 percent. In 1960 it exceeded 15 percent.

At the close of the great migration in the late 1960s, Harlem had become a southern and Caribbean city. Most of its people spoke with southern or Caribbean accents, they prepared and ate traditional southern and Caribbean foods, their worship services conformed to southern and Caribbean conventions, and their nightclubs, dance halls, and theaters offered the same fare as African American communities in the South and Puerto Rico. At the same time, Harlem's residents had also adopted many northern ways. Most noticeably, they had become an urban people. They worked at city jobs, not as farmers; they lived among neighbors, not relatives; the clock, not the calendar, governed their lives; and they answered to themselves, not to their community. These changes occurred slowly, one person at a time, day by day.

The rapid rise in the number of Pentecostal and Holiness churches in Harlem after World War II, and the increasingly southern, sanctified features of its old-line Protestant and Catholic congregations, reflected this influence. Even Harlem's formal institutions of culture—the Schomburg Library, the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations (YMCA and YWCA), the Urban League, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Amsterdam News, and its socially prominent churches—increasingly defined their role in Harlem in the language of southern migrants' sanctified religion and music. But Harlem's migrants also carried back to their homelands Harlem's political militancy and city ways, sowing seeds of change in the South and in Puerto Rico. Appropriately, the legendary Harlem Globetrotters basketball team warmed up their worldwide audiences with down-home music: "Sweet Georgia Brown." By the 1970s Harlem and "Sweet Georgia Brown" had become interrelated pieces in a much larger, complex African American mosaic that came from the South, the Caribbean, and Africa itself—an artifact of the great migration.

PETER RUTKOFF
WILLIAM SCOTT

See also Anglophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance; Great Migration; Walker, Madame C. J.

Further Reading

- Bushell, Garvin, with Mark Tucker. Jazz from the Beginning. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1988.
- Devlin, George. South Carolina and Black Migration, 1860–1940. New York: Garland, 1989.
- Hawkins, Homer. "Trends in Black Migration from 1863–1960." Phylon, 34, 1973.
- New York Urban League. "Twenty-Four Hundred Negro Families in Harlem." 1927. (Unpublished manuscript, New York Urban League files.)
- Scott, Emmet. Negro Migration during the War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1920.
- Trotter, Joe William Jr. The Great Migration. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991.
- U.S. Census Bureau. United States Census, New York City. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1900, 1910, 1920, 1930.
- Watkins-Owens, Irma. Blood Relations: Caribbean Immigrants and the Harlem Community, 1900–1930. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

Green Pastures, The

As the framework for his play The Green Pastures (1929), which is a deliberately naive retelling of stories from the Old Testament, Marc Connelly depicts an elderly black Sunday school teacher explaining the mysteries of the Bible to a group of curious, fidgety black children in the deep South during the Depression. The play stresses the analogy between the children of Israel in the Old Testament and blacks in the rural South: God, the angels, and the biblical characters resemble the sort of adult figures that the children would recognize. As Connelly explained in the preface to the printed version of the play, "The Green Pastures is an attempt to present certain aspects of a living religion in the terms of its believers." For some readers now, as for the original audience, the sincerity, affection, and good humor of this play make it consistently enjoyable; for its critics, it is sentimental, condescending, and racist. The Green Pastures opened on Broadway in February 1930, had a six-year run, and won a Pulitzer Prize for its author. But a revival in 1951 failed, partly because of the shift in racial attitudes after World War II.

The first act consists of a series of dramatizations of familiar scenes from the Old Testament, with poor southern blacks taking on the roles of God and the biblical characters. The stage directions explain that the angels “look and act like a company of happy negroes at a fish fry.” God, known throughout the play as “De Lawd,” has a taste for boiled custard and “ten-cent seegars.” The first act moves from the creation and Adam to Noah and the flood; the second act jumps briskly from the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to Moses and Exodus and a newly invented character, “Hezdrel,” who is about to be killed defending the Temple in Jerusalem from Herod’s attack. At the play’s conclusion, the angels comment sympathetically on the plight of an unseen Jesus, who is being sent off to his crucifixion.

The popularity of The Green Pastures among white audiences during the Depression is understandable. As in the American melodramatic tradition, the poor and humble are shown as keeping their dignity (Richards 1997), and sympathy for others is displayed in highly emotional situations (Mason 1993). Connelly, who had earned his reputation as the coauthor with George S. Kaufman of several successful Broadway comedies, provided his characters with charm and earthy good sense. The view of Miller and Frazer (1991) that the play’s “sincerely religious atmosphere” actually “overcomes the condescending view of ignorant folk” is open to question, as is the suggestion of Berkowitz (1992) that the play’s charm, humor, and emotional power cover the implicit racism. Craig (1980) cites a contemporary viewer who dismissed the play’s “inauthentic black folklore” and complained that it treated blacks as stereotypical figures.

A modern reading of the play reveals certain paradoxes. The structure of the play is loose and episodic, but anyone raised on these stories will find Connelly’s retelling fresh and amusing, with no knee-jerk piety. (God wearily admits to one of the archangels that “Even bein’ Gawd ain’t a bed of roses.”) To counter the charge of sentimentality, the play can be shown to contain a deeply pessimistic streak. God lives up to his Old Testament reputation of being bad-tempered and aloof. Outraged at human misbehavior but neglectful of injustice, De Lawd withdraws out of unhappiness with his own creation: “I repent of dese people dat I have made and I will deliver dem no more.”

That the play adopts the racist attitudes of its time is undeniable. As in the “jungle” numbers that were featured in Duke Ellington’s programs at the Cotton Club in Harlem, the talented African American performers in the first production were asked to present a false impression of black life. The supposed dialect of poor blacks in Louisiana owes more to racist stage tradition than to observation of actual speech. (Audiences continue to forgive George Gershwin’s opera Porgy and Bess for using such unrealistic speech, but not The Green Pastures.) It also seems undeniable, though, that the play is sympathetic to the plight of impoverished blacks in the deep south during the Depression. Certain figures are deeply sympathetic, such as Adam, Hosea, and Hezdrel.

By making all the villains—such as Pharaoh and “Cain the Sixth”—black, as well as the other characters, the play forgoes the opportunity to put the blame for black people’s suffering outside the local black community. But as a measure of its dramatic sophistication, the play’s most admirable character is also shown to be its most defective. “De Lawd,” like the other characters, needs to learn the lesson of mercy as a reward for suffering, and in the course of the play, he learns to abandon wrath in favor of compassion. As the theologian Karen Armstrong explains in her study of Genesis (1996), the Old Testament God “is omnipotent but powerless to control humanity.” De Lawd has to come to terms with his own neglect of his creation. In the climactic scene, De Lawd is impressed by the steadfast faith of Hezdrel, who explains that he worships the God of Hosea the prophet, not the wrathful God of Moses. Pleased, but not a little discomforted by Hezdrel's earnest faith, De Lawd tells Hezdrel, "If dey kill you tomorrow I'll bet dat God of Hosea'll be waitin' for you." In the short final scene, De Lawd tells the archangel Gabriel that people on earth have earned mercy through suffering. "Did he mean dat even God must suffer?" he asks himself about his encounter with Hezdrel.

Scene from The Green Pastures showing Moses and Aaron before Pharaoh. (Photofest.)

Marc Connelly. (Library of Congress.)

Like the stage versions of Uncle Tom's Cabin in the 1850s, The Green Pastures showed sympathy for the struggles of the African Americans depicted onstage (Richards 371). Although it is probably not performable today because of its racial stereotyping, The Green Pastures shows energy, wit, irreverence, and a willingness to ask difficult questions.

BYRON NELSON

See also Cotton Club; Porgy and Bess

Further Reading

- Armstrong, Karen. In the Beginning: A New Interpretation of Genesis. New York: Knopf, 1996.
- Berkowitz, Gerald M. American Drama of the Twentieth Century. London and New York: Longman, 1992.
- Connelly, Marc. The Green Pastures. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1929.
- Craig, E. Quita. Black Drama of the Federal Theatre Era. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1980.

Mason, Jeffrey D. Melodrama and the Myth of America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.

Miller, Jordan Y., and Winifred Frazer. American Drama between the Wars: A Critical History. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1991.

Richards, Jeffrey, ed. Early American Drama. New York: Penguin, 1997.

Green, Paul

Paul Green's black and white folk literature—written throughout 1919–1937, the years of the Harlem Renaissance—secured his place as a white writer who depicted black life in America. Green was the son of a southern white farmer and from childhood was aware of the ills that beset blacks; he used literature to express his ardent belief in freedom and equality for all. Green wrote controversial one-act plays focusing on southerners to illuminate harsh race relations. His inclusion of black themes and his presentation of black life offered a greater understanding of black culture. In literature earlier in the century, black characters were commonly portrayed as villains or relegated to the background; Green, by contrast, introduced blacks as humans who were as true to life as possible.

Although Green aroused much opposition and resentment, this reaction did not prevent him from attempting to fully represent the lives of people cast off by mainstream society, and he addressed humanitarian issues and social problems. Green did not write solely about blacks; he included in his works the people he knew most about, typically white tenant farmers, convicts, mill workers, field laborers, teachers, and poor blacks and whites. Common themes in his work include the social aspirations and fate of blacks, love between blacks and whites, malice and discrimination inflicted by whites, issues relating to mulattoes, freedom and equality, and religious conflicts. Green integrated vernacular speech, poetry, pantomime, and various forms of music into his literature.

Green's White Dresses, his first characteristic play centered on blacks, is the tragic story of a mulatto woman living in a black environment. It was produced in White Plains, New York, in 1923. In 1927 Green received a Pulitzer Prize for his play In Abraham's Bosom, a tragedy about a black educator who attempts to establish a school for blacks in North Carolina. In Abraham's Bosom was produced in New York by the Provincetown Players and staged by Jasper Deeter in 1926. Later in his career, Green became known for his symphonic dramas, plays that incorporated music for dramatic effect. His symphonic history plays took up events in American history and culture—for example, events involving the founding fathers. The four most popular of these plays were The Lost Colony (1937), celebrating the first British settlement in America, Raleigh's colony at Roanoke Island; The Highland Call (1941), about the Scottish settlement in North Carolina; The Common Glory (1948), about Jefferson's role as well as the state of Virginia throughout the American Revolution; and Faith of Our Fathers (1950), about George Washington. In 1941 Green worked with Richard Wright on an adaptation of Wright's Native Son for Broadway.

Green is largely unrecognized today, but he was a prominent figure throughout the Harlem Renaissance. His efforts to introduce blacks into realistic modern literature and theater helped pave the way for black actors. He also expressed progressive ideals and a sense of cultural pride during what was a delicate time for blacks.

Biography

Paul Eliot Green was born on 17 March 1894, in Lillington, North Carolina. He was educated at Buie's Creek Academy in North Carolina, graduating in 1914, and at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill (1921); he did graduate study in 1921–1922 and had a Kenan Philosophy Fellowship to study philosophy at Cornell University in 1922–1923. He was a school principal in Olive Branch, North Carolina, in 1914–1917; served in the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in 1917–1919; was an instructor and then an assistant professor of philosophy at Chapel Hill in 1923–1936, and later taught in the department of dramatic arts in 1936–1944; was editor of the Reviewer magazine, Chapel Hill, in 1925; was a contributing editor at Contempo magazine in 1931–1932; and wrote for Fox, Warner Brothers, and others in Hollywood in 1932–1936. He married Elizabeth Atkinson Lay in 1922. Five one-act plays by Green were produced by the Carolina Playmakers in Chapel Hill in 1920. His characteristic Negro play White Dresses was produced in 1923. He completed his first music drama, Potter's Field: A Symphonic Play of the Negro People, in 1931; and two novels, The Laughing Pioneer and This Body the Earth, in 1932 and 1936, respectively. His symphonic plays include The Lost Colony (the most popular, first produced at Roanoke Island in 1937), The Highland Call (1939), The Common Glory (1947), and Faith of Our Fathers (1950). He worked with Richard Wright on an adaptation of Native Son for Broadway in 1941. Green was president of the National Theatre Conference (1940–1942) and a member of the National Institute on Arts and Letters (1941), the U.S. Executive Committee, and the National Commission, UNESCO (1950–1952); he participated in the International Conference for the Performing Arts in Athens (1962). His awards included the New York City Belasco Cup for a one-act play, The No 'Count Boy (1925); a Pulitzer Prize for Abraham's Bosom (1927); and a Guggenheim fellowship (1928, 1929). Green died on 4 May 1981, at his home in Chapel Hill. The Paul Green Foundation was formed in 1982.

LISA A. CZERNIECKI

See also Contempo; Provincetown Players; Wright, Richard

Selected Works

The Lord's Will and Other Carolina Plays. New York: Holt, 1925.

Contemporary American Literature: A Study of Fourteen Outstanding American Writers. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1925.

Lonesome Road: Six Plays for the Negro Theatre. New York: McBride, 1926.

Wide Fields. New York: McBride, 1928.

The House of Connelly and Other Plays. New York: French, 1931.

Shroud My Body Down. Iowa City, Iowa: Clio, 1935.

The Lost Colony. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1937.

Out of the South: The Life of a People in Dramatic Form. New York: Harper, 1939.

Native Son. (With Richard Wright, adaptation.) New York: Harper, 1941.

The Highland Call: A Symphonic Play of American History. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1941.

The Common Glory: A Symphonic Drama of American History. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1948.

Five Plays of the South. New York: Hill and Wang, 1963.

Further Reading

Adams, Agatha Boyd. Paul Green of Chapel Hill. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1951.

Clark, Barrett Harper. Paul Green. New York: McBride, 1928.

Green, Paul. Paul Green's Wordbook: An Alphabet of Reminiscence, ed. Rhoda H. Wynn. Chapel Hill: Appalachian Consortium, 1990.

———. A Paul Green Reader, ed. Laurence G. Avery. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.

Kenny, Vincent S. Paul Green. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Greene, Lorenzo

Lorenzo Johnston Greene, an early promoter of black history, wrote the first scholarly history of blacks in colonial New England.

Greene entered Howard University to study medicine but became interested in history after taking courses with two notable African American historians: Walter Dyson, a Europeanist; and William Leo Hansberry, a pioneer in the study of African civilizations. Greene decided to pursue graduate training in history; and when he was initially rebuffed by Yale because he had taken so few history courses at Howard, he was encouraged to enter Columbia University to take additional courses. There, he met the Americanist Dixon Ryan Fox and developed an interest in the black colonial experience in the United States. Greene completed his M.A. in 1926, but in 1928 he encountered financial difficulties that interrupted his doctoral studies at Columbia. For assistance, he turned to a fellow alumnus of Howard, Charles Wesley, who had received a Ph.D. from Harvard and was an investigator for the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History (ASNLH). Wesley persuaded Carter G. Woodson, the founder of ASNLH, to retain Greene to assist in a national survey of the black church, and Woodson hired Greene as a part-time associate and field investigator. In this capacity, Greene assisted in the production of several seminal studies of the black experience.

Much of what we know about Greene's involvement with ASNLH during the Harlem Renaissance comes from a diary he kept between 1928 and 1930. Greene's entries were meticulous and provide valuable personal and professional insights into the organization's early years. In addition to recounting his work with the national church survey, Greene also detailed his contributions to several publications of ASNLH, including African Myths, The Negro in Our History, and The Negro Wage Earner. The diaries also give us a glimpse of the inner workings of ASNLH. Greene noted his interactions with other investigators for ASNLH, such as Charles Wesley and Alrutheus Ambush Taylor. He described the quality of their scholarship as well as stories Woodson related to him. Most important, he revealed how exacting Woodson was with regard to the publication of scholarly work. Woodson often made Greene correct or proofread a work several times before accepting it. In the case of the national church survey, Woodson's criticism of the original draft led to the abandonment of the project, and Greene was reassigned to a project that culminated in the production of The Negro Wage Earner. Greene described the tabulation and interpretation of statistics that went into this work, as well as research at the Library of Congress and other institutions. He also described the national convention of ASNLH in 1928 and 1929, as well as Woodson's work with Negro History Week, instituted in 1926.

In addition to exposing the inner workings of ASNLH, Greene, in his second diary, covering 1930–1933, described his own role in promoting ASNLH and its work. He and four other men left Washington, D.C., in 1930 to sell books issued by Associated Publishers. This trip, which encompassed much of the upper and lower South as well as Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, Missouri, and Illinois, demonstrates the length to which the organization went to promote its work. Greene's diary also reveals much about the respect and admiration that Woodson's work stimulated in black communities throughout the United States. On several occasions, the mere mention of Woodson's name was enough to secure lodging, food, and assistance with transportation.

Although Greene is not as well known as many of his contemporaries, his contributions to the growth of African American history as a historical specialty are immeasurable. His early editorial work, his fundraising, and his scholarship helped define the mission of ASNLH in the first half of the twentieth century.

Biography

Lorenzo Johnston Greene was born on 16 November 1899, in Ansonia, Connecticut. He was educated in public schools; at Howard University in Washington, D.C. (A.B., 1924); and at Columbia University in New York City (A.M., 1926; Ph.D., 1942). Greene was a part-time research associate and field investigator for the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History (1928–1933); taught history at Lincoln University in Jefferson City, Missouri (1933–1972); and was an editor of Midwest Journal (1947–1956). He was chairman of the Subcommittee on Education, Missouri Advisory Committee to U.S. Commission on Civil Rights (1959–1961); president of the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History (1965–1966); director of the Institute for Drop-Out Prevention and Teacher Orientation, Jefferson City, Missouri; and director of the Institute to Facilitate Desegregation in Kansas City Public Schools, Missouri (1972–1974). Greene died in Jefferson City on 24 January 1988.

STEPHEN G. HALL

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History; Black History and Historiography; Woodson, Carter G.

Selected Works

The Negro Wage Earner. 1930.

The Negro in Colonial New England, 1620–1776. 1942.

Missouri's Black Heritage. 1980. (As editor.)

Further Reading

Selling Black History for Carter G. Woodson: A Diary, 1930–1933, ed. Avrah Strickland. 1996.

Working with Carter G. Woodson, the Father of Black History: A Diary, 1928–1930, ed. Avrah Strickland. 1989.

Greenwich Village

Renowned for its rich and diverse literary, intellectual, and artistic heritage, Greenwich Village—often called simply the Village—is an old residential neighborhood located in the lower section of downtown Manhattan that is bounded by First Street, Fourteenth Street, Houston Street, Broadway, and the Hudson River waterfront.

During the early nineteenth century, new institutions arose in Greenwich Village to serve the spiritual, educational, and cultural needs of the growing community. Religious denominations commissioned elaborately decorated buildings; New York University grew on the east side of Washington Square from 1836 on; and the neighborhood soon became the site of art clubs, private picture galleries, learned societies, literary salons, and libraries. Fine hotels, shops, and theaters also flourished. However, the character of the neighborhood changed markedly at the close of the century, when German, Irish, and Italian immigrants found work in the breweries, warehouses, and coal and lumber yards near the Hudson River as well as in the manufacturing lofts in the Southeast corner of the neighborhood. Older residences were either subdivided into cheap lodging hotels and multiple-family apartment houses or demolished to build tenements. Plummeting real estate values prompted nervous retailers and genteel property owners to move farther uptown.

At the turn of the twentieth century, Greenwich Village—much like Harlem—was a quaintly picturesque and ethnically diverse neighborhood. By the time World War I began, it was widely known as a bohemian enclave with secluded side streets, low rents, and a tolerance for radical political views and nonconformist lifestyles. Attention became increasingly focused on artists and writers noted for their boldly innovative work: books and irreverent “little magazines” were published by small presses, art galleries exhibited the work of the avant-garde, and experimental theater companies ignored the financial considerations of Broadway. A growing awareness of its idiosyncrasies helped make the Village an attraction for tourists. Entrepreneurs provided amusements ranging from evenings in artists’ studios to bacchanalian costume balls. During Prohibition, local speakeasies attracted patrons from uptown. Decrepit rowhouses were remodeled into “artistic flats” for the more affluent residents, and luxury apartment towers appeared at the Northernmost edge of Washington Square by 1926—although the stock market crash of 1929 halted the momentum of new construction in this area of the city. During the 1930s, galleries and collectors promoted contemporary art. The sculptor Gertrude Whitney Vanderbilt opened a museum dedicated to modern American art on West Eighth Street, now the New York Studio School. The New School for Social Research, on West Twelfth Street since the late 1920s, inaugurated the “university in exile” in 1934.

From 1920 until about 1930, an unprecedented outburst of creative activity among African Americans occurred in all manner of artistic endeavors. Beginning as a series of literary discussions in lower Manhattan (Greenwich Village) and upper Manhattan (Harlem), this African American cultural movement became known as the “New Negro movement” and later as the Harlem Renaissance. African Americans were encouraged to celebrate their heritage and to become the “New Negro,” a term coined in 1925 by the sociologist and critic Alain Locke. This movement was more than a literary phenomenon and more than a social revolt against racism. Adventurous participants in the Greenwich Village scene, most notably Carl Van Vechten, were very excited by the Harlem Renaissance. Also, many artists and writers in Greenwich Village found great inspiration in the formative years of the Harlem Renaissance because it exalted the unique cultural expression and racial heritage of African Americans and magnificently redefined African American expression.

JUAN FLOYD-THOMAS

See also Black Bohemia; Locke, Alain; New Negro Movement; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Beard, Rick, with Leslie Cohen Berlowitz. Greenwich Village: Culture and Counterculture. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Bender, Thomas. New York Intellect. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988.
- Binder, Frederick M., and David M. Reimers. All the Nations under Heaven: An Ethnic and Racial History of New York City. New York: Columbia University Press, 1995.
- Harris, M. A. A Negro History Tour of Manhattan. New York: Greenwood, 1968.
- Jackson, Kenneth T., ed. The Encyclopedia of New York City. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995, pp. 506–509.
- Katz, William L. Black Legacy: A History of New York's African Americans. New York: Atheneum, 1997.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Ottley, Roi, and William Weatherby, eds. The Negro in New York. New York: New York Public Library Press, 1967.
- Stansell, Christine. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Metropolitan, 2000.
- Ware, Caroline F. Greenwich Village, 1920–1930: A Comment on American Civilization in the Post-War Years. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1994.
- Watson, Sherrill D. New York City's African Slaveowners. New York: Garland, 1994.
- Wetzsteon, Ross. Republic of Dreams, Greenwich Village: The American Bohemia, 1915–1950. New York: Simon and Schuster, 2002.

Wilder, Craig Steven. In the Company of Black Men: The African Influence on African American Culture in New York City. New York: New York University Press, 2001.

Griggs, Sutton E.

The novelist, essayist, and minister Sutton Elbert Griggs (1872–1930) is important in the African American literary tradition as one of the earliest voices of black nationalism; he was also one of the earliest African American writers to establish a publishing company, Orion, in Nashville, Tennessee. He distributed his own thirty-three books primarily through Orion; and because they were distributed throughout the African American community, he probably had a larger African American readership than his contemporaries Charles Chesnutt and Paul Laurence Dunbar. Among Griggs's published works were five novels: Imperium in Imperio (1899), Overshadowed (1901), Unfettered (1902), The Hindered Hand (1905), and Pointing the Way (1908). Little is known about Griggs's personal life, but his professional achievements indicate his lifelong commitment to racial justice, racial solidarity, and self-determination.

His first novel, Imperium in Imperio, because of its radical nature and its emphasis on ideology, is especially pertinent to studies of the Harlem Renaissance. This protonationalist text advocates a violent overthrow of the U.S. government through the efforts of an underground black political organization, the Imperium. Bell (1987) describes this work as “one of the most thematically radical Afro-American novels of the nineteenth century” (61). Although it was published twenty-six years before Survey Graphic helped publicize the inception of the Harlem Renaissance, Imperium in Imperio prefigures ideological issues that were of extreme importance to artists of the renaissance era. The text is immediately concerned with the utilitarian purpose of early African American literature, the state of African American leadership, and the emergence of a new, militant concept of black masculinity. The novel is both sensationalist and didactic, and it anticipates the tension between aesthetics and ideology in many renaissance texts. The fantastic plot turns indicate that Griggs wanted to entertain his readers, but his primary aim is to impel them to pursue racial justice. Griggs's two protagonists, Bernard Belgrave and Belton Piedmont, are loosely modeled on W. E. B. Du Bois and Booker T. Washington, respectively—representing the divergent methods of African American leaders.

The conflicted relationship that develops between them is a metaphor for the complexities of attempting to unite African Americans from diverse backgrounds under a single model of leadership. Perhaps most significantly, Griggs uses the “New Negro” to symbolize the growing militancy of African Americans at the turn of the twentieth century, prefiguring the association of this term with the literature of the Harlem Renaissance.

Griggs’s other four novels all center on the related issues of African American uplift and equality. His second novel, Overshadowed, focuses on the conflicted nature of the emergent black middle class. Griggs’s growing interest in international politics and the black diaspora is at work in Unfettered and The Hindered Hand; in both novels, Griggs focuses on the timely issues of imperialism and African Americans’ complicated relationship to the African past. By the time his last novel, Pointing the Way, was published, Griggs had begun to temper his radical ideology with the rhetoric of interracial cooperation. Accordingly, during World War I he spoke in the African American community in support of Liberty Bonds.

After publishing his final novel, Griggs devoted his attention to the ministry. He was secretary of the Education Department of the National Baptist Convention in Nashville, Tennessee, and in 1920 he became pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church in Memphis. The pastorate gave Griggs another venue for his interest in interracial cooperation; he remained active in the ministry and was president of the American Baptist Theological Seminary from October 1925 to January 1926. He then moved to Houston, Texas, to establish the National Religious and Civic Institute.

MICHELLE TAYLOR

See also Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Survey Graphic

Biography

Sutton Elbert Griggs was born on 19 June 1872, in Chatfield, Texas. He studied at public schools in Dallas, Texas; at Bishop College, Marshall, Texas; and at Richmond Theological Seminary, Richmond, Virginia. He was the founder of Orion Publishing Company, Nashville, Tennessee; president of the American Baptist Theological Seminary; and pastor of Tabernacle Baptist Church, Memphis, Tennessee. Griggs died in Houston, Texas, on 3 January 1933.

Selected Works

- Imperium in Imperio*. 1899.
Overshadowed. 1901.
Unfettered. 1902.
The Hindered Hand: or, The Reign of the Repressionist. 1905.
The One Great Question. 1907.
Pointing the Way. 1908.
Needs of the South. 1909.
The Race Question in a New Light. 1909. (Enlarged as Wisdom’s Call, 1911.)
The Story of My Struggle. 1914.
How to Rise. 1915.
Life’s Demands; or, According to the Law. 1916.
The Reconstruction of a Race. 1917.
Light on Racial Issues. 1921.
Guide to Racial Greatness; or, The Science of Collective Efficiency. 1923.
The Negro’s Next Step. 1923.
Kingdom’s Builders’ Manual: Companion Book to Guide to Racial Greatness. 1924.
Paths of Progress; or, Cooperation between the Races. 1925.
Triumph of the Simple Virtues; or, the Life Story of John L. Webb. 1926.
The Winning Policy. 1927.

Further Reading

- Bell, Bernard. The Afro-American Novel and Its Tradition. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1987.
 Elder, Arlene. The “Hindered Hand”: Cultural Implications of Early African American Fiction. 1978.
 Kinney, James. Amalgamation: Race, Sex, and Rhetoric in the Nineteenth-Century American Novel. 1985.
 Moses, William. The Golden Age of Black Nationalism, 1850–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
 Thompson, Betty Taylor. “Sutton Griggs.” In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 50, African American Writers before the Harlem Renaissance, eds. Trudier Harris and Tahdious Davis. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Group, 1986.
 Tracy, Steven. “Saving the Day: The Recordings of the Reverend Sutton E. Griggs.” Phylon, 47(2), 1986.

Grimké, Angelina Weld

Angelina Weld Grimké is important to the Harlem Renaissance both as a writer and as a member of an influential, aristocratic Bostonian family. Because she did not produce much work after the mid-1920s, she is often overlooked in present-day critical analysis; however, her drama Rachel (1920) is significant as one of the first uses of the stage to directly confront the evil of lynching, and her poetry is significant for its artistry and its themes, including the sometimes repressed expression of lesbian desire.

Grimké was born in Boston in 1880; she was the only daughter of Archibald Henry and Sarah Stanley Grimké, who separated some time in her early childhood, around 1883. Archibald Grimké was the nephew of the famous abolitionist sisters Sarah Moore Grimké and Angelina Grimké Weld; he was an escaped slave and found these aunts after traveling north toward freedom and education. Scholars speculate that Sarah Stanley's prominent white family was against her interracial marriage and that this opposition might have contributed to the separation. After a brief time with her mother, Angelina Weld Grimké returned to her father, a lawyer who was prominent in Boston's elite black community, and never again saw her mother, who died in 1898.

Grimké was exposed to political activism at a young age, in her family circle. She was very much attached to her father and remained so throughout his life. A writer from early childhood, she composed poems dedicated to her family, including her aunt, Charlotte Forten Grimké; and when she was only thirteen years old, her "Tribute to Theodore Weld—On His Ninetieth Birthday" appeared in a local newspaper. After grammar school, she attended several elite academies before graduating in 1902. She started a teaching career at the Armstrong Manual Training School in Washington, D.C., but was unhappy teaching in her major field, physical education. She took classes in English at Harvard during the summers of 1904–1910, switched to teaching English, and in 1907 transferred to the M Street School, where she taught English until she retired in 1933. This school, which became Dunbar High School in 1916, was well known for its academic and artistic training of young black students; Grimké wrote a poem dedicated to it: "To the Dunbar High School," which was published in Crisis in 1917.

Grimké was older than many of the most significant writers of the Harlem Renaissance and is distinct in that she lived outside Harlem for most of her life and in that she was already established as a poet before the dates which are generally accepted as the flowering of the renaissance. She was embraced by the renaissance literary community as a poet whose work had gained attention in local black journals, and her recognition escalated during the Harlem Renaissance: her work appeared in journals such as Crisis and Opportunity and in anthologies published during and after the renaissance, including Negro Poets and Their Poems (1923), The New Negro (1925), Caroling Dusk (1927), and Negro Caravan (1941). Perhaps because of her early success publishing poems in journals—according to Hull (1979, 1987), her elegy "El Beso" was called "as perfect as an antique gem in its genre"—Grimké had high hopes for her dramatic writing, most of which remains unpublished. The exception is her play Rachel, which is significant not only because of its poignant treatment of lynching but also because it was considered at the time to be the first use of the stage to directly confront racism. Grimké is perhaps best known for this play, which was sponsored by the drama committee of the local National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and was first performed on 3–4 March 1916. Even for its time the play was controversial; some critics held that Rachel's response, on learning that her absent father has been lynched, is exaggerated. Rachel—expressing Grimké's own position—vows never to have children of her own and breaks off her romantic relationship. Despite its dark tone, after its publication in book form in 1920, Rachel received many positive reviews and came to be seen as a tragic portrayal of the horror of lynching. In more recent times, the play's characters have seemed overly romanticized, although Rachel is still recognized as a historically significant work. Today's audiences tend to dislike the depressing plot and the conclusion—the play ends with a dark stage and a weeping child.

Besides Rachel and some nonfiction pieces, including a loving tribute to her father published in Opportunity in 1925, Grimké continues to be known for her beautiful, muted lyric poetry. She specialized in imagistic presentations of the natural world to present a mood or theme; and although some of her poetry—such as "Tenebris" and "Beware Lest He Awakes"—addresses racial themes, most of it is about love. Hull (1979, 1987) speculates that the hushed tones and muted colors of Grimké's love poetry, as in "A Mona Lisa" and "When the Green Lies Over the Earth," are a consequence of repressed lesbianism. Many of Grimké's unpublished or recently published works contain explicit references to female lovers and broken romances with women. This repression of her homosexuality appears to have been encouraged by her father, and critics consider the silencing of Grimké's erotic life to have been an influence on the silencing of her artistic life.

Shortly after her father's death in 1930, Grimké retired from teaching and moved to New York City. Her letters indicate that she hoped to return to writing, but she never published again, although she did continue to be a public representative of the Grimké family. Letters indicate also that she became reclusive and somewhat asocial, distrusting even close friends. She died in 1958 after a long illness.

Biography

Angelina Weld Grimké was born on 27 February 1880, in Boston, Massachusetts. She attended public grammar schools in Boston and Hyde Park, Massachusetts, 1887–1994; and several private secondary schools, including Fairmount School in Boston, Carleton Academy in Northfield (Minnesota), Cushing Academy in Ashburnham (Massachusetts), and Girls' Latin School in Boston. She received a degree in physical education from Boston Normal School of Gymnastics in 1902; took summer courses in English at Harvard University, 1904–1910; taught physical education and later English in Washington, D.C., at Armstrong Manual Training School, 1902–1907; and taught English at the M Street High School (renamed Dunbar High School in 1916) from 1907 until her retirement in 1933. She died in New York City on 10 June 1958.

SHARON BARNES

See also Crisis, The; Opportunity; Rachel

Selected Works

- "To Keep the Memory of Charlotte Forten Grimké." Crisis, 9, January 1915, p. 134.
- "To the Dunbar High School." Crisis, 13, March 1917, p. 222.
- "The Closing Door." Birth Control Review, 3, September 1919.
- Rachel: A Play in Three Acts*. 1920.
- "The Black Finger." Opportunity, 1, September 1923, p. 343. (Also in The New Negro: An Interpretation, ed. Alain Locke. 1925.)
- "Little Grey Dreams." Opportunity, 2, January 1924, p. 20.
- "Dusk." Opportunity, 2, April 1924, p. 99.
- "I Weep." Opportunity, 2, July 1924, p. 196.

- "A Biographical Sketch of Archibald H. Grimké." Opportunity, 3, February 1925, pp. 44–47.
- "Death." Opportunity, 3, March 1925, p. 68.
- Caroling Dusk*, ed. Countee Cullen. 1927.
- Readings from Negro Authors*, eds. Otelia Cromwell, Lorenzo Dow Turner, and Eva B. Dykes. 1931.
- Negro Poets and Their Poems*, rev. enlarged ed., ed. Robert T. Kerlin. 1935.
- Negro Caravan*, eds. Sterling Brown, Arthur P. Davis, and Ulysses Lee. 1941.
- Poetry of the Negro, 1746–1949*, eds. Langston Hughes and Arna Bontemps. 1949.
- Black Writers of America: A Comprehensive Anthology*, eds. Richard K. Barksdale and Keneth Kinnamon. 1972.
- Poetry of Black America: Anthology of the Twentieth Century*, ed. Arnold Adoff. 1973.
- New Negro Renaissance: An Anthology*, eds. Michael W. Peplow and Arthur P. Davis. 1975.
- Black Sister: Poetry by Black American Women, 1746–1980*, ed. Erlene Stetson. 1981.
- Afro-American Women Writers, 1746–1933*, ed. Ann Allen Shockley. 1988.
- Selected Works of Angelina Weld Grimké*, ed. Carolivia Herron. 1991.
- The Sleeper Wakes: Harlem Renaissance Stories by Women*, ed. Marcy Knopf. 1993.

Further Reading

- Bradley, Gerald. "Goodbye, Mister Bones." Drama Critique, 7, Spring 1964, pp. 83–84.
- Greene, Michael. "Angelina Weld Grimké." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 50, Afro-American Writers before the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Group, 1986.
- Herron, Carolivia, ed. and intro. Selected Works of Angelina Weld Grimké. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Hull, Gloria T. "Under the Days: The Buried Life and Poetry of Angelina Weld Grimké." Conditions: Five, Black Women's Issue, 1979, pp. 17–25.
- . Hull, Gloria T. Color, Sex, and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- McKinney, Ernest R. "Rachel: A Play by Angelina W. Grimké." Competitor, 1, 1920, pp. 51–52.
- Miller, Jeanne-Marie A. "Angelina Weld Grimké." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 54, American Poets, 1880–1945, Third Series, ed. Peter Quatermain. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Group, 1987.

Mollette. "They Speak: Who Listens? Black Women Playwrights." Black World, 25, April 1976, pp. 28–34.

Roses, Lorraine Elena, and Ruth Elizabeth Randolph. Harlem Renaissance and Beyond: Literary Biographies of 100 Black Women Writers, 1900–1945. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Shockley, Ann Allen. Afro-American Women Writers, 1746–1933. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1988.

Gruenberg, Louis

The composer Louis Gruenberg, a European-American Jew of prodigious talent, training, and output, is rarely thought of as being part of the Harlem Renaissance. Whether by intent or coincidence, though, Gruenberg's use of jazz and Negro spirituals in his concert music paralleled the hot debates about such use among Harlem Renaissance intellectuals. Furthermore, his most famous work, the controversial opera The Emperor Jones, was based on Eugene O'Neill's 1920 play, which had starred the iconic African American performer Paul Robeson.

One of a now-forgotten generation of American "modernist" composers, Gruenberg was a pioneer in his efforts to energize American music through an infusion of rhythms and melodies derived from folk and popular musics of American blacks, whites and "Indians." He believed that a vibrant nationalistic style would result from the inclusion of these "primitive" elements, provided that they were handled with skill and sophistication. He expounded his theories in prominent interwar music journals such as Modern Music. He also wrote a good deal of music to prove his point.

Gruenberg was not alone in his attraction to "high-brow jazz." George Gershwin, John Alden Carpenter, Aaron Copeland, and William Grant Still among American composers and Igor Stravinsky, Kurt Weill, Paul Hindemith, Darius Milhaud, and Ernst Krenek among the Europeans were enchanted by the uses of jazz in concert music.

Beginning in 1923, Gruenberg wrote music in the "American idiom" for a wide range of instrumental and vocal forces. His setting of "jazz poet" Vachel Lindsay's poem Daniel Jazz, which spoofs the biblical tale of Daniel in the lion's den, was a critical success at its 1925 premier in Venice. The Creation: a Negro Sermon tells the familiar Bible story in a colloquial way using a male narrator and eight instrumentalists. Its text, by James Weldon Johnson, was published a year later, in 1927, part of God's Trombones—Seven Negro Sermons in Verse. The Gruenberg—Johnson collaboration created a bold and theatrical impact and launched the career of the hitherto unknown African American baritone, Jules Bledsoe.

The pinnacle of Gruenberg's popular success was the opera The Emperor Jones, based on Eugene O'Neill's play of a decade earlier. Gruenberg wrote his own libretto with the blessing of O'Neill. Although scheduled to be premiered in Berlin in 1932, it was deemed neither the time nor the place for an opera by a Jew about a black man. Instead, the 77-minute "monodrama" had its premier on 7 January 1933, on a double bill with Pagliacci at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, where The Emperor Jones had the longest continuous run of any opera in the Met's history. The white baritone, superstar Lawrence Tibbett, was the protagonist, Brutus Jones, in blackface. Despite that throwback to an American theatrical tradition despised by African Americans, the production did provide jobs, perhaps for the first time, to African American singers. Critical reaction was mixed. Olin Downes of the New York Times greatly admired the work, as did Paul Robeson; influential modernist critic Paul Rosenfeld hated it. The opera's reputation for politically incorrect language and plot—a black man's brutality toward other blacks—guarantees that the opera will not be revived often, if at all.

Biography

Louis Gruenberg was born on 22 July/3 August 1884, near Brest-Litovsk, Russia, and emigrated to the United States in 1885. He attended public schools in New York, quitting at age fifteen to become the sole support of his family. He was a child piano prodigy whose earliest music studies were with his father, then at the National Conservatory of Music, New York. He returned to Europe as a teenager to study at the Vienna Conservatory of Music, then at the Berlin State Academy of Music, 1905. He was a piano and composition student of Ferruccio Busoni in Berlin, starting in 1908, but his studies were interrupted by World War I. He made his European debut as a pianist in Berlin, 1912. He abandoned his career as a performer to devote his life to composing and championing modern music in the United States from 1919 on, eventually composing six symphonies, thirty-six other instrumental works, eighteen operas and operettas, and thirteen other vocal works. He helped establish the American Music Guild in 1921 and the League of Composers in 1923. He conducted the American premier of Arnold Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire, 1923. He was president of the U.S. chapter of the International Society for Contemporary Music during the 1920s. He achieved international fame as composer of the cantata The Daniel Jazz, 1925. His best-known work was The Emperor Jones, performed eleven times at The Metropolitan Opera, New York, 1933. He was chairman of the Department of Composition at Chicago Musical College, 1933–1936. He moved to California in 1937, where he composed nine film scores and was nominated unsuccessfully for Academy Awards for The Fight for Life, 1940; So Ends Our Night, 1941; and Commandos Strike at Dawn, 1942. He was commissioned by the violin virtuoso Jascha Heifetz to compose Violin Concerto, 1944. Awards he received include the New York Philharmonic Flagler Prize for Hill of Dreams, 1920; RCA Victor Prize for Symphony no. 1, 1930; Bispham Memorial Medal for The Emperor Jones, 1933; and Lake Placid Club Prize for Piano Quintet, 1937, an award he could not accept in person because the Club barred Jews as members and guests. Gruenberg died in Beverly Hills, California, on 10 June 1964.

HONORA RAPHAEL

See also Emperor Jones, The

Selected Works

- Polychromatics*, Op. 16. 1923.
The Creation, Op. 21. 1925. (Text by James Weldon Johnson.)
The Daniel Jazz, Op. 23. 1926. (Text by Vachel Lindsay.)
Jazzberries, Op. 25. 1925.
Jazzettes, Op. 26. 1925.
Twenty Negro Spirituals. 1926.
Jazz-Suite, Op. 28. 1929.
Jazz-Masks, Op. 30a. 1929.
Jazz Epigrams, Op. 30b. 1929.
The Emperor Jones, Op. 36. 1931. (After Eugene O'Neill.)
 "For an American Gesture." Modern Music, 1, June 1924.

Further Reading

- Metzer, David. "A Wall of Darkness Dividing the World: Blackness and Whiteness in Louis Gruenberg's 'The Emperor Jones.'" Cambridge Opera Journal, 7(1), 1995.
 Nisbett, Robert Franklin. "Louis Gruenberg: His Life and Works." Dissertation, Ohio State University, 1979.

- . "Louis Gruenberg's American Idiom." American Music, 3(1), 1985.
 Oja, Carol. Making Music Modern. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
 Saminsky, Lazare. Music of the Ghetto and the Bible. New York: Bloch, 1934.

Guardian, The

In 1901, William Monroe Trotter began a weekly newspaper, the Boston Guardian, to add an editorial voice that would speak freely and courageously for the equality of Negro people. The Guardian reinvigorated a muted Negro press: editors of other Negro newspapers, who had recently abandoned their militant stances, were inspired and mobilized. The Guardian led to the establishment in 1908 of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

The Guardian was born during what has been described as an "era of reaction and adjustment (1877–1915)" that started when President Rutherford B. Hayes pulled Union soldiers from the South and became the "most dangerous and brutal period for Afro-Americans" (Hughes et al. 1983, 215). This period overlaps with what NAACP has called the "lynching era," from 1889 to 1939; during that period, 2,522 African Americans were lynched. As a result, many editors of the African American press, who had once been outspoken in favor of racial equality, chose to tone down their comments; those who did not were fired or run out of town. One exception was Ida B. Wells, who in 1889 became an editor of the newspaper Free Speech and Headlight in Memphis, Tennessee, and made it well known for editorial veracity. She wrote against lynching, but mob violence closed Free Speech and Headlight in 1892. The number of lynchings of African Americans reached 115 in 1900 and 130 in 1901, according to the Tuskegee Institute. While lynchings were taking place in the South, race riots broke out as a form of protest in the North. During this chaotic time for African Americans, Booker T. Washington disappointed other Negro leaders by professing "accommodation" and "conciliation," policies that effectively weakened the editorial vigor of the Negro press except for the handful of militant newspapers located in the North.

Trotter's Guardian, in a sense, freed the restrained Negro press. Trotter's editorials were scathing attacks on Booker T. Washington: "What man is a worse enemy to a race than a leader who looks with equanimity on the disenfranchisement of his race in a country where other races have universal suffrage by constitutions that make one rule for his race and another for the dominant race" (Toppin 1971, 168). Trotter also attacked other Negro politicians and leaders, such as W. E. B. Du Bois, for failing to speak in unison with him against Washington's philosophy. At that time, Du Bois—a teacher, an author, and editor of The Crisis—was considered by many to be "the Negro leader," and he believed that Washington's philosophy of accommodation and patience would work if given adequate time. Less than a year later, according to some accounts, Trotter persuaded Du Bois to change that position and become opposed to Washington; although according to other accounts, Du Bois had concluded on his own that Washington's philosophy was not working. In any case, the Guardian had allies in the Negro press in its criticism of Washington: the Cleveland Gazette, the Chicago Conservator, the Richmond Planet, the Washington Bee, and the Christian Record. Trotter died in 1934, but the Guardian continued to be published into the 1950s.

GERI ALUMIT

See also Antilynching Crusade; Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Black Press; Du Bois, W. E. B.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Trotter, William Monroe; Washington, Booker T.

Further Reading

- Hughes, Langston, Milton Meltzer, and C. Eric Lincoln. A Pictorial History of Black Americans. New York: Crown, 1983.
- Meier, August. "Booker T. Washington and the Negro Press: With Reference to the Colored American Magazine." Journal of Negro History, 38, 1953.
- Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1969.
- Newkirk, Pamela. Within the Veil: Black Journalists, White Media. New York: New York University Press, 2000.
- Pride, Armistead S., and Clint C. Wilson II. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.
- Shannon, Samuel. "Tennessee." In The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979, ed. Henry Lewis Suggs. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- Simmons, Charles A. The African American Press: A History of News Coverage during National Crises, with Special

Reference to Four Black Newspapers, 1827–1965. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1998.

Toppin, Edgar A. A Biographical History of Blacks in America since 1528. New York: David McKay, 1971.

Guggenheim Fellowships

The Guggenheim Fellowships, sponsored by the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation, are competitive grants (not scholarships) available to advanced professionals pursuing interests in the humanities, the creative arts, and science. A Guggenheim fellowship may be used for a span of six to twelve months and is determined according to the individual needs of the scholar and the scholarly project. These fellowships are intended to provide advanced scholars with financially assisted time to closely examine, do research on, or create an individual endeavor in order to, according to Simon Guggenheim, the father of John Simon Guggenheim, encourage "the advancement and diffusion of knowledge and understanding and the appreciation of beauty." Other Guggenheim foundations also provide substantial monetary gifts: for example, the Solomon Guggenheim Foundation provides grants to support studies of nature and causes of aggression, and the Daniel Guggenheim Foundation provides grants to support aviation and rocketry.

The Guggenheim family has a tradition of humanitarian interests expressed through assistance to artists, scientists, and scholars. Meyer Guggenheim came to America from Switzerland in 1848 and acquired his wealth by importing lace and investing in silver mining in North and South America. John Simon Guggenheim, the grandson of Meyer Guggenheim, died suddenly while he was in college, and a fellowship was then established in his name by his parents. The John Simon Guggenheim foundation was incorporated on 16 March 1925, with an initial endowment of $3 million by Simon Guggenheim. Initially, the Guggenheim fellowships were intended for American citizens only, but Simon Guggenheim expanded eligibility to include Latin Americans by providing additional funding for more fellowships in 1929.

Because of Guggenheim fellowships, several exceptional figures of the Harlem Renaissance were able to develop their talents fully and were able to complete specific artistic and scholarly endeavors. Some of the Guggenheim Foundation's most distinguished fellows were participants in the Harlem Renaissance. Countee Cullen, the second African American fellow, received the award in 1928. He used the fellowship during 1928–1934 to travel back and forth between France and the United States, study, and write. In 1929, shortly after receiving the fellowship, he published The Black Christ and Other Poems. The folklorist, novelist, and playwright Zora Neale Hurston received a fellowship in 1936 and 1938 to complete research on folk religions in Jamaica and Haiti. A detailed account of her studies and experiences is represented in Tell My Horse (1938). The artist Jacob Lawrence was awarded a Guggenheim fellowship after serving as a steward's mate and combat artist for the U. S. Coast Guard during World War II; in 1946–1947, he painted a series called War.

GENYNE HENRY BOSTON

See also Cullen, Countee; Hurston, Zora Neale; Lawrence, Jacob; Philanthropy and Philanthropic Organizations

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Davis, Arthur. From the Dark Tower: African-American Writers 1900–1960. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1974.
- Davis, John Hagy. The Guggenheims: An American Epic. New York: Morrow, 1978, p. 276.
- Hoyt, Edwin Palmer. The Guggenheims and the American Dream. New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1967.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Dust Tracks on a Road: An Autobiography. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1971.
- O'Connor, Harvey. The Guggenheims: The Making of an American Dynasty. New York: Covici, Friede, 1937.

Gumby Book Studio

In 1926, Levi Sandy Alexander Gumby strutted down Fifth Avenue with “fancy clothes, a perennial walking stick, pale yellow kid gloves, and a diamond stick-pin” (Nugent 2002, 223). Gumby—a onetime butler, bellhop, and songwriter, and at that time a postal clerk—had just moved to “the Avenue,” into an enormous second-floor studio between 131st and 132nd streets. Gumby needed a space to accommodate his growing collection of “rare editions and manuscripts and items for my fast-growing scrapbooks” purchased with “the generosity of [a] staunch friend”—Charles Newman, a wealthy white stockbroker whom Gumby had known since 1910 (Gumby 1951, 5). Gumby’s “Book Studio,” decorated with a grand piano and Persian carpets, matched the grandeur he admired in things associated with the New Negro. Gumby’s salons attracted “friends who brought their friends, regardless of race or color—those who were seriously interested in arts and letters. . . . I daresay that [it] was the first unpremeditated interracial movement in Harlem” (Gumby, 5).

Gumby was also involved in another interracial movement: he and Newman were lovers. Their relationship was evidently tumultuous; in a letter of 1917 Gumby explains, “When I say you’re a bitch it’s only half what you are.” However, such outbursts seem to have complemented Gumby’s precise charm (Wirth 2002). Richard Bruce Nugent, whom Gumby called “the one person I don’t hafter [sic] pull my punches with,” explains that Gumby could “go into fits of rage, of majestic and pompous ire” just as easily as he could deliver one of his raucous, explicit sonnets to great applause” (Nugent 2002, 225; Wirth, 29). Gumby’s studio was a magnet for Harlemites, male and female, and their guests. Samuel Steward, a gay white writer and a friend of Gertrude Stein’s, remembered “being taken to Gumby’s one evening by a lesbian friend and enjoying a delightful evening of ‘reefer,’ bathtub gin, a game of truth, and homosexual exploits” (Garber 1989, 322).

Gumby was “one of Harlem’s reigning dandies”; however, he was also recognized for his meticulous scrapbooks, in which he gave accounts of aspects of black culture that were typically overlooked (Kellner 1987, 147). Aubrey Bower (1930, 20), the book critic of the New York Amsterdam News, lauded Gumby as an “indispensable” documentarist “whose patient and unselfish labors fertilize the soil from which grow the flowers of history and letters.” In September 1930, a “stag reception” for Countee Cullen, held to celebrate his return to the United States, was also reported in the Amsterdam News, complete with a list of attendees, as if they were “movable fixtures in his bright and social art collection” (Nugent, 225).

But this party was one of Gumby’s last. He had already sold several first editions because Newman had lost millions in the stock market crash of 1929 and could no longer bankroll soirees. Soon after Gumby closed the Book Studio, he contracted tuberculosis, and although he survived, after four years in the hospital, not all of his collection did. A “gentleman’s agreement” to house the collection led to pilfering and partial damage: “two bottom cases were practically paper-mud” (Gumby, 8). Restoring what he could, Gumby continued the collection; he donated it to Columbia University in 1951.

SETH CLARK SILBERMAN

See also Cullen, Countee; Gumby Book Studio Quarterly

Further Reading

- Bowser, Aubrey. “English Critic Lauds American Negro Art.” New York Amsterdam News, 13 August 1930, p. 20.
- Garber, Eric. “A Spectacle in Color: The Lesbian and Gay Subculture of Jazz Age Harlem.” Hidden from History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, eds. Martin Bauml Duberman, Martha Vicinus, and George Chauncey Jr. New York: New American Library, 1989, pp. 318–331.
- Gumby, L. S. Alexander. “The Gumby Scrapbook Collection of Negroana.” Columbia Library World, 5(1), January 1951, pp. 1–8.
- Kellner, Bruce. “Gumby, [Levi Sandy] Alexander.” In The Harlem Renaissance: An Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1987, p. 147.
- Nugent, Richard Bruce. “On Alexander Gumby.” In Gay Rebel of the Harlem Renaissance: Selections from the Work of Richard Bruce Nugent, ed. Thomas H. Wirth. Durham, N.C., and London: Duke University Press, 2002, pp. 223–226.
- Wirth, Thomas H. “Introduction.” In Gay Rebel of the Harlem Renaissance: Selections from the Work of Richard Bruce Nugent, ed. Thomas H. Wirth. Durham, N.C., and London: Duke University Press, 2002, pp. 1–61.

Gumby Book Studio Quarterly

Gumby Book Studio Quarterly stands with Fire!! and Harlem as single-issue literary journals of the Harlem Renaissance appearing during the mid-1920s to early 1930s. The Gumby Book Studio Quarterly was a project of the avid bibliophile, scrapbook creator, and popular Harlemite personality Alexander Gumby. Contributors included George Schuyler, Arthur Schomburg, and Richard Bruce Nugent, who submitted the short fictional work “The Tunic with a Thousand Pleats.” Gumby was supported by a New York stockbroker who made it possible for him to enhance his book and scrapbook collections. However, that support evaporated after the stock market crash of 1929. This lack of funding, coupled with Gumby’s four-year hospitalization for tuberculosis, meant that the Gumby Book Studio Quarterly made it only as far as galley proofs, with no distribution. Gumby continued his voluminous scrapbook collection after recovering from tuberculosis, but he abandoned the idea of the journal.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Gumby Book Studio; Nugent, Richard Bruce

Further Reading

- Garber, Eric. “Richard Bruce Nugent.” In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro-American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1987.
- “L. S. Alexander Gumby Is Dead; Compiled Scrapbooks on Negro.” New York Times, 18 March 1961.
- Nugent, Bruce. Gay Rebel of the Harlem Renaissance: Selections from the Work of Richard Bruce Nugent, ed. and intro. Thomas H. Wirth. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002.

Hall, Adelaide

Early in her career, Adelaide Hall was a member of J. Homer Tutt and Salem Tutt Whitney's troupe, appearing in several of their original musicals. Her first appearance on Broadway was in Sissle and Blake's Shuffle Along (1921); she sang and danced as one of eight Jazz Jasmines, and also sang a solo in the up-tempo number "Bandana Days." Her success in that musical led to a featured role in Miller and Lyles's hit Runnin' Wild (1923), in which she sang James P. Johnson's "Love Bug," "Old-Fashioned Love," and "Ginger Brown." In 1925, Hall had a major success at the famous Club Alabam in New York City. She then joined the cast of Sam Wooding's Chocolate Kiddies, which toured in Europe for about a year and was especially well received in London. During her European tour, Hall met Bert Hicks, a Trinidadian who was an officer in the merchant navy; he became her husband and manager. On their return to the United States in 1926, Hall joined the cast of Tan Town Topics, where she appeared with Florence Mills's sister Maude, Ralph Cooper, and Thomas "Fats" Waller and his band. Hall's next show, Desires of 1927, with music and lyrics by J. C. Johnson and Andy Razaf, toured from October 1926 through early 1927 and reunited her with J. Homer Tutt. During the latter part of that year, she joined the RKO circuit and appeared with Duke Ellington and his band in Jazzmania and Dance Mania. Hall's first recording, a wordless obligato to Ellington's "Creole Love Call," was the result of her humming a counter-melody during a performance of the piece. Ellington liked her improvisation and recorded it several days later.

After the tragic and unexpected death of Florence Mills, Hall was chosen to star in Lew Leslie's Blackbirds of 1928, with a cast that included Bill Robinson, Mantan Moreland, Aida Ward, Tim Moore, and the Cecil Mack Choir. Hall sang several of Jimmy McHugh and Dorothy Fields's hit songs, including "Diga, Diga, Do" and "I Can't Give You Anything but Love." She toured with the show in Europe and remained in Paris after it closed, to star at the Moulin Rouge and at the Lido. Hall rivaled Josephine Baker as the leading African American entertainer in Paris. In 1930, she returned to New York to appear in Brown Buddies. On returning to Paris in 1936, she and her husband opened La Grosse Pomme, a club on Rue Pigalle. After they moved to London in 1938, they opened the Florida Club, which was destroyed during the blitz in World War II.

Hall appeared in several film shorts, including Dancers in the Dark (1932), All Colored Vaudeville Show (1935), and Dixieland Jamboree (1935). Although her later career was based mainly in London, she returned to New York to appear with Lena Horne in Jamaica (1957). On her return to London, she and her husband opened another club, the Calypso. During the last decade of her life, Hall toured in a one-woman show, which was seen in New York in 1988 and 1992.

Biography

Adelaide Hall was born in Brooklyn, New York, possibly on 20 October 1901. Hall's birth date is not certain; in 1991, in an interview, she said she was ninety years old, but several sources list her birth date as 1904. Her father was a German and African American music teacher (he taught at Pratt Institute); her mother, Elizabeth Gerrard, was African American and American Indian. During the 1910s, the family moved to Harlem. As children, Hall and her younger sister, Eileen, sang at various events. Early in her career, Hall was a member of J. Homer Tutt and Salem Tutt Whitney's troupe; she made her Broadway debut in Shuffle Along (1921) and appeared in Miller and Lyles's Runnin' Wild (1923). She performed at Club Alabam (1925) and in Chocolate Kiddies. Her other shows included Tan Town Topics (1926), Desires of 1927, and Blackbirds of 1928. Hall performed and recorded with Duke Ellington and appeared in several film shorts. She was married to Bert Hicks. She died on 7 November 1993.

JOHN GRAZIANO

See also Baker, Josephine; Blackbirds; Ellington, Duke; Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 3—London; Fields, Dorothy; Musical Theater; Shuffle Along; Singers

Further Reading

- Bourne, Stephen. Sophisticated Lady: A Celebration of Adelaide Hall. London: Lilla Huset, 2001.
- Commire, Anne, ed. Women in World History: A Biographical Encyclopedia. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Group, 1999.
- Garraty, John A., and Mark C. Carnes, eds. American National Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Hine, Darlene Clark. Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Carlson, 1993.
- Smith, Jessie Carney, ed. Notable Black American Women. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1992.
- Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.
- Tucker, Mark. Ellington: The Early Years. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Hallelujah

King Vidor and Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer released the film Hallelujah (or Hallelujah!) in 1929, on the heels of Hearts in Dixie, the first musical from a major Hollywood studio that had an all-black cast. Writing years later, Vidor said of Hallelujah, "I wanted to make a film about Negroes, using only Negroes in the cast. The sincerity and fervor of their religious expression intrigued me, as did the honest simplicity of their sexual drives." Both of these essentialist beliefs are readily apparent in the film. Nonetheless, Hallelujah broke away from the stock character roles generally reserved for African American actors, and this encouraged black leaders, including W. E. B. Du Bois, to comment favorably that the production had moved away from "buffoonery."

Hallelujah tells the story of a young man from the country, Zeke, or Zeke (played by Daniel Haynes), who goes to the city to sell his family's cotton crop. There he meets a slick city woman named Chick (Nina Mae McKinney), who—along with her lover, Hot Shot (William Fountaine)—conspires to relieve Zeke of the money he has just been paid for his family's cotton. A fixed crap game leads to a fight between Hot Shot and Zeke, culminating in the accidental death of Zeke's brother Spunk (Everett McGarity). Filled with remorse, Zeke repents and, with the guidance of his father (Harry Gray), a pastor, becomes a minister himself.

Zeke and his family take to the road, holding revival meetings and baptisms. When Zeke encounters Chick in the midst of his crusade, he convinces her of her own sinful nature. Chick repents, but her religious ecstasy is reminiscent of her sexual ecstasy, and Zeke again falls under her spell. Zeke attempts to escape his lust by proposing to a "good girl," Missy Rose (Victoria Spivey). Missy Rose's purity, however, is not enough to keep Zeke from Chick. During one of his own evening services, he runs off to the city with Chick. Months later, Chick is restless and attempts to leave with Hot Shot. In the subsequent chase, Chick is thrown from her carriage and dies; Zeke then hunts down Hot Shot and strangles him. Following his prison sentence, Zeke returns to his country home, where his family welcomes him with open arms and he is reunited with Missy Rose.

Vidor used several traditional songs—"Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," "Let My People Go," "Ol' Time Religion"—as a musical backdrop for the film. The songs themselves usually echoed the onscreen action, but they rarely forwarded the plot. Vidor hired the Dixie Jubilee Singers to perform these standards. He relied on the leading actors, however, to sing two tunes by George Gershwin. Zeke sings "At the End of the Road" while waiting to gin his family's cotton, and Chick sings "Swanee Shuffle" in a local club. Only the youngest actors (Milton Dickerson, Robert Couch, and Walter Tait), playing Zeke's siblings, showcase their talent as dancers in a spontaneous celebration outside their home.

Vidor recruited the actors for his film in Chicago and Harlem. The New York Times found the subject captivating enough to devote a story to the process of “Finding Screen Negroes.” Unable to secure Paul Robeson for the lead, Vidor turned to another actor, Daniel Haynes, who had graduated from Morris Brown University before appearing in several roles on Broadway. Haynes’s voice and physique fit Vidor’s conception of Zeke, and he was cast. For the role of Chick, Vidor had originally selected Honey Brown. When she became ill on the set of the film, Vidor sent for Nina Mae McKinney, his second choice. McKinney’s performance impressed Vidor, and she was retained by MGM.

Most of Hallelujah was filmed on location in Tennessee and Arkansas. Vidor captured footage of his actors in local cotton fields, cotton gins, and sawmills to provide the background for the story. He also utilized the human resources of his locations, calling on African-Americans to help him design and implement the mass baptism scene. Four pastors answered Vidor’s call and brought their congregations to serve as extras. Vidor also hired Harold Garrison, an African American employee of MGM, as an assistant director to help shape the production.

The actors and the film received generally positive reviews. W. E. B. Du Bois wrote of Hallelujah:

It is the sense of real life without the exaggerated farce and horseplay . . . which most managers regard as inseparable from the Negro character that marks Hallelujah as epoch-making. . . . The music was lovely and while I would have preferred more spirituals instead of the theme-song, yet the world is not as crazy about Negro talk songs as I am. Everybody should see Hallelujah.

The reviewer for the New York Times, Mordaunt Hall, said that Hallelujah was a “most impressive audible film” and in a separate article praised the “clever negro cast.”

Nonetheless, Vidor and MGM had difficulty finding theaters to show the film. Southern theater owners were hesitant to show the “all-black” musical, and northern theater owners were concerned that a “preponderance” of African-Americans might drive away white customers. Vidor offered to give the owner of a large theater chain in Florida a check for $1,000 if the owner showed Hallelujah and it did not perform well. The owner agreed, and the film succeeded. Despite these small victories, MGM struggled to distribute the film, and the financial returns were limited.

Some of the religious and sexual themes Vidor explored in this film had previously been examined by an independent black filmmaker, Oscar Micheaux. In his film Body and Soul (1924), Micheaux told the story of a corrupt minister. Micheaux’s film, however, was much darker than Hallelujah, and his minister (named Jenkins), in contrast to Zeke, is not misguided but evil. The Green Pastures, first as a play on Broadway (1930) and then as a Hollywood movie (1936), followed in the tradition of Hallelujah with its fascination with and romanticization of “Negro religion.”

DANIELLE BRUNE

See also Film; Film: Actors; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Gershwin, George; Green Pastures, The; McKinney, Nina Mae; Micheaux, Oscar

Further Reading

Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Kisch, John, and Edward Mapp. A Separate Cinema. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1992, p. xx.

Vidor, King. A Tree Is a Tree. New York: Garland, 1972, p. 175. (Originally published 1952, 1953.)

Hamid, Sufi Abdul

In 1932, Bishop Amiru Al-Minin Sufi Abdul Hamid—after having succeeded with a similar campaign in Chicago earlier that year under the alias Bishop Conshankin—formed the Negro Industrial and Clerical Alliance in Harlem and began once again to publicize the slogan “Don’t buy where you can’t work.” Hamid captured the attention of Harlemites with his outrageous dress, appearing beturbaned and in a mélange of national costumes; and he earned the appellation “black Hitler” in both the black and the white press with his rhetoric of black nationalism and virulent anti-Semitism. (According to some reports, “black Hitler” was a title he gave himself.)

Hamid achieved success in 1934 with his boycotts of jobs, which had the objective of procuring positions for black clerks in department stores and five-and-ten stores owned and operated by whites in Harlem. The same year, however, he lost control of the coalition of groups of activists that had been formed for these campaigns to the more respectable Harlem Citizens League for Fair Play. Shortly thereafter, in October 1934, Hamid faced charges of disorderly conduct, brought against him by the Jewish Minutemen of America and the white Harlem Merchants' Association for allegedly advocating "war against the Jews" (McDowell 1998, 228). Although Hamid was cleared of these charges, he was unofficially blamed for a riot that took place in Harlem on 19 March 1935. Claude McKay (1935a) then took up Hamid's cause in an article in The Nation, "Harlem Runs Wild." McKay believed that the riot and the condemnation of Sufi Abdul Hamid indicated pressure points—points at which a combination of black and white liberals and radicals were attempting to suppress a positive, nationalist black labor movement. During the 1930s, McKay wrote often and passionately on Hamid and Hamid's cause.

Biography

Sufi Abdul Hamid was born in the shadow of an Egyptian pyramid on 6 January 1903—a fact for which his parole officer produced documentation at one of Hamid's many legal trials. Actually, his origins are obscure. Police at the scene of his death, a plane crash on Long Island on 31 July 1938, gave his real name as Eugene Brown and his address as Lombard Street, Philadelphia. Lewis (1981, 300) traced Hamid to Lowell, Massachusetts. In 1930, Hamid founded, in Harlem, the Universal Temple of Tranquillity; in 1932, he led a successful boycott of jobs in Chicago and began boycotting merchants in Harlem; in February 1934, as part of a coalition of activist groups, he organized a successful boycott of Blumstein's department store. However, he had legal woes, and among African American intellectuals he developed a reputation (perhaps deserved) as a charlatan and a racketeer; both his legal difficulties and this reputation effectively neutralized him as a force in Harlem's labor politics. During the late 1930s, he turned to experiences as a cultist, relying on the mystical and hoping to challenge Father Divine's standing as the premier cultic figure in Harlem.

MARK CHRISTIAN THOMPSON

See also Father Divine; McKay, Claude; Riots: 4—Harlem Riot, 1935

Further Reading

Greenberg, Cheryl Lynn. "Or Does It Explode": Black Harlem in the Great Depression. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Hunter, Jerome. "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work': Black Union Boycott Movements During the Depression, 1929–1941." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Michigan, 1977.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Random House, 1981.

McDowell, Winston C. "Keeping Them 'In the Same Boat Together'? Sufi Abdul Hamid, African Americans, Jews, and the Harlem Jobs Boycotts." In African Americans and Jews in the Twentieth Century. Columbia, Mo., University of Missouri Press, 1998, pp. 208–236.

McKay, Claude. "Harlem Runs Wild." Nation, 140, 3 April 1935a, pp. 382–383.

———. Interview with Sufi Abdul Hamid. Nation, 140, 3 April 1935b, p. 383.

———. Harlem: Negro Metropolis. New York: Dutton, 1940.

Ottley, Roi. New World a-Comin': Inside Black America. New York: Arno, 1968. (Originally published 1943.)

Solomon, Mark. The Cry Was Unity: Communists and African Americans, 1917–1936. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

Weisbrot, Robert. Father Divine. Boston, Mass.: Beacon, 1984.

Handy, W. C.

William Christopher (W. C.) Handy was born in Florence, Alabama, in 1873. His early musical education was exclusively in vocal music—traditional hymns and classical sacred works rather than Negro spirituals. Instrumental music was disallowed, but the vocal training gave him a very keen ear. By the time Handy finished school, he had secretly learned to play the cornet and found casual work with a local dance band.

In 1896, after various odd jobs, he joined the band of a white-owned black troupe, Mahara's Minstrels, that introduced him to the world of black minstrelsy, ragtime, and black popular music. Handy soon became an established bandleader in this field. Extensive travel brought him into contact with leading black musicians and entertainers and gave him an opportunity to visit Cuba, where he absorbed elements of local Latin music. He stayed with Mahara's Minstrels until 1903, apart from an interlude as musical director of the Agricultural and Mechanical College in Huntsville, Alabama, a forerunner of Tuskegee College.

Handy married Elizabeth Price in Kentucky in 1898. By 1903, with young children to support, they needed to settle down. Handy felt drawn to the South and settled, as musical director of the local black band, in Clarksdale, Mississippi, in the heart of the Delta region, a home of traditional blues.

Handy now considered himself a composer as well as a bandleader. He traveled widely in the region, and his sharp ear recognized a unique music style among nomadic blues singers of the Delta. He also observed the excitement that these “blues” aroused in people who merely listened politely to his own conventional music. He decided to use blues motifs in his own compositions, and he met with instant success.

His first blues piece, “Mr. Crump” (1909), was a satirical comment on a politician in Memphis, Boss Crump, who adopted it as the theme song of a successful mayoral campaign. Handy was inundated with requests for copies and had sheet music published in 1912 as “Memphis Blues.” It sold hugely, but he was duped into selling his copyright for a mere $500. This experience taught him a lifelong lesson; one result was the establishment of the Pace and Handy Music Company, publishers of sheet music.

Handy had been friendly with the banker Harry Pace since 1907, and Pace had supplied words to several of Handy’s compositions. Their first publication, in 1913, was Handy’s “Jogo Blues,” later rewritten as the phenomenally successful “Saint Louis Blues.” Before long it was followed by “Beale Street Blues,” and then by many more works over the next decade. In 1917, Handy’s Memphis Orchestra went to New York for a recording session at Columbia.

New York was a growth area for black music, with pre-jazz orchestras like that of James Reese Europe. Harlem was its musical center, with stride pianists like James P. Johnson. Handy’s music was well known there. In 1918, Pace and Handy moved to Harlem, taking up residence in swanky Strivers’ Row. Handy played an active role in the musical life of Harlem and became a respected figure, but his business had its ups and downs.

In 1921, Pace was frustrated by the unwillingness of white-owned record companies to record black artists. He resigned from Pace and Handy to found Black Swan Records, intending to record black performers exclusively. Handy, who was not part of the recording company, re-formed the publishing company with his brother Charles. Handy Brothers Music Company had heavy debts, and Handy developed serious eye problems that temporarily blinded him and left him severely visually impaired for the rest of his life. However, with his music rights, and with some help from friends, the company survived its problems.

Handy remained an active composer and performer. In 1926 he cowrote a book, the comprehensive survey Blues: An Anthology. In 1928 he presented a concert representing the “full spectrum of black music” at Carnegie Hall. In later years he turned to spirituals as a source of inspiration, publishing a Collection of Negro Spirituals in 1938.

Throughout the 1930s Handy toured and performed; he played at the Apollo Theater in Harlem in 1936. A concert was held at Carnegie Hall to commemorate his sixty-fifth birthday. In 1937 he became a founding member of the Negro Actors’ Guild. He published his autobiography, Father of the Blues, in 1941. In 1943 he suffered a fall on a subway in New York and was seriously injured; this injury reduced his activities. Handy died in 1958.

Handy was much honored during his lifetime and afterward. In 1931, Memphis constructed Handy Park on Beale Street, and a statue was erected in 1960. There was a film, Saint Louis Blues (1958), based loosely on his life; and a commemorative postage stamp was issued in 1969. The Blues Foundation established the W. C. Handy Blues Awards in 1980. Handy’s hometown—Florence, Alabama—built a museum in his honor.

Some lovers of blues question Handy’s credentials in this area, accusing him of copying and commercializing music that was already in the public domain. Although he adopted the title “father of the blues,” Handy never claimed to have “invented” blues. He always acknowledged that he had drawn on an existing folk heritage, considering himself a composer in that idiom. He adapted elements of traditional blues and transformed or embellished them—as in his subtle use of Latin motifs in “Memphis Blues” and “St. Louis Blues”—to create a blues-based variant of the American popular song.

Handy’s successful commercial exploitation of the blues idiom paved the way for later breakthroughs by black female blues singers. This development began with Mamie Smith’s recording of “Crazy Blues” in 1920 and culminated with the successes of Bessie Smith. By succeeding in business, Handy showed that black composers and artists could be masters of their own destiny in a world dominated by whites. He was a staunch champion of the talents of black musicians.

W. C. Handy, c. 1940s; the sheet music on the piano is "Saint Louis Blues." (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

In 1935, he wrote and published Negro Authors and Composers of the United States, and in 1944 he published Unsung Americans Sung, a tribute to underappreciated black musical figures. He contributed greatly to the status of black music as a major factor in American—and world—popular culture during and after the Harlem Renaissance. "Saint Louis Blues" is perhaps the world's best-known piece of American music.

Biography

William Christopher Handy was born on 16 November 1873, in Florence, Alabama, to Charles Bernard Handy, a minister, and Elizabeth Brewer, both freed slaves. He studied at the Florence District School for Negroes. He was a schoolteacher in Birmingham, Alabama (1892) and held various other jobs (1892–1896). He joined Mahara's minstrel troupe in 1896, married in 1898, and visited Cuba with the Mahara troupe in 1900. Handy was musical director at Agricultural and Mechanical College, Huntsville, Alabama (1900–1902), then rejoined Mahara as bandleader (1902). He was director of the Knights of Pythias Band in Clarksdale, Mississippi, in 1903. He moved to Memphis c. 1906. He established Pace and Handy Music Company in 1913; this company moved to New York in 1918. When Pace and Handy split up, Handy formed Handy Brothers Music Company (1921). He presented a concert of black music at Carnegie Hall in 1928. Handy Park was opened in Memphis in 1931. Handy was a founding member of the Negro Actors' Guild (1937). His sixty-fifth birthday was commemorated at Carnegie Hall in 1938. Handy died in New York City on 28 March 1958; he is buried in Woodlawn Cemetery, Bronx, New York.

BILL EGAN

See also Black Manhattan; Black Swan Phonograph Company; Blues; Blues: An Anthology; Clef Club; Covarrubias, Miguel; Europe, James Reese; Hunter, Alberta; Jazz; Music; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Pace, Harry H.; Pace Phonographic Company; Saint Louis Blues; Smith, Bessie; Smith, Mamie; Still, William Grant; Strivers' Row

Selected Works

Blues: An Anthology. 1926. (Rev. ed., 1972.)
Negro Authors and Composers of the United States. 1935.
W. C. Handy's Collection of Negro Spirituals. 1938.
Father of the Blues: An Autobiography. 1941.
Unsung Americans Sung. 1944.

Further Reading

Carlin, Richard. "Handy, W. C." In The American National Biography, Vol. 10, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Davis, Francis. The History of the Blues. London: Secker and Warburg, 1995.

Floyd, Samuel A. Jr. The Power of Black Music. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995, pp. 108–109.

Handy, D. Antoinette, "W. C. Handy." In Black Heroes of the Twentieth Century, ed. Jessie Carney Smith. Detroit, New York, Toronto, and London: Visible Ink, 1998.

Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues: An Autobiography, New York: Handy Brothers, 1941. (Also, New York: Collier, 1970. Includes a full list of Handy's musical compositions and arrangements up to 1940.)

Locke, Alain. The Negro and His Music: Negro Art Past and Present. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1969, ch. 9.

Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans: A History, 3rd ed. New York and London: Norton, 1997.

Stearns, Marshall W. The Story of Jazz. London, Oxford, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1956. (Rev. ed. 1972.)

Vincent, Ted. Keep Cool: The Black Activists Who Built the Jazz Age. London, and East Haven, Conn.: Pluto, 1995, ch. 2. (See “W. C. Handy, the Blues, and Black Struggle.”)

Harcourt Brace

Harcourt Brace was founded on 29 July 1919, in New York City, by Alfred Harcourt and Donald Brace, both of whom had worked for Henry Holt and Company for fifteen years. Harcourt had managed to bring Carl Sandburg, Robert Frost, and W. E. B. Du Bois to Holt, but had struggled to do so in an environment that he felt stifled creativity. Having developed a contentious relationship with the Holt family and having become convinced that he would not be able to publish books exploring “new ideas” if he remained at Holt, Harcourt decided to leave. He was encouraged to start his own publishing house by Sinclair Lewis, whom he had known through Holt and whose novels became some of Harcourt Brace’s best-sellers during the 1920s.

Along with the publishing houses run by Alfred A. Knopf, Ben Huebsch, and Boni and Liveright, Harcourt Brace sought to rewrite American culture through the publication of texts that would move the seat of American literature from Boston to New York and counter the Anglocentricity that dominated the publishing industry, even in older New York houses. Because the editors at Harcourt Brace were committed to change and diversity, they embraced African American writing from the inception of the firm. Harcourt Brace had fewer connections with the avant-garde than Boni and Liveright or Knopf but nonetheless was committed to pushing the boundaries of current publishing trends.

Harcourt’s plan for developing a list of titles was based on the personal taste and connections of his top staff members. Each staff member would attract writers in his or her own area of interest, and these areas would eventually become focus areas for the house as a whole. Joel Spingarn, who served as vice president and literary adviser for Harcourt Brace, was instrumental in its development as a firm dedicated to publishing African American texts. Spingarn had been a professor at Columbia University, was a civil rights activist, and was a founding member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Promoting the works of new African American writers through Harcourt Brace fit well with Spingarn’s personal mission of national cultural advancement through a multicultural agenda.

Notably, Spingarn’s vision of African American writing was not limited by the distinction between high art and propaganda that motivated the choices made by some other publishing houses. Spingarn did support the publication of books that excelled as propaganda, even if they were less than successful aesthetically, but under his guidance Harcourt Brace became known for publishing a wide variety of texts by black writers. James Weldon Johnson’s Book of American Negro Poetry, Claude McKay’s Spring in New Hampshire and Harlem Shadows, Arna Bontemps’ God Sends Sunday, and Sterling Brown’s Southern Road are among the books Harcourt Brace published during the Harlem Renaissance. However, as Hutchinson (1995, 377) comments, a listing of works published by Harcourt Brace during this period cannot adequately convey the extent of the firm’s intertextual commitment to African American art. More than any other firm, Harcourt Brace was committed to representing the rich intertextual diversity of the Harlem Renaissance.

AMANDA M. LAWRENCE

See also Boni and Liveright; Bontemps, Arna; Brown, Sterling; Johnson, James Weldon; Knopf, Alfred A.; McKay, Claude; Publishers and Publishing Houses; Spingarn, Joel

Further Reading

Dzwonkoski, Elizabeth. “Harcourt Brace.” In American Literary Publishing Houses, 1900–1980, 2 vols., ed. Elizabeth Dzwonkoski. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1986, pp. 180–183.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Harlem: 1—Overview and History

On 17 February 1919, the black 369th Regiment (Fifteenth Infantry), returning home after heroic service in France in World War I, marched up Fifth Avenue and through Harlem to the cheers of thousands of Harlemites. African-Americans to a great extent had taken the advice of W. E. B. Du Bois, who, in an editorial in The Crisis, had urged them to “close ranks” and support the war effort, with the idea that their country would no longer deny their claim to equal rights. For many African-Americans, their wartime sacrifices, their move into the heretofore middle-class white preserve of Harlem, and even the retaliatory self-defense of black communities attacked by white mobs signaled the birth of a “New Negro.” Many people in Harlem found cause for optimism during the ensuing decade, as white publishing houses discovered talented young black writers, Broadway discovered African American culture, and white tourists discovered Harlem’s nightlife.

Harlem was the unofficial political and cultural capital of Afro-America in the first half of the twentieth century, and especially in the 1920s. During this decade, Harlem became America’s most populous urban center; was the headquarters of black nationalism, embodied in Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA); and was a magnet for black artists from the southern United States, South America, the Caribbean, and other parts of the world. Its artistic productions generated audiences throughout the Americas, the Caribbean, Africa, and Europe, as they still do today; and the writers, musicians, and visual artists of the Harlem Renaissance have become part of the American cultural canon. In many ways, the period of the Harlem Renaissance, although it was filled with promise, could provide only partial deliverance from racial barriers, or from the stereotypes and oppressive conditions that were tolerated by what some people called “Old Negro” thinking. The glittering popular image of Harlem in the 1920s was a reality for some residents but a more complicated situation, or even a mirage, for many others, especially the ordinary working population. But blacks still came to Harlem. For southern black migrants seeking relief from segregation, political disenfranchisement, and grinding rural poverty, Harlem was an oasis. For the growing foreign-born black population of New York, Harlem held out the possibility of greater economic advancement than they could achieve in their various Caribbean homelands.

The African presence in New York dates back to the era of Dutch control and the naming of the city, New Amsterdam, in the 1620s; but blacks’ residence in Harlem was relatively new. By 1840, the center of the black population shifted from the lower tip of Manhattan between Cedar and Canal streets to the infamous squalor of the Five Points district. Twenty years later, Five Points had become overwhelmingly Irish, and most New York blacks were living in the southern portion of Greenwich Village. By 1900, this part of the Village had become predominantly Italian, and most of its black population had continued to move northward up the West Side to the Tenderloin district, which extended from the West Twenties to the West Fifties; and to the San Juan Hill neighborhood, in the West Sixties. Then, black real estate agencies, like Philip Payton’s Afro-American Realty Company and Nail and Parker’s firm, seized the opportunity when landlords in Harlem needed to fill vacancies in their apartment buildings—a situation that was created by a housing boom in conjunction with the extension of the subway system to Harlem. Soon black churches, such as Abyssinian Baptist, were following their parishioners and acquiring or building edifices in Harlem.

It was a source of pride for African-Americans to move into a previously all-white area with housing stock far superior to what was available anywhere they had lived before in New York City. The writer James Weldon Johnson—who was also a diplomat and an official of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)—reflected the optimism to be gained from living in an area “situated in the heart of Manhattan,” which “is not a slum, nor is it a ‘quarter’ consisting of dilapidated tenements.” Harlem, according to Johnson, had “streets as well paved, as well lighted, and as well kept as any other part of the city.” This was a significant difference from earlier black neighborhoods in Manhattan. For blacks—to repeat—housing in Harlem was clearly an improvement over their previous living conditions. Yet although Johnson hoped that by moving uptown, blacks had left the slums behind, regression and stagnation would eventually create slum conditions in parts of Harlem too.

By 1920, 70 percent of the African American population of Manhattan lived between 118th Street and 144th Street, from the Harlem River to the Hudson River. Ten years later, half of the city’s black population would live in Harlem. The black community grew in numbers from 83,000 in 1920 to 204,000 in 1934. Between 1910 and 1930, while Manhattan’s white population decreased by 633,249, the black population increased by 154,135. Eventually, black New Yorkers found it extremely difficult to obtain housing outside Harlem; consequently, they would pay more for housing than their white counterparts. In Manhattan, the density rate for blacks was 336 people per acre—significantly higher than the rate for whites, 222 per acre. The high population density in Harlem contributed to the deterioration of the housing stock, as apartments were cut into smaller units to accommodate demand and maximize the building owners' profits. By 1938, the median rental for vacant apartments in Harlem had reached $30 per month, compared with $18 per month for Manhattan in general.

Housing congestion took its toll on the health of Harlemites, who had higher rates of communicable diseases and higher mortality rates. For example, for New York City as a whole, the death rate from tuberculosis was 76 per 100,000 people, but the rate for Harlem was 183 per 100,000 between 1923 and 1927. For New York City, the mortality rate from pneumonia was 124 per 100,000; the rate for Harlem was 244 per 100,000. Thus health and life expectancy were considerably reduced for blacks in Harlem—as they had been in earlier decades for blacks in other parts of the city. No doubt, a lack of access to better health care and the exclusion of black patients and physicians from New York's hospitals, other than Harlem Hospital, contributed to this problem. Pressure from the black community had forced a reorganization of Harlem Hospital and the integration of its medical staff. But this change, like so many changes in Harlem, did not transform the delivery of health services, which remained inadequate and unequal.

For black migrants, wages and employment conditions in urban America were an improvement over their occupations in the South as sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and low-wage workers. Yet the situation in the North for many African-Americans proved ambiguous during the 1920s. The number of black professionals in New York doubled in the 1920s, and from 1910 through 1930, black males in Manhattan consistently had a higher rate of employment than their white counterparts. In 1930, 88.6 percent of black males living in Manhattan had jobs, compared with 87.1 percent of white males. In the 1920s, then, the lack of a job was not a great problem; rather, the low-paying jobs that many African-Americans found themselves in made it difficult to make ends meet and pay the rent. The people who held "rent parties" in Harlem in the 1920s, to raise money to pay their landlords, were often employed, but their wages were insufficient to meet the cost of housing and food.

As late as 1935, businesses owned by blacks constituted only 18.6 percent of the total number of businesses in Harlem. Black enterprises tended to be services such as barbershops, beauty salons, and funeral parlors, and they tended to be smaller and less profitable than the larger individually owned white businesses or white chain stores. Department stores in Harlem's main business districts, such as 125th Street, did not hire black managers or even black sales clerks. African Americans were excluded from all but janitorial jobs with the city subways, bus companies, utility companies, and telephone companies; and blacks were nearly totally excluded from the police and fire departments. Thus many people came to regard black Harlemites as, in a sense, a colonized people banned from the colonizers' institutions and economic life.

Similarly, many residents of Harlem felt excluded from the political life of the city, and even from the political life of their own community. Black members of the Democratic Party in New York City had no significant influence. In 1898, the Democratic leadership—known as Tammany Hall—formed a segregated auxiliary exclusively for African Americans, called the United Colored Democracy. It was a citywide organization, however, and therefore was unable to compete for political power and patronage, which remained at the district level, in the hands of white district leaders. The Republican Party did not segregate blacks in a separate auxiliary, but neither did it allow any black district leaders to emerge in Harlem. African American Republicans, discontented with their exclusion, organized the United Civic League in 1913 to push for greater inclusion in the party and black candidates for elective office. Two of the league's candidates were elected to office: Edward A. Johnson, a black lawyer, was elected assemblyman from Harlem's Nineteenth District; and in 1918, another black lawyer was elected from the Twenty-first District. In 1919, Charles H. Roberts, a Republican, became New York City's first black alderman. However, not until 1929 did Charles Fillmore become Harlem's first black Republican district leader, and not until 1935 did Herbert Bruce become its first Democratic district leader.

Another response by blacks who felt alienated from a segregated society was radicalism. Black socialists included A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, editors of The Messenger, a socialist publication opposed to the United States' involvement in World War I. In 1918, Cyril Briggs began publication of The Crusader, a monthly periodical advocating black nationalism, Marxism-Leninism, and violent revolution. Also appearing in 1918 were two literary and cultural magazines, Challenge and Negro Voice, published by William Bridges and Hubert Harrison, respectively. Negro World, a publication of the Jamaican immigrant Marcus Garvey, captured the imagination of the masses in Harlem and of blacks throughout the diaspora. Garvey was able to recruit numerous black followers in the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa—and in Harlem, where nearly one-quarter of the population was foreign-born blacks from the Caribbean, and where he had many devout black American supporters.

Garvey had his first speaking engagement before a large audience in Harlem in the summer of 1917 and quickly outdistanced his black radical competitors in attracting a mass following. In 1920 he spoke before thousands in Madison Square Garden at a huge convention of UNIA, after an enthusiastic parade through Harlem. He advocated a nationalistic agenda emphasizing the need for diasporic blacks to create their own economic institutions—black-owned retail businesses, factories, steamship lines, and so on—that would unite blacks in an international web of commerce and advancement, leading eventually to a decolonized, independent, united Africa. Garvey came to believe that blacks would never obtain either political or economic equality in the United States and sooner or later would have to repatriate themselves to Africa, rebuild it, and make it strong.

Eventually, UNIA—which had grown into the largest black mass movement in the world in less than ten years of existence in the United States—began to unravel, partly because of the petty jealousy of Garvey's rivals within and outside the organization. Moreover, UNIA had relied heavily on his charismatic leadership, and it declined rather rapidly when he was imprisoned for mail fraud (a charge that may have been based on a technicality). By the late 1920s, Garvey had been released but was in exile, and UNIA continued to decline.

The decline of Garvey's movement, however, did not diminish the reputation of Harlem as the capital of the black world. That reputation rested on the cultural developments of the "Negro Renaissance"—developments in literature, music, and the visual arts. White cultural critics discovered black themes and black artists as downtown audiences attended musicals such as Dixie to Broadway and Blackbirds or more serious dramas such as The Emperor Jones and The Green Pastures. Through the efforts of black scholars—including Charles S. Johnson at Opportunity magazine and W. E. B. Du Bois at The Crisis—black artists were put in contact with white publishing houses and editors. James Weldon Johnson and Walter White of the NAACP, along with Alain Locke, a professor of philosophy at Howard University, served as literary and artistic shepherds to a flock of young writers, painters, and sculptors who flourished in the 1920s and 1930s and in many cases have become part of the canon. James Weldon Johnson said that their artistic achievements brought about an "entirely new national conception of the Negro . . . placing him in an entirely new light before the American people. Indeed they placed the Negro in a new light before himself." For Johnson and many cultural critics, the Harlem Renaissance was not simply a rebirth of black artistic production but the birth of a new identity and self-definition for African Americans. Locke said: "Harlem has the same role to play for the New Negro as Dublin has had for the New Ireland or Prague for the New Czechoslovakia."

However, black writers were by no means unified with regard to the role of Harlem—or their own role or that of their artistic products—in this redefinition. The works published during the decade reflected assimilationist and antiassimilationist themes, and bourgeois and antibourgeois values. Claude McKay praised the instinctive unassimilated black man in Banjo (1929). Langston Hughes heralded the black common man and the black working class in his prose and poetry. Jean Toomer praised the spirituality of rural southern blacks in Cane (1923). Other works focused on black bourgeois heroes and heroines; examples are Jessie Redmon Fauset's There Is Confusion (1924) and Nella Larsen's Passing (1929).

But despite the lack of thematic and stylistic unanimity—or probably in great part because of it—the Harlem Renaissance, like Harlem itself, had a dynamism and a diversity that were widely attractive. The Great Depression dried up private patronage for black creative artists, and in the succeeding decade, these artists embraced more leftist themes related to class and found a new patron in the Federal Arts Project. But the Harlem Renaissance had laid the foundation for black writers and artists for generations to come: from James Baldwin and Amiri Baraka to Alice Walker and Maya Angelou.

During its renaissance, Harlem was, in terms of class, a heterogeneous community; in the decades that followed, it would be transformed into a more homogeneous, low-income, working-class community as much of its former middle-class population became suburbanized after World War II. As of the present writing, Harlem was undergoing further change: Gentrification was attracting a new middle class to Harlem's affordable brownstones, and national chain stores were opening new branches in locations that had once been thought undesirable. Whether these changes would revitalize the economy and employment or merely move the poor from one geographic area to another within the city remained to be seen. Yet Harlem continued to be the best-known black community in the world, and even its current changes were occurring, in great part, because of its historic reputation as the capital of Afro-America—a reputation established during the era of the Harlem Renaissance.

LARRY A. GREENE

See also Afro-American Realty Company; Briggs, Cyril; Crisis, The; Fifteenth Infantry; Garvey, Marcus; Harlem Hospital; Harrison, Hubert; House-Rent Parties; Negro World; New Negro; Opportunity; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; United Colored Democracy; Universal Negro Improvement Association; White, Walter; specific artists and writers

Further Reading

- Capeci, Dominic J. The Harlem Riot of 1943. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1977.
- Greenberg, Cheryl Lynn. Or Does It Explode: Black Harlem in the Great Depression. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Greene, Larry. "Harlem in the Great Depression: 1928–1936." Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1979.
- . "Harlem, The Depression Years: Leadership and Social Conditions." Afro-Americans in New York Life and History, 17, July 1993.
- Huggins, Nathan I. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Naison, Mark. Communists in Harlem During the Depression. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto—Negro New York, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1963.

Harlem: 2—Economics

At the apex of the Harlem Renaissance, Harlem experienced a rapid increase in population and business growth, a sign of a vibrant economy. The area received new capital, people, and ideas. Immediately before its renaissance, Harlem had been a large residential neighborhood populated by eastern European Jews and African Americans, who moved uptown after excessive residential capacity impelled landlords to recruit new tenants.

Increasing public transportation, federal spending on infrastructure, and foreign conflict perpetuated the boom. The rise of the stock market in the 1920s and mobilization for World War I created more efficient manufacturing and distribution throughout the United States. Harlem's proximity to Wall Street was advantageous, as the value of common stocks and railroad bond yields produced consistent returns. Harlem benefited from growth in jobs and from the disposable income that industrial professionals spent in the neighborhood.

Economic geography separated Harlem from other American urban neighborhoods. By marketing Harlem as a place, business leaders and boosters showcased the area's international flair, artistic heritage, and famous residents. This commodification of the area resulted in increasing returns during the Harlem Renaissance. The region drew aficionados of art and music, and visitors came to sites that were significant for the African American cultural heritage. In fact, Harlem has continued to draw capital resources (net benefits) to the City of New York for years for these reasons.

Before the residential boom in Harlem, local land was considered unproductive. During the 1840s and 1850s, many farms were deserted and used by Irish squatters. Horsecar lines and a steamboat that ran during the summer from 125th Street to Peck Slip were the only transportation links available for travel to New York's business district. In 1873, New York City annexed Harlem, and new, elevated rail service was proposed. Over the next twenty-five years, rail service was extended, and land in Harlem became valuable. Building trades and municipal officials infused the area with capital, subsidizing jobs and buying goods.

Because the Harlem River was a navigable eight-mile tidal straightaway between Manhattan and the Bronx, connecting the East River with Spuyten Duyvil Creek and the Hudson River, the waterway was considered valuable for shipping in the nineteenth century. The first section of the Harlem River Ship Canal (U.S. Ship Canal), a waterway designed to connect the Hudson and Harlem rivers, was completed in 1895. Afterward, Manhattan was successfully circumnavigated so that Long Island Sound was accessible to shipping traffic from the Hudson. By the end of the twentieth century, six swing bridges, one lift bridge, and three arch bridges spanned the river, which served as a transportation link joining the boroughs of New York City.

In Harlem, new apartment buildings were strategically placed to take advantage of this prime location, near rail lines, burgeoning roads, and waterways. However, extensive building in the late nineteenth century created excess capacity during sporadic recessions in the 1890s, so landlords in Harlem sought new tenants. Many eastern European Jews moving from tenements in lower Manhattan and African Americans willing to pay higher prices than their white counterparts were recruited. The former primarily moved into buildings between 110th and 125th streets; the latter moved near 135th Street. Many black New Yorkers arrived from the Tenderloin district of Manhattan after witnessing brutal race riots or being displaced by the construction of Pennsylvania Station in 1906–1910. Some longtime residents of Harlem fled as the newcomers arrived, but the new residents were determined to stay. Even as organizations like the West Side Improvement Association tried to exclude black residents, companies like Philip A. Payton's Afro-American Realty Company courted black tenants.

Before its renaissance, Harlem supported thousands of domestic and personal service jobs and employees, and some manufacturing employment, primarily in the garment and masonry industries. Professional service jobs, public employment, and trade and transportation jobs increased rapidly after 1900. Some local manufacturers and distributors specialized in finished and semifinished nondurable consumer goods such as clothing, printed materials, textiles, and leather. Sales of beauty-care products and professional services grew rapidly, as did retail businesses specializing in imported products. Harlem's economy gained measurably from a constant infusion of capital and people during the first twenty years of the twentieth century. The success of local proprietors transformed Harlem into a national headquarters for black businesses, a trend that continued for years afterward.

General migration to Harlem slowed immediately after World War I, when the large supply of unskilled European labor ceased to flow into New York City. When the U.S. Congress passed the Emergency Quota Act (1921), the nation's first quantitative immigration law, immigrants were restricted in number on the basis of their country of origin. The Immigration Act of 1924 made the quota system permanent. A growing need for labor in New York provided opportunities for vast numbers of African Americans recruited by agents to leave the American South and move to Harlem. These new arrivals further invigorated Harlem with people, ideas, and capital. Alain Locke wrote in 1925: "The wash and rush of this human tide on the beach line of the Northern city centers is to be explained primarily in terms of a new vision of opportunity, of social and economic freedom, of a spirit to seize, even in the face of an extortionate and heavy toll, a chance for the improvement of conditions."

Jazz musicians and writers drew visitors "uptown" and transformed the neighborhood into a recreational destination. The Cotton Club (formerly Jack Johnson's Club Deluxe) and Connie's Inn were owned by whites and catered to a white clientele, but both clubs built Harlem's reputation as a neighborhood of entertainment during Prohibition. According to the census of 1920, there were approximately 152,467 people living in Harlem, up from 91,709 in 1910. Service employment remained constant. James Hubert of the New York Urban League published a study (Living Conditions of Small Wage Earners, 1927) of approximately 2,400 tenants in the neighborhood, which confirmed that this employment had persisted for years. Hubert's report also showed a trend in Harlem: Gainfully employed families were earning slightly less than four times the amount of their rent in gross pay. The average weekly income for a family was $19.75, and the average monthly rent was $41.14.

Harlem's growth as a business district during the Renaissance drew capital from across the nation, boosting local financial institutions. As Harlem gained new residents and capital, New York Age and Amsterdam News promoted the community's new business leaders. The Carver Savings and Loan Association and the United Mutual Life Insurance Company employed several local residents and were regionally powerful firms. Several funeral homes, law firms, and medical practices were founded during the 1920s, and Apple Bank for Savings, originally named Harlem Savings Bank, accumulated vast capital. Patrons of the arts, both black and white—including the wealthy A'Lelia Walker, who operated a popular salon, the Dark Tower, from her home—merged business interests and art.

The literature of the Harlem Renaissance promoted economic independence. Black residents no longer regarded themselves as subservient and sought grand economic projects in Harlem. However, a division emerged between more conservative black business owners and new leaders, who promoted a self-assertive image of what came to be called the "New Negro." This new philosophy was described in periodicals such as The Crisis (1910), published by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and edited by W. E. B. Du Bois with help from the novelist and literary editor Jessie Redmon Fauset; and Opportunity (1923), published by the Urban League and edited by the sociologist Charles S. Johnson. Cultural independence was described as the ideal way to sustain economic independence: “Harlem’s New Negroes employed a strategy of self-empowerment through cultural ascendancy rather than direct economic or political protest” (Douglas 1995).

More radical publications in Harlem questioned the economic authority of contemporary American business leaders. The Messenger, established by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen in 1917, held that the oppression of blacks was not racial but economic in origin. This periodical denounced the American Federation of Labor, which largely excluded African Americans, and black America’s involvement in World War I. In March 1922, Randolph began advocating the pooling of black business resources, citing an increase in bankruptcies in Harlem. His astute theories on cooperative economic power were proved in 1925, when he organized the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. Randolph drew support from the numerous black fraternal lodges and social clubs that dotted Harlem. Economic independence movements began at Saint James Presbyterian Church, Abyssinian Baptist Church, Canaan Baptist Church, and Saint Philip’s Protestant Episcopal Church.

Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) was another example of an organization promoting economic independence, although Garvey went about this differently from most entrepreneurs in Harlem. Garvey sought to return Harlemites to their African homelands in a “back to Africa” program to restore worldwide economic equality. His weekly newspaper, Negro World, was widely read in America and abroad. In 1919, Garvey founded the Black Star Line Steamship Corporation in Harlem to achieve his goal. Shares valued at $5 each were sold at meetings of UNIA and through mailed circulars; and nearly $200,000 was raised in less than four months. Harlem was the headquarters of Garvey’s ventures; much of the capital came from the working poor of the Caribbean and the United States. Numerous owners of businesses and real estate in Harlem, and the labor leader Randolph, were critical of Garvey’s managerial skills and considered his behavior divisive. He was denounced as an opportunistic social and political leader who was promoting unrealistic economic development plans for Harlem for his own benefit.

Booker T. Washington and his close business associates had founded the National Negro Business League (NNBL) in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1900, and many of the leaders of this organization cast their projects from Harlem. T. Thomas Fortune, editor and publisher of New York Age, was appointed chairman of the executive committee of NNBL and tirelessly encouraged black economic growth. The secretary of NNBL, Albon L. Holsey, founded the Colored Merchants’ Association (CMA); and the banker Richard Wright, a Philadelphian, established the National Negro Bankers Association and played a vital role in financing small bakeries, groceries, and cleaning firms in Harlem.

However, when the stock market crashed in 1929 and the Great Depression followed, Harlem’s economy was badly damaged. The Depression displaced millions of jobs, and in this regard, Harlem was particularly vulnerable. Thousands of the working poor lived in the district, and their jobs disappeared when infrastructure and retail sales suffered. According to federal data, Harlem had rates of unemployment three to four times greater than neighborhoods with primarily white residents. In the face of economic decline—and racism—few African American families prospered. Numerous adults in Harlem began working as street peddlers or vendors in order to survive. Neighborhood “cotton pickers” were famous for finding marketable goods by searching through refuse. Moreover, patrons of the arts reduced their financial support. Some writers in Harlem fell out of favor with publishers when their works were accused of promoting communist ideals; some performers also fell from favor because of their communist leanings.

Many workers and artists based in Harlem were eventually absorbed into other areas of American society, including universities and the U.S. government’s Works Progress Administration (WPA). But in the summer of 1934, more than 19,000 families were on relief. The unemployed would gather at the “Tree of Hope” (near the Lafayette Theater) at 132nd Street and Seventh Avenue to touch its trunk for luck. In March 1935, a riot resulted in widespread looting and symbolized the economic plight of the neighborhood. To combat the problem of scarce jobs, officials of the National Urban League in Harlem adopted a slogan, “Don’t buy where you can’t work,” that had been developed in St. Louis; its point was to boycott chain stores operated by whites.

In 1929, in an essay in Modern Quarterly, the sociologist E. Franklin Frazier argued that the Harlem Renaissance was divorced from the politics and economics of black culture as a group concept. This issue is debatable, but clearly the ideals and leaders of the Harlem Renaissance influenced collective and group economic development across the United States. Harlem still remains a center of African American business. A survey by Black Enterprise in 2004 of the 100 largest African American businesses in the United States found that 29 percent were located in New York state, and several had germinated in Harlem.

SANDY SUMMERS HEAD
R. JAKE SUDDERTH

See also Abyssinian Baptist Church; Afro-American Realty Company; Amsterdam News; Black Star Line; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Cotton Club; Crisis, The; Fortune, Timothy Thomas; Frazier, E. Franklin; Garvey, Marcus; Messenger, The; Negro World; New York Age; Nightclubs; Nightlife; Opportunity; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; Riots: 4—Harlem Riot, 1935; Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Walker, A'Lelia

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. A. Phillip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. New York: Harcourt, 1972.
- Black Enterprise*. (Archives of this magazine list African-American firms and their locations.)
- Douglas, Ann. Terrible Honesty: Mongrel Manhattan in the 1920s. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1995.
- Draper, Theodore. The Rediscovery of Black Nationalism. New York: Viking, 1970.
- Foner, Philip S., and James S. Allen, eds. American Communism and Black Americans: A Documented History, 1919–1929. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1987.
- Garvey, Amy Jacques, ed. Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986.
- Gurock, Jeffrey S., and Calvin B. Holder. "Harlem." In The Encyclopedia of New York City, ed. Kenneth T. Jackson. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995, pp. 523–525.
- Hill, Robert A., ed. The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- Hutchinson, George. "Mediating 'Race' and 'Nation': The Cultural Politics of The Messenger." African American Review, 28(4), 1994, pp. 531–548.
- Ingham, John N., and Lynne B. Feldman. African-American Business Leaders: A Biographical Dictionary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1994.

- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1991.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Vintage, 1982.
- Locke, Alain LeRoy. The New Negro. New York: Atheneum, 1970. (Reprint with new preface by Robert Hayden. Originally published 1925.)
- Schuyler, George. Black No More. New York: Macaulay, 1931. U.S. Bureau of the Census. Census of Population, 1900, 1910, 1920, 1930.

Harlem: 3—Entertainment

The Harlem Renaissance is often treated as primarily a literary movement, but music and entertainment were at the center of the cultural productivity and social optimism associated with the period. Black migrants from around the country, a category that included many of the artists celebrated as key figures in the creative life of the renaissance, along with whites, flocked to Harlem to participate in the cultural milieu of the cabarets, nightclubs, and theaters as observers and participants. Music is often celebrated as a medium that transcends social divisions such as class and race, but the entertainment history of Harlem illustrates the extent to which such divisions determined the conditions of the culture being produced there.

The New Negro movement was primarily a middle-class phenomenon; its artists and intellectuals came mostly from educated, relatively privileged backgrounds. Secular music and dance were considered to be mere popular culture, often vulgar and distinct from the high culture—such as sculpture, painting, classical music, and literature—being produced in literary salons and artistic parlors. Nonetheless, it was the vernacular culture of the masses of working-class black people—their songs, dance, and music—from which the "talented tenth" drew inspiration. That said, class distinctions were not easily transcended. The affluent—W. E. B. Du Bois, Roy Wilkins, Walter White, and other renaissance leaders and artists—lived on Sugar Hill along with doctors, lawyers, and successful businesspeople. The up-and-coming and middle-class artists and writers, like Paul Robeson, Countee Cullen, Clarence Cameron White, W. C. Handy, and Fletcher Henderson, lived on Strivers' Row; and the black poor and working classes lived in "the Valley." Social circles were just as circumscribed by class as residential patterns were. For example, the upper classes congregated in the “Dark Tower,” the third floor of A’Lelia Walker’s home, for intellectual conversation. In contrast, jazz musicians and entertainers gathered at the Rhythm Club to socialize and jam together. Elite fraternities and sororities held dances at the Renaissance Casino, while working people came together at basement parties to raise money to pay their high rents. At these informal gatherings, musicians such as Fats Waller and Duke Ellington honed their craft and proved themselves to their peers.

Although class distinctions clearly informed the creative outlets that particular entertainers pursued, the distinctions were also frequently blurred and crossed. George Gershwin was known to frequent Harlem rent parties, for example, and he invited jazz musicians to his own parties downtown, where they gained entry to and employment in mainstream musical productions. Moreover, although critics emphasize the “talented tenth’s” designation of spirituals as the classical music of black America, in contrast to what was then considered to be the more vulgar secular music, the status of spirituals as high culture did not gain widespread acceptance until composers and performers such as Harry T. Burleigh and Roland Hayes began to perform this music in public concerts and James Weldon and John Rosamond Johnson anthologized it. “New Negro” composers strove to elevate the race’s music, while establishing themselves within European musical traditions. In addition to Burleigh and the Johnson brothers’ compositions in both spiritual and secular traditions, other breakthroughs in African American concert music included Roland Hayes’ concert of lieder and spirituals at Town Hall in 1923, the organization of the Hall Johnson Choir in 1924, and the “First American Jazz Concert” at Aeolian Hall in 1924.

The strides made in musical concert halls were significant, but it is also true that most curiosity seekers flocked to Harlem to hear jazz and blues, musical forms that they believed expressed the sexual, exotic, and uninhibited. These characteristics of jazz and blues appealed to many people who had a new turn-of-the-century attitude toward modern society. Everyone, white and black, went to Harlem to hear black music. Racial and gender conventions were viewed—at least in lore if not in reality—as being more easily transgressed in Harlem. Just as important, Harlem was viewed as a hotbed of musical creativity.

Musical pioneers such as W. C. Handy, Ford Dabney, James Reese Europe, and Will Marion Cook made significant contributions in the early years of the twentieth century, formalizing black music, orchestrating it, and paving the way for future generations of musicians. Bandleaders such as Fletcher Henderson and Duke Ellington popularized the music and went on to assume the title of jazz composers. Henderson’s orchestra worked as the house band at the Roseland Ballroom on Broadway, a segregated club that excluded blacks. Henderson is credited with initiating the transformation of ragtime from its roots in Dixieland into the more urbane sounds of the big band movement. He accompanied the blues singers Ethel Waters and Bessie Smith, and he collaborated with other musicians. His band’s hit “Sugar Foot Stomp” came to signify both “hot” and “sweet” styles of New York jazz.

Ellington moved from Washington, D.C., to Harlem in 1923 and worked his way up through the ranks until he and his orchestra were hired for a long-term gig at the prestigious Cotton Club in 1927. The four-year run at the Cotton Club gave Ellington national exposure—there were weekly broadcasts on the CBS radio network—as well as the opportunity to collaborate on compositions and arrangements that would become classics, such as “Black and Tan Fantasy” (1927) and “Black Beauty” (1928). By 1928, the Ellington Orchestra became the premier jazz ensemble. Its members had honed their characteristic styles, such as “growling” solos, blue notes, and hot rhythms, that helped define what would come to be known as the orchestra’s trademark “jungle” style. By the early 1930s, Ellington had gained fame as the composer of “Mood Indigo” and “Sophisticated Lady” and was living on Sugar Hill.

In 1930, Cab Calloway replaced Ellington’s orchestra at the Cotton Club, where he introduced “Minnie the Moocher” (1930), a song that featured the scat singing which that would become his trademark. Before that he appeared at Harlem’s Savoy Ballroom, as well as in the all-black Broadway revue Connie’s Hot Chocolates. Individuals such as Fats Waller played at rent parties and nightclubs and composed music for shows and revues throughout the 1920s.

The Savoy proved to be a central meeting place, because, unlike the Cotton Club, the Roseland, Connie’s Inn, and numerous other establishments, it did not discriminate against African Americans, and unlike A’Lelia Walker’s Dark Tower, it did not exclude the working classes. A cross section of people came together at the Savoy Ballroom, and many entertainers reaffirmed their allegiance to the black community by performing in black and integrated venues like the Savoy whenever possible. The heterogeneous environment cultivated group creativity; in addition to the musical richness to be found there, many of the dances of the period were invented at the Savoy, including the lindy, black bottom, shimmy, truckin', snakehips, and Suzy Q. After long days of laboring hard for low wages, black people congregated at spaces like the Savoy, and especially in the more intimate places like the jook joints and rent parties, in order to reclaim their humanity. In such places, the cellar clubs and jooks, before a working-class clientele, Ethel Waters performed as a teenager and became known for her shimmy dance. Bill "Bojangles" Robinson showed off his footwork on Lenox Avenue, and in 1918, he premiered at New York's Palace Theater. At this performance, Robinson performed his trademark "stair dance," in which he tap-danced up and down a five-step staircase. The talented tenth may have associated vernacular dances such as these with stereotypical images of the lower classes, and such performances were certainly not regarded as theatrical art, but the dances created and performed in the cabarets and clubs, and at house parties, captured and embodied the optimism and escapism of the time.

If the early history of jazz in Harlem showcases the talent of men, the history of blues during the period puts the spotlight on women. Mamie Smith made the first blues recording by a black singer in 1920. The success of Smith's rendition of "You Can't Keep a Good Man Down" for Okeh records was quickly followed by the release of "Crazy Blues," which became a huge hit. Because of the trend set by Smith, record companies focused on developing the careers of female blues singers in the first decade of the commercialization of blues. During this period the recording industry played a central role in disseminating blues music, producing "race records" to market to an African American audience. Individuals such as Alberta Hunter, Ida Cox, Ethel Waters, Lucille Hegamin, Edith Wilson, Victoria Spivey, Rosa Henderson, Clara Smith, Trixie Smith, and Sippie Wallace all found success singing blues. Audiences could listen to these women singing not only in nightclubs and theaters but also on records, for labels such as Paramount, Columbia, and Black Swan, the only black-owned record company.

African American migrants from the rural South carried blues with them when they came, during the "great migration," to urban centers like Harlem. The recordings of classic blues singers such as Mamie Smith, Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, and Bessie Smith illustrate the extent to which the music reflected the new social realities of its creators. Thus themes such as individual love, sexual and economic independence, alcoholism, drugs, and travel all figure prominently in the lyrics and speak in different ways of their makers' relatively recent emancipation. Moreover, because women blues singers—who came from poor and working-class roots—were assumed to deviate from the norms of appropriate female behavior, their lyrics dealt explicitly with topics such as sexuality that could not be openly explored in the middle-class narratives of most black women writers.

Whereas Ma Rainey recorded most of her songs in Chicago between 1923 and 1928, Bessie Smith was closely identified with Harlem during her recording career. She performed at nightclubs in Harlem and attended and performed at Carl Van Vechten's parties on the West Side, which brought together wealthy white connoisseurs of black culture, black entertainers and intellectuals, and white artists. Van Vechten, a chronicler of the Harlem Renaissance, wrote about and photographed Smith, creating some of the most enduring images of her.

If Smith was regarded as singing a more urbanized blues than Rainey, Ethel Waters was known for a style of blues that was even smoother, more precise, and therefore considered more "sophisticated" than the bluesy vocalizations of Rainey and Smith. Singers affecting this more urbanized style were thought to appeal more to whites, who frequented "sophisticated" cabarets run by mobsters, such as Connie's Inn and the Plantation Inn. Edith Wilson, like Waters, was one such performer. She opened at the Cotton Club in 1925 and also appeared at the Lafayette Theater, the Lincoln Theater, and other New York cabarets in song and comedy skits. Her style was polished and upbeat, and it traveled easily outside African American circles. Wilson also performed in the Broadway hits Shuffle Along and Blackbirds of 1926, among others.

About forty musical shows and revues were produced during the 1920s and 1930s, including Shuffle Along (1921), Chocolate Dandies (1924), Runnin' Wild (1924), and Hot Chocolates (1929). Many of these shows, which featured comedy sketches, singing, dancing, and rent-party skits, were produced in downtown theaters. Harlem did have some influential African American theaters, though. Chief among them was the Lafayette, between 131st Street and 132nd Street on Seventh Avenue. From its opening in 1915, the Lafayette catered to black audiences, often staging plays from Broadway at more affordable prices and tailoring them to suit the taste of the black audience. Its repertoire consisted of a range of plays, such as Othello, Madame X, The Servant in the House, The Count of Monte Cristo, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, and On Trial. The Lafayette was also known to feature wild shows that were memorialized by Arthur P. Davis, Regina Andrews, Arna Bontemps, and Langston Hughes. The company ran successfully and profitably for a dozen years.

W. E. B. Du Bois founded the Krigwa Players' Little Theater in 1926, and this troupe produced more sober fare in the basement of the New York Public Library's 135th Street branch. Du Bois and the playwrights featured by the Krigwa Players strove to produce dramas aimed toward Negro communities and to convey something of the truth of Negro life.

DAPHNE LAMOTHE

See also Blues; Blues: Women Performers; Cotton Club; House-Rent Parties; Jazz; Krigwa Players; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Madame X; Music; Musical Theater; On Trial; 135th Street Library; Renaissance Casino; Roseland Ballroom; Savoy Ballroom; Servant in the House, The; Singers; Van Vechten, Carl; specific entertainers, musicians, singers, and writers

Further Reading

- Collier, James Lincoln. The Making of Jazz: A Comprehensive History. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1978.
- Davis, Angela. Blues Legacies and Black Feminism. New York: Vintage, 1998.
- Floyd, Samuel A. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Greenwood, 1990.
- Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Hill and Wang, 1997. (Originally published 1940.)
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans: A History. New York: Norton, 1971.

Harlem: 4—Housing

Part I

A headline in the New York Herald in December 1905—"Negroes Move Into Harlem"—announced that Harlem was changing. A search for better housing was the basic motivation for the move of African Americans to Harlem before the Harlem Renaissance. This move started in 1904 with the relocation of just a few black families to West 134th Street between Lenox and Fifth avenues.

Harlem had originally been a small, dispersed farming community. Then, in the late 1700s, New York City's wealthy, prominent citizens began to regard it as an ideal location for their estates. With the passage of time, Harlem was considered a suburb of the central city. By the early 1800s, the soil no longer supported farming, and many families had moved to better land. Some black slaves lived in Harlem as early as 1752. Once freed, many continued to live and work as servants in the Harlem area. The Village of Harlem was annexed to the rest of New York in 1873.

Although the building of a train line to Harlem spurred some development in the 1830s, much of Harlem was covered with shantytowns by the start of the Civil War. At the end of the Civil War, three more Harlem-bound elevated train lines were in operation. These in turn spurred development in the 1880s, which resulted in overbuilding that attracted new black residents.

Into this scenario walked the black real estate broker Philip Payton, who bought up five-year leases from white building owners and leased apartments to black tenants, beginning with a building on West 134th Street. White businesses and civic community organizations in Harlem protested against this infusion of black renters and home owners; they urged white owners to hold tight and not sell or rent to blacks. But for landlords who were facing financial ruin, renting to black tenants was too profitable a deal to refuse.

Following the "draft riots" of 1865, in which blacks were a target of violence, many blacks moved from Manhattan to Brooklyn. However, thousands of black families remained in shanties and tenements in two mid-Manhattan areas, known then as the Tenderloin (West Twentieth to West Forty-second or West Fifty-third Street between Sixth and Seventh avenues) and San Juan Hill (West Sixtieth to West Sixty-fourth Street between Tenth and Eleventh avenues). Another riot in 1900 made it easier to consider a move away. At that time, New York had 60,666 black residents.

When plans were announced to clear the area around Thirty-third Street in order to build the original Pennsylvania Station, black residents began to worry about where they would live. Their plight and desperation coincided with the overbuilding that had taken place recently in Harlem. In addition to the black people who moved uptown from lower Manhattan, other blacks who had heard of Harlem or had family or friends already there began coming from the American South and from the Caribbean West Indies.

White flight did not occur seriously until 1920, as blacks started the move west across Lenox Avenue, breaking the color line that this avenue had marked. By 1925, blacks lived from West 110th Street up to West 145th Street. Black churches followed—or sometimes led—their congregations to Harlem. Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church, which before 1911 had been located in the Tenderloin area, bought tenements along West 135th Street to rent apartments to black tenants.

For most of the new residents, the housing in Harlem represented an unprecedented improvement. Civil reformers, for their part, considered improvements in housing vital to overall improvement in the life of the city. Thus, beginning in 1901, they had passed “tenement house laws” that tried to address the worst ills of poorly designed urban dwellings—and of dwellings that had not been designed at all, such as those in the abandoned factory buildings and cellars inhabited by some of the poorest New Yorkers before 1900.

Part II

The housing that existed in Harlem at the time of the renaissance included mansions that had been built as much as a century before the move by blacks to Harlem; row houses, of which some of the finest examples were to be found in Harlem; brick tenements; apartment buildings, some of which were elegant, luxurious elevator buildings comparable to the best in the city; and various alternative kinds of housing. The most prevalent and distinctive form of housing in Harlem was the row house, in which the dominant visible building material was brownstone, limestone, or brick. By the end of the nineteenth century, builders considered tenements and apartment buildings more profitable to build, but African Americans were routinely denied occupancy in some luxury apartment buildings until after this period.

Although many of the early black migrants to Harlem were the wealthiest of the black populace, who could afford the steep rents, they represented just a small fraction of the black residents of New York who moved to Harlem. They were followed by working-class people who could not afford the exorbitant rents found in Harlem. Often, therefore, several families would pool their money and live together as a huge extended family, dividing up the space to suit each nuclear family.

When real estate brokers realized what was happening, they would sometimes divide a building themselves, creating layouts in which each individual occupant got a single room with access to a toilet and cooking facilities on the same floor of the building, or on a nearby floor. Some row houses originally intended for one family were eventually subdivided to provide as many as twenty small rooming units.

Hotels such as the Libya at 149 West 139th Street and the Cecil at 210 West 118th Street represented one short-term alternative form of housing. Another alternative was the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA). The nation's first black YMCA relocated from West Fifty-third Street to West 135th Street. At various times, it was the home of the writers Claude McKay, Langston Hughes, and Ralph Ellison.

Following are some examples of the various forms of housing.

Two mansions are the Morris-Jumel Mansion (1764), a Georgian house that George Washington used as his headquarters in 1776; and Hamilton Grange (1802) on Convent Avenue, a Federal-style house that was built for Alexander Hamilton.

Harlem's best-known row houses are those on Strivers' Row (1891), consisting of 106 luxurious brownstones on West 138th Street and West 139th Street between Seventh and Eighth avenues; they were first leased to African Americans in 1919. Numbers 330 to 336 Convent Avenue (1892) are a colorful array of Queen Anne-style row houses. Astor Row (1880)—a group of twenty-eight three-story brick semiattached houses on West 130th Street with large, graceful wooden porches and large front yards—was built by a son of the Astor family as working-class housing. Hamilton Terrace (1899) was a semiprivate street of three-story row houses. Sylvan Terrace (1882) had wood-sided working-class row houses, on a street that ran through the gardens of the Jumel estate. Numbers 133 to 143 West 122nd Street (1887) were distinctive terra-cotta row houses.

Apartment buildings included the Paul Laurence Dunbar Apartments (1928), built with financing from John D. Rockefeller Jr. as cooperatives for middle-class black families. The complex, which included 511 apartments, had its own savings bank. It was once the home of W. E. B. Du Bois, Countee Cullen, and Paul Robeson.

Graham Court (1901) at Seventh Avenue and 116th Street was built by William Waldorf Astor and was considered the most luxurious apartment building in Harlem; it was first leased to African Americans in 1933. Number 409 Edgecombe (1917), a twelve-story apartment building, was the most popular address in Sugar Hill for black leaders and artists.

The architects of most of the housing that black residents found on arriving in Harlem around 1904 had been hired by speculative developers. Although most of these architects were not well known, a few were among the most notable in New York. The famous firm of McKim, Mead and White (Stanford White, the architect of Pennsylvania Station) led the design of Strivers' Row. William B. Tuthill designed a series of handsome bay-windowed buildings at 4 to 16 West 122nd Street (he went on to design Carnegie Hall). Francis Kimball, who designed row houses on West 122nd Street, also designed one of New York's first high office buildings.

By the time the Harlem Renaissance started, most of the lots in Harlem's grid up to 145th Street were already built up. Thus most of the construction work in this area during the period of the renaissance involved the renovation of existing buildings and the occasional demolition of an existing large house to make way for apartment buildings.

Most architects working in Harlem during this period were not black. However, at least three African American architects were prominent and very productive. Vertner Tandy, who had been trained at Tuskegee and Cornell, was New York's first black registered architect. He and his partner, George W. Foster, one of the first black architects in New Jersey, designed the new Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church on West 134th Street; they also undertook residential projects, including a house for Madame C. J. Walker at 108 to 110 West 35th Street. (Walker, America's first black female millionaire, who made her fortune through the manufacturing and distribution of black hair-care products, also commissioned Tandy to design a thirty-five-room mansion in Westchester County, New York.) John Louis Wilson worked for Tandy in 1924–1926, became the first black architecture graduate of Columbia University in 1928, and was licensed in New York state in 1930. Wilson undertook substantial renovation of dozens of houses during and after the Harlem Renaissance. He is best known as the only black among seven architects who were selected in 1934 to design the Harlem River Houses, a 574-unit redbrick building complex that is recognized as the first newly constructed public housing project in New York City and in the United States.

Part III

By 1932, Harlem, like the rest of the nation, had slumped into the Depression; perhaps 50 percent of the families in Harlem were on welfare. Hard times, of course, impaired people's ability to pay for housing. Even though 60 percent of black women worked (compared with only 20 percent of white women), they still did not make enough to pay rent, or to buy food and clothing for themselves and their children. As early as 1927, according to a survey by the Urban League, 48 percent of families in Harlem were spending more than twice as much of their income for rent as comparable white families. This situation was exacerbated by the Depression. Rent parties, which became popular in Harlem during this period, were a necessity for hundreds of tenants—a way to raise money for the rent that was due on the first of the month. Also, 25 percent of 2,326 renters surveyed had at least one roomer within their space. Evictions became common. Even people in luxury buildings were hit by the Depression: Rockefeller foreclosed on the Dunbar Apartments in 1936.

At the time of the Urban League's report in 1927, real estate in Harlem was firmly in the hands of white absentee landlords. As had been the case before black people came to Harlem, black families looking for better housing were severely restricted by racial discrimination as to where they could move or live. The Harlem Tenants' League was formed in 1928 to fight rigid segregation and the lack of options available to tenants who had been presented with rent increases. The first protest by the Tenants' League was against the expiration of the Emergency Rent Laws, which controlled rent ceilings. The rent strike was one strategy used; such strikes were of limited value, but they did catch the attention of local politicians. By 1934, however, redlining of areas where most residents were black became a standard practice. This policy made it difficult or impossible for blacks and whites to refinance homes they owned in Harlem or to buy homes there.

The decline of housing in Harlem would continue into the late 1960s, when the population decreased drastically, many buildings were left abandoned, and—as a result of tax defaults—the city became the principal owner of residential properties in Harlem. From the 1990s on, though, the renovation of old residential buildings and the construction of new buildings made Harlem a magnet for those in search of what was still fundamentally some of the best housing in Manhattan. Today, remnants of housing from the days of the Harlem Renaissance remain as witnesses to Harlem's most glorious era.

ROBERTA WASHINGTON

See also Afro-American Realty Company; Dunbar Apartments; House-Rent Parties; Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church; Strivers' Row; Sugar Hill

Further Reading

- Adams, Michael Henry. Harlem Lost and Found. New York: Monacelli, 2002.
- Anderson, Jervis. Harlem: The Great Black Way. London: Orbis, 1982.
- Doklart, Andrew S., and Gretchen S. Sorin. Touring Historic Harlem: Four Walking Tours in Northern Manhattan. New York: Oliphant, 1997.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1930.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York, Random House, 1982.
- Mitchell, Melvin L. The Crisis of the African-American Architect: Conflicting Culture of Architecture and (Black) Power. New York: Writer's Advantage, 2003.
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.
- Plunz, Richard. A History of Housing in New York. New York: Columbia University Press, April 1992.

Harlem: 5—Neighborhoods

Negro Harlem's three broad highways form the letter H, Lenox and Seventh Avenues running parallel northwards, united a little above their midpoints by east-and-west 135th Street. . . . These two highways, frontiers of the opposed extreme of dark-skinned social life, are separated by an intermediate any-man's land, across which they communicate chiefly by way of 135th Street. Accordingly 135th Street is the heart and soul of black Harlem; it is common ground, the natural scene of unusual contacts, a region that disregards class. It neutralizes, equilibrates, binds, rescues union out of diversity. (Fisher, 1987)

By the 1920s, Harlem was identified as a "city within a city" (Johnson 1930) and as the "Negro capital of the world" (Locke 1925 / 1968). Migration to Harlem in the early decades of the twentieth century transformed an ethnically mixed community into an almost wholly African American community within a generation. Speculation in property before the construction of the Lenox Avenue subway in the first decade of the century had resulted in large numbers of apartments and not enough tenants. In an effort to protect (and ultimately maximize) profits, buildings were let to African Americans, who subsequently paid higher rents for poorer facilities than tenants in any other part of the city. The landlords got a return on their investment, and Negro Harlem was born. From 1910 to 1920, the African American population expanded by 66 percent (from about 90,000 to 150,000); and from 1920 to 1930, it increased by 115 percent (from about 150,000 to 325,000). The development of this community, as Rudolph Fisher noted, was as internally diversified as it was extraordinary. Outsiders saw Harlem as an entertainment capital characterized by bars, dance halls, and speakeasies; but in reality Harlem was a complex community with distinct neighborhoods organized according to use and class stratification. The descriptions that follow of famous locales that were recognizable by the mid-1920s suggest the class-driven intraracial organization of Harlem.

Lenox Avenue

Lenox Avenue from 125th Street up to around 147th Street represented the center of Harlem's street life, restaurants, and entertainment. In any number of accounts of life in Harlem during this period (such as Fisher's), emerging from the subway at Lenox and 135th Street is cited as the paradigmatic urban experience. Lenox Avenue was associated in the popular imagination with the most notorious aspects of life in Harlem; Fisher depicts it as "the boulevard of the unperfumed; 'rats' they are often termed." In part this was because of the economic conditions affecting housing in the area. Apartments built for a property boom that never happened were let at increasingly exorbitant rents, and tenants made ends meet by subdividing and subletting their space, often many times over. The problems attendant on this overcrowding included poor sanitation, bad services, criminality, and lack of employment opportunities. But the reputation of Lenox as the "low-down" section of Harlem has far more to do with the kinds of services that were offered to Harlemites and to white visitors. As Anderson (1981) describes it, Lenox provided the most famous, the most outrageous, the best-loved, and the most notorious of Harlem's nightspots.

In an era when Harlem was recognized as the nightclub capital of New York, if not of the world, Lenox reigned supreme. To Lenox belonged the Lenox Club at Lenox and 143rd Street, which had a largely African American clientele; the Plantation Inn at 126th Street; and the Savoy Ballroom at 140th Street. The Savoy was the largest dance hall and the most significant mixed-race venue in Harlem; all of the major balls and other events were held there, and it was perhaps best known as the home of the lindy hop. Lenox's most famous nightspot, the Cotton Club, had white audiences only. Its reputation, built on the legendary performances of Cab Calloway and his band, Duke Ellington, Ethel Waters, Lena Horne, and Bill "Bojangles" Robinson, accounted for much of the stereotype of wild after-hours Harlem. The most famous of Harlem's nighttime venues was just off Lenox, on West 133rd Street between Lenox and Seventh avenues. This block had so many nightclubs that it was known as Jungle Alley. Here one could find Tillie's Chicken Shack for after-hours eating, Pod and Jerry's for stride piano from some of Harlem's most famous names, jazz contests at Mexico's, and the cross-dressing "mannish woman" Gladys Bentley singing at the Clam House.

Seventh Avenue

Seventh Avenue, often known as the "great black way," stood for all that was handsome and best about Harlem. It was the widest and most beautiful of Harlem's avenues, with an uninterrupted vista stretching from 125th Street up to 145th Street, and with a median that was given over to plantings of trees and flowers. It too was home to nightclubs and dance halls, including Connie's Inn at Seventh Avenue and 131st Street, which presented cabaret revues with music by Fats Waller and lyrics by Andy Razaf; and Small's Paradise at Seventh and 135th Street. Seventh Avenue was the site of many important theaters, including the Alhambra, the Lafayette, and the Roosevelt. Left-wing magazines such as the Liberator had their offices here, as did the Blyden and the National bookstores, which specialized in African and African American books. Harlem's best hotel, the Teresa, was at the corner of Seventh and 125th Street. The most prestigious churches in Harlem were also located on Seventh Avenue (and a funeral procession up some part of Seventh was a mark of one's social standing).

Seventh Avenue was the prime location for both formal and informal parades. It was the route of parades by many of Harlem's fraternal organizations, protest marches, and celebrations. Parades by Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) and the followers of Father Divine went along Seventh Avenue; and in 1947, there was a parade in honor of the boxer Joe Louis. The Easter parades and Sunday afternoon promenades along Seventh Avenue were famously recorded by James Weldon Johnson; on these occasions, all classes of Harlemites donned their best and most fashionable clothes and came out to stroll: "This was not simply going out for a walk; it is like going out for an adventure" (Johnson 1930).

135th Street

Fisher said that 135th Street was the "common ground" mediating between Seventh and Lenox avenues. In many ways this was the symbolic home of the "New Negro" and the New Negro Renaissance. Here one could find the Harlem Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), where Langston Hughes and other famous figures of the Harlem Renaissance lived for a time. The YMCA also provided rooms for literary groups; at their meetings, one might hear, for example, Hughes or Countee Cullen reading from his recent work. It was, and still is, an imposing landmark in Harlem. Even more important was the 135th Street Library (later renamed the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, after Arthur Schomburg deposited his extensive collection of materials on African Americans and Africa there). This library—which was the Harlem branch of the New York Public Library—provided a locus for many activities associated with the Harlem Renaissance: readings, meetings, and performances as well as research. At one time or another virtually every literary African American of note spent time writing or doing research at the 135th Street Library. In the 1920s and 1930s, the library sponsored and promoted diverse cultural activities by and for residents of Harlem. In the 1930s, it also commissioned for its own walls some of the most famous works of African American visual art—Aaron Douglas's murals Aspects of Negro Life. And 135th Street, as Fisher noted, had the lion's share of a rather more popular form of cultural capital; it was legendary for its barbershops and beauty salons, which were recorded by photographers such as James Van Der Zee and Morgan and Marvin Smith. These shops and salons were an important community space, where information about parties, literary gatherings, and political meetings would be exchanged. They played a crucial role in the development of cultural self-esteem as well as making the fortune of more than one African American.

125th Street

If 135th Street was the locus of literary Harlem, 125th Street was (and to a considerable extent has remained) its commercial hub. At one end of 125th Street there was a stop on the Eighth Avenue elevated railway (another of Harlem's iconic, often photographed gateways); at the other end was a stop on the Lenox Avenue subway. African Americans came to 125th Street later than to the upper portions of Harlem; this street did not have a black majority until the mid-1920s. Once in residence, though, blacks took advantage of the department stores and other commercial outlets available there. Also on 125th Street were the Harlem Opera House, Loew's Victoria, and the Apollo Theater, which became perhaps the most important and most prestigious venue for black entertainment. Success at the Apollo became the sign of having arrived as an African American performer. Louis Armstrong and his orchestra, Billie Holliday, and Ella Fitzgerald all appeared there. Most notably, however, the Apollo was a resolutely populist institution. Its clientele, numbering in the thousands, were ordinary African

Harlem, 125th Street, c. 1915–1920s. (Brown Brothers.)

Americans whose approval or disdain could make or break a performer's reputation.

Sugar Hill and Strivers' Row

Sugar Hill and Strivers' Row were the antithesis of the populism represented by the Apollo Theater. These were two distinct residential areas of Harlem where one found the most desirable town houses and the wealthiest and best-educated African Americans. Strivers' Row consisted of two leafy blocks—138th and 139th streets—between Seventh and Eighth avenues. Its town houses were designed in 1891 by Stanford White, among others, for the developer David H. King Jr and were intended as homes for wealthy white Harlemites. The white clients evaporated as the surrounding areas were taken over by African Americans; and although the two blocks held out for some time against black tenants and owners, they became home to a largely upper-class black coterie by the mid-1920s. Writers such as Wallace Thurman railed against the snobbishness of this community, which was seen as slavishly imitating the white upper classes, and it is true that many of the residents manifested a class prejudice built on intraracial prejudice—nearly all of the residents of Strivers' Row were light-skinned.

Sugar Hill became a neighborhood to aspire to sometime later than Strivers' Row, but its location on a hill overlooking Harlem soon made it a metaphor of the good life for African Americans. It lay roughly between Amsterdam Avenue to the west and Edgecombe Avenue to the east, running northward from 145th Street to 155th Street. Like Strivers' Row, it had once been a white neighborhood, but as wealthy African Americans made inroads into the area, its luxurious brownstones and apartments became the choice of black celebrities, socialites, intellectuals, politicians, civic leaders, and churchmen. The journalist and writer George S. Schuyler, the painters Aaron Douglas and Hale Woodruff, Langston Hughes, Ralph Ellison, A'Lelia Walker, Duke Ellington, Paul Robeson, and Walter White were among those who made Sugar Hill their home.

Harlem Savings Bank at 124 East 125th Street, in the 1920s. (Brown Brothers.)

MARIA BALSHAW

See also Alhambra Theater; Apollo Theater; Cotton Club; Douglas, Aaron; Father Divine; Fisher, Rudolph; Jungle Alley; Lafayette Theater; Liberator, The; Nightlife; 135th Street Library; Savoy Ballroom; Small's Paradise; Strivers' Row; Sugar Hill; Van Der Zee, James; specific entertainers and writers

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1981.
- Fisher, Rudolph. "City of Refuge" and "Blades of Steel." In City of Refuge: The Collected Stories of Rudolph Fisher, ed. John McCluskey Jr. Columbia and London: University of Missouri Press, 1987. ("City of Refuge" originally published 1925; "Blades of Steel" originally published 1928.)
- Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. London, Oxford, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1930. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1991.)
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Locke, Alain. The New Negro. New York: Atheneum, 1968. (Originally published 1925.)
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto—Negro New York, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1963. (See also 2nd ed., 1971.)

Harlem: 6—Public Health

Significant, rapid migration of blacks from the southern United States and the Caribbean before World War I radically changed what had been predominantly Irish, Jewish, and Italian communities in Harlem. This influx of black people—most of whom were poor—took place against a background of racial prejudice supported by pseudoscientific theories of genetic inferiority, social Darwinism, and eugenics. The numbers and the health needs of the population created a severe strain on the medical services available in Harlem. Moreover, two other factors also contributed to inadequate health care: One of these was misperceptions about black culture; the other was the attitude of organized American medicine, which militated against government support for what were considered expensive state-sponsored medical programs. In this context, efforts to integrate the medical staff at Harlem Hospital—the only public facility in the community—and the founding of the Harlem Hospital Nursing School to train black women nurses were important innovations. Nevertheless, the quality and kind of medical services available to the black community were adversely affected by the distribution of funding for health care, by discrimination in the allocation of medical resources and personnel, and by racial prejudice that limited access to professional medical societies and research positions.

During the period of the Harlem Renaissance, most medical care was offered through various fee-for-service providers, including homeopaths, physicians, midwives, pharmacists, and purveyors of folk remedies. Although this range of providers did not differ from those used by European immigrants, poor blacks—as a consequence of both their race and their poverty—relied mostly on folk medicine or became patients at public facilities. Public outpatient facilities soon became inadequate to meet the needs of the black community, a population that increased by more than 300 percent between 1920 and 1932. Inpatient facilities at Harlem Hospital were also consistently unable to meet the demands of the community. Despite efforts by African American physicians who tried to draw attention to public health issues, preventive medicine was rare, poor sanitary conditions were widespread, and infectious diseases proliferated. There was an increased incidence of venereal disease, consumption, malnutrition, heart disease, and substance abuse. Psychiatric services were almost nonexistent and remained so until the founding of the Lafargue Clinic just after World War II.

Moreover, under a "justification for scientific research," many poor and ill-informed blacks became subjects of experiments (such as the infamous Tuskegee study of untreated syphilis), were subjected to unnecessary procedures, or were treated negligently because their complaints were routine or fell outside the scope of research protocols. Middle-class black Harlemites sometimes adopted racial stereotypes, demanding white physicians, or they sought treatment in private clinics owned by blacks; both reactions encouraged a segregated system and deprived public institutions of important political support. For example, these attitudes among the middle class hampered the efforts led by Louis T. Wright, an African American graduate of Harvard Medical School, to integrate black physicians at Harlem Hospital. Another impediment was the attitude of private foundations, such as the Rosenwald Fund, that proposed to strengthen African American medical institutions. These foundations were well meaning, and they did achieve some practical success in funding programs to combat infant mortality, sexually transmitted diseases, and tuberculosis; ironically, however, they slowed the pace of integration and hindered well-trained black physicians from obtaining staff positions at largely white institutions. Instead of creating opportunities for black health care professionals, these foundations helped perpetuate a stereotype of black doctors and nurses as less well trained or less competent.

By 1923, most African American physicians earned their medical degrees at Howard University or Meharry; few blacks gained admittance to the predominantly white medical schools that received the most funding, benefited most from current scientific research, and largely supervised specialist training. There was a shortage of practitioners willing to treat inner-city patients, and so the ratio of black physicians to patient visits fell. The American Medical Association controlled the politics of medicine, although the black National Medical Association worked to raise standards and respect for black physicians. Nationwide, the medical establishment was characterized by “separate and unequal” health care for blacks and whites, and this situation obviously influenced health care in Harlem.

Extreme poverty and social dislocation exposed the need for psychiatric services based in Harlem. An epidemic of juvenile crime, thwarted aspirations, discrimination in housing and employment, and limited educational opportunities created despair; as a result, the black community in Harlem was afflicted by anxiety bordering on neurosis, but there were few openings for black physicians to receive psychiatric training in New York City. In 1946, after having worked for a decade on the project, Fredric Wertham, one of the nation’s most distinguished psychiatrists, organized the Lafargue Clinic in the basement of the parish house of Saint Philip’s Church, with the encouragement and advice of Ralph Ellison, Richard Wright, Earl Brown, Marion Hernandez, and Father Sheldon Hale Bishop. Wertham enlisted and trained a multiracial volunteer staff to establish this mental health clinic, dedicated to alleviating the “free-floating hostility” of many people in Harlem and to understanding the reality of black life in America—a reality shaped by oppression. The clinic, which was named in memory of Karl Marx’s son-in-law Dr. Paul Lafargue (a Cuban-born black French physician, social reformer, and politician), became one of the most noteworthy institutions in the United States, serving the poor and promoting civil rights.

JAMES E. REIBMAN

See also Ellison, Ralph; Harlem Hospital; Saint Philip’s Protestant Episcopal Church; Tuskegee Experiment; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

- Bailey, A. Peter. The Harlem Hospital Story: 100 Years of Struggle against Illness, Racism, and Genocide. Native Sun, 1991.
- Byrd, W. Michael, and Linda A. Clayton. An American Health Dilemma: A Medical History of African Americans and the Problem of Race: Beginnings to 1900. New York and London: Routledge, 2000.
- . An American Health Dilemma: Race, Medicine, and Health Care in the United States, 1900–2000. New York and London: Routledge, 2002.
- Maynard, Aubre de L. Surgeons to the Poor: The Harlem Hospital Story. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1978.
- Myrdal, G. An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy. New York: Harper and Row, 1944.
- Reibman, James E. “Ralph Ellison; Fredric Wertham, M.D.; and the Lafargue Clinic: Civil Rights and Psychiatric Services in Harlem.” Oklahoma City University Law Review, 26(3), Fall 2001, p. 1041.
- Reynolds, P. Preston. “Dr. Louis T. Wright and the NAACP: Pioneers in Hospital Racial Integration.” American Journal of Public Health, 90(6), June 2000, p. 883.

Harlem Community Players

During the 1920s, Harlem was a magnet not only for African American artists but also for many white New Yorkers. Many middle-class Americans attended black vaudeville shows, dramas, and Broadway productions and also expressed great interest in community-based “little theater” groups and amateur dramatic clubs of the day, such as the Harlem Community Players.

In the late 1920s, the Harlem Community Players produced Edward Smith’s drama Release in the Harlem Library Little Theater at the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library. This little theater space had been converted from a lecture room in the basement of the library and was active from the mid-1920s until the mid-1940s. The first resident group to use the Harlem Library Theater was the Krigwa Players, led by W. E. B. Du Bois (the founder of the group) and the artistic director Charles Burroughs.

Such dramatic societies served as a cultural resource for the community. The Lafayette Players, the first theater group in Harlem, was formed in 1916, and there were several other black theater groups during the Harlem Renaissance, such as the Krigwa Players, the Negro Art Theater, the Utopia Players, and the Harlem Community Players. Most of them were small amateur groups that produced classics or melodramas about middle-class life. Many of their plays dealt with black life and were performed by blacks, but had been written by whites.

FELECIA PIGGOTT-McMILLAN

See also Community Theater; Krigwa Players; Lafayette Players; Negro Art Theater; 135th Street Library; Utopia Players

Further Reading

Peterson, Bernard L. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960: A Comprehensive Guide to Early Black Theatre Organizations, Companies, Theatres, and Performing Groups. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life

Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life (1928) was a literary journal edited by Wallace Thurman. He undertook this new publication two years after the demise of Fire!!, a magazine that in its single issue had devoted itself to artistic expression unfettered by racial propaganda. Thurman’s reasons for the new venture—which was intended as a successor to Fire!!—were, first, that black artists in New York had no journal of their own and thus could not reach their primary audience (since few African Americans would consistently buy a white publication just for the sake of contributions by black artists); and, second, that the black editors of The Crisis and Opportunity, according to him, hampered artistic freedom. Thurman envisioned Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life as a way to make up for these deficiencies and give a voice to the young black artist, who was rebelling “against shoddy and sloppy publication methods, . . . against the patronizing attitudes his elders assumed toward him, . . . against their editorial astigmatism and their intolerance of new points of view” (Thurman 1928, 21).

As chief editor, Thurman carefully organized what turned out to be the only issue of Harlem, published in November 1928. He balanced the bohemian pieces of Richard Bruce Nugent, Roy de Coverly, and George W. Little with the more conservative contributions of Alain Locke, Walter White, and George Schuyler. Harlem lacked the fiery spirit of its predecessor, but, appealing to a wider audience and costing only twenty-five cents a copy, it seemed to have a better chance of surviving. During its short existence, it nearly achieved its goal of being “a wholly new type of magazine, one which would give expression to all groups” (Thurman, 21). It included illustrations by Nugent and Aaron Douglas; political advice from White, who was the chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); discussions of theater by Theophilus Lewis and Nugent; poems by Helene Johnson, Alice Dunbar Nelson, and Langston Hughes; and short stories by Hughes, Schuyler, de Coverly, and Little. By presenting so many different opinions and values, Thurman was trying to sever any links between his new magazine and Fire!!, which had been a one-sided affair: “If you are in doubt as to which side of a public argument you agree with—look for both sides in Harlem.” In an editorial, he reassured the reader that Harlem was entering the field “without any preconceived editorial prejudices, without intolerance, without a reformer’s cudgel” (22).

After a single issue, and without having been reviewed in any other periodicals, Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life folded. There are no official records that reveal the specific reasons for its failure, but one explanation might be that the black public lacked interest in literary magazines and was unready to support yet another black periodical. Theophilus Lewis (1932) seems to believe that financial difficulties led to the downfall of the new journal; another, and more probable, cause may have been the poor quality of the material in the first issue.

NIKOLAS HUOT

See also Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; Fire!!; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Helene; Lewis, Theophilus; Locke, Alain; Nelson, Alice Dunbar; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Opportunity; Schuyler, George S.; Thurman, Wallace; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna, ed. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin, ed. Voices from the Harlem Renaissance. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Knopf, 1940.
- Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Maberry Johnson. Propaganda and Aesthetics: The Literary Politics of African-American Magazines in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Lewis, Theophilus. "Wallace Thurman Adores Brown Women Who Have Beauty Mark on Shoulder; Prefers Sherry to Gin." Journal and Guide, 5, 5 March 1932, p. 7.
- Notten, Eleonore van. Wallace Thurman's Harlem Renaissance. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1994.
- Thurman, Wallace. Editorial. Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life, 1(1), November 1928, pp. 21–22.

Harlem General Hospital

Harlem General Hospital emerged from the Harlem Dispensary (1868), a charitable foundation that had been formed to provide medical care for the poor of Harlem. The dispensary not only dealt with immediate medical issues but also became a pioneer in public health efforts against contagious and epidemic diseases. However, it was eclipsed by the foundation of Harlem Hospital on 18 April 1887.

Harlem General Hospital began as a twenty-bed facility; later, it was expanded to fifty-four beds. It was run by the Department of Public Charities and Correction in a rented wooden building at 120th Street and the East River and served as a center for transferring patients to hospitals on Ward's and Randall's islands and as an emergency unit of Bellevue Hospital. Eventually, as a result of a population boom that included a large influx of Negroes, a new Harlem Hospital was built on Lenox Avenue between 136th and 137th streets. This new facility, which had 150 beds, was opened on 13 April 1907. In turn, it became too small, so in 1915 a nurses' wing was opened and an additional 240 beds became available.

In 1917, during World War I, Harlem General Hospital sent a medical unit—which served with distinction—overseas. Also as part of the war effort, the hospital trained army medical personnel, especially in the use of X-ray technology. In 1918, medical students at Fordham University rotated through the hospital, which had been recognized as a teaching hospital. In addition, its professional quality was attested to by the fact that several attending physicians also held positions in other medical faculties in the area.

Military service during World War I created a severe shortage of personnel in city hospitals and enabled black physicians to join the house staff at Fordham and Bellevue hospitals. This precedent provided an impetus for integrating hospitals in New York City. Because Harlem had a large black population that was gaining political power, and because there was evidence that blacks were being treated indifferently and inadequately at Harlem General Hospital, a demand arose to admit Negroes to its house staff. In 1919, Louis T. Wright, who was a veteran and a graduate of the Harvard medical school, was appointed as a provisional clinical assistant visiting surgeon, the lowest rung of the medical staff. Wright's appointment was greeted with discontent by the rest of the medical staff, and it became a cause célèbre in the growing black community of Harlem. As a result of widespread political pressure and a campaign in the black press, abuses suffered by black patients were revealed, as was a predominant racist animus among many white physicians. In 1920, several Negro physicians obtained affiliation with the outpatient staff. In 1925, after additional political and legal pressure, the derogatory designation "provisional" was removed from the appointments of these physicians.

Until 23 January 1923, when the nursing school at Harlem General Hospital opened, black women could be trained only at Lincoln Hospital School for Nurses in the Bronx. When black nurses and nursing students appeared at Harlem General Hospital, many white nurses either resigned or transferred to other hospitals; but a notable exception was Sadie O'Brien, who lent her expertise as first principal of the School of Nursing and as superintendent of nurses for the hospital. The graduates of the nursing school encountered problems when they sought additional training or staff positions at other medical institutions. Finally, in 1937, training became available at Willard Park Hospital for communicable diseases and at Bellevue Hospital for psychiatry.

In 1930, there was a reorganization of the medical staff; this provoked bitterness, and a multiracial group of physicians led by Wright and John Fox Connors emerged. Thereafter, a policy of "full and equal opportunity" based on merit guided the appointments of both black and white physicians. Ties to the community of Harlem were strengthened, and by 1935 the hospital's census was nearly 85 percent black. However, although the hospital was the primary medical facility in Harlem, its outpatient and bed services were inadequate to meet the demands of the community; it faced continual underfunding that strained its resources, and it was also affected by persistent racism.

JAMES E. REIBMAN

See also Harlem: 6—Public Health; Wright, Louis T.

Further Reading

- Bailey, A. Peter. The Harlem Hospital Story: 100 Years of Struggle against Illness, Racism, and Genocide. Native Sun, 1991.
- Linden, Diana L., and Larry A. Greene. "Charles Alston's Harlem Hospital Murals: Cultural Politics in Depression Era Harlem." Prospects, Annual, 26(31), 2001, p. 391.
- Maynard, Aubre de L. Surgeons to the Poor: The Harlem Hospital Story. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1978.
- Reynolds, P. Preston. "Dr. Louis T. Wright and the NAACP: Pioneers in Hospital Racial Integration." American Journal of Public Health, 90(6), June 2000, p. 883.

Harlem Globetrotters

The Harlem Globetrotters were one of two exceptionally talented black professional basketball teams that began playing in the 1920s. At first, the Globetrotters were the less successful of the two teams; the New York Renaissance Five (better known as the New York Rens) were considered the premier black professional squad until the late 1930s, playing before large audiences of both black and white fans. In time, however, the Globetrotters would become one of the best-known sports entertainment franchises not only in the United States but around the world—in part by relying on carefully orchestrated comedy routines during games.

Ironically, the original Harlem Globetrotters were neither from Harlem nor particularly well-traveled. The team was organized in 1927 by a twenty-five-year-old entrepreneur, Abe Saperstein, initially as a splinter squad of another team, the Savoy Big Five, which Saperstein coached in Chicago. Saperstein was a Jewish immigrant who had been born in London; he had realized, in the early 1920s at the University of Illinois, that he was too slight to play varsity sports, and so he had turned to coaching. By the mid-1920s, he was running a successful youth league team called the Chicago Reds. Impressed by his success, a former baseball star in the Negro Leagues—Walter Ball—hired Saperstein in early 1926 to coach an all-black American Legion basketball team. Later in 1926, the business manager of that team persuaded the owners of Chicago's Savoy Ballroom (modeled after the famous Savoy in Harlem) to sponsor evening basketball games, offering Saperstein's unit as the main attraction. The team was renamed the Savoy Big Five and began playing in November 1926. But disappointing crowds, coupled with an intractable salary dispute, led three of the Big Five players and Saperstein to leave the Savoy soon thereafter to form their own team.

This new team was first called Saperstein's New York, then simply New York, then Saperstein's Harlem New York. Although it would not officially be called the Harlem Globetrotters until the mid-1930s, these earlier names also implied cosmopolitanism. That was a deliberate strategy: Saperstein wanted midwestern spectators to think the team had, in his words, "been around" (Zinkoff and Williams 1953, 25). Saperstein also chose a barnstorming schedule rather than staying in Chicago, where he would have had difficulty booking large arenas regularly.

The team—consisting of Walter "Toots" Wright, Byron "Fats" Long, and Willis "Kid" Oliver (the three former members of the Savoy Big Five), plus Andy Washington and Bill Tupelo (who had been newly signed by Saperstein)—played its first game on 7 January 1927, in Hinckley, Illinois. According to Zinkoff and Williams, Saperstein and the players traveled in a secondhand Model T, with Saperstein at the wheel. In these lean early years, Saperstein was simultaneously the team's driver, owner, coach, manager, and trainer, and an on-court substitute when a regular player was injured or fatigued. By the end of the first barnstorming season, the team had a total of 101 wins against only 16 losses, although steady profits were still many years away.

In 1929, Saperstein signed Inman Jackson to replace Andy Washington, signaling a shift from traditional basketball to a mix of serious play and gimmicky clowning. Jackson was the team's first "superclown," the predecessor of such famous later figures as Reece "Goose" Tatum, who joined the Globetrotters in the early 1940s, and Meadowlark Lemon, who arrived in 1954. The comedy routines first made popular by Jackson—which included no-look passing, bouncing the ball off his head into the basket, and lining his teammates up in mock football formations—accomplished three purposes: They entertained the crowd, gave the players a rest (because clowning, although often fast-paced, required less running), and kept the final score close. The score was crucial in getting future bookings: During this era, all such barnstorming teams understood that they should not completely dominate their opponents, although this feat could be easily accomplished by skilled professional athletes. Local fans wanted to believe that their amateur squad had a chance to defeat the professional touring club; otherwise, they would lose interest in staging rematches.

During the 1930s the Globetrotters extended their barnstorming, eventually playing throughout the upper Midwest and even, by the mid-1930s, as far west as Washington state. They were also now beginning to play in larger urban centers, including Detroit, where the Globetrotters often began their season with a game on Thanksgiving Day. The real competition with the New York Rens also began in the 1930s, as the Globetrotters gained a more national reputation. Despite the challenge of constant travel, often on poor roads (a strain exacerbated by the great physical distances between top teams), and the persistent exclusion of black squads from professional leagues, the black teams thrived during the Depression. According to Ashe, "the addition of the Globetrotters enhanced all of black basketball; fans took it more seriously and a sort of intra-racial rivalry began" (1993, 48). Despite their rivalry, or perhaps because of it—Robert Douglas, the owner of the Rens, was said to have resented the Globetrotters' clowning as racially demeaning—the Rens and Globetrotters did not meet on the court until 1939 at the Chicago World Professional Tournament, when they faced each other in the second round. That year, the Rens defeated the Globetrotters 27–23 and went on to win the tournament title. However, the following year, the Globetrotters defeated the Rens in the semifinals and won their own first tourney championship. From 1940 on, Saperstein's team soared in popularity as the Rens declined. Today, the Globetrotters are the franchise best remembered for their association, however nominal, with Harlem.

Early members of the Harlem Globetrotters. Standing, left to right: Abe Saperstein, Toots Wright, Byron Long, Inman Jackson, and William Oliver. Seated: Al Pullins. (Photofest.)

WILLIAM GLEASON

See also Professional Sports and Black Athletes

Further Reading

- Ashe, Arthur R. Jr. A Hard Road to Glory: A History of the African-American Athlete, 1919–1945, rev. ed., Vol. 2. New York: Amistad, 1993.
- Bjarkman, Peter C. The Biographical History of Basketball. Lincolnwood, Ill.: Masters, 2000.
- Henderson, Edwin B. The Black Athlete: Emergence and Arrival. Cornwells Heights, Pa.: Publishers' Agency, 1976.
- Hollander, Zander, ed. The Modern Encyclopedia of Basketball. New York: Four Winds, 1969. (See also rev. ed., 1973.)
- Peterson, Robert W. Pages to Jump Shots: Pro Basketball's Early Years. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Rayl, Susan. "African American Ownership: Bob Douglas and the Rens." In Basketball Jones, ed. Todd Boyd and Kenneth L. Shropshire. New York and London: New York University Press, 2000.

Zinkoff, Dave, and Edgar Williams. Around the World with the Harlem Globetrotters. Philadelphia, Pa.: Macrae Smith, 1953. (An account of the team's silver-anniversary international tour.)

Harlem: Negro Metropolis

Claude McKay's Harlem: Negro Metropolis (1940) is a community study. McKay, taking a cross section of Harlem, provides a profound historical examination of the major movements and figures that affected Harlemites in the 1920s and 1930s. This study is a direct descendant of W. E. B. Du Bois' sociological studies of Philadelphia (1899) and blacks in the North (1901), and of James Weldon Johnson's history of Harlem (1930).

McKay takes a close look at both the famous and the notorious aspects of Harlem's social geography and concludes that Harlem is neither the shining star nor the scourge of urban Negro communities. He focuses primarily on group phenomena, describing activities that bring people together for some common goal or interest. The Marxist approach that he adopts precludes the excessive attention to an intellectual or monied elite so often found in accounts of Harlem in the early twentieth century. McKay's concern is with the life of the masses, and his lively prose makes their exuberance and originality leap off the page. For McKay, religion, individualism, and personal wealth have no intrinsic value; they exist to structure society and, in this case, to allow Harlem to express its public culture. Thus his study is not an organizational history of religious or political movements but rather a social history of ordinary people in which he traces the careers of specific figures.

The opening chapters chronicle Harlem's development into a black neighborhood. McKay describes the origins of sections such as Strivers' Row and Sugar Hill from the acquisition of property to the letting of overpriced rooms, and the mixing of diverse black immigrant groups, races, and classes in Harlem. McKay uses this introductory material to identify Harlem as a sort of melting pot whose challenge was to fit the "Aframerican" minority into American society.

McKay's study of Father Divine is of particular interest. With humor and contempt, McKay discusses the beginnings of Father Divine's mass movement and its inner workings as a religion, a community, a social program, and a real estate enterprise. What McKay finds most notable is Father Divine's system of communal living, sustained by doctrines such as the nonexistence of sex, race, color, and money. Father Divine's followers acquiesced in sexual segregation at home and at work; those who worked turned their earnings over to the organization, while those who were out of work shared the maintenance of its rooming houses. The organization looked out for the health and well-being of its members and also provided ten-cent meals to hundreds of Harlemites every day. Father Divine's followers—an interracial, multiclass group who believed him to be God—had independent churches around the country. McKay characterizes Father Divine as an odd little man who was a brilliant, if mysterious, capitalist.

McKay is also interested in African American occult religion, which he traces to the inherent "magic" of Africa. He describes the practices of occultists as similar to fetishism in Guinea and to West Indian obeah and voodoo. These practitioners met in homes and storefronts, burning incense, oils, and candles and selling various cures and talismans.

Cultists in Harlem were different from the voodooists, psychics, and soothsayers of the occult. They were more like the adherents of Father Divine, following individual leaders who developed, and traded on, a doctrine of themselves based on some form of Christianity. Many of these leaders were attractive and dynamic and had significant influence over the people of Harlem.

McKay also considers various efforts by propertied persons and businesspeople to stimulate black commerce in Harlem. Blacks' move into retail, service, and manufacturing was slow and sparse. Cafeterias, pushcarts, and laundries were representative of the small ventures; larger successful businesses included a Negro doll factory, the Brown Bomber Baking Company, and Madame C. J. Walker's beauty empire. McKay also describes the development of "the numbers"—a gambling game—explaining its complicated operation and appeal. The importance of trust and community in running the numbers in Harlem provided a lesson in black consumerism when outsiders tried to take over the operation. The numbers game promoted the numerology of the occultists, and bootlegging by numbers runners stimulated the entertainment business in Harlem. Speakeasies and clubs provided recreation and social life for blacks, although few of these places were owned by black people. McKay mentions several popular clubs and the bands that played there, noting that cabaret acts were subjected to exploitation and received low pay.

In studying politicians, McKay names Harlemites in city government, education, medicine, and so on from whom political types could be drawn. This elaborate list reveals an infrastructure of professionals who served and supported the community in Harlem. McKay describes the arduous and complex efforts of blacks to infiltrate Tammany Hall, elect officials, and obtain appointive positions in government. In detailing political mobilization, McKay describes community politics between Puerto Ricans, immigrant blacks, and native-born blacks in Harlem. There were elaborate efforts to gain representation in city assemblies, in state government, on the board of education, and in the judiciary; McKay attributes these efforts to the independent spirit stirred up by Marcus Garvey's movement.

McKay describes the development and popularity of Garvey's controversial "back to Africa" movement in the United States in some detail. The account of Garvey's life and exploits indicates that despite his energy and imagination, he lacked organizational ability—a shortcoming that precipitated the failure of the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Still, his movement cultivated racial pride, internationalism, and a sense of the potential of mass politics in black America.

A full third of Harlem: Negro Metropolis is taken up by the final chapter: "Sufi Abdul Hamid and Organized Labor." Hamid, a former cultist, attempted to bring his successful labor campaign—with its slogan "Don't buy where you can't work"—to New York from Chicago. Boycotts and picketing forced local businesses to pay attention to this campaign and actually to hire black clerks and other staff members. Hamid did politicize the notoriously blasé young people of the black middle class, but despite this, his efforts were largely unsuccessful. He and his supporters were wrongfully labeled anti-Semites in the press and were opposed by various groups, including the Communist Party, that were loath to see blacks organizing on their own. Hamid's program to provide service jobs for Harlemites crumbled, and Harlem was left with a dubious legacy of anti-Jewish sentiment. McKay, in describing how black labor activism was thwarted, condemns the role of the Communist Party in the life and politics of Harlem. He believes that the pervasive, although unseen, power of the party was responsible for failures in Negro organizations and labor activism. He particularly notes the negative effect of the party's interracial policies on the Negro community and black political activism within the American social and political structure.

Harlem: Negro Metropolis is enjoyable to read: interesting, amusing, and full of surprising explanations and facts. McKay emphasizes that even though most of the major movements of the 1920s and 1930s failed, they had a lasting constructive effect on Harlemites' political sensibilities and sense of possibilities, and on other black communities; moreover, less organized versions of the various practices and belief systems often survived. Adopting a dry, critical tone throughout, McKay refuses to take his subject too seriously. He emphasizes his own theory of Harlem's status—that Harlem was merely a place in upper Manhattan, New York City, U.S.A., where black people managed to make a living within a complicated racist society.

STEPHANIE L. BATISTE

See also Black Manhattan; Communist Party; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Father Divine; Garveyism; Hamid, Sufi Abdul; Home to Harlem; McKay, Claude; Numbers Racket; Strivers' Row; Sugar Hill; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Walker, Madame C. J.

Further Reading

- Blary, Liliane. "Claude McKay and Black Nationalist Ideologies (1934–1948)." In Myth and Ideology in American Culture, ed. Regis Durand and Michel Fabre. Villeneuve d'Ascq: Université de Lille, 1976.
- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay—Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance: A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- . The Passion of Claude McKay: Selected Poetry and Prose, 1912–1948. New York: Schocken, 1973.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Black North in 1901: A Social Study. New York: Arno, 1969. (Originally published 1901.)
- . The Philadelphia Negro. Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus-Thomson, 1973. (Originally published 1899.)
- Giles, James R. Claude McKay. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1976.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1930.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Timothy, Helen P. "Claude McKay: Individualism and Group Consciousness." In A Celebration of Black and African Writing, ed. Bruce King, Kolawole Ogungbesan, and Iya Abubakar. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1975.

Warren, Stanley. "Claude McKay as an Artist." Negro History Bulletin, 40, 1977, pp. 685–687.

Harlem: Play

Harlem (1929), a drama by Wallace Thurman and William Jourdan Rapp, was chosen as one of the best plays of the 1928–1929 season and was considered one of the most important plays of the Harlem Renaissance era. It was originally called Black Belt and was advertised under that title before its opening. As Harlem, it was first produced on Broadway at the downtown Apollo Theater, where it opened on 20 February 1929. After ninety-three performances, it went on the road; it then returned to Broadway for a short run. Harlem proved successful enough for a second company to produce it.

The plot concerned the devastating effects of adversity on a black family that migrated to Harlem from the South expecting to find a better life but discovered instead a den of debauchery, racketeering, prostitution, drugs, and murder. The play examined, especially, the experiences of a distracted migrant mother who was caught in the whirlpool of life on the streets and was struggling to save herself, her husband, and her children from being submerged.

The original cast of Harlem numbered sixty. It included Inez Clough, Lew Payton, and Isabel Washington, but the revival had a completely different cast. In general, the reviewers thought that the acting was quite realistic. A reviewer for the New York Times also mentioned the intense dramatic appeal of the play, noting its treatment of themes such as love and murder. Another critic mentioned its authenticity, which was a result of its frank portrayal of black life; in fact, Harlem is significant because it dealt with some of the less desirable political and social aspects of the city. Harlem relied to a considerable extent on strong language, and some audience members considered that offensive.

In addition to this play, Thurman wrote several novels that received considerable attention from influential figures of the Harlem Renaissance, including The Blacker the Berry, Infants of the Spring, and The Intern. He also contributed to some of the most popular periodicals of the Harlem Renaissance, such as Fire!!, The Messenger, and The World Tomorrow.

Harlem, scene from the stage production. (Billy Rose Theatre Collection, New York Public Library, New York City. © The New York Public Library / Art Resource, N.Y. Keysheet Box 44, Image 58. Photographer: White Studio, anonymous.)

CARMEN PHELPS

See also Clough, Inez; Thurman, Wallace; Washington, Isabel

Further Reading

The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1930.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Mapp, Edward. Directory of Blacks in the Performing Arts. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1978.

Peterson, Bernard. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.

Harlem Renaissance: 1—Black Critics of

The literary and cultural flowering of the Harlem Renaissance is a source of pride for many African Americans. However, the renaissance has also received its share of skepticism and criticism. Critics charged that the promoters of the Harlem Renaissance had an inflated sense of its significance or had vastly overestimated what arts and letters could achieve; such critics also charged that the renaissance was simply cosmetic or irrelevant, or that the early literature of the renaissance was too elitist and was devoted to proving that black people were just like white people.

One must bear in mind that the Harlem Renaissance passed through at least three phases. Lewis (1979) suggests that its first phase began in 1917 and lasted until 1923. In this period, whites began to take an interest in black life and subjects, and whites dominated publication. In 1917, Ridgely Torrence and Emily Hapgood (who were white) presented three one-act plays with all-black casts: The Rider of Dreams, Simon the Cyrenean, and Granny Maumee. Then, in 1919, came the poem “If We Must Die” by Claude McKay (1889–1948), an immigrant from Jamaica. In 1920, there was a production of The Emperor Jones, by Eugene O’Neill, starring the African American actor Charles Gilpin. Black creative energy was emerging into the open, and in 1922, McKay published a collection of poems, Harlem Shadows, and James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) published The Book of American Negro Poetry. Also in 1922, the white writer Thomas Stribling published a novel, Birthright, about an African American physician, educated at Harvard, who returns to the South and is killed there. In 1923, Boni and Liveright published Cane, by Jean Toomer (1894–1967), a writer whose work had been promoted by Sherwood Anderson. These developments stimulated a desire by African Americans to take a greater role in shaping and controlling their own literary representation. Blacks wanted to write literature about black people rather than passively sitting back and leaving literature about black people to be written by white people.

That desire in turn ushered in the second phase of the Harlem Renaissance, from 1924 to 1926, presided over by Charles Spurgeon Johnson (1893–1956) of the National Urban League and by individuals such as James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) and Walter White (1893–1955) of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In March 1924, Charles Johnson arranged a dinner at the Civic Club in Manhattan, ostensibly to honor the publication of There Is Confusion by Jessie Redmon Fauset (c. 1882–1961). This dinner launched the term “Negro renaissance.” Alain Locke (1885–1954) also played a prominent role at this time. The second phase of the Renaissance was dominated by the optimistic premise that arts and letters could achieve or help achieve a breakthrough in the struggle for racial equality. James Weldon Johnson said the world does not know that a people are great until they produce great literature and art. Literary and cultural achievement would be a means to the end of promoting civil rights. Lewis calls this perspective “civil rights by copyright.” The approach of the Urban League and the NAACP, however, seemed to be based on the idea that in order to “win acceptance” by whites, black people had to prove that they were “just like” elite white people, sharing the same sense of propriety and convention. The result was a genteel literature about prim and proper light-skinned black people who seemed to be plastic imitations of elite whites, or about tragic mulattos struggling with racial ambivalence and the dilemmas of racial identity.

By 1926, the younger generation of African American writers rebelled against the censorship and “control” imposed by the older generation; these younger figures pushed the Harlem Renaissance into its third—populist—phase. The young insurgents reacted against what they perceived as an elitist, condescending view of black life, a view taken by people who were ashamed of the black working class, the ghetto, and the rural South. These younger writers of the renaissance included Claude McKay, Langston Hughes (1902–1967), Wallace Thurman (1902–1934), and Zora Neale Hurston (1891–1960).

Consequently, in discussing the Harlem Renaissance, it is crucial to specify what phase of the renaissance one is referring to. Furthermore, there were at least two different segments of the black community seeking to push or pull the renaissance in the direction they thought it should go: The “talented tenth” pulled in the direction of genteel culture as a means to the end of racial equality, and the young rebels pulled in the populist direction of art for art’s sake. And always, in the background, the publishing companies and the patrons who supplied the fellowships and paid the bills were white—they had their own agendas, too. The result was a complex, many-sided tug-of-war, which gave rise to criticism of the Harlem Renaissance from many different quarters.

The most caustic critic of the Harlem Renaissance was George Schuyler (1895–1977). For the most part, he was criticizing its second phase. From 1923 to 1928, he served on the staff of The Messenger, edited by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen. Schuyler married a white woman from Texas and was an integrationist. For many years he wrote a column called “Views and Reviews” in the Pittsburgh Courier. In June 1926, he published an article in The Nation, called “The Negro-Art Hokum,” ridiculing the pretensions of the renaissance. Schuyler rejected the thesis that there was any distinctive “Negro” culture, seeing “African” music and culture as simply black versions of white American music and culture. Schuyler described the spirituals as merely slave songs based on Protestant hymns and biblical texts. Blues was nothing more than work songs and secular songs of “sorrow and tough luck.” Jazz was but an outgrowth of ragtime. This music reflected the peasantry of the South and a caste of a certain section of the country, but it was foreign to northern Negroes and West Indian Negroes. The music and dancing were no more expressive or characteristic of the Negro race than the music and dancing of Appalachian highlanders or Dalmatian peasants were expressive of the Caucasian race. There was no distinctly African American culture or psychology. The African American was merely a “lampblack Anglo-Saxon.”

Schuyler’s criticism cut two ways. He rejected the idea of a unique African American culture. But he also condemned the apparent need of some Caucasians to write about black Americans merely to suggest that no matter how civilized the African American appeared to be, “it is only necessary to beat a tom-tom or wave a rabbit’s foot and he is ready to strip off his . . . suit, grab a spear and ride off wild-eyed on the back of a crocodile.” In 1931, Schuyler wrote a satire, Black No More, that parodied leading figures of the Harlem Renaissance. In this novel, Dr. Junius Crookman develops a method of turning black people into white people. The National Social Equality League (standing for the NAACP) is horrified because it no longer has a need to exist. The hair-straightening business is pushed to the brink of collapse. Schuyler mocked the preoccupation of W. E. B. Du Bois and the NAACP with the “Negro problem” and suggested that they made a living from continually agitating about the issue of segregation and race. If the issue of race prejudice and discrimination were actually solved, Schuyler seemed to say, the NAACP would go out of business.

Schuyler also mocked the NAACP and the African American writers of the second phase of the Harlem Renaissance for striving so furiously to show that black people were “just like (elite) white people.” Apparently he had Jessie Redmon Fauset’s There Is Confusion (1924) in mind. In 1924, he described an African American fashion show held at Madison Square Garden. He described the crowd as consisting of mostly light-skinned people (“A genuine Negro was conspicuous”). They were doctors, lawyers, undertakers, dentists, members of college fraternities, all well-dressed, orderly, and cultured. He dismissed them as “manikins.” In effect, this polished assemblage of the talented tenth was little more than a black imitation of the white elite. Its great mission was to achieve respectability and present itself as educated, cultivated, and refined. By being as much like the white elite as possible, black people could “prove” that they were worthy of respect and deserving of equality, and that they should be accepted by the white community. This model behavior would also distance them from the stereotype that all black people were loud, vulgar, and ignorant. Schuyler dismissed the debutante balls and glittering social occasions as a make-believe fantasy world.

Schuyler’s observation about the light complexion of much of the African American intelligentsia of the 1920s, and some of the writers of the first and second phases of the Harlem Renaissance, was quite accurate. Jean Toomer, Jessie Fauset, and Nella Larsen (1891–1963) were light-complexioned people of African ancestry, and all three wrote about the dilemmas of mulatto or biracial identity. Toomer was the grandson of P. B. S. Pinchback, the biracial acting governor of Louisiana during Reconstruction. His “prose poem” Cane (1923) explores the theme of the tragic mulatto, caught between two worlds, black and white, and not fitting entirely into either one. The book seems to be a meditation on the meaning of racially mixed identity, or the search for identity, as if the author were trying to find (or understand) an enigmatic part of himself or his past or his ancestry. By 1930, Toomer would renounce his “blackness,” deciding that he was no longer a Negro but “simply an American.” He turned to the mysticism of Georgi Gurdjieff (and perhaps to the hope of a futuristic utopian society beyond race and color). In There Is Confusion (1924), by Jessie Fauset, the main characters are well-born black Philadelphians struggling against racism. Her second novel, Plum Bun (1929), also explores the problems of light-complexioned people who can “pass for white.” Nella Larsen wrote Passing (1929), which directly confronts the choices made by biracial people who are light enough to “pass.” Like Schuyler, many other African Americans ridiculed what they saw as snobbery, elitism, classism, and pretentiousness on the part of the “black bourgeoisie” and some of the early writers of the Harlem Renaissance, as well as the obsession with the theme of mulattos and racial ambivalence.

Many of the critics of the Harlem Renaissance bear a complex relationship to it because they were participants. Thus they criticized some particular aspect or phase of the renaissance. For example, W. E. B. Du Bois initially felt that arts and letters could be used as propaganda, to advance the cause of breaking down negative stereotypes and promoting racial equality. However, Du Bois intensely disliked works such as Nigger Heaven (1926), by the white author and patron of the renaissance Carl Van Vechten. He also hated Claude McKay’s Home to Harlem (1928), which described ghetto life. Du Bois wrote that after reading Home to Harlem he felt “distinctly like needing a bath.” He warned that the renaissance was deteriorating into art without politics, no longer serving the cause of advancing the struggle for racial equality. It ran the risk of sliding into mere decadence and vulgarity. He proclaimed:

Thus all art is propaganda and ever must be, despite the wailing of purists. I stand in utter shamelessness and say that whatever art I have for writing has been used always for propaganda for gaining the right of black people to love and enjoy. I do not care a damn for any art that is not used for propaganda.

Du Bois charged that some whites who praised the Harlem Renaissance had an ulterior motive for doing so: “The recognition accorded to Cullen, Hughes, Fauset, White and others shows that there is no real color line. Keep quiet! Don’t complain! Work! All will be well!” Thus the recognition and acclaim given to the literary movement could be used as proof of “progress” and could therefore be used to deny or minimize the reality of continuing racial oppression. In November 1926, Du Bois asked how the NAACP, as a radical, fighting organization, struggling for the rights of black people to be ordinary human beings, could turn aside to talk about mere art. He asked, “What have we who are slaves and black to do with art?” For Du Bois, art for art’s sake, devoid of political content, was useless and even counterrevolutionary. It was little more than an evasion.

From a very different direction, as early as 1926, younger writers rebelled against the confining strictures and the prim, proper, puritanical conventions of their elders. This rebellion ushered in the third (populist) phase of the Harlem Renaissance. Claude McKay, Langston Hughes, Wallace Thurman, and Zora Neale Hurston were among those who rejected the strategy of “civil rights by copyright” and a literature of genteel, well-mannered, assimilated black people who were “just like” elite white people. The younger writers rejected a literature about “whitewashed” black people who seemed to feel that they were “better” than other black people because they were more “cultured” or lighter in color. The dissidents seem to have reacted viscerally to the hypocritical snobbery and elitism of a class of relatively privileged black people who felt entitled to judge and look down on and feel ashamed of and superior to other black people. After all, was this not precisely what racist whites had done to blacks as a whole for centuries?

Langston Hughes was one of the great populist rebels of the Harlem Renaissance. He defended art for art’s sake. He sought to describe the full range of black life, as it actually was, without shame or apology. Hughes relentlessly ridiculed the illusion that arts and letters would change the cruel realities of racial domination and subordination. In The Big Sea, he said:

Some Harlemites thought the millennium had come. They thought the race problem had at last been solved through Art plus Gladys Bentley. They were sure the New Negro would lead a new life from then on in green pastures of tolerance created by Countee Cullen, Ethel Waters, Claude McKay, Duke Ellington, Bojangles, and Alain Locke.

Furthermore, most blacks hadn’t heard of the Harlem Renaissance, and it hadn’t raised their wages any. Hughes’s most devastating critique is given by the fictional character Oeola, in The Ways of White Folks (1934):

And as for the cultured Negroes who were always saying art would break down color lines, art could save the race and prevent lynchings! “Bunk!” said Oeola. “Ma ma and pa were both artists when it came to making music, and the white folks ran them out of town for being dressed up in Alabama.”

Another defiant critic of “proving how white and proper we can be” was Wallace Thurman. His relationship to the Harlem Renaissance is complex because he was novelist, editor, promoter, and critic all in one. He was a dark-skinned man, from Salt Lake City, Utah. As a novelist, he wrote The Blacker the Berry (1929) and Infants of the Spring (1932). The former explores the taboo subject of color stratification within the black community. The main character of the book is a dark-skinned black woman who is shunned and rejected by light-skinned black people and who struggles to find self-acceptance. The book reveals how color bias has been reproduced within the black community as internalized self-hatred. In November 1926, Thurman also founded and edited a literary magazine called Fire!!, a quarterly “Devoted to the Younger Negro Artists.” As an editor, he was a promoter of a new (third) phase of the Harlem Renaissance. Fire!! included the poems “Elevator Boy” by Langston Hughes, “From the Dark Tower” by Countee Cullen, and “Southern Road” by Helene Johnson. It also included the short story “Sweat” and the play Color Struck by Zora Neale Hurston, and Thurman’s own short story “Cordelia the Crude,” about a young prostitute. The most shocking and sensational entry was “Smoke, Lilies, and Jade,” by Richard Bruce Nugent. Nugent was controversial because he was openly homosexual, and the story describes an encounter between Alex and a man (Beauty) he meets on the street after a party in Greenwich Village. The story is written as if from an intoxicated haze, in which everything blurs together, and Alex’s fiancée (Melva) and Beauty also blur together in Alex’s mind. Readers have interpreted this as androgynous and homoerotic. It certainly scandalized the talented tenth, the guardians of the renaissance.

Thurman deliberately intended to shock traditional sensibilities and social conventions, and to portray all of African American life, warts and all. Thus he included literature about street life, ordinary working people, and sexuality. In November 1928, Thurman tried again with a new magazine; this successor to Fire!! was called Harlem. Thurman symbolizes the revolt of the younger generation against the censorship and snobbery of the older generation. At the same time, class dynamics appear to have been at work: The younger writers identified with the working class and the black urban masses rather than the elite. Thurman’s marriage to Louise Thompson ended in divorce, amid accusations that he was a homosexual. And he was, in fact, an alcoholic. Thurman was a manifold “outsider.” He was from Utah (not the Northeast or South). He was dark, not light. He had not attended one of the historically black colleges that educated the children of the black elite. And he was gay (or bisexual). He seems to have been destined to be one of the great rebels of the renaissance even as he was a significant participant in it. He criticized the elitist, bourgeois wing and the second phase of the renaissance, while advocating a more egalitarian and unapologetic approach.

Like Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston was a member of the populist wing and the third phase of the Harlem Renaissance. She humorously referred to the white patrons and allies of the civil rights movement and the renaissance as “Negrotarians,” and to the writers, artists, and literati as the “niggerati.” She drew inspiration from the rural South and its folklore and dialect. She was not ashamed of what the “highbrow” crowd would consider to be the ignorant, embarrassing, or superstitious folkways of the South.

In the inevitable tug-of-war between generations, time is on the side of youth. The most enduring literary symbol of the Harlem Renaissance is Langston Hughes. He would become the most beloved poet of the period, the poet laureate of the renaissance. In the end, the loving criticism of the rebels prevailed, and it would go on to inspire later generations and the literary awakening of the black arts movement and the black aesthetics of the 1960s.

WAYNE GLASKER

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Larsen, Nella; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Messenger, The; Nation, The; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Pittsburgh Courier; Schuyler, George S.; Talented Tenth; Thurman, Wallace; Toomer, Jean; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston, Jr. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Huggins, Nathan. The Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering, ed. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1979. (With new preface, New York: Penguin, 1997.)
- . The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Wall, Cheryl. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Harlem Renaissance: 2—Black Promoters of Several African Americans, along with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the National Urban League, played a significant role in promoting the Harlem Renaissance. The involvement of African Americans in promoting literature by and about blacks began in earnest in 1924. It had been preceded, in 1923, when Jean Toomer's novel Cane was published by Boni and Liveright. Toomer's work had been promoted by Sherwood Anderson. Thereafter, African Americans consciously sought a greater role in shaping the representation of their own image to the wider public.

One of the foremost African American promoters of the Harlem (or African American) Renaissance was Charles Spurgeon Johnson (1893–1956). He was born in Virginia and earned a Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Chicago in 1918. He came to New York as the director of research for the Urban League in 1921, and in 1923, he began to edit its magazine, Opportunity. In 1924, Johnson sponsored a literary gathering at the Civic Club in Manhattan. The event took place on 21 March 1924, and a week later the New York Herald Tribune referred to it as evidence that America was on the "edge . . . of a Negro renaissance." The idea of a Negro renaissance was born, and Johnson had been a midwife in the process. Beginning in 1925, Opportunity sponsored an annual literary competition, awarding prizes and steering promising talent to publishing houses (which at that time were owned entirely by Caucasians). Johnson compiled information on talented artists and writers who could be recruited and promoted. For example, he encouraged Aaron Douglas (1898–1979), an artist from Kansas, to come to New York. Johnson was one of the great middlemen in the process of linking black talent to white publishers and sponsors from 1924 to 1926. In 1926, Johnson left New York for Fisk University, where he served as chairman of the sociology department, and in 1946, he became the first African American president of Fisk.

The NAACP also sponsored a literary contest and awarded prizes. W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963) was the editor of the NAACP's magazine, The Crisis (beginning in 1910), and Jessie Redmon Fauset (1882–1961) served as literary editor (1919–1926). Fauset had graduated with honors from Cornell and had received an M.A. in French from the University of Pennsylvania. She was one of the first people to recognize the talent of Toomer and Langston Hughes. In 1921, Fauset published Hughes's famous poem "I've Known Rivers" in The Crisis. Funds for the NAACP's literary prize came from Amy Spingarn, the wife of Joel Spingarn. The Spingarn Award, begun in 1915, was not originally for literary, artistic, or creative endeavor, but four of the eight awards given from 1924 to 1931 went to performing artists or writers (Roland Hayes, Charles Chesnutt, the actor Richard B. Harrison, and James Weldon Johnson).

Walter White (1893–1955), the assistant executive director of the NAACP (1918–1930), also promoted the careers of promising writers and actors. For instance, he urged Paul Robeson to give up a career in law to pursue acting. Also, White was a friend of Carl Van Vechten and the publisher Alfred Knopf. Thus he was in a position to commend talented writers to the attention of Knopf. James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938), executive secretary of the NAACP (1920–1930), was another promoter of the Harlem Renaissance. In 1922, he published The Book of American Negro Poetry. He is most famous, perhaps, as the author of the song "Lift Every Voice and Sing" (1900).

The premier promoter of the renaissance was Alain Locke (1885–1954). Locke, a lifelong bachelor, was a graduate of Harvard and the first African American Rhodes scholar (1907–1910). He earned a Ph.D. from Harvard in 1918 and served on the faculty at Howard University beginning in 1912. Locke edited the special edition of Survey Graphic (May 1925) and the anthology The New Negro (1926). As an editor, he was in a unique position to select which authors and works to publish. He is credited with helping to advance the careers of Countee Cullen, Claude McKay, Richmond Barthé, Aaron Douglas, and Langston Hughes, among others. Locke was also influential because of his friendship with Charlotte Osgood Mason ("God-mother"), a wealthy white widow who used her fortune to become a patron of the arts. She was interested in preserving the "purity" of "primitive" peoples and cultures, uncontaminated by the corruption of modern Western civilization. Locke was in a position to recommend gifted writers and artists to Mason, and she could provide them with financial support. She served as benefactor to Langston Hughes, Claude McKay, and Zora Neale Hurston.

Arthur (Arturo) Schomburg (1874–1938) was Puerto Rican, not African American. However, it should be noted that he collected literature, art, and material on Africa and Africans in the new world. Over time he amassed more than 5,000 books, 3,000 manuscripts, and several thousand etchings, drawings, and pamphlets. These items formed the basis of the famous Schomburg Collection.

Perhaps the most ostentatious of the African American promoters of the Harlem Renaissance was A'Lelia Walker (c. 1885–1931), daughter of the millionaire Madam C. J. Walker (who was famous for her hair treatment process and her empire of beauty salons). A'Lelia Walker inherited her mother's estate on the Hudson River and maintained residences on Edgecombe Avenue and 136th Street. Her apartment on Edgecombe Avenue has been described as a combination retreat and pleasure dome, where she threw lavish parties and entertained artists, writers, and dignitaries. Although she did not support the writers and artists financially, no account of the promoters of the renaissance would be complete without her.

Finally, as part of the effort to promote the renaissance, even a “numbers king” in Harlem, Casper Holstein (who came from the Danish West Indies), donated money for Opportunity's literary prizes.

It is crucial to ask, however, what the promoters of the Harlem Renaissance believed they were doing. What were their motives? What ends did they hope to achieve, and what means were they using to reach those ends? Although scholars debate these questions, the writings of some of the “promoters” suggest that they saw the production of “great” literary and cultural work as a way to elevate the status of African Americans and improve the treatment of blacks by the white majority. The individuals who expressed the view that the demonstration of artistic merit would help improve the position of black people within American society are sometimes referred to as the “arts and letters school.” James Weldon Johnson, who had studied literature at Columbia, wrote in The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922):

The final measure of the greatness of all peoples is the amount and standard of the literature and art they have produced. The world does not know that a people are great until that people produces great literature and art. No people that has produced great literature and art has ever been looked upon by the world as distinctly inferior. . . . And nothing will do more to change the mental attitude and raise his status than a demonstration of intellectual parity by the Negro through the production of literature and art.

The African American literary critic Benjamin Brawley expressed to James Weldon Johnson the view that “we have a tremendous opportunity to boost the NAACP, letters, and arts, and anything else that calls attention to our development along the higher lines.” For Brawley, Fauset, Du Bois, and the so-called talented tenth, however, development along the “higher lines” seems to have meant development by the “right type” of African American: the college-educated, white-collar professionals, the middle class, the “bourgeoisie.” It meant activity by black people who were refined, educated, polished, and well-mannered. It probably did not mean the untutored masses—the rural peasantry, the sharecroppers, or the residents of the ghettos and slums.

In praising the ideal of the power of culture to promote the cause of racial equality, Alain Locke proclaimed that African Americans’ “more immediate hope rests in the revaluation by white and black alike of the Negro in terms of his artistic endowments and cultural contributions, past and prospective.” Furthermore, the writers and artists found themselves “acting as the advance guard of the African peoples in their contact with twentieth-century civilization.” In “Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro,” the special number of Survey Graphic (1926), Locke wrote: “Harlem has the same role to play for the New Negro as Dublin has had for the New Ireland or Prague for the New Czechoslovakia.” And W. E. B. Du Bois consistently defended art and literature as “propaganda” that should serve a cause.

Some scholars have interpreted these statements by James Weldon Johnson, Charles S. Johnson, Brawley, Fauset, and Locke as evidence that the promoters of the Harlem Renaissance hoped to achieve a breakthrough in civil rights and use culture for political purposes. They hoped to use culture as a political weapon, as a means to the end of achieving better treatment and conditions for African Americans. Somehow, if only African Americans could “prove” that they were talented human beings with a worthwhile culture, each poem or novel or sculpture would undermine the old images of black people as inherently and immutably ignorant, illiterate, and inferior. If only black people could prove how refined and cultured they could be or were becoming, their works of genius would change white supremacists’ opinions and overturn racial prejudice. Racism would be overturned and broken down by means of displaying the cultural brilliance of Afro-America. Arts and letters would become alternatives to the blocked paths to the voting booth and the workplace. Lewis (1994) describes this approach as “civil rights by copyright.”

At worst, some promoters of the renaissance may have naively fallen into the trap of imagining that if only African Americans could show and prove that they were “just like white people,” could compose sonnets and rhyming couplets, and could create works of subtle beauty and elegance, “white people” would begin to regard them as human beings and not savages whose heathen ancestors swung (naked) through the trees in Africa. If only African Americans exhibited the same manners and “refined” sensibilities as the white elite, and spoke with proper diction and conjugated foreign verbs, Caucasians would abandon racism and begin to accept African Americans as fellow citizens worthy of all the same rights and opportunities as everyone else. This strategy of trying to show that black people could be “just like white people,” and thereby earn respect and win sympathy, would lead some individuals to a quest for assimilation and mindless imitation of the British-American elite and its culture.

Some African American promoters of the Harlem Renaissance had a second motive. They wanted to present positive images of black people. They were concerned that literature about black people was being written by whites. As an equal and opposite reaction, African Americans sought greater control over the literary representation of black people. They felt that black people were better qualified to provide a genuine, authentic, informed account of black life. They believed black people would benefit if they were in a position to present positive images that “uplifted” the race and presented its “best face.” One of the best examples of this perspective is Jessie Redmon Fauset. Describing her expectations of what might come of the renaissance, she wrote: “Here is an audience waiting to hear the truth about us. Let us who are better qualified to present that truth than any white writer, try to do so.” One might add that Fauset’s writing tended to focus on light-complexioned biracial African Americans who were educated and refined, struggling to win “acceptance” in the face of irrational and undeserved hostility from whites.

Charles S. Johnson exemplifies a third (and rather opportunistic) approach toward promoting the Harlem Renaissance. In contrast to those who adopted an uncritical strategy of blind imitation, Johnson perceived that white America, at the time, was taking an unprecedented interest in black America. In 1917, Ridgely Torrence and Emily Hapgood had staged three one-act plays with all-black casts at the Provincetown Playhouse: The Rider of Dreams, Simon the Cyrenean, and Granny Maumee. In 1920, there was a production of The Emperor Jones, by Eugene O’Neill, starring the African American actor Charles Gilpin. In 1922, a white writer, Thomas Stribling (1881–1965), wrote the novel Birthright, about an African American who is a Harvard-educated physician and is killed after his return to the South. In 1923 (as noted previously), Boni and Liveright published Cane, by Jean Toomer, whose work had been championed by Caucasians such as Sherwood Anderson and Waldo Frank. Johnson realized that this interest by Caucasians in African Americans presented an opportunity for African Americans to promote their own agenda. Capitalizing on the interest of white publishers could be a way for African Americans to pursue their own quest for respect, civil rights, and improved opportunities and conditions. Thus the interest of white publishers in using black writers and their culture could be used by African Americans to advance the cause of resisting white supremacy. Johnson realized that the “game” was one of mutual use: use and be used. Far better that each side get something out of the exchange than that the exchange be entirely one-sided. Obviously this exchange was taking place in a context where the relationship of power was very asymmetric.

Some of the African American promoters of the renaissance may have overestimated what culture (arts and letters) could achieve. They may have had an inordinate faith in the power of poetry, novels, and pretty paintings of landscapes and sunsets to combat negative stereotypes about African Americans. Ultimately, some promoters of the renaissance may have expected more from arts and letters than arts and letters could achieve or deliver. There is no substitute for organized struggle, and one cannot realistically expect culture to do the work of politics. Nor will an elite movement be enough. There is no substitute for an organized mass movement, springing up from the grassroots.

But one must be careful not to imagine that all the promoters of the Harlem Renaissance bought into the idea of using arts and letters as an alternative means of advancing the political struggle for racial equality. Wallace Thurman (1902–1934), who was both a participant

(as a novelist and editor) and a promoter, illustrates a fourth approach to the renaissance. This approach may be described as populist. Thurman was one of the enfants terribles of the period. He was dark-skinned; had been born in Salt Lake City, Utah; had attended the University of Utah and the University of Southern California; and had worked at the Los Angeles post office with Arna Bontemps. Leaving California in 1924, he came east and worked with A. Philip Randolph's publication The Messenger. He was also circulation manager of The World Tomorrow, a liberal white monthly. Thurman rejected the bourgeois pretensions and respectability of the black middle class. In 1926, he founded and edited a short-lived journal called Fire!! that included works by Langston Hughes, Richard Bruce Nugent, and Zora Neale Hurston. It shocked the civil rights establishment by including depictions of prostitutes, street life in the ghetto, and even ruminations of an androgynous or bisexual nature. Thurman, whose marriage to Louise Thompson ended in divorce and accusations that he was a homosexual, reflected the views of the younger generation of artists. He rebelled against the elders and their snobbish sense of social convention, and he promoted art for art's sake. His novel The Blacker the Berry (1929) exposed the taboo subject of color stratification within the black community, with lighter-complexioned African Americans ostracizing and looking down on those who were darker. In "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926), Langston Hughes, very much in accord with Thurman's defiant stance, insisted:

We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased, we are glad. If they are not, it doesn't matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too. . . . If colored people are pleased, we are glad. If they are not, their displeasure doesn't matter either.

For inspiration, Thurman and Hughes looked to ordinary black people and to everyday life in the ghetto. Zora Neale Hurston looked to the folklore of the rural South. Thurman, Hughes, Hurston, and others like them represented a phase of the renaissance that refused to worship at the altar of arts and letters as a means to the end of improving racial conditions. They rejected the strategy of "sanitizing" black life and putting only the best foot forward at all times and trying to prove how much black people could mimic the image of (elite) white people. Instead, they articulated the value of self-acceptance as they struggled to combat self-hatred within the black psyche and within the black community.

The Harlem Renaissance was a seed that would grow into a mighty tree, and eventually bring forth much fruit. It was also a stepping-stone or a bridge to—or a foundation for—later developments. It inspired African Americans, giving them a new sense of their own abilities and possibilities, and it helped create a psychological revolution. Only fifty years after the end of slavery, African Americans could take pride in the genius of Du Bois; the poetry of Cullen, McKay, Hughes, and Bontemps; the stories of Toomer, Fauset, Larsen, and Hurston; the art of Aaron Douglas and Palmer Hayden. These achievements, from a people who were supposedly incapable of producing literature or culture, proved that the ideology of inborn, immutable black inferiority was a lie. Although the renaissance is criticized for having been confined to a few (mostly) elite writers, this small cadre dared to raise its voice to defend the honor and aspirations of a despised and victimized people. It is remarkable that an oppressed people managed to produce so much beauty and talent despite the terrorism of lynching, serfdom, sharecropping, and incarceration in the ghettos.

The renaissance is also sometimes criticized as artificial and merely ornamental or cosmetic. After all, it did not change the grim realities of the ghetto, the high rates of infant mortality, or the lower life expectancy of African Americans. It did not raise wages or give jobs to the unemployed. It did not alter the relationship of domination and subordination. The relationship between the black promoters of the Harlem Renaissance, black writers, and the whites who financed them, patronized them, and owned the publishing companies was a decidedly unequal one. However, the renaissance was a stage in the development of a people. It was a rung on a ladder. The miracle is that it happened at all. Whatever its shortcomings, the Harlem Renaissance became a beacon of inspiration whose light illuminated a dark hour and whose legend endures to this very day.

WAYNE GLASKER

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Boni and Liveright; Brawley, Benjamin; Civic Club Dinner, 1924; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Holstein, Casper; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Knopf, Alfred A.; Locke, Alain; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People;

National Urban League; New Negro, The; Opportunity Literary Contests; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Spingarn, Joel; Survey Graphic; Thurman, Wallace; Van Vechten, Carl; Walker, A'Lelia; White, Walter; specific artists and writers

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston, Jr. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Huggins, Nathan. The Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1979. (With new preface, New York: Penguin, 1997.)
- . ed. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Wall, Cheryl. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Harlem Renaissance: 3—Legacy of

Until the early 1970s, most students of the literature of the United States could not have been terribly concerned with the legacy of the New Negro or Harlem Renaissance. They were barely aware of this historical phenomenon, which had extensive implications for all Americans' understanding of culture, citizenship, artistic production, and the intricate ways in which they define one another. But since the 1970s, the Harlem Renaissance has gained prominence in our sense of social, cultural, and literary history, as well as in the college and university curriculum. One can approach the legacy of this movement and period from various angles, and perhaps the best way to gauge the range of possibilities is to recount the reception of the Harlem Renaissance in recent American cultural history.

In the 1970s, when scholars such as Nathan Huggins, James O. Young, Margaret Perry, and Amritjit Singh (the present writer) extended and revised the earlier surveys of the period by Sterling A. Brown, Hugh M. Gloster, and Robert Bone, they were concerned mostly with remedying the absence of the renaissance from books such as Hoffman (1962). Such scholars had hoped to include the Harlem Renaissance in what Van Wyck Brooks, in the 1920s, saw as America's coming-of-age and to link their examination of this historical phenomenon to their new concern with shaping a multiethnic consciousness of American literature—a project we associate today with the beginnings and the impact on our curriculum and pedagogy of organizations such as the College Language Association (CLA), the Society for the Study of Multi-Ethnic Literature of the United States (MELUS), and the National Association of Ethnic Studies (NAES) and with anthologies such as the two-volume Heath Anthology of American Literature (1990). In fact, Huggins (1971), in the first major study of the "black 1920s," regards black Americans' confusion over identity as uniquely American and describes it in the post-World War I context as symbiotic with that of white Americans: "White Americans and white American culture have no more claim to self-confidence than black. . . . Blacks have been essential to white identity (and whites to black). . . . They cannot be understood independently." Huggins notes that "whenever Americans do come of age, they will have gained true insight into themselves" by claiming their interdependence, but he also recognizes that blacks' willingness to be used for the sake of whites' "psychic dependency" defines "deep moral tensions" in American race relations.

Many scholars—notably Cruse (1967)—have argued that the Harlem Renaissance failed at precisely the project it had set out to accomplish: to extend the civil and human rights of African Americans by demonstrating the quality and quantity of their artistic contributions. Cruse, the harshest of the critics, blames the failure of the renaissance to define its own nationalist aesthetic on the "ludicrous" integrationist goals of its protagonists and on its dependence on white institutions. Huggins's seemingly simple statement—near the conclusion of his book—that "the true Negro renaissance awaits Afro-Americans' claiming their patria, their nativity"—militates against his more complex analyses throughout his book of the interrelatedness of black and white identities during the 1920s. In contrast to Cruse, who views the powerlessness and imitativeness of the writers and intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance as a direct consequence of their individualism, Huggins sees their obsession with group identity as a source of debilitating provincialism. Huggins places considerable faith in what he extrapolates as Wallace Thurman's point in Infants of the Spring: "Artistic production was an extremely personal, individualistic thing, not to be turned on or off by nationalism of any kind." Singh (1976) describes Cruse's charges as having been made from the vantage point of the 1960s and 1970s and argues that "the failure or success of any literary movement cannot be directly related to the acceptance or rejection of a well-defined ideology." He finds that the patronage of the black middle class was "as mixed a blessing as the white patronage" and asserts that "the majority of Harlem Renaissance novels did not deal with issues central to the black masses." Baker (1987) notes that Lewis (1987), in focusing on the "tragically wide, ambitious, and delusional striving" of black intellectuals, takes a view of the failures of the renaissance that is contrary to Huggins's. For Lewis, as Baker puts it, "the architects of the Renaissance believed in ultimate victory through the maximizing of the exceptional. They deceived themselves into thinking that race relations in the United States were amenable to the assimilationist patterns of a Latin country."

So until well into the 1980s, the Harlem Renaissance was viewed mostly as an exciting period for the arts—a period that produced many fascinating works of poetry, fiction, music, painting, and sculpture but whose major promoters and participants made remarkably naive arguments about the sociopolitical possibilities of art and had naive expectations for American legal and political institutions. Baker attempted to interpret the period more positively and has been credited by Helbling (1999) and others with moving the discussion of its failure or success to a new plane. Baker sees as inadequate to the (discursive) history of Afro-American modernism any "histories that are assumed in the chronologies of British, Anglo-American, and Irish modernisms." Detecting a distinctively "Afro-American sounding" in the texts and figures of the Harlem Renaissance (his choices include Booker T. Washington, Charles W. Chesnutt, and W. E. B. Du Bois), he offers "what is perhaps sui generis definition of modern Afro-American sound as a function of a specifically Afro-American discursive practice." Hutchinson (1995), attempting to establish the Harlem Renaissance as a successful project, focuses on "interracialism" and underplays the often colonial nature of relations between American whites and blacks in the 1920s. Hutchinson chastises Baker for a lack of historical complexity and suggests that Baker, like Huggins, fails to notice that the writers of the Harlem Renaissance looked more to the "low modernism" of Whitman, Sinclair Lewis, Sandburg, Shaw, and Synge than to the "high modernism" of Eliot, Joyce, Yeats, Stein, or Pound—a point made earlier by Rampersad (1989).

An important aspect of the historiography of the Harlem Renaissance during the 1980s and 1990s is feminist scholarship, which has revised and expanded our sense of the renaissance. Feminist scholars of these decades examined how issues of genre, periodization, class, and gender had been treated earlier, during the 1970s, and also brought to the fore many neglected women writers of the 1920s and 1930s. For example, Hull (1987) argues that women writers are "tyrannized by periodization, the hierarchy of canonical forms, critical rankings of major and minor, and generalizations about literary periods." The new feminist consciousness allowed many black women scholars to offer a fresh, sometimes empathic examination of the challenges faced by women artists of the 1920s and 1930s regarding gender, race, and class. This scholarship is embodied in Hull et al. (1982) and in the cumulative work of dozens of other writers and scholars, such as Alice Walker, Audre Lorde, Mary Helen Washington, Barbara Christian, Henry Louis Gates Jr., Nellie McKay, Toni Morrison, Gloria Naylor, Gayl Jones, Sherley Ann Williams, Hortense Spillers, Cheryl Wall, Hazel Carby, Michael Awkward, Deborah McDowell, Gloria Hull, Thadious Davis, Maureen Honey, Karla Holloway, and Marcy Knopf. Walker, in particular, through essays such as "In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens" and "Looking for Zora" (originally published in the mid-1970s in Ms.), helped establish Zora Neale Hurston as a central figure of the period. Walker argued for a radically new view of black female creativity while recounting her search for Hurston—her life; her grave in the marshes of Eatonville, Florida; and the meaning of her narratives, especially Their Eyes Were Watching God. In these essays, which have inspired scores of other scholars, Walker made the point that Hurston had not received her due from other writers of the Harlem Renaissance or from later critics, primarily because of her strong individuality, her uninterest in becoming either white or bourgeois, and her devotion to black folk culture. Walker noted: "That Hurston held her own literally against the flood of whiteness and maleness that diluted so much other black art of the period in which she worked is a testimony to her genius and her faith." Walker also wrote forewords to Hemenway's biography (1977) and Washington's anthology (1978) of Hurston—two books that brought further attention to Hurston's importance in the Harlem Renaissance.

Since the 1980s, we have benefited immensely not only from the social and cultural histories of the period by Jervis Anderson, Cary Wintz, and David Levering

Lewis but also from the revisionist readings of the “modern” by Houston Baker Jr., James de Jongh, Michael North, Sieglinde Lemke, and others. There is also extensive and still growing new scholarship on music, theater, and the fine arts and on literary and cultural activity away from New York City, as well as several essays on gay and lesbian issues. Smith (1977) presaged much of the work by black feminists, and Nero (1991) took another new direction in African American literary study. Extending the arguments of Smith and Nero to the Harlem Renaissance, many scholars continue to offer important new readings and rereadings of texts and figures. With the availability of previously unpublished writings by Richard Bruce Nugent in Gay Rebel of the Harlem Renaissance (2002) and by Wallace Thurman in The Collective Writings of Wallace Thurman (2003), the interrelated processes of recovery and rereading are likely to accelerate.

The aesthetic legacy of the Harlem Renaissance is indicated best by latter-day understandings of the triangular relationship among the positions taken by Du Bois, Alain Locke, and the younger writers such as Langston Hughes, Thurman, and Hurston, most of whom were associated with the magazine Fire!! (1926). Sharing the optimism of white American cultural pluralists and progressive reformers, Locke recognized that “the conditions that are molding a New Negro are [also] molding a new American attitude.” In terms of art and literature, Locke saw no conflict between being “American” and being “Negro,” but rather an opportunity to enrich both through cultural reciprocity. In a way, Locke was reinterpreting Du Bois’s concept of “double consciousness” for aesthetic and cultural uses, and Locke’s view seems to have had room for many different talents to exist and thrive together. Locke did not see any direct connection between African American artists and the African arts that had influenced the works of many Europeans such as Picasso. For Locke, the most important lesson the Negro artist in the United States could derive from African art was “not cultural inspiration or technical innovations, but the lesson of a classic background, the lesson of discipline, of style, of technical control.” He wanted the younger writers to create a cohesive artistic movement that would—through a responsible and pluralistic exploration of “race”—contribute to Negroes’ struggle for civil equality. Like James Weldon Johnson, Locke stressed the importance of racial expression in African American writing, linking Negroes’ civil rights to their artistic output. And like Charles S. Johnson, he rejected cultural separatism and endorsed a hybrid of black experiences and Euro-American aesthetic forms. Thurman and others often found Locke’s well-intentioned but overbearing views a challenge to their artistic independence, and they were even more vehemently opposed to the programmatic and promotional ideologies of leaders and intellectuals such as Du Bois, Allison Davis, Aubrey Bowser, and Benjamin Brawley. In fact, Thurman’s consuming passion was arguing against the older generation’s insistence on representational didacticism and idealism, which for him was indistinguishable from the bourgeoisie’s obsession with uplift and respectability. Thurman not only wrote more forcefully and persistently than others on these issues, but he also tried to organize the opposition of the younger generation through the publication of Fire!! and Harlem. These two magazines did, as intended, shock the older generation, but for financial reasons neither lasted beyond the first issue.

The central debate of the period—the incidence of racial expression in African American writing and art—is probably best summed up in Schuyler (1926) and Hughes (1926), two articles published in consecutive issues of The Nation, along with some further correspondence from these two authors. Schuyler considers Negro art simply an African phenomenon, rejecting the possibility of any such development among black Americans. He considers spirituals, blues, jazz, and the Charleston not racial expression but “contributions of a caste in a certain section of the country.” Otherwise, in literature, painting, sculpture, and drama, the American Negro has produced hardly anything racially distinctive, because “the Afro-American is merely a lampblack Anglo-Saxon.” Hughes, in turn, finds the taint of self-hatred in Schuyler’s view of black art and culture. In his own essay, Hughes projects a culturally pluralistic view of black art, emphasizing the integrity of the artist. He observes that for most blacks and black artists, “the word white comes to be unconsciously a symbol of all the virtues. It holds for the children beauty, morality, and money.” For Hughes, issues of racial expression converge on the issue of class within the black community. The “low-down folks,” he says, “furnish a wealth of colorful, distinctive material for any artist because they still hold their own individuality in the face of American standardizations. And perhaps these common people will give to the world its truly great Negro artist, the one who is not afraid to be himself.” As a black artist, Hughes welcomes a growing middle-class black audience for his work but regards this audience as a potential threat to his artistic integrity. Using his own poems and Jean Toomer's Cane as examples of the kind of racial expression he approves and cherishes, Hughes asserts his artistic independence of both whites and blacks: "We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. . . . We build our temples for tomorrow, strong as we know how, and we stand on top of the mountain, free within ourselves."

As of the present writing, there had been no serious study of the effect of the Harlem Renaissance on later African American authors. It would appear, though, that what is important for latter-day culture and literature is the New Negro's insistence, in so many spheres, on self-definition, self-expression, and self-determination—a striving after what Locke called "spiritual emancipation." The many debates that took place during the Harlem Renaissance on art and propaganda, representation and identity, assimilation versus militancy, and parochialism versus globalism enriched the perspectives on issues of art, culture, politics, and ideology that have emerged on the African American scene since the 1930s, especially the perspectives offered by Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, and Toni Morrison. In the 1920s, journals such as The Crisis, Opportunity, and The Messenger helped interpret for their growing readership the powerful impact of World War I and the "great migration" on the African American masses. Since the late 1970s, Zora Neale Hurston has received wide recognition for her feminist consciousness. Sharing an interest in issues of class and color with male writers such as McKay, Hughes, Toomer, and Rudolph Fisher, women writers such as Hurston, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Nella Larsen, Dorothy West, Marieta Bonner, and Gwendolyn Bennett—each in her own way—explored female lives and the politics of gender. Today, the women writers of the Harlem Renaissance have become a major literary presence and a source of inspiration. Jean Toomer appears to have been read and admired by most African American writers since the 1920s. Langston Hughes, a major figure of the Harlem Renaissance, continued to support and influence the careers of many black writers until his death in 1967. The renaissance can certainly be credited with initiating discussions on many artistic and cultural concerns of African Americans that have caused heated controversy since the 1960s—such as the treatment of black themes and characters by white writers and the aesthetic criteria for black writing. The novelist John A. Williams has written: "For me . . . the real meaning of the Harlem Renaissance was that it gave us an example, and having had that example, we do not need to make the same mistakes its members made" (Fuller 1970). From comments by Richard Wright and Ralph Ellison, it appears that they learned from the mistakes of their predecessors in the renaissance, especially in being aware of the dangers inherent in gearing their artistic impulses to the needs and demands of a primarily white audience. Also, the many clear-headed pronouncements on race, gender, and art by Hughes, Locke, Hurston, and McKay probably paved the way for Toni Morrison's unabashed rejection of false dichotomies between being a "black" and a "woman" novelist, as well as between being an "American" and a "global" writer.

Later African American writers have perhaps learned more from the failings of the Harlem Renaissance than from its achievements, but by the late 1920s, black authors in the West Indies and Africa were already taking inspiration from the spirit and individual works of the New Negro movement. Léopold Senghor of Senegal and Aimé Césaire of Martinique had read poetry and fiction of the Harlem Renaissance in translation while they were still students at the Sorbonne. Under its influence, these two poets developed their variant concepts of négritude, which, according to them, expressed the unifying essence of black experience and culture throughout the world. These and other African intellectuals such as Sembene Ousmane and Ousmane Soce, who have articulated African nationalism, were inspired by Claude McKay's Banjo. The South African writer Peter Abrahams has written in his autobiography, Tell Freedom, about how, as a teenager at the Bantu Men's Social Center in Johannesburg, he discovered writers of the renaissance such as Claude McKay, Langston Hughes, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Countee Cullen, and W. E. B. Du Bois, and how they gave him hope for the future and faith in "color nationalism." In the 1990s, the Harlem Renaissance began to be seen as an important manifestation of nationalist stirrings in the early twentieth century that led to a fuller postcolonial consciousness in global literature and politics.

Many writers of the Harlem Renaissance who remained active after the 1920s—such as Hughes, Nugent, West, and Arna Bontemps—talked and wrote about the period, but Thurman provided, in his roman à clef Infants of the Spring (1932), the only detailed contemporary account of the movement. This work, a thinly veiled satire on the major figures of the renaissance, presents mediocre artists caught in a web of frivolity and recalcitrance without purpose or privacy, unable to achieve anything worthwhile. Raymond, Thurman's protagonist, is disgusted at attempts to romanticize Harlem and offers a harsh judgment of himself and his colleagues, almost all of whom in his view are warped by either "propaganda" or "decadence." Although many people today would hesitate to accept Thurman's judgment uncritically, Infants of the Spring symbolized a coming-of-age of the renaissance literati. It demonstrated the ability of the movement to evaluate and possibly modify its direction. However, there was little opportunity for Thurman's criticism to be absorbed. The stock market had crashed in 1929, and white Americans' ability to sustain and enjoy the "Negro fad" had been severely hampered. Perhaps, as Ralph Ellison noted, the black writers of the 1920s "had wanted to be fashionable and this insured, even more effectively than the approaching Depression, the failure of the 'New Negro' movement." By the mid-1930s, exotic and genteel novels about black life were no longer popular with publishers and were being attacked by a new breed of black writers and critics. In early 1934, Eugene Saxton, who had handled McKay's work at Harper Brothers, bluntly informed McKay that his popularity had been part of a passing fad. In 1940, Langston Hughes spoke for many when he said of the Harlem Renaissance, "I had a swell time while it lasted. But I thought it wouldn't last long. . . . For how could a large number of people be crazy about Negroes forever?"

If Thurman's assessment is harsh and lopsided, it is equally unfair to evaluate the Harlem Renaissance according to the hindsight of Hughes, Nugent, and McKay—or according to the aesthetic criteria of Du Bois and Brawley or the theoretical constructs and reviews of Locke, who was accused by women writers such as Fauset of maliciously misreading their work. Intense intellectual and artistic activity created fruitful controversy over basic issues relating to art and its appreciation. The racial matrix of artistic expression received serious critical attention, and some later concepts—such as the "black aesthetic"—were prefigured in discussions among renaissance artists. This is an important part of the legacy of the Harlem Renaissance, even though the attitude of many individual artists toward these matters seems to have been characterized by ambivalence and tension, conflicting impulses as well as tentative solutions.

AMRITJIT SINGH

See also Bontemps, Arna; Brawley, Benjamin; Césaire, Aimé; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Ellison, Ralph;

Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life; Harper Brothers; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Infants of the Spring; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Messenger, The; Negritude; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Opportunity; Schuyler, George S.; Senghor, Léopold; Thurman, Wallace; Toomer, Jean; West, Dorothy; Wright, Richard; other specific writers

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. 1987.
- Bone, Robert. The Negro Novel in America. 1958. (Rev. ed. 1965.)
- Bontemps, Arna, ed. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. 1972.
- Cruse, Harold. The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual. 1967.
- Fuller, Hoyt, ed. Black World. November 1970. (Special number on the Harlem Renaissance.)
- Gloster, Hugh. Negro Voices in American Fiction. 1948.
- Helbling, Mark. The Harlem Renaissance: The One and the Many. 1999.
- Hemenway, Robert. Zora Neale Hurston: A Biography. 1977.
- Hoffman, Frederick. The Twenties. 1962.
- Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. 1971.
- Hughes, Langston. "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." Nation, June 1926.
- . The Big Sea. 1940.
- Hull, Gloria. Color, Sex, and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. 1987.
- Hull, Gloria, Patricia Bell Scott, and Barbara Smith, eds. All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, but Some of Us Are Brave. 1982.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. 1987.
- Nero, Charles I. "Toward a Gay Black Aesthetic: Signifying in Contemporary Black Gay Aesthetic." In Brother to Brother: New Writings by Gay Black Men, ed. Essex Hemphill. Boston, Mass.: Alyson, 1991, pp. 229–252.
- Perry, Margaret. Silence to the Drums: A Survey of the Literature of the Harlem Renaissance. 1976.
- Rampersad, Arnold. "Langston Hughes and Approaches to Modernism." In The Harlem Renaissance: Revaluations, ed. Amritjit Singh, William S. Shiver, and Stanley Brodwin. 1989.

- Schuyler, George S. "The Negro-Art Hokum." Nation, June 1926.
- Singh, Amritjit. The Novels of the Harlem Renaissance. 1976.
- Singh, Amritjit, and Daniel M. Scott III, eds. The Collected Writings of Wallace Thurman: A Harlem Renaissance Reader. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2003.
- Smith, Barbara. "Toward a Black Feminist Criticism." In Conditions: Two. 1977, pp. 25–44.
- Thurman, Wallace. Infants of the Spring. 1932. (Reprint, 1992 with foreword by Amritjit Singh.)
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. 1995.
- Washington, Mary Helen, ed. I Love Myself When I Am Laughing. 1978. (Anthology of writings by Zora Neale Hurston.)
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. 1988.
- Wirth, Thomas H., ed. Gay Rebel of the Harlem Renaissance: Selections from the Work of Richard Bruce Nugent. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Young, James O. Black Writers of the Thirties. 1973.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 1—Boston

Many commentators have described Boston as ambivalent toward its black citizens. On the one hand, Crispus Attucks died for American independence there, Phillis Wheatley wrote there, the abolitionist movement thrived there, and some of the nation's most important black writers and thinkers lived there. On the other hand, African Americans in Boston have over the course of centuries faced numerous obstacles to access to housing, education, and jobs. If the history of blacks in Boston is ambiguous, so too is the identity of the black community. On the one hand, the black community in Boston can be identified with a tradition of freedom predating the Civil War and with a level of sophistication rivaling that of any other African American community. On the other hand, this freedom and sophistication characterized a black elite representing only a small part of the community as a whole.

Regardless of its actual size, though, this black elite exerted a considerable influence on black intellectual and cultural life throughout the United States before the Harlem Renaissance. In 1914, Daniels noted that, because of their educational advantages, Boston's black elite in some ways identified more readily with whites than with rank-and-file blacks. And yet in the first two or three decades of the twentieth century, the black upper class in Boston took a step away from identification with whites and began to agitate for real social change. Once this change took place, the black Brahmins of Boston—in the 1910s and 1920s—promoted some of the most progressive elements of African American political thought.

By the first part of the twentieth century, black Boston was moving from its traditional location in the West End (Beacon Hill) and into the South End. During these decades the cultural life of black Boston began to be dominated by social clubs, cultural organizations, and a few individual activists. The network of settlement houses (South End House, Robert Gould Shaw House) that had been developed to celebrate black civic pride and to provide social services was augmented by the work of groups such as the Woman's Era Club (founded in 1892), the Wendell Phillips Club, the Bachbends, Prince's African Masonic temple, and Greek-letter organizations. For example, the Aristo Club (founded in 1924) encouraged the teaching of African American history in the schools and increased educational and cultural opportunities for Boston's youth. At the same time that social groups increased civic-mindedness in Boston's black community, arts and cultural organizations led the way in terms of literature, music, and visual arts. Two of the most prominent—the Boston Literary and Historical Society (1901) and the Saint Mark Musical and Literary Union (1902)—promoted cultural activity and sponsored local writers and performing artists.

The most visible political activist in the early decades of the twentieth century was William Monroe Trotter (1873–1934), who founded the Boston Equal Rights League in 1901—nine years before the establishment of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). W. E. B. Du Bois, who received his Ph.D. from Harvard in 1895, was inspired by Trotter not only in developing the NAACP but also in developing his concept of the "talented tenth" and the New Negro movement. Trotter's newspaper The Guardian was a source of information and black progressive opinion in Boston. In 1903, Trotter and his followers disrupted a speech being delivered by Booker T. Washington. In 1915, Trotter organized a protest campaign against D. W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation. Black Bostonians such as William Henry Lewis, William H. Ferris, Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin, Angelina Weld Grimké, Maria Baldwin, and George Washington Forbes joined Trotter in extending the tradition of black activism in Boston (initiated by Attucks and running through the black abolitionists) into the twentieth century. Boston, then, was the home of an educated black elite that laid a social, cultural, and political foundation for insistence on equality for black citizens.

Art and literature within the black community in Boston took many different and sometimes competing forms. In theatrical circles, figures such as Ralf Coleman and his Negro Repertory Theater made a considerable impression on the community. The play The Rider of Dreams by Ridley Torrence was a great success in February 1927. In dance, Stanley E. Brown, Mildred Davenport, and Jimmy Slyde won national acclaim. The painter Allan Rohan Crite (b. 1910) was one of the most influential visual artists from Boston. Although recognition for Crite was slow in coming, his work—especially in the 1930s and 1940s—documents places and people that made the black community in Boston a thriving and productive cultural center.

The literature that came from Boston tended to be traditional—unlike that of New York (which was often experimental) or that of Chicago (which celebrated the working man). As early as in Wheatley's poetry, decorousness and shapeliness were hallmarks of Boston's literary taste. Boston produced a great many important black literary figures. Besides Wheatley, there were Lucy Terry Prince, the first black poet in the United States; David Walker, author of the famous Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World; and William Wells Brown, the first published black novelist and the author of Clotel (1853).

During the 1920s and 1930s, the main figures associated with Boston were the extremely influential poet and editor William Stanley Braithwaite; the protest writers Pauline Hopkins and Angelina Weld Grimké; and three writers of the younger generation: William Waring Cuney, Helene Johnson, and Dorothy West.

Braithwaite (1878–1962), who was largely self-educated, was a major force in American literature during much of the first half of the twentieth century as a poet and even more as an editor. He published two books of his own lyric poetry—Lyrics of Life and Love (1904) and The House of Falling Leaves (1908)—which adhered to nineteenth-century ideas concerning subject matter and form; and his Anthology of Magazine Verse, a collection of the best magazine poetry of the year, was published annually from 1913 to 1929. These collections brought poetry into American homes and influenced the literary tastes of the public (Braithwaite is especially recognized for bringing Robert Frost into public prominence). Unlike some of his black contemporaries, Braithwaite was reluctant to treat racial experiences in his own poetry or to choose poems with this theme in his anthologies, feeling that such content interfered with the universality of the work and only accentuated the differences between whites and blacks. Braithwaite also published The Book of Elizabethan Verse (1906), The Book of Georgian Verse (1908), The Book of Restoration Verse (1909), the history The Story of the Great War (1919), and The Bewitched Parsonage: The Story of the Brontës (1950), a biography. In his long and illustrious career, he was one of the most influential editors of poetry in the United States. However, he had a tense relationship with many figures of the Harlem Renaissance. Claude McKay writes:

[Braithwaite] said that my poems were good, but that, barring two, any reader could tell the author was a Negro. And because of almost insurmountable prejudice against all things Negro, he said, he would advise me to write and send to magazines only such poems as did not betray my racial identity. . . . So, I thought, that was what Boston made of a colored intellectual.

Although Braithwaite has often been criticized for having no apparent interest in furthering the New Negro movement, it is an error to assume that Braithwaite did not identify with black writing. He served on the board of The Crisis for many years; he was the author of critical essays on black literature ("Some Contemporary Poets of the Negro Race," which appeared in The Crisis in 1919; and "The Negro in American Literature," which appeared in Alain Locke's The New Negro in 1925); and he left at his death an unpublished Anthology of Negro Authors: Prose and Verse.

The poet, playwright, and short-story writer Angelina Weld Grimké (1880–1958) is traditionally read as an adherent of the "black genteel" school of writing; she was raised in a elite family in Boston, and she grew up surrounded by intellectuals and activists. Nevertheless, her writing addresses some crucial themes and issues of her time. In the aftermath of the "red summer" of 1919, when lynchings of blacks rose sharply, her stories “The Closing Door” (1919) and “Goldie” (1920) described lynching in harrowing detail and suggested very little hope for future generations. Her play Rachel (1916) examines the effect of lynching on family members who must live on after the horror of the event. Recently, her diaries have come under scrutiny because they reflect the frustration she felt as a woman who loved women in the early decades of the twentieth century. Her poetry, with its themes of death and unfulfilled love, is read today in light of the details of her life.

A forerunner of Grimké and of many aspects of the Harlem Renaissance, Pauline Hopkins (1859–1930) wrote for The Colored American—one of the first magazines aimed at African Americans. Her articles in the early 1900s and her “magazine novels” were important protest literature in which she addressed problems and issues of race relations that were thought to be unspeakable and were not touched by other journals. She used the form of the romantic novel to explore and challenge prevailing racial and gender representations that were foremost in the minds of middle-class African Americans in the early part of the twentieth century.

The Saturday Evening Quill, published from 1928 to 1930, was a product of Boston’s literary atmosphere that gained recognition among and attracted the interest of writers in Harlem. It was edited by Eugene Gordon, and its contributors included William Waring Cuney, George Reginald Margetson, Florida Ridley, Alvirah Hazzard, Helene Johnson, and Dorothy West. The Quill was a proponent of the New Negro movement. Unlike Braithwaite—but like their counterparts in Harlem—the young black intellectuals who wrote for the Quill wanted to depict racial experience, through which they felt black art distinguished itself and became meaningful for all its readers. Unlike Grimké, these writers were not so much interested in protest as in creating literary expressions of black experiences. In September 1928, in The Crisis, Du Bois praised the Saturday Evening Quill for its interesting content and consistent quality.

The poet William Waring Cuney (1906–1976) attended the New England Conservatory of Music (an institution whose first black student, Rachel Washington, graduated in 1876). While he was at school in Boston, he wrote for the Saturday Evening Quill. He had also attended Lincoln University, where he and Langston Hughes were classmates, and he maintained a friendship with Hughes for decades. Although Cuney’s poetry has been largely overlooked by scholars (his first collection of poems, Puzzles, was published in 1960), he is a minor Harlem renaissance poet deserving of more attention. His poem “No Images” is a compact statement and analysis of the lack of positive racial images in American society.

The short-story writer and novelist Dorothy West (1907–1998) was raised in an upper-middle-class home in Boston. She is known widely for her reminiscences of Harlem in the 1920s and 1930s. West moved to New York in 1927 with her cousin Helene Johnson (1907–1995), and the two women soon became part of a group of younger writers and poets principally centered on Wallace Thurman. Johnson published several poems (including one in the single issue of Fire!) but stopped writing poetry after her marriage in 1933. West, after her arrival in New York, was a member of the cast in the traveling production of DuBose Heyward’s Porgy with Richard Bruce Nugent. West became involved in the film project Black and White and traveled to the Soviet Union with Langston Hughes and others during 1932 and part of 1933.

When she returned to the United States, West became the editor of Challenge: A Literary Quarterly (which later became New Challenge). Like the Saturday Evening Quill, Challenge published younger black poets and writers. Challenge is important, too, as a transition between the Harlem Renaissance and the generation of writers who emerged in the late 1930s and who found fault with the faddishness of the 1920s. The associate editor of the new journal, Richard Wright, would publish his “Blueprint for Negro Writing” in the first issue of New Challenge in 1937. West published her first novel, The Living Is Easy, in 1948. This novel was prized for its characterizations and for its depiction of life among Boston’s upper middle class, and social historians continue to read it as a source of information about the lifestyles of Boston’s black elite. West, who was still alive during the revival of interest in the Harlem Renaissance in the late twentieth century, provided valuable information about the 1920s and 1930s in Harlem and Boston through her letters, interviews, and memoirs. Her papers are a significant source of information about the Harlem Renaissance.

It is estimated that between 1899 and 1936, approximately 145,000 foreign-born blacks came to the United States, and many of them came to Boston. This shift in populations highlighted differences and exacerbated disagreements between native-born blacks and those from other parts of the world—a phenomenon included in many depictions of Harlem by writers of the renaissance, such as Wallace Thurman, Eric Walrond, Rudolph Fisher, Claude McKay, and Langston Hughes. In the early decades of the twentieth century, too, the black community in Boston underwent considerable changes: An influx of immigrants from the South and Midwest (including the young Malcolm X) and from the West Indies and Cape Verde (islands off the coast of west Africa) meant that the community grew quickly and diversified considerably. By the 1920s, Boston's black community was expanding beyond the South End and into Roxbury. The city became a center of entertainment and culture for blacks, with nightclubs like the Storyville Café and the Hi Hat Club.

Diversified by immigration, more extended geographically than before, and no longer focused on the tastes and influence of the black elite, Boston's black community underwent tremendous alterations in the latter half of the twentieth century. Intimately involved with the very beginnings of the United States, the African American community in Boston has faced obstacles with intelligence and creativity. It is indisputable that Boston played a major role in black cultural expression in the years before, during, and after the Harlem Renaissance.

DANIEL M. SCOTT III

See also Black and White; Braithwaite, William Stanley; Challenge; Cuney, Waring; Ferris, William H.; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Guardian, The; Johnson, Helene; Rachel; Saturday Evening Quill; Trotter, William Monroe; West, Dorothy; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

- Braithwaite, William Stanley. The William Stanley Braithwaite Reader, ed. Philip Butcher. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1972.
- Cromwell, Adelaide M. Boston's Black Upper Class: 1750–1950. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1994.
- Daniels, John. In Freedom's Birthplace: A Study of the Boston Negroes. New York: Arno, 1969. (Originally published 1914.)
- Grimké, Angelina Weld. Selected Works of Angelina Weld Grimké, ed. Carolivia Herron. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Hayden, Robert C. African Americans in Boston: More Than 350 Years. Boston, Mass.: Public Library of the City of Boston, 1991.

West, Dorothy. The Living Is Easy. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1948. (Reprint, Old Westbury, N.Y.: Feminist, 1982.)

———. The Richer, the Poorer: Stories, Sketches, Reminiscences. New York: Doubleday, 1995.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 2—California and the West Coast

California, and particularly the West Coast cities of Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Oakland, played an important if generally unrecognized role in the migrations that were fundamental to the New Negro movement. There were significant contributions in many fields, but the most important were in music.

Although African Americans participated in the exploration, conquest, and settlement of the American West, the actual number of blacks there remained relatively small until after the United States entered World War II, when the New Negro movement was mostly over. As late as 1940 San Francisco had about 4,800 blacks (this number rose to 43,500 in 1950), and Oakland had about 8,400 (it had 47,600 in 1950). The largest concentration of blacks in West Coast cities before and during the New Negro movement was in Los Angeles. The black population there generally doubled in each succeeding census, going from about 8,000 in 1910 to more than 64,000 in 1940 (there were 171,000 in 1950). Los Angeles was also the only city on the West Coast in which a clearly defined black neighborhood had developed before World War II. The black population was subjected to formal housing restrictions, limiting it mainly to the vicinity of the Central Avenue business corridor, in the late 1920s.

In addition to the relatively late formation of black neighborhoods, several other features are important for understanding the New Negro movement on the West Coast. Emigration to the West Coast was limited because it was much farther away and more expensive to reach than such cities as Chicago, Kansas City, or New York. The black population was relatively stable, prosperous, and conservative. Residential areas were shared with ethnic Mexicans, whites, and, to a lesser extent, Asians. (Overt racial hostility from whites often focused on ethnic Chinese and Japanese, who outnumbered African Americans in San Francisco, Seattle, and Portland.) Racially mixed schools were the rule. Literacy was more widespread than in black communities in other parts of the United States. Although conditions were far from perfect, cities on the West Coast were seen as relatively less repressive than eastern cities throughout the New Negro period. Nevertheless, opportunities in the arts and literature for African Americans and other minorities were much more limited than opportunities for the white population.

Although this article concentrates on Los Angeles, individual blacks achieved distinction in other places as well from the mid-nineteenth century on. Judge Mifflin Wistar Gibbs, who came to California in 1850, published the first black newspaper in California and later became consul to Madagascar. Nelson Primus (1842–1916) and Grafton Tyler Brown (1841–1918) came to the West and worked as painters. In the New Negro period after World War I, Horace Roscoe Cayton Jr. (1903–1970), son of a newspaper publisher in Seattle and grandson of a U.S. senator, graduated from the University of Washington and studied at the University of Chicago; he became a distinguished sociologist, producing a memoir that eloquently sets forth his personal conflicts as a member of the “talented tenth” (Long Old Road, 1965) as well as important studies of Chicago’s black community. The sculptor Sargent Johnson (1888–1967) was born in Boston but made most of his career in San Francisco, where he created striking modernist figures of African Americans and taught at the California College of Arts and Crafts, important to the training of later generations of black artists. Ralph Bunche (1904–1971) went east from Los Angeles to Harvard and achieved distinction at the United Nations. The architect Paul Revere Williams (1894–1980) was born in Los Angeles and established his own firm there; he designed and built mansions for both white and black movie stars as well as commercial buildings. Wallace Thurman and Arna Bontemps are well-known writers of the Harlem Renaissance who were raised in the West and lived in Los Angeles for significant periods before they migrated eastward to Harlem. (Thurman’s The Blacker the Berry, 1932, set in Los Angeles, satirizes the destructive hierarchy of color he found within the black community there.) William Grant Still (1895–1978) used his Guggenheim fellowship to move permanently to Los Angeles in 1934. Early jazz musicians from New Orleans spent significant time in both San Francisco and Los Angeles. Many popular entertainers found their way to the film colony in Hollywood, where they struggled to maintain their personal integrity despite the white filmmakers’ expectation that they would play stereotyped, often menial roles. Noble Johnson founded the Lincoln Motion Picture Company, one of the earliest and most successful of the black film companies, in 1916, although he abandoned it in 1921 in favor of a more economically viable career as a bit player in stereotyped black and Native American roles. Among the many well-known entertainers who remained in California were the arranger Will Vodery, the actor Clarence Muse, the dancer Bill “Bojangles” Robinson, and the Nicholas brothers.

Artists and writers who remained in the West but were not associated with Hollywood are much less well known. Artists often worked as amateurs and did not receive recognition until the 1960s. For example, Leonard Cooper (b. 1899) worked in Salinas as a painter and music teacher; and Alice Gafford (1886–1981), who had been born in Kansas, was a painter in Los Angeles. The more immediately successful painters Charles White (1918–1979) and Beulah Woodard (1895–1964) spent most of their careers elsewhere, but they had substantial influence, partly as teachers at the Otis Art Institute in Los Angeles.

Mexican art was shown in Los Angeles in major exhibitions in 1923 (the first such exhibit in the United States), and again in 1925 and 1931, and it had both political and aesthetic influence on American artists. Diego Rivera and Jorge Juan Crespo (who taught at the Chouinard Art Institute from 1930 to 1938) were particularly influential. Their politics were far to the left of the generally more conservative black newspaper editors discussed as follows. The Mexican muralists Rivera and José Clemente Orozco executed influential works in San Francisco and at Pomona. Artists in the West were inhibited by a lack of a market for their work and even a lack of galleries for its display; when the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) presented Eugene Burk’s The Slave Mother to the Oakland Museum in 1931, it was a breakthrough for that institution. The various federal relief projects in the 1930s offered some slight change, especially encouraging the production of outdoor and indoor murals. This activity sowed the seeds for the blossoming of black art in the 1960s and later.

Fragmentary runs survive of at least fifteen black newspapers published in Los Angeles, and five published in Oakland, at some point in the 1920s or 1930s. Of the black writers who remained in the West, most that we know about were journalists. The self-educated, pioneering writer Delilah M. Beasley did research for her landmark history of blacks in California for eight years before publishing it in 1919. Later she provided a column, "Activities Among Negroes," for the (white) Oakland Tribune, partly intended as a way to counter the negative stereotypes that were common in the white press. During most of the New Negro period, Charlotta Bass edited the dominant California Eagle, a black weekly published in Los Angeles that dates back to 1879; the surviving run of this paper (from 1914) provides invaluable coverage of black activity in southern California. Flash, a weekly literary magazine that survived for a little more than the year 1929, was edited by the writer Fay M. Jackson, an enterprising and outspoken graduate of the University of Southern California; Jackson later was the Hollywood reporter for the Associated Negro News Service. Harold Bruce Forsythe was the most important writer to emerge in Flash.

Music making was widespread in the black communities. Concert music had a prominent place. In Los Angeles, John S. Gray and William T. Wilkins operated music schools that trained generations of African Americans to read and perform so-called serious music. In 1936, Samuel Browne began teaching at Jefferson Middle School, which trained the generation of black studio musicians who emerged after World War II. There were large choirs in the churches and in the community; Jester Hairston, Hall Johnson, Eva Jessye, Freita Shaw Johnson, and Mrs. A. C. Billbrew (also an organist) were among their directors. Billbrew and Elmer Bartlett were prominent church organists. An independent gospel style developed, replaced after World War II by Thomas A. Dorsey's Chicago gospel style. Concerts and musicales were abundant; the famous tenor Roland Hayes performed in Los Angeles very early in his career—in 1918, before an integrated audience. W. E. B. Du Bois's pageant The Star of Ethiopia, first produced in New York in 1913, was produced at the Hollywood Bowl in 1925. Among other exceptional performers were the pianist Lorenza Jordan-Cole, the violinist Bessie Dones, and the singer Ivan Harold Browning. William Grant Still came to Los Angeles in 1934 (as noted previously) and composed most of his symphonies and all eight of his operas there; other works from his years in Los Angeles include film music, arrangements for radio and television, ballets, and chamber music. Alain Locke wrote to Still about his second symphony in 1937: "It is so strange that nowhere among Negro musicians do you find any really intellectual interest in new works and experimenting." Blacks' involvement with concert music in the New Negro period was vital but was, as Locke's words suggest, already being ignored by most intellectuals. Harold Bruce Forsythe (whom Locke did not know) is an exception. Forsythe's extensive music training and writing skills led him to understand the challenge of expressing the African American experience in terms of so-called classical music.

The best-documented activity in the cities of the West Coast, however, was in jazz. Bert Williams had formed his partnership with George Walker in San Francisco in the 1890s; they reached stardom, bringing the cakewalk to Broadway in 1898. Black musicians from New Orleans and elsewhere found their way to San Francisco, at least by 1908. The so-called Barbary Coast—a few blocks along Pacific Street—became a center for dance music with a New Orleans flavor. The shimmy or shim-me-sha-wobble had originated there as early as 1900. After 1908, in short order, came the turkey trot, bunny hug, chicken glide, Texas Tommy, pony prance, grizzly bear, "and many other varieties of close and semi-acrobatic dancing, which swept the country during the half dozen years that preceded the world war" (Stoddard 1982, 127). Sid Le Protti's So Different Orchestra was the most active performing group on the Barbary Coast, gradually incorporating features of the new style. In San Francisco in 1913, the word "jazz" was first applied to the black dance music that had previously been known as ragtime. (The style was probably somewhere in between what we now think of as ragtime, which had crystallized in 1895, and Dixieland jazz, which emerged in the early 1920s.) A large proportion of the (relatively few) blacks listed as "professionals" in San Francisco in the census of 1910 were musicians and entertainers—an indication of the importance of these performance venues. (Labor unions excluded black workers for most of this period.) When the Barbary Coast was closed down in 1921, some of its musicians emigrated to the Central Avenue area in Los Angeles, which was already a center for black music.

In the relatively conservative atmosphere of Los Angeles, musicians were expected to read music with facility and perform in many styles, because most local musicians and much of the audience had some classical training. Many jazz leaders required their musicians to play from written arrangements. Of the New Orleans musicians who came to Los Angeles, formally trained musicians (many of them Creole) were more successful than the pure improvisers who did not read. Bill Johnson and Ernest Coycault had played in Los Angeles as early as 1908; Coycault remained and Johnson returned in 1912, possibly with Jelly Roll Morton. Freddie Keppard had arrived by 1914, when he formed the Original Creole Band, made up of six musicians from New Orleans. This group was “discovered” while entertaining at a boxing match in Los Angeles and hired to perform on the Pantages vaudeville circuit in that year. For the next four years, the Original Creole Band toured the United States, playing in vaudeville houses and making their version of the New Orleans style (still often called “ragtime”) known to a wide audience. In 1917, Jelly Roll Morton began what turned into a stay of five years, pursuing a variety of business interests as he discovered his forte as a composer and arranger. The trombonist Kid Ory, who arrived in 1919 and also stayed for five years (before joining Louis Armstrong in Chicago), organized a series of recordings on the Sunshine label in 1921. These are usually considered to be the first recordings of instrumental jazz by an African American band; their style is clearly Dixieland.

Several bands and musicians stayed in the Los Angeles area, anchoring the Central Avenue music scene and launching the careers of many well-known musicians. The Spikes Brothers ran a music business on Central Avenue from 1919 that served as a booking agency for black musicians. The black union (Local 767 of the American Federation of Musicians) was eventually integrated into Local 47, expanding opportunities and leading to the end of highly discriminatory pay scales, but this did not happen until 1953. (Black musicians worked for much lower wages than white musicians, whether they played for all-white, all-black, or racially mixed audiences.) One of Reb Spikes’s bands was the Legion Club 45. Other important bandleaders and bands included Mutt Carey, Harry Southard’s Black and Tan Jazz Orchestra, Sonny Clay’s Stompin’ Six, Charlie Lawrence’s Sunnyside Jazz Band, Paul Howard’s Quality Sereaders, Les Hite, and Curtis Mosby’s Dixieland Blue Blowers. Lionel Hampton, who achieved international fame for his vibraphone playing in the late 1930s, got his start as a drummer with Hite, Howard, and Mosby.

With the start of World War II, the black population of Los Angeles soared, bringing further change and a new set of issues. Whether there was a distinct, laid-back “West Coast style” associated with jazz in the years of the New Negro movement is still not clear. What is clear is that, in a lively jazz scene that fostered the early careers of many famous musicians, the groundwork had been laid for the emergence in Los Angeles of cool jazz, such as Miles Davis’s “Birth of Cool,” and postwar rhythm and blues (R&B).

CATHERINE PARSONS SMITH

See also Bontemps, Arna; Forsythe, Harold Bruce; Hayes, Roland; Johnson, Hall; Johnson, Noble; Johnson, Sargent Claude; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Morton, Jelly Roll; Muse, Clarence; Ory, Edward “Kid”; Robinson, Bill “Bojangles”; Still, William Grant; Thurman, Wallace; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”

Further Reading

- Cox, Bette Yarbrough. Central Avenue: Its Rise and Fall (1890–c. 1955), Including the Musical Renaissance of Black Los Angeles. Los Angeles, Calif.: Beem, 1993.
- DjeDje, Jacqueline Cogdell, and Eddie Meadows, eds. California Soul: Music of African Americans in the West. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1998.
- Reed, Tom. The Black Music History of Los Angeles: Its Roots—A Classical Pictorial History of Black Music in Los Angeles from the 1920s to 1970. Los Angeles, Calif.: Black Accent on L.A., n.d. (Published in 1992.)
- Stoddard, Tom. Jazz on the Barbary Coast. Chigwell, Essex: Storyville, 1982.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 3—Chicago and the Midwest

Although the Harlem Renaissance was centered in New York, it helped shape the lives and careers of people in literature, the fine arts, and the performing arts across the country during the 1920s and 1930s. In the Midwest, this was clearly evident among creative artists in Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri as well as other places. The work of these individuals continues to testify to the lively and significant discourse among artists nationwide.

At the turn of the twentieth century, Ohio was home to two giants of African American literature: Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906) and Charles Waddell Chesnutt (1858–1932). Because both men focused on the experiences of African Americans, they served as important role models for many younger, nationalistic writers who would follow their example during the Harlem Renaissance.

Dunbar was the first African American writer to achieve national renown in the modern era. He was a native of Dayton, Ohio, and was the son of former slaves. Dunbar was educated in the public schools of Dayton and became active in literary circles before he had earned his high school diploma. He went on to publish six volumes of poetry, beginning with Oak and Ivy in 1893; and several novels, librettos, and essays. He is probably best remembered—and has been alternately praised by both African Americans and whites—for his “dialect verse,” in poems such as “Little Brown Baby” and “When Malindy Sings.” Through both his dialect poems and his poems in “standard” English (including “Sympathy”—“I know why the caged bird sings”), Dunbar tried to capture the full range of African American experiences.

Chesnutt was a native of Cleveland, Ohio, and in his life and work we also find threads that weave together much of the story of early twentieth-century life among African Americans there and elsewhere. In addition to being a successful writer, Chesnutt was a successful businessman and engaged in benevolent and volunteer work. Because of his honest, forthright portrayal of life “along the color line” and his ability to deal with such controversial subjects as color and class prejudice among well-to-do “colored” Americans, his works were well received by African American and white readers. By the turn of the twentieth century, Chesnutt had several works in print, including The Conjure Woman (1899), The House Behind the Cedars (1900), and The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line (1899). In his fiction, Chesnutt always dealt skillfully with controversial issues, but in real life he exercised caution before publicly supporting radicals who were calling for social, political, or educational reform. Information about his early life suggests that he was well aware of the injustices suffered by African Americans of his day because of their race, and by early adulthood he was well prepared to be a race leader. Most important, Chesnutt—like W. E. B. Du Bois—understood the value and limitations of self-help programs, through his work with the Cleveland Association of Colored Men and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In Cleveland, as across the nation, the NAACP was the primary organization through which African Americans would agitate for social and educational reforms. The NAACP also supported cultural programs during the Harlem Renaissance.

Langston Hughes was an alumnus of Central High School in Cleveland (class of 1920) and a longtime associate of the city’s Karamu House theater. Hughes frequently acknowledged that his writing was influenced by Dunbar and Chesnutt. His early work reflected the nationalistic focus of Dunbar’s poetry; and long after leaving high school, Hughes corresponded with Chesnutt—and with Chesnutt’s daughter and biographer, Helen Chesnutt, who was an educator in Cleveland. Interestingly, Hughes’s poetry was also influenced by the free verse of another midwesterner, Carl Sandburg. Hughes came to New York to enroll in undergraduate courses at Columbia University, and to position himself, as he said, to become an active member of Harlem’s cultural community.

At this time, the work of the composer, lyricist, and bandleader Noble Sissle (1889–1975) was transforming popular entertainment for blacks and whites in Manhattan. Sissle was a native of Indianapolis, Indiana; he moved to Cleveland with his family in 1909 and graduated from Central High School in 1911. As a young man, Sissle formed a very successful songwriting team with Eubie Blake, touring America’s vaudeville circuit and Europe in the 1920s. They were the cowriters of the Broadway musical Shuffle Along (1921), which was a smash hit.

Chicago, Illinois, had a vibrant artistic community during this era, and writers in particular found a great deal of material there. Richard Wright, who moved to Chicago in 1927 (he had been born in Mississippi), experienced his most prolific period of publishing during the “Chicago renaissance” of the 1930s. Strongly influenced by the social, political, and economic movements of his day, he wrote “Blueprint for Negro Writing” (1937), a radical call for African American writers to free themselves from the restrictions imposed by the current dominant literary forms. His other celebrated works include Uncle Tom’s Children (1938) and Native Son (1940).

While working for the Federal Writers’ Project of the Works Progress Administration (WPA), Wright met and befriended Margaret Walker (1915–1998), who was then a student at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois. Walker too went on to become a celebrated writer; she won the Yale Younger Writers’ award in 1942 for her volume of poetry For My People, and she had a long teaching career at the postsecondary level before publishing her novel Jubilee (1966).

The poet and novelist Arna Bontemps (1902–1973) moved to Chicago and joined Wright, Walker, and others in the South Side writers’ group there. While he was living in Chicago, Bontemps completed Black Thunder (1936), Drums at Dusk (1939), and other works. After receiving his master’s degree in library science from the University of Chicago in 1943, Bontemps became librarian at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee.

The African American community in South Side Chicago also provided many performance opportunities for budding and established musicians. In the 1930s, blues and jazz artists such as Louis Armstrong, Duke Ellington, and Billie Holiday, and the modern dancer Katherine Dunham, performed before enthusiastic crowds of recent migrants to the city; they also took their music to St. Louis.

In addition to these secular forms of African American music, Chicago was a center for some of the nation's most important sacred music. The gospel vocalist Mahalia Jackson and the composer-pianist Thomas Andrew Dorsey (the "father of gospel music") are examples. Jackson and Dorsey were both pioneering artists in a tradition known as gospel-blues—sacred music with secular influences. The presence of secular elements in Dorsey's music is not surprising: He was a former pianist for the blues singer Gertrude "Ma" Rainey. With support from the local Baptist churches and others belonging to the National Baptist Convention, Dorsey established a broad base of support for his choral music and eventually, in 1932, founded the National Convention of Gospel Choirs and Choruses.

In addition to organizations within and outside the religious and artistic communities, individual patronage and philanthropy were important sources of support for activities of the renaissance in the Midwest. One philanthropist was the entrepreneur and self-made millionaire Madame C. J. Walker, who established a phenomenally successful hair-care business in St. Louis and later Indianapolis. Until her death in 1919, she supported African American educational programs championed by Booker T. Washington and Mary McLeod Bethune, and the activities of the National Association of Colored Women. After Walker's death, the national headquarters of the family business was established in Indianapolis. Walker's daughter A'Lelia Walker, who had a home in New York, used the family fortune to become a popular patron of the African American arts community. She was the hostess of the short-lived "Dark Tower" gatherings, where literati, book lovers, and others engaged in numerous multicultural social exchanges in 1927 and 1928. Langston Hughes called A'Lelia Walker the "joy-goddess of Harlem's 1920s."

With the onset of the Great Depression in 1929, many sources of financial patronage dried up, but public arts programs—especially the Federal Arts Program, which was part of the New Deal—encouraged creative artists to continue working.

With few exceptions, most of the "younger Negro artists" described in Langston Hughes's essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926) would not live to see the black arts movement of the 1960s and 1970s. Nevertheless, their legacy would live on in Harlem, Chicago, Cleveland, and other African American population centers and artistic communities.

REGENNIA N. WILLIAMS

See also Armstrong, Louis; Blake, Eubie; Bontemps, Arna; Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Ellington, Duke; Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 4—Cleveland; Holiday, Billie; Hughes, Langston; Karamu House; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble; Walker, Madame C. J.; Walker, Margaret; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

- Bundles, A'Lelia. On Her Own Ground: The Life and Times of Madam C. J. Walker. New York: Scribner, 2001.
- Gates, Henry Louis Jr., et al., eds. The Norton Anthology of African American Literature. New York: Norton, 1997.
- Grabowski, John J., and David D. Van Tassel. The Dictionary of Cleveland Biography. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.
- Hine, Darlene Clark, et al. The African American Odyssey. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2003.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1986. (Reprint.)
- Kramer, Victor A., ed. The Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined. New York: AMS, 1987.
- Lewis, David Levering, ed. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Viking Penguin, 1994.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Rampersad, Arnold, and David Roessel, eds. The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes. New York: Knopf, 1995.
- Wintz, Cary D. The Harlem Renaissance: A History and an Anthology. Maplecrest, N.Y.: Brandywine, 2003.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 4—Cleveland

The stage was set for the development of the arts in Cleveland as early as 1883, when Charles Waddell Chesnutt—who is considered the first African American writer of fiction—settled there. Several artists in a variety of genres followed him, including the poet Langston Hughes.

Chesnutt was born in Cleveland. As a child, he moved to Fayetteville, North Carolina, with his parents; but as a young man he returned to Cleveland, passed his bar examination, and opened a court reporting business. Writing was his first love, and he developed into a recognized author of short stories and novels, publishing in the prestigious Atlantic Monthly. Chesnutt became a member of Booker T. Washington's "committee of twelve" in 1905 and helped establish the Playhouse Settlement when it came to Cleveland in 1914. Chesnutt's daughter, Helen, was Langston Hughes's English teacher at Central High School in Cleveland.

Russell Wesley Jelliffe and Rowena Woodham Jelliffe, who were associated with the settlement house movement of the 1920s, and particularly with Karamu House, had a profound impact on the arts in Cleveland; in the early twentieth century, black arts in Cleveland and the Karamu Theater were virtually synonymous. The Jelliffes had graduated from Oberlin College in 1910 and had undertaken graduate study in sociology at the University of Chicago. They did fieldwork at Chicago Commons, a local settlement house where they lived, as well as at Jane Addams's Hull House. In 1914, as newlyweds who had recently completed their master's degrees, they moved to Cleveland to conduct a survey and remained there. Significantly, at about that time—1915—Cleveland's Negro population included eight doctors, three dentists, two nurses with professional training, twelve lawyers, and thirty teachers, who contributed to a cultural milieu in which the arts could be introduced and could thrive.

P. Dudley Allen and the Second Presbyterian Church Men's Club provided seed money to establish a center for activities and recreation for the expanding African American population in the Central Avenue district, known also as the "Roaring Third." The center was incorporated in 1917 as the Playhouse Settlement Neighborhood Association and would become known, nationwide, as Karamu House. Karamu has been described as the nation's oldest multiracial metropolitan center for the arts, the outstanding Negro community theater in America, the oldest and best organization of colored actors in America, and the country's first interracial theater.

In Karamu's early days, most of its activities were geared toward children and the assimilation of new immigrants to the city. The Playhouse Settlement was dedicated to helping all racial groups, but more blacks than others were settling in the neighborhood: In 1910, African Americans were 1.5 percent of the population of Cleveland; a decade later, they were 4.3 percent. Although Rowena Jelliffe aimed her arts program toward youngsters, a few young adults were soon drawn to the theater. The adult theater began as an informal group for reading and discussing plays but soon began performing onstage as the Dumas Players (named after Alexandre Dumas père and fils). Their first production was The Little Stone House, performed at Cleveland's Central High School in the autumn of 1921, and subsequently in nearby Oberlin.

The Dumas Players were not the only amateur black theater group in Cleveland in the 1920s. The Aldridge Players were formed through the Phillis Wheatley Association, and other groups were formed through the Cleveland Association of Colored Men, the Council of Women, and churches. Specific groups such as the Federal Theater and the Robeson Players, Harrison and Taylor Players, Vagabond Players, Charity Players, and Richard B. Harrison Players were active at various times during that period and later.

There was some dispute concerning the Dumas Players. For one thing, settlement houses in white neighborhoods tended to discriminate against blacks; for another, some blacks protested vehemently against the works the Dumas Players chose to perform. There were objections because works by white playwrights were being presented almost exclusively (this controversy began with a production of Stevedore); and more serious dissent developed in the spring of 1922, when Charles Gilpin, manager of the Lafayette Theater in Harlem, came to Cleveland to appear in The Emperor Jones. Harry C. Smith, editor of the Negro weekly the Cleveland Gazette, praised Gilpin's acting but attacked the play; he also attacked the Jelliffes, who were white. The Dumas Players were not swayed by Smith's review and in fact invited Gilpin to their rehearsal of Wolves by John Jay Bell. Gilpin's encouraging words and the $50 he donated for future scholarships inspired the group to change their name to the Gilpin Players. Smith continued his attacks even after works by black playwrights were performed.

In 1927, some members of the Gilpin Players decided to change their name again, this time to Karamu, a Swahili word meaning "a place of joyful gathering." This name reflected the group's interest in Africa and seemed appropriate for an organization in the heart of Cleveland's black community; also, it was in accordance with the philosophy of Alain Locke, who was encouraging American Negroes to reflect on their heritage. With the new name came a more intense focus on performing plays by African Americans, notably those of Langston Hughes, who was by then emerging as a luminary in Cleveland and who lived around the corner from Karamu. It is worth mentioning here that Hughes's experiences at Central High School had been very important to his early artistic development: He had been encouraged in grammar and literature by Helen Chesnutt and Ethel Weimer, and in art by Clara Dieke. Hughes had talent for the visual arts, and at the Playhouse Settlement he taught lettering and block prints to youngsters.

Most of Hughes's plays were previewed during the 1930s at the Karamu Theater; and his farce Joy to My Soul, set in Cleveland, had its world premiere there on April Fool's Day 1937. Silver (1961) notes that Joy to My Soul received mixed reviews, being described variously as "rollicking," "amusing," "lusty, lightly diverting burlesque," "boisterously slangy," "not Hughes at his best," and "the finest by Hughes." New York was the site of the world premiere of Hughes's Mulatto (an outgrowth of a poem with the same title), but he had first offered it to Karamu. The actors were busy with productions in other cities, and it was put off until 1939. Controversy arose when Mulatto opened in New York, and although Hughes thought that using the original version for the production in Cleveland would dispel the criticism, it did not. The play aroused such intense anger that the theater was destroyed by arson on 22 October 1939—but the Karamu and the Jelliffes carried on.

According to Silver, "Mulatto was the end of the Langston Hughes 'decade,' but not the end of his 'era.' He remains the 'king' of Karamu playwrights, with more of his works produced there than those of any other writer." During Hughes's lifetime, the mutual admiration between him, Karamu, and Cleveland was very evident. Western Reserve University gave Hughes an honorary doctorate in 1964. Hughes, for his part, said that the Karamu was "immensely valuable" both to him and to the community, and he wrote glowingly about the theater on several occasions. Also, in his autobiography, The Big Sea (1940), Hughes acknowledged Charles Chesnutt's influence, calling Chesnutt "my fellow Clevelander." On the centenary of Hughes's birth in 2002, Cleveland held a citywide celebration in his honor.

Two of Hughes's students in printmaking at Karamu were Hughie Lee-Smith and Charles Sallee Jr. In 1934, the Karamu Theater set aside a substantial amount of money to establish an Art Scholarship Fund for a Karamu student to attend the Cleveland School of Art (later the Cleveland Institute of Art). Sallee was the first winner and Lee-Smith the second. Lee-Smith and Sallee organized a group known as the Karamu Artists and were praised by James A. Porter in his landmark book Modern Negro Art. Porter wrote that Sallee was "the leader of a powerful group of artists that would make a difference in the quality of WPA prints." The group, of course, exhibited at Karamu House; they also exhibited at other venues in Cleveland, and eventually on tour. When their show opened in New York at the American Artists' Gallery on 7 January 1942, the critic for the New York Post said that it was "the largest Negro art exhibition ever held in this city." It included work by twenty-five Karamu artists, in various media: painting, sculpture, ceramics, jewelry, and prints. Another venue for artists in Cleveland was the Cleveland Museum, which held annual May Shows.

Finally, Karamu was also a venue for musicians and dancers. Musicians such as Hale Smith (who composed settings of Hughes's poems) were influenced by, and contributed to, the programs at Karamu, and dance found strong artistic expression there.

Black art has continued to thrive in Cleveland, and Karamu House has continued to nurture talent. The unique atmosphere of this artistic community may be partly a result of the interracial foundation on which the Playhouse Settlement was created.

MARIANNE WOODS

See also Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Emperor Jones, The; Gilpin, Charles; Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 3—Chicago and the Midwest; Hughes, Langston; Karamu House; Locke, Alain; Mulatto; Porter, James Amos; Stevedore

Further Reading

- Abookirie, Noerena. "Children's Theatre Activities at Karamu House in Cleveland, Ohio, 1915–1975." Ph.D. dissertation, New York University, 1982.
- Benson, Carol Angela. "Hull House and Karamu House." M.A. thesis, University of Wisconsin, 1965.
- Blood, Melanie Nelda. "The Neighborhood Playhouse, 1915–1927: A History and Analysis." Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern University, 1994.
- Christy, Denis Rachel. "The Contributions of the Gilpin Players of Karamu Theatre to Cleveland's Interracial Unit of the Federal Theatre Project." M.A. thesis, Kent State University, 1976.

Looman, Glen. "Karamu House: The Establishment and Evolution of a Settlement House for Cleveland's African-American Community, 1914–1923." Ph.D. dissertation, Cleveland State University, 1995.

Miller, Henry. "Art or Propaganda: A Historical and Critical Analysis of African-American Approaches to Dramatic Theory, 1900–1965." Ph.D. dissertation, City University of New York, 2003.

Patterson, Linsay. Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre: A Critical Approach. London and New York: Publishers Company, 1967.

Silver, Reuben. "A History of the Karamu Theatre of Karamu House, 1915–1960." Ph.D. dissertation, Ohio State University, 1961.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 5—Kansas and the Plains States

In June 1925, Aaron Douglas, who had been born in Kansas, arrived to take his place in an artistic community recently acknowledged in a special edition of Survey Graphic—"Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro." Fifty years later Douglas recalled what had inspired him to leave a secure teaching job in Kansas City: "The most cogent single factor that eventually turned my face to New York was the publication of the spectacular issue of 'Survey Graphic' magazine with the splendid portrait of a black man on the cover drawn by Fritz Winold Reiss" (Patterson 1999, 2). Once in New York, Douglas set to work immediately, producing illustrations for both The Crisis (the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, NAACP) and Opportunity (the magazine of the National Urban League). He reflected later: "I began to feel like the missing piece that all had been looking for to complete or round out the idea of a Renaissance" (Patterson, 7).

Alain Locke, one of the mentors of the Harlem movement, in his introduction to The New Negro—a subsequent book version of the special issue of Survey Graphic—speaks of the renaissance of the New Negro as a flourishing of cultural production by young artists self-consciously contributing to racial uplift. Although Locke refers to Harlem as the most important gathering of a growing movement of black artists and intellectuals, he recognizes, too, the influence of earlier migrations by African Americans from the rural South to the more urban North and Midwest in creating this community of artists. Scholars often refer to this cultural moment as the Harlem Renaissance, thereby locating it geographically, whereas Locke locates it in a historically specific people, the New Negroes. For most artists who developed this new consciousness, sites far from Harlem nurtured their social and artistic activities. Individuals like Aaron Douglas grew up in Kansas and the surrounding plains states. Distinctive black cultures thrived outside Harlem in places like St. Louis, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Omaha, Topeka, and Wichita, and throughout Oklahoma, where considerable numbers of African Americans had previously settled.

During the closing decades of the nineteenth century, freedmen and freedwomen had been impelled to leave their homes in the South by several factors: Reconstruction ended; "Jim Crow" laws were passed; and the North promised greater economic opportunities. In Kansas, for instance, the flood of migration from the border states of Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee peaked in the summer of 1879; and the black population in Kansas swelled by about 26,000 people in the decade between 1870 and 1880. An estimated 6,000 black migrants, called Exodusters in contemporary newspapers, traveled through St. Louis, Missouri, during the one-month period of mid-March through mid-April 1879. These new immigrants created new towns; they also added to populations of African Americans already settled in midwestern cities. Some migrants founded black towns such as Nicodemus in Kansas and Langston in Oklahoma. Poor rural migrants settled into segregated communities in Omaha (Nebraska), Chicago (Illinois), and Tulsa (Oklahoma)—places that would erupt with violence in the early twentieth century.

Several factors shaped a New Negro renaissance in Kansas and other plains states well before Locke defined the renaissance in Harlem. The racial politics that divided some followers of Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois in the East influenced black midwesterners too, sometimes differently. Two factors—race consciousness and segregation—led to the creation of separate black newspapers, schools, and social clubs. Essays by Du Bois in local black-owned newspapers and in national magazines influenced readers. Aaron Douglas, for instance, was a regular reader of The Crisis (which was edited by Du Bois) during his college years in Lincoln, Nebraska. But unlike some national publications that strongly supported one viewpoint or the other, midwestern newspapers covered both Du Bois and Washington.

Black-owned newspapers such as the Iowa Bystander in Des Moines, the Call in Kansas City (Missouri), the Black Dispatch in Oklahoma City, and the Negro Star in Wichita (Kansas), brought news of Harlem and Chicago's South Side to local communities. Nick Chiles, a businessman in Topeka, began publication of The Plaindealer in 1899, just two years after Booker T. Washington had made a well-received speech in Topeka advocating racial support for black businesses. In 1914, black political leaders, influenced by Du Bois, formed the Topeka chapter of the NAACP; Aaron Douglas's future father-in-law was a founding member of this chapter. A year after its inception, protesters associated with the NAACP succeeded in having the film The Birth of a Nation banned in Topeka. (Forty years later, of course, Topeka would be a focus of national attention when members of the NAACP challenged segregated schools in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas.)

Black newspapers also communicated information about local social events and individual artistic achievements. Reports on educational and social clubs appeared regularly in the columns of such newspapers. Women's literary societies such as the Pierian Club in Kansas City and the Dunbar Society in Topeka flourished throughout the early twentieth century and beyond. Social and artistic events at elite black schools—such as Sumner High School in Kansas City, Kansas, and Lincoln High School in Kansas City, Missouri—also received considerable attention in these newspapers. Although these schools were segregated, their facilities rivaled those of neighboring white schools, and they employed excellent teachers who served as race leaders. Such schools functioned as centers of creativity and intellectual life in African American communities.

Families and the community both emphasized education, and this emphasis further supported the next generation of African American high school and college graduates. For instance, Langston Hughes (who moved to Harlem in 1924) lived from 1909 to 1915 with his grandmother in Lawrence, Kansas, where he excelled in elementary school. Early in life, Hughes developed a sense of family honor and community responsibility, on which he drew throughout his career. From his grandmother, Mary Langston, in particular he acquired a sense of responsibility to his family and to African Americans. Several of his ancestors had fought slavery and segregation; for instance, his grandfather Charles Langston—Mary Langston's second husband—had been an abolitionist and an active member of the community. (Mary Langston's first husband, Lewis Sheridan Leary, had died after being seriously wounded when he joined the abolitionist John Brown's assault against the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Maryland, in 1859.) Hughes also learned an appreciation for theater from his mother, Carrie Langston, who shared her passion with her son and took him on trips to nearby Kansas City to see performances.

Aaron Douglas was born a few miles west of Lawrence in Topeka, Kansas, in 1899. Douglas attended a segregated elementary school and graduated from the integrated Topeka High School in 1917. While he was a high school student, Douglas established a reputation among his peers and teachers as an excellent artist and a serious student, forming an early taste for, in his words, the "heavy" literature of writers such as Emerson, Bacon, Dumas, and Shakespeare. In 1915 and again in 1917, Douglas designed the cover images for the high school yearbook. The caption under his image in the yearbook of 1917 noted: "He is one of the most talented artists in school and he has specialized in Art ever since he entered." Despite his poverty, Douglas graduated from the school of fine arts at the University of Nebraska in 1922; he was the first African American to receive such a degree there. Through his art, writing, teaching, and public speaking, Douglas challenged antiblack racism and the resulting barriers that the average African American faced in mainstream American society.

Education promised unique opportunities to young black women and men. In Shadow and Act, for instance, Ralph Ellison explains how a "frontiersmen" atmosphere in Oklahoma during the 1920s encouraged him to read and grow intellectually. Ellison recalled that this prevailing attitude of wide-open freedom offered him an opportunity to imagine himself in the roles of the figures—white, black, and other—he read about and saw in early movies. The writer, poet, and editor Frank Marshall Davis grew up combing the stacks of the library in Arkansas City, Kansas, and then studied journalism at Kansas State University in Manhattan before moving east to Chicago.

Like education, music—especially blues and jazz—was an important aspect and source of the cultural renaissance. In their later writings, Frank Marshall Davis, Ralph Ellison, and Langston Hughes all note how important it was for them to hear blues and jazz in local venues as they were growing up. Great jazz musicians such as Charlie "Bird" Parker (born in 1920 and raised in Kansas City) and Coleman Hawkins (born in 1904 in St. Joseph, Missouri, and raised in Topeka, Kansas) were part of coterie groups of musicians who had created their sound in Kansas City and Chicago.

In the 1920s and 1930s, clubs and theaters in Kansas City were centered on the jazz district at Eighteenth and Vine. Hot spots such as Club Reno, Gem Theater, and Lyric Hall earned national reputations. In Kansas City, as in Harlem during the renaissance, the jazz scene supported black artists who were expressing themselves in their own unique styles. The pianist William “Count” Basie came to Kansas City in 1927, and in 1935, he led the Barons of Rhythm, a group that included Walter “Hot Lips” Page, Lester “Pres” Young, Buster Smith, and, a year later, Eddie Durham. The saxophonist Charlie Parker—whose own nickname, “Bird,” initiated the name “Birdland” for the scene in Kansas City—joined Jay McShann’s band in Kansas City in 1938 and then toured throughout the nation, including New York. The talent and ambition of musicians in Kansas City led them to develop a regional cultural renaissance and also propelled them to success in Chicago and New York, the national centers of black culture.

Even before jazz gained broad popularity in the 1920s and 1930s, however, vaudeville acts with roots in the plains states had toured the country. George Walker, who was born in Lawrence, Kansas, c. 1873, performed throughout Kansas before taking his act on the road from San Francisco to New York. While he was in San Francisco, Walker teamed up with Bert Williams; these two men would bring the cakewalk to mainstream white audiences. Similarly, Hattie McDaniel, who was born in 1895 in Wichita, Kansas, left school in 1910 to perform on the traveling vaudeville circuit. (In 1940, McDaniel became the first African American to win an Oscar, for her portrayal of Mammy in Gone With the Wind.)

In expressing their talents, black artists had to overcome many obstacles. Langston Hughes’s white seventh-grade teacher, for instance, remembered him fifty years later only as a troublemaker with “no talent, much less promise” (Rampersad 1986, 17). Such a comment, half a century after the fact, suggests the difficulties many potential artists and scholars in Kansas and throughout the plains states must have faced at the time as they struggled for achievement. Yet Hughes, Douglas, and countless other African American artists contributed enormously to the flowering of black culture known as the Harlem, or New Negro, Renaissance.

CHERYL R. RAGAR

See also Blues; Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; Ellison, Ralph; Hughes, Langston; Jazz; Survey Graphic; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”

Further Reading

- Cox, Thomas C. Blacks in Topeka, Kansas, 1865–1915: A Social History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.
- Davis, Frank Marshall. Living the Blues: Memoirs of a Black Journalist and Poet, ed. John Edgar Tidwell. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1992.
- Early, Gerald. Black Heartland: African American Life, the Middle West, and the Meaning of American Regionalism, 2 vols. St. Louis, Mo.: Washington University, 1996–1997.
- Ellison, Ralph. Introduction. In Shadow and Act. New York: Random House, 1967. (Reprint, New York: Vintage, 1995.)
- Jackson, Carlton. Hattie: The Life of Hattie McDaniel. Lanham, Md.: Madison Books, 1990.
- Meier, August. Negro Thought in America 1880–1915: Racial Ideologies in the Age of Booker T. Washington. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1963. (Reprint, 1988.)
- Morgan, Thomas L., and William Barlow. From Cakewalks to Concert Halls: An Illustrated History of African American Popular Music from 1895 to 1930. Washington, D.C.: Elliott and Clark, 1992.
- Painter, Nell Irvin. Exodusters: Black Migration to Kansas after Reconstruction, 2nd ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1986.
- Patterson, Cheryl R. “Aspects of Negro Life, from Topeka to Harlem, Forming Aaron Douglas.” Master’s thesis, University of Kansas, 1999.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Russell, Ross. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the Southwest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968.
- Tidwell, John Edgar. “Coming of Age in a Land of Uncertainty.” Cottonwood, 56, Fall 2000, pp. 43–59.
- Tidwell, John Edgar, et al. “Plateaus of Uncertainty: Symposia on Legacies and Future of the Race—Part 2: Legacy of the Harlem Renaissance.” Cottonwood, 57, Spring 2001, pp. 45–61.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 6—Philadelphia

Philadelphia’s contribution to the Harlem Renaissance has traditionally been defined in terms of cultural center (Harlem) versus periphery (Philadelphia). For instance, the landmark exhibition “Harlem Renaissance:

Art of Black America" (1987) positioned Philadelphia in opposition to Harlem:

Indeed, the artistic migration to Harlem would have been modest to negligible without the efforts of a half dozen or so prominent figures. Otherwise the Harlem cultural scene would have become little more than a larger version of Washington, D.C., or Philadelphia, places where arts and letters meant Saturday night adventures in tidy parlors, among mostly tidy-minded literati.

Recent scholarship has deemphasized the notion of Harlem as an exclusive site of this cultural phenomenon, instead viewing it as "a geopolitical metaphor for modernity and an icon for an increasingly complex black diasporal presence in the world" (Powell 1997).

Although less significant than New York, Philadelphia did play an essential role in advancing the black cultural movement of the 1920s. As the nation's first capital, as one of America's oldest settlements, and as Pennsylvania's largest city, Philadelphia was linked to the plight of African Americans, their cultural aspirations, and their quest for political emancipation. Also, its seaport and central geographic location on the eastern seaboard made it a center of commerce and trading where the arts, literature, and music could flower.

In the early twentieth century, Philadelphia, like other large cities, provided a community of increasingly mobile artists, musicians, and writers with an urban-centered experience of modernity. Philadelphia's impact on the Harlem Renaissance manifested itself in three areas: (1) in a spirit of tolerance and cultural experimentation stemming from the city's abolitionist heritage and deep-rooted religious traditions; (2) in a community of innovative artists, writers, and musicians whose works explored the nexus of modernity and African American identity; and (3) in the advancement of educational opportunities for blacks in prominent local institutions.

Philadelphia was one of the few American cities with significant black populations as early as 1790; and in Philadelphia (unlike, say, New York and Baltimore, which had a large number of slaves), most blacks were free. Quaker settlers had rejected the institution of slavery early on, although they maintained segregation. Also, Philadelphia had a long history of independent black churches that advanced cultural and social endeavors. Bishop Richard Allen's African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church in Philadelphia became the country's first black congregation. As early as 1831, Allen coordinated black conventions advocating literacy and education. Building on the abolitionist heritage and strong religious traditions, Philadelphia's black populace developed a resilient spirit of cultural autonomy and self-determination. Abolitionist patronage supported the production of art and material culture. Philadelphia was not a haven from racism, but its diverse ethnic communities and varied social composition differed from the harsh realities of segregation in the South. Its uniquely positioned black population is also evident in W. E. B. Du Bois's landmark sociological study The Philadelphia Negro (1899). Jones (1995) characterizes Philadelphia as "the artistic apex of 19th century African America in terms of its visual arts production, exhibits, collecting and documentary efforts. In this context, it also functions as a model of both the major accomplishments of, and obstacles to, African American artistic expression."

In the early twentieth century, Philadelphia offered African Americans the economic and political conditions that engendered the Harlem Renaissance. Blacks in Philadelphia, as in other industrialized cities of the Northeast and Midwest, experienced a series of demographic and social transformations. In the first two decades of the new century, the city attracted large numbers of blacks from a predominantly rural South. Philadelphia also functioned as a stopover for those continuing their artistic and intellectual journey to Harlem. Like New York, Philadelphia had an economic and social infrastructure to accommodate the influx of new migrants and the social and cultural impulses that accompanied them. Throughout the 1920s, then, numerous writers, artists, musicians, and performers lived or worked in Philadelphia, creating a convergence of artistic practice that has come to characterize the Harlem Renaissance. Some artists had been born and raised in Philadelphia; others had formative educational experiences there before moving away; still others spent their most productive years there.

Philadelphia's heritage of nineteenth-century black cultural associations fostered the emergence of literary societies during the Harlem Renaissance era. In the 1920s, various literary currents came together in Black Opals, a prestigious journal featuring prose, poetry, and reviews by local black writers who had formed a society of the same name. Contributors to Black Opals included Lewis Grandison Alexander (1900–1945), who was from Washington, D.C., but was based in Philadelphia and had studied at the University of Pennsylvania; and Effie Lee Newsome (Mary Effie Lee, 1885–1979), who was a native of Philadelphia and had extensive educational experience at Wilberforce University, Oberlin College, the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, and the University of Pennsylvania. Newsome also contributed regularly to the children’s column in Opportunity.

Alain Locke (1886–1954) was also a native of Philadelphia, and he maintained close ties with the city even though he lived in Washington, D.C., and taught at Howard University for most of his life. His influential book The New Negro (1925) laid out the vision of the renaissance as a black contribution to American music, art, and literature that would simultaneously embrace a uniquely African American heritage. Another pivotal figure, the novelist, poet, biographer, and literary critic Jessie Redmon Fauset (1882–1961), had been schooled in Philadelphia; she received a scholarship to attend Cornell University as the first black woman there, before pursuing another degree in classical languages from the University of Pennsylvania. Fauset became the literary editor of The Crisis in 1919. Besides writing significant literary works about black middle-class life, she was a mentor to younger, more bohemian writers, including Jean Toomer, Langston Hughes, and Countee Cullen. Fauset was part of Harlem’s literary scene but kept up an ongoing involvement with Black Opals in Philadelphia—and also with the Saturday Nighters Club in Washington, and with other literary clubs, underscoring the mobility of figures of the Harlem Renaissance. The writer Idabell Yeiser was also based in Philadelphia and deserves mention for her insightful accounts of her extensive journeys in Europe and Africa.

A sizable number of painters, printmakers, and sculptors created a visual counterpart to the evolving body of literature during 1918–1935, the period associated with the Harlem Renaissance. Well-known artists whose work and legacies point to Philadelphia as a place of artistic formation include Henry Ossawa Tanner, Meta Warrick Fuller, Laura Wheeler Waring, Jacob Lawrence, and Dox Thrash. Philadelphia’s black artists owed much of their success to the city’s excellent art schools, universities, and museum collections, which provided opportunities for artistic inspiration, professional networking, and exchanges of ideas.

The Philadelphia Centennial Exhibition had recognized leading black artists such as Edward Mitchell Bannister and Edmonia Lewis as early as 1876, when Henry Ossawa Tanner (1859–1937) was beginning his studies at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts.

Frustrated by racial prejudice and harassment, Tanner later studied in France and became an expatriate there, but he remained an important figure at home. In 1899, the Philadelphia Museum of Art bought his painting The Annunciation (1897); this was the first acquisition of his work by an American institution. Tanner’s growing international success drew other Philadelphian artists to Paris, where they sought his advice and academic guidance.

The sculptor Meta Warrick Fuller (1877–1968), a native of Philadelphia, also went abroad for training; after attending the Philadelphia Museum School of Industrial Art (later the Philadelphia College of Art), she spent three years in Paris, where Tanner looked after her. Fuller returned to Philadelphia in 1903 as a fairly well-established artist. She exhibited frequently at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts and earned a gold medal at the Tercentennial Exposition of 1907 for Jamestown Tableau, a sculptural ensemble recounting the settlement of the first black community in colonial America in 1607. Fuller moved to Massachusetts after her marriage in 1909 but left an influential legacy in Philadelphia. Her career, spanning several decades and two continents and embracing emancipation and liberation, anticipated the spirit of the Harlem Renaissance. Fuller’s well-known bronze sculpture Ethiopia Awakening (1914) foreshadowed the emergence of a new cultural consciousness among African Americans at the onset of the renaissance era.

The painter Laura Wheeler Waring (1887–1948), who was from Connecticut, arrived in Philadelphia in 1907 to attend the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. She moved on to found the art department at nearby Cheyney State Teachers College, where she would remain until 1945. During the 1920s, a scholarship enabled her to study in Paris, where Tanner introduced her to a group of expatriates constituting a who’s who of the Harlem Renaissance: the artists Palmer Hayden, Malvin Gray Johnson, Nancy Elizabeth Prophet, Augusta Savage, and Hale Woodruff; the writers Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Jessie Redmon Fauset; and the performers Lillian Evanti, Roland Hayes, and Paul Robeson.

The Philadelphian sculptor May Howard Jackson (1877–1931) also attended the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, between 1895 and 1902. Declining an invitation from Fuller to go to Europe for advanced academic training, Jackson instead accepted a teaching position at Howard University in Washington, D.C., where she continued to produce portrait busts of prominent African Americans such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Paul Laurence Dunbar. She also produced an important series of sculptures representing women and children during the 1910s and 1920s; these works explored issues of racial identity, a subject at the heart of the Harlem Renaissance. At this time another sculptor, Augusta Savage, who was already working for the periodical Fire!!, exhibited her work at Philadelphia's Sesquicentennial Exhibition of 1926. The Philadelphian Allan R. Freelon (1895–1960), a painter and printmaker who was the artistic director of Black Opals, frequently exhibited at the Harmon Foundation; his works also appeared as covers and illustrations in The Crisis and Opportunity. Freelon was a graduate of the Philadelphia Museum School of Industrial Arts, the University of Pennsylvania, and the Tyler School of Arts, and later became supervisor of Philadelphia's art education program. Jacob Lawrence (1917–2000) spent part of his childhood in Philadelphia before moving to Harlem at age thirteen. His family's experience of the great migration from the rural South to the industrialized North later figured prominently in his sixty-painting work Migration of the Negro (1941).

Others artists—building on the legacy of Philadelphia's visual culture of the 1920s—began their careers during the mid-1930s, just as the Harlem Renaissance was declining. This new cohort of young and highly productive African American printmakers and painters worked under the auspices of the graphic arts division of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) and the Federal Arts Project. Dox Thrash (1893–1965) experimented with the limitations print as a medium and consequently developed the carborundum print process, a technique that allowed for a wider range of tints and tonal variations. Thrash's expertise in technique complemented the powerful social commentary of the printmaker Raymond Steth (1916–1997). Other significant members of the graphic arts group included Claude Clark (b. 1915), Samuel Joseph Brown (b. 1907), and Humbert Lincoln Howard (1906–1990). Howard studied with James A. Porter at Howard University before transferring to the University of Pennsylvania. Like many other black artists in Philadelphia, Howard advanced his studies at the legendary Barnes Foundation. He frequently exhibited at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, the Philadelphia Art Alliance, and the Pyramid Club, a social organization for black professionals.

The architect Julian F. Abele is a captivating yet frequently overlooked figure of Philadelphia's Harlem Renaissance. He was the first black architecture graduate of the University of Pennsylvania (in 1902), and he then studied at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris with financial support from his patron, Horace Trumbauer.

Howard joined Trumbauer's architectural firm in 1906 and later became its chief designer. Abele and Trumbauer developed a symbiotic working relationship that compensated for their individual difficulties—Trumbauer lacked formal training; Abele, although outstandingly talented, was hampered by the racially charged climate of Philadelphia's architectural association—and they succeeded in obtaining important commissions, such as the residence of James B. Duke in New York City and the architectural master plan for Duke University.

Philadelphia was a principal center of music in the United States and had a range of excellent concert halls. Its role as a center of music publishing in the nineteenth century preceded its role as a site of popular music. During the 1920s, its black churches produced internationally successful gospel choirs such as the Clara Ward Singers. This was also the time when Philadelphia emerged as a center for jazz. Important figures included the pianist Sam Wooding (1895–1985), a native of Philadelphia, whose band played at hotels in Atlantic City in 1919 before moving on to New York. By the mid-1920s, Wooding's jazz band and dance revue Chocolate Kiddies conquered European stages. In 1921, the dancer Josephine Baker (1906–1975), who was then still unknown, arrived in Philadelphia with a traveling show; she met and married her second husband, William Howard Baker, there. The opera singer Marian Anderson (1897–1993) was a Philadelphian, although she first gained fame in Europe before receiving belated recognition at home. Other important figures with ties to Philadelphia include the singer and actor Paul Robeson (1898–1976), the singer Ethel Waters (1896–1977), and, later, the trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie (1917–1993). Still later, the tenor saxophonist John Coltrane (1926–1967) chose Philadelphia for studies: He attended the Ornstein School of Music and Granoff Studios during his formative years.

Another aspect of Philadelphia's role during the Harlem Renaissance era was its educational institutions. In addition to leading art schools and museum collections, the greater Philadelphia area had some of the nation's oldest black colleges and universities. Cheyney State Teachers College and Lincoln University, originally established by Quakers to educate free blacks and runaway slaves, attracted African Americans from Philadelphia and beyond. The celebrated art collection and educational foundation of Albert C. Barnes in Merion turned out to be another cultural magnet. Established in 1922 as a nonprofit organization to promote appreciation of and education in the fine arts, the Barnes Foundation contributed significantly to the formation of Philadelphia's black cultural movement. Barnes's interest in both Western and African art proved particularly attractive to many black artists; and his belief in egalitarian causes, his commitment to education as a tool for social change, and his financial support created a welcoming environment for Aaron Douglas, Claude Clark, Horace Pippin, and others. In 1926, the Barnes Foundation established close ties with Lincoln University—a collaboration that epitomizes the cultural synergy of Philadelphia's black renaissance.

JÜRGEN HEINRICH

See also Anderson, Marian; Baker, Josephine; Barnes, Albert C. Black Opals; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Federal Programs; Fire!!; Fuller, Meta Warrick; Harmon Foundation; Jackson, May Howard; Lawrence, Jacob; Locke, Alain; Porter, James Amos; Robeson, Paul; Savage, Augusta; Tanner, Henry Ossawa; Waring, Laura Wheeler; Waters, Ethel; Works Progress Administration

Further Reading

- Blockson, Charles L. African Americans in Pennsylvania: Above Ground and Underground—An Illustrated Guide. Harrisburg, Pa.: RB, 2001.
- Campbell, Mary Schmidt, David Driskell, David Levering Lewis, and Deborah Willis Ryan. Harlem Renaissance: Art of Black America. New York: Studio Museum in Harlem/Abrams, 1987.
- Jones, Steven Loring. "A Keen Sense of the Artistic: African American Material Culture in Nineteenth-Century Philadelphia." International Review of African American Art, 12(2), 1995, pp. 4–29.
- Powell, Richard J. Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- Tomlinson, Glenn C., and Rolando Corpus. "A Selection of Works by African American Artists in the Philadelphia Museum of Art." Philadelphia Museum of Art Bulletin, 90(382–3), Winter 1995.
- Willis, Arthur C. Cecil's City: A History of Blacks in Philadelphia, 1638–1979. New York: Carlton, 1990.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 7—The South

During the Harlem Renaissance, the South was not a place for African Americans to remain in, raise families, and prosper but, as in the days of slavery, a "prison-house of bondage"—a place to leave. Actually, though, the South was a region of contradictions for its black residents. Patterns such as vigorously enforced race-based segregation, economic exploitation, suspension of civil rights, political disenfranchisement, and relentlessly brutal suppression of dissent existed alongside influential black institutions: newspapers, churches, and schools. These black institutions, formed by and within African American communities, nurtured a new leadership and new strategies for resisting oppression and effecting social change. Southern artists, entertainers, musicians, and writers mined black sacred and secular traditions in order to introduce new forms and themes to national and international audiences, meanwhile debating over the enduring value of these traditions and over daring pronouncements about legitimately African American aesthetics. Nevertheless, for about fifteen years during the "great migration," hundreds of thousands of black farm families did move to the North or West, leaving the boll weevil infestation and their own second-class citizenship and grinding losses as sharecroppers for a more prosperous urban life, factory jobs, and promises of social equality. The South, for its part, struggled to reconcile its dismal history of enslavement, and the aftermath of enslavement, with the new directions in religion, education, activism, and the arts that the Harlem Renaissance offered.

Religion

Because of the "black codes" that prevented slaves from gathering to worship communally, or that allowed services for slave congregations to be led only by ministers hand-picked to reinforce notions of racial inferiority, African American religion developed a subversive element throughout much of the South. Both free and enslaved blacks devised coded expressions of an African past manifested in the movements, sermons, spirituals, rituals, and icons of both Protestants and Catholics; thus religion became an expression of rebellion against bondage and an indicator of a distinctly African American culture. For example, in Louisiana—as in other states where large numbers of slaves had been imported from the Caribbean—santería flourished alongside Catholicism; and Catholicism and west African religions were reassembled into a new belief system. It thus is not surprising that during the Harlem Renaissance black churches in the South continued to represent the heart and soul of African American culture. They were incubators for political and educational leaders, sources of relief and renewal to communities besieged by Jim Crow, and affirmative symbols to artists, regardless of race.

African American churches in the South were essential in educating black youth and organizing political assaults against racism. They raised money to send their brightest students to the segregated colleges and normal schools that served them, and created networks of families to house, feed, and pay teachers who traveled to their communities. W. E. B. Du Bois, in his Souls of Black Folk (1903), recalls such assistance when he finished matriculating at Fisk University in Nashville and began teaching in a one-room schoolhouse in rural Tennessee. Many students would return to their southern homes as ministers, to ask local whites for calm and humanity in times of racial tension, and to develop “bully pulpits” from which they called for immediate or gradual relaxation of racial apartheid. In addition to their spiritual functions, African American churches in the South performed services as mundane, and as specific to the region, as providing safe havens and meals for black travelers when all-white hotels and restaurants refused their patronage.

In rural as well as urban communities in the South, African American churches offered a release valve for pressures built up by racial stereotyping, financial hardships, and so on. Church members fraternized at picnics, weddings, funerals, ice cream socials, tent meetings, revivals, and other events; and they published newspapers disseminating political opinions as well as announcing the locations of places of worship and the hours of services. In all this, they found freedom from the surveillance by the master that had characterized the religious practices of an earlier generation. As the nation became urbanized and industrialized, some of the creative productions of the Harlem Renaissance—such as Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston’s play Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life (1931) and Hurston’s novel Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937)—celebrated southern black churches or satirized them, or both.

Education

During the Harlem Renaissance, the South was a site for the education of professional and working-class African Americans, despite the obstacles raised by the “separate and unequal” Jim Crow system, which impaired the quality of instruction, limited the availability of institutions, and weakened the power of black communities to define their own educational agenda.

Shoddy buildings, shortages of teachers, inadequate instruction, and poor equipment plagued segregated rural schools especially. Even when teachers could be found to accept the low or inconsistent pay that such communities offered, and these communities’ remoteness from cities, the pupils often stayed away from school to help in the fields or otherwise assist their families financially. Rural areas were dotted by Bible colleges, funded primarily by such denominations as the African Methodist Episcopal Church and the Baptists, that developed pastors and teachers for such communities. However, the most visible symbols of black people’s educational progress in the region were industrial schools such as Booker T. Washington’s “experiment” in Tuskegee, Alabama, and Hampton Institute in Virginia.

The industrial schools were funded by a combination of contributions from white northern philanthropists (the Carnegies, Rockefellers, Rosenwalds, and Phelps-Stokeses, for example), religious organizations, and African American individuals and communities. The curriculum emphasized practical skills, discipline, hard work, and self-help, along with cultural awareness and racial pride. Whites who suspected that too much education and literacy would stir up restlessness and dissatisfaction among blacks in the region were reassured that the students would return to their communities with marketable trades such as carpentry, bricklaying, dressmaking, and laundering. With buildings constructed by the students and dining halls stocked with food that the students prepared, industrial schools modeled thrift, self-sufficiency, morality, persistence, deferred gratification, and cooperation—qualities that proved crucial to arguments for extending the full rights of citizenship to African Americans.

Yet these schools did have detractors. Many critics complained, for example, about the preponderance of white faculty members and presidents, although by the 1920s black administrators and instructors were being hired more routinely than had been the case in the nineteenth century. And the novelist Nella Larsen—after an unhappy experience living at Fisk with her husband, a physics teacher—invented a fictional institution, Naxos, in her novel Quicksand (1928), to skewer the industrial model for promoting conformity, snobbery, and self-hate. In response to such criticism, institutions including Fisk and Atlanta University added liberal arts tracks to their vocational offerings in order to prepare the best and the brightest to enter such professions as law, teaching, and medicine.

Despite such objections, southern black educational institutions at all levels were crucial to the establishment of a black middle class in the region and to the development of innovative individuals. For instance, the chemist George Washington Carver spent his career teaching at Tuskegee University, where he made internationally recognized discoveries regarding paint dyes and soybean, peanut, and potato production. James Weldon Johnson served as principal of the Central Colored Grammar School in Jacksonville, Florida, before he began his celebrated creative career in New York City. Similarly, African American women found opportunities to rise to leadership positions by establishing and directing all-female schools, such as—in Georgia—Spelman Seminary (later Spelman College) in Atlanta and Haines Normal and Industrial School in Augusta; or by taking positions as “lady principals” at coeducational schools. And black families in rural areas benefited from agricultural extension and community outreach services, libraries, health care programs, and primary schools staffed by the faculty and students of educational institutions.

Activism

Black southerners during the Harlem Renaissance confronted a hostile social and political climate and entrenched Jim Crow policies. They were subjected to literacy tests and poll taxes that denied them the vote; to sharecropping and low-wage agricultural labor that created economic inequities; and to a legal system that encouraged false arrests of law-abiding African Americans and the exploitation of convict labor by wealthy whites. Additionally, social control often took the form of mob violence. Particularly in rural areas, lynching was practiced indiscriminately; the victims were men, women, and children whose offenses were frequently more imaginary than real. In the cities, especially after black soldiers who had served in World War I returned from overseas to compete for jobs and agitate for social justice, angry whites incited riots that devastated African American communities and caused the death of many residents—most notoriously in Longview, Texas, and Washington, D.C., during the “red summer” of 1919.

The National Association of Colored Women (NACW) and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) responded to such oppression by campaigning through the legal and political systems. They pressed at the local, state, and national levels for antilynching legislation, increases in teachers’ pay, and additional resources for public health and educational institutions in African American communities. Sometimes black citizens armed themselves against lynch mobs and rioters. As a final recourse, they could leave the South as part of the great migration—which thus was a way of actively resisting their disempowerment and of asserting their dignity as much as it was a way to find more lucrative industrial jobs or to find better housing and schools.

Culture

Southerners were central figures in the artistic flowering that African Americans initiated. The South as a romantic “land of cotton” was still quite prominent in the national imagination. However, African American artists of the Harlem Renaissance doubted that the region held pleasant associations for their people, and their artistic expression influenced mainstream popular and commercial culture.

Writers and visual artists stood at the forefront of a movement to remove stereotypes of black southerners and to assert the complexity and beauty of these black people’s lives. They also challenged the notion that Harlem was the only black space rich enough to produce enduring artistic contributions. The South inspired northern black artists to visit, live there, and produce honest portrayals, and it inspired native southern artists to capture their insiders’ views for posterity.

Jean Toomer’s experimental novel Cane (1923), for example, derived from his brief residence as a teacher in Georgia. It contrasted vivid landscapes, alluring mulatto beauties, and the haunting sounds of spirituals, work songs, and blues with the terrors of lynching and the stark economic hardships that characterized the rural black South. James Weldon Johnson, in his Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912), fictionalized the life of a light-complexioned protagonist in Georgia during the Jim Crow period. Langston Hughes’s poems in his Weary Blues (1926) relied on musical rhythms that could be traced to the days of slavery in the South. Zora Neale Hurston, in Mules and Men (1935), collected folklore from the region. Johnson’s sermons in God’s Trombones (1927), along with the spirituals he and his brother anthologized (1925, 1926), brought attention to additional creative forms. Walter White, a longtime official of the NAACP, could pass for white and occasionally infiltrated meetings of the Ku Klux Klan to gather information on lynching. Out of these experiences came his Rope and Faggot: An Analysis of Judge Lynch (1929), as well as Fire in the Flint (1924), on African American life in Georgia; and Flight (1926), a portrait of mulatto life and the black middle class in Atlanta.

The painter Jacob Lawrence, who was based in Harlem, captured the many ways in which flight and its symbols—the train, the North Star—recur as motifs in black southern history. African American schools, most notably Fisk and Tuskegee, commissioned such visual artists to design and decorate buildings and to train students.

Singers such as Bessie Smith and Gertrude “Ma” Rainey and musicians such as Louis Armstrong, Joseph “King” Oliver, Sidney Bechet, and Jelly Roll Morton refined blues and jazz in cities like Memphis and New Orleans. Frequently, they resettled in the North to perform in larger venues and record for the nascent “race record” industry but would then come to the South again on the “chitlin’ circuit” to perform in black-owned vaudeville houses or traveling tent shows. These musicians further demonstrate the rich contribution of the South to the Harlem Renaissance.

BARBARA McCASKILL

See also Armstrong, Louis; Artists; Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Bechet, Sidney; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fire in the Flint, The; God’s Trombones; Great Migration; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, James Weldon; Johnson, John Rosamond; Jim Crow; Larsen, Nella; Lawrence, Jacob; Morton, Jelly Roll; Oliver, Joseph “King”; Quicksand; Rainey, Gertrude “Ma”; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Smith, Bessie; Toomer, Jean; Vaudeville; Washington, Booker T.; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Anderson, James D. The Education of Blacks in the South, 1860–1935. Chapel Hill and London: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.
- Brundage, W. Fitzhugh, ed. Under Sentence of Death: Lynching in the South. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Franklin, John Hope, and Alfred A. Moss Jr. From Slavery to Freedom: A History of African Americans. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1947. (See also 8th ed., New York: Knopf, 2000.)
- Griffin, Farah Jasmine. “Who Set You Flowin’?”: The African American Migration Narrative. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Harris, Trudier. Exorcising Blackness: Historical and Literary Lynching and Burning Rituals. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.

Harrison, Alferdteen, ed. Black Exodus: The Great Migration from the American South. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991.

Johnson, Alonzo, and Paul T. Jersild, eds. Ain’t Gonna Lay My ‘Ligion Down: African American Religion in the South. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.

Litwack, Leon F. Trouble in Mind: Black Southerners in the Age of Jim Crow. New York: Knopf, 1998.

Marks, Carole. Farewell—We’re Good and Gone: The Great Black Migration. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1989.

Neverdon-Morton, Cynthia. Afro-American Women of the South and the Advancement of the Race, 1895–1925. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1983.

Taylor, Arnold H. Travail and Triumph: Black Life and Culture in the South Since the Civil War. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1976.

Tolnay, Stewart Emory, and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence: An Analysis of Southern Lynchings, 1882–1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 8—Texas and the Southwest

The Harlem Renaissance influenced and promoted creative efforts of African Americans in Texas and the Southwest, although output was sometimes more restricted in the Southwest (as in the western United States in general) than in New York. Many prominent participants in the Harlem Renaissance had grown up in the West before moving to Harlem. Many other black westerners were prevented from relocating to New York because of the distances and the expense involved, and because (especially in the case of black women) they were reluctant to break family ties; these creative artists participated in regional and local renaissances in their home communities, despite numerous obstacles that were often imposed by whites.

The Harlem Renaissance was manifested in an increase in the artistic productivity of blacks in Texas and the Southwest, and it took place in a more tolerant social climate than had existed in previous years. Blacks’ artistic endeavors and expressions were fostered by organized drama groups, theaters, nightclubs, galleries, schools, and newspapers. Avenues for artistic expression were opened not only by the Harlem Renaissance but also by a growing middle class, better educational opportunities, and the growth of cities. The cities of the region—for example, Albuquerque, Amarillo, Dallas, El Paso, Fort Worth, Houston, Phoenix, and San Antonio—served as vital outlets for black artistic expression during the renaissance.

But not all African American artists in the Southwest found a ready path to success. In white Texas, for instance, opportunities for black painters were limited; few black artists are recorded, and the works of those few were seldom given prominence. However, in September 1930, seventy-three examples of painting and sculpture, selected from more than 200 hundred nationwide entries for the Harmon Award, were exhibited in Houston. A black Houstonian, Samuel Countee, was one of the prominent exhibitors. Countee's painting My Guitar, a life-size portrait of a black man with a guitar, was later hung in the Negro Hall of Life at the Texas Centennial Exposition in 1936 and became a very popular piece in the collection. Frank Sheinall, an elevator operator from Galveston who was a self-taught painter in oils, also had a painting in the centennial exhibit, and the following year he was featured at the Fifth Annual Exhibit of the Negro Carnegie Branch Library in Houston.

Black dramatists in Texas also faced difficulties, because the opportunities that existed in theater were limited to actors rather than playwrights. Few, if any, plays written by black Texans of the period appear to have survived, but actors in the cities of the Southwest found new opportunities. Three examples are Clarence Brooks, Dick Campbell, and Arthur Wilson, who were all born in Texas. Campbell and Wilson both performed in Harlem during the renaissance: Campbell at the Cotton Club and Wilson in productions of the Lincoln and Lafayette theaters. In Houston, Texas, as early as 1919, the American Theater advertised that it would offer the best of colored professionals playing in colored houses. In 1931, blacks in Houston and San Antonio established Negro "little theater" troupes that presented shows throughout Texas. Black actors in Dallas organized the Dallas Negro Players, who gave their first performance in December 1928 to a racially mixed audience. The Dallas Negro Players experienced considerable financial difficulties, but in the autumn of 1930 presented Jute, a three-act play on race relations written by a white Dallasite, Kathleen Witherspoon.

It was in music—particularly blues, gospel, ragtime, and jazz—that Texan African Americans excelled and contributed most significantly to the national cultural milieu during the 1920s and 1930s. Their music grew out of the unique experience of black Texans and became a permanent part of the national musical heritage. The musicians wrote, performed, and ultimately recorded their work. The most successful example during this period was Blind Lemon Jefferson, a blues singer from Dallas who recorded for Paramount; during the late 1920s he was the best-selling black musician in the nation.

The most versatile black Texas musician was Huddie "Leadbelly" Ledbetter. Leadbelly began singing early in his life; spent the years 1918–1925 and 1930–1934 in prisons in Texas and Louisiana, where he became the lead man, or caller, for the work gangs; and eventually gained national recognition with songs such as "Good-night Irene," "Midnight Special," and "Jail-House Blues." Leadbelly shared certain characteristics with many blues singers—intense vitality, a roving spirit, independence, and arrogance. Other talented black Texas performers included Texas Alexander, "Whistlin'" Alex Moore, Aaron Thibaux "T-Bone" Walker, Mance Lipscomb, Sam "Lightning" Hopkins, and "Ragtime" Henry Thomas. Beulah "Sippie" Wallace, who was born in Houston, combined boogie-woogie with gospel, blues, and jazz; she had a successful career singing throughout Texas and touring with Louis Armstrong. Another vocalist, Victoria Spivey from Houston, sang in clubs and shows, acted in films, and wrote songs, including "Black Snake Blues."

The career of the singer and writer Penman Lovinggood indicates the opportunities for educated, talented black Texans in music during the Harlem Renaissance. He was born in Austin, the son of the founder and longtime president of Samuel Huston College. By 1925 he became a noted tenor in New York; in the 1930s, he performed with John Rosamond Johnson's quartet and the W. C. Handy orchestra. Lovinggood also wrote an opera and the book Famous Modern Negro Musicians (1921).

As more blacks moved into Texas cities, outstanding black bands also emerged. The bands directed by Troy Floyd of San Antonio and Alphonso Trent of Dallas achieved a national reputation. In Fort Worth, King Holston and Frank Bonapartes led highly popular black bands. Other musical groups included the Blues Syncopaters in El Paso, the Real Jazz Orchestra of Laredo, and Gene Coy's Happy Black Aces in Amarillo. These bands toured the state, playing to enthusiastic audiences in major cities and in more remote areas.

The singer Julius Bledsoe, who was born in Waco in 1899 and was educated at Bishop College, left Texas for New York in 1924. Four years later he was acclaimed for his rendition of “Ol’ Man River” in the musical Show Boat. Maud Cuney-Hare, who was also born in Texas, said in her book Negro Musicians and Their Music that Bledsoe was the most versatile African American singer on the current stage. The swing pianist Teddy Wilson was born in Austin in 1912, studied music theory at Tuskegee and Talladega colleges, joined the Benny Goodman Trio in 1935, and left the Goodman trio four years later to form his own swing band, which he reduced to a sextet in 1940. The contralto Etta Moten was a native Texan (although she left Texas early in her life) who studied at Paul Quinn College; she became a successful singer on radio and appeared in movies and onstage during the 1930s.

In 1925, the Texas Association of Negro Musicians was organized, with headquarters in Fort Worth (where it was host to a national convention of Negro musicians in 1929); it was an affiliate of the National Association of Negro Musicians, which had started in 1919. The Texas Association published a journal, The Negro Musician, whose editor (and the guiding hand of the association) was Manet Harrison Fowler. Fowler, a dramatic soprano, had been born and educated in Fort Worth; at one time she operated a school in New York, the Nawlimu School for the Development of African Music and Creative Arts, before returning to Texas.

During the period of the renaissance, Texas also had an articulate group of poets, most of whom were middle-class and college-educated. Their poetry ranged widely in content, philosophy, and approach. In 1925, Bernice Love Wiggins published a volume of poetry, Tuneful Tales, in El Paso, but she later moved to California and was heard from no more. In 1933, the folklorist J. Mason Brewer published his first book of poems, Negrato: Negro Dialect Poems From the Southwest. Brewer (who was the Texas counterpart of Alain Locke) also collected the work of other black poets in Texas during the renaissance, in Heralding Dawn: An Anthology of Verse (1936). In his introductory essay, he argued that Texas poets should use materials drawn from the life of the urban and rural masses and should focus on African American culture, superstitions, customs, and traditions. Most of the black Texans included in his anthology did draw from that traditional base.

Among these poets was Clarence F. Carr, who wrote “When Dad Cooks Soda Biscuits.” Carr had studied at Wilberforce University, where he came under the influence of Paul Laurence Dunbar. Another poet in the anthology was Lawrence Carlyle Tatum, a resident of Limestone County who also lived for a time in Los Angeles, where he published two volumes of verse. Brewer also included his own poetry, such as “Deep Ellum and Central Tracks,” a vivid portrayal of the red-light district in Dallas. Some of the poets, such as J. Austin Love and Josie B. Hall, drew on the spiritual life of blacks in Texas. “The Will to Do,” a poem by J. W. Fridia (a physician from Waco who wrote poetry for the Houston Informer), expressed a middle-class belief in self-help. Black Texas poets also expressed some criticism of the black community. Hypocritical behavior is castigated in Richard T. Hamilton’s delightfully sarcastic “Sister Mandy Attends the Business League.” Hamilton was a native of Alabama who had earned a medical degree at Howard University and had come to Dallas in 1901.

Two poets—Malcolm Christian Conley and Laretta Holman Gooden—were openly critical of the segregated, racist society in Texas. Conley, who was from Tyler, began to appear in national publications in 1930: His “Four Walls” was published in The Messenger and his “Nineveh” and “American Ideals” in The Crisis. Gooden lived in Dallas, where she and her husband operated a grocery store. In “Questions to a Mob,” she inveighed against lynching. The writings of these black poets marked an increasing willingness by black Texans in the 1930s to speak out against the inequities of their position.

Although poetry in Texas was equal to that of other parts of the nation in output and nature, African Americans in Texas and the Southwest—with one notable exception—were less successful in fiction. Melvin B. Tolson (who was later to become an acclaimed poet) wrote a novel, Beyond the Zaretto, in 1924, but was unable to have it published. He did publish a short story in 1926, “The Tragedy of the Yarr Karr,” in the Wiley Wild Cat. Jennie V. Mills, a homemaker in Waco, also published a short story, “Doomed to Despair,” in the Waco Messenger in 1933. However, the predominant writer of fiction at this time was Anita Scott Coleman of New Mexico.

Coleman’s heritage was varied and unique. She was born in Guaymas, Sonora, Mexico, in 1890, the child of a Cuban man and a woman whom he had bought as a slave, most likely in order to free her. He later fought for the Union during the Civil War, and afterward he gravitated to Mexico and the Southwest. Anita Scott grew up in New Mexico, graduated from New Mexico Teachers College in Silver City, taught school, married, and later moved to Los Angeles. In 1920, in a biographical sketch for The Competitor, she was referred to as Miss Coleman from Silver City, so she seems to have been married and in New Mexico at that time; evidently her career as a teacher ended because of her marriage. She and her husband raised four children in Los Angeles, where she also managed a boardinghouse for children and continued writing. The impact of marriage on a working woman is reflected in her stories, especially “Peter and Phoebe Up North” and “The Little Grey House.” Coleman was a polished and successful author by the time she was in her mid-twenties; she received many awards, and her work was sought by editors such as Wallace Thurman. Her twenty-one short stories and essays were published in national magazines, including Half-Century, The Crisis, The Messenger, The Competitor, and Opportunity; they reflect concerns of women and African Americans during the early twentieth century. Until relatively recently, her work has been mostly ignored by critics, despite its initial favorable reception, but she was a significant participant in the Harlem Renaissance.

The Hall of Negro Life at the Texas Centennial Exposition of 1936 was a culmination of the activities of the renaissance. It was funded by the federal government and had some 400,000 visitors, approximately 60 percent of whom were white. The Hall of Negro Life contained four murals by Aaron Douglas; featured music, dance, and educational and economic programs; and included an exhibit of artists of the Harlem Renaissance sponsored by the Harmon Foundation. Thomas (1938) provides a valuable tool for understanding the role of blacks in Texas culture during the 1930s.

The Texas Centennial Exposition fostered a renewed interest in the history of African Americans in Texas. In 1935, L. V. Williams had published “Teaching Negro Life and History in Texas High Schools” in the Journal of Negro History. The following year, three short works were published either in connection with the exhibition or as a result of this renewed interest: Ira B. Bryant Jr., The Texas Negro Under Six Flags; W. E. B. Du Bois, What the Negro Has Done for the United States and Texas; and Charles E. Hall, Progress of the Negro in Texas.

Finally, to gain further insight into this period in Texas, it is useful to give some more detail about two figures previously discussed briefly—J. Mason Brewer and Melvin B. Tolson. Brewer, who compiled the anthology of poetry Heralding Dawn and published a volume of his own poems, Negrato, was born in Goliad, graduated from Wiley College, took a graduate degree at Indiana University, and taught at the high school and college levels. Brewer sought diligently to portray black culture and (like his contemporary Zora Neale Hurston) included folklore in his work. His first published writing, in 1932, was forty folktales under the title “Juneteenth” in Tone the Bell Down, a publication of the Texas Folklore Society. The next year, 1933, the society published Brewer’s “Old Time Negro Proverbs.” He also published a historical-political study, Negro Legislators of Texas and Their Descendants, in 1935.

Tolson was the Texan scholar and artist with the closest personal ties to the Harlem Renaissance. He was born in Missouri in 1898, accepted a teaching job at Wiley College in 1923, and remained at Wiley for twenty-four years. During the summers, though, he visited New York City, where he became friends with leading renaissance writers such as Langston Hughes. Hughes traveled to Texas on numerous occasions, and one of his visits resulted in the poem “West Texas.” Tolson also attended Columbia University in New York, and in 1940 he completed his master’s thesis, “The Harlem Group of Negro Writers,” which was the first scholarly study of renaissance writing.

BRUCE A. GLASRUDE

See also Bledsoe, Jules; Brooks, Clarence; Campbell, Dick; Cuney-Hare, Maud; Douglas, Aaron; Harmon Foundation; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, John Rosamond; Lovinggood, Penman; National Association of Negro Musicians; Show Boat; Spivey, Victoria; Thurman, Wallace; Wilson, Arthur “Dooley”

Further Reading

- Beeth, Howard, and Cary D. Wintz, eds. Black Dixie: Afro-Texan History and Culture in Houston. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1992.
- Brewer, J. Mason, ed. Heralding Dawn: An Anthology of Verse. Dallas, Tex.: June Thomason, 1936.
- Christian, Garna L. “Texas Beginnings: Houston in the World of Jazz.” Houston Review, 12(3), 1990, pp. 144–156.
- Clayton, Lawrence, and Joe W. Specht, eds. The Roots of Texas Music. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2003.
- Farnsworth, Robert M. Melvin B. Tolson, 1898–1966: Plain Talk and Poetic Prophecy. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1984.
- Fowler, Manet Harrison. “History of the Texas Association of Negro Musicians.” Negro Musician, August 1929, pp. 114–116.

- Glasrud, Bruce A. "From Griggs to Brewer: A Review of Black Texas Culture, 1899–1940." Journal of Big Bend Studies, 15, 2003, pp. 195–212.
- Glasrud, Bruce A., and Laurie Champion. "Anita Scott Coleman (1890–1960)." In American Women Writers, 1900–1945: A Bio-Bibliographical Critical Sourcebook, ed. Laurie Champion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000, pp. 77–81.
- Govenar, Alan B., and Jay E. Brakefield. Deep Ellum and Central Track: Where the Black and White Worlds of Dallas Converged. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1998.
- Hales, Douglas. A Southern Family in White and Black: The Cuney's of Texas. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2003.
- Hare, Maud Cuney. Negro Musicians and Their Music. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1936.
- Lovinggood, Penman. Famous Modern Negro Musicians. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Press Forum, 1921. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1978.)
- Sapper, Neil Gary. "Black Culture in Urban Texas: A Lone Star Renaissance." Red River Valley Historical Review, 6, Spring 1981, pp. 56–77.
- Thomas, Jesse O. Negro Participation in the Texas Centennial Exposition. Boston, Mass.: Christopher, 1938.
- Tolson, Melvin B. The Harlem Group of Negro Writers, ed. Edward J. Mullen. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Wiggins, Bernice Love. Tuneful Tales. El Paso, Tex.: privately printed, 1925. (Reprint, Lubbock: Texas Tech University Press, 2002.)

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 9—Washington, D.C.

The 1920s marked a cultural awakening among blacks in which more of them were actively involved in the arts. Their creative endeavors extended to all realms of the arts—fiction, poetry, drama, music, dance, and the visual arts. This time was unlike any other period before the 1920s in that white American publishers began to recognize black self-expression and issue it in books, magazines, and journals. The 1920s also gave rise to all-black literary quarterlies and "little magazines" that became major vehicles for the expression of the New Negro.

This new literary genius was not confined to Harlem, a section of New York City widely considered to be the "mecca" of black culture in the 1920s. Black communities in many cities experienced similar, although sometimes less extensive, literary and artistic activity. Washington, D.C., was no exception. Washington was the home of many cultural leaders, writers, musicians, performers, and visual artists. Some of them had been born there, and others were a part of the "great migration," in which an estimated 700,000 to 1 million blacks left the South between 1917 and 1920. According to the census of 1920, there were approximately 109,966 blacks living in the District of Columbia, making it the city with the third-largest population of blacks in the nation.

The rise of the "New Negro" movement in Washington brought an increased interest in the life and character of blacks. There was a new degree of frankness, openness, and self-awareness. The Harlem Renaissance transformed blacks as subject and artists from the old stereotype into the New Negro, who was more militant and embraced all facets of the black experience, including African heritage, social protest, folk songs, blues, jazz, lynching, race riots, and social injustice. Three writers—Langston Hughes, Jean Toomer, and Rudolph Fisher—effectively captured the spirit, energy, and experiences of the urban masses. Their imagery conjured up the moods of city streets filled with the naturalness of ordinary people.

During the early years of the twentieth century, an increasing number of blacks settled on and near Seventh and U streets in Washington. This neighborhood, which was populated by recent migrants, was a place where writers could gather rich material for stories. Washington had a dynamic social scene; and during the 1920s and 1930s, U Street—with its supper clubs, cabarets, jazz venues, and cafés—was the undisputed entertainment capital of black Washington. Bohemian Caverns, which opened in 1926, was the queen of U Street. In the early years, evening attire was mandatory—ladies wore gowns, and gentlemen wore tuxedos. Club Bengasi was upscale and a magnet for café society. At the Dance Hall at Ninth and V streets, one could regularly hear Louis Armstrong. Patrons at the Jungle Inn jived to the music of Jelly Roll Morton. Oriental Gardens, the oldest black cabaret in the city, catered to a racially mixed crowd, and Duke Ellington worked with the legendary Bricktop. Phoenix Inn also drew racially mixed audiences. Other points of interest in the general vicinity included the Casbah, Rocky's, Cecelia's, the Capitol Pleasure Club, the Rendezvous, and the Bali Club. The big three movie houses were the Lincoln Theater, the Booker T, and the Republic.

At Seventh and U streets, there was more of a “down-home” atmosphere, bustling and full of energy. Ninth Street divided the genteel and prosperous to the west and the poorer residents to the east. The action was on Seventh Street, especially for those who had migrated from points farther South. Noise and music from the traffic, pool rooms, storefront churches, barbershops, beauty salons, and liquor stores mingled together excitingly. In fact, the pool halls were second only to barbershops as important community gathering places. There was Club Off Beat, and just a few doors down one could hear the latest sounds at the University Record Shop. The Dunbar, at Seventh and T streets, was known as a family theater; it was black-owned and featured short subjects and universal news. There were evening performances at the Howard Theater, which had a seating capacity of 1,500 and was the first legitimate theater for blacks in the nation. Its location near Seventh Street placed it at a focal point in the black community. During the 1920s, the Howard Theater and the Howard University Players collaborated to present about two plays a year. In the late 1920s and early 1930s, programming gravitated toward big bands such as those of Duke Ellington, Cab Calloway, Jimmie Lunceford, and Earl “Fatha” Hines. Also, in the 1930s, the Howard Theater began its amateur-night contests. The winners included performers such as Bill Kenny of the Ink Spots and Billy Eckstein. During the period of the Harlem Renaissance, programming was geared toward jazz and blues, and there was an impressive schedule that included Ella Fitzgerald.

Langston Hughes was one of the major figures who were greatly influenced by Seventh Street. Hughes claimed that while he was living in Washington, the “cultured colored society” of the northwest section ignored him. Because he had a dislike of middle-class blacks in Washington, he explored Seventh Street for the themes and characters that he portrayed in his writing. He found inspiration in the dynamic and vibrant black life that was located there, and he incorporated the stories he heard into his own work, creating fresh, racially sensitive poetry. Most of the poems he wrote in Washington appeared in Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927). In Hughes’s poetry, as in that of others of the younger generation, black life was artistically celebrated. Because the subjects of Hughes’s works were simply themselves, he created a new racial consciousness that focused on everyday black life, elevating it to a new meaning.

The community just north of Seventh and U streets was a vast contrast to the happenings at that intersection. This community was home to Howard University, Freedmen’s Hospital, Miner Normal School, and LeDroit Park, a neighborhood of strong black middle-class standing. Howard University was fertile ground for a black renaissance in the Washington area. The dean of the Harlem Renaissance, Alain Locke, was a member of the philosophy department. Illustrious faculty members in other disciplines included Kelly Miller, Ralph Bunche, Ernest Just, and T. Montgomery Gregory. Locke played an instrumental role both locally and nationally. On a local level, he helped organize the art gallery and the music department at Howard University. He and Gregory, who was a member of the drama department, collaborated to put together a student writers’ group, which became known as the Stylus Society. There was a little magazine, The Stylus, which served as the organ for this group. As a student at Howard University, Zora Neale Hurston was a member of the Stylus Society, and she later said it had been an important part of her early writing career. Gregory also played a pioneering role at Howard University in developing drama as an art form in the lives of blacks and in black theater. Gregory’s interest in creating a national Negro theater movement was the seed for the establishment of the Howard Players, which became a renowned college theater troupe. As director of the drama department, Gregory inspired a national interest in black drama, and he collaborated with playwrights such as Willis Richardson, Paul Green, and Eugene O’Neill. In 1927, Gregory and Locke published Plays of Negro Life, which included works by several playwrights connected to Washington: Thelma Myrtle Duncan, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Jean Toomer, Willis Richardson, and Richard Bruce Nugent. On a national level, Locke served as guest editor for a special issue of Survey Graphic (March 1925) that was devoted to “Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro.” This special issue was organized and edited from Washington, and on its release it sold an unprecedented 40,000 copies. The success of this special issue led Locke to edit The New Negro (1925), in which perhaps sixteen of the thirty-seven contributors had some connection to Washington.

During the Harlem Renaissance, numerous social clubs and small cultural groups were active in and around Washington. Some of these were organized simply as literary study groups; others had a broader base that included the study of history and culture. The most inclusive of these groups that met on a regular basis was the Saturday Nighters, which met at the home of Georgia Douglas Johnson. On Saturday nights, her home became the social hub for the Washington group of the Harlem Renaissance—established Washingtonians as well as younger writers and artists who would later make a name for themselves. These gatherings were especially popular among the young writers but were also frequented by older writers who served as their mentors. The Saturday Nighters Club began when Jean Toomer asked Georgia Douglas Johnson to “hold weekly conversations among writers in Washington.” The group met continually for about ten years and was still holding intermittent gatherings as late as 1942. In 1926, the Saturday Nighters Club was mentioned in Gwendolyn Bennett’s “Ebony Flute” column in Opportunity magazine. The Saturday Nighters, through their longevity and the contributions they made, demonstrated that a common interest in the arts and culture could create a community.

A small sampling of those who were involved in the scene in Washington includes Richard Bruce Nugent, Waring Cuney, and Rudolph Fisher. Nugent, a native Washingtonian with close ties to Alain Locke and Langston Hughes, was a true bohemian, a non-conformist who rejected middle-class norms. His short story “Smoke, Lilies, and Jade” was the first literary work on a purely homosexual theme to be published by a black. Although Nugent was a gifted writer and artist, little of his work is currently in print. He was known to present his writings to Locke on scraps of newspaper, paper bags, or anything else he could find. In fact, Langston Hughes rescued what became Nugent’s first published poem, “Shadow,” from the trash. Because Nugent wrote under many aliases, a compilation of his writings might be unexpectedly large.

Waring Cuney was known by his contemporaries as one of the favorites of the young writers. Cuney studied briefly at Howard University and eventually graduated from Lincoln University, where he was a classmate of Langston Hughes. Cuney did further study at the New England Conservatory of Music and at the Conservatory in Rome. His most frequently anthologized poem, “No Image,” was written when he was eighteen years old, and he won an award for it in Opportunity’s literary contest when he was twenty. This poem is considered a minor classic of the New Negro movement.

Rudolph Fisher was a true renaissance man—physician, novelist, short-story writer, musician, and orator. His short life (thirty-seven years) was filled with many academic, oratorical, and literary accomplishments. By all accounts, Fisher is considered one of the major literary figures of the Harlem Renaissance. His stories appeared regularly in Atlantic Monthly, The Crisis, Opportunity, and Story, and he was said to be the wittiest of the New Negroes. In his works, Fisher gave the reader a glimpse of ordinary blacks living and working in their community. His Conjure Man Dies (1932) was the first black detective story.

To sum up, Washington’s role in the Harlem Renaissance was clearly defined by the activity that occurred in the city and by the number of literary figures and other creative artists who either were in the area or maintained ties to it as active participants in its cultural scene. In addition to Alain Locke and other mentors (T. Montgomery Gregory, Kelly Miller, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Edward Christopher Williams, and Carrie Williams Clifford), there were numerous creative spirits from the younger generation. These included Waring Cuney, Richard Bruce Nugent, Lewis G. Alexander, Rudolph Fisher, Langston Hughes, Jean Toomer, James L. Wells, Sterling Brown, Clarissa M. Scott Delaney, May Miller, Richard Goodwin, Albert Rice, Thelma Myrtle Duncan, and James A. Porter.

GEORGE-MCKINLEY MARTIN

See also Armstong, Louis; Bennett, Gwendolyn; Brown, Sterling; Conjure Man Dies, The; Cuney, Waring; Ellington, Duke; Fine Clothes to the Jew; Fisher, Rudolph; Green, Paul; Howard University; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Locke, Alain; Miller, Kelly; Morton, Jelly Roll; Nugent, Richard Bruce; O’Neill, Eugene; Opportunity Literary Contests; Porter, James Amos; Richardson, Willis; Stylus; Survey Graphic; Toomer, Jean; Williams, Edward Christopher

Further Reading

- Catchpole, Terry. “Some of the Sounds of the Howard.” Washingtonian Magazine, 2(9), June 1967.
- Fisher, Rudolph. The Conjure-Man Dies: A Mystery of Dark Harlem. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1992.
- Gardner, Bettye, and Bettye Thomas. “The Cultural Impact of the Howard Theatre on the Black Community.” Journal of Negro History, 55(4), October 1970.
- Hughes, Langston. Fine Clothes to the Jew. New York: Knopf, 1927.

- . The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Knopf, 1940.
- Johnson, Richard M. "Those Who Stayed: Washington Black Writers of the 1920s." In Records of the Columbia Historical Society of Washington, D.C., Vol. 50, ed. Francis Coleman Rosenberger. Washington, D.C.: Columbia Historical Society, 1980.
- Locke, Alain. "Beauty and the Provinces." Stylus, June 1929.
- , ed. The New Negro. New York: Atheneum, 1968. (Originally published 1925.)
- Locke, Alain, and Montgomery Gregory, eds. Plays of Negro Life. New York: Harper, 1969.
- Martin, George-McKinley, et al. Black Renaissance in Washington, D.C., 1920s–1930s. Washington, D.C.: District of Columbia Public Library, June 2003. (Web site.)
- Miller, Kelly. "Where Is the Negro's Heaven?" Opportunity, 4(48), December 1926.
- Rubin, Lawrence. "Washington and the Negro Renaissance." Crisis, 78(3), April–May 1971.

Harlem Shadows

Harlem Shadows (1922) was Claude McKay's first book of poetry published in the United States. This collection of poems follows rigid structures but also explores a variety of themes, including McKay's famous protest sonnets.

Many of the poems in Harlem Shadows were first published in the literary journals Seven Arts, Pearson's Magazine, and Liberator. This fact, as well as the beginning of McKay's autobiography A Long Way From Home, indicates that McKay was dependent on white editors. In contrast to this image of McKay, however, critics of the 1960s and later hailed McKay as a protester—an artist who was willing to confront white racist practices. Their evaluation challenges the idea of McKay's dependency and suggests that he was a pioneer because he was able to get published in such white literary journals without compromising his racial politics.

Before coming to New York City, McKay had published two volumes of dialect poetry in Jamaica: Songs of Jamaica and Constab Ballads (both 1912). In 1919, McKay went to England for three years; there, he published Spring in New Hampshire (1920). Harlem Shadows was an expanded version of McKay's poetry from Spring in New Hampshire, including many of the protest poems. McKay's most famous poem, "If We Must Die," was excluded from the English publication but appeared in Harlem Shadows. "If We Must Die" is a militant poem urging black people to fight lynch mobs and dogs, so that if blacks must die, they will die with dignity. The reference to black people is only implied, though, and during World War II, Winston Churchill made this poem known to an international audience as a call to arms for British troops. In September 1971, the poem was circulated among inmates at Attica State Prison in New York before an uprising by these prisoners. Other poems excluded from Spring in New Hampshire also reflected McKay's militancy, but "If We Must Die" more than any other poem made McKay one of the most important poets of the Harlem Renaissance and established his reputation as a militant. Unlike McKay's novel Home to Harlem, Harlem Shadows was praised by most black intellectuals at its time of publication.

Interestingly, "If We Must Die" instigated a debate, which is still going on, about McKay's protest sonnets. The problem is how to reconcile the protest with the sonnet form. Sonnets consist of fourteen lines, with various rhyme schemes. In the early twentieth century, the sonnet was still closely associated with the romantic poets of the early nineteenth century. To most critics of McKay's poetry, the militant subject matter seems inconsistent with a form associated with love and beauty. For example, with regard to "The Lynching," another militant sonnet in Harlem Shadows, Giles (1976) thinks that the self-consciousness of the imagery of Christ interferes with the horror aroused by the lynchers. The final couplet reads: "And little lads, lynchers that were to be, / Danced round the dreadful thing in fiendish glee." In 1918, Frank Harris, the editor of Pearson's Magazine, had rejected this poem, arguing that it did not do justice to its historical parallel, the race riot of 1917 in St. Louis. However, Harris published "To the White Fiends," a poem that, according to Gayle (1972), casts the speaker as a Christlike figure and thus continues the powerless pleading of Dunbar's poetry. In the middle of the poem, the tone changes to humility and calm: "But the Almighty from the darkness drew / My soul and said: Even thou shalt be a light / Awhile to burn on the benighted earth." Keller (1994) sees the poem as a tour de force of restraint: The speaker offers the specter of violence but then withdraws it as a favor to those who mistreat him. However, Gayle prefers the militancy of the sonnet "The White House," which appeared in Liberator in 1922. In "The White House," the speaker is seething with anger, and only self-restraint keeps it from bubbling over:

Oh, I must search for wisdom every hour,
 Deep in my wrathful bosom sore and raw,
 And find in it the superhuman power
 To hold me to the letter of your law!

Alain Locke included five of McKay's poems in the groundbreaking anthology of the Harlem Renaissance, The New Negro. However, McKay selected only two of those poems—"Baptism" and "Tropics in New York"—for inclusion in Harlem Shadows, perhaps because Locke tended to favor the romantic poems of the spirit rather than the angry protest sonnets. In "Baptism," McKay uses baptism by fire as a metaphor for confronting racist oppression; such confrontation produces "A stronger soul within a finer frame." "Tropics in New York" highlights themes of migration, focusing on the tropical fruit available in New York that elicits a longing for home; the speaker says, "I turned aside and bowed my head and wept." McKay would turn to this subject—love and longing for Jamaica—again and again. In such poems as "Flame-Heart," "Home Thoughts," "North and South," "After the Winter," "My Mother," "In Bondage," and "Winter in the Country," McKay recalls the beauty of Jamaica and contrasts it with the manmade, stultifying industrial world. Virtually every critic who has written about his Jamaican-inspired poems has described them as nostalgic, romantic, or pastoral.

Other widely anthologized poems are "America," "Outcast," "Spring in New Hampshire," "Harlem Shadows," and "The Harlem Dancer." The last two of these focus on jobs available to black women in urban centers. In "Harlem Shadows," the job is prostitution. In the three stanzas of this poem, the speaker focuses on the "slipperd feet," "tired feet," and "weary feet" of these young women. "The Harlem Dancer" focuses on the spectacle of a black female dancer in a cabaret but ends with a denial of complete objectification: "But looking at her falsely-smiling face, / I knew her self was not in that strange place."

KIMBERLY J. BANKS

See also Liberator, The; McKay, Claude; New Negro, The; Seven Arts

Further Reading

- Brown, Lloyd W. West Indian Poetry. London: Heinemann, 1984.
- Cooper, Wayne F., ed. The Passion of Claude McKay: Selected Poetry and Prose, 1912–1948. New York: Schocken, 1973.

———. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance—A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.

Gayle, Addison Jr. Claude McKay: The Black Poet at War. Detroit, Mich.: Broadside, 1972.

Giles, James R. Claude McKay. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1976.

Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Keller, James R. "'A Chafing Savage, Down the Decent Street': The Politics of Compromise in Claude McKay's Protest Sonnets." African American Review, 28, 1994, pp. 447–456.

Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. New York: Atheneum, 1992. (Originally published 1925.)

Wagner, Jean. Black Poets of the United States: From Paul Laurence Dunbar to Langston Hughes, trans. Kenneth Douglas. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1973. (Originally published 1962.)

Harleston, Edwin A.

Edwin Augustus Harleston is best known for his many portraits of African Americans. He was born in 1882 in Charleston, South Carolina. Throughout his childhood he showed an aptitude for art (although also for science and singing) and was an avid draftsman. After graduating from Atlanta University in 1904, he studied medicine at Harvard University, but eventually he gave up that career path to pursue his interest in art.

Harleston went north and studied art at the school of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston from 1906 to 1912. While living in an African American neighborhood in Boston, he was surrounded by people who were willing and able to speak openly about racial injustice. Later, he would become an outspoken civil rights activist, perhaps as a result of this experience. He eventually returned to Charleston, where he lived for the rest of his life. Harleston was never able to earn a living from his painting, although he strove for many years to get publicity for his work and to obtain portrait commissions. In order to earn a living, he operated a funeral home in Charleston that his father, an undertaker, had started. As a successful African American businessman, he became an influential civic leader in Charleston. In 1916, he helped establish the Charleston branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); this was one of its first branches in the South, and he was its first president. He was active in efforts to improve education for African Americans in the South.

Harleston, Edwin A.

Harleston depicted African American business-people, professionals, artists, writers, and musicians. He also painted many portraits of poor rural African Americans. In addition to working in oil and charcoal, he was a photographer, and he took many portrait photographs over the years. Perhaps his most famous portrait is of the African American painter Aaron Douglas, which was done in 1930 and is now in the Gibbes Museum. His portrait The Soldier (1919) depicts a young African American man in military garb with arms folded across the chest and with a countenance of annoyance and disappointment directed at the viewer. This has been interpreted as indicative of what many African Americans felt about their service in the military during World War I—that their efforts, heroism, and risks were not appreciated, because of their race. In this and other paintings, such as The Honey Man, The Charleston Shrimp Man, and The Old Servant, Harleston's depictions of African Americans are noteworthy for the sense of humanity and dignity he conveyed.

Harleston died in 1932. His recognition as an artist increased in the years after his death. Because he created paintings of great sincerity and honesty and depicted African American people and life, he was an important precursor of the artists of the Harlem Renaissance before artists, who were a generation younger but founded their art on goals and ideals that were the same as his.

Biography

Edwin Harleston was born in 1882 in Charleston, South Carolina, the third of six children; his father was a rice planter and then an undertaker. Harleston was educated at the Avery Institute (graduating in 1900), Atlanta University (A.B., 1904), Boston Museum of Fine Arts School (1906–1912), and Harvard University. His awards included the Amy E. Springarn Prize, 1925, for Crisis of Ouida (a portrait of his wife); and the Alain Locke Portrait Prize, Harmon Foundation, New York, 1930, for The Old Servant. He died of pneumonia in 1932.

HERBERT R. HARTEL JR.

See also Artists; Douglas, Aaron

Exhibitions

1921–1923: New York Public Library, 135th Street branch.
1928, 1931, 1936: Harmon Foundation, New York.

1930, 1933: National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.
1936: Texas Centennial Exhibition, Museum of Fine Arts, Dallas.
1935, 1937: Howard University, Washington, D.C.
1941, 1945: South Side Community Art Center, Chicago.
1942: Downtown Gallery, New York.
1967: City College of the City University of New York.

Further Reading

- Driscoll, David. Two Centuries of Black American Art. New York and Los Angeles: Knopf and Los Angeles County Museum of Art, 1976, pp. 57, 136.
- "Edwin A. Harleston." University of South Carolina–Aiken Web site. (Biography page.)
- "Harleston, Edwin." In African-American Artists: A Bio-Bibliographical Dictionary, ed. Theresa Dickason Cederholm. Boston, Mass.: Boston Public Library, 1973.
- Henderson, Harry, and Romare Bearden. African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- McDaniel, Maurine Aku. Edwin Augustus Harleston, Portrait Painter 1882–1931. Atlanta, Ga.: Emory University, 1994.
- Powell, Richard J. Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- Reynolds, Gary. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1990, pp. 14, 17, 20, 31, 199–200.
- Severens, Martha R. The Charleston Renaissance. Spartanburg, S.C.: Saraland, 1998.

Harmon Foundation

The Harmon Foundation, or William E. Harmon Foundation, was the most important institution involved in promoting African American visual art during the Harlem Renaissance. Harmon, a real estate professional, created it in 1922 to encourage self-improvement among disadvantaged peoples by rewarding individual achievements. It had various programs but became best known for the Harmon Foundation Awards for Distinguished Achievement Among Negroes, which began in 1926 and received widespread press coverage in the late 1920s. During 1926–1930, the awards program was administered by Dr. George E. Haynes, chair of the Commission on Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches. The foundation was directed for many years by Mary Beattie Brady, who counted among her close advisers Haynes and also Alain Locke.

The foundation gave awards in eight categories: (1) literature, (2) music, (3) fine arts, (4) business and industry, (5) science and innovation, (6) education, (7) religious service, and (8) race relations. With regard to the fine arts, there was also, starting in 1928, an exhibition program of works entered by African Americans; separate prizes were awarded in conjunction with these annual exhibitions, which generated a good deal of interest among critics and others. From 1928 to 1933, largely because of the activities of the Harmon Foundation, African Americans emerged as a distinct presence in the American art world. After 1933 the awards program was discontinued, and the foundation devoted itself primarily to promoting African American artists through educational programs, publications, and exhibitions. By the time it closed down in 1967, the Harmon Foundation had acquired a significant body of work, some of which was dispersed to the art collections of historically black colleges. The archives of the Harmon Foundation, housed in the Library of Congress, remain a major repository of information on the development of early twentieth-century African American artists.

The Harmon Foundation encouraged discourse about the work of black American artists that shaped much subsequent criticism and scholarship, and its promotional materials and its policies regarding the exhibitions powerfully influenced viewers' response. The group shows opened in New York and traveled throughout the country. George Haynes was instrumental in organizing these shows, and he stipulated as a condition for bringing them into a particular community that the exhibition must be displayed in a place where both races could view it without discrimination. Exhibitions were thus typically sponsored by regional interracial councils and committees on race relations and displayed in black churches, libraries, public schools, and local branches of the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA). In 1930, the Federal Council of Churches sent questionnaires to the various organizations that had sponsored the show, asking for statistics on the number of white and black visitors. Host institutions were also asked to report on the effect of the show on white people who saw it and to note if there appeared to be any significant change in community race relations afterward. All this tended to encourage a sociological rather than an aesthetic approach to African American art—a situation that continued to vex the artists for the remainder of the twentieth century.

Although the Harmon Foundation was not commercial, one of its stated goals was financial self-sufficiency among black artists, and works in the traveling shows were offered for sale. Nominally, the foundation was committed simply to excellence and to cultivating creativity, but the purity of these objectives was bound to be undermined by its multiple roles as museum, agent, benefactor, and critical authority. Its opponents, then and later, regarded such conflicts of interest in a non-black philanthropic agency as a hindrance to the artists' growth and development. This climate of trade stimulated (and to an extent controlled) by well-meaning advocacy characterized a great deal of the cultural activity of the Harlem Renaissance.

Recent scholarship suggests that with respect to African American art, the efforts of the Harmon Foundation, however commendable, contributed to critical confusion and contradictory values. The foundation's official promotional literature insisted that the works entered in the competitions were judged solely on technical and aesthetic criteria (separate juries of arts professionals were convened for the fine arts awards and the exhibitions prizes), but spokesmen associated with the foundation (such as Alain Locke) stressed conspicuous racial identity as a criterion. Similarly, Haynes rejected the frequent suggestion by progressive artists and critics that the most powerful, "authentic" racial expression would come from naive or unschooled black artists, but the foundation stressed that many of the exhibiting artists were nonprofessionals.

In a well-known essay of 1934, "The Negro Artist and Modern Art," Romare Bearden accused the Harmon Foundation of taking a patronizing attitude toward black artists by encouraging them to exhibit prematurely. This accusation may seem unduly harsh, given that the foundation was then involved in establishing the professional credentials of black artists seeking employment in the Federal Arts Project. Nevertheless, the condescension Bearden described was conspicuous in press coverage of the foundation's awards and of the traveling exhibitions. In 1928 to 1933, accounts of the awards in newspapers were filled with hard-luck stories about aspiring black artists who supported themselves through manual labor and who showed remarkable creative ability despite their inexperience. Press releases on award winners always included biographical information that the foundation called "human interest" material.

Sometimes the press repeated this material verbatim, but often the information was used selectively, with an emphasis on the artists' humble circumstances rather than their training or experience.

Historians have also asked to what extent the foundation deliberately promoted essentialist notions of black aesthetics. Haynes's own belief in universal artistic standards was evident in the makeup of the juries, but the foundation's literature sent mixed and even conflicting messages. Officials were concerned about the technical proficiency of African American art, or "Negro art," but were also aware that they could best stimulate interest in it by identifying it as distinctive. Thus some scholars have concluded that the foundation actively encouraged exhibiting artists to make characteristically racial art, and certainly Locke's close association with the foundation supports this belief. However, the foundation's catalogs and publicity represented both the universalist and the essentialist positions. Press packets for the traveling shows, for example, quoted reviews of past exhibitions in which the affirmation of characteristically racial artistic qualities and the mastery of prevailing conventions were both acknowledged.

The Harmon Foundation's group shows had their greatest success in the early 1930s, when the fascination with primitivism and black culture generated by Harlem Renaissance was in decline. In 1931, the foundation shifted the site of its shows in New York from International House, a kind of multicultural center, to the Art Center; this move resulted in a significant change in the press coverage and in the promotional materials. Before 1931, the foundation's catalogs had been essentially illustrated checklists, but in 1931 and again in 1933, Locke contributed substantial essays positioning the works in an explicit critical and historical context. Although Locke rehashed many issues that had emerged in his early treatises of the Harlem Renaissance, these catalog essays reveal a subtle but strategic new emphasis. In the context of the cultural nationalist rhetoric of the 1930s, it began to appear that the Harmon Foundation had reinforced traditional inequalities of race and power by constructing the black artist as a distinct category, who then was driven into the margins as the "Negro vogue" dissipated. During these years Locke, and also James Porter, worked to integrate black artists into a cultural mainstream preoccupied with the Depression and normative "Americanism."

Because the Harmon Foundation had a virtual monopoly on promoting black visual artists, it played a crucial role in the subsequent formation of the canon. Through its awards and exhibitions, the foundation systematically introduced a critical mass of black artists to the American public. The foundation carefully constructed a narrative of black artistic progress, which in turn created an informed public that could chart its course by following the activities of the foundation. Press releases each year speculated on the future promise of prizewinners and often mentioned that the prize money facilitated trips abroad for education and development. By 1930, critics in the mass media prefaced their reviews of the foundation's shows with comments implying that the names of the black artists had become household words. With a few notable exceptions, the Harmon Foundation launched—and to an extent managed—the career of nearly every African American artist who emerged in the years between the two world wars. The black artistic canon that emerged from the Harmon Foundation has endured a very long time; to this day, most of the African Americans represented in Harlem Renaissance art exhibitions were introduced to the general public through the foundation's shows, and many were prizewinners.

MARY ANN CALO

See also Cultural Organizations; Harmon Traveling Exhibition; Haynes, George Edmund; Locke, Alain; Porter, James Amos

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare. "The Negro Artist and Modern Art." Opportunity, 12, December 1934.
- Breaking Racial Barriers: African Americans in the Harmon Foundation Collection*. Washington, D.C., and San Francisco, Calif.: Smithsonian Institution and Pomegranate Artbooks, 1997.
- Leininger-Miller, Theresa. New Negro Artists in Paris: African American Painters and Sculptors in the City of Light, 1922–1934. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Malloy, Erma Meadows. "African-American Visual Artists and the Harmon Foundation." Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University Teacher's College, 1991.
- Negro Artists: An Illustrated Review of Their Achievements*. New York: Harmon Foundation, 1935.

Reynolds, Gary, and Beryl J. Wright, Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1989.

Harmon, Pappy

Pappy Harmon was a native New Yorker, born in Greenwich Village shortly after the mid-nineteenth century. He moved to Harlem after his wife and children died of influenza during the Spanish-American War. He had been in show business—as a ventriloquist—until 1910, when theater doors were closed to black performers. Needing work, he acquired a small wagon and a horse he called Maude and rode up and down 131st Street peddling vegetables, fruit, fresh fish, and assorted junk. He must have been quite a sight, with his long, lanky frame wrapped in a threadbare pair of old-fashioned overalls and topped by a shock of gleaming white hair against his dark black face. His beloved Maude was not his only pet; he also kept pigeons, which he called his children, on the roof of his apartment building. Although he was an entertainer by trade, many chose to label him crazy, eccentric, or just a “little too much” to take (Mitchell 1967, 73). In reality, however, Pappy Harmon was more than just an entertainer and crazy local junk dealer. He was a sort of street philosopher, a sage of Harlem.

Harmon was deeply interested in human psychology, current events, and cultural movements—in truth, he was simply interested in understanding human beings. He said that he enjoyed peddling junk and produce on the street because it afforded him an opportunity to be among the people. He told the young Lofton Mitchell, “You never know unless you’re out there among people just what’s going to happen next. You go and hide someplace and you can find yourself kicked right out of a lot of places—like the theatre” (74). It was said that Harmon’s two-room apartment was lined with books and the walls were lined with newspaper clippings telling the story of African American drama: articles about Bert Williams, Charles Gilpin, The Emperor Jones, and other contemporary developments in black theater. Once, Harmon happened on a street-corner conversation about Florence Mills’s place in American theater, and after listening for just a moment, he chimed in: “What’s the matter with you all? Someone here was just looking for a white person to compare Florence with? Why do we always have to have a white person to remind us of ourselves? . . . Why can’t we say there ain’t no words for Florence Mills? Let’s just say—she’s Florence Mills,” and he stormed off (Mitchell, 78). Despite this kind of straightforward, insightful thinking, Harmon was often ridiculed or dismissed as a lunatic. However, for those who took the time to listen to him, he made perfect sense, and he left a lasting impression. Mitchell recalls, “In those days—like most kids on my block—I thought Pappy Harmon knew everything. If Pappy said the Yankees would win the pennant, that Babe Ruth would hit a homer, and that there’d be no war this year, I believed him” (77).

Biography

Pappy Harmon was born c. 1860 in Greenwich Village. He lost his wife and children to influenza during the Spanish-American War and thereafter moved to Harlem. He worked as a ventriloquist and all-around showman until 1910. He became a street vendor and junk dealer on 131st Street. Harmon died in the summer of 1929 in his apartment on Fifth Avenue.

STEPHEN CRINITI

See also Emperor Jones, The; Gilpin, Charles; Mills, Florence; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”

Further Reading

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984, p. 156.

Mitchell, Lofton. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.

Harmon Traveling Exhibition

In 1922, William E. Harmon began the Harmon Foundation, and by 1925 he teamed up with George Haynes of the Federal Council of Churches and Alain Locke of the New Negro movement to sponsor an awards ceremony. The Harmon Foundation awards offered both recognition and a monetary gift to Negroes who excelled in their field and who worked for the betterment of race relations in America. After the awards of 1927, which saw a significant number of entries in the fine arts category, the director of the foundation, Mary Beattie Brady, suggested that it sponsor an exhibition of the fine arts submissions in conjunction with the annual awarding of medals. In January 1928, the first annual “Exhibit of Fine Arts Productions of American Negro Artists” opened at International House on Riverside Drive in New York City. Although International House was small and awkward, Brady chose it mainly because she wanted “a place where the two races would meet under the most harmonious circumstances” (Reynolds 1989, 34). The modest exhibit of 1928 lasted only about ten days, but a seed had been sown for the more extensive exhibitions to come.

Over six years from 1928 to 1933, the Harmon Foundation held five such exhibitions (there was none in 1932), giving 125 black artists an opportunity to display their work. These exhibitions were the first of their kind to showcase only black artists. Some of the notable artists featured (often in multiple exhibitions) were Palmer Hayden, Laura Wheeler Waring, William H. Johnson, Sargent Johnson, Richmond Barthé, Hale Woodruff, Malvin Gray Johnson, and Aaron Douglas. Beginning in 1929, the exhibition toured the country after closing in New York. By the end of 1930, it had reached almost twenty cities, including Atlanta, Baltimore, Boston, Nashville, Oakland, San Diego, Denver, Houston, Minneapolis, and New Orleans. Not only did the exhibition grow, but the accompanying catalog grew as well. The catalog began as nothing more than a glorified checklist, but it was expanded in 1931 to include essays by Alain Locke, Arthur Schomburg, and Alon Bemont, among others. As a result of the expanded catalog and the considerable attention the exhibits received in the press, the Harmon exhibition grew into more than simply a display of black artwork; it became the primary occasion for discussions of Negro art.

Each exhibition catalog included some form of the following statement of goals, which appeared in 1931: “It was hoped through this assembling to acquaint and interest the public more generally in the creative accomplishments in fine arts by Negroes, thereby assisting this group to a more sound and satisfactory economic position” (4). The original catalog, in 1928, had added to these two goals a third: “stimulating [the Negro] to aim for the highest standards of achievement” (quoted in Bennett 1928, 111). George Haynes echoed this sentiment when he referred to the exhibited works as “not ‘Negro Art’ but universal art” (quoted in Reynolds, 108). Such statements can easily be read as a call for black artists to strive for a Eurocentric set of standards—in other words, they sound as if the Harmon Foundation had asked the entrants to “paint white.” There was some confusion, however, about the foundation’s standards, as the administrators not only called for a “universal” art but also—led by Locke—began to solicit art that would explicitly address Negro subjects and tap into a perceived vital primitiveness. These statements of goals as well as the somewhat confusing set of criteria for judging sparked considerable controversy among critics and raised serious questions about the definition and nature of “Negro art.”

Critics reacted strongly to the exhibition for a variety of reasons. One notable criticism was that the foundation’s administrators were showcasing artists who had not yet matured enough in their craft. The work of professionals often hung next to that of amateurs, causing the artists’ technical handicraft to be questioned. Describing the selection process, Aaron Douglas said, memorably: “Harlem was sifted. Neither streets, homes nor public institutions escaped. When unsuspecting Negroes were found with a brush in their hands they were immediately hauled away and held for interpretation. . . . Every effort to protest their innocence was drowned out with big-mouthed praise” (quoted in Dover 1960, 31). Another frequent criticism, notably voiced by Cyril Kay-Scott of the Denver Art Museum, was that without the exhibition title above the door, viewers might believe they were looking at an exhibition of white artists. But other critics argued that, on the contrary, the artists were trying too hard to draw on primitive roots, when they had never truly experienced this kind of primitivism in their own lives. Henderson (1928, 123) observed: “The Negro artist of today is likely to meet two chief dangers—that of self-consciously trying to return to the primitive art of his race and that of imitating the products of white artists. By either of these routes he fails to express himself as a modern Negro in a modern environment.”

The most scathing and most famous criticism of the Harmon Foundation’s exhibitions, however, came from Romare Bearden, in an article in Opportunity. Bearden essentially gathered all of the objections mentioned previously into one concentrated condemnation of the foundation: “First, we have no valid standard of criticism; secondly, foundations and societies which supposedly encourage Negro artists really hinder them; thirdly, the Negro artist has no definite ideology or social philosophy.” He went on to lament a lack of feeling in the black artworks and concluded: “An intense, eager devotion to present day life, to study it, to help relieve it, this is the calling of the Negro artist" (1934, 372).

Still, the Harmon Foundation's exhibitions, however flawed, promoted the careers of nearly all of the artists of the Harlem Renaissance and thereby made a future for black art possible. Also, the criticisms leveled at these exhibitions were themselves necessary to the life of black art. The exhibitions provided, for the first time, a platform for vitally important conversations about the nature and role of black art in America—conversations that were long overdue and that continue to propel American art today.

STEPHEN CRINITI

See also Harmon Foundation; Haynes, George Edmund; Locke, Alain; Schomburg, Arthur A.; specific artists

Selected Publications (Harmon Foundation)

Exhibit of Fine Arts by American Negro Artists. New York, 1929.

Exhibit of Fine Arts by American Negro Artists. New York, 1930.

Exhibit of Fine Arts: Productions of American Negro Artists. New York, 1928.

Exhibition of Productions by Negro Artists. New York, 1933.

Exhibition of the Work of Negro Artists at the Art Center. New York, 1931.

Negro Artists: An Illustrated Review of Their Achievements. New York, 1935.

Further Reading

Bearden, Romare. "The Negro Artist and Modern Art." Opportunity, December 1934, pp. 371–372.

Bennett, Gwendolyn B. "The American Negro Paints." Southern Workman, 57(3), 1928, pp. 111–112.

Dover, Cedric. American Negro Art. New York: New York Graphic Society, 1960.

"Editorials: American Negro Art." Opportunity, August 1926, pp. 238–239.

"Exhibit Raises Question Whether Negro Should Paint 'White'." Art Digest, 15 February 1931, p. 7.

Henderson, Rose. "First Nation-Wide Exhibit of Negro Artists." Southern Workman, 57(3), 1928, pp. 121–126.

———. "Exhibit of Painting and Sculpture by Negro Artists." Southern Workman, 58(4), 1929, pp. 165–169.

———. "American Negro Exhibit at International House." Southern Workman, 59(4), 1930, pp. 166–170.

———. "Negro Artists in the Fifth Harmon Exhibition." Southern Workman, 62(4), 1933, pp. 175–181.

"The Negro Annual." Art Digest, 15 May 1934, p. 18.

Reynolds, Gary A., and Beryl J. Wright. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1989.

Harper Brothers

Harper Brothers publishing company began in New York in March 1817, when the brothers James and John Harper, who had both been apprentices for printing firms, joined to start their own printing firm, J. and J. Harper. Their two younger brothers joined them—one in 1823 and the other in 1825—and with all four working together, they began to see themselves as publishers instead of just printers. The Harper brothers' approach to publishing was innovative in several ways. They were the first to introduce to the United States the concept of a series of books, which were published as "libraries." They were also the first publishing house to deal in a general list. In 1833, the firm switched to a steam press and changed its imprint to Harper and Bros. The firm continued to change with the times, introducing British authors and titles and publishing respected names, so that by the end of the nineteenth century, Harper Brothers was the leading publishing house in America.

During the 1890s the firm began to experience financial difficulties and had to borrow large sums of money from J. P. Morgan and Company. In consequence, for the first time, the firm was not under family control. The change in control led to several unfortunate and nearly devastating choices that prolonged the company's financial struggles into the early 1920s. Ultimately, two vice presidents—Thomas B. Wells and Henry Hoyns—were able to implement a plan to relieve the company of its two-decade cycle of debt. This plan included moving the firm from Franklin Square to East Thirty-third Street and finally resolving the issue of control by instituting Douglas Parmentier as president of the company in 1924. With these changes, then, Harper Brothers began a new era.

In 1925, the company made several dramatic changes in order to keep up with new publishers such as Knopf, Boni and Liveright, and Harcourt Brace. For one thing, the firm revamped Harper's magazine, evidently in an effort to make it look more like Knopf's American Mercury. The changes included a new editor with “modern” preferences and an updated look for the magazine, developed with the help of W. A. Dwiggins, who was chief designer at Knopf. The contents of the magazine were remodeled, and the cover also underwent a transformation so as to resemble American Mercury. This version of Harper's came out in September 1925, and circulation doubled quickly thereafter. All of this helped transform one of America's oldest publishing houses in such a way that it was in line with the new tastes reflected by other publishers in New York.

With regard to the Harlem Renaissance, one of the most significant changes made by Harpers at this time was to bring in Eugene Saxton as book editor. Saxton soon began to attract African American authors, including Countee Cullen. Harpers published Cullen's first volume of poetry, Color, and Frederick Lewis Allen, who was chief editor at the time, nominated the collection for a Pulitzer Prize. Harpers kept in close contact with Cullen after this first volume and supported him in other endeavors as well. Allen asked Cullen to represent the company at a book celebration week at the Jordan Marsh department store in Boston, and Harpers also assisted Cullen in negotiations to set several of the poems from Color to music. Additionally, Harpers arranged a lecture tour for Cullen and asked him to contribute poems to Harper's magazine. In 1927, Harpers published Caroling Dusk, an anthology of black poetry edited by Cullen. That year the company also published his second and third volumes of poetry, Copper Sun and The Ballad of the Brown Girl. In 1930, Saxton asked Cullen to write a book-length poem about the history of blacks in America. Cullen expressed interest, but this project was never undertaken, because he began to focus his efforts on a novel, One Way to Heaven. Nevertheless, Harpers remained Cullen's lifelong publisher.

Harpers also supported Claude McKay. The firm published his first novel, which was an expanded version of his short story “Home to Harlem,” as well as his next novel, Banjo, which appeared in 1929. Although there was a loss in the demand for McKay's works after the stock market crash of 1929, he and Harpers continued their relationship. However, Harpers lost money publishing McKay's collection of short stories, Gingertown (1932), and his novel Banana Bottom (1933); and Saxton then told McKay that he no longer wanted to publish a novel entitled “Savage Loving,” which he had earlier asked McKay to revise for publication in place of Gingertown. McKay's agent, Max Lieber, reportedly told McKay that this decision was based on Saxton's opinion that the Harlem Renaissance was a fad and that people no longer cared about black authors. But it seems questionable that this was actually Saxton's opinion. Max Lieber was a member of the Communist Party, and the comment he attributed to Saxton was actually the party's position on the Harlem Renaissance; also, Lieber may have had political reasons for attacking McKay, because McKay had become disillusioned with the Communist Party. More probably, both Saxton and Lieber were reluctant to publish “Savage Loving” because of its overt homosexual content.

Whatever Saxton's opinion was regarding the Harlem Renaissance, Harpers continued to publish writings by African American authors. The firm published The Medea and Some Poems by Countee Cullen in 1935, Claude McKay's autobiography A Long Way From Home in 1937, and Richard Wright's Uncle Tom's Children in 1938 and Native Son in 1940. During the 1930s, the number of works by African American authors waned, but Harpers does not seem to have given up publishing black authors simply because the Harlem Renaissance was said to be a “fad.” Instead, Harpers maintained its relationship with the two prominent black authors it had begun publishing in the 1920s, and it took on Richard Wright, the next important African American author to emerge after the Depression.

APRIL CONLEY KILINSKI

See also American Mercury; Boni and Liveright; Color; Copper Sun; Cullen, Countee; Harcourt Brace; Knopf, Alfred A., Inc.; McKay, Claude; Publishers and Publishing Houses

Further Reading

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Tebbel, John. Between Covers: The Rise and Transformation of Book Publishing in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Harrington, James Carl “Hamtree”

Hamtree (James Carl) Harrington was born in 1889 and was one of many comedians of his generation who aspired to take on the mantle of the great Bert Williams. Harrington joined a traveling carnival at age fourteen and soon established himself as a black-face comedian in Williams's mold; in fact, he was billed as "the vest pocket Bert Williams." The name Hamtree came from a sketch in which he hid a stolen ham in a tree.

An early romance with a chorus girl, Edna Murray, produced a son. By 1916, Harrington had teamed up with Maude Mills, the sister of Florence Mills. In March 1916, they were married onstage at Gibson's Standard Theater in Philadelphia. They toured the black vaudeville circuits with modest success until 1920. Reviewing their act in 1920, Sime Silverman of Variety found Harrington's imitation of Williams competent but "cold" beside the original.

In 1921, Harrington and Mills separated, and he found a new female partner, Cora Green. She had previously been a member of the Panama Trio singing group with Florence Mills. The new partnership was featured in the first black show to follow Shuffle Along, Put and Take (1921), a clever revue that was, however, panned for imitating white shows. Then followed Creamer and Layton's Strut Miss Lizzie (1922), which was not much more successful despite numbers like "Dear Old Southland" and "Way Down Yonder in New Orleans."

Greater success came when Harrington and Green spent a year with Florence Mills's Dixie to Broadway (1924–1925); audiences loved Harrington's haunted house scene, although sophisticates deplored it. Their success earned them a four-year contract on the prestigious Keith-Albee vaudeville circuit in 1925, starring in a show called Nobody's Gal. They made some records on the Brunswick label. In 1927, they were summoned to London to replace the ailing Florence Mills in the provincial tour of Blackbirds of 1927.

By 1930, Harrington was again on his own. He continued in black shows, Change Your Luck (1930) with Alberta Hunter, Old Kentucky (1932) with Clara Smith, and then with Ethel Waters in an otherwise all-white success on Broadway, As Thousands Cheer (1933). With vaudeville and live entertainment withering during the Depression, he found a place in black movies. These included Rufus Jones for President (1933), with Ethel Waters and a very young Sammy Davis Jr.; The Devil's Daughter (1934), with the beautiful Nina Mae McKinney; and Keep Punchin' (1938), a vehicle for the boxing champion Henry Armstrong.

Mainly these movies, plus some musical shorts, keep Harrington's name in the public memory, but his stage career was not yet over. He played in Lew Leslie's last comeback attempt, Blackbirds of 1939, a flop that nevertheless helped launch Lena Horne's career. Harrington was a founding member of the Negro Actors' Guild in 1937. After he had retired to live in Harlem, he returned one last time in another unsuccessful revival, Shuffle Along of 1952.

Hamtree Harrington died in 1956. His career, spanning the era of the Harlem Renaissance, epitomized the opportunities available for black comedians of the time if they were prepared to occupy approved niche roles.

Biography

James Carl "Hamtree" Harrington was born in Columbia, South Carolina, in 1889. He left school at age fourteen, performed in vaudeville before 1920, and then performed in stage shows: Put and Take (1921), Strut Miss Lizzie (1922), Dixie to Broadway (1924), Nobody's Gal (1926), Blackbirds of 1927 (England, 1927), Harlem Girl (1930), Change Your Luck (1930), Old Kentucky (1932), As Thousands Cheer (1933), Blackbirds of 1939 (1939), and Shuffle Along of 1952 (1952). His film appearances included Gayety (Vitaphone short, 1929), His Woman (1931), Rufus Jones for President (1933), The Devil's Daughter (1934), and Keep Punchin' (1938). Hamilton was a founding member of the Negro Actors' Guild in 1937. He died in Harlem in 1956.

BILL EGAN

See also Blackbirds; Blackface Performance; Film: Actors; McKinney, Nina Mae; Mills, Florence; Racial Stereotyping; Vaudeville; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"

Further Reading

- Kellner, Bruce. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1987.
- Peterson, Bernard L. Jr. A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- . Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow Press, 1977.
- . Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow Press, 1980.

Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. New York: Da Capo, 1991, pp. 102–104.

Harrison, Hubert

Hubert Harrison—a writer, orator, editor, educator, and radical political activist—lived in Harlem from 1907 until his death in 1927. A. Philip Randolph called him the father of Harlem radicalism; J. A. Rogers considered him the foremost Afro-American intellect of his time and the political leader with the sanest and most effective program; James Weldon Johnson considered him a “walking cyclopedia,” especially of history and literature.

Harrison played a major role in the largest class-radical movement (socialism) and the largest race-radical movement (the “New Negro” and Garveyism) in American history. In the 1910s and 1920s, when Harlem became the international center of radical black thought, he profoundly influenced people such as Randolph, Chandler Owen, Cyril Briggs, Richard B. Moore, W. A. Domingo, and Marcus Garvey. Many of his ideas became the stock in trade of the black left in the twentieth century.

Harrison was also a cultural and literary force who wrote book and theater reviews, articles, and editorials; lectured (his series for the Board of Education, “Literary Lights of Yesterday and Today,” is especially notable); edited five publications based in Harlem; aided black writers and artists (including Rogers, Andy Razaf, Walter Everette Hawkins, Claude McKay, Lucian B. Watkins, Anselmo Jackson, Solomon Plaatje, Charles Gilpin, and Augusta Savage); and helped develop the 135th Street Public Library into an international center for research in black culture.

In 1900 to 1910, Harrison was active in lyceums at Saint Benedict’s and Saint Mark’s churches; in educational programs at the Young Men’s Christian Association (YMCA) and the White Rose Home for Colored Working Girls; in literary societies, discussion groups, and workers’ circles; and with several small black periodicals. He worked with Arthur Schomburg, John Bruce, the actor and activist Charles Burroughs, the social worker and activist Frances Reynolds Keyser, and the bibliophile George Young. In this period Harrison broke from organized religion and was attracted to free thought, socialism, scientific humanism, and the protest philosophy of W. E. B. Du Bois.

From 1911 to 1914, Harrison was America’s leading black socialist writer, theoretician, campaigner, and speaker, and the initiator of the party’s first major effort at organizing African Americans, the Colored Socialist Club. In 1917 he founded the first organization and first newspaper of the militant “New Negro” movement: the Liberty League (which prepared the groundwork for Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association, UNIA) and The Voice. In 1919, Harrison edited the monthly New Negro; in January 1920 he became the principal editor of Garvey’s Negro World, which he reshaped into an international political and literary force with pointed editorials, regular book reviews, a magazine section devoted to poetry for the people, and later a column, “West Indian News Notes.” In the 1920s, after leaving the Negro World, Harrison lectured on literary, historical, scientific, and political topics for the Board of Education’s “Trends of the Times” series and other organizations; wrote book and theater reviews and articles; was an activist against censorship; and helped build the Department of Negro Literature and History at the 135th Street Public Library, the International Colored Unity League, and Voice of the Negro.

Politically and in his literary work, Harrison focused on the common people, and his race-conscious mass appeal marked a shift from the leadership approaches of Booker T. Washington and Du Bois. He rejected Washington’s reliance on white patrons and a black political machine and Du Bois’s reliance on the “talented tenth.” He was a candid critic of the creative arts who preferred objective assessments to the notion that blacks had to be presented in a favorable light, and he believed that the critic should not dictate to the artist. His mass-based “New Negro” movement preceded and was qualitatively different from the more middle-class, more arts-based, and more apolitical movement associated with the publication of Alain Locke’s New Negro in 1925. Harrison’s life and work suggest important issues about the Harlem Renaissance. He openly questioned the genuineness of the “literary renaissance,” the willingness to take “standards of value ready-made from white society,” and the claim of a significant new rebirth. He maintained that there had been an uninterrupted, although ignored, stream of literary and artistic products by blacks from 1850 into the 1920s and that what was called a renaissance was mostly a creation of whites who overlooked such contributions. He envisioned a true literary renaissance that would express the true values and aspirations of black people, and he challenged the role of many prominent gatekeepers of culture who he felt depended on whites and were unable or unwilling to form their own opinions.

Harrison died unexpectedly at age forty-four, leaving a wife and five children. His funeral, in Harlem in December 1927, was attended by thousands, but within months of his death the Harlem activist Hodge Kirnon noted an ominous “concerted silence” about his life. Many prominent African American and leftist leaders, particularly those, like Du Bois, who had been stung by his criticism, were noticeably silent. This situation was intensified by the fact that Harrison had been poor, black, foreign-born, and from the Caribbean; had opposed capitalism, racism, and the Christian church; had supported socialism, “race consciousness,” racial equality, women’s equality, free thought, and birth control; and had been more of a “freelance” educator and activist than an “organization man.” As the twenty-first century opened, however, a rapidly growing interest in Harrison was evident.

Biography

Hubert Harrison was born on 27 April 1883, in Estate Concordia, Saint Croix, Danish West Indies, and emigrated to New York City in 1900 (he was naturalized in 1922). He studied in public schools in Saint Croix and New York City and was self-educated thereafter. He worked as associate editor, Unique Advertiser, New York, 1904; editor, St. Mark’s Mirror, New York, 1906; editor, Fair Play, New Rochelle, New York, 1906; post office clerk, New York, 1907–1911; public speaker, Socialist Party of New York, 1911–1914; editor, The Masses, New York, 1911; instructor, Modern School, New York, 1915; columnist, New York News, 1915; contributing editor, Colored American Review, New York, 1915; editor, The Voice, New York, 1917–1919; organizer, American Federation of Labor, Philadelphia, Atlantic City, and Washington, D.C., 1918; cochair, National Liberty Congress, Washington, D.C., 1918; editor, New Negro, New York, 1919; editor, Negro World, New York, 1920, then associate editor and contributing editor, 1920–1922; lecturer, New York City Board of Education, 1922–1926; columnist, Boston Chronicle, 1924; columnist New York Inter-State Tattler, 1924; speaker, La Follette for President Committee, Milwaukee, Chicago, and Indianapolis; speaker, American Negro Labor Congress, New York, 1926; editor, Embryo of the Voice of the Negro, New York, 1927; and editor, Voice of the Negro, New York, 1927. He also wrote for numerous periodicals and founded several organizations. He died in New York City, on 17 December 1927.

JEFFREY PERRY

See also Briggs, Cyril; Domingo, W. A.; Garvey, Marcus; Johnson, James Weldon; McKay, Claude; Moore, Richard B.; Negro World; 135th Street Library; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Saint Mark’s Methodist Episcopal Church; Savage, Augusta; other specific individuals

Selected Works

The Negro and the Nation. 1917.
When Africa Awakes: The “Inside Story” of the Stirrings and Strivings of the New Negro in the Western World. 1920.
A Hubert Harrison Reader, ed. Jeffrey B. Perry. 2001.

Further Reading

Foner, Philip S. American Socialism and Black Americans: From the Age of Jackson to World War II. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1977.

Gaines, Kevin K. Uplifting the Race: Black Leadership, Politics, and Culture in the Twentieth Century. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Jackson, John G. Hubert Henry Harrison: The Black Socrates. Austin, Tex.: American Atheist, 1987.

James, Portia. “Hubert H. Harrison and the New Negro Movement.” Western Journal of Black Studies, 13, 1989.

James, Winston. Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in Early Twentieth-Century America. New York: Verso, 1998.

———. “Being Red and Black in Jim Crow America: Notes on the Ideology and Travails of Afro-America’s Socialist Pioneers, 1877–1930.” Souls, 1(4), Fall 1999, pp. 45–63.

Moore, Richard B. “Hubert Henry Harrison (1883–1927).” In Dictionary of American Negro Biography, ed. Rayford W. Logan and Michael R. Winston. New York: Norton, 1982.

Perry, Jeffrey B. “Hubert Henry Harrison ‘The Father of Harlem Radicalism’: The Early Years—1883 through the Founding of the Liberty League and The Voice in 1917.” Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1986.

———. “An Introduction to Hubert Harrison, ‘the Father of Harlem Radicalism.’” Souls, 2(1), Winter 2000, pp. 38–54.

———, ed. A Hubert Harrison Reader. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 2001.

Rogers, Joel A. World’s Great Men of Color, 2 vols., ed. with intro. John Henrik Clarke. New York: Collier, 1972.

Samuels, Wilfred D. “Hubert H. Harrison and ‘The New Negro Manhood Movement.’” Afro-Americans in New York Life and History, 5, January 1981.

Harrison, Richard

Richard Berry Harrison is best known for his first and only professional theatrical role, which he secured at age sixty-five: De Lawd in Marc Connelly’s The Green Pastures. Harrison was reluctant to take the part, fearing that the play would be a version of Uncle Tom in heaven and that he would be betraying his race; but he overcame his doubts and dedicated the remaining five years of his life to portraying an anthropomorphic God made in the image of a southern black preacher for the 1,657 performances of the show on Broadway and the company’s three-and-a-half-year national tour.

A graduate of the Detroit Training School of Art (1887), Harrison was proficient in elocution and a talented actor but was prevented by the color line from developing a career on the legitimate stage. Supporting himself as a bellhop, Pullman porter, and dining car waiter throughout the 1890s, he took his public readings of poetry and Shakespeare on tour. He also teamed up with his good friend the poet Paul Laurence Dunbar, serving as a reader of dialect poems from the collection Oak and Ivory in an effort to sell Dunbar’s books. Eventually Harrison found employment as a reader with the Lyceum Bureau of Los Angeles and toured in Mexico, California, and the Midwest and throughout the South giving performances and lectures at colleges and in churches.

Noting that young African Americans had no access to theatrical training, Harrison began his career as an educator in dramatics at the start of World War I. This was the era of the “great migration,” and Harrison spent these years campaigning for funds to institute training programs for church schools, setting up summer lyceum courses in New York City, and teaching elocution and drama at Branch Normal in Arkansas, Flipper Key College in Oklahoma, and Haines Institute in Augusta, Georgia. During the 1920s, he ran a summer-school dramatics curriculum for teachers at North Carolina Agricultural and Technical College and served as a lecturer for the Greater New York Federation of Churches, directing church festivals, training church dramatic groups, and giving recitals. By the time he appeared on Broadway as a humane, dignified God who “walked the earth like a natural man,” he had trained more than 300 teachers and scores of students who otherwise would have had little access to formal education in theater and drama.

Although Harrison did not fit the usual profile of the New Negro as outlined by Alain Locke, it is clear that his commitment to racial pride and to providing access to the professional skills of theater and public speaking for young African Americans was in line with the movement. He, like Locke and Montgomery Gregory, determined that technique and training in the arts would become an important resource for successful race relations through which the acceptance of African Americans as equal and productive citizens could be secured.

Biography

Richard Berry Harrison was born on 28 September 1864, in London, Ontario. He attended the Training School of Art, in Detroit, from which he graduated in 1887. He founded the summer dramatic school for teachers at North Carolina Agriculture and Technical State University in Greensboro, which he ran 1922–1929. He performed in one-man versions of Macbeth and Julius Caesar for the Lyceum Bureau; helped write and played the lead in Frank Wilson’s Pa Williams’ Gal (1923) for the Lafayette Theater; toured as Shylock and Othello in one-man versions of The Merchant of Venice and Othello, respectively; appeared in the films How High Is Up (1923) and Easy Street (1930); and played De Lawd in The Green Pastures for the Broadway productions and on the national tour (1930–1935), a role for which he won the Springarn Award in 1931. He received an honorary master’s degree from Howard University and a doctorate in dramatic literature from North Carolina Agriculture and Technical College and Lincoln University in 1934. Harrison was the first actor to be awarded the Sigma Society Key from Boston University. He died in Harlem on 14 March 1935.

ANDREA J. NOURIEH

See also Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Green Pastures, The; Lafayette Theater; Pa Williams’ Gal

Further Reading

- Daniel, Walter C. "'Absolution': An Unpublished Poem by Richard B. Harrison." Negro History Bulletin, 37, 1974, pp. 309–311.
- . "The Green Pastures: Religiosity in the American Theatre." Journal of American Culture, 5(1), Spring 1982, pp. 51–58.
- . "De Lawd": Richard B. Harrison and The Green Pastures. New York: Greenwood, 1987.
- Haskins, James. Black Theater in America. New York: HarperCollins, 1982.
- Hatch, James V. "Theatre in Historically Black Colleges: A Survey of 100 Years." In A Sourcebook of African-American Performance: Plays, People, Movements, ed. Annemarie Bean. New York: Routledge, 1999, pp. 151–164.
- Hill, Errol. Shakespeare in Sable: A History of Black Shakespearean Actors. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1984.
- Mapp, Edward. Directory of Blacks in the Performing Arts, 2nd ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1990.

Hayden, Palmer C.

Palmer Hayden showed artistic talent at an early age, but after failing to set himself up as an artist, he joined two circuses as a roustabout; there he drew advertisements and portraits of the performers, and it was perhaps through this experience that he sharpened his powers of observation and developed the directness that would be characteristic of his later work. During World War I, in the army, he made maps. (His experiences in the army would provide the subject for a series of paintings in the 1960s and 1970s, and in 1973, he was awarded a Creative Arts Project grant in New York City to develop a series of paintings of the history of the black soldier in America.) After his discharge from the army in 1920, Hayden moved to New York City, where he studied painting and drawing at Columbia University and worked in the post office. He eventually settled in Greenwich Village. He supported himself as a janitor at Cooper Union and began working with Victor Perard, one of the teachers there; he captured his experience in The Janitor Paints a Picture (1936, National Museum of American Art). The city would become an important source for his paintings; he executed views of street scenes, the environs of New York City public housing, and landmarks such as the Brooklyn Bridge. During the summers he worked at the Boothbay Art Colony in Maine with A. C. Randall, executing marine scenes that earned a Harmon Foundation Gold Award for painting in 1926. Along with the financial support of a patron whose identity has been lost to history, the Harmon Foundation award allowed Hayden to study in Europe.

He set up a studio in Paris and spent his summers in Brittany. In Paris, at the suggestion of the painter Laura Wheeler Waring, he visited Henry Ossawa Tanner; he also befriended Hale Woodruff—who described him as a bon vivant and dandy. (He introduced himself to Woodruff with the words, "A buzzard laid me and the sun hatched me.") Hayden and Woodruff associated with a group of expatriate African Americans; Hayden's watercolor Nous à Quatre Paris (c. 1930, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York) shows Hayden, Woodruff, the poet Countee Cullen, and another member of the group, Ernest Dupré, playing cards in a café similar to the Café La Coupole, which Hayden painted several times.

In Paris, Hayden developed a figural style that shows the influence of current trends such as art deco and cubism and is related to the stylizations of Aaron Douglas and the posters and illustrations of French artists such as Paul Colin and Roger Perot depicting musicians and dancers in plush interracial social settings. Hayden studied at the École des Beaux Arts and constantly visited the Louvre. Like many of his contemporaries, he grappled with the notion of developing a uniquely African American art based on African art. Alain Locke, in the essay "The Legacy of Ancestral Arts" (1925), noted that "a younger group of Negro artists" were "beginning to move in the direction of a racial school of art." Although he admitted that African Americans experienced as much alienation and misunderstanding as Europeans when they first encountered African art, he said that "there is the possibility that the sensitive artistic mind of the American Negro, stimulated by a cultural pride and interest, will receive from African arts a profound and galvanizing influence." Hayden, who met Locke in Paris, would acknowledge that influence in Fetiché and Fleurs (1926, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee), in which a head from the Fang group is placed in a traditional still life arrangement. Hayden also produced witty depictions of reconstructed African villages and dancers at the Paris Exposition Coloniale of 1930, conveying the artificiality of fabricated reconstructions of "native" life but also the dignity of the "natives" caught in this anomalous situation. Hayden never visited

Hayden, Palmer C.

Africa, but in the 1960s he would return to African themes.

When Hayden came back to New York in 1932, he found employment in the Federal Arts Project and was assigned to paint scenes along the Hudson River. After leaving this project in 1940, he began to concentrate on various aspects of the life he observed around him.

Many critics have noted that Hayden's work eludes specific classification because he imitated no teacher or master. Usually, his art is characterized as naive, folkloric, or satiric—and the last characteristic has sometimes put him out of favor with serious-minded people. He developed an exceptional skill at narrative that draws us into a scene. He retains relatively flat color areas defined within strong, elegant linear elements, and his work now teases the distinction between so-called fine art and illustration. Hayden's approach is not unlike that of a photographer who captures people at unguarded moments. Whether it is a woman caught by a gust of wind lifting her skirt (Gusting to Thirty-five Degrees) or a little girl in her Sunday best admiring her new red shoes, the individuals respond to Hayden's scrutiny with an unself-consciousness, ease, and trust that any photographer would envy. In Gusting to Thirty-five Degrees, the woman's knowing smile as she struggles against the wind tells us that she is fully aware of being observed at an embarrassing moment. Hayden's portrayal is exact in all details, letting us see a bit of lace panty and a shapely leg framed by the curve of the woman's billowing coat.

Biography

Palmer Cole Hayden (originally named Peyton Cole Hedgeman) was born in Widewater, West Virginia, on 15 January 1890. By age four he showed artistic ability. At age sixteen he left Widewater for Washington, D.C., working as a drugstore errand boy and porter and enrolling in a correspondence course in drawing. After failing to set himself up as a professional artist, he joined the Buffalo Bill Circus and then the Ringling Brothers' Circus as a roustabout. Members of the circus had him do portraits of themselves and advertisements for the show. With the outbreak of World War I, he joined the army; he was stationed in the Philippines and later at West Point. He moved to New York after his discharge in 1920 (eventually settling in Greenwich Village); he worked in the post office and as a janitor at Cooper Union, studied art at Columbia University, and worked at the Boothbay Art Colony in Maine during the summers. He won an award from the Harmon Foundation in 1926 that enabled him to study in Europe, and he set up a studio in Paris. In 1932, having returned to New York, he worked for the Federal Arts Project. Hayden married Miriam Hoffman, a schoolteacher, in 1940. They settled on West Fifty-sixth Street in midtown Manhattan, where he spent the rest of his life. He died in New York City in 1973.

LOWERY STOKES SIMS

See also Artists; Douglas, Aaron; Federal Programs; Harmon Foundation; Locke, Alain; Tanner, Henry Ossawa; Waring, Laura Wheeler; Woodruff, Hale

Further Reading

Bearden, Romare, and Henry Henderson. A History of African-American Artists from 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.

Sims, Lowery S. "Palmer Hayden." New York: Just Above Midtown Gallery, 1975. (Exhibition catalog.)

Hayden, Robert

Robert Earl Hayden (1913–1980) was a poet and educator influenced by the Harlem Renaissance. His early writing, in particular, evinces an apprenticeship to poets like Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen; but even in his later writings and outlook, Hayden, like many artists inspired by the Harlem Renaissance, believed that the cultivation of a shared aesthetic and humanity would help remove the color line.

Hayden's original name was Asa Bundy Sheffey; at the age of eighteen months, he was taken in and renamed by William and Sue Ellen Westerfield Hayden after first his father and then his mother abandoned him, although he maintained a relationship with his mother. He was raised by the Haydens in an impoverished area of Detroit, Michigan, nicknamed Paradise Valley. Severe myopia precluded a physically active life, but the young Hayden found a refuge in reading and writing.

After majoring in Spanish at Wayne State University, but still one credit short of his B.A., Hayden found employment during the Great Depression with the Federal Writers' Project of the Works Progress Administration (WPA). His research into the settlement of African Americans in Michigan would later find expression specifically in poems such as “Runagate Runagate” and, more generally, in his overall engagement with history in his poetry.

Robert Hayden. (Library of Congress.)

In time, Hayden’s conversion to the Baha’i World Faith in 1942 also found expression in the themes of his poetry. Baha’i tenets, such as the belief that humankind’s quest for truth is cyclical but progressive, permeate the poetry in Words in the Mourning Time (1970). Initially, however, Hayden’s poetry was beholden to Cullen and Hughes. His first published poem, “Africa” (Abbot’s Monthly, 1931), was in many ways a response to the question posed by Countee Cullen in “Heritage”: “What is Africa to me?” Hayden’s speaker replies: “Dear Africa, you’re more to me / Than reeking jungle. / In thee I take undying pride.” On meeting Cullen in 1941, Hughes was delighted to learn that his mentor had read and enjoyed his poetry. However, Langston Hughes’s earlier response to Hayden’s poetry had been less flattering: Over a lunch, Hughes had encouraged Hayden to find his own voice—Hayden’s first published poetry collection having been pervaded by Hughes’s voice in its use of dialect and blues.

Evidently, Hayden followed Hughes’s advice as a graduate student in English at the University of Michigan where, under the tutelage of W. H. Auden, he cultivated a restrained, economical style that is poignant without being maudlin. This approach is best exemplified in “Those Winter Sundays,” one of Hayden’s most lauded and most frequently anthologized poems.

In 1966, at the first Black Writers’ Conference held at Fisk University, Hayden was attacked for being critical of the black nationalist school of writers, but Hayden, like Cullen before him, preferred to be a poet rather than a black poet. He was redeemed when that same year an international panel of judges, including Langston Hughes, awarded him the Grand Prix de la Poésie for A Ballad of Remembrance. During the last decade of his life, Hayden achieved recognition: He gave frequent poetry readings, received numerous honorary degrees, and was twice appointed the poetry consultant for the Library of Congress, an unprecedented honor.

Biography

Robert Earl Hayden (originally named Asa Bundy Sheffey) was born on 4 August 1913, in Detroit, Michigan; he married Erma Inez Morris in 1940. He was educated at Northern High School in Detroit (1930); Wayne State University (B.A., 1942); and the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor (M.A. in English, 1944). He was a writer and researcher for the Federal Writers Project, Works Progress Administration, in Detroit (1936–1939); director of Negro Research, Detroit Federal Writers’ Project (1939–1940); researcher, Federal Historical Records Survey, WPA (1940); professor of English, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee (1946–1969); appointed poetry editor, World Order (1967); poet in residence, Indiana State University, Terre Haute (1967); visiting professor of English, University of Michigan (1968); Bingham professor, University of Louisville, Kentucky (1969); visiting poet, University of Washington, Seattle (1969); professor of English, University of Michigan (1969); writer and editor for Scott, Foresman (1970); on the poetry staff, Breadloaf Writers’ Conference, Middlebury College, Vermont (1972); and visiting poet, Connecticut College, New London (1974). His awards included the Hopwood Minor Award for Poetry (1938); the Hopwood Major Award for Poetry (1942); a Rosenwald fellowship in creative writing (1947); a Ford Foundation grant for travel and writing in Mexico (1954); the Grand Prix de la Poésie, First World Festival of Negro Arts, Dakar, Senegal (1966); a nomination for a National Book Award (1970); the Russell Loines Award for Poetry, National Institute of Arts and Letters (1970); election as a fellow of the Academy of American Poets (1975); appointment as consultant in poetry, Library of Congress (1976–1978); membership in the Academy of American Poets and Institute of Arts and Letters (1979); and an invitation to President Jimmy Carter's "White House Salute to American Poetry" (1980). He recorded poetry for the Library of Congress archives (1968). "A Tribute to Robert Hayden" was held on 24 February 1980, at the University of Michigan. Hayden died in Ann Arbor, Michigan, on 25 February 1980.

VALARIE MOSES

See also Cullen, Countee; Federal Writers' Project; Hughes, Langston

Selected Works

Heart-Shape in the Dust. 1940.

The Lion and the Archer: Poems, with Myron O'Higgins. 1948.

Figure of Time: Poems. 1955.

A Ballad of Remembrance. 1962.

Selected Poems. 1966.

Kaleidoscope: Poems by American Negro Poets. 1967. (As editor.)

"Preface." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. 1968. (Originally published 1925.)

Words in the Mourning Time. 1970.

Afro-American Literature: An Introduction. 1971. (As editor, with David J. Burrows and Frederick R. Lapedes.)

How I Write, with Paul McCluskey. 1972.

The Night-Blooming Cereus. 1972.

Angle of Ascent: New and Selected Poems. 1975.

The Legend of John Brown, with screen prints by Jacob Lawrence. 1978.

American Journal. 1978. (Expanded version reprinted 1982.)

Collected Prose, ed. Frederick Glaysher. 1984.

Collected Poems, ed. Frederick Glaysher. 1985.

Further Reading

Conniff, Brian. "Answering 'The Waste Land': Robert Hayden and the Rise of the African American Poetic Sequence." African American Review, 33(3), 1999.

Fetrow, Fred M. Robert Hayden. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1984.

Gallagher, Ann M. "Hayden's Those Winter Sundays." Explicator, 51(4), 1993.

Gayle, Addison Jr. Black Expression: Essays by and about Black Americans in the Creative Arts. New York: Weybright and Talley, 1969.

Genge, Susan. "Hayden's Homage to the Empress of the Blues." Explicator, 57(2), 1999.

Gibbons, Reginald. "Robert Hayden in the 1940s." Tri-Quarterly, 62, 1985.

Goldstein, Laurence, and Robert Chrisman, eds. Robert Hayden: Essays on the Poetry. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2001.

Harper, Michael S. "Remembering Robert Hayden." Michigan Quarterly Review, 21, 1982.

Hatcher, John Southall. From the Auroral Darkness: The Life and Poetry of Robert Hayden. Oxford: George Ronald, 1984.

Layman, Richard. "Robert Hayden." In Conversations With Writers, 1. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1977.

Pool, Rosey E. "Grand Prix de la Poésie for Robert Hayden." World Order, 17(4), 1983.

Potter, Vilma Raskin. "Reconsiderations and Reviews: A Remembrance for Robert Hayden, 1913–1980." MELUS, 8(1), 1981.

Rashid, Frank. "Robert Hayden's Detroit Blues Elegies." Callaloo, 24(1), 2001.

Richards, Phillip M. "Robert Hayden (1913–1980): An Appreciation." Massachusetts Review, 40(4), 1999–2000.

Stepito, Robert B. "After Modernism, after Hibernation: Michael Harper, Robert Hayden, and Jay Wright." In Chant of Saints: A Gathering of Afro-American Literature, Art, and Scholarship, ed. Robert B. Stepito, Michael S. Harper, and John Hope Franklin. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979.

Williams, Pontheolla T. Robert Hayden: A Critical Analysis of His Poetry. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Zabel, Darcy. "Hayden's Runagate Runagate." Explicator, 60(2), 2002.

Hayes, Roland

The distinguished and distinctively brilliant African American tenor Roland Hayes (1887–1976) was known not only for his artistry but also for his unique way of fighting racism and bigotry in America and in Europe. He was the first African American concert artist to achieve international prominence, and he had many other "firsts" in his long career. He was hailed as one of the great voices of the twentieth century, and he mastered the music of not just America but much of the world. In order to perform the music of other nations, he made a point of learning to sing in the language of each country he visited and in which he concertized. His preparation for this monumental task was supplemented by intensive study with several prominent teachers and coaches; he always seemed to be able to find just the right person to train him or guide him. The important teachers and coaches with whom Hayes studied in Europe were George Henschel in London, Theodore Lierhammer in Vienna, and Gabriel Fauré in Paris. His association with Henschel—who had studied with Johannes Brahms—led to a lifelong friendship, and it was through Henschel that Hayes polished his art and solidified his singing technique. Because of his concept of universality as well as his vocal art, Hayes falls easily into the category of the “New Negro” of the Harlem Renaissance.

Hayes was in a sense a self-made man and artist. He had been rather late in developing academically; he arrived at Fisk University, and was allowed to enroll, with the equivalent of only a sixth-grade education. He soon encountered personal problems that eventually cut short his studies at Fisk; one reason for these problems was that he was performing with the famous Jubilee Singers, which were not actually associated with the university’s music department. However, he remained loyal to Fisk and often returned there to perform. (The present writer had the good fortune to hear Hayes in recital at Fisk in the early 1960s.)

After his experience at Fisk, Hayes moved from Nashville to Louisville, where he met Arthur Calhoun, one of many white associates who would assist him with his training and help him to get gainful employment. Eventually, he went to Boston, where he had a summer residency with the Jubilee Singers in 1911. He then began serious study with Arthur Hubbard, meanwhile supporting himself by working as a messenger at the John Hancock Life Insurance Company. (His many supporters from this company contributed much to the success of his professional debut at Symphony Hall in Boston.) After settling in Boston, he sang at every opportunity, to demonstrate his vocal artistry.

In 1914, Hayes was chosen to go on one of Booker T. Washington’s lecture tours to sing with the noted baritone Harry T. Burleigh, who was the first African American concert artist and a close friend of Washington’s. Not only was this a great boost for the aspiring young Hayes, but Burleigh also became an inspiration to him as well as a conduit to sources of indigenous American music. Moreover, news of this tour reached Nashville and, at Fisk University, reached a Miss Robinson—a teacher from whom Hayes had been estranged. She wrote to Hayes, suggesting a reconciliation, and his response was to go back to Fisk and sing the tenor role in Mendelssohn’s Elijah, with Burleigh singing the baritone lead. On this trip to Nashville, Hayes also visited his cousin Helen Alzada Mann, who would become his wife in 1932.

From the time when he first began to sing in public, Hayes realized that he had a unique talent; he believed that this talent was God-given and that it was something to be nurtured and shared with the world. He also realized that his beloved mother, Fannie, whom he called Angel Mo, had given him a special upbringing. (The title of Hayes’s autobiography is Angel Mo and Her Son Roland Hayes, and Chapter 2 is called “I Worship My Mother.”) Although his mother was a former slave, on one of his tours when she traveled with him, she was able to critique his performance—telling him how important it was not only to hear but also to understand the message he wanted to impart to his audience. Hayes described Fannie as “an indomitable woman whose high standards of personal honesty and dignity had exerted” a profound effect on him. He said that “next to our souls, Mother Fannie cherished our minds. She wanted us to have an education so that we could do good in the world.”

But in the early twentieth century, despite his talent and his inspirational upbringing, Hayes, as an African American, could not find professional sponsorship or management. He tried to engage as his manager William H. Brennan of the management staff at Symphony Hall in Boston—this was an audacious move for a black man at the time, and the attempt failed. (Not until 1923, when Hayes returned from Europe as a celebrity, would Brennan accept the position of his manager.) Hayes was not deterred from persisting with his career; he decided to be his own manager and promoter. He did hire a secretary, and between them they compiled mailing lists and other promotional literature. Also, Hayes had an entrée to the news media, which he used. Against the advice of his friends and his teacher, Arthur Hubbard, he pursued his dream of renting Symphony Hall for his professional debut in 1917. This debut recital drew an overflow crowd and earned him a $2,000 profit. (In retrospect, though, there had already been a minor debut: Hayes had sung the tenor arias in a performance of Messiah at Howard University c. 1910.)

Early on, tours were important in Hayes's career. He planned and managed them carefully and felt that overall they were successful. In 1915, for example, in order to earn money for his future endeavors, Hayes made a tour of several southern cities, singing in Negro churches with the aid of the American Missionary Association (AMA); in later years, he would reciprocate with a benefit performance for AMA. Early in 1918, Hayes and his accompanist, Lawrence Brown, set out on a tour that extended all the way to the West Coast. Hayes's mother went with them and took a liking to Brown. (Brown, who came from Charlestown, South Carolina, was later an accompanist for Paul Robeson.) There was a second transcontinental tour late in 1918, covering basically the same territory but with some additions and under "Negro auspices."

One factor in the success of Hayes's tours was the distinctiveness of his art. He recounted that "an elderly gentleman of aristocratic bearing came to me and said, 'Mr. Hayes, you seem to me to sing with all the art of the master singers I have heard and yet with some new emotional quality of your own. I wish you would tell me how you have come by that special quality.'" Hayes was a masterful communicator and a masterful interpreter of song. He has been described as an "expressor of the soul in song" (Carter 1977)—"soul" being understood here as deep inner expressiveness and genuine conviction. Hayes considered his voice a tool for a mission that was more important than art: racial harmony. Hayes pursued this mission in his own unique manner, which was quiet but strong. An example is a concert he gave in Vienna to a hypercritical audience that greeted him with hisses; called him, with blatant disrespect, the Negertenor; and seemed to be asking, Who gives him the right to sing our music? Hayes waited patiently for about twenty or twenty-five minutes, then nodded to his accompanist. They began a rendition of a piece that was a favorite of the Viennese, Schubert's Du bist die Ruh. Hayes sang in perfect German and with solid artistry, and he finally silenced the audience. By the end of the concert, he had won the audience over and received tremendous bravos of acclaim.

Work and studies abroad were also important to Hayes. The $2,000 he earned from his debut recital in Boston made possible a trip to Europe "in search of the roots of French and German art songs." He had studied the French and German languages and French and German art songs assiduously, and he was already familiar with the singing of Enrico Caruso—in fact, while Hayes was in Louisville (where, as noted previously, his benefactor was Arthur Calhoun), he had learned many arias and other works by listening to Caruso's recordings. In addition to his most important teachers and coaches (Henschel in London, where he spent most of his time; Lierhammer in Vienna; and Fauré in Paris), Hayes met and became friends with many international artists who recognized his genius; these figures included Pablo Casals, Ignacy Paderewski, Myra Hess, and Fritz Kreisler. Kreisler urged Pierre Monteux to engage Hayes for an appearance with the Boston Symphony on 16 November 1923—perhaps the first time that an African American was engaged to sing with a major American orchestra. Furthermore, during the three years that he spent in London (1920–1923), Hayes came into contact with his roots. There were many black residents in London at the time, including some who were British, some from the Caribbean, and some from West Africa, and Hayes benefited from the assistance of these primary sources. He studied their folklore and also learned to sing in their native languages. With the help of the West African community in London, for instance, Hayes studied and performed the folk music of West Africa. (Hayes's father, William, was of black and Indian heritage and may well have also been an influence in this regard.)

A source of support for Hayes—and subsequently a source of information about him—was the news journal West Africa, which was founded in early 1917 in London for a black and white readership in Britain and in Africa; Albert Cartwright was its editor and music critic. West Africa strongly promoted Hayes's career in London, reporting on all of his recitals and performances in Europe; and Hayes would usually list in this journal his programs as well as reviews of his recitals and other performances. In addition, he announced a command performance at Buckingham Palace for the king (George V) and queen in April 1921. Cartwright chided the London Times and other news media for their cool response to Hayes, and the Times later changed its stance.

Hayes's ability to sing in many languages—such as those of West Africa, as mentioned previously—was significant. Hayes was a fast learner; he had a command of French, German, and Italian, and he also sang in Russian on his tour of Russia. He knew several languages before coming to Europe and continued his study of languages during his stay there. This mastery of languages was one aspect of his general versatility: He was very universal in his approach and presented a marvelously varied repertoire. For instance, his recital programs included some works dating back as early as the fifteenth century.

Roland Hayes, photographed by Carl Van Vechten.
(Library of Congress.)

Hayes was the first of his race to make a comfortable living as a concert artist. During the 1920s, he made seven hugely successful transcontinental tours of the United States; and in 1924, the New York Times reported that Hayes had earned $100,000. Hayes bought a villa in France and a 623-acre farm in Georgia, where his mother had been a slave. He also had a residence in Brookline, Massachusetts, where he spent the end of his life with his wife and his only child—his daughter, Afrika, who sang recitals with him in Boston.

Hayes was an impeccable artist and a rare human being, a humanitarian with a universal spirit and a remarkable personality. One friend may have touched the essence of Hayes's spirit: "Roland has achieved great things. But he's one in a million. He could have been anything he put his mind to, because he has that kind of intelligence and drive." At the peak of his career, Hayes was said to be the only concert artist who could fill both Carnegie Hall in New York and Symphony Hall in Boston three times in the same season. The Boston Post called him "the greatest recitalist in the world."

Biography

Roland Hayes was born in 1887 in Curryville, Georgia; his mother was a former slave. He was educated at Fisk University; performed with the Jubilee Singers (summer 1911) in Boston, Massachusetts; and began serious study with Arthur Hubbard in Boston. Hayes made his professional debut at Symphony Hall in Boston in 1917. He made several coast-to-coast tours in 1916–1919 and went to London in 1920–1923 (his debut in London was at Aeolian Hall in 1920). On his return to the United States, his recital of 2 December 1923 began his long, illustrious career, throughout which he would tour internationally. Hayes received numerous honorary degrees and, in 1924, the Spingarn Medal. He was probably the first black artist to sing with a major symphony orchestra (Boston, 1923) and one of the first blacks to make a good living through a concert singing career: He was able to buy a French villa, a large farm in Georgia, and a beautiful home in Brookline, Massachusetts. Hayes died in Boston in 1976.

MALCOLM BREDA

See also Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Singers; Washington, Booker T.

Further Reading

- Abdul, Raoul. Blacks in Classical Music: A Personal History. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1977.
- Carter, Mavra Griffin. "Roland Hayes: Expressor of the Soul in Song (1887–1977)." Black Perspective in Music, 5(2), Fall 1977.
- Green, Jeffrey P. "Roland Hayes in London, 1921." Black Perspective in Music, 10(1), Spring 1982.
- Hayden, Robert C. Singing for All People: Roland Hayes—A Biography. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1989.
- Hayes, Roland. My Songs: Afroamerican Religious Folk Songs Arranged and Interpreted by Roland Hayes. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1948.
- Helm, MacKinley. Angel Mo' and Her Son, Roland Hayes. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1942.
- Marr, Warren, II. "Conversation with Roland Hayes." Black Perspective in Music, 2(2), Fall 1974.

Woolsey, F. W. "Conversation with Roland Hayes." Black Perspective in Music, 2(2), Fall 1974.

Haynes, George Edmund

George Edmund Haynes was a pioneering black sociologist and social worker, a passionate advocate of education and self-improvement, and a founder and first executive secretary of the National Urban League (NUL).

The child of a domestic worker, Haynes was born in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, in 1880. He earned a B.A. at Fisk in 1903 and an M.A. in sociology at Yale a year later. Over the next six years he studied at the University of Chicago, the New York School of Philanthropy, and Columbia University, all while supporting his mother and sister by working as secretary of the Colored Men's Department of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA). In 1912, he became the first African American to earn a Ph.D. from Columbia University. His dissertation, The Negro at Work in New York City: A Study in Economic Progress, was published the same year.

At a time when most political leaders, black and white, urged African Americans to remain in the rural South, Haynes saw black urbanization as an inevitable by-product of modernization. He stressed the need for careful, nonpartisan investigation of the actual conditions of black urban life, including health, housing, vice, family life, and above all employment. He also stressed the vital need for a cadre of trained black social workers, to aid new southern migrants in their "adaptation" to the demands of urban life. Both convictions were embodied in the Committee for Improving Industrial Conditions of Negroes in New York, which he and Ruth Standish Baldwin, a wealthy white philanthropist, founded in 1910. A year later, he and Baldwin engineered the merger of their committee and several other social welfare agencies to create the National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes, which became known as the National Urban League. Haynes became its first executive secretary. In 1918, he accepted a position as director of the Department of Negro Economics, a wartime agency within the U.S. Department of Labor. At the same time, he held a professorship at Fisk University, where he introduced the first program in social work at a black university.

Haynes played little of a direct role in the Harlem Renaissance. His commitment to scientific investigation, incremental reform, and "interracial cooperation" was distinctly out of step with the temper of the "New Negro" movement, with its emphasis on bold self-assertion and social transformation through art. He did contribute an essay, "The Church and the Negro Spirit," to Survey Graphic's special issue on Harlem in 1925, but the essay was one of those that Alain Locke excised in preparing The New Negro.

Over the remaining decades of his life, Haynes devoted his energies to numerous liberal social welfare agencies, including the Federal Council of Churches, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, and the YMCA. In 1930, he traveled under the auspices of the YMCA to South Africa, whose problems of urbanization and "race friction" seemed to resemble those he had confronted in the United States. He returned to Africa in 1947, undertaking a continent-wide survey, the fruits of which appeared in his final book, Africa: Continent of the Future. He died in New York in 1960.

Biography

George Edmund Haynes was born in 1880 in Pine Bluff, Arkansas. He studied at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee (B.A., 1903); Yale University (M.A., 1904); the University of Chicago; the New York School of Philanthropy; and Columbia University (Ph.D., 1912). He was a cofounder of the Committee for Improving Industrial Conditions of Negroes in New York (1910) and the National Urban League (1911) and the first executive secretary of the National Urban League; a professor of education and sociology at Fisk University; and director of the Department of Negro Economics, U.S. Department of Labor (1918–1921). Haynes was a member of the President's Commission on Unemployment (1921), the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, the Federal Council of Churches, and the World Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. He died in Mount Vernon, New York, in 1960.

JAMES CAMPBELL

See also National Urban League; New Negro, The; Survey Graphic

Selected Works

The Negro at Work in New York City: A Study in Economic Progress. 1912.

The Trend of the Races. 1922.

"The Church and the Negro Spirit." Survey Graphic, March 1925.

Africa: Continent of the Future. 1950.

Further Reading

Carlton-La'Ney, I. "George Edmund Haynes's Impact on Social Work Education." In From Vision to Action: Social Workers of the Second Generation, ed. Janice Edwards. St. Thomas, Virgin Islands: University of St. Thomas Press, 1992.

Perlman, Daniel. "Stirring the White Conscience: The Life of George Edmund Haynes." Ph.D. dissertation, New York University, 1972.

Weiss, Nancy J. The National Urban League, 1910–1940. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Hearts in Dixie

Hearts in Dixie (1929), directed by Paul Sloane II and released by Fox Films, was the first feature-length Hollywood film with an almost exclusively black cast. Previously, most black roles in films were played by white actors in blackface, a long-standing theatrical tradition that gained popularity in the nineteenth century with the development of the minstrel show. Hearts in Dixie, by contrast, eschewed the use of blackface. By employing black actors, its makers sought to achieve a more realistic depiction of black life in the South.

With a script written by Walter Weems (a former southern minstrel performer), Hearts in Dixie narrates the story of an old black farmer named Nappus. His daughter Chloe is married to Gummy (played by Stepin Fetchit), a ne'er-do-well who suns himself by day and dances by night, leaving Chloe to perform all of the housework and manual labor. When Chloe and one of their two children fall ill, Gummy calls a voodoo woman instead of the white doctor, and both die. Determined to make a better life for his surviving grandchild, Nappus sells his mule and farm to raise enough money to send the boy north to become a doctor. The film ends with Nappus's wish that someday his grandson will return to the South to help their people.

On its release early in 1929, Hearts in Dixie was lauded by the mainstream white press. Mordaunt Hall, reviewer for the New York Times, described the film as "a talking and singing production that is gentle in its mood and truthful in its reflection of the black men of those days down yonder in the cornfields" (1929, 30). However, the film met with a lukewarm response in the black press. A reviewer for the Chicago Defender, an important African American newspaper, was ambivalent about the depiction of black life, complaining that the film "dragged" and referring sarcastically to its "occasional spark of darky humor" ("Hearts in Dixie" 1929, 6).

Eugene Jackson and Clarence Muse in Hearts in Dixie, 1929.

(Photofest.)

Despite its historical significance, Hearts in Dixie has attracted little critical attention in recent scholarship. Much of the criticism that does exist has focused on the ideologies the film seems to endorse. First, the film participates in what has been called the "plantation myth," which painted an idealized and nostalgic vision of slavery. Furthermore, by depicting the voodoo woman as impotent, the film values white science and medicine over African or folk tradition. Bogle argued that because the film was written and directed by whites, "the actor becomes a black man in blackface" (1973, 27), depicting black life as it was imagined by whites. Some commentators would argue that this is particularly true of Stepin Fetchit. The first African American actor to receive top billing in the movies, he was at once a talented performer and an embarrassment to some blacks who felt that the role of the "plantation coon" (Bogle, 28), which he perfected, reinforced white stereotypes of blacks. Still, despite the flaws in Hearts in Dixie, Cripps maintains that Nappus has a "quiet patriarchal dignity" and that the action "flows from black ambition, not white instigation" (1993, 239). Hearts in Dixie remains a milestone in the vexed history of African Americans in Hollywood cinema.

Hearts in Dixie

ALISON LANDSBERG

See also Fetchit, Stepin; Film

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattos, Mammies, and Bucks. New York: Viking, 1973.

California Eagle, 14 and 21 December 1928. (Review.)

Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1906–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Hall, Mordaunt. "Way Down Yonder." New York Times, 28 February 1929, p. 30. (Review.)

"'Hearts in Dixie' Opens in New York." Chicago Defender, 16 March 1929, part 1, p. 6.

Variety, 6 March 1929, p. 15. (Review.)

Hegamin, Lucille

The blues singer Lucille Hegamin was most prominent in the early 1920s. She began her professional career around 1909, touring with a Leonard Harper revue. In 1914 to 1918, she was a cabaret and café singer in Chicago, billed as the "Georgia peach." She worked extensively with the legendary New Orleans pianist Tony Jackson at the Elite No. 2 Theater on Chicago's south side, popularizing his classic song "Pretty Baby" and W.C. Handy's "Saint Louis Blues." She also worked with Jelly Roll Morton and others before marrying the pianist Bill Hegamin, who then became her accompanist.

In 1918 to 1919, the Hegamins traveled to Los Angeles; they worked there and also in San Francisco and Seattle. Around November 1919, they moved to New York, where they worked at cafés in Harlem (the Dolphin, Connor's) while Lucille Hegamin established herself in New York. By the spring of 1920, she had graduated to singing at major events, such as the spectacular dances put on by Happy Rhone's Orchestra at the Manhattan Casino. The Manhattan Casino was a large room, unkind to singers, and Rhone's ensemble often numbered thirty players or more. Hegamin's voice, although not large, had an edge that penetrated; she proudly recalled her ability to "wail."

Voices of this type were much in demand during the early commercial fad for blues, and Hegamin soon became a popular recording artist, the second African American woman blues singer to record. Her initial recordings, on the Arto label, featured her husband on piano and several fine jazz musicians, and sold well. Among the most important was "He May Be Your Man but He Comes to See Me Sometimes." After touring extensively to support her record sales, she began a stint at Harlem's Shuffle Inn on 131st Street. In January 1922, she took part in a legendary four-way blues contest in New York, placing second behind Trixie Smith. Around February to May 1922, she toured the eastern United States with the number-two company of the show Shuffle Along. In the autumn of 1923, she appeared in the musical comedy Creole Follies in New York and Washington, D.C.

From December 1923 through 1926, she worked primarily as a solo act, now with the pianist Cyril Fullerton, her marriage and partnership with Bill Hegamin having failed. She briefly led her own jazz band from November 1925 to February 1926. She continued as a prolific recording artist, making more than forty sides for Cameo Records from September 1922 to the autumn of 1926 (she was dubbed the "Cameo girl"). In early 1925, she performed frequently on the radio station WHN, broadcasting from the Cotton Club with Andy Preer and his Cotton Club Syncopators. From January to March 1927 she was active primarily in Philadelphia.

After the late 1920s, Hegamin's career began to fade. She eventually found work as a nurse and put show business behind her, but she was rediscovered during the blues revival of the 1960s; in August 1961, she recorded alongside Alberta Hunter and Victoria Spivey, accompanied by an old-timers' jazz band, for the Prestige "Bluesville" label. Although these were her first recordings in almost thirty years, they found her in good voice and were well received. She made a few personal appearances in clubs during the early 1960s, as a revered elder of the blues.

Biography

Lucille Nelson Hegamin was born in Macon, Georgia, on 29 November 1894. She had no formal musical training; she sang in church and local theatricals as a child and entered professional show business c. 1909, touring with a Leonard Harper revue. She became a cabaret and café singer in Chicago. She married the pianist Bill Hegamin, who became her accompanist; they worked together on the West Coast, then moved to New York c. 1919. She worked in cafés in Harlem and then moved up to major venues and recordings. After her marriage to Bill Hegamin failed, she worked mostly solo (1923–1926), continued recording, and did radio broadcasts. When her performing career faded (late 1920s), she became a nurse; she was rediscovered during a blues revival in the 1960s. She died on 1 March 1970, in New York City.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Blues: Women Performers; Cotton Club; Handy, W. C.; Hunter, Alberta; Manhattan Casino; Shuffle Along; Singers; Spivey, Victoria

Further Reading

Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who's Who. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1979.

Jazz Journal (UK), July–August 1967.

Kunstadt, Leonard. Record Research, November 1961–January, February, March 1962.

Henderson, Fletcher

James Fletcher Hamilton Henderson, known as Fletcher Henderson and as Fletch Smack Henderson, is among the most important figures in the emergence of jazz during the 1920s and 1930s. As musical director for Black Swan Records, piano accompanist for hundreds of early blues recordings, leader of an innovative ensemble that began as a polished dance orchestra and became crucial to the development of big band jazz, and chief arranger for Benny Goodman during the height of his popularity in the mid-1930s, Henderson helped shape many elements of American popular music between the world wars. He had a remarkable eye for talent, hiring and shepherding the careers of numerous sidemen, soloists, and arrangers who profoundly influenced the direction of jazz. Although his upbringing made him an unlikely candidate to help develop and popularize a revolutionary new musical form, he came as near as any black jazz musician to the “New Negro” ideal as established by the leaders of the Harlem Renaissance, providing a model for the talented, striving, professional black musician that many African Americans could follow.

Fletcher Henderson was born into an upstanding middle-class family in Cuthbert, Georgia. His grandfather James, born a slave, served as a delegate to South Carolina’s Constitutional Convention of 1868 and in the state legislature during Reconstruction. Both his parents were college-educated and were respected teachers at the Howard Normal School, where his father was also principal. Young Fletcher Henderson grew up surrounded by music, but exclusively in classical rather than popular forms. Even after his success in jazz, his parents forbade the playing of jazz in their house. His well-rounded childhood education included compulsory piano lessons, which he reportedly resented, from age six to thirteen.

While earning a B.S. in chemistry at Atlanta University, his father’s alma mater, Henderson played the organ for university church services, performed in several musical stage shows, and led the Georgia Student Army Training Corps band during World War I. Although he earned money playing piano at a resort in Woods Hole, Massachusetts, during the summers while he was in college, he as yet showed no signs of a professional interest in music.

In June 1920, Henderson traveled to New York intending to enroll at Columbia University for graduate work in chemistry, but from his first days in the city he found himself drawn, by chance and a lack of financial resources, toward work in New York’s vibrant music scene, and increasingly toward popular music styles. After playing piano on a riverboat orchestra, he was hired by Pace and Handy Music Company as a song plugger, performing tunes the company published to increase sales of its sheet music. When the coproprietor Harry Pace, a fellow alumnus of Atlanta University, split from Handy to form the Black Swan Phonograph Company in 1921, he hired Henderson as music director, recording manager, and piano accompanist.

The years 1921 through 1923 were vital in Henderson’s musical development. Black Swan’s determination to record both classical and popular music brought Henderson, as pianist on many of the label’s early recordings, into contact with a wide variety of music, including blues and dance styles. The success of the blues singer Ethel Waters also prompted Black Swan to send Waters and Henderson on tour with a small ensemble, the Black Swan Troubadours, in 1921 and 1922. The sophisticated Henderson was so uncomfortable at the prospect of touring with a blues singer that he felt compelled to obtain permission from his family beforehand. Ultimately, however, Waters’s influence on Henderson in 1921 and 1922 was crucial. Frustrated at his lack of a feel for blues and jazz rhythm, Waters coached Henderson in left-hand technique, even buying him piano rolls by James P. Johnson as a model. Henderson quickly absorbed the new blues and dance styles, and his versatility, talent, reliability, and organizational skills made him one of the most sought-after piano accompanists in New York. By 1923, he had performed on more records than any other African American artist, accompanying singers such as Bessie Smith, Rosa Henderson, Trixie Smith, and Turner Layton.

Fletcher Henderson formed his first dance orchestra late in 1922. The musicians were primarily a recording ensemble until Club Alabam, an elite white-only downtown dance venue, hired them for steady work in January 1924. When a dispute with the management led them to quit in June, they were quickly hired at the Roseland Ballroom (the "Home of Refined Dancing") on Broadway, where they would make their home until 1928. A live radio broadcast from the Roseland Ballroom on WHN increased their exposure, and Henderson was on his way to national prominence.

With these engagements and recording contracts on numerous labels, including the prestigious Columbia, the Henderson orchestra became one of the premier black ensembles in New York in the mid-1920s. Henderson's unit was the only black orchestra competing directly with white dance bands such as Sam Lanin's and Paul Whiteman's for work in elite, whites-only downtown clubs and for market share among both black and white consumers of recorded music. His success in these venues was based on several factors. The Henderson orchestra was a disciplined, sophisticated, musically educated unit of young black instrumentalists who could read virtually any music put in front of them. Their talent and versatility made it possible not only to play "sweet music" (waltzes, foxtrots, and other "refined" dances) for their audience, but also to adapt quickly to trends, such as orchestrating increasingly popular blues songs into a polished, danceable form, or including "hot" jazz and blues-inflected solos in an otherwise "sweet" repertoire. Thus the Henderson band of 1923 and 1924 was not a jazz ensemble but a dance ensemble that could perform at the highest levels of the profession and attract black and white audiences alike.

Nevertheless, in this early ensemble there were two men who would move Henderson toward the new jazz style in the mid-1920s and significantly influence the direction of jazz. Coleman Hawkins, a brilliant young soloist who would become the most important tenor saxophonist during the first half of the twentieth century, joined the band in 1923. More important, that same year Don Redman, a college-educated multi-reed player from West Virginia, began his four-year stint as chief arranger with Henderson. Redman laid the foundation for jazz arranging by his inventive use of call-and-response patterns between brass and reed sections and his ability to integrate ensemble playing and improvised solos.

In the autumn of 1924, the Roseland Ballroom gave Henderson money to expand his orchestra to include four brass and three reeds. The additions allowed Redman to experiment with a larger ensemble and brought to the band the clarinetist Buster Bailey and the cornet player Louis Armstrong, both from King Oliver's Creole Jazz Band in Chicago. Armstrong's effect was immediate and profound, for both the commercial and the musical fortunes of the band. Both men, especially Armstrong, were wildly popular with the crowd at Roseland. From the first night, dancers and even people passing on the street stopped to listen to Armstrong's brilliant sound. When Henderson introduced his orchestra with Armstrong to Harlem at the Lafayette Theater later that year, Armstrong established himself as the new trumpet king of New York. The demand for the band grew nationally, and Henderson began touring one week per month during the autumn of 1925. Moreover, Armstrong's melodically innovative and driving jazz improvisations influenced virtually all who heard him. Trumpet players tried to imitate his fire and style. Coleman Hawkins and other instrumentalists moved toward more modern jazz performance, and Don Redman incorporated Armstrong's ideas into his arrangements for the ensemble.

Armstrong's departure in the autumn of 1925 did not at all hinder the band's musical or commercial development. Henderson added new musicians who were more familiar with jazz improvisation and began increasing the number of jazz pieces, as opposed to popular dance numbers, in the repertoire. This indicated not only musical maturity but also an increased interest in jazz among consumers of popular music, both in nightclubs and on records. By 1928, the Henderson orchestra had shifted from a versatile dance ensemble with "hot" jazz soloists to becoming one of the top jazz bands of the era. Although Redman left in 1927, Henderson attracted some of the best talent in the business, including the trumpeters Rex Stewart, Tommy Ladnier, and Cootie Williams and the saxophonist Benny Carter, who soon became principal arranger. While the band maintained a home base at Roseland, frequent tours took it across the East and Midwest. The demand for the Henderson orchestra was such that Henderson established a band under his brother's leadership to cover any dates for which he was already booked.

Fletcher Henderson and his orchestra, at their peak, represented the closest approximation to "New Negro" ideals found in jazz. After his marriage in 1924, Henderson and his family moved to Strivers' Row and often took in young, aspiring musicians as boarders. He consistently demonstrated a commitment to improving his race, performing benefits for African American charities, including the Defense Fund of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Brotherhood Fraternity, which raised funds for the education of young black men. Also, following the example of the Clef Club (a black musicians' union that had been formed in 1910), Henderson insisted on discipline, professionalism, and excellent skills in reading music, none of which had been associated with the improvisatory, bawdy, "uncivilized" nature of early jazz. Henderson had filled his orchestra primarily with young, professional, educated black musicians of middle-class origins who shared his aspirations for musicianship and respectability, aspirations that included work in the elite downtown dance clubs. It was a model of a striving, professional, musical organization that many others, including the young Duke Ellington, would follow.

The reaction among African Americans to the Henderson orchestra, however, was mixed. It was a great source of pride for most, and in 1927 the Chicago Defender identified Henderson's outfit as "the greatest orchestra of the Race." Members of Ellington's band feared battles with the Henderson outfit, knowing that their defeat was virtually preordained. Yet its success among white audiences and its more polished sound led to charges that its music was "adulterated" and was meant "for the white man's consumption" after Henderson opened the Savoy Ballroom in 1926. For the "talented tenth," embarrassed by the cultural and musical rough edges of jazz, Henderson's more composed music and sophisticated image were a comfort; the African American professional was assured that he could, in the words of David Levering Lewis, still enjoy the jazz of the Henderson band "at the Savoy without being downright savage about it."

After 1928, the band's fortunes began to decline. Following a serious automobile accident in August

Fletcher Henderson. (Brown Brothers.)

1928, Henderson lost interest in the business of running an orchestra, and he began to fall into debt in 1930. Forced to disband in 1934, he reconstituted his outfit the next year, attracting but failing to hold several of the most talented young jazz musicians of the period. A six-week stand at the Grand Terrace Ballroom in Chicago, including a contract with NBC radio, provided the band with one final commercial success, a release of the song "Christopher Columbus" in 1936.

In 1930, Henderson began to write arrangements for his orchestra; and when Benny Goodman needed jazz material for his big band's radio program "Let's Dance" in 1934, the producer John Hammond introduced him to Henderson, who sold twenty-seven of his arrangements to Goodman. These pieces formed the foundation of Goodman's repertoire during his rise to stardom in 1935. In all, Henderson probably contributed between 300 and 400 arrangements to Goodman's orchestra, and many bandleaders, including Count Basie, Chick Webb, Ray Noble, and Tommy Dorsey, performed Henderson's music. At the height of the swing era, Henderson was recognized as among the greatest arrangers in jazz.

Henderson's work behind the scenes in helping Goodman, a white clarinetist, become the "king of swing,” and his competition with the bandleader Paul Whiteman, known as the “king of jazz,” a decade before has been central to the academic debates over the place of African American music in twentieth-century America. Caught among competing visions of African American culture in a racially divided America, however, Henderson and his orchestra responded as so many other jazz musicians did—by simply revolutionizing American music above the din of academic arguments.

Biography

James Fletcher “Smack” Henderson was born in Cuthbert, Georgia, on 18 December 1897. He was educated at Atlanta University College Prep (1911–1912, 1913–1916) and Atlanta University (as a chemistry major, 1916–1920). He was a song plugger for Pace and Handy Music Publishing Company (1920–1921); was musical director and pianist for Black Swan Records (1921–1923); toured with Ethel Waters and the Black Swan Troubadours (1921–1922); made recordings with Waters, Rosa Henderson, Alberta Hunter, Turner Layton, Bessie Smith, Trixie Smith, Lena Wilson, J. Arthur Gaines, and Ravella Hughes (1921–1924); made recordings on the Black Swan, Paramount, Emerson, Brunswick, Columbia, Victor, Vocalion, and Decca labels; led the Henderson Dance Orchestra (1922–1923); was featured at Club Alabam (1924); had Louis Armstrong in his orchestra (1924–1925); performed at Roseland Ballroom (steadily, 1924–1928; intermittently, 1929–1936); had a contract with WHN radio (1924–1930); made regional and national tours (1924–1934); played at the grand opening of the Savoy Ballroom (March 1926); had a six-week engagement at the Pompeii Room, Congress Hotel, Chicago (1927); conducted the orchestra for the musical Great Day (1929, but never made it to Broadway); had a contract with WABC radio (1930–1932); moved from Roseland to Connie’s Inn (1930–1931); disbanded his orchestra because of financial difficulties (1934); formed a new orchestra (1935–1939); had his last commercial success, the song “Christopher Columbus” (1936); began arranging for Benny Goodman (1934); was a staff arranger with Goodman (1937–1941); was a pianist with the Benny Goodman Orchestra (1939); performed in the concert “Spirituals to Swing” (December 1939); formed another new band, which played intermittently (1941–1947); and appeared in reunion concerts with Ethel Waters (1948–1950). Henderson died in Harlem on 29 December 1952.

WILLIAM J. NANCARROW

See also Armstrong, Louis; Black Swan Phonograph Corporation; Clef Club; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Jazz; Lafayette Theater; Pace, Harry H.; Roseland Ballroom; Savoy Ballroom; Waters, Ethel; other specific musicians

Selected Recordings of the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra

- “The Dicky Blues.” 1923.
- “Go Long Mule.” 1924.
- “Shanghai Shuffle.” 1924.
- “Copenhagen.” 1924.
- “Sugarfoot Stomp.” 1925. (Arranged by Henderson, 1931.)
- “The Stampede.” 1926. (Composed by Henderson.)
- “Henderson Stomp.” 1926. (Composed by Henderson.)
- “Whiteman Stomp.” 1927.
- “Variety Stomp.” 1927. (Co-composed by Henderson.)
- “King Porter Stomp.” 1933. (Arranged by Henderson.)
- “Down South Camp Meeting.” 1934. (Composed and arranged by Henderson.)
- “Wrappin’ It Up.” 1934. (Composed and arranged by Henderson.)
- “Christopher Columbus.” 1936.

Further Reading

- Allen, Walter C. Hendersonia: The Music of Fletcher Henderson and His Musicians—A Bio-Discography. Highland Park, N.J.: Walter C. Allen, 1973.
- Audibert, Michel. Fletcher Henderson et son orchestre 1924–1951: sa place dans l’histoire du jazz. Bayonne, France: Michel Audibert, 1983.
- Charters, Samuel, and Leonard Kunstadt. Jazz: A History of the New York Scene. Garden City, N.Y., 1962.
- Driggs, Frank, and John Hammond. Liner notes. A Study in Frustration: The Fletcher Henderson Story, Thesaurus of Classic Jazz. Columbia/Legacy Records, 1961 (LP), 1994 (CD).
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Magee, Jeffrey Stanford. “The Music of Fletcher Henderson and His Orchestra in the 1920s.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Michigan, 1992.

Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Stewart, Rex. "Smack! Memories of Fletcher Henderson." Down Beat, 32, 3 June 1965.

Herskovits, Melville

In 1896, nine years after his arrival from Germany, Franz Boas received a permanent appointment in anthropology at Columbia University. Almost immediately, he became the leading anthropological voice in America, and his students Melville Herskovits, Margaret Meade, Ruth Benedict, Alfred Kroeber, and Edward Sapir would become dominant authorities as well far into the twentieth century. Boas was important for his criticism of the "scientific racism" that dominated European and American thought and his argument that cultures (the "genius of a people") were diverse, were independent, and had an internal integrity of their own. As a result, such prominent black intellectuals as W. E. B. Du Bois, Alain Locke, Walter White, Carter G. Woodson, Charles S. Johnson, Arthur Schomburg, and Zora Neale Hurston all sought his counsel throughout the 1920s and 1930s. As Hutchinson (1995) has noted, Boas's concepts "became bedrock assumptions among 'New Negro' authors of virtually every persuasion." Melville Herskovits had nearly the same importance, especially in his relationship with Locke and Hurston. Whereas most of Boas's students focused their attention on Native American cultures, Herskovits devoted his life to the study of Africa and the transmission of African culture to the new world.

In 1924, after completing his dissertation "The Cattle Complex in East Africa," Herskovits met Locke in New York City; the two soon became friends as well as intellectual collaborators. Herskovits's anthropometric studies in Harlem (the measuring of African Americans to help disprove the argument that race was a fixed and unvarying constant) and such articles as "The Cultural Approach to Sociology" (1923) helped clarify for Locke theoretical distinctions between race and culture that he would make in "The Concept of Race as Applied to Social Culture" (1924). As a result, it was now possible for Locke to turn his attention to the symbolic dimensions of racial identity. Thus the genesis of Locke's The New Negro (1925) was, in part, in this understanding that race "determines the stressed values which become the conscious symbols and tradition of culture." At the same time, Locke was of assistance to Herskovits, helping him obtain a teaching position at Howard University in Washington, D.C., where he gave the course "Introduction to Physical Anthropology" and was able to continue gathering anthropometric evidence to extend his studies of race. Also, at Locke's invitation, Herskovits contributed to The New Negro an essay called "The Negro's Americanism," in which he argued that Harlem was "essentially not different from any other American community" but was "the same pattern, only a different shade." Locke was not entirely pleased with this argument; he structured The New Negro to emphasize that culturally and temperamentally, blacks were distinguished from whites and that Harlem was not just like any other American community.

As a result of his relationship with Locke and Ernest Just at Howard, the vitality and diversity of The New Negro, and his own observation that blacks were consolidating as a social group, Herskovits began to revise the assimilationist emphasis he had made in "The Negro's Americanism." In The American Negro (1928), Herskovits argued that a race was not so much a homogeneous biological group as a cultural group. This shift in point of view eventually led to his classic work The Myth of the Negro Past (1941), in which he explored the African cultural heritage of African Americans. As a consequence, Herskovits increasingly turned his attention to cultural factors to help explain what science had revealed but could not fully explain. In 1926, Herskovits outlined to the National Research Council his hope of tracing the cultural roots of African Americans by returning to "the great African collections of the major European ethnological museums." Later, with the help of Boas and Elsie Clews Parsons, he did research in West Africa (Dahomey, Nigeria, and the Gold Coast), Suriname, and the Caribbean (Trinidad and Haiti). His work in the Dutch colony of Suriname on descendants of runaway slaves, the Saramaka, led to Rebel Destiny (1934), an almost novelistic rendering intended to help capture the "temperamental base" that Locke had emphasized, and Suriname Folklore (1936). Throughout these years Herskovits kept in touch with Locke. Their shared interest in Africa and African culture had long been a major strand of their friendship.

When Herskovits first began measuring in Harlem in 1924, Zora Neale Hurston was one of his assistants. For the next ten years, however, they saw little of each other. During that time, Hurston had been doing fieldwork in the South and in the Bahamas and kept in close contact with Boas and Ruth Benedict, and Herskovits had taken a position at Northwestern University in 1927. Then Hurston was persuaded by Boas that she should study with Herskovits for a Ph.D. in anthropology, so she and Herskovits were once again in contact. Although Hurston's plans for graduate work failed to materialize, Herskovits would play a significant role as an adviser and personal friend as she expanded the research she had begun in the American South into the Caribbean. As their correspondence suggests, her interest in African American culture and in the African diaspora—in particular, the complex spiritual world of the African maroon communities in Jamaica and Haiti—was what she shared most directly with Herskovits. In Tell My Horse, her study of these two islands, she praised him as the one person who had written about voodoo (in his Life in a Haitian Village) and actually knew something about it.

Melville and Frances Herskovits. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Herskovits taught at Northwestern until the end of his life. He became the first chair of the Department of Anthropology in 1938, and ten years later he established the program of African studies. In 1961, he was appointed to the chair of African studies, the first position of its kind in the United States.

Biography

Melville Jean Herskovits was born on 10 September 1895, in Bellefontaine, Ohio. He studied at the University of Chicago (A.B., 1920), Columbia University (Ph.D., 1923), and the New School of Social Research in New York. He taught at Columbia University (1924 and 1927); Howard University, Washington, D.C. (1925); and Northwestern University (1927–1963). Herskovits was a founding member and first president of the African Studies Association (1957–1958) and an officer in other organizations, including the American Anthropological Association, American Association for the Advancement of Science, American Folklore Society, International Anthropology Congress, and First International Congress of Africanists, 1962. He was an adviser to the Mayor's Committee on Race Relations (Chicago, 1945) and the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee (1959–1960). He died on 25 February 1963.

MARK HELBLING

See also Boas, Franz; Hurston, Zora Neale; Locke, Alain; New Negro, The

Selected Works

- "The Cattle Complex in East Africa." American Anthropologist, 1926.
- The American Negro: A Study in Racial Crossing*. 1928.
- "Race Relations in the U.S." American Journal of Sociology, 1928.
- Rebel Destiny*. 1934.
- Suriname Folklore*. 1936.
- Life in a Haitian Village*. 1937.
- The Economic Life of Primitive People*. 1940.
- The Myth of the Negro Past*. 1941.
- Man and His Works*. 1948.
- Continuity and Change in African Culture*. 1959.
- The Human Factor in Changing Africa*. 1962.
- Economic Transition in Africa*. 1964.
- The New World Negro: Selected Papers in Afroamerican Studies*. 1969.

Further Reading

- Helbling, Mark. The Harlem Renaissance: The One and the Many. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1999.
- Hemenway, Robert. Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Jackson, Walter. "Melville Herskovits and the Search for Afro-American Culture." In Malinowski, Rivers, Benedict, and Others: History of Anthropology, ed. George Stocking. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986.

Heyward, DuBose

DuBose Heyward was an unlikely figure to become associated with the Harlem Renaissance, but his novel Porgy (1925) was the first major work of fiction by a white southerner to depict African Americans in non-stereotypical ways. It won him the respect and admiration of James Weldon Johnson, Nella Larsen, Jean Toomer, and many others in Harlem's intellectual circles.

Heyward was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1885, into a once aristocratic southern family that had been dispossessed and wrecked financially by the Civil War. His widowed mother, Janie, did what she could to keep the family afloat, taking in piecemeal sewing work, operating a boardinghouse on a nearby barrier island, and eventually becoming a local-color writer of some repute. Her subject was the lives and lore of the Gullah Negroes—an ethnically homogeneous subculture that thrived on the sea islands in the Southeast. The Gullahs were said to have originated in Angola (hence, "gullah") and to have been imported as a tribe to Georgia and South Carolina rather than split up as most slaves at the time were; thus the Gullahs more than other slaves retained an unusually strong sense of their customs, origins, and tribal bonds. Speaking a glittering metaphorical language that brought to life their myriad folktales and folk songs, the Gullahs appealed to Janie Heyward as a subject for art. She subsequently wrote several books, transcriptions of Gullah tales, for white audiences and later performed them orally as a parlor-room speaker for ladies' afternoon teas up and down the eastern seaboard.

Janie Heyward and John Bennett, who was a local author of children's books and an avid researcher into the ways of the Gullahs, urged Heyward in the early 1920s to give up the work for which he had had to settle—that of an insurance agent—and pursue his dream of a life in art. Together with Heyward's new wife, Dorothy Hartzell Kuhns, they collectively pointed him toward the rich storehouse of untapped artistic material in the Gullah culture of Charleston.

Thus was born Porgy, a critical and popular sensation in 1925 because of its honest and undiluted view of the African American—not as the ignorant or shifty darky of nineteenth-century writing, but as a person with the same aims and dreams, thoughts and emotions, as white people, simply emanating from a different culture. Reviewers in both the North and the South uniformly applauded the novel, seeing it as revolutionary for its time.

Heyward was mildly ostracized by some quarters of Charlestonian society for his progressive views. He began to spend less time in Charleston and more time in the mountains of western North Carolina, where he did the bulk of his writing, and in New York, where his wife, a professional playwright, got him interested in theater. Dorothy Heyward drafted a script for a play of Porgy, Heyward helped her refine it, and the resulting work was performed in New York in October 1927, once again to great critical acclaim. Many reviewers said that the lush Negro spirituals, which set the emotional mood of the play, were worth the price of admission alone, and the Heywards found themselves adopted by wealthy white New Yorkers and the elite of Harlem as well. Most important, the play Porgy helped energize the nascent black theater movement at the time, for the Heywards insisted that the cast be all-black, not white actors in blackface as was the custom. As a result, more headlining roles began to open up for black actors.

Heyward, now famous, continued to pursue this vein of then-new material—the white modernists' interest in primitivism—in his next major novel, Mamba's Daughters (1929). This book, a longer and more complex work than Porgy, tells the story of three generations of Gullah women and the successive generations' striving to rise above their social and cultural destiny. In this novel, Heyward abandoned the somewhat aloof voice of the white outsider in Porgy and adopted instead a much more sympathetic narrative voice, one that clearly champions the attempts of the Gullah women to better their lot in life.

Much of Heyward's fame resulted from the stage dramatizations of his work. In 1939, Mamba was performed on Broadway, where it made a star of Ethel Waters in her first major dramatic role. And Porgy, of course, became Porgy and Bess in 1935—the first American folk opera. Heyward collaborated with George Gershwin and Ira Gershwin in all possible ways on this production. He wrote the libretto single-handedly, carving it out of the play version of the story. Either by himself or in collaboration with Ira Gershwin, he wrote half the arias for the opera. And he also scouted for talent, assisted in rehearsals, and performed other production chores. Porgy and Bess, however, was a relative failure, commercially and critically, when it first opened: Black critics objected to what they considered to be the stereotyped portrayal of African Americans; white critics carped over whether the work was a legitimate opera or a Broadway musical.

Despondent and embittered by New Yorkers' insensitivity to Porgy and Bess, into which he had poured nine years of labor and love, Heyward beat a retreat from the glitterati and returned to his roots in Charleston. He published some more novels, taking a more overt social-critical angle; and he involved himself in local historic preservation efforts and in a playwriting group that had attached itself to a newly restored eighteenth-century theater.

DuBose Heyward, 1931. (Library of Congress.)

Heyward died of a heart attack at age fifty-four in 1940, just three years after George Gershwin's death. Both men died thinking that Porgy and Bess had been a failure, but it was actually their greatest success; it has since achieved literary and musical immortality.

Biography

Edwin DuBose Heyward was born on 31 August 1885, in Charleston, South Carolina, and studied at Boys' High School there. He was a cofounder of the Poetry Society of South Carolina (1920), was editor of its Year Book (1921–1923), was elected its president in 1924, and resigned in 1925. He toured Europe in 1927. He received a D.Litt. from the University of North Carolina in 1928. He took a second trip abroad, to the Mediterranean and the Holy Land, and was made an honorary doctor of letters by the College of Charleston in 1929. He attended the Southern Writers Conference in Charlottesville, Virginia, with Faulkner, Glasgow, and others (1931). Heyward was the first South Carolinian elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters. He was awarded an honorary degree from the University of South Carolina and cruised to the Virgin Islands in 1937. He was named resident director of the Dock Street Theater in Charleston in 1939. Heyward died at age fifty-four in Tryon, North Carolina, on 16 June 1940.

JAMES M. HUTCHISSON

See also Gershwin, George; Johnson, James Weldon; Larsen, Nella; Porgy and Bess; Porgy: Novel; Porgy: Play; Toomer, Jean; Waters, Ethel

Selected Works

- "Poetry South." Poetry, 20, April 1922, pp. 35–48. (With Hervey Allen.)
- Carolina Chansons, Legends of the Low Country*. 1922. (With Hervey Allen.)
- Skylines and Horizons*. 1924.
- Porgy*. 1925.
- "The New Note in Southern Literature." Bookman, 61, April 1925, pp. 153–156.
- Porgy: A Play*. 1927. (With Dorothy Heyward.)
- Mamba's Daughters*. 1929.

The Half Pint Flask. 1929.
Jasbo Brown and Selected Poems. 1931.
Peter Ashley. 1932.
Porgy and Bess. 1935. (With George Gershwin and Ira Gershwin.)
Lost Morning. 1936.
Star Spangled Virgin. 1939.
Mamba's Daughters: A Play. 1939. (With Dorothy Heyward.)

Further Reading

Alpert, Hollis. The Life and Times of Porgy and Bess. New York: Knopf, 1989.
 Durham, Frank. DuBose Heyward: The Man Who Wrote "Porgy." Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1954.
 Hutchisson, James M. DuBose Heyward: A Charleston Gentleman and the World of Porgy and Bess. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.

Higher Education

Ever since Alain Locke's seminal essay "Enter the New Negro" (1925), the term "New Negro" has usually been reduced to its linkage with the authors and literature of the Harlem Renaissance. As used in the 1920s, however, the term referred to more than the active writers of the Harlem Renaissance: it also included the African American masses and especially the young. "For the younger generation," Locke wrote, "is vibrant with a new psychology" (1969, 3). This new spirit, which Locke attributed to a renewal of self-respect and independence, was nowhere more evident during the 1920s than on black college and university campuses.

The 1920s represented the real beginnings of modern public as well as private black higher education, although that aspect of the decade is usually overlooked in most discussions and analyses. These years witnessed the first significant growth in the population of African American as well as African college students in the United States, ongoing efforts at the modernization of the curriculum, the emergence of modern intercollegiate spectator sports such as football, and increased personal freedom for students on campus. The decade also witnessed the appearance of students who were not only better prepared academically for the academic rigors of college, but also more mature, assertive, expressive, and militant at black institutions of higher education—all traits that characterized the New Negro of the Harlem Renaissance.

The new confidence that characterized students of color specifically and members of their race generally in the 1920s resulted from many forces. Before World War I, militant new leaders, such as W. E. B. Du Bois, had emerged, demanding full civil rights and an immediate end to racial segregation and thereby inspiring greater self-assertiveness among African Americans. The "great migration" to the urban North further disrupted old patterns of life and created new hopes as well as new problems. The fight abroad to make the world safe for democracy during World War I led to greater expectations at home, despite the bloody race riots of 1919. As African Americans entered the 1920s, it was clear that their long journey down the desert years of history had strengthened, not weakened, their resolve to improve their lives.

Important changes occurred in black higher education during the decade. An essential characteristic of black colleges and universities during the 1920s was their first emergence as institutions of higher education after nearly half a century as poverty-stricken elementary and secondary schools. The chief factor that brought them into existence was the growth of a system of public education for African Americans in the South. This system, by creating a demand for teachers, made their preparation the focus of the black colleges' mission. The education of teachers set in motion a complex supply—demand chain in which the availability of teaching positions drew students into the colleges to qualify for these positions. The growth of this total system of racially segregated public education not only was responsible for the development of black higher education but also ascribed to it an indispensable role as the source of manpower for black education and, ultimately, placed it in intellectual and pedagogical control over that system—defining the content, establishing methods, setting standards, and, as the sole outlet for the system, serving as a criterion for its success.

Many forces converged to make this happen. Among these was a change in the economic fortunes of black higher education after 1900. This is attributable to the appearance of two large and purposeful private philanthropic agencies—the Rosenwald Fund and the General Education Board—which were concerned with the improvement of educational opportunities for African Americans. Moreover, there was some improvement in public support for black schools as a result of the positive effect that World War I had on the nation's economy. In educational terms, this meant that the demand for education rose and more public money from rising taxes and private charitable dollars went into schools. As the demand for teachers rose, the educational requirements for teachers rose too, and public funds had to be used to improve teacher training—some of which was directed toward the African American community. These conditions led to the growth of black colleges and an improvement in both physical plants and faculties as well as the academic quality of students who enrolled in these institutions.

Improved economic conditions also made higher education a goal for more African American young people during the 1920s. Between 1919–1920 and 1929–1930, the undergraduate enrollments at fifty-seven four-year black colleges and universities grew from 9,589 to 16,392. During this period, the largest increase in enrollments occurred at thirty black four-year colleges, more than doubling from 4,473 to 10,222. Significantly, the total undergraduate enrollment at these schools was about equally divided among male and female students: 5,116 and 5,110, respectively. This growth in enrollment at private black colleges would continue uninterrupted until 1953. A similar increase occurred at twenty-seven black public colleges, where enrollments grew from 3,720 in 1919–1920 to 6,170 by 1929–1930—an upward trend that would continue uninterrupted to the present day (Bowles and De Costa 1971, 52, 55).

The publication of the Phelps-Stokes Fund's Jones Report in 1916 also helped bring about the demise of many marginal and substandard black institutions, which were colleges or universities in name only, and led to the termination of many of the elementary and secondary education divisions in black colleges. As a result, the average age of students at these institutions increased. Thus, by 1920, the average age of the student body at black colleges began to approach the modern norm of seventeen to eighteen years for college freshmen. Moreover, because of the great migration, a larger proportion of students not only came from urban areas and from improved public school systems but also were high school graduates and so were better prepared for the academic rigors of college. Finally, a higher number of students came from families in which one or both parents had received some postsecondary schooling. All of these changes had, by the 1920s, created a type of student who was less willing than his or her predecessors to tolerate the all-encompassing petty restrictions on student life on campus that characterized the traditional system of discipline at black colleges.

The 1920s were also noteworthy for the appearance of African Americans on the scholarly scene, in the pages of Journal of Negro History, Opportunity, and Survey Graphic, who would contribute to the future intellectual growth of black higher education as well as the modernization of its curriculum and mission. Their names read like a who's who of twentieth-century scholars. They included the director of Tuskegee University's Bureau of Records and Research and editor of The Negro Yearbook, Monroe N. Work; the historians Luther P. Jackson, Lorenzo J. Greene, William Leo Hansberry, and Rayford Logan; the English professor Benjamin Brawley; the folklorists Miles Mark Fisher and Lorenzo D. Turner; and the sociologists E. Franklin Frazier and Charles S. Johnson.

Alain Locke, who is usually credited with playing a major role in defining and promoting the Harlem Renaissance, began his career as a scholar at the nation's premier black educational institution of the 1920s—Howard University. At Howard, Locke was accepted and acclaimed by its dean of arts and sciences, Kelly Miller. Along with his former classmate Montgomery Gregory, Locke organized the Howard Players. In addition, African American scholars organized into a group known as the Sanhedrin under the joint leadership of Locke and Miller. Locke organized Howard's first literary journal, Stylus. He helped in the organization of Howard's art gallery and the music department, for he believed strongly that general and cultural education was a desirable goal for African American students. Locke devoted much of his own teaching to the new science of anthropology, social conflict, and social theory during this period.

Before the 1920s, the system of rules and regulations governing students at black colleges and universities was an all-encompassing web of Victorian paternalism that intruded on nearly every aspect of student life. Students were told when to rise in the morning, when to retire at night, and even what to wear. Daily attendance at campus convocations or chapel services was mandatory. Students and their dormitory rooms were required to be neat and clean. The use of alcohol and tobacco by students as well as card-playing, dancing, and whatever else teachers and administrators considered immoral or opposed to true culture was forbidden. Fraternities and sororities were also prohibited.

Some African American students had naturally objected to the regimentation imposed by these campus rules and regulations even before the 1920s, but such discipline was tolerable in the late nineteenth century, when it was thought to be prompted by Christian piety and was applied to white and black students alike. Yet the tradition of piety remained in force at black institutions of higher education long after the leading white colleges deemphasized their concern for the moral uplift of students and began to stress secular scholarship. African American students suspected that the continuation of the strict discipline governing their lives at black colleges during the 1920s was prompted by the belief that Africans were especially sensuous beings who lacked self-discipline and restraint and were incapable of exercising free will. Behind this view, they believed, lay the fear that if African Americans were allowed to exercise personal freedom, they would become a threat to white civilization.

The spirit of W. E. B. Du Bois—editor of the magazine The Crisis—hovered over the black college rebellions of the 1920s. He instigated the confrontation at Fisk University and publicized and celebrated African American student protests nationwide. Throughout the 1920s Du Bois wrote editorials and articles excoriating the so-called corrupt bargain between philanthropists and the white South, which forced black institutions of higher learning to compromise both their mission and their principles in return for money. He lamented the fact that African Americans' dependence on the rich for donations to absolutely necessary causes made it increasingly difficult for them to exercise intelligence, apply frank and honest criticism, and achieve freedom and self-respect. African Americans' fear of retribution for challenging the system, in Du Bois's opinion, sapped the manhood of the race, bred cowards and sycophants, and crucified honest men and women. For Du Bois, therefore, black college student protests of the 1920s involved nothing less than the tremendous question of whether African American young people were to be trained as they and their parents wished or as white southerners and their northern allies demanded.

Yet Du Bois believed that African American students of the 1920s had come of age. They should no longer tolerate the sort of petty dictation that had seemed natural in the early days of black higher education when African Americans were no more than a generation removed from slavery. Du Bois considered African American students free men and women. While acknowledging that African American parents wanted their children reared under all necessary constraints, he noted that at the same time they demanded for young people the equally necessary freedom and self-respect which were essential to the development of responsible adults.

The challenge to parietal rules and regulations governing student life at black colleges broke forth with unprecedented force following World War I. In the spring of 1920, students at Wilberforce University boycotted classes to protest a faculty resolution restricting social intermingling between male and female students on campus. Two years later, students at Storer College struck to protest the expulsion of three males who had been involved in an altercation with local whites. In 1923, most of the student body at Livingstone College went on strike during much of May; some students left the college for good. Demanding more "freedom of choice," students at Howard University went on strike in 1925 to protest compulsory Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) for males and overly strict enforcement of military requirements by university officials. That same year students at W. E. B. Du Bois's alma mater, Fisk University, began a classroom boycott to demand fewer social restrictions and demonstrate support for fellow students who had been expelled for allegedly participating in an earlier campus protest. In 1927, students at Hampton Institute staged a bitter and protracted boycott to protest the arbitrary enforcement of parietal rules and regulations, which led to the expulsion of sixty-nine undergraduates and to probation for hundreds more. Student unrest at Wilberforce, Howard, Fisk, and Hampton received the most attention in the African American press, but there were reports of at least ten additional student protests and boycotts at black institutions of higher education, including Knoxville College, Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, Shaw, Alcorn A&M, Lincoln University in Missouri, Saint Augustine, and Johnson C. Smith.

Another correlative of the mentality of the New Negro, which manifested itself at black colleges and universities during the 1920s, was an increased demand for competitive sports. Although attempts to develop intercollegiate athletics in black higher education had begun in the 1890s, such efforts did not bear real fruit until after World War I. By the 1920s, nearly every black college and university sponsored teams in football, baseball, basketball, and track and field. The jubilation and pageantry of these contests were exemplified in a ritual unique to football games at black colleges in the 1920s that was known as the "rabblies," in which well-dressed students poured out of the stands at halftime and—to the accompaniment of music provided by some of their peers—danced around the field in a free-flowing exhibition. Significantly, female students at black colleges began participating in intercollegiate basketball and track contests during the 1920s; in this regard, black colleges not only afforded women more opportunities to compete but also accorded more prestige to their accomplishments than white institutions of higher education (P. Miller 1995, 119–120). Thus, as a response to prevailing notions of blacks' and women's inferiority, organized athletics at black colleges constituted a telling assertion of pride and accomplishment.

The 1920s were also noteworthy for the appearance of an appreciable number of African students in the United States, many of whom were enrolled at black colleges and universities. In a program initiated by the Phelps-Stokes Fund, Hampton and Tuskegee institutes were selected as hosts for African students from British colonies in Africa in the early 1920s. Although the goal of the program was to train Africans who would passively accept colonial rule in their homelands, the results were quite the opposite. At Tuskegee, the African history classes of Professor Simbini M. Nkomo—who was variously described as being from present-day Madagascar, Zimbabwe, and South Africa—deliberately attempted to communicate the spirit of incipient nationalism or racial self-evaluation, which he regarded as the foundation of true progress for Africans. One observer of Tuskegee's African students remarked that all of them displayed a pan-African consciousness, an attitude assisted, in no small part, by the African American milieu in which African students could immerse themselves. Nkomo's efforts led to the founding of the African Student Union of America (ASU). The agenda of the organization's fourth annual conference at Tuskegee Institute included items ranging from misrepresentations of African life and history to cooperation between African and African American students. "The ASU presented its members with the concrete need to prepare themselves for leading their own people, and inspired them with the determination to take independent action if need be" (King 1971, 221). In 1925, the future leader of independent Nigeria, Benjamin Nmandi Azikwe, arrived in the United States to begin his undergraduate studies. As a student, Azikwe not only learned everything he could about political science from his American professors but also participated in a brief student protest at Lincoln University.

Although most African and African American youths attended black institutions of higher education, a small number were enrolled at northern white private and public colleges and universities during the 1920s. The exact number of students of color who attended these institutions will probably never be known, but it is possible to identify some of them. The historians William Leo Hansberry, William M. Brewer, Alrutheus A. Taylor, and Charles H. Wesley received bachelor's or graduate degrees or both from Harvard between 1919 and 1925. The first African American cabinet member and secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, Robert C. Weaver, graduated from Harvard University in 1929. The teacher and anthropologist Caroline Bond Day, the composer and writer Marieta Bonner, the singer Lola Wilson Hayes, and the future chairman of Howard University's French department, Theodora R. Boyd, all received bachelor's degrees from Radcliffe College. Both Zora Neale Hurston and Langston Hughes attended Columbia University. Hughes left after a year, finding the atmosphere uncongenial to his tastes, but Hurston remained at Columbia, where she was a student of the anthropologist Franz Boas. Under Boas's guidance she began research on African American folklore and religion, much of which was later incorporated into her novels, such as Mules and Men, Jonah's Gourd Vine, and Their Eyes Were Watching God. Countee Cullen attended New York University, from which he graduated in 1923, and received a master's degree from Harvard University. The African American educator William Allison Davis attended Williams College; he graduated summa cum laude in 1924 and was the class valedictorian. Wallace Thurman, author of The Blacker the Berry (1929) and Infants of the Spring (1932), attended the University of Utah and the University of Southern California.

The matriculation of African American students at white colleges was, at best, only tolerated during the 1920s. "A dozen little discriminations annoy you," one African American undergraduate confessed in 1927, "discriminations that you have known all your life, but you hoped to escape" at college. You can "never hope to play" on your college's team or "belong to literary societies or pep organizations or any other extracurricular activities," he complained. The white students "shun you except when they want something." Nor could they "refer to you in the singular." An African American student was "always addressed as one of 'you fellows.' You can't understand why you can never be an individual" (L. Miller 1927, 138). In what was perhaps one of the most egregious instances of racial harassment during the decade, Halston V. Eagleson, an African American undergraduate at Indiana University–Bloomington, was kidnapped by three white students in 1922 and taken to Spencer, Indiana. There he was arrested and jailed briefly to prevent him from earning his letter in band. Despite efforts by the Eagleson family to press charges against the perpetrators, the case was dismissed for lack of evidence (Halsell Gilliam 1985, 41).

African Americans of the 1920s stood in opposition to the tradition of paternalism that characterized black colleges and the unapologetic racism of white institutions of higher education. Prompted by a growing racial consciousness and greater ambition, African American students demanded greater respect and independence for themselves as well as a better quality of life on their campuses. They discarded past notions of what type of education was best suited for them and demanded a greater say in their own lives as well as the educational institutions that were supposed to prepare them for the challenges of modern society and advance the race. They wanted to escape from the backwaters of American life and join the mainstream. In their struggle to do so, students and faculties not only helped reform the curriculum of black institutions of higher education but also transformed the extracurricular activities of these schools. African American students attending the nation's white colleges put those schools on notice as well that they were no longer willing to accept racial discrimination in silence. In these and countless other ways, black colleges, students, and faculty members both reflected and contributed to the mythos of the New Negro during the 1920s.

MONROE LITTLE

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History; Boas, Franz; Brawley, Benjamin; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Frazier, E. Franklin; Greene, Lorenzo; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; Howard University; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Locke, Alain; Miller, Kelly; Opportunity; Stylus; Survey Graphic; Thurman, Wallace; Work, Monroe Nathan

Further Reading

Bowles, Frank, and Frank A. De Costa. Between Two Worlds: A Profile of Negro Higher Education. New York:

McGraw-Hill, 1971. (Fifth of a series of profiles sponsored by the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education.)

Halsell Gilliam, Frances V. A Time to Speak: A Brief History of the Afro-Americans of Bloomington, Indiana, 1865–1965. Bloomington, Ind.: Pinus Strobus, 1985.

Holmes, Eugene C. "Alain Locke and the New Negro Movement." Negro American Literature Forum, 2(3, Protest and Propaganda Literature), Autumn 1968, pp. 60–68.

Jones, Maxine D., and Joe M. Richardson. Talladega College: The First Century. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1990.

King, Kenneth James. Pan-Africanism and Education: A Study of Race, Philanthropy, and Education in the Southern States of America and East Africa. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Locke, Alain. "The New Negro." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Atheneum, 1969.

Logan, Rayford W. Howard University: The First Hundred Years, 1867–1967. New York: New York University Press, 1969.

Miller, Loren. "College." Crisis, 33(3), January 1927, pp. 138–140.

Miller, Patrick B. "To 'Bring the Race Along Rapidly': Sport, Student Culture, and Educational Mission at Historically Black Colleges during the Interwar Years." History of Education Quarterly, 35(2), Summer 1995, pp. 111–133.

Sollors, Werner, et al., eds. Blacks at Harvard: A Documentary History of African American Experience at Harvard and Radcliffe. New York: New York University Press, 1993.

Wolters, Raymond. The New Negro on Campus: Black College Rebellions of the 1920s. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975.

Historically Black Colleges and Universities

In 1927, 13,580 students were enrolled at predominantly black colleges and universities, while another 1,500 black students were enrolled at predominantly white colleges. This was a sixfold increase over the 2,132 African Americans who had been enrolled in college only a decade earlier ("Enrollment" 1928). As their numbers increased, the black college students and alumni of the 1920s demanded a different and higher type of education. These demands were manifest in many student strikes and alumni revolts.

These rebellions should be understood in context. The "New Negroes" on campus were responding to the growing racial consciousness and the larger ambition that also gave rise to the Harlem Renaissance. This new consciousness was also influenced by a more assertive ethos that developed as a result of blacks' participation in World War I, and it came to the fore against the background of the "great migration" of blacks from the rural South to urban areas. Looming in the more distant background was a long-simmering revolt against the paternalistic spirit and the industrial emphasis that had characterized much of black college education in the past.

Part I

During and after the Civil War, northern benevolent societies and denominational bodies, the Negro church, and the Freedmen's Bureau began the heroic task of educating the freedmen. These missionaries rejected southerners' demands that they begin with industrial and manual training to prepare blacks for skilled work, later add the sequence of elementary and secondary schools, and still later add colleges. They thought they would be wasting money if they established elementary or vocational schools without also providing a college education for teachers. Hence they founded colleges—Fisk, Howard, Hampton, Talladega, Atlanta, and others—which together trained a few thousand teachers who then instructed the masses in the fundamentals of reading, writing, arithmetic, and life.

Yet many white southerners feared that any education of blacks beyond the vocational level would lead to increased dissatisfaction with the inferior status accorded to African Americans in the South. The editor of the New Orleans Times-Democrat warned that "the higher education of the Negro unfits him for the work that it is intended that he shall do, and cultivates ambitions that can never be realized" (quoted in "A Blow" 1904). Throughout the South, planters feared that college education would undermine the willingness of blacks to work in the fields and would make African Americans less deferential, submissive, and dependent. Some of them heartily endorsed the contention of Senator James K. Vardaman of Mississippi: "What the North is sending South is not money but dynamite; this education is ruining our Negroes. They're demanding equality" (quoted in Baker 1964).

Many white southerners also said that the missionary teachers had ignored the limited aptitude and capabilities of the Negro. At a time when social Darwinism was in vogue, even some black people thought that the races were at different stages of cultural evolution and that the educational curriculum should be adjusted accordingly. "The educational requirements of the people who are only a few hundred years out of the jungle are not the same as those of people who have had thousands of years of civilization," the black president of Georgia Normal College explained. "The great mass of our people need to be trained in agriculture, the mechanical arts, the trades and industries, and in the art of homemaking" (Holley 1948).

Given the prevalence of these views, many black colleges proceeded cautiously. Following the example set at Hampton and Tuskegee institutes, they renounced agitation and added vocational courses that promised to make black students more efficient workers. This vocational emphasis was then reinforced with support from secular northern philanthropists associated with the Slater, Jeanes, Phelps-Stokes, and Rosenwald foundations; the Southern Education Board; and the Rockefeller General Education Board. The secular philanthropists took care to avoid alienating the white South. Rather than follow the egalitarian example of the Yankee missionaries, the secular philanthropists fostered vocational training as especially suited to a predetermined, subordinate role for black people in American society.

The trend in this direction was heightened when Congress, through the Smith-Lever and Smith-Hughes acts of 1914 and 1917, rounded out the program of vocational and agricultural training and established a county-agent bureaucracy. The county agents then assumed responsibility for seeing that the land-grant colleges, and especially black institutions, did not stray from the gospel of vocationalism. Together the combination of secular philanthropy and federal aid altered the course of the black colleges and initiated a vocational phase in the history of Negro higher education.

In retrospect it seems inevitable that black college students, even those trained at vocational institutes, would eventually challenge the subordination of their race. Segregation, after all, required that blacks provide their own leaders, and this meant that a critical minority of African Americans had to be trained in medicine, law, journalism, theology, and other professions. Moreover, as it happened, teaching eventually became the most reliable source of employment for black college graduates. Thus even the land-grant A&M colleges, while offering a veneer of vocational courses, enrolled most of their students in teacher-training programs that resembled the studies then in vogue at most white colleges. The black students were segregated, of course, and generally received inferior training, but the ideal of aspiration was preserved.

As a result of World War I and the great migration, many blacks of the 1920s also enjoyed larger social and economic opportunities, and consequently felt a greater need for higher education and professional training. Far from being grateful for the financial aid that the government and secular philanthropy had showered on vocational schools, many black students, professors, and alumni feared that the higher aspirations of the race had been sacrificed in order to obtain money from the ruling powers. They were not prepared to adjust to a subordinate status but instead demanded the right to full participation in American life.

The challenge to subordination broke forth with unprecedented force when blacks returned from the “war to make the world safe for democracy” with a fierce determination to battle against discrimination in their own land. The rising tide of Negro protest was manifest in many ways—in the warfare of the “red summer” of 1919; in Marcus Garvey’s black nationalist movement; in the resurgence of black pride celebrated by the artists of the Harlem Renaissance; and in the growth of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Urban League, and the black press. It was evident during the 1920s that “New Negroes” were ascendant in the black community, and they were determined to enjoy all the rights and privileges of American citizens.

The wave of rebellion that engulfed most of the leading black colleges was one of the most significant aspects of the New Negro protest movement. It began at one of the leading vocational institutes. In 1922, when the governor of Florida shifted the emphasis at Florida A&M from teacher training to trade training, students not only went on strike but also burned down the Mechanical Arts Building. Similarly, at Lincoln Institute in Missouri, there was a decade-long struggle between one faction that emphasized vocational training and another that stressed the importance of traditional liberal arts and sciences. And at Hampton Institute, several hundred students were suspended in 1927 after demanding that more emphasis be given to academic subjects. “The complaints with regard to education are possibly unique in the annals of student strikes,” the Hampton administration noted, “demanding as they did more and better education” (“The Strike” 1927). One of the suspended students explained that the students had a “Du Bois ambition” that would not mix with a “Booker T. Washington education” (Robert A. Coles, quoted in Baltimore Afro-American, 1927).

“Du Bois protest” was also on display at Fisk University, the nation’s most prominent liberal arts college for blacks. In 1925, students at Fisk took exception to the suspension of the student newspaper, the Fisk Herald, and to the denial of a request for a campus chapter of the NAACP; they also complained about the university’s sponsoring of segregated Jim Crow entertainments, and they protested against a draconian code of student discipline that was rigorously enforced and was justified with statements to the effect that black young people were particularly sensuous beings who would abandon themselves to indulgence if they were not subjected to firm control.

To Du Bois it seemed that Fisk had devised a plan that was intended to persuade the elite of black youth to accept a subordinate status, to make them know “their place.” He was delighted when, in February 1925, more than one hundred students from Livingstone Hall ignored the ten o’clock curfew and instead sang, yelled, smashed windows, and told the faculty that it would not be safe for any authorities and that they were “going to keep up this sort of thing until the President’s hair was white.” According to the dean of women, “The disorderly students overturned chapel seats, broke windows, . . . all the while keeping up a steady shouting of ‘Du Bois!’ ‘Du Bois!’” (Scriber 1925). Police were called to the campus to restore order, but this precipitated a student strike of ten weeks’ duration. Eventually, a new administration was inaugurated, after the trustees conceded that it was impossible to operate a college without students.

Part II

The black students and alumni of the 1920s aimed at control of their colleges. This did not necessarily mean that the colleges had to be headed by African Americans. In 1925, the rebellious students and alumni at Fisk had demanded only that their white president be ousted, because they thought he had compromised too much with white segregationists and supremacists; they accepted another white man as a replacement, because they found him in sympathy with their basic ideals. The same scenario was repeated at Lincoln University in Pennsylvania in 1926. In each instance, however, the protests on campus elicited elements of racial pride and confidence that some Negroes were capable of presiding over the college.

Going beyond their brothers and sisters at Fisk and Lincoln, who had demanded only that they be given a larger role in the management of their schools, the faculty and alumni at Howard University insisted that an African American should be in charge of their school. They did so because they, like some of the artists of the Harlem Renaissance, were stirred by a new sense of racial pride and self-consciousness. Thus the historian Carter G. Woodson of Howard was convinced that the absence of black leaders, along with the presence of textbooks that emphasized the primitive quality of the African background and the servile character of the black American experience, left many African Americans with the conviction that they were inferior and should accept an underprivileged status. If elite black students were given the impression that the Negro race and its leaders would never amount to much, Woodson said, they would not be prepared to uplift the group. Such students could “hardly find delight in undertaking what [their] education has led [them] to think impossible” (1933).

Similarly, Alain Locke, who was then a professor of philosophy and literature at Howard, concluded that blacks must take control of the university if the students were to develop the confidence needed for leadership. In scores of articles and especially in a remarkable anthology that gave its name, The New Negro, to the black arts movement of the decade, Locke celebrated black poetry, fiction, drama, scholarship, music, and art as the necessary foundation for building a self-confident race that could face whites with equanimity (1925a). He feared that if whites remained in control of black colleges, African American young people would succumb to an atmosphere of “spirit-dampening condescension” and would leave the campus as a talented tenth committed not to group service but to bourgeois individualism (1925b).

Like Woodson and Locke, Howard’s dean of arts and science, Kelly Miller, and its most prominent sociologist, E. Franklin Frazier, also insisted that the university needed black leaders to inspire its students with enthusiasm for racial service and uplift. They thought that white leadership left many black students with the impression that the Negro race would never measure up and that black collegians consequently would settle for the “materialistic individualism of middle-class American life.” They lamented that, instead of preparing “for the uplift of a downtrodden people,” black students were “preparing themselves for the professions as a means to wealth and enjoyment” and not as a prerequisite for racial uplift.

Thus these professors joined with the leaders of the Howard Alumni Association in 1925 and 1926 and demanded that James Stanley Durkee, the eleventh in an almost unbroken line of white clergymen-presidents, should be replaced by an African American. Eventually, Mordecai W. Johnson was chosen in 1926 as the first black president of Howard University—a choice that the journal Christian Century and Christian Work hailed as “a new milestone in the long pilgrimage of a race” (quoted in “Howard’s New President” 1926).

Howard University, 1942. (Photograph by John Collier. Library of Congress.)

The New Negroes on campus were in revolt against both the industrial emphasis and the paternalistic spirit that had characterized an earlier era of black college education. Prompted by a larger ambition and a growing racial consciousness, the black students and alumni of the 1920s demanded a higher type of curriculum and a greater degree of control over their colleges. They turned their backs on the limited educational program of trade training and, as Du Bois (1921) put it, proposed “to speak for ourselves and to be represented by spokesmen whom we elect. And whenever in any case this policy is contravened we are going to fight that decision in every civilized way, and to the last ditch.”

RAYMOND WOLTERS

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Frazier, E. Franklin; Garveyism; Higher Education; Howard University; Locke, Alain; Miller, Kelly; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Woodson, Carter G.

Further Reading

Baker, Ray Stannard. Following the Color Line. New York: Harper Torchbook, 1964, p. 247.
Baltimore Afro-American, 19 November 1927.

- "A Blow at Negro Education." Current Literature, 36, January–June 1904, pp. 491–492.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Thomas Jesse Jones." Crisis, 22, October 1921, p. 256.
- "Enrollment in Negro Universities and Colleges." School and Society, 28, 29 September 1928, pp. 401–402.
- Holley, Joseph Winthrop. You Can't Build a Chimney From the Top. New York: William-Frederick, 1948, p. 82.
- "Howard's New President." Pamphlet, 1926. (Howard University Archives.)
- Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925a.
- . "Negro Education Bids for Par." Survey, 54, September 1925b, pp. 570, 593.
- Scriber, Dora. Communication to alumni, 14 February 1925. Du Bois Papers, reel 15, frame 0447.
- "The Strike at Hampton." Southern Workman, 56, 1927, pp. 569–572.
- Wolters, Raymond. The New Negro on Campus: Black College Rebellions of the 1920s. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975.
- Woodson, Carter G. The Mis-Education of the Negro. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1933, pp. xxxiii, 6, 55–56.

Hobby Horse

Douglas Howe opened the Hobby Horse bookstore in Harlem some time around 1928, at a time when interest by both blacks and whites in African American literature was at a zenith, yet there were few avenues for making this literature available to the public.

At the time, Harlem was considered the national hub of black culture and artistry. African Americans who were seriously interested in becoming writers, performers, and musicians were eventually likely to make their way there. In Harlem, they found a supportive group of other writers and artists with whom to share their work and ideas. And in the cultural mosaic made up of blacks who had migrated from the South and the Caribbean, they found characters and images that would inhabit their work.

The Hobby Horse, considered the nation's first African American bookstore, was a combination bookstore and tearoom. It was a place where young African American writers and artists could congregate and publicly share their work and where many of Harlem's noted black society matrons met for lunch and afternoon tea. These social gatherings were often reported in black newspapers such as the Chicago Defender.

The Hobby Horse was originally located at 205 West 135th Street. This site was in the heart of Harlem's social activity, and Howe had access to many of the established literary and artistic luminaries of the Harlem Renaissance, as well as up-and-coming figures. Not only did the Hobby Horse stock and display books by African Americans, but Sunday evening book discussions were also held there, and—more important—black writers and poets gave readings from their own work. At the Hobby Horse, poets and writers such as Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston found a public venue for both their published works and their works in progress. Howe also exhibited paintings and photographs by many popular visual artists of the day at the Hobby Horse. Among these artists was James Allen (b. 1907), whose photographic portraits of African American and white celebrities of the Harlem Renaissance were often reprinted in the popular black press.

Howe had not been the first to conceive of a bookstore featuring the works of African American writers: Many other literati of the Harlem Renaissance had also sensed a need for such an enterprise and contemplated the idea. Among them was Nella Larsen (the author of Passing and Quicksand), who began to seek financing for a bookstore in 1926, two years before Howe opened the Hobby Horse. Like Howe, Larsen envisioned a bookstore that would do more than just sell books—a place where Harlem's fashionable set could gather, buy books, and discuss literature, and where black authors could read from their work. Larsen was especially concerned about the scarcity of venues for public display and promotion of the works of African American writers, because she was nearing completion of her own first novel. Larsen sought financing for her venture from her friend Carl Van Vechten, but he was unable to supply it.

Howe's Hobby Horse was in operation until 1930.

JANICE TUCK LIVELY

See also Chicago Defender; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Larsen, Nella; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1982.
- Andrews, William. Classic Fiction of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

- Davus, Thadious M. Nella Larsen, Novelist of the Harlem Renaissance. Louisiana, 1994, pp. 217–219.
- Harlem Renaissance: Art of Black America*. New York: Studio Museum in Harlem, 1987.
- “The Hobby Horse.” In The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary of the Era, ed. Bruce Kellner. New York, 1987, p. 170.
- Hughes, Langston. Selected Poems. New York: Vintage, 1987.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Their Eyes Were Watching God. New York: Harper and Row, 1990.
- Larsen, Nella. Quicksand and Passing. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Holiday, Billie

Billie Holiday’s triumph was to take the American popular song and use it to claim her place in the world. She was probably the most complete, unadulterated jazz singer of all time, although that fact has been overshadowed because of a quirk in the human condition that makes us fascinated with those who gamble with life and lose. But even if her life was like a long, tortuous sentence struggling to express itself, to attempt to reconstruct it as that of an ordinary woman beset by trials and tribulations is to misunderstand her with a degree of perversity equal to her own.

Many of the personality problems Holiday grappled with throughout her life could well have had their roots in her traumatic childhood. She was continually abandoned to friends and relatives, and her rape at age eleven wrought emotional havoc; these experiences could have contributed to the diminished sense of self that those close to her spoke of. This feeling of rejection would also go some way toward explaining her abnormally dependent personality, her desire to attach herself to someone who would love and care for her—and then, once she was in a relationship, her willingness to do anything and accept anything to maintain it. Equally, a lack of parental supervision might have had a bearing on her shaky moral discipline, expressed at an early age through truancy and uninterest in academic activities. Yet such calm after-the-fact rationalization can never fully explain the dark, destructive forces that inhabit human nature. From her early teens, Billie Holiday associated marijuana and alcohol with good times. As a young woman, she lived it up with a vengeance. Yet she found something within herself that enabled her to create some of the great classics of jazz during the 1930s, in the company of some of the finest jazz musicians of the day.

In pickup bands led by the pianist Teddy Wilson, her songs included “I Wished on the Moon,” “What a Little Moonlight Can Do,” “I Cried for You,” “Summertime,” and “This Year’s Kisses.” With Teddy Wilson and under her own name she also created a series of recordings with Lester Young on tenor saxophone that convey a degree of mutual inspiration epitomizing jazz at its highest level of creativity—“Sun Showers,” “I’ll Get By,” “Me Myself and I,” “A Sailboat in the Moonlight,” “He’s Funny That Way,” “When You’re Smiling,” “Back in Your Own Backyard,” and “All of Me.” These recordings reveal a singer of broad emotional range able to narrow her focus at will, able to seize the pressure points of a song to reshape the music so profoundly that once heard it goes on to enjoy a second life, a life within memory; many of her songs from this period are truly unforgettable.

Although she enjoyed considerable success and admiration for her recording of “Strange Fruit” (1939), which portrayed a southern lynching, few listeners realize how Billie Holiday took the tradition of the previous generation of female blues singers and applied it to the American popular song. By careful use of material, she performed these songs in a way that invoked a blues mood without actually being blues. Bessie Smith and her contemporaries all sang in the first person about sex, infidelity, and broken relationships. Billie Holiday carefully chose sophisticated popular songs with lyrics that dealt with similar issues, often expressing yearning and pain. In effect, she created a character part for herself that evolved directly out of the blues tradition, without being a blues singer per se. The “character” she chose to portray was a woman unlucky in love whose experience of life appeared to be mirrored in the text of her songs. Even when singing in the big bands of Count Basie and Artie Shaw, she refused to perform songs that did not conform to the role she created for herself. Frequently she sang “I” songs, addressed to “you,” but changed the “I” from positive to negative: “I Cover the Waterfront,” “The Man I Love,” “I Can’t Get Started,” “My Old Flame,” “I’ll Get By,” and so on. In the 1940s, she created a series of enduring classics for the Decca label that included “Lover Man,” “Good Morning Heartache,” and “That Old Devil Called Love,” the latter two especially written to frame her great talent to considerable effect. Through the mediation of her “character” with the songs she performed, audiences gradually began to read her real-life history into her performances. In the late 1940s, when she never seemed far from the clamor of the tabloid headlines, she chose songs that interacted with her real-life image, such as “Tain’t Nobody’s Business If I Do.” This song, recorded a year after she was released from prison after being convicted of possessing drugs, triumphantly reinforced her notoriety while defiantly justifying her indulgence of the self.

As her voice deteriorated in the 1950s, it ironically became the source of her authenticity on albums for Norman Granz’s Clef and Verve labels (1952–1957), and in the album Lady in Satin (1958), in which the dues she had paid, the wrong associations she had made, and the collapse of a promising career all seemed to be refracted in the flaws of her latter-day voice. Even today the way her image interacts with her music remains the least understood aspect of her art. But equally, this image of Billie Holiday as an all-purpose victim, part a romantic martyr and part a heroine of excess, has gradually tended to overwhelm her artistry. When in November 1956 she performed a concert in which readings from her autobiography Lady Sings the Blues (ghostwritten by William F. Dufty) alternated with songs that had become associated with her, she was consciously erecting the legend into which she would finally step, closing the doors behind her, when she died in 1959. Yet the essential truth about Billie Holiday is that she was a great artist, not because of her hedonistic and much publicized lifestyle, but despite it.

Billie Holiday. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Billie Holiday (also Eleanora Fagan, Eleanora Gough, Eleanora Monroe, Eleanora McKay, Eleanora Gough McKay, Lady Day) was born on 7 April, 1915, in Philadelphia (although her birthplace has long been given as Baltimore). She was the illegitimate daughter of Sarah Julia “Sadie” Harris and Clarence Holiday, who would later play banjo and then guitar and become a member of the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra (1928–1933). For the first eighteen months of her life, she was raised by Martha Miller in Baltimore. She began her education at Public School 102, the Thomas Hayes Elementary School, at 601 Central Avenue in Baltimore, in 1920. That year her mother married Philip Gough, but by 1923, the marriage was over and the daughter returned to Martha Miller. In 1925, persistent absence from school resulted in her being sent to the House of the Good Shepherd, a juvenile house of correction; after nine months she was paroled to Sadie Gough. On 24 December 1926, Wilbert Rich was arrested for raping her, and she was returned to the House of the Good Shepherd as a witness for the prosecution. (Rich went on trial on 18 January 1926 and was convicted.) She was returned to the custody of her mother on 2 February 1927. Around this time, while employed as a cleaner at a brothel, she discovered jazz through recordings and a wind-up Victrola and was attracted to the singing of Louis Armstrong. In 1928, her mother went to Harlem, leaving her once again in the care of Martha Miller. She had now begun singing in public for tips. Her mother—who was then a prostitute at 151 West 140th Street—sent for her at the end of the year. On the night of 2 May 1929, mother and daughter were arrested for vagrancy, a charge then associated with solicitation. Sadie Gough was discharged, but the daughter was sentenced to 100 days at Blackwell's Island. She was released in October 1929 and moved with her mother to Brooklyn. The mother was now employed as a domestic, and the daughter began singing with the saxophonist Kenneth Hollon in clubs. Around this time she changed her name to Billie Holiday. She worked as a waitress in Mexico's on 133rd Street in Harlem in 1930, singing for tips while serving customers. An audition with Charlie Johnson's band at Small's Paradise ended in failure. Around this time, Holiday began smoking marijuana. She opened at Covan's on West 132nd Street in 1932; the following year she was spotted by the entrepreneur John Hammond. Her other admirers included Paul Muni and Charles Laughton. She sang at Pod's and Jerry's and then at the Hot Cha Restaurant at 2280 Seventh Avenue; next, she worked the "bar and grill" circuit. In November 1933, she made her recording debut with Benny Goodman's pickup unit. In 1934, she began a friendship with Lester Young, then a member of the Fletcher Henderson band. She made her debut at the Apollo Theater on 125th Street on Friday, 23 November 1934; she was then in a relationship with the pianist Bobbie Henderson, with whom she performed. Through John Hammond, she was given a role in Duke Ellington's Symphony in Black (1935). She had stints with the Mills Blue Rhythm Band and Ralph Cooper's band, and while she was working at Clark Monroe's Uptown House, Hammond negotiated a record deal with Brunswick, whereby Holiday was to be vocalist for a series of sessions under the leadership of the pianist Teddy Wilson, beginning 2 July 1935. She worked at the Famous Door on Fifty-second Street in September 1935. Joe Glaser became her manager, and from October 1935 to January 1936, she appeared in the musical Stars Over Broadway, starring Louis Armstrong. She appeared with Eddie Condon in Sunday afternoon jam sessions at the Famous Door in February–March 1936, and briefly with Jimmie Lunceford and Fletcher Henderson. Her records with Wilson led to a contract in her own right in 1936 with Vocalion, although she continued to work with Wilson. She worked with a band led by the trumpeter Louis Metcalfe that included her father and Lester Young in October 1936. She joined Count Basie on 13 March 1937, and had an affair with Basie's guitarist Freddie Green. She left Basie in February 1938. She joined Artie Shaw's orchestra on 9 March 1938, and left on 19 November 1938, having made one record—"Any Old Time"—with the band. She opened at Café Society in Greenwich Village on 22 December 1938, and was an immediate hit with the café crowd. She became associated with a song by Abel Meeropol (who wrote under the name Lewis Allen) called "Strange Fruit." Columbia refused to record it because the lyrics depicted a lynching in the South, but it was put out by Commodore Records and became a minor hit (1939). Holiday had an affair with the pianist Sonny White, then met James Monroe (Jimmy, b. 1911), the brother of Clark Monroe (of Monroe's Uptown House). In April 1940, she opened at Kelly's Stables on Fifty-second Street with a band led by Roy Eldridge, then at Café Society with Art Tatum. She married Jimmy Monroe on 25 August 1941. She played at the Apollo with Lionel Hampton and had a season at the Famous Door with Benny Carter. Her final session for Columbia was on 10 February 1942. She made a theater tour with Benny Carter and orchestra. In May 1942, Jimmy Monroe was arrested on the West Coast for drug smuggling. To pay for his defense, Holiday traveled to Hollywood and opened at Trouville with Lester Young, but Monroe was convicted (receiving a one-year sentence), and lawyers' fees took much of Holiday's money. She recorded with Paul Whiteman on 12 June 1942, "Trav'lin Light." She opened in Chicago in August 1942 with Red Allen. In February 1943, she opened at Kelly's Stables on Fifty-second Street; by now she was becoming known as the "queen of Fifty-second Street." Her marriage to Monroe was effectively over, and he took a job at the Douglas plant on the West Coast. Holiday became a mainstay at the Onyx Club on Fifty-second Street throughout 1943 and 1944. An affair with the bassist John Simmons ended in 1943. At this time, Holiday became a heroin user. She recorded with Commodore records, toured to Chicago, returned to New York, and opened at the Downbeat Club. She signed with Decca records on 7 August 1944. She recorded classics such as "Lover Man" and "That Old Devil Called Love." She had a relationship with the trumpeter Joe Guy, an early swing-into-bebop musician. In January 1945, she appeared in the Second Annual Esquire Magazine Jazz Concert. She toured widely at this time. Her mother, Sadie, died on 6 October 1945—many people say that Holiday never recovered from this blow. She spent most of 1946 at Downbeat. She performed in a concert at Town Hall in February 1946; Downbeat magazine called it "a startling success." In May 1946, she played with Norman Granz's Jazz at the Philharmonic. She appeared in the film New Orleans, but her drug addiction created problems during the filming. She returned to Fifty-second Street. She was made to confront her addiction by her manager, Joe Glaser, and spent a period of rehabilitation in a private nursing home, but she continued to use drugs at the behest of Joe Guy, her boyfriend. Glaser betrayed her to the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, and she was arrested after a week at the Earle Theater in Philadelphia, on 16 May 1947. The prosecution had only flimsy evidence, but Glaser refused her legal representation. Joe Guy, who had legal representation, was freed; Holiday received a sentence of a year and a day on 27 May 1947, and was sent to the Federal Reformatory for Women in Alderston, Virginia. She remained in custody until 16 March 1948, and then gave a concert at Carnegie Hall on 27 March 1948. Because of her prison sentence, she was denied a cabaret card. She played in the revue Holiday on Broadway in April 1948, then at the Ebony Club, where she became involved with the owner, John Levy (not the bass player). Her life was now beginning to collapse around her; without the prestige of playing at New York clubs, her asking price began to drift down. She played on the West Coast at Billy Berg's club. An incident with a knife was reported in the newspapers, and then she was arrested for possession of narcotic drugs. She was acquitted in May 1949 and continued to tour extensively outside New York, but she was dropped by Decca in 1950. That year, she made a film short with Count Basie. Her life was now a daily round of club work and a daily struggle to get drugs. In 1951, she began a relationship with Louis McKay. In 1952, she began recording for Norman Granz's Clef label. In early 1954, she toured Europe with the group Jazz Club USA. In 1955, the West Coast became the center of her activities. She was arrested while playing in Philadelphia on 23 February 1956, for possession of drugs. In the summer of 1956, her ghostwritten autobiography, Lady Sings the Blues, was published, and there was a concert at Carnegie Hall in November to relaunch her career. On 28 March 1957, she married Louis McKay in Chihuahua, Mexico. She continued to record for Norman Granz, creating what many critics claim are latter-day classics, but in 1957 he decided not to renew their contract, because she had become increasingly difficult to work with. An appearance on television in The Sound of Jazz in December 1957 provided an indelible picture of Holiday at work. In 1958, she recorded Lady in Satin for Columbia, but it was clear that the ravages of her lifestyle had caught up with her. In September 1958, she played at the Blackhawk Restaurant in San Francisco; on 5 October, she played at the Monterey Jazz Festival. In November 1958, she made a brief European tour. In February 1959, she flew to London for an appearance on television. Her final album, Billie Holiday (March 1959), was a very sad affair. On 30 May 1959, she collapsed and was admitted to a hospital in New York. Holiday died on 15 July 1959. A requiem mass was held at Saint Paul's Roman Catholic Church on Columbus Circle on 22 July 1959.

STUART NICHOLSON

See also Armstrong, Louis; Blues: Women Performers; Ellington, Duke; Henderson, Fletcher Jazz; Nightclubs; Nightlife; Singers

Further Reading

- Blesh, Rudi. Combo USA: Eight Lives in Jazz. Philadelphia, Pa., 1971.
- Dance, Stanley. The World of Swing. New York, 1974.
- Friedwald, Will. Jazz Singing. New York, 1990, p. 126.
- Giddins, Gary. Faces in the Crowd. New York, 1992, p. 65.
- Hodier, Andre. Toward Jazz. New York, 1962, p. 191.
- Holiday, Billie, and William F. Dufty. Lady Sings the Blues. New York, 1956.
- James, Burnett. "Billie Holiday and the Art of Communication." Jazz Monthly, 5, June 1959, p. 9.
- . Essays on Jazz. London, 1961, p. 45.
- Jones, Max. "The Trouble with Billie." Wire (7), 1984.
- . Talking Jazz. London, 1987, p. 244.
- Kuehl, Linda, and E. Schokert. Billie Holiday Remembered. New York, 1973.
- Lyttelton, Humphrey. The Best of Jazz 2. London, 1981, p. 196.
- Nicholson, Stuart. Billie Holiday. London, 1994.
- O'Meally, Robert. Lady Day: The Many Faces of Billie Holiday. New York, 1991.
- Pleasants, Henry. The Great American Popular Singers. London, 1974, p. 157.
- Widgery, D. "The Woman Who Moved the World." Wire (7), 1984, p. 2.
- Williams, Martin. The Jazz Tradition. New York, 1962, p. 191.
- . "Billie Holiday: Actress without an Act." Jazz Journal, 21, October 1968, p. 22.

Holstein, Casper

Casper Holstein—a staid, abstemious businessman and investor—owned the elite Turf Club in Harlem (at 111 West 136th Street), apartment buildings, a stable of horses in Canada, a farm in Virginia, and a house on Long Island. He was also involved in “the numbers,” or policy, a form of gambling that was popular in Harlem. An individual could place a bet with a local numbers runner, for as little as ten cents, on a combination of three numbers (e.g., 709); the runners were employed, and the winners were paid by a “bank” or “banker.” Holstein was one of the “big six” policy bankers in Harlem during the 1920s and was known for his reliability in paying bettors who had “hit” the winning number. According to Redding (1934) and Hansen (1996), tradition credits Holstein with the idea of getting the three winning digits from the daily Clearinghouse totals of the New York Stock Exchange; this method assured bettors that the winning number would not be fixed.

Holstein came to the attention of the American public when he was kidnapped by white gangsters in September 1928 and held for ransom ($50,000). The public also became aware that the numbers game, which white gangsters had derisively dismissed as “nigger pennies,” was actually a gold mine and that some black policy bankers were rich. Later, when Prohibition was repealed (1933) and their bootlegging operations ceased, white gangsters such as Dutch Schultz took control of numbers gambling in Harlem. Judge Samuel Seabury’s commission exposed corruption in the numbers (including bribery or fixes for numbers operators), and numbers bankers were investigated for tax evasion. Holstein left the numbers when he saw circumstances turning against it; however, as late as 1937, he was convicted of operating a numbers game.

Holstein became a patron of the Harlem Renaissance by donating $1,000 for cash prizes for the second literary contest held by Opportunity (1925–1926) and another $1,000 for the third contest (1926–1927). In his honor, the prizes were called the Casper Holstein Awards. The Holstein awards were given for essays, plays, poetry, personal narrative sketches, art, and musical composition. Holstein’s financial support enabled the managers of the contests to seek out more talented applicants and to give more prizes. Charles S. Johnson, the editor of Opportunity, wanted to introduce the creative works of African Americans to the American public and to get publishers interested in them. He also wanted talented African Americans to be able to express Negro life in their own terms, and he hoped to use black culture to promote interracial understanding. Contest applicants (who did not have to be American citizens) were expected to focus on subjects relating directly or indirectly to Negro life.

Holstein served as an “angel”—that is, a financial backer—for Johnson and for the Harlem Renaissance at a critical moment, when the movement was just getting off the ground. As a “race man,” Holstein had faith in the abilities of the Negro, and he demonstrated this faith by using his money to support the uncovering of creative talent. In this regard, he and Charles Johnson were in accord. Holstein favored Johnson’s goals, as he noted in a letter that Johnson read at the awards dinner for the first contest and published in Opportunity in 1927: “I honestly think [the contest] will go far towards consolidating the interests of, and bridging the gap between the white and black races in the United States today, and particularly will it encourage among our gifted youth the ambition to scale the empyrean heights of art and literature.”

Holstein’s philanthropy took other forms as well. He was unstinting in giving funds for the education, at colleges and technical schools, of young people from the Virgin Islands and the United States. He also donated money to historically black colleges in the United States. He sent money, clothes, and food to people in the Virgin Islands and set up a relief fund of $100,000 when the islands were devastated by hurricanes in 1924; he also sent lumber and workmen to help the islanders rebuild. After the U.S. government bought the islands in 1917, Holstein used his position as president of the Virgin Islands Congressional Council and his personal wealth to get the United States to redress certain social and political ills there.

Despite his successes, Holstein made some enemies in political circles. Law enforcement officials watched him constantly, and he was arrested in 1937 for operating a small-time numbers game. He was convicted, received an indeterminate sentence, and remained in prison for about a year.

Holstein died penniless in 1944, in New York City. Thousands attended his funeral at the Memorial Baptist Church in Harlem, and he was buried at Woodlawn Cemetery in the Bronx, New York. The University of the Virgin Islands established a scholarship in his honor, and a library collection, with books by and about black people, was named after him. An annual celebration commemorating his philanthropy and his achievements was decreed in the islands.

Holstein and Charles Johnson have been called midwives of the Harlem Renaissance. Johnson said of Holstein: “There is a faith and service deserving of more than casual appearance. A Negro who is by no means a millionaire has faith enough in the future of his own developing race to give of his means to support it.”

Casper Holstein, 1926. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Biography

Casper Holstein was born on 6 December 1876, in Christiansted, St. Croix, Virgin Islands. At age twelve he came to the United States with his mother. He graduated from Boys High School in Brooklyn, New York, served in the U.S. Navy, and then worked for a prominent stockbroking family, the Christies (or Chrysties). He became engaged in business, real estate, and investing, and in “the numbers” as a “banker.” He was kidnapped in 1928 and held for ransom. Later, when conditions became unfavorable, he left the numbers racket. In 1925–1927, he donated money for prizes in Opportunity's literary contests. In 1937, he was arrested, convicted, and jailed for operating a small-time numbers game. Holstein died penniless in New York City on 5 April 1944.

MARVIE BROOKS

See also Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Numbers Racket; Opportunity Awards Dinner; Opportunity Literary Contests; Organized Crime; Race Men

Further Reading

- Boyer, William W. America's Virgin Islands: A History of Human Rights and Wrongs. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic, 1963.
- “Casper Holstein Dies a Pauper.” New York Amsterdam News, 15 April 1944, p. 2-A.
- “Casper Holstein Dies After Long Illness; Several Thousand Present at Last Rites.” New York Age, 15 April 1944, pp. 1, 5.
- Drake, St. Clair, and Horace R. Cayton. “Business Under a Cloud.” In Black Metropolis: A Study of Negro Life in a Northern City, rev. enlarged ed. New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1970, Vol. 2, pp. 470–491.
- “Former Policy King in Harlem Dies Broke.” New York Times, 9 April 1944, p. 34.
- Gill, Jonathan. “Numbers Game.” In Encyclopedia of African-American Culture and History, ed. Jack Saltzman, David Lionel Smith, and Cornel West. New York: Simon and Schuster Macmillan, 1996, Vol. 4, pp. 2032–2034.
- Haller, Mark H. “The Changing Structure of American Gambling in the Twentieth Century.” Journal of Social Issues, 35(3), Summer 1979, pp. 87–114.
- Hammer, Richard. The Illustrated History of Organized Crime. Philadelphia, Pa.: Courage, 1989.
- Hansen, Axel C. From These Shores. Nashville, Tenn.: Hansen and Francois, 1996.
- Fleming, G. James. “Law Regards Holstein as Menace While Throngs Recall Good Deeds.” New York Amsterdam News, 15 February 1936, pp. 1, 3.
- Holmes, Eugene C. “Alain Locke and the New Negro Movement.” Negro American Literature Forum, 2(3), 1968, pp. 60–68.
- “Holstein Faces Term in Prison.” New York Amsterdam News, 8 February 1936, p. 1.
- “Holstein Seized in a Policy Raid.” New York Times, 24 December 1935, p. 3.
- Kelly, Robert J. “Casper Holstein.” In Encyclopedia of Organized Crime in the United States: From Capone's Chicago to the New Urban Underworld. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000, pp. 157–158.
- Lawrence, Carl Dunbar. “Casper Holstein Dies at Sixty-Seven; Colorful Harlem Sportsman.” New York Amsterdam News, 15 April 1944, pp. 1–2A.
- Light, Ivan. “Numbers Gambling Among Blacks: A Financial Institution.” American Sociological Review, 42, December 1977, pp. 892–904.
- Moolenaar, Ruth. Profiles of Outstanding Virgin Islanders, Vol. 2. U.S. Virgin Islands: Department of Education, 1992.

"Mystery Surrounds the Kidnapping and Return of Holstein." New York Amsterdam News, 26 September 1928, pp. 1–2.

Opportunity: A Journal of Negro Life. 1925–1927. (See editorials about the literary contests; accounts of the awards dinner; articles by Holstein.)

"Prison Term for Holstein." New York Amsterdam News, 15 February 1936, p. 3.

Redding, Saunders J. "Playing the Numbers." North American Review, December 1934, pp. 238, 533–542.

"Rudolph Brown Tells His Story." New York Amsterdam News, 3 October 1928, pp. 1–2.

Schatzberg, Rufus. Black Organized Crime in Harlem, 1920–1930. New York: Garland, 1993.

———. African-American Organized Crime: A Social History. New York: Garland, 1996.

Turnbull, Charles W., and Christian J. Lewis. Casper A. Holstein: Unusual Humanitarian. St. Thomas: Virgin Islands Department of Education, 1974.

Willensky, Elliot. When Brooklyn Was the World, 1920–1957. New York: Harmony, 1986.

Holt, Nora

Nora Holt was one of the most fascinating personalities of the Harlem Renaissance, as well known for her musical abilities as she was for her vibrant, adventurous personal life. She was a good friend of Carl Van Vechten and other luminaries of the period.

Nora Lena Douglas was born in Kansas. The exact year of her birth is unknown; it was either 1895 or 1890. Her parents encouraged her musical talent, and she studied at Chicago Music College, becoming one of the first African Americans to receive a master's degree in music. In January 1921, she began editing her own periodical, Music and Poetry, a "monthly music magazine of high standard" that also offered her an opportunity to publish her own compositions and spotlight new artists. Holt cofounded the National Association of Negro Musicians, an association that is still active as of the present writing. She was the music critic for several African American newspapers and was one of the earliest African American women to produce her own radio show.

Holt was intelligent, witty, and fashionable, and her personal life attracted the public eye. She married at least five times, and she was known for her rendition of the sexually suggestive song "My Daddy Rocks Me (With One Steady Roll)." Van Vechten used

Holt as a model for the character Lasca Sartoris in his controversial novel Nigger Heaven (1926). This novel offers one of the best descriptions of Holt:

The nose was delicate, the mouth provocative and sensual. Pear-shaped pearls depended from the lobes of the tiny ears. The black, wavy hair was combed severely back from the forehead, above the ears, and shingled. The lady was dressed in the smartest mode of the moment; moreover, . . . she wore her clothes with that manner which is rare with women of any race or colour. (79–80)

On 29 July 1923, Holt married the wealthy Joseph L. Ray, a secretary and attendant to Charles Schwab, head of Bethlehem Steel Corporation in Pennsylvania. Three years later their divorce made the headlines of several black newspapers. Ray charged his wife with infidelity, but according to Holt, Ray disliked being known as "Mr. Holt" and wanted to retrieve the money and real estate he had given her on their marriage (Dannett 1966). Holt demonstrated her poise in her public response to the charges, reprinted on the front page of the Chicago Defender in 1926:

Nora Holt, photographed by Carl Van Vechten. (Library of Congress.)

I have never, to any person or newspaper, made a statement against Mr. Ray and there is plenty I could and may have to say, but I maintain that only crude and uncultured people fight out their domestic differences in public. In the divorce court, yes; in newspapers, never.

Nora Holt was the embodiment of contradictions, and as other commentators have noted, her life resists easy summarization. Gracious and assertive, artistic and attractive, she exhibited many of the feminist qualities associated with other women of this period, yet she has not been as frequently studied.

Biography

Nora Holt (Nora Lena Douglas) was born 1895 (or 1890) in Kansas City, Kansas, to Rev. Calvin N. Douglas, an African Methodist Episcopal minister, and Gracie Brown Douglas. She studied at Western University in Quindaro, Kansas (1915), and at Chicago Music College (B.A., 1917; master's, 1918). She was married five or more times. Holt was a music critic for the Chicago Defender (1917–1921) and for the Amsterdam News (1943–1956). She cofounded, with Nathaniel Dett and Clarence White, the National Association of Negro Musicians (1919) and was its vice president (1919–1922). She was editor and publisher of Music and Poetry (1921); a music teacher in public high schools in Los Angeles, California (1937–1943); owner or operator of a beauty parlor in Los Angeles (1940s); and producer of Nora Holt's Concert Showcase, a weekly classical radio program on WLIB, New York (1953–1964). Holt was a member of the New York Music Critics Circle (1945). She died in Los Angeles on 25 January 1974.

MIRIAM THAGGERT

See also National Association of Negro Musicians; Nigger Heaven; Van Vechten, Carl; White, Clarence Cameron

Selected Works

"Rhapsody on Negro Themes." Master's thesis (symphonic), Chicago Music College, 1918.
Music and Poetry. January–October 1921.

Further Reading

- Dannett, Sylvia G. L. Profiles of Negro Womanhood. Yonkers, N.Y.: Educational Heritage, Vol. 1, 1964; Vol. 2, 1966.
- Johns, Robert L. "Nora Holt." In Notable Black American Women, ed. Jessie Carney Smith. Detroit, Mich., and London: Gale Research, 1992.
- Kellner, Bruce. Carl Van Vechten and the Irreverent Decades. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1968.
- , ed. Keep A-Inchin' Along: Selected Writings of Carl Van Vechten about Black Art and Letters. Westport, Conn., and London: Greenwood, 1979.
- . Letters of Carl Van Vechten. New Haven, Conn., and London: Yale University Press, 1987.
- "Mrs. Nora Holt Ray's Silence Ends." Chicago Defender, 6 February 1926, p. 1.
- Reed, Bill. Hot from Harlem: Profiles in Classic African-American Entertainment. Los Angeles, Calif.: Cellar Door, 1998.
- Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. New York: Knopf, 1926.

Home to Harlem

Claude McKay's novel Home to Harlem (1928)—his first venture into fiction—was a best-seller when it was released. However, it received a mixed reaction from the black community. Langston Hughes praised it as the first fruit of the Harlem Renaissance, basing his evaluation on McKay's willingness to represent urban working-class black life. W. E. B. Du Bois, by contrast, found the book disgusting and said that he felt in need of a bath after reading it. He associated its focus on sex and sensuality with a controversial novel by Carl Van Vechten, Nigger Heaven (1926); moreover, he thought that both novels perpetuated stereotypical images of blacks.

Home to Harlem opens with its protagonist, Jake Brown, abandoning a tour of military duty in Brest, working his way to London on a ship, and then deciding to go back to Harlem after a two-year absence. He returns to Harlem and spends the night with a part-time prostitute, Felice, who returns his money in the morning with a note. Ostensibly, Jake spends the rest of the novel searching for Felice, having forgotten her address, but his journeys in Harlem and the Northeast provide occasions for reflecting on black urban life. The scenes of the novel take place in cabarets, saloons, and boardinghouses, and among dock and train workers. Jake tries to maintain a sense of honor and nobility as he encounters employers who try to exploit him and women who want to take care of him. Memorable characters include Zeddy, Rose, Miss Curdy, Susy, Billy Biasse, and Ray. Zeddy is an old friend of Jake's but becomes his enemy at the end of the novel because Felice—who was Zeddy's girlfriend—prefers Jake. Zeddy threatens to reveal that Jake is absent without leave from the army, so Jake and Felice leave for Chicago. Rose is a bisexual singer who wants to take care of Jake and wants him to beat her as a sign of his masculinity. Jake escapes from Rose; this escape is similar to a later escape by Zeddy from Miss Curdy and Susy, who live in Brooklyn and give parties with free alcohol in the hope of finding sexual partners. Billy Biasse owns a saloon where Jake keeps his suitcase for two years and is part of the male company to which Jake constantly retreats.

In Home to Harlem, Ray vies with Jake for importance. The second section opens by introducing Ray and closes with his departure from the United States and from this story, although Ray became the protagonist of McKay's second novel, Banjo. Traditionally, Ray's intellectuality has been understood as the opposite of Jake's physicality, but more recently Ray and Jake have been seen as complementary, learning from each other and growing through their relationship. Ray, a Haitian immigrant to the United States, raises questions about the United States as a colonial power and about images of Africa in the Western imagination. At the same time that he brings a critical perspective to bear on racial and colonial relationships, he also envies the physical and sensual aspects of Jake's life and the lives of most people. Ray sees working-class people as animal-like in their simplicity, working and loving without caring about the hows and whys of the world. Many critics interpret Ray as a fictional projection of McKay's own sensibility and philosophy. Ray's thoughts about the world occasionally interrupt the development of the novel for several pages at a time; that is, McKay sacrifices the plot for reflections and ideas that are not integral to it. Although Ray envies working-class people, his attitude toward them and the black middle class moves between stereotypes, challenges to stereotypes, and seeming disdain. The ambiguity of McKay's language and especially his doubtful use of irony have made it difficult, despite numerous attempts, to settle Hughes's and Du Bois's debate over whether the novel is pathbreaking or tawdry.

The complexities of Home to Harlem have led to analyses of widely varied elements such as its homoerotic subtext, its cosmopolitanism, its primitivism, its critical use of racist vocabulary, and even its punctuation. Throughout Home to Harlem, McKay uses devices such as ellipses and exclamation marks, and critics have tried to relate them to meaning in this novel. Ramchand (1970) takes these punctuation devices as reflective of jazz and argues that McKay intended them to create rhythm and texture but did not always succeed; but Spencer (1998) argues that many of the ellipses in Home to Harlem appear at points where McKay is implying unspeakable homoeroticism. Ramchand initiated a discussion of cultural dualism that other critics, such as Chauhan (1990) and Nelson (1992), have built on. These critics call attention to McKay's heritage as a Jamaican educated under an English system, who then migrated to the United States; to England; back to the United States; to Russia, France, Spain, and Morocco; and then again to the United States (where he died). Huggins (1971) argues that Home to Harlem (unlike Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven) represents an insider's view of black life and enmeshes the reader in the confusion and struggles of the characters. Priebe (1972) argues that rather than being a happy-go-lucky character, Jake is alienated, and that his alienation accounts for his continual wanderings. Some critics have offered discussions about primitivism and masculinity in the 1930s. Lively (1984) argues that McKay uses primitivism as a form of protest against racial and colonial oppression. McCabe's study (1997) is part of a fairly widespread effort to reevaluate the importance of primitivism in the development of modernism and its aesthetics. Hathaway (1999) suggests that McKay should be understood as someone who resisted categories of race, class, nationality, and political affiliation. In general, the criticism has become more varied as manhood becomes less important and issues of sexuality, gender, interracial relationships, and colonialism become more important.

KIMBERLY J. BANKS

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Hughes, Langston; McKay, Claude; Nigger Heaven

Further Reading

- Carby, Hazel. "Policing the Black Woman's Body in an Urban Context." In Identities, ed. Kwame Anthony Appiah and Henry Louis Gates Jr. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1995. (First published 1992.)
- Chauhan, P. S. "Rereading Claude McKay." CLA Journal, 34(1), 1990, pp. 68–80.

- Hathaway, Heather. Caribbean Waves: Relocating Claude McKay and Paule Marshall. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1999.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Lively, Adam. "Continuity and Radicalism in American Black Nationalist Thought, 1914–1929." Journal of American Studies, 18, 1984, pp. 207–235.
- McCabe, Tracy. "The Multifaceted Politics of Primitivism in Harlem Renaissance Writing." Soundings, 80, 1997, pp. 475–497.
- Nelson, Emmanuel S. "Community and Individual Identity in the Novels of Claude McKay." In Claude McKay: Centennial Studies, ed. A. L. McLeod. New Delhi: Sterling, 1992.
- Priebe, Richard. "The Search for Community in the Novels of Claude McKay." Studies in Black Literature, 3(2), 1972, pp. 22–30.
- Ramchand, Kenneth. The West Indian Novel and Its Background. New York: Barnes and Noble, 1970.
- Spencer, Suzette A. "Swerving at a Different Angle and Flying in the Face of Tradition: Excavating the Homoerotic Subtext in 'Home to Harlem.'" CLA Journal, 42, 1998, pp. 164–193.
- Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. New York: Harper and Row, 1971. (Originally published 1926.)

Homosexuality

Many scholars regard Richard Bruce Nugent's short story "Smoke, Lilies, and Jade" (1926)—about a vagabond artist named Alex who beds a Latino man late one night after a literary salon—as the first extant publication by an African American to "openly depict" homosexuality, even though Alex is technically bisexual. They assert that Nugent is one of the few beacons of what the gay black poet Essex Hemphill calls "evidence of being," proof of black gay men's experiences; or what Garber describes as "a homosexual subculture, uniquely Afro-American in substance, [found] throughout the so-called Harlem Renaissance" (1989, 318). Woods says that "Nugent was the exception," cautioning: "When reading the writers of the Negro Renaissance we should not expect, nor be disappointed by the lack of, the kind of openness we now reasonably demand of gay writers" (1993, 139). Nugent, however, never understood "what the fuss was about. Even today some ask him: 'How could you write anything gay in 1926?' His reply is "I didn't know it was gay when I wrote it'" (Smith 1986, 214). Nugent "wore his bohemianism and homosexuality like a badge of honor"; he felt that "everybody he met was 'in the life,' especially if he found them physically attractive. He [had] the belief that 'if you can't take me the way I am, it's your problem. It's certainly not mine'" (Smith, 209). Nugent's attitude was by no means singular; it reflects the attitude of many black men and women "in the life." One of these, Nugent reveals, was the "truly named" Philander Thomas, a fellow actor Nugent met in 1927 during the Broadway production of Porgy. Thomas embodied the free attitude toward sexuality, including homosexuality, that characterized Harlem's nightlife. Thomas's talent was finding "bed-mates": "People who came to Harlem did so to vent their pleasures. Everybody thought that they could and Philander saw to it that they did. . . . He was much more outgoing than I. I liked his random freedom" (Smith, 216). The "random freedom" of philandering Thomas and Nugent are but two contributions made to bohemian Harlem's language and network of institutions sustaining its community "in the life."

The relative freedom of Harlem's bohemians can be overlooked by those reading for contemporary gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered communities. During the Harlem Renaissance, black men and women did not always use the word "gay," "lesbian," or "homosexual" to reflect what is now a distinct identity. Sexuality, Nugent assures us, was just one part of black peoples' lives:

Harlem was very much like [Greenwich] Village. People did what they wanted to do with whom they wanted to do it. You didn't get on the rooftops and shout, "I fucked my wife last night." So why would you get on the roof and say, "I loved prick." You didn't. You just did what you wanted to do. Nobody was in the closet. There wasn't any closet. (Kisseloff 1989, 288)

Regardless of the degree to which black men and women publicly proclaimed their sexuality, the laissez-faire attitude Nugent identifies can be found in how Harlem's own did express bohemian experiences through black vernacular. Although words naming homosexuality had been used since 1862, different ones were needed to reflect black men and women "in the life." As Jeanne Flash Gray, who lived in Harlem in the 1930s, remembers, "There were many places in Harlem run by and for Black Lesbians and Gay Men, when we were still Bull Daggers and Faggots and only whites were lesbians and homosexuals" (Garber, 331). Numerous blues songs revel in this black bohemian vernacular: They include Lucille Bogan's "B. D. Women Blues," in which she warns "B. D. women sure is rough / They drink up many a whiskey and they sure can strut their stuff"; Gertrude "Ma" Rainey's "Sissy Blues" and "Prove It on Me Blues"; and George Hanna's "Freakish Blues" and "Sissy Man Blues," in which he confides, "If you can't bring me a woman, bring me a sissy man." Writers, in turn, used blues as a kind of homosexual shorthand. For example, Claude McKay first refers to homosexuality in Home to Harlem (1928) with Bessie Smith's "Foolish Man Blues": "And there is two things in Harlem I don't understand / It is a bulldyking woman and a faggoty man." Another word used by Harlem's writers is "queer," applied since the 1910s by cosmopolitan male New Yorkers "who identified themselves as part of a distinct category [based on] their homosexual interest" (Chauncey 1994, 15). The writers McKay, Eric Walrond, Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, and Jean Toomer—as well as others—used "queer" because it could also mean "different" or "odd." Such double meanings define black vernacular, which historically has been contextual rather than direct, in order to conceal meaning from potentially hostile outsiders. Harlem's bohemians, Chauncey maintains, crafted their vernacular for protection as well: "The visibility of bulldaggers and faggots in the streets and clubs of Harlem during the late 1920s and early 1930s does not mean they enjoyed unqualified toleration throughout Harlem society" (253).

How Harlem society tolerated bohemian culture fluctuated. Harsh reactions to Nugent's story, to other queer literature, and to bawdy blues songs were simply a public defense, reflecting Nugent's admonition against proclaiming "I love prick" on the rooftops. Sometimes these defenses came from people who were participating in the bohemian culture they presumably condemned. For example, Alain Locke, who is often called the intellectual godfather of the Harlem Renaissance, argued strongly that any black literature highlighting sexuality would only confirm racist, reductionist ideas of blacks as promiscuous. Locke wrote negative reviews of work by McKay and of Fire!!: Devoted to Younger Negro Artists (1926), the publication in which Nugent's story first appeared. Still, Locke was known in some circles for taking more than a literary interest in Langston Hughes, and he contributed to Harlem's bohemian network like any other "in the life." His written reprimands are not necessarily hypocritical, though. Locke felt that black art which reached a reading or viewing public should not air private affairs. Moreover, such art should not revel in "sexual taboos" that whites publicly damned. The black artists should forgo references to black bodies (as sexual, or as violent) so that black art could be aesthetically appreciated just like white art, away from racism. According to Locke, social appreciation of black people would follow from aesthetic appreciation of black art. Because of this focus on the social potential of art, Locke, W. E. B. Du Bois, and others confined themselves mainly to aesthetics in their public criticism of art, never trespassing on an individual's private life. In a review, Du Bois wrote that he needed to take a bath after reading Home to Harlem, but he "spent heavy days regretting" firing Augustus Granville Dill, a close associate and business manager of Du Bois's magazine The Crisis, after Dill was arrested for having sex with a man in a public rest room (Silberman 2001, 258). In the editorial column of The Crisis, Du Bois briefly mentioned Dill's departure but without explaining the reason for it. A similar silence followed Wallace Thurman's arrest for the same "offense"; Ma Rainey's arrest for running an "indecent party" at her home, an orgy involving the women in her chorus; and the dissolution of the poet Countee Cullen's marriage to Du Bois's daughter, Yolande. Publicly, she made sure that "the Harlem press reported Cullen was infatuated with another woman, but she confided to her father that Cullen's homosexuality was the problem" (Chauncey, 265).

Not a problem was Harlem's bohemian nightlife. Notwithstanding the minister Adam Clayton Powell's "scathing and bitter denunciation of perversion" and other reproaches published in New York Age, Harlem's evening bohemians were well known and celebrated. One of the most visible was Gladys Bentley, "'huge, voluptuous [and] chocolate colored,' according to one fan" (Chauncey, 252). Bentley was as famous for her notorious shows at Hansberry's Clam House on 133rd Street, in which she performed in a white tuxedo and top hat, as she was for her girlfriends; she ad-libbed popular ballads, turning the Broadway tunes "Sweet Georgia Brown" and "Alice Blue Gown" into odes for anal sex. She inspired the writer Blair Niles to create Sybil, an openly lesbian singer, in Strange Brother (1931). Also famous was the drag queen Gloria Swanson (originally named Winston), who was "so perfect a woman [people] came and left never suspecting his true sex" (Chauncey, 251). As Dr. Herman Warner remembered:

Gladys and Gloria were extremely popular. Gloria Swanson used to sing a song called "Hot Nuts." . . . As soon as you would enter [the club], he would make you sing the song: "Hot nuts, tell it to the peanut man. You see that man walking there in green? He has good nuts but he won't keep 'em clean. (Kisseloff, 323)

Such participation was not limited to those in one of Harlem's many bohemian institutions, like 267 House on 136th Street, Edmond's Cellar on 132nd Street and Fifth Avenue, or Lulu Belle's on Lenox Avenue near 127th Street. As Howard "Stretch" Johnson, a dancer at the Cotton Club, recalled, bohemian culture spread farther:

There was another place, where they had a chorus of all homosexuals, who used to come out and dance in drag. That was the 101 Ranch [on 140th Street], which is where they invented a dance called the Shim-Sham Shimmy, which became a kind of a national anthem for dancers. Practically every dancer in Harlem could do the Shim-Sham Shimmy. (Kisselhoff, 323)

The 101 Ranch—or the Daisy Chain, as it was also called—became so well known that both Fats Waller and Count Basie commemorated it in songs. Harlem's bohemian culture became so popular that many black performers "in the life" such as Bessie Smith, Alberta Hunter, Josephine Baker, Ethel Waters, and the comedienne Jackie "Moms" Mabley, who regularly wore men's clothes, flirted with bisexual imagery in their work.

However, it was at private parties that "flirting" became more forthright. As the dancer Mabel Hampton explained, "We used to go to parties every other night. . . . The girls all had the parties" (Garber, 321). The hostess of one of these parties on 137th Street described it as a "freakish party, everybody in here is supposed to be a bull dagger or a c—" (Chauncey, 280). Parties thrown by A'Lelia Walker, Clinton Moore, and others were as notorious and as well attended. Moore's parties were said to have attracted Cole Porter and Cary Grant, and boasted sexual entertainment. Another famous gathering place was Alexander Gumbly's studio on Fifth Avenue between 131st and 132nd streets, known as Gumbly's "bookstore" or "book studio" for the many books lining its walls. A white author, Samuel Steward, recalled "being taken to Gumbly's one evening by a lesbian friend and enjoying a delightful evening of 'reefer,' bathtub gin, a game of truth, and homosexual exploits" (Garber, 322).

In Harlem, bohemian parties were one setting for interracial mixing, and the white gay writer and patron Carl Van Vechten—whose articles in Vanity Fair are often credited with introducing the Harlem Renaissance to the white public—became Harlem's interracial ambassador. Like Locke, Van Vechten had more than a literary interest in many black writers he helped publish. Van Vechten's parties were legendary, and his photographs document many of Harlem's bohemians. According to Garber, interaction between whites and blacks "in the life" at Van Vechten's parties and elsewhere came from an "identification and feeling of kinship [which] may have been the beginnings of homosexual 'minority consciousness'" (329).

Another interracial meeting place was Harlem's most public bohemian institution, the Hamilton Lodge drag ball held at Rockland Palace Casino on Eighth Avenue and 155th Street, "the largest annual gathering of lesbians and gay men in Harlem—and the city" (Chauncey, 257). It soon became known as the "Faggots' Ball," and its complex spectacle and public presence provoked negative reactions in the press, which nonetheless praised the queens' beautiful and sometimes astonishing outfits. Even writers celebrating it, like Langston Hughes in The Big Sea (1940), are careful to position themselves as observers of, not like, the "faggots." Its interracial character led some writers to blame blacks' homosexuality on infiltration by "the discarded froth of Caucasian society" (Chauncey, 260). But the race of the ball's winning queen reflected racial divisions despite any "minority consciousness." The Amsterdam News noted that "considerable rivalry exists between the ofay chicks and the Mose broods"; and Bonnie Clark, the first black contestant to win (in 1931 and again in 1932), complained that the ball was "arranged for the white girls to win. They never had no Negro judges" (Chauncey, 263). Nonetheless, the social networks reflected in the Faggots' Ball and other Harlem institutions were a sometimes ignored but hardly hidden aspect of being "in the life."

SETH CLARK SILBERMAN

See also Baker, Josephine; Black Bohemia; Cullen, Coulee; Fire!!; Gumbly Book Studio; Hughes, Langston; Hunter, Alberta; Locke, Alain; Mabley, Jackie "Moms"; McKay, Claude; New York Age; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Rainey, Gertrude "Ma"; Smith, Bessie; Thurman, Wallace; Van Vechten, Carl; Walker, A'Lelia; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Chauncey, George. Gay New York: Gender, Urban Culture, and the Making of the Gay Male World, 1890–1940. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
- Garber, Eric. "A Spectacle in Color: The Lesbian and Gay Subculture of Jazz Age Harlem." In Hidden From History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, ed. Martin Bauml Duberman, Martha Vicinus, and George Chauncey Jr. New York: New American Library, 1989, pp. 318–331.
- Kisseloff, Jeff. You Must Remember This: An Oral History of Manhattan From the 1890s to World War II. New York: Schocken, 1989.
- Silberman, Seth Clark. "Lighting the Harlem Renaissance A Fire!!: Embodying Richard Bruce Nugent's Bohemian Politic." In The Greatest Taboo: Homosexuality in Black Communities, ed. Delroy Constantine-Simms. Los Angeles, Calif.: Alyson, 2001, pp. 254–273.
- Smith, Charles Michael. "Bruce Nugent: Bohemian of the Harlem Renaissance." In In the Life: A Black Gay Anthology, ed. Joseph Beam. Boston, Mass.: Alyson, 1986, pp. 209–220.
- Woods, Gregory. "Gay Re-Readings of the Harlem Renaissance Poets." In Critical Essays: Gay and Lesbian Writers of Color, ed. Emmanuel S. Nelson. New York, London, and Norwood, Australia: Harrington Park, 1993, pp. 127–142.

Horne, Frank

Frank Smith Horne (1899–1974) was an optometrist, a public administrator, and an important minor poet of the Harlem Renaissance. He is best known for "Letters Found Near a Suicide," a set of short poems that he worked on throughout the 1920s; it won second prize in 1925 in the Amy Spingarn contest of The Crisis magazine. Although Horne was influenced by the racial consciousness of his contemporaries, much of his work focuses on more general themes—in particular, the fear that God might be absent from the modern world and the difficulty of maintaining faith.

Horne was born and grew up in Brooklyn. He received a bachelor's degree from City College in 1921, and he was made a doctor of optometry by the Northern Illinois College of Optometry. He practiced in New York and Chicago until 1926, when he was stricken by a severe illness. The exact nature of the condition is not clear, but Horne called it his "mean illness," and many of his later poems speak of having difficulty walking and having restricted use of one arm. On medical advice, Horne moved to Georgia, where he taught at the Fort Valley Normal and Industrial School from 1926 to 1936. He was very successful, coaching the track team and advancing from teacher to acting president.

Early in his life, Horne was interested in writing, but he did not begin to publish until he was urged to do so by Gwendolyn Bennett and Charles S. Johnson. Throughout the late 1920s, Horne appeared frequently in Opportunity, reviewing books and providing anecdotes for Bennett's column "The Ebony Flute." "Letters Found Near a Suicide" was first published in Opportunity in 1925, and then added to in 1929. Parts of it also appeared in Caroling Dusk (1927), Countee Cullen's anthology of poetry by black Americans. "Letters Found Near a Suicide" is written in a sparse, stripped-down style, but in "Harlem" (1928), Horne also experimented with the jazz style then in vogue among young poets. In 1932 he won honorable mention in Opportunity's literary contest for his essay "Concerning White People."

In 1936, Horne went to work for the U.S. Housing Authority in Washington. There he was a participant in President Franklin Roosevelt's "black cabinet," an advisory group led by Mary McLeod Bethune. In 1938, he returned to New York, where he worked for the City Commission on Inter-Group Relations and for the Housing Redevelopment Board.

Horne had no book published until his Haverstraw was issued by an Englishman named Paul Bremen in 1963. That volume has additions to "Notes Found Near a Suicide" but dates these changes back to the 1920s. The new section in Haverstraw is largely autobiographical, ending with a poem addressing God as uncaring, and showing much concern for the pain and difficulty of living with a disability. Haverstraw was kept to an extremely small printing of 300 numbered copies and so seems to have been meant for an elect few rather than as a serious attempt to establish a reputation for Horne. By the time of his death in 1974, Horne had once again returned to writing and had published additional poems in The Crisis in 1965, 1966, and 1970.

Biography

Frank Smith Horne was born in Brooklyn, New York, on 18 August 1899. He attended the College of the City of New York (B.S., 1921); Northern Illinois College of Optometry (earning a degree in 1922 or 1923); and the University of Southern California (A.M., c. 1932). He practiced optometry in Chicago and then New York City (1922–1926). He was at Fort Valley High and Industrial School from 1926 to 1936, beginning as a teacher and ending as dean and acting president. From 1938 to 1955, he served in various administrative capacities for agencies of the U.S. Housing Authority in Washington, D.C., and then New York. He was on the New York City Commission on Inter-Group Relations (executive director from c. 1956–1962) and the New York City Housing Redevelopment Board (consultant, c. 1962–1974). He was a member and board member of the American Civil Liberties Union and a member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), National Housing Conference, and National Association of Inter-Group Relations Officials. Horne died in New York City, on 7 September 1974.

STEVEN NARDI

See also Bennett, Gwendolyn; Bethune, Mary McLeod; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests

Selected Works

Haverstraw. 1963.

Bontemps, Arna, ed. American Negro Poetry. 1963.

Bontemps, Arna, and Langston Hughes, eds. The Poetry of the Negro: 1746–1949. 1949.

Further Reading

Brown, Sterling. Negro Poetry and Drama. Washington, D.C.: Associates in Negro Folk Education, 1937.

Metzger, Linda, ed. Black Writers. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1989.

Primeau, Ronald. "Frank Horne and the Second Echelon Poets of the Harlem Renaissance." In Remembering the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Cary D. Wintz. New York: Garland, 1996, pp. 371–391.

Hot Chocolates

Hot Chocolates (1929), originally titled Tan Town Topics, helped define an important era in musical theater and confirmed the shift from vaudeville formulas to jazz-centered productions. It was one of the most piquant Broadway shows of the late 1920s. Connie and George Immerman, proprietors of the famous Harlem cabaret

Connie's Inn at 131st Street and Seventh Avenue, produced Hot Chocolates; and their former delivery boy, Thomas "Fats" Waller, wrote the music, along with Harry Brooks and Andy Razaf, who also wrote the lyrics. The crowd at Connie's Inn was white; the only blacks allowed in the establishment were waiters and entertainers. Many black Harlemites railed against this practice; an article in The Age deplored the Immerman brothers' policy of selling cheap liquor and banning even the most elite blacks from a club in their own neighborhood while admitting all types of white patrons, including disreputable sorts. Still, the black musical revue found an early home here, with productions such as Hot Feet, Connie's Inn, Harlem Hotcha, and Hot Chocolates. Even after Hot Chocolates moved to the Hudson Theater on Broadway, where it had a run of 219 performances, it kept its hot Harlem nightclub flavor, and the opening number, "At Connie's Inn," re-created the uptown scene. (When Hot Chocolates first moved to Broadway, each night after the performance, members of the company would trek back uptown to Connie's Inn to perform the same numbers. Eventually, however, this proved too much for the cast, and they stopped doing it.)

There were eighty-five performers in Hot Chocolates, which starred the singers Baby Cox and Edith Wilson. Leroy Smith's orchestra provided the music, and the dancing was highly praised. Hot Chocolates was an early success for the show's trumpeter, Louis Armstrong, who, although he did not receive billing, was praised by reviewers. He (and later Fats Waller) played during intermission. Billy Higgins was a singer, composer, and blackface comedian. Leonard Harper was a dancer, choreographer, and producer. Jazzlips Richardson had been a carnival comedian; he danced as a filler in Hot Chocolates and became one of the show's smash hits. His routine was filled with gymnastics (especially splits and back flips), eccentric dancing, rubbery contortions, and minstrel comedy. Baby Cox's snakehips routine along with Louise "Jota" Cook's gyrations stopped the show. At one point, the Immermans tried to get Bill "Bojangles" Robinson to join the show, but he was too busy with vaudeville; instead, they booked Roland Holder to perform a clean, sophisticated soft-shoe routine in top hat and tails to the tune of "Swanee River." Paul and Thelma Meeres were in their heyday as good-looking, sophisticated waltz dancers; bronze-complexioned Bahamians, they were considered to be the most beautiful couple in Harlem. Their elegant performance was a contrast to the blue humor, suggestive lyrics, double entendres, and scantily attired show-girls, all of which raised a few eyebrows. On the whole, though, audiences and critics did not seem to mind the raunchy material. After all, breaking away from the prudishness of the Victorian era was part of the appeal of the Harlem Renaissance.

Waller wrote several of his most renowned songs for this production, including "Black and Blue" and "Can't We All Get Together." "Ain't Misbehavin'," which became a classic, solidified Waller's reputation as a masterful composer. Most reviewers thought that the score would be an instant hit, although the New York World felt that too much emphasis was placed on this one song, which was repeated often in the show.

NADINE GEORGE-GRAVES

See also Armstrong, Louis; Musical Theater; Razaf, Andy; Waller, Thomas "Fats"; Wilson, Edith

Further Reading

Balliett, Whitney. Jelly Roll, Jabbo, and Fats: Nineteen Portraits in Jazz. London: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Dictionary of the Black Theatre: Broadway, Off-Broadway, and Selected Harlem Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

Harrison, D. D. "Edith Goodall Wilson." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999, Vol. 23, pp. 563–564.

Kirkeby, W. T., with Duncan P. Scheidt and Sinclair Traill. Ain't Misbehavin': The Story of Fats Waller. New York: Da Capo, 1975.

Machlin, Paul S. Stride: The Music of Fats Waller. Boston, Mass., and London: G. K. Hall, 1985.

Shipton, Alyn. Fats Waller: His Life and Times. New York: Universe, 1988.

Singer, Barry. Black and Blue: The Life and Lyrics of Andy Razaf. New York: Schirmer, 1992.

Vance, Joel. Fats Waller: His Life and Times. Chicago, Ill.: Contemporary, 1977.

Waller, Maurice, and Anthony Calabrese. Fats Waller. New York: Schirmer, 1977.

Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

House-Rent Parties

Although house-rent parties once flourished in the black neighborhoods of Chicago, Detroit, Washington

D.C., and other cities, they have become most closely associated with Harlem. During the 1920s and 1930s (and even into the 1940s), such parties formed the backbone of Harlem nightlife and became for many working people not only an enjoyable and affordable way to dance and socialize but also an economic necessity. For the reasonable admission price of between ten cents and a dollar, plus the cost of liquor and food, guests could dance, drink, flirt, and gamble, while the hosts collected enough money to pay the landlord for another month.

The house-rent party evolved out of traditions that were several generations old by the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance. Since the late nineteenth century, African American families in the rural South had enjoyed Saturday night barbecues and fish fries, complete with music and dancing, at events called "frol-ics" or "breakdowns." By the turn of the twentieth century, African Americans in southern cities were throwing dance parties expressly to raise money. Dozens of couples would cram into tiny apartments, and the sometimes painful results of dancing in such confined spaces led to the term "shin-digs" to describe these events, although they were also referred to as "stomps," "boogies," "breakdowns," "skiffles," "scuffles," "struggles," "shake-me-downs," "chitterling rags," and "struts."

African Americans who came north during the great migration brought with them their fondness for a good shin-dig. This social custom served them well, for instead of finding plentiful and profitable work in northern cities, many migrants instead found relentless economic exploitation by employers, landlords, and merchants. Wages for black workers were disproportionately low in New York, and rents in Harlem were exorbitantly high. Limited economic options forced residents of Harlem to find creative ways to supplement their income, and so many families transformed the southern shin-dig into the modern house-rent party.

To prepare for a rent party, hosts would clear all furniture (except for the piano) from the front rooms of the apartment, take up the rugs, replace regular lightbulbs with more sensuous colored ones, and sometimes rent folding chairs from a local undertaker. Some hosts would even hire "home defense officers" (HDOs), to bounce unwelcome guests and squelch incipient brawls. The highlight of any rent party was the music, often provided by a single piano player, a series of pianists, or even a three- or four-piece musical ensemble. Well-known pianists such as "Fats" Waller, James P. Johnson, and Willie "the Lion" Smith regularly made the rounds at rent parties, where musicians competed in “cutting contests” to determine who was the most talented. Bootleg liquor, usually homemade corn whiskey (called “King Kong”) or bathtub gin, was sold by the pint or in quarter-pint portions called “shorties.” For an additional price, guests could purchase southern-style meals that usually included some combination of hoppin’ John, fried chicken, fried fish, chitterlings, mulatto rice (rice and tomatoes), gumbo, chili, collard greens, potato salad, and sweet potato pone. The party would often last until dawn, or until someone summoned the Black Maria (the police patrol wagon) to break it up.

In order to attract a large number of paying guests, hosts advertised their parties using “rent party tickets.” Often, they enlisted the help of the “Wayside Printer,” a middle-aged white man who walked the streets of Harlem with his portable press. For a modest fee, he stamped the party information onto tickets about the size of a business card. Interestingly, these tickets always identified rent parties using such terms as “Social Party,” “Social Whist Party,” “Parlor Social,” or “Matinee Party.” Other, less elevated terms included “Too Terrible Party,” “Boogie,” and “Tea Cup Party.” Tickets often incorporated popular slang phrases, lyrics from current songs, or bits of poetry. One ticket from 1927 implored: “Save your tears for a rainy day, / We are giving a party where you can play / With red-hot mammas and too bad She-bas / Who wear their dresses above their knees / And mess around with whom they please.” Another reasoned: “You Don’t Get Nothing for Being an Angel Child, So You Might As Well Get Real Busy and Real Wild.”

Hosts would distribute these tickets to friends, neighbors, and even strangers on the street corner. Sometimes, hosts targeted a specific population, such as Pullman porters, interstate truck drivers, or black tourists. Other hosts simply tucked the tickets into elevator grilles or apartment windows. Drumming up a good crowd was important, for competition was fierce; as many as twelve parties in a single block and five in an apartment building, simultaneously, were not uncommon in Harlem during the 1920s. Although rent parties raged every night of the week, the most popular evening was Saturday, because most day laborers were paid on Saturday, and few had to work on Sunday. The next favorite party night was Thursday, when most sleep-in domestic workers were off-duty. The only population generally not invited to rent parties was white people. During Prohibition (1920–1933), any white man in Harlem could potentially be a rev-enuer or a cop, who would certainly appreciate the opportunity to raid a rent party for violating liquor laws, or to extort money from the hosts in order to keep them out of jail. But even without that threat, black hosts seldom welcomed the presence of unfamiliar, inquisitive white people in their homes.

During the Harlem Renaissance, house-rent parties essentially amounted to a kind of grassroots social welfare. However, their general atmosphere was far more sordid than the average neighborhood block party. Frequently, back rooms were reserved for gambling or drug use, and sometimes hosts would offer the private use of the back bedrooms to couples for a price. Before long, gangsters and small-time racketeers had also entered the rent-party business, staging nightly parties that served as a front for their more illegitimate business ventures. Not surprisingly, some Harlem residents were ashamed of or appalled by rent parties, especially those who firmly believed in the immorality of jazz, liquor, and gambling. Certain black intellectuals and writers also scorned these gatherings, believing that such rowdy displays of passion and intemperance reflected poorly on the black race. No accounts of rent parties appear in the works of Jessie Redmon Fauset, Nella Larsen, or W. E. B. Du Bois, for instance, and in his sociological description of Harlem, Black Manhattan (1930), James Weldon Johnson simply ignores them. We do, however, get enthusiastic depictions of rent parties in the works of Langston Hughes, Wallace Thurman, and Claude McKay.

KATHLEEN DROWNE

See also Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James P.; McKay, Claude; Smith, Willie “the Lion”; Thurman, Wallace; Waller, Thomas “Fats”

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1981.
- Byrd, Frank. “Rent Parties.” In A Renaissance in Harlem, ed. Lionel C. Bascom. New York: Avon, 1999.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Hill and Wang—Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1997. (Originally published 1940.)
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning: Meaning in the Blues. Cambridge and London: Cambridge University Press, 1990. (Originally published 1960.)
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto—Negro New York, 1890–1930, 2nd ed. New York: Harper and Row, 1971.

Ottley, Roi. New World a-Coming. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1968.

Reid, Ira DeA. "Mrs. Bailey Pays the Rent." In Ebony and Topaz: A Collectanea, ed. Charles S. Johnson, in The Politics and Aesthetics of "New Negro" Literature, ed. and intro. Cary D. Wintz. New York and London: Garland, 1996.

Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of Black America, 1900–1968. New York: Random House, 1968.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Howard University

In November 1866, representatives of the First Congregational Society of Washington, D.C., met to discuss plans for establishing a seminary for the training of black ministers. Their interest in creating "Howard Theological Seminary" stemmed from a sense of commitment and obligation to the formerly enslaved men and women of the nation. Prominent among the group of Congregationalists was General Oliver Otis Howard, a Civil War hero and commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. In his capacity as an official of the Freedmen's Bureau, Howard had a significant interest in the welfare and education of the formerly enslaved. He became a natural leader in the group's effort, and consequently the university was named for him. As their proposal gained momentum, the school's founders soon saw fit to broaden their vision from theological seminary to Howard Normal and Theological Institute for the Education of Teachers and Preachers. Ultimately, they went a step further and obtained congressional support for the incorporation of Howard University, an institution dedicated to "the education of youth in the liberal arts and sciences." The charter of Howard University was enacted by the U.S. Congress on 2 March 1867.

Since its inception, Howard University has distinguished itself as a training ground for countless African Americans who would make significant contributions to American society. Among them are prominent civil rights lawyers, such as Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall, who were trained under the tutelage of Charles Hamilton Houston, the influential dean of Howard's law school. Other distinguished graduates include Debbie Allen (actress and choreographer), Edward Brooke (former U.S. senator), Ralph Bunche (political scientist, first African American Nobel laureate), David Dinkins (former mayor of New York City), Elaine R. Jones (first woman to head the NAACP Legal Defense Fund), Vernon Jordan (former president, National Urban League), Toni Morrison (author, recipient of Pulitzer and Nobel prizes), Jessye Norman (opera star), Phylicia Rashad (actress), L. Douglas Wilder (first African American governor of Virginia), and Andrew Young (former ambassador to the United Nations, mayor of Atlanta). Howard is also well known for its exceptional faculty. Benjamin Brawley, Sterling Brown, Ralph Bunche, Charles Drew, Rudolph Fisher, John Hope Franklin, E. Franklin Frazier, Francis Grimké, Lois Maillou Jones, Alain Locke, Rayford Logan, Kelly Miller, James Nabrit, Dorothy Porter, James Porter, Robert Terrell, Howard Thurman, Charles Wesley, and Carter G. Woodson are an abridged list of significant African American intellectual leaders who have served Howard University as pedagogues.

The Moorland-Spangarn Research Center (MSRC), a division of the university's library system, is yet another reason for Howard's prestige among American institutions of higher education. MSRC is an extensive repository of documentation and memorabilia relating to the history and culture of African Americans. Its holdings include the Alain Locke papers and the Rose McClendon Memorial Collection of photographs by Carl Van Vechten. In addition, MSRC houses manuscripts of W. E. B. Du Bois, E. Franklin Frazier, Angelina Weld Grimké, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Rayford Logan, Kelly Miller, and Carter G. Woodson, as well as correspondence by Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Charles S. Johnson, and others.

The period of the Harlem Renaissance indelibly influenced African Americans' interest in the liberal arts. By extension, the artistic movement also had an influence on African American higher education, and Howard University is no exception. The ideological thrust of the university during that period is evident in Howard's theoretical stance with respect to the lingering debate on higher education between Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois. Recognizing the severe limitations of Washington's philosophy, Howard stood squarely in Du Bois's camp. Under the influence of humanist scholars, such as Alain Locke, Mercer Cooke, Frank Snowden, Arthur P. Davis, and Sterling Brown, who helped identify the intellectual life of the university, Howard conformed to a pedagogy best defined by Du Bois: "The curriculum of Higher Education which must underlie true life is intelligence, broad sympathy, knowledge of the world that was and is and the relation of men to it." Howard's proponents of the liberal arts engaged in an outright assault against the industrialist camp. They made clear that in advocating a liberal arts orientation, they were not seeking to create an elite which would be alienated from the larger African American community, as Washington had feared. Rather, they concurred with Du Bois's observation that "what black men need is the broader and more universal training so that they can apply the general principles of knowledge to the particular circumstances of their condition." Mordecai Wyatt Johnson, Howard's first black president, echoed Du Bois's dictum in his inaugural address of 1926:

The great danger that confronts Howard University and all Negro institutions of learning is not that we shall have too much liberal education, but that we shall have too little of it—that we shall turn out competent physicians, competent lawyers, competent teachers in their several specialties, who are at the same time incompetent, shallow sympathized men, ignorant of the fundamental human relations and not knowing how to take their part in the general development of a community. . . . It is absolutely necessary that there shall [be] studies which fit a man sympathetically to understand the kind of country that he is living in, the progress which that country has made, the direction in which it is moving, the nature of the institutions with which he has to deal, and the relations and possibilities of his own people to his government and to the progress of his country. This is what is meant by a liberal education—not the preparation of a leisured aristocracy, simply spending its time in the discussion of things of cultural interest to incompetent men, but the broadening of the sympathies, and that deepening of the understanding which make the experienced minister, the lawyer, and the teacher for the public good, together endeavoring to develop a country which shall have a deep sense of community and of brotherly cooperation.

This concept of "broad sympathy" remains at the core and is the sine qua non of Howard University's mission, which states in part: "Howard University is dedicated to attracting, sustaining, and developing a cadre of faculty who, through their teaching and research, are committed to producing distinguished and compassionate graduates who seek solutions to human and social problems in the United States and throughout the world."

Howard University, c. 1900. (Library of Congress.)

With regard to Howard University's profound legacy, and its continued humanistic vision, Zora Neale Hurston's reflections on her time as a student at Howard offer an eloquent tribute to the institution and its significance to African American life and culture. She recalled that when the students sang the alma mater, "my soul stood on tiptoe and stretched up to take in all that it meant. So I was careful to do my class work and be worthy to stand there under the shadow of the hovering spirit of Howard. I felt the ladder under my feet." Howard University had a significant impact on African American life during Reconstruction and through the Harlem Renaissance, and the tradition and influence of the institution continue today.

NATASHA COLE-LEONARD

See also Higher Education; Historically Black Colleges and Universities; specific faculty members and alumni

Further Reading

- Battle, Thomas C. "The Moorland-Spingarn Research Center." Library Quarterly, 58, 1988, pp. 143–163.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches. Boston, Mass.: Bedford, 1997. (Originally published 1903.)
- Dyson, Walter. Howard University, the Capstone of Negro Education—A History: 1867–1948. Washington, D.C.: Graduate School, Howard University, 1941.
- Howard University Home Page*. Howard University, August 2001. (Web site, www.howard.edu)
- Logan, Paul, ed. A Howard Reader: An Intellectual and Cultural Quilt of the African-American Experience. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin Custom Publishing, 1997.

Logan, Rayford. Howard University: The First Hundred Years, 1867–1967. New York: New York University Press, 1969.

Traylor, Eleanor, Alphonso Frost, and Leota Lawrence, eds. "Foreword." In Broad Sympathy. Needham Heights, Mass.: Simon and Schuster Custom Publishing, 1997.

Howells, William Dean

From his stint as the editor of Atlantic Monthly in the 1870s to his death in 1920, William Dean Howells was arguably the most powerful man in American publishing. Merely by mentioning a book in one of his monthly magazine columns, the "dean of American letters" could bring fame and greatly increased sales to the author. From this eminent position, he brought the works of African American writers to the attention of a white reading public. He was also the most outspoken proponent of literary realism. According to his theories of writing, a work of fiction should portray the world as it is and faithfully record the way people commonly speak and act. To achieve this, the work must accurately reflect the experience and environment of the writer. It should come as no surprise that Howells encouraged most what he imagined to be authentic expressions of the African American experience, sometimes favoring works written in dialect over those written in standard English.

Raised in the radical Republican politics of Ohio, Howells hoped for a peaceful reconciliation between the races and social equality for African Americans. He renounced any aggressive solutions to racial oppression, favoring instead gradual betterment based on increased economic power for African Americans and the exposure of the African American experience through the arts. In his "An Exemplary Citizen," Howells praised Booker T. Washington for a speech that Washington gave at the Atlanta Exposition of 1895. Howells did not see submission in Washington's speech; instead, he admired Washington's ability to maintain good-natured patience in the face of overwhelming injustice. In 1909, William Dean Howells, along with forty-two other prominent American liberals, signed a letter drafted by Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of the New York Post, on the hundredth anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's birth to protest a recent race riot in Springfield, Illinois. Howells later joined the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) when it began in 1910.

Howells was an early champion of African American literature, advancing the careers of Paul Laurence Dunbar and Charles Chesnutt by proclaiming the literary merits of their work to a white audience. He believed in the importance of artistic expression in the greater cause of civil rights. Achievement through the arts demonstrated the talent and genius of a people. He had faith that the sympathy generated through works of art would eventually lead to understanding between the two races and raise the status of African Americans.

Through his review of Paul Laurence Dunbar's second book of poetry, Majors and Minors (1896), Howells introduced Dunbar to a popular readership. Although he praised the more traditional poems written in standard English, he maintained that the verse written in dialect was more faithful to and representative of the African American experience. True to the tenets he set for realism, Howells praised Dunbar as "the first man of his color to study his race objectively, to analyze it to himself, and then to represent it in art as he felt it and found it to be." On the basis of this one review, Dunbar became a household name. Howells continued his support by contributing a laudatory introduction to Dunbar's third book, Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896). Dunbar appreciated the attention he received from Howells, but he felt that his ability to express himself freely was hampered by Howells's public call for dialect pieces.

Charles Chesnutt was already nationally known through his stories in Atlantic Monthly by the time Howells reviewed two volumes of his work, The Conjure Woman (1899) and The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line (1899), in 1900, but Howells's endorsement of these books established Chesnutt as a major literary figure and a preeminent African American voice. Howells's reaction to Chesnutt's work was similar to his reception of Dunbar's—Howells applauded Chesnutt's command of his materials and the "unerring knowledge" of his subject matter. He further advised Chesnutt to write from experience as a light-skinned African American and "acquaint us with those regions where the paler shades dwell as hopelessly, with relation to ourselves, as the blackest negro." Although he praised the dramatic power of The Marrow of Tradition (1901) the following year, Howells could not contain his ultimate disappointment. In his review "A Psychological Counter-Current in Recent Fiction," in which he chastised literature he called "morally false and mentally despicable," Howells described the tone of Chesnutt's novel as "bitter, bitter." The anger Howells detected in Chesnutt disturbed his dream of reconciliation between the races. After this harsh criticism, the relationship between Howells and Chesnutt cooled and eventually dissolved.

William Dean Howells, 1877. (Library of Congress.)

Howells's fascination with the condition of the "paler shades" found its way into his own work well before his exposure to the work of Chesnutt. In his novella An Imperative Duty (1891), a young woman discovers the secret of her parentage, that her mother had been African American, a member of a group which the young woman had always considered inferior and ugly. The doctor of nervous disorders who falls in love with her overcomes his own initial repulsion and racism to wed her and escape to Europe. Chesnutt kept a copy of this exploration into the psychological effects of racism in his personal library, where it may have provided some literary context for his own work.

Howells was greatly responsible for the popular reception of African American writers at the turn of the twentieth century. In his own way, he also tried to influence the direction of African American literature, fostering in its writers a faith in realistic portrayals of African American life and a confidence in the development of a distinctive African American voice.

Biography

William Dean Howells was born in Martinsville (later Martin's Ferry), Ohio, on 1 March 1837. He had occasional formal schooling in Hamilton, Ohio, 1842–1847. He was a printer's apprentice for the Ohio State Journal, 1851–1852; a printer at the Ashtabula Sentinel, 1852–1856; city editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, 1857; city editor of the Ohio State Journal, 1858–1860; U.S. consul for Venice, 1861–1864; assistant editor at Atlantic Monthly, 1866–1870; editor at Atlantic Monthly, 1871–1880; editor at Cosmopolitan, 1891–1893; and president, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1908–1920. His awards included the Howells Medal for Fiction, 1915. Howells died in New York City on 11 May 1920.

CHARLES D. MARTIN

See also Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Villard, Oswald Garrison

Selected Works

- Their Wedding Journey*. 1871.
A Foregone Conclusion. 1874.
The Undiscovered Country. 1880.
A Modern Instance. 1882.
The Rise of Silas Lapham. 1885.
Indian Summer. 1886.
Annie Kilburn. 1888.
A Hazard of New Fortunes. 1890.
A Boy's Town. 1890.
An Imperative Duty. 1891.
Criticism and Fiction. 1891.
A Traveler From Altruria. 1894.
 "Life and Letters." Harper's Weekly, 1896. (Review of Paul Laurence Dunbar's Majors and Minors.)
 "Introduction." In Lyrics of Lowly Life, by Paul Laurence Dunbar. 1896.
Their Silver Wedding Journey. 1899.
 "Mr. Charles Chesnutt's Stories." Atlantic Monthly, May 1900.
 "An Exemplary Citizen." North American Review, August 1901.
 "A Psychological Counter-Current in Recent Fiction." North American Review, December 1901.
The Leatherstocking God. 1916.
Years of My Youth. 1916.

Further Reading

- Andrews, William. "William Dean Howells and Charles W. Chesnutt: Criticism and Race Fiction in the Age of Booker T. Washington." American Literature, 48(3), 1976.

Cady, Edwin H. The Road to Realism: The Early Years 1837–1885 of William Dean Howells. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1956.

———. The Realist at War: The Mature Years 1885–1920 of William Dean Howells. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1958.

Lynn, Kenneth S. William Dean Howells: An American Life. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1970.

McElrath, Joseph R. Jr. "W. D. Howells and Race: Charles W. Chesnutt's Disappointment of the Dean." Nineteenth-Century Literature, 51(4), 1997.

Stronks, James B. "Paul Laurence Dunbar and William Dean Howells." Ohio Historical Quarterly, 67(2), 1958.

Hughes, Langston

Langston Hughes was one of the most influential, prolific, and beloved writers to emerge from the Harlem Renaissance. Over the course of a professional writing career that spanned nearly five decades, Hughes gained international attention and acclaim in nearly every genre of writing, including poetry, the short story, the essay, drama, the novel, history, autobiography, journalistic prose, children's literature, literature for adolescents, the libretto, and song lyrics. He was also a popular speaker, reading his poetry and prose to audiences of all ages around the world. Just as eclectic as his interests in numerous genres were the subjects on which Hughes chose to focus his creative talents. Keenly aware of both his own sociocultural milieu and issues affecting people worldwide, Hughes wrote as powerfully about jazz, blues, and the African American working and middle classes as he did about imperialism in Haiti or the effects of revolutionary socialism on Soviet central Asia. Whatever his subject or genre, Hughes wrote with passion, clarity, and a great deal of humanity, blending a critical awareness and condemnation of oppressive ideologies and institutions with a subtle, ironic, blues-toned sense of humor that sought the comic in the tragic and celebrated the healing power of laughter.

Hughes's artistic presence in Harlem, the burgeoning center of African American artistic and intellectual activities, actually preceded his physical arrival. In the autumn of 1920, when he was only eighteen years old, he had drawn the attention of Jessie Redmon Fauset—who was the literary editor of the youth-oriented Brownies' Book and of The Crisis, the prestigious magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)—with several poems written for children that he submitted for publication. Fauset was impressed with the submissions, promised to publish one poem in a coming issue of Brownies' Book, and asked whether Hughes had written any children's articles or stories about Mexico (he was living with his father in Toluca at this time). Hughes responded by sending a brief piece on Mexican games, an essay about daily life in Toluca, and a third article about a Mexican volcano, all of which Fauset accepted and published, respectively, in the January, April, and December 1921 issues of Brownies' Book. Fauset published a fourth essay by Hughes, "The Virgin of Guadalupe," in The Crisis that same year.

Although these pieces gave hints of a youthful literary talent, the publication of his poem "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" in The Crisis in 1921 helped establish Hughes as a significant voice in African American literature. The poem's unique blend of self-revelation and historical consciousness reflected a young poet with firm control of the English language and a deep appreciation of the culture on which he would subsequently focus his creativity. The poem also introduced Hughes to important contacts in New York City. Having arrived in New York in September 1921, to enroll for classes at Columbia University, Hughes was soon invited by Fauset to visit the offices of the NAACP and to meet W. E. B. Du Bois, whose eloquent words of strength, protest, and defiance in The Souls of Black Folk and in editorials in The Crisis were among the earliest Hughes remembered from his childhood. Fauset and Du Bois would prove to be very important to Hughes at the start of his career, publishing his writings in The Crisis and introducing him to many dignitaries at the NAACP, especially those who were part of the literary and artistic community at the center of the Harlem Renaissance.

If "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" signified Hughes's maturing literary vision, "The Weary Blues"—published in Opportunity magazine in May 1925—cemented his reputation as one of the preeminent poets of the Harlem Renaissance. "The Weary Blues" blended blues lyrics that Hughes remembered from his childhood with a syncopated narrative that captured the actions and emotions of a blues musician. The poem's innovative appropriation of the blues form would serve Hughes well, earning him first prize in a literary contest sponsored by Opportunity. The poem also impelled Carl Van Vechten, a novelist and patron of the arts, to approach Hughes and ask to see other examples of his work. Van Vechten was impressed by what he read and urged his own publisher, Alfred A. Knopf, to consider one of Hughes's manuscripts. The result was The Weary Blues, published in 1926 to nearly unanimous critical acclaim. Reviewers noted the lyrical quality of Hughes's verses but focused more intently on the ways in which the young poet seemed to be doing something never before attempted in poetry—convincingly representing in print the rhythm, tone, and emotive qualities of jazz and blues. The poems in The Weary Blues, to many reviewers, also captured the sheer excitement and energy that characterized Harlem during the mid-1920s. Here, some readers suggested, was clearly a poet who loved African American culture and was unafraid to represent aspects of that culture in his writings.

Hughes's reputation as a poet was certainly made secure by The Weary Blues, but during the Harlem Renaissance he also established himself as a talented writer in other genres. Most notably, the publication of "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926) in The Nation signaled Hughes's transformation from a promising writer of nonfiction to one of America's most engaging essayists. At stake in the essay was no less than the very existence of a distinct African American aesthetic, an art originating in the confluence of African folk culture and the black experience of the "middle passage," slavery, Reconstruction, and the long era of segregation. Hughes had touched on this subject implicitly in "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," but it would take a controversial essay by another African American writing for The Nation, George S. Schuyler, to provoke a more explicit articulation of a distinct black art. Schuyler's "The Negro-Art Hokum" (1926) challenged the premise that art produced in the United States was in any way influenced by race. In the midst of the intense excitement surrounding the publication of Alain Locke's anthology The New Negro (1925), which heralded an awakening in African American visual arts, literature, music, and scholarship, Schuyler registered strong and bitingly sarcastic doubt that the movement known as the Harlem Renaissance was anything more than racial propaganda and self-promotion by a small elite. Central to Schuyler's argument is the idea that "race" is a cultural construct, a product of social class, caste, and physical environment rather than a biological determinant. Schuyler pointed out that, historically, the concept of fundamental differences among the races had been used in the United States to develop a white supremacist ideology in which African Americans were cast as inherently inferior to white Americans. Schuyler insisted that celebrations of a distinct African American art—which might be translated by whites as a "peculiar art"—could only legitimize such an ideology.

Hughes understood the merits of Schuyler's argument concerning "fundamental differences" among races, but he was incensed by Schuyler's suggestion that African Americans were merely "lampblacked" Anglo-Saxons. In a letter to the editor of The Nation that appeared shortly after Schuyler's essay was published, Hughes made his own position clear:

For Mr. Schuyler to say that "the Negro masses . . . are no different from the white masses" in America seems to me obviously absurd. Fundamentally, perhaps, all peoples are the same. But as long as the Negro remains a segregated group in this country he must reflect certain racial and environmental differences which are his own.

Hughes had enumerated these differences two months before this letter, in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," his finest essay and a virtual declaration of independence for the younger artists and writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Troubled by what he perceived to be a reliance on dominant white standards of art and culture among the African American middle class and intelligentsia, Hughes challenged black artists and writers to embrace a racial aesthetic and a source of creativity generated from within black communities in the United States rather than from without. In creating a truly racial art, the black artist could not be swayed by critiques of his or her subject matter or techniques, nor could fears of revealing aspects of black life that the standard-bearers of propriety frowned on stand in the way of artistic inspiration. "An artist must be free to choose what he does," Hughes insisted in the essay, "but he must also never be afraid to do what he might choose." In this respect, Hughes believed that there was a vast storehouse of largely untapped artistic material in the culture of the African American working masses. Jazz, spirituals, and blues offered the artist a wealth of resources for the creation of a distinct black aesthetic, and the often conflicted relations between black and white people in the United States furnished an "inexhaustible supply of themes" for the writer and dramatist. In utilizing these resources, the black artist could—indeed, must—begin to challenge and overturn dominant white standards of beauty that limited the representation of blackness to stereotypes associated with minstrelsy. Hughes dismissed Schuyler's argument that environment and economics had transformed African Americans into darker Anglo-Saxons, and he issued in its place a code of responsibility to the artists of his generation: "It is the duty of the younger Negro artist, if he accepts any duties at all from outsiders, to change through the force of his art that old whispering 'I want to be white,' hidden in the aspirations of his people, to 'Why should I want to be white? I am a Negro—and beautiful!'"

"The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" anticipated themes Hughes would pursue in his writings for the next decade, particularly in its strong critique of white racial prejudice but also in its condemnation of the black bourgeoisie's complicity in perpetuating racist attitudes. Uncompromising in his belief that the younger generation of African American artists and writers were being held back by timeworn attitudes, Hughes chastised "the best Negroes" in another powerful essay, "These Bad New Negroes: A Critique on Critics" (1927), for rejecting the work of writers such as Jean Toomer and Rudolph Fisher because these writers had described conflict and violence within African American communities. In this essay, he also took a controversial stance on Carl Van Vechten's sensationalistic novel Nigger Heaven (1926), which had caused a firestorm among the black literati and intelligentsia for its grossly stereotypical depictions of Harlem society and nightlife. A combination of his friendship with Van Vechten, a desire to shock the black bourgeoisie, and perhaps a sincere conviction that he was correct compelled Hughes to pronounce the novel "true to the life it pictures." In the essay, Hughes also addressed charges by critics that his own second book of poems, Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), was mired in the lives of the lowest classes of African America. "Is life among the better classes," Hughes asked, "any cleaner or any more worthy of a poet's consideration?"

As the nation headed toward economic collapse, Hughes's response to this question was a resounding "no." The Great Depression brought to an abrupt halt the sense of joy and hope with which he had proclaimed, in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," a new and shining moment in African American art. The gaiety of the Harlem Renaissance had given way to the stark reality of economic crisis, and Hughes responded by focusing his work on the broader racist and classist attitudes that he perceived to be increasing in the United States. The Scottsboro trials of 1931 especially reinforced in Hughes's mind the connections between race and class, further convincing the young writer that conservative thinking among blacks and whites alike was leading the nation, and particularly its millions of black citizens, toward disaster. The Scottsboro case involved nine African American youths—called the "Scottsboro boys" in the media—who had been arrested in Alabama and charged with the rape of two young white women on an open railroad freight car. Eight of the youths were quickly convicted by all-white juries and sentenced to death; the ninth was sentenced to life imprisonment. As Hughes journeyed through the South on a reading tour in the winter of 1931, the nine youths imprisoned at Kilby State Penitentiary in Montgomery, Alabama, were frequently on his mind. Concerned that the Scottsboro boys would perish by actual or legal lynchings, Hughes published a poem, "Scottsboro" (1931), and two powerful essays—"Southern Gentlemen, White Prostitutes, Mill-Owners, and Negroes" (1931) and "Brown America in Jail: Kilby" (1932)—which dramatized the vagaries of a racist southern justice system and implicitly criticized black leaders who remained silent about the trials.

This critique was implicit in poems such as "To Certain Negro Leaders," which Hughes published in the radical New Masses in 1931, and was extended in "Cowards From the Colleges" (1934), a scathing essay that took black college administrators to task for bowing down to the demands of white philanthropists. Hughes's personal experiences with white patronage during the 1920s certainly contributed to the honest conviction with which he criticized such philanthropy in the 1930s. He had been supported by a wealthy white woman, Charlotte Mason, while writing his first novel, Not Without Laughter (1930), and had thoroughly enjoyed the opportunity to focus on his art without having to worry about where his next paycheck would come from. As soon as Hughes's work took on a radical edge of social critique, however, Mason withdrew her patronage. This kind of hypocrisy, which seemed to fester behind philanthropic fronts, troubled Hughes long after the end of the Harlem Renaissance and the largesse of wealthy patrons who supported it. Addressing in absentia the first American Writers' Congress (1935), which was organized by politically committed writers on the left and out of which grew the radical League of American Writers, Hughes called on African American writers to reveal through their art the lovely grinning face of philanthropy—which gives a million dollars to a Jim Crow school, but not one job to a graduate of that school; which builds a Negro hospital with second-rate equipment, then commands black patients and student-doctors to go there whether they will or no; or which, out of the kindness of its heart, erects yet another separate, segregated, shut-off, Jim Crow Y.M.C.A.

In this radical statement, which was published in essay form under the title "To Negro Writers," Hughes championed the transformative powers of the written word and urged writers to use their art to effect social change. Black writers must use their talents, Hughes argued, to overturn minstrel stereotypes and establish racial unity "on the solid ground of the daily working-class struggle to wipe out . . . all the old inequalities of the past." They must reveal, he continued, "the sick-sweet smile of organized religion" and the false leaders within black communities who fear to speak out against injustice.

Concerned as he was with issues affecting black communities in the United States, Hughes was no provincial; his increasing engagement with the political left in the late 1920s and 1930s was motivated as much by an active awareness of global class and racial oppression as it was by his commitment to representing the voices of the African American working masses. A trip to Haiti in 1931, for example, confirmed for Hughes the extent to which U.S. imperialism had cast an ugly net of racism and economic exploitation over a once proud people. When Hughes arrived in Haiti, signs of the American occupation were to be found everywhere. The U.S. military intervention, purportedly undertaken for humanitarian reasons after a coup d'état in 1915 had resulted in the overthrow and death of the Haitian president and the execution of political prisoners, had stripped the Haitian government of all vestiges of independence; the Haitian military, finances, and legislative powers were firmly under the control of the United States. Hughes's love of foreign travel was fed in part by a desire to temporarily escape racial prejudice and discrimination at home. The discovery that soldiers of the American occupation enforced Jim Crow in Haiti was thus a painful blow to him, as was the color line drawn between mulattoes and blacks and the fact that the Haitian ruling class segregated itself from the workers. Moving further away from the themes that characterized his writings of the 1920s, Hughes documented these sad realities in essays such as "People Without Shoes" (1931) and "White Shadows in a Black Land" (1932).

Langston Hughes, 1931. (Library of Congress.)

A trip to the Soviet Union in 1932 gave Hughes a sense of renewed optimism about the possibility of an egalitarian society. The contrast between the Soviet Union and the American South, where Hughes had spent more than four months on his speaking tour, could not have been more pronounced. Hughes was warmly greeted by white Muscovites gathered at the train station to meet him and was then whisked across Red Square in a luxurious sedan to the Grand Hotel, where he found courteous attendants and a clean, comfortable room. "Everything that a hotel for white folks at home would have," Hughes remarked in "Moscow and Me" (1933), "except that, quite truthfully, there was no toilet paper. And no Jim Crow." In essays and poems written during this trip, Hughes embraced revolutionary socialism as a viable alternative to the class and race antagonism that characterized life in the United States. "Put one more s in the U.S.A.," Hughes boldly proclaimed in a poem of 1934, "To make it Soviet." Such sentiments were characteristic of Hughes's writings of the 1930s. Discontented with the policies and practices of his own nation, Hughes turned to others to seek the ideals of democracy that had been so badly compromised in the United States. Thus, while he was hailed as the “poet laureate of Harlem,” Hughes was, by the close of the Harlem Renaissance, truly an international man of letters and a spokesperson for oppressed peoples worldwide.

Biography

James Mercer Langston Hughes was born on 1 February 1902, in Joplin, Missouri. He studied at public schools in Topeka, Kansas; Lincoln, Illinois; and Cleveland, Ohio. He then attended Columbia University (1921–1922) and Lincoln University, Pennsylvania (B.A., 1929). He worked as a crew member aboard a freighter headed for Africa (1923); worked in a Parisian nightclub (1924); collaborated with Zora Neale Hurston on Mule Bone, a play (1930); traveled through the South on a reading tour with support from the Rosenwald Foundation (1931); traveled to the Soviet Union to make Black and White, a motion picture about race relations in the United States (1932); wrote a series of articles for Izvestia, a Russian newspaper (1932); was a war correspondent in Spain for the Baltimore Afro-American (1937); founded the Harlem Suitcase Theater (1938); wrote a Hollywood script (1939); founded the Skyloft Players in Chicago (1941); was a columnist for the Chicago Defender (1942–1966); taught at the University of Chicago Lab School (1949); was a columnist for the New York Post (1962–1967); and traveled to Europe for the U.S. State Department (1965). His awards included the Opportunity prize for poetry (1925), a Guggenheim Foundation fellowship (1936), a Rosenwald Fund fellowship (1941), the NAACP Spingarn Medal (1960), and induction into the National Institute of Arts and Letters (1961). Hughes died in New York City on 22 May 1967.

CHRISTOPHER C. DE SANTIS

See also Black and White; Brownies' Book; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fine Clothes to the Jew; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Mulatto; Not Without Laughter; Opportunity Literary Contests; Schuyler, George S.; Scottsboro; Van Vechten, Carl; Weary Blues, The

Selected Works

The Weary Blues. 1926.

Fine Clothes to the Jew. 1927

Not Without Laughter. 1930.

The Negro Mother and Other Dramatic Recitations. 1931.

Dear Lovely Death. 1931.

The Dream Keeper. 1932.

Scottsboro Limited. 1932.

Popo and Fifina. 1932. (With Arna Bontemps.)

The Ways of White Folks. 1934.

Mulatto. 1935.

Little Ham. 1935.

Troubled Island. 1936.

A New Song. 1938.

The Big Sea. 1940.

Shakespeare in Harlem. 1941.

The Langston Hughes Reader. 1958.

Good Morning, Revolution: Uncollected Social Protest Writings, ed. Faith Berry. 1973.

Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life, ed. George Houston Bass and Henry Louis Gates Jr. 1991. (With Zora Neale Hurston.)

The Political Plays of Langston Hughes, ed. Susan Duffy. 2000.

The Poems: 1921–1940, ed. Arnold Rampersad. 2001.

Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten, 1925–1964, ed. Emily Bernard. 2001.

Essays on Art, Race, Politics, and World Affairs, ed. Christopher C. De Santis. 2002.

Works for Children and Young Adults: Poetry, Fiction, and Other Writing, ed. Dianne Johnson. 2002.

The Short Stories, ed. R. Baxter Miller. 2002.

The Plays to 1942: Mulatto to The Sun Do Move, ed. Leslie Sanders and Nancy Johnston. 2002.

Further Reading

Barksdale, Richard. Langston Hughes: The Poet and His Critics. Chicago, Ill.: American Library Association, 1998. (first published, 1977.)

Berry, Faith. Langston Hughes: Before and Beyond Harlem. Westport, Conn.: Lawrence Hill, 1983.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Langston Hughes. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.

Bloom, Harold. Langston Hughes: Comprehensive Research and Study Guide. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1998.

Dace, Tish. Langston Hughes: The Contemporary Reviews. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Gates, Henry Louis Jr., and K. A. Appiah. Langston Hughes: Critical Perspectives Past and Present. New York: Amistad, 1993.

Jemie, Onwuchekwa. Langston Hughes: An Introduction to Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.

- McLaren, Joseph. Langston Hughes: Folk Dramatist in the Protest Tradition, 1921–1943. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.
- Miller, R. Baxter. The Art and Imagination of Langston Hughes. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1989.
- Mullen, Edward J. Critical Essays on Langston Hughes. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1986.
- , ed. Langston Hughes in the Hispanic World and Haiti. Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1977.
- Ostrom, Hans. A Langston Hughes Encyclopedia. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- O'Daniel, Therman B. Langston Hughes: Black Genius—A Critical Evaluation. New York: Morrow, 1971.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1940: I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Tracy, Steven C. Langston Hughes and the Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.

Hunter, Alberta

The versatile blues and jazz singer Alberta Hunter was born in Memphis on 1 April 1895. In 1907 she ran away from home, accompanying her Chicago-bound music teacher (who was under the mistaken impression that Hunter had asked her mother for permission). At age fifteen she obtained her first job as a singer, in an exceedingly disreputable club called Dago Frank's, where she stayed for two years. Long-running engagements at Hugh Hoskins's and, especially, the Panama Café brought her more attention; Sophie Tucker, Eddie Cantor, and Al Jolson regularly stopped by to hear her sing. Soon Hunter was performing at Dreamland, Chicago's most prestigious club. "The South Side's sweetheart," as she was then being called, performed there with such jazz musicians as King Oliver, Sidney Bechet, and Tony Jackson. She was known for her rich contralto voice and excellent diction; her style was alternately earthy and sophisticated.

Hunter's initial recordings, for the Black Swan label in New York in 1921, featured Fletcher Henderson. She wrote and recorded "Down Hearted Blues" for Paramount in 1922 (because Hunter did not read music and therefore could not set down the score, the house pianist Lovie Austin received credit as a cowriter). A year later, Bessie Smith recorded it as her debut, with great success.

Hunter achieved fame in New York when she replaced Smith as a featured singer in the stage show

How Come? Advertised as a "girlie musical darkomedy" (Taylor 1987), How Come? was the most expensive black production to date. Hunter joined the cast, which also included Bechet, on 18 April 1923, and the show ran at the Apollo Theater for five weeks before going on the road (to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and the Lafayette Theater in Harlem). Meanwhile, Hunter's recording career accelerated. She was probably the first black singer to record with an all-white group (the Original Memphis Five, including Miff Mole, in 1923). In 1924 she made five records for the Gennett label with Louis Armstrong and the Red Onion Jazz Babies, including "Everybody Loves My Baby" and "Texas Moaner Blues"; because she was under contract with Paramount, Hunter used the name of her half sister, Josephine Beatty. That same year, she recorded as Alberta Prime on the Biltmore label, with Duke Ellington's band. Other notable recordings include "Chirpin' the Blues" (1923), "Your Jelly Roll Is Good" (1925), "I'm Hard to Satisfy" (1926), and three songs with Fats Waller on pipe organ for Victor ("Sugar," "Beale Street Blues," and "I'm Going to See My Ma," all 1927). Hunter also worked for Okeh, Decca, and Bluebird with musicians such as Eubie Blake, Clarence Williams, and Earl Hines. Most of her recordings during the 1930s were with orchestras, most notably Jack Johnson's society orchestra in London. She had her own radio show on NBC in 1938–1939.

In between recording dates, Hunter remained active on the circuit. Following an unsuccessful marriage in 1927 (Hunter was homosexual), she spent more and more time in Europe. Oscar Hammerstein and Jerome Kern heard her perform in 1927 at a benefit for victims of a flood in London, and they subsequently cast her as Queenie in a production of Show Boat with Paul Robeson at the London Palladium (1928–1929). One of the first female blues singers to tour Europe, she was especially well received in Paris, where she replaced Josephine Baker at the Casino de Paris.

During World War II, Hunter headed the first black USO show, completing twenty-five tours to various sites in Europe and the South Pacific. Soon after her mother died, Hunter retired from show business; she worked for the next twenty years as a nurse at Goldwater Memorial Hospital on Welfare Island (renamed Roosevelt Island in 1973). Renewed interest in the blues led to a successful comeback in 1977, when Hunter was eighty-two. She performed and recorded until her death in New York on 18 October 1984.

Biography

Alberta Hunter was born in Memphis, Tennessee, on 1 April 1895. In Chicago, she sang at Dago Frank's (1911–1913), Hugh Hoskins's (1913–1915), Panama Café (1915–1917), and Dreamland Ballroom (1917–1921); she also appeared in musical comedy revues in Chicago (1921–1922). Hunter made her first recording in New York City in 1921; joined the Broadway show How Come? in 1923; made the first of many European tours in 1927; performed in Show Boat at the London Palladium and in New York in 1928–1929; sang with Jack Johnson's orchestra throughout the 1930s; had her own show on NBC radio in 1938–1939; entertained troops during World War II on USO tours; joined ASCAP in 1952; and understudied three roles in the Broadway show Mrs. Patterson in 1954–1955. She passed the New York City elementary school equivalency examination, received a diploma (1955), attended the YMCA School for Practical Nurses (1956), and worked at Goldwater Memorial Hospital on Welfare Island (1956–1977). She returned to music in 1977. Hunter died in New York City on 18 October 1984.

GREGORY MILLER

See also Armstrong, Louis; Bechet, Sidney; Black Swan Phonograph Company; Blake, Eubie; Blues: Women Performers; Ellington, Duke; Henderson, Fletcher; Homosexuality; Oliver, Joseph "King"; Robeson, Paul; Show Boat; Singers; Smith, Bessie; Waller, Thomas "Fats"; Williams, Clarence

Selected Works

- "Down Hearted Blues." 1922.
- "Chirpin' the Blues." 1923.
- "Down South Blues." 1923.
- "You Got to Reap Just What You Sow." 1923.
- "I'm Hard to Satisfy." 1926.

Recordings on CD

Complete Recorded Works, Vols. 1–4. Document 5422–5425.
The Legendary Alberta Hunter: DRG 5195.

Further Reading

Balliett, Whitney. American Singers: Twenty-Seven Portraits in Song. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.

- Friedwald, Will. Jazz Singing: America's Great Voices From Bessie Smith to Bebop and Beyond. New York: Scribner, 1990; New York: Da Capo, 1996.
- Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Placksin, Sally. American Women in Jazz: 1900 to the Present—Their Words, Lives, and Music. New York: Seaview, 1982.
- Sackheim, Eric. The Blues Line: A Collection of Blues Lyrics. New York: Schirmer, 1969. (See also 2nd ed., 1975.)
- Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans: A History. New York: Norton, 1971. (See also 3rd ed., 1997.)
- Taylor, Frank C., with Gerald Cook. Alberta Hunter: A Celebration in Blues. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1987.
- Winter, Kari J. "On Blues, Autobiography, and Performative Utterance: The Jouisance of Alberta Hunter." In Creating Safe Space: Violence and Women's Writing, ed. Tomoko Kuribayashi and Julie Tharp. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.

Hunter, Eddie

Eddie Hunter, a fast-talking comedian, was born in 1888 on New York's East Side, to a black father and a white mother. He left school in 1903. An early exposure to Bert Williams fired him with ambition to write vaudeville and musical comedy sketches. While working as an elevator attendant, he caught the attention of a regular passenger, the great tenor Enrico Caruso, who read his material and encouraged him.

Hunter's first public productions occurred in 1905–1906, when his parents rented a hall for him to perform his comedy sketches locally. He soon graduated to the Lincoln Theater in Harlem, sandwiching comedy acts between silent movies. When the Crescent Theater was founded in 1909, the owners invited him to write for them. The Crescent was Harlem's first true theater, the Lincoln being considered a movie house. Teamed with Thomas Chappelle, Hunter contributed highly successful stock pieces for several years, drawing crowds away from the rival Lincoln.

In 1912, when the owners of the Crescent leased the newly built Lafayette Theater, Hunter worked with Lester Walton, drama editor for New York Age, on productions similar to those at the Crescent. In 1915, when the Lafayette switched to straight drama, becoming the home of the Lafayette Players, Hunter returned to vaudeville. In 1920–1921, he toured as far as Salt Lake City, Utah, with his successful act—Hunter, Randall, and Senorita (his sister, Katherine), in their presentation On the Border of Mexico. In 1921, Hunter became the manager of the stock company of the Standard Theater in Philadelphia. He wrote and produced several shows there, which toured with his wife, Nina, in the cast.

In 1923, he produced his most famous show, How Come? Although its Broadway run was short and was treated harshly by the critics, it had already enjoyed long runs in Philadelphia and Washington, D.C., with a cast that included Alberta Hunter, Sidney Bechet, and, briefly, Bessie Smith. Revived in 1925, How Come? gained Hunter much attention, including a recording contract with Victor. This resulted in six sides during 1923–1924, including collaborations with the songwriter Alex Rogers, a veteran writer of material for Bert Williams. The association with Rogers enhanced Hunter's reputation as one of a group aspiring to inherit Williams's mantle.

Hunter collaborated with Rogers on two touring shows in 1924, Struttin' Time and Steppin' Time. Their coproduction of 1926, My Magnolia, starring Adelaide Hall, was a flop; but Struttin' Hannah From Savannah (originally 4–11–44) toured successfully. In 1928 Hunter was invited to play in the English version of Lew Leslie's Blackbirds of 1927, after the original star, Florence Mills, withdrew because of ill health. He rejoined Lew Leslie for Blackbirds of 1933, which was a flop on Broadway but had some success on tour.

Eddie Hunter continued performing into the early 1940s, when he retired and became a property manager in Harlem's Sugar Hill area. However, he occasionally made special appearances; and in 1968, he was the recipient of a presentation by the people of Harlem, honoring his contributions to the black theater movement. He died in New York in 1980.

Biography

Edward (Eddie) Hunter was born in New York, on Ninety-seventh Street between Second and Third avenues, on 4 February 1888. He finished his education in 1903. He was a production manager with the Crescent Theater (1909), Lafayette Theater (1912), and the Standard Stock Company, Philadelphia (1921). Hunter died in New York in February 1980.

See also Bechet, Sidney; Blackbirds; Crescent Theater; Hall, Adelaide; Hunter, Alberta; Lafayette Players; Lafayette Theater; Leslie, Lew; Lincoln Theater; Mills, Florence; Musical Theater; Smith, Bessie; Sugar Hill; Walton, Lester

Productions and Performances

- 1909–1912. Short sketches, Crescent Theater. (Including Going to the Races, The Battle of Who Run, What Happens When the Husbands Leave Home, The Railroad Porter, Subway Sal.)
1920. On the Border of Mexico. (Vaudeville sketch.)
1921. The Insane Asylum. (Philadelphia.)
1922. Abraham the Barber. (Philadelphia.)
1923. How Come?
1924. Steppin' Time; Struttin' Time.
1925. How Come? (Revival.)
1926. My Magnolia; 4–11–44.
1927. Struttin' Hannah From Savannah; Darktown Scandals.
1928. Blackbirds of 1928. (English provincial version.)
1933. Blackbirds of 1933. (Later toured as Blackbirds of 1934.)
1941. Here 'Tis.

Recordings

- Vocal Blues and Jazz*, Vol. 3, 1921–1928. (DOCD-1015; with Alex Rogers.)
- DOCD-5528: George Williams and Bessie Brown, Vol. 2, 1925–1930. (DOCD-5528, with Alex Rogers.)

Further Reading

- Albertson, Chris. Bessie: Empress of the Blues. London: Abacus (Sphere), 1975, p. 34.
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984, pp. 175, 179.
- Mitchell, Lofton. Black Drama. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.
- . Voices of the Black Theatre. Clifton, N.J.: James T. Whit. 1975. (See "The Words of Eddie Hunter," pp. 35–57.)
- Peterson, Bernard L. Jr. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- . A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.

———. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn., and London: Greenwood, 2001. (See “Eddie Hunter,” p. 132.)
Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow, 1980. (See especially pp. 108, 119–120.)

Hurst, Fannie

Today Fannie Hurst is known primarily as the writer behind such films as Imitation of Life, Back Street, and Humoresque. Yet during the 1920s and 1930s, she was one of America’s most popular and prolific novelists and short-story writers; she was the highest-paid writer in the nation. She also made her mark as a champion of many causes, especially workers’ rights, women’s rights, and civil rights for African Americans. Her significance to the Harlem Renaissance comes primarily from her support of Zora Neale Hurston and Dorothy West, among others; her championing of racial causes; and her work for publications such as Opportunity—but particularly from her friendship with Hurston.

Hurst was born in 1889 in Ohio and was raised primarily in St. Louis, Missouri, where she attended Washington University; she later did graduate work at Columbia University. Her ambition to be a writer developed early in her life, and she published numerous stories in student magazines while she was in school. In New York City, partly in order to study people for her writing, Hurst attended night court, observed people on the street, and took jobs as a waitress and a sales clerk. By 1913 her stories were appearing regularly in many popular magazines, most notably the Saturday Evening Post, whose editors had told her they would take anything she wrote.

Hurst married the pianist Jacques Danielson in 1915, but they kept their marriage secret for several years, living in separate houses, in part so that she could write without interruption and he could pursue his music. When news of the marriage broke on the front page of the New York Times in 1920, it became a cause célèbre, with both Hurst and Danielson writing defenses of their choices. In answer to one editorial in the New York Times that had castigated them for maintaining two separate residences during a housing shortage, Hurst asserted the right of a married woman to retain her name, life, and personal liberty. Later, though, Hurst and Danielson did share a home until his death in 1952.

Hurst’s short stories were so popular that she was called the female O. Henry, and her publishers and her public urged her to write novels as well, although most critics agree that she was better in the short form. She wrote eighteen novels, more than 300 short stories, twelve films, numerous radio scripts and articles, and pamphlets about civil rights. Her stories tended to feature immigrants, shop girls, and people living in boardinghouses. She was frequently criticized for her sentimentality and uneven writing, but she was praised for her skill at rendering the emotional lives of women. Some thirty films have been made from her writings.

Among her novels, Hurst’s own favorite was Lummo (1923), about a Polish immigrant domestic worker. Her greatest popular success was Back Street (1931). Imitation of Life (1933), probably her most recognizable title today, was filmed in 1934 and again in 1959. This story of a friendship between a white woman and a black woman and their two daughters, one of whom chooses to pass for white, met with great acclaim nationwide. In Harlem, it received general approval as a novel by someone who deeply deplored racial prejudice. There was, however, a notable exception: After the first wildly successful film version in 1934, starring Louise Beavers and Claudette Colbert, Sterling Brown published a review in Opportunity entitled “Imitation of Life: Once a Pancake.” Brown said that the film and the novel indulged in stereotypes—the contented mammy, the tragic mulatto—and perpetuated archaic ideas about the mixture of the races. Langston Hughes, however, sent a note in 1937, thanking Hurst for having helped bring to the screen “the first serious treatment of the Negro problem in America.” The next year, Hughes parodied Hurst’s novel in “Limitations of Life” for the Harlem Suitcase Theater, but the two remained warm friends.

Hurst met Zora Neale Hurston on 1 May 1925, when she presented Hurston with second prize for a short story called “Spunk” at the first Opportunity awards dinner; Hurst had served as one of the judges. In September, Hurst invited Hurston to tea. In November, Hurston, needing tuition for Barnard and money for living expenses, moved into Hurst’s house as her secretary. Hurston had no talent for the job. In “Zora Neale Hurston: A Personality Sketch” (1961), Hurst noted that Hurston’s “shorthand was short on legibility, her typing hit-or-miss, mostly the latter, her filing a game of find the thimble.” Hurston’s job description was changed from secretary to chauffeur and companion.

We also have Hurston’s description of her friendship with Fannie Hurst in her autobiography Dust

Tracks on a Road (1942). Hurston describes Hurst as “a curious mixture of little girl and very sophisticated woman.” On one of their many driving trips, Hurst used the occasion to integrate a restaurant in Vermont by having Hurston dress as an Indian princess and accompany her. In the personality sketch of Hurston, Hurst applauded her “blazing zest for life” and noted, “Regardless of race, Zora had the gift of walking into hearts.” As Wall (1995) points out, “Both accounts make much of the fact that Hurst employed Hurston as a secretary; . . . Hurston was actually in Hurst’s regular employ for less than a month. Clearly the idea of the two, both writers, with strikingly similar names, appealed to the imagination of both.” In 1934, Fannie Hurst wrote the introduction for Hurston’s first novel, Jonah’s Gourd Vine.

On 4 August 1946, after the Harlem Renaissance and the Harlem riots, Hurst wrote a piece for the New York Times Sunday magazine entitled “The Other and Unknown Harlem,” in which she reminded her readers that “the large majority of Harlem, who lead ordered, backbone-of-the-nation lives, are seldom heard of. . . . [They are] the immense section of unhonored and unsung Harlem which represents decency, family unity, and social stability.”

Hurst published throughout her life, and eventually she appeared frequently on radio and television programs. She remained involved in numerous reform movements, especially during the presidency of Franklin Roosevelt; she became a close friend of Eleanor Roosevelt, with whom she often campaigned for various issues. Hurst served as chair of the National Housing Commission in 1936–1937; chaired a national committee on workmen’s compensation; was a member of the National Committee to the Works Progress Administration (WPA) in 1940–1941; and was a delegate to the World Health Organization Assembly of 1952. She also served as a member of the board of directors of the New York Urban League. She argued for equal pay for equal work and the right of a woman to retain her name after marriage. During World War II, she worked for the relief of oppressed Jews in eastern Europe and raised funds for refugees from Nazi Germany.

Most of Hurst’s work was out of print at the time of the present writing, but Kroeger (1999) argues that she was a literary trendsetter who used her own celebrity to promote racial equality and women’s rights. Hurst left instructions for her estate and her papers to be divided between Washington and Brandeis universities, with much of the money going to endow chairs in creative writing. In addition to those collections, the bulk of her manuscripts and correspondence is at the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, University of Texas at Austin.

Fannie Hurst, c. 1931. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Fannie Hurst was born in Hamilton, Ohio, on 18 October 1889, to Rose Koppel Hurst and the shoe manufacturer Samuel Hurst—American Jews of Bavarian descent who had immigrated to the United States in 1860. She graduated from Washington University (B.A., 1909) and did graduate work at Columbia University. She had various part-time work in New York City, including as a waitress and in retailing. In 1915, she secretly married Jacques Danielson; he died in 1952. Her awards included an honorary degree from Washington University in 1953. Hurst died in New York City, on 23 February 1968.

KATHRYN WEST

See also Beavers, Louise; Brown, Sterling; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Opportunity; Opportunity Awards Dinner; West, Dorothy

Selected Works

- Just Around the Corner*. 1914.
Every Soul Hath Its Song. 1916.
Gaslight Sonatas. 1918.
Humoresque: Short Stories. 1919.
Star-Dust: The Story of an American Girl. 1921.
LummoX. 1923.
Appassionata. 1926.
A President Is Born. 1928.
Back Street. 1931.
Imitation of Life. 1933.
Lonely Parade. 1942.
Hallelujah. 1944.
Man With One Head. 1954.
Anatomy of Me: A Wonderer in Search of Herself. 1958.
Family! 1959.
God Must Be Sad. 1961.

Further Reading

- Brown, Sterling. "Imitation of Life: Once a Pancake." Opportunity, April 1935, pp. 87–88.
- Hemenway, Robert. Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1942.
- Hurst, Fannie. "Zora Neale Hurston: A Personality Sketch." Yale Gazette, July 1961, p. 17.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Dust Tracks on a Road. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1942. (Reprint, 1984.)
- Koppelman, Susan. "Fannie Hurst." In The Oxford Companion to Women's Writing in the United States, ed. Cathy Davidson and Linda Wagner-Martin. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Kroeger, Brooke. Fannie: The Talent for Success of Writer Fannie Hurst. New York: Random House, 1999.
- Shaughnessy, Mary Rose. Myths About Love and Woman: The Fiction of Fannie Hurst. New York: Gordon, 1980.
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Hurston, Zora Neale

As a folklorist, ethnographer, novelist, short-story writer, storyteller, galvanizing personality, and emblematic figure of the celebration of black culture by the Harlem Renaissance, Zora Neale Hurston not only wrote about but also lived the quest of twentieth-century blacks to pursue beauty, individuality, and affirmation. Her writings, and her life, are characterized by a spirit of humor, contradiction, and imagination.

Hurston was born in Alabama in 1891. She grew up in Florida, and in her writings she refers repeatedly to her childhood and adolescence there: Jonah's Gourd Vine, for instance, is a veiled fictionalization of her parents' lives. Whereas many of the other major writers of the Harlem Renaissance focused on urban scenes and situations in Harlem, Hurston—primarily because of her parallel interest in customs and folklore—found her literary inspiration in the lives, language, and storytelling strategies of southern blacks.

In 1925, in search of the "New Negro" Renaissance, she arrived in New York and quickly distinguished herself as a storyteller and a source of entertainment at parties. But more than this, Hurston quickly translated her talent for storytelling to the written page—first by publishing "Spunk" in Alain Locke's The New Negro in 1925 and then by publishing "Sweat" and "Color Struck: A Play in Four Scenes" in Fire!! (November 1926). All three of these early works announce themes which would continue to occupy her writing for her entire career: storytelling, the relations between men and women, and the struggle for an independent sense of self. As part of a group that included Aaron Douglas, John P. Davis, Bruce Nugent, Gwendolyn Bennett, Langston Hughes, and Wallace Thurman, Hurston found herself among like-minded iconoclasts who were opposed, in various ways, to the more established figures: W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, and Alain Locke. Wallace Thurman, in his passages on literary salons in The Blacker the Berry (1929) and Infants of the Spring (1934), highlights the bold, outspoken, and sometimes outrageous personality of Hurston (who is called Sweetie Mae Carr). Similarly, Langston Hughes, in his autobiography The Big Sea (1940), devotes a great deal of space to explaining Hurston:

Of this "niggerati," Zora Neale Hurston was certainly the most amusing. Only to reach a wider audience, need she ever write books—because she is a perfect book of entertainment in herself. In her youth she was always getting scholarships and things from wealthy white people, some of whom simply paid her just to sit around and represent the Negro race for them, she did it in such racy fashion.

Such depictions of Hurston are not entirely complimentary, but they indicate the impression she made on Harlem in the 1920s.

Hurstun's talent for storytelling may have been behind her decision to study anthropology at Columbia University and Barnard College with Franz Boas, Gladys Reichard, and Ruth Benedict. Like many of the younger generation of Harlem Renaissance writers, Hurstun embraced the constructivist idea that race was a social convention rather than a biological necessity, but she also asserted her own "Negroness"—in such essays as "How It Feels to Be Colored Me" (1928)—and celebrated the distinctiveness of black culture, as in her "Characteristics of Negro Expression" (1934). Like Wallace Thurman and Rudolph Fisher, for example, Hurstun held that for African Americans race was a burden that held them back from asserting their human individuality but was also a source of unique and delightful aspects of American life. Hurstun celebrated that uniqueness in a series of sketches she published in The Messenger in late 1926, "The Eatonville Anthology."

Hurstun was caught up in the particularly vicious social history of the African American, and she wrote her own story within the prescribed space of the divided self: just enough space to sustain one's "Negroness," but not enough space to move beyond the limitations of racial identification into self-determination. In "How It Feels to Be Colored Me," she says:

At certain times I have no race, I am me. When I get my hat at a certain angle and saunter down Seventh Avenue, Harlem City, feeling as snooty as the lions in front of the Forty-Second Street Library, for instance. So far as my feelings are concerned, Peggy Hopkins Joyce on the Boule Mich with her gorgeous raiment, stately carriage, knees knocking together in a most aristocratic manner, has nothing on me. The cosmic Zora emerges. I belong to no race nor time. I am the eternal feminine with its string of beads.

Robert E. Hemenway, in his introduction to the second edition of Hurstun's autobiography, Dust Tracks on a Road, discusses her sense of self as belonging to two distinct categories: private and public. The former is instinctive, folklorish, and Negro-centered; the latter is learned, literary, and "at home" in the wide white world. Applying this categorization to the autobiography, one begins to read it as a dialogue—somewhat heated and personal in places—between two selves who strive for identity and personhood by different means. These two selves appear throughout Hurstun's work.

During the 1920s, however, much of that work was not under Hurstun's own control. By agreement, Hurstun ceded ownership of her writing to a wealthy patron, Charlotte Osgood Mason, who had offered the same agreement to Langston Hughes. As a result of her relationship with Mason, her research on folklore in the South (pursued in particular after she graduated from college in 1927), and the relative eccentricity of her focus on the rural South and on black female protagonists, a considerable amount of Hurstun's writing in the 1920s remained unpublished and unrecognized, despite her personal triumphs and the success of her short stories.

Hurstun came into her own as a folklorist and a novelist in the 1930s. With the publication of her books of folktales Mules and Men (1935) and Tell My Horse (1938) and the release of her novels Jonah's Gourd Vine (1934), Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), and Moses, Man of the Mountain (1939), she became a major figure in African American literary and cultural expression. Mules and Men and Tell My Horse had resulted from ethnographic research that Hurstun did as part of her studies with Boas and as the recipient of two Guggenheim fellowships, but Jonah's Gourd Vine heralded the emergence into American literature of a unique combination of narrative verve and inventiveness. In that work and her other novels of the 1930s, Hurstun combined her research on folklore with the psychological possibilities of fiction. She exposed the inner life of black characters in all their creative, erotic, and personal depth and complexity through inventive language, unusual metaphors, natural imagery, and attention to the humorous and profound realities of rural southern life. In Jonah's Gourd Vine (which, as noted previously, is loosely based on the lives of her mother and father), Hurstun juxtaposes the adventurous self-discovery of a philandering man against the complex self-diminishment of a long-suffering woman—chronicling what she called, in a letter to James Weldon Johnson, "the common run of us who love magnificence, beauty, poetry and color so much that there can never be too much of it."

These themes reappear in Hurstun's second novel, Their Eyes Were Watching God, which is widely regarded as a very successful melding of storytelling with a focus on an independent woman's life. The opening paragraphs announce an interest in distinguishing the ways of men from those of women. As Janie Mae Crawford walks into town, her neighbors watch and comment from their porches, establishing an opposition between individual experience and social opinion.

The primacy of oral styles in this novel is indicated by its structure—it starts and ends with Janie’s recounting of her life story to her friend Phoeby as the Florida night descends—and by the extensive use of images, similes, and metaphors derived from the black storytelling tradition. Chronicling Janie’s girlhood and early womanhood in flashbacks, the novel traces her search for her own way of describing her life, for her own voice, for love, and for the world of people. Hurston’s vivid use of black dialect shows that this dialect can convey complex, realistic characters—contrary to the proclamations of several black writers. (One example is James Weldon Johnson, in the introduction to God’s Trombones; another is Richard Wright, in his review of Their Eyes Were Watching God—Johnson had decided not to use dialect, and Wright took Hurston to task for using it.) Hurston describes Janie and her world with a sympathy and an intimacy that are rare in American literature.

To her biographers, Hurston has seemed eccentric, elusive, and at times completely baffling; in her autobiography, she is doubly so. Autobiography is a genre caught in the cross fire between truth and fiction, and Dust Tracks on a Road is no exception. Walker (1975) concedes that Hurston “is probably more honest in her fieldwork and her fiction than she is in her autobiography, but only because she was hesitant to reveal how different she really was”; and in fact, Hurston took considerable liberties with the particulars of her life—as she admits in the text (“anybody whose mouth is cut cross-ways is given to lying”). This approach moves Hurston’s autobiography away from strictly “objective” truth, freeing it to be more accurate about the directions Hurston’s life took and about her perceptions of herself. Critics, too, have more freedom to read this autobiography as a work of the imagination in which the author’s inventiveness may actually reveal much that she failed to see. Hurston offered this observation: “People are prone to build a statue of the kind of person that it pleases them to be. And a few people want to be forced to ask themselves, ‘What if there is no me like my statue?’ The thing to do is to grab the broom of anger and drive off the beast of fear.”

Hurston’s final book published during her lifetime, Seraph on the Suwanee (1948), depicts the rural South (like most of her previous works) but sets the action among white characters. Some critics consider this setting a rejection of black cultural traditions; others see it as an intentional reversal meant to highlight the flaws and foibles of a society that ascribes so much to categories like race and gender. In any case, though, during the late 1940s and the 1950s, there was clearly a growing distance between Hurston’s work and her readers. Hurston’s conservative views about race, which had always troubled her colleagues in the Harlem Renaissance, stood out more prominently toward the end of her life. In the late 1940s and the 1950s, she wrote some articles for newspapers and magazines in the South, but for the most part she lived in obscurity; she worked occasionally as a librarian, teacher, or maid, and died in poverty in 1960.

The appearance of significant critical studies—particularly those by Walker (1975) and Hemenway (1977)—renewed interest in Hurston. To the writers and critics who rediscovered her in the 1970s and 1980s, she seemed to anticipate feminism, to embody the love of a distinctively African American culture, and to present a complicated, multilayered concept of the challenges facing black writers. In particular, there was a great deal of interest in Their Eyes Were Watching God, which has become part of the canon and a central text in American classrooms; and in Mules and Men, which is a classic of African American folklore. In 1991 Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life in Three Acts, a play that Hurston cowrote with Langston Hughes and that caused a falling-out between them, was produced for the first time—nearly sixty years after its composition. Kaplan (2002) presents Hurston’s correspondence with, among others, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Fannie Hurst, Charlotte Osgood Mason, Carl Van Vechten, and Dorothy West. These letters reveal a sophisticated, complex woman who is very much aware of her considerable talents; they include her reactions to Hughes’s depiction of her in The Big Sea and to the antipathy of the black press and the black public during the 1950s. Along with the stories, essays, and novels, the letters fill in the picture of a protofeminist, iconoclastic, down-home, politically conservative woman who wrote some of the most alluring prose of the twentieth century.

Hurston’s complex, never fully comprehensible personality has made her infinitely attractive to critics. The contradictions and revisions in her work suggest how mobile and shifting her ideas of identity were. Hurston, rather boldly, stages herself, the South, and the situation of being a black woman in the United States for her audience. Finally, she was a master of the story. Her self-invention is inseparable from her love of storytelling and from the way she used language. Her celebration of black culture, her rebellious and independent spirit, and her determination to tell her story in her own voice (and with a sense of humor) continue to inspire writers and readers.

Zora Neale Hurston in Florida, 1935. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Zora Neale Hurston was born in Notasulga, Alabama, on 7 January 1891 (but would later claim to have been born in 1901). She grew up in, and is particularly identified with, Eatonville, Florida. After the death of her mother in 1904, Hurston traveled with a theatrical troupe. She completed school in Baltimore, Maryland, and then enrolled at Howard University in Washington, D.C. (1923–1924). She came to New York in 1925 and began publishing that same year. She studied anthropology at Columbia University and Barnard College with Franz Boas, Gladys Reichard, and Ruth Benedict. Hurston became a major figure in African American literature in the 1930s. Her awards included two Guggenheim fellowships. In the late 1940s and the 1950s, Hurston did some writing for newspapers and magazines but lived mostly in obscurity, sometimes working as a librarian, teacher, or maid. She died in poverty in Fort Pierce, Florida, on 28 January 1960.

DANIEL M. SCOTT III

See also Bennett, Gwendolyn; Boas, Franz; Douglas, Aaron; Fire!!; Fisher, Rudolph; Hughes, Langston;

Hurst, Fannie; Johnson, James Weldon; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Messenger, The; New Negro, The; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Their Eyes Were Watching God; Thurman, Wallace; West, Dorothy

Works: Fiction

- Jonah's Gourd Vine*. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1934. (Reprint, New York: HarperPerennial, 1990.)
- Their Eyes Were Watching God*. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1937. (Reprints, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979; New York: Harper, 1990.)
- Moses, Man of the Mountain*. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1939. (Reprint, New York: HarperPerennial, 1991.)
- Seraph on the Suwanee*. New York: Scribner, 1948. (Reprint, New York: HarperCollins, 1991.)
- Spunk: The Short Stories of Zora Neale Hurston*. Berkeley, Calif.: Turtle Island Foundation, 1984.
- The Complete Stories*. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Works: Nonfiction

- Mules and Men*. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1935.
- Tell My Horse: Voodoo and Life in Haiti and Jamaica*. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1938.
- Dust Tracks on a Road*. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1942. (Reprint, New York: HarperPerennial, 1995.)
- I Love Myself When I Am Laughing . . . And Then Again When I Am Looking Mean and Impressive: A Zora Neale Hurston Reader*, ed. Alice Walker. Old Westbury, N.Y.: Feminist, 1979.

Further Reading

- Boyd, Valerie. Wrapped in Rainbows: The Life of Zora Neale Hurston. New York: Scribner, 2002.
- Hemenway, Robert E. Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Howard, Lillie P. Zora Neale Hurston. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1980.
- Kaplan, Carla, ed. Zora Neale Hurston: A Life in Letters. New York: Doubleday, 2002.
- Lowe, John. Jump at the Sun: Zora Neale Hurston's Cosmic Comedy. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.
- Walker, Alice. "In Search of Zora Neale Hurston." Ms. Magazine, March 1975, pp. 74–79, 85–89.

Infants of the Spring

Wallace Thurman's novel Infants of the Spring (1932) is an extraordinary work offering insights into the Harlem Renaissance from the perspective of a key figure in a younger group who called themselves or were called the niggerati (also spelled "niggeratti"). The events and discussions in Infants of the Spring are all set in "Niggeratti Manor," the home of the protagonist, Raymond Taylor—a meeting place of Harlem's black bohemia. Most of the characters seem to be thinly veiled real-life figures, and Taylor is evidently Thurman's persona. Similarly, the setting can be identified as Thurman's home at 267 West 136th Street, where he lived from 1926 to 1928. Except for its top floor (where an actress with two daughters, and another tenant, lived), the house was offered to young African American writers and artists by a black businesswoman, Iolanthe Sidney. In order to help talented young black people, Sidney asked for only a very low rent—or none, when (as frequently happened) her tenants were unable to pay anything at all.

The main focus of the fictional residence is Taylor's studio, where the niggerati gather for work, discussions, and parties. Two characters who live in Niggeratti Manor with Taylor are the artists Paul Arbian (modeled on Richard Bruce Nugent) and Pelham Gaylord (based on Rex Goreleigh), and the singer Eustace Savoy (based on William Service Bell). The story begins with the arrival of a white Canadian, Stephen Jorgenson (who is clearly modeled on Thurman's intimate friend Jan Harald Stefansson). Taylor and Jorgenson quickly become friends, and Jorgenson eventually moves in. Throughout the novel, the all-pervading issue of "race" is discussed. Racial tensions soon develop, as African American women compete for Jorgenson's attention: There are episodes of jealousy and continual arguments. Although Taylor is involved in the events, he is essentially the voice of reason, whose comments and insights—often in the form of an internal monologue—give the story its structure.

A significant aspect of the plot is the development of relationships. In this regard, the focus is on Taylor. His relationship with Jorgenson is described as intimate but platonic, giving the reader the impression that Thurman has intentionally excluded sexual attraction between these two men. The interracial experiment represented by Jorgenson's living in the center of Harlem does not succeed, and he and Taylor eventually split up. Taylor's relationship with Lucille (modeled on Thurman's wife, Louise Thompson) is also important. Here, too, sex is absent, yet it remains a continual point of discussion and tension between Taylor and Lucille, whose closeness intensifies toward the end of the novel.

Art constitutes a central issue in Infants of the Spring. The group of young African Americans who have gathered at Niggeratti Manor are actually creative failures: the writer Taylor and the painter Arbian represent unfulfilled talent, the poet Gaylord represents mediocrity at best, and the singer Savoy suffers from problems of racial identity. This failure is meant to reflect flaws that presumably hampered the development of the actual Harlem Renaissance. The niggerati—the "infants of the spring" of the title—suffer from stunted growth, as is suggested by the epigraph of the novel, two lines from Hamlet: "The canker galls the infants of the spring / Too oft before their buttons be disclosed."

The characters all seem to waste their talents or misinterpret their abilities: Taylor, deeply involved in discussions about race, relationships, and art, is unable to concentrate on his writing; Arbian, although clearly talented, does not work at his art but instead opts for decadent poses (his last pose being his craftily staged suicide); the vocalist Savoy has a penchant for white music, dislikes any type of African American music, fails dramatically, and ends up in the mental ward of a hospital in New York; Gaylord writes crude love poetry dedicated to one of the daughters of the actress living on the top floor, and is jailed for alleged rape—his poems, although they are metaphorical, are used as evidence against him. The most famous passage in the novel is a scene of a literary salon at which all of the great figures of the Harlem Renaissance are gathered, including a Dr. Parkes (who represents Alain Locke), DeWitt Clinton (representing Countee Cullen), and Sweetie May Carr (representing Zora Neale Hurston). There is a heated discussion—ending in shouting matches and chaos—about race and art and the direction the movement is to take. The message seems clear: The Harlem Renaissance could not succeed, because it was too narrowly defined, was defined in terms of race, and left no space for individualism.

When Infants of the Spring was published in 1932, the Harlem Renaissance had long since passed its height, and the nation had entered an economic depression. Consequently, the novel never received much critical attention. Thurman had actually developed the main body of the book in 1929–1930 during a one-year absence from Manhattan, when he stayed with a friend, the theater critic Theophilus Lewis, in Jamaica, Queens, and was supported by a grant from Elisabeth Marbury, a rich American literary agent who was also a patron of the arts. The text had apparently already been accepted by a publishing company in March 1930, but the name of the publisher is not known; nor is it clear why publication was deferred. It is certain, though, that Thurman reworked the novel several times, and this may have been one reason for the delay. Another factor in the delay in publication may have been the fact that Richard Bruce Nugent, Thurman's intimate friend at the time, also wrote an account of the Harlem Renaissance period, "Gentleman Jigger." Nugent claimed that Thurman had stolen chapters from "Gentleman Jigger" and had used them in Infants of the Spring. This alleged plagiarism has never been proved, and it seems that if Thurman actually did copy such material, he later removed these passages.

The few contemporary critics who reviewed Infants of the Spring at the time of its publication almost all dismissed it as poorly written. Thurman was always highly critical of his own work and seems to have concurred with this assessment; in 1932, in a letter to Langston Hughes, he said that the novel was "lousy." For many years, Infants of the Spring was out of print, but in a foreword to the 1992 edition, Singh reclaims its significance and holds that its themes are relevant in modern times. Even if the novel suffers from a rather thin story line and an overemphasis on monologue and discussions, it remains a unique, insightful, and entertaining insider's perspective on the Harlem Renaissance movement.

A. B. CHRISTA SCHWARTZ

See also Cullen, Countee; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Lewis, Theophilus; Locke, Alain; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Patterson, Louise Thompson; Thurman, Wallace

Further Reading

- Abbott's Monthly Review*, April 1932. (Review of Infants of the Spring.)
- Fisher, Rudolph. "Harlem Manor." New York Herald Tribune Books, 21 February 1932. (Review of Infants of the Spring.)
- Notten, Eleonore van. Wallace Thurman's Harlem Renaissance. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1994.
- Nugent, Richard Bruce. "Gentleman Jigger." N.d. (Unpublished typescript, Richard Bruce Nugent Papers, private collection of Thomas H. Wirth, Elizabeth, N.J.)
- Singh, Amritjit. "Foreword to the 1992 Edition." In Wallace Thurman, Infants of the Spring. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1992.
- Taylor, Lois. In Opportunity, March 1932. (Review of Infants of the Spring.)
- Thurman, Wallace. Infants of the Spring. New York: Macaulay, 1932.

Inter-State Tattler

Although the Inter-State Tattler (1925–1932) was the most-maligned and shortest-lived example of Harlem's "chocolate drop press," it was more than just a "gossipy black weekly" (Watson 1995, 136). It offered a window onto the nightlife north of 125th Street, a scene enlivened by performers such as Bessie Smith and by clubs such as Small's Paradise, a regular advertiser. And in addition to columns called "Social Snapshots," "About People You Know," "Club Scribblings," and "Between Puffs," the Inter-State Tattler provided sports coverage as well as advice on finances, health, and fashion. Another column, "The World, the Flesh, and the Devil"—supposedly written by the "Three Moral Monkeys"—gave readers an opportunity to write in and redress, within limits, wrongs that anyone had done to them. Still, the playfulness of the Tattler led Lewis, for example, to describe it as "Afro-America's most frivolous newspaper . . . a sometimes viperous weekly hissing with gossip about 'sheiks' and 'shebas' at play in Harlem, Chicago, and on the West Coast" (1981, 126).

In focusing on the more social aspects of the New Negro, the Tattler was not entirely misguided. In fact, by ascribing a social element to the vibrant, yet sometimes too polished, psychology that Alain Locke and others wanted to project onto a new generation of black writers, the Tattler demonstrated how Harlem's "vogue and [its] literature were inextricably linked: Harlemania trained publicity's spotlight on black culture" (Watson, 106). Even Lewis concedes that the Tattler "excelled as a well-written gossip sheet with a racial conscience, and was even capable of serious literary commentary" (2000, 171).

The Tattler's star columnist was its managing editor, Geraldyn Dismond Major, who doubled as "Lady Nicotine" for the column "Between Puffs" and appeared on the cover when she won first place among society writers in the Survey of the Negro Press of 1927. She was fond of A'Leia Walker's wild parties: She said of one held in 1929 that "Bacchus himself passed out before midnight and along about two o'clock the shade of Rabelais returned to its tomb with its head hanging low in defeat." Major was also a regular at the annual Hamilton Lodge drag ball, known in the 1920s as the Faggots' Ball. In a column of February 1929, she observed that "a costume ball can be a very tame thing, but when all the exquisitely gowned women on the floor are men and a number of the smartest men are women, ah then, we have something over which to thrill and grow round-eyed."

Some of Harlem's luminaries were indeed round-eyed when they read Major's commentary. Her frank descriptions of bohemian venues such as the Hobby Horse, "which out-Villages the Village" with "exotic drawings . . . and a flock of artists," made it difficult for anyone to party anonymously. Neihart explains,

"Hell, some of the most committed faggots in Harlem were ambivalent about being seen [out], lest their names be celebrated in tomorrow's gossip columns" (2003, 8).

Coincidentally or pointedly, the Tattler's use of blue ink reflected the off-color quality often associated with this periodical and with some undeniable aspects of the renaissance age.

SETH CLARK SILBERMAN

See also Hobby Horse; Homosexuality; Small's Paradise; Smith, Bessie; Walker, A'Leia

Further Reading

- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- . W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
- Neihart, Ben. Rough Amusements: The True Story of A'Leia Walker, Patroness of the Harlem Renaissance's Down-Low Culture. New York and London: Bloomsbury, 2003.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Isaacs, Edith

Edith Juliet Rich Isaacs began her career in theater in 1904 as a critic for Ainslee's Magazine. By 1918, she became editor of the influential magazine Theatre Arts. It was then that she established herself as one of the most important and influential members of the American theater community. One of Isaacs's main projects was the promotion of a national theater. She believed very strongly in the connection between theater and life; accordingly, she felt that a rich national American theater, rooted in American folk traditions, could enrich American life. She did not believe that theater in New York was fulfilling this purpose because it was too commercial, largely inartistic, and dull in general. Instead of following the uninspired paradigm of theater in New York, Isaacs urged Americans to go to "the four corners of the country and begin again, training playwrights to create in their own idiom, in their own theatres" (quoted in Martin 1996, 26). Also, Isaacs believed that in order for there to be a national theater—a national anything, for that matter—the American Negro must have an important role. Not only must black Americans be included in a national theater, she asserted, but the folk tradition she saw as vital to the existence of a national theater was most alive in black communities. In the June 1935 issue of Opportunity, Isaacs said that “the American theatre and the American Negro had a world of good things to place at each other’s service if the road between them could be cleared. And . . . these things, rightly used, would enrich not only the theatre, but the whole of life” (174). With that, she set out to clear the road.

In August 1942 Isaacs devoted an entire issue of Theatre Arts to “The Negro in the American Theatre.” The forty-nine-page feature included Isaacs’s narrative along with copious photographs of actors (Ira Aldridge as Othello, Charles Gilpin in The Emperor Jones), productions (Porgy and Bess, The Green Pastures), and the like. Five years later, in 1947, Isaacs used this project as the basis for a landmark book-length study, also called The Negro in the American Theatre. In the introduction to this book, she stated her goal, again with an eye toward a unified national theater, and added: “The goal may not be reached until it is no longer possible to isolate the story of the Negro from the much broader panorama of the American theatre as a whole, in which the Negro plays his part as actor, dramatist, citizen. But at least the road is open now” (17). Alain Locke praised this goal, remarking: “The Negro in the American Theatre is all the more important because [it is] told in the overall context of the development of the drama of American life. . . . The story of the Negro’s part in all this and of his progressive integration with it profits greatly through being told as an integral part of the general story.” Locke also said that Isaacs was the most “consistent and constructive” friend of Negro drama (1948, 8–9). Isaacs was indeed a constructive friend; almost single-handedly, she opened the previously locked door of American theater to African Americans.

Biography

Edith Juliet Rich Isaacs was born on 27 March 1878, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin; her parents were Adolph Rich and Rose (Sidenberg) Rich. She graduated from Downer College (later Lawrence University) in 1899 and became a reporter for the Milwaukee Sentinel; she became literary editor of the Sentinel in 1903. She married Lewis M. Isaacs, a lawyer, in 1904 and moved to New York. She wrote for Ladies’ Home Journal and was a drama critic for Ainslee’s Magazine; she was named editor of the magazine Theatre Arts in 1918 and served in that capacity until 1946. She worked with Alain Locke to sponsor the Blondiau Theatre Arts Collection of Primitive African Art. She edited Theatre: Essays on the Arts of the Theatre (1928), Plays of American Life and Fantasy (1929), The American Theatre in Social and Education Life: A Survey of Its Needs and Opportunities (1932), and Architecture for the New Theatre (1935). Isaacs aided in the creation of the National Theater Conference in 1925 and the American National Theater and Academy (ANTA) in 1935; she also served as ANTA’s first vice president. In the mid-1930s, she was often consulted by Hallie Flanagan of the Federal Theater Project. Isaacs devoted the August 1942 issue of Theatre Arts to “The Negro in the American Theatre” and made this short narrative into a book of the same title in 1947. She relinquished the editorship of Theatre Arts to Rosamond Gilder in 1946. Isaacs died on 10 January 1956, at age seventy-seven.

STEPHEN CRINITI

See also Emperor Jones, The; Gilpin, Charles; Green Pastures, The; Locke, Alain

Selected Writings and Edited Works

Theatre: Essays on the Arts of the Theatre. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1927.

Plays of American Life and Fantasy. New York: Coward-McCann, 1929.

Architecture for the New Theatre. New York: Theatre Arts, 1935. (As editor.)

“The Negro and the Theatre: A Glance at the Past and a Prophecy.” Opportunity, 13(6), 1935, pp. 174–177.

“The Negro in the American Theatre: A Record of Achievement.” Theatre Arts, 26(8), 1942, pp. 494–543.

The Negro in the American Theatre. College Park, Md.: McGrath, 1947.

Further Reading

Bryant, H. Edward, III. “Edith Juliet Rich Isaacs.” In Notable Women in the American Theatre: A Biographical Dictionary, ed. Alice M. Robinson, Vera Mowry Roberts, and Milly S. Barranger. New York: Greenwood, 1989, pp. 459–462.

"Edith J. R. Isaacs." In Who Was Who in the Theatre: 1912–1926, Vol. 3. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1978, p. 1274.

Locke, Alain. "A Critical Retrospective of the Literature of the Negro for 1947." Phylon, 9(1), 1948, pp. 3–12.

Martin, Carol. A Sourcebook of Feminist Theatre and Performance: On and Beyond the Stage. London: Routledge, 1996.

"Mrs. Isaacs Dies; Stage Expert, 78." New York Times, 11 January 1956.

Oppenheimer, Priscilla. "Edith (Juliet Rich) Isaacs." In The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era, ed. Bruce Kellner. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984, pp. 186–187.

Tabor, Catherine Ann. "Edith Juliet Rich Isaacs: An Examination of Her Theories and Influence on the American Theatre." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Wisconsin–Madison, 1984.

Jackman, Harold

Harold Jackman, teacher, model, muse, and patron, is best known for being the best friend of poet Countee Cullen. Yet Jackman was himself a central figure of the Harlem Renaissance—though Arna Bontemps singled him out as one whose contributions to the renaissance had been ignored. Jackman had a collection of African American cultural artifacts; in addition, he was a witty and gossipy letter writer, and his correspondence with such figures as Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Nella Larsen, Zora Neale Hurston, Claude McKay, and Carl Van Vechten provides insight into his role in encouraging and supporting their literary efforts. Jackman was the physical model for the character Bryon Kasson in Van Vechten's novel Nigger Heaven, and he also appears in Wallace Thurman's novel Infants of the Spring.

Jackman met Countee Cullen in high school, and the two men remained close friends until Cullen's death in January 1946. They shared a love of theater, travel, and gossip. While Cullen was abroad, Jackman kept him and others informed of theatrical productions, literary news, and general goings-on in New York City. Their correspondence provides a context for and little-known details of many key events of the Harlem Renaissance. A discreet and humble man, Jackman was a member of Harlem's gay community. He frequented the famous Hamilton Lodge Balls, and his correspondence is filled with references, some coded, to other prominent gay men.

Jackman was active in the artistic and political communities in New York City. He directed Georgia Douglas Johnson's play Plumes in June 1929, was an associate editor of Dorothy West's journal New Challenge in 1937, and participated in political and literary groups that continued after the Harlem Renaissance. Throughout the 1930s and 1940s, he belonged to civic organizations including the Urban League and the American Theater Wing Stage Door Canteen. Jackman subsequently served as a contributing editor to Phylon, a literary journal published by Atlanta University (later Clark Atlanta University).

Jackman, a handsome man with prematurely gray hair, was a socialite in Harlem. He was a frequent escort of single women and was customarily king of the Urban League's Beaux Arts Ball. (The New York Amsterdam News reported his death with a headline on the front page: "Long Live the King!") He was also a model for Ophelia DeVore and Grace De Marco's legendary agency; he began modeling in the 1920s, appeared in advertisements in Ebony magazine through the late 1950s, and was featured in the historic special issue of the Survey Graphic (March 1925) in Winold Reiss's drawing A College Lad.

Jackman helped Carl Van Vechten obtain documents and other materials for the James Weldon Johnson Memorial Collection at Yale University. He also established what is now the Countee Cullen–Harold Jackman Memorial Collection at Clark Atlanta University, donating his own collection—including his correspondence with many well-known people—to Atlanta University. The collection, which also includes theater programs, drafts and manuscripts, sheet music, and audiotapes, has facilitated the study of African American culture.

Harold Jackman. (From "Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro," Survey Graphic, Vol. 6, No. 6, March 1925, F128.9.N3 H3 1925. Special Collections Department, University of Virginia Library, <http://etext.virginia.edu/harlem/>.)

Biography

Harold Jackman was born in England in 1901. He was raised in New York City and attended DeWitt Clinton High School, where he met Countee Cullen, who would become his close friend. Jackman earned a bachelor's degree from New York University and a master's degree from Columbia University. He was employed as a teacher by the New York City Public School System for his adult life. He was also active in the arts and politics; was a model; was an associate editor of New Challenge and a contributor to Phylon; and a correspondent with notable figures such as Langston Hughes, W. E. B. Du Bois, Gwendolyn Bennett, Dorothy West, Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, Richmond Barthé, Carl Van Vechten, and Owen Dodson. Jackman died in 1961.

JACQUELINE C. JONES

See also Barthé, Richmond; Bennett, Gwendolyn; Cullen, Countee; Homosexuality; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Infants of the Spring; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; McKay, Claude; New Challenge; Nigger Heaven; Survey Graphic; Thurman, Wallace; Van Vechten, Carl; West, Dorothy

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna. "The Awakening: A Memoir." In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Chauncey, George. Gay New York. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
- Early, Gerald. My Soul's High Song: The Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Doubleday, 1991.
- Ferguson, Blanche. Countee Cullen and the Negro Renaissance. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1966.
- Hawkeswood, William G. One of the Children: Gay Black Men in Harlem. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Random House, 1981.
- . W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
- Reimonenq, Alan. "Countee Cullen's Uranian 'Soul Windows.'" Journal of Homosexuality, 26(2–3), pp. 143–165.
- Shucard, Alan. Countee Cullen. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1984.
- Van Notten, Eleonore. Wallace Thurman's Harlem Renaissance. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 1994.

Jackson, May Howard

May Howard Jackson was a proponent of racial representation in art, and her neoclassical portrait sculptures reflected the positive self-image of black Americans during the Harlem Renaissance. In technique, she is considered a traditionalist; and her style was not entirely indicative of the "New Negro," since she neither experimented widely nor looked to Africa for ancestral roots; however, her later works were more angular and abstract, hinting at modernism.

Jackson's realistic portrait busts of black American leaders captured their psychological character and were a significant departure from the stereotypes, caricatures, and exotic images of blacks that prevailed at the time. Her sitters included W. E. B. Du Bois, Paul Laurence Dunbar, Reverend Francis J. Grimke, W. H. Lewis, Kelly Miller, and Jean Toomer. During the late 1920s, perhaps because of a lack of commissions, Jackson turned to the theme of mother and child, in Head of a Negro Child (1929), Shell-Baby in Bronze (1929), and Mulatto Mother and Her Child (1929). These works are more abstract and less neoclassical.

In 1895, Jackson was first black American woman to receive a scholarship at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, where her teachers included John Joseph Boyle, William Merritt Chase, and Charles Grafly. She moved to Washington, D.C., in 1902 when she married William T. Sherman Jackson. Between 1899 and 1931, she had a studio in Washington and exhibited both there and in New York. She also taught art to black children in Washington and lectured at Howard University; one of her students at Howard was the artist and art historian James A. Porter. Another notable student of Jackson's was her nephew Sargent Johnson, who lived with her at one time; their work was shown in some of the same exhibitions of the Harmon Foundation, a philanthropic organization that promoted the work of black American artists.

Jackson was occasionally mentioned in Crisis; was cited in Benjamin Brawley's Women of Achievement (1919); was praised in a poem by Georgia Douglas Johnson (1922); and was invited by Mary Beattie Brady, organizer of the Harmon Foundation exhibition in New York in 1927, to serve as a judge (although Jackson was delayed and had to view the works separately after selections had been made).

Because of her race, Jackson was denied membership in the Washington Society of Fine Arts and eventually received no further invitations to exhibit at the National Academy of Design (where her work had been included in group shows in 1916 and 1928); moreover, many people thought that her interest in the physiognomy of black people, combined with her neoclassical sculptural style, was outmoded. Nevertheless, in 1928 she received a bronze medal from the Harmon Foundation in recognition of her work as a whole. When Jackson died, Du Bois wrote in Crisis (October 1931) that her death was "a loss to art." He added that she had "met rebuffs in her attempts to study, and in her attempts at exhibition, in her chosen ideal of portraying the American mulatto type; with her own friends and people she faced continual doubt as to whether it was worthwhile" but that she had "accomplished enough to make her fame firm in our annals."

Biography

May Howard Jackson was born 12 May 1877 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. She studied at public school and in J. Liberty-Tadd's Art School in Pennsylvania; and at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts (A.B., 1895–1898, 1900–1902.) She married William T. Sherman Jackson, 1902; had a studio in Washington, D.C., 1902–1931; and was an instructor in the department of fine arts at Howard University, 1922–1924. Her awards included a scholarship to the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, 1895–1899; and a bronze medal from the Harmon Foundation, 1928. She died in Long Beach, New York, 12 July 1931.

CLAUDIA HILL

See also Brawley, Benjamin; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Harmon Foundation; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, Sargent Claude; Miller, Kelly; Porter, James Amos; Toomer, Jean

Selected Exhibitions

- 1912: Verhoff's Galleries, Washington, D.C.
- 1913: National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, New York.
- 1915: Corcoran Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.
- 1916: Verhoff's Galleries, Washington, D.C. (Individual.)
- 1916: National Academy of Design, New York.
- 1919: Verhoff's Galleries, Washington, D.C.
- 1919: Tanner Art Students Society, Washington, D.C.
- 1919: Dunbar High School, Washington, D.C.
- 1928: National Academy of Design, New York.
- 1929: Harmon Foundation, New York.

Further Reading

- Brawley, Benjamin. Women of Achievement. Chicago, Ill.: Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, 1919.
- Benjamin, Tritobia Hayes. "May Howard Jackson and Meta Warrick Fuller: Philadelphia Trailblazers." In Three Generations of African American Women Sculptors: A Study in Paradox, ed. Carolyn Shuttlesworth. Philadelphia, Pa.: Afro-American Historical and Cultural Museum, 1996.
- Cederholm, Theresa Dickason. Afro-American Artists: A Bio-Bibliographical Directory. Boston, Mass.: Trustees of the Boston Public Library, 1973.

- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Postscript: May Howard Jackson." Crisis, October 1931.
- Igoe, Lynn, with James Igoe. 250 Years of Afro-American Art: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Bowker, 1981.
- Johnson, Georgia Douglas. Bronze: A Book of Verse. Boston, Mass.: B. J. Brimmer, 1922.
- King-Hammond, Leslie. "Jackson, May Howard (1877–1931)." In Black Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia, ed. Darlene Clark Hine, with Elsa Barkley Brown and Rosalyn Terborg-Penn. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Carlson, 1993.
- Lewis, Samella. Art: African American. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1978.
- Riggs, Thomas, ed. St. James Guide to Black Artists. Detroit, Mich.: St. James, 1997.
- Stewart, Jeffrey C. ed. The Critical Temper of Alain Locke: A Selection of His Essays on Art and Culture. New York: Garland, 1983.

Jazz

On 6 April 1917, the Original Dixieland Jass Band opened at the Paradise Room of Reisenweber's Café on Columbus Circle in New York City. Through these white imitators of New Orleans-style novelty bands, the term "jass" or, later, "jazz" and the music known as jazz came to New York. By 1918, the term had become common usage; for example, in World War I black regimental bands were called "jazz bands." Another common term was "hot" music, as opposed to "sweet" music. Sweet music was the music played for ballroom dancing downtown; hot music became associated with the music of Harlem. The movement from sweet to hot was a major transformation and was significant to the concepts of jazz that developed during the Harlem Renaissance.

Musical Life in Harlem

Benny Carter, the noted jazz arranger, player, and composer, moved to Harlem in 1923 when he was sixteen years old. As he later remembered, "There was music everywhere—from dusk to dawn. And I was privileged to be right in the midst of it. I was encouraged to sit in with people like Willie 'the Lion' Smith and Bill Basie, that was before he became 'Count.' If you could play passably well you were welcome, as long as the proprietor didn't have to pay you" (Berger 1992).

The musical life that Carter described was a result of several factors. One was the rapid migration of blacks from the South to New York. A second factor was segregation. The policies of segregation forced many blacks to live in the upper-northeastern part of Manhattan, the area called Harlem; also, many African American musicians were barred, because of their race, from entering music conservatories and classical musical organizations such as symphony, opera, and ballet orchestras. A third factor, related to the second, was the fact that musicians had to commute from their homes in Harlem to their work downtown in Broadway theaters, recording studios, ballrooms, and clubs. To accommodate them when they returned to Harlem late at night, "after-hours" clubs developed; these clubs proved to be the real conservatories for black musicians. Duke Ellington and Billy Strayhorn's "Take the 'A' Train"—"the quickest way to get to Harlem"—reflects this pattern of travel from downtown to uptown. Ellington (1973) recounted how, after playing a show downtown at the Kentucky Club, he and drummer Sonny Greer would play special requests for patrons and receive $100 to $200 in tips. Then they would go to Harlem and spend it all in the after-hours clubs.

The typical jazz musician of Harlem would be exposed to a variety of musical styles and would have to master them in order to make a living. This situation produced a very capable type of musician who could perform many genres but who had little time and few opportunities to develop as a soloist. In the words of one musician, "You did your 'woodshedding' before you came to New York if you were a solo jazz player." Louis Armstrong, Sidney Bechet, and Duke Ellington were all accomplished soloists before coming to New York.

Still, despite the overcrowded, segregated conditions and the competition among musicians for work, Willie "the Lion" Smith said, "I'd rather be a fly on a lamppost in Harlem than a millionaire anywhere else."

What Is This Thing Called Jazz?

At the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance, jazz was defined by performances and performers from the New Orleans tradition. Nick La Rocca, the leader of the Original Dixieland Jass Band, explained: "Jazz is the assassination of the melody and the slap of syncopation." Melodic decoration, instrumental timbral effects, and syncopation were among the characteristics of this style. In 1925, Eubie Blake—composer of Shuffle

Along (1921), the first all-black show in a Broadway theater—described the public taste as follows: “What the public wants today are lively, jazzy songs, not too jazzy, with love interest, but without the sickly sentimentality in vogue a generation ago.”

One characteristic distinguishing jazz from other music is that it is primarily a vocal style imitated by instruments. For instance, all the colors and nuances of the Negro voice were transferred into the plunger mutes of Bubber Miley’s trombone and Cootie Williams’s trumpet, into the slurs and growls of Johnny Dodds’s clarinet, and into the trap sound effects of drummers Sonny Greer and Chick Webb. Another unique timbral effect was achieved by James Reese Europe, who replaced the second violins, violas, and cellos in his Society Orchestra with banjos to give a strumming, murmuring sound. Also, because ballrooms in New York were so large, bands and orchestras had to add more brass instruments and saxophones, which produced a much larger, louder sound.

The jazz of this time had a strong, and significant, emphasis on individualism. It was not what you played but how you played it. Bill Evans, a jazz pianist of the 1970s, said of jazz history: “Jazz is not a ‘what’; it’s a ‘how’—and if you do things according to the ‘how’ of jazz, it’s jazz.” The jazz improviser became at the same time an interpreter and composer in relationship to the surrounding musicians and the listeners. Short preexisting forms such as blues and pop tunes from Tin Pan Alley formed the basis of the musical material from which the skilled jazz player could improvise.

The oral tradition provided the means of transmission for this music. It was the music heard in recordings, in after-hours clubs, and on the street that formed the ideas heard in jazz improvisations. Also, the “call and response” aspect of conversation, which came from the oral tradition, was adapted for jazz. The blues form consisting of statement, restatement, and result allows an instrumental response to the vocal music at the end of each couplet; this dialogue between soloist and accompaniment is based on call and response. Later, as the big bands emerged, call and response between the brass section and the saxophone section would become an important aspect of this type of jazz.

The “slaying of syncopation,” as described by Nick La Rocca, was also an essential ingredient in jazz. A basic dance movement in many west African communities is to lift the foot up off the ground and place it down gently; the upbeat of the African dancer is reflected in the offbeat of the music. In European dances, the entire leg is used to give a stomping effect; thus the downbeat of the military march emphasizes the soldier’s footfall. In other words, the African dance will accent beats two and four of a four-beat pattern, allowing the lifting of the foot and leg, whereas a march will place the emphasis on the first and third beats of the pattern. This concept of syncopation, introduced in ragtime (“ragged time”), was developed in jazz to superimpose one beat pattern over another simultaneously. As Ellington expressed this: “It Don’t Mean a Thing If It Ain’t Got That Swing”—“Doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah, doo-wah.” Here, Ellington provides the call-and-response pattern but places the response in a pattern of nine over a pulse beat of eight. This throws the beat out of sync—syncopation. In this regard, too, the faster tempo of the new dances such as the fox trot and the Charleston (sixty and ninety beats per minute) seemed to reflect the hectic pace of the times.

William C. Handy, the composer of “Saint Louis Blues” and “Memphis Blues,” taking a more philosophical and social viewpoint, believed that ragtime, blues, jazz, and spirituals all “came from the same strain of Negro creation.” Alain Locke, a social philosopher, described jazz as “first a reaction from Puritan repressions and then an escape from the tensions and monotonies of machine-ridden, extroverted form of civilization” (1936). Locke also said: “Jazz is basically Negro, then, although fortunately, also human enough to be universal in appeal and expressiveness.”

The journalist Joel Augustus Rogers, of the Amsterdam News, wrote in 1925 that the racial component of jazz was “one part American and three parts American Negro, and was nobody’s child of the levee and the city slum. . . . It is really at home in its humble native soil wherever the modern unsophisticated Negro feels happy and sings and dances to his mood.”

Performers of Jazz and Their Influence

Among the early venues for jazz performers were “rent parties.” In the urban environment of Harlem, low wages and a lack of housing led to overcrowding—and to insufficient funds to pay landlords. One solution was the rent party, which often included a player of a “band in a box,” the parlor piano. Rent parties would begin on a weekend afternoon and last until the next morning. At first, the music was ragtime, waltzes, popular tunes, and dances. Later, a style known as “Harlem stride” piano playing became popular. In stride piano, the left hand played a note in the bass register on the downbeat and then a chord in a higher octave on the offbeat; the right hand played syncopated melodic patterns. Talented players would often syncopate the left hand as follows: 1 2 | 1 2 | 1 1 | 2 1 | (with 1 as the bass note and 2 as the chord). James P. Johnson, Willie “the Lion” Smith, and Thomas “Fats” Waller were all stride pianists and were in demand for rent parties.

When piano rolls were cut of these performances—such as James P. Johnson’s “Carolina Stride”—a young player like Duke Ellington or Fletcher Henderson would learn to play the pieces by placing his fingers on the keys as they were depressed by the mechanical piano rolls. James Weldon Johnson observed in Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man that these pianists were “making ‘serious’ or ‘famous’ work in the Negro vein an aim of the professional career.”

Blues bands usually featured a small combo of trumpet, banjo or piano, and clarinet. W. C. Handy transported blues to New York, and specifically to Tin Pan Alley, to develop more of an urban feel instead of the rural tradition. In the early “race records,” these small ensembles would provide accompaniment and occasional solos.

Between 1921 and 1939, forty black musicals were presented in New York City. Beginning in 1921 with Shuffle Along, by Eubie Blake and Noble Sissle, the Broadway theaters provided opportunities for African American musicians. The typical theater orchestra had violins, flutes, oboes, saxophone, trumpets, piano, banjo, and drums; sometimes a tuba or bass would be added. In 2002, this long tradition was continued when Harlem Song, a black musical recalling the Harlem Renaissance, played at the Apollo Theater in Harlem. (In June of that year, President George W. Bush invited the producers of Harlem Song to give a performance at the White House in honor of Black Music Month.)

Although few recording companies were owned by blacks (Black Swan, for which Ethel Waters was a featured singer, was an exception), even white owners were quick to realize that they could find a large market by making “race records.” After a record of Mamie Smith singing “Crazy Blues” sold a million copies in less than a year, recording companies scrambled to record African American blues singers and instrumentalists. (Not until 1947 would Variety change the category “race music” or “Harlem Hit Parade” to “rhythm and blues.”) Duke Ellington said of this period, when he was employed at the Kentucky Club: “We recorded once a week, sometimes three or four times a week, for almost every existing label under different names: Duke Ellington on Victor, Jungle Band on Brunswick, Washingtonians on Harmony, Whoopee Makers on Perfect and Harlem Foot Warmers on Okeh.”

Because of the technological limitations of the time, however, jazz was recorded in conditions that made a true representation of the music impossible. A record could hold only three minutes of music, which meant extended compositions and performances were severely curtailed. Certain instruments such as bass drums and string basses were omitted because of lack of space in the recording studios and because the acoustical range was limited. Also, the repertoire was restricted to what the owners thought they could sell. Therefore, Fletcher Henderson’s waltz medleys from the Roseland Ballroom were not recorded, nor was Fats Waller playing Chopin’s études. Nevertheless, jazz musicians were an important component of “race records.”

One important influence on jazz that is not well documented during this period is music from the Caribbean and South America, called “Latin music.” Roberts (1998) notes that more than half of James Reese Europe’s 180 musicians were listed in the Clef Club Booking Agency as Puerto Ricans. This was evidently because they had a higher level of musical skills such as sight reading and playing different styles. The “tango craze” was imported uptown; “tango teas”—at which people would dance to ragtime as well as tangos—were popular in Harlem. In both “Saint Louis Blues” and “Memphis Blues,” W. C. Handy included “habanera” sections reflecting a Cuban influence. In 1929 Juan Tizol, a Puerto Rican valve trombonist, joined the Ellington Band at the Cotton Club, where he wrote a famous piece of “jungle music” called “Caravan.” Classy nightspots usually had one band or orchestra for dancing, a second for the shows, and a third to play Latin music and particularly tangos. The musicians of Harlem also knew calypso. Okeh Records made recordings of calypso in the 1920s, and Sam Manning recorded “My Little West Indian Girl.”

Dance bands and show bands were probably the most influential aspect of jazz. In 1924, Variety listed 900 dance bands, with more than 7,200 musicians, in the United States. Paul Whiteman had sixty-eight bands and orchestras using his name, including eleven in New York City. The five- or six-piece New Orleans-style bands had to be increased to play in the larger clubs and ballrooms, which needed more sound. Duke Ellington, for instance, had to increase the number of his musicians from the six who played at the Kentucky Club to the eleven who played at the larger Cotton Club in 1927. (Ellington was an exception to the usual practice of hiring musicians on a per-service basis. By establishing his orchestra at the Cotton Club, he was able to keep the same musicians in the band and could compose for their individual musical qualities.) Because the dance bands also had to play for shows, musicians who could sight-read and play in many styles were preferred. Few outstanding solo players emerged from the ranks of New York's dance bands.

Hot versus Sweet

Many of the early jazz groups were known as "hot": Louis Armstrong's Hot Five and Hot Seven, Fletcher Henderson's Hot Six, and the like. The term "hot" seemed to distinguish these groups from musical ensembles that called themselves orchestras and played more sophisticated "sweet" music. The contrast between hot and sweet is suggested in the lyrics to Duke Ellington's "Don't Mean a Thing": "Makes no difference if it's sweet or hot. Just keep that rhythm, give it all you've got!"

An anecdote about the famous Fletcher Henderson Orchestra, which played at the Roseland Ballroom downtown, illustrates this conflict. When Louis Armstrong joined the Henderson orchestra in 1924, he arrived in the middle of a rehearsal of waltzes and started playing along quite loudly. Henderson stopped the music and asked what the dynamic marking was; Armstrong replied that it was "pp." Henderson said that this meant pianissimo—that is, play softly. Armstrong answered that he thought it meant "pound plenty!" This story indicates not only the difference between styles but also Armstrong's limited ability to read music. Armstrong played in the New Orleans style, an oral tradition in which he had developed his skill as a soloist rather than skill in reading music.

When Henderson became the recording director for Black Swan Records, he accompanied Ethel Waters on a successful tour with his Black Swan Dance Masters. Waters complained that he wouldn't play the "damn-it-to-hell" bass lines (stride piano style) that she preferred. She bought him some piano rolls of James P. Johnson, and Henderson learned to play in Johnson's hot style.

A notable comment about the sweet style that was preferred in the downtown ballrooms and shows comes from Duke Ellington, describing the style of Paul Whiteman. Ellington said that Whiteman "dressed her in woodwinds and strings and made a lady out of jazz." However, the hot bands could parody sweet orchestras. Fletcher Henderson recorded "Dicty Blues" in 1922, and Duke Ellington recorded "The Dicty Glide" in 1929 "Dicty" was a slang word in Harlem indicating snobbishness or "putting on airs."

A distinguishing feature of hot bands and orchestras was their ability to relate to the responses of the dancers. Duke Ellington describes this feature in discussing Chick Webb, who led the Savoy Ballroom Orchestra: "The reason why Chick Webb had such control, such command of his audience at the Savoy Ballroom, was because he was always in communication with the dancers and felt it the way they did." This was the era of dances such as the Charleston, black bottom, and lindy hop.

Another aspect of hot versus sweet music is suggested by the number of white musicians who came to the dance clubs and after-hours joints to learn hot music. Paul Whiteman, George Gershwin, Darius Milhaud, and others came to listen and incorporate this style into their own music. For example, in 1924, in a concert called "Experiment in Modern Music" at Aeolian Hall, the Paul Whiteman Orchestra presented both the premiere of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue and a piece that had become famous in a recording the Original Dixieland Jass Band, "Livery Stable Blues." Later, the Whiteman Orchestra added such white jazz performers as Bix Beiderbecke on trumpet, Jack Teagarden and Frank Teschmaker on trombone, and Eddie Lang on guitar. Gene Krupa learned much of his drumming style from Chick Webb; and Benny Goodman not only learned his clarinet licks in Harlem but he also was the first important white bandleader to hire black musicians.

Jazz and the Harlem Renaissance

The writers and philosophers who developed the idea of the "New Negro"—W. E. B. Du Bois, Alain Locke, James Weldon Johnson—had little regard for "entertainment" music. They appreciated the qualities of the "sorrow songs," the Negro spirituals as sung by Harry T. Burleigh and Roland Hayes, but they felt that blues, jazz, and jazz dance did nothing to uplift the Negro race. One writer, Samuel Floyd (1995), states: "Initially, entertainment music, including jazz, was ignored or dismissed by Renaissance leaders in favor of concert music; the blues and other folk forms (except for the Negro Spiritual, which was held in high esteem) were rejected as decadent and reminiscent of the 'Old Negro.'" Benny Carter writes: "Jazz was viewed either ambivalently or with outright hostility by many of the leading figures of the movement. We in music knew there was much going on in literature, for example, but our worlds were far apart. We sensed that the Black cultural as well as moral leaders looked down on our music as undignified." An example of the ambivalence Carter mentions comes from the composer William Grant Still, who wrote the Afro-American Symphony: "Some forms of jazz are cheap, monotonous. No one can be blamed for scorning them. But there are also forms of jazz that are valuable additions to music; forms upon [which] great symphonies can be built."

By contrast, the younger literary talents of the Harlem Renaissance—Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and Sterling Brown—embraced the new music and used it in their writings. Hughes wrote in one poem:

I'm going down to de river
And take me a rockin' chair
If the blues overcome me
I'm gonna' rock away from here.

Interestingly, in this poem Hughes uses an encapsulated version of the blues form by omitting the repetition of the first stanza. Benny Carter praises Hughes as "the poet laureate of the Renaissance and a man who had much respect for and understanding of this music"—that is, jazz. Hughes himself said, regarding the conflict over how to define the New Negro: "Let the blare of Negro jazz bands and bellowing voice of Bessie Smith singing Blues penetrate the closed ears of colored near-intellectuals until they listen and perhaps understand."

The Legacy of Jazz in the Harlem Renaissance

A significant development in jazz was the incorporation of the styles of ballroom and nightclub orchestras. Jazz, or some jazz, evolved from the New Orleans tradition of a small combo featuring solo players to big bands reading prepared arrangements and contrasting musical phrases between sections: brass, saxes, and rhythm. Harlem's musicians had to play in many ensembles and venues—tango tea dances, rent parties, Broadway theater orchestras, show clubs, military bands, "sweet" orchestras, and so on. As a result, a type of musician developed who could sight-read music and could play in many styles, but this often precluded the development of a personal soloistic style. Louis Armstrong came to New York as an established soloist, was acclaimed for his ability as an improviser, and was sought after for recordings; yet, in order to play in Fletcher Henderson's dance orchestra, he had to improve his ability to read music.

A large number of retrospective art exhibitions, literary publications, theater reviews, and jazz performances have reflected the Harlem Renaissance. A number of jazz clubs around the world are named "Cotton Club"; bus tours of Harlem are offered every night in New York; and jazz is still recorded with homage to the Harlem traditions. Moreover, the eventual acceptance of jazz by the younger writers of the Harlem Renaissance assured it a place in the artistic and cultural legacy of the era.

JOHN K. GALM

See also Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Blues; Brown, Sterling; House-Rent Parties; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, James Weldon; Locke, Alain; Music; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Roseland Ballroom; Savoy Ballroom; Shuffle Along; Spirituals; specific musicians

Further Reading

- Anderson, Paul Allen. Deep River: Music and Memory in Harlem Renaissance Thought. Chapel Hill: Duke University Press, 2001.
- Berger, Ed. Liner notes to Benny Carter: Harlem Renaissance. 1992. (Sound recording.)
- Ellington, Edward Kennedy. Music Is My Mistress. 1973.
- Floyd, Samuel L., Jr. The Power of Black Music: Interpreting Its History from Africa to the United States. 1995.
- Kirchner, Joe, ed. The Oxford Companion to Jazz. 2000.
- Locke, Alain. The Negro and His Music. 1936.
- Lowe, Allen. "Foot Stompers, Cross Dressers, and Swingers: The Big Bands, Singers, and Musicians of the Harlem Renaissance." In Rhapsodies in Black: Music and Words from the Harlem Renaissance. Rhino, 2000.
- Ramsey, Guthrie P. Race Music: Black Cultures from Bebop to Hip Hop. Berkeley: UC Press, 2003.
- Roberts, John Storm. Black Music of Two Worlds, 2nd ed. 1998.
- Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. New York: Oxford UP, 1968.
- Skipwith, Joanna, ed. Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance. Berkeley: UC Press, 1997.
- Spencer, Jon Michael. The New Negroes and Their Music: The Success of the Harlem Renaissance. 1997.
- Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans, 3rd ed. 1997.
- Smith, Willie. "The Lion." Music on my Mind. 1964.
- Tracy, Steven. Langston Hughes and the Blues. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 2001.

Ward, Geoffery C., and Ken Burns. Jazz: A History of America's Music. New York: Knopf, 2000.

Jessye, Eva

Eva Jessye was playing the piano by the age of five and organizing singing groups by the age of twelve, already on her way to becoming the “dean of black female musicians,” as she would eventually be known. Jessye attended public schools in Coffeyville and Iola, Kansas, as well as in St. Louis and Seattle, living with various relatives. After graduating from Western University in Kansas in 1914, she spent three summers getting her teacher’s certificate at Langston University in Oklahoma. Her long career included teaching, journalism, composing, radio production, film acting, and, most notably, choral conducting. Eva Jessye is best known for her central role as choral director in two important operas of the 1930s: Virgil Thomson and Gertrude Stein’s Four Saints in Three Acts (1934), and George Gershwin and DuBose Heyward’s Porgy and Bess (1935). By the mid-1930s, Jessye’s choir was one of the preeminent black choral groups in the country, hailed for its eclectic repertoire and its full-throated sound.

The Eva Jessye Choir began as the Dixie Jubilee Singers, performing spirituals and popular songs. In 1926, Jessye moved to New York and formed the choir. The organization first worked singing “mood music” before movies began at the Rivoli Theater on Broadway. In 1926, the choir was hired for a radio show at the Capitol Theater. Jessye soon was asked to write her own radio shows, featuring her choir, now the Eva Jessye Choir, mostly performing spirituals that Jessye herself arranged. (The choir also performed in one of the first singing commercials on radio, for Van Heusen shirts.) In 1927 Jessye published My Spirituals, her arrangements interspersed with text describing the place of this music in her life. In 1929, her choir appeared in King Vidor’s Hallelujah, Hollywood’s first all-black talkie, for which she wrote some original music as well.

Although she championed black musical styles and forms, particularly spirituals, Jessye rebelled against the idea that she should produce only “black music.” She was a choral director at Morgan College in Baltimore, but she resigned in protest when its president, a white southerner, insisted that her singers perform only “their own music.” Her most notable composition, Paradise Lost and Regained (1943), crosses racial boundaries by setting John Milton’s work to the sounds and styles of black spirituals in what she called a “folk oratorio.” Jessye’s choir participated in numerous events of the civil rights movement, most notably as the official choir of Martin Luther King’s March on Washington in 1963.

Jessye devoted the final decades of her long life to education. In 1972 she formed a new Eva Jessye Choir at the University of Michigan, where she organized a major archive on black musicians and entertainers. In 1979 she became an artist in residence at Pittsburg State University in Kansas, to which she contributed a large collection of her personal memorabilia. She received numerous honors and awards, including honorary doctorates from the University of Michigan and Eastern Michigan University. Eva Jessye died in 1992.

Biography

Eva Jessye was born 20 January 1895 in Coffeyville, Kansas. She studied at Western University, Quindaro, Kansas; graduated in 1914; received a teaching certificate from Langston University in Oklahoma in 1917; taught in public schools in Taft, Haskell, and Muskogee, Oklahoma, in 1917–1920; directed the music program at Morgan State College in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1920–1925; was a reporter for the Baltimore Afro-American in 1925; joined the Dixie Jubilee Singers (later the Eva Jessye Choir) in 1926; and sang on radio in 1926–1929. She appeared in Hallelujah (MGM, 1929), Virgil Thomson and Gertrude Stein’s Four Saints in Three Acts (1934), George Gershwin and DuBose Heyward’s Porgy and Bess (1935), and numerous revivals including a tour sponsored by the U.S. State Department in 1952. She composed three oratorios: Paradise Lost and Regained (1934), Chronicle of Job (1936), and The Story of the Black Wise Man (1958). She was awarded honorary doctorates by the University of Michigan (1976) and Eastern Michigan University (1987). Jessye died on 21 February 1992 in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

CRISTINA L. RUOTOLO

See also Four Saints in Three Acts; Hallelujah; Porgy and Bess; Spirituals

Selected Works

My Spirituals. New York: Robbins, 1927.

Selected Poems. Pittsburg, Kan.: Little Balkans, 1978.

Further Reading

- Black, Donald F. "The Life and Work of Eva Jessye and Her Contributions to American Music." Dissertation, University of Michigan, 1985.
- Robinson, Florence, "Eva Jessye." In Notable Black American Women. Detroit, Mich., and London: Gale Research, 1992.
- Southern, Eileen. Music of Black Americans. New York: Norton, 1983.
- Wilson, Doris Louise Jones. "Eva Jessye: Afro-American Choral Director." Dissertation, University of Washington at St. Louis, 1989.

Jim Crow

In the late 1820s, a blackface minstrel performer named T. D. Rice introduced a new character he claimed to have patterned after an elderly slave he had observed while traveling in Kentucky. Rice, a white man, delighted audiences with the song-and-dance routine, the lyrics of which were:

Wheel about and turn about and do just so;
Ev'ry time I wheel about I jump Jim Crow.

By the 1830s, "Jim Crow" had become a popular term describing a particular African American stereotype: the slow-witted, clownish, deferential, contented slave. By the late nineteenth century, Jim Crow had become synonymous with the entire culture of formal and legal separation of the races that pervaded American society in both the South and the North.

Beginning during the waning days of Reconstruction, southern whites began to construct a system of legally sanctioned discrimination in which African Americans were generally prohibited from inhabiting the same physical spaces as whites and from interacting with whites on an equal basis. This segregation took place not merely in private establishments such as restaurants, stores, theaters, hotels, and nightclubs, but also in virtually all areas of public life—education, housing, employment, organized labor, religion, the armed forces, transportation, health care, and marriage law—as well as facilities such as swimming pools, parks, rest rooms, and drinking fountains.

The establishment of Jim Crow in the South testified to the social and political strength of white supremacy after the Civil War. Under the Reconstruction Act of 1867 and the Civil Rights Act of 1875, southern blacks were formally given freedoms that had been only dreamed of during slavery: the right to participate in political and legal institutions as citizens; and the right to travel, dine, shop, and work alongside whites. Scholars have argued over the degree to which newly freed blacks were able to exercise these rights in the postwar years against the tide of white resentment and an entrenched code of deference. To whatever degree these rights and freedoms were exercised, they were short lived, as over the next three decades the integrationist gains of Reconstruction would be rolled back by powerful forces of white supremacy.

Scholars have also differed over whether Jim Crow laws merely reflected prejudices widely held among white southerners, or whether the laws were instrumental in nurturing a new and virulent ideology of white supremacy. Whatever the case, there can be little doubt that the architects of Jim Crow used the power of the law to affirm and naturalize the subordinate position of African Americans. Beginning in the 1870s with statutes enacted across the South against intermarriage between the races—whites had long considered such intermarriage an abomination—the prohibition on the physical union of black and white was soon expanded to an increasing number of social situations. The Civil Rights Act of 1875 was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1883, enabling a range of business establishments to discriminate on the basis of race. By the mid-1880s, segregated educational facilities had become mandatory by law in most southern states.

In conjunction with the relegation of African Americans to a separate social realm, Jim Crow also entailed the disenfranchisement of African American men (who had been given the vote in 1870) through various means, including poll taxes, literacy tests, intimidation, violence, and whites-only referenda. These techniques, however fraudulent and unconstitutional, proved highly effective: by 1900, registered black voters in the South had dwindled to 3 percent of the eligible population, making the possibility of remedies for African Americans through political representation more and more remote.

Jim Crow received its highest sanction in 1896, when the Supreme Court heard the case of a young Creole man who had been arrested for riding in a whites-only railway car in New Orleans. In this landmark case, Plessy v. Ferguson, the Court affirmed the constitutionality of racial segregation in public facilities and institutions, with the dubious proviso that the separate facilities for blacks were also "equal" to those reserved for whites. The ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson granted a powerful and lasting legitimacy to Jim Crow and set a template for race relations until the mid-twentieth century. Perhaps the most egregious effect of Plessy was the system of separate and substandard (with a few exceptions) educational institutions for African American children, a handicap that perpetuated poverty among blacks as well as political and social inequalities.

The endorsement of segregation by the highest court in the land demoralized the opponents of Jim Crow and made resistance to its codes unlawful. Yet law was only one means of enforcing white supremacy under Jim Crow; the threat of extralegal racial violence was ever present. Transgressions of segregation laws and of Jim Crow etiquette by African Americans (and, in some cases, by whites), especially those codes prohibiting sexual contact between the races, were met with the most extreme punitive measures. According to recent estimates, more than 3,200 African Americans were victims of lynch mobs in the period from 1880 to 1930. Violence was used systematically to enforce obedience to Jim Crow and to remind African Americans of their status as “outsiders,” beyond the protections the law afforded white citizens.

Some scholars have argued that Jim Crow, despite placing African Americans at the margins of American society, also created spaces in which black culture flourished. Especially in the northern cities, where a somewhat milder form of Jim Crow was in force, African Americans made a virtue of their forced isolation from whites, cultivating self-sufficient and dynamic communities, educational institutions, newspapers, academic journals, political organizations, and artistic movements. New York’s Harlem was such a community, both a result of the social, political, and spatial conditions of Jim Crow and a refuge from them. Yet the refuge was not total, because Jim Crow still largely governed the interactions between the races in daily life even in the cosmopolitan urban centers; its powerful sway could be observed, for example, in the all-white clientele of nightclubs in Harlem, such as the famous Cotton Club, where the artists and employees were African American.

Jim Crow described the system under which, as W. E. B. Du Bois wrote, African Americans spent their lives behind a “veil,” a barrier that kept them from participating fully in American society, and that kept blacks and whites from recognizing each other’s humanity. That veil began to tear in the mid-twentieth century with the rise of the civil rights movement and its explicit challenges to white supremacy and to Jim Crow.

COTTEN SEILER

See also Cotton Club; Lynching; Minstrelsy; Nightclubs

Further Reading

Dailey, Jane Elizabeth, Glenda Elizabeth Gilmore, and Simon Bryant, eds. Jumpin’ Jim Crow: Southern Politics from Civil War to Civil Rights. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2000.

Dees, Jesse Walter, and James S. Hadley. Jim Crow. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ann Arbor, 1951.

Franklin, John Hope, and Alfred A. Moss. From Slavery to Freedom: A History of Negro Americans. New York: Knopf, 1980.

Gilmore, Glenda Elizabeth. Gender and Jim Crow: Women and the Politics of White Supremacy, 1896–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Kennedy, Stetson. Jim Crow Guide to the U.S.A.: The Laws, Customs, and Etiquette Governing the Conduct of Non-whites and Other Minorities as Second-Class Citizens. London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1959.

Litwack, Leon F. Trouble in Mind: Black Southerners in the Age of Jim Crow. New York: Knopf, 1998.

Woodward, C. Vann. The Strange Career of Jim Crow. New York: Oxford University Press, 1955.

Johnson, Charles Spurgeon

Charles S. Johnson—along with W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, and Alain Locke—was an important black American promoter and patron of black essayists, graphic artists, fiction writers, and poets (both male and female) of the Harlem Renaissance.

Johnson was born, raised, and educated in Virginia. He had established himself as a major researcher and sociologist after his graduate studies at the University of Chicago from 1917 to 1918 (although he did not receive a doctorate from that university), before moving to Harlem in 1921. His reputation rested primarily on his immeasurably valuable contribution to a report by the Chicago Commission on Race Relations: The Negro in Chicago: A Study of Race Relations and a Race Riot, published in 1922. This careful, detailed 672-page study, which was funded by the philanthropist Julius Rosenwald, described the underlying causes of the bloody and disastrous riot that had taken place in Chicago during the “red summer” of 1919—foremost among them the “great migration” and the subsequent dislocations that resulted from the influx of black southern migrants in the North. The study also offered recommendations for a public policy that would prevent the recurrence of such rioting. Johnson had been appointed only associate executive secretary of the commission (the executive secretary was Graham Romeyn Taylor, the son of the "social gospel" prophet Graham Taylor); but Richard Robbins (1998) has concluded that Johnson wrote "at least seven" of the chapters in the study. The work, Robbins has also noted, "was a striking document for its time, whatever the criticism of its caution in coming to terms with the part played by the white power structure in sustaining discrimination."

Of more significance for the Harlem Renaissance is the fact that, while Johnson was enrolled in the graduate program in sociology at the University of Chicago, he was influenced by Robert E. Park, one of the nation's most distinguished students of sociology and the leading authority on race relations. From Park, as Wintz (1988) has noted, Johnson adopted the concept of the "marginal man," a concept first applied by Park's close friend and colleague at Chicago, William I. Thomas. To Johnson, the concept meant that African Americans were caught between their indigenous folk culture in the rural South and the urban industrial culture to which they migrated. Blacks were segregated and discriminated against in urban industrial areas; Johnson felt that it was essential to enhance their self-esteem by educating them about and preparing them to appreciate the distinctive value not only of their urban culture but also their indigenous folk culture. Furthermore, as Hutchinson has observed, Johnson thought that the press could nourish the "growth of a communal African American consciousness, which was a necessary stage in the development of an integrated America," as well as "create a national New Negro community" (1995, 179–180). In other words, through the revitalization of their folk culture, black Americans would be able to become more cohesive in the struggle for their inevitable integration into the American mainstream in the distant future.

In 1921, Johnson moved from Chicago to New York City, where he headed the research team of the National Urban League and founded and edited its monthly, Opportunity: The Journal of Negro Life, which he brought out during the years 1923–1928. Johnson was always committed to publishing articles containing political and socioeconomic data that he made accessible to sophisticated laypeople; he soon also turned to publishing essays, poetry, and short fiction by black writers who were then still unknown, such as Countee Cullen, E. Franklin Frazier, Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, Nella Larsen, and Eric Walrond. Furthermore, during what Hurston called the "Negrotarian" phase of the Harlem Renaissance, Johnson developed a structure for Opportunity's literary awards, which were presented at banquets in 1925 and 1926.

Johnson left New York in 1926 to become head of the department of sociology at Fisk University in Nashville, and subsequently became its first black American president. He continued to be a vital presence in the "New Negro" movement, however, publishing what is now a classic work of the Harlem Renaissance, the anthology Ebony and Topaz. It contained semi-popular sociology by such experts on race and race relations as E. Franklin Frazier, Ellsworth Faris, Ira D. A. Reid, and Edward B. Reuter, and creative work by Arna Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Rudolph Fisher, Zora Neale Hurston, James Weldon Johnson, Claude McKay, and several others; it rivals Alain L. Locke's The New Negro as a major manifesto of the 1920s.

Johnson was admired by many writers and graphic artists who credited him with having ignited the Harlem Renaissance: Bontemps, Hughes, Hurston, and the painter Aaron Douglas praised him highly. Hughes's statement that Johnson "did more to encourage and develop Negro writers during the 1920s than anyone else in America" (quoted in Lewis 1981, 125) indicates the respect that Harlem's black intellectuals paid to Johnson. During the 1920s, few people dared to criticize Johnson publicly.

During the past three decades, however, historians such as David Levering Lewis, Cary Wintz, and George Hutchinson have subjected Johnson to critical scrutiny, especially regarding whether or not he was a proponent of art for art's sake and whether he was a pluralist or an integrationist. Lewis argues that Johnson promoted unknown black artists primarily because art, in contrast to skilled labor, offered a path to upward mobility and could be used as a "weapon against old racial stereotypes." According to Lewis, Johnson assumed that black artists could acquire a power equivalent to economic power and thereby "redeem through art . . . the standing of his people" (1981, 48). That is, for Johnson art was utilitarian: its function was to elevate black people to first-class citizenship so that they would eventually be integrated into American society.

Wintz, though, finds Johnson far more enigmatic. He believes that Johnson was enthusiastic about the work of young black artists primarily because of their realistic appraisal of the black experience: "They were investigating through their literature the very issues that Johnson had identified as crucial to the understanding of the black experience through his studies in sociology and his work in the Urban League" (1988, 122). According to Wintz, Johnson saw the Harlem Renaissance as an avenue by which blacks could gain acceptance into the American mainstream. Yet, despite his preoccupation with the "political and social position" of blacks in American letters, Johnson (unlike W. E. B. Du Bois) did not advocate art as propaganda, and he supported the artistic freedom of blacks. In short, Johnson regarded black artistic expression as a means to achieve integrationist ends.

Charles S. Johnson, photographed by Bachrach. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Hutchinson takes a position between Lewis's depiction of Johnson as a pluralist and Wintz's depiction of Johnson as an integrationist. Hutchinson argues that the development of a "New Negro aesthetic" was a vital part of Johnson's vision for achieving an "art for life" adequate to the needs of black Americans and also for achieving the "integration and spiritual invigoration of a pluralistic and truly American civilization" (1995, 59–60). Thus Hutchinson describes Johnson as a proponent of a "pragmatist" aesthetic theory that sought to achieve pluralistic integration.

Despite the controversies surrounding Johnson's motivations and his theory of art, we do know that he saw art as a means of accomplishing a larger purpose: integration. After five years at the center of the artistic activities of the Harlem Renaissance, Johnson returned to the South in order, once again, to use social science to affect public policy in reference to blacks.

Biography

Charles Spurgeon Johnson was born 24 July 1893. He studied at Wayland Academy, Richmond, Virginia; Virginia Union in Richmond (A.B., 1916); and the University of Chicago (Ph.B., 1917). He was employed at the Chicago Commission on Race Relations, 1919–1921; and the National Urban League in New York, 1921–1928. He was the founder and editor of Opportunity in 1923–1928. He taught at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, 1928–1947; and was its president from 1947 to 1956. Johnson died on 27 October 1956.

VERNON J. WILLIAMS

See also Bontemps, Arna; Cullen, Countee; Douglas, Aaron; Ebony and Topaz; Fisher, Rudolph; Frazier, E. Franklin; Great Migration; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, James Weldon; Larsen, Nella; McKay, Claude; National Urban League; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Walrond, Eric

Selected Works

- The Negro in Chicago*. 1922.
- Ebony and Topaz*. 1927.
- The Negro in American Civilization*. 1930.
- A Preface to Racial Understanding*. 1936.
- Shadow of the Plantation*. 1934.
- Growing Up in the Black Belt*. 1941.
- To Stem This Tide*. 1943.
- Education and the Cultural Process*. 1951.

Further Reading

- Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Johnson, Charles Spurgeon

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Robbins, Richard. Sideline Activist. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Johnson, Fenton

Fenton Johnson was born in 1888 in Chicago. He went through the public school system there and attended Chicago University. After teaching for one year, Johnson moved on to work as a writer, poet, reporter, editor, publisher, and activist. Although he was involved in the literary circles of Chicago, Johnson remained distanced from his African American peers, and his poetry also remained somewhat distant. Some critics would argue that Johnson's new poetic style linked him more directly with the emerging white poets of the time, such as Carl Sandburg. Because Johnson used dialect in his poetry, however, some critics align him with black poets such as Paul Laurence Dunbar and Claude McKay. Still others place Johnson at the vanguard of the Harlem Renaissance, or they even believe that he stands alone as a precursor or an adjunct.

Actually, because of his time, location, style, and subject matter, it is difficult to place Johnson in the period or in the movement. While in Chicago, he was removed from Harlem and the growing number of black artists who began to congregate there between the turn of the twentieth century and World War I. Yet it was during this time that Johnson published three volumes of poetry: A Little Dreaming (1913), Visions of the Dusk (1915), and Songs of the Soil (1916). He also published works in the magazines Crisis and Poetry. He started The Favorite Choice, which first appeared on 17 August 1918 as "the first and only weekly magazine published by and for colored people" and went under three years later. Johnson was the editor and writer for most if not all of Favorite Choice. In 1920, Johnson published a collection of short stories, Tales of Darkest America, and a collection of essays, For the Highest Good. By the time the Chicago renaissance developed and was in full stride, between 1935 and 1950, Johnson seems to have disappeared.

The focus of much of Johnson's work is the common man. Like Dunbar and McKay, Johnson wrote some verse in dialect, particularly in his third volume, Songs of the Soil. Yet within this collection and even more so in the two earlier collections, Johnson wrote in a style akin to the emerging "new poetry" of the era; his style was new in its free form, with irregular rhythm and rhyme schemes, as well as in his use of plain speech. The result was his unique position relative to the emerging periods and movements. He portrays the real world in simple, direct language, and a sense of bitterness and disillusionment permeates his poetry—as is perhaps best revealed in "Tired." Johnson's sense of despair preceded that of the Harlem Renaissance. Another common theme is Ethiopia as a place of origin, or refuge, or both. Celebrating black culture, artists often incorporated different locations within Africa as the homeland or as an idyll. Johnson, whose racial consciousness is mixed with a radical and different poetic voice, demonstrates the struggle of the black artist in the early twentieth century.

Biography

Fenton Johnson was born in Chicago on 7 May 1888 and was educated in the public school system there, and at Chicago University. He taught for one year before becoming a writer, poet, reporter, editor, publisher, and activist in Chicago. Johnson died in 1958.

BROOKE CARLSON

See also Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 3—Chicago and the Midwest

Selected Works

A Little Dreaming. 1913.

Visions of the Dusk. 1915.

Songs of the Soil. 1916.

For the Highest Good. 1920.

Tales of Darkest America. 1920.

Further Reading

Bell, Bernard W. "Fenton Johnson." In Dictionary of American Negro Biography, ed. Rayford Logan and Michael R. Winston. New York: Norton, 1982.

Chapman, Abraham. Black Voices: An Anthology of Afro-American Literature. New York: Mentor, 1968.

Creadick, Anna. "Fenton Johnson." Appalachian Journal: A Regional Studies Review, 22(2), Winter 1995.

Cullen, Countee, ed. Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Black Poets of the Twenties. New York: Harper, 1927.

- Harrington, Joseph. "A Response to Lisa Wooley." Langston Hughes Review, 14(1–2), Spring–Fall 1996.
- Hayden, Robert, ed. Kaleidoscope: Poems by American Negro Poets. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and World, 1967.
- Hutchinson, James P. "Fenton Johnson: Pilgrim at the Dusk." Studies in Black Literature, 7(3), 1976.
- Hughes, Langston, and Arna Bontemps, eds. The Poetry of the Negro, 1746–1949: An Anthology. New York: Doubleday, 1949.
- Johnson, James Weldon, ed. The Book of American Negro Poetry. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and World, 1922.
- Kreymborg, Alfred, ed. Others for 1919. New York: Nicholas L. Brown, 1920.
- Long, Richard A., and Eugenia W. Collier, eds. Afro-American Writing: An Anthology of Prose and Poetry, 2nd enlarged ed. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1985.
- Schafer, William J. "The Bridges of Fenton Johnson." Appalachian Journal: A Regional Studies Review, 22(2), Winter 1995.
- Wooley, Lisa. "From Chicago Renaissance to Chicago Renaissance: The Poetry of Fenton Johnson." Langston Hughes Review, 14(1–2), Spring–Fall 1996.

Johnson, Georgia Douglas

Georgia Douglas Johnson is often considered the first black female poet of the twentieth century, preceded in popularity only by the nineteenth-century poet Frances Harper. Of Johnson's four collections of poetry, three were published or received recognition during the Harlem Renaissance: The Heart of a Woman and Other Poems (1918), Bronze: A Book of Verse (1922), and An Autumn Love Cycle (1928). All three were published at Johnson's own expense, since she had been unable to obtain financial support or find a commercial publisher.

Johnson was born in Atlanta, Georgia; her father was George Camp and her mother (whose maiden name she later took) was Laura Douglas Camp. Johnson spent her early years in Rome, Georgia; after her parents separated, she moved to Atlanta with her mother. She studied at Atlanta University and later taught school for nearly a decade. She married attorney and politician Henry Lincoln Johnson on 28 September 1903; the Douglasses had two sons, Henry Lincoln Jr. (1906–c.1990) and Peter Douglas (1907–1957) before relocating to Washington, D.C., in 1910. During these "silent" years—despite the disapproval of her husband, who believed "a woman should take care of her home and her children and be content with that" (Hull 1987, 159–160)—Georgia Johnson fine-tuned her craft, often drawing on her musical background; she wrote several poems that she sang for visiting friends, and she frequently published poems as well as children's stories in magazines such as The Liberator, The Messenger, The Crisis, and Opportunity. She also became very active socially and politically, occasionally speaking on topics concerning women and minorities.

The appointment of Henry Johnson Sr. to a four-year term as recorder of deeds by President William Howard Taft in 1912 had propelled the Johnsons into a black social elite. After her husband's death in 1925, Johnson remained socially prominent, opening her home at 1461 S Street in northwest Washington, D.C., to literary figures such as Gwendolyn Bennett, William Stanley Braithwaite, Countee Cullen, W. E. B. Du Bois, Jessie Fauset, Waldo Frank, Zona Gale, Angelina Weld Grimké, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, James Weldon Johnson, Vachel Lindsay, Alain Locke, Alice Dunbar Nelson, Richard Bruce Nugent, Anne Spencer, Wallace Thurman, and Jean Toomer; as well as to some social and political figures. During these Saturday soirées, her guests would share their most recent works. Johnson would later call her home "Half-Way House" because she considered herself "half-way between everybody and everything and I bring them together" (Shockley 1988, 350).

The years following her husband's death, although difficult for Johnson, had a liberating effect on her literary career. On the one hand, she had to assume the financial burden of maintaining a home and sending her two sons to college, which restricted the amount of time she could devote to writing. On the other hand, she had more creative freedom, since she no longer needed to contend with the silent disapproval of her spouse.

Johnson said that William Stanley Braithwaite had inspired her to write poetry; because she was influenced by him, critics have generally classified her raceless poetry as "genteel." In addition, Johnson's lyricism and her exploration of love and femininity have frequently led critics to compare her poetry to that of Sara Teasdale. By 1922, however, when Johnson published her second volume, Bronze: A Book of Verse, it became evident that she had been affected by the spirit of the Harlem Renaissance and its emphasis on racial consciousness.

As its title suggests, Bronze (unlike her first collection) exposed not the heart of all women but the heart of the "colored" woman. Johnson would later explain that “some one said—she has no feeling for the race. So I wrote Bronze—it is entirely racial” (quoted in Hull 1987, 160). Present-day scholars and biographers have tended to consider this volume Johnson’s weakest, owing to its “obligatory” conception. However, critics of her time, such as W. E. B. Du Bois in his introduction to Bronze, commended Johnson for her “revelation of the soul struggle of the women of a race.” Nevertheless, in her third collection, An Autumn Love Cycle, which includes the frequently anthologized poem “I Want to Die While You Love Me,” Johnson reverted to the raceless themes she had explored in The Heart of a Woman. Some critics, such as Dover (1952), preferred a concentration on racial awareness and considered Johnson’s decision unfortunate; but others considered An Autumn Love Cycle Johnson’s strongest collection. Dover acknowledges that this volume expresses “the aching maturity of a sensitive woman in her forties” (1952, 634).

Johnson worked in other genres besides poetry. From 1926 to 1932 she wrote “Homely Philosophy,” a weekly newspaper column consisting of tidbits of wisdom; it was syndicated to some twenty Negro publications. She also wrote plays during this time, under the influence of Zona Gale (the writer to whom An Autumn Love Cycle is dedicated). Johnson is said to have written twenty-eight scripts, but most of these were destroyed by workers clearing away her home after her death in 1966. Johnson’s published dramas represent the social problems and themes with which she was concerned: lynching (A Sunday Morning in the South, c. 1925), miscegenation (Blue Blood, 1926), folk culture (Plumes, 1927), and history (Frederick Douglass, 1935; William and Ellen Craft, 1935). Johnson was an undoubtedly skillful dramatist. Blue Blood received honorable mention in Opportunity’s literary contest of 1926 and was performed later that year by the Krigwa Players of New York City; Plumes, her most famous play, received first prize the following year, firmly establishing her as a playwright.

Nevertheless, despite her other works, in 1950 Johnson would ask to be called the “mother of the Negro poets” (Tate 1997, xxxv). This seems appropriate, not only because of her willingness to provide a nurturing environment for budding writers, but also because of her own artistic talents and sensibilities.

Biography

Georgia Blanche Douglas Camp Johnson was born 10 September 1877 in Atlanta, Georgia. She studied at public and private schools there and in Rome, Georgia; at Atlanta University’s Normal School, 1893; at Oberlin Conservatory of Music in Ohio, 1902; and at Howard University, c. 1965. She taught and served as an assistant principal in the Atlanta school system, 1903; was a substitute teacher and librarian in the public schools in Washington, D.C., c. 1924; was a file clerk in the civil service, c. 1924; and was commissioner of Conciliation, Department of Labor, 1925–1934. She received an honorary doctorate from Atlanta University in 1965. Johnson died in Washington, D.C., 14 May 1966.

VERONICA ADAMS YON

See also Braithwaite, William Stanley; Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 9—Washington, D.C.; Krigwa Players; Opportunity Literary Contests; Salons; specific literary figures

Selected Works

- The Heart of a Woman and Other Poems*. 1918.
Bronze: A Book of Verse. 1922
A Sunday Morning in the South. c. 1925.
Blue Blood. 1926.
Plumes. 1927.
An Autumn Love Cycle. 1928.
Frederick Douglass. 1935.
William and Ellen Craft. 1935.
Share My World. 1962.
The Selected Works of Georgia Douglas Johnson, ed. Henry Louis Gates Jr. 1997.

Further Reading

- Brown-Guillory, Elizabeth. Wines in the Wilderness: Plays by African American Women from the Harlem Renaissance to the Present. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990.
Dover, Cedric. “The Importance of Georgia Douglass Johnson.” Crisis, 59, 1952.
Fletcher, Winona L. “Georgia Douglas Johnson.” In Notable Women in the American Theatre: A Biographical Dictionary, ed. Alice Robinson, Vera M. Roberts, and Milly S. Barranger. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1989.
Hull, Gloria. Color, Sex, and Poetry. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
Miller, Jeanne-Marie A. “Georgia Douglas Johnson and May Miller: Forgotten Playwrights of the New Negro Renaissance.” College Language Association Journal, 33(4), 1990.

- Shockley, Ann Allen. Afro-American Women Writers, 174–1933: An Anthology and Critical Guide. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1988.
- Stephens, Judith. "'And Yet They Paused' and 'A Bill to Be Passed': Newly Recovered Lynching Drama by Georgia Douglas Johnson." African American Review, 33(3), 1999.
- Tate, Claudia. "Introduction." In The Selected Works of Georgia Douglas Johnson, ed. Henry Louis Gates Jr. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.

Johnson, Hall

Hall Johnson, along with Eva Jessye, was a pioneer in the organization and development of professional concert ensembles. His great mission was to perform African American spirituals properly and meaningfully, without pretension but with beauty and simplicity, preserving the integrity of this music as it had developed during the era of slavery. His passion was to acquaint the world with the true and distinctive quality of spirituals. The objective of the Hall Johnson choirs, under his leadership, was to demonstrate how spirituals should be sung. These choirs became the first African American choral groups to win national and international distinction, and they had considerable influence. Many outstanding white choral directors, including Robert Shaw, came to the Harlem Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) to watch Johnson's Hall rehearsals.

Johnson had been trained professionally as an instrumentalist and had a significant role, in 1923, in organizing the Negro String Quartet, for which he played violin and viola alternately. (The other members of this quartet were Arthur Boyd and Felix Weir, violins; and Marion Cumbo, cello.) Johnson also played in orchestras led by James Reese Europe, in the orchestras of various Broadway musicals, and in Will Marion Cook's Southern Syncopated Orchestra. In these orchestras, he met many important jazz musicians and classical musicians of the Harlem Renaissance period. In 1925, Johnson organized his preeminent choral ensemble, the Hall Johnson Choir; its major goal was to perform, legitimately, the spirituals and folk music of African Americans.

Johnson composed a number of original art songs, including The Courtship (1956); these works were sung by such professional artists as Marian Anderson and Roland Hayes. However, he is especially noted for his arrangements of African American spirituals and folk songs, in which his intention was to honor the authenticity and beauty of the music in its original form and style. Johnson also composed several large works based on spirituals; one of these was his sacred cantata Son of Man (1946).

After Johnson moved to California in 1938, he organized the Festival Choir of Los Angeles, a group that was formed to sing in the film version of The Green Pastures. Johnson remained in California for a number of years, directing choruses in the films Lost Horizon, Way Down South, and Cabin in the Sky. He also organized the 200-voice Festival Choir of Los Angeles, among other community-based groups. In 1946, Johnson resettled in New York, where he organized the Festival Negro Chorus of New York.

In 1951, the State Department chose Johnson and the Hall Johnson Choir to represent the United States at the International Festival of Fine Arts in Berlin—probably the most prestigious honor to be bestowed on the ensemble. At this time the choir also made an extensive tour of major European cities. After returning to New York, Johnson inaugurated an annual concert series called "New Artists," featuring a number of promising young African Americans. Johnson died in 1970 after a long and productive career.

Biography

Francis Hall Johnson was born in Athens, Georgia, 12 March 1888. He received a B.A. degree from the University of Pennsylvania. Beginning in 1910, he played the violin professionally. He organized the Negro String Quartet (1923), the first Hall Johnson Choir (1925), the Festival Choir of Los Angeles (1938–1946), and the Festival Choir of New York (1946). He and his choir represented the United States at the International Festival of Fine Arts in Berlin (1951). His awards included two Holstein prizes (1925, 1927); the Harmon Award (1930); an honorary doctorate from the Philadelphia Academy of Music (1934); and the City of New York Handel Award (1970). Johnson died in New York City on 30 April 1970.

MALCOLM BREDA

See also Anderson, Marian; Cook, Will Marion; Europe, James Reese; Hayes, Roland; Jessye, Eva; Spirituals

Further Reading

- Carter, Marva Griffin. "Hall Johnson: Preserver of the Old Negro Spiritual." Master of Arts thesis, Boston University, 1975.
- Harris, Carl Gordon, Jr. "A Study of Characteristic Stylistic Trends Found in the Choral Works of a Selected Group of Afro-American Composers and Arrangers." Unpublished D.M.A. dissertation. University of Missouri at Kansas City, 1972.
- Johnson, Hall. "Notes on the Negro Spiritual." In Readings in Black American Music, 2nd ed., ed. Eileen Southern. New York: Norton, 1971.
- Roberson, Leroy Alfred. "Hall Johnson: A Biography and an Analytical Study of Selected Songs for Solo Voice and Piano." D.M.A. dissertation, University of Southern Mississippi, 1992.

Johnson, Helene

At age eighteen, Helene Johnson won first prize in a short-story competition sponsored by the Boston Chronicle. In 1926 she came to New York to study journalism at Columbia University; when she arrived in Harlem, she was nineteen years old.

Johnson was one of a group of young women who came to Harlem in 1926 and 1927, including Mae Cowdery and Johnson's cousin Dorothy West, and she was acknowledged as an important voice among the emerging young poets. Particularly after her poem "Bottled" was published in Vanity Fair in May 1927, Johnson was lionized and was considered a peer of the most promising young writers, such as Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen. She made such a favorable impression on Wallace Thurman that, in his novel Infants of the Spring (1932), which was otherwise savagely cynical, he portrayed her as having real talent and a freshness and naïveté that the rest of the characters had lost. Johnson won several honorable mentions in Opportunity's literary contests of 1925 and 1926 and second prize in 1927. Her poetry was also published in Fire!!, a short-lived journal edited by Wallace Thurman, Hughes, and Richard Bruce Nugent; and in the Anthology of Magazine Verse edited by William Stanley Braithwaite in 1927.

In New York, Johnson was in constant company with her cousin Dorothy West. The two became close friends with the young literary circle of the time. West and Johnson would become particularly good friends of Zora Neale Hurston, and even take over Hurston's apartment for a summer. After Cullen read "Bottled" to one of his audiences, Johnson sent him a packet of other work, writing, "you'll like them Countee, because one of them is a sonnet." Johnson, like Cullen, was deeply interested in Percy Bysshe Shelley and the Romantic poets; in Braithwaite's anthology, she listed Shelley, Alfred, Lord Tennyson, Walt Whitman, and Carl Sandburg as her primary influences. Her poem "Fulfillment," in fact, ends with the poet swearing to "die bleeding—consummate with Life," a phrase that is reminiscent of the line "I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!" in Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind." Many of Johnson's other poems dwell on the beauty of nature and contrast it with the harsh reality of human society.

Despite an auspicious beginning, Johnson never lived up to her early promise. Exactly why is hard to say, in part because she shrouded her life in extreme privacy. Until her death in 1995—well after interest in the women poets of the Harlem Renaissance had been revived—Johnson resisted publicity. Biographical details about her are so scarce that even her married name was not published until 1970. We do know that after 1929 she moved out of Harlem and fell into obscurity. She was still writing, however, and around that time she sent some of her new work to Cullen, but nothing came of it. Her work next appeared in print in Challenge, a journal edited by Dorothy West (later New Challenge). But that contribution amounted to only a handful of poems which were criticized in some quarters as showing no significant development. After these publications, until her death, Johnson lapsed into public silence, although she continued to write. Her later poems, along with others from the 1920s that had not been published at the time, were collected in This Waiting for Love (Mitchell 2000) along with an extensive introduction.

Biography

Helene Johnson was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on 7 July 1907, and brought up in Boston, where she lived at 470 Brookline Avenue and attended the Boston Clerical School. She attended Columbia University in 1926–1927, studying journalism. She won honorable mentions and an award in Opportunity's literary contests in 1925–1927; her poetry was published in Vanity Fair, Fire!!, and William Stanley Braithwaite's anthology. After 1929, she left Harlem and fell into obscurity, though her work appeared in Challenge and New Challenge. Johnson died in New York City on 6 July 1995.

STEVEN NARDI

See also Challenge; Cowdery, Mae Virginia; Cullen, Countee; Fire!!; Hurston, Zora Neale; Infants of the Spring; New Challenge; Opportunity Literary Contests; Thurman, Wallace; Vanity Fair; West, Dorothy

Selected Works

In Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets, ed. Countee Cullen. 1927.

In Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Maureen Honey. 1989.

Further Reading

Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1987.

Ferguson, Sally Ann H. "Dorothy West and Helene Johnson in Infants of the Spring." Langston Hughes Review, 2(2), 1983.

Mitchell, Verner D., ed. This Waiting for Love: Helene Johnson, Poet of the Harlem Renaissance. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2000.

Redmond, Eugene B. Drumvoices: The Mission of Afro-American Poetry. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor Doubleday, 1976.

Johnson, James P.

Although unheralded, even during his lifetime, outside a small group of jazz aficionados and performers, James P. Johnson was among the most important and versatile American musicians of the twentieth century. Johnson was an innovative and virtuosic performer of "stride," a style of piano playing that featured a vigorous left hand and lively melodies that was a foundation of jazz; a talented songwriter for musical theater during the 1920s and 1930s who wrote "The Charleston," the anthem of the jazz age; and a composer of classical works for piano and orchestra.

Johnson was exposed to a remarkable variety of music during his youth in New Jersey and New York.

He absorbed the music and culture of black migrants from the American southeast, featuring lively songs for folk dances. He also frequented clubs in New York where he heard great ragtime pianists. But Johnson listened to classical music as well, on recordings, in cafés, and at performances of the New York Symphony. While honing his phenomenal piano skills entertaining at clubs and parties during his teens, Johnson studied harmony and composition in the hope of someday writing "serious" music.

By the late 1910s, he was recognized as the dean of the New York stride pianists. Johnson's presence at a "rent party," a social event held to help tenants in need of rent money, guaranteed attendance among dancers and musicians alike. Through the release of several piano rolls beginning in 1917, Johnson's music began to attract wider attention, and his influence spread. "Carolina Shout" was introduced in this period and soon became the piece by which all other stride pianists were measured. Many young pianists, including Duke Ellington and Thomas "Fats" Waller, learned piano by slowing the action on player pianos that were performing Johnson's music and then fingering the automatically depressed keys. In 1921, Waller became a student and lifelong friend of Johnson's, thus guaranteeing that Johnson's innovations would spread to the numerous jazz musicians who performed with Waller.

During the 1920s and 1930s, although Johnson continued to develop and perform as a pianist, he expanded into new musical territory. Beginning with Runnin' Wild, which made "The Charleston" a national sensation, and then in Keep Shufflin', his most important collaboration with Fats Waller, he emerged as one of the premier songwriters for black musical theater. He also began to explore compositions using classical forms. Among composers writing in popular idioms, Johnson was most committed to the ideal expressed by leaders of the Harlem Renaissance that African American music achieved its highest expression in orchestral, chamber, or traditional vocal compositions. With a performance at Carnegie Hall of his Yamekraw: A Piano Rhapsody—and with numerous concerts that included his orchestral works—Johnson fulfilled his lifelong ambition to write "serious" music.

Johnson always shunned the showmanship favored by many of his colleagues in jazz, and he worked increasingly in classical forms when most jazz musicians were moving toward swing bands; as a result, he virtually ensured his own obscurity. Yet his crucial jazz innovations, his versatility as a composer and performer, and his influence on generations of pianists must give him a place among the leading American musicians of the twentieth century.

Biography

James Price Johnson was born 1 February 1894 in New Brunswick, New Jersey. He was educated in public schools in New Jersey and New York City; studied piano with his mother Josephine Johnson, Ernest Green, and Bruto Giannini; and studied composition with Jan Chiapusse at Toledo University, 1919. Pianists who influenced Johnson include Eubie Blake, Luckeyeth "Lucky" Roberts, and Richard "Abba Labba" McLean. Johnson had jobs as a dancer, vaudevillian, and nightclub performer in New York City and in Jersey City, Newark, and Atlantic City, New Jersey, 1912–1914; and he performed with James Reese Europe's Clef Club musicians, 1914–1920. Johnson's first published song was "Mamma's and Pappa's Blues," with his songwriting partner William Farrell, 1917; he cut piano rolls for Aeolian and other companies, 1916–1920; he made a tour of the east coast with Smart Set Revue, a black vaudeville show, 1918; he cut piano rolls for QRS Music, including "Carolina Shout," 1921; he was a mentor to Thomas "Fats" Waller, 1921; his first recorded performance, accompanying the singer Alice Leslie Carter on the Arto label, was in 1921; also in 1921, he made his first recording for Black Swan, "Harlem Strut"; he was musical director for Plantation Days, a touring revue in the United States and London, 1922–1923; he was an accompanist for singers including Eva Taylor, Spencer Williams, Bessie Smith, and Ethel Waters, 1920s; he performed at rent parties, nightclubs, and socials, 1920s–1940s; he contributed to black musicals, including Runnin' Wild (1923) and Keep Shufflin' (1928); his Yamekraw: A Negro Rhapsody (performed by Fats Waller) had its debut at Carnegie Hall in 1928; he performed in "From Spirituals to Swing" at Carnegie Hall in 1938 and 1939; the first performance of his blues opera, The Organizer (with libretto by Langston Hughes), was in 1940; "Jazzfest and Pop Concert Presenting James P. Johnson: Composer-Pianist" was presented at Carnegie Hall in 1945. Johnson was a member of ASCAP (1926). He died in New York City, 17 November 1955.

WILLIAM J. NANCARROW

See also Ellington, Duke; House-Rent Parties; Jazz; Musical Theater; Runnin' Wild; Waller, Thomas "Fats"

Selected Works: Musicals

Plantation Days. 1922–23, 1925. (As music director.)
Runnin' Wild. 1923. (With Cecil Mack.)
Negro Nuances. 1924. (With Sidney Bechet, Will Marion Cook, and Abbie Mitchell.)
Moochin' Along. 1925. (With Cecil Mack and Jessie Shipp.)
Keep Shufflin'. 1928. (With Fats Waller, Andy Razaf, and Harry Creamer.)
Messin' Around. 1929. (With Perry Bradford.)
Shuffle Along of 1930. (With Fats Waller.)
Harlem Hotcha. 1932. (With Andy Razaf.)
Policy Kings. 1938.

Other Works

"Carolina Shout." 1917.
"Charleston." 1923.
Yamekraw: Negro Rhapsody. 1927. (Premiere 1928.)
"Snowy Morning Blues." 1927.
"Sippi." 1928.
Saint Louis Blues. 1929. (Film soundtrack; as musical director.)
"You've Got to Be Modernistic." 1930.
Harlem Symphony. 1932. (Orchestral work.)
"Hungry Blues." 1939.
The Organizer. 1939. (One-act blues opera with libretto by Langston Hughes.)

Further Reading

Blesh, Rudi, and Harriet Janis. They All Played Ragtime, 4th ed. New York: Oak, 1971.
Brown, Scott E. James P. Johnson: A Case of Mistaken Identity. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, and Institute of Jazz Studies, Rutgers University, 1986.
Hammond, John. "Talents of James P. Johnson Went Unappreciated." Down Beat, 28, December 1955.
Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Spreadin' Rhythm Around: Black Popular Songwriters, 1880–1930. New York: Schirmer, 1998.
Kirkeby, W. T., ed. Ain't Misbehavin': The Story of Fats Waller. New York: Da Capo, 1975.

Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. Oxford, U.K., and New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Johnson, James Weldon

To consider the career—or more properly the careers—of James Weldon Johnson is to throw a spotlight on someone who characteristically shunned the spotlight. Johnson was arguably the most versatile of all the figures associated with the Harlem Renaissance, and he blended quiet integrity, forceful ideas, and natural modesty. He crowded into sixty-seven years a series of remarkable achievements—as educator, lawyer, diplomat, poet, essayist, novelist, and songwriter—that would seem to require several lifetimes.

Johnson was born on 17 June 1871, the first son of Bahamians who had immigrated to Jacksonville, Florida. His mother, the former Helen Louise Dillet, was a schoolteacher who instilled in Johnson and his brother, John Rosamond Johnson, a love of learning, with special interests in reading, drawing, and music. His father, James Sr., held a secure position of middle-class respectability as the headwaiter at a resort hotel, the Saint James. Both parents were hard workers, and both were civic minded. The family was unusual compared with many southern African Americans; it was an educated, cultured, and financially secure household. In comparison with many of the writers and artists who led the Harlem Renaissance, Johnson could arguably be said to have come from a privileged background.

Such opportunities smoothed the way for future success, but it would be a mistake to think that Johnson had a path free of obstacles throughout his life. He had to contend with virulent racial prejudice; to his great credit, he made the project of eradicating it his life's work.

As a youth he attended the Stanton School in Jacksonville, a segregated institution where his mother taught and where he learned much under the demanding tutelage of its principal, James C. Walter. Johnson graduated from Stanton in 1887, at the age of sixteen, and left the area to attend the preparatory division of Atlanta University (later Atlanta Clark University), because the high schools in Jacksonville were closed to African Americans. Two years later, he graduated from the preparatory division and entered the freshman class at Atlanta. He excelled in all his subjects, especially writing and speech. He began to write poems on African American themes (mostly dialect verse, which was the accepted mode for black poetry at the time), and in 1891 he won the university's prize for oratory for his address, "The Best Methods of Removing the Disabilities of Caste from the Negro."

The material in that speech was derived largely from Johnson's experiences during his summers when he taught school in rural Henry County, Georgia, and witnessed much that revealed to him the racial inequities in the United States—incidents that he later recalled in his autobiography, Along This Way (1933). The unspoken attitude of many whites on encountering "a strange Negro on a backcounty road" reminded him that he was "not entirely secure, not even in daylight." From that point on, he made it his life's philosophy that he "would not allow one prejudiced person or one million or one hundred million to blight my life. I will not let prejudice or any of its attendant humiliations and injustices bear me down to spiritual defeat. My inner life is mine, and I shall defend and maintain its integrity against all the powers of hell."

Johnson graduated from Atlanta University in 1893 with honors. Wanting to help improve the struggles and aspirations of African Americans, he returned to Jacksonville to teach at Stanton, where he took over as principal one year later. He expanded the curriculum to include high school classes, and at the same time undertook heavy additional responsibilities when he founded, in 1895, the Daily American, the first African American newspaper. As its editor, Johnson quickly acquired an image in the southeast as a spokesperson for African American advancement, although its particular brand of "radicalism," derived from the conservative views of Booker T. Washington (whom Johnson agreed with more than he agreed with the more liberal W. E. B. Du Bois), seems mild by today's standards. The Daily American failed after only a year; Johnson had tried to keep it afloat almost single handedly, and its failure gave him his "first taste of defeat in public life." But the newspaper did bring him to the attention of Washington, Du Bois, and others—connections which would later serve him well in his work as a political activist.

Undeterred, and spurred on by his strident ambition, Johnson started to study law with the encouragement of a local white attorney, and in 1898 he passed the bar, becoming the first African American in Florida to do so since Reconstruction. He continued to administer the Stanton School and to write poetry while setting up a successful law practice in Jacksonville with a former classmate from Atlanta University.

Around this time, Johnson also began to try his hand at song writing. His brother, John Rosamond, had been a gifted musician from early boyhood and had gone to the New England Conservatory of Music. On graduation in 1897, Rosamond returned to Jacksonville, discovered that his brother had been writing poetry, and convinced him that the lyrics could be set to Rosamond's music. Their greatest composition was an early work that James Weldon Johnson had written for a celebration of Abraham Lincoln's birthday at Stanton School: "Lift Every Voice and Sing." The brothers published it and forgot it, but it lived on in the minds of Stanton's students, who taught it to other students throughout the South; some twenty years later, it was officially adopted by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) as the "Negro national anthem."

Their collaborative talents took the brothers out of Jacksonville and up to New York, where, at the turn of the century, they teamed with Bob Cole, a talented musician, to form a songwriting and producing trio. James Weldon worked in the background, supplying lyrics. Cole and Rosamond put together vaudeville material, which they performed onstage as "Cole and Johnson," placing them in the company of entertainers such as Will Marion Cook and Williams and Walker.

The Johnsons and Cole were enviably energetic and stunningly successful. Between 1901 and 1905, they composed some 200 songs for musical productions on Broadway and elsewhere. Their goal was to make the lyrics of Negro songs more sophisticated. The team's first collaboration was "Louisiana Lize," a love song written in a new lyrical style "which left out the watermelons, razors, and hot mamas typical of coon songs." For $50, they sold the singing rights to a popular white entertainer, May Irwin, who was known as a performer of coon songs. Irwin used it in her next show, The Belle of Bridgeport. Its success encouraged the team to experiment a bit, and they developed a successful method of collaboration in which they took turns writing words, composing melodies, and critiquing works in progress.

Under an exclusive three-year contract with the Broadway producers Klaw and Erlanger, the trio turned out many such songs, including such hits as "The Congo Love Song," "I've Got Troubles of My Own," "Tell Me, Dusky Maiden," "The Old Flag Never Touched the Ground," and "Oh, Didn't He Ramble."

Probably the most famous of these tunes was "Under the Bamboo Tree," which according to Rosamond had its origins in an unusual incident. He and Cole were walking uptown after a performance one day when he began to hum the African American spiritual "Nobody Knows the Trouble I've Seen." Hearing the song, Cole got the idea of rearranging it and working it into their act. When Rosamond objected that this was sacrilegious, Cole responded, "What kind of a musician are you anyway? Been to the Boston Conservatory and can't change a little old tune around." By the time Rosamond finally conceded, Cole had already written the words. "Under the Bamboo Tree" sold more than 400,000 copies, making it one of the biggest sellers ever. With James Weldon Johnson as their manager, the trio toured throughout the United States and also performed in Paris and London. Legend has it that "Under the Bamboo Tree" was the last thing they heard as they set sail from New York and the first thing they heard when they arrived in Paris.

Following their successful tour, Cole and Rosamond Johnson started their own theatrical company. In 1906, they produced and starred in a musical called The Shoo-Fly Regiment. After helping to write the songs for this show, James Weldon Johnson decided that it would be the last piece of work they would do together. Their song writing had been lucrative, netting them more than $25,000 a year in salary and royalties, but, as Johnson later reflected, "Success is a heady beverage" and "is safe only when it comes slowly." Their prosperity had been sudden, and Johnson had begun to feel that he was forsaking his avowed life's goal of helping to advance the ambitions of the race. He also found distasteful the tradition of the coon song within which he had to work as a writer, and even the dialect poetry he had earlier begun now seemed to him an inadequate form for expressing what he felt in his heart and thought in his mind. He had recently read Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass (1855), and he saw that his own earlier poems had relied on white stereotypes of the African American.

Johnson had accelerated his study of literature beginning in 1904, when he started to take courses in creative writing at Columbia University taught by Brander Matthews, the well-known critic and anthologist. At this time an idea for a novel began to gestate in Johnson's mind, an innovative statement on African American identity that would lay to rest much of the white-generated writing about black life of the nineteenth century. While he was working with Bob Cole and Rosamond, however, Johnson did not have the time to devote to the book; he shelved the idea until 1906, when he left the trio to enter the diplomatic service.

For some time, Johnson had been active in New York political circles. He had become treasurer of the city's Colored Republic Club in 1904. He had also become friends with Charles W. Anderson, the most influential black Republican in the city, who was in turn a close friend of Booker T. Washington. When the black civil rights leadership split into conservative and radical factions, Johnson backed Washington, who used his connections to have the Theodore Roosevelt administration appoint Johnson as the U. S. consul in Puerto Caballo, Venezuela. Such posts had often gone to writers, and traditionally they were considered little more than sinecures that gave the writer time to reflect and work on writing.

In 1909 Johnson assumed his post in South America, where he expected to have time to work on his book; his duties turned out to be unusually demanding, however, and he could not finish the book until 1911, after a year's leave of absence. The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, published anonymously in 1912, is arguably the central text of the Harlem Renaissance and by most reckonings one of the dozen key documents that best reflect the American experience. It tells the story of a light-skinned black man who drifts rather aimlessly throughout the South, then to New York, where he becomes involved with gambling and playing ragtime piano. Eventually he is "adopted" by a wealthy white man who takes him to Europe and broadens his musical abilities. On returning to the United States, the protagonist samples the life of the black middle class in different cities on the eastern seaboard, ending up in rural Georgia; after witnessing a lynching, he decides to return to the North and pass for white. The novel is a complex psychological portrait of a weak, self-indulgent man who is alienated by both races and ultimately succumbs to and is victimized by the racist values of American society. The novel created a stir in intellectual circles in New York, but Johnson did not admit that he was its author until 1927, when it was republished. Even then, after a well-documented public career, Johnson had to deny that the novel was based on his own life, and in fact he published Along This Way in part to set the record straight.

On leave in 1910, Johnson married Grace Nail, the daughter of a prosperous businessman in Brooklyn. He also took up a new consular post in Nicaragua, another difficult diplomatic assignment. In 1912, after much political turmoil in Nicaragua, U. S. troops landed at Corinto in response to an assassination and an attempted coup. When Woodrow Wilson, a Democrat, became president in 1914, Johnson resigned from the foreign service, citing race prejudice and the likelihood that party politics would bar him from securing a desirable new post.

Thus began the most famous and personally rewarding phase of Johnson's multifaceted public life: politics. He returned to New York to become an editorial writer for New York Age, the city's oldest and most distinguished black newspaper. Johnson's editorials were fiery and passionate, but they also reflected his basically conservative view that African Americans could improve their lot through self-education, hard work, and many of the middle-class white values that were the cultural norm.

In the summer of 1916, Joel E. Spingarn asked Johnson to attend the important Amenia Conference on racial issues, and a few months later Spingarn asked Johnson to become field secretary for NAACP, which had been organized in 1910 by blacks and whites in order to break down racial barriers. Johnson proved to be an immensely efficient administrator and an effective spokesperson for NAACP's platform. He organized local branches throughout the country and expanded the membership substantially. During his early tenure, he monitored and responded to the riots in East St. Louis, where 6,000 African Americans were driven from their homes; atrocities against black soldiers in World War I; the great Fifth Avenue March for civil rights; and the bloody race riots in Chicago and elsewhere during the "red summer" of 1919. The following year he went on an investigatory trip to Haiti and exposed the abuses of the American occupation there in a series of articles for The Nation.

The year 1920 also saw Johnson assume the role that destiny had seemed to carve out for him—general secretary, or chief executive, of NAACP. With typical modesty, Johnson claimed in his autobiography that he "got immense satisfaction" out of his work for NAACP, yet that understates his achievements by great lengths. In fact, it is difficult to single out for special mention one event that he orchestrated or one advance that was gained, so numerous were the organization's accomplishments during the decade when Johnson steered its course. Probably the most dramatic episode, though, was the attempt to get Congress to pass the Dyer antilynching bill in the summer of 1921, a measure behind which Johnson had placed the full force of NAACP and for which he had personally lobbied in the halls of the Capitol, literally camping out on the benches in front of senators' offices to wait for a chance to speak in its favor. The bill was defeated, but the campaign for its passage nevertheless brought the nation's attention to the issue of race prejudice as never before.

Throughout his years of political activism, Johnson was determined not to let his creative muscles atrophy, and he produced much literary work in the 1920s. For instance, he compiled three important anthologies of African American literature: The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922), The Book of American Negro Spirituals (1925), and The Second Book of American Negro Spirituals (1926). He also brought out a series of collections of verse, culminating with God's Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse in 1927. The book is a paean to the soulful richness of black Christianity—ironically so, since Johnson himself professed no religious faith except an optimistic dream of man's humanity to his fellow man and an acknowledgment of an unknowable spiritual presence permeating the material world.

Fatigued by his work in the political arena, Johnson left in 1930 to accept an appointment as a professor of creative writing at Fisk University, a position that gave him time to complete two more prose works: Black Manhattan (1930), a copiously researched but lively and engaging history of the African American presence in New York; and his autobiography, Along This Way (1933), a book of which John Hope Franklin has said, "It is impossible to understand the place of African Americans in the life of this country without Along This Way." The following year, some of the positions Johnson presented on race and politics in the autobiography were outlined in a slim volume called Negro Americans, What Now? At this time, he moved back to New York to become a professor of literature at New York University, where he remained until his death in an automobile accident in Maine in June 1938.

More than 2,500 people, black and white, filled the largest church in Harlem to attend Johnson's funeral, where, for more than an hour, a succession of the brightest and most celebrated figures of the era extolled his achievements. Even these eulogies seem inadequate, for Johnson lived so full a life, touching so many other people and influencing their thoughts and actions, that it may not be possible to gauge the degree to which he guided African Americans' awareness of their identity and of their place in American society. His greatest legacy may be that he lives on, not just in the histories of the NAACP, in the biographies of its members, or in the anthologies of African American literature, but in an unusually large number of books for children and adolescents that tell of a life grounded in the bedrock of unwavering moral principle. In the words of another African American writer, Johnson symbolized what it meant "to be gifted, young, and black. We must begin to tell our young, there's a world waiting for you, yours is the quest that's just begun."

James Weldon Johnson, c. 1900–1920. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

James Weldon Johnson was born in Jacksonville, Florida, 17 June 1871; his parents were James and Helen Louise Dillet Johnson. He studied at Stanton School; received an A.B. from Atlanta University, 1894; and did further study at Columbia University, 1903–1906. He was principal at Stanton School, 1893–1900. Johnson was founder and editor of the Daily American, 1895–1896. He received an honorary A.M. from Atlanta University, 1904. Johnson was U. S. consul to Venezuela, 1906–1908; and consul to Corinto, Nicaragua, 1909–1912. He married Grace Nail, 10 February 1910. He was a field secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 1916–1920; and its general secretary, 1920–1930. His awards included the following: Litt. D., Talladega College, 1917; Litt.D., Howard University, 1923; Spingarn Medal, 1925; Rosenwald Grant, 1929; an appointment as professor of creative writing, Fisk University, 1930; W. E. B. Du Bois Prize for Negro Literature, 1933; and Lewis Carroll Shelf Award for "Lift Every Voice and Sing," 1971. Johnson died in Wiscasset, Maine, 26 June 1938.

JAMES HUTCHISSON

See also Amenia Conference, 1916; Anderson, Charles; Antilynching Crusade; Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Black Manhattan; Cole, Bob; God's Trombones; Johnson, John Rosamond; New York Age; Spingarn, Joel

Selected Works

The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man. 1912. (Republished, 1927.)

Fifty Years and Other Poems. 1917.

"Self Determining Haiti." Nation, 111, August 1920, pp. 236–238, 265–267, 295–297, 345–357.

The Book of American Negro Poetry. 1922.

"Lynching: America's National Disgrace." Current History, 19 (January 1924): 595–601.

The Book of American Negro Spirituals. 1925.

The Second Book of American Negro Spirituals. 1926.

God's Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse. 1927.

Black Manhattan. 1930.

Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. 1933.

Negro Americans, What Now? 1934.

Further Reading

Fleming, Robert E. James Weldon Johnson and Arna Wendell Bontemps: A Reference Guide. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1978.

———. James Weldon Johnson. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1987.

Levy, Eugene. James Weldon Johnson: Black Leader, Black Voices. 1973.

Mason, Julian. "James Weldon Johnson: A Southern Writer Resists the South." CLAJ, 31(2), December 1987, pp. 154–169.

Oliver, Lawrence J., and Kenneth M. Price, eds. Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.

Wilson, Sondra Kathryn, ed. The Selected Writings of James Weldon Johnson, Vols. 1 and 2. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Johnson, John Arthur "Jack"

Jack Johnson was the first black man to win the world heavyweight boxing championship and is considered by many boxing enthusiasts to be the greatest heavyweight boxer of all time. More than a boxing legend, he symbolized open defiance to the unjust social order evident during the first half of the twentieth century.

Johnson was born into the first generation of free blacks in the United States. His father, a former slave, provided for the family admirably despite the limited opportunities afforded in Galveston, Texas. Galveston was an economically challenged city devastated by natural disaster and living under the yoke of the Jim Crow system. Essentially raised in poverty and with little formal education, Johnson turned to fighting as a means to transcend his constricted circumstances. He began fighting in degrading battle royals, which customarily featured numerous blacks against one another in a free-for-all to entertain white spectators. Around 1897, he began fighting professionally, experienced modest success, and earned a modest living.

By 1903, Johnson had developed as a boxer, winning the Negro heavyweight title from Denver Ed Martin in Los Angeles, in a twenty-round decision. He then focused on the world heavyweight champion, James J. Jeffries; but Jeffries, a white man, adhered to the established color line in professional fighting, which discouraged whites from fighting blacks. This was an age of prevalent racism, and blacks in the boxing world—like blacks in the larger society—were perceived by whites as inferior. As a result, Johnson's attempts to win the world heavyweight championship were frustrated. Circumstances changed, however, when Jeffries retired in 1904, amid a general lack of interest in boxing; the championship subsequently passed to other white boxers, first to Marvin Hart and then to Tommy Burns.

Burns, facing the problem of a declining sport, agreed to fight Johnson in 1908. The fight, which took place in Sydney, Australia, was stopped in the fourteenth round after Johnson had thoroughly punished the outmatched Burns. The color line had been broken, and a determined black man was the world heavyweight champion. White fans and sports commentators reacted to Johnson's victory by attempting to discount its significance, saying that boxing had deteriorated in recent years and that the best boxers were retired. But Johnson remained undaunted by the negative press, as was evident in his increasingly brazen attitude. When asked about the fight, Johnson discussed his opponent's athletic inferiority instead of offering the traditional commendation. Johnson was resolved, through his actions and his words, to defy American boxing as well as social etiquette. This was unsettling to the white community, which reacted with contempt for the new champion and demanded a match in which Johnson would be defeated and, presumably, the pseudoscientific theory of social Darwinism would be vindicated.

James J. Jeffries was called out of retirement as the "great white hope" to defeat and silence Johnson. Despite the protests of progressive reformers and the usual controversy surrounding a fight between a white and a black man, the match was held in Reno, Nevada, in 1910. Jeffries, previously undefeated, was the betting favorite; as the fight developed, however, it was apparent that he was outclassed. Moreover, Johnson demonstrated that he was more interested in humiliating Jeffries than in simply defeating him. He savored his victory as he physically punished and verbally taunted the helpless Jeffries. After Johnson had knocked Jeffries down three times in the fourteenth round (before this match, Jeffries had never been knocked down at all), the fight was stopped and Johnson retained his championship. The black community largely perceived Johnson's victory as a victory for all blacks; the white community reacted with malevolence and disdain, exasperated not only by the notion that a black man was the undisputed world champion but also by Johnson's arrogance. As a result, incidents of rioting and racial violence against blacks (including some murders) took place in many parts of the United States.

Johnson's lifestyle outside the ring further enraged whites. He was a wealthy entrepreneur who owned a prosperous nightclub, the Café de Champion in Chicago; he was also an egotist who flaunted his money, wearing flashy clothes and enjoying the high-life. The most intense controversy was centered on his public relationships with numerous white women at a time when miscegenation was considered taboo. Aside from the white girlfriends and prostitutes with whom he surrounded himself, Johnson married three white women: Etta Terry Duryea in 1911, Lucille Cameron in 1913, and Irene Marie Pineau in 1924. Even as he challenged white America, however, he realized that he was not immune to the nation's deep-seated racism.

White America, unable to defeat Johnson in the boxing ring, sought to defeat him through the judicial system. He was charged with violating the Mann Act, an outdated and infrequently applied federal law that prohibited the transportation of women across state lines for immoral purposes. In 1913, after a trial before twelve white male jurors, Johnson was found guilty, fined, and sentenced to a prison term of a year and a day. Rather than be imprisoned, he decided to flee the United States.

In exile, Johnson traveled through Europe, where he continued to fight. However, he encountered numerous difficulties including proposals to strip him of his title, financial troubles, and racism. In 1915, he journeyed to Cuba to defend his title against a white American, Jess Willard. In a match that is still controversial, Willard knocked Johnson out in the twenty-sixth round. Johnson, no longer the heavy-weight champion, continued boxing in Spain and then in Mexico. In 1920, he returned to the United States, where he was arrested and imprisoned for his earlier conviction.

Jack Johnson, c. 1910. (Library of Congress.)

After serving his prison term, Johnson returned to boxing, but his best years were behind him. He fought his last professional match in 1928. After that, he participated in exhibition matches and also did some acting, managing to earn a humble living. In 1946, Johnson died in a car crash near Raleigh, North Carolina.

Biography

John Arthur ("Jack") Johnson was born 31 March 1878 in Galveston, Texas. He had a limited elementary school education. He began professional boxing in 1897; won the Negro heavyweight boxing championship title from Denver Ed Martin on 3 February 1903; won the world heavyweight championship from Tommy Burns in December of 1908; defended the world heavyweight championship against James J. Jeffries on 4 July 1910; and lost the world heavyweight championship to Jess Willard on 5 April 1915. Johnson died near Raleigh, North Carolina, on 10 June 1946. He was inducted into the International Boxing Hall of Fame in 1954 and into the World Boxing Hall of Fame in 1980.

JOHN MARINO

See also Professional Sports and Black Athletes

Further Reading

- Batchelor, Danzil. Jack Johnson and His Times. London: Phoenix Sports, 1956.
- DeCoy, Robert H. The Big Black Fire. Los Angeles, Calif.: Holloway House, 1969.
- Farr, Finis. Black Champion: The Life and Times of Jack Johnson. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1969.
- Gilmore, Al-Tony. Bad Nigger: The National Impact of Jack Johnson. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat, 1975.
- Odd, Gilbert, ed. Jack Johnson: In the Ring and Out—The Classical Autobiography by the First Black Champion. London: Proteus, 1977.
- Roberts, Randy. Papa Jack: Jack Johnson and the Era of White Hopes. New York: Free Press, 1983.

Johnson, John Rosamond

John Rosamond Johnson was one of the most prolific composers and musicians of the early twentieth century and the Harlem Renaissance. He composed "Lift Every Voice and Sing" (the "Negro national anthem," 1900) and was also a successful arranger and vaudevillian. Rosamond changed the face of early black theater and was not only the first black composer to be signed by a white music company on Broadway (Joseph W. Stern, 1901) but also the first to compose music for white Broadway shows and conduct an all-white orchestra. He was among those who awakened interest in spirituals; he made arrangements of spirituals and published two volumes of these songs. Johnson studied for six years at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and was influenced by the nationalist composer Antonín Dvořák, who was then dean of the conservatory; Dvořák inspired Johnson's interest in black folk and popular traditions. As one of the few conservatory-trained musicians of the Harlem Renaissance, Johnson brought substance, style, and uniqueness to its music.

Johnson was introduced to musical theater in 1896, when he toured with John Isham's Oriental America; Isham had specifically recruited him because of his classical training and his familiarity with black popular rhythms. In 1897, Jackson returned to his hometown, Jacksonville, Florida, and began to give private piano lessons; he was also appointed music supervisor for the Jacksonville public schools. During that period Johnson (as composer) and his brother, James Weldon Johnson (as lyricist), wrote their first opera, Toloso. This was the beginning of a collaboration that would have a strong influence on musical theater. During the summer of 1899, the Johnson brothers traveled to New York and met some members of the black elite there: Harry Burleigh, Will Marion Cook, Paul Laurence Dunbar, George Walker, and Bert Williams—as well as Bob Cole, with whom they soon formed an alliance. On their return to Jacksonville, the brothers wrote "Lift Every Voice and Sing" to be sung by schoolchildren for a celebration of Abraham Lincoln's birthday in February 1900. The song became popular in schools throughout Jacksonville; was distributed as handwritten copies; was sung in black churches and schools, at graduation ceremonies, and at meetings of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) across the nation. By the 1920s it was being recognized as the "Negro national anthem." It was finally published by the Edward B. Marks Company in 1921.

In 1900 the Johnson brothers returned to New York, where they worked with Bob Cole. With John Rosamond Johnson as composer, James Weldon Johnson as lyricist, and Cole as arranger, they wrote four songs for the show Belle of Bridgeport and one for the show Rogers Brothers in Central Park. These songs began to earn them a reputation. In 1901—because of this initial success and also because a fire had devastated the Stanton School, where they had worked in Jacksonville—the Johnsons decided to move to Harlem. Rosamond and Bob Cole completed the musical Cannibal King, with a libretto by Paul Laurence Dunbar, and they continued to gain popularity in the theatrical community. Their musical style, with its syncopation, its sophistication, and its varied use of dialect, became so popular that they took a collection of songs to the publisher Joseph Stern, who signed a three-year contract with them. This arrangement, the first for any black composers, established their professional career. The two Johnsons and Cole began contributing songs to Broadway musicals such as Sleeping Beauty and the Beast; and in 1902 Rosamond composed one of their biggest hits, “Under the Bamboo Tree,” for the musical Sally in Our Alley. Its funny, catchy style and lyrics initiated a new type of popular music.

Also in 1902, John Rosamond Johnson and Bob Cole formed a vaudeville duo that soon became renowned as a “class act” because of their sophisticated charm and their avoidance of buffoonery. Johnson would often interject classical themes and art songs into their syncopated dance tunes, and he and Cole gradually overcame the image of the black minstrel entertainer and created a new image for future black performers. By 1903 they had become the hottest duo on Broadway. They enhanced their reputation with songs for the popular Broadway musicals Mother Goose and Humpty Dumpty.

In 1906 Johnson and Cole composed and performed their own first show, The Shoo-Fly Regiment, which included one of Johnson’s best songs, “L’il Gal,” based on a poem by Dunbar. After touring in the west and midwest with modest success, the show opened on Broadway on 3 June 1907, but it was unsuccessful there, evidently because Johnson and Cole were out of their usual element and because their show, unlike their songs, lacked the financial support and advertising that their publishers usually provided.

In their next show, Red Moon, based on an Indian theme, Johnson had his first stage role as a comedic actor. The show began in Delaware in 1908 and traveled throughout the northeast and midwest before coming to the Majestic Theater in New York in 1909. As a result of the financial hardships, the strenuous schedule, and the numerous setbacks of the touring season, Cole suffered a mental and physical breakdown; he died on 2 August 1911 in a boardinghouse in the Catskills, New York.

Johnson formed another vaudeville act, with Dan Avery and Charles Hart, and this trio became part of a revue in London in 1912. Oscar Hammerstein appointed Johnson as musical director of the London Grand Opera House; Johnson remained in England for two years. When he returned to New York in 1914, Johnson became the founder and music director of the Harlem Music School Settlement for Colored People. During World War I, he served as a second lieutenant with the National Guard’s Fifteenth Infantry. He returned to his musical and theatrical career in the 1920s, focusing more on black themes. His most notable contribution was The Book of American Spirituals in 1925, followed by The Second Book of American Spirituals in 1926. He had composed the arrangements, and James Weldon Johnson had provided the historical and musicological background, as well as an introductory preface.

Johnson turned to film in 1929, as conductor of a forty-voice choir for Saint Louis Blues, starring Bessie Smith. In 1933 he wrote the score for the film version of The Emperor Jones, starring Paul Robeson; this film was the first with a score by a black composer. Johnson continued to write songs for Broadway shows in the 1930s but primarily concentrated on collecting and arranging spirituals. In 1928 he appeared in a revue, American, which ran briefly; and in 1935 he acted in the original production of Porgy and Bess, as “Lawyer Frazier.” His last role as an actor was in 1940, in the film Cabin in the Sky, starring Ethel Waters.

Left to right: Bob Cole, James Weldon Johnson, and J. Rosamond Johnson, 1900s. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Biography

John Rosamond Johnson was born 11 August 1873 in Jacksonville, Florida. His parents were well educated and encouraged him and his brother, James Weldon Johnson, to read and study music. His father was a headwaiter at the Saint James hotel in Jacksonville and later became pastor of the Ebenezer Methodist Church; his mother was the first black woman to teach in a public school in Florida and was his first piano teacher. Johnson studied at the Stanton School in Florida and the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, 1890–1896. He was music supervisor of the Jacksonville public schools, 1897–1901; musical director of London’s Grand Opera House, 1912 (he married his childhood sweetheart, Nora Floyd, during his stay in London); musical director of the Harlem Music School Settlement for Colored People, 1914; and a second lieutenant in the National Guard’s Fifteenth Infantry in World War I. After the war he returned to his musical career, focusing on spirituals and eventually working in films. Johnson died in Harlem, 11 November 1954.

BRENDA ELLIS

See also Cole, Bob; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Emperor Jones, The; Fifteenth Infantry; Johnson, James Weldon; Musical Theater; Porgy and Bess; Saint Louis Blues; Spirituals

Selected Works

Toloso. 1898.

“Louisiana Lize.” 1899.

“Lift Every Voice and Sing.” 1900.

“Under the Bamboo Tree.” 1901.

The Shoo-Fly Regiment. 1906.

Further Reading

Caldwell, Hansionia L. African-American Music: A Chronology, 1619–1995. California: Ikoro Communications, 1996.

Floyd, Samuel, ed. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance: A Collection of Essays. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990.

Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Spreadin’ Rhythm Around: Black Popular Songwriters, 1880–1930. New York: Schirmer, 1998.

Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way. New York: Viking, 1933.

Johnson, James Weldon, and John Rosamond Johnson. The Books of American Negro Spirituals. New York: Viking, 1925, 1926.

Riis, Thomas. Just before Jazz: Black Musical Theater in New York, 1890 to 1915. New York: Smithsonian Institution, 1989.

Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of African American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.

———. The Music of Black Americans: A History. New York: Norton, 1983.

Johnson, Malvin Gray

In his short life, Malvin Gray Johnson, usually called Gray, became one of several artists whose work reflects the complexities of the Harlem Renaissance at its pinnacle. Johnson’s range of subjects was wide and included portraits and figures, Harlem street life, African American folklore, and Negro spirituals. His modernist-inspired style was characterized by vigorous brushwork, intense areas of color, flattened and angular forms, and a lack of painterly finish. His work has the subtlety, charm, and sensitivity of his African American contemporaries in the early years of the Harlem Renaissance. Along with Aaron Douglas, William H. Johnson, and Hale Woodruff, Johnson was among the numerous painters and sculptors of the early 1930s who created a truly African American art by combining the basics of early modern styles with distinctly African American subjects, themes, and concerns.

Johnson was born in 1896 in Greensboro, North Carolina. He moved to New York City as a young man and studied at the National Academy of Design with Francis Coates Jones in the 1920s. In order to survive financially, he worked as a commercial artist and did various menial chores. He first gained widespread recognition when, in 1929, he received the Otto H. Kahn Prize from the Harmon Foundation for his painting Swing Low, Sweet Chariot, which was reproduced on the cover of Crisis in February 1929.

In the next five years, Johnson built his reputation with many paintings of his typical themes. In 1933 he painted murals for the Public Works of Art Projects (PWAP). Critics responded to his works in various ways. While some admired the authenticity and sincerity with which he explored African American subjects, others disliked his quick, loose handling of paint and his modernist sensibility.

Johnson's finest portraits include his late Self-Portrait, Postman, and Negro Soldier, all from 1934. In the Self-Portrait, two African masks are seen behind the painter; they reflect his own countenance and allude to his African heritage at a time when this rediscovery was a broad concern of African American artists in the wake of the New Negro movement. In contrast, Postman is much less expressively curvilinear and more cubist in the description of forms. The Old Mill of 1934 is a vigorously painted cubist scene of rural industry. His Negro Masks is a sharply angular, dark-toned cubist still life of African tribal masks, a theme that African American artists of the era sometimes explored. Johnson's most compelling scenes of African American history and folklore include Roll Jordan, Roll (1930).

Johnson died suddenly at the age of thirty-eight, at the height of his career.

Biography

Malvin Gray Johnson was born 28 January 1896, in Greensboro, North Carolina. He studied at the National Academy of Design, New York City. He was awarded the Otto H. Kahn Prize, Harmon Foundation, New York, 1929, and was a member of the Society of Independent Artists. Johnson died 4 October 1934.

HERBERT R. HARTEL JR.

See also Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; Harmon Foundation; Johnson, William H.; Woodruff, Hale

Exhibitions

- 1928–1933, 1935: Harmon Foundation, New York City.
- 1934: Nicholas Roerich Museum, New York City.
- 1934: Corcoran Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.
- 1935: New Jersey State Museum, Trenton.
- 1936: Texas Centennial Exhibition, Museum of Fine Arts, Dallas.
- 1939: Baltimore Museum of Art.
- 1940: American Negro Exposition, Chicago.
- 1940: Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.
- 1943: Institute of Contemporary Art, Boston.

1971: Newark Museum, Newark, N.J.

1976: Los Angeles County Museum of Art.

Further Reading

- Driscoll, David. Two Centuries of Black American Art. New York and Los Angeles, Calif.: Knopf and Los Angeles County Museum of Art, p. 149.
- Henderson, Harry, and Romare Bearden. African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Lewis, Samella. African-American Art and Artists. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- Patton, Sharon F. African-American Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Powell, Richard J. Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- Reynolds, Gary. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1990, pp. 18, 23, 111, 114–116, 208–212.

Johnson, Noble

Noble Johnson was one of the most successful black supporting actors in Hollywood during the silent-film era and remained an important figure in film throughout his career. His career extended from 1914, when he filled in for an injured actor in a film produced by the Lubin Company, to 1950, when he appeared in North of the Great Divide as a Native American chief. During the 1920s—the period of the Harlem Renaissance—Johnson appeared in at least forty-five films. He officially retired in 1950, though he appeared again in an unmemorable black-and-white television movie, Lost Island of Kioga, in 1966. Johnson—who was 6 feet 2 inches tall, weighed more than 200 pounds, and was light skinned—is best known for playing formidable nonwhite characters, including Native Americans, Egyptians, Mexicans, and generic “exotics” (such as the chief on Skull Island in King Kong in 1933). Rarely did he have a role as an African American.

Johnson was raised on his father's ranch in Colorado Springs, where he trained race horses. He left in 1896 and traveled extensively in the American west, working as a cook and a cowboy, before involving himself with motion pictures with the Lubin Company on his return to Colorado Springs. During the next ten years, Johnson established himself as a bit actor with Universal Studios. In 1916, Johnson joined with his brother, George P. Johnson, and the actor Clarence Brooks to form the Lincoln Motion Picture Company (incorporated 1917), the first black-financed film company dedicated to producing all-black films. Noble Johnson was its (unsalaried) president and ran the studio in Los Angeles; George Johnson controlled marketing and distribution in Omaha, where he held a full-time job with the post office. The Lincoln Motion Picture Company produced three films—The Realization of a Negro's Ambition (1916), A Trooper of Troop K (1917), and The Law of Nature (1918)—all starring Noble Johnson, before Universal demanded that Noble Johnson discontinue his association with Lincoln to avoid a conflict of interest. Primarily, Universal feared Johnson's successes in acting with Lincoln and wanted him to discontinue race films. Rather than lose his secure career at Universal for the instability of a fledgling company, Johnson resigned from Lincoln in September 1918. Clarence Brooks succeeded him as Lincoln's president; in 1923, after only seven films, the company folded because of financial difficulties.

Johnson, sometimes billed in the black press as "the race's daredevil movie star," was consistently given roles commensurate with his stature. He remained apart from the demeaning stereotyped roles to which black actors were usually relegated; rather, he presented to African American moviegoers an image of power and professional success. The Chicago Whip declared in 1919, "Johnson is a fair actor . . . and we trust he some day will be allowed to play a stellar role" (Bowser and Spence 2000, 235). As it happened, Johnson's only leading roles were in his own pictures with Lincoln. Although he appeared in numerous films and played some significant characters, such as Uncle Tom in Topsy and Eva (1927) and Queequeg in Moby Dick (1930), his career at Universal never included any major roles. His success lay more in the sheer volume of his films.

Biography

Noble Johnson was born 18 April 1881 and was raised on his father's ranch in Colorado Springs. He left Colorado Springs in 1896, traveled in the West, and then returned to Colorado Springs and joined the Lubin Company. He became a bit actor with Universal Studios, formed the Lincoln Motion Picture Company with his brother George P. Johnson and Clarence Brooks in 1916, and (under pressure from Universal) resigned from Lincoln in 1918. During the 1920s and later he appeared in many films. The date of Johnson's death is unknown.

DAN MOOS

See also Brooks, Clarence; Film; Film: Actors; Film: Black Filmmakers; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Race Films

Selected Filmography

- The Eagle's Nest*. 1915. (As a stagecoach driver and an Indian.)
The Realization of a Negro's Ambition. 1916.
Intolerance. 1916. (As a chariot driver.)
A Trooper of Troop K. 1917.
The Law of Nature. 1918.
The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. 1921. (As Conquest, uncredited.)
Tracks. 1922. (As Leon Serrano and also wrote the scenario.)
The Loaded Door. 1922. (As Blackie Lopez.)
The Adventures of Robinson Crusoe. 1922. (As Friday.)
The Ten Commandments. 1923. (As the Bronze Man in prologue.)
The King of Kings. 1927. (As a chariot driver.)
Vanity. 1927. (As a ship's cook.)
Topsy and Eva. 1927. (As Uncle Tom.)
The Mysterious Dr. Fu Manchu. 1929. (As Li Po.)
Moby Dick. 1930. (As Queequeg.)
Murders in the Rue Morgue. 1932. (As Janos.)
The Mummy. 1932. (As the Nubian.)
King Kong. 1933. (As a native chief.)
The Son of Kong. 1933. (As a native chief, uncredited.)
Dante's Inferno. 1935. (As Devil, uncredited.)
The Plainsman. 1936. (As Indian, uncredited.)
Drums Along the Mohawk. 1939. (As Indian, uncredited.)
The Ghost Breakers. 1940. (As the zombie.)
Jungle Book. 1942. (As a Sikh.)
She Wore a Yellow Ribbon. 1949. (As Red Shirt.)

Further Reading

- Bowser, Pearl, and Louise Spence. Writing Himself into History: Oscar Micheaux, His Silent Films, and His Audiences. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film 1900–1942, 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Gaines, Jane M. Fire and Desire: Mixed-Race Movies in the Silent Era. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

Leab, Daniel J. From Sambo to Superspade: The Black Experience in Motion Pictures. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.

Richards, Larry. African American Films through 1959: A Comprehensive, Illustrated Filmography. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1998.

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1995.

Johnson, Sargent Claude

Sargent Claude Johnson was a visual artist who worked with great success in a range of media, producing lithographs, etchings, chalk drawings, large-scale murals, enamel metalwork, mosaic, and ceramics. Johnson made his artistic home in the Bay Area of California, rather than among the African American artists of the Harlem Renaissance. Nevertheless, he was a much-admired figure in the larger African American art world and won a number of awards in the influential shows sponsored by the Harmon Foundation. In 1935, the Harmon Foundation featured his work as part of a three-man exhibition at the Delphic Studios in New York City with the painter Malvin Gray Johnson and the sculptor Richmond Barthé, and he received an award for the wood polychrome Forever Free, now his most acclaimed work. This is a redwood sculpture covered with several coats of gesso and fine linen, sanded between layers. The piece is highly polished, with the flesh areas colored copper brown and the clothed portions painted black and white. The female figure looks obliquely upward, embodying strength and self-possession; at her feet she embraces and protects her young children.

Forever Free demonstrates an abiding preoccupation in Johnson's work: the relationship of the modern African American artist to his folk and African roots. The sculpture finds technical and stylistic inspiration in ancient Egypt, but Johnson is also inspired by ancient Asian, Mexican, and Native American plastic art. One can see in his work a relationship to west African tribal art, as well as to art deco, cubism, and the Mexican muralist tradition. His personal quest was to develop what he called, in 1935, a strictly Negro art; in common with other artists of the 1920s and 1930s, he took ideas from so-called primitive art. This engagement with nonwestern art led Johnson to spend time in Mexico, and through the 1940s he produced a number of pieces using the black clay of Oaxaca. One can also see the influence of a radically pared-down African style in the lithographs he produced in the late 1930s, which were inspired by his love of African American music. Lenox Avenue (1938) in particular evokes Harlem's most famous thoroughfare, through references to its musical and artistic output expressed as a clearly Africanist racial physiognomy.

Mask of a Girl, 1926, by Sargent Claude Johnson (1888–1967); copper repoussé, 9 by 6 by 2½ inches. (© The Newark Museum/Art Resource, N.Y. Collection of the Newark Museum, Newark, New Jersey, 92.108.)

Johnson continued to experiment with form and medium throughout his career. When the Works Progress Administration art project began in California in 1936, Johnson was hired, and the well-equipped studios gave him an opportunity to produce much larger works. Over the next few years he produced large-scale public projects. Later in the 1940s he worked with the Paine-Mahoney Company, producing massive porcelain enamel-on-steel murals and relief sculptures. In the 1950s he made a long visit to Japan. He continued to live in the Bay Area until his death in 1971. He stands as one of the most versatile artists to have come out of the Harlem Renaissance period.

Biography

Sargent Claude Johnson was born 7 October 1887 in Boston, Massachusetts. He attended public school in Worcester, Massachusetts, and the A. W. Best School of Art and California School of Fine Arts in 1915. He worked as a fitter for Schlussers and Brothers, 1917; and as a framer for Valdespino Framers, 1921. He was hired by the Works Progress Administration in 1936; he worked as a commissioned artist for the rest of his life. His awards included the following: Harmon Foundation; Otto H. Kahn Prize for Sammy, $250, 1927; Bronze Award, $100, 1929; Robert C. Ogden Prize, 1933; and San Francisco Art Association medals in 1925, 1931, 1935, 1938. Johnson died in San Francisco, 10 October 1967.

MARIA BALSHAW

See also Barthé, Richmond; Federal Programs; Harmon Foundation; Harmon Traveling Exhibition; Johnson, Malvin Gray; Works Progress Administration

Selected Exhibitions: Individual

- 1967: "Photos and Works by Sargent Johnson." San Francisco Negro Historical Society.
 1971: "Sargent Johnson—Retrospective." Oakland Gallery, California.

Selected Exhibitions: Group

- 1925–1931, 1933, 1935, 1937: Harmon Foundation Exhibitions of Negro Art.
 1935: Three-artist exhibition, Harmon Foundation, Delphic Studios, New York.
 1945: "The Negro Artist Comes of Age." Albany (New York) Institute of History and Art.
 1966: "The Negro in American Art." UCLA Fine Arts Gallery, Los Angeles.
 1970: "Dimensions of Black." La Jolla (California) Museum of Art.
 1997: "Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance." Hayward Gallery, London, and tour.

Further Reading

Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.

Patton, Sharon. African American Art. London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Powell, Richard. Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. London: Thames and Hudson, 1997.

Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance. London: Hayward Gallery; and Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Sargent Johnson: Retrospective. Oakland, Calif.: Oakland Museum, 1971.

Johnson, William H.

William Henry Johnson (1901–1970) was a major American artist of the twentieth century but has tended to be neglected. He was born in Florence, South Carolina. In 1918 he moved with his uncle to New York, where he underwent a rigorous training in art at the School of the National Academy of Design; he also studied at the Cape Cod School of Art, before relocating to Paris in 1926. In Europe, Johnson developed a turbulent style based on the paintings of Chaim Soutine, Edvard Munch, and Vincent Van Gogh, expressing his emotional reactions in exaggerated distortions and squeezing colors from the tube directly onto the canvas. After winning the Harmon Foundation Gold Medal in 1930, Johnson married Holcha Krake, a Danish tapestry weaver and ceramicist, and settled in Scandinavia for the next eight years.

In 1938, Johnson returned to Harlem and began to modify his expressionist style to depict scenes celebrating the black experience. Inspired by the work of Horace Pippin and Jacob Lawrence, Johnson simplified his painting, emphasizing flatness, heavy outlines, and jarring color contrasts in a style that has often been described as primitive, naïve, or folk oriented. Johnson painted a variety of subjects, from urban scenes of cafés and Harlem's nightlife, street musicians, and jitterbugs to rural scenes of farm life, chain gangs, churchgoers, and baptisms to biblical scenes and portraits. In the 1940s, Johnson's work became overtly religious and political, especially in his historical series Fighters for Freedom. Johnson was determined "to give, in simple and stark form, the story of the Negro as he has existed" (Powell 1991).

Johnson exhibited in several major shows and won accolades from both black and white critics, but his life then turned tragic: his wife died of cancer, and he himself began suffering the effects of a debilitating mental deterioration that eventually left him unable to work, confined to Central Islip State Hospital in New York for the remainder of his life. He had initially been considered one of the up-and-coming painters of the Harlem Renaissance; the strange circumstances of his illness, however, combined with a lack of gallery support, his expatriate status, and what many critics considered his stylistic fickleness, contributed to a widespread neglect of his art. This situation has been redressed only relatively recently, as several posthumous exhibitions returned Johnson to his status as a major black modernist.

William H. Johnson (1901–1970), Art Class, c. 1939–1940; oil on plywood. (© Smithsonian American Art Museum, Washington, D.C./Art Resource, N.Y.)

Taylor (1971) notes that Johnson's primitivism, eclecticism, and spirituality made him a "forceful and original" painter; Driskell (1987) has argued that, by integrating religious and social messages, Johnson "changed the course of artistic interpretations of Black American themes in Christianity" and "enlightened the Black community about their own history and heritage." Powell (1991) has attempted to redefine Johnson as a "world-class citizen" rather than as an isolated and tragic figure; according to Powell, Johnson's lifelong search for "home" imbued his work with a powerful empathy for "the folk life and the cultural expressions of marginalized peoples."

Johnson was a professed "primitive," and his work corresponds to similar attempts by artists of the Harlem Renaissance to capture the innate power and spirituality of the folk heritage of common people. With his brilliant sense of design, coupled with a strong sensibility for rhythmic color and form, Johnson was able to create powerful visual narratives of African American life that celebrated the New Negro's deep reservoir of spirituality and humanity.

Biography

William H. Johnson was born 18 March 1901 in Florence, South Carolina. He studied at the Wilson School for Negroes in Florence, 1907–1917; at the School of the National Academy of Design, New York, 1921–1923; at the Cape Cod School of Art in Provincetown, Massachusetts, under Charles Webster Hawthorne, 1924–1926; and at the studio of George B. Luks in New York City, 1926. Johnson taught at WPA/FDA, Harlem Community Arts Center, in 1939–1942. His awards included the Cannon Prize for Painting, School of the National Academy of Design, 1924 and 1926; the Hallgarten Prize for Painting, Cape Cod School of Art, 1925; a Harmon Foundation Gold Medal, 1930; and a Certificate of Honor, National Negro Achievement Day, 1942. Johnson was confined to Central Islip State Hospital in 1948–1970. He died 13 April 1970 of acute pancreatitis.

RANDALL SHAWN WILHELM

See also Artists; Lawrence, Jacob

Selected Exhibitions: Individual

- 1927: "William H. Johnson: Paintings." Students and Artists Club, Paris, France.
- 1928: "William H. Johnson." Galerie Alban, Nice, France.
- 1929: "Exhibition of Paintings by William H. Johnson." Peter White Public Library, Marquette, Michigan.
- 1930: "William H. Johnson." Trondheim (Norway) Art Society.
- 1931: "Paintings: William H. Johnson." Alma Reed Galleries, New York.
- 1932: "Tempera Paintings by William H. Johnson." Wakefield Gallery, New York.
- 1946: "William H. Johnson." 135th Street Branch, New York Public Library.
- 1957–1961: "William H. Johnson: An Artist of the Work Scene." (Traveled nationally.)

1971–1973. “William H. Johnson, 1901–1970.” National Collection of Fine Arts, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. (Posthumous; traveled to Africa and Europe.)

1982: “William H. Johnson: The Scandinavian Years.” National Museum of American Art, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. (Posthumous.)

Further Reading

Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson, eds. “William H. Johnson.” In A History of African-American Artists from 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993, pp. 185–199.

Driskell, David. “The Flowering of the Renaissance: The Art of Aaron Douglas, Meta Warwick Fuller, Palmer Hayden, and William H. Johnson.” In Harlem Renaissance: Art of Black America. New York: Studio Museum in Harlem and Abradale, 1987.

Hammond, Leslie King. “The Life and Work of William Henry Johnson, 1901–1970.” Ph.D. dissertation, Johns Hopkins University, 1975.

Powell, Richard J. “William H. Johnson’s ‘Minde Kertiminde.’” Siksi: The Nordic Art Review, 1, 1986: 17–23.

———. Homecoming: The Art and Life of William H. Johnson. New York: Norton, 1991.

Taylor, Joshua C. “Introduction.” In Adelyn D. Breeskin, William H. Johnson: 1901–1970. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press for the National Collection of Fine Arts, 1971.

Jones, Eugene Kinckle

Eugene Kinckle Jones was born in Richmond, Virginia, in 1885, during the post-Reconstruction era; his parents were Joseph Endom and Rosa Kinckle Jones. He earned a bachelor’s degree from Virginia Union College in 1905 and that autumn enrolled in the master’s program at Cornell University in mathematics and engineering. He refocused his studies on economics and sociology, in order to have more impact on African Americans, and received a master’s degree in those two areas in 1908. At Cornell, he was a founding member of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity, the first inter-collegiate Greek-letter fraternity for African Americans. Jones was denied the opportunity to pursue a career in social work; he then worked as a teacher in Louisville, Kentucky. He married Blanche Ruby Watson on 11 March 1909; they would have two children.

In 1911, Jones met the noted black sociologist George Edmund Haynes, who during that year brought him to New York City to work as a field secretary at the League of Urban Conditions among Negroes, which later became the National Urban League (NUL). In this position Jones helped to address the role of black migrants as well as the professional development of black social workers. In 1917, he became the first executive secretary of NUL; he served in this post until 1941, the longest tenure of any leader in the organization.

Jones wrote articles in Opportunity, the magazine of NUL, about the education of African American social workers; he also helped implement NUL’s social work fellowship program to enable young black students to pursue graduate studies at various participating universities. According to Armfield (1999), this was part of Jones’s initiative to improve the professional status of black social workers, whose services were needed in black communities in both the North and the South. Jones is credited with developing the first successful approach to professional training for black social workers; he helped to train a number of individuals with regard to health care, housing, industry, and fieldwork.

During the period of the Harlem Renaissance—the 1920s—Jones became the first African American elected to the executive committee of the National Conference of Social Work (he was elected treasurer in 1925). Additionally, he became vice president and chairman of the Harlem Adult Education Committee, chairman of Associates in Negro Folk Education, and a trustee of Virginia Union University and president of its alumni association. During the Great Depression he became a member of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt’s unofficial “black cabinet”—a group of leading African Americans who gave the president input on the New Deal programs intended to improve employment opportunities for African Americans.

Jones’s leadership was in the tradition of “race men” who were committed to using their education and position to advance the cause of the African American masses.

Biography

Eugene Kinckle Jones was born in Richmond, Virginia, 30 July 1885. He studied at Wayland Academy; Virginia Union College (A.B., 1905); and Cornell University

(M.A., 1908). He was a founding member of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity; an adviser to Mayor James J. Walker of New York City; treasurer of the executive committee, National Conference of Social Work; American delegate at the International Conference of Social Work in Paris; a participant in the International Conference of Human Relations in Cambridge, England; a member of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's "black cabinet"; a member of the executive board of the National Conference of Social Workers; vice president and chairman of the Harlem Adult Education Committee; chairman of Associates in Negro Folk Education; a trustee of Virginia Union University; and president of the Virginia Union alumni association. Jones was employed as a teacher in the public school system of Louisville, Kentucky (1909–1911); he was a field secretary of the National Urban League in New York City (1911–1917) and an executive secretary in New York City (1917–1941). He died in Flushing, New York, 11 January 1954.

ANDREW P. SMALLWOOD

See also Haynes, George Edmund; National Urban League; Opportunity; Race Men

Further Reading

- Armfield, Felix L. "Jewel Eugene Kinckle Jones and the Development of Early African-American Social Work." Sphinx, 84(1), Spring 1999.
- Battle, Marc Kevin. "Legendary Brothers Establish Place in History through Contributions to Humanity." Sphinx, 84(1), Spring 1999.
- Lively, Tarron. "Eugene Kinckle Jones: Moving the Urban League to the Streets." Washington Afro-American and Washington Tribune, 28 July–3 August 2001. (Commemorative section of "Afro Chronicles.")
- Walker, Wallace L. "Alpha Phi Alpha and the Founding of African-American Civil Rights Groups." Sphinx, 84(1), Spring 1999.
- Wesley, Charles H. The History of Alpha Phi Alpha: A Development in College Life. Baltimore, Md.: Foundation Publishers, 1996. (16th printing.)

Jones, Lois Mailou

The story of Lois Mailou Jones (1905–1998) as an artist and teacher is perhaps told best through her own recollections and those of her students, in particular Benjamin (1994, 1995) and Driskell (1998). Her life spanned most of the twentieth century, and her work encompassed many stylistic changes.

Jones was born and educated in Boston, which was a center for the visual arts; it was the first American city to embrace impressionism, then considered a radical movement. At her family's summer home in Martha's Vineyard, she met the sculptor Meta Warrick Fuller and the musician and composer Harry T. Burleigh, both of whom had lived and worked in Paris and encouraged Jones to go there; she was also inspired by Fuller's stories about working with the sculptor Auguste Rodin. Jones obtained teaching positions at the Palmer Memorial Institute in Sedalia, North Carolina, in 1928; and at Howard University in Washington, D.C., in 1930. In 1937, when she had her first sabbatical leave, she received a General Education Board fellowship and left the United States to study at the Académie Julian in Paris. In the United States, Jones had endured her share of discrimination: for example, she was turned down for an assistantship at the School of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, even though she was one of its brightest graduates. The climate in America was such that Jones asked her friend Céline Tabary, whom she met at the Académie Julian, to deliver a number of her works to museums and galleries for her; she assumed that if she delivered them herself, they would probably be rejected because of her race.

Jones, Tabary, and Lillian Evanti—an opera singer who was introduced to Jones by Burleigh—were very close, calling themselves the "three blind mice." In 1953, Jones and the Haitian artist and graphic designer Louis Vergniaud Pierre-Noël were married at Tabary's summer home in Cabris, France. (Jones and her future husband had met at Columbia University in 1934.) Another of Jones's friends, the historian and philosopher Alain Locke, had a definite influence on the direction Jones took in her art. During a summer session at Columbia University in 1934, Jones had studied its ethnographic collection of masks from nonwestern cultures; while she was in France, she explored African themes in her own work (Les Fétiches, 1938), having seen original art—considered artifacts at the time—in museums and galleries and then having seen these images as reworked by Pablo Picasso and other avant-garde artists. When Locke became acquainted with Jones, he suggested that she explore these themes further, telling her that she had more right to Africa than, say, Picasso did.

Jones had a long-standing interest in design, emanating from her early education at the High School of Practical Arts (HSPA) in Boston; through her apprenticeship to Grace Ripley (Ripley Studios), she designed theater costumes and masks. However, she made a conscious decision to separate herself from design so that she could be regarded as a serious artist. At the time, “design” was associated with crafts, and those executing “patterns” were primarily women who remained anonymous—whereas Jones was explicit about wanting to be an artist and be known. She did, however, return to design later in life, exploring the theme of the mask and taking inspiration from her experiences in Haiti and Africa. In the 1970s and 1980s, she experimented with transforming this traditional three-dimensional medium onto a two-dimensional surface. Examples of her work during this period are Moon Masque (1971), Sudanesia (1970), Ubi Girl from Tai Region (1972), Damballah (1980), Symbols d’Afrique I (1980), Petite Ballerina (1982), and Initiation, Liberia (1983). Jones once recalled, “Very early I was introduced to Africa through creating the masks with the Ripley studios.”

From time to time, Jones explored political themes in her work. Meditation (Mob Victim) (1944) is an empathic treatment of a single black man, representing the thousands of black men who had been lynched in the American South. Jones was not acquainted with the model for this work and had chosen him more or less by chance; it turned out, however, that his brother had been lynched in his presence. During the turbulent 1960s, Jones turned to images that included such notable figures as Martin Luther King Jr., John Kennedy, and Lyndon Johnson.

Although Jones spent her adult life mainly in Washington, D.C. (where she taught at Howard University) and in Paris (where she maintained a studio), her hometown, Boston, never forgot her. Jones’s first individual show was held at the Robert Vose Galleries in Boston in 1939. At the time of this exhibition, the Christian Science Monitor described her as the “leading Negro artist.” In 1973 the Boston Museum of Fine Arts organized “Reflective Moments,” Jones’s first major solo retrospective. Other important exhibitions were held in Washington. In 1972 Howard University honored Jones with a retrospective show, “Forty Years of Painting, 1932–1972.” Another solo exhibition was held at the Phillips Collection in Washington in 1979.

During the last two decades of her life, Jones received many awards, and her works were exhibited throughout the world. She was extremely proud of her African American heritage, although she said that wanted to be remembered simply as an American artist. She also took pride in having taught for forty-seven years at Howard University, where she said she had “guided and taught many of today’s major black artists.” She summed up her career as having been “long and rich”; she noted that her style and subject matter showed “the unmistakable influence of the countries and cultures in which she has traveled and lived: France, Haiti, Africa, America.”

Biography

Lois Mailou Jones was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on 4 November 1905; her parents, Thomas Vreeland Jones and Carolyn Dorinda Adams, had moved from Paterson, New Jersey, to Cambridge shortly after their marriage, and then to Boston. She was educated in Boston, studying at the High School of Practical Arts there, and was an apprentice of Grace Ripley (Ripley Studios). Jones taught at Palmer Memorial Institute in Sedalia, North Carolina (beginning in 1928), and—for forty-seven years—at Howard University in Washington, D.C. (beginning in 1930). In 1937 she went to Paris on a sabbatical to study at the Académie Julian. She married the Haitian artist and graphic designer Louis Vergniaud Pierre-Noël in 1953. Jones spent most of her adult life in Washington, D.C., and Paris. After a long career, she died in Washington, D.C., in 1998.

MARIANNE WOODS

See also Artists; Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Fuller, Meta Warrick; Locke, Alain

Further Reading

- Benjamin, Tritobia Hayes. The Life and Art of Lois Jones. San Francisco, Calif.: Pomegranate Artbooks, 1994.
- . “Color, Structure, Design: The Artistic Expressions of Lois Mailou Jones.” International Review of African American Art, 9, c. 1995, pp. 28–40.
- Benjamin, Tritobia Hayes, E. J. Montgomery, and Joellen El-Bashir. “A Tribute to Lois M. Jones: Three Remembrances.” International Review of African American Art, 15, 1998, pp. 39–43.
- Driskell, David C. “A Tribute: Lois Mailou Jones (1905–1998).” American Art, 12, 1998, pp. 86–88.

LaDuke, Betty. "Lois Mailou Jones: The Grande Dame of African-American Art." Woman's Art Journal, 8, 1988, pp. 28–32.

Rowell, Charles H. "Interview with Lois M. Jones." Callaloo, 12, 1988, pp. 357–378.

Joplin, Scott

Scott Joplin, the child of a former slave and a freeborn black woman, grew up in the town of Texarkana on the Texas-Arkansas border. His often-cited birth date, 24 November 1868, is incorrect. He had no formal education as a youth, although the members of his family were very musical and played several instruments. A German immigrant musician (perhaps Julius Weiss) seems to have played a significant role in Joplin's musical and artistic development.

During the 1880s, Joplin probably moved to and lived in Sedalia, Missouri, where he worked as a traveling musician and became a close friend and associate of Tom Turpin of St. Louis, a pioneer in the early development of ragtime. In 1893, Joplin probably played in a band at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, where the explosion of interest in ragtime began. Returning to Sedalia in 1894, he joined the Queen City Cornet Band and led his own dance band. He also traveled with a vocal group called the Texas Medley Quartette. During this period, he attended music classes at George R. Smith College in Sedalia, at the same time teaching piano and composition to several younger ragtime composers, including Scott Hayden and Arthur Marshall. From 1898 to 1899 Joplin performed as a pianist at the Maple Leaf Club; he issued his first piano rag, "Original Rags," in 1899. His next publication, "Maple Leaf Rag," sold more than half a million copies by 1909 and provided Joplin with a small but steady income for the remainder of his life. "Maple Leaf Rag" is probably the most famous of all piano rags; it formed the basis for Joplin's success in ragtime and for his title "king of ragtime."

In 1901 Joplin and his first wife, Belle, moved to St. Louis, where he spent more time composing and teaching than performing. Rags published during this time period were "The Easy Winners" (1901), "Sunflower Slow Drag" (1901), "The Entertainer" (1902), and "The Strenuous Life" (1902), a tribute to President Theodore Roosevelt.

Joplin's interests went beyond ragtime to serious music for lyric theater and classical European art forms. He composed a ballet called The Ragtime Dance, depicting a black American ball and incorporating a singer-narrator, which was first performed on 24 November 1899 in Sedalia and was published in 1902. A Guest of Honor was an opera depicting the black leader Booker T. Washington's dinner at the White House with President Theodore Roosevelt in 1902; this opera went on tour in 1903. Joplin's life work, however, was the composition of his opera Treemonisha (1911), and his subsequent efforts to publish and produce it. He moved to New York in 1907 to further his efforts to find a reputable publisher. Joplin claimed that Irving Berlin had access to the score of Treemonisha at this time and had stolen one of Joplin's themes for use in Berlin's hit song "Alexander's Ragtime Band." During his first year in New York, Joplin befriended and encouraged Joseph F. Lamb, a young white man who eventually became one of the foremost composers of ragtime, and one of the most successful.

Although Treemonisha received several favorable reviews from critics after Joplin published the score himself, he was never able to stage the work successfully in its entirety. Joplin published his last work, "Magnetic Rag," in 1914, through his own publishing company. After his death, it was apparent that he had been a prolific composer; he left behind numerous unpublished manuscripts and compositions of stage works and orchestral music, most of which appear to have been destroyed or lost in legal proceedings in 1961.

Scott Joplin as shown on the sheet music of "The Entertainer."
(© Bettmann/Corbis.)

Joplin was the preeminent composer of piano ragtime, and he strove to be recognized as a composer of artistic merit above and beyond his popular acclaim. He called his piano rags "classic rags," meaning that they were comparable to European artistic music. The care that he took to create and subsequently publish and have performed accurate representations and renderings of his scores justifies his position.

Joplin's influence on the Harlem Renaissance movement specifically stems from his time in New York from 1907 to 1917. Ragtime as an American art form and a popular idiom flourished from about 1896 to 1918, and it has widely been identified as a precursor of jazz—that musical art form which is uniquely American in both its development and its subsequent influence and success throughout the twentieth century.

Biography

Scott Joplin was born between July 1867 and mid-January 1868 in northeastern Texas. He had few early educational opportunities, but most members of his family played musical instruments. Evidently, he moved to Sedalia, Missouri, in the 1880s, and he attended music classes at George R. Smith College in Sedalia in the 1890s. He worked as a traveling musician, and he may have played in a band in Chicago in 1893 for the World's Columbian Exposition. He issued his first piano rag, "Original Rags," in 1899; this was followed by the immensely popular "Maple Leaf Rag." Joplin moved to St. Louis, Missouri, in 1901. He devoted his time to teaching and composition and continued to publish piano rags. He had an ambition to write for lyric theater, and he wrote a number of ballets and short operas, most of which have not survived. He moved to New York City in 1907 and tried to publish and produce his opera Treemonisha. He completed Treemonisha in 1910 and published the score himself in 1911; thereafter, a few stagings and performances were done, none of any substance. Joplin continued to compose until his death in New York City on 1 April 1917. Most of his unpublished manuscripts and scores were apparently lost or destroyed in 1961.

BRAD EDEN

See also Jazz

Selected Works

- "Maple Leaf Rag." 1899.
- "The Entertainer." 1902.
- The Ragtime Dance*. 1902. (Ballet.)
- A Guest of Honor*. 1903. (Opera, lost.)
- "Rose Leaf Rag." 1907.
- "Wall Street Rag." 1909.
- Treemonisha*. 1911. (Opera.)
- "Magnetic Rag." 1917.

Further Reading

- Berlin, Edward A. Ragtime: A Musical and Cultural History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
- . King of Ragtime: Scott Joplin and His Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- . "Joplin, Scott" and "Ragtime." (Grove's Web site, ed. Laura Macy.)
- Blesh, Rudi, and Harriet Janis. They All Played Ragtime. New York: Knopf, 1950. (See also 2nd ed., Grove, 1959; 3rd ed., Jazz Book Club, 1960; 4th ed., Music Scales, 1971.)
- Curtis, Susan. Dancing to a Black Man's Tune: A Life of Scott Joplin. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1994.
- Frew, Tim. Scott Joplin and the Age of Ragtime. New York: Friedman-Fairfax, 1996.
- Gammond, Peter. Scott Joplin and the Ragtime Era. New York: St. Martin's, 1975.
- Lawrence, V. B., ed. The Collected Works of Scott Joplin. New York, 1971. (Rev. 1981 as The Complete Works of Scott Joplin.)
- Ping-Robbins, Nancy R. Scott Joplin: A Guide to Research. New York: Garland, 1998.

Jordan, Joe

Joe Jordan, a noted ragtime pianist, arranger, composer, and musical director, became renowned through his tenure at Robert T. Mott's Pekin Theater (formerly Pekin Music Hall) in Chicago in 1906–1909 and 1911–1913. When he was hired as musical director in 1906, Jordan immediately began supplying the new all-black stock company with his own works (The Man from 'Bam, 1906; Mayor of Dixie, 1906). As the first theater in the nation owned and operated by blacks, the Pekin quickly became a major center for black entertainment during the 1910s and 1920s.

In May 1905, the first “syncopated music” concert performed by the Memphis Students featured Jordan’s work and the talents of Ernest Hogan, James Reese Europe, and Will Dixon (the group later featured Will Marion Cook).

During the 1920s and 1930s, Jordan was a much sought-after director and conductor of musical revues. Strut Miss Lizzie (1922), advertised as “Glorying the Negro Beauty,” portrayed racial pride through a series of songs (mainly composed by Jordan), dances, and comedy scenes. Rarin’ to Go (1925–1926), a touring musical revue, had a score by Jordan and an integrated cast who performed separately; it received little attention. Deep Harlem (1928–1929), another musical revue with a score by Jordan, chronicled the progress of the Negro from Ethiopian royalty to Harlem’s cabarets in song, dance, and comedy. Jordan also composed most of the score for the musical comedy Brown Buddies (1930), which starred Bill “Bojangles” Robinson and ran for 111 performances at the Liberty Theater in Harlem. This acclaimed show, full of riveting dance sequences, looked at black soldiers in France during World War I. Fast and Furious (1931), which lasted for only seven performances at the New Yorker Theater, had music composed by Jordan and J. Rosamond Johnson as a team; it also included a rare appearance by Zora Neale Hurston, who acted in a few skits and sang. During the 1930s Jordan conducted the Negro Unit of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) Federal Theater Project, a project intended to help employ artists during the Great Depression.

A proponent of self-empowerment and self-help, Jordan was also a sought-after businessman. Early in 1917, he brought legal action against the Original Dixieland Jazz Band for copyright infringement: the band had used his tune “That Teasin’ Rag” in its “Original Dixieland One-Step.” The band’s records were quickly recalled and redistributed as “Introducing ‘That Teasin’ Rag’ by Joe Jordan.” In 1920 and 1923, as the vice president and manager of the Chicago Production Company, Jordan produced revisions of The Man from 'Bam. Jordan was also a financial manager for Will Marion Cook’s New York Symphony Orchestra in 1918 and a staff arranger for the Clarence Williams Publishing Company during the 1920s. Meanwhile, Jordan toured the United States and Europe with his group, the Ten Sharps and Flats.

Jordan retired from music in 1944 after serving as director for the Army Specialist Corp’s black orchestra, with the rank of captain. He relocated to Tacoma, Washington, and continued his real estate enterprises.

Biography

Joseph Zachariah Taylor Jordan was born 11 February 1882 in Cincinnati, Ohio. He learned violin, piano, and drums primarily by ear and briefly studied music at Lincoln Institute (later Lincoln University), Jefferson, Missouri, around 1899–1900. He taught private students in his studio in Tacoma, Washington, 1944–1971; and was on the faculty of the Modern Institute of Music in Tacoma, 1949. Jordan played violin, double bass, and drums in the band Georgia-Up-to-Date (St. Louis, Missouri), 1899; played violin and drums in the Taborin Band (St. Louis), 1900; was music and stage director of the vaudeville show Dandy Coon (Chicago), 1903; performed ragtime piano at Tom Turpin’s Rosebud Café (St. Louis), 1904; was conductor and director of the Pekin Music Hall (Chicago), 1904; organized and wrote music for the Memphis Students (New York City), 1905; was musical director of the Pekin Theater (Chicago), 1906–1909; organized and produced the new Memphis Students, 1908; returned to the Pekin Theater as musical director, 1911–1913; directed an orchestra for the new States Theater (Chicago), 1913; organized the YMCA symphonic orchestra (Chicago), 1913; was musical director for the prizefighter Jack Johnson’s European tour, 1915; was financial manager and assistant director of Will Marion Cook’s New York Syncopated Orchestra, 1918; was vice president and manager of Chicago Production Company, 1920 on; was staff arranger for Clarence Williams Publishing Company, 1920s; was musical director and conductor for Keep Shufflin’, 1928; conducted the Negro Unit Orchestra of the WPA Federal Theater Project, 1930s; conducted a seventy-five-member symphony orchestra to accompany a choir of 350 for the ASCAP Silver Jubilee Festival (Carnegie Hall), 1939; directed an orchestra of black musicians in the Army Specialist Corps (ASC) at Huachuca, Arizona, as a captain, 1943–1944; and retired from active performance to continue his career in real estate, 1944. Jordan was the first African American elected to the board of directors of American Federation of Musicians (AFM) Local 208 of Chicago 1932; he joined ASCAP in 1939. He died in Tacoma, Washington, 11 September 1971.

EMMETT G. PRICE III

See also Cook, Will Marion; Europe, James Reese; Federal Programs; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, John Rosamond; Musical Theater; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Works Progress Administration

Selected Works

"Morocco Blues." 1926. (Piano; recorded, Arpeggio ARP 1205.)

"Hop Off." 1927. (Dance orchestra; recorded, Classics 580; Riverside SDP-11.)

"Betty Lou." New York: Harms, 1930.

"Don't Leave Your Little Blackbird Blue." New York: Harris, c. 1930. (Cocomposers, Porter Grainger and Shelton Brooks.)

Musical Theater

The Man from 'Bam. 1920, 1923. (Original, 1906–1907.)

Strut Miss Lizzie. 1922.

Rarin' to Go. 1925–1926.

Deep Harlem. 1928–1929.

Brown Buddies. 1930.

Fast and Furious. 1931.

Further Reading

Bauman, Thomas. "Jordan, Joseph Zachariah Taylor ('Joe')." In Center for Black Music Research: International Dictionary of Black Composers, ed. Samuel A. Floyd Jr. Chicago, Ill.: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.

Blesh, Rudi, and Harriet Janis. They All Played Ragtime, 4th ed. New York: Oak, 1971.

Fletcher, Tom. 100 Years of the Negro in Show Business. New York: Burdige, 1954.

Morgan, Thomas L., and William Barlow. "Joe Jordan." In From Cakewalks to Concert Halls: An Illustrated History of African American Popular Music from 1895 to 1930. Washington, D.C.: Elliot and Clark, 1992.

Oppenheimer, Priscilla. "Jordan, Joe." In The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era, ed. Bruce Kellner. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. A Century of Musicals in Black and White: An Encyclopedia of Musical Stage Works by,

about, or Involving African Americans. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.

Southern, Eileen. "Jordan, Joe." In The Greenwood Encyclopedia of Black Music: Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.

Zimmerman, Richard. "Jordan, Joe." In The New Grove Dictionary of American Music, Vol. 2, ed. H. Wiley Hitchcock and Stanley Sadie. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

Journalists

Whether as newspaper and magazine publishers, editors, reporters, columnists, or critics, black journalists made vital contributions to African American politics and culture during the Harlem Renaissance. Black newspapers and magazines provided the institutional base for black journalists as well as publicizing and providing outlets for black essayists, poets, playwrights, and novelists. Without black journalists and the newspapers and magazines that supported them, the Harlem Renaissance would have had little impact.

By the 1920s, black newspapers had been in existence for more than one hundred years. From the establishment of the first black newspaper, Freedom's Journal, by John Russwurm in 1827 to the 1920s, black newspapers gathered and delivered news and opinion to black communities throughout the United States. During this time, because of the limited, if not biased, coverage in the general press, blacks found their newspapers the only source of news and opinion about their activities and concerns. The black press was one of the few segments of the American news media that actively campaigned for black equality in the United States. In that sense, the black press, along with civil rights organizations and black community groups, was an agent of protest. In some communities the black press, as the only medium of black protest, helped to create and influence other agents of change.

The black press not only expressed dissatisfaction with American racism but also helped create, maintain, and mold the black communities it served. In doing so, through its coverage of black organizations, social functions, personalities, issues, events, and achievements, it helped define the black community. According to Gunnar Myrdal in An American Dilemma:

The press defines the Negro group to the Negroes themselves. The individual Negro is invited to share in the sufferings, grievances, and pretensions of the millions of Negroes outside the narrow local community. This creates a feeling of strength and solidarity. . . . The [black] press is also the chief agency of group control. It tells the individual how he should think and feel as an American Negro and creates a tremendous power of suggestion by implying that all other Negroes think and feel in this manner. (171)

Although other black institutions, such as churches, were also significant agencies for group control, Myrdal correctly assessed the role of the black press. To a far greater extent than the white press during the Harlem Renaissance era, the black press showed the world to the black community, showed that community to itself, and showed the black community to the world.

Black newspapers and magazines were open to all within the black community who had something to say. Aspiring black journalists were barred from most if not all journalism schools in the 1920s, so black newspapers could not tap that source. They had to train their own reporters, columnists, and critics and in so doing tapped the rich source of black literary talent that surfaced during the Harlem Renaissance. Black publishers, for the most part, were highly literate and educated people who wanted to introduce to the world the black writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Quite a few saw the 1920s as a time of radical social change, so they gave a voice on their editorial pages to black radicals of the era. Many black newspapers had feature sections in which writers and journalists of the Harlem Renaissance published their works. In that sense, black newspapers served as literary magazines as well as purveyors of news and opinion. Such a role was necessary, because few if any black literary journals survived for very long, and only a few white journals published black writers.

Here, we examine the leading black journalists of the Harlem Renaissance. These include Carl Murphy of the Baltimore Afro-American, Robert S. Abbott of the Chicago Defender, Robert L. Vann of the Pittsburgh Courier, P. B. Young of the Norfolk Journal and Guide, John Mitchell of the Richmond Planet, and C. A. Franklin of the Kansas City Call. Among the most important editors of the period were T. Thomas Fortune, the “dean” of black journalists, who in the 1920s edited Marcus Garvey’s newspaper The Negro World; W. E. B. Du Bois, who edited The Crisis, the house organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, editors of The Messenger; and Charles S. Johnson, editor of Opportunity, the magazine of the Urban League.

Robert S. Abbott (1868–1940)

The black press flourished during the 1920s: more than 500 black newspapers had a total circulation of more than 1.5 million. Of all these newspapers, none prospered more than the Chicago Defender. Its publisher and editor was Robert Sengstacke Abbott. Abbott was born in 1868 on Saint Simons Island, Georgia, to a butler and a hairdresser; he grew up in Savannah, Georgia, and was raised by his mother and his stepfather, John Sengstacke. Sengstacke was a newspaperman himself, and this encouraged his stepson to enter the newspaper business. Abbott attended Hampton Institute, where he was trained as a printer. Printing jobs were hard to find, however, so he studied law. Despite completing a law course, Abbott was not admitted to the Georgia bar, so he returned to journalism.

In 1905, Abbott decided to start his own newspaper and chose Chicago as the place to start it. That year, Chicago’s black population was 40,000 and growing. Three newspapers were already serving the black community in Chicago, but that did not stop Abbott, who called his newspaper the Defender. From an initial press run of 300 copies in 1905, the Defender grew to a circulation of more than 200,000 during World War I. The newspaper was distributed throughout the Midwest and the middle and deep South. Its popularity came from its constant publicizing of and crusading against local and national racial oppression, especially in the South. Along that line, it constantly encouraged its southern readers to migrate North, preferably to Chicago. In no small part because of the Defender’s encouragement, Chicago became a magnet for black migration from the South; its black population increased 144 percent to 110,000 by 1920. Many of these newcomers became readers of the Defender, thereby increasing the newspaper’s circulation, wealth, and influence.

During the Harlem Renaissance, Abbott’s Chicago Defender was the most widely read black newspaper, with a circulation approaching 250,000. Abbott put out a lively, sensationalist newspaper that appealed to all segments of the black community. Like its contemporaries in the white press of the “roaring twenties,” the Defender featured lurid headlines and stories focusing on crime and sex. This appealed to the newspaper's numerous working-class readers. Still, the Defender gave comprehensive coverage to the day-to-day life of Chicago's black community and crusaded against local and national racism. The Defender was divided into twelve sections, including local, national, and international news; sports; entertainment; society; editorials and opinion; and a features section that spotlighted black writers and artists, especially those of the Harlem Renaissance. The features section offered poetry, short stories, and serialized novels. The Defender's layout was imitated throughout the rest of the black press, and by the late 1920s most black newspapers had adopted its sensationalistic, comprehensive format. For good reason, the Defender called itself the "world's greatest weekly."

Politically, the Defender differed little from its contemporaries in the black press in that it generally supported the Republican Party locally and nationally. Abbott, as befitted his status as a successful entrepreneur, was moderate to conservative on most issues besides race. However, in 1928, annoyed by the Republican Party's neglect of issues concerning black people, Abbott and the Defender endorsed the presidential candidate of the Democratic Party, Alfred E. Smith.

Abbott and the Defender fell on hard times during the Great Depression. The newspaper's circulation decreased by 75 percent, and Abbott was forced to dip into his personal assets to keep the paper afloat. Then his health began to fail in the late 1930s. In 1939 he turned over control of the Defender to his nephew John Sengstacke. Shortly thereafter, in February 1940, Robert S. Abbott died.

Under Sengstacke's leadership, the Defender revived itself during World War II, reaching new heights in circulation and influence because of its extensive coverage of and advocacy for equitable participation by blacks in the war. Although the Defender continued to be a powerful voice of the black community during the civil rights era and beyond, it fell on hard times again during the 1990s and passed out of the control of Abbott's descendants. The Defender is still being published today, however, and is highly likely to continue to be as influential in the twenty-first century as it was during the twentieth.

Robert L. Vann (1879–1940)

Robert L. Vann—like his contemporary and rival Robert S. Abbott—was a lawyer who was interested in journalism. He is forever linked to the Pittsburgh

Courier, which he ran from 1910 until his death in 1940. Vann, one of the few black attorneys in Pittsburgh, was asked by the founders of the Courier to organize their legal affairs. When they were unable to keep the newspaper going, Vann took it over and in ten years built it to equal the Defender in circulation and influence. The Courier's layout followed that of the Defender but was less sensational. Also, the Courier's columnists and writers tended to be of higher quality than those of the Defender. Prominent among Vann's writers was George Schuyler, who wrote most of the Courier's editorials and a widely renowned column, "Views and Reviews." There was also J. A. Rogers, who contributed numerous articles and columns on ancient and contemporary Africa. Walter White, head of the NAACP, had his novel The Fire in the Flint serialized in the Courier and then became a book reviewer for the newspaper, reviewing the works of such writers of the Harlem Renaissance as Countee Cullen, Alain Locke, and Langston Hughes. Later, the Courier employed the distinguished black journalists P. L. Prattis and Wendell Smith. In the 1940s, Smith was instrumental in the effort to integrate major league baseball.

Unlike Abbott, Vann was very active in local and national politics. He was a "kingmaker" in Pittsburgh, controlling the black vote in the 1920s for the Republican Party. As such he was very influential in the Republican Party in Pennsylvania, and in the national party, during the 1920s. As time went by, however, Vann became disenchanted with the Republicans' lack of interest in black people's concerns; in the 1930s he switched to the Democratic Party, taking thousands of black votes with him. For this he was rewarded with an appointment as a special assistant to the attorney general in Washington, D.C.—a job with little power.

Because it had a politically active publisher, the Courier was an activist newspaper. It crusaded for racial equality in Pittsburgh, in Pennsylvania, and nationwide. It was one of the few black newspapers that supported the labor movement by giving news coverage and editorial support to A. Philip Randolph when he was organizing the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. During the 1920s, the Courier, while not the most widely read black newspaper (the Defender had a higher circulation), was perhaps the most influential, owing to its high-quality leadership and staff.

The Great Depression damaged the Courier, as it did other black newspapers. Vann found himself spending as much time back in Pittsburgh trying to keep the paper afloat as he spent in Washington. In the late 1930s, however, the newspaper's health improved. The Courier's coverage of the impending world war, and its tireless advocacy of full participation by blacks in the war effort, restored it to national prominence. It led the black community's "double V" campaign for victory over racism at home and victory over fascism abroad. Vann himself, though, did not live long enough to see this revival; he died of cancer in 1940.

In the postwar years, the Courier continued to prosper, as its coverage and advocacy of the civil rights and "black power" movements helped it retain its readership. The Sengstacke family (the owners of the Chicago Defender) acquired it in 1965. Although, like black newspapers in general, it experienced hard times in the 1980s and 1990s, the Courier still publishes today as the New Pittsburgh Courier and is still a tireless advocate for racial justice.

Carl Murphy (1889–1967)

Carl Murphy was the gifted and charismatic publisher-editor of the Baltimore Afro-American from 1922 to 1967. One of the nine children of the Afro-American's owner John H. Murphy, Carl Murphy joined the newspaper in 1918 and was picked by his family to take it over in 1922 after his father's death. He had been educated at Howard University, had received a graduate degree in German from Harvard University, and was a professor of German at Howard University when he joined the Afro-American. His academic and scholarly background manifested itself in the extremely high quality of the editorials—most written by him—carried in the newspaper. In general, the Baltimore Afro-American was very highly regarded, and it dominated the black media markets along the eastern seaboard.

Throughout the 1920s, Carl Murphy had his Afro-American crusade continuously for racial justice and advancement in Baltimore, in Maryland, and elsewhere. Among the issues were equalization of teachers' salaries in Baltimore, efforts to maintain and increase black membership in the Baltimore city council, the struggles for representation of blacks on the local school board and in the police department, and anti-lynching crusades. Nationwide, the Afro-American supported anti-lynching legislation, and it called for increased federal patronage for black Republicans. The newspaper tended to be a maverick concerning national politics, however. Carl Murphy was very progressive for his time and was attracted to leftist views and politicians. Unlike his peers in the black press, Murphy was not afraid to go out on a limb politically. For example, in 1924 he endorsed the third-party candidate, Robert La Follette, for the presidency. In 1928 he had the Afro-American support the Democratic Party candidate, Alfred E. Smith, instead of the Republican, Herbert Hoover. In the 1930s the newspaper gave covert endorsements to Communist Party and Socialist Party candidates for local, state, and national offices. During that time, Murphy described himself as a "red."

Carl Murphy's literate background was reflected in the high quality and wide range of columnists and feature writers who appeared in the Afro-American. Among others, Walter White of the NAACP; Kelly Miller, dean of Howard University; and James Weldon Johnson all had columns in the newspaper. The Afro-American also had homegrown columnists such as William N. Jones and Ralph Matthews. Jones wrote a column, "Day-by-Day," that was a fixture of the Afro-American from 1922 until his death in 1940. In this column, which was almost an editorial page in itself, he commented on local and national issues. Jones had joined the Afro-American in 1921, after a stint as a social worker and field investigator for the Urban League; he became the city editor and then the managing editor. As a man of the left, he was subjected to red-baiting during the 1930s. His ideology was congruent with Carl Murphy's, however, so he never lost influence within the Afro-American. Ralph Matthews, a witty and acerbic writer, was the Afro-American's answer to H. L. Mencken. Matthews had one or two columns in each issue of the Afro-American from the 1920s on. In these columns he lampooned various sacred cows in the black community, such as the black church and its ministers, black politicians, black "society," and the institutions of marriage and family. Matthews also wrote short stories and plays, and he contributed many of these pieces, usually expressing his worm's-eye view of male-female relationships, to the Afro-American's feature pages. One interesting aspect of the Afro-American was that, while its editorial columns, written mostly by Carl Murphy, upheld the church, society, and the family, Matthews's columns satirized these institutions. It is to Carl Murphy's credit that, despite his forceful opinions, he tolerated and even encouraged those who disagreed with him. This tolerance of diversity was one of Murphy's greatest strengths and in turn strengthened the Afro-American.

More so than most of his peers, Carl Murphy appreciated the Harlem Renaissance and encouraged it by serializing the works of local and nationally known black novelists, publishing the poems and essays of Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Claude McKay. The newspaper encouraged young black writers by publishing serials and short stories in its magazine section. Eventually these stories were published in an anthology edited by Nick Aaron Ford: Best Short Stories by Afro-American Writers.

Unlike its competitors the Defender and the Courier, the Afro-American expanded and prospered during the Great Depression. It established branch offices and editions in Washington, Philadelphia, Richmond, and Newark. By 1940 Carl Murphy presided over a newspaper chain that blanketed the East Coast. The Afro-American reached unprecedented highs in circulation, income, and influence during World War II, becoming a million-dollar company in 1945. It remained at that level for many years afterwards.

Carl Murphy died in 1967, full of years and success. He left a prosperous and powerful media voice, as well as descendants who have kept the newspaper alive and well during the hard times that have befallen the black press. Today the Afro-American, in continuous operation since 1892, is still a powerful voice for African Americans in Baltimore, Washington, and elsewhere on the east coast.

Charles S. Johnson (1893–1956)

A renowned sociologist, Charles S. Johnson was also a major player in the Harlem Renaissance due to editorship of Opportunity, published by the National Urban League. Johnson was the director of research for the Urban League and at their request founded Opportunity in 1923. From 1923 to 1927, when Johnson left the magazine to head Fisk University's Sociology Department, Opportunity not only published news of the Urban League but it also published most of the poets and essayists of the Harlem Renaissance. Johnson strongly believed that African Americans could achieve racial equality through literary and artistic accomplishments. Consequently he encouraged and mentored nearly every prominent literary figure of the Harlem Renaissance. Among Johnson's protégés were Arna Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Aaron Douglas, Jessie Fauset, and Langston Hughes. In 1925 Johnson's Opportunity began awarding literary prizes. That year Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Zora Neale Hurston were the first recipients. Opportunity prizes gave needed recognition to Harlem Renaissance artists and helped jump-start the movement. The NAACP's Crisis followed with awards of its own. In 1926 Countee Cullen joined Opportunity as the assistant editor. In that capacity he wrote a column "The Dark Tower."

After joining Fisk in 1927, Charles S. Johnson established the Race Relations Institute in 1944. In 1947 he became Fisk University's first black president. Under his stewardship Fisk prospered, increasing its enrollment and endowment. Johnson died in 1956. As for Opportunity, it still publishes today as the Urban League's house organ.

W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963)

A true man for all seasons W. E. B. Du Bois spent some of his most productive years as a journalist. In 1909 he left his faculty position at Atlanta University, where he established their Sociology Department, to join the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) as their director of research and publications. In that capacity, Du Bois founded and edited Crisis, the NAACP's magazine. During the 1920s the Crisis provided an outlet for Du Bois' developing Pan-Africanist and Socialist ideologies, as well as a platform from which he could denounce Marcus Garvey, with whom he feuded. Besides Du Boisian ideology and NAACP news, Crisis kept abreast of the artistic accomplishments of the Harlem Renaissance by publishing many black poets and essayists. The noted black writer Jessie Fauset was the Crisis's literary editor. She made sure Crisis promoted and published Harlem Renaissance writers. Among those whose works appeared in the Crisis were Sterling Brown, Langston Hughes, and Claude McKay. In 1924, Du Bois had Crisis offer prizes for artistic excellence. In the late 1920s, Du Bois became disenchanted with the Harlem Renaissance, especially its growing emphasis on ghetto realism, so Crisis suspended its awards competitions.

Du Bois ran the Crisis as his own fiefdom and frequently clashed with the NAACP's leadership, who did not often appreciate Du Bois' criticism of the organization and his ideological meandering. In 1934, Du Bois published articles in the Crisis calling for blacks to build self-sufficient communities separated from whites. This was too much for Walter White and the NAACP board, who fervently believed in a racially integrated society. They dismissed Du Bois, who then rejoined the faculty of Atlanta University. There he established the sociological journal Phylon. As time went by, he became more and more active in leftist politics and organizations, believing that socialism offered the surest path for black advancement. For that stand, he was Red-baited during the 1950s. In 1959, Du Bois, disgusted with the slow pace of racial and social reform and his own persecution, joined the Communist party USA, then migrated to Ghana. There he began work on the Encyclopedia Africana, a task that occupied him until his death at 95 in 1963. As for the Crisis, the NAACP publishes it today as the organization's house organ.

P. B. Young (1884–1962)

Plummer Bernard Young, was born in North Carolina, migrated to Norfolk, Virginia, and in 1907 joined the staff of the Norfolk Journal and Guide. The Journal and Guide had been established in 1901 as a church journal. In 1910 Young bought out the owners, and along with his family, ran the paper until his death in 1962. Young and his Journal and Guide were second only to Carl Murphy and the Afro-American in readership and influence on the eastern seaboard. The Journal and Guide was especially influential in Norfolk and Virginia politics. Young was somewhat more conservative than his peers in the black press, preferring a conciliatory approach toward racial problems. Still, when black interests were threatened locally or nationally, Young's voice of protest could be heard loud and clear. In the 1920s, the newspaper campaigned against lynching and called for better schools, improved housing, and jobs for its readers. It also took a strong stand on crime reduction within the black community

The Journal and Guide's format was not sensational, as were its contemporaries. This tended to limit its circulation though not necessarily its influence. In fact, its nonsensational format caused it to be taken more seriously than its competitors. Like other black newspapers, the Journal and Guide published Harlem Renaissance black poets, novelists and essayists. It also carried columns written by such black journalists as T. Thomas Fortune.

P. B. Young died in 1962, and his son Thomas W. Young succeeded him at the helm, only to die five years later. The Journal and Guide passed out of the control of the Young family in the 1970s and is now owned and operated by Brenda Andrews. Today the Norfolk Journal and Guide carries on in the tradition set by P. B. Young.

John Mitchell (1863–1929)

P. B. Young's main rival for journalistic dominance in Virginia was John Mitchell and the Richmond Planet. Mitchell took over the Planet in 1884 and ran it until his death in 1929. Mitchell was more militant in racial matters than P. B. Young, and the two were frequently at odds during the 1920s. Mitchell from the beginning crusaded against the disenfranchisement of black voters in the South and led boycotts of streetcar companies that segregated black riders. He was far more active in politics than Young, serving in the Richmond City Council in the 1890s, as a delegate to Republican National Conventions, and running for governor of Virginia in 1921. Mitchell in his editorial policies represented the more militant "New Negro" of the 1920s than P. B. Young, who harked back to the more accommodationist ways of Booker T. Washington.

John Mitchell died in 1929. The Richmond Planet declined under his successors and was taken over Carl Murphy in 1938. The newspaper became the Richmond Afro-American and Planet. It followed the parent Baltimore Afro-American in layout, but its news coverage and editorials were localized to Richmond. The Richmond Afro-American lasted until 1996.

C. A. Franklin (1880–1955)

Chester A. Franklin was one of the most important publishers in the midwest. He started the Kansas City Call in 1919 and in a few short years built it into one of the more important black newspapers of the era. Franklin had run newspapers in Omaha and Denver before he moved to Kansas City during World War I. After a rocky early start, Franklin by the mid-1920s had the Call on a firm financial and journalistic footing. Like other black newspapers of the time, it campaigned for racial equality locally and nationwide. It led crusades against lynching, the Ku Klux Klan, and police brutality. It also campaigned for desegregated education and housing and increased job opportunities for blacks.

The Call rejected sensationalism as a means to sell newspapers. In that, it followed the example of the Norfolk Journal and Guide. It constantly presented the local and national black community in the most positive light, emphasizing news about black religious, social, and cultural activity. Along those lines, it provided an outlet for local and national black poets, novelists, and essayists. The Call also employed a distinguished roster of reporters and columnists. The most important of these was Roy Wilkins, later the head of the NAACP, who started his career as a reporter columnist for the Call in the late 1920s.

C. A. Franklin died in 1955; his wife, Ada Crogman Franklin, succeeded him as the owner and publisher of the Call. The Kansas City Call publishes today and is still the primary media voice for Kansas City's African Americans.

Marcus Garvey (1887–1940)

Marcus Garvey is not often remembered today as a newspaper publisher. However, he did establish a newspaper, the Negro World, to publicize the activities of the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). During the early 1920s, the UNIA was the most powerful black organization in the United States. Its membership numbered in the millions, and it established numerous subsidiaries, which included a church (African Orthodox Church) the Black Cross Nurses, the Black Star Line, an auditorium, and a laundry. Garvey preached a black nationalism built around a powerful Africa free of white colonial domination. This message resonated with black working-class folk in Harlem and elsewhere in the North, who attended UNIA meetings, patronized UNIA enterprises, bought stock in UNIA businesses, and read the Negro World.

For a time, the Negro World was the most important black newspaper in Harlem. At its peak it had a circulation approaching 200,000. An aged T. Thomas Fortune, who had published the New York Age and who was considered to be the most important black journalist at the turn of the century, edited it. Along with hard news, the Negro World promoted Garveyite Black Nationalism in its editorials and features, serializing fictional stories of Africans overthrowing white colonialists. The Negro World along with other black newspapers of the era published poems, essays, and short stories by Alain Locke, Claude McKay, and Zora Neale Hurston. In fact, it was the first newspaper to publish her poems, doing so in 1922. After a while Garvey lost interest in promoting the Harlem Renaissance, believing that black artistic activity should be subordinate to Black Nationalist protest politics. Therefore, the Negro World became solely a propaganda organ for the UNIA.

The Negro World flourished as long as Marcus Garvey did. When Garvey was imprisoned for mail fraud in 1925 and deported to Jamaica in 1927, the UNIA faded away. So did the Negro World. Still, during its heyday it was the strongest voice for Black Nationalism during this era.

A. Phillip Randolph (1889–1979)

Primarily known as a great labor leader due to his organizing black Pullman porters into the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Workers, Randolph also was a noted journalist during the Harlem Renaissance. He cofounded with Chandler Owen (1889–1967) and edited the Messenger, which existed from 1917 to 1928. This magazine became the leading black radical publication of the era. The Messenger promoted socialism as the road to black freedom and called for solidarity between black and white workers. It also harshly criticized Marcus Garvey and the UNIA.

The Messenger, like Crisis and Opportunity, promoted the Harlem Renaissance, though not to the extent of the latter two. The Renaissance was incidental to its mission of promoting black socialism. It did publish Arna Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Claude McKay. and The Messenger's drama critic was Theophilus Lewis, who wrote for the magazine from 1923 to 1927. Lewis's reviews of black plays and other fiction were the Messenger's main contribution to the Harlem Renaissance.

Plagued by consistently low circulation, the Messenger folded in 1928. Randolph later became one of the most powerful labor and civil rights leaders of the twentieth century, founding the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Workers and organizing the 1941 and 1963 Marches on Washington.

Conclusion

Black journalists and the newspapers and magazines they published and edited provided one of the main outlets for the artists of the Harlem Renaissance. At the same time, they were themselves part of the explosion of black creativity that characterized that era. The 1920s were a golden age for black journalism, as circulation, advertising, and income reached new heights. This firm financial foundation enabled them to publish and publicize Harlem Renaissance artists. By supporting local black artists of the era, black newspapers ensured that the Harlem Renaissance would be a national phenomenon, not one limited to just New York City.

The Harlem Renaissance witnessed an outpouring of black literary and political magazines, which had not been seen before and has not been seen since. The most important of these—The Crisis, Opportunity, and the Messenger—were among the main publishers, critics, and employers of such Harlem Renaissance figures as Jessie Fauset, Zora Neale Hurston, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and others. While white patronage and outlets were important to the success of the Harlem Renaissance, without black journalists the Harlem Renaissance would have had little impact.

HAYWARD "WOODY" FARRAR

See also Abbott, Robert Sengstracke; Baltimore Afro-American; Black Press; Chicago Defender; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fortune, Timothy Thomas; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Messenger, The; Miller, Kelly; Murphy, Carl J.; Negro World; Opportunity; Owen, Chandler; Pittsburgh Courier; Randolph, A. Philip; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Schuyler, George S.; Vann, Robert L.; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Buni, Andrew. Robert L. Vann of the Pittsburgh Courier. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1974.
- Detweiler, Frederick G. The Negro Press in the United States. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1922.
- Farrar, Hayward. The Baltimore Afro-American 1892–1950. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1998.
- Ford, Nick A. Best Short Stories by Afro-American Writers. Baltimore, Md.: Afro-American, 1950.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Mayberry. Propaganda and Aesthetics: The Literary Politics of Afro-American Magazines in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1940. (Reprint, New York: Arno, 1968.)
- Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. No Crystal Stair: Black Life and the Messenger. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1975.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Myrdal, Gunnar. An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Democracy. New York: Harper and Row, 1944.
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.
- Ottley, Roi. The Lonely Warrior: The Life and Times of Robert S. Abbott. Chicago, Ill.: Regnery, 1955.
- Pride, Armistead. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.
- Stein, Judith. The World of Marcus Garvey: Race and Class in Modern Society. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1986.
- Suggs, H. Lewis, ed. The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- Suggs, H. Lewis. P. B. Young, Newspaperman: Race, Politics, and Journalism in the New South. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1988.
- Suggs, H. Lewis, ed. The Black Press in the Middle West, 1865–1985. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1996.
- Thornbrough, Emma Lou. T. Thomas Fortune: Militant Journalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.
- Vincent, Theodore G. Voices of a Black Nation: Political Journalism in the Harlem Renaissance. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World, 1973.
- Weiss, Nancy J. The National Urban League, 1910–1940. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- Wintz, Cary. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.
- Wolseley, Roland E. The Black Press U.S.A. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1971.

Jungle Alley

Jungle Alley, also known as The Street, Paradise Valley, Beale Street, and The Stroll, was the part of 133th Street between Lenox and Seventh avenues. It was the locale for many expensive, white-owned, segregated nightclubs and cabarets such as the Cotton Club, Connie's Inn, and Small's Paradise, and for extravagant rent parties and speakeasies. As a center of Harlem's social scene, Jungle Alley functioned as a setting where upper-class white Americans who wanted to transcend the rigid rules of the color line could visit Harlem and gaze on the African American culture and people "without actually descending into it" (Watson 1995). In many ways, the economic, social, and artistic activities associated with the residents and businesses of Jungle Alley made it a microcosm of the cultural vibrancy that characterized the Harlem Renaissance.

The vogue of Harlem contributed to the popularity of the pricey nightclubs and cabarets in Jungle Alley. In addition to the Cotton Club, Connie's, and Small's, its popular nightspots and jazz clubs included the Apartment, Minton's Playhouse, Crawford's, and the Beehive. African American performers such as Duke Ellington, Ethel Waters, Cab Calloway, and Bessie

Smith appeared frequently in these establishments. Wealthy white Americans who were intrigued by the image of the African American as a primitive exotic unabashedly journeyed to Jungle Alley to see shows featuring scantily clad performers while being served by dancing waiters. To become acquainted with Harlem's nightlife and the world of the presumed primitive exotics, a visit to Jungle Alley was an essential part of a nighttime foray into Harlem, "race capital of the world."

Despite the allure and excitement of Jungle Alley, and despite the fact that this specific area of Harlem was a place where the races could congregate and socialize, the realities of racism and segregation prevented it from functioning in a genuinely color-blind way. For example, the Cotton Club—the largest and most popular nightspot in Jungle Alley—aimed its advertising at a predominantly if not wholly white clientele. The owners of clubs, who were often affiliated with the mob, strictly enforced the rules of segregation; they also carefully selected and hired young, light-skinned women whose physical appearance would be nonthreatening to a white audience. Moreover, there was seldom any social interaction between audiences and performers. Thus, although the establishments in Jungle Alley provided an income and commercial recognition for many African American performers, the exclusionary and racist practices of club owners were a reminder that white Americans had "infiltrated" Harlem and would maintain the status quo.

It should be noted, however, that the status quo varied within Jungle Alley, in terms of the clientele and reputation of the businesses there. Some establishments, such as the Sugar Cane on 135 Street at Fifth Avenue, attracted a more racially diverse crowd and provided a setting for the sale and distribution of cocaine, marijuana, and bootleg liquor. At such nightspots, sultry torch singers would perform while the customers reveled and danced into the early morning hours. Although businesses like the Sugar Cane were less elegant than the Cotton Club, they represented an adventurous fringe of Jungle Alley and appealed to the black working class.

Similarly, speakeasies, also known as "lap joints," and rent parties were a common aspect of life in Jungle Alley. The rent party, originally designed to raise money to forestall a tenant's impending eviction, became a common social gathering and communal event for working-class African Americans. Speakeasies and black-owned nightclubs provided a venue for social interaction between blacks on the one hand and white curiosity seekers (particularly tourists) and white patrons of black artists on the other. Some establishments of this kind were used for more private events. The Bamboo Inn, for instance, was often used for young women's coming-out parties and for society matrons' luncheons; parties that began in someone's home would often conclude in a cabaret in Jungle Alley.

To some degree, the atmosphere of the speakeasies and rent parties allowed Harlemites to transcend barriers of race and class. As Wintz (1988) writes, "There all of Harlem converged: the prostitute, the washwoman, the petty gangster, the poet, and the intellectual shared the blues and swayed to the beat of the jazz musicians." Jungle Alley also appealed to gay and lesbian Harlemites. The Harlem Renaissance, in general, was a time of sexual as well as artistic freedom and exploration; moreover, the idea that African Americans were primitive exotics led, predictably, to a view of blacks as sexually uninhibited. Gay, lesbian, and bisexual Harlemites such as the novelist Wallace Thurman and the white patron Carl Van Vechten found Jungle Alley a zone of safety where they could express their sexuality. Gay establishments such as the Clam House, described as "a popular house for revelers but not for the innocent young" (Watson 1995), featured performers like Gladys Bentley and Bessie Smith, whose songs had double-entendre lyrics about same-sex love. Drag and costume balls, vividly depicted in Langston Hughes's autobiography The Big Sea (1940), were held at places such as the Rockland Palace and the Garden of Joy Club. Gays, lesbians, and bisexuals of all races also expressed their sexuality in private homes, apartments, and "buffet flats" such as Hazel Valentine's Daisy Chain. Jungle Alley, then, was a magnet for the sexually uninhibited.

Jungle Alley's commercial and social enterprises played a significant role in the development of the thriving Harlem community. Intellectuals, black artists and their patrons, gays, lesbians, bisexuals, working-class African Americans, and upper-class whites all converged on Jungle Alley in pursuit of good times, stimulating conversation, and hours of partying and drinking to the accompaniment of jazzy or soulful music. Despite the constraints of a racially divided society in the 1920s, the atmosphere of Jungle Alley enhanced the appeal of Harlem to a larger—and even a global—community.

LARNELL DUNKLEY JR.

Jungle Alley

See also Black Bohemia; Cotton Club; Harlem: 5—Neighborhoods; Homosexuality; House-Rent Parties; Nightclubs; Nightlife; Small's Paradise; specific performers

Further Reading

Coleman, Leon. "Carl Van Vechten Presents the New Negro." In Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined, ed. Victor A. Kramer and Robert A. Russ. New York: Whitston, 1997.

Garber, Eric. "A Spectacle in Color: The Lesbian and Gay Subculture of Jazz Age Harlem." In Hidden From

History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, ed. Martin B. Duberman, Martha Vicinus, and George Chauncey Jr. New York: NAL, 1989.

Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Knopf, 1940.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1997.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1996.

Karamu House

Karamu House—a settlement house, neighborhood center, and complex for the fine arts and performing arts in Cleveland, Ohio—has served the city and helped launch the careers of numerous African American artists since the era of World War I. It was organized as the Playhouse Settlement in 1915 and later renamed Karamu, Swahili for “place of joyful gathering.” The center was an outgrowth of committee work done in 1914 by members of the Men’s Club of the Second Presbyterian Church, who had sensed that the cultural and social needs of the neighborhood—the Central Avenue District, at that time a community of “Jewish, Colored, and Italian peoples”—were being neglected. The committee discovered that “the better class of colored people” there were also interested in establishing a racially integrated social settlement. Early supporters of the idea included the African American author Charles Waddell Chesnutt and the Cleveland Association of Colored Men.

There was almost unanimous concern among local leaders about problems facing and related to the growing population of poor African American migrants from the South. After completing its own preliminary investigation, the committee hired a white couple, Russell and Rowena Jelliffe, who were graduates of Oberlin College and the Chicago School of Civics, to conduct a more extensive survey of the Central Avenue District. The Jelliffes found that the residents “were being denied any hope of or exposure to decent schooling, housing, jobs, recreational facilities and cultural advantages.” In 1915, at the request of the Men’s Club, the Jelliffes moved to Cleveland to head the Playhouse Settlement and to develop programs that would address some of the needs identified in their study. Having worked at Chicago’s Hull House Settlement, they came with some practical experience in social work, but they often described their early activities in Cleveland as “learn as you go.” In a small frame house that was both their own home and the settlement center, game rooms, reading rooms, and classes in sewing, cooking, and crafts “were offered and eagerly received.” The Cleveland Board of Education also made space and equipment available in the Longwood School, including the gymnasium, printing presses, domestic science rooms, and paid teachers “to conduct classes and clubs there.” In 1919, the settlement agency was formally incorporated as the Neighborhood Association. The Karamu Theater was founded in 1927, in a building adjacent to the original complex. With encouragement from the celebrated African American actor Charles Gilpin, a resident troupe called the Gilpin Players raised funds to furnish their performance space, support other settlement activities, and endow scholarships for promising students in the performing and visual arts.

During and after the Great Depression, the Jelliffes, Chesnutt (who was now a member of the settlement’s board), and others worked with the schools and other agencies to foster creativity and interracial cooperation in social settings. These Clevelanders were pioneers in what became part of a national movement. By bringing new works to the stage and casting actors of all nationalities and racial backgrounds, the Jelliffes provided an alternative to the stereotypical plots and roles popular in mainstream American theater.

Langston Hughes was an alumnus of Karamu House. As a student at Cleveland Central High, he had been more interested in the graphic arts than in literature and had taught art to some of the younger students; he later taught graphics at the settlement. The Karamu Theater also produced six of Hughes's plays, which helped to establish it as a "focal point for both Negro and white dramatists writing for the Negro theater." When the Jelliffes retired from Karamu, Hughes expressed his gratitude in the poem "For Russell and Rowena Jelliffe."

REGENNIA N. WILLIAMS

See also Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Gilpin, Charles; Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 4—Cleveland; Hughes, Langston

Further Reading

- Blood, Melanie N. "Theatre in Settlement Houses: Hull House Players, Neighborhood Playhouse, and Karamu Theatre." Theatre History Studies, 16, 1996, pp. 5–69.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1986. (Reprint.)
- Looman, Glen. "Karamu House: The Establishment and Evolution of a Settlement House for Cleveland's African American Community, 1914–1923." Ph.D. dissertation, Cleveland State University, 1997.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941, I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Rampersad, Arnold, and David Roessel, eds. The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes. New York: Knopf, 1995.
- Silver, Reuben. "A History of the Karamu Theatre of Karamu House, 1915–1960." Ph.D. dissertation, Ohio State University, 1961.

Kellogg, Paul U.

Paul U. Kellogg attended the Civic Club Dinner of 21 March 1924—an event that was held in honor of Jessie Redmon Fauset's first novel and that James Weldon Johnson used to announce the emerging Harlem Renaissance to the white literary establishment. Kellogg was so impressed that he devoted the March 1925 issue of Survey Graphic, the social work magazine he edited, to black literature and art. For the six previous years, Survey Graphic had featured nationalist cultural movements such as the "new Ireland" and the "new Russia" and had drawn attention to the emerging cultural pluralism in the United States. For Kellogg, the issue on black art would be an extension of this larger project.

Kellogg wanted to promote acceptance of African Americans and was looking for an approach that would be a departure from both the economic-educational method of Hampton and Tuskegee institutes and the political ideology of those fighting for legal rights in the face of discrimination and lynchings. Accordingly, he turned to the affirmation that could be found in works of art. Kellogg was predisposed toward the views of James Weldon Johnson and Alain Locke rather than those of Fauset, The Crisis, and particularly W. E. B. Du Bois, with whom he had had a falling-out a decade earlier.

Kellogg called on Locke to be a guest editor of the "Harlem issue," which featured the work of James Weldon Johnson, Charles S. Johnson, Rudolph Fisher, Du Bois, Countee Cullen, Anne Spencer, Angelina Grimké, Claude McKay, Jean Toomer, Langston Hughes, W. A. Domingo, Arthur Schomberg, and Walter White, among others. Importantly, Locke later expanded his work on this issue into an anthology, The New Negro (1925).

The March 1925 issue of Survey Graphic was reviewed favorably by H. L. Mencken, Waldo Frank, and Marcus Garvey, among others, and sold extremely well: 42,000 copies. In fact, this was the best-selling issue of Survey Graphic before World War II. However, some writers of the Harlem Renaissance criticized the issue. One point of contention was that Winold Reiss, who had illustrated other issues of the magazine, also worked on the "Harlem issue"; Fauset complained about the artwork because it was not what she considered appropriately "representative." Others said that there were limits to Kellogg's acceptance of African Americans. Kellogg was deeply involved in and committed to the support of black art and the Harlem Renaissance; however, as Hutchinson notes, his viewpoint still seemed to keep African American art in a subordinate position (1995 429). Kellogg's essay "The Negro Pioneers," for example, argued that African Americans were becoming Americanized by entering into the experiences of immigration and pioneering. He was countered on this point by others, among them Du Bois, who argued that the African American experience carried a cultural authority all its own. These debates raised by the "Harlem issue" of Kellogg's magazine were continued with the publication of Locke's book.

Kellogg made a vital contribution to the Harlem Renaissance through the "Harlem issue" of Survey Graphic, but the nature of that contribution also highlighted some of the ideological fissures in the movement, that would later divide it.

Biography

Paul Underwood Kellogg was born 20 September 1879, in Kalamazoo, Michigan. His parents were Frank Israel Kellogg, a businessman; and Mary Foster Underwood. He entered Columbia University in 1901. Kellogg wrote for the Kalamazoo Daily Telegraph after high school; joined Charities Magazine with his brother Arthur in 1902, and through his work there completed a study of life in Pittsburgh that would be published as the Pittsburgh Survey (1910–1914) and would serve as a model of research methods used for social reform; became editor of Charities Magazine (retitled Survey Magazine and later Survey Graphic) in 1912 and promoted it as a social work journal; served as editor of Survey Graphic until the magazine folded in 1952; and crusaded for social reform throughout his life. Kellogg died in 1958.

AMANDA M. LAWRENCE

See also Civic Club Dinner, 1924; Frank, Waldo; Locke, Alain; Mencken, H. L.; New Negro, The; Reiss, Winold; Survey Graphic; specific writers

Further Reading

Chambers, Clarke A. "Paul Underwood Kellogg." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999, Vol.12, pp. 504–505.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Kerlin, Robert

Robert Kerlin, a white socialist academic who taught at colleges throughout the American South during a long career, edited three collections of work by black writers. In response to a wave of race riots that occurred in several northern cities just after World War I, the black press presented a variety of news articles and opinion columns. Kerlin gathered material from leading African American newspapers and published a well-regarded anthology, The Voice of the Negro (1919). In his introduction, Kerlin described the extent and influence of these newspapers and urged that whites who wished to understand African Americans should read the black press. In 1921, The Nation published a letter Kerlin had written protesting the treatment of blacks in Arkansas; Kerlin was immediately fired from his teaching post at the Virginia Military Institute, where he had served for more than a decade.

Kerlin also edited two early anthologies of African American poetry: Contemporary Poetry of the Negro (1921) and Negro Poets and Their Poems (1923). Negro Poets and Their Poems, the more widely read of the two, includes selections from and commentary about more than sixty poets including Phillis Wheatley, Angelina Weld Grimké, Georgia Johnson, Anne Spencer, Langston Hughes, Claude McKay, Walter Everette Hawkins, and Joseph S. Cotter Jr. Kerlin explained that, in selecting poems for his anthology, he looked primarily for "passion." His biographical notes and critical commentary are effusive, and thirty-six of his profiles contain photographs or portrait sketches. Chapter 1 of Negro Poets and Their Poems is a historical overview of folk song and pre-twentieth-century poets. Later chapters treat contemporary poets in groups, labeled "The Present Renaissance of the Negro," "The Heart of Negro Womanhood," "Dialect Verse," "The Poetry of Protest," and so on. Kerlin acknowledged earlier work by James Weldon Johnson and Arthur Schomberg as his guide in selecting poets for inclusion. Negro Poets and Their Poems received little serious critical attention, but it was reviewed briefly in some of the major magazines of the day.

In 1924, Kerlin wrote the lyrics for Samuel Barber's score "My Fairyland." By the 1930s, his political attention had shifted to the labor movement.

Biography

Robert Kerlin was born in Newcastle, Missouri, on 22 March 1866. He studied at Central College in Fayette, Missouri (A.M., 1890); at Johns Hopkins University, the University of Chicago, and Harvard (without completing a degree); and at Yale (Ph.D., 1906). He worked as a professor of English, Missouri Valley College,

Kerlin, Robert

1890–1894, 1901–1902; Southwestern University, 1902–1903; State Normal College, Warrensburg, Missouri, 1903–1906; Yale, 1906–1907; State Normal School, Farmville, Virginia, 1908–1910; Virginia Military Institute, 1910–1921; State Normal School, West Chester, Pennsylvania, 1922–1927; Potomac State College, Keyser, West Virginia, 1927–1933; and Western Maryland College, 1933–1940. He was active in the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1895–1898; and was chaplain for the Third Missouri Volunteers during the Spanish-American War, 1898. Kerlin died in Cumberland, Maryland, on 21 February 1950.

CYNTHIA BILLY

See also Cotter, Joseph Seamon; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; McKay, Claude; Nation, The; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Spencer, Anne

Publications

Mainly for Myself. 1897. (Original poems.)

The Voice of the Negro. 1919.

Contemporary Poetry of the Negro. 1921.

Negro Poets and Their Poems. 1923.

Further Reading

Knight, Lucian Lamar, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Southern Authors. Detroit, Mich: Gale, 1910, 1978.

Potter, Vilma R. "Race and Poetry: Two Anthologies of the Twenties." College Language Association Journal, 29 (March 1986).

Who Was Who in America, Vol. 3, 1951–1960. Marquis Who's Who, 1966.

King, Billy

William (Billy) King, born in Whistler, Alabama, in 1875, was a living link between the Harlem Renaissance and nineteenth-century black minstrelsy. He left home at an early age and found a niche in black minstrel shows as part of the famous Georgia Minstrels in the late 1890s.

In 1898 he teamed with Clarence Bush to form King and Bush Wide Mouth Minstrels. They toured successfully until 1902, when the troupe became stranded in Texas. King rejoined the Georgia Minstrels, in which the great Billy Kersands was the main attraction, and established himself along with Kersands as one of the four leading comedians of the troupe; he was noted for his stylish dressing.

In 1911 King went into vaudeville. He formed his own stock company in 1912, the same year he married Hattie McIntosh, widow of a famous minstrel. He wrote prolifically for shows performed at the various theaters where his company was based, including the Central in Atlanta (1912), the Lyric in Kansas City (1913), and the Star in Savannah (1914).

In 1915, he established a permanent base for his company at the white-owned Grand Theater in Chicago. From 1916 until 1923, he wrote, staged, and performed in a remarkable series of musical comedies and sketches, often changing shows every week. At least forty-four shows can be identified, mostly complete presentations although some were supporting sketches for white vaudeville. Many of them toured the black vaudeville circuits for which King was a booking agent, including Harlem's Lafayette Theater. He was also involved in operating theaters in Louisville, Chattanooga, Atlanta, Savannah, Birmingham, Jacksonville, Mobile, and elsewhere.

King's stock company employed a large roster of performers, many of whom went on to greater things. An early protégée was Gertrude Saunders, later famous in Shuffle Along. Other notable names included the comedian Billy Higgins, the female impersonator Andrew Tribble, the dancer Ida Forsythe, Lottie Gee (also of Shuffle Along), and Maude Russell. King also claimed to have helped promote the early career of Florence Mills.

His innovations included the clowning and chorus girl routine that later made Josephine Baker famous. He did not balk at including social and political satire on the race question, causing Lester Walton to describe one show as being like a protest meeting held under the auspices of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). When King's long run at the Grand Theater finally ended, he went back to vaudeville, taking the Billy King Road Show on tour from 1923 until it disbanded in Oklahoma City in 1925. The band stayed together as Walter Page's Blue Devils, the original nucleus of the Count Basie Orchestra.

King continued in show business, but after 1925 his career is obscure. He played in Earl Dancer and Ethel Waters' show Vanities in 1926 but later sought an injunction to prevent them from using his material. In 1937 he was elected president of the Colored Actors'

Billy King, c. 1907. (Library of Congress.)

Protective Society, which was based in New York. In 1967 Langston Hughes and Milton Melzer listed him in their “golden dozen” of all-time best black comedians. The date of King’s death is unrecorded.

Biography

William (Billy) King was born in Whistler, Alabama, in 1875. He was a cofounder of King and Bush Wide Mouth (later Colored) Minstrels, 1898–1902; a member of the Georgia Minstrels, 1902–1911; and founder and owner of the Billy King Stock Company, 1912–1923. He was elected president of the Colored Actors’ Protective Society, New York, 1937. The date of King’s death is unknown but was probably sometime in the 1960s.

BILL EGAN

See also Baker, Josephine; Blackface Performance; Forsyne, Ida; Lafayette Theater; Mills, Florence; Minstrelsy; Muse, Clarence; Musical Theater; Shuffle Along; Theater Owners’ Booking Association; Vaudeville; Waters, Ethel

Theatrical Productions and Performances

- 1912: Two Bills from Alaska.
- 1914: Two Bills from Alaska (second edition).
- 1914: Carnation.
- 1914: Out in the Street.
- 1914: The Runaway’s Return.
- 1916: The Rivals.
- 1916: The Undertaker’s Daughter.
- 1916: Preparedness.
- 1916: The Other Fellow.
- 1917: Exploits in Africa.
- 1917: The Face at the Window.
- 1917: The Final Rehearsal.
- 1917: Hotel Nobody.
- 1917: The Kidnapper.
- 1917: Lady for a Day.
- 1917: The Lonesome Mile.
- 1917: A Mother-in-law’s Disposition.
- 1917: Neighbours.
- 1917: Raiding a Cabaret.
- 1917: The Senator.
- 1918: The Board of Education.
- 1918: Catching the Burglar.
- 1918: Chief Outlanchette.
- 1918: The Con Man.
- 1918: The Heart Breakers.
- 1918: My Rich Uncle.
- 1918: At The Beach.
- 1918: Goodby Everybody.
- 1918: In the Draft.
- 1918: Mr Jazz from Dixie.
- 1918: The Night Raid.
- 1918: Now I’m a Mason.
- 1918: The Rich Uncle.
- 1919: Exploits in Africa.
- 1919: Over the Top.
- 1919: They’re Off.
- 1920: China Town.
- 1920: Hello Dixieland.
- 1920: The New Americans.
- 1920: Lime Kiln Club.
- 1921: Trip Around the World.
- 1922: Moonshine.
- 1922: Darktown Jubilee.
- 1922: Hello Sue.
- 1922: Hits and Bits.
- 1922: Moonshine.
- 1922: Whirl of Joy.
- 1923: Burgleton Green versus Spark Plug.
- 1923: Whirl of Pleasure.

King, Billy

1924: Hits and Bits. (1924 edition.)

1923–1925: Billy King Road Show.

1926: Vanities. (With Earl Dancer and Ethel Waters.)

Further Reading

“Billy King’s Unpublished Memoirs.” Leigh Whipper Papers. Moorland-Spingarn Collection, Howard University, Washington, D.C.

Fletcher, Tom. The Tom Fletcher Story: 100 Years of the Negro in Show Business. New York: Burdge, 1954, p. 196.

“Hughes, Langston” and “Melzer, Milton.” In Black Magic: A Pictorial History of the Negro in the Performing Arts. New York: Crown, 1968, p. 336.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984, p. 210.

Page, Walter. “About My Life in Music, as Told to Frank Driggs.” Jazz Review, November 1958, pp. 12–15.

Pearson, Nathan W. Goin’ to Kansas City. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1994.

Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993a, p. 112.

———. A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993b.

———. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001, p. 158.

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow Press, 1980, pp. 94–96.

———. The Ghost Walks. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1988.

Walton, Lester. “Review of Over the Top at Lafayette Theater.” New York Age, July 26, 1919.

Kirkpatrick, Sidney

The baritone Sidney Kirkpatrick acted and entertained in minstrel shows, vaudeville, musicals, and dramas during the period of the Harlem Renaissance. His first professional engagement was with Billy Kersands’s Minstrels in 1902–1903. He was hired as a singer with Richards and Pringle’s Minstrels in 1909. Later, he went into vaudeville with his wife, Laura Bowman; they toured the United States and Europe together for nearly ten years with the Dark Town Entertainers, a group Kirkpatrick had founded. The repertoire of this group was unique in theatrical circles. The members sang and danced, with Bowman, the highlight of the evening, performing varied characterizations in costume. One of her favorites was “Salome,” from the opera of that name.

In 1914, Kirkpatrick played the title role in Captain Rufus, a military comedy that had first been produced by the Pekin Theater in Chicago in 1907. In 1917, he appeared in the second production of the Frederick Douglass Film Company, The Scapegoat, which had its premiere on 15 May, at the Simplex Theater in New York City. The impressive cast also included Abbie Mitchell, Walker Thompson, Maude Jones, and Leon Williams. This film—an adaptation of a story by Paul Laurence Dunbar—was widely reviewed by critics of the time and was so successful that it was booked by white as well as black motion picture houses.

Bowman and Kirkpatrick separated in 1918, but they continued to perform together with the legendary Lafayette Players in Harlem in such shows as His Honor, the Mayor (1918); Shades of Hades (1922), in which Kirkpatrick played Satan; and That Gets It (1928). They also performed together in 1923 in the landmark productions of the Ethiopian Art Players, a group formed by Raymond O’Neil and the wife of Sherwood Anderson. These presentations included Salome, in which Kirkpatrick was praised for his portrayal of King Herod; The Chip Woman’s Fortune, in which he played the role of Silas Green; and A Comedy of Errors, in which he played the merchant Aegeon. Kirkpatrick made his final appearance on Broadway in 1928, as Enos Green in Meek Mose, written by Frank Wilson and produced by Lester Walton. He died two years later.

As his career developed during first two decades of the twentieth century, Kirkpatrick had come to be one of the favorites among many talented performers in Harlem. In addition, his professional affiliations with major production groups and other influential artists of this era contributed to his own success in the performing arts as well as the continuing development of other black Americans in this field.

Biography

The date of Sidney Kirkpatrick’s birth is uncertain. Kirkpatrick performed with Billy Kersands’s Minstrels, 1909; and played the title role in Captain Rufus, 1914. He also performed in The Scapegoat, 1917; His Honor, the Mayor, 1918; Shades of Hades, 1922; Salome, 1923; The Chip Woman’s Fortune, 1923; A Comedy of Errors, 1923;

That Gets It, 1928; and Meek Mose, 1928. He founded the Dark Town Entertainers. Kirkpatrick died in New York City in 1930.

CARMEN PHELPS

See also Ethiopian Art Players; Lafayette Players; Minstrelsy; Mitchell, Abbie; Walton, Lester; Wilson, Frank

Further Reading

- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1930.
- Mapp, Edward. Directory of Blacks in the Performing Arts. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1978.
- Peterson, Bernard. The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.
- . Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow, 1995.
- Spradling, Mary Mace, ed. In Black and White: A Guide to Magazine Articles, Newspaper Articles, and Books Concerning More Than 15,000 Black Individuals and Groups, 3rd ed., 2 vols. and Supplement. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1980, 1985.

Knopf, Alfred A.

Alfred A. Knopf founded the publishing house Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., in New York in 1915 and then served as chairman of this highly respected firm until 1972. Knopf was interested in poetry, European literature in translation, and literature that touched on issues of the day; and he shepherded the house through a tremendously productive period in the 1920s. During this time, the firm emerged as both the leading venue for writers of the Harlem Renaissance—publishing works by Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson, Nella Larsen, Carl Van Vechten, and Walter White, among others—and a dominant force in the American literary marketplace at large. The Knopf imprint (which later became a subsidiary of Random House) is still recognized through its “Borzoï” icon, an image of a Russian hound.

Alfred Knopf was born in New York City, the son of Samuel Knopf and Ida Japhe Knopf, Jewish immigrants from Europe. Alfred’s mother died when he was four years old. Samuel Knopf became successful in advertising, and in 1906 the family moved from Manhattan to Long Island. Knopf was educated first at public schools, then at the MacKenzie School in Westchester, New York, before receiving a bachelor of arts degree from Columbia University in 1912. At Columbia, he studied literature with Brander Matthews; Bernard Boyeson, who was an early American advocate of Russian writers; and Joel Spingarn, who would later become a prominent publisher and an activist with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Knopf also wrote for, and became advertising manager of, the Columbia Monthly. After graduation, Knopf traveled in Europe and Britain, where he met and stayed with the writer John Galsworthy. On returning to the United States, Knopf cast aside his plans to attend Harvard Law School and, with some difficulty and using his father’s connections, found a position in the accounting department of the publishing firm Doubleday, Page, and Company. During the period around 1915, the publishing industry was not generally open to Jews; and it was still in the process of becoming an industry located almost exclusively in New York. The opening up of the publishing business, along with its newly centralized location in New York, helped fuel those aspects of the Harlem Renaissance that relied on receptive mainstream white publishers and a consolidation of cultural outlets in New York.

In 1915, after a brief stint with the firm of Mitchell Kennerley, Knopf launched his own business with the financial assistance of his father and the enthusiastic editorial assistance of the woman he would marry in 1916, Blanche Wolf. In 1916, Knopf’s new house published a number of Russian, German, and French works in translation and a book of music criticism by Carl Van Vechten, Music and Bad Manners (1916). Van Vechten, a white critic and man about town, would come to play a significant role in the Knopfs’ support of African American writers and subjects. Van Vechten’s first novel, Peter Whiffle (1922), was a best-seller for the company and on that basis Van Vechten was able to build his influence. Knopf demonstrated his interest in the burgeoning genre of African American literature by publishing Walter White’s controversial novel about the riots in Atlanta, The Fire in the Flint, in 1924. The following year, after meeting White through Alfred Knopf’s introduction, Van Vechten began to exert his influence in support of Langston Hughes and then other African American writers.

Knopf, Alfred A.

When Van Vechten and Hughes first became friends, in 1925, Hughes had just won a prize for his poem “The Weary Blues.” Van Vechten insisted on reading a collection of Hughes’s poems, made suggestions, and—most important—brought the poems to Knopf for consideration. Hughes’s first book, The Weary Blues (1926), began what would become a long and complex relationship among Hughes, Van Vechten, Alfred Knopf, and Blanche Knopf. Emily Bernard’s collection of letters between Van Vechten and Hughes (2001) suggests both the helpful and the manipulative aspects of the relationship between the older established white writer and the younger, unknown, but promising African American. Ultimately, Bernard finds much of value in the assistance Van Vechten gave to Hughes, indicated perhaps best by the longevity of their friendship but also by the efficacy of that first gesture: “Van Vechten’s one lunch date with Alfred Knopf meant that Hughes could quit his tedious day job doing research” (Bernard 2001, p. xxi).

Van Vechten soon became the most notable—and in some quarters the most notorious—white popularizer of the Harlem Renaissance, with the publication by Knopf of his best-selling novel Nigger Heaven (1926). The novel was condemned by many critics even as it opened market-driven publishing opportunities for ever more African American writers. The Knopf publishing house went on to bring out such landmarks as James Weldon Johnson’s Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, which it reissued in 1927 to great acclaim—and to a much wider audience than Johnson had achieved when the work was originally issued by a lesser-known publisher in 1912. Knopf also published Nella Larsen’s pair of novels, Quicksand (1928) and Passing (1929).

Alfred Knopf’s personal style, at least by his own account, seems to have played a role in the success and high reputation of his firm. In his unpublished memoirs, probably written in the 1960s, Knopf remembers the early days of the firm fondly: “1920 completed our first five years and we marked this anniversary with the publication of The Borzoi, 1920, a small volume which I think is unique in publishing. It shows our authors to have been a happy family in the early days, for many of them wrote pieces for it, about other authors on the list” (Moore and Lewis 1992). The sense of a “family” was underscored by the social relations that developed between the Knopfs and their authors. Knopf writes warmly of the period from 1924 to 1928, when the couple lived at 1148 Fifth Avenue and entertained guests such as George Gershwin, who played the piano; Paul Robeson, who sang; and James Alfred A. Knopf, photographed by Carl Van Vechten, 1935.

(Library of Congress.)

Weldon Johnson, who recited his poems. At the same time, however, Knopf was not a gentleman publisher; he was running a business and he needed to make money. According to the critic Clifton Fadiman, in his introduction to another promotional retrospective collection put out by the Knopf publishing house in 1965 to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary, the company “was started not as a playboy’s exercise but as a business. It has remained one, with attention methodically paid to the superior attractions of black ink over red” (1965, ix).

In addition to its role in the Harlem Renaissance, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., emerged as a major publisher of nationally and internationally renowned authors. During the period of the Harlem Renaissance, Knopf’s list included Wallace Stevens, Ezra Pound, Willa Cather, T. S. Eliot, Edmund Wilson, H. L. Mencken, Dashiell Hammett, E. M. Forster, and Thomas Mann.

Biography

Alfred Abraham Knopf was born 12 September 1892 in New York City. He studied at public schools in New York; MacKenzie School, Westchester, New York; and Columbia University (A.B., 1912). He worked in the accounting department of Doubleday, Page, and Company, 1912–1914; founded the publishing house Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1915; and became chairman emeritus in 1972. He was publisher of American Mercury, 1924–1934. Knopf was chairman of the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments of the National Park Service; a member of the American Historical Association and the New York State Historical Society; a trustee of the American Scenic Historic Preservation Society; and a member of the Overseers' Visiting Committee of the English Department of Harvard University. He died in Purchase, New York, 11 August 1984.

JOSHUA BOAZ KOTZIN

See also American Mercury; Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Fire in the Flint, The; Gershwin, George; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Knopf, Alfred A., Inc.; Knopf, Blanche; Larsen, Nella; Mencken, H. L.; Nigger Heaven; Passing: Novel; Publishers and Publishing Houses; Quicksand; Robeson, Paul; Spingarn, Joel; Van Vechten, Carl; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Bernard, Emily, ed. Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten, 1925–1964. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Fadiman, Clifton, ed. Fifty Years. New York: Knopf, 1965.
- Flora, Peter. "Carl Van Vechten, Blanche Knopf, and the Harlem Renaissance." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.
- Knopf, Alfred A., ed. The Borzoi 1920: Being a Sort of Record of Five Years' Publishing. New York: Knopf, 1920.
- Lewis, Randolph. "Langston Hughes and Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1925–1935." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.
- Moore, Heather, and Randolph Lewis, eds. "The Education of a Publisher: Selections from the Memoirs of Alfred A. Knopf." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.

Knopf, Alfred A., Inc.

The publishing house Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., was founded by Alfred Knopf in New York in 1915. With the financial assistance of his father, Samuel Knopf, and the editorial guidance of his wife, Blanche Wolfe Knopf, Alfred guided the house through a tremendously productive period in the 1920s as it emerged as both the leading venue for writers of the Harlem Renaissance—publishing works by Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson, Nella Larsen, Carl Van Vechten, and Walter White, among others—and as a dominant force in the American literary marketplace at large. The Knopf imprint (which became a subsidiary of Random House) still uses its logo of a borzoi, a Russian hound.

The advent of Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., was an important development in the Harlem Renaissance both because of the particular works it published and because of the larger trends of which it was an exemplary part. During the period around 1915, the publishing industry was still an elite Anglo-American business, and it was still in the process of becoming an industry located mostly in New York. Opening up the publishing business to Jews such as the Knopfs, along with the industry's newly centralized location in New York, helped fuel those aspects of the Harlem Renaissance that relied on receptive mainstream publishers and a consolidation of cultural outlets in New York. Alfred Knopf's interest in European literature—described by Randolph Lewis as "a wider definition of what was publishable"—was combined with Blanche Knopf's "fluency in French and fondness for French culture," which "made her a perfect envoy to Parisian literary circles." Lewis adds: "This multicultural attitude made the house of Knopf atypical among the literary publishers of New York, ideal for alternative American voices from outside the literary establishment—such as those of African American writers" (1992, 53).

In 1916, the new house published a number of Russian, German, and French works in translation and a book of music criticism by Carl Van Vechten, Music and Bad Manners (1916). Van Vechten, a white critic and man about town, would play an important part in the Knopfs' support of African American writers and subjects. Van Vechten's first novel, Peter Whiffle (1922), was a best-seller for the company, and on that basis Van Vechten was able to build his influence. Knopf demonstrated his own interest in the burgeoning genre of African American literature by publishing Walter White's controversial novel about riots in Atlanta, The Fire in the Flint, in 1924; the following year, after meeting Walter White through Alfred Knopf's introduction, Van Vechten began to exert his influence in support of, first, Langston Hughes and then other African American writers.

When Van Vechten and Hughes first became friends in 1925, Hughes had just won a prize for his poem "The Weary Blues." Van Vechten insisted on reading a collection of Hughes's poems, made suggestions, and—most important—brought the poems to Knopf for consideration. Hughes's first book, The Weary Blues (1926), began what would become a long and complex relationship among Hughes, Van Vechten, Alfred Knopf, and Blanche Knopf. Emily Bernard's collection of letters between Van Vechten and Hughes (2001) suggests both the helpful and the manipulative aspects of their relationship. Ultimately, Bernard seems to find much of value in the assistance Van Vechten gave Hughes, which was perhaps indicated best by the longevity of their friendship.

Van Vechten had considerable muscle to flex at Knopf when he decided to help Hughes. Hughes had impressed the black literati with his early poems, but none of his mentors in Harlem had the power to get his work published. "Van Vechten's one lunch date with Alfred Knopf meant that Hughes could quit his tedious day job doing research" (Bernard, xxi).

Van Vechten soon became the most noted—and was considered by some the most notorious—white popularizer of the Harlem Renaissance, with the publication by Knopf of his best-selling novel Nigger Heaven (1926). The novel was condemned by many critics even as it opened up a market, and thus publishing opportunities, for increasingly more African American writers. The Knopf publishing house, partially through Van Vechten's influence, went on to bring out such landmarks as its reissue in 1927 of James Weldon Johnson's Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; this had first been published in 1912, when it had only a small press run, but now it found a much wider audience. Knopf also published Nella Larsen's novels Quicksand (1928) and Passing (1929).

The relationship between the Knopfs and Langston Hughes illustrates how financial considerations, always a source of concern, could produce tension over questions of creative and political autonomy. When money became more of an issue, the Knopfs put more pressure on Hughes to produce marketable work: "The financial pressures of the early 1930s forced the shortcomings of the Knopfs' treatment of Hughes to the surface; with fewer people buying books, the Knopfs became less tolerant publishers" (Lewis 1992, 56). Also, as Hughes, in the early 1930s, became more politically engaged with causes that were not exclusively African American, economic and ideological fissures began to appear: "The Knopfs, with Van Vechten's support, as many letters indicate, implicitly and explicitly urged Hughes to focus his writing on racial subjects. Political themes were only acceptable if they stuck to primarily racial issues" (Lewis 1992, 57). Despite these problems, Hughes seems to have appreciated his long-standing relationship with the Knopfs. He wrote to them in 1941: "Dear Alfred and Blanche, This June marks for me twenty years of publication—largely thanks to you as my publishers. With my continued gratitude and affection . . . Langston Hughes" (Lewis 1992, 62).

Lewis concludes:

Financial pressures in the early years of the Depression took a toll on the Knopf-Harlem relationship, as did age. The Knopfs were no longer the "new breed" of publisher; younger, more daring publishers assumed this role. With the Knopfs reaching middle age and their firm growing in reputation, they gradually entered into the fold of the publishing establishment, letting someone else save the world from commercial publishing of the narrow-minded variety. (63)

At the same time as it was participating in the triumphs and conflicts of the Harlem Renaissance, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., emerged as a major publisher of nationally and internationally regarded authors. During the period of the Harlem Renaissance, Knopf's list included Wallace Stevens, Ezra Pound, Willa Cather, T. S. Eliot, Edmund Wilson, H. L. Mencken, Dashiell Hammett, E. M. Forster, and Thomas Mann—the "publishing establishment" indeed.

JOSHUA BOAZ KOTZIN

See also Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Fire in the Flint, The; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Knopf, Alfred A.; Knopf, Blanche; Larsen, Nella; Mencken, H. L.; Nigger Heaven; Passing; Novel; Publishers and Publishing Houses; Quicksand; Van Vechten, Carl; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Bernard, Emily, ed. Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten, 1925–1964. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Fadiman, Clifton, ed. Fifty Years. New York: Knopf, 1965.
- Flora, Peter. "Carl Van Vechten, Blanche Knopf, and the Harlem Renaissance." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.

- Knopf, Alfred A., ed. The Borzoi 1920: Being a Sort of Record of Five Years' Publishing. New York: Knopf, 1920.
- Lewis, Randolph. "Langston Hughes and Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., 1925–1935." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.
- Moore, Heather, and Randolph Lewis, eds. "The Education of a Publisher: Selections from the Memoirs of Alfred A. Knopf." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.

Knopf, Blanche

As a director of Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., Publishers, from its founding in 1915 until her death in 1966, Blanche Knopf helped many authors of the Harlem Renaissance gain a wider audience by the seemingly simple means of recognizing their talent and accepting and publishing their work. Under her guidance, the new firm quickly developed a reputation as a publisher of high-quality literary books. While Blanche Knopf is best known as the publisher who introduced English translations of important European writers, including Sigmund Freud, Albert Camus, and Thomas Mann, to the United States, she was also responsible for the fact that Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., became one of the most significant publishers of the writers of the Harlem Renaissance.

When Blanche Wolf and her future husband, Alfred (they married in 1916), established the publishing firm of Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., in 1915, there were no models for a woman who wished to do serious work as a book editor and publisher. In this period there was no question that the firm would bear Alfred's name alone, or that his title would be (and would remain) a bit more impressive than Blanche's, although the two were equal in their responsibilities, their talent, and their accomplishments. As the firm grew, Alfred made full use of the contacts he made through male-only organizations such as the Publishers' Lunch Club, while Blanche became adept at using her social connections to cultivate writers. Her work with writers was personal and individual; writers with whom she worked received invitations to lunch and personal letters from her regularly.

For the first several years of her work with the firm, the multilingual Knopf focused on learning about the technical aspects of book publishing and on acquiring the works of French writers. But the firm also took on an angry novel about riots in Atlanta, Walter White's The Fire in the Flint (1924). Like most of the company's books, The Fire in the Flint sold respectably, but it was by no means a best-seller. Two years later, the company published White's second novel, Flight (1926), about Atlanta's black middle class and African Americans who "passed" in the North. As a black writer whose work was being issued by a major publisher of the 1920s, White was in small group. Most black writers at the time published and sold their own work, or they found their work accepted by a very few small presses in New York that turned out good books but could not reach a national audience. With Knopf, White found himself in a community of recognized writers with a supportive editor. A letter that White wrote to Knopf in 1928, as he was working on Rope and Faggot (1929)—a book about lynching in the United States, which Knopf published—includes greetings to Carl Van Vechten and to other writers of the Harlem Renaissance who were also published by Knopf.

It was through her friendship with Carl Van Vechten, the controversial white author of the novel Nigger Heaven (1926), that Knopf was encouraged to take on the works of more black American writers. Van Vechten was fascinated by the culture of Harlem, and he had asked the Knopfs for an introduction to Walter White. With White as his guide, he became acquainted with many of the important writers and musicians of Harlem in the 1920s, and he wrote reviews and criticism of their work. He suggested to Blanche that Knopf, Inc., turn its attention to "the Negro question," and she agreed to consider manuscripts Van Vechten sent her way.

In 1925, Van Vechten brought Blanche a manuscript of a collection by an unknown poet, Langston Hughes. At Van Vechten's urging, Blanche agreed to publish The Weary Blues (1926), making Hughes the first African American poet to be published by a major firm in the United States. Knopf took Hughes under her wing, guiding his manuscript through the production and marketing process, and also helping him with personal and professional advice and encouragement. Knopf acted in some ways as Hughes's agent, negotiating royalties and speaker's fees that he was too timid to ask for himself. Hughes's second collection of poetry, Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), was, in Knopf's view, too political and not as marketable as his first book. Although Knopf and Hughes disagreed about the direction of his work, and their professional relationship grew strained as Hughes's work became more political and less profitable, Knopf, Inc., continued to publish Hughes's work, including the novel Not without Laughter (1930).

Knopf took on the work of several other writers of the Harlem Renaissance, in many cases acting on Van Vechten's advice. Important Knopf publications include James Weldon Johnson's Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1927) and Black Manhattan (1930); Nella Larsen's two novels, Quicksand (1928) and Passing (1929); and Rudolph Fisher's Walls of Jericho (1930). A pattern emerged with these books: Van Vechten identified the work; Knopf edited and published it; and, frequently, Van Vechten wrote the introduction. Knopf also published the work of Van Vechten, including the sensational Nigger Heaven. The title of that novel was intended to be offensive and eye-catching, and it was both. The book was intended as a sympathetic portrayal of urban African American life, but many readers found it condescending.

Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., was a business, and Blanche Knopf accepted manuscripts that she expected would turn a profit for the company. But she considered manuscripts that most publishing houses at the time would not consider, she nurtured new talents, and she made it possible—and profitable—for African American writers of the 1920s to reach a national audience.

Blanche Knopf. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Blanche Wolf Knopf was born 30 July 1894 in New York City. She was educated by private governesses and at the Gardner School. With Alfred A. Knopf, her future husband, she founded the publishing company Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., in New York City (1915), and the Borzoi colophon and imprint (1916). She was the firm's office manager, 1916–1921; its director and vice president, 1921–1957; and its director and president, 1957–1966. Her awards included the following: French Legion of Honor, Chevalier (1949) and Officer (1960); Brazilian Order of the Southern Cross, Cavaliero (1952) and Oficial (1964); honorary degrees from Franklin and Marshall College (1962), Western College for Women (1966), and Adelphi University (1966); and the Women's National Book Association Skinner Award (1966). She died 4 June 1966 in New York City.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Black Manhattan; Fine Clothes to the Jew; Fire in the Flint, The; Fisher, Rudolph; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Knopf, Alfred A.; Knopf, Alfred A., Inc.; Larsen, Nella; Nigger Heaven; Not without Laughter; Passing: Novel; Quicksand; Van Vechten, Carl; Walls of Jericho, The; Weary Blues, The; White, Walter

Further Reading

Flora, Peter. "Carl Van Vechten, Blanche Knopf, and the Harlem Renaissance." Library Chronicle of the University of Texas, 22(4), 1992.

Henderson, Cathy, comp. The Company They Kept: Alfred A. and Blanche W. Knopf, Publishers: An Exhibition Catalog, ed. Dave Oliphant. Austin: University of Texas at Austin, 1995.

Knopf, Alfred A. "Blanche W. Knopf, July 30, 1894–June 4, 1966." Borzoi Quarterly, 15(3), 1966.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, 2 vols. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Krigwa Players

The Krigwa Players Little Theater Group was founded in 1925 by Crisis magazine at the urging of W. E. B. Du Bois. By all accounts, the Krigwa Players were dedicated to the production of theater by, for, about, and near black Americans, with a special emphasis on the production of plays with a racially conscious message. The name Krigwa (originally Crigwa) is an acronym representing the initial sounds and letters of the legendary Crisis Guild of Writers and Artists. Famous members of the Krigwa Players included the artist Aaron Douglas (who painted the scenery for the group) and the playwrights Mary T. Burrill (who wrote Aftermath and They That Sit in Darkness), Willis Richardson (who wrote The Chip Woman's Fortune and Boothblack Lover), May Miller (who wrote Riding the Goat and Harriet Tubman), and Georgia Douglas Johnson (who wrote Blue Blood and Sunday Morning in the South). The contributions of Krigwa to the development of black theater are vast: the group awarded prizes to encourage blacks to write drama, used Crisis as an outlet for establishing guidelines for budding dramatists, provided space for the workshopping of dramas in progress, and served as a training ground for black actors and actresses.

Success stories attributable to Krigwa are abundant. For example, when the administration of Howard University refused to grant the Howard Players permission to perform some of Willis Richardson's works (because the administrators considered them propaganda), Richardson was encouraged by Du Bois to submit his plays to black theater houses and to Crisis. Richardson's first-place award in the first annual Krigwa drama contest helped bring national attention to his work. Another example of Krigwa's successful promotion of black theater practitioners is May Miller, whose plays had previously been staged primarily in educational environments with little financial support for her work. Miller was able to advance her theater career by winning prizes in Krigwa's playwriting contests and by joining the Baltimore Krigwa group as director, performer, and actor. Additionally, two of Krigwa's performers—Richard Hughly and Doralyn Spence—joined professional casts in downtown theaters after the successes of the Krigwa group in the Belasco tournament.

Theophilus Lewis, the black drama critic for the Messenger, praised Krigwa and other "little theater" groups operating in black communities for staging serious and potentially educational plays by blacks. Du Bois described the Krigwa Players as a group dedicated to presenting black community theater, with special attention to noncommercial theater with a political message: even more specifically, they supported developing propaganda plays that could be used to politically uplift and to educate African Americans. Occasionally, the Krigwa Players would include interpretive dancing on their programs, but Krigwa's promotion of political theater was especially important because, without the help of a communal group, this type of theater was not likely to gain an audience. It rarely appealed to wealthy theatergoers, theater owners, or any other group without a strong allegiance to the black community.

The Krigwa "little theater" movement quickly found support not only in New York but also in other areas of the country. The original Krigwa Players operated under the direction of Charles Burroughs and met in the basement of the New York Public Library on 135th Street—a space offered by the librarian, Earnestine Rose. Material support for the group came from a variety of sources. Amy Spingarn provided the money for the prizes that the group awarded. The New York Public Library provided stage space, dressing rooms, and lighting equipment. The players wrote their own plays, acted the parts, furnished audiences, and attended to any other necessary aspects of production. The Krigwa Players soon had extensions in Cleveland, Ohio; New Haven, Connecticut; Baltimore, Maryland; Washington, D.C.; and Denver, Colorado.

The Krigwa Players' first major production took place on 25 October 1926, as they enlivened the Crisis awards dinner with performances of Willis Richardson's Compromise and Eulalie Spence's Fool's Errand. In addition, they regularly offered local weekend performances and participated in small competitions for one-act plays. In May 1927, the New York group entered a national "little theater" tournament and again presented Fool's Errand, in a performance that was praised in the New York Times as a close second to the top performance of the tournament. In June 1927, Spence's The Hunch was performed by the Krigwa Players of Washington, D.C. In 1928, The Crisis reported that the group was not meeting as regularly as before but that it had performed Mary Burrill's Aftermath in the Belasco tournament, with the encouragement of the tournament's promoters.

By 1930, there is no record of the group's activities, and their practice and performance space was given to the Harlem Experimental Theater. Various explanations for the demise of Krigwa have been offered. Du Bois said that after the group won the national "little theater" contest, its activities slowed because its best members were lured away by downtown theaters, which could give performers more money and greater exposure; however, the fatal blow, according to Du Bois, was the onset of the Depression. This second reason seems somewhat unlikely, though, since other black acting troupes, such as the Harlem Experimental Theater, survived.

Another explanation was given by some group members, who said they left because of Du Bois's increasingly heavy-handed promotion of the propaganda play, without respect for their individual artistic concerns: while they understood the need for political theater, they did not want to limit their art to political themes. For instance, Eulalie Spence—one of the first writers to have her work produced by Krigwa—grew increasingly frustrated because Du Bois was insisting that she write about issues which were not engaging for her. Still another explanation had to do with money: the New York group was said to have dissolved over a disagreement about the money that had been won in the tournament of 1927; when Du Bois claimed the total amount for expenses, without sharing any of the prize with the group members, some of them became embittered and left the troupe. In any case, after the group in New York broke up, Krigwa groups across the country soon did the same.

Though the life of Krigwa was short and its concerns were often controversial, it had a significant role in the developments of black theater at the time and significant effects on the black theater that followed.

ETHEL A. YOUNG-MINOR

See also Community Theater; Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fool's Errand; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Lewis, Theophilus; Little Theater Tournament; Messenger, The; 135th Street Library; Richardson, Willis

Further Reading

- Archer, Leonard. Black Images in the American Theatre: NAACP Protest Campaigns. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Pageant-Poseidon, 1973.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Kellner, Bruce. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.
- Lester, Julius, ed. The Seventh Son: The Thoughts and Writings of W. E. B. Du Bois. New York: Random House, 1971.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Mitchell, Loftin. Black Drama. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.

Labor

The Harlem Renaissance has sometimes been interpreted largely in terms of race. Analyses, however, are incomplete without an understanding of the important fact that the vast majority of black Americans, including Harlemites, were working people. Indeed, the lives of working black Americans provided much of the subject matter for the authors, poets, painters, and photographers of the Harlem Renaissance. It was this focus as much as anything that distinguished early authors of the renaissance, such as Claude McKay, Langston Hughes, and Jean Toomer, from their black predecessors. Particularly significant for their art was the great movement of blacks from the South to the North that was happening during the time of the Harlem Renaissance. Much of what the authors observed and wrote about concerned the difficult transition of rural agricultural folk into an urban working class.

In the early twentieth century, black Americans were so constrained by systematic racial oppression and discrimination that the structure of black America was radically different from that of white America. In Harlem during the 1920s, 90 percent of black Americans were blue-collar workers. Not only were black Americans excluded from skilled, supervisory, and managerial positions (except in black businesses); they were also excluded from entire industries, segregated into positions requiring strength and endurance, and often given the dirtiest and most dangerous tasks. In 1930, for example, the following occupations in America were most heavily occupied by blacks: laborers in fertilizer factories (84.1 percent), laborers in turpentine farms and distilleries (82 percent), launderers and laundresses not in a laundry (75.1 percent), porters other than those in stores (73.5 percent), cooks other than those in hotels and boardinghouses (68.5 percent), operatives in fertilizer factories (67.6 percent), laborers in cigar and tobacco factories (59.5 percent), operatives in turpentine farms and distilleries (53.1 percent), bootblacks (50.6 percent), and midwives (50.1 percent; "The Negro in Industry" 1936, 976).

Because opportunities for work for black men were infrequent, and because black men's work was insecure, the proportion of black women in the paid labor force was greater than that of women in almost any other group—although opportunities were even more restricted for black women than for black men. In 1934, for instance, about 25 percent of all women over the age of fifteen were in the paid workforce, but the figure for black women was about 50 percent. In 1925, 45 percent of married black women worked, whereas the rate for all married women was about 15 percent. Of all child workers, 36 percent were black. Six times more black girls under age sixteen worked than white girls. Four times more black women over age sixty-five worked than white women.

Not only were employers reluctant to hire black men; labor unions and white workers were generally also hostile. Studies of New York City by George S. Schuyler, published in 1927, revealed that no blacks worked as salesclerks in major department stores. Macy's hired blacks as elevator operators, cafeteria workers, and escalator men; but Gimbel's refused all black labor, claiming that white workers and shoppers would object. Of the large employers in New York, not one hired blacks as semiskilled or skilled workers. In the transit systems, no drivers were black; the systems that did hire blacks used them as porters or messengers.

World War I was a watershed for African Americans. It marked the first time that black Americans in large numbers were able to break the "agricultural ceiling." Half a million blacks left the South for northern and western cities between 1916 and 1920. While the war lasted, despite residential segregation and differential wage rates, black workers had opportunities in mass-production industries at much better rates of pay than they were used to. Following peace and the economic collapse of 1921–1922, there was a recovery; during the rest of the 1920s 800,000 more blacks left the South. The proportion of all blacks living in cities rose from 27 percent in 1916 to about 35 percent in 1920, then to 43 percent in the late 1920s, and then to nearly 50 percent by 1940. In Harlem, the number of blacks rose from 73,000 in 1920 to 164,000 in 1930 (25 percent were foreign born).

However, pervasive racism and other factors contributed to low occupational levels among black migrants. In New York City, the economy revolved around skilled and white-collar jobs and small manufacturing firms. Few opportunities existed for unskilled and unschooled labor such as those offered elsewhere. A majority of the migrants from the South had not completed grade school, and few had any vocational training. Opportunities for adult education in Harlem were minimal. During the 1920s, blacks made little headway in improving their occupational opportunities.

Harlem was, if nothing else, poor. The poorest 50 percent of blacks in New York City lived on the equivalent of 46 percent of the income of the poorest 50 percent of whites. In addition to low wages and frequent periods of unemployment, black Harlemites paid more in rent (up to 40 percent of their income) to live in more crowded conditions than existed anywhere else in the nation, and they were in worse health.

The relationship between black Americans and the organized labor movement was troubled, to say the least. In 1890, the American Federation of Labor (AFL) had banned the color bar and refused to grant a charter of affiliation to the National Association of Machinists, which maintained such a bar; in 1891 the AFL had hired George L. Norton to organize black workers. By the end of the decade, however, the AFL had changed: it accepted the autonomy of member unions, and the nation witnessed an aggressive exclusion of skilled black workers from their trades. In 1900, the AFL convention gave official sanction to Jim Crow in organizing. By 1910, twelve union affiliates in good standing had constitutional or ritual bans on black members, and a range of less formal exclusionary mechanisms were in place. High initiation fees, tacit agreements, discriminatory technical exams, special licenses, and a ban on blacks as apprentices all worked against black union membership. Even when national unions were not unsympathetic to black workers, individual locals often were. Blacks in search of work were sometimes able to find it only by replacing striking white workers. New York City's black longshoremen, for example, gained a foothold in the late 1890s when the exclusionary white union struck their employers.

The black community thus became not only suspicious of organized labor unions but in many cases hostile to them. The outstanding leader of his generation, Booker T. Washington, promoted individual self-help and opposed unions. After Washington's death in 1915, Marcus Garvey was the most influential black leader to oppose unions. As early as 1902, on the other hand, the group around W. E. B. Du Bois recommended that blacks support the labor movement even while denouncing its racist practices. By 1915, attempts to organize national, as opposed to just local, unions of black workers began to bear fruit. In that year, Robert L. Mays organized the Railwaymen's International Industrial Benevolent Association, which would peak in 1920 with 15,000 members. Rienzi B. Lemus founded the Brotherhood of Dining Car Porters in 1920. Most important, the activities of A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen in Harlem led to attempts to organize elevator operators in 1918 and shipyard workers in the National Brotherhood Workers of America the following year, and to an invitation to Randolph in 1925 to head the newly founded Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. In Harlem, the other great promoter and organizer of black labor was the socialist Frank R. Crosswaith.

As the Harlem ghetto developed, the problems of employment stirred both the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). During World War I, the New York Urban League involved itself in labor matters when it started the Committee for Improving the Industrial Conditions of Negroes and held conferences with the AFL in what turned out to be a long and fruitless effort to get the federation to stop discriminatory practices. Pressure from NAACP led, in 1918, to the establishment of the United States Division of Negro Economics under the Department of Labor (the division was scrapped in 1921). NAACP tried again in 1924 when it proposed an Interracial Labor Commission to try to improve relations with the AFL and end discrimination. None of these efforts succeeded.

In 1925, several developments marked a turning point in black labor history. The National Urban League formed its Department of Industrial Relations to lobby and agitate continually for better opportunities for black workers. The American Communist Party established the American Negro Labor Congress. Frank Crosswaith, A. Philip Randolph, and the Urban League formed the Trade Union Committee for Organizing Negro Workers; and the Pullman porters began their long fight for recognition. Harlem was crucial in all these efforts. Even by 1928, however, only 4 percent of the members of the AFL in New York City were black—though the foundation for improvement had nevertheless been laid.

Throughout what is generally known as a prosperous decade, black workers experienced little affluence. Declines occurred in industries where they were most heavily concentrated—agriculture, coal, lumber, iron, and steel. The construction industry was also uneven. Earlier than in many areas of the country, the economy in New York City slowed down and unemployment rose. Floyd J. Calvin reported in Opportunity in May 1929 (a few months before the stock market crashed in October) that over the previous year, because of an economic slowdown, blacks had been replaced by whites in such normally “black” jobs as laying pavement and collecting garbage.

Blacks were hit earliest and hardest by the Depression. The Urban League surveyed twenty-five cities in 1930 and found a decrease of 34.5 percent in the number of available jobs for blacks and an increase of 40 percent in demand. In New York City at the end of 1930, only 42.5 percent of black workers were in full-time employment, compared with 64.2 percent of native-born whites. Similarly, only 31.9 percent of black women workers were employed full time, compared with 74.7 percent of native-born white women. Blacks became unemployed sooner and stayed unemployed longer than whites.

Despite some exceptions, relief programs and their implementation almost universally discriminated against blacks, either through exclusion of job categories containing the largest numbers of blacks, such as domestic service workers and agricultural workers, or through differential payments. In Harlem by 1933, almost 50 percent of all families received unemployment relief but only 9 percent of work relief jobs went to blacks. The whole community in Harlem took action to increase the representation of blacks in employment and to improve opportunities. In 1933, the Reverend John H. Johnson spearheaded the Citizens League for Fair Play (CLFP). Ira Kemp and Arthur Reid formed the Harlem Labor Union (HLU) to gain employment in Harlem for black workers. Sufi Abdul Hamid founded the Harlem Industrial Clerical Alliance. Crosswaith and Randolph started the Harlem Labor Council (HLC). While CLFP worked on boycotts to force companies to hire blacks—“Don’t buy where you can’t work”—Hamid’s organization was denounced as little better than racketeering, forcing firms to employ blacks by offering “protection” to those that did. HLU made an impact, but the most solid achievements came from HLC, which was involved in organizing black workers all over the city. Through the efforts of HLC, 4,000 black workers joined the Building Service Employees Union. HLC also worked with the International Ladies Garment Workers Union to organize black women. By 1938 it claimed to have organized more than 50 percent of all Harlemites in unions. The successes of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (BSCP), long delayed, resulted in acceptance into the AFL in 1935 and a contract with the staunchly antiunion Pullman Company in 1937. The BSCP, together with the emerging CIO, formed the backdrop to the phenomenal increase of Harlem’s black trade unionists. In addition, the Harlem riot of 1935 revealed the powder keg created by prolonged discrimination and jolted city government and employers into opening up employment to blacks. The transformation was startling. When the Federal Writers’ Project published its New York Panorama in 1938, the authors could say: “Perhaps the strongest of Negro organizations in Harlem are the trade unions. . . . Since the depression and the inception of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, there is hardly a trade or profession in Harlem that is not organized.” Harlem had become the heart not only of black America but also of black labor in segregated America.

STEPHEN BURWOOD

See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Communist Party; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Federal Writers’ Project; Garvey, Marcus; Great Migration; Hamid, Sufi Abdul; Harlem: 2—Economics; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Urban League; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; Riots:

4—Harlem Riot, 1935; Schuyler, George S.; Washington, Booker T.

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 1982.
- Foner, Philip S., and Ronald L. Lewis, eds. The Black Worker: A Documentary History from Colonial Times to the Present, Vol. 6, The Era of Post-War Prosperity and the Great Depression, 1920–1936. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1981.
- Greenberg, Cheryl Lynn. Or Does It Explode? Black Harlem in the Great Depression. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Harris, William H., The Harder We Run: Black Workers Since the Civil War. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1968. (Originally published 1930.)
- Meier, August, and Elliott Rudwick. "Communist Unions and the Black Community: The Case of the Transport Workers Union, 1934–1944." Labor History (Spring 1982). (Reprinted in Melvyn Dubofsky and Stephen Burwood, eds. The Great Depression and the New Deal, Vol. 6, Women and Minorities during the Great Depression; New York and London: Garland, 1990.)
- "The Negro in Industry." Monthly Labor Review, 42, April 1936, p. 976.
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto—Negro New York, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.
- Ottley, Roi. New World-A-Coming. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1968. (Originally published 1943.)
- Trotter, Joe W., and Earl Lewis, eds. African Americans in the Industrial Age: A Documentary History, 1915–1945. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1996.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Lafayette Players

The Lafayette Players Stock Company, commonly known as the Lafayette Players, was New York's first African American stock company to concentrate on legitimate theater. From 1915 to 1923, the company resided at the Lafayette Theater, one of the major playhouses in Harlem. The company presented more than 250 productions that included original works by African American playwrights as well as revivals of popular comedies and the classics. The stated goals of the Lafayette Players were to raise the standards of African American acting and dramatic productions, demonstrate that black actors could excel in dramatic roles as well as in song and dance, and provide the black community of Harlem with an alternative to vaudeville and minstrel shows, which often ridiculed African Americans. The actor Charles Gilpin, who became famous in the title role in Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones (1920), was among the founding members of the company. Other well-recognized members included Ida Anderson, Andrew Bishop, Laura Bowman, Inez Clough, Evelyn Ellis, Clarence Muse, Evelyn Preer, and Arthur "Dooley" Wilson.

The Lafayette Players were founded in 1915 by the actress and former dancer Anita Bush, as the Anita Bush Stock Company. The company made its first stage appearance at the Lincoln Theater in Harlem on 15 November 1915, with a production of Billie Burke's The Girl at the Fort. The players had been gathered only two weeks earlier, when Eugene Elmore, the manager of the Lincoln, had given Bush permission to perform there with a troupe of her own. Shortly after their opening at the Lincoln, the players followed Elmore to the nearby Lafayette Theater, where their first production, Across the Footlights, opened on 27 December 1915. In 1916, because of financial difficulties, Anita Bush sold the managing rights of her company to the comanager of the Lafayette, Lester Walton. She remained with the players until 1920, however, and it was she who chose most of their repertoire. In March 1916, the troupe was renamed the Lafayette Players Stock Company. In the same year, Walton sold the management rights of the Lafayette Players to the Elite Amusement Corporation, which hired Elmore to manage the troupe. In 1917 the Lafayette Players were taken over by the Quality Amusement Company, and in 1919 Walton was reinstalled as the company's manager.

As their productions became famous, the Lafayette Players organized road companies; in 1916–1917 two of these offspring toured on different circuits, appearing in Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Richmond, Norfolk, and other large cities on the East Coast. When the Lafayette Theater was turned into a vaudeville house in 1923, the Lafayette Players disbanded as a residential troupe and concentrated on their traveling companies. They reunited as a stock company in 1928, when Robert Levy, who now headed the Quality Amusement Corporation, invited them to move to Los Angeles. The Lafayette Players performed at the newly built Lincoln Theater in Los Angeles, until the economic hardships of the Great Depression finally forced them to dissolve in 1932.

The Lafayette Players had an almost exclusively African American audience. They presented a repertoire that changed weekly, staging abridged versions of popular Broadway plays. Many of these plays were being performed by black actors, and for black spectators, for the first time. The players obtained stock-company rights to numerous Broadway hits, particularly comedies, melodramas, and classics; but their repertoire occasionally also included original plays, operas, and musical revues. Among the most successful productions of the Lafayette Players were the Broadway melodramas Within the Law (1915–1916) and Madame X (1916–1917); Jerome Kern's musical Very Good Eddie (1917–1918); and adaptations of The Count of Monte Cristo (1916–1917), Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1916–1917), and Goethe's Faust (1917–1918).

In Los Angeles, the Lafayette Players performed before racially mixed audiences. This turned out to be a challenge for the company, because black and white patrons often had conflicting expectations about how African Americans should be portrayed onstage. Nevertheless, the players continued to present—successfully—their usual offering of popular works from the white stage, which now included Eugene O'Neill's Desire under the Elms as well as DuBose Heyward's Porgy.

The Lafayette Players generally received favorable reviews, which were regularly published nationwide in the black press. However, progressive theater critics and intellectuals, including Theophilus Lewis, Lester Walton, and James Weldon Johnson, attacked the company for being too “white” with regard to the scope and style of its productions. The Lafayette Players favored light-skinned actors and actresses; in fact, dark-complexioned performers such as Clarence Muse sometimes whitened their faces. Moreover, not only was the repertoire taken almost exclusively from Broadway; the performances also followed the conventions of the white stage.

Considering their need to survive financially, the Lafayette Players operated within a rather narrow framework of opportunities. Their popularity depended on the range of their repertoire, and also on their low ticket prices. Well into the 1920s, they were the least expensive legitimate theater company in New York and on the road. Furthermore, the concept of a black legitimate theater that would present original works and develop its own dramatic conventions was only just emerging during the time when the Lafayette Players were active. Nevertheless, to meet audiences' demand for authentic portrayals of blacks onstage, and to compensate for a general lack of plays written by and for African Americans, the company did occasionally commission works from within its own ranks. Andrew Bishop's It Happened in Harlem (1917–1918) and An Automobile Honeymoon (1917–1918) are probably the best-known examples.

As the first and major African American legitimate theater company in Harlem during the Harlem Renaissance, the Lafayette Players helped pave the way for the development of modern African American theater in the United States. In taking productions from the white repertoire and having black actors present them to black audiences, the company overcame racial barriers in casting and broke away from the traditional portrayals of African Americans onstage. Perhaps the company's most significant achievement was training African American actors in a variety of dramatic roles, many of which had never before been given to black performers. The Lafayette Players not only fostered the theatrical careers of a whole generation of African American actors but also helped raise the general standards of black theatrical entertainment.

ASTRID HAAS

See also Anita Bush Theater Company; Bush, Anita; Clough, Inez; Ellis, Evelyn; Gilpin, Charles; Johnson, James Weldon; Lafayette Theater; Lewis, Theophilus; Lincoln Theater; Madame X; Muse, Clarence; Porgy; Play; Preer, Evelyn; Walton, Lester; Wilson, Arthur “Dooley”

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950, 2nd ed. New York: Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1982.
- Isaacs, Edith J. R. The Negro in the American Theatre. College Park, Md.: McGrath, 1968.
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen; London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1987.
- Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. “Theophilus Lewis and the Theater of the Harlem Renaissance.” In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.

Mitchell, Loftin. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.

Patterson, Lindsay, ed. Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre: A Critical Approach. International Library of Negro Life and History, New York, Washington, and London: Publishers Company, 1968. (2nd printing.)

Thompson, Sister M. Francesca, O.S.F. "The Lafayette Players, 1917–1932." In The Theater of Black Americans, Vol. 2, The Presenters: Companies of Players; The Participants: Audience and Critics—A Collection of Critical Essays, ed. Erroll Hill. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1980.

Vorder Brugge, Andrew. "Lafayette Players." In American Theatre Companies, 1888–1930, ed. Weldon B. Durham. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1987.

Lafayette Theater

The Lafayette Theater at 132nd Street and Seventh Avenue was built in 1912 by John Mulonski; during the 1910s and 1920s it became one of the most important theaters in Harlem catering to the African American community. The Lafayette, which at one time was called "House Beautiful," was the largest theater in Harlem; it was also the first major playhouse there to desegregate: as early as 1912, African American theatergoers were allowed to sit in the orchestra. From 1915 to 1923, the Lafayette was home to an important theatrical troupe, the Lafayette Players. The theater became known as a "cradle of stars" (Anderson 1982, 236); among the many prominent actors, singers, and musicians who appeared on its stage were Charles Gilpin, Duke Ellington, Fletcher Henderson, Florence Mills, Bessie Smith, Mamie Smith, Ethel Waters, and Arthur "Dooley" Wilson. Because of the variety and the high artistic standards of its productions, the Lafayette was both a popular and a critical success. Its presentations were reviewed nationwide in black newspapers, and critics acknowledged its significance in the development of African American theater and acting during the Harlem Renaissance.

Like most other theaters of the time, the Lafayette was originally owned and managed by whites. This began to change in 1914, however, when Lester Walton, a black journalist, leased the Lafayette—which had been a vaudeville and movie theater—and took over the duties of comanager. Walton broadened the Lafayette's range of productions and in 1915 persuaded Anita Bush to transfer her theatrical company to the Lafayette from a rival theater, the Lincoln. Less than a year later, the Anita Bush Stock Company changed its name to the Lafayette Players Stock Company; the troupe soon became known simply as the Lafayette Players. Walton also pushed for a blacks-only employment policy at the Lafayette. Owing to disagreements within the management, Walton left the Lafayette Theater in 1916, but he continued to support it in his journalistic writing. Management rights of the theater and its stock company were sold to the Elite Amusement Corporation, a theatrical syndicate controlling African American playhouses; and then were sold to another syndicate, the Quality Amusement Corporation.

In 1919 the Lafayette became a completely African American enterprise, when two black Philadelphians—the bankers E. C. Brown and Andrew F. Stevens—bought controlling ownership of Quality Amusement. They also brought Lester Walton back to the management staff. Walton left the Lafayette again in 1923, when Frank Schiffman and Leo Brechler bought the theater in order to turn it into a vaudeville house.

The economic downturn of the Great Depression forced Schiffman and Brechler to close the Lafayette in 1934. During the New Deal era, however, it was revived as a legitimate theater for the Federal Theater Project (FTP) of the Works Progress Administration; from 1935 to 1939 it served as the headquarters of FTP's New York Negro Unit. During this period the Lafayette became famous as the theater where Orson Welles's production of a "voodoo" Macbeth (1936) was staged. This was an adaptation of Shakespeare's play set in Haiti in the 1820s and included elements of African American and Afro-Caribbean culture. In 1939 the Lafayette was turned into a movie theater; eventually, it was turned into a church. A black theater impresario, Robert Macbeth, revived the Lafayette's dramatic tradition in 1966, when he leased a wing of the building and founded the New Lafayette Theater.

The Lafayette Theater seated 2,000 patrons, and its audiences were almost exclusively African American. Productions offered there followed the typical stock repertoire schedule, with a bill that changed weekly and with daily matinee and evening performances on Monday through Saturday. On Fridays an additional midnight show lasted until four o'clock in the morning. Wallace Thurman vividly recalled the lively atmosphere of these shows, which usually attracted a noisy crowd, turning the auditorium itself into a stage.

The Lafayette offered a wide range of productions. The Lafayette Players regularly presented abridged versions of Broadway comedies and melodramas as well as classics, such as Within the Law (1915–1916), Madame X (1916–1917), and Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1916–1917). In 1916 the Lafayette Theater participated in the tercentenary celebrations of Shakespeare's death with a production of Othello, and in 1923 the theater was host to productions of The Comedy of Errors and The Taming of the Shrew performed by the Ethiopian Players, a company based in Chicago. The Lafayette's fame, however, rested mainly on its productions of musical revues, such as Porter Grainger and Freddie Johnson's Aces and Queens (1925), and Mississippi Days (1928), starring Bessie Smith. Many of the shows presented at the Lafayette were simply replicas of recent Broadway hits. A popular success could also inspire new versions; Lew Leslie's Plantation Revue (1922), for instance, was immediately modified and revived as Club Alabam during the same season.

Although reviews of the productions at the Lafayette were generally favorable, progressive theater critics, writers, and intellectuals, such as Theophilus Lewis, Lester Walton, Wallace Thurman, and Harold Cruse, complained that the Lafayette was too "white" in the content and style of its presentations. In those days, however, legitimate drama that dealt seriously with black life and race relations was rare. Thus, not only criticism of its policies but also time was needed before the Lafayette began to produce works by African American playwrights, such as Andrew Bishop's It Happened in Harlem (1918) and Frank Wilson's Pa Williams's Gal (1923). Critics also objected to the Lafayette's practice of casting mostly light-skinned performers who might pass for white. There were no dark-complexioned chorus girls at the Lafayette, and dark-skinned actors occasionally whitened their faces for performances.

Although the Lafayette Theater never resolved the tension between the taste of its mass audience and the aesthetic or political demands of some of its critics, it did have a prominent place in the cultural life of Harlem during the 1910s and 1920s, and it was widely acclaimed by patrons and reviewers alike. As a completely black-operated house offering employment and theatrical training to a generation of African American actors, the Lafayette came to represent a "focal point of ethnic pride" (Vorder Brugge 1987, 254) for Harlem's black community.

ASTRID HAAS

See also Anita Bush Theater Company; Bush, Anita; Ethiopian Art Players; Lafayette Players; Lewis, Theophilus; Pa Williams's Gal; Thurman, Wallace; Walton, Lester; specific performers

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950, 2nd ed. New York: Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1982.
- Harlem 1900–1940: An African American Community—An Exhibition Portfolio from the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.* (Web site.)
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen; London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1987.
- Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. "Theophilus Lewis and the Theater of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Mitchell, Loften. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.
- Thompson, Sister M. Francesca, O.S.F. "The Lafayette Players, 1917–1932." In The Theater of Black Americans, Vol. 2, The Presenters: Companies of Players; The Participants: Audience and Critics—A Collection of Critical Essays, ed. Erroll Hill. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1980.
- Thurman, Wallace. The Blacker the Berry. New York: Macaulay, 1928.
- Vorder Brugge, Andrew. "Lafayette Players." In American Theatre Companies, 1888–1930, ed. Weldon B. Durham. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1987.

Larsen, Nella

Nella Larsen, one of the most important novelists of the Harlem Renaissance, is also the most mysterious. Published biographies have been rife with error, and accurate information is difficult to come by. Larsen's original name was Nellie Walker. She was born in Chicago in 1891 to a Danish immigrant whose maiden name was Mary Hansen and a "colored" cook from the Danish West Indies (later the U. S. Virgin Islands) whose name was Peter Walker. Within a year Walker died, or perhaps abandoned the family. Mary then married a white Dane, Peter Larsen, and gave birth to a second daughter, Anna Elizabeth. Throughout Nella's childhood, her working-class family suffered from intense animosity directed toward a white woman with a "mulatto" daughter, while racial tension escalated around them in the rapidly segregating near South side of Chicago.

Sometime between 1895 and 1897, Mary Larsen took her daughters to Denmark, possibly fleeing persecution. They returned in 1898, and the girls attended, briefly, a private school for German and Scandinavian children in the “white” neighborhood to which Peter Larsen had moved. Within months, the family moved back to a “mixed” race district, and Nella entered the public school system. She did well academically, but her neighborhood was rapidly turning into a racial battleground. In the fall of 1907, the family sent her to the normal school at Fisk University, in hopes that she could find a place in the black middle class. After her first year, however, she was told not to return. She next went to live in Denmark with relatives of her mother, but by 1912 Larsen returned to the United States and entered the Lincoln Hospital and Home Training School for Nurses in the Bronx, New York.

Larsen excelled at Lincoln and was then accepted for the position of head nurse at Tuskegee Institute’s hospital in Alabama. She was quickly disillusioned, working fourteen hours a day under insulting conditions, and finding the philosophy of the school as well as its treatment of pupil nurses insupportable. At the end of a year, she resigned and returned to Lincoln Hospital. Then, in 1918, she took a position with the Bureau of Preventable Diseases in the Bronx, a group that was on the cutting edge of the new field of public health.

Soon Larsen met and married Dr. Elmer S. Imes, a graduate of Fisk University who had recently received a Ph.D. in physics from the University of Michigan and who shared Larsen’s love of books and was well connected to the African American elite. Nella Larsen Imes, as she now signed her name, had finally achieved a foothold in the higher echelons of black society. In 1919 she published two articles on Danish children’s games, riddles, and rhymes for The Brownies’ Book, the first African American children’s magazine. Larsen’s love of reading and her new connections in black Harlem led her to take an interest in library work. In the fall of 1922, having resigned from her nursing position and having worked for several months in the library, she entered the library school of the New York Public Library, the first black woman to be admitted for formal training in the profession. After graduation, she worked for a year in the Children’s Room of the Seward Park Library and then took over the children’s division at the 135th Street branch library, the nerve center of the Harlem Renaissance.

As interest in African American subjects and writers grew, Larsen began writing fiction. In 1926 two of her stories—“Freedom,” and “The Wrong Man”—appeared under the pen name Allen Semi in Young’s Magazine, a “pulp” periodical aimed at working-class readers. Resigning from the library in 1926 to concentrate on writing, Larsen entered the interracial world of high bohemian intellectuals, growing particularly close to Carl Van Vechten, author of the controversial novel Nigger Heaven. At Van Vechten’s urging, she submitted her first novel, Quicksand, to Alfred A. Knopf, who published it in 1928 under her maiden name. The next year, Larsen was awarded the Harmon Foundation’s bronze medal for literary achievement among Negroes. Soon afterward, her second novel, Passing, was published by Knopf with considerable fanfare.

Larsen was now considered one of the most important black novelists of the day. In the January 1930 issue of the prestigious magazine Forum, she published the story “Sanctuary,” about an old black woman in the American South who harbors a fugitive fleeing a white sheriff after killing the woman’s own son. The story marked a significant departure from her earlier fiction, but readers quickly noticed detailed parallels between “Sanctuary” and the story “Mrs. Adis” by the British author Sheila Kaye-Smith. Confronted with accusations of plagiarism, Larsen claimed that she had based the story on one told years earlier by a patient in the nursing home at Lincoln Hospital. The editors accepted her explanation, but among some circles in Harlem her reputation was badly damaged.

At about this time Larsen won a Guggenheim Fellowship to write a novel concerning the effect on African Americans of differences in intellectual and physical freedom between America and Europe. From September 1930 until January 1932, Larsen lived in Majorca, Paris, and Málaga, working partly on this project but mostly on another, called “Mirage,” that she described as her “white novel.” The latter was rejected by her publisher; of the former, no record remains.

Elmer Imes started work as a professor of physics at Fisk University while Larsen was abroad. He was, she knew, in love with a popular white administrator at the school. Having put off any decision about how to respond, on her return to the United States in January 1932 Larsen took an apartment in New York and postponed joining Imes in Nashville; eventually she agreed to try living on campus. She found herself in an excruciating position, and her behavior grew erratic as she hung on to force the most favorable terms for a divorce, which finally came in August 1933.

Winners of Harmon Award, at Zion Church. Left to right: Miss Harmon (daughter of the founder) congratulates the winners, Nella Larsen Imes; Channing H. Tobins; James Weldon Johnson; a proxy of Claude McKay; and Dr. George Haynes, secretary of a committee on race relations. (© Bettmann/Corbis, n.d.)

Larsen moved back to New York, took an apartment on Second Avenue near Stuyvesant Park, and maintained herself financially with her alimony, but the divorce was psychologically devastating. Other romantic disappointments ensued as she sank into alcoholism and depression. Between 1934 and 1937, still failing to place any of her fiction and fearing abandonment by friends, she gradually withdrew into herself. From 1938 to 1944, she practically disappeared, cutting off her friends, moving to a new apartment, and falling into a spiral of addiction.

Elmer Imes's death of cancer in 1941 eventually forced Larsen to earn a living. From 1944 until 1961, she worked as a staff nurse and then nurse supervisor at Gouverneur Hospital on the lower east side, and from 1961 to 1963 she worked at Metropolitan Hospital, serving east Harlem. Highly respected on the job, she quickly leapfrogged over her colleagues into higher-paid supervisory positions; but she was not entirely free of alcohol and drugs. She was forced to retire in June 1963 when the hospital realized that she had passed her seventieth birthday. (She was actually seventy-two.) She died of a heart attack in her apartment eight months later. For several days, no one missed her; finally the police answered a call from the building supervisor and found her body. The first person they contacted to claim it—probably a relative of Imes's—refused. One of Larsen's friends, the nurse Alice Carper, saw to the funeral arrangements and buried Larsen in her own family plot, with more than fifty nursing colleagues present. Larsen's sister Anna inherited her estate, exclaiming with surprise when informed of the death, "Why, I didn't know I had a sister"—which, of course, was a lie. Larsen is buried in Cypress Hills Cemetery off the Triborough Expressway in New York, under the name Nella Imes.

Biography

Nella Larsen (née Nellie Walker) was born in Chicago on 13 April 1891. In 1892 her father, Peter Walker, died; her mother remarried a white Dane, Peter Larsen, and gave birth to Nella Larsen's half sister, Anna Elizabeth. From about 1895 to 1898 Nella Larsen lived in Denmark with her mother and half sister; from 1898 to 1907 she lived with her family on the near South side of Chicago. In 1907–1908 she studied at Fisk University's Normal School. In 1908–1909 she again lived in Denmark. In 1912–1915 she attended Lincoln Hospital and Home Training School for Nurses in the Bronx, New York. In 1915–1916 she was head nurse at the John A. Andrew Memorial Hospital, Tuskegee Institute; in 1916–1918 she was assistant superintendent of nurses and an instructor at Lincoln Hospital and Home; in 1918–1921 she was a public health nurse at the Bureau of Preventable Diseases in New York. She married Elmer S. Imes, a research physicist, on 3 May 1919. Her "Three Scandinavian Games" and "Danish Fun" were published in the Brownies' Book in June–July 1919. In 1922–1926 she attended the Library School of the New York Public Library and worked as a children's librarian at the Seward Park and Harlem branches. (Larsen was the first black woman to graduate from a library school.) "The Wrong Man" and "Freedom" were published in Young's Realistic Stories Magazine in January and April 1926, under the pen name Allen Semi. In 1928 Quick-sand was published. In 1929 Larsen won the Harmon Foundation Bronze medal for Literary Achievement among Negroes; also in 1929 Passing was published. During 1930–1932 "Sanctuary" was published in Forum (January 1930); Larsen was accused of plagiarism; she won a Guggenheim Fellowship; she lived in Majorca, Paris, and Málaga; and she wrote a novel called Mirage (unpublished). During 1932–1933 she moved to Fisk University. She divorced Elmer Imes on 30 August 1933 and returned to New York. In 1938, suffering from alcoholism, depression, and possibly drug addiction, she cut off all friendships, moved to a new apartment, and "disappeared." In 1944 she began working as a staff nurse at Gouverneur Hospital; she was quickly promoted to supervisor of nurses for the night shift. In 1961 Gouverneur Hospital closed; Larsen transferred to Metropolitan Hospital as night supervisor in the psychiatric ward. In March of 1964 Larsen died alone in her apartment. Larson was rediscovered in the twenty-first century, and her novels were reissued.

GEORGE HUTCHINSON

See also Brownies' Book, The; Harmon Foundation; Knopf, Alfred A.; 135th Street Library; Passing: Novel; Quicksand; Van Vechten, Carl

Selected Works

"Three Scandinavian Games." The Brownies' Book, June 1919.

"Danish Fun." The Brownies' Book, July 1919.

"The Wrong Man." Young's Realistic Stories Magazine, January 1926. (Published under the name Allen Semi.)

"Freedom." Young's Realistic Stories Magazine, April 1926. (Published under the name Allen Semi.)

Quicksand. New York: Knopf, 1928. New edition: 2002.

Passing. New York: Knopf, 1929. New edition: 2003.

"Sanctuary." Forum, January 1930.

Further Reading

Davis, Thadious M. Nella Larsen, Novelist of the Harlem Renaissance. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994.

Hutchinson, George. "Nella Larsen and the Veil of Race." American Literary History, Summer 1997, pp. 329–349.

Larson, Charles R. Invisible Darkness: Jean Toomer and Nella Larsen. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1993.

Lawrence, Jacob

Jacob Lawrence is arguably one of the most important American artists of the twentieth century. Although he was not active during the Harlem Renaissance, his work directly reflects the importance of Harlem both as a place and as an artistic community.

Lawrence was born in 1917 in Atlantic City, New Jersey, the eldest child of Jacob and Rosa Lee Lawrence. His father worked as a railroad cook but in 1919 moved the family to Easton, Pennsylvania, in order to seek work as a coal miner. Lawrence's parents separated when he was seven, and in 1924 his mother moved the children to Philadelphia, where, because of the types of jobs she held—primarily live-in domestic work—they spent time in and out of foster homes. They moved to Harlem when Lawrence was twelve years old. In Harlem, he spent many hours listening to relatives and neighbors describe their lives in the South and their journey northward, themes that would later appear in his art.

Shortly after his arrival in Harlem—because his mother wanted to keep him out of trouble—Lawrence enrolled at the Utopia Children's Center, a settlement house that provided an after-school program in arts and crafts. The center was operated by the painter Charles Alston, who recognized Lawrence's talent and encouraged him. After graduating from grade school, Lawrence attended the High School of Commerce and continued to paint on his own. As the Great Depression deepened, his mother lost her job, the family had to go on relief, and Lawrence dropped out of high school before his junior year to help by working at odd jobs. In 1936 he joined the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) and was sent to upstate New York, where he planted trees and built dams. When he returned to Harlem, he became actively involved with another New Deal program, the Harlem Community Art Center, directed by the sculptor Augusta Savage. There he began painting his earliest scenes of Harlem. As a teenager, Lawrence hung out at the Harlem branch of the YMCA, where he became friendly with "Professor" Seifert, a self-taught expert on African and African American culture. Lawrence was profoundly influenced by Seifert, who, he explained, "wanted to get black artists interested in art . . . to select as our content black history." Seifert encouraged Lawrence to visit the public library as well as local museums to learn more about the African and African American past. Seifert also gave Lawrence access to his personal collection.

As the Depression continued, hard times persisted for Lawrence and his family. Yet he maintained that, in Harlem, the Depression "was actually a wonderful period. . . . There was a real vitality in the community." In part this vitality was due to the Works Progress Administration (WPA), which established jobs for blacks in a variety of fields. Most significant for Lawrence were the WPA's art projects, in particular the Federal Arts Project (FPA). With the help of Augusta Savage, Lawrence was assigned to the FPA's easel project. The FPA paid artists, black and white, a living wage—$23.60 a week—and, according to Lawrence, that was a lot of money at the time.

While working with the FPA, Lawrence became interested in the life of the black revolutionary Toussaint-Louverture, founder of the republic of Haiti. Lawrence felt that no single painting could capture Toussaint's numerous achievements and that he would therefore need to paint the entire story. Series of paintings would become one of Lawrence's signature traits. A year after completing the Toussaint-Louverture series, Lawrence began work on a forty-panel series depicting the life of the abolitionist Frederick Douglass; in 1939 he did a thirty-painting series, The Life of Harriet Tubman; and in 1940–1941 he painted the famous Migration Series, with a grant (his first of three) from the Rosenwald Foundation. All these series reflected his strong interest in African American history.

With regard to the Migration Series, Lawrence said:

By the time I was in Harlem, I decided to paint this series—I wasn't thinking of sales or of a gallery. I liked storytelling. I went to the Schomburg Library and selected events from the North and the South. I think that the series alternates from South to North. I just got into it. I didn't separate it—I wasn't looking at it from the inside out or the outside in. This was such a part of my life. . . . I was doing research at the time. I guess it was both emotional and intellectual. . . . We are absolutely a people telling stories. It seems like we were born talking and telling people about it. The series came out of that—people talking about people coming up from the South. This tradition continues. . . . Another family arrives.

When Lawrence created a series, he would work on all the panels at once, one color at a time, going from dark to light. A striking characteristic of his work is his use of bright colors, a trait that he attributed to his experience of living in Harlem:

We lived in a deep depression. Not only my mother, but the poor people in general. In order to add something to their lives, they decorated their tenements and their homes in all of these colors. I've been asked, Is anybody in my family artistically inclined? I've always felt ashamed of my response and I always said no, not realizing that my artistic sensibility came from this ambience. I did have this influence, but I didn't realize it was taking place. It's only in retrospect that I realized that I was surrounded by art. You'd walk Seventh Avenue and look in the windows and you'd see all these colors in the depth of the depression. All these colors. You'd walk though Harlem and go to the Apollo theater, and the jokes that were being told! The pathos! People would laugh, but it was a comedy on a very profound, deep, philosophical level. But you can only see this, you can only realize this., in retrospect.

Essentially, then, Lawrence's sense of color was communal, coming directly from the streets of Harlem.

In general, Lawrence's pictures tell a story not only visually but also verbally. The Migration Series, for instance, has a caption for each image, such as the following text for the sixth panel: "The trains were packed continually with migrants." In this regard, it is worth noting that for Lawrence the railroad was an important symbol of the great migration:

I didn't realize that there were so many symbols of railroad stations, bus stations, people travelling! But that's what migration is. You think in terms of people on the move, people moving from one situation to another. Crossroads, bus stations, and train stations—moments of transition—it certainly was a moment of transition in the history of America and for the race. It's one of the big movements in our country. And I want to say this, too: I don't think the blacks in making a movement just contributed to their own development. It contributed to American development. Look at your structure of the cities—the passion, the energy, the vitality. Not always positive—some of it quite negative—but it's there and I think we have added to, and not taken from, our growth. When I say our, I'm using that in a larger context. And I think that we have made a contribution in making this move. Many people tried to keep us out. You had your riots. But we made a tremendous contribution to the American growth, to the American development of America.

The Migration Series met with immediate acclaim and with praise from critics, and it secured Lawrence's reputation. Shortly after it was completed, Alain Locke brought Lawrence to the attention of Edith Halbert, the head of the respected Downtown Gallery. She in turn exhibited the entire series and arranged for Fortune magazine to run a story on Lawrence and to reproduce twenty-six of the paintings. Half of the sixty panels in the series were sold to the Museum of Modern Art in New York and the other half to the Phillips Collection in Washington, D.C.

Lawrence followed the Migration Series with The Life of John Brown (twenty-two panels), Harlem (thirty-two panels), War (fourteen panels), The South (ten panels), Hospital (eleven panels), and History of the American People (thirty panels). Hospital was painted during and after his own nine-month stay at Hillside Psychiatric Hospital, where he had gone voluntarily for treatment, citing the stresses of fame. Lawrence also completed a number of individual paintings and drawings inspired by African American history and by his own life experiences.

Jacob Lawrence. (Library of Congress.)

As his fame grew, Lawrence was in demand as a teacher. He taught at the Black Mountain School in North Carolina; the Pratt Institute and the New School for Social Research in New York; the Five Towns Music and Art Foundation in Cedarhurst, Long Island; and elsewhere. In 1970, he became a full professor at the University of Washington in Seattle, where he lived until his death in 2000.

Lawrence's work has been represented in numerous individual and group shows, and he received many awards, commendations, and honorary doctorates. His lifework may perhaps be summed up in his own assertion that "the Negro experience is the American experience."

Biography

Jacob Armstead Lawrence was born in Atlantic City, New Jersey, on 7 September 1917 and moved at the age of twelve to Harlem, where he attended public schools. He won a scholarship to the American Artists School (organized by the John Reed Club, a communist group) at 131 West Fourteenth Street in 1937. He worked for six months in the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) near Middletown, New York, in 1936 and made drawings of life in the CCC. He married Gwendolyn Knight in 1941. Also in 1941, Fortune published a color portfolio of twenty-six panels of his series The Migration of the Negro, with text; and the Downtown Gallery showed the series in its main gallery. Lawrence served in the armed forces during World War II, at one point on the USS Sea Cloud, a weather patrol boat that was the navy's first racially integrated ship. In 1949 he voluntarily entered Hillside Hospital in Queens, New York, for treatment of depression; the New York Times Magazine had an article on this episode: "An Artist Reports on the Troubled Mind," and an exhibition of his hospital paintings opened at the Downtown Gallery in October 1950. In 1951 he received an award from the Committee for the Negro in the Arts. Lawrence taught at Black Mountain College in Asheville, North Carolina (summer session, 1946); at Five Towns Music and Art Foundation in Cedarhurst, Long Island (1955–1962, 1966–1968); at the Pratt Institute in New York (1958–1970); at the New School for Social Research in New York (1966–1969); at the Art Students League in New York (1967–1969); at the Skowhegan School of Painting and Sculpture in Maine (summer 1968); and at the University of Washington, as a full professor (beginning in 1970). He served as president of the New York chapter of the National Institute of Arts and Letters (1957); as president of the artists' committee of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC, 1963); as a member of the advisory board for the founding of the Museum of African Art in Washington, D.C.; as a member of the coordinating committee for an exhibition of contemporary African art sponsored by the American Society of African Culture (AMSAC); and as a member of the National Screening Committee for the Fulbright-Hays scholarship program (1965–1967). Lawrence exhibited in Nigeria in 1964. He was an artist in residence at Brandeis University in Waltham, Massachusetts, in February–May 1965; a visiting artist at California State College in Hayward (September 1969–March 1970); and a visiting artist at the University of Washington in Seattle (March–June 1970). Lawrence was appointed commissioner of the National Council of Arts by President Jimmy Carter in 1979; was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1983; and was inducted into the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1995. He received the Artist Award from the College Art Association, the NAACP Third Annual Great Black Artists Award, and the Images Award for Outstanding Achievement in Art from the University of Pittsburgh (1988); the National Medal of Arts from President George H. W. Bush (1990); the Medal of Honor from the National Arts Club, New York (1993); the Charles White Lifetime Achievement Award in Los Angeles and the Edwin T. Pratt Award from the Urban League of Metropolitan Seattle (1994); an award from the American Civil Liberties Union and the Washington State Medal of Merit (1998); a Lifetime Achievement Award from the Americans for the Arts and Seattle's Golden Umbrella Award and Mayor's Master Artist Award (1999); and numerous honorary doctorates. He established the Jacob and Gwendolyn Lawrence Foundation to promote the creation, exhibition, and study of American art (1999). Lawrence died in Seattle on 9 June 2000, at age eighty-two.

JOAN SAAB

See also Alston, Charles; Artists; Federal Programs; Great Migration; Locke, Alain; Savage, Augusta; Second Harlem Renaissance; Works Progress Administration

Selected Solo Exhibitions

- 1936: In studio of Addison Bates, a cabinetmaker.
- 1938: Harlem YMCA, exhibition sponsored by James Weldon Johnson Literary Guild.
- 1942: "The Migration of the Negro." Museum of Modern Art, New York (even-numbered panels); Phillips Memorial Gallery; Washington, D.C. (odd-numbered panels).
- 1943: Harlem paintings. Downtown Gallery; New York.
- 1944: "Paintings by Jacob Lawrence: Migration of the Negro and Works Made in U.S. Coast Guard." Museum of Modern Art, New York.
- 1953: "Performance: A Series of New Paintings in Tempera by Jacob Lawrence." Downtown Gallery, New York.
- 1960: Retrospective. Brooklyn Museum, New York. (National tour.)
- 1962: Exhibition in Lagos and Ibadan, Nigeria. Organized by AMSAC and the Mbari Artists' and Writers' Club Cultural Center.
- 1963: Paintings pertaining to the civil rights movement. Terry Dintenfass, New York.
- 1964: Brandeis University. (Traveled to Morgan State College.)
- 1968: "The Life of Toussaint L'Ouverture." (Fisk University.)
- 1976: "Graphics by Jacob Lawrence." Francine Seders Gallery, Seattle.
- 1977: "The Life of John Brown." Detroit Institute of Arts.
- 1977: "Jacob Lawrence: Paintings and Graphics from 1936 to 1978." Chrysler Museum of Art; Norfolk, Virginia.
- 1982: "Jacob Lawrence: The Builder." Mississippi Museum of Art, Jackson.
- 1984: "Jacob Lawrence: Fifty Years of His Work." Jamaica Arts Center; New York.
- 1985: Colored-pencil drawings. Francine Seders Gallery, Seattle.
- 1989: "Jacob Lawrence: Paintings and Drawings"; "Jacob Lawrence: Drawings and Prints." (Tour, Caribbean and Africa, sponsored by United States Information Agency.)
- 1989: "Jacob Lawrence: The Washington Years." Tacoma (Washington) Art Museum.
- 1989: "Jacob Lawrence: A Continuing Presence." Syracuse (New York) University.
- 1992: Whatcom Museum of History and Art, Bellingham, Washington.
- 1992: "Jacob Lawrence: An American Master." East Carolina University, Greenville.
- 1992: "Jacob Lawrence: The Early Decades, 1935–1950." Katonah (New York) Museum of Art.
- 1993: "Jacob Lawrence: An Exhibition Presented by the Black Alumni of Pratt Institute." Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York.
- 1993: "Jacob Lawrence: Paintings, Drawings, and Prints." Midtown Payson Galleries, New York.
- 1994: "Jacob Lawrence: Works on Paper." University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
- 1994: "Jacob Lawrence: Prints and Drawings." Shasta College, Redding, California.
- 1997: "Jacob Lawrence: An American Vision—Paintings and Prints 1942–1996." Museum of Northwest Art, La Conner, Washington.
- 1998: Savannah (Georgia) College of Art and Design.
- 1998: "Jacob Lawrence as Muralist." Francine Seders Gallery, Seattle, Washington.
- 2000: "Games." Francine Seders Gallery, Seattle, Washington.

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African-American Artists from 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Driskell, David, et al. Harlem Renaissance Art of Black America. New York: Studio Museum in Harlem, 1987.
- Patton, Sharon. African American Art. New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Lawrence, Jacob

Powell, Richard. Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Wheat, Ellen Harkens. Jacob Lawrence, American Painter. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1986.

Lee, Canada

Canada Lee (Leonard Lionel Cornelius Canegate) was an actor on Broadway and in films who played classical roles and, as his career continued, roles that portrayed blacks in a less stereotypical way than was usual in the 1920s and 1930s. He was a violinist and a jockey during his youth; he changed his name to Canada Lee when he became a prizefighter as a young man. After World War II, black characters in films and onstage became more multidimensional, and Lee took advantage of the opportunity to perform in a variety of roles.

Lee's role as Bigger Thomas in the stage version of Richard Wright's Native Son (1940 and 1941) is memorable. His portrayal of Joe in Alfred Hitchcock's movie Lifeboat (1944) is one of his best performances. Also noteworthy is his performance as Stephen Kumalo in the movie version of Alan Paton's Cry, the Beloved Country (1952). Sidney Poitier costarred in that movie, his first.

In the early 1930s, Canada Lee acted onstage in Orson Welles's Voodoo Macbeth (1936), and in many productions of the Works Projects Administration's Federal Theater Project, which helped black actors hone their skills as they worked with talented directors and attended workshops. Lee also appeared in The Tempest (1945), and he put on whiteface makeup as a character in The Duchess of Malfi (1946).

In the 1940s, Lee's connections with progressive causes, including his efforts to change racial images onstage and in films, became a liability. He participated in rallies, took petitions to Congress, was seen with controversial people, and allied himself with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and Walter White. During these years he also decided to become a producer in order to avoid menial roles. On Whitman Avenue (1946), a work he produced with Mark Marvin, attracted the attention of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) in 1947 because of its portrayal of liberal groups. Because Lee would not appear before HUAC, his name was never officially cleared, despite his public statements denying that he had communist affiliations. He was harassed by HUAC and the Federal Bureau of Investigation; was blacklisted from films, radio, and television; and became destitute. Cry, the Beloved Country (1952) was his last film.

Lee is seldom mentioned today, partly because he was a casualty of the communist scare; however, his pioneering work as a classical actor, his portrayal of nonstereotypical blacks onscreen, and his credits as a director helped to broaden job opportunities for blacks in Hollywood. He opened doors of opportunity for blacks to perform in a wider range of dramatic roles. For example, his son, Carl Lee, also became an actor and performed in The Connection (1962), Super Fly (1972), and Gordon's War (1973). The younger Lee also cowrote The Cool World (1964) with Shirley Clarke.

Biography

Canada Lee (Leonard Lionel Cornelius Canegate) was born 3 March 1907 in New York City. He had public schooling in Harlem and was a violinist and a jockey as a young adult. He changed his name to Canada Lee when he became a boxer; an eye injury ended his boxing career in 1933. His stage credits include Voodoo Macbeth (1936), Native Son (1940 and 1941), and The Tempest (1945). His movies include Lifeboat (1944), Body and Soul (1947), and Cry, the Beloved Country (1952). Lee was falsely labeled a communist in the 1940s and was blacklisted from films, radio, and television. He died 10 May 1952.

LOU-ANN CROUTHER

See also Federal Programs; Second Harlem Renaissance; White, Walter; Works Progress Administration; Wright, Richard

Selected Work: Stage

Voodoo Macbeth. 1936.

One-Act Plays of the Sea. 1937.

Haiti. 1938.

Mamba's Daughters. 1939.

Big White Fog. 1940.

Native Son. 1940, 1941.

The Tempest. 1945.

The Duchess of Malfi. 1946.

On Whitman Avenue. 1946.

Set My People Free. 1948.

Selected Work: Films

Keep Punching. 1939.

Farmer Henry Browne. 1942.

Lifeboat. 1944.

Body and Soul. 1947.

Lost Boundaries. 1949.

Cry, the Beloved Country. 1952.

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Continuum, 1973. (See also 3rd ed., 1994.)

———. Blacks in American Films and Television: An Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1988.

Cripps, Thomas. Making Movies Black: The Hollywood Message Movie from World War II to the Civil Rights Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Gill, Glenda E. "Canada Lee: Black Actor in Non-Traditional Roles." Journal of Popular Culture, 25(3), 1991.

Leab, Daniel. From Sambo to Superspade: The Black Experience in Motion Pictures. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.

Mapp, Edward. Blacks in American Films: Today and Yesterday. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1972.

Null, Gary. Black Hollywood: The Negro in Motion Pictures. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1975.

Patterson, Lindsay, ed. Black Films and Film-Makers: A Comprehensive Anthology from Stereotype to Superhero. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1975.

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1977. (See also 2nd ed., 1995.)

Lee, George

George W. Lee's literary work serves as a southern "countervoice" to the Harlem Renaissance. Lee is best-known for his hagiography of Beale Street in Memphis, Tennessee; he also is credited as the author of a realistic anti-sharecropping novel that offered rural black southerners a voice. His work has a strongly pro-business bent that constitutes a critique but also an extension of the artistic and philosophical concerns of the Harlem Renaissance.

Lee was born in Mississippi in 1894 and spent several years of his childhood as a sharecropper. He attended high school and college at Alcorn Agricultural and Mechanical College, graduating in 1917. He enlisted in the U.S. Army and fought in World War I as a second lieutenant. In Memphis, he had a productive career in insurance, eventually serving as vice president for two of the nation's most successful black-owned insurance companies. Lee became an important force in state and national Republican politics, placing African Americans in political and municipal positions, corresponding with three presidents, and serving as a delegate to several national conventions. In the early 1960s the party's white members unseated Lee and other African Americans from positions of leadership. However, he continued to be politically active, speaking nationwide on issues of education and desegregation through the Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World. Lee died in an automobile accident in Memphis in 1976.

James Weldon Johnson encouraged Lee to finish his first work, Beale Street: Where the Blues Began (1934), an account of the colorful figures in a legendary area in Memphis. It became a commercial and critical success and was a selection of the Book of the Month Club. By choosing Beale Street as his subject, Lee established Memphis and the South as a setting for African American contributions to artistic and economic enterprises. His catalog of Beale Street's businessmen and companies emphasizes his belief in the centrality of economics to racial uplift.

Lee's River George (1937) traces the downfall of Aaron George, the son of a sharecropper who hoped that his college education could help him free his race from economic and social bondage. According to Lee, he wrote this book to prove himself to the literati of the Harlem Renaissance, who had attributed the success of his first work simply to its subject, not to the talents of its author. River George follows George (a character from Beale Street: Where the Blues Began) from the Mississippi delta to Memphis and New York City—a gesture toward the "great migration" of African Americans from the farm to the city and from the South to the North. Lee questions the usefulness and productivity of the Harlem Renaissance, favoring instead talented African Americans across the nation, coupled (troublingly) with white paternalism. The novel searches for effective ways to protest against white racist society but admits defeat, symbolized by the lynching that ends it. The reaction of the critics of the day to River George was disappointing.

Lee's last work, Beale Street Sundown (1942), is a collection of short stories, some of which had originally appeared in Negro Digest, World's Digest, and Southern Literary Messenger. Like Beale Street: Where the Blues Began, it focuses on the people of Beale Street.

Lee, George

Biography

George Lee was born 4 January 1894 near Indianola, Mississippi. He attended public school in Indianola and completed high school and college coursework at Alcorn Agricultural and Mechanical College, Lorman, Mississippi (1917). He worked as a bellhop during summers at Gayoso Hotel in Memphis, Tennessee (1910–1917). He was a second lieutenant in the U.S. Army, Ninety-Second Division, 268th Regiment, Company C (1917–1919). He was an insurance salesman at Mississippi Life in Memphis (1919), then a manager, then a vice president (1920–1924); later he was a manager (1924–1939) and a vice president (1939–1976) at Atlanta Life in Memphis. Lee was a member of the Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World (1926–1976) and was Elks' Best Orator (1926). He was national director, Veterans for Hoover (1928); was on the Tennessee Republican Executive Committee (1942–1962); and was grand commissioner of education in the Elks (1951–1976). Lee was named one of ten "Most Useful Men" by the Chicago Defender in 1951, for his voter registration efforts in Memphis. He was the first African American for whom a post office was named (in Memphis, 1956). He received a Certificate of Honor from the Lincoln League of Memphis in 1962. He was appointed colonel aide-de-camp, Gov. Buford Ellington (1967) and Gov. Winfield Dunn (1973); and he was honorary sergeant-at-arms, Tennessee House of Representatives (1973). His portrait was hung in the Tennessee state capitol in 1973. Also in 1973, he received the American Legion Post 27 R.Q. Venson Appreciation Award. Lee died in Memphis on 1 August 1976.

SCOTT HICKS

See also Johnson, James Weldon

Selected Works

Beale Street: Where the Blues Began. 1934.
River George. 1937, 1975.
Beale Street: Sundown. 1942.

Further Reading

- Brown, Sterling A. "The American Race Problem as Reflected in American Literature." Journal of Negro Education, 8(3), 1939.
- Clark, Edward D. "George Washington Lee." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro-American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1987.
- Clark, Mary B., processor. "George W. Lee Collection." Housed in Memphis and Shelby County Room, Memphis-Shelby County Public Library and Information Center, 1986.
- Gloster, Hugh M. Negro Voices in American Fiction. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1948.
- Houston, Helen R. "Lee, George Washington." In The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Tucker, David M. Lieutenant Lee of Beale Street. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt University Press, 1971.
- . Memphis since Crump: Bossism, Blacks, and Civic Reformers, 1948–1968. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1980.

Leslie, Lew

Lew Leslie was white, a fact many people have been surprised to discover, so closely was he associated with black entertainment during the Harlem Renaissance era. After an undistinguished early career in vaudeville Leslie gravitated to promotion, organizing revues for Broadway. An early protégée of his was the vaudeville star Belle Baker. He coached and partnered her, then married her in 1909. Though they were divorced by 1919, they remained close friends ever afterward.

The first sign of Leslie's interest in black entertainment came in 1921, when he presented the white actress Tess Gardella in blackface as Aunt Jemima in George White's Scandals. However, the definitive moment of his life came when he saw Florence Mills in Shuffle Along; from then on, Leslie was driven by a consuming vision—to glorify the black American showgirl as Ziegfeld had glorified white showgirls. From 1922 to 1927, Leslie starred Florence Mills in a succession of elaborate, fast-paced revues (Plantation Revue, Dover Street to Dixie, Dixie to Broadway) that made her the toast of Broadway and ultimately a superstar in London and Paris. Later versions of his revues were called the Blackbirds series, after her theme song, "I'm a Little Blackbird Looking for a Bluebird."

When Mills died tragically in 1927, Leslie continued his Blackbirds series. Blackbirds of 1928 was the most successful, bringing international fame to the dancer Bill "Bojangles" Robinson and the singer Adelaide Hall. During the Great Depression—which also undermined the Harlem Renaissance—later versions of Blackbirds (1930–1936) had only mixed success at home and overseas. However, these shows helped the careers of many black performers such as the Nicholas Brothers, Eubie Blake, and Valaida Snow and gave them international exposure; the shows also included notable hit songs such as Blake's "Memories of You." The last of the series, Blackbirds of 1939, was a flop but gave valuable exposure to a young Lena Horne.

Whitebirds (1927), as its name implies, had a white cast; it was an attempt to cash in on the success of Blackbirds in London, but it was a financial disaster. Apart from the Blackbirds shows, Leslie mounted two notable productions during the 1930s: the ambitious all-white International Revue (1930), which was panned as a pretentious attempt to use an ill-assorted set of international stars; and Rhapsody in Black (1931), starring Ethel Waters and Valaida Snow, which was praised for abandoning stereotypes of blacks.

Leslie was a paradoxical figure. He created huge employment opportunities for black performers, but leaders of the Harlem Renaissance such as Theophilus Lewis and W. E. B. Du Bois objected to his use of stereotyped material. Despite his faith in black performers, he entrusted most of the music and writing to whites. An amiable, generous man in private, he was ruthless in business, saving money by playing stars off against each other. Though he was solicitous for the welfare of his performers, he was a perfectionist who drove them relentlessly in rehearsal.

After 1939 Leslie's career as a producer languished, and he worked as a talent scout for a theatrical agency. When he died in 1963, many of the black stars he had worked with attended his funeral to express their respect and affection. Despite the justified accusations of stereotyping, he influenced the style of black shows for a generation, abandoning the libretto-based approach for a modernized, fast presentation that allowed the performers to strut their stuff. By featuring a female superstar, Florence Mills, he also broke with the convention that black shows were usually built around two male comedians.

Biography

Lew Leslie (Lev Lessinsky) was born 15 January 1890 in New York City. His theatrical productions included Plantation Revue (Plantation Club, New York, 1922–1924, various editions); Dover Street to Dixie (Pavilion Theater, London, 1923); Dixie to Broadway (Broadhurst Theater, New York, 1924); Blackbirds of 1926 and Blackbirds of 1927 (Pavilion Theater, London); Whitebirds (Majestic Theater, London, 1927); Blackbirds of 1928 (Liberty Theater, New York); Lew Leslie's Blackbirds (Royale Theater, New York, 1930); International Revue (Majestic Theater, New York, 1930); Rhapsody in Black (Sam H. Harris Theater, New York, 1931); Blackbirds of 1933 (Apollo Theater, New York); Blackbirds of 1934 (Coliseum Theater, London); Blackbirds of 1936 (Gaiety Theater, London); Lew Leslie's Blackbirds of 1939 (Hudson Theater, New York). There were also some Blackbirds shows in Europe, mainly in Paris. Leslie was the inaugural producer of the floor show at the Cotton Club in Harlem (1923). He died in Orangeburg, New York, 10 March 1963.

BILL EGAN

See also Blackbirds; Blake, Eubie; Cotton Club; Hall, Adelaide; Lewis, Theophilus; Mills, Florence; Musical Theater; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Shuffle Along; Ward, Aida; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Bordman, Gerald. American Musical Theatre: A Chronicle. New York, Oxford University Press, 1978.
- "Lew Leslie." New York Times, 13 March 1963. (Obituary.)
- Moore, James Ross. "Lew Leslie." In The American National Biography, Vol. 15, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Reed, Bill. Hot from Harlem: Profiles in Classic African-American Entertainment. Los Angeles, Calif.: Cellar Door, 1998. (See ch. 4, "Valaida Snow.")
- Stearns, Marshall, and Jean Stearns. Jazz Dancing: The Story of American Vernacular Dance. New York: Macmillan, 1968.
- Woll, Allen. Dictionary of the Black Theatre: Broadway, Off-Broadway, and Selected Harlem Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

———. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. New York: Da Capo Press, 1991. (See especially ch. 7.)

Lewis, Sinclair

During the 1920s no American writer was more successful than Sinclair Lewis, and in 1930 he became the first American to receive the Nobel Prize for literature. His prestige and his frequent residence in New York City would qualify him as being of some note in a study of the Harlem Renaissance. Lewis also had some direct connection with the renaissance, primarily through his friendship with Walter White. However, it is appropriate to point out that his biographer Mark Schorer (1961) does not mention any connection with the Harlem Renaissance whatsoever but merely has an index entry, “Negroes, HSL’s [Lewis’s] interest in”—seemingly, this interest was first awakened in 1940 with his initial research for his novel Kingsblood Royal (1947).

During the Harlem Renaissance, Lewis was widely considered the foremost critic of American hypocrisy, yet his renowned novels of the decade largely ignore racial issues. Regarding Lewis’s first seven books, Charles Cooney (1975) observes that “the few Negro characters who meander through Lewis’s novels range from innocuous to mildly derogatory.” Yet Lewis’s satirical style and overt social concerns did have an impact on many writers of the Harlem Renaissance.

Lewis left his childhood home in Minnesota to attend Yale University and after graduation embarked on a career as a writer. He traveled and managed to support himself as a journalist and a writer of short stories and novels until 1920, when his book Main Street made him one of the most recognized literary figures in America. Main Street is about the romantic Carole Kennicott and her discovery of the petty, mean-spirited attitudes beneath the veneer of small-town American life. Lewis followed Main Street with Babbitt, for which he invented the city of Zenith—the setting for several of his future novels as well. George F. Babbitt, like Carole Kennicott, seeks to escape his successful but ultimately stultifying life: in his case, selling real estate. The book’s power lies in the contrast between Babbitt’s conformist behavior and his rebellious thoughts. He takes advantage of everyone he encounters, yet never fully recognizes that he is morally compromised. The book struck such a chord that the word “Babbittry,” to describe a sort of unthinking commercialism, entered the language. In the 1920s, Lewis also published his three other most renowned novels: Arrowsmith, Elmer Gantry, and Dodsworth. In each, Lewis examines how success in America can become a perpetual round of self-congratulatory activities, which eventually threaten any true social improvement.

Lewis won the Pulitzer Prize in 1925 for Arrowsmith but declined the award. Many commentators have assumed he refused the prize largely because he was bitter about not receiving it for Main Street (despite the committee’s original vote for that work) or for Babbitt. In his strongly worded refusal, he implored other writers not to accept such awards, because acceptance leads to admitting the authority of awarding institutions, and he asked rhetorically “whether any prize is worth that subservience” (Schorer). Ironically, though, when in 1930 he became the first American to be awarded the Nobel Prize for literature he accepted that award almost without reservation. These awards and Lewis’s response to them did much to make him a public figure. He pointedly criticized the literary establishment, and his attacks—like the characterizations in his novels—were so cruel that they alienated many other writers. For this reason, and because there was a general dismissal of his particular brand of “social realism,” Lewis has disappeared from most of the major anthologies of American literature.

Interestingly, Lewis’s struggle to have his naturalism accepted as great literature parallels the struggles of many writers of the Harlem Renaissance, who often found their own artistic vision being denounced and demeaned as “primitivist.” Stylistic and thematic debts to Sinclair Lewis can be seen in such varied writers as Wallace Thurman, whose novel The Blacker the Berry has a narrative tone reminiscent of Lewis’s best works; and Jessie Fauset, whose repeated criticism of the hypocrisy of the middle class echoes some of Lewis’s observations. Also, later realist writers such as Richard Wright were able to find a more receptive public in part because Lewis’s best-sellers had altered the literary marketplace.

Lewis did, moreover, offer direct encouragement to some writers of the Harlem Renaissance, most notably Walter White and Claude McKay. Lewis supplied a very favorable quotation for the dust jacket of White’s first novel (ranking it with A Passage to India as one of the two most important novels of the year). This led to a decades-long friendship between the two men; and Lewis not only gave White a thorough analysis of The Fire in the Flint but also helped him with his second novel, Flight. In addition, Lewis wrote a very strong recommendation that helped White secure a Guggenheim fellowship. On White's suggestion, Lewis visited Claude McKay in Paris; and McKay later said, "Lewis gave me a few cardinal and practical points about the writing of a book or novel" (Cooney). Lewis further demonstrated that he no longer condemned all literary prizes when, in 1935, he agreed to serve on the Spingarn Medal Committee of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In his first year on the committee, Lewis recommended that McKay be given the award, and in his second year he voted for A. Philip Randolph; he resigned from the committee before completing his three-year term, however.

Sinclair Lewis, c. 1900–1940. (Library of Congress.)

Toward the end of his career, Lewis published Kingsblood Royal (1947), a novel in which the protagonist, Neil Kingsblood, discovers that he has black ancestry and thus by state law is black. This book was rather poorly received. It was given a citation by Ebony magazine for promoting interracial understanding, but most of the reviewers found it an "oversimplified 'sociological tract' and a total failure as a work of art" (Schorer).

Schorer concludes that Lewis "is one of the worst writers in modern American literature, but without his writing one cannot imagine modern American literature." Similarly, one could assert that Lewis was a figure very tangential to the Harlem Renaissance, but that without his writing and influence the fiction of the Harlem Renaissance would undoubtedly have looked much different.

Biography

Sinclair Lewis was born 7 February 1885 in Sauk Center, Minnesota. He studied at Yale University (A.B., 1908). His awards included a Pulitzer Prize for Arrowsmith in 1925 (refused); the Nobel Prize for literature (1930); election to the National Institute of Arts and Letters (1935); and election to the American Academy of Arts and Letters (1938). Lewis died in Rome, Italy, 10 January 1951.

NEIL BROOKS

See also Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire in the Flint, The; McKay, Claude; Randolph, A. Philip; Thurman, Wallace; White, Walter; Wright, Richard

Selected Works

Free Air. 1919.
Main Street. 1920.
Babbitt. 1922.
Arrowsmith. 1925.
Mantrap. 1926.
Elmer Gantry. 1927.
The Man Who Knew Coolidge. 1928.
Dodsworth. 1929.
Ann Vickers. 1933.
It Can't Happen Here. 1935.
Kingsblood Royal. 1947.

Further Reading

Cooney, Charles F. "Walter White and Sinclair Lewis: The History of a Literary Friendship." Prospects, 1, 1975, pp. 63–79.

- Hutchisson, James M. The Rise of Sinclair Lewis, 1920–1930. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Hutchisson, James M., ed. Sinclair Lewis: New Essays in Criticism. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1997, pp. 94–109.
- Schorer, Mark. Sinclair Lewis: An American Life. Toronto: Heinemann, 1961.

Lewis, Theophilus

Theophilus Lewis was the leading theater critic during the Harlem Renaissance. From 1923 to 1927 he wrote primarily for A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owens's magazine The Messenger, where he was also the coauthor of a column, "Shafts and Darts: A Page of Calumny and Satire," with the Messenger's editor George S. Schuyler. Lewis was an iconoclastic and sharply biting writer who repeatedly called for significant improvements in the composition and direction of African American theater, particularly dramatic productions. He proposed the establishment of a national African American theater that would eschew stereotypes and "colorism" in favor of realistic roles and casting without regard to skin color.

Lewis was born in Baltimore in 1891. Although he had very little formal education, he was a devotee of the theater from his teens onward. Not long before World War I began, Lewis traveled to New York City and made the acquaintance of Randolph and Owen. After serving in the army during the war, Lewis moved to Detroit for three years and then, in 1922, obtained employment as a postal clerk in New York.

After showing a theater review to Randolph, Lewis was commissioned to write regular reviews for the Messenger, albeit with no remuneration except the price of his tickets. According to Kornweibel (1972), Lewis's columns were the only ones from Harlem that offered a discriminating perspective on theater. Lewis was fairly consistent throughout his career in urging African Americans to create a theatrical tradition distinct from that of white Americans, and especially from any vestiges of the minstrel tradition. Lewis had a low opinion of African American comedies and musical revues, primarily because they abounded with racial stereotypes. Most African American musicals, Lewis wrote, were "compounded of sheer imbecility sugar-coated with music and dancing" and, because they so often relied on low humor and nudity, degraded such fine actors and singers as Charles Gilpin and Florence Mills. In addition, Lewis decried the overwhelming tendency for directors to cast only light-skinned African Americans in their productions. His opposition stemmed from a black cultural nationalism that was at odds with the ideas of many of the Messenger's other columnists, who frequently condemned separate cultural institutions and argued against cultural differences.

Nonetheless, Lewis was apparently the first black theater critic to address the dearth of aesthetically, morally, or culturally sound plays and roles for African Americans. Lewis argued that theater productions which appealed to the intelligence of African American audiences would help foster the careers of black playwrights. Actually, there were very few African American playwrights in the 1920s, and far fewer who had access to Broadway or even to off-Broadway—and those who did catered to the lowest common denominator among their black audiences, making development of high-quality theater highly improbable. Lewis believed that black theater should be based on serious study of African American folk experiences, rather than on the aspirations of the black bourgeoisie. Accordingly, he encouraged young playwrights such as Eubie Blake and Noble Sissle, and his friends Wallace Thurman and William Jourdan Rapp; he also encouraged emerging "little theater" groups such as the Aldridge Players, the Krigwa Players, the National Ethiopian Art Theater, and the Tri-Arts Club. Lewis hoped that these groups would form the foundation of a national black theater.

In addition, Lewis's satirical "Shafts and Darts" columns, which he wrote with Schuyler from April 1924 through August 1925, allowed him to discuss a number of cultural and political issues, including the rise and fall of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), African American literature, and, again, the lack of high-quality dramatic productions. Lewis also reviewed new books for the Messenger; he was among the first to react positively to Langston Hughes's Weary Blues and the controversial Fine Clothes to the Jew.

After the Harlem Renaissance began to decline, Lewis seldom wrote for African American publications. He converted to Catholicism in the 1930s and then wrote primarily for Catholic magazines and journals until the early 1970s; however, in most of his columns he still continued his campaign for high-quality African American drama. Today he is one of the lesser-known African American dramatic critics, but unquestionably one of the most important.

Biography

Theophilus Lewis was born 4 March 1891 in Baltimore, Maryland, and studied at public schools there. He served in the U.S. Army in 1917–1918 and was a clerk in the U.S. Post Office in 1922–c. 1955. He was a member of the Commission on Human Rights, New York City (1950s); the Epworth League, Salem Missionary Church, New York City (beginning in 1911); Friends of Negro Freedom (1920–c. 1928); and the Independent Political Council, New York City (1913). Lewis wrote for America, Catholic World, Commonweal, Harlem, Interracial Review, Messenger, Opportunity, and the Pittsburgh Courier. He died in 1974.

DARRYL DICKSON-CARR

See also Blake, Eubie; Krigwa Players; Messenger, The; National Ethiopian Art Theater; Schuyler, George S.; Sissle; Noble; Theater; Thurman, Wallace; Tri-Arts Club

Selected Works

- "Same Old Blues." Messenger, 7, January 1925, pp. 14–15, 62.
 "Survey of the Negro Theater—III." Messenger, 8, October 1926, pp. 301–302.
 "Reflections of an Alleged Dramatic Critic." Messenger, 9, June 1927, pp. 193, 200.
 "If This Be Puritanism." Opportunity, 7(4), April 1929, p. 132.
 "The Frustrations of Negro Art." Catholic World, 155, April 1942, pp. 51–57.
 "Reflections on the Subscription Theatre." America, 123, 11 July 1970, pp. 26–27.

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986. (Reprint.)
 Grimes-Williams, Johanna L. "Theophilus Lewis." In The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997, p. 437.

- Hutchinson, George. "Mediating 'Race' and 'Nation': The Cultural Politics of The Messenger." African American Review, 28(4), Winter 1994, pp. 531–548.
 ———. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass., and London: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
 Kornweibel, Theodore. "Theophilus Lewis and the Theater of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972, pp. 171–189.
 ———. No Crystal Stair: Black Life and the Messenger, 1917–1928. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1975.
 Schuyler, George S. Black and Conservative: The Autobiography of George S. Schuyler. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1966.
 ———. "The Reminiscences of George S. Schuyler." In The Oral History Collection of Columbia University, ed. Elizabeth B. Mason and Louis M. Starr. New York: Oral History Research Office, 1979. (Originally published 1972.)

Liberator

The Liberator was an avant-garde publication founded, owned, and edited in its first years by the socialist writer Max Eastman. It covered economic and political news and views, as well as art, poetry, fiction, and criticism. Eastman began the magazine in 1918 as a successor to The Masses, a radical periodical he had edited from 1913 to 1917, which had been banned by the government. Eastman was intolerant of "dogma and rigidity of mind," and in the Liberator he welcomed a wide range of leftist views and took a stand against censorship. In 1921, he asked the poet Claude McKay to become an associate editor of the Liberator; shortly thereafter he handed the reins to McKay and the writer Michael Gold as coeditors.

Under the direction of McKay and Gold, the circulation of the Liberator rose from 50,000 to 60,000; its format became more elegant; and illustrations by socially minded artists like William Gropper and Stuart Davis made a sharp impact. Contributors included talented people such as Art Young, Boardman Robinson, Robert Minor, Maurice Becker, Helen Keller, and Cornelia Barns; McKay also published several poems by e.e. cummings. Initially, McKay decided not to publish a short story submitted by Jean Toomer; later, when he noticed that Toomer's work was appearing elsewhere, however, the Liberator did publish one of Toomer's poems in 1922.

Seven of McKay's own poems—overtly political works about lynchings of African Americans—were published in the Liberator in 1919. His sonnet "If We Must Die," which expressed militant politics within a traditional poetic form, was unprecedented; in fact, one publisher later it considered too incendiary to be included in a collection of McKay's poetry, and Alain Locke considered it too radical to be included in The New Negro. Langston Hughes, who subscribed to the Liberator, got his first taste of African American revolutionary concepts from McKay's militant poems.

Gold and other left-wing associates eventually took the magazine in a clearly Marxist direction; although McKay tried to reserve a certain amount of space in each issue for racial topics, he lost the battle. Eastman warned McKay that if they "published too much material about the Negroes, our white readers would dismiss the magazine, not the material. They would stop buying and reading it." Disappointed over the magazine's policies and wanting to see the Bolshevik Revolution up close, McKay left for Russia in late 1922.

After McKay returned from abroad, having immersed himself in the ideas of Marx and Lenin, he invited various socialists, Marxists, and black nationalists to strategy sessions at the Liberator. This caused Eastman to worry about surveillance by the Justice Department; McKay, for his part, used one of his last articles in the Liberator to criticize Eastman.

Undercapitalization, a weak distribution network, and a lack of broad appeal shortened the life of many magazines like the Liberator. The Liberator continued to veer toward the communist line; eventually it merged with some other communist periodicals, and in 1924 it became the Workers' Monthly, a journal of Marxist thought owned by the Communist Party.

KATHLEEN COLLINS

See also Communist Party; Eastman, Max; McKay, Claude

Further Reading

- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance, A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1987.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance, Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Lincoln Motion Picture Company

The Lincoln Motion Picture Company was founded in Los Angeles in 1916 by the actor Noble M. Johnson, who had already achieved considerable recognition and now starred in the new company's productions. In 1918 Noble Johnson brought in his brother George P. Johnson, who established an impressive distribution network that drew on the patronage of the black middle class in major cities, including Chicago, New York, Pittsburgh, and Los Angeles. George Johnson also devised a method of distribution to small-town establishments that could not afford to rent prints, and he advertised the company's films in newspapers such as the Chicago Defender and the Amsterdam News.

Lincoln's films were intended to present images of black people as normal human beings with talent and intelligence, and to avoid the negative stereotyping that was prevalent during this period: its productions offered the first blacks in film who did not conform to the usual roles of mammies, spear-wielding natives, or slapstick and burlesque comedians. In keeping with the ideology of uplift generally espoused by black leaders, these films emphasized decidedly middle-class values and achievements. Moreover, except for the cameraman Harry Grant, who was also a stockholder, the production company itself was all black.

Lincoln produced five narrative films—Realization of a Negro's Ambition (1916), Trooper of Company K (1916), Law of Nature (1917), Man's Duty (1919), and By Right of Birth (1921)—and two newsreels: Lincoln Pictorial (1918) and A Day with the Tenth Cavalry at Fort Huachuca (1922). In addition to Noble Johnson, its regular actors included Clarence Brooks, Beulah Hall, and A. Collins.

Lincoln's first "photoplay" (the term used for film productions), Realization of a Negro's Ambition, was a testament to the virtues of hard work and earnestness. The hero, a graduate of the Tuskegee Institute, leaves home to seek his fortune in the oil fields of California; rescues the daughter of the owner of an oil company; and returns home, where he finds oil on the family farm. The film opened in white-owned theaters catering to blacks, as well as in public-gathering places such as churches and schools; it was also shown at the Tuskegee Institute. Two of the four prints that were made were copyrighted by white-owned film companies: Carver Film and Supply and Queen Feature Service.

The next film, Trooper of Company K, was about the “Carrizal incident,” an episode during the Mexican War in which all-black troops were virtually wiped out. It too starred Noble Johnson and Beulah Hall. Trooper of Company K played to both black and white audiences; it was shown in two white theaters in New Orleans and drew large crowds throughout the Midwest and the South.

Law of Nature, released in 1917, was the last movie in which Noble Johnson starred; he resigned from Lincoln soon afterward, possibly at the insistence of Universal, a studio with which he was also under contract. (Johnson was such a strong attraction that Lincoln’s films were evidently drawing moviegoers away from Universal’s.) Ultimately, Lincoln could not survive the loss of its star.

A Man’s Duty and By Right of Birth were Lincoln’s final films. A Man’s Duty, with its traveling road show of actors and dancers, was shown in all of the then forty-eight states of the nation. Heart of a Negro was announced as the next release, but it was never produced. The Lincoln Motion Picture Company ceased operations in 1923.

AUDREY THOMAS MCCCLUSKEY

See also Brooks, Clarence; Film; Film: Black Filmmakers; Johnson, Noble

Further Reading

Birchard, Robert S. “Lincoln Motion Picture Company (1916–1921).” In Silents Majority. c. 1997. (Web site.)

Cripps, Thomas. Making Movies Black: The Hollywood Message Movie from World War II to The Civil Rights Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

George P. Johnson Negro Film Collection: Collection 1042. Los Angeles: University of California Los Angeles Library, Photographic Department., 1974. (See also microfiche: Indiana University, University of California Berkeley, and Florida State University–Tallahassee.)

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1995.

Lincoln Theater

The Lincoln Theater opened in 1909 at 56–58 West 135th Street, between Fifth and Lenox avenues, to serve Harlem’s burgeoning African American population. The new owner, Maria C. Downs, converted what had been a nickelodeon into a 300-seat theater, and its success allowed her to build a new 850-seat theater on the same site in 1915. Along with the Lafayette Theater (which desegregated in 1914), the Lincoln was Harlem’s most important venue for bringing entertainment to black audiences during the 1910s and 1920s.

The defection to the white Ziegfeld Follies of the great black comedian Bert Williams in 1910 signaled the end of black Broadway’s first great age, one that would not be revived until the phenomenal success of Shuffle Along in 1921. The virtual banishment of African Americans from downtown stages, however, encouraged the development of a vital theater within Harlem itself, financed, performed, and attended by members of the community. In 1914, the actress and dancer Anita Bush, who had been born in Brooklyn and who had performed with Williams in around 1904, organized a Colored Dramatic Stock Company at the Lincoln in order to offer black audiences serious drama—that is, to break away from the all-singing, all-dancing format which usually constrained black performers. By 1915, the organization was called the Anita Bush Stock Company, and by 1916 it had moved to the Lafayette. Samuel Hay (1994, 173–174) suggests this move might better be described as a “hostile takeover” on the part of Maria Downs and the Lafayette Players.

The Lincoln continued to present drama, but by the 1920s it was better known as a raucous movie and vaudeville house popular with recent migrants from the South: “the kind of people,” the Messenger’s drama critic Theophilus Lewis wrote with bourgeois dismay and fascinated pride, “who kick the varnish off the furniture, plaster chewing gum on the seats and throw peanut shells in the aisles” (quoted in Fraden 1994, 73). In The Big Sea (1940), Langston Hughes fondly recalled one summer night in 1927 when Jules Bledsoe stopped a performance of Eugene O’Neill’s The Emperor Jones to deliver a lecture on theater manners to an audience that had “howled with laughter” at the spectacle of Bledsoe running naked through a stage forest pursued by his fears. Hughes added that “their manners had been all right at all the other shows at the Lincoln, where they took part in the performance at will” (1940, 258–259).

Lincoln Theater, c. 1915. (Brown Brothers.)

As a stop on the Theater Owners’ Booking Association circuit, the Lincoln was the New York showcase for national black jazz and vaudeville acts like Williams, Butterbeans and Susie, Ethel Waters, and the blues singers Bessie Smith, Ma Rainey, Mamie Smith, and Alberta Hunter. In 1919, the Lincoln hired the young Fats Waller at $23 a week to play its new $10,000 Wurlitzer organ for silent films and vaudeville acts.

In 1929, the Lincoln was sold to Frank Schiffman and Leo Brecher, businessmen who were busy consolidating Harlem’s entertainment industry. The Lincoln was designated to show movies while live entertainment (including Waller) was moved to the Lafayette.

RYAN JERVING

See also Anita Bush Stock Company; Bledsoe, Jules; Bush, Anita; Community Theater; Emperor Jones, The; Hughes, Langston; Hunter, Alberta; Lafayette Players; Lafayette Theater; Lewis, Theophilus; Messenger, The; O’Neill, Eugene; Rainey, Gertrude “Ma”; Shuffle Along; Smith, Bessie; Smith, Mamie; Theater Owners’ Booking Association; Waller, Thomas “Fats”; Waters, Ethel; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”

Further Reading

- Fraden, Rena. Blueprints for a Black Federal Theatre, 1935–1939. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Hay, Samuel A. African American Theatre: An Historical and Critical Analysis. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. London and New York: Knopf, 1940. (Reissue, New York: Hill and Wang, 1993.)
- Newman, Richard. “The Lincoln Theatre.” American Visions, 6(4), August 1991.

Singer, Barry. Black and Blue: The Life and Lyrics of Andy Razaf. London and New York: Schirmer–Simon and Schuster Macmillan, 1992.

Waller, Maurice, and Anthony Calabrese. Fats Waller. New York: Schirmer, 1977.

Lindsay, Vachel

Of his birthplace—Springfield, Illinois—Vachel Lindsay wrote, “Everything begins and ends there for me.” In a profound way this is true of his life. Lindsay drew on the people and landscape of Illinois as the material for his art and also as the yardstick for judging that art. For Lindsay, poetry was necessarily popular and democratic. He strove to create art that would appeal to the common people, in Springfield and beyond.

Lindsay’s first book was a prose memoir recalling his journeys across America as a tramp, exchanging his goodwill and poetic recitations for money and lodging. From this start, Lindsay rose quickly to become a central figure in the popularization of free verse in America. His poem “William Booth Enters Heaven” (1914) brought him wide acclaim and took him to the top of the American avant-garde. In 1914 the Irish poet William Butler Yeats, visiting America, said that Lindsay’s poetry had a “strange beauty,” legitimizing the new avant-garde in the eyes of the conservative press. By the end of that year, with the publication of Lindsay’s poem “The Congo” in the magazine Poetry and his volume The Congo shortly thereafter, Lindsay’s dramatic reading style and his verse—which was influenced by vaudeville—became wildly popular, and he embarked on a rigorous schedule of readings and lectures nationwide which he would keep up for years.

Lindsay, along with Carl Sandburg and Edgar Lee Masters, defined modernism for the Harlem Renaissance. His chanted verse and dramatic cadences anticipated the use of jazz and ragtime in poetry, but it was Lindsay’s populism that made him so influential a figure in the renaissance. Lindsay was first and foremost concerned about how to create poetry that would sing to the masses. Famously, he claimed to have discovered Langston Hughes while appearing at a hotel where Hughes was working as a busboy. Hughes dropped a packet of poems on Lindsay’s table; Lindsay read them that night, and then he surprised his audience by announcing that he had discovered a black poet working right there in the hotel. However, Lindsay did not realize that Hughes had already been discovered: Alfred Knopf had a contract to publish Hughes's Weary Blues.

Lindsay's most famous poem, "The Congo," is subtitled "A Study of the Negro Race." The poem draws on the concept of African Americans as barely concealed primitives and portrays black people's coming into civilization as a source of a vital new poetry. Although "The Congo" now reads as stereotyped, condescending, and even offensive, Lindsay claimed that it had been inspired when he discussed the plight of the Negro with a black lawyer in Springfield, Charles Gibson.

Lindsay's interest in helping black America was sincere, if sometimes misguided. In 1926 he was a judge for Opportunity's annual literary contest; that same year he was also one of the respondents in a symposium in The Crisis: "The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed?" Lindsay was also involved in civil rights causes; for example, he wrote letters of protest to newspapers after two black men were lynched in Springfield in 1908, and he made a point of including black colleges on his reading tours.

By the 1920s, Lindsay's career was in decline. He himself came to hate reading "The Congo," although his audiences kept on demanding to hear it. In 1931, faced with the critical failure of his later work, and battling exhaustion and illness, Lindsay committed suicide (by drinking Lysol) in the home in Springfield where he had been born.

Biography

Nicholas Vachel Lindsay was born in Springfield, Illinois, 10 November 1879. He attended Hiram College in Ohio (1897–1900); the Chicago Art Institute and the New York School of Art (1900–1905). He was a pen-and-ink designer (1900–1910) and a lecturer on art history (1905–1910). His honors included Phi Beta Kappa (Harvard, 1922); a Litt.D. from Baylor University, and a Litt.D. from Hiram College (1930). Lindsay died in Springfield 5 December 1931.

STEVEN NARDI

See also Crisis, The: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Hughes, Langston; Knopf, Alfred A.; Opportunity Literary Contests; Weary Blues, The

Selected Works

General William Booth Enters Heaven and Other Poems. 1913.
Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty. 1914.
The Congo and Other Poems. 1914.
The Art of the Moving Picture. 1915. (Rev. ed., 1922.)
The Golden Whales of California and Other Rhymes in the American Language. 1920.
Collected Poems. 1925.

Further Reading

Masters, Edgar Lee. Vachel Lindsay: A Poet in America. New York: Scribner, 1935.
 Flanagan, John T., ed. Profile of Vachel Lindsay. Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1970.
 Harris, Mark. City of Discontent. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1952.
 Wolfe, Glenn Joseph. Vachel Lindsay: The Poet as Film Theorist. New York: Arno, 1973.

Lippincott, J. B., Publisher

J. B. Lippincott, one of America's oldest publishing houses, was started by Joseph Ballinger Lippincott in 1836. He established his own firm by buying the business of a bookseller in Philadelphia named Clarke and later acquiring Jacob Johnson and Company, a publisher—also in Philadelphia—that had been in existence since 1792. In its early years, Lippincott was known for publishing bibles, prayer books, and literature. The company's list diversified through the 1850s, and Lippincott became the largest publishing, distributing, and manufacturing office in the world, establishing its reputation as a seller of medical books, religious books, and textbooks.

Lippincott's Magazine was launched in 1868 to boost the firm's literary publishing list. It became an important venue for Rudyard Kipling, Oscar Wilde, Jack London, and Arthur Conan Doyle, all of whom published complete novels or novelettes in the magazine; it was one of the leading magazines of its type until it merged with Scribner's in 1916.

Although a poem by Alice Dunbar Nelson appeared in Lippincott's Magazine in 1902 and William Stanley Braithwaite's A Tale of a Walled Town and Other Verses was published by the firm in 1921, Lippincott's list during the heyday of the Harlem Renaissance showed no significant investment in works by black writers. Rather, Lippincott's principal contribution to the Harlem Renaissance was its publication of Zora Neale Hurston's major works in the 1930s and 1940s.

Bertram Lippincott took over as editor during this time and brought a new perspective to the conservative firm. Lippincott discovered Hurston's work when he read "The Gilded Six-Bits" in Story Magazine in 1933, and he wrote to her asking if she had a novel. Although she had not yet begun writing the text that would become her first novel, Jonah's Gourd Vine, Hurston convinced Lippincott that she was already working on it, and he offered her an advance. Lippincott was interested in Hurston's blending of fiction and folklore, and published Jonah's Gourd Vine in 1934. He eagerly published Hurston's next four books—Mules and Men (1935), Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), Tell My Horse (1938) and Moses, Man of the Mountain (1939)—although the last two did not sell well.

When Lippincott urged Hurston to write an autobiography as her next project, she initially disagreed; he prevailed, however, and Dust Tracks on a Road was published in 1942. This book is marked by inconsistencies that are very likely a result of Hurston's and Lippincott's contrary expectations for its content. When, in 1945, Lippincott rejected Hurston's proposal for a novel about the upper strata of African American life, she called him a "timid soul" and stated that he thought America was not yet ready for this kind of text. Her later essay "What White Publishers Won't Print" may have been related to Lippincott's rejection of her idea.

Aside from its promotion of Zora Neale Hurston's works, J. B. Lippincott contributed little to the Harlem Renaissance. Still, the role this publishing house played in establishing Hurston as a major figure of the 1930s is notable indeed.

AMANDA M. LAWRENCE

See also Hurston, Zora Neale; Publishers and Publishing Houses; Their Eyes Were Watching God

Further Reading

Dzwonkoski, Peter. "J. B. Lippincott Company." Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 49, American Literary Publishing Houses, 1638–1899. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1986, pp. 261–266.

Hemenway, Robert. Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.

Stern, Edith M. "J. B. Lippincott Co.: 'An Eye to the Book Chance.'" Saturday Review of Literature, 14 June 1941, pp. 11–12.

Tebbel, John. Between Covers: The Rise and Transformation of Book Publishing in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Literary and Artistic Prizes

During the Harlem Renaissance, several sponsors had contests for outstanding literary, artistic, and scientific achievement. These sponsors included The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), through its magazine The Crisis; the National Urban League, through its magazine Opportunity; private foundations; and individual patrons whose purpose was to encourage young writers and artists and to have the best of their work published. Such contests went on throughout the 1920s and early 1930s. Most were eventually discontinued for various reasons—financial constraints, a lack of worthy entries, and a desire to forgo white patronage—but they left an important legacy. Among the eminent literary figures who achieved recognition, and whose work was promoted, through these contests were Arna Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and Nella Larsen.

As early as 1922, the blues singer Trixie Smith won the first concert competition of the 369th Infantry Regimental Band, sponsored by Black Swan Records. But the literary and artistic prizes of the Harlem Renaissance officially got under way in the summer of 1924, when W. E. B. Du Bois, the editor of The Crisis, received $300 to sponsor an annual literary competition. The donors were Amy E. Spingarn, daughter of a wealthy mill owner in New Jersey; and her husband, Joel Spingarn, who was a literary editor at the publishing firm Harcourt Brace and a member of the board of NAACP. In September 1924, Charles S. Johnson, the editor of Opportunity, announced a creative writing contest of his own, both to encourage literary achievement and to promote African American social and political causes.

From their inception, the contests raised concerns having to do with the content, goals, and patronage of the sponsoring magazines. Regarding content and goals, in early 1926 the poet Claude McKay responded to the proliferation of awards with an essay (unpublished) called "Negro Life and Negro Art," in which he argued that the contests were, ill-advisedly, channeling artistic expression toward racial propaganda. With regard to patronage, although the Urban League and the NAACP supported the arts during the 1920s, this situation began to change as the decade wore on: increasing numbers of prizes and fellowships were sponsored by white businesses, foundations, and entrepreneurs. White patronage was at first considered an encouraging development in interracial relations, but eventually it came to be seen as inimical to African American uplift—and, as noted earlier, this was one reason why the magazines finally ended the awards. Du Bois, for one, had misgivings about certain white publishers that he believed were perpetuating sensationalist images of Harlem and African Americans. Nevertheless, for quite a few years the contests and award ceremonies provided a prominent venue in which emerging writers and artists could meet each other and publicize their work.

The Crisis

The Crisis, which had been founded by Du Bois in 1910, was a high-quality journal that urged the eradication of racism in America and emphasized African American sources of the nation's cultural landscape. Before undertaking its literary contests, it had published work by little-known poets and writers such as Georgia Johnson, Mary Effie Lee, and Lucian Watkins; had offered the Spingarn medal for African American achievement in several categories; and, in December 1922, had run a short-story competition. The Crisis formally announced its first literary contest in October 1924. The rules were few, calling for plays, poems, fiction, and essays dealing with some aspect of Negro life; the categories also included illustration and song. The first awards dinner was held in November 1925 at the Renaissance Casino in Harlem. The prestigious panel of judges, selected by Du Bois and Jessie Fauset (the literary editor of The Crisis), included Sinclair Lewis, Charles Chestnutt, Eugene O'Neill, H. G. Wells, and the African American anthologist and literary critic William Stanley Braithwaite.

The following year, the award money was increased. Langston Hughes won a prize in the contest of 1926; and Du Bois announced the Krigwa prizes (originally Crigwa, an acronym standing for Crisis Guild of Writers and Artists), sponsored by white and black patrons. Du Bois, who was a firm believer in the power of art to promote racial uplift, established the Krigwa workshop to encourage young playwrights, writers, and artists. In 1927 he formed the Krigwa Academy, comprising everyone who had received two prizes (first or second) in the contests run by The Crisis. Du Bois also believed firmly that African American life should be presented in positive terms; nevertheless the Krigwa competition invited submissions on all facets of black life.

Du Bois's ambivalence about the goals set by The Crisis became manifest in the announcement of the prizes for 1927. Substantial prize money came from African American businesses and the Empire State Federation of Women's Clubs rather than from whites. Prizes were to be awarded not only for artistic achievements but also for achievements in African American economic activities. The Crisis continued to acknowledge creative works with the Amy Spingarn awards and with a cash award from Charles Chestnutt, but the rules for the contest became more restrictive, urging submissions that promoted black business and social causes over those of an artistic nature. Although Mae Virginia Cowdery of Philadelphia won first prize for poetry, the general feeling at The Crisis was that the quality of the entries and the stature of the judges had declined. Du Bois decided to eliminate the annual prizes and banquets in favor of modest monthly Spingarn awards for poetry and fiction. Toward the end of 1928, The Crisis had abandoned its arts and literature categories altogether, maintaining only the Charles Chestnutt honoraria and the economic prizes, with its own editors acting as judges.

The Crisis revived its contests in 1931 with a Du Bois Literary Prize of $1,000, established by Mrs. E. R. Mathews. First prize went to James Weldon Johnson for Black Manhattan. There was no winner in 1932, and enthusiasm for the contests continued to fade: prizes were postponed, submissions decreased, and there was a lack of qualified judges. Interest in The Crisis itself also declined as Du Bois struggled with the direction the magazine should take and dampened the enthusiasm of artists with his exacting demands and restrictions.

Opportunity

Founded in 1923, Opportunity: A Journal of Negro Life was committed to promoting talented African American artists, writers, and poets whose work was often neglected by other periodicals. Its editor, Charles S. Johnson, furthered this goal by inaugurating Opportunity's literary contest in September 1924; entries depicting varied aspects of African American life were requested.

Johnson had raised awareness of black literature earlier that year as the host of a party at the Civic Club on 21 March 1924; the guests had included many literary luminaries, such as Alain Locke, who served as master of ceremonies. The ensuing enthusiasm for African American writing led to a gift of $500 from Mrs. Henry G. Leach to sponsor a creative-writing contest run by Opportunity.

To Johnson's delight, Opportunity received numerous submissions in fiction, poetry, and drama, and the winners were announced at a banquet in New York City on 1 May 1925. An integrated panel of twenty-four judges included Robert C. Benchley of Life magazine, Alexander Woollcott of the New York Sun, Henry G. Leach of Forum, and James Weldon Johnson. First prize for fiction went to John Matheus for "Fog"; second prize to Zora Neale Hurston for "Spunk" and Dorothy West (then age nineteen) for "The Typewriter"; and third prize to Eric Walrond for "The Voodoo's Revenge." Langston Hughes won first prize for poetry for "Weary Blues"; Hurston's play Color Struck shared second prize for drama with Warren A. MacDonald's Humble Instrument; and E. Franklin Frazier, Sterling Brown, and Laura D. Wheatley won prizes for essays.

The first Opportunity awards also established important relationships in New York's literary milieu. Among the guests at the banquet were the publisher Alfred Knopf, the essayist and novelist Fannie Hurst, and several members of the Van Doren family. It was at this banquet that Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston met for the first time, and Hurston first became acquainted with Fannie Hurst, who soon thereafter hired Hurston as her companion and personal secretary. Distinguished magazines such as the Nation, Vanity Fair, and Harper's solicited further work from several prizewinners, including Countee Cullen; the black West Indian merchant Caspar Holstein gave Johnson the funds to sponsor a second contest.

The following year, Opportunity received 1,276 entries for its contest, which had been extended to include journalism, musical composition, and the Alexander Pushkin Poetry Prize. The second awards ceremony was held in April 1926; the judges this time included Robert Frost, Vachel Lindsay, Jean Toomer, James Weldon Johnson, Alain Locke, Carl Van Doren, and William Stanley Braithwaite. Zora Neale Hurston received second prize for her short story "Muttsy," and Arna Bontemps received the Pushkin prize for "Golgotha Is a Mountain." Arthur Fauset (Jessie Fauset's half brother), Joseph Cotter Seamon, Dorothy West, and John Matheus also won prizes. Many award-winning works appeared in the June issue—the "Contest Number"—of Opportunity.

The Opportunity awards of 1927 were successful but also controversial. Winners included Sterling Brown (who was awarded the first prize in poetry for "When De Saints Go Ma'ching Home"), Helene Johnson (who won second prize in poetry for "Summer Matures"), and Nellie R. Bright (who won third prize for poetry). Arna Bontemps won his second Pushkin prize for "The Return," and Georgia Douglas Johnson won first prize for her play Plumes. Nevertheless, four months later the Urban League suspended the contests. One judge resigned from the panel; Charles Johnson and others deplored the inferior critical standards applied to many submissions; and the writer Wallace Thurman lamented that the prizes seemed to be based on racial rather than literary merit. Financial troubles set in as well, when a five-year grant from the Carnegie Corporation ended in 1927 and Opportunity sold just 11,000 copies a month during 1928; also, Johnson left Opportunity in 1928 for a professorship in sociology at Fisk University.

Like The Crisis, Opportunity later resumed its contests. It held a banquet on 5 May 1933 honoring Arna Bontemps with first prize for "A Summer Tragedy" and Marieta Bonner and Henry B. Jones with honorable mentions. Pearl S. Buck was the guest of honor, and the judges included Sterling Brown, Fannie Hurst, and John Day (the president of John Day Publishing Company). By the following year, however, the contests were permanently discontinued.

Other Prizes

Additional prizes included the NAACP's Spingarn Medal for exemplary work by an African American, awarded to William Stanley Braithwaite in 1918; and various Amy Spingarn awards. In 1925, Rudolph Fisher won a first prize for a story in the Spingarn contest in literature and art; Willis Richardson won the Amy Spingarn prize for his play The Broken Banjo. Funding for prizes in 1926 included the Boni and Liveright prize of $1,000 for an outstanding novel by an African American writer (although this was never awarded, for lack of a worthy recipient); $600 from Amy Spingarn for the forthcoming Crisis contest; $1,000 from Casper Holstein; and a cash award from Carl Van Vechten for Opportunity.

In 1921, Marcus Garvey's weekly newspaper, Negro World, ran a Christmas literary competition with dozens of cash prizes for essays, poems, and short stories combining creative talent with race-consciousness. One notable entrant was Eric Walrond, who won first prize in the category “Africa Redeemed” for his short story “A Senator’s Memoirs.”

The William E. Harmon Foundation sponsored annual prizes in science, education, literature, music, fine arts, industry, and race relations. Seven prizes were designated for African American contestants, and an eighth for an eligible contestant of any ethnicity. At the Harmon Foundation’s awards ceremony on 12 February 1928, James Weldon Johnson accepted the gold medal and $400 for Claude McKay, and Nella Larsen received the bronze medal and $100 for her novel Quicksand.

Other prizes included those of the Garland Fund, and the Louis Rodman Wanamaker awards for musical composition.

Conclusion

The literary and artistic contests of the Harlem Renaissance were invaluable in promoting and publishing the work of talented black Americans. Yet the momentum of these contests slowed for several reasons. First, editors at both The Crisis and Opportunity believed that the submissions during the late 1920s lacked the vibrancy and spontaneity of earlier entries. Second, noting decreasing circulation at both magazines, many sponsors sensed a waning public enthusiasm for the arts and diverted their funds elsewhere, despite major publications of black prose and poetry at the time, including Alain Locke’s The New Negro. The Crisis, for its part, seemed to have lost much of its aplomb, publishing literature haphazardly and engendering controversy over poorly run contests in 1928 and 1929. Third, there were varying and increasingly complex opinions as to the means of racial uplift. Whereas the announcements of the early contests had encouraged diverse literary representations of black life, Du Bois, for one, later believed in only one acceptable portrayal of the African American experience. Fourth, Du Bois’s exertion of rigid control over the contests run by The Crisis alienated a new generation of artists and writers. Fifth, Charles Johnson at Opportunity faced financial difficulties and the question of whether the magazine and its literature were still effective vehicles for the Urban League.

As a result of all these factors, the prizes of the Harlem Renaissance—although they connoted dazzling literary success—ultimately succumbed to financial distress, artistic disputes, and ongoing racial tension.

KRISTIN E. CZARNECKI

See also Black Manhattan; Boni and Liveright Prize; Bontemps, Arna; Braithwaite, William Stanley; Brown, Sterling; Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Civic Club Dinner, 1924; Cowdery, Mae Virginia; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Frazier, E. Franklin; Garland Fund; Harmon Foundation; Holstein, Casper; Hughes, Langston; Hurst, Fannie; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; Larsen, Nella; Locke, Alain; Matheus, John Frederick; Negro World; Opportunity Literary Contests; Smith, Trixie; Spingarn, Joel; Walrond, Eric; Wanamaker Award; West, Dorothy; other specific writers and artists

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna, ed. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Dettmar, Kevin J. H., and Stephen Watt, eds. Marketing Modernisms: Self-Promotion, Canonization, and Rereading. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. London and Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Ikonne, Chidi. From Du Bois to Van Vechten: The Early New Negro Literature, 1903–1926. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1981.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Marks, Carole, and Diana Edkins. The Power of Pride: Stylemakers and Rulebreakers of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Crown, 1999.
- Martin, Tony. Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983.
- Singh, Amritjit, William S. Shiver, and Stanley Brodwin, eds. The Harlem Renaissance: Revaluations. London and New York: Garland, 1989.

Literary Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance

Much literary criticism was written during the Harlem Renaissance, although it took slightly different forms from the literary criticism written today. Analyses and interpretations of fiction, poetry, and drama in the 1920s appeared as review essays, rather than the extended academic essays that we currently associate with literary criticism. During the Harlem Renaissance, some literary criticism appeared in books and anthologies, but its more common venues were the popular magazines of the time: The Crisis and Opportunity in particular, but also The Messenger and some white journals like Vanity Fair.

Some white writers, such as Carl Van Doren and H. L. Mencken, reviewed literature by African Americans, but work by and about African Americans received its most frequent and extensive attention from other African Americans. The writers of reviews and essays included many of the most prominent African American participants in the Harlem Renaissance: W. E. B. Du Bois and Jessie Fauset, whose essays appeared mostly in The Crisis; Alain Locke and James Weldon Johnson, who contributed reviews to The Crisis, Opportunity, and other magazines; and Charles S. Johnson, who wrote about literature primarily for Opportunity. Literary critics for the Messenger included George Schuyler, whose reviews also were published in other publications; Theophilus Lewis, who wrote about drama; and Wallace Thurman, whose barbed critiques also appeared in white magazines and in Fire!! A number of anthologies published during the 1920s also included important critical essays: Among these are James Weldon Johnson's The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922; revised 1931); Alain Locke's The New Negro (1925); Countee Cullen's Caroling Dusk (1927), and Charles Johnson's Ebony and Topaz (1927). Benjamin Brawley, William S. Braithwaite, and Sterling Brown also deserve note as literary critics: All three published books and essays about African American literature, although much of Brown's work appeared in the years after the Harlem Renaissance.

These critics used a range of criteria to assess literature. Some of the critical essays of the time merely debated those criteria, without reference to specific texts. But most essays analyzed an individual book or play and described its strengths and weaknesses. In the early years of the renaissance, many of the writers of literary criticism measured texts by the degree to which they offered portrayals of African Americans that challenged racist stereotypes and assumptions. This criterion was applied most often to works of fiction or drama. For example, in 1923 Montgomery Gregory argued that the realistic portraits of African Americans in Jean Toomer's Cane were important complements to the caricatures so often present in literature by white writers. Similarly, Gregory heralded Fauset's There Is Confusion in 1924, asserting that it presented "the better elements of our life to those who know us only as domestic servants, 'uncles,' or criminals" (181). Such arguments were common in the literary criticism of the Harlem Renaissance; the reviewers' belief in the importance of new images of African Americans is clear in the laudatory reviews of work like Fauset's that presented well-educated, property-holding, "respectable" African American characters.

This hope that literature might help undermine racism also led to condemnations of books that were seen as presenting "negative" images of African Americans. These included blatantly racist novels by white southern writers such as Thomas Dixon, whose novel The Clansman (1905) was the basis for the movie The Birth of a Nation (1915). Writers in the major African American magazines warned their readers about these depictions, as well as those in more subtly demeaning texts that seemed perhaps more well-intentioned but still advanced racist stereotypes. Also viciously denounced were texts by African Americans that, in reviewers' minds, were counterproductive to the goal of presenting positive images of African Americans. For example, Claude McKay's Home to Harlem (1928) received outraged criticism from Du Bois, who declared that he felt like taking a bath after he read it. Perhaps the one book that was most criticized along these lines was Carl Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven (1926). Again, Du Bois led the charge, writing that the book was "a blow to the face" and "an affront to the hospitality of black folk" (81), particularly because it was written by a white writer who had been assumed to be a "friend" of African Americans. Du Bois found the title misleading and objectionable, but he also was offended by what he saw as the book's focus on cabaret scenes, its reveling in the details of a "wildly, barbaric drunken orgy" (81), and its caricatures of African Americans. Other reviewers, however, were much more positive about the novel, and their responses to it hint at a shift away from the expectation that literature should work as propaganda.

One place where the various positions in this debate were articulated was "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?," a symposium launched in The Crisis in early 1926. Implying that too much literature presented African Americans "at their worst," the opening questionnaire asked whether writers had a duty to present more positive images of African Americans. Du Bois made clear his own answer to this question in “Criteria of Negro Art,” which he included in the October 1926 issue of Crisis. In this essay, a transcription of a speech he had delivered to a meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Du Bois issued his famous proclamation that he did not “care a damn for any art that is not used for propaganda”; he also insisted that black writers had a “bounden duty” to focus on beauty, truth, and goodness (296). Ironically, Du Bois had declared in an editorial, “Negro Art,” in 1921 that expecting art to work as propaganda was wrong and would be harmful. Many of the other contributors to the symposium of 1926 agreed with his earlier argument. Langston Hughes, for example, insisted, as he would insist in his famous essay “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain,” that artists needed to be free to create work according to their own experiences and desires. Others agreed with Hughes, and many declared themselves to be more concerned with the demands of art than the need for propaganda.

The critique of the idea that literature should present positive images of African Americans became more pronounced in the mid- to late 1920s. Wallace Thurman was one of the most vocal writers to articulate this opposition; in fact, he pointedly attacked the expectation that literature and the arts should work as propaganda. For example, in an essay in Fire!! he wrote that racist readers probably wouldn’t believe that characters like Fauset’s were realistic; if they assumed that the less-respectable characters in a book like Nigger Heaven were typical African Americans, they probably already believed “such poppy-cock, . . . without any additional aid from Mr. Van Vechten” (1926, 47). In other words, Thurman challenged the validity of the hope that literature could serve the social purpose of undermining racism. Furthermore, here and elsewhere, he insisted that expecting literature to work as propaganda was counterproductive, that it limited what writers thought they could create and, by oppressing their creative tendencies, weakened the artistic merit of the work produced. He insisted that the criterion by which literature should be measured was quality, not content. This position—art for art’s sake—was articulated, for example, in the opening statement of Fire!!, which defined the magazine as “interested only in the arts” (2). Thurman’s essays and reviews were perhaps among the most sharply worded of the arguments along these lines, but many other literary critics of the Harlem Renaissance agreed with Thurman on these points.

Still another set of reviewers focused on the importance of the quality rather than the content of literature by African Americans because they believed that the work’s quality could serve as an argument against racism. This criterion was applied to literature in all genres. In his preface to the first edition of The Book of American Negro Poetry, for example, James Weldon Johnson asserted that “the amount and standard of literature and art” produced by a group of people was critical to judgments about that group (1922, 9). This assumption underlay many of the reviews of texts by African American writers. Significantly, many reviews were published with photographs of the authors; these made visible the race of their creators, as if to ensure that their work “counted” as a credit to the race. This idea that well-written literature was an important demonstration of the skills of African Americans also seems to have fit into the sense of purpose for the literary contests run by The Crisis and Opportunity from 1925 to 1927, the Civic Club dinner held by Charles Johnson in 1924, and other events designed to draw reviewers’ attention to high-quality work by African American writers.

The question of what made a text notable for its quality was, of course, also subject to debate. Critical discussions ensued about what formal aspects made a text worthy of note. One of the most debated issues was the question of language—in particular, whether writers should use dialect in their work. Poetry was most often the focus of this debate. James Weldon Johnson, for example, argued in the preface to the first edition of The Book of American Negro Poetry that the use of traditional dialect was outdated and problematic; he declared that there was a need for black writers to use the vernacular in new and innovative ways, but he also argued that traditional dialect had too many demeaning connotations to be useful to poets in the Harlem Renaissance. Young poets like Hughes and Sterling Brown did use the speech of “ordinary” black people in their poetry, however, and their innovative use of language was heralded by literary critics—including Johnson in his preface to the second edition of his book—who saw their work as marked by important literary innovations.

Another set of critics debated ideas about culture that had implications for literary criticism. Participants in the Harlem Renaissance voiced a range of opinions about whether African American writers should reflect distinctive elements of African American culture in their work—and even whether distinctive elements of African American culture existed. George Schuyler's essay "Negro Art Hokum," published in The Nation in June 1926, was a particularly strong piece on this topic. Arguing that black and white people in America were subject to the same cultural and social forces, Schuyler insisted that black culture did not exist as a separate, distinct entity; that nationality rather than race had the most significant impact on creative work. By extension, Schuyler asserted, African American writers and artists should not be expected to create work that differed significantly from work created by white American writers and artists. Langston Hughes's response, published a week later in the same magazine, was "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." Opening with a critique of poets who wanted their work to be judged without regard to their race, Hughes attacked what he called an "urge within the race toward whiteness," a desire to be "as little Negro and as much American as possible" (1926, 91). In contrast to Schuyler, Hughes called for the black artist to maintain "his racial individuality" and to create "a racial art" (93). Hughes offered folk music and jazz as examples of specifically racial art forms, and he mentioned his own poetry, particularly his "jazz poems," as demonstrating the possibility of literature that was formally linked to black culture. Diametrically opposed to Hughes's poetry, in terms of their formal elements, were McKay's Elizabethan sonnets. To critics who believed that black culture was distinct from white culture, literature like McKay's poems was seen as missing the opportunity to add something unique to American literature.

A related issue that was debated in the literary criticism of the Harlem Renaissance was whether African American writers should focus on the African American folk, rather than the elite. Poets like Hughes and Brown often portrayed the "low-down folks, the so-called common element," as Hughes referred to them in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (92). Zora Neale Hurston's plays and fiction also were full of such characters, as were stories written by Wallace Thurman and others. Such work did not fit the demands of reviewers who believed that it was depictions of the talented tenth—or at least of middle-class African Americans—that would do the most to improve perceptions of African Americans. But texts that focused on the black folk also had many supporters. Charles Johnson, for example, repeatedly called for fiction that focused on the "lower classes," as did white writers like Carl Van Vechten, who encouraged African American writers to mine the black folk for fresh, innovative material. They and others either saw such work as complementing propaganda literature by ensuring that the folk as well as the elite were depicted, or they saw it as complementing literature by white Americans in adding realistic and sympathetic depictions of the black folk to the national literary tradition.

Whatever their own positions in these arguments about literary criteria, many reviewers also recognized the influence of audiences' demands on writers' work. In some cases, critics pointed to African Americans' expectations as part of the problem. For example, Theophilus Lewis, in his reviews in the Messenger of plays by and about African Americans, often called for more "serious" black drama but bemoaned the lack of support from black audiences for such work. Too many African Americans, he argued, were too fond of dancing and comedies to sufficiently support the development of theater in a way that would nurture an understanding and appreciation for black culture. More often, though, the demands of white audiences were the focus of discussion. One of the assumptions behind the symposium in The Crisis on "Negro in Art," for example, was that white publishers were interested only in literature that conformed to certain stereotypes of African Americans—an assumption with which many of the respondents to the survey disagreed. If it were true, though, the demands of those publishers might persuade writers to create work that fit those expectations. On the other hand, the idea that literature should serve as propaganda also primarily assumed that white readers were the intended audience, and it potentially pushed writers to produce more propaganda literature. In fact, as the Harlem Renaissance wound down, literary critics often used this concern over the effect of literature on white readers to attack the movement. Richard Wright, for example, in his devastating critique of the literature of the Harlem Renaissance, argued that the movement's participants had been too focused on white readers; in his essay "Blueprint for Negro Writing" (1937), he characterized the writers of the Harlem Renaissance as "prim and decorous ambassadors who went a-begging to white America" (194). Ironically, then, as a new generation of literary critics rose to prominence in aftermath of the Harlem Renaissance, the literature of the movement was dismissed on the basis of the very criteria for which it had been praised two decades earlier.

The fact that so much of the literary criticism published during the Harlem Renaissance appeared in periodicals has made its study time consuming and challenging, for it requires archival research on magazines like The Crisis, Opportunity, and the Messenger. However, relatively recent critical work on the literary criticism of the movement demonstrates the insights to be gained from such study. For example, George Hutchinson (1995) offers an overview of the main concerns of literary critics who wrote for The Crisis, Opportunity, and the Messenger, focusing particularly on the work of their drama critics. Furthermore, a number of collections of primary materials from the movement have been published since the 1990s, including Sondra Kathryn Wilson's three readers (1999a; 1999b; 2000) and the first two volumes of Cary Wintz's six-volume series on the Harlem Renaissance. These make at least some of the movement's literary criticism more easily accessible, thus opening the door for continued analysis of this important body of work.

ANNE CARROLL

See also Cane; Crisis, The; Crisis, The: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Ebony and Topaz; Fire!!; Home to Harlem; Messenger, The; New Negro, The; Nigger Heaven; Opportunity; There Is Confusion; Vanity Fair; specific individuals

Further Reading

- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Negro Art." The Crisis, June 1921.
 ———. "Criteria of Negro Art." The Crisis, October 1926a.
 ———. "Review of Nigger Heaven, by Carl Van Vechten." The Crisis, December 1926b.
 Gregory, Montgomery. "Review of Cane, by Jean Toomer." Opportunity, December 1923.
 ———. "The Spirit of Phillis Wheatley." Opportunity, June 1924. (Review of There Is Confusion, by Jessie Fauset.)
 Hughes, Langston. "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." The Nation (June 23, 1926). (Reprinted in The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader, ed. David Levering Lewis. New York and London: Penguin, 1994.)
 Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
 Johnson, James Weldon. The Book of American Negro Poetry. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1922. (See also rev. ed., 1931.)
 Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.
 "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium." The Crisis, February–October 1926.

- Schuyler, George. "Negro Art Hokum." Nation, 16 June 1926. (Reprinted in The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader, ed. David Levering Lewis. New York and London: Penguin, 1994.)
 Thurman, Wallace. "Fire Burns: A Department of Comment." Fire!! 1926.
 Wilson, Sondra Kathryn, ed. The Crisis Reader. New York: Modern Library—Random House, 1999a.
 ———. The Opportunity Reader. New York: Modern Library—Random House, 1999b.
 ———. The Messenger Reader. New York: Modern Library—Random House, 2000.
 Wintz, Cary, ed. Black Writers Interpret the Harlem Renaissance. New York and London: Garland, 1996a.
 ———, ed. The Emergence of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Garland, 1996b.
 ———, ed. The Politics and Aesthetics of "New Negro" Literature. New York: Garland, 1996c.
 Wright, Richard. "Blueprint for Negro Writing." New Challenge, 2, Fall 1937. (Reprinted in The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader, ed. David Levering Lewis. New York and London: Penguin, 1994.)

Literature: 1—Overview

The literature of the Harlem Renaissance, or the New Negro movement, not only was an affirmation of the artistic sensibility and the intellectual potential of the African Americans gathered in Harlem in the years 1910–1930, but it also connected black culture to the avant-garde aesthetics being developed on both sides of the Atlantic. The literary Harlem Renaissance can be seen as beginning with the opening of the musical Shuffle Along in 1921 and with the publication of Claude McKay's Harlem Shadows (1922), Jean Toomer's Cane (1923), and Jessie Redmon Fauset's There Is Confusion (1924). Cane in particular—a sophisticated collage of modernism and folk materials, poetry and prose, advanced urban milieus and mythic rural Georgia—reflected characteristic themes concerning unresolved conflicts between the psychological and the political, the personal and the social, the North and the South, and white modernist formalized elitism and black social advancement.

The renaissance of African American literature was influenced by the "great migration" of the early twentieth century, in which African Americans moved from the rural South to major cities in the North. The resulting concentration of creative artists in urban settings—poets, dramatists, essayists, fiction writers, dancers, painters, singers, and musicians—encouraged interchange and productivity. Often, these artists had a common goal: to develop new forms of artistic expression for the African American experience. Over the span of a few decades, Harlem became the black capital of the world; it was seen as a new mecca where the “niggerati” (as they called themselves, ironically) could undertake a formal exploration of popular culture—leading to new kinds of poetry and music and attracting unprecedented national and international attention. Although earlier writers such as Paul Laurence Dunbar and Charles W. Chesnutt had received national recognition, it was during the Harlem Renaissance that far more mainstream publishers and critics came to take African American literature seriously.

The riots that erupted during the “red summer” of 1919, whatever their ill effects, were also a source of energy for intellectuals and artists. In July 1919, Claude McKay’s “If We Must Die” appeared in the Liberator, a white left-leaning publication; this poem, which contained an impassioned protest against racial violence, became an anthem for the whole movement. W. E. B. Du Bois, Alain Locke, James Weldon Johnson, and Jessie Fauset, who were among the foremost instigators and oracles of the Harlem Renaissance, argued that the inferior status of African Americans could be countered by affirming their intellectual quality, and equality, through art and literature. James Weldon Johnson wrote, in his preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry, “The world does not know that a people is great until the people produces great literature and art.”

Du Bois, in The Souls of Black Folk (1903), had anticipated the new sensibility that would be celebrated during the Harlem Renaissance: he affirmed the dignity and cultural potential of African Americans and indicted the history of prejudice, on the part of white America, that had imposed a “double-consciousness” on blacks, obliging them to measure themselves “by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity.” Du Bois’s argument was significant for literature, implying the existence of a new psychic territory, a connection between knowledge and power, and an interdependence between power and the awareness of one’s own talent. Moreover, his theory of the “talented tenth” suggested that the achievements of black intellectuals would be a beacon for the black multitudes. Du Bois influenced the concept of the New Negro that Locke defined in 1925 in a special issue of Survey Graphic illustrated by Winold Reiss. The New Negro was a revolutionary affirmation of black self-reliance, which at the time overlapped with the notion of modernism. It is worth noting that the special issue of Survey Graphic in which this idea was propounded had resulted from a grand dinner given by Charles S. Johnson, the editor of Opportunity, in order to introduce young African American writers to the white literary establishment of New York.

Du Bois was also the founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), an organization that had a role in the birth of the New Negro movement and lent its support to literary production. In November 1910, the NAACP founded its official magazine, The Crisis, edited by Du Bois, which became a literary and artistic outlet for many black intellectuals and helped to undermine stereotypes of blacks in literature and art. Jessie Fauset was its literary editor from 1919 to 1926, and in that capacity was the first to publish the most distinguished African American poets. Moreover, William S. Braithwaite commented appreciatively on the writers Georgia Douglas Johnson, James Weldon Johnson, and Claude McKay in The Crisis as early as the issue of April 1918.

Other periodicals—such as Opportunity, edited by Charles S. Johnson—gave writers many occasions for publication. Harlem (1928) and the short-lived Fire!! (1926), both edited by Wallace Thurman, were highly influential, as was Negro World; the latter was a periodical of the extravagant Jamaican nationalist Marcus Garvey, through which he expanded the reach of his Universal Negro Improvement Association and publicized his “back to Africa” ideology.

The Harlem Renaissance was part of an international artistic climate of formal experimentation. On the other side of the Atlantic, some artistic trends focused on the beauty and sophistication of African art and showed a new interest in and a new emphasis of the black body. Similar trends occurred in literature: for example, the most influential poem of the 1920s, T. S. Eliot’s The Waste Land (1922), borrowed its syncopations, which expressed the pace of modern life, from jazz rhythms. It is true that some people would come to regard this “exoticism” as only another form of exploitation by whites; nevertheless, the new interest in Africa and African America did make black culture an acknowledged source of artistic inspiration. Many white creative artists of the 1920s, including writers such as Sherwood Anderson, Fannie Hurst, Eugene O’Neill, Waldo Frank, and DuBose Heyward, incorporated black characters and idioms into their works.

“Primitivism”—which is sometimes dismissed as a morbid bent toward the workings of the supposedly “savage” mind—was also a tremendously progressive force. Claude McKay maintained that Negro primitivism should be considered a revolutionary future rather than a past to escape from; and Locke insisted that the modernist treatment of African art might help African Americans to perceive their spiritual heritage in ways that would enable them to understand and to shape their own distinctive experiences in the new world. The poet Countee Cullen, for one, used African and European images to explore his African roots. Furthermore, the African presence in European art encouraged other black writers in the United States to reevaluate their African heritage and to include it in their literary works. Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Nella Larsen, Claude McKay, Richard Bruce Nugent, Jean Toomer, and Wallace Thurman all pondered how their heritage could be considered an inspiration rather than a hindrance. Mixing folk tradition, highly refined modernist techniques, free verse in the style of Walt Whitman, and syncopated prose, they overturned all the conventions about African American writing. Among the poets, Hughes fervently affirmed the elements that were common to black life, whether rural or urban; he wanted to avoid the modernists’ cryptic, elitist tone and adopt a voice that would be both personal and communal. He was acclaimed for The Weary Blues (1926); in Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927) he explored the terse, double-edged language of blues and the new linguistic possibilities of dense jazz rhythms, providing an alternative to dialect poetry and (as the white critic Howard Mumford Jones said) “a really new verse form to the English language.” In fiction, Zora Neale Hurston provided a connection to the black folk heritage that Locke, her mentor, considered the essence of “New Negro” literature. In drama, playwrights such as Georgia Douglas Johnson drew from a black folk reservoir. The first drama by an African American—Willis Richardson’s The Chip Woman’s Fortune—was staged in 1923.

White creative artists as well as African Americans represented black life; financial support from white patrons—the “salon Negrotarians” such as Charlotte Mason, Waldo Frank, Carl Van Vechten, and Nancy Cunard—also proved significant, albeit controversial, for the growth of the movement. Van Vechten’s best-seller Nigger Heaven (1926) was a depiction of nightlife in Harlem, conveying seediness through glittering prose. It had a mixed reception: most African Americans dismissed Van Vechten an exploiter of fashionable black themes, but some, like Claude McKay, Wallace Thurman, Nella Larsen, and Charles S. Johnson, supported the book. Langston Hughes, in his autobiography, The Big Sea, praised Van Vechten, noting that Van Vechten’s generous promotion of black culture had been instrumental in establishing connections between African American writers like Hughes himself, Nella Larsen, and Rudolph Fisher and the publisher Alfred Knopf. (In 1927 Knopf would also reissue James Weldon Johnson’s novel of 1912, The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man.)

The New Negro movement was not monolithic but was characterized by internal differences and tension. The publication of Claude McKay’s Home to Harlem (1928) and Wallace Thurman’s Infants of the Spring (1932) caused considerable controversy. Thurman, especially, was a leader of the new literary bohemians, but both novels offered a firsthand, vibrant account of Harlem’s street life, with its pimps and prostitutes, derelicts, loan sharks, racketeers, and hustlers—an atmosphere that had little to do with the “theology” of the talented tenth. Thurman’s first novel, The Blacker the Berry (1929), and Nella Larsen’s Passing (1929) examined the complexities of skin color as a central theme in black life and concluded that, despite the optimism of the New Negroes, a color hierarchy—related to a class hierarchy—still existed within the black community. (Du Bois, for example, scorned the uneducated Marcus Garvey; and Richard Bruce Nugent revealed a certain “color chauvinism” when he met the dark-skinned Thurman—confirming the persistence of these thorny intraracial issues.)

Perhaps predictably, the movement did not transcend discrimination against women. Women writers attested to the persistence of sexist attitudes among the New Negroes. Jessie Fauset and Marieta Bonner, for instance, had to find covert forms of artistic expression so as not to openly defy the roles or the literary conventions imposed on women. Zora Neale Hurston did have the temerity to confront the narrow-mindedness of blacks and whites; in her essays and novels, she challenged the sexism and class snobbery of the Harlem Renaissance. She received some criticism for supposedly pandering to white readers, but her innovative aesthetics combined a mastery of folk materials with advanced writing techniques (such as a mixture of direct and indirect narration); her work, together with Jean Toomer’s, stands out as perhaps the highest literary achievement of the renaissance.

The thematic concerns of the renaissance writers, like their experiments with literary form, were promising and far-reaching. These writers dealt innovatively with vital issues such as identity, interracial and intraracial prejudice, gender roles, sexual exploitation, passing, and black artistic independence and white patronage—exposing the realities and ironies of black life.

After 1929, however, the glamour of the Harlem Renaissance, “not so gay and sparkling beneath the surface as it looked,” faded. Literary figures such as McKay and Hurston, as well as many others, left Harlem and in some cases disappeared into obscurity. Still, the movement would have an impact on American arts and letters for decades to come.

PAOLA BOI

See also Braithwaite, William Stanley; Crisis, The; Cunard, Nancy; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Frank, Waldo; Great Migration; Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Liberator; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Negro World; New Negro; Opportunity; Primitivism; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Shuffle Along; Survey Graphic; Talented Tenth; Van Vechten, Carl; White Patronage; specific writers; specific works

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Strauss, and Giroux, 1981.
- Baker, Houston A. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Bell, Bernard W. The Afro-American Novel and Its Tradition. Amherst, Mass.: University of Massachusetts Press, 1987.
- Bontemps, Arna. Black Thunder. New York: MacMillan, 1936.
- , ed. American Negro Poetry. New York: Hill and Wang, 1963.
- Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- De Jong, James. Vicious Modernism: Black Harlem and the Literary Imagination. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Quest of the Silver Fleece. Chicago, Ill.: McClurg, 1911.
- Fabi, M. Giulia. Passing and the Rise of the African American Novel. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2002.
- Fisher, Rudolph. The Walls of Jerico. New York: Knopf, 1928.
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., ed. The Prize Plays and Other Acts, Zora Neale Hurston, Eulalie Spence, Marieta Bonner, and Other African American Women Writers 1910–1940. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.
- Horton, James Oliver, and Lois E. Horton. Hard Road to Freedom: The History of African America. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Huggins, Nathan Irving. Harlem Renaissance. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Huggins, Nathan Irving, ed. Voices from the Harlem Renaissance. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996. (Originally published 1976.)
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. London: Pluto, 1986. (Originally published 1940.)
- . The Collected Poems, ed. Arnold Rampersad. New York: Vintage, 1994.
- Hughes Langston, and Zora Neale Hurston. Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life. New York: HarperPerennial, 1991. (Originally published 1931.)
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Dust Tracks on the Road. New York: Lippincott, 1942.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Johnson, Charles S. The Negro in American Civilization: A Study of Negro Life and Race Relations in the Light of Social Research. New York: Holt, 1930.
- Johnson, James Weldon, ed. The Book of American Negro Poetry. San Diego, Calif.: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983. (Originally published 1922.)
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1968. (Originally published 1931.)
- . The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man. New York: Random House, 1989. (Originally published 1912.)
- Kirschke, Amy Helene. Aaron Douglas: Art, Race, The Harlem Renaissance. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Locke, Alain. The Negro and His Music. Washington, D.C.: Associates in Negro Folk Education, 1936. (Reprint, New York: Arno and New York Times, 1969.)
- . The New Negro: Voices of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Atheneum, 1992. (Originally published 1925.)
- McKay, Claude. Home to Harlem. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1987. (Originally published 1928.)

- Powell, Richard J. The Blues Aesthetics: Black Culture and Modernism. Washington, D.C.: Washington Project for the Arts, 1989.
- . Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. London: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- Redding, Saunders J. To Make a Poet Black. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1988. (Originally published 1939.)
- Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of the World, 1900–1968. New York: Random House, 1995. (Originally published 1968.)
- Simawe, Saadi A. Black Orpheus: Music in African American Fiction from the Harlem Renaissance to Toni Morrison. New York: Garland, 2000.
- Thurman, Wallace. The Blacker the Berry. New York: Scribner, 1996. (Originally published 1929.)
- . Infants of the Spring. New York: Modern Library, 1999. (Originally published 1932.)
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1995.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance, Hub of African American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.
- Wilson, Sondra Katryn, ed. The Crisis Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays from the NAACP's Crisis Magazine. New York: Modern Library, 1999.

Literature: 2—Children's

Children's literature flourished during the Harlem Renaissance. In plays and pageants, in the children's magazine The Brownies' Book, and in texts by major authors like Langston Hughes, Arna Bontemps, and Countee Cullen, writers discussed and debated black childhood, the future of black children, and the potential for art to change black communities. Importantly, for children's writers of the Harlem Renaissance, the "New Negro" would arise from the young Negro. By cultivating the racial self-image and political awareness of young black readers, writers attempted to transform race relations in America. As an aspect of emerging cultural nationalism, children's literature directed attention to the black child as an icon of progress and revolutionary possibilities. This turn toward children's literature as a means of nation building was not limited to Harlem or to the 1920s. In other urban centers of the North and Midwest and in rural communities in the South throughout the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s, writers advanced progressive images of black childhood. Additionally, books for black children during the renaissance inaugurated a tradition of African American children's literature emphasizing black history and heroism.

Periodicals

As editor of The Crisis, W. E. B. Du Bois issued a "Children's Number" in October of nearly every year from 1912 to 1934. These issues included children's poetry, short stories, and nonfiction narratives; discussions of parenting and education; photographs of "perfect babies"; and coverage of baby beauty contests held by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

The popularity of the "Children's Numbers" inspired Du Bois to found one of the earliest literary magazines for black children, The Brownies' Book (1920–1921). Under the expert eye of Jessie Redmon Fauset, the magazine issued Langston Hughes's first published poems and short stories, as well as works by Nella Larsen, Willis Richardson, James Weldon Johnson, and others. Although its subscriptions numbered only 4,000, The Brownies' Book reached children nationwide. It included various genres and viewpoints—such as pan-Africanism, black fairy tales; dialect stories of the South, descriptions of black industrialists—but the writers had in common the goal of preparing young people to contend with racism and oppression.

When The Brownies' Book ceased publication in 1921, Crisis continued its commitment to black children's literature, albeit on a smaller scale. It published the poet Effie Lee Newsome's "Little Page" nearly every month from March 1925 to November 1930. Offering "Things That Children Will Love and Learn" (January 1926), Newsome cultivated children's positive self-image by comparing their blackness to beautiful features of the natural world; she also offered descriptions of her own childhood and her experiences in the South and in Ohio.

Other periodicals included Carter G. Woodson's Negro History Bulletin, founded in 1937, which offered biographies and historical narratives for school-age children.

Drama

Staged in schools, community centers, and churches nationwide, dramas for children allowed communities to address local concerns as well as the larger topics of black nationhood and cultural identity. Many of the plays were not published, however, and exist only in archives and private collections.

Much of children's drama of the renaissance adhered to Du Bois's proclamation in "Criteria of Negro Art" (1926), "I do not care a damn for any art that is not used for propaganda." For example, Mary Church Terrell's "Historical Pageant-Play Based on the Life of Phyllis Wheatley" (1932) aimed to increase children's self-respect through reflection on the accomplishments of African ancestors. Washington, D.C., where Terrell's pageant was staged, was an important site for the development of children's drama, since playwrights drew on Howard University's theater program and Carter G. Woodson's Association for the Study of Negro Life and History.

Black history was central to much children's drama. Playwrights like May Miller, Willis Richardson, Alice Dunbar-Nelson, and Louise Lovett depicted historical figures so as to shape contemporary black identity; as actors and audience members, children were able to walk in the shoes of Harriet Tubman, Frederick Douglass, Sojourner Truth, and others. Some playwrights, though, like Langston Hughes in "The Gold Piece" (Brownies' Book, 1921), were more concerned with the domestic sphere and its influence on black children's ethics. And Willis Richardson—who published a body of children's plays and was an editor of Plays and Pageants from the Life of the Negro (1930) and The King's Dilemma and Other Plays for Children (1956), a collection of his early dramas—used fantasy to explore the ability of the imagination to transform black children's social conditions.

Black Presses

Perhaps the most important black press for children's literature was Carter G. Woodson's Associated Publishers, which issued more than a dozen picture books, poetry collections, and histories aimed at children. These texts were often written by female schoolteachers and became an important means of revitalizing black education. Black teachers throughout the nation sent Woodson lesson plans, manuscripts, and poems on black history, many of which he published in the Negro History Bulletin and as individual volumes through Associated Publishers. Effie Lee Newsome issued her book of poetry, Gladiola Garden (1940), through Woodson's house, which also published many lesser-known writers, like Gertrude Parthenia McBrown, Jane Dabney Shackelford, and Helen Adele Whiting. The painter Lois Mailou Jones (who also did illustrations for Negro History Bulletin) illustrated nine of Associated Publishers' books during the 1930s and 1940s. Black representatives sold Woodson's children's texts successfully throughout the South and Midwest, even during the Great Depression. Today, these texts might seem conservative and conciliatory, but in the context of Jim Crow their approach can be understood as strategic rather than defeatist.

Major Figures

Major writers who turned to children's literature toward the end of the 1920s did so for economic as well as ideological reasons. Langston Hughes, who had published in The Brownies' Book at age nineteen, collaborated with the novelist and poet Arna Bontemps on Popo and Fifina: Children of Haiti (1932), The Pasteboard Bandit (written in 1935, published in 1997), "Bon-Bon Buddy" (unpublished, 1935), and "The Boy of the Border" (unpublished, 1939). Both Hughes and Bontemps found themselves increasingly interested in children as a means to reach a mass audience. Bontemps himself published a dozen children's books from 1932 to 1955, including historical narratives like Chariot in the Sky (1951), illustrated folktales like The Fast Sooner Hound (with Jack Conroy, 1942), and nonfiction like the acclaimed Story of the Negro (1948). Bontemps's Lonesome Boy (1955) is generally considered the capstone of early black children's literature. Hughes published a book of poetry, The Dream Keeper (1932); many texts in the Watts "First Book" series, including First Book of Negroes (1952) and First Book of Jazz (1955); and Famous Negro Athletes (1954) and Famous Negro Music Makers (1955) in Dodd, Mead's "Famous American" series.

Countee Cullen wrote almost exclusively for children after 1930. In The Lost Zoo (1940) and My Lives and How I Lost Them (1942), envisioning an urbane child reader, he manipulated and parodied adult literary conventions such as footnotes, prologues, and epilogues. Ellen Tarry—who is best known for her account of the renaissance in The Third Door: Autobiography of an American Negro Woman (1955)—was perhaps the earliest writer of picture books for black children. Her Janie Belle (1940), Hezekiah Horton (1942), My Dog Rinty (1946), and The Runaway Elephant (1950) set the stage for later writers' interest in interracial dynamics and the urban experience.

Unlike other “New Negro” children’s writers of the period, Bontemps, Hughes, Cullen, and Tarry were published by mainstream houses, and they reached a more integrated audience. Their association with mainstream publishers entailed some compromises (as Hughes and Bontemps report in their extensive correspondence), but all four writers were gratified to see black children’s books take their place in the national literary world.

KATHARINE CAPSHAW SMITH

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History; Bontemps, Arna; Brownies Book; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Howard University; Hughes, Langston; Jones, Lois Mailou; Richardson, Willis; Woodson, Carter G.; other specific writers and editors

Further Reading

- Alvarez, Joseph A. “The Lonesome Boy Theme as Emblem for Arna Bontemps’s Children’s Literature.” African American Review, 32(1), 1998.
- Gray, Christine Rauchfuss. Willis Richardson: Forgotten Pioneer of African-American Drama. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1999.
- Harris, Violet J. “Race Consciousness, Refinement, and Radicalism: Socialization in The Brownies’ Book.” Children’s Literature Association Quarterly, 14(4), Winter 1989.
- Johnson, Dianne. Telling Tales: The Pedagogy and Promise of African American Literature for Youth. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990.
- Nichols, Charles H., ed. Arna Bontemps—Langston Hughes Letters, 1925–1967. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1980.
- Smith, Katharine Capshaw. “Constructing a Shared History: Black Pageantry for Children during the Harlem Renaissance.” Children’s Literature, 27, 1999.

Literature: 3—Drama

The evolution of black drama in America was quite slow. In fact, compared with other literary genres, drama could be regarded as a new field for African American writers; the Harlem Renaissance, so rich in poetry and fiction, was relatively poor in drama. Historically, slavery and its aftermath, as well as prejudice, are obvious explanations; however, the comparative lack of black dramatists—in contrast to black poets and novelists—in the first half of the twentieth century can also be explained by the fact that drama is a totally public genre. A play needs to be staged; staging costs money; investors are therefore needed; and investors expect to make a profit. At the time of the Harlem Renaissance, professional theaters, which were owned and run mostly by whites, were reluctant to produce black drama because there was no guarantee of a satisfactory box office. On the other hand, black playwrights were active in amateur theaters, and many black playwrights, men and women, were seriously involved in establishing genuine black drama.

White Playwrights and Black Drama

One factor motivating black dramatists, even if they were effectively excluded from commercial American theater, was the way blacks were being portrayed onstage. Some theatrical roles did exist for black performers, especially in musicals, but these roles were almost invariably stereotyped. In the early 1820s, white entertainers had begun to imitate African American songs, dances, dialects, and manners; minstrel shows developed in the 1840s. Minstrelsy became extremely popular, and its sentimental, melodramatic, and mocking images dominated the American stage until the 1920s. Consequently, black characters—as presented to white theater audiences by white playwrights—were fixed types such as the buffoon, the tragic mulatto, the primitive, the Christian slave, and the black beast. At around the end of World War I, a few white playwrights set out to create a more realistic picture of blacks and black life and to give black characters more verisimilitude. They were seeking new materials for drama; the folk tradition, which was to be a hallmark of black drama during the Harlem Renaissance and later, appealed to them. Eugene O’Neill, Paul Green, Marc Connelly, Dorothy and DuBose Heyward, and Ridgely Torrence did initiate a new folk drama; but despite their seriousness and their integrity, and although many blacks were in sympathy with their efforts, these white dramatists could not have firsthand knowledge of the black experience. Arguably, then, black dramatists were needed to find genuine material for drama and to mold it truthfully.

O’Neill’s plays about African Americans, most notably The Emperor Jones (1920) and All God’s Chillun Got Wings (1924), are a case in point. The black characters are presented as emancipated but at the same time as “chained” because they are, in one way or another, psychologically subjugated: they exist in a state of fear and resentment. Thus these characters, who seem fated to fail in the white world, confirm white people's stereotypes of blacks. O'Neill's depiction of blacks has been problematic for black critics, who feel that, whatever he intended, he did little to improve the image of African Americans onstage.

A second example is Paul Green, who was the most prolific white dramatist to write about black people and their issues but who seems to have envisaged failure as their ultimate fate. His play In Abraham's Bosom: The Tragedy of a Southern Negro (1926)—which attracted a great deal of attention on Broadway and won a Pulitzer prize—focuses on Abraham McCranie, a black man who dreams of leading his people out of the bondage of poverty and ignorance through education. In Abraham's Bosom powerfully illustrates the workings of racism in the minds of blacks as well as whites, and it is a moving drama; in the end, though, the protagonist cannot realize his dream.

A third example is Marc Connelly's Green Pastures (1930), his only play about blacks and his only play on a religious subject; it too won a Pulitzer prize. This biblical drama, presented in southern American Negro dialect, had an all-Negro cast that included a Negro actor playing the role of God; it was extremely popular and tremendously successful on Broadway—but it too seems to end in failure, as human sympathy is extended to a suffering God.

DuBose Heyward's novella Porgy (1925), set in a Negro quarter in Charleston, South Carolina, at the turn of the twentieth century, is a fourth example. It was widely considered one of the two most successful fictional works of the Harlem Renaissance (the other being Jean Toomer's Cane); Dorothy and DuBose Heyward turned it into a play (1927), also called Porgy, on which the libretto of George Gershwin's opera Porgy and Bess was based. The protagonist, Porgy, is a crippled street vendor who falls in love with Bess, the mistress of a black "bad man," and is eventually defeated. The play proceeds from life, love, and hope toward murder, resignation, and loneliness.

By contrast, Ridgely Torrence's earlier Three Plays for a Negro Theatre, staged between 1914 and 1917, marked a turning point in black drama because they broke away from stereotypes of black characters, presenting Negroes as human beings with dignity and the potential for tragedy. Granny Maumee (1914), hailed as a serious and truthful play about Negroes from the Negro point of view, is the story of a proud, vengeful black matriarch whose sense of her duty as a Christian eventually prevails as she confronts her son's white murderer, who happens also to be the rapist of her daughter and the father of her grandson. The other two of the Three Plays were The Rider of Dreams (1917) and Simon the Cyrenian (1917).

Black Theories and Black Theater

All these white dramatists, then, served as a motivation for black dramatists and thus heralded a new dawn for black drama. In addition, two figures who worked diligently for the development of African American drama were W. E. B. Du Bois and Alain Locke. Although Du Bois and Locke disagreed about several aspects of black drama, they agreed that it needed to be promoted, and they both emphasized the importance of black culture as its proper source.

African American drama by African Americans emerged in Harlem and elsewhere during the early 1920s and was accepted as giving a more authentic view of blacks than works by white playwrights could offer. This black drama could be divided into two distinct categories: race plays and folk plays. Race plays dealt with pertinent racial issues such as prejudice, oppression, and miscegenation and often constituted propaganda directed toward social change. Folk plays were intended mainly to educate and entertain without offending the audience. The basic differences between race and folk drama regarding purpose and subject matter reflected Du Bois and Locke's opposite attitudes.

Du Bois believed strongly that African American drama had to serve a purpose, which was clearly propagandistic. He advanced this theory in The Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), of which he was the editor; and he applied it in his own pageant The Star of Ethiopia (1915). At this time NAACP organized a drama committee to encourage black playwrights to address the black experience; later, in 1925, Du Bois and Charles S. Johnson, the editor of the National Urban League's magazine Opportunity, launched contests for the best one-act plays of the year, which they would publish in The Crisis and Opportunity respectively, thus providing exposure for new playwrights. In 1926, to contribute further to the development of black drama, Du Bois organized the Crigwa Players (an acronym for Crisis Guild of Writers and Artists; the name was later changed to Krigwa). In his article "Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre: The Story of a Little Theatre Movement," which was published in The Crisis, Du Bois laid down four fundamental principles for the new drama: "the plays of a real Negro theatre must be about us . . . by us . . . for us . . . and near us." These criteria imply race drama.

Du Bois's conviction that black drama should be propaganda for the race clashed with Alain Locke's concept of black drama as an art, not a vehicle for messages. Locke's alternative to race drama was folk drama or art drama. Locke and Montgomery T. Gregory promoted folk plays at Howard University, where Gregory organized the department of dramatic arts as a step toward a national Negro theater. This was the first institution to provide professional training in theater for aspiring black playwrights and performers. The Howard dramatic arts department had an advisory board consisting mostly of successful white theater practitioners and academics; it included Ridgely Torrence and Eugene O'Neill, the drama critic Robert Benchley, Professor George Baker of the renowned "Harvard 47" workshop, and the presidents of Harvard University and Smith College. Gregory believed that to survive and be accepted in the United States, black drama would have to reach not only blacks but all of American society—and that this could best be done by art plays rather than race plays. He and Locke both considered the stage to be a means of entertaining an audience and of preserving African American folk culture. In "Steps toward the Negro Theatre," published in The Crisis in 1922, Locke heralded the concept of Negro theater as distinct from race drama.

In a sense, the Harlem Renaissance was a battleground for Du Bois's and Locke's conflicting visions of theater; much of the literature produced by black literati—poets, essayists, and novelists as well as dramatists—reflected this crucial conflict. Eventually, though, the principles of Gregory, Locke, and Howard University's dramatic arts department seemed to win out: African American drama found its voice in the folk tradition; the folk element became a defining feature of most drama, professional and amateur, of the Harlem Renaissance.

This folk element was derived from slavery, the rural culture of the South, and the migration to the industrial North—and from racial oppression and prejudice as crucial factors (if not the most crucial factor) in black history. It should be noted, however, that folk drama did not take the form of "problem plays"; unlike race drama, it did not deal with issues like miscegenation, lynching, and passing. Instead, it dealt with issues such as poverty and with black history, and it explored the lives of black people. Borrowing almost nothing from white culture, folk drama initiated a new black aesthetics, as well as a form of black nationalism. These plays were unlike most of the plays about black life written by white dramatists; the black stereotypes popular with white producers and their white audiences were replaced with more genuine portrayals. As was mentioned earlier, this kind of drama tended to cut off black playwrights from professional theaters, but many of their works were performed in small community theaters, churches, and college auditoriums.

Black Drama on Broadway

The first black hit on Broadway was actually a sensational musical comedy, Shuffle Along (1921), written by four black artists: Flournoy Miller, Aubrey Lyles, Noble Sissle, and Eubie Blake. Shuffle Along differed from earlier revues in its tightly structured plot and how it blended the story with the music in an organic whole.

Willis Richardson was the first black playwright to have a serious drama produced on Broadway. This was The Chip Woman's Fortune (1923), a one-act folk drama that had been prepared for Broadway under the patronage of Eugene O'Neill and was a great success. Richardson, a prolific dramatist, differed from most of his contemporaries in that he avoided themes having to do with tension between blacks and whites, focusing instead on the ordinary problems faced by ordinary black people. He wrote about poverty, gossip, jealousy, extravagance, greed, and family problems. Richardson's main influence on the Harlem Renaissance was this shift away from the usual emphasis on racial strife, along with the absence of white characters in his plays. He avoided depictions of blacks as victimized by whites, and his stage was not dominated by white culture. Richardson was a pioneer in dramatizing black Americans and their lives and in attempting to correct distorted stereotypes of blacks.

Garland Anderson's Appearances (1925) was the second black play and the first full-length black play to reach Broadway. It espoused a philosophy of self-sufficiency traceable to Booker T. Washington, emphasizing the work ethic and individual initiative as the path to success in capitalist America. Frank Wilson's Meek Mose was the next black play on Broadway, in 1928.

The poet, novelist, and editor Wallace Thurman collaborated with William Rapp on a play, Harlem, that was staged on Broadway in 1929 and was one of the first black plays to become a box-office success there. Harlem was a controversial play; it received quite negative reviews from black critics, who objected to its picture of Harlem as a wild, exotic playground, a corrupt place where gambling, prostitution, sexual promiscuity, and murder were everyday experiences. In underlining the primitive and sensational elements in black life, Thurman seemed to be appealing to white tastes and perpetuating stereotypes; his intention, though, was to give a genuine portrait of urban blacks, in particular by using vernacular and idiomatic expressions—which he explained in a glossary that accompanied the playbill.

Of the plays by African American dramatists, Langston Hughes's Mulatto (1935) had the longest run on Broadway. Hughes was seriously interested in black drama but believed that, although an honest American Negro literature had been achieved, Negro theater still remained to be developed. For his own dramatic works, he took various themes from his poetry: the legacy of slavery, the African heritage, black rural and urban folk culture, and racial oppression. Hughes created both race plays and folk plays.

Mulatto is in the tragic mode of black folk drama. Here Hughes changes the familiar stereotype of the tragic mulatto, making this figure militant rather than meek and gentle. The mulatto character, who desires above all else to be recognized as his white father's son, ultimately kills first his father and then himself. Hughes saw tragedy as intertwined with historical, social, and political injustice, and his tragic figures in Mulatto, Emperor of Haiti (1934), and Front Porch (1938) are all involved in broad social issues and conflicts.

Mule Bone, which Hughes wrote with Zora Neale Hurston (in the 1930s, although it was not staged until 1991 because of a disagreement between them), is in the comic folk mode. Little Ham (1936), When the Jack Hollers (1936), and Joy to My Soul (1936) are also in the comic folk mode. Little Ham, a comedy of urban life that blends satire with social issues, is a romantic play with a large cast of more than forty characters; it is about the black world of Harlem and is written for that world alone—Hughes uses a vernacular that few whites would know.

Hughes also tried his hand at poetic drama in the experimental play Don't You Want to Be Free (1939), which chronicled the experience of slavery through music and dance.

In the 1930s, Hughes's ideology shifted to the left; in plays like Blood on the Fields (1934), Angelo Herndon Jones (1936), and The Organizer (1938) he used leftist ideology to interpret social injustice. These were his problem plays, or race plays.

Taken as a whole, Hughes's drama of the 1930s grew out of the black drama of the previous decade, was in various dramatic modes, and offered a panoramic view of black life. It is extremely inclusive: it embraces a keen race-consciousness, racial tension, comic and tragic folk elements, rural and urban motifs, poverty, the experience of slavery, family conflicts, and social and economic inequities. Underlying his tragic and comic folk drama and his race drama is a constant emphasis on social rectification.

Race Drama

Willis Richardson, Garland Anderson, Frank Wilson, Wallace Thurman, and Langston Hughes were prominent black dramatists whose work was staged on Broadway during the Harlem Renaissance. Anderson, Wilson, and Thurman had plays on Broadway before the stock market crash in 1929. After the crash, it became nearly impossible for a black dramatist to find a commercial producer; however, as noted previously, works by black playwrights were produced in churches, lodges, and community halls; were published in periodicals such as The Crisis, Opportunity, Carolina, and Birth Control Review; and were entered in contests sponsored by The Crisis and Opportunity. In addition, some black theater groups, such as the Harlem Suitcase Theater, Negro People's Theater, and Rose McClendon Players, were formed during the Harlem Renaissance. The Federal Theater Project, particularly the Negro Unit at the Lafayette Theater in Harlem, also provided opportunities for black actors and dramatists. It is true that many black dramatists, by staying within the black community, did not achieve the popularity they might have had on Broadway. However, the few black plays that were produced on Broadway at the time were neither race plays that might challenge a white audience nor folk plays that might present the black heritage to whites; the considerable black theater that took place in communities, even if it did not reach a large public at the time, did contribute to the development of African American drama.

A notable early example of black race drama was Angelina Weld Grimké's Rachel (1916), commissioned by NAACP to counter D. W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation (1915). Rachel was presented by the drama committee of the District of Columbia branch of the NAACP at the Myrtilla Miner Normal School, and the playbill stated that it was "the first attempt to use the stage for race propaganda in order to enlighten the American people relative to the lamentable condition of ten million of colored citizens in this free Republic." Rachel addresses the psychological impact of racism on black women; the protagonist is so deeply affected by racism that she decides never to marry and never to have a child. The play became controversial and aroused considerable unease in the black community—particularly among members of the NAACP, its sponsor—because of its overtly political, propagandistic nature. For example, Gregory and Locke (who espoused folk or art drama rather than race drama) dissented from the ideological platform of the NAACP's drama committee.

Still, Rachel was an influential play, one of the first of a succession of serious protest and propaganda dramas, many of which were written by women. Dominant themes in these plays were lynching, poverty, miscegenation, and passing; like Rachel, the plays tended to be grim, ending with the death of the main character or with his or her complete disillusionment. Alice Dunbar Nelson's Mine Eyes Have Seen (1918) considers the question of a black man's loyalty during wartime to a country that has offered him only prejudice and oppression. In Mary Burrill's Aftermath (1919), a young black hero returns from the war to find that his father has been lynched and decides to take the law into his own hands. Another play by Burrill, They That Sit in Darkness (1919), is a tract for birth control: It is about an impoverished woman who dies after bearing too many children. Ottie Graham's Holiday (1923) exemplifies the theme of the tragic mulatto. In this play, a mulatto mother leaves her brown-skinned daughter to be raised by friends and then, years later, precipitates a tragedy when she decides to reveal her identity to the daughter. The daughter, unable to accept the truth, commits suicide; and the mother, unable to live with her guilt, does the same. In Myrtle Livingston Smith's For Unborn Children (1926), a mulatto man—not wanting to have children who would undergo what he has experienced—leaves his white fiancée and finally offers himself to a lynch mob. In Georgia Johnson's A Sunday Morning in the South (1925), an innocent young black man, suspected of flirting with a white woman, is taken from his family on a Sunday morning and hanged. Marieta Bonner, in The Purple Flower (1928), a surrealist play, condemns “white devils.” In May Miller's Stragglers in the Dust (1930), a black charwoman is convinced that the body in the tomb of the unknown soldier in Washington, D.C., is that of her son, who was killed in action during World War I.

Folk plays, which were written by men and women, often focused on the lighter side of the black experience. Religion, class-consciousness, morality, and love were favorite themes of folk drama. The folk dramatist Eulalie Spence, for instance, intentionally avoided racial themes in favor of universal themes. In her article “A Criticism of the Negro Drama” (published in Opportunity in 1928), she stressed entertainment as the most important element of drama, arguing that black people go to the theater to laugh, not to “have old fires and hates rekindled”; she herself was basically a writer of comedies—such as The Hunch (1927), which centers on a love triangle in Harlem. However, Spence's play Her (1927) is a mystery that juxtaposes religion and superstition, and her Undertow (1929)—about a woman who returns from the South after many years to take back the man she loves from his wife—is more of a melodrama.

Many folk plays were set in the South, and these tended to be less lighthearted than other folk drama: they often portray whites as antagonists and end with death. In G. D. Lipscomb's Frances (1925), a young black woman's father forces her into a sexual liaison with a white foreman. In Randolph Edmonds's Breeders (1930), a young black woman's white master tries to force her into a sexual relationship with a black man in order to bear strong slave children, but she commits suicide. In John Mathews's Ti Yette (1930), a black man murders his sister rather than let her marry her white lover. Such folk drama often presented whites as cruel and cunning, who lured and cheated innocent, unsuspecting blacks. In Joseph Mitchell's Help Wanted (1929), a black couple move to Chicago in hope of a better life, only to be cheated out of receiving credit for their money-saving invention. And even folk plays set in the North frequently presented the African American as being like a caged bird: emancipation, in such plays, has led to a new form of slavery—black people are enslaved not only by the oppressiveness and prejudice of white society but also by their own lack of education, lack of confidence, lack of experience, and lack of the material resources needed for survival in a free land.

To address this new, post-Emancipation slavery, some dramatists set out to educate black people. Willis Richardson and May Miller, for instance, compiled an anthology of dramas of the 1920s and early 1930s, Negro History in Thirteen Plays (1935), that was intended for black schools. Carter G. Woodson, who wrote the preface, said that this anthology was a “step of the Negro toward the emancipation of his mind from the slavery of the inferiority complex.” The plays chosen by Richardson and Miller interpreted history through myth, legend, and fiction and offered impressive alternatives to the stereotypes of blacks that were usual in American theater. Helen Webb Harris's Genifrede (1922) and Frederick Douglass (1923), Willis Richardson's Flight of the Natives (1927), and May Miller's Graven Images (1929) were all plays that tried to liberate the black audience from its past in slavery and reconstruct a history that would convey hope, pride, and glory.

Although Zora Neale Hurston is known mainly as a novelist (Their Eyes Were Watching God, 1937) and an anthropologist (Mules and Men, 1935), she also wrote plays such as Color Struck (1925), The First One (1927), and (with Langston Hughes, as mentioned earlier) Mule Bone (1931). In Color Struck, a black girl is damaged by illogical standards of beauty. The First One is a history play that reinterprets the relationship between the biblical Noah and his darker son, Ham; it parodies a version of the biblical story which was circulated during the antebellum period to convince blacks that slavery was part of God's design. Hurston, in her typical playful style, presents a whole family of Hams—artists who do not believe that being black is a curse, whatever Noah might have intended. Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life combines amusing anecdotes from Hurston's folklore collection Mules and Men with Langston Hughes' bluesy humor.

The Legacy of Black Drama

Black drama written during the Harlem Renaissance encompassed a great variety of themes, styles, and approaches. What has survived from that era, however, is quite a small body of works. A few black playwrights—perhaps five—had their work performed on Broadway; some playwrights received productions from amateur groups in schools, lodges, churches, and so on, reaching a limited audience; and plays that won the drama contests sponsored by Opportunity and The Crisis were published, as were plays by the important figures of the renaissance, such as Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston. The rest of the dramatists and their works were, for a long time, doomed to obscurity. Not until the 1990s were many of these plays brought to light in anthologies and collections. The “lost plays” of the Harlem Renaissance that have been found relatively recently testify to the extensive dramatic activity of the renaissance period, despite the adverse circumstances facing black dramatists. Freeing themselves from the influence of stereotypes and turning to a black audiences, however small that audience may have been, these playwrights strove to develop a true African American drama.

ASLI TEKINAY

See also Authors: 4—Playwrights; Blacks in Theater; Carolina Magazine; Community Theater; Crisis, The; Literary Prizes; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Federal Programs;

Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Krigwa Players; Locke, Alain; Opportunity Literary Contests; Theater; Woodson, Carter G.; specific playwrights and works

Further Reading

- Du Bois, W. E. B. “The Drama among Black Folk.” The Crisis, 1916.
- . “Criteria of Negro Art.” The Crisis, 1926a.
- . “Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre.” The Crisis, 1926b.
- Gray, Christine Rauchfuss. Willis Richardson: Forgotten Pioneer of African American Drama. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1999.
- Gregory, Thomas Montgomery. “The Drama of Negro Life.” In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Atheneum, 1970. (Originally published 1925.)
- Gregory, T. Montgomery, and Alain Locke, eds. Plays of Negro Life. New York: Harper and Row, 1927.
- Hatch, James V., and Lee Hamalian, eds. Lost Plays of the Harlem Renaissance: 1920–1940. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1996.
- Hatch, James V., and Ted Shine, eds. Black Theatre U.S.A.: Plays by African Americans—The Early Period (1847–1938). New York: Free Press, 1996.
- Hughes, Langston. “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain.” In The New Negro Renaissance, ed. Arthur P. Davis and Michael W. Peplow. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston. (Originally published 1926.)
- Locke, Alain. “Steps toward the Negro Theatre.” The Crisis, 1922.
- . “The Negro and the American Stage.” Theatre Arts Monthly, 10, 1926.
- Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. New York, 1925.
- Patterson, Lindsay, ed. Black Theatre: A Twentieth-Century Collection of the Work of Its Best Playwrights. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1971.
- Spence, Eulalie. “A Criticism of the Negro Drama.” Opportunity, 28 June 1928.
- Turner, Darwin T., ed. Black Drama in America: An Anthology, 2nd ed. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1994.

Literature: 4—Fiction

Fiction produced during the Harlem Renaissance reflects the social, historic, and political influences present in the immediate aftermath of World War I. Participation by blacks in the war that was to make the world safe for democracy, along with their keen awareness of continued racial oppression in postwar America, resulted in awakened pride, race-consciousness, militancy, and assertiveness—traits that were evident among writers of fiction and in their works. This boldness manifested itself in a rejection of stifling western literary aesthetics and a search for original narrative forms and techniques. By no means is the fiction monolithic, however. Rather, there are diverse political concerns, strategies, and subjects. For instance, writing reflecting the “talented tenth”—such as the works of Jessie Redmon Fauset and Nella Larsen—is vastly different from the bohemian emphasis of the Jamaican-born Claude McKay. George Schuyler’s satiric works, or those of Rudolph Fisher, contrast sharply with the impressionism of Jean Toomer’s masterpiece Cane. Among all writers of fiction, though, there is a narrative concern with the attempt of blacks to explore the complex bicultural self. This discussion will focus on just a few representative novels.

The Color Line

A number of novelists turned their attention to the talented tenth, the elite segment of the race that was to offer leadership to the masses (Du Bois, 1903). Foremost among the issues confronting this group was color. Because quite a few of the talented tenth were light enough to pass for white and thus cross the color line, questions regarding the nature, scope, and consequences of passing assumed paramount importance. Nella Larsen’s Quicksand (1928) is a compelling rendering of a young woman’s efforts to find a place within a society polarized along lines of race, gender, and class. The heroine, twenty-three-year-old Helga Crane, is the daughter of a West Indian father and a Danish mother. Refined, well educated, and strikingly beautiful, Helga exemplifies the ideals of the talented tenth. But she is unable to find genuine satisfaction in either bourgeois white society or the black world. The narrative unfolds against a backdrop involving Helga’s search for herself—one that takes her from the rural South, where at the opening she is a schoolteacher, to Chicago, New York, Denmark, back to New York, and finally to a small town in Alabama. When she returns to the South she becomes the wife of a dull, overbearing country preacher. Helga abandons her aspirations for the finer things in life: exquisite clothes, fine food, and elaborate furnishings. Instead, she is mired in domesticity, subject to her husband’s authoritarian rule. As the novel closes, Helga, worn down by a life of endless childbearing, is pregnant with her fifth child.

Much of the significance of Quicksand has to do with Larsen’s rather sympathetic portrayal of a heroine facing a crisis. Helga is not simply a stereotypical tragic mulatto poised between the black and white worlds and unable to find genuine acceptance in either society; she is a psychologically complex woman. Larsen is careful to offer a representation of Helga’s inner life. The young woman is far too refined for the small-town southern community where she teaches, and she is clearly out of place among the people who are disdainful of her because of her manner, bearing, and taste. A painful rejection by her white uncle in Chicago prompts her meeting with Mrs. Hayes-Rore, an independently wealthy widow who rescues the destitute Helga, takes her to New York, and finds her a place to stay and a job. But Hayes-Rore’s pompous manner and pretentious speeches about race are unappealing to Helga. Anne Grey, a socialite widow in Harlem, is well connected but overly consumed by the issue of race. She too befriends Helga, who, however, is either unable or unwilling to establish a lasting bond with Grey.

Helga’s crisis is not only a matter of race; she also struggles with her nascent sexuality, which she both revels in and denies. The confusion surrounding her sexuality prompts her to end her engagement to James Vayle, a well-connected teacher. She also refuses a proposal from Axel Olsen, a Swedish painter who, like the other Europeans, sees Helga not as an individual but as something exotic. The character who has by far the strongest impact on Helga’s sexual self is James Anderson, principal of the school where she teaches. In New York, Anderson kisses Helga passionately, and she believes that he loves her. When she learns of his engagement to Anne Grey, Helga is devastated. In a rush of emotions, Helga finds herself in a storefront church in Harlem, where she surrenders to God and to the minister’s seductive powers.

Larsen uses quicksand skillfully as a metaphor, interweaving this motif throughout the narrative. The image suggests the various influences—both internal and external—conspiring to bring about the heroine’s tragic fall. The harder Helga tries to extricate herself from the quagmire of race, class, and gender, the more those forces entrap her. Perhaps this is Larsen’s own pronouncement on the limited options of a mixed-race woman. Even so, one cannot ignore the role that Helga’s poor judgment plays in determining her fate: her painful dilemma is intensified by what she herself does or refuses to do. In any case, the novel is a forceful treatment of passing and its consequences; and although the portrait of Harlem is superficial, Larsen presents a memorable account of the challenges often faced by the black middle class.

Jessie Fauset's Plum Bun (1929) is perhaps less convincing than Quicksand but is still compelling in its treatment of the bourgeoisie. Plum Bun deals with passing largely through the experiences of Angela Murray, an attractive, ambitious art student; and her younger sister Virginia, a music teacher. Angela, like her mother, is fair skinned and can pass for white; but Virginia is dark skinned like her father. The sisters have been reared in an all-black working-class neighborhood in Philadelphia; they are left alone after both parents die within a relatively short time. Angela then studies art in New York and is established in Greenwich Village; there, as in Philadelphia, she decides that refraining from announcing her race will allow her freedom and mobility. She is attracted to a rich young white man, Roger Fielding, who is interested only in seducing her. When Virginia arrives, Angela is torn between her desire to pass in the white world and her sisterly bond. Rather than risk exposure, Angela chooses to estrange herself from Virginia.

Although Fauset appears to avoid dealing directly with racial issues in her treatment of the black middle class, the resolution of the novel emphasizes the importance of race. What sets the stage for this affirmation is the relationship between Angela and Rachel Powell, a young black woman pursuing a career in art. The climax of the novel occurs when Rachel is denied passage to Europe on an art scholarship because she is black. Angela is outraged and realizes that her own scholarship was a matter of color, not talent or merit. But it is mainly Virginia's example that makes Angela realize she is mistaken in denying her racial identity. Virginia enters the world of black artists and intellectuals in Harlem and is comfortable. Through her sister's example, then, Angela comes to see how superficial her own life has been.

Angela's conflict with Virginia symbolizes a war between the black and the white self; Plum Bun, like other novels of the Harlem Renaissance, touches not only on the racial prejudice of white America but also on "colorism" among blacks, an attitude that leads some of them to deny their cultural heritage. In exploring this theme, Fauset includes a number of highly improbable situations. That the two sisters should become romantically involved with the same man, who also passes for white, is unlikely. Anthony, who thinks Angela is white, is unaware of her relationship to Virginia. Once Angela announces her heritage publicly, she and Anthony are reunited. Virginia then returns to her first love, Martin, and to Philadelphia. In the end, individual characters learn that happiness cannot be achieved through a rejection of one's true identity.

Wallace Thurman's The Blacker the Berry: A Novel of Negro Life (1929) focuses on Emma Lou Morgan's struggle to be accepted by light-skinned blacks. Because she is dark, Emma Lou is mistreated by her fair-skinned family. Emma Lou's mother was light-skinned and expected her daughter to be even lighter. The mother's most serious flaw is her belief that "white is right," an ideal which she upholds at every turn; she makes her daughter's life miserable by repeatedly and unfavorably comparing Emma Lou's color with that of others. Unfortunately, Emma Lou comes to accept her mother's pronouncements, internalizing western standards of beauty.

In an effort to escape the rejection she experiences at home, Emma Lou goes to a university in California. There, through a series of humiliating experiences, she learns that her fair-skinned classmates ostracize her as readily as her family does. She uses various skin whiteners and bleaching creams, but to no avail; in fact, some of these products accentuate her blackness. To make matters worse, she prefers light-skinned boyfriends who take advantage of her emotionally and sexually. But finally, as a result of a painful encounter with one of her lovers, she comes to accept herself as she is.

Thurman deals head-on with the color-consciousness that was prevalent during the Harlem Renaissance. Emma Lou represents the black Americans who failed to embrace Marcus Garvey's slogan "Black is beautiful." The Blacker the Berry lacks subtlety in its portrayal of Emma Lou and her pervasive self-hatred, however, and the issue of color prejudice is much more complex than Thurman indicates. Because he fails to address the intricacies of intraracial prejudice, he oversimplifies a very complicated psychosocial issue. Nevertheless, in her divided allegiance and her preoccupation with white standards and ideals, Emma Lou personifies the "double consciousness" that W. E. B. Du Bois considered central to black life in a nation polarized by race.

Literary Primitivism

Whereas some novelists chose to depict the tragedies and triumphs of the middle class, others, like Claude McKay, focused on the experiences of the working class. McKay's Home to Harlem (1928) is an exposé of the seamier side of Harlem—the jook joints, speakeasies, and cabarets frequented by the displaced urban masses. Here, outside the social mainstream, people have a certain joie de vivre that is reflected in their carefree lifestyle and attitudes. Jake Brown, the protagonist, takes unofficial leave from the army during World War I after being assigned noncombatant duties in Europe. He returns to New York as a stoker and finds that Harlem is a safe haven. After an affair with a prostitute, Felice, who declines to keep his money, he continues to search for her. His search takes him through the underworld of Harlem, where he comes into contact with a wide range of characters. Congo Rose, for example, is an entertainer who takes Jake as a lover when he is broke. Agatha, an assistant in a beauty parlor, is a paragon: sincere, warm, and congenial. Zeddy Plummer is a gambler who reports Jake to the authorities as a deserter. Susy is a prostitute who supports Zeddy. Billy Biasse is Jake's friend who operates a longshoremen's gambling apartment.

McKay, unlike Larsen or Fauset, focuses on the proletariat, the working class, rather than on the talented tenth with their painfully proper ways. As a result, he was strongly criticized by Du Bois, who felt that literature should be political and should serve the purpose of racial uplift. Du Bois, along with a number of others, reasoned that when blacks write about themselves they should put their best foot forward, and that McKay had therefore let down the race. However, McKay does introduce a character, Jake's comrade Ray, who is bookish and serves as a foil to Jake. Through Ray, McKay establishes tension between the intellectual and the primitive. Ray is a Haitian who has attended Howard University, and he no doubt represents McKay, a Jamaican who had studied at Tuskegee Institute. Ray is a voice for McKay's social and philosophical views, believing that blacks should regain their self-confidence by understanding the past glories of black civilization. But Ray is also pessimistic, decrying his education at Howard, unable to accept marriage to Agatha, and unable to accept the challenges of life in Harlem; eventually he leaves America for Europe.

Jake, who lacks formal education, is McKay's ideal black American. Free from materialism, spirited, and streetwise, he is the classic picaresque hero. He represents the unlettered masses. Jake's one goal is to find Felice again so that they can enjoy life together. One of his most significant traits is resilience. He is able to endure the vicissitudes and misfortunes of life and yet remain positive. Thus the message McKay conveys is that the primitive black can cope with the uncertainties of life whereas the intellectual cannot.

Home to Harlem offers a vivid and realistic portrait of Harlem's underworld and its denizens. Scenes in nightclubs and cabarets give the reader insights into life among the struggling masses. The novel is, as well, a vehicle for McKay's political views, especially his views on class and race. He explores social issues of everyday urban life, such as overcrowding, unemployment, and discrimination.

The Satiric Novel

Through the lens of satire, novelists are able to maintain artistic distance between themselves and their sometimes very serious subject matter, holding all of society—black and white—up for scrutiny. George Schuyler's Black No More (1931) offers an examination of color prejudice. The novel opens when a black doctor named Crookman discovers an electric process that can make black people white. This discovery makes the doctor rich but causes an upheaval in America: black leaders lose their followers; white supremacist organizations are at a loss because race can no longer be easily discerned; alarming numbers of white women give birth to black babies. At the end of the novel, "Nordicized" blacks are found to be actually whiter than born Nordics. A black beautician then invents a skin stain to turn white skin light brown, and everyone starts trying to darken up.

Schuyler aims his attack at race leaders who exploit the color line for personal gain, and he is as unrelenting toward the talented tenth as toward the unlettered masses. In the world of Black No More, brown, not black, is beautiful. The novel suggests that the root of the color problem is capitalism and the free enterprise system, because those who are most vehemently opposed to Crookman's process are businessmen. Schuyler rejects both capitalism and racism and offers socialism as the solution for national ills. Yet the novel ends on an ambivalent note, suggesting uncertainty about the materialist American dream and those who pursue it.

Rudolph Fisher, in The Walls of Jericho (1928), satirizes the social extremes of Harlem: not only the pretensions of the "dickties"—the middle-class elite—but also the earthiness of the low-down folk. He also pokes fun at the whites who patronize haunts in Harlem. Merrit, a fair-skinned black lawyer who can pass for white, buys a home in one of the last white neighborhoods in Harlem. Shine, one of the black movers who bring in Merrit's furniture, falls in love with Linda, Merrit's maid. Whites, presumably, set fire to Merrit's house, and the author shows how class tension between Jinx and Bubber, the other movers, and Merrit is relaxed in the face of a racial struggle. As it turns out, though, Merrit's house was burned not by whites but by one of his black enemies.

A major contribution that this novel made to the fiction of the Harlem Renaissance is its use of the vernacular, especially street talk between Jinx and Bubber. The humor of this pair of characters is expressed largely in the slang of the times. The novel abounds with signifying, playing the dozens (talking about someone's ancestors, especially the mother), and terms for describing an opponent's worthlessness. Fisher's chief purpose, however, was to examine the complexities, and particularly the foibles, of Harlemites. He attempted to debunk what he saw as myths about Harlem; at the same time as he depicted middle-class attitudes of the day, he was also able to look at all of black life objectively. By making the villain in The Walls of Jericho black rather than white, he suggested that the white man is not always the black man's problem.

Folklore and Fiction

During the Harlem Renaissance, a number of novelists found material in black expressive culture: symbolic acts of religion, speech, and music. A coalescence of oral and written forms resulted in texts with a rich, complex substructure harking back to the vernacular tradition. Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937) follows the life of Janie Crawford as she comes of age and finds her identity both as an African American and as a woman. The action is set in rural Florida—mostly in Eatonville, Hurston's own birthplace. Janie is the product of an illicit relationship between her mother, Leafy, and a schoolteacher. After seeing sixteen-year-old Janie kissing a young man, Nanny, Janie's grandmother (a former slave), arranges a marriage to Logan Killicks, an older, propertied farmer. The marriage is unhappy; Logan intends to break Janie's spirit by making her submissive and forcing her to work alongside him in the fields. Janie leaves him in order to marry Joe Starks, a citified, smooth-talking, ambitious older man who offers her the "front porch" existence Nanny values. But Joe turns out to be no different from Logan. He wants Janie to remain subservient in a socially prescribed place and refuses to let her associate with the folk.

Joe's early death (he dies of kidney failure) allows Janie to begin the process of self-discovery. She enters a third marriage with Virgible Tea Cake Woods, an itinerant blues man and gambler who is her ideal. Although he is fourteen years her junior and unemployed, he allows her space to be herself. With Tea Cake, Janie travels to South Florida, where she works on the muck, the rich soil in which vegetables flourish. Here, among migrant workers, she steps down from the pedestal on which southern women were expected to remain and comes into her own. No longer does Janie try to live as her well-meaning grandmother would like; instead, she lives according to her own plans. Her happiness is brief, however; Tea Cake is bitten by a rabid dog during a flood, and Janie is forced to shoot him. After being acquitted of murder, she returns to Eatonville, where she tells her life story to her best friend, Phoebe.

Their Eyes Were Watching God reveals Hurston's skill not only as a writer of fiction but also as a folklorist: she captures brilliantly the customs and language of everyday people. Janie's account of her life, spoken in black dialect, is a literary device that allows the heroine to tell her own story. The text is notable for its authenticity and its fidelity to black folk speech. Some passages read much like poetry, as Hurston blurs the boundary between oral and written forms. Storytelling is an aspect of the folk tradition, allowing the transmission of values from one generation to the next; Janie's growth is suggested by her connection, or reconnection, with the vernacular tradition. With Tea Cake, particularly, Janie reaffirms the historic black past, and her voice signifies her empowerment within a white, patriarchal society.

Hurston's work is a classic within the African American novelistic tradition. Hurston tells the story of Janie in richly poetic language, and that story becomes a saga of the historic black quest for the self. Although Richard Wright (1937) criticized Their Eyes Were Watching God for Hurston's avoidance of overt social protest and argued that she had perpetuated racial stereotypes, more recent critics have given a more balanced assessment of its contribution to black letters. Moreover, a number of women novelists today—such as Alice Walker—consider Hurston their literary "foremother."

Langston Hughes's Not Without Laughter (1930)—his first novel—is about the coming of age of Sandy, a young, impressionable boy growing up in Stanton, a small midwestern town; the novel describes how Sandy must choose his path in life. His family is presided over by Aunt Hagar, who is a former slave and a community mainstay. She and his mother, Anjee, are domestics, as are all the women in the family. His aunt Harriet, who is restless and rebellious, tires of small-town life and turns to prostitution. Jim Boy, Sandy's absent father, is an itinerant railroad worker who plays blues and is constantly at odds with the churchgoing Hagar. When Hagar dies, Sandy goes to live with his prim, proper Aunt Tempy. Tempy tries to impose her conservative lifestyle on him, but he comes to reject her way of life and eventually joins his mother and Harriet in Chicago, where he works as an elevator boy.

Not without Laughter takes up various ideologies of America in the period after World War I. Hughes creates a broad range of unique characters whose response to racial oppression typifies that of other blacks struggling to make sense of their changing world. In the tradition of Booker T. Washington, the pious Aunt Hagar is conciliatory toward southern whites, believing that accommodation is the only way to achieve racial harmony, and she wants her grandson to follow in Washington's footsteps. Tempy, an elitist who joins the Episcopal church, espouses values similar to those of W. E. B. Du Bois. Free-spirited and worldly, Harriet and Jim Boy embrace the lifestyle of the working-class poor. The reader assumes that Sandy will reject Hagar's strict religiosity, Tempy's elitism, and even the blues lifestyle of his father and aunt to chart his own course in life.

The setting of this novel—Stanton's Bottom, an all-black neighborhood where individuals are free to abandon social restraints—is far removed from urbanized Harlem. Its contribution to the fiction of the Harlem Renaissance has to do with Hughes's deft rendering of secular and sacred folk forms that have allowed blacks to endure oppression. Spirituals deriving from the church are a central part of the life he depicts, especially for older people like Aunt Hagar; and blues expresses the sorrows and successes of the younger generation. Spirituals and blues, and also the storytelling of the men at the barbershop and pool hall, indicate the ability to the folk to survive and also indicate their sensibility, "laughing to keep from crying." The novel's central message is that no matter how difficult life might be, it is not without laughter.

Jean Toomer's Cane (1923), frequently regarded as the greatest literary achievement of the Harlem Renaissance, is an experimental work that also relies heavily on aspects of black folklore. Cane defies classification: it is a rather loose combination of poetry, prose sketches, and an unfinished drama that resulted from a visit by Toomer (who was born in the North) to Sparta, Georgia. The author tries to capture the essence of the South and its inhabitants, paying tribute to their culture and customs during a time when large numbers of African Americans were migrating to the urban North. It has a three-part structure corresponding to black people's epic search for their beginnings. Part One is set in the rural South and offers a portrait of the region and the people living there—especially the women, who remain psychologically intact despite externally imposed limitations. Part Two, focusing on the North, deals with life in a fast-paced, materialistic urban environment. Part Three returns to the South, developing the experiences of Kabnis (no doubt representing Toomer), who attempts but fails to establish meaningful cultural, social, and psychological ties with the region. Unity is achieved through recurring patterns, symbols, and images such as pine, cane, dusk, African vestiges, and ascent.

Cane is a hauntingly lyrical work of fiction but is also highly autobiographical. Its theme centers on the importance of the land in the lives of African Americans. Those who remain close to the rural past, in all its beauty and terror, remain psychologically whole; those who seek to deny or suppress the past are fragmented. Not surprisingly, then, the characters in Part Two seem superficial, lacking the depth and complexity of their southern counterparts. Thus the text is critical of the migration to the North and the subsequent pursuit of materialist values—values that are clearly at odds with the spirituality of the rural past. By moving up the socioeconomic ladder, individuals have distanced themselves geographically and psychologically from their own vibrant history.

More than any other figure, the biracial Kabnis epitomizes the racial ambivalence of blacks. Kabnis, a schoolteacher, is erudite, refined, and cultured but obviously neurotic and paranoid. He spends much of his time carousing with prostitutes and fretting over racial issues rather than pursuing his teaching career. The emphasis in Part Three is on possible responses to oppression, as well as on the religion that was vital to community life. However, Toomer focuses not so much on the physical violence that blacks often faced as on the psychological assaults to which black men such as Kabnis were subjected. In the end, Kabnis is in a cellar, symbolically outside the social mainstream, unable to take charge of his life. Although the work closes with a promise of new beginnings, represented by a sunrise, neither Kabnis's personal problems nor the searing racial problems have been resolved.

Cane does not present a conventional world of exotics or primitives. Rather, it is a montage of seemingly disparate pieces that in fact make up a tightly structured, unified whole. In this work Toomer explores his thesis—that America has given birth to a new race, which has subsumed all the old identities—and chronicles the black experience in the early twentieth century. Cane signaled a new era for black artistic expression.

Conclusion

The fiction of the Harlem Renaissance, in sum, is a varied genre representing a major aspect of the movement. The many themes the authors explored reflect numerous concerns of African Americans during the renaissance period. The authors of this fiction speak in uniquely individual voices as they tell and retell the story of a journey from bondage to freedom in an American promised land; they take up key issues that later authors would also treat.

MAXINE LAVON MONTGOMERY

See also Authors: 2—Fiction; Passing; Primitivism; Talented Tenth; specific writers and works

Further Reading

- Bell, Bernard. The Afro-American Novel and Its Tradition. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1989.
- Bone, Robert. The Negro Novel in America, rev. ed. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1965.
- Brown, Sterling. The Negro in American Fiction. New York: Atheneum, 1969. (Originally published 1937.)
- Davis, Arthur P. From the Dark Tower: Afro-American Writers 1900 to 1960. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1981.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches. Greenwich, Conn.: Crest, 1965. (Originally published 1903.)
- Gayle, Addison, Jr. The Way of the New World: The Black Novel in America. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1975.
- Hughes, Langston. "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." The Nation, 23 June 1926, pp. 692–694.
- Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. New York: Atheneum, 1968. (Originally published 1925.)

Turner, Darwin T. In a Minor Chord: Three Afro-American Writers and Their Search for Identity. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1971.

Wright, Richard. "Between Laughter and Tears." New Masses, 5 October 1937.

Literature: 5—Humor and Satire

Before the Harlem Renaissance, the most popular public presentations of African American humor were generally limited to depictions by whites, in such forms as Joel Chandler Harris's "Uncle Remus" stories or minstrels performing material such as Ernest Hogan's infamous song "All Coons Look Alike to Me." The comedy that emerged during and after the Harlem Renaissance reflected the diverse political, religious, and economic interests of its creators, as well as their various views of race itself. Of course, this diversity is not news to anyone who has had access to the private folklore of African Americans: in feigned reverence and mockery of their white "superiors" and other inside jokes, and in their basic everyday interactions with each other, one could easily see that there was more to African Americans than their previous representations had suggested. And because much of African Americans' previous experience had been marked by various forms of oppression, it should not be surprising that the humor and satire of the Harlem Renaissance added depth, rage, and even tragedy to the earlier formula of black buffoonery.

Works such as J. A. Rogers's From "Superman" to Man (1917), Walter White's Flight (1926), Rudolph Fisher's Walls of Jericho (1928), Claude McKay's Banjo (1929), and Countee Cullen's One Way to Heaven (1932) satirized white society; works such as Wallace Thurman's The Blacker the Berry (1929) and Infants of the Spring (1932, a book in which Thurman memorably used the term "niggerati") targeted blacks; and novels such as George Schuyler's Black No More (1931) targeted not only blacks and whites, but also race itself. Of course, with this variety of comic approaches came varying views on how race should be depicted comedically. Two examples are George S. Schuyler and Zora Neale Hurston.

Perhaps the most prominent satirist of the Harlem Renaissance was George S. Schuyler, a conservative socialist and iconoclast whose wit was directed at both blacks and whites. Writing a column for the Pittsburgh Courier, as well as articles for widely respected periodicals such as the Messenger and American Mercury, Schuyler frequently satirized race as a cultural concept, considering such a concept illegitimate; this focus may account for the lack of black folk humor in his work. Encouraged by H. L. Mencken, Schuyler often mocked whites' self-deception, as well as "black art," black nationalism, and apologists for the race, in such pieces as "Our White Folks," "Blessed Are the Sons of Ham," "Our Greatest Gift to America," and "Negro Art Hokum"; this last piece was an article in which he claimed that there can be no such thing as black art because there are no cultural differences between blacks and whites. In 1931, Schuyler published two novels, Slaves Today and the aforementioned Black No More. The latter is a science fiction novel about the aftermath of blacks' crossing the color line after surgically becoming white; in it Schuyler lampoons W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, Walter White, Marcus Garvey, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), and the Ku Klux Klan.

In contrast to Schuyler, whose view seems to preclude folk humor, Zora Neale Hurston put black folk humor at the center of her work—much of which is set in Eatonville, Florida, the all-black town where she spent much of her youth. Some scholars are reluctant to refer to Hurston as a writer of the Harlem Renaissance, because she did not publish her first novel until 1934; however, she had published a handful of stories during the latter half of the 1920s, and these place her among an elite group of renaissance writers. Before publishing her four novels between 1934 and 1948 (the most famous of these is Their Eyes Were Watching God, 1937), Hurston studied anthropology with the paternalistic Franz Boas, and she later produced two studies of folk life—Tell My Horse (1938), a study of Haiti and Jamaica, and Mules and Men (1935), a study of Negro "lies" (folk humor)—in addition to a number of articles, short stories, and plays. Many of the same characters and episodes reappear in more than one of Hurston's various works, acquiring different meanings in different contexts. Hurston made a noteworthy contribution by bringing black private humor into the public domain via anthropology and literature. Some critics have found the recurrent material simplistic or uninteresting, however; and some (such as Richard Wright) saw her humor as pandering to white audiences by putting blacks on display, an argument that has been made against anthropology in general. In addition to writing novels and stories, Hurston also aspired to fame in the performing arts, and in 1927 she collaborated with Langston Hughes on Mule Bone, an adaptation of her short story "The Bone of Contention" for which she was to provide the dramatic structure. A feud cut short their collaboration and their friendship, however, and the play was not performed until 1991, at Lincoln Center.

In addition to comic literature, black performance comedy of the time had tremendous and lasting mass appeal. Plays such as Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles's Shuffle Along (1921) and Runnin' Wild (1923) introduced popular dances like the time steps, the buck-and-wing, the soft-shoe, rapid-fire tap dancing, and the Charleston to white audiences. Other examples of popular black comedy and musical performances include Chocolate Dandies (1924), which featured Josephine Baker; Dixie to Broadway (1924); Africana (1927); Weather Clear—Track Fast (1927); and Fats Waller's Hot Chocolates (1929).

Also at this time, some black performers started achieving success and popularity in the film industry, although usually in regressive roles. For example, in Hearts in Dixie (1929), Stepin Fetchit (Lincoln Perry) played a clownish, baffled character; he went on to appear in twenty-six films from 1929 to 1935 and created a type that would pave the way for such stars as Bill "Bojangles" Robinson. Simply dismissing such performances as stereotypes would be an oversimplification, ignoring the fact that these performers gained a degree of fame and wealth which had eluded many other African Americans, and created a new type of African American lifestyle.

MICHAEL MIKLOS

See also American Mercury; Boas, Franz; Cullen, Countee; Fisher, Rudolph; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Infants of the Spring; McKay, Claude; Mencken, H. L.; Messenger, The; Niggerati; Pittsburgh Courier; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Schuyler, George S.; Thurman, Wallace; Walls of Jericho, The; White, Walter; specific individuals and works in theater and film

Further Reading

Fauset, Jessie. "The Gift of Laughter." In The New Negro: Voices of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Atheneum, 1992. (Originally published 1925.)

Favor, J. Martin. "Color, Culture, and the Nature of Race: George S. Schuyler's Black No More." In Authentic

- Blackness: The Folk in the New Negro Renaissance.* Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Foxx, Redd, and Norma Miller. The Redd Foxx Encyclopedia of Black Humor. Pasadena, Calif.: Ward Ritchie, 1977.
- Hutchinson, George. "Superior Intellectual Vaudeville': American Mercury." In The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Jackson, Blyden. "The Harlem Renaissance." In The Comic Imagination in American Literature, ed. Louis D. Rubin Jr. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1973.
- Kuenz, Jane. "Black No More: George Schuyler and the Politics of 'Racial Culture.'" In Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined, ed. Victor A. Kramer and Robert A. Russ. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1997.
- Lowe, John. "Hurston, Humor, and the Harlem Renaissance." In Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined, ed. Victor A. Kramer and Robert A. Russ. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1997.
- Marks, Carole, and Diana Edkins. The Power of Pride: Stylemakers and Rulebreakers of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Crown, 1999.
- Scruggs, Charles. "The Age of Satire: The Teacher and His Pupils." In The Sage in Harlem: H. L. Mencken and the Black Writers of the 1920s. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984.
- Watkins, Mel. On the Real Side: A History of African American Comedy from Slavery to Chris Rock. Chicago, Ill.: Lawrence Hill, 1999.

Literature: 6—Nonfiction

The nonfiction of the Harlem Renaissance—essays, editorials, literary criticism, histories, and so on—performed several important tasks. First, it defined the mind-set of young black intellectuals and creative artists and differentiated them from the older, genteel African American men and women of letters. Second, it heightened black people's racial consciousness and class consciousness—frequently, in particular, seeking an identification with the working classes. Third, it sought to discover and convey what was authentic and deserving of preservation in African life and thought. Fourth, it sought to demolish stereotypes of blacks and replace them with an authentic picture of black people's strengths and weaknesses. The following discussion will briefly consider just a few of the many aspects of nonfiction.

A primary goal of African American and European-American writers—both men and women—who published nonfiction during the Harlem Renaissance was to reawaken black peoples' dormant racial consciousness and racial pride. As a consequence, they made a deliberate attempt, as Alain Locke put it, to rehabilitate "the race in world esteem."

Ironically, the quest for a strong self-image for black people had begun during what has been generally considered a period of racial accommodation, as exemplified by Booker T. Washington. Nevertheless, this period saw a proliferation of racially conscious, historical achievements in literature, by writers such as W. E. B. Du Bois, Kelly Miller, John E. Bruce, and W. H. Councill; and it also saw the emergence of institutions—founded by Arthur A. Schomburg and Carter G. Woodson—that disseminated historical writings intended to foster an enhanced racial image for African Americans. During this same period, Du Bois and later Charles S. Johnson wrote sociological treatises that examined the impact of a racist society on the lives of most African Americans. Furthermore, Locke's philosophical lectures on the nature of both interracial and intraracial relations provided an intellectual basis for the "New Negro" movement. The nonfiction literature of the time of Booker T. Washington provided historical, sociological, and philosophical foundations for the young creative artists who would attempt to re-create an essential racial culture in the 1920s and early 1930s.

Before the self-image of black people could be enhanced, the culture makers felt they needed to destroy a subservient attitude that was supposedly a salient characteristic of the older generation of "plantation Negroes." Accordingly, between 1917 and 1923, leftist, centrist, and conservative periodicals all bombarded the reading public with a new image. This concept of a "New Negro" contrasted starkly with an earlier image which had originated in antebellum abolitionist literature and that S. P. Fullin, a writer in the late 1960s, described as "Christlike."

The socialist image of this New Negro was offered by W. A. Domingo in A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owens's periodical, the Messenger. Domingo's New Negro met "violence with violence," resisted the exploitation of his labor, and, unlike accommodationists such as Booker T. Washington and W. H. Councill, demanded "social equality." Finally, Domingo's New Negro sought to identify his interests with those of the white working class.

W. E. B. Du Bois's position at this time was represented in the organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), Crisis. Du Bois was impressed by the Bolshevik Revolution in the emergent Soviet Union (which he visited in 1926), and he stressed the importance of the laboring classes. He concurred, then, with Domingo's assertion that the working classes were the key constituency in fostering radical political and economic change in the United States after World War I.

A position that was more conservative than either Domingo's or Du Bois's was offered in Opportunity, the monthly magazine of the National Urban League. Charles S. Johnson, a distinguished sociologist who had been trained at the University of Chicago and who served as a patron for young, aspiring African American graphic artists and writers of fiction and nonfiction, became the editor of Opportunity in 1923. The magazine's stated intention was to examine and analyze "Negro life as it is with no exaggerations." In consequence, this publication tried to appeal to the educated layperson, especially with its economic and sociological studies.

Some European Americans—perhaps especially leftists—also contributed to the image of the New Negro and the concept of a "Negro arts movement." For example, Max Eastman, owner of the magazine Liberator, appointed the West Indian darling of the European-American left, Claude McKay, as an associate editor and then a coeditor, in order to give better and deeper coverage of working classes' articulation of their struggle for liberation.

Much of the nonfiction that came out of Harlem and other black communities in the United States proffered a color-blind universalistic worldview and argued that the militant New Negro could play an essential role in the radical transformation of American life and society. Nevertheless, the "Negrotarians"—a term coined by the writer, folklorist, and anthropologist Zora Neal Hurston to describe the moderate and conservative elements of the civil rights establishment, which attempted to harness the content and direction of the "New Negro" movement—gained prominence between 1923 and 1927. When Locke brought out his anthology The New Negro in 1925, to an enthusiastic reception, the generational clash between African Americans was well under way. Young creative artists, Locke pointed out in his foreword, were revolting against a genteel tradition that focused on the victimization of African Americans. Black and white writers who believed that moral suasion was useless preached a brand of cultural and economic nationalism which emphasized self-reliance, self-respect, and racial pride; they expected their nationalism to replace appeals to the conscience of European Americans regarding racial oppression and exploitation.

Locke's anthology included one article—"Durham: Capital of the Black Middle Class," by E. Franklin Frazier—that extolled the virtues of capitalism and thus deviated from the party line of the American leftist radicals and socialists who had emerged after World War I. Frazier stated that a strong black economic base was essential for the revitalization of African American culture. In essence, he thought that his fellow writers were overly dependent on white capitalists and therefore could not serve the cultural and nationalist functions that the literary critics and creative artists had intended. Frazier's emphasis on self-determination reflected an attempt by African Americans of the past to transform the economic as well as the social structure so as to create an order in which blacks would become socially independent.

These varying viewpoints also led to different approaches to culture. For instance, Charles S. Johnson used Opportunity to examine and analyze critically the cultural production of the Harlem Renaissance. He was devoted to building the self-esteem and racial pride of black migrants who were traumatized by their transitional status in both northern and southern urban-industrial areas. Johnson argued time and again in the pages of Opportunity that the solution to the problems causing anomie among blacks was a revitalization of the rural folk culture which had traditionally unified and sustained blacks in their quest for full integration into mainstream American society. In his nonfiction writing, Johnson argued that art was utilitarian, that it was a means toward an end—integration.

Du Bois also argued that it was a necessity for the works of African American creative artists to have a utilitarian function. Accordingly, when he reviewed Locke's anthology The New Negro—in a controversial article published in Crisis in January 1926—he was critical of Locke's philosophy of art for art's sake. Du Bois believed that such a concept of art would result in works that were dangerously introspective, formalistic, and too far removed from reality to have any "tangible" use. He therefore attempted to formulate criteria of utility that could guide the writing of the "Negro Renaissance." These criteria evidently influenced his reaction to Claude McKay's slice-of-life novel Home to Harlem (1928); he found it so repugnant that he commented, "After the dirtier parts of its filth . . . I feel distinctly like taking a bath." Du Bois opened the pages of Crisis to social scientists who, he believed (sometimes mistakenly), could provide a significant part of his arsenal as he made his case for art as propaganda. Du Bois admired the work of Melville Herskovits, a Jewish immigrant who was Franz Boas's student and who at this juncture was emphasizing the assimilability of African Americans into the United States. (Later, Herskovits would provide empirical evidence for Du Bois's hypothesis about African retentions in the Americas.)

Langston Hughes summed up his own response and that of young writers such as Zora Neale Hurston, Nella Larsen, Wallace Thurman, and Countee Cullen in an article published in 1926 in The Nation: "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." This was a declaration of the young writers' independence from the staid confines of Du Boisian propaganda. Drawing on the resources of black culture—including folklore and blues—they celebrated an essential blackness that was part of their cultural identity and heritage.

VERNON J. WILLIAMS JR.

See also Authors: 3—Nonfiction; Black History and Historiography; Boas, Franz; Bruce, John Edward; Crisis, The; Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Frazier, E. Franklin; Herskovits, Melville; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Literary Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance; Locke, Alain; Messenger, The; Miller, Kelly; New Negro; Opportunity; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Woodson, Carter G.

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Fabre, Genviève, and Michael Ferth. Temples for Tomorrow: Looking Back at the Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Huggins, Nathan Irwin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- . Voices of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Random House, 1979.
- Lewis, David Levering, ed. The Portable Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.

Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Literature: 7—Poetry

Regarding poetry, it is convenient to mark the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance with the publication of Claude McKay's forcible sonnet "If We Must Die" in 1919 and to see it as ending around 1932, a year after James Weldon Johnson issued the expanded edition of his Book of American Negro Poetry. During that thirteen-year span, some of the most distinguished voices in American poetry emerged, including Johnson, McKay, Angelina Weld Grimké, Anne Spencer, Jean Toomer, Langston Hughes, and Countee Cullen. They were joined by Alice Dunbar Nelson, William Stanley Braithwaite, Jessie Redmon Fauset,

Countee Cullen. (Brown Brothers.)

Georgia Douglas Johnson, Frank Horne, Sterling Brown, Gwendolyn Bennett, Arna Bontemps, Richard Bruce Nugent, Waring Cuney, Helene Johnson, and Mae Cowdery—poets whose reputation after the renaissance waned slightly, but whose contributions to the explosion of poetic art in the 1920s were nevertheless valuable and vast. Together, these writers produced a body of poetry that was unprecedented in its volume, variety, and achievement. The work of this period is notable particularly for its innovation and for expanding the repertoire of themes commonly treated in verse. The poets of the Harlem Renaissance took older, established forms, such as the sonnet, and made them new by reflecting on contemporary conditions and by addressing questions of race. They also created novel poetic forms, arranging the rhythm and structure of some of their poems after the musical models of jazz, bebop, and blues. And in representing the real lives and the real speech of black Americans of the time, the renaissance poets confirmed that everyday experience—especially everyday black experience—deserves and rewards serious poetic consideration.

Writing “Brown Poems” in the 1920s

Although Alain Locke’s The New Negro (1925) is routinely identified as being the first anthology to document a pioneering aesthetic among black artists, it rather belatedly recognized the achievement of a new poetry that had already been flourishing for several years. Between 1922 and 1925, three major, original anthologies of contemporary black verse were published (a fourth would appear in 1927). Also, in 1922, McKay published his Harlem Shadows, which confirmed the emergence of a new sensibility that would animate the work of poets associated with the Harlem Renaissance. Harlem Shadows was followed by several individual volumes of poetry that proved to be equally modern in their conception and formidable in their achievement, including Toomer’s Cane (1923); Hughes’s The Weary Blues (1926), Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), and The Dream Keeper (1932); Cullen’s Color (1925), Copper Sun (1927), and The Black Christ and Other Poems (1929); and James Weldon Johnson’s God’s Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse (1927). Dozens of books and hundreds of poems were published by these and other black poets during the 1920s. The interest and influence of white patrons helped make the publication and recognition of much of the renaissance verse possible, but even more significant were the contributions of talented black editors, publishers, and reviewers of poetry, such as James Weldon Johnson, Braithwaite, Fauset, Locke, and Cullen. They were all poets of some stature, but, with the exception of Johnson and Cullen, were and are best known as promoters of poetry.

The poems composed by black writers around the 1920s are so varied in form, tone, style, and theme that it is difficult to generalize about them. Nevertheless, all the poets of the Harlem Renaissance struggled with the question of whether, and how, to “Write poems—/brown poems/Of dark words.” These lines, from Gwendolyn Bennett’s poem “Advice,” suggest how a poet’s artistic choices are affected when that poet is black. For all the renaissance poets, race inevitably informed the way they thought about what subjects and what language to choose.

Still, different poets dealt differently with what Langston Hughes called the “racial mountain.” For instance, though Braithwaite, Horne, Cuney, and Georgia Johnson sometimes identified black figures or themes in their poems, there is little indication that race as a sociopolitical concern is central to their artistic thinking. They usually preferred to write about abstract concepts—especially love, death, beauty, and God—though often from a very personal perspective.

Georgia Johnson, for instance, composed many capable and quite popular verses about women’s experience with love and longing. The pathos of her poetry is well represented by the last lines of “The Heart of a Woman”: “The heart of a woman falls back with the night,/And enters some alien cage in its plight,/And tries to forget it has dreamed of the stars,/While it breaks, breaks, breaks on the sheltering bars.”

Like Johnson, Horne traded in a certain sentimentality, which is especially in evidence in his series “Letters Found Near a Suicide.” Even so, there and in his best poems, Horne, again like Johnson, usually avoids the maudlin; both showed themselves attentive to the craft of writing poetry. Braithwaite, too, conscientiously composed his pieces, in which he was inclined to reflect on such topics as time and fate, beauty and joy, memory and mortality.

These were not the only poets of the Harlem Renaissance disposed to comment on abstractions and on the human condition generally. However, in the work of the majority of poets of that period, much more common situations predominate, and the subject of race is more explicitly—if variously—treated. Gwendolyn Bennett declares her affection for other black women in “To A Dark Girl,” when she attests, “I love you for your brownness.” Similarly, Helene Johnson praises the splendor of a young black man in her “Sonnet to a Negro in Harlem”: “You are disdainful and magnificent—/. . . You are too splendid for the city street.” Mixed with Johnson’s sensual admiration for this young man is a nonsexualized racial pride that is commonly expressed in renaissance poetry. She makes no apologies for the man’s self-confidence; indeed, she suggests that not enough of his peers are following his lead.

In “The Shroud of Color,” Countee Cullen is somewhat more conflicted about the impact of race on one’s will and power, admitting, “‘Lord, being dark’ I said, ‘I cannot bear/The further touch of earth, the scented air.’” By contrast, Claude McKay is certain of his ability to live nobly and ably, and of his capacity to respond to racial injustices: “I possess the courage and the grace/To bear my anger proudly and unbent.”

Sometimes, racial themes seemed to be too ponderous to be accommodated by poetic lines, as Hughes implies in one piece: “In the Johannesburg mines/There are 240,000/Native Africans working./What kind of poem/Would you/Make out of that?/. . .” But his skepticism is enabling; the response to his question is contained in the fact of the poem itself. He suggests that no subject is too great for poetry, so long as we are willing to expand our idea of what poetry is.

For many poets of the Harlem Renaissance, the question of how best to write “brown poems,” or poems that were uniquely their own, entailed not only considering what topics to address but what type of language to use. Most preferred to compose in the vernacular, using everyday language and syntax to express their ideas, paving the way for a practice that would become almost universal in American poetry written in the second half of the twentieth century. However, Cullen, for one, usually favored a formal, literary mode and sometimes even archaic language—one of his poems is entitled “The Wind Bloweth Where It Listeth.” He disparaged the use of dialect in poetry and wishfully announced that “the day of dialect as far as Negro poets are concerned is in the decline.”

Cullen’s prediction was not borne out by the verse compositions of his day, however, as James Weldon Johnson, Sterling Brown, and Hughes, among others, became well known for their folk poems and their work written in dialect. The challenge for them was to write authentic folk poetry without relying on the kind of dialect verse that Paul Laurence Dunbar wrote. Though Dunbar was revered by most renaissance poets, his work was seen as possessing a certain quaintness and modesty that the poets of this new age did not wish to replicate in their own work. One way to modernize dialect was to combine folk language with new musical forms, as Hughes did in “Bound No’th Blues,” which begins, “Goin’ down the road, Lawd,/Goin’ down the road./Down the road, Lawd,/Way, way down the road./Got to find somebody/To help me carry this load.” Here Hughes inserts an unexaggerated dialect into a blues pattern of stating a problem, reiterating that problem, and then projecting a solution. However, the solution, such as it is, is not discovered at the end of the poem but inheres in its process—reflecting the function of blues itself—and the poet refuses to offer the kind of moral the reader might expect from a poem by Dunbar or others like him.

Another way for renaissance poets to refresh dialect is revealed in Brown’s “Strong Men,” which blends standard language and dialect, playing one off the other in a pattern of call and response typical of some forms of jazz: “They put hammers in your hands/And said—Drive so much before sundown./You sang:/Ain’t no hammah/In dis lan’/Strikes lak mine, bebby . . .” Here the standard language contextualizes and leavens the nonstandard lines so that the latter do not become “humorous or pathetic,” as James Weldon Johnson warned was the fate of most dialect verse.

The “language” of jazz was in fact another method that renaissance poets used for updating dialect. Toomer’s “Portrait in Georgia,” for instance, has jazz-like syncopation: “Hair—braided chestnut,/coiled like a lyncher’s rope,/Eyes—fagots,/Lips—old scars, or the first red blisters/Breath—the last sweet scent of cane.”

The staggered rhythms and irregular tempo of jazz became hallmarks of Harlem Renaissance poetry, and they are one manifestation of some poets’ urge to devise forms appropriate to their experience. In order to create new forms, the poets had first to know old ones and understand the past; thus, to think about writing “brown poems” also meant considering one’s place as a black poet in the older tradition. Some felt a considerable—if also productive—conflict about being black and yet taking up an art form whose most famous serious practitioners have been white. Cullen’s memorable lines articulate this conflict: “Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:/To make a poet black, and bid him sing!” Many, like James Weldon Johnson, partly resolved this conflict by looking back to Dunbar and to the traditions of “Black and unknown bards of long ago” whose “lips [were able] to touch the sacred fire” of poetic inspiration. Others, such as Langston Hughes, were convinced that they could create a new tradition which would be more authentically “American” than the predominantly white tradition which most students of poetry knew at the time. Hughes may well have been speaking of American poetry when he wrote, “O, yes, /I say it plain, /America never was America to me, /And yet I swear this oath— /America will be!”

Still, although Hughes focused on the future, several renaissance poets stayed trained on the past. Cullen addressed a lyric poem “To John Keats, Poets, at Spring Time,” and Anne Spencer also invoked the nineteenth-century poets whom she had read and studied, inserting herself as well as other black poets into the largely white tradition that preceded them. In the short poem “Dunbar,” she laments, “Ah, how poets sing and die! /Make one song and Heaven takes it; /Have one heart and Beauty breaks it; /Chatterton, Shelley, Keats, and I— /Ah, how poets sing and die!” Her grief for the passing of great poets is mitigated by her faith in the feeling that links poets across generations.

But even as Spencer identifies with these men, she acknowledges that the question of poetic traditions is even more complicated for women writers. In her poem “Letter to My Sister,” she contends that “It is dangerous for a woman to defy the gods,” referring to male figures of authority—in poetry and elsewhere—from the past as well as in the present. And if defiant acts by women were threatening, how much more so were the acts of black women, as Spencer once proclaimed: “I proudly love being a Negro woman—it’s so involved and interesting. We are the PROBLEM—the great national game of TABOO.”

While black women may have presented a “problem,” they participated significantly and influentially in the creative activity of the Harlem Renaissance—more so than in society in general. Black women published alongside men in leading journals during the 1920s, and their poems were included in contemporary anthologies. Jessie Fauset served as literary editor of The Crisis from 1919 to 1926, during which time she discovered the work of Langston Hughes and others. Georgia Johnson held salons at her home in Washington, D.C., which attracted male and female intellectuals and encouraged and inspired many young artists.

Yet, despite the contributions of women writers, and despite recent scholarship which has raised their status, the poets of the Harlem Renaissance whose legacy has persisted are almost exclusively men. The reason may be that the most accomplished women poets of the period wrote comparatively few poems and had relatively short careers as poets. Hughes spoke for himself as well as for many contemporary scholars of the renaissance when he speculated that, “On Anne Spencer’s table /There lies an unsharpened pencil— /As though she has left unwritten /Many things she knows to write.” But the poems that she, Grimké, and others have left behind are worthy of study, are reasonably well-preserved, and are integral to understanding what we now recognize as the tradition of the Harlem Renaissance.

Two Landmark Anthologies: The Book of American Negro Poetry and Caroling Dusk

A fair number of the best-known poems written by the women of the Harlem Renaissance are, like those written by the men, most accessible to us today in two anthologies published in the 1920s: James Weldon Johnson’s The Book of American Negro Poetry and Cullen’s Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. Both texts are remarkably valuable resources for understanding the range and accomplishments of the renaissance poets.

Johnson’s collection was first published in 1922, then published in a second, enlarged edition in 1931. It was the first book-length compilation of the work of modern black poets. Perhaps more famous now than the anthology itself is Johnson’s preface, “Essay on the Negro’s Creative Genius.” This influential and continually illuminating essay reveals Johnson’s belief—which he shared with many of the figures of the renaissance—that artistic achievement can be tied to social and political advancements:

The final measure of the greatness of all peoples is the amount and standard of the literature and art they have produced. The world does not know that a people is great until that people produces great literature and art. No people that has produced great literature and art has ever been looked upon by the world as distinctly inferior.

Published in 1927, Caroling Dusk contained some of the most recently produced poems of its day and, uniquely, included brief biographies that in almost every case were written by the poets themselves. In his foreword, Cullen (like Johnson) emphasizes the variety of the work by black poets: “The conservatives, the middlers, and the arch heretics will be found among them as among the white poets.” Cullen goes on to deny that there is any organic unity among the poems written by blacks during the 1920s, and to downplay the idea that novelty is their most worthy characteristic: “to say that the pulse beat of their verse shows generally such a fever, or the symptoms of such an ague, will prove on closer examination merely the moment’s exaggeration of a physician anxious to establish a new literary ailment.” Cullen was suspicious of efforts to identify an aesthetic of the “New Negro,” fearing that such identifications would keep the work of black poets on the margins of American literature. Even more than Johnson, Cullen hoped that the renaissance poets would participate fully in a “national literature” and would be recognized simply as poets, without the qualification “Negro.”

In addition to Johnson’s and Cullen’s anthologies, two other major poetry collections and a few smaller volumes of verse appeared during the 1920s to showcase black writers. Robert Kerlin published Negro Poets and Their Poems in 1923 and issued a revised version in 1935. Newman White and Walter Jackson, two self-identified “southern white men,” brought out An Anthology of Verse by American Negroes in 1924. White (a professor at Trinity College, which would later become Duke University) and Jackson (a professor at the North Carolina College for Women, now the University of North Carolina at Greensboro) had the specific purpose of providing a text for college students. Their editorial note is rather dated, and some of their comments suggest a custodial attitude, yet their effort to incorporate the work of black poets into the college curriculum seems to have been motivated by a genuine interest in expanding the canon of American literature and not, as was the case with some other white critics and teachers, by a prurient interest in the “exoticism” of the contemporary Negro.

Whatever White’s and Jackson’s motivations were, James Weldon Johnson and Sterling Brown had a similar idea. Published in conjunction with the second edition of Johnson’s anthology was an “Outline of Study,” prepared by Brown “for the use,” according to Johnson, “of teachers and students.” Like White and Jackson’s anthology, Brown’s “Outline” and Johnson’s preface indicate their hope not only of making the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance available to appreciative readers but also of making it an object of critical appraisal and study.

The fact that four separate collections dedicated to black poetry appeared within the span of five years attests to the importance, vitality, and continuous renewal of the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. In addition, Alain Locke’s anthology The New Negro contained some poems; and pamphlets such as Kerlin’s Contemporary Poetry of the Negro (1921) and Locke’s Four Negro Poets (1927)—both put out by mainstream publishing houses—further documented the fecundity of the renaissance imagination and the willingness of publishers to make it known to readers.

Black Journals, the Little Magazines, and Modernism

The publishing of poetry during the Harlem Renaissance was perhaps most vibrant in periodicals. Almost all the major and minor poets of the renaissance first found an audience by presenting their work in journals dedicated to black life, such as The Crisis, the official publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); and Opportunity, published by the National Urban League. These journals sponsored literary contests, granting recognition as well as much-needed financial rewards to many fledgling poets. Yet some of the younger artists considered these magazines too conservative, and several of the principal figures of the Harlem Renaissance came together in 1926 to found Fire!! It was intended to be a quarterly publication that would, as Hughes explained, “burn up a lot of the old, dead conventional Negro-white ideas of the past, épater les bourgeois into a realization of the younger Negro writers and artists, and provide us with an outlet for publication not available in the limited pages of the small Negro magazines then existing.” Only one issue of Fire!! was ever published, however, and these artists had to return to other venues.

Before and especially after the demise of Fire!! renaissance poets published widely in the prestigious “little magazines”: Poetry: A Magazine of Verse, Dial, Messenger, Broom, Others, Little Review, Liberator, and its successor New Masses. These journals promoted avant-garde literature (and often left-wing politics), and appealed to a primarily white highbrow readership. It was largely through these little magazines that the Harlem Renaissance and modernism intermingled. “Modernist” is a term used to describe certain trends in art and literature during the period from about 1914 to 1945. Briefly, modernist art was experimental, and many modernists valued fragmentation over unity and implication over direct communication or description; they aimed to reproduce the workings of the mind rather than transcribe some supposedly objective reality.

Modernists were producing strikingly original verse in the 1920s, when the Harlem Renaissance was flourishing. During that decade, white American poets (modernists and others) such as Wallace Stevens, William Carlos Williams, Ezra Pound, H. D., Marianne Moore, John Crowe Ransom, T. S. Eliot, Edna St. Vincent Millay, e. e. cummings, Hart Crane, Allen Tate, and Robert Penn Warren all published significant volumes of poetry. All the white modernist poets were familiar with the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance, and Pound, H. D., Crane, and Williams were personally acquainted with several renaissance figures. Jean Toomer had a close association with Hart Crane and other literary people such as Waldo Frank and Van Wyck Brooks; as a result, he occupies a unique place at the intersection of modernism and the Harlem Renaissance, and his eclectic Cane is considered a masterpiece of modernism. It is a pastiche of verse and prose, written in many voices, most of which are rural and southern. On the surface, the poetry does not appear difficult, yet many of Toomer's lines resist easy explication, such as the enigmatic ending of the prose poem "Harvest Song": "O my brothers, I beat my palms, still soft, against the stubble of my harvesting. (You beat your soft palms, too.) My pain is sweet. Sweeter than the oats or wheat or corn. It will not bring me knowledge of my hunger."

Like Toomer, Richard Bruce Nugent, Hughes, and other renaissance poets shared with their modernist counterparts an interest in experimenting with form, genre, and perspective. Nevertheless, while the Harlem Renaissance and modernism were not wholly independent movements, they influenced each other largely indirectly. Many poets of the Harlem Renaissance—but only a very few white poets—were committed to traditional forms, particularly the sonnet. Only a few leading white writers displayed much political consciousness, and most of them were disinclined to describe social conditions concretely. Furthermore, many modernists preserved a distinction between high and low culture, and they valued erudition and at times seemed to revel in abstruseness. By contrast, even if most of the poets of the Harlem Renaissance were middle class and educated—unlike the vast majority of black Americans of their era—they showed more interest in what Johnson called the "lower strata" of society and they almost uniformly aimed to create a poetry that was accessible (in theory if not in practice) to most of the literate public.

Racial Identity and Poetic Identity: The Implications of Genre

To some extent, poets of the Harlem Renaissance were torn between their populist impulses and their higher literary aspirations. This was one manifestation of W. E. B. Du Bois's concept of "two-ness," a split consciousness that many black Americans felt and still feel. Cullen invokes this "two-ness" when he speaks of the "double obligation of being both Negro and American." This condition, he says, "is not so unified as we are often led to believe." For the Harlem Renaissance poets, this double obligation often presented itself when they had to choose a form in which to express their ideas. Cullen, whose prosody was conservative, advocated in his foreword to Caroling Dusk the power of traditional literary elements: "As heretical as it may sound, there is the probability that Negro poets, dependent as they are on the English language, may have more to gain from the rich background of English and American poetry than from any nebulous atavistic yearnings toward an African inheritance."

Claude McKay, whom few would characterize as "conservative," nevertheless embraced predominantly white English and American literary history, though only to a point, skillfully combining traditional forms and political protest in his sonnets "To the White Fiends," "Africa," "The Harlem Dancer," "America," "Enslaved," "The White House," "Outcast," and, most famously, "If We Must Die." McKay took an old and very rigid poetic genre and made it new and relevant to his own project by examining within its bounds unconventional, contemporary subjects. He is particularly affecting in his final couplets, as in "If We Must Die": "Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,/Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!" and in "The White House": "Oh, I must keep my heart inviolate/Against the potent poison of your hate."

Although he also composed Petrarchan sonnets (in which an octave is followed by a sestet), McKay preferred the Shakespearean form (which contains three quatrains and a couplet). Among his best efforts at the Shakespearean sonnet is "America," which opens: "Although she feeds me bread of bitterness,/And sinks into my throat her tiger's tooth,/Stealing my breath of life, I will confess/I love this cultured hell that tests my youth!" As a Jamaican immigrant, McKay perhaps initially idealized the United States and its promise of success to all who exerted sufficient effort, but his enthusiasm for and belief in meritocracy was tempered by his understanding of America's entrenched racism. McKay closes another sonnet, "The Lynching," with the ominous observation, "And little lads, lynchers that were to be,/Danced round the dreadful thing in fiendish glee." Still, despite the despair in some of his poems, McKay ultimately wants to affirm that if he successfully bears the burdens of today, he will live to see the promise of the future. In "Harlem Dancer," one of his most frequently anthologized pieces, McKay might well be describing himself when he says of the title figure, "To me she seemed a proudly-swaying palm/Grown lovelier for passing through a storm."

Langston Hughes found it more difficult to articulate his vision within traditional poetic forms, as he suggests in "Aesthete in Harlem": "Strange,/That in this nigger place,/I should meet Life face to face/When for years I had been seeking/Life in places gentler speaking/Until I came to this near street/And found Life—stepping on my feet!" The rhymes suggest conventional models, but the anomalous opening line and the irregular meter throughout the poem indicate that Hughes's hand is quite free. His play is deliberate, as is indicated by the poem's last word, a pun on poetic feet. (In standard meter, syllables are grouped in particular ways to create what is called a "foot.") The "life" that he discovers in Harlem does not conform to predetermined poetic models, but this conflict is liberating and exhilarating.

Hughes's discomfort with traditional forms hardly constituted a limitation for him. He was an extremely prolific writer of poetry, prose, and drama; very early in his career he had the skill and the confidence to create a new poetry when he found old forms inadequate, while at the same time insinuating himself into the most venerable poetic traditions. In "I, Too," Hughes lays claim to the assertiveness and expansiveness of the nineteenth-century American poet Walt Whitman, who wrote: "I am large. . . . I contain multitudes." Hughes responds: "I, too, sing America," claiming his rightful place as an American citizen and an American poet.

Although Hughes invokes Whitman's audacity, his claims are understated and he hopes for ordinary achievements. For instance, Hughes envisions a day when he won't be sent "to eat in the kitchen/When company comes" and says of the guests, "They'll see how beautiful I am/And be ashamed." This reference to his own physical beauty recalls his poem "My People": "The night is beautiful,/So the faces of my people." But in "I, Too" beauty may also indicate a quality of his poem: "they" will see the value in his poetry and be ashamed for having held a narrow concept of what constitutes good poetry. By extension, Hughes' pronouncement suggests that social justice may derive from white society's recognition of black poets' equal power to create verse. In the final line, Hughes announces, "I, too, am America." The repetition of "too" emphasizes his desire to be part of the national identity but also emphasizes the divide between black and white. Hughes's voice is legitimately American but is not raceless.

Hughes devised a great range of poetic personae: an escaped slave, a historian of American and African life, a poor single mother, a soldier, a member of the Ku Klux Klan, a new Ph.D., an American prophet, and so on. But he also enjoyed recording the "voice" of Harlem as a whole. "Air Raid Over Harlem," subtitled "Scenario for a Little Black Movie," begins with this exchange: "Who you gonna put in it?/Me./Who the hell are you?/Harlem./Alright, then."

Hughes not only put Harlem into many of his poems but, along with his fellow poets of the 1920s, put poetry into Harlem. If it was true before the Harlem Renaissance that "Harlem/Knows a song/Without a tune—/The rhythm's there:/But the melody's/Bare," as Hughes once asserted, this was not the case by the end of the renaissance. Hughes and others bestowed on Harlem the melody it needed and deserved, and in so doing helped set a new course in American literature.

The Legacy of the Harlem Renaissance

Many of the poets of the period continued to write after the end of the Harlem Renaissance, and several of them turned to fiction, drama, and criticism. Hughes wrote in other forms, but he also continued to compose poetry for decades. His verse, along with that of the other central poets of the 1920s, helped shape the work of Melvin Tolson, Robert Hayden, Margaret Walker, and Gwendolyn Brooks, all of whom began their careers as writers in the 1930s and are sometimes identified as belonging to the tail end of the renaissance.

Among the more recent poets who inherited the legacy of the Harlem Renaissance are Derek Walcott, Audre Lorde, Sonia Sanchez, Amiri Baraka, Jay Wright, Lucille Clifton, June Jordan, Clarence Major, Michael S. Harper, Nikki Giovanni, Alice Walker, Yusef Komunyakaa, Ai, Ntozake Shange, Rita Dove, Thylas Moss, Patricia Smith, Essex Hemphill, Carl Phillips, and Elizabeth Alexander. Thanks in part to the efforts of their predecessors of the renaissance, these poets continue to find poetry pliable enough to accommodate their multiple voices and to pursue their wide-ranging visions.

JEANNINE JOHNSON

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Bennett, Gwendolyn; Bontemps, Arna; Braithwaite, William Stanley; Brooks, Gwendolyn; Brown, Sterling; Cane; Color; Cowdery, Mae Virginia; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Cullen, Countee; Cuney, Waring; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fine Clothes to the Jew; Fire!!; God's Trombones; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Harlem Shadows; Hayden, Robert; Horne, Frank; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, Helene; Johnson, James Weldon; Kerlin, Robert; Literary and Artistic Prizes; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Modernism; Nelson, Alice Dunbar; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Opportunity Literary Contests; Poetry: Dialect Poetry; Spencer, Anne; Tolson, Melvin; Toomer, Jean; Walker, Margaret; Weary Blues, The

Further Reading

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Black American Poets and Dramatists of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Chelsea House, 1995.
- Cullen, Countee, ed. Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. New York: Harper, 1927. (See also Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Black Poets of the Twenties. New York: Carol, 1993.)
- Honey, Maureen, ed. Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1989.
- Hughes, Langston. "Harlem Literati in the Twenties." In Remembering the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Cary D. Wintz. New York: Garland, 1996.
- Hull, Gloria. Color, Sex, and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Hutchinson, George B. "The Whitman Legacy and the Harlem Renaissance." In Walt Whitman: The Centennial Essays, ed. Ed Folsom. Iowa City: Iowa University Press, 1994.

- Johnson, James Weldon, ed. The Book of American Negro Poetry. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1922. (See also rev. ed., 1931; reprinted, 1958, 1969.)
- North, Michael. The Dialect of Modernism: Race, Language, and Twentieth-Century Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Primeau, Ronald. "Frank Horne and the Second Echelon Poets of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Rampersad, Arnold. "Langston Hughes and Approaches to Modernism in the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance: Revaluations, ed. Amritjit Singh et al. New York: Garland, 1989.
- . "The Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Columbia History of American Poetry, ed. Jay Parini. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- Roses, Lorraine Elena, and Ruth Elizabeth Randolph, eds. Harlem's Glory: Black Women Writing, 1900–1950. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.
- Smith, Gary. "The Black Protest Sonnet." American Poetry, 2, Fall 1984, pp. 2–12.
- Woods, Gregory. "Gay Re-Readings of the Harlem Renaissance Poets." In Critical Essays: Gay and Lesbian Writers of Color, ed. Emmanuel S. Nelson. New York: Haworth, 1993.

Little Theater Tournament

The National Little Theater Tournament, held in New York from 1923 to 1931, was an influential competition for amateur theater groups. The contest was an outlet of recognition and support for "little theater" organizations, providing national exposure in a Broadway setting. Several black little theater groups of the Harlem Renaissance competed in the tournament with white groups and earned prizes as well as critical praise.

The National Little Theater Tournament was the brainchild of Walter Hartwig, executive secretary of the New York Drama League, which supported little theater groups in the city. The tournament grew from an unofficial competition that Hartwig organized, in 1921, between the Nyack Club Players and the Forest Hills Garden Players, two little theater companies in the New York area. This pairing led to other informal competitions, until 1923, when Hartwig invited groups within 100 miles of New York City to participate in a formal contest.

The date of the first National Little Tournament was 7 May 1923. It featured twenty groups in a week-long competition at the Bayes Theater on Broadway. Four plays were performed from Monday through Friday, with four finalists chosen to compete for a silver trophy cup on Saturday. David Belasco, the prolific Broadway producer and director, contributed the silver trophy and his name to the prize for the winner of the finalists' competition. The tournament was therefore sometimes referred to as the Belasco Little Theater Tournament or the Belasco Cup Match. The East West Players of Manhattan won the trophy in the 1923 competition for their performance of George Calderon's The Little Stone House.

Belasco's sponsorship of the silver trophy cup was an attempt to appease little theater artists. He was critical of the little theater movement and its departure from the popular melodrama that was a staple of his own Broadway productions. Belasco's involvement with the tournament was minimal, however, other than his contribution of the prize and his participation in judging the finals of the competition in 1924.

Other prizes in the contest included $200 to each of the four finalists. The drama publisher Samuel French sponsored two additional prizes of $200 for the first- and second-best presentations of original unpublished plays from the four competition finalists. Winning the Samuel French prize meant publication of the play by French's company and rights controlled by Samuel French Publishers as the playwright's agent. Playwrights who won the Samuel French Prize received royalties from the publication of their works.

The National Little Theater Tournament reflected and enhanced the growth of amateur theater groups in the United States. The increased artistic output of the Harlem Renaissance coincided with this burgeoning little theater movement. These amateur groups were known for producing plays that strayed from the melodrama that was popular in Broadway theaters at the time. Randolph Edmonds—a dramatist, college professor, and father of black educational theater—described the little theater movement as the best chance for developing authentic black theater (1949). Blacks had control of the productions from start to finish, without pressure from white backers to perpetuate racial stereotypes or otherwise compromise the presentation of the plays.

In 1927, the Krigwa Players (originally Crigwa, an acronym for Crisis Guild of Writers and Artists), a black little theater group sponsored by W. E. B. Du Bois and The Crisis magazine, performed a work by the black female playwright Eulalie Spence—The Fool's Errand—and won first prize in addition to a $200 Samuel French Prize for one of the best unpublished plays. Friction developed between Du Bois and Spence when he kept the prize money to cover his expenses. The Krigwa Players also performed Mary P. Burrill's Aftermath during the tournament of 1928. Randolph Edmond's Morgan Players, representing the drama club at Morgan State University in Baltimore, Maryland, performed in the National Little Theater Tournament in 1929. Although the Morgan Players did not win a prize, their performance of Paul Green's The Man Who Died at Twelve O'Clock was ranked fourth out of the twenty groups performing that year.

Following the inaugural National Little Theater Tournament in 1923, the competition broadened to include national and international (primarily English) amateur theater groups. Regional tournaments imitated the competition held in New York, and by 1928 fifty little theater tournaments had been held nationwide. The organizer, Walter Hartwig, financed the tournament in New York by requiring entrance fees from groups in the contest. The groups could sell tickets to their performances to recoup entrance fees and earn additional money. Many regional theater competitions copied this financing plan.

One-act plays were the standard for most of these tournaments, and the National Little Theater Tournament groups performed thirty 50-minute plays in the contest through 1930. In 1930, Hartwig expanded the competition to include original, unpublished long plays, which were performed during the week after the one-act competition. Samuel French offered a $1,000 prize for the winner of the long-play contest, and the magazine Theater Arts Monthly awarded a silver cup. The Morningside Players of Columbia University won with their performance of The New Freedom by Marjorie Paradis.

In 1931, one-act plays were dropped from the National Little Theater Tournament, since the Depression was putting a financial strain on little theater groups. Only ten groups could afford to pay the entrance fee for the contest. The long-play competition in 1931 was the last of the National Little Theater Tournament contests. Although Hartwig announced his intention to continue the tournament, he could not find competitors, and the contest was never revived.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Community Theater; Fool's Errand; Green, Paul; Krigwa Players

Further Reading

- Dart, Peter A. "The National Little Theatre Tournament 1923–1931." Educational Theatre Journal, 16, 1964.
- Dean, Alexander. Little Theatre Organization and Management for Community, University, and School: Including a History of the Amateur in Drama. New York: Appleton, 1926.
- Edmonds, Randolph. "The Negro Little Theatre Movement." Negro History Bulletin, 12(4), 1949.
- Hill, Errol G., and James V. Hatch. A History of African American Theatre. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Perry, Clarence Arthur. The Work of the Little Theatres: The Groups They Include, the Plays They Produce, Their Tournaments, and the Handbooks They Use. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1933.
- "The Torchbearers Arrive: Whys and Wherefores of the Little Theatre Tourney, Which Again Impends." New York Times, 6 May 1928, sec. 9.
- Williams, Allen. "S. Randolph Edmonds." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro-American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1987.

Liveright, Horace

If any one event signaled the arrival of the Harlem Renaissance as a literary phenomenon, it would be the Civic Club dinner given by Charles S. Johnson of the National Urban League on 21 March 1924. The guests included Alain Locke, James Weldon Johnson, and W. E. B. Du Bois; supportive white writers and critics such as Eugene O'Neill, H. L. Mencken, and Carl Van Vechten; and aspiring young black authors. The purpose of the dinner (or at least its ostensible purpose) was to celebrate the publication by Boni and Liveright of Jessie Redmon Fauset's novel There Is Confusion. Standing to toast Fauset—and Jean Toomer, whose Cane had been published by Boni and Liveright the previous year—Horace Liveright noted the difficulties involved in marketing books of merit and urged the writers in his audience to present a rounded rather than sanitized view of Negro life.

Liveright's comments reveal the aesthetic judgment that enabled him, as a publisher, to connect the writers of the Harlem Renaissance to the bohemian and avant-garde left of Greenwich Village. As a major publisher of the 1920s, Liveright was important in defining and identifying modernist artists and progressive intellectuals. Throughout the 1920s, his firm would take risks and fight censorship in order to publish many of the books that came to define American modernism: Ezra Pound's Poems 1909–1921, T. S. Eliot's The Wasteland, all of Eugene O'Neill's work, Ernest Hemingway's In Our Time, Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy, Stephen Crane's The Bridge, and William Faulkner's Soldier's Pay. In addition, Boni and Liveright published Sigmund Freud, Bertrand Russell, Havelock Ellis, Upton Sinclair, Leon Trotsky, and Jack Reed—writers who shaped progressive thought during this era. Therefore, Boni and Liveright provided an important venue for its black authors: Jean Toomer, Jessie Fauset, and Eric Walrond.

Horace Brisbin Liveright was born in 1886 and raised in Philadelphia. He had written a comic opera, worked on Wall Street, and failed at a number of marketing ventures when, in 1916, he met Albert Boni, who was a bookseller in Greenwich Village and, like Liveright, was looking for an investment partner. Boni's idea was to publish reprints of modern classics and sell them in a series of inexpensive editions. Liveright was enthusiastic, and in May 1917 the firm of Boni and Liveright opened for business at 105 West Forty-Eighth Street, offering the first twelve titles in the Modern Library series. Modern Library reissued hard-to-find and out-of-print works—attractively bound in limp leatherette and inexpensively priced at sixty cents each—by such authors as Friedrich Nietzsche, Oscar Wilde, Maxim Gorki, August Strindberg, and Fyodor Dostoyevsky. The venture was an immediate success and an important event in American publishing; it was also to prove important in shaping the literary canon. In the decades to follow, new generations of writers would find themselves published in Modern Library along with the classics of the past.

With income from Modern Library and a growing reputation for publishing contemporary literature, Liveright was able to have a rather brilliant private life. He had an image as a jazz age entrepreneur, and his lavish parties, attended by blacks and whites, never lacked for liquor or stimulating conversation. Professionally, Liveright would risk publishing innovative and radical authors when mainstream commercial publishers would not take a chance. Who, then, but Horace Liveright would give serious consideration to Cane, a highly experimental book dealing with racial themes and written by an unknown Negro author?

Jean Toomer first met Liveright in 1922 through Waldo Frank, an avant-garde writer in Greenwich Village whose work Boni and Liveright published without much financial return. At that time, Frank was one of Toomer's closest friends. The two had corresponded throughout 1921–1922, critiquing each other's work and enthusiastically pursuing a new modernist aesthetic. Toomer introduced Frank to the American South and black culture during a week they spent together in Spartanburg, South Carolina; Toomer was in turn introduced by Frank to the literary scene in Greenwich Village, meeting Georgia O'Keefe, Alfred Stieglitz, and Hart Crane as well as Horace Liveright.

Liveright published Toomer's masterpiece, Cane, in 1923, with an introduction by Waldo Frank. Although critics, both black and white, gave the book favorable reviews, it was not a financial success, selling only 500 copies. Nevertheless, Liveright offered Toomer a contract for a second, unspecified book (which was never actually completed). By the time of the Civic Club dinner in 1924, however, Toomer had begun to distance himself from both literary production and identification as a black man. When Boni and Liveright's publicity for Cane emphasized that Toomer was a new, talented Negro writer, he objected to the mention of race—an attitude which Liveright found difficult to understand.

Liveright's decision to publish a second work of fiction by a black author, Jessie Fauset's There Is Confusion, suggests his openness to a "rounded" view of Negro life. Although his publishing career reflected his support of progressive causes and sexual freedom, There Is Confusion is a novel of the Negro upper class and is almost Victorian in its depiction of sexual matters. Advertisements for this book featured the gathering of the Negro elite at the Civic Club dinner and compared Fauset's treatment of the upper class to Edith Wharton's.

The West Indian short-story writer Eric Walrond was the third significant author of the Harlem Renaissance whose work was published by Boni and Liveright. Walrond was raised in Barbados and Panama, was educated in Spanish and English, studied literature at Columbia University, wrote for Marcus Garvey's Negro World, and was an important link between aspiring black writers and white publishers. He had been the business manager of Opportunity since 1925 when Liveright advanced him money for a trip to Panama. The result was the short-story collection Tropic Death, published by Boni and Liveright in 1926. Walrond's experimental and expressionistic prose, like Toomer's, was modernist and exotic, rich in dialect and allegory; it was highly praised by Du Bois and others. Walrond went abroad with Guggenheim funding in 1926, again under contract to Boni and Liveright; as with Toomer, however, Liveright's investment failed to yield a second book. Walrond died in England in 1956, without publishing again.

By 1928 the heyday of Boni and Liveright was over. In 1925 Liveright sold the firm's most reliable source of profit, the Modern Library, to pay for a series of poor theatrical and stock investments. Although the firm continued to publish important books, its financial situation weakened. Liveright had invested heavily in the stock market, and he never recovered from the crash of 1929. In the early 1930s, he lost the business and moved to Hollywood to work for Paramount, where he tried, unsuccessfully, to produce Dreiser's An American Tragedy with the filmmaker Sergei Eisenstein of the Soviet Union. Still looking for new publishing ventures, Liveright died broke and alone in New York in 1933. Upton Sinclair gave the eulogy at his funeral.

Biography

Horace Brisbin Liveright was born 10 December 1884 in Oceola Mills, Pennsylvania. He attended public schools in Philadelphia. He was a bond salesman and an investment manager (1904–1916); a cofounder with Albert Boni of the publishing house Boni and Liveright (1917); publisher, Boni and Liveright (1917–1928); publisher, Horace Liveright (1928–1933); and an adviser at Paramount Studios (1931). Liveright died in New York on 25 September 1933.

MICHAEL ZEITLER

See also Boni and Liveright; Civic Club Dinner, 1924; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Frank, Waldo; Johnson, Charles S.; Modernism; Publishers and Publishing Houses; There Is Confusion; Toomer, Jean; Walrond, Eric

Further Reading

- Darden, Tom. Firebrand: The Life of Horace Liveright. New York: Random House, 1995.
- Gilmer, Walker. Horace Liveright: Publisher of the Twenties. New York: Lewis, 1970.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Tebbel, John. A History of Book Publishing in the United States, Vol. 3. New York and London: Bowker, 1978.

Wintz, Cary. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Liza

Liza—a musical comedy with book by Irvin C. Miller, score (words and music) by Maceo Pinkard, and “special lyrics” by Nat Vincent—was produced by Al Davis and had its premiere on 27 November 1922 at Daly’s Sixty-Third Street Theater. Its cast included Irvin Miller, the team of R. Eddie Greenlee and Thaddeus Drayton, and Emmett (“Gang”) Anthony, comedians; Gertrude Saunders (the “falsetto comedienne”) and Margaret Simms, singers; and Maude Russell and Johnny Nitt, dancers.

Liza was originally titled Bon Bon Buddy, Jr., and had a trial run at the Lafayette Theater in Harlem during August and September 1922. It was one of at least five black shows to open during that year attempting to duplicate the immense success of Shuffle Along (1921) and was the only one to succeed, running for more than two years in various configurations.

The story of Liza concerned a woman—the daughter of a small-town mayor—who has fallen in love with a schoolteacher. The young man is unjustly accused of embezzling public funds. In the end the truth comes to light, the young man is exonerated, and the happy couple are able to wed. The songs in the show included “Tag Day,” “Pleasure,” “I’m the Sheriff,” “Liza,” “Memories,” “Just a Barber Shop Chord,” “That Brown-Skin Flapper,” “On the Moonlit Swanee,” “Essence,” “Forget Your Troubles,” “My Old Man,” “Runnin’ Wild Blues,” “The Charleston Dance,” “Dandy,” “My Creole Girl,” “Planning,” “The Ghost Dance,” “Love Me,” “Jintown Speedster,” and “Don’t Be Blue,” as well as several untitled numbers.

Liza was scored for a modified theater orchestra, consisting—according to composer Darius Milhaud, who saw the show—of flute, clarinet, saxophone, two trumpets, trombone, percussion, two violins, viola, cello, and string bass. (Presumably there was also a piano.)

The show was widely reviewed in the mainstream press by major critics of the day, including Alexander Woollcott and Heywood Broun. The reviewers particularly praised the dancing in Liza, as well as the general liveliness and fast pace. The loose story line and script were accounted trite and weak, although some critics found some of the comedy pleasing. The score was received favorably, but without excitement; although Pinkard wrote some immortal songs, including “Sweet Georgia Brown” and other hits, none of his best work appeared in Liza.

Liza is of lasting historical importance for two reasons that were not readily apparent at the time. It was a major influence on Milhaud, as a source for his famous ballet nègre of 1923, La création du monde. Liza also heralded a major change in American dance. It was in this show that Maude Russell (the “slim princess,” 1897–2001) and a chorus line, the Dancing Honey Girls, performed a number called “The Charleston Dance.” This was the first appearance of the Charleston on a New York stage. It would become the ubiquitous dance of the jazz age, although it did not rise to its full popularity until the mid-1920s, following its success in the show Runnin’ Wild.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Lafayette Theater; Miller, Irvin; Musical Theater; Runnin’ Wild; Shuffle Along

Further Reading

Broun, Heywood. Article in New York World, 28 November 1922.

Liza clippings file, Billy Rose Theater Collection, Performing Arts Library, New York Public Library.

Milhaud, Darius Milhaud. “L’évolution du jazz-band et la musique des nègres d’Amérique du nord.” Courrier Musical, 25(9), May 1923.

Peterson, Bernard. A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.

Woollcott, Alexander. Article in New York Herald, 28 November 1922.

Locke, Alain

In the pantheon of African American intellectuals who helped to spur on the artistic, social, and political flowering of the Harlem Renaissance, few names occupy as prominent a place as that of Alain Locke. Locke was formally trained and vastly accomplished as a philosopher, but his life and work far transcend the role traditionally ascribed to that profession. As a result of his more than forty years as a prominent member of the faculty at Howard University and his exemplary record of publication on a variety of subjects, Locke exerted a broad influence on African American arts, sociology, and education, among other areas. Locke's status as a cultural authority during the height of the Harlem Renaissance was perhaps rivaled only by that of W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, Charles S. Johnson, and a select group of others. Although he was not a creative artist himself, Locke's intellectual work not only shaped the Harlem Renaissance but also significantly altered the development of modern American thought in general. His status as a prominent, albeit somewhat closeted, gay figure has also been more fully acknowledged only in recent years. On the whole, Locke's life is marked throughout by a genteel brand of cerebral struggle against the numerous problems he perceived in American society.

Locke was born into a well-to-do African American family in Philadelphia in 1885 and benefited most from this privileged situation in terms of his education. After a distinguished high school career, Locke spent two years training to become a teacher in Philadelphia before matriculating at Harvard, where he earned a bachelor's degree in philosophy and graduated magna cum laude in 1907. That same year, Locke was awarded a Rhodes scholarship as a representative of his home state, Pennsylvania. When he departed for Oxford in the fall of 1907, he officially became the first African American Rhodes scholar in the history of that prestigious program. He continued his post-baccalaureate studies in philosophy for another five years, the first four of which (1907–1910) were completed at Oxford. He subsequently spent a year (1910–1911) at the University of Berlin, where Du Bois had also studied for three years in the early 1890s. Locke distinguished himself at both institutions, excelling at his scholastic work even as he bore the significant burden of being considered a pacesetter for his entire race (a task he actually welcomed, however). He wrote an article called "Oxford Contrasts" in 1909 for The Independent, a British periodical, on the triumphs and tribulations associated with his experience as an African American student at Oxford. This piece was reprinted in Colored American Magazine that same year, marking Locke's first written contribution to the project of racial uplift associated with the so-called talented tenth. Du Bois had coined this phrase in an essay of 1903 to denote the black intellectual elite that he believed would lead the entire race to a better position in American society. This group was composed mostly of educated, prosperous, urban African American men from the spheres of business, education, art, medicine, religion, and law. In Du Bois's conception, they were morally obliged to elevate the status of their comparatively powerless lower-class brethren. Locke's later articulation of the characteristics of the "New Negro" borrowed heavily from Du Bois's writings on the talented tenth.

After he returned to the United States, Locke embarked on a six-month tour of the American South. During this tour, the prejudice and intolerance he himself witnessed drove home the necessity of positively demonstrating the capabilities of African Americans. Once he had returned from his travels, Locke moved to Washington, D.C., and quickly accepted a position as an assistant professor at Howard University. He remained at Howard for four years in this role; among his important contributions during this time was the cofounding of the Stylus Society there in 1916. This society, which would last for more than seventy years, published Stylus, a literary magazine that included contributions from students (Zora Neale Hurston contributed a piece as an undergraduate in 1921) and faculty members.

In 1916, after four eventful years at Howard, Locke was made a full professor in the philosophy department. Having attained this goal, he decided again to follow Du Bois's example and pursue a doctoral degree at Harvard. Following two years of diligent research and teaching, Locke earned his doctorate in 1918 and returned to Howard to resume his professorial post. He published a wide variety of articles during this period, ranging from occasional philosophical discourses and pedagogical polemics to literary and artistic criticism. He began to contribute regular pieces to Opportunity, the monthly journal of the National Urban League, after Charles S. Johnson founded that publication in 1923. Opportunity quickly became one of the most prominent African American literary magazines of the day. Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Zora Neale Hurston were frequent contributors or subjects of reviews in the early years of the journal, and Locke began to mingle freely among the members of the talented tenth because of his association with it. Locke wrote dozens of reviews and other short pieces for Opportunity throughout his life and served as a judge in a number of the literary contests that the publication sponsored.

The New Negro: An Interpretation (1925), the work that would become perhaps the most lasting achievement of Locke's career (and one of the masterpieces of the Harlem Renaissance), arose directly from his collaboration with Johnson in the publication of Opportunity. Johnson put together the dinner that became known as the Civic Club dinner of March 1924. The purpose, or presumed purpose, of this dinner was to celebrate the publication of Jessie Redmon Fauset's first novel, There Is Confusion (1924). However, Johnson also saw it as an occasion to bring together a large number of the most gifted African American artists and writers—many of whom had already been published in Opportunity—with prominent sympathetic white figures in the publishing industry in New York. Fauset was literary editor of The Crisis at the time, a position that put her in contact with most of the rising young African American talents in literature. Johnson added to the attractiveness of the event by proposing that Locke serve as the toastmaster. Locke's acceptance of this offer provided the dinner with a marquee name to advertise as its master of ceremonies.

The dinner, although a fairly modest event by the standards of New York's literary world, was a great success and brought Locke and Johnson into contact with Paul U. Kellogg, the editor of Survey Graphic, a popular magazine dealing with issues related to social work. The magazine was set to publish a "Mexico number" in May 1924, and Locke proposed a similar African American issue to Kellogg. This "Harlem number" would feature the work of many of the artists represented at the dinner, as well as a number of specially commissioned pieces and commentaries. Locke also nominated himself for the role of editor, a move that gave him a chance to put his own theories of elite-centered racial uplift into practice. Kellogg agreed, and the March 1925 issue of Survey Graphic came out with poems by Cullen, Hughes, McKay, Angelina Grimké, Jean Toomer, and Anne Spencer, as well as essays and stories by Du Bois, Rudolph Fisher, James Weldon Johnson, Albert Barnes, and others.

During the production of this issue of Survey Graphic, Locke and some of the other principals began to consider producing a book-length volume that would include much of the same material but with a wider scope. Albert Boni, who had recently started a publishing company along with his brother Charles, approached Kellogg in January 1925 and made preliminary inquiries about the possibility of republishing a large portion of the "Harlem number" in a book, of which Locke would again be the editor. Boni wished to produce a work that would expand the focus outward from Harlem to include more of the general cultural revitalization within African American society. Kellogg agreed to allow the Boni brothers and Locke to use much of the material from the "Harlem number"; Locke's work on The New Negro began almost as soon as he had finished the work for Survey Graphic.

The title of the anthology came from a phrase that had been in use to varying degrees since before the turn of the century. Booker T. Washington, Fannie Barrier Williams, and N. B. Wood had put together the collection A New Negro for a New Century in 1900 as a call for a general revision of the role of African Americans in the twentieth century. The "New Negro" movement predated the anthology that bore its name by at least ten years, and its membership took on a distinctly urban, middle-class, educated character. The racial pride that was associated with this group fell somewhere between the assimilationism of Washington and the outright separatism supported by more radical figures. Much like the talented tenth before it, the New Negro movement was represented by the poets, painters, politicians, businessmen, scholars, and musicians who made up the African American cultural elite. This movement intended to demonstrate the ways in which the rest of the race could find its own identity without being assimilated into the dominant white culture. The inherent pluralism of the New Negroes meshed well with Locke's personal philosophy about the nature of race, as well as his somewhat elitist ideas about the means by which African Americans could find a place for themselves.

As Locke transformed the Survey Graphic number into The New Negro, he reduced the three-part structure of the original into two sections: "The Negro Renaissance" and "The New Negro in a New World." This new division is illustrative of Locke's desire for his contributors to create art not for African Americans but as African Americans. Locke's essay "The New Negro" led off the first section, stating the manifesto of the New Negro movement in no uncertain terms:

The younger generation is vibrant with a new psychology; the new spirit is awake in the masses, and under the very eyes of the professional observers is transforming what has been a perennial problem into the progressive phases of contemporary Negro life. (47)

Two additional essays on African American art and literature follow Locke's introduction and provide a historical context for the creative material collected in the first part of the anthology, situating the Harlem Renaissance at the leading edge of a long line of creative art by blacks in America. The New Negroes involved in the artistic flourishing of the 1920s are thus rightly not seen as a spontaneous outburst of creativity but as the most recent high point in long, upward-moving cultural curve.

The anthology contains original fiction and poetry by many of the most celebrated artists of the Harlem Renaissance. Toomer contributed (albeit apparently without his consent) two of the short stories that made up his masterpiece Cane (1923): “Carma” and “Fern.” Also included are short stories by Fisher (“Vestiges: Harlem Sketches” and “The City of Refuge”), John Matheus (“Fog,” winner of Opportunity’s literary prize in 1925), Fauset (“The Gift of Laughter”), Hurston (“Spunk”), Bruce Nugent (“Sahdji”), and Eric Walrond (“The Palm Porch”), as well as a one-act folk play by Willis Richardson called “Compromise.” The poetry section features contributions (many of which appeared in the “Harlem number” as well) from Cullen, Toomer, James Weldon Johnson, Hughes, McKay, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Spencer, Grimké, and Lewis Alexander.

Locke contributed several essays to the anthology, including a piece on the development of traditional African American religious songs (“The Negro Spirituals”). Other prominent contributors of nonfiction included Montgomery Gregory (“The Drama of Negro Life”), Charles S. Johnson (“The New Frontage on American Life”), James Weldon Johnson (“Harlem: The Cultural Capital”), Kelly Miller (“Howard: The National Negro University”), E. Franklin Frazier (“Hampton-Tuskegee: Missioners of the Mass” and “Durham: Capital of the Black Middle Class”) and Elise Johnson McDougald (“The Task of Negro Womanhood”). The anthology closes with a strikingly revolutionary piece by Du Bois called “The Negro Mind Reaches Out.” Like Locke, Du Bois places racial issues before class issues, but he asserts that there is an important connection between the two, as befits his more socialistic political perspective. In sum, The New Negro showcased a broad range of African American artistic and intellectual achievement and proved to be an instant success and source of pride, not only for its contributors but for its readers as well.

Locke’s editing of The New Negro was not without controversy, however. His opinions about the unquestioned leadership role of the cultural elite were not universally accepted in the African American artistic community. Furthermore, his insistence on the pragmatic purpose of African American art and literature as a means of building racial consciousness ran contrary to the goals of writers like Cullen or Toomer who were seeking to break away from the limitations inherent in being labeled “black” writers. Criticism of Locke’s judgment in his editorial decisions has been expressed by those who claimed that Locke was actually furthering the goals of assimilation and by those who claimed that he was advancing a black nationalist position in his selection of material for the book. Hutchinson (1995) attempts to negotiate a solution to this seeming contradiction by outlining the various different forces with which Locke had to contend in putting the volume together, such as including both black and white audiences, considering questions of marketability and profitability, and—perhaps most difficult of all—finding a way to blend the many different ideologies of African American thought into a coherent whole. This last point is the one for which Locke is most frequently attacked, either for over-accentuating writers who agreed with his own racial philosophy or for excluding dissenting voices. Locke had significant and largely permanent fallings-out with Cullen, McKay, and Hurston in the decade following the publication of The New Negro.

Countee Cullen resented Locke’s insistence on writing predominantly for the purpose of culture building. Although Cullen deals with African themes and images in his poems, their form is derived more from the romanticism of English writers like Keats and Shelley than from the traditional folkloric forebears that Locke would have preferred. Cullen did make some attempts to follow Locke’s advice and experimented with primitive elements as much as (if not more than) any of the other major poets of the 1920s. However, to Cullen’s Anglophile poetic sensibility, this was simply too narrow a stricture for his artistic expression. Following a squabble about compensation for his poetic contributions to the “Harlem number,” Cullen largely broke away from Locke’s influence, although he still allowed Locke to use his work on occasion.

Claude McKay, on the other hand, was already politically and aesthetically at odds with Locke before 1925. He became enraged when Locke used his poetry without permission (or with unauthorized alterations) on several occasions, including in The New Negro. This led McKay to refuse categorically to allow Locke any further use of his poems in anthologies. When Locke charged that McKay was hurting the New Negro movement by this refusal, McKay angrily replied by letter that Locke was being tyrannical in his desire for aesthetic control over African American arts. Locke made a public reply of sorts in 1937, in an article for New Challenge entitled “Spiritual Truancy,” in which he accused McKay of being selfish in writing solely according to his personal tastes. The great schism between individual expression and communal responsibility that cleaved the Harlem Renaissance apart is clearly present in this exchange.

Portrait of Alain LeRoy Locke, 1943–1944, by Betsy Graves Reyneau (1888–1964); oil on canvas. (© National Portrait Gallery, Smithsonian Institution/Art Resource, N.Y.)

Locke had greatly assisted Zora Neale Hurston in the beginning of her career, both by including her work in The New Negro and by publicly extolling the virtues of some of her later writings. However, their relationship soured quickly after Locke’s negative review (oddly negative, given the work’s subject matter and somewhat folkloric tone) of her novel Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937). She subsequently referred to Locke, in a letter to James Weldon Johnson, as a “malicious, spiteful little snout” and an intellectual hypocrite. She eventually almost entirely disavowed Locke’s positive influence on her career, claiming that it was Charles S. Johnson who was responsible for her inclusion in The New Negro.

Although the ultimate cause of the disagreements between Locke and his onetime protégés is still open to question, Locke’s aestheticism was certainly at odds with the values of many members of this younger generation of African American writers. This conflict was felt very keenly by the younger generation of the Harlem Renaissance, many of whom pointedly departed from the classical scholasticism of Locke and experimented with more radical forms of literary and social endeavor in the decades to come.

One key figure in African American letters with whom Locke maintained a close (albeit occasionally antagonistic) relationship was Du Bois, even though the latter’s political stance was increasingly distant from that of Locke. Du Bois had criticized Locke’s belief in the power of art to effect political change. However, when Locke, by then chair of the philosophy department, was peremptorily fired from Howard in 1925, it was chiefly Du Bois who came to his defense. Du Bois petitioned Jesse Edward Moorland, one of the trustees of the university, on Locke’s behalf. His argument was predicated not on his friendship with Locke (which was lukewarm) but rather on an insistence that Locke, as one of the finest scholars in America, belonged at the best African American university in America. Locke was somewhat grudgingly reinstated two years later and remained at Howard until 1953.

Despite the growing antagonism toward Locke among some of the literati of Harlem, The New Negro received considerable acclaim and remains a seminal text of the period. It also led Locke to produce a number of other works that continued to aim at an expression of the New Negro aesthetic. Two years after The New Negro was published, he produced two separate collections of African American literature—Four Negro Poets (1927) and Plays of Negro Life: A Sourcebook of Native American Drama (1927)—which he coedited with Montgomery Gregory. Four Negro Poets, a thirty-two-page chapbook, includes poems by Cullen, Hughes, Toomer, and McKay, and an introductory essay by Locke entitled “The Poetry of Negro Life.” Plays of Negro Life is a collection of twenty “plays for the Negro theatre” by both black and white writers. While neither work breaks much new ground, both provide elaboration on means of expressing the artistic ideals associated with The New Negro.

As a bibliographic companion to these two pieces, Locke published A Decade of Negro Self-Expression (1928). This work, produced while he was a visiting professor at Fisk University in Nashville, consists mainly of an annotated list of books written by African Americans from the outbreak of World War I through the mid-1920s. Locke also began writing what would become a twenty-four-year series of annual publications in which he reviewed the preceding year's books by and about African Americans. From 1929 through 1943, these reviews appeared in Opportunity; thereafter, until 1952, they were published in Phylon, a leading African American scholarly journal founded by Du Bois in 1940. These pieces represent Locke's greatest contribution to scholarship following the height of the Harlem Renaissance, bringing together his insightful and often opinionated annotations and a comprehensive catalog of information that greatly facilitated the study of African American history and culture.

Biography

Alain LeRoy Locke was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 13 September 1885. He studied at Ethical Culture and at Central High School in Philadelphia; Philadelphia School of Pedagogy, 1902–1904; Harvard University (A.B., 1907; Ph.D., 1918); Oxford University, 1907–1910; and the University of Berlin, 1910–1911. He was an assistant professor of philosophy and English at Howard University, in Washington, D.C., 1912–1916; a professor, 1916–1953; and chair of the philosophy department, 1921–1953. He founded the literary magazine Stylus and the Stylus Society at Howard, 1916. Locke was a visiting professor, Fisk University, Nashville, 1927–1928; cofounder of Associates for Negro Folk Education, 1935; Inter-American Exchange professor, Université de Port-au-Prince, Haiti, 1943–1944; visiting professor, University of Wisconsin–Madison, 1945–1946; president of the American Association for Adult Education, 1946–1947; visiting professor, New School for Social Research, New York, 1947; visiting professor, City College of New York, 1948. His awards included a Rhodes scholarship, 1907; and an honorary doctorate from Howard University, 1953. Locke died in New York City on 10 June 1954.

DEREK MAUS

See also Civic Club Dinner, 1924; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Howard University; New Negro; New Negro

Movement; New Negro, The; Opportunity; Stylus; Survey Graphic; Talented Tenth; specific individuals

Selected Works

- "Oxford Contrasts." Independent. (Reprint, "A Negro Student at Oxford." Colored American Magazine, 1909.)
- Race Contacts and Inter-Racial Relations: A Study in the Theory and Practice of Race*. 1916. (Reprint, Race Contacts and Interracial Relations: Lectures on the Theory and Practice of Race, ed. and intro. Jeffrey C. Stewart. 1992.)
- The New Negro: An Interpretation*. 1925. (As editor; reprints, 1968, 1970, 1992.)
- Four Negro Poets*. c. 1927. (As editor.)
- Plays of Negro Life: A Source-Book of Native American Drama*. 1927. (As compiler and editor, with Montgomery Gregory; reprint, 1970.)
- A Decade of Negro Self-Expression*. 1928. (As editor.)
- The Negro in America*. 1933.
- The Negro and his Music*. 1936. (Reprint, 1969.)
- Negro Art: Past and Present*. 1936.
- "Spiritual Truancy." New Challenge, 1937.
- The Negro in Art: A Pictorial Record of the Negro Artist and of the Negro Theme in Art*. 1940. (As editor and annotator; reprints, 1969, 1971.)
- When Peoples Meet: A Study in Race and Culture Contacts*. 1942. (As editor, with Bernhard J. Stern; rev. ed., 1946.)
- World View on Race and Democracy: A Study Guide in Human Group Relations*. 1943. (As compiler and annotator.)
- The Negro in American Culture*, ed. Margaret Just Butcher. 1957. (Based on materials left by Locke.)
- The Critical Temper of Alain Locke: A Selection of His Essays on Art and Culture*, ed. Jeffrey C. Stewart. 1983.
- The Philosophy of Alain Locke: Harlem Renaissance and Beyond*, ed. Leonard Harris. 1989.

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A., Jr. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Linnemann, Russell J., ed. Alain Locke: Reflections on a Modern Renaissance Man. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.

- Loughery, John. The Other Side of Silence: Men's Lives and Gay Identities—A Twentieth-Century History. New York: Holt, 1998.
- Posnock, Ross. Color and Culture: Black Writers and the Making of the Modern Intellectual. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Singh, Amritjit. The Novels of the Harlem Renaissance: Twelve Black Writers, 1923–1933. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1975.
- Tidwell, John Edgar, and John Wright. "Alain Locke: A Comprehensive Bibliography of His Published Writings." Callaloo, 4, February–October 1981.
- Washington, Johnny. Alain Locke and Philosophy: A Quest for Cultural Pluralism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1986.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1996.

Loggins, Vernon

For his doctoral work at Columbia University, Loggins studied African American literature written before the twentieth century, producing the first serious scholarly analysis of this literature. In 1931, Columbia University Press published the dissertation as a book, The Negro Author: His Development in America to 1900. The book was and is significant because it presented the literature as worthy of serious study, and because Loggins included virtually all the major and minor African American authors known at the time. In his research, he relied heavily on the Arthur A. Schomburg collection of the New York Public Library, and on suggestions made by Charles S. Johnson, James Weldon Johnson, and others. Loggins's analysis is frequently marked with the racial stereotyping common to the period, as when he praises the "African temperament," the "mystic Negro mind," or the "primitive mind" of various writers. Examining Phillis Wheatley, he finds her poems uninteresting but is amazed by the fact that a slave had composed poetry at all.

Works produced during the late nineteenth century by W. E. B. Du Bois and Charles W. Chesnutt, two important figures in the Harlem Renaissance, are analyzed in The Negro Author. Additionally, Loggins uses a quotation from Countee Cullen to support his claim that "it is unfair criticism to expect too much" of black poets like Paul Laurence Dunbar, because of the disadvantages they faced.

In 1937, Loggins published another critical work, I Hear America . . . : Literature in the United States since 1900. In this volume, Loggins writes approvingly of Julia Peterkin and Paul Green, two white southern writers who created sympathetic black characters, but he does not include any African Americans who were among the important writers of the first third of the twentieth century. Later in his career, Loggins published other books of literary criticism, including studies of the works of Nathaniel Hawthorne and William Shakespeare.

Biography

Vernon Loggins was born on 10 January 1893, in Hempstead, Texas. He studied at the University of Texas (A.M., 1917), University of Chicago (A.M., 1917), and Columbia University (Ph.D., 1931), and additionally at New York University, the University of Montpelier, and the Sorbonne. He taught at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis (1917–1918); Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn (1919–1920); New York University, New York City (1920–1925); and Columbia University (1925–1960). Loggins was a scholar of American literature and the author of books, short stories, reviews, essays, and poems (1924–1968). He was a member of the Poetry Society of America and the International Institute of Arts and Letters. Loggins died on 3 October 1968 in New York City.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Green, Paul; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Peterkin, Julia Mood

Selected Works

- The Negro Author: His Development in America to 1900*. 1931.
- I Hear America . . . : Literature in the United States since 1900*. 1937.

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A., Jr. The Journey Back: Issues in Black Literature and Criticism. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1980.

- Burke, William Jeremiah. American Authors and Books, 1640 to the Present Day. New York: Crown, 1972.
- Ethridge, James M., et al., eds. Contemporary Authors, 1st rev., Vols. 5–8. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1963.
- Jackson, Blyden. The Waiting Years: Essays on American Negro Literature. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1976.
- Who Was Who among English and European Authors, 1931–1949*. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1978.
- Who Was Who among North American Authors, 1921–1939*. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1976.

Lovinggood, Penman

Penman Lovinggood Sr.—an author, tenor, and composer—was born in Texas in 1895. During the first decades of the twentieth century he was active in New York City as a church soloist, concert tenor, music columnist, and music teacher.

In 1921, in Brooklyn, he published a slender volume, Famous Modern Negro Musicians: brief essays on nineteen contemporary figures. His criteria for selection were that “these here included are famous, and likewise Modern Musicians.” Eileen Southern, in her introduction to a reprint edition (1978), notes that this was “the first survey of black music since the epochal publication in 1878 of James Monroe Trotter’s Music and Some Highly Musical People, and there was not to be another study until 1934, the publication date of Maude Cuney-Hare’s Negro Musicians and Their Music.” Lovinggood’s work is also noteworthy because his approach is in accordance with the ideas of W. E. B. Du Bois and Alain Locke regarding the New Negro and the advancement of the race—ideas that encouraged “classical” performance and composition rather than the blues and jazz genres of Harlem.

Lovinggood tended to omit biographical information but assessed the musicians in terms of their contribution to the race. Following are some examples. Samuel Coleridge Taylor: “He burned his vital energy up in successive musical creations. He stands with the Masters, and is the greatest Negro Musician.” Henry T. Burleigh: “America’s greatest Art-Song writer, and the American Negro’s foremost composer. His work with the Negro Spiritual has been a devoted and masterful achievement . . . [conveying] the full beauty of the music of his own people.” R. Nathaniel Dett: the “most characteristically racial composer.” J. Rosamond Johnson: “His moving style is always graceful and his insight into the weaving of harmonies . . . is indeed illuminating.” (Johnson was Lovinggood’s vocal teacher, and later Lovinggood was a member of Johnson’s vocal quartet.) Will Marian Cook (as a violinist): “One forgets the structure, form and style of the piece and is conscious only of the delight in the pure, unalloyed movement.” Carl R. Diton: “Creative effort reveals more and more the pure gold of the native musical mine, and well-spring.” Roland W. Hayes: “Hailed as the race’s greatest singer.” Marian Anderson: “Miss Anderson possesses the most perfect vocal organ in itself in the race.” Clarence Cameron White (as a violinist): “Mr. White is recognized by the musical people of both races, as one of the race’s greatest musicians.”

In November 1925 Lovinggood made his own musical debut at Town Hall; in October 1927 he appeared at Steinway Hall. A reviewer in the New York Times (23 October 1927) said of the latter performance that Lovinggood had “revealed a smooth, velvety tone, which was well produced and of fair range and volume. His performance was especially enjoyable in the spirituals, which he imbued with true expressiveness and simplicity.” During the 1930s Lovinggood performed with J. Rosamond Johnson’s quartet and also with W. C. Handy’s orchestra.

In 1936 Lovinggood’s opera Menlelek was performed by the American Negro Opera Association; the cast included Carl Diton. In 1942 Lovinggood organized the Drum and Bugle Corps in Englewood, New Jersey.

Biography

Penman Lovinggood Sr. was born 25 December 1895 in Austin Texas. He studied at Samuel Houston College in Austin (which his father had founded), and later with William Happich in Philadelphia and with J. Rosamond Johnson in New York City. Lovinggood was active in New York during the first decades of the twentieth century as a church soloist, concert tenor, music columnist, and music teacher. He published Famous Modern Negro Musicians in 1921. He made his debut at Town Hall in November 1925; in October 1927 he gave a well-received performance at Steinway Hall. In 1936 his opera Menlelek was performed by the American Negro Opera Association. Lovinggood received the Wanamaker prize for composition and the Griffith Music Foundation’s silver-bronze medal. In 1945 he settled in Compton, California, and established a publishing firm, Lovinggood Company (1947–1963).

At this time he changed the spelling of his name and added the designation "Sr." Lovinggood died in Compton on 4 August 1993.

JOHN GALM

See also Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Cook, Will Marion; Dett, Robert Nathaniel; Handy, W. C.; Hayes, Roland; Johnson, John Rosamond; White, Clarence Cameron

Selected Works

Evangeline and Gabriel. (Opera.)

Famous Modern Negro Musicians. Press Forum, 1921. (See also New York: Da Capo, 1978, with foreword by Eileen Southern.)

"I Am Sure, My Love." (For voice with piano accompaniment; words by Zella.)

Menlelek. 1936. (Opera.)

Further Reading

Anderson, E. Ruth. Contemporary American Composers: A Biographical Dictionary. 1976.

Carter, Madison. An Annotated Catalogue of Composers of African Ancestry. 1986.

Floyd, Samuel A., and Martha Reisser. Black Music in the United States: An Annotated Bibliography. 1983.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. 1984.

Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. 1982.

Lowe, James

James B. Lowe's acting career included three Hollywood productions during the 1920s, but he is best known for having played the leading role in Universal Studios' 1927 film adaptation of Uncle Tom's Cabin, directed by Harry Pollard. Other than Paul Robeson, Lowe was the only African American actor to play the lead in a Hollywood film with white actors in the lesser roles. Lowe was also the first black actor to be ballyhooed by his studio. Despite these credits, though, he is mainly associated with the racist stereotype of the "Tom." The Tom had originated earlier than the movies—in popular entertainments of the nineteenth century—but it took on startling staying power on film.

Bogle (1998) describes the Tom as a docile male character with a nearly religious faith in the whites who abuse him; and Noble observes that "the term 'Uncle Tom' has in a hundred years come to mean all that is considered most contemptible in Negro mentality" (1948, 32). As portrayed by Lowe, Uncle Tom is doggedly devoted to Little Eva, his white master's daughter, and thus is a conventional character, but Lowe's own charisma added a new dimension to the role.

An effusive press release about Uncle Tom's Cabin read as follows:

James B. Lowe has made history. A history that reflects only credit to the Negro race, not only because he has given the "Uncle Tom" character a new slant, but because of his exemplary conduct with the Universal company. They look upon Lowe at the Universal Studio as a living black god. . . . Of the directors, critics, artists, and actors who have seen James Lowe work in the studio there are none who will not say he is the most suited of all men for the part of "Tom." Those who are religious say that a heavenly power brought him to Universal and all predict a most marvelous future and worldwide reputation for James B. Lowe. (quoted in Bogle)

Bogle argues, however, that "Tom still came off as a genial dandy, furnished with new color but no new sentiments." He adds, though, "Yet to Lowe's credit, he did his tommying with such an arresting effectiveness that he was sent to England on a promotional tour" (6). Such a tour was an entirely novel practice on the studio's part.

Lowe made no further films, but his collaboration with Universal and Pollard remains the best remembered of half a dozen film versions of Uncle Tom's Cabin. (In one of these, made twelve years before, Harry Pollard himself had played the role of Tom in blackface.)

Biography

James B. Lowe was born 12 October 1879 in Georgia. His performances include Tom in Uncle Tom's Cabin (1927), Rastus in Blue Blazes (1926), and Cook in The Demon Rider (1925). Lowe died on 19 March 1963 in Los Angeles, California.

TERRI FRANCIS

See also Film: Actors; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers

Further Reading

- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films, 3rd ed. New York: Continuum, 1998, pp. 4–7.
- Bowser, Pearl, et al., eds. Oscar Micheaux and His Circle: African-American Filmmaking and Race Cinema of the Silent Era. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Diawara, Manthia, ed. Black American Cinema. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Ellison, Ralph. Shadow and Act. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, ed. Early Cinema: Space/Frame/Narrative. London: British Film Institute, 1990.
- Everett, Anna. Returning the Gaze: A Genealogy of Black Film Criticism, 1909–1949. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2001.
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984.
- Noble, Peter. The Negro in Silent Films. London: Knapp, Drewett, 1948.
- Null, Gary. Black Hollywood: The Negro in Motion Pictures. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1975.
- Stewart, Jacqueline. "Migrating to the Movies: The Emergence of Black Urban Film Culture." Dissertation, University of Chicago, 2000. (See also Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI, 2000.)

Lulu Belle

Lulu Belle (1926) is a play by Charles MacArthur (1895–1956) and Edward Sheldon (1886–1946). MacArthur was a highly successful newspaper columnist before becoming a playwright; in later life, he edited the magazine Theatre Arts. His best-known plays were The Front Page (1928) and Twentieth Century (1932), both written in collaboration with Ben Hecht. Lulu Belle was MacArthur's first play; he completed it with the assistance of Edward Sheldon, an established and influential dramatist. Sheldon was the author of The Nigger (1909), a dramatic portrait of a white southern politician who rises to the governorship of his state and then faces a crisis when he learns that he is one-eighth black.

Lulu Belle is about a character who has much in common with Carmen in Bizet's opera. The first of the play's four acts is set in San Juan Hill, near Fifty-ninth Street in Manhattan; this was the major black community before the development of Harlem. Lulu Belle is a blues singer, dancer, and vamp who seduces George Randall, an honest barber, and takes him away from his wife and children. Throughout the play Lulu Belle has premonitions of death, but she refuses to change the course she has set for herself. In the second act, set in a furnished room in Harlem that she now shares with George, she drugs and robs a male victim and forces George to help her conceal the crime. By the third act, bored with George's jealousy, Lulu Belle jilts him in a Harlem nightclub. In rapid succession, George finds out that his son is dead; George refuses to leave Lulu Belle even though she no longer wants him; Lulu Belle has George beaten by another of her boyfriends, a boxer; George stabs the boxer; Lulu Belle turns George over to the police; and Lulu Belle leaves both George and the boxer for a French vicomte who has been slumming in the club. The last act is set in Paris, five years later. George, who has been released from prison, finds Lulu Belle and, in a jealous rage, kills her. As the curtain falls, he cradles her in his arms.

Lulu Belle opened on 9 February 1926; it was produced and directed, with spectacularly realistic scenery, by the legendary David Belasco at the theater that bore his name. The play had more than fifty speaking parts, and the cast consisted of 100 African American and fifteen white actors. This use of an integrated cast was viewed as a progressive step, but the leading roles were filled by two white performers in blackface: Lenore Ulric playing Lulu Belle and Henry Hull playing George. Evelyn Preer, a veteran of the Lafayette Players, had the role of Ruby Lee, Lulu Belle's best friend.

Brooks Atkinson, the critic for the New York Times, was most impressed by the acting, dancing, and scenery: "Lulu Belle is splendid showmanship; but it retains few of the elements of drama" (10 February 1926, 20). James Weldon Johnson also admired the acting, considering Hull's makeup and dialect "beyond detection" (1977, 205). Though he considered the play no more than "sensational melodrama," he thought that it was significant because of the realistically staged scenes of black life in New York and the mixed cast. Lulu Belle was a major success in its time, running for 461 performances.

FREDA SCOTT GILES

See also Johnson, James Weldon; Lafayette Players; Preer, Evelyn; San Juan Hill

Further Reading

- Archer, Leonard C. Black Images in the American Theatre. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Pageant-Poseidon, 1973.
- Bond, Frederick W. The Negro and the Drama. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1940.
- Dorlag, Arthur, and John Irvine, eds. The Stage Works of Charles MacArthur. Tallahassee: Florida State University Foundation, 1974.
- Hecht, Ben. Charlie: The Improbable Life and Times of Charles MacArthur. New York: Harper, 1957.
- Isaacs, Edith J. R. The Negro in the American Theatre. New York: Theatre Arts, 1947.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Atheneum, 1977. (Originally published 1930.)
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984.
- Mantle, Burns. The Best Plays of 1926–1927. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1928.

Lyles, Aubrey

Through his partnership with Flournoy Miller, Aubrey Lyles was a significant influence in black comedy. Lyles was born in Jackson, Tennessee, in 1883. He attended Fisk University as a medical student in the early 1900s. When tiny Lyles faced tall Flournoy Miller in a boxing bout, they hammed it up to the delight of their fellow students. This led to their theatrical partnership. In 1906 Lyles and Miller became resident playwrights and performers for the innovative Pekin Stock Company in Chicago.

They wrote a succession of light entertainments for the Pekin, including The Mayor of Dixie (1906), The Husband (1907), Doctor Knight (1908), and The Colored Aristocrats (1909)—their first starring vehicle. Their characters Steve Jenkins (Miller) and Sam Peck (Lyles) became their stage personae thereafter. Lyles and Miller's comedy style broke from the tradition of Bert Williams and George Walker, which featured a comedian and a straight man with singing and dancing. Miller and Lyles, by contrast, were equal partners in straight comedy.

Following their successes at the Pekin, they toured on vaudeville circuits in the midwest. Their appearances in New York earned them a tour of the east coast on the prestigious Keith circuit. The conventions of the time decreed that they perform in blackface, but their style was far from the stereotypes of minstrelsy. In addition to their famous slapstick boxing, they introduced several much-imitated routines. These included “mutilatin’ the language” (“You gotta be repaired for that”) and “indefinite talk,” in which they anticipated the completion of each other’s sentences.

In 1915 they played successfully in the well-known Charlot’s Revue in England. On their return they starred in Darkydom, which had an impressive black cast including Abbie Mitchell. After more years in vaudeville, they collaborated (in 1921) with the composer-lyricists Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake on a musical about a mayoral contest in the mythical town of Jimtown (based on the earlier Mayor of Dixie). The result was Shuffle Along, which many believe launched the Harlem Renaissance.

Shuffle Along brought fame and fortune, but Lyles was shy (in contrast to his boastful stage persona). He compensated by using his wealth to give lavish parties. He kept a menagerie of exotic animals and owned a Rolls Royce whose luxurious appointments were legendary in Harlem. After Shuffle Along closed in 1923, Miller and Lyles created another great black show of the 1920s, Runnin’ Wild, and other similar shows (Rang Tang, Keep Shufflin’) but never managed to re-create the magic of Shuffle Along. Between 1922 and 1925, Miller and Lyles also made about a dozen 78-rpm recordings on the OKEH label.

Lyles was angered by the producers of the radio series Amos ‘n’ Andy, who, he believed, had plagiarized his material; and by Carl Van Vechten, who had accused him of stereotyping. Time magazine reported Lyles’s angry outburst against Van Vechten at a welcome-home gathering for Florence Mills in 1927.

In 1929 Lyles split from Miller. Influenced by Marcus Garvey’s ideas, he spent a year in Africa. On his return, his solo production Runnin’ de Town flopped. He then teamed with Miller again. They made two short talkies for RKO and a brief unsuccessful radio series on CBS. Their unconventional musical drama Sugar Hill received mixed reviews.

While working on a revival, Shuffle Along of 1933, Lyles underwent surgery for gastric ulcers. During his convalescence in New York, he died of preexisting pulmonary tuberculosis on 28 July 1932.

Biography

Aubrey Lyles was born in Jackson, Tennessee, in 1883. He studied at Fisk University. He was a resident playwright at the Pekin Theater Stock Company (1906–1909), with his partner, Flournoy Miller. Lyles and Miller then toured in vaudeville, performed in revues and musicals, and in 1921 collaborated on Shuffle Along. In 1929 Lyles split from Miller; they later collaborated again, though not as successfully as before. Lyles died in New York on 28 July 1932.

Lyles, Aubrey

BILL EGAN

See also Blake, Eubie; Miller, Flournoy; Mills, Florence; Mitchell, Abbie; Musical Theater; Runnin' Wild; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble; Van Vechten, Carl; Vaudeville

Theatrical Productions and Performances

- 1906: The Man from 'Bam.
- 1907: The Mayor of Dixie; The Oyster Man; The Husband.
- 1908: Doctor Knight; The Colored Aristocrats.
- 1912: The Charity Girl.
- 1913: The Cabaret.
- 1915: Charlot's Revue (London); Darkydom.
- 1918: Who's Stealin'.
- 1919: Upstairs and Down Below.
- 1920: Tunes and Funnies of 1920.
- 1921: Shuffle Along.
- 1922: Step On It; The Flat Below.
- 1923: Runnin' Wild.
- 1924: Going White; Honey; Negro Nuances; Struttin' Along Liza; Struttin' Time; Backbiters.
- 1927: Rang Tang.
- 1928: Keep Shufflin'.
- 1930: Runnin' de Town.
- 1931: Lazy Rhythm; Sugar Hill.

Films

- 1929: Harlem Knights; Harlem Mania.

Further Reading

- "Death of Aubrey Lyles Shatters Hope of 'Shuffle Along' Revival." Afro-American, 6, August 1932, p. 16.
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993a, p. 162.
- . A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- . Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001, p. 184.

- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow Press, 1980, pp. 111–114, 115–117.
- Slide, Anthony. The Encyclopaedia of Vaudeville. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1994, p. 345.
- Watkins, Mel. On the Real Side: Laughing, Lying, and Signifying. New York: Touchstone–Simon and Schuster, 1995.
- Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. New York: Da Capo, 1991.

Lynching

Lynching is a means of social control in which a mob serves as prosecutor, jury, judge, and executioner. The phrase "lynch law" derives from the unofficial court of Charles Lynch, a planter in Virginia who tried Tory loyalists during the Revolutionary War. Owing to a lack of a standardized judicial system, lynch law was a common practice in the rapidly expanding United States. After the Civil War, the lynching of African Americans in particular served as a crucial means of maintaining white supremacy. Because justifications for lynching and the lynching ritual itself constituted a particularly sexualized attack on black bodies, lynching during the Harlem Renaissance is perhaps most usefully approached in both psychosexual and socioeconomic terms.

History

The lynching of African Americans peaked after radical Reconstruction, as southern whites worked

Two men are lynched in Marion, Indiana, 9 August 1930.

(© Bettmann/Corbis.)

to prevent blacks from participating in the economy and in politics. The withdrawal of northern troops in 1877 paved the way for the systematic economic, social, and political disenfranchisement of the newly emancipated slaves. Lynching functioned as the extralegal counterpart to Jim Crow and to the “separate but equal” legal system. Though the rate of lynching had decreased significantly by the 1920s, 477 African Americans were lynched between 1919 and 1930, according to statistics compiled by the Tuskegee Institute.

In this era, lynching typically occurred in a rural or semirural community in a southern or border state. The mob, composed largely of working-class whites, usually assembled through word of mouth. Sometimes, however, a lynching was advertised in advance in a newspaper or broadside. Legal authorities generally overlooked the lynching. The victim was first physically brutalized—shot, castrated, or otherwise dismembered—then often set on fire and hanged in public view. Before or after death, the victim might be dragged through the white and black sections of town. Afterward, participants salvaged “souvenirs” such as body parts, bone, hair, and scraps of clothing. For some whites, a lynching was a spectacle that served as a ritualized celebration of racial supremacy; and many black communities were terrorized by the constant threat of lynching. In this way, lynching maintained the institutionalized racial and economic hierarchies of Jim Crow.

Explanations

There is no single explanation for lynching. At the time a lynching took place, the reason—that is, the accusation involved—might range from a criminal act to a petty infraction of the social code. Relatively recent scholarship has offered economic and psychosexual explanations. Tolney and Beck (1995) correlate lynching in the South with vacillations in the cotton market. Although their conclusions cannot be applied universally, because the lynching rate decreased as terrorized laborers fled north, their findings support theories linking the “great migration” to the threat of lynching. The threefold rise in lynching that occurred after the stock market crash of 1929 also suggests a link between this form of violence and economic crises.

A very common reason, or pretext, for lynching was an accusation of rape. Although Raper (1933) and Franklin (1967) found that only one-third of all male victims of lynching had been accused of sexual assault, the influence of this rationale indicates a link between psychosexual forces and socioeconomic explanations. The pervasive stereotype of the sexually uncontrollable black man (as opposed to the “civilized” white gentleman) was offered to justify the disenfranchisement and oppression of blacks. The presumed object of the black male’s sexual desire, the chaste white woman, symbolized wealth and privilege. An accusation of interracial rape, then, was a call for white men to assert their “natural” rights of social, economic, and political domination over blacks and over white women. Smith (1990) argues that a “homosocial triangle” defined the mythology of rape and lynching and obscured the rape of black women. Just as white and black men were opposed with regard to violence and sexuality, so were white and black women. If black women, like black men, were thought naturally promiscuous, the rape of a black woman could not be considered a crime. The mythology of interracial rape and lynching, then, served an ideological function in terms of the economic and social competition between the races. The Scottsboro case of 1931 seems to illustrate this complex of forces.

Representations

In the creative art of the Harlem Renaissance, scenes of lynchings expressed tension regarding differences of gender, class, geography, and race. For instance, in Jean Toomer’s Cane (1923) the threat of lynching emasculates and silences the black male artist who is attempting to voice racial pride—one quality that, according to Alain Locke, characterizes the New Negro (1925, 11). Toomer dramatizes this situation through Kabnis’s hysterical fear of whites, the lynching of Mame Lamkins and her unborn child, the poem “Portrait in Georgia,” and the story “Blood-Burning Moon.”

Similarly, in James Weldon Johnson’s Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912), a lynching causes the protagonist to abandon the South and to vow “to voice the joys and sorrows, the hopes and ambitions, of the American Negro” (147–148). For the ex-colored man, the lynching both reinforces and dissolves the color line, as fear propels him to flee northward and pass as a white man. Southern male characters in Richard Wright’s Uncle Tom’s Children (1938) are also impelled northward by the threat of lynching. In these stories, Wright explores how lynching furthers class exploitation, revealing how stereotypes of black masculinity and white femininity frustrate the possibility of interracial labor solidarity. Wright's influential Native Son (1940) also powerfully indicts this system.

The visual artists Jacob Lawrence and Aaron Douglas produced notable representations of lynching. In panel 15 of Lawrence's series Migration of the Negro, a figure is shown grieving under an empty noose. The caption, "It was found that where there had been a lynching, the people who were reluctant to leave at first left immediately after this," links the great migration to lynching. Lawrence does not show either the victim's body or the lynch mob; this seems to suggest his condemnation of the mob and the crowd of spectators, since he refuses to validate their point of view. Aaron Douglas contrasts a lynching with working and dancing figures in panel 3 of his famous mural Aspects of Negro Life. The juxtaposition of life and death in this panel, which has the title The Idyll of the Deep South, suggests the strength and resilience of African Americans.

Unlike Lawrence, other artists made a point of representing the brutal spectacle itself. Billie Holiday's song "Strange Fruit" (a setting of a poem by Lewis Allen), and Claude McKay's sonnet "The Lynching," use vivid representations to incite protest. Two works concerned with visual convention are Langston Hughes's "Christ in Alabama" (about the Scottsboro boys) and Countee Cullen's "Black Christ"; both use the image of crucifixion to point out Christians' racism.

Dramas about lynching offer another perspective. These plays arose from a convergence of the "little theater" movement and the Harlem Renaissance; they include works by Georgia Douglas Johnson, Alice Dunbar Nelson, and Angelina Weld Grimké (among others) and suggest one kind of tension characterizing Locke's aesthetics of the New Negro. Using aspects of the folk tradition such as call and response, the plays emphasize Negroes' "difference" in the context of demands for equal treatment under American law. In the literature of the Harlem Renaissance—and in fact Harris (1984) argues that this is true of African American literature in general—representations of lynching serve as symbols of shared experience testifying to black people's protest, resistance, and survival.

SONDRA GUTTMAN

See also Antilynching Crusade; Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Cane; Civil Rights and Law; Cullen, Countee; Douglas, Aaron; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Holiday, Billie; Hughes, Langston; Jim Crow; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; Lawrence, Jacob; Lynching: Silent Protest Parade; McKay, Claude; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Nelson, Alice Dunbar; Racial Violence: Riots and Lynching; Scottsboro; Toomer, Jean; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

- Allen, James, et al. Without Sanctuary: Lynching Photography in America. Santa Fe, N.M.: Twin Palms, 2000.
- Best, Stephen Michael. "'Stand by Your Man': Richard Wright, Lynch Pedagogy, and Rethinking Black Male Agency." In Representing Black Men, ed. Marcellus Blount and George Cunningham. New York: Routledge, 1995.
- Franklin, John Hope. From Slavery to Freedom: A History of Negro Americans. New York: Knopf, 1967. (See also 8th ed., 2000.)
- Harris, Trudier. Exorcising Blackness: Historical and Literary Lynching and Burning Rituals. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- Locke, Alain. "The New Negro." In The New Negro: An Interpretation, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925. (See also New York: Scribner, 1997.)
- Moses, Norton H., comp. Lynching and Vigilantism in the United States: An Annotated Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.
- National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Staff. Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918. New York: NAACP, 1919. (See also New York: Arno, 1969.)
- Perkins, Kathy A., and Judith L. Stephens, eds. Strange Fruit: Plays on Lynching by American Women. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Raper, Arthur. The Tragedy of Lynching. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1933.
- Smith, Valerie. "Split Affinities: The Case of Interracial Rape." In Conflicts in Feminism, ed. Marianne Hirsch and Evelyn Fox Keller. New York: Routledge, 1990.
- Stephens, Judith L. "Racial Violence and Representation: Performance Strategies in Lynching Plays of the 1920s." African American Review, 33(4), 1999.
- Tolney, Stewart E., and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence: An Analysis of Southern Lynchings, 1882–1930. Carbondale and Edwardsville: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

- Toomer, Jean. Cane. New York: Liveright, 1923. (Reprint, 1993.)
- White, Walter. Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch. Ayer, 1978. (Originally published 1929.)
- Wright, Richard. Native Son. New York: Harper and Row, 1940. (See also New York: HarperPerennial, 1993a.)
- . Uncle Tom's Children. New York: World, 1938. (See also New York: HarperPerennial, 1993b.)

Lynching: Silent Protest Parade

The first massive African American protest in American history took place when some 8,000 to 10,000 African Americans marched down Fifth Avenue in New York City on 28 July 1917 in a “parade of silent protest against acts of discrimination and oppression” (“Negroes in Protest March” 1917, 12). The silent protest parade—which had been organized by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), church officials, and civic leaders shortly after riots broke out in East St. Louis—was a dramatic appeal to President Wilson to address lynching, disenfranchisement, Jim Crow, and mob violence. Because the march “turned protest into something like organized and conspicuous theater” Douglas contends that the silent protest parade marks the true beginning of the Harlem Renaissance (1995, 328).

The paraders assembled at Fifty-ninth Street and Fifth Avenue and marched thirty-six blocks downtown to Madison Square Park. They were led by about 800 children, some no older than six, dressed entirely in white. Following the children were white-clad women, then rows of men dressed in black. The marchers walked wordlessly to the sound of muffled drumbeats. Despite their silence, their concerns were articulated on neatly stenciled banners and signs.

According to news reports, the march drew attention, respect, and support from whites and blacks alike. The mayor of New York City, John Purroy Mitchel, had diverted traffic and established a protective police presence; an estimated 20,000 spectators, some in tears, were as silent as the marchers. One newspaper reported that “the parade in all respects was one of the most quiet and orderly demonstrations ever witnessed on Fifth Avenue” (“Negroes in Protest March,” 12).

Although the police ordered the removal of one banner, which depicted a black woman kneeling before President Wilson and begging him to secure democracy in America before taking it abroad, they had no objection to the other banners and placards, some of which read:

“Thou shalt not kill.”

“America has lynched without trial 2,867 Negroes in thirty-one years and not a single murderer has suffered.”

“We have fought for the liberty of white Americans in six wars; our reward is East St. Louis.”

“Memphis and Waco—Centers of American Culture?”

“Taxation without representation is tyranny.”

“We are maligned as lazy and murdered where we work.”

“Your hands are full of blood.”

“Mother, do lynchers go to heaven?”

During the parade, black Boy Scouts handed out leaflets which posed the question, “Why Do We March?” and answered: “We march because we deem it a crime to be silent in the face of such barbaric acts. . . . We march in memory of our butchered dead, the massacre of honest toilers who were removing the reproach of the laziness and thriftlessness hurled at the entire race” (Du Bois 1917, 241).

The riots in East St. Louis, to which some of these statements were referring, had taken place in May and July and had destroyed at least $400,000 worth of property, driven 6,000 African Americans out of their homes, and resulted in the death of at least forty African Americans. In an extensively researched article for The Crisis, W. E. B. Du Bois and a white social worker, Martha Gruening (1917), attributed the riots to the hostility of white union workers toward black strikebreakers. The strike involved had ended in May, but white laborers in the packing industry, troubled by the mass migration of African Americans from the South, had remained wary. Tension was exacerbated by union leaders who continued to call for “drastic action” against the “influx of undesirable negroes” (phrasing that appeared in a letter from Edward F. Mason, reprinted as a facsimile in The Crisis, 1917, 221). On 2 July 1917 drastic action was taken. Rioting ensued when a group of white policemen, who may have been mistaken for gun-wielding joy-riders, drove into a black neighborhood and were fired on by the residents. The next morning, the city erupted. Eyewitnesses likened the mob to a manhunt, describing how rioters sought out blacks to beat, mutilate, stab, shoot, hang, and burn.

Stunned by the events in East St. Louis, leaders of the Harlem branch of the NAACP met to discuss a method of protest. The field secretary James Weldon Johnson, recalling an idea developed years before by Oswald Garrison Villard, suggested a silent protest parade. In order to reach all African American citizens of New York, Johnson formed a parade committee that included pastors from several leading churches and influential members of the black community.

Johnson also hoped that the march would draw attention to the NAACP's antilynching crusade. The crusade was spurred on by an article that appeared in The Crisis in 1916, about a mob that had attacked a mentally retarded adolescent in a courtroom in Waco; Johnson himself investigated the lynching of an accused ax-murderer who was burned alive in Memphis. In April 1917, The Crisis featured a letter from the NAACP to Woodrow Wilson requesting that in his inaugural address he "say something against the barbaric system of lynching which prevails in various parts of this country" ("A Letter to the President," 284). By 1919, in Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States 1889–1918, the NAACP would report that, nationwide, 3,224 lynchings had claimed the lives of 702 whites and 2,522 blacks.

Yet despite the direct appeal to the president, and despite the national publicity surrounding the violence, black leaders had been turned away from the White House, and Samuel L. Gompers of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) had publicly excused the white workers of East St. Louis. Thus a new kind of "drastic action" seemed to be in order. Joining in Johnson's strategy of "firm but friendly pressure" were the parade's organizers: the grand marshal, Captain W. H. Jackson; the parade president, Reverend Dr. H. C. Bishop; the vice president, Reverend F. A. Cullen; the secretary, Reverend Dr. Charles Martin; and the first deputy marshal, J. Rosamond Johnson. The parade committee also included Allen Wood, A. B. Cosey, C. H. Payne, Reverend E. W. Daniels, and John Nail. Marching with these leaders was W. E. B. Du Bois, who had just returned from his research in East St. Louis.

In the years following the march, James Weldon Johnson lobbied strenuously for the Dyer antilynching bill. That bill ultimately failed, but the silent protest parade heralded the rise of a new militancy among blacks. Without uttering a word, African Americans had expressed their unity, and in so doing had developed a powerful new voice.

REBECCA MEACHAM

See also Antilynching Crusade; Crisis, The; Cullen, Frederick Asbury; Johnson, James Weldon; Johnson, John Rosamond; Lynching; Nail, John E.; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Riots 1: Overview, 1917–1921; Villard, Oswald Garrison

Further Reading

- Douglas, Ann. Terrible Honesty: Mongrel Manhattan in the 1920s. New York: Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 1995.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "The Negro Silent Parade." The Crisis, 14(5), 1917.
- Du Bois, W. E. B., and Martha Gruening. "The Massacre of East St. Louis." The Crisis, 14(5), 1917.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1930. (See also New York: Arno and New York Times, 1968.)
- . Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1933. (See also New York: Da Capo, 2000.)
- Kellogg, Charles Flint. NAACP: A History of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Vol. 1, 1909–1920. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967.
- "A Letter to the President." The Crisis, 13(6), 1917.
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.
- "Negroes in Protest March on Fifth Avenue." New York Times, 29 July 1917, p.12.
- Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918*. New York: National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 1919. (Reprint, New York: Negro Universities Press–Greenwood, 1969.)
- Ottley, Roi, and William J. Weatherby. The Negro in New York: An Informal Social History, 1626–1940. New York: Praeger, 1967, 1969.
- St. James, Warren D. NAACP: Triumphs of a Pressure Group, 1909–1980. Smithtown, N.Y.: Exposition, 1958. (See also 2nd ed., 1980.)

Lyrical Left

When Floyd Dell, a bohemian extraordinaire (although he had been raised in Iowa), declared 1912 the "lyric year," he praised Edna St. Vincent Millay's seamless sonnets about free love. But he also extolled the rise of a new American progressivism that was reconciling clashing styles of rebellion and that promised to revolutionize both private life and the nation's public business. For Dell and his comrades in the bohemian stronghold of Greenwich Village, New York, at its height in the 1910s and 1920s, the expressive energy and integrative logic of lyric verse suggested a model for politics as much as a postromantic literary ideal. Now that the traditionally isolated lyric poet was learning to emerge from his or her quiet solitude, they assumed, the most sensitive young American rebels could learn to break down the doors between contemplation and action, sexual and economic liberation, the studio and the barricades. The Masses, the exemplary magazine of bohemia in the Village, preached the gospel of synthesis through eight worthy passions: "fun, truth, beauty, realism, freedom, peace, feminism, revolution." As leftist positions hardened during the Great Depression, Dell and his associates' hope for an inclusive lyric socialism, with headquarters in the cafés and walk-up apartments of downtown Manhattan, began to seem self-indulgent, naïvely utopian, even decadent. A more flattering revisionist view was prompted by the renewal of "personal politics" in the late 1960s—politics willing to discover a usable past in the thought and manners of Randolph Bourne, Van Wyck Brooks, Mabel Dodge, Crystal and Max Eastman, John Reed, and other artist-rebels in the Village. Since the 1970s, historians have been unembarrassed to declare that the "lyrical left" created by these rebels was the first, the heartiest, and perhaps the most indigenous American left of the twentieth century.

In its early years, the native habits of the lyrical left included indifference to the emergence of Harlem as a black intellectual capital. Although this left had an unprecedented openness to American Jews, southern and eastern European immigrants, and products of the white working class—Dell himself was the son of a butcher—few Harlemite thinkers other than the feminist Grace Nail Johnson and the socialist Hubert Harrison regularly participated in Village circles before World War I. Recent scholarship has nevertheless emphasized that the lyrical left was a force shaping the self-conscious Harlem "renaissancism" of the late 1910s. Lewis (1994), for example, argues that the Village bohemia was in fact the major incubator of the renaissance during its primary stage. From 1917 to 1923, he contends, Harlem's rebirth was piloted from Washington Square more frequently than from any uptown address.

Lewis's notion of a first-phase "bohemian renaissance" is supported by the fact that Claude McKay and Jean Toomer—perhaps the foremost pioneers of, respectively, the poetry and prose of the Harlem Renaissance—both had links to, or even entanglements in, the Village. McKay was born in Jamaica, and his initial travels along the track of the great Afro-Caribbean migration were followed by a similarly crowded bohemian itinerary once he arrived in the United States. Like thousands of others who made the escape from the provinces to downtown New York "the defining cultural journey of most of the century" (Stansell 2000), McKay concluded that Manhattan, Kansas, was too small for great achievements. In 1914, before he knew the ins and outs of Harlem, he was patronizing the larger Manhattan's Greenwich Village, where what he conceived as his atheistic socialism and peasant "pagan" temperament harmonized with its post-Christian era. McKay's frequent publications in organs of the lyrical left such as The Masses and Seven Arts led to an editorship at the Liberator, then the world's only Marxist journal to pattern its content and working method on Village conversation. By the time that Harlem Shadows, the first poetry collection of the Harlem Renaissance, appeared in 1922, McKay was one of the most visible and influential people in the bohemia of the lyrical left—a referee at its signature magazine, an epitome of its innovative left-literary synthesis, and an intimate friend of its famous figures.

Jean Toomer's affiliation with the lyrical left was more fitful and less conspicuous. Unlike McKay, who chose some of the first ingredients of Cane (1923) for the Liberator, Toomer never assumed a formal position within the literary institutions of bohemian Manhattan. Nevertheless Toomer's literary identity took shape on contact with the lyrical left. In the aftermath of a brief trip to the Village in 1920, the aristocratic wanderer and serial college dropout known as Nathan Pinchback Toomer read Romain Rolland's Jean Christophe (1904), reconceived his artistic fate, and rechristened himself Jean Toomer. The new Toomer's intensely lyrical prose, freshly dedicated to African American voices, was received as grist for the mill by many journals of the lyrical left—not just the Liberator. Broom, Dial, Double-Dealer, and S4N ran pieces by Toomer which inspired people like Sherwood Anderson who were searching high and low for a way to "get inside the niggers and write about them with some intelligence" (Lewis 1994, xxi). Toomer took from the Village nearly as much as he gave. White critics downtown were “receptive of what the English, the Irish, the Teuton, the Latin, the Slav, the Chinese, the Japanese, the Jew, the Negro, have to give,” he said. Their transcendence of “the narrow implications of the entire Anglo-Saxon ideal”—if not the entire vocabulary of antiblack racism—had much to teach “we who have Negro blood in our veins, who are culturally and emotionally the most removed from the Puritan tradition,” but who “are its most tenacious supporters” (Hutchinson 1995, 131). In particular, one white critic with connections to the Village, Waldo Frank, author of the influential anti-Anglo-Saxon meditation Our America (1919), went with Toomer on a southern expedition that partly inspired the setting of Cane—Georgia. Significant traces of the styles, values, and prejudices of the lyrical left can be found in Cane as well as in Harlem Shadows, both classics of the literature of the Harlem Renaissance.

The impact of the lyrical left on the movement in Harlem did not end in 1923 with the appearance of Toomer’s novel and the official closing of the bohemian renaissance. As Hutchinson notes, the concept of cultural pluralism, crucial to Alain Locke’s thinking in and beyond the anthology The New Negro (1925), owed a good deal to theorists of the lyrical left such as the “transnationalist” Randolph Bourne; Locke’s dialogue with Horace Kallen—who was his classmate at Harvard and a fellow Rhodes scholar—was not the sole inspiration for his abandonment of “Anglo-conformity.” Locke’s controversial proposal that African Americans could pursue political liberation through artistic means was similarly informed by a fundamental presumption of the lyrical left: that the arts could rewire the American mind and thus remake the American social order. The core strategy of the Harlem Renaissance, which Lewis (1994) calls “civil rights by copyright,” appears much less fantastic when viewed in relation to the insistence of the lyrical left on the indissolubility of art and life.

Ideas of sexual liberation that characterized the lyrical left played a comparably long-lasting role in attacks by members of the Harlem Renaissance on black Victorianism. In the free-love poetry and prose of such New Negroes as McKay, Toomer, Langston Hughes, and Helene Johnson, there are plentiful and sometimes queer linkages between rebellious black bodies; these echo Village bohemians’ interweaving of the bonds of love, practical morality, and radical politics. In general, the positive influence of the lyrical left on Harlem’s erotic literature has been underexamined. No less underexamined, however, is the critical response of Harlem’s authors to the silence of the Village on the ties among race, free-love bohemia, and everyday wage labor. Consider, to take just one example, McKay’s sixteen-line lyric “Alfonso, Dressing to Wait at Table,” a poem prominently featured in Harlem Shadows. Although he must prepare himself to serve, the figure who lends the poem its name lives far from the uninspired work the title predicts. In the eyes of McKay’s approving speaker, Alfonso removes any self-ridicule from the waiter’s required parody of aristocratic dress; in his case, the man makes the clothes, and his beauty outstrips fashion in everything but its capriciousness: “His moods are storms that frighten and make glad,/His eyes were made to capture women’s hearts.” Praise is not confined to Alfonso’s sexual charisma; the poem’s desired object is also flattered as a self-conscious free lover, a winning propagandist of “wine and clinking glasses/And riotous rakes . . .,” and an artist of literally moving talent: “Alfonso’s voice of mellow music thrills/Our swaying forms and steals our hearts with joy.” To indulge in a contradiction in terms, Alfonso is thus revealed to be a natural bohemian, by rights a prince of the Village, readier than most to muddle the distinction between passion and art, not to mention the distinction between male feminism and womanizing. The last stanza of Alfonso’s unveiling, however, brings bohemian canonization to a sudden, apostrophizing halt: “O Alfonso! wherefore do you sing/. . . Soon we shall be beset by clamouring/Of hungry and importunate palefaces.” The nearly ridiculous formality of rhyme and diction underscores the disproportion between the waiter’s job and the waiter’s capacity. The bohemian idyll of enlivening, cross-class conversation over food and wine is drowned out by unreasonable, racially loaded orders.

In Harlem Shadows, “Alfonso” is followed by a suite of three analogous poems sketching harassed workers, all of which take aim at the poet-celebrity who made Village bohemia sensible to a national audience. The intimate addressee of McKay’s lyrics “Dawn in New York,” “The Tired Worker,” and “When Dawn Comes to the City” is Edna St. Vincent Millay; their intertextual task is to remember skeptically her poem “Recuerdo” (1920), the bohemian rhapsody that begins with the hypnotic lines “We were very tired, we were very merry—/We had gone back and forth all night on the ferry.” As Miller (1998) observes, “Recuerdo” testifies that its “we” are merry precisely because they are tired, not in spite of it; they meet a lazy dawn with a code “of bohemian antiproductivity and a dynamic of pure circulation,” having preempted the morning commute with an evening whirl, a floating purposefulness without a purpose. The would-be bohemians in McKay’s poems, by contrast, are trapped in a circular desire for antiproductivity. Their spirit also thrills to dawn in New York, but for them the protective shadows wane; the bohemian love connection to the city ends at eight in the morning. The culprit, typically revealed in a puncturing final couplet, is the need to “go darkly-rebel to . . . work” (“Dawn in New York”).

What McKay dramatizes in these poems of New York’s dawn is something close to Marcuse’s notion of the “temporal dismemberment of pleasure,” the shattering distribution of happiness into “small separated doses” through the regimentation of the working day (1974). American “Freudo-Marxism” began in Greenwich Village, after all, with its premonition that eros could flower within civilization if socialism repealed both surplus value and surplus repression. Given the poems’ signifying take on Millay, however, it would be mistaken to ignore McKay’s less neighborly additions to Village conversation. The dark and rebellious speakers of Harlem Shadows enter the cross-talk of middle- and working-class bohemians straight from workplaces difficult to libidinalize—a pantry rather than a garret office, say. They bring with them more skepticism about the pairing of wage work and equality than did many Village feminists, who audaciously invested such work with redemptive force adequate to emancipate “new women” from Victorian motherhood. Above all, however, McKay’s speakers infiltrate the bohemian public sphere to caution that unfree labor could break bohemia’s faith in a smooth transit between private and public liberty, free love and civic good. By the conclusion of Harlem Shadows, these speakers have thus created a genre of bohemian lyric interruptus with morals of its own—McKay’s would-be bohemians not only confess that the lyrical left is part of the lineage of the Harlem Renaissance but advise Villagers against great expectations for “no more separate spheres.”

WILLIAM J. MAXWELL

See also Broom; Cane; Eastman, Crystal; Eastman, Max; Frank, Waldo; Harlem Shadows; Harrison, Hubert; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Helene; Liberator; McKay, Claude; Seven Arts; Toomer, Jean

Further Reading

- Diggins, John Patrick. The Rise and Fall of the American Left. New York: Norton, 1992.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap–Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering, ed., The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Marcuse, Herbert. Eros and Civilization: A Philosophical Inquiry into Freud. Boston, Mass.: Beacon, 1974. (Originally published 1955.)
- Miller, Nina. Making Love Modern: The Intimate Public Worlds of New York’s Literary Women. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Stansell, Christine. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Metropolitan–Holt, 2000.

Mabley, Jackie “Moms”

The vaudevillian, stand-up comic, and star of stage and screen Jackie “Moms” Mabley (1897–1975) had a long, productive career that spanned the years from the Harlem Renaissance through the black arts movement. Her original name was Loretta Mary Aiken; she claimed that she acquired her stage name by “taking it” from a Canadian-born boyfriend—they had only a brief relationship but she decided to keep his name because she liked it. Her ability to find humor in unlikely situations such as this one was something she attributed to her determination to overcome the many adversities she encountered in her daily life.

Following a difficult and short childhood, during which she had experienced the death of her father when she was eleven and had been raped by two local men, Mabley left home just before her fourteenth birthday to join a minstrel show. She changed the date of her birth from 1897 to 1894 and entered the adult world of African American performers on the Theater Owners’ Booking Association (TOBA) circuit, during the days of segregation and Jim Crow. The husband-and-wife dance team Butterbeans and Susie were among the first well-known professional acts with whom she performed, very early in her career.

By the 1920s, Mabley began performing in Harlem, in venues such as the Cotton Club, Connie’s Inn, and the Savoy Ballroom, where she shared billings with Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong, and Cab Calloway, among others, and perfected her stand-up comedy routines. Her credits as a performer in musical theater included Bowman’s Cotton Blossoms in 1919, and Look Who’s Here and Miss Bandana in 1927. In the following decade she was cast in The Joy Boat, Sidewalks of Harlem, Red Pastures, Blackberries, Swingin’ the Dream, and the Broadway production Fast and Furious, in which she performed with the writer and folklorist Zora Neale Hurston. During this period, Mabley also began to develop the character “Moms” that would make her famous.

Mabley made her film debut in 1933 in The Emperor Jones, which starred Paul Robeson. In the 1940s she performed in the films Killer Diller and Boarding House Blues. Even during her difficult days on the road, Mabley was able to help provide for three generations of family members, and she bought a house in Washington, D.C., where Mabley’s mother lived until her death in 1946.

Mabley’s career received a huge boost when she appeared on television in the 1960s and 1970s, in the shows of the Smothers brothers, Bill Cosby, Merv Griffin, Mike Douglas, Ed Sullivan, Garry Moore, and Flip Wilson. Her growing popularity led to performances at Carnegie Hall, the Kennedy Center, and the White House, and on college campuses across the country.

Mabley’s classic comedy routines are preserved on more than twenty-five recordings, including Moms Mabley: The Funniest Woman in the World (on the Chess label), which sold one million copies. For many people, the crowning achievement of her career was the making of Amazing Grace, her first full-length motion picture, in 1974, just before her death in 1975. Mabley was a multitalented artist, but she is best remembered as “Moms,” a granny who wore a floppy hat, seemed to be toothless, loved children, and was a churchgoer—but for whom few topics other than religion were off limits. Mabley's humor included comments about racism, homosexuality, and her own flings with younger men. "Moms" was eulogized as someone who had enjoyed a good laugh whenever or wherever she could find or create one.

Mabley, Jackie "Moms"

Biography

Jackie "Moms" Mabley (Loretta Mary Aiken) was born in 1897 in Brevard, North Carolina, where she attended public schools. Her parents were James P. and Mary Aiken. She left school and home at the age of thirteen to join a minstrel show. Mabley performed on the Theater Owners' Booking Association circuit in comedy and musical theater; appeared in several films during the 1930s and 1940s; appeared on stage, on television, and in films in the 1960s and 1970s; and made numerous audio recordings in the 1960s and 1970s. She died 23 May 1975.

REGENNIA N. WILLIAMS

See also Armstrong, Louis; Calloway, Cabell "Cab"; Cotton Club; Ellington, Duke; Emperor Jones, The; Hurston, Zora Neale; Savoy Ballroom; Theater Owners' Booking Association

Selected Films

The Emperor Jones. 1933.
Boarding House Blues. 1948.
Killer Diller. 1948.
Amazing Grace. 1974.

Discography

Moms Mabley at the Playboy Club. 1961.
Young Men, Si, Old Men, No! 1962.
Live at Sing Sing. 1970.
Stars of the Apollo Theater. 1973.

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Brown Sugar: Eighty Years of America's Black Female Superstars. New York: Harmony, 1980.
Dance, Daryl Cumber, ed. Honey, Hush!—An Anthology of African American Women's Humor. New York: Norton 1998.

"Moms Mabley: She Finally Makes the Movies." Ebony, April 1974.

"Moms Mabley, 77, Comedienne of TV, Stage and Radio, Dead." New York Times, 24 May 1975, p. 26.

Sampson, Henry J. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows, 1865–1910. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1988.

Watkins, Mell, ed. African American Humor: The Best Black Comedy from Slavery to Today. Chicago, Ill.: Lawrence Hill, 2002.

Williams, Elsie A. The Humor of Jackie Moms Mabley: An African American Comedic Tradition. New York: Garland, 1995.

Macaulay

Macaulay was a publishing company based in New York City, which was probably founded around 1909. The earliest documentation of its existence is from 1909: an advertisement for Hornor Cotes's novel of the Civil War, The Counterpart. Macaulay specialized in histories, poetry, criticism, literary translations, and inexpensive popular literature. It also published non-fiction under the imprint Gold Label Books, which was launched in 1931. The most noteworthy of Macaulay's publications came out between 1927 and 1933 and include the following: Macaulay's anthology American Caravan: A Yearbook of American Literature (1927), Malcolm Cowley's translations of Henri Barbusse's Jesus (1927), William Carlos Williams's A Voyage to Paganry (1928), Matthew Josephson's Zola and His Time (1928), John Dos Passos's Airways, Inc. (1928), Maurice Barrés's The Sacred Hill (1929), Robert M. Coates's The Eater of Darkness (1929), Wallace Thurman's The Blacker the Berry (1929) and Infants of the Spring (1932), George S. Schuyler's Black No More (1931), Wallace Thurman and A. L. Furman's Interne (1932), and Robert M. Coates's Yesterday's Burdens (1933). The company also published works by Michael Gold.

In addition to publishing work by George Schuyler and Wallace Thurman, Macaulay's main connection to the Harlem Renaissance came through V. F. Calverton (George Goetz), who founded the magazine Modern Quarterly (1923–1940) and compiled An Anthology of American Negro Literature in 1929. Calverton was a new editor for Macaulay in 1929 and tried to lure Langston Hughes away from Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. He did not succeed with Hughes, but Calverton did encourage George Schuyler to write Black No More and was influential in getting the book published by Macaulay in 1931. Calverton was most likely also responsible for the firm's hiring of Wallace Thurman for an editorial position in 1932. Thurman's position was advertised in Crisis in September 1932; according to Hughes, Thurman "was the only black to hold such a prominent position with a major publishing firm during the Renaissance" (Wintz 1988, 89). Thurman seems to have been mainly concerned with the publication of popular fiction, and he left the company early in 1934.

In June 1934, more than half of the Macaulay's employees participated in the first strike to take place in a publishing house. This strike, along with a second strike in September 1934, led to changes in the relationship between the National Labor Relations Board and publishing houses. The last work of fiction published by Macaulay was The Strange Death of Adolf Hitler (1939), by an anonymous author. The firm declared bankruptcy in 1941. The printers J. J. Little and Ives obtained the company, and Citadel Press bought its publications.

APRIL CONLEY KILINSKI

See also Calverton, V. F.; Hughes, Langston; Infants of the Spring; Publishers and Publishing Houses; Schuyler, George S.; Thurman, Wallace

Further Reading

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Notten, Eleonore van. Wallace Thurman's Harlem Renaissance. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 1994.

Stauffer, Alison Tanner. "Macaulay Company." American Literary Publishing Houses, 2 vols., ed. Peter Dzwonkoski. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1986, pp. 214–216.

Tebbel, John. A History of Book Publishing in the United States, Vol. 3, The Golden Age between Two Wars, 1920–1940. New York: Bowker, 1978.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Mack, Cecil

Cecil Mack was an enterprising figure in the New York music world during the early twentieth century. He was involved in the biggest dance craze of the period and, more significantly, played an integral role in the first African American–owned music publishing company. Today, however, he is little remembered, and few details are known about his life.

Mack, whose birth name was Richard Cecil McPherson, was born in Norfolk, Virginia, in 1883. He took private music lessons and soon headed for New York, where he worked steadily under the professional name Cecil Mack. His first published song was "Never Let the Same Bee Sting You Twice" (1900), written with the composer Chris Smith. The vaudeville team of Bert Williams and George Walker recorded Mack's "Good Morning, Carrie" (music by J. Tim Brymn) for the Victor Company in 1901. Soon thereafter, Mack scored his first big hit with "Teasing."

In 1905 Mack organized the Gotham Music Publishing Company. The actual ownership is unknown, and the company lasted only four months before merging with another firm in New York, Attucks Music (named after Crispus Attucks, the first black soldier killed in the Revolutionary War). Both firms had published mostly songs written by African Americans. Gotham-Attucks, also known as the "House of Melody," released work by Will Marion Cook, Mack, and others, as well as tunes from Williams and Walker's Broadway shows, In Abyssinia and Bandanna Land. The cover art of Gotham-Attucks's output notably broke with the tradition of racist stereotypes, and the material itself avoided the denigrating excesses of the "coon songs" popular at the time. Along with Cook, Mack was very likely the firm's guiding force (R. C. McPherson is listed as "secretary and treasurer and general business director").

In 1910 Gotham-Attucks published "That's Why They Call Me Shine" (later known as simply "Shine"), which Mack had probably written about a real man who had been badly beaten by the New York City police in a race riot. James Weldon Johnson probably drew from the same source for his character Shine in Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912). Other songs by Mack—mostly written for various musicals—include "Please Go Away and Let Me Sleep," "You're in the Right Church but the Wrong Pew," and "The Little Gypsy Maid."

With James P. Johnson, Mack wrote the songs for the musical Runnin' Wild (1923). By far the most popular was "Charleston," a tune Johnson had written ten years earlier, for which Mack provided lyrics. The song, which Elisabeth Welch performed in the show, took on a fevered life beyond Mack's now forgotten verses. The Charleston became the signature dance of the jazz age, easily eclipsing the bunny hug, the turkey trot, and even the shimmy. In 1925 the New York Times reported that the dance had become so popular that black domestic workers often needed to demonstrate knowledge of it so they could teach the steps to their prospective white employers. At the peak of the craze, fifty people died in the Pickwick Club in Boston when the dance hall collapsed because of overvigorous "Charlestoning."

Mack's career continued at its same busy pace. In 1925, he became a member of ASCAP (such membership was extremely rare then for African Americans); later that year he formed Cecil Mack's Southland Singers. He also led the Cecil Mack Choir, which was prominently featured in Lew Leslie's production of Rhapsody in Black (1931). Mack contributed lyrics for this show and provided arrangements for its folk songs and spirituals. He died in 1944.

Biography

Cecil Mack (Richard Cecil McPherson) was born in Norfolk, Virginia, 6 November 1883. He was educated at Norfolk Mission College and Lincoln (Pennsylvania) University; spent one semester at the University of Pennsylvania Medical School; and studied music with Melvin Charlton. Mack was associated with the vaudeville team Williams and Walker. He organized the Gotham Music Publishing Company, 1905; and was codirector, secretary, and treasurer of the Gotham-Attucks Music Publishing Company, 1905–1911. He joined ASCAP in 1925. Mack died in New York City on 1 August 1944.

GREGORY MILLER

See also Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man; Cook, Will Marion; Johnson, James P.; Leslie, Lew; Runnin' Wild; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"

Selected Works

- "Never Let the Same Bee Sting You Twice." 1900.
- "Good Morning, Carrie." 1901.
- "Good Night Lucinda." 1902.
- "The Little Gypsy Maid." 1904.
- "Teasing." 1904.
- "Zona, My Congo Queen." 1904.
- "He's a Cousin of Mine." 1906.
- "I'm Miss Hanna from Savannah." 1908.
- "That's Why They Call Me Shine." 1910.

"Charleston." 1923.

"Mistah Jim." 1925.

"You for Me, Me for You." 1925.

"Ain't We Got Love." 1937.

"Huggin' and Muggin'." 1937.

Further Reading

- Hatch, James V. Black Image on the American Stage: A Bibliography of Plays and Musicals, 1770–1970. New York: DBS, 1970.
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. A Century of Musicals in Black and White: An Encyclopedia of Musical Stage Works by, about, or Involving African Americans. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- Roach, Hildred. Black American Music: Past and Present. Boston, Mass.: Crescendo, 1973. (Rev. ed., 1976. Malabar, Fla.: Krieger, 1985; 2nd ed., 1992.)
- Sampson, Henry T. The Ghost Walks: A Chronological History of Blacks in Show Business, 1865–1910. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1988.

Madame Sul-Te-Wan

Madame Sul-Te-Wan (Nellie Conley, 1873–1959) was born in Louisville, Kentucky, and introduced to show business at an early age by her mother, a laundress for burlesque performers. She began her career under the tutelage of and with the encouragement of two burlesquers, Mary Anderson and Fanny Davenport. Sul-Te-Wan's first performance was in a tap-dancing contest in which she won the first prize, a granite dishpan and spoon. Later, she worked in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the Dime Museum with a vaudeville company called the Three Black Cloaks. She then formed her own troupes, the Black Four Hundred and the Rare Black Minstrels. Her father, Silas Crawford Wan, reportedly either a Hawaiian or a Hindu priest, supposedly called her Sul-Te, which became her stage name.

Although she already had a budding career in traveling circuses and Negro vaudeville by design, her career in Hollywood movies was purely accidental, stemming largely from an introduction to the director-producer D. W. Griffith, who was a fellow Kentuckian. Madame Sul-Te-Wan's motion picture career coincided with a watershed in cinema history—Griffith's Birth of a Nation (1915). Working as a domestic on the set, Sul-Te-Wan aligned herself closely with Griffith, who upgraded her position and cast her in what was her own first role in motion pictures and also the first for an African American woman. This was a departure from Griffith's usual policy: he had previously refused to hire African American actors, especially males who would have direct contact with white actresses, and instead had used white actors in black-face to portray all the African American characters. Sul-Te-Wan was the only exception. She played a maid, a role that posed little threat to the sanctity of white womanhood; her character did have the dubious distinction of taunting another character, Dr. Cameron, and spitting on him, however. The spitting scene became her most memorable. The Majestic Motion Picture Company fired Sul-Te-Wan soon after filming ended, accusing her of stealing a book from the set and inciting African Americans to protest against the film on its release.

Throughout the 1920s, Madame Sul-Te-Wan acted in a series of Negro comedies produced by L-KO studios. In the major Hollywood studio pictures in which she appeared, however, she almost always played one-dimensional domestics and supernatural savages. Many of her performances went uncredited or were simply given descriptions such as "harmonica player" and "woman at slave auction." Even when she played the pivotal role of Tituba, an accused witch, in The Maid of Salem (1937), she received only fifteenth billing. Nevertheless, she was perhaps the first African American actress to work consistently in Hollywood, and she appeared in a number of notable films, such as Uncle Tom's Cabin (1927) and Ladies They Talk About, with Barbara Stanwyck (1933).

Madame Sul-Te-Wan's legacy included the careers of her daughter, Ruby Dandridge, who appeared in several comedies as a domestic; and her granddaughter, Dorothy Dandridge. Of the three women, Dorothy Dandridge was the most popular and received the most acclaim from critics; she also was nominated for an Academy Award as best actress (the first such nomination for an African American actress), for her performance in Carmen Jones (1954); Madame Sul-Te-Wan also had a small part in that film. Madame Sul-Te-Wan died in 1959 at the Motion Picture Country Home in Woodland Hills, California.

Biography

Madame Sul-Te-Wan (Nellie Conley) was born 7 March 1873 in Louisville, Kentucky. She performed in circuses and Negro vaudeville and was the first African American actress in motion pictures, appearing in D. W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation (1915). She was the grandmother of actress Dorothy Dandridge. Madame Sul-Te-Wan died in Woodland Hills, California, 1 February 1959.

CANDICE LOVE

See also Birth of a Nation, The

Selected Filmography

The Birth of a Nation. 1915.
Hoodoo Ann. 1916.
Intolerance. 1916.
The Children Pay. 1916.
Stage Struck. 1917.
Manslaughter. 1922.
The Lightning Rider. 1925.
The Narrow Street. 1925.
Uncle Tom's Cabin. 1927.
Queen Kelly. 1929.
Sarah and Son. 1930.
The Thoroughbred. 1930.
Pagan Lady. 1931.
Heaven on Earth. 1931.
King Kong. 1933.
Ladies They Talk About. 1933.
A Modern Hero. 1934.
Imitation of Life. 1934.
Black Moon. 1934.
Maid of Salem. 1937.
In Old Chicago. 1937.
The Toy Wife. 1938.
Kentucky. 1938.

Madame Sul-Te-Wan in Maid of Salem, 1937. (Photofest.)

Madame Sul-Te-Wan

Tell No Tales. 1939.
Torchy Plays with Dynamite. 1939.
Safari. 1940.
Maryland. 1940.
King of the Zombies. 1941.
Sullivan's Travels. 1942.
Revenge of the Zombies. 1943.
Carmen Jones. 1952.
Something of Value. 1957.
The Buccaneer. 1958.
Tarzan and the Trappers. 1959.

Further Reading

Bolden, Tonya. The Book of African American Women. Holbrook, Mass.: Adams Media, 1996.
Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Madame X

Madame X was originally a three-act French courtroom drama, La femme X (1908), by Alexandre Bisson (1848–1912). It was translated into English by John Raphael and was adapted for both the British and the American theater, made into six American motion pictures, and made once into a television drama. The dates of some of the American versions coincided with the Harlem Renaissance, and Madame X was one of the productions of the Lafayette Players.

The basic story has been modified in various ways, depending on the resources that were available to stage and film directors. Despite the different settings and the different identities created for the characters, however, it remains a conventional cautionary tale. A woman's love affair is exposed by her husband, and the woman—impelled either by him or by her own guilty conscience—leaves their baby son with him and sets out to live alone. Without the protection of her respectable family, the woman sinks lower and lower, eventually becoming directly or indirectly involved with prostitution, blackmailing, trafficking, and other criminal offenses. After many years, she becomes embroiled in a murder case and is put on trial. Too poor to pay for her defense, she is assigned a young lawyer who happens to be her grown-up son. She becomes aware of this during the course of the trial, but to protect his reputation and her husband's, she herself simply remains Madame X, even when facing the threat of being convicted. Different versions of the story have different endings. In some, she dies during the course of the trial; in others, her son exonerates her, though still without knowing who she is.

Madame X had its British premier at the Globe Theater on 1 September 1909, with a cast that included Lena Ashwell, Winifred Harris, Sydney Valentine, O. P. Heggie, and Edmund Gwenn. It had its American premiere in 1910, evidently on 7 February (though according to some records the date was 1 February or 2 January), at the New Amsterdam Theater in New York. A total of 125 performances were recorded. Madame X was played by Dorothy Donnelly, who would repeat the role in the first (silent) film adaptation of the play in 1916. In 1927 the play was presented at the Earl Carroll Theater, for twenty-two performances.

Silent film versions of Madame X were directed by George F. Marion (in 1916) and Frank Lloyd (in 1920). The first talking film of the story was a celebrated adaptation in 1929, directed by Lionel Barrymore and starring Ruth Chatterton; a version in 1937 was directed by Sam Wood and starred Gladys George; the first color version was a famous production of 1966 starring Lana Turner; and a film version was made for television in 1981. Attempts to update the characters and the events have in general been discouraging.

AMY LEE

See also Lafayette Players

Further Reading

Halliwell, Leslie. Halliwell's Film Guide, 7th ed. London: Grafton, 1989.
Hanson, Patricia King, and Alan Gevinson. The American Film Institute Catalog of Motion Pictures Produced in the United States: Feature Films, 1931–1940. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993. (Film entries, M–Z.)
Internet Broadway Database. (Web site.)
Loney, Glenn. Twentieth-Century Theatre, Vol. 1. New York: Facts on File, 1983.

Madden, Owen Vincent “Owney”

Owen Vincent (Owney) Madden was born in Liverpool, England, of Irish stock in June 1892. He came to America in 1903, at age eleven, and was soon engaged in street gang activities in New York, in a notorious neighborhood called Hell's Kitchen. In 1910, he became the leader of the Gopher Gang, which engaged in petty crime and street violence. In 1912, he was shot at least six times by members of a rival gang; he survived, but his injuries would cause him problems in later years. By 1914 he had been arrested forty-four times but never convicted, until a rival for the leadership of the Gophers was slain. Protesting his innocence, Madden was sentenced to ten to twenty years and entered Sing Sing in 1915.

Madden was a model prisoner, earning the warden's trust and keeping a low profile, and he was paroled in 1923. He had recognized the potential offered by the arrival of Prohibition in 1919. Behind a veneer of respectability, avoiding the ostentation that characterized other mobsters such as Legs Diamond and Dutch Schultz, he became the elder statesman of New York's underworld. With a large network of trusted partners and lieutenants, he operated rackets in brewing, bootlegging, illegal gambling, laundries, protection, speakeasies, and boxing. In spite of his reputation for ruthlessness, Madden was considered a man of integrity and loyalty by his associates.

As a front for his rackets Madden operated nightclubs, including the Silver Slipper, Hollywood Paradise, Kit Kat Club, Connie's Inn, and most famously Harlem's Cotton Club, which was started in 1923 and was run by his lieutenant Frenchy De Mange. Lew Leslie originally developed the entertainment side, assisted by the songwriter Jimmy McHugh. All the performers were black; all the other staff members were white; and only white patrons were admitted. Performers and musicians found that the gangsters treated them well, even generously. They helped maintain the gangster's legitimate front. For many white tourists, the strictly segregated Cotton Club epitomized the Harlem Renaissance.

Typical of Madden's style was an episode in 1930 when rival mobsters threatened to compete with him in Harlem by starting up the fancy Plantation Club. Cab Calloway, who had been newly contracted, turned up on opening night to find that the club had been wrecked. It never opened. Shortly afterward, Madden offered Calloway an engagement at the Cotton Club, forcing Calloway's agent to relinquish a tight contractual arrangement.

Madden, still on parole, carefully avoided publicity, but he could not completely avoid the attention of the police. He had been linked to a stolen liquor truck in 1924, and in 1925 the Cotton Club had been charged with violations of Prohibition. Madden stayed out of prison despite many such incidents, but eventually, in 1932, he went back to Sing Sing for parole violations. Again a model prisoner, he was released for reasons of health in 1933.

In 1935, after his first marriage ended in divorce, he married the daughter of a postmaster in Hot Springs, Arkansas—a town that was then notorious as a gangsters' playground and a center of illicit gambling. Madden lived there quietly for thirty years, contributing generously to charities. He died of chronic emphysema in 1965.

Biography

Owen Vincent "Owney" Madden was born in Liverpool, England, in June 1892. He arrived in America in 1903. He became the leader of the New York Gopher Gang (1910), was convicted of manslaughter (1914), and was imprisoned in Sing Sing (1915–1923). He established the Cotton Club in 1923. He was imprisoned in Sing Sing again in 1932 and was paroled 1933. Madden died in Hot Springs, Arkansas, 24 April 1965.

BILL EGAN

See also Calloway, Cabell "Cab"; Cotton Club; Ellington, Duke; Leslie, Lew; Nightclubs; Nightlife; Numbers Racket; Organized Crime

Further Reading

Asbury, Herbert. Gangs of New York. New York: Avon, 1950.

Calloway, Cab, and Bryant Rollins. Of Minnie the Moocher and Me. New York: Crowell, 1976.

Haskins, Jim. The Cotton Club. London: Robson, 1985.

Nown, Graham. The English Godfather: Owney Madden. London: Ward Lock, 1987.

"Owney Madden, 73, Ex-Gangster, Dead." New York Times, 24 April 1965. (Obituary.)

Variety, 28 April 1965. (Obituary.)

Walker, Stanley. The Night Club Era. New York: Frederick A. Stokes, 1933. (See also paperback edition, Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1999.)

Magazines and Journals

The magazines and journals of the Harlem Renaissance indicate much of the range of expression in African American thought and art during the 1920s and 1930s.

No single magazine, however, adequately captures the character of the artists, critics, and thinkers who appeared in various publications. This is due to the often differing ideologies and visions of the magazines and the individuals and organizations behind them, the economic trends of the time, and the diverse contributors and works. The most significant contribution of these magazines and journals is the plethora of voices that emerged from their pages to further explore and define an African American literature.

Crisis, the monthly magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was founded by W. E. B. Du Bois and began publication in 1910. It received a higher degree of support than had been achieved by any previous African American magazine (Johnson and Johnson 1979, 31; subsequent page citations are to this source). Its full title was The Crisis: A Record for the Darker Races, after a popular poem by James Russell Lowell, "The Present Crisis." Du Bois edited the magazine; its objective, as stated by him, was to "set forth those facts and arguments which show the danger of race prejudice, particularly as manifested today toward colored people" (33). From the beginning, Du Bois issued a call for a renaissance of African American art, essays, and literature, and Crisis went on to publish established authors as well as new voices; these included Gwendolyn Bennett, W. S. Braithwaite, Charles Chessnut, Countee Cullen, Paul Lawrence Dunbar, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Rudolph Fisher, Langston Hughes, Georgia Johnson, James Weldon Johnson, Alain Locke, Claude McKay, and Jean Toomer. Jessie Fauset, literary editor of Crisis from 1919 to 1926, worked with Du Bois to publish works of many of the most esteemed African American writers of the time. These artists enjoyed increasingly widespread attention that was due in large part to their exposure in Crisis. From 1925 to 1928, the magazine sponsored an annual contest with money prizes for stories, plays, poems, essays, and illustrations. The pages of The Crisis were also dedicated in part to reviews of literature for children. An issue dedicated entirely to children appeared once a year, and Du Bois and Fauset edited a children's magazine called The Brownies' Book in 1919 and 1920. During his reign at Crisis, Du Bois also called for a greater production of drama by and about African Americans (42). The circulation of the magazine peaked in 1919 at nearly 100,000 copies. According to Ray Wilkins, Crisis was so widely read because it contained news about African Americans not available anywhere else (35). Du Bois attributed a large part of the magazine's success to the fact that it was very much, in his words, "a personal organ and the expression of myself" (34). The magazine promoted Du Bois's politics, notably pan-Africanism. Du Bois used his editorials to espouse his ideological interests and offer his own commentary. His colleagues and the NAACP's board of directors often fought with him about the personal direction the magazine took in its editorials and overall vision but The Crisis attained such popularity that the arguments ceased for a number of years, resuming again only when circulation decreased. A number of factors contributed to this downturn: the Depression, competing periodicals, reactions to the effects of Du Bois's own shifting ideals, and a lack of big-money advertisers. Du Bois became involved in the debate over art versus propaganda during the 1920s, initially supporting art—and the open, honest portrayal of African American life—rather than propaganda. On reading Alain Locke's The New Negro, however, Du Bois came out in strong opposition to the idea of art for art's sake and openly criticized writers who exposed the seedier elements of African American life. He felt that writers should focus on and tell the stories of educated African Americans, not, as he put it, those of "beggars, scoundrels, and prostitutes" (quoted, 46). This new stance, along with Du Bois's outspokenness regarding particular writers of the time, caused a notable decline in support for him and undermined the magazine's position as the leading African American literary voice. As The Crisis lost much of its readership, the board of directors informed Du Bois that he would no longer have complete control over the magazine. He resigned his editorship in 1934 and was replaced by the more moderate Ray Wilkins. Crisis is still in publication as a bimonthly magazine, although it is no longer owned by the NAACP.

The Messenger (1917–1928), established by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, is considered one of the first radical African American journals. It was created to espouse socialist ideals but eventually shifted its focus to union politics, becoming "a platform for the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters," a group headed by Randolph (31, 57). The Messenger had a succession of subtitles. In the beginning, it was alternately subtitled Journal of Scientific Radicalism and the Only Radical Negro Magazine in America. In 1923, when the magazine became more literary in focus, the subtitles were New Opinion of the New Negro and World's Greatest Negro Monthly. In its initial stage, the journal criticized Du Bois and other African American leaders of the time and eschewed apolitical or moderately political art and literature. During its second stage, in 1923–1925, George Schuyler and Theophilus Lewis achieved primary editorial control. Together they shifted the literature that was published in it away from socialist verse and toward more creative work by poets and short-story writers such as Josephine Cogdell, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Thomas M. Henry, Georgia Douglas Johnson, and Eric Walrond. Lewis and Schuyler also reviewed artistic and cultural events and news. Schuyler created a column in which he often promoted his views on integration, race, and culture (59). Lewis contributed a column dedicated to discussing African American drama. The third phase of the magazine came in about 1926, when Wallace Thurman took over briefly as editor. Thurman put a call out for submissions of literature by and about African Americans, stating that the magazine would “pay liberally” for those it published (60). This policy proved successful: The Messenger published works by Arna Bontemps, Anita Scott Coleman, Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, Helene Johnson, Richard Bruce Nugent, and Dorothy West, among others. After Thurman left The Messenger, other contributing editors followed, but the ultimate leadership of the magazine still rested with Randolph and Owens. Messenger stopped publishing in 1928 when Randolph decided to concentrate his efforts and money on the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. During its years of publication, the magazine’s circulation never exceeded 5,000 copies a month (62).

Opportunity (1923–1949) was the journal of the National Urban League (NUL, an organization founded in 1911 to meet the housing and occupational needs of southern black migrants). Charles S. Johnson, a member of NUL, edited its first periodical, the Urban League Bulletin, during 1921 and 1922. The bulletin, a bimonthly publication, included information about the local leagues and national body and had space for editorials and topics of current interest (48). In October 1922 the organization successfully pushed to expand beyond the bulletin to a magazine that would be “an official organ,” with “advertisements and second-class mailing privileges (48). In January 1923, Opportunity: Journal of Negro Life became that magazine. Although Opportunity had an active readership, its circulation eventually peaked at 11,000, never reaching the magnitude of Crisis. Also, unlike Crisis, Opportunity was never self-supporting and therefore had to depend on an outside annual grant. Its contributors were never paid for their work (48). Opportunity started without “poems or stories, but there were articles on such topics as black labor, housing, and child placement”; later issues of the magazine, however, included more and more creative work, such as art, fiction, and poetry, along with articles and news of local current events (49). Writers whose work appeared in the magazine include Gwendolyn Bennett, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Georgia Douglas Johnson, and Claude McKay. Opportunity sponsored literature and art contests and published the work of the winners, between 1925 and 1927, in a yearly issue dedicated to the contests. Charles Johnson took a different approach from Du Bois, avoiding personal editorials; in fact, Johnson clearly expressed his dislike for Du Bois’ style of editorship and thus helped to create a definite philosophical difference between the two magazines (50). This division became more clear cut when Johnson took up the argument against Du Bois’s position in the debate over art versus propaganda. Johnson reacted to Du Bois’s conservatism by encouraging writers to express themselves openly and freely (51). Johnson had great success at the helm of Opportunity but resigned in 1928 when he accepted the chairmanship of the department of social sciences at Fisk University. Also in 1928, Opportunity lost its yearly grant. The editorship was taken up by Elmer A. Carter, who largely shifted the magazine’s focus away from the arts and toward sociology and economics (57). In the 1930s, Opportunity did not have a definitive identity, as the editor and the board argued over its purpose and direction; it vacillated between the literary and the political. Publication ceased with the winter issue of 1949.

Fire!! was a single-issue magazine, appearing in November 1926, that was initially conceived by Langston Hughes and Richard Bruce Nugent and then edited by Wallace Thurman with an editorial board consisting of Hughes, Nugent, Zora Neale Hurston, Gwendolyn Bennett, John P. Davis, and Aaron Douglas. Fire!!, subtitled Devoted to Younger Negro Artists, was the first African American magazine that was “both independent and essentially literary” (77). Hughes wrote that the magazine’s creators wanted “to express [themselves] freely and independently—without interference from old heads, white or Negro” and “to provide . . . an outlet for publishing not existing in the hospitable but limited pages of The Crisis and Opportunity” (quoted, 78). The title Fire!! is significant: the magazine was intended to ignite the consciousness of its readers, and its writers boldly challenged conservative elements of the African American literati. The one issue had commentary promoting a full spectrum of African American stories and representations, as well as short stories, Nugent's drawing depicting a naked African woman, and potentially controversial selections of poetry and fiction. Fire!! received general support from Opportunity, from writers such as Countee Cullen, from smaller African American magazines, and—unexpectedly, months after its release—from Du Bois. It was also greeted with some negative reviews, notably from Alain Locke; poor distribution and insufficient financing, however, contributed most to its demise. The board members initially agreed to share expenses for the publication, as the magazine had no outside funding. However, Wallace Thurman, the only member with a steady income, had to shoulder most of the financial burden of publishing it. The first issue cost so much to produce that there was no money for further issues—in fact, Thurman would spend the next few years paying off debts to the printer. Most of the copies of that first issue were later burned in a fire that broke out in the building where they were being stored (78, 79).

After the demise of Fire!!, Zora Neale Hurston unsuccessfully attempted to obtain support to start another magazine while Wallace Thurman created and edited Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life, a journal that he intended be a more moderate version of Fire!! (84). Harlem, like Fire!!, lasted for only one issue, which was published in November 1928. It included essays by Theophilus Lewis, Alain Locke, Richard Bruce Nugent, and Walter White; poems by Helene Johnson, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Alice Dunbar Nelson, and Effie Newsom; stories by Roy de Coverly and George Little; and illustrations. Thurman abandoned his moderate stance in the later pages of the issue, where he criticized Du Bois and promoted the unwholesome side of life in Harlem (87). Further issues of Harlem had been planned, but readers did not respond favorably to Thurman's initial effort.

Fire!! and Harlem were the first of what would be called African American "little magazines" of Harlem. Such magazines were not limited to Harlem, however. Black Opals (1927–1928) was a magazine from Philadelphia created by Jessie Redmon Fauset's brother, Arthur Huff Fauset (89), and intended for the work of young Philadelphians. The first issue was published in spring of 1927 and was followed at the end of that year by a Christmas issue edited by Gwendolyn Bennett. The third and final issue appeared in June 1928 under the direction of an editorial board (90). Along with the work of young Philadelphians, Black Opals had pieces by Alain Locke and Langston Hughes. The Boston Quill Club, an African American literary group, published Saturday Evening Quill (1928–1930), an annual magazine with works mostly by Bostonian poets, dramatists, essayists, and illustrators. Other contributors included Waring Cuney, Helene Johnson, and Dorothy West. Stylus, named after a literary group at Howard University, first appeared in 1916 under the leadership of Alain Locke. Its initial issue contained mostly student submissions and special contributions from better-known writers (68). Stylus did not publish its next issue until May 1921; and the third issue did not appear until 1929. While Zora Neale Hurston was a student at Howard and a member of the Stylus literary group, two of her short stories were published in this magazine. In the mid-1930s, near the end of the Harlem Renaissance, the little magazine Challenge, edited by Dorothy West, was produced in Chicago. Its first issue included an editorial by James Weldon Johnson calling for conservatism in African American literature; West herself, though, eventually called for more social realism (she went through shifts of political ideology and focus during her editorship). Challenge included works by Arna Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Helene Johnson, and Claude McKay, as well as works by unknown and younger writers. It lasted until 1937 and was quickly followed by what would be the sole issue of New Challenge, a politically leftist magazine edited jointly by Dorothy West, Marion Minus, and Richard Wright (116).

At the end of the 1920s and into the years of the Depression, African American popular magazines published apolitical entertainment fiction along with their regular columns and features. Two of the most successful of these magazines were Abbott's Monthly (1930–1933) and Bronzeman (1929–1933). Abbott's Monthly was introduced one month after the stock market crash, yet it sold as many as 100,000 copies (110). Along with light fiction, both magazines published works by J. Max Barber, Chester Himes, Langston Hughes, and Richard Wright. Metropolitan (1935), also a popular magazine, published work by Jessie Redmon Fauset, Rudolph Fisher, and Countee Cullen. Other popular magazines of the 1930s, such as Dawn, Mirror, and Brown American, were read mostly by local or regional audiences (110).

During the second half of the 1920s, single issues of magazines managed by whites began to appear. In March 1925, Survey Graphic published a "Harlem number" edited by Alain Locke. The issue included essays, stories, and drawings that focused on life in Harlem. Its cover described Harlem as a mecca; and in an editorial and an article, Locke extolled Harlem as a cultural promised land and predicted that the people of Harlem would be responsible for a birth of a “vital folk literature” (70). Also in this issue, Locke defined his use of the term “New Negro.” Locke chose for the “Harlem number” works by Countee Cullen, W. E. B. Du Bois, the cultural anthropologist Melville Herskovitz, Langston Hughes, Charles S. Johnson, Claude McKay, Arthur Schomburg, Jean Toomer, and Walter White. In October 1926, the poetry journal Palms published an issue focusing on African American poetry; this issue was edited by Countee Cullen and included work by Lewis Alexander, Gwendolyn Bennett, Arna Bontemps, William Braithwaite, Countee Cullen, W. E. B. Du Bois, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Langston Hughes, Helene Johnson, and Richard Bruce Nugent. Carolina Magazine, a literary journal of the University of North Carolina, published a “Negro number” in May 1927, a “Negro poetry number” in May 1928, and a “Negro play number” in April 1929 (74).

RACHEL DAVIS

See also Black Opals; Brownies’ Book, The; Carolina Magazine; Challenge; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Arthur Huff; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Lewis, Theophilus; Locke, Alain; Messenger, The; New Challenge; Opportunity; Owen, Chandler; Palms; Randolph, A. Philip; Saturday Evening Quill; Schuyler, George S.; Stylus; Survey Graphic; Thurman, Wallace; West, Dorothy; Wright, Richard; specific writers

Further Reading

Andrews, William L., Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, eds. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Crisis. (Web site.)

Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Maberry Johnson. Propaganda and Aesthetics. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.

Manhattan Casino

The Manhattan Casino (later the Rockland Palace) was an elaborate hall at 280 West 155th Street and Eighth Avenue, established in about 1910. It had a ca-capacity of 6,000 and was used for balls and dances; benefits; sports; and religious, civic, and promotional events. During the Harlem Renaissance, a number of famous figures appeared there.

For example, the composer and conductor James Reese Europe engaged the Manhattan Casino on 27 May 1910 for the debut of the new Clef Club Orchestra, which had more than 100 players and performed ragtime, blues, and jazz. The Clef Club was a fraternal organization and union for black musicians; Europe was one of its organizers, and its president. He was also associated with Vernon and Irene Castle, a famous white dance team who popularized ballroom dancing and performed many popular steps that came from black culture. On 22 April 1915, the Castles supervised a dance competition at the Manhattan Casino, the “Castle Cup Contest,” for which Europe’s Society Orchestra supplied the music.

During the 1920s, Fletcher Henderson and his band—considered the foremost early big jazz ensemble—played at the Manhattan Casino. At various times his group included famous musicians such as Louis Armstrong (trumpet), Coleman Hawkins (tenor saxophone), and Don Redman (alto saxophone).

The popular blues singer Lucille Hegamin appeared at the Manhattan Casino on 30 April 1920, 25 September 1920, and 22 April 1921. Hegamin was among the earliest black women to make recordings; she also performed in the second company of the black musical Shuffle Along. Noble Sissle, who wrote the lyrics for Shuffle Along (1921), later organized his own orchestra (1928). It made its first appearance in New York City at the Manhattan Casino—which by then had been renamed the Rockland Palace—in the late 1930s. Sissle’s orchestra included Sidney Bechet, a jazz pioneer from New Orleans.

The Frogs (1908–mid-1920s), a fraternal organization of black theater professionals (and later of other professionals as well), held one of the largest social events in Harlem at the Manhattan Casino: the “Frolic of the Frogs,” a fund-raiser for indigent performers, presented annually in August. Famous Frogs included Bob Cole, James Reese Europe, J. Rosamund Johnson, George Walker, and Bert Williams; the “Frolic,” which lasted all night, featured a dance and vaudeville revue and prizes for the costumes.

During this period as well, Marcus Garvey invited the journalist and activist Ida B. Wells Barnett to address a crowd of almost 3,000 at a meeting of his Universal Negro Improvement Association held in the Manhattan Casino. And the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) gave its annual whist tournament and dance there.

On 7 December 1924 the National Ethiopian Art Theater, a black “little theater” group (1924–1925), presented a program of one-act plays at the Manhattan Casino.

A famous event held at the Manhattan Casino in the 1920s and early 1930s was the annual drag costume ball given by Hamilton Lodge No. 710 of the Grand Order of Odd Fellows. Hamilton Lodge was a black social club, but its drag ball, which attracted some 2,000 men and women, was nonsegregated. Whites attended it, and sometimes whites such as Carl Van Vechten and the playwright Avery Hopwood served as judges.

The lindy, or lindy hop, a popular dance, was born at the Manhattan Casino—in 1928, at the Harlem Dance Derby marathon. One of the remaining contestants, the dazzling Harlemite dancer “Shorty George” Snowden, broke away from his partner and began executing some steps alone. When asked what he was doing, Snowden, thinking of Charles Lindbergh’s famous solo flight across the Atlantic, answered, “The lindy.”

As of the present writing, the site of the Manhattan Casino is a parking lot.

MARVIE BROOKS

See also Armstrong, Louis; Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Bechet, Sidney; Clef Club; Cole, Bob; Europe, James Reese; Garvey, Marcus; Hegamin, Lucille; Henderson, Fletcher; Homosexuality; Johnson, John Rosamond; National Ethiopian Art Theater; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble; Van Vechten, Carl; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”

Further Reading

- Badger, H. Reid. “James Reese Europe.” In Encyclopedia of African-American Culture and History, ed. Jack Saltzman, David Lionel Smith, and Cornel West. New York: Macmillan, 1996, Vol. 2, pp. 917–918.
- Brooks, Tilford. America’s Black Musical Heritage. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1984, pp. 102–103.
- Judge, Mark Gauvreau. If It Ain’t Got That Swing. Dallas, Tex.: Spence, 2000.
- Malone, Jacqui. Steppin’ on the Blues: The Visible Rhythms of African American Dance. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1996, pp. 142–144.
- Neihart, Ben. Rough Amusements: The True Story of A’Lelia Walker, Patroness of the Harlem Renaissance’s Down-Low Culture. New York: Bloomsbury, 2003.

Peterson, Bernard L. The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind. New York: Random House, 1969, p. 47.

Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.

Stearns, Marshall Winslow, and Jean Stearns. Jazz Dance. New York: Macmillan, 1968, pp. 96–98, 315.

Thorpe, Edward. Black Dance. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook, 1990, pp. 88–89.

Thurman, Wallace. Negro Life in New York’s Harlem: A Lively Picture of a Popular and Interesting Section. Little Blue Book 494. Girard, Kan.: Haldeman-Julius, c. 1927.

Maran, René

In the 1920s, René Maran was a literary star: his novel Batouala (1921) had received the prestigious Prix Goncourt in France; in the United States, in September 1922, a headline in The Crisis proclaimed, “The Whole World is Reading It!” Black magazines were filled with pictures and discussions of Maran. Critics discerned Maran’s influence in works such as Claude McKay’s Banjo (1929) and Carl Van Vechten’s Nigger Heaven (1926) and acclaimed Maran as the precursor of the burgeoning New Negro movement. Along with such hyperbole, there was also anxiety and dissension over the novel’s primitivism and its episodic structure. The story is about a “grossly sensuous” tribe under the subjection of a cruel chief—Batouala—in the Oubangui-Chari region of French Equatorial Africa; some critics feared that it would reinforce racist stereotypes (Martin 1983, 96). Nevertheless, Maran continued to be celebrated, and the brisk sales of the first English translation of Batouala in the United States indicated that the Harlem Renaissance had a diasporic aspect.

Maran’s stellar debut actually stymied his literary career. He spent much of the 1920s and 1930s perfecting each page of Batouala for a “definitive edition,” which was published in 1938. His other novels, including Djouma (1927), were less celebrated and were never translated into English, despite the best efforts of Alain Locke, who became a lifelong friend. Although Maran was disappointed, he promoted the writing of the Harlem Renaissance in Paris. He wrote the first French-language article praising Jessie Fauset, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Walter White in December 1925. In 1924, Maran helped edit the short-lived Les Continents, the first black newspaper in Paris; its edition of September 1924 featured poetry by Cullen, Hughes, McKay, and Jean Toomer. Locke wrote a preface in French, his first published description of the new spirit of young “Africo-Américaine” poets that he would praise in The New Negro (1925).

Locke singled out Cullen’s poem, “The Dance of Love (after Reading René Maran’s Batouala)” as an illustration of a “new intellectual commerce between the continents” sparked by Maran’s international acclaim (quoted in Edwards 2003, 113; subsequent page citations are to this source). Cullen alluded to the controversial chapter “Ga’nza” in Batouala and suggested the interest that black writers “in the life” had in the “glorious dance [during which] all things are permitted, even perversions and sins against custom” (85). That dance features Batouala’s wife Yassigui’ndja acting “as the male” with “an enormous painted wooden phallus” tied about her waist, and another woman who “had never known a man” (86). After little resistance, Yassigui’ndja’s woman “melted to the ardor of the phallus as a fog melts in the rising sun” (86). So does Yassigui’ndja, when her partner “stirred the desire in the male figure by delaying his satisfaction” (86). The two end in “a breathless convulsion of short shivering movements, . . . immobile, happy, enraptured” (87). This orgasmic gender play offers Cullen a mitigating metaphor “to voice his own sensuality mingled with an American puritan ethic” and indicates another legacy influenced by Maran (Dixon 1977, 756). If Batouala “did more to encourage the return of the Harlem Renaissance to the sources of blackness,” same-sex desire was evidently a factor in that homecoming (Fabre 1975, 342).

Biography

René Maran was born in Martinique on 15 November 1887. His family moved to Gabon (west Africa) in 1890, but he was educated in France, graduating in 1909. His novel Batouala appeared in 1922 and won the Goncourt prize. Maran then worked in the French colonial service but resigned (1923), returned to Paris, and became a pan-African activist. He worked as an editor at Les Continents (1924) and later (1930) at a literary journal, Revue du Monde Noir. Maran died on 9 May 1960.

SETH CLARK SILBERMAN

See also Batouala; Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; New Negro, The; Nigger Heaven; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Dixon, Melvin. “Toward a World Black Literature and Community.” Massachusetts Review, 18(4), Winter 1977, pp. 750–769.
- Edwards, Brent Hayes. The Practice of Diaspora: Literature, Translation, and the Rise of Black Internationalism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Fabre, Michel. “René Maran, the New Negro, and Negritude.” Phylon, 36(3), 1975, pp. 340–351.
- Ikonné Chidi. “René Maran and the New Negro.” Colby Library Quarterly, 15(4), December 1979, pp. 224–239.
- Maran, René. “Le mouvement Negro-littéraire aux états-Unis.” Vient de Paraître, December 1925, p. 645.
- . Batouala: A True Black Novel—The Definitive Edition, trans. Barbara Beck and Alexandre Mboukou. Washington, D.C.: Black Orpheus, 1972. (Originally published 1938.)
- Martin, Tony. Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983.
- Nwezeh, E. C. “René Maran: Myth and Reality” Odu: A Journal of West African Studies, 18, July 1978, pp. 91–105.

Mason, Charlotte Osgood

Charlotte Osgood Mason has become one of the best-known white patrons of the Harlem Renaissance—somewhat ironically, because she required that the artists she supported refer to her as “Godmother” and not reveal her identity. In turn she referred to her protégés as “godchildren.”

Mason came from a wealthy family and became still wealthier when, in 1886, she married Rufus Osgood Mason, a physician. On her husband’s death in 1905, Mason used some of her money to finance anthropological studies of American Indians, especially those from the Southwest; she herself participated in some of the fieldwork. In addition to her interest in American Indians, Mason found psychology and studies of the psychic world intriguing; she wrote The Passing of the Prophet, which was published in 1907 in North American Review.

During the 1920s, Mason’s interest in “primitive” art forms and the people she associated with primitivism—such as American Indians and African Americans—increased. Consequently, Mason used some of her wealth to finance the artistic production of some of the most talented black artists associated with the Harlem Renaissance. She invested thousands of dollars to pay for research, travel, and living expenses for black artists such as Aaron Douglas, Arthur Huff Fauset, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Hall Johnson, Alain Locke, Claude McKay, and Louise Patterson Thompson, to name a few.

Mason's interest in black art began with her fascination with Alain Locke, whom she referred to as her "precious brown boy." Locke introduced Mason to some of the most talented visual artists, singers, and musicians of the Harlem Renaissance. Mason used Locke as a liaison between herself and black artists; in fact, Locke arranged and took responsibility for persuading various black artists to accept financial support from Mason. In addition to individual artists, Mason provided financial support for the Negro Art Institute, which Locke founded in 1924. One purpose of this institute was to help support black writers so that they could produce works challenging the stereotype of blacks as intellectually and socially inferior. Mason's support of the institute came with strings attached: she insisted that the literature of writers associated with the institute must maintain the "primitive purity" she associated with African American people and culture. In short, Mason insisted on art which reinforced her belief that African Americans had a special affinity with the primitive and the world of the spirit.

Mason's own stereotypical notions about what constituted black art and her desire to claim ownership of the art being produced by her protégés caused serious conflict between herself and the artists she supported. A number of the artists associated with the Harlem Renaissance used their art as a vehicle not only for artistic expression but also for other purposes: to protest against American racism, violence, and the overall discrimination African Americans experienced; and to counter the prevailing stereotype of blacks as exotic primitives. As a result, although several writers benefited from Mason's financial generosity, many of the relationships she developed with black artists during this period were short lived. In addition to the conflicts over the content and ownership of the art, there were other problems: many of Mason's protégés thought that she herself was racist and described her as, at times, cruel.

Mason's relationship with Hurston and Hughes was the most controversial and seems to reveal the racism and cruelty which many of her protégés complained about, and which led them to sever their ties with her. Both Hughes and Hurston were impressed by Mason's wealth and admired her for her philanthropy and for the learned company with which she surrounded herself. At the same time, these two talented young black writers became troubled because Mason wanted them to produce work that would reinforce and perpetuate current racial stereotypes.

Mason met Hughes during one of his weekend visits to New York in early 1927. Initially, he was struck not only by her material wealth but by her apparent kindness and her intellectual acumen. Their meeting ended with her giving him $50, because he had fascinated her with his discussion of his poetry. One week later, Hughes sent Mason a thank-you card, and she invited him back to her apartment in New York to discuss his goals as an artist. During this second meeting, in April of 1927, Hughes revealed to Mason that his main goal was to write a novel. She encouraged him to pursue this dream and offered to provide monetary support for the summer so that he could focus on his novel (Hughes 1940). Helped by Mason's financial support, Hughes wrote a draft of Not without Laughter. He revised it during his senior year at Lincoln University, and on his graduation Mason decided to give him a monthly allowance so that he could focus on his art. She also read the first and revised drafts of Hughes's novel and offered him feedback as an unofficial editor.

Early in their relationship, Hughes had given Mason unwavering admiration. But as time went on and he began to write pieces that were more overtly critical of the status quo, he became repelled by Mason's ostentation—her apartment on Park Avenue, her servants, and so on. He wrote a number of political and satirical works that exposed the disparity between upper-class and lower-class Americans; and he became preoccupied with exploring race and class as social and political themes—a preoccupation that is illustrated in his poems "Advertisement for the Waldorf-Astoria" and "Park Bench," among others. The publication of these two poems, in particular, marked a turning point in his relationship with Mason (Wintz 1996). She found his political poetry disturbing and tried to persuade him to move away from such overtly political work. During this period, Hughes and Hurston were in the process of writing their play Mule Bone, and Louise Patterson Thompson, an educator and labor organizer, was working as a secretary for them, at Mason's request. Mason's paternalistic, controlling personality caused Thompson to end her own relationship with her patron; Thompson then worked diligently to influence Hughes as he grappled with the problem of when and how to break his dependence on “Godmother.” As it happened, when Hughes refused to abandon his political writing, his relationship with Mason was irreparably damaged; in addition, he continued to resist Mason’s attempts to force him to reproduce stereotypes of the “primitive” in his work. Eventually, he asked Mason to stop providing him with financial support. Hughes (1940) notes Mason’s belief that African Americans were “America’s great link with the primitive, and they had something very precious to give the Western world” and adds that he himself did not “feel the rhythms of the primitive surging through me, and so I could not live and write as though I did.”

Mason became Hurston’s patron in December 1927, providing money—$200 a month—so that Hurston could do research on African American folklore. This money was paid on the condition that Mason would maintain ownership of the folklore Hurston collected; once again, the relationship became strained because of a conflict between the desires of the artist and desires of the patron. In this case, the relationship was complicated by additional factors. First, some of Hurston’s contemporaries accused her of playing a stereotypical “darky” role in order to win Mason’s favor. Second, Hurston’s apparent admiration for Mason led some of these contemporaries to question Hurston’s allegiance to other African Americans. Third, many historians and literary scholars suggest that a degree of adoration existed between Hurston and Mason. A close reading of Hurston’s commentary on Mason suggests, rather, that Hurston, in the tradition of the trickster, was shrewdly manipulating the relationship in order to maintain a privileged position among the artists Mason supported; in any case, Hurston came to have misgivings about Mason. After having been, or having played the role of, an appreciative, dutiful protégé, at various stages she began to question her patron’s desire to impose control over her artistic creativity. The monetary support Mason provided did allow Hurston to produce a number of literary works; however, Hurston did not reach her full artistic potential until she broke with Mason and published Their Eyes Were Watching God in 1937.

The relationship Mason had with Hughes, Hurston, Locke, Thompson, and a number of others exemplifies the complex dynamics that existed between white patrons and African American artists during the Harlem Renaissance, and it also suggests an underlying racial conflict. Eventually, many of the artists Mason supported created satirical pieces criticizing their patron for her paternalism and racism. For instance, Hughes, in his collection of short stories The Ways of White Folks (1933), satirized Mason and other supposedly liberal supporters of African Americans and especially of African American artists: Mason’s desire to control her protégés and their art is illustrated by his characters Dora Ellsworth (in “The Blues I’m Playing”) and Anne and Michael Carraway (in “Slave on the Block”). Similarly, Rudolph Fisher satirized Mason through his character Agatha Camp in The Walls of Jericho (1928). Hurston offered a critique when she ironically described Mason as a “benevolent” benefactress in Dust Tracks on a Road (1942).

By insisting on primitivism, Mason stifled, or was in effect attempting to stifle, some of the most prominent artists of the period. Ultimately, though, the constraints Mason placed on her “godchildren” became too much for at least some of them. As the Harlem Renaissance came to a close, many of Mason’s “godchildren” ended their relationship with her. Mason then shifted her emphasis from African American culture to other cultures, and eventually she died in obscurity.

Biography

Charlotte Osgood Mason (Charlotte Vandervere Quick) was born 18 May 1854. She married Rufus Osgood Mason in 1886 and was widowed in 1905. She then turned her attention to anthropological studies of southwestern American Indians. She published The Passing of the Prophet in 1907. Beginning in the 1920s she became a patron of African American arts and provided financial support to African Americans including Aaron Douglas, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Alain Locke, and Claude McKay. Mason died in New York 15 April 1946.

DEIRDRE J. RAYNOR

See also Douglas, Aaron; Fauset, Arthur Huff; Fisher, Rudolph; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Hall; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Negro Art Institute; Not without Laughter; Patterson, Louise Thompson; White Patronage

Further Reading

Bernard, Emily. Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten, 1925–1964. New York: Knopf, 2001.

- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Knopf, 1940.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Dust Tracks on a Road. New York: HarperPerennial, 1991. (With a new foreword by Maya Angelou.)
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1987.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Walker, Alice, ed. I Love Myself When I Am Laughing: A Zora Neale Hurston Reader. New York: Feminist Press at City University of New York, 1979.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Austin: Texas A&M University Press, 1996.

Matheus, John Frederick

Despite his relatively small reputation as a writer of the Harlem Renaissance, John Frederick Matheus was a pioneer in the movement as a creative artist and an instructor. Besides being a prolific author, he was fluent in seven languages, traveled extensively, and was a respected professor at several universities in the United States and in Haiti.

Matheus was born in West Virginia in 1887. His main vocation was teaching; he taught for more than thirty years at West Virginia State College, and after his retirement in 1953 he was a sought-after visiting professor, teaching for another twenty years at several colleges and universities. However, his writing never abated. His literary work can be divided into two periods, dominated by different interests that led to shifts in form and style.

In the first period, 1925 to 1934, Matheus wrote almost entirely fiction. In 1925, his story "Fog"—probably his best-known work—won an award in Opportunity's literary contest, appeared in Alain Locke's The New Negro, and was included in the honors list in Edward J. O'Brien's Best Short Stories of 1925. "Fog" explores the racial attitudes of passengers on a train during a fateful ride in a coal-mining region in West Virginia. In 1926, Matheus's sketch "Sand" took first place in the "personal experience" category in Opportunity's contest; his one-act drama "Cruiter" also won a first prize from Opportunity; and his short story "Swamp Moccasin" won a first prize in the Krigwa (originally Crigwa; an acronym of the Crisis Guild of Writers and Artists) contest for The Crisis. "Cruiter" tells of the separation of a rural southern grandmother and her grandson when a northern recruiter encourages the young man to take a factory job in Detroit.

Matheus also wrote poetry, which appeared in The Crisis, Opportunity, and The Chronicle. His poem "Requiem" was included in Countee Cullen's anthology Caroling Dusk (1927). "Ti Yette," a play published in Plays and Pageants from the Life of the Negro in 1930, focuses on conflict between two siblings, one light-skinned, the other dark-skinned, in New Orleans. Matheus's early fiction often explored the lives of rural southern African Americans.

During the second period of Matheus's writing, roughly 1934–1970, his work consisted largely of articles—journalistic essays, educational statistics, translations, and book reviews. Many of his reviews appeared in CLA Journal, Modern Language Journal, Negro History Bulletin, and Quarterly Review of Higher Education among Negroes. In 1936, he won an award for best reviews of the year from Journal of Negro History. Several of Matheus's essays explored the role of foreign languages in African American life.

Matheus continued to write fiction occasionally during this period, though infrequently. He published two short stories in 1937: "Sallicoco" in Opportunity (a story inspired by his trip to Liberia), and "What Kind of Man" in Arts Quarterly. As a result of a trip to Haiti in 1927 (the first of two; the other was in 1945) with the composer Clarence Cameron White, he wrote Ouanga ("charm for evil" in Creole), a drama and operatic libretto with music by White; it had its premiere in 1949. Matheus and White also collaborated on an uncompleted opera, "Cocomaque: a Musical Drama of Haiti."

Matheus was engaged in international activities as well. In 1930, for example, he spent six months in Liberia as secretary to Dr. Charles S. Johnson, who was the American member of a commission investigating charges of forced labor there; in 1945–1946, he was director of the teaching of English in the national schools of Haiti. He was also involved in many professional organizations, including the College Language Association (he was its treasurer from 1938 to 1975); the Modern Language Association; and Alpha Iota Lambda Chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha.

At the time of his death in 1983, Matheus may have been the last surviving writer of the Harlem Renaissance.

Biography

John Frederick Matheus was born 10 September 1887 in Keyser, West Virginia. At age twelve he published poems in two newspapers in Steubenville, Ohio, where his family had moved when he was nine; at fourteen he won a prize in an essay contest sponsored by a local women's club. He studied at Steubenville (Ohio) High School (1905); Western Reserve (A.B., 1910); Columbia University (M.A., with a Teachers College diploma as teacher of French, 1921); the Sorbonne in Paris (1925); and the University of Chicago (graduate work, 1927). He taught at Florida A&M College in Tallahassee (1911–1913); was an auditor at Florida A&M (1911–1913); and was head of romance languages at West Virginia State College (1922–1953). He was a foundation director in 1945–1946 and was then at Maryland State College (1953–1954), Dillard University (1954–1957), Morris Brown College (1958–1959), Texas Southern University (1959–1961), Hampton Institute (1961–1962), and Kentucky State University (1962). He wrote stories, plays, poems, and articles for Opportunity, The Crisis, and other journals and was included in several anthologies, such as Alain Locke's The New Negro (1925). He wrote the libretto for Ouanga (1949), with music by Clarence Cameron White. His awards included prizes in the literary contests run by Opportunity, Krigwa, and The Crisis. He was married to Maude Roberts and later to Helen Taylor. Matthews died in Tallahassee, Florida, on 21 February 1983.

STEVEN G. FULLWOOD

See also Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Cullen, Countee; Krigwa Players; Locke, Alain; Opportunity Literary Contests; White, Clarence Cameron

Selected Works

- "Fog." Opportunity, May 1925. (Also in The New Negro: An Interpretation, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925.)
- "Sand." Opportunity, July 1925.
- "Swamp Moccasin." The Crisis, December 1926.
- "Cruiter." In Plays of Negro Life: A Source-Book of Native America Drama, ed. Alain Locke and Montgomery Gregory. New York and London, Harper, 1927.
- "Requiem." In Caroling Dusk, An Anthology of Negro Poetry, ed. Countee Cullen. New York: Harper, 1927.
- "Haiti Is a Riot of Color." Crisis, November 1929.
- "Ti Yette." In Plays and Pageants from the Life of the Negro. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1930.
- "African Footprints in Hispanic-American Literature." Journal of Negro History, 23, July 1938.

"A Negro State College Looks at Foreign Language." Journal of Negro Education, April 1938.

"What Good Are Foreign Languages to American Negroes?" Quarterly Review of Higher Education among Negroes, October 1942.

"Cruiter." Black Theatre USA: Plays by African Americans 1847 to Today, ed. James V. Hatch and Ted Shine. New York: Free Press, 1996.

Further Reading

Andrews, William L., Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, eds. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Brawley, Benjamin. The Negro Genius: A New Appraisal of the Achievement of the American Negro in Literature and the Fine Arts. New York: Biblio and Tannen, 1972.

Hatch, James V., and Leo Hamalian, eds. Lost Plays of the Harlem Renaissance. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1996.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Rush, Teresa Gunnels, Carol Fairbanks Myers, and Ester Spring Arata, eds. Black American Writers Past and Present: A Biographical and Bibliographical Dictionary. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1975.

Matthews, Ralph

Ralph Matthews had a long career as one of the most widely read black journalists in the United States. He began in 1924 as a reporter with the Baltimore Afro-American, which became the largest-selling black newspaper on the eastern seaboard, reaching its highest circulation in the late 1930s. Its staff developed a reputation for excellent national and international coverage of news; its motto was "Independent in all things—neutral in none." At the Afro-American, Matthews worked alongside respected journalists such as Lula Jones Carrett, Arthur Carter, Jimmy Hicks, Max Johnson, Cliff Mackay, Herb Mangrum, Bob Maynard, Bettye Moss, I. Henry Phillips, Al Sweeney, and Vincent Tubbs, on a floor of the building known as the "Ivory Castle" because of the inhabitants' lofty talent. Like other Afro-American editors, Matthews held high standards for political, social, and economic equality.

After eleven years in Baltimore, Matthews was named editor of the Afro-American in Washington, D.C., where he stayed until 1947. He continued working in a series of editorial posts at Afro-American papers: Newark, New Jersey (1947–1951); Washington, D.C. (1951–1954), Philadelphia (1959–1964), and back to Washington from 1964 until his retirement in 1968. He left the Afro-American chain, where he had developed a role as a troubleshooter, for a five-year stint as editor of the Cleveland Call and Post from 1954 to 1959. Over the course of his career, he covered some of the leading stories of his time, including civil rights, the coronation of George VI of Great Britain in 1936, and the Korean War. For sixteen years he ran “New Faces Guild,” a variety show sponsored by the Afro-American for the benefit of a children’s hospital and other charities.

Matthews received the Wendell L. Wilkie public leadership award for national political reporting; in 1977, he was cited by the National Newspaper Publishers Association for his writing and for his “ability to establish great newspapers and watch them make their mark in history as fighters for the black cause.” Matthews died in 1978.

Biography

Ralph Matthews was born in about 1904 in Harford County, Maryland; he grew up in Baltimore and attended Morgan State College and the Columbia University School of Journalism in New York. He became a reporter with the Baltimore Afro-American in 1924; eleven years later he became editor of the Afro-American in Washington, D.C., where he stayed until 1947. He then worked at the Afro-American papers in Newark, New Jersey (1947–1951); Washington again (1951–1954); Philadelphia (1959–1964); and Washington once more (1964–1968.) During 1954–1959 he left the Afro-American chain to work at the Cleveland Call and Post. Matthews retired in 1968 and died in 1978.

KATHLEEN COLLINS

See also Baltimore Afro-American; Journalists

Further Reading

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984.

Vincent, Theodore G. Voices of a Black Nation: Political Journalism in the Harlem Renaissance. San Francisco, Calif.: Ramparts, 1973.

McClendon, Rose

The distinguished actress Rose McClendon (Rosalie Virginia Scott) was born in Greenville, South Carolina, in 1884; her parents moved the family to Harlem in 1890. She began singing at Saint Mark’s African Methodist Episcopal Church and developed her love of theater while sponsoring, directing, and performing in plays there. Her professional career was launched in 1919, when she had a small part in the Bramhall Players’ production of Justice; she also appeared in another Broadway production, White Mule, and performed on radio in the series John Henry.

McClendon was one of the strongest actresses of the Harlem Renaissance; although she was short and slight, she had an impressive command of the stage, and she was capable of affecting the emotions of the audience with a simple gesture or just a change of expression. She was acknowledged as the “first lady of Negro drama,” and critics called her the “Negro Duse,” after the famous Eleonora Duse (1858–1924). Like Duse, McClendon had an acting style that enabled her to portray human suffering and to convey powerful emotions realistically but with extraordinary economy of means. Playwrights called on Rose McClendon when they wanted the crème de la crème.

In 1924, McClendon starred opposite Charles Gilpin and later Paul Robeson in Roseanne. She gained prominence in 1926 as an aging mulatto madam in Clement Wood’s Deep River, an opera with jazz staged and produced on Broadway by Arthur Hopkins. As the legend goes, Ethel Barrymore came to see Deep River, having been advised not to leave before the end so that she would be sure to see McClendon’s performance. The critic Alexander Woollcott of New York World reported that Barrymore did stay till the end and then sought out Hopkins to say that Rose McClendon could teach all actresses distinction. Also in 1924, McClendon played the role of Goldie McAllister opposite Jules Bledsoe and Abbie Mitchell in Paul Green’s folk tragedy In Abraham’s Bosom; the play won a Pulitzer Prize, and McClendon won an acting award from the Morning Telegraph. In the late 1920s, McClendon toured in Dorothy and DuBose Heyward’s play Porgy, as Serena, the wife of Crown’s victim. Despite some opposition by blacks to the production, McClendon and the Theatre Guild cast achieved a hit in New York and London from 1927 to 1929.

In the 1930s McClendon was supposed to appear in John Houseman's production of Medea, with a cast including mulatto children and black choruswomen but otherwise white; however, this daring plan had to be put aside when McClendon fell ill. In 1931, McClendon collaborated with Richard Bruce Nugent to write the one-act play "Taxi Fare"; that year she also starred in Paul Green's House of Connelly. In 1932, along with Langston Hughes and others, McClendon was appointed to the "Sponsoring Committee for Production of a Soviet Film on Negro Life." Also in 1932, she appeared in James Knox Millen's Never No More; Brooks Atkinson, the drama critic of the New York Times, described her performance as both majestic and humble: "She acts from the inside out . . . and confirms the high esteem in which she has long been held." McClendon became familiar to theatergoers in Black Souls, Brain Sweat, Roll Sweet Chariot, Panic, and—especially—Mulatto (1935), in which she played the slave Cora, the mother of the colonel's mulatto child. Mulatto, which was written by Langston Hughes, ran for 375 performances, the second-longest run for a work by a Negro playwright. Hughes was delighted that McClendon had set Broadway afire, but the producer, Martin Jones, was evidently not; Jones refused to give McClendon her full salary as a star, considering it too much for a Negro. Moreover, Jones refused to provide her transportation to the theater (she had to take the subway back and forth from her home in Harlem), and neither she nor Hughes was welcome to attend Jones's whites-only postproduction party. During the run of Mulatto, McClendon became ill and had to leave the cast; Cora was her last "mammy" role.

To fight stereotyped roles such as mammies, McClendon was one of the organizers of the Negro People's Theater (1935). She wanted black performers, especially women, to have parts in legitimate theater productions that would portray black America in a more positive light and thereby empower African Americans. She and John Houseman also headed the sixteen "Negro Units" established by this Federal Theater Project (FTP). McClendon was the spokeswoman for the Negro Units and, interestingly, blocked an attempt by Hallie Flanagan, the director of FTP, to give the directorship of the Harlem unit to a black person. McClendon argued that it would be advantageous for blacks to have an apprenticeship under a white leader. McClendon was on the advisory board of Actors Equity Association (the actors' union); directed plays at the Harlem Experimental Theater; and gave a great deal of her time to advising amateurs. In her last days, she recorded her hope for a "Negro theater that would develop not an isolated Paul Robeson, an occasional Bledsoe or Gilpin, but a long line of first-rate actors."

The Rose McClendon Players (1938–1941)—a semiprofessional group founded after her death in 1936—continued her legacy.

Biography

Rose McClendon (Rosalie Virginia Scott) was born 27 August 1884, in Greenville, South Carolina; her parents, Sandy Scott and Tina Jenkins, moved to Harlem in 1890, when she was six years old. McClendon attended Edina Public School—P.S. 40 and Sergeant Dramatic School in New York City; she won a scholarship to the American Academy of Dramatic Art in 1916. On 27 October 1904 she married Henry Pruden McClendon, who was a chiropractor and a porter on the Pennsylvania Railroad. Her Broadway credits included Justice (1919), White Mule and Roseanne (1924), Deep River (1926), In Abraham's Bosom (1926), Porgy (1927–1929), The House of Connelly (1931), Never No More (1932), and Mulatto (1935); her regional credits include The Cat and the Canary, Brain Sweat, Black Souls, Roll Sweet Chariot, and Panic. She also performed on radio. McClendon was a cofounder of the Negro People's Theater; a codirector of sixteen Negro Units of the Federal Theater Project (Works Progress Administration); and a coauthor of "Taxi Fare." McClendon died at her home in Harlem on 12 July 1936; she is buried in Mount Hope Cemetery in Westchester County, New York.

SHIRLEY BASFIELD DUNLAP

See also Black and White; Bledsoe, Jules; Gilpin, Charles; Green, Paul; Hughes, Langston; Mitchell, Abbie; Mulatto; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Porgy: Play; Robeson, Paul; Saint Mark's Methodist Episcopal Church

Further Reading

Andrews, William L., Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, eds. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Bogle, Donald. Brown Sugar. New York: Da Capo, 1980.

- Gill, Glenda E. "Rose McClendon: The Black Eleonora Duse." Paper presented at the annual convention of American Society for Theater Research, Ohio State University, 12 November 1988.
- Haskins, James. Black Theater in America. New York: Crowell, 1982.
- Hatch, James V. Black Image on the American Stage. New York: Drama Book Specialists, 1970.
- Isaacs, Edith J. R. The Negro in the American Theatre. College Park, Md.: McGrath, 1968 (originally published in 1947).
- Mitchell, Lofton. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.
- . Voices of the Black Theatre. Clifton, N.J.: James T. White and Co., 1975.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Tanner, Jo A. Dusky Maidens: The Odyssey of the Early Black Dramatic Actress. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1992.

McGuire, George Alexander

Bishop George Alexander McGuire (1866–1934) is best-known for his prominence in Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). He was also an important theological figure in his own right. McGuire, a naturalized American, was born in Antigua. He immigrated to the United States in 1894 and became an ordained minister in the Protestant Episcopal Church. By 1901 he had risen sufficiently to be appointed rector of Saint Thomas's Episcopal church in Philadelphia. Saint Thomas's served the African American elite of Philadelphia and was one of the most prestigious congregations in African America, having been started in 1794 by Absalom Jones, one of the founders—together with Richard Allen of the African Methodist Episcopal Church—of organized African American Christianity.

In 1905 McGuire was made the Protestant Episcopal church's archdeacon for Colored Work in the Diocese of Arkansas, thus becoming the church's highest-ranking African American and the first to achieve the rank of archdeacon. His next major appointment was to the parish of St. Bartholomew's in Cambridge, Massachusetts. During this period, he also studied medicine at Jefferson Medical College. In 1913 McGuire returned home to Antigua, where he practiced medicine and served as a minister in the Church of England, the English counterpart of the Episcopals.

McGuire returned to the United States in 1919, just as Garvey's UNIA was gathering momentum. Like thousands of other race-conscious intellectuals who joined UNIA, McGuire eagerly embraced the organizational framework Garvey provided to combat racism and to articulate an independent philosophy of racial uplift. Long before UNIA, McGuire had fought his own battles against racism in the Protestant Episcopal church.

McGuire was elected first chaplain-general of UNIA at its inaugural international convention in New York in August 1920. In this position, he wrote two important documents of UNIA: Universal Negro Ritual and Universal Negro Catechism. The latter had both religious and historical sections, reflecting his interest in religion and race history. (At Saint Thomas's, he had been an early member of African America's first historical association, the American Negro Historical Society.) In September 1921, McGuire founded the African Orthodox Church (AOC), envisaged as a home for blacks of the Protestant Episcopal persuasion who wanted ecclesiastical independence.

McGuire would have liked to have seen AOC designated as the official church of UNIA, but Garvey was unwilling to grant such an exclusive privilege to any denomination. McGuire accordingly resigned from his position at UNIA on the formation of AOC. He ensured official "orthodox" status for his new church by arranging apostolic succession for himself. He had himself reordained bishop in the American Catholic church; he was then ordained first bishop of the new AOC by a representative of the Russian Orthodox church.

McGuire seems to have briefly joined some of Garvey's adversaries in late 1921, but by 1925 he wrote a moving preface to Volume 2 of The Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, edited by Garvey's wife Amy Jacques Garvey shortly after her husband's imprisonment in Atlanta. In 1924, the newly organized conclave of AOC unanimously elected McGuire archbishop of the church. During the remaining decade of his life McGuire built AOC into a thriving international church. Branches were eventually established in Canada, Barbados, Cuba, South Africa, Uganda, Kenya, Miami, Chicago, Harlem, Boston, Cambridge (Massachusetts), and elsewhere. The official organ of AOC, The Negro Churchman, became an effective link for the far-flung organization. Wherever it existed, AOC remained a sort of ecclesiastical reflection of Garvey's ideas of racial independence and uplift.

Biography

George Alexander McGuire was born in Antigua, in the then British West Indies, 26 March 1866. He was educated at Mico College and Nisky Theological Seminary in the Danish (later U.S.) Virgin Islands; immigrated to the United States in 1894; was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal church; became rector of Saint Thomas's Episcopal Church in Philadelphia in 1901; became the Protestant Episcopal church's archdeacon for Colored Work in the Diocese of Arkansas in 1905; was appointed to Saint Bartholomew's parish in Cambridge, Massachusetts; studied medicine at Jefferson Medical College; returned to Antigua in 1913, practicing medicine and serving as a minister; returned to the United States in 1919; joined the Universal Negro Improvement Association and was elected its chaplain-general (1920); and founded the African Orthodox Church in 1921 and resigned from UNIA. McGuire died 10 November 1934.

TONY MARTIN

See also Garvey, Marcus; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

- Ball, Wendy, and Tony Martin. Rare Afro-Americana: A Reconstruction of the Adger Library. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1981.
- Burkett, Randall K. Black Redemption: Churchmen Speak for the Garvey Movement. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1978.
- Martin, Tony. Race First: The Ideological and Organizational Struggles of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986. (Originally published 1976.)
- The Negro Churchman*. Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus Reprint, 1977.

McKay, Claude

The poet, novelist, essayist, and political activist Claude McKay was one of the most versatile and talented intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance. Although his standing among twentieth-century intellectuals has never been in doubt, McKay has always been surrounded by controversy. It is easy to see why: he was politically radical; he was not only a freethinker but also a militant rationalist and vociferously anti-Christian; he was, as he put it himself, "suicidally frank," and what he was frank about was seldom flattering. Though he taught the virtues of group life, he was an individualist, a freelance, and a loner; he hated bourgeois civilization and its pretensions and consistently identified himself with the black working class against all comers; as a proud black man, he despised the "superstitions"—his word—of racism as well as colorism; he saw his role as a writer and intellectual as that of truth teller, however embarrassing and discomfiting the truth might turn out to be; he was decidedly anti-capitalist and anti-imperialist and never refrained from saying so; he was a man of peace but advocated the virtues of retaliatory violence; he loved passionately and hated passionately—he was especially known for his hatred. Given such a complex character, it is little wonder that McKay remains the most misunderstood figure of the Harlem Renaissance.

McKay's relationship to the Harlem Renaissance is in many ways quite peculiar. He looked at the artistic dimension of the movement, if movement it was, with great interest but a jaundiced eye—and from afar. As he makes clear in A Long Way from Home (1937), McKay never thought much of those who claimed to lead the renaissance. Alain Locke, regarded by some as the "dean" of the movement, was in McKay's eyes a cowardly "pussy-footing professor," especially after Locke, on political grounds, censored McKay's militant submissions to The New Negro (1925), the influential anthology Locke edited. Two of the other leading figures of the Harlem Renaissance, W. E. B. Du Bois and Walter White, McKay thought, subordinated artistic integrity to shortsighted, reformist racial goals. McKay said that White was a "propaganda angel" who, like Du Bois, believed that the Negro should always be made to put his best foot forward in depictions by black artists: no washing of dirty linen in public—it hurts the race. James Weldon Johnson was the only other major figure of the older generation of renaissance writers for whom McKay had genuine affection and respect, as an artist, as a critic, and as a man. The feeling was mutual, and when McKay published Harlem: Negro Metropolis (1940), he dedicated it to the memory of Johnson, who had died two years earlier.

Despite his formidable literary presence, McKay was physically absent from not only Harlem but the United States for almost the entire period of the renaissance. In the autumn of 1919, soon after writing his militant sonnet "If We Must Die," McKay left the United States to spend more than a year in London.

He returned to New York in January 1921 but was off again by September 1922, this time to bolshevik Russia. After eight months in Russia, he moved to Berlin, thence to Paris, the South of France (mainly Marseilles), Barcelona, and finally Tangiers, where he lived for six years before returning to the United States in 1934, by which time the Harlem Renaissance was over.

Despite his misgivings and his absence, however, McKay's work constitutes a major contribution to the Harlem Renaissance and today is a crucial part of its literary canon. "If We Must Die," which Richard Wright called a "new and strange cry," is often considered the opening salvo of the renaissance. It was published during the "red summer" when African Americans across the nation defended themselves against racist violence, and it urged them not to be hunted, penned, and slaughtered like hogs but to fight back, even while dying:

O kinsmen! we must meet the common foe!
 Though far outnumbered let us still be brave,
 And for their thousand blows deal one deathblow!
 What though before us lies the open grave?
 Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,
 Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!

As Joel Augustus Rogers later noted, this poem became the "Negro Marseillaise." And McKay became, according to the poet Melvin Tolson, "the symbol of the New Negro and the Harlem Renaissance." In praising McKay, the black socialists—congregated around A. Philip Randolph and the Messenger magazine—and the black nationalist Garveyites for once sang from the same hymnal. Black preachers recited "If We Must Die" from their pulpits, black schoolchildren learned it by heart, and black newspapers across the country reprinted it, beginning the process of making it the most widely anthologized work written by a black poet. A similarly rapturous reception awaited Harlem Shadows when it appeared in 1922; Negro World, for instance, ran not one but two rave reviews of the volume.

By the end of the year, however, McKay was once again gone. As early as 1919, despite the persecution of radicals during the "red scare," he had openly come out in favor of the Bolshevik revolution. "Every Negro who lays claim to leadership," he wrote in Negro World, "should make a study of Bolshevism and explain its meaning to the colored masses. It is the greatest and most scientific idea afloat in the world today," which if put into practice "might make these United States safe for the Negro." He was now off to Lenin's Russia and would not return until more than a decade had passed. Although he continued to write poetry, he now increasingly turned his hand and time to prose. The first major public fruit of this endeavor was Home to Harlem, a picaresque novel revolving around the adventures of Jake, an African American deserter from World War I, and his return to Harlem. The novel also features Ray, McKay's alter ego, a Haitian intellectual driven into exile by the American occupiers of Haiti. Drawing substantially on McKay's experience as a Pullman waiter and its attendant black proletarian life, the novel is resolutely set in the African American working class, eschewing those whom McKay derisively called "nice Negroes," the Afro-American elite. Indelicate and uncompromising, but in many ways tender, in its depiction of Harlem's working class at work and play, Home to Harlem was the first novel by a black person to head the list of best-sellers in the New York Times. Not surprisingly, however, it was trounced in the black press. Garvey, in a front-page editorial review of the book, called McKay a "literary prostitute" to the white racist public, a traitor to his race; he said that Home to Harlem was "a damnable libel against the Negro." Du Bois, who rarely agreed with Garvey, concurred. Du Bois said that the book, though "not wholly bad," catered to the "prurient demand" of a decadent white readership, and that he himself, after reading certain passages— "the dirtier parts of its filth"—had felt "distinctly like taking a bath." McKay did not take this lying down. From Barcelona he wrote to Du Bois, saying that he did not care about Du Bois's opinion of Home to Harlem, since Du Bois's own writings never revealed "any comprehension of esthetics" and Du Bois was therefore "not competent or qualified to pass judgment upon any work of art." As for Garvey, McKay contemptuously dismissed him as "a West Indian charlatan" (before he died, however, McKay would revise his appraisal of Garvey in a radically more favorable direction). But despite his bravado, McKay was hurt by his black critics. Similar objections arose after Banjo came out the following year. James Weldon Johnson was the only member of the older generation to publicly write favorable comments about McKay's fiction. Even McKay's old friend Arturo (Arthur A.) Schomburg wrote an unfavorable review of Home to Harlem and questioned McKay's motives for writing it.

The clash between McKay and his critics was more a matter of philosophy than a question of venal motives. McKay, through circumstances and to a lesser extent by choice, had worked and lived among the African American proletariat. (He consistently referred to himself in his post-Jamaican exile as “not only a Negro, but a worker.”) This was the world he knew best, and this was the world he depicted in both Home to Harlem and Banjo. As McKay points out in his riposte, “A Negro Writer to His Critics” (1932), as an artist he cannot go along with the “nice Negroes” who believe that “Negroes in literature and art should be decorous and decorative.” Like Langston Hughes (“The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain,” 1926), he sees no crime in depicting black proletarian life as he found it. “I want to see Negro artists express themselves to the limit,” McKay wrote to a friend in 1927. “They should exclude nothing, limit themselves to nothing. They should make their voices as strong, sweet, broad, strange, sad, happy and varied as all Negro life itself is.” He expressed sympathy for his critics’ position, but as an artist he could not help them by censoring himself in the way they desired; it was shortsighted and inimical to the artistic enterprise. “We must leave the real appreciation of what we are doing to the emancipated Negro intelligentsia of the future,” he told James Weldon Johnson, adding sarcastically, “while we are sardonically aware now that only the intelligentsia of the ‘superior race’ is developed enough to afford artistic truth.” It is noteworthy that none of McKay’s critics claimed that the world he depicted did not exist, or that his depiction was inaccurate; the criticism instead focused on the very depiction of that world for public gaze.

Despite the reaction of black critics, McKay had his defenders among the people who really counted in the forward movement of the artistic side of the Harlem Renaissance: the young writers. Langston Hughes, the most gifted of the lot, adored McKay—from his first encounter with McKay’s poetry as a schoolboy in Cleveland right up to his death. It was McKay, he said, who had set him on the road to becoming an artist. He loved Home to Harlem and declared McKay “the best.” Gwendolyn Bennett expressed a similar love for McKay. As late as 1928, Wallace Thurman, despite misgivings about McKay’s attachment to the sonnet as a literary form, acknowledged McKay’s mental depth. More than the rest of the black poets, Thurman observed, McKay “has really had something to say”; moreover, “he is the only Negro poet who ever wrote revolutionary or protest poetry.” Eric Walrond, Arna Bontemps, Zora Neale Hurston, Dorothy West, and even Countee Cullen, the most straitlaced and conservative of the group before the 1930s, expressed deep admiration for McKay and his work, both privately and publicly. McKay became close friends with many of them after he returned to the United States in 1934.

During the 1920s, McKay served as the chief conduit for the work of renaissance writers in Europe. Through a close friendship with sisters Paulette and Jeanne Nardal in particular, he put African Americans in contact with African and Caribbean intellectuals in Paris. It was McKay who first introduced Locke to the Nardal sisters, who were Martinican writers and editors of an influential and pioneering journal, La Revue du Monde Noire. McKay’s poetry was translated and published in France; all his novels, including Home to Harlem and Banjo, set in Marseilles, were quickly translated into French. Banjo, in particular, exercised an enormous influence on the négritude movement that developed in the 1930s, led by Aimé Césaire, Léopold Sedar Senghor, and Léon Gontran Damas.

Despite his focus on fiction during the 1920s, McKay continued to write poetry. Many of his poems remain unpublished, but a substantial number appeared in American journals such as The Crisis and Opportunity. He also wrote essays; the most remarkable is “Soviet Russia and the Negro,” published in two parts in The Crisis (December 1923 and January 1924), about his “magic pilgrimage” to bolshevik Russia, a powerful apologia extolling the merits of bolshevism for oppressed blacks.

Through the waning days of the Harlem Renaissance, McKay published Gingertown (1932), a collection of short stories set in Harlem and the Caribbean, and then his best novel, Banana Bottom (1933), set in his native Jamaica at the turn of the century. These works hardly sold; the Depression had annihilated the market for black novels. McKay returned from Tangiers in 1934 to a Harlem in such a desperate situation that it was hardly recognizable. He soon found work with the Federal Writers’ Project (FWP) and tried to form an all-black Negro Writers’ Guild among the black writers of FWP; due to vociferous opposition from black members of the Communist Party, however, the Negro Writers’ Guild was destroyed. By 1938, McKay was out of work, largely, he plausibly claimed, because of the machinations of his communist enemies in FWP. He had offended both the Communist Party and the establishment in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) by his critical and “suicidally frank” travelogue, A Long Way from Home, published the previous year. After Harlem: Negro Metropolis appeared in 1940, matters got worse: McKay was more isolated than ever, and he suffered severe hardship and ill health, including several strokes, in the 1940s. McKay's black nationalist tendencies became even more pronounced during the Depression years. He powerfully propounded them in newspaper articles, including his column in the Amsterdam News; most forcefully in the final chapter of A Long Way from Home; and in his blistering attack in Harlem: Negro Metropolis on the hypocrisy and shenanigans of the Communist Party regarding the "Negro question."

Through the efforts of Ellen Tarry, a black Catholic member of FWP, McKay received needed help from the Catholic church. In 1944 he moved to Chicago, where he did work with progressive Catholics. To the consternation of his closest friends, who had admired his forthright atheism, McKay converted to Catholicism toward the end of 1944. He died on 22 May 1948 and was buried in New York. He was fifty-six years old.

The final, so-called Catholic, phase of McKay's life is the most misunderstood and therefore deserves the mention of a few basic facts. McKay worked for Bishop Bernard Sheil and the Catholic Youth Organization; both the man and the organization were among the most progressive forces in Chicago during the Depression. Sheil delivered stirring May Day speeches to workers, and he was highly respected in Chicago's African American community. The pacifist-socialist Catholic Worker Movement, led by Dorothy Day, was the other organization with which McKay established the closest ties. He contributed some important later poems to its newspaper, the Catholic Worker. As he wrote to a friend in 1946, there is "a formidable left wing" in the Catholic church, to which he belonged. He denounced American imperialism and sided with the Soviet Union against Britain and the United States in the early days of the cold war. In an angry letter to Max Eastman, his former Trotskyist friend who had become a vehement "cold warrior," he wrote:

I try to see things from the standpoint of right and wrong and when Soviet Russia is wrong I will say so. When the U.S. and Great Britain are wrong I will say so too, and the two latter in my mind are more often wrong than the Soviet nation. I am certainly never going to carry the torch for British colonialism or American imperialism abroad.

McKay—a longtime admirer of the vanquished Leon Trotsky, whom he met during his sojourn in Russia—now developed a grudging admiration for the cunning and "genius of His Satanic Majesty," Joseph Stalin, and for Stalin's chess game with the western powers in Europe. Writing in February 1945, he confessed, however, that he was awaiting the denouement "in fear and trembling."

He denounced America and Britain as hypocrites and fascists and spoke of the "fascist-oppressed Negroes" in the United States and the British empire at a time when both the United States and Britain claimed to be fighting a war against fascism. He published "Look Within" in the Catholic Worker in January 1945:

Lord, let me not be silent while we fight
 In Europe Germans, Asia Japanese
 For setting up a Fascist way of might While fifteen million Negroes on their knees
 Pray for salvation from the Fascist yoke
 Of these United States.

The following year, again in the Catholic Worker, he published "Tiger," describing the white man as a tiger at his throat drinking his blood as his life ebbs away, "And muttering that his terrible striped coat/Is Freedom's and portends the Light of Day."

Europe and Africa and Asia wait
 The touted New Deal of the New World's hand!
 New systems will be built on race and hate,
 The Eagle and the Dollar will command.
 O Lord! My body, and my heart too, break—
 The tiger in his strength his thirst must slake!

In the "Cycle Manuscript"—his last major work, his testament—McKay sang in sonnet form in praise of Garvey, declaring at the end "nothing the professors do can sever / You from the people to whom you belong forever."

McKay's so-called anticommunism was largely aimed at white communists in the United States whom he saw as opportunistic and untrustworthy with regard to the struggles of African Americans. Despite his bitter disagreements with the Communist Party, however, McKay never cooperated with the agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation who came to him for information. When an emissary from the Dies Committee (an anticommunist congressional outfit) came to see him in September 1939, McKay said, "I'm sure that the real America would not think

I was contributing anything to good citizenship by being a son-a-bitch." An agent came again the year before McKay died, and the answer was the same. The agent's notes of the meeting read: "McKay was somewhat reluctant to discuss his past activities and stated that he had no desire to discuss individual Communists as he did not care to get anyone in trouble."

As McKay repeatedly said, he was always pro-union and pro-working class, and in many ways he remained a socialist, stating in one of his last pieces of writing: "I can see nothing wrong about a planned economy. . . . If the richest country in the world had planned beforehand, it might have avoided a ten-year depression and a second world war." He repeatedly expressed his admiration for Henry Wallace, who ran for president on the American Labor Party ticket in 1948. The fact that Wallace was the candidate supported by the Communist Party did not deter McKay. He especially liked Wallace's anti-racist and anti-imperialist positions.

Claude McKay, photographed by Carl Van Vechten, c. 1920–1940. (Library of Congress.)

McKay's abiding loyalty was to the black working class, the kind of people with whom he worked on the Pullman trains and in other menial jobs. Those were his people. As he put it in "The Negro's Tragedy," another of the sonnets from the "Cycle Manuscript," which was also published in the Catholic Worker:

It is the Negro's tragedy I feel
Which binds me like a heavy iron chain,
It is the Negro's wounds I want to heal
Because I know the keenness of his pain.

Grappling with the Negro's tragedy was a constant in McKay's turbulent life, including the period after his unexpected turn to Catholicism. And despite his failing health, powers, and resources, after his conversion he remained—as he told Max Eastman at the time—"no less a fighter."

Biography

Claude McKay (Festus Claudius McKay) was born 15 September 1889 in James Hill, Clarendon, Jamaica. He was the youngest of eleven children, eight of whom lived to maturity, born to Hannah Ann Elizabeth Edwards McKay and Thomas McKay, prosperous peasant proprietors. In 1897, he went to live with his eldest brother, Uriah Theodore McKay, a schoolmaster in Saint James, western Jamaica, who educated him. He went to Kingston to train as a tradesman, but left soon afterward as a consequence of an earthquake in 1907. He met the English aristocrat and folklorist Walter Jekyll in 1909. McKay went to Kingston and worked in a match factory before joining the Jamaican constabulary in 1910; he left the constabulary in October 1911, having served for seventeen months. He published his first volume of verse, Songs of Jamaica (1912), quickly followed by Constab Ballads in the same year. In July 1912 he left Jamaica, a freethinker and a Fabian socialist, for study at Tuskegee Institute in the United States; he left Tuskegee the same year for Kansas State College in Manhattan, Kansas. He abandoned college in 1914 and went to New York; with a friend, he opened a restaurant in Brooklyn that soon failed. In 1914 he married his childhood sweetheart, but the marriage effectively ended within six months when his wife returned to Jamaica pregnant. McKay then led an itinerant proletarian life, at one point working as a Pullman waiter. In 1916, he published his first poem since leaving Jamaica, in Seven Arts under the name Eli Edwards. In 1918, an autobiographical sketch was published in Pearson's Magazine, edited by Frank Harris; McKay established close friendships with Harris and with Max and Crystal Eastman, editors of the Liberator. McKay joined Industrial Workers of the World in 1919 and in the same year published "If We Must Die" in the Liberator to both notoriety and wide acclaim. He left for London and the Netherlands in the autumn of 1919. He joined Sylvia Pankhurst's Workers' Socialist Federation and worked with her on the Workers' Dreadnought, in which he published many articles and some of his most radical poems. In 1920 he published Spring in New Hampshire and Other Poems, his first collection since leaving Jamaica. He returned to New York in January 1921 and was soon made associate editor of the Liberator. He joined the African Blood Brotherhood—a black revolutionary socialist organization—and became a member of its supreme council. He published Harlem Shadows in 1922 and soon thereafter left for Russia, where he stayed for more than eight months, leaving for Berlin in June 1923. He wrote "Soviet Russia and the Negro," published in two parts in Crisis (1923–1924). He left Berlin for Paris, then settled in Marseilles. In 1926 he finished a novel, "Color Scheme," which he destroyed after failing to find an American publisher. In 1928, Home to Harlem was published to acclaim and derision; Banjo was published a year later, followed by Gingertown (1932) and Banana Bottom (1933). In the late 1920s McKay moved between Marseilles and Barcelona; in 1928 he finally settled in Tangiers, where he remained until his return to the United States in 1934. He worked in the Federal Writers' Project up to 1938, when he was dismissed (ostensibly because he was not a citizen); he wrote a column for the Amsterdam News and articles in various journals including the Nation, New Leader, and Jewish Frontier in the 1930s. He published a travelogue, A Long Way from Home (1937). McKay was attacked by members of polite Negro society (such as Alain Locke) as well as the Communist Party. (Zora Neale Hurston spoke up in his defense.) In 1940 he published Harlem: Negro Metropolis, which offended the Communist Party and fellow travelers. He wrote a novel, Harlem Glory, but failed to find a publisher. In 1942 McKay became ill and was unemployed and almost destitute. He was cared for by Catholics, in particular the black writer Ellen Tarry, and became associated with a Catholic organization, Friendship House in Harlem. He got work in a shipyard in Newark in 1943 but suffered a severe stroke; he began writing "Cycle Manuscript" while recovering in Connecticut. In April 1944 he moved to Chicago to work for the Catholic Youth Organization led by Bishop Bernard J. Sheil, a progressive force in the Catholic Church. McKay reestablished contact with Dorothy Day of the socialist-pacifist Catholic Worker movement, whom he had known from his days at the Liberator. On 11 October 1944 he was baptized and received into the Catholic church. He finished "My Green Hills of Jamaica" in 1946. McKay died in Chicago on 22 May 1948, age fifty-six.

WINSTON JAMES

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Amsterdam News; Bennett, Gwendolyn; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Eastman, Max; Federal Programs; Garvey, Marcus; Harlem: Negro Metropolis; Harlem Shadows; Home to Harlem; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Liberator, The; Locke, Alain; Negritude; New Negro, The; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Thurman, Wallace; Workers' Dreadnought; Wright, Richard; specific writers

Selected Works

- A Long Way from Home: An Autobiography*. New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1970. (Originally published 1937.)
- Harlem: Negro Metropolis*. New York: Dutton and Company, 1940.
- The Passion of Claude McKay: Selected Poetry and Prose, 1912–1948*, ed. Wayne Cooper. New York: Schocken, 1973.

Further Reading

- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- James, Winston. Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in Early Twentieth Century America. New York: Verso, 1999.
- . Fierce Hatred of Injustice: Claude McKay's Jamaica and His Poetry of Rebellion. New York: Verso, 2000.
- . "A Race Outcast from an Outcast Class: Claude McKay's Experience and Analysis of Britain." In West Indian Intellectuals in Britain, ed. Bill Schwartz. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press, 2003.

McLeod, Alan L. Claude McKay: Centennial Studies. New Delhi, India: Sterling, 1992.

Tillery, Tyrone. Claude McKay: A Black Poet's Struggle for Identity. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992.

McKinney, Nina Mae

The actress, singer, and dancer Nina Mae McKinney was the first black woman to play a significant role in a Hollywood film: Hallelujah (1929), in which she initiated the character of the sultry black temptress. This film also marked the beginning of an irksome stereotype; for years to come, lighter-skinned black women would be cast as exotic sexual objects.

McKinney was born in South Carolina in 1912 and lived with an aunt, Carrie Sanders, who was a maid for a rich white couple. As a girl, McKinney was talented and eager to woo an audience. She performed stunts on her bicycle while riding to the post office to pick up mail for her aunt's employer, and she acted in plays at a local industrial school for black children. At age thirteen, she joined her mother, Georgia Crawford McKinney, in New York City. Soon she was performing in nightclubs in Harlem; in 1928 she was given a role in Lew Leslie's Broadway musical Blackbirds; while still in her teens, she went to Hollywood during its brief period of interest in producing all-black films. After starring as the seductive Chick in Hallelujah, she was called "the screen's first black love goddess." In this film, a "bad girl"—Chick—lures a country preacher (played by Daniel Haynes) away from his congregation and into a life of sin; her death frees him to reclaim his virtue. Hallelujah was hugely successful, but some black critics considered it trite and stereotypical. According to some black film historians, it suggests that blacks have a natural bent toward violence and immorality, and its ending has disturbing social implications: the immoral racially mixed black woman serves as an object lesson against miscegenation and represents a threat to racial harmony.

McKinney received glowing reviews for her performance in Hallelujah, obtained a five-year contract with MGM, and appeared in two other films while she was under contract—Safe in Hell (1931) and Reckless (1935). She was not able to repeat her success, however; like many other African American artists of the period she went to Europe, where she found acceptance. She sang in cafés in Paris and London and was billed as the "black Garbo"; she also toured in Dublin and Budapest. In 1930, having returned from Europe, she appeared on Broadway in Congo Road; however, she still found Hollywood indifferent to her when she returned there in 1932.

Later, she met Paul Robeson abroad and starred with him in a stylized British production, Sanders of the Rivers (1935). McKinney played an African princess, with a southern accent, glitzy costumes, and makeup. Most of her film work during the late 1930s and 1940s consisted of roles in all-black independent productions such as Gang Smashers (1938), The Devil's Daughter (1939), Straight to Heaven (1939), Mantan Messes Up (1946), and Night Train to Memphis (1946). She starred as a discontented mulatto in Pinky (1949); some critics consider this her most notable role.

During the 1930s and 1940s, McKinney toured the United States with her own band. (When she returned to South Carolina with the band for a benefit performance in Columbia, the seating in the auditorium was segregated.) In the 1950s and 1960s, she lived in Athens, Greece, where she was called the "queen of nightlife." She returned to New York shortly before she died. In her honor, her likeness was placed on a brick wall near the courthouse in her hometown, Lancaster, along with pictures of other famous natives, including President Andrew Jackson.

Biography

Nina Mae (Nannie Mayme) McKinney was born 12 June 1912 in Lancaster, South Carolina. She attended public schools in Lancaster and New York City. She began her professional career as a dancer in nightclubs in Harlem. Her first film, Hallelujah (1928), established her as the archetypal tragic mulatto. She performed in several other films from the 1930s through the 1940s, including Pinky (1949), which is considered her strongest role. She launched a singing career in Europe and led a band in United States; her credits also include Congo Road on Broadway and several black independent films. She was married to the jazz musician Jimmy Monroe. McKinney died in New York City on 3 May 1967, at age fifty-four.

AUDREY THOMAS MCCCLUSKEY

See also Blackbirds; Hallelujah; Robeson, Paul

Filmography

Hallelujah. 1929.
They Learned about Women. 1930.
Safe in Hell. 1931.
Pie, Pie, Blackbird. 1932.
Kentucky Minstrels. 1934.
Sanders of the River. 1935.
Reckless. 1935.
The Black Network. 1936.
On Velvet. 1938.
Gang Smashers. 1938.
Straight to Heaven. 1939.
The Devil's Daughter. 1939.
Swanee Showboat. 1940.
Together Again. 1944.
Dark Waters. 1944.
The Power of the Whistler. 1945.
Night Train to Memphis. 1946.
Mantan Messes Up. 1946.
Danger Street. 1947.
Pinky. 1949.
Rain. 1951.

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Blacks in American Films and Television: An Illustrated Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1988.
———. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretative History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Continuum, 1999.
Johnson, Helen A. Black America Onstage. New York: Graduate Center of the University of the State of New York, 1978.
Mapp, Edward. Blacks in American Films: Today and Yesterday. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow, 1972.
Null, Gary. Black Hollywood: The Negro in Motion Pictures. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1975.
Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1995.

Mencken, H. L.

In the 1920s, Henry Lewis (H. L.) Mencken was one of the most publicly recognized intellectuals of the day. A journalist, editor, prolific author, and social and literary critic, Mencken turned his satiric wit on the cultural landscape of the United States, in particular battling the “genteel tradition” and the vestiges of Puritanism that he saw as stifling America’s artists and thinkers.

Many luminaries of the Harlem Renaissance expressed admiration for Mencken at one time or another. In his autobiography, James Weldon Johnson wrote that in the 1910s, “Mencken had made a sharper impression on my mind than any other American then writing.” In 1918, Johnson called Mencken “the cleverest writer in America today,” and went on to express his admiration for the controversial stands that Mencken often took, saying that “the best part of Mencken is truth.” Nella Larsen, W. E. B. Du Bois, Countee Cullen, Zora Neale Hurston, and the editor of the influential black newspaper the Pittsburgh Courier all read Mencken with interest and often praised him. Mencken earned their respect, in part, by using his own editorial position to challenge prevailing views of race, attacking the Ku Klux Klan and other such groups and drawing attention to African American cultural contributions through his reviews and essays.

Mencken was also an advocate for black writers, encouraging their work and helping to get it into print. Walter White, for example, said that Mencken encouraged him to write his first novel, The Fire in the Flint. When the manuscript was rejected by one publisher, Mencken persuaded his own publisher, Alfred A. Knopf, to take it. As the editor of the magazines Smart Set and American Mercury, Mencken often opened their pages to black writers, including White, Cullen, Du Bois, and Eric Waldron, providing them with a national forum at a time when they were usually restricted to black-oriented periodicals. Mencken

H. L. Mencken, photographed by Carl Van Vechten, 1932.
(Library of Congress.)

avored no writer of the Harlem Renaissance more than George Schuyler, whose satiric bent was similar to Mencken's, and who appeared in American Mercury more than any writer other than Mencken himself during Mencken's tenure there.

Like most whites associated with the Harlem Renaissance, Mencken has not escaped controversy. Some commentators have accused him of harboring racist (and anti-Semitic) views. Often these charges are based on Mencken's frequent use of derogatory terms for African Americans. His essays on African Americans are filled with terms such as "coon," "darky," and "niggero," although in most cases his intention was obviously satiric. The appearance of such terms in his posthumously published diary is more difficult to dismiss, however.

Biography

Henry Louis Mencken was born 12 September 1880 in Baltimore, Maryland. He graduated from the Baltimore Polytechnic Institute as valedictorian (1896). He was a reporter at the Baltimore Herald (1899–1901); editor, Baltimore Sunday Herald (1901–1903); city editor, Baltimore Morning Herald (1903–1904); city editor, Baltimore Evening Herald (1904–1905); editor in chief, Baltimore Herald (1906); news editor, Baltimore Evening News (1906); editor, Baltimore Sunday Sun (1906–1910); editor, Baltimore Evening Sun (1910–1916); coeditor, Smart Set (1914–1923); coeditor, Parisienne (1915–1916); coeditor, Saucy Stories (1916); coeditor, Black Mask (1920–1921); contributing editor, Nation (1921–1932); editor, American Mercury (1924–1933); and columnist and political correspondent, Baltimore Sunpapers (1919–1941). He married Sara Powell Haardt on 27 August 1930. In 1948 he had a stroke that ended his career. Mencken died on 29 January 1956 in Baltimore.

ERIK BLEDSOE

See also American Mercury; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fire in the Flint, The; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, James Weldon; Larsen, Nella; Pittsburgh Courier; Schuyler, George S.; Walrond, Eric; White, Walter

Selected Works

The American Language: A Preliminary Inquiry into the Development of English in the United States. 1919. (Plus later revisions and supplements.)

Prejudices: First Series. 1919. (First of several in subsequent years.)

The American Credo: A Contribution toward the Interpretation of the National Mind. 1920. (With George Jean Nathan.)

Notes on Democracy. 1926.

James Branch Cabell. 1927. (Rev. ed., 1928.)

Treatise on the Gods. 1930. (Rev. ed., 1946.)

Making a President: A Footnote to the Saga of Democracy. 1932.

Treatise on Right and Wrong. 1934.

The Vintage Mencken, ed. Alistair Cooke. 1955.

Prejudices: A Selection, ed. James T. Farrell. 1958.

The Diary of H. L. Mencken, ed. Charles A. Fecher. 1989.

Further Reading

Douglas, Ann. Terrible Honesty: Mongrel Manhattan in the 1920s. New York: Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1995.

Hobson, Fred. Mencken: A Life. New York: Random House, 1994.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance on Black in White. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way. New York: Viking, 1943.

Scruggs, Charles. The Sage in Harlem: H. L. Mencken and the Black Writers of the 1920s. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984.

———. "H. L. Mencken and James Weldon Johnson: Two Men Who Helped Shape a Renaissance." In Critical Essays on H. L. Mencken, ed. Douglas C. Stenerson. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1987.

Messenger, The

Founded in 1917 by coeditors A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, The Messenger was published erratically until 1919 and thereafter monthly until 1928. As a result of its opposition to World War I and its advocacy of radical labor unionism (the Industrial Workers of the World), the editors were indicted and charged with offenses under the Espionage Act, although they were not convicted. After the war, its support for the Bolshevik revolution and for socialism at home led the federal government to describe it as "the most dangerous of all the Negro publications." The editors muted its militancy in the early 1920s while leading a campaign against Marcus Garvey. In 1925, The Messenger became the official publication of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, which Randolph undertook to organize. When the fortunes of the fledgling union plummeted in 1928, however, the magazine folded for lack of finances.

The Messenger, The Crisis (the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, NAACP), and Opportunity (the magazine of the National Urban League) were perhaps the only nationally circulated black periodicals to actively promote the Harlem Renaissance. The Messenger's political-economic orientation, however, dictated the view that cultural nationalism was secondary to more activist "New Negro" strategies for the progress of the race. Nevertheless, The Messenger opened its pages to poems and short stories by new and unknown writers as well as writers with already established reputations, and it gave additional space to cultural criticism—although without developing a unifying philosophy for the renaissance. Four individuals were primarily responsible for the magazine's literary emphasis: Randolph, who had a prior interest in amateur theater; the theater critic Theophilus Lewis; George S. Schuyler, managing editor in the mid-1920s; and Wallace Thurman, who, although he was on the staff only a short time, used his literary contacts to solicit contributions from, among others, Langston Hughes and Arna Bontemps.

One of The Messenger's two greatest contributions to the Harlem Renaissance was opening its pages to aspiring writers. Although its motive was to radicalize the black proletariat rather than to promote literature, The Messenger printed Claude McKay's "If We Must Die" in 1919 when The Crisis feared to do so. Other poems followed, but it was not until 1923 that the magazine began to print works for their literary rather than their political merit. In sum, in 101 issues The Messenger published more than 250 poems by about ninety individuals, most of whom did not establish a literary reputation but did consider themselves participants in the renaissance.

In addition to unsolicited poetry by unknown writers, work by most of the significant poets of the Harlem Renaissance was printed in The Messenger. Langston Hughes was recognized as a literary "hot property"; sixteen of his poems appeared in the magazine, along with eight by a fellow student at Lincoln University, Edward L. Silvera. Others of the Harlem group besides Hughes and McKay who had poems published in The Messenger were Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Wesley Curtwright, and Johnathan Henderson Brooks. Georgia Douglas Johnson, the doyenne of a literary circle in Washington, D.C., published sixteen poems; other poets from that group who appeared in the magazine were Lewis Alexander, Angelina Grimké, and Walter Everett Hawkins. Members of Boston's Saturday Evening Quill Club who published in The Messenger included Helene Johnson (poems), Eugene Gordon (a monthly feature on the best editorials in the black press), and Dorothy West (a short story). The magazine also printed thirty-five short stories, including some by Zora Neale Hurston, Eric Walrond, and Thurman, and three autobiographical stories by Hughes which were later incorporated into The Big Sea (1940). Finally, Schuyler published a Menckenesque monthly column, "Shafts and Darts," using wit and satire to skewer the likes of Marcus Garvey.

The second major contribution of The Messenger was its thoughtful and consistent commentary on black theater during the Harlem Renaissance. This was the work of the drama critic Theophilus Lewis, whose honest but sympathetic monthly columns from 1923 to 1927 sought to develop an ideology for a national black theater. He applauded popular musical revues for their irreverence and their accessibility to the masses, although he believed that only serious drama, based on black values and rooted in a black consciousness, could produce a genuinely racial theater. Despite this view, he applauded works by white playwrights that offered meaningful roles to black actors, like Eugene O'Neill's All God's Chillun Got Wings. Lewis believed that a greater number of such meaty roles would eventually emerge from black "little theater" groups, and he invariably found something positive in reviewing even the most pedestrian plays. Such efforts, he hoped, would lay the foundation for a future national black theater.

Regarding music, however, The Messenger took a conservative stance. Jazz and blues were not art, but merely raw materials from which a higher culture might be built. The magazine instead sought to encourage interest in classical music through articles on the composers Samuel Coleridge-Taylor and Robert Nathaniel Dett, the pianist Helen E. Hagen, and the tenor Roland Hayes. The magazine longed for productions of black opera to replace the "musical pabulum" of blues.

Despite The Messenger's unwillingness to appreciate black popular musical culture, it made a number of important contributions to the Harlem Renaissance. Theophilus Lewis was, in the opinion of writers like Bontemps, simply the best theater critic of the era. The magazine published as many poems and short stories as did The Crisis and Opportunity, although major figures like Cullen, Hughes, and McKay published much less in The Messenger than in the other two magazines, regarding it as a distinctly third choice. On balance, The Messenger was a major proponent and encourager of the Harlem Renaissance, although it suffers somewhat in comparison with the other two monthlies because its circulation was less than theirs and because it never had someone who functioned exclusively as a literary editor. The renaissance would have been much poorer without any of these magazines: their ultimate significance lies in their encouragement of aspiring artists by publishing these artists' works.

THEODORE KORNEWIBEL

See also Bontemps, Arna; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Crisis, The; Dett, Robert Nathanie; Garvey, Marcus; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Hayes, Roland; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, Helene; Lewis, Theophilus; McKay, Claude; Opportunity; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; Schuyler, George S., Thurman, Wallace; Walrond, Eric; West, Dorothy

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
- Kornweibel, Theodore. "Theophilus Lewis and the Theater of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- . No Crystal Stair: Black Life and the Messenger, 1917–1928. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1975.
- . "Seeing Red": Federal Campaigns against Black Militancy, 1919–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- . "Investigate Everything": Federal Efforts to Compel Black Loyalty during World War I. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Pfeffer, Paula F. A. Philip Randolph, Pioneer of the Civil Rights Movement. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.

Meyer, Annie Nathan

Annie Florance Nathan Meyer was born 19 February 1867 in New York City to Annie Florence Nathan and

Robert Weeks Nathan. The Nathan family is of a notable U.S. Sephardic Jewish lineage and can be traced to Gershom Mendes Seixas, who served as minister of Congregation Sherith Israel in New York during the Revolutionary War. Meyer spent most of her life in New York except for a brief time in Green Bay, Wisconsin, where the family moved following her father's financial losses on the stock market in 1875. The family fell apart after this financial setback; her mother turned to drugs and died in 1878. Following their mother's death, Annie and her three siblings returned to New York to live with their grandparents.

The Nathan children attended public schools, but when her older sister Maud married, Annie Nathan quit school to manage the family's household. Through outside tutoring, she prepared for college and enrolled in the Collegiate Course for Women at Columbia University in 1885. To her disappointment, she learned that the women's curriculum was not the same as that for men at Columbia. After marrying a prominent physician, Alfred Meyer, on 15 February 1887, she left Columbia and studied independently, developing her literary skills. Her experience at Columbia University sent her on a quest to establish a college for women. On 28 January 1888, in an article in The Nation, Meyer began her campaign for the creation of New York's first women's college. Barnard College, named for a former president of Columbia University who supported higher education for women, formally opened on 7 October 1889 with seven students. Meyer maintained close ties with the college throughout her life and served on the board of trustees from 1893 through 1942. In 1915, her daughter Margaret was among the graduating class. On Meyer's seventieth birthday, the Annie Nathan Meyer Drama Library was established by Barnard College.

Meyer, a liberal, was active in numerous causes, some of which were controversial, such as the anti-suffrage movement. She also participated in numerous organizations, including the Daughters of the American Revolution (DAR), the League of Women Voters, and the National Council of Women. Her liberal ideas facilitated her willingness to work with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); to sponsor Zora Neale Hurston as Barnard's first black student; and to donate books on black history and culture to Hunter College. In 1932, the Provincetown Players produced her play Black Souls, which dealt with racial problems. Meyer was a prolific writer, having written twenty-six plays, three of which were produced on Broadway; eleven books; numerous short stories, essays, and addresses; and hundreds of letters to newspapers. Her last book, It's Been Fun, was scheduled for publication at the time of her death. Following her death in 1951, an editorial in the New York Times described her as "a lively and constructive force for good in this city," possessing a "sense of humor that was one of her useful weapons in winning an argument."

Biography

Annie Florance Nathan Meyer was born 19 February 1867 in New York City, where she would spend most of her life. Her parents were Annie Florence Nathan and Robert Weeks Nathan. She enrolled at Columbia University in 1885; married Alfred Meyer, a physician, on 15 February 1887; left Columbia to study independently; was instrumental in the founding of Barnard College in 1889; and served on Barnard's board of trustees from 1893 to 1942. She was an activist in many causes; a participant in many organizations; and an author of books, plays, and essays. Meyer died of a heart attack on 23 September 1951.

KAREN COTTON MCDANIEL

See also Hurston, Zora Neale; Provincetown Players

Further Reading

"Annie Nathan Meyer." New York Times, 25 September 1951, p. 28.

Brody, Seymour. "Annie Nathan Meyer." In Jewish Heroes and Heroines of America: 150 True Stories of American Jewish Heroism. Hollywood, Fla.: Lifetime, 1996.

Gordon, Lynn D. "Annie Nathan Meyer and Barnard College: Mission and Identity in Women's Higher Education, 1889–1950." History of Education Quarterly, 26(4), 1986, 503–522.

"An Inventory of the Annie Nathan Meyer Papers." (Web site.)

"Mrs. Meyer Dead; Barnard Trustee." New York Times, 24 September 1951, p. 27.

Micheaux, Oscar

Few African American artists have had a career spanning such a breadth of time and genres, or have achieved such a high degree of popularity, as Oscar Micheaux. Following his first novel, which was published just before World War I, Micheaux would go on to write half a dozen full-length works of fiction over the next four decades. Yet it was in the new twentieth-century medium of film that he gained his greatest success as a storyteller, directing and producing more than forty movies between 1919 and 1948. Micheaux's movies—part of the genre called "race films"—addressed multiple aspects of the African American experience and were aimed specifically at black audiences. Still, his work remained on the periphery of the intellectual and cultural movement known as the Harlem Renaissance. The elite of the movement often regarded film itself as "low-grade" entertainment, and Micheaux's frequent use of negative stereotypes and his emphasis on conservative values earned him much criticism from black leaders.

Micheaux's early life shaped many of the values that he would inject into his novels and films. He was born in 1884 near Murphysboro, Illinois, the fifth of thirteen children. At age seventeen, he joined his older brother in Chicago, the destination of thousands of African Americans during the "great migration." Although Chicago's booming economy allowed for steady employment that helped sustain a growing black community, Micheaux found urban life too hectic and oppressive. Within a year, he took a job as a Pullman porter, which allowed him to travel, save money, and, especially, perfect the kinds of social skills in dealing with whites that would aid him as a young entrepreneur. In 1905, he used his savings to acquire a homestead in southern South Dakota, where he spent several years living in a sod house and raising crops. Black pioneers were a rarity in rural South Dakota, but apparently he gained the trust and respect of his white neighbors. Having removed himself from the urban centers of African American culture in the east, Micheaux often expressed disgust with blacks who huddled in overgrown cities rather than pursue opportunities for land ownership and self-employment in the American west, as he had done.

This was the theme of his first published book, The Conquest (1913), an autobiographical account of his experiences as a farmer on the great plains. The hero, Oscar Devereaux (a name very close to Micheaux's own), is a hardworking, enterprising young black man who becomes a western pioneer and rises above his poor, unambitious relatives. Much of The Conquest provides a sociological study of agricultural and community life of the area around the Rosebud reservation; later in the novel there is an explanation of Devereaux's failed marriage to the daughter of a demagogic black preacher, whose interference causes the couple to divorce—a story based directly on Micheaux's experience with his first wife, Orlean McCracken. Indeed, Micheaux's book seemed an attempt both to express his personal bitterness over the divorce and to condemn the values of his former in-laws. Micheaux dedicated The Conquest to Booker T. Washington, the black educator whose advocacy of self-help and economic advancement collided with the growing "Niagara movement," popular among black professionals, which encouraged racial solidarity and attainment of social and legal rights. Although the Niagara movement gradually gained strength in subsequent decades, Micheaux would remain steadfastly loyal to Washington's ideas, portraying himself and his fictional heroes as self-made men who won the respect of whites through hard work rather than through confrontations with racism.

Micheaux's ideal self-made man was no mere facade. Having had his previous short stories rejected by publishers, he paid for the costs of printing The Conquest (anonymously) out of his own pocket, and even set up his own distribution system for marketing the book, first among his neighbors in South Dakota and then by traveling personally to the homes of black people across the South. His experience as an African American author and bookseller formed the basis for his second novel, The Forged Note, in 1915. By this time, Micheaux's homesteading operations had failed—most of his land had been lost to bank foreclosures—and writing appeared the most likely way to make a living. The profits generated by The Conquest, although meager, financed the establishment of his new firm, the Western Book and Supply Company. In 1917, the company published his third and longest novel, The Homesteader, which amounted to a reworking of The Conquest albeit with more melodrama and complexity. Like Oscar Devereaux, the protagonist of The Homesteader, Jean Baptiste, is a black pioneer who leaves city life for the openness of the west—and he too searches fruitlessly for romance, first with Agnes, the white daughter of a local farmer; and then with Orlean McCarthy, the daughter of a mean-spirited black minister in Chicago. The Homesteader was a success with the reading public and critics alike, though many readers found its ending contrived (Agnes is revealed to be part black and therefore a suitable partner for Baptiste, so that they can marry and live happily ever after).

The Homesteader also served as Micheaux's vehicle into the medium of film. In 1918, he was approached by two young black filmmakers, George and Noble Johnson, about adapting the novel into a movie. The parties signed a contract and began filming in Los Angeles. Micheaux, with his characteristic aplomb, however, insisted on directing the film himself, and so the deal was canceled. Undeterred, he renamed Western Book and Supply the Micheaux Book and Film Company and began selling stock to white farmers in the plains states in hopes of producing the screen version of The Homesteader himself. With a budget of $15,000, he hired a cast of actors and shot the eight-reel production in a leased studio in Chicago. The Homesteader—the longest African American film to that date—opened in 1919 just as black veterans were returning from the war in Europe. Thanks to Micheaux's genius in promoting it, the film played in New York, Chicago, and important midwestern cities; was applauded by black newspapers like the Chicago Defender; and earned Micheaux a sizable profit.

Little is known about Micheaux's personal life in the 1920s, although judging from the sheer volume of films that his company produced, these were certainly his most prolific years as a storyteller. At the same time as the burst of creative energy in the arts and literature during that decade, African American filmmakers produced silent "race movies" that blacks could see in churches, private homes, armories, and segregated theaters. In films produced by whites at that time, black characters were often depicted as stereotypical clowns and toadies; in race films, by contrast, many black characters were proud, dignified role models. Moreover, the plots of race films often addressed subjects considered taboo in mainstream films, such as lynching, interracial romance, and prejudice. In the aftermath of a series of race riots that erupted in the summer of 1919, such topics could be seen as inflammatory; consequently, Micheaux and other African American directors often had to answer to local boards of reviewers and censors and cut footage that white authorities considered too controversial.

Micheaux did not shrink from controversy and in fact even used it as an opportunity for advertising. Within Our Gates (1920) depicted the lynching of a black sharecropper who was accused of murdering his vicious landlord. When southern censors and theaters rejected the film because of at least one very graphic scene, Micheaux ran ads in black metropolitan newspapers promising to deliver the uncut version that "tells it all." In another film, The Brute, also released in 1920, Micheaux presented the story of a black prizefighter and dealt with the complicated subject of domestic abuse in African American families. In The Symbol of the Unconquered, he returned to a western theme: a gallant black frontiersman helping a young woman to defend her land. The ending is reminiscent of The Homesteader: the protagonist learns that the heroine has been passing for white, and so she becomes his love. Several of Micheaux's other films also have this theme: a black hero and a white woman are kept apart by society's fear of miscegenation until the revelation of "a drop of black blood" makes their union possible. Some critics have faulted Micheaux for apparently condoning the "one-drop rule," but others have seen in his stories an attempt to mock white America's insistence on rigid racial boundaries.

Despite the popularity of his work, the financial pressures of independent filmmaking gave Micheaux little time to enjoy his success. As his company expanded, he insisted on personally supervising all its functions, from writing scenes to directing and even to handling routine accounting. Micheaux often financed his productions by selling theater owners first rights to a new release, sometimes accompanied by actors who would perform a scene for the benefit of a prospective investor.

By the late 1920s, race films—unable to compete with the high-quality films produced by the major studios—were suffering a decline. As a consequence, the Micheaux Book and Film Company declared bankruptcy in 1928. A year later, Micheaux married the actress Alice Russell, whose financial and emotional support revived his career. In 1931, with the backing of white theater owners in Harlem, he released his first sound picture, a full-length feature film called The Exile, yet another romanticized account of his experiences in the west.

While The Exile did reasonably well and enjoyed a long run, Micheaux's "talkies" never attained the same level of success as his silent pictures. His films in the 1930s were basic reworkings of themes he had established earlier: for example, Veiled Aristocrats (1932) was an attack on African American elites and God's Stepchildren (1938) was about a railroad porter who saves money to buy a farm. Although social commentary remained important in all his works, the Great Depression also caused Micheaux to be more mindful of market demands. Increasingly, he augmented his plots with singing, dancing, or comedy acts, some of which were popular numbers known to patrons of the Cotton Club in Harlem and other nightspots. By the late 1930s, reviewers were regularly lambasting his films as predictable and amateurish.

Micheaux returned to writing novels during the years of World War II, an endeavor he had abandoned after his initial successes as a filmmaker. Struggling with arthritis and often confined to a wheelchair, he relied more on his wife, Alice, who sometimes appeared in his films, to edit his manuscripts and assist with their sale and distribution. The Case of Mrs. Wingate (1945) deals with an interracial romance between a white woman in Georgia and her black chauffeur, with an added melodramatic plot involving fascist spies and an attempt to assassinate Eleanor Roosevelt. International spies also appeared in his detective tale, The Story of Dorothy Stanfield (1946). By this time, Micheaux had such a loyal following for both his books and his films that these works sold quite well. However, critics faulted him for telling unrealistic stories in which African Americans appeared in roles and situations improbable for the time; these critics also objected to Micheaux's habit—which bordered on libel—of retaliating against actual persons who had offended him by depicting them as thinly disguised villains. After an eight-year hiatus, Micheaux returned to film with The Betrayal (1948), an adaptation of his last pioneer novel, The Wind from Nowhere. Once again, black audiences appeared to enjoy the movie whereas black and white critics alike described it in terms such as “ridiculous” and “a preposterous, inept bore.” The Betrayal proved to be Micheaux’s last major project; his health continued to suffer, and he died of a heart attack while on a trip to Charlotte, North Carolina, in 1951.

Oscar Micheaux. (Photofest.)

Micheaux’s personal and professional lives were truly inseparable. Not only did his own experiences provide the plots for many of his works, but the marginalization—both geographic and ideological—that he felt, relative to the leaders of African American society, became the standard conflict of his stories. Micheaux’s contributions to black culture rest in the enormous popularity of his books and films with ordinary African Americans, in his insistence that film could do more than entertain but could address social issues relevant to race relations, and in the shaping of his own persona as a role model for independent black filmmaking. That tradition would be revived following the civil rights movement, some twenty years after his death.

Biography

Oscar Micheaux was born 2 January 1884 near Murphysboro, Illinois. He moved to Chicago to work as shoeshine boy and Pullman porter in 1901; bought a homestead and became a farmer near Gregory, South Dakota, in 1905; and in 1913 wrote and published his first novel, The Conquest, which was followed by two additional novels, The Forged Note: A Romance of the Darker Races (1915) and The Homesteader (1917). He founded the Micheaux Book and Film Company in 1918 and produced a film version of The Homesteader in 1919. Micheaux released numerous films through the 1920s: Within our Gates, The Brute, and The Symbol of the Unconquered (1920); The Gunsaulus Mystery (1921); The Dungeon (1922); The House behind the Cedars (1923); Body and Soul and Son of Satan (1924); The Conjure Woman (1926); and The Wages of Sin (1928). The book and film company went bankrupt in 1928. Micheaux married the actress Alice Russell in 1929. The first all-black feature-length film, The Exile, was produced in 1931; The House behind the Cedars was remade as Veiled Aristocrats, a sound version, in 1932. Swing and God’s Stepchildren were released in 1938; Lying Lips was released in 1939. Micheaux returned to writing fiction with the publication of The Wind from Nowhere (1944), The Case of Mrs. Wingate (1945), The Story of Dorothy Stanfield (1946), and his last novel, The Masquerade (1947). His last film, The Betrayal, was released in 1948. Micheaux died in Charlotte, North Carolina, on 26 March 1951.

JAMES N. LEIKER

See also Film; Film: Black Filmmakers; Johnson, Noble; Niagara Movement; Race Films

Further Reading

- Bowser, Pearl, and Louise Spence. Writing Himself into History: Oscar Micheaux, His Silent Films, and His Audiences. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Dorsey, Learthen. “Introduction.” In The Conquest: The Story of a Negro Pioneer. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994a. (Bison Book edition.)
- . “Introduction.” In The Homesteader: A Novel. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994b. (Bison Book edition.)
- Elder, Arlene. “Oscar Micheaux: The Melting Pot on the Plains.” Old Northwest, 2(3), 1976, pp. 299–307.
- Fontenot, Chester J., Jr. “Oscar Micheaux, Black Novelist and Film Maker.” In Vision and Refuge: Essays on the Literature of the Great Plains, ed. Virginia Faulkner with Frederick C. Luebke. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982.
- Gaines, Jane. “Fire and Desire: Race, Melodrama, and Oscar Micheaux.” In Black Cinema: History, Theory, Criticism, ed. Manthia Diawara. New York: Routledge and Chapman, Hall/American Film Institute, 1993.
- Green, J. Ronald. “The Micheaux Style.” Black Film Review, 7(4), 1992, pp. 32–34.
- . “Micheaux versus Griffith.” Griffithiana, 60–61, 1997, pp. 32–49.
- Hebert, Janice. “Oscar Micheaux: A Black Pioneer.” South Dakota Review, 11(4), Winter 1973–1974, pp. 62–69.
- hooks, bell. “Micheaux: Celebrating Blackness.” In Black Looks: Race and Representation. Boston, Mass.: South End, 1992.
- Regester, Charlene. “Black Films, White Censors: Oscar Micheaux Confronts Censorship in New York, Virginia, and Chicago.” In Movie Censorship and American Culture, ed. Francis G. Couvares. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1996.
- Reid, Mark. Redefining Black Film. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Van Epps-Taylor, Betti Carol. Oscar Micheaux: A Biography. Rapid City, S.D.: Dakota West, 1999.

Young, Joseph A. Black Novelist as White Racist: The Myth of Black Inferiority in the Novels of Oscar Micheaux. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1989.

Miller, Flournoy

Flournoy E. Miller was born in Columbia, Tennessee, in 1887, the son of a black newspaper editor and the second of three brothers, all significant in black entertainment (the other two were Irvin and Quintard). While studying at Fisk University, he and Aubrey Lyles formed a comedy act, writing their own material.

In 1906 Miller and Lyles joined the innovative Pekin Stock Company in Chicago as performers and resident playwrights. Working at the Pekin gave them contact with major figures like Will Marion Cook, Jesse Shipp, Joe Jordan, and Will Vodery. They contributed material to Ernest Hogan's last production, The Oyster Man, and wrote original shows. One show, The Colored Aristocrats, introduced the comic Jimtown personae, Steve Jenkins (Miller) and Sam Peck (Lyles), that would be associated with them evermore, significantly influencing the history of black—and blackface—entertainment. Another show, The Husband, helped launch Charles Gilpin's career.

In 1909 Miller and Lyles embarked on a vaudeville career that took them to New York. The conventions of the time dictated that black comedians perform in blackface, but Miller and Lyles's witty verbal humor and clever slapstick were far removed from the inanities of minstrelsy. They perfected several comedy devices that were imitated by comedians, black and white, for many years. These included a famous prizefighting routine; "indefinite talk," in which they anticipated the completion of each other's sentences; and "mutilatin" the language ("I's regusted.")

After several successful years in vaudeville, including an English season in 1915 (Charlot's Revue), they achieved even greater fame in 1921, collaborating with the musical duo Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake on the sensational Shuffle Along. This set the style for black shows for more than a decade, inspiring many imitations, including use of the Jimtown pair, Jenkins and Peck, in shows written by others.

After Shuffle Along, Miller and Lyles continued writing, producing, and performing in musicals and dramas, with mixed success. Their biggest successes were Runnin' Wild (1923) and Rang Tang (1927). Numerous attempts to re-create the magic of Shuffle Along, such as Keep Shufflin' (1928), fell flat, though they provided opportunities for black entertainers. In 1928 the pair split. Miller continued writing and performing—for instance, in Blackbirds of 1930, a reunion with Eubie Blake. Miller and Lyles themselves reunited in 1930, collaborating on shows and short films.

By 1930 the radio show Amos 'n' Andy, by Correll and Gosden, white performers similar in style to Miller and Lyles, had become highly successful. Miller and Lyles's own radio show failed, though, and in 1932 they threatened to sue Correll and Gosden for plagiarism. Lyles died shortly afterward.

During the 1930s, Miller's career moved increasingly toward film. Teamed with the comedian Mantan Moreland, he performed in, and wrote for, many black movies from 1933 to 1956, including westerns like Harlem Rides the Range (1939). He moved to Hollywood but was occasionally still involved in theater, as in the final unsuccessful Shuffle Along of 1952. By 1940 he had made peace with the producers of Amos 'n' Andy, becoming a scriptwriting consultant for the show and later recommending Tim Moore for the role of Kingfish in the television version.

Flournoy Miller died in Hollywood on 6 June 1971. His association with Shuffle Along ensures that his memory will endure. He was an innovator who advanced black comedy and entertainment significantly, although his achievements are partly overshadowed today by association with the stereotypes of the blackface era.

Biography

Flournoy E. Miller was born in Columbia, Tennessee, on 14 April 1887. He studied at Fisk University. He was a resident playwright at the Pekin Theater Stock Company, 1906–1909; and founder of the Bijou Stock Company in Jacksonville, Florida, 1908. Between 1922 and 1925 he and Aubrey Lyles made about a dozen 78 rpm recordings on the OKEH label. Miller died in Hollywood on 6 June 1971.

BILL EGAN

See also Amos 'n' Andy; Blackbirds; Blackface Performance; Blake, Eubie; Cook, Will Marion; Gilpin, Charles; Jordan, Joe; Lyles, Aubrey; Miller, Irving; Miller, Quintard; Moore, Tim; Moreland, Mantan;

Musical Theater; Runnin' Wild; Shipp, Jesse A.; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble

Theater Productions and Performances

- 1906: The Man from 'Bam. (Pekin Stock Company.)
 1907: The Mayor of Dixie; The Oyster Man; The Husband. (Pekin Stock Company.)
 1908: Doctor Knight and The Colored Aristocrats. (Pekin Stock Company.)
 1908: Ephraim Johnson from Norfolk. (Bijou Stock Company, Jacksonville, Florida.)
 1912: The Charity Girl.
 1913: The Cabaret.
 1915: Darkydom.
 1915: Charlot's Revue. (London.)
 1918: Who's Stealin.
 1919: Upstairs and Down Below.
 1920: Tunes and Funnies of 1920.
 1921: Shuffle Along.
 1922: Step On It.
 1922: The Flat Below. (Dama, Lafayette Theater.)
 1923: Runnin' Wild.
 1924: Going White; Honey; Negro Nuances; Struttin' Along Liza; Struttin' Time; Backbiters.
 1927: Rang Tang.
 1928: Keep Shufflin'.
 1929: Great Day; A Great Day in N'Orleans.
 1930: Blackbirds of 1930.
 1931: Lazy Rhythm; Sugar Hill.
 1933: Shuffle Along of 1933.
 1934: Get Lucky.
 1935: Cotton Club Parade.
 1938: Dixie Goes High Hat.
 1939: Hollywood Revue.
 1942: Harlem Cavalcade.
 1947: Kitchen Opera.
 1949: Sugar Hill. (Revival, California; also known as Meet Miss Jones.)
 1952: Shuffle Along of 1952.

Films

- 1929: Harlem Knights; Harlem Mania.
 1933: That's the Spirit.
 1938: Mystery in Swing; The Bronze Buckaroo; Harlem Rides the Range.
 1939: Harlem on the Prairie; Double Deal.
 1940: Mr. Washington Goes to Town.

- 1941: Professor Creeps; Lucky Ghost.
 1943: Stormy Weather.
 1946: Mantan Runs for Mayor.
 1948: She's Too Mean for Me; Come On, Cowboy; The Return of Mandy's Husband.
 1951: Yes Sir, Mr. Bones.
 1956: Rockin' the Blues; Untamed Mistress.

Further Reading

- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993a, p. 162.
 ———. A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993b.
 ———. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001, p. 184.
 Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980, pp. 111–114, 115–117.
 Slide, Anthony. The Encyclopaedia of Vaudeville. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1994, p. 345.
 Watkins, Mel. On the Real Side: Laughing, Lying, and Signifying. New York: Touchstone–Simon and Schuster, 1995.
 Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. New York: Da Capo, 1991.

Miller, Irvin

Irvin C. Miller was a producer, comedian, and playwright, active from 1908 to the 1950s. He was one of three brothers in show business, the most famous being the actor-impresario Flournoy Miller and the youngest being the producer Quintard Miller.

Irvin Miller was educated at Fisk University. He performed at Chicago's Pekin Theater in 1908, in shows produced by Flournoy. He was with Scott's Black American Troubadours in 1910 and wrote his first show, Happy Sam from 'Bam, while with this company. He wrote and produced Mr. Ragtime in 1914, while he was with Kid Brown's company, and he costarred with Brown. For fifteen years Miller performed as a duo act with different partners: in 1913–1918 with the singer Esther Bigeou, his wife at the time; in about 1918–1919 with Henry "Gang" Jines; and in around 1920–1928 with Emmett "Gang"

Anthony. He and Anthony became quite prominent in black show business.

Miller specialized in revues featuring beautiful showgirls, snappy dancing, and comedy. Several of his shows appeared repeatedly in new editions from year to year, in the manner of the Ziegfeld Follies. Broadway Rastus was mounted in 1915, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1923, 1924, 1925, and 1928; Brown Skin Models annually from 1924 to 1954; and Brown Skin Revue in 1925. Miller was still sending companies out to tour the hinterlands with shows of this type after World War II.

Miller reached the height of his creativity and success in the early 1920s. He had two successful shows in 1921: Alabama Bound (based on a version of Broadway Rastus), and Put and Take. His greatest success came in 1922 with his script for Liza (original title, Bon Bon Buddy, Jr.), produced by Al Davis.

Miller's other shows included Georgia, Runnin' Wild, Sugar, and Desires of 1927 (all in 1927); Carolina Nights, That's My Baby, Blue Baby, Desires of 1928, Bad Habits of 1928, and the "oriental" show Tokio (all in 1928); Circus Showman (1929); Red Pastures (1930); Club Hollywood Revue (1931); Harlem Scandals (1934); Harlem Broadcast (1936); and Harlem Express (1945). Particularly in the late 1920s, these shows were of variable quality; in some cases, Miller's involvement with them went no farther than allowing his name to be used and collecting some of the box office receipts. In the season of 1927–1928 alone he mounted ten productions at the behest of the Theater Owners' Booking Association alone, in addition to other shows in the same years. Not all his shows were aimed exclusively at the African American market; he sent his "Mikado Entertainers" (apparently an early version of Tokio) out on the Pantages vaudeville circuit.

Miller was adept at getting publicity. In 1927 he announced his intention to build a home in New Jersey for unwed chorus girls and the offspring of their liaisons. By this time, he was also involved in the career of a boxer, Joe Boykins. In 1941 Miller was instrumental in the capture of the murderer of a theater owner in Helena, Arkansas. Miller remained active into the mid-1950s, hiring small companies of young chorus girls, comedians, and musicians to tour the remnants of the black vaudeville circuit in late editions of his Brown Skin Models. He died in 1967.

Miller's shows were noted for the beauty of their showgirls; several also involved talented figures of the Harlem Renaissance. Broadway Rastus of 1919 featured songs from the Pace and Handy catalog, including Handy's hit "Beale Street Blues"; Maceo Pinkard ("Sweet Georgia Brown") wrote music for the 1925 edition, as well as for Liza, which featured some fine dancers and comedians; and Shelton Brooks ("Some of These Days," "The Darktown Strutters' Ball") appeared in the Brown Skin Models of 1927.

Biography

Irvin C. Miller was born in 1884 in Columbia, Tennessee; he was one of three brothers in show business (the others were Flournoy and Quintard). Irvin Miller was educated at Fisk University; he performed at the Pekin Theater in Chicago in 1908 and with Scott's Black American Troubadours in 1910; wrote his first show, Happy Sam from 'Bam while with Scott's company; wrote, produced, and costarred in Mr. Ragtime in 1914, while with Kid Brown's company; worked for fifteen years as a duo with various partners; and produced or otherwise contributed to numerous revues. Miller died in 1967.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Brooks, Shelton; Handy, W. C.; Liza; Miller, Flournoy; Miller, Quintard; Theater Owners' Booking Association

Further Reading

Baltimore Afro-American, 2 July 1927.

New York Amsterdam News, 3 January 1923; 5 October 1927; 11 October 1941.

Peterson, Bernard. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.

Pittsburgh Courier, 8 October 1927; 5 November 1927; 7 January 1928; 18 February 1928.

Miller, Kelly

Kelly Miller's life and work place him squarely among the savants of his time. He was a major contributor to the thought, institution building, and consciousness raising among African Americans between 1880 and 1915 that were a necessary precondition for the birth of the "New Negro" of the 1920s and the Harlem Renaissance. He was "a leader whose instincts favored moderation, reasonableness, harmony, and whose preferred terrain was the common ground between extreme positions" (Wright 1978, 180). Miller served with distinction as an inspiring teacher and administrator at Howard University for most of his academic career, but his national importance derived from his intellectual leadership both as an advocate for his race and as a mediator between supporters and opponents of Booker T. Washington. According to Meier (1966, 267), Miller "voiced the aspiration toward a cultural nationalism not only in his call for the study of Negro history, but also in his belief in a Negro genius in music literature and the arts." Miller is usually overlooked as a contributor to the Harlem Renaissance, but his philosophical outlook put him in the ranks of thinkers such as Alain Locke and W. E. B. Du Bois.

Long before the Harlem Renaissance, Miller embraced the notion of stimulating African American cultural development, serving as a cofounder and president of the American Negro Academy. The academy was limited to forty members, and its mission included promoting literature, science, and the arts; fostering higher education; publishing scholarly work; defending African Americans against vicious attacks; and stressing the importance of a "talented tenth" to lead the masses. "Upon the enlightened Negro has been imposed unusual responsibility and opportunity for service," he wrote in 1908. "He becomes the inevitable leader and exemplar of his people. They look to him as their guide, philosopher, and friend."

Miller was a noteworthy scholar. In Educational Review, Dial, Journal of Social Science, and other leading journals, he argued that African Americans needed wise leadership and that only higher education could provide such leaders. His monograph-length chapter "The Education of the Negro" in a report of the Bureau of Education in 1900–1901 not only displayed a careful marshaling of facts and figures from raw local and state data, but also offered a penetrating analysis of the socialization of African American children through the manipulation of the formal educational process by southern whites and the stratagems of African American teachers to counteract the process and promote race consciousness among these children. Miller's essay "The Harvest of Race Prejudice" appeared in March 1925 in the landmark "Harlem number" of the magazine Survey Graphic, which was republished in expanded book form as The New Negro (1925).

Miller was one of the first African American scholars to write regularly for the black press, with a syndicated column that appeared weekly for nearly twenty years in more than 100 newspapers. At the height of his fame, Miller estimated that his column was read by some half a million newspaper subscribers. He was an extremely forceful and prolific essayist, pamphleteer, and public speaker, whose frank analysis of race relations was directed at friend and foe alike, ranging from the segregationist Thomas Dixon Jr., to Oswald Garrison Villard of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). To those who objected to his pessimism about race relations, he replied, "I want the younger generation to open its eyes. I want to inspire them with courage. Not a blind impotent inane optimism which exults in vain conceit and empty boasting. . . . History discounts and discredits such fatal optimism" (Eisenberg 1960, 185).

In his lectures, books, and essays Miller sought to delineate the basic issues of race relations. Though devoid of elaborate statistical tables, Miller's publications were nonetheless marked by prescient observations derived from his careful study of the raw data. In "Enumeration Errors in Negro Population," Miller explained how the U. S. Census Bureau had compounded some relatively minor initial errors into a serious undercount in the census of 1920.

The emergence of Marcus Garvey and his movement following World War I created a leadership crisis among African Americans. In response to Garvey's challenge and competing visions of group progress among middle-class African American leaders, Miller proposed that the warring factions meet in a great council or "Sanhedrin" to formulate a common program of action for African American progress and achieve a unity of effort. Held in Chicago during February 1924, the Sanhedrin was attended by more than fifty organizations represented by approximately 500 delegates, including James Weldon Johnson of the NAACP, George Edmund Haynes of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, Channing H. Tobias of the African American branch of the YMCA, and a future president of Howard University, Mordecai Johnson. Delegates presented recommendations on a number of issues, including health care, the participation of women in civic affairs, financial assistance to farmers and students, and conditions of urban life for African Americans. Critics of the conference such as Du Bois, however, noted the meeting's weak stand on lynching, segregation, and racial discrimination in industry, as well as its failure to say much of value about housing, intermarriage, union labor, or the resurgence of the Ku Klux Klan. In the end, the conference accomplished virtually nothing. A second attempt to hold a unity conference under the auspices of the communist-controlled National Negro Congress in 1936 also failed. Sadly, old jealousies, poor planning, and Miller's inability to institutionalize the idea of the Sanhedrin led to the eventual collapse of the drive for unity.

By the 1930s Miller's leadership of the race had come to an end. In an era dominated by the competing ideologies of Marxism and capitalism, his pragmatism and lack of a definite philosophy made him a leader of the "old crowd." He would continue to write his weekly newspaper column, but the younger and more militant generation of African Americans thought that his views on important issues were out of step with the realities of the modern age. Ironically, that newer generation owed its existence, in large part, to Miller's tireless efforts as a teacher and advocate for the race.

Biography

Kelly Miller was born 23 July 1863 in Winnsboro, South Carolina. His parents were Elizabeth Roberts and Kelly Miller Sr.; he was the sixth of ten children. He received his primary education at Fairfield Institute in Winnsboro, South Carolina; attended the preparatory department, Howard University, 1880–1882; attended Howard University, 1882–1886 (bachelor of science, 1886); served as a clerk in the U. S. Pension Office, 1882–1886; studied advanced mathematics with Captain Edgar Frisby at the United States Naval Observatory, 1886–1887; was the first African American admitted to the graduate school of John Hopkins University in mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy, 1887–1889; and was awarded a master of arts degree in mathematics (1901) and a doctor of laws degree (1903) from Howard. Miller was a teacher at M Street High School in Washington, D. C. (1889–1890) and was appointed a professor of mathematics at Howard University in 1890. He married Annie May Butler in 1894; they had five children: Newton, Paul, Irene, May, and Kelly Jr. He was a co-founder of the American Negro Academy in 1897. In 1907 he was appointed dean of the college of arts and sciences at Howard, a post he held for twelve years. He founded Howard's sociology department in 1895 and was a professor of sociology at Howard from 1895 to 1934 and its chairman of sociology from 1915 to 1925.

Miller organized Howard's Moorland Foundation in 1914; it was reorganized as the Moorland-Spingarn Research Center in 1973. He was a board member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People as well as the National Urban League. Miller was the author of Radicals and Conservatives (1908), Race Adjustment (1908), Out of the House of Bondage (1910), The Disgrace of Democracy—An Open Letter to President Wilson (1917), History of the Negro in the World War for Human Rights (1920), and The Everlasting Stain (1924). He organized the Negro Sanhedrin in Chicago, Illinois, 1924. Miller died in Washington, D. C., 29 December 1939.

MONROE H. LITTLE JR.

See also Garvey, Marcus; Haynes, George Edmund; Howard University; Johnson, James Weldon; New Negro, The; Survey Graphic; Talented Tenth; Villard, Oswald Garrison

Further Reading

- Eisenberg, Bernard. "Kelly Miller: The Negro Leader as a Marginal Man." Journal of Negro History, 45(3), July 1960, pp.182–197.
- Holmes, D. O. W. "Phylon Profile: Kelly Miller." Phylon, 6(2), 1945, pp. 121–125.
- Jones, Butler Blackwell. "The Tradition of Sociology Teaching in Black Colleges: The Unheralded Professionals." In Black Sociologists: Historical and Contemporary Perspectives, ed. James Blackwell and Morris Janowitz. Heritage of Sociology Series. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1974, pp. 121–163.
- Meier, August. "The Racial and Educational Philosophy of Kelly Miller, 1895–1915." Journal of Negro Education, 29(2), Spring 1960, pp. 121–127.
- . Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1966.
- Roberts, Samuel K. "Kelly Miller and Thomas Dixon, Jr., on Blacks in American Civilization." Phylon, 41(2), 1980, pp. 202–209.
- Wright, W. D. "The Thought and Leadership of Kelly Miller." Phylon, 39(2), 1978, pp. 180–192.

Miller, Quintard

Quintard Miller was born in Columbia, Tennessee, in 1895. His father was the editor of a black newspaper, the Nashville Globe. He was the youngest of three brothers, all prominent in black musical theater. His early career is obscure. There is a suggestion that he may have spent some time with the Pekin Stock Company, perhaps in association with his elder brothers. He also spent some time with the Sandy Burns Stock Company, where he met his future stage partner, Marcus Slayter.

Miller emerged in 1920 as a full-blown producer, as well as a comedian-actor, with the show Broadway Gossips, and from then until the late 1930s he was a prolific producer and performer. He occasionally collaborated with his more famous brothers, Irvin C. and Flournoy Miller, but he mostly operated independently of them. From 1920 to 1922, he wrote and produced nine shows on his own, as well as performing in his brother Irvin's productions Bon Bon Buddy Jr. and Liza.

In 1923 he teamed up with the comedian-actor Marcus Slayter, who was also a dancer and choreographer. Slayter had also worked with Sandy Burns, as well as stock companies run by Billy King and Eddie Hunter. Known as Miller and Slayter, the pair produced and performed in twelve shows from 1923 to 1926, including a production of Shuffle Along in Kansas City. Their show Dixie Brevities ran in an annual form from 1926 to 1928. Miller also performed during this period in several more of his brother Irvin's productions.

None of Quintard Miller's shows had an impact comparable to Flournoy Miller's Shuffle Along and Runnin' Wild, or even to Irvin Miller's Put and Take and Liza. Quintard Miller's productions had no original music of significance; they relied on a speedy revue format. The book was typically a rehash of familiar themes, even including Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles's "Jimtown" characters, Jenkins and Peck. Nevertheless, these shows were a significant feature of black Broadway during the 1920s and created employment for a regular troupe of capable performers including the character actor George Wiltshire, as well as occasional opportunities for big names like Bessie Smith, Johnny Hudgins, Greenlee and Drayton, Butterbeans and Susie, and Willie Covan.

These were mostly touring shows, and their travels included the circuit of the black-owned Quality Amusement Company. In the early 1920s Quality Amusement controlled eight theaters in major cities, including the Lafayette in New York; the Howard in Washington, D.C.; and the Dunbar in Philadelphia.

This gave black audiences in regional centers some idea of what the new black Broadway phenomenon was about.

With the onset of the 1930s and the Depression, the frenetic pace of Quintard's productions slackened off; only four shows are recorded from 1930 to 1936. His final show as a performer, along with his partner Slayter, was in his brother Flournoy's Dixie Goes High Hat (1938). He retired from the theater in the 1940s and died in 1979.

Biography

Quintard Miller was born in Columbia, Tennessee, 9 May 1895. He was the younger brother of Flournoy Miller and Irvin Miller, who were also prominent in theater. He emerged as a producer and comedian-actor in 1920 with the show Broadway Gossips and was a performer and producer from then through the 1930s. In 1923 he and Marcus Slater became stage partners; they produced and performed in twelve shows. Miller retired from theater in the 1940s and is reported to have run a catering business in Los Angeles. He died in Los Angeles in March 1979.

BILL EGAN

See also Hunter, Eddie; King, Billy; Lafayette Theater; Liza; Musical Theater; Miller, Flournoy; Miller, Irvin; Shuffle Along; Smith, Bessie

Theater Productions and Performances

1920: Broadway Gossips.

1921: Darktown Scandals of 1921; Folly Town; Some Baby; Tunes and Topics; Why Worry?

1922: Bon Bon Buddy Jr.; The Devil; Liza; This Way Out; Hearts of Men.

1923: The Mayor of Jimtown; Broadway Rastus of 1923; Sheik of Harlem; Tunes and Topics.

1924: Annie Oakley; Step Along; The Flat Above; Take It Easy.

1926: Broadway Brevities; Charleston Fricassee; Dixie Brevities; Harlem Butterflies; Miss Dinah of 1926; Shuffle Along (Kansas City edition).

1927: Bare Facts; Dixie Brevities of 1927.

1928: Dixie Brevities of 1928.

1930: Cabaret Prince.

1934 and 1935: Get Lucky.

1936: Harlem on Parade.

1938: Dixie Goes High Hat.

Further Reading

- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984, p. 245.
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- . Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001, pp. 183, 227.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980, p. 117.

Mills, Florence

Florence Mills was a celebrated entertainer and the first black female star to win international acclaim at the beginning of the twentieth century. During the Harlem Renaissance and the jazz age of the 1920s, Mills enthralled audiences around the world with her talent for comedy, her phenomenal ability as a dancer, and her flutelike singing voice. She was known as “Harlem’s dainty singer” and the “queen of happiness”; James Weldon Johnson described her voice as “full of bubbling, bell-like, birdlike tones.” When she performed her signature song, “I’m a Little Blackbird Looking for a Bluebird,” Johnson said, “she did it with such exquisite poignancy as always to raise a lump in your throat.” Mills excelled in a number of forms of jazz and tap dancing, distinguishing herself from other dancers with her legendary acrobatic movements.

Mills was born in 1895 in Washington, D.C. She displayed her exceptional musical talents early in life, performing in local amateur hours and dance contests; she won her first dance contest, a buck-and-wing competition, at the age of three. Mills was already becoming popular locally and was invited to perform for diplomats and dignitaries. Billing herself as “Baby Florence,” she made her professional debut in 1903 in the road company of Bert Williams and George Walker’s show Sons of Ham. This brought her under the tutelage of a renowned black entertainer, the ragtime singer and cakewalker Aida Overton Walker, who had performed in the original company of Sons of Ham and had made the song “Miss Hannah from Savannah” a hit. Walker became a mentor and role model to Baby Florence and taught her the song, which Mills then sang in the show. As a result of her success in Sons of Ham, Mills—at age eight—joined the touring company of the white vaudeville team Bonita and Hearn as a dancing “pick,” or pickaninny. The role of the pick was to dance and sing onstage with the white performers to enhance their routines. Mills’s tenure as a pick ended when she was arrested for being under age. Her family then moved to Harlem, and Mills began attending school.

In 1910, Mills, then age fourteen, returned to show business. She and her sisters, Olivia and Maude, formed the Mills Sisters, a song-and-dance team that performed in theaters in Harlem, including the famous Lincoln Theater, and in black vaudeville houses along the East Coast. The Mills Sisters specialized in ballads and popular songs. Eventually, Mills grew tired of the vaudevillian’s demanding lifestyle—constant traveling, the uncertain living conditions that black entertainers faced while on the road, low pay, and long hard hours—and left to try her hand as a cabaret entertainer. In 1916, Mills moved to Chicago and became a member of the Panama Trio with Ada “Bricktop” Smith and Cora Green. The trio performed in the black-and-tan Panama Café, a notorious honky-tonk on State Street on Chicago’s South Side. At the Panama Café, Mills worked with the jazz legends Alberta Hunter, Glover Compton, and Mezz Mezzrow and became acquainted with the renowned Bill “Bojangles” Robinson, who began giving her tap-dancing lessons. After a shooting scandal resulted in the closing of the Panama Café, the Panama Trio disbanded. Mills returned to vaudeville, joining the Tennessee Ten, a successful black traveling show. The dance director of the Ten, Ulysses “Slow Kid” Thompson—who was himself an acrobatic tap and “rubberlegs” dancer—eventually became Mills’s husband, and her extraordinary dancing style was greatly influenced by the combination of Thompson’s acrobatics and Robinson’s tap technique.

Mills’s big break came in 1921 when she replaced Gertrude Saunders, star of the hit black musical Shuffle Along, when Saunders left the show. Opening off-Broadway, Shuffle Along took theatergoers by storm with its high-stepping dancing and lively jazz. Mills, now age twenty-six, was a sensation and became an overnight star. Her success in Shuffle Along prompted the white promoter Lew Leslie to hire her and Kid Thompson to perform nightly at his Plantation Restaurant on Broadway. Leslie’s all-black floor show was built around Mills (although the show also had notable visiting performers such as Paul Robeson); and it was so successful that he turned it into a Broadway production, the Plantation Review, which opened on 22 July 1922 at the Forty-Eighth Street Theater. This was a milestone in Mill's career: her work would be seen by New York critics and she was expanding the racial boundaries of show business. Mill's debut on Broadway was a tremendous success; the magazine Billboard noted that her name appeared in lights, "an even one hundred of them."

Mill then had a series of triumphs and "firsts," even though at times her successes were tarnished by racism. In 1923, famous British impresario C. B. Cochran brought the Plantation show to the London Pavilion, renaming it From Dover to Dixie. In London, Mills faced opposition from white performers, and newspaper headlines announced that the "Negro problem" was being brought to London; she was a huge success, however, and each night received an ovation from the packed house the moment she walked onto the stage. When she returned to New York, she was invited to be a guest star in the Greenwich Village Follies at the Winter Garden Theater. White cast members threatened to walk out in protest against a black performer's receiving a higher billing than theirs, but they backed down and the show went on. In 1924, Mills opened in a new show, Dixie to Broadway, in which she introduced her theme song, "I'm a Little Blackbird Looking for a Bluebird" (considered a thinly veiled protest against racial injustice). In June 1924, she became the first black headliner in vaudeville at the famous Palace Theater. This honor was followed in 1925 by her show Blackbirds, in which she also performed in France and England.

Mills always saw herself as representing her race. She was known for her charitable activities and for speaking out on racial issues and promoting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). She sought not only personal recognition but recognition for African Americans, "believing that every white person pleased by her performance was a friend won for the race." Mills died of appendicitis in 1927.

Biography

Florence Mills was born 25 January 1895 in Washington, D.C. She was the youngest daughter of John and Nellie Winfrey, two former slaves. Her professional debut was in Williams and Walker's show The Sons of Ham, 1903. Her professional performances included Bonita and Hearn Vaudeville Show, 1904; Mills Sisters, 1910; Panama Trio, Chicago, Illinois, 1916; Tennessee Ten, 1917; Panama Trio (re-formed), tour of Canada and the West, 1918; Tennessee Ten, 1919; Lincoln Theater, Harlem, 1920; Shuffle Along, Broadway, 1921; Plantation Review, Broadway, 1922; Dover to Dixie, London, 1923; Greenwich Village Follies, New York, 1923; Dixie to Broadway, Broadway, 1924; Palace Theater, New York, 1925; Blackbirds, New York, France, and England, 1925 and 1926; Aeolian Hall, New York, 1925. Mills was the first to star in a review built exclusively around black female singing and dancing, Dixie to Broadway; created the first major show made up solely of black American music, Blackbirds; was the first black woman to be offered a part in a major white show, Greenwich Village Follies; and was the first black woman headliner at the Palace Theater. She died in New York City, 1 November 1927, at age thirty-one.

JANICE TUCK LIVELY

See also Black and Tan Clubs; Blackbirds; Hunter, Alberta; Johnson, James Weldon; Leslie, Lew; Lincoln Theater; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Shuffle Along; Smith, Ada; Willams, Egbert Austin "Bert"

Further Reading

- Hine, Darlene Clark, Elsa Barkly Brown, and Rosalyn Tenborg-Penn, eds. Black Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.
- James, Edward T., Janet Wilson, and Paul S. Boyer, eds. Notable American Women, 1607–1950: A Biographical Dictionary. Cambridge, Mass: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1997.
- Logan, Rayford W., and Michael R. Winston, eds. Dictionary of American Negro Biography. New York: Norton, 1982.
- Marks, Carole, and Diana Edkins. The Power of Pride: Stylemakers and Rulebreakers of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Crown, 1999.
- Newman, Richard. Words Like Freedom: Essays on African-American Culture and History. West Cornwall, Conn.: Locust Hill, 1996.
- Stearns, Marshall, and Jean Stearns. Jazz Dance: The Story of American Vernacular Dance. New York: Schirmer, 1994.

Minstrelsy

The minstrel show, which originated in America in the 1840s, was a highly popular form of entertainment during the nineteenth century. Its phenomenal success in the United States, as well as in Europe and the far east, demonstrates its appeal to audiences of many social classes. The minstrel show became the training ground for many performers; it also provided a foundation for other popular theatrical entertainments. It was in decline during the first two decades of the twentieth century, but audiences were able to see acts that were similar to minstrelsy in many venues, including vaudeville, the variety show, burlesque, and Broadway musicals—and as late as 1910, more than ten minstrel troupes were still touring the United States.

A number of African American troupes that featured songwriters such as Sam Lucas (1848–1916), James Bland (1854–1911), and Gussie Davis (1863–1899) toured North America, Europe, east Asia, and Australia during the latter part of the nineteenth century, but by the turn of the twentieth century, the only well known black minstrel who was still performing regularly in minstrelsy was Billy Kersands (1842–1915). Kersands's long career had begun in the 1870s when he was as part of Callender's Georgia Minstrels. He appeared with many other companies, and at his death he was the lead comedian of the Dixie Minstrel troupe.

African American minstrel troupes appeared soon after the conclusion of the Civil War. The troupes followed the accepted practice of “blacking up” when they appeared onstage. Even after they left minstrelsy for variety, vaudeville, and musical theater, some comedians continued to “blacken up.” In their appearances in genres other than minstrel shows, African American comedians perpetuated the burnt-cork characters familiar to audiences who attended popular entertainments. Several other traditions also migrated to the other popular entertainments, including the use of stock minstrel characters with descriptive names, the use of dialect for some roles, the use of plots derived from farce, and the use of African American dance steps as the basis of the choreography.

The most prominent of the blackface performers who continued minstrel traditions after the turn of the twentieth century was Bert Williams (1876–1922). As one of the most popular acts on Broadway, Williams, with his partner, George Walker (1872–1911), portrayed stock characters known to audiences from the after-piece farces that concluded each minstrel show. Walker portrayed a fast-talking dandy who was always eager to inflict his shady schemes on everyone who met him; Williams's stage persona was a slow-witted, slow-speaking, gullible but wily and canny survivor who usually had the last laugh. Their characters were based, in part, on the antebellum minstrel characters Zip Coon and Jim Crow, respectively. Williams and Walker's important shows include The Sons of Ham (1900), In Dahomey (1902), and Abyssinia (1905). In all these full-length musicals, the names of the characters recall those used in nineteenth-century minstrel shows, such as Shylock Homestead; Dr. Straight, a fakir; George Reeder, an intelligence officer; Henry Stampfield, a letter carrier; Leather, a bootblack; Hustling Charlie, promoter of the Get the Coin Syndicate; and Miss Primly. The extant scripts confirm that a number of brief humorous skits were joined together to make a full-length evening. Many were built around a song or dance that featured one of the stars. In Sons of Ham, for example, Williams, in disguise, is introduced by Walker as a doctor whose specialty is phrenology. After attracting a crowd by imitating a barker at a medicine show, Williams sings one of the earliest hits, “The Phrenologist Coon”; in this song, he parodies the pseudoscience of phrenology by telling the crowd that as long as they put some coins in his hand, he can tell them anything they want to hear.

After Walker's death in 1911, Williams continued playing similar roles as he starred in various editions of the Ziegfeld Follies. In one of his most famous performances, Williams portrayed a railroad porter who helped an English tourist, played by Leon Errol, to navigate his way out of the recently rebuilt Grand Central Terminal. The skit takes place during the reconstruction; Williams and his customer make their exit through the terminal on narrow girders and beams. While they are balancing on girders and lurching through the construction site, the two comedians discuss politics and social issues of the day. But mishaps continue to occur. After saving Errol several times from falling off girders, Williams receives a five-cent tip for his services. He grumbles at the stinginess of his customer. At that point, when Errol slips once again, Williams lets him fall into the excavation and throws his suitcase after him. Though long suffering, he has had the last laugh again. Bert Williams was revered as one of the greatest comedians of his time. He composed more than sixty songs, and he was a recording star for Victor and Columbia. He made several silent films; A Natural-Born Gambler (1916) preserves his famous pantomime poker game, which was seen in Follies of 1914. His character Jim Crow served as the prototype for stereotypical African American characters of the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s, including those played by Flournoy Miller and Stepin Fetchit, as well as the character Andy in Amos 'n' Andy.

During the 1910s, black musical theater continued to show that it had roots in minstrelsy. Although the plots of these musicals were somewhat more substantial, they replicated the types of plots that audiences knew from the previous decade; minstrel caricatures, old jokes, and descriptive names still appeared in almost every show. Several new teams toured the country, including that of Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles and the team of J. Homer Tutt and Salem Tutt Whitney. In Tutt and Whitney's How Newtown Prepared, for example, audiences saw the "grand old veterans," Private Arsenal, Sergeant Duposal, Major Bragg, and Colonel Hullabaloo, as well as Eagle Eye (an Indian chief) and Said Pasha (a Turkish prince). The use of double entendre and descriptive names was one of the major characteristics of minstrelsy from its earliest days. Their continuing use through the nineteenth century and the first three decades of the twentieth demonstrates the long-lasting influence of the minstrel show.

The presence of dialect roles in African American musicals is another characteristic associated with minstrelsy. The character types who speak in dialect are generally represented as ignorant and lower class, but streetwise. They are prone to mispronouncing polysyllabic words (as in the stump speeches that were heard in the minstrel show), and to mangling the niceties of grammar. Characters who spoke in dialect were seen in virtually every African American theater during the Harlem Renaissance.

Most of the scripts for African American book musicals during the renaissance still had only a thread of a plot; the narrative was regularly suspended at various points in the show to allow performers to present their specialties. Book musicals in the 1920s, like those earlier in the century, were, in effect, a collection of brief skits that were strung together. Their plots, which usually featured up-to-date post—World War I topical references and unsubtle references to famous people in the news, continued in the tradition of nineteenth-century low-comedy farces and were familiar to contemporary audiences not only through minstrelsy but from early black musicals and the African American vaudeville circuit. Plots were usually centered on an illegal or crooked scheme. In Shuffle Along (1921), two friends who own a grocery store in Jimtown and who want to be mayor of the town try to outwit each other in fixing the election; at the end, neither of them succeeds. In The Chocolate Dandies (1924), the scheme is to "fix" a horse race. Some of the horses in the musical were named after recent African American shows: Runnin' Wild, Shuffle Along, and Liza. The plot opens with a race between horses that have been "doped" by one of the jockeys; the race is held and is won by Dumb Luck. The odds on Dumb Luck were 100 to 1, so the horse's owner, Mose Washington, collects $10,000 on his $100 bet. Washington then becomes president of the town's bank, and the former owners rob the bank and send him a letter informing him that he will go to jail for ten to thirty years because he has not protected the bank from robbers. As he is absorbing the bad news, there is a run on the bank—the depositors storm it to withdraw their money—but he escapes. In Rang Tang, two barbers steal an airplane from Jimtown's airport and land in Africa. Their comic adventures are the basis for most of the musical, which compares and contrasts the customs of American and African society.

African American revues, which gained in popularity during the Harlem Renaissance, were similarly influenced. The revue did not have to maintain the logic of a story line for the entire evening, since, by definition, it is a collection of separate scenes and acts. In Dixie to Broadway (1924), the opening "Evolution of the Colored Race," is followed by a plantation scene in which a song and dance, "Put Your Old Bandanna On," celebrates antebellum life in the South. Florence Mills (1896–1927) then appeared to sing "Dixie Dream," which also refers nostalgically to the plantation, with its "fields of white"; she dreams that she is back "once more in my Dixie home." In the subsequent scenes of Act 1, the audience saw a haunted-house skit in which the comedian Hamtree Harrington pantomimed fright at seeing a ghost; a double-entendre song, "He Only Comes to See Me Once in a While," sung by Cora Green; another number by Florence Mills, "Jungle Nights in Dixieland"; a tap dance by several of the men; a cross-dressing skit, "Mandy, Make Up Your Mind," in which Florence Mills played the groom; and a closing number, "Jazz Time Came from the South," performed by the entire company. In Blackbirds of 1928, the opening prologue, "Way Down South," again celebrated life on the old plantation; it was followed by Aunt Jemima's stroll and a scene in Jungleland, which featured eccentric dances while Adelaide Hall sang Dorothy Fields and Jimmy McHugh's "Diga, Diga, Do." Other scenes included a boxing sequence, a card game in a gin mill in Harlem, and a marriage ceremony in a minister's apartment on 135th Street in the middle of Harlem. In all these scenes, the traditions of the minstrel show is apparent: a nostalgic look at the old way of life, as exemplified by the plantation; a caricature of African American superstition, in a haunted house or graveyard; a parody of African dances; the cross-dressing that was an important part of nineteenth-century minstrelsy; and the double-entendre low humor of the farce. Dialect performers; specialty acts; blackface comedians; and skits all reflected comically, in the minstrel tradition, on African American life.

Although professional minstrel shows were rapidly disappearing from theaters, they were still popular with audiences. Many were produced by amateur groups, who used the published manuals, with jokes for the end men in the opening semicircle, brief skits, music, and suggestions for staging and costumes. Amateur minstrel shows continued to be performed in many communities across the country at least through the 1950s.

JOHN GRAZIANO

See also Amos 'n' Andy; Blackbirds; Blackface Performance; Chocolate Dandies; Fetchit, Stepin; Fields, Dorothy; Hall, Adelaide; Harrington, James Carl "Hamtree"; Liza; Lyles, Aubrey; Miller, Flournoy; Mills, Florence; Runnin' Wild; Shuffle Along; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"

Further Reading

- Bean, Annemarie, James V. Hatch, and Brooks McNamara. Inside the Minstrel Mask: Readings in Nineteenth Century Blackface Minstrelsy. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1996.
- Graziano, John. "Sentimental Songs, Rags, and Transformations: The Emergence of the Black Musical, 1895–1910." In Musical Theatre in America, ed. Glenn Loney. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.
- . "Black Musical Theater and the Harlem Renaissance Movement." In Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Samuel A. Floyd Jr. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990.
- Mahar, William J. Behind the Burnt Cork Mask. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.
- Riis, Thomas L. Black Musical Theater in New York, 1890 to 1915. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1989.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.

Smith, Eric Ledell. Bert Williams: A Biography of the Pioneer Black Comedian. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1992.

Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans: A History, 3rd ed. New York: Norton, 1997.

Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Mitchell, Abbie

Abbie Mitchell was a child prodigy who, in her early teens, took voice lessons from Harry T. Burleigh; Burleigh had studied with Antonín Dvořák at the National Conservatory of Music. In 1887, when she was not yet fourteen years old, she auditioned for Paul Lurance Dunbar and Will Marion Cook's one-act musical Clorindy, or the Origin of the Cake Walk. Dunbar and Cook recognized her talent, and during the summer of 1898 she appeared in Clorindy with Ernest Hogan at the Casino Roof Garden. The following year she married Cook and starred in his Jes' Lak White Fo'ks, another one-act musical presented at the Roof Garden. In 1902, she played the ingénue in Bert Williams and George Walker's In Dahomey, which was one of the first African American musicals on Broadway and was also a huge hit in London.

On her return to New York, Mitchell was seen in The Southerners (1904), another musical by Cook. In 1905, she joined the Memphis Students, a singing and dancing group. Their act at Proctor's Twenty-Third Street Theatre was so successful that they were booked in Hammerstein's Victoria Theater, where they gave more than 150 performances. A tour of Europe included performances at the Olympia Theater in Paris, the Palace Theater in London, and the Schumann Circus in Berlin. Mitchell toured briefly with the Black Patti Troubadours and in early 1908 starred in Williams and Walker's Bandanna Land. As her marriage to Cook was ending, Mitchell joined a tour of the Nashville Students. In 1909, she starred as Minnehaha in Cole and Johnson's The Red Moon, which toured Europe after its New York run.

In 1912, because of a throat ailment, Mitchell turned to acting. In 1915, as a member of the original Lafayette Players of Harlem, she was seen in many dramas, including Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The Count of Monte Cristo, Charley's Aunt, and Othello. After World War I, Mitchell joined Cook and his Southern Syncopated Orchestra on a tour of Europe; she decided to remain in Paris to study voice with Jean de Reszke and his teacher Giovanni Sbriglia. During the 1920s, she performed in concerts throughout Europe, singing French mélodies, German lieder, and African American spirituals. On her return to the United States in 1927, Mitchell appeared with Jules Bledsoe in Paul Green's In Abraham's Bosom at the Provincetown Playhouse. She was also seen in The House of Shadows, and with Helen Hayes in George Abbott's Coquette (1928), and she sang on the radio station WNBC.

Mitchell joined the faculty of Tuskegee Institute as head of the voice department in 1931. She also continued to perform, giving an "all-Negro" song recital in New York's Town Hall in 1931; in addition, she appeared as Santuzza in Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana in 1934, as Clara in Gershwin's Porgy and Bess, in Langston Hughes' Mulatto in 1935, and as Addie in Lillian Hellman's The Little Foxes in 1939. Although she had studied the title role in Verdi's Aida, and she hoped to sing in opera regularly, her dream never materialized. Mitchell served as executive secretary of the Negro Actors' Guild. In 1959, she was asked to appear in Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun, but her deteriorating eyesight prevented her from joining the cast.

Mitchell was sometimes described as a mezzosoprano, though she sang the soprano aria "Ritorna vincitor!" from Aida. Photographs show that she had an elegant bearing, and it was noted that her voice was natural, pure, and mellifluous.

Biography

Abbie Mitchell was born 25 September 1884 on the lower east side of Manhattan, to an African American mother and German-Jewish father. She was raised by a maternal aunt in Baltimore, where she was enrolled in a convent school and was soon recognized as a child prodigy. In her early teens, she returned to New York, where she studied with Harry T. Burleigh. In 1898 she appeared in Paul Laurence Dunbar and Will Marion Cook's Clorindy, or the Origin of the Cakewalk; in 1899 she married Cook and starred in his musical Jes' Lak White Fo'ks. She appeared in Bert Williams and George Walker's In Dahomey (1902) and Cook's The Southerners (1904); joined the Memphis Students, a singing and dancing group (1905); toured with the Black Patti Troubadours; starred in Williams and Walker's Bandanna Land (1908); joined the Nashville Students; starred in Cole and Johnson's The Red Moon (1909); became an actress (1912) and performed with the Lafayette Players (1915); studied voice again in Paris after World War I; performed in concerts around Europe (1920s); returned to the United States and appeared in plays such as Paul Green's In Abraham's Bosom (1927); joined the faculty of Tuskegee Institute (1931) but continued to perform; appeared in Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana (1934), George Gershwin's Porgy and Bess (1935), Langston Hughes's Mulatto (1935), and Lillian Hellman's The Little Foxes (1939); and was executive secretary of the Negro Actors' Guild. Mitchell died 16 March 1960.

JOHN GRAZIANO

See also Bledsoe, Jules; Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Cook, Will Marion; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Green, Paul; Lafayette Players; Mulatto; Porgy and Bess; Singers; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"

Further Reading

- Commire, Anne, ed. Women in World History: A Biographical Encyclopedia. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Group, 1999.
- Hine, Darlene Clark. Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Carlson, 1993.
- Logan, Rayford W., and Michael R. Winston. Dictionary of American Negro Biography. New York: Norton, 1982.
- Smith, Jessie Carney, ed. Notable Black American Women. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1992.
- Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.

Modern Quarterly

In March 1923, in the inaugural issue of the Modern Quarterly, the opening editorial declared that it was a "socialist magazine." It was published in Baltimore, Maryland, by the editor V. F. Calverton (a pseudonym for George Goetz) and his associates, and it reflected their leftist views. It included socialist commentary, literary criticism, book reviews, poetry, fiction, and articles on sociology and science. It differed from other radical journals of the time (e.g., Seven Arts, Masses, and Liberator), however, by publishing opposing viewpoints together in the same issues. In addition to editing the magazine, Calverton contributed to it regularly as a writer. The content of Modern Quarterly was closely tied to Calverton's views, and he was the driving force behind the publication. Over the years, it featured more social, literary, political, and economic criticism and less creative work. The magazine ran from 1923 to 1940.

Modern Quarterly had developed from gatherings Calverton held in his home in Baltimore. He spearheaded fund raising for the publication, raising money from annual dinners and from lecturing. The magazine was intended for an intellectual audience and had subscribers in the United States and abroad. In 1933, Calverton's magazine changed to a monthly publication schedule, and its name was changed to The Modern Monthly.

Calverton frequently featured black writers in Modern Quarterly. W. E. B. Du Bois, Langston Hughes, Charles S. Johnson, Alain Locke, George Schuyler, Melvin B. Tolson, and other writers of the Harlem Renaissance were published in the magazine. Its open commentary on race and its promotion of desegregation reflected Calverton's views. He held social intellectual gatherings with blacks and whites and lectured at black institutions. Modern Quarterly also carried advertisement for black publications such as Opportunity and Crisis. Calverton was a contributor to Opportunity and other black periodicals.

Modern Quarterly offered black intellectuals a rare opportunity to present their views in a white publication. Hubert Harrison, who had been born in the Caribbean, put forth an alternative view of America's racial problems in the issue of September–December 1926, in his article "The Real Negro Problem." Alain Locke discussed the past and future of blacks in American literature in "American Literary Tradition and the Negro" (May–July 1926). Charles S. Johnson reviewed Locke's anthology The New Negro in the pages of Modern Quarterly. Other writing by blacks included Du Bois's essay "The Social Origins of American Negro Art" (October–December 1925) and Hughes's poem "Listen Here Blues" (May–July 1926).

As an anti-Stalinist, Calverton was frequently at odds with the Communist Party; he was also critical of the party's segregationist policies. He also differed from moderate conservative black leaders such as Du Bois by advocating class struggle within the black community. However, the openness of Modern Quarterly to writers of differing viewpoints made it a popular publication among intellectuals. This popularity subsided when many intellectuals became loyal to the Communist Party and to the fight of the Soviet Union against fascism. Calverton's stance against World War II—which was thus the stance of Modern Quarterly—also caused a dwindling of readership and of financial support. Modern Quarterly ceased publication with Calverton's death in 1940.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Calverton, V. F.; Communist Party; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Harrison, Hubert; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Charles S.; Liberator, The; Locke, Alain; Opportunity; Seven Arts; Schuyler, George S.; Tolson, Melvin

Further Reading

- Abbott, Philip. Leftward Ho!—V.F. Calverton and American Radicalism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- Genizi, Haim. "V.F. Calverton, a Radical Magazinish for Black Intellectuals, 1920–1940." Journal of Negro History, 57(3), 1972.
- . "The Modern Quarterly, 1923–1940: An Independent Radical Magazine." Labor History, 15(2), 1974.
- Hook, Sidney. "Modern Quarterly, a Chapter in American Radical History: V. F. Calverton and His Periodicals." Labor History, 10(2), 1969.
- Nash, Michael. "Schism on the Left: The Anti-Communism of V. F. Calverton and His Modern Quarterly." Science and Society, 45(4), 1981–1982.
- Wilcox, Leonard. V. F. Calverton: Radical in the American Grain. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1992.

Modernism

The Armory Show of 1913 in New York City introduced Americans to European modernism. The term "modernism" encompassed a broad range of avant-garde artistic expression that broke with the forms, images, and ideas of nineteenth-century western art. At the time of World War I, art critics applied the term to such nonrepresentational painting as cubism, fauvism, post-impressionism, futurism, and dada but also used it to describe avant-garde movements in all the arts. Modernists often disdained naturalistic representation and conventional narratives and rejected the values and sensibilities of the western genteel classes, including middle-class attitudes toward sexuality, class, gender, and race. Before World War I, most American modernists lived and worked in New York's Greenwich Village, not Harlem. Nonetheless, the modernist assault on everything bourgeois led New York's modernists to Harlem and many Harlemite artists to modernism.

Several things beckoned modernists to Harlem. Because it was a virtually all-black neighborhood, many modernists, themselves bound by racial and class stereotypes, imagined its residents to be unscathed by debilitating bourgeois traits; in their minds, Africans and African Americans were thus more authentic. Moreover, the police of New York City failed to enforce many municipal ordinances in Harlem, especially laws that involved petty crime and vice. Unpoliced and morally unregulated, individuals in Harlem could freely pursue almost any activity, including the consumption of illegal alcohol and drugs and the gratification of a wide variety of sexual passions and whims. For many, this meant the freedom to be modern. Finally, during World War I Harlem became the showcase of a revolutionary new music. Following the war, jazz transformed American music and brought African American musicians and composers to center stage. By 1920 Harlem had become a major center of jazz, a music that many considered synonymous with "modern."

The African American musicians of Harlem altered the rhythm and sound of New York, giving the city's modernists an explicitly American and modern music. In nightclubs in Harlem, New York's modernist avant-garde discovered jazz. With the jazz revolution, the modern art of New York acquired an American voice, not just in sound and rhythm but also in its very spirit. Owing to its west African influences, jazz gave New York's modernists, black and white, a means to express their modernity in less narrowly western modes. During the jazz age, Harlem's African American artists redefined what it meant to be modern and American. They created a new, more encompassing notion of the modern—free of the racism implicit in European-based modernism—as they challenged the limits and frustrations dictated by western racism.

In the winter of 1924, Paul Whiteman's "First American Jazz Concert" introduced white New Yorkers to jazz. Downtown, far from Harlem, in the comfortable confines of the Aeolian concert hall, Whiteman offered a watered-down version of Harlem's jazz. The concert received a positive if condescending reaction. Olin Downes, the music critic for the New York Times, wrote sympathetically that Livery Stable Blues "is a glorious piece of impudence, much better in its unbuttoned jocosity and Rabelaisian laughter than other and more polite compositions that came later" (13 February 1934). American avant-garde composers, however, understood from the start that jazz was far more than light entertainment. The modernist composer Aaron Copland recounted, "When I finished with my studies in Europe, I returned home with a strong desire to write recognizably American music. Jazz seemed to supply the basic source material for such music" (quoted in Thompson 1941, 46). Writing in 1924, the art critic Gilbert Seldes of New York pronounced: "Jazz is . . . the symbol, or the byword, for a great many elements in the spirit of the times—that as far as America is concerned it is actually our characteristic American expression" (1924, 83). American moderns saw in jazz an indigenous source for an American music, rich in new themes, interesting rhythms, and novel sounds, an expression of a "primitive" people, uninhibited by bourgeois culture.

Such attitudes both pleased and concerned Harlem's intellectuals. The year after white New York discovered jazz, these Harlemites launched an offensive against western intellectual racism. In 1925 Alain Locke (who was the first African American Rhodes scholar) inaugurated the Harlem Renaissance—or propelled it forward—with his anthology The New Negro, published by Albert and Charles Boni's modernist press in Greenwich Village. In this remarkable document, Locke offered an expansive collection of modern poetry, fiction, and essays that set the agenda for Harlem's cultural flowering. The New Negro brought to public attention the work of several unknown writers, outlining the enormous possibilities for black creativity. Locke's belief in Harlem's nascent renaissance was warranted. In the interwar decades, Harlem offered black artists and writers resources and an appreciative audience for their work. For example, during the 1920s the periodicals Crisis and Opportunity, which were based in Harlem, published many works of literature, and in turn Harlem's writers and artists produced an impressive number of modern works, some of exceptional quality—especially Claude McKay's novels; Zora Neale Hurston's fiction inspired by folklore; and Langston Hughes's poetry inspired by blues.

Locke, however, was disquieted by the infatuation that many modernists had with primitivism and their association of primitivism with Africa and African Americans. He cautioned:

Liberal minds today cannot be asked to peer with sympathetic curiosity into the darkened Ghetto of a segregated race life. . . . Nor must they expect to find a mind and soul bizarre and alien as the mind of a savage, or even as naive and refreshing as the mind of the peasant or the child. . . . No more Uncle Remuses, Aunt Chloe's or Jemimas or pickaninnies. (1936, 48)

Locke asked Harlem's artists to transcend the narrow conventions of western art, creating a genuinely modern and human art: "Negro art does not restrict the Negro artist to a ghetto province, but only urges him to sustain his share in its interpretation, with no obligation but the universal one of a duty to express himself with originality and unhampered sincerity" (61).

Art, however, required patronage, and African American art found few patrons. In 1926, the William E. Harmon Foundation established an annual competition and exhibition for African American artists, awarding a gold medal and $400 in eight fields of artistic expression. Although modest, the Harmon prizes granted black artists formal recognition for their work, and the annual Harmon exhibitions brought to public attention scores of previously unknown black artists. The artists and prizewinners included the sculptors Augusta Savage and Richmond Barthé and the painters William Henry Johnson, Palmer Hayden, and Archibald Motley. The Harmon Foundation ended its awards and exhibitions in 1934.

For painting and sculpture, the Harlem Renaissance proved a time of planting and nurturing. In the 1920s, however, perhaps only one artist in Harlem, Aaron Douglas, had a significant impact. Douglas had grown up and received his professional training in Kansas. In 1925 he came to Harlem. Responding to Locke's artistic imperative for the "New Negro," Douglas adopted a cubist-precisionist manner and committed himself almost exclusively to African American themes. Douglas illustrated several publications of the Harlem Renaissance, including Crisis, Locke's New Negro, and James Weldon Johnson's God's Trombones. In God's Trombones, Douglas combined stylized African imagery with cubist shapes and flattened perspectives.

Before the Harlem Renaissance, African American artists had generally failed to achieve recognition in painting and sculpture. In music, however, African American spirituals, ragtime, blues, and jazz came to define American popular music and dance. In the 1920s, several black singers fulfilled Locke's hopes for an African American music, including Roland Hayes, Marian Anderson, and Paul Robeson, all of whom received national recognition in the 1920s and all of whom sang music inspired by African Americans. William Grant Still, however, was the pride of the Harlem Renaissance. Still had been educated at Wilberforce University and Oberlin College in Ohio and during World War I had composed for W. C. Handy. In the 1920s, Still focused almost exclusively on African American themes. His modern compositions included Darker America, From the Black Belt, La Guiblessé, and his masterpiece, Afro-American Symphony, performed in 1931 by the Rochester Philharmonic Symphony, the first major orchestra to play a symphony composed by an African American (Floyd 1990; Southern 1983, 395–456).

In Harlem, modern art often expressed itself commercially. In 1921 Eubie Blake and Noble Sissle produced the runaway hit Shuffle Along, featuring Josephine Baker and Florence Mills, the first Broadway musical produced and performed by blacks in more than a decade. In the 1920s, Mills, Charles Gilpin, Paul Robeson, and Bill "Bojangles" Robinson consistently received top billing on Broadway; Fletcher Henderson, at the Roseland Ballroom, just off Times Square, directed the first important jazz orchestra, opening the way for the big swing bands of the 1930s and 1940s. Harlem's entertainers affirmed the same racial pride championed by the Harlem Renaissance. Like its painters and writers, Harlem's musicians realized that their art contributed much to American life. Finally, it seemed, their day had come.

After World War I, despite persistent and pervasive racism, modern American culture became suffused with African American culture. In the great migration to northern cities, southern blacks carried with them far more than their meager material possessions. Leaving the rural South, they brought to America's cities a rich, complex, evocative culture. Drawing on their west African and southern folk roots, African American blues singers, dancers, artists, and jazz musicians provided modernist American artists with an alternative, nonwestern mode of expression. African American colors, patterns, rhythms, and values became a part of American culture. Such art challenged the boundaries between art and entertainment, western and nonwestern, male and female, white and black. Duke Ellington, Langston Hughes, Aaron Douglas, and other participants in the Harlem Renaissance bridged the racial chasm that had fragmented modern life. In the 1920s and 1930s, however, Harlem and most of its residents remained apart, distant from the rest of the city. Despite the pervasive presence of jazz and other modern arts, racism continued to separate New York's modern artists.

PETER M. RUTKOFF
WILLIAM B. SCOTT

See also Anderson, Marian; Barthé, Richmond; Black Bohemia; Blake, Eubie; Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; God's Trombones; Harmon Foundation; Hayden, Palmer C.; Hayes, Roland; Henderson, Fletcher; Jazz; Johnson, William H.; Locke, Alain; Motley, Archibald J., Jr.; New Negro, The; Primitivism; Robeson, Paul; Roseland Ballroom; Savage, Augusta; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble; Still, William Grant

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African American-Artists. New York, 1993.
- Floyd, Samuel A., Jr., ed. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance. Westport, Conn., 1990.
- Gendron, Bernard. "Jamming at Le Boeuf: Jazz and the Paris Avant-Garde, 1917–1923." Discourse, Fall-Winter 1989–1990.
- Lewis, David Leverings. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York, 1981.
- Locke, Alain. Negro Art: Past and Present. New York, 1936.
- Ogren, Kathy J. The Jazz Revolution. New York, 1989.
- Rubin, William, ed. Primitivism in Twentieth-Century Art. New York, 1984.
- Scott, William B., and Peter M. Rutkoff. New York Modern: The Arts and the City. Baltimore, Md., 2001.
- Seldes, Gilbert. The Seven Lively Arts. New York, 1924.
- Singal, Daniel Joseph, ed. Modernism Culture in America. Belmont, Calif., 1991.
- Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans. New York, 1983.
- Spencer, Jon Michael. The New Negroes and Their Music. Knoxville, Tenn., 1997.
- Thompson, Oscar. Great Modern Composers. New York, 1941.

Moore, Frederick Randolph

The newspaper publisher Frederick Randolph Moore (1857–1943) was a lifelong and active member of the Republican Party; was personally acquainted with every president from Ulysses Grant to Herbert Hoover; was present at the assassination of President James Garfield in 1881; and attended every Republican National Convention from 1908 to 1920. Unlike many black leaders, Moore never shifted allegiance to the Democrats, but he did not hesitate to criticize the Republican Party when it disappointed African Americans' hopes. He bitterly attacked President William Taft for giving in to the "lily-white" faction within the party in the South. Nevertheless, Taft appointed him minister to Liberia in 1912, although the appointment was merely symbolic; Woodrow Wilson had already won that year's presidential election, and Moore served only one month, during which he remained in New York.

From age eighteen on, Moore was a messenger to seven successive secretaries of the Treasury; he accompanied Secretary Daniel Manning on overseas business and was named a temporary assistant secretary of the Treasury. After leaving the Treasury Department, Moore took a position with the Western National Bank in New York. In 1905 he resigned to become publisher of Colored American Magazine. Moore had been an ally of Booker T. Washington in the 1890s and to some degree was his spokesman at Colored American Magazine and later at New York Age. Moore was also connected with Washington's other lieutenants in black politics and business, such as T. Thomas Fortune and Emmett Scott. In association with these men, Moore became active in the Negro Protective League (a business organization), its successor the Afro American League, and, most important, the Afro-American Building and Loan Association.

In 1907 Moore purchased New York Age, a leading black paper that had formerly been published by Fortune. Moore had written for the paper for decades. He moved New York Age from its original offices in Chatham Square (today's Chinatown) to West Forty-Sixth Street in 1910, and to West 135th Street in Harlem in 1919. He built his own printing plant for New York Age, at a time when few black papers owned one. Moore continued to publish the paper until his death in 1943.

Despite his moderate politics, Moore was a fierce and outspoken opponent of lynching and Jim Crow laws in the south. In this respect, he broke firmly with the gradualism of Booker T. Washington's group. He also joined progressive campaigns in the North, particularly a movement of the 1930s whose slogan was "Don't buy where you can't work." However, he never abandoned Washington's conservative emphasis on an economic rather than an educational model for racial success.

Moore, Frederick Randolph

Moore was elected an alderman of New York City twice, in 1927 and 1929. During this period he worked tirelessly for the Colored Merchants Association (CMA), but, particularly with the onset of the Great Depression, it became virtually impossible to persuade black consumers to buy according to racial loyalty rather than price. In 1933, Moore turned against CMA, which folded the following year. In his later years he was particularly active with the National Urban League and in numerous local organizations in Harlem.

Biography

Frederick Randolph Moore was born 16 June 1857, the son of a slave woman and a white father; he was raised in Washington, D.C. He worked as a newsboy and then (from age eighteen) as a messenger to seven secretaries of the Treasury, as well as accompanying one, Secretary Daniel Manning, on overseas business. He later worked for the Western National Bank in New York; he resigned in 1905 and became publisher of the Colored American Magazine; in 1907 he bought New York Age, which he continued to run until he died. He was a lifelong active member of the Republican party and was elected an alderman of New York City in 1927 and 1929. He was also active in business associations and, later in life, in the National Urban League. Moore married Ida Lawrence in 1879. They had eighteen children, of whom six survived to adulthood. Moore died 1 March 1943 in New York City.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Fortune, Timothy Thomas; National Urban League; New York Age; Scott, Emmett Jay; Washington, Booker T.

Further Reading

Afro-American Investment and Building Company Collection, Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.

Baltimore Afro-American, 6 March 1943. (Obituary.)

Booker T. Washington Papers, Library of Congress.

Ingham, John N., and Lynne B. Feldman, "Frederick Randolph Moore." In African-American Business Leaders: A Biographical Dictionary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1994.

New York Age, 6 March 1943. (Obituary.)

New York Times, 3 March 1943. (Obituary.)

Werner, Ludlow W. "The New York Age: Lusty Veteran." Crisis, 45(3), March 1934.

Wiseman, John B. "Frederick Randolph Moore." In Dictionary of American Negro Biography, ed. Rayford W. Logan and Michael R. Winston. New York: Norton, 1982.

Moore, Richard B.

Richard Benjamin Moore was an Afro-Caribbean intellectual and radical activist who contributed to the development of black Marxism, organized labor, and cultural nationalism in the United States. He immigrated from Barbados to New York City in 1901, settled in Harlem, and became involved in grassroots politics. He was a founding member of the Harlem branch of the Socialist Party in 1918 but grew disheartened by its failure to attack racism and abandoned it in 1921. He then joined the Workers Party, the local branch of the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) in Harlem. With Cyril Briggs, Grace Campbell, and others, Moore established the African Blood Brotherhood (ABB), a secret organization for people of African descent that emphasized armed self-defense against white supremacists. Though ABB was short lived, it marked an attempt by the Communist Party to merge racial concerns with labor politics. Moore also served on the executive board and council of directors of the American Negro Labor Congress (ANLC) in 1925 and became a contributing editor of its organ, Negro Champion. In 1931 Moore was elected vice president of International Labor Defense (ILD), which had a crucial role in the Scottsboro case. Moore was instrumental in pushing ILD and the Communist Party to demonstrate a commitment against racism. By the 1940s, however, Moore moved away from Marxism and toward pan-Africanism as a means of black liberation. He was charged with racial chauvinism and expelled from CPUSA in 1942.

Moore also contributed to the Harlem Renaissance by promoting literary and intellectual developments rooted in the black experience. He became a wholehearted pan-Africanist intellectual and studied informally throughout the 1930s with figures such as anthropologist Louis Leakey and historian William Leo Hansberry. In the 1940s, he lectured on the history and political affairs of the African diaspora, in accordance with his heightened race-consciousness.

In 1940 Moore formed a partnership with Angelo Herndon and started Pathway Press, specializing in racially conscious texts such as a commemorative edition of The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass. Also in 1940, Moore founded the Frederick Douglass Historical and Cultural League as a public forum for the local Harlem community. In 1942, he established the Frederick Douglass Book Center, which specialized in the African diaspora; it remained a cultural and intellectual hub in Harlem until it burned down in 1968. Moore acquired some 15,000 books on the experience of black people around the world (the collection is now housed in Barbados), and he was directly involved with developing a curriculum to promote greater racial sensitivity in the educational system of New York City.

Moore also focused on decolonization. His earliest foray into this movement was his effort to organize mass demonstrations and relief during the Italian-Ethiopian crisis of 1935. Two years later he became involved with endorsing Caribbean independence and help found the American-West Indian Defense Committee. He participated more intensely in Caribbean advocacy organizations during the 1940s and 1950s, hoping to establish a federation of West Indian nations. In 1953, he delivered a speech in Harlem, to British representatives and many supportive Harlemites, about this proposed federation. Although the federation movement faltered in the 1950s, many Caribbean islands did gain political independence from European powers a decade later; in 1966, Moore was invited to return to Barbados for a celebration of its independence.

Throughout his life, Moore devoted himself to ending white supremacy. His most profound contribution to that struggle was The Name "Negro"—Its Origin and Evil Use (1960), in which he argued that the word "Negro" was unacceptable because of its "slave origin" and detrimental connotations; he proposed "Afro-American" as a more positive alternative.

Biography

Richard Benjamin Moore was born on 9 August 1893 in Hasting, Christ Church, Barbados. His family immigrated to New York City in 1901 and settled in Harlem. He was a founding member of the African Blood Brotherhood, 1919–1924; was a member of the executive board and council of directors of the American Negro Labor Congress (ANLC), 1925; was a contributing editor to Negro Champion; was elected vice president of International Labor Defense, 1931; was a cofounder of Pathway Press, 1940; and established the Frederick Douglass Book Center, 1942–1968. Moore died on 18 August 1978 in New York.

J. M. FLOYD-THOMAS

See also African Blood Brotherhood; American Negro Labor Congress; Briggs, Cyril; Communist Party; Pan-Africanism; Scottsboro

Further Reading

James, Winston A. Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in America, 1900–1932. New York: Verso, 1997.

Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. Seeing Red: Federal Campaigns against Black Militancy, 1919–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Moore, Richard B. Caribs, "Cannibals," and Human Relations: A Revealing Exposure of Smears and Stereotypes. Patchogue, N.Y.: Pathway, 1972.

———. The Name "Negro": Its Origin and Evil Use, ed. and intro. W. Burghardt Turner and Joyce Moore Turner. Baltimore, Md.: Black Classic, 1992. (Originally published 1960.)

Turner, W. Burghardt, and Joyce Moore Turner, eds. Richard B. Moore, Caribbean Militant in Harlem: Collected Writings, 1920–1972, intro. Franklin W. Knight. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992.

Watkins-Owens, Irma. Blood Relations: Caribbean Immigrants and the Harlem Community, 1900–1930. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

Moore, Tim

Harry Roscoe "Tim" Moore is best known today for his role as George "Kingfish" Stevens in the television version of Amos 'n' Andy during the 1950s. However, this came at the tail end of a long career in black entertainment.

While dancing for pennies on the streets of Rock Island, Illinois, around 1900, Moore was recruited to join a vaudeville act, Cora Miskel and Her Gold Dust Twins, as one of the twins. He toured England with this act. On his return in around 1901–1902 he joined Dr. Mick's Traveling Medicine Show. He left show business to be a jockey briefly, before taking up a successful career as a professional boxer (he claimed to have won 84 of 104 fights).

He returned to the stage in 1908 with a notable one-man show of Uncle Tom's Cabin in which he presented a profile in blackface or whiteface depending on which character he was playing. With his first wife, Hester, he formed a vaudeville troupe, the Georgia Sunflowers, which lasted several years. They toured in Asia, Australia, and the Pacific. In 1916, with his second wife, Gertie, he created Tim Moore's Chicago Follies. They regularly toured the Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA) circuits until 1925, building up a strong following among black audiences.

As well as his own touring productions, Moore played in numerous other shows as a featured comedian in the 1920s, and also in an early black silent film, His Great Chance (1923). Though he worked in the blackface tradition, he had established a reputation as a clever stand-up comedian writing and performing his own material. He had perfected a con-man routine developed in his early vaudeville years and also sometimes portrayed a blackface Scotsman, complete with kilt. His success brought him to the attention of Lew Leslie, who gave him the leading comic role in the highly successful Blackbirds of 1928. Moore continued to be featured in most of Leslie's later Blackbirds shows, including the European-based versions in 1934 and 1936, as well as the final version in 1939, which also featured Lena Horne.

Moore appeared in several other black revues throughout the 1930s, such as Fast and Furious (1931), which included Jackie "Moms" Mabley. He was a regularly featured comedian at Harlem's Apollo Theater and the Alhambra. In 1931 he had a role in Oscar Micheaux's movie Darktown Revue. Moore continued playing nightclub and cabaret engagements into the 1940s. His last theater engagement was Ed Sullivan's Harlem Cavalcade in 1942. His final film role was as a transvestite in Boy! What a Girl! (1947).

While he was living quietly in retirement at home in Rock Island in 1950, he was recommended by his old friend Flournoy Miller for the part of "Kingfish" in the planned television version of Amos 'n' Andy (which had begun as a radio series). Despite the show's controversial racial image, Moore's reworking of his con-man routine created a memorable portrayal that is still recalled with affection by many people, both black and white. The show ended in 1953. Moore died in Los Angeles in 1958.

Biography

Harry Roscoe "Tim" Moore was born in Rock Island, Illinois, 9 December 1887. He joined a vaudeville act in around 1900; joined Dr. Mick's Traveling Medicine Show in about 1901–1902; was a jockey (briefly) and then a professional boxer; had a one-man show of Uncle Tom's Cabin in 1908; formed a vaudeville troupe, the Georgia Sunflowers; produced Tim Moore's Follies, 1916–1925; performed in numerous shows as a comedian in the 1920s and 1930s; he also performed in nightclubs, cabarets, films, and—memorably—in the television series Amos 'n' Andy in the early 1950s. Moore died in Los Angeles 13 December 1958.

BILL EGAN

See also Alhambra Theater; Amos 'n' Andy; Apollo Theater; Blackbirds; Blackface Performance; Leslie, Lew; Mabley, Jackie "Moms"; Micheaux, Oscar; Miller, Flournoy; Theater Owners' Booking Association

Theater Productions and Performances

- 1908: Uncle Tom's Cabin. (One-man show.)
- 1909: Georgia Sunflowers.
- 1916–1925: Chicago Follies/Tim Moore's Follies.
- 1919: A Wedding in Jazz.
- 1923: Rosie's Wedding Day.
- 1924: Aces and Queens.
- 1925–1926: Rarin' to Go.
- 1925: Lucky Sambo. (Aces and Queens renamed.)
- 1927: Southland Revue; Take the Air.
- 1928–1929: Blackbirds of 1928.
- 1931: Fast and Furious.
- 1932: Harlem Scandals of 1932; Blackberries of 1932.
- 1934: Blackbirds of 1934.
- 1936: Blackbirds of 1936.
- 1939: Blackbirds of 1939.
- 1942: Ed Sullivan's Harlem Cavalcade.

Films and Television

- 1923: His Great Chance.
- 1931: Darktown Revue.
- 1946: Boy, What a Girl.
- 1951–1953: Amos 'n' Andy.

Further Reading

- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993a.

- . A Century of Musicals in Black and White. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993b.
- . Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.
- Watkins, Mel. On the Real Side: Laughing, Lying, and Signifying. New York: Touchstone–Simon and Schuster, 1995.
- Woll, Allen. Dictionary of the Black Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

Morand, Paul

Paul Morand, a French modernist author, published more than sixty books of fiction, travel, criticism, and autobiography during a career that lasted some sixty years. By the end of the twentieth century, his fame had dimmed in France and he was little known in the English-speaking world, but two of his early books were widely read in translation and discussed during the Harlem Renaissance.

Magie noire (1928; issued in the United States as Black Magic, 1929) is a collection of eight short stories, inspired by Morand's travels through Africa as part of his diplomatic duties for the French government. The stories show black Africans in Europe and the United States struggling to deal with the changing world, and generally finding themselves incapable of keeping pace with whites. In "Syracuse, or the Panther Man," for example, a wealthy and educated African American becomes a screaming naked savage when he sees an African mask for the first time in a museum in Brussels; in "Good-Bye, New York," a light-skinned black woman from New York takes a cruise around the world and is driven mad by prejudice. It seems that Morand was attempting to treat those of African descent sympathetically, but his black characters are mere stereotypes; most of them long to return to Africa or revert to a supposed ancestral black essence, and they are unable to find peace and success in modernized societies like those found in Harlem, New Orleans, or Liberia. The stories are sprinkled with specific details of life in these locations, and several critics commented that Morand had a better feel for skyscrapers, music, and costume than he did for people. The book is illustrated with drawings by Aaron Douglas, an important artist of the Harlem Renaissance. The drawings, incorporating both western and African elements, were among Douglas's most influential works.

For one of his nonfiction travel books of the period, New York (1929, translated 1930), Morand drew on official visits he had made to the United States in 1925 and 1927. The book reveals a writer who finds New York fascinating and amusing. He celebrates museums and hockey and shopping, and he demonstrates his fascination with Harlem's nightlife and with the opportunities New York offered for members of different races to interact. His passages describing Harlem are lively and detailed, presenting an interesting outsider's point of view.

Both books were controversial in the 1930s, as intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance debated the extent to which Morand's portrayals were insightful or patronizing.

Biography

Paul Morand was born in Paris, France, on 13 March 1888. He was educated at the Institution Sainte-Marie; Lycée Carnot, 1899–1903 (degree not completed); was tutored privately by Jean Giraudoux, 1905; and studied at the Écoles des Sciences Politiques, 1909–1912. He was an attaché, diplomat, and ambassador for the French government, 1913–1927, 1932–1944, 1953–1955; an editorial board member at the newspaper Figaro, 1933–1939; and a writer and translator, 1919–1976. He was elected to the Académie Française in 1968. Morand died in Paris on 23 July 1976.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Douglas, Aaron

Selected Works

- Magie noire*. 1928. (Black Magic. 1930.)
New York. 1929. (Translated 1930.)

Further Reading

- Burrus, Manuel. Paul Morand, voyageur du vingtième siècle. Paris: Séguier, 1986.
- Lemaître, Georges. Four French Novelists: André Gide, Marcel Proust, Jean Giraudoux, Paul Morand. London: Oxford University Press, 1938.

- Place, Georges G. Paul Morand. Paris: Éditions de la Chroniques des Lettres Françaises, 1975.
- Thibault, Bruno. "Paul Morand." Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 65, French Novelists, 1900–1930, ed. Catharine Savage Brosman. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1988.
- Van Noort, Kimberly Philpot. Paul Morand: The Politics and Practice of Writing in Postwar France. Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 2001.

Moreland, Mantan

Most scholars would agree that, with regard to his career, Mantan Moreland is about as far removed from the goals and ideas of the Harlem Renaissance as an artist can get. A highly successful comic, Moreland appeared in more than 300 films during the 1930s and 1940s, playing nervous black characters who fled at every sign of danger. The diminutive Moreland delighted white and black audiences alike with his rolling eyes and exaggerated facial expressions, but his humor seemed totally at odds with the efforts of the renaissance to produce works that portrayed African Americans as dignified role models rather than as offensive caricatures. Whatever the attitude toward his legacy, Moreland left a mark as a comedian that is difficult to ignore.

Moreland was born in 1901; his penchant for entertaining emerged during his childhood years in Monroe, Louisiana, where his friends nicknamed him "Google Eyes." At around age fourteen (some accounts say he was as young as twelve), Moreland ran away at least twice, once to become a dancer with a carnival, and later to join a traveling medicine show; in both cases, he was forcibly returned to his home by the juvenile authorities. In the 1920s, Moreland toured briefly with a minstrel troupe before playing on the "chitlin circuit," the colloquial term for all-black vaudeville shows. There, he perfected his craft as a comedian by playing backup for famous comics such as Flournoy Miller, Benny Carter, and most notably Tim Moore, a former prizefighter who later played the role of Kingfish on the television program Amos 'n' Andy.

The slapstick-burlesque road shows in which Moreland developed his style evolved from nineteenth-century minstrel troupes and the crude "coon humor" that was popular around the United States. Middle-class professionals, particularly those of the Harlem Renaissance, derided such comedy as racist and demeaning, an opinion shared by contemporary historians. Yet, as some cultural theorists have pointed out, vaudeville shows required more skill than minstrelsy, and overall they marked a shift toward a more respectable image for black comedians. "Mutilatin' the language" (as in "you gotta be repaired for that") became a staple of Flournoy Miller's act, whereas Moreland's own "indefinite talk" routine, which he regularly performed live and unrehearsed with his partner Ben Carter, required ample skills in delivery and timing:

- A. How come you can't pay me now?
B. Horse races
A. What track you play at?
B. I play over there at . . .
A. That track's crooked. Why don't you play over here around . . .
B. That's where I lost my money! . . . I bet on a horse and that rascal didn't come in until . . .
A. Was he that far behind?
B. Yeah!
A. Who was the jockey ridin' him?
B. A jockey by the name of . . .
A. He can't ride! I thought he went out there to ride for . . .
B. He did! But they fired him. He came on back . . .

Moreland and Carter could continue such patter indefinitely, each finishing the sentences of the other without allowing the conversation to reach a stopping point. Despite the stereotypical content, the grammar and dialect of such exchanges was probably a more accurate reflection of the speech patterns of average, uneducated African Americans in the 1920s than the literary accomplishments of the black elite.

Moreland's background in live comedy provided much of the style that later defined him as a movie actor. A typical stage buffoon, he used physical mannerisms and gestures that held the audience's attention: delivering his lines at a staccato pace, punctuating a joke by rolling or popping his eyes, or affecting a facial expression with his elastic features to convey a range of emotions from surprise to terror to lechery. His popularity earned him offers to perform in Connie's Inn Frolics of 1927 and Blackbirds of 1928, 1930, and 1932. Though he received mostly secondary roles with little dialogue, Moreland's antics were such that observers found it difficult to watch anyone else with whom he was sharing the stage.

Hollywood studios had a need for black men with such talent. Lazy black characters like Rastus or “coon servant” types like Stepin Fetchit drew the laughter of white audiences even while confirming their prejudices. Moreland’s film debut came with That’s the Spirit in 1932; it was followed five years later by a supporting role in The Spirit of Youth, which was about the life of a professional boxer and had an all-black cast including Joe Louis. As in his stage work, Moreland would be typecast in minor, insignificant roles where he provided his formulaic routines and gestures. His films were mostly low-budget independent productions, although he worked with some great comedy teams like Laurel and Hardy, and also with figures such as Redd Foxx and Lucille Ball who later became famous in the transition to television. Through the late 1930s and 1940s, Moreland was almost ubiquitous in American films, making cameo appearances in literally hundreds of grade-B productions.

Moreland found his niche playing the sidekick in comic mystery tales such as Cosmo Jones, Crime Smasher (1943) and in horror films like King of the Zombies (1943). The inane writing and plots were partly redeemed by Moreland’s humor, as in his use of signature lines like “Feets, do your duty.” His most recurrent role was Birmingham Brown, the black chauffeur of the Chinese detective Charlie Chan. The Chan films capitalized on a dual set of ethnic images by contrasting the calculating Asian sleuth and his sons, who spoke broken English and were given to philosophical musings, with Brown’s perpetually frightened demeanor and hilarious avoidance of danger. American audiences identified with Brown because of the way that Moreland imbued the character with a commonsense instinct of self-preservation, juxtaposed against the cold rationality of the Asians:

Number 1 son: Confucius remind us, Birmingham, that he who fights and runs away . . .

Brown: I know . . . will live to run another day!

Number 1 son: If you’re scared, Birmingham, just keep saying to yourself, “I’m not afraid . . . I’m not afraid.”

Brown: I’m not afraid. I’m not afraid. I’m not afraid.

Number 1 son: How do you feel now?

Brown: I feel like a liar!

In other mystery films, Moreland’s characters could be seen commenting on the action from the sidelines or occasionally even rescuing the protagonist from danger, though always with extreme reluctance.

Although the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) regularly denounced Moreland’s work as perpetuating ignorance and stereotypes, his films undeniably did well with African American moviegoers. At theaters in Harlem, he had top billing in advertisements for the Chan films. In the late 1940s, Toddy Studios commissioned him to star in a series of cheap but raucously funny movies produced for all-black cinemas. Moreland occasionally did have roles in grade-A pictures as well as in numerous radio programs, and apparently he was even considered as a replacement for Shemp Howard in the Three Stooges comedy team. Through the decade of World War II, his trademark role of the “fainthearted Negro” would be endlessly repeated by imitators, but Moreland’s expert use of physical expressions and body language somehow conveyed the individuality of each character, despite the banal dialogue given to him by unimaginative screenwriters.

The black civil rights movement of the 1950s brought a downturn in Moreland’s popularity. As African Americans defied a century of discrimination and segregation laws, the image of a clownish, scared black man no longer held much power to entertain. No longer in demand in movies, Moreland tried to revive his stage career by turning to the nightclub circuit. His finances suffered, and by the early 1960s, when a severe stroke left him incapacitated, he was nearly bankrupt. After 1964, however, Moreland’s health and reputation experienced an amazing recovery. He appeared in 1964 in the horror picture Spider Baby with Lon Chaney Jr., and he went on to play cameos in two prominent films directed by Carl Reiner later in the decade. As the television and motion picture industries became more open to African Americans, experienced black actors like Moreland enjoyed a resurgence. He worked on a few situation comedies such as the Bill Cosby Show, and even revived his “indefinite talk” routine for television commercials. His last roles included a part in Melvin Van Peebles’s satire The Watermelon Man (1970) and in The Young Nurses in 1973. Moreland died of a heart attack in Hollywood that same year, at age seventy-two.

Film critics of the post-civil rights era have not been kind in their analyses of Mantan Moreland and other black actors who portrayed tricksters, lethargic servants, and lovable cowards in the early decades of moviemaking. Yet Moreland carved a place for himself in the film industry during a time of intense racial oppression and when the doors of major studios were almost universally closed to people of color. Evidencing what W. E. B. Du Bois called “double consciousness,” Moreland developed a physical repertoire that allowed him to produce ambiguous images that whites perceived as clownish and unthreatening, but that fellow blacks could interpret as sly and clever. At the very least, his work testifies to the expertise of an entertainer who could assess the mood of his audiences and use self-parody to keep them laughing.

Biography

Mantan Moreland was born 4 September 1901 in Monroe, Louisiana. He left home at age fourteen, in 1915, to join a traveling circus; toured with a minstrel troupe and became a well-known vaudeville circuit actor in the 1920s; appeared in Connie's Inn Follies of 1927 and Blackbirds of 1928, 1930, and 1932; and moved to Hollywood and began appearing in low-budget independent films in the late 1930s. His most famous role was “Birmingham Brown,” assistant to the detective Charlie Chan in a series of fifteen films from 1944 to 1948. Moreland was considered as a replacement for Shemp Howard in the comedy team the Three Stooges in 1955. He began appearing in nightclub acts in the late 1950s. He suffered a severe stroke in the early 1960s but made numerous cameo appearances in films and television sitcoms in the late 1960s. He appeared in his last major film, The Watermelon Man, in 1970. Moreland died of a heart attack in Hollywood, California, 28 September 1973.

JAMES N. LEIKER

See also Miller, Flournoy; Moore, Tim

Selected Filmography

That's the Spirit (1932); The Spirit of Youth (1937); Shall We Dance (1937); Next Time I Marry (1938); There's That Woman Again (1938); Harlem on the Prairie (1938); Two-Gun Man from Harlem (1938); Irish Luck (1939); One Dark Night (1939); Riders of the Frontier (1939); Tell No Tales (1939); Frontier Scout (1939); Laughing at Danger (1940); Millionaire Playboy (1940); On the Spot (1940); Star Dust (1940); Chasing Trouble (1940); Drums of the Desert (1940); Up in the Air (1940); Hi'Ya, Sailor (1941); Let's Go Collegiate (1941); Mr. Washington Goes to Town (1941); You're Out of Luck (1941); Cracked Nuts (1941);

Dressed to Kill (1941); Ellery Queen's Penthouse Mystery (1941); Sign of the Wolf (1941); Four Jacks and a Jill (1941); The Gang's All Here (1941); Hello Sucker (1941); Cabin in the Sky (1942); Footlight Serenade (1942); Law of the Jungle (1942); Mexican Spitfire Sees a Ghost (1942); The Palm Beach Story (1942); Phantom Killer (1942); Andy Hardy's Double Life (1942); Eyes in the Night (1942); The Strange Case of Dr. Rx (1942); Tarzan's New York Adventure (1942); Footlight Serenade (1942); Freckles Comes Home (1942); Girl Trouble (1942); Phantom Killer (1942); A-Haunting We Will Go (1942); Cosmo Jones, Crime Smasher (1943); King of the Zombies (1943); Hit the Ice (1943); Melody Parade (1943); You're a Lucky Fellow. Mr. Smith (1943); Revenge of the Zombies (1943); Sarong Girl (1943); She's For Me (1943); Slightly Dangerous (1943); Swing Fever (1943); We've Never Been Licked (1943); Mystery of the Riverboat (1944); Bowery to Broadway (1944); Charlie Chan in the Secret Service (1944); Moon over Las Vegas (1944); Pin Up Girl (1944); Charlie Chan in Black Magic (1944); The Chinese Cat (1944); Chip off the Old Block (1944); See Here, Private Hargrove (1944); South of Dixie (1944); This is the Life (1944); Meeting at Midnight (1944); The Scarlet Clue (1945); The Jade Mask (1945); Captain Tugboat Annie (1945); The Shanghai Cobra (1945); The Spider (1945); She Wouldn't Say Yes (1945); Dark Alibi (1946); Riverboat Rhythm (1946); Shadows over Chinatown (1946); Tall, Tan and Terrific (1946); The Chinese Ring (1947); The Trap (1947); Juke Joint (1947); Sky Dragons (1948); The Mystery of the Golden Eye (1948); Docks of New Orleans (1948); The Feathered Serpent (1948); The Shanghai Chest (1948); The Chinese Ring (1948); Spider Baby (1964); The Patsy (1964); Enter Laughing (1967); The Comic (1969); The Watermelon Man (1970); The Young Nurses (1973).

Further Reading

- Berlin, Howard M. The Charlie Chan Film Encyclopedia. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2000.
- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films, 3rd ed. New York: Continuum, 1994.
- Boskin, Joseph. Sambo: The Rise and Demise of an American Jester. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film. 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- . Black Film as Genre. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978.

- Patterson, Lindsay. Black Films and Film-Makers: A Comprehensive Anthology from Stereotype to Superhero. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1975.
- Reid, Mark A. Redefining Black Film. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Sourcebook on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.
- Schechter, William. The History of Negro Humor in America. New York: Fleet, 1970.
- Watkins, Mel. On the Real Side: Laughing, Lying, and Signifying—The Underground Tradition of African-American Humor That Transformed American Culture, from Slavery to Richard Pryor. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1994.
- , ed. African American Humor: The Best Black Comedy from Slavery to Today. Chicago, Ill.: Lawrence Hill, 2002.

Morrison, Frederick Ernest

As a baby, Frederick Ernest Morrison (c. 1912–1989) was thrust into films by his father, a cook based in New Orleans whose own ambitions for a film career had led him to Hollywood, where he eventually found himself working for a movie producer. Thanks to his father's connections in Hollywood and to his infectious beaming smile, little Ernie Morrison came to the attention of the father of the child star Baby Marie Osborne, who was looking for a black youngster to appear alongside his daughter in one of her films. Morrison made his film debut with Baby Marie Osborne in 1917 at the age of five.

In 1919, Morrison came to the attention of the white comedy producer Hal Roach, who wanted to sign Morrison to appear under the sobriquet "Sunshine Sammy" in a series of short films starring the popular white comedians Snub Pollard and Harold Lloyd. Roach's films were a far cry from the early motion pictures called "race films" produced by independent black filmmakers such as Oscar Micheaux. Roach understood that stereotypes of blacks were what sold at the box office. In these shorts, Morrison played the role of a tiresome pest who constantly interfered with everyone else's affairs. His performances were so impressive that Roach decided to showcase his talents and make him a member of a new comedy series called Our Gang, about the adventures of a group of white and black children from a working-class background. The series was innovative in that it featured the white and black children on equal terms rather than as foils against one another. As far as children were concerned, audiences had no problem with this arrangement. As a child actor, however, Morrison had little choice in the roles he played. Whether they were children or adults, white audiences were comfortable with seeing African Americans portray stereotyped comic or clown characters who were nonthreatening—and what better example could there be than a smiling black youngster? From 1922 to 1924, Morrison, now referred to exclusively as "Sunshine Sammy," appeared in twenty-eight Our Gang shorts and became the highest-paid black performer in the movies.

Sometime in 1924, at the ripe age of twelve, Morrison was persuaded by his frustrated father-manager to leave cinema for the vaudeville circuit as a tap dancer, singer, and comedian with his own band called "Sunshine Sammy and His Hollywood Syncopators." He continued on this path for the next fifteen years, learning a great deal about entertaining along the way. In 1940, Morrison returned sporadically to films and played the character Scruno in Monogram's East Side Kids. He was also periodically cast in a few Twentieth-Century-Fox musicals as a member of the dancing Step Brothers.

During World War II, Morrison found time to entertain troops with the USO. After the war, he gave up show business and took a job as a quality-control inspector at an aerospace firm based in Los Angeles. He retired in the early 1970s, but he emerged briefly to appear in guest spots on such television series as Good Times and The Jeffersons. In 1987, Ernie "Sunshine Sammy" Morrison was inducted into the Black Film-makers Hall of Fame.

Biography

Frederick Ernest Morrison was born in about 1912. He made his film debut with Baby Marie Osborne in 1917 at the age of five. In 1919, he was signed by the white comedy producer Hal Roach to appear as "Sunshine Sammy" in a series of short films starring Snub Pollard and Harold Lloyd. From 1922 to 1924, Morrison appeared in twenty-eight Our Gang shorts. In 1924, he went on the vaudeville circuit as a tap dancer, singer, and comedian with his own band; in 1940 he returned to films. Morrison retired in the early 1970s and died in 1989.

JAMES SMALLS

See also Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Micheaux, Oscar; Race Films

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Tom, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Viking, 1973.

Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Null, Gary. Black Hollywood: The Negro in Motion Pictures. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1975.

Morton, Ferdinand Q.

The politician and attorney Ferdinand Quentin Morton was born in Mississippi in 1881 and grew up there and in Washington, D.C. He studied for three years at Harvard, where he was a star of the debating team, and then studied law at Boston University. He received his bachelor of laws degree in 1909, moved to New York City, passed the bar exam, entered the firm of Wheaton and Curtis, and allied himself with the Tammany Hall Democratic Party under the sponsorship of Charles F. Murphy. In 1916, Morton was elected leader of the United Colored Democratic Association (United Colored Democracy) and was appointed assistant attorney general. In 1922, he was named to the Civil Service Commission by Mayor John F. Hylan; Morton would serve on this commission for twenty-six years, surviving four investigations that resulted in the resignations of several colleagues (he was chairman of the commission for several years in the 1940s). In 1924, Morton declined the offer of a judgeship. During the 1920s, he had a close friendship with Mayor Jimmy Walker and was also connected with Governor Al Smith. When Smith ran for the presidency in 1928, Morton initially refused to campaign for him after discovering that the campaign headquarters was segregated; he then relented and did work for Smith, but refused reimbursement of expenses on the grounds that the funds were tainted by racism. In 1932, Morton initially opposed Franklin D. Roosevelt's nomination for the presidency because Roosevelt, as governor of New York, had quarreled with Tammany Hall. In 1935, Morton ran for the state assembly but lost the seat for Harlem to a white candidate and openly decried the election as having been corrupt and rigged.

Throughout his long career in politics, Morton worked for the people of Harlem, particularly in matters involving government jobs. He was instrumental in the appointment of several black judges. A staunch opponent of racial separatism, he quarreled over this matter with W. E. B. Du Bois in the pages of Crisis. On both tactical and psychological grounds, Morton took positions that in retrospect seem prescient as well as sensible:

You advocate withdrawal behind the barriers because members of the majority group . . . "refuse to treat me like a man." That psychological reaction is precisely the thing that must be discouraged in our youth. . . . We will not build separate institutions . . . when our country's institutions are our birthright. There is not one which we have not helped to establish.

A stoic by nature, and a tough and persistent political brawler, Morton received the following unusual accolade in the magazine section of the Baltimore Afro-American in 1935: "astute politician . . . never cries when hit." And the Tattler noted, in 1930: "Morton . . . taught the Negroes of New York that politics is a business that calls for hard selfish thinking instead of idealistic sentiment." Morton had his critics, however, one of whom, the columnist "Capitan" in the Louisiana Weekly, wrote some incisive and telling attacks.

Morton never married, and he claimed to live entirely for his work. An enthusiastic baseball fan, he served a term as commissioner of Negro Baseball. His last years were marred by Parkinson's disease, and he retired from the Civil Service Commission at the beginning of 1948. He entered a sanatorium in Washington, D.C. and died in 1949.

Biography

Ferdinand Quentin Morton was born 9 September 1881, in Macon, Mississippi, and was raised there and, from age nine, in Washington, D.C. His father was a schoolteacher in Macon and later a clerk in the Treasury Department. Morton attended public schools in Washington; Phillips-Exeter Academy, graduating in 1902; Harvard (for three years); and Boston University (bachelor of laws, 1909). He joined the law firm Wheaton and Curtis in New York City; allied himself with Tammany Hall; was elected leader of United Colored Democracy (1915); was appointed assistant attorney general (1916); and was named to the Civil Service Commission (1922), on which he served for twenty-six years (including several years as its chairman in the 1940s). He also served a term as commissioner of Negro Baseball. He developed Parkinson's disease, retired from the Civil Service Commission in 1948, and entered a sanatorium in Washington, D.C. He died in a hospital there in November 1949, following injuries suffered when he fell asleep while smoking.

ELLIOTT HURWITT

See also Baltimore Afro-American; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Inter-State Tattler; Party Politics; Politics and Politicians; United Colored Democracy

Further Reading

- Baltimore Afro-American*, 12 November 1949. (Obituary.)
 Brisbane, Robert H. The Black Vanguard. Valley Forge, Pa.: Judson, 1970.
 "Capitan." "Harlem, Morton, and United Colored Democracy." Louisiana Weekly, 16 January 1932.
 Ferdinand Q. Morton clippings file, Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.
 Morton, Ferdinand Q. "Segregation." Crisis, August 1934.
 Murphy, George B., Jr. "Commissioner Ferdinand Morton Tells Why He Is a Bachelor." Baltimore Afro-American, 19 September 1931.
New York Age, 12 November 1949. (Obituary.)
 "The Statesmanship of Ferdinand Q. Morton." Tattler, 22 August 1930.
 Titus, E. K. "Morton Muses Over Loss of Hard Fight in Harlem." New York World-Telegram, 18 September 1935.

Morton, Jelly Roll

Jelly Roll Morton (Ferdinand Joseph La Menthe)—a pianist, composer, arranger, and bandleader in classic jazz—is among the most colorful and controversial figures in the history of this music. During the 1920s, Morton brought jazz to new heights with a series of recordings that demonstrated the greatness of early New Orleans ensemble playing and also influenced the future big band style by showing that swinging jazz could result from combining solo improvisation with complex written arrangements. However, Morton's adventurous life and his constant self-aggrandizement, sometimes at the expense of others, often overshadowed his importance as a pioneering genius in jazz composing, arranging, and piano playing.

Morton was born in New Orleans, probably in 1885 or 1890, and as a child was drawn to the music of his surroundings: ragtime, spirituals, opera, blues, marches, vocal quartets, and Spanish guitar music. These experiences would lead to his love of the piano, and they would influence the development of his highly original concepts of jazz improvisation and form. Morton's brief period of formal piano instruction was supplemented by learning from blues pianists and the ragtime piano "professors" of New Orleans' Storyville red-light district, where he soon worked as a soloist.

After being ejected from home for working in brothels, Morton began an errant lifestyle that took him throughout the South, trying his hand at gambling, pimping, and pool hustling. He also became a traveling vaudevillian and adopted the name Jelly Roll (and Morton, based on his stepfather's last name, Mouton). He traveled about the country, challenging and defeating lesser pianists with his style of ragtime, blues, jazz, and even classical pieces. By 1914 Morton began to write out the original compositions that he had made up and refined over the years. He published his "Jelly Roll Blues" (the first published jazz score) in 1915. From 1914 to 1917, Morton was active in Chicago's Southside night life as a bandleader, using his handwritten musical arrangements for the first time.

Morton moved to Los Angeles in 1917 and for the next five years wrote new compositions, led bands, and performed up and down the West Coast. In 1923, seizing new opportunities presented by the publishing and recording industries, he moved back to Chicago, where he had his greatest period of productivity, renown, and artistic success. He wrote, published, and recorded songs at a rate that surpassed anyone else in jazz at the time. Among his earliest sessions were band recordings and piano solos, including some of his best works, like "King Porter Stomp" and "New Orleans Joys." Morton's piano style was his own unique creation: a blend of the forms and techniques of ragtime and the feeling of the blues with his own laid-back sense of swing. In his early solo piano style, Morton often conveyed the sounds of other instruments with lines, melodies, riffs, and effects that appear later in versions recorded by full bands.

During this time, he began a collaboration with the Melrose brothers' publishing company and record store, which served as his base of operations for putting out new material, rehearsing bands for recordings, and gaining exposure in the music community. He continued to record band numbers and produced two duets with Joseph "King" Oliver. National exposure came when compositions like his "Wolverine Blues" were recorded and played by bands all over the country.

On the heels of Louis Armstrong's recordings with the Hot Five and Hot Seven—which helped to shift attention toward improvised solo playing in jazz—Morton recorded his greatest body of work, which focused on collective ensemble playing. Morton's sessions with the Red Hot Peppers in 1926 and 1927 are among the most significant body of jazz recordings. Here his extended concept of New Orleans—style jazz is beautifully displayed with a series of colorful melodies, shifting moods, solo breaks, arranged harmony parts, improvised solos, surprising effects, and driving rhythms. Morton was a true artist who experimented with instrumentation, tone colors, rhythms, and form. His band orchestrations were extensions of his solo piano style and were thus tinted with blues inflections, Afro-Caribbean rhythms, subtle dynamics, dissonance, and counterpoint, all of which he saw as crucial to jazz. Morton's work of the mid-1920s also introduced new elements in jazz recording, such as trios, arranged clarinet "choirs," and improvisation based on a single chord.

When activities on Chicago's Southside slowed down, Morton toured for a year and then moved to New York in 1928. Despite his best efforts, he was never a big success in New York. The man who had been at the top of Chicago's jazz world now experienced a downward spiral in his career and his life, from which he never recovered. During his five years in New York, Morton constantly had problems finding competent musicians and work. His insistence on regular rehearsals and on strict adherence to sometimes difficult written scores—and his preference for musicians from New Orleans—made it hard for him to assemble and keep a good band.

In the late 1920s, jazz was growing in many directions—all of them away from Morton's New Orleans concept of an ensemble. In the mind of the public and of forward-thinking jazz musicians, Morton was no longer in fashion. The flashy hot improvised solos of Louis Armstrong and the emerging big bands that depended more on arrangements were now in vogue.

Morton's laid-back, bluesy piano style seemed tame compared with the trendy faster, fuller, more aggressive, technically complex Harlem stride piano, the style of James P. Johnson, Willie "the Lion" Smith, and Fats Waller. Some musicians saw Morton as a second-rate has-been. To make matters worse, Morton became a target of scorn and ridicule as a result of his own continual bragging about being the world's greatest pianist and the inventor of jazz and about the superiority of New Orleans musicians, and as a result of his complaint that New York musicians were thieves who could not play jazz or swing. However, Morton also had a reputation for being able to back up his claims, and on occasion he proved that he could at least hold his own with the stride players.

In 1928 and 1929, Morton recorded several piano solos and a new version of the Red Hot Peppers, who had been working with him at a dance hall in Harlem called Rose Danceland. Although he was able to find work over the years playing at ballrooms and college dances in the area, Morton's engagements became fewer and fewer. Due to poor record sales and the economic effects of the Depression, he was dropped by the Victor recording label in 1930. He now spent much of his time standing outside the Rhythm Club in Harlem, arguing with and preaching to musicians about organizing, protecting their rights, the shortcomings of other musicians, and of course his own greatness.

The main targets of Morton's verbal assaults were organizations like ASCAP, Melrose Publishing, MCA booking agency, and the musicians' union, which he felt were either stealing from him or preventing him from collecting the royalties that were rightfully due to him as a composer and a recording artist. He believed that a concerted effort by these agencies and a voodoo curse placed on him were the causes of his declining career and his other misfortunes. Some of Morton's beliefs were not completely without merit. The Melrose brothers had been cheating him out of royalties for years; he had also been denied membership in ASCAP for several years because of its racist practices, so that had had received no payment for other people's performances of his songs. Although his own piano and band style was considered old fashioned, several of his compositions, such as "Wolverine Blues," "Milenburg Joys," and especially "King Porter Stomp" (in versions for big bands) had become hits for Benny Goodman, Fletcher Henderson, and others, and they were constantly being recorded and played on radio across America.

Much has been made of the fact that, although Morton and Duke Ellington (as the first and second great jazz composers) had some similar artistic and conceptual ideas, there was a long-standing and sometimes viciously outspoken bitterness between them. In interviews, Ellington belittled Morton as a pianist and composer. Morton, for his part, called Ellington a fake and a thief whose acclaimed “jungle style” had been stolen from Morton’s earlier recordings. Actually, Ellington’s style of the late 1920s and early 1930s showed considerable influence from New Orleans jazz, and it is unimaginable that he would have been unaffected by the greatest composer in that tradition, Morton. Morton’s “Jungle Blues” (1927)—which has the same title as a different tune written by Ellington in 1929—does have the dark “primitive” minor mood, bluesy effects, and general feeling of Ellington’s later work. And several of Ellington’s recordings of the period have melodic devices, breaks, and attention to sound, mood, and form that were introduced by Morton. Ellington’s recording of “Dicty Glide” (1929) has very similar elements as those in Morton’s classic version of “The Pearls” (1927): a steady staccato bass line, melodic and rhythmic saxophone solo quotations, and Ellington’s brief phrase in Morton’s style that opens his piano solo.

Feeling jinxed and overpowered, unable to succeed in New York, and fed up with the music business, Morton moved to Washington, D.C., in 1935. He ended up serving as entertainment, bartender, bouncer, and barrel opener in a small dive called the Jungle Inn. Though his customary fancy clothes, big car, and front tooth diamond helped to keep up appearances, the proud Morton was broke and slipping deeper into obscurity. With the help of a friend and business associate, Roy Carew, Morton started a publishing company and began a vigorous campaign to reestablish his career and collect royalties from the Melrose brothers and ASCAP. He sent letters seeking justice everywhere, even to the U.S. Supreme Court and the White House.

In 1938 Morton created a stir in the jazz world when Down Beat magazine published a letter he wrote in which he affirmed his claim to having invented jazz and also called the respected “father of the blues,” W. C. Handy, a fraud and an imposter. He may have done this to get attention, but, if so, the plan backfired: he was now being perceived by some people as laughable or even crazy, a jealous egomaniac who blamed others for his own failure. Morton’s attempt to be heard did have one positive result, however: Alan Lomax taped a series of interviews with him for the Library of Congress that same year. The many hours of Morton talking, playing, and singing make up one of the most detailed and important oral histories in American music.

These sessions eventually led to the publication of Morton’s biography, Mr. Jelly Roll (1949). Morton provides descriptions, names, dates, places, and musical examples as they relate to the early history of jazz in New Orleans. He demonstrates examples of influential musical genres and shows how he transformed them into his own personal style of jazz. He becomes the first major early jazz figure to give insight into the unwritten rules and principles of melody, harmony, rhythm, effects, instrumentation, and color, as they relate to different styles.

After recording several piano solos for small labels, Morton moved back to New York in 1939 with high expectations of reviving his career. He recorded several fresh-sounding piano solos and band sides for the Bluebird label. The band recordings are of standard New Orleans material, done in a much looser and less arranged form than the material of the Red Hot Peppers. These sessions feature several prominent New Orleans musicians, including Sidney Bechet and Albert Nicholas. In 1940 Morton made his last recordings, introducing his popular ballad “Sweet Substitute.” He spent his last months in New York playing in clubs and trying to sue his former publishers for not paying his royalties. When ASCAP finally granted Morton membership, it was in the lowest category, which yielded insultingly low payments. His last national exposure came when he performed two songs in a show on NBC radio.

In the winter of 1940, the broke and ailing Morton drove across the country to Los Angeles to handle family business and to try to restart his career there. As he grew weaker (from heart failure), Morton rehearsed a big band in music that he had written shortly before leaving New York. Morton’s last compositions included several revolutionary pieces containing advanced harmonic ideas. He had hoped that his new music and band would rival the leading swing orchestras of the day, like Count Basie’s and Duke Ellington’s. Jelly Roll Morton died in July 1941 without having a chance to perform or record his new material.

Given the range and scope of Morton’s recordings (nearly 200 songs), compositions (more than 100 songs), and arrangements, he was one of the greatest creative forces in jazz. He invented his own virtuoso solo piano style. He was among the first to conceive of jazz compositions in terms of written arrangements, and he published written music long before jazz recording began. Morton was also among the first to announce the new New Orleans sound and spread it across America. Through his experimentation with melodic and rhythmic variation, nuance, sound textures, effects, color, and moods, he expanded and inspired new possibilities in jazz composition and arranging.

Nearly fifty years after Morton's death, his music began to be revived and his life began to be reexamined. Both the music and the life were presented in numerous ways: in theater, documentaries, tribute concerts, books, radio shows, and endless record reissues. While much of the attention has focused on his contribution to jazz, some of it has had to do with the more sensational aspects of his life: in particular, there has been a popular but distorted analysis of Morton, a light-skinned Creole, as a self-loathing man who despised his own race. This distortion may have developed because outsiders can rarely understand the eccentric character terms, views, and humor of the black Creole culture of New Orleans. In Morton's case, his actions spoke louder than his words. He spent his entire life working in the context of a black folk tradition, surrounded by black musicians whom he considered the greatest performers of jazz. He spoke out against injustices to blacks (including himself) that came from a racist entertainment industry. Moreover, Morton did not pass himself off as being of another race (although his appearance would have allowed this) even when he was living in California, where it was a common practice for insecure New Orleans Creoles to "become Hispanic." Musicians who were close to Morton have said that he did not harbor any deep-seated hatred for other blacks; he merely expressed a "Crescent City version" of black signifying and self-humor that was, and remains, a common cultural characteristic.

Late in his life, Jelly Roll Morton predicted that he would gain his due recognition and make an impressive return, and eventually he proved to be right.

Biography

The exact birth date of Jelly Roll Morton (Ferdinand Joseph La Menthe, or Lamothe) remains unclear; it is often cited as either 20 September 1885 or 20 October 1890. He came from a Creole family in New Orleans, Louisiana. He briefly had formal piano instruction; also learned from blues pianists and ragtime piano "professors" in Storyville, the red-light district in New Orleans; and was soon performing as a soloist there. He then became a traveling vaudevillian and pianist and adopted the name Jelly Roll; began writing down his compositions c. 1914; was a bandleader in Chicago, 1914–1917; moved to Los Angeles in 1917 and back to Chicago in 1923; composed, performed, and made recordings in Chicago; moved to New York in 1928 but had difficulties there; moved to Washington, D.C., in 1935; made taped interviews for the Library of Congress in 1938; moved back to New York in 1939; made his last recordings in 1940 and moved back to Los Angeles. Morton died 10 July 1941 in Los Angeles, California.

MICHAEL WHITE

See also Armstrong, Louis; Bechet, Sidney; Blues; Ellington, Duke; Handy, W. C.; Jazz; Johnson, James P.; Music; Oliver, Joseph "King"; Smith, Willie "the Lion"; Waller, Thomas "Fats"

Selected Compositions

"Black Bottom Stomp"
"The Crave"
"Dead Man Blues"

Jelly Roll Morton. (Brown Brothers.)

"Fingerbreaker"
"Freakish"
"Frog-I-More Rag"
"Georgia Swing"
"Jelly Roll Blues"
"Jungle Blues"
"King Porter Stomp"
"Milenburg Joys"
"Mr. Jelly Lord"
"New Orleans Blues"
"The Pearls"
"Shreveport Stomp"
"Sidewalk Blues"
"Sweet Substitute"
"Tom Cat Blues"
"Wild Man Blues"
"Winin' Boy Blues"
"Wolverine Blues"

Recordings

Ferd "Jelly Roll" Morton. Retrieval 79002. (Piano solos, 1923–1926.)
Jelly Roll Morton Centennial: His Complete Victor Recordings, 1926–1939. Bluebird 2361.
Jelly Roll Morton: Last Sessions, 1939–1940. GRP/Commodore 403.
Jelly Roll Morton's Library of Congress Recordings of 1938. Rounder 1091, 1092, 1093 and 1094. (4 CDs, various titles.)

Further Reading

Balliet, Whitney. Jelly Roll, Jabbo, and Fats. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.
Depogny, James, ed. Ferdinand "Jelly Roll" Morton: The Collected Piano Music. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1982. (Sheet music for solo piano.)
Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Black Bottom Stomp: Eight Masters of Ragtime and Early Jazz. New York: Routledge, 2002.
Kennedy, Rick. Jelly Roll, Bix, and Hoagy. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994.
Levin, Floyd. Classic Jazz. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.
Lomax, Alan. Mr. Jelly Roll. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001. (Originally published 1949.)
Pastras, Phil. Dead Man Blues: Jelly Roll Morton Way Out West. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

Reich, Howard, and William Gaines. Jelly's Blues. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
Russell, William. Oh, Mister Jelly: A Jelly Roll Morton Scrapbook. Copenhagen: JazzMedia APS, 1999.
Williams, Martin. Jelly Roll Morton. New York: Barnes, 1963.
———. Jazz Masters of New Orleans. New York: Da Capo, 1979.
Wright, Laurie. Mr. Jelly Lord. Chigwell, Essex, UK: Storyville, 1980.

Motley, Archibald J. Jr.

The painter Archibald J. Motley Jr. of Chicago consciously dedicated himself to depicting African Americans. Through his portraiture and genre scenes, Motley created a visual legacy that extended the issue of representation beyond the boundaries of New York's Harlem. Optimistically, he believed that art could end racial prejudice by dispelling negative stereotypes, a sentiment espoused by both W. E. B. Du Bois and Alain Locke. Motley's striking paintings of stylish urban African Americans correspond to the image and concept of the "New Negro." During his academic training at the School of the Art Institute of Chicago from 1914 to 1918, Motley synthesized a variety of approaches to the composition, color, and meaning of art. He believed that each element of a painting should be carefully considered for both its significance and its aesthetic contribution to the overall composition.

After graduation, Motley began to exhibit works in Chicago, winning prestigious prizes and critical acclaim. In 1919 the Chicago Defender published his article "The Negro in Art," in which he urged other black artists to paint African American subjects and to uphold academic principles, avoiding modernist expressionism. His own Mending Socks (1924), a portrait of his paternal grandmother Emily, shows his skill at rendering the texture of objects realistically, as well as his ability to capture a sitter's likeness. Each object that the artist included in this work was selected for its aesthetic and iconographic meaning. For example, the portrait of Emily Motley's former mistress, shown on the wall in the upper left of the painting, adds visual balance to the composition yet is also an unsettling reminder of slavery. This painting was voted the most popular work when it was exhibited at the Newark Museum in 1927; its sentimentality reflects the artist's commitment to portraying both the appearance and the character of his subjects.

Motley's success led to his first solo exhibition at the New Gallery in New York City in 1928. Because of the commercial success of works that exoticized black culture, the dealer of the New Gallery requested that the artist expand his repertoire to include depictions of "voodoo" and African cultures. After doing research on his assigned subject in sources such as National Geographic and Asia: The Magazine of the Orient, Motley created a series of five paintings reflecting the biases and misunderstandings that were perpetuated in these magazines. Although Alain Locke had urged African American artists to reestablish a connection with African cultures by adopting the geometric forms of African sculpture, Motley maintained a critical distance by depicting Africa as mirage from the past, complete with demons, dinosaurs, and giant apes. Reviewing Motley's exhibition, a critic for the New York Times Magazine (Jewell 1928)—who was evidently racially prejudiced—rhapsodized over the "jungle works," largely ignoring the portraits and urban scenes and claiming that Motley's creative urge was linked to superstitions and mysteries rather than to ambition and skill. Some other critics reacted similarly, conflating the artist's imagery and his racial identity. For example, a reviewer for the Chicago Daily News (Williams 1928) concluded that although the African images were derived from the artist's research, "there was something innate" in his "makeup that made him sense and express the mystery that hovers over such themes." Not all the reviewers acclaimed the series; one of them (Mannes 1928) described the paintings as "the cheapest most blatant ten-twenty-three illustrations." Another (M.P. 1928) described such works as the "imaginings of boy's Voodooland," but praised the portraits that compared favorably "with the best output of the Academy." Nearly every painting in the exhibition was sold, including a portrait sold to John E. Nail, a real estate magnate in Harlem.

Also in 1928, Motley won a gold medal for the fine arts from the Harmon Foundation for his portrait Octoroon Girl (1925). As the antiquated title indicates, this work depicts a woman of mixed race: an octoroon was supposedly one-eighth African American and seven-eighths Caucasian. During Motley's time, the validity of determining racial identity through biological characteristics was hotly debated, as anthropologists such as Franz Boas argued that race was in fact a social construction. The artist's position on this issue remains ambiguous. Through what he referred to as "scientific studies," he painted various "Negro types" such as the "octoroon," the "quadroon," the "mulattress," and "pure" African Americans, apparently equating external appearance with internal character. Yet he also called into question the reliability of such methods of classification and the social consequences. Motley stated that their different skin tones and facial features made African American subjects far more attractive and interesting to paint than European-Americans. Through his interest in documenting these differences in portraiture, he refuted the concept of a uniform blackness and provided a "visual rebuttal" to the negative stereotype of African American that was common in popular culture during this period (Patton 1998, 123). But although Motley was aware of the pressure to produce "positive images," he rejected the demand for art as propaganda, repeatedly stating that he intended to depict African Americans "honestly," including the humor and pathos of black life. In genre scenes of the street life of Chicago's "Bronzeville," with its cabarets and pool halls, he frequently exaggerated spatial perspective, color, and the posture and physiognomy of his figures. Because visual art has a strong and enduring impact, and because it could presumably have a harmful effect on people's perception of African Americans, race leaders such as Locke criticized Motley's works as "lurid" and "grotesque" (1936, 69). Other viewers disagreed, though, appreciating the provocative, satirical nature of these scenes.

Despite his criticism, Locke supported Motley's successful application for a Guggenheim fellowship. This fellowship allowed Motley to travel to Paris in 1929. During his year abroad, Motley studied the works of old masters in the Louvre and painted several portraits, street scenes, and cabarets. His most famous work from this period is Blues (1929), a close-up view of dancers and musicians in a Parisian club that seems to suggest the syncopation of jazz through the artist's use of alternating forms.

Returning to Chicago in 1930, Motley continued to paint and exhibit his works both locally and nationally. In 1935 he was invited to be a visiting artist at Howard University, where he taught art classes. He also won a commission from the United States Treasury Relief Project for a mural at the post office in Wood River, Illinois. From 1935 to 1940, Motley joined other artists in Chicago who were employed by the Illinois Art Project, a division of the Federal Arts Project of the Works Progress Administration (WPA), which provided employment for artists during the Archibald J. Motley Jr. (1891–1981), The Jazz Singers, c. 1934; oil on canvas, 32 1/8 by 42 1/4 inches. (Provenance: WPA, 1934.

Permanent collection, Western Illinois University Art Gallery, Macomb, Illinois. Courtesy Western Illinois University Art Gallery.)

Depression. He created murals and easel paintings, adapting his style to the didactic narratives favored by the WPA. Motley's commitment to promoting social and racial equality is especially apparent in his paintings from this period, such as Playground (Recess) of c.1940, which shows a diverse group of children playing together. After the WPA was disbanded, Motley and many other artists had to find employment elsewhere. Resourcefully, Motley joined the graphic design crew of Styletone, a manufacturer of hand-painted shower curtains in Chicago. He also continued his artistic work, broadening his subject matter by traveling to Mexico in 1953. For several years afterward, Motley painted images inspired by the landscape and people of Guanajuato and Cuernavaca. During the 1960s and 1970s, he returned to depictions of African American life. Although his productivity slowed, he continued to paint until his death in 1981.

Motley's contribution to the Harlem Renaissance continues to be appreciated and investigated. Recent scholarship has focused on his concept of racial identity. His determination to expand the canon of American art to include images of African Americans by African Americans remains a relevant concern.

Biography

Archibald John Motley Jr. was born 7 October 1891 in New Orleans, Louisiana. In 1893 his family moved to Chicago, where he attended public schools in the Englewood district. He began studies at the School of the Art Institute of Chicago in 1914 and graduated in 1918. He worked at various odd jobs while submitting paintings to group exhibitions. His first solo exhibition was at the New Gallery in New York City. Motley studied in Paris while on a Guggenheim fellowship in 1929–1930; was a visiting instructor at Howard University in Washington, D.C., in 1935–1936; was employed by the Works Progress Administration Illinois Art Project intermittently from 1935 to 1940; was commissioned by the Treasury Department to paint a mural for the Wood River, Illinois, post office in 1937; taught art at South Side Community Art Center in Chicago in 1941; and painted for industrial design firms in Chicago (Styletone from 1948 to 1956 and Artistic during 1957). His awards included the School of the Art Institute of Chicago Joseph N. Eisendrath and Frank G. Logan prizes, 1925; Harmon Foundation Gold Medal, 1928; John Simon Guggenheim Fellowship, 1929–1930; recognition by President Jimmy Carter for his contribution to American art; and an honorary doctorate from the School of the Art Institute of Chicago, 1980. Motley died in Chicago on 16 January 1981.

AMY MOONEY

See also Artists; Chicago Defender; Federal Programs; Harmon Foundation; Locke, Alain; Nail, John E.; Works Progress Administration

Individual Exhibitions

- 1928: New Gallery, New York.
- 1933: Chicago (Illinois) Women's Club.
- 1957: Chicago Public Library.
- 1991: Chicago Historical Society.

Selected Group Exhibitions

- 1917: "Paintings by Negro Artists." Arts and Letters Society, Chicago.
- 1921: "Twenty-Fifth Annual Exhibition by Artists of Chicago and Vicinity." Art Institute of Chicago.
- 1927: "Painting and Watercolors by Living American Artists." Newark (New Jersey) Museum of Art.
- 1929: "Exhibit of the Fine Arts by American Negro Artists." Harmon Foundation and Commission on the Church and Race Relations, Federal Council of Churches. International House, New York.
- 1929: "Exhibition of Paintings and Sculpture by American Negro Artists." National Gallery of Art, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C.

Motley, Archibald J. Jr.

- 1930: "Udstilling af Amerikansk Kunst." American-Scandinavian Foundation, American Federation of Arts, and American Institute of Architects, Copenhagen, Denmark.
- 1988: "Three Masters: Eldzier Cortor, Hughie Lee-Smith, Archibald J. Motley, Jr." Kenkeleba Gallery, New York.
- 1989: "The Blues Aesthetic: Black Culture and Modernism." Washington (D.C.) Project for the Arts.
- 1990: "Against the Odds: African American Artists and the Harmon Foundation 1923–1943." Newark (New Jersey) Museum of Art.
- 2000: "Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance." Hayward Gallery, London, England.

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African American Artists from 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Bernard, Catherine. Afro-American Artists in Paris: 1919–1939. New York: Hunter College, 1989.
- Greenhouse, Wendy. "An Early Portrait by Archibald J. Motley, Jr.," American Art Journal, 1 and 2, 1998.
- Greenhouse, Wendy, and Jontyle Theresa Robinson. The Art of Archibald J. Motley, Jr. Chicago, Ill.: Chicago Historical Society, 1991.
- Jacobson, Jacob Z., ed. Art of Today: Chicago 1933. Chicago, Ill.: L. Stein, 1933.
- Jewell, Edward Alden. "A Negro Artist Plumbs the Negro Soul." New York Times, 25 March 1928.
- Locke, Alain. Negro Art: Past and Present. Washington, D.C.: Associates in Negro Folk Education, 1936.
- Mannes, Myra. "Gallery Notes." Creative Art, 2(4), April 1928.
- Mooney, Amy M. "Representing Race: Disjunctures in the Work of Archibald J. Motley, Jr." Museum Studies, 24(2), 1999.
- M.P. "The Art Galleries." New Yorker, 10 March 1928.
- Patton, Sharon. African American Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Powell, Richard. The Blues Aesthetic: Black Culture and Modernism. Washington, D.C.: Washington Project for the Arts, 1989.
- . Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. London: Thames and Hudson, 1997.
- Reynolds, Gary A., and Beryl J. Wright. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation, 1923–1943. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum of Art, 1990.

- Robinson, Jontyle Theresa. "The Art of Archibald John Motley, Jr.: A Notable Anniversary for a Pioneer." In Three Masters: Eldzier Cortor, Hughie Lee-Smith, Archibald John Motley, Jr. New York: Kenkeleba Gallery, 1988.
- Williams, Marguerite B. "Putting a Race in Pictures: Archibald Motley's Story." Chicago Daily News, 31 July 1929.
- Woodall, Elaine. "Looking Backward: Archibald J. Motley and the Art Institute of Chicago." Chicago History, 8, Spring 1979.

Moton, Robert Russa

Robert Russa Moton, a child of slaves, was a distinguished American educator, an adviser to every president from Woodrow Wilson through Franklin D. Roosevelt, and a consistent advocate of interracial goodwill. His achievements are now largely unknown, however, because Moton, unlike some of the more vocal figures of the era, preferred to induce social, economic, and political change quietly.

Moton's education inspired him to help fellow African Americans. Following early tutoring from his mother, Moton attended a free school for blacks. In 1885 he enrolled in Hampton Institute, a school famous for its industrial offerings. At Hampton, Moton imbibed heavy doses of the "Hampton spirit," a call to lead and serve others. As a result, he abandoned plans to become a tradesman, preferring instead to pursue a teaching career. Once again, however, Moton's plans changed when he became Hampton's assistant commandant of cadets in 1890. In the following year, Moton assumed the post of commandant, which made him the highest-ranking African American administrator at Hampton. Moton's position also entailed a number of speaking and fund-raising engagements. Moton was often accompanied by Booker T. Washington, the founder of Tuskegee Institute and Hampton's most illustrious graduate; thus, Moton could observe Washington's poise and character firsthand. Besides helping Moton polish his skill at public relations, the tours enabled him to assess the nation's race relations and the plight of rural blacks.

In 1915, following Washington's death, Moton accepted the presidency of Tuskegee Institute, an African American institution modeled on Hampton's plan. Moton assumed this responsibility with a determination to transform Tuskegee into a world-class educational institution. When the nation prepared for war, Moton assisted the mobilization effort by transforming Tuskegee into a technical training school for 1,200 students. He also successfully lobbied for Emmett J. Scott's appointment as an assistant to Newton Baker, the secretary of war. After much wrangling, Moton also secured a training camp for African American officers at Fort Des Moines, Iowa. In addition, he traveled to France to oversee the treatment of African American troops. Moton's investigation and subsequent report silenced the "whispering gallery" by disproving charges that black troops were incompetent and unruly.

When the 1920s began, Moton became involved in the struggle for racial equality. In Finding a Way Out (1921), in What the Negro Thinks (1929), in newspaper articles, and in his public appearances, Moton regularly addressed the topic of deteriorating race relations in the United States. His comments were always frank and sincere. When a rash of violent race riots erupted just after the end of World War I, Moton helped organize the Council on Interracial Cooperation. He also implored Presidents Wilson and Harding to denounce lynching, mob action, and all other forms of racial injustice. To halt lynchings, Moton authorized Tuskegee's Department of Records and Research to issue annual reports on lynchings in the United States. The findings, combined with widespread editorial condemnation of the practice and the efforts of Ida B. Wells Barnett, substantially reduced the number of lynchings.

W. E. B. Du Bois, William Monroe Trotter (the fiery editor of the Boston Guardian), and James Weldon Johnson criticized Moton's strategy of compromise. They resented Moton's apparent willingness to placate rather than antagonize wealthy southerners. Some activists believed that Moton should have been more militant and aggressive in protesting racial injustice, especially in the South. Black intellectuals also feared that Moton's promotion of industrial and vocational training at the expense of academic studies threatened to confine African Americans to positions of perpetual servitude.

Although stung by the harsh criticism, Moton, a man of peace who believed in reason and the power of righteousness, remained committed to his strategy of strengthening black institutions at the local, state, and national levels. Although critical of segregation, Moton believed that African American institutions could enhance black people's participation in the civic life of their communities. He also felt that, as blacks gained enhanced strength through their institutions, they would be better prepared to secure the rights and privileges that other Americans enjoyed. Moton's support was especially evident in the business arena.

In 1924, he played a key role in establishing the National Negro Finance Corporation in Durham, North Carolina. Moton was also the director of the Dunbar National Bank following its establishment in Harlem in 1928, and he served as president of the National Negro Business League throughout the 1920s.

Moton's showdown with the Alabama Ku Klux Klan, however, demonstrated that he would, when necessary, challenge white authorities and confront any attempts to subordinate blacks. In 1923 Moton learned that government officials had selected Tuskegee as the site for a new hospital for black veterans. To his dismay, however, he was informed that, despite previous assurances from President Warren G. Harding to the contrary, the medical facility would be staffed by white physicians and nurses. Refusing to accept the decision, Moton lobbied state and federal officials to allow qualified black professionals to fill positions designed to care for African American veterans. Even death threats failed to dissuade him. At one point during the crisis, Moton informed a hostile crowd that he had always believed in interracial cooperation. If he was mistaken, he said, then perhaps it was best if they followed through with their threats and killed him. Moton's defiance eventually forced military leaders to examine the matter. The controversy subsided when General Frank T. Hines, director of the Veterans Bureau, recommended hiring qualified black nurses and physicians to staff the new veterans' hospital.

Moton, the recipient of the Harmon Award in 1930 and the Spingarn Medal in 1932, never wavered in his belief that people of goodwill, regardless of color, could secure justice and equal opportunity for all Americans. Although he was criticized during the Harlem Renaissance for being a "Washingtonian," Moton was not a timid devotee of gradualism. Throughout his life, he consistently condemned discrimination and the hatred it bred. He also believed that mutual understanding and cooperation would eventually solve the nation's racial, economic, civic, and political problems. Moreover, his efforts to disseminate Mahatma Gandhi's message of nonviolent protest had a powerful influence on future generations of African American activists.

Biography

Robert Russa Moton was born 26 August 1867 in Amelia County, Virginia. He studied at a public school in Prince Edward County, Virginia, and at Hampton (Virginia) Normal and Agricultural Institute (teachers' course, 1890; postgraduate course, 1895). He was an assistant commandant of cadets at Hampton Institute in 1890–1891 and commandant of cadets from 1891 to 1915; and president of Tuskegee Institute in Alabama from 1916 to 1935. He was a trustee for several educational institutions, including the People's Village School, Mount Meigs, Alabama; Industrial Home School for Colored Girls, Peake, Virginia; Negro Reform School for Boys, Hanover, Pennsylvania; and Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee. Moton was also a member of the Executive Committee on Interracial Cooperation, 1918; director of the American Bible Society, 1921; chair of the Colored Advisory Commission for disaster relief after the Mississippi flood in 1927; and a member of President Herbert Hoover's National Advisory Commission on Education, 1930. He received honorary degrees from Virginia Union University, Wilberforce University, Oberlin College, Lincoln University, Williams College, Harvard University, and Howard University. His awards included the Harmon Award in Race Relations, 1930; and the Spingarn Medal, 1932. Moton died in Capahosic, Virginia, on 31 May 1940.

JON L. BRUDVIG

See also Antilynching Crusade; Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Du Bois, W. E. B.; National Negro Business League; Scott, Emmett Jay; Spingarn Medal; Trotter, William Monroe; Washington, Booker T.

Selected Works

- "A Negro's Uphill Climb." 1907.
Racial Goodwill. 1916.
Finding a Way Out. 1921. (Reprint, 1969.)
The Negro of Today: Remarkable Growth of Fifty Years. 1921.
"The Status of the Negro in America." 1922.
"The Negro in the South." 1924.
What the Negro Thinks. 1929.

Further Reading

- Anderson, Eric A., and Alfred A. Moss. Dangerous Donations: Northern Philanthropy and Southern Black Education, 1902–1930. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1999.
- Anderson, James D. The Education of Blacks in the South, 1860–1935. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.

Daniel, Pete. "Black Power in the 1920s: The Case of Tuskegee Veterans Hospital." Journal of Southern History, 36, August 1970.

Eisenstadt, Peter, ed. Black Conservatism: Essays in Intellectual and Political History. New York: Garland, 1999.

Engs, Robert F. Educating the Disenfranchised and Disinherited: Samuel Chapman Armstrong and Hampton Institute: 1839–1893. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1999.

Hughes, William Hardin, and Frederick D. Patterson, eds. Robert Russa Moton of Hampton and Tuskegee. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1956.

Myrdal, Gunnar. An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy, 2 vols. New York: Harper and Row, 1944. (See also Twentieth Anniversary ed., New York: Harper and Row, 1962.)

Mulatto

Langston Hughes's play Mulatto opened at the Vanderbilt Theater in New York on 24 October 1935. The production ran for 373 consecutive performances, becoming the longest-running Broadway play by a black writer until Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun broke that record in 1959. Mulatto, which is based on Hughes' short story "Father and Son," was written in 1930 and was later made into an opera—The Barrier (1950)—by the composer Jan Meyerowitz. Mulatto's commercial success on Broadway and during its subsequent tour is notable, for it exposed to a racially mixed audience the issues surrounding miscegenation, a recurrent theme in the literature of the Harlem Renaissance.

Set on a plantation in Georgia, Mulatto, like Hughes's poem "Cross" (1931), presented the plight of a young man in conflict with his biracial identity. Eighteen-year-old Robert "Bert" Lewis is the son of Colonel Thomas Norwood, a white plantation owner, and Norwood's black housekeeper and mistress, Cora. Bert returns home after being away at school and is no longer willing to stay in his place (walk through the back door, speak politely to whites, or labor in the fields) as determined by the racial and social codes of conduct in the South. Bert feels entitled to equal treatment and the same privileges as whites. When Norwood tells Bert to leave the state before the townspeople come after him for his public impudence, Bert strangles his father. At the end of the play, Cora wants to hide her son from the lynch mob, but Bert commits suicide before the townsmen can reach him.

Mulatto, scene from the stage production with J. Kirkwood and M. Gilbert. (Billy Rose Theatre Collection, New York Public Library, New York City. © The New York Public Library/Art Resource, N.Y. Photo: White Studio, anonymous.)

The significance of Mulatto to the Harlem Renaissance derived from its subject matter and its performance history. It was a very early—if not the first—Broadway drama in which the classic conflict between father and son had a racial dimension. Moreover, Cora, a character that Hughes had created particularly for the actress Rose McClendon, gained more depth as the play progressed; at its conclusion, she scorns her relationship with Norwood and withstands a slap across the face from the overseer. Thus, depending on one's interpretation, Hughes presented two black characters, Bert and Cora, who challenged social codes in order to control their own lives. Martin Jones, the producer of the Broadway production in 1935, however, changed certain passages of the script and added a rape scene without Hughes's knowledge or consent. The changes may have increased box-office sales, but they may have also perpetuated a stereotype of blacks as violent and sexually promiscuous—an image that the playwrights of the Harlem Renaissance sought to dispel.

Mulatto received mixed reviews; the reaction of critics and audience members ranged from disgust to enthusiasm, and the sensationalism of the altered script caused some people to disregard its political implications. Hughes wrote mostly comedies and musicals for the stage, but this serious drama set off considerable controversy in its attempt to critique the racial caste system of the South. Mulatto brought Hughes recognition as a playwright and brought issues of race and class to the forefront of the American stage during a period when Broadway did not usually produce plays by blacks or hire blacks as actors.

MELINDA D. WILSON

See also Hughes, Langston; McClendon, Rose

Further Reading

Barksdale, Richard K. "Miscegenation on Broadway: Hughes's Mulatto and Edward Sheldon's The Nigger." In Critical Essays on Langston Hughes, ed. Edward J. Mullen. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1986.

Biennu, Germain. "Intracaste Prejudice in Langston Hughes's Mulatto." African American Review, 26(2), 1992, pp. 341–353.

Hatch, James V., and Ted Shine, eds. Black Theatre U.S.A.: Plays by African Americans, 1847 to Today, rev. and expanded ed. New York: Free Press, 1996. (Originally published 1974.)

Plum, Jay. "Accounting for the Audience in Historical Reconstruction: Martin Jones's Production of Langston Hughes's Mulatto." Theatre Survey, 36, 1995, pp. 5–19.

Sanders, Leslie Catherine, ed. The Plays to 1942: Mulatto to the Sun Do Move. Vol. 5 of The Collected Works of Langston Hughes. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.

Turner, Darwin. "Langston Hughes as Playwright." In The Theatre of Black Americans: A Collection of Critical Essays, ed. Errol Hill. New York: Applause, 1987, pp. 136–147. (Originally published 1980.)

Murphy, Carl J.

One of the most important figures in African American history was Carl J. Murphy (1889–1967), the gifted and charismatic publisher-editor of the Baltimore Afro-American from 1922 to 1967. He was one of the nine children of John H. Murphy, the owner of the Afro-American. Carl Murphy was a newsboy for the paper but then went to college rather than work his way up through its ranks. He attended Howard University, where he majored in German; he then received a fellowship to Harvard University. Such a fellowship was an honor rarely bestowed on blacks in the early 1900s; in fact, Murphy was one of only two blacks in Harvard's graduate school. He graduated from Harvard in 1913 with an M.A. in German. In 1914 he studied at Jena University in Germany. He was caught in Germany by the outbreak of World War I but returned home in October 1914.

Murphy next became an instructor in German at Howard University. During World War I, he volunteered for the Colored Officers' Training Camp at Fort Des Moines, Iowa, but was determined to be too short (at 5 feet 1 inch) and was rejected. In 1918 Murphy gave up his position at Howard to become the editor of the Afro-American. Carl Murphy impressed his family with his editorial and managerial skills, and his brothers chose him to publish the newspaper after their father's death in 1922.

Murphy's academic and scholarly background manifested itself in the extremely high quality of editorials—mostly written by him—that ran in the Afro-American, and in the depth and breadth of its columnists and reporters. As a result, the Afro-American became one of the most highly regarded newspapers on the east coast. Among the renowned figures whom Murphy hired to write for the Afro-American were Countee Cullen, Charles H. Houston, Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson, Claude McKay, Kelly Miller, J. Saunders Redding, Walter White, William Worthy, and the legendary sportswriter Sam Lacy, who, as the paper's sports editor in the 1940s and 1950s, was instrumental in the desegregation of professional athletics.

Throughout the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s, Murphy encouraged the Afro-American crusade for racial justice and advancement locally, statewide, and nationally. Among the causes Murphy led were equal pay for black teachers in Baltimore, an increase in black membership on the Baltimore city council, and black representation on the local school board and in the police department. Nationwide, the Afro-American supported antilynching legislation; it also supported increased federal patronage for black Republicans. With regard to national politics, however, the newspaper was a maverick. Murphy was very progressive for his time and was attracted to leftist views and politicians. Unlike his peers in the black press, he went out on a limb politically. For example, in 1924 he endorsed the third-party candidate, Robert La Follette, for the presidency. In 1928 he had the Afro-American support the Democratic Party's candidate, Alfred E. Smith. Then in the 1930s the newspaper gave covert endorsements to candidates of the Communist and Socialist parties for local, state, and national offices.

Unlike many of its competitors among the black press, the Afro-American expanded and prospered during the Great Depression. It established branch offices and editions in Washington, Philadelphia, Richmond, and Newark; by 1940, Murphy presided over a newspaper chain that stretched all along the East Coast. The Afro-American sent six reporters overseas to cover World War II, more than any other black newspaper and more than quite a few white newspapers. Consequently, the circulation, income, and influence of the Afro-American reached unprecedented highs during these years. The Afro-American became a million-dollar company in 1945 and remained at that level for many years afterward.

Murphy was not only a great journalist but also a great civic leader. In the 1930s, he encouraged and helped finance a case, Murray v. Maryland, that opened the University of Maryland Law School to blacks. Murphy was a member of the national board of directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and in 1935 he was midwife at the rebirth of its moribund Baltimore branch. In the process he launched the career of Lillie B. Jackson, perhaps the most important civil rights leader in Baltimore and one of the most influential in the nation.

Murphy played a vital role in the creation of Morgan State College (later Morgan State University). When Maryland bought this institution from the Methodist Church in 1939, Murphy became a member of its board of regents and then chairman. In that capacity, Murphy used the Afro-American and his own influence to ensure that Morgan received an equitable share of state funding. His interest in Morgan was rewarded, as the school's physical plant, faculty, and student services were greatly upgraded. To honor Murphy, Morgan's fine arts center is named for him.

In the 1950s, Carl Murphy's influence extended nationwide as the Afro-American supported NAACP's efforts to desegregate public education. For this, Murphy received the NAACP's Spingarn Medal in 1955. Under his still-vigorous leadership, the Afro-American crusaded locally and nationally for civil rights in the 1960s.

Little went on in black Baltimore and the nation that escaped Carl Murphy's editorial notice. A man of extremely high intellectual, moral, ethical, and spiritual standards, Murphy refused to tolerate racism anywhere he found it. Nor would he tolerate failure, or even mediocrity, in any endeavor undertaken by black folk. The Afro-American never hesitated to blast individuals, black and white, who did not act in the highest interests of black and white communities. Murphy's unwavering commitment to excellence is shown by the exponential growth of the Afro-American in the years he ran the newspaper, his promoting the rebirth and growth of the Baltimore NAACP, and his shepherding Morgan State College to prosperity and growth in the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s.

Carl Murphy died in 1967, full of years, honors, and success. He left a prosperous and powerful newspaper that is still a meaningful voice for African Americans in Baltimore, in Washington, and elsewhere on the East Coast. Carl Murphy's passing left a void in Baltimore and the nation that has yet to be filled.

Biography

Carl J. Murphy was born in 1889, one of the nine children of John H. Murphy, owner of the Baltimore Afro-American. Carl Murphy was educated at Howard University, earned a graduate degree in German from Harvard University, and became a professor of German at Howard. He joined the Afro-American in 1918 and was chosen by his family to take it over in 1922 after his father's death. He established branch offices and editions, and by 1940 presided a chain of newspapers that extended throughout the East Coast. Murphy died in 1967.

HAYWARD "WOODY" FARRAR

See also Baltimore Afro-American; Black Press; Civil Rights and Law; Cullen, Countee; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Journalists; McKay, Claude; Miller, Kelly; Redding, Jay Saunders; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Detweiler, Frederick G. The Negro Press in the United States. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1922.
- Farrar, Hayward. The Baltimore Afro-American 1892–1950. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1998.
- Ford, Nick A. Best Short Stories by [the Baltimore] Afro-American Writers. Baltimore, Md.: Afro-American, 1950.

Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Pride, Armistead. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.

Suggs, H. Lewis, ed. The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

Vincent, Theodore G. Voices of a Black Nation: Political Journalism in the Harlem Renaissance. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World, 1973.

Wolseley, Roland E. The Black Press U.S.A. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1971.

Muse, Clarence

Clarence Muse acted for more than sixty years and appeared in more than fifty movies. During the early years of the Harlem Renaissance, he acted on the stage in the South and in the East. In the 1920s, he lived in New York City and was a member of the Lincoln Players. He was also a founder and member of New York's Lafayette Players. Muse moved to Chicago for a while, and then moved to Hollywood after performing in Hearts in Dixie (1929), the first all-black movie. For the next fifty years, he worked regularly in minor and major film roles.

Perhaps there will always be controversy about Muse's legacy, because we are still dealing with the issues he wrote about in his pamphlet "The Dilemma of the Negro Actor" (1932). Many early black actors were offered roles that required them to be dutiful servants, thankful menial laborers, buffoons, and happy darkies. If black actors wanted to work, they had, initially, no option other than these types of roles. Muse was a contemporary of Stepin Fetchit but was a different kind of actor, even though his early roles were similar in type to those Fetchit made famous. Many critics have indicated that Muse's talents, range, and capability were, unfortunately, hardly tapped.

Even though Muse was featured in some roles that some blacks found and still find degrading, many have noted that he did not play some of those roles with much enthusiasm, and he was not as involved in the stereotypical roles as he was in the roles that required more of his talent. One of his finer roles was Nigger Jim in Huckleberry Finn (1931). Not surprisingly, the roles he wrote for himself were usually better than the roles others assigned him. For example, his acting in Broken Strings (1940) is some of his best; and it has been suggested that Muse's help with the script is the reason for his memorable performance.

When the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and other groups complained about roles for black actors in the early 1940s, Muse at first wanted these groups to be quiet so that black actors could work, regardless of the roles. His point of view changed, however, when he was asked to work on the script of Song of the South (1946), but quit after his attempts to upgrade the roles of blacks were disregarded. Muse disliked the images of blacks in this movie, and spoke out against it.

The issues Muse discussed in his pamphlet about the dilemma of the Negro actor proved to be persistent. Is any representation better than none? Does it matter how black actors are portrayed on the screen? Robert Townsend's movie Hollywood Shuffle (1987) analyzed essentially the same questions that Muse had tackled more than fifty years earlier. In retrospect, it may be easy to call actors like Clarence Muse, Stepin Fetchit, and Hattie McDaniel Uncle Toms, mammies, minstrels, and coons, but they opened doors so that later black actors, like Canada Lee, could have roles that were more dramatic and multidimensional.

Biography

Clarence Muse was born 7 October 1889 in Baltimore, Maryland. He studied at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania (international law degree, 1911). He had a career in music and acting in the South; he was acting in New York City by the 1920s with the Lincoln Players and Lafayette Players; and he wrote the screenplay for The Sport of Gods (1921). Muse's first major film role was in Hearts in Dixie (1929), which had the first all-black screen cast. Muse worked in Hollywood for fifty years; he sang the title role in DuBose Heyward's Porgy (1929). He published a pamphlet, "The Dilemma of the Negro Actor" (1932); wrote the song "When It's Sleepy Time Down South," which was performed by Louis Armstrong; composed a black symphony, Harlem Heab'n; co-wrote a screenplay with Langston Hughes, Way Down South (1939); co-wrote, produced, and acted in Broken Strings (1940); was an executive member of the Hollywood Victory Committee during World War II; and was a member of Hollywood Writers Mobilization. He received an honorary doctor of humanities degree from Bishop College, Dallas, Texas, in 1972. Muse died in Perris Valley, California, 13 October 1979.

LOU-ANN CROUTHER

See also Fetchit, Stepin; Film: Actors; Hearts in Dixie; Lafayette Players; Lee, Canada

Selected Works

Hearts in Dixie (1929), Hallelujah (1929), A Royal Romance (1930), Rain or Shine (1930), Huckleberry Finn (1931), Dirigible (1931), Last Parade (1931), Secret Witness (1931), Woman from Monte Carlo (1932), Cabin in the Cotton (1932), Winner Take All (1933), Washington Merry-Go-Round (1933), From Hell to Heaven (1933), Broadway Bill (1934), The Count of Monte Cristo (1934), So Red the Rose (1935), Show Boat (1936), Follow Your Heart (1936), Spirit of Youth (1937), Way Down South (1939), Broken Strings (1940), Maryland (1940), Zanzibar (1940), Tales of Manhattan (1934), Shadow of a Doubt (1943), Heaven Can Wait (1943), Watch on the Rhine (1943), Two Smart People (1946), Joe Palooka in the Knockout (1947), An Act of Murder (1948), Riding High (1950), Porgy and Bess (1959), Buck and the Preacher (1972), Car Wash (1976).

Further Reading

- Bogle, Donald. Blacks in American Films and Television: An Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1988.
- . Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Continuum, 1973. (See also 3rd ed., 1994.)
- Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- . Making Movies Black: The Hollywood Message Movie from World War II to the Civil Rights Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Leab, Daniel. From Sambo to Superspade: The Black Experience in Motion Pictures. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
- Mapp, Edward. Blacks in American Films: Today and Yesterday. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1972.
- Null, Gary. Black Hollywood: The Negro in Motion Pictures. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1975.

Patterson, Lindsay, ed. Black Films and Film-Makers: A Comprehensive Anthology from Stereotype to Superhero. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1975.

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1977. (See also 2nd ed., 1995.)

Music

The following discussion focuses on the people who were influential creators and performers of music. All achieved distinction and stretched the boundaries of their art, and most of them flourished during the 1920s. Each epitomized the “New Negro” as described by the leaders of the Harlem Renaissance and interpreted by later writers: the idea that African Americans would project a new image and a new sense of worth as a result of outstanding accomplishments.

These “new musicians” excelled as composers and performers of either ragtime, musical theater, jazz, and other popular styles, or of music in European classical forms and styles. Significantly, many of the European-oriented musicians incorporated in their work either quotations or suggestions of traditional songs, such as spirituals and blues, documenting and celebrating, rather than rejecting, their African American heritage.

Although not all the leaders of the Harlem Renaissance shared the same views as to the direction of black culture, they did usually agree that literature and the arts were to be used as a means of securing economic and cultural equality with the white population by bringing honor and glory to the Negro race. Equality would result from outstanding achievements in the arts. Most leaders of the Harlem Renaissance agreed that black Americans should honor their heritage while striving for higher cultural and artistic achievements. For example, a symphonic work by an African American would incorporate some aspect of black culture—perhaps a theme based on a Negro spiritual or a characteristic melody, rhythm, or cultural reference. Also, a vocal recital would include artistic arrangements of spirituals, in addition to western European art songs.

As this new music evolved, western European notation could not adequately reproduce the slides, tone bending, and other fluctuations of pitch and rhythm characteristic of traditional black music. Thus, some degree of melodic embellishment and improvisation and a strong rhythmic impulse became central to the performance of much new black music.

Black folk music is a product of the rural culture of the South, but the large number of black Americans who moved to northern cities during the early part of the twentieth century responded well to a merging of these rural folk traditions and urban, composed music. The minstrel song was a product of these merging traditions. Typically, it was lively, syncopated, and often humorous. But these songs were originally written by white Americans for white Americans, were sung by white Americans in blackface, and were a caricature of the Negro way of life, often portraying black Americans as comical and illiterate. Although this portrayal had little to do with the realities of black culture, the songs became an important part of American popular music.

Popular Music and Jazz

Jazz—like American society—is also a product of many influences. In some ways, it represents a merging of cultures and musical styles, yet in other ways it retains distinct ethnic characteristics. In the late nineteenth century and the early twentieth, Americans—both black and white—sang and danced to syncopated, “jazzy” music. Some roots of jazz were thus in the existing popular music of Americans of the North and the South and could be found in the melodies and rhythms of the songs and dance music of Tin Pan Alley, minstrel shows, vaudeville, blues and gospel traditions, syncopated orchestras, brass bands of New Orleans, and ragtime.

By the 1920s, the nation’s flourishing economy benefited many places of entertainment. Harlem had become the center for nightclubs, floorshows, and other venues for hearing this new black music. Many white people wanted to go out at night to hear it and would go to “whites-only” clubs in Harlem, sometimes after attending classical concerts or theater in downtown or midtown Manhattan. This was the new syncopated music—created and performed by black Americans and listened to, danced to, and enjoyed throughout the 1920s, the jazz age. The following sections highlight major African American artists who contributed significantly to the advancement of American popular music and jazz during this decade.

Blues Songs

Blues songs originally were part of the folk tradition of African Americans, especially in the Deep South.

Antecedents of blues included work songs, field hollers, and sorrow songs—although blues songs existed long before they were called “blues” and long before they were put into twelve-bar choruses with identifiable, predictable chord progressions. Likewise, blues songs existed long before blues poetry was created in aab form. As folk music, it was sung by individuals who usually created the words, often as they were singing—sharing themes and experiences (such as problems concerning work or a relationship) with any listeners who might be near by.

In the early years of the twentieth century, blues songs were collected as folk songs; by the 1920s, however, blues poetry was being newly created and blues songs were being newly composed. They were arranged for singers with instruments—perhaps a single guitar, or perhaps a more elaborate instrumental ensemble. These songs were published, recorded, and disseminated, and many became popular parts of vaudeville and minstrel shows, nightclub floor shows, and musical theater productions. The careers of “blues singers” became firmly established.

W. C. (William Christopher) Handy (1873–1958) was the acknowledged “father of the blues.” He was a composer, bandleader, music publisher, and the first person to popularize blues. In 1908, he and his partner, Harry Pace, established the Pace and Handy Music Company in Memphis, Tennessee. Handy came to Harlem from Memphis in 1918 and became part of the emerging Negro movement—the Harlem Renaissance. Like others, he saw it as an opportunity for personal success. He and Pace moved the music company to New York, but it was dissolved in 1921. Pace then established the Black Swan Phonograph Company, and Handy established—with his brothers—the Handy Brothers Music Company. Handy became active in publishing music by black songwriters and composers, and he organized concerts of black music, including one in Carnegie Hall in 1928. Through these efforts, he brought the music of many black songwriters and performers to the public’s attention. The Handy family, as of this writing, still owns and operates the Handy Brothers Music Company in New York City.

Handy’s first compositions—“Memphis Blues” (1912) and “Saint Louis Blues” (1914)—achieved widespread popularity. His style was to incorporate blues idioms in his songwriting, rather than quoting from preexisting folk-blues songs or spirituals. His autobiography, Father of the Blues, was published in 1941.

William Christopher Handy, photographed by Carl Van Vechten, 1941. (Library of Congress.)

The most popular of early-twentieth-century blues singers was Bessie Smith (1894–1937), the “empress of the blues.” Smith was a successful vaudevillian, blues and jazz singer, and recording artist during the 1920s and early 1930s. The “classic” blues style that she brought into the jazz repertoire was intense, expressive, and very personal. Smith began touring professionally in 1912, and she made some 200 recordings from 1923 to 1933. She recorded regularly with such greats as Louis Armstrong, James P. Johnson, and members of Fletcher Henderson’s band. She was the featured performer in the film Saint Louis Blues (1929). (For a detailed analysis of Bessie Smith’s singing style, see Schuller 1968, 226–241.)

Other famous classic blues singers of the 1920s included Ma Rainey, Clara Smith, Mamie Smith, and Alberta Hunter.

Ragtime, Stride, and Musical Theater

Other composers and arrangers, such as Will Marion Cook and James Reese Europe, had introduced rag rhythms and bold harmonies in vaudeville and musical theater. By the 1920s, these innovations had become commonplace. Likewise, the blues style was becoming a significant part of mainstream popular music. Syncopated ragtime music and blues songs were increasingly incorporated into much of the popular music of Tin Pan Alley.

By the 1920s, American popular music was already heavily influenced by ragtime and stride—both solo piano styles. Two significant contributors to ragtime were Scott Joplin (who also contributed significantly to opera) and Eubie Blake (who also contributed significantly to musical theater).

Scott Joplin (1868–1917) died before the “official” start of the Harlem Renaissance, yet his contributions are compatible with its philosophy. Joplin grew up in Texarkana, became an itinerant musician, and by 1896 had settled in Sedalia, Missouri. By 1899, he had composed his first piano rag: “Maple Leaf Rag,” ultimately one of his most popular compositions.

Joplin’s rags are full of energy and vitality, highly syncopated, and immediately appealing. To the extent possible, Joplin insisted that they be played according to the written notes and not too fast. He considered his rags a serious art form—at a higher artistic level than rags played in vaudeville, in minstrel shows, on the streets of New Orleans, or on the showboats on the Mississippi River. He sought to bring care and skill to his compositions. He not only helped shape the “classic ragtime” style but also elevated the composing and performing of piano rags to the functional equivalent of piano miniatures by European classical composers of the nineteenth century.

John Stark, in Sedalia, became the primary publisher of Joplin’s rags and dubbed Joplin the “king of ragtime writers.” Joplin wanted to do more than compose and perform rags, however. He wanted to compose for theater as well, and in 1899 he produced The Ragtime Dance, a tableau for dancers and singer-narrator. His Scott Joplin Opera Company presented his ragtime opera, A Guest of Honor, in 1903. Both productions were notably unsuccessful.

By 1907, Joplin had moved to New York City, where he spent the final ten years of his life. In 1911, he published his first opera score, Treemonisha, but failed to get backers for a staged production. In 1915, he financed his own production at the Lincoln Theater in Harlem—a single performance without scenery, costumes, or orchestra. He did not live to see a full production of Treemonisha. In 1972, during the ragtime revival of the 1960s and 1970s, however, Treemonisha was given a full-scale production in Atlanta. Robert Shaw was the conductor, Katherine Dunham was the choreographer, and T. J. Anderson prepared the orchestration. In 1975, the Houston Grand Opera also produced Treemonisha. Gunther Schuller prepared the orchestration—for Dixieland band with added winds and strings—and also conducted the orchestra.

Perhaps as a result of the ragtime revival and the renewed interest in his music, Scott Joplin was publicly recognized with a posthumous Pulitzer Prize in 1976 and a commemorative postage stamp in 1983. Compact discs of the Houston Grand Opera production of Treemonisha are readily available as of this writing—as are many of Joplin’s rags that have been remastered from piano rolls. His complete works have been collected by Vera Brodsky Lawrence and published by the New York Public Library (1972, 1981).

Eubie Blake (1883–1983) achieved success as a ragtime pianist and composer, as a vaudeville performer, and especially as the composer of two musicals: Shuffle Along (1921), which ran on Broadway for 504 performances, and The Chocolate Dandies (1924). His collaborator on each was his vaudeville partner, Noble Sissle. Blake and Sissle incorporated into their musicals all the styles that were then extant in black folk and popular music: ragtime, minstrel songs, vaudeville, cakewalks and other dance music, and spirituals.

Blake’s pianistic abilities also influenced the style of “Harlem stride piano,” a term describing principally the piano styles of James P. Johnson and Fats Waller. Stride piano evolved from ragtime and ultimately changed the course of jazz piano style. Pianists such as Johnson and Waller often were hired to play at Harlem cabarets in Harlem, at house-rent parties, and at sophisticated events of the white social set. Listeners responded enthusiastically to the energy of stride piano, its improvisation, and what must have been perceived as highly technical piano wizardry. Stride was designed to entertain, even impress, the revelers; and the pianists accommodated the tastes of their patrons.

Clubs and Floor Shows: The Entertainers

Minstrel songs and shows were popular by the middle of the nineteenth century. By the beginning of the twentieth century, vaudeville became increasingly popular. But by the 1920s, the former patrons of vaudeville were switching their allegiance to movies and to floor shows in nightclubs and huge ballrooms, although some preferred the more seductive cabarets and intimate nightclubs and bars that had emerged in Harlem. Many restaurant owners introduced dancing and floor shows. These new venues were more respectable—and safer—than the cellar clubs and “below the street” bars. Jazz, the new black music, became one of the ideal forms of music for these new “entertainment centers.”

One of the most noted of the new venues was the Cotton Club. Like many of the clubs, it was “whites-only,” although the patrons were served and entertained by blacks. This “safe” environment made it easier to attract white patrons to Harlem, people who generally lived in downtown or midtown New York. As noted earlier, they would often go to the opera or theater in midtown and afterward go uptown to Harlem to enjoy the black music and the black entertainers.

The careers of black musicians and dancers were often created or stimulated by their participation in these lavish floor shows. For example, Duke Ellington played at the Cotton Club from 1927 to 1932, and this engagement provided him with a large audience (including radio listeners) and an effective showcase for his big band arrangements and compositions. He and his music became well known.

Performers’ careers were also enhanced by appearances in black musical theater on Broadway and elsewhere. Josephine Baker (1906–1979)—a singer, dancer, and entertainer—began her career as a thirteen-year-old in a touring black vaudeville troupe. In the early 1920s she joined the chorus line of Sissle and Blake’s Shuffle Along, and she was featured in its sequel, Chocolate Dandies. After a stint in a New York nightclub revue, she became a comic dancer in the chorus line of La Revue Nègre in Paris. But the show was revised to take advantage of Baker’s beautiful and exotic appearance. Her dancing was featured, but her feather costume was perhaps more memorable. This run lasted three months. After a twenty-five-country world tour in 1928–1929, Baker shifted from novelty dancing to singing love ballads and also became a leading actress in films. She learned the French language and starred in French films, including a remake of Offenbach’s operetta La Créole (1934). She became a French citizen and remained professionally active (and politically active) nearly until her death.

Ethel Waters (1896–1977) was a singer of blues, jazz, and popular music and was prominent in the nightclub scene in Harlem during the 1920s and into the 1930s. Her style and technique anticipated and in fact influenced future jazz singers. Waters began recording in 1921, but she was not content just to record songs. She used her recordings to entice people to come to her live performances, where she used her theatrical flair to draw the audience to her. She was a blues singer—perhaps more of a song stylist—who sang blues in a more refined style than the original, folksy blues singers. Her performances and her recordings were aimed mostly at black audiences; later, though, she became a star on Broadway and in films. Waters began touring with the Billy Graham Crusades in 1960 and continued to do so until 1975; this was a considerable contrast to her previous career.

Syncopated Orchestras and Jazz Bands

The good jazz musicians in the first decades of the twentieth century were mobile, willing to go where the best employment was and, perhaps more important, where the best jazz musicians were. One example of this mobility was the response to a “call” from Charles S. Johnson and Alain Locke to come to Harlem and participate in what was to be the Harlem Renaissance. W. C. Handy came from Memphis; Eubie Blake from Baltimore; Duke Ellington from Washington, D.C.; and Fletcher Henderson from Atlanta. Musicians were also brought by the “lure [of] potential success in an exciting environment” (Floyd 1990, 2).

Most scholars assign the beginnings of jazz to New Orleans—a cosmopolitan city populated by white and black Americans and Creoles. One section of New Orleans, Storyville, was a district where black musicians could find employment—primarily in its clubs, bars, and brothels. In 1917, Storyville was closed down, drying up employment for jazz musicians. The musically able ones went to Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, Kansas City, St. Louis, or San Francisco; they included Jelly Roll Morton, Kid Ory, King Oliver, and Louis Armstrong.

Jazz is a merging of cultures and styles: ragtime, blues, syncopated dance music, and popular songs from minstrels and vaudeville. Essentially it evolved from the performance practices of African Americans: the moods and melodic fluctuations of their blues songs, the syncopated rhythms of their dance music, and the freedoms they took in the creative process—that is, their freedom to improvise. These are some of the characteristics that musicians brought from New Orleans to Harlem, to other parts of New York, and to other cities.

James Reese Europe (1881–1919) was born in Mobile, Alabama, to a musical family. The family moved to Washington, D.C., when Europe was ten. In 1903, at age twenty-two, he moved to New York and began playing piano in Harlem nightclubs. In 1910, Europe founded the Clef Club, an organization that was part social club and part booking agency. It provided musicians to entertain at society parties and dances but also organized performing groups within the club. One group was the Clef Club Orchestra, which had 125 members and included the usual instruments of the string family as well as mandolins and banjos. The orchestra played music by black composers. It first appeared in Carnegie Hall in 1912 and then again in 1913 and 1914. These performances gave the orchestra greater respectability in white society, which in turn resulted in more bookings for elite society functions.

At the start of World War I, Europe enlisted in the army, and his commander asked him to form a military band. This all-Negro band entertained troops and citizens everywhere it visited, and it was always received with great enthusiasm. It was not the typical military band. Members were highly creative in the way they played their instruments and the way they moved. The military band had, in fact, become to a large extent a jazz band.

Louis Armstrong (Satchmo, 1898–1971) became one of the most successful and popular jazz musicians in history. He honed his skills in New Orleans, then moved to Chicago in 1922 to play with King Oliver. In 1924, Armstrong moved to New York to join the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra; he then returned to Chicago, where he made perhaps his most important recordings during the late 1920s with his groups the Hot Five and the Hot Seven. Armstrong had a very successful and illustrious career as a popular entertainer, recording artist, and movie actor.

Armstrong's innovations were formed in New Orleans. They included creative embellishments and improvisations; a swing rhythm; a unique singing quality and style, including scat singing (singing in the manner of instrumental improvisation); and his own personality as a performer. This type of new "hot jazz," in New Orleans and later in Chicago, was typically performed with a small instrumental ensemble, perhaps three melody instruments (cornet or trumpet, clarinet, and trombone) and a rhythm section of string bass or tuba, piano and guitar or banjo, and drums.

Armstrong's impact altered the course of both popular music and jazz, contributing significantly to the development of African American musical styles as a dominant force in twentieth-century music.

Fletcher Henderson (1897–1952) began his professional career in New York as a song demonstrator with the Pace-Handy Music Company. When Harry Pace founded his recording company and the Black Swan label, Henderson began putting together instrumental groups to back up the Pace singers. From this experience, he became a bandleader, organizing various groups for clubs and dances. He performed in Club Alabam and then the Roseland Ballroom, where he remained for a decade. These bands were dance bands, not jazz bands, and were little influenced by the new "hot jazz" coming out of New Orleans. But although most bands in northern urban areas were dance bands, meeting a widespread craving for social dancing, the new jazz was becoming popular.

Louis Armstrong in Every Day's a Holiday, 1937. (AP/Wide World Photos.)

In 1924, Henderson brought in Louis Armstrong from Chicago as the band's jazz specialist. Armstrong's hot swing and melodic invention influenced the musicians in Henderson's band and other musicians in New York, who began to copy Armstrong's solo style. Armstrong left Henderson within a year, but the seed had been sown. By 1926, Henderson's band played excellent jazz. Additionally, Henderson's arrangements—mostly of the work of Don Redman—became the basic pattern of big band arrangements for decades: reed, brass, and rhythm sections with each section alternately taking the lead and providing supportive riffs, always swinging.

Henderson eventually fell into financial difficulties and sold his best arrangements to Benny Goodman, thus initiating the popular swing bands of the 1930s.

Edward Kennedy (Duke) Ellington (1899–1974) was a jazz bandleader, pianist, arranger, and composer, and a leading figure in big band jazz from the 1920s until his death. As previously noted, he and his band played at the Cotton Club in Harlem from 1927 to 1932. His work earned him honorary doctorates, the Presidential Medal of Honor, and membership in the National Institutes of Arts and Letters. Numerous biographies, discographies, essays, and musical analyses fully document the contributions of this distinguished musician.

Classical Music

Most of the African American classical musicians were highly educated, having studied at the best music schools or privately with outstanding white European-trained musicians. African Americans who wanted to create music in classical forms and styles had to determine individually to what extent and in what ways they would adhere to “higher,” cultivated classical forms and yet retain that which was basic to their black cultural heritage.

One point of view among leaders of the Harlem Renaissance was to keep folk and popular idioms out of classical concert music. However, most writers and musicians valued the concept of black nationalism, which implied incorporating traditional black melodic idioms and dance rhythms into classical music. Spirituals, for instance, were arranged in the style of art songs and were included as thematic material in symphonies, concertos, and symphonic poems. A composer might incorporate a spiritual without modifying it, but most composers would vary a spiritual to suit their own compositional style.

Composers

Harry T. Burleigh (1866–1949) was the first black American to achieve distinction as a classical composer and arranger; he was best-known for his arrangements of Negro spirituals. Burleigh studied at the National Conservatory of Music in New York, most notably with its director, Antonín Dvořák. Burleigh also became a choir member at Saint George’s Episcopal Church, which had a prominent, wealthy, white congregation; he remained there for fifty-two years. In addition, he became a soloist at Temple Emanu-El, an affluent synagogue in New York, and remained there for twenty-five years. He was also a music editor for Ricordi Publishing for thirty-six years.

Burleigh composed or arranged 265 vocal works—mostly for solo voice and piano accompaniment—and 187 choral arrangements of black spiritual melodies. He died in 1949. At his funeral, his pallbearers included Eubie Blake, Noble Sissle, and W. C. Handy.

William Levi Dawson (1899–1990) was a composer, arranger, and choral conductor. He graduated from Tuskegee Institute and later returned there to direct the Tuskegee Choir for twenty-five years. In his symphonic music, he used folk song idioms. His best-known work, Negro Folk Symphony, is a four-movement composition based (as its title indicates) on Negro folk music but having the same symphonic form used by European composers who drew on the folk melodies and idioms of their own cultures. Negro Folk Symphony was given its world premiere in 1934 with Leopold Stokowski conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Nathaniel Dett (1882–1943) was a composer, pianist, and conductor. His formal education included a bachelor of music degree from Oberlin Conservatory in 1908 (he was the first black American to receive this degree at Oberlin), and a master of music degree from the Eastman School of Music in 1932. In 1929, he studied with Nadia Boulanger in France. Dett was director of music at Hampton Institute from 1913 to 1931 and was also director of its choir.

Dett is now best known for his numerous arrangements of spirituals, although he also composed three extended works for chorus and orchestra; a widely performed choral piece, “Listen to the Lambs”; and eight suites for piano, of which In the Bottoms and Magnolia Suite are perhaps best known.

Florence Price (1888–1953) was the first black woman to achieve widespread recognition as a symphonic composer; she was also a teacher. Price graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music in 1906 with diplomas in organ and piano. Her prizewinning Symphony in E Minor was performed in 1933 by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra; this exposure led to further performances of her works in the United States and in Europe. Price achieved even more recognition when Marian Anderson sang her arrangement “My Soul’s Been Anchored in de Lord” and her composition “Songs to the Dark Virgin.” The latter was a setting of a text by Langston Hughes.

Price’s compositional style would be considered conservative; she did not use the twentieth-century compositional techniques that were in vogue during the 1920s and the 1930s. Using western European forms, she did incorporate elements of her Negro heritage, however, though she did not quote actual Negro folk or spiritual melodies.

William Grant Still (1895–1978) is undoubtedly the best-known African American composer of classical music in the western European style. Among his most familiar works is Symphony No. 1, the Afro-American Symphony. Its was premiered in 1931 by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, becoming the first symphony composed by a black American to be performed by a major symphony orchestra.

Still worked for Pace and Handy's music publishing company in Memphis and then in New York City. In 1921, he played oboe in the orchestra of Eubie Blake's Shuffle Along on Broadway and on tour. In 1923, he studied at the New England Conservatory in Boston and in New York City with Edgard Varèse. In the late 1920s, Still received grants and awards and created jazz arrangements for Artie Shaw. The première of his opera A Bayou Legend was broadcast on PBS in 1981.

Still's best-known works used Negro and other African American folk idioms. Still, Burleigh, and Dett can probably be said to represent a culmination of at least one ideal of the Harlem Renaissance—to incorporate Negro folk materials into “higher” forms of western European art.

Performers

This ideal was also pursued by solo recitalists. Marian Anderson, Roland Hayes, and Paul Robeson were among the best singers to incorporate black music, particularly spirituals, into their recitals.

Marian Anderson (1897–1993) was a contralto who performed concerts worldwide, winning critical acclaim for her presentation of art songs, arias from operas and oratorios, and spirituals—usually in the same recitals. In 1925, Anderson won first prize in a competition sponsored by the New York Philharmonic, which enabled her to be featured as a soloist with that orchestra. She made her Carnegie Hall debut in 1928. By 1935, with the help of Sol Hurok (her manager for thirty years), Anderson became a world-class artist, touring across the United States and throughout Europe. She would return to Carnegie Hall more than 150 times. Later in her career, she became the first black singer to join the roster of the Metropolitan Opera, paving the way for many to follow.

Anderson received numerous honorary doctorates and awards, including the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1963), the United Nations Peace Prize (1977), a Congressional Gold Medal (1978), the first Eleanor Roosevelt Human Rights Award (1984), and a concert tribute at Carnegie Hall celebrating her seventy-fifth birthday. In 1991, she received a Grammy Award for Lifetime Achievement.

Roland Hayes (1887–1977), a tenor, attended Fisk University and then continued vocal studies in Boston, where he made his debut recital in 1917. He then toured throughout the United States. In 1920, he continued his studies in Europe, gave recitals, and appeared with major orchestras in London, Paris, Amsterdam, Berlin, and Vienna. He returned to the United States, making his Carnegie Hall debut in 1923.

Like Marian Anderson, Hayes shaped a career by presenting recitals of European classics and Negro spirituals—a career that, in his case, lasted for fifty years. At first he was not able to get professional management, so he scheduled his own concerts and tours, becoming well known in African American communities. He financed his own recitals in the major concert halls of Boston, then went to Europe for a series of concerts that included a performance for King George V and Queen Mary of Great Britain. Thereafter, when he returned to America, he now was able to get professional management: the manager of the Boston Symphony, William Brennan, who signed Hayes up for thirty concerts.

Paul Robeson (1898–1976) was a bass-baritone, a movie actor, and a political activist. He received a bachelor of arts degree from Rutgers University and a law degree (LLB) from Columbia University. He became well known for his singing of black spirituals and made his first national tour in 1926. This was followed by stage productions in England (Show Boat and Othello). His best-known films made in the mid-1930s were The Emperor Jones and Show Boat.

Robeson's activism was centered in his recognition of the cultural importance of the common people; accordingly, he learned the languages and folk songs of other cultures. He then took on working-class concerns and became a communist. As his political and cultural rhetoric intensified, his popularity as a singer decreased. He became depressed at the loss of contact with audiences and friends and was virtually isolated in the 1960s and 1970s; before then, however, he had received any number of honors and accolades.

DAVID WILLOUGHBY

See also Black Swan Phonograph Company; Blues; Blues: Women Performers; Chocolate Dandies, The;

Cotton Club; Harlem: 3—Entertainment; House-Rent Parties; Jazz; Minstrelsy; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Musical Theater; Musicians; Nightclubs; Roseland Ballroom; Saint Louis Blues; Shuffle Along; Singers; Spirituals; specific individuals

Recordings

- Anderson, Marian. Marian Anderson. RCA 7911, 1990; BMG Classics, 1989. (1 CD. Music by Bach, Handel, Schubert, and Brahms; three spirituals.)
- Armstrong, Louis. The Hot Fives and Hot Sevens. JSP Records. JSPCDLOUISBOX1 (JSPUSA.com/Products), 1999. (4 CDs.)
- At the Jazz Band Ball: Early Hot Jazz, Song, and Dance, 1925–1933*. Yazoo, 1993. (Videocassette. Performed by Louis Armstrong, Duke Ellington, Bessie Smith, and many others.)
- Burns, Ken. Ken Burns Jazz Collection: Fletcher Henderson. Legacy 061447, 2000. (1 CD.)
- Dett, R. Nathaniel. Magnolia Suite, In the Bottoms, and Eight Bible Vignettes. New World Records 80367, 1992. (1 CD. Denver Oldham, piano.)
- Joplin, Scott. Elite Syncopations. Sony, 2003; Biograph, 1987; Musical Heritage Society, 1989. (1 CD. Original recordings remastered.)
- Price, Florence B. Symphony No. 3; Mississippi River Suite; and The Oak. Koch International Classics 7518, 2001. (1 CD.)
- Price, Still, and Bonds. Black Diamonds. Cambria Records 1097, 1993. (1 CD. Althea Waites, piano.)
- Rhapsodies in Black: Music and Words from the Harlem Renaissance*. Rhino, 2000. (4 CDs and a 100-page booklet. Songs performed by Ma Rainey, Alberta Hunter, Bessie Smith, Ethel Waters, and Paul Robeson. Bands include Louis Armstrong, Fletcher Henderson, and Duke Ellington. Writers include Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Claude McKay, Sterling Brown, W. E. B. Du Bois, and Arna Bontemps. Readers include modern actors and entertainers such as Quincy Jones, Lou Rawls, Gregory Hines, Ice-T, and LeVar Burton.)
- Smith, Bessie. The Essential Bessie Smith. Sony Music Entertainment, 1997. (2 CDs.)
- Smithsonian Collection of Classic Jazz*, Vol. 1. New York: CBS Special Products, 1987. (1 CD of five. From rags of Scott Joplin to the blues of Bessie Smith to the shouts of James P. Johnson. Also includes performances by Jelly Roll Morton, Fats Waller, and Louis Armstrong.)
- Still, William Grant. Symphony No. 1 (Afro-American)./ Duke Ellington. Suite from The River. Chandos 9154, 1993. (1 CD.)
- Still, William Grant. Symphony No. 2 (Song of a New Race)./William Levi Dawson. Negro Folk Symphony./ Duke Ellington. Harlem. Chandos CHN 9226. (1 CD.)

Further Reading

- Anderson, Paul Allen. Deep River: Music and Memory in Harlem Renaissance Thought. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2001.
- Fabre, Geneviève, and Michael Feith, eds. Temples for Tomorrow: Looking Back at the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Floyd, Samuel A. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance: A Collection of Essays. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Kramer, Victor A., and Robert A. Russ, eds. Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1997.
- Krasner, David. A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre, Drama, and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Locke, Alain. The Negro and His Music. New York: Arno Press and New York Times. 1969. (Originally published 1936.)
- Ogren, Kathy J. The Jazz Revolution: Twenties America and the Meaning of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans: A History, 3rd ed. New York: Norton, 1997.
- Spencer, Jon Michael. New Negroes and Their Music: The Success of the Harlem Renaissance. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1997.
- Tirro, Frank. Jazz: A History. New York: Norton, 1977.
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington. Indiana University Press, 1995.

Music: Bands and Orchestras

During the Harlem Renaissance, the very definition of bands and orchestras was altered. Previously, a band was considered an ensemble of wind and percussion instruments playing music for military functions, outdoor funerals, and park concerts; this term now also included small ensembles called “jazz bands.” An orchestra had been defined as an ensemble of bowed string instruments and fewer wind and percussion instruments. The orchestra was intended to play the music of the western European composers in a concert setting and also to perform at social events for wealthy, aristocratic patrons. In New York City and particularly Harlem in the 1920s, the term “jazz orchestra” began to be used to designate an ensemble of eight to ten players of trumpets, trombones, saxophones-clarinets; and a rhythm section consisting of piano, banjo, string bass, tuba, and drums. Sometimes, in the “sweet orchestras,” two or three violins would be used.

Another important innovation in Harlem and elsewhere in New York City was the establishment of specifically named ensembles, such as the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra and the Cotton Club Orchestra, in which the musicians might change nightly, depending on who was available. This practice was possible because in New York many talented musicians could play in many styles this practice differed significantly from that of traditional ensembles such as the King Oliver Band playing in Chicago, which would have the same musicians every night.

To understand this change in established bands and orchestras, it is useful to look at the social and economic situation of Harlem in the 1920s. During this period, black migration from the southeastern United States to New York—as well as discriminatory real estate policies—caused overcrowding and a housing shortage, and many blacks were forced to live in Harlem. Thus black musicians who worked in the Broadway theaters, society orchestras, or recording studios in downtown or midtown New York typically had to travel to work and return home to Harlem.

Band in a Box

One result of the overcrowding was an economic crisis: limited incomes and limited housing. A popular solution was the “rent party,” a well-advertised event featuring food, alcohol, dancing, and music. The party would begin on a weekend afternoon and end the following morning. Music was provided by a “band in a box,” the piano player. The three famous players most in demand were James P. Johnson, composer of “Carolina Stomp,” the “cutting piece” used for stride piano contests; Thomas “Fats” Waller, called the “summation of the Harlem piano style”; and Willie “the Lion” Smith.

James Reese Europe and the Clef Club Orchestra

The first African American band signed to a recording contract was that of James Reese Europe, which was contracted in 1914 by Victor Records. By this time, Europe had established a booking agency called the Clef Club, which had more than 180 musicians listed who could play at many types of functions and venues. In the Clef Club orchestra, Reese created a unique sound by having the first violins accompanied by the second violin parts played by mandolins and banjos. This strumming effect was enhanced by ten pianos, two clarinets (no oboe), two baritone horns (no French horns), trombone (no bassoons), and saxophones; the musicians also sang as well as played their instruments.

James Reese Europe led the band of the 369th Regimental Military Unit (known as the “Harlem Hell Fighters”) during World War I while serving on active duty as a machine gunner. The band performed many concerts in Paris and gained an international reputation. When the 369th was excluded from the victory parade in Washington, D.C., it held its own parade in New York City on 17 February 1919, starting in lower Manhattan and ending on Lenox Avenue in Harlem playing “Here Comes My Daddy Now.”

James Reese Europe was also important as the musical director for the dancers Vernon and Irene Castle in their ballroom at “Castle House,” where the fox-trot was introduced to America. With all these musical activities, Europe set the stage for the versatility and variety of Harlem’s bands and orchestras.

After Europe’s death in 1919, Will Marion Cook took over the Clef Club orchestra, which presented concerts with Paul Robeson. Cook later established the New York Syncopated Orchestra, also known as the Southern Syncopated Orchestra or the American Syncopated Orchestra, and gave concerts in many parts of the United States. A concert program might include waltzes by Brahms, Cook’s own composition “Rain Song,” Nathaniel Dett’s “Listen to the Lambs,” W. C. Handy’s “Memphis Blues,” and Negro spirituals sung a cappella.

“Sweet” Dance Music Orchestras

As the new dances such as the fox-trot, Castle walk, Charleston, black bottom, shimmy, turkey trot, and lindy hop became popular, public ballrooms were established; one example was the Roseland Ballroom in downtown New York City. The first important band to play for this “sweet” dancing was Fletcher Henderson’s. Henderson and his orchestra played at the Roseland Ballroom from 1924 to 1926. This orchestra, as recorded playing “Copenhagen” in 1924, consisted of eleven pieces: three trumpets, trombone, three saxes-clarinets, banjo, tuba, drums, and piano. (On this recording, a new trumpet player had joined the band as soloist—Louis Armstrong.) Henderson was experimenting with a concept later known as the “big band,” in which the musicians played arrangements contrasting the different sections and timbres of the ensemble instead of relying on soloistic improvisation.

Another important sweet dance orchestra was that of Paul Whiteman, known as the “king of jazz.” In his recording of “Charleston” in 1925, the orchestra consisted of three violins, two trumpets, two trombones, four saxes-clarinets, banjo, tuba, and drums. Whiteman’s orchestra presented important concerts such as “Experiment in Modern Music” (1924), which featured the premier of George Gershwin’s Rhapsody in Blue as well as “Livery Stable Blues.”

Several society orchestras in Harlem consisted of women, such as the Negro Women’s Orchestra and Civic Association; the Famous Ladies Orchestra, led by Marie Lucas; and the Ladies Orchestra, conducted by the bass player Hallie Anderson.

Benny Carter was typical of the Harlemithe orchestra musician who had to read music, improvise, know the popular styles, and play alternately in two or three different ensembles. Carter, a young player in the 1920s, began a career with Fletcher Henderson as a sax and trumpet player and an arranger. Carter played in Harlem’s nightclubs, in ballroom orchestras, and in Broadway theater orchestras; later he worked on musical scores for Hollywood films. He had “absolute expertise, musical knowledge, and a brilliant style of arranging. He took advantage of unique sonorities afforded by the jazz big band” (Lowe 2000).

“Hot” Dance Music Orchestras

In 1929 a radio broadcast from the Cotton Club in Harlem began with an A-flat dominant seventh chord from the band. Then the announcer, Irving Mills, manager of the Duke Ellington Orchestra, said: “Welcome to our famous Cotton Club. Introducing the greatest living master of ‘Jungle Music’—that rip-roaring harmony hound, none other than Duke Ellington. Take your bow, Dukie. The first number is the ‘Cotton Club Stomp.’”

With this introduction, Mills presented Ellington’s unique orchestra to the radio audience. In 1927, when Ellington had been invited to lead a house band at the Cotton Club, he needed to enlarge his ensemble from eight players to eleven to accommodate the large production numbers of the singers and dancers. The new orchestra had two trumpets, trombone, three saxophones-clarinets, guitar-banjo, bass-tuba, drums, and piano. Later Ellington added another trumpet, two trombones, and a fourth saxophone-clarinet. Unlike many other orchestra leaders, Ellington was able to keep the same musicians working with him. This enabled him to compose for specific instruments and for the unique qualities of each musician. Thus he wrote “Concerto for Cootie”—that is, Cootie Williams—rather than just a concerto for trumpet.

Miguel Covarrubias (1904–1957), Rhapsody in Blue, c.1925; oil on canvas. (CH96189, Christie’s Images, private collection/Bridgeman Art Library.)

Duke Ellington and his band in the early 1930s. (Brown Brothers.)

Ellington's orchestra and other hot dance orchestras featured many soloists, unlike the sweet orchestras that relied on written arrangements.

New Orleans jazz bands were also popular as "hot" ensembles. Wilbur Sweatman's Original Jazz Band, for instance, consisted of the typical instrumentation of clarinet, trumpet, trombone, piano, and drums. Another hot jazz band was that of William "Chick" Webb, who opened the famous Savoy Ballroom in 1926. (In 1934, Webb would introduce the young Ella Fitzgerald to the jazz world.) The Savoy, which was advertised as the "house of happy feet," was open to whites and blacks, unlike the "whites-only" Cotton Club.

As Duke Ellington began to tour nationally and internationally, Cab Calloway and his musicians became the house band at the Cotton Club in 1931. Calloway had started his ensemble a few years before at Connie's Inn, which was a similar venue. His orchestra remained the same size as Ellington's.

It is worth noting that when Louis Armstrong came to Harlem in 1924, he was able to transcend the New Orleans format and play with big bands, blues bands, and jazz bands. Everybody wanted him.

Broadway Theater Orchestras

Shuffle Along, by Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake, was the first successful Broadway musical written, produced, and performed by African Americans. After its opening in 1921 it ran for some 500 performances and spawned three national touring companies. Noble Sissle had worked with James Reese Europe and led a jazz orchestra; Blake was a vaudeville performer and ragtime pianist. Their thirteen-piece orchestra for Shuffle Along consisted of violin, viola, cello, bass, flute, clarinet, oboe, alto saxophone, two trumpets, trombone, piano, and drums. The members of the orchestra included William Grant Still, oboe (later musical director of Black Swan Records and composer of the Afro-American Symphony), and Hall Johnson, violist with the Negro String Quartet and leader of the Hall Johnson Singers.

Theater ensembles sometimes had musicians onstage as well as in the orchestra pit. These musicians were experienced and versatile, playing not only in the theater but also in recording studios, nightclubs, and jazz sessions, sometimes all in the same day.

Recording Bands and Orchestras

Recording orchestras were developing at the same time as jazz and dance orchestras. Jazz was in fact the first music to be recorded from its beginnings, or nearly so. However, the recording techniques and equipment imposed many restrictions on the music, such as the three-minute length of a recording, the single microphone, and the limited dynamic range, which excluded certain instruments. Consequently, the early recordings give an incomplete and distorted representation of the actual performance practices of the period. Perhaps innovations such as longer performances, extended compositions, subtler timbres, and an expanded dynamic range could have begun earlier if the recording industry had been more advanced.

Whereas the big bands ruled the ballrooms and variety clubs, blues singers ruled the recordings. The popularity of these singers stimulated a new industry called "race records." In 1921 Okeh Record Company recorded Mamie Smith and the Jazz Hounds playing "Crazy Blues." The recording sold more than a million copies the first year, at seventy-five cents a copy, indicating that there was a market for selling music to African Americans. The other recording companies started to record blues singers, and race records began. The typical blues band consisted of piano, cornet, and rhythm instruments such as guitar, banjo, and drums, but Gertrude "Ma" Rainey recorded Thomas Dorsey's "Chain Gang Blues" in 1925 in New York with a larger blues band: cornet, trombone, clarinet, bass sax (played by Coleman Hawkins), banjo, and Fletcher Henderson on piano.

Although Rainey recorded mostly in Chicago, she had an enormous influence on many blues singers such as Bessie Smith and others who recorded in New York. From 1923 to 1928, Rainey recorded ninety-two songs for Paramount Records. Her story and her recording practices are presented in August Wilson's play Ma Rainey's Black Bottom (1984).

In 1923 the young Bessie Smith recorded "Gulf Coast Blues" and "Down Hearted Blues" with Clarence Williams on piano. That recording sold 750,000 copies in a year, rivaling Mamie Smith's "Crazy Blues." Bessie Smith recorded many songs with Henderson's Hot Six, an ensemble that included Fletcher Henderson on piano, with clarinet, banjo, cornet, and trombone. Bessie Smith's recording of W. C. Handy's "Saint Louis Blues" with Louis Armstrong (1925) is considered a classic of this era.

Clarence Williams recorded a great deal of instrumental blues with his band, Clarence Williams's Blue Five. This band featured Sidney Bechet on soprano saxophone and included Williams playing piano, with clarinet, trombone, and banjo. In 1925, Williams recorded “Cake Walking Babies from Home” featuring Louis Armstrong on trumpet.

The first recording company owned by African Americans was started by Henry Pace, who recorded Ethel Walters in 1921. The recording, “Down Home Blues,” sold 500,000 copies in six months and made the company a success. With Fletcher Henderson as recording director and William Grant Still as music director, the company, later to be known as Black Swan Records, became very well known. Black Swan arranged a national tour with Fletcher Henderson and the Black Swan Troubadours to capitalize on its success.

Music of the “Talented Tenth”

Some people, impressed by the philosophy of “advancing the Negro race” as espoused by W. E. B. Du Bois, Alain Locke, and James Weldon Johnson, felt that jazz and entertainment music were to be shunned, and that nobler music should be developed. This was the reason for Penman Lovinggood’s book Famous Modern Negro Musicians (1921). Lovinggood offered a series of short essays on nineteen composers; classically trained singers, conductors, and instrumentalists; and concert promoters. His subjects included Roland Hayes, James Reese Europe, Paul Robeson, and Marian Anderson. Lovinggood was expressing ideas related to the concept of the “talented tenth,” a term used by Du Bois to refer to the upper 10 percent or so—the leadership—of the African American population.

William Christopher (W. C.) Handy had come to New York to open a publishing house with Henry Pace in 1918. He conducted an orchestra and chorus at Carnegie Hall in 1928 in a program of black music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Edward Gilbert Anderson established the Harlem Symphony Orchestra and the Renaissance Theater Orchestra in the 1920s. The Negro String Quartet gave many concerts in Harlem and New York City. In 1925, this quartet accompanied the famous tenor Roland Hayes in his Carnegie Hall debut. The members of the quartet were Felix Weir, first violin; Arthur Boyd, second violin; Hall Johnson, viola; and Marion Cumbe, cello. Hall Johnson became the leader of the Hall Johnson Singers, who had their debut in 1928 at the Pythian Temple and Town Hall in New York City. They later recorded for RCA Victor Company.

Another important vocal ensemble was led by Eva Jessye. The Major Bowes Family Radio Hour and the General Motors Hour both featured the Eva Jessye Choir. At a later date—from 1930 to 1942—the Monarch Symphonic Band performed in Harlem, led by Fred Simpson. Floyd (1990) notes that in 1917 the Jenkins Orphanage Band played in a production of DuBose Heyward’s Porgy—the work on which George Gershwin’s opera Porgy and Bess was based.

JOHN K. GALM

See also Clef Club; Cotton Club; House-Rent Parties; Jazz; Music; Musical Theater; Nightclubs; Roseland Ballroom; Savoy Ballroom; Shuffle Along; Talented Tenth; specific individuals

Further Reading

- Abdul, Raoul. Blacks in Classical Music: A Personal History. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1977.
- Badger, Reid. A Life in Ragtime: A Biography of James Reese Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Cuney-Hare, Maud. Negro Musicians and Their Music. Washington, D.C.: The Associated Publishers, 1936.
- Dance, Stanley. Liner notes. The Complete Fletcher Henderson. Bluebird, 1976.
- Ellington, Edward Kennedy. Music Is My Mistress. New York: Doubleday, 1973.
- Floyd, Samuel A., Jr., ed. Black Music of the Harlem Renaissance: A Collection of Essays. New York: Greenwood, 1990.
- Lowe, Allen. “Foot Stompers, Cross Dressers, and Swingers: The Big Bands, Singers, and Musicians of the Harlem Renaissance.” In Rhapsodies in Black: Music and Words from the Harlem Renaissance. Rhino, 2000.
- Morgan, Thomas, and William Barlow. From Cakewalks to Concert Halls: An Illustrated History of African American Popular Music from 1895 to 1930. Washington, D.C.: Elliott & Clark, 1992.
- Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans, 3rd ed. 1997.
- Ward, Geoffery C. Jazz: A History of America’s Music, Based on a Documentary Film by Ken Burns. New York: Knopf, 2000.

Musical Theater

Young Langston Hughes once claimed that he attended Columbia University so he could see Shuffle Along, a Broadway musical of 1921 written and performed by African American artists. He credited the show with giving a “scintillating send-off to that Negro Vogue in Manhattan” known as the Harlem Renaissance: “For nearly two years it was always packed. It gave the proper push—a pre-Charleston kick—to the vogue that spread to books, African sculpture, music, and dancing." While most studies have concentrated on these aspects of the Harlem Renaissance, they have tended to ignore the role of African American musical theater during this period. African American musicals as a form moved into the mainstream of American culture during the 1920s, bringing black performers, writers, directors, and composers into the mainstream as well. Their innovations spread among their white counterparts as the giants of musical theater history such as George Gershwin, Irving Berlin, and Jerome Kern became inspired by the music, performers, and themes of African American musical theater.

Shuffle Along was not the first musical written, performed, and produced by African American talent. This honor belongs to both Will Marion Cook's Clorindy, the Origin of the Cakewalk and Bob Cole's A Trip to Coontown, which appeared briefly on Broadway in 1898. Yet in the twenty-three year interim, African American musical productions were few and far between. Some of the original innovators had died early, some were hired away by white producers (Florenz Ziegfeld hired the talented Bert Williams to appear in his Ziegfeld Follies), and others shifted to other forms of cultural production, such as classical music or poetry. As a result, there was no continuing tradition within African American musical theater in the first two decades of the twentieth century.

Shuffle Along premiered in May 1921 with few expectations of success; but it soon became a surprise hit, and its 504-performance run was surpassed only by Jerome Kern's Sally, which opened the same season. The composer Eubie Blake and the lyricist Noble Sissle created a score that delighted critics and audiences with its modern tempi. The cast of unknowns was catapulted to stardom. The leads Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles (who also wrote the libretto for the show) appeared on Broadway every season throughout the 1920s. Even members of the replacement cast (Florence Mills) and the chorus (Josephine Baker, Paul Robeson, and Adelaide Hall) found Shuffle Along the first step to international stardom. Shuffle Along legitimized the African American musical. It proved to producers that audiences would support African American talent on Broadway, not always an obvious conclusion in earlier years. As a result, Shuffle Along spawned a series of imitators, turning the African American musical into a staple of entertainment during the 1920s. At the same time, it influenced white creators of the genre to acknowledge the talent, the music, and even the themes in their own creations.

The creators of Shuffle Along were talented but generally unknown. Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles were the creators of the show's libretto. They had met while students at Fisk University and had entered the world of entertainment as comedians in the black vaudeville circuit. Their comedy skits burlesqued southern life and combined a healthy dose of malapropisms with acrobatic dancing. One of their skits, "The Mayor of Dixie," became the foundation for the plot of Shuffle Along. Although they did have their fans in the years before Shuffle Along, they had remained generally unknown. Within a year after the show's premiere, they were billed as "America's Foremost Colored Comedians." They remained Broadway stars throughout the 1920s.

The composer (James Hubert "Eubie" Blake) and lyricist (Noble Sissle) of Shuffle Along met at a party in Baltimore in 1915 and began a long musical collaboration. Blake, a talented ragtime pianist, joined with Sissle to compose "It's All Your Fault," which was sung by Sophie Tucker. World War I interrupted their partnership, but soon after the armistice they rejoined each other as a performing team, the Dixie Duo, Shuffle Along, scene with two actors in blackface. © Billy Rose Theatre Collection, New York Public Library for the Performing Arts, Astor, Lenox, and Tilden Foundations. Photographer: White Studio.)

on the vaudeville circuit. Miller and Lyles later approached them with the proposition of creating a musical comedy for Broadway—a somewhat outlandish notion, since black musicals had been absent from Broadway for several years.

Sissle and Blake wrote the score for the new show and performed in it as well. While most Broadway musical scores of this period still relied on European models of musical production, Blake introduced jazz and blues rhythms to the Broadway stage, featuring such songs as “I’m Just Wild about Harry” (later Harry Truman’s campaign song), “Love Will Find a Way,” and “I’m Craving for that Kind of Love.” As a result, Shuffle Along echoed contemporary popular music in ways that other shows did not.

As white audiences flocked to the show, the crew of Shuffle Along also encouraged African Americans to attend. When the show first opened, African Americans were relegated to the balconies of most New York theaters. The Shuffle Along company tried to break down these barriers, both by staging performances at times when African Americans might be more likely to attend—midnight performances proved quite popular—and by loosening the informal segregation process that reigned in most New York theaters. As a result, Shuffle Along paved the way for the end of theatrical segregation in New York City. James Weldon Johnson noted in 1930, “At the present time the sight of colored people in the orchestras of Broadway theatres is not considered a cause for immediate action or utter astonishment.”

As the audiences became integrated, so too did the Broadway musical theater. Shuffle Along was a novelty at the time it opened, but it ultimately legitimized black musical comedy on Broadway. In just three years, New Yorkers saw nine musicals written by and starring African Americans: Put and Take (1921); Strut Miss Lizzie, Plantation Revue, Oh Joy, and Liza (1922); How Come? and Runnin’ Wild (1923); and The Chocolate Dandies and Dixie to Broadway (1924). African American composers also wrote melodies for three shows with white casts in 1923: C. Luckeyeth Roberts’s Go-Go and Sharlee, and Sissle and Blake’s Elsie. By 1922, a song from the Ziegfeld Follies noted the new trend, as the star Gilda Gray sang “It’s Getting Dark on Old Broadway.”

Runnin’ Wild was the most successful of the succeeding shows. Not surprisingly, it featured two veterans of Shuffle Along—Miller and Lyles—in leading roles. It also continued the tradition of using contemporary African American music and themes in the score. While “Old Fashioned Love” became the immediate hit of the show, another song from the score swiftly attracted greater attention. The composer James P. Johnson and Cecil Mack included a song and dance number, “The Charleston,” for the new show. Although the Charleston as a dance was not new, the new song ultimately became the symbol of the roaring twenties. Johnson said he composed various “Charlestons” over the years, but the version used in Runnin’ Wild became the most popular of the genre. Both the contemporary tone of the music and the farcical libretto continued to draw audiences to the new African American musical.

Although the early African American musicals remained the product of African American performers and writers, as the 1920s progressed more white producers became interested in the profitable genre and reshaped it in a variety of ways. Many of these shows were streamlined into revues—collections of songs, dances, and skits, without the libretto and extensive scenery. These revues, produced by the likes of Lew Leslie and George White, were extremely profitable, efficient, and inexpensive to produce. Shows such as Dixie to Broadway (1924) and Blackbirds of 1928 achieved long runs despite their abbreviated format. During this period, much of the creative control shifted to white producers and writers who used elements and themes from the earlier shows created by African Americans. Blackbirds of 1928 had a vibrant score, but it was created by a white songwriting team, Jimmy McHugh and Dorothy Fields. As a result, African Americans became recognized as the performers in these hit musical shows, but creative control was slowly draining away.

Although white audiences continued to flock to productions performed by African Americans—on Broadway and in Harlem as well—African American critics found little to praise in them. The musicals of the late 1920s seemed to be borrowing stereotypical elements from the earlier works, and to be pushing African American creative talents to the sidelines. Many of the African American critics of the Harlem Renaissance lost their enthusiasm for this unique genre and criticized the turn to white control. Others, such as Alain Locke and Charles S. Johnson, criticized the form for its escapist tendencies (this was often a complaint about musical comedy in general), arguing that musical comedy ignored the critical social and economic issues of the age.

The African American musical weathered the early days of the Great Depression with some difficulty. On the one hand, African American musicals continued to be produced during these dismal times. One reason for the genre's survival was its inexpensive production costs. The shows produced during the Depression had minimal scenery (Rhapsody in Black in 1931 maintained only a dark curtain), and smaller and smaller casts. Producers continually cut wages during this period; considering the lack of alternatives, African American actors often accepted the cuts. On the other hand, by the early 1930s the genre was recognized to be in decline, as performers as well as the creative talents behind the African American musicals sought other avenues to success and indeed work.

Although the boom in African American musical theater during the 1920s rivaled the successes of the literary lights of the Harlem Renaissance, prominent authors and critics often tended to ignore the remarkable success that the creators of these entertainments had in bringing their work into the American mainstream. The stars of these shows appealed to both white and African American audiences, and the melodies from the shows had a similar appeal. White authors of the musical theater had often ignored African American performers and their culture before the 1920s. After the explosion of talent during the Harlem Renaissance, this became an impossibility. Jerome Kern and Oscar Hammerstein II, for example, chose African American performers and musical themes for Show Boat (1927), their adaptation of Edna Ferber's novel of the same name. The hit of the show, the enduring "Ol' Man River," was sung first in New York by Jules Bledsoe, and later in London by Paul Robeson. Irving Berlin chose Ethel Waters for his revue As Thousands Cheer in 1933, after seeing her perform at the Cotton Club. She sang several numbers in the show, including "I've Got Harlem on My Mind," but the song that stopped the show each evening was her rendition of "Supper Time," a solo about her husband's lynching. This was certainly a serious turn for what is often called an "escapist entertainment." Waters became the highest-paid female performer on Broadway during the show's run. George and Ira Gershwin followed suit a few years later with Porgy and Bess (1935), their ambitious African American opera for the Broadway stage. Many of the performers featured in Porgy and Bess had earned their stripes in the African American musicals of the 1920s.

As the most prominent composers, lyricists, and librettists looked to African American musical comedy for inspiration during and after the Harlem Renaissance, changes were also occurring in the structure of the audience. African American musicals brought African American audiences into Broadway theaters and slowly helped to break down the remaining walls of segregation in New York City's theaters. Similarly, talented African Americans, whether onstage or behind the scenes, were no longer a rarity, as individuals moved to the forefront in the various theatrical crafts. Although the harsh days of the Depression slowed the continued integration within the world of legitimate theater, Broadway theater was an integrated force by the late 1930s. This, too, would have a downside: musicals and dramas created by African Americans would tend to diminish as both creators and performers found themselves welcome in the formerly white world of the Broadway theater. Whenever this window of opportunity started to narrow, both African American musicals and drama would find a new place on the Broadway stage.

ALLEN WOLL

See also Baker, Josephine; Blackbirds; Blake, Eubie; Bledsoe, Jules; Chocolate Dandies; Fields, Dorothy; Hall, Adelaide; Johnson, Charles S.; Johnson, James P.; Leslie, Lew; Locke, Alain; Lyles, Aubrey; Mack, Cecil; Miller, Flournoy; Mills, Florence; Music; Porgy and Bess; Robeson, Paul; Runnin' Wid; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Dictionary of the Black Theatre: Broadway, Off-Broadway, and Selected Harlem Theatre.* Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- Kimball, Robert, and William Bolcom. Reminiscing with Sissle and Blake. New York: Viking, 1973.
- Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Musicians

The Harlem Renaissance began in one musical era and ended in another. It was born during the age of the marching band, aptly symbolized by the parade of James Reese Europe and his 369th Regiment "Harlem Hell Fighters" Band up Fifth Avenue, from midtown to Harlem, in the spring of 1919. By the time the Harlem Renaissance ended, with the onset of the Great Depression a decade later, the jazz age was in full cry, blues had been a craze for more than a decade, and brass bands (such as James Europe's) and the ragtime style that had characterized their most up-to-date repertoire were going into a decline.

Music Publishing

In the early twentieth century, mechanical music reproduction was in its infancy. Musical amateurs were legion, many owned pianos, and the sheet music business was an enormous industry. Leading music publishers of the Harlem Renaissance were located, not in Harlem itself, but in midtown Manhattan, home of Tin Pan Alley. The most important was the Pace and Handy Music Publishing Company, which moved to New York in 1918. In 1921, when Harry Pace left the partnership to found Black Swan Records, the company was reconstituted as Handy Brothers Music Company, under the leadership of its primary songwriter, W. C. Handy (1873–1958), and his brother Charles (1889–1980). This company formed the nucleus around which other publishers clustered. Most important were the Clarence Williams Music Publishing Company, which arrived in New York in 1921, and the Perry Bradford Music Publishing Company. Williams published some major hits, and Bradford was involved in securing the first recordings by an African American blues singer. These entrepreneurs rented offices in the Gaiety Theater Building at Broadway and Forty-fifth Street. They were joined there by lesser companies, run by the songwriters Spencer Williams, Porter Grainger, Henry Troy, and Bud Allen. Some of these enterprises were honest independent efforts; others were “fronts” for white publishers cashing in on the popularity of black music by setting up an office with a couple of black employees as a facade. A few small music publishers were located in Harlem itself, such as the Arrow Music Publishing Company, Q. Roscoe Snowden, and Payton-Brown. Most were short lived, though, and published little music. In Brooklyn, the entertainer Alex Rogers and the ragtime pianist Luckey Roberts ran a small firm from about 1920 to 1924, initially to supply material to Bert Williams, the nonpareil comedian of the era.

Of all the music publishing houses, by far the longest lived has been Handy Brothers Music Company, still run by the Handy Family on Broadway as of this writing. Beginning in Memphis in 1913 as a conduit for hit songs written by Handy himself, it later published successful songs by others, including “A Good Man Is Hard to Find” (1918) by the vaudevillian Eddie Green (1896–1950), and “Sugar” (1926) by Maceo Pinkard (1897–1962). As an incubator for young talent during the Harlem Renaissance, the company had few peers. The composer William Grant Still and the bandleader Fletcher Henderson both entered New York’s musical life as employees of Pace Handy. So did Daniel Haynes, who went on to fame on the stage, then starred in the first big-budget, all-black Hollywood feature film, Hallelujah, in 1929. That same year, Handy was involved in the production of the only film Bessie Smith ever made, Saint Louis Blues, named for his greatest song hit. Smith was one of Handy’s illustrious friends in show business who made his office in Times Square a meeting place and a refuge. Others included George Gershwin, J. Rosamond Johnson, and Eubie Blake. In later years it was a hangout for jazz musicians, who sometimes cut “demo” recordings there. Handy was also close to writers and intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance, including Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten. He published some songs with lyrics by Hughes, including one, “Golden Brown Blues” (1926), for which Handy himself wrote the music. Finally, Handy’s book Blues: An Anthology (1926) was of great importance in the dissemination of African American culture.

Music Promotion

African Americans were also in the business of booking musical talent during the Harlem Renaissance. The Clef Club, in addition to its crucial role in concert production and general musical uplift, served as a musical clearinghouse and booking agency. Long after it fell from the limelight, it continued to function commercially under the leadership of Fred “Deacon” Johnson. The composer and music arranger Will Vodery (1885–1951) was an active booking talent from Times Square as early as 1916. As late as the 1950s, musicians from Harlem such as the songwriter Maceo Pinkard continued to run services providing entertainment for parties. There was also an active promotional network in the press. Some journalists, such as Salem Tutt Whitney of the Indianapolis Freeman, promoted mainly their own productions and those mounted by their friends. More independent writers also operated in mainstream publications, such as “Billboard” Jackson, who derived his nickname from the magazine he wrote for and was a leader in the entertainment field. The journalist, diplomat, and entrepreneur Lester A. Walton worked on behalf of the race, including entertainers, while writing for the New York World in the 1920s.

Recordings

African Americans were heard on records virtually from the beginning of the recording industry, performing minstrel and comic pieces, spirituals, and other music. The biggest African American recording star was the legendary comedian Bert Williams, whose records for Columbia were immensely popular. Many small record companies still existed in the early 1920s, and several recorded black blues and jazz musicians, mostly in New York. These companies included Okeh, Emerson, Brunswick, Perfect, and Harmony. The dominant record company of the period, Victor (later RCA Victor), made many of its recordings in a converted church building it owned in Camden, New Jersey. In addition, one company, owned and operated by blacks, was of enormous importance for the Harlem Renaissance—Black Swan Phonograph Company.

The Pace Phonograph Corporation, producer of Black Swan Records, was founded at the beginning of 1921 and began issuing recordings the following spring. Unlike the leading music publishers, it was located in Harlem, first at 2289 Seventh Avenue, then at 257 West 138th Street. While this was not actually the first black-owned record company (the short-lived Broom Records has that distinction), Black Swan was the first such company to issue hit records, advertise widely, and become an important presence in American culture. Black Swan reflected the tastes of its proprietor, Harry H. Pace (1884–1943), a highly educated and ambitious businessman and a disciple of W. E. B. Du Bois. Like Du Bois, the real estate magnate John Nail, and most of the Black Swan's other investors, Pace had little use for blues and jazz, preferring classical music and spirituals. He allowed his young employees, such as Fletcher Henderson, to guide him in the recording of pop music, however, and this practice paid off handsomely in a series of hit recordings by Ethel Waters. Nevertheless, much of Black Swan's catalog was taken up with recordings of opera arias and other short classical selections. While these are of lesser interest to music fans today, they are of inestimable worth as historical documents. From the Black Swan records of Florence Cole-Talbert, Revella Hughes, and Ivan H. Browning we can reconstruct the sound of the black concert singers of approximately 1920.

Classical Musicians

In the early decades of the twentieth century, African Americans were not heard in white symphony orchestras or opera houses. Classically trained musicians such as Will Marion Cook (1869–1944) and R. Nathaniel Dett (1882–1943) had to find other avenues for the expression of their considerable talent. Cook made his greatest mark in musical theater, with such scores as Clorindy, or the Origin of the Cakewalk (1898) and In Dahomey (1902–1903), two of the finest shows in the history of American theater. Dett also wrote music of very high quality, such as the piano suite In the Bottoms (1913), but he made his career as a teacher at such black schools as the Hampton Institute. Teaching would prove the primary musical outlet for black classical musicians during this period. A few solo pianists attempted concert careers, among them Hazel Harrison and Helen Hagan, both of whom gave recitals in New York in the early 1920s. It was rare to see a black soloist with a white orchestra; nevertheless, Raymond Lawson played concertos with the Hartford Symphony on more than one occasion beginning in 1911. In classical music, as in so many areas of American life, African Americans created their own institutions to support performance and education. Some white musicians and philanthropists showed an interest in providing music instruction to African Americans. In New York, one remarkable example was the Music School Settlement for Colored People, founded by the violinist David Mannes, who was active between 1911 and 1919.

One African American who broke through numerous barriers in the music world was Harry T. Burleigh (1866–1949). He is best remembered today for his arrangements of spirituals, such as “Deep River,” but he also wrote classical songs of distinction. As a staff arranger with the New York office of the Italian music publisher Ricordi, Burleigh was in a central position in New York's classical music world. He was the first African American to become an officer of the American Society of Composers and Publishers, was a prestigious private music instructor, and was a popular recital artist for several decades. Most prominently, he had a remarkable career as a baritone soloist at Saint George's Episcopal Church on Stuyvesant Square from 1894 to 1946, and at Temple Emanu-El from 1900 to 1925. By the late 1930s, his singing during the services had become so popular that music lovers were being turned away at Saint George's doors at Easter. Nor was Burleigh the only African American musician in New York to achieve this degree of success in both Christian and Jewish sacred music. His friend Melville Charlton (1880–1973) was the organist at the Union Theological Seminary for nearly thirty years, and at the Temple of the Covenant from 1914 to 1924.

African Americans were not particularly active in the performance of chamber music during the Harlem Renaissance. However, the Negro String Quartet—consisting of Arthur Boyd and Felix Weir, violins; Hall Johnson, viola; and Marion Cumbo, cello—concertized in the 1920s. Another important cellist of the era was Leonard Jeter, an active freelance musician and teacher. Allie Ross, a capable violinist and conductor, had a notable career in the 1920s. In 1927 he conducted Jazz Symphony, a complex and difficult work by the avant-garde composer George Antheil, in a concert at Carnegie Hall. W. C. Handy hired the orchestra for this engagement, and A'Lelia Walker provided a rehearsal space and ample funds to ensure adequate rehearsal time. For classical musicians of the Harlem Renaissance, there was often crossover work to be had in pop, whether in musical theater bands or in recording studios. Marion Cumbo made records with both Clara Smith and Eva Taylor, and Leonard Jeter recorded with Ethel Waters (and also played in the pit band for the show Shuffle Along). The presence of a cello on 1920s blues records may seem surprising today, but it reflects common musical practices of the period. The standardized jazz-band format that we now take for granted did not take shape until the dawn of the swing era. Many of the early blues and jazz bands—including New Orleans bands and other hot bands—featured a violin as a melody instrument.

The most remarkable example of a crossover musician in the Harlem Renaissance was William Grant Still (1895–1978), a thoroughly trained musician who studied with the avant-garde composer Edgard Varèse. Still was proficient on both the oboe and the cello, two very difficult and dissimilar instruments. He played cello with W. C. Handy's Memphis Blues Band in the summer of 1916, and also wrote some arrangements for Handy during those months. He rejoined Handy in 1919, now in New York, where he wrote many arrangements for publication by the Pace and Handy Music Company. He also played cello in a large concert band under Handy's direction during this period. In early 1921, he joined Harry Pace in the new enterprise of Black Swan records, where he was soon active as arranger and studio conductor. Later in 1921, he joined the pit band of the Broadway hit Shuffle Along, playing oboe. This band also included the choral conductor Hall Johnson (1888–1970) on viola, led by the show's composer Eubie Blake at the piano. In the 1920s and 1930s, Still made a name for himself as a composer of classical music, while writing sophisticated arrangements for such pop music figures as Don Voorhees, Willard Robison, and Artie Shaw.

Popular, Dance Band, and Theater Musicians

A broad middle category between the classical and popular categories was occupied by musicians who played light classics, music for dancing, and theater tunes. Many, like Still, were active in several musical genres, the boundaries of which were somewhat more fluid than they are today. Around 1900, the leading bandleader in this area was Professor Walter F. Craig (1854–1920s); his orchestra was popular with African Americans in New York for more than three decades, playing for picnics and other occasions. The career of the bandleader and composer Ford Dabney (1883–1958) encompassed several styles and formats, including a stint leading a brass band, with which he made recordings around 1920. The high point of his performing career was leading the band for Ziegfeld's Midnight Frolic, a highly popular late-night entertainment that featured such star entertainers as Bert Williams. For these engagements in 1916–1917, Dabney's Syncopated Orchestra consisted of eleven pieces: flute, clarinet, trumpet (the early jazz star "Cricket" Smith), trombone, piano (Dabney), drums, mandolin, two violins, cello, and double bass. This instrumentation suggests a sound between that of a "palm court" orchestra and a theater pit band; many published "stock" arrangements issued by music publishers had a similar layout of parts.

The most prominent director of popular music in New York at the beginning of the Renaissance was James Reese Europe (1880–1919). Early in his career he was involved in musical theater in New York. With the establishment of the Clef Club in 1910, he became a leader in African American musical uplift, directing a large, unique orchestra made up largely of plucked string instruments. With this massive ensemble, Europe led the first concert of African American music at Carnegie Hall in 1912. Curiously, many of the musicians who played the banjo, bandoneon, and harp-guitar in Europe's Clef Club Orchestra read little if any music. This is not to contradict the reputation Europe and his men had for highly disciplined performances, a renown that was richly deserved. The majority of his men played by ear, however, clustering, in rehearsals, around a few reading colleagues, who learned the parts first. The others then "caught the tune" from them, playing the parts with varying degrees of detail, giving the overall texture of the sound an extraordinary layered richness.

In 1914, having left the Clef Club, Europe became music director for the popular dance team of Vernon and Irene Castle, playing ragtime to accompany the new social dances such as the fox-trot. In the final phase of his career, he led a brass band of African American and Puerto Rican musicians during World War I. The version of brass band ragtime played by this “Harlem Hell Fighters” unit was immensely popular in France, and the musicians made several exemplary records on their return to America. Some of the musicians associated with Europe, such as the trumpeter Cricket Smith, the trombonists Ward “Dope” Andrews and Herb Flemming, and the drummer Buddy Gilmore, were important in the transition to jazz, the new music of the 1920s. The band’s vocalist, Lieutenant Noble Sissle, went on to a highly successful partnership in vaudeville and songwriting with the pianist Eubie Blake. Their musical Shuffle Along (1921) would set the standard for work of its kind.

Musical theater in the Harlem Renaissance was a blend of old and new elements, including holdovers from minstrelsy, particularly in comic routines and in the use of blackface. Newer elements included syncopated forms of black music, first ragtime and then early jazz and blues. Dance was enormously important, and pretty light-skinned chorus girls were as important in the theater as they were in such cabarets and nightspots as the Cotton Club. Some, such as Fredi Washington and Josephine Baker, would become stars in their own right. Musical comedy singers, such as Florence Mills and Gertrude Saunders, were also crucial to a show’s success. Mills was the biggest star of black entertainment between the death of Bert Williams in 1922 and her own sudden, premature death in 1927. The line between singers, dancers, and actors was extremely thin and porous during this period, and a number of recordings were made by performers who were not primarily singers, and not jazz or blues singers by any means. They sang in a style that is extinct today, and their few surviving recordings sound strange to our ears: a shrill, high-pitched warbling, with an overabundance of vibrato and a coy theatricality. A recording made in 1921 of Saunders singing “I’m Craving for That Kind of Love,” a hit by Sissle and Blake from Shuffle Along, is a revealing artifact of this culture. Eight decades later, the style is unmistakably archaic.

Ragtime Musicians

Although ragtime was primarily a solo piano genre originating in the midwest, a good deal of ragtime was played and composed in New York. Some of the most important practitioners of the music were there, and much New York ragtime was for instrumental ensemble or was vocal. The brass band of James Reese Europe, previously discussed, was a first-rate ragtime band, and there were others in New York, including those led by Ford Dabney and J. Tim Brymn (1881–1946). Like Europe, Brymn was an army band-leader in France during World War I. As for solo pianists, the ragtime musicians who are best remembered today, New York was host to Scott Joplin, the greatest composer of the genre, for the last decade of his life, 1907–1917. By the time of his death, New York had quite a few fine ragtime pianists in residence. Some were locals, such as Fats Waller (1904–1943); some came from near the city, such as Willie “the Lion” Smith (1897–1973) from New York State and James P. Johnson (1891–1955) from New Jersey. Still others were from the eastern seaboard: Eubie Blake (1883–1983) from Baltimore and Charles Luckey (“Luckey”) Roberts (1887–1968) from Philadelphia. All but Smith were also composers of importance. Some, such as Luckey Roberts, were very successful entertainers in the decades around World War I, supplying music to the same high-society families that danced to the music of James Reese Europe’s band during his time with Vernon and Irene Castle.

Eventually, New York ragtime would evolve into a more virtuosic musical style known as “stride,” which was in full flower by the end of the 1920s. The pianists who were able to master this very difficult art, which required an extremely active and agile left hand, tended to be New York ragtime masters such as Johnson and Waller. Johnson later branched out into the composition of longer symphonic forms. Waller wrote popular song standards with the brilliant lyricist Andy Razaf (1895–1973).

Blues Musicians

Country blues, as performed by male vocalists to the accompaniment of their own guitar, played almost no part in the Harlem Renaissance. Although some folk blues pioneers and “songsters” traveled to New York in the late 1920s to make records, such musicians did not stay in the city long. In “commercial,” “city,” or “vaudeville” blues, however, the situation was quite different. This was a prevalent new style on the black vaudeville circuit throughout much of the United States, beginning in the southeast and in such cities as Chicago and Memphis. The style had established a foothold in New York by the end of World War I. It is impossible to ascertain when blues was first heard in New York, but in 1918 W. C. Handy, later known as the “father of the blues,” arrived in the city to open a new office for his music publishing business. He had already published his greatest songs in Memphis, among them “Saint Louis Blues,” “Yellow Dog Blues,” “Joe Turner Blues,” and “Beale Street Blues.” (His first song hit, “Memphis Blues,” actually more of a ragtime song, was no longer his property.) Handy’s arrival in New York coincides roughly with the rise of the blues craze nationwide. Blues in sheet music already sold extremely well, and there were a great many false blues (blues in name only) on the market. By 1920, there was enough interest in the music for the record companies to begin releasing blues records by African American women. The vaudevillian and music publisher Perry Bradford (1893–1970) was the first to successfully push for this innovation, and in 1920 Fred Hager of Okeh Records permitted him to record Mamie Smith. The first records were successful, and within the next three years most of the best blues “shouters” were immortalized on disk: Ma Rainey, Lucille Hegamin, Albert Hunter, Clara Smith, Edith Wilson, Ethel Waters, Eva Taylor, and the greatest of them all, Bessie Smith.

Jazz Musicians

Early jazz, from approximately 1915 until about 1930, fell into two broad camps according to performance practice. The one generally given the most attention, purely improvised music by small groups, was actually a minority practice. Small combos numbering approximately five players would work up tunes in rehearsal, weaving their lines around one another’s in a crude polyphony that at its best was quite viscerally exciting. This earliest jazz style originated in New Orleans around 1915. In that year, the Creole Band, led by the trumpeter Freddie Keppard, played New York on a vaudeville tour. The best-known early Dixieland ensemble, and the first to record, was the Original Dixieland Jazz Band (white); some of its members were musical illiterates. Their “routining” (playing of memorized riffs) relates to vaudeville and novelty music, and several leading early jazz performers were in fact more comedians than musicians. Ted Lewis (white) incorporated a good deal of corny verbiage into his act. Jimmy Durante, a fine early jazz pianist, eventually relegated music to a sideline in his comedy career. Wilbur Sweatman (1882–1961), an African American veteran of minstrel bands, developed an act in which he played three clarinets at once.

The earliest black jazz musicians actually living in Harlem emerged from the older musical genres such as ragtime and from bands such as James Europe’s, or from the minstrel and vaudeville circuit. The first jazz recordings all featured white musicians, and African American players recorded first as accompanists to blues singers. Most of the musicians featured on these records had little sense of what we would consider jazz style, and their performances now sound somewhat stiff and wooden. Nonetheless, such musicians as the trumpeter Joe Smith, the clarinetist Ernest “Sticky” Elliott, and the violinist Leroy Parker reflect the prevailing style of the day. Some of their contemporaries were fine musicians. They were often remarkably versatile: Garvin Bushell (1902–1986) played clarinet, several sizes of saxophone, oboe, and bassoon. Musicians of this caliber never stopped studying and improving themselves; in old age, Bushell viewed his recordings of the 1920s with a certain embarrassment and disdain.

Many musicians on early blues and jazz records were reading from either published or handwritten parts. This was apparently true, for example, of the sessions recorded by the singer Lucille Hegamin for Arto Records in 1921, as surviving parts (now in private hands) attest. As Mark Tucker’s oral history with Bushell (1988) revealed, the boundary between note reading and “cutting loose” (improvising) was forever shifting. The notion that early blues and jazz records were made by illiterate performers who played entirely “from the heart” is a misunderstanding fueled by wishful thinking, a “noble savage” myth that may be romantic but is in any case condescending.

As new musicians arrived in town to take advantage of the boom in recordings and club work during the 1920s, the competition for those already on the scene stiffened. Soloists like Johnny Dunn, a trumpeter from Memphis who reigned as the king on his instrument in the early 1920s, were unable to withstand the arrival of superior practitioners from elsewhere, such as Louis Armstrong, Cladys “Jabbo” Smith, James “Bubber” Miley, and Rex Stewart. There were trombonists like Charlie Green, Jimmy Harrison, and Benny Morton; clarinetists like Buster Bailey and Barney Bigard; saxophonists like Coleman Hawkins, Gene Sedric, and Don Redman; and a host of others. Exempt from this law of the jungle were Harlem's piano players; New York already had the best in the business. Even a jazz master like Jelly Roll Morton stood no chance of unseating titans like James P. Johnson, Luckey Roberts, Willie "the Lion" Smith, and Fats Waller. In late-night "cutting contests," these virtuosos showed off their tricks and tested one another's mettle.

The busiest recording artists of the 1920s were Fletcher Henderson and Clarence Williams, two pianists with widely diverging backgrounds and careers. Henderson (1897–1952), scion of a middle-class educated family in Georgia, originally came to New York to study chemistry at Columbia University but took a summer job with the Pace and Handy Music Company and soon gave up science for music. He moved with Harry Pace to Black Swan Records the following winter and became the house pianist and recordings manager. Throughout the 1920s, Henderson was in great demand as an accompanist to blues singers. By the mid-1920s he was also the leader of the first important black jazz orchestra. Clarence Williams (1893–1966) came from a rural background near New Orleans. He entered show business early, appearing in traveling shows at the age of twelve. By 1916, he was a bandleader and songwriter, and he soon founded a music publishing company with his duo performing partner, the violinist Armand Piron. The partnership dissolved after the company moved to Chicago in 1918, and Williams arrived on Tin Pan Alley in 1921, a prolific and successful tunesmith and publisher. Less active than Henderson as an accompanist, he formed several bands and made many fine recordings with them. Williams's records featured such jazz greats as the trumpeter Joseph "King" Oliver, the clarinetist Buster Bailey, and the pianist James P. Johnson.

The larger jazz orchestras consisted entirely of reading musicians, many with a good deal of classical training. They played a repertoire that ranged from light classics to the more polite, "sweet" dance music that was also known as jazz in this period. The most famous were well-drilled units led by such white bandleaders as Paul Whiteman and Vincent Lopez. Black bands also played this sort of material, which was popular with both races. The first great African American jazz orchestra, led by Fletcher Henderson, played largely from written arrangements, including doctored versions of "stock arrangements" purchased from publishers. In the mid-1920s, two major developments brought orchestras such as Henderson's firmly into the jazz age. The first was the arrival in his band of "hot" soloists, such as Louis Armstrong, Buster Bailey, and Coleman Hawkins, who used their solo choruses to enrich the expressive range of the orchestral jazz medium. Equally important was the rise of the jazz arranger. Bandleaders such as Henderson and his brother Horace did some arranging of their own, but they also cultivated talented arrangers within their ensembles. The two greatest figures in this development both worked with Henderson: Don Redman (1902–1964) in the late 1920s, and Benny Carter (1907–2003) in the early 1930s. Both were multi-instrumentalists whose primary instruments were the woodwinds, and both later became important bandleaders. Redman, from West Virginia, played clarinet and alto saxophone. Carter, a native of New York's San Juan Hill (the West Sixties), made hit recordings as a trumpet soloist as well as being one of the greatest alto saxophonists, and in his seventy-five-year career composed a great deal of original music.

Much of the music played by "jazz" bands in the 1920s sounds corny to listeners today; the style of such once-popular bandleaders as "Fess" Williams will probably never experience a revival. The "hotter" variety of jazz came to the fore only gradually. The great hot bands in New York tended to have long residencies at particular jazz clubs, often in Harlem, where they attracted considerable patronage, usually exclusively white. Most famous was the Cotton Club, where the orchestras of Andy Preer, Duke Ellington, and Cab Calloway held sway in succession. The numerous venues ranged from large ballrooms—the Manhattan Casino and the Alhambra Ballroom—to small clubs like the Nest and the Lenox Club. Small's Paradise, a club owned and operated by blacks, catered to African American patrons. Its excellent orchestra, led by Charlie Johnson, though little remembered today, was among the finest in New York in 1927–1928, as surviving recordings confirm. Sidney De Paris and "Jabbo" Smith were featured on trumpet, and Benny Carter and Benny Waters in the reed section; the latter two also wrote arrangements for the band, including the Carter's first. Stylistically, their work, as heard on such records as De Paris's feature "The Boy in the Boat," pointed toward the future: deeply expressive music with a bluesy groove. Other bands of the 1920s playing in this funkier style included Thomas Morris and his Past Jazz Masters and the Gulf Coast Seven, led by June Clark on trumpet.

This was the musical environment in which Duke Ellington (1899–1974) rose to fame at the Cotton Club; his first trademark was called “jungle music.” With the trumpeter “Bubber” Miley soloing on such features as “East Saint Louis Toodle-Oo,” the Ellington band accompanied the famous Cotton Club chorus lines. Ellington, originally from Washington, D.C., arrived in New York in 1923 and worked as a sideman with the veteran vaudevillian Wilbur Sweatman. Ellington’s next job was with a group known as the Washingtonians, led by the banjo player Elmer Snowden. Early in 1924, Ellington took over this band, which played various club dates, gradually taking shape as the Duke Ellington Orchestra that would become world famous. Among Ellington’s band mates in the early years were musicians who would help to define his sound: Miley; the trombonist Joe “Tricky Sam” Nanton; the bassist Wellman Braud; and the drummer Sonny Greer. They began to make a series of classic recordings for Vocalion in 1926; the following year, on the death of Andy Preer, they became the resident band at the Cotton Club. Over the next four decades, Ellington would outstrip all his rivals as a composer and bandleader, evolving new styles of orchestral jazz.

As the Harlem Renaissance waned, the sound of the jazz band itself was changing. The popularity of the violin diminished; the guitar began to assert itself against the banjo, and the double bass against the tuba. As the swing era dawned, a new, streamlined sound, dominated by synchronized saxophone, trumpet, and trombone sections, would characterize urban dance music in America. Composers such as Ellington, singers such as Cab Calloway and Ethel Waters, and bands led by Louis Armstrong, Count Basie, Claude Hopkins, Jimmy Lunceford, and Lucky Millinder ushered in a new era. Arranger-bandleaders like Don Redman and Benny Carter were crucial in defining this new sound, which would be prevalent until the mid-1940s. By the early 1930s, they were creating works of great sophistication. Redman’s “Chant of the Weed,” recorded by Harlan Lattimore and his Connie’s Inn Orchestra in 1932, is still impressive for its harmonic daring, sinuous section work, and aura of mystery. Musically ambitious as well as entertaining, it was a harbinger of things to come.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Black Swan Phonograph Company; Blues; Blues: An Anthology; Blues: Women Performers; Clef Club; Cotton Club; Jazz; Music; Musical Theater; Pace Phonographic Company; Saint Louis Blues; Singers; Small’s Paradise; specific individuals

Recordings

- The Best of Early Ellington*. Decca CD, 1996. (Dating from 1926–1931.)
- Black Manhattan*. Paragon Ragtime Orchestra, dir. Rick Benjamin. New World Records, 2003.
- The Chronological Clarence Williams*, 12 vols. Classics Records, c. 1994–1996.
- Fletcher Henderson: Developing an American Orchestra, 1923–1937*. Smithsonian Collection/Columbia Special Products, 1977.
- Jabbo Smith and His Rhythm Aces*. Jazz Archives, 1993. (2 CDs.)
- James Reese Europe’s Harlem Hell Fighters Band*. Memphis Archives, 1996.
- Jazz Odyssey*, Vol. 3, The Sound of Harlem. Columbia Records, 1964. (3 LPs.)
- Jazz the World Forgot*. Yazoo Records, 1996. (2 CD vols.)
- Smithsonian Collection of Classic Jazz*, rev. ed. 1994.
- Souvenirs of Hot Chocolates*. Smithsonian Collection, 1978.

Further Reading

- Allen, Walter. Hendersonia, the Music of Fletcher Henderson and His Musicians: A Bio-Discography. Highland Park, N.J.: Allen, 1973.
- Badger, Reid. A Life in Ragtime: A Biography of James Reese Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Bradford, Perry. Born with the Blues. New York: Oak, 1965.
- Bushell, Garvin, as told to Mark Tucker. Jazz from the Beginning. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1988.
- Charters, Samuel B., and Leonard Kunstadt. Jazz: A History of the New York Scene. New York: Da Capo, 1981. (Originally published 1962.)
- Chevan, David. “Written Music in Early Jazz.” Ph.D. dissertation, CUNY Graduate Center, 1997.
- Cuney-Hare, Maude. Negro Musicians and Their Music. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishing, 1936.
- Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues. New York: Boni and Boni, 1926. (Introduction and notes by Abbe Niles.)
- Harker, Brian. “‘Telling a Story’: Louis Armstrong and Coherence in Early Jazz.” Current Musicology, 63, 1999, pp. 46–83.
- Hurwitt, Elliott S. “W. C. Handy as Music Publisher: Career and Reputation.” Ph.D. dissertation, CUNY Graduate Center, 2000.
- Kimball, Robert, and William Bolcom. Reminiscing with Sissle and Blake. New York: Viking, 1973.
- Lord, Thomas. Clarence Williams. Chigwell, Essex, UK: Storyville, 1976.

- Morgan, Thomas L., and William Barlow. From Cake-walks to Concert Halls. Washington, D.C.: Elliott and Clark, 1992.
- Rust, Brian. Jazz Records, 1897–1942, 4th ed. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1978.
- Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.
- . The Music of Black Americans: A History, 2nd ed. New York: Norton, 1983.
- Stewart, Rex. Jazz Masters of the 1930s. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- Thygesen, Helge, Mark Berresford, and Russ Shor. Black Swan: The Record Label of the Harlem Renaissance. Nottingham, UK: VJM, 1996.
- Tucker, Mark. Ellington: The Early Years. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.
- Walton, Lester A. "Dabney's Orchestra Is Making History." New York Age, 21 December 1916.
- Waters, Ethel. His Eye Is on the Sparrow. New York: Da Capo, 1992. (Originally published 1950.)

Nail, John E.

John E. Nail was born in 1883. In 1904, he was persuaded by Philip A. Payton to join the Afro-American Realty Company, which was based in Harlem. Nail immediately took advantage of a recession that was lowering real estate prices in Manhattan. Withheld loans and foreclosed mortgages caused landlords to drop rents and accept more diverse tenants as building owners tried to recover their investments. Nail united black renters and white landlords while simultaneously eroding an unwritten "covenant" whereby certain blocks in Harlem blocks were supposed to remain white. Nail and his associates found new black tenants who were willing to pay higher rates for better-quality housing in Harlem, and Afro-American Realty helped thousands move into homes and apartments between Fifth and Seventh avenues despite vocal opposition from the white Property Owners Protective Association of Harlem. Afro-American Realty protected its market by acquiring five-year leases on properties owned by whites and rented them at 10 percent above deflated market prices.

Migration to Harlem increased when displaced families left Manhattan's Tenderloin district during the construction of Pennsylvania Station between 1906 and 1910. Nail and Henry C. Parker left Payton to open their own firm, Nail and Parker, in 1907. Nail served as president, and Parker was the corporate secretary-treasurer. The company expanded into full-service real estate operations by providing mortgages and by purchasing, selling, managing, and appraising properties. Nail argued that black ownership in Harlem would permanently undermine discriminatory real estate practices. He urged blacks to invest in property in Harlem to secure the future of the black community in the area, a practice that also benefited his business.

Nail was considered one of Harlem's primary "deal makers." His firm acted as agent for Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church when the church bought aggregate properties in Harlem for $1,070,000. Nail and Parker also sold $200,000 worth of property to Madame C. J. Walker, who had amassed a fortune developing hair-care products. The company also brokered the move of the black YMCA and the Equitable Life Assurance Properties, which included the sophisticated town houses on Strivers' Row. In 1929, Nail and Parker was granted the management contract for the largest apartment building in Harlem, then owned by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

Nail vigorously supported cultural activities and commercial ventures in Harlem. He provided financial support to the Colored Merchants' Association, which had been created to advance racial solidarity and economic stability, and he briefly served as vice president of the New York Urban League. He was chair of the finance committee of the 135th Street branch of the YMCA, and he donated money to programs sponsored by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Nail often raised money for independent artists and causes he respected. He and Eugene Kinckle Jones gathered funds for the artist Augusta Savage, who later founded Savage Studio of Arts and Crafts in New York and served as an assistant supervisor at the Works Progress Administration. Nail also joined W. E. B. Du Bois as a director on the board of Black Swan Records.

Nail's detractors said that he was intractable and insensitive to progressive causes. Some tenants claimed that Nail was an exploitative landlord who overcharged his tenants. Nail's philosophy reflected that of Booker T. Washington, who emphasized the importance of establishing an economic foundation on which blacks could build a stronger and more stable community; this philosophy clashed with the visions of Marcus Garvey, the founder of the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Garvey's black nationalism and "back to Africa" program repelled Nail, who was interested in supporting African American economic development rather than establishing unity among African migrants across the world.

Nail joined Robert Abbott, the publisher of the Chicago Defender, the entrepreneur Harry Pace, NAACP's field secretary William Pickens, and four additional outspoken African American leaders seeking to discredit Garvey. Nail and this "committee of eight" were convinced that Garvey was undermining their efforts to balance race relations. The group drafted a letter to Harry M. Daugherty, United States attorney general during the Harding administration, in which they said: "The movement known as the Universal Negro Improvement Association has done much to stimulate the violent temper of this dangerous element [a reference to Garvey's coalition of immigrants and frustrated black citizens]. . . Its president and moving spirit is one Marcus Garvey, an unscrupulous demagogue, who has ceaselessly and assiduously sought to spread among Negroes distrust and hatred of all white people." Garvey responded by calling the committee "Uncle Tom Negroes." This episode reflected a split between elite black business representatives and community leaders on the one hand and, on the other, lower-income and middle-class blacks who supported Garvey's celebration of African culture.

Although Nail and Parker temporarily weathered the Depression, the firm collapsed in 1933. Nail eventually formed the John E. Nail Company and continued to solidify his strong reputation among business and real estate leaders. He was the first black member of the Real Estate Board of New York, and he became the only sitting black member of the Housing Committee of New York. Nail also served President Herbert Hoover as a consultant for his Committee on Housing during the Depression. Nail's connections to Harlem's cultural beacons remained strong. James Weldon Johnson married Nail's sister, Grace Nail Johnson, who preserved voluminous writings and letters by Harlemite authors and artists.

Nail died in 1947; obituaries appeared in the New York Times and the New York Herald-Tribune on 6 March and in New York Age on 15 March.

A John E. Nail Scrapbook is held at Yale University's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library. The Scrapbook is one element of the James Weldon Johnson Collection, which was founded in 1941 by Carl Van Vechten. Grace Nail Johnson contributed her husband's papers to it. The Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture has the personal papers of William Pickens, which include letters from Nail.

Biography

John E. (Jack) Nail was born 22 August 1883 in New London, Connecticut. He was raised in New York City, where his father, John Bennett Nail (d. 1942), managed a profitable restaurant, hotel, and billiard parlor on Sixth Avenue and owned several properties in Manhattan; the elder Nail was the first African American to receive a credit rating from Dun and Bradstreet and was a silent partner in his son's business interests. John E. Nail worked briefly for his father after graduating from high school, then opened his own real estate office in the Bronx. In 1904, Philip A. Payton persuaded him to leave this business and join the Afro-American Realty Company, based in Harlem. Nail and Henry C. Parker left Payton to open their own firm, Nail and Parker, in 1907, with Nail as president and Parker as corporate secretary-treasurer. Nail married Grace Fairfax in 1910; they had no children. Nail and Parker's firm collapsed in 1933; Nail later formed the John E. Nail Company. Nail's sister married James Weldon Johnson. Nail died in New York City 6 March 1947.

R. JAKE SUDDERTH

See also Abbott, Robert Sengstacke; Afro-American Realty Company; Black Swan Phonograph Company; Garvey, Marcus; Johnson, James Weldon; Jones, Eugene Kinckle; Pace, Harry H.; Payton, Philip A.; Pickens, William; Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church; Savage, Augusta; Tenderloin; Walker, Madame C. J.; Washington, Booker T.

Further Reading

Boris, Joseph J., ed. Who's Who in Colored America: A Biographical Dictionary of Notable Living Persons of African

- Descent in America*. New York: Who's Who in Colored America, 1929.
- Crisis*, March 1925. (Contains a profile of Nail.)
- Draper, Theodore. The Rediscovery of Black Nationalism. New York: Viking, 1970.
- Garvey, Amy Jacques, ed. Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986.
- Ingham, John N., and Lynne B. Feldman. African-American Business Leaders: A Biographical Dictionary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1994.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1991.
- Kranz, Rachel C., ed. "James Weldon Johnson." In The Biographical Dictionary of Black Americans. New York: Facts on File News Services, 1992.
- Nail, John. E. "$20,000,000 in Negro Holdings." New York Evening Mail, 26 January 1918.
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto—Negro New York, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.

Nance, Ethel Ray

Through her secretarial and administrative work with W. E. B. Du Bois and Charles S. Johnson, Ethel Ray Nance made significant contributions to the Harlem Renaissance and became instrumental in its reconstruction in later years. Nance's relationship with Du Bois began in 1921, when she was twenty-two, and lasted until his death in Ghana in 1963. Nance, the daughter of the president of the Duluth, Minnesota, chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), first met Du Bois at the St. Paul NAACP. Her relationship with Johnson started in 1923: As the director of research for the Urban League, he attended its national conference in Kansas City, Missouri, where the impressive Nance was employed as an executive secretary for the local chapter. Nance moved to New York in 1924 to become Johnson's executive secretary; she assisted him in his sociological research and at Opportunity magazine (of which he was the founder and editor) through the winter of 1925. Years later, in 1953, Nance once again joined Johnson's staff, running his office for a short time during his tenure as Fisk University's first black president. At the time of Nance's retirement in 1977, there was a renewed interest in the Harlem Renaissance and her participation in it.

Du Bois and Johnson were only two of the African American executives who wanted Nance to work for them; she was an enormously gifted young woman who had received national attention in the black press in 1923 for breaking the secretarial color bar in the Minnesota State Legislature. After graduating from high school in 1919, her father had taken her on long trips, by train, during which he had introduced her to black leaders—and also to the racist conditions under which their southern relatives were still living. In 1921, three black men were lynched near her own home in Duluth; this incident left her with a lifelong dedication to the black cause.

When Nance joined Johnson's staff in 1924, in addition to running his office she carried on independent research and functioned as managing editor of Opportunity. She wrote news items, screened manuscript submissions, and read proofs. A short sketch by Nance appeared in Opportunity in 1924, but she did not envision a writing career for herself; she focused on supporting the work of others, with confidence in her own artistic taste. She knew Aaron Douglas's Afrocentric art from her days in Kansas City, where he taught high school, and she recommended his work for inclusion in Alain Locke's anthology The New Negro in 1925. Countee Cullen respected her literary judgment and sought her opinion on some of his poems.

Nance served as Johnson's talent scout and his link to the younger generation; she reviewed new books and literary publications from historically black colleges and universities and brought promising writers to his attention. She waged a campaign to get Douglas to New York and persuaded Du Bois to hire him at The Crisis; she also offered Douglas (as she offered Zora Neale Hurston at another time) temporary use of the sofa in "Dream Haven," the apartment she shared with Regina Anderson and Louella Tucker at 580 Saint Nicholas Avenue in Harlem. Nance was the model for a character in Carl Van Vechten's novel Nigger Heaven—Olive Hamilton, the "responsible secretary-stenographer"—but she herself deplored the book.

Nance made the first cuts on submissions in Opportunity's literary contest of 1925, handled negotiations with the panel of judges, gave Johnson many ideas for the awards dinner, and was in charge of the seating arrangements at the Fifth Avenue Restaurant. At the dinner, she shared a table with two of the winners: Countee Cullen and Langston Hughes, who were both visitors to "Dream Haven."

Although Nance was not actually employed by Du Bois until years later, she spent a lot of time with him while she was working at Opportunity, consulting him, sharing ideas about art and politics, and—as she did for Johnson—putting him in contact with the younger generation. Du Bois respected her organizational skills, which had first come to his attention in 1922 when she sent him petitions she gathered in Minnesota for the Dyer antilynching bill. Nance, unlike many others, was at ease with the formidable Du Bois and brought out his playful side, which was rarely visible. As her meager salary from Opportunity dwindled toward the end of each month, she felt free to call Du Bois and get dinner invitations for herself and her roommates. She credited Du Bois with awakening her to intellectual life.

Nance remained in Harlem for less than two years. In late 1925 she took a month's leave from Opportunity to care for her ailing mother in Duluth and then decided to stay there as caretaker (a decision she still regretted many years later). However, she retained the spirit of uplift and racial pride of the Harlem Renaissance. She organized book clubs, did volunteer work with civil rights groups, and founded and participated in historical societies devoted to documenting and celebrating the achievements of black America. She became the first black policewoman in Minnesota (1928) and the first black woman ship inspector in Seattle, Washington (1943). In 1945, Du Bois, who was a consultant at the founding meeting of the United Nations, brought her to San Francisco as his secretary, a position she considered the peak of her career. Following a brief period in New York to conduct research for Du Bois, she returned to San Francisco, serving as administrative assistant in the NAACP's new West Coast Regional Office. She had a series of pioneering secretarial and administrative positions, ending with seven years at the San Francisco African American Historical and Cultural Society, which she had helped found decades earlier. She retired in 1977.

During the 1960s, renewed interest in the Harlem Renaissance prompted Nance to publish an article on Opportunity's dinner of 1925; it also made her the subject of several valuable interviews for oral histories. She contributed to volumes on the renaissance published by Arna Bontemps, Nathan Huggins, and David Levering Lewis. In 1978, at age seventy-nine, Nance was awarded a B.A. from the University of San Francisco and was honored as the university's oldest graduate. She remained intensely engaged in civic activities and in documenting the black presence in California and also worked on a memoir of Du Bois (which was unpublished as of this writing). When Nance died in 1992, the San Francisco Board of Supervisors adjourned out of respect for her memory.

Biography

Ethel Ray Nance was born 13 April 1899 in Duluth, Minnesota; she was the daughter of a Swedish immigrant mother and a race-conscious black father who had migrated to Minnesota from North Carolina. Nance studied at public schools in Duluth and at the University of San Francisco (B.A., 1978). She was a secretary for the Minnesota State Relief Commission, Moose Lake, Minnesota, 1919–1922; Minnesota House of Representatives, 1923; Urban League, Kansas City, Missouri, 1923–1924; and New York Urban League, 1924–1925. She was associate head resident, Phillis Wheatley Settlement House, Minneapolis, 1926–1928; a policewoman in Minneapolis, 1928–1932; secretary to the commissioner of education, St. Paul, Minnesota, 1937–1940; secretary at the Hampton Institute, 1940–1943; secretary at the Federal Public Housing Authority, Seattle, Washington, 1944–1945; secretary–research assistant to W. E. B. Du Bois, San Francisco, 1945; and administrative assistant, West Coast Regional Office, NAACP, San Francisco, California, 1945–1953. Nance also worked for Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee, 1953–1954; Veterans Administration, San Francisco, 1954–1956; San Francisco Unified School District, 1956–1964; United States Post Office, San Francisco, 1964–1969; and San Francisco Historical and Cultural Society, 1970–1977. Her awards included a certificate of recognition from the San Francisco Unified School District, 1964; a certificate of merit from the San Francisco Negro Historical and Cultural Society, 1965; a scholarship to the University of California, 1968; and the Sojourner Truth Award, San Francisco, 1981. She was a member of the Association for the United Nations, Sickle Cell Anemia Research Federation, San Francisco Historical and Cultural Society, National Council of Negro Women, and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Nance was married twice and had two sons. She retired in 1977 and died in San Francisco on 11 July 1992.

ONITA ESTES-HICKS

See also Anderson, Regina M.; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; 580 Saint Nicholas Avenue; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon;

Nigger Heaven; Opportunity; Opportunity Awards Dinner; Opportunity Literary Contests; Survey Graphic; Van Vechten, Carl

Selected Works

"And Along Came Ben." Opportunity, January 1924, p. 24.

"The New York Arts Renaissance: 1924–1926." Negro History Bulletin, April 1968, pp. 15–19.

Further Reading

Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd Mead, 1972.

Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Hull, Gloria. Color, Sex, and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.

Kirschke, Amy Helene. Aaron Douglas: Art, Race, and the Harlem Renaissance. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981. (See also Penguin ed., 1997.)

———. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.

Shockley, Ann Allen. Interview with Ethel Ray Nance, 18 November 1970.

Smith, Jessie Carney. "Ethel Nance." In Notable Black American Women. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1992, pp. 789–792.

Taylor, David Vassar. Transcript of an interview with Ethel Nance, 15 May 1974.

Ulansky, Gene. "A Quiet Storm," Excel, Fall 1989, pp. 40–42.

Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance, Hub of American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Nation, The

The Nation, a weekly journal devoted to politics and the arts, was founded in 1865. Under the leadership of its first editor, E. L. Godkin, The Nation supported the Fourteenth Amendment's extension of the franchise to black men, but the magazine then failed to support radical Reconstruction and adopted an antiunion and culturally conservative perspective. During the 1920s, under the editorship of Oswald Garrison Villard, it was one of a few white publications to take a major interest in the Harlem Renaissance. Villard served as the magazine's editor from 1918 until 1932 and guided its strong support for trade unions, pacifism, anti-imperialism, women's rights, and racial justice. For most of its history from that time to this, The Nation has been one of the foremost left-liberal magazines in the United States.

Throughout the 1920s and into the 1930s, The Nation published poems, essays, and book reviews by or about many of the leaders of the Harlem Renaissance, including Countee Cullen, W. E. B. Du Bois, E. Franklin Frazier, Langston Hughes, Alain Locke, Claude McKay, George Schuyler, and Walter White. It covered the activities of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the National Urban League. The Nation also reported on and editorialized about a number of topics of interest to participants in the Harlem Renaissance: antiracism movements, the southern "oligarchy," the Ku Klux Klan, segregation, the antilynching movement, prejudice, the achievements of African Americans, race riots, Jim Crow, voting rights, and justice for Haiti and other parts of the Caribbean. There were, however, limitations on the magazine's racially progressive stance, including its relative inattention to black female leaders of the renaissance and its dismissal of Marcus Garvey and black nationalism.

The most famous contribution of The Nation to the Harlem Renaissance was the publication, in 1926, of an exchange between George S. Schuyler and Langston Hughes concerning the nature of Negro art in America. In "The Negro-Art Hokum," Schuyler claimed that such art was nonexistent in that there were no racial or cultural differences between blacks and whites in the United States. In "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," Hughes argued that standing in the way of the realization of Negro art was the very attitude of men like Schuyler, which shaped a "racial mountain": the desire of many blacks to be just like whites. In contrast, Hughes argued that the black masses provided the source for an art, best exemplified by jazz, that was based in racial themes.

Perhaps the final essay on the Harlem Renaissance to be published by The Nation was Claude McKay's "Harlem Runs Wild." In this essay, McKay argued that the riot in Harlem in 1935, which has been said to mark the end of the renaissance, was not a race riot but a gesture of despair resulting from extreme poverty and resentment at the refusal of white merchants in Harlem to hire black workers. The progressive racial politics of the magazine continued after the 1930s, but the Harlem Renaissance faded from The Nation as it did from the nation.

MICHAEL BENNETT

See also Hughes, Langston; McKay, Claude; Riots: 4—Harlem Riot, 1935; Schuyler, George S.; Villard, Oswald Garrison

Further Reading

Hughes, Langston. "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." Nation, 23 June 1926.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Lewis, David Levering, ed. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Viking, 1994.

McKay, Claude. "Harlem Runs Wild." Nation, 3 April 1935.

Schuyler, George S. "The Negro-Art Hokum." The Nation, 16 June 1926.

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) is the oldest and most celebrated civil rights organization in the United States. Since its formation in 1909, the group has been at the forefront of numerous struggles for equality in America, calling on the nation as a whole to abide by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, and to end all racial violence and discrimination—social, political, and economic. The group's activities during the 1920s and the era of the "New Negro" movement are central to its history, for during this period the NAACP matured into the civil rights organization that has been a beacon of light for many African Americans for much of its existence.

Before the creation of the NAACP, other groups had constructed platforms on which it would build. For example, the Afro-American League—later the Afro-American Council—was assembled in 1890 and created a strategy to confront discrimination in America that was similar to that of the NAACP. Around the turn of the twentieth century, a group of radicals, led by W. E. B. Du Bois and William Monroe Trotter, began to challenge what they perceived as the Afro-American Council's conservative leadership and the influence of Booker T. Washington within the organization. By 1905, Du Bois and Trotter created their own group, the Niagara movement, which was dedicated to persistent agitation for civil rights, equal education, and general human rights. Both the Afro-American Council and the Niagara movement would continue their struggles up to the development of the NAACP.

Twentieth annual session of the NAACP, 1929. (Library of Congress.)

The creation of the NAACP was precipitated by an article by William English Walling, in which he graphically described two days of racial violence that took place in Springfield, Illinois, in August 1908 and lamented that there was no "large and powerful body of citizens" prepared to respond and come to the aid of the black population. Mary White Ovington wrote to Walling, asking him to meet her and a few others in New York to discuss the "Negro problem." During January 1909, Ovington, Walling, Dr. Henry Moskowitz, Oswald Garrison Villard, Charles E. Russell, Bishop Alexander Walters, and Rev. William Henry Brooks met, discussed the race question, and decided to call a larger conference to address the issue. In February, the group presented a call written by Villard and signed by sixty prominent black and white Americans, including W. E. B. Du Bois, Ida B. Wells Barnett, Mary Church Terrell, and Jane Addams. The call reflected the platforms of the Afro-American Council and the Niagara movement, emphasizing the protection of black people's rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments.

In response to the call, the National Negro Conference, held 30 May–1 June 1909, created the Committee of Forty, whose mission was to develop plans for the creation of an effective organization tentatively called the "Committee for the Advancement of the Negro Race." The committee's plans were implemented the following year at a second annual conference, during which the organization's permanent name was adopted and its first officers were selected. They included Moorfield Storey as president, William E. Walling as executive committee chairman, John E. Millholland as treasurer, Oswald Garrison Villard as disbursing treasurer, Frances Blascoer as executive secretary, and W. E. B. Du Bois, the only black officer, as director of publicity and research.

Once the organization was created, it immediately began what has been nearly a century of militant protest and litigation against the denial of African Americans' constitutional rights. Within the first year, the group began agitating for better job opportunities for blacks and greater protection from racial violence in the South. The group also established its first local branch in Chicago and, under the guidance of Du Bois, launched The Crisis, a magazine that quickly became the leading voice in the black struggle. Du Bois published political articles and literary works aimed at educating the readership, white and black, about black culture, black history, and American racism. He hoped to instill pride in the African American community and stir readers of both races to action. The Crisis grew from its initial publication of 1,000 copies in 1910 to a circulation of 16,000 the following year, and to almost 104,000 by 1919.

By the end of the association's fifth year, it had twenty-four branches and had initiated numerous crusades against discrimination. Among other things, the group had begun campaigning against the exclusion of black lawyers from the American Bar Association, laid the groundwork for a legal attack on residential segregation, protested against a number of anti-intermarriage bills, and objected to President Woodrow Wilson's policy of segregating African American government employees. During the next few years, the group continued to battle against racism and racial injustice, campaigning, for example, against the film The Birth of a Nation. The organization also called for the African American population to "close the ranks" in support of the war effort; the association's president would argue a case, involving residential segregation in Louisville, before the U.S. Supreme Court.

During and just after World War I, a series of race riots in numerous cities took place throughout the nation, the worst occurring in East St. Louis in 1917 and in Chicago in 1919. The NAACP responded in 1917 by conducting a silent parade of 15,000 people in Harlem.

In 1919, the group called for the creation of a Legal Defense Fund to employ lawyers to increase the association's attempts to end such lynching and mob violence and to bring the culprits to justice. Also in 1919, the organization published its famous study Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918.

Although the migration of African Americans to the North during the 1910s created real as well as imagined competition for jobs, housing, and recreational space and precipitated much of the racial violence during the period, it also aided the development and growth of the NAACP. During this period of turmoil, many northern and southern African Americans joined the organization. In fact, the number of black members grew so quickly that by 1920 their membership fees were supplying most of the association's income. More important, during this period African Americans began to play a role in the organization's leadership. In 1916, James Weldon Johnson was hired as field secretary, and in 1918, Walter White became assistant executive secretary.

During the next decade, the organization entered "young adulthood," maturing and increasingly taking actions that laid the foundation for full adulthood. In the 1920s, in addition to its continued propaganda campaign against lynching and other forms of racial violence, the NAACP stepped up its use of the courts to challenge racial injustices. The organization applied two criteria when deciding on a case: first, whether it involved injustice or discrimination related to race, and second, whether it would establish a precedent for protecting black people's rights as a whole. (These criteria were applied on the national level; local branches continued to accept nearly any case involving injustice.)

In the wake of the racial violence that closed the 1910s, the NAACP lobbied the Republican Party to introduce legislation in Congress making lynching a federal crime. Nothing came of its efforts in the election year (1920); in 1922, however, as a result of lobbying by James Weldon Johnson, who was now the association's executive secretary (1920–1930), the NAACP was successful in getting the House of Representatives to pass an antilynching bill introduced by Congressman L. C. Dyer of Missouri. However, a filibuster in the Senate, led by a coalition of northern Republicans and southern Democrats, later killed the bill. Ironically, on the same day that the Senate crushed the Dyer bill, a mob in Kirby, Texas, burned three African Americans alive, making it obvious that federal legislation was needed.

In the face of such blatant disregard for the rights and welfare of black Americans, the NAACP pressed forward. Regardless of its failure to gain the passage of federal legislation and its frustration with the lack of commitment by national political parties to issues that were critical to the African American community, many in the association did see some positive aspects of their battles on Capital Hill. As James Weldon Johnson commented, "The Dyer Anti-Lynching Bill did not become law, but it made of the floors of Congress a forum in which the facts were discussed and brought home to the American people as they had never been before."

The NAACP's antilynching campaign was central to this growing public awareness. Along with the group's lobbying activity, there were the propaganda campaign in The Crisis and the investigative activities of Walter White. After a mob brutally attacked the association's executive secretary, John Shillady, while he was in Texas investigating a lynching, White, an African American from Atlanta who had fair complexion, blond hair, and blue eyes, became the organization's chief investigator of lynching and mob violence.

White, often posing as a northern white journalist, penetrated white communities where racist crimes had occurred. One such incident followed events in Phillips County, Arkansas. In late 1919, African American sharecroppers' attempts to form a union precipitated a violent confrontation with armed whites that ended with a massacre of black farmers. In a hasty trial, twelve blacks were sentenced to death. The NAACP, led by a local black attorney, Scipio A. Jones, set out to reverse the convictions. The organization took the case to the Supreme Court, where Moorfield Storey argued it. The Supreme Court reversed the convictions and remanded the cases to the lower courts. On the district level, Jones retook control of the cases and secured either discharges, commutation of sentences, or short prison terms for the twelve defendants.

This victory—which came in 1923, a year after the Senate had killed the Dyer bill—demonstrated that the NAACP's legal and investigative strategy could strike a decisive blow against Jim Crow. During this period, the organization also chipped away at America's system of segregation, achieving minor successes against white Democratic primaries in the South. This long struggle began in July 1924, when Dr. Lawrence A. Nixon attempted to cast his ballot in a primary election in East El Paso, Texas. Three years later the Supreme Court ruled in a 5–4 decision that states could not lodge discriminatory practices in the party executive committees, although it failed to determine whether conventions could bar African American members. With this modest victory, the NAACP pressed forward, continuing to strike at the all-white primaries. The fight would require three more decisions by the Supreme Court over the next three decades.

The NAACP also forged ahead, though with less success, in its legal struggle against restrictive covenants that encouraged the segregation of a growing northern urban black population into overcrowded city neighborhoods. Since its inception, the NAACP had waged a war against residential segregation, most often initiating legal action after some sort of provable intimidation or lawlessness. During the first two decades of its existence, the association initiated investigations of housing segregation in cities such as Kansas City, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Minneapolis. The organization also gained favorable decisions from the Supreme Court in cases originating in Louisville, Kentucky (Buchanan v. Warely, 1917), and Richmond, Virginia (City of Richmond v. Deans, 1930).

The most celebrated case involving residential segregation, however, grew out of an incident in Detroit. On 8 September 1925, Dr. Ossian Sweet, a middle-class African American surgeon, moved his family into a hostile white neighborhood in Detroit's East Side. Some people immediately protested his presence, and on the following day the objections became much more aggressive: An angry mob surrounded the property and pounded the house with stones and gunfire. Sweet, along with his two brothers, Otis and Henry, and a few friends who had joined them in anticipation of trouble, fired on the mob and killed one of the whites in the street. Once the bullets began to come from the house, the police, who had been idly standing by, moved in and arrested Sweet and the rest of the occupants. The NAACP took on their defense; after a hung jury in the first trial, in 1927 it gained an acquittal of Sweet's brother Henry and a dismissal of all the other cases.

At the end of the 1920s, the NAACP gained a legal or lobbying victory that demonstrated its strength and influence. After the death of Justice Edward Terry Sanford of the Supreme Court, President Herbert Hoover chose Judge John J. Parker of the Fourth Circuit Court to succeed him. Parker, a North Carolinian who as a gubernatorial candidate had supported the disenfranchisement of African Americans, immediately drew objections from the NAACP. With the support of labor unions, which had their own qualms about Parker, the NAACP set into motion coalitions against him and lobbied the Senate not to confirm his nomination. Within two months the Senate did reject the nominee—an action that at the time had rarely been seen in Washington.

Because the vote in the Senate had been close (41–39), the association moved against the recalcitrant senators. In the general elections after the confirmation hearing, the NAACP waged campaigns against incumbent senators who represented regions of the country where African American voters could unseat them. Senator Henry Allen of Kansas was one of the first to feel the effect at the polls; over the next four years, senators from California, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island also lost their seats. Such political action demonstrated the strength the organization had gained during the 1920s. Earlier, in 1922, the NAACP had not possessed the muscle nor the political capital to wage such campaigns against senators who voted against the Dyer antilynching bill.

The NAACP also played a central role in the evolution of the cultural movement of the decade variously known as the Harlem Renaissance or the New Negro movement. The Crisis had become the voice of post-war African America, and it gave space in its pages to young black writers and encouraged them to hone their craft and create work that would dismantle the negative stereotypes of African Americans appearing in much of American literature and art.

During the 1920s The Crisis published literary works by Gwendolyn Bennett, Anita Scott Coleman, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Fenton Johnson, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Claude McKay, and Jean Toomer, among numerous illustrious authors; it also published literary criticism by William Stanley Braithwaite and others. Furthermore, in 1924, The Crisis, in conjunction with the NAACP and Amy Spingarn, established annual prizes in literature and art, which became an important showcase for new talent. The review board for the prizes included Sinclair Lewis, Edward Bok, Charles W. Chesnutt, Robert Morse Lovett, Witter Bynner, Van Wyck Brooks, Carl Van Doren, Zona Gales, James Weldon Johnson, Eugene O'Neill, H. G. Wells, and Amy Spingarn. The recipients of the awards included Arna Bontemps, Frank Horne, Countee Cullen, and Langston Hughes for poetry; Rudolph Fisher and Anita Scott Coleman for short stories; Hughes for essays; and Willis Richardson for drama. In addition, in 1926, The Crisis published a symposium—"The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?"—on the rising cultural movement. Contributors to the roundtable included Sherwood Anderson, W. E. B. Du Bois, Sinclair Lewis, and Vachel Lindsay.

Although The Crisis had published literary works since its inception, its ability to do so was greatly enhanced during Jessie Redmon Fauset's tenure as its literary editor (1919–1926). Fauset herself wrote poetry, short stories, and novels. In early 1924, Boni and Liveright published her first novel, There Is Confusion; and over the next decade she would write three more novels: Plum Bun (1929), The Chinaberry Tree (1931), and Comedy: American Style (1933). Fauset's numerous poems, essays, and short stories appeared in a number of periodicals, including The Crisis and the NAACP's Brownies' Book—a magazine for children that Du Bois started in 1920 and that was edited by Fauset and Augustus Granville Dill.

In addition to being a central contributor to the Harlem Renaissance, Fauset was an important talent scout and mentor of the burgeoning movement. Together with Du Bois, the chief editor of The Crisis, Fauset set out to create a forum for young writers to publish their work and to convey a new image of African America to the community as well as to the nation as a whole. According to Langston Hughes, one of the emerging artists of the period, Fauset, along with a few others, "midwived the so-called New Negro literature into being. Kind and critical—but not too critical for the young—they nursed us along until our books were born." As literary editor, Fauset introduced writers such as Hughes, Gwendolyn Bennett, Countee Cullen, Fenton Johnson, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Claude McKay, and Jean Toomer to a national audience.

During the same year that Fauset's There Is Confusion was published, another active member of the NAACP became a working participant in the mushrooming literary activity of the African American community. In 1923, Walter White, the association's assistant secretary and chief investigator of lynching, tried his hand at artistic expression. He produced the manuscript of his first novel, about an African American doctor who has been trained in the North and then returns to his native small town in Georgia. After some revisions and wrangles with publishers, White's novel, The Fire and the Flint, appeared under the Knopf imprint, about five months after There Is Confusion. White received praise for his artistic vision and his realistic portrayal of southern life. Two years later, he published a second novel, Flight (1926); this in turn was followed a few years later by a study of the social, economic, and sexual influences of lynching, Rope and Faggot: The Biography of Judge Lynch (1929).

White was also an important mentor to many young writers, and he became a link between the growing black artistic community and the white world of money, publicity, and publishers. Once Fire in the Flint had achieved modest success, White used his new literary weight to connect with people in high places. He soon impressed many cultured benefactors and publishing heavyweights like Alfred A. Knopf, Horace Liveright, Sinclair Lewis, and Carl Van Vechten. He used his new contacts to help publish the work of young writers, such as Countee Cullen's first collection of poetry, Color (1924). White also commented on the growing literary and cultural movement in a number of essays published in various newspapers and journals during 1925 and 1926, including a series of literary columns in the Pittsburgh Courier called "The Spotlight."

The poet, novelist, essayist, and lyricist James Weldon Johnson, the NAACP's executive secretary, also contributed his share to the New Negro movement. As the poet and professor Sterling Brown remarked, by his "interpretations of Negro poetry and music, by his occasional essays on the problems of Negro writers, and by his own creative work James Weldon Johnson succeeded more than any predecessor in furthering the cause of Negro artists." Even before the Harlem Renaissance, Johnson had been one of the few African Americans to publish a novel, although anonymously. This was The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912). The novel attracted renewed interest in 1927, when Johnson announced that he was its author. During the same year he published a collection of lyrical verse, God's Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse (1927), in which he captured the imagery, style, and fervor of traditional black preachers and the African American church. On the eve of the renaissance, he had edited a large anthology, The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922); during the renaissance, he collaborated with his brother, the composer and singer John Rosamond Johnson, in publishing two collections of spirituals: The Book of American Negro Spirituals (1925) and The Second Book of American Negro Spirituals (1926).

Like Johnson, W. E. B. Du Bois, the association's director of research and editor of The Crisis (1910–1934), was an elder statesman of the renaissance. Before the era of the New Negro, Du Bois had already established himself as an intellectual and was widely acclaimed as an author and international scholar. By 1920 he had published numerous articles in a wide range of journals, including The Crisis, Atlantic Monthly, and The Nation. He had been a professor at Atlanta University and had also published many books, including a sociological study, The Philadelphia Negro (1898); a famous collection of essays, The Souls of Black Folk (1903); his first novel, The Quest of the Silver Fleece (1911); a biography, John Brown (1909); and a second collection of essays and verse, Darkwater: Voices from within the Veil (1920).

Du Bois had been urging a reawakening of black art for a number of years. Since the late nineteenth century, Du Bois had been seeking the most effective means of establishing Africa's descendants among the world's recognized peoples. According to Du Bois, one way to gain such universal recognition was through the arts—in The Souls of Black Folk he gave precedence to music, the "sorrow songs"—and the New Negro renaissance offered encouragement that black poets, novelists, painters, and playwrights might win this larger recognition. Du Bois argued in the early 1920s that African Americans would be regarded "as human" when their art "compels recognition." James Weldon Johnson was in agreement with this idea; he noted in the preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry that "the final measure of the greatness of all peoples is in the amount and standard of the literature and art they have produced." Du Bois, as the editor of The Crisis, played a central role in developing and encouraging young writers and promoting the movement. He also continued his high level of scholarly and literary production with the publication of numerous essays in journals and two more books, The Gifts of Black Folk (1924) and the novel Dark Princess (1928).

Despite Du Bois's initial hope that the artistic production of young black artists would bring worldwide recognition to African Americans, within a few years of the beginning of the renaissance he had become disillusioned with the movement and many of its artists. His frustration was occasioned by a continued outpouring of so-called realistic renderings of Harlem's street life and the lives of the lower classes. Two extreme examples of such writing are Nigger Heaven (1926), by the white author Carl Van Vechten, and Claude McKay's Home to Harlem (1928). In the symposium "The Negro in Art" that The Crisis held in 1926, Du Bois accused many of the younger writers of failing to recognize their political and social responsibilities. "All art is propaganda," he asserted, "and ever must be, despite the wailing of the purist." Two years later, Du Bois published his second novel, Dark Princess, to illustrate his point. The story centers on a black man who falls in love with a beautiful Indian princess, and on a plot among representatives of the darker nations of the world to rid themselves forever of white domination.

As the 1920s came to a close, the NAACP lost some of its interest in the new literary movement; as the Depression set in, the renaissance itself waned. During the next decade, the association focused its energy on its major objective—the dismantling of the Jim Crow system. During the 1930s, the NAACP would experience some setbacks with the resignations of James Weldon Johnson in 1930 and Du Bois in 1934, but the organization still pushed forward with its agenda, an agenda greatly aided in the early 1930s by the formation of its legal committee. Before this time, the association had worked with numerous—mainly white—lawyers who worked pro bono or for a nominal fee. By mid-1935, after deciding to develop its own legal staff, the group hired Charles H. Houston, dean of Howard Law School, as its full-time special counsel. Houston put together a legal team that had a considerable black presence and that included his former student Thurgood Marshall.

The NAACP's new legal staff developed a two-pronged strategy to fight discrimination in education in the South. It directly attacked the exclusion of blacks from professional and graduate programs at southern state schools, and indirectly contested segregation and discrimination at the primary and secondary levels with regard to salaries, facilities, and length of school terms. The group sought to force the South either to strengthen African American institutions or to desegregate on the basis that it was too costly to keep separate institutions open. The first step in the new legal strategy was to win victories on the local and state levels in order to create a precedent that the association could build on to dismantle the Supreme Court's decision in Plessy v. Ferguson. On this premise the NAACP, now under the leadership of Walter White, started along the road to Brown v. Board of Education. Or, to change the metaphor, using the foundation that it had laid during the 1920s, the association helped construct the modern civil rights movement.

SHAWN LEIGH ALEXANDER

See also Antilynching Crusade; Brownies' Book, The; Civil Rights and Law; Crisis, The; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Crisis, The: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Johnson, James Weldon; Niagara Movement; White, Walter; other specific individuals

Further Reading

Factor, Robert L. The Black Response to America: Men, Ideals, and Organization, from Frederick Douglass to the NAACP. Reading, Mass.: Addison-Wesley, 1970.

Goings, Kenneth W. The NAACP Comes of Age: The Defeat of Judge John J. Parker. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990.

Hine, Darlene Clark. Black Victory: The Rise and Fall of the White Primary in Texas. Millwood, N.Y.: KTO, 1979.

Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Hughes, Langston. Fight for Freedom: The Story of the NAACP. New York: Norton, 1962.

Janken, Kenneth Robert. White: The Biography of Walter White, Mr. NAACP. New York: New Press, 2003.

Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Da Capo, 2000. (Originally published 1933.)

Kellogg, Charles Flint. NAACP: A History of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Vol. 1, 1909–1920. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967.

Levy, Eugene. James Weldon Johnson: Black Leader, Black Voice. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1973.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.

———. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1896–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.

———. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.

Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915: Racial Ideologies in the Age of Booker T. Washington, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1963.

Meier, August, and John H. Bracey. "The NAACP as a Reform Movement, 1909–1965: To Reach the Conscience of America." Journal of Southern History, 59(1), February 1993, pp. 3–30.

Meier, August, and Elliott M. Rudwick. "Attorney's Black and White: A Case Study of Race Relations within the NAACP." Journal of American History 62(4), 1976, pp. 913–946.

Ross, B. Joyce. J. E. Spingarn and the Rise of the NAACP. New York: Atheneum, 1972.

Rudwick, Elliott, and August Meier. "The Rise of the Black Secretariat in the NAACP, 1909–1935." Crisis, 84(2), 1977, pp. 58–69.

Schneider, Mark R. "We Return Fighting": The Civil Rights Movement in the Jazz Age. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 2002.

Scruggs, Charles W. "Alain Locke and Walter White: Their Struggle for Control of the Harlem Renaissance." Black American Literature Forum, 14, Autumn 1980, pp. 91–99.

Tushnet, Mark V. The NAACP's Legal Strategy against Segregated Education, 1925–1950. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

- Vose, Clement E. Caucasians Only: The Supreme Court, the NAACP, and the Restrictive Covenant Cases. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.
- Wedin, Carolyn. Inheritors of the Spirit: Mary White Ovington and the Founding of the NAACP. New York: Wiley, 1998.
- White, Walter. A Man Called White: The Autobiography of Walter White. Athens: University of Georgia, 1995. (Originally published 1948.)
- Wilson, Sondra Kathryn, ed. The Crisis Reader. New York: Modern Library, 1999a.
- , ed. In Search of Democracy: The NAACP Writings of James Weldon Johnson, Walter White, and Roy Wilkins (1920–1977). New York: Oxford University Press, 1999b.
- Zangrando, Robert L. The NAACP Crusade against Lynching, 1909–1950. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1980.

National Association of Negro Musicians

The National Association of Negro Musicians (NAMN) is an organization dedicated to the advancement of African Americans in the field of classical music. The violinist and composer Clarence Cameron White of Boston issued the first call for such an organization by letter in March 1916; his suggestion was reiterated by the composer Robert Nathaniel Dett, then a professor at the Hampton Institute, in October 1918. In the following spring, Nora Holt invited leading musicians to her home in Chicago to honor White. Holt (1885–1974) was a composer and journalist based in Chicago; she served at two times as the music critic of the Defender and, after further study in Europe, moved to New York, where she wrote for the Amsterdam News in the 1940s. She and Henry L. Grant became the cofounders of NAMN, and for many years she was a leading figure in the association. Grant—a composer, pianist, and choir conductor—was director of the Washington Conservatory of Music, taught at the elite Paul Laurence Dunbar High School in Washington, D.C., and counted a young Duke Ellington among his students. In May 1919, Holt and Grant held an informal conference in connection with the annual festival given by the music department of Dunbar High School. Thirty-three musicians attended.

The National Association of Negro Musicians was formally founded in the wake of this meeting, under the leadership of Holt and Grant. Its first annual convention was scheduled to be held in Chicago that July.

The convention was held but was small: It coincided with a race riot in Chicago, and several delegates who learned of the bloodshed as they were arriving turned around at the Chicago train depot. Nevertheless, the organization was successfully launched. The original officers and members of the board of directors included Holt, White, the violinist Kemper Harreld, and the composer and educator Carl Rossini Diton.

The organization soon established branches throughout the United States. Branch 1, in Chicago, quickly came to the forefront of the national organization. Some branches were closely affiliated with other local and regional music organizations, such as the Chicago Music Association and the Indianapolis Music Promoters. As NANM gained in prestige, other musical luminaries served on the board or gave financial support, W. C. Handy and Harry T. Burleigh among them.

Before World War II, presidents of NANM served two- or three-year terms. The first president was Henry Grant (1919–1922); he was followed by Clarence Cameron White (1922–1924), Robert Nathaniel Dett (1924–1926), Carl Diton (1926–1928), J. Wesley Jones (1928–1930), Lillian LeMon (1930–1933), Maude Roberts George (1933–1935), Camille L. Nickerson (1935–1938), and Kemper Harreld (1938–1940). The rotating presidency allowed musicians with regional affiliations (Diton of New York, LeMon of Indianapolis, Harreld of Atlanta) to take the lead in turn.

NANM's activities centered on its national conventions, held most often in Chicago (those held in Chicago included the first one in 1919 and the convention of 1923). In alternating years the convention rotated to other cities, including New York in 1920, Nashville in 1921, Columbus in 1922, Cleveland in 1924, Indianapolis in 1925, Philadelphia in 1926, St. Louis in 1927, Detroit in 1928, and Dallas in 1929.

The promotion of African Americans in concert music, particularly opera and classical song, has been the primary focus of the organization from the outset; NANM was helpful to many singers, starting with the great contralto Marian Anderson, who won the first annual scholarship. Among the illustrious singers who benefited from NANM's sponsorship since then have been Roland Hayes, Shirley Verrett, Grace Bumbry, William Warfield, Adele Addison, Robert McFerrin, and George Shirley. Composers and arrangers assisted by NANM have included Harry T. Burleigh, William Grant Still, Florence Price, John Wesley Work, and Margaret Bonds. NANM has also sponsored work by educators and scholars such as Maud Cuney-Hare, Alain Locke, Carl Diton, Eileen Southern, and Doris McGinty. NANM has remained focused on concert or “art” music traditions; for many years, it made no attempt to extend its mandate to the more commercially viable popular music. More recently, gospel music and jazz have gained in acceptance, and NANM has honored some gospel musicians, including stars such as James Cleveland.

In New York, the leading member of NANM for many years was George Washington Glover (1888–1993), who was a founding member in 1919 and remained active until late in his very long life. For eighteen years he was chairman of the Department of National Exhibits and Archives for the organization, and for many years he functioned as its unofficial historian. Initially, there was only one New York branch, which was named in honor of educator David I. Martin (c. 1880–1923). Closely affiliated with this, by way of Glover and his friend Blanche K. Thomas, was the Thomas Music Study Club. Other branches of NANM in New York City included those named for Carl Diton (for a time there were two of these), Lillian Dunn Perry, and Rev. A. Merrill Willis in Manhattan; Mu-Te-Or (Brooklyn); and the B Branch (Jamaica, Queens). Additional branches were established in Mount Vernon and upstate New York.

In its early decades, NANM followed an explicit policy of promoting “art” song and opera, specifically deemphasizing what its charter described as more “negroid” styles. It also went to some lengths to promote performances of selections from a particular work by one of its leading members, the opera Ouanga by Clarence Cameron White. More recently, its mission has included promotion of “love and appreciation of traditional and contemporary Negro music,” “use of Negro folk themes as a basis for compositions,” the promotion of higher professional standards, and resistance of the “desecration of Negro spirituals.”

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Anderson, Marian; Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Cuney-Hare, Maud; Dett, Robert Nathaniel; Handy, W. C.; Hayes, Roland; Holt, Nora; Locke, Alain; Still, William Grant; White, Clarence Cameron

Further Reading

Diton, Carl. “The National Association of Negro Musicians.” The Crisis, May 1923, pp. 21–22.

George Washington Glover Papers, Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.
Glover, George W. “A Brief History of the Organization.” In National Association of Negro Musicians Presents Second Annual Scholarship Concert. New York Philharmonic, 1965. (Program booklet.)

Holt, Nora. “The Chronological History of the NANM.” Music and Poetry, July 1921. (Reprinted in Black Perspective in Music, 2, Spring 1974, pp. 234–235.)

Hutchison, Clara E. “The National Association of Negro Musicians, Inc., 1919–1930.” 1930. (NANM pamphlet.)

Southern, Eileen, and Doris McGinty, eds. National Association of Negro Musicians: A Documentary History. Chicago, Ill.: Center for Black Music Research, 2004.

National Colored Players

The National Colored Players were a short-lived “little theater” group, active in the autumn of 1929. The group presented three productions at the West End Theater on Saint Nicholas Avenue near 125th Street. The first of these productions, Seventh Heaven, began a one-week run on 7 October with Ida Anderson, Vere E. Johns, and George Randol in the leading roles. It was followed by Crime, a drama about an underworld heist; and finally by The Gorilla, the lightest of the three plays. All three works were by white authors and had all been successfully produced on Broadway before their run in Harlem. Seventh Heaven (by Austin Strong) had run for 704 performances in 1922 (the fifth-longest Broadway run up to that time), and it was made into a successful silent film in 1927. The Gorilla (by Harold Lloyd’s screenwriter, Harold Spence) had run for 257 performances in 1925; a critic for Variety wrote at the time that it was “the shootingest, shoutingest melange of chills and thrills and yells ever concocted.” Crime (by Samuel Shipman and John Hymer) had run for 186 performances beginning in February 1927.

The National Colored Players should be seen primarily as a showcase for revivals in Harlem of past Broadway hits, and it was in this light that a columnist for the Inter-State Tattler described the company in October 1929. In addition to Anderson and her costars, the ensemble included J. Homer Tutt, one of the most prominent theater men of the Harlem Renaissance.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Inter-State Tattler

Further Reading

Inter-State Tattler, 11 October 1929.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

National Ethiopian Art Theater

The National Ethiopian Art Theater (NEAT) in New York was a short-lived “little theater” group and school that promoted playwriting and dramatic performance by blacks. Organizers and teachers of NEAT included Anne Wolter and Henry Creamer.

Theophilus Lewis, an ardent supporter of black theater who was the foremost drama critic during the Harlem Renaissance, noted the first public performance (19 June 1924) of students from NEAT’s school in his theater column for The Messenger. The program featured dance numbers as well as choral singing. According to Lewis, NEAT’s ultimate goal was to build a school and a theater in the Broadway district. Although Lewis supported the goal of creating an organization to feature black dramatic talent, he encouraged the group to locate its theater in Harlem, where it could benefit from the support of blacks in the community in addition to focusing on developing black dramatists and actors.

Lewis commented favorably on NEAT’s attempt to bring drama to the stage during a time when musicals were the most popular form of stage entertainment. The lack of black playwrights who focused on dramatic works (instead of musicals and comedies), however, meant that NEAT and other black little theater groups frequently performed dramas written by whites. The public’s taste for low comedy and imitations of white tastes in drama often dictated the types of works presented by black theater groups. Lewis also noted NEAT’s practice of using brown-skinned women in dance performances when the norm for most shows was light-skinned women in dance choruses.

Critics noted other performances by NEAT, including a presentation of three one-act plays at the Lafayette Theater in Harlem on 15 October 1924. The author and critic George Schuyler (1924) praised “Cooped Up” by Eloise Bibb Thompson as a “play written by one who knows life and the ingredients of real drama.” The evening’s performances also included “Being Forty” by Eulalie Spence and “Bills,” which Schuyler dismissed as an unfunny comedy. Both Eloise Bibb Thompson and Eulalie Spence were students at the NEAT school.

The National Ethiopian Art Theater School disbanded in 1925. Other black little theater groups of the 1920s and 1930s included the Tri-Arts Club, the Inter-Collegiate Association, the Sekondi Players, the Krigwa Players, and the Aldridge Players.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Krigwa Players; Lafayette Theater; Lewis, Theophilus; Schuyler, George S.; Tri-Arts Club

Further Reading

Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. “Theophilus Lewis and the Theater of the Harlem Renaissance.” In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.

Lewis, Theophilus. “Theatre.” Messenger, 6(8), August 1924.
———. “The Theater: The Souls of Black Folks.” Messenger, 7(7), July 1925.

Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960: A Comprehensive Guide to Early Black Theatre Organizations, Companies, Theatres, and Performing Groups. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Schuyler, George S. “Theatre.” Messenger, 6(11), November 1924.

National Negro Business League

On 23 August 1900, Booker T. Washington and his close business associates founded the National Negro Business League (NNBL) in Boston, Massachusetts. T. Thomas Fortune, editor and publisher of New York Age, was appointed chairman of the NNBL’s executive committee, and Andrew Carnegie provided capital for the fledgling group. The NNBL was committed to black people’s economic independence, and it promoted the “commercial, agricultural, educational, and industrial advancement” of African Americans. Washington served as president until his death in 1915.

Detractors of the NNBL said that it was simply the centerpiece of the “Tuskegee machine”; these critics took exception to Washington’s anointment by the press as the spokesman for black Americans across the nation. As head of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in Tuskegee, Alabama, since 1881, Washington had a history of enticing members of the black entrepreneurial class in northern cities to join organizations he personally sponsored. Under his direction, Tuskegee became one of the leading African American educational institutions in the nation. Its programs emphasized industrial training, self-discipline, and trade-specific instruction as a means to economic independence. Washington attributed his interest in the NNBL to work and travel related to the institute.

The records of the NNBL suggest that it was more than simply an operation of Tuskegee and Washington. Numerous elite black businessmen (and women) from across the United States participated. Its ranks also included large numbers of the rising black middle class. Broad activism and aggressive recruitment defined the NNBL. The association's leaders argued that black businesses could not thrive unless their prosperity was spread throughout the community and supported by other local businesses. The annual conference proceedings for 1900–1919 show that cooperation and community linkages were championed, as were communication links among African American business owners. Black executives, publishers, scholars, and a wide range of professionals across the United States were constantly recruited. NNBL officials also produced important demographic and statistical data, including one of the most comprehensive surveys of the growth and location of black businesses in the history of the United States.

Local leagues expanded the organization and met regularly in stores and offices to plan regional activities. Presentations about the growth of black business were prevalent, as were events designed to raise money. Barbecues were popular, often well advertised, and well attended. In addition, to encouraging the growth of businesses owned by blacks, local leaders called for trade with member suppliers and mandated rules and procedures. According to August Meier (1966), the Kansas City league even established a special oversight committee to identify those members who failed to patronize black enterprises. Chapter leaders of local U.S. Chamber of Commerce offices, who followed the successes of the NNBL closely, were effective partners in these efforts. They offered their cities as possible sites for league conventions, provided the league with the names of African American businessmen, and recommended ongoing cooperative efforts and events.

While local networks inspired growth in numbers, connections with large business entities led to investment. In addition to Carnegie, the retail magnate John Wanamaker and Julius Rosenwald of Sears, Roebuck advocated the NNBL's mission. Wanamaker was the advertised speaker at one of the NNBL's annual meetings, and Rosenwald was a member of the board of trustees of the Tuskegee Institute. Officers of the NNBL also worked with other established promoters of business development, such as the Association of National Advertisers and the J. Walter Thompson advertising agency in New York. The NNBL also maintained an informal connection with the prestigious Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, using the manager Carl Hunt as a valuable contact. The NNBL complemented other black associations formed during this period, and members developed the confidence necessary to launch similar programs. While the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) emphasized social and legal objectives, the NNBL invigorated business initiatives and black economic advancement. The NNBL's secretary, Albon L. Holsey, founded the Colored Merchants' Association (CMA) in 1930, and Richard Wright established the National Negro Bankers Association and played a vital role in financing several small enterprises, notably grocery, bakery, and cleaning firms.

Although it is difficult to credit the NNBL with the explosive growth of black business ownership in early twentieth-century America, statistics suggest that the group was a key participant during a stimulating period of African American capitalism. Between 1888 and 1934, 134 black banks were established; the number of black businesses increased from 4,000 in 1867 to 50,000 in 1917. More than 200 black newspapers were published as the twentieth century began; by 1920, almost 75,000 businesses were owned by African Americans in the United States. The majority of these firms tended to be funeral parlors, hotels, barber-shops, hair product manufacturers, grocery and drug stores, restaurants, and shoe repair shops. A survey by the NNBL in 1928 showed a general lack of surplus for many of these firms. Of 1,534 black businesses in thirty-three cities, 43.4 percent recorded profits of below $5,000, and only 8.9 percent recorded profits of more than $25,000. Economic conditions during the Depression created further hardship. Of the aforementioned 134 African American banks established between 1888 and 1934, only 12 remained in operation in 1938.

The NNBL grew to 40,000 members at its high point, and it supported 400 delegates representing thirty-four states at annual conventions until operations ceased in 1933. The organization's legacy has continued to shape economic fulfillment agencies. The National Student Business League (NSBL), founded in 1900 with the help of Booker T. Washington, has flourished for years and provides training for African American business students. The National Business League (NBL) credits its founding to the NNBL. The association's literature states, "Yet, it was not until 1900 that an organized federation of merchants and tradesmen was established to promote and protect the financial and commercial interests of Black entrepreneurs. Under the leadership and guidance of Dr. Booker T. Washington, a former slave who became one of the most influential leaders of his day, a few hundred men and women launched the organization that is now the National Business League." The NBL has headquarters in Washington, D.C.

R. JAKE SUDDERTH

See also Fortune, Timothy Thomas; Washington, Booker T.; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

"Booker T. Washington and the National Negro Business League." In Seven on Black: Reflections of the Negro Experience in America, ed. William G. Shade and Roy C. Herrenkohl. Philadelphia, Pa.: Lippincott, 1969. (Interview with Louis Harlan.)

Burrows, John Howard. "The Necessity of Myth: A History of the National Negro Business League, 1900–1945." Ph.D. dissertation, Auburn University, 1977.

Hamilton, Kenneth, consulting ed. "Records of the National Negro Business League." Department of History, Southern Methodist University.

Lee, J. R. E. "Highlights on Early History of the National Negro Business League." Quarterly Journal, 9, October 1940, pp. 9–13.

Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1966.

Washington, Booker T. "The National Negro Business League." World's Work, 4(2), October 1902, pp. 2671–2675.

The Peabody Microfilm Collection at Hampton University has made available the published proceedings of the Annual Conventions of the National Negro Business League.

National Urban League

New York City became the logical setting for an organization designed to ease the burden of urban life for African Americans. During the late nineteenth and the early twentieth centuries, thousands of southern rural blacks sought employment in northern industries. A need existed to ease the transition from farm to factory for men and women alike. Black people formed organizations designed to promote advancement for their race by overcoming segregation and racial discrimination. Among white people, however, the reasons for helping Negro migrants varied. Some believed that African Americans should be integrated into the larger society in order to enable white people to live more comfortably among blacks. Others contended that as long as discrimination against Negroes continued, true democracy in the United States could never be realized. And still others had pragmatic reasons for instituting reforms that could help black migrants. These progressives feared class and racial conflict, industrial unrest, and unsavory housing conditions that could result in disease epidemics—all of which would prove inimical to the urban lifestyle of the privileged elite. None had a better grasp of the problem than wealthy progressive reformers residing in New York City. These influential white men and women established chapters like the Armstrong Association and the Association for the Protection of Negro Women to handle the influx of black migrants.

At the turn of the twentieth century, several social service organizations evolved that worked to ameliorate the conditions of the black masses. By 1905, sixty-four agencies operated in New York City and Philadelphia to administer to the needs of disadvantaged blacks. Included among the service agencies were the Committee on Urban Conditions (CUC), the Committee for Improving the Industrial Condition of the Negroes in New York City (CIICN), the National League for the Protection of Colored Women (NLPCW), and eventually the National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes (NLUCAN). Although the agencies were scattered and uncoordinated and had different objectives, all were devoted to sustaining and improving the condition of African Americans.

Migrants required immediate assistance, and some relief occurred in the churches and social service missions in the Bronx, Brooklyn, and Harlem. Unfortunately, short-term solutions for dependent migrants failed to resolve constant problems attributed to the evil influences of urban malaise, ranging from shyfters who shortchanged women and ran prostitution rings to industrial and housing discrimination that reduced black men and women to a subhuman existence. Equally important, migrants needed someone to act as an employment broker—an individual or organization responsible for finding jobs and providing training necessary for gainful employment in an urban, industrial milieu.

Several men and women, black and white, endeavored to solve the burgeoning problems related to the great black migration. Included among the beneficent white people were Frances A. Kellor, general director of the Inter-Municipal Committee on House Research, and Ruth S. Baldwin, the wealthy socialite wife of the railroad tycoon William H. Baldwin Jr. Blacks possessing a similar interest in ameliorative work were Dr. Eugene P. Roberts, a physician who had graduated from Lincoln University (Pennsylvania) and New York Medical College; and William L. Bulkley, a graduate of Claflin University in South Carolina, Wesleyan, and Syracuse University, where he earned a Ph.D. in ancient and foreign literature. Later, prominent white men like L. Hollingsworth Wood, Edwin R. A. Seligman, and Oswald Garrison Villard, and blacks like Rev. Reverdy Ransom and the shoe manufacturer Samuel R. Scottron added luster to the migrant reform movement.

Despite the interest and talent of those who volunteered to mitigate the problems that migrants faced, the need to coordinate the various programs and create a full-time professional staff became increasingly evident. George E. Haynes—a graduate of Fisk University and Yale Divinity School, with a Ph.D. from Columbia—embarked on a research project and became the individual responsible for proving that the black migrant community remained underserved. Haynes's work led to the creation of another organization, the Committee on Urban Conditions Among Negroes in New York (CUCANNY). This organization enabled the participants to realize the need to coordinate all social service and philanthropic work in New York City and other industrial cities.

Therefore, on 16 October 1911, the most prominent service organizations—CUCANNY, NLPCW, and CIICN—merged, and, invoking the motto “Not alms but opportunity,” the National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes (NLUCAN) came into being. It would be officially renamed the National Urban League (NUL) on 4 February 1920. Haynes became the first chief executive officer and accepted responsibility for training black professional social workers to administer to the needs of migrants. To carry out his mission, he established a training center at Fisk and divided his time between training social workers there and carrying out his administrative responsibilities in New York. During Haynes's tenure, the league eschewed paternalism and embarked on a mission to create prospects for black employment. Although its headquarters were in New York City, the NUL evolved to become the most prominent black social service organization in the United States.

When the board members of the league realized that Haynes's training responsibilities at Fisk prevented him from providing adequate oversight of day-to-day operations, Haynes was ousted from the directorship in favor of Eugene Kinckle Jones. Jones established organizational priorities and used the resources at his disposal to carry out his mission. Jones had been born into a highly educated family in Richmond, Virginia, and seemed destined to lead. His mother, Rosa, had graduated from Howard University and the New England Conservatory of Music and taught music at Hartshorn College in Richmond; his father, Joseph E. Jones, acquired a baccalaureate degree from Colgate University and served on the faculty at Richmond Theological Seminary (Virginia Union University) as a professor of homiletics and church history. With this background, Eugene Jones had little recourse but to further his education and thereby serve his people. After graduating from Virginia Union and earning a master's degree from Cornell in sociology, Jones eventually moved to New York City in 1911 to become the first full-time secretary of the Committee on Urban Conditions.

By 1916 Jones' star qualities enabled him to become the league's director. Under Jones's direction, the league evolved from an organization established to train black urban leaders to one that provided direct services and assistance to the black urban poor. Moreover, Jones displayed the thinking of a visionary who recognized that the league had a national responsibility to look after the social welfare of all African Americans. He promoted the separation between the national office, housed in New York City, and the New York Urban League—the latter headed by James H. Hubert. The change proved beneficial for disadvantaged blacks nationally. The national office now directed itself to upgrading the condition of Negroes in a coordinated way and on a national scale.

Jones proved himself to be the right man at the right time to lead the NUL. Of quiet demeanor, extremely industrious, and fact oriented, Jones unobtrusively but forcefully brought recognition to NUL. Indeed, Jones's temperament was ideal for the work at hand. Unlike the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which generated funds through membership dues, the NUL depended exclusively on grants and donations from corporations and wealthy benefactors. Jones' soft-spoken, results-orientated approach made him the ideal leader for the league. Hence, under Jones's direction the league became extremely attentive to concerns and dictates of benefactors like the Rockefeller Foundation, Carnegie interests, and the Julius Rosenwald Fund.

Directly or indirectly, Jones's middle-class demeanor permeated the entire national association. Cleanliness, thrift, punctuality, proper morals, and other lessons were dispersed by NUL affiliates throughout the United States. It was the intention of Jones and other officials of the league to refute the prejudicial thinking of white employers who believed in the inferiority, indolence, and limited intelligence of the Negro.

In addition to finding employment for urban black workers, one of the primary goals Jones had in mind was the extension of the Urban League's services. During the 1920s, the national office brought seventeen new affiliates into the organization from as far South as Tampa and Atlanta and as far west as Los Angeles, and a scattering of chapters existed in cities like Baltimore, Louisville, Omaha, and Minneapolis–St. Paul. In addition to seeking employment for migrants, the centers established day nurseries, kindergartens, and clinics. The league also expanded its fellowship program to train social workers, many of whom studied at the New York School of Social Work. Jones also augmented the number of affiliates in cities including Atlanta, Baltimore, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Louisville, Minneapolis–St. Paul, Omaha, and Tampa. For children, Jones and his associates created a range of activities, organizing ball games, picnics, and stage plays and sponsoring pageants and lectures. Seeking "softer" methods to acquire access for blacks into mainstream America, Jones left it to the NAACP to agitate for equality; he himself avoided controversy and solicited the support of whites for the NUL's social service programs.

Another key to the success of the National Urban League may be observed through the calculated approach the organization took in acquiring information about the needs of African Americans. In 1920, Jones presented a proposal to the Carnegie Corporation to underwrite a research and investigations department to provide affiliate chapters with data on the "Negro question" locally and nationally. Reformers and potential benefactors alike could receive accurate information about African Americans so that proper solicitations could be made and decisions rendered to improve their condition. If the department proceeded as Jones expected, the NUL would be the most accurate repository of information about contemporary blacks in the nation. The Carnegie Corporation underwrote the department, awarding the sum of $8,000 annually over a three-year period. The National Urban League had taken a step toward greatness.

In order to continue making steps to help African Americans, Jones and the national board realized the necessity for collecting accurate data on the condition of the Negro. The NUL therefore needed an erudite, effective person to head the research department. One of the best decisions Jones made as executive secretary was his choice of Charles Spurgeon Johnson to head the NUL's new research arm. Johnson had been a student of the esteemed professor Robert E. Park of the University of Chicago, who had served as director of the Chicago Urban League; he profoundly believed that information could prove essential in helping African Americans acquire opportunities for advancement. With Johnson at the helm between 1922 and 1928, the research department enabled Jones to target corporations and other entities that could offer gainful employment to black urbanites. Jones used the information—facts and figures—to spearhead a "jobs for hire" program and to obtain money for other programs deemed essential to find work for African Americans. The Urban League's research department would allow New York to become the established center for information about the nuances of change in the lives of African Americans.

In addition to collecting data, the national office recognized a need to disseminate immediate information to subordinate leagues, interested parties, benefactors, and the general public. As the newly appointed head of the research department, Johnson was given an additional task. By December 1921, he would edit and produce the first edition of the "Urban League Bulletin," directed toward the larger society. Despite the early successes of the bulletin, however, a broader, more comprehensive publication had been envisioned by members within the NUL. Therefore, under Johnson's direction, on 19 January 1923, the magazine Opportunity: Journal of Negro Life made its initial appearance. Its name was derived from the NUL's slogan, "Not alms but opportunity," and it did far more than publicize facts and statistics germane to employment and living conditions. Indeed, Opportunity not only provided information on black aspirations and needs but, perhaps even more important, served as an outlet for the flowering of Negro culture and contributed significantly to publicizing the talent of the new black cognoscenti and intellectuals who made up the Harlem Renaissance. By 1924 Opportunity had won such acclaim that the league felt obliged to create a literary contest in which awards were offered for poetry, short stories, essays, plays, and personal sketches on life. Later contests incorporated awards for musical composition and constructive journalism. Winners of the various prizes included writers like Countee Cullen, E. Franklin Frazier, Zora Neale Houston, Langston Hughes, and Eric Waldron.

The national office also interceded on behalf of Arthur Schomburg to secure a repository for his vast collection of memorabilia—pamphlets, artifacts, letters, newspapers, manuscripts, and books—that chronicled the black diaspora. When the collection was offered to the NUL in 1926, Eugene Kinckle Jones, Charles S. Johnson, and a prominent white man, Hollingsworth Wood, encouraged the Carnegie Corporation to purchase the collection for $10,000. Although the donation proved far less than the value of Schomburg's collection, permanent housing was established, so that the material would be accessible to the general public, in a Harlem branch of the New York Public Library; the branch was eventually named for Schomburg.

Almost simultaneously with Jones's vision for establishing a means for disseminating information about the league through the "Bulletin," the national director recognized that the procurement of jobs for blacks required the creation of an industrial department. By November 1923 Jones had presented a proposal to the Rockefeller Foundation and received $4,500 in matching funds to create a department of industrial relations. By 1925 the national office acquired the additional funds from Julius Rosenwald so that the department could distribute black workers to sites and cities in need of labor. Furthermore, this new department would coordinate local employment agencies with potential employees, work directly with corporations to prepare opportunities for black workers, encourage black employees to perform their duties efficiently and effectively, and endeavor to gain admission of blacks into trade unions.

After Jones acquired funding, he had the task of finding a suitable industrial secretary. As it happened, T. Arnold Hill, executive director of the Chicago Urban League, became available to head the new department. Hill proved ideal for the job. His experience in Chicago had enabled him to acquire fund-raising skills, acumen as a leader, and a profound understanding of what was needed to be a successful director of the Department of Industrial Relations. Hill knew that he must gain insight about the needs of corporate America, understand the industrial training given to black workers, and function as a liaison between corporations and potential Negro employees. Additionally, to be effective, Hill realized the need to place good workers in jobs commensurate with their talent. This would prove the best way to ensure promotion for individual employees and to protect future hiring possibilities for the entire race. Hill had also prepared to work closely with labor unions to enhance blacks' prospects for work with the trade union movement. Therefore, when Hill arrived in New York on 8 April 1925 to carry out his outlined mandate, he was prepared for the task at hand.

Jones endeavored to encourage white employers to hire black help by publicizing black people's aptitudes for work. Simultaneously, the NUL made overtures to labor with the intention of lowering racial barriers that precluded African Americans from entering unions and finding work as artisans. If the Department of Industrial Relations was to succeed, the league had to be respected by both the business elite and the forces of labor and work aggressively to achieve cooperation between industrialists and union leaders.

Fortunately, the location of the NUL in New York City, and the existence of Harlem and the populace that gravitated there seeking employment, proved advantageous to African American workers. For more than a decade, members of the league's board successfully solicited corporate America to acquire financial support for the organization and place blacks in jobs. The rapport established in the nation's business center enabled Hill and the NUL to support black workers' involvement in unions with relative impunity. While black newspaper editors, ministers, and the nationally renowned Black Elks supported the Pullman Company against striking black unionists, only NUL leaders like Jones and Hill, with tacit support from the NAACP, supported A. Philip Randolph in his struggle to organize and defend the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. By 1927, Hill had generated sufficient enthusiasm among African Americans to forge a bond with unions that he sponsored and helped organize a "Negro in Industry Week." The purpose of this "week" was to instill within black institutions—such as fraternal organizations, churches, lodges, the YMCA and YWCA, and the National Negro Business League—an acceptance of unionization. Only the early advent of the Great Depression, which initially affected African Americans, prevented the NUL's union movement from being extremely successful.

The leaders of the NUL realized that to bring African Americans into trade unions required effective, highly trained social workers. In 1919, Jones hired Alexander L. Jackson, who had graduated from Harvard with honors, to serve as the league's educational secretary. In keeping with Booker T. Washington's philosophy of advancement of the Negro through industrial education, the need for trained social workers who could act as instructors became urgent. Furthermore, since the NUL no longer used the services of its previous educational director, George Haynes at Fisk, something had to be done. Jackson used his Ivy League training to solicit blacks attending prestigious colleges and recruited them to pursue careers in social work. The league's fellowship program, which had begun earlier in the century, received enormous stimulation and experienced great success under Jackson's direction. Scores of African Americans attending prestigious colleges and universities applied for and received grants from the league.

Although many organizations in Harlem flourished during the 1920s, the National Urban League, to some extent, found itself in difficulties. Although the NUL dedicated itself to finding work for blacks and to elevating the standard of living for those who were indigent, Jones and members of the NUL's hierarchy received criticism for the league's inability to acquire support from African Americans. Critics specifically pointed to the example of Marcus Garvey, who had raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Universal Negro Improvement Association from enthusiastic black followers. Jones, according to Parris and Brooks (1971), raised only $68,000 from wealthy white donors, corporations, and African Americans combined. Confidence in Jones's leadership eroded further when the Commission on Interracial Cooperation (CIC), led by Dr. Will Alexander, acquired a significant following in the South and gained acclaim, through its Atlanta headquarters, by servicing regions beyond the purview of the NUL. Further difficulties arose when George Haynes's Department of Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America achieved national visibility and recognition. Both of these agencies recognized that the NUL was weakest in the South, the region where most blacks lived. Therefore, the CIC and the disgruntled Haynes acquired influence at the expense of the league's national office in New York. By 1925, a special conference held in Cincinnati with the theme "Toward Interracial Cooperation" operated without Eugene Kinckle Jones's influence, input, or subsequent appreciation and recognition. Only the direct involvement of Charles S. Johnson with the conference of 1928 in Washington, D.C., righted the ship and brought recognition and respect to the NUL and Jones.

Proud and taciturn, Jones refused to sacrifice his dignity to curry favor with white benefactors. For example, the league encouraged Standard Oil and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company to broaden employment opportunities for African Americans, but these companies remained intransigent; neither of them agreed to present information about hiring practices to Jones and the board. Jones' sense of integrity and independence prevented him from pleading with the companies to provide blacks with respectable blue- and white-collar jobs and perhaps limited the NUL's ability to conduct large-scale programs during the 1920s. Nevertheless, the organization remained strong and proved capable of withstanding challenges encountered during the Great Depression.

H. VISCOUNT NELSON

See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Haynes, George Edmund; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Jones, Eugene Kinckle; Labor; 135th Street Library; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Villard, Oswald Garrison

Further Reading

- Moore, Jess Thomas, Jr. A Search for Equality: The National Urban League, 1910–1961. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1981.
- Nelson, H. Viscount "Berky." The Rise and Fall of Modern Black Leadership: Chronicle of a Twentieth Century Tragedy. New York: University Press of America, 2003.
- Parris, Guichard, and Lester Brooks. Blacks in the City: A History of the National Urban League. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1971.
- Weiss, Nancy J. The National Urban League, 1910–1940. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Négritude

Négritude—in English, negritude—is the literary and cultural movement associated with francophone writers of African descent principally during the 1930s and 1940s, most notably Léon Damas, Aimé Césaire, and Léopold Senghor. Although there have been many definitions and descriptions of the term négritude, the three elements that characterized the works of these authors were valuing black and African cultures, rejecting the French policy of cultural assimilation, and promoting black and African agency.

France, like many other European states, imported large numbers of African slaves to work on sugar plantations throughout the Caribbean basin and consequently held Africans and peoples of African descent to be inferior to Europeans. Although the French First Republic abolished slavery during the French Revolution, people of African descent in these French territories did not receive citizenship until 1848, as did residents of the four communes of Senegal (Dakar, Saint Louis, Gorée, and Rufisque). The French government classified the rest of the inhabitants of Senegal and its other colonies as indigènes, or natives, and considered them subjects without the rights and privileges of citizens. The policy of assimilation assumed the superiority of French culture to all others. Accordingly, subjects had no political rights or rights of representation in the French national assembly. An indigène, however, by adopting and practicing the French language and French culture (and paying a significant fee), could be classified as évolué, or evolved, and could receive the rights of citizenship. Only a very small minority of Africans in French colonies achieved évolué status, however; the assimilated elite tended to collaborate with French rulers, while, for the vast majority of the people living under France's colonial occupation, the spirit of liberty, fraternity, and equality was little more than rhetoric. Furthermore, by the 1930s the ideas of scientific racism, which proclaimed the biological inferiority of African peoples (particularly as espoused by Gobineau), dominated French intellectual circles and broader French society as well.

Négritude, therefore, can be defined as taking pride in or promoting a positive image of African heritage individually and collectively. Given the political and cultural climate in Paris in the 1930s (the zenith of European colonialism), the assertions of black pride made by Damas, Senghor, and Césaire were very radical.

Several scholars have traced the beginnings of négritude to a short-lived journal, Légitime Défense, which was published by a group of Martinican students in Paris in 1932. Led by Etienne Léro, the group called for an end to racial discrimination against people of African descent (particularly from French territories in the Caribbean), an abolition of bourgeois hierarchical values, and a recognition of black and African racial difference as positive rather than as a deficiency. Heavily influenced by French surrealist and Marxist ideologies, Légitime Défense was banned by French authorities after only one issue. Other scholars have argued that négritude began with the publication of La Revue du Monde Noir, under the leadership of the Martinican sisters Andrée, Jane, and Paulette Nardal, in 1931–1932. Both publications significantly influenced the founders of négritude: Léro's group raised the theme of black alienation resulting from capitalist exploitation and racial discrimination, and they called for a new form of literary expression free from French canons; the Nardal sisters held weekly salons in which young African and Afro-Caribbean students came together to discuss a variety of issues and read their poetry. It was also in these salons that the francophone writers met Harlemite literati, including Langston Hughes and Claude McKay.

Another significant influence on the incipient movement were developments in ethnology, or cultural anthropology, most notably works by Leo Frobenius and Maurice Delafosse that argued for the historicity and positive contributions of West African cultures and states, contrary to the racist ideology of Gobineau. Similarly, René Maran's historical novel, Batouala, which exposed French exploitation of the people in its African colonies, had an effect on the young poets' critique of French colonial society. In 1934, Damas, Senghor, and Césaire published another short-lived journal, L'Étudiant Noir (The Black Student), which built on the themes found in Légitime Défense and La Revue du Monde Noir. One of the principal themes of négritude that the authors of L'Étudiant Noir apparently stated (the journal is no longer extant) was the commonality of experiences of French colonialism on the part of Caribbean blacks and Africans. According to Césaire, the objective of the publication was "to reunite Black people who are considered French by law and nationality to their own history, traditions, and languages, to the culture which truly expresses their soul."

In 1937, Damas published the first collection of his poetry, Pigments. Several of the poems contain significant critiques of French assimilationist policies. "Hoquet" ("Hiccups"), for example, provides a scathing view of the rules associated with the proper conduct observed by black elite families in the Caribbean (Damas was born and raised in French Guiana and attended secondary school in Martinique, where he met Césaire). In 1939, French authorities banned the book in their African colonies because Baoulé-speakers in the Ivory Coast recited the last poem in the collection, "Et Cetera"—in which Damas exhorted Senegalese soldiers in the French army to leave the Germans in peace and liberate Senegal instead—while resisting the military draft. Damas published a collection of essays, Retour de Guyane (Return from Guiana), in 1938, and edited the first anthology of poets from the French colonies, Poètes d'expression française d'outre mer (Poets of Overseas France) in 1947. Damas served one term as Guiana's representative to the French national assembly following World War II, and he taught in the United States at the University of the District of Columbia and Howard University. He died in 1978.

Aimé Césaire wrote his monumental poem Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a return to the native land) in 1938. Although the journal Volontés published significant portions of the work in 1939, it did not receive critical acclaim until it was published in its entirety with an introduction by surrealist philosopher André Breton in 1947. It was in Cahier that Césaire coined and first used the term négritude. Surrealist in its structure, syntax, and imagery, Cahier is as much a psychological journey toward the young Césaire's interior self-realization as a poet and a person of African descent as a critique of French exploitation and testament to African agency in the Caribbean and on the continent. Kennedy (1975) described Cahier as "the only possible introduction to Césaire's work." Similarly, Kesteloot (1991) proclaimed it "the national anthem of blacks the world over." During World War II, Césaire returned to Martinique to teach and, with his wife, Suzanne, edited the surrealist journal Tropiques. After the war, he served as Martinique's representative in the French assembly and as mayor of Fort-de-France. At the time of this writing, he continued to serve as mayor. Césaire's most important later works include his famous essay Discourse on Colonialism and the plays La tempête (The Tempest), based on Shakespeare's play), La tragédie du roi Christophe (about a king in early nineteenth-century Haiti), and Une saison au Congo (about the life and death of Patrice Lumumba).

Of the three founders of négritude, Léopold Senghor has been regarded as the champion of African contributions to the twentieth-century world, and this can be seen clearly in his essay "Ce que l'homme noir apporte" ("That Which the Black Man Carries," 1939). Senghor wrote the poems in the first two collections of his work, Chants d'ombre (Songs of Darkness) and Hostes Noires (Black Hosts, Black Victims), between 1936 and 1945. They were published in 1945 and 1948, respectively. Also in 1948, Senghor edited and published the second anthology of francophone African poetry, Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache (Anthology of the New Black and Malagasy Poetry), which included a controversial introductory essay by Jean-Paul Sartre, "Orphée Noir" ("Black Orpheus"). In addition to helping Damas and Césaire discover or rediscover African cultures, Senghor had a significant impact on a fellow Senegalese, Alioune Diop, the founder of the enormously influential journal Présence Africaine and the Société Africaine de Culture (African Society of Culture). Like Damas and Césaire, Senghor also served as a deputy from Senegal in the French national assembly. In 1960, he became president of an independent Senegal, an office he held until his resignation in 1980. He left Senegal and lived in France until his death in 2001.

Much of the criticism that négritude received as a movement stems from various definitions of the concept, particularly Senghor's and Sartre's. Césaire defined négritude as "the awareness of being black, the simple acknowledgment of a fact that implies the acceptance of it, a taking charge of one's destiny as a black man, of one's history and culture," whereas for Senghor it was "the cultural patrimony, the values and above all the spirit of Negro African civilization." Building on the implicit essentialist and universalist ideas in Senghor's definition, Sartre defined négritude as the "being-in-the-world of blacks," but further as the upbeat of a dialectical progression; the theoretical and practical assertion of white supremacy is the thesis; the position of negritude, as an antithetical value, is the moment of negativity. But this negative moment is not sufficient in itself, and the blacks who make use of it are aware of this. They know its aim is to prepare a synthesis or realization of the human in a society without races. Thus negritude exists in order to be destroyed. It is a transition, not a result, a means and not a final ending.

In effect, Sartre made the essentialism implicit in Senghor explicit. Furthermore, to the extent that Senghor's understanding of culture as it related to a universal "spirit of Negro African civilization" is essentialist, it is understandable given that he no doubt developed his understanding of culture from the early ethnologists who reified concepts such as culture as a matter of course. Nigel Gibson characterized négritude as defined by Césaire as "subjective negritude," and as defined by Sartre following Senghor as "objective negritude." The revolutionary theorist (and Martinican) Frantz Fanon was more accepting of "subjective negritude" and critical of "objective negritude" because of "the historical specificity of racism and colonialism": that is, they were not universals; rather, they were contingent on specific historical contexts. In short, Fanon was far more critical of Sartre than any of the négritude poets. Furthermore, Kesteloot argued that négritude literati were more interested in the realization of human society without racism than in its realization without race. The criticisms of anglophone African writers, such as the Nigerian Wole Soyinka and the South African Ezekiel Mphahlele, argued for the existence of and preferred separate black and African "national" literatures versus a universal black literature and spirit. Curiously, Langston Hughes noted that, had the term négritude been used in the 1920s, he and the Harlem literati "might have been called poets of négritude."

The poet-politicians of négritude intended their literary works to have a political impact. They saw political involvement as an extension of their ideology: All three served in the French national assembly, Senghor was president of Senegal, and Césaire was the mayor of Fort-de-France. Radicals criticized both Senghor and Césaire: Senghor voted for union with France in the referendum of 1958; Césaire received André Malraux, France's minister of information, who denied that the French army used torture during the Algerian war. Yet the success and significance of négritude can be measured by its impact on the generations of black and African intellectuals and nationalists who led movements against Western colonialism.

While scholars have chronicled the relationship between négritude and the Harlem Renaissance, its interaction with other contemporary literary movements is less well known. Manuel Ferreira wrote about the influence of négritude on claridade, a literary movement of the 1930s in Cape Verde. Damas dedicated "Il est des nuits" to the Afro-Cuban poet Alejo Carpentier. Senghor noted that the Haitian Jean Price-Mars's Ainsi parla l'oncle influenced his thought. Thus, négritude was one of several literary movements among black and African people in the Atlantic world in the early twentieth century. These movements were the intellectual forebears of later black and African movements for political and social liberation from western colonialism.

NICHOLAS M. CREARY

See also Batouala; Césaire, Aimé; Damas, Léon; Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance; Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance;

Hughes, Langston; Maran, René; McKay, Claude; Senghor, Léopold

Further Reading

- Césaire, Aimé. Discourse on Colonialism. New York: Monthly Review, 2000.
- . Notebook of a Return to the Native Land. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 2001.
- Damas, Léon Gontran. Pigments. Paris: Présence Africaine, 1962.
- Kennedy, Ellen Conroy. The Negritude Poets: An Anthology of Translations from the French. New York: Viking, 1975.
- Kesteloot, Lilyan. Black Writers in French: A Literary History of Negritude. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1991.
- Senghor, Léopold Sédar. Négritude et humanisme (Liberté I). Paris: Éditions du Seuil, 1964.

Negro: An Anthology

Negro: An Anthology, collected and edited by Nancy Cunard, was the largest and the most radical of the anthologies to come out of the Harlem Renaissance. It was published in 1934, nine years after Alain Locke had issued The New Negro, and it can be read as an updated version of Locke's anthology. Like The New Negro, Negro includes literature, essays, sociological studies, and photographs. Negro is much broader in focus than Locke's anthology, however, and, at 855 pages, more thorough: Negro includes 250 contributions by 150 writers, and it firmly sets the history and achievements of African Americans in a global context, with sections on the history, culture, and social development of the West Indies and South America, Europe, and Africa. Negro is also more militant than its predecessor: It includes coverage of racism and violence against African Americans, with essays on lynching, the Ku Klux Klan, and the Scottsboro trial. It also includes a number of essays attacking imperialism and capitalism and lauding the potential of communism and socialism to help fight racism and injustice.

Whereas The New Negro is understood as the defining volume of the Harlem Renaissance and is well known to scholars of the movement, Negro has never received much attention. In the 1930s, only a very few periodicals reviewed it. More recently, Chisholm (1979) and Ford (1970) have offered accounts of Cunard's creation of the anthology, and a few essays have been devoted to it, but scholarship on Negro remains scant.

The obscurity of Negro is at least partly a result of its limited availability. The first edition was published by Wishart in London in 1934 at Cunard's expense, and she was unable to find an American publisher. Wishart printed only 1,000 copies of the volume, and the bombing of London during World War II destroyed several hundred copies that had not yet been sold. After the war, according to Chisholm, copies were "virtually unattainable," available only at very high prices on the rare book market (1979, 222). The version that Ford edited in 1970 is more widely available; however, he abridged the contents to 464 pages.

Still, the anthology offers an insightful coda to the Harlem Renaissance, particularly in its original form. First, it is an important source of work by some of the significant writers of the period. Negro includes, for example, poetry by Arna Bontemps, Sterling Brown, Countee Cullen, and Langston Hughes, as well as essays by Locke, W. E. B. Du Bois, Arthur Schomburg, and Walter White. A number of essays by Zora Neale Hurston, including "Characteristics of Negro Expression," were originally published in Negro. The anthology also includes contributions by notable white literary figures, including Theodore Dreiser, Ezra Pound, and William Carlos Williams; Samuel Beckett translated a number of essays from French writers.

Second, Negro demonstrates the importance of musicians and performers of the period; it includes a selection of photographs of and essays about young African American musicians, actors, and performers active during the 1920s and 1930s, including Louis Armstrong, Cab Calloway, Duke Ellington, Ethel Waters, and Bill "Bojangles" Robinson. Negro is a reminder that the work and the influence of these writers and artists did not end with the close of the 1920s, nor did the interest in black culture.

Negro also demonstrates that the concerns of the 1920s extended into the 1930s. Cunard's goal for the volume, as she describes it in her foreword, was to record "the struggles and achievements, the persecutions and the revolts against them, of the Negro peoples" (iii). A sense of frustration with the continuing racism against African Americans permeates the volume; it matches the frustration often found, for example, in Du Bois's editorials in The Crisis, the journal he edited for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). The essays on black culture, in contrast, are laudatory in tone; they praise the literature, art, music, and performances by black people in the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa, implicitly offering such work as evidence that disproves the often assumed inferiority of black people. Negro shares with so many works of the previous decade, then, the optimistic feeling that the arts could serve the political purpose of undermining racism.

A number of aspects of Negro set it apart from other work of the Harlem Renaissance and made it controversial, however. The espousal of communism in the volume is probably its most distinctive and divisive element. The arguments about the benefits of communism are heavy handed; Cunard, for example, states in her foreword, "The Communist world-order is the solution of the race problem for the Negro" (iii). Moreover, she had little patience or understanding for anyone who did not share this belief, and she was quite outspoken in her criticism of people with whom she disagreed about politics or strategies, even if they were contributors. For instance, although she included contributions from a number of members of the NAACP, including Du Bois, White, and William Pickens, she also included an essay in which she attacked Du Bois, The Crisis, and the NAACP as reactionary—and even placed her critique immediately ahead of Du Bois's essay.

Another controversial aspect of the anthology is the fact that its editor, Cunard, was a white British woman born into a high-class, well-off family who was not afraid of controversy in her own life. She dedicated Negro to Henry Crowder, an African American musician whom she had met in Italy in 1928 and with whom she had a long affair. Cunard's interest in and relationships with Crowder and other black men caused quite a scandal and received a good deal of press; as McSpadden (1997) points out, Cunard's reputation for "sexual adventurousness" and her interest "in all things African"—particularly men—made her credibility as the editor of this anthology questionable (60).

Cunard's editorial policies and organization also are debatable. North (1994), for example, argues that the anthology is indiscriminate and lacks organization, although McSpadden describes the benefits of its complexities. And, certainly, some of the texts are problematic, such as William Carlos Williams' sexist and racist essay, "The Colored Girls of Passenack." In spite of—or perhaps because of—these controversies, however, Negro calls for much more scholarly attention.

ANNE CARROLL

See also Cunard, Nancy; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Locke, Alain; New Negro, The; Scottsboro; White, Walter; other specific individuals

Further Reading

- Chisholm, Anne. Nancy Cunard: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1979.
- Ford, Hugh. "Introduction." In Negro: An Anthology, comp. and ed. Nancy Cunard. London: Wishart, 1934. (See also: Negro: An Anthology, ed. and abridged Hugh Ford. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1970.)
- Friedman, Alan Warren, ed. Beckett in Black and Red: The Translations for Nancy Cunard's Negro (1934). Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2000.
- Marcus, Jane. "Bonding and Bondage: Nancy Cunard and the Making of the Negro Anthology." In Borders, Boundaries, and Frames: Essays of Cultural Criticism and Cultural Studies, ed. May Henderson. New York: Routledge, 1995.
- McSpadden, Holly Ann. "Transgressive Reading: Nancy Cunard and the Negro." In Essays on Transgressive Readings: Reading over the Lines, ed. Georgia Johnston. Lewiston, N.Y.: Mellen, 1997.
- North, Michael. "'Characteristics of Negro Expression': Zora Neale Hurston and the Negro Anthology." In The Dialect of Modernism: Race, Language, and Twentieth-Century Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Negro Art Institute

The Negro Art Institute—known formally as the American (National) Institute of Negro Letters, Music, and Art—was the first of three major attempts by the civil rights leader Walter White (1893–1955) to obtain broad-based support for artists of the Harlem Renaissance. Patterned after the American Negro Academy (ANA), which was founded in 1897, the Negro Art Institute was conceived in 1923 to train and cultivate black writers, musicians, and visual artists. It immediately found advocates in the philosopher Alain Locke (1885–1954), who was a member of the ANA, and the activist James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938), who served with White as an officer of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). According to the NAACP's records, plans for the incorporation of the Negro Art Institute and the configuration of its board were outlined in a memorandum dated 13 April 1923. Although unsigned, the document was probably written by Locke, who made suggestions as to additional supporters beyond the members of the board, and who recommended New York or Chicago as a possible location for the institute, because both cities had an abundance of cultural and financial resources.

White, who worked tirelessly for the NAACP for nearly forty years, was not only a staunch civil rights activist but also an award-winning author. As such, he championed the NAACP's support of black artists, particularly writers, and used the NAACP's publications to highlight their works, inform the public about the state and nature of black art, and foster relationships between artists and critics. The Negro Art Institute was an outgrowth of this interest, and it was hoped that the institute would function not merely as an academy but also as a vehicle through which to raise global awareness about black genius and creativity.

An application for financial support of the institute was submitted, unsuccessfully, to the Garland Fund. Following this rejection, Locke invited the wealthy widow Charlotte Osgood Mason (1854–1946) to underwrite the project. Mason, who supported a number of African American literary and visual artists throughout the 1920s and 1930s, initially agreed but later withdrew her support. Although it is unclear why Mason abandoned the project, she seems, in any case, to have been an improbable sponsor for an institution intended to cultivate scholarly pursuits, intellectual engagement, and the notion of black erudition: Mason was a "primitivist" who coerced her beneficiaries into creating works that emphasized the visceral and childlike nature of black people as she understood them.

Unable to obtain financial backing, White and his colleagues appear to have relinquished their plans for the institute. By 1924, White's correspondence no longer refers to the project, nor is it mentioned in his biography. A second, similar endeavor, the Negro Foreign Fellowship Fund, was attempted in 1924, again by White, Locke, and Johnson, in order to finance travel and study abroad for black artists and scholars. An application for a subsidy was submitted to the American Fund for Public Service but was rejected because the proposal fell outside the scope of the fund's objectives. A third and final venture to support black art was conceived by White in 1927, when he wrote to a former director of the Harmon Foundation (which had independently begun to offer awards to black artists) for assistance, but his request was again rejected. Despite these disappointments, White continued to aid black artists on an individual basis and through his advocacy of the NAACP's literary awards.

LISA FARRINGTON

See also Garland Fund; Harmon Foundation; Johnson, James Weldon; Locke, Alain; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; White, Walter

Further Reading

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

