

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE HARLEM RENAISSANCE

VOLUME 1
A-J

CARY D. WINTZ
PAUL FINKELMAN
EDITORS

ROUTLEDGE
NEW YORK • LONDON

Also available as a printed book see title verso for ISBN details

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE
HARLEM RENAISSANCE

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

Tritobia Benjamin
Howard University

Anne Carroll
Wichita State University

Eugene Leach
Trinity College

EDITORIAL BOARD

Hayward "Woody" Farrar
Virginia Tech

John Hope Franklin
Duke University

Darlene Clark Hine
Northwestern University

James Horton
George Washington University

George Hutchinson
University of Indiana

Amy Kirschke
Vanderbilt University

Alvia Wardlaw
Texas Southern University

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE
HARLEM RENAISSANCE

VOLUME 1
A-J

CARY D. WINTZ
PAUL FINKELMAN
EDITORS

ROUTLEDGE
NEW YORK · LONDON

This edition published in the Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2005.

“To purchase your own copy of this or any of Taylor & Francis or Routledge’s collection of thousands of eBooks please go to www.eBookstore.tandf.co.uk.”

Published in 2004 by

Routledge
An Imprint of the Taylor and Francis Group
270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016
www.routledge-ny.com

Published in Great Britain by Routledge
An Imprint of the Taylor and Francis Group
2 Park Square
Milton Park, Abingdon
Oxon OX14 4RN
www.routledge.co.uk

Copyright © 2004 by Taylor & Francis Books, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilized in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including any photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

Manufactured in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of the Harlem Renaissance/edited by Cary D. Wintz and Paul Finkelman
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 1-57958-389-X

1. African American arts—New York (State)—New York—History—20th century—Encyclopedias.

2. Harlem Renaissance—Encyclopedias. I. Wintz, Cary D., 1943– II. Finkelman, Paul, 1949–

NX512.3.A35E53 2004

700'.89'9607307471—dc22

2004016353

ISBN 0-203-31930-3 Master e-book ISBN

DEDICATION

We dedicate this work to John Wright, agent par excellence. He was a part of this endeavor from the beginning and guided the project through difficult times.

PAGE vi BLANK

CONTENTS

Preface	ix
Alphabetical List of Entries	xiii
Thematic List of Entries	xxi
Entries
Volume I A–J	1
Volume II K–Z	659
Contributors	1289
Index	1297

PAGE viii BLANK

PREFACE

The Harlem Renaissance today is a topic of great interest, celebrated as the most creative period in African American cultural life. Yet even now, some seventy-five years later, there still is little agreement about the extent of the renaissance, either in time or in content, and there is still debate about the quality of the creative work it spawned, its impact on African American and American history, and how it affected race relations. Part of the problem is that even the African American intellectuals who created and tried to define the movement, and who provided its critical framework, disagreed among themselves and with the African American writers and artists who provided its creative force. During the Harlem Renaissance, as well as today, participants and scholars alike disagreed about when it began; when it ended; what its artistic, political, and aesthetic focus should be; whether it was a success or a failure; whether it was a positive or a negative development in African American culture; and, ultimately, whether it served the interests of blacks, the interests of whites, or both.

Although the Encyclopedia of the Harlem Renaissance will not resolve these debates, it is based on the belief that the Harlem Renaissance was one of the most significant developments in African American history in the twentieth century. It also takes a very broad view of the renaissance and the connection of this movement to the major social, political, and intellectual developments in early twentieth-century African American history. Consequently, the encyclopedia not only addresses the artistic and cultural events directly related to the Harlem Renaissance but also examines the political, economic, and social environment in which the movement took place. Placing the Harlem Renaissance within this broader context is necessary in order to fully understand the movement and its achievements, and to understand the work of individual artists, writers, and performers. With this in mind, we structured the encyclopedia to provide deep coverage of the literary and artistic aspects of the movement as well as broad coverage of the political, social, economic, and legal issues that confronted African Americans during the early twentieth century.

Our coverage of the artistic elements of the Harlem Renaissance includes essays on the literature, art, and music of the movement. There are extensive essays on major writers, artists, and performers, as well as pieces on most of the lesser-known figures. In addition, there are discussions of the major creative works, especially those that had an impact on the development of the Harlem Renaissance. Along with the so-called higher arts (poetry, literature, painting, sculpture, theater, classical music, and dance), expressions of popular culture are covered, especially musical theater, musical reviews, and motion pictures. In other areas, the line between popular culture and art is not entirely clear. Jazz, blues, and spirituals are treated as art forms, although they were also an expression of folk or popular culture. Although not everyone who wrote a poem, sang a song, or performed onstage is covered in this encyclopedia, we have attempted to include everyone who played a significant role in the renaissance, and those whose activities reflected or influenced some aspect of African American culture in the early twentieth century.

The Harlem Renaissance was, of course, situated in time and place. We see the movement as a phenomenon of the 1920s and the 1930s, beginning at about the end of World War I and fading out in the late 1930s. Its temporal boundaries are not exact, however; they vary somewhat from one artistic category to another, and there are powerful antecedents existing as early as the turn of the century. For example, we include entries on individuals such as Paul Laurence Dunbar and Henry Ossawa Tanner, whose major work predates World War I but who had a significant influence on later writers and artists. Furthermore, the social, political, and economic developments intertwined with the movement are much less easy to contain; accordingly, various entries can range back into the late nineteenth century and extend into the 1940s. The focus, though, is on the two decades following World War I.

The geographic boundaries of the Harlem Renaissance are also complicated. Clearly Harlem was central to the movement, and a large number of entries examine multiple aspects of Harlem's life and history. The Harlem Renaissance was not confined to one location, however. For example, blues and jazz, two developments in music that helped define the renaissance, had their origins in a number of locations—New Orleans, Memphis, St. Louis, the Mississippi delta—and were transported north by people who migrated to Chicago, New York, and other cities. Likewise, most of the writers, poets, actors, and artists moved to Harlem from other parts of the country; many emerged from artistic and cultural movements in places like Los Angeles, Houston, Dallas, New Orleans, and Atlanta. Also, African American communities in other Northern cities like Washington, Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago had their own cultural movements, which contributed to the Negro Renaissance. Furthermore, neither the movement nor its influence was confined to the United States. Caribbean writers and artists immigrated to the United States and participated in the movement; others from this region influenced the political and cultural life of Harlem. African American writers, artists, and performers traveled to the Caribbean, Africa, and Europe, where they interacted with the artistic and political life of Europeans and immigrants from the European African and Caribbean empires. A number of entries examine the connection of the Harlem Renaissance to this broader world.

Finally, race in all its complexity is fundamental to the Harlem Renaissance. Each African American writer or artist confronted in his or her own way the racism and colonialism of the United States and the Western world; at the same time, each was connected to the emergence of the struggle for civil rights and the anticolonial movements. These issues had an impact on the Harlem Renaissance and on the lives and work of those who participated in it. This encyclopedia contains numerous entries that examine race and racism, both within the United States and abroad, especially in terms of how these issues defined the African American experience in the early twentieth century and how they affected the life and work of the participants in the Harlem Renaissance.

One aspect of the racial experience that is the subject of several entries is the role of whites in the Harlem Renaissance: White authors writing about African Americans; white patrons and supporters of the Harlem Renaissance; white publishers, producers, and booking agents; white critics and promoters—they all influenced African American culture for better or worse. A closely related subject is the interaction between blacks and whites: most often black artists reacting with white publishers, promoters, and critics, but also the more complex interaction between the black intelligentsia and black writers and white publishers and intellectuals. Both W. E. B. Du Bois and James Weldon Johnson were black civil rights leaders, novelists, and poets in their own right, and both published, promoted, and critiqued the work of black artists and writers. Carl Van Vechten, a white novelist, wrote a major Harlem novel of the period and also served as a patron and promoter of black literature, art, and music, and as a documenter of the Harlem Renaissance.

The Encyclopedia of the Harlem Renaissance, then, examines all phases and all aspects of the Harlem Renaissance, as well as the broader cultural, political, social, and economic environment in which the renaissance, and indeed African Americans, functioned in the first half of the twentieth century. Entries address individual participants and major works and a wide range of related issues that fall into several large categories. Entries on individuals include participants in all aspects of the creative arts as well as journalists, political and cultural figures, and others who were simply personalities in Harlem and contributed to the ambience of the era. Entries on creative works cover all artistic fields but focus on books, anthologies, plays, motion pictures, and musical shows or revues. The encyclopedia also includes entries on significant newspapers, literary magazines, and periodicals that either were directly connected to the Harlem Renaissance or helped define the political and social milieu. Likewise, we provide entries on artistic and cultural organizations along with political and civil rights groups. Harlem itself is covered in essays on its history and social and economic issues, as well as its nightlife and specific institutions and places in the neighborhood. Finally, a number of thematic and interpretive essays provide a general overview of specific aspects of the renaissance such as music, literature, and the visual arts, and several somewhat shorter essays address specific concepts, events, and movements.

Through its breadth and diversity, this encyclopedia attempts to meet a common demand. Students, scholars, and the public at large are looking for information on the rich and complex culture of the Harlem Renaissance. Whether readers seek the broad outlines or the fine details of the era, they will find here, in one work, an unparalleled resource—contributed by those dedicated to studying its achievements.

Organization

The Encyclopedia of the Harlem Renaissance is divided into two volumes. The entries are organized alphabetically. Volume 1 contains entries from A to J, and Volume 2 contains K to Z and the index. To assist the user in finding material, each entry has cross-references (“See also”) to related entries, and, as necessary, blind entries (“See”) direct the reader to the proper essay. An extensive index also assists the reader in finding specific information that may not have its own entry or may be found in several entries. Each entry also includes a relatively short bibliography directing the reader to further information. The illustrations provide visual material for specific entries and for the Harlem Renaissance in general.

Contributing Authors

The encyclopedia includes some 640 entries, representing the work of about 260 contributors. The contributors represent academic faculty members and independent scholars, writers, and artists. They include specialists in history, art, music, theater, dance, politics and political theory, economics, sociology, and African American studies; and they come from across the United States as well as from abroad. Their work reflects the latest scholarship in their respective fields.

Language

This encyclopedia, in general, uses the terms “African American” and “black” interchangeably. It also uses “Negro,” “Afro-American,” “African American,” and similar terms of the early twentieth century in direct quotations and when these terms are appropriate to reflect the usages of the time and place. “Negro” is always capitalized, unless it was lowercased in a source that is quoted directly. The use of the term “nigger” and its derivations is more complicated. This term has not been used here to denote a pejorative attitude toward African Americans. As necessary and appropriate, however, it has been used in direct quotations to capture accurately the language of poetry or literature, or to reflect and understand racist language. Phrases like the book title Nigger Heaven, and terms like “niggerati” and “negritude” that refer to specific concepts, have been used as they were during the Harlem Renaissance. Our approach to the use of words is to be true to the language of the period, maintain a language appropriate for scholarly discourse, and address racial issues accurately and honestly while avoiding needlessly offensive phrases.

Acknowledgments

A number of people have contributed to this project. First, our associate editors provided the broad knowledge of the period necessary to review the entries. They, along with our advisory board, also reviewed the list of entries and helped identify contributors. Vincent Virga provided us guidance and significant insight during a conversation at the Library of Congress. Rita Langford at the University of Tulsa performed some of the initial work in organizing the entry list. We want to add a special word of thanks to Arnold Rampersad, who served as an associate editor during the early phases of the project but had to withdraw as the demands of his administrative duties at his university increased. We also received a great deal of assistance from the publishers. First, at Fitzroy Dearborn, where the project began, Paul Schellinger embraced our vision of this encyclopedia, and Robin Rhone and Audrey L. Berns guided the project during its initial phase. When Routledge took over from Fitzroy Dearborn, it committed the resources to help us complete the project quickly. Sylvia Miller, Mark Georgiev, and Kate Aker provided overall leadership, while Susan Gamer worked directly with us on an almost daily basis. We especially appreciate Susan’s energy and hard work that kept the project moving and brought it to its completion. Finally, we wish to thank all our contributing authors for the expertise they brought to their essays; for completing their work in a timely manner; for completing revisions or taking on new assignments, often on a short schedule; and for maintaining their belief in the project as we moved toward its completion.

CARY D. WINTZ
PAUL FINKELMAN

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF ENTRIES

- Abbott, Robert Sengstacke
Abyssinian Baptist Church
African Blood Brotherhood
Afro-American Realty Company
Algonquin Roundtable
Alhambra Theater
Ali, Duse Mohamed
Alston, Charles
Amenia Conference, 1916
Amenia Conference, 1933
American Mercury
American Negro Labor Congress
Amos 'n' Andy
Amsterdam News
Anderson, Charles W.
Anderson, Edmund Lincoln
Anderson, Garland
Anderson, Marian
Anderson, Regina M.
Anderson, Sherwood
Anglophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance
Anglophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance
Anita Bush Theater Company
Antilynching Crusade
Apollo Theater
Appearances
Armstrong, Louis
Art Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance
Artists
Associated Negro Press
Association for the Study of Negro Life and History
 and Journal of Negro History
Atlanta University Studies
Attaway, William
- Authors: 1—Overview
Authors: 2—Fiction
Authors: 3—Nonfiction
Authors: 4—Playwrights
Authors: 5—Poets
Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, The
- Baker, Josephine
Baker, Ray Stannard
Baltimore Afro-American
Barnes, Albert C.
Barnett, Ida B. Wells
Barthé, Richmond
Batouala
Bearden, Romare
Beavers, Louise
Bechet, Sidney
Becton, George Wilson
Bennett, Gwendolyn
Bentley, Gladys
Bethune, Mary McLeod
Birth of a Nation, The Birth of a Race, The Birthright
Black and Tan Clubs
Black and White
Black Bohemia
Black History and Historiography
Black Manhattan
Black Opals
Black Press
Black Star Line
Black Swan Phonograph Company
Black Zionism

Alphabetical List of Entries

Blackbirds
Blackface Performance
Blacks in Theater
Blake, Eubie
Bledsoe, Jules
Blues
Blues: An Anthology
Blues: Women Performers
Boas, Franz
Boni and Liveright
Boni and Liveright Prize
Bonner, Marieta
Bontemps, Arna
Booklovers Club
Booklovers Magazine
Bradford, Perry
Braithwaite, William Stanley
Brawley, Benjamin
Briggs, Cyril
Brimmer, B. J., Publishing House
Brooks, Clarence
Brooks, Gwendolyn
Brooks, Shelton
Broom
Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters
Brown, Ada
Brown, Hallie Quinn
Brown, Sterling
Brownies' Book, The
Bruce, John Edward
Bubbles, John
Burleigh, Harry Thacker
Bush, Anita
Buttitta, Anthony J.

Calloway, Cabell "Cab"
Calverton, V. F.
Campbell, Dick
Campell, Elmer Simms
Cane
Carolina Magazine
Césaire, Aimé
Challenge
Chenault, Lawrence
Chesnutt, Charles Waddell
Chicago Defender
Chocolate Dandies, The
Civic Club Dinner, 1924
Civil Rights and Law
Clef Club
Clough, Inez

Cohen, Octavus Roy
Cole, Bob
Color
Colored Players Film Corporation
Columbia Phonograph Company
Come Along Mandy
Communist Party
Community Theater
Conjure Man Dies, The
Contempo
Cook, Will Marion
Copper Sun
Cornhill
Corrothers, James D.
Cotter, Joseph Seamon Jr.
Cotton Club
Covarrubias, Miguel
Cowdery, Mae Virginia
Cox, Ida Prather
Crescent Theater
Crisis, The
Crisis, The: Literary Prizes
Crisis, The: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium
Cullen, Countee
Cullen, Frederick Asbury
Cullen–Du Bois Wedding
Cultural Organizations
Cunard, Nancy
Cuney, Waring
Cuney-Hare, Maud

Daddy Grace
Dafora, Asadata
Damas, Léon
Dance
Dark Laughter
Dark Princess
Dark Tower
DePriest, Oscar
Dean, Lillian Harris
Delaney, Beauford
Delany, Clarissa Scott
Dett, Robert Nathaniel
Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus
Douglas, Aaron
Draper, Muriel
Dreiser, Theodore
Du Bois, W. E. B.
Dudley, Sherman H.
Dunbar Apartments

- Dunbar, Paul Laurence
Dunn, Blanche
- Eastman, Crystal
Eastman, Max
Ebony and Topaz
Eclectic Club
Edmonds, Randolph
Ellington, Duke
Ellis, Evelyn
Ellison, Ralph
Emancipator
Emperor Jones, The
Ethiopian Art Players
Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 1—Overview
Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 2—Berlin
Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 3—London
Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 4—Paris
Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 5—Soviet Union
Europe, James Reese
- Farrow, William McKnight
Father Divine
Fauset, Arthur Huff
Fauset, Jessie Redmon
Federal Programs
Federal Writers' Project
Ferris, William H.
Fetchit, Stepin
Fields, Dorothy
Fifteenth Infantry
Film
Film: Actors
Film: Black Filmmakers
Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers
Fine Clothes to the Jew
Fire!!
Fire in the Flint, The Fisher, Rudolph
580 Saint Nicholas Avenue
Fool's Errand
Ford, Arnold Josiah
Ford, James William
Forsythe, Ida
Forsythe, Harold Bruce
Fortune, Timothy Thomas
Four Saints in Three Acts
Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance
Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance
Frank, Waldo
- Frazier, E. Franklin
Fuller, Meta Warrick
- Garland Fund
Garvey, Marcus
Garveyism
Gershwin, George
Gilpin, Charles
God's Trombones
Great Migration
Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance
Green Pastures, The
Green, Paul
Greene, Lorenzo
Greenwich Village
Griggs, Sutton E.
Grimké, Angelina Weld
Gruenberg, Louis
Guardian, The
Guggenheim Fellowships
Gumby Book Studio
Gumby Book Studio Quarterly
- Hall, Adelaide
Hallelujah
Hamid, Sufi Abdul
Handy, W. C.
Harcourt Brace
Harlem: 1—Overview and History
Harlem: 2—Economics
Harlem: 3—Entertainment
Harlem: 4—Housing
Harlem: 5—Neighborhoods
Harlem: 6—Public Health
Harlem Community Players
Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life
Harlem General Hospital
Harlem Globetrotters
Harlem: Negro Metropolis
Harlem: Play
Harlem Renaissance: 1—Black Critics of
Harlem Renaissance: 2—Black Promoters of
Harlem Renaissance: 3—Legacy of
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 1—Boston
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 2—California and the West Coast
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 3—Chicago and the Midwest
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 4—Cleveland

Alphabetical List of Entries

Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 5—Kansas and the Plains States
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 6—Philadelphia
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 7—The South
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 8—Texas and the Southwest
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 9—Washington, D.C.
Harlem Shadows
Harleston, Edwin A.
Harmon Foundation
Harmon, Pappy
Harmon Traveling Exhibition
Harper Brothers
Harrington, James Carl “Hamtree”
Harrison, Hubert
Harrison, Richard
Hayden, Palmer C.
Hayden, Robert
Hayes, Roland
Haynes, George Edmund
Hearts in Dixie
Hegamin, Lucille
Henderson, Fletcher
Herskovits, Melville
Heyward, DuBose
Higher Education
Historically Black Colleges and Universities
Hobby Horse
Holiday, Billie
Holstein, Casper
Holt, Nora
Home to Harlem
Homosexuality
Horne, Frank
Hot Chocolates
House-Rent Parties
Howard University
Howells, William Dean
Hughes, Langston
Hunter, Alberta
Hunter, Eddie
Hurst, Fannie
Hurston, Zora Neale

Infants of the Spring
Inter-State Tattler
Isaacs, Edith

Jackman, Harold
Jackson, May Howard
Jazz
Jessye, Eva
Jim Crow
Johnson, Charles Spurgeon
Johnson, Fenton
Johnson, Georgia Douglas
Johnson, Hall
Johnson, Helene
Johnson, James P.
Johnson, James Weldon
Johnson, John Arthur “Jack”
Johnson, John Rosamond
Johnson, Malvin Gray
Johnson, Noble
Johnson, Sargent Claude
Johnson, William H.
Jones, Eugene Kinckle
Jones, Lois Mailou
Joplin, Scott
Jordan, Joe
Journalists
Jungle Alley

Karamu House
Kellogg, Paul U.
Kerlin, Robert
King, Billy
Kirkpatrick, Sidney
Knopf, Alfred A.
Knopf, Alfred A., Inc.
Knopf, Blanche
Krigwa Players

Labor
Lafayette Players
Lafayette Theater
Larsen, Nella
Lawrence, Jacob
Lee, Canada
Lee, George
Leslie, Lew
Lewis, Sinclair
Lewis, Theophilus
Liberator
Lincoln Motion Picture Company
Lincoln Theater
Lindsay, Vachel
Lippincott, J. B., Publisher
Literary and Artistic Prizes

- Literary Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance
 Literature: 1—Overview
 Literature: 2—Children’s
 Literature: 3—Drama
 Literature: 4—Fiction
 Literature: 5—Humor and Satire
 Literature: 6—Nonfiction
 Literature: 7—Poetry
 Little Theater Tournament
 Liveright, Horace
 Liza
 Locke, Alain
 Loggins, Vernon
 Lovinggood, Penman
 Lowe, James
 Lulu Belle
 Lyles, Aubrey
 Lynching
 Lynching: Silent Protest Parade
 Lyrical Left
- Mabley, Jackie “Moms”
 Macaulay
 Mack, Cecil
 Madame Sul-Te-Wan
 Madame X
 Madden, Owen Vincent “Owney”
 Magazines and Journals
 Manhattan Casino
 Maran, René
 Mason, Charlotte Osgood
 Matheus, John Frederick
 Matthews, Ralph
 McClendon, Rose
 McGuire, George Alexander
 McKay, Claude
 McKinney, Nina Mae
 Mencken, H. L.
 Messenger, The
 Meyer, Annie Nathan
 Micheaux, Oscar
 Miller, Flournoy
 Miller, Irvin
 Miller, Kelly
 Miller, Quintard
 Mills, Florence
 Minstrelsy
 Mitchell, Abbie
 Modern Quarterly
 Modernism
- Moore, Frederick Randolph
 Moore, Richard B.
 Moore, Tim
 Morand, Paul
 Moreland, Mantan
 Morrison, Frederick Ernest
 Morton, Ferdinand Q.
 Morton, Jelly Roll
 Motley, Archibald J. Jr.
 Moton, Robert Russa
 Mulatto
 Murphy, Carl J.
 Muse, Clarence
 Music
 Music: Bands and Orchestras
 Musical Theater
 Musicians
- Nail, John E.
 Nance, Ethel Ray
 Nation, The
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
 National Association of Negro Musicians
 National Colored Players
 National Ethiopian Art Theater
 National Negro Business League
 National Urban League
 Negritude
 Negro: An Anthology
 Negro Art Institute
 Negro Art Theater
 Negro Experimental Theater
 Negro World
 Negrotarians
 Nelson, Alice Dunbar
 New Challenge
 New Deal
 New Masses
 New Negro
 New Negro Art Theater
 New Negro Movement
 New Negro, The
 New York Age
 Niagara Movement
 Nigger
 Nigger Heaven
 Niggerati
 Nightclubs
 Nightlife
 Not without Laughter

Alphabetical List of Entries

- Nugent, Richard Bruce
Numbers Racket
- Oliver, Joseph “King”
On Trial
135th Street Library
O’Neill, Eugene
Opportunity
Opportunity Awards Dinner
Opportunity Literary Contests
Organized Crime
Ory, Edward “Kid”
Ovington, Mary White
Owen, Chandler
- Pa Williams’ Gal
Pace, Harry H.
Pace Phonographic Corporation
Padmore, George
Palms
Pan-African Congresses
Pan-Africanism
Party Politics
Passing
Passing: Novel
Patterson, Louise Thompson
Payton, Philip A.
Peterkin, Julia Mood
Peterson, Dorothy Randolph
Philanthropy and Philanthropic Organizations
Pickens, William
Pittsburgh Courier
Poetry: Dialect
Politics and Politicians
Porgy and Bess
Porgy: Novel
Porgy: Play
Porter, James Amos
Powell, Adam Clayton, Sr.
Preer, Evelyn
Primitivism
Professional Sports and Black Athletes
Prophet, Nancy Elizabeth
Provincetown Players
Publishers and Publishing Houses
- Quicksand
- Race Films
Race Men
Rachel
- Racial Iconography
Racial Stereotyping
Racial Violence: Riots and Lynching
Racism
Rainey, Gertrude “Ma”
Randolph, A. Philip
Razaf, Andy
Redding, J. Saunders
Reiss, Winold
Religion
Religious Organizations
Renaissance Casino
Revue Nègre, La
Richardson, Willis
Riots: 1—Overview, 1917–1921
Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919
Riots: 3—Tulsa, 1921
Riots: 4—Harlem Riot, 1935
Robeson, Paul
Robinson, Bill “Bojangles”
Rogers, Joel Augustus
Roseland Ballroom
Rosenwald Fellowships
Runnin’ Wild
- Saint Louis Blues
Saint Mark’s Methodist Episcopal Church
Saint Philip’s Protestant Episcopal Church
Salons
San Juan Hill
Saturday Evening Quill
Savage, Augusta
Savoy Ballroom
Schomburg, Arthur A.
Schuyler, George S.
Scott, Emmett Jay
Scott, William Edouard
Scottsboro
Second Harlem Renaissance
Senghor, Léopold
Servant in the House, The Seven Arts
Shipp, Jesse A.
Show Boat
Shuffle Along
Singers
Sissle, Noble
Small’s Paradise
Smith, Ada
Smith, Bessie
Smith, Clara

Smith, Mamie
 Smith, Trixie
 Smith, Willie "the Lion"
 Snow, Valaida
 Social-Fraternal Organizations
 Spencer, Anne
 Spingarn, Arthur
 Spingarn, Joel
 Spingarn Medal
 Spirituals
 Spivey, Victoria
 Stevedore
 Still, William Grant
 Stribling, Thomas Sigismund
 Strivers' Row
 Stylus
 Sugar Hill
 Survey Graphic

 Taboo
 Talbert, Mary Burnett
 Talented Tenth
 Tannenbaum, Frank
 Tanner, Henry Ossawa
 Tenderloin
 Theater
 Theater Owners' Booking Association
 Their Eyes Were Watching God
 There Is Confusion
 They Shall Not Die
 Thomas, Edna Lewis
 Three Plays for a Negro Theater
 Thurman, Wallace
 Tolson, Melvin B.
 Toomer, Jean
 Tree of Hope
 Tri-Arts Club
 Tropic Death
 Trotter, William Monroe
 Tucker, Earl "Snakehips"
 Tuskegee Experiment
 267 House

 United Colored Democracy
 Universal Negro Improvement Association
 Utopia Players

 Van Der Zee, James
 Van Doren, Carl

 Van Vechten, Carl
 Vanguard
 Vanity Fair
 Vann, Robert Lee
 Vaudeville
 Viking Press
 Villard, Oswald Garrison
 Visual Arts

 Walker, A'Lelia
 Walker, Madame C. J.
 Walker, Margaret
 Waller, Thomas "Fats"
 Walls of Jericho, The
 Walrond, Eric
 Walton, Lester
 Wanamaker Award
 Ward, Aida
 Waring, Laura Wheeler
 Washington, Booker T.
 Washington, Fredi
 Washington, Isabel
 Waters, Ethel
 Weary Blues, The
 West, Dorothy
 White, Clarence Cameron
 White Novelists and the Harlem
 Renaissance
 White Patronage
 White, Walter
 Williams, Clarence
 Williams, Edward Christopher
 Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"
 Wilson, Arthur "Dooley"
 Wilson, Edith
 Wilson, Frank
 Wise, Stephen Samuel
 Within Our Gates
 Witmark, M., and Sons
 Woodruff, Hale
 Woodson, Carter G.
 Work, Monroe Nathan
 Workers' Dreadnought
 Works Progress Administration
 World War I
 Wright, Louis T.
 Wright, Richard

 Yerby, Frank

PAGE xx BLANK

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

PERSONS

Actors

Anderson, Edmund Lincoln
Brooks, Clarence
Bubbles, John
Bush, Anita
Campbell, Dick
Dudley, Sherman H.
Dunn, Blanche
Fetchit, Stepin
Gilpin, Charles
Harrington, James Carl "Hamtree"
Harrison, Richard
Hunter, Eddie
Kirkpatrick, Sidney
Lee, Canada
Mabley, Jackie "Moms"
Madame Sul-Te-Wan
McClendon, Rose
McKinney, Nina Mae
Moore, Tim
Morrison, Frederick Ernest
Preer, Evelyn
Robeson, Paul
Sissle, Noble
Thomas, Edna Lewis
Washington, Fredi
Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"
Wilson, Arthur "Dooley"
Wilson, Frank

Artists

Alston, Charles
Barthé, Richmond
Bearden, Romare
Covarrubias, Miguel
Delaney, Beauford
Douglas, Aaron
Farrow, William McKnight
Fuller, Meta Warrick
Harleston, Edwin A.
Hayden, Palmer C.
Jackson, May Howard
Johnson, Malvin Gray
Johnson, Sargent Claude
Johnson, William H.
Jones, Lois Mailou
Lawrence, Jacob
Motley, Archibald J. Jr.
Porter, James Amos
Prophet, Nancy Elizabeth
Reiss, Winold
Savage, Augusta
Scott, William Edouard
Tanner, Henry Ossawa
Van Der Zee, James
Waring, Laura Wheeler
Woodruff, Hale

Dancers

Dafora, Asadata
Forsythe, Ida

Thematic List of Entries

Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"
Tucker, Earl "Snakehips"

Filmmakers and Celebrities

Beavers, Louise
Chenault, Lawrence
Ellis, Evelyn
Johnson, Noble
Lowe, James
Micheaux, Oscar
Moreland, Mantan
Muse, Clarence

Personalities

Dean, Lillian Harris
Harmon, Pappy
Holt, Nora
Jackman, Harold
Madden, Owen Vincent "Owney"
Peterson, Dorothy Randolph
Walker, A'Lelia

Journalists

Abbott, Robert Sengstacke
Baker, Ray Stannard
Barnett, Ida B. Wells
Bruce, John Edward
Ferris, William H.
Fortune, Timothy Thomas
Matthews, Ralph
Murphy, Carl J.
Vann, Robert Lee
Walton, Lester

Musicians

Armstrong, Louis
Bechet, Sidney
Blake, Eubie
Bradford, Perry
Calloway, Cabell "Cab"
Cole, Bob
Cook, Will Marion
Cuney-Hare, Maud
Dett, Robert Nathaniel
Ellington, Duke
Europe, James Reese
Fields, Dorothy
Forsythe, Harold Bruce
Gershwin, George
Gruenberg, Louis

Handy, W. C.
Henderson, Fletcher
Jessye, Eva
Johnson, Hall
Johnson, James P.
Johnson, John Rosamond
Joplin, Scott
Jordan, Joe
Mack, Cecil
Morton, Jelly Roll
Oliver, Joseph "King"
Ory, Edward "Kid"
Razaf, Andy
Smith, Willie "the Lion"
Still, William Grant
Waller, Thomas "Fats"
White, Clarence Cameron
Williams, Clarence

Playwrights

Anderson, Garland
Anderson, Regina M.
Edmonds, Randolph
Green, Paul
Heyward, DuBose
Lyles, Aubrey
Miller, Flournoy
Miller, Irvin
Miller, Quintard
O'Neill, Eugene
Richardson, Willis

Politics and Culture

Ali, Duse Mohamed
Anderson, Charles W.
Becton, George Wilson
Bethune, Mary McLeod
Boas, Franz
Briggs, Cyril
Brown, Hallie Quinn
Cullen, Frederick Asbury
Daddy Grace
De Priest, Oscar
Domingo, Wilfrid Adolphus
Du Bois, W. E. B.
Father Divine
Fauset, Arthur Huff
Ford, Arnold Josiah
Ford, James William
Frazier, E. Franklin
Garvey, Marcus

Greene, Lorenzo
 Hamid, Sufi Abdul
 Harrison, Hubert
 Haynes, George Edmund
 Herskovits, Melville
 Johnson, Charles Spurgeon
 Johnson, James Weldon
 Johnson, John Arthur
 Jones, Eugene Knickle
 McGuire, George Alexander
 Mencken, H. L.
 Miller, Kelly
 Moore, Frederick Randolph
 Moore, Richard B.
 Morton, Ferdinand Q.
 Moton, Robert Russa
 Nail, John E.
 Ovington, Mary White
 Owen, Chandler
 Padmore, George
 Patterson, Louise Thompson
 Payton, Philip A.
 Powell, Adam Clayton, Sr.
 Randolph, A. Philip
 Rogers, Joel Augustus
 Schomburg, Arthur A.
 Scott, Emmett Jay
 Spingarn, Arthur
 Talbert, Mary Burnett
 Trotter, William Monroe
 Villard, Oswald Garrison
 Walker, Madame C. J.
 Washington, Booker T.
 Wise, Stephen Samuel
 Woodson, Carter G.
 Work, Monroe Nathan
 Wright, Louis T.

Promoters and Patrons

Barnes, Albert C.
 Braithwaite, William Stanley
 Brawley, Benjamin
 Campell, Elmer Simms
 Cunard, Nancy
 Draper, Muriel
 Holstein, Casper
 Locke, Alain
 Loggins, Vernon
 Mason, Charlotte Osgood
 Meyer, Annie Nathan

Nance, Ethel Ray
 Redding, J. Saunders
 Van Vechten, Carl

Publishers

Buttitta, Anthony J.
 Calverton, V. F.
 Eastman, Crystal
 Eastman, Max
 Isaacs, Edith
 Kellogg, Paul U.
 Knopf, Alfred A.
 Knopf, Blanche
 Liveright, Horace
 Pace, Harry H.
 Spingarn, Joel
 Van Doren, Carl

Singers

Anderson, Marian
 Baker, Josephine
 Bentley, Gladys
 Bledsoe, Jules
 Brooks, Shelton
 Brown, Ada
 Burleigh, Harry Thacker
 Clough, Inez
 Cox, Ida Prather
 Hall, Adelaide
 Hayes, Roland
 Hegamin, Lucille
 Holiday, Billie
 Hunter, Alberta
 Lovinggood, Penman
 Mills, Florence
 Mitchell, Abbie
 Rainey, Gertrude "Ma"
 Smith, Ada
 Smith, Bessie
 Smith, Clara
 Smith, Mamie
 Smith, Trixie
 Snow, Valaida
 Spivey, Victoria
 Ward, Aida
 Washington, Isabel
 Waters, Ethel
 Wilson, Edith

Thematic List of Entries

Theater Owners

King, Billy
Leslie, Lew
Lewis, Theophilus
McClendon, Rose
Shipp, Jesse A.

Writers

Anderson, Sherwood
Attaway, William
Bennett, Gwendolyn
Bonner, Marieta
Bontemps, Arna
Brooks, Gwendolyn
Brown, Sterling
Césaire, Aimé
Chesnutt, Charles Waddell
Cohen, Octavus Roy
Corrothers, James D.
Cotter, Joseph Seamon Jr.
Cowdery, Mae Virginia
Cullen, Countee
Cuney, Waring
Damas, Léon
Delany, Clarissa Scott
Dreiser, Theodore
Dunbar, Paul Laurence
Ellison, Ralph
Fauset, Jessie Redmon
Fisher, Rudolph
Frank, Waldo
Griggs, Sutton E.
Grimké, Angelina Weld
Hayden, Robert
Horne, Frank
Howells, William Dean
Hughes, Langston
Hurst, Fannie
Hurston, Zora Neale
Johnson, Fenton
Johnson, Georgia Douglas
Johnson, Helene
Kerlin, Robert
Larsen, Nella
Lee, George
Lewis, Sinclair
Lindsay, Vachel
Maran, René
Matheus, John Frederick
McKay, Claude

Morand, Paul
Nelson, Alice Dunbar
Nugent, Richard Bruce
Peterkin, Julia Mood
Pickens, William
Schuyler, George S.
Senghor, Léopold
Spencer, Anne
Stribling, Thomas Sigismund
Tannenbaum, Frank
Thurman, Wallace
Tolson, Melvin B.
Toomer, Jean
Walker, Margaret
Walrond, Eric
West, Dorothy
White, Walter
Williams, Edward Christopher
Wright, Richard
Yerby, Frank

WORKS

Plays, Films, Theater Productions

Amos 'n' Andy
Appearances
Birth of a Nation, The Birth of a Race, The
Black and White
Blackbirds
Chocolate Dandies, The
Come Along Mandy
Emperor Jones, The
Fool's Errand
Four Saints in Three Acts
Green Pastures, The
Hallelujah
Harlem: Play
Hearts in Dixie
Hot Chocolates
Liza
Lulu Belle
Madame X
Mulatto
On Trial
Pa Williams' Gal
Porgy and Bess
Porgy: Play
Rachel
Revue Nègre, La

Runnin' Wild
 Saint Louis Blues
 Servant in the House, The Show Boat
 Shuffle Along
 Stevedore
 Taboo
 They Shall Not Die
 Three Plays for a Negro Theater
 Within Our Gates

Books

Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, The Batouala
 Birthright
 Black Manhattan
 Blues: An Anthology
 Cane
 Color
 Conjure Man Dies, The Copper Sun
 Dark Laughter
 Dark Princess
 Ebony and Topaz
 Fine Clothes to the Jew
 Fire in the Flint, The
 God's Trombones
 Harlem: Negro Metropolis
 Harlem Shadows
 Home to Harlem
 Infants of the Spring
 Negro: An Anthology
 New Negro, The
 Nigger
 Nigger Heaven
 Not Without Laughter
 Passing: Novel
 Porgy: Novel
 Quicksand
 Their Eyes Were Watching God
 There Is Confusion
 Tropic Death
 Walls of Jericho, The Weary Blues, The

TOPICS

Topics, Concepts, Ideologies, Events, Themes

Algonquin Roundtable
 Amenia Conference, 1916

Amenia Conference, 1933
 Anglophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance
 Anglophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance
 Antilynching Crusade
 Art Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance
 Artists
 Atlanta University Studies
 Authors: 1—Overview
 Authors: 2—Fiction
 Authors: 3—Nonfiction
 Authors: 4— Playwrights
 Authors: 5—Poets
 Black Bohemia
 Black History and Historiography
 Black Press
 Black Zionism
 Blackface Performance
 Blacks in Theater
 Blues
 Blues: Women Performers
 Civic Club Dinner, 1924
 Civil Rights and Law
 Community Theater
 Crisis, The: Literary Prizes
 Crisis: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be
 Portrayed? A Symposium
 Cullen–Du Bois Wedding
 Cultural Organizations
 Dance
 Dark Tower
 Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 1—Overview
 Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 2—Berlin
 Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 3—London
 Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 4—Paris
 Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 5—Soviet Union
 Federal Programs
 Federal Writers' Project
 Film
 Film: Actors
 Film: Black Filmmakers
 Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers
 Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance
 Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance
 Garveyism
 Great Migration
 Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance
 Gumby Book Studio
 Harlem: 1—Overview and History
 Harlem: 2—Economics
 Harlem: 3—Entertainment
 Harlem: 4—Housing

Thematic List of Entries

Harlem: 5—Neighborhoods
Harlem: 6—Public Health
Harlem Renaissance: 1—Black Critics of
Harlem Renaissance: 2—Black Promoters of
Harlem Renaissance: 3—Legacy of
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 1—Boston
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 2—California and the West Coast
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 3—Chicago and the Midwest
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 4—Cleveland
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 5—Kansas and the Plains States
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 6—Philadelphia
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 7—The South
Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 8—Texas and the Southwest
Harlem Renaissance in the
 United States: 9—Washington, D.C.
Higher Education
Homosexuality
House-Rent Parties
Jazz
Jim Crow
Journalists
Labor
Literary and Artistic Prizes
Literary Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance
Literature: 1—Overview
Literature: 2—Children's Literature: 3—Drama
Literature: 4—Fiction
Literature: 5—Humor and Satire
Literature: 6—Nonfiction
Literature: 7—Poetry
Little Theater Tournament
Lynching
Lynching: Silent Protest Parade
Lyrical Left
Magazines and Journals
Minstrelsy
Modernism
Music
Music: Bands and Orchestras
Musical Theater
Musicians
Negritude
Negrotarians
New Negro
New Negro Movement
Niagara Movement
Niggerati
Nightclubs
Nightlife
Numbers Racket
Opportunity Awards Dinner
Opportunity Literary Contests
Organized Crime
Pan-African Congresses
Pan-Africanism
Passing
Philanthropy and Philanthropic Organizations
Poetry: Dialect
Politics and Politicians
Primitivism
Professional Sports and Black Athletes
Publishers and Publishing Houses
Race Films
Race Men
Racial Iconography
Racial Stereotyping
Racial Violence: Riots and Lynching
Racism
Religion
Religious Organizations
Riots: 1—Overview, 1917–1921
Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919
Riots: 3—Tulsa, 1921
Riots: 4—Harlem Riot, 1935
Salons
Scottsboro
Second Harlem Renaissance
Singers
Social-Fraternal Organizations
Spirituals
Talented Tenth
Theater
Tuskegee Experiment
Vaudeville
Visual Arts
White Novelists and the Harlem
 Renaissance
White Patronage
World War I

Higher Education

Historically Black Colleges and Universities
Howard University

Nightlife

Clef Club
Cotton Club
Small's Paradise

Philanthropy

Boni and Liveright Prize
Garland Fund
Guggenheim Fellowships
Harmon Foundation
Rosenwald Fellowships
Spingarn Medal
Wanamaker Award

Places

Abyssinian Baptist Church
Alhambra Theater
Apollo Theater
Black and Tan Clubs
Crescent Theater
Dunbar Apartments
580 Saint Nicholas Avenue
Greenwich Village
Harlem General Hospital
Hobby Horse
Jungle Alley
Lafayette Theater
Lincoln Theater
Manhattan Casino
135th Street Library
Renaissance Casino
Roseland Ballroom
Saint Mark's Methodist Episcopal Church
Saint Philip's Protestant
Episcopal Church
San Juan Hill
Savoy Ballroom
Strivers' Row
Sugar Hill
Tenderloin
Tree of Hope
267 House

Politics

Communist Party
New Deal
Party Politics

ORGANIZATIONS

Businesses

Afro-American Realty Company
Black Star Line
Black Swan Phonograph Company
Colored Players Film Corporation
Columbia Phonograph Company
Lincoln Motion Picture Company
Pace Phonographic Corporation

General

African Blood Brotherhood
American Negro Labor Congress
Association for the Study of Negro Life and History
and Journal of Negro History
Booklovers Club
Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters
Eclectic Club
Fifteenth Infantry
Harlem Globetrotters
Harmon Traveling Exhibition
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People
National Association of Negro Musicians
National Negro Business League
National Urban League
Negro Art Institute
Theater Owners' Booking Association
United Colored Democracy
Universal Negro Improvement Association
Vanguard
Works Progress Administration

Publishers

Boni and Liveright
Brimmer, B. J., Publishing House
Cornhill
Harcourt Brace
Harper Brothers
Knopf, Alfred A., Inc.
Lippincott, J. B., Publisher
Macaulay

Thematic List of Entries

Viking Press
Witmark, M., and Sons

Theater Companies

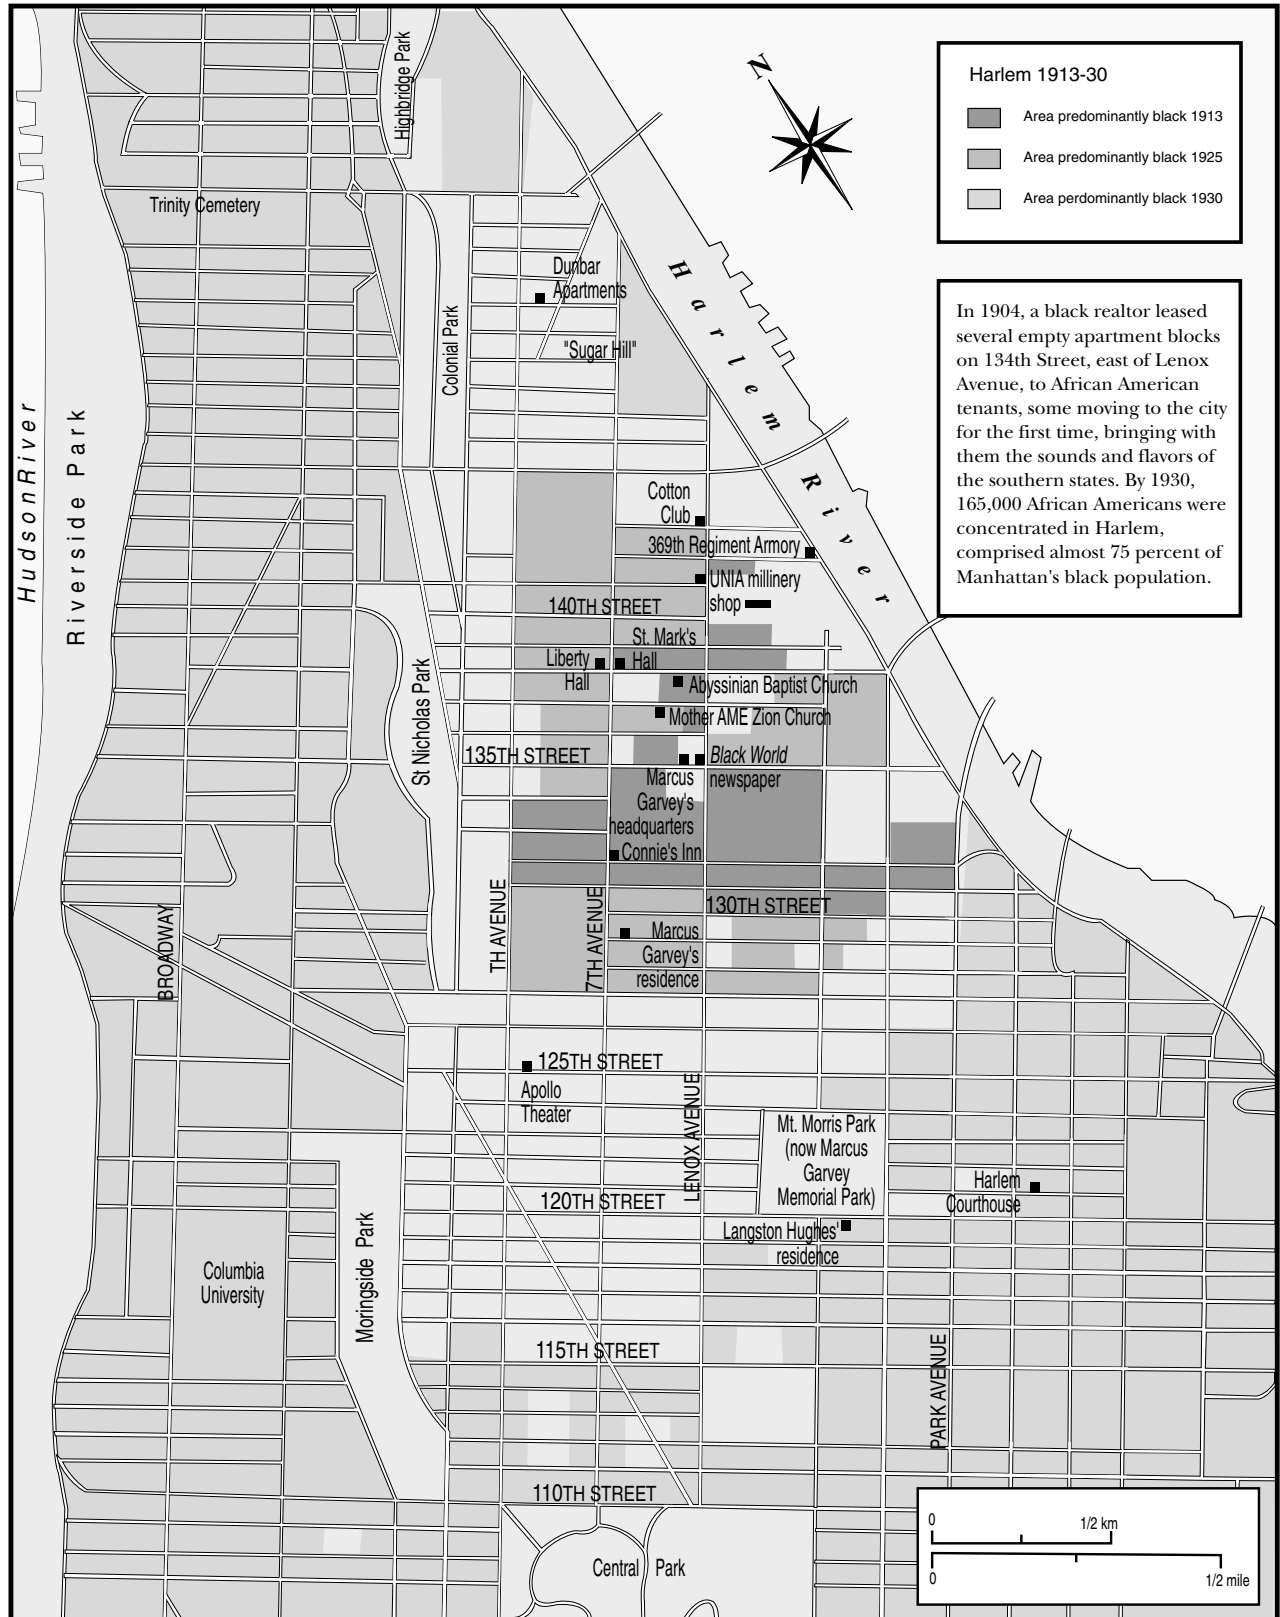

Anita Bush Theater Company
Ethiopian Art Players
Harlem Community Players
Karamu House
Krigwa Players
Lafayette Players
National Colored Players
National Ethiopian Art Theater
Negro Art Theater
Negro Experimental Theater
New Negro Art Theater
Provincetown Players
Tri-Arts Club
Utopia Players

PERIODICALS

American Mercury
Amsterdam News
Associated Negro Press
Baltimore Afro-American
Black Opals
Booklovers Magazine
Broom

Brownies' Book, The Carolina Magazine
Challenge
Chicago Defender
Contempo
Crisis, The Emancipator
Fire!!
Guardian, The
Gumby Book Studio Quarterly
Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life
Inter-State Tattler
Liberator
Messenger, The Modern Quarterly
Nation, The
Negro World
New Challenge
New Masses
New York Age
Opportunity
Palms
Pittsburgh Courier
Saturday Evening Quill
Seven Arts
Survey Graphic
Stylus
Vanity Fair
Workers' Dreadnought

MAP

PAGE xxx BLANK

Abbott, Robert Sengstacke

Robert Sengstacke Abbott was born in Fredericka, Saint Simon's Island, Georgia. His parents—Thomas, his father; and Flora, his mother—were both former slaves who worked in agriculture. As a youngster, Abbott became interested in the situation of African Americans when his stepfather, John Hermann Henry Sengstacke, encouraged him to consider the plight of former slaves. Abbott had to struggle to get an education. During his time in law school, he reinvented himself by taking Sengstacke's surname as his own middle name and concentrating on the practice of law.

In 1905, Abbott used twenty-five dollars to start the Chicago Defender in his home on State Street, proudly announcing the newspaper as the "World's Greatest Weekly." His entrance into journalism was evidently a result of disappointment with law. Several stories explain his sudden change of career. According to one story, he had been told that he was too dark to succeed in Chicago's courts; according to a second, he could not pass the Illinois bar; according to a third, he never really made much money in law and needed to earn his living some other way.

At first, the Chicago Defender was a one-man operation. When the earliest versions appeared, Abbott was serving as editor, business manager, and staff and tried to sell the paper to homes along Twenty-ninth and Twenty-fifth streets in Chicago. These original versions consisted of only four pages, printed in his kitchen. The first few years of operation saw modest growth. Abbott encouraged friends to write columns, and he increased the paper's circulation by selling it in local barbershops, churches, and pool halls—places that he also used, brilliantly, as sources of news. Through these venues the Defender was able to gain a reputation as the voice of Chicago's African American community.

Abbott used the Defender to fight against discrimination, segregation, and disenfranchisement. It became a protest newspaper, highly respected among African Americans in and around Chicago. The Defender reported abuses against African Americans and focused on unfair treatment of minorities. It developed a controversial reputation because Abbott published articles on police brutality, racial violence, and bigotry against African Americans. Also, Abbott had copied the masthead of William Randolph Hearst's Chicago Evening American; this often confused readers, and he was eventually forced to change the masthead to avoid a lawsuit.

The most important factor in the growth and expansion of the Chicago Defender was the mass migration of African Americans from the South after 1915. These emigrants bought the Defender and sent it South to relatives, transforming it into a national paper. The Defender encouraged African Americans to fight back against racism and injustice. It responded to lynching by adopting the slogan "An eye for an eye" in 1916. By 1917, the paper was encouraging African Americans to leave the South and settle in what Abbott called the "promised land," the North.

Abbott used his success as a newspaperman to become part of Chicago's African American elite. In 1917, he joined other leading African Americans—although unsuccessfully—in trying to make real estate agreements that would be acceptable to whites. The Defender supported African American strikebreakers against the American Federation of Labor because the union discriminated against African Americans. The paper accused the police and local leaders of failing to enforce the law and failing to investigate crimes against African Americans, particularly a rash of bombings: During the migration period of 1917–1921, there were fifty-eight unsolved bombings of African Americans' dwellings.

By 1918, the huge migration had increased the Defender's circulation dramatically, to well more than 230,000. At one time the Defender opposed the migration because Abbott feared the effect of the emigrants on the morals and social standing of Chicago's black community. However, he later switched sides and began to write columns of advice—do's and don'ts—aimed at emigrants. Abbott used his paper to criticize the Jamaican leader Marcus Garvey and Garvey's movement; he also joined a group of prominent African Americans in encouraging the attorney general to investigate that movement.

During the Red Summer of 1919, the Defender played an invaluable role by presenting the African American side of the story. Abbott was rewarded for his actions during the riot by being named to the Chicago Commission on Race Relations, which issued a report, The Negro in Chicago, in 1922. Abbott supported this report, even though it criticized the African American press for overreacting to the riot.

During the 1920s and 1930s, Abbott lent his name and prestige to several causes, including most of the major efforts to improve the condition of African Americans in and around Chicago. He was a board member of the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), National Urban League, Hampton Alumni Association, Masons, and Lincoln Memorial Congregational Church. For most of his life, he was politically aligned with the Republican Party. He publicly supported Oscar DePriest, the first African American elected to Congress from the North.

After Abbott's death, the Defender was run by his nephew John Sengstacke.

Biography

Robert Sengstacke Abbott was born on 28 November 1868. He attended Beach Institute in Savannah; Claflin University in Orangeburg, South Carolina; and, from 1892 to 1896, Hampton Institute, where he learned the printer's trade. After completing his studies at Hampton, he earned an LL.B. at Kent College of Law in Chicago. He practiced law in Gary, Indiana, and Topeka, Kansas, before retuning to Chicago in 1903. He started the Chicago Defender in 1905. Abbott was married twice, each time to a widow. His first marriage, on 18 September 1918, was to Helen Thornton Morrison; they were divorced in June 1933. In August 1934 he married Edna Rose Brown Denison, who had five grown children. Abbott died in Chicago on 29 February 1940, of Bright's disease; he was eulogized by all the major papers of Chicago and the New York Times.

ABEL A. BARTLEY

See also Black Press; DePriest, Oscar; Garvey, Marcus; Garveyism; Journalists; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919

Further Reading

Bontemps, Arna, and Jack Conroy. Anyplace But Here. New York: Hill and Wang, 1966.

Ottley, Roi. The Lonely Warrior: The Life and Times of Robert S. Abbott. Chicago, Ill.: Regnery, 1955.

Tuttle, William. Race Riot: Chicago in the Red Summer of 1919. New York: Atheneum, 1970.

Abyssinian Baptist Church

The Abyssinian Baptist Church is internationally recognized as a symbol of black spiritual and political power. During the Harlem Renaissance, Abyssinian relocated uptown, after having made several expansive moves from lower Manhattan.

The church was founded in 1808, when a group of African Americans at the Gold Street Baptist Church decided that they would no longer accept segregated pews. After their initial application for autonomy was rejected as too threatening, a core group of four men and twelve women invited Thomas Paul, who had founded the Joy Street Baptist Church in Boston a few years earlier, to petition church officials. Paul, an African American preacher of great renown, prevailed, and the necessary papers were granted. Some Ethiopian merchants in the founding group suggested the name Abyssinian. In its early years, the church moved often. It remained for several years on Anthony Street (now Worth Street), then moved to the Broadway Tabernacle, and later moved to Thompson and Spring streets, all the while following the progression of the African American population northward through the city.

During the 1840s, the church took a strong—and, at the time, radical—stand against slavery. At the turn of the century, Abyssinian owned church property on Waverly Place in Greenwich Village. In the first decade of the twentieth century, the church moved again and acquired additional property on Fortieth Street in the Tenderloin section.

In 1908, when the church could look back on its first hundred years, Adam Clayton Powell Sr. assumed leadership. For roughly the next three decades, he would guide Abyssinian through its most expansive period. He was at the helm when the congregation erected a church on 138th Street in Harlem in the early 1920s, then discharged its indebtedness to the bank about a decade earlier than required. The Gothic and Tudor structure with its imported stained-glass windows, fully paid for through tithing contributions from parishioners, represented the solidity and fidelity of the church membership, which had more than doubled, expanding from 3,000 to 7,000 during the 1920s through 1937, when Powell retired.

Then Powell's only son, Adam Clayton Powell Jr., stepped into the pulpit. He drew new attention to the church and inspired new energy. From the foundation his father had built, the son was able to extend the Abyssinian ministry further into the realm of politics. The younger Powell led a highly publicized labor protest to pressure white owners of stores on 125th Street to employ African Americans. A few years after becoming pastor at Abyssinian, Powell was elected to the City Council. His next step was Congress, where he served fourteen terms in the House of Representatives, championing the legal and social rights of African Americans.

Funeral at the Abyssinian Baptist Church, 1920s. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Like the founders of Abyssinian, he never shrank from protesting against injustice or from the light of publicity.

Following the younger Powell's tenure and that of Pastor Samuel Proctor, Rev. Calvin Butts maintained the church's respected status into the twenty-first century.

BARBARA BREWSTER LEWIS

See also Powell, Adam Clayton Sr.

Further Reading

Baer, Hans A., and Merrill Singer. African-American Religion in the Twentieth Century: Varieties of Protest and Accommodation. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Billingsley, Andrew. Mighty Like a River: The Black Church and Social Reform. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Gore, Bob. The Abyssinian Baptist Church: A Photographic Journal. New York: Stewart, Tabor, and Chang, 2001.

Haskins, Jim. Adam Clayton Powell: Portrait of a Marching Black. Trenton, N.J.: First Africa World Press, 1993.

Powell, Adam Clayton. Against the Tide: An Autobiography. New York: R. R. Smith, 1938.

Sobel, Mechal. Travelin' On: The Slave Journey to an Afro-Baptist Faith. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1979.

African Blood Brotherhood

The Blood Brotherhood was created by Cyril Valentine Briggs, a Jamaican African nationalist and socialist. Briggs was born on 28 May 1888 in Chester Park, Nevis, British West Indies. He had a very light complexion and was called the "angry blond Negro" in some newspapers. He worked in the printing trade in Saint Kitts and was inspired by the works of the social critic Robert Green Ingersoll (1833–1899), the "great agnostic," who attacked not only religion but also much else that was dear to Americans.

Briggs immigrated to the United States in July 1905. In 1912 he was hired as a writer by the New Amsterdam News. In 1915 he served one term as editor of the Colored American Review, the mouthpiece of Harlem's black business community. Briggs's writings emphasized racial pride and economic cooperation. Briggs was impressed by the Easter Rebellion of 1916 in Ireland and began to discuss plans for the decolonization of Africa. During World War I, as a reporter for the New Amsterdam News, he was an outspoken critic of what he considered to be the United States' hypocritical aims. Because of his denunciations of American policies regarding African American soldiers and citizens, the paper was officially censored by the federal government. The issue of 12 March 1919 was detained by the U.S. Post Office because of an editorial written by Briggs in which he denounced the League of Nations as a "league of thieves." In May 1919, Briggs severed his ties with the New Amsterdam News.

A few months earlier, in December 1918, Briggs had begun publishing the Crusader. This newspaper emphasized self-government for African Americans, and Africa for the Africans. It focused on and expressed the ideas of the radical element in the New Negro movement.

After the events of the Red Summer of 1919, Briggs and others came to believe that protecting African American rights required armed resistance. His ideas fit the postwar New Negro movement. The racial violence that followed the war shocked African Americans and made them more aware of their vulnerability. Briggs's response was the African Blood Brotherhood for African Liberation and Redemption (ABB), created in October 1919 after an article was published in the Crusader. ABB was made up principally of native Caribbeans, young intellectuals, workers, veterans, and marginal businessmen, and it preached radical revolution; thus it was never able to gain a mass following. Briggs envisioned ABB as an alternative for those who were sophisticated enough to resist the hollow charm of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA).

At its peak, ABB claimed to have 3,500 members and more than 100 branches. However, membership was by enlistment only, and it is virtually impossible to determine the number of members accurately. After 1920, when the leadership of ABB came under communist influence, the Crusader—the organization's official mouthpiece—became increasingly anticapitalist, focusing less on African issues and more on the benefits of bolshevism.

Briggs was recruited into the Communist Party with the help of another West Indian, Claude McKay. McKay introduced Briggs to Robert Minor, a famous cartoonist from Texas; and Rose Pastor Stokes, a leading Jewish activist. They were committed to the struggle for black liberation, and they convinced Briggs of the concept of parallel communism: that is, two communist parties—one legal and aboveground, the other secret and underground. As a result, during the 1920s, Briggs increasingly moved his movement toward communism and began to give his rhetoric communist overtones.

Originally, ABB was a semisecret organization with a highly centralized governing structure. Although its name was derived from the blood brotherhood ceremonies of African peoples, ABB was actually modeled after the Irish Republican Brotherhood, which dated from 1858 and led to the Fenian movement. Briggs was also impressed by the Hamitic League, with its system of passwords, secrecy, and oaths. The Hamitic League was founded by George Wells Parker of Omaha, Nebraska; and the Crusader, in its first few issues, proclaimed itself the publicity organ of the league.

Briggs served as the executive head of ABB, sharing power with the supreme executive council, which included Ben Burrell (director of historical research), Richard Moore (educational director), Theo Burrell (secretary), Otto Huiswoud (national organizer), W. A. Domingo (director of publicity and propaganda), Grace P. Campbell (director of consumers cooperatives), and William H. Jones (physical director).

ABB was the first black organization in the twentieth century to advocate armed self-defense. It came to national prominence in June 1921, when about 500 of its members—armed with shotguns—surrounded a jail in Tulsa, Oklahoma, to protect Dick Rowland, an African American shoeshine boy who had been accused of assaulting a white woman. In response, white mobs raided gun stores, randomly attacked African Americans, and eventually burned and looted the black section of Tulsa. ABB was widely blamed for this racial violence, but Briggs defended his organization's actions in Tulsa as community self-defense.

In 1921–1924 the leaders of ABB concentrated on criticizing Marcus Garvey and his UNIA. In 1921, at the national convention of UNIA, members of ABB had lobbied outside Liberty Hall, seeking an official link to Garvey's organization, but the UNIA delegates had ignored them. In 1922, Briggs stopped publishing the Crusader, creating the Crusader News Agency in its wake. In 1924, ABB was an official participant in a movement called Negro Sanhedrin, which met in Chicago under the leadership of Kelly Miller. Miller wanted to create a federation of black organizations that could coordinate protest activities and develop a unified agenda.

In 1925, ABB was disbanded on orders of the Communist Party of the United States. It was replaced by the American Negro Labor Congress and the League of Struggle for Negro Rights. Symbolically, ABB had been a very important organization. Its insistence on African American rights and protection had placed it in the forefront of the New Negro and black liberation movements. Although its tangible accomplishments were negligible, its psychological effects continue today.

ABEL BARTLEY

See also Briggs, Cyril; Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus; Garvey, Marcus; Jones, William H.; McKay, Claude; Miller, Kelly; Moore, Richard B.; New Negro Movement; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919

Further Reading

Foner, Philip S., and James S. Allen, eds. American Communism and Black Americans: A Documentary History, 1919–1929. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1986.

Hill, Robert A. The Crusader, 3 vols. New York and London, 1987.

Negro History Bulletin, July–August 1978, p. 862.

Samuels, W. D. Five Afro-Caribbean Voices in American Culture, 1917–1929. Boulder, Colo.: Belmont, 1977.

Afro-American Realty Company

In the early twentieth century, Harlem became the spiritual center of a new black cultural identity and a famous center of black expression. During the 1920s and 1930s, its writers and artists gave it a worldwide reputation, and the critic Alain Locke described Harlem as an ideal locale for black self-determination. But before all of this talent could descend on Harlem, a series of changes in infrastructure and great foresight were required, beginning in the late nineteenth century. The Afro-American Realty Company, in 1904–1908, illustrates how black businesspeople provided opportunities in Harlem, leading to patterns of migration that permanently altered the community and established an era of expression.

Afro-American Realty was founded in 1904 by Phillip A. Payton, who capitalized on factors that included an economic downturn and the availability of real estate in Harlem. Vast speculative development had penetrated Harlem after the Civil War, when many single-family row houses, tenements, and luxury apartment houses were built. Businesses and religious, educational, and cultural institutions followed. Growth continued in 1873, when Harlem was annexed by

New York City and planning for elevated rail service was announced. Proposed subway routes to west Harlem set off another wave of real estate speculation and further inflated market values. By the end of the nineteenth century, virtually all of Harlem was covered by commercial and residential buildings.

The effects of years of overbuilding were exacerbated by a local real estate recession at the beginning of the twentieth century. Loans were withheld, mortgages were foreclosed, rents fell, and residences sat vacant as building owners scrambled to recover their investments. Eventually, landlords sought the services of Payton, who offered to provide regular tenants for buildings on the east side of the district if the landlords would accept black applicants. The landlords agreed, and one of New York's great internal migrations began. Thousands of families began pouring into houses and apartments between Fifth and Seventh avenues, despite opposition from the white Property Owners Protective Association of Harlem. Previously, black newcomers to Harlem had been abetted by real estate speculators seeking to extract high mortgages or rents in a discriminatory process; now, however, nonresident owners gradually realized that Payton's clients were good tenants who were willing to pay higher rents. Afro-American Realty acquired five-year leases on properties owned by whites and rented these properties at 10 percent above deflated market prices. Pent-up demand for new housing and newly created jobs in industry in New York drew thousands to Harlem.

As more black residents moved into Harlem, Afro-American Realty received considerable attention in the national press and considerable support from black leaders, such as Booker T. Washington, who was an associate and business partner of Payton's. The company also lured customers with an innovative advertising program aimed at riders on subways and elevated trains across New York City. Soon, successful black business owners and families who could pay higher rents for a higher standard of living were establishing residences and commercial spaces in Harlem. The migration continued as Afro-American Realty bought more sections of Harlem, whites fled, and a wave of immigrants from the southern United States and the Caribbean arrived, tripling New York's black population. Harlem—no longer a distant community in Manhattan—bustled with activity and a new cosmopolitan culture.

Perhaps Payton's greatest feat was his accumulation of investment capital for his operation. When the Pennsylvania Railroad bought the property of an African American undertaker, James C. Thomas, at 493 Seventh Avenue for $103,000, Payton induced Thomas to invest much of his profit in Harlem real estate. Over time, Thomas accrued a vast fortune. Payton recruited other investors as well, people who were excited about the rapid growth of Harlem. Afro-American Realty was also boosted by the New York press corps and by the dislocation of residents in other parts of the city. For example, during the construction of Pennsylvania Station in 1906–1910, families and individuals were displaced from the Tenderloin district of Manhattan—historically one of New York’s overcrowded nonwhite ghettos—and many of them made their way to Harlem. From 1900 to 1910, T. Thomas Fortune’s newspaper, New York Age, began to depict Harlem as a vibrant, progressive neighborhood.

Payton had trouble managing his own riches, and he dissolved Afro-American Realty in 1908, but opportunities for black migrants to Harlem continued after his company ceased operations. A new firm, Nail and Parker, began to buy rows of five-story apartments, which it sold to eager newcomers. John Nail and Henry Parker had both been salesmen for Afro-American Realty, and they understood the market. They brokered the move of the black Young Men’s Christian Association (YMCA) and Equitable Life Assurance Properties, which included the sophisticated town houses of Striver’s Row. Along with the Harlem Property Owners’ Improvement Association (founded by John G. Taylor in 1913), these real estate experts continued Payton’s legacy of local ownership. The efforts of businesses were matched by those of residents who focused on sustaining their community. To pay landlords, many black tenants took in boarders or gave rent parties on Saturday nights. Many homes were partitioned to create rooming houses; some lodgers even slept in bathtubs. As housing costs stabilized, this dense neighborhood contained the majority of African Americans in New York; in fact, Harlem had the highest concentration of black people anywhere on earth at the time.

The Afro-American Realty Company has not been forgotten by residents or historians of black Harlem. The firm ushered in a new era of direct investment among local renters and buyers and initiated black cultural assimilation in Harlem. Payton firmly believed that the best way for blacks to succeed in New York, and in America, was by establishing economic independence. According to Cruse (1967), Harlem was founded on the basis of “black economic nationalism by the Afro-American Realty Company.” This economic gain created a climate for black expression and black cultural life.

R. JAKE SUDDERTH

See also Harlem: 4—Housing; House-Rent Parties; Locke, Alain; Nail, John E.; New York Age; Payton, Philip A.

Further Reading

- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996.
- Cruse, Harold. The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual. New York: Morrow, 1967.
- Draper, Theodore. The Rediscovery of Black Nationalism. New York: Viking, 1970.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1991.
- Kiser, Clyde V. Sea Island to City: A Study of Saint Helena Islanders in Harlem. New York: Atheneum, 1969.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1997.
- Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro: An Interpretation. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925.
- McKay, Claude. Harlem: Negro Metropolis. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1968.
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem, the Making of a Ghetto: Negro New York, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.
- Scheiner, Seth M. Negro Mecca: A History of the Negro in New York City, 1865–1920. New York: New York University Press, 1965.
- Thurman, Wallace. The Blacker the Berry. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1996.

Algonquin Roundtable

The Algonquin Roundtable, an institution of the literary scene in the 1920s, was a group of writers and artists who met for lunch at the Algonquin Hotel in New York. When they first gathered in 1919, all but a few of the critics and columnists who were members of this unofficial club were struggling to establish themselves. Years later, nearly all of them had achieved fame, although amid accusations of back-scratching and logrolling. Scholars often contrast the Algonquin group with other American writers of the period, such as Ernest Hemingway, F. Scott Fitzgerald, and John Dos Passos, who constituted and gained stature as an expatriate “lost generation.” The Algonquin Roundtable can also be contrasted with contemporaries who were not expatriates, and particularly—for our purposes—with the writers who personified the Harlem Renaissance. Although some of the individual humorists and essayists in the Roundtable did produce significant work, their famous lunches were characterized by biting, elitist wit, whereas the Harlem Renaissance produced more meaningful and relevant work.

How the Roundtable began is not entirely clear, but according to most accounts, its inception was at a lunch meeting at the Algonquin between John Peter Toohey, a theatrical press agent, and Alexander Woollcott, an influential theater critic and columnist for the New York Times. Murdock Pemberton, the press agent who had arranged this meeting, later decided to have a second gathering at the same place. He invited a large group of theater professionals and writers to a party, purportedly in honor of Woollcott’s return from World War I, but actually mocking Woollcott’s self-indulgent personality. (Pemberton printed a program of speeches related to wartime exploits—all of them to be presented by Woollcott.) Among others, Pemberton invited Franklin P. Adams, a columnist for the New York Tribune; Robert Benchley, then an editor at Vanity Fair; Heywood Broun, drama critic at the New York Tribune; and George S. Kaufman, at the time a drama editor for the New York Times and an aspiring playwright.

When Woollcott refused to let Pemberton’s joke embarrass him but instead enjoyed the meal and the company, the tradition of dining at the Algonquin began. Later, the group included other writers who were still on their way up, such as Harold Ross, a magazine editor who later founded the New Yorker; Dorothy Parker and Robert E. Sherwood, who were beginning their careers as writers for Vanity Fair; Maxwell Anderson, a playwright who would later write an antiwar classic, What Price Glory?; Ring Lardner, a successful syndicated columnist; and Marc Connelly, a playwright who was Kaufman’s collaborator and who struggled as a newspaper writer before achieving success on Broadway.

As Woollcott and his friends began meeting regularly, the group gained considerable fame around New York. Columnists, many of whom were Roundtable regulars, recounted anecdotes and quips from the lunches, boosting the careers of all involved. The owner of the Algonquin Hotel, Frank Case, did not fail to appreciate this free publicity. The group members had at first called themselves “the Board”; they acquired their permanent name when Case replaced the original rectangular dining table with a large round one. Soon afterward, a cartoonist for the Brooklyn Eagle drew a caricature of the gathering with the caption “Algonquin Round Table.”

Droll wit and sarcasm were criteria for success at the Roundtable; as a result, some visitors attended it only once. Clare Booth Luce found the environment “too competitive,” claiming that “you couldn’t say ‘Pass the salt,’ without somebody trying to turn it into a pun or trying to top it.” Some other writers of the period saw the Roundtable as elitist and self-enchanted. According to the screenwriter Anita Loos, the members were “self-styled intellectuals . . . concerned with nothing more weighty than the personal items about themselves that were dished up in the gossip columns.”

Those outside the circle also said that the members of the Roundtable promoted each other’s work, excluding new thinkers and writers. The only figure of the Harlem Renaissance known to have joined the Roundtable was Paul Robeson, and even he was not a regular. For all their presumed conceit and cronyism, however, the members of the Roundtable did sometimes write critically about each other’s work. Once, after Adams gave a novel by Broun a negative review, Woollcott supposedly remarked that one could “see Frank’s scratches on Heywood’s back yet.”

Whether or not the Algonquin regulars convened for their own professional advantage, they did like one another’s company. On Saturdays, the men—calling themselves the Thanatopsis Literary and Inside Straight Club—would extend the meetings beyond lunch, moving upstairs to a suite to play poker, often until the early hours of Sunday morning. The group members also spent time together in their own homes, at restaurants and speakeasies, and on vacations. In 1922, the Algonquin writers collaborated on a musical revue, No Sirree! (mocking a popular Russian revue called Chauve Souris), which played for one night to an audience of theater insiders. No Sirree! featured Broun as master of ceremonies, Sherwood as a song-and-dance man, and Benchley in a solo sketch that eventually led to a career as a comedian in Hollywood. The following day’s newspapers completed the role reversal, allowing the performers to roast their critics in printed reviews.

The Roundtable lunches ended some time in the early 1930s, although few sources mention an exact date or give any particular reason for the demise of the circle. In the years that followed, the group became legendary—so much so that many of the writers who had lunched at the Roundtable tried to play down its cultural impact in an effort to move on with their careers. Eventually, over time, the works of the “lost generation” and the Harlem Renaissance overshadowed even the best literature of the Algonquin group. The myth that persisted, therefore, arguably inflated both the significance of the Roundtable and the legacy of the writers who dined there.

JOSHUA A. KOBRIN

See also Robeson, Paul

Further Reading

- Calhoun, Randall. Dorothy Parker: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- Drennan, Robert E., comp. The Algonquin Wits. New York: Citadel, 1968. (Also published as Wit's End: The Best of the Brilliant Humor of the Celebrated Round Table. London: Frewin, 1973.)
- Gaines, James R. Wit's End: Days and Nights of the Algonquin Round Table. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977.
- Harriman, Margaret Case. The Vicious Circle: The Story of the Algonquin Round Table. New York: Rinehart, 1951.
- Meredith, Scott. George F. Kaufman and His Friends. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.
- O'Connor, Richard. Heywood Brown: A Biography. New York: Putnam, 1975.

Alhambra Theater

The Alhambra Theater building was constructed in 1905 and (as of this writing) still stands at the intersection of 126th Street and Adam Clayton Powell Boulevard (Seventh Avenue) in Harlem. At first it was a vaudeville house; it became part of the Keith vaudeville circuit, featuring such leading performers as Julian Eltinge and the young Groucho Marx. The managers of the Alhambra clung to segregationist policies as long as they could, confining black audience members to the balcony and failing to book African American acts, long after the two other major theaters, the Lincoln and the Lafayette, had adapted their policies to accommodate the changing community. On 4 September 1920, New York Age reported that the treasurer of the Alhambra had been arrested for refusing to sell orchestra tickets to two black men. By the mid-1920s, however, the Alhambra was catering to African American audiences. A highlight during this period was the Harlem premiere of Blackbirds of 1926, a musical revue produced by Lew Leslie to showcase the prodigious talents of Florence Mills. After a six-week engagement at the Alhambra, Blackbirds went on to a highly successful six-month European tour. The show that followed it at the Alhambra starred Bill “Bojangles” Robinson. Also in 1926, a ballroom for dances and cabaret performances was added to the theater building, at a reported cost of $100,000; white and black audiences attended on alternate nights. In May 1927, the theater introduced a stock troupe, the Alhambra Players, briefly billed as the All Star Colored Civic Repertory Company. Its inaugural production was Goat Alley, by the white playwright E. H. Culbertson; this full-length drama of life in a black slum had opened on Broadway in 1921 and was well received. However, the Alhambra Players were more likely to perform nonracial plays, such as The Cat and the Canary or Rain.

Despite good reviews and good houses, the Alhambra closed briefly beginning in June 1927 because of a lack of capital. When it reopened in late August of that year under the management of Milton Gusdorf, the theater featured musical reviews and motion pictures until legitimate drama was again incorporated into its programs, in the form of short plays complementing the reviews and films, in 1928. Actors who had appeared with the Lafayette Players, including Evelyn Preer, Charles H. Moore, Edward Thompson, J. Lawrence Criner, Susie Sutton, and Alice Gorgas, appeared as Alhambra Players. The company presented a new thirty-minute production, usually described as light drama based on contemporary themes, each week through 1929 and remained active through 1931, when the Alhambra became exclusively a movie theater.

A casualty of the Depression era, the Alhambra closed in 1932, and its ballroom and theater were never again to be used for those purposes. After standing empty for decades, it was converted into an office building. However, it was used once more for a performance on 22 May 2000, when Ingo Maurer, a German lighting designer, presented a happening and light show for an audience of 600 called Harlem Lights: A Night at the Alhambra.

FREDA SCOTT GILES

See also Blackbirds; Lafayette Players; Mills, Florence; New York Age; Preer, Evelyn; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"

Further Reading

Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1982.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Atheneum, 1977. (Reprint.)

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Mitchell, Loftin. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.

Monroe, John Gilbert, "A Record of the Black Theatre in New York City: 1920–1929." Ph.D dissertation, University of Texas–Austin, 1980.

Ali, Duse Mohamed

Duse Mohamed Ali was born in Alexandria, Egypt, to an Egyptian father, Abdul Salem Ali, an army officer who was later killed during an abortive nationalist uprising in 1881–1882; and a Sudanese mother. When he was nine years old, his father sent him to study in England, and eventually he lost his knowledge of Arabic and lost contact with his family. From then on he would live away from his country of birth, traveling widely throughout the African diaspora and residing variously in England, the United States, and Nigeria.

In 1885, at age nineteen, he started a career as a stage actor that would last for twenty-four years. He began in Wilson Barrett's theatrical company, adopting the non-Arabic name Duse; the following year, he left England for tours and performances in the United States and Canada. He quit the company in the United States and worked as a clerk for several years before returning to Britain in 1898 to resume acting.

In 1909 he began a new career in journalism, publishing articles on Egyptian nationalism and the oppression of Africa in New Age, an influential socialist weekly literary journal. In 1911 he published a short history of Egypt, In the Land of the Pharaohs, reputedly the first history of that country written by an Egyptian. The book received critical acclaim, catapulting him into international prominence.

In July 1912, in London, he founded African Times and Orient Review, a political, cultural, and commercial journal that advocated pan-African-Asian nationalism and was a forum for African intellectuals and activists from around the world. The journal covered issues in the United States, the Caribbean, West Africa, South Africa, Egypt, and Asia, including India, China, and Japan. Marcus Garvey, who was then living in London, briefly worked for Duse Mohamed Ali and contributed an article to the journal's issue of October 1913. African Times and Orient Review ceased publication in October 1918 and was succeeded by African and Orient Review, which operated through most of 1920.

In 1921, Duse Mohamed Ali traveled again to the United States, and thereafter he never returned to Britain. In the United States, he worked briefly in Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association movement, contributing articles on African issues to Negro World and heading a department on African affairs.

Having come to the United States to promote his vision of economic pan-Africanism, he sought to set up a commercial link between West Africans and African Americans. In the 1920s he repeatedly but unsuccessfully tried to obtain financing to enable West African produce farmers to secure markets and exports to the United States so as to wrest control from major British firms, such as Lever Brothers. In the 1930s he failed to gain European-American capital for the same purpose.

In 1931 he left the United States for West Africa, settling in Lagos. He founded and was the editor of The Comet, which in 1933 became Nigeria's largest weekly. In 1934 he serialized his novel Ere Roosevelt Came, which touched on his experiences in the United States. From June 1937 to March 1938 he also serialized his autobiography, Leaves from an Active Life. He retired from the newspaper's managing directorship in 1943 and died in Lagos two years later.

Biography

Duse Mohamed Ali was born in Alexandria, Egypt, on 21 November 1866. He was sent to England for schooling in 1875 or 1876. His father was killed during a nationalist uprising in 1882. Duse Mohamed Ali pursued an acting career in England (1885–1909) and traveled to and lived in the United States (1886–1898, and later in 1921–1931). He began a career in journalism in London and wrote for New Age (1909). He published In the Land of the Pharaohs (1911). He founded and edited African Times and Orient Review (1912–1918) and African and Orient Review (1920), both in London. He worked for Marcus Garvey's United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) in the early 1920s. He settled in Lagos, Nigeria (1931–1945); there, he founded, edited, and managed The Comet (1933–1943). In Comet, he serialized a novel, Ere Roosevelt Came (1934); and an autobiography, Leaves from an Active Life (1937–1938). He died in Lagos, on 26 February 1945.

AHATI N. N. TOURE

See also Garvey, Marcus; Negro World; Pan-Africanism; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Selected Works

In the Land of the Pharaohs: A Short History of Egypt. 1911. (Reprint, 1968.)

Ere Roosevelt Came. 1934.

Leaves from an Active Life. 1937–1938.

Further Reading

“Biographical Supplement: Duse Mohamed Ali.” In The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers, Vol. 1, 1826–August 1919, ed. Robert A. Hill and Carol A. Rudisell. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.

Duffield, Ian. “The Business Activities of Duse Mohamed Ali: An Example of the Economic Dimension of Pan-Africanism.” Journal of the Historical Society of Nigeria, 4(4), June 1969.

———. “Duse Mohamed Ali and the Development of Pan-Africanism, 1866–1945.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Edinburgh, 1971.

———. “John Eldred Taylor and West African Opposition to Indirect Rule in Nigeria.” African Affairs, 70(280), July 1971.

———. “Duse Mohamed Ali: His Purpose and His Public.” In The Commonwealth Writer Overseas: Themes of Exile and Expatriation, ed. Alastair Niven. Brussels: M. Didier, 1976.

———. “Some American Influences on Duse Mohamed Ali.” In Pan-African Biography, ed. Robert A. Hill. Los Angeles: African Studies Center, University of California–Los Angeles; and Crossroads, African Studies Association, 1987.

Hill, Robert A. “The First England Years and After, 1912–1916.” In Marcus Garvey and the Vision of Africa, ed. John Henrik Clarke and Amy Jacques Garvey. New York: Random House, 1974.

Mahmud, Khalil. “Introduction to the Second Edition.” In Duse Mohamed, In the Land of the Pharaohs: A Short History of Egypt, 2nd ed. London: Frank Cass, 1968.

Alston, Charles

Charles H. “Spinky” Alston (1907–1977) was a major figure in the art scene in New York City for fifty years—a trailblazer as a painter, muralist, sculptor, illustrator, and art educator. He had come to Harlem in 1915 when his stepfather, Harry Bearden (Romare Bearden's uncle), moved the family there. In Harlem, Alston's artistic interests were nurtured and blossomed into a professional career that would significantly influence African American art.

After graduating from Columbia University, Alston became the director of the boys' program at Utopia House, which cared for the children of working mothers; one of his students was Jacob Lawrence, who became an important African American artist. Alston was employed next at the Harlem Arts Workshop, run by the African American sculptor Augusta Savage at the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library; this workshop was later incorporated into the Works Progress Administration (WPA). He was introduced to African art by the philosopher and cultural critic Alain Locke, whom he helped install an exhibition of African sculpture at the Schomburg Collection at the 135th Street Library.

As classes at the workshop in the library became too crowded, because of increasing demands for cultural education in Harlem, Alston found new space for the school and himself in an old stable at 306 141st Street. During the next four years, “306” became an interdisciplinary artistic salon as well as a school for the visual arts. In 1935, Alston, Savage, Elba Lightfoot, and others came together to form the Harlem Artists Guild. Also in 1935, Alston became the first black WPA supervisor. He was assigned to the WPA's Federal Arts Project Commission and was in charge of the murals to be painted at Harlem Hospital. These murals became a source of controversy in 1936, when the white director of the hospital and the city's commissioner of hospitals sought unsuccessfully to block their display. In 1938, Alston obtained a Rosenwald fellowship and began a tour of the South that became the basis of his Family series, renderings of the life of southern blacks.

During World War II, Alston worked for the Office of War Information, creating posters and cartoons to mobilize support among blacks for the war effort. In 1950, his career in the fine arts was revitalized when the Metropolitan Museum mounted an exhibition of contemporary art, and his submission, Painting, was one of the few works purchased by the museum. Alston soon became an instructor at the Art Students League. His social and racial consciousness led him to join other black artists, such as Hale Woodruff, Norman Lewis, Romare Bearden, and Emma Amos, to form Spiral, an organization concerned about the relationship of black artists to the civil rights movement. Charles Alston died in 1977, leaving behind a legacy as a pioneering artist and educator whose work was quite varied in style, but always expressive and interesting.

Biography

Charles H. Alston was born on 28 November 1907 into a prominent black family in Charlotte, North Carolina. His mother was Anna Elizabeth Miller Alston; his father was Rev. Primus P. Alston, an Episcopalian minister. Primus Alston died of a cerebral hemorrhage in 1910. Three years later, Anna Alston married Harry Pierce Bearden (the uncle of the artist Romare Bearden), who moved the family to New York. In New York, Alston attended DeWitt Clinton High School and Saturday classes at the National Academy of Art. In 1925, he received a scholarship to the Yale University School of Fine Arts but decided to attend Columbia University; there, he was introduced to modern art, including the work of Modigliani. Alston graduated from Columbia in 1929 and received his M.A. from the university's Teachers College in 1931. He worked with Utopia House, the Harlem Arts Project, and the WPA during the 1930s; with the Office of War Information during World War II; and with the Art Students League in the postwar years. He was the recipient of a Julius Rosenwald fellowship and one of the founders of Spiral. Mayor John V. Lindsay appointed him to the New York City Art Commission in 1969. Alston died in 1977.

LARRY A. GREENE

See also Artists; Bearden, Romare; Harlem Hospital; Lawrence, Jacob; Locke, Alain; 135th Street Library; Rosenwald Fellowships; Savage, Augusta; Woodruff, Hale; Works Progress Administration

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Coker, Gylbert Garvin. "Charles Alston: The Legacy." In Charles Alston: Artist and Teacher. New York: Kenkeleba Gallery, 1990.
- Henderson, Harry. "Remembering Charles Alston." In Charles Alston: Artist and Teacher. New York: Kenkeleba Gallery, 1990.
- Hotton, Julia, ed. Charles Alston and the "306" Legacy. New York: Cinque Gallery, 2000.
- Linden, Diana L., and Larry Greene. "Charles Alston's Harlem Hospital Murals: Cultural Politics in Depression Era Harlem." Prospects: An Annual of American Cultural Studies, 2001.

Amenia Conference, 1916

Arriving at Troutbeck, the setting for the three-day Amenia Conference of August 1916, W. E. B. Du Bois "knew it was mine. It was just a southern extension of my own Berkshire Hills." Troutbeck, in Amenia, New York, was the home of Joel Spingarn, chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); it was just thirty miles South of Du Bois's hometown, Great Barrington, Massachusetts. Not only were the sylvan surroundings familiar to Du Bois, but he also sensed that this rural estate would inspire the conference, marking the end of one era and the beginning of another.

Although the Amenia Conference was described as an "independent" retreat for the national civil rights leadership held "under the auspices" of the NAACP, the association had a clear investment in sponsoring the meeting. In just its sixth year, the NAACP—and in particular its officers Du Bois and Spingarn—perceived an opportunity to unify civil rights leaders and to fortify its own role in the struggle for freedom for African Americans. Before 1916, unity had been all but unachievable. For more than a decade, meaningful cooperation had been prevented by deep fissures and contention between African American leaders who sympathized with Booker T. Washington's program of accommodation and those who were committed to confronting Jim Crow squarely. Even within the NAACP, unity had involved a struggle. Since its founding in 1909, the association had grown in strength and numbers, yet it continued to experience internal conflict and uncertainty. Although communities from Los Angeles to Boston had responded to the appeal of the NAACP's strategy of protest and had founded local branches, Du Bois acknowledged in 1916 that the association was "a precarious thing without money, with some influential members" yet "never quite sure whether their influence would stay with us if we 'fought' for Negro rights." But when Washington died in late 1915, Du Bois and Spingarn believed the moment had arrived to ensure the NAACP's survival within a more unified civil rights movement.

Spingarn offered to hold the conference at his estate and mailed 200 invitations—an ambitious number—to a wide spectrum of activists, philanthropists, and politicians ranging from the radical Bostonian William Monroe Trotter to Robert Russa Moton, the conservative bearer of Washington's legacy. President Woodrow Wilson and former presidents William Howard Taft and Theodore Roosevelt were among those who replied with regrets, but more than fifty of the invitees arrived in Ameniam on 24 August, an unusually cool and misty morning. They included the novelist Charles Chesnutt; Mary White Ovington of the NAACP; John Hope, the president of Atlanta University; Emmett Scott, who had been an associate of Washington's; Kelly Miller, a sociologist at Howard University; and Mary Burnett Talbert, president of the National Association of Colored Women. In a short while, in Du Bois's words, the conferees were having a "rollicking good time." It had taken considerable delicacy to persuade leaders of "all shades" of opinion to convene at all, let alone in this unique setting. The NAACP had arranged for Spingarn's guests to camp among several canvas army tents pitched on the lawn at Troutbeck. If this rusticity had at first raised eyebrows, the congenial atmosphere—hikes through the woods, turns on the tennis court, and comedy on the croquet pitch—eventually charmed the delegates and created a cooperative spirit. "Now and again, of course," Du Bois observed, "there was just a little sense of stiffness and care in conversation when people met who for ten years had been saying hard things about each other; but not a false word was spoken."

What was said, however, was meant to remain private—conducted not to secrecy but rather to candid discussion. Over three days, the participants in the Ameniam Conference discovered, with little surprise, their common conviction about the principal goals of their work. Although—again, to no one's surprise—disagreement arose over how to reach these goals, no conflict prevented a united statement of purpose. The group expressed a collective belief, summarized in the resolutions of the conference, in the need to support education for African Americans, "every form" of which "should be encouraged and advanced." They also considered it essential to achieve "complete political freedom" and to abandon factionalism.

Looking back on the Ameniam Conference a decade later, Du Bois asserted that "on account of our meeting, the Negro race was more united and more ready to meet the problems of the world." His words may suggest hyperbole, but the NAACP had emerged from the meeting of 1916 with renewed vitality. Following the Ameniam Conference, the association founded local branches in the South, backed litigation that protected citizenship rights for blacks, and lobbied for federal antilynching legislation. By the mid-1920s the NAACP had become the nation's foremost civil rights organization.

EBEN MILLER

See also Ameniam Conference, 1933; Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Miller, Kelly; Moton, Robert Russa; Ovington, Mary White; Scott, Emmett Jay; Spingarn, Joel; Talbert, Mary Burnett; Trotter, William Monroe

Further Reading

Du Bois, W. E. B. "The Ameniam Conference." Troutbeck Leaflet 8. Ameniam, N.Y.: Troutbeck, 1925. (Privately printed. See also Herbert Aptheker, ed. Pamphlets and Leaflets by W. E. B. Du Bois. White Plains, N.Y.: Kraus-Thompson, 1986.)

Kellogg, Charles Flint. NAACP: A History of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967.

Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.

Ross, B. Joyce. J. E. Spingarn and the Rise of the NAACP, 1911–1939. New York: Atheneum, 1972.

Amenia Conference, 1933

On Friday, 18 August 1933, Abram Harris, an economist at Howard University, arrived at Troutbeck, Joel Spingarn's estate in Amenia, New York, for the second Amenia Conference, along with W. E. B. Du Bois; Virginia Alexander, a physician in Philadelphia; and Pauline Young of Wilmington, Delaware, who was a librarian and an activist in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). These four had traveled together in Du Bois's automobile. They were soon joined by more than two dozen fellow delegates and observers of the three-day conference to discuss the past, present, and future of the NAACP within the struggle for civil rights.

The idea of reprising the Amenia Conference had come to Du Bois and Spingarn, who were officers of the NAACP, in 1931. Fifteen years earlier, they had also arranged for a conference of civil rights leaders at Troutbeck, in the southern Berkshires. That meeting had resulted in a newfound unity of purpose, which helped the NAACP to become a powerful nationwide organization. By the early 1930s, however, the association's future appeared uncertain. For several years membership had been dwindling, leaving formerly dynamic branches from Boston to Baltimore nearly moribund. One board member of the NAACP argued in the spring of 1932 that even the appeal of the association as a civil rights organization had diminished significantly. The association was "losing ground with the average man on the street" and was just as clearly failing to "attract and hold the minds of the young people." In the context of the Depression, the NAACP's historic commitment to the legal and political rights of African Americans seemed to fall short—especially in contrast to the radical left, particularly affiliates of the Communist Party such as International Labor Defense and the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, which articulated the need for social progress through economic transformation. The leaders of the NAACP had long debated developing an economic program, and in 1933 the association accepted Spingarn's offer to host a second Amenia Conference devoted to this concern, among others.

Unlike the conference of 1916, the retreat of 1933 was limited by the NAACP to a small group representing the up-and-coming generation of African American leaders. Of the twenty-seven conferees who met in Amenia in August 1933, the youngest (Juanita Jackson, an activist from Baltimore) was twenty, and the oldest (the sociologist E. Franklin Frazier of Fisk University) was thirty-eight. Five of the conferees, including Harris, Emmett Dorsey, the lawyer Charles Houston, the political scientist Ralph Bunche, and the "New Negro" poet Sterling Brown, taught at Howard University. Frances Williams, Marion Cuthbert, Wenonah Bond, and Anna Arnold represented the Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA). Most of the group—like the attorney Louis Redding of Delaware, a graduate of both Brown University and Harvard University's law school—held degrees from prestigious northern universities and conformed to Du Bois's vision of a well-educated and socially responsible elite upper stratum of racial leadership.

Among the remaining delegates, Abram Harris had perhaps looked forward most keenly to the second Amenia Conference. Harris had spent the past decade arguing that the struggle for civil rights would succeed only by fostering a cooperative movement for economic justice between black and white workers. Until the publication of The Black Worker in 1931, Harris's analytical work had never earned him the stature of his celebrated contemporaries, who were poets of the Harlem Renaissance. At Amenia in 1933, however, Harris was among the most recognized intellectuals of his generation; during the election of conference officers, he was given the responsibility of formulating the group's Findings Report.

As in 1916, the deliberations of the conference were kept private to allow frank conversation. During morning, afternoon, and evening sessions held among the tents at Troutbeck, the delegates, as well as several older observers from the NAACP, such as Du Bois and Spingarn, vigorously debated the future shape of the struggle for civil rights. Whereas Harris and Emmett Dorsey (his colleague at Howard University) enunciated the power of interracial working-class unity, E. Franklin Frazier stressed the need to take black nationalism seriously. Armed with charts, graphs, and visual aids, Du Bois similarly argued for the necessity of separatism as a means to end segregation. Although the final consensus leaned toward accepting Harris's point of view, it was only after a conversation ranging from New Deal politics to the delegates' personal experiences.

The NAACP leaders had hoped that the conferees at Ameniam would offer specific guidance for shaping the association's program, but the problems discussed that weekend proved too vast to address in such terms. Rather, once Abram Harris began to develop the Findings Report, he was purposefully broad—and he unabashedly drew on arguments he had already made in The Black Worker. Considered in the black press as the statement of a new generation, the idea that civil rights leaders needed to cooperate with the labor movement went back to the 1920s and even earlier, but it had taken on new significance during the Depression. Harris, in particular, would continue to work with the NAACP to implement an economic program, but the challenge of uniting black and white workers in a broad effort for social change remained unfulfilled over the next generation.

EBEN MILLER

See also Ameniam Conference, 1916; Brown, Sterling; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Frazier, E. Franklin; Spingarn, Joel

Further Reading

Holloway, Jonathan Scott. Confronting the Veil: Abram Harris Jr., E. Franklin Frazier, and Ralph Bunche, 1919–1941. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Struggle for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.

Ross, B. Joyce. J. E. Spingarn and the Rise of the NAACP, 1911–1939. New York: Atheneum, 1972.

Wolters, Raymond. Negroes and the Great Depression: The Problem of Recovery. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1970.

Young, James O. Black Writers of the Thirties. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1973.

American Mercury

The magazine American Mercury (1924–1980) began monthly publication in January 1924 under the editorship of Henry Louis (H. L.) Mencken (1880–1956) and George Jean Nathan (1882–1958). At its peak in 1927, more than 77,000 copies were sold each month. The editorial team and the content went through several major changes, especially after 1933, when Mencken's resignation led to a drastic drop in readership; but the magazine continued to come out each month, in green-covered 128-page issues, until November 1950. In 1952 it was reorganized as a right-wing journal with no resemblance to its founders' original vision; publication stopped in 1980.

American Mercury was founded, as announced in a press release before the appearance of the first issue, to "offer a comprehensive picture, critically presented, of the entire American scene." That scene included a nonconformist spectrum of ideas in diverse fields, including literature, science, politics, economics, and "industrial and social relations." The magazine devoted itself to debunking platitudes, challenging assumptions about authority and propriety, and providing an educated and discerning readership with the best available writing in a variety of genres and on a wide range of topics.

Mencken approached many of the best writers of the day to ask for contributions to the magazine: among the first were Theodore Dreiser, Upton Sinclair, and James Weldon Johnson. Realist writers, whether or not they had achieved popular or critical success, were prominently featured throughout Mencken's editorship. Volume 1, number 1 of the Mercury presented four poems by Theodore Dreiser; number 2 included All God's Chillun Got Wings (A Play) by Eugene O'Neill and "Caught (A Story)" by Sherwood Anderson. Later issues would include work by Ambrose Bierce, Sinclair Lewis, Carl Sandburg, William Faulkner, and others.

The Mercury widely publicized its interest in discovering new writers; it encouraged and accepted submissions by housewives, convicts, panhandlers, and many others whose stories were otherwise unlikely to be told. The magazine was also well known as a showcase for writings about racial tension and featured many contributions by African Americans, including W. E. B. Du Bois, Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson, Countee Cullen, George S. Schuyler, and Kelly Miller.

In addition to short stories, poems, plays, and essays, the Mercury was read for its regular features. Editorial essays and monthly columns on "The Theatre" and "The Library" provided strongly opinionated recommendations. The popular and much copied column "Americana" featured brief sketches of scenes from city or country life, as well as samples of entertaining sayings heard on the street or reprinted from American newspapers.

American Mercury, especially in its first decade (1924–1933), is credited with challenging and changing expectations of what a magazine could be. By actively seeking contributions from a wide variety of writers, and by providing a hearing for unpopular viewpoints, the Mercury served as a forum in which members of the “civilized minority,” as Mencken described his varied readership, could explore and debate the social constraints under which they lived.

ROSEMARIE COSTE

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Cullen, Countee; Dreiser, Theodore; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Lewis, Sinclair; Mencken, H. L.; Miller, Kelly; Schuyler, George S.

Further Reading

- Harrison, S. L. Mencken Revisited: Author, Editor, and Newspaperman. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1999.
- Scruggs, Charles. The Sage in Harlem: H. L. Mencken and the Black Writers of the 1920s. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984.
- Singleton, M. K. H. L. Mencken and the American Mercury Adventure. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1962.

American Negro Labor Congress

African Americans in the Workers (Communist) Party of America organized the American Negro Labor Congress (ANLC) in Chicago on 25–31 October 1925. Increasing conservatism in the United States after 1920 had brought the collapse of all-black organizations such as the African Blood Brotherhood, and ANLC was intended to fill the gap. Its principal founder was Lovett Fort-Whiteman, an African American Marxist who had studied at Tuskegee and who also initially edited ANLC’s journal, The Negro Champion. ANLC eschewed black nationalism and separatism; it sought to achieve black liberation by concentrating on the working class and on economic issues. However, this communist emphasis often conflicted with African American sensibilities; for example, ANLC believed that lynching was caused by capitalist exploitation and control and could best be countered in the economic arena.

ANLC wanted to eliminate discrimination in employment, to open segregated unions to black members, and to create all-black unions when necessary; it repeatedly cited the failure of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to organize black workers. ANLC demonstrated its goals in 1926 through its support for striking black theater projectionists at the white-owned Lafayette Theater in Harlem. Unfortunately, ANLC’s agenda, which was extremely unfocused, also included the global elimination of discrimination against all black peoples and the liberation of victims of American and European imperialism overseas. Such sweeping objectives held little appeal to workers, who were more immediately concerned with earning a living; as a result, the membership of ANLC was never very large. William Green, the president of AFL, made ANLC’s objectives even harder to attain: He considered ANLC so radical that he threatened member unions with expulsion if they participated in it. Labor activists in Harlem such as A. Philip Randolph, who was launching the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters at the time ANLC met in Chicago, also gave the congress a wide berth.

ANLC made an effort to incorporate black nationalism and racial issues with its communist focus on the class struggle but failed miserably. At the founding convention in Chicago, the emphasis on communism (and Russia) overshadowed African American concerns. For instance, the thirty-two black delegates and one Mexican-American delegate met before a primarily white audience and were entertained by Russian ballet and theater groups, but no black artists. Lovett Fort-Whiteman attended the congress dressed in a rabochka (a Russian peasant blouse) and announced that a group of black young people had been selected for revolutionary training in Moscow and would study Marxism and Leninism at the University of the Toilers of the East. Also, in the United States ANLC focused on large eastern cities and industrial centers, failing to represent the masses of southern black workers.

Within one year, in an attempt to focus on issues more important to average African Americans, Richard Moore replaced Fort-Whiteman as the leader of ANLC and as editor of The Negro Champion. ANLC moved its headquarters from Chicago to New York in 1928. Although ANLC was nearly moribund after its move to Harlem, the desire for a black labor organization resulted in intermittent calls for its resurrection. In late 1930, ANLC dissolved and was replaced by the League of Struggle for Negro Rights (LSNR). Lovett Fort-Whiteman emigrated to Russia in 1930; he was arrested in 1937, during the Stalinist purges of the Bolshevik leadership, and he died in 1939 in a Soviet gulag, at age forty-four.

JOHN CASHMAN

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Communist Party; Lafayette Theater; Moore, Richard B.; Randolph, A. Philip

Further Reading

- Foner, Philip S. History of the Labor Movement in the United States, Vol. 10, The T.U.E.L.: 1925–1929. New York: International, 1994.
- Foner, Philip S., and Herbert Shapiro, eds. American Communism and Black Americans: A Documentary History, 1930–1934. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1991.
- Maxwell, William J. Old Negro, New Left: African-American Writing and Communism between the Wars. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- Naison, Mark. Communists and Harlem during the Depression. Urbana, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1983.
- Solomon, Mark. The Cry Was Unity: Communists and African Americans, 1917–1936. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.
- Wesley, Charles H. "Organized Labor and the Negro." Journal of Negro Education, 8, July 1939.

Amos 'n' Andy

The face of entertainment was changed forever by the comedy series Amos 'n' Andy, originally called the Sam 'n' Henry Show, which was broadcast on radio from 1928 to 1960 and on television from 1951 to 1953. On radio, the white actors Charles Correll (1890–1972) and Freeman Gosden (1899–1982), who wrote and performed the shows, won audiences over with slapstick comedy and buffoonery as two southern black men hoping for success and prosperity in the city of Chicago. Correll and Gosden had begun as "harmony boys" at WGN, the radio station in Chicago where they developed what became Amos 'n' Andy. They made their program popular among black and white audiences alike with a combination of music, minstrel comedy, and dramatic dialogue.

Although Amos 'n' Andy emerged during the later part of the Harlem Renaissance, this form of entertainment worked against what many artists and scholars were attempting to achieve for blacks. As the radio program continued, black audiences became more perplexed by offensive connotations that mocked the progress of black Americans. Correll and Gosden skillfully imitated black vernacular English to give the characters authenticity and alert audiences to each character's social status—"dialect" indicated a black person, "nondialect" a white person. Also, there were mixed responses to their use of racial stereotypes as central characters. The episodes centered on Amos, who was presented as shiftless and inept; and Andy, who was lazy and pompous. Both characters reflected stereotypical minstrel caricatures that had been popularized during the nineteenth century. Still, the series continued to remain a favorite in American households.

In 1927, Correll and Gosden entered a critical period that led them to examine the future of their radio program. Their popularity had been growing not only because of the program but also because of promotional offerings such as recordings, books, and toys. Correll and Gosden decided that they wanted to distribute the program to other radio stations in order to expand their audience; however, WGN rejected this proposal.

WGN's refusal aroused the interest of WMAQ, the radio station of the Chicago Daily News. WMAQ offered Correll and Gosden a contract with distribution rights, which they accepted. They changed the name of the program to Amos 'n' Andy when WGN refused to release the original name, Sam 'n' Henry. On 19 March 1928, Amos 'n' Andy made its debut at WMAQ.

Amos 'n' Andy was similar to Sam 'n' Henry in centering on the adventures of two southern black men who come to the North seeking success and fortune. But now the two black men were from Atlanta, were blundering businessmen, and were members of a fraternal order, Mystic Knights of the Sea. Although the new radio series received some harsh criticism for its portrayal of blacks, it continued to be very popular on the east and west coasts, running six days a week, sometimes twice a day to accommodate time differences.

As Amos 'n' Andy reached the peak of its fame during the 1930s, the controversy surrounding it intensified. Correll and Gosden's uncensored use and imitation of facets of black culture disturbed black audiences and black comedians, and protesters argued that the program was baneful and demeaning to blacks. In 1931, reportedly, some 750,000 signatures were gathered by the Pittsburgh Courier in an effort to have the radio show canceled; this petition alleged that the program inflated misconceptions about black culture and defamed black women. Nevertheless, the program continued to be broadcast and was converted from a daily serial into a weekly half-hour presentation.

The growing popularity of the radio program led to the development of a television series, which began in the summer of 1951 on CBS. The television program was produced by Correll and Gosden, but they did not act in it: There had been an intense search, lasting more than a year, for the most appropriate black actors for the television version. The television program also differed from the radio program in that many of its episodes focused on George "Kingfish" Stevens (played by Tim Moore), the head of the Mystic Knights of the Sea lodge; Stevens typically placed Amos Jones (played by Alvin Childress) and Andy Hogg Brown (played by Spencer Williams) in situations where they—or at least Andy—might be revealed as hapless and artless. The characters in the television version also included Kingfish's wife, Sapphire (played by Ernestine Wade), and his overbearing mother-in-law, "Mama" (played by Amanda Randolph). This program was television's first all-black comedy, and the story lines involved the lives of two types of characters: stereotypical and true-to-life. Some of the characters, as on the radio program, were reincarnations of figures in nineteenth-century minstrel shows—the coon, the Uncle Tom, the mammy. Such types, of course, precluded authentic representations of black life and reaffirmed notions of segregation and inequality.

Freeman Gosden and Charles Correll as Amos and Andy.
(Photofest.)

The CBS network received criticism from various civil rights groups, such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which believed that the show promoted racial stereotypes and negative images of blacks. Walter White of the NAACP led a significant protest and filed a lawsuit against the CBS network. This protest, however, deterred sponsors from supporting not only television comedies that exploited blacks but also comedies that featured blacks; thus the efforts of the civil rights group may have been a factor in the failure of CBS to cast any blacks as main characters in dramatic series. (After the cancellation of Amos 'n' Andy, no television network cast a black person in a dramatic series until 1965, when Bill Cosby starred in I Spy.)

The television series Amos 'n' Andy was canceled at the end of its second season in 1953. But during the following decade, Amos 'n' Andy appeared occasionally in at least 218 markets across the world, including Australia, Bermuda, Kenya, and western Nigeria; and it continued to thrive afterward through syndication. There is still debate about whether the show was actually racist, because while it did incorporate common stereotypes, it also portrayed blacks in positive, professional roles—for example, as attorneys and entrepreneurs. Eventually, though, as a result of widespread civil rights demonstrations and continued protest against local broadcasts of Amos 'n' Andy, CBS removed the show from the television circuit permanently in 1966. Correll and Gosden had meanwhile continued the radio series, with new material, until the program went off the air in 1960.

GENYNE HENRY BOSTON

See also National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; White, Walter

Further Reading

Andrews, Bart, and Ahrigus Julliard. Holy Mackerel: The Amos 'n' Andy Story. New York: Dutton, 1986.

- Barlow, William, Voice Over: The Making of Black Radio. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1999.
- Douglas, Susan J. Listening In: Radio and the American Imagination. New York: Random House, 1999.
- Ely, Melvin Patrick. The Adventures of Amos 'n' Andy: A Social History of an American Phenomenon. New York: Free Press, 1991.
- Harmon, Jim. The Great Radio Heroes, rev. ed. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2001.
- Leonard, William Torbert. Masquerade in Black. London: Scarecrow, 1986.

Amsterdam News

Amsterdam News, the leading African American weekly in New York City since the Harlem Renaissance, was established in 1909 at a site close to Amsterdam Avenue—hence its name. With an expense account of $10, James H. Anderson assembled the paper in his apartment on 65th Street in San Juan Hill, where many African Americans lived before relocating to Harlem. One year later, the paper joined the exodus to Harlem. Between 1910 and 1920, Harlem was evolving into a hub of black America, and the Amsterdam News chronicled the change.

That a newspaper begun with such minimal resources managed to survive and thrive suggests the demand in the community for its image in print. The limited funds also indicate the strong odds against the black press. This was a difficult, although heady, time. World War I helped create a distinction between “old” and “new” Negroes, but the soldiers of color who participated in the Allies’ victory were rarely allowed to benefit from their efforts. Some soldiers were lynched, and bloody riots erupted in several cities, with hundreds of casualties among African Americans. Decent jobs were scarce. But African Americans transformed themselves in the urban market, and they were ambitious to learn and improve, with the black newspaper as their secular bible. They read it religiously to find out where they were and what they were doing within and outside their own communities, and a single copy often passed from hand to hand.

Much of the newfound excitement of African Americans as they remade themselves in their new environment was expressed artistically. This expression culminated in the Harlem Renaissance, which was largely the work of their hands and pens. In the 1910s and 1920s, T. Thomas Fortune, then a dean of journalists, wrote regularly for the Amsterdam News. In later years, so did John Henrik Clarke, W. E. B. Du Bois, Roy Wilkins, and Adam Clayton Powell Jr. Two women who were pioneers in arts journalism—Nora Holt and Marvel Cooke—contributed to the paper during and after the Harlem Renaissance, as did the novelist Ann Petry.

Sara Warren, whose husband had worked with its founder, bought the Amsterdam News in 1926. A decade later, it was in receivership and was sold for several thousand dollars to two physicians. Under the Powell-Savory partnership, younger writers were hired, and coverage became national as well as local. The paper also became one of the first in the country to unionize. In the 1950s and 1960s, the Amsterdam News was in the vanguard of civil rights journalism and was quick to recognize Malcolm X, with a column called “God’s Angry Man.” In 1971, a consortium of businesspeople and politicians, including Clarence Jones, John Procope, and Percy Sutton, bought the paper for $2.3 million. Twelve years later, it was sold to another group of businesspeople, headed by Wilbert Tatum, who practiced hands-on control. In 1997, Tatum retired and turned the reins over to his daughter Eleanor, who then served as publisher and editor-in-chief.

BARBARA BREWSTER LEWIS

See also Black Press; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fortune, Timothy Thomas; Holt, Nora

Further Reading

- Dodson, Howard, Christopher Moore, and Roberta Yancy. The Black New Yorkers: The Schomburg Illustrated Chronology. New York: Wiley, 1999.
- Freedom’s Journals: A History of the Black Press in New York State*. New York: Public Library, 1986.
- Jordan, William G. Black Newspapers and America’s War for Democracy, 1914–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.
- Pride, Armistead S., and Clint C. Wilson II. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.
- Senna, Carl. The Black Press and the Struggle for Civil Rights (The African American Experience). New York: Watts, 1993.
- Vincent, Theodore G., ed. Voices of a Black Nation: Political Journalism in the Harlem Renaissance. San Francisco, Calif.: Ramparts, 1973.

Wolseley, Roland E. The Black Press, U.S.A. Ames: Iowa State University, 1990.

Anderson, Charles W.

Charles W. Anderson was born in Oxford, Ohio; he was educated in public schools, and after brief training at business and language schools, he arrived in New York in the late 1890s. There, he quickly rose to prominence as the recognized leader of state Republican politics; by the time of his death, he was one of the most famous black politicians in the country.

Anderson held a variety of minor posts in New York early in his career—at the customs house, as private secretary to the state treasurer (and later chief clerk of the treasury), and with the state racing commission—all the while building a network of political contacts within Manhattan, mainly through his presidency of the Colored Republican Club. He was thus positioned to receive political appointments near the top of the civil service hierarchy.

The Colored Republican Club had been formed in the early 1900s, primarily to get out the black vote for Theodore Roosevelt, which it succeeded in doing; and when Roosevelt became president in 1905, Anderson was appointed collector of internal revenue for New York's second district (which included Wall Street). He was also a member of the New York State Republican Committee (for a long while, the only African American) for ten terms and a delegate-at-large to three Republican conventions. His influence on the political empowerment of African Americans was so pervasive that at his death in 1938, New York Age commented, "You just can't think of Republicanism in New York without remembering Charlie Anderson."

Anderson's forceful rise in Republican politics was largely a result of his friendship with Booker T. Washington, with whom he had aligned himself in the late 1890s. Anderson, like Washington, believed that solutions to the emerging "Negro problem" could be found by doing what could be done, within existing limitations, as soon as possible. This set him at odds with W. E. B. Du Bois and the Negro Democrats, a group that Anderson characterized as people "to whom nothing is desirable but the impossible." Anderson was so faithful to Washington's beliefs that he even planted spies in rival black organizations that he thought might threaten Washington's goals and carefully reported on their activities to his ally.

In character and temperament Anderson was distinctive. Savvy and freewheeling, he had a reputation as a classy dresser and as a master of the endgame in political deal-making. Versatile and apparently of inexhaustible energy, he seemed never to stop working. According to his friend and admirer James Weldon Johnson, Anderson's solution to fatigue was to stop in the nearest hotel bar for a pint of champagne, and then press on. As an astute politician, Anderson was also well read and fond of discussing contemporary culture, drawing widely on his self-taught knowledge of the English poets, the Irish patriots, and the contemporary leaders of the British parliament.

Ill health forced Anderson to retire in 1934, but there can be little doubt that he was one of the most important African American politicians of either party in the nineteenth century and the early twentieth.

Biography

Charles W. Anderson was born on 28 April 1866 in Oxford, Ohio, to Charles W. and Serena Anderson. After attending public school, he received further training at Spencerian Business College, Cleveland; and Berlitz School of Languages, Worcester, Massachusetts. He was private secretary to the state treasurer of New York in 1893–1895; he was appointed collector of internal revenue for the Second District in New York City in 1905 and for the Third District in New York City in 1922. He died in 1938.

JAMES M. HUTCHISSON

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Johnson, James Weldon; New York Age; Politics and Politicians

Further Reading

Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto, Negro New York, 1890–1930. New York: Harper and Row, 1966.

Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915: Racial Ideologies in the Age of Booker T. Washington. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1963.

Anderson, Edmund Lincoln

Edmund Lincoln (Eddie) Anderson's career as a comedian and actor stretched from stage roles during the latter days of the Harlem Renaissance to stardom on radio, in films, and on television during the 1950s and 1960s. Anderson was always called Eddie in private, but in public he was often referred to as “Rochester,” the name of the character he made famous in radio and television programs and in films with the white comedian and actor Jack Benny.

Anderson’s mother, Ella Mae, was a circus tightrope artist; his father, Ed, was a minstrel performer. Although Anderson would later be most famous for his role as Rochester, he had gotten his start on the stage. One of his earliest stage appearances was in the chorus of Struttin’ Along, an all-black revue, in 1919. He traveled the vaudeville circuit, singing and dancing with his brother Cornelius and another performer as the Three Black Aces in the show Steppin’ High; their bookings included the Roxy on Broadway and the Apollo and the Cotton Club in Harlem. After Steppin’ High, Anderson struck out on his own, touring as a solo song-and-dance act and eventually incorporating comedy into his routine.

His big break came when he auditioned for and won the role of a porter in a train sketch for Jack Benny’s radio program. The character of the porter and Anderson’s performance in the role were hugely popular with the audience, and in 1937 Anderson became a regular on Benny’s radio show. His character was now Jack Benny’s valet, Rochester, and in this role he stole the show on Benny’s radio and television programs as well as in Benny’s films. Audiences loved the fun-loving, quick-witted servant who often had the last laugh with regard to Benny’s miserly character. One factor contributing to Anderson’s success was the comic effect of his raspy voice, a result of damaging his vocal cords while hawking newspapers as a boy. The character of Rochester might seem stereotypical by today’s standards, but at the time it was considered a step up from the antics of black characters on the vaudeville and Broadway stage in the 1920s and 1930s. Anderson became so identified with this role on Benny’s program that he was sometimes credited only as “Rochester” in his subsequent films and public appearances, and he achieved such success as Rochester that for several years during the 1940s he was the highest-paid black actor in Hollywood.

In addition to radio and television, Anderson appeared in more than fifty films. His first film was What Price Hollywood? (1932); he also played Noah in The Green Pastures (1936). His biggest starring role was Little Joe Jackson in the critically acclaimed Cabin in the Sky (1943), a film that also featured other veterans of vaudeville and Broadway, including Ethel Waters and Lena Horne. Anderson continued to appear with Jack Benny on radio and television and in films until 1965.

Eddie “Rochester” Anderson in a photo from Paramount Pictures, 1940. (Photofest.)

Biography

Edmund Lincoln Anderson was born in Oakland, California, on 18 September 1905. He studied at public schools in Oakland, San Francisco, and San Mateo, California. His work as an actor included Jack Benny’s radio and television series, 1937–1965; The Green Pastures, 1936; Jezebel, 1938; You Can’t Take It with You, 1938; Gone with the Wind, 1939; Cabin in the Sky, 1943; Brewster’s Millions, 1945; and It’s a Mad Mad Mad Mad World, 1963. He was a member of the Screen Actors’ Guild, Actors Guild of Variety Artists, and Motion Picture Academy of Arts and Sciences. Anderson was married first to Mamie Sophie Wiggins, who died in 1954, and then, in 1956, to Eva Simon, with whom he had three children. His second marriage ended in divorce. Anderson died of a heart ailment at the Motion Picture Country House and Hospital in Los Angeles, California, on 28 February 1977.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Film; Film: Actors; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

“Anderson, Eddie [Edmund Lincoln].” In The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography. Clifton, N.J., 1981.

Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Continuum, 1973. (New expanded ed., 1989.)

———. Primetime Blues: African Americans on Network Television. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2001.

Douglas, George H. “Anderson, Eddie.” In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.

Thomas, Robert McG., Jr. “Eddie Anderson, 71, Benny’s Rochester.” New York Times, 1 March 1977.

Anderson, Garland

The playwright Garland Anderson (1886–1939) was a former shoe shiner, singer, dancer, and bellhop (he was called the “San Francisco bellhop playwright”), a philosopher advocating constructive thinking, and a minister and lecturer. He was the first African American to have a serious full-length play produced on Broadway, Appearances (1924), which opened doors for other African American dramatists. This work is an autobiographical “courtroom melodrama in which a morally upright bellhop”—Anderson himself—“is tried and exonerated of the charge of raping a white woman” (Peterson 1990, 1997).

Anderson achieved success against considerable odds. At a young age, he ran away from home after his mother died. He set up a shoeshine stand and sang and danced for money. The hoboes he met taught him how to cadge meals, find a place to sleep, and “steam a ride on a moving train.” Passengers on trains hid him beneath their seats; black hotel workers gave him food, money, and a bed. He educated himself by reading the Bible and studying books on Christian Science, psychology, metaphysics, practical psychology, and constructive thinking.

Anderson’s philosophy of constructive thinking was criticized as reflecting an “Uncle Tom” mentality. Appearances drew the same criticism; Anderson was accused of selling out in order to appeal to white audiences. As a bellhop at the Braetum Hotel in San Francisco, he had impressed the guests with his optimism: He believed that all things were possible through faith and that he was called to serve mankind. After seeing Channing Pollock’s moralistic drama The Fool, Anderson decided to write a play to convey his own philosophy, although he had no training in playwriting or stage technique. He completed it in only three weeks but then spent seven months finding a producer; during this time, Al Jolson paid Anderson’s expenses in New York and helped him seek financing for the play. Anderson gave public readings of his play (inviting the governor of New York to one of them); he also went to Washington, D.C., to get support from President Calvin Coolidge.

Appearances opened at the Frolic Theater on Broadway on 13 October 1925. In 1925, the policy on Broadway was to avoid mixed casts by having white actors play “colored” roles in blackface. (In 1924, the press had demanded that an off-Broadway production, All God’s Chillun Got Wings, be banned because Paul Robeson kissed the hand of the white actress.) However, Appearances succeeded with a cast of fourteen white and three “colored” performers and a Negro as the principal character. In 1927–1929, the play toured Los Angeles, Seattle, Chicago, and San Francisco. On 1 April 1929, it opened again in New York City, at the Hudson Theater. In March 1930, it opened at the Royalty Theater in London, where Anderson would become a celebrity.

Anderson also became famous as a minister of constructive thinking and a lecturer to white audiences in the tradition of Booker T. Washington. His message that hard work could overcome social obstacles was well received in America and elsewhere. He and his wife, Doris, a white Englishwoman, had met when she went to a lecture of his at the International New Thought Alliance on Oxford Street in London, where he spoke twice a week. At one of Anderson’s Mayfair Tea Talks, “Dick” Sheppard (then the canon of Saint Paul’s and royal chaplain) was the guest of honor. In London, Anderson lived in Lowndes Square, an exclusive neighborhood; became a member of the Poets’ Club; and had his portrait painted by A. Christie. He left London for America in 1935 and published a book on his philosophy, Uncommon Sense, in 1937. An excerpt from it suggests why African Americans rejected his teachings:

The white race is the superior race of this age. In making this statement I do not feel that it is a reflection on my own race. The white race has centuries of civilization behind it, while the Negro race has less than a hundred years since its slavery in America in which it can lay claim to any civilized status.

Another passage, however, suggests Anderson's sense of serving humanity:

Service to me is the rent I pay for the space I occupy on earth. . . . I realized that if I succeeded, in spite of apparently unsurmountable obstacles, in writing a play. . . . the production of that play would prove to my audience, that they would be able to do the thing they wanted to do.

Biography

Garland Anderson was born c. 1886 in Wichita, Kansas. He completed only four years of schooling there before his family moved to Sacramento, California; he was mainly self-educated. He worked as a bellhop in the Braeburn Hotel in 1907–1924 and began writing Appearances in 1924. He also wrote three other plays; the only one whose title is still known is Extortion (it was not produced). He was ordained by Rev. Netta Holmes of the Church of Constructive Thinking in Seattle, becoming the first African American ordained in a white church to minister to a white congregation. He served as a minister at the Truth Center in 1929–1939. He visited Honolulu, speaking to Japanese, Chinese, Korean, and Hawaiian Christian churches. Anderson opened a “colored” café in San Francisco and eventually bought the Braeburn Hotel, although he later sold it back to his boss. Anderson died in New York Hospital of heart disease in 1939.

FELECIA PIGGOTT McMILLAN

See also Appearances

Selected Works

Appearances. In Black Theater U.S.A.: Forty-Five Plays by Black Americans 1847–1974, ed. James V. Hatch. 1974.

“How I Became a Playwright.” In International Library of Negro Life and History Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre: A Critical Approach, ed. Lindsay Patterson. 1967.

Uncommon Sense. 1933.

Further Reading

Abdul, Raoul. “The Negro Playwright on Broadway.” In International Library of Negro Life and History Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre—A Critical Approach, ed. Lindsay Patterson, 1967.

Abramson, Doris E. Negro Playwrights in the American Theatre, 1925–1959, 1969.

Anderson, Doris. Nigger Lover, 1938.

The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era, ed. Bruce Kellner, 1984.

Hicklin, Fannie Ella Frazier. The American Negro Playwright, 1920–1964, 1965.

Howard, Stephanie M. “Garland Anderson and His Appearances.” Master’s thesis, Winston Salem, N.C., Wake Forest University, 1995.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan, 1968.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue, 1981.

Locke, Alain. “The Negro and the American Stage.” In International Library of Afro-American Life and History Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre, ed. Lindsay Patterson, 1987.

Mitchell, Loftin. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre, 1967.

Peterson, Bernard L. Jr. Early Black American Playwrights and Dramatic Writers: A Biographical Directory and Catalog of Plays, Films, and Broadcasting Scripts, 1990.

———. “Drama.” In The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, eds. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, 1997.

Potter, Joan, and Constance Claytor. “Garland Anderson.” In African Americans Who Were First, 1997.

Sanders, Leslie Catherine. The Development of Black Theatre in America: From Shadows to Selves, 1988.

Anderson, Marian

The career of the contralto Marian Anderson concided during its early years with the period of the Harlem Renaissance and continued long afterward, until 1965, when she retired from the concert stage with a final performance at Carnegie Hall.

In 1923, Anderson won a competition for soloists held by the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society. In 1925, as a result of winning a competition at Aeolian Hall in New York City, she appeared at Lewisohn Stadium with the New York Philharmonic. In 1930 and 1933, she received fellowships from the Julius Rosenwald Fund. In 1933–1935, she undertook a concert tour of Europe that established her career. After her performance at the Salzburg Festival in June 1935, the conductor Arturo Toscanini told her, “Yours is a voice such as one hears once in a hundred years.” Anderson had already been well received by African Americans, but her successes abroad gave her an entrée into mainstream American concert halls, theaters, and university auditoriums.

Anderson grew up in an environment filled with music—at home, at church, at school, and in the community. She was born into a happy, close-knit “black bourgeois” family in Philadelphia and showed a natural talent for singing at a tender age, although her parents—who had little money—did not seek professional instruction for her. When she was eight years old, her father, John Anderson, bought a piano. She at first took little interest in it, but one day, as she strolled along a street, she heard a piano being played eloquently by a “dark woman” and became inspired to study the instrument. There was no money for lessons, so she used a note chart propped above the keys. She also bought a violin in a pawnshop for $3.98 and struggled with it, helped by musical acquaintances who tuned it for her until the strings wore out. Anderson, who was in some ways self-taught, played the piano and the violin by ear and matched her voice to the tones. At about this time, an aunt who was arranging a concert to raise funds for a ministry included Anderson on the program. Anderson knew nothing of the plan until she found a flier on the street with her photograph and name: “Come and hear the baby contralto, ten years old.” Actually, she was still only eight, but she was tall and looked older (later, she would join her church’s adult choir at age thirteen, while still keeping her membership in the junior choir, which she had joined at age six). When Anderson was ten, her father died, and she and her mother and sisters went to live with his parents, who owned an organ that she played while singing spirituals.

John Anderson had been a supervisor of ushers at Union Baptist Church, and the child Marian was introduced to choir music there. She gave her first public performances in church at about age eight: a duet with her neighbor Viola Johnson, who sang the upper part while Anderson sang the lower part, the range that would become her comfort zone; and a duet with her father’s sister as the soprano and herself as the alto. Anderson soon joined a girls’ church quartet. These early performances led to solo pieces, as Anderson filled in for absent soloists in the senior choir. Soon she was representing Union Baptist Church at various events as a soloist or in ensembles. One such event was at the Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem. When Anderson was a teenager, the tenor Roland Hayes gave a fund-raising concert for Union Baptist, and she was permitted to appear on the program. Hearing Hayes sing French songs, German lieder, and Italian airs inspired her to take up classical song. (Anderson later said that Hayes was one of three musicians who most decisively influenced her style; the others were Sigrid Onegin and Ernestine Schumann-Heink.) Hayes recommended his own vocal instructor, Arthur J. Hubbard, in Boston, but Anderson’s grandmother would not allow her to travel there, so Anderson approached a music school in Philadelphia, where she was snubbed.

At William Penn High School, where she studied typing and shorthand in preparation for the civil service, Anderson sang in the school choir, often performing brief solos. After she sang at a school assembly, the principal was persuaded to transfer her to South Philadelphia High School, which had a college preparatory track that might lead to a music scholarship.

Anderson belonged to the Camp Fire Girls and performed in their chorus. She gave amateur performances—sometimes for a stipend of a dollar or two—at Baptist, Episcopal, and Methodist churches; the Young Men’s Christian Association (YMCA); and the Young Women’s Christian Association (YWCA). When she realized that people would pay to hear her sing, she began to charge at least five dollars a performance. Anderson also joined the Philadelphia Choral Society, a professional group. Her name became known in and around Philadelphia, and she began to give frequent concerts in nearby towns. Roland Hayes helped by recommending her to churches and colleges.

Anderson’s studies with her first vocal teacher, Mary Saunders Patterson (who charged no fee), culminated in a performance in an operetta that Patterson presented for promising students. Anderson next studied with the contralto Agnes Reifsnnyder; then, the musician Lisa Roma—who had heard Anderson sing at William Penn and had recommended her transfer to South Philadelphia High—arranged an audition with the tenor Giuseppe Boghetti. When Anderson became Boghetti's student, Roland Hayes performed in a concert that raised $600 to pay the fees. She then studied with Frank La Forge, on a scholarship, for more than a year.

After graduating from high school, Anderson decided to make a career of singing. William ("Billy") King became her accompanist and later her manager. On tour, she met R. Nathaniel Dett, choir director at the Hampton Institute, who took an interest in her career. After a performance at Howard University, Anderson felt confident enough to have a promoter book her at New York City's Town Hall, but her appearance at Town Hall was poorly attended and received unfavorable reviews, and she went home to ponder her next step. Encouraged by her family, she signed on with Arthur Judson's prestigious management firm. Her fees rose, and she appeared at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia and at Carnegie Hall as a soloist with the Hall Johnson Choir; but her career remained stagnant, and she felt that she could establish herself only in Europe.

Anderson's first trip abroad was in 1930: She went to England for about a year. There, she stayed in the homes of the expatriate African American actor John Payne and the painter Vicky Newburg; met, among others, Amanda Ira Aldrich (the daughter of the actor Ira Aldrich); studied German at the Hugh Institute; and performed at Wigmore Hall and the Promenade Concerts directed by Sir Henry Wood. However, her performances were more as a student than as an accomplished artist, and she did not achieve greater recognition from booking agencies in the United States after her return.

In 1933, Anderson returned to Europe for two years. She went first to Germany to perfect her performance of lieder, and after studying with Michael Raucheisen and Sverre Jordan, she financed her own appearance at the Bachsaal in Berlin. She received mostly favorable reviews, but this was the beginning of the Nazi era, and she would not perform again in Germany until 1950. During this trip she also sang in many other cities: Salzburg, Vienna, Brussels, Copenhagen, London, Helsinki, Paris, Tiflis, Leningrad (Saint Petersburg), Moscow, Kharkov, Kiev, and Odessa.

When Anderson returned to the United States, her new manager was the famous Sol Hurok, who wanted to broaden her audiences beyond African Americans. His ambition led to a legendary episode. In 1939,

Hurok tried to arrange for a concert in Washington, D.C., at Constitution Hall, which was controlled by the Daughters of the American Revolution (DAR). The DAR said that it had "no available dates" and, furthermore, that its policy was "concerts by white artists only." This rejection aroused widespread anger from many individuals and organizations that were working to end racism, and the injustice to Anderson became a cause célèbre even in the White House—the first lady, Eleanor Roosevelt, resigned from the DAR in protest. Harold Ickes, secretary of the interior, then invited Anderson to sing to the people of America in a public concert at the Lincoln Memorial on Easter Sunday, 9 April 1939. On the platform with Anderson were senators, representatives, cabinet members, a Supreme Court justice, Walter White of the NAACP, and representatives from Howard University and African American churches; the diverse audience numbered 75,000, and the concert was broadcast on radio to millions more. (Eventually, the DAR amended its policy, and Anderson appeared at Constitution Hall in 1943.)

Anderson's star rose after the Easter Sunday concert. The general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, Rudolf Bing, approached her about performing in an opera. She accepted, although with some trepidation, and studied with Max Rudolf, the artistic administrator, who prepared her to audition with Dimitri Mitropoulos, the conductor of the opera orchestra. Anderson's opera debut on 7 January 1955, at age fifty-seven, was a milestone: She was the first African American opera singer to appear onstage at the Metropolitan.

In addition to her contributions to classical music (in which she was especially renowned for her interpretations of Bach, Brahms, Handel, Schubert, Schumann, Strauss, Rachmaninoff, and Wolf), Anderson presented classical renditions of African American spirituals—the socioreligious folk songs of an enslaved people, which W. E. B. Du Bois called "sorrow songs." She brought this art form, cherished by African Americans, to international audiences in places where spirituals might otherwise not have been heard. Her performances of "Crucifixion," "Deep River," "Go Down, Moses," "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands," "My Lord, What a Morning," "Oh, What a Beautiful City," and "Were You There?"—mostly in arrangements by Harry Thacker Burleigh—are memorable for her interpretation of dialect and her embellishment, phrasing, rhythm, and tempo, which remained true to the nature of the spiritual. Anderson, who always sang with her eyes closed, opened the eyes of the international community to the value of this music.

Marian Anderson, 1940. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Marian Anderson was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on 17 February 1897. She studied voice with Mary Saunders Patterson, Agnes Reifsnnyder, Giuseppe Boghetti, Frank La Forge, Raimund von zur Mühlen, Mark Raphael, Amanda Ira Aldrich, Michael Raucheisen, Sverre Jordan, Madame Charles Cahier, and Steffi Rupp. Her many awards included the Spingarn Medal from the NAACP in 1930. She sang the national anthem at the inauguration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1953; made her debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York City in 1955, as Ulrica in Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera; was the United States' goodwill ambassador to Asia in 1957; was appointed by President Eisenhower as an alternate delegate to the American delegation to the United Nations in June 1958; sang at another presidential inauguration—John F. Kennedy's—in 1961; and sang at the Lincoln Memorial as part of the March on Washington in 1963. She received honorary degrees from Temple University and several colleges. Anderson was married in 1943 to the artist and architect Orpheus H. "King" Fisher. She died in Portland, Oregon, on 8 April 1993.

GERRI BATES

See also Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Dett, Robert Nathaniel; Hayes, Roland; Johnson, Hall; King, Billy; Music; Rosenwald Fellowships; White, Walter

Further Reading

Anderson, Marian. My Lord, What a Morning: An Autobiography. New York: Viking, 1956.

Ferris, Jeri. What I Had Was Singing: The Story of Marian Anderson. Minneapolis, Minn.: Lerner, 1994.

"Grounded in Faith, Free to Fly." New York Times, 18 April 1993.

Keiler, Allan. Marian Anderson: A Singer's Journey. New York: Scribner, 2000.

Livingston, Myra C. Keep on Singing: A Ballad of Marian Anderson. New York: Holiday House, 1994.

Anderson, Regina M.

Regina M. Anderson Andrews was instrumental in the development of the Harlem Renaissance because of her vision of community cultural awareness and her ability to inconspicuously implement the ideas of others.

Anderson shared an apartment with Ethel Ray Nance and Louella Tucker in Sugar Hill, at 580 Saint Nicholas Avenue, which became known as the Harlem West Side Literary Salon or simply "580." Andrews began promoting the arts by opening the apartment to community gatherings and cultural activities. She helped organize the famous Civic Club dinner of 1924, which evolved from an event at "580" and was attended by 110 guests, including W. E. B. Du Bois and Langston Hughes. Readings at the dinner inspired Alain Locke, who edited the anthology The New Negro in 1925; this collection of rising African American writers is sometimes considered to mark the birth date of the Harlem Renaissance and to be its definitive work. Gatherings and events at "580"—and a similar salon in Harlem's East End, that of Dorothy Peterson and her brother Jerome Bowers Peterson—were reflected in Carl Van Vechten's fifth novel, Nigger Heaven (1926).

Anderson, a librarian, worked at several branches of the New York Public Library, notably as an assistant to Ernestine Rose at the 135th Street branch (renamed the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture). She felt that her career as a librarian was an opportunity to educate the community about its artists and the scope of its arts, and in that capacity she instituted a series of cultural events within the library system. These included Family Night, which was a setting for activities such as art exhibits and lectures (one of the guest speakers was Marcus Garvey). The cultural initiative also provided homes in the basement of the 135th Street Library for the Crigwa Theater (which moved to the parish house of Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church in 1931), the Harlem Suitcase Theater, and the Harlem Experimental Theater.

Anderson was a significant figure in theater in several ways. She helped Du Bois with the work of the Crigwa Theater (founded 1924–1925), later known as the Krigwa Theater or Krigwa Players. (Its original name was an acronym for Crisis Guild of Writers and Artists, after the official publication of the NAACP, Crisis Magazine.) When the Krigwa Players disbanded, Anderson and Dorothy Peterson founded the Negro Experimental Theater in 1929, on the same principle—as theater by, for, about, and near blacks. Their first production, in June 1929, was Georgia Douglas Johnson's Plumes. This group was later called the Harlem Experimental Theater, and Anderson served as its second executive director. She was also a playwright: The Harlem Experimental Theater produced her one-act dramas Climbing Jacob's Ladder (written under the pseudonym Ursula Treling) and Underground (also pseudonymous) in 1931 and 1932, respectively. Climbing Jacob's Ladder was about a lynching coinciding with a church service and was profoundly influenced by the activist Ida B. Wells. The Harlem Experimental Theater was a factor in the decision of the Federal Theater to come to New York.

Biography

Regina M. Anderson Andrews was born on 21 May 1901, in Chicago, Illinois. Her parents were William Grant Anderson (an attorney in New York) and Margaret Simons Anderson. She was educated at Normal Training School, Hyde Park High School, Wilberforce University in Ohio, the University of Chicago, and City College of New York; she received a master of library science (M.L.S.) degree from Columbia University Library

School. She married William T. Andrews (an attorney and assemblyman) in 1926; they had a daughter, also named Regina. In 1936, Anderson was the first African American to be appointed acting supervising librarian, at the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library. She was recognized for her contributions at the World's Fair of 1939 in New York. In 1947, she became the supervising librarian at the Washington Heights branch of the New York Public Library. She retired from the New York Public Library system in 1967. Anderson wrote a two-volume work (unpublished) about black New Yorkers, originally intended for "Harlem on My Mind," an exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in 1968; and coedited Chronology of African Americans in New York, 1621–1966 with Ethel Ray Nance. Anderson served as the second vice president of the National Council of Women, represented the National Urban League with the United States Commission for UNESCO, and worked with the State Commission for Human Rights. She was a recipient of the Musical Arts Group award, Community Heroine award, and Asia Foundation award. At the time of this writing, she was apparently still living, in upstate New York.

JULYA MIRRO

See also Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Civic Club Dinner, 1924; 580 Saint Nicholas Avenue; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Krigwa Players; Nance, Ethel Ray; Negro Experimental Theater; Nigger Heaven; 135th Street Library; Peterson, Dorothy Randolph; Saint Philip's Protestant Episcopal Church; Salons; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Noonday, 1983.
- Andrews, Regina M. Anderson. Oral History Videotape, Personal Documents, Professional Work. Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1997.
- Mitchell, Lofton. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.
- . Voices of the Black Theatre. Clifton, N.J.: White, 1975.
- Perkins, Kathy A. Black Female Playwrights: An Anthology of Plays Before 1950. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991.

Roses, Lorraine E., and Ruth E. Randolph. "Regina M. Anderson [Ursula Trelling]." In Harlem Renaissance and Beyond: Literary Biographies of 100 Black Women Writers, 1900–1945. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1997.

Anderson, Sherwood

Sherwood Anderson had an important role in the development of modern writing in the United States. His immense influence was based largely on a myth that developed around his life, on his extraordinary fourth book, Winesburg, Ohio (1919), and on several enduring short stories. At a time when the short story was a generally moribund form, Anderson revolutionized it by rejecting what he called the "poisoned plot"—the artificially pat narrative used by O. Henry—and turning it into a vehicle for a serious examination of American realities. Anderson was a tutor and mentor to Ernest Hemingway and William Faulkner, and he influenced the vision and style of such diverse writers as Jean Toomer, Thomas Wolfe, John Steinbeck, William Saroyan, and Henry Miller.

Two towns where Anderson's family lived—Camden and Clyde, Ohio—figured large in Anderson's imagination, providing him with themes and characters for his many novels and poems. Camden gave him images (largely invented) of preindustrial America: attractively human in its relations and proportions, a utopia that would be ravaged by capitalism. Clyde gave him a wealth of complex American characters who balanced repression and meanness with generosity and untrammelled imagination. Almost all of Anderson's writing was woven from this material.

Anderson, who became the president of a manufacturing company, was never happy with the moral and ethical compromises he had to make as a businessman; and on 28 November 28, 1912, the pressures of his life intensified. He walked out of his office in the middle of the morning and did not turn up until four days later, when he wandered into a drugstore in Cleveland, not knowing where he was. This episode became a legend in American literary history, a moment when an important writer turned his back on American materialism and worldly success and took up a quest for creative accomplishment.

Anderson eventually left his first wife and their children and started a new life in Chicago as a writer. What became known as the Chicago renaissance was then in full swing, and Anderson found himself in the company of important writers and publishers, who welcomed and encouraged him. Anderson immersed himself in the tumult of ideas circulating in bohemian Chicago, including current notions of socialism and psychoanalysis, as well as the writings of Gertrude Stein, who became a close friend, and James Joyce.

Anderson had already written three novels when his first story, "The Rabbit-Pen," was accepted for publication by Harper's in 1913. He published Windy MacPherson's Son in 1916 and Marching Men in 1917. He was forty-three years old in 1919 when his masterpiece, Winesburg, Ohio, was published by B. W. Huebsch and became an immediate critical success. In this work, Anderson pioneered a new form, the unified short-story collection, that later in the century represented a significant alternative to the traditional novel. The language of Winesburg, Ohio—inspired, according to Anderson, by Stein's Tender Buttons—is spare and direct; and the narrative is honest, provocative, and indefinite: Anderson represents with stark simplicity and power the alienation that pervaded life in small-town America when industrialization began. This work strongly influenced a generation of younger writers that included Hemingway (whom Anderson introduced to Stein and Faulkner, and whose first novel Anderson got published) and Toomer, among many others.

Over the next several years, Anderson, at the height of his powers and his reputation, published in quick succession Poor White (1920), the story collections The Triumph of the Egg (1921) and Horses and Men (1923), Many Marriages (1923), the autobiographical A Story Teller's Story (1924), and Dark Laughter (1925).

With Dark Laughter, Anderson joined a few writers who were trying to cross the deeply entrenched color line in American culture, by drawing on and recounting the experience of African Americans. Given the political climate of the United States in the 1920s, his attempt was definitely progressive. However, it was hobbled because his treatment of African Americans never went beyond the symbolic. African Americans came to stand for all the vital impulses of the body that Anderson felt were stifled and repressed by American Protestantism. (In this regard his work was not unlike Ishmael Reed's representation of Jes' Grew and The Wallflower Order some fifty years later in Mumbo Jumbo, but without Reed's humor.) Ernest Hemingway parodied Dark Laughter in his own Torrents of Spring (1926), and Toni Morrison subjected both books to critical scrutiny in her essay "Whiteness and the Literary Imagination."

Sherwood Anderson, photographed by Carl Van Vechten in 1933.
(Library of Congress.)

During his remaining years Anderson published some twenty books, but none of them matched the creative accomplishment of his earlier works.

Biography

Sherwood Anderson was born in Camden, Ohio, on 3 September 1876. His family moved to Clyde, Ohio, in 1883 after living briefly in Mansfield and Caledonia. Anderson's father, a harness maker, was never very well off. When his mother died in 1893, Anderson moved to Chicago and worked as an unskilled laborer. After serving in the Spanish-American War, he went back to school for a year, then got a job writing advertising copy in Chicago. In 1904 he married Cornelia Lane, the daughter of a successful businessman. After working his way up in several manufacturing companies, in 1906 he took over and became president of Anderson Manufacturing, later renamed American Merchants Company, in Elyria, Ohio. In 1916 he and his first wife (with whom he had three children) were divorced. He then married Tennessee Mitchell; in 1924 that marriage also ended in divorce—as did his third marriage, to Elizabeth Pral, in 1932. Anderson then traveled from Chicago to New York to Reno to New Orleans and eventually settled in Virginia. In 1933, he married Eleanor Copenhaver. In 1941, on a trip with his wife to South America, he died of peritonitis in Panama.

MICHAEL BOUGHN

See also Dark Laughter; Toomer, Jean

Further Reading

Anderson, David D. Sherwood Anderson: An Introduction and Interpretation. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1967.

Crowley, John W. New Essays on Winesburg, Ohio. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Dickerson, Mary Jane. "Sherwood Anderson and Jean Toomer: A Literary Relationship." Studies in American Fiction, 1, Autumn 1974, pp. 163–175.

Faulkner, William. "Sherwood Anderson: An Appreciation," Atlantic Monthly, 191, June 1953, pp. 27–29.

Howe, Irving. Sherwood Anderson. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1966.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Morrison, Toni. "Whiteness and the Literary Imagination." In Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Rideout, Walter B., ed. Sherwood Anderson: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1974.

Small, Judy Jo. A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Sherwood Anderson. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994.

Townsend, Kim. Sherwood Anderson. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1987.

Anglophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance

Anglophone Africa—which consisted of British colonies in western, eastern, and southern Africa; and the independent country of Liberia, founded by freed American slaves in 1847—occupied a central place in the discourse of the Harlem Renaissance. Like its counterpart, francophone Africa, anglophone Africa provided an imaginative resource that contributed to the cultural and aesthetic base of the Harlem Renaissance. Also, one focus (if not a preoccupation) of the renaissance movement was racial origin and pride, and in this regard the idea of Africa represented many possibilities, of which anglophone Africa provided one. The Harlem Renaissance, for its part, provided anglophone Africa with avenues of self-expression to oppose British colonial rule, develop an agenda for self-rule, and intervene in discourses about a pan-African and pan-Negro philosophy and movement that promoted a unifying agenda for racial self-determination and political freedom. The themes of self-determination, self-assertion, and black pride that defined the Harlem Renaissance resonated favorably in anglophone Africa as it struggled against British colonization. The exchange of ideas about politics, culture, racial roots, and heritage defined the relationship between anglophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance and their opposition to colonial and racial suppression and domination. The English language, which provided a readily available means for intercultural and transatlantic communication, facilitated this connection between anglophone Africa and the Harlem movement.

In the consciousness of the Harlem Renaissance, anglophone Africa was a rallying point for envisioning racial equality and self-determination. In "The Negro Mind Reaches Out" in Alain Locke's The New Negro (1925), W. E. B. Du Bois drew attention to racial and political imbalances in anglophone Africa, with an emphasis on British colonial rule in west Africa (Sierra Leone, Nigeria, and the Gold Coast, later Ghana), British East Africa (Kenya, Uganda, and Sudan), and South Africa. He implied that there was a contradiction in Harlem's appropriation of the idea of Africa as a route to envisioning the New Negro while the African continent was subjected to colonial exploitation and domination. He highlighted Britain's brutal colonial policies, which he characterized as the "shadow of England"—policies that, for example, displaced Africans from their lands in Kenya and South Africa. Du Bois's essay, published in the representative text of the renaissance movement, explained that anglophone Africa was more than a geographical entity. Du Bois portrayed anglophone Africa as a culturally and economically diverse territory marked by economic exploitation, political subjugation, and racial oppression; the Harlem Renaissance addressed these issues in the United States and should also confront them in the wider context of the African diaspora. To do so, and to appeal to the mind of Harlem, Du Bois interpreted British colonial rule in anglophone Africa as fundamentally racist, with white British rulers and black African subjects. However, Du Bois was not alone in focusing on anglophone Africa as an aspect of the aesthetics of the Harlem Renaissance.

The magazines and newspapers of the Harlem Renaissance provided the best indicators of its interest in anglophone Africa. Publications such as books, edited volumes, and anthologies that dealt with topics ranging from folklore to the ancient and modern history of anglophone Africa were highlighted in reviews and articles in Opportunity, The Crisis, and Marcus Garvey's newspaper Negro World. Regular columns in Opportunity variously titled "Africana," "Africana and Exotica," and "Anthropology and Africana" listed books on anglophone Africa. Two columns that Du Bois wrote for The Crisis—"Opinion" and "The Looking Glass"—covered culture, politics, and aesthetics in anglophone Africa. Editorials, opinions, and letters to the editor in Garvey's Negro World promoted an agenda for anglophone Africa that insistently opposed British rule and affirmed African self-governance. At the time of the Harlem Renaissance, the International Institute of African Languages and Culture began to publish a journal in English, Africa (1928–1929), which offered scholarly and intellectual materials on Africa and anglophone Africa, and was therefore favorably reviewed in publications of the renaissance. In addition, reviews of texts on adventure, religion, geography, missionary activities, apartheid in South Africa, art in west Africa, and the "natives" and "primitives" of anglophone Africa appeared regularly in the newspapers and magazines of the renaissance.

For some anglophone Africans, Harlem's newspapers and magazines provided opportunities to question and oppose British colonial rule. Because of British censorship, newspapers in the colonies did not publish anticolonial writings. Not surprisingly, then, anglophone Africans in the colonies sent letters, opinion pieces, stories, and poems to publications in Harlem, calling for political self-representation and self-determination. Through their contributions, anglophone Africans shared in the aspirations of the Harlem Renaissance, which linked its ideology of racial equality in the United States to a call for the end of colonial rule in Africa. Harlem reciprocated not only by publishing the contributions of writers from anglophone Africa but also by espousing anticolonialism. Harlem's newspapers published profiles of various anglophone African countries, such as Sierra Leone, Uganda, and Kenya. Moreover, some of the major figures of the Harlem Renaissance—for example,

W. E. B. Du Bois and Langston Hughes—visited anglophone African countries, particularly in west Africa, and wrote about their experiences; these accounts were also published in the magazines and newspapers of the renaissance. Writers of the Harlem Renaissance also used anglophone Africa in their works, although their depictions were sometimes stereotyped. For example, Langston Hughes set the major action of his short story “Luani of the Jungle” in Lagos, Nigeria.

Literary works of anglophone Africans were also printed in publications of the Harlem Renaissance. For example, in 1922, Negro World published “The Sojourner,” a poem by William Essuman Gwira (Kobina) Sekyi of the Gold Coast—a lawyer, nationalist, Africanist, and pan-Africanist. The anglophone African strain in the Harlem Renaissance was evident in Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets (1927), edited by Countee Cullen. This anthology included poems by Gladys Casely Hayford (1904–1950), west Africa’s first modern female poet. The Messenger and Opportunity also published poems by Hayford. Her poetry captured the cultural and aesthetic mood of the Harlem Renaissance, and in particular the discourse on racial uplift through celebrating and affirming Africa and black beauty, praising individuality, and debunking Western myths and stereotypes of Africans.

In her biographical entry for Caroling Dusk, Hayford said that she was born in Axim, Gold Coast (Ghana), and that her parents were Ephraim Joseph Casely Hayford (1866–1930), a Ghanaian; and Adelaide Smith Casely Hayford (1868–1960), a Sierra Leonean. Hayford’s parents were prominent in the culture and politics of west Africa and had contacts with important figures of the Harlem Renaissance; Du Bois stayed in the Hayfords’ home when he visited Freetown in 1924. Hayford’s mother visited Harlem twice—in 1920 and in 1927—to raise money for a vocational school in Freetown, Sierra Leone, and during these visits she promoted African culture among African Americans. On her first visit, the Crisis of 20 August 1920 informed its readers in Harlem that Mrs. Casely Hayford was the “first West African woman to lecture in America” (169). With her niece, a Miss Easmon, she contributed to the production and performance of a pageant, Asheeko (1922), about the contributions of African Americans to the greatness of America. As a political activist, she was one of the black women (the only African) in Harlem who organized to raise funds for the fourth Pan-African Congress, held in New York in August 1927. The African countries represented at this congress, drawn primarily from anglophone west Africa, were Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, Nigeria, and Liberia.

Gladys Casely Hayford’s father, Joseph Casely Hayford, was a prominent politician in the Gold Coast; because of his anticolonial, nationalist, and pan-Africanist views, he had contacts with significant figures of the Harlem Renaissance, such as Du Bois and Marcus Garvey. In 1920, he founded the National Congress of British West Africa (NCBWA), the first political movement in colonial west Africa, which comprised the British colonies of Sierra Leone, Nigeria, the Gold Coast, Nigeria, and the republic of Liberia. The main goal of NCBWA was the liberation of anglophone west Africa from British colonial rule; thus the organization was a natural ally of the anticolonialists of the Harlem Renaissance. Du Bois and Garvey saw NCBWA in west Africa and the pan-African and pan-Negro movements in Harlem as part of a global effort by black people to unify Africa and the African diaspora in the struggle against racial and colonial domination.

Politics was no doubt the most significant aspect of the relationship between the Harlem Renaissance and anglophone Africa. The political vision of self-determination and self-governance, articulated in the aesthetics of Harlem and transformed into political capital by Du Bois and Garvey, became very influential in anglophone Africa. Du Bois’s pan-African movement was initiated at about the time—the 1920s—when modern political consciousness and nationalism were taking shape in anglophone west Africa (as is evident in the formation of NCBWA); and Garvey’s vision and ideology of black empowerment were defined by his call “Africa for Africans.”

From Harlem, Garvey transformed his United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) into an anti-colonial movement, demanding that whites leave Africa; this position appealed to anglophone Africans under colonial rule. In 1922, Garvey told the British government that UNIA stood for the liberation of African colonies, particularly the British colonies of Nigeria, Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, and southwestern and east Africa. In the 1920s, branches of UNIA were established in anglophone west Africa, although the British colonial governments disapproved of UNIA and monitored its activities in the region. In 1924, Garvey negotiated with Liberia for an immigrant settlement by UNIA in southern Liberia; but this attempt was thwarted by the English and French, who feared anticolonial Garveyite ideas in Africa, especially near their colonies. Garvey’s anticolonial Negro World was very popular in anglophone Africa; the British considered it seditious, disloyal, and a threat to their interests in Africa, and therefore banned it in most of their African colonies. But despite government regulations and monitoring, Negro World was being received by African nationalists in South Africa as late as 1933. Garvey's political and anticolonial philosophy had an especially strong influence on anglophone west African political consciousness during its formative period, the 1920s. NCBWA, in defining its anticolonial position, incorporated Garvey's ideas on African and racial self-determination. On the eve of Ghana's independence, Kwame Nkrumah expressed his allegiance to Garvey's philosophy; and in his autobiography, he noted that as he formed his political ideas, he was influenced by Garvey's Philosophy and Opinions. Jomo Kenyatta, the leader of the Mau Mau and later president of Kenya, described how in 1921 Kenyan nationalists, unable to read, would gather round a reader of Garvey's paper the Negro World, and listen to an article two or three times. Then they would run various ways through the forest, carefully to repeat the whole, which they had memorized, to Africans hungry for some doctrine which lifted them from their servile consciousness in which Africans lived. (James 1963, 397)

Garvey's wife recounted how the king of Swaziland had stated that the only two black men he was aware of in the Western world were the boxing champion Jack Johnson and Marcus Garvey.

Music was another link between anglophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance, and in this regard, the music of Samuel Coleridge-Taylor (1875–1912) was particularly significant. Coleridge-Taylor, who was born to a British mother and a Sierra Leonean father, was a famous composer of choral music, including Hiawatha's Wedding Feast (1897); Du Bois, in Darkwater, eulogized him as the "immortal child." In his work, Coleridge-Taylor expressed his African and black identity, a theme many Harlem Renaissance musicians would later incorporate into their own compositions. He based some of his compositions on African and African American subjects and melodies. His African Romances (1897) and African Suite (1898) reflected his African heritage; Sorrow Songs (1904) and Six Negro Melodies (1905) drew on both African and African American song traditions. Coleridge-Taylor wanted to reclaim black identity—and even more, the dignity of the black man—through music; and he inspired

African American composers of the period leading to and including the Harlem Renaissance who used their music to inquire into their cultural roots and heritage. He directly influenced composers of the Harlem Renaissance such as Harry T. Burleigh (1866–1949) and, especially, Clarence Cameron White (1880–1960).

Anglophone Africa and Harlem shared a vision that was anticolonial and antiracist. The Harlem Renaissance contributed significantly to the development of political consciousness and activism in anglophone Africa, either through pan-Africanism and pan-Negroism, which provided political capital for self-empowerment and opportunities for addressing oppression and subjugation; or through art, which provided aesthetic capital for transatlantic contacts and cultural awareness. For its part, anglophone Africa became one of the many regions in Africa that the Harlem Renaissance used to conceptualize the meaning of heritage, roots, and history and to articulate racial pride. It should be noted, though, that the discourse of the Harlem Renaissance occasionally reproduced uncritically the stereotypical rhetoric about anglophone Africa that was part of the colonial representation of Africa as a whole.

PATRICK S. BERNARD

See also Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance; Garvey, Marcus; Hughes, Langston; Messenger, The; Negro World; Opportunity; Pan-African Congresses; Pan-Africanism; United Negro Improvement Association; White, Clarence Cameron

Further Reading

- Adebayo, J. Babington. "The British West African Congress: Marcus Garvey's Pan-Negroism and the Universal Negro Improvement Association." Lagos Weekly Record, 27, November 1920, p. 7.
- Agard, J. E. "Some Impressions of Uganda." Crisis, 30, May 1925, p. 22.
- Brown, Lloyd. "The African Heritage and the Harlem Renaissance: A Re-Evaluation." African Literature Today, 9, 1978, pp. 1–9.
- Clarke, John Henrik, ed. Marcus Garvey and the Vision of Africa. New York: Vintage, 1974.
- Coleman, James. Nigeria: Background to Nationalism. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1965.
- Cromwell, Adelaide M. An African Victorian Feminist: The Life and Times of Adelaide Smith Casely Hayford,

- 1868–1960. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1992.
- Cullen, Countee. Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. New York: Harper and Row, 1927.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Little Portraits of Africa." Crisis, 27, April 1924, p. 274.
- . "The Negro Mind Reaches Out." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992. (Originally published 1925.)
- . "The Immortal Child." Dark Water: Voices from within the Veil. Toronto: Dover, 1999, pp. 114–127. (Originally published 1920.)
- Garvey, Marcus. Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, ed. Amy Jacques-Garvey. New York: Atheneum, 1969.
- Hughes, Langston. "Ships, Sea, and Africa." Crisis, 27, December 1923, p. 72.
- . "Luani of the Jungle." Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life, 1, November 1928.
- . The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Hill and Wang, 1963.
- Hodgkins, T. Nationalism in Colonial Africa. London: Muller, 1956.
- James, C. L. R. The Black Jacobins. New York: Vintage, 1963.
- "Kenya: A Study of English East African Conditions as Revealed by Norman Leys." Crisis, 31, February 1926, p. 91.
- Langley, Jabez Ayodele. "Garveyism and African Nationalism." Race, 2, April 1970, pp. 157–172.
- Obadende, I. M. "An African Program." Crisis, 24, May 1922, p. 33.
- Ojo-Ade, Femi, ed. Of Dreams Deferred, Dead, or Alive: African Perspectives on African-American Writers. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1996.
- Sekyi, Kobina. "The Sojourner." Negro World, May 1922.
- Shepperson, G. "Pan-Africanism and 'Pan-Africanism': Some Historical Notes." Phylon, 4, 1962, p. 356.
- "Sierra Leone." Crisis, 26, June 1923, p. 76.
- Weisbord, Robert G. "Marcus Garvey, Pan-Negroist: The View From Whitehall." Race, 2, April 1970, pp. 419–429.
- "Zion in Africa: An Open Letter on Missions in West Africa by a Native Christian Secondee, Gold Coast, West Africa." Crisis, 31, April 1926, p. 293.

Anglophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance

The Harlem Renaissance and the anglophone Caribbean presence in the United States are intimately and inextricably bound together. Claude McKay, Eric Walrond, Marcus Garvey, Hubert Harrison, Cyril Briggs, Amy Jacques Garvey, Wilfred A. Domingo, and Joel A. Rogers are only a few of the better-known Caribbean immigrants who were closely associated with the renaissance, which was as much a political as a cultural movement.

Caribbeans (especially those from English-speaking territories) distinguished themselves during the Harlem Renaissance as writers, editors, publishers of newspapers and magazines, organizers of political and cultural forums, street-corner orators, founders of dissenting political movements, and raisers of political consciousness. Their contribution is all the more remarkable when one considers that during this period, the foreign-born component never exceeded 1 percent of the black population in the United States. And were we to include those of Caribbean descent born in the United States, other notable figures of the period would be among them, such as W. E. B. Du Bois (whose father was born in Haiti but had roots in the Bahamas), James Weldon Johnson (whose mother was Bahamian), William Stanley Braithwaite (whose father was from British Guiana), and Grace Campbell (whose father was Jamaican)—all of whom expressed pride in their Caribbean background.

McKay's role as poet and novelist was pivotal in the renaissance. Eric Walrond's collection of short stories Tropic Death (1926) was an artistic triumph; but perhaps because the stories are set in the Caribbean and Central America and because the author was a pioneer in using regional creole languages for artistic expression, Tropic Death is less known and less appreciated in the United States than in Caribbean literary history and criticism. Although Walrond also wrote short stories set in the United States, he is recognized there more as a journalist and editor. Between 1921 and 1923, he served as associate editor of Negro World, the organ of the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) founded and led by Marcus Garvey. Two years after his break with Garvey, Walrond was the business manager and contributing editor for Opportunity, founded and edited by Charles Johnson under the auspices of the National Urban League. In all his writings—short stories, book reviews, essays—Walrond revealed himself as a master prose stylist and a serious thinker. Wallace Thurman, the enfant terrible of the Harlem Renaissance and the most unsparing critic of his contemporaries (and himself), showered Walrond with praise. Of the renaissance writers, observed Thurman, "None is more ambitious than he, none more possessed of keener observation, poetic insight or intelligence. There is no place in his consciousness for sentimentality, hypocrisy or clichés. His prose demonstrates his struggles to escape from conventionalities and become an individual talent." Thurman, however, felt that Walrond's talents were not fully realized, even in Tropic Death. He hoped that Walrond's promised novel on the Panama Canal, "The Big Ditch," which Walrond had received a Guggenheim fellowship to write, would prove an even greater triumph. But Walrond left for Britain in 1928 and never returned to the United States; he worked with the exiled Marcus Garvey in London on the latter's journal, Black Man, but the "The Big Ditch" was never finished. Resident mainly in Britain, Walrond traveled widely in Europe, despite failing health. He collapsed and died of a heart attack, his fifth, on a London street in 1966.

Caribbeans not only founded but also edited radical journals and newspapers such as Voice, Crusader, Negro World, Promoter, Emancipator, and New Negro. Hubert Harrison, an immigrant from the Virgin Islands, was a pioneer in this area of New Negro radical journalism; A. Philip Randolph called him the "father of Harlem radicalism." Harrison, a legendary orator, created Voice, the first journal of its type, in 1917. Two years later he brought out a short-lived magazine, New Negro, and before his own sudden death (from a ruptured appendix) in 1927 he had founded another journal, Voice of the Negro. Ephemeral though Harrison's magazines and journals were, his writings and example had a vast influence on the journalism of the time. Hodge Kirnon, in his obituary of Harrison, noted that Voice "really crystallized the radicalism of the Negro in New York and its environs." Kirnon, an immigrant from Saint Kitts, would draw on Harrison's example in founding his own magazine, Promoter.

Another Caribbean immigrant, Cyril Briggs, founded the magazine Crusader in 1918; it was the organ of the African Blood Brotherhood, which Briggs organized and led, between 1919 and 1923. W. A. Domingo (from Jamaica) and Richard B. Moore (from Barbados), two black socialists, founded Emancipator in 1920 mainly as a challenge to Garvey's movement. But Emancipator, although it had some influence over the black movement, especially through a famous exposé of the finances of Garvey's shipping company, the Black Star Line, was no match for UNIA; and unlike its black nationalist rival, Negro World, it lasted for only a few months.

Negro World, founded in 1918, was by far the most influential of these organs. During Garvey's tenure, each issue carried on the front page an editorial by him addressed to the "Negroes of the World"; this newspaper would outlast Garvey's departure in the late 1920s, although it died slowly as UNIA imploded and disintegrated in the 1930s. During its heyday, Negro World attracted the writing of some of the most talented figures of the Harlem Renaissance: Zora Neale Hurston, Claude McKay, J. A. Rogers, Arturo Schomburg, Walrond, and others. Distinguished African American intellectuals such as T. Thomas Fortune, a firebrand from the 1880s; William Ferris, a graduate of Yale; and John Edward Bruce, the venerable black nationalist, served as editors on Negro World during the 1920s; and it was in the pages of Negro World that Hubert Harrison, who was its managing editor and later a contributing editor between 1920 and 1922, reached his widest audience. Harrison revamped Negro World, included more book reviews, and regularly ran "Poetry for the People," a forum, often filling an entire page, that carried a wide variety of poems by ordinary black people in the United States and around the world. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of Negro World was "Our Women and What They Think," a deliberately unorthodox women's page, edited by Amy Jacques Garvey (a Jamaican immigrant, Garvey's second wife), which ran in 1924–1927. Amy Jacques, who combined militant black nationalism and feminism, won the admiration of black women within and outside UNIA and alienated some of its more conventional male leaders; the movement killed her column in 1927.

Apart from their involvement in publications owned and run by Caribbeans, the immigrants made significant contributions to others. Domingo was Garvey's first editor of Negro World but was fired by Garvey in 1919 for his socialist writing and immediately became a contributing editor for the Messenger magazine, edited and run by the African American socialists A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen. Claude McKay returned from a yearlong sojourn in Britain in 1921 and became associate editor of the influential revolutionary socialist magazine Liberator, edited by Max Eastman. Rogers, Walrond, McKay, and especially Harrison contributed to a wide range of mainstream and black periodicals during the 1920s. Additionally, several of these Caribbean writers contributed to major anthologies. Alain Locke's influential New Negro (1925) included the work of McKay, Walrond, Rogers, and Domingo; V. F. Calverton's Anthology of American Negro Literature (1929) included McKay (poetry and prose) and Walrond. McKay's poems appeared in all of the anthologies of black poetry published in the 1920s: James Weldon Johnson, The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922); Robert Thomas Kerlin, Negro Poets and Their Poems (1923); Countee Cullen, Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets (1927); and Alain Locke, Four Negro Poets (1927).

McKay and Walrond were among the immigrants who published volumes of their own work. The prolific McKay produced two highly influential and acclaimed volumes of poetry—Spring in New Hampshire and Other Poems (1920) and Harlem Shadows (1922)—and two pioneering and controversial novels: Home to Harlem (1928) and Banjo (1929). Hubert Harrison published two remarkable and influential collections of his essays: The Negro and the Nation (1917) and When Africa Awakes: The “Inside Story” of the Stirrings and Strivings of the New Negro in the Western World (1920). J. A. Rogers published several antiracist books before publishing, in 1931, the antiracist classic World’s Great Men of African Descent (later revised as World’s Great Men of Color). His most influential work in the 1920s was From “Superman” to Man, a Socratic dialogue in the form of a novel that first appeared in 1917 and was reprinted several times during the next decade. This book was acclaimed by all of the factions engaged in the black struggle, a rare accolade; UNIA made it required reading for members; and Du Bois wrote: “The person who wants in small compass, in good English and an attractive form, the arguments for the present Negro position should buy and read and recommend to his friends” Rogers’s book. Hubert Harrison, who dished out praise sparingly, described From “Superman” to Man as the “greatest book ever written in English on the Negro by a Negro.”

The great comedian Bert Williams (from Antigua) was a pioneer of black theater and helped open up Broadway to blacks. Williams received both praise and criticism. Theophilus Lewis, the theater critic for Messenger, averred that Williams “rendered a disservice to black people” by encouraging Broadway not to “countenance the Negro in serious, dignified, classical drama.” Walrond, writing in Negro World, disagreed. He held that Williams had made it possible for black shows such as Shuffle Along to be staged on Broadway and also had been “directly responsible” for bringing to Broadway more serious dramas, such as The Emperor Jones: “There is no doubt about it—Bert Williams will go down in history alongside the great artists of the theatre of all time. To us, to whom he meant so much as an ambassador across the border of color, his memory will grow richer and more glorious as time goes on.”

Much of the literature on the Harlem Renaissance focuses on the role of white patrons. Consequently, the role of the only notable black patron—Casper Holstein, born in the Virgin Islands—is often overlooked. Holstein made his money as a “numbers king” in Harlem; he was the most successful and most honest practitioner of this gambling game (unlike many others, he paid out when bettors won), and by far the most generous. Beginning in 1925, Holstein put up the prize money for Opportunity’s annual contest for Negro writers (which extended to composers of music as well). In 1926, this amounted to more than $1,000—a not inconsiderable sum. Holstein explained that he had always been a “firm and enthusiastic believer in the creative genius of the Negro race, to which I humbly belong.” He congratulated Opportunity for organizing the contest, which he believed would “go far towards consolidating the interests of and bridging the gap” between black and white people in the United States. The contest, he wrote, “will encourage among our gifted youth the ambition to scale the empyrean heights of art and literature.” Holstein also made individual gifts to needy young artists. Eric Walrond was one of his beneficiaries and dedicated Tropic Death to him. Another was Holstein’s compatriot Hubert Harrison, who endured a mainly hand-to-mouth existence; Holstein also paid for Harrison’s funeral. When Garvey’s Liberty Hall was threatened with repossession, Holstein came to the rescue. From his associations, it is discernible that Holstein was not a conservative, despite his success in business. He had time and money for some of Harlem’s most radical citizens, and he spoke out in uncompromising terms against American rule in his native Virgin Islands (purchased by the United States from Denmark in 1917), publishing articles on the subject in Opportunity and Negro World. Through his various efforts, Holstein contributed to the artistic and political culture of the Harlem Renaissance.

Caribbean immigrants also distinguished themselves as some of Harlem’s and Afro-America’s most accomplished orators. Harrison was by far the most erudite and experienced, but Garvey was more popular as a platform speaker. Richard B. Moore quickly earned a reputation as a great orator—passionate, eloquent, and informed—surpassed only by his elders Garvey and Harrison at their best. In the 1920s and 1930s, Moore’s oratorical talents would be exploited to good effect by the Communist Party, which he had joined by 1923. J. Edgar Hoover’s spies from the Justice Department were not only alarmed but also impressed by these men’s eloquence, force, and impact as orators.

Men dominated the speakers' platforms in Harlem, on the street corners as well as indoors, but women were by no means absent. An African American, Henrietta Vinton Davis, the highest-ranking woman in UNIA, was among the very best orators of either sex. The fact that she had a successful stage career before devoting herself full time to Garvey's movement probably contributed to her effectiveness on the podium at Liberty Hall. Amy Jacques Garvey was a highly effective and popular public speaker, although she seldom spoke, preferring to devote her time to writing. Among the black socialists, Elizabeth Hendrickson, a Virgin Islander, was also considered among the best by her contemporaries.

But it was in radical politics, both black nationalist and socialist, that the Caribbean presence was most conspicuous during the Harlem Renaissance. Hubert Harrison once again stands out as a pioneer; amazingly, he won black converts to both revolutionary socialism and black nationalism. This apparent paradox is explained by the fact that Harrison was a member of the Socialist Party between 1909 and 1914 and subsequently moved toward black nationalism but never abandoned his deeply ingrained Marxism. Harrison left the Socialist Party because of the racism he encountered within it, even among its leaders. He felt that the party preached "class first" but practiced "race first," discriminating against the black working class, especially in the South; and that so as not to offend its southern white working-class members, the party had compromised its principles and succumbed to what he called "southernism"—the trumping of working-class solidarity by white supremacy. Harrison was suspended by the party in 1914 and subsequently resigned. (He apparently rejoined in 1918 but left again soon thereafter, never to return.) He insisted that because white socialists, except for the Industrial Workers of the World, practiced "race first and class after," African Americans should also practice "race first," if only in self-defense. To forward this ideology, Harrison formed the Liberty League of Negro-Americans in the summer of 1917. As Harrison put it, this league was part of Afro-America's "bold bid for some of that democracy for which their government [had] gone to war."

Moore, Domingo, McKay, and Frank Crosswaith first encountered Harrison during his socialist phase and were deeply affected by him. A. Philip Randolph recalled that when he and Chandler Owen encountered Harrison, they explained to him: "We want to develop a street forum comparable to yours. We don't plan to have any competition, but we want to extend your work, what you're doing." The extension of Harrison's work would go beyond the street forum into the publication of Messenger, and by 1926 Randolph would also embark directly on the organization of the black working class in the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, in which Caribbean immigrants such as Ashley Totten, Thomas Patterson, and Frank Crosswaith would play leading roles.

When Garvey arrived in the United States in 1916, Harrison (then in his black nationalist phase) was the first to offer him a public platform in Harlem. Harrison would later work with Garvey, especially on Negro World, but apparently never joined UNIA. It was from Harrison that Garvey borrowed the slogan "race first," and much else. Garvey developed the largest black organization the world had ever known and mobilized ordinary African Americans to an unprecedented degree, especially in the South. The leadership of UNIA in the United States and abroad was disproportionately of anglophone Caribbean origin (Vincent, 1970)—as was Cyril Briggs's African Blood Brotherhood (ABB). ABB, founded in Harlem in 1919, began as a classical black nationalist organization. But its leaders, increasingly attracted by the anti-imperialism and antiracism of the Russian revolution and the Communist International, dissolved the organization and joined forces with the Communist Party of the United States in 1923.

At both the cultural and political levels, anglophone Caribbeans played a disproportionate role during the Harlem Renaissance. The reason for this is complex, but we can briefly outline some of its key components.

Approximately 143,000 black people immigrated to the United States between 1899 and 1932. About 80 percent of these came from the Caribbean. Although they made up less than 1 percent of the black population in the United States, Caribbean immigrants and people of Caribbean descent constituted 20 to 25 percent of the black population in Harlem during the 1920s. Thus their weight was far greater, and they were more conspicuous, in Harlem and New York City than nationally.

Far more than their African American counterparts in Harlem and elsewhere, Caribbean immigrants, especially those who came to New York, had a high level of literacy and professional training. These black immigrants were far more literate than European immigrants entering the United States at the time, and they were also more literate and generally better-educated than the native-born white population. Some, such as McKay, Walrond, and Garvey, had begun their literary and journalistic careers before emigrating to the United States. By the time McKay left Jamaica, he was a well-known literary figure who was widely published in newspapers there and abroad and had written two highly acclaimed volumes of poetry. Walrond had started out as a journalist in Panama, where he grew up; Garvey had started in this field during his stay in Costa Rica and London, and then in Jamaica, before he came to the United States.

In the British Caribbean, the population was overwhelmingly black, and immigrants who came from there to the United States found it difficult to adjust to a minority status, or to being maligned, persecuted, and considered pariahs. McKay's reaction was typical: "It was the first time I had ever come face to face with such manifest and implacable hate of my race, and my feelings were indescribable. . . . I had heard of prejudice in America but never dreamed of it being so intensely bitter." When Hugh Mulzac first came to the United States, he was barred from entering a church because of his color; he quickly concluded of white America: "These people are not Christians, but savages!" Shock and frustrated hopes (especially among the most highly educated) contributed to Caribbean immigrants' radicalization and their disproportionate involvement in dissident political projects. McKay, in particular, would express bitterness and anger in his literary work and his politics. Moreover, the immigrants' shock and outrage were exacerbated by certain entrenched features of American society at the time they arrived, particularly Jim Crow (which was official in the South and unofficial in the North) and lynching.

The extensive travel and international experience of many of these migrants contributed significantly to the pan-Africanist and race-conscious thrust of the Harlem Renaissance. Contemporary commentators, black and white, attributed this internationalist dimension of the movement largely to the Caribbeans. Garvey, in particular, movingly recalled his travels to and experiences in Central America, Europe, and Jamaica, where he found that blackness was "the same stumbling block." He asked himself: "Where is the black man's Government? Where is his King and his kingdom? Where is his President, and his ambassador, his army, his navy, his men of big affairs?" He could not find them, and vowed: "I will help to make them."

Relations between Afro-Caribbeans and Afro-Americans were by no means untroubled. Ethnic epithets such as "monkey chaser" and "coon" were not unknown. Wallace Thurman, McKay, and especially Rudolph Fisher scrutinized this tension in their fiction and elsewhere, making intraracial interactions a subject of the literature that emerged during the Harlem Renaissance. The moment of greatest tension was during the "Garvey must go" campaign of 1922–1923. But the historical literature on the relations between these two parts of the African diaspora in Harlem have tended to overstate ethnic conflict and understate the remarkable level of collaboration and cooperation between them. Afro-Americans and Afro-Caribbeans married one another; shared their culture (including cuisine, music, and sartorial tastes); learned to live with one another in a very densely populated place; and joined forces, fighting shoulder to shoulder, in political movements against racism and class oppression. The tension that did exist was largely confined to the petit bourgeois and professionals of both groups, and this tension abated significantly during the Depression, which was a calamity shared by Caribbeans and African Americans alike and brought the exuberance of the Harlem Renaissance to a sudden end.

The Caribbean legacy of the Harlem Renaissance in the arts and politics would continue in subsequent generations: Paule Marshall, Shirley Chisholm, Kenneth Clark, Malcolm X, Louis Farrakhan, Harry Belafonte, St. Clair Drake, Lani Guinier, and Constance Motley Baker are some of the direct descendants of those who arrived and settled during the renaissance. In their work and contribution to the black struggle and the life of the republic generally, one discerns the continuation of a tradition.

WINSTON JAMES

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Briggs, Cyril; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Calverton, V. F.; Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus; Emancipator; Garvey, Marcus; Harrison, Hubert; Holstein, Casper; Liberator, The; McKay, Claude; Messenger, The; Moore, Richard B.; Negro World; Numbers Racket; Opportunity; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Thurman, Wallace; Tropic Death; Walrond, Eric; other specific individuals

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. A. Philip Randolph: A Biographical Portrait. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986.
- Cooper, Wayne, ed. The Passion of Claude McKay: Selected Poetry and Prose, 1912–1948. New York: Schocken, 1973.

- Harrison, Hubert. When Africa Awakes: The "Inside Story" of the Stirrings and Strivings of the New Negro in the Western World. New York: Porro, 1920.
- Holder, Calvin. "The Causes and Composition of West Indian Immigration to New York City, 1900–1952." Afro-Americans in New York Life and History, 11(1), January 1987.
- James, Winston. Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in Early Twentieth-Century America. New York: Verso, 1998.
- . "Explaining Afro-Caribbean Social Mobility in the United States: Beyond the Sowell Thesis." Comparative Studies in Society and History, 44(2), April 2002, pp. 218–262.
- . "Being Red and Black in Jim Crow America: On the Ideology and Travails of Afro-America's Socialist Pioneers." In Time Longer Than Rope: A Century of African American Activism, ed. Charles Payne and Adam Green. New York: New York University Press, 2003, pp. 336–399.
- Martin, Tony. Race First: The Ideological and Organizational Struggles of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1976.
- . Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983.
- , ed. African Fundamentalism: A Literary and Cultural Anthology of Garvey's Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1991.
- McKay, Claude. Harlem: Negro Metropolis. New York: Dutton, 1940.
- Mulzac, Hugh. A Star to Steer By. New York: International, 1963.
- Parascandola, Louis J. "Winds Can Wake Up the Dead": An Eric Walrond Reader. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1998.
- Perry, Jeffrey B. A Hubert Harrison Reader. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 2001.
- Turner, W. Burghardt, and Joyce Moore Turner, eds. Richard B. Moore, Caribbean Militant in Harlem: Collected Writings, 1920–1972. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988.
- Vincent, Ted. Keep Cool: The Black Activists Who Built the Jazz Age. London: Pluto, 1995.
- Vincent, Theodore. Black Power and the Garvey Movement. Berkeley, Calif.: Ramparts, 1970.
- , ed. Voices of a Black Nation: Political Journalism in the Harlem Renaissance. San Francisco, Calif.: Ramparts, 1973.
- Walrond, Eric. Tropic Death. New York: Boni and Liveright, 1926.

Watkins-Owens, Irma. Blood Relations: Caribbean Immigrants and the Harlem Community, 1900–1930. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

Anita Bush Theater Company

The Anita Bush Theater Company—also known as the Anita Bush All-Colored Dramatic Stock Company and the Anita Bush Players and eventually renamed the Lafayette Players Stock Company—developed during the period 1910–1917, when Negroes were exiled from the downtown theaters of New York, as a setting in which black performers played to almost exclusively black audiences. This atmosphere offered a new freedom from the constraints of performing to white or predominantly white audiences. The performers in Bush's company came from the days of shows by Isham, Williams and Walker, and Cole and Johnson; they included Anita Bush, Ida Anderson, Andrew Bishop, Laura Bowman, Tom Brown, Jack Carter, Inez Clough, A. B. Comathiere, Cleo Desmond, Evelyn Ellis, Charles Gilpin, Lottie Grady, Sidney Kirkpatrick, Abbie Mitchell, Lionel Monagas, Charles Moore, Clarence Muse, Charles Olden, Susie Sutton, Edna Thomas, Walter Thompson, "Babe" Townsend, and Frank Wilson.

Anita Bush (1883–1974), a pioneer in black theater, founded her company in 1912, after an injury forced her to stop performing as a dancer. The Anita Bush Players toured the vaudeville circuit, presenting dramatic sketches based on life in the Old West and staged plays at the Lincoln Theater at 135th Street and Lenox Avenue until the company moved to the Lafayette Theater. Bush had taken her idea for a new stock company to Eugene "Frenchy" Elmore, assistant manager of the Lincoln Theater, which was newly renovated but was experiencing an economic slump. Elmore quickly signed a contract with Bush, who assured him that the company would be ready to perform in two weeks. Bush also persuaded Billie Burke, a white male director-playwright, to direct the group in his comedy The Girl at the Fort. The Anita Bush Players opened in this play at the Lincoln Theater on 19 November 1915, with Charles Gilpin as the leading man and Dooley Wilson in a supporting role. For the next six weeks, the company presented different plays at two-week intervals. However, Elmore left to take a position at the rival Lafayette Theater, and Maria C. Downs, who then managed the Lincoln, demanded that Bush change the name of the company to the Lincoln Players. Bush refused and, with the help of the drama critic Lester A. Walton, moved to the Lafayette, at 132nd Street and Seventh Avenue.

The company, still bearing Bush's name, opened at the Lafayette on 27 December 1915 in Across the Footlights and for a while presented short plays each week. Many of the presentations were adaptations of Broadway melodramas and old favorites such as The Gambler's Sweetheart (adapted from The Girl of the Golden West); the company also produced a version of Dion Boucicault's The Octoroon.

By March 1916, as a result of financial difficulties, Bush sold the company, and with her consent its name was changed to the Lafayette Players Stock Company. She remained with the company until 1920, establishing new groups of Lafayette Players at other theaters on the touring circuit. By 1917, there were four troupes of Lafayette Players.

FELECIA PIGGOTT-McMILLAN

See also Bush, Anita; Clough, Inez; Ellis, Evelyn; Gilpin, Charles; Kirkpatrick, Sidney; Lafayette Players; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Mitchell, Abbie; Muse, Clarence; Thomas, Edna Lewis; Walton, Lester; Wilson, Arthur "Dooley" Wilson, Frank

Further Reading

Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Atheneum, 1968.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Mitchell, Loftin. Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.

Peterson, Bernard L. The African American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960: A Comprehensive Guide to Early Black Theatre Organizations, Companies, Theatres, and Performing Groups. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Antilynching Crusade

The crusade to end lynching in the United States began in the final decade of the nineteenth century and continued relatively unabated until the middle of the twentieth. During that time, organizations such as the Council on International Cooperation (CIC), Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA), National Association of Colored Women (NACW), United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), National Citizens Rights Association (NCRA), National Equal Rights League (NERL), and American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) worked toward the eradication of lynching through programs of education, investigation, and publicity and through advocacy for a federal antilynching statute. Sometimes these groups cooperated in their efforts to end lynching, but more often than not, they found themselves at odds with each other over the best means to apply. While activists such as Ida B. Wells Barnett and organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching (ASWPL) fought valiantly for the enactment of federal antilynching legislation, they were never successful. The antilynching crusade nevertheless paved the way for the equal rights movement that followed, and it helped establish the NAACP as a national force to be reckoned with in the pursuit of political and social justice. Accompanying these efforts to eradicate lynching was the work of writers of the Harlem Renaissance, who dramatized the horrors of lynching in their poetry and prose and united to form the Writers' League against Lynching in 1933.

Between 1892 and 1940, there were approximately 3,000 lynchings in the United States; of those lynched, more than 2,600 were African American. This remarkable number and the terrible violence that characterized the lynchings compelled Ida B. Wells Barnett, among others, to organize in resistance. Wells Barnett eloquently challenged the most prominent myth about lynching—that most lynchings were justified as a response to the rape of white women by black men—by investigating lynchings throughout the South. In A Red Record (1895), she published her findings: that rape was seldom the charge for which black men were lynched and that the numerous lynchings of African American women directly challenged the connection between rape and lynching. Wells Barnett argued that lynching was more accurately described as a mechanism for depriving African Americans of their constitutional rights. This text—by debunking the myths that were used to justify lynchings, by publicizing the number and violent nature of lynchings, and by seeking to create economic disincentives for southern jurisdictions that were permissive regarding “lynch rule”—set a precedent for subsequent antilynching campaigns (Brown 2000).

When the NAACP was founded in 1909, a vigorous antilynching effort was already under way. However, two of the NAACP’s leaders—James Weldon Johnson and, later, Walter White, whose Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch (1929) remains an indispensable account—made lynching a primary focus of the organization. Using many of the techniques pioneered by Wells Barnett, the NAACP made its campaign against lynching the basis for numerous fund-raising activities, lobbied for federal antilynching legislation, and used its new prominence in the antilynching effort to draw attention to other racial inequalities. The NAACP hired Johnson in 1916, and by 1918 he had helped launch a five-year, high-priority attack on lynching. This undertaking included conferences, letter-writing campaigns, and countless editorials in the organization’s newspaper, The Crisis; but the most visible effort was support of the Dyer bill, antilynching legislation introduced by Leonidas Dyer (Republican, Missouri) in April 1918. Although the Dyer bill and others like it—including the Costigan-Wagner bill of 1937—would pass the House of Representatives, no federal antilynching bill ever received the approval of the Senate. Between 1918 and 1923, and again between 1933 and 1937, a large proportion of the NAACP’s operating budget and organizational efforts was directed toward the crusade to end lynching (Zangrando 1980).

Other organizations, some occasionally affiliated with the NAACP, worked hard to eradicate lynching. In 1922 the NAACP supported the creation of the Anti-Lynching Crusaders, a group headed by Mary Talbert (of the NACW) and dedicated to raising $1 million from one million members to combat lynching. Although they never reached this goal, the Anti-Lynching Crusaders did raise nearly $70,000. The ASWPL, founded in 1930 by Jessie Daniel Ames, attempted to combat lynching through investigations and publicity, and by seeking pledges from southern law enforcement officials to work against lynching. Despite their shared goal, the ASWPL and the NAACP were frequently at odds because the ASWPL was segregated and did not support federal antilynching legislation. In 1937, the NAACP’s field secretary Daisy Lampkin oversaw a “Stop Lynching” button campaign that raised awareness and nearly $10,000.

In addition to these organized endeavors to end lynching through direct political action, there were numerous literary attacks. James Weldon Johnson not only addressed lynching in his official duties for the NAACP but also vividly described the effects of lynching in his Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man. Other literary responses came from figures such as W. E. B. Du Bois (in his work for The Crisis), Jean Toomer (the poems “Blood-Burning Moon” and “Portrait in Georgia” in Cane), Claude McKay (the poems “If We Must Die” and “The Lynching”), Georgia Douglas Johnson, Angelina Weld Grimké, and others. Nella Larsen, Jessie Fauset, Mary White Ovington, Dorothy Parker, Sinclair Lewis, and Upton Sinclair were among the members of the Writers’ League against Lynching.

Although its inability to get federal legislation enacted was an important factor in its demise, the antilynching crusade had lost momentum for other reasons as well: a general decrease in lynchings during the period of World War II; widespread interest in atrocities abroad, rather than at home; and the NAACP’s shift in focus to more pressing matters—notably, segregation in the armed forces, housing, and the workplace. Despite the explicit failure of many of the antilynching crusaders, their work drew attention to the horrors of lynching, gained recognition for the NAACP, and laid the groundwork for other efforts on behalf of equal rights.

MATTHEW R. DAVIS

See also Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Johnson, James Weldon; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Talbert, Mary Burnett; White, Walter

Further Reading

- Ames, Jessie Daniel. The Changing Character of Lynching: Review of Lynching, 1931–1941. Atlanta, Ga.: Commission on International Cooperation, 1942.
- Brown, Mary Jane. Eradicating This Evil: Women in the American Anti-Lynching Movement, 1892–1940. New York and London: Garland, 2000.
- Gunning, Sandra. Race, Rape, and Lynching: The Record of American Literature, 1890–1912. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Hall, Jacquelyn Dowd. Revolt against Chivalry: Jessie Daniel Ames and the Women’s Campaign against Lynching. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979. (Rev. ed., 1993.)
- Harris, Trudier. Exorcising Blackness: Historical and Literary Lynching and Burning Rituals. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- Terborg-Penn, Rosalyn. “African-American Women’s Networks in the Anti-Lynching Crusade.” In Gender, Class, Race, and Reform in the Progressive Era, ed. Noralee Frankel and Nancy S. Dye. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1991.

Wells-Barnett, Ida B. On Lynchings: Southern Horrors, A Red Record, Mob Rule in New Orleans. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1969.

White, Walter. Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch. New York: Knopf, 1929.

Zangrando, Robert L. The NAACP Crusade against Lynching, 1909–1950. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1980.

Apollo Theater

When the building that would become the famous Apollo Theater was erected in 1913, at 253 West 125th Street, it was an Irish music hall. By 1919 it became Hurtig and Seamon's Burlesque Theater, featuring white female performers, most notably Fanny Brice. Few African Americans were allowed to perform there, and the few black members of the audience had to sit in the balcony, which was poorly lit and often dirty. Another, much smaller burlesque theater, the Apollo, named for the Greek god of music and poetry, was also situated on 125th Street. Both theaters were shut in 1932 when Fiorello La Guardia, who was then a congressman, ordered all burlesque theaters to close. In 1934, Sidney Cohen bought the Hurtig building specifically to provide live entertainment by African Americans for African Americans in Harlem. He was the first to do anything like this on 125th Street, which was still catering to whites and still segregated. Cohen appropriated the name of the earlier small Apollo for the Hurtig building, naming his new venture the 125th Street Apollo Theater. It came to be known simply as the Apollo, and from 1934 to the present, it has been a center of African American entertainment.

Cohen's Apollo was newly decorated and had high-fidelity RCA sound equipment—an innovative system also used at Radio City Music Hall. The first show at the Apollo, Jazz à la Carte, opened in 1934 and was very successful. However, neither this show nor the regular appearance of talented performers such as Bessie Smith persuaded Harlem's residents to come to 125th Street, which remained segregated. In an effort to attract larger audiences, Ralph Cooper suggested that the Apollo host weekly amateur nights. Accordingly, in 1935, when the Apollo was on the verge of bankruptcy, the first amateur night took place, with Cooper as the master of ceremonies.

Ralph Cooper's Harlem Amateur Night, as it was called, was intended not only as entertainment but also to provide an opportunity for talented residents of Harlem. However, Cooper knew that he had to find some way to handle the less talented entrants. He enlisted the aid of Norman Miller, a comic stagehand, to appear in eccentric costumes and gently and humorously usher the losing contestants offstage. Cooper made it clear that Amateur Night was not meant to denigrate any of the contestants or to hurt their feelings. Miller's job, then, was to make sure that everyone, including the losers, had a good time. Amateur Night quickly became a Harlem institution, just as well-known for its rowdy, booing crowds and its dancing clown as it was for the talent that graced the stage. That talent was often impressive: Early winners of amateur nights included Ella Fitzgerald, Sarah Vaughan, and Pearl Bailey.

An interesting tradition of the amateur nights had to do with the Tree of Hope. Nearly since the beginning of these events, each amateur performer touched a special piece of wood before going onstage. This chunk of wood had been taken from the Tree of Hope, a legendary shade tree behind the Lafayette Theater and Connie's Inn. The tree had been an informal meeting place for people in show business, where Harlem's stars told anecdotes about themselves and their tours and aspiring performers listened and dreamed. When Seventh Avenue was expanded around 1935, the Tree of Hope was cut down; but Ralph Cooper took a piece of the tree as a souvenir, had a set designer at the Apollo shellac it and mount it on an Ionic column, and placed it onstage where the audience and performers could see it, as a symbol of show business in Harlem. Contestants in the amateur nights began touching it for good luck, creating a new custom at the Apollo.

The Apollo's earliest competitor was the Lafayette Theater, owned by Leo Brecher and managed by Frank Schiffman. Later it became the Harlem Opera House, still owned by Brecher and Schiffman. Although Lafayette had been opened, strategically, only half a block from the Apollo, a campaign by the Harlem Opera House to lure Harlem's audiences away from the Apollo failed. However, when Sid Cohen died of a heart attack in 1935, Morris Sussman, the general manager of the Apollo, sold it to Brecher and Schiffman. Schiffman then took over as general manager of the Apollo, and another era of its history began.

Apollo Theater, 1920s. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Under Schiffman's management, Amateur Night continued with Ralph Cooper as emcee. After his retirement in the 1960s, it still continued, as did performances by celebrities including Gladys Knight and the Pips, Patti LaBelle, the Jackson Five, and Parliament Funkadelic. By the 1970s, however, support for Schiffman's Apollo had waned; residents of the neighborhood were calling for more black-owned and black-operated businesses in Harlem. Nevertheless, Schiffman held on to the Apollo, although he sold many of his other theaters to religious organizations. When he died in 1974, the Apollo was the last of his holdings in Harlem still operating.

In 1977, the Schiffman family closed the Apollo. Its profits had been declining as the crime rate rose, and in 1975 there had been a shooting at the Apollo during a concert by Smokey Robinson. The family tried unsuccessfully to sell the Apollo to various church organizations; finally, it was bought by the Harlem Urban Development Corporation (HUDC).

In 1983, the Apollo, as Harlem's oldest theater, was registered as a National Historic Landmark. In 1984, it reopened as an auditorium, a television studio, and the home of a new weekly Amateur Night Contest. In 1992, Showtime at the Apollo premiered on television in national syndication, returning the theater to its former glory as a place of entertainment and opportunity.

CANDICE LOVE

See also Harlem: 3—Entertainment; Smith, Bessie; Tree of Hope

Further Reading

Cooper, Ralph, and Steve Dougherty. Amateur Night at the Apollo: Five Decades of Great Entertainment. New York: HarperCollins, 1990.

Fox, Ted. Showtime at the Apollo. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1983.

Schiffman, Jack. Uptown: The Story of Harlem's Apollo Theatre. New York: Cowles, 1971.

———. Harlem Heyday. New York: Prometheus, 1984.

Appearances

The events that led to the presentation of Garland Anderson's play Appearances (1925) on Broadway, and made Anderson the first African American playwright to have a full-length nonmusical drama produced there, are in themselves dramatic. Anderson, a bellhop in San Francisco, was inspired to write Judge Not According to Appearances (its original title) as an expression of his religious beliefs, based on the precepts of Christian Science, after attending a performance of Channing Pollock's religious melodrama The Fool. Anderson's protagonist is Carl, a black bellhop in a residential hotel to whom the white patrons turn for spiritual counsel. Wilson, an unscrupulous prosecuting attorney whose fiancée has faith in Carl, becomes envious and tries to frame Carl for the attempted rape of a white woman named Elsie. The second act takes place in a courtroom, where Carl refuses to mount a defense, simply trusting that his innocence will be revealed. The other black characters in the play—Carl's fiancée, Ella; and the hotel's porter, Rufus—try to give support. When Elsie is revealed as not white but mulatto, and as Wilson's mistress, Carl is exonerated. In the third act, all plotlines are resolved; the play has been a dream, but Carl's faith has made it come true.

On the advice of a friend, Anderson sent his script to the entertainer Al Jolson, who declined to produce the play but lent Anderson his press agent. Among other fund-raising efforts, the "bellhop playwright" presented a reading of the play by the actor Richard B. Harrison at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel, met with Governor Al Smith of New York, and went to the White House, where he presented a script to President Calvin Coolidge. Anderson then returned to California and set forth across the country on a promotional tour.

On 13 October 1925, after successful out-of-town tryouts and bearing a shortened title, Appearances finally opened at the Frolic Theatre on Broadway, where it ran for twenty-three performances. Carl was played by Lionel Monagas, a veteran of the Lafayette Players; Rufus by the vaudevillian Doe Doe Green; and Ella by a newcomer, Evelyn Mason. Although two white actors withdrew from the production rather than work in an integrated cast, there was no serious controversy (such as the one that had beset Eugene O'Neill's All God's Chillun Got Wings in 1924) over this issue.

Appearances, scene from the stage performance. (Billy Rose Theatre Collection, New York Public Library, New York City. ©The New York Public Library / Art Resource, N. Y. Keysheets Box 4, Image 26. Photographer White Studio, anonymous.)

The critical response to Appearances was mixed. W. E. B. Du Bois enthusiastically supported the play, partly because of its perceived antilynching message. Other African Americans, such as the historian J. A. Rogers, denounced Anderson as an opportunist. The character Rufus and Green's portrayal of him had overtones of minstrelsy and were particularly controversial. Alan Dale's review in the New York World probably summarized the response of most of the white critical establishment: "It would be absurd to waste much time in analysis of this play. . . . I admit that this little play is better than some of the offerings that have made Broadway wretched this season."

Anderson refused to let Appearances die. He raised enough money for a tour through the western United States in 1927 and a revival (running for twenty-four performances) at the Hudson Theater on Broadway in 1929. In November 1929, Anderson sailed to London, where the play was produced at the Royalty Theater; it ran there from mid-March through the end of May 1930.

Anderson claimed authorship of another play, Extortion, which was never produced; became a lecturer for a religious organization, Unity; and established Andy's Nu Snack, the first milk bar in England, in London in 1934. While he was in England, he became the first black person to be admitted to the prestigious literary organization PEN.

FREDA SCOTT GILES

See also Anderson, Garland; Lafayette Players

Further Reading

Hatch, James, and Ted Shine, eds. Black Theatre U.S.A.: Plays by African Americans, 1847 to Today. New York: Free Press, 1996.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Atheneum, 1977. (Reprint; originally published 1930.)

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Kreizenbeck, Alan. "Garland Anderson and Appearances: The Playwright and His Play." Journal of American Drama and Theatre, 6(2, Spring; 3, Fall), 1994.

Mantle, Burns. The Best Plays of 1925–1926. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1926.

Patterson, Lindsay, ed. Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre: A Critical Approach. New York: Publishers Company, 1967.

Armstrong, Louis

From 1925 to 1928, Louis Daniel Armstrong (a.k.a. Dippermouth, Satchelmouth, Satchmo, Pops) made a series of more than sixty recordings with his small groups the Hot Five and the Hot Seven. Jazz writers of later years hailed these recordings for their role in helping to transform jazz from an ensemble entertainment to a solo art. But observers in the 1920s admired Armstrong less for his recordings per se than for his utter dominance in a highly visible professional field. The respect and even awe that Armstrong aroused among white and black musicians alike made him a shining example of the New Negro, even though he was not involved in the more rarefied artistic aspects of the Harlem Renaissance. From his destitute youth in New Orleans to his triumphant performances on Broadway in 1929, Armstrong struggled to better himself musically and socially while stopping just short, as he put it, of "putting on airs."

Armstrong was born out of wedlock in the poorest section of New Orleans, in a neighborhood so violent that it was known as the Battlefield. His father moved out when Armstrong was a child, and his mother supported the family as a domestic worker and part-time prostitute. Louis helped by singing in the streets for pennies and scrounging for food in garbage bins. In 1912, he was arrested for firing a gun in the air on New Year's Eve and was sentenced to eighteen months in reform school. At the school Armstrong was subjected to military-style discipline and learned to play the cornet. Upon his release he began developing a reputation as a gifted cornetist. He sought out musical instruction from his idol Joe "King" Oliver, performed with parading brass bands, and played the blues in honky-tonks late at night. When Oliver moved to Chicago in 1918, Armstrong took his place in Kid Ory's band, the leading jazz band in New Orleans. From then on, Ory recalled, Armstrong "went up like a sunflower. His name went right through New Orleans." Yet some contractors still wouldn't hire him for certain events in polite society. One of them, Edmond Souchon, considered Armstrong "a rough, rough character" who blew "false" (he may have meant out of tune) and played too loudly. Most of Armstrong's role models were also rough characters. Early on he had developed an admiration for pimps, gamblers, and other figures of the New Orleans underworld, the most charismatic and influential males in his cultural milieu. The drummer Baby Dodds recalled that in 1920–1921, Armstrong dressed like "low-class hustlers" and gamblers, "because that's what he wanted to be in those days. . . . Back at that time he was always broke from gambling."

Armstrong's aspirations changed after he moved North in 1922. He began his career in the North playing with King Oliver's Creole Jazz Band in Chicago and Fletcher Henderson's orchestra in New York. Armstrong seems to have been at least vaguely aware of artistic and cultural trends in Harlem. In his first autobiography (1936), he mentioned several black celebrities active in New York while he was there in 1924–1925, including James Weldon Johnson, Charles Gilpin, Paul Robeson, and Bill "Bojangles" Robinson. Armstrong was especially impressed with Robinson, whom he had seen perform in Chicago. Above all, Armstrong admired the dignity and independence Robinson brought to his stage performance. "To me, he was the greatest comedian + dancer in my race—better than Bert Williams," he recalled. "He didn't need blackface to be funny." Robinson, unlike the performers in minstrel shows, did not wear rags or tell self-disparaging jokes; he dressed immaculately and exuded power and self-confidence. The example of prominent northerners like Robinson moved Armstrong to embark on a somewhat ambivalent quest for outward "respectability"—in manners, literacy, clothing style, and most significantly music.

A catalyst in this transformation was Oliver's pianist Lillian (Lil) Hardin, who became Armstrong's second wife. In 1918, in New Orleans, Armstrong had married a young prostitute named Daisy Parker. Their relationship was turbulent, involving brickbat fights in the streets and still more dangerous confrontations behind closed doors. After moving to Chicago, Armstrong divorced Daisy in order to marry Hardin, a woman from Memphis who had taken some classes at Fisk University. Hardin immediately began overhauling Armstrong's rough New Orleans persona, buying him new clothes, changing his hairstyle, and demanding a certain propriety in his behavior. When Daisy visited Chicago in an effort to reclaim him, Armstrong assured her that they were incompatible, especially since he had lately been trying to "cultivate" himself. Publicity photographs from the late 1920s show the results of Lil's handling: Wearing expensive clothing and jewelry, Armstrong invariably looks sophisticated. And yet despite his willingness to make changes in his appearance, Armstrong chafed under Lil's exacting standards in other realms. He ultimately rejected the highfalutin lifestyle that required, as he put it, "a certain spoon for this, and a certain fork for that." By around 1927 he had begun to live with Alpha Smith, a less pretentious working-class woman who would later become his third wife.

Armstrong may have resented Hardin's overbearing social direction, but he remained forever grateful that she had pushed him to expand his musical sensibility. From the moment he arrived in the North, Armstrong had electrified audiences with the boldness and originality of his playing. But the type of music he and other New Orleanians played—"hot jazz" and the blues—drew harsh criticism in the 1920s from moralists and social reformers. The critics denigrated such music, using epithets such as "lowdown" (or "low-class"), "gutbucket," and "barrelhouse," and worried that it inspired lewd dancing and generated business for nightclubs and speakeasies owned by mobsters. To insulate themselves from ill repute, many black musicians sought for "high-class," "dicty," or "society" credentials by working in vaudeville theaters, fashionable ballrooms, and dance orchestras that included elements of European art music in their programs. The ability to play within the European tradition demonstrated a literacy and refinement that raised the "class" quotient of any musician. The musicians who most self-consciously participated in the Harlem Renaissance—such as Robert Nathaniel Dett and Roland Hayes—aspired to compose or perform works based on European classical practice. At Hardin’s urging, Armstrong tried to acquire some classical training; he practiced concert pieces at home to Hardin’s accompaniment on a grand piano, and he even studied briefly with a German trumpet teacher known in Chicago for advocating the “nonpressure” method of playing.

The bands and venues Armstrong played in after leaving Oliver show his concern for building a “high-class” musical reputation. In 1924, Fletcher Henderson’s orchestra was the leading black society dance band in the country. When an opportunity came for Armstrong to join the band, Hardin encouraged him wholeheartedly, even though it meant that the two had to live separately for a year. Henderson’s musicians, with their elegant deportment and thorough musical training, embodied the New Negro in popular music. In fact, Henderson, although impressed with Armstrong’s solos, told him: “If you gonna be good someday, you’ll take some [music] lessons.” Armstrong apparently ignored this advice. But when he returned to Chicago in 1925, he bowed to Hardin’s insistence that he join Erskine Tate’s “Symphony Orchestra” at the Vendome Theater, an organization featuring violins and double-reed woodwinds as well as the more traditional jazz instruments. At the Vendome, Armstrong became more skilled at reading music and learned to play pieces from the classical repertoire. He even performed featured solos during transcriptions of Italian operas such as Mascagni’s Cavalleria Rusticana and Puccini’s Madame Butterfly. Within a year or so Armstrong was playing at the Sunset Café, one of the most exclusive nightclubs in black Chicago. At the Sunset and later the Savoy Ballroom, Armstrong accompanied floor shows in a style that would have required considerable versatility and technical polish. A mere handful of recordings document Armstrong’s work with these bands: Erskine Tate, “Stomp Off (Let’s Go)” and “Static Strut” (both 1926); and Louis Armstrong and His Stompers (the Sunset band), “Chicago Breakdown” (1927).

During the same period that Armstrong was performing high-class music at the Vendome and the Sunset, he was also recording plenty of New Orleans-style blues and jazz, the kind that most appealed to working-class southern migrants. These records, known collectively as the Hot Fives and Hot Sevens, show the same gradual reconciliation of high and low that was occurring simultaneously in Armstrong’s personal life. The early Hot Five records—including such celebrated performances as “Cornet Chop Suey” and “Big Butter and Egg Man” (both 1926)—feature only New Orleans musicians (except Hardin), emphasize traditionally raucous polyphonic textures, and often suggest a casual spontaneity with little advance preparation. Over time, however, Armstrong gradually introduced ritzy pre-arranged elements. In “You Made Me Love You” (1926), “The Last Time,” and “Once in a While” (both 1927), the band plays introductions and accompanimental figures redolent of the music of floor shows. In the Hot Fives of 1928, Armstrong replaced his New Orleans sidemen with the northern musicians he employed nightly at the Savoy. This last series of records features classical and other “society” elements in instrumentation, repertoire, texture, harmony, and form. For example, the meticulously arranged “Beau Koo Jack” has a structural complexity nowhere evident in earlier Hot Five recordings; and the band accompaniment to Armstrong’s solo in “Muggles” alternately rises and falls in volume, showing a classical concern for dynamics (patterns of loud and soft). And yet Armstrong did not cut himself off from his New Orleans roots. His most famous records of the period, such as “West End Blues” and “Weatherbird,” are a convincing hybrid of northern and southern, “high-class” and “gutbucket” elements.

By the late 1920s Armstrong’s musical innovations—particularly his virtuosity, power, coherence, rhythmic “swing,” and eccentric vocal style—had established him as a rising force in American popular music. His achievements had won over much of the black community, including those who earlier had fretted that the unsavory social aspects of jazz would have negative effects on the black cause. Dave Peyton, the chief music critic for the Chicago Defender, began calling Armstrong the “Great King Menalick” after Menelik II, the Ethiopian emperor who overthrew Italian domination in the late nineteenth century. Nor was Armstrong’s influence limited by race. At a banquet in 1929, a group of white musicians gave Armstrong a wristwatch engraved: “To Louis Armstrong, the World’s Greatest Cornetist, from the Musicians of New York.” Also in 1929, he created a sensation on Broadway singing “Ain’t Misbehavin’” in the musical Hot Chocolates. In 1930, he made his first film appearance in Ex-Flame (now lost), an achievement he proudly emphasized in his passport application two years later, wherein he stated his occupation as “actor and musician.” He needed the passport to undertake his first tour of Europe, where an already flourishing group of fans attested to his international popularity.

In the 1930s, European and American left-wing commentators lauded the Hot Five and Hot Seven recordings as great works of art. Such praise might have gratified musicians of the Harlem Renaissance who consciously sought to equal the achievements of western classical composers. Armstrong, however, had a different goal: to bring his music—which he viewed primarily as entertainment rather than art—to the widest possible audience. In the 1920s, that had entailed diversifying and refining his music and his demeanor; in the 1930s it involved singing and telling jokes as well as playing the trumpet. During this period Armstrong became a hero to the black community for his high profile in recordings, radio, and film. But after World War II, black America required a new New Negro, one not only culturally accomplished but also politically assertive. In this changed environment many accused Armstrong of Uncle Tomism because of his sincere desire to please an audience. For Armstrong, though, professional success and mass appeal represented the most significant advance a black musician could make. Such recognition may not have satisfied the generation of the civil rights movement, but it fulfilled some of the highest objectives of the Harlem Renaissance.

Louis Armstrong. (Brown Brothers.)

Biography

Louis Armstrong was born 4 August 1901, in New Orleans, Louisiana. He attended Fisk School for Boys until around age twelve and was confined in the Colored Waif's Home for Boys in 1913–1914. He joined Kid Ory's Brown-Skinned Babies in 1918, Fate Marable's band on the Streckfus Steamboat line in 1919, King Oliver's Creole Jazz Band in Chicago in 1922, and Fletcher Henderson's Orchestra in New York in 1924; performed in Chicago with the bands of Lil Hardin Armstrong, Erskine Tate, Carroll Dickerson, and Clarence Jones in 1925–1928; and accompanied many blues and vaudeville singers, including Bessie Smith and Alberta Hunter, in 1924–1930. He appeared in a Broadway show, Hot Chocolates, in 1929. He made his first European tours in 1932–1935; hired Joe Glaser to be his manager in 1935; hosted the Fleischmann's Yeast radio program on NBC in 1937; and appeared at Rockefeller Center in the musical Swingin' the Dream in 1939. Armstrong performed in the first Esquire All-American Jazz Concert at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1944. In 1947 he performed at Carnegie Hall and organized the septet Louis Armstrong's All-Stars. He performed at the first international jazz festival in Nice, France, in 1948, was featured on the cover of Time magazine in 1949, and made international tours in 1949–1968 and television appearances in 1949–1971. His television work included appearances on the shows of Horace Heidt, Ed Sullivan, Danny Kaye, Steve Allen, Mike Douglas, Jackie Gleason, Dick Cavett, David Frost, Johnny Carson, and Flip Wilson, and on What's My Line? He was given a seventieth (actually sixty-ninth) birthday tribute at the Newport Jazz Festival in 1970. Armstrong died in Queens, New York, on 6 July 1971.

BRIAN HARKER

See also Dett, Robert Nathaniel; Hayes, Roland; Henderson, Fletcher; Jazz; Music; Musicians; New Negro; Oliver, Joseph "King"; Ory, Edward "Kid"; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Savoy Ballroom

Selected Recordings

As a sideman: K. Oliver, "Chimes Blues"/"Froggie Moore" (1923, Gen. 5135), F. Henderson, "Copenhagen" (1924, Voc. 14926), Red Onion Jazz Babies, "Cake Walking Babies From Home" (1924, Gen. 5627), Bessie Smith, "St. Louis Blues" (1925, Col. 14064D). Hot Five/Hot Seven: "Muskrat Ramble"/"Heebie Jeebies" (1926, OK 8300), "Cornet Chop Suey" (1926, OK 8320), "Big Butter and Egg Man" (1926, OK 8423), "Potato Head Blues" (1927, OK 8503), "S.O.L. Blues" (1927, Col.

35661), "Struttin' with Some Barbecue" (1927, OK 8566), "Hotter than That"/"Savoy Blues" (1927, OK 8535), "West End Blues" (1928, OK 8597), "Muggles" (1928, OK 8703).

Duet with Earl Hines: "Weatherbird" (1928, OK 41454).

Big bands: "Sweethearts on Parade" (1930, Col. 2688D), "Star Dust" (1931, OK 41530), "I Gotta Right to Sing the Blues" (1933, Vic. 24233), "Jubilee" (1938, Decca 1635), "Struttin' with Some Barbecue" (1938, Decca 1661).

All-Stars: "Rockin' Chair"/"Save It Pretty Mama" (1947, Vic. 40-4004), "Basin Street Blues" (1954, Decca 29102), Louis Armstrong Plays W.C. Handy (1954, Col. CL591), Satch Plays Fats (1955, Col. CL708), "Hello Dolly" (1963, Kapp 573), "It's a Wonderful World" (1967, ABC-Para. 45-10982).

Selected Films

Rhapsody in Black and Blue, 1932; Pennies From Heaven, 1936; Artists and Models, Everyday's a Holiday, 1937; Going Places, 1938; Cabin in the Sky, 1943; Atlantic City, 1944; New Orleans, 1947; The Glenn Miller Story, 1954; High Society, 1956; Satchmo the Great, 1957; Jazz on a Summer's Day, 1958; The Beat Generation, 1959; Paris Blues, 1961; A Man Called Adam, 1966; Hello Dolly, 1969.

Further Reading

Armstrong, Louis. Swing That Music. New York, 1936. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1993.)

———. Satchmo: My Life in New Orleans. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1986.)

———. Louis Armstrong in His Own Words: Selected Writings, ed. and intro. Thomas Brothers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Bergreen, Laurence. Louis Armstrong: An Extravagant Life. New York: Broadway, 1997.

Berrett, Joshua, ed. A Louis Armstrong Companion: Eight Decades of Commentary. New York: Schirmer, 1999.

Collier, James Lincoln. Louis Armstrong: An American Genius. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Gabbard, Krin. "Actor and Musician: Louis Armstrong and His Films." In Jammin' at the Margins: Jazz and the American Cinema. Chicago, Ill., and London: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Giddins, Gary. Satchmo. New York: Doubleday, 1988.

Harker, Brian. "'Telling a Story': Louis Armstrong and Coherence in Early Jazz." Current Musicology, 1999.

Jones, Max, and John Chilton. Louis: The Louis Armstrong Story, 1900-1971. London, 1971. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1988.)

Miller, Marc H., ed. Louis Armstrong: A Cultural Legacy. New York: Queens Museum of Art, with Seattle and London: University of Washington Press, 1994.

Schuller, Gunther. "The First Great Soloist." In Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Art Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance

The Harlem Renaissance, with its emphasis on racial and ethnic distinctiveness, created an audience for visual art made by Americans of African descent. However, as an invention of the 1920s, the category "American Negro artist" would soon be suspended between the rhetoric of cultural nationalism and the reality of a segregated society as yet ill-equipped to fulfill its democratic promise. Within the African American community during these years, there were lively exchanges on the nature of "black creativity," typically in terms of a dynamic interaction between race and nationality. But critics writing for mainstream publications consistently emphasized that "Negro art" was separate from the overarching category "American art." As exposure to so-called Negro art grew, a set of critical constructs emerged, based on racial difference, that in effect isolated black art from the mainstream and contributed significantly to its subsequent historical neglect.

During the Harlem Renaissance and its aftermath, speculation on the relationship between race and creativity filled the pages of black periodicals and spilled over into the mainstream press. In these discussions, African Americans raised important questions about the responsibility of black artists to social (as opposed to aesthetic) issues, about the most desirable ways to represent members of the race, and about whether art should furnish cultural models or present actual individual experience. Articles highlighting the achievements of African American artists and articles about the current reappraisal of African art appeared regularly. The reader was frequently admonished to support black artists by buying their work, so that the artists would not be corrupted by too much white patronage.

But in this heady intellectual climate, black artists seeking a reputation in American art received complex and even conflicting messages. Although critics looked for growing technical facility in emerging black artists, their work was often considered interesting only to the extent that it differed from mainstream art. Critics were bored when the work of black artists appeared too derivative or too much like the work of artists who were not black. Yet critical standards were not altered to accommodate original or innovative expression when it did appear. To a certain extent, the perception of difference was encouraged by African American critics such as Alain Locke. Locke often referred to racially specific experience and culture; he urged black artists to express themselves in characteristically racial terms by drawing on the uniqueness of their experience and on their position as heirs to both an authentic American folk culture and the artistic traditions of ancestral Africa.

In considering art criticism and the Harlem Renaissance, genuine art criticism must be distinguished from what is more properly described as art journalism. These were very different modes of conveying information about African American art and artists, and most critical opinion on what is called the art of the Harlem Renaissance falls into the category of art journalism. Although critics and historians such as Locke and James Porter addressed complex issues of race, culture, identity, and nationalism, journalists writing for the popular press rarely went beyond basic questions such as what "Negro art" was and why anyone should be interested in it.

This situation reflected the state of American art criticism in general during the early twentieth century. With some notable exceptions, a good deal of the writing about art before World War II was a mixed bag of journalism and editorial commentary. Art criticism was not highly professionalized in the United States, and very few American critics applied a consistent, recognizable methodology. The writers of essays on art and culture in literary magazines and the popular press often had little background in the visual arts. Furthermore, in appraising African American visual art, these critics often relied on typologies from music and literature, with which they were more familiar. Thus they tended to raise general issues rather than engage in complex critical analysis of specific works or artists.

Moreover, the aggressive public relations strategies of the Harmon Foundation, the institution most involved in promoting African American artists during the 1920s and 1930s, ensured its control over newspaper coverage of the Harmon awards for achievement in the visual arts and of its annual exhibitions of Negro art. In the period between the two world wars, a good deal of writing about African American art was simply the Harmon Foundation's publicity posing as art criticism; articles in the mainstream press often took the form of responses to, or paraphrases of, the foundation's promotional literature. Reviews and notices of the foundation's shows either focused on the evidence for and the merits of racial expression or dwelled on anecdote and biography. The black press stressed the professional accomplishments of successful artists; the mainstream press announced cash prizes awarded to artists who had emerged from extremely humble circumstances. In neither case was it common to find long analytical discussions of individual works of art.

Beginning in 1928, the annual exhibitions of the Harmon Foundation stimulated considerable discussion about the achievements and future direction of African American artists. Stemming from the larger debates about black creativity that were of central concern during the Harlem Renaissance, these discussions addressed many of the same issues that occupied critics in literary circles, where they were clearly articulated and hotly contested. Questions were raised about the relationship between contemporary black expression and black folk culture, about the meaning of Africa to modern American blacks, and about the transmission of racial characteristics across time and place. There was also intense concern about the proper representation of African Americans, especially in literary circles, as African American writers came to terms with a sudden fascination with black life in the 1920s. This interest in representation was coupled with an ongoing discussion about the nature of black creativity.

In this context, a set of issues emerged that provided mainstream art critics with a fairly consistent focus for considering the works of African American artists. The visual art of the Harlem Renaissance was typically evaluated according to a priori assumptions about amateurism, primitivism, Authenticity, and racial uniqueness. The fusion of these qualities created specific expectations: Authentic Negro art would be primitive because it was the product of amateurs or individuals predisposed to the primitive by virtue of their unique racial heritage; and such authenticity and uniqueness should be manifest in both the form and the content of Negro art. The ideology of racial primitivism, which often combined beliefs about authenticity, amateurism, and atavism, resulted in a clear preference among mainstream critics for black artistic expression that manifested it. The fascination with tribal art would later, in the populist climate of the 1930s, be displaced by an idealization of folk art; but insofar as Africa and rural black culture were understood as authentic subject matter for African American artists, they were welcomed. The popularity in the late 1920s of the painters Archibald Motley and Malvin Gray Johnson can in part be explained by this fascination with the primitive.

Mainstream critics looking for racial primitivism in the work of African American artists were especially pleased when they discovered evidence of emotional sensibility based on southern black folk culture and religion. They were in fact seeking the visual equivalent of the Negro spiritual. This sentiment—nearly universal among critics who followed developments in African American art and literature—emanated from a widespread belief that cultural sophistication would be the ruination of the “real American Negro.” For many white Americans, the so-called sorrow songs were the most familiar, and therefore most representative, form of black expression.

Of the black visual artists of the Harlem Renaissance, Richmond Barthé and Archibald Motley were among those most consistently and favorably reviewed by the art press. By the end of the 1930s, Barthé was regarded as one of America’s most promising sculptors, a truly gifted artist who was also racially authentic. Art critics also often found value in the work of seemingly naive black artists such as William H. Johnson. Nineteenth-century American folk art was widely admired during these years as an example of authentic native expression from the past. Modern black folk art and the black folk spirit in professional art were thus often received with greater enthusiasm by art critics than the more obviously sophisticated productions of academically trained artists. Ultimately, these expectations would prompt critics to express displeasure when the work of African American artists presented itself as similar to, or derived from, mainstream artistic practices. Even though many African American artists followed the same general principles as their peers who were not black, racial difference was expected to override shared national cultural ideals or similar professional training.

Notices on the Harmon Foundation shows during the 1930s rehashed many of the same issues that had emerged in the early reviews. Reviewers continued to be disappointed by an evident lack of authentic racial expression and to regard increased technical skill and the mastery of existing conventions as symptomatic of black artists’ regrettable eagerness to imitate mainstream traditions rather than creating their own. Critics of these later shows consistently remarked that work by black artists resembled the work of their white counterparts. Although William H. Johnson’s work was frequently considered the best in the show, it also commonly prompted (along with the work of Hale Woodruff) the observation that the Harmon collection did not differ significantly from that of any other modern art exhibition coming out of New York. Mainstream critics, straining to find distinctive racial qualities, resorted to clichés about Negroes’ rhythm, spontaneous emotion, and affinity for bright colors. But more often than not, writers concluded that, were it not for the ubiquity of black subjects, the work might “pass” for that of any group of contemporary artists.

The issue of aesthetic modernity and its relationship to traditional African art is also a recurrent theme in much writing about African American art after the Harlem Renaissance. In The New Negro, Locke emphasized that African tribal art had invigorated European painters and sculptors, helping to free them of academic practices, and he claimed that it could be an even more potent stimulant for modern African American artists. Although in some of Locke’s writing in the 1930s the emphasis shifts from the tribal antecedents of African American expression to native black American folk culture, Locke never abandoned his belief that African art could be a powerful source for black expression. The conflation of these ideals caused considerable confusion as critics and artists struggled to assess the emerging black modernist aesthetic, prompting the African American artist Selma Day to observe, in 1930:

A few of the artists are producing what is called modern art by some, Negro art by others, and still another group will name the same paintings primitive art. I imagine that one often wonders where one style ends and the other begins, and more often questions whether or not any such thing as modern art or Negro art or primitive art really exists.

The 1920s had forecast the coming of an invigorated American culture that would be expansive and replete with possibilities, and in this context, artists of the Harlem Renaissance made their claims as important contributors to American national culture. The critical writing of Locke and other African Americans concerned with the progress of black artistic expression reflects a complex understanding of broad cultural discourse in America. Locke noted that although black artists have always sought cultural freedom through art, they have expressed themselves in artistic modes responsive to the American mainstream. Implicit in all of Locke's writing was an unswerving conviction that black Americans, by virtue of their distinctive racial heritage and singular experience, were destined to make a unique contribution to national culture at a critical moment in its development. However, mainstream art critics were more inclined to deal with the artist of African descent in the United States as an "American Negro" rather than a "Negro American," and so they typically did not acknowledge African American art as a vital manifestation of cultural nationalism. During the years between the wars, at a time when black expression, especially in music, was a powerful signifier of American culture in Europe, racism and segregation made it improbable that the visual art of African Americans would be so recognized at home.

Although visual representations of American blacks were considered authentic American subject matter, the discussions of democracy and culture that dominated the American art world, particularly during the Depression, rarely extended to the work of black artists. Instead, African American artists were constantly accused of sacrificing their birthright and were entreated to articulate their difference through archetypal images of suffering, naïveté, or racial primitivism. In an age that merged nationalistic and aesthetic issues, and in which critical discourse about art often lacked sophistication and focus, race seems to have remained the only relevant issue in considerations of African American art. The failure to fundamentally alter this fact has resulted in continued neglect and distortion of African American artists in both American art history and contemporary art; their work is rarely understood in terms that would affirm their participation in mainstream cultural ideals. In this respect, the Harlem Renaissance was a lost opportunity for American art critics, who failed to recognize the extent to which African American artists, both through their work and in their rhetoric, sought to participate in a collective project of national self-definition.

MARY ANN CALO

See also Barthé, Richmond; Harmon Foundation; Johnson, Malvin Gray; Johnson, William H.; Locke, Alain; Modernism; Motley, Archibald J. Jr; New Negro, The; Porter, James Amos; Primitivism; Woodruff, Hale

Further Reading

- Calo, Mary Ann. "African American Art and Critical Discourse Between World Wars." American Quarterly, Fall 1999.
- Conwill, Kinshasha Holman. "In Search of an 'Authentic' Vision: Decoding the Appeal of the Self-Taught African-American Artist." American Art, Fall 1991.
- Driskell, David C., ed. African American Visual Aesthetics: A Postmodernist View. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1995.
- Gaines, Charles, with Maurice Berger and Catherine Lord. Theater of Refusal: Black Art and Mainstream Criticism. Irvine: Fine Arts Gallery of the University of California, 1993.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 1995.
- Johnson, Eloise E. Rediscovering the Harlem Renaissance: The Politics of Exclusion. New York and London: Garland, 1997.
- Metcalfe, Eugene. "Black Art, Folk Art, and Social Control." Winterthur Portfolio, 18, 1983.
- Powell, Richard J. Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1997.
- Reynolds, Gary. "The American Critics and the Harmon Foundation Exhibitions." In Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1989.
- Sims, Lowrey Stokes. "Subject/Subjectivity and Agency in the Art of African Americans." Art Bulletin, December 1994.
- Stewart, Jeffrey C., ed. The Critical Temper of Alain Locke. New York: Garland, 1983.
- West, Cornel. "Horace Pippin's Challenge to Art Criticism." In Keeping Faith: Philosophy and Race in America. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Wilson, Judith. "Shades of Grey in the Black Aesthetic, Part 1, The Myth of the Black Aesthetic." In Next Generation: Southern Black Aesthetic. Winston-Salem, N.C.: Southeastern Center for Contemporary Art, 1990.

Artists

During the Harlem Renaissance, the visual arts flowered with the same vigor as drama, dance, music, and literature. For a brief but resplendent moment in the 1920s and 1930s, Harlem was the center of a visual arts movement whose effects were felt across the United States and around the world, in places such as Atlanta, Chicago, Kansas City, San Francisco, Paris, Copenhagen, and Berlin. For the first time in history, there was a widespread interest in African American art among dealers, patrons, and curators. As early as 1919, an exhibit of the paintings of the African American expatriate Henry Ossawa Tanner (1859–1937), who was then living in Paris, was mounted at Knoedler Gallery in New York City. It was followed in 1921 by an exhibit of African American painting and sculpture at the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library (later known as the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture). This second show featured works by Tanner as well as other accomplished artists, such as Meta Vaux Warrick Fuller (1877–1968), William Edward Scott (1884–1969), and Laura Wheeler Waring (1887–1948). In 1926, the Harmon Foundation (a philanthropic agency that awarded prizes to African Americans for achievement in the visual arts) granted the first of many annual prizes to the painters Palmer Hayden (1890–1973) and Hale Woodruff (1900–1980); and in 1927, a pivotal exhibition, “The Negro in Art,” was presented by the Chicago Women’s Club.

Interdisciplinary collaboration also marked this period. For example, Aaron Douglas (1899–1979) designed covers for black periodicals such as The Crisis, Opportunity, and Fire!!; and artists illustrated books of scholarly writing, poetry, and fiction by literati of the Harlem Renaissance, including Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, Charles S. Johnson, Alain Locke, and James Weldon Johnson.

The Harlem Renaissance was pervaded by the concept of the New Negro—someone with, in Locke’s words, “renewed self-respect and self-dependence,” who found a voice in the arts. Locke’s sentiments were articulated in 1925, in an edition of Survey Graphic magazine dedicated to Harlem as the “mecca of the New Negro.” The magazine, which contained drawings, poems, essays, fiction, and social commentary by young African American artists, writers, and intellectuals, sold more than 5,000 copies and helped launch the literary and artistic movement that came to be known as the Harlem Renaissance. This special issue of Survey Graphic became the manifesto of the era; in addition to writings, it included illustrations and portraits of notable figures of the renaissance, such as the singer and actor Paul Robeson, the tenor Roland Hayes (who appeared on the magazine’s cover), and other distinguished African Americans.

The magazine’s art director was the artist Winold Reiss (1886–1953), who had emigrated to the United States from Germany in 1913 and became known for his documentary-style portraits of Americans from widely varied racial and cultural backgrounds. Reiss’s cover design for the Harlem issue of Survey Graphic featured a sensitive portrait of Hayes (as the New Negro) and a combination of African and art deco design elements. In fact, Reiss’s cover, with its emphasis on African forms and abstract design motifs, embodied the modern international spirit of the Harlem Renaissance—a spirit clearly arising from both European and African culture. Many of the Harlem Renaissance artists studied abroad, particularly in Paris (where Negritude, a counterpart to the New Negro movement, was forming) and incorporated elements of German expressionism and cubism (itself inspired by African sculpture) into their own art. The Harlem Renaissance may be considered one of the first truly international art movements to take root on American soil.

An unprecedented number of African American visual artists were able to achieve some degree of success during this period, owing in no small measure to the Harmon Foundation. Aaron Douglas, Augusta Savage (1892–1962), and William H. Johnson (1901–1970), among others, gained a national and even an international reputation with the help of this foundation, whose art prizes were intended to bring African American creativity to the attention of a broad public and to lend financial support to participating artists. The winner of the foundation’s Gold Medal Prize for art in 1926, and one of the first to benefit from the Harmon programs, was Palmer Hayden, who was then thirty-six. Hayden had earlier spent ten years in the armed services, during which time he enrolled in a correspondence course in drawing. After his discharge in 1920, he pursued further art study at Columbia University and at the Boothbay Commonwealth Art Colony in Maine. After winning the Harmon medal (and a $400 prize) for an impressionistic marine painting, Hayden traveled to Paris, where he lived, studied, and exhibited for five years, from 1927 to 1932.

While abroad, Hayden made the acquaintances of Tanner and of Locke (who was traveling in Europe at the time). Locke, the major interpreter of Harlem Renaissance aesthetics, had received his Ph.D. at Harvard and had the distinction of being the first African American Rhodes Scholar (at Oxford). He also headed the philosophy department at Howard University from 1912 to 1953. Locke, whose pivotal essay “The Legacy of the Ancestral Arts” urged African American artists to look to the art of their African ancestors for creative inspiration, argued that modern European art, particularly the works of Matisse, Picasso, Derain, and the German expressionists, had been substantially influenced by the abstract qualities of African sculpture. Locke believed that if African art was capable of arousing the aesthetic impulses of the European modernists, then surely it should inspire the same outpouring of creativity from the “culturally awakened” New Negro artist.

Locke’s hope that black artists would take inspiration from Africa found representation in one of Hayden’s best-known works, Fétiche et Fleurs, which won the Harmon painting prize in 1933. The painting comprised a still life of a vase of flowers, a Gabon Fang mask, and a Congo Bakuba cloth arranged in a Cézannesque design that tilted perspective and compressed the picture space. Hayden, who had by then returned to New York from Paris, continued to focus on ethnic subjects, but his style began to reveal a disturbing element of caricature that was evidently popular among the white clientele on whom most Harlem Renaissance artists depended for support. Hayden exaggerated the features of his subjects to the point, some people believed, of grotesqueness and, as a result, became a target of criticism, particularly from the respected art historian James A. Porter, the author of Modern Negro Art (1943). Porter objected to Hayden’s new painting style as “ill-advised if not altogether tasteless” and reminiscent of billboards advertising blackface minstrel shows.

Hayden, however, maintained that his purpose was not to mock or to satirize but rather to paint, in his own “naive” style, the life and people that he knew. He compared his means to the writing style of Langston Hughes (who admired Hayden’s work) and argued that the vernacular elements and characters found in Hughes’s writings were similar to those that he painted. Locke praised Hayden’s work and considered Porter’s assessment too severe; notwithstanding these conflicts, Hayden flourished. He worked for the easel division of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) Federal Arts Project, which provided continued support to many artists of the Harlem Renaissance after the Harmon Foundation’s exhibits were discontinued in 1933. Hayden’s paintings, particularly those that centered on black life, had broad appeal and exerted an incontrovertible influence on perceptions of Harlem Renaissance aesthetics.

The artist most closely associated with the Harlem Renaissance was Aaron Douglas, who was born in Kansas. Douglas espoused not only Locke’s ideal of art embodying African motifs but also a similar mandate set forth by the scholar and social activist W. E. B. Du Bois (in 1915, in an issue of the NAACP’s magazine The Crisis) that black artists should depict only the most ennobling self-imagery. Douglas studied fine arts as an undergraduate at the University of Nebraska and taught art briefly in Kansas City before coming to New York in 1924. There he met Winold Reiss, who encouraged him to incorporate African abstraction into his work.

Douglas quickly developed a unique method of painting, which combined accessible narrative imagery with a complex compositional substructure of geometric abstraction. His stylized representations of African American life and history greatly appealed to patrons and literati in Harlem. In 1925, Reiss included Douglas’s illustrations in the Harlem issue of Survey Graphic. That same year, Douglas received commissions to illustrate Opportunity (the publication of the New York Urban League) and The Crisis (for which Du Bois was a contributing editor). In 1926, Douglas helped illustrate the first issues of Fire!!, a cutting-edge periodical that was devoted to the works of young African American artists and writers; and in 1927, he collaborated with one of the cofounders of the NAACP, James Weldon Johnson, in creating drawings to accompany Johnson’s collection of poems God’s Trombones. In 1928, Douglas designed the jacket for Claude McKay’s highly successful book Home to Harlem.

Also in 1928, Douglas received an award from the Barnes Foundation that enabled him to study the Barnes collection in Merion, Pennsylvania. This experience and a one-year stay in Paris from 1931 to 1932 exposed Douglas to a variety of African art objects as well as to European modernism. The influences of both are revealed in Douglas’s mature style, which by the 1930s was a synthesis of African and European elements. By this time, Douglas was creating large-scale murals such as Jungle and Jazz for Harlem’s Club Ebony, and other murals for businesses and institutions beyond the borders of Harlem, including Fisk University in Nashville (where he would later be the chairman of the art department) and the Sherman Hotel in Chicago. Douglas’s most famous mural sequence was produced under the auspices of the WPA for the Schomburg Center in Harlem in 1934 and was called Aspects of Negro Life.

The large-scale oil compositions of Aspects of Negro Life comprise a chronological record of four critical moments in African American history. The first panel, The Negro in an African Setting, portrays African dancers, musicians, and ritual objects during an elysian time before the African slave trade began. The second, From Slavery through Reconstruction, shows a scene of enslaved workers behind a screen of cotton plants, men breaking their chains, and a figure holding up a copy of the Emancipation Proclamation in the shadow of the Capitol building. An Idyll of the Deep South depicts a time just after Reconstruction, during the period of Jim Crow, when legal segregation and widespread lynchings marred African American life. Portrayed in this complex narrative is a group of farmworkers and banjo players amid stylized flora. The figures in this group are overshadowed by the specter of a victim of lynching—the dangling feet of a body hanging from a tree. In Song of the Towers, the fourth mural in the series, Douglas portrays a saxophone player (a symbol of the black creative spirit) and a businessman in a towering industrial setting. The composition—a requiem for the proletariat—is crisscrossed with sinister, shadowy forms that haunt the figures, who appear to be overcome by intense emotional anguish.

Douglas's inimitable fusion of disparate elements—abstraction and figuration, Africanism and modernism, social and historical narrative—within his signature lyrical, translucent, nearly monochromatic palette appealed to both the neophyte and the connoisseur. Unlike most social realist and regionalist artists of his time, Douglas was able to embrace geometric abstraction in a way that allowed his paintings to remain accessible to the broader public. The comprehensibility of his images, and their dignified black subject matter, made Douglas one of the most popular artists of the period. In fact, one year after the completion of Aspects of Negro Life, Douglas was elected president of the Harlem Artists' Guild (the Harlem affiliate of the Artists Union), through which he fought for better opportunities for black artists.

Douglas's contemporary William H. Johnson was equally prolific and talented. Johnson came to New York from South Carolina in 1918, studying art and supporting himself at a variety of odd jobs until 1926, when he moved to Europe. During his years in New York, Johnson studied the visual arts, taking classes at the National Academy of Design beginning in 1921 and winning several art prizes and scholarships. He also spent summers at the Cape Cod School of Art in Provincetown, Massachusetts, where his works were included in a group exhibition at the local art association. After studying briefly with George B. Luks, the renowned American "ashcan school" artist, Johnson went to the Montparnasse section of Paris with funds given to him by the director of the Cape Cod School of Art, Charles W. Hawthorne.

Johnson was an exceptional draftsman. His early still lifes and figure studies show a keen understanding of form and color and evoke the loose brushwork and spatial analyses of the impressionists and postimpressionists. His portraits and landscapes during his first years abroad demonstrate his own painterly expressiveness and also reveal the influence of the French artist Chaim Soutine and the Norwegian symbolist painter Edvard Munch. Johnson experimented in a variety of two-dimensional media while he was in Europe, and his works, like those of Douglas, show evidence of a broad understanding of European modernism, particularly German expressionism.

While he was abroad, Johnson met and married the Danish artist Holcha Krake; they returned to the United States in 1929. One year later, encouraged by Luks, Johnson entered his work in the Harmon Foundation's annual exhibit and was awarded a gold medal for painting. Throughout the 1930s, Johnson continued to exhibit at the Harmon Foundation and at numerous galleries at home and abroad. In 1937, he took a position with the WPA as an instructor at the Harlem Community Art Center. At about this time, his work began to undergo stylistic changes. Under pressure from the Harmon Foundation (which disapproved of his single-minded espousal of a European aesthetic), and in response to the expectations of the broader public regarding African American artists in general, Johnson turned to more deliberately ethnic themes and to a less apparently erudite formal technique. He moved away from European modernism toward a pseudo-naïve art brut style that evoked vernacular art and African sculpture. He also began to focus on African American religious subjects and on genre scenes of couples in Harlem, street musicians, and farmworkers. In shifting toward an approach like that of folk art, Johnson was similar to Hayden, but, despite the guise of naïveté, Johnson's later works continued to show a keen sense of composition, an understanding of color and form, and an undeniable gift for complex design.

After his wife's death from breast cancer in 1944, Johnson's mental health began to deteriorate. While traveling in Norway, he was hospitalized for paresis (a disease of the central nervous system characterized by mental and emotional instability and paralytic attacks). The U.S. State Department arranged for his return home, and he was admitted to Central Islip State Hospital in New York. Johnson would never paint again; he remained confined at the state hospital until his death. However, the more than 1,000 works he had produced during the Harlem Renaissance were rescued from a warehouse in Manhattan by the Harmon Foundation, which purchased his estate and donated his paintings and prints to the Smithsonian Institution, where they remain today. The immense body of work produced by Johnson during the Harlem Renaissance reflects his complex personality and his response to life between two world wars and on two continents.

In 1927, the Newark Museum of Art mounted an exhibition, "Paintings and Watercolors by Living American Artists." A delicately rendered portrait of an elderly woman, seated at her sewing beside a lace-covered table, was voted the most popular work in the show. The painter was an alumnus of the Chicago Art Institute, Archibald Motley Jr. (1891–1981); and the painting was Mending Socks—a carefully constructed composition portraying Motley's grandmother in near profile within a compressed space. Mending Socks represented Motley's unquestionable talent, but as an early work depicting a conventional domestic subject in a naturalistic manner, it was far from indicative of the stylized forms and edgy, urban themes (influenced by his onetime mentor, the American artist George Bellows) for which Motley would become known.

Motley's penchant for realism quickly gave way to a more modernist vision, developed during a year of study in Paris at the end of the 1920s. In his new paintings, Motley generalized figures and faces, simplified forms, and subordinated details in favor of mood or ambience. He was able to capture his emotional impressions as well as his visual impressions of each scene he chose, bringing to life crowded Harlem nightclubs or cobblestoned Parisian streets teeming with French flâneurs. He achieved this feat through the use of vibrant colors, diffuse lighting, overlapping forms, and unique angles of vision and handling of space. The results were often visually dazzling.

Motley preferred metropolitan themes: pool halls, dance halls, and street scenes. He was also one of the first American artists to treat the black female nude as a subject worthy of "high" art, rather than as an object of ridicule or pornography. His psychologically intense Brown Girl after the Bath (1931) reconstitutes a seventeenth-century Dutch motif with a realism and quiet authority that conveys not only a sexualized body but also a contemplative woman whose melancholy, enigmatic gaze holds that of the viewer. Motley, who was supported throughout the Depression by the WPA, made a definitive and lasting creative contribution to the Harlem Renaissance—a contribution which, although largely ignored after the 1930s, has been recognized in recent years as integral to our understanding of the period.

Women artists, too, thrived during the Harlem Renaissance. One was the sculptor Nancy Elizabeth Prophet (1890–1960), who graduated in 1918 from the Rhode Island School of Design, and then moved to New York, attracted by the art scene there. She developed a significant alliance with Gertrude Vanderbilt Whitney, a member of New York's cultural elite and founder of the Whitney Museum of American Art. Whitney was responsible for some of the museum's first acquisitions of African American art: several works by the sculptor Richmond Barthé (1901–1989).

Whitney and Prophet were not only fellow artists but also close friends, and they shared a studio and exhibited together. In fact, in 1922 Whitney financed Prophet's first trip to Europe; Prophet would remain in Europe for ten years, studying and exhibiting throughout the 1920s and early 1930s—and becoming acquainted with W. E. B. Du Bois, Countee Cullen, and Augusta Savage, who were all sojourning in France. Toward the end of her stay in Paris, Prophet began to cultivate her reputation in the United States by sending two of her works to the Harmon exhibition of 1930 and winning a $250 prize for one of them.

Returning to the United States in 1934, at the invitation of John Hope, the president of Atlanta University, Prophet joined the art faculty at Spelman College—one of the southern magnets for talented figures in the Harlem Renaissance (Hale Woodruff had recently founded the art department there). For a time, Prophet's career flourished. Her elegant portraits in wood, marble, and other three-dimensional media appeared in major American exhibitions, including the Whitney Biennials of 1935 and 1937, and in renowned collections such as the Philadelphia Museum of Art. In 1944, Prophet left her position at Spelman College; as a northerner, she had found the southern rural environment uninspiring. She returned to Rhode Island and made several attempts to further her professional goals; however, she found it impossible to repeat her earlier successes. To support herself, Prophet was forced to work as a housekeeper and as a live-in domestic servant. Occasionally, she made portrait busts for a ceramics factory to earn extra money, but her final years were spent in poverty and obscurity.

Another woman artist, Lois Mailou Jones (1905–1998), is a shining example of the creativity and productivity of the Harlem Renaissance. Unlike Prophet, Jones had nearly half a century of artistic success. Jones began her career in 1919 as a student at the High School of Practical Arts in Boston; her decision to pursue the arts as a profession was inspired, in part, by a meeting in the early 1920s with an older artist, Meta Warrick Fuller (whose sculpture Ethiopia Awakening of 1921 is considered one of the first to articulate the pan-Africanist philosophy of black enfranchisement that was integral to the New Negro and Negritude movements). Jones started by designing costumes and textiles, but she was also a prolific draftsman and painter. She held her first one-person show in 1923, when she was only seventeen. She spent her college years at the Boston Museum School on a four-year scholarship, majoring in design and winning numerous awards.

When she graduated, Jones relocated briefly to North Carolina and founded the art department at Palmer Memorial Institute in Sedalia. Her success there brought her to the attention of James V. Herring, then chairman of the art department at Howard University in Washington, D.C. (where Alain Locke headed the philosophy department). Herring invited Jones to join the faculty at Howard, and she would go on to teach design there for nearly fifty years. During her abundantly creative and productive life, Jones had more than sixty solo exhibitions, and she participated in literally hundreds of group shows, including the Harmon Foundation exhibits. Like Douglas, Jones also worked as a graphic designer, producing illustrations for a book by the African American historiographer Carter G. Woodson, African Heroes and Heroines, and designing covers for his Negro History Bulletin. Jones was a pioneer American abstractionist who combined a flair for decorative and geometric patterning with a keen understanding of human anatomy and a gift for portraiture. Responding to the inspiration of Locke and the Harmon Foundation, she focused consistently on African and African American subject matter, alternating these interests with a love of impressionist-style landscape.

The sculptor Augusta Savage—a contemporary of both Jones and Prophet—came to New York in the 1920s, like so many others, as part of the “great migration.” Savage was one of the most influential artists of the Harlem Renaissance, making her greatest impact as an educator and an activist for the arts. After a period of study at New York’s Cooper Union and a stay in Europe in the late 1920s, Savage returned to New York in 1932 to establish her own Studio of Arts and Crafts. With aid from the WPA, this studio eventually evolved into the Harlem Community Arts Center, which provided art instruction to some 1,500 constituents and was a model WPA facility, visited by Eleanor Roosevelt and Albert Einstein. Savage’s students included Jacob Lawrence (1917–2000), Norman Lewis (1909–1979), and William Artis (1914–1977), who were then novices but would go on to become renowned artists.

In 1939, Savage was offered a professional commission by the organizers of the New York World’s Fair to create her sculpture The Harp (Lift Every Voice and Sing). This monumental sixteen-foot plaster work featured a human harp consisting of singing African American figures. It also paid homage, through its subtitle, to James Weldon Johnson’s song “Lift Every Voice and Sing,” often known as the “black national anthem.” After the World’s Fair closed, Savage did not have the funds to cast or store this sculpture, and it was bulldozed when the fairgrounds were demolished. Savage also discovered that because she had been privately employed (even if only temporarily), she no longer qualified for her WPA position, and her employment with the Harlem Community Arts Center was terminated.

That year marked the last major showing of Savage’s work, and her further attempts to advance her career were unsuccessful. In fact, her later career paralleled that of Prophet. The fact that neither woman could make professional progress after the 1930s was largely because of the demise, in 1943, of the WPA Federal Arts Project, which—because of its mandates against racial and sexual discrimination—had provided a short season of opportunity to women and minority artists. The unprecedented opportunities afforded to women and minorities during this period ended as congressional budgets were cut or discontinued, as abstract expressionism began to replace social realism and other narrative art, and as socialist sentiments gave way to more conservative values. Like Prophet, Savage rarely exhibited or produced art after the early 1940s; eventually, she became an embittered recluse on an old farm in upstate New York, shunning the art community altogether. Despite this unfortunate conclusion to her own artistic life, Savage’s genius survived in the art of one of her most important students, Jacob Lawrence.

Lawrence’s art is epitomized in images of Harlem and of African American heroes and heroism, configured in meticulously structured spaces. Lawrence was only a boy during the Harlem Renaissance, but his experiences in Harlem and in Savage's studio helped make him one of the most renowned African American artists of the twentieth century. His earliest painting cycles—Frederick Douglass (1938–1939), Toussaint L'Ouverture (1939), Harriet Tubman (1939–1940), Migration (1940–1941), John Brown (1941), and Harlem (1942–1943)—reflect his affinity with the Harlem Renaissance. Like Douglas, Lawrence was inspired by the formal principles of contemporaneous art movements such as cubism and art deco, and he produced a body of work that is visually, emotionally, and intellectually provocative.

Lawrence was born in Atlantic City and moved to Harlem when he was thirteen years old, at a time when the glittering nightlife and the social milieu of Harlem were being displaced by the harsh realities of the Depression. His series Harlem compassionately portrays and interprets his experiences of life in New York. The scenes, thirty in all, range from pulsating city views to intimate interiors and use an often explicit narrative vernacular that reveals the depth, breadth, and complexity of African American existence. Lawrence, who remained active into his eighties, spent a lifetime enchanting and enlightening audiences, and informing them about the African American experience; through his work, he carried the legacy of the Harlem Renaissance into the next millennium.

Romare Bearden (1912–1988), like Lawrence, was a youth in Harlem at the end of the renaissance. Bearden attended college in New York in the early 1930s and exhibited at the Harlem YMCA and at the Harlem Art Workshop (also headed by Savage). By 1940, Bearden had rented studio space on 125th Street in a building also occupied by Jacob Lawrence and Claude McKay. Bearden is seldom identified directly with the Harlem Renaissance, but his art, like the work of Lawrence, recontextualizes his experiences of Harlem. Although Bearden had left Harlem by the mid-twentieth century, remembrances of the old neighborhood would continue to appear in his art for decades.

In the true spirit of the Harlem Renaissance, Bearden took inspiration from African as well as various other sources, including medieval stylization, Chinese calligraphy, the work of the European masters, and biblical and literary themes. His later collages reflect his affinity with cubist structure and the painting of the American precisionist Stuart Davis (who was active in New York during the Harlem Renaissance), as well as his studies at the Art Students League in the 1930s with the political satirist George Grosz. Bearden was also a disciple of jazz, which he deftly translated into visual form. In his compositions, he configured complex overlays of negative and positive space with the same intuitive rectitude as a jazz musician might conceive the compound relationships between sounds and silence. Bearden also applied the methods of the dada artists of the 1920s and 1930s, combining elements of montage, collage, and photography. His images are unique visions of tenement houses, conjure women, jazz sessions, and life in Harlem. Bearden was a man of many talents and deep emotional and intellectual commitments. In addition to his career as a visual artist, he studied philosophy at the Sorbonne in Paris, spent two decades as a social worker, published poetry, and pursued a brief career as a songwriter. Bearden is recognized today as one of the great American modernists of the twentieth century and a quintessential “renaissance” man.

The artists discussed here are only a few of those whose lives and ambitions were interconnected during the years of the Harlem Renaissance. There are many others, such as the photographer James Van Der Zee (1886–1983), who recorded in pictures a crucial time in our history—creating, for example, valuable visual documents of the activities of Marcus Garvey's pan-Africanist organization, the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Van Der Zee's photographic portraits of families and individuals in Harlem provide a breathtaking record of the age. Arriving in Harlem from Massachusetts in 1906, Van Der Zee was hired by the Gertz department store as a darkroom technician, and by 1917, he had opened his own portrait studio on 135th Street (by the early 1930s, he moved to a larger space on Lenox Avenue). Soon, Van Der Zee's talent for creative settings, elaborate props, and ennobling photographs of Harlem's citizens made him a celebrated artist in the community; ultimately, he achieved a reputation as one of the most important photographers in modern American history.

Other artists include the sculptor Richmond Barthé, who studied at the Art Institute of Chicago almost simultaneously with Motley; by the early 1930s, three of Barthé's elegant, lyrical bronze sculptures were purchased by the Whitney Museum. The painter and sculptor Charles Alston was one of the first African Americans to be given a supervisory position by the WPA. Under its auspices, Alston created murals for Harlem Hospital and opened a studio space at 306 West 141st Street. Alston's atelier, known affectionately as “306,” became a hub for African American artists and intellectuals, who gathered there to discuss important issues of the day.

William Johnson, Street Life, Harlem, c. 1939–1940. (Smithsonian American Art Museum, Washington, D.C.; Art Resource, New York.)

Miguel Covarrubias, Rhapsody in Blue, 1929. (Art Resource, New York. By permission of Fundación Covarrubias.)

Malvin Gray Johnson (1896–1934) studied at the National Academy of Design and exhibited with the Harmon Foundation. His Cézannesque portraits of African American subjects received some adverse criticism for their emphatic modernism, but they attracted the attention of commercial galleries and were given enthusiastic reviews. Sargent Claude Johnson (1887–1967), who was based in San Francisco, created African-inspired sculptural portraits that paid homage to the physical beauty of the black race; Johnson participated in Harmon shows throughout the 1920s and 1930s. Hale Woodruff, who was born in Illinois,

Aaron Douglas, Song of the Towers, 1934, at the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture. (Schomburg Center, New York Public Library; Art Resource, New York.)

Jacob Lawrence, The Migration of the Negro, 1940–1941, Panel 12: “The railroad stations were at times so crowded that special guards had to be called in to keep order.” Tempera on gesso on composition board, 12 by 18 inches; text and title revised by the artist, 1993. (© ARS, New York; © Digital Image; © The Museum of Modern Art, New York, gift of Mrs. David M. Levy, 28. 1942. 6. Licensed by Scala / Art Resource, N. Y.)

was inspired by Mexican muralists; he received one of the first Harmon Foundation awards in 1926, and went on to paint social realist murals on African American history for the libraries of both Atlanta University (where he was chairman of the art department) and Talladega College in Alabama.

Although important research has been done on many visual artists of the Harlem Renaissance, numerous others remain unsung. Many of these men and women have faded into obscurity, but their legacy has not. The painters and sculptors of the Harlem Renaissance constitute a remarkably talented group, who made possible the successes of subsequent generations of African American artists, represented by Bearden, Lawrence, and others. Serious racial, economic, and sociopolitical impediments faced the artists of the Harlem Renaissance in the pursuit of their chosen vocation. Yet the particular circumstances of the period, which allowed a momentary flowering of genius, caused Americans to sit up and take notice of African American creativity for the first time in the history of the United States.

LISA E. FARRINGTON

See also Art Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance; Crisis, The; Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 4—Paris; Federal Programs; Fire!!; Harmon Foundation; Locke, Alain; Modernism; Negritude; New Negro; 135th Street Library; Opportunity; Porter, James Amos; Survey Graphic; Visual Arts; Woodson, Carter G.; specific artists

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African-American Artists From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Driskell, David, et al. Harlem Renaissance Art of Black America. New York: Studio Museum in Harlem, 1987.
- Farrington, Lisa. Creating Their Own Image: A History of African-American Women Artists. New York and London: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- King-Hammond, Leslie, and Tritobia Hayes Benjamin. Three Generations of African-American Women Sculptors. Philadelphia, Pa.: Afro-American Historical and Cultural Museum, 1996.
- Patton, Sharon. African American Art. New York and London: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Powell, Richard. Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Reynolds, Gary A., and Beryl J. Wright. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1989.

Associated Negro Press

The Associated Negro Press was not the first black news service. In 1884, Colonel William Murrell, general manager of the Washington, D.C. Bee, announced at a meeting of the National Colored Associated Press (NCAP) that Western Union had installed wires in its office to transmit news to other black newspapers around the country. Charles C. Stewart of the Baltimore Vindicator chose at least one black newspaper in each state to become a member of NCAP. In 1890, the Associated Correspondents of Race Newspapers (ACRN) was established. It consisted of at least forty reporters from ten newspapers around the country who were based in Washington, D.C., and sent news from Washington to newspapers other than their own ten. Matthew M. Lewey, owner and founder of the Gainesville Sentinel and president of the National Negro Press Association, realized that a more efficient system of exchanging articles was necessary to improve coverage by the black press. This topic was explored at the association's convention in Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1911; later that year, Lewey arranged a meeting in Nashville, Tennessee, where a newspaper service for member weeklies was established. The service would gather news from all of the weeklies through Wednesday of each week for publication on Friday or Saturday.

In 1918, Claude Barnett, as part of a public relations campaign for the Chicago Defender, visited several black newspapers and learned that many of them had local coverage but lacked national and international news. He then approached Robert S. Abbott, owner and publisher of the Defender, and suggested starting a news service to provide stories to back newspapers. Barnett received no support, but in 1919 he launched the Associated Negro Press (ANP) in Chicago.

Barnett called ANP a news service, but its critics said that it was actually a clipping service because Barnett and his staff clipped articles from newspapers nationwide and included them in what ANP sent to its clients, along with articles rewritten from papers such as the Chicago Defender and only a handful of original articles from freelancers in Chicago and elsewhere. Abbott complained to a friend that Barnett was "stealing my news and selling it to other papers for a profit" (Waters 1987, 419); and in general, historians—although they believe that ANP was more than a clipping service—agree with Abbott's accusation. Barnett was short-staffed at the outset and found that the most economical means of providing his service was to rewrite material from the Defender, which was then the leading black newspaper in terms of circulation and coverage. In this way, his small staff produced an impressive amount of copy. However, as ANP gained more clients, Barnett was able to attract news sources and thus decrease his dependence on the Defender.

Barnett's criteria included accuracy, human interest, coverage of racial concerns, and appeal to a wide audience. As ANP grew, it also attracted reporters from other newspapers: Nahum Brazier (Nahum Daniel Brascher) and Percival Prattis from the Defender, and Frank Marshal Davis from Atlanta. They broadened the product by enlisting well-known scholarly writers and personalities as columnists, who commented on a wide variety of topics including civil rights, sports, and science. Barnett paid his writers only a meager salary, on the assumption that they would become celebrated by having their articles and columns published in numerous newspapers. This appeal to fame rather than money helped keep ANP solvent.

ANP served newspapers, schools, organizations, businesses, and individuals; newspaper clients could pay for the service by providing ANP with their local news. ANP's news was mimeographed and delivered twice a week by first-class mail and special delivery. A delivery might consist of two or three packages of fifty to seventy-five legal-size sheets of single-spaced copy, depending on the circulation of the client newspaper. This represented more than enough articles to fill all the sections of the paper except for local stories. ANP's feature stories focused on black history, entertainment, women's fashions, and other subjects. Late-breaking stories and special events were sent over the wires. ANP had its own part-time correspondents in large cities and correspondents abroad in Paris, Moscow, London, Tokyo, and elsewhere.

ANP did not collaborate with its white counterpart, the Associated Press (AP); in fact, some of ANP's editors considered AP the enemy. Oswald Garrison Villard, for one, believed AP's coverage of Negroes was biased and tended to polarize whites and Negroes:

The Associated Press (white) . . . always in its first paragraph . . . attributes the source of trouble to our people "molesting white women." That, the Associated Press knows, is always fuel for the fire of the fury. . . . It arouses certain elements of whites to indignation by the thoughts of the ever "burly black brutes," and it stirs the people of our group to a state of fighting made by the folly of it. (Pride 1974, 51)

But ANP was like AP in at least one respect: Both helped sustain newspapers. According to Waters, "Half, maybe three-fourths, of the papers could not have existed without the copy provided by ANP, just as most white papers would have folded had it not been for AP and UPI" (420). Historians credit ANP with building the Negro press by providing reliable content. Moreover, ANP did much to orchestrate the civil rights movement by reporting on racial discrimination.

ANP reached its height after the period of the Harlem Renaissance, during World War II, when it had 225 domestic subscribers. By 1958, it had only thirty-seven domestic clients. In August 1964, Barnett retired and sold ANP to Alfred Duckett, a public relations specialist in New York City. At that time, ANP had recovered somewhat; it had seventy-five domestic subscribers and two hundred international subscribers (mostly African newspapers). But even a reasonable number of subscribers could not sustain it: With the advent of television and the increased coverage of black issues in white dailies, black newspapers and eventually ANP lost importance. In the early 1960s, though, Barnett started an extension of ANP in Africa, called World News Service (WNS). In 1967, after a series of strokes, Barnett died in Chicago. Duckett distributed feature stories through ANP until 1969.

During the years when ANP operated, 1919 through 1969, nearly fifty African American news services cropped up. However, none of these was nearly as successful as ANP; and after 1969 the black press had no news service until April 1972, when the National Newspaper Publishers Association (NNPA, based in Washington, D.C.) began to provide the National Black News Service.

GERI ALUMIT

See also Abbott, Robert Sengstacke; Black Press; Chicago Defender; Villard, Oswald Garrison

Further Reading

Hogan, A. A Black National News Service: The Associated Negro Press and Claude Barnett, 1919–1945. London: Associated University Presses.

- Pride, Armistead S. "The News That Was." In Perspectives of the Black Press: 1974, ed. Henry G. La Brie III. Kennebunkport, Maine: Mercer House Press, 1974.
- Pride, Armistead S., and Clint C. Wilson II. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.
- Shofner, Jerrell H. "Florida." In The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979, ed. Henry Lewis Suggs. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- Thornbrough, Emma Lou. T. T. Thomas Fortune, Militant Journalist. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1972.
- Waters, Enoch P. American Diary: A Personal History of the Black Press. Chicago, Ill.: Path, 1987.

Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History

Scholars tend to focus on the artistic and literary manifestations of the Harlem Renaissance, neglecting its historical component. In fact, though, the black history movement led by Carter G. Woodson, the second African American to earn a Ph.D. from Harvard University, experienced growth and expansion during the time of the renaissance.

From its humble beginning in 1915, Woodson envisioned the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History (ASNLH) as a scientific and scholarly organization dedicated to the promotion and dissemination of useful information about various aspects of black history. Central to this project was the publication of a scientific historical journal, the Journal of Negro History (JNH), founded in 1916. In format, JNH resembled the American Historical Review, edited by the prominent scholar J. Franklin Jameson, which was the official organ of the American Historical Association (AHA). Both ASNLH and JNH represented a century-long effort to establish black history, first in black academia—historically black colleges and universities—and later in American society in general. The Harlem Renaissance was not only the backdrop but also a significant impetus for this institutionalization. Several factors made a serious study of black history possible: They included (1) white patronage, from individual donors and philanthropic organizations; (2) Woodson's single-minded leadership and his ability to attract prominent white historians and black civic leaders; and (3) the shifting demographics of black America, caused by the "great migration." These same factors also allowed the construction of an intellectual apparatus through which studies of black history could be disseminated to both African Americans and whites.

Throughout much of the nineteenth century, and up to the founding of ASNLH, black history was pursued in the narrow, parochial confines of specialized and localized black intellectual and historical associations. Among African Americans, interest in history and organization for its study were characterized by groups such as the American Negro Academy, founded by Alexander Crummell in 1897; and the Negro Society for Historical Research, founded in the early twentieth century by two black bibliophiles, John ("Grit") Bruce and Arthur Alonso Schomburg. Because their origins were in the late nineteenth century and the early twentieth century, the American Negro Academy and the Negro Society for Historical Research relied heavily on nineteenth-century notions of gentlemanly deportment and on elitist ideas about scholarship. Their members, drawn mostly from the black elite, saw their role as disseminating information to educated audiences in the form of addresses, lectures, and treatises. The American Negro Academy published occasional papers, and W. E. B. Du Bois, one of its most distinguished leaders, considered its membership representative of the best men of the race. Although the Negro Society for Historical Research was less exclusive, it, too, had only a moderate impact on the larger community. It consisted primarily of serious collectors and bibliophiles who focused on the black experience, and it proved too insular to survive in a changing intellectual environment.

ASNLH represented a significant departure from these earlier societies. By the 1920s, it emerged from its shadowy position as a small, localized historical organization and became a recognized scholarly association for the promotion of black history. Much of this change was a result of Woodson's pioneering work. Woodson was a native of Kentucky and a graduate of Berea College and Harvard University. As a professionally trained historian, he strongly believed that history and historical understanding involved not only the collection and preservation of materials but also a rigorous application of scientific objectivity to historical data. He understood, furthermore, that to be respected as a legitimate scholarly enterprise and to sustain itself financially, his organization would need the endorsement of white historians, philanthropists, and prominent African American scholars and donors. One source of such support was the presence of leading figures in the white and black communities on the executive council of ASNLH. Throughout the 1920s, prominent individuals from all walks of life served in this capacity. Historians were represented on the council by Carl Russell Fish of the University of Wisconsin and Albert Bushnell Hart of Harvard University. Philanthropists included Julius Rosenwald, chairman of Sears Roebuck and Company; and the financier George Peabody, a trustee at Hampton University. The council also included well-known white activists and black intellectuals. For example, two council members were Moorfield Storey, who served as executive director of the NAACP in the early twentieth century; and Monroe Nathan Work, a prominent black sociologist who was the editor of Negro Yearbook, an annual compilation of statistics regarding blacks in the United States. Perhaps the most prominent black college president to serve on the council was Robert Russa Moton, Booker T. Washington's successor at Tuskegee Institute; Moton had close ties to the Republican Party throughout the 1920s.

ASNLH also received $25,000 from the Carnegie Institute, with the help of J. Franklin Jameson, the director of the foundation; and a $25,000 grant from the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial Fund. These grants were used to collect data and fund several projects on free black families in the early republic (1789–1830) and in the antebellum period (1830–1860). The grants also supported a series of investigations by Alruthus Ambush Taylor, a graduate of the University of Michigan and Harvard University who was ASNLH's first associate investigator. Taylor collected information about African Americans during the Reconstruction period (1865–1877) and wrote two monographs: The Negro in the Reconstruction of Virginia (1924) and The Negro in the Reconstruction of South Carolina (1926). In addition, the grants facilitated the hiring of Lorenzo Greene as a part-time associate and field investigator for ASNLH. Between 1928 and 1930, Greene made important contributions to several of Woodson's book-length studies, including African Myths, The Negro in Our History, and The Negro Wage Earner.

ASNLH hired several African American women as research assistants. Irene Wright was hired in 1923 to conduct research in archives at Seville, in Spain. Wright investigated the struggle between the British and Spanish empires for territorial control of the Americas during the colonial period; she also examined material related to the position of blacks in Spanish colonial society. Ruth Anna Fisher, a graduate of Oberlin College who was a research assistant to J. Franklin Jameson, conducted research in the British Museum and the Public Record Office and found important letters as well as the diaries of captains of slaving vessels. Woodson's goal in having Fisher conduct research was to develop a documentary history and an anthropological portrait of Native Africans before the advent of the slave trade.

Another important component of the black history movement was the annual conventions held by ASNLH. Consistent with the overall goals of the organization and the fact that it sought to establish itself in large urban centers, meetings were held in cities with large black populations and established black communities: Baltimore, Maryland; Washington, D.C.; Chicago, Illinois; St. Louis, Missouri; Nashville, Tennessee; and elsewhere. These conventions often showcased the varied achievements of ASNLH and brought together distinguished individuals from many sectors of the population of the host city. The meetings of 1920 and 1924 can serve to illustrate the goals of ASNLH. The convention of 1920, held in Louisville, Kentucky, was devoted to the theme "Social and Economic Development of the Negro." Speakers focused on the early history of African Americans, the teaching of black history, and the specific contributions of enslaved Africans to civilization. The convention of 1924, in Baltimore, Maryland, examined (among other subjects) folklore among African Americans. Also, N. F. Mossell, author of The Work of the Afro-American Women, presented a paper, "History from the Point of View of a Child," in which he stressed the importance of elementary reading material in helping young students acquire a knowledge of their history.

These conferences not only highlighted black history but also addressed other concerns of ASNLH. Woodson felt that the role of the organization encompassed more than history as an academic discipline: It also extended to solving the problems of society. He hoped that ASNLH could help strengthen training in the social sciences in black schools and stimulate research and teaching about the social sciences and the economic problems of African Americans. Most important, he thought that ultimately his work could and would lead to an improvement in race relations.

One of the most enduring legacies of ASNLH was the establishment of Negro History Week in 1926. This event—celebrated in February, the month in which Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln were born—highlighted the work of ASNLH and drew attention to the importance of teaching black history in primary and secondary schools and at institutions of higher learning. Woodson never wanted Negro History Week to be observed only by the black community, so he took great pains to disseminate information about it to members of the white community.

Like ASNLH, the Journal of Negro History (JNH) played a crucial role in the creation of a viable black historical tradition. The journal—edited by Woodson from 1916 until his death in 1950—was the organization's premier scientific publication. It was founded to meet the need for an accurate record of black people's past and, equally, to provide a forum where black scholars could publish studies challenging conventional wisdom about that past. As many scholars have noted, the major historical associations, such as the American Historical Association, rarely published scholarship by African Americans. The American Historical Review did not invite W. E. B. Du Bois to publish a paper until 1910; the Mississippi Valley Historical Association and the Southern Historical Association did not invite black historians to present papers until the 1940s.

JNH was also important because of its multifaceted presentation of African Americans' past. The journal featured articles, communications, informative letters from individuals, notices, and reports from the annual and spring conferences of ASNLH. Many books were first printed, in their entirety, in JNH. At the center of the journal's philosophy were "five ways to help the cause"—reminders about how subscribers could help promote the study of black history. They were as follows: "subscribe to the journal, become a member of the Association, contribute to the research fund, collect and send us the historical materials bearing on the Negroes of your community, and urge every Negro to write us all he knows about his family history."

JNH published a wide range of scholarship. It concentrated on revisionist history; for example, it challenged the southern historian Ulrich Bonnell Phillips, whose American Negro Slavery depicted slavery as fairly benign; and it also offered significant revisions of the concept of Reconstruction (1865–1876) as a "tragic era." The earlier, legendary account had taken a dim view of blacks' participation in Reconstruction; blacks, who were portrayed as docile, lazy, and incompetent, were said to have been manipulated by two invidious factions: northern carpetbaggers (northerners who packed all of their belongings in a carpetbag and came South to profit from Reconstruction) and southern scalawags (native southerners who profited from the corruption of the Reconstruction era at the expense of their fellow southerners). This older view was countered in articles by John Lynch, a participant in Reconstruction in Virginia; by Alrutheus Ambush Taylor's pioneering work on Reconstruction; and by Woodson's own Negro in Our History, a scholarly textbook published in several editions throughout the 1920s. Moreover, Lynch, Taylor, and Woodson offered alternative portraits of black politicians and their activities in southern legislatures during Reconstruction, and thus did significant groundwork for the contemporary view of Reconstruction.

JNH also focused on the diaspora and its implications for African American life. The journal often included articles on the African past as well as the black experience in Latin America, Europe, and elsewhere. The article "Three Elements of African Culture," by Gordon Blaine Hancock, a well-known African American educator at Virginia Union, appeared in JNH in 1923. Also in 1923, in a nod to European history, JNH published Albert Perry's article on Abram Hannibal, an African who served at the court of the Russian czar Peter the Great. Perhaps the most interesting work of this kind was produced by Zora Neale Hurston. Hurston, who was a folklorist and ethnographer, spent considerable time in the 1920s documenting the folkways of rural African Americans throughout the South. Her contributions include "Cudjo's Own Story of the Last African Slavery" and a set of her own letters on the Mose Settlement, one of the oldest black colonies in Florida. Hurston's work complemented that of Elsie Clews Parsons, who worked intensely to stimulate interest in the collection of black folklore. ASNLH offered a prize of $200 for the best material collected.

JNH also included other subject matter of importance to African Americans. Particular issues presented material on black people's feelings about World War I; letters from participants in the "great migration," the movement of blacks from the rural South to the urban North between 1915 and 1930; reviews of the work of prominent authors, such as W. E. B. Du Bois's Darkwater (1920); and advertisements for black colleges and universities such as Howard, Tuskegee, Fisk, and Morris Brown.

Some issues of JNH were devoted to a specific topic. The issue of July 1922, for instance, was devoted to the black church; articles by Woodson, John Cromwell, and Walter Brooks focused on denominations such as the Baptists and examined churches in specific geographic locales such as the District of Columbia. An issue in 1924 was devoted exclusively to civil rights groups in the black community. Mary White Ovington, a protégé of Du Bois, wrote an article about the NAACP; L. Hollingsworth Wood, who was an active member of the executive council of ASNLH and a longtime supporter of African American causes, wrote an article on the Urban League; and the bibliophile and collector Jesse Moorland, a trustee of Howard University, wrote about the influence of the YMCA on African Americans. On important topics like Reconstruction, whole books were printed. For example, Alrutheus Ambush Taylor's The Negro in the Reconstruction of Virginia and The Negro in the Reconstruction of South Carolina were first printed in JNH, in 1924 and 1926.

ASNLH and JNH represent the culmination of a century-long effort to make black history a professional discipline. Like the Harlem Renaissance, the black history movement represented an assertive effort to reconstruct the past through viable organizations. This goal was supported by several trends in the African American community and the wider American community. Urbanization and professionalization—which facilitated the growth of institutions such as the black press, black businesses, black academic associations, and graduate training for black historians—were directly responsible for the development of the black history movement. Thus this movement, not unlike the literature of the Harlem Renaissance, created a legacy for black and white Americans.

STEPHEN G. HALL

See also Bruce, John Edward; Greene, Lorenzo; Hurston, Zora Neale; Moton, Robert Russa; National Urban League; Ovington, Mary White; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Woodson, Carter G.; Work, Monroe Nathan

Further Reading

- Dagbovie, Pero Gaglo. "Black Women, Carter G. Woodson, and the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, 1915–1950." Journal of African American History, 88, Winter 2003, pp. 21–41.
- Franklin, John Hope. George Washington Williams: A Biography. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1985.
- . "On the Evolution of Scholarship in Afro-American Scholarship." In The State of Afro-American History: Past, Present and Future, ed. Darlene Clark Hine. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1986.
- Goggin, Jacqueline. "Countering White Racist Scholarship: Carter G. Woodson and the Journal of Negro History." Journal of Negro History, 68, 1983, pp. 355–375.
- . "Carter G. Woodson and the Movement to Promote Black History, 1915–1950." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Rochester, N.Y., 1986.
- . Carter G. Woodson: Life in Black History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana University Press, 1993.

- Hall, Stephen G. "Alrutheus Ambush Taylor, Black Intellectualism, and the Remaking of Reconstruction Historiography, 1893–1954." UCLA Historical Journal, 16, 1996, pp. 39–60.
- Higham, John. History Professional Scholarship in America. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- McHenry, Elizabeth. Forgotten Readers: Recovering the Lost History of African American Literary Societies. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Meier, August, and Elliott Rudwick. Black History and the Historical Profession, 1915–1980. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Moses, Wilson Jeremiah. Afrotopia: The Roots of African American Popular History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Sinnette, Elinor Des Verney. Arthur Alonzo Schomburg: Black Bibliophile and Collector—A Biography. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1989.
- , et al. Black Bibliophiles and Collectors: Preservers of Black History. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1990.
- Walker, Clarence. Deromanticizing Black History: Critical Essays and Appraisals. Atlanta: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Wilson, Francille Rusan. "Racial Consciousness and Black Scholarship: Charles H. Wesley and the Consciousness of Negro Labor in the United States." Journal of Negro History, 81, 1996, pp. 72–88.

Atlanta University Studies

The Atlanta University Studies series lies outside the historical context of the Harlem Renaissance. Nevertheless, under the editorship of the protean W. E. B. Du Bois (1897–1914), the series provided an intellectual foundation for many of the significant themes in the ideology of the New Negro. To be more precise, the studies provided an intellectual justification for attempts by social scientists, writers of fiction and cultural and social criticism, and graphic artists to unearth African elements retained in the black population not only in North America but also in the Caribbean and South America. Furthermore, with regard to the development of black businesses, the series provided a philosophical rationale that resonated in the rhetoric of many black political leaders, such as Marcus Garvey. Finally, the studies provided factual evidence of significant enterprise among blacks (both male and female) nationwide. Thus despite the unevenness of the publications and the consequent acerbic criticism of Du Bois's efforts from white commentators who reviewed some of the studies, these works were an integral part of the philosophical rationalization of the New Negro movement.

The Atlanta University Studies series originated in 1896, at the annual Atlanta University Conference on Negro Problems. The annual conferences—the brainchild of the university's white president, Horace Bumstead; and one of its white trustees, a New Englander—were modeled after the Farmers Conferences of the Tuskegee Institute. Like Tuskegee's conferences, those at Atlanta were, in the words of the historian Leroy Davis, "laudable early attempts at meshing the needs of the community with the resources of the academy."

The studies conceived between 1897 and 1914 were edited primarily by Du Bois. His grandiose vision of the project called for a repetition of each topic every ten years. The proceedings of the studies ranged widely and (as noted above) varied in quality. Although Du Bois's plans did not reach fruition (and he did not participate in the project after 1914), his volumes in the series had a perceptible impact on the thought of people as varied as Alain Locke, Charles S. Johnson, and other patrons of the Harlem Renaissance; E. Franklin Frazier and other social and cultural critics; and sculptors and painters such as Richmond Barthé and Aaron Douglas.

As editor of and contributor to the series, Du Bois often vacillated between stereotypes of his African ancestors and genuine, lucid insights into their lives. For example, in Efforts for Social Betterment Among Negro Americans (1898), he referred to African religions as the "mystery and rites of . . . fetishism." As late as 1914, in Morals and Manners Among Negro Americans, Du Bois seemed to invent traditions, writing, "Africa is distinctly the land of the Mother." Nevertheless, Du Bois's thoughts on Africa and Africans were significant. Influenced by the immigrant German-Jewish anthropologist Franz Boas, who delivered the commencement address at Atlanta University in 1906, Du Bois again and again celebrated the contribution of blacks to world civilization, demonstrating that black Americans were descendants of peoples who had made and were perfectly capable of making essential contributions to the progress of humankind in the present and future. Furthermore, Du Bois anticipated the anthropologist Melville J. Herskovits and the works of the "father of Negro history," Carter G. Woodson, during the 1920s and early 1930s, that revealed African "retentions" in the black population in the United States. Africanism in the African American peoples was a vital theme, promulgated time and again by major writers and artists during the Harlem Renaissance. Du Bois also overtly linked pertinent African retentions to the issue of black people's capability in business enterprises when he asserted, in 1897, that many Africans "are born men and traffickers." In 1899, in The Negro in Business, a work in the Atlanta series, he once again asserted that "the African Negro is born a trader." Accordingly, although one of the most renowned social critics of the Harlem Renaissance, E. Franklin Frazier, rejected the notion of Africanism as the source of some blacks' success in business, he nevertheless saw business enterprises as essential for any program of black liberation.

In sum, the Atlanta University Studies evidently provided a strong foundation for the rising New Negro ideologies of economic and cultural nationalism. That the artists and theoreticians of the Harlem Renaissance were unable to impose cultural nationalism perhaps had more to do with their economic dependence on white patronage than with any unwillingness on their part to seize the historical moment of the 1920s for black liberation.

VERNON J. WILLIAMS

See also Barthé, Richmond; Boas, Franz; Douglas, Aaron; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Frazier, E. Franklin; Herskovits, Melville; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Locke, Alain; New Negro; New Negro Movement; Woodson, Carter G.

Further Reading

- Broderick, Francis. W. E. B. Du Bois: A Leader in a Time of Crisis. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1959.
- Lewis, David. W. E. B. Du Bois: A Biography of Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.
- Rudwick, Elliott. W. E. B. Du Bois: A Study of Minority Group Leadership. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1960.

Attaway, William

William Alexander Attaway (1911–1986) was a novelist, songwriter, playwright, screenwriter, labor organizer, and actor. He was the son of a physician and a teacher in Greenville, Mississippi, and was born into a life of privilege, but he did not want to follow in his parents' professional footsteps. As a teenager he chose to attend a vocational school and learn automotive mechanics; and although he soon yielded to family pressure and went to a regular high school, he continued to rebel against upper-class respectability. When a high school teacher introduced him to the poetry of Langston Hughes, he immediately decided to become a writer. He attended the University of Illinois at Urbana until his father's death, whereupon he dropped out to travel around the country as a hobo for the next two years. He returned to college and graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1936.

Attaway published his first short story, "Tale of the Blackamoor," in Challenge in June 1935. At about the same time he joined the touring company of You Can't Take It With You, helped by his sister, Ruth Attaway, who had begun her acting career as Rheba in the original production. While on the road, he learned that his novel Let Me Breathe Thunder had been accepted for publication, immediately quit the tour, and returned home to write.

The publication date of Let Me Breathe Thunder—1939—puts Attaway at the end of the Harlem Renaissance and the beginning of a period of realism. He established himself as a writer with this novel, a critically acclaimed story of two white hoboes and their Mexican charge. However, neither Let Me Breathe Thunder nor his next novel, Blood on the Forge, which was also well received by the critics, sold well (the latter, though, was reprinted in 1993). The reason may be that the landmark work Native Son by his friend Richard Wright, the icon of realism, was published in 1940, and Attaway's novels suffered in comparison. The three tragic Moss brothers in Blood on the Forge, like the white characters in Let Me Breathe Thunder, seem tame next to Wright's Bigger Thomas. (Attaway and Richard Wright had become friends in November 1935, when both were working on the Federal Writers' Project guide to Illinois.)

Attaway later turned to more lucrative forms of writing. He composed and arranged songs for Harry Belafonte, among others, and was involved in Calypso Song Book (1957, a collection of songs) and I Hear America Singing (1967, a children's book about the history of popular music). He also wrote scripts for radio, television, and motion pictures. One of his most important scripts was One Hundred Years of Laughter (1966), for a television special on black humor. After its completion he took his family to Barbados for what was to have been a week's vacation; they stayed eleven years. Attaway spent the last years of his life in Berkeley and then in Los Angeles, California. In 1985, while working on a script for The Atlanta Child Murders, he suffered a heart attack from which he never fully recovered. He died in 1986.

Biography

William Attaway was born on 19 November 1911 in Greenville, Mississippi. His mother, Florence Parray Attaway, was a teacher; his father, William Alexander Attaway, was a physician and businessman who co-founded the National Negro Insurance Association. Dr. Attaway moved the family to Chicago when young William was about ten years old, to escape the segregated South; this migration northward became a central theme in Attaway's novel Blood on the Forge (1941). Attaway left college for two years and became a hobo—this experience was a theme in his novel Let Me Breathe Thunder (1939)—but eventually received his B.A. in 1936. He married Frances Settele on 28 December 1962, at the home of his friend Harry Belafonte. The Attaways had a son and a daughter. Attaway died on 17 June 1986, in Los Angeles.

CARMALETTA M. WILLIAMS

See also Federal Writers' Project; Wright, Richard

Further Reading: Works

Blood on the Forge: A Novel. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1941. (Reprint, 1993.)

Calypso Song Book, ed. Lyle Kenyon Engel. New York, Toronto, and London: McGraw-Hill, 1957. (Attaway was a contributing editor.)

Carnival. (Play produced at University of Illinois-Urbana, 1935.)

"Death of a Rag Doll." Tiger's Eye, 1, October 1947, pp. 86–89. I Hear America Singing. New York: Lion, 1967.

Let Me Breathe Thunder. New York: Doubleday, Doran, 1939; London: Hale, 1940. (Novel.)

One Hundred Years of Laughter. American Broadcasting Company (ABC-TV), 1967. (Television script.)

"Tale of the Blackamoor." Challenge, 1, June 1936, pp. 3–4.

Authors: 1—Overview

The authors of the Harlem Renaissance shared the goal of developing new forms of artistic representation of the African American experience. At the same time, they manifested a wide range of aesthetic principles and radically diverse concepts of blackness. The Harlem Renaissance meant different things to different people. The novelists, poets, dramatists, and essayists whose activity was centered in Harlem, although aware of the unique value of African American culture and art, interpreted and represented this uniqueness in many, sometimes conflicting, ways, embodying the tensions and contradictions of their American context.

In their quest to move beyond the dominant white aesthetics, black writers and intellectuals, such as W. E. B. Du Bois, Alain Locke, and James Weldon Johnson, were convinced that the Negro Renaissance was an auspicious movement in American cultural life. Johnson, among others, believed that if it succeeded it would undermine prejudice, win respect for the intellectual and artistic achievements of blacks, and consequently promote equal rights.

The new sensibility of this period, first anticipated by Du Bois in The Souls of Black Folk in 1903, affirmed the dignity and cultural potential of African Americans. Centuries of slavery and racial prejudice had imposed on them a “double-consciousness,” to use Du Bois’s term, and they were now challenged to acknowledge their own intrinsic power (such power is always closely connected to knowledge of one’s own value) and to explore broader personal and artistic territories. Du Bois promoted many talented young African Americans, and as one of the organizers of the Pan-African conference in Paris in 1919, he urged black artists to create works from their own experiences and to celebrate their African and African American cultural heritage.

Du Bois was a charismatic figure who had an unquestionable influence on the New Negro, but his elitist notion of the “talented tenth” was criticized by several artists of the period (Wallace Thurman, Claude McKay, Zora Neale Hurston, and Langston Hughes in particular) as a Victorian cliché. Also, Du Bois’s moral outlook contrasted with Locke’s broader celebration of the New Negro. Locke saw the New Negro movement as a spiritual coming-of-age and “the finding of one another” as the greatest experience for those who gathered in Harlem. He saw Harlem as an experiment in racial welding that would enhance race consciousness. In his anthology The New Negro (1925), illustrated by Aaron Douglas, Winold Reiss, and Miguel Covarrubias, Locke not only showed the world the impressive impact of modern black culture but also acknowledged an emerging “common consciousness.”

Many writers of the Harlem Renaissance were convinced that drama was the crucial form for the future of blacks’ artistic development. As early as 1908 the first organization of African American theater professionals, the Frogs, was founded by George Walker and ten other members. Their purpose was to develop an archive of social, historical, and literary materials for a theatrical library. Around 1910 Egbert Austin (“Bert”) Williams, then America’s top comedian, was elected president of the Frogs.

Du Bois’s idea of theater was that it should be essentially political, so that drama would teach colored people the meaning of their history and also reveal African Americans to the white world. This concept was counterbalanced by that of Locke, who had a propensity for drama concerned not so much with protest or propaganda as with a revival of folklore. In Locke’s opinion, poetry and drama should reflect the soul of a people different in temperament from the “smug, unimaginative industrialist and the self-righteous Puritan.” The problem facing the black playwright was how to reconcile the vitality of folklore, an oral tradition, with the written language. Zora Neale Hurston (who won second prize for both fiction and drama in Opportunity’s literary contest of 1925) and Langston Hughes (who won first prize for poetry) did achieve a balance between these elements and conceived works based on black folk culture. In 1926, Locke, in “The Negro and the American Stage,” stressed the importance of folklore for the “complete development of the Negro dramatist”; that same year Hurston’s play Color Struck appeared in Fire!!—a magazine produced by the collaborative efforts of Wallace Thurman, Aaron Douglas, Bruce Nugent, John P. Davis, Gwendolyn Bennett, Hurston, and her friend Langston Hughes. Color Struck was the first of Hurston’s many achievements in drama, which she considered “inherent to Negro life.” In her plays as well as her prose, ethnography was applied to performance as a mode of scientific investigation and artistic representation. In 1930, Hurston and Hughes—who both received the patronage, and were subject to the psychological impositions, of Charlotte Mason—wrote Mule Bone, intending it to be “the first real Negro folk comedy.” Through a skillful use of black vernacular and black tradition, the play introduced a dramatic form that contrasted strongly with the stereotypical or ambivalent black characters in popular drama of the time, and also marked a clear departure from white American modernism.

Because of a disagreement between the authors over the copyright, Mule Bone could not be performed until several decades later (1991). Other African American plays, however, did have a significant impact at the time. In 1929, Harlem, by Wallace Thurman and William Rapp, opened at the Apollo Theater and became the most successful work written by African Americans but produced for Broadway's white audience. In 1935, Hughes's play Mulatto opened on Broadway; it had the longest run of any play by an African American until Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun, in 1959.

The aesthetic characteristics of the dramas of the Harlem Renaissance can also be found in its poetry and fiction. The first New Negro poets to attain recognition were Claude McKay and Countee Cullen. McKay, whose genius encompassed many contradictions, moved to Harlem from his native Jamaica in 1915; he immediately became a voice of unconventional wisdom and later was praised by Thurman as one of the few relevant artists "who had some concrete idea of style." McKay's Harlem Shadows (which included the famous sonnet "If We Must Die") was published in 1921, introducing him as the most fiery, radical, and powerful poet in Harlem's artistic world.

Countee Cullen was the boy wonder of the Harlem Renaissance and Du Bois's son-in-law. (He was married to Yolande, Du Bois's only daughter, in a memorable ceremony, and soon thereafter escaped to Europe with a male friend, Harold Jackman.) Cullen is a striking example of the controversial aspects of the vogue for Harlem. He tried to embody the spirit that made the New Negro respectable and worthy to white audiences. Fearing the dangers inherent in yielding to the contemporary fashion for exoticism and in exposing things that should remain secret, Cullen was among those who strongly objected to Carl Van Vechten's novel Nigger Heaven (1926). Cullen's own poetry, although it dealt with African and African American themes, conformed to traditional middle-class taste. Thurman gave an ironic picture of Cullen in his "creative hours, eyes on a page of Keats, fingers on typewriter, mind frantically conjuring African scenes."

James Weldon Johnson, a transitional figure who later became an inspiration for the Harlem Renaissance and a renowned poet, composed many songs for Broadway musicals, together with his brother Rosamond and Bob Cole. They also wrote several popular songs, including "Lift Every Voice and Sing," which became the unofficial black national anthem. Johnson is also important for his groundbreaking preface to The Book of American Negro Poetry in 1922; in this preface he stressed the literary potential of the black vernacular, as well as the power, emotional endowment, and artistic originality of African American writers. At about the same time, Hughes was incorporating blues rhythms and vernacular idioms into his poetry; and his radical poems of the 1930s included realistic portrayals of black characters—the lives of plain black men and women and their struggles against injustice.

Writers of fiction often focused on a fascination with Harlem, on the complexities of interracial relations and relations among blacks, and on the black protagonist represented with all his or her uncertainties. In The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (published anonymously in 1912 but reprinted in 1927), James Weldon Johnson prefigured what would become a pattern of other works of the Harlem Renaissance: an often unreliable narrator who tells about his moving from the rural South to the metropolitan North, experiencing the excitement of groundbreaking intellectual and artistic activity, and becoming intrigued by African American tradition and folklore—stereotypes still prevalent in white culture.

Jean Toomer's novel Cane (1923), a montage of prose and poetry, was the most refined modernist attempt thus far to render the black experience, individual perceptions of that experience, and the ambiguities that persisted in cultural dialogues between the South and the North. Cane introduced many of the themes and concerns of later Harlem Renaissance fiction, including differences of geographical origin, class, and gender within the black community. McKay's Home to Harlem (1928) was an immediate success, but it was harshly criticized by Du Bois for its lack of social decorum and still remains largely unappreciated despite its modern style. McKay combines the narratives of two migrants to show how a working-class African American and an intellectual Haitian immigrant overcome their class and national prejudice to develop an increasing, albeit unlikely, sense of familiarity and comradeship. The following works all appeared in 1928, an important year for the black novel: Jessie Redmon Fauset's Plum Bun, focusing on middle-class urban blacks in the North; Nella Larsen's Quicksand, which took up complex themes and issues such as female identity, class, color, and gender; Rudolph Fisher's The Walls of Jericho (Hughes described Fisher as the wittiest writer of the Harlem Renaissance, "whose tongue was flavored with the saltiest humor"); and Du Bois's Dark Princess. In 1932, Wallace Thurman's Infants of the Spring caused an uproar because of its uninhibited depiction of nightlife in Harlem and because Thurman sharply criticized many representative figures of the renaissance—his sarcastic bent made him disclaim the polite literature promoted by black leaders. (This inclination toward sarcasm was shared by several other authors, such as Claude McKay; Zora Neale Hurston, who dubbed Du Bois “Mr. Dubious”; Rudolph Fisher; and George S. Schuyler, who, as Hughes recalled, wrote “verbal brickbats that said sometimes one thing sometimes another but always vigorously.”) McKay was not only an able critic but also an exceptionally voracious reader; as a result, the publisher Macaulay hired him as a reader—the only African American reader to be employed by any of the larger white publishing firms. Interestingly, in The Blacker the Berry (1929), Thurman used a dark-skinned female protagonist; he was one of very few male writers who did this (Du Bois, in Dark Princess, was another).

Gender remained an issue in the Harlem Renaissance. The success of Nella Larsen’s cryptic, modernist fiction, such as Quicksand (1928) and Passing (1929), did not prevent her from falling into oblivion right after the crash of the stock market in 1929. The career of Jessie Redmon Fauset came to the same sad conclusion—as did the career of Zora Neale Hurston, although Hurston was one of the two literary giants of the Harlem Renaissance (the other was Toomer). The female poets Georgia Douglas Johnson, Anne Spencer, and Helene Johnson (whose “American Color Point of View” can be read as a feminine counterpart of Hughes’s “The Negro Speaks of Rivers”) went almost unacknowledged.

The New Negro movement seemed to decline with the crash of 1929 and the ensuing Great Depression, which led many artists and intellectuals to either an outright commitment to Marxism or an identification with American progressivism in general. Still, despite the shock caused by the Depression, the works published in the middle and late 1930s—Hurston’s novels, including her masterpiece Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), and her collection of tales Mules and Men (1935); Hughes’s autobiography The Big Sea (1940); McKay’s Harlem: Negro Metropolis (1940); and many others—confirmed the lasting legacy of this generous movement, which would leave its imprint on generations of writers to come. The vocabulary of color and sounds that James Baldwin borrowed from the Harlem Renaissance painter Beauford Delaney, the modernist surrealist mode of Ellison’s Invisible Man, the epic of the black struggle shown in the panels of Jacobs Lawrence and recounted in the novels of Toni Morrison—these are just a few examples of the inheritance left to today’s black artists.

See also Covarrubias, Miguel; Cullen–Du Bois Wedding; Delaney, Beauford; Douglas, Aaron; Lawrence, Jacob; Literature: 1—Overview; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Modernism; New Negro; New Negro Movement; Opportunity Literary Contests; Pan-African Congresses; Reiss, Winold; Talented Tenth; Theater; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”; specific writers and works

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1981.
- Bernard, Emily, ed. Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten. New York: Knopf, 1991.
- Boi, Paola. Talking Books: Zora Neale Hurston and the Power/Knowledge Philosophy in American Modernist Fiction. Cagliari, Italy: AV, 1999.
- Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd and Mead, 1972.
- The Book of American Negro Poetry*, ed. James Weldon Johnson. San Diego, Calif.: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983. (Originally published 1931.)
- Cooke, Michael G. Afro-American Literature in the Twentieth Century: The Achievement of Intimacy. New Haven, Conn., and London: Yale University Press, 1984.
- Davis, Thadious M. Nella Larsen, Novelist of the Harlem Renaissance: A Woman’s Life Unveiled. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.
- Douglas, Anne. Terrible Honesty: Mongrel Manhattan in the 1920s. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1995.
- Du Bois, William E. Burghardt. Writings. New York: Library of America, 1986.
- . Dark Princess, intro. Claudia Tate. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995. (Originally published 1928.)
- Fabre, Geneviève, and Michel Feith, eds. Jean Toomer and the Harlem Renaissance. New Brunswick, N.J., and London: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Fauset, Jessie Redmon. Plum Bun: A Novel Without a Moral. Boston: Beacon, 1990. (Originally published 1929.)
- Fisher, Rudolph. The Walls of Jerico. New York: Knopf, 1928.
- Gates, Henry Louis Jr., ed. The Prize Plays and Other Acts: Zora Neale Hurston, Eulalie Spence, Marita Bonner, and Other African American Women Writers, 1910–1940. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.
- Hemenway, Robert. Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.

- Huggins, Nathan Irving. Harlem Renaissance. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971
- , ed. Voices From the Harlem Renaissance. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996. (Originally published 1976.)
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. London: Pluto, 1986. (Originally published 1940.)
- Hughes, Langston, and Zora Neale Hurston. Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life, ed. Henry Louis Gates Jr. and George Houston Bass. New York: Harper Perennial, 1991. (Originally published 1931.)
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Folklore, Memoirs, and Other Writings, ed. Cheryl A. Wall. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- . Novels and Stories, ed. Cheryl A. Wall. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Johnson, Charles S. The Negro in American Civilization: A Study of Negro Life and Race Relations in the Light of Social Research. New York: Holt, 1930.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1968. (Originally published 1933.)
- . Black Manhattan. New York: Arno, 1968.
- . The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man. New York: Random House, 1989. (Originally published 1912.)
- Kaplan, Carla, ed. Zora Neale Hurston: A Life in Letters. New York and London: Doubleday, 2002.
- Kerman, Cynthia Earl, and Richard Eldridge. The Lives of Jean Toomer: A Hunger for Wholeness. Baton Rouge and London: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Larsen, Nella. Quicksand; Passing, ed. Deborah McDowell. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986. (Quicksand originally published 1928; Passing originally published 1929.)
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- Locke, Alain. The New Negro: Voices of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Atheneum, 1992. (Originally published 1925.)
- McKay, Claude. A Long Way From Home: An Autobiography. London: Pluto, 1970. (Originally published 1937.)
- . Home to Harlem. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1987. (Originally published 1928.)
- Perkins, Kathy A., ed. Black Female Playwrights: An Anthology of Plays Before 1950. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes (2 vols.). New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Redding, Saunders J. To Make a Poet Black. Ithaca, N.Y., and London: Cornell University Press, 1988. (Originally published 1939.)
- Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of the World, 1900–1968. New York: Random House, 1995. (Originally published 1968.)
- Schuyler, Georges B. Black No More: Being an Account of the Strange and Wonderful Workings of Science in the Land of the Free, A.D. 1933–1940. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1989. (Originally published 1931.)
- Thurman, Wallace. The Blacker the Berry. New York: Scribner, 1996. (Originally published 1929.)
- . Infants of the Spring. New York: Modern Library, 1999. (Originally published 1932.)
- Toomer, Jean. The Wayward and the Seeking: A Collection of Writings by Jean Toomer, ed. Darwin T. Turner. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1982.
- . Cane, ed. Darwin T. Turner. New York and London: Norton, 1988. (Originally published 1923.)
- . Essentials. Athens and London: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. New York: Knopf, 1926.
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1995.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance, Hub of African American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.
- Wilson, Sondra Katryn, ed. The Crisis Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays from the NAACP's Crisis Magazine. New York: Modern Library, 1999.
- Wintz, Cary, D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Authors: 2—Fiction

African American writers of fiction during the Harlem Renaissance continued a tradition that had begun in the mid-nineteenth century. In their novels and short stories, these writers developed themes of race, gender, class, justice, violence, history, migration, and cultural memory—themes that were similar to those found in the earlier fiction of, among others, William Wells Brown (Clotel, 1853), Harriet Wilson (Our Nig, 1859), Frances Harper (Iola Leroy, 1892), Pauline Hopkins (Contending Forces, 1900), Charles Chesnutt (House Behind the Cedars, 1900; The Marrow of Tradition, 1901), and James Weldon Johnson (The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, 1912). However, the fiction writers of the Harlem Renaissance broke away from the earlier tradition in that they “gave African American culture a more urban, assertive, and cosmopolitan voice” (Andrews et al. 1997). One significant factor in this transformation of the fictional voice was the migration of African Americans from the rural South to northern urban industrial centers as well as to urban areas of the South; another factor was African Americans’ travels in Europe during World War I and as part of the expatriate generation. At the same time, it is important to note that writers such as Zora Neale Hurston (in “Spunk,” 1925; “Sweat,” 1926; and Their Eyes Were Watching God, 1937) and Jean Toomer (in Cane, 1923) paid homage to Africans’ and African Americans’ southern ancestral past.

The transformed voice permeating the fiction of the Harlem Renaissance expresses strong pride in blackness, and in some instances calls directly for resistance to both subtle and overt racial oppression. In calling for social and political equality for black Americans and encouraging African Americans not to acquiesce, fiction writers—along with poets and writers of prose—contributed to the racial uplift movement.

Many fiction writers of the Harlem Renaissance disagreed about whether the purpose of art should be aesthetic or propagandistic. Much of the fiction produced during this period served a political or propagandistic purpose whether or not an author intended a work to be used in that way. The fiction of the Harlem Renaissance emphasizes the richness and diversity within African American culture. Consequently, novelists such as Nella Larsen and Jessie Fauset provide a glimpse into middle-class black America, primarily in the North; Zora Neale Hurston provides an overview of class within African American communities in the South. The fiction of the Harlem Renaissance offers a panoramic view of African American life at various levels from the black bourgeoisie to folk culture. By exploring the diversity within African American culture, these writers point out differences in the experience of African Americans based on educational background and class, despite common experiences based on racial background.

Johnson: The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man

James Weldon Johnson’s novel The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912) can set the stage for the fiction of this period, because Johnson developed common themes such as the construction of identity, “passing,” violence, and intraracial conflict. This novel was reissued in 1927, at the height of the Harlem Renaissance, perhaps because of those themes. Johnson examines the social construction of race through a mixed-race protagonist. Similar to several other fiction writers—such as Nella Larsen in Quicksand (1928) and Passing (1929), Jessie Fauset in Plum Bun (1929), and Wallace Thurman in The Blacker the Berry (1929)—Johnson explores the psychological consequences of blackness as a racial marker in a society that prefers biological and visible whiteness.

Johnson was a precursor of other writers of the Harlem Renaissance who examined race relations, violence, and interracial as well as intraracial conflict. For instance, Larsen, Fauset, and Toomer, like Johnson, explore interracial relationships at several levels: intimate, political, and social. Furthermore, Toomer in Cane (1923), Walter White in The Fire in the Flint (1924), and Langston Hughes in The Ways of White Folks (1933) examine the causes and effects of racial violence directed against African Americans.

During the Harlem Renaissance, fiction writers continued another tradition in African American literature: examining the effects of migration on black individuals and communities. Hundreds of thousands of African Americans migrated from the South to the North and within the South. Johnson’s protagonist in The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man migrates from the North to the South, to Europe, and then back to the United States. Similarly, in their fiction, Jean Toomer, Nella Larsen, Wallace Thurman, and Langston Hughes focus on the movement of blacks from one cultural space to another; Larsen and Toomer shed light on how the return to the South affected African Americans.

Toomer: Cane

Jean Toomer’s Cane was published in 1923. It received positive reviews for its modernist style and its examination of black migration and the connection between African Americans and their ancestral past in the South and in Africa. Many scholars associate the publication of Cane with the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance as a literary movement. Cane is certainly important in relation to other fiction of this period, given the common themes found in Toomer’s text and in subsequent works. However, it is difficult to place Cane within any one genre, because throughout this work Toomer used elements of the short story, poetry, and the novel. Cane is divided into three sections, to chronicle black migration from South to North and back to the South.

Toomer explores the causes and effects of the psychic or spiritual death many African Americans underwent during this period. This theme of spiritual death is explored in both northern and southern settings. Toomer emphasizes the theme of migration to illustrate the cultural displacement and social isolation of blacks who went from the South to the urban North. The rural South depicted in Cane symbolizes African Americans' spirituality and strong communal bonds; the North symbolizes isolation, materialism, and individual success.

Other themes developed in Cane include sexual exploitation, miscegenation, generational shifts, work, violence, and resistance. Toomer develops these themes and the theme of spiritual death through individual narratives centered on archetypal characters representing a broad range of individuals. For instance, the text opens with "Karintha," in which the title character is a girl stifled by a sexually oppressive and exploitative environment; and in this part of the book, Toomer contrasts Karintha's beauty, and the beauty of certain aspects of nature, with the ugliness of the girl's poverty-stricken environment, the men who exploit Karintha, and the devastating psychological effects of sexual exploitation.

"Becky," the second vignette in Cane, explores the theme of interracial relationships and miscegenation. Becky is a white woman who gives birth to two African American boys. This is the first story in Cane to explore the tangled racial skeins in the South, but it revises the traditional narrative of miscegenation by focusing on the community's reaction to the forbidden sexual relationship between Becky and her black lover. In mainstream narratives that alluded to intimate relationships between black men and white women, the black man was more often than not described as a brute threatening the sanctity of white womanhood. Toomer challenges the stereotype of the black brute: He depicts Becky as willingly becoming involved with a black man. We know that Becky has entered this relationship willingly because in order to protect her lover from retaliatory violence by white "protectors" of womanhood, she never reveals his identity. Furthermore, the fact that she has two black sons indicates a long-term relationship with her lover.

Toomer addresses race as a social construction in "Becky," and also in "Bona and Paul." Becky's sons are described as Negro rather than biracial even though their mother is white. This accords with a practice of the time during which the story is set: the "one drop" rule, whereby people of mixed race were considered to belong to the socially subordinate race. Other fiction writers of the Harlem Renaissance—including Nella Larsen in Quicksand and Passing, Jessie Fauset in Plum Bun, and Langston Hughes in the short stories "Passing" and "Father and Son" from The Ways of White Folks—also take up the theme of race as a social construction, describing the plight of mixed-race individuals and people involved in interracial relationships in a racist society.

"Becky" also considers the hypocrisy of southerners who attempt to hide behind religion while engaging in unchristian behavior. Toomer writes: "She's dead; they've gone away. The pines whisper to Jesus. The bible flaps its leaves with an aimless rustle on her mound." The reference to the pines suggests that the crimes committed by presumably Christian yet racist southerners—in this case the death of Becky and the disruption of her sons' lives—will be revealed to a higher being. In the story, both whites and blacks isolate Becky and render her powerless. They assuage their guilt by leaving food for her and by building her a house, but the house is built on such shaky ground that it collapses, crushing her.

Each story in Cane builds on other stories in the text. For instance, "Fern" further develops the themes of isolation, sexual exploitation, and miscegenation found in "Karintha" and "Becky." Toomer also develops the theme of interracial relationships and sexuality and connects it to the theme of violence in "Blood Burning Moon." In "Blood Burning Moon," Toomer asks who has the right to the black woman, and he shows how this question is inextricably linked to the history of the socially condoned sexual exploitation of the black female body during the era of slavery. Although this story is set after that era, the narrator alludes to past differences in power—differences determined by race—and shows the connections between race relations during slavery and afterward.

Toomer addresses the causes and effects of racially based violence for the first time in Cane in "Blood Burning Moon." This story opens with a poem describing a woman's braid, which looks like a lyncher's rope. As in other stories in the text, the epigraph at the beginning foreshadows the prevalent theme. Writers such as Toomer, Hughes, White, and Larsen present lynching as a theme because this was a very real threat to African Americans of the time.

The second part of Cane takes place in the urban North: in Washington, D.C., and Chicago. Here Toomer contrasts the earthy southern landscape with northern coldness. Toomer associates the cold with the isolation of blacks living in this new environment and with the concrete buildings characteristic of industrialization. Toomer demonstrates in Part Two how African Americans who deny Africa and the American South as a vital part of their heritage become consumed by an emphasis on money, “machines, nightclubs, newspapers, and anything else which represents modern society” (Bontemps 1972). The acceptance of materialistic, individualistic values has a devastating impact on the African American community because the emphasis on individual success can lead to estrangement from the black community and their ancestral past. Toomer’s critique of the northern urban environment suggests the disillusionment felt by many blacks who had migrated to the promised land and found that they still encountered racism and limited employment opportunities and were still subjected to violence.

Part Three of Cane takes the reader and Kabnis, the central character of this section, back to the South. Toomer depicts Kabnis as a man in search of his identity, and this is especially important because Kabnis rejects and hates the South upon first arriving there. In this section, Toomer chronicles Kabnis’s journey toward connecting with his black ancestral past.

Cane is a seminal work of fiction. Toomer addresses themes associated with the Harlem Renaissance; he also addresses concerns of modernist writers during this era, linking the literature of the Harlem Renaissance to the American modernist movement.

White: The Fire in the Flint

In The Fire in the Flint (1924), Walter White expands on Johnson’s and Toomer’s use of violence as a theme. During his tenure with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), White—who was able to pass as a white man—infiltrated and investigated white supremacist groups. As an eyewitness of the activities of white lynch mobs, he was able to give lawyers and others in the antilynching movement valuable firsthand information. In The Fire in the Flint, he not only exposes American racism and lynching but also offers insights into the black labor movement and demolishes the myth of the African American brute.

Women Writers

African American women wrote some of the most important fiction of the Harlem Renaissance. Jessie Redmon Fauset, a prolific writer, wrote four novels—There Is Confusion (1924), The Chinaberry Tree (1931), Plum Bun, and Comedy American Style (1933)—as well as literary reviews, poems, and short stories. Nella Larsen wrote Quicksand and Passing. Zora Neale Hurston wrote short stories, plays, and novels including “Sweat,” “Spunk,” Colorstruck (1925), and Their Eyes Were Watching God. The playwright Georgia Douglas Johnson wrote antilynching works and dramas focused on class, miscegenation, and the sexual exploitation of black women, such as A Sunday Morning in the South (1925), Blue Blood (1926), Safe (1929), and Blue-Eyed Black Boy (1930s). Mary Burrill, another playwright of the Harlem Renaissance, addressed themes similar to those of black female novelists and playwrights. Burrill’s They That Sit in Darkness (1919) focuses on motherhood and birth control; her Aftermath (1928) focuses on resistance to racial oppression and the position of black soldiers returning to the United States after fighting for American democracy.

Women authors such as Fauset, Larsen, Hurston, and Georgia Douglas Johnson provide a critique of both the “new woman” and the “New Negro” in their fiction. Fauset and Larsen illustrate the precarious position of African American women within both movements. In general, these women writers describe intersections of race, class, and gender. They create multidimensional female characters who overtly and covertly resist victimization based on their gender as well as their race.

Fauset, Larsen, and Hurston also offer a profound critique of marriage by examining the unequal power of men and women and the economic basis of marriage as an institution. As DuCille (1993) notes, writers such as Fauset, Larsen, and Hurston “use coupling as a metaphor through which to examine and critique the color consciousness, class stratification, social conventions, and gender relations of the burgeoning black middle class and working class communities.” Furthermore, these writers examine how African American women react to being considered sex objects. Hurston and Larsen illustrate how African American women develop a sense of sexual agency despite living in a racist, sexist society. For instance, Hurston's novel Their Eyes Were Watching God is a coming-of-age story describing the social and sexual development of the heroine, Janie Crawford.

Female authors also provide a critique of the educational and employment opportunities available to women. For instance, Larsen, in her depiction of Naxos in Quicksand, criticizes the southern black school for attempting to train pupils to imitate whiteness. Larsen's heroine has difficulty finding employment once she leaves Naxos, because of her race and gender. Fauset demonstrates how women are constrained by societal notions of acceptable employment for unmarried black women, such as domestic service, teaching, and office work. Hurston illustrates that women of higher socioeconomic status are judged harshly by society when they pursue nontraditional work; Hurston's character Janie Crawford ends up doing migrant farm work, side by side with her husband.

McKay: Examining Black Intellectuals and Expatriates

Claude McKay—and some other writers of the Harlem Renaissance, including Larsen, Toomer, Langston Hughes, Walter White, and James Weldon Johnson—looked at the role of the black intellectual and the black expatriate in their fiction. McKay, like some of his contemporaries, experimented with writing in a variety of literary genres, and he produced poetry as well as fiction. Critics often associate McKay's fiction with cultural primitivism because of his emphasis on black, especially Jamaican, folk culture. McKay's fiction includes Home to Harlem (1928), Banjo (1929), and Banana Bottom (1933). In these books McKay addresses the plight of the black intellectual and the relationship between black intellectuals and the mass of black people.

McKay felt that progress and true racial uplift depended on all segments of the black community, not just the educated black elite. According to McKay, educated African Americans during the 1920s espoused the need for a racial renaissance without considering the role of the common folk in this new cultural movement. McKay writes in his novel Banjo: "It's the common people, you know, who furnish the bone and sinew and salt of any race or nation. . . . If this renaissance is going to be more than a sporadic scabby thing, we'll have to get down to our racial roots to create it."

Home to Harlem provides one view of life in the black urban ghetto. McKay associates Harlem—where this novel is set—with a vibrant black culture, but he also explores alienation, economic uncertainty, and negative aspects of American materialism. He contrasts two characters, Jake and Ray, to emphasize the division between common black folk and the so-called black intellectual. McKay's depiction of Jake, which is similar to Toomer's depiction of Rhobert in Cane and Larsen's depiction of Helga Crane in Quicksand, draws attention to the conflict between modern society and the vitality and passion associated with African cultural images and black life in Harlem. Ray represents the black intellectual who exchanges his humanity for a mainstream education (Bontemps 1972)—who separates the intellect from the emotions. Ray's inability to reconcile his intellectual and emotional development leads him to become an expatriate, and this decision suggests the alienation of the black intellectual and artist within the United States, largely because of American racism. Expatriation was in fact a realistic theme: Many black artists, as well as whites, were actually leaving the United States and moving to Europe to pursue their personal development.

McKay also examines the black expatriate movement and the plight of the black intellectual in Banjo. Ray, the character from Home to Harlem, reappears in Banjo; and McKay once again explores the causes and effects of the alienation of black intellectuals from the masses of black people and whites. The narrator notes that despite educational accomplishments and socioeconomic status, color and race shape the experiences of individuals in American society. African Americans do not participate as equals in the American dream; rather, regardless of their intellectual acumen, they are judged first and foremost as blacks and are consequently looked down on. McKay writes in Banjo: "The thinking colored man could not function normally like his white brother, responsive and reacting spontaneously to the emotions of pleasure or pain, joy or sorrow, kindness or hardness, charity, anger, and forgiveness." McKay illustrates how American mainstream society views African Americans as a monolithic group, whereas whites are judged on their merits as individuals.

In Banjo, McKay further explores the relationship between the artist and the folk in African American culture. Ray represents the black intellectual; Banjo represents the artist. Banjo describes his instrument as a reflection of his soul and himself, and McKay's emphasis on the banjo as an important instrument elevates African American folk art. (Similarly, Zora Neale Hurston elevates African American folk culture through her use of folklore and black dialect as art forms; and Langston Hughes elevates the black artist and the spiritual tie between artists and their art through his depiction of Roy in “Home” and Oceola in “The Blues I’m Playing,” in his short-story collection The Ways of White Folks.) McKay likens the banjo to African Americans’ culture by noting that this instrument was preeminent in their creation of music. He also describes the banjo as affirming the existence of African Americans in a world where they were rendered invisible by the dominant culture. In Banjo, McKay celebrates African American folk culture and shows how black artists and their art help to empower African Americans in the face of attempts to displace them and despite the chaos associated with black life in the early twentieth century.

Thurman: The Blacker the Berry and Infants of the Spring

Wallace Thurman’s novels The Blacker the Berry (1929) and Infants of the Spring (1932) develop the themes of racial consciousness, the role of the black artist, and racism. The Blacker the Berry is unique because Thurman focuses on the effects of internalized racism and intraracial prejudice. Infants of the Spring provides a first-hand critical evaluation of the Harlem Renaissance.

Thurman—like Langston Hughes in The Ways of White Folks (1934), Rudolph Fisher in The Walls of Jericho (1929), and George Schuyler in Black No More (1931)—was a master of both satire and irony. The Blacker the Berry is a scathing critique of color and class prejudice within the African American community. This novel explores the development of Emma Lou, a dark-skinned African American, as she confronts not only the prejudice to which her family and her associates are subjected because of her darkness but also her own negative self-image, a result of internalized racism. Thurman took his title from a common saying among African Americans: “The blacker the berry, the sweeter the juice.” That folk saying, as well as Thurman’s novel, celebrates blackness.

Emma Lou desperately tries to transform herself by straightening her hair and using creams to lighten her skin. Although these attempts are in part a consequence of the psychological abuse she has suffered because of color prejudice within the black community, Thurman suggests that her own self-hatred has played an even larger role in causing her discontent. According to the narrator, Emma Lou eventually learns that she must “accept her black skin as being real and unchangeable . . . and with this in mind begin life anew, always fighting, not so much for acceptance by other people but for acceptance of herself by herself.”

Thurman’s novel Infants of the Spring provides a critique of African American artists, specifically those associated with the Harlem Renaissance. It exposes the foibles of and conflicts between some of the major figures in the Harlem Renaissance, including Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, Alain Locke, Countee Cullen, Rudolph Fischer, and Thurman.

Fisher: The Walls of Jericho

Rudolph Fisher uses satire in The Walls of Jericho (1928) to develop a critique of social class and racial conflict during the 1920s. Like Thurman, he exposes the dangerous elitism among the African American bourgeoisie. He also satirizes the relationship between African Americans and white liberals through one of his characters, the white socialite Agatha Camp (his model for this character was Charlotte Osgood Mason, a white patron of black artists). Essentially, Fisher demonstrates how relationships between African Americans and whites can develop only so far if whites take a paternalistic attitude.

Hughes: Not Without Laughter and The Ways of White Folks

Langston Hughes, one of the most prolific writers of the Harlem Renaissance, produced poetry, fiction, and nonfiction during this period and afterward. Not Without Laughter (1933) and The Ways of White Folks (1934) are two of his most intriguing works. Not Without Laughter is a coming-of-age story about a black boy in the Midwest. The Ways of White Folks focuses on relationships—intimate and superficial—between blacks and whites. Hughes uses satire to expose white racism; to criticize liberal (or presumably liberal) white Americans’ growing fascination with black culture, especially when this fascination stems from and perpetuates stereotypes of African Americans; and to criticize the patronage system that affected many artists of the Harlem Renaissance.

The writers discussed in this essay are among the best-known figures associated with the Harlem Renaissance. Their fiction reflects a new era in African American history: This period was characterized by the Jazz Age, the image of the New Negro, a renewed sense of radicalism among some African Americans, and a sense of pride in being black. Although the Great Depression of the 1930s marked the end of the Harlem Renaissance, the influence of the writers associated with this movement can be seen in much later works by African Americans: the “black arts movement” of the 1960s and 1970s, the renaissance of African American women’s literature in the 1980s, and the fiction and poetry of African Americans today.

DEIRDRE J. RAYNOR

See also Literature: 4—Fiction; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Modernism; Primitivism; specific writers and works

Further Reading

- Andrews, William, et al. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Baker, Houston A. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Bernard, Emily, ed. Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Bontemps, Arna, ed. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. 1972.
- DuCille, Ann. The Coupling Convention. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Fabre, Geneviève, and Michel Feith, eds. Temples for Tomorrow: Looking Back at the Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Gates, Henry Louis, et al. The Norton Anthology of African American Literature. New York: Norton, 1997.
- Singh, Amritjit, et al. The Novels of the Harlem Renaissance. 1996.
- Wall, Cheryl. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. 1995.
- Wilson, Sondra Kathryn. The Crisis Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays from the N.A.A.C.P.’s Crisis Magazine. New York: Random House, 1999.
- . The Opportunity Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays from the Urban League’s Opportunity Magazine. New York: Random House, 1999.
- . The Messenger Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays from the Messenger Magazine. New York: Random House, 2000.

Authors: 3—Nonfiction

African American and Jewish-American historians, anthropologists, psychologists, and sociologists who came of age between 1877 and 1919—an era that scholars of African American history often describe as “the nadir”—laid the intellectual foundations for the nonfiction authors of the Harlem Renaissance in the 1920s and 1930s. African American historians in particular reacted against such blatant forms of racism as Jim Crow laws, disenfranchisement, extralegal violence, and the removal of blacks from positions involving skilled labor.

These nonfiction authors, figures such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Carter G. Woodson, used their writings not only in an attempt to bolster black racial pride and instill self-esteem in their people, but also to educate whites in what was a seething and sometimes explosive national atmosphere of racial conflict—despite Booker T. Washington’s public policy of racial accommodation. Du Bois and Woodson were the leading historians who wrote works extolling the achievements and capabilities of their people, not only in the United States but also in Africa, the Caribbean, and South America.

Du Bois was born into a poor, female-run household in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. He received degrees from Fisk and Harvard universities, as well as graduate training in the social sciences at some of the most prestigious German universities; but in his own ideology, he vacillated between color-blind universalism and cultural pluralism. He often spoke and wrote as if there were what David Levering Lewis called “distinct racial attributes.” Thus Du Bois argued—in his Atlanta University Studies and his seminal volume of African history, The Negro (1915), which drew on the pioneering work on Africa by Franz Boas, the great anthropologist of German-Jewish descent—that African peoples had made, and were perfectly capable of making in the present and future, achievements essential to human progress. In so doing, Du Bois discredited the claim of white supremacists that “color is a mark of inferiority.” At the same time, though, he argued that black peoples were distinct from whites “to some extent in spiritual gift.”

Carter G. Woodson, the son of former Virginian slaves, had lifted himself up from abject poverty to reasonable comfort through sheer pluck, hard work, and perseverance. Like Du Bois, he attended Harvard, where he received his doctorate despite being embroiled in disputes with his major professor. Woodson founded the Journal of Negro History in 1915. During the 1920s and 1930s he published several historical and sociological works, including five textbooks (one of which, The Negro in Our History, went through several editions during the years between its initial publication in 1922 and 1947). His work (as noted above) was consciously aimed at enhancing black racial pride and, as a consequence, instilling self-esteem in his black readers.

Arthur Schomburg, a Puerto Rican immigrant who lived in New York City, is known primarily as a bibliophile (he sold part of his library to the Carnegie Corporation, which in turn donated the collection to the New York Public Library). However, Schomburg also made a vital contribution to Alain Locke's monumental anthology The New Negro (1925). In that collection, Schomburg wrote what has become a credo for present-day autodidacts: "The American Negro must remake his past in order to make his future." Like both Du Bois and Woodson, Schomburg sought—as the recent historian Winston James has pointed out—to construct a black "vindicationist" history.

For sociologists such as Charles S. Johnson and E. Franklin Frazier, the "social problems" of blacks during the 1920s and 1930s required environmental explanations rather than the racial explanation that pervaded most of the writings of most European-American social scientists at the time. Johnson, a native of Virginia, was trained at the University of Chicago and became an educator, author, and editor (he edited Opportunity, the organ of the National Urban League). He believed that a revitalization of African American folk culture was necessary in order to restore the values and behavior of the mass of black people who had migrated from the South to the urban industrial North. Johnson left New York City in 1926 to become a professor and later the first African American president of Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee; and in 1934, he published a classical sociological work, Shadow of the Plantation. This book documented the harsh, even brutal, conditions under which African American farmers lived in Macon County, Alabama; it was a crushing indictment of the sharecropping system—which, however, was changing because of the increasing number of literate young blacks in the country.

E. Franklin Frazier was a native of Maryland and a graduate of Howard University, Clark University, and the University of Chicago. Frazier, like Johnson, was alarmed by the anomie that characterized the northern urban industrial areas where the mass of transplanted southern immigrants lived. In The Negro Family in Chicago (1932) and his classic work The Negro Family in the United States (1939), Frazier publicized the plight of most African American migrants. Frazier, who had published essays in Opportunity between 1924 and 1930, intended to subvert the traditional orthodoxies regarding race and culture. Accordingly, he launched assaults against both strictly racial and strictly cultural explanations for the normlessness of black ghettos.

Anthropologists were especially fascinated by issues of race and culture with reference to blacks. Melville J. Herskovits, a Jewish-American anthropologist, believed that the discussion of race in the American social sciences had direct implications for the issue of the assimilation of blacks. At the beginning of his career, Herskovits, who was a student of the methodological puritan Franz Boas, was involved in arguments about the relative merits of the methodology of racist intelligence testers. As early as the 1900s his mentor, Boas, had attacked their empirical methodology and had concluded that there was no compelling evidence of "racial" mental differences among blacks. As a consequence, Boas argued that assimilation through miscegenation was the true solution to the problems centered on relations between blacks and whites.

In Herskovits's essay "The Negro's Americanism," published in Alain Locke's The New Negro, the tension between assimilation and racial essentialism was apparent. Nevertheless, the New Negro sought—with infectious enthusiasm—an essential cultural identity with bases in African and African American folk culture. As a result, Herskovits's embrace of the ideology of the intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance led him to his own search for African "retentions" in the Western Hemisphere, a search that had begun three decades earlier in the nonfiction writings of W. E. B. Du Bois.

Finally, African American and Jewish-American psychologists such as Howard Hale Long, Horace Mann Bond, Herman Canady, Martin D. Jenkins, Joseph St. Clair Price, Doxey Wilkerson, and Otto Klineberg published articles in The Crisis, Opportunity, and the Journal of Negro Education that raised issues related to the sources of racial differences between the scores of whites and blacks on intelligence tests. These authors were critical of the cultural biases in the tests.

In sum, the nonfiction authors of the Harlem Renaissance contributed narratives that countered the pervasive racism of the majority group in the United States. Seeking to revitalize African American culture, nonfiction authors challenged the dominant racial and ethnocentric discourse that attempted to use history, anthropology, sociology, and psychology as the “social scientific” bases for white supremacy.

VERNON J. WILLIAMS JR.

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History; Atlanta University Studies; Boas, Franz; Crisis, The; Literature: 6—Nonfiction; Opportunity; specific authors and works

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Fabre, Geneviève, and Michel Feith, eds. Temples for Tomorrow: Looking Back at the Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- . Voices of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap–Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Random House, 1979.
- , ed. The Portable Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Authors: 4—Playwrights

Feeling overwhelmed by the numerous fictitious stories and plays published and produced during the early 1900s that perpetuated negative racial stereotypes, W. E. B. Du Bois made a public statement in an editorial in the February 1926 issue of The Crisis (the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, NAACP), raising questions about the liability and social responsibility of artists and authors. The acclaimed Negro actress Hattie McDaniel, who was criticized by certain members of the Negro community for portraying negative racial images (she is credited with creating the quintessential film representation of the “mammy” caricature), once remarked that it was better to play a maid than to be a maid and certainly more profitable. However, her critics—such as Jessie Redmon Fauset, the literary editor of The Crisis—argued that the long-term damage done by artists like McDaniel would preclude any hope of racial equality.

In his editorial in The Crisis—“The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?”—Du Bois asked artists and writers to consider seven questions: (1) What is the actor’s personal responsibility in portraying black characters? (2) Can an author be criticized for depicting positive or negative characteristics of a racial group? (3) Should publishers be criticized for refusing to publish books with nonstereotypical representations of Negroes? (4) How can Negroes refute negative stereotypes that most Americans accept as cultural truths? (5) Should educated black characters receive the same sympathetic treatment from artists and audiences as Porgy received in the popular American opera Porgy and Bess? (6) How will white and Negro artists find the courage to create multiple representations of black characters when the world has seen only negative representations and believes that Negroes are incapable of behaving differently? (7) Who will tell the truth about the actual character of the Negro people if their young writers are tempted to follow popular trends?

Du Bois was not the only activist during the Harlem Renaissance to be concerned about the popular tendency, on most American stages, to portray Negro characters as minstrel-type clowns. Several writers, artists, philosophers, politicians, ministers, and housewives posed the same or similar questions and sometimes even tried to answer them. Those whose attempts to answer Du Bois’s questions were the most successful or caused the most controversy were probably the playwrights.

The playwrights of the Harlem Renaissance were unified in their determination to solve the problem of “race” through their work for the theater but were divided with regard to strategy. Some of them advocated “folk dramas”; others advocated history or pageant plays; still others thought that propaganda plays, such as plays about lynching, were the most effective. The merits of the various forms of Negro theater were often debated not only in Harlem and elsewhere in New York state but also in Washington, D.C., at the Saturday Nighters Club. The host for these passionate discussions in Washington was the well-known playwright and poet Georgia Douglas Johnson (1880–1966), who wrote twenty-eight or more plays at her home on S Street in several genres, such as folk plays, anti-lynching plays, and history plays.

W. E. B. Du Bois

W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963), a widely respected Negro leader, philosopher, and playwright, greatly influenced Georgia Douglas Johnson's career and the discussions about the plight of Negro theater that were held at her house. As the editor of The Crisis, Du Bois sponsored playwriting contests and helped several playwrights produce their work professionally. However, when the debate over the portrayal of the Negro onstage and in film intensified, and when both the Negro masses and Du Bois's "talented tenth" became hopeless about racial oppression, he decided that further action was needed. In "Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre: The Story of a Little Theatre Movement," an essay that also appeared in The Crisis in June 1926, he argued that the plays of a real Negro theatre must be: 1. About us. That is, they must have plots which reveal Negro life as it is. 2. By us. That is, they must be written by Negro authors who understand from birth and continual association just what it means to be a Negro today. 3. For us. That is, the theatre must cater primarily to Negro audiences and be supported and sustained by their entertainment and approval. 4. Near us. The theatre must be in a Negro neighborhood near the mass of ordinary Negro people.

On 3 May 1926, Du Bois had made his dream a reality by opening a Negro "little theater"—the Krigwa Players—in the basement of the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library. The company staged three one-act plays: Compromise and The Broken Banjo (two tragedies by Willis Richardson), and The Church Fight (a comedy by Ruth Ann Gaines-Shelton). Du Bois hailed the event as an unquestionable success and said that enthusiastic audiences left the theater wanting more. His goal was to organize Krigwa Players Little Negro Theaters (KPLNTs) throughout the United States to stage works written by himself and others presenting his views about the future of Negro theater and the talented tenth. Several playwrights were influenced by Du Bois's little theater movement, including Marieta Bonner, Owen Dodson, Shirley Graham Du Bois, Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, Georgia Douglas Johnson, May Miller, Willis Richardson, and Eulalie Spence.

Willis Richardson

Interestingly, Willis Richardson (1889–1977), whose plays were staged by Du Bois's KPLNT, had somewhat different views about the goals and future of Negro theater. Richardson, as noted above, was influenced by Du Bois, who was his mentor, but he was also inspired by a controversial anti-lynching play called Rachel (1916) by Angelina Weld Grimké (his former high school teacher) and by the Irish National Theater. In 1919, Richardson had addressed concerns similar to those of Fauset, in an essay in The Crisis titled "The Hope of a Negro Drama." Richardson believed that the Negro had a natural predisposition for poetry, that all playwrights are poets, and that therefore all Negro poets should write Negro drama "that shows the soul of a people; and the soul of this people is truly worth showing." He considered the Irish National Theater an excellent model for Negro playwrights because of its small size and its international reputation. He wanted his vision of Negro theater to reach the entire world; and even though he strongly encouraged Negro poets to write plays, he praised the work of playwrights who were not Negroes but nevertheless wrote about the "souls" of Negro people in a suitable fashion—playwrights such as Eugene O'Neill and Ridgley Torrence. Richardson did not agree with Du Bois that Negro plays had to be written by Negro playwrights, produced near Negro communities, or aimed at exclusively Negro audiences; he felt, rather, that Negro plays should be written for theatergoers worldwide. Despite their philosophical differences, Du Bois advanced Richardson's career by staging several of Richardson's plays and by advising him to share his work with Raymond O'Neil's Ethiopian Art Players in Chicago.

Richardson wrote at least forty-eight plays, including children's plays, historical plays, and family and marital plays; a few examples are The Flight of the Natives; The Black Horseman; The House of Sham; Attucks, the Martyr; Near Calvary; Antonio Maceo; The King's Dilemma; The Dragon's Tooth; and The Gypsy's Finger Ring. His one-act drama The Chip Woman's Fortune—a realistic work emphasizing cohesive relationships in a family despite generational gaps—was the first nonmusical play by a Negro to be produced on Broadway; it opened on 15 May 1923 at the Frazee Theater. Richardson also edited two anthologies of drama: Plays and Pageants from the Life of the Negro (1930) and Negro History in Thirteen Plays (1935).

Richardson's distinguished career was shaped by many other mentors besides du Bois. Richardson met some of these mentors through his attendance at Georgia Johnson's Saturday Nighters Club. He was greatly influenced by the work of Alain Locke (1886–1954), a philosopher who was teaching at Howard University and was a cofounder of the Howard University Players. Richardson had originally submitted his plays to Locke, hoping that they would be produced at Howard University; but Locke's request to stage one of them was turned down by the president of the university, and Richardson then sought Du Bois's help.

Alain Locke

Locke was a mentor to numerous other playwrights of the Harlem Renaissance besides Richardson and was a judge in the playwriting contests sponsored by Opportunity, a publication of the Urban League. Locke published several essays on the New Negroes and their place in theater. He developed and published an extensive manifesto outlining his views on Negro folk drama and edited several anthologies that included plays representing his vision of this genre. Locke encouraged Negro artists to abandon commercial theater, in which stereotypes and caricatures of the Negro had dominated American and some European stages since the late 1800s. He believed that Negro theater should be housed at universities instead of community centers in major cities. In 1922, in an essay published in The Crisis, he wrote:

We believe a university foundation will assure a greater continuity of effort and insure accordingly a greater permanence of result. We believe further that the development of the newer forms of drama has proved most successful where laboratory and experimental conditions have obtained and that the development of race drama is by those very circumstances the opportunity and responsibility of our educational centers.

Ideally, these educational centers would replicate European theatrical training schools, such as the Moscow Art Theater, where novice actors could work with a master director.

Locke and his colleague Montgomery Gregory, the cofounder of the Howard Players, produced works by professional playwrights (such as Ridgley Torrence) with professional actors (such as Charles Gilpin); they also produced plays written by students under the auspices of Howard University's theater department. Locke and Montgomery invited theater professionals, regardless of race, to help them train the Howard University Players. As time went on, Locke realized the importance not only of training actors but also of developing scripts. He began to publish a series of articles about the importance of folk drama and the stage voice of the "New Negro."

Locke argued that a problem with Negro theater was its desire to imitate western European theater. In his essay "The Negro and the American Stage," he asserted that "one can scarcely think of a complete development of dramatic art by the Negro without some significant artistic reexpression of African life and the traditions associated with it." Negroes had not been encouraged to explore cultural memory, retrieve artistic traditions from the past, or bring these traditions into their own work for the stage. Locke was interested in plays with African elements: themes, scenes, music, storytelling, ritual, and nonlinear plots. He believed that once Negro playwrights found the truth about their past, a new sense of cultural and artistic freedom would emerge and would naturally connect with American theatrical sensibilities, thereby creating a true or realistic form of Negro theater that illustrated the New Negro. Playwrights who were influenced by Locke's folk drama included Marieta Bonner, Owen Dodson, Shirley Graham Du Bois, Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Willis Richardson, and Eulalie Spence.

Zora Neale Hurston

Zora Neale Hurston (1891–1960) was especially intrigued by the possibilities of Locke's vision for the theater of the New Negro, and she experimented with its form throughout her life. Hurston studied with Locke and Montgomery Gregory at Howard University in the 1920s. She was greatly influenced by Locke, who encouraged her to write about Negro folklore and "Africanisms." At Columbia University, as a student at Barnard College interested in anthropology, and as a budding writer, Hurston—like Locke—refused to believe that people of African ancestry were innately inferior to whites. A popular study at this time was craniology, the size of the human head relative to the size of the brain; accordingly, she stood on various street corners in Harlem and asked passersby if she could measure their heads. This use of science to prove that African Americans were not inferior to whites may have inspired Hurston, in her plays and novels, to depict the struggles of Negroes as they attempted to “love” themselves. For instance, in 1925, while she was a student at Barnard, she wrote what may have been her first play, Color Struck. It focuses on the inability of one woman to love herself because of racial shame: This woman does not have light skin, and she believes in a doctrine, espoused by racist scientists of the time, that darker-skinned Negroes were inferior to whites or mulattoes. She destroys her own life and causes the death of her mulatto daughter; still, she is an object of pity, not a villain. This controversial folk drama, written in Negro dialect appropriate for that period, forces audiences to confront issues of miscegenation and racial pride. Hurston submitted Color Struck to Opportunity magazine and won an award for it. The following year, she submitted her next play, Spears, to Opportunity and received an honorable mention. In 1927, she wrote the play The First One, which was published in Ebony and Topaz magazines.

All together, between 1920 and 1950, this extraordinarily prolific woman wrote nearly forty plays and musical reviews, four novels, two books of folklore, an autobiography, and more than fifty short stories and essays. She received a Rosenwald fellowship and two Guggenheim fellowships and was widely recognized as a successful writer. Still, she often found herself in poverty; and although she tried to break away from the confines of patronage, she has been criticized by some historians and biographers for accepting the support of a wealthy white woman, Charlotte Osgood Mason of Park Avenue. Mason, who enjoyed Negro literature, supported not only Hurston but also Langston Hughes during most of their literary careers. Alain Locke often met with Mason, and he encouraged her to support young Negro folk dramatists. But in return for her patronage she insisted that the playwrights refer to her as their “godmother,” and she also liked to be described as the “little mother of the primitive world” (Hurston 1979, 12).

In addition to experimenting with Locke’s form of folk drama, Hurston was interested in Du Bois’s theories of theater. She became a member of the “cabinet” for Du Bois’s Krigwa Players and participated in the company’s first season at the 135th Street Library. At this time she found herself under the tutelage of Locke and Du Bois and hoped that her plays would be produced by the Krigwa Players and at Howard University. While working with Du Bois, she continued to write plays and attempted to produce Negro musical revues. She was selected to be one of nine writers for Fast and Furious, a Broadway musical revue in two acts and thirty-seven scenes. The famous figures involved in this production included Tim Moore and Jackie “Moms” Mabley, but when the revue opened in New York in September 1931, it was received unfavorably by several white theater critics. Hurston’s next theatrical venture, Jungle Scandals, was also unsuccessful; this was followed by The Great Day, which was praised by the critics but was not a financial success. The Great Day, which centered on “a day in the life of a railroad work camp,” incorporated themes from Negro folklore and included “Bahamian dances, conjure ceremonies, club scenes, work songs, and children’s games” (Perkins 1989, 78).

Hoping to forward her career in theater, Hurston applied for faculty positions in the theater departments of two historically black schools—Bethune-Cookman College and Fisk University—but was rejected by both. She then returned (after a six-year hiatus) to writing novels and short stories, that is, to the world of Negro fiction in which she had first achieved success. However, her theatrical career seemed to be rekindled in 1935 when the New York Negro unit of the Federal Theater Project (FTP) hired her as a drama coach, a position in which she worked directly with John Houseman. While working with FTP, she submitted several plays for production, most notably The Fiery Chariot. She did not succeed in this regard, although she was encouraged by Houseman, who seemed enthusiastic about the possibility that FTP might produce one of her plays in the future. In his autobiography, Run-Through, Houseman writes:

For a few days I thought I had found a solution in a new play by Zorah [sic] Hurston, our most talented writer on the project, who had come up with a Negro Lysistrata updated and located in a Florida fishing community, where the men’s wives refused them intercourse until they won their fight with the canning company for a living wage. It scandalized both the Left and Right by its saltiness. (quoted in Perkins, 78)

After the short-lived FTP came to a close, Hurston was hired from 1939 to 1940 to organize a drama program at North Carolina College for Negroes in Durham. There, she developed a professional relationship with the playwright Paul Green, who was the winner of a Pulitzer Prize and worked with the drama department at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill. Hurston and Green discussed collaborating on a play to be called John de Conqueror (Perkins, 78), but this plan ended when Hurston left North Carolina College to work for a year at Paramount Studios as a story consultant. At Paramount, Hurston tried hard to persuade various producers to use one of her novels or plays as a film script, but again she did not succeed. Her last attempt to achieve success in the theater was in 1944, when she and a white theater artist, Dorothy Varing, produced a musical comedy, Polk County, that was supposed to appear on Broadway in the fall of that year. However, the play lost its financial backing and never opened. Disgruntled and disappointed, Hurston returned to Florida (where she had grown up) and lived there until her death on 29 October 1960.

Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes (1898–1967), like Hurston, is often thought of as a poet but was also a prolific playwright: He wrote almost one hundred theatrical pieces, ranging from short scenes to full-length plays. In fact, he and Hurston collaborated on writing a play called Mule Bone, although because of personal differences they were unable to finish it. One of Hughes's full-length plays, Mulatto, opened on Broadway on 24 October 1935. Mulatto is about a mulatto son, Bert, who murders his father—the father having refused to acknowledge Bert as anything more than a slave plantation worker. Hughes was disappointed with the Broadway production because the white producer, Martin Jones, altered the script after buying the rights to the text. Nevertheless, Mulatto was the longest-running Negro play on Broadway until Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun, which opened in 1959. Although Mulatto is a tragedy, Hughes primarily wrote comedies and musicals. His theater works include The Barrier (an opera); Emperor of Haiti; Little Ham; Don't You Want to Be Free?; Limitations of Life?; Scarlett Sister Barry; The Em-Fuehrer Jones; Little Eva; Run, Ghost, Run—; Joy to My Soul; Simply Heavenly; The Sun Do Move; Tambourines to Glory; The Gold Piece; Soul Gone Home; and Black Nativity.

After his experiences with having Mulatto presented commercially and trying to have his other plays produced professionally, Hughes wrote several essays outlining his hopes for the future of Negro theater. Hughes advocated a Negro theater similar in structure to what Du Bois envisioned. He believed that Broadway and Hollywood were too commercial, averse to experimentation, and interested only in minstrel-like caricatures of Negro life. (Hughes expressed these ideas in, for example, "The Need for an Afro-American Theatre" in Anthology of the American Negro in Theatre.) He also wanted Negro theater artists to be able to work in professional spaces; accordingly, he urged the formation of a national black theater. He considered it important for young playwrights to see revivals of the work of older playwrights; he also thought there should be a place like a national theater that could serve as a workshop for the next generation of artists. Hughes believed that without some sort of national African American theater, the world would have no opportunity to hear what he called "authentic" Negro voices, that is, diverse voices in the Negro community that also spanned lines of skin color and class; he also strongly believed that these voices would be heard by all Americans, regardless of color, if such a theater existed. In his own work—his poetry, his short stories, and especially his theatrical characters—he emphasized these authentic voices.

Georgia Douglas Johnson

Hughes enjoyed discussing his ideas with other Negro playwrights and artists of the Harlem Renaissance. He, Hurston, Locke, Richardson, and Du Bois all attended Georgia Douglas Johnson's Saturday Nighters Club—the salon on S Street in Washington, D.C., where the future of Negro art was debated. Johnson, who happily proclaimed herself the maternal hostess of the Harlem Renaissance outside New York City, once remarked, "I'm halfway between everybody and everything and I bring them together" (Hull 1987, 186–187). Johnson had a reputation for taking in stray animals and artists; Hurston, during her periods of financial difficulty, was a frequent and welcome guest at Johnson's house.

Johnson was a playwright as well as a hostess. She wrote dramas that reflected the political and social doctrines of Locke and Du Bois and attempted to address the questions raised by Du Bois. She was well known in the African American and white American theater communities; thus it is not surprising that she worked, although indirectly, with the Federal Theater Project (FTP) from 1935 to 1939. She submitted six plays to FTP for production: four antilynching plays (A Sunday Morning in the South, versions 1 and 2; Safe; and Blue-Eyed Black Boy) and two historical dramas about slaves escaping from bondage to achieve freedom, or what should have been freedom (Frederick Douglass and William and Ellen Craft). FTP decided not to produce any of these plays, but that did not discourage Johnson; she continued to write not only plays but also poetry and dozens of musical compositions. She also wrote articles and essays for various black journals and newspapers; in these essays, she discussed the plight of Negro women and the political and social struggles of the Negro community. She was a contributing editor for the magazine Negro Women's World and an associate editor with The Women's Voice, periodicals located in the area around Washington.

Georgia Douglas Johnson wrote approximately thirty plays, but only five were published, and only a few of her scripts are still extant (her family has most of the unpublished plays). The five plays that were published were A Sunday Morning in the South (1925), Blue Blood (1926), Plumes (1927), Frederick Douglass (1935), and William and Ellen Craft (1935). Of these, only Plumes, Blue Blood, and Frederick Douglass have a record of theatrical production. The one-act play Blue Blood was first staged in New York City, starring Frank Horne and May Miller, who was also a playwright and poet of the Harlem Renaissance; it was later performed at Howard University as part of a program featuring three one-act works. Blue Blood attracted attention and was critically acclaimed after it won the playwriting contest sponsored by Opportunity in 1926; Plumes took first prize in that contest in 1927. Blue Blood is significant because it examines black women's struggle to redefine their lives: The female characters boldly confront issues of rape, miscegenation, the Negro elite, racism and classism within the African American community, and the concept of women as objects. Johnson's commitment to the development of Negro theater is demonstrated not only in her own theatrical work but also in her influence over many playwrights and artists of the Harlem Renaissance, including Du Bois, Locke, Richardson, Hurston, and Hughes.

It is worth noting here that Johnson's activism went beyond the theater; she was also a part of the antilynching campaigns in African American communities during the 1920s.

Summary

In sum, the playwrights of the Harlem Renaissance—along with its artists and scholars—attempted to answer the questions posed by Du Bois. They were committed to demolishing the dehumanizing stereotypes of people of African descent, but they understood that changing dominant attitudes takes time. Most writers of the Harlem Renaissance were not interested in chastising an artist like Hattie McDaniel, who perpetuated the popular nineteenth-century image of the Negro as a clown from a minstrel show, because they understood the dilemma of such an artist, and they also often felt caught between the politics of the burgeoning Negro community and the white community's stereotypical perceptions of Negroes. They were more intrigued with finding a theatrical formula that would ensure "authentic" representations of Negro identity on the American stage. Du Bois argued that Negro artists who were writing about Negroes, for Negroes, in Negro communities could produce authentic Negro characters for the theater. Numerous theater artists—Marieta Bonner, Mary Burrill, Shirley Graham Du Bois, Angelina Weld Grimké, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Georgia Douglas Johnson, May Miller, Willis Richardson, Eulalie Spence, and others—were influenced by Du Bois's theories of theater. However, Alain Locke, although he admired Du Bois's historical pageants, had a different theory about the future of Negro theater. Locke believed that Negro theater should be produced at universities and that folk drama was the essence of cultural and artistic expression for the New Negro. He encouraged playwrights such as Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, Georgia Douglas Johnson, May Miller, and Willis Richardson to abandon western European theatrical standards for "Africanisms" or cultural memory. Hughes, Hurston, Johnson, and Richardson are just four of the playwrights of the Harlem Renaissance who transformed popular Negro theatrical characters from their predecessors in minstrelsy to diverse, realistic dramatic figures. These four playwrights experimented with Du Bois's and Locke's theories of drama but also remembered Willis Richardson's assertion that the most important goal was to create a "play that shows the soul of a people; and the soul of this people is truly worth showing.”

JASMIN L. LAMBERT

See also Blacks in Theater; Crisis, The; Crisis: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Ethiopian Art Players; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Krigwa Players; Literature: 3—Drama; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Minstrelsy; 135th Street Library; Opportunity; Porgy and Bess; Talented Tenth; Theater; specific writers and works

Further Reading

- Brown-Guillory, Elizabeth. Wine in the Wilderness. New York: Praeger, 1990.
- Hatch, James V. Black Theater, U.S.A. 1847–1974. New York: Free Press, 1974.
- Hatch, James V., and Hamalian. Lost Plays of the Harlem Renaissance, 1920–1940. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1996.
- Hull, Gloria T. Color, Sex, and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. I Love Myself When I Am Laughing . . ., ed. Alice Walker. New York: Feminist, 1979.
- Krasner, David. A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre, Drama, and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Patterson, Lindsay. Anthology of the American Negro in the Theatre: A Critical Approach. New York: Publishers Company, 1970.
- Perkins, Kathy. Black Female Playwrights. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.
- Turner, Darwin T. An Anthology of Black Drama in America. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1994.
- Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Authors: 5—Poets

Judged by its quality and popularity, poetry produced by African American writers in the 1920s constitutes a bright period in American literature. In the last decade of the nineteenth century, Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906) enjoyed international popularity, primarily for his humorous poems in dialect. From Dunbar’s death to the early 1920s, no African American poet received a great deal of attention; but during the 1920s, with the advent of the New Negro movement, that situation changed dramatically. The high profile of poets during the Harlem Renaissance was influenced by changes in the American publishing scene as well as by the development of a more militant race consciousness in the black community.

Background

In the early decades of the twentieth century, many newspapers, including the black press, published poems on their editorial pages or in special literary columns. These poems were usually patriotic, sentimental, pleasantly philosophical, or humorous and were contributed by local readers as well as by more accomplished writers from all over the country. However, they were often regarded as filler by both editors and readers and did not get much serious attention. The critical consensus of the period was that most late nineteenth-century American poetry was undistinguished at best. There were other periodicals, though, in which poetry was taken more seriously, and by the beginning of the 1920s, such journals had created a resurgence of interest in poetry among the general public. Poets were gregarious or controversially argumentative, and poetry became fashionable for a season. That mood helped direct attention to African American poets as well.

For their part, African American readers seemed to be eager to read literature that expressed both their social and political aspirations as well as their resentment of the racial segregation laws and discriminatory customs that frustrated them. The phrase “New Negro” had been popularized around the turn of the twentieth century to indicate a new sense of self-awareness and militancy in the African American community. The young intellectuals who became the poets of the Harlem Renaissance proudly adopted that phrase, and Alain Locke (1885–1954), a professor of philosophy at Howard University, used it as the title of a groundbreaking anthology of sociological essays and literary works that he edited in 1925.

The poets who emerged in the 1920s were an incarnation of a people’s hopes. The first generation of the twentieth century, children of the African American middle class, were often college-educated and were able to aspire to much greater ambitions than their elders had ever imagined. They were proud of their heritage and intent on celebrating African American culture, but they were also aware of the necessity of proving the value of that culture to the rest of the world. The work they produced illustrates two methods of accomplishing these goals: (1) some poets attempted to demonstrate their mastery of time-honored classical and traditional literary forms; (2) others, however, emphasized adapting colloquial language or folk-based motifs and investing them with artistic legitimacy.

An important aspect of the poetry of the Harlem Renaissance is the fact that it was primarily aimed at an African American readership. Although many of the works voiced a protest against the status quo, the poets attempted to avoid an attitude of supplication and what the critic John Henrik Clark has called the “literature of petition.” The journals that published their poetry facilitated this polemical position.

The Crisis, published by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and the National Urban League’s Opportunity: Journal of Negro Life were among the primary venues for the new poetry. The literary pages of the newspaper Negro World, published by Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), also promoted poets, as did political journals such as The Messenger, edited by the labor organizers Chandler Owen and A. Philip Randolph. Mainstream journals such as Vanity Fair and H. L. Mencken’s American Mercury were also supportive of African American poets. Across the country, local chapters of the NAACP and UNIA, women’s organizations, and churches encouraged book clubs, discussion groups, and elocution societies. Beginning in 1925, annual contests sponsored by Opportunity brought many talented young writers widespread attention, and celebrated judges such as Carl Van Vechten and Fannie Hurst were able to help these writers secure generous patrons or publishing contracts.

Poetry with a Purpose

The poetry of the Harlem Renaissance does not adhere to any one style, although most of it does appear to serve a particular purpose. Young poets such as Countee Cullen and Langston Hughes vociferously declared their artistic freedom to write in any way they pleased. Cullen went so far as to say that while he hoped his work would be appreciated, he didn’t particularly want to be identified primarily as a Negro poet. Even so, much of the poetry produced by Cullen, Hughes, and their peers focused on issues and experiences specific to black Americans. Other writers articulated the movement’s goals in political terms. Both James Weldon Johnson and Alain Locke pointed out that literature might be a force in improving the way mainstream American society viewed African American people. In Johnson’s view, no race or nationality could be considered inferior if it produced great art. As early as 1918, Johnson had written, “The world does not know a race is great until that race has produced great literature.” Locke, in The New Negro, suggested that talented artists might emphasize African Americans’ contributions to society and culture and, by reversing the negative images of African people encouraged by slavery, help eliminate the “great discrepancy between the American social creed and the American social practice.”

Although it produced no uniform style of writing and followed no specific aesthetic guidelines, the New Negro poetic movement was not exactly a spontaneous or undirected development. The historian David Levering Lewis used the phrase “civil rights by copyright” to describe the strategy of improving the African Americans’ status by demonstrating intellectual and artistic excellence. The literary campaign was envisioned and carefully nurtured by W. E. B. Du Bois and Jessie Redmon Fauset at The Crisis, by Charles S. Johnson at the National Urban League, by the NAACP’s James Weldon Johnson, and by the scholars Alain Locke and Carter G. Woodson. These leaders in turn drew on the goodwill and significant connections of a network of white editors, sociologists, and charitable institutions.

The ideas that undergirded the creative activity were most clearly articulated by Alain Locke. Democracy could not succeed, Locke stated, “except through the fullest sharing of American culture and institutions.” The New Negro announced that the talented young people in the black community were ready to make their contribution. Locke hoped that this rising generation would be able to advance “from the arid fields of controversy and debate to the productive fields of creative expression.” Locke—like Du Bois and the white cofounder of the NAACP, Joel A. Spingarn—believed that the progress of an ethnic group or a nation-state depended on the leadership of cultured individuals. These leaders also firmly believed that the arts have the power to change society.

In his article “Criteria of Negro Art,” published in The Crisis in October 1926, W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963) bluntly stated what Alain Locke and James Weldon Johnson had often implied. All art, Du Bois declared, should be propaganda. Literary works should support an ethical or political point of view, be persuasive, and—in the case of the art of black Americans—promote the social advancement of the group. In fact, although younger writers might have resented the constraints implied by Du Bois, they attempted to produce poetry that would examine the characteristics of black life in the United States and inspire black readers with a sense of both individual and collective self-worth. They wrote poems clearly intended to redeem African American people in their own eyes by countering racist stereotypes, and in so doing, to inspire and promote political action for achieving the rights and privileges of citizenship.

The Early Poets

The forerunners of the Harlem Renaissance poets include two writers who achieved significant national attention following Dunbar's death. William Stanley Braithwaite (1878–1962) wrote elegant, sentimental, and somewhat mystical verse. His collection The House of Falling Leaves (1908) was warmly received. Braithwaite's true influence, however, came later, as he established himself as a major literary editor and critic. Fenton Johnson (1888–1958) published three collections of poems between 1912 and 1916. Although his earliest work was in the dialect mode popularized by Dunbar, he experimented with poems based on Negro spirituals and later became known for poems marked by an ironic tone and written in the avant-garde style that emerged in Chicago at the time of World War I. By 1922, however, perhaps because of his controversial political militancy, Johnson had stopped publishing poetry.

Two other poets named Johnson (unrelated to each other and to Fenton Johnson) achieved recognition as well. James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) first achieved fame and wealth as a lyricist for Broadway musicals at the turn of the century; he wrote the words for "Lift Every Voice and Sing" (1900), a song cherished by millions of people as the "Negro national anthem." He also aspired to a literary career and, modeling himself on Dunbar, published Fifty Years and Other Poems (1917), a book divided between dialect verses and poems in standard English. The popular and prolific poet Georgia Douglas Johnson (1877–1966) received recognition and critical praise for her finely crafted verses in The Heart of a Woman (1918). Georgia Johnson, who was educated at Atlanta University, Oberlin

Conservatory of Music, and the Cleveland College of Music, married and settled in Washington, D.C., in 1909. Throughout the 1920s, she wrote a syndicated newspaper column and held a weekly literary salon at her home. On Saturday evenings, Alain Locke, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Jean Toomer, Anne Spencer, and others who might be visiting the city met to read their works and discuss artistic issues. After her husband's death in 1925, Georgia Johnson worked for various agencies of the federal government and raised two sons while continuing her literary activities. Her published works of poetry also include Bronze (1922) and An Autumn Love Cycle (1928).

Joseph Seamon Cotter Jr. (1895–1919), a journalist in Louisville, Kentucky, published an impressive collection titled The Band of Gideon and Other Lyrics (1918), but he succumbed to tuberculosis soon afterward. His poetry demonstrates his skilled approach to standard rules of versification, but some of the poems reflect the "imagist" approach of the modernists and some reflect his interest in colloquial African American idioms—an interest he shared with Fenton Johnson and James Weldon Johnson.

The multitalented W. E. B. Du Bois also published poems in the first two decades of the century. Several idiosyncratic, biblically cadenced verses were included in his book Darkwater: Voices from Within the Veil (1920). Focusing on events such as the mob violence that shook Atlanta in 1906, these are starkly angry, bitter poems.

Because of its stylistic innovation and racially focused subject matter, Cane (1923)—a book by Jean Toomer (1894–1967) that includes fictional vignettes, poems, and a play—is often considered the inaugural expression of the Harlem Renaissance. Poems such as "Song of the Son" and "Georgia Dusk" represent Toomer's lyrical attempt to capture what he felt was the beauty, as well as the memories of pain and hardship, of a southern rural way of life that was passing with the old century. Like Fenton Johnson before him, Toomer in "Song of the Son" elegantly captures the tone and flow of spirituals without resorting to dialect.

Claude McKay

The first major poetic voice of the Harlem Renaissance, however, was Claude McKay (1889–1948). McKay was born in Jamaica, West Indies, and had worked there as a policeman and published two volumes of dialect verse based on his experiences before coming to the United States to attend college in 1912. He quickly became involved in radical politics and served on the editorial board of socialist magazines such as Liberator and The Masses. His bold antilynching poem “If We Must Die,” first published in Liberator, was a militant response to the “red summer” of racial violence in 1919. The poem’s powerful effect is derived from the seeming contrast of its immediacy of subject matter, its militant content, and McKay’s sonorous but meticulous Elizabethan sonnet form.

McKay could render beautiful images of nature and vibrant urban scenes, but he is primarily a poet of social engagement. He was a dedicated political activist, and in 1919 he was briefly associated with the International Workers of the World (IWW) and with socialists in Harlem such as Hubert H. Harrison and Richard B. Moore. Between 1920 and 1934 McKay lived and traveled widely in England, Europe, the Soviet Union, and Africa, writing and publishing prolifically. Although he was not actually in the United States, his work remained central to the “New Negro” movement.

McKay’s poetry, as in “If We Must Die,” is uncompromising in its analysis of racial bigotry and his assertion of the will to overcome it. Poems such as “America” specifically address social conflict, and “Baptism” uses the metaphor of a trial by fire. “Into this furnace let me go alone,” writes McKay. This sonnet ends with the affirmation “I will come out, back to your world of tears, A stronger soul within a fine frame.” Trials, in McKay’s vision, strengthen the spirit of a race or an individual. In later years, McKay would seek a similar affirmation in religion.

Although he would go on to publish additional volumes of poetry, novels, journalism, and political commentary, McKay’s collection Harlem Shadows (1922) established a high standard for other poets—a standard that would be met by major poets such as Countee Cullen (1903–1946), Langston Hughes (1902–1967), and Sterling Brown (1901–1989).

Countee Cullen

Countee Cullen, who was the adopted child of Carolyn Mitchell Cullen and the pastor of the Salem Methodist Episcopal Church, Dr. Frederick Asbury Cullen, epitomized Harlem’s educated and polished upper middle class. A brilliant student and precocious writer, he received several academic and literary prizes, including the John Reed Memorial Prize from Poetry magazine.

His first collection of poems, Color (1925), published by the venerable firm Harper Brothers, was a best-seller. This book appeared just as Cullen graduated Phi Beta Kappa from New York University and went on to Harvard to earn a master’s degree.

At the beginning of his career, Cullen was easily the most acclaimed and prolific poet of the Harlem Renaissance. His work appeared in a wide range of African American and mainstream journals, and he published three books in 1927: Copper Sun, The Ballad of the Brown Girl: An Old Ballad Retold, and Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. Two years later, his own book The Black Christ and Other Poems provoked some controversy. From 1926 to 1928 Cullen also wrote a literary column, “The Dark Tower,” for Opportunity.

Cullen insisted that while his subject matter might focus on African American life, his poetry was nevertheless part of a long English-language literary tradition. He argued that African American writers had more to gain from a study of that literature than from “any nebulous atavistic yearnings toward an African influence.” He definitely opposed the tendency of some poets to indulge in sensationalized “primitive” imagery. Other literary critics also expressed weariness with poets who seemed to exploit tawdry urban scenes.

In the anthology he edited, Cullen applauded the stylistic diversity of his contemporaries. He praised Anne Spencer’s “cool precision,” delighted in Lewis Alexander’s experiments with haiku, and admired McKay’s rebelliousness even though he feared that it sometimes “clouds his lyricism.” Above all, though, Cullen desired to “maintain the higher traditions of English verse.”

He was aware of the ambivalence in his own position. In his magnificent poem “Heritage” (1925), identifying himself as “one three centuries removed,” Cullen wonders, “What is Africa to me?” Self-doubt, social ostracism because of race, and skepticism about religious faith become powerfully conflicting forces. As with Du Bois’s famous formulation of “double consciousness” in The Souls of Black Folk (1903), Cullen shows how the discrepancy between America’s democratic rhetoric and the realities of race threaten to unhinge black citizens.

Langston Hughes

Beginning with “The Negro Speaks of Rivers,” published in The Crisis when he was nineteen years old, Langston Hughes made a tremendous impact on the literary world; eventually, he achieved international fame that rivaled Dunbar's. Since his death in 1967, Hughes has been increasingly viewed by critics as a major American poet.

Hughes was born in Joplin, Missouri, and raised by his grandmother and mother in Kansas and Ohio. He was a voracious reader as a child, and while he was still in high school, he determined that he wanted to be a writer.

Influenced early on by the modernist poetics of Carl Sandburg and other practitioners of free verse, Hughes developed a terse, freely rhymed (almost syn-copated) style in short lyrics and dramatic monologues that captured aspects of everyday life. Hughes found support for his early writing from luminaries such as Du Bois and the popular poet Vachel Lindsay, who helped him make contacts that led to the publication of his first book in 1926. The Weary Blues sounded a new note in African American poetry. Hughes celebrated the common man; chose to write about situations that many thought unpoetic; and, without apology, used the folk blues stanza as if it were as acceptable as the sonnet. When The Weary Blues was reviewed in the Times of London, Hughes was slightly called a "poet of the cabaret" and unfavorably compared with Countee Cullen.

Such reviews might have angered him, but Hughes did not flinch before criticism. In 1928, in a letter to the editor published in The Crisis, he forcefully declared that he did not care if critics found the poems included in Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927) "low-down, jazzy . . . and utterly uncouth." He would be satisfied if his poems depicted the details and rhythms of urban African American life with lyrical realism. Hughes was concerned to show his readers—as he put it in his essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926)—that "we are beautiful. And ugly too."

Despite his capacity for generating controversy, Hughes found favor with a middle-class audience and, particularly through the appearance of his poems in newspapers, an enthusiastic working-class readership as well. A nationwide tour in 1931–1932 boosted his popularity; he traveled across the country giving readings of his work at colleges, churches, and community auditoriums. Poems such as "I, Too, Sing America" captured the community's mood of pride, determination, and impatience with second-class citizenship. The beautiful monologue "Mother to Son," more than likely drawing on Hughes's own personal childhood experiences, spoke directly to both elders and the rising generation, reinforcing the need for perseverance in the face of adversity and racism.

At the same time, Hughes's blues poems expressed the reality of hard times and bad luck. In "Po' Boy Blues," he states that "this world is weary/An' de road is long an' hard." But the blues poems also demonstrate how to use humor to survive the worst. Hughes was also capable of biting political satire. His "Advertisement for the Waldorf-Astoria" was a withering critique of the American economic system and the structural inequalities that were made apparent by the stock market crash of 1929. The poem brought him praise from the left wing but also cost him the support of Charlotte Osgood Mason, his wealthy patron. Regardless of his approach, in diction that seems both eloquent and effortless, Hughes produced a consistent stream of poems that people read with excitement and—as they had done with Dunbar's verses—memorized for their own entertainment.

Sterling Brown

Sterling Brown (1901–1989) was born in Washington, D.C., and literally grew up on the campus of Howard University, where his father was a faculty member. He graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Williams College, earned his master's degree at Harvard in 1923, and eventually became a beloved professor at Howard, serving for half a century. Under the mentorship of his colleague Alain Locke, Brown became both a formidable scholar and a public intellectual. He wrote a literary column for Opportunity and was an active folklore researcher. He pursued doctoral studies at Harvard and, in 1937, published two important critical surveys—The Negro in American Fiction and Negro Poetry and Drama.

Brown's folklore studies helped him develop into a marvelous storyteller, and in some ways he embodied the traits of the trickster Slim Greer, a figure he featured in a series of hilarious poetic monologues. Brown found beauty and grandeur in ordinary people, but he could evoke their sorrows, too. "Maumee Ruth," written in ballad meter, prematurely mourns the death of a rural matriarch. The reader is told, "Might as well drop her / Deep in the ground" because Maumee Ruth's children have been lost to the vices of urban life and have turned their backs on her. The use of colloquial idiom—without the usual mechanics of dialect verse—underscores the poem's ironic tone and emphasizes the tragic toll caused by prodigal sons and daughters.

Brown used dialect skillfully in poems such as “Odyssey of Big Boy” and “Long Gone.” In “Southern Road,” he incorporated the work song rhythms of a chain gang; and in “Ma Rainey,” he alternated dialect and standard English stanzas to explore the powerful attraction of the blues.

Minor Poets

Many excellent writers, not all of whom published their work in book form, made the Harlem Renaissance truly remarkable in terms of poetic activity. Although most of the best-known writers were located in New York, the creative flowering was actually a national artistic movement, and many fine poets could be found in all parts of the United States. There were vibrant literary scenes in cities such as Chicago and Washington, D.C. Black colleges and universities also supported artistic communities and employed professors with literary interests.

Among the noteworthy but lesser-known poets of the era are Helene Johnson, Walter Everette Hawkins, Gwendolyn Bennett, Anne Spencer, Waring Cuney, Frank Horne, Arna Bontemps, Esther Popel, and Lewis Alexander. While Helene Johnson and Bennett (like McKay and Cullen) cultivated the sonnet tradition, poets such as Cuney, Horne, and Alexander explored vers libre and other experimental forms. Hawkins, a regular contributor to The Messenger, exemplifies a boldly militant voice, continuing the tradition established by Fenton Johnson, Du Bois, McKay, and others.

Anne Spencer (1882–1975), a librarian and community leader in Lynchburg, Virginia, said, “I proudly love being a Negro woman.” Her poetry, however, was primarily focused on the beauties of nature and the elevating life of the mind. When she chose to write about social problems, it was often to focus attention on the quirks of human nature. In “Neighbors,” for example, considering people “who ask too much,” Spencer cleverly noted the dangers of friendliness: “Offered a hand, a finger-tip, / You must have a soul to clutch.”

Esther Popel (1896–1958), a poet who was concerned much more with politics, was a participant in Georgia Douglas Johnson’s literary salon and a frequent contributor to Negro World, Opportunity, and other journals. Popel graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Dickinson College and became a high school teacher in Washington, D.C. Her often bitterly ironic poems are as searingly effective as Claude McKay’s. Her “Blasphemy—American Style” (1934), for example, is a prayer of thanks raised by a lynch mob. Popel did not, however, publish a book-length collection of her work.

Like Popel, Walter Everette Hawkins (b. 1883)—a postal clerk in Washington, D.C.—was among the more militant voices of the era. Hawkins published two collections of poems: Chords and Discords (1920) and Petals From the Poppies (1936). He was also featured in Nancy Cunard’s Negro Anthology (1934).

Frank Horne (1899–1974) had been trained as an ophthalmologist but eventually enjoyed a distinguished career as a college and government administrator. His grimly titled “Letters Found Near a Suicide” won a prize from The Crisis in 1925 and launched a series of spare but witty modernist poems that celebrate the vigor and camaraderie of youth while also attacking Victorian middle-class complacency.

Lewis Alexander (b. 1900), who had been educated at Howard University and the University of Pennsylvania, was an actor and theatrical director. As a poet, he preferred to write in traditional stanza forms but also experimented with free verse and Japanese forms such as haiku and tanka. At his best, Alexander could produce strikingly evocative images such as “The earth trembles tonight / Like the quiver of a Negro woman’s eye-lids cupping tears.”

Clarissa Scott Delany (1901–1927), the daughter of Booker T. Washington’s secretary Emmett J. Scott, was a Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Wellesley College. In her tragically short life she wrote excellent lyric poems and was capable of brilliant and memorable lines such as “Joy shakes me like the wind that lifts a sail.”

The equally talented Gwendolyn Bennett (1902–1981), a visual artist as well as a writer, graduated from Pratt Institute and studied in Paris at the Académie Julian and the École de Panthéon. Many of her poems exalted femininity and, in some cases, natural African beauty. In her poem “Heritage”—perhaps in response to Cullen—she offers romanticized images of dancers “around a heathen fire” and, in terms reminiscent of Dunbar, testifies to her desire to “feel the surging / Of my sad people’s soul / Hidden by a minstrel-smile.” During the 1920s, Bennett wrote a regular column for Opportunity and taught in the art department at Howard University.

Arna Bontemps (1902–1973) was for many years a librarian at Fisk University and collaborated with Langston Hughes on many projects, including their major anthology Poetry of the Negro: 1746–1964. During the 1920s, Bontemps published poems in Opportunity, The Crisis, and other journals. His powerful “Nocturne at Bethesda" received the poetry prize from The Crisis in 1927 and has been frequently anthologized. Perhaps drawing on a technique used in spirituals and African American sermonic traditions, poems such as this one and "Golgotha Is a Mountain" (1926) use biblical stories but carefully relocate them in a contemporary historical setting.

Helene Johnson (1906–1995) was among the youngest and most talented of the Harlem Renaissance poets. She was raised in Boston, won an honorable mention in the first Opportunity literary contest, and settled in New York in 1927. Her poems appeared in Vanity Fair, The Messenger, Fire!!, and other journals, as well as in several anthologies. Some of her poems reflect a primitivistic theme by celebrating an imagined African state of nature.

Waring Cuney (1906–1976), a member of a prominent African American family, was a classically trained musician who graduated from Lincoln University and studied at the New England Conservatory of Music and in Rome. Cuney's "No Images" (1926) is a small modernist masterpiece that is often reprinted. An attempt to encourage personal and racial pride by contrasting a vibrantly mythical Africa and the anesthetic working-class city, "No Images" is the quintessential Harlem Renaissance poem.

Conclusion

These young writers were a remarkable cohort of brilliant, creative people who exemplified the "talented tenth" that Du Bois saw as the hope of the nation's future. Their ambitious and accomplished example demonstrated that only a seriously shortsighted society would deny their contribution or reject their promise.

While the poets of the Harlem Renaissance took pride in the "newness" of their work and their role as representatives of a newly awakened generation, they were also part of a literary tradition. In their attempt to distance themselves from the anxious alternation of dialect and standard English poetry practiced by Dunbar, the younger poets adopted a kind of division of labor: McKay and Cullen demonstrated their skill in expressing African American ideas in traditional stanzas, whereas Hughes and others enjoyed creating rhythmic literary experiments in colloquial black English. The movement launched the careers of several major writers and made a lasting impact on American literature. The poets of the Harlem Renaissance won favorable attention in Europe as their work was translated into other languages, and they served as an inspiration to African and Caribbean writers, including the founders of the négritude movement. Since the 1990s, excellent annotated collections of several poets, major and minor, have appeared, and literary critics continue to publish studies and interpretations of the Harlem Renaissance group.

LORENZO THOMAS

See also American Mercury; Crisis, The; Fire!!; Harper Brothers; Literature: 7—Poetry; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; Messenger, The; Modernism; Negritude; Negro World; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Primitivism; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Spingarn, Joel; Talented Tenth; Vanity Fair; specific poets, writers, and works

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna, ed. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. 1972.
- Honey, Maureen, ed. Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. 1989.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. 1995.
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary of the Era. 1987.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. 1981.
- Locke, Alain, ed. The New Negro. 1925.
- Martin, Tony, ed. African Fundamentalism. 1991.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, 2 vols. 1986, 1988.
- Roses, Lorraine Elena, and Ruth Elizabeth Randolph, eds. Harlem's Glory: Black Women Writers, 1900–1950. 1996.
- Wagner, Jean. Black Poets of the United States: From Paul Laurence Dunbar to Langston Hughes. 1973.
- Wintz, Cary. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. 1988.

Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, The

James Weldon Johnson's novel The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912; sometimes spelled . . . of an Ex-Coloured Man) unsettles distinctions of genre just as its light-skinned narrator, who has lived on both sides of the "color line," unsettles racial distinctions. The work was originally published anonymously as an actual autobiography (the publisher was Sherman, French of Boston) but was reissued as fiction (by Knopf) in 1927.

Johnson's text interweaves personal experience, sociological observation, and social protest. The narrator begins his life's story in the South, of which his vague memories include occasional visits from a white man he later learns is his father. When this man announces his imminent marriage to a white woman, the narrator and his mother move North, to a small town in Connecticut, where he grows up immersed in books and music. Inspired by his mother's singing of old southern melodies, he distinguishes himself by becoming a remarkable classical pianist with a distinct, "singing" style. Although his musicality seems tied to his mother's race, the narrator remains unconscious of his blackness until his teacher distinguishes him from the white students in the classroom, thus initiating a crisis of identity reminiscent of W. E. B. Du Bois's "double consciousness." His new sense of racial identity leads him back to the black South, where he plans to attend Atlanta University but instead ends up working at a cigar factory alongside black Cuban immigrants and teaching piano to middle-class black children. When the factory closes, he moves North again, to the emerging "black belt" of New York City, where he narrowly escapes the pull of gambling and other vices by discovering ragtime. After hearing a "natural" black musician play ragtime by ear, he brings his classical training to bear on this new music to develop his own ragtime style—"ragging the classics"—and quickly gains a reputation as the city's best ragtime pianist.

The narrator's playing attracts white audiences in particular, and one of his admirers, a young, disaffected millionaire, hires him as a companion and personal pianist on a trip to Europe. Although the narrator enjoys relative freedom from prejudice in London and Paris, he nonetheless leaves his employer after being inspired by a German pianist to consider a new way of combining his two musical—and racial—traditions. Instead of ragging the classics, the narrator decides to devote himself to incorporating black music into classical forms, and thereby make a name as an important black composer. This ambition takes him back to the American South, where, in search of "raw material" for his work, he finds himself moved beyond expectation by the music he hears. Before his project materializes, however, he witnesses the brutal lynching of a black man and, repulsed and "shamed" by the idea of belonging to a race that could be so demeaned, he returns to New York to live as a white man. By the end of the narrative, at the moment when he begins to write his life story, the "ex-colored man" has made his fortune in real estate, married a beautiful "lily white" woman, and fathered two light-skinned children; but none of this outweighs his growing sense of regret that he has "sold his birthright for a mess of pottage."

Johnson began writing The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man at the end of a brief stint as a lyricist in musical theater; he published it six years later, while serving as an American consul in Latin America. Although some southerners who reviewed the edition of 1912 doubted its authenticity, most accepted the narrative as genuine autobiography and praised it as a "dispassionate" revelation of modern blacks' experiences and of race relations. When the text was reissued as fiction in 1927—at the height of the "Harlem Renaissance"—it carried the author's name and had a cover designed by Aaron Douglas and an introduction by Carl Van Vechten. Echoing earlier reviews, Van Vechten praised its "calm dispassionate tone" and its continuing relevance as "a composite autobiography of the Negro race."

Not until Robert Bone's The Negro Novel in America (1965) did critics begin to consider Johnson's narrator as a fictional character, rather than simply a mouthpiece for the author's opinions or a "dispassionate" conveyor of truths. Bone's characterization of the "ex-colored man" as a coward, and the novel as a "tragedy," opened the door to a range of new approaches to the literary qualities of the work and to the narrator's point of view. In the 1970s, critics attempting to articulate a black literary tradition considered the novel a link between nineteenth- and twentieth-century African American narratives. Both Houston Baker (1973) and Robert Stepto (1979) hailed it as an important revision of the slave narrative and a forerunner of black protest fiction.

Much early critical discussion concerns whether and to what extent the text uses irony to undermine the narrator's point of view. This criticism tends to fall into two camps: Some scholars, such as Robert E. Fleming (1971), read the narrator as wholly unreliable and maintain that his perceptions are colored by guilt over abandoning his race; and others, such as Eugene Levy (1973), insist that the narrator embodies, without irony, Johnson's own ambivalence and biases. Joseph T. Skerrett Jr. (1980) offers a compromise between these positions, arguing that Johnson used both irony and tragedy in constructing his narrator. Invoking biographical material, Skerrett suggests that Johnson "symbolically restructured" his own vexed relationship to a college friend "D," about whose decision to pass as white he felt both envy and disapproval.

More recent critics have revisited the ambiguities of Johnson's novel with a new set of questions, interested less in defining Johnson's intentions than in exploring the text's challenges to notions of authenticity. Invoking Lacanian theory, Samira Kawash (1997) underscores the text's treatment of race as "specular image" and its rejection of any notion of racial authenticity. Donald Goellnicht (1996) draws a parallel between the fictional text's "passing" as autobiography and the narrator's passing as white, and argues that the text is a "subversion" of conventional literary and racial boundaries.

As this critical history demonstrates, Johnson's only novel has continued to inspire interest and debate since its original publication, providing evidence of the changing concerns of literary criticism and the heterogeneous resonance of this richly ambiguous text.

CRISTINA L. RUOTOLO

See also Douglas, Aaron; Johnson, James Weldon; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston, Jr. "A Forgotten Prototype: 'The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man' and 'Invisible Man.'" Virginia Quarterly Review, 49, 1973. (Reprinted in Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson, eds. Kenneth M. Price and Lawrence J. Oliver. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.)
- Bone, Robert. Negro Novel in America. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1965.
- Clarke, Cheryl. "Race, Homosocial Desire, and 'Mammon' in Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man." In Professions of Desire: Lesbian and Gay Studies in Literature, eds. George E. Haggerty and Bonnie Zimmerman. New York: MLA, 1995.
- Fleming, Robert. "Irony as a Key to Johnson's The Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man." American Literature, 43, March 1971.
- Garrett, Marvin P. "Early Recollections and Structural Irony in The Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man." Critique, 2, 1971.
- Goellnicht, Donald. "Passing as Autobiography: James Weldon Johnson's The Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man." African American Review, 30, Spring 1996. (Reprinted in Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson, eds. Kenneth M. Price and Lawrence J. Oliver. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.)
- Kawash, Samira. "The Epistemology of Race: Knowledge, Visibility, and Passing." In Dislocating the Color Line: Identity, Hybridity, and Singularity in African American Narrative. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1997.
- Levy, Eugene. James Weldon Johnson: Black Leader, Black Voice. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1973.
- Pfeiffer, Kathleen. "Individualism, Success, and American Identity in The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man." African American Review, 30, Fall 1996.
- Ruotolo, Cristina L. "James Weldon Johnson and the Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Musician." American Literature, special issue, "Unsettling Blackness," June 2000.
- Skerrett, Joseph T., Jr. "Irony and Symbolic Action in James Weldon Johnson's The Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man." American Quarterly, 32, Winter 1980. (Reprinted in Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson, ed. Kenneth M. Price and Lawrence J. Oliver. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.)
- Stepto, Robert B. "Lost in a Quest: James Weldon Johnson's The Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man." In From Behind the Veil: A Study in Afro-American Narrative. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979; 2nd ed., 1991. (Reprinted in Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson, ed. Kenneth M. Price and Lawrence J. Oliver. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.)

Baker, George

See Father Divine

Baker, Josephine

Josephine Baker's performances and writings of the years 1925–1936 form an archive of the transatlantic dimensions and expressions of the Harlem Renaissance. Like many African American performers of the era, Baker found her audience in Europe, where the phenomenal popularity of black Americans came to be known as le tumulte noir, or "black rage." She made her debut in La Revue Nègre (1925), and its promotional posters, designed by Paul Colin, remain the most controversial and important images of Josephine Baker. After her danse sauvage with Joe Alex in La Revue Nègre, Baker was both hailed as a primitivist icon and denounced as an indecent savage by Parisian critics. Today, "Although many people celebrate Baker's career, many could argue that her initial success was achieved at the expense of her integrity and the principles of African Americans" (Barnwell 1997, 86). According to Sharpley-Whiting (1999), Baker doubtless "realized that her popularity . . . depended on her exploitation of French exoticist impulses . . . [and] the Black Venus narrative" (107). Baker achieved greater financial success and artistic freedom in France than she might have had in the United States, but she did not escape the problem of realizing her artistic ambitions within the limitations of stereotypical black roles. Still, like many artists of the Harlem Renaissance, Baker sought to use entertainment to improve race relations, and she consistently praised the relatively liberal racial policies of the French, as an oblique critique of American racism.

Before she became a star in Paris, Baker had learned the ways of the entertainment world through black vaudeville. She toured with the Dixie Steppers on the Theater Owners' Booking Association circuit (TOBA, widely known as "Tough on Black Asses"), for a salary of $9 per week. As a dresser for the blues singer Clara Smith, she tended to Smith's costumes and was probably influenced by Smith's preference for tight pink dresses, red wigs, and feather boas—in later years, Baker would be admired for the bravado of her own fashions. When the Dixie Steppers disbanded, Baker, who was then fifteen years old, made for New York, where she was hired to perform in the touring company of Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake's Shuffle Along. For $30 a week, she played the chorus line's "Funny Girl," that is, the chorine on the end who doesn't quite get the routine. To the consternation of the other performers, Baker's funny faces, out-of-time kicking, comparatively dark skin, and skinny, rubbery body drew crowds and earned her admiring reviews.

Baker was then recruited by Caroline Dudley to perform in France, as a comic dancer in La Revue Nègre at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées in Paris. Dudley assembled a troupe of twenty-five dancers and musicians, including the clarinetist Sidney Bechet, and they set sail 15 September 1925 aboard the Berengaria, arriving at Le Havre several days later. André Daven and Rolf de Maré had the company in rehearsals almost immediately, and in consultation with the music hall choreographer Jacques Charles, the directors transformed the Harlem-style tap show with the aesthetics of French colonialist fantasy. The most significant revision of La Revue Nègre was Charles's creation of a pas de deux for Josephine Baker and Joe Alex called La danse sauvage. Baker and Alex danced topless in costumes consisting of feathers about the head, pelvis, and ankles that caused the show to be remembered long after its brief run (from 2 October until 19 November 1925) was finished.

Josephine Baker performing "The Conga" in the Ziegfeld Follies at the Winter Garden, New York, 11 February 1936.

(AP / Wide World Photos.)

In Paris, Baker added fantastic colonialist costumes of bananas, feathers, and grass to her repertoire of grimaces and dances, which included the eagle rock, turkey trot, kangaroo dip, itch, break a leg, pimp walk, through the trenches, shimmy, snake hips, black bottom, and mess around (Wood 2000, 24). She typically performed a series of dances with unexpected changes at a high speed, "violating white conventions of movement" (Rose 1989, 29). One interviewer praised her as a "black Venus, who turned our concept of rhythm and movement on its head" ("Femmes d'aujourd'hui," 3). Baker's performance style of the 1920s departed from the liquid prewar style of Vernon and Irene Castle and prefigured the scholarly choreography of Katherine Dunham, which was based on the African diaspora.

Baker's famous banana skirt was her costume for la danse des bananes, a scene in the film La folie du jour (1926). Archival footage shows Baker entering the scene on the high branch of a tree and descending to the stage laughing and shaking her bananas. Baker danced without a partner in la danse des bananes, but she is surrounded by black male drummers, and a lounging white explorer looks on. Baker later abandoned the bananas, except for her unfortunate performance in 1936 in the Ziegfeld Follies, in which she wore a more aggressive version of this comically sexy costume (Documents des Archives, Cinémathèque de la Danse).

After her world tour of twenty-five countries in 1928–1929, Baker would transform herself during the 1930s from a black novelty to an exotic singer of love ballads and a leading actress in colonial films, under the orchestration of Pepito Abatino, her manager and partner. Abatino engaged tutors in French, voice, and dance, and he himself gave his vedette (star) lessons in table manners and polite conversation. He negotiated Baker's contract to appear in a silent film, Sirène des tropiques, in 1927. His friend Arys Nisotti, a Tunisian casino owner, produced the films ZouZou (1934) and Princesse Tam Tam (1935). Abatino wrote the script and is credited as the artistic director for Princesse Tam Tam. Both films included narratives of transformation and unrequited assimilation and were meant as vehicles for the new "Parisianized" Josephine Baker. Of her movies, Baker said, "It all seems so real, so true, that I sometimes think it's my own life being played out on the sets" (Rose 1989, 163).

Baker's hope for roles in Hollywood movies did not materialize, but she did star successfully in an adaptation of Offenbach's operetta La Créole, realizing her goal of performing serious music in French with French actors. Thus, in the 1930s Baker struggled against the sauvage persona she had created in the 1920s. As a jazz empress during the 1930s she wore glamorous Poiret gowns, sang, and chatted with the audience in French; and when she danced, her movements tended to conform to the fluidity and the stationary upper body of ballet. The American vernacular dance called the Charleston would remain in her repertoire, however, and this dance and the song "J'ai deux amours" became her signature. The square near the Bobino Theater in Paris where this complex and brilliant star gave her last performance has been named in her honor.

Biography

Josephine Freda McDonald Baker was born 3 June 1906 in St. Louis, Missouri. Her parents were Carrie McDonald and Eddie Carson; her stepfather was Arthur Martin; her siblings were Richard, Margaret, and Willie Mae. Her primary education was at public schools in St. Louis; she received private instruction in French, acting, voice, and dance at Beau-Chêne, France, in 1930–1931. Baker married Willie Wells in 1919. In 1920–1921, she was a dresser for Clara Smith and a featured blues singer and substitute in the chorus line with the Dixie Steppers (a vaudeville troupe) at the Booker T. Washington Theater in St. Louis, the Gibson Theater in Philadelphia, and elsewhere, earning $9 a week. She married Willie Baker in September 1921. In 1922–1923, she was with the touring company of Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake's Shuffle Along as the "Funny Girl" in the chorus line, earning $30 per week. In 1924–1925, she was the "Comedic Principal" in Sissle and Blake's Bamville/Chocolate Dandies on Broadway and on tour, at $125 per week. Also in 1925, for several months, she was a dancer at the Plantation Theater Restaurant.

Baker emigrated to France in 1925, sailing on 22 September on the Berengaria. In France, she was a dancer with La Revue Nègre, featured in a danse sauvage with Joe Alex, at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées (opening 2 October 1925, closing 19 November 1925; directed by André Daven, produced by Caroline Dudley, choreographed by Jacques Charles) at $200 per week. In 1926, she was a principal in La folie du jour at the Folies Bergère, featured in la danse des bananes (the composers were Irving Berlin, Spencer Williams, and Vincent Scotto). Baker opened Chez Joséphine on Rue Fontaine, in the Montmartre district of Paris, on 14 December 1926.

Baker's films of the 1920s include La folie du jour, directed by Mario Nalpas (silent, 1926); Un vent de folie, which opened in April 1927; and An Excursion to Paris. There is also a film of her performance in La Revue des revues (1927, directed by Mario Nalpas). She appeared in the short silent film Le pompier des Folies Bergères/Les hallucinations d'un pompier (c. 1927, possibly with Pierre Brasseur). She starred in Siren of the Tropics (silent, 1927; directed by Henri Etiévent and Mario Nalpas). In 1927, Baker published the first of five collaborative autobiographies: Les mémoires de Joséphine Baker, recuillis et adaptés par Marcel Sauvage, which had drawings by Paul Colin. She also endorsed a hair-straightening pomade, Bakerfix, patented by an Argentinean chemist. In 1928–1929, she undertook a tour of twenty-five countries.

During the 1930s, Baker published a novel, Mon sang dans tes veines (1930); was a principal in Paris qui remue at the Casino de Paris (1930–1931 season); recorded her signature song "J'ai deux amours" (July 12, 1930); starred in the film ZouZou (1934, a backstage musical with Jean Gabin, directed by Marc Allégret); starred in a remake of Offenbach's operetta La Créole, which opened 15 December 1934 in Marseilles; and starred in the musical comedy film Princesse Tam Tam (1935, directed by Edmond Gréville). Baker was the first black woman to appear in the Ziegfeld Follies (1936). On 30 November 1937, she acquired French citizenship by her marriage to Jean Lion. In September 1939, she performed in the revue Paris-Londres with Maurice Chevalier.

In 1940, during World War II, Baker joined the French resistance; she served as a sublieutenant in southern Europe and North Africa in 1940–1942. In 1942–1944, she organized the equivalent of the American United Services Overseas for the Free French. In 1943, The Josephine Baker Show, a benefit concert for the French Red Cross, was presented in Casablanca, Morocco. In 1945, Baker starred in Un soir d'alerte/Fausse alerte, directed by Jacques de Baroncelli. She was awarded the Croix de Lorraine by General Charles de Gaulle, in appreciation of her wartime efforts, and the Médaille de la Résistance, on 6 October 1946.

Baker toured the United States in 1951. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) declared Sunday, 20 May 1951, Josephine Baker Day in recognition of her civil rights activism. She renovated her chateau in France, Les Milandes, as a tourist attraction and home, and she adopted the twelve children of her "Rainbow Tribe" in 1954–1962. In 1945, she established the Josephine Baker Foundation, hoping to use it to support the College of Brotherhood. In 1961, she was awarded the Légion d'Honneur by General de Gaulle. In 1963, she addressed the March on Washington, D.C., and starred in concerts at Carnegie Hall to benefit the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), the NAACP, and the College of Brotherhood. She sold Les Milandes on 3 May 1968 to reimburse her creditors. In 1973, she starred in concerts at the Palace Theater; in 1974, she starred in Joséphine's Story, a benefit for the Red Cross presented at Monte Carlo. Her last show was Joséphine, in 1974–1975. Baker died in Paris 12 April 1975.

Baker, Josephine

TERRI FRANCIS

See also Bechet, Sidney; Chocolate Dandies; Dance; Primitivism; Shuffle Along; Smith, Clara

Further Reading

Baker, Jean-Claude, and Chris Chase. Josephine Baker: The Hungry Heart. New York: Random House, 1993.

Barnwell, Andrea D. "Like the Gypsy's Daughter or Beyond the Potency of Josephine Baker's Eroticism." In Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Richard J. Powell. London, Los Angeles, and Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Dalton, Karen C. C., and Henry Louis Gates Jr. "Josephine Baker and Paul Colin: African American Dance Seen Through Parisian Eyes." Critical Inquiry, 24, no. 4 (1998): 903.

"Femmes d'aujourd'hui: perle noire, poésie noire— Joséphine Baker." Femme de France, 26, October 1930 (Arsenal Pressbook, Rondell 15.816).

Hammond, Bryan, comp. Josephine Baker. London: Cape, 1988.

Kalinak, Kathryn. "Disciplining Josephine Baker: Gender, Race, and the Limits of Disciplinarity." In Music and Cinema, ed. James Buhler, Caryl Flinn, and David Nuemeyer. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 2000, pp. 315–335.

Lemke, Sieglinde. Primitivist Modernism: Black Culture and the Origins of Transatlantic Modernism. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Rose, Phyllis. Jazz Cleopatra: Josephine Baker in Her Time. New York: Doubleday, 1989.

Sauvage, Marcel. Les mémoires de Joséphine Baker. Paris: Éditions Kra, 1927 (with drawings by Paul Colin).

Sauvage, Marcel. Voyages et aventures de Joséphine Baker. Paris: Éditions Marcel Sheur, 1931 (preface by Fernand Divoire; illustrated with photographs and drawings).

Sharpley-Whiting, T. Denean. Black Venus: Sexualized Savages, Primal Fears, and Primitive Narratives in French. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.

Wood, Ean. The Josephine Baker Story. London: Sanctuary, 2000.

Selected Films

Les hallucinations d'un pompier/Le pompier des Folies-Bergère, c. 1927 (credits unknown)

Princesse Tam Tam, 1935 (color; dir. Edmond Gréville)

Sirène des tropiques, 1927 (black-and-white, silent; dir. Maurice Dekobra)

ZouZou, 1934 (black-and-white, with Jean Gabin; dir. Marc Allégret)

Baker, Ray Stannard

Ray Stannard Baker, one of the significant journalists of the muckraking period, joined the staff of the revolutionary McClure's Magazine in 1892. Working alongside Lincoln Steffens and Ida Tarbell, Baker produced a variety of investigative articles that molded his political beliefs. Initially, he wrote with little sympathy for the worker, feeling that protesters and strikers failed to understand the problems of a growing nation. Soon, however, his perspective changed, as he investigated lawlessness, monopolies, and corruption. Although he was not pro-labor, he began to distrust corporations, and a series of articles that he wrote about railroads pushed him further toward progressivism. When Steffens, Tarbell, and John S. Philips resigned from McClure's to buy American Magazine, Baker joined them. A study of the nation's racial divide would be his first investigative series for this new reformist publication.

At the time of the race riots of 1906 in Atlanta, Baker traveled South to investigate America's "color line." He had previously written about racial issues in two articles for McClure's; for those articles, he had traveled to the sites of four widely publicized lynchings and studied the lawlessness that characterized racial problems in the United States. In his new series, however, he planned to examine the "Negro problem" in depth. His research included interviews with southern leaders, both black and white, as well as clergymen, farmers, scholars, and other citizens. At one of these meetings, Baker sat down with W. E. B. Du Bois, then a professor of economics at Atlanta University, along with the white Episcopal clergyman Cary Breckenridge Wilmer. As Du Bois and Wilmer debated racial issues, both acknowledged they had never before done so face to face with someone of the opposing race (Tuttle 1974, 242).

In April 1907, the American published the first article in Baker's series, which concentrated on the race riot and the situation of blacks in Atlanta. After four more pieces, which covered topics such as Jim Crow laws and black life in the city, Baker broadened his study, examining the color line in the North. The completed series, while presenting few solutions, pointed to various trends in American racial politics. Baker considered the impact of the “great migration,” divisions within the African American community, and the many societal factors that made racism a regional and national issue.

Ray Stannard Baker, c. 1930–1946. (Library of Congress.)

Despite their thorough—and rare—analysis of the subject, however, Baker’s articles fell short of radicalism. In a conversation with Baker, his colleague John Philips had reminded him to “keep the interests and friendliness of southern readers. . . . They are the people whom we wish to reach and enlighten.” Also, many scholars have noted that Baker was never particularly extreme, or even immoderate, on the issue of race. Ideologically, he was allied with the progressive philanthropists and with Booker T. Washington; as a result, his articles received compliments from white liberals and moderate black leaders, and only slight criticism from more radical leaders like Du Bois.

In 1908, Baker published the series in a book, Following the Color Line. During the following years, he continued to write about race relations and also published a succession of idealistic books about country life under the pseudonym David Grayson. In 1918–1919, Baker served as director of the press bureau for the American peace commission at Versailles, where his close relationship with President Woodrow Wilson enabled him to define the role of press secretary. After the war, Baker continued to write; he produced an autobiography and fifteen volumes on Wilson.

Biography

Ray Stannard Baker was born 17 April 1870 in East Lansing, Michigan. He attended public schools in St. Croix Falls, Wisconsin; received a bachelor of science degree from Michigan Agricultural College (later Michigan State) in East Lansing, Michigan, in 1889; and studied at the University of Michigan Law School in 1891 (he did not graduate). Baker was a reporter for the Chicago News-Record (1892–1896); an associate editor at McClure’s Magazine (1897–1906); a part owner and editor of the American Magazine (1906–1915); a freelancer for Century, Harper’s Weekly, Outlook, World’s Work, and other publications; and director of the press bureau of the American peace commission (1918–1919). He received the Pulitzer Prize for Biography in 1940. Baker died in Amherst, Massachusetts, 12 July 1946.

JOSHUA A. KOBRIN

See also Great Migration; Lynching

Selected Works

“Railroads on Trial.” McClure’s Magazine, November 1905–March 1905, June 1906.

Adventures in Contentment. 1907 (as David Grayson).

“Not Less Democracy, But More: A Suggestion for the Solution of the Negro Problem in America, Made After Wide Observation and Careful Study.” Christian Endeavor World, 7 October 1909.

Following the Color Line: An Account of Negro Citizenship in the American Democracy. 1908 (new ed., 1964).

Adventures in Friendship. 1910 (as David Grayson).

“Negro Suffrage in Democracy.” Atlantic Monthly, November 1910.

“The Problem of Race.” In Conservation of National Ideals. 1911.

“Pressing On: Specific Cases in the Struggle Against Prejudice and Ignorance and Fear.” American Magazine, July 1912.

“The New Head of Tuskegee.” World’s Work, March 1916.

"The Negro Goes North." World's Work, July 1917.
What Wilson Did at Paris. 1919.
The New Industrial Unrest. 1920.
Woodrow Wilson and World Settlement (3 vols.). 1922.
Adventures in Understanding. 1925 (as David Grayson).
The Public Papers of Woodrow Wilson (6 vols.). 1925–1927
(ed., with William E. Dodd).
Woodrow Wilson, Life and Letters (8 vols.). 1927–1939.
Adventures in Solitude. 1931 (as David Grayson).
Native American: The Book of My Youth. 1941.
*American Chronicle: The Autobiography of Ray Stannard
Baker* [David Grayson]. 1945.

Further Reading

Bannister, Robert C., Jr. Ray Stannard Baker: The Mind and Thought of a Progressive. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1966.
Chalmers, David. "Ray Stannard Baker's Search for Reform." Journal of History and Ideas, 19(3), 1958.
Grantham, Dewey W., Jr. "Introduction to the Torchbook Edition." In Ray Stannard Baker, *Following the Color
Line*. 1964.
Semonche, John E. "The 'American Magazine' of 1906– 1915: Principal Versus Profit." Journalism Quarterly, 40(1), 1964.
———. Ray Stannard Baker: A Quest for Democracy in Modern America, 1870–1918. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.
Tuttle, William M., Jr. Introduction to "W. E. B. Du Bois's Confrontation With White Liberalism During the Progressive Era: A Phylon Document." Phylon, 35(3), 1974.

Baltimore Afro-American

The outburst of literary creativity known as the Harlem Renaissance might have been little noticed or remembered were it not for black newspapers. Black newspapers publicized and provided media outlets for black novelists, poets, and essayists. Although black and white magazines of the 1920s such as Opportunity, The Crisis, and American Mercury did publish Harlem Renaissance artists and writers, the black newspapers exposed them to a much wider audience. One black newspaper, the Baltimore Afro-American, provided an invaluable if little known outlet for the Harlem Renaissance.

The Baltimore Afro-American was and is one of the most important black newspapers. During the 1920s, it was the most widely read black newspaper on the East Coast. It was founded in Baltimore in 1892 by a group of black entrepreneurs and ministers led by Rev. William Alexander. John H. Murphy, its printer, acquired the newspaper in 1897, and his descendants have owned and operated it down to the present. In 1918, his son Carl Murphy, who was a graduate of Howard and Harvard universities, became the editor of the Afro-American. When John H. Murphy died in 1922, the family chose Carl Murphy to run the newspaper. Under his leadership, which lasted until 1967, the Afro-American became one of the top three black newspapers in the United States, matching its competitors the Chicago Defender and the Pittsburgh Courier in circulation and influence.

During the 1920s, the Afro-American reported news about the black community and crusaded for racial justice locally and nationally. It also extensively publicized black artists and entertainers. This last function was its greatest contribution to the Harlem Renaissance.

The Afro-American endlessly publicized jazz, blues, and the concert singers and musicians of the Harlem Renaissance—figures such as Marian Anderson, Louis Armstrong, Josephine Baker, Eubie Blake, Duke Ellington, Roland Hayes, Florence Mills, and Bessie Smith. It also gave prominent coverage to the singer, actor, and activist Paul Robeson. It regularly reviewed Broadway plays with black themes, such as The Emperor Jones, and occasionally published excerpts from these plays. It also published excerpts from the works of black novelists of the era such as Jean Toomer; and it frequently published the poems and essays of such Harlem Renaissance figures as Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Alain Locke, Claude McKay, and Zora Neale Hurston. Countee Cullen became a columnist for the newspaper, and Langston Hughes, later on in the 1930s, covered the Spanish Civil War for it. The Afro-American encouraged young black writers by publishing serials and short stories in its magazine section; eventually these stories were published in an anthology edited by Nick Aaron Ford, Best Short Stories by Afro-American Writers. In addition, the Afro-American publicized black playwrights and advertised local presentations of their plays. It publicized and published, as well, such intellectual and political leaders as W. E. B. Du Bois, Marcus Garvey, James Weldon Johnson, and Kelly Miller. Its homegrown columnist Ralph Matthews became nationally known as the “black H. L. Mencken.” In all these ways, the Afro-American supported the Harlem Renaissance.

HAYWARD “WOODY” FARRAR

See also American Mercury; Black Press; Chicago Defender; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Emperor Jones, The; Garvey, Marcus; Hughes, Langston; Matthews, Ralph; Mencken, H. L.; Miller, Kelly; Murphy, Carl J.; Opportunity; Pittsburgh Courier; Revue Nègre, La; specific entertainers, musicians, and writers

Further Reading

- Buni, Andrew. Robert L. Vann of the Pittsburgh Courier. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1974.
- Detweiler, Frederick G. The Negro Press in the United States. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1922.
- Farrar, Hayward. The Baltimore Afro-American, 1892–1950. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1998.
- Ford, Nick A. Best Short Stories by Afro-American Writers. Baltimore, Md.: Afro-American Co., 1950.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Mayberry. Propaganda and Aesthetics: The Literary Politics of Afro-American Magazines in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1940. (Reprint, New York: Arno, 1968.)
- Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. No Crystal Stair: Black Life and the Messenger. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1975.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Barnes, Albert C.

Albert C. Barnes established the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania, in 1922, having amassed the largest private collection of modern and African art in the world. Most important, Barnes appreciated African sculpture as art, not simply as artifacts that were best placed in museums of ethnography and natural history. He also understood the profound impact of African sculpture on the formal and aesthetic innovations of the European avant-garde—artists such as Pablo Picasso, Georges Braque, and Henri Matisse.

In addition, Barnes was a tireless and aggressive champion of the cultural importance of African art for African Americans: “Negro art is so big, so loaded with possibilities for a transfer of its value to other spheres where Negro life must be raised to higher levels, that it should be handled with the utmost care. . . . It involves intellectual, ethical, social, psychological, [and] aesthetic values of inseparable interactions.” As a consequence, Barnes soon caught the eye of Alain Locke, the editor of The New Negro, who may be considered the philosophical “midwife” of the Harlem Renaissance and who was himself seeking to make the art of Africans and African Americans the locus of a new aesthetics and a new racial consciousness. Thus began a complex friendship that would also involve Barnes’s relationship with other prominent figures of the Harlem Renaissance, in particular the novelist Walter White and the editor of Opportunity, Charles S. Johnson.

Barnes met Locke in Paris in December 1923 and the next month sought Locke’s assistance with an article, “Contribution to the Study of Negro Art in America,” that was to be published in both Ex Libris and Les Arts à Paris. Three months later, at Barnes’s suggestion, Johnson devoted a special issue of Opportunity (March 1924) to African art; this issue included Barnes’s own article, “The Temple,” together with Locke’s “A Note on African Art” and Paul Guillaume’s “African Art at the Barnes Foundation.” One year later, Locke included Barnes’s “Contributions to the Study of Negro Art” (retitled “Negro Art and America”) in a special issue of Survey Graphic, “Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro” (March 1925); soon afterward, he included this same article in The New Negro.

Barnes was an important cultural resource—a person to consult regarding African art. George Hutchinson has claimed that Locke and Opportunity relied on Barnes as their “house expert” on African aesthetics and its relation to European modernism. One must be careful, however, not to overstate this influence. Locke was not entirely satisfied with Barnes’s “Negro Art and America,” which offered little help in Locke’s own effort to provide a cultural context for African art. Partly for this reason, Locke offered “The Legacy of the Ancestral Arts” to supplement Barnes’s effort. For the remainder of the decade and into the next, Locke continued to champion African art. He now argued, however, that to see African art through the eyes of modernists such as Barnes, who so strongly emphasized form, was to see it “through a glass darkly.”

Barnes, Albert C.

Biography

Albert C. Barnes was born 2 January 1872 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He studied at public schools in Philadelphia; at the University of Pennsylvania Medical School, 1892; and at Heidelberg in Germany, 1900. He established the Barnes Foundation in December 1922. Barnes transferred 710 paintings from his personal collection (works by Picasso, Van Gogh, Renoir, Cézanne, and Matisse) to the foundation and first purchased African sculpture in 1922. He was named an Officier de l'Ordre National de la Légion d'Honneur by the French government on 27 July 1936 and was made an honorary doctor of science by Lincoln University on 5 June 1951. Barnes died 24 July 1951. (His provisions for the Barnes Foundation have since given rise to continuing controversy.)

MARK HELBLING

See also Johnson, Charles S.; Locke, Alain; Modernism; New Negro, The; Opportunity; Survey Graphic; White, Walter

Selected Works

"The Temple." Opportunity, 1924.
The Art of Painting. 1925.
"Negro Art and America." Survey Graphic, 1925.
"Negro Art Past and Present." Opportunity, 1926.
Art and Education. 1929.
The Art of Renoir. 1935.
The Art of Cézanne. 1939.

Further Reading

Helbling, Mark. The Harlem Renaissance: The One and the Many. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1999.
McCardle, Carl. "The Terrible Tempered Barnes." Saturday Evening Post, March 1942.
Meigs, Mark. "The Barnes Foundation and the Philadelphia Museum of Art: Bifurcated Loci of Cultural Memory." Annales: Lieux de Mémoire aux États-Unis, 18, 1995.
Spalding, Francis. Roger Fry: Art and Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.
Twitchell, Beverly. Cézanne and Formalism in Bloomsbury. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Research Press, 1987.
Williams, Elizabeth. "Art and Artifact at the Trocadero: Ars Americana and the Primitivist Revolution." In Objects and Others: Essays on Museums and Material Culture, ed. George Stocking. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985.

Barnett, Ida B. Wells

Ida Bell Wells Barnett was born a slave in Holly Springs, Mississippi, in 1862. She began her work as a teacher in the rural schools of Mississippi but then went to Memphis, a move that radicalized her and gave her an opportunity for a new career and for leadership. In the late nineteenth century she was one of the best-known African American women in the United States and internationally.

In Memphis, Barnett became part of a politically and intellectually active community. She joined a lyceum, composed primarily of other public school teachers, whose members enjoyed music, reading together, debating issues of the day, giving recitations, and writing and presenting essays. She contributed essays to a periodical associated with the lyceum, the Evening Star, then served as its editor; she was also a columnist for another local paper, Living Way. An incident that informed her editorials and articles at this time took place when she was forcibly removed from a train for taking a seat in the ladies' coach (rather than in the smoking car, as Jim Crow regulations required) and led to a lawsuit against the railroad, the Chesapeake, Ohio, and Southwestern. She won the suit, and although the decision was overturned by the supreme court of Tennessee, the episode began Barnett's lifetime of outspoken activism and advocacy. Barnett also wrote articles about the poor conditions in schools in the African American community (these writings got her fired from the teaching pool), and she encouraged African Americans, including members of her own family, to leave Memphis and seek justice and political and economic opportunities in the West.

Ida B. Wells Barnett in a photo published in 1891.
(Library of Congress.)

During this period, Barnett was a full-time investigative journalist; a co-owner and editor of her own newspaper, Free Speech and Headlight (1889), with Rev. Taylor Nightingale and J. L. Fleming; an astute businesswoman and professional woman who made her paper a successful enterprise; an active member and then secretary of the predominantly male National Press Association; a columnist syndicated in African American periodicals throughout the country; and an outspoken crusader for justice. In 1892, she wrote an editorial about the lynching of three of her friends, Thomas Moss, Calvin McDowell, and Lee Stewart, who had been co-owners and operators of the People's Grocery, in competition with a store owned and operated by whites. Barnett was a sharp-tongued political observer, and in her editorial—which, like all of her writing, was short, simple, and direct—she argued, provocatively, that these and other lynchings were not what the white establishment claimed them to be. The white power structure in Memphis reacted with threats and the actual burning of her newspaper offices, but she herself was in New York at the time and prudently remained there. In fact, she did not return to the South until January 1922, when she went to Little Rock, Arkansas, as an advocate against injustice and terrorism during a riotous period in which many African Americans were incarcerated or murdered.

Barnett's exile from the South gave her another arena for political action. Though she remained an active journalist for the rest of her life, she also began a career as a public speaker and a lifelong commitment to community development and political organization.

From 1892 on, she traveled and spoke frequently as a political activist.

Barnett had a reputation as a "difficult" woman who was often involved in public disagreements if not out-and-out feuds with a broad range of adversaries. Some of these were with highly respected white reformers: for example, in 1893, Barnett disputed with Frances Willard (of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union) and the evangelist Dwight Moody, because she considered their response to lynching inappropriate. Another adversary was a white journalist, John W. Jacks, president of the Missouri Press Association; in 1895, Jacks wrote a scathing attack on the morals of African Americans generally, and Barnett in particular. There was also tension between Barnett and some women who were part of the African American elite, such as Mary Church Terrell and Fannie Barrier Williams, who both vied with Barnett, for several decades, for leadership and power in various organizations. Some of Barnett's disagreements were with African American men, most notably Booker T. Washington during the time when he dominated the black leadership: Barnett found his political position intolerable. She also disagreed with political organizations; for instance, although she herself was a founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), in 1910, she considered it too conservative and overly controlled by white rather than African American viewpoints.

However, not all of Barnett's activity was so contentious. She was always an active member of the African American church, most consistently in the African Methodist Episcopal Church, but in many others as well. She joined many professional, social, and community organizations whose goals were self-improvement and securing justice, equality, and empowerment for all. Before the turn of the twentieth century, she organized one of the most successful anti-lynching campaigns: documenting cases; developing careful, thorough arguments; and offering proposals to end this type of terrorism. After the turn of the century, she continued the antilynching crusade but also became active in the woman's suffrage movement and the settlement house movement. With regard to settlement houses and community development, one of her striking achievements was the founding, in 1913, of the Negro Fellowship League in Chicago; she kept this organization alive and functioning for ten years before competing organizations and a lack of resources compromised her ability to continue. By the 1920s and 1930s, Barnett was also involved in political campaigns, and she herself ran for the state senate in Illinois in 1930, although she was defeated.

Barnett died in 1931, never having lost her passion for justice, never having wavered in her commitment to people who were disenfranchised politically or economically, and leaving as her legacy a remarkable record of achievements. She was a successful and significant investigative journalist, an insightful political observer and analyst, and a creative community organizer who was able to put together a network of services in support of specific needs. She was also an intellectual with a genuine vision of possibilities for African Americans. Perhaps most important, she was a leader who helped to identify strategies for social and political action that would constitute a framework for positive change for generations to come.

Biography

Ida Bell Wells Barnett (or Wells-Barnett) was born 16 July 1862 in Holly Springs, Mississippi. Her parents, James and Elizabeth Warrenton Wells, were politically active after the Civil War; they and one of her brothers died in the yellow fever epidemic of 1878, and she was left to care for her surviving siblings. Barnett attended elementary and high school at Shaw University, later renamed Rust College. She taught in the public schools of rural Mississippi and Shelby County, Tennessee. She was a contributor to and later editor (1886) of the Evening Star and a columnist for Living Way, both periodicals in Memphis, Tennessee; was a co-owner and editor of Free Speech and Headlight (with Rev. Taylor Nightingale and J. L. Fleming), 1889; and was elected secretary of the National Press Association, 1889. In 1892, she wrote an editorial that made her famous as a leader of the antilynching movement and in effect exiled her from the South for the next three decades. In 1893 and 1894, she made two speaking tours of England, Scotland, and Wales. Barnett was active in several political organizations—including the National Afro-American League, Afro-American Council, National Association of Colored Women, National Equal Rights League, Ida B. Wells Woman's Club, and National American Woman's Suffrage Association—and in the Niagara movement, the woman's suffrage movement, and the international peace movement. She was a cofounder of the NAACP (1910) and a founder of the Negro Fellowship League (1910) and the Alpha Suffrage Club (1913). She ran unsuccessfully for the Illinois state senate in 1930.

Barnett died in Chicago (of uremic poisoning) 25 March 1931.

JACQUELINE ROYSTER

See also Antilynching Crusade; Lynching; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Further Reading

- Aptheker, Bettina, ed. Lynching and Rape: An Exchange of Views. New York: American Institute for Marxist Studies, 1977.
- DeCosta-Willis, Miriam. Ida B. Wells: The Memphis Diaries. Boston, Mass.: Beacon, 1994.
- Duster, Alfreda M. Crusade for Justice: The Autobiography of Ida B. Wells. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Harris, Trudier, comp. Selected Works of Ida B. Wells-Barnett. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Humrich, Shauna Lea. "Ida B. Wells-Barnett: The Making of a Reputation." Master's thesis, University of Colorado, 1989.
- Hutton, Mary M. B. "The Rhetoric of Ida B. Wells: The Genesis of the Anti-Lynch Movement." Ph.D. diss., University of Indiana, 1975.
- Logan, Shirley W., ed. With Pen and Voice: A Critical Anthology of Nineteenth-Century African-American Women. Carbondale: University of Southern Illinois Press, 1995.
- McMurry, Linda O. To Keep the Waters Troubled: The Life of Ida B. Wells. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Royster, Jacqueline Jones. "To Call a Thing by Its True Name: The Rhetoric of Ida B. Wells." In Reclaiming Rhetorica, ed. Andrea Lunsford. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1995, pp. 167–184.
- . Southern Horrors and Other Writings: The Anti-Lynching Campaign of Ida B. Wells, 1892–1900. Boston, Mass.: Bedford, 1997.
- Rydell, Robert W., ed. The Reason Why the Colored American Is Not in the World's Columbian Exposition. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.
- Thompson, Mildred I. Black Women in United States History, Vol. 15, Ida B. Wells-Barnett: An Exploratory Study of an American Black Woman, 1893–1930. New York: Carlson, 1990.
- Tucker, David M. "Miss Ida B. Wells and Memphis Lynching." In Black Women in United States History, Vol. 4, Black Women in American History: From Colonial Times through the Nineteenth Century, ed. Darlene Clark Hine. New York: Carlson, 1990, pp. 1085–1095.

Video

The American Experience: Ida B. Wells, a Passion for Justice. New York: Video Dub, 1990 (prod. William Greaves).

Barthé, Richmond

James Richmond Barthé (1901–1989), a formally trained academic sculptor, was one of the most widely collected and publicized artists of the Harlem Renaissance. His work was characterized by racial pride, naturalistic representation, movement, sensuality, and spirituality; it appealed to a clientele extending beyond the black American community and attracted patronage from the white American mainstream; and it helped form the image of the “New Negro.”

In the 1920s, when Harlem was coming into vogue and the young Barthé was experimenting in art, he received funding from a pastor to attend the School of the Art Institute of Chicago. There, he acquired a traditional academic education strongly influenced by European art in the classical and Renaissance styles. At first, he studied painting under Charles Schroeder; later, however, an exercise in molding clay, intended to enhance his appreciation of three-dimensional forms, thrust him into the spotlight.

In 1927, the Chicago Women’s Club, a progressive group interested in the fine arts as a social commentary on race, sponsored an unprecedented exhibition of art, music, and literature by black Americans and needed some three-dimensional works to be placed alongside African sculpture. Two sculptured busts that Barthé had made for an art course were included in this exhibition, which was part of the Negro in Art Week programs. It introduced him to the world of professional artists and led, in 1928, to his first commissions for sculptures: portrait heads of Henry O. Tanner and Toussaint-Louverture. Throughout Barthé’s long career, his principal source of income would be such figurative bronze sculpture, particularly commissions for single portrait busts of Africans, African Americans, Caribbean-Americans, and European-Americans, although he also produced realistic freestanding full-length nude and clothed statues, some groups of figures (often with African themes), and some religious sculpture.

Barthé met Alain Locke during the Negro in Art Week programs; they developed a lifelong friendship, and Locke became a loyal supporter of Barthé’s work. During this time Barthé also met Frank Breckinridge and Julius Rosenwald, two prominent and influential businessmen in Chicago. This acquaintance led to a one-year travel grant to New York City in 1929, enabling Barthé to create works for an individual exhibition at the Chicago Women’s Club in 1930. A year earlier, he had exhibited four sculptures in New York in a show sponsored by the Harmon Foundation—The Jubilee Singer (1927), Toussaint L’Overture (1928), Head of a Tortured Negro (1929), and Tortured Negro (1929)—and they received an honorable mention. The Jubilee Singer appeared on the cover of Opportunity in 1928. Barthé continued to exhibit regularly with the Harmon Foundation until 1933 and received tremendous publicity and recognition through its promotion of black American artists.

Barthé became a permanent resident of New York City in 1931, attracted by its artistic culture and especially its progressive black arts community. He met artists, writers, and intellectuals such as Aaron Douglas, Langston Hughes, Wallace Thurman, and Carl Van Vechten and attended the salon of A’Lelia Walker. Through this salon he secured work such as a sculptured portrait of Walker herself.

Barthé lived not in Harlem but on Fourteenth Street in Chelsea, where he also opened a studio. He may have found the “New Negro” arts movement too restrictive because it focused on Afrocentric imagery, and he may have wanted more exposure in mainstream artistic circles. He seems to have concluded that his primary customers and patrons would be whites rather than blacks, and that by living and working downtown he could make himself more accessible to whites. If this was his strategy, it succeeded; he received numerous commissions and exhibitions and was praised by white and black critics in the 1930s and 1940s. Still, Barthé was a figure in Harlem, enjoying its nightlife, interacting with the literati of the Harlem Renaissance, and attending dance, music, and theater performances, although he maintained some measure of anonymity.

During the time of the Harlem Renaissance, mainstream institutions in culture, entertainment, and publishing were extraordinarily open to black Americans, and Barthé evidently took advantage of this openness. His work was displayed in exhibitions at the Whitney Museum (which acquired some for its collection), the New Jersey State Museum, the Corcoran Galleries, the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, and the Carnegie Institute, among others. His acquaintance with businesspeople led to public commissions, notably a frieze for the Harlem River Housing Project, Green Pastures: The Walls of Jericho (1938); and the Arthur Brisbane Memorial (1939), a monument to the newspaper editor and columnist. Barthé was also acquainted with people in theater, and he created many portrait sculptures for stars such as Phillips Holmes, John Gielgud, and Katharine Cornell.

Some of Barthé's sculpture—such as African Dancer (1933), Wetta (c. 1934), Feral Benga (1935), and African Boy Dancing (1937)—had African themes that appealed to the popular culture of the day: the Afrocentric self-awareness of blacks, and the expectation of whites that black artists would infuse their work with African "primitivism." Dance was a central motif in much of Barthé's art; Barthé had enrolled in classes in modern dance to enhance his understanding of the human figure in motion. His mastery of human anatomy, acquired during his years of academic training, combined with this appreciation of dance allowed him to capture emotion, movement, and sensuality, especially in his more stylized, elongated pieces.

Recent scholars have pointed out homoerotic aspects of Barthé's sculpture and have suggested that his use of the black male nude was a way of working out of his own sexual conflicts. His sensual sculptures of nude black males, such as Feral Benga, The Boxer (1940), and the robust Stevedore (1937), may well have appealed to white homosexuals who saw eroticism in their interpretation of images of African male "primitivism." The suggestion that Barthé had a double life during the Harlem Renaissance—participating in an intricate network of gays, lesbians, and bisexuals—may explain his wide appeal and patronage, especially among New York's homosexual and artistic circles; it may also explain his apparent need to obtain privacy by living downtown rather than in Harlem.

Barthé did cross racial, gender, and class lines in his career. Yet he may have made his greatest contribution to the Harlem Renaissance as a role model for other black American artists, demonstrating through his life and work the heights that artistic creativity could achieve in an integrated society.

Biography

James Richmond Barthé was born 28 January 1901 in Bay St. Louis, Mississippi. He studied at Saint Rose de Lima (a parochial school) and Valena C. James High School; at the School of the Art Institute of Chicago, 1924–1928; with Charles Schroeder and Albin Polasek, privately; and at the Art Students League, New York, 1931. Barthé traveled and worked in Italy and Iolous, Jamaica. His awards included the Eames McVeagh Prize, Chicago Art League, 1928; a Rosenwald Foundation fellowship, 1928–1929; an honorary mention from the Harmon Exhibition, for Tortured Negro, 1929; an honorary master of arts degree from Xavier University in New Orleans, Louisiana, 1934; a Guggenheim Memorial Foundation fellowship, 1940–1941; the Edward B. Alford Award; an award from the National Sculpture Society, 1945; the James J. Hoey Award for Interracial Justice, 1945; the Audubon Artists Gold Medal of Honor, 1945; an honorary doctorate in fine arts from Saint Francis College in Brooklyn, New York, 1947; and election to the National Academy of Arts and Letters, 1949. He died in Pasadena, California, 6 March 1989.

CLAUDIA HILL

See also Art Criticism and the Harlem Renaissance; Artists; Douglas, Aaron; Harmon Foundation; Harmon Traveling Exhibition; Locke, Alain; Primitivism; Salons; Tanner, Henry Ossawa; Van Vechten, Carl; Walker, A'Lelia

Selected Individual Exhibitions

1930: Chicago Women's Club, Chicago
1931: University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wisconsin
1931: Caz-Delbo Galleries, New York
1931: Rankin Art Galleries, Washington, D.C.
1933: Caz-Delbo Galleries, New York
1939: Arden Galleries, New York
1941: De Porres Interracial Center, New York
1942: South Side Art Center, Chicago
1945: International Print Society, New York
1947: Margaret Brown Galleries, Boston
1947: Duncan Phillips Memorial Galleries, Washington, D.C.
1947: Grand Central Galleries, New York
1948: Saint Peter College, Jersey City, New Jersey

Selected Group Exhibitions

1927: Chicago Women's Club, Chicago
1928: Chicago Art League, Chicago
1929: Fisk University, Nashville
1929: Harmon Foundation, New York
1930: Regal Theater, Chicago

1931: Harmon Foundation, New York
 1933: Harmon Foundation, New York
 1933: Whitney Museum of American Art, New York
 1933–1934: Century of Progress Show, Chicago
 1934: Salons of America, New York
 1934: Howard University, Washington, D.C.
 1934: New School of Social Research, New York
 1934: Whitney Museum of American Art, New York
 1935: New Jersey State Museum, New Jersey
 1935: Whitney Museum of American Art, New York
 1936: Corcoran Galleries, Washington, D.C.
 1936: Texas Centennial Exposition, Texas
 1938: Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, Philadelphia
 1939: Baltimore Museum, Maryland
 1939: Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, Philadelphia
 1939: Whitney Museum of American Art, New York
 1939: World's Fair, New York
 1939: Harlem Art Galleries, New York
 1939: Sculptors' Guild Outdoor Exhibition, New York
 1940: American Negro Exposition, Chicago
 1940: Pennsylvania Museum Sculpture Show
 1941: Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh
 1941: Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia
 1943: Art Institute of Chicago, Illinois
 1947: World's Fair, New York

Further Reading

- Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. "Richmond Barthé." In A History of African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Billops, Camille. The Hatch-Billops Collection. New York: Unpublished. (Archives of Black American Cultural History, Taped Oral Interviews. See interview with Richmond Barthé at his home in St. Albans, Queens, 9 December 1975.)
- Cederholm, Theresa Dickason. "Barthé, Richmond." In Afro-American Artists: A Bio-Bibliographical Directory. Boston, Mass.: Trustees of the Boston Public Library, 1973.
- Hammond, Bert D. "Richmond Barthé and Elizabeth Catlett: An Exchange." International Review of African American Art, 6(1), 1984.
- Hedgepeth, Chester M. "Barthé, Richmond (1901–1989)." In Twentieth-Century African American Writers and Artists. Chicago, Ill., and London: American Library Association, 1991.
- Igoe, Lynn, with James Igoe. "Barthé, Richmond." In Two Hundred Fifty Years of Afro-American Art: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Bowker, 1981.
- Lewis, Samella. Two Sculptors, Two Eras: Richmond Barthé, Richard Hunt. Los Angeles, Calif.: Landau Traveling Exhibitions, 1994.
- . "Barthé, Richmond." In Encyclopedia of African-American Culture and History, ed. Jack Salzman, David Lionel Smith, and Cornel West. New York: Macmillan Library Reference, 1996.
- Shaw, Thomas M. "Barthé, Richmond." In St. James Guide to Black Artists, ed. Thomas Riggs. Detroit, Mich.: St. James, 1997.
- Smalls, James. "Barthé, James Richmond (1901–1989)." In Glbq: An Encyclopedia of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Culture, ed. Claude J. Summers. Chicago, Ill.: Glbtq, 2002. http://www.glbq.com/arts/barthe_jr.html.
- Vendryes, Margaret Rose. "Expression and Repression of Identity: Race, Religion, and Sexuality in the Art of American Sculptor Richmond Barthé." Master's thesis, Princeton University, 1997.

Batouala

René Maran's novel Batouala (1921) is set in the French colony of Ubangui-Shari and takes the reader into the cultural practices and emotions of the people whom Maran came to know as an administrator in the French colonial empire. Sexually explicit and dramatically exotic, Batouala was an immediate sensation and caused a furor in France. Although it won the Prix Goncourt, the most prestigious award France has to offer a young writer, the book was banned for many years, and Maran was forced to resign his post. The most incendiary part of Batouala was the preface, in which Maran, who was from Martinique, attacked the French in Africa and equated colonialism with deceit and genocide: "You build your kingdom on corpses. . . . You aren't a torch, but an inferno. Everything you touch, you consume." Not only had this "brother of France" declared that assimilation was a myth but he had also used his position of authority to question the raison d'être of the French presence in Africa. After he returned to France, Maran became involved in various pan-African movements, joining the Ligue Universelle de la Défense de la Race Noire (as a member of the editorial staff of its journal, Les continents) and the Comité Universel de l'Institut Nègre de Paris (its literary journal was La revue du monde noir).

Many people consider Batouala the founding text of African nationalist literature. For writers and intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance, the novel and its author evoked strong feelings of racial pride and testified to the artistic potential of Africa. In Marcus Garvey's Negro World, for example, Batouala became a cause célèbre. As a consequence, Maran's salon in Paris soon became a meeting place for African and West Indian intellectuals (most notably Aimé Césaire, Léon Damas, and Léopold Senghor), as well as African American intellectuals. In 1924, Alain Locke met Maran in Paris; this meeting was the beginning of a long friendship. Maran introduced members of the Harlem Renaissance to the French public in such articles as "Le mouvement negro-littéraire aux États-Unis"; he was also instrumental in having Walter White's Fire in the Flint translated into French. At the same time as Maran began to appear in Opportunity, the Revue de monde noir began to publish the writings of Locke, Jean Toomer, Claude McKay, Langston Hughes, and James Weldon Johnson.

African Americans have long considered France the "garden spot of Europe." Batouala served both to complicate that understanding and to bring intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance into the larger political and cultural universe of the African diaspora.

MARK HELBLING

See also Césaire, Aimé; Damas, Léon; Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 4—Paris; Fire in the Flint, The; Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance; Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance; Locke, Alain; Maran, René; Negro World; Opportunity; Pan-Africanism; Senghor, Léopold

Further Reading

Fabre, Michel. "Autour de René Maran." Presence Africaine, 1973.

Fayolle, Roger. Batouala et l'accueil de la critique Afrique littéraire et artistique. 1978.

Hausser, Michel. Les deux Batouala de René Maran. 1975.

Ikonne, Chidi. "René Maran 1887–1960: A Black Francophone Writer Between Two Worlds." Research in African Literature, 1974.

Kesteloot, Lilyan. Les écrivains noirs de la langue française. 1965.

Miller, Christopher. "Nationalism as Resistance and Resistance to Nationalism in the Literature of Francophone Africa." Yale French Studies, 1993.

Ojo-Ade, Femi. René Maran, écrivain negro-africain. 1977.

Bearden, Romare

Among African American artists, Romare Bearden is one of the most inventive, distinctive, and famous and has received more critical acclaim and scholarly analysis than nearly anyone else. His art evolved considerably during his career: Early on, he was committed to social realism and political illustration; after World War II, he was one of the few African American painters who embraced abstract expressionism; at the beginning of the 1960s, his art became more representational but remained highly modernist in style and materials. When the civil rights movement erupted during the 1960s, he began to explore the social, economic, cultural, and political issues of African American life, through his many collages, which were made with found images from newspapers, magazines, and photographs. Although collage was hardly new at that time, Bearden was radical in his use of brutally factual photographic images to visualize the African American experience from his personal perspective. It is for these works that he is still best known.

Romare Bearden, photographed by Carl Van Vechten. (Library of Congress.)

Bearden was born around 1912 in Charlotte, North Carolina, and was raised there and in Pittsburgh and Harlem. He came to Harlem as a child and often visited his grandmother in Pittsburgh, where he eventually lived for a few years during his childhood. In Pittsburgh he had a friend named Eugene whom he later credited with inspiring his desire to draw and therefore his career as an artist. As a youth, Bearden came into contact with many artists and writers associated with the Harlem Renaissance, because his mother worked for the New York office of the Chicago Defender, an African American newspaper.

After college, Bearden studied at the Art Students League with George Grosz, who was then one of the great political satirists in graphic media. Bearden himself worked as a political cartoonist in the mid-1930s, first publishing cartoons in Medley, a humor journal published by New York University, then having illustrations and cartoons published in Collier's, Fortune, the Baltimore Afro-American, and the Saturday Evening Post. Thus, early in his artistic career he was creating images weighted with social commentary and observation, undoubtedly having learned this skill from Grosz. At about this time he became associated with the 306 Group of African American artists based in Harlem; this group included Charles Alston, Aaron Douglas, Jacob Lawrence, and Augusta Savage and was named for a salon that developed at 306 141st Street.

By the mid-1940s—after the period of the Harlem Renaissance—Bearden began to receive recognition for his social realist paintings. His work was exhibited in 1945 in the Whitney Museum Annual, and in the next three years he had exhibits at the Kootz Gallery. Ironically, though, his social realist works from these years are little known today, especially compared with his later collages; and social realism was not a long phase in his development as an artist. It seems that he felt some displeasure with how African American artists were publicly received at the time and with his own identity, and this discontent led him to take new stylistic directions. Still, social realist paintings such as Two Women in a Landscape (1941) reveal his keen observation of the problems of ordinary people, particularly poor African Americans, during the Great Depression; and his painting Factory Workers (1942) was used to illustrate “Negro’s War,” an article in Fortune magazine.

In his paintings of the mid-1940s, many of biblical subjects, his style was becoming much more abstract. In the late 1940s, Bearden was deeply involved in studying the paintings and drawings of the old masters, European artists of the Renaissance and later. He did not care to sketch in public at museums; instead, he made photocopies of masterworks and hung them in his studio so that he could study them conveniently and carefully. However, during the late 1940s and early 1950s, he was not very productive as a visual artist.

Bearden, who had served in the army during World War II, was able to go to Paris in 1950 to study philosophy at the Sorbonne, thanks to the GI Bill. He was very active in Parisian artistic and intellectual circles and got to know many older artists who had been part of the rise of modern art early in the century, as well as younger expatriate American writers and artists.

From the mid-1950s to the early 1960s, he continued to paint abstractly. Abstract expressionism was then at the height of its popularity, and Bearden’s works have the painterly, agitated brushwork and diverse tonal colors that were typical of this style. A characteristic technique of his own was to pull painted pieces of paper off canvases, creating rough, uneven, gritty paint surfaces. But although the abstract expressionists’ philosophical introspection and self-discovery might have appealed to Bearden, he and other African American artists of this period felt alienated from the New York school, which was all-white. At the same time, they seemed to feel that representational, socially conscious painting was no longer meaningful or effective.

In the early 1960s, as the civil rights movement was advancing, Bearden’s own art—and his idea of what African American art should be—changed dramatically. In 1963, he and several other African American artists in New York City, including Norman Lewis, Hale Woodruff, and Charles Alston, formed the group Spiral to help promote distinctly African American aesthetics and find a way to use art for the benefit of the civil rights movement. This group, which at its largest numbered sixteen artists, met frequently in Bearden’s studio in SoHo to discuss various philosophical and political views concerning the social turmoil of the day and the members’ own place as visual artists in the struggle for equality. After the march on Washington, D.C., in 1963, they organized an exhibit of their recent work; this was held in Manhattan and was called “Black and White” because all the works were done using only black and white. The exhibit was interpreted as fiercely political despite the artists’ attempt to minimize polemical responses to their work.

Also in 1963, Bearden began to create his socially conscious collages about African American life and culture. He concentrated on several rather broad themes, such as the inner city, the rural South, music, and musicians. Hoping that the artists with whom he was associated would collaborate with him on these collages or follow his lead, he collected a huge number of fragmentary cutout images and brought them to the meetings of Spiral, and two members—Richard Mayhew and Reginald Gammon—did start to work with him, but they soon lost interest and stopped.

Bearden created his collages by first assembling the fragmentary images, then painting over them in scattered places, then using a brayer to work a resin emulsion adhesive over the whole. The collages were then photocopied and enlarged. It was in this enlarged format that they were first exhibited, in 1964, under the collective title "Projections." They have been described as projections (a term referring to the method of enlargement) but also as "photomontages." These works were well received by most critics, whose response encouraged Bearden to abandon painting and devote himself to collage. It should be noted, though, that the critics were reacting at least partly to the newsworthy content of the works, and this is how they have usually been interpreted by scholars. Bearden himself did not approve of that approach, however, because the collages were not meant to illustrate or be parallel to the civil rights movement.

Bearden's collages feature disparate, abruptly juxtaposed found images. Bearden cut them out of various popular magazines of the time, such as Life, Ladies Home Journal, Ebony, and Look. Abrupt shifts in depth and scale create intense, provocative scenes of ordinary people and their activities. His composites of cutout images can create extremely realistic or very distorted figures and settings. Photographic images that were originally without color or had been stripped of their color during the photocopying are sharply contrasted with colored photographs and periodical illustrations and brightly painted areas. (Color derived from found images or created with paint is seen in the later collages, but the breakthrough works of the mid-1960s are without color.) Bearden evolved his own fully realized, tonally charged aesthetics, and his collages seem to reverberate with the rhythms of jazz and the blues and the movement and speed of urban life. They were often inspired by the artist's recollections of his youth and his perceptions of the life of rural and urban African Americans. Themes of travel and motion, usually with some reference to trains, appear frequently.

Because Bearden had produced illustrations and cartoons thirty years earlier, he knew the expressive power of images in the mass media; but when he began his collages he resisted the literal, direct approach of illustration. Photographs, with their striking immediacy, were a provocative, enticing means of visualizing the reality of life for a part of America that had been historically poor and alienated from the dominant mainstream culture.

Dove (1964) shows urban dwellers on a tense, noisy, crowded street. Its title refers to a bird, in the upper center, that suggests peace, tranquillity, and spiritual release and is in sharp contrast to all else that is depicted. The faces are brutally real; scale and depth are not. The Prevalence of Ritual—Baptist (also 1964) includes some of the most important themes in Bearden's collages: Christian references, the concept of inclusion or exclusion, the rituals of black culture, and the ritualistic quality of making art. Pittsburgh Memories features two large faces of black men; these faces suggest African masks, are made up of fragments of photographs (in a way influenced by cubism), and are surrounded by assembled photographs of city buildings. As with many of Bearden's collages, the inspiration for this image was the artist's recollection of his youth. Watching the Good Trains Go By and Train Whistle Blues Numbers 1 and 2 show one of Bearden's most persistent themes: the train. Bearden said that for him the train represents how white society encroached on African American society. It may well also be his personal reflection on the migration of many African Americans from the South to the North in the early decades of the twentieth century, a theme that Jacob Lawrence immortalized in his series of paintings The Migration of the Negro. The Conjur Woman depicts an African American folk mystic who could supposedly work magic and cast spells. Summertime (1967) contrasts the sentimental wholesomeness of a girl eating an ice cream cone with the impoverishment of people behind tenement windows, who seem to be caged in.

After the 1960s, Bearden returned to painting. He depicted socially conscious themes and scenes of African American life in vivid colors, sometimes with scratchy, agitated brushwork. Some of these works are pleasantly abstract scenes with large, bold areas of color, whereas others are violent and disturbing.

Late in life, Bearden was a mentor to younger black artists and an advocate of African American art. He received widespread recognition and acclaim for his work, becoming one of America's most famous black artists. In 1967, he was a cocurator of "The Evolution of Afro-American Artists, 1800–1950" at City College in New York City, an exhibit that was one of the first to explore the history of African American art. Bearden wrote "Rectangular Structure in My Montage Paintings," an important treatise on his own collages, in 1968. In 1969, he and the abstract artist Carl Holty wrote The Painter's Mind: A Study of the Relations of Structure and Space in Painting. Bearden's years of research became the foundation for A History of African American Artists: From 1792 to the Present, of which he and Harry Henderson were coauthors; this was one of the first major surveys of the topic. Bearden died of cancer in 1988.

Biography

Romare Bearden was probably born 2 September 1912 in Charlotte, North Carolina. (There is some disagreement among sources as to the year of his birth, with dates ranging from 1911 to 1914. According to the Register of Deeds in Charlotte, he was born in 1912.) He was brought as a child to New York, where his father was an inspector for the Department of Sanitation. Bearden studied at Boston University while playing for one of the Negro baseball leagues; he eventually received a B.S. in mathematics from New York University in 1935. He also studied at the University of Pittsburgh, the American Artists School, and the Art Students League, New York City. In the late 1930s and then again from the early 1950s to the mid-1960s, he was a social worker in New York City. Bearden served in the army from 1942 to 1945, traveled to Paris in 1950, and married Nanette Rohan in 1954. His awards include the National Medal of the Arts and numerous honorary doctorates. He was a member of Spiral, the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Bearden was involved in music as well as art: he wrote music for well-known performers such as Billie Holiday; started his own business, the Bluebird music company; and had twenty of his songs recorded. Bearden died 12 March 1988 of complications from cancer.

HERBERT R. HARTEL JR.

See also Alston, Charles; Artists; Baltimore Afro-American; Chicago Defender; Douglas, Aaron; Lawrence, Jacob; Savage, Augusta; Woodruff, Hale

Individual Exhibitions

1940: "Romare Bearden: Oils, Gouaches, Watercolors, and Drawings, 1937–1940," Addison Bates Studio, New York

1944 and 1945: G Place Gallery, Washington, D.C.
 1945: Duvuloy Gallery, Paris
 1945: Caresse Crosby, Washington, D.C.
 1945, 1946, 1947: Samuel Kootz Gallery, New York City
 1948: Niveau Gallery, New York City
 1955: Barone Gallery, New York City
 1960: Michael Warren Gallery, New York City
 1961: Cordier and Ekstrom Gallery, New York City
 1964: "Projections," Ekstrom's Gallery, New York City
 1965: "Projections," Corcoran Gallery, Washington, D.C.
 1966: Dundy Art Gallery, Wattsfield, Vt.
 1967: Michael Warren Gallery, New York City
 1967: J. L. Hudson Gallery, Detroit
 1968: "Romare Bearden: Paintings and Projections," Art Gallery, State University of New York at Albany
 1969: Iowa State University, Iowa City
 1970: Michael Warren Gallery, New York City
 1971: "Romare Bearden: The Prevalence of Ritual," Museum of Modern Art, New York City
 1972: Studio Museum in Harlem
 1975: Gallerie Albert Loeb, Paris
 1975: Madison Art Museum, Madison, Wis.
 1980: "Romare Bearden: 1970–1980," Mint Museum, Charlotte, N.C.
 1986: "Romare Bearden: Origins and Progressions," Detroit Institute of Arts
 1991: "Memory and Metaphor: The Art of Romare Bearden, 1940–1987," Studio Museum of Harlem, New York City
 1992: "A Graphic Odyssey: Romare Bearden as Printer," Cleveland Museum of Art
 1997: "Romare Bearden in Black and White: Photomontage Projections, 1964," Whitney Museum of American Art, New York City
 1997: "The Painted Sounds of Romare Bearden," Mount Saint Vincent University Art Gallery, Halifax, Nova Scotia
 2003: "The Art of Romare Bearden," National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.

Group Exhibitions

1945 and 1946: Whitney Museum Annual
 1946: Durand-Ruel Gallery, New York City
 1948: Six American Painters, Galerie Maeght, Paris
 1948: Art Institute of Chicago
 1948: Barnett-Aden Gallery, Washington, D.C.
 1950: "American Painting Today: A National Competitive Exhibition," Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York City

Bearden, Romare

- 1955: Clearwater Art Museum, Clearwater, Fla.
1960: "Recent Acquisitions," Museum of Modern Art, New York City
1961: Carnegie International, Pittsburgh
1964: Farleigh-Dickinson University, Madison, N.J.
1964: "Black and White," Christopher Street Gallery, New York City
1966: New School of Social Research, New York City
1966: UCLA Art Gallery, Los Angeles
1967: City College, City University of New York
1967: Forum Gallery, New York City
1968: "International Exhibition of Posters," Sofia, Bulgaria
1968: Minneapolis Museum
1969: "New American Painting and Sculpture," Museum of Modern Art, New York City
1969: Detroit Museum
1969: Cranbrook Academy of Art, Bloomfield Hills, Mich.
1971: "Seventeen Black Artists," Newark, N.J.
1975: "Art Students League Anniversary Exhibition—100 Artists," Kennedy Galleries, New York City
2003: "Challenge of the Modern: African-American Artists, 1925–1945," Studio Museum in Harlem
2003: "African-American Artists, 1929–1945: Prints, Drawings, and Paintings in the Metropolitan Museum of Art"

Further Reading

- Fine, Ruth. The Art of Romare Bearden. New York: Abrams, 2003.
- Campbell, Mary Schmidt, and Sharon F. Patton. Memory and Metaphor: The Art of Romare Bearden, 1940–1987. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Driscoll, David. Two Centuries of Black American Art. New York and Los Angeles, Calif.: Knopf and Los Angeles County Museum of Art.
- Gelburd, Gail. Romare Bearden in Black and White: Photomontage Projections, 1964. New York: Whitney Museum of American Art, 1997.
- Gibson, Ann E. Abstract Expressionism: Other Politics. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1997.
- Henderson, Harry, and Romare Bearden. African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Lee, Felicia R. "An American Life in Mixed Media: Bearden Is Honored With a National Gallery Retrospective." New York Times, 11 September 2003, pp. E1, E5.
- Lewis, Samella. African-American Art and Artists. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- Patton, Sharon F. African-American Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

- Pomeroy, Ralph. "Romare Bearden." In Contemporary Artists. New York: St. James, 1977, pp. 79, 80.
- Powell, Richard J. Black Art and Culture in the Twentieth Century. New York: Thames & Hudson, 1997.
- Reynolds, Gary. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1990.
- Schwartzman, Myron. Romare Bearden: His Life and Art. New York: Abrams, 1990.

Beavers, Louise

The actress Louise Beavers, like the better-known Hattie McDaniel, was a favorite "mammy" figure in American film—a wise if sometimes naive servant, cheerful and loyal, who provided her white employers, and a predominantly white audience, with sage advice, commentary, humor, and a reaffirmation of the status quo.

Beavers began her career as a member of the Lady Minstrels but soon started to get small parts in silent films. She made her feature debut in Gold Diggers (1923) and also appeared in the 1927 version of Uncle Tom's Cabin. During this period Beavers was being trained to fit into the "mammy" and "Aunt Jemima" mold; in fact, she was asked to gain weight so that her image on the screen would conform to the imagined ideal. With the advent of talkies, her career took off, and between 1929 and 1960 she appeared in more than one hundred films. The characters Beavers played generally brought comic relief or served as a counterpart of the Greek chorus, commenting on the foibles of the leading characters. She was described as conveying sincerity, authenticity, and warmth, and as seeming tamer and less cantankerous than McDaniel.

The highlight of Beavers's career was a dramatic role: she played Delilah Johnson opposite Claudette Colbert in the tearjerker Imitation of Life (1934). In this film Beavers and Colbert portray single mothers juggling the demands of jobs and parenthood. Beavers's character still functions as a loyal servant who makes sacrifices for her white employer. However, her conflict with her daughter (played by Fredi Washington), who tries to pass for white, suggests the influence of racism in American society. Beavers received critical praise for her role in Imitation of Life, but in her remaining films she once again played the stereotypical servant.

The Harlem Renaissance partly coincided with the arrival of sound films in Hollywood; and both the renaissance and the talkies opened new doors not only for African American performers who had been active in New York's theaters and nightclubs but also for those who were establishing their careers elsewhere in the United States. More work was available, and there were new avenues for artistic expression. However, Hollywood was affected by the racism and discrimination that also characterized American society as a whole; as a result, only minor roles—as servants, entertainers, or comic characters—were generally available to black actors. Moreover, these roles were stereotypical. This kind of casting drastically limited the parts that African Americans, such as Beavers, could play. Nevertheless, during the 1920s and 1930s, a performer like Beavers could still manage to create a unique screen persona within these confines.

Beavers, who had died in 1962, was posthumously inducted into the Black Filmmakers Hall of Fame in 1976.

Biography

Louise Beavers was born 8 March 1902 in Cincinnati, Ohio, and moved to Los Angeles as a teenager. She made her feature film debut in 1923 and appeared in some one hundred films between 1929 and 1960. Later, she brought her screen persona to television in the situation comedies Beulah and The Danny Thomas Show. She died of a heart attack 26 October 1962 in Hollywood, California.

DWANDALYN R. REECE

See also Film: Actors; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Washington, Fredi

Selected Films

Gold Diggers. 1923.
Uncle Tom's Cabin. 1927.
Coquette. 1929.
Girls About Town. 1931.
What Price Hollywood? 1932.
She Done Him Wrong. 1933.
A Shriek in the Night. 1933.
Bombshell. 1933.
Imitation of Life. 1934.
Palooka. 1934.
It Happened in New Orleans. 1936.
Made for Each Other. 1939.

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattos, Mammies, and Bucks. New York: Continuum, 1997.
 Nesteby, James. Black Images in American Films. New York: Lanham, 1982.
 Noble, Peter. The Negro in Film. London: Skelton, 1948.
 Sampson, Henry. Blacks in Black and White. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1995.

Bechet, Sidney

Sidney Bechet, who has been called the “wizard of jazz,” was perhaps the most prominent virtuoso to emerge from the early jazz community in New Orleans and was certainly the hottest reed man of this era. He was born a Creole in New Orleans—the city often associated with the birth of jazz—and was considered a child prodigy, having taught himself the clarinet on his brother Leonard's instrument. By age eight Bechet was performing with neighborhood bands; at age fourteen he had played with the greats in New Orleans: Bunk Johnson, King Oliver, Louis Armstrong, and Freddie Keppard. Bechet left New Orleans around 1916 and after several detours reached Chicago in 1918. There he encountered musicians from New Orleans: Keppard, Oliver, Armstrong, and Jelly Roll Morton. Bechet, who was always adventurous, set out for Europe in 1919 with Will Marion Cook's orchestra and traveled to England, France, and eventually Russia. The hotheaded Bechet was deported at one time or another from both England and France, and in 1928, he spent almost a year in jail in France for having been involved in a shooting scrape. On other trips to England and France, though, he gave command performances for royalty.

After a brief downturn in his popularity, Bechet became a significant figure in the jazz renaissance of the 1940s; he would maintain this role in the rebirth of jazz for the rest of his life. In 1951, when he took up permanent residence in France, he became an idol to the French people and played and recorded with several French jazz orchestras. A street—rue Sidney Bechet—was named in his honor.

Bechet's first love was the clarinet, but during his first trip to Europe he bought a soprano saxophone, the instrument on which he later excelled. Until John Coltrane took up this instrument in the 1960s, Bechet was the premier performer on it. The soprano saxophone is a lead and solo instrument; in sound and quality, it can pervade an ensemble much as the trumpet—the “king of instruments”—does. Many observers say that if Bechet’s instrument had been the trumpet, he would have been as famous a virtuoso as Louis Armstrong.

As it was, some authorities on jazz name Bechet, Armstrong, and Duke Ellington as the three top figures in the development of jazz, with regard to improvisation and virtuosity. Although Bechet had his detractors, he was widely considered a gifted and passionate improviser and a consummate artist who inspired his fellow musicians to transcend the mediocre. According to Williams (1978, 1989), Bechet was also a great blues player. (Reportedly, Bechet performed with Bessie Smith, the “empress of the blues.”) Williams also says that Bechet had impressive powers—paraphrase, invention, and adaptation to a particular musical climate—as well as an “outstanding sense of overall structure.” Bechet’s musical legacy includes hundreds of recordings with several groups, on American and French labels.

We may appropriately end with a quotation from about 1919 from the classical maestro Ernest Ansermet (1883–1969), then the resident conductor of the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande: “There is in the Southern Syncopated Orchestra an extraordinary clarinet virtuoso who is, so it seems, the first of his race to have composed perfectly formed blues on the clarinet. I wish to set down the name of this artist of genius; it is Sidney Bechet.”

Biography

The clarinetist and saxophonist Sidney Bechet was born in New Orleans in 1897. Bechet was a child prodigy who played with the greats in New Orleans at age fourteen, in 1911. He came to Chicago in 1918 and went to Europe in 1919, playing with major jazz groups in the United States and abroad. Around 1919, he was praised by the Swiss classical conductor Ernest Ansermet. At about this time Bechet took up the soprano saxophone. He traveled back and forth to Europe, toured extensively, and recorded numerous jazz tracks. In 1951, Bechet settled in Paris; he became an idol of the French from then until his death. He married a German, Elizabeth Zeigler (an event reported in Life magazine), and they maintained an imposing residence near Paris; however, he also had a mistress, with whom he had a child, Daniel. Bechet died in Paris in 1959.

MALCOLM BREA

See also Armstrong, Louis; Cook, Will Marion; Jazz; Morton, Jelly Roll; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Oliver, Joseph “King”

Further Reading

- Bechet, Sidney. Treat It Gentle: An Autobiography. New York: Da Capo, 1978. (Paperback ed. See also hardback ed., Twayne and Cassell, 1960.)
- Chilton, John. Sidney Bechet: The Wizard of Jazz. New York: Da Capo, 1996. (First printing, London, 1987.)
- Hippenmeyer, Jean-Roland. Sidney Bechet: Ou l'extraordinaire odyssée d'un musicien de jazz. Geneva: Tribune, 1980.
- Porter, Lewis, and Michael Ullman. “Sidney Bechet and His Long Song.” Black Perspective in Music, 16(2), Fall 1988.
- Williams, Martin T., ed. The Art of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1959.
- Williams, Martin T. Jazz Masters of New Orleans. New York: Da Capo, 1978.
- . Jazz in Its Time. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Zammarchi, Fabrice. Sidney Bechet. Paris: Éditions Filipacchi-Sonodip, 1989.

Becton, George Wilson

George Becton—the “dancing evangelist”—is perhaps most remembered today through Langston Hughes’s poem “Goodbye Christ,” which rails against religious hypocrisy in Harlem and across the globe. Hughes specifically indicts “Big black Saint Becton/ Of the Consecrated Dime” and laments that “The popes and preachers’ve/Made too much money from [the Bible].” Although Hughes mentions Becton by name only in “Goodbye Christ,” he almost certainly had Becton in mind in other poems with a similar theme, such as “To Certain ‘Brothers’” and “Sunday Morning Prophecy.” It should be noted that the working-class people of Harlem undoubtedly remember Becton quite differently. Hughes may have best summed up Becton’s life and career in one sentence in George Wilson Becton: inset, and in his living room, 1930s.

(Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

The Big Sea (1940, 275): “Dr. Becton was a charlatan if there ever was one, but he filled the huge church—because he gave a good show.”

George Wilson Becton was born in Clarksville, Texas, where he was known as the “boy clergyman.” From an early age he felt that he had a calling as an evangelist and began practicing the trade; eventually he went to Ohio to pursue his career. He earned degrees from Payne Theological Seminary at Wilberforce University before becoming the pastor at Zion Baptist Church in nearby Xenia. In the mid-1920s, he moved to Harlem, where he landed at the Salem Methodist Episcopal Church on the corner of Seventh Avenue and 129th Street. F. A. Cullen (father of the poet Countee Cullen) was its pastor. There, Becton became known for his upbeat services. He would swagger onto the stage wearing a pearl-gray suit, a top hat, and white silk gloves and carrying a malacca cane, followed by his “twelve disciples” and accompanied by the music of a jazz band with seven to fifteen players (reports vary). Becton was gentle-looking, baby-faced, fleet of foot, poetic, quick-witted, and charismatic. His congregation swooned, shouted, danced, and, most important, contributed to the collection basket. Becton called his show “The World’s Gospel Feast Party,” and the primary tenet of the organization was the “consecrated dime.” Every member of this working-class congregation was to put a dime a day into an envelope, and on Sunday Becton would collect the envelopes, each containing seventy cents of hard-earned money. Becton would consecrate the dimes to God during the worship service but put them into his own pocket afterward. He lived in an extravagant apartment, wore the finest clothes, and bought real estate. When asked about his wealth, Becton delivered the familiar refrains “If Jesus were alive, he would dress like me” and “God ain’t broke!” (Anderson 1981, 249). At the height of his popularity as Harlem’s favorite evangelist, he founded a magazine, The Menu, and took his “World’s Gospel Feast Party” on the road.

Becton was visiting one of his churches in Philadelphia on 21 May 1933 when he was gunned down, presumably by members of the policy racket, a mob-run lottery system, of which he was a vocal opponent. He died four days later. Mourners piled into the Salem M. E. Church (which had a capacity of 3,000) on the morning of 30 May 1933 for the funeral, and more than 5,000 lined the street—so many, in fact, that a small riot broke out. Despite Becton’s unrestrained swindling of the poor, it was clear that in both life and death “he gave a good show.”

Biography

George Wilson Becton was born 15 April 1890 in Clarksville, Texas. His parents were Matthew and Lucy Ann (Bagsby) Becton. He attended Payne Theological Seminary at Wilberforce University in Wilberforce, Ohio; he received a bachelor of divinity degree in 1910, a bachelor of arts degree in 1917, and the Rust prize for oratory in 1913 and was selected as the speaker for Founders’ Day in 1914. Becton was the pastor of Zion Baptist Church in Xenia, Ohio, c. 1913–1925. He then moved to Harlem, where he worked at Salem Methodist Episcopal Church (Seventh Avenue and 129th Street) under Rev. Dr. F. A. Cullen. Becton married Rev. Josephine Bufford, pastor of Allen Memorial Spiritualist Church at 135 West 120th Street, and resided at 62 West 120th Street. He was the founder and president of the World’s Gospel Feast Party, Inc., and publisher of and contributor to a bimonthly magazine, The Menu. Becton was known for leading upbeat evangelical revivals and preaching the concept of the “consecrated dime.” He was shot by mobsters in Philadelphia on 21 May 1933 and died 25 May 1933 (although some sources give the day of his death as 31 May). His funeral was held on 30 May 1933; thousands attended, and rioting broke out.

STEPHEN F. CRINITI

See also Cullen, Frederick Asbury; Hughes, Langston

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1981.
- Cunard, Nancy. "Harlem Reviewed." In Negro: An Anthology, ed. Nancy Cunard. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1970, pp. 47–55.
- "5,000 Riot to See Harlem Funeral." New York Times, May 31, 1933, p. L13.
- Hughes, Langston. "Goodbye Christ." Negro Worker, 2(11–12), 1932, p. 32.
- . The Big Sea. New York: Hill & Wang, 1940.
- "Negroes Here Mourn Slain Evangelist." New York Times, 30 May 1933, p. L13.
- Yenser, Thomas, ed. Who's Who in Colored America, 1930–1931–1932, 3rd ed. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Yenser, 1933.

Bennett, Gwendolyn

Gwendolyn Bennett was a graphic artist as well as a writer. Because her writing tapered off in the 1930s, she can only be considered a minor figure now; but to her contemporaries she was one of the most promising of the younger artists and a very visible part of the Harlem Renaissance.

Bennett was born in Giddings, Texas, in 1902. After her parents divorced, her father stole her from her mother, and Bennett spent much of her early life moving from place to place. Her father later remarried and settled in Brooklyn, where Bennett graduated from high school in 1921 at the top of her class. After graduation she decided to pursue art as a career, studying fine art at Pratt Institute and taking classes at Columbia University. In 1923, her poem "Heritage" was published in Opportunity.

In 1924, she was introduced to Harlem's literary circles at a dinner for Jessie Redmon Fauset. The poem "To Usward," which she read to the gathering, was subsequently published in both The Crisis and Opportunity and became a rallying cry for the aspirations of the "New Negro." Bennett quickly found herself caught up in a young literary group that included Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Eric Walrond, Wallace Thurman, and others. In 1925, her poem "Song" appeared in Alain Locke's influential anthology The New Negro.

In 1924, Bennett took a position at Howard University, in the fledgling fine arts department. The next year she went to Paris to study. Her letters to Cullen and others back home are full of events in Harlem but also describe buying James Joyce's Ulysses and visiting the famous Parisian bookseller Shakespeare and Company. France had a great effect on her art, and her two published short stories both involve Paris.

Bennett became an assistant editor at Opportunity in the summer of 1926, and she kept her affiliation with Opportunity even after returning to Howard. Most significantly, 1926 marks the beginning of "The Ebony Flute," a gossipy monthly column in Opportunity that would last for nearly two years. "The Ebony Flute" is filled with vivid details about the goings-on of the young literary community in Harlem and is a unique record of the avant-garde of the Harlem Renaissance.

Bennett married a doctor, Alfred Jackson, in 1927 and moved with him to rural Florida. Her marriage ended her career at Howard and also ended "The Ebony Flute," as she was no longer part of events in Harlem. The Jacksons' marriage became increasingly unhappy because of financial pressures and the young couple's isolation. By the time Bennett and her husband returned to New York in 1930, the Harlem Renaissance was nearly over. Bennett was able to resume some of her former lifestyle, but her marriage continued to be troubled, and financial problems finally caused the Jacksons to lose their home on Long Island. Dr. Jackson died in the early 1930s.

As late as 1937, Bennett corresponded regularly with Claude McKay and Cullen and was active in their literary circle. Accusations of communist affiliations cost Bennett a job with the Federal Arts Project in 1941 and brought her under investigation by the House Un-American Activities Committee. This seems to have broken her spirit, and by the early 1940s she had retreated into anonymity. Eventually, Bennett remarried and moved to Kutztown, Pennsylvania, to retire. She died there in 1981.

Biography

Gwendolyn Bennett was born in Giddings, Texas, 8 July 1902. She graduated from Pratt Institute, 1924; studied at Columbia University, 1921–1924; and studied at Académie Julian and École du Pantheon, Paris, 1925. She was an instructor in watercolor and design at Howard University, 1924 and 1926; and taught art education and English at Tennessee State College, 1927. In the 1930s, Bennett was associated with the Federal Arts Project and with the Harlem Community Art Center, as assistant director (1937) and as director (1938–1941). She was a teacher and administrator at the Jefferson School for Democracy, c. 1941; director of the George Washington Carver School, beginning in 1943; secretary of Consumer's Union, mid-1940s; and an antique dealer in Kutztown, Pennsylvania. She received a fellowship from the Alfred C. Barnes Foundation, 1926. Bennett died in Kutztown in 1981.

STEVEN NARDI

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Hughes, Langston; Literature: 7—Poetry; McKay, Claude; New Negro, The; Opportunity; Thurman, Wallace; Walrond, Eric

Selected Works

Bennett, Gwendolyn. "Tokens." In Ebony and Topaz: A Collectanea, ed. Charles S. Johnson. New York: 1927, pp. 149, 150.

Bennett, Gwendolyn. "Wedding Day." Fire!!, November 1926, pp. 26–28.

Cullen, Countee, ed. Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. 1927. (Collection in which Bennett appears.)

Honey, Maureen, ed. Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. 1989. (Collection in which Bennett appears.)

Hughes, Langston, and Arna Bontemps, eds. The Poetry of the Negro, 1746–1949. 1949. (Collection in which Bennett appears.)

Further Reading

Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1987.

Govan, Sandra Y. "Gwendolyn Bennett: Dramatic Tension in Her Life and Art." Langston Hughes Review, 6(2), 1987, pp. 29–35.

Perry, Margaret. Silence to the Drums: A Survey of the Literature of the Harlem Renaissance. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1976.

Bentley, Gladys

Gladys Bentley once wrote: "It seems I was born different. . . . From the time I can remember anything, even as I was toddling, I never wanted a man to touch me. . . . Soon I began to feel more comfortable in boys' clothes than in dresses." She left home at age sixteen, bound for Harlem and the chance to be a jazz singer. There was a public hungry for gay and lesbian entertainers, and in Harlem Bentley carved out a niche for herself among what were known as "pansy acts" and "hot mamas." Bentley began performing at house-rent parties and in the speakeasies of the nightclub district called Jungle Alley, at 133rd Street between Lenox and Seventh avenues; and in the 1920s, she achieved international fame as a male impersonator who cultivated an image as a bulldagger. She sang at Harlem's most fashionable clubs, dressed in her signature tuxedo and top hat, and openly flirted with female patrons. Bentley would playfully transform popular tunes of the day by adding raunchy lyrics. Her popularity and her earnings were ever-increasing, and she was frequently mentioned in many of the entertainment columns of the day. Characters based on her appeared in novels such as Carl Van Vechten's Parties and Clement Wood's Deep River. Moreover, she was a major influence on the careers of other blues singers, including Bessie Smith.

Bentley's enormous popularity on the stage led to a highly successful recording career when she was twenty-one. She recorded eighteen songs for the Okeh company and a side with the Washboard Serenaders on the Victor label. Her recordings—unlike her stage act—had no homoerotic elements and no lesbian lyrics.

As the era of the "New Negro" ended and the Great Depression began, Bentley moved to Los Angeles to care for her ailing mother and to continue her career as an entertainer. She had some success during World War II, performing at Loquin's El Rancho in Los Angeles and at Mona's in San Francisco, a club whose motto was "Girls Will Be Boys" and where she was known as the "brown bomber of sophisticated songs." However, the McCarthy era brought with it a great deal of homophobia, and Bentley's act was targeted. In response, she stopped wearing her tuxedo onstage and appeared in dresses instead. In 1950, Bentley wrote an article for Ebony magazine, "I Am Woman Again," in which she claimed that she was no longer a lesbian, having cured herself with hormone treatments. After two marriages to men (one of which was disputed by the bridegroom, J. T. Gibson), and two divorces, she went back to performing at the Rose Bowl in Hollywood. She also recorded a song on the Flame label and appeared twice on Groucho Marx's television show.

Bentley became a member of a church called the Temple of Love in Christ, Inc., and was preparing to become a minister; but she died, at age fifty-two, before she could be ordained.

Biography

Gladys Bentley was born 12 August 1907 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; her father was American-born, and her mother was a native of Trinidad. She left home to go to Harlem at age sixteen and became famous as a male impersonator during the 1920s. At the beginning of the Depression, she moved to California, where she continued her career as an entertainer during World War II; but in the postwar period her homoerotic act became less acceptable. She announced in 1950 that she had been “cured” of lesbianism, and she was married twice (to men). Both marriages ended in divorce, and Bentley then returned to performing; however, at the time of her death—in 1960, during a flu epidemic—she was planning to become a minister

COURTNEY JOHNSON

See also Homosexuality; House-Rent Parties; Jungle Alley; Smith, Bessie; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Bentley, Gladys. “I Am Woman Again.” Ebony, 1950.
- Bogus, Diane. “The Myth and Tradition of the Black Bulldagger.” In Dagger: On Butch Women, ed. Lily Burana Roxxie and Linnea Due. San Francisco, Calif.: Cleis, 1994.
- Garber, Eric. “A Spectacle in Color: The Gay and Lesbian Subculture of Jazz Age Harlem.” In Hidden From History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, ed. Martin Duberman, Martha Vicinus, and George Chauncey Jr. New York: Penguin, 1989.
- Mitchell, Carmen. “The Oppositional Lives of Gladys Bentley.” In The Greatest Taboo: Homosexuality in African American Communities, ed. Delroy Constantine-Simms. Los Angeles, Calif.: Alyson, 2000.

Bethune, Mary McLeod

Mary McLeod Bethune, educator, clubwoman, political appointee, and civil rights activist, believed in the power of education, the need for collective action, and political protest to gain social justice for African Americans. She was a major educational and political leader during the Harlem Renaissance. Through the institutions she founded and the posts she held, Bethune encouraged political activism and resistance to oppression. She struggled to make African American voices heard and to move black Americans from the sidelines to the center of American social, economic, and political life.

In an era of accommodation and a strong belief in industrial education, Bethune established the Daytona Normal and Industrial Institute for Negro Girls to provide a classic liberal arts education and to train young women for leadership. Through Daytona Institute Bethune became a role model in community activism—initiating outreach and cultural programs and setting up mission schools, community centers, reading rooms, summer schools, playgrounds, a hospital, a visiting-nurse service, and farmers’ institutes. She organized black voters to support a mayoral candidate who had come out against the Ku Klux Klan, and on election day she marshaled 500 eligible black voters who successfully challenged and undermined the Klan’s political dominance. This episode drew attention to the importance of the black vote, the power of collective action, and the use of the ballot as a political weapon.

Mary McLeod Bethune. (Library of Congress.)

As a member of the black women's club movement, Bethune further demonstrated the importance of collective action in advancing black people's interests. She herself was president of the Florida State Federation of Colored Women's Clubs, founder of the Southeastern Federation of Colored Women, and the Circle of Negro War Relief, and a lecturer for the Red Cross. Other black clubwomen opened the Home for Delinquent Girls in Ocala, Florida; supported the United States' involvement in World War I; began interracial organizations; actively addressed the problems of black workers; and took up the cause of world peace. As a two-term president (1924–1928) of the National Association of Colored Women (NACW), Bethune established its permanent national headquarters in Washington, D.C.; she saw this as a first step toward making NACW the official, authoritative female voice for the concerns of African Americans. The permanent headquarters gave NACW legitimacy, set it on an equal footing with similar white women's organizations, gave black women a place for making international contacts, and became the official archive of NACW. Bethune, who had gained recognition through her club work, became an adviser to two administrations—those of presidents Calvin Coolidge and Herbert Hoover—on African American educational issues through the National Child Welfare Commission.

In 1935, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Bethune as director of the Office of Minority Affairs in the National Youth Administration (NYA). This was the first federal office created for a black woman. In this position Bethune publicized New Deal programs to ensure participation by blacks and used NYA programs to empower African Americans politically. She diminished the control of local white administrators over programs and funds by persuading racially liberal federal administrators to appoint qualified African Americans to positions in which they could make decisions that directly affected black students. She ensured that black state administrators dispensed funds to black people and used those same administrators to build an autonomous national black field staff that reported directly to her. By creating a Special Negro Higher Education Fund, Bethune gained direct control over some $600,000 in New Deal funds that secured graduate training for African American students. Bethune also organized the "black cabinet" and used her position to arrange public conferences between civil rights activists and government officials; these conferences succeeded in putting civil rights on the national political agenda.

Personal political appointments made Bethune aware of how few African American women held decision-making positions. She soon concluded that black women should create a national coalition to effect political change; accordingly, she organized the National Council of Negro Women (NCNW) in 1935. This was an umbrella organization designed to give black women political visibility and power on the national level. Through its programs, NCNW encouraged independent action by African American women, taught self-reliance, and honed women's leadership skills. A significant portion of these programs was educative. Women investigated problems in their communities, analyzed political campaigns and party platforms, and became familiar with state constitutions and voting laws. They organized voter registration campaigns and mobilized women voters. They studied and publicized voting records and drew up and presented petitions. NCNW's programs made many black women astute political activists and lobbyists. As a result of the political education women gained through NCNW, ten of its members secured federal administrative and judicial posts between 1941 and 1946. Once in place, these women promoted legislation designed to improve conditions for the entire race, including laws against lynching and against the poll tax; and they fought for public health, equal education, and equal employment opportunities. Their politics addressed the everyday struggle for survival as well as movements intended to change power relationships. Through political education and collective action, NCNW compelled the government to recognize African American women's legitimate place in federal programs and taught black women how to effect long-term political change by giving them a voice in the national political arena.

Mary McLeod Bethune's impact was significant. She used education, clubs, government appointments, and collective action to change individual consciousness while organizing African Americans to fight collectively for the transformation of social, economic, and political institutions. She worked to improve African Americans' lives and to change the contours of American democracy. She used insight, determination, and persuasiveness to make African Americans more visible in American social, economic, and political life; and she continually fought for social justice for African Americans.

Biography

Mary Jane McLeod Bethune was born 10 July 1875 in Mayesville, South Carolina. She studied at Trinity Mission School in Mayesville; Scotia Seminary (later Barber-Scotia College) in Concord, North Carolina (1893); and Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, Illinois (1895). She taught at Trinity Mission School in Mayesville (1895); Haines Institute in Augusta, Georgia (1895–1896); Kendell Institute in Sumter, South Carolina (1897–1998); and Palatka Mission School in Palatka, Florida (1899–1903). She was founder and president of Daytona Normal and Industrial Institute for Negro Girls (1904–1923), later Bethune-Cookman College (1923–1942); Southeastern Federation of Colored Women's Clubs (1920); National Council of Negro Women (1935–1949); and the Mary McLeod Bethune Foundation (1953). Her government positions included the National Committee for Child Welfare (1924–1928); the Executive Committee of the National Youth Administration (1935); director of Minority Affairs of the National Youth Administration (1936–1943); special assistant to the secretary of war, for selection of candidates for the first officers candidate school for the Women's Army Corps (1942); and consultant to the San Francisco Conference on drawing up the charter for the United Nations (1945). Bethune received honorary degrees from Wilberforce University (1915), South Carolina State College (n.d.), Lincoln University (1935), Tuskegee Institute (1938), Howard University (1942), Wiley College (1943), Bennett College (1945), West Virginia State College (1947), and Rollins College (1949). She was affiliated with or held positions in the following: Association for the Study of Negro Life and History; International Longfellow Society (honorary president); Commission on Interracial Cooperation (vice president); National Council of Women of the United States (honorary president); Afro-American Life Insurance Company (vice president); Southern Conference for Human Welfare (vice president); Central Life Insurance Company (member of the board of directors, and president); National Association of Colored Women (president); Florida State Teachers Association (president); Florida State Federation of Colored Women's Clubs (president); Florida Council on Human Relations (state director); National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (member of the board of directors, and vice president); National Urban League (vice president); National Sharecroppers Fund (member of the board of directors);

Southern Conference Educational Fund (member of the board of directors); American Women's Volunteer Service (member of the board of directors); American Mother's Committee (member of the board of directors), Bethune-Volusia Beach (founder, treasurer). She was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Church, Women's Army for National Defense, National Commission on Christian Education, Council of Church Women, Social Service Commission of the Methodist Church, Americans for Democratic Action, National Civil Liberties Union, First Daytona Beach Housing Authority, American Council on African Education, National Committee on Atomic Information, and Good Neighbor Association. She received the Spingarn Medal (1935); Francis Drexel Award (1937), First Annual Youth City Award (1941), Thomas Jefferson Award (1942), Haitian Medal of Honor (1952), Haitian Star of Africa (1953), and Dorie Miller Award (1954). Her writings include contributions to What the Negro Wants; "Spiritual Autobiography"; columns in the Chicago Defender and the Pittsburgh Courier; articles in Journal of Negro History and Ebony; and editorials in Afro-American Woman and Women United, the official publications of the National Council of Negro Women. Bethune died in Daytona Beach, Florida, 18 May 1955.

JOYCE A. HANSON

See also Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 9—Washington, D.C.

Selected Works

- "The Adaptation of the History of the Negro to the Capacity of the Child." Journal of Negro History, 24(1), January 1939.
- "The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History: Its Contribution to Our Modern Life." Journal of Negro History, 20(4), October 1935.
- "Certain Inalienable Rights." In What the Negro Wants, ed. Rayford W. Logan. New York: Agathon, 1944. (Writings by Mary McLeod Bethune and others.)
- "Clarifying Our Vision with the Facts." Journal of Negro History, 23(1), January 1938.
- "My Last Will and Testament." Ebony, 18 September 1963.
- "The Negro in Retrospect and Prospect." Journal of Negro History, 35(1), January 1950.
- "The Torch Is Ours." Journal of Negro History, 36(1), January 1951.

“Spiritual Autobiography.” In American Spiritual Autobiographies: Fifteen Self-Portraits, ed. Louis Finkelstein. New York: Harper, 1948.

Further Reading

Brawley, Benjamin G. Negro Builders and Heroes. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1937.

Daniels, Sadie Iola. Women Builders. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1931.

Fleming, Shelia Y. The Answered Prayer to a Dream: Bethune-Cookman College, 1904–1994. Virginia Beach, Va.: Donning, 1995.

Giddings, Paula. When and Where I Enter: The Impact of Black Women on Race and Sex in America. New York: Bantam, 1984.

Hicks, Florence Johnson, ed. Mary McLeod Bethune: Her Own Words of Inspiration. Washington, D.C.: Nuclassics and Science, 1975.

Holt, Rackham. Mary McLeod Bethune. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.

Leffall, Delores C., and Janet L. Sims. “Mary McLeod Bethune: The Educator; also Including a Selected Annotated Bibliography.” Journal of Negro Education, 45(3), Summer 1976, pp. 342–359.

Lerner, Gerda, ed. Black Women in White America: A Documentary History. New York: Vintage, 1973.

McClusky, Audrey T. “Mary McLeod Bethune and the Education of Black Girls.” Sex Roles, 21(1–2), 1989.

———. “Multiple Consciousness in the Leadership of Mary McLeod Bethune.” NWSA Journal, 6(1), Spring 1994, pp. 69–81.

McCluskey, Audrey, and Elaine M. Smith, eds. Mary McLeod Bethune: Building a Better World—Essays and Selected Documents. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999.

Ovington, Mary White. Portraits in Color. New York: Viking, 1927.

Peare, Catherine Owen. Mary McLeod Bethune. New York: Vanguard, 1951.

Perkins, Carol O. “The Pragmatic Idealism of Mary McLeod Bethune.” Sage, Fall 1988, pp. 30–35.

Poole, Bernice Anderson. Mary McLeod Bethune, Educator. Los Angeles, Calif.: Melrose Square, 1994.

Ross, B. Joyce. “Mary McLeod Bethune and the National Youth Administration: A Case Study of Power Relationships in the Black Cabinet of FDR.” Journal of Negro History, 60(1), January 1975, pp. 1–28.

Sitkoff, Harvard. A New Deal for Blacks: The Emergence of Civil Rights as a National Issue—The Depression Decade. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Smith, Elaine M. “Mary McLeod Bethune and the National Youth Administration.” In Black Women in American History: The Twentieth Century, Vol. 4, ed. Darlene Clark Hine. New York: Carlson, 1990.

———. “Mary McLeod Bethune’s ‘Last Will and Testament’: A Legacy for Race Vindication.” Journal of Negro History, 84(1–4), Winter 1996, pp. 105–122.

Stern, Emma Gelders. Mary McLeod Bethune. New York: Knopf, 1957.

Birth of a Nation, The

The Birth of a Nation, D.W. Griffith’s controversial film, premiered on February 8, 1915, at Clune’s Auditorium in Los Angeles. It had cost a remarkable $110,000 to make, more than had ever been spent on a film, and it was a huge box-office success. At twelve reels, it was probably the longest and most impressive piece of filmmaking to date. In it, Griffith concentrated on storytelling and characterization, and this approach would come to dominate American filmmaking.

Released fifty years after Robert E. Lee’s surrender at Appomattox, The Birth of a Nation was Griffith’s attempt to present a history of the Civil War and Reconstruction. Griffith believed that, as a medium, film could be objective and was therefore well suited to history. He wrote at the time, with regard to the historical film, “There will be no opinions expressed. You will merely be present at the making of history” (Griffith 1915). But The Birth of a Nation was hardly objective. It was based on a novel, Thomas Dixon's The Clansman (1904), which had presented the Civil War and Reconstruction from the perspective of the Democratic Party, criticizing the radical Republicans for treating the South punitively after the war. Dixon was known to be a racist, and many people considered his novel racist propaganda. The Birth of a Nation would face the same accusation.

Scene from The Birth of a Nation. (Photofest.)

The Birth of a Nation depicts the radical Republicans of the North as villains who exploited freed slaves and used the freedmen's vote to disenfranchise and victimize white Southerners. To appeal to the viewers' emotions, Griffith chose to narrate these events not as an impersonal epic but rather as the story of two families: the Stonemans, who are liberal, abolitionist Northerners; and the Camerons, who are slaveholding Southerners living on a plantation. The cause of the rift between these two families, and between the North and the South, is clear. The first image in the film is a "tableau of a minister praying over manacled slaves to be auctioned in a town square"; and the accompanying intertitle states, "The bringing of the African to America planted the first seed of disunion," pointing to blacks as the primary threat to national unity. Through what Griffith called "historical facsimiles"—reenactments of historical events—we watch the destruction of the South at the hands of the newly enfranchised blacks. Again and again, the film shows the Civil War and Reconstruction as violations of the South, a point vividly dramatized by the attempted rape of one of the Cameron daughters by a black man. Ultimately, the nation is preserved by the union of the two families by marriage. But first, the threat from the African Americans must be contained. At the climax of the film, the Ku Klux Klan rides triumphantly through the town of Piedmont, South Carolina, signaling the defeat and ultimate eradication of African Americans there and in the world of the film. An intertitle reads, "The aftermath. At the sea's edge, the double honeymoon," and is followed by an image of the two couples: first, Margaret Cameron and Phil Stoneman; then, seated on a bluff overlooking the sea, Ben Cameron and Elsie Stoneman. The double wedding heals the breach between North and South.

From the outset, the blatant racism of The Birth of a Nation engendered controversy and aroused protests. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) sent out thousands of pamphlets to even the smallest towns in an effort to prevent the film from opening in New York, and blacks began a nationwide campaign against a movie that "few eyes had ever seen" (Cripps 1993, 52–53). Although the protests achieved limited success on the West Coast, where some of the most gruesome and violent scenes were cut from the film, The Birth of a Nation did open in New York, at the Liberty Theater. And despite the protests by blacks, whites flocked to see it in record numbers. In the press, the film was lauded as "the last word in picturemaking" (Vance 1915/1994) and as "the soul and spirit and flesh of the heart of your country's history, ripped from the past and brought quivering with all human emotion before your eyes" (Greene 1915/1994).

In writing about The Birth of a Nation, film scholars have long faced the problem of reconciling the film's overt racism and its impressive stylistic innovations. Critics have tended to address either race or aesthetics, but primarily the latter. Because Griffith is widely considered the father of American cinema, many critics have been reluctant to take up the question of race at all. But Taylor (1996) has argued that it is indefensible to disregard racism, because the film's ideology and form cannot be separated. Griffith uses lighting, framing, costumes, and camera angles to induce the spectator to look favorably on some characters and unfavorably on others. Because this film is focused on families, it actually has more in common with the popular genre of melodrama than with the discipline of history. Melodrama neatly divides the world into good and evil. In The Birth of a Nation, white women, the symbols of goodness and purity, are continually threatened by black and mulatto men, who are represented as dangerous. Furthermore, Lang (1994b) argues that with the depiction of Abraham Lincoln as "the Great Heart . . . even politics becomes 'familiarized'" (22). The family rift, the Civil War, must be resolved by the joining of the white Northern and Southern families in matrimony, in preparation for the "birth of the nation." According to White (1994), history is a mere pretext in this film, "the premise or occasion for developing a story whose values and meanings extend beyond the purview of any single social-historical moment" (214). Ultimately, if Griffith is to be considered the father of American cinema, then The Birth of a Nation is a constant reminder of its racist heritage.

ALISON LANDSBERG

See also Birth of a Race, The; Film; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

Further Reading

- Carter, Everett. "Cultural History Written With Lightning: The Significance of The Birth of a Nation." American Quarterly, 12, Fall 1960, pp. 347–357.
- Cripps, Thomas. "The Year of The Birth of a Nation." In Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1906–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Gish, Lillian, with Ann Pinchot. Lillian Gish: The Movies, Mr. Griffith, and Me. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1969.
- Greene, Ward. Review. Atlanta Journal, 7 December 1915. (Reprinted in Robert Lang, ed. The Birth of a Nation. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1994.)
- Griffith, D. W. "Five Dollar 'Movies' Prophesied." Editor, 24 April 1915.
- Lang, Robert, ed. The Birth of a Nation. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1994a.
- Lang, Robert. "History, Ideology, Narrative Form." In The Birth of a Nation, ed. Robert Lang. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1994b.
- May, Lary. Screening Out the Past. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Rogin, Michael. "'The Sword Became a Flashing Vision': D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation." Representations, 9, Winter 1985, pp. 150–195.
- Schickel, Richard. D. W. Griffith: An American Life. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.
- Taylor, Clyde. "The Re-Birth of the Aesthetic in Cinema." In The Birth of Whiteness: Race and the Emergence of U.S. Cinema, ed. Daniel Bernardi. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1996.
- Vance, Mark. Review. Variety, 12 March 1915. (Reprinted in Robert Lang, ed. The Birth of a Nation. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1994.)
- White, Mimi. "The Birth of a Nation: History as Pretext." In The Birth of a Nation, ed. Robert Lang. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1994.

Birth of a Race, The

The history of the silent film The Birth of a Race (1918) is bound up with that of a more famous film—D. W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation (1915). The Birth of a Nation was strikingly innovative in many ways and was widely praised as the best film of its day. However, it was also blatantly racist, portraying black and mulatto characters as villainous and the Ku Klux Klan as heroic. Black critics and intellectuals were outraged by The Birth of a Nation and even more outraged by its huge popularity. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) organized protests against it, and the backlash was so strong that Griffith filmed a prologue at Hampton Institute (or using footage from Hampton) to be included in future prints of the film (he had wanted to film the prologue at the Tuskegee Institute, but Booker T. Washington refused). Griffith's attempt at an apology seemed feeble and did not mollify the growing number of objectors, many of whom, including W. E. B. Du Bois and William Howard Taft, began to call for some other cinematic response.

Initially, the NAACP planned to spearhead the "official response" to Griffith's film. A consortium of artists, with financial backing from Carl Laemmle, the president of Universal Pictures, came together to film an adaptation of Washington's book Up From Slavery. From the beginning, however, there was discord. Blacks and whites had conflicting interests in the project, and there was disagreement over whether the film should be a work of art, a political statement, or a work for profit. Universal withdrew its financial support when the NAACP could not provide matching funds, and soon afterward the NAACP dropped out. The project was then taken over by Emmett Jay Scott. But Scott (who in 1917 was appointed a special assistant to the secretary of war) was more concerned about black Americans in the armed services than about responding to The Birth of a Nation; accordingly, the script was changed—as was the title, from Lincoln's Dream to, finally, The Birth of a Race. Scott decided not to rely on money from white-owned businesses; instead, he financed his production company by selling stock to more than 7,000 shareholders, most of them black.

At this point, the project was still supposedly a history of the black race. A later advertisement would claim that it was "[t]he true story of the Negro—his life in Africa, his transportation to America, his enslavement, his freedom, his achievements together with his past, present, and future relations to his white neighbor and to the world in which both live and labor." However, the demands of the investors changed the scope of the film, and Scott, owing to his concerns regarding World War I, moved the content more toward Judeo-Christian ideals and anti-German sentiments. Scott was eventually removed from the project, but not before directing most of the footage that appeared in the final cut. The final product, conceived by a committee and worked on by a variety of artists, was a series of loosely related vignettes associating biblical stories (the story of Noah, Moses freeing the slaves from Egypt, and the crucifixion of Jesus Christ) with events in American history (Christopher Columbus's discovery of the new world, Paul Revere's ride, and Reconstruction). The final two-thirds of the film focused on the problems faced by those involved in World War I, including a German immigrant family in the United States that was split by the conflict.

After three years of work, including numerous pauses in production caused by financial problems, The Birth of a Race was released in 1918. At the time of its release, it was considered a critical and popular failure, and it was a financial fiasco. The sudden jumps between eras and vignettes disoriented most audiences, who found the film sprawling and not always coherent. A review in Moving Picture World concluded, "The names of three men are given as the authors of the scenario. It will be a deed of charity not to reveal their identity nor the names of the members of the cast. All have well-earned reputations and are probably anxious to live down their connection with the entire affair."

The Birth of a Race quickly faded from the national consciousness and in fact was thought to be lost for many years, while The Birth of a Nation became one of the most noted and controversial films of all time. In the long run, however, The Birth of a Race proved to be effective. Although the final version was far removed from what had first been envisioned, this film demonstrated to black America that a distinct market existed for black cinema. Also, The Birth of a Race had a tremendous influence on young black filmmakers, encouraging Oscar Micheaux and two brothers, Noble and George Johnson, to widen their horizons. The Johnson brothers formed the Lincoln Motion Picture Company, which independently created and released films from 1916 to 1923.

In the early 1980s, a print of The Birth of a Race was discovered in Texas. Although (as of this writing) it has not been released to the public, several clips can be found on a DVD version of The Birth of a Nation, and some critics have seen it and evaluated it. In general, The Birth of a Race is still considered a salient moment in the evolution of black expression in cinema; but there is an undercurrent of objections. The main objection is that this film actually reinforces some unfortunate stereotypes. In certain passages, black subjectivity is linked to aggression, even prejudice; in the film's most famous scene, for instance, a black farmer and a white farmer, holding plows, fade into soldiers marching in uniform and carrying rifles. Nevertheless, the film does imply that the army is a force for integration. And although there may have been compromises, so that the film fell far short of the initial aspirations, The Birth of a Race did actively seek an alternative tradition, one more racially equitable than was suggested in The Birth of a Nation.

ANDREW HOWE

See also Birth of a Nation, The; Film; Johnson, Noble; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Micheaux, Oscar; Scott, Emmett Jay; World War I

Further Reading

- Cripps, Thomas. "The Birth of a Race Company: An Early Stride Toward a Black Cinema." Journal of Negro History, 59, 1974, pp. 38–50.
- Cripps, Thomas. "'The Birth of a Race': A Lost Film Rediscovered in Texas." Texas Humanist, 5, 1983, pp. 11–12.
- . "The Making of 'The Birth of a Race': The Emerging Politics of Identity in Silent Movies." In The Birth of Whiteness: Race and the Emergence of United States Cinema, ed. Daniel Bernardi. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1996.
- Leab, Daniel J. From Sambo to Superspade: The Black Experience in Motion Pictures. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
- Nestey, James R. Black Images in American Films, 1896–1954: The Interplay Between Civil Rights and Film Culture. Washington D.C.: American University Press, 1982.

Birthright

Birthright is T. S. Stribling's first novel with a southern setting. It was initially serialized in Century Magazine from October 1921 to April 1922, then published by the Century Company in New York in the spring of 1922. It was filmed twice by the famous black director Oscar Micheaux: in 1924 (as a silent movie) and 1939.

With Birthright, Stribling became a pioneer in the southern literary renaissance. The novel is characterized by a keen social consciousness, a sympathetic and empathetic portrayal of the black race, and a high degree of realism, and it was a new departure in the treatment of race relations by a white southerner. Stribling satirizes bigotry, hypocrisy, conventional thinking, and narrow-mindedness and accuses whites of dehumanizing blacks.

The similarities between his novel and Sinclair Lewis's Main Street (1920) were frequently pointed out by critics; in fact, Birthright was called "a Negro Main Street," a southern rendition of Lewis's novel.

Birthright presents the spiritual journey of an educated southern mulatto, Peter Siner, after he graduates from Harvard University and returns to his hometown, Hooker's Bend. Siner comes home with idealistic plans for the education of black children in town. However, his hopes soon turn into frustration and disillusionment. Stribling describes the plight of the young protagonist realistically and sympathetically, showing how Siner becomes a victim not only of white hatred and oppression but of the entire racist caste system in the South. Siner considers himself an "evangel of liberty" to the black people. However, both his "white blood" and his "white Harvard education" create an unbridgeable gap between him and his people. Birthright explores Siner's difficulties in his process of self-formation. Influenced by white standards, he is profoundly disturbed by what he sees as signs of the inferiority of his race: odor, uncleanliness, sexual promiscuity, and dishonesty. He suffers from what W. E. B. Du Bois called "double-consciousness." Siner feels ashamed of his own people in Niggertown, whose real trouble is that they have adopted the white man's estimate of them as worthless, immoral, and subhuman. Considering her immoral, he rejects the girl he loved. He temporarily finds a safe retreat in the library of a white patron, Captain Renfrew, his unacknowledged father, only to find out that Renfrew is a traditional southern racist.

However, Siner's spiritual journey ends with an affirmation of his blackness and acceptance of his people. He marries Cissie, who has just come out of jail and is pregnant with another man's child, and he leaves Niggertown to find work in the North. The ethics that he acquired in Harvard proved untenable in the odd morality of Niggertown; eventually, though, Siner outgrows "white ethics," rejects the notion of absolute morality, and embraces the idea that morals are relative and that they differ from one race to another. In the end, practicality wins out over idealism and altruism. Still, Siner retains some of his idealism: as he sets out for the North with his bride, he hopes to find there the equality and opportunity that turned out to be impossible in his southern hometown.

ASLI TEKINAY

See also Micheaux, Oscar; Stribling, Thomas Sigismund

Further Reading

- Becker, George J. "T. S. Stribling: Pattern in Black and White." American Quarterly, 4, Fall 1952.
- Cleghorn, Sarah N. "Review of Birthright by T. S. Stribling and White and Black by H. A. Shands." Nation, 26 April 1922.
- Durham, Frank. "The Reputed Demises of Uncle Tom or, the Treatment of the Negro in Fiction by White Southern Authors in the 1920s." Southern Literary Journal, 2, Spring 1970.
- Eckley, Wilton E. T. S. Stribling. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1975.
- Heywood, Brown. "Review of Birthright by T. S. Stribling." New York World, 29 March 1922.
- Piacentino, Edward J. "The Main Street Mode in Selected Minor Southern Novels of the 1920s." Sinclair Lewis Newsletter, 7–8, 1975–1976.
- . "'No More Treacly Sentimentalities': The Legacy of T. S. Stribling to the Southern Literary Renaissance." Southern Studies: An Interdisciplinary Journal of the South, 20, Spring 1981.

Black and Tan Clubs

Black and Tan clubs were nightclubs where African Americans and whites could be found socializing and listening to jazz. These clubs were always located in the predominantly black sections of towns, notably "Bronzeville" in Chicago and Harlem in New York. African Americans rarely entered white neighborhoods after dark, but young white enthusiasts and musicians could always venture to black neighborhoods for entertainment. So, in addition to an appreciation of jazz, there was a sense of excitement among the whites who came to these clubs, which were part of a culture of jazz, liquor, and race.

Though New Orleans is often considered the birthplace of jazz, Chicago emerged as its second home. During the period of black creativity known as the renaissance, Harlem became its third. These urban centers appealed to black musicians because in the South they were rarely allowed to play on the same stage as whites, and any social mixing of the races was even rarer. World War I and growing industry in the North around 1920 led to an exodus of African Americans northward, and jazz went with them. Prohibition and the temperance movement were also important factors in the development of the culture of the Black and Tan clubs. In 1920, the Eighteenth Amendment made illegal the manufacture, sale, and transport of alcoholic beverages. Its advocates had hoped that it would foster temperance; instead, trafficking in bootleg liquor became a profitable enterprise, and crime rates soared. The illegally run clubs that sold bootleg liquor were called speakeasies, and many of these were Black and Tans, with an interracial clientele and an interracial roster of entertainers.

There is no definitive explanation of how the name Black and Tan began, but there are at least two plausible origins. The first explanation is that the name was probably coined by some of the recent immigrants who controlled bootleg liquor during Prohibition and who would no doubt have kept abreast of happenings abroad. In Ireland, the “black and tans” were British officers who aided the Irish police in quelling the Irish Republican Army in 1920 and 1921; these officers wore a distinctive uniform: khaki coat, black trousers, and black cap. The gangsters in America, therefore, may have adopted “black and tan” as an apt description of the clubs’ clientele (if so, the term would have had wry connotations, since the “black and tans” in Ireland were notoriously brutal). The second explanation is that white Americans who came to the black neighborhoods were different from the whites who disavowed jazz and African American culture in general. “Tan,” then, would have been slang for whites who immersed themselves in black musical culture, pretending for a brief time that they belonged to the black community, and who were thus, in a sense, neither white nor black.

The most famous Black and Tan in Chicago was the Sunset Café, which was remodeled in 1937 and renamed the Grand Terrace Ballroom (it was designated a historic landmark in 1998). The Sunset Café was a host to the elite of jazz, including Earl “Fatha” Hines and Louis Armstrong. Another notable club was the Silver Frolics. The Black and Tan clubs of note in Harlem were Connie’s Inn, Small’s Paradise, and Barron Wilkin’s club; all three presented Ethel Waters, Count Basie, Thomas “Fats” Waller, and other famous figures. Many of these clubs were a training ground for aspiring jazz musicians—not only African Americans but also many young whites, particularly Jimmy Dorsey, Benny Goodman, and Bix Beiderbecke.

The Black and Tan clubs often seemed to symbolize racial harmony and testify to the universality of music. However, Langston Hughes noted in his autobiography, The Big Sea (1940), that “ordinary Negroes [did not] like the growing influx of whites in Harlem . . .

flooding the little cabarets and bars where formerly only colored people laughed and sang. . . . Thousands of whites came to Harlem night after night, thinking the Negroes loved to have them there.” To accommodate this influx, some Black and Tan clubs began to follow the example of the famous Cotton Club, which—despite being in Harlem and showcasing black entertainment—discouraged black patronage and catered exclusively to whites. Still, a large part of the appeal of the Black and Tans was the thrill of watching the people of Harlem in their own environment.

By the late 1950s, a few Black and Tans were still operating, but race relations in the United States were becoming increasingly strained, and hardly anyone, black or white, frequented these clubs. This was an ironic and sad end to an institution that had fostered jazz and had contributed, in its way, to improving relations between the races.

CANDICE LOVE

See also Cotton Club; Jazz; Nightclubs; Nightlife; Small’s Paradise

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux; Toronto: McGraw-Hill Ryerson, 1982.
- Erenberg, Lewis. Steppin’ Out: New York Nightlife and the Transformation of American Culture. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- Fisher, Rudolph. “The Caucasian Storms Harlem.” American Mercury, 11, 1927, 393–98.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of Black America, 1900–1968. New York: Random House, 1968.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Black and White

Black and White was a film project—an attempt to make a movie in the Soviet Union about the plight of African Americans in the United States. It exemplifies a growing interest among blacks during the 1930s in challenging American racism through communism and the international arena.

The project began in March 1932, when the American communist James A. Ford, acting for the Meschrabpom Film Corporation of the Workers International, recruited African American performers and intellectuals and created the Cooperating Committee for Production of a Soviet Film on Negro Life. The committee's sponsors included Whittaker Chambers, Malcolm Cowley, W. A. Domingo, Waldo Frank, and Rose McClendon; its corresponding secretary, Louise Thompson, organized the cast. (Meschrabpom gave the performers a salary and room and board in Moscow, but they had to pay for their own transportation.)

The diverse group that arrived at the Brooklyn Pier on 14 June 1932, to board the German ship Europa included, in addition to Thompson herself, the aspiring fiction writer Dorothy West (one of the youngest figures of the Harlem Renaissance); the journalists Henry Lee Moon and Theodore Poston of the Amsterdam News in New York; two social workers, Leonard Hill and Constance White; an art student from Hampton Institute, Mildred Jones; a pharmacist, Mollie Lewis; a postal clerk, Homer Smith (who had a degree in journalism); a salesman, Alan McKenzie (the only member of the Communist Party of the United States in the group); the writer Loren Miller (who was a friend of Langston Hughes and of Thompson); an agricultural worker, Laurence Alberga; an insurance clerk, Matthew Crawford; a paperhanger and house painter, Lloyd Patterson (who was a graduate of Hampton); a student at Howard University, Frank Montero; Juanita Lewis, who had sung with Hall Johnson's choir; Thurston McNairy Lewis; Katherine Jenkins, who was a tenant at Thompson's home; George Sample; and only two experienced actors: Sylvia Garner and Wayland Rudd (who had appeared in Scarlet Sister Mary and Porgy, respectively). At the last minute, Langston Hughes arrived, having agreed to help write the English dialogue for the screenplay.

During the voyage, the group studied the Russian language and some history but more often played cards, danced, and lounged on deck; Dorothy West wrote, in her letters home, about champagne parties and "congenial folks." A proposal to send a cable of support to Ada Wright, the mother of one of the Scottsboro boys, was voted down—a hint of differences between the more and less political members of the group.

On 25 June 1932, the group arrived in Leningrad (Saint Petersburg), by train from Berlin, to be greeted by representatives of Meschrabpom and a brass band playing the "Internationale"; the next day the cast members were warmly welcomed at Nikolayevski Station in Moscow, photographed, and taken to the luxurious Grand Hotel in a fleet of Buicks and Lincolns. The Soviet Union was like nowhere else these African Americans had ever known. Meschrabpom paid them 400 rubles a month each and provided ration books for shopping; Russians on crowded streetcars offered them seats; they were ushered to the front of every line; and they were guests of honor at receptions, museums, factories, and schools. "For all of us who experienced discrimination based on color in our own land, it was strange to find our color a badge of honor," Thompson (1968) recalled.

But the film itself was another matter. The German-born director Karl Yunghans found the cast inexperienced in acting and singing and uninformed about the black working class; furthermore, he himself spoke neither English nor Russian, and knew, in Langston Hughes's (1956) words, "nothing at all about race relations in Alabama, or labor unions, North, South or European." Worse, the screenplay—by a Soviet writer, in consultation with Lovett Fort-Whiteman, an African American communist who had emigrated to the Soviet Union in 1928—bore no resemblance to the sweeping history of the African American experience that the cast and their sponsors had expected. Instead, it was a fictional account of black steelworkers in Birmingham, Alabama, who try to organize a union, wrest power from their corrupt white bosses, and overcome racism and class antagonism by joining forces with oppressed white workers. This story may have expressed communist ideals, but it hardly reflected race relations in the South; Langston Hughes (1956) said it was "improbable to the point of ludicrousness."

The script had been approved by Comintern, and by the time Meschrabpom finally agreed to make revisions, the performers, bored by weeks of waiting and anxious about the film's prospects, had become edgy and quarrelsome. One woman (probably Sylvia Garner) fell in love with another (probably Constance White), was spurned, and attempted suicide; Thompson objected to the "embarrassing" behavior of Ted Poston and Thurston Lewis, who had romped naked in the river near Moscow's Park of Rest and Culture; and the political divisions became sharper as the group debated whether or not to attend a rally for the Scottsboro boys.

Meschrabpom rescheduled the filming for 15 August and took the cast to the Black Sea, at the invitation of the Theatrical Trade Unions, for sunbathing in Odessa and a cruise to Sebastopol and Yalta. But when the group returned to Odessa from the cruise, they found Henry Lee Moon, who had not accompanied them, waving an edition of the Paris Herald-Tribune with the headline "Soviet Calls Off Film on U.S. Negroes; Fear of American Reaction Cause," and "hell broke loose. Hysterics took place" (Hughes 1956).

Thompson, Hughes, and Loren Miller defended Meschrabpom; but Moon, Thurston Lewis, Leonard Hill, and Laurence Alberga considered Thompson gullible (they called her "Madame Moscow") and denounced Meschrabpom, the Soviet Union, and Joseph Stalin for selling out the black race under pressure from the United States. An American engineer, Colonel Hugh Cooper, was then overseeing the building of the important Dnieprostroi Dam, and one story was that he had threatened to end construction unless Black and White was stopped. Another story, reported by Homer Smith (1964), was that the project was canceled out of fear that the United States would withhold diplomatic recognition of the Soviet Union. An article in the Afro-American on 8 October 1932 offered a third reason: that the Soviet Union was courting American favor because it was threatened by Japan's aggression in Manchuria. The competing accounts were debated in the African American press for months. Moon and Poston published statements in the Amsterdam News, and Thompson and Hughes replied in The Crisis, International Literature, and the Daily Worker.

Nevertheless, the film project and the Soviet Union left an indelible imprint on the African American participants. Many cast members extended their visit: Hughes spent six months traveling around Central Asia on a writing assignment; Dorothy West and Mildred Jones stayed in Moscow for another year writing for an English-language newspaper; Lloyd Patterson married a Russian woman and settled there; Wayland Rudd stayed on to study singing, fencing, and dancing; Alan McKenzie accepted a job with Meschrabpom; and Homer Smith became a consultant at the central post office in Moscow and remained in the Soviet Union until 1947.

Even those who returned home immediately remained impressed. Matthew Crawford told his wife that the trip had converted him to socialism; Loren Miller wrote that "the Soviet Union is the best friend of the Negro and all oppressed people"; Louise Thompson announced in the Amsterdam News that "Russia today is the only country in the world that's really fit to live in"; and Henry Moon wrote in The Nation in 1934 that he had "never felt more at home among a people than among the Russians."

Note: Papers of Louise Thompson Patterson and Matthew Crawford are at Emory University in Atlanta. Documents related to the film project can also be found in the papers of Langston Hughes in the James Weldon Johnson Collection at the Beinecke Library at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut; and in the papers of Dorothy West at the Schlesinger Library at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

CLAIRE NEE NELSON

See also Amsterdam News; Communist Party; Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus; Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 5—Soviet Union; Frank, Waldo; McClendon, Rose; West, Dorothy

Further Reading

- Berry, Faith. Langston Hughes: Before and Beyond Harlem. Westport, Conn.: Lawrence Hill, 1983.
- El-Hai, Jack. "Black and White and Red." American Heritage, 42(3), 1991.
- Hughes, Langston. "Moscow and Me: A Noted American Writer Relates His Experiences." International Literature, 3, July 1933.
- . I Wonder as I Wander. New York: Hill & Wang, 1956.
- Kellner, Bruce. "Black and White." In The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1997.
- McDowell, Deborah E. "Conversations with Dorothy West." In The Harlem Renaissance Reexamined, ed. Victor A. Kramer. New York: AMS, 1987.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Smith, Homer. Black Man in Red Russia: A Memoir by Homer Smith. Chicago, Ill.: Johnson, 1964.
- Thompson, Louise. "The Soviet Film." Crisis, 40, February 1933.
- . "With Langston Hughes in the U.S.S.R." Freedomways, 8, Spring 1968.

Black Bohemia

Black bohemia, as both a place and a group of people, was a significant aspect of the Harlem Renaissance. Black bohemians were creative artists—the literati, intellectuals, writers, musicians, actors, and visual artists—who lived and worked in Harlem in the 1920s and created and critiqued the Harlem Renaissance. Black bohemians were also the political activists, nightclub owners, nightclub habitués, petty criminals, hustlers, and the other characters who defined and participated in the counterculture that flourished in Harlem during the decade or so following World War I.

“American bohemianism” refers to the men and women who turned their backs on conventional, bourgeois culture and values and instead embraced the “modern.” They repudiated the economic, political, social, and cultural conventions of their day in favor of the experimental, in art and aesthetics and in their personal beliefs and lifestyle. In the United States bohemian communities sprouted in most major cities among creative and educated young people, but the center of the movement was in New York City’s Greenwich Village. It grew out of a writers’ colony that settled there in the late nineteenth century and the early twentieth. By 1920, these writers had transformed a once dingy neighborhood into a district that epitomized the modern and avant-garde. Writers and artists congregated in its cafés and discussed aesthetics and politics with its radicals. They adopted the life of the “intellectual,” a new term coined by the political left that referred to people who supported themselves through careers in the arts or literature. Intellectuals belonged to the professional class (rather than the working class), but they generally were not men or women of wealth or social status. Indeed, a certain level of poverty usually went hand in hand with the intellectual or bohemian lifestyle.

Although bohemians might thumb their noses at most social conventions, Greenwich Village was about as segregated as other neighborhoods in New York during the early twentieth century, with no significant interaction between blacks and whites. However, a black bohemia developed, initially in the Tenderloin district, on the west side North of Greenwich Village and South of Times Square, and then—at about the turn of the century—in an area centered near West Fifty-third Street. The Tenderloin neighborhood had tenements, boardinghouses, theaters, hotels, and restaurants but also speakeasies, brothels, and gambling houses. Among the neighborhood’s pimps and prostitutes, and amid its loan sharking, gambling, and assorted vices, a community of writers, musicians, and entertainers emerged. Paul Laurence Dunbar and James Weldon Johnson lived in the Fifty-third Street area during the first decade of the twentieth century and described this early black bohemia and its habitués in two novels: Dunbar’s The Sport of the Gods (1902) and Johnson’s Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1912). Others who frequented these neighborhoods in the prewar period included the musicians and performers Bob Cole and John Rosamond Johnson, Will Marion Cook, Willie “the Lion” Smith, Jelly Roll Morton, and Scott Joplin. The Tenderloin district between Twenty-seventh and Fifty-third streets had clubs and restaurants; and Fifty-third Street itself was the site of the Marshall and Maceo hotels, both of which were operated by African Americans and served as gathering places for black artists, performers, and sports celebrities. Musicians and entertainers frequently gathered at the Marshall Hotel, among them James Reese Europe and his Clef Club Orchestra; the comedian-songwriters Bert Williams and George Walker; the musicians Willie “the Lion” Smith, Jelly Roll Morton, and Scott Joplin; and the heavyweight champion Jack Johnson. Black literati and artists mingled with white performers at the Marshall (which was across the street from the Clef Club); Diamond Jim Brady, Lillian Russell, Florenz Ziegfeld, and Anna Held often dined there.

By the outbreak of World War I, black bohemians had followed the rapidly growing black population into Harlem. A typical example is James Weldon Johnson: When he returned to New York in 1914 after an absence of eight years, he relocated from Fifty-third Street to 507 Edgecombe Avenue in Harlem. By the mid-1920s, Harlem was home to most of the creative artists associated with the Harlem Renaissance, as well as to major African American political and civil rights organizations, publications, and institutions. Although it lacked an African American university, Harlem supplanted Washington, D.C., and Atlanta as the center of African American intellectual life. Furthermore, among its tenements, apartment buildings, and brownstones, and amid its poverty and wealth, an African American bohemian community flourished. Harlem’s cafés and nightclubs nourished an artistic, intellectual lifestyle. Gatherings of artists, writers, critics, and political radicals debated aesthetics as well as politics and race.

Like their white counterparts, black bohemians embraced political and aesthetic beliefs and a lifestyle that put them in sharp contrast to both the previous generation and their more conventional contemporaries. However, connections between Harlem and Greenwich Village were limited. Radical politics led Claude McKay downtown from his home in Harlem.

The first poems that he published in the United States appeared in 1917 in Seven Arts and in 1918 in Frank Harris's Pearson's Magazine, two avant-garde literary journals. Then he linked up with Max Eastman and Crystal Eastman and the more political Liberator. In addition to publishing a number of poems and essays in Liberator, for six months in 1922 McKay coedited this radical journal with Herbert Gold. Although the relationship between McKay and Gold was occasionally stormy, McKay's radical politics, sympathy for the Bolshevik revolution, and free-spirited lifestyle fit well with the political radicalism of Greenwich Village. Jean Toomer, whose interests were more philosophical and aesthetic than political, also connected with the artistic community in the Village. During the time when Toomer was writing Cane, his main literary connections there were Waldo Frank and Frank's associates. Later, as Toomer entered a spiritual search that took him away from race and literature, the photographer Alfred Stieglitz and the artist Georgia O'Keeffe became his close friends.

Most of the interaction between the Village and Harlem was in the other direction. Legal and extralegal segregation, zoning laws, racism, homophobia, sexism, and resistance to conventional values linked black and white bohemians. Well before World War I black bohemia and the Tenderloin had become a playground for literary and visual artists, theater people, lesbians and gays, gangsters, and prostitutes of both races; and elite activities took place concurrently with what was generally regarded as vice. The privileged hobnobbed with the proletariat, and whites frequented black communities—although de jure and de facto segregation inhibited African Americans from making reciprocal jaunts to white neighborhoods. The law circumscribed black bohemia, and certain activities were relegated to within its circumference. By the 1920s, this activity had shifted to Harlem and had greatly accelerated. White thrill seekers joined white bohemians in the cabarets and nightclubs of Harlem.

The person most responsible for making Harlem a vogue was the author Carl Van Vechten, a product of the bohemia in Greenwich Village. Even before his best seller Nigger Heaven popularized Harlem as a playground, he had led groups of daring downtowners through Harlem's nightlife. To his credit, Van Vechten was sincerely interested in African American life and became a major promoter of African American music, art, literature, and theater. He also opened his home to African Americans. At the gatherings and parties in his apartment on Fifty-third Street black bohemians and intellectuals met and established contact with their white counterparts.

In the cabarets and parties of Harlem, the discouraged white youth of the "lost generation" mingled with the African American "encouraged youth"—Alain Locke's New Negroes. The former were the descendants of landed immigrants; the latter were the descendants of the African diaspora and constituted the first critical mass of educated blacks. The viewpoints of both groups had been affected by World War I, though in different ways: white young people lost their belief in humanity, whereas optimism and determination took root among black young people, who believed that their military service entitled them to the social and economic equality that their parents had waited for so patiently. One thing the two groups had in common was their commitment to art and modernity. Among the white writers were T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, Edith Wharton, Ernest Hemingway, Sinclair Lewis, Eugene O'Neill, Willa Cather, and F. Scott Fitzgerald. These authors produced a number of works critical of American life and society, and Eliot, Pound, Wharton, and Hemingway became expatriates in Europe. African American writers included Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen; Claude McKay, Wallace Thurman, James Weldon Johnson, Nella Larsen, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Zora Neale Hurston, and Rudolph Fisher. These black writers—and visual artists like Aaron Douglas and Augusta Savage—all met with white publishers at Van Vechten's apartment or at James Weldon Johnson's apartment in Harlem.

Harlem provided a sociopolitical milieu for black bohemia. It was home to a wide range of political ideologies, including the cultural nationalism exemplified by W. E. B. Du Bois, Marcus Garvey's "back to Africa" movement, Charles S. Johnson's sociology of racial advancement, the militant socialism of A. P. Randolph and The Messenger, and the radical racial politics of the African Blood Brotherhood. Harlem was also a place where the intelligentsia mingled with the criminal underground and frequented establishments owned by gangsters: the accoutrements of Prohibition allowed interracial socializing, and as in many major cities throughout the 1920s, blacks and whites transcended race, class, and gender.

Prohibition contributed the development of Harlem's black bohemia. Laws prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or exportation of alcohol spawned illegal sources of alcoholic drinks and entertainment, beyond the restraint of law and convention. Speakeasies flourished in urban centers nationwide, and Harlem was a hotbed of them. Organized crime provided the management and capital for many of Harlem's legal and illegal nightspots. The presence of criminals and the potential for violence, along with the relaxation of racial and sexual mores, added to the attractiveness of Harlem for both black and white bohemians.

Not all speakeasies were backstreet dives. Some evolved into legitimate nightclubs, but racketeers tended to retain their ownership of clubs that provided black entertainment for white patrons. Many of these establishments became venues for the rapidly evolving African American music scene. Black musical styles migrated to the North and merged to engender new forms. Clubs proliferated; they included Barron's Exclusive Club, Connie's Inn (where Thomas "Fats" Waller played piano for white customers), Connor's Club, Edmond's Cellar, Ed Small's Paradise, the Manhattan Casino on West 155th Street, and the renowned Cotton Club. The Cotton Club, owned by the white gangster Owney Madden, featured "café au lait" women; Cab Calloway and his band included in their repertoire compositions with titles like "Tall, Tan, Terrific" and "Copper Colored Gal of Mine," exemplifying the audience's preference for women of color as entertainers at such a club. Duke Ellington and his orchestra had a twelve-year association with the Cotton Club, during which Ellington popularized a sound called jungle music; this was the sound that white people slumming in Harlem wanted to hear, because it fulfilled their preconceived notion of blacks as exotic. The Cotton Club was on 133rd Street between Lenox and Seventh avenues, a strip known as "Jungle Alley." It was one of eleven clubs in the area.

The Cotton Club catered to a wealthy white clientele. Indeed, it was segregated: the only African Americans who gained admittance were the performers and a handful of black celebrities. Its major patrons were the white international "high bohemian" crowd who traveled to Harlem in their Stutzes and Daimlers and reportedly included Princess Violette Murat, Cecil Beaton (the British artist, designer, and photographer), Gertrude Vanderbilt Whitney (founder of the Whitney Museum of American Art in 1930), Otto Kahn, James J. Walker (mayor of New York from 1926 to 1932), Lady Mountbatten, Libby Holman, Michael Arlen (the British novelist and short-story writer), Beatrice Lillie (the Canadian-born actress), Harry K. Thaw (infamous for murdering the celebrated architect Stanford White), Muriel Draper, and Harold Lloyd (the silent film comedian).

As a result of this surge in the black population, and as a result of the productivity of black literati, artists, and entertainers, new cultural venues such as theaters and ballrooms emerged and contributed to the culture available to black bohemians. These included a number of theaters—the Roosevelt, Douglas, West End, Lincoln, and Lafayette—as well as Hurtig and Seamon's Burlesque (which later became the Apollo Theater), Keith's Alhambra, the Harlem Opera House, and Loew's Seventh Avenue. Ballrooms were inspired by the music of the jazz age; the three most renowned were the Savoy, Renaissance, and Alhambra.

Literary and artistic salons also emerged. A'Leia Walker held "invitation only" gatherings and soirées for writers, artists, entertainers, and statesmen in her mansion, twin town houses at 108–110 West 136th Street, generally referred to as the "Dark Tower" after Countee Cullen's column in Opportunity. This was an important meeting place for black and white artists and writers who came after dark, circumventing the segregation laws. There Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Countee Cullen, and many other black literati met successfully with Carl Van Vechten, Mabel Dodge, Nancy Cunard, and other influential white writers, publishers, and philanthropists. A block down the street was one of the better-known black bohemian institutions, "Niggerati Manor," a rooming house at 267 West 136th Street where Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, and Langston Hughes lived in the mid-1920s and held far more informal and interesting gatherings of young black writers and artists. A few blocks away Alexander Gumbly's studio on Fifth Avenue between 131st and 132nd streets was a place for frequent gatherings of black and white literati where bathtub gin and stronger intoxicants flowed and racial and gender lines blurred.

Like their white counterparts in Greenwich Village, the black bohemians embraced modernity and the counterculture. They were at war with their elders and the bourgeois leadership of the race, especially anyone who attempted to restrict their life and work by imposing racial, political, aesthetic, or sexual barriers. Like their counterparts downtown, they rejected conventional sexual morality and tended toward promiscuity and experimentation. Homosexuality and bisexuality were far more open in Harlem than in Greenwich Village; this may have been one reason for Van Vechten's attraction. Although few works focused specifically on homosexuality (Richard Bruce Nugent's short story of 1926, "Smoke, Lillies, and Jade," is a notable exception), many literary works and songs of the Harlem Renaissance contained references to homosexuality, and many of the people involved in the renaissance experimented with homosexuality or bisexuality.

Homosexuality among black bohemians, especially its appearance in their creative works, was one of the issues separating African American leadership from the movement. Political and intellectual leaders like W. E. B. Du Bois and even Alain Locke argued that too much sexuality of any sort, but especially homosexuality, in black art would reinforce negative white stereotypes of black sexuality and immorality, and harm the race politically. Most of the creative artists rejected this criticism, as well as any effort by the older generation to impose limits on the creative process. Langston Hughes expressed this rejection of the aesthetics and morality of conventional black leadership in 1926, in his essay "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." Also in 1926, the one-issue literary magazine Fire!! by Wallace Thurman and his black bohemian cohort reinforced the determination of young black intellectuals to move beyond the values and aesthetics of their elders.

The determination of black writers and artists to assert their independence from conventional values and leadership did not mean that black bohemians were apolitical. On the contrary, politics and political radicalism were at the center of the black bohemian experience. This was especially true during World War I and the immediate postwar period, when the Bolshevik revolution, the racial and social turmoil of the "red summer" of 1919, and the racial militancy associated with the "New Negro" and with Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association aroused unprecedented political excitement in Harlem. African American radical and political periodicals like The Messenger and Negro World joined more mainstream civil rights publications like The Crisis and Opportunity in publishing and promoting black creative arts. And although no single political viewpoint dominated black bohemia or the creative work of black bohemians, an essential part of their work was politics—generally radical politics. Claude McKay, with his connection to radicals in Greenwich Village and his reputed involvement in the Communist Party, is one example. Langston Hughes is another. Hughes, who seemed to eschew propagandistic art in his essay of 1926, nevertheless cited political differences, especially his refusal to write apolitical poetry, as a cause of his breakup with his patron, Charlotte Osgood Mason. In the 1930s, Hughes, like McKay before him, would travel to the Soviet Union, celebrate the Bolshevik revolution in his writings, and define himself as a "social poet."

Black bohemia was essential to the Harlem Renaissance. It provided a community in which black creative artists and intellectuals operated. Like all bohemian movements, it was characterized by a sense of independence from conventions and from outdated concepts and aesthetics, and it was in rebellion against traditional values and traditional leadership. It embraced modernity and rejected the bourgeois life and values of the previous generation.

ELIZABETH AMELIA HADLEY

GARY D. WINTZ

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Eastman, Crystal; Eastman, Max; Europe, James Reese; Fire!!; Frank, Waldo; Garvey, Marcus; Greenwich Village; Homosexuality; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Johnson, John Rosamond; Joplin, Scott; Liberator; Madden, Owen Vincent "Owney"; McKay, Claude; Morton, Jelly Roll; Nigger Heaven; Seven Arts; Smith, Willie "the Lion"; Tenderloin; Toomer, Jean; Van Vechten, Carl; Walker, A'Lelia; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"; other specific performers, writers, and artists; specific nightclubs

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1981.
- Chauncey, George. Gay New York: Gender, Urban Culture, and the Makings of the Gay Male World, 1890–1940. New York: Basic Books, 1994.
- Foley, Barbara. Spectres of 1919: Class and Nation in the Masking of the New Negro. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Hill and Wang—Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1997. (Originally published 1940.)
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1933.
- . Black Manhattan. New York: Atheneum, 1968. (First published 1930.)
- Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto—Negro New York, 1890–1930, 2nd ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.
- Ottley, Roi. New World A-Coming. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1968.

Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of Black America, 1900–1968. New York: Random House, 1968.

Stansell, Christ. American Moderns: Bohemian New York and the Creation of a New Century. New York: Holt, 2001.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995. (Reprint, 1996.)

Black History and Historiography

History and historiography were significant aspects of the Harlem Renaissance, along with artistic expression. The historical tradition among black Americans was informed by two parallel developments. First, black thinkers continued and refined “contributionism”—a late-nineteenth-century trend that emphasized African Americans as participants in and contributors to American life. Second, professional historical organizations and professionally trained historians emerged.

The contributionist tradition had flourished from about 1880 to 1900. Blacks used history as a marker of racial progress, and many “race histories” were published, including George Washington Williams’s History of the Negro Race (1883), William Alexander’s History of the Colored Race (1887), William Simmons’s Men of Mark: Eminent, Progressive, and Rising (1887), Joseph Wilson’s Black Phalanx (1890), Leila Amos Pendleton’s Narrative of the Negro (1903), and John Wesley Cromwell’s History of the American Negro (1915).

Another component of contributionism derived from the largely proto-professional projects of African American literary and historical societies. Early societies often merged the social, political, and intellectual agendas of the rising black middle class with “uplift”—the idea that, for blacks, respectability was a matter of social class and intellectual attainments. The interest in black history among the urban black elite is evident in early literary and historical societies, such as the Bethel Literary and Historical Association (1881, based in Washington, D.C.), the American Negro Academy (1897), and the Negro Society for Historical Research (1911, based in New York).

Bibliophiles were also important. One of the most accomplished collectors was Arthur A. Schomburg. He was born and educated in Puerto Rico, emigrated to the United States in 1891, and established himself as a collector of rare books and manuscripts on the African diaspora. Schomburg was an early proponent of teaching black history in colleges and universities; his widely quoted paper Racial Integrity (1913) was one of the first calls for a chair of black history in black colleges. Cognizant that historical work was becoming increasingly professional, Schomburg joined the American Negro Academy in 1914.

Contributionism was perhaps best expressed in Schomburg’s essay “The Negro Digs Up His Past” (1925), in Alain Locke’s The New Negro. This essay emphasizes history as a factor in group identity and describes the maturation of race history. Schomburg argues that the popularizers who simply listed blacks’ achievements have been replaced by true historians who present evidence systematically. Although he was critical of white racialists who attributed all of the world’s great accomplishments to Europeans, he also criticized “Ethiopian racialists,” who did much the same for blacks. Schomburg always sought the contributionist goal—history as a sustainer of group pride and identity—but he also believed in merging contributionism with newer objective, scientific models.

The second development, as noted above, was a professionalized milieu for black history and historians. In the late nineteenth century, American scholars began to move away from the notion of history as an avocation for gentlemen. Drawing on German historiography, which emphasized objectivity and the methods of the natural sciences, Americans created graduate programs in history—for instance, at Johns Hopkins, Wisconsin, Harvard, and Yale universities. The American Historical Association was founded in 1884, the American Historical Review in 1895, and the precursor of the Organization of American Historians in 1909.

Carter G. Woodson, the second African American to earn a Ph.D. in history from Harvard University, founded the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History (ASNLH) in 1915. He established the Journal of Negro History (JNH) the following year, and later Associated Publishers, the publishing arm of the ASNLH. For the first five years of JNH, most of its writers were contributionists. After World War I, J. Franklin Jameson, director of the Department of Historical Research at the Carnegie Institution of Washington, supported Woodson with a $25,000 grant from the Carnegie Foundation. As a direct result of that grant, Woodson received a $25,000 grant from the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial Fund, enabling him to hire several investigators who would be instrumental in recasting African American history.

Three investigators during the 1920s were Alrutheus Ambush Taylor, Charles Wesley, and Lorenzo Greene. Taylor had earned a degree in mathematics at the University of Michigan in 1916, and Woodson arranged for him to receive graduate training in history under Edward Channing at Harvard University in 1922. Taylor's studies The Negro in the Reconstruction of South Carolina (1924), The Negro in the Reconstruction of Virginia (1926), and "Negro Congressmen During Reconstruction" (in the Journal of Negro History) challenged the legend of the "tragic era"—John W. Burgess's and William Archibald Dunning's concept of Reconstruction as having been characterized by the political malfeasance and incompetence of blacks supported by the Republican Party. Wesley, a historian trained at Harvard, received his doctorate in 1925 and published his revised dissertation, Negro Labor in the United States, 1850–1925, in 1927. Also in 1927, Wesley joined Woodson's staff as a part-time investigator; later, he directed a survey on the African American church. Wesley himself was a minister in the African Methodist Church (AME) and wrote an early scholarly treatment of Bishop Richard Allen. Greene, a graduate of Howard University, joined ASNLH to work on a church research project. After that project ended, he wrote The Negro Wage Earner (1930); later, he wrote The Negro in Colonial New England (1942).

Woodson himself produced monographs and published the textbook The Negro in Our History (1922), one of the first scholarly treatments of the subject and one of the most widely circulated textbooks before John Hope Franklin's From Slavery to Freedom (1948). Monographs written or edited by Woodson included History of the Negro Church (1921); The Negro Professional Man and the Community (1924); Negro Orators and Orations (1925); Free Negro Heads of Families in the United States in 1830 (1925); Free Negro Owners of Slaves in the United States in 1830 (1925); The Mind of the Negro as Reflected in Letters Written During the Crisis, 1800–1860 (1926); and African Myths (1928).

In 1926, Woodson led the movement for "Negro History Week," to be observed in February (the month when Abraham Lincoln and the abolitionist Frederick Douglass were born). This week highlighted the work of ASNLH and promoted African American history in secondary schools. As ASNLH opened chapters in cities across the country, the annual celebrations of Negro history also extended to the larger white community.

Woodson spent considerable time collecting primary documents on the black experience—scouring black newspapers and maintaining ties with black churches, fraternal organizations, bibliophiles, and literary and historical associations. Printed notices appeared regularly in JNH, asking individuals who possessed documents to bring them to ASNLH's offices in Washington, D.C.

In addition to these community-based activities, Woodson had relied on grants from the Carnegie Foundation and the Social Science Research Committee. However, because he insisted on autonomy and refused to affiliate ASNLH with other black organizations, his foundation support eroded. A $25,000 three-year matching grant from the Rockefeller Foundation in 1930 was his last. Thereafter, he turned almost exclusively to the community. Woodson founded the Negro History Bulletin in 1937. Despite his contributions to professionalization, he never entirely abandoned contributionism and "uplift."

The emergence of a professional milieu for black history is surely one of the legacies of the Harlem Renaissance. In many ways, historiography, like the renaissance itself, was an outgrowth of migration, urbanization, and industrialization—factors in the rise of urban institutions, such as the black press and literary societies, that gave expression to cultural knowledge and pride. The study and preservation of history served much the same purpose, and it has continued to offer insights into American history.

STEPHEN G. HALL

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History; Greene, Lorenzo; New Negro, The; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Woodson, Carter G.

Further Reading

Franklin, John Hope. George Washington Williams: A Biography. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1985.

———. "On the Evolution of Scholarship in Afro-American Scholarship." In The State of Afro-American History: Past, Present and Future, ed. Darlene Clark Hine. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1986.

Goggin, Jacqueline. "Countering White Racist Scholarship: Carter G. Woodson and the Journal of Negro History." Journal of Negro History, 68, 1983, pp. 355–375.

———. "Carter G. Woodson and the Movement to Promote Black History, 1915–1950." Ph.D. diss., University of Rochester, 1986.

- . Carter G. Woodson: Life in Black History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993.
- Hall, Stephen G. "Alrutheus Ambush Taylor, Black Intellectualism, and the Remaking of Reconstruction Historiography, 1893–1954." UCLA Historical Journal, 16, 1996, pp. 39–60.
- Higham, John. History of Professional Scholarship in America. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983.
- Meier, August, and Elliott Rudwick. Black History and the Historical Profession, 1915–1980. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Moses, Wilson Jeremiah. Afrotopia: The Roots of African American Popular History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Sinnette, Elinor Des Verney. Arthur Alonso Schomburg: Black Bibliophile and Collector—A Biography. Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1989.
- Sinnette, Elinor Des Verney, et al. Black Bibliophiles and Collectors: Preservers of Black History. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1990.
- Walker, Clarence. Deromanticizing Black History: Critical Essays and Appraisals. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Wilson, Francille Rusan. "Racial Consciousness and Black Scholarship: Charles H. Wesley and the Consciousness of Negro Labor in the United States." Journal of Negro History, 81, 1996, pp. 72–88.

Black Manhattan

In Black Manhattan (1930), James Weldon Johnson intended to provide a history of blacks' progress in theater in New York. What resulted was much more: Johnson produced a history of blacks in New York from the time of its establishment as a colony in 1626 through its heyday at the height of the Harlem Renaissance. Black Manhattan is an interdisciplinary history that sets the theatrical successes and global fame of Harlem in the context of many complicated historical, political, and geographical trends up to 1930, the year of its publication. In broad strokes, this book also presents a very general history of blacks in America. Johnson traces Negro life in New York in order to describe how African Americans formed a thriving black community centered in Harlem.

In Black Manhattan, Johnson prefers description rather than depth, argument, or analysis, although his descriptions of events and performances are at times quite detailed. The ways that Johnson contextualizes his subject, however, indicate his belief that the condition and progress of Negro culture (to use the terminology of the time and of the text) in the United States relate directly to the struggle against violence and discrimination and the struggle for full citizenship—efforts that took myriad forms throughout American history. The list of historical facts begins with the settlement of New York as a colony in 1626, slavery under the Dutch, and the number of slaves and freedmen in the area at the time. Johnson describes major events in American and African American history and the involvement of black New Yorkers in these events. Among them are the establishment of free education in New York, the manumission and abolition movements, black publications, the colonization movement, New Yorkers and the Civil War, antiblack draft riots, blacks in the military in World War I and the attending antiblack violence, attacks against blacks in cities in 1919, and Marcus Garvey's movement. In relating this history, Johnson focuses on all aspects of performance that gave blacks fame (and sometimes notoriety) in New York, including theater, sports, club life, and music.

In developing the history of theatrical performance, Johnson loosely defines three phases in the development of Negro theater that he unceremoniously names according to their order: the "start of the Negro in American theater," the "middle theatrical period," and the "third theatrical period," which lasted from about 1918 through the 1920s. Johnson categorizes black American theater chronologically and only very informally according to content and trends in performance. Since the characteristics of each theatrical period have as much to do with the state of race relations in the nation and what audiences would accept as with artistic license, the development of black audiences and a broadly visible black cultural presence that accompanied the formation of the Harlem community was a key to the maturation of black theater. Geographical and community development greatly influenced the content and character of black theatrical performance. Thus the concept of "Harlem" as a place, an idea, and a cultural community facilitated artistry and complexity in black theater and influenced the way that Johnson was able to describe theater history. Without such an environment, consistent development and evaluation of theatrical content were only faintly possible.

The first phase, the "start," occurs very roughly between about 1820 and 1880. Although this period included a burgeoning club life that nurtured black artistic talent, it was characterized primarily by black minstrel performances, which were popularized fairly late in the nineteenth century. Several “all-Negro” companies, such as Lew Johnson’s Plantation Minstrel Company and the Georgia Minstrels, are described. This period is also sparsely punctuated with classical plays performed by the African Company at the African Grove Theater and the mainly international work of the actor Ira Aldridge.

The second or “middle” phase in black theater begins in the mid- to late nineteenth century. Musical revues and programs produced and performed by black artists dominated this period. Musical comedies by the famous Cole and Johnson, Williams and Walker, and Ernest Hogan are described. Other productions highlighted include The Octoroons, Oriental America, A Trip to Coontown, and Clorindy—The Origin of the Cakewalk.

The onset of the third theatrical phase was facilitated by what Johnson calls the “conquest of Harlem,” a process in which African American real estate developers and residents of New York initiated a complicated and challenging move involving houses to be bought and the surplus of apartments in upper Manhattan in the early 1900s. The “invasion” of this area was the beginning; by 1930, the neighborhood had become home to 200,000 blacks. The characteristics of the third theatrical period have mainly to do with the quantity, diversity, quality, and “seriousness” of the plays and revues.

In the final third of Black Manhattan (the last hundred pages or so), Johnson details the theatrical, artistic, and cultural developments of the 1920s. The large amount of theatrical and literary production described in these chapters makes it clear why this decade has been considered the high-water mark of the Harlem Renaissance. Theatrical events that, according to Johnson, changed the status of the Negro in American theater include a revival of Shuffle Along, All God’s Chillun Got Wings, The Emperer Jones, Porgy, and The Green Pastures. The emergence of a number of stars—Florence Mills, Charles Gilpin, Paul Robeson, Bill Robinson, and Ethel Waters, among others—is also described. Literary and poetic works and blacks’ efforts in the fine arts are described, along with major productions and plays.

Johnson directly links Harlem—its location, population, community, and history—to the advent of the black renaissance in literature and performance that occurred in the 1920s. He helps us understand why this period was called the Harlem Renaissance.

Black Manhattan is a narrative of struggle and accomplishment in which Johnson holds up the rich, diverse culture of this massive northern community of black American citizens for the world’s respect and admiration.

STEPHANIE L. BATISTE

See also Blacks in Theater; Emperor Jones, The; Gilpin, Charles; Green Pastures, The; Johnson, James Weldon; Mills, Florence; Porgy: Play; Robeson, Paul; Robinson, Bill “Bojangles”; Shuffle Along; Theater; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Continuum, 1998.
- Elam, Harry J., and David Krasner, eds. African-American Performance and Theater History: A Critical Reader. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Gottschild, Brenda Dixon. Waltzing in the Dark: African American Vaudeville and Race Politics in the Swing Era. New York: Palgrave, 2000.
- Hatch, James V. The Black Image on the American Stage: A Bibliography of Plays and Musicals, 1770–1970. New York: DBS, 1970.
- Horton, James, and Lois Horton. Hard Road to Freedom: The Story of African America. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York, Viking, 1968. (First published 1933.)
- . The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man. New York: Knopf, 1970.
- Krasner, David. Resistance, Parody, and Double Consciousness in African American Theatre, 1895–1910. New York: St. Martin’s, 1997.
- . A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre, Drama, and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.
- McKay, Claude. Harlem: Negro Metropolis. New York: Dutton, 1940.
- Price, Kenneth M., and Lawrence J. Oliver, eds. Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson. New York: G. K. Hall; London: Prentice Hall, 1997.
- Wilson, Sondra Kathryn, ed. The Selected Writings of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Woll, Allen. Dictionary of the Black Theatre: Broadway, Off-Broadway, and Selected Harlem Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

———. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Black Migration

See Great Migration; Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance

Black Opals

A small group of young black intellectuals and creative writers in Philadelphia published three issues of the literary journal Black Opals between the spring of 1927 and June 1928. Though it was only a short series, not a true magazine, it was part of a continuing discourse about what was considered the proper direction for blacks' writings.

In almost every good-sized American city at the time, groups of African American "culture nurturers" were supporting literary publications. In Boston, for example, the Quill Club launched the Saturday Evening Quill. Although many of these societies were more social than literary, the journals provided a sounding board for the work of writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Black Opals was one of the most promising of the Afro-American "little reviews" of the 1920s.

Led by the folklorist, civil rights activist, and educator Arthur Huff Fauset, the venture was originally intended as an outlet for students of the local high school as well as the Philadelphia Normal School, Temple University, and the University of Pennsylvania. It was established because of "the desire of older New Negroes to encourage younger members of the group who demonstrate talent and ambition."

The poet Langston Hughes and the writer Alain Locke lent their influence to the enterprise. Locke wrote "Hail, Philadelphia!" for the first issue in an attempt to close the gap between conservative and radical voices among black writers and scholars. (Arthur Fauset was basically conservative but was willing to present works of either side in his publication.) The first issue also carried three poems by Langston Hughes. The poets Nellie Bright and Mae V. Cowdery were among the other significant figures associated with Black Opals. Contributors to the later issues included the short-story writer Marieta Bonner; the writer Lewis Alexander; and Arthur Fauset's sister, the novelist Jessie Redmon Fauset, who was a former literary editor of W. E. B. Du Bois's periodical The Crisis. The poet Gwendolyn Bennett, who taught art at Howard University, was a guest editor of Black Opals. The journal exposed a growing reading public to these and other talented literary people.

Countee Cullen, who at that time was the new literary editor of Opportunity magazine, praised "some highly commendable material" in the first issue of Black Opals, especially two poems by Bright and Cowdery. Cullen also wrote that Black Opals "is a venture we should like to see sweeping the country." W. E. B. Du Bois wrote that he was happier with Black Opals than he had been with earlier efforts of black writers to publish a literary "little magazine."

The writers in Philadelphia planned to make Black Opals a quarterly, but, like other publications of its kind, it did not have sufficient support or a wide enough readership: the subscription list required that only 250 copies of each issue be printed. Black Opals ceased publication after the issue of June 1928, which had been prepared by an editorial board. Its presence, though brief, made the point that Harlem was not the sole locale of the black arts movement in the period after World War I.

KATHLEEN COLLINS

See also Bennett, Gwendolyn; Bonner, Marieta; Cowdery, Mae Virginia; Cullen, Countee; Fauset, Arthur Huff; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Harlem Renaissance in the United States: 6—Philadelphia; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain; Saturday Evening Quill

Further Reading

Daniel, Walter C. Black Journals of the United States. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Penguin, 1987.

Black Press

The black press flourished during the Harlem Renaissance. There were many reasons for its success. First, the massive increase in northern black urban populations as a result of the “great migration” of black southerners in the years beginning about 1915 provided northern black newspapers with a greatly expanded circulation. For example, the circulation of the Baltimore Afro-American rose from 19,200 a week in 1919 to 40,432 in 1930 (from its Baltimore and out-of-town editions). Other black newspapers saw similar increases in circulation. Second, the black migrants hungered for news about themselves and the communities they had moved to. Black newspapers, especially the Chicago Defender, Pittsburgh Courier, and Baltimore Afro-American, satisfied this hunger by offering intensive, often sensationalistic coverage of news relevant to black audiences. Third, increased circulation made the black press more attractive to advertisers who wanted blacks to purchase their products. Fourth, the increased wealth of black newspapers enabled these enterprises to upgrade their staffs and physical plants, provide a stronger institutional base for black journalists, and create outlets for the black essayists, poets, playwrights, and novelists of the Harlem Renaissance.

It is useful to consider what a black newspaper looked like in the era of the Harlem Renaissance, and the Baltimore Afro-American will serve as a representative example. The Afro-American typifies the black press of the Harlem Renaissance. It was the most widely circulated black newspaper on the East Coast, and it matched the Pittsburgh Courier and Chicago Defender in national impact. The Afro-American constantly crusaded for racial reform, especially in jobs, politics, housing, and education. These topics, as well as civil rights, black uplift, crime, sports, entertainment, and society news, dominated its pages.

A typical issue of the Afro-American in the 1920s was that of 24 April 1926. Its front page headlined the discovery of the body of the Reverend J. E. Fitchett, who had been a prominent black minister on the eastern shore of Maryland and had been missing for three months after being caught with the wife of a parishioner. The front page also carried an account of an interracial conference in Birmingham, Alabama, at which Will Alexander, chairman of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, called for an end to Jim Crow laws and an end to the occupation of Haiti. Also on the front page were stories dealing with a divorce suit, a conference of African Methodist Episcopal (AME) ministers, and two black students who had won Guggenheim fellowships.

Pages 2 and 3 contained news from Washington, D.C., and advertisements. The fourth, fifth, and sixth pages were the entertainment pages; they carried copious advertisements for motion picture and vaudeville theaters, dance halls, and cabarets in Baltimore that catered to blacks. Pages 7 and 8 were the sports pages; they dealt with Negro League baseball, black college baseball, boxing, tennis, and the Penn Relays track and field competition. Advertisements—mostly for cigars, clothing, and quack doctors—were also found on the sports pages. The ninth page was Baltimore society news. Page 10 was local Baltimore news, mostly having to do with crime.

Page 11 was the editorial page; this was the most serious section of the Afro-American. The editorials on 24 April commented on President Calvin Coolidge’s inaction concerning black disenfranchisement in the South; on the appointment of a black to the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor; and on Dartmouth College’s awarding of a prize for achievement in biology to Lowell Wormley, a black student. Also on the editorial page was the column of letters to the editor. Among them was one complaining about the Afro-American’s campaign for more black Republican patronage in the South. Another congratulated the newspaper for its championing of exploited black workers. A third described how conditions on Pennsylvania Avenue, the “main street of Black Baltimore,” were leading black youngsters to crime. Completing the editorial page were columns by Kelly Miller, a dean of Howard University; William N. Jones, city editor of the Afro-American; and Ralph Matthews Sr.

The rest of the Afro-American consisted of more society news from Baltimore; a magazine section, which featured the short stories “On the Rock” and “Home Made Goods”; and miscellaneous local news. Church news and announcements, a survey of local black business, court news, and the classified section filled the final pages.

The Chicago Defender and the Pittsburgh Courier—which were the chief national competitors of the Afro-American—tended to publish the same type of news, though with differing emphases and in different formats. On 24 April 1926, the Defender and the Courier both headlined stories of domestic scandals: the Defender reported that a police raid had caught a prominent black minister in bed with a nineteen-year-old woman; the Courier reported that a young black woman had shot and wounded a man who was pestering her with unwanted attentions. Both the Defender and the Courier, owing to their national status and reputation, carried more national news on their front pages than the Afro-American. Otherwise, however, the Defender and the Courier carried the same mixture as the Afro-American: local news—mostly about crime, reported as sensationally as possible; society; theater; and sports—and service features.

The editorial page was not as extensive in the Defender as in the Afro-American; the Defender had only one signed column, on health, whereas the Afro-American had three. The editorial page of the Courier was more like that in the Afro-American: the Courier carried two signed columns dealing with current issues, one by Walter White of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and the other by George Schuyler, who fancied himself a black H. L. Mencken. All three newspapers had congruent editorial ideologies, though in depth and breadth of editorial opinion the Afro-American was superior to the other two.

Black newspapers such as the Afro-American also covered and commented on national issues such as presidential elections, which they tried to influence by endorsing candidates; Marcus Garvey's movement; and the Harlem Renaissance.

Black voters were a growing force in the North, and black newspapers attempted to harness that force through endorsements for president. In 1924, for example, the Pittsburgh Courier and the Chicago Defender—both longtime supporters of the Republican Party—endorsed Calvin Coolidge (a Republican) over the candidate of the Democratic Party, John W. Davis. The Afro-American, however, broke with the two major parties by endorsing a third-party candidate, Robert La Follette, a Progressive, because he supported voting rights in the South and equal employment opportunity and specifically opposed the Ku Klux Klan, discrimination in the allocation of federal patronage, and lynching. The editors of the Afro-American felt that neither of the other two candidates had such an impressive record on black people's concerns. In the election, Coolidge won a landslide victory over Davis, and La Follette won no electoral votes at all (though he did win some 5 million popular votes). Its maverick endorsement of La Follette in 1924 cost the Afro-American influence and prestige in national black Republican circles.

In 1928, the Afro-American again broke from the pack and endorsed the Democratic candidate for president, Governor Alfred E. Smith of New York, whose record on race relations seemed more progressive than that of his Republican opponent, Herbert Hoover. Smith was the first Catholic to run for president, and the Afro-American believed that the religious bigotry he had experienced made him sensitive to the plight of other oppressed minorities. In this election, the Afro-American was not the only black newspaper to desert the Republican Party and support a Democratic candidate; it was joined by the Norfolk Journal and Guide, the Boston Guardian, and the Atlanta Independent. But the two largest black newspapers—the Chicago Defender and Pittsburgh Courier—remained in the Republican fold, as did New York Age and the New York Amsterdam News in Smith's home state. These newspapers questioned Smith's commitment to racial reform, since his running mate was a segregationist senator from Arkansas, Joseph T. Robinson. As in 1924, the endorsement of the Afro-American did its candidate no good: Smith was buried in Hoover's landslide victory. However, the Afro-American was no longer isolated in its independence from the Republican Party with regard to presidential endorsements.

The black press was ambivalent toward Marcus Garvey's movement. Garvey, a Jamaican printer and social activist, emigrated to the United States in 1916. The next year he founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), which was based in Harlem; by 1919, he had built the UNIA to a point where it claimed to have more than 2 million members. Though its membership figures may have been exaggerated, the UNIA and Garvey, its "provisional president," had become important forces in black America. The UNIA owned a newspaper, Negro World; owned an auditorium, Liberty Hall, which seated some 6,000 people; and operated several businesses, the most prominent of which was the Black Star Line, a steamship venture to promote trade between black America, Africa, and the world. Nothing like Garvey's movement had ever occurred in black America. For the first time a black advancement organization was gaining widespread support among the black masses, who hitherto had made their desires known only through migration.

Some black newspapers, such as the Courier and the Afro-American, initially supported Garvey's movement, believing that it was a positive influence in its emphasis on racial pride, solidarity, and enterprise, and that its goal of an independent, powerful Africa was a worthy one. Other newspapers, such as the Defender and New York Age, were harshly critical of Garvey. For example, New York Age ridiculed his plans for Africa, and the Chicago Defender—black America's leading newspaper—disparaged him. Moreover, the editor of the Defender, Robert S. Abbott, signed a letter to the U.S. attorney general, Harry Daugherty, asking him to investigate Garvey for mail fraud in connection with the sale of stock in the Black Star Line.

Garvey's black nationalism was more appealing to the black masses than the assimilationist doctrines expressed by the middle class through such organizations as the NAACP. Black newspapers such as the Afro-American, while supporting racial integration as an ultimate goal, advocated a kind of black nationalism, constantly calling for the creation of black businesses, the establishment of an independent black vote, and black control of institutions serving blacks. This position accounts for the benign treatment that Garvey received from some of these newspapers in the years preceding his trial for mail fraud. However, by the time the trial took place, the black press had pretty much broken with Garvey. This was probably because the middle-class owners of black newspapers wanted men like themselves to lead the masses—not a man like Marcus Garvey, whose flamboyance, bombast, and financial incompetence disturbed their sensibilities.

Black newspapers in major markets, such as the Afro-American, encouraged the outburst of literary and artistic creativity known as the Harlem Renaissance. In its feature pages, the Afro-American published poems and essays by Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, and Claude McKay. It also encouraged young black writers by publishing serials or short stories in its magazine section (in 1950, Nick Aaron Ford compiled and published a selection of these short stories). The Chicago Defender employed Langston Hughes, and George Schuyler—one of the leading columnists, essayists, novelists, and satirists of the era—wrote not only for the Pittsburgh Courier but also for A. Phillip Randolph and Chandler Owen's magazine The Messenger, which employed Wallace Thurman as well. Garvey's Negro World initially supported aspects of the Harlem Renaissance, though it turned against the renaissance from 1923 on, owing to its distaste for the more bohemian aspects of the renaissance.

Apart from the major-market black newspapers with a regional or nationwide circulation, it is not clear how, if at all, the Harlem Renaissance affected or was affected by the black press. Neither of the two main surveys of the black press in the hinterlands (Suggs 1983, 1996) mentions coverage or critiques of writers of the renaissance in black newspapers—although each survey discusses the development of these newspapers as businesses and their political and civil rights crusades. Presumably, these regional newspapers devoted some attention to the Harlem Renaissance, but the specific details are no longer known (much work needs to be done in this regard). The large-circulation black newspapers did publish some of the writers of the Harlem Renaissance, but their editorial attitude toward these writers is not clear. Presumably, given the middle-class orientation and sensibilities of the editors, the major black newspapers—especially the Afro-American—would not have looked favorably on such works as Carl Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven or Claude McKay's Home to Harlem, which offered explicit depictions of black life. These editors would have sided with W. E. B. Du Bois, who felt that black art should uplift black life and protest against racism, since their newspapers emphasized those points as well. (Again, though, much work needs to be done on this topic.)

As noted above, the major black newspapers such as the Afro-American, Defender, and Courier supported the Harlem Renaissance to some extent; and the black magazines The Crisis, Opportunity, The Messenger, and Fire!! supported it even more. The Crisis, the magazine of the NAACP, was edited by Du Bois and employed the novelist Jessie Fauset as its literary editor. Fauset encouraged and was one of the earliest publishers of Langston Hughes and Jean Toomer. Du Bois, who was a novelist himself, favored the promotion and publication of young black writers. In 1924, The Crisis began a literary contest, and in 1926, it published a symposium called "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?" Through such activities Du Bois and The Crisis hoped to determine the course of the Harlem Renaissance. However, with the publication in 1926 of Carl Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven and in 1928 of Claude McKay's Home to Harlem, Du Bois turned from a supporter to a critic of the renaissance. Though he was becoming more radical in his politics, Du Bois was culturally conservative, and both novels presented a slice of African American life that he felt should not be portrayed. Jessie Fauset, a leading supporter of the Harlem Renaissance, left The Crisis in 1927; with her departure, the magazine deemphasized coverage of this literary phenomenon.

Opportunity, the magazine of the Urban League, edited by Charles Spurgeon Johnson, helped to give birth to the Harlem Renaissance by sponsoring literary contests and prizes beginning in 1925. Among the winners were Sterling Brown, Arna Bontemps, Zora Neale Hurston, and Langston Hughes. Though Johnson is better known as a sociologist, he made a valuable contribution to the Harlem Renaissance by encouraging, publishing, and awarding prizes to some of the literary lights of that period.

The Messenger, a radical socialist magazine published by A. Phillip Randolph and Chandler Owen, also provided an outlet for writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Its most important contribution was

"These Colored United States," a series of articles it ran between 1923 and 1926, giving a panoramic view of black American communities at the time. Fire!!, which began publication in 1926, was the only periodical established and edited by members of the Harlem Renaissance. It was edited by Wallace Thurman, and its contributors and editors included Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, Aaron Douglas, Countee Cullen, and Arna Bontemps. Its unvarnished depictions of black life provoked extreme reactions in the black middle class and among black intellectuals; some loved it for its dedication to the truth, whereas others hated it for its sometimes unflattering portrayals of black life. Fire!! never gained enough financial support to be viable; it lasted for only a few issues.

Black newspapers were an integral resource for the black community of the Harlem Renaissance. Without the black press, that community would have been voiceless and powerless. It was black periodicals such as Opportunity, The Crisis, The Messenger, and Fire!! that provided the main print outlets for the poets, essayists, and novelists of the Harlem Renaissance. If not for black newspapers and magazines, the social, political, and cultural gains of the Harlem Renaissance would have been impossible.

HAYWARD "WOODY" FARRAR

See also Amsterdam News; Baltimore Afro-American; Chicago Defender; Crisis, The; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Crisis: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Fire!!; Garvey, Marcus; Garveyism; Harlem Renaissance: 1—Black Critics of; Journalists; Messenger, The; Miller, Kelly; Negro World; New York Age; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Party Politics; Pittsburgh Courier; Schuyler, George S.; Universal Negro Improvement Association; White, Walter; specific writers

Further Reading

- Baltimore Afro-American. 1919–1930.
 Buni, Andrew. Robert L. Vann of the Pittsburgh Courier. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1974.
 Chicago Defender. 1919–1930.
 Farrar, Hayward. The Baltimore Afro-American, 1892–1950. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1998.
 Ford, Nick A. Best Short Stories by Afro-American Writers 1925–1950. Boston: Meador Pub. Co. 1950.
 Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Mayberry. Propaganda and Aesthetics: The Literary Politics of Afro-American Magazines in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1940. (Reprint, New York: Arno, 1968.)

Kornweibel, Theodore Jr. No Crystal Stair: Black Life and The Messenger. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1975.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

———. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
New York Age. 1919–1928.

Osofsky, Gilbert. Harlem: The Making of a Ghetto. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.

Ottley, Roi. The Lonely Warrior: The Life and Times of Robert S. Abbott. Chicago, Ill.: Regnery, 1955.

Pittsburgh Courier. 1919–1930.

Pride, Armistead. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.

Stein, Judith. The World of Marcus Garvey: Race and Class in Modern Society. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1986.

Suggs, H. Lewis, ed. The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

Suggs, H. Lewis. P. B. Young, Newspaperman: Race, Politics, and Journalism in the New South. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1988.

Suggs, H. Lewis, ed. The Black Press in the Middle West, 1865–1985. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1996.

Vincent, Theodore G. Voices of a Black Nation: Political Journalism in the Harlem Renaissance. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World, 1973.

Vogel, Todd. The Black Press: New Literary and Historical Essays. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.

Weiss, Nancy J. The National Urban League, 1910–1940. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Wintz, Cary. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Wolseley, Roland E. The Black Press U.S.A. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1971.

Black Star Line

Black Star Line Steamship Corporation was founded in Harlem in June 1919 and lasted until 1922. It was established under the auspices of the Universal Negro

Black Star Line, certificate for one share, issued in November 1919. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Improvement Association (UNIA) and the stewardship of Marcus Garvey and was an integral part of Garvey's "back to Africa" program. The company was a manifestation of his desire to help blacks achieve economic independence and to give African migrants across the world a sense of unity.

With the enthusiastic participation of UNIA's membership, Garvey raised the money for this venture. Shares valued at $5 each were sold at UNIA meetings and through mailed circulars, traveling agents, and advertisements in the newspaper Negro World. Nearly $200,000 was raised in less than four months. Much of the capital came from the working poor of the Caribbean and the United States.

The available capital allowed Garvey to purchase a ship just months after Black Star's incorporation. The company's first vessel, the SS Yarmouth, which Garvey intended to rename the Frederick Douglass, set sail with an all-black crew on 31 October 1919. Thousands crowded the dock at 135th Street in Harlem to witness the event. However, the Yarmouth, which had transported coal in World War I, was in poor condition when the UNIA bought it for $165,000, and on its maiden voyage for Black Star, fears about poor equipment and a lack of proper insurance kept the ship's crew from venturing past the Twenty-third Street pier.

Two other ships joined the line in 1920: the SS Shadyside, and the steam yacht Kanawha, renamed SS Antonio Maceo. All three ships were commissioned to transport manufactured goods, raw materials, and produce for black businesses in North America, the Caribbean, and Africa. The backers hoped that the enterprise would allow African Americans to return to Africa and would also enable black people around the Atlantic to exchange goods and services. Unfortunately, in the autumn the Shadyside sank, after having provided only passenger travel on the Hudson River; and the Kanawha blew a boiler on its maiden voyage, killing a man onboard.

Mismanagement and expensive repairs severely disrupted the operations of the fleet. In February 1922, Garvey was indicted on charges of mail fraud related to promotional claims made for the Black Star Line during the company's sale of stock. Soon afterward he suspended company operations. Estimates of Black Star's losses were as high as $1.25 million. Garvey was eventually convicted of mail fraud in 1923 and imprisoned in 1925 as the Justice Department pursued legal action, bolstered by information from J. Edgar Hoover's Federal Bureau of Investigation (an organization that Garvey's supporters accused of sabotage). The government later commuted Garvey's sentence, only to deport him to Jamaica in November 1927.

The troubles of the Black Star Line were chronicled by two African American leaders—W. E. B. Du Bois and A. Philip Randolph—who cautioned black Americans about investing in schemes that required operational complexity but had no proper management. Still, Garvey was a respected advocate for African culture and progress. He believed that mass urban organization by African Americans in the North could provide the necessary wealth and unity to combat imperialism in Africa and discrimination in the United States. The Black Star Line was a symbol of unfulfilled potential during a period of dynamic change in Harlem.

R. JAKE SUDDERTH

See also Garvey, Marcus; Negro World; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

- Cronon, David E. Black Moses: The Story of Marcus Garvey and the United Universal Negro Improvement Association. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1969.
- Hill, Robert A., ed. The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1961.
- Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1966.

- Moses, Wilson J. The Golden Age of Black Nationalism, 1850–1925. Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1978.
- Redkey, Edwin S. Black Exodus, Black Nationalist, and Back-to-Africa Movements. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1969.
- Stein, Judith. The World of Marcus Garvey: Race and Class in Modern Society. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1986.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Black Swan Phonograph Company

Black Swan Phonograph Company was the first record label substantially owned and operated by African Americans. It advertised its product as “the only records made entirely by colored people,” though that claim was true only for the first year of its existence. The label was named after a nineteenth-century African American classical singer, Elizabeth Taylor Greenfield, who was known as the “black swan.” Its proprietor, Harry H. Pace, had been a banker and insurance executive in Memphis, Tennessee, when he met the bandleader and composer W. C. Handy around 1905. The two formed the Pace and Handy Music Publishing Company in 1907, with Pace managing the business, while Handy composed the music. They had only modest success until Handy’s “Saint Louis Blues” (1914), the first blues song published, was a national sensation. Business picked up, and they moved their operation to New York in 1918, considering themselves uniquely positioned to publish music by African American composers.

Immediately following World War I, recorded music became increasingly popular, and publishers and other businesspeople were scrambling to produce records. Equally important to Pace, a black entrepreneur in music, was the success of Okeh Records’ “race” recordings (music performed by blacks), particularly Mamie Smith’s two blues hits for the Okeh label in 1920. These records sold in the hundreds of thousands, especially among southern blacks, a fact not lost on the entire record industry, which had never seriously marketed to African Americans. Other white-owned labels rushed to follow Okeh’s lead, and Pace saw an opportunity to enter the field. In 1921, he severed his ties with W. C. Handy and opened the Pace Phonographic Company to produce records under the Black Swan label. After a difficult three-month search for a pressing plant (competition was fierce, and the problem was compounded by racism), he secured a deal and began to hire a staff. Pace lured away from Handy’s publishing firm Fletcher Henderson, to direct the musical operations, and the composer William Grant Still, as chief arranger. Serving on the board of directors of the upstart label were W. E. B. Du Bois and the African American real estate developer John E. Nail.

Harry Pace fundamentally agreed with many leaders of the Harlem Renaissance that the true future of African American music lay not in the “lower” folk idioms of blues and jazz but in classical genres. Black musicians would be seen as the equals of white Americans or Europeans on the concert stage, and black composers would demonstrate the value of black musical themes in works composed for orchestras and chamber and vocal ensembles. Thus Pace sought to build a varied catalog of light and serious classical music, as well as more popular dance bands and jazz and blues vocals. It is the jazz and blues recordings, however, that brought financial success and represent some of the most important documents of black popular music in New York during the early 1920s.

After a series of mediocre light classical recordings, the first important success for Black Swan came in the spring of 1921, when the black vaudeville and blues singer Ethel Waters recorded “Down Home Blues” and “Oh Daddy.” Waters, Henderson, and other Black Swan artists toured black vaudeville theaters as the Black Swan Troubadours in 1921 and early 1922, bringing increased attention to the label. The outstanding sales of its blues line suddenly put Black Swan on the same level as Columbia and Okeh in the “race records” market, and Pace began to expand his catalog to include more blues artists. Alberta Hunter, Trixie Smith, and Lucille Hegamin all had hits in 1921, presenting a problem for Pace—the need for more recording facilities. In April 1922, Pace entered a partnership with John Fletcher, a white businessman who had an interest in the struggling Olympic Records, and the team purchased Olympic’s former pressing plant. Also, the Olympic catalog, consisting exclusively of white popular and classical musicians, devolved to Black Swan Records.

With these moves, Pace’s company seemed the mirror image of white-owned labels that had ventured into recording black musicians and had begun to hire black staff members to produce their race records. Yet the company publicly maintained the image of an exclusively African American enterprise. Its advertisement in the Chicago Defender in February 1923 claimed that “[A]ll stockholders are Colored, all artists are Colored, all employees are Colored”; its black clientele, however, did not know that the company featured white bands such as Fred Smith’s Society Orchestra and Henderson’s Dance Orchestra.

Regardless, Pace attempted to fulfill his mission to record black concert artists, and in 1922 he began an opera series featuring African American singers including the soprano Antoinette Gaines of the Chicago Grand Opera. However, the blues and jazz recordings of Alberta Hunter, Trixie Smith, and other singers were actually the mainstay of the label, as there was simply no substantial market among its African American customers for classical music or the lighter popular fare performed by white and black acts. The true market for race records was to be found among southern black audiences, where there was no interest in classical forms. White-owned companies could unabashedly sell blues and jazz to these markets while retaining their white audiences by offering more familiar fare, an option not open to Pace.

This was not the only problem for Pace and Black Swan. By early 1923, the emergence of radio had devastated the young, fragile recording industry, leaving many companies struggling for survival. Moreover, the Columbia and Paramount labels had tremendous success with Bessie Smith and Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, respectively, and Paramount had lured Ethel Waters, Trixie Smith, and Alberta Hunter away from Black Swan with more lucrative contracts. Both Columbia and Paramount had hired African Americans to run their race records lines and had created their own rosters of prominent black musicians. By late fall 1923, Pace declared bankruptcy and leased his catalog to Paramount, which reissued the recordings by the black stars.

Many Black Swan artists, who had not achieved success, never recorded again. Pace left the music business altogether and served many years as president of the Supreme Liberty Life Insurance Company.

WILLIAM J. NANCARROW

See also Hegamin, Lucille; Henderson, Fletcher; Hunter, Alberta; Nail, John E.; Pace Phonographic Company; Rainey, Gertrude “Ma”; Saint Louis Blues; Smith, Mamie; Smith, Trixie; Still, William Grant; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

Allen, Walter C. Hendersonia: The Music of Fletcher Henderson and His Musicians: A Bio-Discography. Highland Park, N.J.: Walter C. Allen, 1973.

Thygesen, Helge, with Mark Berresford and Russ Shor. Black Swan: The Record Label of the Harlem Renaissance. Nottingham, England: VJM, 1996.

Waters, Ethel, with Samuel Charters. His Eye Is on the Sparrow. New York: Doubleday, and London: W. H. Allen, 1951.

Black Zionism

Black Zionism is the name given collectively to the movements among blacks of the diaspora for self-determination, economic independence, and cultural renewal. Since the mid-1960s, scholars in African American studies have used the term “diaspora,” borrowed from the Jewish tradition, to refer to the historical experience of blacks who were forcibly transferred from their African homelands to the new world by European slave traders. Despite significant differences, the African diaspora and the Jewish diaspora are both understood as exile from a lost ancestral homeland. With the advent of various nationalist movements in nineteenth-century Europe, Jewish leaders such as Theodor Herzl (1860–1904), Moses Hess (1812–1875), and Leo Pinsker (1821–1891) argued that Jews needed a sovereign state of their own in order to end centuries of oppression and restore ethnic pride and unity. These leaders were called Zionists, after a biblical name for the ancient kingdoms of Israel and Judea, which the legendary descendants of the Jews had lost to the Romans and other invaders in the first century after Christ. Herzl’s political tract The Jewish State (1896) and his astute leadership of the World Zionist Organization had a profound influence on the beliefs and practices of black leaders such as Edward Wilmot Blyden (1832–1912), W. E. B. Du Bois, and Marcus Garvey, who advocated various strategies for political and economic liberation and greater race consciousness in the African diaspora.

Since the beginning of slavery in the new world, there have been numerous efforts by individuals and groups to return slaves and free blacks to Africa. These efforts are based on a utopian belief that blacks and whites should live separately for the good of all concerned. Early instances of separatist organizing include the Free African Societies of the 1780s and Abraham Lincoln's emigration plan of 1862. After Reconstruction came to an untimely end with the Compromise of 1877, black leaders like Blyden and Bishop Henry M. Turner (1834–1915) of the African Methodist Episcopal Church abandoned the hope that blacks could ever achieve real equality as a minority group in a racist culture. In the years before World War I, these men and others raised funds, wrote propaganda, and founded steamship companies to encourage diaspora blacks to resettle in independent West African states such as Liberia, Sierra Leone, and the Gold Coast (Ghana).

In his pamphlet The Jewish Question (1898), Blyden commended Herzl's bold political vision and his tremendous influence among European Jews. He also called on Jews "to come . . . to the assistance of Ishmael in the higher work for Africa which Japheth, through a few struggling representatives, is laboring heroically under great disadvantages to carry out." Blyden's invocation of biblical metaphors was not only a strategy for reaching out to religious Jews but also part of the black Protestant tradition of mythologizing the diaspora with figures borrowed from scripture. John Gibbs St. Clair Drake (Washington 1984) has suggested that the Jewish patriarchs have had a distinct resonance for diaspora blacks, who, like the ancient Israelites, longed for both political deliverance and spiritual redemption: the spirituals and sermons of black churches, the jazz songs of Louis Armstrong, and the poetry of James Weldon Johnson and Paul Laurence Dunbar are full of allusions to the Hebrew Bible.

In the Harlem of the 1920s, one of Blyden's most ardent admirers, Marcus Garvey, led a second wave of black separatist activity that was especially popular with lower-class urban blacks who could not benefit from philanthropic initiatives like Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute. Garvey was born in Jamaica, where he founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) in 1914. He came to the United States in early 1916 and went on the lecture circuit, touring thirty-eight states before establishing a branch of the UNIA in Harlem that same year. Although he began by addressing the black elite, he soon took to the streets, where his gift for oratory drew great crowds. In Garvey's speeches, he extolled the virtues of the racially pure Negro and the superior achievements of ancient African civilization, claiming that whites had insidiously suppressed history and had taught diaspora blacks to hate their own bodies. He also announced the goals of the UNIA, which were to encourage stronger economic, political, and cultural ties between Africans around the world; to agitate against European colonization of the African continent; and to enact "back to Africa," a massive emigration and resettlement program. To further these goals, Garvey and other executives of the UNIA—including his second wife, Amy Jacques Garvey—established a merchant marine, the Black Star Line; a newspaper, Negro World; and a manufacturing chain, the Negro Factories Corporation, which was operated entirely by blacks.

The driving force behind the UNIA was Garvey's vision of a prosperous, proud, unified black people, a vision that has been called pan-Africanism. Representatives of the UNIA, many of them West Indians or native Africans, often spoke of the common ground of Garvey's pan-Africanism and Jewish Zionism. Because of his charismatic and often theatrical style of leadership, Garvey was nicknamed the "black Moses" (similarly, many Jews were inspired to describe Herzl in messianic terms).

Garvey's program, like that of the Jewish Zionists, had aesthetic as well as political and economic dimensions. The newspaper of the UNIA, Negro World, published many leading writers of the Harlem Renaissance, including Zora Neale Hurston, Claude McKay, and Alain Locke, as well as international figures like the Egyptian nationalist Duse Mohamed Ali. These writers contributed poetry, reviews, polemical essays, and journalistic sketches of Africa, all of which exhibited a general concern for promoting pan-African consciousness in the diaspora. Tony Martin has collected some of the best writing from Negro World, including articles by Garvey himself, as part of the New Marcus Garvey Library series.

Garvey's incendiary comments on racial matters and his mismanagement of the UNIA's business ventures often provoked the ire of political opponents such as W. E. B. Du Bois, the chief founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), whose own newspaper, The Crisis, was unsparing in its criticism of Garvey's movement. The story of Garvey's legal entanglements that led to his political demise can be read elsewhere. But it is important that Garvey and Du Bois, despite their mutual hatred, were both pan-Africanists who modeled some of their rhetorical and administrative strategies on the successes of Jewish Zionism. In fact, it was Du Bois who convened the first Pan-African Congress in Paris in 1919, a year before Garvey's own international gathering at Liberty Hall. Du Bois wrote many articles, pamphlets, and scholarly books about African culture and history, and eventually settled in Ghana as a distinguished citizen. In his essay "The Negro's Fatherland" (1917), Du Bois wrote, "The African movement means to us what the Zionist movement means to the Jews." As a committed socialist and a person of multiracial descent, Du Bois argued for the cooperation of whites and blacks in the struggle for basic human freedoms, yet he also insisted that group identity and the preservation of inherited traditions were essential to the continued progress of civilization.

Black Zionism never had much appeal for middle-class blacks of the 1920s and 1930s, who tended to favor either the pragmatic approach of Booker T. Washington or the policy of the Communist Party, "self-determination in the black belt"; however, its broad legacy extends through radicals of the 1960s like Malcolm X and the Black Panthers to contemporary pan-Africanists like Louis Farrakhan and Ntozake Shange. Furthermore, the Afrocentric aesthetic experiments of the cohort at Negro World, as well as similar experiments by writers like Langston Hughes and Richard Wright, were highly instrumental in shaping the black cultural revolution that is known today as the Harlem Renaissance.

DARYN GLASSBROOK

See also Black Star Line; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Negro World; Pan-Africanism; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

- Drachler, Jacob, ed. Black Homeland/Black Diaspora: Cross-Currents of the African Relationship. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat, 1975.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. The Dusk of Dawn: An Essay Toward an Autobiography of a Race Concept. New York: Schocken, 1968.
- . The World and Africa. Milwood, N.Y.: Kraus-Thomson, 1976.
- Hall, Raymond L. Black Separatism in the United States. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1978.
- Hill, Robert A. "Black Zionism: Marcus Garvey and the Jewish Question." In African Americans and Jews in the Twentieth Century: Studies in Convergence and Conflict, ed. Grant Franklin et al. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1998, pp. 40–53.

Lewis, Rupert, and Patrick Bryan, eds. Garvey: His Work and Impact. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World, 1991.

Lynch, Hollis R. Edward Wilmot Blyden, Pan-Negro Patriot, 1832–1912. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.

———, ed. Black Spokesman: Selected Published Writings of Edward Wilmot Blyden. New York: Humanities, 1971.

———. Selected Letters of Edward Wilmot Blyden. Milwood, N.Y.: KTO, 1977.

Martin, Tony, ed. African Fundamentalism: A Literary and Cultural Anthology of Garvey's Harlem Renaissance. New Marcus Garvey Library, 5. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1991.

Washington, Joseph R., Jr., ed. Jews in Black Perspectives: A Dialogue. Rutherford, N.J.:

Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1984. (Includes John Gibbs St. Clair Drake's "African Diaspora and Jewish Diaspora: Convergence and Divergence.")

Blackbirds

Blackbirds was the title of a series of musicals with all-black performers, produced and directed by Lew Leslie, a white former vaudevillian. The shows were presented from the late 1920s through the 1930s. They included singing, dancing, and blackface comedy skits and were a stepping-stone to greater fame for many of the featured performers. Blackbirds of 1928 was the most successful version of the series; it became the longest-running all-black show of its time.

Blackbirds of 1928, Poker scene from the stage production. (Billy Rose Theatre Collection, New York Public Library, New York City. Photographer: White Studio.)

As the manager of a cabaret at Café de Paris on Broadway in 1921, Lew Leslie (whose original name was Lev Lessinsky) was inspired by the success of Eubie Blake's and Noble Sissle's Shuffle Along, an all-black musical hit on Broadway. Leslie began to produce and direct successful all-black shows (Plantation Revue, From Dover to Dixie, and From Dixie to Broadway) at the Café de Paris, in Broadway theaters, and at venues in London and Paris. Leslie added Florence Mills from Shuffle Along to the cast of his shows, to great acclaim. The title of Leslie's Blackbirds series came from a popular song ("I'm a Little Black Bird") performed by Mills in From Dover to Dixie.

After a successful run in Harlem, Blackbirds of 1926 played to enthusiastic audiences in Paris and London. This production starred Florence Mills. Although her performance in Europe made her an international star, the show was the last before her death in 1927.

The most successful of Leslie's productions, Blackbirds of 1928, starred Adelaide Hall, replacing Mills. It also featured Bill "Bojangles" Robinson, whose dancing was a hit with audiences and critics alike. Other performers included Peg Leg Bates, a one-legged tap dancer. Famous songs from Blackbirds of 1928 included "Diga Diga Do," "I Can't Give You Anything but Love," and "Doing the New Low Down" (a dance number featuring Robinson). The singing and dancing were accompanied by stereotypical sketches such as the blackface poker skit "According to Hoyle." The show also offered parodies of novels and plays, including DuBose Heyward's Porgy, and it featured a tribute to Florence Mills sung by Adelaide Hall. Blackbirds of 1928 played on Broadway for 518 performances, the longest run for an all-black musical to that point.

The Blackbirds shows, like Leslie's earlier all-black productions, were intended for all-white audiences and were usually written by whites. The white audiences' stereotypes of blacks were reflected in formulaic numbers: plantation scenes, African primitives, black performers doing skits in blackface, and parodies of popular plays and novels, exploiting the novelty of all-black casts in versions of white works. It was typical at the time for whites to have artistic and financial control of Broadway shows with all-black casts. Despite the stereotypes and racism in the shows, though, many black performers appreciated the chance to appear in productions on the grand scale such as Florenz Ziegfeld's Follies.

Leslie never repeated the success he had with Blackbirds of 1928. Blackbirds of 1930, although it had music and lyrics by the African Americans Eubie Blake and Andy Razaf and starred Ethel Waters, played for only fifty-seven performances on Broadway. Blackbirds of 1933 played for only twenty-five performances on Broadway, and the critics said that the dancing of Bill Robinson, who was a guest performer, was the only redeeming feature of the show. Blackbirds of 1939 (the final edition) featured a newcomer, Lena Horne, but played on Broadway for only nine performances.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Blackface Performance; Blake, Eubie; Hall, Adelaide; Leslie, Lew; Mills, Florence; Musical Theater; Razaf, Andy; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Shuffle Along; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Green, Stanley. Ring Bells! Sing Songs!—Broadway Musicals of the 1930s. New York: Galahad, 1971.
- Krasner, David. A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre, Drama, and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- Moore, James Ross. "Leslie, Lew." In American National Biography, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Peterson, Bernard L. A Century of Musicals in Black and White: An Encyclopedia of Musical Stage Works By, About, or Involving African Americans. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- Woll, Allen. Dictionary of the Black Theatre: Broadway, Off-Broadway, and Selected Harlem Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- . Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Blackface Performance

Blackface performance emerged as a form of theatrical entertainment for American audiences who desired new and more enthralling pastimes. The early minstrel show consisted of white performers who mocked, with excessive exaggeration, the behavior of blacks. They adorned their faces with greasepaint or burnt cork to create a dark complexion; their lips were painted red, or a large, rounded white circle was left to intensify the exaggeratedly full lips and gaping mouth; the eyes were bulged. A costume of rags was added, for a more effective theatrical and comic reincarnation of the black slave. Blackface performances in the theaters of metropolises like New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago appealed to audiences partly because of the songs, dances, and comic repartee, but also because they reflected ideas about white superiority and class conflict.

Early blackface minstrel performances attracted audiences from among lower-class, middle-class, and upper-class American audiences and became very popular; this form of entertainment served as a common denominator. White audiences enjoyed the racial ambivalence of blackface performance, which reinforced not only white superiority but also black inferiority. The performances often included songs with lyrics extolling the South, dances accompanied by fiddles or banjos, and comic dialogues insisting that the black slave loved his master and plantation life. Often, the blackface roles included caricatures like Sambo, Jim Crow, and Zip Coon, whose songs, dances, and comic routines conveyed dubious interpretations of blackness as well as conflicting depictions of cultural exchange.

During the nineteenth century, some blackface productions offered literary works and new material. William Shakespeare's Othello was the blackface production most often performed on American stages; it was first presented in 1751 and was eventually performed more than 400 times. Other popular blackface productions included Samuel Woodworth's The Forest Rose; or, American Farmers (1825), which had 126 performances, and R. B. Peake's The One-Hundred-Pound Note (1827), which had 109 performances.

During the late 1820s and early 1830s, two main blackface roles were popularized: the first was a ragged, happy southern plantation hand eager to please and serve his master; the second was a black imitation or burlesque of the white dandy. In 1822, Charles Mathews, an English actor, based his one-man blackface act on these images; he also often used the black preacher as his main character. In 1828, Thomas Dartmouth Rice created "Jim Crow," a crippled plantation slave who sang and danced. By 1832, when Rice arrived in New York City after touring along the northeastern seaboard, he was a celebrity: Audiences were eager to see his act, and other performers tried to imitate him.

In the late 1830s, two new types of blackface performance emerged that changed the nature of this kind of theater. Whereas the stage figures Jim Crow and Zip Coon had relied on orchestral accompaniment, the redesigned acts included only the solo banjo or solo dancers. William Whitlock, known as the "king of banjo players," performed simply instrumental pieces or played a tune and sang. Whitlock and John Diamond, who was known Master Diamond and was noted for his skill at "Negro dancing," became one of the most popular blackface comedy teams during the early 1840s; this new form of entertainment became a favorite of white American audiences.

In 1843, blackface entertainment, also commonly known as minstrelsy, was changed forever by several factors. Faced with a financial crisis, the theaters in New York reduced ticket prices and performers' wages. Theatrical ensembles increased in size from duos to teams of three or four, which usually included a banjoist and two dancers. This form became more highly regarded with the success of the Tyrolese Family Ranier, who introduced a family quartet consisting of two women and two men.

Another change in blackface productions was the appearance of black performers, although this practice was not very common. Before the early 1840s, blacks did not legitimately perform on American stages for white audiences; however, they did on rare occasions appear in theaters exclusively for blacks. During the mid-1840s, William Henry Lane, known onstage as Master Juba, became the most renowned, and nearly the only, black performer to appear before white audiences. John Diamond, after being defeated by "Master Juba" in a dance competition in 1844, said that Lane was the best dancer he had ever seen.

In the 1850s, blackface performance became more controversial, and it was banned in some southern cities as issues related to slavery intensified. A financial crisis in 1858 and the onset of the Civil War in June 1861 marked a decline in public interest in blackface performance; however, this decline was temporary: interest revived as social and political unrest subsided. Some black minstrel troupes were formed in the midst of the Civil War, and such troupes became more common after 1865. At first, black minstrels did not usually wear blackface, but by the end of the nineteenth century, white audiences were demanding blackface even for black performers.

Although blacks became more widespread in blackface performance, whites still dominated the circuit for this kind of entertainment, as performers, managers, and owners. By the late 1870s, white minstrel groups had virtually cornered the market in the United States and abroad, although blacks were making great strides toward eliminating stereotypes and ambivalent interpretations of blackness onstage. Two successful shows—Clorindy (1898), which mainly featured a chorus line of female dancers, and Creole Show (1899), featuring well-dressed cakewalk teams—were instrumental in establishing new images. Vaudeville, introduced in the 1880s, also offered various opportunities for black performers, despite the fact that two vaudevilles existed, one for blacks and one for whites.

By the twentieth century, professional minstrel troupes were no longer a principal form of entertainment for American audiences. The Harlem Renaissance introduced new types of entertainment, including jazz and the blues; Dizzy Gillespie, Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, and Josephine Baker are just three of the performers who generated this transformation. Nevertheless, blackface performance had served as a foundation for black music and theater in the United States and across the world.

GENYNE HENRY BOSTON

See also Jim Crow; Minstrelsy

Further Reading

- Abrahams, Roger D. Singing the Master: The Emergence of African American Culture in the Plantation South. New York: Pantheon, 1992.
- Cockrell, Dale. Demons of Disorder: Early Blackface Minstrels and Their World. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Levine, Lawrence W. Black Culture and Black Consciousness: Afro-American Folk Thought from Slavery to Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Lhamon, William T. Raising Cain: Blackface Performance in Its Lore Cycle. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Lott, Eric. Love and Theft: Blackface Minstrelsy and the American Working Class. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Mahar, William J. Behind the Burnt Cork Mask: Early Blackface Minstrelsy and Antebellum American Popular Culture. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1999.
- Roach, Joseph. “Slave Spectacles and Tragic Octoroons: A Cultural Genealogy of Antebellum Performance.” Theater Survey, 33, November 1992, pp. 167–187.

- . Cities of the Dead: Circum Atlantic Performance. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.
- Rourke, Constance. American Humor: A Study of the National Character. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1986.

Blacks in Theater

Ideological constructions of African American identity (what the novelist Toni Morrison in our own time has called American Africanisms) were central in the development of American and African American theater long before black people made a collective effort to shape that theater through their artistic contributions. One source of American stage history is blackface minstrelsy, which probably began in the 1820s or 1830s with the song-and-dance routines of performers like T. D. Rice. Rice is said to have created the figure “Jim Crow” after seeing a lame black man dancing on the street in a southern city, possibly Lexington. The legend is that Rice assumed this street performer’s shabby clothes and dance steps, and with his own “Jump Jim Crow” humorously imitated and exaggerated them onstage. Thereafter, the stereotypical traits of this minstrel character—comical shiftlessness, laziness, and bumbling foolishness—became fixed in the American consciousness as defining characteristics of the American Negro. These perceived traits diminished black people’s humanity in the eyes of the nation. Still, the origins of minstrelsy in the cultural productions of enslaved African Americans—their song, dance, and music—gives credence to the designation of minstrelsy as the first authentic American theater form.

During the Harlem Renaissance, the works of “New Negro” performing artists and intellectuals were intended to inscribe on the national consciousness a new and more progressive image of blackness. Believing that social change and racial equality could be achieved through their contributions to the arts, including theater, New Negro artists considered drama a means of waging the struggle for self-determination and self-expression. Their theatrical performances and dramatic works were created in the shadow of minstrelsy. At the same time as mainstream theatrical depictions of African Americans continued to reflect and perpetuate the stereotypical images that had emerged from minstrelsy, the dramatists of the Harlem Renaissance, whose work was often staged in smaller, less commercial spaces, challenged these debasing notions about blacks.

During the early twentieth century, it was easy to discern the continuing presence of minstrel traditions in performances by African Americans in vaudeville and on Broadway. For example, George Walker and Bert Williams—who were thought of as being among the brightest Negro stars on Broadway—frequently depicted recognizable types from the minstrel stage. They billed themselves as “Two Real Coons”: Walker played a smooth, wily dandy, and Williams played a shuffling buffoon. Their talent for comedy made an impression on their audience, and they formed a company that made a successful transition from vaudeville and the minstrel stage to Broadway. The Williams and Walker Company included Jesse Ship, Alex Rogers, Will Marion Cook, and Walker’s wife, the dancer and choreographer Ada Overton Walker. They created a number of musical and comic revues that did well on Broadway, including In Dahomey (1902–1905), Abyssinia (1905–1907), and Bandana Land (1907–1909). Overton Walker choreographed all the shows, and her introduction of the cakewalk in the production of In Dahomey made the dance a sensation in both the United States and Europe.

Overton Walker felt that she was in a position to contribute to the dance concert stage. In 1908, she staked a claim for black performers’ participation in classical dance by choreographing a version of Salome from the 1907 production of Bandana Land and then reprising it at the Roof Garden Theater in 1912. In creating and performing a dance based on the biblical story of the seductress Salome, she joined a number of white female modern dancers who were choreographing similar pieces and who were seen as participating in a more serious classical dance tradition. Overton Walker’s tentative expansion of the vocabulary of black theatrical dance anticipated a greater shift in sensibilities in the mid-1920s. By 1925, Hemsley Winfield—one of the first men to attempt to dance the role of Salome—was involved in theatrical ventures in Yonkers, in Harlem with the Krigwa Players, and in Greenwich Village with the Provincetown Players; and Edna Guy began her studies with the Denishawn School of Dance in New York. These dancer-choreographers all had to contend with an assumption on the part of critics and audiences that black bodies were suitable only for performances of more exotic fare, such as African and Caribbean dance, or for vernacular dances that made use of jazz or blues.

Bert Williams himself faced obstacles when he wanted to take roles that strayed from the limited possibilities offered to blacks in the popular imagination.

After the Williams and Walker Company disbanded in 1909, Williams spent the next nine years with the Ziegfeld Follies, performing routines that showcased his mastery of comic timing and mimicry but repeated the sad-sack type he was known for on Broadway. Williams was a well-read man whose formal speech suggested considerable complexity beneath the simple types he depicted, but he found no other vehicles for his gifts for humor and mimicry. He famously remarked: “I have never been able to discover that there was anything disgraceful in being a colored man. But I have often found it inconvenient—in America.”

In the early years of the twentieth century, being a black performer in popular theater entailed other inconveniences in addition to the limited range of roles. The Theater Owners’ Booking Association (TOBA), also known as “Toby”—a consortium of forty theaters, mostly in the South—was one of several outlets for black entertainers and audiences in the 1910s and 1920s. But it was controlled primarily by whites, and performers said that TOBA stood for “tough on black asses” because their wages were low and unreliable and their acts were subject to unexpected cancellation. Moreover, as performers traveled through the segregated South, they often suffered the indignities of Jim Crow in transportation and housing. Other, smaller circuits existed, including the Dudley circuit, which was run by the African American producer and theater owner Sherman “S. H.” Dudley and operated from 1911 to 1916; and the Southern Consolidated Circuit (SCC), which operated from 1916 to 1925. After the demise of his own circuit, Dudley owned a controlling interest in the SCC. He attempted to provide an alternative for black performers by regulating hiring and payment practices and minimizing the corruption that characterized relations between performers and theatrical managers and agents. He also owned more than a dozen theaters and produced, wrote, and acted in several successful musicals.

Audiences in New York and around the United States showed an obvious and enduring interest in black musical and comedic performances. The Harlem Renaissance is noteworthy, however, for a groundswell of interest in serious African American drama. This shift in what American audiences were prepared to see in depictions of black life was marked by the success, in the autumn of 1917, of Emily Hapgood and Ridgely Torrence’s three one-act plays. At the Garden Street Theater, Hapgood produced Torrence’s The Rider of Dreams, a voodoo tragedy; Simon the Cyrenian, a passion play; and Granny Maumee, a comedy. The all-black casts enacted dignified characters that were the antithesis of the minstrel types mainstream audiences were accustomed to seeing onstage. The dignity of these roles made the productions notable, as did the critics' acclaim and the audience's positive response.

This landmark performance was followed by a number of other noteworthy dramatic performances by black actors. In 1920, Charles Gilpin captivated audiences in Eugene O'Neill's Emperor Jones. Gilpin played Brutus Jones, a con artist who becomes the emperor of an unnamed Caribbean island. Jones' subjects eventually discover his deception, and they pursue him to his death. Critics praised Gilpin for the magnetism and power of his performance; and the play eventually moved to Broadway, where it was a huge hit. Gilpin also toured the country, playing the lead in some 200 performances in more than thirty cities between 1921 and 1922. Gilpin's acting career had begun several years earlier, when he performed at the turn of the twentieth century as a singer and dancer. As his reputation grew, he was hired to start up Harlem's Lafayette Theater in December 1915. Gilpin left that position, however, and went on to play Rev. William Custis, an "old slave," in John Drinkwater's Abraham Lincoln on Broadway; he then took what would become his greatest role, Brutus Jones.

Paul Robeson, Gilpin's heir as the stage's great black dramatic actor, made his theatrical debut in Mary Hoyt Wilborg's Taboo (1921), and he was an understudy in Eubie Blake and Noble Sissle's pioneering musical Shuffle Along. But it was a revival of The Emperor Jones in 1924 that made Robeson's career—along with his star turn the same year in O'Neill's All God's Chillun Got Wings, which was also a sensation. All God's Chillun Got Wings examined miscegenation and costarred Mary Blair. After these performances, Robeson was offered roles in international and Broadway productions, including the Broadway revival of Oscar Hammerstein II and Jerome Kern's Show Boat in 1932. Robeson's rendition of "Ol' Man River" in Show Boat became a classic.

Other notable theater events included, in 1926, the Provincetown Players' production of In Abraham's Bosom, which won a Pulitzer Prize in 1927. The cast featured Rose McClendon, Abbie Mitchell, Frank Wilson, and Jules Bledsoe. Also in 1927, the Theater Guild produced Porgy, Dorothy and DuBose Heyward's adaptation of his novel of the same name. In 1930, at the end of the first decade of African Americans' participation in American legitimate theater, Marc Connelly's The Green Pastures—a play based on Roark

Bradford's tales of southern folk life, Old Man Adam and His Chillun—was produced. Richard Harrison, playing "De Lawd," led an all-black cast that included Rose McClendon, Frank Wilson, Georgette Harvey, Leigh Whipper, and Jack Carter; the Hall Johnson Choir also performed. The Green Pastures won the Pulitzer Prize and had one of the longest runs in the history of African American theater.

In addition to these successful stage productions, which were presented in both large and small spaces, there were one-act plays written and performed in more intimate venues that offered some of the most innovative work being done in the American theater at the time. Eugene O'Neill, for example, was one of three associate directors of the Provincetown Players, a theater company in Greenwich Village that produced his "Negro drama," which included The Emperor Jones and All God's Chillun Got Wings. O'Neill and his associates hoped to rejuvenate America theater by exploring contemporary topics and using native themes such as race. He, George Cram Cook, Susan Glaspell, and Edna St. Vincent Millay initiated the "little theater" movement, which grew out of the discontent of actors, writers, and directors with the obvious commercialism of large Broadway-style productions. Experimental theater companies like the Provincetown Players strove to create alternatives to the formulaic dramas and gaudy spectacles that they considered the primary fare of more commercial venues.

These collaborations between white writers, directors, and producers and black actors and musicians left a mixed legacy. Many of these plays won popular and critical acclaim, but they still conveyed deep-rooted racial attitudes and perpetuated stereotypes of black characters as inferior and primitive. Because they kept alive negative images of African Americans, the plays often received mixed reviews from black audiences and critics. At the same time, African American playwrights had to struggle to make their voices heard in a climate of hostility or indifference. Many black writers considered themselves lucky if a church or community group staged a reading, and it was improbable that their scripts would ever make the transition from page to stage.

For example, young playwrights like Zora Neale Hurston and Marieta Bonner would have gone unrecognized if not for the support of Negro journals such as Crisis and Opportunity. Hurston is more widely known as a novelist, but in 1925, her play Color Struck won second prize in the drama division in a contest run by Opportunity. This play had originally been published in Fire!!, a journal produced by younger, more radical members of Harlem's literary establishment, who wrote for a primarily black audience. Color Struck explores the issue of "colorism" in a black community in Florida, showing the damage done to a single black woman's consciousness by the community's assignment of privilege according to degrees of darkness and lightness of complexion. This play also features a cakewalk contest as a communal ritual, underscoring Hurston's interest in vernacular culture.

Marieta Bonner's plays were rarely if ever staged. She was most widely known as a short-story writer, but in 1927, she wrote three plays: Exit: An Illusion, The Pot Maker, and The Purple Flower. Both Exit: An Illusion and The Purple Flower won first prize for playwriting in a contest in Crisis that year. Bonner had graduated in 1922 from Radcliffe College, where she majored in comparative literature and became fluent in German. Her education introduced her to German expressionist drama of the 1920s, and her own plays reveal its influence. Like the German expressionists, Bonner wanted to expose social truths and shock society out of its complacency. In The Purple Flower, for example, Bonner relies on allegory more than realism to explore the themes of racial injustice and resistance. The play centers on a character, Old Man, who is a member of the "Us's," representative of African Americans, who are pitted against the more powerful and exploitative "Sundry White Devils." Old Man eventually realizes that his passive resistance to the injustices of the White Devils is misguided and that the only avenue to liberation is violence. The play ends with a call to revolution.

Bonner's abstraction of racial themes contrasted with a dominant trend toward realism among African American dramatists as they addressed social and political themes. The theatrical counterculture that the "little theaters" represented could be found in black circles as well. By the mid-1920s, every major urban center had an African American theater. Such theaters developed because members of the black middle class were seeking spaces for cultural expression and enrichment and were also contending with apparently entrenched racial segregation and even with interracial violence. Some of the best-known theaters were the Harlem Experimental Theatre, Lafayette Players, and Hapgood Players in New York; the Krigwa Theater of New York and Washington, D.C.; the Howard University Players Theater and Dunbar Players Theater of Washington, D.C.; the Ethiopian Art Theater and Folk Theater of Chicago; the Dunbar Theatre of Philadelphia; the Dixwell Players Theater of New Haven, Connecticut; and the Karamu House's Gilpin Players Theater in Cleveland. These spaces were situated in black communities and aimed their projects toward a black audience; they staged readings and presented plays and musicals by black playwrights.

The most influential African American theaters were the Lafayette in Harlem and the Ethiopian Art Theater in Chicago. The Lafayette opened in 1915 and for about ten years catered to a black audience, often staging plays from Broadway that had been altered to suit the tastes of this audience, and showcasing black casts in productions originally written for white actors. The Ethiopian Art Theater was founded in Chicago in 1923 by Raymond O'Neill and was sponsored by Sherwood Anderson's wife. The troupe made its debut in New York that same year at the Frazee Theatre with a series of plays that included Willis Richardson's The Chip Woman's Fortune, Oscar Wilde's Salome, and a jazz version of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors. As noted above, the group's production of Taboo, a study of voodoo by Mary Hoyt Wilborg, started Paul Robeson on the road to stardom.

Two other theaters are worthy of notice because they were affiliated with W. E. B. Du Bois and Alain Locke, who were leaders of the New Negro movement and important supporters and shapers of African American theater. Du Bois's Krigwa Players, who met in the basement of the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library in Harlem, had their inaugural season in 1926. In 1927, they produced two plays by Eulalie Spence (1894–1981): Her and Foreign Mail. Spence's plays were acclaimed by critics in the black press, but Spence encountered opposition from Du Bois because she refused to treat her art as propaganda. She did not believe that drama could compel white society to empathize with the victims of lynching and rape; instead, she tried to portray black life realistically. In Washington, D.C., Alain Locke and Montgomery Gregory organized the Howard University Players in order to cultivate African American drama. The Howard Players produced Simon the Cyrenian and The Emperor Jones in March 1921; in the latter play, Charles Gilpin and Jasper Deeter had the leading roles, and students filled the supporting roles. The Howard group also produced plays written by students in Howard University's drama department, as well as one-act plays by Thelma Duncan and Willis Richardson.

Du Bois and Locke were important in black theater during this period because they controlled the means of and possibilities for publication and production through their books (such as Locke's anthology The New Negro), journals (such as Crisis), and theater, which provided the primary venues for black playwrights. For this reason, Du Bois's belief in art as propaganda, Locke's insistence that authentic black drama must emphasize folk life, and their shared conviction that art can be an instrument of social change were prominent features of much drama written and produced during this era. This was particularly true of the community theaters that provided an alternative to large commercial Broadway spectacles. However, although both Du Bois and Locke believed that art could change society, Locke did resist the temptation to make art synonymous with propaganda, believing instead that the African American folk experience provided rich material for drama and gave voice to free and full self-expression. Locke was instrumental in developing black drama during this period. He attended Georgia Douglas Johnson's literary soirees at her home in Washington, D.C., and sponsored both her and Willis Richardson's plays, including Richardson's Mortgaged at Howard University in 1924. Locke reviewed and critiqued Georgia Johnson's and Richardson's plays and included Richardson's Compromise in The New Negro.

Du Bois's definition of "race drama" gave a nationalist dimension to the New Negro manifestation of the "little theater" movement. Referring to his Krigwa Little Theatre, Du Bois wrote in 1926 that African American theater must follow four principles: it should be "about us," that is, with plots about black life; "by us," written by African American authors who by birth, affiliation, or both had an understanding of what it meant to be black; "for us," catering primarily to black audiences; and "near us," in black neighborhoods.

New Negro dramatists tended to treat black folk culture seriously. They believed in art as propaganda, and they intended to provide alternatives to mainstream depictions of black primitivity, exoticism, and decadence. They also believed that small theaters producing work with black themes contributed more to black communities than large Broadway-style productions. In this sense, then, it would be incorrect to conclude that black dramatists were absent from the more commercial venues solely because they were unable to find a receptive audience there. They intentionally wrote one-act plays to be performed in churches, meeting halls, college theaters, and private homes.

Georgia Douglas Johnson and Willis Richardson—the most prolific playwrights of the 1920s—offer two models of dramatic creativity during the Harlem Renaissance. Although both lived in Washington, D.C., they were identified as artists of the renaissance, and their plays presented the characters' racial pride, resistance to oppression, and moral rectitude. Richardson joined luminaries such as Alain Locke, Jean Toomer, and Jessie Redmond Fauset at Johnson's weekly literary salon, which provided a fertile ground for black theater. Another source of nourishment was the existence of a solid black middle class in Washington; this middle class flourished because of the city's nonsegregated government jobs and excellent schools, including Howard University. Moreover, Washington's large black population provided a ready audience for non-musical drama.

Georgia Johnson published two books of poetry before 1925, but she mostly deferred her creative and professional ambitions in order to raise her family and help her husband, who was a lawyer in Washington. When her husband died in 1925, Georgia Johnson began to flourish artistically. In 1926, her play Blue Blood received an honorable mention in a contest in Opportunity; in 1927, her play Plumes took first prize in Opportunity's contest. Plumes introduces a mother, Charity Brown, who must decide whether to pay for an expensive operation for her daughter or bury the daughter in style; she is also torn between conventional medicine and her belief in herbalism. Ultimately, Charity's hesitation in deciding costs the daughter her life, and the mother buries the daughter in grand style. This play was produced twice in 1928, in Harlem and Chicago.

Willis Richardson studied drama, rhetoric, and English under the playwright Mary Burrill at the respected M Street High School in Washington, D.C. In 1923, his play The Chip Woman's Fortune was the first nonmusical drama by an African American to be produced on Broadway. He won the Crisis playwriting award twice, in 1925 and 1926.

Antilynching plays are an important subset of the serious dramatic productions written and performed during this period. From the mid-1910s through the 1920s, several antilynching plays by African Americans were produced. Dramatists such as Mary Burrill, Georgia Douglas Johnson, and Angelina Weld Grimké wrote in response to the mob violence that broke out in both southern and northern cities. They used realistic settings and characters and vernacular language to address social injustice. These women playwrights created strong female figures who had to contend with the effects of racial violence. Grimké's Rachel, the first full-length antilynching drama, was written and produced in 1916 in Washington, D.C., by the drama committee of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The play was taken up and performed in regional theaters as well, including the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York, and in Cambridge, Massachusetts. It recounts the decision of a sensitive, educated African American woman to forgo motherhood rather than bring children into a world where they would be hated and effaced. Rachel has learned that, before she was born, her father and older brother were lynched in the South; she realizes that black mothers cannot protect their loved ones, and she resolves to keep future generations of black children from the fate of being victimized by racial violence. The original title of Rachel was Blessed Are the Barren.

Georgia Douglas Johnson wrote three antilynching plays: A Sunday Morning in the South (1925), which was submitted to the Federal Theatre Project between 1935 and 1939 but was never produced or published; Blue Eyed Black Boy; and Safe. All three plays are sentimental, portray folk life, and make a plea for society to recognize the damage wrought by lynching.

Mary Burrill, Willis Richardson's drama teacher at the M Street High School, wrote two plays—Aftermath (1919) and They That Sit in Darkness (1919)—dealing with lynching and birth control. Both were published in journals: They That Sit in Darkness was published in the Birth Control Review in September 1919, and Aftermath in Liberator in April 1919. Du Bois's Krigwa Players produced Aftermath in 1928.

Although many of these productions received critical acclaim when they were produced in small regional theaters, and although race dramas by white playwrights were popular, black dramatists did not find an enthusiastic reception on Broadway. With the exception of some sketch writers and an occasional librettist for musical shows, black writers did not often have opportunities to create works for Broadway. From 1917 to 1930, fifteen playwrights presented works on the Broadway stage that dealt with African American themes and characters, but only five black playwrights found a stage for their plays about black life. When blacks did manage this feat, they were met with skepticism about the interest of a mainstream audience. Willis Richardson's The Chip Woman's Fortune did make the leap from "little theater" venues to Broadway. It was first produced by the Ethiopian Art

Theater in Chicago, eventually moved to Washington, then moved to the Lafayette Theater in New York, and finally—in May 1923—came to New York's Frazee Theater, where (as mentioned above) it became the first drama by an African American to be produced on Broadway. It was, however, a commercial failure, as was Frank Wilson's Meek Mose (1928). Garland Anderson's Appearances (1925), which focused on Christian Science, cannot strictly be called an African American drama. However, it was performed by a mixed cast of fourteen whites and three blacks, and a black actor played the principal character. Wallace Thurman's Harlem (1929), written in collaboration with William Jordan Rapp, a white man, was a melodramatic treatment of a family's attempt to survive after moving to Harlem from the South.

The few plays that reached the stage were often presented on the outskirts of Broadway, in neighborhoods that raised doubts about the respectability of the productions and their casts. However, the tremendous popularity of Shuffle Along caused producers to reconsider their attitude toward black productions.

Shuffle Along was by far the most popular musical among both white and black audiences during the Harlem Renaissance. Before it became a hit on Broadway, it had first been given for black audiences at the Howard University Theater in Washington, D.C., and at the Dunbar Theater in Philadelphia. In 1921, Shuffle Along opened at the Sixty-third Street Theater. This landmark production had music, lyrics, choreography, a cast, and a production that were entirely created, made up of, or controlled by African Americans. James Hubert (Eubie) Blake had collaborated with the lyricist Noble Sissle and the comedy duo Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles to write the music and dialogue for Shuffle Along. Blake and Sissle began their careers in vaudeville, performing ragtime, jazz, and sentimental melodies. Blake's "I'm Just Wild About Harry" and "Love Will Find a Way" were only two of the many songs from the show that became American standards, and the show was so popular that it ran continuously on Broadway until 1928. It also inaugurated the careers of Paul Robeson, Josephine Baker, and Florence Mills.

Shuffle Along takes place in "Jimtown," a fictional southern black city. The plot revolves around a mayoral election in which there are three candidates: Steve Jenkins and Sam Peck, the unscrupulous partners of a local grocery store; and Harry Walton, an honorable man whose love for Jessie Williams will go unrequited unless he wins the election, which he is expected to lose. This musical succeeded in striking an unlikely balance: it depicted black characters who had integrity while also appealing to audiences' nostalgia for minstrel humor. Shuffle Along had stock characters such as the "Uncle," actors performed in blackface, and the female dancers were dressed provocatively. Moreover, Miller and Lyles's comic routines used the racial humor that made their vaudeville routines so popular. But the show also had noble characters, attractive, well-dressed young people who spoke standard English, and a romantic black couple.

The audiences who flocked to Shuffle Along also attended other musicals, including Put and Take (1921); Strut Miss Lizzie, Plantation Revue, Oh Joy, Liza, and Runnin' Wild (1923); The Chocolate Dandies and Dixie to Broadway (1924); Lucky Sambo (1925); Blackbirds of 1926 and Blackbirds of 1928; and Africana (1927). These musicals introduced a number of talented performers and made many songs and dances created by African Americans popular with mainstream audiences. For example, Runnin' Wild introduced the Charleston to America and the world and helped to define the jazz age. Chocolate Dandies starred Josephine Baker and was a step in her path to international stardom. Florence Mills became a star in 1924 in From Dixie to Broadway and went on to even greater success in Lew Leslie's Blackbirds. Next to Baker, Mills was the most successful African American female performer of the 1920s. Mills was a protégée of Ada Overton, from whom she learned to cakewalk. She began performing in vaudeville as a child and later joined the Williams and Walker Company. Going by the names "Little Baby Flo," "Little Twinks," and "Little Blackbird," she became popular in numerous musical comedies. At the peak of her career (1921–1927) she appeared in Shuffle Along, Plantation Review, and Dover to Dixie (which was renamed Dixie to Broadway when it moved to Broadway). In 1926, she performed in Paris in La revue nègre, the cabaret act that made Josephine Baker a star. Mills's final performance was in Blackbirds of 1926, which opened at the Alhambra Theater in Harlem before touring Europe. Finally, Bill "Bojangles" Robinson dazzled audiences with his complex, improvisational footwork onstage and on the screen. He appeared in a number of Broadway shows including Brown Buddies (1930), Blackbirds of 1926 and 1933, and The Hot Mikado (1939).

The talent, ambition, and vision of African American playwrights, actors, dancers, composers, and musicians during the first decades of the twentieth century are indisputable. More debatable is their success in achieving the social change to which so many New Negro artists aspired. Nonetheless, the period was one of newfound freedom of artistic expression and creativity. It is a historical juncture that contributed much to the emergence of a new, more modern, and more progressive image of the African American as an artist and a human being.

DAPHNE LAMOTHE

See also Antilynching Crusade; Authors: 4—Playwrights; Blackface Performance; Community Theater; Crisis, The; Dance; Du Bois, W. E. B., Fire!!; Liberator; Literature: 3—Drama; Locke, Alain; Minstrelsy; Musical Theater; 135th Street Library; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Theater; Theater Owners' Booking Association; specific people, plays, theaters, and theater groups

Further Reading

- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre." Crisis, 32(3), July 1926.
- . "Criteria for Negro Art." Crisis, 32(6), October 1926.
- Krasner, David. A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre, Drama, and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
- McKay, Nellie. "Black Theatre and Drama in the 1920s: Years of Growing Pains." Massachusetts Review, 28(4), Winter 1987.
- Perkins, Kathy A., and Judith L. Stephens. Strange Fruit: Plays on Lynching by African American Women. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1991.)

Blake, Eubie

In a professional career that spanned more than eighty years, James Hubert (Eubie) Blake was celebrated, successful, and influential as a ragtime pianist, a vaudeville performer, a songwriter, and a composer of musicals. Blake wrote at least 300 compositions and also recorded hundreds of songs in arrangements for solo piano, small orchestras, and other configurations.

Blake was the only surviving child of two former slaves. When he was six, his parents bought him an organ and sent him to an instructor, hoping that he would take up religious music, but he was irresistibly drawn to the ragtime and popular music that he heard blaring from neighborhood brothels, nightclubs, and parades. His professional career began when he was fifteen, in a local brothel where he composed his ragtime masterpiece “Charleston Rag” in 1899. Blake’s early career as a ragtime pianist included playing in traveling shows and taverns in Baltimore and Atlantic City, New Jersey; in 1907, he worked in Baltimore’s prominent Goldfield Hotel. Blake was one of the first ragtime players to publish songs: In 1911, his “Chevy Chase” and “Fizz Water Rag” were printed as sheet music. In New York he encountered flashy, competitive ragtime pianists who inspired him to develop his own virtuosic style, characterized by syncopated right-hand figures, steadily descending bass lines, and—because of his unusually long fingers—extended octave runs.

“Charleston Rag” by Eubie Blake, c. 1917: a page of the composer’s manuscript. (Library of Congress.)

In 1915, Blake met the singer and lyricist Noble Sissle, with whom he would have a longtime partnership. Almost immediately, the two embarked on a series of collaborations that would bring them fame and fortune and make musical theater history. Their first song, “It’s All Your Fault” (1915), was popularized by the legendary vaudeville singer Sophie Tucker. Sissle was responsible for Blake’s move to New York in 1916 and his employment by the most famous black bandleader of the day, James Reese Europe. In 1919, Sissle and Blake formed a successful traveling vaudeville act, the Dixie Duo. They rejected the standard black-face makeup, ragged minstrel attire, and “comic ducky” behavior expected of African American performers. Wearing black tuxedos, the dapper Sissle and Blake presented a classy act that featured dynamic piano playing and singing of fresh, original material—with none of the usual stereotyped clowning, exaggerated dialect, or mugging. The Dixie Duo performed on the road, in Harlem, and at New York’s prestigious Palace Theater, and Blake and Sissle’s act was considered among the best of the 1920s and was widely imitated.

In 1921, Sissle and Blake collaborated with the comedy team Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles to produce the most acclaimed musical of the period, Shuffle Along. This has been widely described as a “Broadway show” that paved the way for a succession of black musicals on Broadway, but Shuffle Along actually had its very successful run (fourteen months, 500 or more performances) in a hastily refurbished lecture hall that opened as the Sixty-third Street Theater, far away from Broadway’s main entertainment district. Shuffle Along was also a hit on tour throughout the United States for three years after its New York run. Its unprecedented success and its mixture of lively dancing, hilarious comedy, charismatic actors, and appealing music set a standard for the style and format of future musicals, drew attention to all forms of black entertainment (especially in Harlem), and introduced stars like Florence Mills, Paul Robeson, and Josephine Baker. Shuffle Along had a number of songs by Sissle and Blake that became hits nationwide, including “Bandana Days,” “I’m Just Wild About Harry,” and “Love Will Find a Way.” Although syncopation was to remain a characteristic of Eubie Blake’s music, this show gave him an opportunity to turn from ragtime to composing slower ballads influenced by light opera; he did not compose rags again for over twenty years.

Blake and Sissle were the first African Americans to appear in a sound film: they performed two songs in De Forest Phonofilm (1923), which premiered in New York. They also wrote other musicals together—the mildly successful Chocolate Dandies (1924), for which Blake was also the conductor and music director; and unsuccessful remakes of their earlier hit Shuffle Along in 1933 and 1952. Shortly after a European tour of their vaudeville act in 1927, Sissle and Blake split up as a team, but on rare occasions thereafter they did collaborate on some projects.

Blake continued to write songs with other lyricists, as well as record and compose for shows. The revue Hot Rhythm (1930) featured his hit “Loving You the Way I Do.” He teamed up with the lyricist Andy Razaf and produced twenty-eight songs for Lew Leslie’s Blackbirds of 1930, which included several hit standards: one was “You’re Lucky to Me” (popularized by Louis Armstrong’s recording in 1930), and another was Blake’s most famous composition, the sentimental ballad “Memories of You.”

During the Depression, black Broadway musicals declined. Blake then formed a studio orchestra that made recordings, performed in plays, and appeared in the films Harlem Is Heaven and Pie, Pie Blackbird (both 1930). He became somewhat less active in the 1930s, but he and Razaf produced new music for Swing It! (1937, a show sponsored by the Works Progress Administration) and the revue Tan Manhattan (1940). A song from the latter, “I’ll Take a Nickel for a Dime,” became a standard in lounge acts after being featured by the singer Joe Williams in the 1950s.

During World War II, Blake headed a USO touring troupe and played at hospitals and military bases throughout the United States. In 1945, Blake—now a widower, and an avid ladies’ man—married for the second time; his new wife, Marion, became his business manager.

When his musical style was no longer in vogue and he was financially secure, Blake planned a quiet retirement. But he became bored by leisure and enrolled at New York University, where he studied the Shillinger system of musical composition between 1946 and 1950. In 1948, “I’m Just Wild About Harry” became a hit again (and introduced Blake’s name to a new generation) when Harry Truman used it as a presidential campaign theme song. Blake’s life changed unexpectedly and dramatically in the 1950s when a ragtime revival—inspired by the book They All Played Ragtime (1950)—focused attention on him as one of the style’s few remaining original figures. Suddenly he had a new career, performing (though sporadically), lecturing, recording, and giving interviews. Blake was now recognized as the elder statesman of ragtime.

In his seventies and eighties, Blake proved to be much more than a charming relic of a bygone era. In the late 1960s, he made several appearances that proved that he had lost none of his ability. He was still a technically adept and innovative pianist who practiced regularly and continued to develop new songs and creative ideas. Blake’s later style dazzled musicians and audiences alike. It featured dramatic chord flurries, syncopated right-hand melodies and runs, dynamic improvised breaks, and steady “wobble-wobble” bass lines; it represented an original and personalized blend of ragtime, show music, jazz, classical music, and Harlem stride piano.

Blake’s career reached even greater heights after the release of his recording The Eighty-six Years of Eubie Blake (1969, Columbia), which made him an international star during the 1970s. He was now featured on television talk shows, in newspapers and magazines, and at concert halls and music festivals around the world. He received numerous honors and awards from universities and social, civic, and professional organizations. In 1972, at age eighty-nine, he formed Eubie Blake Music (EBM), publishing music and producing records (mainly his own). A successful Broadway revue, Eubie! (1978), featured his music and focused even more attention on him. He maintained an active schedule of appearances until age ninety-eight. Blake died in 1983, five days after his hundredth birthday.

Blake left an important legacy. During his long, productive, and prosperous career, he had been an early ragtime virtuoso, a songwriter, a defiant vaudeville entertainer, and a trend-setting composer of musical shows. With his compositions, recordings, and performances, he transformed rags, classical pieces, marches, show music, ballads, and (rarely) blues into his own distinctive, dramatic syncopated style. Throughout his life he was a pioneer who influenced the direction, perception, and visibility of black entertainment and oversaw its leap into the American mainstream during and after the Harlem Renaissance.

Biography

James Hubert (Eubie) Blake, a pianist and composer in ragtime and musical theater, was born 7 February 1883 in Baltimore, Maryland. He studied music at New York University and received a bachelor of arts degree in 1950. He founded the music publishing and record company Eubie Blake Music (EBM) in 1972. Blake was a member of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP) and the American Federation of Musicians. His honors and awards include the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1981) and honorary doctorates from Brooklyn College

Blake, Eubie

(1973), Dartmouth College (1974), Morgan State University (1973), New England Conservatory of Music (1974), Pratt Institute (1975), and Rutgers University (1974). Blake died 12 February 1983 in Brooklyn, New York.

MICHAEL WHITE

See also Baker, Josephine; Blackbirds; Chocolate Dandies; Europe, James Reese; Lyles, Aubrey; Miller, Flournoy; Mills, Florence; Musical Theater; Razaf, Andy; Robeson, Paul; Shuffle Along; Sissle, Noble; Vaudeville

Selected Compositions

- "Bandana Days." 1921. (With Noble Sissle.)
"Charleston Rag." 1899. (Originally "Sounds of Africa.")
"Chevy Chase." 1911.
"Fizz Water." 1911.
"Gypsy Blues." 1921. (With Noble Sissle.)
"I'm Just Wild About Harry." 1921. (With Noble Sissle.)
"It's All Your Fault." 1915 (With Noble Sissle and E. Nelson.)
"Love Will Find a Way." 1921. (With Noble Sissle.)
"Memories of You." 1930. (With Andy Razaf.)
"Thinking of You." 1924. (With Noble Sissle.)
"You Were Meant for Me." 1922. (With Noble Sissle.)
"You're Lucky to Me." 1930. (With Andy Razaf.)

Musicals

- Blackbirds of 1930.* 1930.
The Chocolate Dandies. 1924.
Shuffle Along. 1921.
Swing It. 1937.
Tan Manhattan. 1940.

Selected Recordings

- The Eighty-six Years of Eubie Blake* (Columbia: C2S847, 1969)
Memories of You (from Rare Piano Rolls; Biograph: BCD 112 DDD, 1990)
The Wizard of Ragtime Piano (Twentieth-Century Fox, 20CF 3003, 1958)

Further Reading

- Blesh, Rudi, and Harriet Janis. They All Played Ragtime. New York: Oak, 1971.

Carter, Lawrence T. Eubie Blake: Keys of Memory. Detroit, Mich.: Balamp, 1979.

Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Spreadin' Rhythm Around: Black Popular Songwriters, 1880–1930. New York: Schirmer, 1998.

Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Black Bottom Stomp: Eight Masters of Ragtime and Early Jazz. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Levin, Floyd. Classic Jazz. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

Rose, Al. Eubie Blake. New York: Schirmer, 1979.

Shaw, Arnold. Black Popular Music in America. New York: Schirmer, 1986.

Waldo, Terry. This Is Ragtime. New York: Da Capo, 1991.

Bledsoe, Jules

For two decades, Jules Bledsoe was the most famous African American singer of classical music, as well as an actor and composer. He made his professional singing debut on April 20, 1924, at Aeolian Hall in New York City, performing the music of Bach, Brahms, Handel, and Purcell, then began a career performing on concert stages throughout the United States and Europe. A baritone with a wide range, he sang evocatively in several languages. He performed with some of the leading orchestras of the day, including the Boston Symphony (1926) and the British Broadcast Company Symphony in London (1936). In 1931, he presented a program at Carnegie Hall. Bledsoe was also a talented actor, receiving critical praise for his role as Tizan, the Voodoo King, in W. Frank Harling's opera Deep River (1926), the first opera performed in the United States with a racially mixed cast. Bledsoe performed in Giuseppe Verdi's opera Aida with the Cleveland Stadium Opera in 1932, with the Chicago Opera Company in 1933, and with the Cosmopolitan Opera Company in New York in 1934; and he sang the leading role in the opera The Emperor Jones by Louis Gruenberg in 1934.

Bledsoe is perhaps best known for creating the role of Joe in Jerome Kern's musical Show Boat, in which he sang "Ol' Man River." Kern had conceived the character and written the song, which became an American classic, specifically for Bledsoe, after hearing him sing. Bledsoe played the role through the run of the show at the Ziegfeld Theater, but Paul Robeson, not Bledsoe, was eventually chosen to play the role in England and in the film version.

Bledsoe went on to other roles and other work. In 1927, he was hired as a member of the music staff at the Roxy Theater in New York City, becoming the first African American to have an ongoing position on Broadway. He left the Roxy in 1930 to resume his concert schedule in the United States and Europe. He moved to Hollywood in the early 1940s and played dramatic roles in Drums of the Congo (1942) and other feature films.

Bledsoe wrote several of the songs he performed, sometimes borrowing the language and style of spirituals and folk music. One of his songs, "Pagan Prayer," was based on a poem by Countee Cullen; his one opera, Bondage, was based on the novel Uncle Tom's Cabin by Harriet Beecher Stowe. He also wrote patriotic songs, including "Ode to America" (1941), which he dedicated to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and "Ballad for Americans." He composed a series of songs, African Suite, for voices and orchestra. Bledsoe was well aware of the privileges he enjoyed as a successful black artist in a segregated country. In an article he wrote for the July 1928 issue of Opportunity—"Has the Negro a Place in the Theater?"—he described the responsibilities that he believed accompanied those privileges.

Biography

Julius Lorenzo Cobb Bledsoe was born 29 December 1897 in Waco, Texas. He graduated (as valedictorian) from Central Texas Academy in Waco in 1914 and from Bishop College (with a B.A.) in Marshall, Texas, in 1918; was in the ROTC at Virginia Union University, 1918–1919; and studied medicine at Columbia University in New York City, 1920–1924. He was a professional singer and actor, appearing in concerts, onstage, and in films, 1924–1941; and a composer, 1931–1942. Bledsoe died 14 July 1943 in Hollywood, California.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Cullen, Countee; Emperor Jones, The; Opportunity; Robeson, Paul; Show Boat; Singers

Further Reading

- Abdul, Raoul. Blacks in Classical Music. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1977.
- Cuney-Hare, Maude. Negro Musicians and Their Music. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1936.
- Fletcher, Tom. One Hundred Years of the Negro in Show Business. New York: Da Capo, 1954, 1984.

Geary, Lynette G. "Jules Bledsoe: The Original Ol' Man River." Black Perspective in Music, 17, (1, 2), 1989.

Mendoza, Patrick M. Extraordinary People in Extraordinary Times: Heroes, Sheroes, and Villains. Englewood, Colo.: Libraries Unlimited, 1999.

Petrie, Phil. "The Negro in Opera." In International Library of Negro Life and History: The Negro in Music and Art, ed. Lindsay Patterson. New York: Publishers Company, 1967.

Blues

The music known as blues (or as "the blues") can be counted among the remarkable achievements of the twentieth century, not only in its own right but as an influence on artistic production in a variety of genres and settings. To a number of writers and artists of the Harlem Renaissance—who were seeking connections with their African and African American past and a native idiom that would capture the spirit of the lives of many blacks in America—blues provided an ideal source and an ideal vehicle for their creative output. Although the influence of Europe is clear in the language (English) and strophic elements of blues, several other characteristics are derived from African modes of performance, including its strong rhythmic emphasis, syncopation, percussive techniques, call-and-response patterns, blue notes, improvised lyric moments, musical instruments, and vocal timbres. Also, the griot performers in African societies may have been figurative ancestors of the African American blues singer. Particularly in its use of integrated polyrhythms and antiphonal techniques, we can see that blues has affinities with African societal structures and life, which were communally oriented and in which art was, intentionally, an integral part of everyday life rather than an adjunct. One can also trace a number of these elements in African American music that preceded the blues, such as spirituals, jubilees, and ragtime: this earlier music surely bequeathed some African strains to the blues tradition.

In form, blues loosely follows a relatively small number of musical and lyric stanza patterns. The combination of the field holler vocal with a harmonic pattern common to European-derived ballads seems to have produced the stanza forms that are used most frequently in blues. Those stanzas most often consist formally of variations of the chord progression I–IV–V lasting for eight bars, twelve bars, sixteen bars, or occasionally some other number of bars. Most frequently, blues songs tend toward a roughly twelve-bar musical pattern. This is described as a “tendency” because the singer could frequently draw out the length of a word or line to indefinite length, as frequently occurred in the work songs and field hollers that preceded the blues. This practice was based on the feelings and exigencies of the moment, and therefore a song could be structured in emotional or social terms rather than according to strict, metronomic formal demands. With regard to the lyrics, there are also a number of pattern variations. For twelve-bar blues, there are usually three roughly equal four-bar segments that rhyme in one of the following strophic patterns: one “line” or thought repeated three times (AAA); one line repeated twice and completed by a different line that end rhymes (AAB); one line sung once and then completed by a second line, with the end rhyme repeated twice (ABB); or a rhyming couplet completed in four bars followed by a refrain of eight bars. The other eight-bar, sixteen-bar, and longer blues stanzas frequently present some kind of variation or adaptation of these patterns.

Some commentators consider this apparent simplicity a limitation; but for blues performers, the basic patterns are a challenge—the performer tries to maintain an essential historical and emotional connection to the community while creating a distinctive individual voice that, through infinite variation and invention, avoids any descent into monotony or self-caricature. Additionally, within the basic structure a great deal of variation is possible in performing techniques, instrumental combinations, and settings. In fact, a wide array of blues styles developed over the years, influenced by geographical, chronological, and social factors, including the dominance of a local musical figure in the blues community. All the while, blues has offered musicians a remarkable opportunity to explore a variety of themes and issues: the complexities of male and female relationships, domestic violence, alcoholism, natural disasters, social protest, labor difficulties, alternative sexual identities, and many others. In fact, blues can be seen as a forum for raising important issues, if not explicitly, then implicitly, and therefore as an important means of creating and sustaining a voice for those who are frequently voiceless in the African American community. These were voices that many creative artists of the Harlem Renaissance wanted to hear, represent, and express in their work.

It was no accident that the musical genre known as blues and the literary movement known as the Harlem Renaissance both emerged on the national and international scene in the 1920s. Both traced their roots back to the nineteenth century during the period when the first generation of freeborn African Americans were coming of age. At this point, most African Americans were facing for the first time the prospect of life outside the oppressive plantation system, and there was no older generation with experience in such a context to help them deal with new modes of oppression. Blues seems to have been created to explore the new experiences and new difficulties facing African Americans. It provided a flexible new structural and emotional setting that still had ties to previous African and African American musical genres. Blues focused primarily on love between men and women and on wanderlust—two major issues confronting African Americans outside the system that had controlled the slaves’ sexuality and mobility—and this music gave performers ample opportunities to express in a direct, earthy, pithy way the joys, sorrows, and ambiguities of their experiences. Blues, then, provided both structural guidelines and expressive freedom.

While writers such as Charles Chesnutt and Paul Laurence Dunbar, the premier African American dialect poet, were exploring the lives and language of African Americans through the local-color tradition, musicians were creating and spreading the feelings, forms, and techniques that made up the budding blues tradition—which would receive a great deal of attention from folklorists, songsmiths, literary artists, and eventually the general public. The establishment of the American Folklore Society at Harvard University in 1888 was an impetus for the study and collection of American, including African American, folklore; shortly thereafter, reports began to surface of blues or blueslike songs heard by W. C. Handy and Gates Thomas in 1890, Charles Peabody in 1901, Gertrude “Ma” Rainey in 1902, and Howard Odum between 1905 and 1908. The first three blues songs published in history were Artie Matthews’s “Baby Seals Blues” (August 1912), Hart Wand’s “Dallas Blues” (September 1912), and Handy’s “Memphis Blues” (late September–early October 1912). In just a few years, blues would be available on phonograph records and would inspire dance crazes (Noble Sissle claimed that Handy’s “Memphis Blues” had inspired Vernon and Irene Castle’s fox trot), and a flurry of activity would bring blues to the attention of the American intelligentsia and to mainstream popular culture as well.

African Americans had appeared in recordings possibly as early as 1890–1892, when the Bohee Brothers recorded titles (now unknown) for Edison cylinders (unfortunately untraced) in London; also, the white Victor Military Band had recorded instrumental blues as early as 1914; and beginning in 1916 the Chicago Defender had been urging African Americans to release records. However, African American vocal blues made their first appearance on phonograph records in 1920. Perry Bradford took Mamie Smith—an artist from his revue Made in Harlem—first to the Victor label and then to Fred Hager at Okeh, where Smith recorded “That Thing Called Love,” which was successful enough to earn her another recording date the same year. At her second session, she recorded “Crazy Blues,” the first vocal blues recorded by an African American artist, and its effect on the market was electrifying. “Crazy Blues” sold 75,000 copies in the first month after its release and persuaded a number of other companies in New York City to jump into what came to be called the “race” record market, even though these companies had initially been reluctant to record African American performers. Recordings by Lucille Hegamin, Lillyn Brown, Lavinia Turner, and Bessie Smith soon followed. Harlem had mounted one parade to welcome soldiers returning home from World War I, and another (10,000 strong) to protest against lynchings and racial discrimination in 1917; and Smith’s recording seemed to be one more sign of the imminent emergence of the New Negro onto the American scene.

The first five years or so of blues recording were dominated by these women vaudeville blues singers, who performed blues based on folk blues but composed, arranged, and clearly aimed at a more refined audience. The recordings were in part influenced by the efforts of trained composers and musicians such as Handy, who saw a chance to make blues more “respectable” and marketable. Handy smoothed off what he saw as some of the “rough edges” and made blues more palatable by using trained, reading musicians who had a sense of timing and technique less idiosyncratic than that of the frequently untrained folk performers. Vaudeville blues often consisted of a sung narrative or lyric introduction preceding the main body of the song and setting up the situation that the singer was about to lament, followed by either twelve-bar stanzas or some sophisticated popular modification of the twelve-bar pattern, accompanied by professional musicians on piano, brass, and reeds who gave the recordings a tinge of jazz. This is not to suggest that all vaudeville blues performers sounded alike: There was a remarkable diversity in styles, vocal timbres, and stage presence, and the tradition included a range of artists from hog-maw earthy to saccharine-sweet.

As writers sought to represent not only the lives but the spirit of African Americans, blues seemed to demonstrate how a people had been able to survive systematic oppression and discrimination by generating an art that explicitly or implicitly examined the deprivations imposed by slavery and Jim Crow—and how blacks had risen above and become superior to oppression by creating their own artistic system, which was more democratic than the putative democracy that had enslaved them. African American writers of the 1920s searching for an alternative to the worn-out literary modes and values of the previous generation found in the blues and jazz traditions a meaningful historical and cultural past that helped them deal with their own current social issues and also helped them generate art dealing with familiar modernist themes: the outsider’s sense of dislocation and alienation; rejection of conventional middle-class values; rejection of rationalization for “primitive” passion and living and improvising in the moment; and the need to find a new structure and language adequate for expressing these ideas.

It was no wonder that blues musicians seized the moment in 1920. Blues—with its roots in the oral tradition among the masses of African Americans and its welter of voices frequently lacking the inhibitions and pretensions of upwardly mobile middle-class African Americans—captivated a number of “new guard” African American writers who were anxious to declare themselves liberated from what they considered (at least in some cases) the smothering influence of the American literary tradition and of the “old guard” proponents of the Harlem Renaissance. W. E. B. Du Bois, for example, was known to prefer European classical music; in The Crisis, he gave the most prominent space to African Americans who worked in the classical tradition and European artists who drew on African American elements to enliven their classical compositions. Moreover, in Dusk of Dawn (1940) he referred to jazz as “caricature”—which no doubt some of it was, pandering as it occasionally did to white popular tastes—and throughout his career he seemed to wrestle with being proud of jazz and blues but not quite able to wholly accept them as worthy of artistic appreciation. James Weldon Johnson, who was somewhat more sympathetic, appreciated the contributions of African American secular folklore and called for someone to capture its “racial flavor”

(as John Millington Synge had done for the Irish); however, Johnson himself championed spirituals, not blues, as the great African American folk art. Clearly, Du Bois's and Johnson's middle-class orientation and their concentration on image as a bridge into mainstream American society prompted them to reject the earthy, even vulgar, blues in favor of genres that more definitively demonstrated that African Americans were capable of generating art just as good as (read "just like") that of white Europeans.

Among the writers of the Harlem Renaissance who were most influenced by blues were Langston Hughes, Sterling Brown, and Zora Neale Hurston. All three represented the younger generation of writers who had connections to middle- and upper-class society yet felt misgivings about allowing their work to be dominated by European aesthetics. In his famous manifesto "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926), Hughes praised "the low down folks" for their unpretentiousness and their unself-conscious joy, hearing in their blues and religious songs a natural alternative to the restrictions of contemporary society. He had been profoundly affected by the blues singers he heard as a child on the appropriately named Independence Avenue in Chicago in 1918; in Washington, D.C., in 1924; and in the cabarets, theaters, and nightclubs of Harlem—his frequent use of the blues idiom in his works reflects that influence. Hughes used a variety of stanza patterns, earthy language, metaphors and other imagery, dramatic situations, and references to blues performers in his poetry, prose, fiction, and drama from his first volume, The Weary Blues and Other Poems (1926), to his last, The Panther and the Lash (1967). Inherent in the blues idiom, as Hughes applied it, were call-and-response elements and a philosophy of perseverance in the face of adversity. As a professed urban poet, Hughes most frequently mentioned and made use of the works of urban blues singers, particularly women such as Ma Rainey; Bessie, Clara, and Trixie Smith; Gladys Bentley; Victoria Spivey; and Georgia White, along with sophisticated male blues singers such as Lonnie Johnson. In a review of The Weary Blues in Opportunity (February 1926), Countee Cullen called Hughes's jazz poems "interlopers" that did not "belong to that dignified company, that select and austere circle of high literary expression which we call poetry." But while some people tried to discourage Hughes from using blues in his work, he was placing in the mouth of his unpretentious folk hero Simple the last word on his love of the blues and the people who made it, putting aside personal vanity and social self-consciousness in the face of their enduring presence: "I will not deny Ma Rainey, even to hide my age. Yes, I heard her! I am proud of hearing her! To tell the truth, if I stop and listen, I can still hear her" ("Shadow of the Blues").

Sterling Brown and Zora Neale Hurston were more familiar with southern folk blues, and more adept at using it in their works. Brown, who described himself as an amateur folklorist, studied the roots of blues more systematically than Hughes; and although Brown was less likely than Hughes to incorporate blues stanza patterns in his work, he had an unsurpassed ability to evoke the nuances of the blues experience in his stark portraits of characters such as Big Boy Davis, John Henry, Ma Rainey, and old nameless couples giving it one more try. Hurston, who was an anthropologist, also made a systematic study of African American expressive culture. She was familiar with the vivacity of folklore from her earliest years in Eatonville, Florida, where front-porch "lying" sessions had given her an unquenchable passion for the powerful language of the "folk." Sometimes accompanied by Alan Lomax and Mary Elizabeth Barnicle, she made trips to collect folklore at the behest of Franz Boas and with financial support from Charlotte Mason; these trips produced some excellent blues recordings by Gabriel Brown (who is portrayed in Hurston's folklore collection Mules and Men of 1935), Booker T. Sapps, and others. Significantly, Hurston attempted to consider African American folklore in context, that is, in terms of its functions in the community (something no other folklorist at the time had been capable of doing). Thus, although some readers considered Hurston's portrait altogether too rosy or too artificial, it was still neither as artificial nor as stodgy as most written material that had been generated by white folklorists. More important, Hurston's masterpiece, Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), has been called a blues novel because it uses a variety of elements related to blues: the color blue, blues songs, blues performers, creative and earthy language, sexual metaphors, a setting in the bottoms or the muck, call-and-response actions and situations, and a philosophy that can be summed up as "sun gonna shine in my back door someday." In the work of Hughes, Brown, and Hurston, as well as in that of Claude McKay, Rudolph Fisher, Wallace Thurman, and others, we can see blues as an important aesthetic element informing the literature of the Harlem Renaissance.

Of course, it was not only literature that drew on blues. The jazz and pop songs of the period, as performed by such Harlem artists as Ethel Waters, Nina Mae McKinney, Duke Ellington, and Cab Calloway, frequently showed evidence of blues techniques and structures. Duke Ellington in particular worked wonders with the blues idiom; his brilliant three-minute vignettes, and some longer pieces, made him one of the most distinguished composers of the twentieth century. Performances of blues, pop-blues, and jazz were largely responsible for attracting “slumming” whites to Harlem, where they spent money in night spots, and thus for encouraging an interest in African American culture. Whether or not this interest was illusory, it helped finance a number of artists of the Harlem Renaissance.

In the visual arts, Aaron Douglas’s I Needs a Dime for Beer (1926), paired with Langston Hughes’s blues poem “Down an’ Out”; Winold Reiss’s Hot Chocolates (1929), and Archibald Motley’s Blues (1929) were inspired by the syncopated style of blues. In Motley’s Blues, one can almost feel the angular energy, shifting accents, and sensual pulse of performers such as Louis Armstrong, Bessie Smith, and Duke Ellington.

The Harlem Renaissance did not come to an abrupt end at the close of the 1920s; neither did blues—it continued to develop and thrive, and to adapt to and reflect its surroundings. Still, one can look back to the music and art of the Harlem Renaissance as a foundation for much African American art that followed. In the best of this later work, one can hear echoes of the rural and urban blues idiom of the renaissance era—shaped, of course, in the best blues tradition, by the genius of the individual creative artist and passed back to the community that inspired it.

STEVEN C. TRACY

See also Blues: An Anthology; Blues: Women Performers; Boas, Franz; Brown, Sterling; Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Douglas, Aaron; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Fisher, Rudolph; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Jazz; Johnson, James Weldon; Mason, Charlotte Osgood; McKay, Claude; Motley, Archibald J. Jr.; Music; Musicians; Reiss, Winold; Singers; Thurman, Wallace; specific musicians and singers

Further Reading

Bradford, Perry. Born with the Blues. New York: Oak, 1965.
Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing but the Blues. New York: Abbeville, 1993.

- Dixon, Robert M. W., John Godrich, and Howard Rye, eds. Blues and Gospel Records, 1890–1942, 4th ed. Oxford: Clarendon, 1997.
- Ford, Robert, comp. A Blues Bibliography. London: RIS, 1999.
- Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues. New York: Collier, 1941.
- Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who’s Who. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1979.
- Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Oliver, Paul. The Blues Fell This Morning. London: Cassell, 1960.
- . The Story of the Blues. Philadelphia, Pa.: Chilton, 1973.
- Titon, Jeff. Early Downhome Blues: A Musical and Cultural Analysis. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1978.
- Tracy, Steven C. Langston Hughes and the Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.
- , ed. Write Me a Few of Your Lines: A Blues Reader. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999.

Blues: An Anthology

Blues: An Anthology (1926), edited by W. C. Handy, was one of the earliest studies of the influence of folk blues on American jazz, popular music, and classical music and remains one of the most famous published collections of commercial blues. It celebrated African American musical traditions and contributed to a growing interest in blues, and in black folk culture generally, during the Harlem Renaissance. Handy himself was among the first composers to write and publish commercial songs inspired by the newly emerging folk blues, which he heard in the Mississippi delta.

Blues: An Anthology resulted from interviews that the American music scholar Edward Abbe Niles (who was also a lawyer on Wall Street) held with Handy in 1925, about blues and black folk music. It consisted of 180 pages and contained the music and lyrics of fifty songs, selected by Handy and arranged for piano and voice. About half of the songs were Handy’s own compositions or arrangements, including several of his most famous titles: “Saint Louis Blues” (1914), “Joe Turner Blues” (1915), “The Hesitating Blues” (1915), “Aunt Hagar’s Children Blues” (1921, 1922), and “Harlem Blues” (1923)—though not “Memphis Blues” (1912), his earliest published commercial blues, because its publisher had refused to grant permission. Also included were songs by Spencer Williams, Will Nash, Irving Berlin, Jerome Kern, and John Alden Carpenter; excerpts from George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue (1924), a work that was influenced by blues; and Gershwin's Concerto in F (1925), "no part of which," Handy said, "had been published elsewhere at that time." The anthology also had a critical introduction by Niles (which included a concise biography of Handy, music examples, and the first use of the term "folk blues"), notes on the origins of the songs, and eight full-page illustrations by the Mexican artist Miguel Covarrubias.

Blues: An Anthology was received warmly by critics such as Edmund Wilson, Sigmund Spaeth, and Carl Van Vechten. Langston Hughes, in his review for Opportunity magazine, said that the collection was "a much needed, beautiful book . . . filled with invaluable information for the student of Negro folk music and folk poetry." James Weldon Johnson, in the Saturday Review of Literature, praised the book as "a valuable contribution to the literature of American folk-lore and folk music." He added, "In this volume Mr. Handy has taken the first step to do [to] the Negro secular music what has been done quite fully for the Spirituals and the plantation stories."

During the 1920s, there was intense interest in African American folk music, and several important studies of black musical traditions, sacred and secular, were published. But Handy's anthology was the first devoted exclusively to blues, and except for James Weldon Johnson's Book of American Negro Spirituals (1925) and Second Book of Negro Spirituals (1926), it was the only one edited by an African American. Revised editions of Blues: An Anthology were published in 1949 and 1972. Since then, various editions have been reprinted under the original title by Da Capo Press (1985, 1990) and by Applewood Books (2001).

PATRICK HUBER

See also Blues; Bontemps, Arna; Covarrubias, Miguel; Handy, W. C.; Johnson, James Weldon; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

Evans, David. "William Christopher Handy." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, 2nd ed., ed. Stanley Sadie. New York: Grove's Dictionaries, 2001.

Handy, W. C., ed. Blues: An Anthology, intro. Abbe Niles. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1926. (Revisions: A Treasury of the Blues: Complete Words and Music of Sixty-seven Great Songs from Memphis Blues to the Present Day. New York: Charles Boni, 1949; with historical and critical text by Abbe Niles. Blues: An Anthology: Complete Words and Music of Fifty-three Great Songs, rev. Jerry Silverman. New York: Macmillan, 1972; with historical and critical text by Abbe Niles. Reprints, New York: Da Capo, 1885, 1990; new introduction by William Ferris. Also, Applewood, 2001.)

Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues: An Autobiography, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Macmillan, 1941. (Foreword by Abbe Niles.)

Hughes, Langston. "Review of Blues: An Anthology." Opportunity, 4(44), August 1926.

Johnson, James Weldon, ed. The Book of American Negro Spirituals. New York: Viking, 1925. (With musical arrangements by J. Rosamond Johnson and additional numbers by Lawrence Brown.)

Johnson, James Weldon. "'Now We Have the Blues'—Review of Blues: An Anthology." Saturday Review of Literature, 19 June 1926.

———, ed. The Second Book of Negro Spirituals. New York: Viking, 1926. (With musical arrangements by J. Rosamond Johnson.)

Van Vechten, Carl. "Mean Ole Miss Blues Becomes Respectable—Review of Blues: An Anthology." New York Herald Tribune, 6 June 1926.

Blues: Women Performers

African American women were among the first popularizers of recorded blues in the 1920s and 1930s, during the Harlem Renaissance. Mamie Smith's recording of Perry Bradford's "Crazy Blues" sold 75,000 copies (at a dollar apiece) in the first month after it was released on 10 August 1920, and its success opened doors for many other African American female artists. Recording companies established "race record" divisions to tap the African American market, and eventually mainstream consumers as well. Columbia, Okeh (which merged with Columbia), and Paramount searched rural and urban areas for women who could sing the blues. Black Swan began its own effort to record, not the guttural sounds of southern blues, but African American women whose voices would contribute to cultural uplift. (Accordingly, Black Swan rejected the great Bessie Smith.)

Gertrude "Ma" Rainey

The contralto Gertrude "Ma" Rainey (26 April 1886–22 December 1939) is called the "mother of the blues." She was born in Columbus, Georgia, to the minstrel performers Ella Allen and Thomas Pridgett, who were her inspiration. She made her debut at age fourteen in a song-and-dance troupe, A Bunch of Blackberries, at Springer Opera House in Columbus. In 1902, she was intrigued by the haunting lyrics of a blues tune sung by a woman at a theater in St. Louis, Missouri, and incorporated the style into her own act. In 1904, she married a minstrel song-and-dance man and comedian, William Rainey; they billed themselves as Rainey and Rainey, or "Ma and Pa Rainey, Assassins of the Blues." (The Raineys separated in the 1920s.)

As head of the Rabbit Foot Minstrels, Ma Rainey established herself on the Moses Stokes Company circuit (managed by Cora and Lonnie Fisher), singing blues in the earthy male minstrel style. In 1912, in Chattanooga, Tennessee, the troupe hired Bessie Smith, who was eight years younger than Rainey. Rainey and Smith became friends (and possibly lovers), and Rainey taught Smith dance steps and the art of the stage entrance, prepared her for the rigors of the road, and introduced her to blues.

In 1923, Paramount Records promoted Rainey's indigenous southern blues sound. Rainey recorded with Paramount until 1928, releasing more than ninety songs and attracting fans in the urban North and the rural South. Her accompanists included the best musicians, such as Tommy Dorsey and Louis Armstrong. Rainey composed many of her songs but received no royalties—Paramount paid her a flat fee per recorded side. Rainey's style (for example, in her rendition of "See See Rider" and "Prove It on Me Blues") was characterized by rhythmic call-and-response improvisation, distinctive phrasing and timbre, and groans, moans, and shouts; it established the standard for classic blues. The impressive sales of Rainey's records caught the attention of the Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA), which provided steady concert tours for her.

Ma Rainey's eventual departure from the concert circuit and the recording industry was a result of competition from talking pictures, radio, swing music, and the Depression. Paramount canceled her contract in 1928, but she continued on the vaudeville circuit until 1935.

Bessie Smith

The "empress of the blues," Bessie Smith (15 April 1894–26 September 1937), was born in Chattanooga, Tennessee. Her career in show business was started there by her brother Clarence, who encouraged her to sing and dance for coins from passersby (with another brother, Andrew, as guitar accompanist) on the sidewalk in front of the White Elephant Saloon. Smith gave girlish but rowdy renditions of "Bill Bailey, Won't You Please Come Home?" At age nine, she entered an amateur contest at the Ivory Theater.

In 1912, again influenced by Clarence, she joined the dance troupe (managed by Cora and Lonnie Fisher in the Moses Stokes Company) in which Ma Rainey was a blues artist. Smith's salary in this troupe was $10 a week, plus money thrown onto the stage. Audiences loved her rendition of "Weary Blues" and tossed even more coins at her when she sang it.

In 1913, Smith made Charles Bailey's 81 Theater in Atlanta, Georgia, her home base; she also traveled with Pete Werley's Florida Blossoms and the Silas Green show. However, she was fired (at the suggestion of the African American producer Irvin Miller) because her complexion was too dark for a show called "Glorifying the Brownskin Girl." In 1921, Smith went to Philadelphia, where she performed at Moran's Cabaret. She also performed at the Dunbar and Standard theaters and Paradise Gardens in Atlantic City, New Jersey. She married the night watchman at Moran's, Jack Gee, on 7 June 1923.

A customer at Moran's, Charlie Carson, who owned a record shop, persuaded the pianist Clarence Williams to take Smith to Frank Walker, a manager at Columbia, for an audition. At Columbia's recording studio, Smith performed two songs on 15 February 1923. Smith also auditioned for Thomas Edison, Fred Hager at Okeh (who disliked her rural strain), and Harry Pace of Black Swan (who thought her sound too raw). She had her first recording session—three songs—at Columbia on 16 February 1923. Columbia released the hugely successful "Gulf Coast Blues" and "Down Hearted Blues" and gave Smith a one-year contract to record at least twelve usable sides. She was soon being called Columbia's "queen of the blues"; her fee increased to $200 per usable side, and Fletcher Henderson became her studio accompanist.

Smith also continued touring. With Irvin Johns as her accompanist, she performed in 1923 at the 81 Theater in Atlanta (because of segregation, she gave a special midnight performance for whites). She broke attendance records at the Frolic Theater in Birmingham, where she sang "Nobody's Bizness If I Do" and "Gulf Coast Blues." A performance at the Beale Street Palace in Memphis was broadcast. Smith was so popular on tour that she refused to share the stage with any other blues singer.

By 1924, Smith was earning $2,000 a week and contracted for a twenty-week tour with the TOBA. She had a new musical director, Fred Longshaw. By 1925, she owned a custom-made railroad car; recorded with Louis Armstrong; and made her first appearance at the Liberty Theater in Chattanooga, including her brother Clarence in her show. She recorded (again) with Fletcher Henderson in 1926, and with James P. Johnson in 1928. By this time, nightlife in Harlem was at its zenith, and vaudeville and blues were declining, but Smith remained popular. She made her Broadway debut in Pansy (1929) and appeared in a film based on "Saint Louis Blues" (1932).

After the stock market crashed in 1929, audiences fell off, and so did Smith's income. Swing music and talking movies became the new sensation, but Smith, billed as the "queen of recording artists," made eight recordings for Columbia in 1930 (being paid $125 per side); she made her final recording for Columbia on 20 November 1931. Although the demand was not high, she appeared at the Lafayette Theater in New York in 1932, taking second billing to Jules Bledsoe. In 1933, she recorded four sides for Okeh (at $37.50 per side), including "Gimme a Pigfoot" and her last recording, "I'm Down in the Dumps." (As Smith left the studio, Billie Holiday, age seventeen, was in the waiting room preparing to make her recording debut.) Smith also performed at Connie's Inn in New York in 1936.

Mamie Smith

Mamie Gardener Smith (26 May 1883–16 September 1946) was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. At age ten she was a dancer with the Four Dancing Mitchells; by 1910, she was a member of the Smart Set Company, an African American minstrel troupe. In 1912, she married her first husband, the singer William "Smitty" Smith, and moved to New York, where she became a cabaret singer, pianist, and dancer. Perry Bradford, the African American entrepreneur and songwriter, discovered her in 1918 and chose her to break the color barrier in New York's recording industry. He cast her in his musical Made in Harlem and arranged auditions with Victor and Okeh. Smith recorded "That Thing Called Love" and "You Can't Keep a Good Man Down" for Okeh. Her recording of "Crazy Blues" (1920) made her a star, opened a new market for vocal blues, and inspired the recording industry to go in search of other African American women blues singers. "Crazy Blues" featured Willie "the Lion" Smith on piano, Jimmy Dunn on cornet, and Dope Andrews on trombone; these musicians became known as the Jazz Hounds and established the sound of recorded blues. Smith recorded thirty more songs for Okeh and starred in vaudeville shows, including Follow Me (1922), Struttin' Along (1923), Dixie Review (1924), Syncopated Revue (1925), and Frolicking Around (1926).

By the end of the 1920s, blues recordings were losing momentum, but Smith recorded for Okeh through 1931. She also appeared in African American musicals such as Sun Tan Frolics (1929), Fireworks of 1930, Rhumbaland Revue (both 1931), and Yelping Hounds Revue (1932–1934), and in the films Paradise in Heaven (1939), Mystery in Swing (1940), Sunday Sinners (1941), Murder on Lenox Avenue (1941), and Because I Love You (1943).

Clara Smith

Clara Smith (c. 1894–2 February 1935), "queen of the moaners," was born in Spartanburg, South Carolina. She joined the vaudeville circuit in 1910, became a regular with the TOBA in 1918, and joined the Harlem club scene in 1923. She had a thinner voice than Bessie Smith (with whom she sometimes sang duets) but had a distinct comedic style, especially in double-entendre songs like "Whip It to a Jelly." Her biggest hit was "Every Woman's Blues" (1923). She also oversaw the business of the Clara Smith Theatrical Club.

Trixie Smith

Trixie Smith (1895–1943) was born in Atlanta, Georgia. In 1922, she made her first recording with Black Swan and won a blues singing contest at the Manhattan Casino, sponsored by the Fifteenth Regiment of the New York Infantry. Black Swan later merged with Paramount, and Smith recorded for the new company until 1926. Her popular recordings were her own compositions, including "Trixie's Blues," "Railroad Blues," and "Mining Camp Blues." She recorded for Decca in the 1930s. Smith worked with noted jazz musicians, including Louis Armstrong, Fletcher Henderson, and Sidney Bechet. She performed in African American musicals and appeared in one film, The Black King (1932).

Alberta Hunter

Alberta Hunter (Josephine Beatty, 1 April 1895–17 October 1984) was born in Memphis, Tennessee. She ran away to Chicago at age eleven and became an entertainer there in 1914, performing in cabarets and clubs. In 1921, in New York, she also appeared in clubs, and she recorded for the Gennett label, accompanied by Joe “King” Oliver, Louis Armstrong, Sidney Bechet, and Fletcher Henderson. She recorded for other labels as May Alix and Josephine Beatty. She had several musical styles and could adapt her voice to almost any musical situation. Hunter was the composer of “Downhearted Blues” (1922), made famous by Bessie Smith in 1923.

Hunter had one of the longest careers of the early African American women blues singers. From 1927 to 1953 she had lucrative engagements in the United States, as well as in Europe, where she was the first African American woman to perform blues. She made her film debut in Radio Parade in 1936. In London, she appeared opposite Paul Robeson in Show Boat. She performed in USO shows during World War II and the Korean War. Hunter was known as a shrewd businesswoman; she was also a nurse, from 1954 until 1977, when her performing career rebounded.

Ida Prather Cox

Ida Prather Cox (25 February 1896–10 November 1967), “queen of the blues,” was born in Toccoa, Georgia. Her early music was inspired by the church; but in 1911 she ran away from home and joined White and Clark’s Black and Tan Minstrels. She later performed with other vaudeville troupes, including the Rabbit Foot Minstrels, Florida Cotton Blossom Minstrels, and Silas Green from New Orleans. The first song she performed in public was “Put Your Arms Around Me.” During her vaudeville years, she married Adler Cox, the first of her three husbands.

Cox was known for her classic blues style. She was always a lady, always regal; her shows were sophisticated and glamorous, and her music was sultry and sensuous. Her accompanists included Lovie Austin, Jesse Crump (her third husband), Jelly Roll Morton, and Joe “King” Oliver. Her recording “Wild Women Don’t Have the Blues” became a feminist anthem. Between 1923 and 1929, she recorded more than forty records for Paramount. When the stock market crash depressed the blues music industry, Cox produced her own road shows, Raisin’ Cain and Darktown Scandals. In 1934, she performed with Bessie Smith in Fan Waves Revue at the Apollo Theater in Harlem, billed as the “sepia Mae West.” Cox recorded again in 1939 for John Hammond on the Okeh and Vocalion labels, with her All-Star Orchestra. She toured until 1945, when she had a stroke; in 1961 she recorded Blues for Rampart Street for Riverside.

Edith Wilson

Edith Goodall Wilson (6 September 1896–March 1981) was born in Louisville, Kentucky. She began performing in church and school recitals. In 1910, at age thirteen, unbeknownst to her parents, she was in a show at White City Park, earning $35 per week, more than twice her mother’s salary as a housekeeper. Wilson left home at a tender age to seek a stage career in Milwaukee.

Edith appeared on the same bill as, and became friends with, the young piano player Danny Wilson (whom she would marry) and his sister Lena. Danny Wilson, a graduate of a conservatory in Charleston, South Carolina, trained Lena and Edith for the competitive stage, encouraging them to sing all kinds of songs, not just blues. As a trio, Edith, Lena, and Danny Wilson worked in cabarets and clubs in Chicago. In 1921, they went to Thomas’s club in Washington, D.C.; eventually they came to New York City.

Perry “Mule” Bradford, a composer and talent scout for Columbia, had a disagreement with Mamie Smith, who was the lead singer in his musical Put and Take. After seeing one of Edith Wilson’s performances, he decided to replace Smith with Wilson. The musical opened at Town Hall, New York City, and Wilson made a sensational impression on other talent scouts for Columbia. She recorded sides for Columbia on September 13, 1921. Bradford gave her “Nervous Blues,” backed by Johnny Dunn and the Jazz Hounds, with her husband, Danny, on the piano. Wilson’s next recording, “Vampin’ Liza Jane,” marked Columbia’s entry into “race records” and the start of Wilson’s climb to the top.

Wilson cut most of the sides for Columbia in 1922, producing thirty-two recordings (twenty-six were released). She joined the TOBA, billed as “queen of the blues,” and performed Bradford’s songs at Connie’s Inn, the Lincoln Theater, and the Dixieland Plantation Room of the Winter Garden. In 1923, Wilson traveled to London with the revue, renamed Dover Street to Dixie. She expanded her repertoire to include show tunes and comedy skits. In 1924, she joined Club Alabam Revue at the Lafayette Theater in New York City, teamed with Doc Straine in comedy skits, and returned to Columbia Records. She and Straine took their comedy routine on the road during 1924–1925. In 1926–1927, Wilson performed in Blackbirds in Paris and London.

Again in New York, she performed at Loew's State Theater and occasionally sang on CBS radio broadcasts, when Duke Ellington and his band were with Loew's. Her success continued into the late 1970s, when she appeared at blues festivals.

Wilson's audiences included monied Broadway patrons, affluent African Americans, and patrons of Harlem cabarets controlled by underworld figures. Wilson was a good businesswoman, and she had learned not just blues but vaudeville and cabaret style, ballads, ditties, and humorous songs. Her Creole-type yodel distinguished her sound from that of other women blues performers, and her beauty, light complexion, and charm appealed to her mixed audiences.

Ethel Waters

Ethel Waters (31 October 1896–1 September 1977) was born in Chester, Pennsylvania, and raised in Philadelphia by her grandmother. Waters married Buddy Purnsley when she was thirteen and he was twenty-three (the marriage failed). She supported herself as a domestic but performed in churches and other local venues. The producers of a vaudeville troupe discovered her at a Halloween party in 1917 (on her birthday) and billed her as "Sweet Mama Stringbean." Waters became a performer with the TOBA and in clubs in Harlem, where she arrived in 1919. She signed with Black Swan in 1921; her style, with its articulate melodic phrasing, was what the African American elite considered essential for an emerging culture. Her recordings and performances of the 1920s, under the direction of Fletcher Henderson, led to a contract with Columbia. Waters recorded many hits, notably "Down Home Blues" and "Oh Daddy."

As the blues era drew to an end, Waters embarked on a second career as an actress, making her debut in the Broadway musical Africana in 1927. She was a stage and screen star in the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s and was nominated for an Academy Award for Best Actress for her work in Pinky (1949).

Sippie Wallace

Beulah Belle Thomas Wallace ("Sippie," 1 November 1898–1 November 1986) was born in Houston, Texas, and became known as the "Texas nightingale." Her special sound was a mix of spirited, hard-edged, south-western rolling honky-tonk and Chicago shouting and moaning. She followed her musical brother George to the Storyville district of New Orleans, where she married her first husband, Frank Seals. Her second husband was a gambler, Matthew "Matt" Wallace. Sippie Wallace sang at local social gatherings and tent shows in Texas while working as a maid and stage assistant to a snake dancer with Philip's Reptile Show, Madam Dante.

In 1923, Wallace moved with her brother Hersal and her niece Hociel to Chicago, where George Wallace was influential in the music division of W. W. Kimball Company and directed his own orchestra. Sippie, Hersal, and George became a popular recording trio. George and Sippie also formed a songwriting partnership; they wrote "Shorty George" and "Underworld Blues." Sippie Wallace's initial recordings, "Shorty George" and "Up the Country Blues," were for Okeh. She became a regular on the TOBA circuit in 1923 and 1924. She released "Special Delivery Blues" and "Jack o' Diamond Blues" (a homage to Matt Wallace) in 1926 and performed "Dead Drunk Blues" with Louis Armstrong in 1927. She moved to Chicago in 1929 and contracted with Victor Records, recording four sides (two were released: "I'm a Mighty Tight Woman" and "You Gonna Need My Help").

The Depression hampered Wallace's career as a blues singer, and she retired, becoming the organist for Leland Baptist Church in Detroit. However, she continued to accept club bookings. Mercury Records reissued "Bedroom Blues" in 1945, Detroit's Fine Arts label reissued a recording in 1959, and Victoria Spivey encouraged Wallace to join the circuit of folk and blues festivals. In Europe in 1966, Wallace performed for a new generation of blues enthusiasts. She appeared at Lincoln Center in New York in 1977 and in Germany in 1986.

Victoria Spivey

Victoria Spivey (6 October 1906–3 October 1976) was born in Houston, Texas; performed in local clubs as a teenager; and recorded "Black Snake Blues" for Okeh and wrote songs for the St. Louis Publishing Company in 1926. Spivey popularized "TB Blues" and "Murder in the First Degree." She appeared in the African American musical Hallelujah! in 1929, the touring show Dallas Tan Town Topics in 1933, and the touring Broadway show Hellzapoppin' in 1938–1939.

In the 1950s and 1960s, Spivey was a mainstay at blues festivals and college performances, recording for Bluesville and Folkways. Her voice had a Texas twang, a high nasal sound into which she incorporated a moan that she called her “tiger squall.”

Other Women Performers

There were other important figures, recording for Ajax, Black Swan/Paramount, Brunswick, Emerson, Gennett, Okeh/Columbia, Pathé, Perfect, RCA Victor, and Vocalion: Fae Barnes; Bessie Brown; Eliza Brown; Josephine Carter; Martha Copeland; Helen Gross; Ethel Hayes; Lucille Hegamin, the “Cameo Girl”; Rosa Henderson; Edna Hicks; Chippie Hill; Leitha Hill; Edith Johnson; Mary Johnson; Virginia Liston; Sara Martin, the “colored Sophie Tucker”; Viola McCoy; Josie Miles; Lizzie Miles, the “Creole songbird”; Nettie Potter; Susie Smith; Grace White; Lena Wilson—and still more. The cabarets, clubs, and theaters of the Harlem Renaissance were brightened by African American women blues singers, who were, according to Daphne Duval Harrison (1988), “black pearls.”

GERRI BATES

See also Black Swan Phonograph Company; Blackbirds; Blues; Columbia Phonograph Company; Hallelujah; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Manhattan Casino; Miller, Irvin; Music; Musical Theater; Singers; Theater Owners' Booking Association; specific musicians and performers

Further Reading

Davis, Angela Y. Blues Legacies and Black Feminism: Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Billie Holiday. 1998.

Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. 1988.

Lieb, Sandra. Mother of the Blues: A Study of Ma Rainey. 1981.

Boas, Franz

Franz Uri Boas, a German-born Jewish immigrant who was chairman of the Department of Anthropology at Columbia University in New York City, was the leading American anthropologist during the germination, maturation, and demise of the Harlem Renaissance. When the Harlem Renaissance was emerging, Boas had a considerable reputation as a result of his groundbreaking research and writing on race and culture, and his financial and institutional support of talented representatives of the “New Negro.” He significantly influenced the graphic artists, folklorists, writers, and critics of the renaissance in numerous and diverse ways, beginning with the publication of “Human Faculty as Determined by Race,” which was his vice-presidential address to Section H at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in 1894, and culminating with his monumental work The Mind of Primitive Man, which was brought out in 1911 and marked the zenith of his prowess as a researcher. Three aspects of his influence are especially important.

First, Boas offered a physical anthropological critique of racial formalism based on the overlapping sizes of the cranial cavities of blacks and whites. This critique convinced many people that biological racial differences were negligible, and it persuaded the leader of the “New Negro” movement, Alain Locke, to argue in 1916 that racial inequalities were to be explained “in terms of historical, economic, and social factors,” not biological factors. W. E. B. Du Bois, one of the leading custodial figures, concurred in this argument, observing that not all blacks were intellectually inferior to all whites; Zora Neale Hurston and Melville Herskovits tested Boas’s conclusions by measuring the heads of black Harlemites; and Charles Spurgeon Johnson corresponded with “Papa Franz” in reference to the relative reliability of intelligence tests and drew directly on Boas’s advice. Furthermore, in this regard Boas opened the Journal of American Folklore, which he edited, to black amateur folklorists such as Locke, Hurston, Arthur A. Shomburg, Arthur Huff Fauset, and Carter G. Woodson. Eventually, though, Boas began to promote his own students instead of black writers who were attempting to promote “race consciousness.”

Franz Boas, c. 1930–1950. (Photo by R. H. Hoffman. Library of Congress.)

Second—and even more significantly—Boas revealed the achievements of the western African and central African ancestors of black Americans. In his investigations into the African background and culture, which were published in numerous journals of anthropology and popular magazines between 1904 and 1909, he paid particular attention to Africa’s peoples, their early successes in smelting iron, their artistic industries, and their agriculture, cultures, laws, and state building. These revelations convinced notable black thinkers such as Du Bois, Booker T. Washington, Monroe Nathan Work, and George Washington Ellis that blacks were not descended from inferior peoples. In addition, Boas introduced Americans to the disciplined, classical graphic and cultural traditions in black African art, profoundly influencing Locke, who in turn introduced black American painters and sculptors such as Richmond Barthé and Aaron Douglas to these works.

Third, Boas was instrumental in obtaining financial and institutional support for the “New Negroes.” Much of this support was made possible through the beneficence of Carter G. Woodson, founder and head of the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History. Boas was successful in securing funds from Woodson for Zora Neale Hurston and the future economist Abram L. Harris. When Locke was fired by the president of Howard University in 1925, Boas provided him with the institutional support of the American Association of University Professors. (In 1926, however, Boas blocked the funding of a project by Locke on African art.)

During the Harlem Renaissance, Boas maintained his huge reputation among both black and white intellectuals, men and women. “Papa Franz” (an affectionate nickname given to him by Zora Neale Hurston) was the mentor of Herskovits, who was a major contributor to Locke’s manifesto anthology The New Negro, as well as of Ruth Benedict, Margaret Mead, and others who became noted cultural anthropologists. These scholars would contribute to Boas’s legacy as the father of Americanist anthropology, which was characterized by its revulsion against racism and its advocacy of cultural relativism.

However, since the 1980s Marshall Hyatt and the present author have raised issues in reference to the unevenness of Boas’s critique of racial formalism and to his hypothesis about “men of high genius,” that is, the belief that blacks would produce proportionally fewer male geniuses than whites. Also, there have been objections to Boas’s cultural relativism. Nathan Huggins (1971) implied that relativistic research on Africa and African cultures contributed to the primitivism and exoticism that pervaded much of the outpourings of the Harlem Renaissance. With regard to Boas’s withdrawal of his support from black amateur folklorists, Lee Baker (1998) has noted that Boas opposed these folklorists because he equated attempts to promote racial solidarity with nationalism.

Still, the controversies that have arisen about Boas’s contribution to the Harlem Renaissance should not detract from his stature. Although Boas was limited by the state of knowledge about blacks’ character and capabilities, his findings with respect to human differences were nevertheless far more forward-looking than those of the vast majority of his contemporaries, and the black intelligentsia seized on these findings as a means to demonstrate unequivocally that they were perfectly capable of producing great art and criticism. Although some of Boas’s findings that they appropriated were used to rationalize the creation of primitive, exotic, sensationalistic work, this was no fault of his. In short, a significant part of the success that the artists of Harlem enjoyed was no doubt directly related to Boas’s prodigious efforts.

Biography

Franz Uri Boas was born 9 July 1858 in Minden, Westphalia, Germany. He was educated at the Bürger-schule (an elementary school) and the Gymnasium (a secondary school) in Minden and the universities of Heidelberg (1877), Bonn (1877–1879), and Berlin (1879–1882, 1885–1886). He received his Ph.D. from the University of Berlin in 1882. Boas was temporarily employed at the Royal Ethnological Museum in Berlin; was geographical editor of Science in New York (1887–1888); taught at Clark University in Worcester, Massachusetts (1888–1892); was chief assistant of anthropology at the World's Columbia Exposition in Chicago (1892–1894); was assistant curator at the American Museum of Natural History in New York (1896–1901) and then curator (1901–1906); taught at Columbia University (1896–1936); served as editor of American Anthropologist (1898–1920) and Journal of American Folk-Lore (1908–1924); and was president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science (1931). He died in New York City 21 December 1942.

VERNON J. WILLIAMS

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Negro History; Barthé, Richmond; Douglas, Aaron; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Arthur Huff; Herskovits, Melville; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Locke, Alain; New Negro; New Negro Movement; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Woodson, Carter G.; Work, Monroe Nathan

Selected Works

- The Central Eskimo*. 1888. (Reprinted, 1964.)
 "Human Faculty as Determined by Race." 1894.
 "Introduction." In Handbook of American Indian Languages. 1911. (Reprinted, 1966.)
The Mind of Primitive Man. 1911. (Rev. ed., 1938.)
Changes in Bodily Form of Descendants of Immigrants. 1912.
Anthropology and Modern Life. 1928.
Race, Language and Culture. 1940.
Race and Democratic Society. 1945.
A Franz Boas Reader: The Shaping of American Anthropology, 1883–1911, ed. George W. Stocking Jr. 1972.

Further Reading

- Baker, Lee. From Savage to Negro. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
 Bay, Mia. The White Image in the Black Mind. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
 Degler, Carl. In Search of Human Nature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
 Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Robbins, Richard. Sideline Activist. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.

Stocking, George, Jr. Race, Culture, and Evolution. New York: Free Press, 1968.

Williams, Vernon, Jr. Rethinking Race. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1996.

Bojangles

See Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"

Boni and Liveright

Boni and Liveright, one of the most progressive publishing houses of the 1920s, played an important role in connecting the aspiring writers of the Harlem Renaissance to the bohemian, radical culture of white intellectuals in Greenwich Village. Under the direction of its cofounder, Horace Liveright, the firm was willing to risk publishing modern, experimental, and radical books by young, unknown writers. In publishing Jean Toomer's Cane and Eric Walrond's Tropic Death, Boni and Liveright helped to create a vogue for exotic and primitive black writers.

Boni and Liveright began in 1917 as publishers of Modern Library, a series of inexpensive reprints of modern classics, attractively bound and priced at only sixty cents. Modern Library offered hard-to-find and out-of-print titles by such authors as Nietzsche, Wilde, Gorky, Strindberg, and Dostoyevsky. With a backlist of steadily selling, profitable Modern Library titles, Boni and Liveright went about making publishing history, taking chances and fighting censorship to redefine American literature with the publication of Pound, Eliot, O'Neill, Anderson, Hemingway, Dreiser, Crane, and Faulkner. In addition, Boni and Liveright published Sigmund Freud, Bertrand Russell, Upton Sinclair, Leon Trotsky, and Jack Reed—writers who shaped the era's most progressive thought.

Given its history and reputation, Boni and Liveright was a logical choice to publish Cane, a highly experimental book by an unknown black author, dealing with racial themes. Jean Toomer had been introduced to the intellectual elite in Greenwich Village in 1921 by Waldo Frank, a modernist writer and critic whose experimental prose Boni and Liveright had previously published. The firm published Cane in 1923, with an introduction by Frank. Heavily influenced by the modernist aesthetics of Frank, Hart Crane, and Sherwood Anderson (all Boni and Liveright writers), Toomer's masterpiece was praised by the critics but was financially unsuccessful, selling only 500 copies. Unhappy with the book's publicity, which touted him as a rising black author, Toomer soon sailed for Europe. He had contracted with Boni and Liveright for a second book, but it was never written.

Boni and Liveright also published two other works of fiction by blacks: Jessie Fauset's novel There Is Confusion and (as noted above) Eric Walrond's Tropic Death, a collection of short stories. Together, these books indicate that the publisher's commitment to black literature was more than a commitment to the primitive. Although Tropic Death is, like Toomer's Cane, modernist, exotic, and sensual, There Is Confusion is a more conventional treatment of the African American upper classes, reminiscent of Edith Wharton.

By 1927–1928, the heyday of Boni and Liveright was over. In 1925, Modern Library, the firm's most reliable source of profits, was sold to cover a series of poor investments in stocks and theatrical productions. By 1926, the Boni brothers, Albert and Charles, were operating parallel publishing ventures, including the landmark publication of Alain Locke's The New Negro. Liveright continued to publish important books, but the partnership ended in 1928, as the firm's financial situation worsened. Liveright, who had invested deeply in the stock market, never recovered from the crash of 1929; and by the time of his death in 1933, he had already lost control of the company to Arthur Pell, his onetime bookkeeper. After 1933, the firm continued under the name Liveright Publishing Company; it became a subsidiary of W. W. Norton and Company in 1974.

MICHAEL ZEITLER

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Boni and Liveright Prize; Cane; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Frank, Waldo; Greenwich Village; Liveright, Horace; Locke, Alain; New Negro, The; Primitivism; Publishers and Publishing Houses; There Is Confusion; Toomer, Jean; Tropic Death; Walrond, Eric

Further Reading

Darden, Tom. Firebrand: The Life of Horace Liveright. New York: Random House, 1995.

Gilmer, Walker. Horace Liveright: Publisher of the Twenties. New York: Lewis, 1970.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap–Harvard University Press, 1995.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Tebbel, John. A History of Book Publishing in the United States, Vol. 3. New York and London: Bowker, 1978.

Wintz, Cary. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Boni and Liveright Prize

Although the Boni Prize competition is often associated with the publishing house Boni and Liveright, the contest was actually the independent work of the Boni brothers, Albert and Charles. In addition to publishing with Horace Liveright under the name Boni and Liveright, the Boni brothers made significant contributions to the Harlem Renaissance in their own right. Their most important joint venture was surely the publication of Alain Locke's anthology The New Negro, but they also tried to discover and develop new talent through their patronage of a much heralded literary contest similar to the contests sponsored by Opportunity or the Harmon Foundation.

On 29 January 1926, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) held a press conference in New York announcing that the publishers Charles and Albert Boni were offering a prize of $1,000 for the year's best novel "about Negro life and written by a Negro." The NAACP also announced a sterling committee to judge the entries: Henry Seidel Canby, editor of Saturday Review; W. E. B. Du Bois of The Crisis; Charles Spurgeon Johnson of Opportunity; James Weldon Johnson; Edna Kenton; Laurence Stallings; and Irita Van Doren. Taken individually, this panel of judges reflected the diversity of aesthetic opinion engendered by the novelists of the Harlem Renaissance.

By early 1926, such divergent viewpoints on the representation of the African American in art were subject to vigorous debate. That spring The Crisis ran a symposium on "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?" with responses from, among others, Alfred Knopf, Carl Van Vechten, Sherwood Anderson, and Vachel Lindsay. Du Bois himself wrote "Criteria for Negro Art," and Claude McKay wrote "Negro Life and Negro Art." While Du Bois saw little value in promoting art that could not be used to better the conditions of the race, McKay saw such propagandistic motives as self-defeating for any serious artist.

Considering the diversity of opinion and the emotionally charged climate of debate, it is not surprising that any committee as representative as that of the Boni brothers would have difficulty in reaching a consensus. Thus, for reasons that are still unclear, although the contest was heavily advertised in early 1926, with announcements in the New York Times, Publisher's Weekly, and The Crisis, no novel was selected as worthy, and the prize was never awarded.

MICHAEL ZEITLER

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Boni and Liveright; Crisis: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Harmon Foundation; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Knopf, Alfred A.; Lindsay, Nicholas Vachel; McKay, Claude; Opportunity Literary Contests; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

DuBois, W. E. B. "Criteria of Negro Art." Crisis, 32(11), October 1926.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap—Harvard University Press, 1995.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Bonner, Marieta

Marieta Bonner (Marita Odette) was a significant contributor to the African American literary scene from the 1920s to the 1940s, producing short stories, essays, plays, and reviews. Bonner's writing first came to notice in 1925 with an essay in The Crisis, "On Being Young—A Woman—and Colored," which dealt with the prevailing sexism as well as racism of the times and presented a spirited critique of the assumptions of many of her "New Negro" compatriots regarding gender. (This essay is reprinted in Frye Street and Environs, 1987.) Bonner was awarded a literary prize from Crisis for the essay, and she received two more awards in Opportunity's literary competitions in 1934 (for "A Possible Triad on Black Notes" and "Tin Can"). She published in Opportunity and The Crisis in the 1930s and 1940s, producing twenty short stories and three plays, including the acclaimed The Purple Flower (1928), although after 1941 she turned from writing to devote herself to teaching and motherhood. Bonner was also a regular attendee at Georgia Douglas Johnson's salon on S Street in Washington, D.C., an important meeting place for many writers of the Harlem Renaissance, including Angelina Weld Grimké, Clarissa Scott Delany, Jessie Fauset, Mary Burrill, and Alice Dunbar Nelson.

Bonner herself was middle class, but she wrote almost exclusively about working-class communities. Her writing combines sociological detail, allegory, and stream of consciousness to represent the experience of urban African Americans, avoiding the folk idiom that is so familiar from the work of the better-known Zora Neale Hurston. Bonner examines the experience of urban life, racism, and reproduction for women who have little or no desire to uplift the race but simply need to get by. In her "Frye Street" stories she presents a fictional urban neighborhood (based on Chicago's South Side) where migrants' aspirations for the expanding African American community nearly always go unrealized; their difficulties are manifested in anxiety related to motherhood and the black woman's responsibilities toward her race. Bonner's stories constitute a series of jeremiads on the impact of poverty, poor education, bad parenting, female-headed households, drugs, and violence on the inner city—which, in her works, holds little of the promise of Harlem during the jazz age. As noted by Cheryl Wall (1997) and Mary Helen Washington (1987), the brutality of Bonner's writing offers a sharp retort to those who stereotype women writers of the Harlem Renaissance as genteel and apolitical.

The limitations imposed on African American women preoccupied Bonner throughout her life as a writer. Stories such as "Drab Rambles" (The Crisis, 1927), "One Boy's Story" (The Crisis, 1927), and "Tin Can" (Opportunity, 1934) deal with the constrictions of the city, which is prejudiced against her protagonists, socially and economically, because they are black and female. Bonner's later stories become steadily more pessimistic; in these works, women and children find themselves trapped within, and victimized by, racialized socioeconomic structures. Bonner's "Frye Street" stories link the Harlem Renaissance with more explicitly politicized African American social protest writing of the 1930s and 1940s.

Biography

Marieta Bonner (also known as Marita Odette) was born in Boston in 1899. She studied at Brookline High School in Boston and at Radcliffe College in Cambridge, Massachusetts (1918–1922). She taught high school in Cambridge and later in Washington, D.C., and Chicago. Bonner was a member of the Krigwa Players in Washington, D.C. She died in Chicago in 1971.

MARIA BALSHAW

See also Crisis, The; Delany, Clarissa Scott; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Krigwa Players; Nelson, Alice Dunbar; Opportunity Literary Contests; Salons

Further Reading

Balshaw, Maria. "New Negroes, New Women: The Gender Politics of the Harlem Renaissance." Women: A Cultural Review, 10(2), 1999, pp. 127–138.

———. Looking for Harlem: Urban Aesthetics in African American Fiction. London and Sterling, Va.: Pluto, 2000.

Bonner, Marieta. Frye Street and Environs: The Collected Works of Marita Bonner, ed. Joyce Flynn and Joyce Occomy Stricklin. 1987.

Hill, Errol. "The Revolutionary Tradition in Black Drama." Theatre-Journal, 38, 1986, pp. 419–421.

McKay, Nellie. "What Were They Saying? Black Women Playwrights of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined, ed. Victor Kramer. New York: AMS, 1988.

Roses, Lorraine Elena, and Ruth Elizabeth Randolph. "Marita Bonner: In Search of Other Mothers' Gardens." Black American Literature Forum, 21(1–2), 1987, pp. 165–183.

Wall, Cheryl. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.

Washington, Mary Helen, ed. Invented Lives: Narratives of Black Women, 1860–1960. New York: Anchor, 1987.

Bontemps, Arna

Through his distinguished career and his contributions as a novelist, poet, and librarian, Arna Wendell Bontemps brought additional recognition to the historical and literary movement known as the Harlem Renaissance.

Bontemps spent his early formative years in Los Angeles, where, despite his father's objections, he developed a love of literature. Inspired by his uncle Buddy's penchant for folk culture, Bontemps formally began his writing career in 1923, on his graduation from Pacific Union College; in 1924, he published a poem, "Hope," in The Crisis, one of the leading periodicals for aspiring writers of the Harlem Renaissance.

Shortly thereafter, Bontemps moved to New York City. There, he pursued a teaching career at the Harlem Academy; simultaneously, his writing career accelerated. In 1926 and 1927, he received Opportunity magazine's Alexander Pushkin Poetry Prize for his poems "Golgotha Is a Mountain" (1926) and "The Return" (1927). Bontemps's poetry, which addressed the themes of racial pride and love of African civilization, brought him into contact with notable writers of the Harlem Renaissance such as James Weldon Johnson, Claude McKay, and—most important—Langston Hughes. He and Hughes would later collaborate as Arna Bontemps, photographed by Carl Van Vechten, 1939.

(Library of Congress.)

writers on projects such as Popo and Fifina: Children of Haiti (1932), a travel book for young readers.

In 1931, Bontemps published his first novel, God Sends Sunday, the story of the pioneering African American jockey Little Augie. A few years later, Bontemps collaborated with Countee Cullen to transform the book into the play, St. Louis Woman (1939). Although W. E. B. Du Bois criticized God Sends Sunday for its description of the seamy side of black life, the novel was recognized for its unique depiction of black people's interest in sporting life and of the usages of the Creole language. Most significantly, the publication of God Sends Sunday marked Bontemps's emergence as an important African American writer.

Bontemps's literary success continued after he relocated to Huntsville, Alabama, to teach at Oakwood Junior College in 1931. In 1932, he won a prize from Opportunity magazine for his short story "A Summer Tragedy," about an elderly couple whose victimization by the sharecropping system results in their double suicide. (This story has since appeared in many anthologies.) Bontemps also continued to write juvenile books; he believed that a younger reading audience was more accessible, and he wanted to offer young people a positive literary depiction of African Americans. His works of juvenile literature include You Can't Pet a Possum (1934); We Have Tomorrow (1945); Frederick Douglass: Slave, Fighter, Freeman (1959); and Young Booker: Booker T. Washington's Early Days (1972). Later, Bontemps became involved in the Illinois Writers' Project and developed a friendship with another participant, Jack Conroy; he and Conroy then collaborated on several children's books.

In 1936, Bontemps's most widely recognized novel—Black Thunder: Gabriel's Revolt, Virginia 1800—was published. This historical novel tells of a fictional slave revolt, led by Gabriel Prosser, that fails because of horrendous weather and an act of betrayal. Although the book was written during an unfavorable time for black people, Black Thunder was recognized as a powerful statement about the relevance of African American history. Bontemps's use of language was also praised, and this novel secured his place within the African American literary tradition.

Black Thunder was followed by a third novel, Drums at Dusk (1938); this too is a historical novel, about a slave revolution on the island of Santo Domingo. Around this time, Bontemps accepted a Rosenwald Fellowship for travel and research in the Caribbean. Additional achievements soon followed: the publication of Father of the Blues (1941), a commissioned biography of

W. C. Handy; two more Rosenwald grants; the publication of Golden Slippers: An Anthology of Negro Poetry for Young Readers (1941); and the completion of a master's degree in library science from the University of Chicago in 1943.

From 1943 until 1965, Bontemps was the head librarian at Fisk University. In this capacity, he significantly enhanced the university's holdings of materials on African American culture by establishing the Langston Hughes and George Gershwin collections and acquiring the papers of James Weldon Johnson, Jean Toomer, and Charles S. Johnson. Later (1969), Bontemps would serve as curator of the James Weldon Johnson Collection at the Beinecke Library at Yale University. (Bontemps's own letters and other memorabilia of his long friendship with Langston Hughes are also housed at this library.) Bontemps's posts at Fisk and Yale enabled him to establish important resources for the study of African American literature and culture.

Bontemps's work as an anthologist is also significant. In 1958, Bontemps and Hughes coedited The Book of Negro Folklore, a collection of folklore and essays. In 1963, Bontemps edited American Negro Poetry. Another anthology, Hold Fast to Dreams: Poems Old and New (1969), includes works by black and white poets. Perhaps the most important anthology of Bontemps's career is The Harlem Renaissance Remembered (1972), a collection of edited essays about notable figures of the period. This book also includes Bontemps's personal reflections about the movement. Another anthology, Personals (1963), is a collection of Bontemps's poetry and his thoughts on Harlem Renaissance writers. Finally, The Old South: "A Summer Tragedy" and Other Stories of the Thirties (1973) is a collection of short fiction.

After retiring from Fisk in 1964, Bontemps held other academic posts at the University of Illinois (Chicago Circle campus) and later at Yale University. He eventually returned to Nashville, Tennessee, as a writer-in-residence at Fisk. In 1971, Bontemps began work on an autobiography, but it was left unfinished.

Although Arna Bontemps did not receive the same recognition as many of his contemporaries, such as his close friend and idol Langston Hughes, his literary accomplishments—particularly his novels, his children's literature, his anthologies, and his work as a librarian—established him as an important chronicler of African American life and culture. His work also helped to preserve the history and vibrancy of the Harlem Renaissance movement.

Biography

Arnaud Wendell Bontemps was born 13 October 1902 in Alexandria, Louisiana, to parents of Creole origin. He studied at San Fernando Academy in Los Angeles; Pacific Union College in Angwin, California (A.B., 1923); and the Graduate School of Library Science, University of Chicago (M.L.S., 1943). Bontemps taught at Harlem Academy in New York City (1924–1931); Oakwood Junior College in Huntsville, Alabama (1931–1934); Shiloh Academy in Chicago (1935–1937); and the University of Illinois (1966–1969). He married Alberta Johnson in 1926; they would have six children. Bontemps was editorial supervisor for the Federal Writers Project of the Illinois Works Progress Administration (1938); head librarian at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee (1943–1965); director of university relations and acting head librarian at Fisk University (1964–1965); and lecturer and curator for the James Weldon Johnson Collection at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut (1969–1971). His awards included Opportunity magazine's Alexander Pushkin Poetry Prize (1926, 1927) and its short-story prize (for "A Summer Tragedy," 1932), and a Rosenwald Fellowship (1939). Bontemps died in Nashville 4 June 1973.

LARNELL DUNKLEY

See also Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Handy, W. C.; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; McKay, Claude; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Rosenwald Fellowships; Toomer, Jean

Selected Works

- God Sends Sunday*. 1931.
Popo and Fifina: Children of Haiti. 1932. (Coedited with Langston Hughes.)
"A Summer Tragedy." 1932.
You Can't Pet a Possum. 1934.
Black Thunder: Gabriel's Revolt, Virginia 1800. 1936.
Drums at Dusk. 1939.
Father of the Blues. 1941.
Golden Slippers: An Anthology of Negro Poetry for Young Readers. 1941.
We Have Tomorrow. 1945.
St. Louis Woman. 1946.
The Poetry of the Negro. 1949. (Coedited with Langston Hughes.)

- The Book of Negro Folklore*. 1959. (Coedited with Langston Hughes.)
Frederick Douglass: Slave, Fighter, Freeman. 1959.
American Negro Poetry. 1963. (Coedited with Langston Hughes.)
Personals. 1963.
Hold Fast to Dreams: Poems Old and New. 1969.
The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. 1972.
Young Booker: Booker T. Washington's Early Days. 1972.
The Old South: "A Summer Tragedy" and Other Stories of the Thirties. 1973.

Further Reading

- Arna Bontemps–Langston Hughes Letters, 1925–1967*, ed. Charles H. Nichols. 1988.
Jones, Kirkland C. Renaissance Man from Louisiana: A Biography of Arna Wendell Bontemps. 1992.
Sundquist, Eric J. The Hammers of Creation: Folk Culture in Modern African-American Fiction. 1992.

Booklovers Club

The Harlem Booklovers Club was founded in the early twentieth century and flourished from the years preceding World War I through the 1940s. It was composed of university-trained black women who were members of the black middle and upper classes or were connected through marriage and family to the black elite of Harlem. This organization was a regional outgrowth of the first Booklovers Club, which had been established in Washington, D.C., in 1894. According to Mary Church Terrell (1863–1954), a founding member of the Booklovers movement, the club was "organized for the purpose of reading, reviewing, and discussing books" (Terrell 1940). Ida Gibbs Hunt (1862–1957) reported that the Booklovers met to "pursue courses of reading and study for higher culture." Meetings and programs were often devoted to Shakespeare and Wagner, and to reports on the members' travels to Europe and elsewhere abroad. Some sessions also dealt with child-rearing practices and other family-related topics. All-black female Booklovers Clubs spread as far west as the twin cities of Kansas City, Kansas, and Kansas City, Missouri, where the Inner-City Booklovers Club flourished from the 1920s through the 1990s.

During the 1920s, the Harlem Booklovers met at the 135th Street Branch of the New York Public Library on 135th Street and Lenox Avenue. (The club was one of many community organizations that used the 135th Street branch for meetings and cultural programs throughout the years of the Harlem Renaissance. This facility was a key institution for the central Harlem community, serving approximately 125,000 people in a twenty-block area.) In 1925, the Division of Negro Literature, History, and Prints was established through a community advisory committee of Harlem bibliophiles, with the assistance of the librarians Ernestine Rose and Catherine Latimer, the first black librarian hired by the New York Public Library. In 1926, the New York Public Library purchased the private library of Arthur Schomburg—Harlem's leading bibliophile, as well as a cofounder of the Negro Society for Historical Research—and integrated his materials into that special division.

The Booklovers sponsored lectures on African American history and culture, book collecting contests, book review sessions, discussions of children's literature, programs related to community concerns, family development and training sessions, and gatherings that gave individual members an opportunity to share their travel and vacation experiences. Some of Harlem's most prominent intellectuals and collectors of Africana participated in the weekly history lectures sponsored by the Booklovers. This group included Arthur Schomburg; John Edward Bruce, who was a prominent journalist, a self-trained historian, and president of the Negro Society for Historical Research; Hubert Harrison; William Ernest Braxton, a painter who was also a member of many literary societies; and Willis Nathaniel Huggins, who was the owner of the Blyden Bookstore, a leader of the Harlem History Club, the sixth black educator to be hired by the New York public school system, and eventually the first black student to finish a doctorate in history at Fordham University. Huggins was also a tireless advocate for including African history in the curriculum of New York's public schools.

Some members of the Booklovers Club were married to black men who not only were professionally accomplished but were also linked to a flourishing circle of black bibliophiles and collectors that had established regular communication between colleagues in New York City, Philadelphia, and Washington, D.C. Prominent black bibliophiles in all three cities were active in the American Negro Historical Society and the Black Opals Literary Society of Philadelphia; the American Negro Academy; the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History; the Negro Book

Collectors Exchange; the Bethel Historical and Literary Association, based in Washington, D.C.; and the Negro Society for Historical Research, the Negro Library Association, and the Phalanx Club, located in New York City. Mary Church Terrell and her husband, Judge Robert H. Terrell, were both active in the prestigious Bethel Historical and Literary Association, and she served as Bethel's first female president in 1892–1893.

RALPH L. CROWDER

See also Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and Journal of Black History; Black History and Historiography; Bruce, John Edward; Harrison, Hubert; 135th Street Library; Schomburg, Arthur A.

Further Reading

- Gatewood, Willard B. Aristocrats of Color: The Black Elite, 1880–1920. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Hunt, Ida Gibbs, and William H. Hunt. Papers. Moorland-Springarn Research Collection, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
- McHenry, Elizabeth. Forgotten Readers: Recovering the Lost History of African American Literary Societies. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Sinette, Elinor DesVerney. Arthur Alfonso Schomburg: Black Bibliophile and Collector. Detroit, Mich.: New York Public Library and Wayne State University Press, 1989.
- Terrell, Mary Church. A Colored Woman in a White World. Washington, D.C.: Ransdell, 1940. (Reprint, New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.)

Booklovers Magazine

Booklovers Magazine, founded in Philadelphia in January 1903 by the journalist Seymour Eaton, was a monthly publication offering articles on a variety of subjects for a general audience. It appeared under three separate titles during a relatively short span: Booklovers Magazine from January 1903 to June 1905, Appleton's Booklovers Magazine from July 1905 to June 1906, and Appleton's Magazine from July 1906 to June 1909. The magazine sold for twenty-five cents an issue, and at its peak had a circulation of about 100,000, making it a serious and respectable publication but not widely read enough to turn much of a profit. Still, it was lavishly illustrated and printed on glossy paper, and its contributors included such notables as Theodore Roosevelt, Henry Cabot Lodge, Theodore Dreiser, Joseph Conrad, and John Philip Sousa. Its articles on contemporary issues and controversies were well regarded.

The July 1903 issue of the magazine included an article by W. E. B. Du Bois, "Possibilities of the Negro: The Advance Guard of the Race." Du Bois's "advance guard" comprised ten successful black men, each of whom was given a brief biographical treatment: Booker T. Washington, the writers Charles Chesnutt and Paul Laurence Dunbar, the Reverend Frances James Grimké, the painter Henry Ossawa Tanner, the legislator and attorney Edward H. Morris of Illinois, the inventor Granville T. Woods, the mathematician and teacher Kelly Miller, the surgeon Daniel H. Williams, and the businessman W. L. Taylor. Portraits of the men accompanied the biographies.

Du Bois concluded his article by discussing the issues of mixed races, pointing out that of the ten men he profiled "three are black, two are brown, two are half white, and three are three-fourths white." All represented the American Negro and his potential. In a magazine serving an overwhelmingly white readership, Du Bois's article made the simple point that blacks were capable of intellectual and artistic excellence. The editor, Seymour Eaton, included a brief profile of Du Bois, praising The Souls of Black Folk and Du Bois's contributions to addressing the "Negro problem."

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Chesnutt, Charles Waddell; Dreiser, Theodore; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Miller, Kelly; Tanner, Henry Ossawa; Washington, Booker T.

Further Reading

Aptheker, Herbert. Annotated Bibliography of the Published Writings of W. E. B. Du Bois. Kraus-Thomson, 1973.
Mott, Frank Luther. A History of American Magazines, Vol. 5, Sketches of Twenty-one Magazines, 1905–1930. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Bradford, Perry

The songwriter, music publisher, entrepreneur, and entertainer Perry Bradford entered show business in 1906 and worked in Allen's New Orleans Minstrels in 1907. He worked as a pianist in Chicago in 1909 and played at the Grand Theatre with Alberta Perkins. He was part of a successful double act, Bradford and Jeanette, in black vaudeville from 1909 to 1918. He toured in the shows The Chicken Trust (c. 1913) and Sgt. Ham, Darktown After Dark, and Made in Heaven (1918).

Blues songs, beginning with those of W. C. Handy, became increasingly popular shortly before World War I. However, there were as yet no opportunities for African Americans to record this music. Bradford set out to change this situation, with great energy and determination. In 1920, he persuaded Fred Hager, recordings manager for Okeh, to record the blues singer Mamie Smith; her first recordings, featuring Bradford's own "Crazy Blues" and "That Thing Called Love," sold extremely well and precipitated a craze for blues records by African American women. During 1921–1922 Bradford was the most prominent black entrepreneur on Broadway, making money with ease and spending it with abandon. He made several recordings as both singer and pianist from 1923 to 1929, but his skill in these areas was limited; he was much more important, from 1920 to 1944, as a producer of recordings by many of the greatest musicians of the era, including Louis Armstrong, Johnny Dunn, Buster Bailey, Willie "the Lion" Smith, and James P. Johnson.

Bradford sold most of his early songs to other publishers, such as Pace and Handy, but he went into business for himself as a publisher in 1920, joining Handy and other black entrepreneurs in the Gaiety Theater building on Times Square. During the 1920s he was incorporated under several names, of which the most important was Perry Bradford Music Publishing Company. He published songs for the show Put and Take (1921), including several by the prolific songwriter Spencer Williams, as well as a few of his own originals. Bradford is most important for publishing numerous works by James P. Johnson, including a version of the extended concert work Yamekraw. He and Johnson contributed songs to more shows in the 1920s, including Keep Shufflin' (1928) and Messin' Around (1929). Bradford held frequent wild parties at his office in the Gaiety building; these meetings of the "Joy Club" included Johnson, Fats Waller, and the lyricist Andy Razaf.

Unlike Handy and Clarence Williams, Bradford experienced a boom-and-bust cycle in his business affairs: he was an erratic, undisciplined businessman, so he realized only a small percentage of the profits that his pieces generated, and he spent those profits rather than investing them. He got into considerable trouble by double-dealing other publishers on certain songs; and he was sentenced to prison in 1923 for suborning a witness (Spencer Williams) to commit perjury, in a dispute over Lemuel Fowler's hit song "He May Be Your Man, but He Comes to See Me Sometimes." Bradford wasted considerable energy from the 1920s to the 1940s on fruitless lawsuits against more powerful entities such as the publisher Southern Music and the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP).

A famously stubborn man, Bradford early on was nicknamed "Mule." Although he was a prolific songwriter, none of his compositions can be considered standards. However, his pugnacious autobiography, Born With the Blues, is one of the great primary documents in the history of African American music.

Biography

Perry Bradford (John Henry Perry Bradford) was born in Montgomery, Alabama, 14 February 1893; his family moved to Atlanta in 1901. He began his career in show business in 1906 and performed as a minstrel, pianist, and vaudevillian (1907–1918). He married Marion Dickerson in 1918; for a time she was in the music business with him, but the marriage ended in divorce. In 1920, Mamie Smith very successfully recorded some of Bradford's blues songs for Okeh. In 1921–1922, Bradford was a leading black entrepreneur on Broadway. From 1920 to 1944 he was a producer of recordings by many great musicians; however, he experienced economic and legal difficulties during this time. He took a day job at the Belmont Park race track in the 1940s. His autobiography was published in 1965. Bradford died in New York 20 April 1970.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Armstrong, Louis; Handy, W. C.; Johnson, James P.; Razaf, Andy; Smith, Mamie; Smith, Willie "the Lion"; Waller, Thomas "Fats"; Williams, Clarence

Selected Songs

"Lonesome Blues." c. 1916. (All dates are approximate.)
 "Broken Hearted Blues." 1918.
 "Harlem Blues." 1918. (Retitled "Crazy Blues" in 1920.)
 "That Thing Called Love." 1919.
 "You Can't Keep a Good Man Down." 1920.

"Nervous Blues." 1921.

"I Ain't Gonna Play No Second Fiddle." 1925.

"My Home Ain't Here, It's Further Down the Road." 1925. (Retitled "Dixie Flyer Blues" by Bessie Smith.)

Further Reading

Bradford, Perry. Born With the Blues: Perry Bradford's Own Story. New York: Oak, 1965.

Charters, Samuel, and Len Kunstadt. Jazz: A History of the New York Scene. New York: Da Capo, 1981. (First published 1962.)

Hurwitt, Elliott S. "W. C. Handy as Music Publisher: Career and Reputation." Ph.D. diss., City University of New York Graduate Center, 2000.

Jasen, David A. "Perry Bradford: Pioneer of the Blues." Folkways CD FJ 2863. (Program booklet; includes an interview with Bradford by Noble Sissle.)

Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Spreadin' Rhythm Around: Black Popular Songwriters, 1880–1930. New York: Schirmer, 1998.

Braithwaite, William Stanley

"Negro poetic expression hovers for the moment, pardonably perhaps, over the race problem, but its highest allegiance is to Poetry; it must soar." William Stanley Beaumont Braithwaite published these words in The Crisis in 1924. He believed strongly in poetic purity, without reference to skin color; the issue of race, he felt, placed an unnecessary burden on the poet, hindering poetic rhythm and leading to self-destructiveness. (Braithwaite once advised Claude McKay not to identify his race in his writings.) The generation of poets in Harlem in the 1920s did not share his view (they wanted to write about their triumphs and struggles, and they could do that only if they acknowledged their race), but they nevertheless respected Braithwaite as a literary leader.

Braithwaite was born in Boston, but his father, William Smith Braithwaite, was a native of British Guiana who had studied in England and then immigrated to New England. The elder Braithwaite preferred all things British, disdained the struggling African Americans, and therefore limited his children's association with the descendants of slaves. The younger Braithwaite was at first tutored at home; after his father's death he went to public school, but he left school at age twelve (in 1890) to help support the family by working as a porter and errand boy. His sisters Eva and Rosie, who were musically inclined, formed a duet and toured the United States and Europe as "Sadie and Rosie"; by the turn of the twentieth century, they were members of Sam T. Jack's Creole Show.

Eventually, Braithwaite found employment as an apprentice in the pressroom of the publisher Ginn and Company. Here he read galley proofs of poets, developing an interest in poetry and books that would lead to a career path as an anthologist, editor, educator, biographer, critic, novelist, poet, and publisher. He was later promoted to compositor. His contact with the publishing industry and his exposure to creative works inspired him to write poetry himself, in the style of the British romantics.

In 1904, after covering the printing costs, Braithwaite published his first volume of poetry. Edited collections and another volume of lyrics followed, along with occasional poems and critical essays. His work appeared in periodicals such as Atlantic Review, North American Review, and Scribner's. Braithwaite's critical and poetic insight caught the attention of people at a newspaper, the Boston Evening Transcript, where he became a literary critic, a position he held for twenty-five years. He continued to compile anthologies of Elizabethan, Georgian, and Restoration poetry and to compose his own works. Soon he acquired a reputation for his scholarly approach to criticism and poetry. (He would continue to be recognized more for his critical commentary than his poetry.)

Braithwaite's annual Anthology of Magazine Verse made him very influential in the world of arts and letters. To be included in this anthology became a mark of recognition. Braithwaite did not focus exclusively on African American poets or themes; he published the work of black and white poets from the American North and South and from abroad: Sterling Brown, Countee Cullen, Paul Lawrence Dunbar, Robert Frost, Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson, Vachel Lindsay, Edgar Lee Masters, Claude McKay, Amy Powell, Carl Sandburg, and Anne Spencer, to name a few. His anthologies were so successful that they were published for more than a quarter of a century: from 1913 to 1939. Moreover, he wrote critical essays on African American poetry, and he was a contributor to Alain Locke's anthology The New Negro (1925). In 1921, Braithwaite headed his own publishing company, B. J. Brimmer, which issued the works of Lucius Beebe, James Gould Cozzens, and Georgia Douglas Johnson. Thus Braithwaite was a contributor to the arts during the Harlem Renaissance, was instrumental in exposing the poetry of African Americans of that period, and encouraged the literary movement of the renaissance.

In 1935, Braithwaite joined the faculty of Atlanta University as a professor of creative literature. In this position he gained greater exposure to the day-to-day experiences of educated African Americans and to African American writers and poets; until then, his contacts had been occasional and sometimes limited. He published little during this time, however, and he retired from the university in 1945.

Braithwaite studied the poetic patterns of the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century British poets, concentrating on the forms, meters, and themes of the romantics. His poetry, criticism, and compilations are not centered on race or color and do not reflect an identifiable cultural context. Because he circumvented the issue of racial identity, he himself fell into obscurity, and he has tended to be excluded from recently published anthologies that focus on African American writers. Nevertheless, he was among the first to develop the canon of African American poetry and prose.

Biography

William Stanley Beaumont Braithwaite was born in Boston, Massachusetts, 6 December 1878. He was home-schooled for a while and was later an apprentice typesetter at Ginn and Company. Braithwaite was an editor at Colored American Magazine in Boston (1901–1902); literary editor and columnist at the Boston Evening Transcript (1905); professor of creative literature at Atlanta University, Georgia (1935–1945); publisher, Poetic Journal in Boston (1912–1914); editor, Poetry Review (1916–1917); and founder and editor of B. J. Brimmer Publishing Company (1921–1927). He and Emma Kelly were married in 1903; they had four sons and three daughters. Braithwaite's awards and honors included the NAACP Arthur B. Spingarn Award for Outstanding Achievement in Literature (1918); A.M., Atlanta University, Georgia (1918); and Litt.D., Talladega College (1918). Braithwaite was a member of the Poetry Society of America, the New England Poetry Society, the Boston Authors' Club, and the editorial board of Phylon. He moved to 409 Edgecombe Avenue in Harlem in 1941, and died there on 8 June 1962.

GERRI BATES

See also Brimmer, B. J., Publishing House; Brown, Sterling; Cullen, Countee; Dunbar, Paul Laurence;

Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; Lindsay, Vachel; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; New Negro, The; Spencer, Anne

Selected Books

- The Canadian*. Boston, Mass.: Small, Maynard, 1901.
Lyrics of Life and Love: Poems. Boston, Mass.: Turner, 1904.
 (Reprints, 1969 and 1971.)
The House of Falling Leaves With Other Poems. Boston, Mass.: Luce, 1908. (Reprint, 1969.)
The Story of the Great War. New York: Stokes, 1919.
Going Over Tindal: A Fragment Wrenched From the Life of Titus Jabson. Boston, Mass.: Brimmer, 1924.
John Myers O'Hara and the Grecian Influence. Portland, Me.: Smith and Sale, 1926.
The Story of the Years Between 1918–1939. 1940.
Selected Poems. New York: Coward-McCann, 1948.
The Bewitched Parsonage: The Story of the Brontës. New York: Coward-McCann, 1950.
The William Stanley Braithwaite Reader, ed. Philip Butcher. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1972.

Selected Articles

- "A Grave Wrong to the Negro." Boston Globe, 1906.
 "Some Recent Verse." Poet Lore: A Magazine of Letters, January 1911, pp. 223–240.
 "The Poets and the Magazines." Boston Evening Transcript, 9 December 1911.
 "Christmas Books for Children." Boston Evening Transcript, 23 November 1912.
 "The Year and the Writers." Boston Evening Transcript, 28 December 1912.
 "A Foremost American Lyricist." Lippincott's Monthly Magazine, 1913.
 "Mrs. Dargan as Lyric Poet." Boston Evening Transcript, 12 December 1914.
 "Imagists and Their Poetry." Boston Evening Transcript, 21 April 1915.
 "The Mystery." Scribner's, 1915.
 "Imagism: Another View." New Republic, 12 June 1915. (Reprint, 1954.)
 "The Substance of Poetry." Poetry Review, May 1916.
 "Poetry as a Fine Art." Poetry Review, October 1916.
 "The Year in Poetry." Bookman, March 1917.
 "Some Contemporary Poets of the Negro Race." Crisis, 1919.
 "The Negro in Literature and Art." Crisis, September 1924, pp. 208–210.

"Some Contemporary Poets of the Negro Race." Crisis, April 1924, pp. 275–280.

"The Negro in American Literature." New Negro, 1925.

"The Poetry Clinic." Step Ladder, December 1926.

"The Novels of Jessie Fauset." Opportunity, January 1934.

"The House Under Arcturus: An Autobiography." Phylon, 1–3, 1941; 1–2, 1942.

"A Tribute to W. E. Burghardt Du Bois." Phylon, 1949.

"The First Negro Novelist." Pittsburgh Courier, 30 May 1953.

"The Passing of Alain Leroy Locke." Phylon, 1954.

"Alain Locke's Relationship to the Negro in American Literature." Phylon, 1957.

Further Reading

- Bardolph, Richard. The Negro Vanguard. New York: Rinehart, 1959.
 Brawley, Benjamin Griffith. The Negro in Literature and Art in the United States. New York: Duffield, 1918, 1929.
 Brown, Sterling Allen. Negro Poetry and Drama. Washington, D.C.: Associates in Negro Folk Education, 1937.
 ———. The Negro Caravan: Writings by American Negroes. New York: Dryden, 1941.
 Cullen, Countee, ed. Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. New York: Harper, 1927.
 Johnson, James Weldon, ed. The Book of American Negro Poetry. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1931. (First published 1922.)
 Redding, J. Saunders. To Make a Poet Black. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1939.
 Wagner, Jean. Black Poets of the United States: From Paul Laurence Dunbar to Langston Hughes, trans. Kenneth Douglas. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973.
 White, Newman Ivey, ed. An Anthology of Verse by American Negroes. Durham, N.C.: Trinity College Press, 1924.

Brawley, Benjamin

Benjamin Griffith Brawley (1882–1939) was an author, a minister, and a college professor and administrator. He was born in Columbia, South Carolina, to parents who would have a profound impact on his career aspirations. In particular, his father, Edward McKnight Brawley, was a Baptist preacher and an instructor at Benedict College in South Carolina who served as president of a number of Baptist-affiliated colleges and was also a noted speaker and a proficient writer.

Benjamin Brawley, c. 1910. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Throughout his early years, Brawley traveled a great deal, as the family moved several times; he attended a number of elementary schools but also received home schooling. He earned bachelor's degrees from Atlanta Baptist College (later Morehouse College) and the University of Chicago and a master's degree from Harvard. As a young adult, Brawley was aware of the importance of cultural institutions such as the church and school in the African American community and began to dedicate his own professional life to preserving and promoting African American culture through the appreciation and celebration of literature. As a classroom teacher, he also tried to inspire his students with a similar hunger for African American culture. Brawley taught at Howard University, Atlanta Baptist College, and Shaw University (at Shaw, one of the oldest African American Baptist-affiliated colleges in North Carolina, he and his father were colleagues). In 1911, at Howard, he became a member of the faculty committee for the College of Liberal Arts, supervising the work of masters' candidates. In this capacity, he could instill in his students, and help them extract, ideas that would be critical to the next generation of African American scholars.

In 1920, Brawley had an opportunity to travel to Liberia, in western Africa, for six months. On this journey, he was able to explore his own religious beliefs and spread Baptist doctrine. When he returned to the United States, he was ordained as a Baptist minister. During a yearlong absence from the classroom, he served as a minister to the Messiah Baptist Church in Brockton, Massachusetts; however, an ideological conflict developed between him and the Baptist polity, and he resigned this post. The dispute had to do with the assimilationist thesis, which stressed faith over race as true patriotism; adherents of this thesis held that African Americans should develop into American citizens through American Christianity. With regard to this conflict, there was also a disagreement between Brawley and his father, who had taken a radical position but remained an active minister in the Baptist church. Still, despite their differences, Brawley esteemed his father's faith, articulate intelligence, and professionalism.

When Brawley returned to teaching, he was afforded time for scholarship and writing; this resulted in many works that captured African American cultural themes through literature, the arts, and history. Over the course of his career, Brawley produced seventeen books and more than twenty articles, including the following: History of Morehouse College, 1917; Africa and the War, 1918; Women of Achievement Written for the Fireside Schools under the Auspices of the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, 1919; A Short Social History of the American Negro, 1921; The Negro in Literature and Art in the United States, 1921; Doctor Dillard of the Jeanes Fund, 1930; Early Negro American Writers: Selections With Biographical and Critical Introductions, 1935; Paul Laurence Dunbar, 1936; and Negro Builders and Heroes, 1937. One particularly notable work of Brawley's was A Short History of the American Negro (1913), a collection of essays examining social, cultural, and historical issues relevant to African Americans; it received broad attention in both African American and mainstream news media. Another popular work of Brawley's was Paul Laurence Dunbar: Poet of His People, which has been reprinted numerous times.

In 1927, Brawley was nominated for an award from the Harmon Foundation, a philanthropic organization that sought out African American artists and intellectuals in order to support their creative efforts. He won second place, but he rejected the award because he and many of his colleagues believed that he had deserved first place.

As part of his work in preserving and promoting African American culture, Brawley concerned himself with the education and enlightenment of white Americans. He worked hard to explain the unique position of African Americans in American society to his white audiences, and in his essays and books of poems, he sought to provide a shared educational experience for white and African American readers. He was also a collector of materials documenting African American history and culture. His personal library contained a number of books on African American literature and history, including many signed first and limited editions. He also acquired one of the largest collections of manuscripts by and about the journalist and critic Richard Le Gallienne. Brawley bequeathed his manuscript and literary collections to Howard University's Moorland Spingarn Research Center in Washington, D.C. A collection of materials pertaining to Brawley himself is housed at the Moorland Spingarn Research Center, Manuscript Division.

Biography

Benjamin Griffith Brawley was born 22 April 1882, in Columbia, South Carolina; his parents were Edward M. and Margaret Saphronia (Dickerson) Brawley. In 1898–1901, he attended Atlanta Baptist College (Morehouse College) in Georgia, receiving a B.S. degree. He received an A.B. from the University of Chicago (1906) and an A.M. from Harvard University (1908). Brawley taught in Georgetown, Florida (1901); at Morehouse College as an instructor in English (1902) and then a professor of English (1906–1910); at Howard University as a professor of English (1910–1912, 1931); and at Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina, as a professor of English (1923–1931). He also served as dean of Morehouse College (1912). He married Hilda Damaris Prowd, of Kingston, Jamaica, in 1912 (they had no children). In 1920, Brawley went to Liberia to do a study of the republic. On 2 June 1921, he was ordained as a Baptist minister in Boston. Brawley died 1 February 1939.

IDA JONES

See also Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Harmon Foundation

Further Reading

- Dyson, Walter. Howard University, the Capstone of Negro Education: A History, 1867–1940. Washington, D.C.: Graduate School of Howard University, 1941.
- Logan, Rayford W. Howard University: The First Hundred Years, 1867–1967. New York: New York University Press, 1969.
- Logan, Rayford W., and Michael R. Winston, eds. Dictionary of American Negro Biography. New York: Norton, 1982.
- Sinnette, Elinor Des Verney, W. Paul Coates, and Thomas C. Battle, eds. Black Bibliophiles and Collectors: Preservers of Black History. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1990.
- Smith, Jessie Carney, ed. Notable Black American Men. Farmington Hills, Mich.: Gale Research, 1999.
- Who's Who in Colored America, 1928–1929*. New York: Who's Who in Colored America, 1929.

Briggs, Cyril

Although Cyril Valentine Briggs was born with a speech impediment that made it almost impossible to hold a conversation with him, he more than compensated for this disability with his deft organizational skills and his prolific pen. Briggs was at the forefront of black radical politics of the 1920s. The militant organization he founded, the African Black Brotherhood (ABB), helped advance the cause of black nationalism and advocated racial solidarity of the working classes. Briggs was also important as the author of numerous articles espousing black rights and communism, and for establishing several highly influential black radical periodicals, including the Crusader.

Briggs was born in Nevis, in the British West Indies. He was the illegitimate child of Mary M. Huggins, a woman of color, and Louis E. Briggs, a white plantation manager. Briggs himself was light-complexioned enough that he was later described as an “angry, blond Negro.” After graduating from grade school in 1904, he worked at a newspaper on Saint Kitts.

In 1905, Briggs immigrated to New York City, where he became part of a growing West Indian population. Between 1912 and 1915 he worked in a variety of positions for the Amsterdam News. In 1915, he became the editor of the Colored American Review, a black business magazine in Harlem; however, his work with this magazine ended after only two issues, perhaps because of his militant tone. He then returned to the Amsterdam News, writing pieces in which he urged self-determination for blacks and argued against the United States' involvement in World War I. Perhaps his most significant piece was a two-part editorial (5 and 19 September 1917) advocating an independent black nation within the United States. The publishers' growing censorship of his articles caused his break with the Amsterdam News in 1919.

Briggs established the Crusader in September 1918. In its early years, this periodical was the organ of the Hamitic League of the World, a group espousing "race patriotism." Briggs' stance is perhaps best summed up in an editorial, "Race Catechism," published in the inaugural issue of the Crusader. In it, he stressed that blacks should be proud of their race and be prepared to make any sacrifice for it.

The Crusader continued to emphasize race patriotism, but after the "red summer" of 1919 (a season marked by several bloody race riots) it became increasingly anticapitalist and anti-imperialist, as is evidenced in the editorial "The Salvation of the Negro" (April 1921). This editorial encapsulates Briggs's beliefs about saving the race by creating an autonomous black state "in Africa or elsewhere" and by establishing "a Universal Socialist Co-Operative Commonwealth."

The Crusader also became the voice of the African Blood Brotherhood, a semisecret paramilitary organization attempting to blend black nationalism with an interracial working-class program. The group, never numbering more than a few thousand, consisted largely of anglophone West Indians, including Claude McKay, W. A. Domingo, and Richard B. Moore. There was a close link between the ABB and the Communist (Workers') Party, and Briggs and most of the other ABB leaders would join the communists by 1921 (ABB would be dissolved in 1924).

Briggs and other members of the ABB became increasingly convinced that black liberation worldwide would necessitate bloodshed, particularly after the riot of 1921 in Tulsa, in which more than 50 whites and 150 blacks died. Although Briggs denied that the ABB had been involved in this riot, he praised the use of force by blacks. Accusations in the New York Times (June 1921) that the ABB was involved gave the organization much-needed publicity, which increased its numbers.

Briggs's increasingly communistic stance put him in conflict with Marcus Garvey. Initially, Briggs had been supportive of Garvey and Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). But he had made an unsuccessful overture to Garvey in an attempt to work with the UNIA at its convention in 1921; after this rebuff, Briggs became one of Garvey's sharpest critics, using the Crusader to wage a harsh campaign against him.

The Crusader—unlike Garvey's newspaper, the Negro World—was never able to reach a mass audience. Because of increasing government pressure and dwindling financial support, the Crusader ceased publication in 1922. Subsequently, Briggs headed the Crusader News Agency, which disseminated radical news items to some 200 newspapers. Briggs also published pieces in various forums for Marxist thought, including the Daily Worker and The Communist, on many of his long-term concerns.

Briggs went on to edit the Negro Champion, the house organ of the communist-backed American Negro Labor Congress (ANLC); and the Negro Liberator of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights (LSNR). Both the ANLC and the LSNR were attempts by the Communist Party to appeal to black nationalists. In these organizations, for the first time, the party began to emphasize the importance of race, not just class, in the effort to improve blacks' living conditions. The most radical proposal of the communists regarding the "Negro question" came at the Sixth World Congress, held in Moscow in 1928, when the Comintern (the international arm of the Socialist Party of Soviet Russia), declared that blacks in the American South had the right of self-determination as a "subject nation." Briggs was at the forefront of this controversial movement toward black self-determination.

By 1939, Briggs was expelled from the party because of his support of black nationalism over class issues, but he rejoined it soon after moving to Los Angeles in 1944. During the late 1950s, he worked as an editor with the Los Angeles Herald-Dispatch and the People's World. Briggs also became involved with younger black radicals in the 1960s, continuing his lifelong dedication to the cause of black nationalism until his death in 1966.

During much of his life, and during the years immediately after he died, Briggs was relegated to relative obscurity. However, a recent resurgence of interest in radical black politics and the reprinting of a full run of the Crusader have belatedly brought Briggs the attention he has long deserved.

Biography

Cyril Valentine Briggs was born 28 May 1888, on Nevis (or possibly, according to some sources, Saint Kitts), British West Indies. He graduated from the Ebenezer Wesleyan grade school on Saint Kitts in 1904. He immigrated to the United States on 4 July 1905 and became a naturalized U.S. citizen on 6 August 1918. He was the founder of the African Blood Brotherhood and editor of the Amsterdam News (1912–1915, 1916–1919), Colored American Review (1915), Crusader (1918–1922), Negro Champion, Negro Liberator, Los Angeles Herald-Dispatch, and People's World. Briggs died in Los Angeles 18 October 1966.

LOUIS PARASCANDOLA

See also African Blood Brotherhood; American Negro Labor Congress; Amsterdam News; Communist Party; Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus; Garvey, Marcus; McKay, Claude; Moore, Richard B.; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Riots: 3—Tulsa, 1921; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

- Haywood, Harry. Black Bolshevik: Autobiography of an Afro-American Communist. Chicago, Ill.: Liberator, 1978.
- Hill, Robert A., intro. and ed. The Crusader, 3 vols. New York: Kraus, 1987.
- Hutchinson, Earl Ofari. Blacks and Reds: Race and Class in Conflict, 1919–1990. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1995.
- James, Winston. Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in Early Twentieth-Century America. New York: Verso, 1998.
- Kornweibel, Theodore Jr. "Seeing Red": Federal Campaign Against Black Militancy, 1919–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Solomon, Mark. The Cry Was Unity: Communists and African Americans, 1917–1936. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.
- Thomas, Theman R. "Cyril Briggs and the African Blood Brotherhood: Another Radical View of Race and Class During the 1920s." Ph.D. diss., University of California, Santa Barbara, 1981.
- Vincent, Theodore G. Black Power and the Garvey Movement. San Francisco, Calif.: Ramparts, 1972.

Brimmer, B. J., Publishing House

B. J. Brimmer Publishing House was a short-lived company, based in Boston. It was founded in 1921 under the direction of the well-known African American poet and literary critic William Stanley Braithwaite, who was also editor in chief. Braithwaite was also editor of the annual Anthology of Magazine Verse; he previously had been with Cornhill, but he left when Brookes More gained control and stopped publishing the works of African American poets.

Brimmer primarily published poetry, nonfiction, and drama; it issued very few novels. Along with trade printings, the firm published titles in limited, signed editions, which were printed on handmade paper. Brimmer's list (which included Benjamin Rosenbaum's and Celia MacKinnon's first books of poems) reflected Braithwaite's interest in new poetry, as well as his desire to promote the work of new black poets. Among the company's publications were Bronze: A Book of Verse by Georgia Douglas Johnson (1922); The Poems of Seumus O'Sullivan by James Starkey (1923); and The Hills Give Promise, a Volume of Lyrics, Together With Carmus: A Symphonic Poem by Robert Sillman. The firm also published one nonfiction book by an African American, about black soldiers during World War II; and its list for spring 1924 included a novel by Joshua Henry Jones about the "race problem."

Despite Braithwaite's desire to help African American authors, and despite his influence with poets such as James Weldon Johnson, Countee Cullen, and Claude McKay, his primary interest was in white authors from New England. The names on his list of the best contemporary American poets in 1927 (at the height of the Harlem Renaissance) included Edwin Arlington Robinson, Robert Frost, Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, Edgar Lee Masters, Amy Lowell, Conrad Aiken, and Sara Teasdale (Hutchinson 1995, 355). Braithwaite's Anglocentric position was influenced by his assimilationist political stance and his view that American culture was a whole. In terms of his literary preferences, Braithwaite also held rather old-fashioned ideas about what literature should be, and he often balked at the writings of many black authors of the time, which were overtly racial and politically charged. As a result of his literary preferences and his sometimes questionable publishing practices—which included helping to create primarily vanity presses like Brimmer to promote the works of authors for whom he acted as a kind of agent—he lost influence as a critic throughout the 1920s. In fact, Braithwaite was criticized by Claude McKay in the latter's letters to Langston Hughes during this period.

At a time when new publishing companies like Alfred A. Knopf Inc., Harcourt Brace, and Boni and Liveright were on the rise in New York and were embracing new “modern” authors, Brimmer’s list of little-known and now hardly memorable writers such as Lucias Beebe, Mary Esther Cobb, Bella Flaccus, and Zoe Patricia Hobbs, combined with his unwillingness to join current trends in literature, proved fatal to the company’s financial success. B. J. Brimmer Publishing Company went bankrupt in 1927 and was ultimately of little importance to the publishing of the Harlem Renaissance, despite Braithwaite’s personal hope of contributing to the success of African American poetry.

APRIL CONLEY KILINSKI

See also Braithwaite, William Stanley; Cornhill; Cullen, Countee; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; McKay, Claude; Publishers and Publishing Houses

Further Reading

Dzwonkoski, David. “B. J. Brimmer Company.” In American Literary Publishing Houses, 2 vols., ed. Peter Dzwonkoski. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1986, p. 71.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Brooks, Clarence

Clarence Brooks was a pioneer in African American cinema, both in front of and behind the camera. Brooks was born in Texas but moved to Los Angeles after graduating from high school. In 1915, he met the brothers George P. and Noble Johnson, who would soon (in 1916) form the country’s first black-owned and -operated film production firm, the Lincoln Motion Picture Company. Brooks was part of a group of blacks who wanted to make films to counter the demeaning stereotypes that were so frequently in mass culture. Their aim was to portray African Americans realistically and seriously, and in particular to show the concerns and aspirations of a budding black middle class. These same sentiments characterized African American art and culture during the Harlem Renaissance.

Brooks served as secretary of the Lincoln company and was an actor in most of its films. He had a featured role in Lincoln’s first release, The Realization of a Negro’s Ambition (1916), the story of a graduate of Tuskegee Institute who leaves the farm to find his fortune out west. This was the first black film to offer a serious depiction—with no burlesque or buffoonery—of middle-class blacks, and it was well received in black communities throughout the United States. Lincoln quickly followed with Trooper of Company K (1916), a film about the massacre of black troops in the U.S. Army’s Tenth Cavalry. These films were a source not only of entertainment but of racial pride; for actors like Brooks, they provided an opportunity to play fully conceived characters that were in stark contrast to the unflattering stereotypes pervasive in mainstream studio films.

Brooks went into semiretirement after Lincoln went out of business in 1921. He was lured back to films, however, in 1928, when he played the part of a wounded veteran of World War I in Absent (produced by the Rosebud Film Corporation). Brooks would eventually become one of the most popular stars in black films. He also appeared in some big studio productions, most notably as the heroic Dr. Oliver Marchand in John Ford’s Arrowsmith (1931). Brooks’s role in Arrowsmith was one of the rare cases in which black actors were able to portray characters other than the standard racial stereotypes. Brooks earned strong reviews for his performance, but he was never to get another role of that caliber. Nevertheless, Brooks managed to put together a strong body of work, and he continued to appear in mostly black films, including a series of black cowboy westerns, throughout the 1930s and 1940s.

Biography

Clarence Brooks was born around 1895 in San Antonio, Texas; he moved to Los Angeles after graduating from high school. He studied dentistry for a short while at the University of Southern California before opening his own drugstore. In 1916–1921, he was the secretary of the Lincoln Motion Picture Company and appeared in most of its films. After Lincoln went out of business, Brooks returned to films in 1928 and remained a popular actor through the 1940s. The date of his death is unknown.

DWANDALYN R. REECE

See also Film: Actors; Johnson, Noble; Lincoln Motion Picture Company

Select Filmography

The Realization of a Negro's Ambition. 1916.
Trooper of Company K. 1916.
The Law of Nature. 1917.
A Man's Duty. 1919.
By Right of Birth. 1921.
Absent. 1928.
Georgia Rose. 1930.
Arrowsmith. 1931.
Murder in Harlem. 1935.
The Brand of Cain. 1935.
Lem Hawkins's Confession. 1935.

Further Reading

Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1977, 1993.
 Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Lanham, Md., and London: Scarecrow, 1995.

Brooks, Gwendolyn

Gwendolyn Elizabeth Brooks was born in 1917, at the very beginning of the Harlem Renaissance, was barely a teenager at its close, and spent most of her life in Chicago. While she thus cannot properly be called a participant in the renaissance, she is certainly one of its most distinguished students and heirs, receiving encouragement from such Harlem notables as Langston Hughes and James Weldon Johnson. Brooks was known for her astute blend of realism and romanticism, her striking ability with language, and her dedication to African American culture and to children; and she was the first African American to win a Pulitzer Prize.

Brooks was born in Topeka, Kansas, but grew up in Chicago. She began writing poetry in elementary school. Her mother, Keziah Wims Brooks, took her to public poetry readings and asserted that her daughter would one day be the “lady Paul Laurence Dunbar.” In 1930, Brooks’s first poem, “Eventide,” was published in American Childhood Magazine. While in high school she became a regular contributor to the column “Light and Shadows” in the Chicago Defender, with more than one hundred poems in print. She met and corresponded with Langston Hughes and James Weldon Johnson during this period (Hughes, especially, would be a lifelong supporter of her writing). They urged her to read modern poetry, especially such figures as T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, and e. e. cummings. Brooks developed her own distinctive voice and message, always reflecting a concern for issues of oppression but with more of a turn toward the political in the 1960s. However, the attention to craft urged and modeled by Hughes and other modernists is a hallmark of her entire body of work.

Gwendolyn Brooks. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Brooks’s first book of poetry, A Street in Bronzeville, was published in 1945 by Harper and Row. It was praised by the critics and helped earn her a place on Mademoiselle magazine’s list of “Ten Young Women of the Year.” Focusing on the daily lives of urban blacks, A Street in Bronzeville is marked by strong individualized voices, concern for issues of racial and intraracial discrimination and the lives of women, and compassion for all the lives represented. Three of the poems from this volume that have been most frequently anthologized and quoted are "The Sundays of Satin-Legs Smith," a day in the life of an urban zoot-suiter; "Gay Chaps at the Bar," about war veterans; and "The Mother," about abortion.

Annie Allen (which won the Pulitzer Prize) appeared in 1949. Divided into sections called "Notes From the Childhood and the Girlhood," "The Anniad," "Appendix to the Anniad," and "The Womanhood," the volume traces the experiences of an inner-city girl growing into womanhood. In "The Anniad," Brooks uses a variety of poetic techniques, including what she herself called the "sonnet-ballad," with the protagonist achieving an epic heroism in her daily struggles. Annie Allen juxtaposes a realistic approach to life with hopes and dreams for something better, demonstrating the complexities of ordinary human lives.

Brooks's one novel, Maud Martha, appeared in 1953; it consists of very short chapters—practically vignettes—and was drawn in part on her experiences as a maid. Maud Martha was greeted with some interest but also some confusion when it was published. It has been a subject of increasing interest in recent years, especially among feminist critics.

Throughout her life, Brooks advocated for and wrote about the needs of children. Her Bronzeville Boys and Girls (1956), a collection of thirty-four poems with traditional rhyme schemes, explores processes of self-discovery; these boys and girls could be children of any race or region. Another example is her Children Coming Home (1991). Twenty children living in poverty each have a poem describing the pains, joys, and challenges they find as they come home from school. In addition, Brooks passed along the mentoring and encouragement she had received from such Harlem figures as Hughes and Johnson, becoming very active in the poetry workshop movement—and perhaps more notably in poetry classes and contests for inner-city children, to which she devoted tremendous energy and gave both financial and personal sponsorship.

In 1967, Brooks attended the historic Fisk University Second Black Writers' Conference. She was both honored and influenced by such outspoken figures as Amiri Baraka and Ron Milner. She took an active role in the "black arts movement" from that time forward and began to host a poetry workshop in Chicago for such young poets as Sonia Sanchez, Nikki Giovanni, and Don L. Lee.

According to Cook (1993), Brooks's earlier poetry follows an "integrationist ideology," but she "turns from the image of the meek, suffering victim so well loved in earlier poetry to that of the raging, threatening avenger." But Williams (1997), among others, argues that elements of protest and an awareness of oppression were always present in Brooks's poetry, and that her radicalization in the 1960s and 1970s led rather to a shift in balance.

Brooks's more open attention to social and political issues can be seen in The Bean Eaters (1960), which includes such famous poems as "We Real Cool" and "A Bronzeville Mother Loiters in Mississippi. Meanwhile, a Mississippi Mother Burns Bacon," a response to the murder of Emmett Till. Notably, these poems were written before the conference at Fisk University, lending support to Williams's position. Brooks's In the Mecca (1968) shifts to more free verse and more black vernacular speech. The title poem traces a woman's search through a tenement for her murdered daughter. In the Mecca received a nomination for the National Book Award.

After many years with Harper and Row, in the 1970s Brooks switched to African American publishers, especially Broadside Press, out of Detroit. In the 1980s, Brooks established her own publishing house, the David Company of Chicago.

Brooks continued to write until the end of her life, publishing several more volumes of poetry and two autobiographies, Report from Part One (1972) and Report from Part Two (1996). Brooks received more than fifty honorary degrees, as well as two Guggenheim fellowships, the Frost Medal, and the title of poet laureate of Illinois (1968), among many other awards. In 1976, she became the first black woman elected to the 250-member National Institute of Arts and Letters. In 1985, she became a poetry consultant to the Library of Congress. The Gwendolyn Brooks Chair in Black Literature and Creative Writing was established at Chicago State University in 1990. In what she has described as her highest honor, she was named the Jefferson Lecturer by the National Endowment for the Humanities in 1994, and in 1995, she received a National Medal of Arts award. She considered the Gwendolyn Brooks Junior High School, just South of Chicago, equally important.

Through her poetry and the example of her life, Brooks carried on the legacy she herself inherited from the Harlem Renaissance and provided a bridge between it and the "black arts movement." Her influence seems likely to continue well into the future.

Biography

Gwendolyn Elizabeth Brooks was born in Topeka, Kansas, 7 June 1917. She graduated from Wilson Junior College in 1937. She worked as a maid, then as a secretary; she taught poetry workshops and creative writing at Columbia College beginning in 1963, and later at institutions including Northeastern Illinois University, Elmhurst College, Columbia University, Clay College of New York, and the University of Wisconsin. She married Henry Lowington Blakely Sr. in 1939; they had two children. Blakely and Brooks divorced in 1969, but they remarried in 1973. Brooks's awards included the following: Midwestern Writers' Conference Poetry Award, 1943, 1944, 1945; Eunice Tietjens Prize from Poetry (for Annie Allen), 1949; more than fifty honorary degrees; two Guggenheim fellowships; American Academy of Arts and Letters Grant, 1946–1947; Shelley Memorial Award; Frost Medal; the first Kuumba Award; a Senior Fellowship in Literature; Pulitzer Prize, 1950; appointment as poet laureate of Illinois, 1968; election to the National Institute of Arts and Letters, 1976; consultancy in poetry to the Library of Congress, 1985–1986; Lifetime Achievement Award, National Endowment for the Arts, 1989; Lifetime Achievement Award, National Book Foundation, 1994; Jefferson lectureship, 1994; and National Medal of Arts award, 1995. Brooks died in Chicago 3 December 2000.

KATHRYN WEST

See also Chicago Defender; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Literature: 7—Poetry; Modernism

Selected Works

A Street in Bronzeville. 1945.
Annie Allen. 1949.
Maud Martha. 1953.
Bronzeville Boys and Girls. 1956.
The Bean Eaters. 1960.
Selected Poems. 1963.
We Real Cool. 1966.
The Wall. 1967.
In the Mecca. 1968.

Family Pictures. 1970.
Riot. 1970.
The World of Gwendolyn Brooks. 1971.
Aloneness. 1971.
Black Steel: Joe Frazier and Muhammad Ali. 1971.
Aurora. 1972.
Report from Part One: An Autobiography. 1972.
Beckonings. 1975.
A Capsule Course in Black Poetry Writing. 1975.
Black Love. 1981.
To Disembark. 1981.
Primer for Blacks. 1981.
Young Poet's Primer. 1981.
Very Young Poets. 1983.
The Near-Johannesburg Boy and Other Poems. 1986.
Blacks. 1987.
Winnie. 1988.
Children Coming Home. 1991.
Report from Part Two: An Autobiography. 1996.

Further Reading

Bloom, Harold, ed. Gwendolyn Brooks: Modern Critical Views. 2000.
 Cook, William W. "The Black Arts Poets." In The Columbia History of American Poetry, ed. Jay Parini. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
 Kent, George E. A Life of Gwendolyn Brooks. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990.
 Melhem, D. H. Gwendolyn Brooks: Poetry and the Heroic Voice. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1987.
 Mootry, Maria K., and Gary Smith, eds. A Life Distilled: Gwendolyn Brooks—Her Poetry and Fiction. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
 Tate, Claudia, ed. Black Women Writers at Work: Conversations with . . .. New York: Continuum, 1983.
 Washington, Mary Helen. "Plain, Black, and Decently Wild: The Heroic Possibilities of Maud Martha." In The Voyage In: Fictions of Female Development, ed. Elizabeth Abel, Marianne Hirsch, and Elizabeth Langland. Hanover, N.H.: Dartmouth College/University Press of New England, 1983.
 ———. "'Taming All That Anger Down': Rage and Silence in the Writing of Gwendolyn Brooks." In Invented Lives: Narratives of Black Women, 1860–1960. New York: Anchor/Doubleday, 1987.
 Williams, Kenny J. "Gwendolyn Brooks" In The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Wright, Stephen Caldwell, ed. On Gwendolyn Brooks: Reliant Contemplation. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

Brooks, Shelton

Shelton Brooks was a well-known vaudeville entertainer who sang, danced, acted, performed comedy, and played the piano. He is best remembered as the composer of several hit songs between 1910 and 1918—songs that helped set off America's dance craze, furthered the careers of several popular singers, and became part of the standard repertoire of early jazz. Brooks was exposed to church music at an early age and taught himself to play the organ and then the piano. By age fifteen he was playing professionally in Detroit; in 1905, he moved to Chicago, where he became active as a vaudeville performer and an imitator of the comedian Bert Williams. Over the next sixteen years he starred in several plays and composed most of the songs for which he became famous.

Brooks began to establish a reputation as a songwriter in 1910, when the popular white vaudeville singer Sophie Tucker adopted his "Some of These Days" as her theme song. It was an overnight hit, sold more than 2 million copies as sheet music, and became a popular vehicle for jazz improvisation. Tucker herself recorded the tune several times and continued to sing it for the rest of her life. Brooks then wrote a string of hits that captured the spirit of the era: dancing, drinking, and good times. In 1911, Brooks wrote "All Night Long," which expressed the mood of drinking parties. The double-entendre song "I Wonder Where My Easy Rider's Gone" (1913) was popularized in performances and recordings by both Sophie Tucker and Mae West.

Brooks wrote three tunes that inspired nationally renowned dances when they were taken up by white dance troupes and shows: "Walking the Dog" (1916), "Darktown Strutters' Ball" (1917), and "I Want to Shimmie" (1918). "Darktown Strutters' Ball" became an instant dance (shimmy) favorite and was Brooks's biggest hit, eventually selling more than 3 million copies as sheet music. Despite its irresistible lyrics, "Darktown Strutters' Ball" received most attention as an all-instrumental version (1917) by the white Original Dixieland Jazz Band, which made it one of the earliest recorded jazz hits and a traditional jazz standard.

In 1922, Brooks moved to New York. He then worked mainly as a vaudeville actor on Broadway and in Europe, in popular shows such as the Plantation Revue and Blackbirds (in both of these, he played opposite Florence Mills). He also recorded during the "race records" boom of the 1920s. The majority of his nearly two dozen recordings are comedy skits. In 1923, he provided piano accompaniment for two vocal duets that he recorded on the Okeh label with singer Sarah Martin. Brooks was also Ethel Waters's piano accompanist on two Columbia recordings in 1926. In 1928, he produced and starred in the show Nifties. In 1927, he appeared in the short comedy film Gaiety.

In 1930, Brooks was the costar of a popular biweekly CBS radio show, Egg and Shell, and also performed on Broadway in the revue Brown Buddies, for which he cowrote the song "Don't Leave Your Little Blackbird Blue." Brooks also acted in and wrote two songs for the film Double Deal (1939). His last major appearance in New York was at Harlem's Apollo Theater in 1940. That same year, he was honored by the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP) as a composer. In the early 1940s, Brooks moved to Los Angeles, where he would perform in the burlesque tribute Blackouts for seven years. He continued performing into the 1960s and 1970s with other legends of his era, such as Eubie Blake and Ethel Waters.

Although Shelton Brooks spent much of his career as an entertainer on the musical stage, he wrote several of the century's best popular songs before 1920. His true legacy is that he was a member of a generation of multitalented, successful black entertainers and songwriters who pushed beyond the standard genre of minstrel and coon songs after 1910 and produced new material that inspired, influenced, and helped to shape trends in dance, show music, jazz, and twentieth-century American popular culture.

Biography

The composer, vaudevillian, and pianist Shelton Brooks was born 4 May 1886 in Amesburg, Ontario, Canada. By age fifteen he was playing professionally in Detroit; he moved to Chicago in 1905. From then until about 1920 he starred in plays and composed most of his famous songs. Brooks moved to New York in 1922 and continued to perform onstage, in recordings, and in films; he also costarred in a radio show in 1930. He moved to Los Angeles, California, in the 1940s and continued performing into the 1960s and 1970s. Brooks died 6 September 1975 in Los Angeles.

MICHAEL WHITE

See also Jazz; Mills, Florence; Singers; Waters, Ethel; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"

Selected Works

- "All Night Long." 1921.
- "Darktown Strutters' Ball." 1917.
- "Don't Leave Your Little Backbird Blue." 1930.
- "I Want to Shimmie." 1918.
- "I Wonder Where My Easy Rider's Gone." 1913.
- "Some of These Days." 1910.

Recordings

- "After All These Years." 1926. (As piano accompanist to Ethel Waters.)
- "I've Got What It Takes to Bring You Back." 1923. (Piano accompaniment and vocal duet with Sara Martin.)
- "Lost Your Mind." 1921. (Comedy skit with cast and orchestra.)
- "Original Blues." 1923. (Piano accompaniment and vocal duet with Sarah Martin.)
- "Throw Dirt in Your Face." 1926. (As piano accompanist to Ethel Waters.)

Further Reading

- Ewen, David. The Life and Death of Tin Pan Alley. New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1964.
- Jasen, David A., and Gene Jones. Spreadin' Rhythm Around: Black Popular Songwriters, 1880–1930. New York: 1998.
- Morgan, Thomas. "Shelton Brooks: A Profile." In Jazz Roots: Shelton Brooks Discography. <http://www.jass.com/sheltonbrooks/brooks.html>
- Shaw, Arnold. Black Popular Music in America. New York: Schirmer, 1998.
- Tucker, Sophie. Some of These Days. New York: Doubleday Doran, 1945.

Broom

Broom: An International Magazine of the Arts, an important literary publication of the 1920s, was intended as a showcase for the best work by living writers and artists. A cartoon on the back cover of the first issue (November 1921) depicts a character with a broom, suggesting an intention to sweep things clean; later, Gordon Craig's cover drawing for the fourth issue, of a figure thumbing its nose, implies an even stronger sense of defying the norm. However, Broom was not solely a magazine of the avant-garde or of experimental work. Rather, its content was eclectic: The first three issues included photographs of art by Pablo Picasso, Jacques Lipschitz, Fernand Léger, and Henri Matisse, among others, as well as poems, short stories, and criticism by writers such as Conrad Aiken, Amy Lowell, Sherwood Anderson, Wallace Stevens, Malcolm Cowley, Marianne Moore, and Gertrude Stein.

Broom was first published in Rome. Its founding editor was Harold Loeb, assisted by Alfred Kreymborg, but the two became divided over questions of finances and editorial policy, and Loeb announced Kreymborg's resignation in only the fourth issue. Edward Storer became the new associate editor, and Lola Ridge became the American editor, based in New York City. In the October 1922 issue, Loeb announced that the magazine was moving to Berlin; he also announced the appointment of another new associate editor, Matthew Josephson. Loeb continued to edit Broom from Berlin until March 1923, when lack of funding caused him to cease publication. Broom was later revived in New York City, in August 1923, under Josephson's editorship (though Loeb was still listed on the masthead), but it again ceased publication—this time permanently—in January 1924.

In the May 1922 issue, Loeb published an essay, "Foreign Exchange," in which he praised American expatriate writers, claiming that they could view the United States more objectively, and he began to publish poems and prose by writers such as John Dos Passos, e. e. cummings, and Robert Coates. In an essay for the September 1922 issue, "The Mysticism of Money," Loeb argued that the objects of industrialism such as "engines, forges, . . . motors, . . . automobiles, ships, aeroplanes," can be works of art that achieve "simplification, elimination of inessentials, balance and beauty." He also argued that materialism and the pursuit of money can be as great an inspiration for art as religion.

Several new American writers were published in Broom before its demise, including Kay Boyle, Hart Crane, and Jean Toomer—the latter an important figure in the Harlem Renaissance. Broom was one of the first English-language reviews of the arts in Europe, was representative of the post–World War I “lost generation,” and did much to expand artistic form and scope in the 1920s. It was judged by Kenneth Rexroth to have been the best literary magazine of the period.

J. P. STEED

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Toomer, Jean

Further Reading

Kreymborg, Alfred. Troubadour. New York: Liveright, 1925.

Loeb, Harold. The Way It Was. New York: Criterion, 1959.

Sarason, Bertram D. “Harold Loeb.” In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 4, American Writers in Paris, 1920–1939, ed. Karen Lane Rood. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1980.

Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters

The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters (BSCP) was a labor union formed in 1925 to represent the African American porters and maids who worked on the sleeping and dining cars of the Pullman railroad company. These workers were paid very little and had to rely on tips from the predominantly white passengers; moreover, their work hours were long and irregular, and their working conditions were deplorable—a situation that grew even worse after the federal government’s control of the railroads ended in 1920. The increasingly discontented workers began to organize to present their demands in common. In August 1925, they gathered at the Elks Club in Harlem to form their union, choosing A. (Asa) Philip Randolph as their leader. Randolph was a brilliant speaker, a cofounder and coeditor of the socialist newspaper The Messenger, and a committed advocate of equality for all African Americans; he did not work for Pullman, and so he was in no danger of recriminations from the company.

However, the BSCP grew very slowly. Pullman fought vehemently against it; used spies, threats, and indiscriminate firings to try and break it; used yellow-dog contracts, which were agreements whereby employees promised not to join it; and created a rival company-sponsored union. Pullman also induced conservative members of the black community, particularly ministers and preachers, to denounce the BSCP as socialist or communist and as interfering with a benevolent company that provided good jobs for loyal people. Moreover, while Randolph struggled for an agreement with Pullman, the BSCP also faced a battle for recognition from the American Federation of Labor (AFL), an umbrella organization that coordinated the activities of its member unions. The AFL had a long tradition of organizing only the most highly skilled workers in elite craft unions, and it had long ignored the needs of black workers. In 1928, although the federal Railway Labor Board had granted the BSCP the right to organize Pullman porters and maids, the AFL refused to grant the BSCP a charter, insisting that the right to organize porters had already been granted to the Hotel and Restaurant Employees (HRE), an AFL union. In 1934, Randolph was again rebuffed in his attempt to win an AFL charter, when the AFL’s executive council awarded jurisdiction over the Pullman porters to yet another union, the Order of Sleeping Car Conductors (OSCC), a white union that excluded blacks but nonetheless planned to accept African Americans into “auxiliary” locals. Eventually, though, the AFL did embrace the BSCP, because the brotherhood, which was led by socialists, took a strong stance against communist labor organizations (such as the American Negro Labor Congress) and seemed to the conservative AFL to be a bulwark against radical communists.

The ten-year struggle for recognition of the BSCP ended in 1935, when the Pullman company began negotiations. In addition to the BSCP’s own efforts and the solidarity of its members and leaders, other events helped coerce the company into cooperating. This was the Depression era, and President Franklin Roosevelt’s

BSCP at the Elks' Club. (Brown Brothers.)

New Deal legislation had outlawed company unions and yellow-dog contracts, and had guaranteed workers the right to bargain collectively. Thus, in 1935, the National Mediation Board awarded the BSCP sole jurisdiction over Pullman porters; and in 1936, the AFL finally welcomed the BSCP into the federation with an international charter. In 1937, the BSCP concluded its first labor contract with Pullman—the first agreement in American history between a major corporation and a black union.

Later History

By 1940, the BSCP was the most powerful black labor organization in the United States, and A. Philip Randolph was one of the nation's most powerful labor leaders. This enabled the BSCP to expand its activities beyond the workplace concerns of Pullman porters and maids. Beginning in the 1930s, the BSCP became a major force in the civil rights movement. There were several factors in this evolution. For one thing, the union had been so successful that many members were at an economic and social peak in black America, and they used their advantages and power to contribute to their communities. Another factor was Randolph's intelligence, energy, and connections, which helped the BSCP to become a major political force. Thus the BSCP could seek civil rights by mobilizing African Americans nationwide, with solid financial backing and increasing political influence.

As World War II began in China in 1937 and in Europe in 1939, white Americans rushed to fill lucrative new jobs in war industries, but African Americans remained relegated to the lowest-paying occupations. The BSCP intervened, and in 1941 Randolph organized the March on Washington (D.C.) movement. The African American community supported him, and the scope of the planned march grew, although President Roosevelt and other leaders, who worried that such obvious internal racial divisions would weaken the United States, tried to prevent it. Roosevelt and Randolph negotiated a settlement that included Roosevelt's signing of Executive Order 8802 in June 1941—an order banning discrimination in government employment or in any private business that had contracts with the federal government. Also, Roosevelt established the Fair Employment Practices Committee (FEPC), to ensure equal access to jobs. In exchange, Randolph canceled the march. He was criticized for this by many radical blacks, who argued that black Americans had never before organized a mass protest so successfully and that the march should proceed as planned. Randolph, for his part, argued that the government had made unprecedented concessions and that there might be a backlash among whites if blacks were seen as unpatriotic.

In 1947, Randolph again clashed with a president over civil rights. The beginning of the cold war and the expansion of the peacetime armed forces drew attention to segregation in the military. Randolph called on African Americans to refuse military service and refuse to register for the draft; he also founded the Committee against Jim Crow in Military Service and Training, which became the League for Non-Violent Civil Disobedience against Military Segregation; and he continued to lobby President Harry Truman and the Senate Armed Services Committee. On 26 July 1948, Truman signed Executive Order 9981, barring discrimination in the armed forces; in addition, he signed Executive Order 9980, establishing a new FEPC, which significantly improved on Roosevelt's earlier commission. (However, Jim Crow did not end in the military until 1953, during the Korean War, when a manpower shortage led many reluctant commanders to integrate their units.)

The BSCP continued to make its mark during the 1950s. When Rosa Parks was arrested in Montgomery, Alabama, on 1 December 1955, it was a member of the BSCP—E. (Edgar) D. Nixon—who organized a boycott of the city's public transportation. The bus boycott, which lasted for more than a year, first brought the young minister Martin Luther King Jr. into the national spotlight; this boycott also illustrates the significance of the BSCP in the civil rights movement. E. D. Nixon strongly believed that, although the civil rights movement could ensure that African Americans would have the legal right to ride on buses and Pullman cars, the labor movement was needed to ensure that they would have the money to pay the fare.

Still, the BSCP continued to encounter resistance from some longtime opponents. In 1955, the AFL and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) merged to form the AFL-CIO. Of its 15 million members, 1.5 million were black, and of twenty-nine vice presidents, Randolph was one of only two who were black. The BSCP objected to the constitution of the new AFL-CIO because, although it imposed punishments on member unions engaging in corrupt or communist activities, it provided no sanctions against unions violating workers' civil rights. During the AFL-CIO convention of 1959, Randolph and AFL-CIO president

George Meany engaged in an angry debate over the place of civil rights and desegregation in the labor movement. Meany wanted to let black local unions remain segregated and to give white unions more time to change their individual constitutions, whereas Randolph wanted all unions, black and white, ordered to desegregate within the year. (Meany made newspaper headlines when he shouted at Randolph, “Who the hell appointed you as the guardian of all the Negroes in America?”)

The BSCP’s efforts toward social advancement through economic security were threatened by economic downturns in the late 1950s, and during this time white unions were reluctant to admit black members. Randolph now called for a “March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom” that would highlight the interdependence of civil rights and economic self-sufficiency. The BSCP and other unions, notably the United Auto Workers (UAW), provided organizational and financial support, although Meany and the AFL-CIO refused to endorse the demonstration. The resulting march owed much to numerous groups and individuals, black and white, but the BSCP and A. Philip Randolph were the central force. More than 250,000 people took part in the demonstration, on 28 August 1963; this was the event at which Martin Luther King Jr. gave his famous “I Have a Dream” speech. In response to objections from President John Kennedy’s administration, Randolph, King, and other leaders met with Kennedy to air their grievances; the march helped to ensure passage of the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The march of 1963 was one of the BSCP’s last great victories. As fast, economical air travel and a new national highway system developed after World War II, the luxury train business declined steadily. The membership of the BSCP also dropped steadily; furthermore, its remaining members grew older, and their political influence and their ability to finance civil rights reform eroded. A. Philip Randolph retired from the BSCP in 1968, after forty-three years of service. In 1978, the BSCP merged with a larger union, the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks, and ceased to exist as an independent organization. Randolph died in 1979 at age ninety; his funeral was attended by numerous labor leaders, social activists, celebrities, and politicians, and by President Jimmy Carter.

JOHN CASHMAN

See also American Negro Labor Congress; Jim Crow; Labor; Messenger, The; Randolph, A. Philip

Further Reading

- Bracey, John H., August Meier, and Elliott M. Rudwick. Black Workers and Organized Labor. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1971.
- Brazeal, Brailsford Recse. The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. New York: Harper, 1946.
- Chateauvert, Melinda. Marching Together: Women of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1997.
- Davis, Daniel S. Mr. Black Labor: The Story of A. Philip Randolph, Father of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: Dutton, 1972.
- Grizzle, Stanley G., and John Cooper. My Name’s Not George: The Story of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters—Personal Reminiscences of Stanley G. Grizzle. Toronto: Umbrella, 1997.
- Hanley, Sally. A. Philip Randolph. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.
- Harris, William Hamilton. Keeping the Faith: A. Philip Randolph, Milton P. Webster, and the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, 1925–1937. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Pfeffer, Paula F. A. Philip Randolph: Pioneer of the Civil Rights Movement. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990.
- Reef, Catherine. A. Philip Randolph: Union Leader and Civil Rights Crusader. Berkeley Heights, N.J.: Enslow, 2001.
- Santino, Jack. Miles of Smiles, Years of Struggle: Stories of Black Pullman Porters. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989.
- Wilson, Joseph F. Tearing Down the Color Bar: A Documentary History and Analysis of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.
- Wright, Sarah E. A. Philip Randolph: Integration in the Workplace. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Silver Burdett, 1990.

Brown, Ada

Ada Brown, with her full, rich, mellow voice, earned a reputation as a talented vocalist during the Harlem Renaissance era, and she toured extensively on the vaudeville circuit throughout her career. She was born to a musical family in Kansas City, Kansas; her cousin James Scott was a noted ragtime composer and performer. Brown was said to have sung in clubs in Paris and Berlin as a teenager, and by 1910 she was singing at the Pekin Theater in Chicago. She had an active career singing the blues during the 1920s and 1930s, playing theater dates steadily on both coasts, recording in Chicago and St. Louis, and performing internationally as well. She toured with Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles's Step on It in 1922, and with Struttin' Time in 1924. In September 1923, she recorded one of her most popular songs, "Evil Mama Blues," for the Okeh label. She performed at the Lafayette Theater in Plantation Days in 1927, Bandana Land in 1928, and Tan Town Tamales in 1930. After Jangleland in 1931 and Going to Town in 1932, she appeared at the Apollo Theater in Hawaiian Moon and Jungle Drums in 1934. Brown was also one of the incorporators of the Negro Actors Guild of America in 1936. In the late 1930s, she sang with the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra in Chicago and at the London Palladium. In 1938, Brown appeared in the culturally diverse production International Rhythms with the Cecil Mack Choir, the Chinese dancer Princess Chiyo, and Mogiloff's Balalaika Orchestra.

Brown appeared with Thomas "Fats" Waller in the film Stormy Weather (Twentieth Century Fox, 1943), singing "That Ain't Right," along with such acclaimed performers as the legendary Lena Horne and Bill Robinson (both of whom played leading roles in this film), Cab Calloway and his band, Emmett "Babe" Wallace, Katherine Dunham and Dunham's dancers, Mae Johnson, and Flournoy Miller, among others. Stormy Weather was based on the story of Bill Robinson and his rise to the top of the show world. The film attracted significant attention from reviewers and audiences because, although its plot structure and content were simple, it was generously endowed with musical numbers.

In 1945, Brown returned to her hometown, Kansas City, where she died in 1950.

Biography

Ada Brown was born 1 May 1890 in Kansas City, Kansas. She toured with Flournoy Miller and Aubrey Lyles's Step on It (1922) and Struttin' Time (1924). Brown also performed in Plantation Days (1927), Bandana Land (1928), Tan Town Tamales (1930), Jangleland (1931), Going to Town (1932), Hawaiian Moon (1934), Jungle Drums (1934), and Stormy Weather (1943). She was a cofounder of the Negro Actors Guild of America (1936). Brown died in Kansas City, Kansas, 31 March 1950.

CARMEN PHELPS

See also Apollo Theater; Blues; Calloway, Cabell "Cab"; Henderson, Fletcher; Lafayette Theater; Lyles, Aubrey; Mack, Cecil; Miller, Flournoy; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Singers

Selected Works

"Evil Woman Blues." 1932.

"That Ain't Right." 1943.

Further Reading

The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who's Who. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1979.

Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1930.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Mapp, Edward. Directory of Blacks in the Performing Arts. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1978.

Peterson, Bernard. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow, 1995.

Spradling, Mary Mace, ed. In Black and White: A Guide to Magazine Articles, Newspaper Articles, and Books Concerning More Than 15,000 Black Individuals and Groups, 3rd ed., 2 vols. and supplement. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1980, 1985.

Brown, Hallie Quinn

Educator, author, temperance advocate, and renowned public lecturer Hallie Quinn Brown was born in Pittsburgh in 1850, the child of former slaves. She attended school in Pittsburgh and later in the African American expatriate community of Chatham, Ontario, where her family moved in the early 1860s. The family returned to the United States after the Civil War, and Brown received her bachelor of science degree from Wilberforce University in 1873, becoming one of the nation's first black female college graduates.

After graduation, Brown joined the caravan of teachers going South to minister to the freedpeople. She taught first at a plantation school in Mississippi, and later in public schools in Dayton, Ohio; and Columbia, South Carolina. She served as dean of Allen University, a college of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in Columbia; and in 1892, she accepted a position as woman principal of Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute. A year later, she returned to Wilberforce, her alma mater, as a professor of elocution.

Brown epitomized the late nineteenth-century ideology of "racial uplift." She was a prime mover in the formation of the National Association of Colored Women (NACW), an organization whose interwoven class, racial, and gender politics were neatly knotted in its memorable motto, "Lifting as we climb." She led the campaign against African American women's initial exclusion from the Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893, and spoke at the World's Congress of Representative Women that later convened at the fair. In her speech, Brown focused on black women's education, stressing the unparalleled progress of southern freedwomen and the need for a balanced training of head, hands, and heart. Invoking the domestic assumptions of her era and social class, she reminded her audience that mothers shaped the character of their sons, and that no race could progress beyond the attainments of its women.

The high-water mark of Brown's career came in the 1890s, but she remained active in the 1920s, when she was over seventy. She served as president of the NACW from 1920 to 1924, after which she was appointed lifetime honorary president. In 1924, she spoke at the Republican National Convention, pointedly reminding the delegates of their party's historical commitment to civil rights. In 1925, she organized a black boycott of the International Council of Women's All-American Musical Festival, in protest against Jim Crow seating in the theater.

Brown made her most important contribution to the decade of the 1920s as an author, publishing five books—collections of biographies and stories intended to edify and enlighten black readers. With their emphasis on respectability, domesticity, and proper elocution, the books were distinctly out of step with the aesthetic and political temper of the Harlem Renaissance, but they rang with their author's conviction and commitment to racial service. The most widely read was Homespun Heroines and Other Women of Distinction, a collection of sixty short, inspirational biographies of African American women, from the poet Phillis

Wheatley to the cosmetics mogul Madam C. J. Walker. In a passage as applicable to herself as to her subjects, Brown declared: "Regarded in the light of heroism, many Americans, bound and free, have passed on unhonored and unsung who yet were worthy of the olive crown and the victor's palm for their constancy, their courage and their firm belief in the ultimate triumph of justice."

Hallie Q. Brown died in Wilberforce, Ohio, in 1949.

Biography

Hallie Quinn Brown was born in 1850 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. She attended public schools in Pittsburgh and Chatham, Ontario; and Wilberforce University in Wilberforce, Ohio, (B.S., 1873). Brown taught in black schools in Mississippi, Ohio, and South Carolina; was a dean of Allen University in Columbia, South Carolina (1885–1892); was woman principal at Tuskegee Institute in Alabama (1892–1893); and was a professor of elocution at Wilberforce University (1893–1903). She was also a founder of the National Association of Colored Women (1893) and its president (1920–1924), and the president of the Ohio Federation of Colored Women's Clubs (1905–1912). Brown was a delegate to the World's Congress of Representative Women, Chicago (1893); the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union, London (1895); International Congress of Women, London (1899); and the World Missionary Conference, Edinburgh, Scotland (1910). She died in 1949 in Wilberforce, Ohio.

JAMES CAMPBELL

See also Higher Education; Walker, Madame C. J.

Selected Works

Bits and Odds: A Choice Selection of Recitations. 1880.

Elocution and Physical Culture. 1910.

First Lessons in Public Speaking. 1920.

The Beautiful: A True Story of Slavery. 1924.

Our Women, Past, Present, and Future. 1925.

Tales My Father Told. 1925.

Homespun Heroines and Other Women of Distinction. 1926.

Pen Pictures of Pioneers of Wilberforce. 1937.

Further Reading

Cooper, Anna Julia. A Voice From the South. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

- Fisher, Vivian Njeri. "Hallie Quinn Brown." In African American Women, ed. Dorothy C. Salem. New York: Garland, 1993.
- Johnson, George T. "Hallie Quinn Brown." In Dictionary of American Negro Biography, ed. Rayford W. Logan and Michael R. Winston. New York: Norton, 1982.
- Shaw, Stephanie J. "Black Club Women and the Creation of the National Association of Colored Women." Journal of Women's History, 3, Fall 1991, pp. 10–25.
- White, Deborah Gray. Too Heavy a Load: Black Women in Defense of Themselves, 1894–1994. New York: Norton, 1999.

Brown, Sterling

The literary scholar, university professor, poet, and folklorist Sterling Allen Brown was a major figure in twentieth-century African American letters. His scholarly essays, anthologies, and reviews were crucial to the development of African American literature as an academic discipline. Brown was also a highly esteemed teacher and curator of African American life and culture; one former student described him as a "repository of information and inspiration" (Baraka 1976). Furthermore, Brown's poems, evoking black folk expression, have become part of the canon and appear in numerous anthologies; and his experience as folklorist helped to shape his literary and academic career. As an editor of Negro Affairs for the Federal Writers'

Sterling Brown, second from left, in the 1940s. The others are the author Chester Himes (second from right), his wife, and Backlin Moore. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Project of the Works Progress Administration, as a Rosenwald Fellow, and as a staff member of the Carnegie-Myrdal Study, Brown was able to document various aspects of African American folk life as part of systematic studies of American culture.

Sterling A. Brown was born in 1901. His father, Sterling Nelson Brown, a professor of theology at Howard University and pastor of Lincoln Temple Congregational Church, was prominent in black society in Washington, D.C.; much of the younger Brown's early education was influenced by his father's associations. The son was virtually reared on the campus of Howard University, which had a faculty of African American intellectuals, and his father's acquaintances included African American leaders such as Frederick Douglass. Joanne Gabbin (1985/1994) notes that the father's church was the site of several debates between Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois and that it sponsored a major conference, "How to Solve the Race Problem," in 1903. Brown's mother, Adelaide Allen Brown, a graduate of Fisk University, was also an important influence, encouraging his literary interests.

Brown graduated in 1918 (as valedictorian) from Dunbar High School, then widely regarded as the premier secondary school for blacks in the United States. At Williams College—where he was on the debating team and the Common Club tennis team, was a member of Omega Psi Phi fraternity, and was inducted into Phi Beta Kappa—he was introduced to contemporary trends in literature such as realism and modernism, and began studying contemporary American literature, especially poetry. By the time he left Williams in 1922, he had begun to write poetry. In 1923, he earned his master's degree at Harvard University; later, he returned to Harvard for further graduate study toward a doctorate.

Brown taught English at Virginia Seminary in Lynchburg from 1923 to 1926; at Lincoln University in Missouri from 1926 to 1928; at Fisk University in Nashville in 1929; and ultimately for forty years, 1929 to 1969, at Howard University. Brown was a legendary figure at Howard during his tenure there—at one point in the 1960s, students supported an effort to rename the school after him—and many of his students became writers and literary scholars and consider him a major influence, not just as a teacher but also, in the words of one of them, as a "poet and anthologist and writer [who] gave us a great deal of inspiration" (Baraka 1976). Brown was offered posts at other institutions, such as Vassar College, but although he lectured and taught during summer sessions at Vassar and elsewhere, he remained at his beloved

Howard. He also maintained his teaching post at Howard while serving as an editor on the Federal Writers' Project and as a staff member of the Carnegie-Myrdal research project, and while writing creatively as a Guggenheim fellow. Indeed, the combination of all these duties and experiences probably enabled Brown to mine the richness of African American life and culture and infuse his poetry with it.

Undoubtedly, Brown's experience of African American folk culture—his extended stay in the rural South as a young professor, his work preserving folklore as part of the Federal Writers' Project, and his study of southern Negro life as a Rosenwald fellow—informed his creative and critical output. In particular, African Americans of the rural South would dominate his poetry as folk characters. Brown realized that this segment of American society was underrepresented or stereotyped in most American art and literature. Through his own experiences among "the folk," he developed a high regard for the vernacular tradition. He believed that folk forms such as blues, spirituals, and boasts were authentic and laudable forms of artistic expression, and he would immortalize them in his poetry. His "Southern Road," for example, uses the oral tradition of the work song:

Swing dat hammer—hunh—
Steady, bo';
Swing dat hammer—hunh—
Steady, bo';
Ain't no rush, bebbly,
Long ways to go. . . .

This verse also illustrates a common feature in Brown's poetry: dialect. James Weldon Johnson, in his preface to God's Trombones, had said that dialect was "absolutely dead"; but Brown revived the tradition, filling his own dialect poems with dignified and heroic figures and forcing Johnson to reevaluate the function of dialect in African American poetry. Later, Johnson acknowledged that although dialect grounded in the minstrel and plantation traditions could evoke only pathos or humor, authentic dialect treated with fidelity—as it was treated in Brown's ballads and folk epics—could be used to great effect.

Brown himself insisted on authentic documentation of folk life in folklore studies such as the Federal Writers' Project. He and the officials of the Federal Writers' Project developed detailed guidelines for interviewing and recording, so as to avoid intrusion and distortion by the writers and interviewers. Brown was especially concerned about presenting black dialect accurately in narratives of slavery; he recommended that "the stories be told in the language of the ex-slave, without excessive editorializing and 'artistic' introduction on the part of the interviewer" (Gabbin 1985/1994, 72–73). As a scholar, Brown also objected to inauthentic representations of black life in art and literature. His essays "A Century of Negro Portraiture" and "The American Race Problem as Reflected in American Literature" as well as his book-length text The Negro in American Fiction contrast stereotyped representations of African Americans by white authors with more accurate portrayals by blacks. Brown's insistence on realistic depictions of African American life was a profound contribution not only to the African American literary tradition, but to documenting black life in American history and consequently to creating a greater understanding of the African American experience.

Biography

Sterling Allen Brown was born 1 May 1901 in Washington, D.C. He attended public schools in the District of Columbia, including Dunbar High School; Williams College in Williamstown, Massachusetts (A.B., 1922); and Harvard University (A.M., 1923). He was elected to Phi Beta Kappa in 1921 and did additional graduate study at Harvard in 1931–1932. Brown taught at Virginia Seminary in Lynchburg, Virginia (1923–1926); Lincoln University in Jefferson City, Missouri (1926–1928); Fisk University (1928–1929); and Howard University (1929–1969). He was also a visiting professor at Vassar College (1942–1944), the University of Minnesota (1945), New York University (1949 and 1950), and the University of Illinois (Chicago Circle Campus, 1967 and 1968). Brown was an editor of Negro Affairs, Federal Writers' Project (1936–1940); a Guggenheim Fellow (1937–1938); a Julius Rosenwald Fellow (1942); and a staff member of the Carnegie-Myrdal research project. His awards included honorary doctorates from Boston, Brown, Harvard, Howard, Lincoln, Northwestern, and Yale universities; Lewis and Clark and Williams colleges; and the universities of Maryland (Baltimore County), Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania. He was poet laureate of the District of Columbia (1984). Brown died in Takoma Park, Maryland, 13 January 1989.

NATASHA COLE-LEONARD

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Federal Writers' Project; Guggenheim Fellowships; Johnson, James Weldon; Literature: 7—Poetry; Rosenwald Fellowships; Works Progress Administration

Selected Works

- "When De Saints Go Ma'ching Home." Opportunity, July 1927.
- "Negro Literature: Is It True? Complete?" Durham Fact-Finding Conference, 1929.
- "The Blues as Folk Poetry." In Folk-Say: A Regional Miscellany, ed. B. A. Botkin. 1930.
- "Our Literary Audience." Opportunity, February 1930.
- "James Weldon Johnson." In The Book of American Negro Poetry, ed. James Weldon Johnson. 1931.
- "Lonesome Valley." In Folk-Say: A Regional Miscellany, ed. B. A. Botkin, 1931.
- Outline for the Study of the Poetry of American Negroes*. 1931.
- "A Literary Parallel." Opportunity, May 1932.
- "In Memoriam: Charles W. Chesnutt." Opportunity, December 1932.
- Southern Road: Poems by Sterling A. Brown*. 1932.
- "Negro Character as Seen by White Authors." Journal of Negro Education, April 1933.
- The Negro in American Fiction*. 1937.
- The Negro in Washington*. 1937.
- Negro Poetry and Drama*. 1937.
- "Problems of the Negro Writer." Official Proceedings, National Negro Congress, 1937.
- "The Negro in American Literature." In James Weldon Johnson, a Biographical Sketch. 1938.
- "The American Race Problem as Reflected in American Literature." Journal of Negro Education, July 1939.
- The Negro Caravan*. 1941. (As coeditor.)
- "The Negro Writer and His Publisher." Quarterly Review of Higher Education Among Negroes, July 1941.
- "Out of Their Mouths." Survey Graphic, November 1942.
- "Words on a Bus." South Today, Spring 1943.
- "Farewell to Basin Street." Record Changer, December 1944.
- "Georgia Sketches." Phylon, Summer 1945.
- "Georgia Nymphs." Phylon, Autumn 1945.
- "The Muted South." Phylon, Winter 1945.
- "And/Or." Phylon, Fall 1946.
- "The Approach of the Creative Artist." Journal of American Folklore, October–December 1946.
- "Negro in American Theatre." In Oxford Companion to the Theatre, ed. Phyllis Hartnoll. 1950.
- "In the American Grain." Vassar Alumnae Magazine, February 1951.

- "The Blues." Phylon, Autumn 1952.
- "Seventy-Five Years of the Negro in Literature." Jackson College Bulletin, September 1953.
- "Negro Folk Expression: Spirituals, Seculars, Ballads, and Work Songs." Phylon, Winter 1953.
- "The New Negro in Literature, 1925–1955." In The New Negro Thirty Years Afterwards, ed. Rayford Logan et al., 1955.
- The Reader's Companion to World Literature*. 1956. (As coeditor.)
- "A Century of Negro Portraiture in American Literature." Massachusetts Review, Winter 1966.
- "Arna Bontemps, Co-Worker, Comrade." Black World, September 1973.
- "The Last Ride of Wild Bill" and Eleven Narrative Poems. 1975.
- The Collected Poems of Sterling A. Brown*, ed. Michael S. Harper. 1996.
- A Son's Return: Selected Essays of Sterling A. Brown*, ed. Mark A. Sanders. 1996.

Further Reading

- African American Review* (Fall 1997). (Various essays.)
- Baraka, Amiri. "Sterling Brown: A Repository of Information and Inspiration." In Sterling A. Brown: A UMUM Tribute, ed. Black History Museum Committee. Philadelphia, Pa.: Black History Museum UMUM Publishers, 1976. (See also expanded edition, 1982.)
- Bentson, Kimberly. "Sterling Brown's After Song: 'When de Saints Go Ma'ching Home' and the Performances of Afro-American Voice." Callaloo, February–May 1982.
- Fuller, Hoyt W. "The Raconteur." Black World, April 1967.
- Gabbin, Joanne V. Sterling A. Brown: Building the Black Aesthetic Tradition. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1985. (Reprint, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1994.)
- . "Sterling Brown's Poetic Voice: A Living Legacy." African American Review, Fall 1997.
- Harper, Michael. "Sterling Brown, 1901–2001." Parnassus, 1980.
- Henderson, Stephen. "A Strong Man Called Sterling Brown." Black World, 1970.
- . "The Heavy Blues of Sterling Brown: A Study of Craft and Tradition." Black American Literature Forum, 1980.
- Palmer, Ronald D. "Memories of Sterling Brown." African American Review, Fall 1997.
- Rowell, Charles H. "'Let Me Be With Ole Jazzbo': An Interview With Sterling A. Brown." Callaloo, Fall 1991.

Sanders, Mark A. Afro-Modernist Aesthetics and the Poetry of Sterling A. Brown. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1999.

Tidwell, John Edgar, and John S. Wright. "Sterling A. Brown, Afro-American Poet: A Special Section." Callaloo, February–May 1982.

Tidwell, John Edgar, and John S. Wright. "Sterling A. Brown Tribute." Black American Literature Forum, Spring 1989.

Brownies' Book, The

The Brownies' Book, the nation's first magazine for African American children and young adults, was created by three people from the publication The Crisis: W. E. B. Du Bois, editor; Jessie Redmon Fauset, literary editor; and Augustus G. Dill, business manager. The debut issue of The Brownies' Book appeared in January 1920, with this description: "A monthly magazine for the children of the sun, designed for all children but especially for ours." This first issue also included a dedicatory poem by Fauset, expressing the importance of providing black children with a history and literature of their own.

While other children's magazines and schoolbooks perpetuated grotesque stereotypes of the "dark continent," The Brownies' Book highlighted the honor, integrity, and beauty of African and African American life. The first issue, for instance, included a photograph of African American children in the South protesting violence against blacks. In the June 1920 issue, the article "A Little Talk About West Africa" was accompanied by a full-page photograph of West African children posing in front of their school. Summer issues published the names, pictures, accomplishments, and plans of graduates of African American boys' and girls' high schools.

For fifteen cents a copy or $1.50 per year (twelve issues), readers of The Brownies' Book were offered an array of materials, including African, West Indian, Native American, and European legends, fables, and tales, as well as photographs, riddles, puzzles, and songs from around the globe. Each issue contained biographical profiles of historical figures, such as Sojourner Truth, Harriet Tubman, Toussaint-Louverture, Crispus Attucks, and Phillis Wheatley. Regular columns included "Little People of the Month," featuring news about individual children, particularly their academic and artistic achievements. In "The Judge," conversations between an adult and children offered lessons of love, kindness, and friendship. "As the Crow Flies" provided international news updates. "The Jury" comprised letters from young readers, while "The Grown-Ups' Corner" provided a forum for their parents' concerns, such as the lack of positive role models for African American youth and the imposition of white values on them. The Brownies' Book became renowned for its race consciousness, high educational standards, and mature presentation to children of complex information. The magazine's few advertisements were mainly suggestions for books and educational programs and activities.

The Brownies' Book featured work by numerous notable and up-and-coming artists and writers. Langston Hughes, who was then a recent high school graduate, published several plays, poems, and short stories in 1921; these brought him to Jessie Fauset's attention and so launched his career. Nella Larsen's first publications, articles on Scandinavian children's games, appeared in June and July 1921 under the byline Nella Larsen Imes. The Brownies' Book also published pieces by Georgia Douglas Johnson, James Weldon Johnson, and Arthur Huff Fauset, among others. Jessie Fauset, who was a tireless promoter of women, chose poems and stories by Mary Effie Lee and Mary White Ovington, and illustrations by Laura Wheeler, Hilda Wilkinson, and Louise Latimer. Almost all the artwork in The Brownies' Book was by African Americans, as were the many contributions by children of all ages. Along with selecting and editing the content of each issue, Jessie Fauset herself contributed dozens of articles, poems, and stories.

The Brownies' Book ran for two years, publishing twenty-four issues. The last issue, in December 1921, ran a full-page message to readers explaining regretfully that because it had too few subscribers, the magazine could no longer sustain itself. The Brownies' Book continues to stand virtually alone as a venue devoted to promoting self-respect, hope, and pride in African American children.

KRISTIN KOMMERS CZARNECKI

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Arthur Huff; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; Larsen, Nella; Ovington, Mary White

Further Reading

Allen, Carol. Black Women Intellectuals: Strategies of Nation, Family, and Neighborhood in the Works of Pauline Hopkins, Jessie Fauset, and Marita Bonner. New York and London: Garland, 1998.

Johnson-Feelings, Dianne, ed. The Best of The Brownies' Book. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Sinnette, Elinor. "The Brownies' Book: A Pioneer Publication for Children." Freedomways, 1965, pp. 133–138.

Sylvander, Carolyn Wedin. Jessie Redmon Fauset, Black American Writer. New York: Whitston, 1981.

Wall, Cheryl. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Bruce, John Edward

John Edward Bruce was a journalist, historian, writer, orator, and pan-African nationalist. He was born in 1856 in Piscataway, Maryland, to enslaved parents: Robert Bruce and Martha Allen Clark. When Bruce was three years old, his father was sold, never to be heard from again. Bruce and his mother joined a regiment of Union soldiers passing through Maryland in 1860, and so escaped to freedom in Washington, D.C. In 1864, they moved to New York state; later they moved to Stratford, Connecticut, where they remained for two years and where, at an integrated school, Bruce received his first formal education. Although he was largely self-educated, Bruce did receive private instruction in Washington, D.C., and enrolled in a three-month course at Howard University.

After leaving Connecticut, Bruce, then eighteen years old, found a job as a helper in the office of the Washington correspondent for the New York Times in 1874. Around the same time he became the special correspondent for the Progressive American. Thus began a fifty-year career in journalism, during which Bruce would write for more than forty newspapers and other periodicals in the United States and around the world. Between 1877 and 1880 he wrote for or sent letters to the Richmond Star of Virginia; the Freeman's Journal of St. Louis, Missouri; the World of Indianapolis; and the St. Louis Tribune. He then became a Washington correspondent for the Chicago Conservator; North Carolina Republican; Enterprise of Fayetteville, North Carolina; New York Freeman; Reed City Clarion; Detroit Plaindealer; Christian Index; and Cherokee Advocate. Many of his articles also appeared in European-American publications such as the Boston Transcript and the New York Times.

Bruce also founded and edited several newspapers. In 1879, at age twenty-three, he founded the Argus of Washington, D.C., which he managed for two years. In 1880, he established the Sunday Item, the first Sunday newspaper ever founded and run by an African American. In 1882, he became editor of the Republican of Norfolk, Virginia; in 1884, he was the assistant editor and business manager of the Commonwealth of Baltimore; from 1896 to 1901 he was the associate editor of Howard's American Magazine of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; and in 1903, he was editor of a monthly, The Impending Conflict of New York City. In 1884, he founded the Washington Grit as a campaign sheet, dedicated to Republican Party politics and African advancement. In that year he also began writing regular columns under the pen name "Bruce Grit" in the Gazette of Cleveland and in New York Age, the journal of the fiery civil rights activist T. Thomas Fortune. Grit—implying courage and resoluteness—was the name Bruce would be known by throughout his long career. In 1887, he became a special correspondent for New York Age. Three years later he joined Fortune's Afro-American League; in 1898, he joined its successor, the Afro-American Council. Both groups advocated African solidarity and aggressiveness in combating abuses of human rights.

Bruce was independent-minded, despite his close collaboration with Fortune, who was a fierce opponent of Booker T. Washington (Bruce would attend the conference that founded the anti-Washington Niagara movement in 1905). In 1897, Bruce cofounded the Chronicle in New York City with Charles Anderson, Washington's lieutenant in the city's Republican Party. In 1908, Bruce cofounded, again with Anderson, the Weekly Standard in Yonkers, New York. Bruce also edited the Masonic Quarterly in New York City. His articles and editorials appeared not only in newspapers across the United States, but also in parts of Africa, the Caribbean, and Europe, including Duse Mohamed Ali's African Times and Orient Review, which was based in London. Bruce also wrote essays, short stories, plays, poems, and the music and lyrics to songs.

Bruce worked Washington, D.C., until around 1900, when he moved to New York State—first to Albany, then to New York City and Yonkers. He was married twice: first to an opera singer, the contralto Lucy Pinkwood of Washington, D.C., who presumably died before his second marriage, on 10 September 1895, to Florence A. Bishop of Cleveland. He and his second wife had one child, a daughter named Olive.

Bruce was a powerful and popular orator with a strong interest in African history. Many of his speeches and articles focused on the achievements of the African past and the importance of history to counteract white supremacy and its effects on the African psyche. He wrote several pamphlets dealing with African history, as well as two books—Short Biographical Sketches of Eminent Negro Men and Women in Europe and the United States (1910) and a fictional work, The Awakening of Hezekiah Jones (1916). In 1911, in Yonkers, Bruce and the Afro–Puerto Rican bibliophile Arthur A. Schomburg founded the Negro Society for Historical Research. In 1908, Bruce was made a member of the Africa Society of England. President Arthur Barclay of Liberia also made him a Knight of the Order of African Redemption. In 1913, Bruce founded the Loyal Order of the Sons of Africa, which intended to establish its headquarters in Africa and to achieve global pan-African unity.

Bruce was not only an independent but also a fiercely nationalistic thinker. Throughout his life, he refused to join any organization run or supported by Europeans, and in his work as a journalist and activist he largely ignored them. Much of his work excoriated European-American society, and he directed his attention chiefly to the struggle for human rights of Africans in the United States and later to fostering their political and economic ties with Africa. He stood outside the mainstream thought of elite and middle-class African Americans of his day. His views combined nationalist goals—economic independence, cultural pride and solidarity, and self-directed group initiatives—with an unrelenting agitation for political, civil, and human rights. Among other things, he urged that Africans in the United States use merciless armed retaliation to combat pogroms and lynching by European mobs. He insisted that although Africans were to remain politically a part of the United States, they should resist assimilation into European-American culture and society. After World War I, when pogroms intensified, he preferred the objective of national independence on the African continent, maintaining that European-American oppression would remain inflexible. His belief in an independent national destiny led him, in the period around 1919, to embrace Marcus Garvey's pan-African nationalism. As a member of Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association, Bruce wrote columns for the movement's Negro World and the Daily Negro Times.

Despite his enormous productivity, Bruce found that for most of his adult life, he needed to earn a living by working for the Port Authority of New York. After he retired in 1922, he received a small pension until his death in New York City two years later.

Biography

John Edward Bruce was born in Piscataway, Maryland, 22 February 1856. He escaped with his mother to Washington, D.C., in 1860; they moved to New York state in 1864. Bruce attended school in Stratford, Connecticut. He was a helper in the office of the Washington correspondent for the New York Times and special correspondent for the Progressive American (1874) and wrote for the Richmond Star of Virginia; the Freeman's Journal of St. Louis, Missouri; the World of Indianapolis; and the St. Louis Tribune (1877–1880). He was a Washington correspondent for the Chicago Conservator; North Carolina Republican; Enterprise of Fayetteville, North Carolina; New York Freeman; Reed City Clarion; Detroit Plaindealer; Christian Index; and Cherokee Advocate. He also wrote articles for the Boston Transcript, Washington Evening Star, New York Times, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Buffalo Express, Albany Journal, Times Union, Press Knickerbocker, the Sunday edition of the Albany Argus, and Sunday Republican of Washington, D.C. Bruce founded the Argus of Washington, D.C. (1879); Sunday Item (1880); and Washington Grit (1884). He was editor of the Republican of Norfolk, Virginia (1882); assistant editor and business manager of the Commonwealth of Baltimore (1884); associate editor of Howard's American Magazine (1896–1901); and editor of the monthly The Impending Conflict (1903). Bruce was also a columnist for the Gazette of Cleveland and New York Age (1884) and a special correspondent for New York Age (1887). He joined the Afro-American League in 1890 and the Afro-American Council in 1898, and cofounded the Chronicle in New York City (1897) and the Weekly Standard in Yonkers (1908). He published Short Biographical Sketches of Eminent Negro Men and Women in Europe and the United States (1910) and The Awakening of Hezekiah Jones (1916). He cofounded the Negro Society for Historical Research (1911) and founded the Loyal Order of the Sons of Africa (1913). He was made a member of the Africa Society, England (1908), and a Knight of the Order of African Redemption by Liberia's President Barclay. Bruce joined the United Negro Improvement Association around 1919. He was married twice (his second marriage was in 1895). He retired from the Port Authority of New York in 1922 and died in New York City 7 August 1924.

AHATI N. N. TOURE

See also Ali, Duse Mohamed; Anderson, Charles; Black History and Historiography; Black Press; Fortune, Timothy Thomas; Garvey, Marcus; Journalists; Negro World; New York Age; Niagara Movement; Pan-Africanism; Schomburg, Arthur A.; United Negro Improvement Association

Selected Works

The Blot on the Escutcheon. 1890.

Blood Red Record: A Review of the Horrible Burnings and Lynchings by Civilized White Men in the United States. 1901.

A Defense of Colored Soldiers. 1906.

Short Biographical Sketches of Eminent Negro Men and Women in Europe and the United States. 1910.

The Awakening of Hezekiah Jones: A Story Dealing With Some of the Problems Affecting the Political Rewards Due the Negro. 1916.

Tribute for the Negro Soldier. 1918.

Prince Hall: The Pioneer of Negro Masonry. 1921.

The Making of a Race. 1922.

Further Reading

Bullock, Penelope L. The Afro-American Periodical Press, 1838–1909. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

Ferris, William H. The African Abroad or His Evolution in Western Civilization: Tracing His Development Under Caucasian Milieu, Vol. 2. New Haven, Conn.: Tuttle, Morehouse, and Taylor, 1913. (Reprint, New York: Johnson Reprint, 1968.)

Gatewood, Willard B. Aristocrats of Color: The Black Elite, 1880–1920. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1990.

Gilbert, Peter. The Selected Writings of John Edward Bruce: Militant Black Journalist. New York: Arno and New York Times, 1971.

Logan, Rayford W., and Michael R. Winston, eds. Dictionary of American Negro Biography. New York: Norton, 1982.

Newkirk, Pamela. Within the Veil: Black Journalists, White Media. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Penn, I. Garland. The Afro-American Press and Its Editors. Springfield, Mass.: Willey, 1891. (Reprint, New York: Arno and New York Times, 1969.)

Pride, Armistead S., and Clint C. Wilson II. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.

Salzman, Jack, David Lionel Smith, and Cornel West, eds. Encyclopedia of African-American Culture and History, Vol. 1. New York: Simon & Schuster Macmillan, 1996.

Thorpe, Earl E. Black Historians: A Critique. New York: Morrow, 1971.

Wesley, Charles H. "Racial Historical Societies and the American Heritage." Journal of Negro History, 37, January 1952.

Wesley, Charles H. "Evaluation of the Black Studies Movement: The Need for Research in the Development of Black Studies Programs." Journal of Negro Education, 38, Summer 1970.

Bubbles, John

John William Sublett, better known as John Bubbles, was born in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1902. In 1919, he teamed with Ford Lee "Buck" Washington. While working at various odd jobs in carnivals and at a racetrack, they developed a theatrical act, Buck and Bubbles. It featured Bubbles' superfast rhythmic tap dancing and Buck's piano accompaniment, as well as Buck's artfully lackadaisical parody of Bubbles's dance style, all peppered with laconic dialogue.

Buck and Bubbles moved to New York in 1921 and soon broke into white vaudeville at the Palace Theatre, bypassing the black Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA) circuit. They were headliners on the prestigious Keith Circuit and in shows by the white producer Nat Nazarro (Hot Chops in 1922 and Raisin' Cain in 1923).

Criticism of his dancing style from the tap experts of the legendary Hoofers' Club angered Bubbles. Touring west in vaudeville, he rehearsed endlessly; and on his return he silenced his critics, establishing himself as one of the all-time greats of tap, on a par with Bill "Bojangles" Robinson—in fact, many people considered him technically superior to Bojangles. Bubbles is credited with being the originator of a style known as rhythm-tap or jazz-tap, with innovative use of the heel through the "cramp roll" step, and four-to-the-bar rhythm phrases, rather than the traditional two-to-the-bar. His creative approach to tempo was a forerunner of later developments in bebop.

Throughout the 1920s, Buck and Bubbles were popular on stage and in films. They were featured performers in Lew Leslie's Blackbirds of 1930 and the Ziegfeld Follies of 1931. In 1935, Bubbles reached the peak of his career when he created the role of Sportin' Life in the original Broadway production of Porgy and Bess. His status as a dancer was already assured, and this performance also showed him to be a talented dramatic actor and a singer of considerable appeal. His Sportin' Life is still considered by many to be the definitive portrayal.

Buck and Bubbles, c. 1937. (Photofest.)

In 1936, Buck and Bubbles performed in London, where they starred in a revue, Transatlantic Rhythm; made records; and were featured performers in the inaugural broadcast of BBC's television service. They continued to perform in films and onstage throughout the 1930s, although the film roles available to them reflected the usual stereotypical pattern for blacks in Hollywood. A notable exception was Bubbles's memorable stick-and-stair dance in the all-black movie Cabin in the Sky (1943).

The duo continued successfully until Buck's death in 1955. Bubbles then dropped out of the limelight for a time, but he later resumed an active career in television, as a guest on celebrity shows with stars like Lucille Ball, Bing Crosby, and Perry Como. In 1964, he formed a nightclub act with the singer Anna Maria Alberghetti and toured in Vietnam, Thailand, the Philippines, Guam, and Korea with Bob Hope's show. In 1967, Bubbles revisited his old vaudeville haunt, the Palace, as a supporting act in a comeback performance by Judy Garland; but shortly thereafter he suffered a stroke that effectively ended his career.

In 1980, Bubbles appeared, in a wheelchair, in an all-black commemorative show, Black Broadway; also in 1980, he received a Certificate of Approval from the mayor of New York City and a lifetime achievement award from the American Guild of Variety Artists. Bubbles died in 1986.

Bubbles' singing style can be heard on an available CD recording of Porgy and Bess and also in occasional compilations, including a Vee-Jay vinyl LP of 1964, "Bubbles, John W. That Is"; this LP recording has not been issued on CD but can still be found secondhand.

Biography

John William Sublett, also known as John Bubbles, was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on 19 February 1902 and attended grammar and high school there. In 1919, he formed a partnership, Buck and Bubbles, with Ford Lee "Buck" Washington. Bubbles' stage appearances included Hot Chops (1922), Raisin' Cain (1923), Weather Clear (1927), Track Fast (1927), Blackbirds of 1930, Ziegfeld Follies of 1931, Harlem on Parade (1935), Porgy and Bess (1935), Transatlantic Rhythm (London, 1936), Virginia (1937), Frolics of 1938, Laugh Time (1943), Carmen Jones (1944), At Home at the Palace (with Judy Garland, 1967), and Black Broadway (1980). In 1964, he toured in Asia with Bob Hope. He also had many nightclub engagements. Bubbles's films included Foul Play, In and Out, Honest Crooks, High Toned, and Dark Town Follies (all shorts made in 1929–1930); Calling All Stars (Britain, 1937); Varsity Show (1937); Cabin in the Sky (1943); I Dood It (1943); Atlantic City (1944); Buck and Bubbles Laugh Jamboree (1945); Mantan Messes Up (1946); A Song Is Born (1948); and No Maps on My Taps (1978). He appeared in the inaugural BBC television broadcast in 1936 and made many guest appearances on television. In 1980, he received the American Guild of Variety Artists Lifetime Achievement award and a Certificate of Approval from Mayor Edward Koch of New York City. Bubbles died 18 May 1986 in Baldwin, California.

BILL EGAN

See also Blackbirds; Blacks in Theater; Dance; Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 3—London; Film; Film: Actors; Gershwin, George; Heyward, DuBose; Jazz; Musical Theater; Porgy and Bess; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Vaudeville

Further Reading

Fisher, James. "Bubbles, John." In American National Biography, Vol. 3, ed. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

- Frank, Rusty. Tap! The Greatest Tap Dance Stars and Their Stories. New York: Da Capo, 1990.
- Goddard, Chris. Jazz Away From Home. New York: Paddington, 1979. (For a discussion of John Bubbles's tempo innovations, see pp. 90–103.)
- Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary for the Era. New York: Methuen, 1984. (See "Bubbles, John," p. 60.)
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn., and London: Greenwood, 2001. (See "Buck and Bubbles," p. 38.)
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Sourcebook on Black Films. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow, 1977. (See especially "Buck and Bubbles," p. 229.)
- Slide, Anthony. The Encyclopaedia of Vaudeville. Westport, Conn., and London: Greenwood, 1994. (See "Buck and Bubbles," p. 71.)
- Stearns, Marshall, and Jean Stearns. Jazz Dance: The Story of American Vernacular Dance. London: Macmillan, 1968. (See especially ch. 22.)

Burleigh, Harry Thacker

Harry (Henry) Thacker Burleigh was the earliest African American to compose American art songs and to arrange African American choral spirituals and the so-called concert solo spiritual for solo voice with piano accompaniment. His art songs amount to some 265 vocal compositions, including three song cycles. He arranged about 187 choral spirituals, scoring them for unaccompanied mixed chorus; some of these he had heard from the grandfather who helped raise him in his hometown, Erie, Pennsylvania—his grandfather called these spirituals plantation songs. Harry T. Burleigh was also a singer of great repute. He was a baritone soloist at the wealthy and prestigious Saint George Episcopal Church in New York City for fifty years, and at Temple Emanu-El, also in New York City, for twenty-five years. He became an institution at Saint George's, where he established an annual concert of African American music and began a tradition of singing Fauré's "The Palms" at every Palm Sunday service.

Burleigh became the first American person of color to make his living through music as a composer, arranger, and singer. His first professional studies were with the Czech composer Antonín Dvořák at the National Conservatory of Music in New York. Burleigh initially made a reputation through this association with Dvořák, who said that Burleigh had given him an understanding of the music of African Americans and had inspired him to encourage American composers to develop an indigenous music and style rather than rehashing the European tradition.

Burleigh was a pioneer in the development of the concert version of African American spirituals and was the catalyst for the use of spirituals arranged for solo voice in recitals by most of the major performing artists of color, including Roland Hayes and Marion Anderson, as well as a number of prominent white artists during this period and later. Of great interest is Burleigh's setting (1917) of "Deep River" for solo voice, which helped establish him as an arranger of spirituals for solo voice and piano. However, a better-known work is his earlier arrangement (1913) of "Deep River" for a cappella mixed chorus (SATB). Burleigh's choral and solo arrangements of spirituals are considered a valuable contribution to the American choral and art song repertoire. However, his freely composed secular art songs have not been widely recognized since the early years of the twentieth century.

Whether or not it has been adequately acknowledged—and although he received some adverse criticism from African American and white colleagues—Burleigh's creative output has undeniably enriched the African American as well as the American musical tradition. He concertized extensively and was the first artist of color to demonstrate that African Americans could perform the operatic and art-song literature that was at the heart of the serious recital program.

During his last year at the National Conservatory, Burleigh had been engaged to teach voice. From 1913 until his death, he worked as a music editor for Ricordi Music Publishers. As a result, a great deal of his music was published—a reward that many composers would relish.

Biography

Harry (Henry) Thacker Burleigh was born in Erie, Pennsylvania, 2 December 1866. He attended the National Conservatory of Music in New York City; was a baritone soloist at Saint George, 1894–1946, and at Temple Emanu-El, 1900–1925; and made extensive tours as a soloist in the United States and abroad (including a recital tour in England in 1908). He also appeared with Booker T. Washington on fund-raising tours. Burleigh was an editor with G. Ricordi Music Publishers, 1911–1946. His awards included honorary degrees, a Spingarn Medal in 1917, and a Harmon Foundation award in 1929. Burleigh died 12 September 1949.

MALCOLM BREDA

See also Anderson, Marian; Hayes, Roland; Singers

Further Reading

Allison, Roland Lewis. "Classification of the Vocal Works of Harry T. Burleigh (1866–1949) and Some Suggestions for Their Use in Teaching Diction in Singing." Ph.D. diss., Indiana University, 1966. (Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms.)

"H. K. M. in Retrospect . . . Harry T. Burleigh (1866–1949): 'Deep River' Popularizes a Composer." Black Perspective in Music, 2 Spring 1974. (Reprinted from Boston Evening Transcript, 10 March 1917.)

Janifer, Ellsworth. "H. T. Burleigh Ten Years Later." Phylon, 21, 1960.

Lee, Henry. "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot." Black Perspective in Music, 2, Spring 1974.

Simpson, Anne Key. Hard Trials: The Life and Music of Harry T. Burleigh. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1990.

Synder, Jean Elizabeth. "Harry T. Burleigh and the Creative Expression of Bi-Musicality: A Study of an African-American Composer and the American Art Song." Ph.D. diss., University of Pittsburgh, 1992.

Walton, Lester A. "Harry T. Burleigh Honored Today at Saint George's." Black Perspective, 2, Spring 1974.

Bush, Anita

The theater entrepreneur and actress Anita Bush was born in 1883 in Washington, D.C.; she moved to Brooklyn, New York, with her parents by the age of two. Her father was a tailor for people in show business, and Bush, who made deliveries for him, soon became fascinated with the theater. As a child, she appeared onstage at the Bijou and Columbia theaters in Brooklyn and the Park Theater in Manhattan, playing bit parts in Fatal Wedding and Antony and Cleopatra. In 1903, at age thirteen, with her father's consent, she began her career with the Williams and Walker traveling show as a chorus girl in In Dahomey, In Abyssinia, and Mr. Lode of Koal. Her love of drama—and of greasepaint, costumes, and backstage life—led to a "marriage" with the theater that would take her to Cincinnati, Chicago, and Phoenix, and on a tour of In Dahomey in London and Scotland. In 1909, George Walker's illness forced the Williams and Walker company to close; but soon thereafter Bush became the head of her own professional drama company. She wanted to prove to blacks and whites alike that black performers could succeed in doing what white performers were doing on Broadway, and her company disdained stereotypical comic song and dance.

The Anita Bush Stock Players, or Anita Bush Theater Company, first played at the Lincoln Theater on 135th Street in Harlem, in November 1915. When the white proprietor of the theater, Maria C. Downs, insisted that the company should be called the Lincoln Stock Players, Bush refused and moved her players to a rival theater on 132nd Street: the Lafayette, which was managed by two blacks, Lester Walton and Eugene Elmore. On 2 March 1916, the company assumed the name Lafayette Players.

Bush, who became known as the "mother of Negro drama," remained an active member of the company until 1920 and received critical acclaim as a star in The Girl at the Fort, Across the Footlights, The Gambler's Sweetheart, The Octoroon, New York After Dark, Wanted—A Family, When the Wife's Away, For His Daughter's Honor, The Lure, and Within the Law. Her own talent and the sophistication of the company brought an invitation for her to start up touring Lafayette Players in major cities. These tours gave many actors across the country their start.

In 1921, Anita Bush appeared in the silent movie The Crimson Skull, an all-black western mystery; in 1923, she appeared in The Bull-Dogger and a black cowboy film, Girl of the Golden West (1923). The Exhibitor's Herald said that these films "prove conclusively that the Black cowboy is capable of doing anything the white cowboy does."

During the 1930s and 1940s, Bush appeared in a production by the Works Progress Administration, Swing It (1938), taught acting at the Harlem YMCA (then an important theatrical venue), and served as executive secretary for the Negro Actors Guild. She retired from the theater in 1943. Bush died in 1974, at age ninety-one.

Biography

Anita Bush was born in 1883 in Washington, D.C.; her family moved to Brooklyn, New York, in 1885. Bush was a stage and screen actress from 1903 to the 1930s and the founder of the Anita Bush Stock Players, which later became the Lafayette Players. She was also executive secretary for the Negro Actors Guild. Plays in which she was involved included Fatal Wedding, Antony and Cleopatra, In Dahomey, Abyssinia, Mr. Lode of Koal, Across the Footlights, The Gambler's Sweetheart, The Octoroon, New York After Dark, Wanted—A Family, When the Wife's Away, Roanoke, Southern Life, For His Daughter's Honor, The World Against Him, Within the Law, Paid in Full, and Swing It. His films included The Crimson Skull (1921), The Bulldoggers (1923), and Girl of the Golden West (1923). Bush died 19 February 1974 in the Bronx, New York.

SHIRLEY BASFIELD DUNLAP

See also Anita Bush Theater Company; Lafayette Players; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater

Further Reading

- Andrews, William L., Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, eds. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Haskins, James. Black Theater in America. New York: Crowell, 1982.
- Richards, Larry. African American Films Through 1959: A Comprehensive, Illustrated Filmography. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1998.
- Sampson, Henry T. A Source Book on Black Films. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1977.
- Tanner, Jo A. Dusky Maidens: The Odyssey of the Early Black Dramatic Actress. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1992.
- Thompson, M. Francesca. "The Lafayette Players, 1917–1932." In The Theater of Black Americans, Vol. 2, The Presenters—The Participants. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1980.
- Willis, Cassandra. "Anita Bush." Hatch-Billops Collection, Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, Harlem. New York: New York City Library, 1972. (Interview by Willis; sound recording.)

Buttitta, Anthony J.

Anthony J. Buttitta contributed to the Harlem Renaissance primarily through the literary magazine Contempo, which he and Milton Abernathy launched in 1931 when they were both students at the University of North Carolina. Buttitta and Abernathy envisioned

Contempo as a forum in which to explore new ideas and encourage literary controversy. In an effort to broaden the magazine's content and establish it as a southern mouthpiece for the Harlem Renaissance, Buttitta recruited black writers to submit poetry, essays, and short fiction and also reviewed texts by black authors. Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, James Weldon Johnson, Walter White, and Wallace Thurman were among those asked to submit work. Buttitta did not see himself solely as a patron of black writers, however. He also asked James Weldon Johnson and Langston Hughes to read a manuscript that he himself was working on and to help promote his own career.

Hughes visited Buttitta for several days in November 1931, and the two became close friends and colleagues. As a result, Hughes published four poems and one article in Buttitta's magazine, including the poem "Christ in Alabama," which was on the front page of a special issue on the Scottsboro case. The issue drew heavy criticism from outraged journalists, faculty members, and local advertisers (many of whom withdrew their support from the magazine), but Buttitta and Abernathy did not abandon their mission or their relationship with Hughes. Hughes became a contributing editor for December 1931 issue and was supposed to edit a "Negro Arts Edition" of Contempo, although that edition never materialized.

The idea of a southern publication of black literature appealed to many, including White and Cullen, but Buttitta had difficulty finding contributors for the "Negro Arts Edition," because some of the writers he approached were already overcommitted and were unable to write new pieces. Buttitta's special issue of Contempo was also beleaguered by poor timing relative to other anthologies that were already being produced. He might have succeeded a decade earlier, but by 1932, there was little room for his collection in the literary marketplace; similar issues of Vanity Fair and Palms were out, in addition to anthologies by Alain Locke, Charles S. Johnson, Countee Cullen, and James Weldon Johnson. Finally, internal struggles between Buttitta and the other editors at Contempo made the completion of the special issue impossible. Buttitta separated from the failing magazine by October 1932, and the division ultimately led to its end in 1934. After he left Contempo, Buttitta's interest shifted from African American literature to F. Scott Fitzgerald, whom he met in 1935, and to the Federal Theater Project.

Buttitta, Anthony J.

Although he made an important contribution to the Harlem Renaissance through his publication of Hughes's poetry, Buttitta was never a major figure in the movement. Indeed, his failure to complete the "Negro Arts Edition" of Contempo suggests that the Harlem Renaissance was, to a considerable extent, a northern, urban movement, and that it had already peaked by the time he sought to bring it to the South.

Biography

Anthony J. Buttitta was born 26 July 1907, in Chicago. His parents were Giacomo Buttitta, a businessman, and Nina Buttitta, a teacher. He attended Normal College in Natchitoches, Louisiana (1926–1928), received his B.A. from the University of Texas (1929), and pursued graduate study at the University of North Carolina. He was married to Remy Horton in 1932 (they were divorced in 1941), and later to Monica Hannasch. Buttitta was the founder and editor of Contempo (1931–1933); a freelance newspaper correspondent (1932–1935); a press representative for the North Carolina Symphony Orchestra in Chapel Hill (1935); a staff member of the Federal Theater Project (1936–1938); a press representative for Roanoke Island, North Carolina (1938–1940); a press agent on Broadway (1939–1945); a public relations staffer in the U.S. Army (1943–1944); a press representative for the San Francisco Civic Light Opera (1931–1962); and a freelance writer (from 1962 on). His publications (as Tony Buttitta) include Singing Piedmont (1937); "Scott: One More Emotion" (1974); After the Good Gay Times: Asheville, Summer of 1935: A Season With Scott Fitzgerald (Viking, 1974, reprinted in 1987 as The Lost Summer: A Personal Memoir of F. Scott Fitzgerald); Uncle Sam

Presents: A Memoir of the Federal Theatre, 1935–1939 (with Barry Witham, 1982); "Contempo Caravan: Kites in a Windstorm" (1985); "Thank You, Malcolm!" (1989); The Singing Tree (1990); "A Memoir of Faulkner in the Early Days of His Fame" (1999); and "William Faulkner: That Writin' Man of Oxford" (1999). His other works include an unpublished novel, No Resurrection; a one-act play first produced in Natchitoches at State Normal College, Barataria (1927); a three-act play first produced in Chapel Hill at the University of North Carolina, Playthings (1931); and a memoir, Never a Stranger (forthcoming at the time of the present writing).

AMANDA M. LAWRENCE

See also Contempo; Cullen, Countee; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, James Weldon; Locke, Alain; Palms; Scottsboro; Thurman, Wallace; Vanity Fair; White, Walter

Further Reading

- "Anthony Buttitta." In Contemporary Authors: A Biographical Guide to Current Writers in Fiction, General Nonfiction, Poetry, Journalism, Drama, Motion Pictures, Television, and Other Fields, ed. Frances Carol Locher, Vol. 81. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1979, p. 72.
- Buttitta, Tony. "Contempo Caravan: Kites in a Windstorm." In Dictionary of Literary Biography Yearbook, ed. Jean W. Ross. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1986, pp. 109–124.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Calloway, Cabell “Cab”

Cab Calloway was born into a middle-class family in Rochester, New York, and moved to Baltimore when he was eleven. A rebellious youth, he spent almost as much time at the racetrack as in school, but he did manage two years of classical voice training during his teens. He was more attracted to ragtime and jazz, and the glamour of entertainment in general, than to his studies, and picked up work as a jazz singer and drummer at speakeasies in Baltimore. He often encountered his teachers at these illegal clubs, but he and they maintained their respective silence, and Calloway continued to perform.

Calloway's sister Blanche, who had already ventured into show business in New York and sung in Shuffle Along, returned to Baltimore in 1927 with a touring company of Plantation Days. Calloway begged his reluctant sister to get him an audition with the company; she did, and it was successful. Against his mother's wishes, he traveled with the show on the Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA) circuit, until it closed in Chicago in 1928. A brief and insincere stint at Crane College notwithstanding, Calloway spent most of his time in Chicago hustling singing work in local clubs, until steady work at the Dreamland Café and the Sunset Club came along. Here he met Louis Armstrong, who suggested that he develop freer, scat-style singing. This accorded well with Calloway's flamboyant personality, and Calloway became as much of a showman as a singer, often serving as master of ceremonies for the night's entertainment. The highlight of an evening's show with the Alabamians at the Sunset Club, for example, was a wild call-and-response song with Calloway and the orchestra all shouting into megaphones.

In 1929, Calloway and the Alabamians made their debut in Harlem at the Savoy Ballroom, but they bombed after the first song—their Chicago sound was not hot enough for the Harlem crowd. Desperate to salvage the two-week contract, the booking agent set up a battle of the bands between the Alabamians and the Savoy's house band, the Missourians. The Alabamians were cut to pieces, but Calloway's flamboyant stage presence stole the show. Now unemployed, Calloway, on Louis Armstrong's recommendation, was hired for the Broadway and Boston runs of Hot Chocolates. After it closed in early 1930, the Savoy's agent, remembering Calloway's triumph, hired him to front the Missourians, but got them a better job: opening the new Plantation Club on 126th Street. What should have been a milestone event for Calloway crumbled when the club was ransacked by mobsters affiliated with the rival Cotton Club hours before opening night. Fortunately, Calloway and the Missourians secured work at the Crazy Cat, which was frequented by an upscale clientele and broadcast on radio every night.

This brief stint drew attention to the band, particularly from the mobsters running the Cotton Club. Through implied threats, they persuaded Calloway to break the Missourians' contract with the Crazy Cat and substitute at the Cotton Club while the house band, the Duke Ellington Orchestra, toured the West Coast. The Calloway band and its flashy leader were a hit, and they filled in for Ellington during his frequent absences until they themselves became the house band in 1931. Calloway's performances at the Cotton Club guaranteed him a national radio contract and the attention of the star-studded crowd at this prestigious Harlem venue. George Gershwin saw him there and based the character Sportin' Life in Porgy and Bess on Calloway. Gershwin even offered Calloway the role in the first production, in 1935, but Calloway, who was becoming increasingly popular, declined, citing scheduling conflicts. It was at the Cotton Club that Calloway adopted "Minnie the Moocher" as his theme song. After the addition of the "hi-de-hi-de-hi-de-ho" call-and-response between Calloway and the audience, it was an instant hit nationally, and it became his life-long signature piece. The Cotton Club meant stardom, national and international tours, and movie contracts, which all came between 1931 and 1936. Responses to Calloway ranged from the respect and enthusiasm of European audiences to frenzied adulation among many college students and African American fans to occasional threats and violence at segregated dances during several trips in the South.

Although Calloway was now immersed in the Harlem entertainment scene, he had had little contact with the leaders or ideas of the Harlem Renaissance. Harlem was certainly "the place for a Negro to be," according to Calloway, but he never felt connected to the literary movement. He observed that "the two worlds, literature and entertainment, rarely crossed. We were working hard on our thing and they were working hard on theirs." Also, Calloway's flamboyant stage show was hardly suitable for the great concert halls to which most renaissance leaders aspired for African American musicians.

During the mid-1930s, Calloway's tours and radio show helped bring both white and black swing bands, most notably those from New York, to national prominence. But though his orchestra, early in the decade, was serviceable for a Cotton Club revue, it did not approach the caliber of Ellington's or Fletcher Henderson's units. This began to change as Calloway increased the size of the band from ten to sixteen pieces, the standard complement for a swing orchestra, and added a number of hot young players to replace the Missourians. The tenor saxophonist Chu Berry, hired away from Henderson, and the legendary bassist Milt Hinton were added in 1936; the fiery (and troublesome) young trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie and drummer Cozy Cole joined the band in 1939; and the tenor sax player Ben Webster and the trumpeters Jonah Jones and Mario Bauza also played under Calloway. By 1941, Calloway had one of the great ensembles of the era, and he rode the wave of swing's popularity until after World War II. Economic problems caused the breakup of virtually all the big bands between 1946 and 1948, the year Cab Calloway's orchestra folded permanently.

Cab Calloway. (Brown Brothers.)

Calloway performed infrequently after 1948. Between 1952 and 1954, he finally played Sportin' Life in a famous revival of Porgy and Bess. That plus a tour as Horace Vandergelder in Hello, Dolly! from 1967 to 1971 and record royalties guaranteed financial security for him and his family.

Biography

Cabell "Cab" Calloway was born in Rochester, New York, 25 December 1907. He was educated in public schools in Baltimore and at the Downingtown Industrial and Agricultural School; pursued vocal studies with Llewelyn Wilson and Ruth Macabee in Baltimore; and attended Crane College in Chicago (1928), though he did not graduate. Calloway sang in the touring company of Plantation

Days (1927–1928); at the Dreamland Café and the Sunset Club in Chicago (1928); with the Alabamians at the Savoy Ballroom in Harlem (1929); in Hot Chocolates (1929–1930); and with the Missouriians, substituting for the Ellington Orchestra at the Cotton Club (1930–1931). Cab Calloway and His Cotton Club Orchestra were the house band at the Cotton Club in 1931–1934 and made occasional appearances there in 1934–1940. Calloway's first record contract was with Brunswick; he recorded his first hit, "Minnie the Moocher," in 1931. He went on national tours in 1931–1948 and a European tour in 1935. He was on the radio show Quizzicale (NBC Blue Network), a black version of Kay Keyser's Kollege of Musical Knowledge, in 1942. Calloway's orchestra disbanded in 1948. Calloway played Sportin' Life in Porgy and Bess on Broadway (1952–1954) and Horace Vandergelder in Hello, Dolly! (1967–1971). He died in Hockessen, Delaware, 19 November 1994.

WILLIAM J. NANCARROW

See also Armstrong, Louis; Cotton Club; Hot Chocolates; Jazz; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Musicians; Porgy and Bess; Savoy Ballroom; Singers

Selected Recordings

- "Minnie the Moocher." 1931. (Dates are of recordings, not publication.)
 "Bugle Call Rag." 1931.
 "Reefer Man." 1932.
 "Zaz Zuh Zaz." 1933.
 "At the Clambake Carnival." 1938.
 "Pluckin' the Bass." 1939.
 "Ratamacue." 1939.
 "Pickin' the Cabbage." 1940.
 "Jonah Joins the Cab." 1941.
 "Special Delivery." 1941.
 "Let's Go Joe." 1942.

Films

- The Big Broadcast*. 1932.
The Singing Kid. 1936.
Saint Louis Blues. 1937.
Ali Baba Goes to Town. 1937.
Stormy Weather. 1943.
Dixie Jamboree. 1944.

Further Reading

- Calloway, Cab, and Bryant Rollins. Of Minnie the Moocher and Me. New York: Crowell, 1976.
 Dance, Stanley. The World of Swing. New York: Scribner, 1974. (See also 2nd ed., Da Capo, 2001.)
 Gillespie, Dizzy, and Al Fraser. To Be, or Not . . . to Bop: The Autobiography of Dizzy Gillespie. New York and London: Quartet, 1983.
 Haskins, James. The Cotton Club. New York: Random House, 1977; London: Robson, 1985. (See also 3rd ed., Hippocrene, 1994.)
 Popa, Jay. Cab Calloway and His Orchestra. Zephyrhills, Fla.: Joyce Record Club, 1987.

Calverton, V. F.

The socialist V. F. Calverton was one of the most significant figures of the American intellectual left during the first half of the twentieth century. "V. F. Calverton" was a pseudonym, adopted by George Goetz so that his involvement in socialist politics would not compromise his position as a public school teacher. As Calverton, he founded, with others, Modern Quarterly, an influential magazine of intellectual debate with a Marxist point of view. The magazine published essays of literary criticism, book reviews, and articles exploring economics, politics, and race relations in the United States. As editor, Calverton controlled the content of the magazine, and he wrote essays and book reviews for virtually every issue. During the mid- to late 1920s, Modern Quarterly dealt frequently with issues of race, with both black and white writers participating. The issue of October–December 1925 included an article by W. E. B. Du Bois on the significance of the Harlem Renaissance. Other black intellectuals, including Alain Locke, the composer Clarence Cameron White, the sociologist E. Franklin Frazier, and the musicologist Carl E. Gehring also wrote articles for the magazine. Besides providing a forum for black writers, Modern Quarterly reviewed many books coming out of the Harlem Renaissance. Calverton's positive review of Langston Hughes's Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), for example, helped ensure the book's success.

During the 1920s and 1930s, Calverton and his wife opened their home at 2110 East Pratt Street in Baltimore as a sort of a salon, a place to discuss politics and the arts. These weekly gatherings quickly became known as one of the few—and one of the most stimulating—opportunities for black and white intellectuals to mingle freely. Although Baltimore was not the intellectual center that New York and Washington, D.C., were, important leftists of the day made it a point to stop at “2110” on their way between those two major cities. Guests included the educator Charles S. Johnson, the novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald, Alain Locke, and Langston Hughes, who gave a lecture on the blues.

Calverton, V. F.

In 1929, Calverton published Anthology of American Negro Literature, which included poetry, fiction, drama, music, criticism, and historical essays, as well as an introduction in which he argued for the uniqueness and importance of black culture. Later, he published books on sexual liberation and psychology.

Biography

V. F. Calverton (whose real name was George Goetz) was born in Baltimore, Maryland, 25 June 1900. He studied engineering at the Baltimore Polytechnic High School (1914–1916) and liberal arts at City College, an academic high school in Baltimore (1918); he then studied at Johns Hopkins University (B.A., 1918–1921). He taught at Baltimore Public School 40 (1920–1929), Baltimore Labor College (beginning in 1926), and the Rand School of Social Science in New York (summers, beginning in 1926). He was the founder and editor of Horizon magazine (one issue, 1922) and Modern Quarterly (1923–1940). He died 20 November 1940 in Baltimore.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fine Clothes to the Jew; Frazier, E. Franklin; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Locke, Alain; Modern Quarterly; White, Clarence Cameron

Selected Works

Modern Quarterly. 1923–1940.
The Newer Spirit: A Sociological Criticism of Literature. 1925.
Anthology of American Negro Literature. 1929. (As editor.)

Further Reading

Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left. New York: Avon, 1965.
Abbott, Philip. Leftward Ho!: V. F. Calverton and American Radicalism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.

———. “Utopia by Hypnosis: V. F. Calverton’s The Man Inside and American Radicalism in the 1930s.” Utopian Studies, 10(2), 1999.

Diggins, John P. Up from Communism: Conservative Odysseys in American Intellectual History. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Washington, Robert E. The Ideologies of African-American Literature: From the Harlem Renaissance to the Black Nationalist Revolt. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001.

Wilcox, Leonard. V. F. Calverton: Radical in the American Grain. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1992.

Campbell, Dick

As a director, producer, and manager, Dick Campbell (Cornelius Coleridge Campbell) was instrumental in the development and promotion of black theater during the Harlem Renaissance. He himself was a singer, dancer, and former vaudevillian, and he was dedicated to training black playwrights, directing black actors, and producing plays that reflected the vitality of black life. He helped establish a community theater in Harlem that exemplified the artistic integrity of black theater professionals.

Dick Campbell was born in Beaumont, Texas. As a boy, he shined shoes, worked as a high school janitor, and took odd jobs. His involvement in high school plays inspired his early interest in theater; and in 1926, after attending Paul Quinn College, he moved to Los Angeles, California, where he began performing at local speakeasies. Campbell joined the Theatrical Owners’ Booking Association (TOBA) vaudeville circuit as part of the Whitman Sisters’ Show, and he arrived in Harlem in 1928 while touring with that group. He remained in New York and often performed alongside Ethel Waters, Bill “Bojangles” Robinson, Louis Armstrong, and others in theaters in Harlem and on Broadway. His credits include Connie’s Hot Chocolates (1929), Hot Rhythm (1930), and Singing the Blues (1931). After George Gershwin did not cast him in Porgy and Bess, Campbell recognized the difficulty black actors faced in acquiring credible roles on Broadway. In an effort to combat racial discrimination in the theater and offer black actors more roles that were not stereotypical servants, Campbell turned his attention to producing.

Campbell spent the 1930s organizing theater companies in Harlem. In 1935, he cofounded the Negro People's Theater with Rose McClendon, and they successfully staged an all-black production of Clifford Odet's Waiting for Lefty. Following McClendon's death in 1936, Campbell continued their shared vision of creating a theater in Harlem that was intrinsically connected to the community; presented plays by, about, and for blacks; promoted a dignified image of blacks; and gave black theater artists professional training and a reasonable income. Thus he founded and directed the Rose McClendon Players, a "little theater" in Harlem that was funded by audience subscriptions. The Rose McClendon Players furthered the black community's interest in and support of black drama, and, under Campbell's personal guidance, the company helped establish the careers of several black theater artists, including Abram Hill, Loftin Mitchell, Frederick O'Neal, and Ossie Davis.

Campbell's unswerving commitment to black artists and the black community was lifelong. As founder of the Harlem Workshop Theater and chairman of the Coordinating Council for Negro Performers, Campbell opened doors for black artists where white institutions would not. He managed the concert career of the singer Muriel Rahn, his wife, and showcased black performers such as Alvin Ailey and Duke Ellington in more than sixty-five shows overseas while working as the producer of black USO camp shows during World War II. After working for the U.S. State Department, Campbell spent his later years raising awareness in the black community about sickle-cell anemia. Campbell died in 1994 at age ninety-one.

Biography

Dick Campbell (Cornelius Coleridge Campbell) was born in Beaumont, Texas. He was orphaned at age six and was reared by his maternal grandmother, Pauline Snow. He worked as the janitor at his high school (1918–1922) and attended Paul Quinn College in Waco, Texas (1922–1926). Campbell began his theatrical career in Los Angeles as a singer and straight man in vaudeville comedy shows (1926–1928). He then joined the Whitman Sisters' Show and traveled to New York (1928). From 1929 to 1942, he was a cast member in various shows in Harlem and on Broadway, including Connie's Hot Chocolates, Hot Rhythm, and Singing the Blues. In 1930–1931, he costarred with Eddie Green on radio in the comedy show "Green and Campbell" as part of the Fleischmann Yeast Hour. In 1932, he met and married the concert singer Muriel Rahn. In 1935, he and Rose McClendon founded the Negro People's Theater in Harlem. He founded and directed the Rose McClendon Players (1937–1942). Campbell was appointed director of the Harlem unit of the Federal Theater Project (1939). He was a producer of the black USO camp shows (1942–1946). He was an African representative for the American National Theater Association, the administrative branch of the U.S. State Department's International Cultural Exchange Program for which he was the field consultant on African affairs (1956–1964); assistant director of public affairs for New York City Human Resources Administration (1967–1972); and executive director of the Sickle Cell Foundation of Greater New York (1972–1994). Campbell died in New York 20 December 1994.

MELINDA D. WILSON

See also Hot Chocolates; Federal Programs; McClendon, Rose

Further Reading

- Gill, Glenda E. White Grease Paint on Black Performers: A Study of the Federal Theatre, 1935–1939. New York: Peter Lang, 1988.
- Mitchell, Loftin. Voices of the Black Theatre. Clifton, N.J.: White, 1975.
- Peterson, Bernard L. The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960: A Comprehensive Guide to Early Black Theatre Organizations, Companies, Theatres, and Performing Groups. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Campbell, Elmer Simms

E. (Elmer) Simms Campbell was one of the preeminent cartoonists and illustrators of his day; his supple black-and-white drawings and lush watercolors were a regular feature in the pages of Opportunity, the New Yorker, Life, Collier's, the Saturday Evening Post, the Pittsburgh Courier, Cosmopolitan, Redbook, and Playboy. Through William Randolph Hearst's King Features Syndicate, Campbell's "Cuties" appeared in 145 newspapers nationwide. With his tenure as a staff illustrator for Esquire, beginning with its debut issue in January 1934 and lasting until 1957, Campbell became the first black artist to break into the "major" magazines. Campbell is credited with creating “Esky,” the well-dressed, pop-eyed ladies’ man with the white walrus mustache who appeared on most Esquire covers; and the parodic odalisques of his sultan-and-harem series perfectly embodied the urbane, leering men’s magazine aesthetic that Esquire was busy defining at mid-century. Although Campbell sometimes complained that drawing was a little like ditch digging, but without the benefit of fresh air, he managed to turn out anywhere between 300 and 500 pieces a year.

Campbell’s work rarely concerned itself with specifically black subject matter, and rarely featured black characters, largely sticking to the befuddled tuxedoed gents and redheaded “cuties” that assured him a mass audience. An Esquire cartoon of October 1934 (ostensibly making reference to the bandleader Cab Calloway, who considered Campbell his closest friend) struck a self-referential note in this respect. It depicted a white choirmaster eyeing the single black choirboy in his chorus; the caption read: “And none of that hi-de-ho stuff!” Yet his harem series had a certain critical edge to its leer: It featured a disturbingly matter-of-fact approach to the sexual economics of slavery, while at the same time, with its all-in-a-day’s-work punchlines, it poked fun at his mainstream audience’s fascination with exotic otherness.

In a more direct contribution to the Harlem Renaissance, Campbell illustrated a number of books by black writers: most notably Sterling Brown’s collection of poems, Southern Road (1932); a children’s book by Langston Hughes and Arna Bontemps, Popo and Fifina: Children of Haiti (1932); and Binga Dismond’s We Who Die and Other Poems, Including Haitian Vignettes (1943). Campbell was also an astute observer of jazz and the Harlem scene: His jivey, idiosyncratic “Night-Club Map of Harlem” (1932) is a classic of its kind; its cat’s-eye-view guide to hot spots off Lenox or Seventh Avenue (“or heaven”) is full of knowing asides (“You’ve never heard a piano really played until you hear Garland Wilson”) yet still manages to find room for the “nice new POLICE STATION” and the “Harlem Moon.” And in 1936, Campbell revealed to Esquire’s readers what its editors described as “a happy combination of sympathetic insight and critical detachment” (“Homeland” 1936, 101) as he began to write sharply personal, beautifully illustrated articles on such topics as dancing at Harlem’s Savoy Ballroom, the plight of Haitian sugarcane workers, and the history of jazz.

When Esquire changed its format in 1957, Campbell moved to Switzerland, but he remained an active contributor to American periodicals through the 1960s.

Biography

Elmer Simms Campbell was born in St. Louis, Missouri, 2 January 1906. He attended Englewood High School in Chicago, studied at the Lewis Institute of Chicago and the University of Chicago, and graduated from the Art Institute of Chicago (1927). He was an illustrator at the Triad Studios advertising agency in St. Louis (1927–1928). In 1928, he moved to New York, where he worked in advertising, attended the Academy of Design, studied under George Grosz at the Art Students League, and began to contribute to periodicals. Campbell was a staff illustrator and cartoonist at Esquire magazine (1933–1957). He moved to Neerach, Switzerland, and was a cartoonist for Playboy magazine (1957–1970). He won the St. Louis Dispatch Award for black-and-white illustration (1928) and the William Randolph Hearst Art Prize (1936), as well as an honorable mention for watercolor at the American Negro Exposition (1940). He also received honorary degrees from Lincoln, Pennsylvania (M.F.A. in art), and Wilberforce universities and from the University of Ohio (doctor of humane letters). He was a member of the Society of Illustrators, Society of Artists, and National Society of Cartoonists. Campbell died in White Plains, New York, 27 January 1971.

RYAN JERVING

See also Bontemps, Arna; Brown, Sterling; Calloway, Cabell “Cab”; Hughes, Langston; Opportunity; Pittsburgh Courier; Savoy Ballroom

Group Exhibitions

Minneapolis Artists Exhibit, Minnesota. 1924.

Painting and Sculpture by American Negro Artists, Harmon Foundation, National Gallery, Washington, D.C. 1929.

Harmon Foundation, New York. 1935.

Arthur H. Newton Galleries, New York. 1935.

American Negro Exposition: Exhibition of the Art of the American Negro, Chicago Coliseum, Chicago, Illinois. 1940.

South Side Community Art Center, Chicago, Illinois. 1941.

Selected Works

Southern Road by Sterling Brown. 1932. (As illustrator.)

Popo and Fifina: Children of Haiti by Arna Bontemps and Langston Hughes. 1932. (As illustrator.)

- "Homeland of Happy Feet" and "Swing, Mr. Charlie." Esquire, February 1936.
- "Ten Dollars a Head" and "A Portfolio of Haitian Sketches." Esquire, April 1938.
- "Jam in the Nineties." Esquire, December 1938. (Reprinted as "Early Jam" in The Negro Caravan, ed. Sterling Brown, Arthur P. Davis, and Ulysses Lee. 1941.)
- Cuties in Arms*. 1942.
- More Cuties in Arms*. 1943.
- We Who Die and Other Poems, Including Haitian Vignettes* by Binga Dismond. 1943. (As illustrator.)
- Ladies of the Harem*. 1948. (Esquire calendar.)

Further Reading

- Calloway, Cab, and Bryant Rollins. Of Minnie the Moocher and Me. New York: Crowell, 1976.
- "Eskey's True Paternity." Esquire, 124(4), October 1995.
- Jordan, Casper L. "E. Simms Campbell." In Contemporary Black Biography, Vol. 13, ed. Shirelle Phelps. London and Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1997.

Cane

Jean Toomer's Cane was first published in 1923 by Boni and Liveright, a publishing firm in New York, with a foreword by the pluralist and cultural critic Waldo Frank. From the start, the book appealed to two very different audiences—not surprisingly, given that parts of it had been previously published in magazines as different as Crisis and S 4 N. At the time, the book earned a reputation as the first modernist work of fiction by a "Negro writer," securing Toomer's place in the radical cosmopolitan set of Greenwich Village and the New Negro artists of the burgeoning Harlem Renaissance. The book itself is not so much a novel as a collection of brief literary portraits and one longer prose play.

Growing up in Washington, D.C., in the household of his grandfather, a venerable "blue veiner" and a racial chameleon of sorts, Toomer struggled for some time to discover just who and what he was. He briefly attended the University of Wisconsin, took up exercise, and tried his hand at writing poems and short dramatic pieces. In 1921, Toomer—discontented and struggling as a writer to define himself and his subject matter—was offered a job as the head of an African American school in Sparta, Georgia. He took it and mined what he found there for the fugitive pieces that would become the first section and last story of Cane. As was typical of this extraordinarily autobiographical writer, for the middle and the last sections he also drew deeply from his own life and from his own sense of self.

The form of the novel was confusing enough to "irritate" W. E. B. Du Bois, the editor of The Crisis. Indeed, to sum up the combination of writing styles that is Cane, Arna Bontemps once remarked that in this work "poetry and prose were whipped together in a kind of frappé." The book has three parts, the first of which is a series of sensitive, lyrical vignettes of African American womanhood in the South. The women Jean Toomer wrote about in this section were not classic Victorian matriarchs, but compromised, even fallen, and certainly sexually complicated and alive. In breathing life into Fern, Karintha, and others, Toomer painted with words, as Du Bois put it, in the impressionist style, using a "sweep of color" to liberate black women from the restrictive confines of middle-class prudery.

The second section of Cane is set in the North, specifically in Washington, D.C., and Chicago. Once again, Toomer emphasized the contradictions between the modern and the primitive, the superego and the id, in Afro-America. But in contrast to the portraiture of the first section, the characters in his northern stories seem awkwardly out of place and lost. Men are given a significant role here, and they seem to suffer from an excess of self-consciousness and Victorian self-control, afflictions of the cold, prim, whitened North—not of the black South, where emotions were unbridled and human beings whole.

The third section contains the longest single piece of writing in Cane, an apocryphal story titled "Kabnis," in which a northern African American man named Ralph Kabnis heads to the South to find himself, only to be lost forever. His life in the North, it seems, has left him weak and incapable of balance and unity, and so he drifts into moral chaos and impoverishment. His very "northernness"—his psychological hesitation, his heady intellectualism, his emphasis on the mind over the body—renders him unable to enjoy the lives, loves, and labors of the South. As a balance to Ralph Kabnis, Toomer included another, more successfully integrated northerner, Lewis: "He is," the book suggests, "what a stronger Kabnis might have been." The ever-confident Toomer admitted to his friends and confidants that he himself was a combination of the very best of Kabnis and the very best of Lewis.

Many of Jean Toomer's contemporaries claimed that Cane was an "essential" text of some sort, but very few of them seem to have fully understood the book. The bibliophile William Stanley Braithwaite would claim in the pages of Alain Locke's The New Negro that Jean Toomer was "the very first artist of the race," an aesthete and folklorist creatively capturing the essence of proletarian black America in the deep South before it was ground away by modernity. Waldo Frank's original preface to the book, written after numerous conversations with Toomer, presented the author of Cane as "a poet": "The book is the South," Frank concluded; "[a] poet has arisen among our American youth who has known how to turn the essences and materials of his Southland into essences and materials of literature." "No previous writer," Montgomery Gregory (chair of the drama department at Howard University) suggested, "has been able in any such degree to catch the sensuous beauty of the land or of its people or fathom the deeper spiritual stirrings of the mass-life of the Negro. . . . [I]t IS the South, it IS the Negro."

It is also clear, in hindsight, that Cane captured the essence of Jean Toomer himself. Inspired by Waldo Frank's book Our America, with its cultural pluralism, Toomer hoped that Cane would reveal what "the Negro" had to offer to America, envisioning the work as part of the missionary radicalism led by the literary avant-garde. But, given his complicated upbringing and racial background, he also envisioned himself as more than a "Negro," and he saw Cane as a reflection of just one part of his personality. When, in the wake of its publication, few could understand his complicated racial position, he struggled to make that position understood, and then, finally, turned to the writing and rewriting of his numerous unpublished autobiographies.

MATTHEW PRATT GUTERL

See also Authors: 2—Fiction; Boni and Liveright; Bontemps, Arna; Braithwaite, William Stanley; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Frank, Waldo; Literature: 4—Fiction; New Negro, The; Toomer, Jean

Further Reading

Bontemps, Arna. "The Negro Renaissance: Jean Toomer and the Harlem of the 1920s." In Anger and Beyond: The Negro Writer in the United States, ed. Herbert Hill. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.

Kerwin, Cynthia Earl, and Richard Eldridge. The Lives of Jean Toomer: A Hunger for Wholeness. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.

Turner, Darwin. In a Minor Chord: Three Afro-American Writers and Their Search for Identity. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1971.

Carolina Magazine

Founded in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, in March 1844, the North Carolina University Magazine was the official literary publication of the students of the University of North Carolina. It was designed to give the student body an "opportunity of perfecting ourselves in an equally important Department of Letters" tradition and as "a token of our devotion to Literature." Within this context, Carolina Magazine, as it was known in the late 1920s, linked itself with the New Negro movement, also referred to as the Harlem Renaissance and the Negro Renaissance—the artistic and cultural renaissance in Harlem that focused on "race consciousness and racial cooperation" among African Americans.

From 1927 to 1930, Carolina Magazine compiled a yearly issue for April or May called the "Negro Number," presenting a theme representative of black life and art. For example, John Mebane, the editor of the Negro Number of 4 May 1930, explained that the editorial staff of the magazine was happy to give the students "some idea" of what New Negroes were "doing in the field of literature." Mebane recognized that "the Negro," during the 1920s, retained in "his" literature, poetry, music, and art "a certain tint of beauty that is unrestrained by artificial limits, a beauty and an intensity of feeling that are genuine and intimate."

The first of four issues of the Negro Number was published in May 1927. Lewis Grandison Alexander (1900–1945), a New Negro writer whose works were published in the Messenger, Opportunity, and Fire!!, served as the honorary editor for this and the subsequent issues. Alexander, whose work for the magazine was deemed "indispensable," and Charles S. Johnson, the editor of Opportunity and a shaper of the New Negro movement, were acknowledged as the "key to this issue" and as having provided an identification for New Negro writers. Indeed, the article "The Negro Enters Literature," written by Johnson, set the tone for the entire series. This first issue contained drawings by Aaron Douglas for The Emperor Jones and poetry by Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, and Angelina W. Grimké, to name a few.

The second issue, in May 1928, was dedicated to Alexander “in appreciation of his friendship and service.” The editorial staff explained that the magazine would not have made its appearance without Alexander, who had given “his time unstintingly in the assembling of the material” and his “tireless assistance” in calling on his New Negro friends for contributions. This issue was noted for a pen-and-ink sketch of the “New Negro” by Allan R. Freelon and for the article “The Message of the Negro Poets” by Alain Locke, author of the anthology The New Negro (1925).

The third issue, “The Negro Play Number,” in April 1929, is noted for having featured four playwrights, Willis Richardson among them, who all won prizes in contests run by Crisis and Opportunity.

The fourth and final issue, in May 1930, was noted for acknowledging the “rich and ancient tradition” of Negro art and literature. With these four issues, Carolina Magazine shed a bright light on its role as an active participant in the New Negro movement.

GLEN ANTHONY HARRIS

See also Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Emperor Jones, The; Douglas, Aaron; Fire!!; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Hughes, Langston; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Locke, Alain; Messenger, The; New Negro; New Negro Movement; Opportunity

Further Reading

“Lewis Grandison Alexander.” In Black American Writers Past and Present: A Biographical Dictionary, ed. Theresa Gunnels Rush, Carol Fairbanks Myers, and Esther Spring Arata. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1975.

Carolina Magazine, 57(7), 1927, pp. 1–39; 58(7), 1928, pp. 1–4; 59(7), 1929, pp. 1–4, 44.

Carolina Magazine, Literary Supplement to the Daily Tar Heel, 1(12), 1930, pp. 1, 2, 1–35.

North Carolina University Magazine, 1(1), 1844, pp. 1–5.

Césaire, Aimé

Aimé Césaire was among the most illustrious Caribbean writers and statesmen of the twentieth century. In his youth he was both an acute observer of France’s colonial legacy in his native Martinique, and the beneficiary of an extensive education, there and later in Paris, in the French and classical humanities. These experiences enabled him to become an active participant in French literary and civic traditions and at the same time a powerful spokesman for those traditionally excluded from such traditions. He is best known for his French lyric and dramatic poetry, although he also wrote influential essays on literary, historical, and political subjects. He played an important role in the electoral politics of Martinique for almost fifty years, before retiring from public service in 1993.

In 1939, Césaire published the first version of what would become his most famous work, the extended poem Cahier d’un retour au pays natal (Notebook of a Return to the Native Land), revisions of which were later published in book form. In this poem, Césaire brings vividly to life his narrator’s complex experience of being black in French-controlled Martinique and also expounds the broader concept of négritude. This elusive term, which Césaire himself coined, would take on disparate meanings among those who came to be associated with the négritude movement instigated by Césaire and his fellow poets Léopold Senghor and Léon Damas. The three had met during their student days and had helped launch two short-lived pan-Africanist magazines: Légitime Défense and L’Etudiant Noir. The proponents of négritude wanted to revolutionize widespread concepts of black identity; they asserted the beauty of their African heritage and the creative potential of blacks united by ancestry and shared suffering. Senghor and Césaire were particularly influenced in the late 1930s by the German ethnographer Leo Frobenius’s Histoire de la civilisation africaine. Frobenius celebrated African artistry and attributed it to an “African essence” in all black culture. Frobenius’s Africanism broke away from widespread European assumptions that Africa was a cultural void; but his ascription of a shared essence to a diverse black population, along with the négritude poets’ glorification of that concept, has since led many African and African American critics to reject négritude in favor of a multicultural approach.

In 1941, Césaire cofounded Tropiques, a journal of poetry and criticism, largely surrealist and directed at promoting négritude (as opposed to assimilation into white French culture) among black and mulatto Martinicans. The journal initially focused on the arts but then became increasingly political. In an early issue, Césaire wrote an homage to the poets of the Harlem Renaissance, who had inspired him as he developed his concept of négritude. In this essay, “Introduction à la poésie nègre américaine” (“Introduction to Negro-American Poetry”), Césaire introduced French versions of poetry by James Weldon Johnson, Jean Toomer, and Claude McKay and praised what he took to be its revelation and celebration of the innate imagination, emotionalism, and spirituality of all blacks, and of their racial and historical bonds. Césaire had admired the writers of the Harlem Renaissance at least since his second year as a student at the École Normale Supérieure, where he earned his diploma by writing a thesis (no longer extant), “Le thème du sud dans la poésie négro-américaine des États-Unis” (“The Theme of the South in the Negro-American Poetry of the United States”). Césaire especially admired McKay’s novel Banjo, which urged blacks to resist assimilation, reclaim their lost folk traditions, and preserve their “primitive” kinship with nature.

Despite his affinity with the Harlem Renaissance writers’ notions of black identity, Césaire had a strong European orientation and wrote poetry in a style very different from theirs. He inherited the French modernist poetics of Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Lautréamont, Rimbaud, and the symbolists and surrealists but extended these poets’ formal and thematic innovations to new subjects. Césaire’s poetry—skeptical of realism and rationality—is densely, often esoterically figurative and allusive; it frequently violates standard French syntax and is full of outlandish, logically irreconcilable juxtapositions of images and meanings. Césaire also shares the modernist concern with alienation, social and cultural upheaval, anticolonialism, and primitivism, but he transforms these themes by introducing the perspective of those who are socially and culturally repressed. In Césaire’s view, this perspective is unique to the disempowered African diaspora. Another European thinker who influenced Césaire was Nietzsche. Césaire’s repeated representation of a hero’s voluntary self-sacrifice on behalf of the community is reminiscent of Dionysus’s sacrifice in Nietzsche’s The Birth of Tragedy, and Césaire’s mythic images and allusions suggest Nietzsche’s vision of history as cyclical. Arnold (1981) argues that Césaire often depicts heroes, fictional and historical, who surrender their personal well-being for the benefit of the group. For instance, Césaire was impressed by a seven-month lecture tour in Haiti in 1945, and he later wrote works inspired by the Haitian heroes Henri Christophe and Toussaint Louverture.

In 1945, Césaire unexpectedly won the mayoralty of Fort-de-France on the Communist Party ticket. Later that year he was elected to represent Martinique as a député in the French Assemblée Nationale. Despite his change of party affiliation thirteen years later, he retained these positions until he retired from politics just before his eightieth birthday. In 1946, his draft of a proposal to the French government to make Martinique a département of France (the equivalent of a U.S. state), was passed into law. Césaire received bitter criticism from the next generation of Martinican activists, who believed that he should have sought independence for the island.

With Les armes miraculeuses (Miraculous Weapons, 1946) and Soleil cou coupé (Sun Cut Throat, 1948), Césaire established his reputation in francophone avant-garde circles as a foremost surrealist poet; moreover, he was supported by leading francophone intellectuals, including the founder of surrealism, André Breton, whom he had met in Fort-de-France in 1941 and who wrote a laudatory essay about him, “Un grand poète noir” (“A Great Black Poet”). In 1949, Césaire collaborated with Pablo Picasso on a limited edition of Corps perdu (Lost Body). Earlier, in 1947, Césaire and Jean-Paul Sartre had helped found the publishing house Présence Africaine, which ever since has distributed a periodical of the same name as well as books pertinent to black studies, and has printed many of Césaire’s writings. In 1956, Césaire attended the First International Congress of Negro Artists and Writers in Paris and delivered a paper—“Culture et colonisation” (“Culture and Colonization”)—that was more measured in tone than his well-known earlier polemic Discours sur le colonialisme (Discourse on Colonialism) but nevertheless controversial. For years Césaire’s concept of négritude had been evolving differently from Senghor’s, and in this paper he attempted to give it a historical grounding so as to challenge Senghor’s essentialist vision. In the 1960s, Césaire continued his critique of colonial repression and exploitation in the more broadly accessible form of biography (Toussaint Louverture) and drama: La tragédie du Roi Christophe (The Tragedy of King Christophe), Une saison au Congo (A Season in the Congo), and Une tempête (A Tempest, a reworking of Shakespeare’s play.) In the 1970s, he returned to lyric poetry. In 1983, after France created regional councils in overseas departments, he became president of his local conseil régional.

Biography

Aimé Césaire was born 26 June 1913 in Basse-Pointe, Martinique. He studied on a scholarship at the Lycée Schoelcher in Fort-de-France and was awarded his baccalaureate with distinction in 1932; in 1931, he had won another scholarship to continue his studies at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris, and in 1935, he was admitted to the École Normale Supérieure. In 1932, he cofounded the magazine Légitime Défense; in 1934, he cofounded another magazine, L'Étudiant Noir. Césaire returned to Martinique in 1939. In 1940, he began teaching at the Lycée Schoelcher; in 1941, he cofounded Tropiques. In 1944, he spent seven months on a lecture tour in Haiti. He returned to Martinique, and in 1945, he was elected mayor of Fort-de-France and a deputy to the French national assembly. In 1947, Césaire helped launch the publishing house and magazine Présence Africaine. In 1956, he resigned from the French Communist Party; two years later, he founded the Parti Progressiste Martiniquais. In 1966, he attended a production of his already widely performed play La tragédie du Roi Christophe at the first Festival Mondial des Arts Nègres in Dakar, Senegal. In 1972, he gave a series of lectures at the Université Laval in Quebec. He became president of his local regional council in 1983. In 1991, La tragédie du Roi Christophe was performed at the Comédie-Française in Paris. Césaire remained in political office until his retirement in 1993. His awards included the Prix René Laporte for his collection of poems Ferrements in 1960 and the Grand Prix National de la Poésie in 1982.

MARA DE GENNARO

See also Damas, Léon; Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance; Johnson, James Weldon; McKay, Claude; Negritude; Senghor, Léopold; Toomer, Jean

Selected Works

- Cahier d'un retour au pays natal*. 1939. (Rev. ed., 1947, 1956. See also Notebook of a Return to the Native Land, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1983; from 1956 version.)
 "Introduction à la poésie nègre américaine." Tropiques, 2, July 1941.
 "Poésie et connaissance." Tropiques, 12, January 1945. (See also "Poetry and Knowledge," trans. A. James Arnold. In Lyric and Dramatic Poetry, 1946–1982. 1990.)
Les armes miraculeuses. 1946. (Rev. ed., 1970. See also Miraculous Weapons, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1983.)
Et les chiens se taisaient. 1946. (Dramatic poem first published with Les armes miraculeuses. See also rev. ed., 1956; stage version.)
Soleil cou coupé. 1948. (See also Solar Throat Slashed, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1983.)
Corps perdu. 1949. (With illustrations by Pablo Picasso. See also Lost Body, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1983.)

- Discours sur le colonialisme*. 1950. (See also Discourse on Colonialism, trans. Joan Pinkham, 1972.)
Lettre à Maurice Thorez. 1956.
 "Culture et Colonisation." Présence Africaine, 8–10, 1956.
 "L'homme de culture noir et ses responsabilités." Deuxième Congrès des Écrivains et Artistes Noirs, special issue of Présence Africaine, 24–25, 1959.
Ferrements. 1960. (See also Ferraments, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1983.)
Cadastre. 1961. (Containing rev. ed. of Soleil cou coupé and Corps perdu.)
La tragédie du Roi Christophe. 1963. (See also The Tragedy of King Christophe, trans. Ralph Manheim, 1969.)
Une saison au Congo. 1966. (See also A Season in the Congo, trans. Ralph Manheim, 1968.)
Toussaint Louverture: La révolution française et le problème colonial. 1968.
Une tempête. 1969. (See also A Tempest, trans. Richard Miller, 1985; rev. trans., 1992.)
Noria, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1983. (Nine poems from Noria were republished in Soleil éclaté: Mélanges offerts à Aimé Césaire à l'occasion de son soixante-dixième anniversaire par une équipe internationale de chercheurs, ed. Jacqueline Leiner. Tübingen: Gunter Narr Verlag, 1984.)
Oeuvres complètes, 3 vols. 1976.
 "Entretien avec Aimé Césaire," with Jacqueline Leiner. Tropiques, 1, 1978.
Moi, laminaire. 1982. (See also I, Laminaria, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith, 1990.)
Aimé Césaire: The Collected Poetry, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.
Lyric and Dramatic Poetry, 1946–1982, trans. Clayton Eshleman and Annette Smith. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1990.
La poésie. 1994.
Refusal of the Shadow: Surrealism and the Caribbean, trans. Michael Richardson and Krzysztof Fijakowski. London: Verso, 1996. (Includes selected essays by Césaire.)

Further Reading

- Arnold, A. James. Modernism and Negritude: The Poetry and Poetics of Aimé Césaire. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.
 Bailey, Marianne Wichmann. The Ritual Theater of Aimé Césaire: Mythic Structures of the Dramatic Imagination. Tübingen, Germany: Gunter Narr Verlag, 1992.

- Breton, André. "Un grand poète noir." Hemispheres, 2, 1943. (Reprint, Preface. Aimé Césaire. Cahier d'un retour au pays natal, 2nd ed. Paris: Présence Africaine, 1947. See also "A Great Black Poet: Aimé Césaire," trans. Dale Tomich. In André Breton, What Is Surrealism? Selected Writings, ed. Franklin Rosemont. New York: Pathfinder, 1978.)
- Condé, Maryse. Cahier d'un retour au pays natal: Analyse critique. Paris: Hatier, 1978.
- Davis, Gregson. Aimé Césaire. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Delas, Daniel. Aimé Césaire. Paris: Hachette, 1991.
- Hale, Thomas. Écrits d'Aimé Césaire: Bibliographie commentée. Montreal: Presses de l'Université de Montréal.
- Irele, Abiola. "Introduction." In Cahier d'un retour au pays natal. Ibadan, Nigeria: New Horn, 1994; Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2000. (Also notes and bibliography.)
- Kesteloot, Lilyan. Les écrivains noirs de langue française: Naissance d'une littérature. Brussels: Éditions de l'Institut de Sociologie de l'Université Libre de Bruxelles, 1963. (See also Black Writers in French: A Literary History of Negritude, trans. Ellen Conroy Kennedy. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1991.)
- Kesteloot, Lilyan, and Barthélemy Kotchy. Aimé Césaire: L'homme et l'oeuvre. Paris: Présence Africaine, 1993.
- Leiner, Jacqueline, Mario de Andrade, et al. Aimé Césaire ou l'athanor d'un alchimiste: Actes du premier colloque international sur l'oeuvre littéraire d'Aimé Césaire. Paris: Éditions Caribéennes, 1987.
- Ngal, M. Aimé Césaire: Un homme à la recherche d'une patrie. Dakar: Nouvelles Éditions Africaines, 1975.
- Ngal, M., and Martin Steins, eds. Césaire 70. Paris: Éditions Silex, 1984.
- Sartre, Jean-Paul. "Orphée Noir." In Anthologie de la nouvelle poésie nègre et malgache de langue française, ed. Léopold Sédar Senghor. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1948.
- Scharfman, Ronnie Leah. Engagement and the Language of the Subject in the Poetry of Aimé Césaire. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1987.
- Toumson, Roger, and Simonne Henry-Valmore. Aimé Césaire: Le nègre inconsolé. Paris: Syros, 1993.

Challenge

Challenge was a literary magazine devoted to publishing high-quality literature primarily written by African Americans during the 1930s, the Depression era.

Dorothy West, its founding editor and publisher, originally intended it as a monthly, but its revenues were insufficient (owing to sparse subscriptions and advertisements), and it evolved into a literary quarterly from 1934 until its demise in 1937. West nurtured Challenge through six issues: Volume 1, comprising issues released in March and September 1934, May 1935, and January and June 1936; and Volume 2, the issue of April 1937. Harold Jackmann served as associate editor from May 1935 until April 1937.

From its inception, West financed and edited the magazine to "challenge" the young, relatively unknown African American voices that emerged during and after the Harlem Renaissance. She had designed it for the "New Negro Voice, which is an explanation of its title, Challenge." She was aware that support from educators would be valuable to her attempt to edit a literary journal during the Depression, when patronage of black literature had declined or ended, and so she anticipated that Challenge would be established at high schools and universities across black America, where could be found "maybe much of the talent we want to challenge." In a letter of 18 December 1933, mailed to a broad group of teachers of English nationwide who she hoped would become subscribers, West explained the significance of the magazine for new, emerging writers:

We, who are their literary elders, challenge these unknown writers to clean competition in poetry and prose. For I do not think that we, who were the lauded New Negroes of the late nineteen-twenties, quite lived up to our promise. We can in part make up our lack of lighting the literary way of the new singers and their songs may be lustier and lovelier.

Just as Opportunity and The Messenger had been beacons of hope for the "talented tenth" during the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s, West thought that with sufficient financial support from black educators and students, Challenge could represent the artistic promise of the 1930s and 1940s.

Challenge included guest editorials; short stories; special articles; book reviews; poetry; and a column, "Dear Reader," in which West restated the quarterly's intention to accept and publish only high-quality literature, pleaded for the public's continued financial support, and stressed that excellent submissions had come from notable writers whose creativity exemplified an artistic synthesis of the Harlem Renaissance and the Depression. The contributing writers included Arna

Bontemps, Frank Yerby, James Weldon Johnson, West herself (she used the pen name Mary Christopher), Harry Thacker Burleigh, Zora Neale Hurston, Claude McKay, Countee Cullen, William Attaway, Paul Robeson, Richard Bruce Nugent, and others. This is an impressive list, but Challenge succumbed to the economic hardships of the time, publishing its last issue in April 1937.

PEARLIE PETERS

See also Messenger, The; Opportunity; Talented Tenth; West, Dorothy; specific writers

Further Reading

Daniel, Walter C. "Challenge Magazine: An Experiment That Failed." CLA Journal, 19, June 1976, pp. 494–503.

Ferguson, Sally. "Dorothy West." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, 76. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1988.

Genii Guinier. Black Women Oral History Project: Interview with Dorothy West, 6 May 1978. Cambridge, Mass.: Schlesinger Library of Radcliffe College, 1981, pp. 1–75.

Peters, Pearlle. "The Resurgence of Dorothy West as Short-Story Writer." Abafazi: Simmons College Review of Women of African Descent, 8(1), Fall–Winter 1997, pp. 16–22.

Chenault, Lawrence

Lawrence Chenault, who is frequently called the "dean of black film actors," appeared in twenty-four films during the Harlem Renaissance. Chenault was born in Mount Sterling, Kentucky, in 1877, but was raised in Cincinnati, Ohio. The young Chenault developed his singing voice as a soloist at Allen Temple Church, before becoming a professional stage and screen actor in Chicago, New York, and other American cities. He had established his career by the 1910s, and was a major figure in the dynamic early years of African American performance.

Chenault began his acting career in the late nineteenth century at the Pekin Theater in Chicago, and he had steady work for six or seven seasons in the long-running play Darkest America, staged by A. G. Fields Company. He then joined the renowned Black Patti Troubadours. With the M. B. Curtis Minstrels, Chenault toured the United States, Australia, New Zealand, and Hawaii, before settling in San Francisco for several years. In San Francisco, he evidently sang and acted in various venues, most notably with the comedian Ernest Hogan in the Smart Set Company. Chenault next joined the Williams and Walker company and performed in its staging of Abyssinia. When Anita Bush organized the Lafayette Players in 1915, Chenault was among her first leading men.

The leading stage actors—comic and dramatic—of the Harlem Renaissance, who had performed or continued to perform with the Lafayette Players, also worked as actors in race films. Chenault was already a veteran of the stage when he made his screen debut as Herbert Lanyon in Oscar Micheaux's The Brute in 1920. A reviewer for the Chicago Defender wrote that Chenault and his costars "demonstrated that we do not have to go beyond our own Race for screen artists of ability" (Sampson 1995, 243). Later in 1920, Chenault performed in Micheaux's Symbol of the Unconquered. Chenault went on to a challenging triple role in a popular cowboy film, The Crimson Skull (Richard E. Norman, 1921). The fair-skinned Chenault played the villain in many films, notably in Micheaux's Body and Soul (1925), in which he was a former jail mate of a crooked preacher (played by Paul Robeson). Chenault also appeared in a race film with a temperance theme, Ten Nights in a Bar Room (1926), a famous collaboration with Charles Gilpin. This film enjoyed the longest continuous run of any race film of the silent era: four weeks at the Grant Theater in New York.

Poster for The Crimson Skull, with Lawrence Chenault. (Library of Congress.)

Race films, which were made for African American audiences, included a wide range of genres: melodramas, thrillers, musicals, comedies, and westerns. They offered black viewers images of the African American experience—including romance, urban migration, social uplift, racial violence, alcoholism, and color prejudice within the black community—that were conspicuously absent from Hollywood films. Many companies were formed to produce these films, including the Colored Players Company and Robert Levy's Reol Productions, which each financed four of Chenault's films. Chenault's association with the race film industry helped make him a leading figure of the Harlem Renaissance.

Biography

Lawrence Chenault was born in 1877 in Mount Sterling, Kentucky. He received his primary education at public schools in Cincinnati, Ohio. His credits as a performer included A. G. Fields Company, Darkest America; Black Patti Troubadours; M. B. Curtis Minstrels; Smart Set Company, 1905; Williams and Walker Company, Abyssinia, 1908; three years as a member of the Pekin Stock Company, Chicago; appearances in vaudeville as a member of the teams Allen and Chenault and Martin and Chenault; and a play, His Honor the Barber. He was also a member of the Lafayette Players. Chenault married Evelyn Preer in 1924.

TERRI FRANCIS

See also Bush, Anita; Chicago Defender; Gilpin, Charles; Lafayette Players; Micheaux, Oscar; Preer, Evelyn; Race Films; Robeson, Paul

Selected Works

- The Brute*. 1920. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux; nonextant print.)
- The Symbol of the Unconquered*. 1920. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux; also known as The Symbol of the Unconquered: A Story of the Ku Klux Klan.)
- The Crimson Skull*. 1921. (Norman Film Manufacturing Company; nonextant print.)
- The Sport of the Gods*. 1923. (Reol Productions; nonextant print.)
- Birthright*. 1924. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux; nonextant print.)
- Body and Soul*. 1925. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux.)
- Ten Nights in a Barroom*. 1926. (Written and directed by Roy Calnek.)
- The Scar of Shame*. 1927. (Directed by Frank Perugini.)
- Ten Minutes to Live*. 1932. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux.)
- Veiled Aristocrats*. 1932. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux.)
- Birthright*. 1939. (Directed by Oscar Micheaux.)

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films, 3rd ed. New York: Continuum, 1998.
- Bowser, Pearl, Jane Gaines, and Charles Musser, eds. "Oscar Micheaux and His Circle: African-American Filmmaking and Race Cinema of the Silent Era." Twentieth Pordenone Silent Film Festival Catalogue. Sacile: Udine, 13–20 October 2001, pp. 60–61.
- Bowser, Pearl, Jane Gaines, and Charles Musser, eds. Oscar Micheaux and His Circle: African-American Filmmaking and Race Cinema of the Silent Era. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Diawara, Manthia, ed. Black American Cinema. New York and London: Routledge, 1993.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, ed. Early Cinema: Space—Frame—Narrative. London: British Film Institute, 1990.
- Everett, Anna. Returning the Gaze: A Genealogy of Black Film Criticism, 1909–1949. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2001.

- Gaines, Jane. "'Scar of Shame': Skin Color and Caste in Black Silent Melodrama." Cinema Journal, 26(4), Summer 1987, pp. 3–21.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Lanham, Md., and London: Rowman & Littlefield, 1995. (See "Review," Chicago Defender, 28 October 1920, p. 243.)
- Stewart, Jacqueline. "Migrating to the Movies: The Emergence of Black Urban Film Culture." Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 2000. (Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI, 2000.)

Chesnutt, Charles Waddell

Charles Chesnutt (1858–1932) was one of the first successful African American writers of fiction. Beginning in 1887, when he published his dialect tale "The Goophered Grapevine" in the Atlantic Monthly, Chesnutt had a thriving career as a writer of short stories and novels. Chesnutt's stories and novels (of which three were published in his lifetime and two very recently) deal with a variety of times, places, and circumstances, but they all address the tragically absurd ideology of race prevalent in American history, law, culture, and custom. In 1905, Chesnutt completed his final published book-length project, the novel The Colonel's Dream (1905), but he did not stop writing. Even as he remained engaged in African American causes, he continued to write essays, to speak out on issues of the day, to write short stories, and, during the 1920s, to complete two novels, Paul Marchand, F.M.C. (i.e., Free Man of Color; 1998) and The Quarry (1999), both of which were published for the first time in the late 1990s. With these two novels in print and the general critical attention devoted to Chesnutt since the early 1990s, his reputation has grown as a figure engaged with the issues of the Harlem Renaissance, not just as one of its important forefathers.

Chesnutt was born in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1858, the son of two free light-skinned African Americans from Fayetteville, North Carolina. Chesnutt's father, Andrew Jackson Chesnutt, was the son of Waddell Cade, a white slaveholder who left some of his property and land to the free mulatto children whom he fathered with his mistress, Ann Chesnutt. Charles Chesnutt was of an appearance that allowed him to "pass," and many of his characters, as they struggle with the puzzling status implied by a mixed-race background, serve to raise questions about the American system of racial classification.

After the Civil War, Chesnutt's family moved back to Fayetteville, where he went to school and then became first a teacher and later a principal. In 1878, he married Susan Perry, and they soon started a family. Chesnutt and his family moved to Cleveland in 1884 after he had tried a brief stint writing for various newspapers in New York. Chesnutt studied law in Cleveland, passed the Ohio bar in 1887, and at the same time published "The Goophered Grapevine" in the Atlantic Monthly, probably the most prestigious literary magazine in the United States at the time. Throughout the rest of the 1880s and 1890s, Chesnutt continued publishing stories while he also opened and ran a prosperous business as a court reporter and stenographer. In 1899, he published two collections of short stories, The Conjure Woman (1899) and The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line (1899). Both were well received at the time, but The Conjure Woman, as Brodhead (1993) writes in his introduction to the reissue of these stories, "has recently been recognized as a literary creation of remarkable interest and power. In the African American tradition this book stands out as a major literary production . . . and it helped pioneer a literary use of black vernacular culture important to many later writers." "Conjure" is a term for the African magical arts that appear in many of the stories, which are set in the South after the Civil War and feature the complex figure of Uncle Julius, an enigmatic former slave who serves as guide and servant to a carpetbagging northern couple come to cultivate grapes on a desolate former plantation. During this period Chesnutt rose to the very top echelon of elite publishing, befriending the likes of William Dean Howells, the reigning tastemaker of the day, but also writing genuinely complex and what have now proved to be lasting works of serious fiction. Between 1900 and 1905, Chesnutt published three novels; but after this effort to make a serious go of writing fiction exclusively (he closed his legal business from 1899 to 1902), he became dissatisfied with limited sales and disillusioned with the book-buying public and entered a creative hiatus. Until recently, 1905 was considered the end of Chesnutt's writing career.

Remarkably, though, beginning in 1920, Chesnutt experienced a personal creative renaissance that coincided with the Harlem Renaissance. Encouraged by the sale of two of his novels to film production companies in 1920—The House Behind the Cedars (1900) was actually produced by Oscar Micheaux in 1923—Chesnutt began writing again. He wrote two novels, both of which have only now been published: Paul Marchand, F.M.C.; and The Quarry. He also wrote essays that reflect his engagement with the issues of the day.

Paul Marchand is a historical novel set in antebellum New Orleans, where its hero, Marchand, is raised as an octoroon but learns that he is actually white, the son of a prominent New Orleans family. He chooses to move to France and maintain his status for the sake of his octoroon wife and children, whom he would probably have to forsake if he stayed in New Orleans as a white man. Matthew Wilson, in his introduction to the 1998 edition, suggests a reading of Paul Marchand as politically meaningful even within the rapidly changing world of the 1920s: “[Chesnutt] insisted that the experiences of mixed-race people break us out of the trap of the American racial binary, and that to ignore those experiences is a damaging oversimplification of our collective history.” The book was rejected by a number of publishers. Chesnutt continued his involvement in local civic causes and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). He also wrote essays and lectured, as a representative of a previous but still important generation.

Chesnutt’s final novel, The Quarry, written after he won the prestigious Spingarn Medal from the NAACP in 1928, also failed to find a publisher. In this novel, the hero, Donald Glover, raised as a light-skinned African American, learns as a young adult that he in fact is white, but he chooses to continue serving his adopted people. Dean McWilliams, in his introduction to the 1999 edition, points out that Chesnutt’s novel, in contrast to James Weldon Johnson’s influential Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man (1927), “might well be subtitled ‘The Biography of an Ex-White Man’” because The Quarry “turns the novel of passing on its head by recounting the story of a white man who decides to be colored.” Chesnutt takes Donald Glover on a tour of the Harlem Renaissance as Glover attends Columbia University, cavorts in bars, hangs out with a Jewish socialist, and discusses the teachings of W. E. B. Du Bois, Booker T. Washington, and Marcus Garvey. In 1930, when Chesnutt futilely submitted the novel to Houghton Mifflin, he did show some dismay and even resentment over what he saw as the general trend in the Harlem Renaissance: “I have not dredged the sewers of the Negro underworld to find my characters and my scenes” (Chesnutt to Houghton Mifflin, 29 December 1930, quoted in Andrews 1980). Chesnutt died in 1932, but his stature as a figure of the Harlem Renaissance is only now undergoing a full exploration.

Biography

Charles Waddell Chesnutt was born 20 June 1858 in Cleveland, Ohio. He studied in a Freedman’s Bureau school in Fayetteville, North Carolina, 1866–1873, and began teaching in Charlotte, North Carolina, 1873–1876. He was assistant principal and later principal of the State Colored Normal School, Fayetteville, 1877–1883. Chesnutt passed the Ohio bar examination in 1887 and opened his own business as attorney, stenographer, and court reporter in Cleveland in 1888. He wrote short stories for the Atlantic Monthly, 1887–1904. His first novel, The House Behind the Cedars, was published in 1900. He was chairman of the Committee on Colored Troops, Thirty-Fifth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, 1901; president of the Cleveland Council of Sociology, 1910; a member of the Rowfant Club, 1910; a member of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, 1912; and a member of the National Arts Club, 1917. Chesnutt’s awards included an honorary degree from Wilberforce University, Xenia, Ohio, 1913; and the Spingarn Medal, 1928. Chesnutt died in Cleveland 15 November 1932.

JOSHUA BOAZ KOTZIN

See also Authors: 2—Fiction; Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, The; Micheaux, Oscar

Selected Works

- Frederick Douglass*. 1899.
- The Conjure Woman*. 1899.
- The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line*. 1899.
- The House Behind the Cedars*. 1900. (Reissued 1993.)
- The Marrow of Tradition*. 1901. (Reissued 1969.)
- The Colonel’s Dream*. 1905. (Reissued 1977.)
- The Short Fiction of Charles W. Chesnutt*, ed. Sylvia Lyons Render. 1974.
- Collected Stories of Charles W. Chesnutt*, ed. William L. Andrews. 1992.
- The Journals of Charles W. Chesnutt*, ed. Richard H. Brodhead, 1993
- The Conjure Woman and Other Conjure Tales*, ed. Richard H. Brodhead. 1993.
- Mandy Oxendine*, ed. Charles Hackenberry. 1997.
- To Be an Author: Letters of Charles W. Chesnutt, 1898–1905*, ed. Joseph R. McElrath Jr. and Robert C. Leitz III. 1997.
- Paul Marchand, F.M.C.*, intro. Mathew Wilson. 1998.
- The Quarry*, ed. and intro. Dean McWilliams. 1999.

Further Reading

- Andrews, William L. The Literary Career of Charles W. Chesnutt. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.
- Brodhead, Richard H. Cultures of Letters: Scenes of Reading and Writing in Nineteenth-Century America. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1993.
- Keller, Frances Richardson. An American Crusade: The Life of Charles Waddell Chesnutt. Provo, Utah: Brigham Young University Press, 1978.
- Molyneaux, Sandra. "Expanding the Collective Memory: Charles W. Chesnutt's 'The Conjure Woman' Tales." In Memory, Narrative, and Identity: New Essays in Ethnic American Literatures, ed. Amritjit Singh, Joseph T. Skerrett Jr., and Robert E. Hogan. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1994.
- Sundquist, Eric J. To Wake the Nations: Race in the Making of American Literature. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. College Station, Tex.: Texas A&M University Press, 1996.

Chicago Defender

Robert S. Abbott began the Chicago Defender in a rented room on State Street, furnished with a card table and a borrowed chair. Abbott was a graduate of Kent College of Law in Chicago and had wanted to practice law, but he was denied admittance by the state bars of Illinois, Indiana, and Kansas. Inspired by the speeches of two militant black journalists of the time, Ida B. Wells and Frederick Douglass, Abbott switched his interest to newspapers. With twenty-five cents from his financial backers he bought paper and pencils. He arranged for the newspaper to be printed on credit. On 5 May 1905, Abbott delivered door to door in Chicago 300 papers of handbill size, which became the Defender's first issue.

Abbott distributed the newspaper throughout the compact ghetto in which he lived and on which he relied for his advertising. Some 44,000 people resided within a few blocks of this part of Chicago, so his delivery route was very short. Abbott remained the newspaper's sole reporter until 1910, when he hired J. Hockley Smiley, who helped boost the Defender's circulation with his own brand of sensational news coverage, resembling the "yellow journalism" of

William Randolph Hearst and Joseph Pulitzer. (In the late 1890s, Hearst and Pulitzer were competing against each other for circulation size; their battleground was the front pages of the newspapers they owned, and they tried to outdo each other in terms of lurid stories, bold headlines, and graphics.)

Abbott's Defender also adopted another journalistic approach, called "muckraking"—a term coined by President Theodore Roosevelt to describe investigative reporting that dug into the backgrounds of people and organizations to expose corruption. Abbott and Smiley investigated problems in their neighborhood, such as prostitution; but when investigative articles fell from prominence, they often made up "wild stories." "I tell the truth if I can get it, but if I can't get the facts, I read between the lines and tell what I know to be facts even though the reports say differently" (Hogan 1984, 49). The Defender became known for its detailed and salacious accounts of violent crimes and its use of large headlines printed in red; it was the first African American newspaper to depart from the more traditional journalism that simply reported accurate, straightforward news and offered editorial opinions.

Abbott's penchant for sensationalism increased sales enormously: The Defender's circulation rose to a height that had never been attained by a black newspaper. "In little more than a decade, the weekly Chicago Defender emerged as the most important black newspaper in the nation. Its unprecedented success was such [that], with the exception of the Bible, no publication was more influential among the Negro masses" (Ottley 1955, 8). The Defender increased sales not only in the North but also in the South, becoming a nationally known black newspaper. African Americans who had moved North sent the Defender to their families and friends in the South; train conductors were asked to drop copies off at certain southern crossroads.

Moreover, the Defender strategically targeted southern readers—for example, by printing help-wanted ads for jobs located in the North. Job opportunities abounded in the North as a result of World War I: The government closed off European immigration, and many factory workers joined the armed forces, so large numbers of new workers were needed in northern factories. At the same time, the South was facing a boll weevil infestation of its cotton crops that made work scarce there; in addition, in order to urge southern blacks to move north, Abbott reported sensationalized stories of lynchings and violence in the South. Abbott's strategy succeeded in two ways: By the end of World War I in 1918, the sales of his newspaper were higher in the South than anywhere else; and Abbott is sometimes credited with having started a “great northern drive” in which thousands of southern blacks resettled in the North. He himself set the date as 15 May 1917. Other newspapers—the Christian Recorder, New York News, Dallas Express, and New York Age—also urged blacks to migrate North. However, as the South faced a shortage of blacks to work in the fields, southern states such as Mississippi and Arkansas enacted laws against the Defender particularly, suppressing its printing and distribution. The Ku Klux Klan threatened harm to anyone seen with the Defender; two distributors of the newspaper were killed, and many others were run out of town. But as more and more southern leaders tried to stop the Defender, its circulation in the South kept growing.

The Defender's large profits in the North and the South gave it financial stability; it also had editorial clout that was unprecedented for a black newspaper: During World War I, the Defender continued its activist reporting and editorials and criticized the federal government for giving substandard treatment to black military personnel. Furthermore, its success led African Americans to consider journalism as a possible, even lucrative, career. The Defender nurtured a number of writers, such as Langston Hughes, who wrote a column called “Simple and Me,” which discussed the general attitudes of black people.

In 1919, Abbott became the first African American to build a newspaper plant. The circulation of the Defender remained strong: During most of the 1920s, it was about 150,000; and according to Henri (1975), at one point it climbed to 283, 571. The actual number of people who read the Defender was much higher than its subscription rate, because copies of the newspaper were passed on many times.

When Abbott died in 1940, his nephew John Sengstacke became the new owner and publisher of the Defender. Sengstacke extended the influence of the Defender by building it into a group of newspapers, which grew to five editions (one was the Indiana Defender in Gary); the group also had two subsidiaries.

GERI ALUMIT

See also Abbott, Robert Sengstacke; Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Black Press; Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance; Hughes, Langston; Journalists; New York Age

Masthead of the Chicago Defender, 18 August 1917.

Further Reading

- Burns, Ben. Nitty Gritty: A White Editor in Black Journalism. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.
- De Santis, Christopher C., ed. Langston Hughes and the Chicago Defender. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.
- Detweiler, Frederick G. The Negro Press in the United States. College Park: University of Chicago Press and McGrath, 1968, pp. 20–21.
- Finkle, Lee. Forum for Protest: The Black Press during World War II. Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Press, 1975.
- Hemmingway, Theodore. “South Carolina.” In The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979, ed. Henry Lewis Suggs. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- Henri, Florette. Black Migration Movement North, 1900–1920. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Doubleday, 1975.
- Hogan, Lawrence D. A Black National News Service: The Associated Negro Press and Claude Barnett, 1919–1945. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1984.

- Metz, T. P. Lochard. "Robert S. Abbott: 'Race Leader.'" Phylon, 8, 1947.
- Newkirk, Pamela. Within the Veil: Black Journalists, White Media. New York: New York University Press, 2000.
- Ottley, Roi. The Lonely Warrior: The Life and Times of Robert S. Abbott. Chicago, Ill.: H. Regnery Co., 1955.
- Pride, Armistead S., and Wilson, Clint C., II. A History of the Black Press. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1997.
- Reddick, Dewitt C. The Mass Media and the School Newspaper, 2nd ed. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1985.
- Simmons, Charles A. The African-American Press: A History of News Coverage During National Crises, With Special Reference to Four Black Newspapers, 1827–1965. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1998.
- Stevens, John D. "World War II and the Black Press." In Perspectives of the Black Press, ed. Henry G. La Brie III. Kennebunkport, Me.: Mercer House, 1974.
- Suggs, Henry Lewis. The Black Press in the South, 1865–1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.
- Toppin, Edgar A. A Biographical History of Blacks in America Since 1528. New York: David McKay, 1971.
- Waters, Enoch P. American Diary: A Personal History of the Black Press. Chicago, Ill.: Path, 1987.
- Wolseley, Roland E. The Black Press U.S.A. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1971.

Chocolate Dandies, The

Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake's collaboration The Chocolate Dandies (1923–1924, originally called In Bamville) helped establish black musical comedy as a force on Broadway. The show was a result of a songwriting partnership between Sissle and Blake dating back to 1916, when Sophie Tucker performed their first song, "It's All Your Fault." That same year, Sissle joined James Reese Europe's Society Dance Orchestra; he then joined Europe's 369th Infantry Regiment Band as a drum major during World War I. Sissle toured with Reese's band in France and the United States in the year after the war. After Reese was murdered by a band member, Sissle rejoined Blake, and they toured as the Dixie Duo.

Before Sissle and Blake created The Chocolate Dandies, they had had a smash success, Shuffle Along (1921). Lew Payton cowrote the book for The Chocolate Dandies (mainly contributing additional dialogue), and the star-studded cast included Josephine Baker, Lottie Gee, Inez Clough, Valaida Snow, and Payton himself.

Although this production was far more extravagant and expensive than its predecessor (at one point, three live horses ran a race onstage), it was not as economically successful as Shuffle Along. It had only six profitable weeks and closed after a much shorter run of only ninety-six performances.

The Chocolate Dandies received mixed reviews. Some critics praised it as highly as Shuffle Along, but others said that it pandered too much to the stale ideas and expectations of white audiences. Drove of white patrons certainly did come uptown to see The Chocolate Dandies and many other black shows, and Harlem sent its hits downtown to Broadway. The factors in this phenomenon are complex: White patronage increased the economic and emotional support for black musical theater, but it also contributed to a situation in which black performers were limited to stereotypical roles. Scholars have sometimes wondered what types of performance might have developed if white Americans had not been watching so closely.

The African American theater critic Theophilus Lewis thought that The Chocolate Dandies had a high level of sophistication and an aristocratic tone, and that it could be compared to the best of white American theater. Perhaps confirming this, some white reviewers considered the show too "ambitious" and high-minded; they evidently deplored its attempt to abandon the confining notions of what black musicals could do. In other words, they raised questions about "blackness" (a controversial term) and argued that The Chocolate Dandies resembled white productions too closely and lacked the expected black style. (This problem was to persist: Many comedies and revues similar in style to Shuffle Along succeeded, whereas nonconforming productions like The Chocolate Dandies were doomed.) On the other hand, certain reviewers thought that The Chocolate Dandies was not innovative enough. Eric Walrond, reviewing the show for Opportunity, said that it added nothing new to the line of black shows on Broadway since Shuffle Along. He found The Chocolate Dandies neither bad nor good but dull, tiresome, and formulaic: "For a Negro show to make a bid for Broadway all that is required, it seems, is a bevy of dancing girls, a 'harmony four,' a riot of color, and a slender plot (which is unimportant), built usually around the swindling of some poor, old, illiterate 'darky.'" Walrond concurred with those who questioned the "blackness" of the show; he thought that the play was trying to cater to the desires of jaded whites who loved black musical comedies: "Sissle and Blake doubtless forgot that there are colored people who like to see their shows. . . . It didn't seem like a colored show at all." Besides the cut-out and Charleston dance numbers, "there isn't a thing in it that cannot be duplicated by any group of white actors and actresses on the road. . . . The life of the Negro as [it] is sketchily presented in a show like this is false." According to Walrond, The Chocolate Dandies had omitted all the particulars of race, and he considered this omission undesirable. He noted that there was ample talent in Harlem, as well as ample material, but that it was not used in The Chocolate Dandies.

Despite these issues of aesthetics and style, The Chocolate Dandies was still an important production. For one thing, it was Josephine Baker's first major show, and Baker impressed the critics with the slapstick comedy that she had begun earlier, in her embellished role in Shuffle Along. This work had helped her get a leading role in The Chocolate Dandies, and in 1924, she was billed as "that comedy chorus girl." (However, she soon abandoned her comic style for the exotic, erotic image that made her an international sensation.)

The tenor and actor Ivan Harold Browning was the romantic lead in The Chocolate Dandies. Alfred "Slick" Chester performed as an actor, singer, and dancer. Inez Clough played Mrs. Hez Brown, wife of the president of the Bamville Fair. Lottie Gee played Angeline Brown from 1923 to 1924, before the show went to Broadway, when it was still titled In Bamville. Valaida Snow played Manda. Noble Sissle played Dobbie Hicks.

According to Eubie Blake, when the production was headed to Broadway, the producers brought in Julian Mitchell, a white dance director, to give it a "Broadway touch." Mitchell received more money and credit than Charlie Davis, the black choreographer, who did more work. This was a common story at the time; the enthusiasm for blacks' contributions to musical theater often did not translate into economic gains for the artists.

NADINE GEORGE-GRAVES

See also Baker, Josephine; Blake, Eubie; Clough, Inez; Europe, James Reese; Lewis, Theophilus; Musical Theater; Sissle, Noble; Shuffle Along; Snow, Valaida; Walrond, Eric

Further Reading

Dictionary of the Black Theatre: Broadway, Off-Broadway, and Selected Harlem Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983.

Kimball, Robert, and William Bolcom. Reminiscing With Sissle and Blake. New York: Viking, 1973.

Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Civic Club Dinner, 1924

The Civic Club dinner, a gathering of writers and editors held in Manhattan on 21 March 1924, was the first of a number of interracial promotional events organized by Charles S. Johnson to draw attention to the young writers and artists of the Harlem Renaissance. The idea for the dinner first came up among the members of a group that called itself the Writers' Guild; it met in Harlem and included Johnson and a number of other writers. The dinner originally was conceived of as a "coming-out party" that would raise awareness of the work of African American writers; the publication of Jessie Fauset's novel There Is Confusion was selected as the occasion. But as Johnson began to make the arrangements, he made it clear in a letter to Alain Locke that he wanted to include as many writers as possible rather than having an event focused exclusively on Fauset.

The site of the dinner, the Civic Club, had been established in 1917 by, among others, founding members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); it was one of the few places in New York City that welcomed both black and white members. The guest list was carefully interracial: It included scores of African American writers, many of the most influential white editors and publishers of the time, and key figures in a number of important organizations, such as the NAACP, the National Urban League, and the YMCA. In total, about 110 people attended.

The attendees heard a number of speeches by editors and publishers, including Charles Johnson; Locke; Horace Liveright, whose company had published Jean Toomer's book Cane in 1923, as well as There Is Confusion; W. E. B. Du Bois, the editor of the NAACP's magazine, Crisis; James Weldon Johnson, who had just edited the Book of American Negro Poetry; and Carl Van Doren, the editor of Century magazine. Albert Barnes also spoke, about his collection of African art. Fauset did speak, but so did Walter White, whose novel Fire in the Flint had recently been accepted for publication; Countee Cullen and Gwendolyn Bennett read poems. Montgomery Gregory, the chair of the drama department at Howard University, and the poet Georgia Douglas Johnson were also recognized. Fauset ended up feeling slighted because she and her book had not received more attention.

Charles Johnson, as editor of Opportunity magazine, was already familiar with these writers' work, and he clearly hoped that the dinner would encourage white publishers and editors to be more welcoming of this material. That seems to have been the result. Frederick Allen, the editor of Harper's magazine, read Countee Cullen's poems at the dinner and promptly asked to publish them. More important, immediately after the dinner Paul Kellogg, the editor of Survey Graphic magazine, began plans for a special issue on Harlem. Locke, who served as master of ceremonies for the dinner, became the editor of that issue, which was published in March 1925. It proved remarkably popular, and Locke expanded its contents into the anthology The New Negro. The Civic Club dinner, then, was the event that led to one of the most important books of the Harlem Renaissance.

The optimism of the event and the enthusiasm of the participants for the work of African American writers contributed to the energy of the Harlem Renaissance. Furthermore, a number of the speakers articulated points that became themes of the movement. Many of them offered suggestions to the young writers or made arguments about how their work should be understood. Locke, for example, argued that the quality and content of the new literature might spark reappraisals of African Americans; Liveright encouraged writers to provide well-rounded portraits of the race; White heralded the passing of stereotypes of African Americans; and Gregory emphasized the potential for African Americans in drama. Van Doren's comments seem to have been particularly well received, for they were reprinted—along with an account of the evening and a partial list of guests—in Opportunity's May 1924 issue. Van Doren praised the potential of young writers and their work, asserting that they were contributing important characteristics to American literature: emotional power, as well as “color, music, gusto, the free expression of gay or desperate moods.” He also offered advice to young writers, encouraging them to strike a balance between rage and complacency, passion and humor. He acknowledged that black writers had to continue to be “propagandists,” but he also argued that their work must rise above the limits of propaganda.

Reprinting Van Doren's comments in Opportunity brought them to a wider audience. His comments are also echoed by arguments made and advice given elsewhere by other participants in the Harlem Renaissance. His tendency to emphasize the emotional characteristics of African American literature runs through a good deal of the literary criticism of the period—but so, too, does his argument that African Americans were making important contributions to American culture. Other writers and editors also offered advice to aspiring writers and artists. Du Bois and Charles Johnson, for example, laid out artistic criteria each year as they encouraged writers and artists to submit work to the annual contests sponsored by Crisis and Opportunity.

Charles Johnson also continued the tradition of the Civic Club dinner with increasingly elaborate events to celebrate the work of Opportunity's contest winners in 1925, 1926, and 1927. He used both black and white writers and editors as judges for the contests. The judging and celebrations, then, followed the pattern established for the Civic Club dinner of bringing black and white Americans together, in the interest of advancing African American literature and arts. The Civic Club dinner, in short, is one event that reveals many of the issues, criteria, and strategies that characterized the work of the following years.

ANNE CARROLL

See also Barnes, Albert C.; Bennett, Gwendolyn; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; Kellogg, Paul U.; Liveright, Horace; Locke, Alain; New Negro, The; Opportunity Literary Contests; Survey Graphic; Van Doren, Carl; White, Walter

Further Reading

- “The Debut of the Younger School of Negro Writers.” Opportunity, May 1924, pp. 143–144.
- Gilpin, Patrick J. “Charles S. Johnson: Entrepreneur of the Harlem Renaissance.” In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass., and London: Belknap Press–Harvard University Press, 1995. (Paperback, 1997.)
- Johnson, Charles S. “The Negro Renaissance and Its Significance.” In The New Negro Thirty Years Afterward, ed. Rayford W. Logan, Eugene C. Holmes, and

- G. Franklin Edwards. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1956, 1978.
- Lewis, David Lewering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1979. (Paperback, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989.)
- Long, Richard A. "The Genesis of Locke's 'The New Negro.'" Black World, 25(4), 1976.
- Van Notten, Eleonore. Wallace Thurman's Harlem Renaissance. Amsterdam and Atlanta, Ga.: Rodopi, 1994.
- Van Doren, Carl. "The Younger Generation of Negro Writers." Opportunity, May 1924, pp. 144–145.

Civil Rights and Law

The Harlem Renaissance coincided with the push among blacks, and sympathetic whites, to reverse the downward spiral of civil rights that had been taking place since the end of Reconstruction. Civil rights during the renaissance must be understood in the context of the preceding decades.

From Reconstruction to the Renaissance

The passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 marked the high point of the legal protection of black people's rights until the 1960s. Between 1875 and 1915, the rights of African Americans, at the national level, steadily declined. The Harlem Renaissance would coincide with new initiatives in civil rights but would come after four decades of backtracking at the national level. With a few exceptions, blacks lost case after case in the U.S. Supreme Court during this period.

In United States v. Reese (1876), the Supreme Court refused to allow the prosecution of whites who prevented blacks from voting, and in so doing struck down a major portion of the Enforcement Act of 1870, which had been designed to protect the right of blacks to vote. Later that term the Court refused to allow the prosecution of whites who had murdered blacks in Louisiana, in what is known as the "Colfax massacre." This case ended any hope that the Court would uphold the Enforcement Act and other statutes designed to protect blacks from violence by whites. Two years later, in Hull v. DeCuir (1878), the Court struck down a Louisiana statute that had required integration in steamboats, trains, and other common carriers passing through the state. The Court found that these regulations promoting integration violated the federal commerce power. Ironically, of course, less than twenty years later, in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), the Court would find that state regulations requiring segregation did not violate the commerce clause.

In a series of cases involving blacks and juries the courts held, in Strauder v. West Virginia (1880), that states could not specifically prohibit blacks from serving on juries. In Neal v. Delaware (1881), the Supreme Court further held that the states could not indirectly prohibit blacks from serving on juries by tying jury service to some other right that was denied to blacks. However, these rare victories were undercut by the decision in Virginia v. Rives (1880). Here the court refused to interfere in the prosecution of two black teenagers for murder, even though no blacks had ever served on grand or petit juries in the county.

Perhaps the worst year for blacks' civil rights was 1883. In January, the Supreme Court held in United States v. Harris (1883) that the federal government had no jurisdiction to prosecute members of a white mob who had broken into a jail and attacked three black prisoners, murdering one of them. A few days later, in Pace v. Alabama (1883), the Court upheld a state prosecution of a black man for marrying a white woman, on the theory that the law punished blacks and whites equally for the crime of interracial marriage. Later that fall, in The Civil Rights Cases (1883), the Supreme Court struck down the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which had been designed to give blacks equal access to public accommodations such as hotels, restaurants, and theaters. The Court concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment was applicable only to "state action," and thus private individuals were free to discriminate if they wished to. In a bitter dissent Justice John Marshall Harlan noted that the business involved in the case were all state-regulated and were "affected with a public interest," and thus there was a great deal of "state action" if the Court chose to see it.

By the mid-1890s, blacks faced discrimination in almost every aspect of life. More than 90 percent of all African Americans lived in the fifteen former slave states, where segregation had become a way of life. Lynching was common enough so that all blacks feared the possibility. More than 500 blacks were lynched in the 1880s, and more than 1,000 in the 1890s. Blacks voted in substantial numbers through the 1880s, but in the two decades between 1890 and 1910 they were effectively disenfranchised in most of the South. Between 1890 and 1892, the number of black voters in Mississippi declined from more than 190,000 to about 8,000. In 1898, whites rioted in Wilmington,

North Carolina, undermining the political power base of black voters in that state. Legally elected black officials in that city were forced to flee their homes and resign their positions. In 1906, bloody riots in Atlanta preceded the virtual complete disenfranchisement of blacks in Georgia. Meanwhile, in 1896, the Supreme Court in Plessy v. Ferguson held that state laws requiring segregation did not violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as long as the separate facilities were “equal.” The age of Jim Crow not only had arrived but had been sanctified by the nation’s highest court.

Between 1890 and 1910, about 200,000 blacks fled the impoverished South looking for better jobs. They also left the South because it was increasingly repressive and dangerous. Tied to economic opportunity was the chance that their children would have a better education in the North. But this migration was tiny, as some 10 million more blacks—just under 90 percent of the nation’s African American population—remained segregated, brutalized, and mostly impoverished in the South.

Those few blacks who made it to the North did not find nirvana but did find somewhat better conditions. In the 1880s, most of the northeastern states, including New York, passed civil rights laws that at least on their face prohibited racial discrimination in many aspects of life. Except in a few places schools were not formally segregated. In most of the North segregated schools resulted from housing patterns, but in an age before massive ghettoization, many blacks in the North lived near whites and attended schools with them. And in the period before World War I, even where the schools were formally segregated in the North, they were a vast improvement over the South, where often there were no high schools at all for blacks. In 1897, for example, the city of Augusta, Georgia, simply closed its only black high school, claiming that it could not afford the luxury of providing such advanced education for blacks. In Cumming v. Richmond County Board of Education (1899), the Supreme Court refused to intervene on behalf of black parents in that city. Indeed, even where private citizens wanted to provide education for southern blacks, they faced an uphill battle. Berea College, in Kentucky, was integrated after the Civil War. But in 1904, the Kentucky legislature prohibited integrated education, and in Berea College v. Kentucky (1908), the Supreme Court upheld the state law. During this period the Supreme Court usually protected private property from state legislation, but when it came to the rights of blacks, the Court had no problem allowing the state to impose its racial theories on a private college.

Changing Civil Rights: 1915–1937

In 1909, black and white advocates of civil rights organized the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to fight segregation and discrimination. The organization was led by a new generation of black intellectuals and activists, most notably W. E. B. Du Bois and Ida B. Wells; white reformers, such as the socialist William English Walling and Mary White Ovington; and establishment whites with ties to the abolitionist movement. These included Oswald Garrison Villard, the grandson of William Lloyd Garrison, and Moorfield Storey, a leading attorney and former president of the American Bar Association, who had once been the secretary to Senator Charles Sumner, the author of the Civil Rights Act of 1875. The NAACP investigated lynching and lobbied—though unsuccessfully—for federal antilynching legislation. The organization also initiated legal action on a variety of fronts, with Storey acting as legal counsel.

The first success came in a voting rights case from Oklahoma. In 1910, Oklahoma adopted a literacy test for voters, but under a “grandfather clause” the law exempted from the test anyone who would have been able to vote in 1867, the year before the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. This meant that whites did not have to take the literacy test, because any white man who had been an adult in 1867 would have been able to vote; but because blacks could not vote in 1867, they had to take the test. Black voters in Oklahoma brought suit, and in 1912, President William Howard Taft instructed the Department of Justice to intervene. When the case reached the Supreme Court, as Guinn v. United States (1915), Moorfield Storey argued on behalf of the NAACP, but in a huge victory for the civil rights organization, the main argument was made by Solicitor General John W. Davis. The Court unanimously struck down the Oklahoma statute as violating the civil rights of blacks. For the first time in living memory civil rights advocates had won a case in the U.S. Supreme Court.

Two years later, in Buchanan v. Warley, Storey persuaded the Supreme Court to strike down a Kentucky law prohibiting blacks from buying houses on streets that had a majority of white residents, and also prohibiting whites from buying houses on streets that had a majority of black residents. The goal of the statute was to gradually create fully segregated neighborhoods. The Court rejected the idea that this was “separate but equal” under the precedent in Plessy v. Ferguson, and instead saw it as an unconstitutional infringement on the right of property owners to sell their property to whomever they wished. This was the first time that the Court had struck down a law mandating racial segregation. But what the state could not do, private parties could do. In Corrigan v. Buckley (1926), the Court upheld a restriction in deeds that prohibited the sale of land to blacks. In one area of Washington, D.C., some thirty parcels of land had restrictive covenants, prohibiting anyone in the area from selling land to blacks for twenty-one years. When Corrigan sold her house to a black, Buckley sued under the covenants, which he claimed were contracts binding on all landowners in the area. The Court rejected arguments that the covenants violated the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, and as it had in the Civil Rights Cases, concluded that private discrimination was constitutionally permissible.

In Nixon v. Herndon (1927), the Supreme Court struck down a Texas law that prohibited blacks from voting in primary elections. Because at the time winners of the Democratic primary were virtually assured of winning the state offices they sought, the “white primary” effectively barred blacks from meaningful political participation in the state. Texas responded by passing legislation allowing the parties to set their own rules for participation in the primary, and not surprisingly, the Democratic Party barred blacks. In Nixon v. Condon (1932), the Supreme Court struck down this scheme, noting that the state could not delegate to the party what it could not do itself. Texas then withdrew entirely from the process of running primary elections and left the parties free to choose candidates however they wished. In Grovey v. Townsend (1935), the Court concluded that the parties were “private” and that no “state action” was involved. Thus once again the primary became an all-white affair. Finally, in Smith v. Allwright (1944), the Court ruled that the parties were not “private” for purposes of running primaries, and that any discrimination in voting was unconstitutional.

Civil rights were also tied to criminal justice. In Moore v. Dempsey (1923), Storey and the NAACP persuaded the Supreme Court to reverse the convictions of blacks charged with murder for defending themselves during a race riot in Arkansas in 1919. In 1925, the NAACP teamed up with Clarence Darrow and Arthur Garfield Hayes to successfully defend Ossian Sweet, a black physician charged with murder after he shot at a mob that attacked his home in Detroit, Michigan. These cases gave blacks some sense of fair justice. In the famous Scottsboro case, nine black boys were accused of raping two white girls. The story was entirely fabricated—there had been no rape or even consensual sex between the black youths and the two girls. But the accusations led to trials and convictions for all the defendants. In Powell v. Alabama (1932), the Supreme Court reversed a conviction in the case on the ground that the defendant was not properly represented by counsel. In Norris v. Alabama (1935), the Court reversed another conviction because no blacks had ever been in the jury pool in the county where the trial took place. These cases were brought to the Court by the International Labor Defense (ILD), which was affiliated with the Communist Party. The Norris case was a victory for civil rights because a unanimous court recognized that de facto discrimination—simply not putting blacks in the jury pool—violated the Fourteenth Amendment as much as a statute banning blacks from juries. After both cases the defendants were retried and convicted; officials in Alabama put blacks in the jury pool, but then never called them. Ultimately, however, all the defendants either were pardoned or escaped to the North, where they remained free. In Brown v. Mississippi (1936), the Court overturned the conviction of blacks based on confessions they made after they had been tortured and threatened with being lynched. This was another small step in the recognition that civil rights should be tied to a fair administration of justice.

During the 1920s and 1930s, there were no successful civil right initiatives at the national level. Antilynching legislation regularly died in committees or with the threat of filibusters in the Senate. Even without legislation during this period, however, the number of actual lynchings began to decline. The investigations of lynching by the NAACP put some public pressure on communities to try to avoid it. The fact that there was no lynching after the alleged rapes in the Scottsboro incident suggests that the NAACP and other civil rights organizations had won a cultural, if not a legal, victory in this area. However, a spate of race riots during and after World War I in the North and the South reminded blacks and their white allies that race and racial discrimination were not solely a southern problem. Hundreds of blacks died across the country in riots in Chicago, East St. Louis, Knoxville, Omaha, Houston, and Tulsa. Justice was rarely served in the aftermath of these attacks on black communities. Perhaps the best blacks could hope for was what happened after the riots in Elaine (Arkansas) and Tulsa (Oklahoma). In Arkansas, twelve blacks were sentenced to death and more than sixty to prison terms, but the convictions were all reversed after the decision in Moore v. Dempsey (1923). After the riot in Tulsa, the city attempted to use new zoning regulations to prevent blacks from rebuilding on the land they owned in the burned-out North side of the city. A local attorney, Buck C. Franklin, prevented this by convincing a trial court that it would effectively take property away without just compensation. During World War II the executive branch would initiate some fair employment practices as executive orders, but by and large, the era was one that offered little for blacks at the national level. The victories in the Supreme Court pointed toward the future but did little at the time except offer hope to blacks struggling against legalized inequality.

Illustrative of this is Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada (1938). Lloyd Gaines, a black citizen of Missouri, applied to attend law school at the University of Missouri. The state offered to pay his tuition at state law schools in neighboring Illinois or Iowa, which were not segregated, but Gaines insisted on his right to attend a state-supported law school in his home state. The Supreme Court agreed and ordered Missouri to admit Gaines. However, Gaines disappeared shortly after the decision and was never found. Some scholars believe he was murdered by the Ku Klux Klan or other white terrorists; others suggest that he was too afraid to attend the law school and simply moved out of state. In the 1950s, this precedent would help lead to the desegregation of southern graduate and professional schools, but in the age of the Harlem Renaissance, it did little to change the circumstances of blacks living in the South.

Black leaders and organizations never ceased their demands for equal rights, even in the face of so few victories. A. Philip Randolph used the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters—the only black-dominated union in the country—to push for greater rights and to threaten a mass march on Washington, D.C., in the 1930s and early 1940s. The Urban League (unlike the NAACP) did not have a litigation arm but nevertheless pushed for equality. The Socialist Party and the Communist Party also agitated for civil rights, and although these organizations were unsuccessful at the polls, they helped keep the issue on the table.

At the state level, particularly in the North, there were some more substantive victories. After 1915, blacks began to exert significant political power. In 1915, Oscar De Priest was elected to the board of aldermen in Chicago, and in 1928, he became the first black Congressman in the North. In 1934, he was succeeded by Arthur Mitchell. Similarly, in New York, Charles Roberts was elected to the board of aldermen in 1919. In 1941, Adam Clayton Powell Jr. began his long career with a seat on the New York City council, and three years later he went to Congress. Thus in the North voting rights and civil rights began to have a substantive meaning. By the end of the Harlem Renaissance, blacks held office in Ohio, Illinois, New York, Pennsylvania, and other northeastern and midwestern states. Blacks in these states fought for fair housing laws and other antidiscrimination laws. In 1935, for example, Assemblyman James E. Stephens, the only black in the New York state legislature, successfully sponsored a bill to prohibit any “life insurance corporation doing business within” New York state from making “any distinction or discrimination between white persons and colored persons, wholly or partially of African descent, as to the premiums or rates charged for policies” and further prohibited “a greater premium from such colored persons.” Meanwhile, some blacks in Harlem and elsewhere in the North took advantage of state laws to attend public colleges and universities and participate in professional and civil life. By the eve of World War II, a significant number of blacks in the North had obtained education and skills to lead the postwar civil rights movement. The NAACP and its powerful Legal Defense and Educational division—which would successfully challenge the legality of racial segregation after World War II—had headquarters in New York City throughout this period.

PAUL FINKELMAN

See also Antilynching Crusade; Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Communist Party; De Priest, Oscar; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Great Migration; Great Migration and the Harlem Renaissance; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Urban League; Ovington, Mary White; Riots: 1–Overview; Riots: 3–Tulsa; Scottsboro; Villard, Oswald Garrison; other specific individuals

Further Reading

Fairclough, Adam. Better Day Coming: Blacks and Equality, 1890–2000. New York: Viking, 2001a.
 ———. Teaching Equality: Black Schools in the Age of Jim Crow. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001b.

- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Knopf, 1976.
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
- Murray, Pauli, ed. States' Laws on Race and Color. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1997. (Reprint ed.; originally published 1951.)
- Shapiro, Herbert. White Violence and Black Response. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1988.
- Sitkoff, Harvard. A New Deal for Blacks: The Emergence of Civil Rights as a National Issue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Tushnet, Mark V. The NAACP's Legal Strategy Against Segregated Education, 1925–1950. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

Clef Club

The Clef Club was an organization dedicated to presenting concerts of music featuring African American performers and composers in a disciplined manner; it was most active between 1910 and the late 1920s.

The Clef Club evolved from informal meetings at the Marshall Hotel, a gathering place on West 53rd Street for musicians of the ragtime era. The club held its first meeting on 11 April 1910, gave its first concert on 11 May, and was incorporated on 21 June. Its first president, music director, and guiding light was the bandmaster James Reese Europe. Other musical luminaries connected with the club at its inception included the bandleader Dan Kildare, vice president; the composer William H. Tyers, assistant music director; the show composer Henry S. Creamer; and the bandleader and impresario C. Arthur (“Happy”) Rhone. The composer Will Marion Cook was soon named second assistant conductor. At the initial concert, the songwriter Joe Jordan made the biggest impression, conducting his “That Teasing Rag.”

At an early gala concert at Harlem’s Manhattan Casino (20 October 1910), Europe led an orchestra of about one hundred musicians, most playing plucked string instruments. These included mandolins and banjos, plus hybrid instruments that were once common but are no longer in use today, such as bandolins (banjo-mandolins) and harp-guitars. There were also seven violins, nine cellos, and two basses. Three percussionists played trap sets and timpani. Of thirty-three pianists then listed on the roster of the Clef Club, eleven played, conducted, and entertained on this program, sometimes en masse. Several were prominent composers who had works on the program, including Creamer, Tyers, Ford Dabney, and Al Johns. The veteran minstrel Sam Lucas was on the entertainment committee for this concert, which was followed by a dance. The concert itself, which lasted three hours, was broken up into segments conducted by different composer-performers, interspersed with specialty acts. This pattern was followed for a number of later events of the Clef Club.

Old-fashioned minstrel numbers were an important component of the Clef Club’s early concerts but were definitively dropped late in 1911, in favor of a more up-to-date cabaret and show repertoire. The performances also included light classics, waltzes, marches, and some ragtime. The instrumentation of the orchestra evolved during its first years under Europe’s direction: Flutes, clarinets, and a pipe organ were added in 1911, and a brass section was added by the end of that year.

The Clef Club reached its apogee with a concert at Carnegie Hall on 2 May 1912, the first event of its kind held there. This concert was a benefit for the Music Settlement School for Colored People in Harlem; it had been organized by Europe with the white musician David Mannes and was enormously successful, raising almost $5,000. A second concert was held at Carnegie Hall on 12 February 1913. This time, spirituals were added to the program, in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. The biggest hit of both concerts was Cook’s lovely song “Swing Along.” In November 1913, the entire 125-man orchestra went on an extensive tour of the East Coast.

Remarkably, fewer than a quarter of the Clef Club’s musicians were able to read music. Instead, in rehearsals small groups would form, each around a reading musician as a nucleus, with the others catching the tune from him. Some players improvised their own approximations of the written melody. This gave the Clef Club Orchestra a unique sound, synchronized but uncommonly rich in texture.

At the end of 1913, Europe had a falling-out with some other officials of the Clef Club and left to found new organizations. Other luminaries of the Clef Club, including Ford Dabney and Will Tyers, went with Europe to found the Tempo Club. These men soon dominated social dance music in the New York area—particularly Europe, through his association with the dance team of Vernon and Irene Castle. The craze for black musicians in this era benefited the Clef Club long after Europe's departure. Nevertheless, he was asked to resume leadership when he returned to New York from France in 1919—now as bandleader of the 369th New York Regiment, the "Harlem Hellfighters"—but he declined.

Following Europe's departure, the Clef Club was led at various times by most of the prominent African American musicians of the day. Europe was initially succeeded as president by Dan Kildare, who in turn was forced out in March 1915, to be succeeded by J. Wesley ("Deacon") Johnson. The songwriter J. Tim Brymn took charge of the club's orchestra in 1914. Will Marion Cook was briefly the conductor of its orchestra and chorus in 1918, but he quit before a planned tour. On 22 April 1918, the Clef Club presented the debut of the contralto Marian Anderson at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. Also in 1918, a Clef Club orchestra, organized by Cook and renamed the New York Syncopated Orchestra, toured the United States. In 1919, Cook went to London with this band, where they met with great acclaim. In February 1919, a gala honoring the return of the 369th Regiment featured three guest conductors: Europe, W. C. Handy, and Lieutenant Eugene Mikell. Lieutenant Tim Brymn was briefly conductor in 1919; later in that year E. Gilbert Anderson was conductor. In the early 1920s, the composer Will Tyers took the Clef Club's musicians on vaudeville tours. During the same period Eugene Mikell—who, like Europe and Tim Brymn, had been a respected bandmaster in World War I—occasionally conducted Clef Club orchestras.

In the 1920s, the Clef Club was a more loosely organized outfit, with frequent shifts in its leadership and personnel. Over the years its presidents included S. S. Weeks, Alexander Fenner, Sam Patterson, and Aubrey Brooks. Under the leadership of its third president, Deacon Johnson, it became more like an ordinary booking agency for black entertainers. Johnson was the most important figure in the club's fortunes in the 1920s; by 1927, his Apex Musical Bureau was the parent body and controlling factor in the Clef Club. For a time the Apex Bureau was headed by the ragtime pianist Hughie Woolford. In 1927, Deacon Johnson was forced out as head of the Clef Club—an awkward situation, because he still controlled such named entities as the Clef Club Singers and Players.

As the jazz age evolved, the Clef Club's associations with earlier styles made it less relevant to the more forward-looking musicians in Harlem. Nevertheless, it continued to attract the best young artists of the 1920s, including the bass-baritone Paul Robeson. The noted baritone Jules Bledsoe appeared with a small Clef Club unit in upstate New York at the end of 1925. Fletcher Henderson and his Roseland Orchestra appeared at the club's sixteenth-anniversary reception in 1926. The violinist Allie Ross conducted the club's string orchestra at a memorial service for Florence Mills in 1927.

Although the Clef Club was already in decline in the late 1920s, by then it owned its headquarters at 137 West 53rd Street. This ensured its continued existence for another three decades. Eventually, however, the building had to be sold, and the last fifteen years of the Clef Club's decline were spent at 334 West 53rd Street. The club finally folded in 1957.

Although the Clef Club as an organization never moved its headquarters to Harlem from the older black district of west midtown, as a musical institution it was of the utmost importance in the years leading up to the Harlem Renaissance.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Bledsoe, Jules; Cook, Will Marion; Europe, James Reese; Henderson, Fletcher; Jordan, Joe; Manhattan Casino; Music; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Robeson, Paul

Further Reading

- Badger, Reid. A Life in Ragtime: A Biography of James Reese Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Brooks, Tim. "Dan Kildare." Storyville, 1976–1977.
- Clef Club clippings file. Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.
- Jenkins, Sara. "Music Night and the Clef Club Contribution." New York Age, 28 November 1927.
- Outram, Percival. "Activities Among Union Musicians." New York Age, 10 December 1927.

Clough, Inez

The singer and actress Inez Clough joined John W. Isham's Oriental America company in 1896 and toured with the show in the United States. In April 1897, Clough and the company sailed for Great Britain to participate in Queen Victoria's jubilee; over the next twelve months, they performed in many of the cities and towns of the British Midlands, in Scotland and Wales, and on the Isle of Man. When the company disbanded in the spring of 1898, Clough settled in London; as a solo act, she was seen in all the major British music halls. In addition to those appearances, she appeared in English pantomimes, including Little Red Riding Hood, Dick Whittington, and Robinson Crusoe.

Clough, Inez

In 1902, Clough returned to New York, where she joined the Williams and Walker company. She appeared with the troupe in In Dahomey (1902–1904), Abyssinia (1906–1907), Bandanna Land (1908–1909), and Mr. Lode of Koal (1909). Clough also was a member of the Cole and Johnson Brothers company for The Shoo-Fly Regiment in 1907. During this time, she also appeared in concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., and other eastern cities. In 1913, Clough became a charter member of the original Lafayette Players in Harlem. She appeared in many of their productions, both dramatic and musical. In 1922, she joined a road company of Shuffle Along; two years later, she appeared in The Chocolate Dandies on Broadway. In 1925, she became a member of Ida Anderson's company of players, which presented dramatic plays at the Lincoln Theater in Harlem for ten weeks. Clough retired from show business in the late 1920s.

Biography

Inez Clough was born in the 1860s or 1870s, probably in Massachusetts, where she was given voice and piano lessons. It is possible that she studied voice in Europe during the late 1880s. She lived in London from 1898 until 1902, when she returned to New York and joined the Williams and Walker company. She also appeared in concerts, was one of the original members of the Lafayette Players, and performed in dramas at the Lincoln Theater. Clough died in December 1933.

JOHN GRAZIANO

See also Chocolate Dandies, The Lafayette Players; Lincoln Theater; Shuffle Along; Singers

Further Reading

Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.

Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.

Cohen, Octavus Roy

Octavus Roy Cohen was a journalist, lawyer, novelist, short-story writer, and script writer for radio and film. He wrote more than fifty novels and collections of short stories published originally in the Saturday Evening Post, Red Book, and Colliers, among other magazines. He received writing credits for more than fifteen films and several radio programs, including Amos 'n' Andy. Cohen was also a playwright, best known for Come Seven, starring Earle Foxe, who in seventy-two performances brought the character Florian Slappey to life on Broadway in 1920. Slappey, a “sepia gentleman,” leaves Alabama to make his mark in Harlem; sartorially elegant, the “Beau Brummell” of Birmingham, he survives humorous adventures in Birmingham and then in Harlem.

Cohen's stories—in which Slappey is often featured—demonstrate his handling of southern black dialect and chronicle the fast-paced Harlem night scene in the 1920s and 1930s, with its con men, rent parties, fancy women, and just plain decent folk. Highly Colored (1920), Bigger and Blacker (1925), Florian Slappey Goes Abroad (1928), Lilies of the Alley (1931), and Florian Slappey (1938) record Slappey's major experiences.

Epic Peters Pullman Porter (1930) is a collection of short stories exploring the comic misadventures of another character, a train car porter on the Birmingham to New York run. The stories about Epic Peters are told with dialect humor highlighting class, race, and the personal relationships an African American sleeping car porter had with train officials, fellow porters, and whites in the 1920s. Carbon Copies (1932), a collection of short stories set in Birmingham, features the lawyer Evans Chew, “attorney at law and orator extraordinary,” and his comic interactions with Slappey and Peters, among other denizens of Darktown. These caricatures reflect an ethnic humor common during the period but considered offensive today.

Among Cohen's work with black characters is a series of short films produced by Christy Studios in Hollywood in 1929: Melancholy Dame, Oft in the Silly Night, The Lady Fare, Music Hath Harms, and The Framing of the Shrew. These films, which had a black cast, were adapted from Cohen's short stories and often starred Spencer Williams, who also cowrote many of the scripts. The films are characterized by broad satire and stereotyped, often uncouth figures who are meant to portray African American life.

Cohen's "rogue school" mystery fiction is marked by the creation of the detective Jim Hanvey, a white "good ol' boy," who constantly plays with a gold toothpick worn on a chain around his neck and who smokes pungent, cheap little black cigars. Hanvey's ill-kept raiment and slovenly manner conceal his shrewd intelligence. Hanvey made his first appearance in the Saturday Evening Post, and many of these stories were collected and published: Jim Hanvey, Detective (1923), Detours (1927), and Scrambled Yeggs (1934). Novels featuring Hanley include The May Day Mystery (1929), The Backstage Mystery (1930), and Star of the Earth (1932). The Townsend Murder Mystery (1933) is the dialogue of a radio serial about Hanvey, essentially as broadcast on NBC, published in book form.

Cohen's hard-boiled detective fiction, exploring the tawdry underside of the South, New York, and California, includes a number of novels: There's Always Time to Die (also published as I Love You Again, 1937), Romance in Crimson (also published as Murder in Season, 1940), Strange Honeymoon (1939), More Beautiful Than Murder (1948), A Bullet for My Love (1950), and Love Can Be Dangerous (also published as: The Intruder, 1955). These novels rely on traditional techniques of the detective story to create a sense of realism, especially concerning civic corruption, love triangles, the nightclub crowd, and murder.

Biography

Octavus Roy Cohen, a journalist, lawyer, and writer, was born 26 June 1891 of Jewish parents in Charleston, South Carolina. He graduated in 1911 from Clemson College; he married Inez Lopez on 6 October 1914 in Bessemer, Alabama. Cohen worked as a newspaperman—for the Birmingham Ledger and the Charleston News and Courier in the south, and for the Bayonne Times and the Newark Morning Star in New Jersey—before he was admitted to the bar in South Carolina in 1913. He abandoned the practice of law in 1915 to devote himself to writing. As a writer, he produced some fifty novels and collections of short stories and worked on films and in radio. He was also a playwright; his Broadway play Come Seven (1920) was notable for its presentation of his character Florian Slappey. Cohen died in Los Angeles on 6 January 1959.

JAMES E. REIBMAN

See also Amos 'n' Andy

Further Reading

- Brasch, Walter M. Black English and the Mass Media. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1981.
- DeAndrea, William L. Encyclopedia Mysteriosa: A Comprehensive Guide to the Art of Detection in Print, Film, Radio, and Television. New York: Prentice Hall General Reference, 1994.
- "Octavus Roy Cohen (1891–1959)." University of Texas Website.
- Steinbrunner, Chris, and Otto Penzler. Encyclopedia of Mystery and Detection. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.
- Worth, Robert F. "Nigger Heaven and the Harlem Renaissance." African-American Review, 29(3), Fall 1995, pp. 461–473.

Cole, Bob

Although Bob Cole (Robert Allen Cole) died before the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance, many of his innovations paved the way for the renaissance with regard to theater. According to his cocreator, long-time partner, and friend James Weldon Johnson, "Bob was one of the most talented and versatile Negroes ever connected with the stage. He could write a play, stage it, and play a part." Cole was committed to artistic excellence and aimed to prove that blacks were capable of competing with whites in artistic creation.

Cole, a lyricist, songwriter, vaudeville entertainer, playwright, director, producer, and stage manager, was involved in a number of historical "firsts" related to the stage. As part of Sam T. Jack's Creole Show, Cole took part in the first black show to break from the minstrel tradition of an all-male cast. Cole served as the show's writer and stage manager and as a member of the cast. In 1894, Cole organized the first all-black stock company, the All-Star Stock Company. In 1898, Cole and Billy Johnson's show A Trip to Coontown opened. This was the first all-black musical comedy: It was written, performed, administrated, and owned by blacks. For this reason, and as a very early example of the genre, it changed the nature of theater.

Cole's first big hits were products of his partnership with William "Billy" Johnson. After the success of At Jolly Coon-ey Island, for which they received no additional remuneration from the management, Cole and Johnson set out to use an all-black troupe and management for their next show. The result, A Trip to Coontown, was a turning point for Cole. After the tour of this show, Cole departed from the popular coon songs and tried to elevate the image and creativity of blacks through song lyrics. He and Johnson went their separate ways, but Cole entered a successful partnership with the brothers James Weldon Johnson and John Rosamond Johnson (who were not related Billy Johnson) that would last the remainder of his life. Under the name Cole and Johnson and later Cole and Johnson Brothers, the partnership introduced elegance and an air of sophistication to the personae of black artists, as well as to the stage. Cole and John Rosamond Johnson often traveled as a performing duo; they wore fine suits and presented a diverse repertoire, including German selections and many originals. The partnership amassed more than 150 songs composed for both blacks and whites.

Cole continued to be a trailblazer in theater as he and John Rosamond Johnson introduced a love scene in the stage show The Shoo-Fly Regiment (1905). Before this, there were no romantic scenes involving blacks onstage. The team's next success, The Red Moon, used the talented Joe Jordan, and many observers at the time considered it the best black show ever.

Cole committed himself to self-empowerment and the uplift of the black race; but episodes of mental illness forced him to retire from the stage in 1910. He died in 1911.

Biography

Robert Allen "Bob" Cole Jr. was born 1 July 1868 in Athens, Georgia. He studied piano, banjo, guitar, and cello as a child and attended public schools in Atlanta. Cole is often said to have studied at Atlanta University, but research by Thomas Riis (1985) has revealed that although Cole was an employee of the university, he never enrolled there. Cole was the organizer and manager of the All-Star Stock Company, 1894; a coorganizer of the Colored Actors Beneficial Association, 1903; and a founding member of Frogs, Inc., 1908. Cole died in New York City 2 August 1911.

EMMETT G. PRICE III

See also Johnson, James Weldon; Johnson, John Rosamond; Jordan, Joe; Musical Theater

Selected Songs

"Colored Aristocracy." 1896.

"Dem Golden Clouds." 1896.

"4-11-44." 1897. (Composed with William "Billy" Johnson.)

"My Castle on the Nile." 1901. (Composed with J. Rosamond Johnson.)

"Oh, Didn't He Ramble?" 1902. (Under the pseudonym Will Handy.)

"Under the Bamboo Tree." 1902.

The Evolution of Ragtime: A Musical Suite of Six Songs Tracing and Illustrating Negro Music. New York: Edward B. Marks, 1903. (Composed with J. Rosamond Johnson.)

Musical Theater

At Jolly Coon-ey Island: A Merry Musical Farce. 1896-1897. (Written and produced with William "Billy" Johnson.)

A Trip to Coontown. 1897-1901. (Written and produced with William "Billy" Johnson.)

The Shoo-Fly Regiment. 1905-1907. (Written and produced with J. Rosamond Johnson.)

The Red Moon. 1908-1909. (Written and produced with J. Rosamond Johnson and Joe Jordan.)

Further Reading

Cole, Bob. "The Negro and the Stage." Colored American Magazine, 4(3), 1902.

Dennison, Sam. Scandalize My Name: Black Imagery in American Popular Music. New York: Garland, 1982.

Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1968. (First published 1933.)

Morgan, Thomas L., and William Barlow. "Bob Cole and the Johnson Brothers." In From Cakewalks to Concert Halls: An Illustrated History of African-American Popular Music from 1895 to 1930. Washington, D.C.: Elliot and Clark, 1992.

Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. Profiles of African-American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816-1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.

- Riis, Thomas L. "Bob Cole: His Life and Legacy to Black Musical Theatre." Black Perspective in Music, 13(2), Fall 1985.
- Saffle, Michael. "Cole, Robert Allen (Bob)." In Center for Black Music Research, International Dictionary of Black Composers, ed. Samuel Floyd Jr. Chicago, Ill.: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.
- Southern, Eileen. "Cole, Robert Allen (Bob)." In Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.
- Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Color

The publication by Harper and Row of Color, Countee Cullen's first volume of poetry, in 1925 marked the emergence of one of the most promising young writers of the Harlem Renaissance. The same year that Color was published, Cullen—who was then twenty-two—graduated Phi Beta Kappa from New York University and began graduate school at Harvard. At the time, Cullen "was the most celebrated and probably the most famous black writer in America" (Early 1991, 3–4). Color was the first volume of poetry by an African American born in the United States to appear under the imprint of a major American publishing house since Paul Laurence Dunbar's success early in the century. Many of the poems in Color had previously appeared in African American magazines and in magazines edited by whites; and Cullen—a talented, educated, young author from a prominent family (he was the adopted son of an influential pastor in Harlem)—was showered with awards. Color was in all regards a literary event.

After an opening invocation, "To You Who Read My Books," the poems in Color are organized in four sections: "Color," which includes the book's most widely anthologized pieces on racial matters; "Epitaphs"; "For Love's Sake," the shortest section; and "Varia"—some of which Cullen would reuse in his later volumes. "Color" begins with the sonnet "Yet Do I Marvel," originally published in Century; its concluding couplet is a well-known example of Cullen's pithy writing: "Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:/To make a poet black and bid him sing!" The poems in "Epitaphs," mostly single quatrains, reflect on death, among other subjects. The eight poems in "For Love's Sake" vary in length but are composed mostly of ballad stanzas, a verse form that Cullen liked. As its title indicates, "Varia" is eclectic in subject and form, although it includes works on many themes that characterize Color and Cullen's oeuvre as a whole: race, alienation, sexuality, Christianity, religious faith, suicide, and death.

The section "Color" includes several poems that were printed in the March 1925 issue of Survey Graphic and the expanded New Negro (which was published less than a year after Color). One of these is "Tableau," which describes two boys, one black and one white, walking unself-consciously through a hostile world. This poem counterbalances its vision of interracial camaraderie with the negative attention that the two friends attract. In contrast to the companionship depicted in "Tableau," another poem, "Incident," recounts the effect on the narrator when a white boy hurls a racist epithet at him. "Tableau" and "Incident" use different rhyme patterns, but each consists of three ballad stanzas and has added syllables to effect double rhymes in select trimeters. The concluding stanza of "Incident" has a triple rhyme. Cullen masterfully uses traditional lyric forms whose poetic order suggests a somewhat ironic relationship to the racial world he is describing.

The longest poem in Color is "The Shroud of Color," which was first published, to much acclaim, in H. L. Mencken's American Mercury in 1924; it is an extended dialogue with God. This poem is followed by "Heritage," which concludes the section "Color" and is considered by many to be Cullen's finest work. Survey Graphic and The New Negro both printed another version of "Heritage," differing from the poem in Color in organization, length, and dedication. The version in Color, however, is the standard text. It is twenty-six lines longer than the alternative version and is dedicated to Harold Jackman. This poem turns on the repeated query "What is Africa to me?"—a question that resonated with writers such as Nella Larsen, who used lines from "Heritage" as the epigraph for her novel Passing (1929), and W. E. B. Du Bois, who used it as a point of departure in Dusk of Dawn (1940).

There has been some scholarly debate over "Heritage," illustrating the uncertainty that surrounds Cullen's legacy. Huggins (1971) considers Cullen's imaginary Africa "romantic and exotic, no more or no less real for him as a black poet than it would have been for a white one" (81). Davis (1953), on the other hand, describes this Africa as a "means of escape . . . a dream world if you will, of past loveliness," in the face of the actual world of Jim Crow (393). Redding (1939/1988), whose title To Make a Poet Black was taken from "Yet Do I Marvel," like Huggins, is unimpressed by Cullen's poems about Africa, concluding that Cullen's "gifts are delicate, better suited to bons mots, epigrams, and the delightfully personal love lyrics for which a large circle admire him" (111).

The section "Epitaphs" certainly includes the epigrams that Redding (1939/1988) notes, but it also incorporates Cullen's social commentary. For example, "For a Lady I Know," which appeared in Poetry in May 1924, describes a woman who imagines that the racial order of domestic service in the United States is consistent with heaven's design. This section also contains a series of literary tributes to Joseph Conrad, Paul Laurence Dunbar, and John Keats, all of which first appeared in Harper's, in February 1925.

"Varia" includes a second piece for Keats, "To John Keats, Poet. At Spring Time," which Cullen uses to reflect on his own relationship to the craft of poetry. Writers are not the only figures honored in Cullen's poetry. For instance, the poem "In Memory of Col. Charles Young," also in "Varia," remembers an African American in World War I who was discharged to prevent his imminent promotion to general.

Color stands out among Cullen's oeuvre and contains many of his most popular poems: for instance, seven of the eight poems in the Norton Anthology of African American Literature appeared in Color. Still, many critics find in Color evidence of the potential that was left unfulfilled in Cullen's later work.

At the time of this writing, Color was out of print—as was My Soul's High Song: The Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance, an anthology edited and with a substantial introduction by Early, which included most but not all of the poems in Color. Like its author, Color continues to be represented primarily by a handful of widely anthologized poems; the volume remains an underappreciated achievement by one of the most heralded poets of the Harlem Renaissance.

IRA DWORKIN

See also American Mercury; Authors: 5—Poets; Cullen, Countee; Cullen, Frederick Asbury; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Jackman, Harold; Larsen, Nella; Literature: 7—Poetry; New Negro, The; Survey Graphic

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A., Jr. The Many-Colored Coat of Dreams: The Poetry of Countee Cullen. Detroit, Mich.: Broadside, 1974. (Reprinted in Afro-American Poetics: Revisions of Harlem and the Black Aesthetic. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1988, pp. 45–87.)
- Davis, Arthur P. "The Alien-and-Exile Theme in Countee Cullen's Racial Poems." Phylon, 14(4), December 1953, pp. 390–400.
- Early, Gerald, ed. My Soul's High Song: The Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Anchor, 1991.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Lomax, Michael L. "Countee Cullen: A Key to the Puzzle." In Harlem Renaissance Reexamined, ed. Victor A. Kramer and Robert A. Russ. Troy, N.Y.: Whitson, 1997.
- Perry, Margaret. A Bio-Bibliography of Countee P. Cullen, 1903–1946. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1971.
- Powers, Peter. "'The Singing Man Who Must be Reckoned With': Private Desire and Public Responsibility in the Poetry of Countee Cullen." African-American Review, 34(4), 2000, pp. 661–678.
- Redding, J. Saunders. To Make a Poet Black. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1988. (First published 1939.)
- Turner, Darwin T. In A Minor Chord: Three Afro-American Writers and Their Search for Identity. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1971.
- Wagner, Jean. Black Poets of the United States: From Paul Laurence Dunbar to Langston Hughes. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973. (First published 1962.)

Colored Players Film Corporation

The Colored Players Film Corporation (CPFC), which was organized in Philadelphia in 1926, complicates the issue of racial categorization. It had white founders and a predominantly white staff and technical crew, and its financing was firmly in the hands of white investors. However, it used all-black casts; it competed with the better-known film productions of Oscar Micheaux for the attention of black audiences; and its objective was to produce more "authentic," more uplifting representations of black life and to counter minstrelsy and the debasing stereotypes that were endemic in American culture. Also, during its four years of operation, CPFC produced four films that coincided with a burst of black artistic production in New York City. Thus, if the criteria for categorizing a company as “black” were social and racial content, along with significant participation by blacks in various phases of the enterprise, CPFC would indeed qualify. However, CPFC might more accurately be described as a vehicle for interracial cooperation in the arts during a period when racial animus and rigid segregation were the norm in the United States.

The white founders of CPFC—David Starkman, Louis Groner, and Roy Calnek—were joined in 1927 by Sherman Dudley, a black businessman who was a former vaudevillian. Dudley is thought to have given the fledgling company a needed infusion of cash. The films CPFC produced were A Prince of His Race (1926), Ten Nights in a Barroom (1926), Children of Fate (1927), and The Scar of Shame (1929). Only Ten Nights in a Barroom and The Scar of Shame, which lists Dudley as producer, still survive. Dudley had a grand vision of a “black Hollywood” that may have been his original motivation in joining CPFC. Nevertheless, in 1975, in an interview with the film historian Thomas Cripps, Lucia Lynn Moses, who starred in The Scar of Shame, said that she always took direction “from the two white fellas.” She may have been referring to the director Frank Perugina and the screenwriter David Starkman, who worked together on the project.

Although it was neither written nor directed by blacks, The Scar of Shame has been called the most important independent black film of the silent era. In this film, as in the other films by CPFC, the plot involves the aspiring black middle class, with its lofty idealism and its hierarchy of castes based on color. The Scar of Shame is the story of an ill-fated marriage between a young composer and a lower-class laundress. The film suggests that the relationship between these lovers is doomed because of class differences. After a series of disastrous events befall the laundress, suicide is her only recourse. The action thus gives rise to several questions. Is the “scar of shame” lower-class origins? Is it dark skin? In the film, lower-class, dark-skinned characters are prone to drunkenness and other moral failings, an idea that most of society accepted at that time. The film therefore conveys a version of racial uplift with a hint of biological determinism.

A Prince of His Race proposes a similar division between good and bad characters, who represent types that will either lift up or tear down the race. The plot involves a man from an upstanding family who is tricked and ultimately disgraced by unscrupulous associates. After a series of episodes, including a love triangle, the story builds to a surprising climax. In Ten Nights in a Barroom, the renowned actor Charles Gilpin plays a man who loses his money to, and whose daughter is killed by, a gangster. Gilpin’s character pursues the perpetrator but during the pursuit undergoes an awakening that leads him to a productive life as a public servant.

With such heavily moralistic melodramas, and also with technically innovative filmmaking, CPFC offered an alternative view of black life, gave black actors an opportunity to stretch their talents, and offered black audiences entertainment that would not make them feel ashamed.

AUDREY THOMAS MCCCLUSKEY

See also Dudley, Sherman H.; Film; Gilpin, Charles; Micheaux, Oscar

Further Reading

- Bowser, Pearl, Jane Gaines, and Charles Musser, eds. Oscar Micheaux and His Circle. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Cripps, Thomas. Black Film as Genre. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978.
- . Making Movies Black: The Hollywood Message Movie from World War II to the Civil Rights Era. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Gaines, Jane. “The Scar of Shame: Skin Color and Caste in Silent Melodrama.” Cinema Journal, 26(4), Summer 1987.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1995.

Columbia Phonograph Company

Columbia was founded in Washington, D.C., in 1887 as the American Graphophone Company. The Columbia label, originally a regional subsidiary, began recording African American artists early in the twentieth century. Bert Williams, the leading black entertainer from about 1900 until his death in 1922, made most of his recordings for Columbia (although he and his partner George Walker recorded for Victor at the beginning of the twentieth century); he was featured in Columbia’s promotional materials and the in-house leaflets printed for its salesmen.

As the jazz age dawned, Columbia competed with Victor records, which had the wildly popular white New Orleans quintet, the Original Dixieland Jazz Band; Columbia had let this band slip through its fingers after waxing the band's first record in January 1917. By mid-1917, during the fad for vaudeville "jazz," Columbia joined a search for other jazz bands to record the frenetic new dance music. This led to a boom for black bands on records. Columbia recorded ten sides by W. C. Handy's Memphis Blues Band (actually a pickup band consisting of Chicagoans) in September 1917. These sold moderately well, as did Columbia's recordings (1918–1920) by Wilbur Sweatman, a "novelty" musician (his tricks included playing three clarinets at once).

With the success of Mamie Smith's recording of "Crazy Blues" for Okeh in 1920, there was a sudden interest in blues records by black women. Columbia made Edith Wilson's first records in 1921, and in 1923, it signed the great Bessie Smith. Smith's recordings sold well; she recorded exclusively for Columbia for a decade. Her popularity was crucial in keeping Columbia solvent during the 1920s, when the advent of broadcast radio sank many smaller record companies. Smith's rival Ethel Waters, the blues and pop singer, recorded successfully for Columbia from 1924 until well into the 1930s. Columbia's other important commercial blues singers in the 1920s included Alberta Hunter, Clara Smith, Edith Wilson, Lena Wilson, Gertrude Saunders, and Monette Moore.

Midway through the 1920s, Columbia acquired the important "race record" label Okeh. Louis Armstrong made some of the most important small-band recordings in jazz history for Okeh, including those of the legendary "Hot Five" and "Hot Seven" (1925–1927) and the extraordinary sessions with the pianist Earl Hines (1928). The fully developed jazz solo mainly began with Armstrong's records from these sessions, such as "West End Blues." Armstrong's mentor King Oliver had already recorded for Okeh in 1923; after becoming Okeh's parent in 1926, Columbia acquired Armstrong's and Oliver's earlier records and many other important recordings. Okeh continued to issue records by black artists, including the Kansas City big band of Bennie Moten, the New Orleans guitarist Lonnie Johnson, and the classic sessions (1928) of the singer Mississippi John Hurt.

Small combos of the 1920s that recorded for the Columbia label itself included Johnny Dunn's Jazz Hounds, the Get Happy Band (including Sidney Bechet), the Gulf Coast Seven, Leroy Tibbs and His Connie's Inn Orchestra, and numerous others. By the end of the 1920s, Columbia was perhaps the leading label of New Orleans jazz, with numerous recordings of Clarence Williams in New York and field recordings of Oscar "Papa" Celestin and Sam Morgan in New Orleans, in addition to Armstrong's and Oliver's sides on Okeh.

Columbia was also important in recording big bands. Fletcher Henderson, first of the great black orchestra leaders, was with Columbia between 1924 and 1932, when his arrangers included Don Redman and Benny Carter, and his soloists included Louis Armstrong, Coleman Hawkins, and Buster Bailey. Solo pianists on Columbia included Eubie Blake and Fats Waller (more commonly a Victor artist).

Many leading black artists of the big band era recorded for Columbia, the most important being Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington. Other groups Columbia recorded during the 1930s included Harlan Lattimore and His Connie's Inn Orchestra, Claude Hopkins and His Orchestra, Dicky Wells' Shim Shammers, Chick Webb's Savoy Orchestra, and Teddy Wilson and His Orchestra. Columbia also recorded early integrated bands, such as the Benny Goodman Sextet with Lionel Hampton and Charlie Christian.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

See also Blues: Women Performers; individual recording artists

Further Reading

- Albertson, Chris. Bessie Smith, rev. ed. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2003. (First published 1972.)
- Anon. Program notes: The Complete Bert Williams, Vol. 2, The Middle Years, 1910–1918; Vol. 3, His Final Recordings, 1919–1922. Archeophone 5002, 5003.
- Burford, Ray. "Columbia." In New Grove Dictionary of Music. London: Macmillan, 2001, Vol. 6, pp. 164–165.
- Hofer, George. Program notes: Jazz Odyssey, Vol. 3, The Sound of Harlem. Columbia C3L 33, 1965.
- Kernfeld, Barry, and Howard Rye. "Columbia." In New Grove Dictionary of Jazz, 2nd ed., ed. Barry Kernfeld. London: Macmillan, 2002, Vol. 1, 495–496.
- Sanjeck, Russell, and David Sanjek. American Popular Music Business in the Twentieth Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Come Along Mandy

Come Along Mandy (1924) was a musical farce and touring show from the collaboration of the brothers Salem Tutt Whitney and J. Homer Tutt and Donald Heywood. Tutt and Whitney wrote the book and lyrics, and Heywood composed the music. The show played at the famous Lafayette Theater in Harlem from December 1923 until 1924, during a time when vaudeville, musical comedy, and movies were the most popular fare among African American theatergoers in Harlem.

Come Along Mandy is set in Hopeville, Georgia, and centers on a dispute over land between two of the characters, Zack and Sudds (played by Whitney and Tutt, respectively). As these two characters argue, Al LaBabor steals the deeds to the property. A chase ensues, and the title character, Mandy, is invited to join the others in the hunt for the thief. Other characters include Lovey Joe, a peacemaker; and Lucinda and Krispy, detectives on the trail of the thief. The comedy ends with Al LaBabor's capture in New York and the reconciliation of Zack and Sudds.

In an article in The Messenger magazine in February 1924, the noted African American theater critic Theophilus Lewis marveled at the presence of brown-skinned women in the chorus of Come Along Mandy; most chorus girls in musicals of the time were light-skinned. Lewis considered the first part of the show the most interesting and found the rest repetitious.

Whitney and Tutt were writers, producers, and performers of musical comedies, farces, and sketches. From 1908 to 1923, they managed one of the most successful black touring groups in the United States—the Smart Set Company, also known as the Southern Smart Set Company, the Smarter Set Company, and the Tutt-Whitney Musical Comedy Company. The brothers produced more than thirty musical shows. They included blackface and slapstick in their productions. Whitney was the main writer, and Tutt worked primarily as an actor. Whitney was also a columnist for two newspapers: the Indianapolis Freeman and the Chicago Defender. Later in his life, he was in the cast of Marc Connelly's play The Green Pastures.

Donald Heywood also wrote music for other Tutt-Whitney shows, including Ginger Snaps (1929), a Broadway production. He had studied music at Fisk University and had begun his career as a performer. Heywood was also a playwright, but he was most successful as a composer and lyricist, particularly in Africana (1927). This production had a long run and starred Ethel Waters. Heywood later wrote for all-black films.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also Chicago Defender; Green Pastures, The; Lafayette Theater; Lewis, Theophilus; Messenger, The; Musical Theater; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Lewis, Theophilus. "Theatre." Messenger, 6(2), February 1924.
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. Early Black American Playwrights and Dramatic Writers: A Biographical Directory and Catalog of Plays, Films, and Broadcasting Scripts. New York: Greenwood, 1990.
- . A Century of Musicals in Black and White: An Encyclopedia of Musical Stage Works By, About, or Involving African-Americans. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993.
- . The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960: A Comprehensive Guide to Early Black Theatre Organizations, Companies, Theatres, and Performing Groups. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.
- . Profiles of American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1980.
- Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1981.

Communist Party

Of the complex political and ideological currents that swirled around the Harlem Renaissance, or New Negro Renaissance, communism—by which is signified the official Communist Party of the Third International—constituted an important body of thought and practice, one that influenced not only the lives of the individuals drawn into its immediate orbit, but also those of countless other workers, activists, intellectuals, writers, and artists.

In the early twentieth century, Harlem had become the magnet for "an impressive group of young African American and West Indian radicals . . . who were enthusiastic about socialism and committed to the struggle for African American liberation" (Kuykendall 2002). In the heady and contentious sociopolitical climate of World War I and postwar era, these "New Negroes" were at the forefront of the sharp debates about race, class, justice, and the future of blacks in the United States that characterized the public mood of the black community. Many “New Negroes” opposed the United States’ entry into the war, arguing that it was hypocritical to fight abroad for freedoms that blacks were routinely denied at home. They cast a sharp and critical eye on anticolonial struggles in the international arena, taking particular note, for example, of the Irish rebellion. With the triumph of the Russian revolution in 1917, an earlier social and political tradition of socialism in Harlem took on new life and dimensions. The debates among socialists of many stripes over whether or not to support the Russian revolution led to sharp divisions within the Socialist Party and comparable splits among radical “New Negroes.” African American socialists, led by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, rejected the appeal of the communists and remained with the socialists of the Second International; others, many of them West Indians, gravitated toward the Third International. Out of this politically fluid moment emerged the African Blood Brotherhood (ABB), “the first independent socialist/communist organization composed exclusively of persons of African descent in the United States” (Kuykendall 2002). Organized sometime between 1917 and 1919 by Cyril Briggs, publisher of the magazine Crusader, ABB announced itself as a revolutionary secret society for people of African descent, committed to armed self-defense and the “liberation of people of African descent all over the world.” Initially setting its sights on Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), ABB sought to influence the Garveyites toward its own brand of revolutionary black nationalism, but in 1921, the UNIA expelled the ABB for its political extremism. During that same year, the ABB came to public attention in the aftermath of the rioting in Tulsa, Oklahoma, when it claimed to have played a leading role in the defense of Tulsa’s black community. Around this time, also, the ABB established close working relationships with the American Communist Party. By 1925, a number of the leaders of the ABB—Cyril Briggs, Richard B. Moore, Grace Campbell, Frank Crosswaith, and Otto Huiswood, among others—had joined the Communist Party, providing the party with its first leadership cadre from the black Community.

The leadership of the ABB was generally not directly involved with literary or cultural production during the New Negro or Harlem Renaissance, but like many organizations of the period—the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

(NAACP), the National Urban League, and Garveyism—the ABB devoted considerable space to literature and culture in its publication, the Crusader. Furthermore, it could claim as one of its own a literary light of the renaissance: Claude McKay, one of the first black writers in the United States to be associated with the Communist Party. The publication of his best-known poem, “If We Must Die,” in the left-wing magazine Liberator in July 1919 was a direct response to the racial upheavals of the summer of 1919, effectively capturing the angry, defiant mood of the black community. The poem won the praise of the African American cultural elite as well as the admiration of the Garveyites, and it also gained McKay entrance into the radical bohemian community of Greenwich Village. At the same time, McKay was extending his relationships with other prominent black radicals in Harlem—first developed through his close relationship with a pioneering black socialist and street-corner orator, Hubert H. Harrison—most of whom were associated with the ABB. Like his politically committed friends, McKay played a central role in interpreting the outlook of the Communist Party to the black community, and vice versa. In addition to writing radical poems about American racial injustice, such as “Baptism” and “The White House,” McKay sojourned in England in 1919–1920, writing numerous essays, reviews, and letters for Sylvia Pankhurst’s Workers’ Dreadnought—in effect warning his white allies that the revolutionary movement in the United States and abroad was doomed to failure unless it honestly and directly confronted the legacy of racism. McKay’s general outlook during this period seemed to conform to the broad goals of the ABB. After McKay returned to the United States in 1921, he joined the editorial staff of Liberator; and when Max Eastman resigned as editor, McKay and Mike Gold—who became known as the cultural commissar of the Communist Party through his editorship of New Masses beginning in the late 1920s—were appointed as coeditors. There was personal and political tension between McKay and Gold, exacerbated by McKay’s racial militancy and sharpened by Gold’s alarm when he discovered that McKay was holding meetings with the African Blood Brotherhood and other Harlem radicals at the offices of Liberator. McKay resigned as coeditor of Liberator in June 1922, but his tension and squabbles with white leftists did not prevent him from traveling to the Soviet Union later that year to attend the Fourth Congress of the Third International; the high point of his journey occurred on 22 November 1922, when he joined Grigory Yevseyevich Zinoviev, the executive director of the Communist International (Comintern), and other leaders of the party on the platform of the Bolshoi Auditorium to address the congress about racial issues in the United States. McKay remained in the Soviet Union after the conclusion of the Fourth Congress and was treated as a celebrity. He traveled extensively, met and corresponded with Leon Trotsky, and wrote poems and articles for the Soviet press. In his autobiography, he wrote of this experience as a pinnacle in his life. After his visit to the Soviet Union, McKay spent the next decade, from 1923 to 1934, living and working abroad; he returned to the United States during the worst period of the Great Depression. Politically disillusioned, socially and culturally isolated, often poverty-stricken, McKay had become a relentless critic of the American Communist Party, embracing Catholicism before his death in 1948. Nevertheless, the potent fusion of radical political sentiment and traditional poetic forms that constituted the hallmark of McKay's creativity during the period of his most intense political involvement with communism provided an example, a model that was not overlooked by some of his contemporaries during the renaissance.

Twelve years younger than Claude McKay, and more open and experimental in his use of poetic forms, Langston Hughes—by virtue of his travels, temperament, and social outlook—gave strong indications, early in his career, of receptivity to radical politics. Hughes first came to public attention when he won a prize in a literary contest sponsored by Crisis, the journal of the NAACP, and his work was published often in its pages, as well as in Opportunity, the journal of the National Urban League. However, he sought a venue for his more politically radical poetry in the socialist magazine The Messenger, edited by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen, which published early poems such as “Gods,” “Grant Park,” “Prayer for a Winter Night,” “Johannesburg Mines,” “To Certain Intellectuals,” and “Steel Mills.” Hughes would continue to contribute poems to The Messenger when his friend Wallace Thurman worked on the staff in 1927. In March and April 1925, Hughes published a number of politically stinging poems in Workers Monthly, a communist publication: “Drama for Winter Night (Fifth Avenue),” “God to Hungry Child,” “Rising Waters,” “Poem to a Dead Soldier,” and “Park Benching.” This vein of Hughes’s poetry was so pronounced that when he published his second volume of poems, Fine Clothes to the Jew, in 1927, George Schuyler praised him as “the poet of the modern Negro proletariat.” Although Hughes never joined the Communist Party, by late 1931 he had thrown himself wholeheartedly into the struggle to save the Scottsboro Boys, nine young southern black men falsely accused of rape in Alabama and sentenced to death. In 1932, Hughes joined a group of African Americans—among them Louise Thompson, Loren Miller, Henry Lee Moon, and Ted Poston—who traveled to the Soviet Union to make a film called Black and White about race relations in the United States. The film project turned into a public relations fiasco, but from that point on Hughes’s work would be firmly rooted in the cultural politics of the Communist Party for the rest of the decade.

James W. Ford (right) in 1932, at the time he was nominated as the vice-presidential candidate of the Communist Party, shown with the presidential candidate, William Z. Foster. (© Bettmann/Corbis.)

Claude McKay and Langston Hughes were the two writers whose political views sometimes converged with the outlook of the Communist Party during the heyday of the 1920s. Others were also attracted to the political left, if not to the party per se. Jean Toomer flirted with socialism early in his career; and the still neglected but highly talented Eric Walrond, whose striking collection of short stories Tropic Death reveals a sharply developed class consciousness, routinely contributed to Randolph and Owens’s Messenger. As the optimistic mood of the Harlem Renaissance darkened with the onset of the Great Depression in 1929—the stock market crash that, in Langston Hughes’s words, “sent Negroes, white folks, and all rolling down the hill towards the Works Progress Administration”—many of the writers associated with the period began to reassess their cultural and political views. Countee Cullen, the most celebrated poet of the New Negro movement, announced his support for the presidential ticket of the American Communist Party, William Z. Foster and James Ford, in the election of 1932.

Gwendolyn Bennett, who had contributed poetry and short fiction to Opportunity, The Crisis, and The Messenger during the 1920s, became increasingly prominent in communist circles in New York City during the mid-1930s. Sterling Brown, whose poems had been celebrated in communist literary circles since the publication of Southern Road in 1932, seemed sympathetic to the party's outlook during the 1930s but never became a member. Most notably, Alain Locke, an architect of the New Negro movement, was clearly affected by the general drift toward the left of many black writers. Throughout the 1930s, Locke's annual review, "Literature of the Negro," written for Opportunity, revealed a distinct preference for "proletarian fiction" and literature shaped by social realism. He took an active role in the League of American Writers and the National Negro Congress, and he turned to the New Masses as an important venue for his writing.

If the publication of Richard Wright's manifesto "Blueprint for Negro Writing" in 1937 can be seen as signaling the emergence of another generation of "New Negroes," it can also be said that the ideas Wright explored, and the synthesis of black nationalism and Marxism he sought, had their historical antecedents in the encounter between communism and an earlier generation of black activists, intellectuals, and writers. In this encounter with Marxist orthodoxy, African American writers sometimes contested it, sometimes reworked it, and sometimes embraced it; but there is no doubt that, as a significant body of contemporary scholarship makes clear, this encounter played a central role in shaping African American literature, from the Harlem Renaissance until well into the twentieth century.

JAMES A. MILLER

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Black and White; Briggs, Cyril; Eastman, Max; Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 5—Soviet Union; Fine Clothes to the Jew; Harrison, Hubert; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Moore, Richard B.; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Riots: 3—Tulsa, 1921; Thurman, Wallace; Toomer, Jean; Tropic Death; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Walrond, Eric; Workers' Drednought; Wright, Richard; other specific individuals

Further Reading

Berry, Faith. Langston Hughes: Before and After Harlem. New York: Citadel, 1992.

- Cooper, Wayne. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Cruse, Harold. The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual. New York: Morrow, 1967.
- Dawahare, Anthony. Nationalism, Marxism, and African-American Literature Between the Wars: A New Pandora's Box. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2003.
- Denning, Michael. The Cultural Front: The Laboring of American Culture in the Twentieth Century. London and New York: Verso, 1996. (Haymarket Series.)
- Favor, Martin. Authentic Blackness: The Folk in the New Negro Renaissance. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Foley, Barbara. "Race and Class in Radical African-American Fiction of the Depression Years." Nature, Society, and Thought, 3, 1990, pp. 305–324.
- . Spectres of 1919: Class and Nation in the Making of the New Negro. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.
- Haywood, Harry. Black Bolshevik: Autobiography of an Afro-American Communist. Chicago, Ill.: Liberator, 1978.
- Hutchinson, Earl Ofari. Blacks and Reds: Race and Class in Conflict, 1919–1990. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1995.
- Kelley, Robin D. G. Hammer and Hoe: Alabama Communists During the Depression. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.
- . Race Rebels: Culture, Politics, and the Black Working Class. New York: Free Press, 1994.
- Kuykendall, Ronald A. "African Blood Brotherhood: Independent Marxist During the Harlem Renaissance." Western Journal of Black Studies, 26(1), Spring 2002, pp. 16–21.
- Maxwell, William. New Negro, Old Left: African-American Writing and Communism Between the Wars. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- McKay, Claude. A Long Way Home. New York: Arno, 1969. (First published 1937.)
- . The Negroes in America, ed. Alan L. McLeod, trans. (from Russian) Robert J. Winter. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat, 1979.
- Miller, James A. "African-American Writing of the 1930s: A Prologue." In Radical Revisions: Rereadings 1930s Culture, ed. Bill Mullen and Sherry Linkon. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1996, pp. 78–90.
- Naison, Mark. Communists in Harlem During the Depression. New York: Grove, 1983.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

- Rampersad, Arnold, and David Roessel, eds. The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes. New York: Knopf, 1994.
- Robinson, Cedric J. Black Marxism: The Making of the Black Radical Tradition. London: Zed, 1983.
- Smethurst, James. The New Red Negro: The Literary Left and African-American Poetry, 1930–1999. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Solomon, Mark. The Cry Was Unity: Communists and African-Americans, 1917–1936. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.
- Tillery, Tyrone. Claude McKay: A Black Poet's Struggle for Identity. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992.
- Wald, Alan M. Exiles From a Future Time: The Forging of the Mid-Twentieth-Century Literary Left. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Community Theater

By the mid-1920s, there were small theaters in New York, Washington, D.C., Chicago, Cleveland, and many other major American cities. The growth of these theaters, which came to be known as the “little theater” movement, can be attributed to a great extent to the larger black community theater that already existed. As Hurston (1994) noted, community theater was not restricted to the makeshift playhouses of this period; it also appeared in the form of the “jook” (a house where men and women could dance, drink, and gamble), on street corners, and in churches. Community theater, therefore, encompasses any public artistic performance; and “little theater” encompasses professional activities—including financing and the creation of infrastructure—emanating from community theater. In other words, “little theater” is not the totality of community theater but can be considered a microcosm of it.

The genealogy of little theater is important because the movement served as an idealized model for the larger community theater. During the Harlem Renaissance, theater was transformed from something that was used to mock African Americans into an endeavor in which African Americans could claim historical agency. Throughout this period, artists, thinkers, and producers tried to transform stories about black people into communal narratives: stories by and for black people. Thus theater became innovative and experimental, not just a form of resistance.

The little theater movement was part of the aesthetics of the Harlem Renaissance, was a model for communal practice, and helped define the ethos of the “New Negro” by refuting the depictions of blacks as inferior and by exposing the mechanisms that facilitated stereotypical images in minstrelsy. The movement drew attention to the fact that degrading images of black people were a source of pleasure, and to the fact that challenging such images entailed an economic struggle. Drama, unlike prose or poetry, is necessarily experienced in performance before an audience; the little theater movement illuminates the dependence of the “New Negro” ethos not only on voices willing to speak but also on ears willing to listen. This movement shifted black theatrical production from the community to a professional realm in which theater was a commodity as well as an art, and so the movement drew attention to both the product and the modes of production. Each theater company that emerged during this movement had conflicting desires: On the one hand, it wanted to define itself and control its own art; on the other hand, it wanted to attract audiences. To explore the struggle that developed when community theater adopted a public persona, this article will focus on some distinctive movements within little theater, particularly the production of The Star of Ethiopia (1913–1923), the Lafayette Players (1914–1928), and the Krigwa Players (1926–1927).

The little theater movement, as the professional component of community theater, suggests the material difficulties underlying the making of the Harlem Renaissance. However, these professional activities within community theater go beyond the widely accepted span of the Harlem Renaissance—from the end of World War I until the beginning of the Great Depression—because community theater includes performances and related activities, leading up to the plays, poems, and novels that usually mark the renaissance. Frequently, the term “Harlem Renaissance” refers to artistic production during the 1920s, but a study of community theater as it relates to the renaissance must consider earlier activities, both professional and nonprofessional, that resulted in the concept of the New Negro as an identity and a community.

The Star of Ethiopia

Accounts of the black little theater movement typically begin in 1912, with the Anita Bush Stock Company, later renamed the Lafayette Players. However, in 1911, W. E. B. Du Bois had already begun work on a pageant, The Star of Ethiopia, that would contribute to the new African American image. This pageant was performed only four times—in New York, 1913; in Washington, D.C., 1915; in Philadelphia, 1916; and in Los Angeles, 1923—but no preceding professional performance had better expressed the ideological desire for self-definition and communal autonomy. In The Star of Ethiopia, Du Bois depicts the reality of the black experience in America and the contributions of African Americans to the nation; his vision of community stems from a historical narrative in which the transatlantic slave trade is part of a much longer story of the Negro race.

Du Bois's vision countered the images that then permeated the national imagination, and the stage offered him a perfect medium for conveying it. Although Du Bois praised Bert Williams's and George Walker's accomplishments on Broadway, he himself wanted to present a historical narrative that would transcend limited images such as their performances in The Two Real Coons. However, The Star of Ethiopia had 350 people in the original cast and a script that covered 10,000 years of history in six scenes; because of the sheer grandeur of the pageant, Du Bois had to cope with unusual material realities. The vastness of the staging focused the spectators' attention on the community as a whole rather than on individual actors, and the production required coordinating a community of performers.

The pageant emerged as an art form that could set American drama apart from other traditions. At the turn of the twentieth century, African Americans were trying to distance themselves from the images of minstrelsy, and American drama was trying to distinguish itself from the English tradition. The Star of Ethiopia contributed to both of these goals because its narrative was situated within an American narrative and because it staged and restaged communal negotiations. On 22 October 1913, at the Twelfth Regiment Armory in New York City, Du Bois presented a performance unparalleled in African American drama. He was entirely aware of the aesthetic and social possibilities involved: His pageant was an attempt to rewrite black people's role in American history, through an idealized version of the modes of aesthetic resistance that New Negroes were practicing daily in the jook, on the street corner, and in the church. As such, The Star of Ethiopia marked the birth of the little theater movement.

This lofty objective was attained at a considerable price. As Diamond (1997) notes, the economics of the pageant over its twelve-year history mirrored the financial struggle experienced by the black community at that time. Unlike many of the more established commercial American theaters, the little theater movement found it difficult to balance aesthetics with the material realities of the community. The Star of Ethiopia—a text that demanded staging—was seriously affected by a lack of material resources. At the inception of the project, Du Bois, who was the editor of The Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), asked the NAACP for help but was turned down. (The NAACP was unwilling to make such a large investment in an unprecedented venture.) Instead, he had to wait for an act of Congress (Senate Bill 180, passed by the Sixty-Second Congress, Second Session, 2 April 1912) to finance the pageant. This act launched Du Bois's limited career as a playwright; and the production of The Star of Ethiopia was a turning point for the black community because it demonstrated the economic negotiations blacks would have to undertake in order to participate in professional theater.

Anita Bush's Lafayette Players

Around 1914, a tenacious young woman named Anita Bush shifted the emphasis of the little theater movement: As the founder of what would become the Lafayette Players, she focused on finding adequate space in the black community and training members of the community to establish a commercial theater. During this period, the little theater movement faced three main issues: It needed to develop (1) finances (including paying audiences) and an infrastructure (spaces to perform), (2) professionally trained actors, and (3) scripts that would reflect the reality of the black experience in the United States. Under Bush's guidance, the Lafayette Players tackled the first two issues; the third issue was addressed by The Crisis, which took an interest in the development of drama.

After achieving some success as an actress, Bush had decided to create an African American theater company. In the autumn of 1914, she needed to find a rehearsal and performance space for her troupe of black players. At that time, two theaters in Harlem catered to African Americans—the Lincoln on West 135th Street and the Lafayette on 132nd Street and Seventh Avenue—but neither of these had experienced much financial success. Bush convinced the manager of the Lincoln, Eugene "Frenchy" Elmore, that she could help him get out of a slump and persuaded him to give her players a chance. He agreed, and in November 1915, the Anita Bush Stock Company (as it was then still named) opened at the Lincoln, to enthusiastic reviews; it included Bush, Charles Gilpin, Dooley Wilson, Carlotta Freeman, and Andrew Bishop. After a few weeks, the company moved to the Lafayette Theater, where it made its debut on 27 December 1915. (This change was partly because of the company's success at the Lincoln, which had induced the manager of the Lafayette, Lester Walton, to approach Bush about making the move, and partly because of a dispute between Bush and the manager who had succeeded Elmore at the Lincoln.)

The players were as successful at the Lafayette as they had been at the Lincoln, if not more so, although they also received some criticism. The criticism arose because for the most part they presented well-known, popular Broadway shows that did not focus on the black experience; but, to repeat, it did not seem to harm the players' public image. In fact, at one point the company had to perform two shows a day of Within the Law, a recent Broadway hit by Bayard Veiller, to accommodate the growing crowds. Thompson (1972) notes, "According to manager Elmore, the fame of the Lafayette Players at this time had spread so far that on a certain Saturday night some 1,500 people had to be turned away, many of them having come from Philadelphia to attend a performance" (218). (Elmore had followed the players when they relocated from the Lincoln to the Lafayette.) Their popularity gave the Lafayette Players scope to develop their skills; despite the complaints that they were imitating white performers rather than reflecting the black experience, they did achieve a degree of liberation and did break away from the tradition of the minstrel show to give dignified performances for large audiences. Moreover, even though they charged only five or ten cents for matinees and only ten, fifteen, or twenty-five cents for evening performances, the Lafayette Players achieved a financial success unmatched by that of any other theater company during the Harlem Renaissance; indeed, the Lafayette group demonstrated that such success was possible for African American theater.

It should be noted, though, that the Lafayette Players had to make some ideological sacrifices for the sake of their financial success. For example, in March 1916, they presented For His Daughter's Honor, a four-act

"race play" with Gilpin as the star, but it was not nearly as successful as some of their other productions. Under financial pressure, the players could not both produce and perform scripts; as a result, they could not really serve as an ideal model of a successful community theater for, near, and about black people—they served mainly as a model of material success.

Players' Guild, Harlem YMCA, and Krigwa Players

Many of the theater companies that developed during the Harlem Renaissance proper (between 1919 and 1928) were responding to the accusations that the Lafayette Players, in rehashing Broadway productions, failed to present theater about black life. In October 1917, the Circle for Negro War Relief was established; its New York branch was reorganized into the Players' Guild in 1919. The Players' Guild gave several performances during the 1920s at the Harlem YMCA, including one that helped Paul Robeson rise to stardom. The guild was praised for "creating an alternative to the 'cheap melodrama and the cheaper musical comedy' which dominated Harlem theatres" (Monroe 1983, 64); as a result of its success, the YMCA became a new venue for black drama. In May 1923, under the direction of a white woman named Anne Wolter, the Acme Players gave a performance at the YMCA of Frank Wilson's two short plays A Train North and The Heartbreaker. The Acme Players had developed out of a performance given in 1922 by the National Urban League at the Lafayette Theater; because of these players' success, Wolter developed the National Ethiopian Art Theater, which later became a school. Her objectives for the school included instruction in dramatic arts, dancing, music, direction, and public speaking, and—eventually—the erection of a theater building in Harlem. The Players' Guild, the Acme Players, and the school furthered the three goals of creating a black theater, cultivating black actors, and performing black drama.

Writing contests sponsored by two magazines—the NAACP's Crisis and Opportunity, a publication of the National Urban League—gave what was perhaps the strongest push in the effort to realize the ideal of a professional community theater. These contests encouraged black drama because the winning plays would at least be published and at best be produced.

After the contests by The Crisis and Opportunity, the Krigwa Players emerged as a body affiliated with the NAACP and dedicated to performing the prizewinning plays. By the summer of 1926, the Krigwa Players Little Negro Theater was organized in Harlem. Du Bois served as the chairman of the group, although he did not participate in its productions. In July 1926, he wrote: "The movement which has begun this year in Harlem, New York City, lays down four fundamental principles. The plays of a real Negro theatre must be: About us . . . By us . . . For us . . . Near us. Only in this way can a real folk-play movement of American Negroes be built up" (134). Because Du Bois's principles concerned the "real Negro theater," they transcended the little theater movement. Still, little theater attracted considerable attention from the black political leaders and black political and social organizations because it provided an opportunity for the world to see the potential of the New Negro community; and the Krigwa Players used these principles as their foundation.

The Krigwa Players had a performance space in the lecture room in the basement of the 135th Street Library in Harlem. (After the group became inactive in 1930, this room was used by successive companies of players; it was later renamed the Krigwa Playhouse.) The Krigwa Players' first season opened with three one-act plays by prizewinning authors of the contest sponsored by The Crisis: Willis Richardson's Compromise and The Broken Banjo and Ruth Gaines-Shelton's The Church Fight. The performances, repeated twice, attracted capacity audiences totaling approximately 600 people. Eight months later, in January 1927, the Krigwa Players opened their second season with two critically acclaimed plays by Eulalie Spence, Her and Foreign Mail. The Krigwa Players were criticized for the long gaps between their productions, but as a practical matter they could not earn a living as full-time actors—they had to work at other jobs, and so they could not commit themselves to the rigorous performance schedules of the Lafayette Players. Although ideologically they were perhaps the most powerful players' group of the Harlem Renaissance, a financial dispute would mark their end.

After a production of Spence's Fool's Errand in the national Little Theater Tournament in May 1927, the company won the Samuel French Prize of $200 for original playwriting. In an interview in 1973, Spence would say that Du Bois had resented Fool's Errand because it was not a propaganda play and had insisted that the prize money be used to offset the expense of the production (Monroe 1983, 67). The Krigwa Players were angry about his decision and, as a result, dissociated themselves from the organization. After the Krigwa Players disbanded for a time, the space in the 135th Street Library was occupied by other groups, including the Sekondi Players, who later became known as the New Negro Art Theater. Thus other organizations were able to profit from the theatrical infrastructure that the Krigwa Players established.

The little theater movement reflected the ideals of its participants only in glimpses and spurts, if at all, but the efforts to achieve these goals suggest the difficulty of achieving the New Negroes' communal identity in the context of a resistant audience and a resistant country. The little theater movement served as a testing ground for a social struggle that would persist in Harlem's community theaters even after many of the playhouses had shut their doors.

SOYICA S. DIGGS

See also Anita Bush Theater Company; Blacks in Theater; Bush, Anita; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Gilpin, Charles; Krigwa Players; Lafayette Players; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Literature: 3—Drama; Little Theater Tournament; National Ethiopian Art Theater; New Negro; 135th Street Library; Opportunity Literary Contests; Richardson, Willis; Theater; Walton, Lester; Williams, Egbert Austin "Bert"; Wilson, Frank

Further Reading

- Diamond, Elin. Unmaking Mimesis. New York: Routledge, 1997.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "The Drama Among Black Folk." Crisis, 12(4), August 1916.
- . "Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre: The Story of a Little Theatre Movement." Crisis, 32(3), July 1926.
- Gregory, Montgomery. "The Drama of Negro Life." In The New Negro: Voices of the Harlem Renaissance, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997.
- Hill, Errol, ed. The Theatre of Black Americans: A Collection of Critical Essays. New York: Applause Theatre, 1987.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. "Characteristics of Negro Expression." In Within the Circle: An Anthology of African- American Literary Criticism From the Harlem Renaissance to the Present, ed. Angelyn Mitchell. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1994.

Krasner, David. Resistance, Parody, and Double Consciousness in African-American Theatre, 1895–1910. New York: St. Martin's, 1997.

———. A Beautiful Pageant: African-American Theatre Drama and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Monroe, John G. "A Record of the Black Theatre in New York City." Ph.D. diss., University of Texas at Austin, 1980.

———. "The Harlem Little Theatre Movement, 1920–1929." Journal of American Culture, 6(4), Winter 1983.

Thompson, Sister Mary Francesca. "The Lafayette Players, 1915–1932." Ph.D. diss., University of Michigan, 1972.

Walker, Ethel Pitts. "Krigwa: A Theatre by, for, and About Black People." Theatre Journal, 40(3), October 1988.

Walrond, Eric. "Growth of the Negro Theatre." Theatre Magazine, 41, October 1925.

Conjure Man Dies, The

Rudolph Fisher's The Conjure Man Dies: A Mystery Tale of Dark Harlem (1932) was not the first detective novel by a black author, but it was the first "black-identified" detective novel, focused entirely on African American characters and set in Harlem during the Depression era. This novel relies on elements of classic detective stories such as the locked-room mystery and the police procedural, yet it also infuses these elements with the African American vernacular, urban rituals, and contemporary social issues. The influence of the naturalist novel of the 1930s is also apparent in Fisher's use of documentary-style exposition and in the recurring topic of social determinism. Fisher, who was a popular intellectual, scientist, and artist, bestowed his own attributes as a "renaissance man" on his multitalented, complicated protagonists.

The novel opens as Bubber Brown, a former street cleaner turned detective, rushes across 130th Street to the office of Dr. John Archer and asks Archer to examine the body of N'Gana Frimbo, "Psychist." Brown explains that he had accompanied his friend

Jinx Jenkins to see Frimbo for a consultation when Frimbo suddenly fell to the floor dead; Jenkins soon becomes implicated in the murder as his fingerprints are found on the weapon. On the case is Detective Perry Dart, who is described as a street-smart product of the public schools and as one of only ten black police officers in Harlem to be promoted to detective. Dart is a friend of the more intellectual Archer, and he asks Archer to assist in the investigation. The investigators find that Frimbo was an African king, a Harvard-educated philosophy student, a laboratory scientist, and a victim of American racism. While Archer occasionally questions Frimbo's sanity, the text never entirely challenges Frimbo's belief system—a provocative combination of western science and eastern mysticism.

Fisher's characters provide him with an opportunity for comic dialogue and slapstick humor even as he complicates stereotypes and educates readers unfamiliar with the ways of mysterious "dark Harlem." At Dart's request, the seemingly inept Brown efficiently locates two of Frimbo's recent visitors, a numbers runner who intended to collect Frimbo's bet and a drug addict who wanted to kill Frimbo. Others in Frimbo's office that night are also Harlem "types": a railroad porter, the attractive wife of an undertaker, and a desperate churchgoing wife. At a crucial moment, Frimbo himself turns up alive, claiming that he has indeed been dead and asking to join the investigation of his own murder, so he becomes the fourth detective on the case. But Frimbo's walleyed African butler is later found dead by Brown, who catches Frimbo in the act of disposing of the remains, and so Frimbo is also a suspect as well as a victim and an investigator. Fisher manipulates the preconceptions of his protagonists and his readers to plant several red herrings and disguise the killer's identity until the last minute, when Frimbo stages an unmasking in the style of Hercule Poirot that results in an act of violence in the style of Chester Himes.

The Conjure Man Dies was intended to be the first in a series. It was very favorably reviewed on publication, and a dramatized version was presented by the Federal Players at the Lafayette Theater in New York on 11 March 1936, starring Arthur "Dooley" Wilson as a "song-and-dance" detective. However, as of the present writing, this novel had not received the critical attention it deserves.

KIMBERLY DRAKE

See also Authors: 2—Fiction; Fisher, Rudolph; Literature: 4—Fiction; Wilson, Arthur “Dooley”

Further Reading

Bailey, Frankie Y. Out of the Woodpile: Black Characters in Crime and Detective Fiction. New York: Greenwood, 1991.

Bell, Bernard. The Afro-American Novel and Its Tradition. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1987.

Deutsch, Leonard J. “Rudolph Fisher’s Unpublished Manuscripts: Description and Commentary.” Obsidian, 6, Spring–Summer 1980.

Heglar, Charles. “Rudolph Fisher and the African-American Detective.” Armchair Detective, 30(3), 1997.

McCluskey, John. The City of Refuge: The Collected Stories of Rudolph Fisher. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987.

Soitos, Stephen F. The Blues Detective: African-American Detective Fiction. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.

Woods, Paula L. Spooks, Spies, and Private Eyes: Black Mystery, Crime, and Suspense Fiction. New York: Bantam, 1996.

Contempo

Contempo: A Review of Books and Personalities was a literary journal, or so-called little magazine, published between 1931 and 1934 in Chapel Hill, North Carolina. It was founded by a group of five young men; Milton Abernathy and Anthony J. Buttitta were the primary forces behind it. Although both Abernathy and Buttitta were students at the University of North Carolina during part of the lifetime of Contempo, the magazine was not officially associated with the university—a fact that university officials were quick to point out, owing to the radical positions the editors took. During its three years and forty-one issues of publication, Contempo developed a reputation for leftist politics and for being a first-rate little magazine that published significant writers of the era, including James Joyce, William Faulkner, Langston Hughes, Kay Boyle, Wallace Stevens, and William Carlos Williams.

The importance of Contempo to the Harlem Renaissance is primarily its relationship with Langston Hughes, who published four poems and one article in the magazine during 1931–1932. The article and one of the poems—“Christ in Alabama”—were published on the front page of a special issue devoted to the Scottsboro case; this issue also contained a poem by Countee Cullen. The issue had been timed to correspond with a visit by Hughes to the University of North Carolina during his speaking tour of the South in 1931. Abernathy and Buttitta were instrumental in bringing Hughes to Chapel Hill and planned to be his hosts in the apartment they shared. A scandal ensued when their landlord discovered their plans and evicted them; they had to find other accommodations for Hughes, and they themselves had to sleep on the floor in a bookshop they ran. Hughes’s visit and “Christ in Alabama”—with its opening line, “Christ is a Nigger”—attracted a great deal of hostile attention to the poet, the editors, and the magazine. One official of the University of North Carolina called the editors “half-baked, uneducated, and wholly reprehensible adolescents.” During the visit, Abernathy and Buttitta took Hughes to a popular local restaurant and broke the color line there.

Contempo was published sporadically in its final years and finally ceased publication after a split between Abernathy and Buttitta.

ERIK BLEDSOE

See also Buttitta, Anthony J.; Cullen, Countee; Hughes, Langston

Further Reading

Cunard, Nancy. “A Note on Contempo and Langston Hughes.” In Negro: An Anthology. London: Nancy Cunard with Wishart, 1934. (See also reprint, ed. and abridged Hugh Ford. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1970.)

Hughes, Langston. I Wonder as I Wander: An Autobiographical Journey. New York: Rinehart, 1956.

Meador, Judith Hay. “A History and Index of Contempo.” Master’s thesis, University of Louisville, 1968.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America. New York and Cambridge: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Cook, Will Marion

One of the most important questions confronting black intellectuals at the turn of the twentieth century was how to raise the image of the Negro as a writer, composer, and performer. A number of distinguished black composers, writers, and performers—including Harry T. Burleigh, Bob Cole, Will Marion Cook, Paul Laurence Dunbar, James Weldon Johnson, and J. Rosamond Johnson—held serious discussions about this at Marshall’s Hotel on West 53rd Street in Manhattan, where they would gather for an evening of southern food, syncopated music, and stimulating dialogue. In effect, they were pondering how to elevate the old Negro minstrel show to the “New Negro” musical.

Even in this stellar group, the composer Will Marion Cook was considered an especially original genius. He was respected for his pioneering achievements in popular songwriting, black musical comedies, and syncopated orchestral music—genres that he dramatically transformed. After matriculating at the Oberlin Conservatory and at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin (where Joseph Joachim taught him violin), Cook studied at New York’s National Conservatory with the Bohemian Antonín Dvořák, who urged American composers to stop copying European models and take a new path, using the indigenous music of America. Cook accepted the challenge and wrote pioneering black musical comedies under the tutelage of Bob Cole at Worth’s Museum (a theater in New York) at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Thirteenth Street.

In the summer of 1898, the musical production Clorindy: The Origin of the Cakewalk, by Cook and the poet Paul Laurence Dunbar, opened at the Casino Roof Garden. A story in song and dance, it helped bring syncopated African American music to Broadway and helped introduce the high-stepping cakewalk dance to the stage. Cook declared that blacks had finally arrived on Broadway and were there to stay.

The success of this venture led Cook to write a stream of other musicals, notably In Dahomey, which featured “back to Africa” as a theme. This work made theatrical history in 1903 as the first full-length musical written and performed by blacks to be presented at a major Broadway theater—the New York Theater in Times Square. It was also given more than 250 times in London; these presentations included a command performance in Buckingham Palace. Other musicals followed, including In Abyssinia (1906), Bandanna Land (1908), and Darkydom (1915).

During the years when Cook was involved in theatrical work, he was also intermittently conducting various ensembles. He became active with a group known as the Memphis Students, who were neither students nor from Memphis. This playing-singing-dancing orchestra was organized by Ernest Hogan; however, in 1905, Cook took the members on tour to Europe for several months. An outgrowth of this ensemble was the Clef Club Orchestra, led by James Reese Europe and assisted by Cook. The historic debut of the Clef Club Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on 12 May 1912 featured Cook’s compositions “Swing Along,” “The Rain Song,” and “Exhortation.”

In 1918, Cook established the New York Syncopated Orchestra (better known as the Southern Syncopated Orchestra), an all-black group of fifty formally attired men and a few women, who played and sang a diverse repertoire of light classics, popular songs, ragtime, spirituals, and waltzes. They toured the United States and abroad, featuring the clarinetist Sidney Bechet, who introduced characteristic blues.

In the 1920s, Cook freelanced with his orchestra, assisted Abbie Mitchell at the piano in performances at the Lafayette Theater, and presented a series of programs devoted to “all-Negro” music in Manhattan. In 1929, he trained the chorus for Vincent Youmans’s “Great Day” and assisted with Miller and Lyles's Runnin' Wild. He furthered the careers of many musicians, most notably Josephine Baker, Duke Ellington, Hall Johnson, Eva Jessye, and Clarence White.

Will Marion Cook. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Cook's life and music suggest a prototype of the New Negro, a generation before Alain Locke's volume on this subject in 1925. His background as a member of the black middle class, his international exposure, and his musical education in the European and African American idioms well prepared him for the role of uplifting African Americans' lives and music. His means were identification with Africa; the use of more realistic, more positive images of blacks in song lyrics; and his willingness to use aggression, assertiveness, and agitation for the sake of racial equality. Cook revealed in his memoirs that his ultimate challenge was to try to redress social injustices, and at the same time write beautiful music.

Biography

William Mercer Cook was born 27 January 1869 in Washington, D.C. He studied at public schools in Oberlin, Ohio; at Oberlin Conservatory (violin, 1884–1888); in Berlin, Germany (violin, 1888–c. 1889); and at the National Conservatory of Music, New York (under director Antonín Dvořák, 1895). Cook made his debut as concert violinist in 1889 in Washington, D.C. In 1890, Cook was the director of a new orchestra with Frederick Douglass as president. Cook's Clorindy, or The Origin of the Cakewalk, the first major black show at a major theater, was performed at the Casino Roof Garden in New York City in 1898. Cook was musical director and composer for George Walker and Bert Williams's company, which produced In Dahomey, In Abyssinia, and Bandanna Land (1899–1908). He performed at Buckingham Palace for the birthday celebration of Prince Edward of Wales in 1903 and in the musical The Southerners, with a white cast and black chorus, on Broadway in 1903. He took the Memphis Students to Europe in 1905. Cook collaborated on many musicals, including The Traitors and Darkydom, from 1912 to 1915; in 1912, at Carnegie Hall, he participated as performer and composer in a concert by the Clef Club. In 1918–1922 he organized and toured widely with the New York Syncopated Orchestra (also called the Southern Syncopated Orchestra, American Syncopated Orchestra, and Will Marion Cook Syncopated Orchestra), which included Sidney Bechet, Tom Fletcher, Abbie Mitchell, and Arthur Briggs. In 1929, he collaborated with Will Vodery on the musical Swing Along. Cook was an adviser, teacher, coach, and patron of many musicians in New York, and a founding member of the American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP), 1914. He died in New York City 20 July 1944.

MARVA CARTER

See also Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Clef Club; Cole, Bob; Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Ellington, Duke; Europe, James Reese; Jessye, Eva; Johnson, Hall; Johnson, James Weldon; Johnson, John Rosamond; Locke, Alain; Music; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Musical Theater; New Negro, The; White, Clarence; other specific musicians

Selected Works

- "Bon Bon Buddy." 1907. (From Bandanna Land.)
- "Brown-Skin Baby Mine." 1902. (From In Dahomey.)
- "Darktown Is Out Tonight." 1898. (From Clorindy, or The Origin of the Cakewalk.)
- "Down de Lover's Lane." 1900. (From The Traitor; Jes Lak' White Fok's; The Sons of Ham; The Casino Girl.)
- "Exhortation: A Negro Sermon." 1912. (From Bandanna Land.)
- "Jump Back, Honey, Jump Back." 1898. (From Clorindy, or The Origin of the Cakewalk.)
- "A Little Bit of Heaven Called Home." 1933.
- "The Little Gypsy Maid." 1902. (From The Wild Rose.)
- "Mammy." 1916. (From Darkydom.)
- "Molly Green." 1902. (From In Dahomey.)
- "My Lady's Lips Am Like de Honey." 1915. (From Darkydom.)
- "On Emancipation Day." 1902. (From Clorindy, or The Origin of the Cakewalk; In Dahomey.)
- "Rain Song." 1912. (Also arranged for men's chorus.)
- "Red, Red Rose." 1908. (From Bandanna Land; The Man from 'Bam.)
- "Society." 1903. (From The Sons of Ham; In Dahomey.)
- "Swing Along." 1902. (Also arranged for men's chorus; from The Southerners; In Dahomey.)
- "Wid de Moon, Moon, Moon." 1907. (From In Zululand.)

Further Reading

Carter, Marva Griffin. "The Life and Music of Will Marion Cook." Ph.D. diss., University of Illinois, 1988.

- . “The ‘New Negro’ Legacy of Will Marion Cook.” In Afro-Americans in New York Life and History, 23(1), January 1999a, pp. 25–37.
- . “Will Marion Cook.” In International Dictionary of Black Composers, ed. Samuel A. Floyd Jr. Chicago, Ill.: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999b, pp. 297–302.
- . “Removing the ‘Minstrel Mask’ in the Musicals of Will Marion Cook.” In Musical Quarterly, 84(2), Summer 2000, pp. 206–220.
- Cook, Will Marion. “Clorindy, or The Origin of the Cakewalk.” In Theater Arts, 31, 1947, pp. 61 ff. (Reprinted in Readings in Black Music, ed. Eileen Southern, 2nd ed. New York: Norton, 1983.)
- Green, Jeffrey. “‘In Dahomey’ in London in 1903.” In Black Perspective in Music, 11(1), 1983, pp. 22–40.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Along This Way: The Autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York: Viking, 1933. (Reprint, 1968.)
- Riis, Thomas L. Just before Jazz: Black Musical Theater in New York, 1890–1915. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1989.
- . The Music and Scripts of In Dahomey. Madison, Wisc.: A-R Editions, 1996.

Copper Sun

Countee Cullen’s Copper Sun was published in 1927 by Harper Brothers, two years after his first volume of poems, Color (1925). Most critics had found Color promising, if perhaps occasionally trite or flawed; but they felt that in Copper Sun—with its lofty diction, excessively neat rhyme and meter, and uncritical borrowings from older masters—Cullen had failed to develop a personal style. Another perceived shortcoming was Cullen’s tendency to focus on traditional apolitical, metaphysical topics rather than on social problems related to race; many readers believed that this leaning had intensified in Copper Sun. Most critical studies of Cullen therefore center on poems from Color and from his well-received third volume, The Black Christ (1929); as a result, there is something of a gap in the scholarship on Cullen, despite periodic references to various poems from Copper Sun, most notably “From the Dark Tower,” “Uncle Jim,” and “Threnody for a Brown Girl.”

For some time after Cullen’s death in 1946, critics perceived a conflict between his interest in racial problems and folk idioms on the one hand, and his interest in the genteel romanticism of poets like John Keats on the other. Copper Sun is most often faulted for Cullen’s tendency to muse abstractly on love and death rather than address race relations and racial inequality. Scholars, for their part, have tended to focus on Cullen’s celebrated race poems and to read his poetry as a clue to various facets of his enigmatic identity; in particular, they have been interested in the relationship between Cullen’s poetic “investment” and what was considered his duty to write about race.

Davis (1953) examined the role of Africa in Cullen’s poetic imagination as a set of characteristics against which the poet plots his own identity. Reimherr (1963) looked at Cullen’s relationship with Christianity. Cullen was the adopted son of a Methodist minister, and like many black artists whose work had social protest as its raison d’être, he was known for finding or devising biblical parallels in order to expose the hypocrisy and tyranny of racist philosophies. Reimherr notes that Cullen often identified heroic black characters with biblical figures, casting the suffering of blacks so as to appeal to white audiences. Some readers have seen a link between Cullen’s desire to appeal to whites and his preference for western literary forms and traditions. Baker (1974), however, observes that Cullen’s preference for traditional “white” forms would not necessarily have attracted whites in an era when white patrons sought authentic “blackness” expressed in exotic folk forms. Baker himself sees Copper Sun as a work characterized by tension between stasis and change, in which the poet never reconciles his taste for voluptuous sentiment with his concern for sociopolitical racial equality. Lomax (1974) suggests that the demand for an authentic black “folk voice” actually prevented Cullen from developing a more personal style. Primeau (1976) believes that Cullen’s attraction to romanticism was a way to explore feelings of alienation stemming from racism.

During the 1990s, critics often examined how race overlaps with other categories of identity, and some began to analyze Cullen’s poetry in light of his homosexuality. Kelley (1997) noted that Cullen’s attraction to primitivist imagery (especially in poems from Color such as “Heritage”) might be understood as a homoerotic attraction to idealized decadence and might also be related to a consideration of urbanity and savagery as categories invoked in support of racial supremacy. Powers (2000) has theorized that in Cullen’s psyche and poetry there was a profound split between private, forbidden homoerotic desires and the demand for a normative heterosexual lifestyle—that is, for a public persona aligned with Christian uprightness and institutional academic credentials and validation. According to Powers, Cullen's own culture made no allowance for the possibility that these two realms might coincide in the persona of an emblematic black artist and public role model; therefore, Cullen had to live and write on both sides of the divide. Although Copper Sun was a somewhat anomalous critical failure, and although it has had only a minor role in the changing considerations of Cullen's life and art, it may suggest interesting problems in the political climate of the arts during the Harlem Renaissance.

VICTORIA A. ELMWOOD

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Color; Cullen, Countee; Homosexuality; Literature: 7—Poetry

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A., Jr. A Many-Colored Coat of Dreams: The Poetry of Countee Cullen. Detroit, Mich.: Broadside, 1974.
- Davis, Arthur P. "The Alien-and-Exile Theme in Countee Cullen's Racial Poems." Phylon, Winter 1953, pp. 73–86.
- Early, Gerald, ed. My Soul's High Song. New York: Doubleday, 1991, pp. 3–73.
- Kelley, James. "Blossoming in Strange New Forms: Male Homosexuality and the Harlem Renaissance." Soundings: An Interdisciplinary Journal, 80, 1997, pp. 499–517.
- Lomax, Michael L. "Countee Cullen: A Key to the Puzzle." Studies in the Literary Imagination, 7(2), 1974, pp. 39–48.
- Powers, Peter. "'The Singing Man Who Must Be Reckoned With': Private Desire and Public Responsibility in the Poetry of Countee Cullen." African-American Review, 34(4), 2000, pp. 661–678.
- Primeau, Ronald. "Countee Cullen and Keats's 'Vale of Soul-Making.'" Papers on Language and Literature: A Journal for Scholars and Critics of Language and Literature, 12, 1976, pp. 73–86.
- Reimherr, Beulah. "Race Consciousness in Countee Cullen's Poetry." Susquehanna University Studies, 7(2), 1963, pp. 65–82.

Cornhill

The Cornhill Company was a small vanity press based in Boston, owned by Walter Reid and William Stanley Braithwaite during the early Harlem Renaissance. In 1918, the poet Brookes More made the acquaintance of the owners when Cornhill published his work The Lover's Rosary. In 1919, More decided to retire and concentrate on writing. To facilitate publication of his own works, he acquired control of Cornhill in 1921 from Reid and renamed the firm the Cornhill Publishing Company. Reid initially stayed on as manager, but his policies landed the company in serious financial difficulties, and in 1922, More had to dismiss him.

Before More acquired it, Cornhill had been important in making known to larger publishers, and to the reading public, the work of some talented African American poets who would have an impact on black American literature. In the years after World War I, the publishing industry was still controlled by major white publishing houses; African American writers and poets might submit their work to small black magazines and newspapers, which were sometimes affiliated with the black church, but they could not achieve real success unless they published with a major white firm. Although the leading black writers tended to have little or no difficulty finding a white publisher, lesser black writers had to struggle to prove themselves to white companies. Cornhill, as a vanity press, was open to publishing African American literature, and it became a local center of black publication, together with a number of other small presses in the Boston area. However, these local companies had limited resources; very often the writers had to subsidize the printing as well as the promotion of their own work, and both distribution and promotion were rather poor. Nevertheless, for struggling black writers these almost self-financed publications did serve to open the door to white publishing companies.

During the early years of the Harlem Renaissance, Cornhill published a number of works by black writers who later became significant figures in the artistic movement. These included James Weldon Johnson's first volume of poetry, Fifty Years and Other Poems (1917); Angelina Weld Grimké's play Rachel (1917); Joseph S. Cotter's The Band of Gideon and Other Lyrics (1918); and Joshua Jones's Poems of the Four Seas (1921). Other works of African Americans published by Cornhill during this period were Maud Cuney-Hare's The Message of the Trees, Charles Bertram Johnson's Songs of My People, and Georgia Douglas Johnson's The Heart of a Woman and Other Poems.

This list of publications suggests the significance of Cornhill as a stepping-stone for African American writers during the early period of the Harlem Renaissance: Their work did attract attention from major white publishing houses. After 1922, however, under More's management, Cornhill no longer specialized in black literature. More reduced the size of the company; gave particular attention to binding, paper and other technical details; and produced popular works of literature for the general public.

AMY LEE

See also Braithwaite, William Stanley; Cotter, Joseph Seamon; Cuney-Hare, Maud; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Johnson, James Weldon; Publishers and Publishing Houses

Further Reading

- Brawley, Benjamin. The Negro Genius: A New Appraisal of the Achievement of the American Negro in Literature and the Fine Arts. New York: Biblio and Tannen, 1966.
- Brewer, Wilmon. Life and Poems of Brookes More. Boston, Mass.: Marshall Jones, 1940.
- Hutchison, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Kramer, Victor A., and Robert A. Russ, eds. Harlem Renaissance Reexamined. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1997.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Corrothers, James D.

The career of James D. Corrothers predated the Harlem Renaissance; however, themes in his writing and struggles in his life prefigured the spirit and strivings of the renaissance. W. E. B. Du Bois remarked that Corrothers's death in 1917 was "a serious loss to the race and to literature."

After receiving the best education available to an impoverished black youth in a rural area (in the public schools of South Haven, Michigan), Corrothers became an itinerant laborer in western Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio, and in Chicago and Springfield, Illinois. While he was working in Springfield as a coachman, his poem "The Deserted Schoolhouse" was published in Springfield's Champion City Times. The general reaction among whites was disbelief that Corrothers had actually composed the poem—an ominous sign of the difficulties Corrothers would later face in trying to pursue a writing career. Nevertheless,

Springfield was important to Corrothers's development as a writer.

In Springfield, Corrothers met Albery A. Whitman, then known as the "colored poet of America"; attended a lecture by Frederick Douglass; and joined the Young Men's Republican Club, where he met several of Booker T. Washington's associates and where, although he was not yet old enough to vote, he became immersed in politics and was encouraged to write and make speeches. Corrothers then headed back to Chicago, hoping to publish his work; but he was unable to find a publisher for the patriotic songs he had written, and he took a series of menial jobs, eventually working as a porter and bootblack in a white barbershop. One distinguished-looking customer happened to be Henry Demarest Lloyd, part-owner of the Chicago Tribune; Lloyd had one of Corrothers's poems published in the Tribune and gave Corrothers a job in the newspaper's counting room.

From his menial but secure job at the Tribune, Corrothers wrote poetry, studied the paper's writing style, and waited for a chance to break into journalism—though he soon learned that the editor would not give an African American a permanent position as a reporter. Repeatedly, Corrothers's career as a journalist was stymied by newspaper editors who refused to give him permanent work while at the same time publishing his articles and dialect poetry at space rates.

At the time—the 1890s—black dialect in speech and writing was generally used to demean African Americans. Consequently, Corrothers had an aversion to it; but audiences and readers relished it and were accustomed to finding it in minstrel skits, local-color writing, and plantation nostalgia. After meeting Paul Laurence Dunbar and reading Dunbar's works, Corrothers gained a different perspective on black dialect; ultimately, to appeal to readers and support his family, he began to use it. Corrothers contributed dialect poetry to leading magazines and published a series of complex yet minstrel-like character sketches in dialect, which were later collected in his first book, The Black Cat Club (1902). However, as Corrothers's career was gaining momentum, the heyday of dialect writing was coming to an end: James Weldon Johnson defined a new agenda for poets in The Book of American Negro Poetry (1921) and assailed black dialect.

Corrothers was never able to support himself and his family as a full-time writer, and he finally had to retire from writing. His disappearance from the literary scene left a gap in African American literary history that current scholarship on Corrothers and on African American writing preceding the Harlem Renaissance has begun to fill.

Corrothers, James D.

Biography

James D. Corrothers was born 2 July 1869 in Chain Lake Settlement, Cass County, Michigan. He attended public schools in South Haven; a Northwestern University preparatory school in Evanston, Illinois; and Bennett College in Greensboro, North Carolina. Corrothers contributed news and poetry to the Bee, Tribune, Times-Herald, Journal, Daily Record, and Daily News in Chicago; to the Mail, Express, Herald, and Sunday Herald in New York; to the Inquirer in Philadelphia; and to the Globe-Democrat in St. Louis. He also contributed to magazines: Truth, Criterion, Southern Workman, Century, American, Colored American, and The Crisis. He entered the ministry and was a pastor of Methodist congregations in Rochester (New York) and Red Bank and Hackensack (New Jersey); of Baptist congregations in Jersey City (New Jersey), South Haven (Michigan), and Lexington (Virginia); and of a Presbyterian congregation in West Chester (Pennsylvania). Corrothers died 2 February 1917 in West Chester, Pennsylvania.

VETA TUCKER

See also Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Johnson, James Weldon

Selected Works

- "Way in de Woods, and Nobody Dar." Century, 57, April 1899, p. 959.
- "A Dixie Thanksgivin'." Century, 59, November 1899, p. 160.
- "Me 'n' Dunbar." Colored American, 3, July 1901, pp. 163–164.
- The Black Cat Club*. New York and London: Funk and Wagnalls, 1902.
- "An Awful Problem Solved." Colored American, 6, November 1903, pp. 793–795.
- "Paul Lawrence Dunbar." Century, 85, November 1912, p. 56.
- "The Negro Singer." Century, 85, November 1912, p. 56.
- "At the Closed Gate of Justice." Century, 86, June 1913, p. 272.
- "A Man They Didn't Know." Crisis, 7, December 1913, pp. 85–87; 7, January 1914, pp. 136–138.

- "The Dream and the Song." Century, 87, January 1914, p. 398.
- "At the End of the Controversy." American, 77, March 1914, pp. 36–41.
- "In the Matter of Two Men." Crisis, 9, January 1915, p. 138.
- "The Black Man's Soul." Crisis, 10, October 1915, pp. 304, 306.
- "An Indignation Dinner." Century, 91, December 1915, p. 320.
- In Spite of the Handicap: An Autobiography*. New York: Doran, 1916.

Further Reading

- Barton, Rebecca Chalmers. Witnesses for Freedom: Negro Americans in Autobiography. New York: Harper, 1948.
- Brown, Sterling. Negro Poetry and Drama. Washington, D.C.: Associates in Negro Folk Education, 1937.
- Bruce, Dickson D., Jr. Black American Writing from the Nadir: The Evolution of a Literary Tradition, 1877–1915. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.
- . "James Corrothers Reads a Book: Or, the Lives of Sandy Jenkins." African-American Review, 26(4), Winter 1992, pp. 665–673.
- Dictionary of Literary Biography*, Vol. 50, Afro-American Writers Before the Harlem Renaissance. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1987, pp. 52–62.
- Gaines, Kevin. "Assimilationist Minstrelsy as Racial Uplift Ideology: James D. Corrother's Literary Quest for Black Leadership." American Quarterly, 45(3), September 1993, pp. 341–369.
- Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Maberry Johnson. Propaganda and Aesthetics: The Literary Politics of Afro-American Magazines in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.
- Johnson, James Weldon, ed. The Book of American Negro Poetry. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1931.
- Payne, James Robert. "Griggs and Corrothers: Historical Reality and Black Fiction." Explorations in Ethnic Studies, 6, January 1983, pp. 1–9.
- Redmond, Eugene B. Drumvoices: The Mission of Afro-American Poetry. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Double-day, 1976.

Cotter, Joseph Seamon Jr.

The poetic range of Joseph Seamon Cotter Jr. extended from well-crafted sonnets to poems grounded in the biblical allusions of the time-honored African American sermonic tradition. His poems also addressed the pressing social and political issues of his time. Considering his skillful use of free verse, some critics have seen Cotter as a transitional figure who, like Fenton Johnson, established a pattern for African American poets of the 1920s.

Cotter was an avid reader before he began first grade. A fine student, intelligent and athletic, he received a good academic foundation at Central Colored High School in Louisville, Kentucky, where he excelled in Latin, English, history, and mathematics. He graduated at age fifteen, second in his class. In 1911, Cotter followed his older sister Florence to Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee. There he worked on the staff of the student magazine, the Fisk Herald. In his sophomore year, however, Cotter contracted tuberculosis and was forced to return to Louisville. Florence also contracted the disease; she died in December 1914, shortly after graduating from Fisk and beginning a teaching career.

Under close medical supervision, Cotter worked as an essayist for the weekly Louisville Leader and began writing poems that were collected as The Band of Gideon and Other Lyrics, published in June 1918 by the Cornhill Company in Boston. Reviewing the book in New York Age, James Weldon Johnson declared, "Cotter is free and bold. He has imagination and fine poetic sense," coupled with "a splendid mastery of the tools that every poet must know how to use." Years later, Sterling Brown praised Cotter's "concern for social themes, done with quiet persuasiveness," and noted that Cotter shared this focus with younger poets of the Harlem Renaissance.

Cotter's most widely known poem, "Sonnet to Negro Soldiers," dedicated to the all-black Ninety-second Division of the United States Army, was reprinted in The Crisis, the journal of the National Association of Colored People where it had the force of an editorial. African American soldiers, facing enemy fire in France in World War I, "walk unafraid within that Living Hell,/Nor heed the driving rain of shot and shell." Their willing sacrifice, says the poet, serves as "a glorious sign,/A glimmer of that resurrection morn," when racial prejudice and second-class citizenship will be a thing of the past. Other poems, such as "Moloch" and "O Little, David, Play On Your Harp," sound an angrier, less optimistic tone. "The Mulatto to His Critics" and "Is It Because I Am Black?" are eloquent free-verse expressions of racial pride.

Cotter was terminally ill in the autumn of 1918 when he wrote his final poems. Impressive in technique though adhering to syncope and archaic verb forms, "Out of the Shadows: An Unfinished Sonnet-Sequence" appeared posthumously in the AME Zion Quarterly Review in 1920 and 1921.

In his poem "A Prayer," Cotter described his own fragile condition and ended with the pathetic supplication "O God, give me words to make my dream-children live." For about a year that prayer was answered. The sixty-five poems that make up his collected works are testimony to Cotter's talent. Some are good enough to suggest that his early death was, indeed, a loss for literature.

Biography

The poet and journalist Joseph Seamon Cotter Jr. was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on 2 September 1895. He was the second of three children; the third, Leonidas, died in infancy in January 1900. His father was a school principal and a published poet; his mother, Maria Cox Cotter, was a schoolteacher. The Cotters, who were respected community leaders, admired Booker T. Washington and were acquaintances of luminaries such as Paul Laurence Dunbar. Cotter briefly attended college and worked as a journalist. He died of tuberculosis 3 February 1919, but his father saw to it that his poems continued to be published and anthologized.

LORENZO THOMAS

See also Authors: 5-Poets; Brown, Sterling; Cornhill; Johnson, Fenton; Johnson, James Weldon

Further Reading

Cotter, Joseph Seamon, Jr. Complete Poems, ed. James Robert Payne. Athens and London: University of Georgia Press, 1990.

Johnson, James Weldon. "Some New Books of Poetry and Their Makers." In Selected Writings of James Weldon Johnson, 2 vols., ed. Sondra Kathryn Wilson. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995, Vol. 1, pp. 271-277. (This essay was first published in 1918.)

Payne, James Robert. "Joseph Seamon Cotter, Jr." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 50. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1986, pp. 70-73.

Redmond, Eugene B. Drumvoices: The Mission of Afro-American Poetry. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor, 1976, pp. 155-169.

Shockley, Ann Allen. "Joseph S. Cotter, Sr.: Biographical Sketch of a Black Louisville Bard." CLA Journal, 18, March 1975, pp. 327–340.

Cotton Club

The Harlem cabaret is perhaps the most fabled intersection of the jazz age and the Harlem Renaissance, and no cabaret was more fabled than the Cotton Club—the “aristocrat of Harlem”—at the northeast corner of Lenox Avenue and 142nd Street: Between its opening in September 1923 and its relocation downtown in February 1936, the Cotton Club would boost the early careers of Edith Wilson, Bill “Bojangles” Robinson, Aida Ward, Adelaide Hall, Earl “Snakehips” Tucker, Mantan Moreland, Ethel Waters, Lena Horne, the Nicholas Brothers, and the bands of Duke Ellington (in 1927–1931 and 1933), Cab Calloway (in 1930–1933), and Jimmie Lunceford (in 1934–1936). As famous for its exclusionary racial policies as for its fast-stepping revues, the Cotton Club embodied many of the contradictions of the popular Harlem Renaissance; its cultural meaning was shaped by the combined forces of Prohibition economics, postwar trends in musical theater, black performance traditions and innovations, white patronage, and the mass media.

The Douglas Casino—a large, underused dance hall space over a movie house—had been built at 644 Lenox Avenue in 1918. It was sold in 1920 to the former heavyweight champion Jack Johnson, refurbished as an intimate supper club seating 400, and renamed the Club Deluxe. In 1923, the struggling club was resold to Manhattan’s most powerful underworld figure, Owen “Owney” Madden, who was then in prison, having been convicted of manslaughter. Madden had made his fortune on sales of Madden’s No. 1 beer during the national experiment with enforced sobriety; he also owned a number of other nightclubs in Manhattan, including the Stork Club and the Silver Slipper. Initially, most of the personnel of the Cotton Club, including cooks, waiters, busboys, the management, and entertainers, were imported from Chicago. George “Big Frenchy” DeMange managed the club, while Walter Brooks, who had brought Shuffle Along to Broadway in 1921, served as front. Lew Leslie produced the first floor shows; and Andy Preer’s Missourians, renamed the Cotton Club Syncopators, provided music. Madden himself rarely visited the newly baptized Cotton Club, and although federal authorities padlocked the club’s doors for three months in 1925 for forty-four violations of the Volstead Act, he faced little trouble from the police before his voluntary return to Sing Sing prison and semiretirement in July 1932.

Madden spared little expense in creating an exclusive, titillating uptown destination for a well-heeled downtown crowd. The club was renovated to fit 700, with seating surrounding the dance and show floor that extended from the horseshoe-shaped stage. Joseph Urban, Florenz Ziegfeld’s celebrated set and costume designer, redesigned the interior in what Singer (1992) describes as “a brazen riot of African jungle motifs, Southern stereotypology, and lurid eroticism” (100). The gangsters themselves were an attraction; DeMange was expected to be present and visible. Admission to the club cost $2.50, and, except for Madden’s beer, drinks were expensive. Strict decorum and studied elegance were expected of both staff and customers. Shows (generally three per night) were scheduled to allow performers at other locations to drop in after work; Sunday night became “Celebrity Night,” with everyone from Jimmy Durante to New York’s mayor Jimmy Walker asked to take a bow and perhaps do a number. New floor shows opened twice each year and were budgeted to rival Ziegfeld’s Follies (indeed, some—such as Lew Leslie’s long-running Blackbirds of 1928—would eventually find their way to Broadway). Following the closing in 1925, Harry Block replaced Brooks as front, Herman Stark began a fifteen-year run as stage manager, Dan Healey replaced Leslie as floor-show producer, and Jimmy McHugh composed the music (McHugh was joined in 1927 by the lyricist Dorothy Fields). Healey established the formula: a top-billed singer or comedian; specialty acts in eccentric dances and “adult” songs; a chorus line attired in elaborate, or elaborately brief, costumes; and behind it all top-notch jazz—particularly once Duke Ellington’s Washingtonians became the house band in December 1927 (some commentators remember it as an offer the band couldn’t refuse). At the Cotton Club, where he had to write not only dance tunes but also overtures, transitions, accompaniments, and “jungle” effects, Ellington developed much of his distinctive orchestral composition style.

A key innovation in creating the Cotton Club’s exclusive atmosphere was Madden’s seemingly paradoxical introduction of a strict color line into the heart of Harlem. In establishing a whites-only policy regarding customers, Madden was following the practice at Connie’s Inn, a rival Harlem club favored by moneyed whites. At the Cotton Club, the concept was extended to the division of labor, creating a strict divide between the whites who ran the club and produced, wrote, and choreographed its shows, and the blacks who cooked, waited and bussed tables, and entertained. Women in the chorus line faced their own color bar; they were essentially conceived as part of the club's decor, and they were expected to be "tall, tan, and terrific": at least 5 feet 6 inches, no darker than a light olive tone, and under twenty-one. Then, in 1927, the Columbia Broadcasting System, one of the emerging radio networks, began to broadcast from the Cotton Club. By 1930, half-hour programs might be broadcast over several stations and networks five or six nights a week, giving bandleaders a chance to build a national—and mixed—audience and greatly increasing their opportunities to tour and record. In deference to Ellington's new clout and his expressed regret that friends and family of the performers were unable to see them play, the club relaxed its whites-only policy for customers, at least for light-skinned celebrities willing to sit near the kitchen.

Though the Cotton Club experienced a number of changes in the early 1930s, the Depression had trouble catching up with it. For the revue of spring 1930, Brown Sugar—Sweet but Unrefined, Cab Calloway's orchestra replaced Ellington's, and the composer Harold Arlen and the lyricist Ted Koehler replaced McHugh and Fields, who were then (like Ellington) leaving for Hollywood. However, the repeal of Prohibition and the increasingly visible poverty of Harlem eventually created insurmountable problems for many mob-run uptown clubs. The Cotton Club pulled up stakes after the close of its show for spring 1936 and reopened in September at 200 West 48th Street and Broadway, the former site of the Palais Royale and the future site of the Latin Quarter. After four years of high midtown rents, the rising cost of mounting elaborate floor shows, changing tastes in jazz, and renewed federal attention to income tax evasion among New York's nightclubs, the Cotton Club closed its doors permanently on 10 June 1940.

Cotton Club, c. 1920s. (© Underwood and Underwood/Corbis.)

RYAN JERVING

See also Blackbirds; Fields, Dorothy; Harlem: 3–Entertainment; Johnson, John Arthur "Jack"; Leslie, Lew; Madden, Owen Vincent "Owney"; Nightclubs; Nightlife; Organized Crime; specific entertainers

Further Reading

- Burns, Ken, dir. "Our Language." In Jazz. PBS Home Video, 2000, Episode 3.
- Calloway, Cab, and Bryant Rollins. Of Minnie the Moocher and Me. New York: Crowell, 1976.
- Ellington, Duke. Music Is My Mistress. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973; New York: Da Capo, 1988.
- Haskins, Jim. The Cotton Club. New York: Random House, 1977.
- Hasse, John Edward. Beyond Category: The Life and Genius of Duke Ellington. London and New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.
- Singer, Barry. Black and Blue: The Life and Lyrics of Andy Razaf. New York and London: Schirmer—Simon & Schuster Macmillan, 1992.
- Tucker, Mark, ed. The Duke Ellington Reader. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Covarrubias, Miguel

Miguel Covarrubias (1904–1957) was never formally trained as an artist; he began drawing as a boy and perfected his technique through constant work. During his youth, he became well acquainted with artistic circles in Mexico City and began to do caricatures of their members. His images of well-known artists such as Diego Rivera, Dr. Atl, and Carlos Mérida, as well as of politicians and intellectuals, were frequently seen in Mexican publications such as La Falange, Fantoche, El Heraldo, El Mundo, and El Universal Ilustrado. He was equally adept at caricaturing the signature styles of other visual artists, something he first did in the art journal Zig-Zag in 1921, when he incorporated Aubrey Beardsley's style into a caricature of the work of the Mexican painter Roberto Montenegro.

In 1923, Covarrubias arrived in New York City, through the sponsorship of the Mexican Ministry of Foreign Relations. This move would have tremendous significance for his artistic career, and his period in New York (lasting until 1936) was his most prolific. In September 1923, he made the acquaintance of the photographer, writer, and socialite Carl Van Vechten, who introduced him to Frank Crowninshield, editor of Vanity Fair. At Van Vechten's suggestion, Covarrubias began to contribute illustrations featuring black figures; these illustrations aroused interest in Harlem, which had already come to the attention of the white intelligentsia, and were later (1925) exhibited at the New Gallery in New York. By 1924, Covarrubias was the head caricaturist at Vanity Fair, sometimes contributing as many as eight illustrations per issue; he continued to work with this magazine even after it merged with Vogue in 1936. Covarrubias's friendship with Van Vechten also led to close connections with others who were significant in the Harlem Renaissance. In 1926, he illustrated the cover of Langston Hughes's The Weary Blues and the pages of W. C. Handy's Blues: An Anthology. Later, he illustrated books such as René Maran's Batouala (1932), Herman Melville's Typee (1935), Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1938), and numerous ethnographic studies.

Covarrubias had a distinctive style that combined a sense of design with simplicity of line, and his work was much in demand; in fact, he, Ralph Barton (1892–1932), and Al Hirshfeld (1903–2003) defined American caricature in the 1920s. He relied on integrity of line to create his caricatures, and his manipulation of abstract patterning gave them a decidedly modernist appeal; in his attention to line, careful geometry, and exaggeration of particular features he was inspired by cubism. In addition to Vanity Fair, he published caricatures in other prominent publications such as World and the New Yorker. He worked in theater as well; in 1925, he designed the set for the musical number "Rancho Mexicano" in the Garrick Gaities, the set and costumes for George Bernard Shaw's Androcles and the Lion, and the set for Josephine Baker's Revue nègre. Also in 1925, the publisher Alfred Knopf issued Covarrubias's first book of caricatures, The Prince of Wales and Other Famous Americans.

In 1927, Covarrubias published what may be his most significant book, Negro Drawings. These works grew from his direct experience of Harlem; they depict a broad variety of "types" found in Harlem—flappers, musicians, dancers, street preachers, socialites, blues singers, mothers and children, waiters, and others—and convey the feel of the neighborhood. Some of the drawings are of single figures; others are scenes with entertainers, parties, and fashions in appropriate settings. The figures are weighty, nearly monumental, although they are created from a few linear forms. Covarrubias would start a portrait with two circles for eyes and then add a few curved lines or angles, instantly creating the syncopated rhythm of a dancer or the movement of a dandy through Harlem's streets.

Covarrubias's images serve as complete narratives even when they show only one figure. This is particularly true when the single figure, like someone sitting for a photograph, seems aware of the viewer. Unlike his other illustrations, which were intended particularly to entertain, these portrait images present a careful, profound consideration of various facets of Harlem's cultural life, as seen through a modernist's eyes. Stylistically, the works have been described as postcubist by some art historians; Covarrubias always remains interested in depicting the movement of the human figure.

Negro Drawings foreshadowed Covarrubias's interest in examining marginalized cultures throughout the world. Later, he would turn to Bali and his native Mexico for inspiration, taking an anthropological approach to doing research for his images. Once he left New York, Covarrubias abandoned the style of his caricatures in favor of a more documentary style that would inform the work of his later years, beginning with a yearlong trip to Bali in 1933, funded by a Guggenheim fellowship.

Covarrubias's interest in material culture continued to manifest itself in his love of crafts and the indigenous arts of Mexico. He organized an exhibition of Mexican applied arts at the Art Center in New York in 1928. His impressive collection of books, photographs, and other documents of Mexican art and craft allowed him to study these objects closely and illustrate them meticulously. It would seem that Covarrubias's interest in Harlem was part of a larger commitment to studying and depicting a variety of cultural "others." The fascination of the white majority with the culture of Harlem might have given him the idea of bringing Mexican, African American, and Balinese culture to wider audiences.

Along with his caricatures, Covarrubias did numerous paintings. These were large, colorful canvases

Miguel Covarrubias with two Balinese men, c. 1930–1935.

(Library of Congress.)

that featured Mexican peasants as well as portraits of patrons and acquaintances. Created with the same sense of monumentality as his caricatures, the figures in his paintings have a quiet dignity that is suggested by their posture, their clothing, and their surroundings. His images of Mexican women vendors are particularly heroic and seem to reflect something of the costumbrista paintings—featuring vendors of wares and foodstuffs in colorful landscapes—that were popular in Mexico at the turn of the twentieth century. Other images, such as his portraits of women, put the sensuality of his drawn lines at the service of the nude female body.

Biography

Miguel Covarrubias was born in Mexico City in 1904 to a wealthy family. Both his father and his uncle held prominent positions in the Mexican government. Covarrubias began drawing in his boyhood and started his artistic career doing caricatures. He came to New York in 1923 and soon became a caricaturist for Vanity Fair. Covarrubias was also an illustrator and cover artist for books by a number of writers of the Harlem Renaissance, a designer for theatrical productions, and a painter on canvas. He died in 1957.

ROCIO ARANDA-ALVARADO

See also Batouala; Blues: An Anthology; Guggenheim Fellowships; Modernism; Van Vechten, Carl; Vanity Fair; Weary Blues, The

Further Reading

Cox, Beverly J. Miguel Covarrubias: Caricatures. Washington, D.C.: National Portrait Gallery, 1985.

“Miguel Covarrubias: Homenaje.” Mexico City: Centro Cultural de Arte Contemporáneo, 1987. (Exhibition catalog.)

Navarrete, Sylvia. Miguel Covarrubias: Artista y explorador. Mexico City: Consejo Nacional para la Cultura y las Artes, 1993.

Williams, Adriana. Covarrubias. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994.

Cowdery, Mae Virginia

Mae Virginia Cowdery (1909–1953) was part of an artistic and literary milieu, based in Philadelphia during the early twentieth century, that also included many of her contemporaries who were, then and later, better-known figures of the Harlem Renaissance. Cowdery was born into an upwardly mobile middle-class family, the only child of a social worker and a caterer, and she benefited from an environment of racial uplift that valued talent in the arts and in letters as a means of promoting equality and opportunity for black Americans. In 1927, while still a student at the prestigious Philadelphia High School for Girls, Cowdery published writing and poems in Black Opals, a briefly successful black intellectual journal that had been founded by “older New Negroes to encourage younger members of the group who demonstrate talent and ambitions.” In writing for Black Opals, Cowdery was in good company: The journal also printed work by Langston Hughes, Jessie Fauset, Alain Locke, and other notables. Also in 1927, Cowdery won first prize in a poetry contest run by The Crisis, for her poem “Longings”; and another of her poems, “Lamps,” won a Krigwa Prize for poetry.

As a winner of its poetry contest, Cowdery had her picture printed in The Crisis; her biographers all note her unique style, which today might be described as gender bending. In this picture, she wears a tailored suit and a bow tie, and her hair is slicked back, perhaps suggesting her integration into Harlem’s bohemian circle. Actually, though, very little is known of Cowdery’s personal life, and her artistic life is only somewhat less obscure. It appears from her three-part work “Three Poems for My Daughter” that Cowdery may have had a daughter; but there are no other known records of this child, and other poems—such as “Spring Lament”—may indicate that the child was not born alive. For unknown reasons, Cowdery committed suicide in 1953, at the age of forty-four.

Cowdery was one of the few African American women poets in the first half of the twentieth century to publish her own volume of poetry: This was We Lift Our Voices and Other Poems (1936). This work, a visually stunning limited edition (350 copies) of delicate yet intensely powerful verse, had an introduction by the literary editor William Stanley Braithwaite and a frontispiece by the artist Allan Freelon, and it was critically well received. Its date is well after the period that many scholars consider the height of the Harlem Renaissance, the 1920s; however, Cowdery had published a substantial amount of poetry during the late 1920s, in journals, magazines, and collected anthologies. Cowdery’s history of publication in black journals is similar to that of other women writers of the Harlem Renaissance; her older contemporaries Jessie Fauset and Zora Neale Hurston, for example, also built a reputation by publishing their work in black journals.

Despite the obscurity surrounding her personal life and her participation in the Harlem Renaissance, Cowdery clearly arose out of and was intimately connected with an artistic and literary upsurge articulated by a northern, black, middle-class, urban sensibility.

Biography

Mae V. Cowdery was born in 1904 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. She studied at Philadelphia High School for Girls and the Pratt Institute, New York. Her awards included first prize in The Crisis poetry contest and the Krigwa Poetry Prize, both in 1927. She published We Lift Our Voices and Other Poems in 1936. Cowdery committed suicide in 1953.

LAURA ALEXANDRA HARRIS

See also Black Opals; Braithwaite, William Stanley; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Hughes, Langston; Literature: 7—Poetry; Locke, Alain

Further Reading

Braithwaite, William Stanley. Introduction. In We Lift Our Voices and Other Poems. Philadelphia: Alpress, 1936.
Brawley, Benjamin. The Negro Genius. New York: Bilbo and Tannen, 1972.

Cowdery, Mae V. We Lift Our Voices and Other Poems. Philadelphia: Alpress, 1936.

Honey, Maureen, ed. Shadowed Dreams: Women’s Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. New Brunswick, N.J., and London: Rutgers University Press, 1989.

Jubilee, Vincent. “Philadelphia’s Afro-American Literary Circle and the Harlem Renaissance.” New Haven: J. W. Johnson Collection at Yale, 1980.

Kellner, Bruce, ed. The Harlem Renaissance A Historical Dictionary for the Era. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1984.

Lewis, David Levering. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1995.

Cox, Ida Prather

The blues singer Ida Prather Cox (1896–1967) started her career in vaudeville at age fourteen. Before she began recording with Paramount in 1923, she sang with Jelly Roll Morton, and she was occasionally accompanied by Louis Armstrong and King Oliver when she sang in clubs in Chicago for a time in her late teens. She had a longtime musical partnership with the woman pianist Lovie Austin and recorded several songs with Austin and Tommy Ladnier on trumpet. Although the music that Cox recorded was blues in its lyrical form, her musical arrangements did not rely on the classic blues instrument, the guitar. In the early years she sang with a band that usually consisted of a piano; trumpet, clarinet, or cornet; and occasionally percussion, drums, or a banjo.

Ida Cox was a unique woman blues singer—for one reason, because she wrote most of her own songs, including the classic “Wild Women Don’t Have the Blues” (1924). In addition, she had a strong sense of the music business. She produced all her own stage shows through her touring company, which she named Raising Cane. She also hired her own musicians.

During the 1930s Cox toured extensively but did not record much in the studios. In 1939, at the height of her career, she appeared in John Hammond’s revue From Spirituals to Swing at Carnegie Hall. In 1945, on-stage at the Moonglow Nightclub in Buffalo, New York, she suffered a stroke that would halt her singing career for fifteen years. In 1961, she recorded her final session, “Blues for Rampart Street,” with the legendary jazz musicians Coleman Hawkins, Milt Hinton, Roy Eldridge, and Jo Jones.

Biography

Ida Prather Cox was born on or around 25 February 1896 in Toccoa, Georgia. The precise date of her birth is disputed, as are details of her early childhood; but it is known that she left home and began singing in vaudeville shows at age fourteen. Cox recorded at least sixty-five records and hundreds of songs between 1923 and 1940 on various labels; she was called the “uncrowned queen of the blues” by Paramount Records when she sang for its label for six years in the early 1920s. In addition to the many songs she recorded under her own name, she recorded under pseudonyms such as Kate Lewis, Julia Powers, Velma Bradley, and Jane Smith. Throughout her thirty-five-year musical career, Cox she was also popular as a live performer. She died of cancer on 10 November 1967 in Knoxville, Tennessee, where she lived with her daughter and sang in the church choir.

ASALE ANGEL-AJANI

See also Armstrong, Louis; Blues; Blues: Women Performers; Morton, Jelly Roll; Oliver, Joseph “King”; Singers

Selected Works

- “Any Woman’s Blues.” Paramount, 1923.
- “Lawdy, Lawdy Blues.” Paramount, 1923.
- “I’ve Got the Blues for Rampart Street.” Paramount, 1923.
- “Wild Women Don’t Have the Blues.” Rosetta, 1924.
- “Coffin Blues.” Paramount, 1925.
- “Jail House Blues.” Paramount, 1929.
- “Four Day Creep.” Vocalion, 1939.
- “Blues for Rampart Street.” Riverside, 1961.

Further Reading

- Cowley, John, and Paul Oliver. The New Blackwell Guide to Recorded Blues. London: Blackwell, 1996.
- Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who’s Who: A Biographical Dictionary of Blues Singers. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1979.
- Oliver, Paul. Conversation With the Blues. London: Cambridge University Press, 1997. (First published 1965.)
- . The Story of the Blues. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 1998. (Reprint.)
- Santelli, Robert. The Big Book of the Blues. New York: Penguin, 2001.

Crescent Theater

The Crescent Theater, at 36–38 West 135th Street and Lenox Avenue, was built in 1909, slightly later than its rival, the Lincoln Theater. Because the Lincoln was considered a movie house with live entertainment added, the Crescent is generally acknowledged as the first black theater in Harlem. The Crescent was also considered more middle class, as opposed to the working-class Lincoln.

The creation of new venues for theater in Harlem was a major advance for black performers. In the words of James Weldon Johnson (1939/1991):

The Negro performer in New York, who had always been playing to white or predominantly white audiences, found himself in an entirely different psychological atmosphere. He found himself freed from a great many restraints and taboos that had cramped him for forty years. . . . Colored performers in New York experienced for the first time release from the restraining fears of what a white audience would stand for. (171)

The Crescent’s original white managers, Flugelman and Johnson, followed a policy of light entertainment featuring top-drawer black vaudeville acts from established groups or companies like Smart Set and Mr. Load of Kole. These were sometimes supported by promising local talent, such as the fourteen-year old Florence Mills with her sisters in the Mills Trio in 1910.

The middle-class orientation of the Crescent was demonstrated by the production, in 1911, of The Tryst, an opera by the black composer H. Lawrence Freeman. The Tryst dealt with a tragic theme and starred Freeman’s wife Carlotta, who later became prominent with the Lafayette Players.

Sometime in late 1911 or early 1912, the Crescent passed into the hands of two white liquor dealers, Martinson and Nibus. To compete with the Lincoln, they called on the talents of the comedian Eddie Hunter. He appeared regularly during 1912 and 1913 in sketches that involved commentary intercut with moving pictures—“talking pictures before they talked,” according to Hunter. His presentations “Goin’ to the Races” and “The Battle of Who Run” were highly successful.

The Crescent had also acquired a drama company, the Crescent Players. Their “Twenty Minutes in Hell,” featuring the comedian Emmett Anthony, shared the bill with Hunter’s “Battle of Who Run” in March 1913. Sometime in 1914, Clarence Muse and his wife, Ophelia, merged their own stock company with the Crescent Players. They starred in several plays, including Another Man's Wife.

In 1912, when the Lafayette Theater was built in Harlem, Martinson and Nibus leased it also. Though they used black acts, they sought to operate the Lafayette on a segregated basis; however, they soon found this impractical, and they relinquished the lease in 1914. The new operator appointed Lester Walton as manager, ending segregation. Before they left, Martinson and Nibus switched many acts, including Eddie Hunter's, away from the Crescent. The Muses also switched from the Crescent Players, initially to the short-lived Lincoln Players and ultimately to Anita Bush's new Lafayette Players. The Crescent now found itself squeezed between the Lincoln and the Lafayette. By 1915, the Crescent was out of business, and the Lafayette had become the vanguard of black drama. Nevertheless, in its brief tenure the Crescent had created vital opportunities for many developing black performers.

BILL EGAN

See also Black Manhattan; Blacks in Theater; Bush, Anita; Harlem: 3: Entertainment; Hunter, Eddie; Lafayette Players; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Mills, Florence; Muse, Clarence; Musical Theater; Theater; Vaudeville; Walton, Lester

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. Harlem: The Great Black Way. London: Orbis, 1982. (See "Towards a Black Theatre," p. 110.)
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1939. (Reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1991. See ch. 15, p. 170.)
- Mitchell, Lofton. Black Drama. New York: Hawthorn, 1967.
- . Voices of the Black Theatre. Clifton, N.J.: White, 1975. (See "The Words of Eddie Hunter.")
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. The African-American Theatre Directory, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1993. (See "Crescent Theatre, Harlem.")
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Blackface: A Source Book on Early Black Musical Shows. Metuchen, N.J., and London: Scarecrow, 1980.

Crisis, The

The Crisis—the monthly publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)—was the leading vehicle for bringing the grand ideas of the Harlem Renaissance to the provinces, and also for generating and reflecting those ideas. It occupied a central position in setting the agenda of the renaissance: social uplift, promoting literature and the arts, ensuring voting rights and equal funding for education, ending lynching, ending legalized segregation, and seeking equal treatment in the courts. The Crisis, situated at the center of the renaissance, served as a gathering place and a central distribution point for ideas; it printed news coming in from the provinces and then—through its nationwide distribution—spread that news throughout the country. Many observers considered its activities "agitation."

W. E. B. Du Bois served as the editor of The Crisis from its first issue, which appeared in November 1910, until he was forced to resign in 1934. In that first issue, he set the tone of the journal. The Crisis cataloged recent triumphs and defeats in regard to racial discrimination. It printed pages of news, broken down under headings such as political, education, social uplift, judicial decisions, science, and art. Du Bois told his readers in the first issue that the journal sought to alert the nation to the crying evil of racial prejudice. In its early years it printed articles by leading social reformers like Professor Franz Boas of Columbia University's anthropology department and Jane Addams of Chicago's Hull House. Other key contributors included Oswald Garrison Villard, Charles Edward Russell, Arthur Schomburg, and M. D. Maclean. In later years, mostly after 1915, the journal continued to include commentary by social scientists, but it also included more work on literature and the fine arts. With guidance from its literary editor, Jessie Fauset, it published work by Langston Hughes, Charles Chesnutt, Countee Cullen, and Claude McKay, and extensive excerpts from W. D. Howells and Mary White Ovington.

The Crisis provided a systematic critique of mainstream racial attitudes. Some articles articulated grievances; and in an editorial in April 1911, Du Bois identified five key problems: lack of opportunity to save money, local discrimination, discrimination in wages, mob violence, and legal violence. Much of the power of The Crisis came from its monthly catalog of injustices. An example is the case of Pink Franklin, who was serving a life sentence in a prison in South Carolina for killing a white man who had invaded Pink's house to try to enforce an arrest warrant; Franklin had violated South Carolina's "debt peonage" statute, which was subsequently struck down. The Crisis asked in February 1911: If a white man had committed a similar offense, would he ever have been convicted? In June 1916, an article entitled “Progressive Oklahoma” compared the rape of a black girl by a white man with a burglary committed by a black man in the same town on the same day: The rapist was free on bond, whereas the burglar was being severely punished.

Cover of the first issue of The Crisis. (Corbis.)

Other articles exposed the hypocrisy of white Americans’ attitudes. In November 1917, for instance, The Crisis pointed out contradictory statements in southern newspapers, such as a statement that blacks in Alabama were safe juxtaposed with a threat to punish any “Negro in any community who dares raise his hand against white men, no matter what the cause.” Such statements showed that newspapers often exaggerated stories, making blacks who defended themselves against attack appear to be criminals, and exonerating whites from culpability for crimes. In one article, The Crisis cataloged how newspapers called attention to crimes by black people but failed to note the race of criminals when no blacks were involved.

According to a story in The Crisis in April 1911, these tendencies of the white press manufactured prejudice.

Often, The Crisis provided sophisticated social science critiques of inequality. In a series of long articles in the 1920s, it explored differences in quality between white and black schools in the southern states. Through meticulous analysis of such issues as expenditures per pupil, these articles demonstrated the shameful lack of educational opportunity for black students. Side-by-side pictures of schools for blacks and whites, along with graphs and tables, brought home the reality of separate educational systems. Baltimore, where segregated housing was required by zoning laws, received extended treatment, such as an article in November 1911, “A Year of Segregation in Baltimore.”

Over the years, through close analysis of problems with voting rights, lynching, and legalized (or required) discrimination, Du Bois articulated a philosophy of equal treatment. This philosophy was captured in his statement in an article of April 1915: “The American negro demands equality—political equality, industrial equality, and social equality; and his is never going to rest satisfied with anything less.” The Crisis built many of its arguments around the idea of equal treatment. That idea was central to American jurisprudence and had extraordinary power; thus there were frequent articles summarizing discrimination in voting rights, discrimination by police officers and prosecutors, and the persistence of lynching. One particularly contentious issue was legislation preventing marriage between blacks and whites; an editorial in February 1913 urged that such laws stamped blacks as inferior to whites and left black women subject to exploitation by white men.

The campaign against lynching was one of the most important throughout Du Bois’s leadership of The Crisis. Lynching represented the worst breakdown of law; it also represented, according to a statement by James Weldon Johnson to the NAACP’s annual meeting (reported in the September 1927 issue), “the seizing of black America’s body and of white America’s soul.” Du Bois focused special attention on lynching, citing statistics, giving accounts of individual lynchings, and highlighting the complete failure of law enforcement agencies and prosecutors to punish lynchings. He also used photographs to attack lynching: These were a particularly compelling way to depict the gruesome details. White participants often took photos in order to celebrate lynchings (and then made postcards of these photos); Du Bois turned those same pictures to a different purpose. As he said in “Lynchers Triumphant” in December 1911, printing the photographs would show the world “what semi-barbarous America is doing.” Similarly, in July 1916, the article “The Waco Horror” combined sociological inquiry with appalling photographs. “Jesus Christ in Georgia,” published in December 1911, was a short story about a Christlike victim of a lynching.

As Congress was considering antilynching legislation, The Crisis printed legal analyses supporting such legislation. Lynching was the centerpiece of Du Bois’s campaign for a new understanding of the equal protection of the law; he asked that blacks as well as whites be given the protection of laws against lynching. Moreover, equal treatment under the law promised to improve the lives of blacks in general: It promised economic opportunities and opportunities in housing, business, and education.

The rhetoric of democracy that prevailed during World War I was a key component of Du Bois’s campaign for equal protection; he emphasized the differences in treatment that blacks received at home. However, under pressure from the NAACP and the war department, which had temporarily banned The Crisis from soldiers’ reading rooms, Du Bois published a brief editorial in July 1918, entitled “Close Ranks.” This editorial pointed out the benefits blacks could expect from defeating Germany and urged them to “close ranks” with whites and fight for democracy.

Still, Du Bois did not retreat from his demand for equal treatment; and after the war, his agitation landed him in trouble again. The post office delayed delivery of the May 1919 issue, which contained controversial material, including the article “Essay Toward a History of the Black Man in the Great War,” describing the heroism of black soldiers during the war and exposing their mistreatment. The editorial “Returning Soldiers” promised that, although blacks had closed ranks during the war, they were now ready to demand equal treatment. It contained the ominous statement “We return. We return from fighting. We return fighting.” A report to the U.S. Senate, “Radicalism and Sedition Among Negroes as Reflected in Their Publications,” prepared by J. Edgar Hoover, who was then a young lawyer, quoted this editorial as an example of the objectionable material in The Crisis. Hoover paid The Crisis and other black periodicals—such as A. Philip Randolph’s Messenger—the compliment of warning the Senate that “the influence of the Negro press” should not be “reckoned with lightly.”

In February 1919, Du Bois went to Paris for the Pan-African Conference, which he had largely coordinated and which he reported on in the issues of April and May. This conference laid out a broad agenda for self-determination for African nations and opportunities for educational and economic advancement, as well as basic protections such as public health and decent working conditions. Du Bois’s coverage of the conference marked a widening of focus for The Crisis, which now looked to Africa and the rest of the world, including Russia, Japan, and India.

The Crisis also celebrated the many triumphs of African Americans. Frequently, articles in The Crisis discussed legal victories: the United States Supreme Court’s invalidation of debt peonage in 1911, of the “grandfather provision” in Oklahoma in 1915, and of zoning that segregated cities in 1917; the Interstate Commerce Commission’s requirement of integration on certain railroad cars; and lower courts’ decisions invalidating other racially restrictive covenants and punishing police officers who turned prisoners over to lynch mobs. Some articles noted economic successes; there were accounts, with pictures, of successful black professionals, educational achievements, college and professional athletes, and advances in art and music. The record label Black Swan received attention, as did Josephine Baker. Even the advertisements in The Crisis emphasized opportunities for economic advancement. Insurance companies, banks, real estate companies, and clothiers appealed for customers; colleges and technical schools sought students. One can see how, through the pages of The Crisis, the Harlem Renaissance was pushing back many frontiers.

By the end of World War I, the circulation of The Crisis reached approximately 80,000 copies per month; in 1919, circulation peaked at just over 100,000. The Crisis resumed its radical stance, examining, for instance, mob violence against African Americans and the unequal treatment that they received at the hands of the police. The issue of October 1919—a particularly radical edition—gave an account of how the black community in Longview, Texas, had armed to protect itself against lynching after one black man was lynched there. A riot in which several whites died had ensued, but the article described the black community’s resort to “self help” in terms of admiration and concluded with a somber warning that “Negroes are not planning anything, but will defend themselves if attacked.”

Throughout the 1920s, The Crisis increased its coverage of literature, art, and African culture; modern art, portraits, and scenes of Egypt and other African civilizations often appeared on its covers. At the same time it continued its efforts against lynching, focusing on the vicious riots that took place from 1917 through 1921. The Crisis campaigned relentlessly to free black tenant farmers who had been sentenced to death following a particularly heinous attack on the black community around Elaine, Arkansas, in 1919. The campaign culminated with Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes's landmark decision in Moore v. Dempsey in 1923; in the issue of April of that year, Walter White wrote an article entitled "The Defeat of Arkansas Mob Law."

Du Bois' socialist attitudes had often caused problems with the board of the NAACP, and he angered the board further with two editorials in 1934: "Segregation" in January and an elaboration, "Segregation in the North," in April, which seemed to oppose integration. As a result, Du Bois tendered his resignation and was replaced by Roy Wilkins. Thereafter, The Crisis continued to be published, but without the intellectual leadership that had made it so important to the Harlem Renaissance. Du Bois had crisply described the hypocrisy of whites with regard to race and had identified inconsistencies in the nation's treatment of blacks and whites. His theme of equal treatment, developed persistently for twenty-four years, bore extraordinary fruit. It was ultimately adopted and extended by courts and legislatures, so that ideas expressed in The Crisis became central parts of American law and culture. Ralph Ellison, in his essay "What Would America Be Like Without Blacks," listed contributions by African Americans to American culture; one is tempted to add to that list "the idea of equal protection under law." When Du Bois resigned, the board of the NAACP said that his ideas, particularly as expressed in The Crisis, had "transformed the Negro world as well as a large portion of the liberal white world, so that the whole problem of the relation of black and white races has ever since had a completely new orientation."

ALFRED L. BROPHY

See also Antilynching Crusade; Baker, Josephine; Black Swan Phonograph Company; Boas, Franz; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Messenger, The; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pan-African Congresses; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Villard, Oswald Garrison; specific writers

Further Reading

- Investigation Activities of the Department of Justice, Sixty-sixth Congress, First Session. Senate Docs., 153, 1919.
- Jordan, William G. Black Newspapers and America's War for Democracy, 1914–1920. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.
- Kornweibel, Theodore, Jr. Seeing Red: Federal Campaigns Against Black Militancy, 1919–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.
- Lewis, David Levering, ed. W. E. B. Du Bois: A Reader. New York: Holt, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
- Litwack, Leon. Trouble in Mind: Black Southerners in the Age of Jim Crow. New York: Vintage, 1998.
- Washburn, Patrick S. A Question of Sedition: The Federal Government's Investigation of the Black Press During World War II. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Crisis, The: Literary Prizes

The Crisis, the monthly magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), was first published in 1910. Its first editor was W. E. B. Du Bois, who was director of publicity and research when the NAACP was established, also in 1910, and who would remain the editor until 1934. Du Bois used the magazine to champion the rights of American blacks and people of color worldwide, but he also emphasized the promotion of African American arts—literature, music, fine art, and drama. His efforts with regard to the arts helped launch the careers of many figures who are now considered leaders of the Harlem Renaissance, including Zora Neale Hurston, Jean Toomer, Gwendolyn Bennett, and Anne Spencer.

The Crisis promoted the arts in various ways. First, through the arts it presented issues having to do with politics and social and civil rights. Second, it encouraged its readers to participate in and celebrate the arts. Third, it offered discussions of various aspects of the arts: art as propaganda, appropriate subjects for writing, appropriate styles of writing, and ways of portraying blacks in art. All these issues were debated between the covers of the magazine during the early decades of the twentieth century. Fourth, the well-known novelist, poet, and essayist Jessie Fauset was the literary editor of The Crisis from 1919 to 1926, and under her leadership many writers of the Harlem Renaissance were introduced to American audiences. Fifth—and of particular importance—The Crisis showcased the arts by sponsoring literary contests.

The Amy Spingarn Contest in Literature and Art was named for its benefactor, the poet Amy E. Spingarn, who was the wife of Joel Spingarn, the literary critic and chair of the NAACP from 1914 to 1919. The Spingarns were responsible for funding the first two literary contests. Amy Spingarn donated $600 in 1925 and 1926 for first-, second-, and third-place winners in fiction, drama, poetry, essays, and artwork. In 1927, she provided $350 for the literary prizes, while women's and commercial groups donated more than $1,600 for further literary awards. These additional patrons wanted the entries to have more themes related to finances and insurance, and to offer examples of financial industriousness among American blacks.

Judges of the contests included respected black and white writers such as Charles Chesnutt, Sinclair Lewis, H. G. Wells, James Weldon Johnson, William Stanley Braithwaite, Eugene O'Neill, and Du Bois himself. Winners included Arna Bontemps, Countee Cullen, Aaron Douglas, Rudolph Fisher, and Langston Hughes. In the poetry contest of 1926, for example, Arna Bontemps won the first prize of $100 for "A Nocturne at Bethesda," and Countee Cullen won second prize for "Thoughts in a Zoo."

The entries and judges declined in stature in 1927, and the annual contests were ended in 1928. Thereafter, Amy Spingarn and the business groups awarded the Charles Waddell Chesnutt Honoraria of $50 each for the best poetry and short story published each month. They also planned to have monthly economic prizes, but these were never actually awarded, owing to the small number of participants.

Another prominent editor, Charles S. Johnson of the National Urban League's magazine, Opportunity, also encouraged young black writers by offering cash prizes for literature. In addition, both The Crisis and Opportunity were very generous about publishing the work of aspiring writers; Du Bois also included in The Crisis the judges' remarks about the winning entries. Thus, although the contests sponsored by these magazines were of relatively short duration initially—about three years—they were important vehicles for talented figures of the Harlem Renaissance.

At The Crisis, literary prizes returned in the 1930s, funded by Louise Mathews, the mother-in-law of Oliver La Farge, the trustee of the awards, who wanted them to be called the Du Bois Literary Prizes. Each year, $1,000 was to be awarded; the rotating categories were prose fiction, prose nonfiction, and poetry. In 1932, no prize was given for prose fiction, because no entry was considered suitable. In 1933, the award for prose nonfiction was given to James Weldon Johnson's Black Manhattan (1930). In 1934, no award was given for poetry, because Du Bois resigned from The Crisis that year, and the awards were closely associated with him. When Roy Wilkins became the editor of The Crisis in 1934, the NAACP asserted its editorial control and insisted on reducing the magazine's literary content. Thereafter, The Crisis was never as essential an outlet for literary talent as it had been during the Harlem Renaissance.

LOU-ANN CROUTHER

See also Bennett, Gwendolyn; Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Hurston, Zora Neale; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Opportunity Literary Contests; Spencer, Anne; Spingarn, Joel; Toomer, Jean; other specific writers

Further Reading

- Andrews, William L., Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, eds. The Oxford Companion to African-American Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Aptheker, Herbert, ed. The Correspondence of W. E. B. Du Bois, Vol. 1, Selections, 1877–1934. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1973.
- Daniel, Walter C. Black Journals of the United States. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982.
- Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Johnson, Abby Arthur, and Ronald Mayberry Johnson. Propaganda and Aesthetics: The Literary Politics of Afro-American Magazines in the Twentieth Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1979.
- Kramer, Victor A., and Robert A. Russ, eds. Harlem Renaissance Re-Examined: A Revised and Expanded Edition. Troy, N.Y.: Whitson, 1997.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. Toronto: Random House of Canada; New York: Knopf, 1981.

Moon, Henry Lee. "History of 'The Crisis.'" Crisis, 77(9), 1987.

Crisis, The: The Negro In Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium

W. E. B. Du Bois did not set out to transform The Crisis into the premier African American literary journal, but under his editorial leadership it became one of the most important showcases for the early work of many young writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Du Bois viewed this new literature in terms of its potential for improving race relations. An extended example of his view of literature as a tool for racial progress begins with his editorial in February 1926 issue of The Crisis, in which he calls for a symposium, "The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?," and lists seven questions. These questions were reprinted with each of the seven installments of the symposium appearing in the journal in the months that followed:

1. When the artist, black or white, portrays Negro characters, is he under any obligations or limitations as to the sort of character he will portray?
2. Can any author be criticized for painting the worst or the best characters of a group?
3. Can publishers be criticized for refusing to handle novels that portray Negroes of education and accomplishment, on the ground that these characters are no different from white folk and therefore not interesting?
4. What are Negroes to do when they are continually painted at their worst and judged by the public as they are painted?
5. Does the situation of the educated Negro in America with its pathos, humiliation, and tragedy call for artistic treatment at least as sincere and sympathetic as "Porgy" received?
6. Is not the continual portrayal of the sordid, foolish, and criminal among Negroes convincing the world that this and this alone is really and essentially Negroid, and preventing white artists from knowing any other types and preventing black artists from daring to paint them?

7. Is there not a real danger that young colored writers will be tempted to follow the popular trend in portraying Negro characters in the underworld rather than seeking to paint the truth about themselves and their own social class?

These questions reflected Du Bois's legitimate concerns about the effect of white patronage on African American art and about the reinforcement of negative images of black people in the white popular imagination, but what begins in this symposium as a call to dialogue ends in rhetorical posturing. The first three, open-ended questions are followed by two that assume a particular stance toward recent literature and its impact on public opinion (question 4, for instance, implies that African Americans indeed were being "continually painted at their worst" and that they were viewed accordingly by a large number of readers). The list then ends with two closed-ended questions. Several participants in the symposium openly criticized the formulation of the questions. H. L. Mencken replied that the fifth question was "simply rhetorical"; Alfred A. Knopf found the third one "to be senseless" and the others rarely to deserve more than a one-word reply.

The symposium included an impressive list of names, and many of the responses deserve closer attention. As the first contributor to the first installment, Carl Van Vechten did not address the questions directly, but his reply anticipated the speech of the white editor in his novel Nigger Heaven; he argues that the "wealth of novel, exotic, picturesque material" found in lower-class African American life will be used to the point of exhaustion by the white artist unless the African American succeeds in representing it in art first. Other white intellectuals and artists, addressing Du Bois's questions more systematically, agreed with Van Vechten that the black artist should be free to choose any subject matter. Mencken stated that the artist should be "under no obligations or limitations whatsoever." Vachel Lindsay rejected the idea of obligations and maintained that the artist must only be "honest." DuBose Heyward also held that the "sincere artist" is not obligated in any way and that art "destroys itself as soon as it is made a vehicle for propaganda." Julia Peterkin agreed: "The minute anyone becomes an advocate he ceases to be an artist." The "true artist, black or white," Peterkin continued, "will search for these tokens of racial worth and weave around them his contribution to literature."

Black writers were far less unified in their responses. In his brief reply, Langston Hughes—like the white respondents—insisted on the freedom of the “true literary artist.” Similarly, Walter White maintained that “the artist should be allowed full freedom in the choice of his characters and material.” Other black writers, however, identified more closely with Du Bois’s concerns. Jessie Fauset was in emphatic agreement with the implication of Du Bois’s final question, regarding pressures on the young black writer to portray only the sordid side of black life. She added: “This is a grave danger making for a literary insincerity both insidious and abominable.” Countee Cullen’s response was more measured but still in line with Du Bois’s concerns: “Negro artists have a definite duty to perform in this matter [of reconstructing the image of black people in literature], one which should supersede their individual prerogatives without denying their rights.” Cullen also noted that the young black writer should choose material freely, even from among lower-class blacks, but he then added “only let him not pander to the popular trend of seeing no cleanliness in their squalor, no nobleness in their meanness, and no commonsense in their ignorance.”

The varied responses to the questions in this symposium mirror a larger debate in the Harlem Renaissance about the responsibilities and freedoms of the African American artist and the proper roles of white critics and publishers. In its May 1926 issue, The Crisis carried the third grouping of responses to the questions and announced briefly that Jessie Fauset had stepped down from her position as the journal’s literary editor. The fourth installment of the symposium coincided with the publication of Langston Hughes’s essay “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain” in The Nation (23 June 1926), in which Hughes most famously develops his position on the responsibilities and freedoms of the African American writer. Along with the second-to-last set of responses (October 1926), Du Bois issued his own manifesto on blacks’ creative production, “Criteria of Negro Art,” in which he famously asserts: “All art is propaganda and ever must be, despite the wailing of the purists. . . . I do not care a damn for any art that is not used for propaganda.” In the December 1926 issue of The Crisis (the issue following the last of the set of printed responses to the symposium), Du Bois published his scathing review of Carl Van Vechten’s novel Nigger Heaven (1926). Subsequent novels by others, including Julia Peterkin’s Black April (1927) and Claude McKay’s Home to Harlem (1928), also drew Du Bois’s sharp criticism for their unsavory representations of African American life.

The symposium “The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed?” remains of interest as an example of Du Bois’s concerns about literary tastes and publishing trends and as a concise record of the views of many other artists and intellectuals important to the Harlem Renaissance.

JAMES B. KELLEY

See also Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Heyward, DuBoise; Knopf, Alfred A.; Lindsay, Vachel; Mencken, H. L.; Nigger Heaven; Peterkin, Julia Mood; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

Kelley, James. “Blossoming in Strange New Forms: Male Homosexuality and the Harlem Renaissance.” Soundings, 80(4), Winter 1997.

“The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed—A Symposium.” Crisis, 31(4), February 1926; 31(5), March 1926; 31(6), April 1926; 32(1), May 1926; 32(2), June 1926; 32(4), August 1926; 32(5), September 1926; 33(1), November 1926.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.

Cullen, Countee

Concerning Countee Cullen (1903–1946), there is a sense of expectations unfulfilled. Cullen was one of the most respected poets of the Harlem Renaissance; but although the publication of Color in 1925 announced a young poet full of promise and potential, this first volume would turn out to be his best, so much so that critics and Cullen himself often noted the underachievement of his subsequent publications. As the author of several evocative and poignant lines about not only African Americans but also “universal” topics, such as life, death, and love, Cullen demands more serious appraisal and evaluation than he has yet received.

Cullen’s early background consists of puzzling ambiguities. There is, for example, some discrepancy about the place of his birth: Louisville, Kentucky; Baltimore, Maryland; and New York City have all been cited at various times. In addition, little is known about his real parents. Records suggest that as a young child he lived with his grandmother. After she died, he lived with Rev. Frederick A. and Carolyn Cullen of New York. By 1918, when he may have been adopted by the Cullens, he identified himself as Countee P. Cullen; and eventually he called himself simply Countee Cullen.

Cullen had a classic literary education that influenced his poetry. He attended Dewitt Clinton High School, and his first published poems appeared in the high school literary journal, The Magpie, of which he was the associate editor during his senior year. He attended New York University from 1921 to 1925, after which he received his master's degree in English and French from Harvard University. From 1926 to 1928, Cullen wrote an editorial and book review column for Opportunity magazine called "The Dark Tower."

In April 1928, Cullen married Nina Yolande Du Bois, the daughter of W. E. B. Du Bois; Rev. Frederick A. Cullen performed the ceremony, which was well publicized, at his church. This union of two young members of the "talented tenth" appeared to be successful. Nina Yolande Du Bois received her master's degree from Columbia University and taught art and English at Frederick Douglass High School in Baltimore, and Cullen had recently won a Guggenheim fellowship; this fellowship sent him to France, and Yolande followed later. However, they divorced in March 1930 after being married for less than two years. Cullen was married again in 1940, to Ida Mae Roberson, whose scrapbooks concerning her husband have offered a wealth of information for scholars.

Cullen was a successful writer of sonnets, and the early nineteenth-century English poet John Keats was his model. But Cullen's usual choice of subject matter has tended to draw harsh criticism. Huggins (1971) described Cullen as "forever true" to a "genteel" strait-jacket (211), and Shucard (1984) said that "Cullen's voice sometimes sounds effete" (16). Cullen himself held his writings to a high standard. His own definition of "good poetry" expresses his idealistic criteria:

[G]ood poetry is a lofty thought beautifully expressed. . . . Poetry should not be too intellectual; it should deal more . . . with the emotions. The highest type of poem is that which warmly stirs the emotions, which awakens a responsive chord in the human heart. Poetry, like music, depends upon feeling rather than intellect, although there should of course be enough to satisfy the mind, too. (quoted in Perry 1971, 29)

Perhaps because of his artistic ideals, Cullen explicitly rejected a poetic identification solely with African Americans; in this, he differed from his contemporaries Claude McKay and Langston Hughes, who both made explicit references to their racial background (in McKay's case, that background was Caribbean). Cullen (1927) revealed his reluctance to be identified only as a "Negro poet" in the preface to an anthology he edited, Caroling Dusk:

I have called this collection an anthology of verse by Negro poets rather than an anthology of Negro verse, since this latter designation would be more confusing than accurate. . . . The attempt to corral the outbursts of the ebony muse into some definite mold to which all poetry by Negroes will conform seems altogether futile and aside from the facts. . . . As heretical as it may sound, there is the probability that Negro poets, dependent as they are on the English language, may have more to gain from the rich background of English and American poetry than from any nebulous atavistic yearnings toward an African inheritance. (xi)

These comments reveal the extent to which Cullen perceived the primitive as an unwelcome, anachronistic legacy for black people. Indeed, one of Cullen's best-known poems, "Heritage," evokes the divided response of the African American to his African past. Cullen's more "universal" poems were attempts not to deny his racial background but to assert the poet's right to compose lines on subjects not explicitly dealing with race:

Must we, willy-nilly, be forced into writing of the old atavistic urges, the more savage and none too beautiful aspects of our lives? May we not chant a hymn to the Sun God if we will, create a bit of phantasy in which not a spiritual or a blues appears, write a tract defending Christianity, though its practitioners aid us so little in our argument; in short do, write, create what we will, our only concern being that we do it well and with all the power in us? (1929, 373)

Cullen perceived the interest of the (usually white) public in the primitive and the salacious as a limitation for the black writer. Indeed, in his review of Langston Hughes's first book of poems, The Weary Blues, Cullen (1926) expressed a belief that Hughes was indulging in sensuality. He said, for instance, that Hughes's jazz poems "tend to hurl this poet into the gaping pit that lies before all Negro writers, in the confines of which they become racial artists rather than artists pure and simple. There is too much emphasis here on strictly Negro themes" (74). For Cullen, Hughes' "spontaneous" poems coincided too well with the public's expectations of blackness.

Although Cullen resisted the title "black poet," some of his most memorable and most often anthologized poems are those that deal with the experience of race. In addition to "Heritage," other well-known poems such as "Incident," "Uncle Jim," and "From the Dark Tower" continue to resonate with readers decades after they were first published. The sonnet "Yet Do I Marvel," contains the classic couplet "Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:/To make a poet black and bid him sing!" One of Cullen's later poems, "Karengé Ya Marengé" (1942), evokes the frustrated desire for liberty that impelled the leader Mohandas Gandhi:

Is Indian speech so quaint, so weak, so rude,
So like its land enslaved, denied, and crude,
That men who claim they fight for liberty
Can hear this battle-shout impassively . . . ?

Cullen also wrote several long, narrative poems. The Black Christ was the story of a lynching, and The Ballad of the Brown Girl told the story of a young maiden whose lover leaves her for another.

Cullen's novel One Way to Heaven (1932) is sometimes taken as a response to Carl Van Vechten's novel of Harlem, Nigger Heaven (1926). Though frequently dismissed in favor of his poetry, One Way to Heaven does exhibit Cullen's strong writing skills. The opening chapter, for example, offers a quite dramatic and perceptive description of an African American church revival. In addition, Cullen's emphasis on a lower-class black couple, the usually unemployed Sam Lucas and the maid Mattie Johnson, makes this work stand out from the other novels of the period that dealt with the educated members of the talented tenth or with the familiar issue of racial passing. Unlike Van Vechten's Scarlet Creeper in Nigger Heaven, Sam, with his illegal escapes, inspires the reader's comprehension and sympathy.

Less known though equally intriguing are Cullen's children's stories: My Lives and How I Lost Them, about the adventures of a cat; and The Lost Zoo, about the animals that missed the opportunity to board Noah's ark. Cullen apparently had a strong interest in cats: He "cowrote" these children's books with a feline, Mr. Christopher Cat.

From 1934 until his death, Cullen taught French and English at Frederick Douglass High School in New York, where the young James Baldwin was one of his students. At the time Cullen died, he was in the process of collecting what he considered his best poems; this collection was published posthumously as On These I Stand. One of his other final projects was his work with Arna Bontemps on a dramatic version of Bontemps's novel God Sends Sunday. It was produced as Saint Louis Woman several months after Cullen's death.

One of the more recent issues in scholarship on Countee Cullen has been his sexual orientation. When Cullen left the United States on his Guggenheim fellowship, his best friend, Harold Jackman, went with him; there has been speculation that the two may have been lovers. Cullen's poem "Tableau" (1925) may support these conjectures: It presents two boys, one black and one white, "locked arm in arm." Although passersby are "indignant that these two should dare/In unison to walk," the boys are "oblivious to look and word." However, Early (1991) notes that "nothing conclusive" has been presented to substantiate these claims (19, n. 21), and Cullen did have a strong relationship with second wife, Ida. In brief, there are some scholars who take Cullen's homosexuality as a given, whereas others have been more resistant to this idea.

Countee Cullen in Central Park, New York, 1941. (Library of Congress.)

Cullen died 9 January 1946, never having produced another volume that would receive as much critical acclaim as his first, Color. Bontemps (1947) noted that "Cullen did not live to see another springtime resurgence of his own creative powers comparable with the impulse that produced the first three books of poetry, the books which give his selected poems most of their lilt and brightness" (44). Nor has Cullen received as much retrospective attention as other writers of the Harlem Renaissance, such as Hughes. As Early (1991) suggests, this may have more to do with "the dynamics and politics of the making of a black literary reputation" (6) than with the perception that Cullen's writing is not worthy of new criticism. Although Cullen has been criticized for not being bolder in experimenting with his gift, he was unequalled in his talent for creating what one can politely call the formal poetry of the Harlem Renaissance.

Biography

The poet Countee P. Cullen (originally named Countee Porter) was born in 1903; the place of his birth is not certain, and little is known of his parents. He evidently lived with a grandmother; after her death, he lived with Rev. Frederick A. and Carolyn Cullen of New York, who may have adopted him by 1918. He then identified himself as Countee P. Cullen, and eventually simply as Countee Cullen. He attended Dewitt Clinton High School, and his first published poems appeared in its literary journal. He attended New York University (1921–1925) and then received a master's degree in English and French from Harvard University. In 1926–1928, he wrote an editorial and book review column, "The Dark Tower," for Opportunity magazine. In April 1928, he married Nina Yolande Du Bois, the daughter of W. E. B. Du Bois; this marriage ended in divorce in March 1930, and in 1940, he married Ida Mae Roberson. In addition to poetry, Cullen wrote a novel and children's stories. From 1934 to his death in 1946, he taught French and English at Frederick Douglass High School in New York.

MIRIAM THAGGERT

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Bontemps, Arna; Color; Cullen, Frederick Asbury; Cullen–Du Bois Wedding; Guggenheim Fellowships; Homosexuality; Hughes, Langston; Jackman, Harold; Literature: 7—Poetry; McKay, Claude; Primitivism; Talented Tenth; Van Vechten, Carl; specific works

Selected Works

- The Ballad of the Brown Girl: An Old Ballad Retold*. New York: Harper, 1927.
- The Black Christ and Other Poems*. New York: Harper, 1929.
- Color*. New York: Harper, 1925.
- Copper Sun*. New York: Harper, 1927.
- Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets*. New York: Harper, 1927.
- The Medea, and Some Poems*. New York: Harper, 1935.
- On These I Stand: An Anthology of the Best Poems of Countee Cullen*. New York: Harper, 1947.
- One Way to Heaven*. New York: Harper, 1932.

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna. "The Harlem Renaissance." Saturday Review of Literature, 22 March 1947, pp. 12 ff.
- Cullen, Countee. "Poet on Poet." Opportunity, February 1926, p. 73.
- . "Countee Cullen on Miscegenation." Crisis, November 1929, p. 373.
- Early, Gerald, ed. My Soul's High Song: The Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Doubleday, 1991.
- Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Perry, Margaret. A Bio-Bibliography of Countee Cullen, 1903–1946. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1971.
- Shucard, Alan R. Countee Cullen. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1984.

Cullen, Frederick Asbury

Frederick Asbury Cullen served for forty-two years as minister of Salem Methodist Episcopal Church in Harlem, but he is now remembered primarily as the foster father of the poet Countee Cullen. Having unofficially adopted the teenage Countee Porter, Cullen and his wife, Carolyn, raised the boy and introduced him to Harlem's prestigious social circles, which would eventually celebrate him as Harlem's poet laureate. Frederick Cullen promoted his son's achievements as any father might do, attending readings and reprinting two of his son's poems in his self-published autobiography. Yet Frederick Cullen's significance hardly turned solely on his son's prestige. Indeed, as a minister, Cullen was clearly a more influential figure in Harlem than a poet could ever hope to be.

Arriving in 1902, Frederick Cullen began a ministry to Harlem under the aegis of Saint Mark's Methodist Episcopal Church. The Salem mission began with a service attended by three women, who left nineteen cents in the offering plate. But riding the wave of the "great migration," and inspired by Cullen's indefatigable evangelism, Salem swelled to more than 2,500 members by the 1920s. Along with churches such as Abyssinian Baptist, Salem became one of the most significant social institutions in Harlem, and its minister one of the most influential leaders. Prodded by Cullen, Salem began a variety of social ministries. Further, unlike some ministers, who catered to the tastes of the black bourgeoisie, Cullen changed the culture of worship at Salem in order to welcome southern immigrants. For instance, at the risk of some ridicule, he welcomed the flamboyant evangelist George W. Becton to his pulpit.

While insisting that the ultimate cure for Harlem's social ills was conversion to Christianity, Cullen also participated energetically in the political events of his day. He helped organize the Silent Parade of 1919 and headed a delegation to President Woodrow Wilson to protest against the execution of black soldiers following riots in Brownsville, Texas. Cullen was also an early member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); he served as president of the Harlem chapter and helped send W. E. B. Du Bois to the first Pan-African Congress. Thus, while Cullen's ideology and path to leadership mark him as a member of a more conservative generation of black leaders, he can also be seen as an early prototype of New Negro activism, paving the path for his son and other writers of the Harlem Renaissance.

This having been said, it remains true that Cullen's most direct significance to the Harlem Renaissance was through his influence on his son. A vigorous proponent of the traditional moral strictures of Methodism, Frederick Cullen often preached against the vices and entertainments of Harlem that he feared would lead his flock astray. Clearly, Frederick Cullen's devotion accounted for much of Countee Cullen's self-proclaimed struggle between his "Christian upbringing" and the "pagan inclination" that he associated with poetry, with Africa, and with his homoerotic desires. Some commentators have suggested that the younger Cullen's struggle reflected tension having to do with Frederick Cullen's own ambiguous sexuality. Nevertheless, the son deeply appreciated his father's benevolence, penning several poems in his father's praise. The two remained lifelong companions, often traveling together to Europe and the Middle East. This intimate bond was symbolized when father and son died in the same year, 1946.

Biography

Frederick Asbury Cullen was born c. 1868 in Somerset County, Maryland. He was educated in Somerset County public schools and at Maryland State Normal School (later Towson University); he studied theology at Morgan College (1901). Cullen was converted to Christianity at Sharp Street Methodist Church in Baltimore, Maryland, in September 1894; he was ordained as a minister in Delaware County, Maryland, in 1900. He served as minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Catlin, Maryland (1900–1902) and of Salem Methodist Episcopal Church (later Salem United Methodist) in Harlem (1902–1944). He served as president of the Harlem branch of the NAACP and helped organize the National Urban League (1910). Cullen died 25 May 1946.

PETER POWERS

See also Abyssinian Baptist Church; Becton, George Wilson; Cullen, Countee; Lynching: Silent Protest Parade; National Urban League; Saint Mark's Methodist Episcopal Church

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1982.
- Cullen, Frederick Asbury. From Barefoot Town to Jerusalem. N.d.
- Early, Gerald, Introduction. In My Soul's High Song: Collected Writings of Countee Cullen, Voice of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Doubleday, 1991.
- . "About Countee Cullen's Life and Career." In Modern American Poetry: An Online Journal and Multimedia Companion to Anthology of Modern American

Poetry, ed. Cary Nelson. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000. (Web site.)

Sernett, Milton C. Bound for the Promised Land: African-American Religion and the Great Migration. Durham, N.C., and London: Duke University Press, 1997.

Cullen—Du Bois Wedding

The wedding of Yolande Du Bois (1900–1961) and Countee Cullen took place on Easter Monday, 9 April 1928, at Salem Methodist Episcopal Church in Harlem. It had the aura of a royal wedding and became known as the single most important social event of the Harlem Renaissance. Yolande Du Bois, who was then twenty-five, was the only surviving child of the scholar and activist William Edward Burghardt (W. E. B.) Du Bois and his wife, Nina; she had been educated at Fisk University and was a teacher in the Baltimore public school system. Countee Cullen, then twenty-four, was one of the leading poets in the Harlem Renaissance (“Yet Do I Marvel” is among his best-known poems) and was one of the rare artists of the period who had actually grown up in Harlem; he was the adopted son of Rev. Frederick Cullen and Frederick’s wife, Carolyn.

It appears that Yolande Du Bois and Countee Cullen had been introduced in the mid-1920s by Cullen’s best friend, Harold Jackman, a debonair and charming man about town who encouraged their acquaintance. The courtship was somewhat rocky. With the support of her father, Cullen proposed to Yolande Du Bois during the Christmas holiday season of 1927; then, Cullen and W. E. B. Du Bois spent the next few months planning the wedding, with some input from her.

Extensive coverage by the African American press kept readers informed of virtually every detail of the wedding. Everything associated with the wedding was news—including the special rail car used to transport Yolande Du Bois and her bridesmaids from Baltimore, and Countee Cullen’s receipt of the marriage license four days before the ceremony so as to not be inconvenienced by any potential closing of the office for the Easter holiday. On the day of the wedding, the church was overcrowded, perhaps because of a banner headline that had appeared in the Baltimore Afro-American on the Saturday before—“5,000 to See Her Married Monday”—above a large photograph of Yolande Du Bois. There were actually 1,200 invited guests, but 3,000 people attended the ceremony. This seems to have put Frederick Cullen, the minister who was to perform the marriage, in an awkward position; he was compelled to state “This isn’t my wedding!”—explaining that the bride’s parents were in charge of it and that he himself could not include additional guests. Yolande Du Bois was attended by sixteen bridesmaids. Countee Cullen was attended by nine groomsmen, including Edward Perry, Langston Hughes, Arna Bontemps, and Sydney Peterson; Harold Jackman served as his best man. After the wedding, the couple left New York City on Tuesday, 10 April 1928, for visits to Philadelphia; Atlantic City, New Jersey; and Great Barrington, Massachusetts. By the following week both were back at their jobs in New York City and Baltimore, respectively; however, their brief honeymoon was followed by a more extensive vacation later that summer.

Gossip spread when the African American press reported that Countee Cullen and Harold Jackman left for Europe in June 1928 and then that Yolande Cullen joined her husband in August. By September–October, W. E. B. Du Bois was counseling his son-in-law on maintaining the marriage. Presumably, the issue was not Yolande Cullen’s inexperience or her ways as a spoiled child but rather that Countee Cullen eventually admitted his preference for men, and the marriage was over. The separation and divorce were negotiated by Countee Cullen and W. E. B. Du Bois. The divorce became final in France in the spring of 1930.

JACQUELINE C. JONES

See also Cullen, Countee; Cullen, Frederick Asbury; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Jackman, Harold

Further Reading

- Belles, A. Gilbert. “Du Bois: The Father.” Crisis, November 1980, pp. 389–391.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. “So the Girl Marries.” Crisis, June 1928, pp. 192–193, 207–209.
- . “Dr. Du Bois, 93, Writes Daughter’s Obituary.” Baltimore Afro American, 18 March 1961.
- Ferguson, Blanche. Countee Cullen and the Negro Renaissance. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1966.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Random House, 1981.

———. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.

Shucard, Alan. Countee Cullen. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1984.

Cultural Organizations

A wide range of cultural organizations existed during the Harlem Renaissance to support the arts. They functioned in both formal and informal capacities. Black institutions such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the National Urban League gave significant support to the arts, although their main purposes were broader social and political missions. Public libraries served as informal community centers; the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library (now known as the Countee Cullen Regional Branch) was a central gathering place during the 1920s, with a series of forums that attracted a wide audience. Groups such as the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) located in black neighborhoods offered cultural events and provided spaces for plays and exhibitions. Wealthy white philanthropists ran foundations that benefited black artists directly. Last, interested African American individuals sponsored culture broadly within the black community.

Black associations played a critical role in encouraging young African American writers, artists, and musicians. Although not specifically created as cultural organizations, the National Urban League and the NAACP celebrated literature and the fine arts and recognized the achievements of African Americans through award programs. The magazines of both these organizations, Opportunity and The Crisis, published significant amounts of poetry and art by up-and-coming African Americans. In 1914, Joel E. Spingarn, chairman of the board of the NAACP, established the Spingarn Medal; it was given annually to an African American of note who had made significant contributions in "any field of elevated or honorable human endeavor." A decade later, Spingarn's wife, Amy Spingarn, established the Amy Spingarn Prizes for literature and the arts. The awards were announced in The Crisis, and the magazine sponsored the first awards ceremony at a dinner at the Renaissance Casino at 138th Street in August 1925. Several months earlier, the National Urban League sponsored the Opportunity Literary Contest, which gave prizes for short stories, poetry, and drama. The first Opportunity awards were given in May 1925 at a dinner at the Fifth Avenue Restaurant. Among the winners were Zora Neale Hurston, Langston Hughes, and Countee Cullen, all young writers who formed the epicenter of the Harlem Renaissance.

Although it was not so well recognized in this regard, Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) published literature and poetry in its official weekly newspaper, Negro World, and sponsored literary clubs for its members. Negro World was an outlet for the young Zora Neale Hurston and Eric Walrond and for other aspiring writers from Africa, the Caribbean, and Central America. Branches of the UNIA established literary clubs in Boston, Portland (Oregon), Norfolk (Virginia), Philadelphia, and New York as well as in Montreal, Cuba, and the West Indies. These clubs arranged for members to attend concerts, poetry readings, and plays and participate in debates. Members of the UNIA frequently held functions at the 135th Street Library. The Booklovers Club met regularly at this library, and intellectuals associated with the UNIA presented lectures on topics such as "Negro Prose Writers," "Books and How to Read Them," and "Nordic Culture and the Negro" (Martin 1983).

The 135th Street Library was created with funds from Andrew Carnegie (he had donated $5.2 million to New York City to build sixty-seven library branches, which were completed between 1901 and 1929). It opened on 14 January 1905 in a three-story classical revival building, designed by McKim, Mead, and White, with large windows, a wood-paneled vestibule, round plaster columns, and a main staircase with iron railings. The location of the 135th Street branch was central to its success: The 135th Street YMCA, Harlem Hospital, Abyssinian Baptist Church, and an elementary school were located within a radius of a few blocks.

The 135th Street Library was a repository for African and African American materials and an important place for the study of black culture. In 1920, Ernestine Rose was appointed librarian, with Catherine Allen Latimer as assistant librarian. Latimer, the first black librarian hired by the New York Public Library, began to create clipping files on black history and established a separate collection of books on African American life. Rose and Latimer eventually established, on the third floor of the library, a separate reference collection called the Division of Negro History. In 1926, the New York Public Library, with a $10,000 gift from the Carnegie Corporation, purchased the bibliophile Arthur Schomburg's collection of rare books, prints, and manuscripts, making this division one of the most significant collections of such materials in the United States.

In the evenings, the 135th Street Library was alive with activity; it was a facility where one could see African American art and attend various cultural events. Rose, with the assistance of Jessie Fauset, Ethel Ray Nance, and Gwendolyn Bennett, organized poetry readings, book discussions, and other literary activities at the library. The 135th Street Library also lent its space for the annual Harmon Foundation exhibits. Writing about the importance of local library branches, Rose said that "the function of a library in any community is to act as a natural center for the development of the community's intellectual life" (Sinnette 1989). In the pursuit of this development of the mind, the library sponsored a Library Forum. One such forum took place in March 1923 with Countee Cullen, Bennett, Langston Hughes, Sadie Peterson, and the sculptor Augusta Savage reciting their poetry, Eric Walrond reading a short story, and Arthur Schomburg sitting in the audience (Martin 1983).

The "colored branches" of the YMCA also provided spaces for exhibitions, concerts, lectures, and literary and educational programs. African Americans had a long history of participation in the YMCA, which was established in the United States in 1852. Although the YMCA focused primarily on improving the spiritual and intellectual life of its members, its "colored branches" served broader goals in the African American community. The Washington, D.C., YMCA, one of the oldest branches in the nation, articulated the mission as the "mental, moral, and spiritual improvement of our race" (Mjagkij 1994). In segregated America, the "colored branches" offered, among other things, swimming pools, gymnasiums, reading rooms, dormitories, and cafés solely for the use of African American men. They provided opportunities for professional and personal development through organized sports, father-and-son events, and classes. Women attended evenings dedicated to cultural activities.

Between 1912 and 1933, twenty-four "colored branches" of the YMCA were built around the United States in such cities as Chicago (1913), Philadelphia (1914), and Cincinnati (1916). Most were constructed with substantial funding from Julius Rosenwald, the president of Sears, Roebuck, who was a committed philanthropist. In 1918, a new YMCA opened in Brooklyn on Carleton Avenue; the following year, the newly built 135th Street YMCA opened to much fanfare. The 135th Street YMCA became a center of activity in Harlem. Paul Robeson performed there in 1920, in a production of Ridgely Torrence's Simon the Cyrenian, and W. E. B. Du Bois's Krigwa Players presented a full repertoire of dramas that attracted wide attendance in the YMCA's new auditorium. The Krigwa Players performed works by the black playwrights Angelina Weld Grimké, Willis Richardson, Georgia Douglas Johnson, and Eulalie Spence. Branches in Washington, D.C., Chicago, and Brooklyn were early locations for exhibitions devoted to the work of African American artists.

One of the key cultural organizations to emerge during the Harlem Renaissance was the Harmon Foundation, established in 1922 by the philanthropist and real estate tycoon William E. Harmon. This organization's original mission was to encourage individual self-help. Harmon later acknowledged African Americans' accomplishments when he established, in 1926, a five-year award program: the William E. Harmon Awards for Distinguished Achievement Among Negroes. Awards were offered in eight categories: literature, music, fine arts, business and industry, science and invention, education, religious service, and race relations. The Commission on Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America under the guidance of George Haynes administered the Awards for Distinguished Achievement from 1926 to 1930. Harmon selected Haynes because of his dedicated service to interracial cooperation (Reynolds and Wright 1989).

From 1928 to 1933, the Harmon Foundation sponsored annual juried exhibitions to show the work of African American artists. The director, Mary Beattie Brady, established that a jury of five experts would evaluate the work. Artists submitted a portfolio that included art completed within the competition year, letters of recommendation, biographical information, and a recent photograph. Titled "Exhibit of Fine Arts Productions of American Negro Artists," the first three Harmon exhibitions opened in New York City at International House, located at 500 Riverside Drive. In 1931, the annual exhibition was moved to a better space for exhibiting art, the Art Center at 65–67 East 56th Street. With the assistance of the Commission on Race Relations, Brady also sponsored traveling exhibitions of the work; these went to art museums, colleges such as Fisk University and Spelman College, libraries, and "colored branches" of the YMCA. The last Harmon Foundation exhibition took place in 1933. At the end of its five-year commitment, the organization decided to redirect its attention by supporting smaller group and solo exhibitions and providing small stipends directly to artists.

Although it clearly presented opportunities for exhibition, the Harmon Foundation and more particularly its director came under attack in the 1930s for including artists who appeared to lack ability, for segregating African Americans from the mainstream art world, and for assuming that black artists shared innate “racial qualities.” The most noted critique came from the artist Romare Bearden in an article entitled “The Negro Artist and Modern Art” for Opportunity in December 1934. He accused the Harmon Foundation of coddling and patronizing black artists and of creating a standard of inferiority by which African Americans would be judged as lesser artists in relation to the mainstream art world.

The Barnes Foundation would appear to have been less directly involved in the Harlem Renaissance, but it was an important place that encouraged art education, African art, and African American music. In 1922, Albert C. Barnes, a well-to-do pharmaceutical businessman and physician, established the Barnes Foundation on a 12-acre arboretum in Merion, Pennsylvania. Barnes created the educational institution “to promote the advancement of education and the appreciation of the fine arts.” Along with the foundation, Barnes had a residence and a gallery constructed to house his large collection of work, which was dominated by European and American modernist paintings and African art. A central part of Barnes’s mission was educating students in how to look at paintings and teaching them to understand the “plastic” relationship of art to nature. Classes at the Barnes Foundation actively involved studying works of art by such modernists as Paul Cézanne, Pablo Picasso, and Amedeo Modigliani as well as a variety of other artistic traditions including African sculpture; ancient Egyptian, Greek, and Roman carvings; and Chinese drawings and watercolors.

From the outset, Barnes himself was actively involved in the Harlem Renaissance. He attended the Civic Club dinner in March 1924 and was impressed with the range of talented authors and poets. After this encounter, he decided to support educational work among African Americans and contacted Alain Locke. Locke and Barnes had first met in Paris in January 1924, and it was Locke who invited Barnes to the Civic Club dinner. Barnes discussed with Locke possible opportunities for young African American artists to study using his collection. One of the first individuals to benefit from this relationship was the graphic artist and painter Aaron Douglas, who received a stipend to study at the Barnes Foundation in 1925. Douglas wrote: “Gosh, but it is a marvelous place. He undoubtedly has the largest single collection of modern paintings in America and certainly the finest collection of Negro sculpture.” Charles Spurgeon Johnson, editor of Opportunity, reproduced selected pieces from Barnes’s collection of African art in the May 1924 issue. Locke also illustrated key pieces in his influential anthology The New Negro (1925). Barnes wrote an essay entitled “Negro Art and America” for this anthology that helped to define the Harlem Renaissance. Although this fact is infrequently noted, Locke took much of his understanding of African art from his interactions with Barnes (Clarke 1998).

Starting in 1925, Barnes also began to hold concerts of black spirituals at his foundation. Charles Spurgeon Johnson developed a cordial relationship with Barnes after the publication of his African art collection in Opportunity and in 1926 introduced Barnes to the Bordentown School Choir from Bordentown, New Jersey. From the first concert, Barnes was impressed, and he invited the choir to sing annually at the foundation. Barnes, who saw a strong link between music and art, included an annual lecture on the relationship between African sculpture and African American spirituals, giving his lecture between the sets of spirituals sung by the choir (Clarke 1998).

Other organizations and societies outside Harlem actively celebrated and promoted the culture of the 1920s. In such cities as Chicago and Washington, D.C., the black intelligentsia attended events similar to those of their counterparts in Harlem. Chicago’s Arts and Letters Society, the Chicago Art League, and the Tanner Art Students’ League in Washington, D.C., all supported exhibitions of the art of African Americans and also served as gathering places for those interested in literature and fine arts. The National Black Women’s Club Movement, with more than 1,000 clubs in American cities, sponsored numerous lectures and educational and cultural programs. In November 1927, the Chicago Woman’s Club organized the “Negro in Art Week,” a one-week extravaganza that included a concert, lectures, and an exhibition at the Art Institute of Chicago. This groundbreaking show included work by contemporary African American artists and the Blondiau Collection of African Art from the Belgian Congo. The concert included Bach and Ravel and traditional black spirituals sung by the Fisk Jubilee Singers. Both Alain Locke and James Weldon Johnson were invited to the exhibition, and Johnson gave a lecture entitled “The Art Approach to the Negro Problem.” The Chicago Woman’s Club is just one illustration of commitment by an organization to underscoring black culture and using culture as a tool to “uplift the race” (Meyerowitz 1997).

Individuals also were essential in promoting culture during this time: A’Lelia Walker stands out for her attempt to bring together both black and white literati. In 1928, Walker, the heiress of the hair-straightening magnate Madame C. J. Walker, established the Dark Tower, a literary salon held in her mansion at 108–110 West 136th Street in Harlem. The invitation to the opening of the Dark Tower stated, “We dedicate this tower to the aesthetes. That cultural group of young Negro writers, sculptors, painters, music artists, composers, and their friends.” The Dark Tower, which was for members only, functioned as place where one could mingle with the literati, hear poetry read, and see art. Walker decorated the walls of the salon with the written text from Countee Cullen’s poem “The Dark Tower” and Langston Hughes’s “The Weary Blues.” Although Walker’s sponsorship of literary conversation appealed primarily to an elite audience, she supported a venue where aspiring and established writers—including Cullen, Hughes, and Richard Nugent—could express themselves creatively.

Music flourished during the Harlem Renaissance, and several cultural organizations stand out for their dedication to promoting concert music and musicians. The National Association of Negro Musicians (NANM), organized in 1919, helped to establish black concert and recital music as critical components of the New Negro movement. The NANM, which was based in New York, said that its purpose was “stimulating progress, to discover and foster talent, to mold taste, to promote fellowship, and to advocate racial expression.” Its members included music teachers, professional musicians, and music clubs. By 1933, it had twenty-eight branches in the United States; it continues to function as an organization based in Chicago (Cuney-Hare 1936/1974).

Two important choral societies were established early in the twentieth century and continued to thrive during the Harlem Renaissance. The Choral Study Club was organized in 1900 and provided instruction and opportunities for performance and music appreciation to African Americans of Chicago. The Samuel Coleridge-Taylor Society gave its first concert in 1903 at the Metropolitan African Methodist Episcopal Church in Washington, D.C. Like the Choral Study Club, the Samuel Coleridge-Taylor Society fostered a choral music program but focused primarily on the work of African American composers. It was disbanded in 1915 after the death of its founders but was revived in 1921 and continued to perform into the 1930s. Choral societies abounded during this period, including many based on the Samuel Coleridge-Taylor Society. Other prominent choirs included the People’s Choral Society of Philadelphia, Festival Chorus of Atlanta, and Musergia of Louisville, Kentucky.

Symphonic organizations also blossomed during this time. The Negro String Quartet and the Harlem Symphony Orchestra performed a wide range of music in New York City. The Negro String Quartet, founded in the same year as the NANM, performed show music, compositions by contemporary black composers, and classical work by European composers such as Beethoven, Haydn, and Tchaikovsky. The Harlem Symphony Orchestra performed the composer and songwriter James P. Johnson’s Yamekraw and a later concert of music by Weber, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. Musicians and performers received their share of formal recognition as well. For a three-year period beginning in 1925, Casper Holstein donated monies for the Holstein Prizes for composition, awarded through Opportunity. The Spingarn Medal also acknowledged outstanding musicians and singers: Harry T. Burleigh received the prize in 1917 and Roland Hayes in 1925 (Floyd 1993).

The organizations, societies, and associations that supported cultural activity during the Harlem Renaissance were broad in range and deep in scope. The 135th Street Library and the 135th Street YMCA gave immeasurable assistance through their public programming and their nurturing of the arts. Organizations such as the NAACP and the National Urban League publicly acknowledged, through their various prizes, talented authors, poets, and playwrights. And the unflagging support of individuals and smaller groups proved that African American culture was vividly alive and dynamic and worthy of notice.

RENÉE ATER

See also Barnes, Albert C.; Booklovers Club; Civic Club Dinner, 1924; Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Harmon Foundation; Haynes, George Edmund; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Krigwa Players; Locke, Alain; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Association of Negro Musicians;

National Urban League; Negro World; 135th Street Library; Opportunity Awards Dinner; Opportunity Literary Contests; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Spingarn, Joel; Spingarn Medal; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Walker, A'Lelia; specific actors, artists, musicians, and writers

Further Readings

- Campbell, Mary Schmidt, et al. Harlem Renaissance: Art of Black America. New York: Studio Museum in Harlem and Abrams, 1987.
- Clarke, Christa. "Defining Taste: Albert Barnes and the Promotion of African Art in the United States." Ph.D. diss., University of Maryland, 1998.
- Cuney-Hare, Maud. Negro Musicians and Their Music. 1936. New York: Da Capo, 1974.
- Dierickx, Mary B. The Architecture of Literacy: The Carnegie Libraries of New York City. New York: Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art, 1996.
- Floyd, Samuel A., Jr. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance: A Collection of Essays. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Martin, Tony. Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983.
- Meyerowitz, Lisa. "'The Negro in Art' Week: Defining the New Negro Through Art Exhibition." African-American Review, 31(1), Spring 1997, pp. 75–89.
- Mjagkij, Nina. Light in the Darkness: African-Americans and the YMCA, 1852–1946. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1994.
- Reynolds, Gary A., and Beryl J. Wright. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1989.
- Sinnette, Elinor Des Verney. Arthur Alfonso Schomburg: Black Bibliophile and Collector: A Biography. New York: New York Public Library, 1989.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Cunard, Nancy

The British heiress Nancy Cunard (1896–1965) was a writer, editor, and printer who actively rebelled against the economic and racial ideologies of her class.

Her chief connection to the Harlem Renaissance is her massive anthology Negro (1934), which contains works by a number of its leading writers.

Early on, Cunard tried to escape the world of her mother, the famous socialite Emerald Cunard, by settling in France, where she became part of avant-garde circles in Paris and began her own printing press. In 1928, she met an African American jazz musician, Henry Crowder, in Venice; they became lovers, and one evening they discussed the state of American blacks. Crowder reported being amazed at Cunard's ignorance about this, but he found her immensely interested. Thereafter, racial justice became a passion for Cunard.

Her first public writings on race appeared in 1931. Upon hearing that her mother had learned about Crowder and was disgusted by the relationship, she wrote "Does Anyone Know Any Negroes," which was published in the magazine The Crisis in September of that year and in which she excoriated the racism of her mother's class and described instances of racial prejudice that she herself had encountered since she became involved with Crowder. A few months later, her privately printed pamphlet Black Man and White Ladyship: An Anniversary contained an even more vehement attack. Its first part was a vicious personal assault on Cunard's mother; its second part summarized the historic and current mistreatment of black people and argued passionately against racism and imperialism, but most readers agreed that the valuable points made in this second part were overshadowed by the personal hatred expressed in the first. Even Crowder (1987) called the pamphlet "an atrocious piece" (119).

As early as 1930, Cunard had considered compiling an anthology of black history and culture to challenge racial prejudice. In April 1931, she sent out a circular requesting submissions, and she spent the next three years assembling the work. She made two trips to Harlem during which she met some of her contributors, including Walter White, Langston Hughes, and Countee Cullen; continued raising money for the defense of the Scottsboro boys (a project she had taken up while in Europe); and was dogged by reporters who seemed interested only in salacious tidbits about her black lovers. These trips also gave her an opportunity to observe Harlem; she recorded her impressions in an article entitled "Harlem Reviewed" for the anthology. In this essay she criticizes Harlem's nightclubs for refusing to admit black patrons and accuses white writers such as "[Carl] Van Vechten and Co." of presenting the public with a narrow, negative vision of Harlem as nothing more than “a round of hooch-filled night-clubs after a round of ‘snow’-filled boudoirs.”

Negro was published in England on 14 February 1934, at Cunard’s expense. It is a large book (855 pages), with more than 250 contributions: long and short articles, songs, poems, and illustrations. In addition to White, Hughes, and Cullen, contributors associated with the Harlem Renaissance include Zora Neale Hurston, Alain Locke, W. E. B. Du Bois, Arna Bontemps, and Sterling Brown; the book also contains pieces by black social scientists, musicologists, and historians as well as works by whites. Among Cunard’s own contributions—in addition to “Harlem Reviewed”—are a long report on the Scottsboro case, a harsh critique of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) as bourgeois and reactionary, and a sampling of the “hate letters” she had received during her visits to Harlem.

Negro is wide-ranging, divided into sections on the United States, black stars, music, poetry, the West Indies, South America, Europe, and Africa; titles of articles include “Flashes From Georgia Chain Gangs,” “A Negro Film Union, Why Not?” and “French Imperialism at Work in Madagascar.” In fact, Negro was so broad in scope that many readers found it an unwieldy hodgepodge, difficult to read and assess. Cunard was disappointed that it was not widely reviewed and that it did not sell well; an additional reason for this lack of public support may have been its communist slant. Cunard was never a member of the Communist Party, but she supported the communist agenda; the foreword to the anthology notes that “it is Communism alone which throws down the barriers of race. . . . The Communist world order is the solution to the race problem for the Negro.” Still, Cunard received private praise from many people, including Langston Hughes, and Arthur Schomburg; Alain Locke wrote, “I congratulate you—almost enviously, on the finest anthology in every sense of the word, ever compiled on the Negro” (quoted in Chisholm 1979, 293).

Original copies of Negro are now scarce, but an abridged version was published in 1970 and reprinted in 1996. The anthology has received limited attention in the primary studies of the Harlem Renaissance. Huggins (1971) makes no mention of Cunard and Negro, although Lewis (1981) and Wintz (1988) address them briefly. More recently, scholars such as Jane Marcus (1995) and Holly McSpadden (1997) have sought to recover Negro as a landmark text on race.

Cunard’s role as an advocate of racial justice is sometimes difficult to evaluate. In the early twentieth century, she was one of the most outspoken European supporters of equality for blacks, and few others so willingly condemned the racism of their own group. But one must also ask whether she was completely able to escape the influence of her class. For example, although she professed a distaste for primitivism, she often told Henry Crowder that she wished he were darker and admonished him to “be more African” (Chisholm 1979, 186), and he believed that she often chose lovers because of the darkness of their skin. She also sometimes saw racial politics in rather simplistic terms. To confront prejudice head-on, for instance, she would often take a black lover or a black friend to places that excluded African Americans, overlooking the real risk to her black companions in such encounters. Some commentators allow Cunard’s flamboyant personal life to preclude an objective analysis of her work on race; the fact that she had a sexual interest in black men is sometimes seen as undercutting the seriousness of her commitment to racial equality. Cunard herself, however, never doubted this commitment. In making notes for an autobiography, she wrote that her work for the equality of the races was predominant in her life. She regarded her relationship with Crowder as life-changing; on learning of his death, she wrote to a friend, "Henry made me. I thank him."

Nancy Cunard in an inscribed photograph, 1927. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Nancy Clara Cunard was born 10 March 1896 in Leicestershire, England, and was educated at private girls' schools in London, Munich, and Paris (1911–1914). She contributed a poem to Wheels: An Anthology of Verse in 1916 and published Outlaws (poems) in 1921, Sublunary (poems) in 1923, Parallax (a long poem) in 1925, Poems in 1930, Grand Man: Memories of Norman Douglas in 1954, and G. M.: Memories of George Moore in 1956. Cunard founded and ran the Hours Press in La Chapelle-Réanville, France (1928). She was a correspondent for the Associated Negro Press (1935–1950); and she reported on the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) for the Associated Negro Press, New Times, Spanish Newsletter, Spain at War, Voice of Spain, and Manchester Guardian. She edited Authors Take Sides on the Spanish War (1937) and Poems for France (1944). Cunard died 16 March 1965 in Paris.

CHRISTINA G. BUCHER

See also Bontemps, Arna; Brown, Sterling; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Locke, Alain; Negro: An Anthology; Primitivism; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Scottsboro; Van Vechten, Carl; White, Walter

Selected Works

"Does Anyone Know Any Negroes." Crisis, September 1931, p. 300.

Black Man and White Ladyship: An Anniversary. 1931. (Abridged in Nancy Cunard: Brave Poet, Indomitable Rebel, 1896–1965. 1968.)

Negro. 1934. (Abridged ed., 1970, reprinted 1996.)

The White Man's Duty. 1943.

These Were the Hours. 1969.

Further Reading

Chisholm, Anne. Nancy Cunard. New York: Knopf, 1979.

Crowder, Henry. As Wonderful as All That? Navarro, Calif.: Wild Trees, 1987.

Douglas, Anne. Terrible Honesty: Mongrel Manhattan in the 1920s. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1995.

Fielding, Daphne. Those Remarkable Cunards: Emerald and Nancy. New York: Atheneum, 1968.

Ford, Hugh, ed. Nancy Cunard: Brave Poet, Indomitable Rebel, 1896–1965. Philadelphia, Pa.: Chilton, 1968.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Marcus, Jane. "Bonding and Bondage: Nancy Cunard and the Making of the Negro Anthology." In Borders, Boundaries, and Frames: Essays in Cultural Criticism and Cultural Studies, ed. Mae Henderson. New York: Routledge, 1995.

McSpadden, Holly. "Transgressive Reading: Nancy Cunard and Negro." In Essays on Transgressive Readings: Reading Over the Lines, ed. Georgia Johnston. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen, 1997.

Moynagh, Maureen. "Cunard's Lines: Political Tourism and Its Texts." New Formations, 34, 1998, pp. 70–90.

———. Nancy Cunard: Essays on Race and Empire. Peterborough, Ontario, Canada: Broadview, 2002.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Cuney, Waring

Although Waring Cuney is today considered one of the minor poets of the Harlem Renaissance, and although he lived a quiet, private life that defies the efforts of biographers, his use of language and the rhythms of urban African Americans gave credibility to a kind of writing that was echoed throughout the twentieth century and into the twenty-first. With his friend Langston Hughes, Cuney worked hard at being a poet during their years at Lincoln University; much later, in 1954, they coedited an anthology, Lincoln University Poets: Centennial Anthology, 1854–1954.

Cuney's first love was music, but his singing voice was weak, and so he was led to choose writing as a career. Still, his poetry was often influenced by his music education and his musical sensitivity. His poems are strongly rhythmic, and many of them are in ballad stanzas. He is especially known for creating poetic forms echoing blues. He also wrote song lyrics, some of which were recorded by Josh White. Many of Cuney's works are vivid character sketches of people living in black American inner cities, and their vernacular speech and folk rhythms are affirming and energetic. Attention is paid to the smallest and most humble details of daily life. Religion is a recurring theme.

Cuney's most famous poem, "No Images," which he wrote at the age of eighteen, has been called a minor masterpiece and has been widely anthologized. "No Images" won first prize in the literary contest sponsored by Opportunity magazine in 1926; and his poems "A Traditional Marching Song" and "De Jail Blues Song" won honorable mentions in 1927. Cuney's poetry and criticism were published in magazines such as The Crisis, Fire!!, Harlem Quarterly, Negro Quarterly, Black World, and Opportunity. His poetry was also selected for inclusion in anthologies such as An Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1926; Countee Cullen's Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Black Poets of the Twenties (1927); James Weldon Johnson's Book of American Negro Poetry (1931); Sterling Brown's Negro Caravan (1941); and Arna Bontemps's American Negro Poetry (1963).

By the 1950s, Cuney was largely forgotten in the United States, but his work had been translated into German and Dutch and had a small following in Europe. In 1960, his poems were collected and published for the first time as a book, Puzzles, in the Netherlands. Shortly afterward, Cuney stopped writing and publishing and became a recluse. A second book, Storefront Church, was published in London in 1973.

Biography

William Waring Cuney was born in Washington, D.C., 6 May 1906. He was educated in public schools in Washington, D.C.; at Howard University; at Lincoln University, Pennsylvania (B.A.); at the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston; and at the Conservatory of Music, Rome. He was active as a poet from 1927 to 1962. Cuney served in the U.S. Army as a technical sergeant during World War II (1941–1945); he was awarded the Asiatic Pacific Theater Ribbon and three Bronze Stars. His poem "No Images" won first prize in Opportunity's contest of 1926. Cuney died in New York City 30 June 1976.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Crisis, The; Fire!!; Hughes, Langston; Literature: 7—Poetry; Opportunity Literary Contests

Selected Works

Lincoln University Poets: Centennial Anthology, 1854–1954. 1954 (As coeditor.)
Puzzles. 1960.
Storefront Church. 1973.

Further Reading

- Bell, Bernard W. "Contemporary Afro-American Poetry as Folk Art." Black World, 20(5), 1973.
 Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
 Brown, Sterling A. Negro Poetry and Drama. Washington, D.C.: Associates in Negro Folk Education, 1937.
 Hayden, Lucy. Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro-American Writers From the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1987.
 Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Knopf, 1940.
 Woodson, C. G. "The Cuney Family." Negro History Bulletin, March 1948.

Cuney-Hare, Maud

Maud Cuney-Hare (1874–1936) was a concert pianist, music historian, folklorist, writer, educator, playwright, producer, and lecturer. She was the author of a biography of her father, Norris Wright Cuney: A Tribune of the Black People (1913); editor of Six Creole Folk Songs: With Original Creole and Translated English Text (1921), a subject she was the first to bring to the attention of American concertgoers; and editor of a collection of poems, The Message of the Trees: An Anthology of Leaves and Branches (1918). She also contributed articles on music to The Crisis (where she edited the column on music and the arts), Musical Quarterly, Musical Observer, Musical America, and the Christian Science Monitor.

As a folklorist, Cuney-Hare traveled to Mexico, Puerto Rico, Cuba, Haiti, and the Virgin Islands, collecting songs and doing research on sources of African American music. She owned a famous collection of African American, Creole, and early American music that included instruments, photographs, scores, and programs. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) sponsored an exhibit of this collection at the Wanamaker store in Philadelphia; the exhibit was also shown in other libraries and museums in the Northeast and on the West Coast.

Cuney-Hare's authoritative reference work Negro Musicians and Their Music (1936) was published two months before her death and is still used today. In it, she traced the African influence on the music of black people; described African instruments, songs, and dances; and discussed the origin, variants, and applications of spirituals, folk music, sea chanteys, and work songs. Her work covered minstrelsy, vaudeville, musical comedy, classical music, and some blues and jazz and included detailed biographies of famous and less well-known musicians, singers, and composers of African descent from Arabia, Europe, the Americas, the Caribbean, and the United States.

Cuney-Hare as pianist and the baritone William Howard Richardson developed a very popular lecture and concert series that they presented—sometimes in costume—in the United States and abroad from 1913 to the early 1930s. They specialized in African American and Creole music. Cuney-Hare and Richardson also gave concerts, especially of spirituals, with the violinist Clarence Cameron White and the singer Roland Hayes; in one of these concerts, Arthur Fiedler, the famous conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, played the viola.

Cuney-Hare founded the Allied Arts Center in Boston, Massachusetts, which had a little theater group (c. 1926–1935). The center also offered children's theatrical workshops, concerts, art, music study classes, and drama classes; all races were invited to participate, but it was especially a training ground and showcase for young black performers and playwrights. Although Cuney-Hare had begun this organization with only her own money, it later received outside donations and revenues from its activities. The black League of Women for Community Service found a site for the center in downtown Boston, opposite the New England Conservatory of Music.

Maud Cuney-Hare, c. 1910. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

The Allied Arts Players presented Plumes by Georgia Douglas Johnson; Tambour by John Frederick Matheus (1929); Dessalines, Black Emperor of Haiti by William Easton (on 15 May 1930); and Cuney-Hare's own original play, Antar of Araby, Negro Poet of Araby (1926), about a historical figure of the sixth century. The music for Antar of Araby was provided by Clarence Cameron White and Montague Ring (a pseudonym of Amanda Ira Aldridge, the daughter of Ira Aldridge, a prominent black Shakespearean actor of the time).

Biography

Maud Cuney-Hare was born 17 February 1874 in Galveston, Texas. In 1890, she was one of the first graduates of Central High School there, a school that was a direct result of efforts by her father to ensure an education for blacks. After graduating from the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, she studied English literature at Lowell Institute, Harvard University; and studied music privately with two famous European piano teachers: Edwin Klahre and Emil Ludwig. She also studied music theory with Martin Roeder. She became the director of music (1897–1898) for the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Institute for Colored Youth in Austin, Texas. She worked at the settlement house of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in Chicago and was a music instructor at Prairie View Agricultural and Mechanical College (1903–1904). She was a noted lecturer and concert artist and was the founder of an arts center in Boston, that included a theater. Cuney-Hare died 13 February 1936 in Boston.

MARVIE BROOKS

See also Crisis, The; Hayes, Roland; Johnson, Georgia Douglas; Matheus, John Frederick; New Challenge; White, Clarence Cameron

Further Reading

African-American Registry. Maud Hare, Texas Original! (Web site.)

- "Cuney-Hare, Maud." In Handbook of Texas Online. 2003. (Joint Project of University of Texas at Austin and Texas State Historical Association; Web site.)
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Opinion." Crisis, 28(5), September 1924, pp. 196–238. (On the Maud Cuney-Hare Exhibit.)
- Hales, Douglas. A Southern Family in White and Black: The Cuneys of Texas. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2003.
- Logan, Rayford W., and Michael R. Winston, eds. Dictionary of American Negro Biography. New York: Norton, 1982, p. 152.
- Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. Early Black American Playwrights and Dramatic Writers: A Biographical Directory and Catalog of Plays, Films, and Broadcasting Scripts. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990, p. 56.
- Quinlan, Elizabeth. "African-American Women in Jamaica Plain History." Jamaica Plain Gazette, 28 August 1992.
- Salem, Dorothy, ed. African-American Women. New York: Garland, 1993, pp. 134–136.
- Southern, Eileen. Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1982, pp. 166–167.
- White, Clarence Cameron. "Maud Cuney-Hare." Journal of Negro History, 21(2), April 1936, pp. 239–240. ("Notes" section.)

Daddy Grace

Bishop Charles Manuel “Sweet Daddy” Grace was the founder, in 1919, of the United House of Prayer for All People of the Church on the Rock of Apostolic Faith. His denomination was based on the “apostolic faith” that emerged from the Azusa Street Revival in Los Angeles (1906); he emphasized God’s power to heal and advocated worship filled with the spirit. Daddy Grace drew attention from the press for his flamboyant attire, long painted fingernails, and extensive investments in real estate.

Grace, whose original name was Marcelino da Graca, left the Portuguese Cape Verde Islands for New Bedford, Massachusetts, in 1904; he anglicized his name within five years of his arrival. He was one of thousands of Cape Verdeans who immigrated to this area between 1900 and 1921, and like many of the others, he was puzzled by American racial categories. He did not accept the American classification “black” or “Negro” but insisted that he was a white citizen of Portugal. This claim led some critics, who were unaware of his Cape Verdean heritage, to describe him as a “race-rejecter.”

Dismayed by the limited options available to a man society viewed as “black,” Grace looked for a new occupation. In 1919 he founded his ministry in West Wareham, Massachusetts. He soon headed out in his “gospel car,” spreading his message throughout the southern United States. While his House of Prayer was explicitly created “for all people,” most of his followers were African Americans. Grace, however, did hold “mixed-race” meetings and was consequently a target of intimidation by the Ku Klux Klan in the South. The press found it difficult to classify Grace, calling him variously a “Portuguese faith healer” and the “black Christ.”

In 1927 Grace formally incorporated the church in Washington, D.C., making that city his headquarters. His early successes in the South encouraged him to expand into Philadelphia and Harlem. In 1938 the writer Dorothy West documented a worship service in one of Grace’s Houses of Prayer in Harlem for the Works Progress Administration (WPA). She captured the integral role of music in the House of Prayer, including a forerunner of the church’s unique trombone shout bands. Also in 1938, Grace challenged Father Divine’s power in Harlem when he purchased Divine’s “Number One Heaven.”

As Grace’s ministry grew, he offered his followers a line of products, including Grace Magazine, Grace writing paper, and Grace hair pomade. He invested the money he raised in real estate, including a plantation in Cuba and the El Dorado apartment building on New York’s Upper West Side. He also created low-income housing and affordable dining options for his congregations; however, this aspect of his activity rarely received attention in the press, and, despite it, his critics charged that he was duping his followers out of their money. When Grace died, he was somewhat vindicated: he left the bulk of his holdings to his followers and the United House of Prayer.

Grace’s followers held an elaborate funeral for him. His body traveled from Los Angeles to Charlotte, North Carolina, and was then escorted to Newport News (Virginia), Washington (D.C.), Philadelphia, and Newark (New Jersey) before arriving in New Bedford for burial. In the years after Grace's death, the United House of Prayer for All People continued to thrive.

Daddy Grace, photographed by James Van Der Zee, 1938. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Charles Manuel Grace (Marcelino da Graca) was born in Brava, Cape Verde Islands, on 20 January 1881. He immigrated to and permanently settled in New Bedford, Massachusetts (1904). Grace began his formal ministry in 1919; made a trip to the Holy Land in 1923–1924; and incorporated his church, the United House of Prayer for All People of the Church on the Rock of Apostolic Faith, in Washington, D.C., in 1927. He died in Los Angeles, California, on 12 January 1960.

DANIELLE BRUNE

See also Father Divine; Fauset, Arthur Huff; West, Dorothy

Selected Works

Bishop Grace from the Holy Land. "You May Be Healed By the Power of God" and "The Power of God

Can Raise His Friends from the Dead." In Preachers and Congregations, Vol. 4, 1924–1931. DOCD-5548. (Recording.)

Further Reading

"America's Richest Negro Minister." Ebony, January 1952, pp. 17–23.

Davis, Lenwood G. Daddy Grace: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Greenwood, 1992.

Fauset, Arthur Huff. Black Gods of the Metropolis. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1945.

Halter, Marilyn. Between Race and Ethnicity: Cape Verdean American Immigrants 1860–1965. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

West, Dorothy. "Temple of Grace." In A Renaissance in Harlem, ed. Lionel C. Bascom. New York: Avon, 1999.

Dafora, Asadata

Asadata Dafora (1890–1965) was born in Sierra Leone; his mother was a concert pianist who had studied in Vienna and Paris, and his father was a city treasurer. As a student, Dafora traveled throughout west Africa, Europe, and Russia, and then studied voice at La Scala in Milan, Italy, for two years. He emigrated to the United States in 1929 to pursue a career in opera, but he found greater success during the Harlem Renaissance as a dancer and choreographer. He formed the company Shogola Oloba, with other African émigrés, to perform songs and dances of the Temini ethnic group.

Shogola Oloba performed at the Communist Party Bazaar in New York in 1933, as well as at the opening of the New YMCA Little Theater at 180 West 135 Street. In May 1934 Dafora presented Kykunkor, or the Witch Woman, the seminal African dance opera, which told of a bridegroom cursed by a scorned lover. Dafora arranged the libretto, music, and dances, and oversaw the entire production. This work combined operatic dramatic conventions with African dancing and singing by a large company of African and African American performers who were costumed with great theatrical flair according to his specifications; the production was accompanied by an orchestra of three drummers. Kykunkor confirmed the viability of African arts as American entertainment and awakened a broad interest in traditional west African performance practice.

Artists from many disciplines saw Kykunkor and appreciated the implications of Dafora's vision. Among these artists were Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Lawrence Tibbett of the Boston Symphony; the composer George Gershwin; the novelists Sherwood Anderson and Theodore Dreiser; the choreographer George Balanchine; and the eminent literary critic Carl Van Doren. The work made its way to Broadway, where it ran for three months.

Following this resounding success, Dafora created several more works in the same vein, including Bassa Moona (1937) and Zunguru (1938), which were also performed on Broadway, at Carnegie Hall, at the Ninety-Second Street YM-YWHA, the New York Museum of Natural History, the Brooklyn Museum, the Brooklyn Botanical Gardens, and the Bronx Zoo. Dafora also toured throughout the southern and western United States. In 1936, he served as choreographer for Orson Welles's production of Voodoo Macbeth.

In 1943, Dafora organized "African Dance Festival," a program held at Carnegie Hall on 13 December as the first arts project of the African Academy of Arts and Research. The academy's purpose was to "foster goodwill between the United States and Africa through a mutual exchange of cultural, social, and economic knowledge." Two guests of honor, Eleanor Roosevelt and Mary McLeod Bethune, spoke during the intermission in support of the academy and its artistic project.

Dafora's influence as a teacher and proponent of African music and dance has been underestimated. Throughout his career, he taught many significant dance and drum artists, including Ismay Andrews, Pearl Primus, Josephine Premice, Katherine Dunham, Norman Coker, Alphonse Cimber, Jean-Léon Destiné, Alice Dinizulu, Michael Olatunji, and Charles Moore. Shangola Oloba remained in existence until 1960, when Dafora returned briefly to Sierra Leone.

Biography

Asadata Dafora Horton was born on 4 August 1890 in Sierra Leone. He attended the Wesleyan Boys' High School and studied in England and Russia and at La Scala in Milan, Italy. He was artistic director of the Shogola Oloba company (1933–1960), choreographer for Orson Welles's Voodoo Macbeth (1936), and organizer of the program "African Dance Festival" at Carnegie Hall on 13 December 1943. He died in New York City in March 1965.

THOMAS F. DEFRAZT

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Bethune, Mary McLeod; Dance; Dreiser, Theodore; Van Doren, Carl

Selected Works

Awassa Astrige/Ostrich. 1932.

Voodoo Macbeth. 1936. (Directed by Orson Welles.)

Zoonga. 1933.

Kykunkor, or the Witch Woman. 1934.

Bassa Moona. 1937.

Zunguru. 1938.

Batanga. 1949.

Further Reading

"Asadata Dafora." In Dictionary of Blacks in the Performing Arts, ed. E. Mapp. Metuchen, N. J.: Scarecrow, 1978.

Beiswanger, George W. "Asadata Dafora and Company." Dance Observer, January 1944.

Heard, Marcea E., and Mansa Mussa. "African Dance in New York City." In Dancing Many Drums: Excavations in African American Dance, ed. Thomas F. DeFrantz. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2001.

Lloyd, Margaret. "Dancer from the Gold Coast." Christian Science Monitor, 26 May 1945.

Needham, Maureen. "Kykunkor, Or The Witch Woman: An African Opera in America, 1934." In Dancing Many Drums: Excavations in African American Dance, ed. Thomas F. DeFrantz. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2001.

Damas, Léon

Léon Gontran Damas (1911–1978), poet, storyteller, pamphleteer, and lecturer, is remembered, with Aimé Césaire and Léopold Sédar Senghor, as a member of the "trinity" that formulated négritude (negritude) in Paris in the 1930s and spread the concept throughout the world.

Negritude meant acceptance of one's blackness and glorification of African history and culture. The concept enabled Damas to discover his own identity, to move beyond being simply “an object of domination and a consumer of culture” and to become “a cultural actor in history.” Taking pride in one’s own culture would, he believed, lead not to racism and rejection of the other, but rather to the universal. Thus, while remaining profoundly Antillean and dedicated to the progress of blacks in his native Guiana, Damas insisted on the ties that bound blacks of the diaspora to each other and to African blacks. He stressed, in particular, that poets of negritude were indebted to musicians and writers of the Harlem Renaissance.

Damas had been born into an interracial, dysfunctional Guianan bourgeois family that was bent on assimilation with all things French, but his newfound roots led him to reject assimilation completely. Pigments (1937), his most famous work, records the revolt of a young black man who has discovered his identity in African-Guianan traditions. The poems accentuate a rhythm reminiscent of the tom-tom; their tone is nostalgic, humorous, at times biting irony. Many lines are confrontational: black-white, slave-master, innocence-cruelty, love-hatred, truth-falsehood.

The same themes underlie his report (Retour de Guyane, 1938) on a trip to Guiana that he undertook for the French anthropologist Paul Rivet to document the state of black culture there. He chastises the French for viewing Guiana as merely a penal colony, rather than a region with major agricultural and human potential.

Damas later illustrated this human potential by publishing his French transcription of Guianan-African tales collected during his trip (Veillées noires, 1943). Tales of animals, humans, or supernatural beings, in which the weak but intelligent triumph over the powerful, are passed on to a new generation by an old woman, Tètèche, who clearly symbolizes Guiana. Damas helps her reach a wider audience.

In his next major work, Black Label (1956)—which followed his portrayal of a failed love affair in Graffiti (1953)—the poet combines the personal and the polemic. “Black label” is the whiskey in which he drowns his sorrow, but also the mark of the branding iron on the slave. The now-mature poet creates dramatic tension by alternating themes of negritude with songs of love and nostalgia.

However, while important, Damas’s literary production is rather limited. The man and his spoken words greatly enhanced his role in the creation of an international black community and in the fight against racism. After World War II Damas traveled repeatedly to the United States and solidified the ties he had established in Paris with black American intellectuals. Among his friends were Countee Cullen, Claude McKay, Mercer Cook, and Langston Hughes. In 1966 he settled in the United States, lecturing at various universities. He also continued to travel extensively throughout Europe, the Caribbean, and black Africa, lecturing on behalf of international organizations and becoming a bridge between Africans on several continents.

Biography

Léon Gontran Damas was born on 17 July 1912 in Cayenne, Guiana. He studied in Guiana, in Martinique (Lycée Victor Schoelcher), in Paris (School of Oriental Languages, School of the Humanities, Law School, 1929–1933), and again in Guiana (anthropology, 1934). In Paris in 1930–1933, he met Senghor, Césaire, and the Martinican students editing La Revue du Monde Noir (Review of the Black World). Damas was drafted into the colonial infantry in 1939 and demobilized in 1940. He returned to Paris in 1942; traveled to Guiana via New York and Washington, D.C.; was elected a deputy in the French national assembly as a socialist (1948–1951); married Martinican Isabelle Victoire Vécilia Achille (1948); was divorced (1951); went on cultural missions to Jamaica, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, French West Africa, and French Equatorial Africa on behalf of French ministries of foreign affairs and of “overseas France” and participated in conferences in Europe, Africa, and the Caribbean and Latin America (1953–1963); married Marietta Campos (1964); continued traveling and lecturing, often for UNESCO (1965–1970); and taught in American universities and went on traveling and lecturing (1970–1977). He died on 22 January 1978 in Washington, D.C.; his ashes were brought to Guiana via Martinique, receiving great honors along the way.

L. NATALIE SANDOMIRSKY

See also Césaire, Aimé; Cullen, Countee; Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance; Hughes, Langston; McKay, Claude; Negritude; Senghor, Léopold

Selected Works

Pigments. 1937. (Published by Senghor and other friends; rev. ed., 1962; combined ed. with Névalgies, 1972.)

Retour de Guyane (Return from Guiana). 1938.

- Veillées noires* (Black Vigils). 1943. (2nd ed., 1972.)
Poètes noirs d'expression française (Black Poets Writing in French). 1947.
Poèmes nègres sur des airs africains (Negro Poems Based on African Songs). 1948.
Graffiti. 1953.
Black Label. 1956.
Néuralgies (Neuralgias). 1966. (Combined ed. with Pigments, 1972.)
African Songs of Love, War, Grief, and Abuse by Léon Damas, trans. Miriam Koshland and Ulli Beier. 1981.

Further Reading

- Hommage posthume à Léon-Gontran Damas, 1912–1978* (Posthumous Homage to Léon-Gontran Damas). Paris: Présence Africaine, 1979.
 Jack, Belinda. Negritude and Literary Criticism: The History and Theory of "Negro-African" Literature in French. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1996.
 Ojo-Ade, Femi. Léon-Gontran Damas: The Spirit of Resistance. London: Karnak House, 1993.
 Racine, Daniel. Léon Gontran Damas, 1912–1978, Founder of Negritude: A Memorial Casebook. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1979.
 ———. Léon-Gontran Damas, l'homme et l'oeuvre (Léon-Gontran Damas, the Man and His Works). Paris: Présence Africaine, 1983.
 Warner, Keith Q., ed. Critical Perspectives on Léon Gontran Damas. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents, 1988.

Dance

Dance of the Harlem Renaissance during the 1920s and 1930s was a flowering of artistic creativity that led to later innovations and to periodic revivals. In the context of dance, it is useful to note, briefly, the nature of the Harlem Renaissance, which has been one of the most intensely studied periods in the history of African American life. This renaissance was an intellectual awakening involving literary and visual artistic expression and a spiritual experience; the basis of the movement was equality, pride, and conscious recognition of being black. Beginning in 1916, there was a mass migration of blacks from the South to Harlem, which had formerly been an exclusive residential area for wealthy whites fleeing the congested lower-class immigrant neighborhoods of downtown Manhattan. During the renaissance, Harlem became known as the black capital of America and was seen by African Americans as a symbolic mecca—and certainly, by young aspiring artists, as a beacon of light.

In examining the significance of dance in the Harlem Renaissance, it is also appropriate to consider the context of evolving knowledge about dance. Not until 1926 was dance recognized as a subject worthy of study in universities. In the 1950s, psychologists began to do research on nonverbal communication, a key element of dance. As more was learned about dance as a means of sending and receiving messages, the traditional split between mind and body was no longer accepted. Many scholars came to stress the “mentality of matter”: the merging of the physical, emotional, and cognitive in dance. One cannot create mindlessly; dance—like speaking and writing—requires an underlying faculty in the brain for conceptualization, innovation, and memory. Dance is actually in many ways like language: it has a vocabulary (steps and gestures), grammar (justifying how one movement follows another), and meaning—the multiple symbolic meanings of dance more often resemble poetry than prose. Also, dance has purposeful, intentionally rhythmic, culturally influenced sequences of body movements that are selected in much the same way as a person would choose sequences of verbal language.

In the Harlem Renaissance, new dances emerged out of the cultural mixing of African Americans from different parts of the South and the north; and Harlem became the fountainhead of the social dances that were a craze during America’s “roaring twenties.” As a result, racial agency, appropriation of cultural dance forms, and the commodification of black stereotypes were at issue. Also at issue was the purpose of art, including dance: many participants in the Harlem Renaissance valued art for its service to civil rights; others, however, believed that artistic freedom was the most important civil right.

During the intellectual fervor of the renaissance, the dances performed in Harlem influenced African American writers, who tried to capture the lives of the unsophisticated masses in rural areas and inner cities. But certain leaders of the Harlem Renaissance considered dance as something apart from the intellectual movement because to them, as to Americans in general, dance seemed merely emotional and physical. The old proverb “Good dancers mostly have better heels than heads” conveys a common misconception about dance. Mainstream society tends to distrust the body and view it as separate from the mind that creates vocal and written discourse; and schools measure knowledge in words and numbers, not kinetic images.

Still, even when their significance went unrecognized by the leadership of the Harlem Renaissance, the dances of this era—in the street, at house parties, in theaters, in ballrooms—altered the course of dance in America and the world. Dances originated by blacks permeated established forms and influenced the emerging American repertoire of jazz dance and dance in theater and film, much as peasant folk dances had influenced European ballet. Dances popularized during the Harlem Renaissance continue to reverberate widely today, in new and old versions. Some of these indigenous American dances blossomed and then faded but eventually reseeded themselves, particularly in the 1990s, when a revival of swing dance swept the United States and also reached the United Kingdom, Scandinavia, and Germany.

The Harlem Renaissance, in effect, opened a window for—or gave an imprimatur to—the African American dance heritage, which came from the cultures of many African groups. The continent of Africa has some 1,000 different language groups and probably as many constellations of dance patterns. Blacks in America, uprooted from their homes in Africa, had been enslaved not only personally but also culturally. Ethnic groups, clans, and families were broken up, and as a result, African dances specific to these units were constrained and transformed in the new world. Even so, the styles of many African dances persisted in the diaspora. Asadata Dafora, a dancer from Sierra Leone who came to the United States in 1929, identified many black dance movements of the time as common in his homeland. Dancers in Harlem used different parts of the body, undulated the spine, rotated the hips, bent the knees, fluidly extended and flexed the legs, and moved on flat feet with the torso oriented earthward.

In 1921, the black musical Shuffle Along broke through to Broadway, entered the American imagination, and electrified the Harlem Renaissance. Great African American dancers had been known in vaudeville, but many of them performed on the segregated southern circuits and had remained unknown to the wider American public. Shuffle Along opened new doors for talented blacks and proved that money could be made with native, homegrown dancing; this was the first outstanding African American musical to play in white theaters nationwide. It ran a full year on Broadway and continued in various revivals across the country into the 1940s.

The influence of minstrelsy and blackface performance on dance was perhaps somewhat mixed. White minstrels mastered African American expressive styles of performance, but they did this for the purpose of mockery. African American dancers, if they wanted to have opportunities to perform in mainstream society, often had to black up like white minstrels playing Negroes and say they were white. On the other hand, black minstrelsy—in which the black performers wore blackface just as white minstrels did—distinguished itself from its white counterpart by including women, and in this regard it was a precursor of the transition to vaudeville.

White audiences' preconceptions were a factor not only in minstrelsy and blackface entertainment but in other areas as well. To appeal to white audiences, black men and women portrayed themselves as primitive dancing fools, a white fantasy. Duke Ellington's band, for instance, played "Jungle Music." Earl "Snakehips" Tucker (who became famous among other dancers) and the tap dancer Bill "Bojangles" Robinson performed in a happy, sensual way, playing powerless fools. Also, there was a widespread assumption that blacks were natural dancers rather than performers who had learned their art and craft as any other artists do: through observation, coaching, and practice. This assumption could hardly be applied to blacks in general, even though it might have been appropriate for someone like Bill Robinson, who never did take dancing lessons as we understand them.

Robinson was one of several black dancers who became widely famous during the 1920s and 1930s. His nickname, Bojangles, may have come from a hat he wore as a signature piece—the hatmaker's name was Lion J. Boujasson, which sounds rather like it. In Harlem, both the elite and ordinary people were so crazy about Robinson that he was called the "mayor of Harlem," although at the same time he was fighting for a foothold in American society as a whole. Bojangles had begun his career as a "pick," that is, one of the pickaninnies in choruses of African American children, aged four to the early teens, who appeared in white minstrel shows. He performed the buck dancing style, a full-footed shuffle that was a forerunner of modern tap. "Buck and wing" was a minstrel term referring to a combination of jig and pigeon wing or chicken wing in which the neck was held still and arms and legs flailed like a bird's wings. Robinson also further popularized the cakewalk, a dance that whites, for their blackface minstrel shows, had appropriated from enslaved blacks, who in turn had been mocking the pompous strutting mannerisms of whites. When Bojangles appeared on Broadway in Blackbirds in 1928, he achieved instantaneous success with his “stair dance,” in which he moved up and down a staircase, changing the tempo and dance movements on each step. Robinson could and did socialize with white people. In 1935, he costarred with Shirley Temple in The Little Colonel. In 1939, he was a hit in Hot Mikado at the New York World’s Fair. Robinson is known for his comment, “I’m copacetic. Everything is better than fine.”

Clayton “Peg Leg” Bates, another legendary tap dancer, could execute nearly any tap step with one leg. He wanted to surpass two-legged dancers, and he performed acrobatic turns, graceful soft-shoes, buck-and-wings, and powerful rhythm dances. With a regular tap shoe on his right foot and the peg leg covered with leather on the inside and rubber on the outside, he created a unique combination of sounds. Throughout the 1930s, he played at the top Harlem nightclubs.

John Bubbles is best-known for his portrayal of Sportin’ Life in George Gershwin’s Porgy and Bess (1935) and as half of Buck and Bubbles, a singing and dancing comedy act; Buck was Ford Lee Washington. Buck and Bubbles were headliners in vaudeville, and Bubbles became more broadly appreciated on Broadway in the Ziegfeld Follies of 1931. They were the first black artists to appear at Radio City Music Hall in New York. Instead of dancing on his toes, as most tap dancers did, Bubbles dropped his heels to create gradations of tone and complex syncopations. He changed his routine for each show, to prevent other dancers from stealing his steps.

Earl “Snakehips” Tucker arrived in Harlem in the mid-1920s and performed “jungle ritual dances” to accompany the theme of Duke Ellington’s band. Snakehips slithered menacingly, like a cobra; his hips described wide circles, and he performed the belly roll, an undulation of the torso. Snakehips appeared briefly (along with Bill Robinson) in Blackbirds. The first male headliner who did not tap, he was ahead of his time with “outrageous” pelvic movements.

The Nicholas brothers, who played the Apollo in 1928, were acclaimed for a multiunit torso; thrust hips; shuffles with bent knee; movement with “jazz hands,” fingers outstretched; syncopations; and partnering steps from the lindy hop.

Audiences in the United States and Europe were extraordinarily fascinated with the dancer Josephine Baker, who was even more acclaimed abroad than in her homeland. Baker performed wild renditions of the Charleston as well as her trademark danse sauvage at the Folies Bergère and elsewhere. Actually, she parodied the image of a savage sex goddess that had been cast for her. Her dance movements and rhythm influenced George Balanchine of the New York City Ballet.

The Charleston—which came from Charleston, South Carolina—had been introduced to New York by Elida Webb in 1923, in the Broadway show Runnin’ Wild. It became a huge national hit. Trendy young white women were called “flappers,” a term referring to their flailing limbs as they danced the Charleston. It was a fast dance in which the whole body was used in shimmying motions with a kicking step both forward and backward; the hands were crossed on the knees as they moved toward and away from each other. The shimmy was of African derivation: it was common among Igbo girls and mature warriors in Nigeria, and among the Ibibio people, Ghana’s Ashanti, and numerous other African groups.

Partly because of dance, Harlem was a site of diffusion as whites ventured uptown. These whites came to Harlem for the same reason as some other Americans went to Cuba: to be in touch with what they saw as primal authenticity, to feel the pulse of life. Many whites thought that blacks had sensate superiority and that blacks were sensual, lewd, libidinous, and licentious—a quintessential representation of the exotic, erotic, and primitive. Blacks were supposed to be incredibly potent, perhaps even a menace to morality. Whites saw these qualities as manifested in dance, in which, as in sex, the body is the instrument.

To whites, blacks seemed to have a provocative dance vocabulary: swinging hips; a rotating, thrusting pelvis; an undulating torso; and shimmying shoulders. Also, blacks appeared to take unabashed delight in the primacy of the body, to believe in the importance of the spiritual in dance, and to express universalized personal experience in their dances. Whites in Harlem nightclubs were thrilled to partake of a sense of illicit sexuality in a socially protected environment.

In the years after World War I, prosperity and economic growth meant not only more disposable income but also a shorter workweek and longer vacations: that is, more leisure time to pursue personal entertainment. The 1920s were a time of cultural transformation, shifting moral boundaries, and changing lifestyles. The Volstead Act of 1919 had ended the legal sale and distribution of alcoholic beverages; most of the big Harlem clubs were owned by whites and flourished when liquor became illegal. As a result of all these factors, whites who lived downtown saw Harlem as a playground. Harlem witnessed a boom in cabarets from 133rd Street to 135th Street between and on Lexington and Seventh avenues. The Cotton Club, Connie's Inn, Ed Small's Paradise Nest, the Plantation Club, and the Savoy Ballroom were prominent; and the Cotton Club in particular took pride in being the source of new social dances.

Harlem revues were a saturnalia of humor, big bands, vocalists, and dancers. Revues produced for white audiences showcased light-skinned women who appealed not only to these audiences' concept of beauty but also to their taste for exoticism and animality. (Many blacks at the time of the Harlem Renaissance had the same notion of beauty and felt contempt for darker-skinned people.) Dances such as the truckin', Susie-Q, peckin', and scrotch gained recognition in production numbers and then caught on as ballroom fads. Interestingly, though, the lindy hopper George "Shorty" Snowden originated the "shorty George" step at the Savoy Ballroom; it then made its way to nightclub and vaudeville stages.

The lindy hop was the rage across black and white America and Europe for about twenty years. In one of the dance contests at the Savoy, George Snowden, its all-time champion, did a breakaway, flinging his partner out and improvising a few solo steps of his own. The effect was electric, and Snowden called the step the lindy, after Charles Lindbergh, who made a historic nonstop airplane flight from New York to Paris in 1927. In this dance, women actually did take flight; the lindy hop involved rocking and turning moves with freewheeling, flowing, improvised steps to an eight-beat count. At the Savoy, the lindy hop had a democratizing effect, offering emotional freedom and individual expression: race and class boundaries temporarily dissolved.

Clayton "Peg Leg" Bates, 1927. (© Bettmann Corbis.)

White dancers often achieved recognition by performing dances that had been originated by blacks, although the whites transformed these dances by toning down the original uninhibited display of sexuality. This appropriation of African American dances by outsiders was sometimes resented and even considered a form of theft, but it did often evoke a sense of pride in black people—a sense of having created something that others valued.

Furthermore, this appropriation of black dances by whites motivated blacks to create new dances, frequently in the sensual African tradition. For African American dance, the locus of creativity was in streets, homes, and clubs. Style makers and rule breakers, African Americans could reinvent their identity through dance, presenting a new view of their American experience. This association of dance and identity is not unique to blacks: people everywhere may consciously use dance symbolically, as an identity marker, as they might use flags, uniforms, and hairstyles.

Josephine Baker en pointe. (Library of Congress, n.d.)

In most social dance settings, the participants would say they are dancing to have a good time. Some would also say that they are seeking social or sexual partners; and some would think in terms of health—“It’s good exercise.” Black dance also simultaneously conveyed messages having to do with identity: “This is who I am. This is how creative I am.” Dance was, like swearing, a form of release; it was also an assertion that the body is beautiful. It was a component of cultural identity; it encoded messages about hierarchy, inclusion and exclusion, and exchanges across social boundaries. It might also be a covert political challenge, because dance involves a symbolic, stylistic breaking of rules. Thus artistic freedom for African Americans dancers during the Harlem Renaissance was a historically meaningful civil right.

Vocabulary: Terms in Song Accompanying Dance
 Balling: having fun, sex
 Belly rub: sexy dance
 Boogie-woogie: a kind of dance
 Bread, cabbage, cookie: vagina
 Charleston: popular dance of 1925 with movements common to several dances of the Igbo of Nigeria
 Dogging: dancing
 Fishtail: movement in which the hips create a figure eight
 Fungshun: crowded, sweaty dance
 Jagging jig: a black person; people dancing
 Jig and clog: body held upright
 Jooking: dance style
 Pecking: neck and shoulder movement similar to the Yanvallou dance of Dahomey
 Rug-cutter: a person too cheap to frequent dance halls; also, a good dancer
 Scronch: to dance with sexual innuendo
 Shaking the shimmy: a slow walk with frequent twitching of the shoulders (movement common among Igbo warriors of Nigeria)
 Shim-sham shimmy: erotic dance
 Shout: a ball or prom; one-step dance
 Stomp: raucous dance party
 Strut: stylized walk with attitude
 Trucking: dance step resembling a stroll
 Wobble: dance

JUDITH LYNNE HANNA

See also Baker, Josephine; Blackbirds; Bubbles, John; Cotton Club; Dafora, Asadata; Ellington, Duke; Harlem: 3—Entertainment; Nightclubs; Primitivism; Robinson, Bill “Bojangles”; Shuffle Along; Tucker, Earl “Snakehips”

Further Reading

- Dagan, Ester, ed. The Spirit’s Dance in Africa. Montreal, Canada: Galerie Amrad, 1997.
- Gottschild, Brenda Dixon. Waltzing in the Dark: African American Vaudeville and Race Politics in the Swing Era. New York: St. Martin’s, 2000.
- Hanna, Judith Lynne. To Dance Is Human: A Theory of Nonverbal Communication. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Miller, Norma, with Evette Jensen. Swingin’ at the Savoy. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1996.
- Perron, Wendy. “Dance in the Harlem Renaissance: Sowing Seeds.” In EmBODYing Liberation: The Black Body in American Dance, eds. Dorothea Fischer-Hornung and Alison D. Goeller. London: Lit Verlag, 2001.
- Stearns, Marshall, and Jean Stearns. Jazz Dance: The Story of American Vernacular Dance. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

Dark Laughter

Sherwood Anderson’s novel Dark Laughter (1925)—his most popular work of fiction during his lifetime—demonstrates the influence of Jean Toomer’s Cane (1923) in its language and imagery. In Dark Laughter, Anderson presents an America racially divided between the sterile materialism of the white world and the more sensual indulgences of the African American world. Against this backdrop, the novel records the struggles of two white Americans to escape the neurosis and impotence of a society damaged by overindustrialization and world war. Serving as a Greek chorus to this rebellion is the “dark laughter” of African Americans, a sound that represents to Anderson a primitive state of sensual enjoyment now lost to the modern world.

One of the main characters, John Stockton, dissatisfied with his career and his marriage, leaves his wife and home and takes a new identity as Bruce Dudley, a drifter. He first wanders down to New Orleans, where he becomes enthralled by the easy movement and laughter of the African American workers on the docks. He envies their apparent freedom from the obsessions of the white world and tries to embrace a more sensual life. After this journey South, he settles in Old Harbor, Indiana, and earns a modest living painting carriage wheels. Aline Grey, the wife of the owner of the wheel factory, is also seeking to escape—in her case, from a stifled existence and a passionless marriage.

Aline's husband, who has been physically and psychologically wounded by the war, concerns himself only with plans to expand his business. Dudley's newfound easy manner attracts Aline, who hires him as a gardener. The consummation of their relationship takes place before the amused gaze of the African American servants, who laugh at the repressive sexuality of white people.

When it was published in 1925, Dark Laughter received mixed reviews and no notice from African American publications. Some reviewers disapproved of the novel's apparent immorality and its sometimes incomprehensible experimentalism; others praised Anderson's critique of modern American materialism. A few reviewers saw in Anderson's simple construction of racial difference an attempt to construct a primitivism that could serve as an antidote to a European civilization gone awry. Waldo Frank (1925) warned that Anderson's African Americans should not be read as an attempt to represent real African Americans accurately. Anderson's romanticized vision of blackness, Frank wrote, was merely an expression of white people's longing for redemptive laughter. More recent scholars have wrestled with issues raised by the African American presence in this novel. Howe (1951) found the depictions of African Americans "oversimplified and patronizing." But Fanning (1977), in an article about the reception of Dark Laughter by French critics in the 1920s, found the novel a valuable document reflecting the racist views of some progressive white people. Dickerson (1973) argued, in an important article, that Anderson's attempt to portray a lush, sensual world of African Americans in New Orleans bears the imprint of Jean Toomer's Cane. She did not consider Dark Laughter as convincing in its execution as Toomer's work, but she noted that Anderson's novel demonstrates the lasting influence of Cane on American literature.

CHARLES D. MARTIN

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Cane; Frank, Waldo; Toomer, Jean

Further Reading

Anderson, David D. Sherwood Anderson: An Introduction and Interpretation. New York: Holt Rinehart and Winston, 1967.

Burbank, Rex. Sherwood Anderson. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Dickerson, Mary Jane. "Sherwood Anderson and Jean Toomer: A Literary Relationship." Studies in American Fiction, 1(2), 1973.

Fanning, Michael. "Black Mystics, French Cynics, Sherwood Anderson." Black American Literature Forum, 11(2), 1977.

Frank, Waldo. "Laughter and Light." Dial, 79, December 1925.

Howe, Irving. Sherwood Anderson. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1951.

Dark Princess

W. E. B. Du Bois's Dark Princess: A Romance (1928) was his second novel (the first, The Quest of the Silver Fleece, had appeared in 1911). Dark Princess can be read as dramatizing the problem of culture for the Negro—an issue of the Harlem Renaissance, the New Negro movement, and modernism.

This novel relates the journey of Matthew Towns from America to Europe and back, from one thwarted profession to another, and, after considerable struggle, from brooding isolation to happiness in marriage and fatherhood. When he is barred from completing a residency in obstetrics because he is black, Matthew goes to Berlin. There he falls in love with an Indian princess, under whose tutelage he joins an organization of "darker peoples"—Indians, Chinese, Japanese, and Egyptians—who want to dismantle European imperialism. Matthew returns home to track the progress of black Americans toward nationhood; under the guise of a Pullman porter, he becomes involved with a militant black leader in a drive to unionize black porters and then in a terrorist plot. Matthew is jailed but is then rescued by a businessman and launched into a political career that is at first brilliant but then hypocritical. Matthew enters a loveless marriage with his political manager and then a scandalous illicit affair; ultimately, though, he balances the personal with the social by marrying the Indian princess and becoming the parent of an African-Asian child who is called "king," "maharajah" and "messenger and messiah to all the darker worlds." The novel combines the conventions of social realism and romance; portrays a "new" black man; and depicts the many facets, personal and political, of desire.

The critical reception of Dark Princess reflects shifts in literary and cultural analysis and also suggests the specific challenge that Du Bois—a man with manifold and sometimes contrasting creative and social commitments—represents for readers and scholars. Alain

Locke, reviewing the novel for the New York Herald Tribune, gave it measured praise; but he called it a “not wholly successful” mixture of “pure romance” and “rich deposits of sociology,” and in a private letter to Langston Hughes he expressed graver doubts. Other reviews in the black press were more favorable. In The Crisis of October 1928, Allison Davis described Dark Princess as “propaganda at once eloquent and sane”; and Alice Dunbar Nelson, in her literary column, “As in a Looking Glass,” found it “complete and eminently soul-satisfying.” Reviews in the white press were also mixed: some considered the novel too romantic, whereas others thought its realistic portrayal of black humanity was not really “art.”

During the 1930s and 1940s, Dark Princess was overshadowed by novels of social protest, but it continued to receive attention from critics then and later (e.g., Broderick 1959; Redding 1939). Aptheker (1976) gives insight into Du Bois’s own view of this novel; in the publisher’s advertisements, Du Bois described it as a “story of the great movement of the darker races for self-expression and self-determination” and as a “romance with a message” about the “defense and self-development of the best in all races.” Moses (1982) locates Dark Princess in the tradition of African American messianic redemption. Beavers (2000) also reads it as a “messianic discourse,” and as reminiscent of the biblical parable of the prodigal son. Tate (1998) notes that it puts romantic and erotic elements at the service of racial propaganda and is disturbed by its celebration of racial hybridity and its idealization of Asian rather than African beauty; but Gilroy (1993) considers the merging of African and Asian cultures valuable and also finds in Dark Princess a “politics of transfiguration.” With regard to the aesthetics conveyed in Dark Princess, Byerman (1994) considers this element “play” (as opposed to the real “work” of the laborer); but others, including Gilroy and Posnock (1998), find deeper meaning in this theme. Dark Princess will probably continue to raise questions about race and culture, individuality and community, and politics and aesthetics.

ERIKA RENÉE WILLIAMS

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Locke, Alain; Modernism; Nelson, Alice Dunbar; New Negro Movement

Further Reading

Aptheker, Herbert. “Introduction.” In Dark Princess. Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus-Thomson, 1976.

- Beavers, Herman. “Romancing the Body Politic: Du Bois’s Propaganda of the Dark World.” Annals of the American Academy, 568, March 2000.
- Broderick, Francis L. W. E. B. Du Bois: Negro Leader in a Time of Crisis. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1959.
- Byerman, Keith. Seizing the Word: History, Art, and Self in the Works of W. E. B. Du Bois. Athens and London: University of Georgia Press, 1994.
- Gilroy, Paul. “‘Cheer the Weary Traveller’: Du Bois, Germany, and the Politics of (Dis)placement.” In The Black Atlantic. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Lester, Julius, ed. The Seventh Son: The Thoughts and Writings of W. E. B. Du Bois, Vol. 2. New York: Vintage, 1971.
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.
- Marable, Manning. W. E. B. Du Bois: Black Radical Democrat. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1986.
- Moses, Wilson Jeremiah. Black Messiahs and Uncle Toms: Social and Literary Manipulations of a Religious Myth. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1982.
- Posnock, Ross. Color and Culture: Black Writers and the Making of the Modern Intellectual. Cambridge, Mass., and London: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Redding, J. Saunders. To Make a Poet Black. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1988. (Originally published 1939.)
- Sundquist, Eric J., ed. The Oxford W. E. B. Du Bois Reader. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Tate, Claudia. “‘Dark Princess, a Romance,’ by W.E.B. Du Bois.” In Psychoanalysis and Black Novels: Desire and the Protocols of Race. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Zamir, Shamoan. Dark Voices: W. E. B. Du Bois and American Thought, 1888–1903. Chicago, Ill., and London: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

Dark Tower

The Dark Tower, a literary and artistic salon, would have been impossible without the sponsorship of A’Lelia Walker. She had, in 1919, inherited a fortune from her mother, Madame C. J. Walker, the inventor of a very popular hair-straightening process. Whereas her mother had supported African American charities, A'Lelia Walker enjoyed spending her money on jewelry, card games, parties, and cars. As Richard Bruce Nugent, an eccentric among the younger Harlem Renaissance artists, suggested, A'Lelia Walker had two motives in sponsoring the Dark Tower. First, there certainly was a wish to support African American artists, many of whom she knew personally from parties and other social occasions. Another fact may also have played a decisive role: A'Lelia Walker could, as Nugent put it harshly, be described as a "social failure" in that she was not part of the mostly class-oriented black elite. She had become rich not because of an elevated class background but through inheritance, and she was furthermore far from the African American upper-class ideal of near-white. She may have thus viewed the organization of the Dark Tower as a potential gateway to higher social circles.

The Dark Tower, planned as a setting where young artists of the Harlem Renaissance could meet and discuss their plans, was much needed because no regular meeting place existed for them. Before the inception of this salon, they occasionally met at places like Jessie Fauset's home, for formal occasions with poetry recitals; or, in contrast, at the house of Wallace Thurman, where their meetings were usually characterized by drunkenness and chaos. What the black artists and A'Lelia Walker intended to create was "a sufficiently sympathetic place . . . completely informal, a quite homey, comfortable place to which they could bring their friends for a chat and a glass of lemonade, coffee, or tea." Walker would thus occupy a position like Mabel Dodge, who had opened her home to the artists of Greenwich Village.

A'Lelia Walker chose her twin limestone townhouse at 108–110 West 136th Street in Harlem as the location for the Dark Tower. Countee Cullen served as the inspiration for the name of her salon. He had written the popular poem "From the Dark Tower," published in 1927 in Copper Sun, in which he described the suffering of the suppressed "dark" race; and from 1926 to 1928 he had also contributed "The Dark Tower," a literary and cultural column in Opportunity magazine. To create an adequate framework, Walker dedicated an entire floor to the salon and made extensive plans for redecoration. In accordance with her desire to sponsor African American artists, she wanted Aaron Douglas, the best-known painter of the Harlem Renaissance, to decorate the main room, with Nugent as his assistant. According to Nugent, numerous meetings were arranged, but no specific plans for redecorating were ever agreed on. It thus came as a surprise when formal invitations on stylish cards were issued for the grand opening of the Dark Tower in the autumn of 1928:

We dedicate this tower to the aesthetes. That cultural group of young Negro writers, sculptors, painters, music artists, composers and their friends. A quiet place of particular charm. A rendezvous where they may feel at home to partake of a little tidbit amid pleasant, interesting atmosphere. Members only and those whom they wish to bring will be accepted. If you choose to become one of us you may register when first attending "The Dark Tower." One dollar a year. Open nine at eve 'til two in the morn." (quoted in Watson 1995, 143)

The younger artists to whom the place was explicitly dedicated were astonished: the salon was characterized by what Nugent described as "stiff dignity" rather than, as planned, by a casual, relaxed atmosphere. The cream-colored walls had been decorated not by Aaron Douglas but by Paul Frankel, a local sign painter, who had put up passages from Cullen's "From the Dark Tower" and Langston Hughes's "The Weary Blues" in gold lettering on facing walls. Nor did the furniture correspond to earlier plans for an informal air: it consisted of stylish rosewood chairs and tables, a rosewood piano, rose-colored curtains, and a blue Victrola. More decisive for the future development of the Dark Tower, however, were the arrangements regarding prices. Before the opening of the salon, the plan had been to consider the young artists' lack of money—"Food was to be so reasonably priced that the artists would be benefited"—but now everything was set up differently: Everyone turned up in evening clothes; hats had to be checked for 15 cents; and food was expensive. As Nugent remembered it, there was only one option when the guests "saw the menus. Coffee—10 cents, sandwiches anywhere from 25 to 50 cents; lemonade a quarter—and on and on. They left hungry." Moreover, it seemed that the focus was not really on black artists. According to Nugent, "the place was filled to overflowing with whites from downtown who had come up expecting that this was a new and hot nightclub."

Although some artists of the Harlem Renaissance returned to the Dark Tower on other occasions, it was clear that the vision of a regular meeting place had failed. Nevertheless, the Dark Tower survived for roughly one year. As is evident from newspaper reports by Geraldyn Dismond, the gossip columnist for the Inter-State Tattler, its social status was significant; and Dismond therefore bemoaned its closing. Moving from West 136 Street to her apartment on Edgecombe Avenue, A'Leia Walker decided to reopen the Dark Tower—this time, however, not as an artists' venue but as a nightclub and restaurant in the studio below the actual Dark Tower salon. The new venture, which opened, rather optimistically, on 27 October 1929, three days after Wall Street's "black Thursday," apparently continued until A'Leia Walker's death on 16 August 1931. Eventually, the place was leased to the city.

Although it did not achieve its actual purpose of serving African Americans artists, the Dark Tower still stands out as a symbol of an unprecedented upsurge of black self-confidence and creativity.

CHRISTA SCHWARZ

See also Cullen, Countee; Douglas, Aaron; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Hughes, Langston; Inter-State Tattler; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Salons; Thurman, Wallace; Walker, A'Leia

Further Reading

Cullen, Countée. "From the Dark Tower." In Copper Sun. New York: Harper, 1927.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Nugent, Richard Bruce. "The Dark Tower." N.d. (Probably late 1930s; private collection of Thomas H. Wirth, Elizabeth, N.J.)

Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

DePriest, Oscar

When Oscar Stanton DePriest came to Chicago in 1889, the city was rapidly changing and expanding as a result of migration from the American South and immigration from Europe; between 1880 and 1930, Chicago's African American population would increase from 6,480 to 233,903. Although discrimination and de facto segregation existed in Chicago, racial issues were not as virulent there as in the South.

DePriest became active in local politics, joining the Republican Party. His service to the Republicans was rewarded in 1904, when he was nominated for and elected to the Cook County Commission; he served consecutively until 1908. After 1908, he concentrated on his real estate business.

Between 1906 and 1915 DePriest worked with leading African American politicians to form a black political organization centered in two predominantly black wards in Chicago's South Side. In this effort, they were aided by the large migration of blacks to Chicago during World War I; and they succeeded in organizing a voting bloc capable of settling factional disputes within the party.

In 1915 DePriest ran for the city council, backed by a progressive coalition that elected him as the first African American alderman in Chicago. As an alderman, he became part of William "Big Bill" Thompson's political machine. When the Republican U.S. Congressman Martin Madden died, DePriest ran for the open seat; in November 1928, attracting the rapidly rising African American constituency, he was elected and became a member of the Seventy-First Congress. He thus also became the first African American elected to Congress in the twentieth century, the first elected from a northern state, and an inspiration to politically minded Harlemites. He served three consecutive terms before leaving office on 2 January 1935, after the Democratic landslide in the election of 1934.

Oscar DePriest at his desk at the Capitol in Washington, D.C., 1929. (© Bettmann Corbis.)

As an African American Congressman, DePriest was subjected to several personal slights, and his congressional career received mixed reviews. He was criticized, for example, for opposing federal aid to the unemployed; he was unable to get an antilynching bill passed; and he could not achieve a law changing the venue of a trial if the defendant believed that a fair trial was impossible in the designated jurisdiction. However, he was praised for demanding equal treatment in the House of Representatives and for eating in the Senate dining room. He also defended the right of students at Howard University to be served in the House restaurant; and he obtained approval of an increase from $240,000 to $460,000 in federal aid for Howard University's power plant. Ignoring death threats, he delivered speeches in the South. His most recognized legislative achievement was an amendment prohibiting discrimination in the Civilian Conservation Corps.

After serving in Congress, DePriest returned to Chicago and his real estate business. An ardent anti-communist, he remained politically active: he won a seat on the Chicago city council in 1943 and served until 1947. He died in 1951.

Biography

Oscar Stanton DePriest was born on 9 March 1871, in Florence, Alabama; his mother worked part time as a laundress; his father was a farmer. In 1878 the family settled in Kansas; Oscar DePriest was educated in local schools there and then studied business for two years at Salina Normal School. In 1888 he left home; he spent a year traveling and then moved to Chicago, working as a painter, a decorator, and eventually an independent contractor and realtor. He became active in the Republican Party and was commissioner in Cook County in 1904–1908. In 1906–1915 he participated in forming a black political organization in Chicago; in 1915, he was elected to the city council. He was elected to the U.S. Congress in 1928 and served until 1935. DePriest died in 1951, after having been hit by a bus.

ABEL BARTLEY

See also Politics and Politicians

Further Reading

Chicago Defender. 19 May 1951.

Gossnell, Harold F. Negro Politicians: The Rise of Negro Politics in Chicago. 1967.

New York Times. 13 May 1951.

Spear, Allan. Black Chicago: The Making of a Negro Ghetto 1880–1920. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1967.

Dean, Lillian Harris

Lillian Harris (Lillian Harris Dean, 1870–1928), known as “Pig Foot Mary,” was an entrepreneur in Harlem. Unlike her famous contemporary, the businesswoman Madame C. J. Walker, Dean was known to few people outside Harlem. Yet in Harlem, she was a legendary success story: unable to read or write, she had achieved prosperity through inventiveness, hard work, and business savvy.

Pig Foot Mary was described as a black woman with a pleasant face and a deep voice, and physically immense—she was often called “Goliath” and “Amazon-like.” From early morning until late at night, her towering figure could be seen stationed on a segment of the sidewalk at Sixtieth Street and Amsterdam Avenue in front of Rudolph's Saloon. There, wearing one of her starched, checked gingham dresses, she sold the delicacies that many southern-born Harlemites had grown up eating: pigs' feet, chitterlings, corn on the cob, and hogmaws.

Pig Foot Mary had run away from her impoverished home as a teenager and had eventually come to New York City in 1901. She began her business shortly after arriving in Harlem, selling her wares at first from a dilapidated baby carriage. Taking five dollars that she had earned working as a domestic during her first week in Harlem, she spent three of the dollars for the baby carriage and a large wash boiler and spent the other two on pigs' feet. She persuaded the proprietor of Rudolph's saloon to allow her to use his stove each day to boil her wares, and by the end of a month, her business was a stunning success. She then progressed from the baby carriage to selling her wares over a specially constructed portable steam table that she had designed.

In 1917, in an effort to find better living conditions, many black people started moving farther uptown into Harlem. Pig Foot Mary then moved her business to the corner of 135th Street and Lenox Avenue, next to John Dean, who had a flourishing newspaper stand and shoeshine stall there. She and Dean were married shortly afterward.

It has been said that one reason why Pig Foot Mary worked so hard was to save money for her old age: she wanted to afford a place for herself in a respectable old folks' home. After marrying Dean and evidently feeling somewhat more secure, she began to invest the income from her food business in Harlem real estate. Her first acquisition was a $44,000 apartment on Seventh Avenue, which she sold six years later for $72,000. She then bought more buildings at 69–71 West 138th Street, and then still more at 2324 Seventh Avenue, as well as houses in Pasadena, California. She was considered a tough, no-nonsense landlord; tenants and agents who fell behind in their rent would receive letters admonishing them to "Send it and send it damn quick!" By 1925, her real estate holdings were valued conservatively at $375,000.

Biography

Lillian Harris Dean (Pig Foot Mary) was born in 1870, in a shanty on the Mississippi delta, to a large, poverty-stricken family. Longing for a better life, she ran away from home as a teenager and wandered to many northern cities before she arrived in New York City in the autumn of 1901. In Harlem, where she became a prosperous and legendary figure, she sold southern food on the street, married John Dean c. 1917, and invested profitably in real estate. She died in 1928 in California, at age fifty-eight.

JANICE TUCK LIVELY

See also other businesses

Further Reading

- Bascom, Lionel C., ed. A Renaissance in Harlem. New York: Avon, 1999.
- Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Bundles, A'Lelia. On Her Own Ground: The Life and Times of Madam C. J. Walker. New York: Scribner, 2001.
- "Dean, Pig Foot Mary." In The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary of the Era, ed. Bruce Kellner. New York, 1987, p. 97.
- Fisher, Walter. "Sarah Breedlove Walker." In Notable American Women, ed. Edward T. James et al. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1971.

Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York, 1981, pp. 109–110.

"Pig Foot Mary." In The Negro in New York: An Informal Social History, eds. Roi Ottley and William J. Weatherby. New York, 1967, p. 187.

Defender

See Chicago Defender

Delaney, Beauford

Beauford Delaney, an expressionist painter, whose brother Joseph was also an artist, was born in Tennessee in 1901 and studied in Boston. In the midst of the Harlem Renaissance, Beauford Delaney went to New York and found work as a bellboy. He lived in Greenwich Village during the 1930s and 1940s. During that period, he was highly productive; he exhibited at the Whitney Studio Gallery in 1930 and at the Harmon Foundation in Harlem, and he had his first one-man show at the Harlem branch of the New York Public Library. In 1936, under the auspices of the Federal Arts Project, he assisted Georgette Seabrooke Powell on a mural for the nurses' recreation room at Harlem Hospital.

In 1947 Delaney exhibited at the Pyramid Club in Philadelphia; in the 1950s he had a successful show at the RoKo Gallery in New York. At the time, his subjects were mainly urban scenes and portraits. Gregarious and endowed with an engaging personality, Delaney met many important people who recognized his talent and sat for portraits. Among his sitters were W. E. B. Dubois, the New Orleans jazz musician Billy Pierce, Louis Armstrong, Duke Ellington, W. C. Handy, the cartoonist Al Hirschfeld, and the author Henry Miller.

Just as Delaney's subjects were inspired by the white community as well as by the African American community—he was at home both in Harlem and in the Village—so his style reflected influences from both groups. He was impressed by the painterly possibilities of abstract expressionism, which he combined with the rhythms of jazz. His Can Fire in the Park (1946), for example, has affinities with expressionism; the impasto paint is thickly applied, and the color is vivid. It shows a group of blacks gathered around a fire in a garbage can. Illuminated with Delaney's unique light, the canvas pulsates with shimmering reds, yellows, blues, and greens. The outlines vibrate as if to the rhythm of music.

Like Jackson Pollock, Delaney studied for a time with Thomas Hart Benton at the Art Students League and was apparently influenced by his teacher's dynamic painted figures. With a fellowship to Yaddo in the 1950s, Delaney found the time and space to experiment with abstraction. From then on, nonrepresentational paintings would become part of his repertoire.

In the 1950s Delaney went to Paris, where he would spend the rest of his life and would become a magnet for other black artists living abroad. Constantly in need of money, he was helped by his friends among the expatriate American intellectuals in Paris. In addition to Miller, Delaney painted portraits of

Beauford Delaney, photographed by Carl Van Vechten. (Library of Congress.)

James Jones, James Baldwin, and Jean Genet. But sometimes he painted distinctively black themes, as in his portrait Rosa Parks (1970). He shows the defiant civil rights activist in a perky yellow hat and dress, seated confidently on a park bench, surrounded by his signature white impasto light. In the background the silhouette of a black man echoes a barren tree at the right.

In 1973, Delaney had a major retrospective in Paris, but by then his mind and his health were deteriorating as a result of alcoholism and Alzheimer's disease. He died in 1979.

Biography

Beauford Delaney was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, on 31 December 1901. His mother, Delia, had been born a slave in Virginia and later worked as a domestic. His father, part African American and part Native American Creek, was a Methodist Episcopal preacher who built churches in rural Tennessee and Virginia. Delaney attended an all-black high school in Knoxville before moving to Boston. There he studied art at the Massachusetts Normal School, the South Boston School of Art, and the Copley Society; frequented the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum; and developed an interest in classical music and opera. He moved to New York during the Harlem Renaissance and navigated between the white artists in Greenwich Village and the blacks who frequented Harlem. In the 1950s he went to Paris, where he remained until his death. He is best-known for his portraits, mainly of well-known intellectuals, and for his urban scenes. His style is expressionist, but he had a uniquely vivid color sense that he combined with musical rhythm, making his pictures seem to vibrate. Delaney died in 1979 and is buried in Paris.

Laurie Adams

See also Artists; Greenwich Village; Harmon Foundation

Further Reading

Beauford Delaney: A Retrospective. New York, 1978. (Exhibition catalog.)

Leeming, David. Amazing Grace: A Life of Beauford Delaney. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

- Lewis, Samela. African-American Art and Artists. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.
- Miller, Henry. The Amazing and Invariable Beauford Delaney. New York, 1941. (Reissued 1978.)
- Patton, Sharon F. African-American Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Delany, Clarissa Scott

Although she is best-known for her poetry, Clarissa Scott Delany was active in several professions. She contributed essays, book reviews, and poems to Crisis, Opportunity, and Palms, but she also traveled in Europe, taught at the prestigious Dunbar High School, and collected statistical data as a social worker in New York City. Some insight into her varied experiences may be found in her poem "Solace," in which she writes "my life is fevered/and a restlessness at times . . . possesses me." In each endeavor, she addressed the concerns of African Americans from all walks of life.

Delany's social consciousness was probably inspired by her father, Emmet Jay Scott, who was Booker T. Washington's secretary. Delany was raised in the "black belt" in a middle-class family; she left home at age fifteen to study at the Bradford Academy in New England. Upon graduation, she entered Wellesley College, where she studied poetry and social economics and was a member of the varsity field hockey team, as well as many clubs. It was during this time that Scott began attending meetings of the Literary Guild in Boston, where she heard Claude McKay speak and made connections with other socially minded and artistically inspired African Americans.

Her literary and political interests blend in "A Golden Afternoon in Germany," an essay inspired by a postgraduation trip through Europe and published in Opportunity in 1925. This piece profiles two German artists whose works show, in Delany's words, "a recognition of soul, of spirituality in the African." Although the essay explicitly discusses major issues of the Harlem Renaissance, such as pan-Africanism, art, and essentialism, Delany's poetry is more subtle and personal, revealing her private struggles through the imagery of nature. For example, in "Solace," the speaker discovers in the "shifting/Pageant of the seasons" a way that she can "Take meaning from all turmoil/And leave serenity/Which knows no pain." Throughout her poetry, rain and wind seem to be a counterpart to the speakers' emotions and seem to offer the writer some distance from anguish. Such distance is addressed more directly in "The Mask," which features a speaker so detached from emotion that she refers to herself as "she," until a betrayal causes the mask to fall and the "I" to emerge. However, Delany writes not only of masking the "bitter black despair" of social and personal defeat, but also of transcendence, as in her often-quoted "Interim": "Another day will find me brave/and not afraid to dare."

After three years of teaching at Dunbar High School, Clarissa Scott married Hubert T. Delany, a lawyer, and moved to New York City. She continued to work as a poet, critic, and social worker until her death of kidney disease in 1927. Although she published only four poems, her work was lauded by W. E. B. Du Bois, Alice Dunbar Nelson, and Countee Cullen, who included her poems in his anthology Caroling Dusk. Upon her death, Delany's Dunbar colleagues Angelina Weld Grimké and Anna Julia Cooper wrote moving tributes to her.

Biography

Clarissa Mae Scott Delany was born on 22 May 1901, in Tuskegee, Alabama. She studied at Bradford Academy, Haverhill, Massachusetts (1916–1919); and Wellesley College, Wellesley, Massachusetts (B.A., Phi Beta Kappa, 1919–1923). Delany taught at Dunbar High School in Washington, D.C. (1923–1926), and was a social worker with the National Urban League and the Women's City Club of New York (1926). Her husband was Hubert T. Delany, a lawyer. Her poem "Solace" won fourth place in the literary contest sponsored by Opportunity. She died in New York City, on 11 October 1927, at age twenty-six.

REBECCA MEACHAM

See also Authors: 5–Poets; Crisis, The; Cullen, Countee; Grimké, Angelina Weld; Nelson, Alice Dunbar; Opportunity; Opportunity Literary Contests; Palms

Selected Works

- "A Golden Afternoon in Germany." 1925. (Essay.)
- "Solace." 1925.
- "Interim." 1926.

"The Mask." 1926.

"Joy." 1926.

Further Reading

Cullen, Countee, ed. Caroling Dusk: An Anthology of Verse by Negro Poets. New York: Harper and Row, 1927. (See also 2nd ed., 1974.)

Grimké, Angelina Weld. "To Clarissa Scott Delaney [sic]." In The Selected Works of Angelina Weld Grimké, ed. Carolivia Herron. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Honey, Maureen. Shadowed Dreams: Women's Poetry of the Harlem Renaissance. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1989.

———. "Survival and Song: Women Poets of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance 1920–1940: Analysis and Assessment, 1980–1994, ed. Cary D. Wintz. New York: Garland, 1996.

Roses, Lorraine Elena, and Elizabeth Randolph, eds. Harlem's Glory: Black Women Writing, 1900–1950. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.

Roses, Lorraine Elena, and Elizabeth Randolph, eds. Harlem Renaissance and Beyond: Literary Biographies of 100 Black Women Writers, 1900–1945. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Shockley, Ann Allen. Afro-American Women Writers, 1746–1933: An Anthology and Critical Guide. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1988.

Wilson, Sondra Kathryn, ed. The "Opportunity" Reader: Stories, Poetry, and Essays from the Urban League's "Opportunity" Magazine. New York: Modern Library (Random House), 1999.

Dett, Robert Nathaniel

I am a musician whose ambition in life is the advancement of my people, and who believes absolutely in equality of opportunity for all peoples, regardless of race, creed, or color, or previous condition of servitude. (Excerpt from Annual Report to President Gregg, Hampton Institute, 1918)

Robert Nathaniel Dett was born in Canada and raised in New York. He had been a child prodigy, and as an adult he worked for the advancement of "his people" through his roles as educator, pianist and organist, composer, conductor, and intellectual.

Dett's commitment to education was apparent not only in his personal academic studies and accomplishments but also through his teaching: he was a professor at numerous black institutes and colleges. His longest tenure was at Hampton Institute (1913–1932), where he served as the first black chair of music and introduced the B.S. degree in music. He was a protégé of the black educator and soprano E. Azalia Hackley; and one of his students—among other noted artists—was the acclaimed soprano Dorthy Maynor.

As a pianist and organist, Dett performed at numerous prestigious venues, including Carnegie Hall, Boston Symphony Hall, and the Library of Congress. He also performed for two presidents: Herbert Hoover and Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Dett's rapid success during the early 1920s gained him the attention and support of the banker and philanthropist George Foster Peabody, who was his benefactor for more than a decade.

Dett was one of the most celebrated composers of the period; his nearly 100 compositions include works for piano, chorus, solo voice, orchestra, and organ. Many of his compositions reflect his love of black folk music, especially the spiritual. Dett's compositional style was characterized by traditional harmonies and rhythms and was often classified as neoromantic. He received some criticism because of this style, which was seen as an imitation of white classical composers. Nevertheless, along with Harry T. Burleigh, Will Marion Cook, and J. Rosamund Johnson, he paved the way for subsequent black composers; and Penman Lovinggood described Dett as "our most characteristically racial composer." Dett's most noted pieces during the period include the motet The Chariot Jubilee (1919), based on the spiritual "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot"; "Let Us Cheer the Weary Traveler" (1926); and the oratorio The Ordering of Moses (1931–1932, 1937).

Dett was also an esteemed leader within the music community. In the spirit of self-empowerment, he formed the Musical Arts Society in 1919 as a way to invite distinguished artists such as Marian Anderson, Percy Grainger, Roland Hayes, Clarence Cameron White, and Burleigh to the Hampton-Norfolk area to give lectures, concerts, and performance clinics. Also in 1919, motivated by his love of black folk music and by his desire to preserve this music and to foster talent, he cofounded the National Association of Negro Musicians (NANM) with Nora Holt, Henry Grant, and White. Dett served as chair of NAMN's advisory board and later as its president.

Many of Dett's thoughts on black music are expressed in his prize-winning four-part essay "Negro Music" (1920), and in numerous published and unpublished articles.

Biography

Robert Nathaniel Dett was born on 11 October 1882, in Drummondville, Ontario (Canada). He studied at Halstead Conservatory of Music in Lockport, New York, with its founder, Oliver Willis Halstead (1901–1903); at Oberlin College Conservatory of Music in Ohio, with Howard Handel Carter (piano), J. W. Horner (voice), F. Lehman (theory), Edward Dickinson (history of music), Arthur E. Heacox (theory), George Carl Hastings (piano), George W. Andrews (organ and composition), and J. R. Frampton (organ), receiving a bachelor of music degree in piano and composition (1908); again at the Oberlin Conservatory with Karl Gehrken (musical pedagogy, summer 1913); at Columbia University in New York with Peter Dykema (summer 1915); at the American Conservatory of Music in Chicago (summer 1915); at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois, with Lawrence Erb (summer 1915); at Harvard University with Arthur Foote (1919–1920); at Fontainebleau School of Music in France, with Nadia Boulanger (1929); and at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, New York, with Max Landow (piano), Bernard Rogers (composition and orchestration), Edward Royce (counterpoint), and Howard Hanson (modern harmony) in 1932. Dett taught at Lane College in Jackson, Tennessee (1908–1911); at Lincoln Institute in Jefferson, Missouri (1911–1913); at Hampton Institute in Virginia (1913–1932); at the Eastman School of Music (1931–1933); at Sam Houston College in Austin, Texas (summer 1937); and at Bennett College in Greensboro, North Carolina (1937–1942). He was the founder of the Musical Arts Society (1919); a cofounder (1919) and president (1924–1926) of the National Association of Negro Musicians; and director of the Hampton Institute Choir (1913–1931) and of the Hampton Institute School of Music (1928–1932). His awards included the Francis Boot Music Award (1919), Bowdoin Literary Prize (1920), and the Harmon Foundation Award (1928). He received honorary doctorates from Howard University (1924) and Oberlin College Conservatory of Music (1926). He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, American Society of Composers, National Association of Negro Musicians, and National Association of Teachers in Colored Schools. Dett died in Battle Creek, Michigan, on 2 October 1943.

EMMETT PRICE III

See also Anderson, Marian; Burleigh, Harry Thacker; Cook, Will Marion; Hayes, Roland; Holt, Nora; Johnson, John Rosamond; Lovinggood, Penman; Music; National Association of Negro Musicians; White, Clarence Cameron

Selected Writings

- "Emancipation of Negro Music." Southern Workman, 47, 1918.
- "Musical Standards." Etude, 15, 1920.
- "John W. Work." Southern Workman, 54, 1925.
- "As the Negro Sings." Southern Workman, 56, 1927.
- Religious Folk Songs of the Negro as Sung at Hampton Institute*. Hampton, Va.: Hampton Institute Press, 1927. (As editor.)
- "Musical Invasion of Europe: Hampton Institute Choir Abroad." 1930.
- The Dett Collection of Negro Spirituals*, 4 vols. Chicago, Ill.: Hall and McCreary, 1936. (As editor.)
- "From Bell Stand to Throne Room . . ." Etude, 52, 1934; reprinted in Black Perspective in Music, 1(1), 1973.

Selected Compositions

- "America the Beautiful." New York: Fisher, 1918.
- "Go On, Mule!" New York: John Church, 1918.
- "A Thousand Years Ago or More." New York: John Church, 1919.
- Concert Waltz and Ballad*. 1919. (Unpublished.)
- "Magic Moon of Molten Gold." New York: John Church, 1919.
- The Chariot Jubilee*. New York: John Church, 1919. (Recorded: Audio House AHS 30F75.)
- "Enchantment." New York: John Church, 1922.
- "Nepenthe and the Muse." New York: John Church, 1922.
- "Oh, the Land I'm Bound For." New York: John Church, 1923.
- "The Winding Road." Bryn Mawr, Pa.: Theodore Presser, 1923.
- "Cotton Needs Pickin'." 1924. (Unpublished.)
- Sonata No. 1 in F Minor. 1924. (Unpublished.)
- "The Voice of the Sea." New York: John Church, 1924.
- "Were Thou the Moon." New York: John Church, 1924.
- Sonata No. 2 in E Minor. 1925. (Unpublished.)

- "Fair Weather." Bryn Mawr, Pa.: Theodore Presser, 1926.
- "God Understands." New York: John Church, 1926.
- "Let Us Cheer the Weary Traveler." New York: John Church, 1926.
- Cinnamon Grove Suite*. New York: John Church, 1928.
- "Lord Gently, Lord, and Slow." New York: John Church, 1929.
- "My Day." New York: John Church, 1929.
- "As Children Walk Ye in God's Love." New York: Schirmer, 1930.
- "Ave Maria." New York: Schirmer, 1930.
- The Ordering of Moses: Biblical Folk Scenes*. 1931–1932. (Master's thesis, Eastman School of Music; rev. 1937; recorded: Silver Crest TAL 42868, Unique Opera Records UORC 113.)
- "As by the Stream of Babylon." New York: Schirmer, 1933.
- "Juba." Chicago, Ill.: Clayton F. Summy, 1934.
- "O Lord, the Hard-Won Miles." New York: Schirmer, 1934.
- "Iorana: Tahitian Maiden's Love Song." Chicago, Ill.: Clayton F. Summy, 1935.
- "Now Rest Beneath Night's Shadows." New York: Fisher, 1938.

Further Reading

- Brooks, Christopher. "R(ober) Nathaniel Dett." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, 2nd ed., Vol. 7., ed. Stanley Sadie. London: Macmillan, 2001.
- McBrier, Vivian Flagg. R. Nathaniel Dett, His Life and Works (1882–1943). Washington, D.C.: Associated Publication, 1974.
- Perry, Frank Jr. "R. Nathaniel Dett." In Afro-American Vocal Music: A Select Guide to Fifteen Composers. Berrien Springs, Mich.: Van de Vere, 1991.
- Ryder, Georgia A. "Harlem Renaissance Ideals in the Music of Robert Nathaniel Dett." In Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance: A Collection of Essays, ed. Samuel A. Floyd Jr. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- . "R(ober) Nathaniel Dett." In Center for Black Music Research, International Dictionary of Black Composers, Vol. 1, ed. Samuel Floyd Jr. Chicago, Ill.: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.
- Simpson, Anne Key. Follow Me: The Life And Music of R. Nathaniel Dett. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1993.
- Spencer, Jon Michael. "R. Nathaniel Dett's Views on the Preservation of Black Music." Black Perspective in Music, 10(2), 1982.
- . "Wild Dreams of Bringing Glory and Honor to the Negro Race." In The New Negroes and Their Music. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1997.

- . "The R. Nathaniel Dett Reader: Essays on Black Sacred Music." Special issue of Black Sacred Music: A Journal of Theomusicology, 5(2), Fall 1991.

Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus

Wilfred Adolphus (W. A.) Domingo, an Afro-Caribbean immigrant, was a businessman, journalist, and author and a participant in the Garveyite, socialist, and communist movements in Harlem. He and Marcus Garvey had met in Kingston, where they were members of the National Club, a political organization, and they remained in close contact in the United States. Domingo introduced Garvey to the works of the nineteenth-century proto-black nationalist Edward Wilmot Blyden, and later to several radical black intellectuals in Harlem, including Hubert Harrison, A. Philip Randolph, Chandler Owen, and Richard B. Moore.

Although Domingo never officially joined Garvey's United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), he was an active participant in early meetings of the New York branch in 1917–1919; he also arranged for a local printer, Henry Rogowski, to publish UNIA's periodical Negro World, and from August 1918 to July 1919, Domingo was its founding editor, a position in which Garvey gave him considerable latitude. However, Domingo's use of Negro World to express his own socialist views troubled Garvey, who espoused Booker T. Washington's bootstrap capitalism and who wanted to avoid trouble during the "red scare" of 1919. In June 1919, during a raid on the Rand School, the Lusk Committee seized many socialist texts, including a work in progress by Domingo called Socialism Imperiled, and Garvey and Domingo's collaboration came to an acrimonious end. Garvey and the UNIA's executive committee put Domingo on "trial" for publicizing views and ideas inconsistent with Garveyism, and Domingo left Negro World in July 1919. In 1925, in an open letter to the editor of the Jamaican Gleaner, Domingo publicly denounced Garvey's practices as "medieval, obscure, and dishonest" and Garvey's steamship corporation, the Black Star Line, as virtually a swindle.

As a political essayist, Domingo contributed articles on racism, capitalist exploitation, and imperialism to various radical black journals. He worked for the Messenger during the early 1920s, when the black socialists A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen were attacking Garvey (who had held an infamous meeting with the Ku Klux Klan); but Domingo parted ways with the Messenger in 1923 after Randolph and Owen's crusade against Garvey became anti-West Indian. At this time, Domingo shifted his affiliation from the Socialist Party to the Harlem branch of the Communist Party. He also joined the African Blood Brotherhood (ABB) and began handling its periodical, the Crusader, as well as guiding ABB's publicity and propaganda. He started a weekly magazine of his own, the Emancipator, during the late 1920s.

One of Domingo's emphases was the importance of West Indian immigration to racial uplift in America. Later in his life, he was a notable critic of the short-lived West Indian Federation, a pan-Caribbean nationalist entity founded in 1958. Aside from this, however, little is known about Domingo's last years.

Biography

Wilfred Adolphus Domingo was born on 26 November 1889, in Kingston, Jamaica. He left Jamaica for the United States in 1910, relocated from Boston to New York in 1912, and started a fruit and vegetable import business in Harlem in 1922. Domingo was an editor of Negro World, a columnist for The Messenger (1917–1923), and a founding member of the African Blood Brotherhood (1919–1924). He also worked on and contributed to other radical black periodicals. He and Marcus Garvey had a long friendship and collaboration but eventually broke with each other. The date of Domingo's death is unknown.

J. M. FLOYD-THOMAS

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Black Star Line; Garvey, Marcus; Harrison, Hubert; Messenger, The; Moore, Richard B.; Negro World; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; United Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

James, Winston A. Holding Aloft the Banner of Ethiopia: Caribbean Radicalism in America, 1900–1932. New York: Verso, 1997.

Johnson, James W. Black Manhattan. New York: Arno, 1968. (Originally published 1930.)

Kornweibel, Theodore Jr. No Crystal Stair: Black Life and the Messenger, 1917–1928. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1975.

———. Seeing Red: Federal Campaigns against Black Militancy, 1919–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Watkins-Owens, Irma. Blood Relations: Caribbean Immigrants and the Harlem Community, 1900–1930. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

Who's Who in Colored America. 1933.

Douglas, Aaron

Aaron Douglas was the leading visual artist of the Harlem Renaissance. Within weeks of his arrival in Harlem in 1925, he was recruited by W. E. B. Du Bois, the editor of The Crisis; and by Charles S. Johnson, the editor of Opportunity, to illustrate their editorials and articles on lynching, segregation, political issues, theater, and jazz, as well as poems and stories. Douglas, a high school teacher in Kansas City, had decided to join the young artists of the Harlem Renaissance after seeing a copy of Survey Graphic, which had devoted a special issue to Harlem and had chosen the Bavarian artist Winold Reiss to create a cover for the magazine. Douglas was impressed by Reiss's dignified, forthright portrayal of blacks.

Douglas was hired to create a visual message about a largely literary movement, for a public that had grown dramatically with the increase of black migration to the North during World War I. Du Bois had complained often in Crisis about a lack of black patronage and of a black audience, most notably in his "Criteria of Negro Art." As he knew, black artists found that most support for their work came from whites, who were the main patrons of the Harlem Renaissance; and he believed that blacks needed to support their own artists. It was his hope that Douglas could reach a new, emerging black public across the United States, starting with Harlem. This was a role that only an illustrator could fill. Crisis had a wide national readership, and any illustration Douglas made would be seen in libraries, schools, and homes across the country. Douglas tried to reach this new black middle-class public by using the language of African art as one of his most important tools. Before Douglas, some American artists had begun to include African art in their work, but none had used it on a regular basis.

Du Bois realized that an artist could help relay a message; and art, according to Du Bois, should have a message. He stated: "I do not care a damn for any art that is not used for propaganda. But I do care when propaganda is confined to one side while the other is stripped and silent." Douglas, accordingly, tried to create a new, positive black image, influenced by Africa. He was tired of white people's depictions of blacks and believed that his work could touch the black audience in a unique way. He wanted to change the way blacks were depicted in art and to bring the language of African art to Harlem and then to the entire United States. In 1925, he explained in a letter to Alta Sawyer, his future wife: "We are possessed, you know, with the idea that it is necessary to be white, to be beautiful. Nine times out of ten it is just the reverse. It takes lots of training or a tremendous effort to down the idea that thin lips and a straight nose [are] the apogee of beauty. But once free you can look back with a sigh of relief and wonder how anyone could be so deluded."

Douglas's growth and experimentation can be seen in his magazine illustrations, in which he created some of his most forceful and interesting works and evolved his artistic language, a language immersed in African art to a degree that was unprecedented among American artists. These works are clean and bold, often consisting of just a few simple figures that illustrate a basic idea or just show images of African Americans.

Douglas's first illustration in Crisis, in the issue of February 1962, was "Invincible Music: The Spirit of Africa," which had been drawn specifically for the magazine but was not accompanied by any related text and did not accompany any article. "Invincible Music" consists of one figure, presumably male, in silhouette, with head raised in song to the sky and right arm holding a mallet that is used to beat a large drum. This figure is crouching and is clad in only a simple wrap around the waist; the position—with shoulders parallel to the picture plane rather than receding into space in correct perspective—and the figure's hair and entire bodily profile or silhouette are reminiscent of Egyptian art, in which Douglas had a great interest. Here Egypt stands for all of Africa. Douglas was also trying to simplify the human form. Two shield-like marquis shapes are implanted in the ground behind the figure; their jagged design resembles African-inspired patterning. These shapes symbolize plant life, as do three smaller versions, which look like leaves and are placed in front of the figure. At the top of the drawing are two large jagged shapes that represent sources of energy, perhaps the sun or stars, as well as a stylized stream of smoke on the right. At the bottom of the drawing are flat papyrus plants (resembling tulips), which appear to be inspired by art deco. This drawing is successful partly because it is so simple, with large expanses of solid black and a bright white background, highlighted by grayish outlines and details, and also because its format—a silhouette—is so forceful.

Douglas's next illustration for Crisis, "Poster of the Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre of Harlem," appeared in the issue of May 1926. It was not related to any particular play but was rather a type of advertisement for Du Bois's theater project. This illustration is even more strongly influenced by Egyptian and African imagery. Like "Invincible Music," it is in solid black and white, and it is boldly executed, almost like a woodblock print. The poster shows a single figure, sitting cross-legged, with the face turned to the side so that it is shown in profile; the figure is angular, primarily rectilinear in form, with exaggeratedly thick lips, the appearance of geometric tribal makeup, an afro hairstyle, a large hoop earring dangling from the visible ear, and an African mask or ancestral head held in the left hand. Stylized plants and flowers, resembling African motifs and art deco patterning, surround the figure, and a palm tree is shown. Above the figure, the influence of Egypt is apparent in pyramids on the left, a sun form above, and a sphinx on the right. Wave patterns form the bottom third of the composition, perhaps representing the Nile. Although this picture may have little to do with actual African imagery, the viewer can immediately see that the inspiration is African. Du Bois wanted Douglas to remind the readers of Crisis of their African ancestry and to inspire in them an interest in their common heritage. Egypt provided a vocabulary for achieving this goal, although except for the fact that the discovery of Tutankhamen's tomb had prompted a renewed interest in African art, there was only a tenuous link between Egypt and sub-Saharan Africa.

In addition to Crisis and Opportunity, Douglas did illustrations for other journals, including Theatre Arts Monthly; for books, including Locke's New Negro; and for the poems of Langston Hughes. He also received several commissions for murals and portraits. He created a particularly innovative cover for Fire!!, a radical black publication edited by Wallace Thurman that attempted to break away from the confines of the traditional leaders of the Harlem Renaissance and create a new artistic voice. Douglas also did three interior drawings for Fire!! and wrote its artistic statement.

In 1930 Douglas was commissioned to execute a cycle of murals for the library of Fisk University, representing a panorama of the history of black people in the new world. He began with life in Africa, then depicted slavery, emancipation, and freedom, which he symbolized as Fisk's Jubilee Hall. Through this extensive mural project, Douglas hoped to make the students at Fisk realize the important contributions of black Americans in building America. The final murals in the cycle, still visible today, represent philosophy, drama, music, poetry, and science, with depictions of night and day.

Many artists of the Harlem Renaissance traveled to Paris, and Douglas was no exception: he lived in Paris and studied at the Académie Scandinave there for one year, in 1931. This sojourn was followed by a one-year fellowship at the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania.

In 1934, as a project for the Works Progress Administration (WPA), Douglas executed what many people consider to be his masterpiece: the large Marxist-inspired murals Aspects of Negro Life, now at the Schomburg Center in Harlem. As early as the 1920s, Douglas had been determined to awaken middle-class blacks to the important issues of their time, but the Great Depression—which affected the black middle class more severely than its white counterpart—radicalized both Douglas and his audience. In Aspects of Negro Life, Douglas chronicled the struggle of black men and women from Africa through slavery and emancipation to their role as workers in the machine age. These murals—individually titled The Negro in an African Setting, Slavery through Reconstruction, An Idyll of the Deep South, and Song of the Towers—appealed directly to a public suffering the hardships of unemployment and poverty.

Douglas was not the only illustrator during these years to develop the vocabulary of Africa; numerous artists who followed him and were influenced by him took great pride in their African heritage. However, Douglas remains unique in that he provided crucial links between the literary figures of the Harlem Renaissance, their ideas about Africa, and the thinking of blacks throughout the world. Working during a time of limited artistic freedom for African Americans, he also had to confront the problem of trying to reach—with limited patronage—a public that was still geographically isolated, difficult to locate, and difficult to define. Despite these challenges, Douglas successfully addressed issues of importance to a growing black middle class. He based his work on studies of the African heritage and was the first black artist in the United States to create racial art; and as an illustrator for black magazines, he was able to reach a large readership. Black leaders sought his work to illustrate their message, and he received regular commissions until his departure from Harlem in 1937. Douglas brought African art to Harlem in a new, accessible, immediate way and then, through his illustrations, brought it to Americans, both black and white, across the country. He never depended on white patronage: he created African-inspired works largely under his own direction and the influence of black leaders. His experience indicates that this group effort, however brief, was one of the most exciting aspects of the time. The artists of the Harlem Renaissance were a small band, but they opened doors and increased opportunities for black artists in the 1930s.

Douglas's works reflected pride, unity, strength, dignity, and self-awareness. He was a pioneer in American art, breaking away from the traditions of more famous white artists such as Robert Henri, Reginald Marsh, and Ben Shahn to create unique, sophisticated works that interpreted modernism in a new light. Moreover, Douglas's influence extended beyond his extensive commissions during the Harlem Renaissance. He was hired by Fisk University in 1940 to create a new art department, and he became its founding chairman, remaining in this position until his retirement in 1966.

Douglas recognized the similarity between the period of the Harlem Renaissance and the period of the civil rights movement. Both were times of rapid social, political, and economic change, and during both eras he had tremendous hope for a better life for African Americans. His art—depicting the history of Africa and of black Americans, and pervaded by African imagery—was a way to encourage racial pride and build blacks' self-esteem.

In his later years, Douglas often spoke of the Harlem Renaissance, reminding his students that it had been a time "fraught with hope, bitter frustration, and struggle against an indifferent and frequently hostile environment." Knowing that his students were in the midst of their own struggle in contemporary America, he urged them to remain optimistic and hopeful and to keep their eyes on the prize. When he was one of the few remaining figures from the renaissance, he assured his students: "We still rejoice that we were among those who were found able and willing to shoulder the heavy burden of the pioneer and the pathfinder, firm in the conviction that our labor was a small but withal an essential contribution to the continued flowering of the art and culture of the black people of this nation." In making their own contribution to black culture, these students could hardly find a better guide than Aaron Douglas. He ranks among the most important American artists of the twentieth century; and his experiences and insights—which were so essential during the civil rights era—remain valuable today, as artists of a new generation face many of the same obstacles and challenges.

Aaron Douglas. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Biography

Aaron Douglas was born in Topeka, Kansas, in 1899. He received a B.F.A. from the University of Nebraska at Lincoln, in 1922; studied under Winold Reiss in New York in 1924–1927; studied at the Académie Scandinave in Paris (1931); and received an M.A. from Columbia University Teachers College in New York (1944). Douglas was founder and chair of the art department at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee (1937–1966). He retired from Fisk in 1966 and died in Nashville in 1979, at age eighty.

AMY KIRSCHKE

See also Artists; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Fire!!; Hughes, Langston; Krigwa Players; New Negro, The; Opportunity; Reiss, Winold; Survey Graphic; Visual Arts

Major Exhibitions

D’Caz-Delbo Gallery, New York. 1934.
Howard University, Washington, D.C. 1937.
Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee. 1948, 1952, 1953.
Newark Museum, New Jersey. 1971.
Studio Museum in Harlem, New York. 1982.

Further Reading

Aaron Douglas Papers. Special Collections Division, Fisk University.
Douglas Papers. Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.
Gips, Terry, ed. Narratives of African American Art and Identity: The David C. Driskell Collection. 1998.
Kirschke, Amy H. Aaron Douglas: Art, Race, and the Harlem Renaissance. 1995.

Draper, Muriel

Muriel Draper—a writer, social activist, and broadcaster—played a major role in the Harlem Renaissance through one of the most influential salons in New York. Noted for her unusual looks and inventive clothes, she moved in artistic circles in England and America. She married the lieder singer Paul Draper in 1909, and the couple relocated to Italy. The Drapers had a difficult marriage, and Paul Draper died in 1925 at age thirty-eight. Muriel Draper then moved to New York, where she worked as an interior decorator and magazine writer. She, Carl Van Vechten, and A. R. Orage formed a trio of white intellectuals who infused international cultural progressivism into Harlem.

Like the pioneering Harlem author Jean Toomer, Muriel Draper was a follower of the mystic G. I. Gurdjieff, who was based in Paris; for seven years, from 1924 to 1931, Draper served the Gurdjieff group in New York as an unofficial secretary. During that time, meetings of the Gurdjieff group, led by Orage, were held at her apartment. Draper was a close associate of another of Gurdjieff's disciples, Carl Van Vechten, whose novel Nigger Heaven (1926) contributed to making Harlem a fad. Through their mixed-race gatherings, Draper and Van Vechten crusaded to break down the color barrier. Draper's Tuesday teas were modest affairs; however, she brought together the Harlem avant-garde and white artists without regard for race at a time when this was highly exceptional. With Carl Van Vechten, she also assisted the black singer Taylor Gordon in writing and publishing his memoirs, Born to Be (1929).

While participating in a creative writing group (to which Jean Toomer also belonged) conducted at her home by Orage, Draper wrote Music at Midnight (1929). This was a memoir of her years as a saloniste in London from 1911 to 1914, during her marriage to Paul Draper. Regular members of her salon in London had included Pablo Casals, Henry James, and Arthur Rubinstein, and she had also received visits from such notables as Gertrude Stein and Nancy Cunard.

Following up on the renown she achieved through Music at Midnight, she became a lecturer, speaking on social issues that were related to her interest in the psychoanalyst Karen Horney and in Marxism. After a tour of the Soviet Union in 1934–1935, Draper became active in leftist politics. She visited Spain during its civil war in 1937 and subsequently lectured about and raised money for the Loyalists. In 1938 she had a radio program on NBC, "It's a Woman's World," presenting political and social analyses. She made two further visits to the Soviet Union but ceased her political activities after being attacked by the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1949.

Van Vechten preserved Draper's papers and clothes at the Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library at Yale University, where Romaine Brooks's portrait of her also hangs.

Biography

Muriel Draper was born c. 1886 and attended public schools in Haverhill, Massachusetts. She was employed as an interior decorator by the architect Paul Chalfin in New York (1916–1920) and as assistant manager of the Chicago Opera Company (1920–1922); she then operated her own decorating business (1922–1927). Draper published articles and sketches in Harper's, Town and Country, and Vogue (1920–1929) and had a radio program on NBC, "It's a Woman's World" (1938). She was a member of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship (1942) and the Women's International Democratic Federation (WIDF), Congress of American Women (1945–1949), and served as its president (1949). Draper died in New York City on 26 August 1952.

JON WOODSON

See also Cunard, Nancy; Toomer, Jean; Van Vechten, Carl

Further Reading

- Draper, Muriel. Music at Midnight. 1929.
 Kellner, Bruce. Carl van Vechten and the Irreverent Decades. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1968.
 Moore, James. Gurdjieff: The Anatomy of a Myth. Rockport, Mass.: Element, 1991.
 Welch, Louise. Orage with Gurdjieff in America. Boston, Mass.: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982.

Dreiser, Theodore

Theodore Dreiser gained his reputation as a major American novelist during the first half of the twentieth century, as the author of critically acclaimed works that include Sister Carrie (1900), Jennie Gerherdt (1911), and An American Tragedy (1925). He was born in Terre Haute, Indiana, and grew up in a large family that included four brothers and five sisters. Because of constant financial pressure, Dreiser's family moved continually and even separated for a period of time. However, Dreiser managed to receive schooling and even attended college for a year at Indiana University (thanks to the financial assistance of a former schoolteacher). Eventually, Dreiser found work as a reporter for Chicago's Daily Globe and then wrote for a succession of newspapers across the United States. His experiences with these newspapers educated him about the world and enabled him to work at his craft. After writing several short stories, Dreiser published his first novel, Sister Carrie. Following the controversy surrounding this novel, Dreiser suffered a nervous breakdown. His brother Paul, the writer of popular songs such as "On the Banks of the Wabash," helped him recover and go on writing.

Although he was not a major figure in the Harlem Renaissance, Dreiser was a prominent writer and an active participant in the New York literary world; and his social life placed him in the circles of several renowned contributors to the renaissance. At one party held by the Van Vechtens, Dreiser heard James Weldon Johnson read "Go Down Death" and Paul Robeson sing. Along with Robeson and others, Dreiser later received the Award of Merit Medal from the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Dreiser also attended the production of Othello in which Robeson starred. In 1945, Dreiser invited Robeson to one of his teas, at which the two discussed race relations and the possibility of writing an article on that topic; before leaving, Robeson sang a rendition of "Ol' Man River" for Dreiser. At this tea, Dreiser and Robeson also discussed Paul Robeson Jr.'s educational experiences in Russia. Dreiser had always been interested in the Soviet Union and had visited it in 1927. Throughout his life, he leaned heavily toward communism, although he did not join the Communist Party until shortly before his death.

Dreiser also spent time with Langston Hughes. In 1938, he and Hughes were selected as delegates to attend the International Convention for International Peace. Hughes had the difficult responsibility of looking after Dreiser, who had a reputation for unusual behavior. True to form, Dreiser failed to attend a lunch that was being given for the delegation by a group of British writers. Eventually, though, Dreiser came around and conducted himself well; Hughes even stated that he was glad Dreiser had been selected. Shortly after the conference, however, Dreiser proceeded to Spain at the invitation of the Loyalists and then went to London, bypassing his fellow American delegates and causing more anxiety for Hughes.

Dreiser served as an honorary chairman to the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners (NCDPP), which actively sought funds to support the legal defense of the nine Scottsboro boys in Alabama, who had been unjustly accused of assaulting two white girls and imprisoned; NCDPP also wrote a letter to the governor of Alabama. In July 1931, Dreiser wrote to the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching; his letter shows an acute sensitivity to the injustices related to the trial and conviction of the Scottsboro boys, and he places this case in the context of the larger racial problems plaguing the United States. Dreiser also wrote "They Shall Not Die" (1934) as a defense of the Scottsboro boys.

Dreiser's short story "Nigger Jeff" (1901) reflects his early thoughts about lynching. He based part of the narrative on incidents that he observed as a reporter in St. Louis, Missouri; and some critics believe that the story depicts Dreiser's own transformation from newspaper reporter to serious artist. Dreiser uses the perspective of a young reporter named Elmer Davies, who is sent to Pleasant Valley to cover the story of Jeff Ingalls, a black man accused of assaulting a white girl. The reporter witnesses a mob's effort to take Ingalls away from the local sheriff. Eventually, Ingalls is seized by the mob, which is led by the girl's father and brother; he is then brought to a bridge and hanged. This incident has a tremendous impact on the reporter. After the others leave, Davies does not rush back to the city but stays at the bridge with the body. He then returns to the Pleasant Valley and learns that the sheriff will not take action against the men who have killed Ingalls. Before he leaves, Davies walks out to Ingalls' cabin to see the body again, discovers Ingalls' mother weeping in the corner, and is moved to tears.

Theodore Dreiser, photographed by Carl Van Vechten in 1933.
(Library of Congress.)

He leaves the cabin understanding that “it was not always exact justice that was meted out to all.”

Dreiser’s body of work influenced younger writers such as Richard Wright. In particular, Wright discovered in Jennie Gerhardt and Sister Carrie a sense of suffering that he associated with his own mother. Dreiser’s An American Tragedy also influenced Wright’s Native Son. The poet Margaret Walker recalled that to construct his fictional narrative, Wright used Dreiser’s technique of collecting newspaper articles related to a specific crime. Several critics have since noted parallels between Dreiser’s character Clyde Griffiths and Wright’s Bigger Thomas. Wright eventually became friends with Dreiser, and in 1944 attended Dreiser’s farewell party in New York.

Theodore Dreiser remains an intriguing figure in the historical context of the Harlem Renaissance. His association with prominent African American artists and his interest in civil rights are worthy of more critical exploration.

Biography

Herman Theodore Dreiser was born on 27 August 1871, in Terre Haute, Indiana. He attended high school in Warsaw, Indiana, and entered Indiana University in 1889. He was a reporter for a series of newspapers: the Chicago Globe (1892), St. Louis Globe-Democrat (1892–1893), St. Louis Republic (1893), Pittsburgh Dispatch (1894), and New York World (1894). He was also an editor for a series of publications: the New York Daily News (1901–1903), Smith’s Magazine (1904–1905), Broadway Magazine (1906), the Butterick “trio” (Delineator, Designer, and New Idea Woman’s Magazine, 1907–1910), and the American Spectator (1932–1934). He applied to the Communist Party in 1945. His awards included the Merit Medal of the American Academy of Arts and Letters (1944). Dreiser died in Hollywood, California, on 28 December 1945.

PAUL R. CAPPUCCI

See also Hughes, Langston; Johnson, James Weldon; Robeson, Paul; Scottsboro; They Shall Not Die; Van Vechten, Carl; Walker, Margaret

Selected Works

Sister Carrie, 1900. (2nd ed., 1907.)
Jennie Gerhardt. 1911.

The Financier. 1912.
A Traveler at Forty. 1913.
The Titan. 1914.
Free and Other Stories. 1918.
Twelve Men. 1919.
An American Tragedy. 1925.
Dreiser Looks at Russia. 1928.
Dawn. 1931.
Tragic America. 1931.
America Is Worth Saving. 1941.
The Bulwark. 1946.
The Stoic. 1947.

Further Reading

Griffin, Joseph. The Small Canvas: An Introduction to Dreiser’s Short Stories. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1985.
Hakutani, Yoshinobu. Young Dreiser: A Critical Study. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1980.
Lehan, Richard. Theodore Dreiser: His World and His Novels. Carbondale and Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press; London and Amsterdam: Feffer and Simons, 1969.
Lingeman, Richard. Theodore Dreiser: An American Journey 1908–1945. New York: Putnam, 1990.
Matthiessen, F. O. Theodore Dreiser. New York: William Sloane, 1951.
Pizer, Donald. The Novels of Theodore Dreiser: A Critical Study. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1976.
Shapiro, Charles. Theodore Dreiser: Our Bitter Patriot. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1962.
Swanberg, W. A. Dreiser. New York: Scribner, 1965.

Du Bois, W. E. B.

Historian, sociologist, political activist, editor, essayist, novelist, poet, and prophet, William Edward Burghardt Du Bois stands as one of the towering figures in American history. In a public career encompassing three-quarters of a century, Du Bois delivered eloquent, trenchant, and occasionally contradictory commentary on what he called “the problem of the Twentieth Century . . . the problem of the color line.” In the 1920s, he played a central role in the unfolding drama of the Harlem Renaissance, initially as an inspiration and patron and later as an increasingly captious critic.

Du Bois was born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, in 1868. His origins were humble. His mother, Mary, worked odd jobs, mostly as a domestic servant, before suffering a paralytic stroke; he scarcely knew his father, Alfred, who had abandoned the family. Still, Du Bois remembered his childhood as happy, a more or less “typically New England” upbringing, only occasionally ruffled by the racial realities of post-Reconstruction America. He flourished in Great Barrington’s public schools, exhibiting even in these early days the qualities that would distinguish his life and art: a voracious intellect, a romantic imagination, and an overweening (although, in retrospect, quite justified) sense of his own historical importance.

Du Bois graduated from Great Barrington High School in 1885 and proceeded to Fisk University, from which he graduated three years later. Fisk, the flagship of the American Missionary Association’s post-civil war campaign to uplift the freedpeople, gave Du Bois not only a fine classical education but also his first exposure to black life in the South under Jim Crow. In Darkwater (1921), Du Bois would describe that experience in characteristically grandiloquent prose: “Consider, for a moment, how miraculous it all was to a boy of seventeen, just escaped from a narrow valley. I willed and lo! my people came dancing about me . . . riotous in color, gay in laughter, full of sympathy, need, and pleading.”

From Fisk, Du Bois went to Harvard, where he earned a second bachelor’s degree in 1890 and a doctorate in history five years later. Although excluded from the university’s dormitories and most of its social life, he flourished academically, developing close relationships with some of America’s premier intellectuals, including the philosophers William James, Josiah Royce, and George Santayana and the historian Alfred Bushnell Hart. Du Bois’s Ph.D. dissertation, “The Suppression of the African Slave Trade to the United States of America,” completed under Hart’s direction, was published in 1896—the first of his more than two dozen books.

Du Bois’s graduate education also included a two-year sojourn at the University of Berlin, where he immersed himself in the emerging discipline of sociology. Although he failed to earn the coveted German doctoral degree—his support from the white philanthropic Slater Fund dried up before he could complete the residency requirement—his years in Germany proved formative. The encounter with sociology not only shaped Du Bois’s future academic career but also confirmed his political vocation, offering a framework for engaged intellectual activism. Although often frustrated by the sheer irrationality of racial prejudice, Du Bois remained convinced that it was possible to generate authoritative, objective knowledge about human life (and about Negro life in particular), and that this knowledge could be used to fashion a more rational, more just world. More broadly, his years in Germany established some of the signature tensions in his thought. Living in Germany sharpened his racialism, his conviction that each race or Volk possessed its own distinctive genius or “gift”; but at the same time, Germany confirmed the cosmopolitan in him who exulted in what he called “the world beyond the veil,” that vast “kingdom of culture” unsullied by American racial madness.

Despite his peerless education, Du Bois had no chance of a permanent appointment at a white university when he returned to the United States in 1894. He accepted a position teaching classics at Wilberforce University, an African Methodist Episcopal church school in Ohio. (Ironically, in light of future events, Du Bois also applied for and was offered a position at Booker T. Washington’s Tuskegee Institute, but the offer did not arrive until after he had accepted the post at Wilberforce.) Although he often waxed lyrical about African American Christianity, Du Bois had little patience with organized religion, and he soon became estranged from the dominant evangelical ethos at Wilberforce. In 1896, he left to accept a temporary research position at the University of Pennsylvania, from which came his second book, The Philadelphia Negro, which is still regarded as a classic of urban sociology. In retrospect, his years at Wilberforce are significant chiefly for introducing him to his future wife, a “doe-eyed,” somewhat stolid student named Nina Gomer. Although grievously mismatched, the couple remained married for more than half a century, until Nina’s death in 1950. They had two children: a son, Burghardt, whose death in infancy would later be poignantly rendered in “The Passing of the First Born,” one of the essays in The Souls of Black Folk; and a daughter, Yolande.

In 1898, Du Bois joined the faculty of Atlanta University, where he spent the next decade teaching, writing, and overseeing the Atlanta Studies, an ambitious annual series of conferences and monographs designed to provide an exact sociological portrait of African American life. He also put the final touches on his masterwork, The Souls of Black Folk, a collection of essays, autobiographical fragments, and fiction intended to illuminate the subjective human reality of those who lived “within the veil.” In the book’s belletristic “Forethought,” Du Bois made it clear that his imagined audience was white, but this work would have its most profound impact on African American readers, including virtually all of the writers and artists who later distinguished themselves in the Harlem Renaissance.

The Souls of Black Folk marked Du Bois’s entrance into the arena of racial politics. Chapter 3, “Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others,” offered a respectful but telling critique of the so-called wizard of Tuskegee, whose advocacy of “industrial” education and political accommodation had lent an apparent black seal of approval to the Jim Crow regime settling over the South. In 1905, Du Bois helped organize the Niagara Movement, an assembly of black leaders opposed to Washington’s leadership and committed to fighting for full civil equality for African Americans. Although this movement never achieved a firm institutional foundation, it signaled a new black assertiveness and contributed directly to the establishment, four years later, of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In 1910, Du Bois moved to New York City, to take office as the director of publicity of NAACP and to edit its monthly journal, The Crisis.

Du Bois’s relationship with the predominantly white leadership of NAACP was contentious from the outset and would eventually culminate in his resignation. But for the predominantly black readership of Crisis, Du Bois was the NAACP. Working with limited funds and a minimal staff, he turned the magazine into his personal broadsheet, offering news and commentary, edifying reading lists, book reviews, and, on more than a few occasions, scathing criticism of individuals or institutions that had neglected their responsibility to the race. The riot in east St. Louis, the savage practice of lynching, America’s entry into World War I (which Du Bois, to his later regret, endorsed), the Bolshevik revolution, Garveyism, the biennial meetings of his own Pan-African Congress, the New Deal—all of these developments and more were discussed and digested in the columns of Crisis. In the words of Lewis (1993), Du Bois became the self-appointed “preceptor of the race.” No debate in black American life could be considered complete until Dr. Du Bois had had his say.

Inevitably, Du Bois was drawn into debates swirling around the Harlem Renaissance. Initially, he expressed an almost paternal fondness for the writers of the “younger literary movement,” whom he regarded as his heirs. That assessment was characteristically immodest but by no means unfair. Virtually all of the core contentions of the New Negro movement can be found in Du Bois’s writing a generation before. Du Bois first insisted that the Negro was “primarily an artist,” that the “rude melodies” of black slaves constituted the “only true American music,” and that blacks’ “gift of laughter and song” had enriched an otherwise impoverished, materialistic American culture. Du Bois also recognized, long before Alain Locke, James Weldon Johnson, and other progenitors of the Harlem Renaissance, that artistic and literary production could provide a powerful weapon in African Americans’ continuing quest for justice and respect. Although his chief identity was as a scholar and editor, he occasionally wielded that weapon, most notably in the novel The Quest of the Silver Fleece (1911) and the sprawling historical pageant The Star of Ethiopia (1913).

Du Bois was quick to establish himself as a patron and mentor to the emerging New Negro movement. He hired the novelist Jessie Fauset as literary editor of Crisis, and together they launched one of the era’s first competitions for black writers. Among the young writers “discovered” by Crisis was Langston Hughes, whose epochal poem, “The Negro Speaks of Rivers,” dedicated to Du Bois, appeared in 1921. Du Bois attended the Civic Club dinner of 1924 that served as literary Harlem’s downtown debut, and he was one of the first reviewers to hail the genius of Jean Toomer’s Cane, although he seems to have been taken more with the book’s lyricism than with its modernist conception, which left him frankly bewildered. “His art carries much that is difficult or even impossible to understand,” Du Bois complained. “I cannot, for the life of me, for instance, see why Toomer could not have made the tragedy of ‘Carma’ something that I could understand instead of vaguely guess at; ‘Box Seat’ muddles me to the last degree and I am not sure that I know what ‘Kabnis’ is about.”

Embedded in Du Bois’s curious review of Cane were the seeds of his future estrangement from the New Negro movement. For someone who wrote so eloquently of the “souls” of black “folk,” Du Bois had surprisingly conservative aesthetic tastes. In an era attuned to modernist experimentation and the possibilities of vernacular expression, Du Bois preferred the soaring flights of Byron and Tennyson or their German romantic antecedents, Goethe and Schiller.

(The Souls of Black Folk included epigrams from all four authors.) His taste in music was likewise classical and distinctly Eurocentric. Although he appreciated the majesty of the “sorrow songs,” he regarded blues as vulgar and jazz as unrefined. Whereas Langston Hughes glimpsed a universe of beauty in the keening wail of a saxophone on a Harlem street corner, Du Bois thrilled to Beethoven and Wagner.

As these differences in aesthetic values and judgment became apparent, Du Bois’s regard for the rising generation of black writers plummeted, as did their respect for him. By the mid-1920s, Opportunity, an upstart magazine launched by Charles Johnson and the National Urban League, had displaced Crisis as the premier outlet for New Negro writing, and figures like Johnson, Alain Locke, and Carl Van Vechten had usurped Du Bois’s role as literary patron. Personal encounters between Du Bois and his imagined offspring typically left both parties disappointed. The poet Claude McKay detected no human warmth in the idol of his youth, only “a cold, acid hauteur of spirit, which is not lessened when he vouchsafes a smile.” Although not mentioned by name, Du Bois was clearly one of the targets of Fire!!, a short-lived journal launched by “younger Negro writers” (including Langston Hughes, Wallace Thurman, Richard Bruce Nugent, and Zora Neale Hurston) as an artistic declaration of independence from the older generation of “respectable,” “bourgeois” black writers and critics.

Disagreements over the direction of the New Negro movement exploded into the open in 1926, following the publication of Carl Van Vechten’s notorious novel Nigger Heaven. Many black writers defended the novel—Wallace Thurman half-facetiously predicted that a statue in Van Vechten’s honor would one day be erected in Harlem—but Du Bois decried it as a “slap in the face,” a violation of the “hospitality” that black people had extended to its white author. The book’s appearance confirmed Du Bois’s belief that the New Negro movement had lost its way, that a movement begun to advance black claims to citizenship had degenerated into a modern-day minstrel show, purveying stereotypical images of black criminals, prostitutes, and buffoons for the amusement of white readers.

In the months that followed, Du Bois continued to rail against what he dubbed the “Van Vechten school” of black writing. In his eyes, younger black writers were guilty not only of political irresponsibility but also of artistic blindness, recycling tales of “low down” black people while ignoring the rich vein of artistic material to be found in the predicament of intelligent, upstanding Negroes. His reviews of New Negro writing ranged from disappointed (Fine Clothes to the Jew, Langston Hughes’s second volume of poetry, contained “extraordinarily beautiful bits” but lamentably confined itself to “lowly types”) to vicious (passages in Claude McKay’s Home to Harlem, he reported, left him “wanting to take a bath”). In the end, only a handful of writers escaped his scorn, among them Jessie Fauset, Countee Cullen (who was briefly married to Du Bois’s daughter, Yolande), and Nella Larsen.

Over the course of the 1920s, Du Bois made several attempts to redirect the Harlem Renaissance along more appropriate lines. In 1926, he launched a symposium in Crisis: contributors, white and black, were asked to respond to a series of seven questions on the theme “The Negro in Art: How Shall He Be Portrayed?” Although he circulated the questionnaire to a cross section of writers, editors, and publishers, his own opinions were obvious from the tone of the questions:

1. When the artist, black or white, portrays Negro characters, is he under any obligations or limitations as to the sort of character he will portray?
2. Can the author be criticized for painting the worst or the best characters of a group?
3. Can publishers be criticized for refusing to handle novels that portray Negroes of education and accomplishment, on the ground that these characters are no different from white folk and therefore not interesting?
4. What are Negroes to do when they are continually painted at their worst and judged by the public as they are painted?
5. Does the situation of the educated Negro in America with its pathos, humiliation, and tragedy call for artistic treatment at least as sincere and sympathetic as “Porgy” received?
6. Is not the continual portrayal of the sordid, foolish, and criminal among Negroes convincing the world that this and this alone is really and essentially Negroid, and preventing white artists from knowing any other types and preventing black artists from daring to paint them?
7. Is there not a real danger that young colored writers will be tempted to follow the popular trend in portraying Negro character in the underworld rather than seeking to paint the truth about themselves and their own social class?

For the next six months, Du Bois printed the replies in Crisis. Insofar as he had hoped, through the questionnaire, to recapture artistic leadership of the Harlem Renaissance, the results were disappointing. Although a few respondents answered in the intended spirit—Jessie Fauset’s reply deserved perfect marks—most reacted with something between bemusement and dismissal. “What’s the use of saying anything?” Langston Hughes asked. “The true artist is going to write what he chooses anyway regardless of outside opinion. . . . It’s the way people look at things, not what they look at, that needs to be changed.”

Du Bois concluded the symposium with a long essay of his own, “Criteria of Negro Art,” in which he explicated his ideas about the universal attributes of “beauty” and the specific contributions that black writers and artists might make toward its realization. The essay included stern instructions on the political responsibilities of the black writer, suggesting in several places that the duty of vindicating the reputation of the race trumped the value of art for art’s sake. “All art is Propaganda,” he thundered. “I do not give a damn for art that is not Propaganda.”

It is no disrespect to Du Bois, whose place in history is now secure, to say that this was not his finest hour. In the first place, his characterization of contemporary writing was factually incorrect. As James Weldon Johnson showed in a careful inventory published at the end of the 1920s, scarcely one-quarter of the works written by or about African Americans in the previous decade fell within what Du Bois called the “Van Vechten school.” Even Nigger Heaven, after its admittedly lurid beginning, dealt chiefly with the predicament of educated middle-class black people. The unfolding debate had also pushed Du Bois into a position—art equals propaganda—that not only smacked of philistinism but also directly contradicted positions he had previously maintained. Just five years before, for example, Du Bois had defended Eugene O’Neill’s controversial play The Emperor Jones against black critics who decried it for perpetuating racial stereotypes. To compel artists to represent only “the best and highest and noblest in us,” to “insist that Art and Propaganda be one,” betrayed a “complete misunderstanding . . . of the aim of Art,” he wrote on that occasion. “We have criminals and prostitutes, ignorant and debased elements just as all folks have.” Five years later, having seen his position as literary patron usurped, he was prepared to subject art to a more rigorous political test.

Du Bois’s second novel, Dark Princess (1928), can also be read as an attempt to move African American literature in more responsible directions. The novel hewed closely to its author’s political prescriptions, with middle-class characters debating the predicament of the world’s darker races in impeccable English and with nary a prostitute or jazz club in sight. The main character, Matthew Towns, is a disillusioned black medical student who has fled the racism of the United States to live in Germany. There he meets the title character, a beautiful Indian princess who just happens to be the leader of a secret global movement of people of color. Alternately romantic and didactic, the book could scarcely have been more out of step with the artistic temperament of the 1920s, and it had little apparent impact on other black writers.

Although Du Bois surely lost the battle for the soul of the Harlem Renaissance, he may have won the war. As the Great Depression ravaged Harlem and popular enthusiasm for black people’s arts ebbed, many prominent “New Negroes” began to look back at the 1920s with a certain embarrassment, renouncing not only the bohemian excesses of the decade but also their own naïve belief that art alone could conquer racial prejudice. Du Bois watched it all with more than a little satisfaction. In 1933, in a speech at Fisk University, he pronounced an epitaph for the renaissance—an epitaph that continues, for better and for worse, to shape critical assessments of the movement:

W. E. B. Du Bois, portrait by Laura Wheeler Waring, oil on canvas. (National Portrait Gallery, Smithsonian Institution Art Resource, N.Y.)

W. E. B. Du Bois, photographed by Carl Van Vechten. (Library of Congress.)

Why was it that the Renaissance of literature which began among Negroes ten years ago has never taken real and lasting root? It was because it was a transplanted and exotic thing. It was a literature written for the benefit of white people and at the behest of white readers, and starting out privately from the white point of view. It never had a real Negro constituency and it did not grow out of the inmost heart and frank experience of Negroes. On such an artificial basis no real literature can grow.

Although by 1933 Du Bois had settled comfortably into the role of curmudgeonly elder statesman, his public career had run scarcely half its course. He survived for another three decades, remaining politically and intellectually engaged until the end. He resigned as editor of Crisis in 1934, but he continued to churn out articles, essays, and editorials on the issues of the day. He also published a steady stream of books, including Black Reconstruction, a classic work of radical history; Dusk of Dawn, a lyrical autobiography; and three more novels, the so-called Black Flame trilogy, which traced the movements of a thinly veiled autobiographical protagonist, Manuel Mansart, through the twentieth century.

As the shadow of McCarthyism darkened American political life, Du Bois found himself increasingly isolated and vulnerable. His passport was suspended, and he faced mounting harassment, an experience he recounted in the short book In Battle for Peace. In 1951, he was arrested for failing to register as an agent of a foreign principal, a politically motivated charge growing out of his involvement with an international Peace Information Center. In 1961, Du Bois accepted an invitation from Kwame Nkrumah, prime minister of the newly independent republic of Ghana, to spend his last years in Africa. On the day of his final departure from the United States, 1 October 1961, he formally enrolled as a member of the American Communist Party, a parting shot against the native land that had rejected his gifts.

Biography

William Edward Burghardt Du Bois was born on 23 February 1868, in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. He studied at public schools in Great Barrington; Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee (A.B., 1888); Harvard University (A.B., 1890, A.M., 1891, Ph.D., 1895); and the University of Berlin (1892–1894). He taught at Wilberforce University, Xenia, Ohio (1894–1896); the University of Pennsylvania (1896–1897); and Atlanta University (1897–1910, 1934–1943). Du Bois was a participant in the Pan-African Conference of 1900 and the Universal Races Congress of 1911. He was a founding member of the Niagara Movement (1905), National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (1910), and Pan-African Congresses (1919, 1921, 1923, 1927, 1945). Du Bois was an editor at Moon Illustrated Weekly, Memphis, Tennessee (1906–1907); Horizon, Washington, D.C. (1907–1910); Crisis, New York City (1910–1934); and Phylon, Atlanta (1940–1944). He was a columnist for the Pittsburgh Courier (1936–1938), New York Amsterdam News (1938–1944), Chicago Defender (1947–1948), and People's Voice (1947–1948). He was also vice-chairman of the Council on African Affairs (1949–1954) and a candidate for the U.S. Senate (Labor Party, 1950). He immigrated to Ghana in 1961 and became a Ghanaian citizen. His awards included Knight Commander, Liberian Order of African Redemption (c. 1907); Spingarn Medal (1920); International Peace Prize (1952); and Lenin Peace Prize (1959). Du Bois died in Accra, Ghana, on 27 August 1963.

JAMES CAMPBELL

See also Atlanta University Studies; Cane; Crisis, The; Crisis: The Negro in Art—How Shall He Be Portrayed? A Symposium; Dark Princess; Emperor Jones, The; Fire!!; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Harlem Renaissance: 1—Black Critics of; Harlem Renaissance: 2—Black Promoters of; New Negro Movement; Niagara Movement; Nigger Heaven; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Pan-African Congresses; specific individuals

Selected Works

The Suppression of the African Slave Trade to the United States of America, 1638–1870. 1896.

The Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study. 1899.

The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches. 1903.

The Quest of the Silver Fleece: A Novel. 1911.

The Negro. 1915.

Darkwater: Voices from within the Veil. 1921.

The Gift of Black Folk: Negroes in the Making of America. 1924.

Dark Princess: A Romance. 1928.

Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860–1880. 1935.

Dusk of Dawn: An Essay toward an Autobiography of a Race Concept. 1940.

The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Last Decade of Its First Century. 1962.

Further Reading

Aptheker, Herbert. The Literary Legacy of W. E. B. Du Bois. White Plains, N.Y.: Kraus International, 1989.

Bell, Bernard W., Emily R. Grosholz, and James B. Stewart, eds. W. E. B. Du Bois on Race and Culture. New York: Routledge, 1996.

Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.

———. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1976.

Dudley, Sherman H.

Sherman H. Dudley, known for his rapid understated humor, was one of the leading black comedians of the early twentieth century and was also a manager and promoter. Although remarkably accomplished, he remains a neglected figure in the study of the Harlem Renaissance, partly because he often operated outside the Manhattan center of black art.

Early in his career, he performed with medicine shows and minstrel shows. He was the proprietor of a traveling tent show, Jolly Ethiopians; and he appeared with Richards and Pringle's Georgia Minstrels, Rusco and Holland Minstrels, McCabe and Young's Operatic Minstrels, P. T. Wright's Nashville Students, Sam Corker, and Will Marion Cook's Clorindy company; he also appeared with Billy Kersands in King Rastus. He had his own troupe, Dudley's Georgia Minstrels, in 1897–1898. In 1904 he joined the Smart Set Company, starred in its shows, and soon took over the productions.

Several companies used the name Smart Set between 1902 and 1924. Dudley's Smart Set Company produced musical comedies for mainly white audiences, including The Black Politician, Dr. Beans from Boston, and His Honor the Barber, featuring Dudley as principal comedian. These successful shows helped establish a format for black musical comedy: a variety show with a more structured plot usually involving hare-brained schemes, gambling, preposterous protagonists, and horse races. Dudley is perhaps best-known for his act with a trained mule in His Honor the Barber. This production was notable as well because black audience members were not relegated to the balcony ("nigger heaven"); rather, there were segregated seating areas throughout the house—a significant shift in the system. Also significantly, Dudley's shows were criticized by white and black reviewers for imitating white productions and for having performers who looked "too white" (some because of makeup). Their reaction suggests the complex racial situation at the time: performers had to strike a balance between black aesthetics and white audiences' stereotypes.

As an entrepreneur, Dudley was instrumental in creating unions and touring agencies for black performers. He organized a vaudeville touring agency, Dudley's Theatrical Circuit, which operated from 1891 to 1916 and is considered the first black-controlled theater circuit and booking agency. It was based in Washington, D.C., and began with seven theaters there and elsewhere; by 1914 it had nineteen. In 1916, Dudley's Circuit and two other organizations merged into the Southern Consolidated Circuit (SCC), which had fierce battles with the Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA) and was eventually absorbed by TOBA (1921). The resulting touring circuit was complete and independent of the white circuits; although performers complained of mistreatment by TOBA, low pay, and southern racism, this circuit did guarantee work and increased exposure for black talent.

Dudley, Sherman H.

In 1921, Dudley helped found the Colored Actors' Union (CAU), the first African American theatrical union. In its first year, it had 800 individual members, 500 vaudeville acts, and twenty-seven stock companies. In 1926 it produced the Colored Actors' Union Theatrical Guide, a handbook containing a history of black theater, biographies of major players, a list of resources for performers, and articles about the national status of African Americans. In 1937, CAU was replaced by the Negro Actors Guild of America.

Biography

Sherman H. Dudley was born in 1880. He began his career in medicine shows and minstrel shows and had his own troupe, Dudley's Georgia Minstrels (1897–1898). He joined the Smart Set Company in 1904. His vaudeville touring agency, Dudley's Theatrical Circuit (1891–1916), is considered the first black-controlled theater circuit and booking agency. In 1916, Dudley's circuit and two other organizations merged to form the Southern Consolidated Circuit (SCC), which rivaled, but was later (1921) absorbed by, the Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA). Dudley helped found the Colored Actors' Union (CAU, 1921). He died in 1940.

NADINE GEORGE-GRAVES

See also Blacks in Theater; Minstrelsy; Musical Theater; Theater Owners' Booking Association

Further Reading

Bean, Annemarie, James V. Hatch, and Brooks McNamara.
Inside the Minstrel Mask: Readings in Nineteenth Century

Blackface Minstrelsy. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1996.

Hill, Anthony D. "Improving Conditions on the TOBA Black Vaudeville Circuit." In Pages from the Harlem Renaissance: A Chronicle of Performance. New York: Peter Lang, 1996.

Woll, Allen. Black Musical Theatre: From Coontown to Dreamgirls. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Dunbar Apartments

The Dunbar Apartments—located at the northeastern end of Harlem, at Seventh Avenue and 150th Street—were completed in 1928, just before the Great Depression. These apartments were named after the African American poet and novelist Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906), who had achieved fame at the turn of the twentieth century for such works as Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896) and The Sport of the Gods (1902) and who is often considered an inspiration for the Harlem Renaissance, although he never actually lived in Harlem.

Two decades after Dunbar's death, the apartment complex bearing his name was erected. It was designed by Andrew J. Thomas and was a massive construction project. The final complex occupied an entire city block and consisted of six separate redbrick buildings, each six stories high. These buildings were situated around a common garden that included a playground.

John D. Rockefeller Jr. financed the development, initially operating it on a cooperative basis. Eventually, though, as the Depression worsened and as the payment defaults mounted higher and higher, Rockefeller foreclosed on the buildings. Soon thereafter, the Dunbar

Dunbar Apartments. (Brown Brothers.)

National Bank, located in one of the buildings, was liquidated. The Dunbar National Bank had been the sole bank in Harlem operated by African Americans. After dissolving the cooperative, Rockefeller reimbursed the former tenant-owners for their capital infusion and then converted the apartments to rental units.

The Dunbar Apartments still stood as of this writing.

JANICE TRAFLET

See also Dunbar, Paul Laurence; Harlem: 4–Housing

Further Reading

Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem: A Cultural Portrait, 1900–1950. New York: Farrar Straus, Giroux, 1991.

Jackson, Kenneth, ed. Encyclopedia of New York City. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995. (See “Paul Laurence Dunbar.”)

The WPA Guide to New York City: The Federal Writers’ Project Guide to 1930s New York. New York: Pantheon, 1982. (Originally published 1939.)

Dunbar, Paul Laurence

Paul Laurence Dunbar was a prolific and popular African American author whose works appeared in such noted literary magazines as the Atlantic Monthly, the Century, Lippincott’s Monthly, and the Saturday Evening Post and were read and enjoyed by both whites and blacks. In his incorporation of political themes and his use of local color and dialect, he was an important precursor of the Harlem Renaissance.

Dunbar was born in Dayton, Ohio. His parents—Matilda and Joshua Dunbar—were former slaves; Joshua Dunbar had escaped from a plantation in Kentucky and served in the Massachusetts Fifty-Fifth regiment during the Civil War. Paul Laurence Dunbar was educated in Dayton’s public schools; when he reached high school, he was the only African American student. During his high school years, he began to explore creative writing. At age sixteen, he began to write poetry, which appeared in the local newspaper and was largely influenced by British romantic poets such as Keats, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, and by Americans such as Whittier and Longfellow.

After graduating from high school, Dunbar entered a world that was sharply divided by race. Despite his education, he was unable to break through the racial barriers, and he accepted a job as an elevator operator in a hotel in Dayton. However, he was able to find time and financial support for his writing, and in 1892, he published Oak and Ivy, a book of poems largely influenced and inspired by Longfellow’s style. Dunbar then went to Chicago’s World Columbian Expedition, where he met two men who would be his literary patrons: Charles Thatcher and Henry Tobey. They advanced Dunbar money so that he would be able to write another volume of poetry; they also promoted his work and ensured that it would be reviewed by the prominent literary editor William Dean Howells. Their funding allowed Dunbar to produce Majors and Minors, a collection of poetry that was instrumental in making him famous.

Despite racism and segregation, the American public was hungry for a gifted African American author, and Dunbar became popular because his work fulfilled at least three desires of readers: (1) he was an eloquent poet and a highly skilled versifier; (2) his fiction conformed to the public's need for local color; and (3) he was a writer who could provide and confirm the familiar, popular version of African Americans' experience under slavery and since emancipation. In many ways, Majors and Minors met all of these criteria; and Howells, in his review, proclaimed Dunbar the poet laureate of the Negro race. However, Howells also said that Dunbar was most authentic when writing in dialect rather than standard English—and this assessment, intended as praise, proved to be a double-edged sword. Dunbar did attract a tremendous following that moved past racial divisions, but his newfound reputation as a dialect poet in the “plantation tradition” obscured the political and social themes that actually dominated his work.

Paul Laurence Dunbar, c. 1909. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Later scholars would criticize Dunbar for perpetuating the racist concept of the “happy darky,” a figure central to the plantation tradition. This tradition chronicled an antebellum South in which the butler and the mammy are shadowy counterparts of the white master and mistress; that is, the black characters reflect the virtues and graces of the ruling caste. Dunbar's work was widely interpreted as being part of the plantation tradition—an interpretation that made no allowance for the difficult circumstances in which Dunbar had to write, or for the fact that in his time, editorial control and criticism were almost exclusively in the hands of whites. Also, this interpretation ignores an important aspect of Dunbar's writing: he worked within limiting literary conventions in order to use them as a vehicle for offering a radical political alternative to the racial problems of the era.

For example, Dunbar's “Mr. Cornelius Johnson, Office-Seeker,” published in The Strength of Gideon and Other Stories (his second volume of short stories, 1900), focuses on attempts by the title character to secure a patronage position in return for having done campaign work for a congressman and reveals the power of racism. Moreover, Johnson is unable to follow either Booker T. Washington's call for patience or W. E. B. Du Bois's call for aggressive political and social action. In many ways, Dunbar expands on this story's argument in his novel The Sport of the Gods (1902), which describes the difficulties of a southern African American family faced with the choice of staying in the South, and remaining loyal to the family that once owned them, or migrating to New York City, where racism is less but where there are many new, unforeseen dangers. In both of these works, Dunbar drew on the plantation tradition, but readers might also see how he used it for social protest.

Later commentators would also criticize Dunbar for his use of dialect in his poetry. In particular, African Americans such as Sterling Brown and Charles T. Davis—although they admitted that Dunbar had been the first American poet to treat African American life with any degree of fullness—also argued that Dunbar had willfully misrepresented black history. That is, in relying on dialect, and in adopting the plantation tradition, Dunbar had suggested that the “old time” African American was content to serve a white master and was out of place in postbellum America.

Still, some poets of the Harlem Renaissance, such as Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen, would find inspiration in Dunbar's work. Citing specific examples of Dunbar's poems—“We Wear the Mask,” “When Malindy Sings,” “Frederick Douglass,” “The Colored Soldiers,” “The Haunted Oak”—Hughes and Cullen argued that Dunbar had expressed pride in his African American heritage, and that his texts included passages where one might find his call for social action.

Dunbar was aware that his choice of dialect and the plantation tradition might lead to a misinterpretation of his intentions and vision. In fact, he predicted the critical reaction to his work and the damaging effects of Howells's praise. It is only more recently that readers and scholars have become fully aware of Dunbar's objectives and have been able to consider him an important forefather of African American literature.

Biography

Paul Laurence Dunbar was born on 27 June 1872, in Dayton, Ohio, and studied at public schools there. Dunbar edited at least three issues of the Dayton Tattler, a black district newspaper. He published Oak and Ivy in 1892, Majors and Minors in 1896, Lyrics of the Hearthside in 1899, The Strength of Gideon and Other Stories and The Love of Landry in 1900, The Fanatics in 1901, The Sport of the Gods in 1902, Lyrics of Love and Laughter and In Old Plantation Days in 1903, The Heart of Happy Hollow in 1904, and Lyrics of Sunshine and Shadow in 1905. Dunbar married Alice Ruth Moore, a teacher and writer, in 1898; they separated in 1902. Dunbar collaborated with Will Marion Cook on musical plays for black performers (1898–1900) and raised funds for the Tuskegee Institute in 1899; he also wrote a song for the Tuskegee Institute at Booker T. Washington's request in 1901. Dunbar's health problems began around 1900, with pneumonia and then tuberculosis; he died of tuberculosis on 9 February 1906.

GINA ROSSETTI

See also Authors: 5—Poets; Brown, Sterling; Cook, Will Marion; Cullen, Countee; Howells, William Dean; Hughes, Langston; Literature: 7—Poetry; Poetry: Dialect

Selected Works

- Oak and Ivy*. 1892.
Majors and Minors. 1896.
Lyrics of Lowly Life. 1896.
Folks from Dixie. 1898.
The Uncalled. 1898.
Lyrics of the Hearthside. 1899.
The Strength of Gideon and Other Stories. 1900.
The Love of Landry. 1900.
The Fanatics. 1901.
The Sport of the Gods. 1902.
Lyrics of Love and Laughter. 1903.
In Old Plantation Days. 1903.
The Heart of Happy Hollow. 1904.
Lyrics of Sunshine and Shadow. 1905.

Further Reading

- Bone, Robert. Down Home: A History of Afro-American Short Fiction from Its Beginnings to the End of the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Putnam, 1975.
- Brawley, Benjamin. Paul Laurence Dunbar: Poet of His People. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1936.
- Cunningham, Virginia. Paul Laurence Dunbar and His Song. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1977.
- Gayle, Addison Jr. Oak and Ivy: A Biography of Paul Laurence Dunbar. New York: Doubleday, 1971.
- . The Way of the World: The Black Novel in America. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor, 1975.
- Lawson, Victor. Dunbar Critically Examined. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1941.
- Martin, Jay, ed. A Singer in the Dawn: Reinterpretations of Paul Laurence Dunbar. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1975.
- Metcalf, E. W. Jr. Paul Laurence Dunbar: A Bibliography. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1975.
- Redding, Saunders. To Make a Poet Black. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1939.
- Turner, Darwin. "Paul Laurence Dunbar: The Rejected Symbol." Journal of Negro History, 52, 1967, pp. 1–13.

Wagner, Jean. Black Poets of the United States, from Paul Laurence Dunbar to Langston Hughes. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973.

Dunn, Blanche

Blanche Dunn was born in the West Indies in 1911 and left for the United States when she was fifteen years old. Very little is known about her early life in the West Indies or about her life when she first arrived in New York City. However, by 1927 she had attracted the affection of Wilda Gunn, a dress designer who was originally from Cleveland. Dunn's beauty, charm, and bravado gave her an entrée to opening nights on Broadway and to the best tables at Harlem's speakeasies, especially the very fashionable Hot Cha. Dunn also sought stardom as a singer and actress. She secured a small role in Dudley Murphy's film of The Emperor Jones (1933), which was moderately successful.

Dunn was a noteworthy figure at the legendary parties hosted by Carl Van Vechten—gatherings that were evidently designed to showcase Van Vechten's latest black artistic discoveries for a largely white audience. Langston Hughes attended some of these parties and recounted how Dunn captivated wealthy luminaries such as Salvador Dalí.

In 1940 Dunn began an affair with Marion "Joe" Carstairs, a British oil magnate who had set up a sort of oligarchy on the Bahamian island Whale Cay, where he was visited by celebrities such as Mabel Mercer and Marlene Dietrich. Dunn and Carstairs's tempestuous relationship ended in 1941, and Dunn returned to New York. That year, she posed for Carl Van Vechten's series Portrait Photographs of Celebrities.

In both of her portraits by Van Vechten, Dunn wears enormous silver hoop earrings, three strands of wooden beads, heavy beaded bracelets on both wrists, a very low-cut peasant-style blouse, a striped bustling skirt, and a matching head rag. This attire suggests some visual and racial editorializing on Van Vechten's part, but Dunn seems to overcome it: her mouth is defiantly set, and her eyes avoid engagement with the photographer, implying that she may have considered her own beauty a form of artful resistance.

At one time, there was speculation that Dunn was the basis of the character Audrey Denny in Nella Larsen's novel Quicksand (1928). However, this conjecture was unfounded: Denny—who is described as light-skinned, lives downtown, and seems to have no

Dunn, Blanche

West Indian connections—has little in common with Dunn, who was brown-skinned, spoke with a strong West Indian accent, and lived in Harlem. In fact, Denny was probably based on a friend of Larsen's named Anita Thompson.

Biography

Blanche Dunn was born in the West Indies in 1911. She immigrated to the United States in 1926 and met and was befriended by the dress designer Wilda Gunn in 1927. Dunn had a small role in a film adaptation of Eugene O'Neill's play The Emperor Jones in 1933. In 1940 she moved to Whale Cay, a Bahamian island purchased by a British oil magnate and speed boat champion, Marion "Joe" Carstairs; their affair (marked by an episode in which she chased him with a butcher knife and he escaped by leaping out of a window), ended in 1941. Also in 1941, Dunn posed for Carl Van Vechten's series Portrait Photographs of Celebrities.

HEATHER LEVY

See also Emperor Jones, The; Hughes, Langston; Quicksand; Van Vechten, Carl

Film and Portraits

The Emperor Jones. 1933. (United Artists, dir. Dudley Murphy.)

Van Vechten, Carl. Portraits of Blanche Dunn, May 10, 1941. (Lot 12735 Nos. 349–350. Library of Congress Prints and Photographic Division, Washington, D.C.)

Further Reading

Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea: An Autobiography. Toronto and New York: HarperCollins Canada and Hill and Wang, 1993.

Summerscale, Kate. The Queen of Whale Cay. New York: Viking, 1997.

Wirth, Thomas H., ed. Gay Rebel of the Harlem Renaissance: Selections from the Work of Richard Bruce Nugent. London: Duke University Press, 2002.

Duse Mohamed Ali

See Ali, Duse Mohamed

Eastman, Crystal

Crystal Eastman helped prepare the legal blueprints for the workers' compensation program, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the Equal Rights Amendment. She was nicknamed "the tigress" by Hazel Halliran, an equally fearless suffragist. Even Eastman's enemies were willing to concede her absolute fairness and persuasive eloquence. A condescending newspaper announcement of her appointment as the only woman on the New York Employers' Liability Commission in 1909 read: "Portia Appointed by Governor."

Eastman gave most of the credit for her own social insights to her progressive mother, Annis Ford Eastman, an ordained minister who was a granddaughter of the automobile magnate Henry Ford and who had inherited the family ingenuity, although none of Ford's capital, and who encouraged her children to be intellectually independent and physically strong. Crystal Eastman spent a great deal of time riding a mustang that she had been given (although she refused to ride sidesaddle, as women were then expected to; she also wore short skirts, for freedom of movement, and cut her hair short), and she grew up to be an athletic, self-possessed six-foot-tall woman. She dedicated her life to feminism, and she and her scholarly brother Max had a lifelong intellectual collaboration—early on, they seriously examined how to advance the status of women and were advocates of birth control, open sexuality, and wages for housework.

Crystal Eastman achieved academic success at Vassar, Columbia University, and New York City University Law School. After a careful study of the dangerous working conditions in industries in Pittsburgh, she drafted the first workers' compensation law. She was a peerless advocate not only of industrial safety but also of the antiwar movement: She was a founding member of the American Civil Liberties Union (1917) and the Women's Peace Party (1920); she also was one of the key writers of the Equal Rights Amendment in 1923. She developed friendships with a wide range of prominent people, such as the Roosevelt family.

Crystal Eastman was also—significantly for the Harlem Renaissance—a passionate advocate for the disenfranchised and was able to overcome public indifference about gender, race, sexuality, and class discrimination in order to achieve legal reforms. Her other gift to the Harlem Renaissance was her promotion of the poet Claude McKay, who became an associate editor of Eastman's journal The Liberator.

Biography

Crystal Eastman was born on 25 June 1881, in Marlborough, Massachusetts. At age three she had scarlet fever, which permanently affected her kidneys. As a girl, she rebelled against long skirts, wore a man's bathing costume, and with her brother Max Eastman founded the Apostles of Nakedness, a society dedicated to birth control and open sexuality, in 1893. In 1894, she wrote an essay, "Woman," advocating women's emotional and economic autonomy. She graduated from Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, in 1899; went to Columbia University to study for a master's degree in sociology (1904); and graduated from New York University, where she had studied labor law, in 1907.

Crystal Eastman in 1916. (Photograph by Arnold Genthe.
Library of Congress.)

She taught high school English and history in Elmira, New York (1905); worked at the Greenwich Settlement House (1906); and took a job as a researcher with Paul Kellogg (1907). She was appointed by Governor Charles Evans Hughes as the only woman on the New York State Employers' Liability Commission and became a key member of the Wainwright Commission (1909). In addition to her career in labor law, she was an activist for woman's suffrage and later in antiwar and leftist causes. She married Wallace Benedict, an insurance agent, and moved to Milwaukee but decided that the marriage was a failure and returned to New York in 1913. With Lillian Wald, Jane Addams, Paul Kellogg, Rabbi Stephen Wise, and Oswald Garrison Villard, she organized the Anti-Preparedness Committee (later known as the American Union Against Militarism). In 1916, she married the British poet Walter Fuller; he too was an antiwar activist. In 1917, she formed the American Civil Liberties Union with Roger Baldwin and Norman Thomas. She was editor of the progressive left-wing journal The Liberator (1917–1921), was denounced during the "red scare" of 1920–1922, and helped draft the Equal Rights Amendment in 1923. Fuller died of a stroke in 1927, and Eastman died on 8 July 1928, of nephritis. She was inducted into the National Women's Hall of Fame in 2000.

HEATHER LEVY

See also Eastman, Max; Kellogg, Paul U.; Liberator, The; McKay, Claude; Villard, Oswald Garrison; Wise, Stephen Samuel

Selected Publications

"Employers' Liability in Pennsylvania." (Reprinted in 70 Alb. L.J. 68.)

Wisconsin Bureau of Labor and Industrial Statistics, Thirteenth Biennial Report, 85–85. 1909.

"Minutes of Evidence Accompanying the First Report to the Legislature of the State of New York, Commission Appointed Under Chapter 518 of the Laws of 1909 to Inquire into the Question of Employers' Liability and Other Matters." 16 March 1910.

"Work Accidents and Employers' Liability." Survey, 3 September 1910.

Work Accidents and the Law, from The Pittsburgh Survey: Findings in Six Volumes, ed. Paul U. Kellogg. Russell Sage Foundation, 1910. (Reprint, Arno, 1969.)

Further Reading

Ascher, Carol, et al., eds. Biographer and Subject: A Critical Connection between Women—Biographers, Novelists, Critics, Teachers, and Artists about Their Work on Women. New York: Routledge, 1993.

Cook, Blanche Wiesen. Crystal Eastman on Women and Revolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

———. Toward the Great Change: Crystal and Max Eastman on Feminism, Antimilitarism, and Revolution. New York: Garland, 1976.

Eckhaus, Phyllis. "Restless Women: The Pioneering Alumnae of New York University School of Law." New York University Law Review, 66, 1996.

Hackney, James. R. "The Intellectual Origins of American Strict Products Liability: A Case Study in American Pragmatism." American Journal of Legal History, 39, 1995, p. 443.

Law, Sylvia. "Crystal Eastman: Organizer for Women's Rights, Peace, and Civil Liberties in the 1910s." Valparaiso University Law Review, 28, 1994, p. 1305.

Eastman, Max

Max Forrester Eastman (1883–1969) was a prominent journalist, political activist, and literary figure, who edited influential radical periodicals (The Liberator, which he co-owned with his sister Crystal Eastman, and The Masses); wrote twenty-six books, including fiction, poetry, and translations from Russian; and edited two anthologies and a documentary film on the Russian revolution. He opposed America's entry into World War I and was a feminist and socialist, but he was critical of Marxism, Joseph Stalin, and the Soviet Union and eventually rejected communism. Eastman lived in Greenwich Village at a time when it was becoming known as a hub of intellectual and artistic activity.

Under Eastman's editorship, the socialist monthly The Masses emphasized both politics and art. Its contributors and editors included Randolph Bourne, Floyd Dell, Art Sloan, John Reed, Sherwood Anderson, George Bellows, Carl Sandburg, John Sloan, Boardman Robinson, and Stuart Davis. In The Masses, Eastman expressed his own antiwar sentiments and his views against entering World War I; as a result, in August 1917, the federal government denied the publication second-class mailing privileges and put it out of business. Moreover, Eastman, along with seven other editors and contributors, was indicted on charges of conspiring to obstruct military recruiting. Two trials ensued, which received national press coverage and were noteworthy for Eastman's eloquence on the stand and in his summations; they both ended with divided juries.

Max and Crystal Eastman founded The Liberator in 1918 to advance the cause of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia. In 1921, Eastman asked the poet Claude McKay to become an associate editor; soon afterward, Eastman made McKay and the writer Michael Gold coeditors. The Liberator published poetry by McKay in 1919, and one of Jean Toomer's poems in 1922. Langston Hughes was among its subscribers.

In 1922, Max Eastman went to the Soviet Union, where he learned Russian, conferred with Bolshevik leaders, and became a follower of Leon Trotsky. He then decided to go to western Europe, taking with him a copy of "Lenin's Testament," in which V. I. Lenin named Trotsky as his political heir and warned against Stalin; Eastman published sections of it as Since Lenin Died (1925), and it served as a statement about the betrayal of the revolution under the new leadership of the Soviet Union. After returning to the United States in 1926, Eastman served as Trotsky's literary agent and translator. During the 1930s, Eastman supported himself as a lecturer and became the chief anti-Stalinist of the American political left (he was the only American writer to be personally attacked by Stalin, who called him a "gangster of the pen").

Max Eastman. (Brown Brothers.)

In later decades, Eastman moved further to the right, becoming an editor for Reader's Digest and a contributor to the National Review. During the 1950s, he supported the anticommunist crusader Senator Joseph McCarthy.

Biography

Max Forrester Eastman was born on 4 January 1883, in Canandaigua, New York. His parents, Samuel Elijah Eastman and Annis Ford Eastman, were both Protestant ministers. After attending Mercersburg Academy for two years, Max Eastman entered Williams College; he received his B.A. in 1905. He studied for a Ph.D. at Columbia University under the pragmatist John Dewey but did not complete his dissertation; later, he was a professor of logic at Columbia, and his book The Enjoyment of Poetry (1913) became a standard college text. In 1910, Eastman founded the Men's League for Woman Suffrage. He became Leon Trotsky's translator and literary agent in the 1920s; during the 1930s, he supported himself as a lecturer. He later moved to the right politically and was an editor of Reader's Digest. Eastman was married three times: to Ida Rauh in 1911 (they were divorced in 1922); to Eliena Vassilyenva Krylenko, a sister of the minister of justice of the Soviet Union, in 1924 (she died of cancer in 1956); and to Yvette Szekely in 1958. Eastman divided his time between residences in New York City, Martha's Vineyard, and the Caribbean. He died in Barbados on 25 March 1969.

MARTHA AVALEEN EGAN

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Eastman, Crystal; Greenwich Village; Liberator, The; McKay, Claude; Toomer, Jean

Selected Works

- Enjoyment of Poetry*. 1913.
Journalism versus Art. 1915.
Understanding Germany. 1916.
Colors of Life. 1918.
The Sense of Humor. 1921.
Since Lenin Died. 1925.
Marx and Lenin: The Science of Revolution. 1926.
The Literary Mind. 1931.
Kinds of Love. 1931.
Art and the Life of Action. 1934.
Artists in Uniform. 1934.
Enjoyment of Laughter. 1935.
Lot's Wife: A Dramatic Poem. 1940.
Stalin's Russia and the Crisis of Socialism. 1940.
Marxism, Is It Science? 1940.
Heroes I Have Known. 1942.
Enjoyment of Living. 1948.

- Poems of Five Decades*. 1954.
Reflections on the Failure of Socialism. 1955.
Great Companions. 1959.
Love and Revolution. 1964.
Seven Kinds of Goodness. 1967.

Further Reading

- Cantor, Milton. Max Eastman. New York: Twayne, 1970.
O'Neill, William L. The Last Romantic: A Life of Max Eastman. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978. (Reprint, 1990.)

Ebony and Topaz

Ebony and Topaz (1927), a large single-issue anthology edited by Charles S. Johnson, was published by Opportunity under the aegis of the National Urban League. Described as a "collectanea," it was intended as a companion piece to Alain Locke's The New Negro (1925), to which it was similar in format; however, the black literary expression in Ebony and Topaz was less self-conscious and more self-assured. It included prose and poetry, which reflected, according to Johnson, a "venture in expression . . . a faithful reflection of current interests and observations in Negro life."

Johnson loosely classified the contents in five parts in which a broadly interdisciplinary approach is evident: Negro folk life, historical figures in careers and art, racial problems and attitudes, introspection, and articulation of intimate feelings. In his introduction, Johnson said that the anthology was characterized by spontaneity and humor (which perhaps had previously been suppressed in favor of sobriety), and—more important—that it had a new impetus: "A spirit has been quietly manifest of late which it would be a gentle treason to ignore." However, Alain Locke, in his own blunt contribution "Our Little Renaissance," observed that "the mellowness of maturity has not yet come upon us."

Ebony and Topaz was an interracial exercise: Literary contributions came from both black and white writers, including Arna Bontemps, Abram L. Harris, Francis Holbrook, Frank Horne, Helene Johnson, George Chester Morse, Julia Peterkin, Baron von Rucksteschell, and Dorothy Scarborough. There were also bold illustrations by Charles Cullen, Richard Bruce Nugent, and Aaron Douglas (Douglas's contribution had previously appeared in Opportunity in October 1926, accompanying poetry by Langston Hughes). Charles Cullen supplied the art for the cover, moderating his usual highly charged eroticism. However, Richard Bruce Nugent—whose art had sharpened considerably after his contribution to Wallace Thurman's periodical Fire!! (1926) gave him a taste for expression—seems to have had carte blanche and produced some of the most striking graphic images of the Harlem Renaissance: four illustrations titled Drawings for Mulattoes. Whereas Cullen's Negro body type is flawless and athletic, Bruce's figures have a flawed physicality and seem caught in cultural contortions. Additional illustrations, courtesy of Arthur Schomburg, reflected an interest in international high art: reproductions of works by Sebastian Gomez and the English court painters Thomas Gainsborough and Joshua Reynolds.

There are some parallels between Ebony and Topaz and Fire!!—for one thing, they had many of the same contributors. Still, their differences seem more significant. Ebony and Topaz lacked the edginess and independence of Fire!! and was perceived by critics as simply art for art's sake, but it tried to maintain realism, in which Fire!! was deficient. Retrospectively, Ebony and Topaz seems to have more in common with Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life (1928), Thurman's successor to Fire!!.

As a single volume, Ebony and Topaz may have had a negligible impact. Within the context of single-issue publications of the Harlem Renaissance, though, it represents a measured voice "stressing the black man's 'Americanism'" (Hayden 1968). It turned out to be Johnson's swan song at the National Urban League; he took up an academic career at Fisk University in 1928.

CATHERINE O'HARA

See also Bontemps, Arna; Douglas, Aaron; Fire!!; Harlem; Horne, Frank; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; Johnson, Helene; Locke, Alain; National Urban League; New Negro, The; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Opportunity; Peterkin, Julia Mood; Schomburg, Arthur A.

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston. Modernism and the Harlem Renaissance. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1987.
- Gilpin, Patrick J. "Charles S. Johnson: Entrepreneur of the Harlem Renaissance." In The Harlem Renaissance Remembered, ed. Arna Bontemps. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.

Hayden, Robert. "Preface to the Atheneum Edition." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Atheneum, 1968, p. xiii.

Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap, 1995.

Johnson, Charles S., ed. Ebony and Topaz: A Collectanea. New York: National Urban League, 1927.

Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Vintage, 1982, pp. 198–239.

Eclectic Club

The Eclectic Club was an active literary and artistic society in Harlem that met monthly starting in early 1922. Largely ignored by posterity and often mistakenly referred to as the "Electric Club," the group nonetheless provided an important forum in which poets, politicians, and patrons socialized and discussed future projects. Its existence is documented principally in the columns of Negro World; the accounts there suggest that the Eclectics were a peripatetic group.

From the outset, the projects of the Eclectic Club were predominantly, although not exclusively, distinguished by their focus on Afro-Caribbean works. As Claude McKay, one of the club's most noted guests, insisted, the Puerto Rican areas of Harlem had the greatest interest in literary culture during the early 1920s. McKay spoke to the Eclectic Club on at least two occasions. One of these was on 8 April 1922, when McKay read poems from his collection Harlem Shadows; Arthur Schomburg and Joel Augustus Rogers were present at this event. During 1922 Schomburg and Rogers both frequently attended the club's other events, occasionally speaking before the group. Their attendance was probably a result of the fact that the Eclectics shared their interest in popularizing black history. William H. Ferris attended more sporadically, but his presence also illustrates the favorable reception the club gave to black history.

Other prominent members with an Afro-Caribbean background included Eric Walrond, who was also in attendance when McKay read his work. Walrond was one of the club's most important recruiters, introducing Zora Neale Hurston to the group in mid-1925, as well as his fellow columnists at Negro World, Lester Taylor and E. V. Plummer. Some of the Eclectics advanced their careers through the club's events. For instance, in January 1922, Duse Mohamed Ali addressed the club at the Jackson School of Music on West 138th Street on the topic "Modern Egypt"; a few weeks later, Ali resumed a working relationship with Marcus Garvey, taking the position of foreign-affairs correspondent for Garvey's organization, the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). (However, although the club was sympathetic to Garveyism, it by no means fell under the aegis of UNIA.) Walrond maintained strong ties with the Eclectics long after he left his position as editor of Garvey's publications, and Hubert Harrison's occasional appearances indicate that even those who had repudiated Garveyism might still find sufficient attraction in the club.

The president of the Eclectic Club was a man of modest means who went by the name William Service Bell. McKay considered Bell a "cultivated artistic New England Negro." Bell was by no means just a figurehead; he took an active interest in the work of those around him and occasionally even read his own work before the group. By 1926 Bell was making a living as an actor and singer, and for a short period he lived in a bohemian apartment house at 237 West 136th Street known as "Niggerati Manor." It was because of Bell that a few copies of the failed publication Fire!! were saved from the fire in which most copies were destroyed.

Although its name may have suggested otherwise, the rank-and-file members of the Eclectic Club tended to be "ladies and gentlemen in tenue de rigueur" (McKay 1937–1970). Through societies such as the Eclectic Club, the White Peacock, and the Booklovers Club (the present-day Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture), the "renaissance" became a part of everyday Harlem. Moreover, the early establishment of the Eclectic Club and its concern for Afro-Caribbean projects support a wider chronological and substantive definition of the Harlem Renaissance.

ANDREW MICHAEL FEARNLEY

See also Ali, Duse Mohamed; Booklovers Club; Ferris, William H.; Fire!!; Harrison, Hubert; Hurston, Zora Neale; McKay, Claude; Negro World; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Schomburg, Arthur A.; Walrond, Eric

Further Reading

Martin, Tony. Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass., 1983.

McKay, Claude. A Long Way from Home. New York and London, 1970. (Originally published 1937.)

Negro World. Schomburg Collections, New York Public Library.

Wintz, Cary. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex., 1988.

Edmonds, Randolph

During the Harlem Renaissance, musical stage productions were a common form of entertainment. Especially popular were shows that featured African Americans in song-and-dance routines; among these were such musicals as Strut, Miss Lizzie (1922); Chocolate Dandies (1924); and Lucky Sambo (1925). As the titles indicate, this form of entertainment often relied on stereotypes of African Americans and thus did little to aid blacks in their quest for equal rights. Many African American playwrights challenged these negative images by writing plays that depicted the discrimination confronting African Americans in their daily lives.

Fostered by W. E. B. Du Bois, the Negro "little theater" movement, which began in the 1920s, was a venue for exuberant activity among the nearly 300 African American dramatists writing in the 1920s and 1930s. To Du Bois, the stage was a platform for teaching about African American culture and history. Randolph Edmonds shared this view. Known as the "dean of black academic theater," Edmonds worked against stereotypes of African Americans by encouraging the development of drama based on their folk culture and history. Through his work with college and high school students, Edmonds promoted drama clubs and theater courses as part of the curriculum. His career was dedicated to teaching drama, administering theater organizations he had founded, writing more than fifty plays, and publishing three anthologies of his plays and some forty essays on the relationship between drama and education.

Edmonds began writing folk plays at Oberlin College, where he organized the Dunbar Forum, an African American group that produced several of his early plays. Through a fellowship he received from the Rockefeller Fund while attending Yale, Edmonds studied drama in England for one year. At that time he also took courses at Dublin University and attended productions at the Abbey Theater, which had promoted the development of folk drama.

Nearly all of Edmonds's plays focus on the life of working-class African Americans, the folk. Seldom light or joyous, his plays portray problems within black families—problems caused by migration to the North, by the suffering endured during slavery, and by the sacrifices these families make for their communities. His play Breeders (1930) reveals how his work differed from typical productions on Harlem stages. In this play, the master of a black slave woman attempts to force her to have sexual intercourse with a black man in order to produce strong slave children; rather than submit, she poisons herself.

From 1926 until 1934, Edmonds taught drama at Morgan College (later Morgan University) in Baltimore, Maryland, where he directed the Morgan College Players, an organization he had founded. At Morgan, he formed the Negro Intercollegiate Dramatic Association (NIDA), which held annual tournaments among five African American colleges to encourage the creation and production of black folk plays. At Dillard University, he founded the Southern Association of Dramatic and Speech Arts (SADSA) in 1936; it later became the National Association of Dramatic and Speech Arts (NADSA). At Florida A&M University, he served as the chairman of the Department of Speech and Drama for more than twenty years.

The S. Randolph Edmonds Theatrical Collection is housed in the Black Archives Research Center and Museum at Florida A&M University.

Biography

Sheppard Randolph Edmonds was born in 1900 in Lawrenceville, Virginia. He studied at Saint Paul Normal and Industrial School in Lawrenceville, Oberlin College in Ohio (A.B. 1926), Columbia University (A.M., 1934), Yale School of Drama (1936), Dublin University, and the London School of Speech Training and Dramatic Arts (1938). He taught at Morgan College (later Morgan University) in Baltimore, Maryland (1926–1934); Dillard University, New Orleans, Louisiana (1935–1947); and Florida A&M University, Tallahassee (1948–1968). Edmonds was a theater columnist for the Baltimore Afro-American (1930–1934) and founder of the Morgan College Players, Negro Intercollegiate Dramatic Association (NIDA, 1931), and Southern Association of Dramatic and Speech Arts (SADSA, 1936; it later became the National Association of Dramatic and Speech Arts, NADSA). He died in Lawrenceville, Virginia, in 1983.

CHRISTINE RAUCHFUSS GRAY

See also Community Theater; Literature: 3—Drama

Selected Works

“Black Drama in the American Theatre: 1700–1970.” In The American Theatre: A Sum of Its Parts. New York: French, 1971, pp. 379–426.

Shades and Shadows. Boston, Mass.: Meador, 1930.

Six Plays for a Negro Theater. Boston, Mass.: Walter H. Baker, 1934. (Foreword by Frederick H. Koch.)

The Land of Cotton and Other Plays. Washington, D.C.: Associated Publishers, 1942.

Further Reading

Peterson, Bernard L., Jr. Early Black American Playwrights and Dramatic Writers: A Biographical Directory and Catalog of Plays, Films, and Broadcasting Scripts. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990.

Sanders, Leslie Catherine. The Development of Black Theater in America: From Shadows to Selves. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988.

Elder Becton

See Becton, George Wilson

Ellington, Duke

No figure of the Harlem Renaissance achieved more of the goals set by leaders and intellectuals of the movement than Duke Ellington, who purposefully promoted black artistic expression as a way of breaking down prejudice, achieving racial uplift, and displaying and documenting black humanity and achievement. He was one of the most famous and widely disseminated black voices in the international mass media, commenting for more than four decades on black identity, history, and pride. However, although some modern-day accounts include jazz and blues artists as part and parcel of the Harlem Renaissance, this represents a revisionist view: Its leadership kept popular musicians at a distance and downgraded their cultural contributions. The intellectuals of the renaissance tended to apply the same elite standards to music as to literature—recognizing only music that embraced European criteria, hoping for great achievements by African Americans in classical music, and encouraging composers to transform supposedly primitive jazz, blues, and plantation melodies into conventional orchestrated works of Western art. This approach to music largely ignored the significant, decidedly non-primitive contributions of jazz and blues musicians. “Renaissance leaders aspired to create a New Negro, one who would attend concerts and operas and would be economically and socially prepared to enter an ideally integrated American society” (Floyd 1990). Ellington, although he brought his music to concert halls, rarely waded into these academic and semantic battles; he concentrated on creating and performing what may have been the most accomplished oeuvre in the history of American music, much of it pointedly inspired by African American themes, and enjoyed by millions around the world.

Ellington’s interest in black culture came largely from his upbringing in black middle-class Washington, D.C., which was considered the center of “respectable Negro society” from the end of the Civil War until World War II. African American students there received detailed instruction in black history and identity: “What used to happen was that they were concerned with you being representative of a great and proud race,” Ellington recalled in the 1960s. “They used to pound it into you, you go to the English class, that [race pride] was more important than the English.” The black community and schools also exposed students to African American music as well as European classical music, and there were elaborate pageants of black history using music, dance, and narration (Tucker 1991). One reason that Ellington gained national prominence and widespread respect—and earned millions of dollars—during the 1920s and 1930s, while the writers of the Harlem Renaissance were struggling to survive, is that a century-long tradition of successful black music productions and performers had preceded him, mostly centered in New York City. This tradition did not yet support long-form musical works or compositions that directly challenged American racism, but as early as the turn of the twentieth century, it provided a multiracial paying audience; and, as Ellington notes in his autobiography, he and his musical peers in Washington were part of that audience. He mentions dozens of acts that he followed avidly as a young man and whose success on a national level inspired him to leave a lucrative band business he had established in his hometown and venture North to New York City in 1923.

Ellington, though, took years to achieve success in the more competitive publishing and recording circles of New York; and he might never have attained it at all if not for his partnership with the Jewish manager, publisher, and entrepreneur Irving Mills from 1926 to 1939. To find a niche in the crowded, frequently anti-Semitic and racist music publishing industry, Mills decided to focus on black jazz and blues, music shunned by most Tin Pan Alley publishers. This earned him admiring notice in black newspapers; introduced him to his most significant client, Ellington; and thus drew him into band managing. Mills’s main achievement for Ellington during the 1920s was the band’s residency at the Cotton Club, which lasted more than three years and included national nightly radio broadcasts—the first time a black band had received so much national exposure. During this early period in their association, Mills and Ellington seemed more concerned with establishing the orchestra as a top show business attraction than with promoting Ellington as a serious artist.

The Cotton Club was a glamorous, expensive, and successful night spot, even during the Great Depression, but it was also segregated, featuring blacks on-stage performing for an exclusively white audience. It was part of a lucrative market during the Harlem Renaissance that took advantage of a “Negro infatuation” among whites who wanted to expose themselves to the supposedly more licentious, primitive, authentic black culture. Ellington’s music at this time was often (although not always) promoted as “jungle” music or advertised with strongly African connotations. The distinctive growling, shrieking, moaning sounds of the band instrumentalists Bubber Miley and Joe Nanton inspired this characterization, as did the club’s penchant for skits set in Africa. These skits, usually featuring scantily clad light-skinned black women, often portrayed African Americans as one step removed (if that much) from the jungle, although Ellington and the band wore tuxedos, performed sophisticated music, and were not part of the jungle tableaux. Mills and Ellington, however, did not long adhere to emphasis on “primitive” and “weird” effects, which did not accord with Ellington’s view of black music or with Mills’s idea of the enormous commercial and artistic potential among white as well as black audiences for Ellington’s compositions. Starting in 1930, Mills began a historic, nonstereotyped marketing campaign that provided the financial and artistic foundation for Ellington’s nearly half-century career as a composer and popular entertainer.

Mills spent a decade churning out publicity that equated Ellington’s compositions and personal bearing with “genius,” “quality,” and respectability. During the 1930s, Mills placed Ellington in major studio feature films more often and more respectfully than any blacks would be presented until after World War II, with Ellington always in formal clothing, befitting a serious composer and conductor. Mills conveyed the compelling impression that Ellington's shows and recordings constituted an invitation to understand popular music, African American music, and African Americans in a new way. Although it was true that Mills promoted his other black artists using the same stereotypical images that prevailed in show business, and that Mills claimed for himself what would now be considered an unethically disproportionate part of Ellington's earnings, Ellington never protested, privately or publicly. Ellington knew that Mills had given him an opportunity to create and present music that no black composer and few American composers of any color had previously enjoyed. For black and white artists of this period, it took high-powered management to launch a popular music career, and the artists' financial sacrifice was seen as a normal cost of doing business.

Of course, Mills's marketing of Ellington worked so well principally because Ellington's music more than lived up to it. Onstage and in the recording studio, Ellington reveled in his dual role as entertainer and serious composer, which reflected his own musical interests and background and attracted the wide audience he needed to support his writing and the orchestra that performed his compositions. The more rigid critics may have had trouble reconciling artistic quality with the top-forty charts, but Ellington proved equally accomplished at creating intriguing compositions and recordings that easily fit into commercial boundaries, and at composing more esoteric and adventurous works, such as his extended compositions and his compositions that programmatically illustrated African American culture. Often, Ellington's best pieces fulfilled both functions; examples are "Black and Tan Fantasy," "East St. Louis Toodle-Oh" (a musical impression of the lope of a tired black man walking home from work), "Black Beauty" (written for the Harlem singer and actress Florence Mills, who had recently died), and "A Portrait of Bert Williams." The marketing emphasis on Ellington as a composer, as well as his need to write for a listening as well as a dancing audience during the Cotton Club's radio broadcasts, allowed him to work in a larger variety of genres and styles than any other black performer of the period: "hot" jazz, vocal tunes, dreamy instrumentals, low-down blues, swinging riff-laden stompers, and more.

Ellington's extended works, which had the bearing and length of symphonic music, were unprecedented, and they upset listeners who insisted on a strict division between pop and classical forms. These relaxed, charming pieces broke through the three-minute barrier of pop and jazz recording in the 1930s and 1940s: Creole Rhapsody lasted nine minutes (on two sides of a 78-rpm record), and Reminiscing in Tempo lasted thirteen minutes (on four sides). Moreover, their shifting tempos and unpredictable transitions represented a musical adventure that expanded audiences' expectations for pop and jazz performers, and made for some of the freshest and most intriguing pieces in the Ellington canon. They remain examples of the emotional, intricately arranged music that rewards repeated listenings and careful attention, like the best music of any genre. In these longer works, Ellington revealed the near-sightedness of musical as well as racial segregation.

The first European tour of Ellington's orchestra, in 1933, solidified his reputation as an important American composer. Unlike their American counterparts, English critics and audiences did not hesitate to place his music on a high plane alongside Bach, Wagner, and Schoenberg, and they linked Ellington's inspiration and genius to his African American heritage. The Europeans' views were extensively reproduced in the American press (even in the South) and changed Americans' attitudes and expectations. Ellington's music and demeanor, and the way he was marketed, began a shift in the cultural hierarchy—in which only European classical music had been exalted as high art and indigenous American forms had been denigrated. Before Aaron Copland and Charles Ives rose to national prominence at the time of World War II, ushering in a widespread celebration of and search for American highbrow music, Ellington inspired a reevaluation of American music and black music, and new schools of criticism of popular music and jazz, on both sides of the Atlantic. After the war, American music, like American literature, would be studied more frequently and more seriously in the United States and abroad. Without issuing declamatory or inflammatory statements, Ellington had challenged and altered not just social and political attitudes concerning African Americans but also the standing of American artists of all colors.

On 23 January 1943, Ellington and his orchestra appeared in their first concert at Carnegie Hall, amid a crowd of interracial celebrities and the biggest media buildup ever assembled on Ellington's behalf. The highlight of the evening was the premiere of his longest extended work (lasting more than forty minutes), Black,

Brown, and Beige: A Tone Parallel to the History of the American Negro, an ambitious multipart work program-matically illustrating black history from the African continent to blacks' contribution in World War II. With this event, Ellington used his own power in the music business, and Americans' wartime patriotism, to bring the subject of black respectability, pride, and history into the national consciousness even more fully than he had ever done before. In numerous interviews, he eloquently discussed such issues as the "middle pas-sage" and relations between blacks and whites during slavery, subjects that rarely received a hearing in the American mass media, let alone a serious or accurate one. Before it was common or even safe to confront American racism politically, Ellington used his art and his commercial success as a public arena, challenging the false suppositions of black inferiority that lay behind discrimination and bringing alternative messages about blacks to a national audience.

Eleven months after his debut in Carnegie Hall, Ellington continued these efforts to assemble a musical record of black life and history, with the premiere of his evocation of Roi Ottley's book New World a-Comin'

Duke Ellington. (Brown Brothers.)

(1943), which predicted better times for American blacks. Later additions to this part of the Ellington canon (often cowritten with his friend and writing partner Billy Strayhorn) include A Tone Parallel to Harlem (Harlem Suite), My People, and New Orleans Suite. In the 1960s, Ellington continued to release extended suites, such as Afro-Bossa, Far East Suite, and Afro-Eurasian Eclipse, that reflected the African diaspora and the internationalism of many blacks during that period. Ellington's "sacred concerts," which he considered his most important work, featured personal and historical treatments of religion, an important facet of African American history. But Ellington repeatedly stressed that no single genre or theme could define his work. Such Sweet Thunder and Suite Thursday, evocative multipart suites illustrating works by William Shakespeare and John Steinbeck, are two of the many examples of Ellington's determination to remain, as an artist, beyond any easy categorization other than "American composer."

Biography

Edward Kennedy ("Duke") Ellington was born in Washington, D.C., on 29 April 1899. He attended public schools there; studied piano with a local teacher, Marietta Clinkscales; attended Armstrong High School; and studied harmony with Henry Grant (1918–1919). Ellington formed his first band, the Dukes Serenaders, in Washington, D.C. (1918). He performed regularly with his group the Washingtonians at the Kentucky Club, New York City (1923–1927) and was then hired by the Cotton Club (1927–1931). He composed music for and appeared in many films, including Black and Tan (1929), Check and Double Check (1930), Murder at the Vanities (1934), Belle of the Nineties (1934), Symphony in Black (1935), Cabin in the Sky (1943), Reveille with Beverly (1943), Anatomy of a Murder (1959), and Paris Blues (1961). He toured in the United States (1931–1974) and in Europe (1933, 1939, 1950, 1958, 1960s). He gave annual concerts at Carnegie Hall, premiering long-form works, in 1943–1948. Ellington made more than 200 appearances on international television from 1949 to 1973; from 1963 to 1973, he made tours abroad sponsored by the U.S. State Department; and in 1965, 1968, and 1973, he gave three sacred concerts. His awards included the George Washington Carver Memorial Institute, Supreme Award of Merit (1943); the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Spingarn Medal (1959); an Oscar nomination for the score of Paris Blues; eight Grammy awards (1962–1973); City of New York, Musician of Every Year, Gold Medal (1965); Paris Medal (1965); City of Chicago Medal (1965); City Club of New York Medal, Distinguished New Yorker Award (1966); Emmy Award for “Duke Ellington: Love You Madly” (1967); Ordem dos Musicos do Brasil (1968); Presidential Medal of Freedom (1969); special papal blessing from Pope Paul VI (1969); Yale University Duke Ellington Fellowship Program (established 1972); National Association of Negro Musicians, Highest Award for Distinguished Service in Music (1972); Eleanor Roosevelt International Workshop in Human Relations, International Humanist Award (1972); commemorative stamp issued by the U.S. Postal Service (1986); and honorary doctorates from numerous schools, including Wilberforce College (1949), Yale University (1967), Brown University (1969), Berklee College of Music (1971), Howard University (1971), and University of Wisconsin at Madison (1971). Ellington died in New York City, on 24 May 1974.

HARVEY COHEN

See also Cotton Club; Harlem: 3—Entertainment; Jazz; Music; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Musicians; Nightclubs; Nightlife

Selected Works

“Black and Tan Fantasy.” 1927. (Cowritten with Bubber Miley.)
 “East St. Louis Toodle-Oo.” 1927. (Cowritten with Bubber Miley.)
 “Black Beauty.” 1928.
 “Mood Indigo.” 1930. (Cowritten with Irving Mills and Albany Bigard.)
Creole Rhapsody, Parts 1 and 2. 1931.
 “It Don’t Mean a Thing (If It Ain’t Got That Swing).” 1932. (Cowritten with Irving Mills.)
 “Solitude.” 1934. (Cowritten with Eddie DeLange and Irving Mills.)
Reminiscing in Tempo. 1935.
Symphony in Black. 1935. (Film soundtrack.)
 “Jack the Bear.” 1940.
 “Ko-Ko.” 1940.
 “Bojangles (A Portrait of Bill Robinson).” 1940.
 “A Portrait of Bert Williams.” 1940.
Black, Brown, and Beige. 1943.
New World a-Comin’. 1943.

Deep South Suite. 1946.
 “On a Turquoise Cloud.” 1947.
 “The Clothed Woman.” 1947.
A Tone Parallel to Harlem (Harlem Suite). 1951.
Such Sweet Thunder. 1957. (Cowritten with Billy Strayhorn.)
Suite Thursday. 1960. (Cowritten with Billy Strayhorn.)
My People. 1963.
Afro-Bossa. 1963. (Cowritten with Billy Strayhorn and Juan Tizol.)
Far East Suite. 1966. (Cowritten with Billy Strayhorn.)
Second Sacred Concert. 1968.
The River. 1970.
New Orleans Suite. 1970.
Afro-Eurasian Eclipse. 1971.

Further Reading

Ellington, Duke. Music Is My Mistress. New York: Doubleday, 1973.
 Ellison, Ralph. “Homage to Duke Ellington on His Birthday.” In Going to the Territory. New York: Random House, 1986.
 Floyd, Samuel J. Jr., ed. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Greenwood, 1990.
 Hasse, John Edward. Beyond Category: The Life and Genius of Duke Ellington. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1993.
 Nicholson, Stuart. Reminiscing in Tempo: A Portrait of Duke Ellington. Boston, Mass.: Northern University Press, 1999.
 Peretti, Burton W. Jazz in American Culture. Chicago, Ill.: Ivan R. Dee, 1997.
 Stratemann, Klaus. Ellington Day by Day and Film by Film. Copenhagen: Jazz Media, 1992.
 Tucker, Mark. Ellington: The Early Years. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.
 ———, ed. The Duke Ellington Reader. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Ellis, Evelyn

Evelyn Ellis appeared in both film and theater during the Harlem Renaissance; although she was a minor actress, she was connected to significant networks of African American filmmakers, playwrights, and performers. She appeared in race films and in a few plays with black casts during this era. She is notable for having played the role of Crown’s Bess in a successful production by the Theater Guild of Dorothy and DuBose Heyward's play Porgy (1927); and as a member of the Lafayette Players Stock Company, Ellis was part of a black artistic community on the East Coast. Community theater groups such as the Lafayette Players that were not constrained by the racial codes of the film and theater industries offered African American actresses greater creative possibilities; thus Ellis and her colleagues in community groups could appear in plays that were not originally intended for African American performers. The actors of the Lafayette Players also often worked in race films, which were conceived with black performers and black audiences in mind, and Ellis acted in two of these during the 1920s, the golden age of the genre.

One of her race films was a silent-era comedy, Reol Productions' Easy Money (1921), in which Sherman Dudley also appeared. The setting is Millbrook, a thrifty little southern town. The character Andy Simpson (played by Dudley) is looked on as slow, plodding, and lacking in ambition by everyone except his sweetheart, Margie Watkins (played by Edna Morton), who is the daughter of a bank president. Margie becomes attracted to J. Overton Tighe, who has recently arrived in town in an expensive car; and despite Andy's warnings against easy money, the townspeople eagerly buy shares in a phony stock promoted by Tighe. As a comedy, this film was an exception for Reol, which usually produced dramas (including Burden of a Race, Secret Sorrows, and an adaptation of Paul Laurence Dunbar's novel of 1902, Sport of the Gods).

Later, Ellis performed in Oscar Micheaux's controversial film A Son of Satan (1924), which starred Lawrence Chenault and featured the chorus from the original company of Shuffle Along. Micheaux was the most prolific director of race films and was known, according to one contemporary critic, for "giving us the real stuff." The scenes of drinking in A Son of Satan offended the censors, and Micheaux was forced to reedit the film for exhibition.

Biography

Evelyn Ellis was born on 2 February 1894, in Boston, Massachusetts. She was a member of the Lafayette Players Stock Company and appeared in Othello (Lafayette Theater, 1919). During the 1920s she had minor roles in the films Easy Money (1921) and A Son of Satan (1924) and in the plays Roseanne (1923), Goat Alley (1927), and Porgy (1927). She later had roles in Native

Son (1941), Blue Holiday, (1945), the play Deep Are the Roots (1945), The Lady from Shanghai (1948), The Joe Louis Story (1953), Interrupted Melody (1955), Tobacco Road (with an all-black cast, 1950), The Royal Family (at City Center in New York, 1951), Touchstone (1953), and Supper for the Dead (1954). Ellis died on 5 June 1958, in Saranac Lake, New York.

TERRI FRANCIS

See also Chenault, Lawrence; Dudley, Sherman H.; Lafayette Players; Micheaux, Oscar; Porgy; Play; Race Films; Shuffle Along

Further Reading

- Bowser, Pearl, Jane Gaines, and Charles Musser, eds. Oscar Micheaux and His Circle: African-American Filmmaking and Race Cinema of the Silent Era. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Hill, Anthony D. Pages from the Harlem Renaissance: A Chronicle of Performance. New York: Peter Lang, 1996.
- Hottschild, Brenda Dixon. Digging the Africanist Presence in American Performance Dance and Other Contexts. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1996.
- Hughes, Langston, and Milton Meltzer. Black Magic: A Pictorial History of the Negro in American Entertainment. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1968.
- Patterson, Lindsay, ed. Anthology of the Afro-American in the Theatre: A Critical Approach. International Library of Afro-American Life and History. Cornwells Heights, Pa.: Publishers Agency, 1976.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, 2nd ed. Landham, Md., and London: Scarecrow, 1995.
- Tanner, Jo A. Dusky Maidens: The Odyssey of the Early Black Dramatic Actress. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1992.
- Thomas, Ireland D. "Motion Picture News." Chicago Defender, 31 January 1925, p. 6A.
- Thompson, Sister Francesa. The Lafayette Players, 1915–1932: America's First Dramatic Stock Company. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1972.

Ellison, Ralph

Ralph Ellison, the author of Invisible Man, one of the most important twentieth-century American novels, owed much of his development as a writer to the Harlem Renaissance. Ellison was born in 1914 in Oklahoma; he moved with his mother to Indiana just before the riots of 1921 in Tulsa. From 1933 to 1936 he studied music at the Tuskegee Institute; then, intending to earn money for his senior year, he moved to New York. In New York he met Richard Wright, began to write under Wright's guidance, and joined the Communist Party. Ellison remained in New York until 1955, three years after Invisible Man was published and two years after it had received the National Book Award. Thus Ellison's career was launched from New York and in particular from the social and artistic milieu of Harlem.

Invisible Man is a tale of self-discovery. The young African American protagonist escapes from his segregated southern hometown to a black college, only to be expelled and sent to "the big city" to find his own way in the world. Thereafter he experiences a series of disillusionments—episodes that he narrates from a hole, deep in the ground, illuminated by 1,369 light-bulbs. He explains how he slowly came to realize that he had badly misunderstood his world, that he was blind both to the intricate social and political machinery of democracy and to the real nature of African Americans' place in greater American society. As he does so, the metaphor of invisibility comes to signify the experience of being black in America but also, more broadly, the experience of being an ordinary citizen in a democracy. As a narrator, the protagonist takes a jazzy, ironic, tragicomic attitude toward reality and insists on his own power to remake reality through creative speech. Early critics of Invisible Man considered it an outstanding existentialist account of the human condition. With time, however, and with Ellison's many essays (in Shadow and Act and Going to the Territory) as a guide, it has become clear that this novel also makes a profound sociotheoretical argument about democracy and the place of minority cultures and minority viewpoints in a democracy.

Invisible Man was born, according to Ellison, in 1945, when his efforts to work on a war novel were "interrupted by an ironic, down-home voice that struck me as being as irreverent as honky-tonk trumpet blasting through a performance, say, of Britten's War Requiem" (1995, xv). Like other figures of the Harlem Renaissance, Ellison was powerfully influenced by the blues and jazz tradition as well as by African American folklore. He drew on these sources as he worked toward a novel that simultaneously criticizes American society and affirms the ability of that society to consolidate independent traditions. The novel jokes, puns, and riddles its way through the argument that in the

Ralph Ellison. (Library of Congress.)

United States there is no such thing as white culture separate from black culture, or black culture separate from white culture; democracy is a political regime in which the common experiences of diverse citizens are constituted out of the sacrifices of their fellow citizens. Ellison, as he said of his protagonist, was "forged in the underground of American experience and yet managed to emerge less angry than ironic. [He was] a blues-toned laughter-at-wounds who included himself in his indictment of the human condition" (1995, xviii).

Biography

Ralph Waldo Ellison was born on 1 March 1914, in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, where he attended segregated public schools. He later studied at the Tuskegee Institute. Ellis worked for the New York Federal Writers' Project of the Works Progress Administration in New York City (1938–1941); served as a merchant marine in World War II until 1945; worked at odd jobs as a freelance photographer and installing audio systems in New York (1945–1955); and taught at Bard College (1961), Rutgers University in New Jersey (1962–1964), and New York University (1970–1980). He was editor of the Negro Quarterly (1942–1943) and wrote for it (1942–1943) and many other periodicals, including New Masses (1938–1942), Tomorrow (1944), New Republic, Saturday Review, Antioch Review, Reporter, The Nation, New World Writing, Quarterly Review of Literature, Partisan Review, and Iowa Review. During his lifetime, he published short stories and essays, one novel (Invisible Man, 1952), and two essay collections (Shadow and Act, 1966; and Going to the Territory, 1986). His Flying Home and Other Short Stories (1996) and a second novel, Juneteenth (1999), were published posthumously. Ellison was a charter member of the National Council on the Arts and Humanities; a member of the Carnegie Commission on public television; and a trustee of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts and Colonial Williamsburg. His awards included the National Book Award (1953), the Russwurm Award, a fellowship at the American Academy of Rome (1955–1957), an appointment to the American Academy of Arts and Letters (1964), the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1969), Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et Lettres (France, 1970), and the National Medal of Arts (1985). Ellison died in New York City on 16 April 1994.

DANIELLE ALLEN

See also Federal Writers' Project; Second Harlem Renaissance; Works Progress Administration; Wright, Richard

Selected Works

- "Slick Gonna Learn." Direction, September 1939, pp. 10–11, 14, 16.
- "The Birthmark." New Masses, 36, 2 July 1940, pp. 16–17.
- "Afternoon." In American Writing, ed. Hans Otto Storm et al. Prairie City, Iowa: James A. Decker, 1940.
- "Mister Toussan." New Masses, 41, 4 November 1941, pp. 19–20. (Reprinted in Negro Story, 1, July–August 1944, pp. 36–41.)
- "That I Had the Wings." Common Ground, 3, Summer 1943, pp. 30–37. (Reprinted as "Mr. Toussaint." Negro Story, 1, 11, October 1944, pp. 3–4.)
- "In a Strange Country." Tomorrow, 3, July 1944, pp. 41–44. (Reprinted in I Have Seen War: Twenty-Five Stories from World War II, ed. Dorothy Sterling. New York: Hill and Wang, 1960.)
- "Flying Home." In Cross Section, ed. Edwin Seaver. New York: Fisher, 1944. (Reprinted in Ten Modern Masters, ed. Robert Gorham Davis. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1972. Dark Symphony, ed. James A. Emanuel and Theodore L. Gross. New York: Free Press, 1968. The Best Short Stories of World War II: An Anthology, ed. Charles A. Fenton. New York: Viking, 1957. The Best Short Stories by Negro Writers, ed. Langston Hughes. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1967. Stories in Black and White, ed. Eva Kissin. New York: Lippincott, 1970.)

- "King of the Bingo Game." Tomorrow, 4, November 1944, pp. 29–33. (Reprinted in Dark Symphony, ed. James A. Emanuel and Theodore L. Gross. New York: Free Press, 1968. Afro-American Literature: An Introduction, ed. Robert Hayden, David J. Burrows, and Frederic R. Lapedes. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.)
- Invisible Man*. New York: New American Library, 1952. (Reprint, New York: Random House, 1952.)
- "Did You Ever Dream Lucky?" New World Writing Number 5. New York: New American Library, 1954, pp. 134–145.
- "A Coupla Scalped Indians." New World Writing Number 9. New York: New American Library, 1956, pp. 225–236. (Reprinted in Black Literature in America, ed. Houston A. Baker Jr. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1971.)
- "Out of the Hospital and Under the Bar." In Soon, One Morning: New Writing by American Negroes, 1940–1962, ed. Herbert Hill. New York: Knopf, 1963.
- Shadow and Act*. New York: New American Library, 1966. (Reprint, New York: Random House, 1964. Included in The Collected Essays of Ralph Ellison, ed. J. F. Callahan. New York: Modern Library, 1995.)
- Going to the Territory*. New York: Random House, 1986. (Included in The Collected Essays of Ralph Ellison, ed. J. F. Callahan. New York: Modern Library, 1995.)
- Flying Home and Other Stories*, ed. and intro. John F. Callahan. New York: Random House, 1996.
- Juneteenth*, ed. J. F. Callahan. New York: Random House, 1999.

Further Reading

- Baker, Houston A. Jr. Blues, Ideology, and Afro-American Literature: A Vernacular Theory. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1984.
- Benston, K. W., ed. Speaking for You: The Vision of Ralph Ellison. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1987.
- Ellison, R. Introduction. In Invisible Man. New York: Vintage International, 1995. (Originally published 1981.)
- Locke, A. "From Native Son to Invisible Man: A Review of the Literature of the Negro for 1952." Phylon, 14, 1953, pp. 34–44.
- Negro Quarterly*, Spring 1942 / Winter–Spring 1943. (Early articles by Ellison.)

- New Masses*, 16 August 1938–20 October 1942. (Early articles by Ellison.)
- O'Meally, ed. New Essays on Invisible Man. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988, pp. 95–122.
- Schor, E. Visible Ellison: A Study of Ralph Ellison's Fiction. Westport, Conn: Greenwood, 1993.
- Sundquist, E. J., ed. Cultural Contexts for Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man. Boston, Mass.: Bedford (St. Martin's Press), 1995.
- Warren, K. "Ralph Ellison and the Reconfiguration of Black Cultural Politics." Yearbook of Research in English and American Literature, 1995, pp. 11, 139–157.
- Watts, J. G. Heroism and the Black Intellectual: Ralph Ellison, Politics, and Afro-American Intellectual Life. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

Emancipator

First published in March 1920, the Emancipator was a socialist weekly newspaper in Harlem, edited by Wilfred Adolphus (W. A.) Domingo. The mission of the Emancipator was to "provide a 'scientific chart and compass' for blacks, in relation to national and international, social and political movements" (Samuels 1977). Domingo advocated socialism as the answer to the oppression of blacks in the United States; he felt that black Americans were victims of capitalism and should be involved in the socialist revolution. The Emancipator sprang up in the context of other radical Harlem newspapers of the time (such as Negro World and the Messenger), with offices at 2295 Seventh Avenue in New York. It became famous in part because it was investigated by the Lusk Committee (the State of New York Joint Committee Investigating Seditious Activities), which was then looking into socialist and communist activities; but despite its fame, the Emancipator lasted only three months, publishing ten issues. Its last issue appeared in May 1920.

W. A. Domingo was born in Kingston, Jamaica, in 1889 and came to the United States in 1910. From August 1918 to July 1919, he edited Negro World, the newspaper of the United Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) led by Marcus Garvey. Domingo also contributed to another periodical of the Harlem Renaissance, the Messenger, edited by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen. Randolph and Owen would later contribute articles to the Emancipator. However, the focus of the Emancipator differed from that of Negro World and the Messenger and their founders. Unlike Garvey's Negro World, the Emancipator emphasized class issues more than racial issues; and the Emancipator spoke to the common, uneducated black masses, whereas the Messenger appealed to black intellectuals.

These differences in philosophy were most pronounced in relation to Garvey. Domingo had first met Garvey when they were both living in Jamaica, and—as noted above—Domingo edited Negro World and was involved with UNIA. However, he never joined UNIA, and he eventually parted ways with it and with Garvey. This break came because Domingo's socialist views conflicted with Garvey's philosophy: Domingo opposed Garvey's teachings and believed that the welfare of black Americans depended on class equality rather than racial issues. Domingo expressed his opposition in the pages of the Emancipator, criticizing Garvey's practices and Garvey's narrow focus on black nationalism. In addition to attempting to discredit Garvey in the Emancipator and other periodicals of the time, Domingo, Randolph, Owen, and other black socialists supported Garvey's eventual deportation to Jamaica.

The Emancipator's contributing editors included Richard B. Moore, Chandler Owen, A. Philip Randolph, Cyril Briggs, and Anselmo Jackson. Domingo and Moore, who was also a Caribbean-born activist, were members of the Twenty-First Assembly District Branch of the Socialist Party in New York City, and they used the Emancipator to promote socialist ideas. But like many other black socialists during the Harlem Renaissance, they became disenchanted with the Socialist Party of America (SPA) because of its inattention to the racial problems of blacks. In 1918, Domingo, Briggs, and Moore formed the African Blood Brotherhood (ABB), which advocated racial equality, freedom of blacks from capitalism, and an end to terrorism by the Ku Klux Klan and similar groups.

HEATHER MARTIN

See also African Blood Brotherhood; Briggs, Cyril; Domingo, Wilfred Adolphus; Garvey, Marcus; Messenger; Moore, Richard B.; Negro World; Owen, Chandler; Randolph, A. Philip; United Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

- Hill, Robert A., ed. The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983–1990.

Samuels, Wilfred D. Five Afro-Caribbean Voices in American Culture 1917–1929: Hubert H. Harrison, Wilfred A. Domingo, Richard B. Moore, Cyril V. Briggs, and Claude McKay. Boulder, Colo.: Belmont, 1977.

Turner, Joyce Moore. "Richard B. Moore and His Works." In Richard B. Moore, Caribbean Militant in Harlem: Collected Writings, 1920–1972, ed. W. Burghardt Turner and Joyce Moore Turner. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988.

Emperor Jones, The

The Emperor Jones, a play by Eugene O'Neill, premiered at the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York City on 3 November 1920. A film based on O'Neill's play, with a screenplay by DuBose Heyward, was produced in 1933. An opera by Louis Gruenberg with libretto by Kathleen de Jaffa, based on the play, premiered at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, also in 1933.

Eugene O'Neill's play The Emperor Jones is the story of an African American, Brutus Jones, who has escaped prison to the West Indies. Over the course of eight scenes, Jones becomes the emperor of an island, and with the help of his Cockney aide-de-camp, the trader Henry Smithers, Jones rules with brutality and with an eye only to amassing a personal fortune. Jones and Smithers both categorize the "natives" of the island as backward and ignorant, but eventually Smithers alerts Jones that the "natives" are practicing witchcraft and preparing a rebellion. Jones flees the palace for the forest. He believes that he can be killed only by a silver bullet (the original title of the play was The Silver Bullet). In a series of flashbacks, brought about by his disorientation in the forest and the never-ending sound of drumming, Jones recalls incidents in his earlier life, which include being a Pullman porter, killing a man over a woman, going to and escaping from prison, and working on a ship and jumping overboard. He also hallucinates that he is being auctioned off in front of white planters, and he has encounters with a "Congo witch-doctor" and a crocodile. At the end of the play, Jones is killed by his own soldiers, who have made silver bullets.

O'Neill, the playwright, was greatly influenced by the expressionist work of two Europeans: August Strindberg and Frank Wedekind. The Emperor Jones was his own first attempt at this style of drama, which emphasizes a hero who experiences the world from the inside out. Jones's hallucinations are the prime example of expressionism in The Emperor Jones. In his atmospheric portrayal of the Caribbean island, O'Neill also taps into the early twentieth-century fascination with primitivism in art and performance, as well as into his own experiences prospecting for gold in Honduras. For the plot, O'Neill combined various sources: a story he had heard about a onetime ruler of Haiti, Vilbrun Guillaume Sam, who had claimed that he could be killed only by a silver bullet; a book he had read on the use of drums in religious rituals in the Congo; and Joseph Conrad's novel Heart of Darkness. Many critics of The Emperor Jones, at the time and subsequently, have emphasized that O'Neill was not trying to show a close connection between African Americans and Africa, but rather was trying to give a more universal commentary on the fearful, primitive beast in all of us. Nevertheless, O'Neill did choose to confront this aspect of humanity through the character of Brutus Jones.

The production was directed by George Cram Cook (known as "Jig"), and the set was designed by Cleon Throckmorton. The costuming was by Blanche Hays, who chose to dress Jones as a parody of Marcus Garvey, the Jamaican-born founder of the United Negro Improvement Association; Garvey sometimes appeared in marches in Harlem wearing British military regalia. Except for the role of Brutus Jones, white performers played the black-identified roles in blackface. O'Neill's choice of an African American protagonist presented some difficulty. By 1920, no African American actor had been cast in a serious drama written by a white American. The casting of an actual African American, the actor Charles S. Gilpin (1878–1930), was a radical move for the already left-leaning theater group. There was a heated discussion among the actors about whether a black man or a white man in blackface should play the role. O'Neill does not seem to have expressed an opinion, although he is documented as having played a black character in blackface in one of his early plays, Thirst (1916); but Jasper Deeter, the actor who originated the role of Smithers, had seen Gilpin's recent success in a small part as William Custis, an old servant, in John Drinkwater's play Abraham Lincoln.

Gilpin, who was originally from Richmond, Virginia, had begun his professional life working at newspapers in Richmond and Philadelphia. In Philadelphia, he began participating in music hall performances. Gilpin toured with the Canada Jubilee Singers and the Smart Set, where he first met Bert Williams and George Walker. He then sang in the chorus of Williams and Walker's Abyssinia in 1906. In 1915, he and Anita Bush formed the Lafayette Players in Harlem. Like many actors, Gilpin also worked at other jobs—for instance, as a Pullman porter and an elevator operator—between roles, a point emphasized in newspaper articles after the success of The Emperor Jones. The notion that the Provincetown Players “discovered” Gilpin as a “natural” talent looms large in these accounts, including one, which was often repeated, that Gilpin had been working at Macy's as an elevator operator immediately before he read for the part of Brutus Jones. The true story is that Gilpin was one of the leading character actors of the time, and he also needed to make a living.

The critical acclaim for The Emperor Jones was instantaneous. The Provincetown Players immediately began running, in their own playbill, excerpts from positive reviews by Heywood Broun (New York Tribune, 4 November 1920), Kenneth Macgowan (New York Globe, 4 November 1920), and Alexander Woollcott (New York Times, 7 November 1920). After its two-week run in the West Village, The Emperor Jones was moved to Broadway by the producer Adolph Klauber for a total run of 240 performances. In the African American press, most critics and intellectuals praised Gilpin but were less laudatory toward O'Neill. In New York Age, the drama critic Lester A. Walton stated bluntly: “Had not Charles S. Gilpin essayed to appear as Brutus Jones in the season's dramatic success, ‘The Emperor Jones,’ this play would be slumbering in manuscript” (30 April 1921). Jessie Redmon Fauset wrote, in an essay in The Crisis on Bert Williams: “Among many colored theatergoers, Charles Gilpin's rendition caused a deep sense of irritation. They could not distinguish between the artistic interpretation of a type and the deliberate travesty of a race, and so their appreciation was clouded. . . . I need hardly add that the character of Emperor Jones is a class type” (May 1922).

Gilpin was surely aware of the debate in the African American community about his participation in O'Neill's play. When The Emperor Jones started touring with Gilpin in the title role in 1921, he began changing O'Neill's frequent use of the pejorative “nigger” to “Negro” or “colored man.” O'Neill was not amused. Reportedly, he told Gilpin, “If you change the lines again, I'll beat the hell out of you” (Sheaffer 1973, 35). For two years, Gilpin spoke the word he felt so insulted by, and it continued to put him in an uncomfortable and ambivalent position in the African American community. Gilpin began to drink, sometimes appearing onstage after a few too many. Ironically, O'Neill, who laid bare his own and his family's addiction in Long Day's Journey into Night (1956), proved very impatient with Gilpin's developing alcoholism. By 1923, O'Neill wrote to his friend Mike Gold:

Yes, Gilpin is all “ham” and a yard wide. Honestly, I've stood for more from him than from all the white actors I've ever known—simply because he was colored! He played Emperor with author, play, and everyone concerned. . . . I'm “off him” and the result is he will get no chance to do it in London. . . . So I've corralled another Negro to do it over there . . . a young fellow with considerable experience, wonderful presence and voice, full of ambition and a damn fine man personally with real brains. (Sheaffer, 36–37)

The young fellow with brains was Paul Robeson, a graduate of Rutgers and Columbia Law School. Robeson had been cast in several amateur and professional plays, but he was also halfheartedly pursuing a career in law. In the autumn of 1923, Robeson became a subscriber to the Provincetown Players, and on his receipt one of its associate directors, Kenneth Macgowan, asked if he would be interested in auditioning for O'Neill's new play, All God's Chillun Got Wings. Rehearsals for that play began in March 1924, and, as a moneymaker, the company decided to revive The Emperor Jones, with Robeson in the leading role. Robeson opened in The Emperor Jones on 6 May, after a two-week rehearsal period. At the same time, he memorized his lines for All God's Chillun and dealt with the public uproar over that play (published in American Mercury three months before it premiered onstage), which was about a love affair between a white woman and a black man from the same poor New York neighborhood. For both roles, Robeson, the son of a preacher and highly educated, had to work with his wife, Essie, on making the black dialect, as written by O'Neill, sound natural (Duberman 1989, 59).

When the revival of The Emperor Jones opened on 6 May 1924, Robeson received a standing ovation and was asked to come out and bow five times. Gilpin was in the audience, and after the performance, he fought with Robeson backstage. Gilpin had acted in the role of Brutus Jones more than 1,500 times over the course of his association with it, which included several revivals at the Provincetown Playhouse; but with the casting of Robeson, Brutus Jones was forever identified as Robeson's breakthrough role. The difference between the portrayals was significant. Gilpin's Brutus Jones was a man with an intellect, however crude his articulation of that intellect might be. Gilpin, who was light-skinned, slight of stature, age forty-two, and balding, relied on a lifetime of acting technique to get a sense of Jones as a character. Robeson, a former All-American football player, over six feet tall, and physically beautiful, took over the small stage at the Neighborhood Playhouse. He played Brutus as a brute, probably because of his own relative inexperience as an actor; intellectually, he was certainly able to contextualize the role. In an article in Opportunity, "Reflections on O'Neill's Plays," Robeson wrote: "And what a great part is 'Brutus Jones.' His is the exultant tragedy of the disintegration of a human soul" (December 1924). Robeson took the position of many people in African American theater regarding the significance of The Emperor Jones. Montgomery Gregory, the founder of the Howard Players, a drama laboratory at Howard University in Washington, D.C., stated: "In any further development of Negro drama, The Emperor Jones, written by O'Neill, interpreted by Gilpin, and produced by the Provincetown Players, will tower as a beacon-light of inspiration. It marks the breakwater plunge of Negro drama into the main stream of American drama" (1925, 157).

Charles Gilpin in The Emperor Jones, 1920. (Brown Brothers.)

The Emperor Jones was made into a film in 1933, again starring Robeson as Brutus Jones; the screenplay was by DuBose Heyward (author of the novel Porgy), and the director was Dudley Murphy. The structure of the film puts Jones's flashbacks in the forefront. The physical presence of Robeson is still arresting, but his skill as an actor makes his performance. In fact, some white critics complained that Robeson's style was too civilized for Brutus. By 1933, Robeson had seven more years of acting experience, including Othello, than when he had originated the role. He also had a heightened awareness that the character Brutus Jones, although, in Robeson's words, a masterpiece, was not an example of the triumph of a great African "emperor" but the sad story of a pretender to a throne.

Also in 1933, the Metropolitan Opera in New York produced the operatic adaptation of The Emperor Jones by Louis Gruenberg and Kathleen de Jaffa. A few minor parts were cast with African Americans, but Lawrence Tibbett played in the title role, in blackface. The Metropolitan Opera would not cast an African American in a principal role until 1955, when Marian Anderson sang Ulrica in Verdi's Masked Ball.

ANNEMARIE BEAN

See also Bush, Anita; Crisis, The; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Garvey, Marcus; Gilpin, Charles; Gruenberg, Louis; Heyward, DuBose; Lafayette Players; Negro World; O'Neill, Eugene; Provincetown Players; Robeson, Paul; Walton, Lester

Works Discussed

The Emperor Jones. 1933. (Film, United Artists, dir. Dudley Murphy. Performance by Paul Robeson.)

Gruenberg, Louis. Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones: An Opera in Two Acts, a Prologue, an Interlude, and Six Scenes, Op. 36, libretto Kathleen de Jaffa. Newton Center, Mass.: GunMar Music, 1990.

O'Neill, Eugene. The Emperor Jones. Published in Anna Christie, The Emperor Jones, The Hairy Ape. New York: Vintage, 1995.

Further Reading

Cooley, John R. "The Emperor Jones and the Harlem Renaissance." Studies in the Literary Imagination, 7(2), 1974, pp. 73–83.

Duberman, Martin. "The Provincetown Playhouse (1922–1924)" and "The Discovery of Africa (1932–1934)." In Paul Robeson: A Biography. New York: New Press, 1989, pp. 47–67, 156–183.

Gregory, Montgomery. "The Drama of Negro Life." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Albert and Charles Boni, 1925, pp. 153–160.

Krasner, David. "Whose Role Is It, Anyway? Charles Gilpin and the Harlem Renaissance." In A Beautiful Pageant: African American Theatre and Drama and Performance in the Harlem Renaissance, 1910–1927. New York: Palgrave, 2002, pp. 189–205.

Sheaffer, Louis. "The Provincetown's Costly Success." In O'Neill: Son and Artist. New York: Little, Brown, 1973, pp. 25–46.

Ethiopian Art Players

The Ethiopian Art Players were a theater company of twenty-five African American performers based in Chicago and active in 1923–1925. Raymond O'Neil, a white man, was the founder and director of the company; reportedly, he was inspired to organize a black group (rather than a white group, as he had originally intended) after seeing how talented black nightclub performers in Chicago were. One of the group's sponsors was the wife of the playwright and novelist Sherwood Anderson.

O'Neil's goals for the Ethiopian Art Players were (1) to use dramatic material that had universal appeal to audiences, regardless of race; (2) to encourage whites and blacks to write plays about the black experience; and (3) if the Ethiopian Art Players were successful, to share what they had learned with other black community theater groups. The Ethiopian Art Players accepted not only professional performers but also amateurs who would be trained and developed, and O'Neil was particularly interested in presenting the performers in nonmusical plays. With regard to elements of production, O'Neil admired the English scene designer and producer Edward Gordon Craig, who used color, line, forms, and lighting to create atmosphere. O'Neil also worked with the German producer and director Max Reinhardt and with Jacques Copeau, a French critic who had founded the Vieux Colombier theater. Both Reinhardt and Copeau applied Craig's ideas in their work. The repertoire of the Ethiopian Art Players included Oscar Wilde's Salome, Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors and The Taming of the Shrew, and Molière's The Follies of Scapin, but it needed a work by a black playwright and requested help from The Crisis, the official publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). W. E. B. Du Bois, the editor of The Crisis, recommended Willis Richardson, who had won two of its annual literary contests, and the company chose Richardson's one-act play The Chip Woman's Fortune.

When Harry H. Frazee, a theater entrepreneur and philanthropist, saw the Ethiopian Art Players perform in Chicago, he was so impressed that he invited them to play at his theater, the Frazee, on Broadway in New York City. The company opened there on 15 May 1923, presenting The Chip Woman's Fortune as the curtain-opener, then Salome, and then a condensed modern-dress version of The Comedy of Errors accompanied by a jazz band. Evelyn Preer played the title role in Salome and the female lead in The Chip Woman's Fortune; Sidney Kirkpatrick played King Herod in Salome, the male lead in The Chip Woman's Fortune, and the merchant Aegeon in The Comedy of Errors.

The Chip Woman's Fortune, which centered on a critical incident in the life of a poor African American family and was the first serious nonmusical play by an African American to be presented on Broadway, turned out to be the piece that was best received by critics and theatergoers. The critics were not comfortable with African American performers taking the roles of white characters, as they did in Salome and The Comedy of Errors, although the players did meet the standards of European theater—and, ironically, although at that time many white performers darkened their skin to play black characters.

Richardson's characters in The Chip Woman's Fortune are not stereotyped: They have dignity, pride, and a love of God, family, and neighbors. Nor did other works produced by the Ethiopian Art Players stereotype African Americans as drunks, prostitutes, criminals, or clowns who grin and sham their way through life. Thus the Ethiopian Art Players not only performed classical European works and opened the door of mainstream professional theater to African American performers, but the company also opened doors for realistic plays about African American life.

MARVIE BROOKS

See also Blacks in Theater; Kirkpatrick, Sidney; Preer, Evelyn; Richardson, Willis; Theater

Further Reading

- Archer, Leonard C. (1973). Black Images in the American Theatre. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Pageant-Poseidon, 1973, pp. 15, 114–118.
- "Colored Artists in Serious Drama on Broadway." New York Amsterdam News, 2 May 1923, p. 5.
- "Colored Group Presenting 'Salome' to Make International Tour Soon." New York Amsterdam News, 25 April 1923, p. 6.
- Corbin, John. "Jewels in Ethiope's Ear." New York Times, 20 May 1923, p. 11. (Online: ProQuest Historical Newspapers: New York Times Database.)
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Opinion." Crisis, 25(6), April 1923, p. 251; 26(3), July 1923, pp. 103–104. (Columns.)
- Harris, Abram L. "The Ethiopian Art Players and the Nordic Complex." Messenger, 5(7), July 1923, pp. 774–775, 777.
- Henderson, Mary C. Theatre in America. New York: Abrams, pp. 269–270.
- "How Colored Players in Serious Drama Are Received on Broadway." New York Amsterdam News, 16 May 1923.
- Jackson, Wallace. "The Theatre: Drama." Messenger, 5(6), June 1923, pp. 746–748.
- Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Da Capo, 1958, pp. 190–191.
- Leiter, Samuel L., ed. The Encyclopedia of the New York Stage, 1920–1930. 1985, Vol. 1, pp. 145; Vol. 2, p. 793, note 2.
- "Notable Cast in 'Salome.'" New York Amsterdam News, 18 April 1923, p. 5.
- Peterson, Bernard L. Jr. Early Black American Playwrights and Dramatic Writers: A Biographical Directory and Catalog of Plays, Films, and Broadcasting Scripts. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1990, pp. 165–169.
- . Profiles of African American Stage Performers and Theatre People, 1816–1960. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2001, pp. 212–214.
- "Salome Scores at Lafayette." New York Amsterdam News, 25 April 1923, p. 5.
- Woll, Allen. Dictionary of the Black Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1983, pp. 42–43, 243–244.

Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 1—Overview

As its most common name suggests, the flowering of African American culture in the 1920s and early 1930s has usually been seen as centered in Harlem. Harlem was indeed of central importance to the Harlem Renaissance, but from the start, the movement was also tied to developments in Europe.

In the preface to the March 1925 issue of Survey Graphic, Alain Locke compares the growing cultural identity of African Americans to the rise of new, independent nations in Europe in the early twentieth century: "Harlem has the same role to play for the New Negro as Dublin has had for the New Ireland or Prague for the New Czechoslovakia." He is optimistic about Harlem's role as the center of an emerging political and cultural identity, like Dublin or Prague, "those nascent centers of folk-expression and self-determination." An even more significant connection between Harlem and Europe began with the entry of the United States into World War I. Many historians and literary critics cite the participation of black soldiers in this war as a stimulus for the Harlem Renaissance. Black soldiers wondered what a victory against oppression in Europe would mean for their own lives back in the still largely segregated United States. Once home, they marched down Fifth Avenue in protest against a segregated military; the spirit of the demonstration is recorded in W. E. B. Du Bois's essay "Returning Soldiers" (1919).

Numerous minor connections between the Harlem Renaissance and specific European countries can also be traced. In Germany, for example, some citizens who were opposed to the Nazi regime cultivated a taste for jazz and other forms of black art. Two leading intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance, Alain Locke and W. E. B. Du Bois, studied at Humboldt University in Berlin; and the German artist Winold Reiss drew the illustrations for the special issue of Survey Graphic, including the cover image of Ronald Hayes, a singer who first rose to fame in Europe between 1921 and 1923, and then gained prominence in the United States. Claude McKay and the singer and actor Paul Robeson lived and worked for some time in England, and from there Nancy Cunard compiled an important anthology, Negro (1934). The most substantial connections to the Harlem Renaissance, however, are found in France and the Soviet Union.

Langston Hughes's autobiography, The Big Sea (1940), offers an extended meditation on the position of the African American in the United States and abroad. Hughes frequently contrasts his experiences with racial segregation in the United States to the more liberal modes of interaction in Europe and records intimate interactions between whites and blacks in France that would have been nearly impossible at that time in many parts of the United States. Some of the most glowing praise for France is found in Countee Cullen's poem "To France" (1935); the French people and culture, Cullen writes, "most have made me feel that freedom's rays / Still have a shrine where they may leap and sear." The poem implies that the project of racial equality has failed in the United States. However, African Americans were not treated as true equals in France. France still had its colonies, and black Americans who were not intellectuals or artists were easily grouped with Algerian laborers and thus not warmly welcomed. Hughes records this bias as he tells of his search for a job in Paris. Even there, his opportunities for employment were limited. A group of "colored musicians" told him: "There're plenty of French people for ordinary work. 'Less you can play jazz or tap dance, you'd just as well go back home."

Black artists able to "play jazz or tap dance," however, could often make a career of it. Josephine Baker is the best known of the African American performers who helped create le tumulte noir, the Parisian craze for African American music and dance in the mid-1920s. In prints designed by the French artist Paul Colin, Baker is famously portrayed wearing a skirt of palm leaves or yellow bananas. These illustrations reflect the French public's treatment of the black American performer as the exotic other; this fetishizing, however, was already implicit in much of the writing by Harlem Renaissance artists (see, for example, the Harlem poems of McKay and Hughes).

A parallel craze for the African American intellectual and artist was developing in the Soviet Union. Here, darker skin tones were also often fetishized, but the people of the Soviet Union in some ways played down racial difference and understood African Americans' drive for equality and self-determination in the United States more in terms of a shared class struggle. Many black artists were eager to visit the young Soviet Union. In the early 1920s, McKay spent several years there. He records an enthusiastic reception in the packed streets of Moscow in November 1922, but he shrewdly realizes that the welcome was not directed toward him as an individual: "I was welcomed thus as a symbol, as a member of the great American Negro group—kin to the unhappy black slaves of European Imperialism in Africa—that the workers in Soviet Russia, rejoicing in their freedom, were greeting through me." The twenty-two African Americans traveling to Moscow in 1932 to star in Black and White, a Soviet film on race and labor relations in the United States, received a similarly enthusiastic but problematic reception. The unsuccessful project was plagued by problems, including poor planning and a script so at odds with the realities of life in the United States that Langston Hughes—as he writes in his autobiography, I Wonder as I Wander (1959)—found it "improbable to the point of ludicrousness." Louise Thompson Patterson records that their hosts in the Soviet Union were extremely hospitable yet disappointed: Many of the educated black Americans making the journey did not seem dark enough and "didn't square with their concept of working class folk."

Although figures of the Harlem Renaissance traveled to Europe and attained a popularity abroad that often surpassed what they achieved in the United States, the European prejudice toward black Americans often limited the ways in which these artists and intellectuals were able to express themselves. Particularly in France, however, many ideas of the Harlem Renaissance did take root, and these ideas soon spread to other areas of the globe. A significant international legacy of the Harlem Renaissance is found among the key figures of the négritude movement. Three black poets who had been students together in Paris in the 1930s—Léopold Senghor (a president of Senegal), Aimé Césaire (a Martinican poet and statesman), and Léon Gontran-Damas (of French Guiana)—all mention Hughes and McKay as principal influences on them.

The Harlem Renaissance, in short, was not only about Harlem. Its limitations as well as its successes extended to Europe and beyond.

JAMES B. KELLEY

See also Baker, Josephine; Black and White; Césaire, Aimé; Cullen, Countee; Damas, Léon; Du Bois, W. E. B.;

Hayes, Roland; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Negro: An Anthology; Patterson, Louise Thompson; Senghor, Léopold; Survey Graphic; Reiss, Winold; Robeson, Paul

Further Reading

- Blake, Jody. Le Tumulte Noir: Modernist Art and Popular Entertainment in Jazz-Age Paris, 1900–1930. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2003.
- Cunard, Nancy, ed. Negro: An Anthology. London: Nancy Cunard with Wishart, 1934.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Knopf, 1940.
- . I Wonder as I Wander. New York: Rinehart, 1959.
- Lewis, David Levering, ed. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Locke, Alain. “Harlem.” Survey Graphic, 6(6), 1925.
- Maxwell, William J. New Negro, Old Left: African-American Writing and Communism between the Wars. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.
- McKay, Claude. “Soviet Russia and the Negro.” Crisis, 27, 1923–1924.
- Patterson, Louise Thompson. “With Langston Hughes in the USSR.” In The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader, ed. David Levering Lewis. New York: Penguin, 1995.
- Stovall, Tyler. Paris Noir: African Americans in the City of Light. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1996.

Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 2—Berlin

Although the Harlem Renaissance was a distinctly national phenomenon, it also crossed national borders, absorbing transnational influences and spreading its own creative message. Paris, so popular with white artists of the 1920s, has already been explored by scholars as a favorite place of writers of the renaissance, but the links of Berlin and Germany to the movement, less prominent and obvious, have not received much attention.

The connection between the Harlem Renaissance and Berlin began before the actual start of the renaissance. In October 1892, W. E. B. Du Bois, who was to become a leading figure of the renaissance, arrived in Berlin to seek a doctorate in economics, supported by a fellowship from the Slater Fund. Du Bois, then age twenty-four, began his studies at the Friedrich-Wilhelm III Universität at Berlin, generally known as the University of Berlin, one of Europe’s most highly reputed universities. Germany was ruled by Kaiser Wilhelm II, and Berlin, as its capital, had a distinct Prussian style, so that Du Bois received an impression of military regimentation and obedience. Du Bois was fascinated by German culture. He had admired Goethe and Schiller even before coming to Berlin, and once there, he dedicated much of his spare time to the German classics. In September 1893, he recommended that students at Fisk University study European culture and Goethe’s works in order to accelerate African Americans’ uplift. Du Bois’s German tutors left a strong impression on him, influencing his social and political outlook, which was fundamental to his role within the Harlem Renaissance. Taught by such famous professors as Gustav von Schmoller, Adolf Wagner, Heinrich von Treitschke, and Max Weber, Du Bois was guided in the direction of elitism; Wagner and von Schmoller, in particular, taught their vision of the top ranks of Prussian bureaucracy guiding the guardian state. From Weber, Du Bois acquired strong sociological skills, and it was also in Berlin that Du Bois developed a sense of leadership.

Alain Locke, another leader of the Harlem Renaissance, also enrolled at the University of Berlin. As the first African American Rhodes scholar, he had studied at Oxford University for three years before moving on to Berlin in 1910 for another year of studying philosophy. Although he arrived almost a decade later than Du Bois, Locke seems to have been inspired by the same intellectual ideas current in Berlin. Du Bois’s later concept of the “talented tenth”—an educated African American elite that was to represent all African Americans and eventually elevate the race—seems to be directly connected to this strain in Berlin. Locke also clearly subscribed to the concept of the talented tenth, and it profoundly shaped the Harlem Renaissance movement.

Berlin also offered something very different: African art and culture. The Austrian Felix von Luschan became assistant director of the Museum für Völkerkunde in Berlin in 1885. Within a few years, he built up an extensive collection of African and especially Benin art, superior in size and quality to that of any other European museum. By highlighting the value of African art through his scientific appraisal, Luschan contributed greatly to the “discovery” of African art in Europe—a significant fact for the Harlem Renaissance.

Locke was aware of Luschan's work, and during the renaissance era he frequently focused on African art, presenting it as part of a highly valuable cultural heritage. Thus a redefinition of African art and, consequently, a foundation for the appreciation of African American art in the United States occurred through Europe.

Another indirect link between Berlin and the Harlem Renaissance is evident in the person of Rudolf Virchow, a scientist, anthropologist, and politician who taught at the University of Berlin and was its rector during Du Bois's stay in Berlin. Virchow also taught the anthropologist Franz Boas, whose scientific battle against racism was familiar to the participants in the Harlem Renaissance and significantly influenced the attitudes of the contemporary white publishing establishment. Zora Neale Hurston, one of the most prominent women of the renaissance, studied anthropology under Boas, concentrating on folklore.

Berlin also had an emotional impact on the Harlem Renaissance. When Du Bois returned to the United States from Berlin in 1894, he had experienced a great disappointment: His grant from the Slater Fund had not been renewed, and as a result he had not earned his doctorate. Nevertheless, his stay in Berlin and his travels in Germany had a positive effect, similar to that documented by other African Americans who traveled to France. Du Bois noted, on his twenty-sixth birthday, that in Berlin he "felt free from most of those iron bands that bound me at home. Therefore, I have gained for my life work new hope and zeal—the Negro people shall yet stand among the honored of the world" (quoted in Lewis 1993, 145). In Berlin, the "veil of race" was, if only temporarily, lifted.

Locke, too, had felt liberated in Europe, not only because of the absence of racial constraints but also because, as a gay man, he apparently felt sexually liberated. Europe offered more sexual freedom than the United States even though homosexual contacts were against the law in Germany and England; and in Berlin and at Oxford, Locke joined well-structured homosexual subcultures. As is evident from Locke's correspondence with his friend C. Henry Dickerman, Berlin offered numerous opportunities for casual same-sex contacts. Locke clearly fell in love with Germany and Berlin, and throughout the 1920s he returned regularly not only to Berlin but also to other places, such as Dresden, admiring the culture, enjoying intimate friendships with numerous Germans with whom he corresponded intensely, and also using the renowned health resorts.

However, younger writers of the Harlem Renaissance reacted less favorably to Berlin and Germany. Locke attempted to persuade Countee Cullen (whom he guided along the path to gay self-discovery) to visit Germany and partake of the Wandervogel movement, which was well-known for its homosexual undercurrents. The planned trip never materialized, but Cullen eventually arrived in Berlin in 1929, when he had a Guggenheim fellowship for studies in Paris. Although Paris certainly was a better place for meeting fellow Americans, Berlin could also offer chance encounters, and Cullen ran into Marcus Garvey there. Cullen, like Du Bois, received an impression of Berlin as "an orderly, clean, regimented city, as if on dress parade" (1929, 119); otherwise, Cullen seems to have been largely unimpressed by the city.

Claude McKay, who first came to Berlin in the autumn of 1922, had an impression of wealth and stylishness. When he returned in 1923, however, the situation had changed dramatically: The Ruhr area was occupied by French soldiers as a consequence of provisions in the Versailles peace treaty, and inflation was skyrocketing. McKay had apparently been warned against returning to Germany because of allegations that black French soldiers on the Rhine had committed atrocities, and although he emphasized that he did not experience any form of racial hostility but was treated in a friendly way, Berlin seemed to have an atmosphere of depression, bitterness, and hostility. It thus seems fitting that McKay's poem "Berlin" conveys an image of a cold, harsh city. McKay stayed only from summer to autumn 1923 and then left Berlin for Paris.

Langston Hughes visited Berlin for only one night, in June 1932. He was on his way to the Soviet Union, where he, Louise Thompson Patterson, Dorothy West, and nineteen other African Americans were to take part in a movie about white supremacy in the southern United States. Hughes's impression of Berlin, although he only caught a glimpse of it, was one of misery and despair. Whereas the older generation of the Harlem Renaissance had been fascinated by Berlin, and more generally by German culture, the younger writers experienced a different place, with an atmosphere created by political and economic changes.

In Germany, despite these visits, little attention was paid to the initial development of the Harlem Renaissance. However, toward the middle to late 1920s African Americans began to be noticed in Germany. In 1925, a troupe called the Chocolate Kiddies performed in Berlin, followed by Josephine Baker and Louis Douglas in Nelson's theater. In 1927, Ruth Bayton, an associate of Josephine Baker and Florence Mills (who were at that point engaged in Paris and London), performed in Berlin. Moreover, several plays with African American themes were produced in Berlin in 1929. Literature about or by African Americans was also “discovered” in the late 1920s. In 1927, Carl Van Vechten’s sensational novel Nigger Heaven was translated and serialized in the Frankfurter Zeitung. The book had been a best-seller a year earlier in the United States, and its exoticism and alluring themes—African Americans, Harlem, love, jealousy, sex—could be expected to interest German readers. Nigger Heaven, however, was not the type of literature that Locke wanted Europeans to become aware of. In a letter to Paul Huldermann of the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, a major German newspaper published in Berlin, Locke described Van Vechten’s novel as an appetizer and expressed a wish that more serious issues and works would be offered to German readers. Locke published two major articles about African Americans in Huldermann’s newspaper in 1929, introducing Berliners and Germans in general to the Harlem Renaissance movement. As is evident from their correspondence, Huldermann also asked Locke for poems of the Harlem Renaissance, to be printed in a magazine produced by the major publishing house Ullstein. Apparently, Fischer Verlag, another major German publishing company, had considered translating Locke’s seminal work The New Negro, although it eventually gave up the plan because of the work’s length. Huldermann and Locke intended to publish a thinner version of The New Negro—tentatively called Schwarzes Amerika (“Black America”)—specifically for a European audience. Huldermann also published articles on African Americans and planned to include this subject in a series of radio addresses in January and February 1929, but it remains unclear whether these projects were realized.

Around the same time, other figures of the Harlem Renaissance were approached by Germans and particularly Austrians who wanted to translate and publish their works. In fact, Jessie Redmon Fauset’s novel There Is Confusion (1924) had evidently been translated into German by an unnamed Austrian the same year it was published, although her case was exceptional. In 1927, Countee Cullen was approached by an Austrian, Marie Murland, who asked for permission to translate some of Cullen’s poems in order to publish them in German newspapers such as the Berliner Tägliche Rundschau; and in 1931, James Weldon Johnson was asked for permission to translate his Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man. Johnson had to decline because the Autobiography had already been translated in 1928; and it is not clear that these works were eventually published in Germany. Anna Nussbaum of Vienna did collect and translate poetry of the Harlem Renaissance with the permission of the authors, and in 1929, she published the anthology Afrika Singt. These efforts to introduce a German or German-speaking reading public to works of the Harlem Renaissance are impressive, but they apparently failed commercially: As Amy Spingarn informed James Weldon Johnson in 1930, Afrika Singt sold poorly, indicating a lack of interest in the literature of the renaissance.

In contrast to Paris, Berlin usually represented not much more than a stopover for the younger generation of the Harlem Renaissance. Still, the impact of Berlin, and of Germany, on the intellectual foundation of the movement and on the influential older figures who led the Harlem Renaissance should not be overlooked.

CHRISTA SCHWARTZ

See also Baker, Josephine; Boas, Franz; Cullen, Countee; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Homosexuality; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Johnson, James Weldon; Locke, Alain; McKay, Claude; Mills, Florence; Talented Tenth; There Is Confusion; Van Vechten, Carl; West, Dorothy

Further Reading

- Alain Locke Papers. Moorland-Spingarn Research Center, Howard University, Washington, D.C.
- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance—A Biography. New York: Schocken, 1990.
- Cullen, Countee. “Countee Cullen to His Friends.” Opportunity, April 1929.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. “The Talented Tenth.” In Negro Protest Thought in the Twentieth Century, ed. Francis L. Broderick and August Meier. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs, 1965. (First published 1903.)
- . The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life From the Last Decade of Its First Century. New York: International, 1968.
- Fauset, Jessie. There Is Confusion. New York: Boni and Liveright, 1924.
- Irek, Malgorzata. “From Berlin to Harlem: Felix von Luschan, Alain Locke, and the New Negro.” In The Black Columbiad: Defining Moments in African American Literature and Culture, ed. Werner Sollors and Maria

- Diedrich. Cambridge, Mass., and London: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- . "The European Roots of the Harlem Renaissance." Berliner Beiträge zur Amerikanistik, 1, 1994.
- Johnson, James Weldon. The Autobiography of an Ex-Coloured Man. New York: Knopf, 1927. (Originally published 1912.)
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919. New York: Holt, 1993.
- Locke, Alain. "The Art of the Ancestors." Survey Graphic, Harlem Number, March 1925.
- McKay, Claude. A Long Way From Home. New York: Harcourt, 1970. (Originally published 1937.)
- . "Berlin." N.d. Claude McKay Papers, James Weldon Johnson Memorial Collection, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Yale University.
- Nussbaum, Anna, ed. Afrika Singt. Vienna and Leipzig: Spedel, 1929.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. New York: Knopf, 1926.

Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 3—London

As Europe's largest and most cosmopolitan city, London had attracted African Americans since the nineteenth century. The wealth of shared traditions, the many cultural ties, and the absence of a language barrier prompted a continuous migration of black Americans to London, which was home to the largest African-descended population outside of Africa before Harlem became the "capital of the black world" in the 1920s. London's black community consisted of immigrants and expatriates from Africa, the United States, and the West Indies. For many black American artists, writers, and performers, the city served as a hub before they moved on to Paris and other European locales. Black activists and intellectuals came to London, where they could exchange ideas with thinkers from different origins in the black diaspora.

Of course, London was not immune to racism. England's growing black migrant population experienced economic hardships and pervasive discrimination. During World War I, a shortage of white laborers temporarily shifted manufacturing jobs to blacks, but these blacks later found themselves in a worse economic situation as prewar conditions returned in 1918. The following year brought race riots in several cities. As a result, blacks founded the League of Coloured Peoples (LCP) in 1931, advocating social and legal change to improve their living conditions in Britain.

The significance of London to the Harlem Renaissance era lies in (1) its abolitionist heritage and anti-slavery traditions, which helped shape the political aspirations of blacks in the early twentieth century; (2) its function as a crossroads of black communities from Africa, the Caribbean, and the United States; (3) its vibrant cultural life and political traditions, which nurtured intellectual experimentation; and (4) its complex and often contradictory strands of the colonial legacy and progressive traditions, which both encouraged and hindered black emancipation. In short, London can be seen as "an important junction point or crossroads on the webbed pathways of black Atlantic political culture" (Gilroy 1993).

London's first Pan-African Congress in 1900 marked the beginning of universal black political agendas. Seeking to unite people of African descent in their shared pursuit of racial equality and political emancipation, the conferences generated a sizable pan-African presence in London. By the 1920s, prominent black figures in London included Jomo Kenyatta and Kwame Nkrumah from Africa; Aimé Césaire, C. L. R. James, and Marcus Garvey from the Caribbean; and Paul Robeson and many others from the United States.

For the American sociologist and historian W. E. B. Du Bois, London became closely associated with his lifelong commitment to pan-African causes. He participated in London's Pan-African Conference, which first introduced the term "pan-African." As a participant in and co-organizer of related events in London, such as the First Universal Races Congress (1911) and the subsequent Pan-African Conferences in 1919, 1923, and 1927, Du Bois gained critical insights into the continuing impact of colonialism on the black diaspora. Exchanges with other delegates allowed him to review his theories of black emancipation in a transnational context.

London also figured as a politically transformative place for the black nationalist leader Marcus Garvey, who lived and studied there between 1912 and 1914. In London, Garvey met Duse Mohamed Ali, a Sudanese-Egyptian actor, writer, and publisher who had launched pioneering black newspapers in London. Duse introduced Garvey to other Africans, thus providing opportunities for exchange of political ideas in the context of the diaspora. Garvey's experiences in London inspired him to found the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) in his native Jamaica and later to establish branches in Harlem. During the brief success of his nationalist movement, Garvey hired Duse as a foreign affairs specialist for his own newspaper, Negro World.

London's vibrant cultural scene attracted leading artists, musicians, and performers of the Harlem Renaissance. The philosopher Alain Locke had a special connection to England: Support from the Quakers had enabled his grandfather Ishmael to study at Cambridge University. Locke spent time in London when he was the first African American Rhodes scholar to study at Oxford University, between 1907 and 1910. Claude McKay lived in Europe from 1919 to 1921, and then again from 1923 to 1934. During his first sojourn in London, McKay became involved with the communist movement, although he later abandoned this position. In literature, as in other areas of the Harlem Renaissance, texts were not created exclusively by African Americans; in this respect, the British socialite Nancy Cunard deserves mention for compiling and editing the illustrated anthology Negro in 1934.

Although London never had an artists' quarter like Montparnasse in Paris, it did become an important gateway for black American artists on their way to the continent. During the nineteenth century, black artists gravitated toward Britain, whose abolitionist groups had supported visits and grand tours by artists such as Robert M. Douglass Jr., Robert S. Duncanson, and Edmonia Lewis. For decades, London continued to serve as a first contact point with Europe for African American artists as they traveled to Paris, Rome, and other artistic centers. The painter Henry Ossawa Tanner, the sculptor Meta Warrick Fuller, the printmaker Albert Alexander Smith, and others passed through London, where they encountered artists from other countries. The British-born sculptor Edna Manley studied art in London before moving to Jamaica in 1922; in Kingston, she created works that would be exhibited in Britain from 1929 onward. Similarly, the Jamaican sculptor Ronald C. Moody exhibited at British galleries in 1935 and 1937. A Londoner, the white painter and stage designer Edward Burra spent almost a year in New York in 1933–1934, creating lasting impressions of Harlem street life.

During the 1910s and 1920s, London was a center for the dissemination of ragtime and early jazz in Europe, as African Americans came to London during World War I and afterward. The Original Dixieland Jazz Band toured England as early as 1919. For the bandleader and composer James Reese Europe, London became a springboard to France, where his 369th "Hellfighters" Infantry Band introduced military and civilian audiences to early jazz. At the same time, Will Marion Cook's Southern Syncopated Orchestra had many successes in London, including a performance at Buckingham Palace. Several members of Cook's band remained in London, Paris, Berlin, and other European locales; influential figures from his group included Sidney Bechet, Arthur Briggs, and Benny Peyton. Bechet spent formative years of his career in London between 1919 and 1923 and again after 1925, when he joined Josephine Baker and Louis Douglas in the wildly successful Revue Nègre in Paris. The itineraries of many jazz revues reveal that engagements in London often marked the starting point of larger European tours.

As black musicians brought jazz to London, they nourished an emerging local jazz culture during the 1920s. This influence became evident in the original jazz criticism of the English double bass player, composer, and writer Spike Hughes. Similarly, the English trumpeter, singer, and bandleader Nathaniel "Nat" Gonella was inspired by Louis Armstrong, who performed to enthusiastic audiences in London between 1932 and 1935.

American dancers and other entertainers were also successful in London. Many stars who had made their name in Noble Sissle's production of Shuffle Along in New York became even more famous in London: They included Florence Mills, Ethel Waters, and Adelaide Hall. Mills, a dancer and singer, had some of her most significant successes at London's Pavilion Theater, where she had already been acclaimed for her appearance in Blackbirds (1926). Hall, a scat singer, joined Sam Wooding's Chocolate Kiddies in 1925 for a tour of London and other European cities; by 1934, she and her husband, Willie Hicks, settled permanently in London, where they opened a nightclub. Paul Robeson made his London stage debut in 1922, in a production of Taboo; his subsequent engagements included leading roles in Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones in 1924 and Show Boat in 1928. Robeson's experience in London is representative of that of many other African Americans: It gave him new political perspectives on historical interconnections. Other African Americans for whom London became synonymous with professional accomplishment included Lawrence Brown, Roland Hayes, and Marian Anderson. For them, London's wealth of professional opportunities often resulted in groundbreaking successes that eventually led to recognition at home as well.

Although Harlem became the world's new "black capital" in the 1920s, London remained an essential site of cultural production for the Harlem Renaissance. Either despite or because of its contradictory blend of colonial legacies and emancipatory traditions, London continued to attract black artists, writers, musicians, philosophers, and thinkers from different points of origin in the diaspora. Thus London during the time of the Harlem Renaissance anticipated much of the energy and spirit of London today, which is and always has been a multiethnic metropolis.

JÜRGEN HEINRICH

See also Ali, Duse Mohamed; Anderson, Marian; Armstrong, Louis; Bechet, Sidney; Césaire, Aimé; Cook, Will Marion; Cunard, Nancy; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Europe, James Reese; Fuller, Meta Warrick; Garvey, Marcus; Hall, Adelaide; Hayes, Roland; Mills, Florence; Pan-African Congresses; Pan-Africanism; Robeson, Paul; Tanner, Henry Ossawa; Waters, Ethel

Further Reading

- Gilroy, Paul. The Black Atlantic: Modernity and Double Consciousness. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Leininger-Miller, Theresa. New Negro Artists in Paris: African American Painters and Sculptors in the City of Light, 1922–1934. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Powell, Richard J., and David A. Bailey. Rhapsodies in Black: Art of the Harlem Renaissance. London and Berkeley: Hayward Gallery, University of California Press, 1997.
- Rappolt, Mark, ed. "London: Postcolonial City." AA Files, 49, Spring 2003. (Special issue, Architectural Association, London.)
- Schwarz, Bill. "Black Metropolis, White England." In Modern Times: Reflections on a Century of English Modernity, ed. Mica Nava and Alan O'Shea. London: Routledge, 1996, pp. 176–207.
- Simon, Zoltan. "From Lenox Avenue to the Charlottenburg Palace: The Construction of the Image of Europe by Harlem Renaissance Authors." British and American Studies, 4(2), 1999, pp. 105–112.
- Stephens, Michelle A. "Black Transnationalism and the Politics of National Identity: West Indian Intellectuals in Harlem in the Age of War and Revolution." American Quarterly, 50(3), September 1998, pp. 592–608.

Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 4—Paris

By the time of the Harlem Renaissance, Paris had already been a cultural magnet for white Americans for centuries, symbolizing their European origins. African Americans were not entirely excluded from this contact. The story of Sally Hemings' sojourn there with Thomas Jefferson in the eighteenth century is well documented. During the nineteenth century the black Shakespearean actor Ira Aldridge toured France, and prominent blacks such as Frederick Douglass and Booker T. Washington visited Paris. The sculptor Meta Warrick Fuller (1877–1968) studied in Paris from 1899 to 1903, working with Auguste Rodin. In 1900, W. E. B. Du Bois organized an exhibition at the World Exposition in Paris to demonstrate "the history of the American Negro, his present condition, his education, and his literature." A few black entertainers, including Belle Davis, Louis Douglas, Will Garland, Ida Forsythe, and Ollie Burgoyne, also found their way to Paris in the early years of the twentieth century.

However, it was predominantly through World War I that black Americans discovered Paris as a haven of racial tolerance. The warm welcome that greeted black American troops in France made a lasting impression. It would be simplistic to suggest that France was free of racial and cultural prejudice; however, the French did not have the rigid notions regarding skin color that prevailed in the Anglo-Saxon tradition, and especially in America. The idea that it was possible to interact with white Europeans on an equal basis came as a culture shock—a pleasant one—to many black Americans, so much so that some actually stayed on, including the historian Rayford Logan and Eugene Bullard. Bullard had become the first black military aviator by joining the French forces and went on to become manager and part-owner of a popular nightclub, Le Grand Duc.

A more specific cultural impact came from contact between French musicians and their counterparts in black military bands, such as James Reese Europe's 369th Infantry Band (the Harlem Hellfighters) and Tim Brymn's 350th U. S. A. Artillery Band. Bands such as these entertained troops around France, amazing

French musicians with their ability to produce strange “jazz” effects from their instruments.

Encouraged by their welcome, many black musicians returned to Paris after the war. By 1918 Louis Mitchell and His Jazz Kings were established at the Casino de Paris. Other arrivals included the sensational drummer Buddy Gilmore and the trumpeter Arthur Briggs. Briggs came to Europe in 1919 with Will Marion Cook’s Southern Syncopated Orchestra, which also included Sidney Bechet and the young classical genius Edmund Thornton Jenkins. Jenkins settled in Paris in 1922 and died there in 1926 at the early age of thirty-two. In 1923, Palmer Jones and his wife, the singer Florence Embry Jones, were featured at Le Grand Duc until Florence joined Louis Mitchell’s new club, named—after her—Chez Florence. In 1924, Bricktop arrived to replace Florence at Le Grand Duc, staying on to become a Parisian legend for many years. In 1925, Josephine Baker arrived as part of the Revue Nègre to become the toast of Paris. In Bricktop’s words, “Paris was having its own version of the Harlem Renaissance. It was called le tumulte noir.”

These entertainers and musicians brought jazz-based dance music, with overtones of ragtime and blues. The classical conductor Ernest Ansermet’s perceptive reviews of the Southern Syncopated Orchestra marked the origin of serious appreciation of jazz as an art form. Important French critics like Hugues Panassie and Charles Delaunay, and the Belgian Robert Goffin, soon followed. The exotic appeal of black jazz for French audiences was augmented by an interest in African art and motifs that had been sparked by artists such as Matisse, Picasso, and Braque.

Although jazz and the nightclubs around Montmartre epitomized black Americans for the Parisians, many African Americans in Paris had only a passing interest, if any, in jazz. Many were artists and writers who had come to soak up the rich heritage of the great galleries and institutions, such as the Louvre and the Sorbonne, and also—as in the case of Aaron Douglas and Palmer Hayden—to study African art. Paris offered an important symbolic link, with its physical proximity to Africa and contacts with French-speaking Africans from the colonies. In 1919, W. E. B. Du Bois organized the first Pan-African Congress in Paris, with fifty-seven delegates from fifteen nations and colonies, and sixteen African Americans. In 1921, when the second congress held one of its sessions in Paris, the writers Jessie Redmon Fauset and Walter White accompanied Du Bois.

Fauset had studied at the Sorbonne in 1914, becoming sufficiently fluent in French that she was asked to translate Batouala, a novel by the African writer René Maran; however, although this novel had won the Goncourt Prize, Fauset considered it inappropriate for her image. Fauset returned for another six months in 1924, and (as noted above) she had also attended the session of the Pan-African Congress in Paris in 1921. Her own novel Plum Bun was written in Paris.

Other blacks who lived in Paris were businesspeople or students who were happy to temporarily escape from segregation at home. Throughout the 1920s there was a steady procession of African Americans coming to Paris, some merely as tourists or for short stays, others for extended periods. In addition to Fauset, a surprising number of significant writers and artists of the Harlem Renaissance stayed in Paris for at least some months, as if on a pilgrimage. Claude McKay arrived in 1923 from Russia and spent many years in France, much of the time in the provinces; his novel Banjo is set in Marseilles. Langston Hughes arrived in 1924; he was told that he was wasting his time if he didn’t play an instrument or tap dance, but he did get a job as a busboy at Le Grand Duc, with the help of Rayford Logan. Jean Toomer came in 1924 and again in 1926, becoming a disciple of the mystic philosopher Gurdjieff. Countee Cullen visited in 1926 and for a longer period in 1928–1929. Gwendolyn Bennett lived in the Latin Quarter during part of 1925–1926. J. A. Rogers did research for his book Sex and Race and lectured on anthropology at the Sorbonne in 1929. Other transient writers included Alain Locke (1927); Walter White (1927), negotiating a translation of his Fire in the Flint; Eric Walrond (1929); and Nella Larsen (1931).

Paris, of course, attracted African American painters. Henry Ossawa Tanner came as early as 1891; he lived and worked in Paris for most of the rest of his life and was awarded the French Legion of Honor in 1923. Many notable artists followed him. Laura Wheeler Waring studied expressionism and the Romantics at the Académie de la Grande Chaumière, a popular Parisian workshop and studio, in 1924. William Henry Johnson arrived in Paris in the autumn of 1926 and had a studio in Montparnasse; he returned to New York in late 1929. Hale Woodruff was inspired to go to Paris (where he would stay until 1931) by hearing stories of Henry Ossawa Tanner, who helped him get started there. Palmer Hayden received a grant to study in Paris at the École des Beaux-Arts; he stayed until 1932. After winning a Guggenheim fellowship, Archibald Motley left for Paris in 1929, returning to Chicago in 1930. Aaron Douglas started a year's study at the Académie Scandinave in 1931. Lois Mailou Jones came just before World War II; she had a scholarship from Howard University to study at the Académie Julian during the school year 1937–1938.

Sculptors were also attracted to Paris, in the footsteps of Meta Warrick Fuller. One of the first after Fuller was Nancy Elizabeth Prophet, in 1922. Prophet's work was exhibited at the August Salon in Paris from 1924–1927 and at the Salon d'Automne in 1931 and 1932. Augusta Savage almost came to Paris in 1923, but, on racial grounds, she was denied the scholarship she had won. She finally arrived in 1929, having won a Julius Rosenwald fellowship that gave her an opportunity to study in Paris for one year. She stayed until 1931.

Although jazz and popular music dominated the black musical scene in Paris, there was also classical music. Edmund Thornton Jenkins was a resident composer and performer, and there were occasional recitals by notables such as Roland Hayes, Paul Robeson, and Marian Anderson. Some black classical performers found it easier to gain acceptance in France than in the United States: These included Lillian Evanti, who made her debut with the Paris Opera in Lakmé in 1925; Caterina Yarboro, who had to establish herself in Europe before obtaining operatic roles at home; and the clarinetist Rudolph Dunbar, who later achieved fame in Europe as a conductor.

The many artists of various disciplines who established temporary residence in Paris did not constitute a close-knit black artistic community, having widely differing aesthetic viewpoints. Their main link was the many clubs and cabarets with black musicians and entertainers. Bricktop always gave a warm welcome to lonely expatriates, as did Florence Embry Jones. Later, Adelaide Hall established her Big Apple nightclub. Josephine Baker established herself as a Parisian institution and made her first French sound film, Zou Zou, in 1934.

There was also a continuous stream of black entertainment troupes passing through Paris. Sam Wooding and the Chocolate Kiddies came in 1925; Florence Mills came with her Blackbirds for four months in 1926; and later versions of Lew Leslie's Blackbirds came in 1929, 1934, and 1936. These brought names like the Nicholas Brothers, Adelaide Hall, Valaida Snow, and Edith Wilson, and first-rate jazz orchestras led by Will Vodery, Noble Sissle, and others. Some of the entertainers would opt to stay on in Paris. Johnny Hudgins had a mime act that became a popular favorite in Paris in the late 1920s, inspiring a short film by Jean Renoir. Valaida Snow was based in Europe for most of the 1930s. By the early 1930s, jazz performers such as Duke Ellington and Louis Armstrong were household names in France. Ellington and Armstrong toured and gave concerts there in 1933–1934; and Ellington's musicians were amazed how seriously the fans took their music—these French fans knew details of earlier recordings that the band members themselves had forgotten.

Although expatriate African Americans enjoyed their ability to interact freely with French people, relationships with traveling white Americans were more mixed. Many white Americans who traveled to Paris were cosmopolitan, with liberal social attitudes. Those who frequented Bricktop's and Chez Florence, like Cole Porter and F. Scott Fitzgerald, enjoyed the company of the black expatriates. Sinclair Lewis befriended Claude McKay; the English aristocrat Nancy Cunard made no secret of her affair with the pianist Henry Crowder and actively promoted contacts between blacks and whites; wealthy white American patrons courted the favors of Florence Embry Jones. For the painter Hale Woodruff, who was in Paris from 1927 to 1931, just knowing that the city was a center for writers such as Hemingway and artists such as Man Ray was exciting even though contact was limited and fortuitous.

However, there were also conservative Americans who reacted indignantly when black Americans were treated as equals. An incident reported in Variety had the headline, "Americans Protest at Negro Dancing With White Woman." This had occurred during the intermission of Florence Mills' Blackbirds show at the cabaret Les Ambassadeurs in 1926. A black professional dancer was dancing with a Frenchwoman at her husband's request, but the police had to be called to quiet the protesters. In 1927, Jimmy Walker, the mayor of New York, heatedly denied a story, reported in the Baltimore Afro-American, that he had behaved similarly in a Parisian cabaret.

By the late 1930s the Depression had taken its toll on the Harlem Renaissance at home, and the onset of fascism and a looming second world war effectively shut down its offshoot in Paris. Josephine Baker stayed on and became a hero of the French resistance;

Valaida Snow left Paris only to wind up in a Nazi detention center in Denmark. Although Paris was soon bereft of its contingent of black and white American expatriates, the memory of its hospitality was not lost. It would blossom again in a postwar black literary scene with figures such as Richard Wright, James Baldwin, and Chester Himes, and Josephine Baker would reclaim her status as a black superstar.

BILL EGAN

See also Artists; Authors: 2—Fiction; Authors: 5—Poets; Batouala; Blackbirds; Fire in the Flint, The; Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance; Guggenheim Fellowships; Literary and Artistic Prizes; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Musicians; Pan-African Congresses; Pan-Africanism; Revue Nègre, La; Rosenwald Fellowships; Visual Arts; specific artists, writers, and musicians

Further Reading

- “Americans Protest at Negro Dancing With White Woman.” Variety, 9 June 1926. (For incident at Les Ambassadeurs.)
- Andrews, William L., Francis Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris, eds. The Oxford Companion to African American Literature. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997. (See especially Kenneth R. Janken, “Expatriatism.”)
- Fabre, Michel. From Harlem to Paris: Black American Writers in France, 1840–1980. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1991.
- Fabre, Michel, and John A. Williams. A Street Guide to African Americans in Paris. Paris and Michigan: Belleville Lake Press and Cercle d’études Afro-Americaines, 1992, 1996. (Special edition printed for “April in Paris” Conference on African-American Music and Europe held at the Sorbonne 24–27 April 1996.)
- Goddard, Chris. Jazz Away from Home. New York and London: Paddington, 1979.
- Lotz, Rainer E. Black People: Entertainers of African Descent in Europe and Germany. Bonn, Germany: Birgit Lotz Verlag, 1997.
- “Mayor Walker Likes Girls Extra White.” Baltimore Afro-American, 1 October 1927.
- Murray, Albert. Oral History Interview with Hale Woodruff, November 18, 1968. Smithsonian Archives of American Art, Washington, D.C.

Shack, William A. Harlem in Montmartre: A Paris Jazz Story between the Great Wars. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 2001.

Stovall, Tyler. Paris Noir: African Americans in the City of Light. Boston, Mass., and New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1996.

Studio Museum in Harlem. Harlem Renaissance: Art of Black America. New York: Abradale and Abrams, 1994. (See especially “Chronologies of the Artists,” p. 174.)

Europe and the Harlem Renaissance: 5—Soviet Union

Among the most striking features of the quest for cultural identity in the African diaspora in the early twentieth century was the extent to which it entailed travel abroad. Not just coincidentally, Langston Hughes’s and Claude McKay’s respective autobiographies were called I Wonder as I Wander and A Long Way from Home, and the négritude movement—created in the 1930s by African and Caribbean leaders who were directly inspired by the Harlem Renaissance—first emerged in France. It is not surprising, then, that the Harlem Renaissance also manifested itself as far east in Europe as Russia, and that both Hughes and McKay wrote poems about Moscow as well as Harlem. The lofty humanitarian ideals of the experiment in the Soviet Union were attractive to black intellectuals; and although the communist regime officially denounced nationalism of any kind, it actually provided material support to encourage assertion of black cultural identity in the Americas and Africa. The connections between the Soviet Union and the Harlem Renaissance illustrate, particularly, that the renaissance included music, theater, art, and politics as well as literature.

In Russia direct exposure to African American culture actually began at the very start of the twentieth century. For example, the concert singer Coretta Arli-Titz, formerly Coretta Alefred, had a career in Russia that spanned the czarist and Soviet periods. She came to Russia in 1904 as a member of a vaudeville troupe of seven Negro women called the Louisiana Amazon Guards; stayed through the revolution; eventually graduated from the Leningrad and Moscow conservatories of music; became one of the most popular singers in Moscow, performing in four languages, and a successful movie actress; and in the 1930s married a noted professor of music. Marian Anderson, on a tour in the 1930s, visited Arli-Titz. The avant-garde theater director Vsevolod Meyerhold was allowed to include a full jazz band, consisting entirely of Russians, in some of his productions in the early 1920s, although communist ideology required that jazz represent decadence in Meyerhold's plots. A steady stream of entertainment artists toured the Soviet Union, such as the Leland Drayton revue for six months in 1925; and Sam Wooding and his Chocolate Kiddies, featuring thirty-three black American jazz musicians, dancers, and singers, for three months in 1926. Benny Peyton's seven-piece New Orleans Jazz Band, including the saxophonist Sidney Bechet, also visited Russia in 1926.

The reaction of the Russian public to these artists attests to a growing popularity of African American culture, especially jazz, in defiance of the official communist attitude, summed up in Maxim Gorky's description of jazz as "degenerate, bourgeois music." Jazz was considered harmful because it presumably expressed capitalist values and because it celebrated artistic spontaneity and individual freedom, both of which the Soviet regime consistently tried to repress. However, the Soviet authorities acquiesced partly because they were unable to stop it and partly because they wanted to acknowledge this manifestation of African American genius. Several writers of the Harlem Renaissance, such as McKay, Hughes, and Richard Wright, had some of their early work published in communist periodicals. The Soviet government also paid tribute to American Negroes during this period through special awards. For instance, the novelist Arna Bontemps won the Pushkin Prize in 1926; others were elected as honorary members of the Moscow city council; and a mountain was eventually named after Paul Robeson, who first visited Russia in 1934. Although Russian society in general shared the negative stereotypes of blacks prevalent in all Western societies, the Soviet leaders systematically used such honors as propaganda to point out American racial inequality. They even relaxed their usual atheistic censorship to allow Robeson's music, including spirituals such as "Steal Away to Jesus," to be broadcast on Radio Moscow, although with commentary informing the audience that such language at times served as encoded exhortations to slaves to run away.

With directives from Moscow, the American Communist Party was also systematically active in Harlem. A notable black leader in this endeavor was Louise Thompson Patterson, a social worker who was a close friend of Langston Hughes and was briefly married to the novelist Wallace Thurman. In her apartment she held frequent informal gatherings of black artists and intellectuals, as well as specific discussions of the party's position on what was often called the "Negro question." Hughes was persuaded in 1930 to become president of a new party organization in Harlem, the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, that supported the antilynching crusade. In the 1930s, the Communist Party was also active in union organizing among unemployed artists and those working in New Deal relief programs that were constantly under fire from conservatives in the U.S. Congress. These programs included a branch of the Federal Writers' Project; the Harlem Community Art Center; a music project sponsoring orchestras, bands, and music appreciation classes; a puppet show; and an African dance troupe, all under the Works Progress Administration (WPA).

The founding of political schools in the 1920s "to promote universal communist brotherhood" brought a coterie of blacks to Russia, with ten places set aside in 1925–1926 for Africans and black Americans, including two for women, although none came that early. Nearly 100 African Americans would eventually train at these schools. Regarding the political dimensions of the Harlem Renaissance, it is noteworthy that many black artists and writers expressing cultural nationalism were also political figures. A closer look at the touring artists listed above reveals a number who were increasingly drawn into radical politics. One example is Claude McKay, the first prominent black American to visit the Soviet Union. He did so on his own, with no party affiliation, and when he arrived in 1922 he was welcomed as a poet rather than a politician. However, because the lone black American delegate to the fourth Communist International Congress in session there was the very light-complexioned Otto Huiswood, the Soviet leaders wanted McKay, who was very dark, to represent the American Negro to the Russian public. McKay was therefore photographed with the leaders of the Communist International (Comintern) and was introduced to luminaries such as the poet Vladimir Mayakovsky, Leon Trotsky, and V. I. Lenin's wife, Krupskaya, who was representing her mortally ill husband. McKay was also made an honorary member of the Moscow city council and was treated to a brief airplane ride while on an inspection of the Red Army. During several months' stay in Russia, McKay wrote articles and poetry that were published locally, including one reverent homage to Moscow and Lenin entitled "Moscow." The intense, if temporary, appeal of the Soviet dream can be appreciated if one considers the mood of that poem alongside McKay's earlier poem "If We Must Die," a cry of outrage against lynching in America.

McKay was just one of the contributors to the Harlem Renaissance who spent time in Russia as well as Harlem during that era. W. E. B. Du Bois, for one, had been drawn to socialism in the early 1890s, while studying in Germany; publicly expressed socialist sympathies in the first decade of the twentieth century; first visited Russia in 1926; and used a Marxian analytical framework in some of his historical writing, especially in Black Reconstruction in the 1930s but also in earlier articles. Du Bois was encouraged by friends such as the reformer Mary White Ovington, a moderate socialist and cofounder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

Otto Huiswood is another example. The grandson of a slave, Huiswood was born in 1893 in Suriname, a part of the Dutch empire. In 1912—like many West Indian and South American black intellectuals in the early twentieth century—he moved to the United States. There he was a trader in tropical products and later a printer in Harlem, and he became involved with American socialist and Negro organizations. One was a group connected to The Messenger, an originally socialist monthly established by A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen that ran from 1917 to 1928. By 1920, Huiswood was reputed to be the first black member of the American Communist Party; consequently, in 1922, he became a member of the American delegation to the Fourth Comintern Congress. Despite being upstaged by McKay in public appearances, Huiswood also was elected an honorary member of the Moscow city council and had a rare audience with Lenin. In 1927, Huiswood studied at the Lenin School in Moscow, one of the political institutions founded to train elite communist leaders. He became an authority on conditions in the Caribbean region, where he was assigned by Comintern to be the primary organizer. He also succeeded the Trinidadian George Padmore as editor of the Comintern monthly Negro Worker. Padmore, another West Indian drawn to New York and then to radical politics, had been the Communist Party's main liaison with black Africa until he was expelled from the party for opposing colonialism, on which the party line was temporarily equivocal. In communist debates over how to address the "Negro question" in America, Huiswood was among a majority of black members who insisted that racial equality was as critical as the class struggle, sometimes noting that racism was a problem even within the party. This is another instance in which the black consciousness of the Harlem Renaissance period may be seen as influencing Soviet policies.

The Soviet critique of the dominant Western civilization resonated with black intellectuals. Even the usually mild-mannered, good-humored Langston Hughes was inspired at times to bitter musing, as in "Goodbye Christ," written during his travels in Russia in 1932. Hughes had come to Russia as part of a group—including Henry Lee Moon, Ted Poston, and some twenty others—recruited in the United States for Black and White, a propaganda film that proved abortive. (Incidentally, during the transatlantic voyage on the ship Bremen, some members of this group, traveling in second class, encountered Alain Locke and Ralph Bunche, who were in first class, bound for Paris.) Hughes recounts this project, for which he was hired as a consultant, in detail in his autobiography.

Two members of the Black and White project made Russia their home for the rest of their lives and were major contributors to Soviet film. The first was Lloyd Patterson, a graduate of Hampton Institute (1931) who had come seeking adventure. After the project folded, he worked for a time on stage sets at Vsevolod Meyerhold's theater, where he met his future wife, Vera Ippolitovna Aralova, later one of the Soviet Union's leading theatrical costume designers, as well as a celebrated painter. Patterson eventually played minor roles in several films and became a journalist for Radio Moscow. He died during World War II while Moscow was under siege. Lloyd Patterson's son, James ("baby James"), born in Moscow in 1933, became an instant sensation as a child star in the classic Soviet film Circus in 1936.

The second veteran of Black and White who became a celebrity in the Soviet Union, although he was little known in the United States, was Wayland Rudd. He had been raised by foster parents in Nebraska and had shown early talent as an actor. He preceded Paul Robeson in the role of Othello (which was then rarely played by blacks), at Jasper Deeter's Hedgerow Theatre in Rose Valley, Pennsylvania. There, he also played the lead in The Emperor Jones, another role that would later be associated with Robeson. Rudd initially returned home after two years in Russia but then decided to settle in Russia, convinced that Russian directors were much freer to pursue their art than their American counterparts. He attended the Russian State College of Theatrical Arts; graduated as a director; and won wide popularity with Soviet audiences for roles in such films as Tom Sawyer, Without Prejudice, and an adaptation by George Grebner of Jules Verne's Fifteen-Year-Old Captain. In a letter to Robeson in 1952, Rudd still expressed strong support for the Soviet Union. When Rudd died in 1953, in Moscow, the Union of Soviet Artists accorded him its highest honors; at his funeral, a baritone sang a Russian version of "Deep River."

However, archival materials that have recently become available show that all was not well regarding the attitude of the Soviet Union toward blacks, and that other blacks in Russia made observations directly contradicting flattering accounts such as Rudd's. There is a dramatic report of a protest by African and African American students in the political schools, against racism in artistic productions and other Soviet practices. Moreover, this inconsistency between theory and practice existed not only in Russia but also within the American Communist Party, as is attested to by numerous accounts, such as Richard Wright's essay "American Hunger." In general, black artists had few illusions about going abroad and did not consider it a panacea. In a letter to Langston Hughes dated 28 February 1944, Eslanda Robeson congratulated Hughes on his remarks about race relations on the radio "Town Meeting of the Air"—remarks that apparently included scathing derision of Soviet society along with his denunciation of inequality in America.

Still, the direct exposure of Russian society to blacks, black culture, and black thought served to dispel some stereotypes and to reveal the complexities entailed in applying Marxist-Leninist theory to actual human conditions. And for black artists, travel abroad provided a basis for comparison that they would otherwise have lacked in appraising their status as human beings and as artists. For instance, Claude McKay—in a long, undated letter sent from Nice, France—chided Eslanda Robeson for underestimating the inferior treatment of Negro artists in America as compared with Europe. One positive contribution to the Harlem Renaissance of exposure to Russia and its ideals was that the Soviet Union, a major world society, affirmed the respectability of oppressed groups and their cultures. Furthermore, the Russians' expression of confidence in black culture seems to have been needed. Paul Robeson initially shared the American establishment's contempt for jazz as a form of music; and black thinkers had differences of opinion concerning the worth of black culture, betraying lingering doubts and perhaps suggesting a division along class lines.

Zora Neale Hurston, in a letter of 18 April 1934, to Eslanda Robeson, said:

One night, Alan [sic] Locke, Langston Hughes and Louise Thompson wrassled with me nearly all night long that folk sources were no [sic] important, nobody was interested, waste of time, it wasn't art nor even necessary thereto, ought to be suppressed, etc. etc., but I stuck to my guns and the world is certainly coming my way in regards to the Negro.

ALLISON BLAKELY

See also Antilynching Crusade; Bechet, Sidney; Black and White; Bontemps, Arna; Communist Party; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Hughes, Langston; McKay, Claude; Messenger, The; Ovington, Mary White; Patterson, Louise Thompson; Robeson, Paul; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

- Blakely, Allison. Russia and the Negro. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1986.
- Duberman, Martin. Paul Robeson. New York: Knopf, 1988.
- Gorky, M. "O muzyke tolstykh" ("Degenerate Music"). Pravda, 18 April 1928.
- Huiswood, Otto E. "World Aspects of the Negro Question." Communist, February 1930, pp. 132–147.
- Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
- McClellan, Woodford. "Africans and Black Americans in the Comintern Schools, 1925–1934." International Journal of African Historical Studies, 26, 1993, pp. 371–391.
- McKay, Claude. "Soviet Russia and the Negro." Crisis, December 1923, pp. 61–64; January 1924, p. 117.
- . Selected Poems of Claude McKay. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1981. (Originally published by Bookman, 1953.)
- Naison, Mark. Communists in Harlem during the Depression. New York: Grove, 1984.
- Paul Robeson Collection, Correspondence. Moorland-Spingarn Research Center Archives, Howard University.
- Poston, Ted. "Negroes in New York" Collection, New York City Works Progress Administration, Federal Writers' Project Records.
- Rampersad, Arnold, ed. The Collected Works of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001.

Starr, S. Frederick. Red and Hot: The Fate of Jazz in the Soviet Union. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Wright, Richard. American Hunger. New York: Harper and Row, 1977. (Originally published 1944.)

Europe, James Reese

The multitalented James Reese Europe excelled in bandleading, arranging, organization, business, publicity, and military command, and in offering the public an erudite vision of the history and role of black music. He also wrote hit songs (although his compositions, redolent of turn-of-the-century ragtime, marching bands, and nineteenth-century string bands, have mostly not survived the test of time); and he was the primary force in guiding orchestrated jazz, ragtime, and blues to a wider audience in the 1910s. Europe was a significant influence on the Harlem Renaissance and on later efforts to put African American music as an art form on the same cultural plane as classical music.

Europe spent most of his school years in Washington, D.C., one of the few American communities where black history and music were openly celebrated and extensively taught. He came to New York City in 1902 or 1903, hoping to find a foothold in black Broadway productions—one of the few professional areas in which blacks competed on a high level with whites, although the two races did not perform together. Europe worked with all of the major creators of successful black musicals of the period, including Will Marion Cook, who advocated using black music to present a vision of black culture and history, an idea that Europe would promote more widely. In 1905, Europe performed with the Memphis Students, the group James Weldon Johnson credited with playing the first jazz heard in New York City. By 1910, Europe decided to devote himself to projects of his own devising.

Europe's leadership in the Clef Club brought about improved artistic and employment opportunities for black musicians. This organization, established in 1910, combated rampant discrimination in the musical world of New York City; it operated as a trade union, booking agency, and publicity service demonstrating the high standards and abilities of black classical and popular musicians and raising their profile and respectability. On 2 May 1912, Europe's Clef Club symphony orchestra became the first black orchestra to perform at Carnegie Hall, presenting a "serious and dignified program of African American music" to what was probably the first integrated audience for a concert in America. The program changed the perception not only of African American music but of all American popular music. According to one reviewer, this was the occasion when "popular music first invaded the concert auditorium." Europe believed that only a black orchestra could play black music, which diverged from classical music and represented a different identity and historical background. The orchestra's unorthodox 125-piece instrumentation included fourteen upright pianos that dominated the stage and were arranged to blend in unusual tonal colors and rippling rhythmic patterns; there were also banjos, mandolins, and harp guitars, as well as traditional orchestral instruments such as violins and cellos. The musicians occasionally sang and danced, adding to the dense, textured sound. Newspaper reviews praised the orchestra's "seductively rhythmic" jazz sound and its "soft and beautiful" qualities.

The enthusiastic reaction ensured a return to Carnegie Hall and numerous bookings in America and abroad, some for an upper-class clientele on yachts and in mansions. Europe also became the first black bandleader to receive a major recording contract. Yet a large segment of the critical community deemed music worthy of respect only if it adopted exclusively European forms, and a critic for Musical America accordingly advised the Clef Club orchestra to “give its attention in the coming year to a . . . Haydn symphony. If the composers . . . will write short movements for orchestra, basing them on classic models, next year’s concert will inaugurate a new era for the Negro musician in New York and will aid him in being appraised at his full value and taken seriously.” Europe replied: “We have developed a kind of symphony music that, no matter what else you think, is different and distinctive, and that lends itself to the playing of the peculiar compositions of our race.” Black Americans, like Europeans, had to follow their own traditions. The music performed at Carnegie represented “the product of our souls; it’s been created by the sufferings and miseries of our race,” Europe explained to the New York Post. “Some of the old melodies we played . . . were made up by slaves of the old days, and others were handed down from the days before we left Africa.”

James Reese Europe's Clef Club Band, 1914. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

One recording by Europe’s Society orchestra, “Down Home Rag” (1913), gives a hint of what the Clef Club orchestra sounded like at Carnegie Hall. Although scaled down to eighteen pieces, the group in this recording has the same combination of traditional and less traditional string instruments, along with two pianos. The result is an exhilarating wall of sound with a rollicking beat, ominously droning backup vocals, and main melodies (led by the violin) that resemble reels; it brings nineteenth- and twentieth-century influences together into a wild and exciting mélange. “Down Home Rag” represents sophisticated African American music before musical rules were decided on in the young art form of jazz.

After his term as president of the Clef Club, Europe was important during the 1910s in bringing the controversial fad of social dancing to the American public, in a partnership with Vernon and Irene Castle. With the Castles (who were white) devising brisk dance steps and Europe and Ford Dabney writing and directing the music, several dance crazes were instigated, including the fox-trot and the turkey trot; and millions of records—frenetic, polyrhythmic renderings that were, for the time, particularly sexual and daring—were sold. These first efforts by black bands on major recording labels demonstrated that black music represented a new, exciting enterprise that could appeal to a multiracial, multiclass cross section of the American public. The recordings showed Europe’s facility with commercial as well as more highbrow genres; they also helped form a link between black music and the mildly rebellious youth culture of the 1910s and 1920s. Moreover, having a white married couple—celebrities—dancing in front of a black orchestra and openly praising the African American influence in music was an unprecedented and influential development, economically and in terms of American race relations.

During World War I, Europe continued to break down barriers while serving as a lieutenant in the famous all-black 369th U.S. Infantry Division. He was the first African American to lead troops under fire as an officer in a machine gun company. The 369th was the first American regiment to fight side by side with the French, and the black American troops expressed surprise at and appreciation for the respect accorded to them by the French, unlike many counterparts in the U.S. Army. But Europe was mainly noted during and after the war for his leadership of the military band. Originally, he wanted to serve in a purely military capacity, in order to benefit “the race” as well as his country; but a private donation of $10,000 and a formal request by the army persuaded him to take on the band as well. The group he created received a tumultuously affirmative response on both sides of the Atlantic; Europe was credited with exposing the European continent for the first time to the sounds of orchestrated ragtime, blues, and jazz. Lieutenant Noble Sissle, drum major for the band, recalled how the rendition of the “Memphis Blues” made the “dignified French officers . . . tap their feet, along with the American general, who temporarily had lost his style and grace” and that “even German prisoners forgot they were prisoners, dropped their work to listen and pat their feet to the stirring American tunes.” Sissle said that Europe’s band made him “satisfied that America’s music would someday be the world’s music”—a feeling shared by many contemporary observers and later commentators.

Biography

James Reese Europe was born in Mobile, Alabama, on 22 February 1880. He attended public schools in Washington, D.C.; studied composition, piano, and violin with Enrico Hurlei and Joseph Douglass (c. 1895); and studied in New York City with Melville Charlton and Harry T. Burleigh (c. 1903). Europe was a lieutenant and bandmaster in the 369th Infantry Regiment (“Hellfighters”) in World War I. He established himself as a composer of popular songs and instrumentals and as musical director of major black theater productions, including John Larkin's A Trip to Africa (1904), S. H. Dudley's The Black Politician (1904–1908), Cole and Johnson's Shoe-Fly Regiment (1906–1907) and Red Moon (1908–1909), and Bert Williams's Mr. Lode of Koal (1909). He joined Ernest Hogan's Memphis Students in 1905. Europe founded the Clef Club, a union and booking agency for black musicians (1910) and organized and conducted annual concerts of African American music at Carnegie Hall by the large Clef Club Symphony Orchestra (1912–1913) and the National Negro Symphony Orchestra (1914). He was principal composer, orchestra conductor, and musical director, with Ford Dabney, for the dancers Irene and Vernon Castle (1913–1916). Europe obtained the first major recording contract for a black orchestra, with Victor, in 1913. He continued to compose marches, dances, and songs and to collaborate with artists such as Ford Dabney, Eubie Blake, Noble Sissle, Henry Creamer, and Bob Cole, from 1910 to 1919. He recorded for Pathé in 1919. Europe died in Boston, Massachusetts, on 9 May 1919, at age thirty-nine, after having been stabbed by a mentally disturbed member of his band during a postwar tour.

HARVEY COHEN

See also Clef Club; Cook, Will Marion; Fifteenth Infantry; Music; Music: Bands and Orchestras; Sissle, Noble

Selected Works

- The Black Politician*. 1904 (Musical comedy.)
"On The Gay Luneta." 1906. (Lyrics by Bob Cole.)
"Down Home Rag." 1913. (Composed by Wilbur Sweatman, performed on Victor by James Reese Europe's Society Orchestra.)
"Castle House Rag." 1913.
"Castle Walk." 1913. (Cowritten with Ford Dabney.)
"Hi! There!" 1915.
Darkeydom. 1915. (Also, Darkeydom; musical revue, cowritten with Will Marion Cook.)
"On Patrol in No Man's Land." 1919.
"Memphis Blues." 1919. (Composed by W. C. Handy and W. George Norton, recorded by Lieutenant Jim Europe's 369th Infantry Band.)

Further Reading

- Badger, Reid. A Life in Ragtime: A Biography of James Reese Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
Kimball, Robert, and William Bolcom. Reminiscing with Sissle and Blake. New York: Viking, 1973.
Sissle, Noble Lee. "Memoirs of Lieutenant 'Jim' Europe." (Unpublished manuscript held at the Library of Congress.)

Farrow, William McKnight

William McKnight Farrow was probably the best-known and most highly regarded African American printmaker of the early twentieth century. His printing medium of choice was etching; he was also an avid draftsman, watercolorist, and oil painter.

However, Farrow is important to the Harlem Renaissance not so much because of the works of art he made in the 1920s and 1930s but because he was an extremely important early source of inspiration and guidance for African American artists who became prominent in the mid-twentieth century. Farrow was an active supporter of African American artists and a promoter and advocate of their work, and he is perhaps most famous for this pivotal role in African American art. His teaching and curatorial positions at the Art Institute of Chicago made possible his considerable influence among African American artists.

Farrow was born in 1885 in Dayton, Ohio. He moved to Chicago, where he spent the rest of his life. He studied at the Art Institute of Chicago with Ralph Clarkson and Karl Buehr and was later hired to teach there, becoming the first black instructor at the Art Institute. At the Art Institute he taught etching and organized exhibits of contemporary art, including art by African Americans; he was also involved with other major curatorial projects, including reorganizing the Egyptian collection. Farrow was an early supporter of the study of African American visual arts. He wrote "Art for the Home," a weekly column for the Chicago Defender, and many articles on African American artists. He helped establish the Chicago Art League in 1925 and served as its president. The most important achievement of this organization may have been the exhibit "The Negro in Art Week" (1927), a major early exhibit of the art of African Americans; Farrow was one of the curators, and his own works were exhibited in it. Farrow knew some of the most famous artists associated with the Harlem Renaissance and was particularly close to Archibald J. Motley Jr., with whom he studied at the Art Institute.

Farrow's prints varied considerably in subject matter. He did portraits of contemporary people of importance, such as African American artists, and of historical figures such as Abraham Lincoln. His paintings and illustrations were used as covers for Crisis. He also did illustrations for textbooks used in trade courses in the public schools of Chicago.

Farrow's reputation has suffered in recent decades because much of his work was technical and commercial. Nevertheless, his important role as an advocate for African American art at the dawn of the Harlem Renaissance deserves further recognition.

Biography

William McKnight Farrow was born on 13 April 1885, in Dayton, Ohio. He was educated at the Art Institute of Chicago (1908–1917) and taught there (he was also supervisor of the print shop at the Art Institute and assistant to the curator of temporary and contemporary exhibitions) and at the Carl Shurz Evening School and Museum, Northwestern University. He won first honors in figures and still life at the Lincoln Exposition (1915), the Eames McVeagh Prize for Etching from the Chicago Art League (1928), and the Peterson Prize (1929). Farrow was a member of the Art Institute of Chicago Alumni, Alliance of Society of Fine Arts, Chicago Art League (which he served as president), Society for Sanity in Art, YMCA in Chicago, Chicago Urban League, and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He died in 1967.

HERBERT R. HARTEL JR.

See also Chicago Defender; Crisis, The; Motley, Archibald J. Jr.

Exhibitions

- 1915. Lincoln Exposition.
- 1917. Arts and Letters Society of Chicago.
- 1922. Tanner Art League.
- 1924. New York Public Library, 135th Street branch.
- 1928–1945. Chicago Art League.
- 1930. National Gallery of Art, Washington, D.C.
- 1928, 1930, 1931, 1935. Harmon Foundation, New York.
- 1932. Howard University, Washington, D.C.
- 1933. Century of Progress, Chicago.
- 1939. Augusta Savage Studios
- 1940. American Negro Exposition, Chicago.
- 1945. South Side Community Center, Chicago.

Further Reading

Afro-American Paintings and Prints from the Collection of Judge Irvin C. Mollison: A Gift to the Atlanta University Art Collection. Atlanta, Ga.: Atlanta University, Waddell Gallery, 1985.

"Farrow, William McKnight." In African-American Artists: A Bio-Bibliographical Dictionary, ed. Theresa Dickason Cederholm. Boston, Mass.: Boston Public Library, 1973, p. 92.

Henderson, Harry, and Romare Bearden. African-American Artists: From 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993, pp. 116–117, 149, 153, 338.

Reynolds, Gary A., and Beryl J. Wright. Against the Odds: African-American Artists and the Harmon Foundation. Newark, N.J.: Newark Museum, 1989, pp. 14, 17, 172, 183–187.

Father Divine

Father Divine became one of Harlem's most recognizable figures during the 1930s. He created the Peace Mission Movement, founded on the principles of New Thought and Christian Science. Father Divine explained to his followers that he was God incarnate and that they could create heaven on earth. He also advocated a "raceless" society, believing that racial categories were not a legitimate way to classify people. In conjunction with his ministry, Father Divine established restaurants, boardinghouses, and stores, all of which offered affordable services and an integrated atmosphere. He and his Peace Mission became well known in Harlem for political activism and philanthropy. Estimates of Father Divine's followers during his heyday range from 10,000 to two million.

Although Father Divine and the Peace Mission did not acknowledge his prior incarnation, he had apparently been born in Rockville, Maryland, and his original name was George Baker. As a young man, he worked as a hedge cutter in Baltimore and taught Sunday school. In 1906 he met Rev. St. John Divine Bishop (John Hickerson) and Samuel Morris, two ministers who proclaimed their own divinity. He joined them and adopted the title "the Messenger." He eventually parted ways with these two men, but he had taken their message to heart.

When he arrived in New York City in 1914, he continued to preach his own divinity. He adopted a new name, Major Jealous Divine, which he had derived from the Bible (Exodus 34: 14): "For the Lord whose name is Jealous is a jealous God." In 1919, he and his wife, Penninah, moved with his followers to a home in an otherwise all-white neighborhood in Sayville, Long Island. From this home, he operated an employment service for his followers.

Father Divine and his followers coexisted fairly peacefully with their neighbors in Sayville until 1931. By then, his ministry had grown significantly, and more and more Harlemites were traveling to Sayville to visit him. In November 1931, neighbors filed a complaint regarding noise, and Father Divine and many of his followers were arrested. He believed that the complaint was racially motivated. The trial took place in May 1932, and afterward the presiding judge, Lewis J. Smith, gave Father Divine the harshest sentence possible, ignoring the jury's recommendation of leniency. Three days after handing down this severe sentence, Judge Smith died and Father Divine reportedly said, "I hated to do it." The attendant publicity spurred on the growth of the Peace Mission.

Although most of Father Divine's followers were African Americans, people of all races joined the Peace Mission. There were missions from New York to Los Angeles, but few were located in the southern

United States. Many of Father Divine's followers in Harlem committed themselves fully to the Peace Mission, turning over their belongings and living communally. They also had to lead a celibate life, even if they were married. This policy of celibacy led critics, including Marcus Garvey, to claim that Father Divine was advocating race suicide. Father Divine, despite his own marriage, believed that a celibate life was just as necessary for his followers as abstaining from alcohol, profanity, and untoward entertainment.

Worship at Father Divine's Peace Missions centered on huge banquets. Hundreds of followers attended these banquets and feasted on elaborate, multicourse meals. All of the food first passed through Father Divine's hands before it made its way around the table. At the banquets, followers would testify on his behalf, explaining how he had improved their lives. During the Depression, Father Divine and his Peace Mission also provided thousands of meals to residents of Harlem.

Father Divine encouraged his followers to make amends for wrongs they had committed in the past. Newspapers across the country carried stories of Father Divine's followers who paid off decades-old debts. Also, his followers took an active role in improving themselves and the communities in which they lived. For example, they enrolled en masse in New York City's night schools; and he urged members of the Peace Mission to intimidate drug dealers in Harlem.

Political activism was an integral part of the Peace Mission. Father Divine sponsored voter-registration drives and supported other organizations in protests and boycotts. This activism culminated in the Righteous Government Convention, held at the Rockland Palace in Harlem in 1936. With thousands in attendance, Father Divine and his followers passed a series of planks in support of antilynching laws, the abolition of capital punishment, and destruction of weapons of war. An antilynching bill written by the Peace Mission was introduced in the U.S. Congress but was defeated. Members of the "black bourgeoisie" generally criticized Father Divine's religious movement, but they did take note of the impact his political and philanthropic activities had on Harlem.

During the 1940s, Father Divine began to lose his appeal. The Peace Mission faced allegations of impropriety and financial mismanagement; and although neither Father Divine nor the mission was convicted of any charges, the scandals proved damaging. Some scholars also believe that the increasing prosperity in America detracted from the services Father Divine offered his followers: people could provide for themselves and no longer needed his assistance. Furthermore, his second marriage in 1946, to twenty-one-year-old Canadian Edna Rose Ritchings (Mother Divine), disillusioned some of his followers who had given up their marriages for the movement.

Father Divine eventually moved the headquarters of the movement out of New York and into Philadelphia. The remaining Peace Missions became more centralized, and many of the businesses associated with the Peace Mission closed.

Father Divine died in Philadelphia in 1965. His death was not just the passing of a leader but also an ideological stumbling block for some of his remaining followers. He had claimed that, being God, he was immortal, and he had instructed his followers that if they truly believed in him, they too would become immortal. The death of a follower could be understood as a failure of faith, but his own death was more troubling. The Peace Mission explained that Father Divine had made the ultimate sacrifice and "laid his earthly body down."

As of this writing, the Peace Mission still existed, but on a much smaller scale than at the height of Father Divine's fame.

Father Divine. (Brown Brothers.)

Biography

Father Divine (George Baker) was born in Rockville, Maryland, in 1879. He arrived in New York City in 1914 and moved to Sayville, Long Island, in 1919. In January 1936, he held a three-day Righteous Government Convention. In 1942 he established new headquarters in Philadelphia. He died in Philadelphia on 10 September 1965.

DANIELLE BRUNE

See also Antilynching Crusade; Religion; Religious Organizations

Further Reading

Burnham, Kenneth E. God Comes to America. Boston, Mass.: Lambeth, 1979.

Fauset, Arthur Huff. Black Gods of the Metropolis. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1945.

Mother Divine. The Peace Mission Movement. Philadelphia, Pa.: Imperial, 1982.

New Day, 1936–1989. (Peace Mission newspaper containing transcripts of Father Divine's sermons, lectures, and letters.)

Watts, Jill. God, Harlem U.S.A. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1992.

Weisbrot, Robert. Father Divine and the Struggle for Racial Equality. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

Fauset, Arthur Huff

Arthur Huff Fauset left his mark on the Harlem Renaissance through his contribution to major works such as The New Negro and to the sole issue of Fire!!, as well as through his stories in Crisis and Opportunity. Unlike many writers involved in the renaissance, Fauset did not relocate to Harlem but remained in Philadelphia, where he taught in the public schools and was a major figure in local civil rights issues.

Fauset's first literary work appeared in 1922 in an issue of Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Fauset's short piece retells a folktale that the narrator heard from the "queen of Sedalia" in North Carolina. Fauset's interest in folk literature was not lifelong, but this essay is indicative of his work to preserve African American folktales in the 1920s. While pursuing an undergraduate degree in anthropology, Fauset collected Negro folktales in Nova Scotia under the guidance of the renowned anthropologist Elsie Clews Parsons. He later traveled throughout the southern United States collecting such material.

Alain Locke, who had been a mentor to Fauset, called on him to make a contribution to Locke's seminal collection, The New Negro. Fauset focused on his interest in African American folktales for his essay, "American Negro Folk Literature," and also compiled the bibliography of Negro folklore that appeared in the back of the book. In his essay, Fauset addressed the need for "scientific collection" of Negro folklore. Although he praised Joel Chandler Harris's efforts to collect "Uncle Remus" stories, Fauset pointed out that these were adaptations, not faithful representations, of traditional stories.

In April 1926, at an awards banquet held by Opportunity magazine, Fauset won first prize for his short story "Symphoniesque." Other honorees on this occasion included Arna Bontemps, Zora Neale Hurston, and Dorothy West. Fauset was in equally impressive company when he joined with Wallace Thurman, Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and other notables to produce Fire!!—"a quarterly devoted to the younger Negro artists." Fauset provided financial support and also contributed the essay "Intelligentsia," in which he ridiculed the reverence accorded to intellectuals, suggesting that "the contribution of the Intelligentsia to society is as negligible as gin at a Methodist picnic."

Fauset's best-known work was the publication of his doctoral thesis, Black Gods of the Metropolis, in 1944. In this work he turned his anthropological eye on Negro religious cults in the urban North, documenting the practices, beliefs, and followers of cults such as Father Divine's Peace Mission and the Moorish Science Temple that had sprung up in the North amid the "great migration."

In part because of his distance from Harlem and in part because he was overshadowed by his well-known sister, Jessie Redmon Fauset, Arthur Huff Fauset has remained one of the relatively unknown participants in the Harlem Renaissance. David Levering Lewis's description of Claude McKay can also be applied to Arthur Huff Fauset: he was a man who was in the renaissance "but not of it."

Biography

Arthur Huff Fauset was born in Flemington, New Jersey, on 20 January 1899. He graduated from Central High School in Philadelphia, the Philadelphia School of Pedagogy for Men, and the University of Pennsylvania (A.B., 1921; M.A.; Ph.D, 1942). He was an elementary school teacher in public schools in Philadelphia (1918–1926) and principal of the Joseph Singer School there (1926–1946). Fauset died in Philadelphia, on 2 September 1983.

DANIELLE BRUNE

See also Bontemps, Arna; Crisis, The; Father Divine; Fauset, Jessie Redmon; Fire!!; Hughes, Langston; Hurston, Zora Neale; Locke, Alain; New Negro; Opportunity Literary Contests; Thurman, Wallace; West, Dorothy

Selected Works

“A Tale of the North Carolina Woods.” Crisis, 23, 1922, pp. 111–113.

“American Negro Folk Literature.” In New Negro, ed. Alain Locke, 1925.

“Symphonique.” Opportunity, June 1926, pp. 178–180, 198–200.

“Intelligentsia.” Fire!!, 1926, pp. 45–46.

For Freedom, 1927.

“Jumby.” In Ebony and Topaz, ed. Charles S. Johnson, 1927.

“Negro Folktales from the South.” Journal of American Folklore, 40, 1927.

“Tales and Riddles Collected in Philadelphia.” Journal of American Folklore, 41, 1928.

“Safe in the Arms of Jesus.” Opportunity, October 1929, pp. 124–1128, 133.

Sojourner Truth: God’s Faithful Pilgrim. 1938. (Reprint, 1971.)

Black Gods of the Metropolis. 1941. (Reprint, 1971.)

Further Reading

Carpenter, Carole. “Arthur Huff Fauset.” In African-American Pioneers in Anthropology, eds. Ira E. Harrison and Faye V. Harrison. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

Lewis, David Levering. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1995, p. 156.

Fauset, Jessie Redmon

As literary editor of and a major contributor to Crisis, Jessie Redmon Fauset played a principal role in the development of many key figures and issues of the Harlem Renaissance. As a novelist, she ranks with Zora Neale Hurston and Nella Larsen: She, Hurston, and Larsen were the three most respected female Harlem writers. Although Fauset’s books have not seen quite as much of a revival over the past two decades as have those of Hurston and Larsen, many scholars consider her influence as mentor, essayist, and literary critic unparalleled.

Although she identified her birthplace as Philadelphia, Fauset was born in Fredericksville, New Jersey; her family moved to Philadelphia while she was a child. She graduated from the Philadelphia High School for Girls in 1900 as valedictorian; she was probably the only African American at the school during that time. As an honors graduate, she was supposed to receive a scholarship to Bryn Mawr College, but it was never awarded. Instead, Fauset attended Cornell University; she was the first black woman to earn a degree there and the first black woman awarded membership in Phi Beta Kappa. She went on to pursue graduate work at the University of Pennsylvania, where she earned a master’s degree in French; she also studied at the Sorbonne.

In 1903, shortly after the death of her father, Fauset wrote to W. E. B. Du Bois, asking his advice about what kind of summer work she might undertake that would help her learn about other classes of African Americans. This correspondence began a lifelong friendship and professional association. Du Bois helped Fauset obtain a teaching position at Fisk University for the summer of 1904. Fauset then went to work teaching French and Latin at the famous M Street High School (later renamed Dunbar High) in Washington, D.C., in 1906. She remained there until 1919.

In 1912 Fauset published her first short story, “Emmy,” in Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). At this time she became active in the NAACP. Among other efforts, she was involved in an attempt to obtain dormitory space for black students at Smith College. She also began a regular column in Crisis, “The Looking Glass,” which provided literary and other news gathered from various international journals. She was paid $50 per month for the column.

In 1919 Du Bois persuaded Fauset to become the literary editor of Crisis. She had regularly published short stories and essays there since her first contribution in 1912. Among the authors Fauset discovered and encouraged during her editorial tenure at Crisis are Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, Jean Toomer, Nella Larsen, Georgia Douglas Johnson, Anne Spencer, George Schuyler, Arna Bontemps, and Claude McKay. Langston Hughes recognized her contributions in his autobiography, The Big Sea: “Jessie Fauset at the Crisis, Charles Johnson at Opportunity, and Alain Locke in Washington were the people who midwived the so-called New Negro Literature into being. Kind and critical but not too critical for the young, they nursed us along until our books were born.” As Hughes implies, Fauset was a generation older than most of the Harlemites in the news; she was also much more reserved in demeanor. Although she was active in Harlem’s literary and salon life, she was not a part of its nightlife. Also, although she lived in New York City, she maintained associations in Washington, D.C., where she met regularly with the Saturday Nighters Club at the home of Georgia Douglas Johnson.

Jessie Fauset was among those who believed firmly that arts and letters could help overthrow racial prejudice. In addition to her editorial work, she contributed to Crisis and other publications, providing essays, poems, short stories, literary criticism, and biographical sketches of prominent black Americans. She considered biography a genre of particular importance. In 1932, in an interview for Southern Workman, she argued that there was an urgent need for “ambitious Negro youth” to have reading materials on “the achievements of their race.” Her essay production was prodigious; one of her most famous essays is “The Gift of Laughter,” which appeared in Alain Locke’s New Negro. Her poetry, on the other hand, has never been considered her strong point, remaining conventional in both form and themes.

In 1920 an offshoot of Crisis was developed for children, entitled The Brownies’ Book. Fauset served as its editor and a major contributor. She described it as “designed for all children but especially for ours.” The introductory issue began with Fauset’s dedication: “To Children, who with eager look/Scanned vainly library shelf and nook/For History or Song or Story/That told of Colored Peoples’ glory.” However, the Brownies’ Book lasted for only twenty-four issues.

In the June 1922 issue of Crisis, Fauset criticized the theme of primitivism that was so prevalent in attempts by white authors to write about African Americans. Her criticism was generated in part by her feelings on reading the white author T. S. Stribling’s novel Birthright. Fauset doubted that “white people will ever be able to write evenly on this racial situation in America,” and this reaction is thought to have motivated her decision to write a novel.

Fauset’s There Is Confusion—often cited as the first Harlem novel—was published on 21 March 1924, a date that coincided with a famous dinner given by the New York Writers Guild. This dinner, also known as the Manhattan Civic Club Dinner of 1924, earned a place in literary history because it was attended by virtually all of Harlem’s luminaries, including James Weldon Johnson, W. E. B. Du Bois, Countee Cullen, and Langston Hughes, as well as figures from the major publishing houses and editors of some of the most influential journals of the time. Charles S. Johnson, who had organized the dinner, suggested that it was meant to honor Fauset and her first novel, but much of the program was given over to introducing the upcoming stars of the Harlem Renaissance to those in positions to help them get published.

There Is Confusion has numerous characters and subplots, but the main focus is on the courtship of Joanna Marshall, who hopes to be a dancer; and Peter Bye, who plans on a career in medicine. In attempting to achieve their goals, both struggle against racism, and Joanna struggles against sexism as well. Eventually Joanna’s career leads her to work in vaudeville, which she considers less than respectable, and she gives it up, deciding that the best use of her talents will be to help her husband further his career. Wall (1995) argues that Fauset’s insistence on the fulfillment of the “marriage plot” impairs the aesthetic integrity and social integrity of the novel.

However, as a fiction writer—although she stayed within fairly traditional forms and styles—Fauset did break new ground through her depiction of middle-class African American life, a milieu that had not previously been represented. In “The Negro in American Literature” (1925), William Stanley Braithwaite praised Fauset’s creation of an “entirely new milieu in the treatment of race in fiction. . . . In such a story, race fiction, detaching itself from the limitations of propaganda on the one hand and genre fiction on the other, emerges from the color line and is incorporated into the body of general and universal art.”

In January 1925 Fauset traveled to North Africa; she was one of very few Harlem writers and artists to do so. She wrote about her trip in an article for Crisis entitled “Dark Algiers the White.”

Fauset’s second novel, Plum Bun: A Novel without a Moral, appeared in 1929, three years after she had resigned her editorship at Crisis and had returned to teaching. The protagonist of Plum Bun, Angela Murray, is a young African American living in Philadelphia. Realizing that racism is the only obstacle to her success and happiness, and discovering that she can pass as white, she moves to New York. She studies art and meets and pursues a wealthy white man, who—because of her class—refuses to marry her. After becoming his mistress and then being rejected by him, she comes to respect the choices of her sister, who has stayed in Harlem and has found a loving husband and established a rich family life. Plum Bun considers the problems of passing and the racial and gender barriers faced by a young woman seeking to make her way in the world; it also offers a kind of cultural history of the Harlem Renaissance, exploring the caprices of patronage. Wall has suggested that some characters in this novel are fictional representations of certain historical figures, including Du Bois and the sculptor Augusta Savage.

In 1929, Fauset married Herbert E. Harris, who worked for the Victory Insurance Company. Their wedding was preceded by numerous social events, acknowledging Fauset's status in her community.

Fauset's third novel, The Chinaberry Tree, published in 1931, traces the lives of two generations of African American women in a small black community. One of the characters is "Aunt Sal" Strange, a former slave, who loved the white Colonel Halloway and bore him a daughter. He bought Sal a home in New Jersey but did not see marriage as an option. Sal's daughter, Laurentine, must bear the stigma of having been born out of wedlock in a community where propriety is valued above all else. Although Sal's choice is understood and forgiven because the circumstances of slavery are taken into account, there is no leeway for Laurentine or her cousin Melissa. Whereas Fauset explored the intersections of race and gender in Plum Bun, in The Chinaberry Tree she focuses on the intersections of race and class.

Fauset published her fourth novel, Comedy: American Style, in 1933. In this work the focus is again on a light-skinned African American woman, Olivia Carey, but her role as a mother is most important. Very much an "anti-race woman," she marries a light-skinned man and seems happy until her third child turns out to have much darker skin than the rest of the family. Olivia's fixation on color leads her daughter into a bad marriage and eventually leads her darker-skinned son to suicide. Olivia ends up living meagerly in a very poor house in Paris.

From 1927 to 1944 Fauset taught primarily in the public schools in New York City, most notably at DeWitt Clinton High. After Comedy: American Style, her literary output was negligible. Herbert Harris died in 1959; and shortly thereafter, Fauset, whose own health was failing, took up residence with relatives. She died in 1961.

Jessie Redmon Fauset, portrait by Laura Wheeler Waring. (National Portrait Gallery, Smithsonian Institution; Art Resource, N.Y.)

Biography

Jessie Redmon Fauset was born on 27 April 1882, in Fredericksville, New Jersey, the seventh child of Redmon and Annie Seamon Fauset. Her father was an African Methodist Episcopal minister. While she was still a child, her mother died, as did four of her siblings. She received a B.A. from Cornell University (1905) and an M.A. from the University of Pennsylvania (1919); she also studied at the Sorbonne. Fauset taught at Fisk University (1904); taught French and Latin in high schools (1905–1919); and taught in the New York City public schools (1926–1944). She was literary editor of Crisis (1919–1926) and editor of the Brownies' Book (1920–1921). She married Herbert E. Harris in 1929. Fauset died of heart disease on 30 April 1961, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

KATHRYN WEST

See also Authors: 2—Fiction; Birthright; Braithwaite, William Stanley; Brownies' Book, The; Civic Club Dinner,

Fauset, Jessie Redmon

1924; Crisis, The; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Literature: 4—Fiction; Stribling, Thomas Sigismund; There Is Confusion; specific writers

Selected Works

There Is Confusion. 1924. (Reprint, 1989.)
Plum Bun: A Novel without a Moral. 1928. (Reprint, 1990.)
The Chinaberry Tree: A Novel of American Life. 1931. (Reprint, The Chinaberry Tree and Selected Writings, 1994.)
Comedy, American Style. 1933. (Reprint, 1995.)

Further Reading

Braithwaite, William Stanley. "The Negro in American Literature." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. 1925.
Harris, Violet J. "Race Consciousness, Refinement, Radicalism: Socialization in The Brownies' Book." Children's Literature Association Quarterly, 14(3), 1989, pp. 192–196.
Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Knopf, 1940.
Johnson, Abby Arthur. "Literary Midwife: Jessie Redmon Fauset and the Harlem Renaissance." Phylon, June 1978, pp. 143–153.
Johnson-Feelings, Dianne, ed. The Best of the Brownies' Book, intro. Marian Wright Edelman. New York: Oxford, 1996.
McDowell, Deborah E. "The Neglected Dimension of Jessie Redmon Fauset." In Conjuring: Black Women, Fiction, and Literary Tradition, eds. Marjorie Pryse and Hortense J. Spillers. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985, pp. 86–104.
McLendon, Jacquelyn Y. The Politics of Color in the Fiction of Jessie Fauset and Nella Larsen. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.
Pfeiffer, Kathleen. "The Limits of Identity in Jessie Fauset's 'Plum Bun.'" Legacy, 18(1), 2001, pp. 79–93.
Shockley, Ann Allen. Afro-American Women Writers, 1746–1933: An Anthology and Critical Guide. New York: Meridian, 1988.
Showalter, Elaine. Sister's Choice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
Starkey, Marion L. "Jessie Fauset: An Interview." Southern Workman, May 1932, pp. 217–220.
Sylvander, Carolyn Wedin. Jessie Redmon Fauset, Black American Writer. Troy, N.Y.: Whitson, 1981.
———. "Jessie Redmon Fauset." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Vol. 51, Afro-American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1987.

Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Federal Programs

During the 1930s, employment opportunities disappeared for many artists of the Harlem Renaissance. Federal government programs, however, provided some of these black Americans with jobs and a way to preserve their skills and self-esteem.

The Great Depression (1929–1939) represented the greatest economic failure in U.S. history. Roughly fifteen million people lost their jobs. By 1934, 17 percent of the white population and 38 percent of the black population were viewed as incapable of self-support. Many Americans turned to the national government for help.

Before Franklin D. Roosevelt assumed the presidency in March 1933, he promised a "New Deal" for the American people. In his first inaugural address, he stirred the nation with the words, "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself." With congressional collaborators, he shepherded through Congress an impressive body of initiatives that attacked industrial stagnation and unemployment. Eleven measures became federal law during the First New Deal in 1933. These statutes established administrative agencies to regulate and set policy.

The Civil Works Administration (CWA), one of the first relief agencies to assist blacks, sponsored the Public Works of Art Project. It commissioned artists to paint in public buildings. Following the demise of CWA in 1934, the Treasury Department's Section of Painting and Sculpture employed more than 5,000 artists. The Federal Emergency Relief Administration (FERA) provided checks to unemployed survivors. To ensure minority employment, FERA placed several blacks in positions of authority. One, Forrester Washington, served as director of Negro Works.

Roosevelt certainly had his critics. Taking issue with the initial results of his New Deal, they pointed out that more than 10 million Americans were jobless. This led the president to start a second wave of legislation in 1935. The National Youth Administration, with Mary McLeod Bethune as head of the Negro Affairs section, helped young blacks receive job training. However, many scholars view the creation of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) as the most far-reaching measure to revitalize the economy because it greatly reduced joblessness. Over an eight-year period, it employed more than 8.5 million people. WPA employees built roads, bridges, and public buildings. In 1936, from an initial funding of $1.4 billion, Congress earmarked $85 million for WPA to assist “educational, professional, and clerical persons.”

Harry L. Hopkins proved to be an excellent choice to head WPA. A former social worker, he had earlier overseen FERA and had previously dealt with racial issues. Soon after the creation of WPA, W. E. B. Du Bois—the editor of Crisis—and other black leaders sent letters to the administration that argued for employment relief in proportion to the population. Ultimately, the president issued Executive Order 7046, which required WPA to hire qualified workers irrespective of race. Hopkins reiterated this point by issuing directives with provisions against discrimination. He also established a “black cabinet,” which included Robert C. Weaver and William H. Hastie, to advise him on employment-related issues.

To help professional people, Hopkins set up a Professional Projects Division. The unit’s main goal was to hire needy writers, actors, artists, and musicians. Federal One, the program’s official name, consisted of four arts projects: Federal Writers’, Federal Theater, Federal Arts, and Federal Music. Each project had a national director: Henry G. Alsberg (Writers’), Hallie Flanagan (Theater), Holger Cahill (Art), and Nikolai Sokoloff (Music).

With regard to artists of the Harlem Renaissance, the Federal Writers’ Project is perhaps best known because of the many leading figures who participated in it. New York City alone had twenty Writers’ Projects. During the 1930s, Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, and Claude McKay did research on little-known achievements of blacks; their research later resulted in a work called The Negro in New York (1967). Zora Neale Hurston took part in the Florida Project. In Washington, D.C., Sterling Brown served as national editor of Negro Affairs. The Illinois Project nurtured the literary aspirations of Margaret Walker and Frank Yerby. The careers of many lesser-known African Americans were also favorably affected by the Federal Writers’ Project.

When Hallie Flanagan became national director of the Federal Theater Project in 1935, she established nine black branches in major cities. She considered Harlem the pivotal location, appointing John Houseman, Orson Welles, and the black American actress Rose McClendon to manage the unit there. After they restored the Lafayette Theater in Harlem, they employed 700 black actors, singers, dancers, and technicians. They envisioned the Lafayette as presenting plays that would deal with all aspects of black life. In 1936, Houseman opened the revived Lafayette with Frank Wilson’s Walk Together Chillun. In 1939, he presented Macbeth, the first full-scale professional black Shakespearean production. Overall, the Lafayette produced nearly 1,200 plays, including many with black themes.

The Federal Arts Project sponsored classes for aspiring black artists and strengthened the skills of established ones. In major cities, more than 100 artists secured employment. They painted murals for public buildings, worked as sculptors, produced posters, and were mentors to other artists. In Harlem, Vertis Hayes, Aaron Douglas, and Augusta Savage offered instruction in their own studios. In 1937, the Arts Project financed the Harlem Community Art Center and Chicago’s South Side Community Art Center. An impressive list of artists took advantage of government patronage, including Jacob Lawrence, Archibald Motley, Charles Sebree, Romare Bearden, and Dox Trash.

Under the leadership of Nikolai Sokoloff, the Federal Music Project created thirty-four new orchestras and offered music instruction throughout the nation. The orchestras and other programs provided jobs for nearly 10,000 musicians. The Music Project also established the Colored Concert Band, whose black musicians specialized in rhythm and blues; Norman L. Black directed the band. At one point, the Music Project employed nearly 6,000 teachers. Citizens received free lessons in music theory, history, and composition. Henrietta Robinson, a black teacher, participated in Philadelphia. In 1997, at age ninety-three, she published an account of the legacy of black musicians in southern New Jersey.

In 1942, believing that communists had infiltrated Federal One programs, the chairman of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, Martin Dies, persuaded his colleagues to halt funding. Clearly, the Great Depression had left the artists of the Harlem Renaissance with fewer opportunities; and even with federal programs, black artists, if they were employed, often received lower wages. Yet it cannot be denied that those who found jobs in federal programs not only gained economic relief but also earned self-respect through their work.

PAUL T. MILLS JR.

See also Bearden, Romare; Bethune, Mary McLeod; Brown, Sterling; Douglas, Aaron; Ellison, Ralph; Federal

Writers' Project; Hurston, Zora Neale; Lafayette Theater; Lawrence, Jacob; McLendon, Rose; McKay, Claude; Motley, Archibald; Savage, Augusta; Second Harlem Renaissance; Walker, Margaret; Wilson, Frank; Works Progress Administration; Wright, Richard; Yerby, Frank

Further Reading

- Badger, Anthony J. The New Deal: The Depression Years, 1933–1940. New York: Hill and Wang, 1989.
- Fraden, Rena. Blueprints for a Black Federal Theatre, 1935–1939. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Gates, Henry L. Jr., and Nellie Y. McKay, eds. The Norton Anthology of African American Literature. New York: Norton, 1997.
- Harris, Jonathan. Federal Art and National Culture: The Politics of Identity in New Deal America. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Hirsch, Jerrold. Portrait of America: A Cultural History of the Federal Writers' Project. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.
- Kirby, John B. Black Americans in the Roosevelt Era: Liberalism and Race. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1980.
- Mangione, Jerre. The Dream and the Deal: The Federal Writers' Project 1935–1943. Boston, Mass.: Little Brown, 1972.
- Sitkoff, Harvard. A New Deal for Blacks: The Emergence of Civil Rights as a National Issue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Wolters, Raymond. Negroes and the Great Depression: The Problem of Economic Recovery. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1970.

Federal Writers' Project

The Federal Writers' Project (FWP) began as a small, unique component of the larger Works Progress Administration (WPA), programs in the New Deal that were designed to employ portions of the nation's labor force. FWP, which was described as white-collar relief, provided work relief primarily to writers but also hired artists, actors, and musicians, all of whom were willing to work in aiding the arts. Many of the writers who were hired were placed in skilled and professional-technical positions. Before coming under the auspices of WPA, in 1934, FWP had been known as the Authors' League and had been under the Civil Works Administration (CWA), also a white-collar relief program. By 1935, WPA had incorporated FWP into its mission, and in November of that year, FWP hired Henry G. Alsberg, an editorial writer, to serve as the director.

The writers hired for FWP were not necessarily professional writers but rather unemployed professionals from different occupations: newspaper people, lawyers, teachers, librarians, recent college graduates, and even physicians and preachers. Very few were trained creative writers. In 1935, its first year, FWP employed more than 4,000 workers, and by 1936 its payroll rose to 6,700. By 1939, however, the number of workers declined to 3,600; and in 1941, the number fell to 3,000. On average, 4,800 people were on the payrolls during the four-year life of FWP.

FWP hired a large percentage of blacks, the greatest numbers for its projects in New York City and Louisiana. In selecting individuals, Alsberg gave preference to already established editors, journalists, and freelance writers, and these individuals primarily lived in large cities, including New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles. In rural areas, Alsberg had more difficulty hiring qualified writers, relying instead on volunteers who submitted their work to editors in the large cities. FWP was not specifically designed to promote writers' talents, but in effect it did so. Many young black writers, including Ralph Ellison and Richard Wright, began their careers with FWP; and many ambitious participants in FWP eventually returned to their careers with more self-assurance in their craft.

Alsberg had a passion for nonfiction and promoted it over other written genres, such as poetry and short stories. Under his direction FWP developed into an exceptional agency with regard to the utilitarian work produced by its writers; however, these professionals were not allowed to write their own works on FWP time, and some of them therefore felt frustrated. Still, Alsberg did encourage the participants to write on their own time, outside the office, so that their creativity could contribute to the FWP's literature.

The first, and major, contribution of Alsberg and his writers was the American Guide Series (AGS), which was loosely based on the Baedeker guidebooks in Europe, factual aids assisting travelers. Alsberg's goal for AGS was to inform and entertain the general reading public. Each book in the series contained three parts: Part 1 "offered essays on a variety of subjects important to a state—its history, people, the arts, economics, politics, and religion." Part 2 "consisted of up-to-date, fact-laced pieces on the state's cities." Part 3, "the longest, directed the reader throughout the state on motor tours." The books also contained points of interest (POIs); and the history sections also described architecture, encouraging Americans to seek out architectural sites. The writers of FWP asked for suggestions about what to include in AGS, and the public responded with family records; state highway agencies calculated tour mileages; and rail and bus companies and government agencies provided information about roads and tourist sites. In addition, the writers relied on knowledgeable volunteers from small towns for descriptions of less visited yet interesting sites. Lewis Mumford, the Librarian of Congress, called these guides "a great patriotic effort" in rediscovering America. With the success of AGS, FWP began to produce additional new series, including the American Recreation Series and American Pictorial Guides. Auxiliary projects included the Life in America Series, about 150 published titles covering diverse topics from zoo animals to ethnic and religious groups.

There were also transcontinental tour books and trail guides, romanticizing America's pioneer era. Other writing projects included indexing of local newspapers; works on local history; a national project of organizing old state and local records, commonly known as the Historical Records Survey; and the creation of black studies in which the authors of smaller local guides described black communities and their contributions to local and state efforts. The editors of FWP saw these black historical and cultural essays as offering an understanding of the country's racial problems.

Preserving the country's folk heritage later developed into the American Folklore Project. America's folklore was slowly vanishing, so John A. Lomax, the first folklore editor, working under Alsberg's direction, set out to collect and record tales and songs of an older generation. Lomax encouraged the collection and recording of ballads, oral histories, and poetry, and through these recordings, dialects and speech rhythms were preserved. Another FWP project, in 1936, was recording the stories of people who had been slaves. Alsberg and Lomax called on former slaves to describe their life before and after emancipation. Before the project ended, FWP collected some 2,000 stories of former slaves from seventeen states.

In 1939, FWP was accused of radicalism and waste, and shortly thereafter, Congress restricted its activities. In December 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt ordered all WPA projects closed; and FWP shut its doors in spring 1943. By 1943, FWP had created and published more than 1,200 pamphlets and books and had sold or given away some 3.5 million copies of its publications. It had also provided relief to white-collar professionals; had undertaken an artistic and literary effort to document America, the American people, and the American heritage; had observed and recorded unfamiliar parts of America; and had contributed to national self-awareness.

ANNE ROTHFELD

See also Ellison, Ralph; Federal Programs; Second Harlem Renaissance; Works Progress Administration; Wright, Richard

Further Reading

Mangione, Jerre. The Dream and the Deal: The Federal Writers' Project, 1935–1943. Boston, Mass.: Little, Brown, 1972.

McDonald, William F. Federal Relief Administration and the Arts: The Origins and Administrative History of the Arts Projects of the Works Progress Administration. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1969.

Penkower, Monty Noam. The Federal Writer's Project: A Study in Government Patronage of the Arts. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1977.

Ferris, William H.

William Henry Ferris is often considered a minor figure among the black intelligentsia in the first half of the twentieth century, but he was a member of the "talented tenth" and an important contributor to the art and literature of the black nationalist movement in the 1920s.

Ferris was a graduate of Harvard and Yale universities and a charter member of the American Negro Academy, a sort of think tank founded by Alexander Crummell in 1897. He also took an active role in the debate between W. E. B. Du Bois and Booker T. Washington. Ferris supported the Afro-American Council, an early precursor of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and worked with William Trotter, the radical editor of the Boston Guardian—although a dispute with Trotter led him to a brief flirtation with the Washington camp. In 1913, Ferris published his magnum opus, The African Abroad.

Ferris, William H.

Heavily influenced by the English writer Thomas Carlyle and the American Ralph Waldo Emerson, the book featured an eclectic mix of social, political, and economic commentary informed by literary and historical observations. The African Abroad is an excellent example of contributionist history. Its scope encompasses the evolution of Western civilization, locating cultures of Africa and the African diaspora within these developments. Ferris coined the term “Negro-Saxon,” which highlights his belief in the connection between African American and European, especially Anglo-Saxon, culture.

In 1919 Ferris, after having worked briefly as editor of the Champion in Chicago and at the A.M.E. Book Concern, joined Marcus Garvey’s movement as literary editor of Negro World. Garvey’s movement gave Ferris an important outlet for his intellectual beliefs. To him, Garvey embodied the possibility of blacks’ developing race art and literature. Throughout Ferris’s journalistic contributions to Negro World, one finds consistent themes: celebratory assessments of ancient Africa, contributionist appraisals of black art and literature, and a balanced assessment of Marcus Garvey’s Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). A central component of Garvey’s program was affirming the importance of history. Numerous historical articles in Negro World, no doubt written by Ferris, capitalized on this theme. His review in 1921 of John Cromwell’s Negro in American History is an example. Ferris also brought an artistic component to Negro World through numerous assessments of “Negro art and literature,” a topic not often associated with Garvey’s movement. Perhaps most interesting was Ferris’s discussion, in 1922, of the musical ability of the Black Star Line Band. Unlike W. E. B. Du Bois, whom he admired and whom he often presented as a paragon of black intellectual achievement, Ferris offered balanced and favorable assessments of Garvey’s movement. In his article “Dr. Du Bois’s Ten Mistakes” (1923), Ferris points out in a delicate, judicious tone numerous errors in Du Bois’s article “Back to Africa” (also 1923) in Century Magazine.

The importance of Ferris’s contribution lay in his attempts to link the components of civilization—art, literature, and music—to the nationalist discourse of Garvey’s movement. This goal may have influenced Ferris’s participation in the literary contest of UNIA, which was launched in 1921. The contest is significant because it preceded similar activities by mainstream organizations such as NAACP and the Urban League. Ferris raised blacks’ art, literature, and music to levels of admiration and respect comparable to what was accorded to American and European artistic expression. His erudite commentary and astute observations laid the groundwork for deeper appreciation of black history and art during this period.

Biography

William Henry Ferris was born in New Haven, Connecticut, in 1874. He studied at Hillhouse High School there, at Yale University (A.B., 1899), and at Harvard University (M.A., 1900). He was editor of The Champion in Chicago (1916–1917); literary assistant at the African Methodist Episcopal Book Concern in Philadelphia (1917–1919), and literary editor of Negro World (1919–1923) and Spokesman (1925–1927). Ferris died in obscurity in New York City on 23 August 1941.

STEPHEN G. HALL

See also Du Bois, W. E. B.; Guardian, The; Negro World; Talented Tenth; Trotter, William Monroe; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

Burkett, Randall. Black Redemption: Churchmen Speak for the Garvey Movement. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1978.

Ferris, William Henry. The African Abroad; Or His Evolution in Western Civilization, Tracing His Development under the Caucasian Milieu, 2 vols. 1913.

Gaines, Kevin Kelley. Uplifting the Race: Black Leadership, Politics, and Culture in the Twentieth Century. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Martin, Tony. African Fundamentalism: A Literary and Cultural Anthology of Garvey’s Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Del.: Majority, 1983.

Fetchit, Stepin

Stepin Fetchit, a vaudeville entertainer and pioneering black film actor, emerged near the end of the Harlem Renaissance as Hollywood’s first African American movie star. He appeared in more than forty-five feature films and shorts between 1927 and 1976, including Hearts in Dixie (1929), Judge Priest (1934), Stand Up and Cheer (1934), Charlie Chan in Egypt (1935), Miracle in Harlem (1948), and The Sun Shines Bright (1954). During the 1930s, his portrayals of stereotypical plantation “darkies,” chicken thieves, lazy roustabouts, and other “coon” characters made him a national celebrity. His performances drew laughter and applause from white and black moviegoers alike, but they also increasingly sparked firestorms of protest and criticism from civil rights organizations and black newspapers, which objected to the demeaning and offensive roles that made him a star.

Fetchit (whose original name was Lincoln Theodore Monroe Andrew Perry) was born in Key West, Florida, in 1902 and grew up in Alabama. Around 1914, he joined the Royal American Shows carnival, performing as “Rastus the Buck Dancer” in its plantation minstrel revue. Over the next decade he toured the South and southwest with minstrel groups, carnival companies, and medicine shows. He eventually formed his own minstrel act, with Ed Lee, billed as “Step ‘n’ Fetchit, the Two Dancing Crows from Dixie.” After the team split up in the mid-1920s, he retained the stage name Stepin Fetchit, and he soon became a successful solo entertainer on the Theater Owners Booking Association (TOBA) circuit. During this time he also moonlighted as an entertainment reporter for the Chicago Defender, writing a newspaper column that covered African American stage and vaudeville performers and, after his arrival in Hollywood, screen actors.

In 1927, Fetchit obtained his first screen role in MGM’s silent melodrama of the old South, In Old Kentucky (1927); and over the next two years he appeared in supporting roles in several successful films, including The Kid’s Clever (1929), Salute (1929), and Show Boat (1929). He gave his breakthrough performance as Gummy, a shiftless plantation laborer, in Fox Film Corporation’s critically acclaimed Hearts in Dixie (1929), an early talking film with an all-black cast. Fetchit reportedly earned $1,500 per week for this film, making him one of the highest-paid black actors in Hollywood, and his performance led to a series of screen roles in which he portrayed lazy, dim-witted “coon” characters that represented then-current racist caricatures of African Americans.

Offered only a limited range of roles, Fetchit rose to stardom during the 1930s by essentially portraying the same shiftless, simple-minded character time and again. Onscreen, he sported a trademark shaved head and wore baggy clothing that accentuated his tall, lanky, loose-limbed frame. Bald and stoop-shouldered, his characters shuffled from place to place and, when confused, cast puzzled, bug-eyed stares and stammered in broken dialect. They added comic relief to the films, often serving as targets of verbal and physical abuse by the white characters. In time, Fetchit even had a host of imitators, most notably Willie Best (originally billed as “Sleep ‘n’ Eat”) and Mantan Moreland.

Fetchit played his signature character in twenty-six feature motion pictures between 1929 and 1935, many of them for Twentieth-Century-Fox, including Stand Up and Cheer (1934), David Harum (1934), and Judge Priest (1934). In the mid-1930s, at the height of his popularity, he received featured billing with Shirley Temple and Will Rogers, and he was in such demand in Hollywood that, according to Bogle (1973), he often worked on several motion pictures simultaneously and had special roles written for him. Meanwhile, Fetchit continued to make stage appearances as a singer, dancer, and comedian, headlining at the Cotton Club, the Apollo Theater, and other major venues; he also composed at least two songs, “Member Mandy” and “Step Fetchit Strut,” both in 1929.

Fetchit led the extravagant lifestyle of a Hollywood movie star, described by the Chicago Defender, in 1936, as the “squire and lord mayor of Harlemwood.” At the height of his career, he owned six houses staffed with sixteen Chinese servants; wore $2,000 cashmere suits imported from India; threw lavish cocktail parties; and had a fleet of twelve chauffeured automobiles, including a champagne-pink Rolls Royce, for cruising around town. But he was also plagued by personal problems. He became so temperamental and unreliable that in 1931 the exasperated executives of Fox released him; a three-year absence from motion pictures followed. His public fistfights, arrests for drunken driving and assault, and breach of contract suits were all regularly reported in the entertainment sections of black newspapers. Fetchit declared bankruptcy at least twice, once in 1930 and again in 1947, after squandering the more than $2 million he had reportedly earned in films and vaudeville.

During Fetchit’s heyday in the 1930s—the midst of the Great Depression—his comedic film performances delighted both white and black audiences. Some film historians argue that his foolish, self-mocking characters particularly appealed to anxious white moviegoers in an America pervaded by Jim Crow practices and racial tension. But by the time of World War II, Fetchit’s humiliating portrayals of African American characters had thoroughly alienated black moviegoers, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the black press increasingly condemned him for propagating negative racial stereotypes. He made only a few motion pictures during the 1940s and 1950s; and eventually he moved to Chicago, where for much of the rest of his life he worked as a stand-up comedian and singer in nightclubs and strip shows. In 1970, he sued the Columbia Broadcasting System for $3 million, alleging that its documentary Black History: Lost, Stolen or Strayed (1968) had unjustly accused him of perpetuating shameful, degrading images of African Americans. The case was dismissed in 1974.

During the 1970s, after an absence of almost two decades, Fetchit returned to motion pictures, appearing in Amazing Grace (1974) with Moms Mabley, and in Won-Ton-Ton, The Wonder Dog That Saved Hollywood (1976), his final film appearance. In 1977, after suffering the first of a series of strokes, Fetchit entered the Motion Picture and Television Country House in Los Angeles, where he stayed until his death in 1985.

Stepin Fetchit remains a highly controversial figure in African American culture, but he nonetheless ranks as a pioneer of early African American cinema. Bogle defends him as an “immensely talented” actor and comedian who had “a legendary sense of timing” and “a strong visual presence” onscreen, and who opened the doors of movie studios to blacks in Hollywood.

Stepin Fetchit. (Photofest.)

The Hollywood chapter of the NAACP honored Fetchit with a Special Image Award in 1976, and he was inducted into the Black Film Makers Hall of Fame in 1978. Never apologetic, Fetchit always maintained that he had paved the way for succeeding black actors by portraying the first African American character that white moviegoers found “acceptable.” “I became the first Negro entertainer to become a millionaire,” he told an interviewer in 1968. “All the things that Bill Cosby and Sidney Poitier have done wouldn’t be possible if I hadn’t broken [racial barriers]. I set up thrones for them to come and sit on.”

Biography

Stepin Fetchit (Lincoln Theodore Monroe Andrew Perry) was born on 30 May 1902, in Key West, Florida, the son of Joseph and Dora (Monroe) Perry, both of whom had been born in England, probably of West Indian ancestry. He attended St. Joseph’s College in Montgomery, Alabama, until about age twelve. Beginning c. 1914 he toured professionally as Rastus the Buck Dancer with Royal American Shows, and as part of the vaudeville team Step ‘n’ Fetchit, the Two Dancing Crows from Dixie. He toured as a solo performer on the vaudeville circuit and later the nightclub circuit under the name Stepin Fetchit c. 1927–1975. He worked as entertainment reporter for the Chicago Defender c. 1924–1929 and appeared in more than forty-five feature films and shorts in 1927–1976. His awards included the Special Image Award of the Hollywood chapter of NAACP (1976) and induction into the Black Film Makers Hall of Fame (1978). He died in Los Angeles, California, on 19 November 1985, of congestive heart failure and pneumonia, at age eighty-three.

PATRICK HUBER

See also Chicago Defender; Film: Actors; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Hearts in Dixie; Minstrelsy; Moreland, Mantan; Theater Owners Booking Association

Selected Works

- In Old Kentucky*. 1927.
- Hearts in Dixie*. 1929.
- Salute*. 1929.
- Show Boat*. 1929.
- David Harum*. 1934.

Judge Priest. 1934.
Stand Up and Cheer. (1934)
Marie Galante. 1934.
Charlie Chan in Egypt. 1935.
Dimples. 1936.
Big Timers. 1945.
Miracle in Harlem. 1947.
The Sun Shines Bright. 1954.
Amazing Grace. 1974.
Won-Ton-Ton, The Wonder Dog That Saved Hollywood. 1976.

Further Reading

Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films. New York: Viking, 1973.
 ———. Blacks in American Films and Television: An Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1988.
 Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
 Hampton, Wilborn. “Stepin Fetchit, the First Black to Win Film Fame, Dies at 83.” New York Times, 21 November 1985.
 McBride, Joseph. “Stepin Fetchit Talks Back.” Film Quarterly, 24(4), Summer 1971.
 Peterson, Bernard L. Jr. “Stepin Fetchit.” In American National Biography, eds. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
 Register, Charlene. “Stepin Fetchit: The Man, the Image, and the African American Press.” Film History, 6(4), 1994.
 Seiler, Michael. “Stepin Fetchit, Noted Black Movie Comic of 1930s, Dies.” Los Angeles Times, 20 November 1985.
 “Stepin Fetchit Dead at 83; Comic Actor in Over 40 Films.” Variety, 27 November 1985.

Fields, Dorothy

Between 1926 and 1973, Dorothy Fields matched her colloquial, witty lyrics to more than 400 songs. Many of them have become pop and jazz standards: “On the Sunny Side of the Street,” “Don’t Blame Me,” “Exactly Like You,” “I’m in the Mood for Love,” “A Fine Romance,” “Pick Yourself Up,” “The Way You Look Tonight,” and “Big Spender.” The list of her collaborators on Broadway and in Hollywood reads like a who’s who of American popular song: Jimmy McHugh, Jerome Kern, Cole Porter, Sigmund Romberg, Irving Berlin, Arthur Schwartz, Cy Coleman, and her brother Herb Fields. Her songs have been performed by everyone from Louis Armstrong, Billie Holiday, Fred Astaire, and Ginger Rogers to Dizzy Gillespie, King Pleasure, Aretha Franklin, and a Brazilian leopard named Baby. In 1971, Fields was among the first ten members elected to the Songwriters Hall of Fame, and the only woman.

Fields most directly affected the Harlem Renaissance through the lyrics she wrote for floor shows at the Cotton Club during its heyday in the late 1920s. Her father, Lew Fields, a successful producer and veteran vaudeville comedian, discouraged his children from seeking careers in the theater. But in 1926 Fields, then age twenty-one, sent samples of her work to Jimmy McHugh, who had been retained by the Cotton Club to compose music for revues produced by Lew Leslie and later Dan Healey. A Fields-McHugh collaboration was performed on 4 December 1927, at the same opening in which Duke Ellington’s orchestra made its debut as the Cotton Club’s house band. Fields became a full writing partner for the revue of spring 1928, which played on Broadway as Lew Leslie's Blackbirds of 1928 and featured "I Must Have That Man," "Diga Diga Do," and "Doin' the New Low-Down." Adelaide Hall sang the show's biggest hit, "I Can't Give You Anything but Love" (interpolated from Harry Delmar's Revels of 1927, and sometimes rumored to have been composed by Fats Waller and Andy Razaf).

Dorothy Fields, 1934. (© Bettmann/Corbis.)

Cab Calloway, whose band began to substitute for Ellington's in 1929, maintained that Fields "wasn't really funky enough to write the kind of songs that would carry a Negro revue of that type" (Calloway and Rollins 1976, 93). Fields did quietly omit her name from the more risqué numbers demanded by Healey's formula for the Cotton Club and by the expectations of white audiences who were seeking authenticity, and she shared the ambivalence of many white participants in the Harlem Renaissance. For example, her lyrics for "You've Seen Harlem at Its Best" (recorded by Ethel Waters in 1934) stand uncertainly between the notion of Harlem as an uptown amusement destination for hip downtowners and a gender-conscious recognition of what James Weldon Johnson once described as a community of "ordinary, hardworking people" occupied with "the stern necessity of making a living" (1930, 161):

When you've seen gals who wail,
"Hello, baby, love for sale,"
Pound the pavements east to west,
Grabbing what they can to keep a handy man,
You've seen Harlem at its best.

Fields wrote for the Cotton Club until late 1929, when she and McHugh left for Hollywood, and songwriting chores for the revues were taken over by Harold Arlen and Ted Koehler.

Biography

Dorothy Fields was born in Allenhurst, New Jersey, on 15 July 1905. She was a lyricist for revues at the Cotton Club and on Broadway in New York with the composer Jimmy McHugh in 1927–1933; was a lyricist for film scores with the composers Jimmy McHugh and Jerome Kern and others in Hollywood in 1929–1939; wrote the book, lyrics, or both for Broadway musicals in collaboration with Herbert Fields and the composers Arthur Schwartz, Cole Porter, Cy Coleman, and others in 1939–1973; and was a lyricist for the CBS DuPont Show of the Month, Junior Miss, with the composer Burton Lane (New York, 1957). Her honors included an Academy Award for Song of the Year ("The Way You Look Tonight") with the composer Jerome Kern (1936), a Tony Award for Musical Play (Redhead), and election to the Songwriters Hall of Fame (1971). Fields died in New York City, on 28 March 28, 1974.

RYAN JERVING

See also Blackbirds; Calloway, Cab; Cotton Club; Ellington, Duke; Hall, Adelaide; Leslie, Lew; Musical Theater

Selected Stage Works

- Harry Delmar's Revels of 1927*. (With Jimmy McHugh.)
Lew Leslie's Blackbirds of 1928. (With Jimmy McHugh.)
International Review. 1930. (With Jimmy McHugh.)
Something for the Boys. 1943. (Book only, with Herb Fields and Cole Porter, composer.)
Annie Get Your Gun. 1946. (Book only, with Herb Fields and Irving Berlin, composer.)
A Tree Grows in Brooklyn. 1951. (Book with Herb Fields and music with Arthur Schwartz.)
Sweet Charity. 1966. (With Cy Coleman.)

Films

- Roberta*. 1935. (With Jerome Kern.)
Swingtime. 1936. (With Jerome Kern.)

Further Reading

- Calloway, Cab, and Bryant Rollins. Of Minnie the Moocher and Me. New York: Crowell, 1976.
The Chronological Ethel Waters, 1931–1934. Classics, 1994. (Recording; Ethel Waters, performer.)
Dorothy Fields. Smithsonian American Songbook Series, 1993. (Recording; various performers.)
Furia, Philip. The Poets of Tin Pan Alley: A History of America's Great Lyricists. Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
Haskins, Jim. The Cotton Club. New York: Random House, 1977.
Johnson, James Weldon. Black Manhattan. New York: Knopf, 1930.
Winer, Deborah Grace. On the Sunny Side of the Street: The Life and Lyrics of Dorothy Fields. New York: Schirmer, 1997.

Wilk, Max. They're Playing Our Song: Conversations with America's Classic Songwriters. New York: Atheneum, 1973. (See also New York: Da Capo, 1997.)

Yours for a Song: The Women of Tin Pan Alley. (Dir. Terry Benes; Fox Lorber, 1999.)

Fifteenth Infantry

The return of the Fifteenth Infantry to New York, in February 1919, after the end of World War I, is sometimes considered to mark the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance. Neither the return of the Fifteenth Infantry nor the Harlem Renaissance brought an end to violations of African Americans' civil liberties or to legally sanctioned segregation, but both did begin an awareness of African Americans' contributions in all segments of society.

The Fifteenth Infantry, a unit of the New York National Guard, was officially formed on 16 June 1916, with Colonel William Hayward as commander. With a few notable exceptions, such as the band-leader James Reese Europe, the regiment was predominantly led by white officers. Along with Reese, other famous African American men who enlisted with the Fifteenth Infantry, and encouraged others to do so, were Noble Sissle, Eubie Banks, and Horace Pippin. Before their enlistment, most of these African American men had been Pullman porters and waiters, hotel waiters, and doormen. They had little or no experience as soldiers. For the most part, their own officers conducted their training, with almost no assistance from either the National Guard or the regular army.

Arthur Little, a white officer of the Fifteenth Infantry, described it as "the self-made regiment of the American Army. It started without traditions, without education, and without friends" (1936). It did not even have a home base. The regiment began training in an old dance hall in Brooklyn; it also used a state training camp near the town of Peekskill and later at Camp Whitman in New York state. After performing guard duty in various parts of New York state, the regiment was sent to Spartanburg, South Carolina, for further training before embarking for France. Its contentious reception in South Carolina reflected the reality that even though these men were serving their nation, large segments of society refused to recognize their contribution and still wanted them to remain segregated.

When the United States officially entered World War I and the American Expeditionary Force was organized, the Fifteenth Infantry Regiment was redesignated as the 369th and, with other "colored" units of the National Guard, became the Ninety-Third Division (Provisional). This new division was activated at Camp Stuart, Virginia, in December 1917, and almost immediately the 369th was sent to France, with the remainder of the division following in later months. Ostensibly, the division was sent to France because the French army needed replacements. The 369th participated in various defensive and holding operations; its largest operation was the Meuse-Argonne offensive from 16 September 1918 through 11 October 1918—in which, according to some reports, one-third of the unit was killed or wounded. The 369th was credited with never having had a soldier captured and never giving up an inch of ground that it had taken. It spent 191 days in combat and was the first unit to reach the Rhine.

While serving with the French, the 369th fought with distinction and was decorated as a unit, and 170 individuals were awarded the Croix de Guerre. Corporal Henry Johnson and Private Needham Roberts were the first Americans awarded the Croix de Guerre. They had been on guard duty on 14 May 1918 when twenty Germans on a raid tried to take Roberts prisoner. Johnson, using a knife, freed Roberts; and between the two of them, they killed four Germans, wounded several others, and held their position as the rest of the Germans fled. This skirmish became known as the "battle of Henry Johnson." In the battle of the Meuse-Argonne, the 369th captured and held the town of Sechault while facing artillery fire, machine gun fire, and entrenched German soldiers.

One aspect of the history of the Fifteenth Infantry during the war is the story of Lieutenant James Reese Europe. Europe, a well-known bandleader in the United States, conducted a military band known as the 369th Infantry Hell Fighters, which included Noble Sissle and Eubie Blake and is credited with introducing American jazz to Europe. During the war, this band entertained French soldiers and officers in camps and hospitals, and also civilians. Reese composed songs about his wartime experiences and recorded these when he came back to the United States; however, he was killed soon after returning from the war.

Little discusses the hardships that his soldiers suffered at home before the war as a consequence of racism and "the cumulative prejudices of hundreds of years,” but he says that after the war they “were going home as heroes!” They had been denied a parade before departing for France; when they returned, however, the Fifteenth Infantry marched up Fifth Avenue to receive the plaudits of a million grateful citizens of New York, and then marched on for the full length of Lenox Avenue, through Harlem, cheered on by a quarter of a million black men, women, and children. Little reports that on this day, “New York City knew no color line.”

The 369th Colored Infantry returns home: members of this famous unit, formerly the Fifteenth New York regulars, arrive in New York City, 1919. (© Corbis.)

SUSIE SCIFRES KUILAN

See also Blake, Eubie; Europe, James Reese; Sissle, Noble; World War I

Further Reading

Barbeau, Arthur E., and Florette Henri. The Unknown Soldiers: Black American Troops in World War I. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1974.

Henri, Florette, and Richard Joseph Stillman. Bitter Victory: A History of Black Soldiers in World War I. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Little, Arthur W. From Harlem to the Rhine: The Story of New York's Colored Volunteers. New York: Covici Friede, 1936.

Nalty, Bernard C. Strength for the Fight: A History of Black Americans in the Military. New York: Free Press, 1986.

Williams, Charles Halston. Negro Soldiers in World War I: The Human Side. New York: AMS, 1970.

Film

Whoever controls the film industry controls the most powerful medium of influence over the public.
(Thomas Edison)

Background

During the era of silent films, before the advent of the Harlem Renaissance, black faces appeared in motion pictures, but few belonged to African Americans. As a rule, white actors blackened their faces with burnt cork to play blacks in roles that reinforced images immortalized in the novel Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) by Harriet Beecher Stowe. This practice peaked in 1915 with the release of D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation. Upset by the color prejudice manifest in this landmark movie, African Americans, such as Oscar Micheaux, stepped up efforts to organize film companies and produce their own pictures. An outpouring of group pride, which fostered creativity and collaboration by blacks throughout the jazz age, provoked the reaction to Griffith's work and gave rise to numerous films by African Americans. These “race movies” enchanted blacks from the beginning of the 1920s to the early 1930s.

Original Negatives

For nearly two decades after the dawn of motion pictures, African Americans had little influence in the film industry. To their dismay, a mood of nostalgia for antebellum times prevailed in popular culture. Most often, Hollywood movies presented black people as plantation slaves happy to serve their masters; otherwise, blacks were depicted as tramps, thieves, or tricksters. As noted previously, in general white actors played black parts with their faces painted dark, and this practice prevailed when Griffith cast The Birth of a Nation, a sweeping tale of the Civil War and Reconstruction.

The early movies in which whites performed black roles were continuing, or renewing, a custom. After the War of 1812, white minstrels began to make up with burnt cork and render impressions of blacks in song and dance. Out of their routines, a theatrical tradition was born. By the mid-nineteenth century, minstrel shows by whites in blackface were among the most popular pastimes in American society. Their popularity faded in the 1890s, though, as motion pictures emerged and adopted the convention.

In 1903, the first film narrative with a black lead premiered. It was an adaptation of Uncle Tom's Cabin directed by Edwin Porter, who had a white actor, in burnt cork, take the role of Uncle Tom. Like the character in the novel by Harriet Beecher Stowe on which the film was based, the cinematic Uncle Tom thrilled contemporary audiences by submitting piously to his plight as a slave. Six subsequent movie versions of the novel appeared in theaters between 1909 and 1927 and confirmed the public's fascination with black performances, which reprised the black figures developed in the book. In other films by whites, such as The Chicken Thief (1904), The Octoroon (1911), Old Mammy's Charge (1913), A Slave's Devotion (1913), and Rastus's Riotous Ride (1914), black leads copied the devout Tom or other stock characters created by Stowe, including hearty Aunt Chloe, half-witted Topsy, dazzling Eliza, and defiant George. Griffith inserted a form of each type acted by whites into The Birth of a Nation. In the process, he lowered blacks to new depths through characterizations that stripped them of dignity. But Griffith also took filmmaking to new heights through innovative editing; and President Woodrow Wilson, voicing the opinion of the national majority, found the movie an exhilarating account of the past.

African Americans had been protesting against their onscreen image for years before The Birth of a Nation. The "great migration," beginning in 1910, brought many blacks to the North from southern counties plagued by the violence of the Ku Klux Klan and the futility of sharecropping. As these African Americans settled in tight pockets in and around northern cities, their resistance to negative portraits gathered strength. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), formed in 1909 under the leadership of W. E. B. Du Bois, reflected this mounting opposition. A short while after its inception, NAACP had launched a crusade against the use of stereotypes of blacks by the film industry. Other associations that were formed to promote the interests of African Americans—for example, the National Urban League—had soon followed suit. But Birth of a Nation, with its undignified blackface characters in menial or menacing roles, excited the most furious response; this film ignited an explosion of black cinema that contributed to the Harlem Renaissance.

Answer Prints

"Race movies" flourished in the black community before the Great Depression. They picked up a practice that had been initiated by William Foster, who founded a motion picture company in 1910 and produced The Railroad Porter, with an all-black cast and crew, two years later. Race movies were issued by more and more African American filmmakers and were presented in an increasing number of black theater chains. The actors in these movies were real blacks, and the plots were about timely matters relevant to the audiences. These productions often had inadequate capital and thus contained rough cuts and poor lighting; even so, they elicited pleasure as well as pride.

The spread of black film ventures became apparent in 1916 when the Lincoln Motion Picture Company, formed by Noble Johnson, produced The Realization of a Negro's Ambition. These ventures met a demand for businesses owned and operated by African Americans. Marcus Garvey, who emigrated from Jamaica and gained a large following, was an important advocate of black enterprises. Garvey insisted that blacks had to rely on their own resources to improve their standing in society, and the positive response to his rhetoric suggested that an emergent generation was primed to change its fortunes through these means.

The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, a union organized by A. Philip Randolph in 1925, was a sign of the times. It demonstrated the ascent of a social consciousness, involving an extensive commitment to cooperative economics, among African Americans; and this consciousness generated a market for race movies. In cities across the country, audiences filled movie houses to cheer Body and Soul (1925), which came from the Micheaux Film Corporation and starred Paul Robeson. Although this film about a wretched man who undergoes a radical transformation had an uneven narrative (as a result of poor funding and white censorship), it nevertheless delighted viewers. By its mere existence, the movie pleased blacks, for it assured them that, through collaborative activities, they could rise above the barriers of color prejudice.

Recognizing this climate of thought regarding the growth of black cinema, Alain Locke noted, in The New Negro (1925), that African Americans were moved by a fervor for unified action—and that he could hear a cry for arts respectful of black culture. Locke observed that this trend brought writers (such as Langston Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston) considerable patronage throughout the "roaring twenties." Other black artists also enjoyed broad support; some of the most noteworthy were the sculptor Selma Burke, the photographer James Van Der Zee, and the musician

Duke Ellington. Micheaux too found encouragement for more than three dozen motion pictures.

Before the stock market crashed in 1929, numerous black film companies appeared. They tended to dissolve in the following decade, but in their day these businesses produced features for a network of movie chains located in black neighborhoods. The time was right for them, and their target audiences greeted them with enthusiasm. These films were collaborative enterprises that promised relief from the usual Hollywood fare in which blacks were restricted to demeaning roles. Thus through their design and material, the film studios fortified current trends.

Key Light

Although black film companies were reacting against the color prejudice that was rife in the social order, the movies they shot upheld national ideals. Jim Crow, imposing racial divisions, haunted the country: blacks were forced into segregated housing, schools, and jobs; and there were glaring inequalities between public accommodations maintained for blacks and those reserved for whites. These disparities grieved African Americans, but they still believed in the American creed, and their favorite race movies advanced mainstream morals.

The Lincoln Motion Picture Company—the brainchild of Noble Johnson, a black actor with modest film credits in Hollywood—relied on themes that became typical of black independent producers. Lincoln's initial release, The Realization of a Negro's Ambition (1916), espouses faith in the prospect of upward mobility. Reminiscent of Horatio Alger's Ragged Dick, the film has a hero who, through his own intelligence and initiative, rises from a farm to fame and fortune. Lincoln's second feature, The Trooper of Company K (1916), is the story of a slouch who enlists in the Tenth Calvary, develops better habits, and honors himself fighting for his country; thereafter, he wins the girl of his dreams. The standard script for the Lincoln studio had a happy ending. Its later productions, such as The Law of Nature (1917), A Man's Duty (1919), and By Right of Birth (1921), end with a joyful family reunion attained through honest effort in the face of enormous hardship.

The Foster Photoplay Company, pioneered by William Foster, preceded Lincoln by six years. Foster's productions shunned drama in favor of comedy. Soon, joined by the Afro-American Film Company, the invention of Hunter Haynes, Foster was specializing in slapstick borrowed from popular vaudeville routines.

His Pullman Porter (1913), about a raucous romantic triangle, typified his projects, offering delight in lieu of discretion. Lovie Joe's Romance (1914), from the Afro-American Film Company, was in the same vein. Unlike their successors, neither Foster nor Haynes explored issues of racial uplift.

On the brink of the jazz age, there was a turn toward themes related to social accomplishment. The Frederick Douglass Film Company, named after the famous nineteenth-century abolitionist, was part of this shifting tide: its film The Colored American Winning His Suit (1916) had a protagonist who becomes a lawyer and saves his future father-in-law from injustice. Motifs of moral and social triumph soon characterized race movies. Time and again the heroes used brains and hard work to beat hard times. Examples include The Slacker (1917), from the Peter P. Jones Photoplay Company; Loyal Hearts (1919), from the Democracy Film Company; and Reformation (1920), from the Loyalty Film Company. Each such film inspired blacks to dream that they could climb high in society despite handicaps.

Micheaux adopted this approach in 1918 when he filmed The Homesteader, which was based on his own novel about his younger days on the prairie in South Dakota. During the 1920s, he produced a rapid succession of motion pictures. In general, they had subjects that aroused a sense of pride and possibility among blacks across the country, and they attracted large audiences and received rave reviews into the 1930s. In 1931 Micheaux made The Exile (1931), a talkie with a melodramatic plot in which the protagonist's diligence and virtue elevate him in society. Micheaux's successes persuaded white businessmen to finance black film companies that were devoted to dramas of human progress. Reol Productions, for example, distinguished itself with parables such as Easy Money (1921), Secret Sorrow (1921), and The Call of His People (1922), along with The Sport of the Gods (1921), adapted from a novel of the same name by Paul Laurence Dunbar. Another company funded by whites, the Colored Players Film Corporation, appropriated the recognized format in Ten Nights in a Barroom (1926), starring Charles Gilpin, and The Scar of Shame (1927). The Harlem Renaissance, then, encompassed the ascendancy of race movies encouraging black achievements undaunted by color prejudice.

Boom Operator

Beyond doubt, Oscar Micheaux (1883–1951) was the leader of the pack. He had the spirit of a pioneer at age seventeen, when he left his small family farm in rural Illinois to become a Pullman porter in Chicago. He held the job for six years, banking a good deal of his income, until he found an opportunity to buy land in South Dakota. Alone among whites on the prairie, he worked at agriculture and accumulated riches as well as respect from his fellow homesteaders. He married his hometown sweetheart, but the marriage failed because frontier life unsettled her. After their divorce, misfortune plagued Micheaux; his farm business dissipated, and he resorted to writing to make sense of his fallen state. A resulting series of novels, stories of redemption, got him back on his feet. By chance, the shift led him to shoot race movies and set the pace in the field.

In 1913, Woodruff Press printed Micheaux's first book, The Conquest, a veiled autobiography fictionalizing his life from his boyhood to his time as a homesteader. It sold well and justified the publication of a second novel, The Forged Note (1915). Micheaux's third work, The Homesteader, caught the attention of the Lincoln Motion Picture Company, which offered to make a movie out of it. The deal fell through because Micheaux wanted to direct the film and have it run longer than Lincoln's usual features. Nevertheless, with royalties from his book, he produced a cinematic version of the narrative. Reviewers showered the production with lavish praise; most of them deemed it a watershed in the history of black cinema, and their judgment proved valid.

Although Micheaux made films until 1948, he reached the crest of his career around the end of the Harlem Renaissance. In his heyday, he wrote, directed, and produced an average of two films per year; for instance, in 1920 he offered black moviegoers Within Our Gates and The Brute. During the 1920s, he had an unbroken string of films, including Deceit (1921), The Dungeon (1922), The Ghost of Tolston's Manor (1923), Birthright (1924), Body and Soul (1925), Broken Violin (1926), The Millionaire (1927), and Wages of Sin (1928). By the close of the decade, his output was unmatched. Micheaux's movies drew record crowds to black theaters before the onset of the Great Depression. After the Depression had begun, he made headlines with The Exile (1931), the first picture with sound from a black studio. But after that, his popularity waned during the 1930s, when he released Easy Street (1930), Lem Hawkin's Confession (1935), The Underworld (1937), Temptation (1938), God's Stepchildren (1938), and Lying Lips (1939). The Betrayal (1948), succeeding The Notorious Elinor Lee (1940), was his final production.

As yet, no black filmmaker has rivaled Hollywood to the same extent as Micheaux did. He made many accomplished black stage performers into stars of the screen. Laura Bowman, Shingzie Howard, Canada Lee, Ethel Moses, and Lorenzo Tucker are among the film celebrities associated with Micheaux. Also, an unprecedented number of African Americans came to see his films. He whetted their appetite with advertising campaigns that promised spectacular dramas with stellar black casts. To the audiences who packed the movie theaters, it mattered little that his films often suffered from bad lighting and jarring cuts resulting from budgetary constraints. Operating with a small amount of capital, he would take less than two months to shoot a film, in homes and nightclubs or on slapdash sets. The key to his success was his use of subjects and stars that conveyed a positive image of blacks—something that was absent in Hollywood productions.

As authors such as Hughes and Hurston won fame with folktales, Micheaux achieved distinction with movies that embodied black people's dreams. Beginning with The Homesteader, he gave top billing to dignified African Americans. He applied this principle to great effect in The Birthright; and for Body and Soul, he handed the lead to the legendary Paul Robeson, thereby bringing the first black superstar to the screen. When Micheaux switched to sound for The Exile, his style remained the same. He continued to put noble black characters in problematic situations that were familiar to African Americans, and in the process, he propelled the development of race movies.

Raw Stock

At the peak of the Harlem Renaissance, black cinema from Micheaux and his contemporaries received generous criticism. Ordinarily, the critics commended race movies for social reasons, avoiding any consideration of the aesthetics of the genre, because they felt that these movies filled a void in the film industry and should therefore be defended. On occasion, critics mentioned flaws such as erratic montages and uneven acting, but they attributed these problems to pressures imposed by creditors and censors, and they considered the flaws of little importance in light of the social function of race movies. These commentators stressed that the material gave African Americans a vital cinema of their own. Following the death of Micheaux, two decades passed before questions of form and content occupied very many critics. Then, galvanized by the black arts movement, various scholars and researchers began to say that the old productions were deficient in artistic and cultural value.

Cripps (1977) and Sampson (1995) established that early black cinema had been hampered by censorship. From the outset, for example, movies by blacks were subjected to bowdlerization. The following are other specific examples. A need to appease white backers prevented Emmett Scott (a secretary to Booker T. Washington) from realizing "Lincoln's Dream," his planned response to Birth of a Nation; he had to change the name of his project to Birth of a Race and add footage that rendered the finished product an incoherent mélange. The Chicago Board of Censors objected to a lynching scene in Micheaux's Within Our Gates and attempted (although unsuccessfully) to prevent this film from appearing; and white operators of theaters in the South that catered to blacks refused to book the film. Body and Soul was edited to please censors in New York, and this editing jumbled the plot. Because of a romantic episode involving a black man and a white woman, the Pennsylvania Board of Censors prevented The Exile from being shown in Pittsburgh. Time and again, such incidents frustrated black independents.

Moreover, there was never enough money for more than B movies. Lacking the resources for expensive features, black film companies had to settle for moderate productions. Money shortages beset the Foster Photoplay Company and the Lincoln Motion Picture Company. In the 1920s, Reol Productions, the Ebony Film Corporation, and the Democracy Film Corporation managed to assemble decent films, but they did so under the control of white investors. Micheaux, hounded by fiscal woes, had to cut corners. Of course, the tight budgets within which black filmmakers had to work affected the quality of their movies.

In the past few decades, critics have also assailed the content of race movies. Some researchers have noted that light-skinned blacks were consistently given leading roles and have therefore upbraided Micheaux and his peers for replicating the hierarchy of color that prevailed in white cinema. Similarly, some scholars have objected to plots that conformed to conventional Hollywood scripts with happy endings, and several have deplored themes extolling bourgeois conduct. According to scholars such as these, race movies placed the fortunes of blacks in their own hands, thus absolving whites of blame for the problems of African Americans. Now, however, challenges to such critiques are emerging from scholars who suggest that the black pictures of the Harlem Renaissance era should be understood as expressions of a mood which that found favor in black circles.

Because few copies of race movies are extant, details about them are often little more than speculation. The available material does indicate that meager budgets caused these films to lack polish and that the films were vitiated by censorship. But audiences forgave their imperfections and packed halls such as the Lafayette Theater in Harlem to watch them. These films offered dreams of black achievement to an entire generation. They were right for the time.

Closing Credits

In 1927, The Jazz Singer, starring Al Jolson, introduced talking pictures and sounded the death knell for blackface actors and for race movies. Although Jolson played the part of a blackface vaudevillian in The Jazz Singer, the new sound technology aroused—and fed—an appetite for realism; as a result, Hollywood was forced to cast more African Americans in black roles. This technological advance also increased the cost of producing movies because the apparatus required for a synchronized soundtrack was so expensive. In addition, after the stock market crashed, black independents had increasing difficulty securing enough capital to compete in the new era. These factors combined to squeeze black film companies out of the market. Before World War II began, race movies had passed from the American scene. A few black independents remained in business beyond the 1930s: Micheaux was one of them; another one was Spencer Williams, who released Tenderfeet in 1928 and Go Down Death in 1944. But eventually even the survivors were undone by insolvency.

During the Great Depression, Hollywood, with the promise of big paychecks, lured black stars like Clarence Brooks, Paul Robeson, and Lena Horne away from black studios. At the same time, white companies enticed black audiences by developing black musicals, such as Black and Tan (1929) and Saint Louis Blues (1929), respectively featuring Duke Ellington and Bessie Smith. Nostalgia for the antebellum South returned and made hits of Hallelujah (1929) and Hearts in Dixie (1929), which had all-black casts. Hollywood also discovered that it was profitable to sprinkle comedies, mysteries, and westerns with African Americans in stereotypical roles. By the time Cabin in the Sky (1943) and Stormy Weather (1943)—both filled with African American actors—were made, the black independents had all gone out of business.

Race movies left a legacy for future black filmmakers. After Micheaux and his counterparts were gone, black cinema remained dormant for more than twenty-five years. Then, black film directors gained a foothold once again at the start of the black arts movement. This revival was initiated by films such as Melvin Van Peebles's Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song (1971) and Shaft, directed by Gordon Parks (also 1971). During the 1970s, numerous revenge dramas called "blaxploitation" films—such as Superfly (1972) and Foxy Brown (1974)—featured black stars. There was a significant audience for comedians such as Richard Pryor, Eddie Murphy, and Whoopi Goldberg and for movies with racial themes; and during the 1980s, such movies made some black comedians superstars. However, black film companies were still scarce until Spike Lee organized Forty Acres and a Mule Filmworks, whose productions, such as She's Gotta Have It (1986) and Do the Right Thing (1989), were very successful at the box office and sparked a second resurgence of black cinema. The trend begun by Lee brought filmmakers such as John Singleton, Julie Dash, and Charles Burnett to the fore and lasted until the end of the twentieth century.

So far, though, no generation of black filmmakers has matched the volume of output of those who created the race movies. Prohibitive costs and Hollywood blockbusters with African American headliners have continued to thwart black independents. Those who have been notably successful have applied a formula devised by their forerunners during the Harlem Renaissance: they have taken the pulse of the black community and have treated that community agreeably onscreen. This approach constitutes a special part of the heritage bequeathed by figures such as Micheaux.

Wrap

The Birth of a Nation, with its blackface actors, set off a boom in black cinema that reverberated throughout the Harlem Renaissance. The resulting race movies met a demand for positive images of blacks onscreen. A host of black independents opened for business, and their films excited pride and ambition. Among these filmmakers, Oscar Micheaux produced forty features. Black filmmakers were constrained by scanty budgets and by censorship, and their productions were consequently impaired, but audiences packed the movie houses to see their films. Proponents of black aesthetics have frowned on the typical themes of race movies, but so little of these films remains available that commentary is often not much more than guesswork. After the Jazz Singer appeared, race movies faded from the scene, but they provided a lesson for future generations.

ROLAND L. WILLIAMS JR

See also Brooks, Clarence; Birth of a Nation, The; Birth of a Race, The; Colored Players Film Corporation; Film: Actors; Film: Black Filmmakers; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Hallelujah; Hearts in Dixie; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Micheaux, Oscar; Race Films; Robeson, Paul; other specific individuals

Further Reading

- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattos, Mammies, and Bucks. New York: Viking, 1973.
- Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Leab, Daniel. From Sambo to Superspade. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Locke, Alain. The New Negro. New York: Alfred and Charles Boni, 1925.
- Nestey, James. Black Images in American Films. New York: Lanham, 1982.
- Sampson, Henry. Blacks in Black and White. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1995.
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Uncle Tom's Cabin. Boston: John P. Jewett, 1852.

Film: Actors

In 2002, when Halle Berry became the first black woman to win an Academy Award as best actress, more than six decades had passed since the first black woman had won an Academy Award in any category: that was Hattie McDaniel, who had won as best supporting actress for her performance in Gone with the Wind (1939). In the years between, only one other black woman had won: Whoopi Goldberg, in 1990, for her supporting role in Ghost. Interestingly, responses in the black community to Berry's award (for her role in Monster's Ball, the story of a woman who falls in love with a recovering white racist who happens to be the man who executed her husband) were mixed. Recognition of this milestone was tempered by questions surrounding the range of roles offered by Hollywood to blacks and especially to black women. For some critics, Berry's character was contemporary evidence of the persistence of restrictions that had first been imposed on black actors at the dawn of American filmmaking.

The quarter-century from 1888 to 1915 that witnessed unprecedented technological advances in the newly established American film industry was also a period of perhaps unparalleled antiblack sentiment and violence. Somewhat ironically, the year 1896 saw both the first projection of moving images onto a large screen and a decision by the Supreme Court, in Plessy v. Ferguson, that helped usher in an era of legalized racial separation. Given its unquestioned power to shape public opinion—and despite its potential to challenge racial and other standards—American film during this period was implicated in the nation's subjugation and defamation of its black population. Black actors, during the heyday of the Harlem Renaissance, found themselves at the center of a people's struggle for accurate and humanistic representation onscreen.

Hollywood: Opportunity and Boundaries

During the 1920s, as reported by the black press and well documented in Hollywood's Central Casting Bureau, black actors made gains in terms of overall numbers employed by white studios, but those gains did not translate into improved status (Regester 1997, 95). Nor did their appearance in silent films during the 1920s significantly challenge long-standing stereotypes of black Americans. Black film actors, like members of other ethnic minority groups who responded to casting calls during this era, were consistently relegated to appearances as extras. Although employment opportunities generally were plentiful, black actors in the mid-1920s most often appeared as "backdrop": soldiers, slaves, members of crowds, and, frequently, natives in exoticized African or Pacific island settings. Although opportunities to challenge cinematic representations of race were clearly circumscribed, the black acting presence in Hollywood, at least in terms of sheer numbers, was firmly established by 1926 (Regester, 98).

With the transition to the sound era in film, blacks continued to be visible as extras, but they also began to secure a few major roles. In 1927, the same year that The Jazz Singer signaled the industry's transition to sound, and in the following year, several films—including Louisiana, Jungle Gods, The Missing Link, The River, The Wedding March, and Diamond Handcuffs—employed large numbers of blacks as extras and a few in substantial roles. In 1927, the famous black actor James Lowe obtained a leading role in a production of Uncle Tom's Cabin. And the end of the decade would bring the production of two major all-black feature films that showcased many of the most talented actors of the 1920s and 1930s. On the one hand, these gains represented a tremendous improvement in the financial viability of black acting, but on the other hand, black actors acquiesced in their own marginalization. Not until the late 1930s did blacks resort to strikes and other direct measures to gain higher wages and more dignified roles in film.

Hollywood: Black Actors and Comedy

Humor was ubiquitous in American films at the turn of the twentieth century. The silent film era may be best remembered for its comedies (Watkins 1994, 183). Unfortunately for blacks, the genre reinforced racial stereotypes for white audiences accustomed to laughing at the portrayals of black life provided by minstrelsy and vaudeville. Bogle (2001) and others have identified several black character types that appeared in minstrelsy and vaudeville and made an almost seamless transition to moving pictures: the fawning Tom, the self-mocking coon, the jolly but recalcitrant mammy (Aunt Jemima), the tragic mulatto, the brutal buck. Arguably, it was the figure of the coon, or Sambo, whose appearance in America cinema in the first half of the twentieth century had the most devastating impact on efforts to present an honest portrait of black life to American audiences.

Before his popularity began to wane in the late 1930s, Stepin Fetchit was the best-known and most successful black actor in Hollywood. He was, as well, the quintessential coon or Sambo figure in American film. He and his comic "stepchildren"—Willie Best, Mantan Moreland, and Fred "Snowflake" Toones, among others—would leave in the American psyche and memory an indelible image of a lazy, dull-witted, tongue-tied black man. Despite his efforts to inject some respectability into his film roles, Fetchit's characters were among the most demeaning figures in black film history. Ultimately, although he was tremendously popular among white moviegoers, he alienated significant numbers of blacks.

A lesser-known source for exploring images of blacks in films before the civil rights era is the collection Our Gang (renamed The Little Rascals in its television version, for legal reasons), film shorts produced between 1922 and 1944. Four black child actors had major roles in this popular series. Ernie Morrison portrayed, among other characters, “Sunshine Sammy” in the early, silent installments of Our Gang. Allen Hoskins, who bridged the gap between the silent and sound versions, was best known as “Farina.” Matthew Beard’s “Stymie” and William Thomas Jr.’s “Buckwheat” are the black characters most often associated with Our Gang. Throughout its run, the series contained racial jokes and reinforced stereotypes of blacks in general and of black children in particular. However, as has been noted by several critics, the gang’s world—especially when compared with the adult black world depicted in films of the era—was one of “equal-opportunity buffoonery,” because all of the children were the butt of jokes and because they generally related to each other with no regard to race (Watkins, 219–220).

Hollywood: Black Actors and Musicals

The advent of sound movies sparked Hollywood’s interest in black performers for at least two reasons: the belief that black voices, with their “unmistakable resonance,” were well-suited to the new medium; and the continued popularity of black music. The Jazz Singer (1927) launched the sound era in filmmaking, and the critical reception of its star, Al Jolson, prompted renewed interest in blackface productions. Some of the earliest beneficiaries of shifting technologies were black musicians who made appearances in all-black musical shorts. In the late 1920s and into the 1930s, some of the nation’s greatest musicians appeared in one- and two-reelers that showcased their talents. Perhaps most notable were the performances of Bessie Smith in Saint Louis Blues (1929) and Duke Ellington in Black and Tan (also 1929). Black musicians also made cameo appearances, some quite unflattering, in white feature films of the period: for example, in Paramount’s Rhapsody in Black and Blue (1932), Louis Armstrong was cast as a jungle king, complete with animal skins and native headdress (Watkins, 214).

Three notable all-black movies produced in the 1920s and 1930s—Hearts in Dixie (1929), Hallelujah!

(1929), and The Green Pastures (1936)—were striking departures from the musical shorts and cameo appearances. All three were lavish productions in which black musical talent was showcased along with black acting. Hearts in Dixie starred Clarence Muse and Stepin Fetchit, the former in a seemingly dignified role and the latter exhibiting his standard buffoonery. Set in the South during the plantation era, Hearts in Dixie offered standard antebellum stereotypes, but its all-black cast was the first to appear in a feature-length film. Hallelujah! was a morality play directed by King Vidor; its leading lady, Nina Mae McKinney, was the first recognized black film actress (Bogle, 33). Green Pastures, the cinematic adaptation of a successful Broadway play, highlighted the talents of Rex Ingram and Eddie “Rochester” Anderson. Despite their technical and narrative weaknesses, all three films gave black actors an opportunity to display their talents and helped pave the way for subsequent all-black productions.

Hollywood: Black Actors and Drama

D. W. Griffith’s controversial production The Birth of a Nation (1915) was the first feature-length American film. A technological marvel, it was powerful evidence that history and drama could combine to produce a popular, influential, and—for black Americans—dangerous work of art. That this film would so successfully rewrite the history of the Civil War and Reconstruction was cause for alarm; that it would so unflinchingly reinforce stereotypes of blacks as socially and politically incompetent, and black men as bestial by nature, was an even greater motivation for black Americans to protest its release. But Birth of a Nation was not unique. Aside from black independent filmmakers’ visions of black life, most cinematic drama marginalized rather than humanized black Americans.

While the stereotype of the coon, or Sambo, dominated portraits of blacks in comedy films, Hollywood drama in the 1920s and 1930s was replete with other black character types: the long-suffering, loyal Tom; the aggressive, asexual mammy; and the tragic mulatto. Dramatic film has always held the potential to question, if not subvert, the existing racial order, but the “New Negro” was seldom to be found in Hollywood cinema. Bogle (35, 53) notes that with regard to black film roles, the 1930s were an “era of servants,” a period when even the most dignified black actors were relegated to subservient relationships with white leading actors. Thus the legendary actor and dancer Bill “Bojangles” Robinson became humorist Will Rogers’s loyal servant in In Old Kentucky (1935), and most famously Shirley Temple’s trusted “Uncle Billy” in a plantation melodrama, The Littlest Rebel (1935). Clarence Muse became the archetypal Tom, Nigger Jim, in Huckleberry Finn (1931). And the antebellum mammy or Aunt Jemima—a figure who often combined the loyalty of Tom, the comic affability of Sambo, and her own unique “sassiness” (i.e., bitchiness)—was resurrected as a maid in the twentieth century and portrayed by Louise Beavers and Hattie McDaniel, among others.

A mainstay of American film and literature in the first half of the twentieth century was the “tragic mulatto,” almost always a woman. The actress Fredi Washington, whose facial features were racially ambiguous, was frequently cast as a black woman passing for white with tragic consequences. She appeared opposite Paul Robeson in The Emperor Jones (1933) and opposite Louise Beavers in 1934 in a version of Imitation of Life, a film that would become the archetypal statement of the consequences of racial passing. These films were seemingly vehicles for a sophisticated exploration of identity by biracial or multiracial Americans but were based on the faulty assumption that the mulatto’s experience is inherently tragic.

Beyond Hollywood: Black Actors and Black Independent Film

Historically, black independent films have offered alternative images of black life and culture, and in the early twentieth century they provided much-needed work for black artists beyond the reach of Hollywood. William Foster, Oscar Micheaux, Noble and George Johnson, Spencer Williams, and a few other black independent filmmakers offered a working environment that generally allowed black actors to avoid the demeaning roles assigned to their Hollywood counterparts. These underground “race films” also provided a rapidly growing black moviegoing population with a form of entertainment of which they could be proud.

The earliest phase of race films—despite their technical flaws—challenged existing portraits of black Americans. This phase began with William Foster’s The Railroad Porter (1912); continued with Biograph Pictures’ A Natural Born Gambler (released in 1914 and starring the noted vaudevillian Bert Williams); and crystallized in Birth of a Race (originally called “Lincoln’s Dream”), the black community’s response to Birth of a Nation.

The next phase of independent black filmmaking began with the incorporation of Noble and George Johnson’s Lincoln Motion Picture Company in 1916. The Johnson brothers’ films, which included The Realization of a Negro’s Ambition (1916) and The Trooper of Troop K (1916), were conscious attempts to capture the achievements of black Americans and create heroes and heroines (Bogle, 341). In order to remain with Lincoln, actors such as Jimmie Smith and Beulah Hall would forgo other opportunities; perhaps these actors appreciated the control over image enjoyed by a black production crew and acting ensemble. However, by the late 1920s and early 1930s—because of a lack of capital and because the film industry was rapidly expanding and diversifying—many of the black companies had folded. White filmmakers, recognizing that films aimed at a black audience were commercially viable, began to dominate the market (this trend foreshadowed the emergence of “blaxplotation” films in the 1970s).

Beginning in 1918, the legendary independent filmmaker Oscar Micheaux produced pioneering works for three decades. His films included narratives that, like those of the Johnson brothers, were dedicated to the theme of black uplift. However, Micheaux consistently navigated dangerous thematic terrain, exploring interracial relationships and the “color complex”—a range of contentious issues related to gradations of skin color and to the resulting conflicts within the black community. Among the actors employed by Micheaux were Lorenzo Tucker, the “black Valentino”; Bee Freeman, the “sepia Mae West”; the sultry Ethel Moses; and Julia Theresa Russell and Paul Robeson, who had the leading roles in Micheaux’s masterpiece Body and Soul (1925).

It might be argued that the cinematic counterpart to the New Negro in the literature of the Harlem Renaissance was to be found in the world of black independent filmmaking. Literature and film both argued for honest depictions of black life; each was uncompromising in its own way; both began to wane in the mid- to late 1930s; and both would leave an indelible imprint on black history and culture. Bogle (136) has suggested that the New Negro would not appear in Hollywood films until the 1940s, when a new generation of actors and their roles—outgrowths of the social spirit of the day—would help redefine the relationship between blacks and America.

C. C. HERBISON

See also Baker, Josephine; Beavers, Louise; Birth of a Nation, The; Birth of a Race, The; Blackface Performance; Blacks in Theater; Calloway, Cab; Colored Players Film Corporation; Ellington, Duke; Emperor Jones, The; Fetchit, Stepin; Film; Film: Black Filmmakers; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Green Pastures, The; Hallelujah!; Hearts in Dixie; Johnson, Noble; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Lowe, James B.; Madame Sul Te Wan; McKinney, Nina Mae; Micheaux, Oscar; Minstrelsy; Moreland, Mantan; Muse, Clarence; Race Films; Robeson, Paul; Robinson, Bill "Bojangles"; Vaudeville; Washington, Fred; Waters, Ethel; Within Our Gates

Further Reading

- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretive History of Blacks in American Films, 4th ed. New York: Continuum, 2001.
- Bowser, Pearl, and Louise Spence. Writing Himself into History: Oscar Micheaux, His Silent Films, and His Audiences. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2000.
- Cripps, Thomas. Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Diawara, Manthia, ed. Black American Cinema. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Guerrero, Ed. Framing Blackness: The African American Image in Film. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1993.
- Regeher, Charlene. "African American Extras in Hollywood during the 1920s and 1930s." Film History, 9(1), 1997, pp. 95–115.
- Snead, James. White Screens / Black Images: Hollywood from the Dark Side, eds. Colin McCabe and Cornel West. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Watkins, Mel. On the Real Side: A History of African American Comedy from Slavery to Chris Rock. Chicago, Ill.: Lawrence Hill, 1994.

Film: Black Filmmakers

An African American appeared in the first motion picture copyrighted in the United States; this was a young laboratory assistant of Thomas Alva Edison's, Fred Ott, who pretended to sneeze, and made history with his silent, overacted, head-snapping atchoo.

From then on, black people were part of the film industry. Early white American filmmakers featured black vaudeville entertainers, among other subjects, in short silent films; one 35-mm film that survives from the early era shows a black male tap dancer.

During the early experimental phase of the film industry—a phase characterized by rapid progress through trial and error—black assistants worked behind the scenes, beside open-minded white inventors. These black laboratory assistants would sometimes be captured on laboratory demonstration films intended to depict human movement. They were often the inspiration or even the masterminds of cinematic breakthroughs, but because of cultural prejudice, their names were never registered on the patents.

In these early days, between 1888 and 1896, only a few black people other than those employed in laboratories were able to view movies. Edison's Kinetoscope machine accommodated only a single viewer at a time, and other technologies allowed only a few people to watch a film, in a small space (of course, these limitations also restricted the number of white people who could see a movie). In 1896, however, the first motion pictures were presented in a "movie theater" in New York City. The Edison Company had devised a projector known as the Projectoscope and started showing films to large, paying audiences on a regular basis. The first such film showed contemporary scenes of Herald Square in New York City and travelogues of more exotic places, including Niagara Falls in upstate New York and Passaic Falls in New Jersey.

The laboratory of the Edison Company, in West Orange, New Jersey (less than ten miles from New York City), began filming trains and train routes in Black Diamond Express in December 1896. Black men employed as porters, cooks, and skilled laborers on the trains were often seen in these films. Travelogues featuring train rides with scenic views were very popular, and black audiences particularly enjoyed seeing black workers in the background. But black moviegoers were segregated. In some localities, blacks were relegated to the balconies of white vaudeville theaters; in larger northern and southern cities that already had lucrative black vaudeville theaters with middle-class black patrons, the Edison films were shown to all-black audiences between burlesque comedy routines and party music.

Travelogues, newsreels, special events, crime, war, the Paris Exposition of 1900, and Native American cultural events were the typical subjects of most silent films at the turn of the twentieth century. There was also footage of black soldiers going off to fight the Spanish-American War. All of this made movies a very popular form of entertainment and a source of information, but the paying public soon began to demand fictional films with plots. Accordingly, white businesspeople, and soon afterward black businesspeople, scrambled to meet this demand. It was natural and convenient to adapt for the screen some of the vaudeville dramas that were being featured in the same theaters as the early films. Many popular vaudeville stories and stage actors and actresses found their way to silent movies between 1902 and 1915.

In 1903, a fourteen-minute film dramatization of Harriet Beecher Stowe's popular novel Uncle Tom's Cabin was released and shown to enthusiastic audiences in theaters all over the country. The black characters were portrayed by white actors in blackface, and this film proved very effective at transferring demeaning stereotypes of blacks from literature to the movies. At about this time, many other films were produced that also depicted black people in subservient and comic roles.

Not until 1912—when William Foster founded the Foster Photoplay Company—did a filmmaker challenge these onscreen images of black people or depict blacks as confronting complex issues. Foster, a publicity and booking agent for vaudeville in Chicago, was the first black to use the vast pool of African American talent and community drama as a resource for films. His Foster Photoplay Company was organized particularly to specialize in “non-degrading Black-cast comedies,” as he wrote in Freeman (in the issue of 20 December 1913). He noted: “Nothing has done so much to awaken race consciousness of the colored man in the United States as the motion picture. It has made him hungry to see himself as he has come to be.”

With a stock company of black actors from vaudeville and musical theater, Foster set out to represent in American movies the lifestyles of the black middle class. His debut film, in 1912, was a ten-minute comedy-drama, The Railroad Porter—America's first movie with an all-black cast. The Railroad Porter was in part a parody of railroad travelogue films, but it also included the complexities of what can happen when a man stays away from home too long: Foster's porter must cope with a cheating wife. In this film, Foster gave life to the black railroad porter, a figure who had previously appeared in movies only as serving white travelers. Foster produced at least eleven films before his company folded in 1918 as a result of insufficient funding and distribution. His titles included The Butler and The Fall Guy. In 1914, he also produced a newsreel, The Colored Championship Baseball Game, which is the only known film documenting the Colored Baseball Leagues.

To a considerable degree, Foster's hope of uplifting the race was dashed when Birth of a Nation was released in 1915. This film, directed by D. W. Griffith, was a masterpiece, but it depicted American history in the aftermath of the Civil War from the viewpoint of those who sympathized with the Confederacy, and it portrayed black people as rapists, thieves, ignorant preachers, and cowering rascals. Foster responded with a screenplay that would eventually bear the title Birth of a Race and started production on it in 1916. After two years of production and financing from several backers—including Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Circle, Universal Pictures, and Julius Rosenwald of Sears Roebuck—Foster's last film was a commercial failure.

As Foster's company in Chicago faltered, the brothers George Johnson (a black postal worker originally from Omaha) and Noble Johnson (an actor) founded the Lincoln Motion Picture Company in Los Angeles, California. According to its promotional literature, Lincoln “not only produced pictures entertaining to Negroes but to all races. Our market is as large as we make it; the world is our field.”

In 1916, the Johnson brothers produced the country's first full-length black film drama, A Realization of a Negro's Ambition. This was the story of a black graduate of Tuskegee Institute who becomes an oil tycoon in California. Twenty years later, George Johnson said that the film had allowed “black actors to pursue performances liberated from the stereotypes of buffoonery promoted in the mainstream film business.” The Lincoln Motion Picture Company produced films until it was forced out of business by a flu epidemic that closed movie theaters in 1921. Its titles included A Trooper of Company K (1917) and By Right of Birth (1921).

In 1918, another young black filmmaker, Oscar Micheaux, responded to Griffith's Birth of a Nation. Micheaux, an up-and-coming novelist who was originally from Chicago, dramatized his book The Homesteader, based on his own experience as a black farmer in South Dakota and financed by other farmers there, black and white. Micheaux had turned down an offer by the Johnson brothers, who wanted to buy his screenplay; he opened the Micheaux Book and Film Company in Chicago and proceeded to produce his own films, of which The Homesteader was the first. Micheaux shot his early films on location in Chicago and in studios in New York. In 1926, he closed his Chicago operation and moved permanently to Harlem.

Micheaux became the most successful black filmmaker in American history. He produced more than thirty films between 1918 and 1951. Although he emphasized middle-class black America, he also addressed contemporary issues such as lynching. His titles include Within Our Gates (1919), The Brute (1920), The Symbol of the Unconquered (1920), The Gunsaulus Mystery (1921), The House behind the Cedars (1924), The Son of Satan (1924), Birthright (1924 and 1939), Thirty Years Later (1928), The Daughter of the Congo (1930), The Exile (1931), Darktown Revue (1931), Temptation (1936), The Underworld (1936), God's Stepchildren (1939), The Notorious Elinor Lee (1940), and The Betrayal (1948).

Despite Micheaux's success, many of his films seem to have been crudely produced with minimal funding. Members of his technical crew would double as extras—as would Micheaux, who also made cameo appearances in his own films. He was often criticized for using light-skinned black people to play the roles of whites and authority figures.

Micheaux marketed his pictures to black audiences on a circuit of black vaudeville theaters in the South and along the east coast—the “Chitterlings Circuit,” as it was affectionately called by its patrons. His films were also shown in churches, community centers, and dance halls; and he would often exhibit his personal copy of a film as he drove from location to location in his own car. As soon as he completed the exhibition circuit, Micheaux would immediately start filming his next project.

Micheaux has been credited with keeping black stage actors working when times were hard during the Depression. He introduced Paul Robeson to the movies in 1924, in the silent drama Body and Soul. Micheaux said in 1920, “The appreciation my people have shown my maiden efforts convinces me that they want racial photoplays depicting racial life, and to that task I have concentrated my mind and efforts.” In his films, he was able to explore many topics that were unique to black America; for example, he often used the “tragic mulatto” as a theme in which his characters overcame life's difficulties. He emphasized the positive, praiseworthy qualities of black America, but he was not afraid to show the seedy aspects of black life as well—and as a result, the black press continually criticized him and his movies.

In 1928, Micheaux filed a voluntary bankruptcy petition in the U.S. Seventh District Court in New York City. In 1929, with new white partners, he reorganized his company in New York state under the name Micheaux Film Corporation. The president of this new company, Frank Schiffman, also owned several theaters in New York City that catered to black audiences. However, the partnership was short-lived and Micheaux ultimately ran his film production company without partners. By the 1930s, Micheaux was not the only producer interested in making films for black audiences: nearly 150 film companies were targeting the black community, although most of their films were poorly written, poorly acted, and poorly directed.

Another black filmmaker who was unsatisfied with Hollywood's depiction of his race was the actor and director Spencer Williams. Williams made his mark in black films during the 1930s. Films he directed include Bronze Buckaroo, Harlem on the Prairie, Blood of Jesus, Dirty Girtie from Harlem, and Juke Joint. Of these, Blood of Jesus is of particular interest. The main female character is faced with a traditional choice—life in the country versus the more exciting but also more sinful life of a big city—and Williams accordingly documented a river baptism; but he also introduced double exposure to black films, as an inexpensive special effect. In his films, Williams did not try to correct all that was wrong in America; he tended to show ordinary black life. Because his films were popular among audiences as well as critics, he was considered the most successful black film director of his era. (In his later years, Williams was even more famous as Andy in the popular television program Amos 'n' Andy. Although he was criticized for taking this role, he maintained that the character was not stereotypical but strong and intelligent.)

A few black actors and actresses who became famous in films produced by blacks also crossed over to white companies that produced “race films” with all-black casts for black audiences. Paul Robeson was one of the first black victims of white Hollywood's double-edged sword. Two white producers, John Krimsky and Gifford Cochran, recruited Robeson in 1933. Robeson's talent as an entertainer, athlete, and scholar was undisputed, and he had already made his film debut in Micheaux's Body and Soul and had starred in a Swiss film, Boarderline, in 1929; but he fell prey to filmmakers who had ultimate control over the final edit and could therefore remake his image and that of black people. Robeson, who made nine feature films between 1929 and 1942, said that he was never satisfied with their depiction of blacks and that he had been tricked into playing characters whose roles were reconstructed in the editing room without his knowledge. (One such film was Sanders of the River in 1937.) Robeson was an outspoken advocate of civil rights whose complaints to white producers were tolerated, perhaps because his appeal at the box office outweighed other considerations. Evidently, he was selected in preference to other black actors at least partly because he was able to pacify both black and white moviegoers. To blacks, he represented hope (his screen presence was very impressive); to whites, he was seen as being kept in his place as long as his screen characters were submissive to whites. Robeson said that he took questionable roles in order to strengthen his bargaining position; but he finally gave up his fight with Hollywood in 1942, when he joined a picket line protesting against his last movie, Tales of Manhattan—and in any case he had little effect on the white film industry, which refused to create the kind of scripts that would have complemented his talent. Other black actors had even less access to positive roles; most of them were grateful just to have a job and performed stereotyped roles in order to get a paycheck.

The most successful actor who crossed over from all-black films to Hollywood films was Stepin Fetchit (Lincoln Theodore Perry). As a vaudevillian, he had developed, with a partner, a routine called “Step ‘n’ Fetchit.” After that act broke up in the mid-1920s, he took Stepin Fetchit as his stage name and created a new character based on his former partner. Perry perfected the lazy, stupid, subservient black stereotype onstage and carried it into movies. When black filmmakers fell on hard times, Stepin Fetchit found steady work in white Hollywood; he was the first black actor to achieve featured billing in movies with white stars, and he never bowed to objections about his character. He saw himself simply as a hardworking comic actor; claimed that he was the first black entertainer to become a millionaire; and believed that he had been influential in opening doors to the motion picture world for other blacks. Stepin Fetchit starred in at least forty films from 1927 to 1975; they included In Old Kentucky (1927), Salute (1929), Judge Priest (1934), and Steamboat around the Bend (1935). Other blacks who crossed over were Duke Ellington (who appeared with his orchestra in Black and Tan, an RCA Phonophone production of 1929), Mantan Moreland (who appeared in Tall, Tan, and Terrific in 1946), and Bill Robinson (who appeared in Harlem Is Heaven in 1945).

Eventually, a lack of coordinated distribution, exhibition, and publicity caused black filmmakers, one by one, to stop producing. Another factor was film rationing during World War II. Moreover, exhibition space for black films was drastically reduced; many of the black vaudeville theaters that at one time had shown black films went out of business during World War II and abandoned their buildings. Black filmmaking could not recover from economic hardships, the loss of exhibition space, and the shortage of film stock available to nonwhite businesses in the early 1940s, and it succumbed during a flurry of wartime recruitment films for the U.S. Army. The first phase of black filmmaking was over by 1950.

SHARON ELIZABETH SEXTON

See also Amos ‘n’ Andy; Birth of a Nation, The; Birth of a Race, The; Ellington, Duke; Fetchit, Stepin; Film; Film: Actors; Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers; Johnson, Noble; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Micheaux, Oscar; Moreland, Mantan; Race Films; Robeson, Paul; Robinson, Bill “Bojangles”

Further Reading

- “Actor Stepin Fetchit, 83, Dies in L.A. Hospital.” Jet, 9 December 1985.
- A Brief Analysis of Six Black Genre Films*. Moorland-Spingarn Research Center.
- Horowitz, Joy. “Hollywood’s Dirty Little Secret.” Premiere, March 1989.
- Koppes, Clayton R., and Gregory D. Black. “The Second World War in Black and White: How Hollywood Lost the Battle for Racial Progress.” Washington Post, 11 October 1987.
- Oscar Micheaux and the Black Independents*. Moorland-Spingarn Research Center.
- “The Problem with Post-Racism.” New Republic, 5 August 1985.
- Sampson, Henry T. Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1977.
- “Stepin Fetchit Dead at 83; Comic Actor in Over 40 Films.” Variety, 27 November 1985.
- Stewart, Jacqueline. “William Foster: The Dean of the Negro Photoplay.” Oscar Micheaux Society Newsletter (University of Chicago), 9, Spring 2001.

Woll, Allen L., and Randall M. Miller. Ethnic and Racial Images in American Film and Television: Historical Essays and Bibliography. New York and London: Garland, 1987.

Film: Blacks as Portrayed by White Filmmakers

On the basis of his darkness he glowed. (Ralph Ellison)

Perspective

In the wake of World War I, a stream of hope surged through African American culture, but this wave clashed with the depiction of blacks presented in films made by whites. Thousands of black people aspiring to social equality and economic security poured into northern cities from the rural South; they were seeking a fair chance to demonstrate their true talents, and they swore that, given the opportunity, they could soar to new heights and in the process promote the general welfare. To their dismay, these migrants encountered Hollywood movies that mocked their ambitions by casting blacks in roles that simply perpetuated stereotypes formed during the era of slavery.

Alain Locke observed the postwar mood among African Americans. In The New Negro (1925), he described a spirit that was infusing blacks with a strong determination to leave the bottom of society, where slavery and segregation had stranded them, and climb up the social ladder. With regard to popular portrayals of black people, Locke discerned a growing intolerance for traditional depictions of blacks as servile characters such as Uncle Tom and Sambo in Harriet Beecher Stowe's novel Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852). Locke had identified the trend of a new generation, and his insight was verified by the angry reaction of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Urban League to D. W. Griffith's film The Birth of a Nation (1915), which slighted African Americans and supported the Ku Klux Klan.

By the beginning of the Harlem Renaissance, as African Americans sought to rise in society, protests against stereotypical portraits in motion pictures became a common topic of articles in Crisis and Opportunity, two journals that conveyed the perspective of the black community. This outcry, however, failed to stem the tide of unrealistic images of blacks that flowed from white film studios. In fact, the growing demand by blacks for fairness in movies effectively created a backlash: Hollywood habitually featured blacks as flat characters reminiscent of Stowe's verbal sketches of slaves.

Group Show

When it was first published, Uncle Tom's Cabin stirred the country. It was a sincere indictment of slavery, and it was widely credited with inciting the Civil War. Throughout the last half of the nineteenth century, this book inspired a variety of imitators, including novels and plays, that thrilled the general public; and its influence extended into the twentieth century, affecting the motion picture industry. In 1903, Edwin Porter adapted Stowe's novel for the screen, and several cinematic versions of the story arrived in theaters during the era of silent films. Before movies began to talk in 1927, white filmmakers settled on showing five types of blacks, each resembling a figure in Uncle Tom's Cabin: Uncle Tom, Topsy, Eliza, Aunt Chloe, and George Harris. Imitations of these five figures covered the complete range of black characters in white cinema. Like the figures in the book, blacks in mainstream movies evoked, respectively, a shaman, scamp, siren, shrew, and scoundrel. Bogle (1997) described the few black roles as "Toms, coons, mulattoes, mammies, and bucks." Moreover, these characterizations of blacks persisted long after The Jazz Singer (1927) introduced sound, continuing well beyond the stock market crash of 1929 that started the Great Depression.

Birth of a Nation contains the entire array of blacks featured in white productions. The faithful soul who serves the Cameron family to the end has the air of a shaman that distinguishes Uncle Tom in Stowe's novel; the film is full of derelict scamps akin to the pickaninny Topsy, particularly the barefoot blacks in Congress after the Civil War; Lydia Brown, the mulatto, has the allure of a siren and recalls Eliza; Mammy has the shrewish manner of Aunt Chloe; and Silas Lynch and the sinister Gus behave as scoundrels, displaying the defiance of George Harris. Every black figure in Birth of a Nation represents one of the five types.

Birth of a Nation fascinated President Woodrow Wilson, who proclaimed, "It's like writing history with lightning,” but it appalled African Americans. Blacks in Boston rioted after its premiere there. The NAACP tried to have the film banned and picketed showings in New York and Chicago. W. E. B. Du Bois condemned it in Crisis. Across the country, black magazines and newspapers railed against it. A reviewer in the Chicago Defender called it despicable racist propaganda. Despite these protests from the African American community, however, Birth of a Nation remained in demand, and its treatment of black characters continued to find favor in American cinema.

Evidently, the formulaic roles of blacks in feature films satisfied a widespread desire to excuse slavery in early American society. Initially, around 1619, Africans had entered American culture as indentured servants, equal to the average white immigrant and with the right to gain their freedom. Two generations later, to stabilize the workforce, one region after another instituted bondage for blacks—contrary to the emergent social ethos whereby everyone was said to be born for liberty. This development entailed a dehumanization of blacks and a sense that blacks were at their best in service to whites, a concept that persisted into the nineteenth century, with two sides divided over the degree to which whites stood superior to blacks. That concept influenced Stowe. In Uncle Tom’s Cabin, as James Baldwin once noted, she immortalized the most popular images of blacks at that time, placing blacks below whites but above slavery. Her work was appealing enough to impress the motion picture industry; and during the period of the Harlem Renaissance—to repeat—black characters in mainstream movies were variations of her five types, despite strong opposition from African Americans.

Primary Colors

The first “black” star in American cinema was actually white: an actor who painted his face black to play Uncle Tom in Edwin Porter’s movie adaptation (1903) of Stowe’s novel. Such portrayals were enormously popular; moviegoers welcomed a succession of imitators who appeared in silent movies. The next stars were also white: women who enacted fair black belles in dramas such as Octoroon (1911), in which a few drops of black blood make the title character a tragic figure. Not until the jazz age did black actors star in movies made by whites, but by the time the Harlem Renaissance was reaching a downturn, African Americans were in vogue in films, as fretful scoundrels and full-bodied shrews. Paul Robeson became famous in The Emperor Jones (1933); Hattie McDaniel won a Academy Award for her role in Gone with the Wind (1939); and funny scamps, like the black lead in Topsy and Eva (1927), remained in style. Characters such as these appeared more or less frequently from time to time, but at no time did they disappear.

Several white actors wearing burnt cork played Uncle Tom before Sam Lucas, an African American, stepped into the role in 1914, to be followed by James Lowe (1927). Likewise, whites in blackface initially played loyal slaves in films such as The Confederate Spy (1910), For His Master’s Sake (1911), and A Slave’s Devotion (1913). Clarence Muse became the most celebrated authentic black performer of this type after his appearance as Jim in a screen version of Huckleberry Finn (1931). During the early era of silent films, the only other type that achieved the prestige of Uncle Tom was the star-crossed siren evocative of Eliza in Uncle Tom’s Cabin. This spellbinder appeared in The Debt (1912), The Octoroon’s Sacrifice (1912), and In Slavery Days (1913; in this film a white actor in makeup performed the black part). Nina Mae McKinney won renown for this kind of role when she starred as Chick in Hallelujah! (1929).

Another type, the renegade who defies white authority (reminiscent of George Harris in Uncle Tom’s Cabin), took a while to earn applause in movie theaters. The conduct of Silas and Gus in Birth of a Nation was deplorable enough to check interest in their kind. Even the beloved black vaudevillian Bert Williams attracted little attention when—hidden by the minstrels’ blackface—he imitated the notorious toughs in A Natural Born Gambler (1916). The round black shrew became popular long before the rogue. Figures based on Aunt Chloe in Uncle Tom’s Cabin helped make hits of films such as Old Mammy’s Charge (1913) and Coon Town Suffragettes (1914). Louise Beavers represented this type in Imitation of Life (1934) and received rave reviews.

Eventually, though, black scamps started to become prominent in silent films, and thereafter they never faded from motion pictures. This type, similar to Stowe’s figure of Topsy and created for comic relief, originated in Ten Pickaninnies (1904); appeared in Wooing and Wedding of a Coon (1905) and The Masher (1907); and ensured the success of the Rastus Series, including How Rastus Got His Turkey (1910), Rastus in Zululand (1910), and Rastus’s Riotous Ride (1914). Characters in this category are messy and mischievous, tantamount to capricious children. Stepin Fetchit (Lincoln Perry) perfected this role, beginning with the film In Old Kentucky (1927); and by the time he appeared in Judge Priest (1934), his rendition of a scamp had made him a top box-office attraction.

As pictures with sound became prevalent, Hollywood abandoned its habit of assigning black parts to whites in blackface. In The Jazz Singer (1927), the first talkie, Al Jolson played a vaudevillian who sang on-stage with his face painted black, but this was the last major application of the practice. As the Harlem Renaissance ebbed, African Americans were performing most of the black roles in mainstream movies. However, films produced by whites still did not show the spirit of the New Negro heralded by Alain Locke, and African American actors stayed chained to the old stereotypes.

Trompe l'Oeil

Three prominent and popular film projects can serve to illustrate the modest range of parts reserved for blacks in American cinema during the “roaring twenties”: the Our Gang series of comic shorts, started in 1922 by Hal Roach, presented a succession of black scamps; Hearts in Dixie (1929) had a scamp and a shaman in starring roles; and Hallelujah! (also 1929) had a siren opposite a scoundrel and a shrew. Each of these productions broke new ground in motion picture history, but none of the dramatic leads deviated from the old standards.

Our Gang brought the first black child superstar to the screen: a small boy (Allen Clayton Hoskins) who played Farina. Audiences adored him. Surrounded by a motley crew of white children, he seemed to stand equal in status to them; nevertheless, his appearance and attitude called Topsy to mind. Like Topsy, Farina wore a profusion of pigtailed all over his head; and, again like Topsy, he cloaked a penchant for duplicity with a plaintive air of dignity. Therefore, although many fans thought that Farina constituted an improvement in racial representation, he actually reinforced low expectations for blacks—the attitude that sustained Jim Crow laws. After the first child actor outgrew the role, Roach replaced him with two other boys who became known as Stymie and Buckwheat, and they matched Farina in bearing and behavior.

Hearts in Dixie, directed by Paul Sloane, was the first all-black musical. Stepin Fetchit, playing Gummy in this film, resembled an older, bald Farina, and his performance recaptured the buffoonery that Stowe had attributed to Topsy. In the eyes of some critics, Clarence Muse dignified the film by his handling of the role of Nappus, but even this character perpetuated the traits of Uncle Tom. Like Stowe's hero, Nappus is portrayed as devout, deferential, docile, and self-sacrificing. The supporting roles in Hearts in Dixie were split between singing scamps and shrews, consorting with a fledgling siren and scoundrel. Although this film was revolutionary in content, then, it was routine in characterization.

Hallelujah!—a musical written and directed by King Vidor—was filled with blacks breaking into song at the drop of a hat. Overall, it was enthusiastically received, even by W. E. B. Du Bois; critics said that this movie gave black performers a chance to try their wings and that they did take flight in fine form. Nina Mae McKinney, in the role of Chick, won the most acclaim, becoming a screen goddess; but, as noted previously, her role too was a type—McKinney conveyed the allure of Eliza, the mulatto in Uncle Tom's Cabin. Chick turns Zeke, a good boy, into an outlaw and distresses his devout parents, Pappy and Mammy. Essentially, every role in this production approximated a plantation slave as imagined by Stowe; thus Hallelujah! kept racial representation within the bounds of convention.

In brief, with regard to the treatment of blacks in film, the increasing use of African Americans (rather than whites wearing blackface) in black parts was the sole innovation that came out of Hollywood during the 1920s. The characterization of blacks in Hearts in Dixie and Hallelujah! simply extended an established tradition; these two musicals, along with Our Gang, gave only an illusion of progress in racial representation. On the whole, stereotypes of blacks prevailed.

Picture Plane

On 19 February 1919, African Americans lined Fifth Avenue to watch the all-black 369th Infantry Regiment (Fifteenth Infantry), nicknamed the Hell Fighters by their French comrades in World War I, parade into Harlem after returning home from combat. As the marchers crossed 130th Street, the band broke into a popular tune and the crowd became almost frenzied: the uniformed soldiers symbolized African Americans' readiness for full participation in American society. At the end of that year, a black film company captured these soldiers' service to the country in Our Colored Soldiers. White filmmakers ignored their story.

The career of Noble Johnson demonstrates how blacks stayed shackled to stereotypes in mainstream movies against their wishes. Johnson's father was a rancher in Colorado who raised and raced horses and had won the Kentucky Derby in 1902, and Noble Johnson exuded confidence and charm. By chance, his familiarity with horses, plus his fair skin and sharp features, earned him the part of a Native American in a western called The Eagle's Nest. The experience inspired him to join in organizing the Lincoln Motion Picture Company, the second black studio in the United States. Lincoln, with Johnson in the leading role, produced The Realization of a Negro's Ambition (1916), echoing the faith of Booker T. Washington that decency and diligence never go unrecognized. Johnson's performance thrilled audiences; and after he played a complex hero in two additional films released by Lincoln, Universal Pictures offered him a contract. This contract required him to resign from Lincoln, but tight finances forced him to accept it; and Universal—a white studio—then proceeded to squeeze him into bit parts as a servant or savage of African, Asian, or Native American ancestry.

At the same time, though, Oscar Micheaux, an African American, sought to develop movies with black stars playing dynamic heroes. He started his own studio in 1918, and it survived the Great Depression; before going out of business in 1948, he shot more than thirty pictures, such as The Homesteader (1918) and Body and Soul (1925), featuring many complicated black characters. Micheaux was the first of a wave of black filmmakers animated by the spirit of the black community. Like the others, though, he had to settle for a small share of the movie market. Jim Crow regulations confined his work to a few theaters open to blacks. Works by white producers played in far more locations; thus white producers controlled the general impression of blacks conveyed by movies.

Before and behind the cameras, blacks had a low profile in the motion picture industry. Everyone who was apparently rising in stature eventually came up against a low "glass ceiling," crashed, and fell into oblivion. For example, the glory that enveloped Nina Mae McKinney after her appearance in Hallelujah! disappeared in the blink of an eye. After making Hallelujah!, she went abroad for two years with a cabaret act that played at Chez Florence in Paris and the Palladium theater in London; during this time she appeared as a jungle siren in a British picture, Congo Raid (1930), and she came home to New York for its world premiere. Thereafter, she declined into obscurity, although she did star as a crafty charmer in The Devil's Daughter (1939), released by a black studio; and she played a terrible tramp in Pinky (1940), a Hollywood product. She later earned a living performing on the road with her own band; in 1967, barely remembered, she died at age fifty-four.

Given the confidence that prevailed among African Americans in the 1920s—a confidence noted by Alain Locke—one would expect blacks like McKinney, Micheaux, and Johnson to remain in the limelight for a long time. But events of the summer of 1919, which James Weldon Johnson called the "red summer," revealed a staunch impulse to restrict blacks' prestige. Although 1919 had begun with the prideful parade of the 369th Infantry Regiment, the summer brought race riots in two dozen cities, including Washington, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, and Omaha. The turmoil was incited by the activities of the Ku Klux Klan opposing equality for African American citizens. The Klan's racist objectives had evolved from the rationale for black bondage in early American society, which in turn had set the stage for Uncle Tom's Cabin. Throughout the 1920s, its influence persisted, and Hollywood continued to cast blacks as figures from Stowe's novel, lacking in depth and limited in distinction.

Retrospective

At the height of the Harlem Renaissance, the New Negroes hailed by Alain Locke had come to big cities seeking success. Independent films by Oscar Micheaux and other blacks reflected the African American mind, but mainstream movies posed a challenge. Hollywood portrayed black people as five types of flat figures, all of whom were overshadowed by whites. Generally, the motion picture industry preserved a bias provoked by slavery and perpetuated by Uncle Tom's Cabin. It allotted blacks only a very narrow space for achievement and, figuratively speaking, compelled them to sing the blues during the jazz age.

ROLAND L. WILLIAMS JR.

See also Beavers, Louise; Birth of a Nation, The; Crisis, The; Emperor Jones, The; Fetchit, Stepin; Film; Film: Actors; Film: Black Filmmakers; Hallelujah!; Hearts in Dixie; Johnson, Noble; Lincoln Motion Picture Company; Locke, Alain; Lowe, James; McKinney, Nina Mae; Micheaux, Oscar; Muse, Clarence; New Negro,

The; Opportunity; Riots: 2—Red Summer of 1919; Robeson, Paul; Williams, Egbert Austin “Bert”

Further Reading

- Bogle, Donald. Toms, Coons, Mulattos, Mammies, and Bucks. New York: Continuum, 1997.
- Huggins, Nathan. The Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Leab, Daniel J. From Sambo to Superspade. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
- Noble, Peter. The Negro in Film. London: Skelton, 1948.
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Uncle Tom’s Cabin. Boston: John P. Jewett, 1852.

Fine Clothes to the Jew

Langston Hughes’ second volume of poetry, Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), was published at the height of the Harlem Renaissance. It followed his highly successful debut volume, The Weary Blues (1926), and was in turn followed by The Negro Mother and Other Dramatic Recitations (1931). This context is significant because Fine Clothes to the Jew remains Hughes’ most controversial book of poetry, became a transitional work in his canon, and was a classic acknowledgment of his manifesto “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain” (1926).

Fine Clothes to the Jew derives its title from an observation Hughes had made: he noticed that many residents of Harlem pawned their own clothes in neighborhood shops, most of which were owned and operated by Jews. However, this meaning was often misunderstood, and Hughes eventually regretted that he had let the title stand.

It is a courageous volume. Hughes was attempting to broaden his thematic base and to bring something Whitmanesque to the setting of Harlem. In one poem, “Brass Spittoons” a young Negro sings “A bright bowl of brass is beautiful to the Lord” as he polishes a spittoon; the theme of “Ballad of Gin Mary” is evident, as is that of “The New Cabaret Girl.” “Mulatto,” “Prayer,” “Feet o’ Jesus,” and “Song for a Dark Girl” were all very well received, and the blues component in these poems was highly praised. But the critics made little mention of originality, and Fine Clothes to the Jew is decidedly uneven, suffering in comparison with Hughes’s later collections of poetry.

What made Fine Clothes to the Jew controversial was the reaction of some black intellectuals—readers or reviewers—who concluded that it was a sorry return to the dialect tradition and that it overemphasized the negative aspects of Negro life. A review in the Pittsburgh Courier bore the headline “Langston Hughes’s Book of Poems Trash”; a review in the New York Amsterdam News bore the headline “Langston Hughes—The Sewer Dweller.” The Harlem Renaissance promoted racial pride, and those who were perceived as naysayers were quickly confronted. Hughes was no exception. However, he stated that his poetry was an attempt to tell stories of Negroes who were “workers, roustabouts, and singers, and job hunters on Lenox Avenue in New York or Seventh Street in Washington or South Street in Chicago.” Accordingly, Fine Clothes to the Jew contains poems about gambling, love, prostitution, drugs, religion, jealousy, and friendship, among other topics. The common theme is daily life in Harlem.

Hughes was deeply affected by the adverse criticism of Fine Clothes to the Jew, criticism generated primarily by the black press. In his first autobiography, The Big Sea, he says that “the Negro critics did not like it at all. . . . Certainly, I personally knew very few people anywhere who were wholly beautiful and wholly good. . . . [I didn’t] write them protesting letters, nor in any way attempt to defend my book.” Hughes subsequently notes that many of the controversial poems in Fine Clothes to the Jew were later used successfully in Negro schools and colleges. Nevertheless, Hughes mentioned Fine Clothes to the Jew in the collection Anna Bontemps/Langston Hughes Letters 1925–1969 only very briefly, the most notable comment being that the volume was his sole work that was out of print in 1946. In 2002, first editions of Fine Clothes to the Jew sold for between $200 and $1,100.

BRIAN J. BENSON

See also Amsterdam News; Authors: 5—Poets; Hughes, Langston; Literature: 7—Poetry; Pittsburgh Courier

Further Reading

- Berry, Faith. Langston Hughes: Before and Beyond Harlem. Westport, Conn.: Lawrence Hill, 1983.
- Blake, Susan L. “The American Dream and the Legacy of Revolution in the Poetry of Langston Hughes.” Black American Literature Forum, 14, 1980, pp. 100–104.
- Dickenson, Donald. A Bio-Bibliography of Langston Hughes, 2nd ed. New York: Archon, 1972.

- Gates, Henry Louis Jr., and K. A. Appiah. Langston Hughes: Critical Perspectives Past and Present. New York: Armistad, 1993.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1986.
- Rampersad, Arnold. The Life of Langston Hughes, Vol. 1, 1902–1941: I, Too, Sing America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Singh, Amritjit. "Beyond the Mountain: Langston Hughes on Race/Class and Art." Langston Hughes Review, Spring 1987, pp. 37–43.
- Troutman, C. James, ed. Langston Hughes: The Man, His Art, and His Continuing Influence. New York: Garland, 1995.
- Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Fire!!

Fire!! (1926) was a projected periodical, edited by Wallace Thurman; it was intended to appear quarterly, but only one issue was actually produced.

For younger artists, Crisis and Opportunity were crusty establishment publications; these artists' own métier was to debunk the genteel standards (which Thurman called "party-line art") espoused by the "talented tenth" and to position themselves as firebrand agitators for a modern black culture. Their subversive publication Fire!! came out in November 1926; it was inspired by Carl van Vechten's provocative novel Nigger Heaven, which had been published earlier that year and which W. E. B. Du Bois had found "neither truthful nor artistic." Although Fire!! consisted of only its first issue, it was immortalized in the annals of the Harlem Renaissance for having been "Devoted to Younger Negro Artists."

This new publishing venture aimed to be radical, provocative, and available to both the white and the black cultural establishment; and its contributors were expected to take their inspiration from not the bourgeoisie but the proletariat. Thurman, as the editor, had assembled an impressive array of artists and writers who were eager to define a true "Negro aesthetic"; they wanted to produce something genuinely modern and had no intention of splicing high and low art to make some kind of mongrel art. Like the talented tenth, they wanted a pure representation of the Negro experience—a way to "express our dark skinned selves without fear or shame"—and so they looked to the streets, where the worker could be found, as could the seedier side of black life with its illicit gratifications. Therefore, the topics covered in Fire!! would include sex, racism, androgyny, homoeroticism, the "primitive" Negro, prostitution, and interracial relations.

Contributions to Fire!! took the form of stories, essays, poetry, plays, editorials, and artwork. One piece, "Cordelia the Crude," Thurman's story about a sixteen-year-old prostitute, later appeared on Broadway and eventually in theaters in Chicago and Los Angeles. Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, Edward Silvera, Lewis Alexander, Helene Johnson, Waring Cuney, and Arna Bontemps contributed poetry. Arthur Huff Fauset's sociological essay on the intelligentsia was a witty swipe at the pretentious acolytes whom Zora Neale Hurston called "Negrotarians" and "niggerati." Gwendolyn Bennett contributed a story on interracial relations, "Wedding Day." Hurston supplied a play in four scenes called "Color Struck" and a short story called "Sweat," about marital vengeance and regret.

Art came from Aaron Douglas and Richard Bruce Nugent; the latter made a literary contribution as well. The enigmatic cover was by Douglas, and the integrated title and the lean geometric strokes are characteristic of his work; perhaps in no other image from the Harlem Renaissance are the motifs so strikingly pared down. Douglas also supplied incidental art that is unmistakably African in style: three economically drawn figures of a pastor preaching, an artist painting, and a waitress serving. These three vignettes seem satirical, although they make no racial or political declamation except, possibly, as icons of Western materialism. Bruce was considered the enfant terrible of New Negro art (David Levering Lewis has described him as a "self-conscious decadent"), and his recurring themes were homosexuality and androgyny.

At the time, black critics hated Fire!! Even Douglas's artwork did not escape criticism. Rean Graves of the Baltimore Afro-American said: "Aaron Douglas who in spite of himself and the meaningless grotesqueness of his creations, has gained a reputation as an artist, is permitted to spoil these perfectly good pages and a cover with his pen and ink hudge pudge." Nugent's literary and artistic contributions were antithetical to the high culture embraced by the talented tenth and therefore attracted much attention. Referring to Bruce's homoerotic story in Fire!!—"Smoke, Lilies, and Jade"—W. E. B. Du Bois voiced a concern that the "Negro renaissance" was being turned "into decadence." In recent times, Cooke (1984) has described Fire!! as a "quasi-surrealistic organ"; when compared with contemporary establishment publications, it is iconoclastic (particularly in its secularism) and simultaneously ironic and anguished. Lewis (1994) has described it as a “flawed, folk centered masterpiece,” concisely suggesting a distinctive but tentative movement toward exploring black identity within a white hegemony.

In any case, the assertions of “younger” artists such as Thurman, Hurston, Nugent, and Hughes made Fire!! a pivotal moment in the Harlem Renaissance, because Negroes were being called on to reject the paternalism of the talented tenth and seek autonomy. However, autonomy came at a price: Fire!! left Thurman in considerable debt, despite appeals in the first issue for donations. Later, a fire destroyed unsold editions that were being kept in storage. Ultimately, Fire!! is important for its verve rather than for intellectual grandiloquence.

Thurman tried again in November 1928, with Harlem: A Forum of Negro Life, a magazine which was perhaps less subversive and less primitive than Fire!! However, Harlem ran for only two issues.

CATHERINE O'HARA

See also Baltimore Afro-American; Crisis, The; Douglas, Aaron; Harlem; Negrotarians; Nigger Heaven; Niggerati; Nugent, Richard Bruce; Opportunity; Talented Tenth; Thurman, Wallace; other specific writers

Further Reading

Cooke, G. Michael. Afro-American Literature in the Twentieth Century: The Achievement of Intimacy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1984.

De Jongh, James. Vicious Modernism: Black Harlem and The Literary Imagination. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Hughes, Langston. “American Art or Negro Art?” Nation, 123, 18 August 1926.

Lewis, David Levering, ed. The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader. New York: Viking Penguin, 1994.

Thurman, Wallace. “Negro Artists and the Negro.” New Republic, 31 August 1927.

———. Fire!!, 2nd ed. Metuchen, N.J.: Fire, 1982. (Originally published 1926.)

Fire in the Flint, The

Walter White’s novel The Fire in the Flint (1924) caused a stir because of its unflinching exploration of lynching in the American South. White was active in the antilynching crusade and directed the efforts of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to have Congress pass antilynching bills. White also published a nonfiction examination of lynching, Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch (1929).

White’s novel tells the story of Dr. Kenneth Harper, who is clearly intended to stand in sharp contrast to the usual portrayals of victims of lynching as either depraved beasts or agitators seeking to destabilize the social structure. Harper’s father has told him that “only bad Negroes ever get lynched.” The book begins when Harper opens a medical practice in Central City, Georgia, and ends just a few months later with his death at the hands of a mob. Harper has attended Atlanta University, has attended medical school “in the North,” and has served admirably in World War I. He returns from France to his hometown, where he believes he can do good; he assumes, naively, that he will not “have any trouble” with the local racists. Harper at first stays detached from the racial issues of the town, but inevitably he is drawn in—both professionally, because he is called on to save a white woman’s life, and personally, because he falls in love with an activist, Jane Phillips. Jane inspires him to help organize sharecroppers into a collective which would allow them at least a chance of not going deeper into debt with each harvest. (White uses this love story to convey the message that black citizens need to organize themselves politically.) Still, Harper, despite his movement from idealistic indifference to engagement with programs for social change, remains convinced that through hard work and moral living, he can be accepted, if not respected, in the white community. Finally, however, after his sister is raped and his brother commits suicide to avoid being lynched, Harper loses his illusions. Nevertheless, he answers the call to attend his white patient, an act that leads to his own brutal murder.

The melodramatic details of the plot have led many critics to dismiss The Fire in the Flint as propaganda, but the book was widely read and generated many articles debating whether it gave a realistic account of race relations. White, in his autobiography, characterizes the reaction to the book as “gratifyingly prompt and vigorous.” Today, the novel remains provocative, and the struggles Harper faces as a professional trying to succeed in a racist culture continue to offer insights. White suggested that after World War I, southern society became increasingly intolerant as a result of specific political and sociological events—an idea suggesting in turn that the attitudes leading to lynching and to racism in general can be changed if social conditions are changed. White (1948) wrote that although the novel ends with Harper's murder, "one senses that the spirit of revolt against bigotry which he symbolizes will be accelerated rather than diminished by his death."

NEIL BROOKS

See also Antilynching Crusade; White, Walter

Further Reading

Raper, Arthur. The Tragedy of Lynching. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1933.

Tolnay, Stewart, and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence: An Analysis of Southern Lynchings, 1882–1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Waldron, Edward E. Walter White and the Harlem Renaissance. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat, 1978.

White, Walter. Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch. New York: Knopf, 1929.

———. A Man Called White: The Autobiography of Walter White. New York: Viking, 1948.

Fisher, Rudolph

Rudolph Fisher, who would become the chief chronicler of life in Harlem during the period of the Harlem Renaissance, initially gained recognition as a short-story writer while he was still a medical student at Howard University. With encouragement from Alain Locke, Fisher succeeded in placing his first (and most famous) short story, "The City of Refuge," in the February 1925 issue of the prestigious Atlantic Monthly. According to Arna Bontemps, this feat "created something of a sensation" among African American writers because none of them "had been able to break into that magazine" (Tignor 1982). Fisher would publish his work three more times in Atlantic Monthly as well as in other periodicals owned by whites, including McClure's, Story, American Mercury, and the New York Herald Tribune. Of course, he also published work in periodicals owned by blacks, such as Opportunity and Crisis; however, for African Americans at that time, literary success was measured largely in terms of gaining access to mainstream (white) readers. Fisher certainly achieved this, and his success was partly the result of early efforts by Walter White, Carl Van Vechten, and others who recognized his promising talent. In March 1925 Fisher's "The South Lingers On" was included in a special issue of Survey Graphic; also in 1926, Crisis awarded Fisher first place in the Amy Spingarn Prize for fiction (for his "High Yaller"). Fisher's "The City of Refuge" was included in Edward J. O'Brien's Best Short Stories of 1925; and "Miss Cynthia" was included in Best Short Stories: 1934. During Fisher's brief literary career before his death at age thirty-seven, his work also appeared in three other anthologies. He published a total of fifteen short stories, all but one of which are set in Harlem.

Fisher likewise proved himself a gifted novelist, with The Walls of Jericho (1928). Alfred A. Knopf published this debut novel and reportedly contracted with Fisher for two additional ones. Reviews of The Walls of Jericho were generally positive, and several reviewers expressed relief that Fisher had provided a well-proportioned, propaganda-free alternative to the more sensational fare offered up in Carl Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven (1926) and Claude McKay's Home to Harlem (1928). The Walls of Jericho had been inspired by a wager with a friend, who had bet that Fisher could not write a novel effectively uniting Harlem's upper and lower classes. Fisher met the challenge and crafted a work unique among the novels of the period, because other authors predominantly focused on a single class. Fisher's seriocomic novel is also notable for his adroit social satire—a skill that had not so far been revealed in his short fiction. Fisher's satire, like his humor, succeeds in part because it is democratic, taking aim at blacks and whites alike as well as at all levels of society; and it differs noticeably from the more caustic, condemnatory, cynical satire of George S. Schuyler and Wallace Thurman.

In 1932 Covici-Friede published Fisher's second novel, The Conjure-Man Dies: A Mystery Tale of Dark Harlem. Reviews were generally encouraging, although this novel did not arouse the same enthusiasm as The Walls of Jericho. Fisher had been preceded in detective fiction by the African American serial novelists J. E. Bruce and Pauline Hopkins; however, The Conjure-Man Dies remains a watershed as the first detective novel by an African American author to be set in an all-black environment and to have an all-black cast of characters. Although of signal importance today, this accomplishment remained uncelebrated in Fisher's lifetime and for decades thereafter. Nevertheless, the plot was resurrected for a highly popular stage production by the Works Progress Administration (WPA) at the Lafayette Theater in Harlem in 1936. (Critics are divided regarding how much Fisher was involved in writing the stage adaptation.) Fisher intended to write at least two more novels with the same pair of detectives—Dart and Archer—but had only enough time to produce a follow-up short story, “John Archer’s Nose,” before he died.

For the better part of the twentieth century, literary critics classified Fisher as a talented also-ran of the Harlem Renaissance: a writer of merit, but one whose achievements were limited and were worthy of only limited discussion. Some critics considered his short fiction to be his best work, and he received consistent praise for his ability as a humorist and satirist as well as for his objective realism and general craftsmanship. However, The Walls of Jericho received less attention over the years, and The Conjure-Man Dies rarely elicited any critical response at all. The 1980s and 1990s marked a turning point in studies of Fisher: the short fiction was collected and published for the first time in 1987; both of his novels were reprinted in paperback for the first time in the 1990s; and two new generations of critics brought a newfound enthusiasm to bear on Fisher’s work, particularly the detective fiction. The growth in critical attention has been remarkable. Significant work on Fisher was done in the 1980s by John McCluskey Jr., Margaret Perry, Leonard J. Deutsch, and Eleanor Q. Tignor. Somewhat newer critics, such as Stephen F. Soitos, Adrienne Johnson Gosselin, and Maria Balshaw, have considered the complexities of Fisher’s multifaceted representation of Harlem during the 1920s and 1930s, as well as his contribution to African American literature both during and after the Harlem Renaissance.

Biography

Rudolph John Chauncey Fisher was born on 9 May 1897, in Washington, D.C. He studied at public schools in Providence, Rhode Island; Brown University in Providence (A.B., 1919; A.M., 1920); Howard University in Washington, D.C. (M.D., 1924); Freedmen’s Hospital in Washington, D.C. (1924–1925); and Columbia University (1925–1927). He was a lecturer at Howard University in 1920–1924; began a private medical practice in 1927; was a roentgenologist at Mount Sinai and Montefiore hospitals in New York City in 1927; was acting superintendent at International Hospital in New York City in 1929–1932; was an x-ray technician for New York City Health Department in 1930–1934; was a first lieutenant in the medical corps of the New York National Guard, 369th Infantry, in 1931–1934; and was a book reviewer for the New York Herald Tribune in 1931–1932. His awards included a National Research Council Fellowship in 1925 and the Amy Spingarn Prize in 1927. Fisher was a member of the North Harlem Medical Association in 1927–1930, the Harlem Health Center (advisory board) in 1930–1933, the Manhattan Medical Society in 1930–1934, and the Queens Clinical Society in 1932–1934. He died in New York City on 26 December 1934.

CRAIG GABLE

See also American Mercury; Conjure-Man Dies, The; Crisis, The; Locke, Alain; Opportunity; Survey Graphic; Van Vechten, Carl; Walls of Jericho, The; White, Walter

Selected Works

“The Caucasian Storms Harlem.” American Mercury, August 1927. (Reprinted in The Portable Harlem Renaissance Reader, ed. David Levering Lewis. New York: Penguin, 1994.)

The Walls of Jericho. 1928.

The Conjure-Man Dies: A Mystery Tale of Dark Harlem. 1932.

The City of Refuge: The Collected Stories of Rudolph Fisher, ed. John McCluskey Jr. 1987.

The Short Fiction of Rudolph Fisher, ed. Margaret Perry. 1987.

Joy and Pain. 1996. (Collected stories.)

Further Reading

Balshaw, Maria. “Space, Race, and Identity.” In Looking for Harlem: Urban Aesthetics in African-American Literature. London: Pluto, 2000.

Chander, Harish. “Rudolph Fisher (1897–1934).” In African American Authors, 1745–1945: A Bio-Bibliographical Critical Sourcebook, ed. Emmanuel S. Nelson. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000.

Davis, Arthur P. “Rudolph Fisher.” In From the Dark Tower: Afro-American Writers 1900 to 1960. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1974.

Deutsch, Leonard J. “Rudolph Fisher’s Unpublished Manuscripts: Description and Commentary.” Obsidian, 6(1–2), 1980.

- Gable, Craig. "Rudolph Fisher: An Updated Selected Bibliography." Bulletin of Bibliography, 57(1), 2000.
- McCluskey, John Jr. "Introduction." In The City of Refuge: The Collected Stories of Rudolph Fisher. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987.
- Perry, Margaret. "The Brief Life and Art of Rudolph Fisher." In The Short Fiction of Rudolph Fisher. New York: Greenwood, 1987.
- Sinnette, Calvin H. "Rudolph Fisher: Harlem Renaissance Physician-Writer." Pharos, 53(2), 1990.
- Soitos, Stephen F. "Detective of the Harlem Renaissance: Rudolph Fisher." In The Blues Detective: A Study of African American Detective Fiction. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.
- Tignor, Eleanor Q. "Rudolph Fisher: Harlem Novelist." Langston Hughes Review, 1(2), 1982.
- . "Rudolph Fisher." In Afro-American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, ed. Trudier Harris. Detroit, Mich.: Gale, 1987.
- Tolson, Melvin B. "Rudolph Fisher." In The Harlem Group of Negro Writers. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2000.

580 Saint Nicholas Avenue

Ethel Ray Nance, Regina Anderson (Regina M. Anderson Andrews), and Louella Tucker shared a fifth-floor apartment—sometimes called "Dream Haven"—in a stylish six-story building at 580 Saint Nicholas Avenue in Harlem, at the corner of 139th Street, near City College of New York. This apartment building, where Ethel Waters also lived, began welcoming black residents at the same time as nearby buildings on Saint Nicholas Avenue became home to W. E. B. Du Bois and to Saint James Presbyterian Church. Nance worked for Charles S. Johnson and Opportunity magazine; Anderson was a librarian at the 135th Street branch of the New York Public Library; and both women extended the work of these two important organizations to "580," as part of their commitment to racial uplift and women's independence and achievement. They brought home books to review; Anderson searched for potential programs to bring to the library, where readings and discussion groups were held; and because the apartment was within walking distance of the 135th Street library and the popular 135th Street YMCA, it became a place of rest and relaxation for people who had been attending events there and at other nearby locations. At "580," Nance hosted an evening meeting to discuss the format of the Survey Graphic issue on Harlem, introducing her own collection of Aaron Douglas's art to Charles Johnson, Winold Reiss, and the editor, Paul Kellogg; this was a factor in making Douglas the visual artist of choice during the Harlem Renaissance.

In fact, 580—which became so popular that cab-drivers could identify it just by that number—was central to virtually everything and everyone associated with the Harlem Renaissance. Countee Cullen would bring new poems there to read, and the women at 580 took him to his first cabaret. Eric Walrond loved to come to relate his downtown exploits. Gwendolyn Bennett was a frequent visitor. Carl Van Vechten, on his first visit, brought both a bottle of wine and Jean Toomer. Aaron Douglas, penniless and moving from Kansas to New York at Nance's urging, slept on the sofa at 580 until he found work and his own home. Zora Neale Hurston, who had also been impoverished, relinquished the sofa when a change of fortune made her Fannie Hurst's live-in secretary. At 580, W. E. B. Du Bois, Charles S. Johnson, James Weldon Johnson, and Jessie Fauset shared ideas and dreams with the younger artists whose work inspired Opportunity and Crisis to run literary contests. Following the first Opportunity awards program in 1925, many of the attendees assembled at 580, and a historic group photo that included Langston Hughes, Charles S. Johnson, E. Franklin Frazier, Rudolph Fisher, and Hubert Delany was taken on the roof.

Although 580 had an enduring impact, it was short-lived, lasting for less than two years before Nance returned home to Duluth, Minnesota, to take care of her ailing mother in late 1925 and Anderson married in 1926. A fictional relationship between two characters in Van Vechten's Nigger Heaven—Mary and Olive—was modeled on the supportive friendship between Nance and Anderson. Their sense of uplift found expression in numerous individual and group projects after the Harlem Renaissance: one of the most notable was Black New Yorkers, a project initiated by Anderson with research assistance from Nance. In 2000, their text inspired the book Black New Yorkers and an accompanying exhibition at Harlem's Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture.

ONITA ESTES-HICKS

See also Anderson, Regina M.; Douglas, Aaron; Johnson, Charles Sprugeon; Kellogg, Paul U.; Nance, Ethel Ray;

135th Street Library; Opportunity; Reiss, Winold; Survey Graphic; specific artists, writers, and others

Further Reading

- Bontemps, Arna. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.
- Huggins, Nathan Irvin. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Hull, Gloria. Color, Sex, and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Kirschke, Amy Helen. Aaron Douglas: Art, Race, and the Harlem Renaissance. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.
- Lewis, David Levering. When Harlem Was in Vogue. New York: Knopf, 1981. (See also Penguin ed., 1997.)
- . W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century, 1919–1963. New York: Holt, 2000.
- Shockley, Ann Allen. Interview with Ethel Ray Nance, 18 November 1970.
- Smith, Jessie Carney. "Ethel Nance"; "Regina Anderson." In Notable Black American Women. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1992.
- Taylor, David Vassar. Interview with Ethel Nance. 15 May 1974. (Transcript.)
- Ulansky, Gene. "A Quiet Storm." Excel, Fall 1989, pp. 40–42.
- Van Vechten, Carl. Nigger Heaven. New York, Urbana, and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2000.
- Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance, Hub of American Culture, 1920–1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.
- Wntz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

Fool's Errand

Fool's Errand, a play by Eulalie Spence (1894–1981), was first presented by the Krigwa Players Little Negro Theater, as part of its second production season in April 1927. Spence, a high school teacher who became an integral part of the "little theater" movement in Harlem, had been born in Nevis, West Indies, and had joined the Krigwa Players soon after this theater company was founded by W. E. B. Du Bois in 1925. She served the Krigwa Players in several capacities, as a performer, technician, and playwright.

Fool's Errand was a departure for Spence: her one-act plays usually explored some facet of contemporary urban life, but this was a folk comedy-drama set in a cabin in an "unprogressive Negro settlement" somewhere in the rural South. The cabin is occupied by Doug; his wife, Mom; and their teenage daughter, Maza. Mom has been called away to a temporary live-in job as a domestic, and the cabin has been tended by Aunt Cassie. When Aunt Cassie discovers some hidden baby clothes, she assumes the worst and calls in the church council to confront Maza and identify the father of her illegitimate child. Freddie and Jud, Maza's two suitors, are to be tricked into attending the council meeting; arriving too soon, Maza and Jud are sent on a trumped-up "fool's errand" until the council is ready. When the inquisition finally begins, Maza protests her innocence. Before a shotgun wedding can be arranged, Mom returns and reveals that it is she who is pregnant; nonplussed by having a second child so many years after the first, she hid the baby clothes she had made until she could tell her family. The real fool's errand has been performed by the church council, prodded by Aunt Cassie's snooping.

Du Bois selected Fool's Errand as the Krigwa Players' entry in the Fifth Annual International Little Theatre Tournament, sponsored by the New York Drama League. This was the Krigwa Players' first competition; and the Krigwa company was also the first entry by an African American troupe with an African American playwright. Spence took over as the play's director, took on the responsibility of preparing for the tournament, and led the cast in restoring for use in the tournament a discarded set her sister had found in Greenwich Village. During the tournament, which lasted from 2 to 7 May 1927, the Krigwa Players, competing against sixteen other groups, gave three performances at Broadway's Frolic Theater. Although the Krigwa Players did not win the David Belasco Trophy, they were awarded $200 for presenting one of the best unpublished plays. A short time later, Fool's Errand was published by Samuel French—another first for an African American playwright. During the contest, Spence had also been selected for second prize and a shared third prize in the playwriting competition sponsored by the Urban League's journal, Opportunity, for her plays The Hunch and The Starter. In 1926, she had taken second place in the Krigwa playwriting contest, supported by Crisis (the journal of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), for another one-act work, Foreign Mail.

Ironically, the fine showing in the tournament by Spence and the Krigwa Players, rather than strengthening the company, led to its demise. Du Bois refused to share the cash award with Spence or the cast, stating that the prize money was needed to cover the company's expenses. Many company members left, and Du Bois withdrew, taking with him the copyrighted name Krigwa.

FREDA SCOTT GILES

See also Crisis, The: Literary Prizes; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Krigwa Players; Little Theater Tournament; Opportunity Literary Contests

Further Reading

Brown-Guillory, Elizabeth, ed. Wines in the Wilderness: Plays by African American Women from the Harlem Renaissance to the Present. New York: Praeger, 1990.

Burton, Jennifer, ed. Zora Neale Hurston, Eulalie Spence, Marita Bonner, and Others: The Prize Plays and Other One-acts Published in Periodicals. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Hatch, James V., and Ted Shine, eds. Black Theatre U.S.A.: Plays by African Americans, 1847 to Today. New York: Free Press, 1996.

Locke, Alain, ed. Plays of Negro Life: A Source Book of Native American Drama. Westport, Conn.: Negro Universities Press, 1970. (Reprint.)

Perkins, Kathy, ed. Black Female Playwrights: An Anthology of Plays before 1950. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989.

Ford, Arnold Josiah

Arnold Ford's first career once he came to the United States in 1912 was as a musician. He performed jazz as a member of Harlem's Clef Club and was bandmaster for the New Amsterdam Musical Association. In 1917 he became musical director and choirmaster of Liberty Hall, the Harlem center of Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). Ford produced the group's Universal Ethiopian Hymnal, writing several of the songs himself. He was a cowriter of UNIA's anthem, "Ethiopia, Land of Our Fathers." The hymns Ford composed drew on Christian, Jewish, Muslim, and African traditions and celebrated a future African redemption. UNIA was one of many groups that found parallels between the Old Testament stories of the Hebrews escaping from captivity in Egypt and the emancipation of American slaves.

Building on these connections, it was a relatively small step to the establishment of a new religion borrowing elements of Judaism. With a partner, Rabbi Wentworth Arthur Matthew, Ford founded the Black Jews of Harlem, recruiting members from among Garvey's followers. Members called themselves Ethiopian Hebrews or Hebrew Israelites, and they believed that the ancient Hebrews were black. White Jews, Ford believed, were offshoots of the original Hebrews, who had adopted their religion from Africans with whom they came into contact.

In 1923, Ford broke with UNIA; and in 1924 he established Beth Bnai Abraham (House, or Congregation, of the Sons of Abraham) in Harlem. Like Ford, many members of the congregation were from the West Indies. Ford was fluent in Hebrew and in Yiddish, had studied the Torah and the Talmud, and had made contacts with liberal white Jews who answered his questions about their faith. Calling himself Rabbi Ford, he led the congregation, set up an Ethiopian-Hebrew school, and worked to establish a black Jewish homeland in Ethiopia. Ford used his influence to found the Progressive Corporation, a mostly secular organization of black businessmen; and the Aurieth Club, a group of black professionals who supported the idea of a black Jewish Zion.

In 1930, Ford traveled to Ethiopia to witness the coronation of Haile Selassie. Over the next few years he worked to accumulate enough land in Ethiopia for what he hoped would be a wave of immigrants, and in fact some sixty followers joined him there in 1931 and 1932. Little is known about the few remaining years of his life. Some have suggested that Ford reappeared in Detroit in 1930, and that as Wallace Fard he established the Nation of Islam, but most scholars find the theory unsupportable and believe he died in Ethiopia in 1935.

Biography

Arnold Josiah Ford was born in Barbados, West Indies, c. 1890 and was educated in public schools there. He served as a music teacher for the British navy. He emigrated to Harlem in 1912; was a jazz musician, 1912–1920; was musical director of UNIA, 1917–1923; and founded and led Beth Bnai Abraham, 1923–1930. Ford died in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in September 1935.

CYNTHIA BILY

See also Clef Club; Universal Negro Improvement Association

Further Reading

Berger, Graenum. Black Jews in America. New York: Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York, 1978.

Chireau, Yvonne. "Black Culture and Black Zion: African American Religious Encounters with Judaism, 1790–1930—An Overview." In Black Zion: African American Encounters with Judaism, eds. Yvonne Chireau and Nathaniel Deutsch. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

King, Kenneth. "Some Notes on Arnold J. Ford and New World Black Attitudes to Ethiopia." In Black Apostles: Afro-American Clergy Confront the Twentieth Century, eds. Randall K. Burkett and Richard Newman. New York: G. K. Hall, 1978.

Landes, Ruth. "The Negro Jews of Harlem." Jewish Journal of Sociology, 9, 1967.

Landing, James E. Black Judaism: Story of an American Movement. Durham, N.C.: Carolina Academic Press, 2002.

Scott, William. "Rabbi Arnold Ford's Back-to-Ethiopia Movement: A Study of Black Emigration, 1930–1935." Pan African Journal, 8(2), Summer 1975.

Ford, James William

James William Ford was a preeminent African American member of the Communist Party of the United States (CPUSA) and—as a vice-presidential candidate in the election of 1932—the first African American on a national ballot.

Ford was born in Alabama. After graduating from Fisk University, he moved to Chicago, where he worked as a parcel post dispatcher with the U.S. Post Office and joined the Chicago Postal Workers Union. His experiences in Chicago during the 1920s largely shaped his commitment to the American trade union movement. His trade unionism became more militant in reaction to Jim Crow employment policies and tyrannical union officials, and his reputation as a trade unionist grew steadily. He was an early supporter of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and formed a lasting friendship with its founder, A. Philip Randolph. Ford joined the American Negro Labor Congress (ANLC) in 1925 and the Trade Union Educational League in 1926; he then joined CPUSA and rose rapidly through its ranks, serving as an elected delegate of the committee meeting of the Communist International (Comintern) in 1927 and 1928. His increasing radicalism caused problems with his job as a postal worker, and he was fired in 1927, reportedly having been framed.

Ford believed that victory against the ravages of capitalism could be achieved through the "unity of the Negro people and the white workers." In 1927, he was an elected delegate of the Trade Union Educational League to the International Labor Union's Fourth World Congress in Moscow. At this congress, he was elected to its executive committee. A year later, Ford returned to Moscow for the Sixth World Congress of the Comintern and traveled throughout the Soviet Union to observe how national minorities fared there. After returning to the United States, he relocated from Chicago to New York City and became part of Harlem's political scene. In 1929 he was arrested for protesting against the United States' military actions in Haiti; also in 1928, as a member of the American delegation to the Second World Congress of the League Against Imperialism in Frankfurt, Germany, he demanded the unconditional liberation of Ethiopia. Ford devoted much time and energy to forging solidarity between oppressed people in the United States and worldwide in a struggle against capitalism and imperialism; he wanted to merge Garveyite pan-Africanism and Communism, and he was instrumental in organizing the First International Conference of Negro Workers in Hamburg, Germany, in 1930. In 1931, at the League of Nations' conference on African children, he spoke against European colonial policy. In 1932, in the United States, he participated in the Bonus Army March, a protest by veterans of World War I who were seeking federal relief, and was again arrested.

During the 1930s, Ford was a major force within CPUSA. In 1932 he was nominated to run for vice-president on the Communist Party ticket alongside William Z. Foster. In 1933, Ford became the head of CPUSA's Harlem branch. He was later a member of the Political Committee, New York State Committee, and National Committee of CPUSA; and he was influential in moving CPUSA toward a "united front" with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the Urban League, the National Negro Congress, and other civil rights organizations—a significant revision of communist policy toward race-based movements. By 1937, he was asserting that racial injustice and the class struggle could be dealt with in tandem because African Americans sought three goals: a decent and secure livelihood; human rights; and an equal, honorable, and respectable status in society. He was again nominated for vice president in 1936 and 1940. In 1938, Ford was the party's candidate for the U.S. Senate from New York.

During World War II, Ford still led the Harlem section of CPUSA, although he had less power nationally. By the 1950s, during the cold war, he was executive director of the National Committee to Defend Negro Leadership, a group organized to assist African American party members who were targeted by federal laws against presumed communists and subversives. He remained an active member of CPUSA until his death.

Biography

James William Ford was born in Pratt City, Alabama, on 22 December 1893, the son of Lyman and Nancy Reynolds Foursche. (The family's surname was changed to Ford when a racist policeman questioned the father and could not spell or pronounce Foursche.) Ford completed high school in 1913 and then went to Fisk University, where he became a campus leader as a scholar and an athlete. He joined the army in 1917, during World War I, before graduating from Fisk, but he returned there in 1919 after his honorable discharge and received a B.A. He then moved to Chicago, where he worked for the post office and became a trade unionist; he also joined the Communist Party. In 1927 his radicalism led to his dismissal from the post office. He attended labor congresses in Moscow and traveled in the Soviet Union. Around 1928 he relocated from Chicago to New York City and entered the political scene in Harlem. He became head of the CPUSA's Harlem Branch in 1933. In 1932, 1936, and 1940 he ran for vice-president on the Communist Party ticket; in 1938 he ran for the Senate as the Communist Party's candidate from New York. Ford died on 21 June 1957.

JUAN FLOYD-THOMAS

See also American Negro Labor Congress; Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Communist Party; Garveyism; Pan-Africanism; Randolph, A. Philip

Further Reading

- Cunard, Nancy. Negro: An Anthology. London: Wishart, 1934.
- Davis, Benjamin J. Jr. Communist Candidate for Vice-President of the United States, James W. Ford, What He Is and What He Stands For. New York: Workers Library, 1936.
- Ford, James W. Anti-Semitism and the Struggle for Democracy. New York: National Council of Jewish Communists, n.d. (Possibly 1939.)
- . The Communists and the Struggle for Negro Liberation: Their Position on Problems of Africa, of the West Indies, of War, of Ethiopian Independence, of the Struggle for Peace. New York: Harlem Division of the Communist Party, n.d. (Possibly 1936.)
- . Imperialism Destroys the People of Africa. New York: Harlem Section of the Communist Party, n.d. (Possibly 1930s.)
- . The Negro and the Democratic Front. New York: International, n.d. (c. 1938.)
- . The Negro People and the New World Situation. New York: Workers Library, 1941.
- . The Negroes in a Soviet America. New York: Workers Library, 1935.
- . The War and the Negro People. New York: Workers Library, 1942.
- . Win Progress for Harlem. New York: Harlem Division of the Communist Party, 1939.
- Ford, James W., Benjamin J. Davis Jr., William L. Patterson, and Earl Browder. Communists in the Struggle for Negro Rights. New York: New Century, 1945.
- Ford, James W., and Harry Gannes. War in Africa: Italian Fascism Prepares to Enslave Ethiopia. New York: Workers Library, 1935.
- "James W. Ford: A Tribute." Political Affairs, August 1957, pp. 14–29.
- Kornweibel, Theodore Jr. Seeing Red: Federal Campaigns against Black Militancy, 1919–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- . "Investigate Everything": Federal Efforts to Compel Black Loyalty during World War I. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002.

Record, Wilson. The Negro and the Communist Party. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1951.

Forsyne, Ida

Although Langston Hughes named Ida Forsyne as one of the twelve best dancers of all time, she never achieved as much commercial or critical success in the United States as she did in Europe.

By age ten, Forsyne was dancing and singing for small sums of money at candy stores and house-rent parties, and she cakewalked for twenty-five cents a day at the Chicago World's Fair. She broke into professional theater when she joined Sissieretta Jones's Black Patti's Troubadours, a show in which she sang "You're Just a Little Nigger but You're Mine All Mine" while pushing a baby carriage across the stage. After the tour, she appeared in modified minstrel shows in Manhattan, Coney Island, and Atlantic City and had a solo act in the first interracial musical, Will Marion Cook's The Southerners. Forsyne went abroad with the Tennessee Students to perform at the Palace Theater in London, billed as "Topsy, the Famous Negro Dancer," a stock figure from minstrelsy based on the character in Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin. The tiny, exuberant Forsyne enthralled audiences and critics in London with her wild dance numbers. She continued to appear in major venues, such as the Moulin Rouge in Paris, where she began performing a dance routine in a potato sack, occasionally with a chorus of ballet dancers in blackface. By 1911, Forsyne's success led her to Moscow, where her routines included cakewalking as well as Russian dance steps. According to Stearns and Stearns (1994), Forsyne inspired a modest trend of Russian dancing on the vaudeville stage in the United States.

Forsyne's success in Europe lasted for nine years but was cut short by World War I. In 1914, she returned to the United States, where she faced difficulty getting jobs in theater as a result of the shifting aesthetic and social values ushered in by the Harlem Renaissance. The dance routines that had made her famous throughout Europe were considered stereotypical by most black New York audiences, whose interest had turned to jazz dancing. Of her brief appearance at the Lincoln Theater in Harlem, she said, "Lincoln audiences were terrible and always booed anything artistic. All they wanted was bumps and Shake dancing" (quoted in Stearns and Stearns, 254).

Also, she was considered too dark for the Harlem nightclub circuit, which tended to feature light-skinned women. She explained: "I couldn't get a job because I was black, and my own people discriminated against me" (Stearns and Stearns, 256). Forsyne did appear in the musical comedy Darkydom (1914) at the Lafayette Theater in Harlem.

By the early 1920s, Forsyne's career had stalled, although she toured with Sophie Tucker and later with Bessie Smith on the Theater Owners' Booking Association (TOBA) circuit. She also was cast in several minor film roles. In 1951, she assisted Ruthanna Boris with the choreography for New York City Ballet's "The Cakewalk." Little is known about her life after her theatrical career, except that for a brief time she worked as an elevator operator in a hotel in upstate New York. Soon thereafter, she lived at the Concord Baptist Nursing Home in Brooklyn, where she died in 1983.

Biography

Ida Forsyne (also known as Ida Forcen and Ida Forsyne Hubbard) was born in 1883 in Chicago. She toured with Black Patti's Troubadours, 1898–1902; performed in Europe, 1905–1910; performed in Russia, 1911–1914; toured with Sophie Tucker, 1920–1922; toured with Mamie Smith, 1924; and toured with Bessie Smith, 1927. Forsyne died in Brooklyn, New York, on 19 August 1983.

PAUL SCOLIERI

See also Cook, Will Marion; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Mitchell, Abbie; Smith, Bessie; Smith, Mamie; Theater Owners' Booking Association

Selected Stage Credits

Smart Set. 1902. (Road show produced by Gus Hill.)
The Southerners. 1904. (Musical review produced by Will Marion Cook at the New York Roof Garden.)
Abbie Mitchell and Her Coloured Students. 1906. (Musical review at the Palace Theater, London.)
Darkydom. 1914. (Musical comedy at the Lafayette Theater, New York.)

Selected Films

The Emperor Jones. 1933. (United Artists.)
The Green Pastures. 1936. (Warner Brothers.)

Further Reading

- Grimes, Sara. Backwater Blues: In Search of Bessie Smith. Amherst, Mass.: Rose Island, 2001.
- Hughes, Langston. Black Magic: A Pictorial History of the African-American in the Performing Arts. New York: Da Capo Paperback, 1990. (Originally published Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1967.)
- Ida Forsythe Oral History Tapes, Hatch-Billops Collection, New York.
- Stearns, Marshall, and Jean Stearns. Jazz Dance: The Story of American Vernacular Dance. New York: Da Capo, 1994.
- Tanner, Jo A. Dusky Maidens: The Odyssey of the Early Black Dramatic Actress. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1992, p. 171.

Forsythe, Harold Bruce

Harold Bruce Forsythe was a prolific composer and writer, but except for some manuscript songs in the European tradition, now at the Huntington Library, his music—which included symphonic poems and an opera, among other works—is lost; and Harry Hay reported settings of spirituals with a strong blues character that as of the present writing remained unlocated. Forsythe's formal music training was largely in the European romantic tradition. On his own, however, he developed a strong interest in African and African American music as well as history, art, religion, and magic. More of Forsythe's writing than his music survives, also in manuscript form. A long manuscript novel, "Masks" (also "Frailest Leaves"), is partly autobiographical and probably descriptive of the New Negro movement in Los Angeles.

Forsythe found in the composer William Grant Still a compelling model who was exploring ways to use the European-American concert tradition in music to express aspects of African American culture. His writing on Still's music, which offers significant insights, may be the most important part of his output. Still and Forsythe probably met in New York City; they developed a professional friendship important to both during 1929–1930, while Still was working temporarily in Los Angeles. Forsythe's "A Study in Contradictions," the first serious critical essay on Still's music and the first to recognize the subtleties of Still's fusion of styles, came in 1930. Soon afterward, Forsythe provided a long essay, "The Rising Sun," intended as an introduction for Still's ballet Sahdji. Later, Forsythe wrote the libretto to Still's first opera, Blue Steel, and a scenario for a ballet, The Sorcerer. Still and Forsythe's friendship ended abruptly in 1935, however.

A combination of ill health, early deafness, and cultural isolation prevented Forsythe from pursuing the path he had laid out for himself of discovering, exploring, and explicating the African aspects of his heritage in both music and words.

Biography

Harold Forsythe went to Los Angeles with his parents in 1913 and remained there except for one period of study in New York City. He studied piano with Nada McCullough and William T. Wilkins at the Wilkins Conservatory concurrently with his high school education. He also studied music composition privately with Charles E. Pemberton, a faculty member at the University of Southern California. His introduction to literature and to the New Negro movement came through Wallace Thurman, who boarded with Forsythe's family while attending the University of Southern California in 1922. Forsythe graduated from Manual Arts High School, where he was recognized as a gifted pianist and composer, in 1926. The following fall, he enrolled at the Juilliard School of Music in New York, where he studied briefly with Rubin Goldmark. At Juilliard, Forsythe became aware of his growing deafness, which was probably why he withdrew before completing a full year of study. Returning to Los Angeles, he supported himself through odd jobs and a stint as a pianist on an offshore gambling ship during Prohibition. Advancing deafness brought his career as a musician to a halt by the late 1930s. He retrained himself as a nurseryman and worked at that occupation for more than two decades. He died in poverty. He had married Sara Turner, a former Cotton Club showgirl, in 1945; at the time of this writing, one of his two sons, Harold Sumner Forsythe, was a professor of history at Rancho Santiago College.

CATHERINE PARSONS SMITH

See also Still, William Grant; Thurman, Wallace

Further Reading

- Forsythe, Harold Bruce. Papers. Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.

Smith, Catherine Parsons. "An Unknown 'New Negro.'" In William Grant Still: A Study in Contradictions. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2000, pp. 94–113. (See also Forsythe, Harold Bruce. "William Grant Still: A Study in Contradictions," pp. 274–303.)

Fortune, Timothy Thomas

Timothy (T.) Thomas Fortune—the most important black journalist of his time—founded the newspaper New York Age in order to speak out against racism and injustice in the United States, particularly in the South.

Fortune was born a slave in 1856; during Reconstruction he worked as a page in the Florida legislature. He began his career in journalism as a compositor for the Jacksonville Daily Union. During the late nineteenth century, he worked at several newspapers and magazines (including People's Advocate, Weekly Witness, and Rumor) and started the Globe. He came to New York around 1880 and became a leading proponent of black rights in the 1880s and 1890s. By the time of the Globe's demise in 1883–1884, Fortune had a considerable reputation as a fearless editor. In 1884 he was the sole owner, editor, and chief printer of Freeman, speaking out against racism in the South. (Some white publishers and editors considered Freeman dangerous—evidence that people read it and took it very seriously.) In 1885 Fortune published a book, Black and White: Land, Labor, and Politics in the South, in which he focused on economic factors, discussing working conditions under capitalism and criticizing land grants to railroads. In 1887 he organized the National Afro-American League, a civil rights group. Throughout the 1880s and 1890s, he advocated mixed marriages, used the courts to fight racial discrimination, supported Ida B. Wells's protest against lynching, and urged that blacks be called Afro-Americans.

Fortune developed a lifelong friendship with Booker T. Washington, with whom—through the medium of New York Age—he would be very influential. Although the two men differed in temperament and disagreed over Washington's political philosophy of accommodation, Fortune supported Washington's programs in editorials in New York Age; and this support caused some of Washington's critics to accuse Fortune of expediency. (Those critics included W. E. B. Du Bois; J. Max Barber, publisher of Voice of the Negro in Atlanta; and William Monroe Trotter, editor of the Boston Guardian.)

Fortune used New York Age to fight against the disenfranchisement of African Americans and to urge them to become independent voters; he believed that political independence would strengthen their negotiating position. By nineteenth-century standards, Fortune's language was strikingly militant, caustic, and jolting, and it unsettled some readers, especially white southerners. But the editor of the Cincinnati Afro-American stated that Fortune was "without peer or superior as a colored journalist."

In 1904, Fortune, who was facing a personal financial crisis, sold New York Age to Frederick Randolph Moore but maintained his editorship. By then, Fortune was also doing work for other publications, including Colored American Magazine, which was published in Boston; and the Amsterdam News, which was published in New York. In 1914 Fortune moved to Washington, D.C., where he became publisher and editor of the Washington Sun. He continued to exhort black Americans to address their own political and economic conditions and to fight for equal rights and opportunities.

Fortune's work as an editor attracted the attention of Marcus Garvey, and Fortune served as the editor of Garvey's Negro World from 1923 until his death in 1928. However, there is no evidence that Fortune joined Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA).

Fortune's career at New York Age and Negro World coincided with the Harlem Renaissance; during this period his efforts to promote change took on a new urgency. Fortune helped articulate blacks' demands for equality and renewed racial pride in a new urban environment.

Biography

Timothy (T.) Thomas Fortune was born a slave in Marianna, Florida, on 3 October 1856; his father, who was of mixed blood, was a shoemaker, tanner, and political leader. As a child during the Civil War, Fortune was taught by Union soldiers who were stationed in Marianna; he retained a lifelong interest in learning. He served as a page in the senate in Tallahassee during Reconstruction and received an appointment to West Point, which he could not accept because of his race. In the 1880s, he attended Stanton Institute, a school established by the Freedman's Bureau; he also attended Howard University. He got his start in journalism working as a compositor for the Jacksonville

T. Thomas Fortune, c. 1910. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library)

Daily Union; while he was in school, he worked as a printer for the People's Advocate, an African American newspaper, but then he returned to the Daily Union. He married Carrie C. Smiley of Florida while he was employed at the Advocate; they later separated. He came to New York c. 1880 and worked at the Weekly Witness, a religious paper; the People's Advocate; and Rumor. He also started the Globe, which lasted until 1883–1884, and was the owner and editor of Freeman (1884). He published a book, Black and White: Land, Labor, and Politics in the South, in 1885. He founded New York Age in 1887 and sold it to Frederick Randolph Moore in 1904. Fortune moved to Washington, D.C., in 1914 and became editor and publisher of the Washington Sun. He was the editor of Marcus Garvey's Negro World from 1923 to 1928. Fortune died on 2 June 1928.

CAROLYN CALLOWAY-THOMAS
THURMON GARNER

See also Amsterdam News; Barnett, Ida B. Wells; Garvey, Marcus; Moore, Frederick Randolph; Negro World; New York Age; Trotter, William Monroe; Washington, Booker T.

Manuscript Collections

Emmett J. Scott Papers. Soper Library, Morgan State College.

Booker T. Washington Papers. Manuscript Division, Library of Congress.

Further Reading

Berry, Mary Frances, and John W. Blassingame. Long Memory: The Black Experience in America. 1982.

Calloway-Thomas, Carolyn. "T. Thomas Fortune on the 'Land of Chivalry and Devilry.'" Negro History Bulletin, April–June 1979.

Duster, Alfreda M., ed. Crusade for Justice: The Autobiography of Ida B. Wells. 1970.

Franklin, John Hope, and August Meier, eds. Black Leaders of the Twentieth Century. 1981.

Franklin, John Hope, and Alfred A. Moss Jr. From Slavery to Freedom: A History of Negro Americans. 1988.

Fortune, T. Thomas. Black and White: Land, Labor and Politics in the South. 1884.

Harlan, Louis. Booker T. Washington: The Making of a Black Leader, 1856–1901. 1972.

Thornbrough, Emma Lou. "American Negro Newspapers, 1880–1914." Business History Review, 1966.

———. T. Thomas Fortune: Militant Journalist. 1972.

Four Saints in Three Acts

The opera Four Saints in Three Acts (1934), with libretto by Gertrude Stein and score by Virgil Thomson, occupies a unique position in American performance history. First produced in 1934, right after Stein's best-selling Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, the opera was an immediate success. Its all-black cast, plotless libretto, opaque dialogue, and garish cellophane set alternately thrilled and shocked audiences. To this day it remains the longest-running opera in the history of Broadway. Its very singularity, however, precluded its having a broad, lasting influence in the arts. Attempts to revive Four Saints in Three Acts have tended to fail, and only recently have scholars begun to examine its cultural and historical significance.

Stein and Thomson conceived Four Saints in Three Acts as an opera about the contemplative life of the working artist, an existence which Stein likened to that of saints, who, in Stein's estimation, mostly sit around doing nothing. Hence, although the nominal setting was sixteenth-century Spain, the authors and producers did all they could to subordinate the historical context to the theme of creative meditation. Stein's libretto omits references to time and place; Thomson's score drew from American secular traditions; and Florence Stettheimer's brightly colored cellophane curtains and trees rendered the stage otherworldly.

Virgil Thomson's decision, approved by Stein, to cast African Americans in all of the parts was certainly part of this dissociative strategy. The black cast, more than any other aspect of the performance, cut against the ostensible setting. Although Thomson publicly insisted that black performers were necessary only for their rich voices and poise, he nevertheless rejected a proposal to have the cast perform in whiteface. Moreover, he conceded ulterior motives for his casting strategy in a newspaper interview: "Negroes objectify themselves very easily," he said. "They live on the surface of their consciousness" (quoted in Watson 1998, 202).

The disjunction between the opera's setting and its cast attracted much critical attention. By 1934, New York theater audiences had seen many all-black shows, among them Marc Connelly's Green Pastures and Hall Johnson's Run Little Chillun, but blacks had not yet penetrated the upper reaches of the fine arts. Most white critics praised the black cast, acknowledging the power of the voices even as they were struck by the performers' appearance. Significantly, black critics almost completely ignored Four Saints in Three Acts, focusing instead on They Shall Not Die, a play about the Scottsboro trial. To these black critics, Stein and Thomson's opera seemed a terrible waste of talent and opportunity. History bore out their viewpoint: audiences viewed the black cast as a gimmick not to be repeated, and of the performers, only Edward Matthews (Saint Ignatius) enjoyed much acclaim afterward.

Today, cultural critics question Stein's and Thomson's motives. Webb argues, for example, that Four Saints in Three Acts "deliberately situated black persons in a timeless realm devoid of history or stories" (2000, p. 449). Ironically, the renewed interest in this opera derives from scholarly attempts to locate Stein's racial and cultural politics—exactly the historically specific questions that Stein and Thomson tried to evade.

JUSTIN A. PITTAS-GIROUX

See also Green Pastures, The; Johnson, Hall; They Shall Not Die

Further Reading

Watson, Steven. Prepare for Saints: Gertrude Stein, Virgil Thomson, and the Mainstreaming of American Modernism. New York: Random House, 1998.

Webb, Barbara. "The Centrality of Race to the Modernist Aesthetics of Gertrude Stein's Four Saints in Three Acts." Modernism/Modernity, 7(3), 2000, pp. 447–469.

Francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance

The idea of Africa occupied a central place in the politics, aesthetics, art, and imagination of the Harlem Renaissance. However, the renaissance had an ambivalent attitude toward that idea. From one angle, Harlem's aesthetics reproduced the totalizing stereotypes of Africa as exotic and primitive. From another angle, Harlem's aesthetics reproduced idealized and positive images of Africa that exemplified the concern of the movement with nostalgia and its agenda of reclaiming roots and heritage. The presence of the idea of Africa underscores the international theme in Harlem's aesthetics, one that encapsulated the preoccupation of the movement with discourses of encounter and a black diaspora. Because its international theme incorporated a search for a common origin of the black diaspora, the Harlem Renaissance drew inspiration from Africa, first as a geographic monolith and second from the diverse geographic regions that were mostly under colonial rule. One such region was francophone Africa, which then consisted of French colonies primarily in the western, northern, and central regions of Africa. Francophone Africa gave imaginative energy to the political, artistic, and aesthetic focus of the Harlem Renaissance. Moreover, francophone Africa provided possibilities for imagining racial pride through cultural awareness and heritage.

Understanding the relationship of the Harlem Renaissance to francophone Africa requires, first, an understanding of its relationship to France. For many people, the Harlem Renaissance as a movement of self-affirmation had its beginnings in 1919, at a parade in Harlem by the men of the 369th Infantry (Fifteenth Infantry, the Harlem Hellfighters), a predominantly African American regiment in the then-segregated U.S. Army. The men of the 369th had served in France during World War I and had experienced no racial segregation, oppression, bias, or prejudice there. The French had treated the soldiers as equals, an experience the U.S. Army denied them. This valuing of France and French ideas about liberty started the long relationship between the Harlem Renaissance and France. However, the racial equality experienced by African American soldiers blinded some intellectuals and political activists of the Harlem Renaissance to France's colonial policies in Africa, which were oppressive and antithetical to the French liberal tradition. Significantly, many writers and intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance "met" and confronted their African heritage in and through France—through interaction with francophone African intellectuals and politicians who were mostly based in Paris.

In Harlem, there was an expanded awareness and consciousness aptly captured by the idea of the "New Negro," a term that Alain Locke used as the title of the most representative text of the movement, The New Negro (1925), which became influential among francophone Africans in France. The New Negro espoused black pride and power, a bold declaration that called into question the oppression of blacks, including colonialism in Africa, and resonated with francophone African politicians and intellectuals. W. E. B. Du Bois, in "The Negro Mind Reaches Out" (a piece in The New Negro), spelled out France's relationship with its African colonies. Using the central metaphor of shadow to talk about European colonialism generally, Du Bois portrayed the shadow of France in francophone Africa as a systematic mode of political oppression, economic exploitation, and cultural domination. Du Bois highlighted the paradox of France, with its ideals of equality and liberty, subjugating and suppressing Africans in its colonies. French industry exploited African colonies for the economic development of France. Educational and cultural systems promoted French in the colonies instead of African languages and customs.

Other writers in Harlem produced creative and ethnographic work to represent Africa and its traditions and customs. Magazines and newspapers such as Opportunity, Crisis, and Marcus Garvey's Negro World published articles and editorials on French colonial policies in Africa, championed the liberation of francophone Africa, and highlighted the problems of Africans under French colonial rule. At times these publications focused on art and aesthetics from francophone Africa. Alfred G. Barnes's article "Negro Art, Past and Present" (in Opportunity of May 1926) focused on the francophone African territories of Gabon, Ivory Coast, and Sudan-Niger. Lawrence Buermyer's article "The Negro Spirituals and American Art" focused on the francophone region of the Bushongo and Baluba of francophone Congo (Opportunity, 1926). In his article "The Art of the Congo" (Opportunity of May 1927), Melville Herskovits examined the francophone territories of the Congo basin in order to comment on the sophistication of African art. Also, publications in Harlem reviewed texts on francophone Africa such as André Gide's Voyage au Congo (1927) and Retour du Tchad (1928) and Paul Morand's Magie noire (1928).

The relationship between Harlem and francophone Africa was partly intellectual. Francophone African writers in the 1930s read the work of writers of the Harlem Renaissance such as Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, James Weldon Johnson, Claude McKay, Jean Toomer, and Sterling Brown in English and in translation. Mercer Cook, an African American professor of French at Howard University, first publicized in the United States the work of French-speaking blacks, among them francophone Africans. Publications by blacks in France, such as Revue du Monde/Review of the Black World (1931–1932), Depeche Africaine (1928–1930), and Les Continents (1924), promoted race consciousness and Afrocentric aesthetics and philosophy. Revue du Monde/Review of the Black World published works by writers of the Harlem Renaissance such as Hughes and McKay; excerpted The New Negro; and published articles that focused on art, aesthetics, philosophy, and literature of the black diaspora.

Perhaps the most dramatic entry of francophone Africa into the consciousness of Harlem came through a significant personality, René Maran, who lived in France and Africa as a colonial administrator for France; and a significant publication, Maran's novel Batouala (1921). Batouala, which won Maran a prestigious French literary award, the Prix Goncourt, exposed the exploitative and racist practices of French colonialism in central Africa, the former Africaine Equatoriale Française. Publications such as Opportunity, Crisis, and Negro World reviewed Maran's novel positively. For example, in Negro World, Eric Walrond's "Batouala, Art, and Propaganda" (1922) and William H. Ferris's "The Significance of René Maran" (1922, editorial) focused on the political purposes of the novel; Ferris's "World's Ten Greatest Novels: Why René Maran's Batouala Won Goncourt Prize; Novels for Propaganda" (1922) and Alain Locke's "The Colonial Literature of France" (1923) provided in-depth analyses of francophone colonial literature in Africa. Maran became an inspirational figure who promoted the Harlem Renaissance in France. His friendship with Alain Locke in the 1920s and 1930s promoted intellectual, aesthetic, and scholarly interest in Africa. Maran participated symbolically in the literary Harlem Renaissance through his contributions to Opportunity and Crisis. With the Dahomean Kojou Tovalou-Houenou, he edited Les Continents, a publication devoted to black cultural, aesthetic, and political concerns. It published works by Harlem's writers, such as Hughes, Cullen, and Locke; published Garvey's speeches; and reported the activities of Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA).

Another dimension of the relationship between francophone Africa and the Harlem Renaissance was the international political realm, as represented by the pan-African organization that had been partly conceptualized and realized by Du Bois. It advocated equal rights and political rights for blacks and whites and also called for political freedom, education, and land and economic resources for Africans under colonial rule. This organization fostered relations that emphasized the commonality of the black experience. Paris was the site of the first Pan-African Congress in 1919. Among the participants were Du Bois; Blaise Diagne, the Senegalese and black representative to the French National Assembly; and Gratien Candace, the black deputy from Guadeloupe. At the time of the second Pan-African Congress in 1921, there was a deep ideological fissure in the organization over Du Bois's open call for an end to colonial rule in Africa versus Diagne's advocacy of retaining a French colonial system that recognized the role of Africa within French colonial hegemony. The distrust between Du Bois and Diagne had severe consequences for the pan-African organization. Diagne abandoned it, and with him francophone African leadership and support. The rift also prevented the convening of the fourth Pan-African Congress in 1925. Opposition by colonial powers also hindered the vision of the organization. The Pan-African Congress considered holding its fifth assembly in Tunis (North Africa), which was then a French colony, but the French government would not allow the congress to be held on francophone African soil, for fear of political turmoil in its other African colonies.

Francophone Africans responded favorably to Marcus Garvey, who in the early 1920s popularized the slogan "back to Africa," promoting ties between African Americans and Africa. Kodjo Tovalou-Houenou, who was based in Paris and was associated with Garvey, sent copies of Negro World to Dahomey, and in 1924 created in Paris the Ligue Universelle pour la Défense de la Race Noire, which articulated pan-Negroism as promoted by Garvey's UNIA. The organization later became known as the Comité de Défense de la Race Nègre, and its first president was Lamine Senghor, a cousin of Léopold Senghor. Race consciousness and pride as articulated by Garvey and other figures of the Harlem Renaissance permeated the work of francophone African writers, who began to define themselves in terms of their race—a development that later was transformed into the full-fledged négritude (negritude) movement.

In fact, the negritude movement was the most significant contribution of Harlem's aesthetics to francophone Africa. Harlem provided the fundamental philosophical and aesthetic concepts of negritude, and the founders of the movement—Aimé Césaire, Léopold Senghor, and Léon Gontran-Damas—spoke of their indebtedness to the Harlemite writers of the 1930s, mostly Hughes, Cullen, Toomer, and McKay. Senghor openly credited McKay as the spiritual founder of negritude. McKay's novel Banjo was a favorite of many francophone African writers, who in turn explored its themes and style in their own work. The expressiveness and spontaneity of Harlem's aesthetics influenced francophone African writers such as Senghor, Birago Diop, Sembene Ousmane, and Ousmane Soce Diop, author of Mirages du Paris (1937). Negritude poetry, in particular Senghor's oeuvre, gave an important place to feelings, music, song, and rhythm—elements that came directly from Harlem's aesthetics. Negritude writers learned from the writers of the Harlem Renaissance about the power of poetry for self-expression, self-exploration, and social change. In addition to this literary influence, the central tenets of negritude were based on Garvey's black nationalism—which was opposed to racial assimilation and prized a pure, unadulterated African culture—and on the philosophical underpinnings of the pan-African movement. Thus the themes of self-assertion, rebellion, and racial pride articulated by the Harlem Renaissance influenced francophone African writers in their conceptualization of negritude aesthetics and the eventual political mobilization against French colonial rule in Africa.

PATRICK S. BERNARD

See also Batouala; Césaire, Aimé; Crisis, The; Damas, Léon; Fifteenth Infantry; Garvey, Marcus; Herskovits, Melville; Locke, Alain; Maran, René; McKay, Claude; Negritude; Negro World; Opportunity; Pan-Africanism; Pan-African Congresses; Senghor, Léopold

Further Reading

- Brown, Lloyd W. "The African Heritage and the Harlem Renaissance: A Re-Evaluation." African Literature Today, 9, 1978, pp. 1–9.
- Cook, Mercer A. "Some Literary Contacts: African, West Indian, Afro-American." In The Black Writer in Africa and the Americas: Conference on Comparative Literature, ed. Lloyd W. Brown. Los Angeles: University of South California Press, 1973, pp. 120–121.
- Daye, Pierre. "Le Mouvement Pan-Nègre." Flambeau (Brussels), 7, July–August 1921, pp. 359–375.
- "The Decorated Colors of the French Colonial Troops." Crisis, 19, November 1919, p. 346.
- Du Bois, W. E. B. "Memorandum to M. Diagne and others on a Pan-African Congress to Be Held in Paris in February 1919." Crisis, 4, March 1919, pp. 224–225.
- . "The Negro Mind Reaches Out." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992. (Originally published 1925.)
- Du Bus, de Warnaffe. "Le Garveyism en Action dans Notre Colonie." Congo, June–December 1921, pp. 575–576.
- . "Le Mouvement Pan-Nègre aux États-Unis et Ailleurs." Congo, May 1922.
- Edwards, Brent Hayes. Practice of Diaspora: Literature, Translation, and the Rise of Black Nationalism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Fabre, Michel. "Rene Maran, the New Negro, and Negritude." Phylon, 36, 1975, pp. 340–351.
- . "The Harlem Renaissance Abroad: French Critics and the New Negro Literary Movement (1924–1964)." In Temples of Tomorrow: Looking Back at the Harlem Renaissance, eds. Genevieve Fabre and Michael Feith. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001, pp. 314–332.
- "French Colonial Policy." Opportunity, 2, September 1924, pp. 261–263. (An exchange between René Maran and Alain Locke.)
- Geiss, Imanuel. The Pan-African Movement, trans. Ann Keep. London: Methuen, 1974.
- Ikonne, Chidi. "Rene Maran and the New Negro." Colby Library Quarterly, 16(4), December 1979, pp. 224–239.
- Janken, Kenneth R. "African American and Francophone Black Intellectuals during the Harlem Renaissance." Historian, Spring 1998, pp. 1–17.
- Kestleloot, Lilyan. Black Writers in French: A Literary History of Negritude. Philadelphia, Pa.: Temple University Press, 1974.
- Langley, Jabez Ayodele. "Pan-Africanism in Paris, 1924–1936." Journal of Modern African Studies, 7(1), April 1969.
- Logan, Rayford W. "France Will Not Betray Her Subjects." Chicago Defender, National Edition, 22 November 1924, part 2, p. 9.
- McKay, Claude. Banjo: A Story without a Plot. New York: Harcourt, 1929.
- Mudimbe-Boyi, Elisabeth. "African and Black American Literature: The 'Negro Renaissance' and the Genesis of African Literature in French," trans. J. Coates. In For Better or Worse: The American Influence on the World, ed. Allen F. Davis. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1981, pp. 157–169.
- . "Harlem Renaissance and Africa: An Ambiguous Adventure." In The Surreptitious Speech: Presence Africaine and the Politics of Otherness, 1947–1987, ed. V. Y. Mudimbe. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1992, pp. 174–182.
- Tovalou-Houenou, Prince Kojo. "The Problem of Negroes in French Colonial Africa." Opportunity, 2, July 1924, pp. 203–207.

Francophone Caribbean and the Harlem Renaissance

The influence of the Harlem Renaissance on the cultural dynamics of the francophone Caribbean is inestimable. Franco-Caribbean literature was born with negritude (négritude), and negritude was a diasporic offshoot of the Harlem Renaissance. World War I and the international political events in its aftermath brought African Americans and French-speaking blacks together in Paris, the capital of France. Besides black soldiers, many musicians and intellectuals of the Harlem Renaissance made their way to France.

In this après-guerre France, jazz and primitivism became the rage of Paris, perhaps in an attempt to block out the horrors wrought by the war. And blackness was linked to cosmopolitanism, becoming a source of creative inspiration in literature and the arts among Europeans, with their exoticist tracts and tableaux, and cultural workers of the Harlem Renaissance.

W. E. B. Du Bois, editor of Crisis and author of the classic The Souls of Black Folk (1903), was among the first of the Harlem Renaissance coterie to coalesce with elite francophones of color. With the help of Blaise Diagne (the Senegalese deputy in the French parliament) and Gratien Candace, Du Bois was able to organize the first Pan-African Congress, held in Paris from 19 to 21 February 1919. Because Du Bois was (in the words of David Levering Lewis) the “impresario of pan-Africanism,” his theories on the “talented tenth,” on the uneasy symbiosis of blackness and Americanness, and on the cultural histories of Africa and its diaspora found currency among a cadre of elite francophones in Paris at the time, some of whom were committed to reconciling France’s discourse on humanism with its slipshod colonial practices. Such encounters helped make the worldview of French-speaking blacks more global and also expand their understanding of racial inequality and oppression. Hitherto, they had lacked a language imbued with the complexities of race and racialism to articulate the malaise many of them experienced in France. They were citizens of France but—curiously, considering the color blindness implied by the French ideal of liberté, fraternité, and égalité—they were treated as outsiders.

Du Bois’s vigorous anticolonialism and anti-imperialism were moderated with respect to France. His admiration for the principles of Jacobin France and his own personal ability to exist in France unfettered by the “accursed veil” clouded his radicalism. Nevertheless, the tenuous alliance that he established with these métropolitains de couleur under the rubric of the “Pan African Association” proved no match for the fruits offered by the French policy of assimilation. His vision of a black international community eventually came to be considered “dangerously internationalist” and threatening to French colonial policy, with its mission civilisatrice and its assimilationist dicta. Most elite francophones believed that France held out the only hope for the cultural advancement of the “backward races in Africa,” as the rhetoric on civilization went.

Marcus Garvey, with his Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA), also cast his eye on France. He even channeled funds to the fledgling newspaper Dépêche Africaine, whose colonial reformist radicalism perturbed French government officials sufficiently to make them begin a campaign of dogged monitoring. However, Garvey’s vision of global black solidarity and “Africa for the Africans” failed to appeal widely to les français noirs. His failure to overcome the idea of a color-blind France is perhaps more obvious than Du Bois’s, as Kojo Tovalou, editor of the newspaper Les Continents, emphasized during a visit to UNIA’s headquarters in New York in 1924: “Mr. President Garvey . . . France is the only country that does not have race prejudice, but struggles for its disappearance.” In the end, colonial reforms, which would facilitate assimilation into Frenchness rather than the eventual decolonization proposed by both Garvey and Du Bois, were the marching orders followed by French-speaking blacks. As the editors of Dépêche Africaine definitively surmised, “the methods of colonization by civilized nations are far from perfect; but colonization itself is a human and necessary project.”

However, the Harlem Renaissance had its most lasting impact not in politics but in the cultural realm, particularly in literature. In salons set up in Paris by the author René Maran (who was a winner of the Prix Goncourt) and in Clamart, a suburb of Paris, by Andrée, Jane, and Paulette Nardal, and in the pages of newspapers, reviews, and magazines like Continents, Dépêche Africaine, and Revue du Monde Noir, francophone and Harlem Renaissance writers, intellectuals, and journalists discussed issues of race, culture, identity, and internationalism. Although jazz was in vogue, literary ideas and ideals professed in such texts as Alain Locke’s anthology The New Negro, Langston Hughes’s poetry, and Claude McKay’s novel Banjo would become the cultural legacy exported to the French West Indies in the years preceding World War II.

Black self-expression, racial pride, and cultural exploration embodied in the works mentioned previously instigated calls for an authentic black literature in the French Caribbean rather than the usual imitation of French literary masters. “Race-conscious literature” became the battle cry. Langston Hughes’ proletarian literature, lacking the exoticist themes characteristic of McKay’s Banjo, served as a model. Like the New Negro in America, francophone writers also endeavored to invoke a “race spirit,” in accordance with Alain Locke’s theories in his introduction to The New Negro, to create a francophone New Negro in a new world.

The New Negro spawned the term néo-nègre in the francophone context—a concept that would later be transformed into the cultural movement négritude. The most readily identifiable proponents of the francophone New Negro movement that began in France are Aimé Césaire of Martinique, Léon-Gontran Damas of Guyana, and Léopold Sédar Senghor of Senegal. The ideological content of néo-nègre and négritude were conceived at Maran's salon and the salon in Clamart and on the pages of Revue du Monde Noir under the stewardship of Paulette and Jane Nardal. The poet Aimé Césaire coined the neologism in Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (1936). He, Damas, and Senghor—as attendees at those salons and as avid readers of Revue du Monde Noir, whose six issues were decidedly diasporic in content, including translations of poetry and prose by Harlem Renaissance writers—would make their distinctive marks on this burgeoning movement in the francophone world in subsequent literary and philosophical works.

Although Cahier d'un retour au pays natal was neither conceived nor written in Martinique, Césaire's pays natal became the muse for his reflections on the cultural vapidness of the Antilles, a condition he saw as caused by French colonial imposition and solipsism. This cultural void was a result of a defective system of formation whereby Antilleans were “crammed to splitting open with white morality, white culture, white education, white prejudice,” as the poet Étienne Léro wrote in the surrealist manifesto Légitime défense (1932), and succinctly represented in the deleterious phrase nos ancêtres les gaulois. Also in this text, in the fashion of Langston Hughes, Césaire proposes to become the porte-parole of the proletariat, where his “tongue” as poet “will serve those miseries which have no tongue”; “his voice the liberty of those who founder in the dungeons of despair.”

And so as another world war loomed, Aimé Césaire, his philosopher wife Suzanne Césaire, and the Marxist and surrealist René Ménénil returned to Martinique. With their newfound understanding of Africa, a global race consciousness, and a profound respect for Haiti (where black consciousness directly manifested itself as a result of the Haitian revolution and international isolation through indigenism and such writers as Jean-Price-Mars and the anthropologist Anténor Firmin), they undertook a mission—to urge Antillean artists to shed cultural sterility through their literary and cultural review Tropiques.

Tropiques emerged in the Antillean cultural landscape in April 1941. René Ménénil had already taken

West Indian writers of color to task some nine years earlier in Légitime défense. Describing works by these authors as “bored and boring; depressed and depressing,” he suggested that they use the New “American” Negro writer as an inspiration for what Caribbean literature could become. In his debut essay “Naissance de notre art” (1941) in Tropiques, Ménénil continued to accuse Martinican artists in particular of mediocrity, of coming to “courts of Culture empty-handed . . . with borrowed graces.” In the first anniversary issue of Tropiques, Suzanne Césaire lamented, in the tellingly titled essay “Malaise d'une civilisation” (1942), that Martinican cultural workers lived inauthentically, in imitation, and hence had produced no “original” styles.

Both Césaire's and Ménénil's criticisms echoed Paulette Nardal's prophetic words in “The Awakening of Race Consciousness among Black Students” (1932), published in the last issue of Revue du Monde Noir. Nardal recognized that, because of the processes of French acculturation and assimilation, Caribbean writers were uneasy in their black skin. This malaise led to feelings of inferiority and made their creative works mere “tributaries of Latin culture.” Evoking the Harlem Renaissance as a model and citing Langston Hughes, Nardal concluded that the “Americans, having thrown off all inferiority complexes, tranquilly ‘express their individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame.’” This purging of inferiority complexes and coming to terms with the particularity of the “land, race, and economic forms, etc.” of the Caribbean, as Ménénil writes in “Naissance,” would allow for the development of fecund, inimitable cultural productions. Such was the challenge of the Negro writer in the francophone Caribbean entre deux guerres; the road map for the realization of this cultural awakening was the Harlem Renaissance.

TRACY DENEAN SHARPLEY-WHITING

See also Césaire, Aimé; Damas, Léon; Du Bois, W. E. B.; Garvey, Marcus; Hughes, Langston; Locke, Alain; Maran, René; McKay, Claude; Négritude; New Negro, The; Pan-African Congresses; Senghor, Léopold

Further Reading

- Archer-Straw, Petrine. Negrophilia: Avant-Garde Paris and Black Culture in the 1920s. New York: Thames and Hudson, 2002.
- Cunard, Nancy. Negro: An Anthology. New York: Continuum, 1996.

- Fabre, Michel. From Harlem to Paris: Black American Writers in France, 1840–1980. Champaign-Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.
- Kesteloot, Lilyan. Black Writers in French: A Literary History of Negritude, trans. Ellen Conroy Kennedy. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1991.
- Richardson, Michael. Refusal of the Shadow: Surrealism and the Caribbean. London: Verso, 1996.
- Sartre, Jean-Paul. "Black Orpheus." In What Is Literature? and Other Essays. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1988.
- Shack, William. Harlem in Montmartre: A Paris Jazz Story between Great Wars. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.
- Sharpley-Whiting, T. Denean. Negritude Women. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2002.
- Stovall, Tyler. Paris Noir: African Americans in the City of Light. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1996.

Frank, Waldo

In Our America (1919), Waldo Frank claimed, as had Van Wyck Brooks in America's Coming of Age (1915), that America was culturally split between genteel idealism (highbrow) and material obsession (lowbrow). In Frank's words, modern America was "externalized." What was most needed was an awakened sense of cohesion and purpose, a sense of collective identity, that only the artist and the intellectual could provide. Initially, in the first issue of Seven Arts (a journal Frank founded with Brooks, Floyd Dell, and James Oppenheim) and in an essay titled "Emerging Greatness," Frank saw in Sherwood Anderson this promise of a renaissance of the imagination that would help create a new sense of "national self consciousness." However, if Anderson ultimately proved disappointing, Frank detected in Jean Toomer "the spiritual power to hoist himself wholly into a more essential plane: the plane in which the materials of the phenomenal world are re-created into pure aesthetic forms." As a result, Toomer, who thought that "art had a sort of religious function," felt that he and Frank were united "in the dual task of creating an American literature."

Hutchinson (1995) has argued that the Harlem Renaissance is best understood as a search for an American national identity commonly pursued and contested by black and white intellectuals: "The issue of American national identity was, in any case, the dominant problematic structuring the literary field relevant to the Harlem Renaissance. . . . The attempt, overall, came down to an effort to expand the notion of 'the people' who compose the national community." Through his relationship with many of the young intellectuals who made up what Blake (1990) called the "beloved community," Frank was indirectly linked to the cultural renaissance symbolically focused in Harlem, but Frank was most directly linked with the imaginative concerns of African Americans through the person of Jean Toomer.

In 1921 Toomer accepted the job of acting principal of a small black industrial school in Sparta, Georgia. This experience led him to write several stories that would eventually make up Cane, the novel many people consider to be the greatest artistic achievement of the Harlem Renaissance. One year later, Toomer returned to the South (this time to Spartanburg, South Carolina), together with Frank—who, after having spent time in Virginia and the deep South, was drawn by Toomer's insistence that the South and the southern Negro offered "the opportunity for a vivid symbolism" for a world fast becoming homogenized by "machines, motor cars, phonographs, [and] movies." Out of this experience came Toomer's Cane and Frank's Holiday. Each novel was unquestionably the work of its author, but the two novels would not have been the same without the other's criticism and encouragement. In Toomer's "Bona and Paul," for example, Frank found "a certain loss of intensity—a certain amount of mere writing" in much of the imagery. But "Kabnis," he suggested, was "quite perfect as an expression of the man who wrote it." And Frank, whose novel centers on a lynching in a small southern town, eagerly asked for Toomer's critical comments: "I shall send you the other parts in quick order. You can help me INES-TIMABLY, Jean, if you will go through the whole thing carefully—take what time you need for that and mark all the 'stiffnesses' and give me your suggestions of improvements." Even after the publication of Holiday, Frank continued to consult Toomer regarding the validity of the critical comments.

Frank's aphorism "The person is the individual made real" expresses the code he shared with Jean Toomer in their attempt to overcome, through art, the alienation they saw in modern life.

Biography

Waldo Frank was born on 25 August 1889. He studied at De Witt Clinton High School, New York (1902–1906);

Waldo Frank. (Brown Brothers.)

at a private preparatory school in Lausanne, Switzerland (1906–1907); and at Yale University (1907–1911). He was a reporter for the New York Evening Post and New York Times (1911–1913), an associate editor for Seven Arts (1916–1917), a contributing editor for New Masses (1926), chairman of the League of American Writers (1936), and a delegate to the Congress of Revolutionary Writers and Artists of Mexico in Mexico City (1937–1938). His awards included membership in the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Frank died on 9 January 1967.

MARK HELBLING

See also Anderson, Sherwood; Cane; Toomer, Jean

Selected Works

Our America. 1919.
The Dark Mother. 1920.
Rahab. 1922.
City Block. 1922.
Holiday. 1923.
Chalk Face. 1923.

Salvos. 1924.
Virgin Spain. 1926.
Time Exposures. 1926.
In the American Jungle. 1925–1936.
Rediscovery of America. 1929.
Memoirs of Waldo Frank. 1973.

Further Reading

Carter, Paul. Waldo Frank. New York: Twayne, 1967.
Bittner, William. Novels of Waldo Frank. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1958.
Blake, Casey Nelson. Beloved Community: The Cultural Criticism of Randolph Bourne, Van Wyck Brooks, and Lewis Mumford. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.
Helbling, Mark. The Harlem Renaissance: The One and the Many. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1999.
Hutchinson, George. The Harlem Renaissance in Black and White. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.
Ogorzaly, Michael. Waldo Frank: Prophet of Hispanic Regeneration. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1994.
Perry, Robert. Shared Vision of Waldo Frank and Hart Crane. Lincoln: University of Nebraska, 1966.

Frazier, E. Franklin

E. Franklin Frazier was one of the leading cultural critics during the maturation of the Harlem Renaissance. This black American—who would go on to become chairman of the department of sociology at Howard University, president of the American Sociological Society (later Association), and one of the most acclaimed authorities on the black family, the black middle class, and race relations—established a reputation during the “Negro movement” as someone who wanted to combine the essential insights of two diametrically opposed orientations: integration and separatism. During the 1920s, Frazier’s popular articles were published in Southern Workman, Crisis, Opportunity, and Nation; his scholarly articles appeared in Journal of Social Forces, Howard Review, Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, and Current History. At the first Opportunity fete in May 1925, Frazier’s essay on social equality was awarded first prize—a tribute to his critical acuity. As early as 1925, Frazier published an article, “Durham: Capital of the Black Middle Class," in Alain Locke's classic anthology The New Negro. In this essay, Frazier argued unequivocally, as Moses has observed, for the necessity of "black economic self-reliance as a basis for ethnic regeneration of black Americans" (1990, 108). Three years later, in an essay entitled "La Bourgeois Noire," which appeared in V. F. Calverton's Anthology of American Negro Literature, Frazier went so far as to applaud Marcus Garvey's movement for its attempt to develop "nationalistic aims with an economic program" (108). In other words, Frazier thought that the black American question was not solely economic; for Frazier, as Cruse observed, the question "was, and is, also a cultural one" (1967, 155). The Harlem Renaissance lacked directionality, Frazier suggested, at least partly because it represented a type of cultural nationalism that was supported by white rather than black capitalists. Furthermore, Lewis has argued with regard to the New Negro movement that Frazier "exposed its deficiencies from the vantage point of one of its presumed agents" (1994, 173). Frazier succinctly summed up the shortcomings of the Negro Movement when he argued that "it knows nothing of . . . Work and Wealth" (181).

Although Frazier preached a variant of economic nationalism, his views on black cultural nationalism were far more complex. As Platt (1991) has noted, Frazier argued that the African past had no relevance for black culture in the United States. Nonetheless, Frazier thought that it would be good to nurture black racial identity by teaching and developing courses in black history, and by the artistic exploitation of themes from the vital black folk culture of the United States. As a consequence, Frazier abhorred some black peoples' imitation of whites—the use of skin-bleaching creams, the vogue of hair straightening, and other current fashions. Still, he argued that social equality would eventually destroy both racial identity and racial consciousness. In short, Frazier thought that integration and eventual assimilation were inevitable.

Frazier's critiques were an integral part of the New Negro movement during the 1920s. Thus, although his professional relationship with the sociologist Charles S. Johnson would eventually sour in the 1930s, during the Harlem Renaissance the two had a mutually beneficial relationship. In fact, during the years 1924 to 1929 Johnson published eight of Frazier's articles in the National Urban League's organ Opportunity; three of these articles were the genesis of some of Frazier's later work on the black family. Subsequent historians and cultural critics, such as Cruse and Platt, have applauded Frazier's work during the 1920s. For example, Cruse notes that Frazier knew "The unique literary and cultural revival of the 1920s turned out to be a directionless movement . . . because it was divorced from the politics and economics of Negro culture as a group concept" (156). Platt has written that during the Harlem Renaissance, "At stake was the content of culture, which, Frazier argued, could not be separated from issues of class and politics" (128).

At least one critic, in contradistinction to Cruse's and Platt's analyses of Frazier's nationalist cultural examinations, has described Frazier as an assimilationist; however, this label ignores the critiques that Frazier wrote during the 1920s. It is more likely that Frazier's writings during this period were characterized by an ambiguity and openness that left them subject to more than one interpretation. As mentioned previously, Frazier's writings were inspired by his yearning to combine the insights of two opposed positions—color-blind universalism and racially exclusive nationalism. In other words, he desired the integration of diverse racial groups on an equal basis, but without the complete loss of each group's own cultural identity. Thus, although Frazier believed that the world's races and peoples would eventually merge, he was not an assimilationist during the 1920s. Throughout his career, he felt that in the foreseeable future it would be necessary for blacks to reconstruct a communal and institutional life capable of accomplishing the arduous task of black uplift—a mission that he felt the artists of Harlem had failed to perform.

E. Franklin Frazier. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Biography

Edward Franklin Frazier was born on 24 September 1894, in Baltimore, Maryland. He studied at public schools in Baltimore; Howard University, Washington, D.C. (B.A., 1916); Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts (M.A., 1920); New York School of Social Work (research fellow, 1920–1921); American-Scandinavian Foundation (fellow, 1921–1922); and the University of Chicago (Ph.D., 1931). He taught at Tuskegee Institute in Alabama (1916–1917); Saint Paul's Normal and Industrial School, Lawrenceville, Virginia (1917–1918); Baltimore High School (1918–1919); Morehouse College, Atlanta, Georgia (1922–1927); Atlanta School of Social Work (1922–1927); Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee (1929–1934); and Howard University (1934–1962). Frazier was director of the Harlem Riot Commission (1935), a Guggenheim fellow (1940), consultant for An American Dilemma (1942), president of the American Sociological Association (1948), and chief of the Division of Applied Social Sciences in UNESCO (1951–1953). He died on 16 May 1962.

VERNON J. WILLIAMS

See also Calverton, V. F.; Johnson, Charles Spurgeon; New Negro, The; New Negro Movement; Opportunity

Selected Articles

"A Note on Negro Education." Opportunity, 2, March 1924, pp. 213–214.

"Some Aspects of Negro Business." Opportunity, 2, August 1924, p. 239.

"Social Equality and the Negro." Opportunity, 3, June 1925, pp. 165–168.

"Durham: Capital of the Black Middle Class." In The New Negro, ed. Alain Locke. New York: A. and C. Boni, 1925, pp. 333–340.

"Three Scourges of the Negro Family." Opportunity, 4, July 1926, pp. 210–213, 234.

"The Garvey Movement." Opportunity, 4, November 1926, pp. 147–148.

"Is the Negro Family a Unique Sociological Unit?" Opportunity, 5, June 1927, pp. 165–168.

Selected Longer Works

The Free Negro Family. 1932.

The Negro Family in Chicago. 1932.

The Negro Family in the United States. 1939. (Reprinted abridged ed., 1966.)

Negro Youth at the Crossways. 1940.

Bourgeoisie Noire. (American ed. published as Black Bourgeoisie, 1957.)

The Negro in the United States. 1949. (Rev. ed., 1957.)

Race and Culture Contacts in the Modern World. 1957.

The Negro Church. 1964. (Published posthumously.)

Further Reading

Cruse, Harold. The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual. New York: Morrow, 1967.

Edwards, G. Franklin. E. Franklin Frazier on Race Relations. Chicago, Ill.: University of Chicago Press, 1968.

Lewis, David Levering, ed. The Portable Renaissance Reader. New York: Penguin, 1994.

Moses, Wilson. The Wings of Ethiopia. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1990.

Platt, Anthony. E. Franklin Frazier Reconsidered. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1991.

Fuller, Meta Warrick

Meta Vaux Warrick is sometimes seen as a precursor of the Harlem Renaissance. Although she did not live in New York, she was inspired by the ideals of

W. E. B. Du Bois, whom she met in Paris. Her long career began at a time when the art world was just beginning to open up to women and lasted until her death at age ninety.

Warrick grew up in a comfortable middle-class family in Philadelphia and later spent summers on Martha's Vineyard. In 1894, she won a three-year scholarship to the Pennsylvania School for Industrial Arts. In the fall of 1899, she traveled to Paris, where she studied with Rodin, met several other important artists, and exhibited at Samuel Bing's Art Nouveau Gallery. She also studied in Rome at the Colarossi Academy. Later she was included in shows in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Washington, D.C.

After returning to the United States in 1902, she became engaged with issues affecting blacks. The following year, she made a plaque commemorating Emperor Menelik II of Abyssinia. She married the first black psychiatrist in America, Dr. Solomon Fuller, who was originally from Liberia. They moved to Framingham, Massachusetts, where she set up a studio. In 1907, Meta Warrick Fuller became the first black female artist hired by the federal government.

All of the work Fuller did before 1910 was destroyed in a fire. Her surviving work, however, reflects her increasing involvement in black culture. She was impressed by an anticolonial movement called Ethiopianism, which combined black American traditions with those of Africa. That movement inspired Fuller's best-known sculpture, Ethiopia Awakening (1914, or more probably 1921). Although this work was made before the heyday of the Harlem Renaissance, it merges the two cultures—African and black American. The lower half represents a wrapped mummy, and the upper half is an Egyptian princess who is very much alive. The theme of birth as a metaphor for artistic creation is used here in the context of the legendary land of the queen of Sheba, who is considered black by tradition.

In 1917, blacks protested against the lynching of Mary Turner, a black woman from Georgia who had been accused of plotting the murder of a white man. The protests were publicized in the magazine Crisis. To commemorate this event, in 1919 Fuller produced Mary Turner, subtitled Protest against Mob Violence. It shows a woman quietly gazing down at heads embedded in the painted plaster from which it was modeled. Like Ethiopia Awakening, although in a very different style, this sculpture depicts a woman immobilized below the waist (here, because she is embedded in the material itself) but able to move above the waist.

Fuller's Talking Skull (1937) is a contemplative work, showing an African man meditating on a skull. It reflects the artist's lifelong interest in themes of death as well as birth and rebirth.

By the 1950s, following the march of African Americans' progress in the United States, Fuller was creating several works inspired by the civil rights movement. In 1957, the Afro-American Women's Council in Washington, D.C., commissioned her to execute ten sculptures of famous black women. Fuller died eleven years later, in 1968.

Biography

Meta V. W. Fuller was born on 9 June 1877, into a comfortable Philadelphia family. She is considered a precursor of the Harlem Renaissance, and although she lived and worked around Boston, she was sympathetic to the ideals of the renaissance. After graduating from art school, she studied in Paris, where she met and was influenced politically and culturally by W. E. B. Du Bois and artistically mainly by Rodin. When she returned to the United States, Fuller became involved in black issues, which are reflected in the themes of her sculpture. She died in 1968, at age ninety.

Meta Warrick Fuller. (Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library.)

Fuller, Meta Warrick

Laurie Adams

See also Artists; Visual Arts

Selected Works

Ethiopia Awakening. 1914. (Schomburg Center for Research in American Sculpture, New York Public Library.)

Mary Warner. 1919. (Museum of Afro-American History, Boston.)

Talking Skull. 1937. (Museum of Afro-American History, Boston.)

Further Reading

Bearden, Romare, and Harry Henderson. A History of African-American Artists from 1792 to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1993.

Heyd, Milly. Mutual Reflections: Jews and Blacks in American Art. New Brunswick, N.J., and London: Rutgers University Press, 1999.

Lewis, Samela. African-American Art and Artists. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Patton, Sharon F. African-American Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Studio Museum in Harlem. Harlem Renaissance: Art of Black America. New York: Abrams, 1987.

Garland Fund

The Garland Fund—so named for its benefactor, Charles Garland, but more properly called the American Fund for Public Service—was unique among American philanthropies in the 1920s and 1930s. The fund was directly set up to counter the ruling class's domination, especially in education, labor organizing, the media, and race relations.

Ironically, radicalism was aided by a rising stock market. The fund had an initial capitalization of $800,000; and not quite twenty years later its directors had disbursed almost $2 million. With the libertarian Roger Baldwin, founder of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), as secretary and the socialist Norman Thomas as president, the fund's board provided an unusually cooperative meeting ground of the American left. Almost every radical cause and campaign applied to the Garland Fund for money during the 1920s and 1930s, including striking workers, the American Birth Control League, and the ACLU.

Among the first applicants to the Garland Fund was A. Philip Randolph, who sought a loan to help his struggling journal, The Messenger. A loan of $500 was made by the fund to the paper in 1923, followed by a grant of $2,000. The fund lent money to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) the same year and later made a donation to its antilynching campaign. The next year, the National Urban League received $1,000 to fund a study titled "Negro Relations to the Trade Unions." When A. Philip Randolph was initially contacted to head the effort to establish the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters in 1925, the Garland Fund voted to give $1,200 for the production of organizational materials. Eventually, the fund gave $11,200 for the brotherhood's general organizing fund, enough to pay the salaries of several field organizers.

At the same meeting, the fund's board voted $26,000 to NAACP to defend Dr. Ossian Sweet, who had been accused of murder as a result of a riot in the all-white Detroit neighborhood into which his family attempted to move after buying a home. The money, which was conditional on the raising of matching funds, led eventually to the establishment of a permanent defense fund by NAACP. It was a very important aid in a developing strategy to obtain legal equality. Money from the Garland Fund also made possible, in 1927, the pursuit of Nixon v. Herndon that resulted at least temporarily in the invalidation of the all-white primary.

The influence of the Garland Fund was not welcome in all quarters. In 1926, Robert L. Vann, publisher of the Pittsburgh Courier, attacked James Weldon Johnson in print, accusing Johnson—who was a member of the fund's board—of occupying palatial offices on Fifth Avenue and of using the fund's money as a personal slush fund.

Johnson's membership on the fund's board, however, paid dividends for NAACP. In 1930, after the stock market crash reduced income, the fund decided on a major investment in a strategy of NAACP—a legal campaign to achieve racial equality. The NAACP's decision in 1931 to focus its efforts on ending segregation in schools paved the way for the eventual landmark decision by the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954. The Garland Fund had given some $30,000 to the campaign during the 1930s.

The Garland Fund also aided other campaigns for black equality in America: the successful appeal of Lloyd L. Gaines to attend the University of Missouri, the defense of the Scottsboro boys, and the interracial Southern Tenant Farmers Union.

After slowing its activities in 1937 and 1938, the fund finally liquidated itself in June 1941, a victim of its success and of the inability of board members to overcome factional political differences in order to continue to work together.

STEPHEN BURWOOD

See also Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; Johnson, James Weldon; Messenger, The; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; National Urban League; Philanthropy and Philanthropic Organizations; Pittsburgh Courier; Randolph, A. Philip; Vann, Robert L.

Further Reading

Curti, Merle. "Subsidizing Red Radicalism: The American Fund for Public Service, 1921–1941." Social Science Review, 33, September 1959.

Freeman, Joseph. An American Testament: A Narrative of Rebels and Romantics. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1936.

Lamson, Peggy. Roger Baldwin, Founder of the American Civil Liberties Union: A Portrait. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1976.

Samson, Gloria Garrett. The American Fund for Public Service: Charles Garland and Radical Philanthropy, 1922–1941. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1996

Garvey, Marcus

Marcus Garvey was the dominant African American figure in the era of the Harlem Renaissance, especially from about 1919 to 1925. His Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) was the largest African American mass movement ever. More than any single individual, he provided the radical political underpinning to the Harlem Renaissance, known as the New Negro movement. Garvey also significantly affected the purely literary and cultural aspects of the Harlem Renaissance through his encouragement of literature and the arts. From his headquarters on 135th Street in Harlem, Garvey presided over a multifaceted and far-flung empire that encompassed millions of followers and sympathizers all over the world. There were about 1,200 branches of the UNIA spread over more than forty countries, from Australia to the United States. Most of these branches and most members were in the United States. New York City, as befit the headquarters, had the largest single branch, with 35,000 to 40,000 members.

Garvey arrived in the United States in March 1916, after several early years of agitational work in Costa Rica, Panama, Jamaica, and Europe. He had led a printers' strike in Jamaica. He had published newspapers and fought for better treatment for the Caribbean immigrants in Costa Rica and Panama. He had traveled through several European countries and had worked in London for an important pan-African journal, Africa Times and Orient Review.

Garvey was born in 1887 in St. Ann's Bay, Jamaica. As a youth, he excelled at the printing trade. He also participated in anticolonialist political activity and in the nascent Jamaican labor movement. He founded UNIA in 1914 shortly after his return home from four years of travel. The organization was a response to the suffering that Garvey encountered everywhere among the African masses. Garvey came to the United States in March 1916, after UNIA had been active for almost two years in Jamaica. His immediate purpose was to raise funds for his work in Jamaica. He had hoped to meet Booker T. Washington, founder of Tuskegee Institute, the most famous institution of African American education, but Washington, whom he admired, died a few months before Garvey's arrival.

Garvey toured the United States and Canada in 1916 and 1917. On his return to his new base in Harlem, he joined a corps of open-air speakers and stepladder orators who abounded on Harlem's street corners. Harlem had only recently become the major African American section of New York City, but by the time of Garvey's arrival, less than a decade after its transformation into an African American enclave, it was already well on the way to becoming a veritable capital of the African world. Its population was cosmopolitan, with recent immigrants from the South accounting for about half its population and immigrants from the Caribbean making up 20 percent.

Garvey was by this time a polished speaker. He had won a prize for public speaking in Jamaica and had spoken at Speakers' Corner in Hyde Park in London. He quickly built a following on the streets and moved into a rented hall when his audiences became too large for the street. By 1918 he had made the decision to relocate his headquarters from Kingston, Jamaica, to Harlem. He incorporated the Universal Negro Improvement Association and African Communities League, as the organization was officially called, and moved ahead with great speed. His newspaper, Negro World, appeared in 1918. It would soon be the most widely circulated newspaper in the African world. It would also be one of the best. Its editors over the next few years would include some of African America's most talented journalists: T. Thomas Fortune, a former aide to Booker T. Washington and the generally acknowledged "dean" of African American journalists; John Edward Bruce ("Bruce Grit"), perhaps second only to Fortune in the hall of African American journalistic fame; Amy Jacques Garvey, the talented wife of Marcus Garvey; William H. Ferris, author of a two-volume work The African Abroad, who had a B.A. from Yale and an M.A. from Harvard in journalism; and Eric Walrond, author of Tropic Death, one of the outstanding collections of short stories of the Harlem Renaissance.

At the end of World War I in November 1918, Garvey could already attract a crowd of 5,000 to a meeting celebrating the armistice. In this year he also established the Negro Factories Corporation, which in turn established restaurants; a millinery factory, black doll factory, tailoring establishment, hotel, trucking business, and job printing press; and other enterprises in Harlem. By the early 1920s the Negro Factories Corporation was employing more than 1,000 people. In 1919, only three years after his arrival in the United States, Garvey—who was then thirty-two years old—began his most spectacular undertaking, the Black Star Line Steamship Company. This steamship line was plagued with difficulties and eventually collapsed, but its ships had sailed up and down the eastern seaboard of the United States and to several Caribbean islands and Central America. The line's appearance was everywhere met with jubilant demonstrations from African Americans and Afro-Caribbeans, who greeted it as an expression of hope for a suffering people.

In 1920 Garvey held the largest convention in African American history to that time. UNIA's First International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World met on 1 August 1920 at Madison Square Garden in New York, with 25,000 people in attendance—an overflow crowd. Delegates came from many countries. After the ceremonial opening, the deliberations continued at the organization's Liberty Hall in Harlem for the rest of the month.

Garvey was by now the best-known figure in the African world. The king of Swaziland is said to have admitted that he knew of only two African Americans, namely Marcus Garvey and Jack Johnson, the heavy-weight boxing champion. Garvey's exploits were being reported, often with exaggeration and even hysteria, in the newspapers of Europe and farther afield. British and other colonial governments were banning his newspaper and imprisoning his followers in an attempt to curb his influence. The U.S. government kept him under intense surveillance. By 1919 J. Edgar Hoover, later famous as head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), had begun plotting to have Garvey deported, a plot that was realized in 1927. In 1919 Garvey also survived an attempted assassination said to have been instigated by a district attorney in New York.

Meanwhile Garvey's physical presence in Harlem had become inescapable. His weekly meetings at Liberty Hall on 138th Street attracted thousands. UNIA and the Black Star Line boasted some of the best choirs and orchestras in New York, and UNIA's convention parades were spectacular affairs, with numerous brass bands, uniformed auxiliaries of UNIA, and thousands of spectators. The opening parade of the convention of 1920 is said to have been ten miles long. Garvey rode in an open car, wearing the plumed hat and military uniform favored by powerful leaders of the day. By contrast, his day-to-day attire could be plain and even shabby on occasion.

Garvey's physical presence was matched by his ideological presence. Harlem was an area of radical ideas and influential personalities. Between World War I and 1920 A. Philip Randolph published the socialist magazine The Messenger. Hubert H. Harrison, a "race man" and sometime socialist, published The Voice and in 1917 founded the Liberty League of Negro Americans. Cyril Briggs led the African Blood Brotherhood. He published the magazine Crusader and led a small cadre into the Workers (Communist) Party. Downtown, on the white side of New York, the integrationist and exponent of protest politics W. E. B. Du Bois published Crisis, which was the organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and African America's largest magazine.

Garvey distinguished himself from this crowded field by championing the ideology of African nationalism, which in due course would become known as Garveyism. Like Booker T. Washington he felt that Africa's descendants should become economically self-reliant. He went much farther than Washington, however, in eschewing financial assistance from whites, in building a racially exclusive organization, and in adopting a confrontational attitude toward the white power structure.

There were three facets to his nationalist ideology: “race first,” self-reliance, and nationhood. “Race first” was a term used earlier by Hubert H. Harrison, who later joined forces with Garvey for a while. It suggested that African people must put their racial self-interest first. Garvey thought that despite the class difference among Africa’s descendants, they were all beset by the problem of race, which therefore became a common denominator. He hoped to turn the disability of race into a positive factor by rallying his followers around the reality that they had in common. By politically organizing around the concept of race, he would turn it into a powerful force for mobilization and empowerment.

Only people of African descent could join UNIA. African descent was defined liberally to include people of mixed African and other races, as long as they acknowledged and identified with their African origin. Garvey was hostile to those for whom light skin encouraged disdain for their darker brethren. Although he recruited the darker masses like none other, there was a fair representation of members of all hues within the organization.

Race first meant that African people should see beauty in themselves. Racially demeaning ads for beauty products were frowned on, and Garveyites were encouraged to display racially appropriate pictures in their homes. Garvey’s framed essay, “African Fundamentalism,” was a favorite wall decoration. Race first also meant putting the racial interest first in literature, historical writing, religion, and every sphere of life. It did not mean unwarranted antagonism toward other races, but Garvey was adamant that all other peoples put their racial self-interest first and that African peoples must learn to aggressively pursue theirs. He therefore urged his followers to scrutinize critically the works of other historians on the African past. He argued that other historians could never write with true love or feeling for the African. Garvey’s Afrocentric vision led him to challenge the assertions of European historians that King Tut, whose tomb was discovered in Egypt in 1922, was white.

Race first also meant that God had to be depicted as black. People have always depicted their gods in their own image and likeness, Garvey argued, and African people should not be exceptions to that rule. Race first also made necessary independent media capable of injecting the perspectives of the race into the marketplace of ideas. UNIA’s Negro World performed this task admirably.

It was in literature and the arts that race first had the most direct impact on the Harlem Renaissance, which was essentially a literary and cultural movement. By the time that the renaissance became fully conscious of itself in the mid-1920s, Garvey and UNIA had already anticipated its activity by several years. Negro World was UNIA’s single most important contribution to the renaissance. Under the direction of Hubert H. Harrison, it introduced the first regular book review section in an African American publication. From the early 1920s it published “Poetry for the People,” a section that showcased the poems, both good and bad, of hundreds of contributors. Important literary figures such as Zora Neale Hurston and important political figures such as T. Albert Marryshow of Grenada and Kobina Sekyi of Ghana were among the aspiring poets, as was Garvey. Poetic submissions were supplemented by contributions on poetics (usually entitled “What Is Poetry?”), music, drama, and the like. In the period 1920 to 1925 Negro World was in all likelihood the most important literary outlet for pan-African writing. It also pioneered literary competitions, later a notable feature of the renaissance. With a weekly publication schedule and a circulation much larger than that of Du Bois’s Crisis, Negro World reached more readers in more countries and published more aspiring writers than many of its rivals combined. Most of Garvey’s own poetry was published from 1927 to the late 1930s, after the heyday of literary activity by Negro World. His collected poems are enough to fill a work of respectable size, The Poetical Works of Marcus Garvey.

Garvey’s second major idea, self-reliance, was exemplified by the Negro Factories Corporation and the Black Star Line, as well as in Negro World, which was in addition to everything else a successful business. His famous admonition “do for self” later became a staple in the ideas of the Nation of Islam, led by a former Garveyite, Elijah Muhammad.

Nationhood postulated the building of independent political power, whether in the United States or abroad. Garvey’s ambitious Universal Political Union attempted to enlist the voting strength of his followers to influence politics in the United States. It was, however, unable to develop to its full potential because of Garvey’s imprisonment in 1925 and the consequent slow decline of UNIA.

By the early 1920s Marcus Garvey was indisputably the most powerful leader in African America and the pan-African world. His UNIA had approximately 1,200 branches (called divisions) in more than forty countries. There were divisions in thirty-eight states, with the South being far and away the most intensely organized region. Louisiana alone had seventy-four branches, according to surviving records, and in actuality the number was somewhat larger. Large cities throughout North America had large branches with thousands of members, and these branches owned substantial amounts of real estate. The cities included New York, Chicago, Detroit, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Toronto, Montreal, Miami, and New Orleans.

Garvey's success and his well-defined ideology brought forth a host of adversaries. Some, such as communists and integrationists, opposed him on ideological grounds. Communists preached the primacy of class over race and saw the united workers of the world as the most potent force for political change. Garvey countered that white workers were as infected as anyone else with the virus of racism and that while interracial working-class solidarity might be good as an ideal, it was premature to adopt this as a practical strategy to lift the African race out of oppression. Integrationists, led by NAACP, resented Garvey's ability to mobilize a vast number of people and to amass more money than the integrationists could, despite their access to white philanthropy. Du Bois became the major unofficial spokesman for the integrationist group. Du Bois, who had been trained at Harvard and was still fresh from a serious conflict with Garvey's mentor Booker T. Washington, considered Garvey poorly educated, uncouth, and dishonest. He described Garvey as black and ugly and called him a lunatic or a traitor. Garvey responded with similar vitriol, suggesting that Du Bois hated the small amount of African blood that flowed through his veins.

The most damaging of Garvey's opponents, however, were the European colonialist governments and the United States. Colonial powers such as Great Britain and France banned Negro World, arrested Garveyites, sometimes prevented Garvey from landing in their territories, and generally tried to frustrate the work of UNIA. The United States arrayed its security apparatus against Garvey, planted agents in his organization, and eventually sent him to prison on a dubious charge of mail fraud in connection with the failure of the Black Star Line.

After serving almost three years of his five-year sentence, Garvey was released early when President Calvin Coolidge commuted his sentence in 1927. By this time millions of people around the world had appended their names to petitions asking for Garvey's release. The timing of his release may also have been influenced by an impending presidential year in the United States. Presidential commutation was, however, made contingent on deportation, and Garvey was shipped to Jamaica in December 1927. There he arrived to the greatest hero's welcome in the history of that country. He again published newspapers and held a grand international convention. In 1929 he founded the People's Political Party, Jamaica's first modern political party. He was once more imprisoned, however, this time by Jamaica's British rulers. He relocated to England in 1935 in an effort to rebuild his declining movement, now weakened by a schism.

Garvey died in London in 1940. Although UNIA never regained the dominance it had held during the 1920s, it remained an important organization in several places as late as the 1950s. An impressive array of later leaders in African America and throughout the pan-African world had roots in Garveyism. They included such children of Garveyites as Congressman Charles Diggs of Detroit, Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm of Brooklyn (New York), and Malcolm X. Garvey's ideas also permeated the "black power" era of the 1960s and 1970s and the later Afrocentric movement in academia. After two decades during which Garvey had been nearly expunged from the historical record, the black power movement of the 1960s rediscovered him as a precursor and a hero. He has since become, in addition, a very popular object of academic inquiry. The centenary of his birth in 1987 was an occasion for large-scale celebrations around the world.

Marcus Garvey, 1926. (Library of Congress.)

Marcus Garvey, c. 1920. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

Marcus Garvey was born on 17 August 1887, in St. Ann's Bay on Jamaica's north coast. He founded UNIA in 1914; he arrived in the United States in March 1916. By 1918 he had decided to relocate his headquarters from Kingston, Jamaica, to Harlem; his newspaper, Negro World, appeared in 1918. He began the Black Star Line in 1919. UNIA's First International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World met on 1 August 1920, at Madison Square Garden in New York. Garvey championed African nationalism (Garveyism), and his Universal Political Union attempted to mobilize voters to influence politics in the United States. Garvey was imprisoned in 1925 (on a charge related to the failure of the Black Star Line); he was released in 1927 but was deported to Jamaica in December of that year. In 1929 he founded the People's Political Party in Jamaica, but he was imprisoned again in Jamaica and in 1935 went to Great Britain. Garvey died in London in 1940, at age fifty-two.

TONY MARTIN

See also Black Star Line; Garveyism; Negro World; New Negro Movement; Pan-Africanism; Universal Negro Improvement Association; specific individuals

Further Reading

- Garvey, Amy Jacques. Garvey and Garveyism. Kingston, Jamaica: Author, 1963.
- Garvey, Amy Jacques, ed. The Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, Or, Africa for the Africans. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986. (First published, 1923, 1925.)
- Garvey, Marcus. The Poetical Works of Marcus Garvey, comp. and ed. Tony Martin. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983.
- Martin, Tony. Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983a.
- . Marcus Garvey, Hero: A First Biography. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983b.
- . Race First: The Ideological and Organizational Struggles of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986. (First published 1976.)
- . African Fundamentalism: A Literary and Cultural Anthology of Garvey's Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1991.
- Negro World*. (Available on microfilm.)

Garveyism

Garveyism is the term applied to the ideology of Marcus Mozhiah Garvey (1887–1940), leader of the largest African American and pan-African mass movement ever. Garveyism flourished in the 1920s, the peak period of Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA). It has remained a vital force in pan-African life. The term is probably as old as his UNIA (founded in Jamaica in 1914), but it was further popularized by Garvey and Garveyism (1963), the biography written by his wife, Amy Jacques Garvey.

Garveyism was essentially what has variously been called African or black nationalism. It was therefore not a new ideology, although it received arguably its most definitive articulation from Marcus Garvey. This idea has been a staple of African American thought since the inception of political activity in that community. In UNIA, Garvey was able to fashion a mass instrument to implement his ideas on a scale without precedent or parallel.

Black nationalism has traditionally been articulated in contradistinction to integrationism. Whereas integrationists have preferred to stress the Americanness of African Americans, nationalists have emphasized the African aspect. Integrationists have therefore worked within interracial organizations, often, like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), founded and led by Euro-Americans. Nationalists have tended toward racially exclusive organizations, preferring independent endeavor rather than dependence on the goodwill of others.

Among Garvey's distinguished nationalist precursors can be counted David Walker, whose David Walker's Appeal (1829) remains one of the most celebrated polemics of African American history. Walker refuted the pseudoscientific theories that considered Africans to be an inferior species. He denounced American slavery as the harshest in history and saw the white perpetrators of this evil as devils. He encouraged the African American population to rise up against its oppressors. Martin Delany, author of The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States (1852), is another precursor, as are Bishop Henry McNeal Turner of the African Methodist Episcopal Church and Edward Wilmot Blyden, an intellectual of the late nineteenth century and the early twentieth who was born in the Caribbean and based in West Africa. Delany, Turner, and Blyden all exalted their blackness, sought to rescue African history from the distortions of others, and advocated emigration to Africa as the ultimate salvation for African Americans in a hostile land. Bishop Turner insisted that God be portrayed as black. All of these ideas would later be incorporated into Garveyism.

The ideology of Garveyism was systematically developed by Garvey in hundreds of speeches, supplemented by essays, poems, and other writings, throughout his political life. The major tenets of the ideology revolved around three very straightforward concepts: "race first," self-reliance, and nationhood. In his early readings and in his travels in the Caribbean, Latin America, and Europe between 1910 and 1914,

Garvey noticed, with great alarm, the universal suffering of the African race. The race was everywhere subjugated and weak, and Garvey grappled with the problem of how to turn its fortunes around and save it, as he assessed the situation, from reenslavement or even extinction. For a people lacking political or economic power, he saw the power of organization, buttressed by an appropriate ideology of empowerment, as the solution to their predicament.

"Race first" postulated the necessity for African-descended peoples to put their own racial self-interest first. The precise expression was initially popularized by a Harlemite intellectual, Hubert H. Harrison, a sometime collaborator with Garvey. Garvey argued that all other races put their interests first, often to the detriment of others. Africans would have to be equally solicitous of their own welfare, although not necessarily to the extent of oppressing others. "Race first," Garvey said, freely acknowledged the right of others to safeguard their interests, although not the right to oppress others.

"Race first" permeated all aspects of his people's existence. It meant that African people should see physical beauty in themselves. This needed to be emphasized after several hundred years of slavery and its aftermath, which had stereotyped African hair, skin color, and phenotypes as ugly. Garvey urged his followers to remove white pinups from their walls. He frowned on racially demeaning advertisements for beauty products. He also praised the beauty of black women in poetry:

Black queen of beauty, thou hast given color to the world!

Among other women thou art royal and the fairest!

Like the brightest of jewels in the regal diadem,

Shin'st thou, Goddess of Africa, Nature's purest emblem!

Garvey's newspaper, Negro World, published a gala Christmas edition in 1921 showcasing beautiful African women of various tints and phenotypes, from all over the world. One of the beauties was Amy Jacques, soon to be Garvey's second wife.

But "race first" went well beyond physical considerations. Garvey was adamant that African people, alternatively dictated to and paternalistically led for so long, should now define their own reality. This must be the case in historical studies. Garvey, a keen amateur student of history, would have agreed with the famous assertion of the first editorial in African America's first newspaper, Freedom's Journal, in 1827: "Too long have others spoken for us," wrote the editors, John Brown Russwurm and Rev. Samuel Cornish. "We wish to plead our own cause." Garvey thought that other historians showed little love for the African. He stressed that only the suffering African could definitively interpret the experience of his or her people. "Mr. H. G. Wells may divert civilization for the benefit of his Anglo-Saxon group," he said on one occasion, "but that does not make it a fact that the people who laid claims to the civilization he attributed to others are going to give up easily. The black man knows his past."

Several prominent historians accordingly gravitated toward UNIA or were sympathetic to its aims. J. A. Rogers, the great discoverer of little-known facts of African history, on occasion wrote for Negro World. Carter G. Woodson, who was the second African American to receive a Ph.D. in history at Harvard University (1912), wrote a weekly column for the paper.

"Race first" also extended to religion. Garvey had a Christian upbringing, and his speeches and writings were laced with Christian allusions. Yet he advocated widespread religious tolerance within UNIA. Christians, Muslims, atheists, African Hebrews, and later Rastafarians were among those accommodated within the organization. All those who believed in a god probably accepted Garvey's insistence that God for African people must be portrayed in their own image and likeness (that is, as black). Two of the most important organizations growing out of UNIA after its decline in the 1930s made this idea a focal point of their new theologies. Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam proclaimed Islam the black man's religion, with a black God and a white devil. The Rastafarian movement accepted His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie of Ethiopia as the "living God."

Garveyism's strong advocacy of "race first" brought it into a symbiotic relationship with white supremacists such as Earnest Sevier Cox of the White America Society. Garvey was as hostile as anybody to the pseudoscience of supremacists, but he also distrusted white liberals, such as those running NAACP. In his rejection of miscegenation and in his desire for a separate state, he shared at least two crucial preferences with white supremacists. It was presumably on this basis that Garvey accepted a request from the Ku Klux Klan for a summit meeting in Atlanta in 1922. Neither side had any illusions about the other's position. "I was speaking to a man who was brutally a white man,"

Garvey picturesquely put it, "and I was speaking to him as a man who was brutally a Negro."

When UNIA was founded in 1914, Garvey was already an accomplished printer and journalist. He had by then edited his own publications in Jamaica, Costa Rica, and Panama and had worked for the foremost pan-African journal of the day, Duse Mohamed Ali's Africa Times and Orient Review, which was based in London. He was therefore acutely aware of the power of the media. Uncompromisingly independent media thus became an indispensable adjunct to the idea of "race first." A struggling race had to inject its point of view into the marketplace of ideas. "We are not afraid of the word 'propaganda,'" Garvey explained, "for we use the term in the sense of disseminating our ideas among Negroes all the world over. We have nothing stealthy in this meaning." Garvey's Negro World, published in Harlem from 1918 to 1933, became the African world's most widely circulated newspaper in the 1920s. In addition to general news, its editorials, transcribed speeches, creative writing, and letters all reflected UNIA's doctrine of race first. The potency of this message was not lost on imperialist governments, which banned Negro World in several countries in Africa, Central America, and the Caribbean.

"Race first" helped provide the underpinning of racial pride and awareness that permeated the Harlem Renaissance. Garvey's influence on the renaissance was also more direct, because his activities inserted themselves into Harlem's literary and cultural life. Garvey's movement nurtured such well-known fledgling writers and artists as Zora Neale Hurston, Eric Walrond, Claude McKay, and the sculptor Augusta Savage, together with others less well known. Some of these did their earliest apprentice work in the pages of Negro World, which practically doubled as political newspaper and literary organ.

Garvey encouraged an explosion of literary and cultural activity that actually anticipated the "official" dates (c. mid- to late 1920s) usually given for the Harlem Renaissance. Negro World, in its section "Poetry for the People," published many bards, known and unknown, from all over the world. It also provided a rich fare of literary vignettes, short stories, literary criticism, articles on poetics, thoughts on music appreciation, and the like. Negro World also pioneered the literary competitions of the Harlem Renaissance era. African America's first regular book review column appeared in Negro World, edited by Hubert H. Harrison.

Garvey applied his idea of "race first" to literary work, in what in hindsight might be called the Garvey aesthetic. Black writers should approach their task responsibly. They should maintain a certain racial decorum. They should not “prostitute” their talent, as Garvey put it, to titillate white audiences desirous of confirming their negative stereotypes of the race. Garvey accordingly criticized Claude McKay’s blockbuster novel Home to Harlem (1928). He similarly criticized Paul Robeson for acting in films such as The Emperor Jones, which held the race up to ridicule.

Garvey practiced what he preached and produced a substantial corpus of poems and plays, in addition to many memorable speeches and essays. Many of the prose items were collected by Amy Jacques Garvey in the famous Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, Or, Africa for the Africans (1923 and 1925). The literary aspect of Garveyism was also articulated by the accomplished corps of editorial workers at Negro World. These included T. Thomas Fortune, the generally acknowledged “dean” of African American journalists; William H. Ferris, a graduate of Harvard and Yale; John Edward Bruce (popularly known as “Bruce Grit”), a highly respected veteran journalist; Eric Walrond, a major short-story writer; and Amy Jacques Garvey, an associate editor at Negro World.

The second major principle of Garveyism was self-reliance. Garvey stressed the psychological benefits to be derived from “doing for self.” Although he favored reparations, he refused to accept financial assistance from white philanthropists for the mature UNIA. UNIA’s monuments to self-reliance were exceedingly successful for a time and astounded friend and foe alike. The Negro Factories Corporation operated restaurants, groceries, a printing press, a trucking business, a millinery establishment, and a factory where black dolls were made, and manufactured UNIA uniforms, among other things. It employed more than 1,000 people in Harlem. Divisions of UNIA in cities such as New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Toronto, and Montreal owned valuable real estate. Negro World was, in addition to everything else, a hugely successful business enterprise. In the Black Star Line Steamship Company, UNIA produced the most spectacular African American business undertaking of the period. The line’s three acquired ships (it paid down on a fourth) sailed between the eastern seaboard of the United States and the Caribbean and Central America. Thousands assembled to see the ships in such places as New York and South Carolina. In Port Limon, Costa Rica, workers stopped work for the day and showered a Black Star Line ship with fruit and flowers. Garvey collected more money from the shareholders of Black Star Line than white-funded organizations such as the NAACP and National Urban League were able to dream of.

The spirit of self-reliance permeated every aspect of UNIA. A publishing house produced Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, although it became one of the casualties of Garvey’s imprisonment in 1925 and the consequent slow demise of UNIA.

The third major tenet of Garveyism was what Garvey called “nationhood.” Nationhood was essentially a quest for political self-determination. Despite his emphasis on African regeneration and his effort to relocate his headquarters to Liberia, Garvey did not advocate neglect of local politics wherever African people found themselves. He was acutely aware of the universal political powerlessness of African people and sought to address this in many ways. UNIA conceived of itself as a provisional prototype of a future African government. Delegates to a convention held by UNIA accordingly bestowed the title “provisional president of Africa” on Garvey. At its annual international conventions (the convention of 1920 attracted 25,000 people to the opening ceremonies), UNIA had a provisional parliament, in which delegates from many countries, such as England and South Africa, debated issues affecting the race.

The first convention, of 1920, was responsible for the adoption and popularization of several important symbols of nationhood. These included the “Universal Ethiopian Anthem,” composed especially for UNIA and designated the anthem of the race. Red, black, and green were declared the official colors of the race—red for blood and sacrifice, black for the sons and daughters of Africa, and green for the luxuriant land of their forebears. These colors have endured among the mass of Africa’s descendants in North America, the Caribbean, and elsewhere. They have also been incorporated into the flags of some independent African countries.

One of the most ambitious manifestations of nationhood coming out of the convention of 1920 was the important Declaration of Rights of the Negro Peoples of the World. The assembled delegates produced a historically significant document outlining the main grievances of African people everywhere and also making demands for improved treatment. They declared in the document’s preamble:

Be it Resolved, That the Negro people of the world, through their chosen representatives in convention assembled in Liberty Hall . . . protest against the wrongs and injustices they are suffering at the hands of their white brethren, and state what they deem their fair and just rights, as well as the treatment they propose to demand of all men in the future.

The document deplored racism in public transportation, including international travel by sea. It deplored the racism of court systems and the use of African and Caribbean soldiers in white people's wars. It condemned lynching as the most revolting barbarity visited on African Americans. It condemned the unusually cruel treatment of African people in prisons. It wanted Africa's descendants everywhere to be made "free citizens of Africa." It deplored Jim Crow and denial of voting rights in the United States. It called for the capitalization of the word "Negro" and the teaching of black history in schools. "We also demand," the delegates said, "Africa for the Africans at home and abroad." The document proclaimed the determination of the men of the race to defend their women from the depredations of white men.

All of these multifarious trappings of nationhood were reinforced by the UNIA's diplomatic service, which sent ambassadors and commissioners to Great Britain, Liberia, and the League of Nations, among other places.

For the United States, Garvey planned an ambitious foray into nationhood through his Universal Political Union (UPU). Like much else, UPU failed to reach maturity because of Garvey's imprisonment in 1925. It was an attempt to harness the vast following of UNIA for political ends. UPU would endeavor to control the votes of its constituency to reward those politicians who were good to African America. It would likewise seek to punish, by withholding support, those who reneged on their promises. For the few short months of its existence, UPU showed itself willing to oppose African American candidates and support white ones, when that seemed necessary to ensure its objectives.

Nationhood could also be seen in Garvey's view of Africa in general. He advocated the recovery of African independence, which had been comprehensively lost in the European "scramble for Africa" from the mid-nineteenth century to World War I. UNIA's own plan to relocate its headquarters from Harlem to Liberia was an effort to plant itself in almost the only African nation enjoying a semblance of independence at the time. (Ethiopia was the only other independent country on the African continent.) Everywhere that UNIA implanted itself, its advocacy of nationhood bore political fruit. The African National Congress in South Africa, the Workingmen's Association in Trinidad and Tobago, and the Lagos Youth Movement in Nigeria were among the political entities permeated with Garveyites. In Cuba the British diplomatic representatives came close to formally acknowledging UNIA as a quasi-representative body for the large immigrant British West Indian population. After his deportation from the United States to Jamaica in 1927, Garvey founded Jamaica's first modern political party, the People's Political Party. Garvey served several terms on the Kingston and Saint Andrew Corporation Council.

That Garvey's message of nationhood was heard can be seen from the figures who claimed that he was their political inspiration. These include Kwame Nkrumah, first president of independent Ghana; Nnamdi Azikiwe, first governor-general of Nigeria; and Jomo Kenyatta, independence leader of Kenya. In the United States, Malcolm X and Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm, the first African American woman in Congress, were children of activist Garveyites.

The ideology of Garveyism energized the largest pan-African mass movement of all time. Its appeal was as universal as the UNIA's name. Garveyism was propagated in Garvey's Negro World, in the spoken words of official and unofficial emissaries of the movement, in official or quasi-official publications and documents such as the Universal Negro Catechism, and through UNIA's Constitution and Book of Laws.

In the 1930s, after his deportation from the United States, Garvey distilled his wisdom into a secret course of lessons administered both by correspondence and in person in Toronto. These lessons, later published as Message to the People: The Course of African Philosophy, summarized the main ideas of Garveyism, together with practical advice for organizers on self-education, personal deportment, diplomacy, fund-raising, and other pertinent subjects. Prominently restated here was Garvey's concept of God, an important corollary of his ideas of "race first" and self-reliance. God, Garvey said, endowed all human beings equally and then left them to their own devices to fight the battle of life. Any race that fell behind could blame itself at least in part for not fulfilling its God-given potential to be the equal of other races.

The spread of Garveyism was nothing short of phenomenal. Within three years of his obscure landing in the United States, Garvey had started Negro World and the Black Star Line. One year later he had convened the largest convention to date in African American history. The spread of the idea and the movement that gave it concrete expression can be attributed to many factors. Among these are Garvey's charisma as a speaker and writer and the fact that he was an indefatigable organizer. An important element in UNIA's success was also the clarity of Garvey's articulation of his ideology. Garveyism appealed equally to the Aborigines of Australia and the congregation of the local African Methodist Episcopal Church in Colorado Springs, Colorado, which formed the nucleus of UNIA in that city. Moreover, although undoubtedly a mass movement like few others, UNIA and its ideology of Garveyism also attracted many distinguished intellectuals.

As a successful ideology, Garveyism inevitably attracted opponents as well. The major organizational battles fought by Garvey and UNIA were in essence ideological battles against those who disagreed with, hated, or feared Garveyism. The integrationist elite, especially in the United States, were implacable foes and collaborated with the government to hasten Garvey's ultimate trial and deportation. W. E. B. Du Bois and other members of NAACP and other anti-Garvey organizations, wrote, either in concert or individually, to the attorney-general, the secretary of state, and other officials offering their services in the campaign against Garveyism. The United States and European colonialist governments feared Garvey's impact on the African masses as they became radicalized and decided that they needed to throw off their yoke. The Communist International resented Garvey's ability to organize the proletarians and peasants the communists coveted. The communists also opposed their doctrine of "class first" to Garvey's ideology of "race first." For a communist, the white worker was the best friend of his fellow black proletarian. For Garvey, class distinctions within the race were real but of less significance than the racial oppression that indiscriminately bound all African peoples together.

All of these adversaries took their toll on UNIA, but the organization might have survived as a major force if the state power of the United States had not been deployed against it. Despite Garvey's deportation in 1927, UNIA was still an influential, although not overwhelmingly important, entity into the 1950s in places such as New York, Toronto, Montreal, Philadelphia, and Detroit.

The slow demise of UNIA did not mean the demise of Garveyism, which remains an important expression of the African nationalism that has always been a major force in African America and elsewhere. The "black power" movement of the 1960s and 1970s was a peak manifestation of Garveyism and African nationalism. This period brought Garvey to the forefront once again, both as an icon of the movement and as a subject of serious historical scholarship. His popularity has tended to grow on both fronts ever since.

After all is said and done, Garveyism was simply an expression of racial uplift for a downtrodden people who, Garvey asserted, had it within them to regain their God-given right to equality with the rest of the world. He summarized his ideology in the short and beautiful essay "African Fundamentalism." The subtitles proclaimed the Garveyism that the essay expounded: "A Racial Hierarchy and Empire for Negroes"; "Negro's Faith Must Be Confidence in Self"; "His Creed: One God, One Aim, One Destiny." Garvey began the essay as follows:

The time has come for the Negro to forget and cast behind him his hero worship and adoration of other races, and to start out immediately to create and emulate heroes of his own. We must canonize our own saints, create our own martyrs, and elevate to positions of fame and honor black men and women who have made their distinct contributions to our racial history.

Never, however, was his summary of Garveyism so succinct as in his poem "Blackman!" (1934):

What Is In Thy Bosom? Pluck It
Out—Is It Genius, Is It Talent
For Something? Let's Have It.

TONY MARTIN

See also Black Star Line; Emperor Jones, The; Garvey, Marcus; Harrison, Hubert; Hurston, Zora Neale; McKay, Claude; Negro World; Pan-Africanism; Robeson, Paul; Rogers, Joel Augustus; Savage, Augusta; Universal Negro Improvement Association; Walrond, Eric; Woodson, Carter G.; other specific individuals

Further Reading

- Burkett, Randall. Garveyism as a Religious Movement. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow, 1978.
- Garvey, Amy Jacques. Garvey and Garveyism. Kingston: Author 1963.
- Garvey, Amy Jacques, comp. and ed. The Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey, Or, Africa for the Africans. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986. (Originally published in two vols., 1923, 1925.)

- Garvey, Marcus. The Poetical Works of Marcus Garvey, comp. and ed. Tony Martin. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983.
- . Message to the People: The Course of African Philosophy, ed. Tony Martin. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986.
- Hill, Robert A., Carol A. Rudisell, et al., eds. The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Berkeley: University of California Press, Vol. 1, 1983. (See also subsequent volumes.)
- Lewis, Rupert, and Patrick Bryan, eds. Garvey: His Work and Impact. Trenton, N.J.: African World, 1991.
- Martin, Tony. Literary Garveyism: Garvey, Black Arts, and the Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983a.
- . Marcus Garvey, Hero: A First Biography. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1983b.
- . The Pan-African Connection. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1984. (Originally published 1983.)
- . Race First: The Ideological and Organizational Struggles of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1986. (Originally published 1976.)
- Martin, Tony, comp. and ed. African Fundamentalism: A Literary and Cultural Anthology of Garvey's Harlem Renaissance. Dover, Mass.: Majority, 1991.

Gershwin, George

George Gershwin, a son of Russian Jewish immigrants, earned a reputation as America's first generally recognized great composer, a writer adept at long-form serious works, Broadway musicals, popular songs, and folk opera. A large part of the reason his oeuvre remains so vibrant, lasting, and controversial was that Gershwin incorporated black musical influences and devices more frequently and effectively than his peers. Classical music critics expressed discomfort that he studied and openly loved black musical forms and Tin Pan Alley pop as much as classical practice and theory, but the public embraced the amalgam, which helped shape the definition of serious American music and highlighted how it differed from European forms. During the jazz age of the 1920s, when blacks were almost entirely shut out of the most popular sectors of the radio and recording industries and white interpretations of jazz ruled the airwaves, primary innovators such as Bessie Smith and Louis Armstrong were relegated to appearances on "race records" and in segregated clubs. With his witty use, in his compositions, of African American musical devices from blues and jazz, Gershwin recognized the centrality of the black contribution to American music and life. He did not water down jazz as much as other white bandleaders and composers of the day, and he helped create an eventual multiracial market for the black jazz and blues artists who would break through the segregation of the entertainment industry in the late 1920s and become internationally revered. There was also a significant amount of cross-pollination between Gershwin and jazz artists throughout the twentieth century: his compositions were among the most covered by them, and some of Gershwin's ideas, especially the chord sequence for "I Got Rhythm," became popular source material for new compositions by artists including Duke Ellington ("Cotton Tail," 1940) and Charlie Parker ("Moose the Mooche," 1946).

Gershwin's career began when he quit high school to work as a song plugger in the Tin Pan Alley publishing house of Jerome H. Remick. The work disillusioned him when he found that most songs he promoted were written to make a quick buck, rather than to match the sophisticated musical quality Gershwin admired in the songs Jerome Kern wrote for Broadway musicals. Gershwin's attempts to breathe interest into these hoary commercial pieces improved his piano and arranging skills, and by 1916 he was composing his own works while embarking on a successful side career as a performer on piano rolls. In early 1917, he left Remick and the song plugging business behind for a job closer to the world he wanted to inhabit, becoming a rehearsal pianist for a new musical by Kern. Within a year, Gershwin landed his first publishing deal. A year after that, four months before his twenty-first birthday, he composed his first full Broadway score, La La Lucille.

Al Jolson's over-the-top rendition of "Swanee" was Gershwin's first hit song; it earned Gershwin $10,000 in royalties in 1920 alone. While he spent the next four years learning the mechanics of Broadway musical production by composing and arranging ten shows for Broadway and London stages, the money and fame he received from "Swanee" allowed him to begin composing and presenting long-form serious works. Although little known, Blue Monday (1922) was the first of these, an early unsuccessful attempt at a "miniature" American opera about black life. Gershwin and the lyricist B. G. DeSylva completed it in five days, and it played for only one night as part of George White's Scandals of 1922. This twenty-five-minute piece included actors in blackface and "an unabashed 'mammy song,'" according to Jablonski (1987), who describes its “stereotypical racism” as “no worse than the standard treatment of the Negro by white writers” of the period. Blue Monday featured a gambler as the central character, and much of the action takes place in a bar. Critics mostly savaged it, although it was revised and restaged in later decades. The next time Gershwin attempted an opera based on the lives of black Americans, he would show more care and conduct more research. His next foray into more serious realms occurred on 1 November 1923, during a “Recital of Ancient and Modern Music for Voice” by the mezzo-soprano Eva Gauthier at Aeolian Hall in New York City. Gauthier had been searching for fresh material, and Carl Van Vechten suggested that she sample the best of the popular American songwriters whose works were informed by jazz. The program featured works by Bartók and Schoenberg alongside an “American” section dedicated to works by Irving Berlin, Kern, and Gershwin, with Gershwin providing piano accompaniment. The reaction of the audience and critics proved wildly enthusiastic. The new masters of American popular song had never been placed in such a rarefied atmosphere; the event marked the beginning of a highbrow respect for their craft that would increase during the course of the century.

The main event that transformed Gershwin into a major composer in the eyes of the American public was the premiere of Rhapsody in Blue at Aeolian Hall on 12 February 1924, as part of a program called “An Experiment in Modern Music.” The rapturous reception that greeted the composition overshadowed newspaper commentary concerning the show the next day, and transcended the somewhat crass publicity for the program. Paul Whiteman, the famous bandleader who concocted the event and conducted Rhapsody in Blue, had marketed the concert as an overview of American musical history, with judges from the classical field (such as Jascha Heifetz and Sergey Rachmaninoff) issuing opinions after the performances about what constituted the true identity of American music. Whiteman had so much enthusiasm for his idea that he had never asked Gershwin to participate before allowing newspapers to report that “Gershwin is at work on a jazz concerto.” Whiteman was lucky. Gershwin came through with what remains the most famous American concert composition.

Numerous theories have emerged to explain the excellence and continuing popularity of Rhapsody in Blue. Gershwin’s facility with melody and arranging, honed by his classical music studies, and his experience in writing memorable songs in the competitive milieus of Tin Pan Alley and Broadway were certainly important. But, as is the case with much enduring American music (such as spirituals, bluegrass, and country music), the resonance of this piece had a great deal to do with Gershwin’s ability to fuse disparate black and white sources into a compelling whole. Within Rhapsody in Blue, Gershwin combined classical forms and textures with the syncopation and “blue” thirds and sevenths of African American blues and jazz, the frenetic rhythms of urban America of the 1920s, and the keening sounds and minor-key modes of Jewish and Russian music. The black bandleader and composer James Reese Europe had made forays into Carnegie Hall in the mid-1910s; but aside from those, American music, by whites or blacks, was rarely heard in major concert halls. Rhapsody in Blue marked the beginning of a trend toward considering American music worthy of such exposure. After the financial and artistic success of Rhapsody in Blue, Gershwin spent more time developing concert music and receiving instruction from classical music teachers. The acclaimed Concerto in F and An American In Paris followed, along with the more academic and less appealing Second Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra (1931).

Months after the premiere of Rhapsody in Blue, Gershwin and his brother and lyricist Ira Gershwin made their first success in establishing their own approach to the Broadway musical—Lady Be Good! The romantic plots and song themes of the Gershwins’ musicals during the 1920s differed little at first from the competition, but their musical and lyrical sophistication were usually well above average and kept rising throughout the decade. As the brothers assembled more successful shows, they grew more adventurous in their choice of settings. The original production of Strike Up the Band, with a book by the humorist George S. Kaufman, and a carefully integrated score that developed the plot, was a step closer to Gershwin’s dream of developing a great American opera. (Usually, Broadway musicals were more haphazard in their construction, adding new hit songs whether or not these songs coalesced with the plot.) Strike Up the Band playfully but sharply criticized aspects of the 1920s: the embrace of materialism, American jingoism, profiteering by big business in World War I, and the meaninglessness of the war for many Americans—all themes shared by prominent writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Yet audiences did not support this step away from Broadway’s usual escapism, even if it did include “The Man I Love,” one of the most enduring of the Gershwins’ songs; the brothers and Kaufman were too far ahead of their time. A revival of the show in 1930, with the most controversial lyrics removed, did become a hit, though. Of Thee I Sing was a more auspicious attempt to bring the Broadway musical into new realms, winning a Pulitzer Prize for its book and libretto, which lightly satirized the American political system. While it did make some jabs at authority figures and included some talk of impending impeachment, its primary focus on presidential love and childbearing in the White House made for a far less threatening premise than Strike Up the Band. What was innovative about Of Thee I Sing, as Bowers (1995) has written, was the Gershwins' score: "a masterful progression of straight songs, recitatives, and extended musical scenes; it stormed the boundaries of conventional musical theater and charted new territory for the genre."

The lessons learned by the Gershwins in their Broadway years were brought to bear and heightened with their next production, the American "folk opera" (as Gershwin liked to call it) Porgy and Bess. It was based on a novel of 1925 by DuBose Heyward, who closely collaborated with the Gershwins on the opera. He viewed the project as a piece of folklore based on the experiences of poor blacks he knew well and studied extensively while working as a cotton checker for years on the wharves of Charleston, South Carolina. Like Blue Monday before it, Porgy dealt with themes of love and intense jealousy in the lives of gamblers, prostitutes, and other less-than-respectable blacks. In Porgy, however, an all-black cast played the roles, not whites in blackface, and the characterizations were deeper and more nuanced. The characters interacted in a community whose members were obviously devoted to one another and were hard workers attempting to do the best they could in a difficult environment. Heyward and Gershwin purposely sought to avoid the stereotypes of "Negro vaudeville" found in most depictions of blacks on American stages, including the stage play of Porgy (1927). Gershwin, at Heyward's urging, spent two months in Charleston, interacting with the black community. He found himself particularly inspired by the spirituals, as is heard in "Prayer," a piece using six different prayers sung simultaneously, in a revolving, hypnotic fashion similar to that of a black choir he heard in Charleston. Once again, Gershwin infused African American musical devices within a genre where they were usually not present—an operatic score. Many critics were initially put off by this hybrid, but the peculiarly American combination has been a main source of the appeal of Porgy and Bess through the generations.

Although Porgy and Bess is now considered a classic, its initial reception in New York was disappointing. After years of preparation, the three-hour opera had opened in Boston to a fifteen-minute ovation and glowing reviews, and the black composer and scholar J. Rosamond Johnson had declared that Gershwin was the "Abraham Lincoln of Negro music." The director and producers, however, found the length excessive and asked for cuts. Gershwin and his collaborators cooperated, shearing off one-quarter of the work, including many of the more challenging and intricate sequences. Two weeks later, the reviews in New York were mostly scathing, although some noted the power of the music and the historic nature of the production. Porgy and Bess closed prematurely, unable to earn back its principal. Besides the ill-advised cuts, which were restored in performances after Gershwin's death, another possible reason for the show's failure was the decision to use white opera stars to record the score for its initial release, instead of the black stars who had been carefully chosen by Gershwin. Lawrence Tibbett and Helen Jepson gave fine, if somewhat histrionic, performances, but they reflected too much of a European opera sensibility, whereas Gershwin had aimed for warmth and personality in his decidedly American opera by casting Todd Duncan and John W. Bubbles. Those in charge may have assumed that using the actual cast would have doomed the commercial prospects for the recordings, but five years later, when recordings of Porgy and Bess by the original cast were released, the opera finally began to catch on with the American mass public. Hundreds of recordings followed, by a multitude of artists in various genres.

Porgy and Bess engendered controversy over the decades, even as its reputation as the premier American opera solidified. The Gershwins and Heyward never insisted that it was an authentic portrait of black culture, but other observers suggested this, and some blacks expressed unhappiness that another major artistic success had risen from a vision of uneducated, morally suspect working-class blacks, no matter how much respect was paid to black culture and music in the construction of the show. The creators of Porgy and Bess had tried to avoid clichés from minstrelsy, but the subject matter still cut too close for some people, perhaps understandably. In 1953 the Eisenhower administration decided to send a state-sponsored tour of the opera to various foreign locales, including the Soviet Union, as an example of the positive state of American race relations, and this too angered many blacks. Some in the black musical community expressed resentment as well: they knew that, since the early 1920s, no black composers could receive the backing to stage a similarly expensive production concerning black life in a major opera or Broadway venue.

Gershwin spent most of his last months writing for films in Hollywood. Studio bosses worried about his recent immersion in highbrow material, but Gershwin assured them that he was as anxious to write million-sellers as they were to promote them. Any concerns on the studio's part were unwarranted. As no less an authority than Irving Berlin declared a half-century later, "no one wrote greater songs than George and Ira did during the last year of George's life." The brothers once again reached for and attained new heights with compositions such as "Nice Work If You Can Get It," "They All Laughed," and "They Can't Take That Away from Me." With their relaxed swing, their sophisticated romantic patter, and their humor (in both words and music) based on the seemingly real-life trials of lovers, these songs are perennially charming expositions of high art on the jukebox. When Gershwin began his career, such notions of high art concerning American popular music were incongruous; by the time he succumbed to a brain tumor in 1937, this idea was well on the way to worldwide acceptance, thanks in large part to his contributions.

George Gershwin, 1938. (Library of Congress.)

Biography

George Gershwin (Jacob Gershvin) was born in Brooklyn, New York, on 26 September 1898. He studied at public schools and received musical instruction from Charles Hambitzer (1912–1914); Edward Kilenyi, Sr. (1919–1921); Henry Cowell (1927–1929); and Joseph Schillinger (1932–1936). Gershwin was a song plugger for Jerome H. Remick, a music publishing firm in New York City (1914–1917); a performer on piano rolls for various companies (1916–1926); and a rehearsal pianist and concert organizer and accompanist at the Century Theater (1917). He secured a contract with the Harms musical publishing company in 1918. His first full Broadway score was La La Lucille (1919). He composed the scores for ten shows on Broadway and in London, including five for the producer George White in 1920–1924. Gershwin was accompanist and composer for Eva Gauthier's program at Aeolian Hall featuring songs by European classical and American popular composers (1923). He composed and premiered several long-form serious works, including Rhapsody in Blue, 1924; Concerto in F, 1925; An American in Paris, 1928; and Second Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra, 1931. He composed the music for several highly successful Broadway musicals, with his brother Ira as lyricist, including Lady, Be Good! 1924; Tell Me More, 1925; Tip-Toes, 1925; Oh, Kay! 1926; Funny Face, 1927; Treasure Girl, 1928; Show Girl, 1929; Girl Crazy, 1930; Strike Up the Band, 1930; and Of Thee I Sing, 1931. He composed songs for major motion pictures, including Delicious, 1931; Shall We Dance, 1937; A Damsel in Distress, 1937; and The Goldwyn Follies, 1938. He hosted, performed on, and produced the nationally broadcast CBS radio program Music by Gershwin, 1934–1935. He composed the music for the folk opera Porgy and Bess, 1935. Gershwin died in Hollywood, California, on 11 July 1937.

HARVEY COHEN

See also Bubbles, John; Ellington, Duke; Europe, James Reese; Heyward, DuBose; Johnson, John Rosamond; Porgy and Bess; Porgy: Novel; Porgy: Play; Van Vechten, Carl

Selected Works

Gershwin Plays Gershwin: The Piano Rolls. 1993. (Collection of Gershwin's piano roll performances from 1916 to 1926, Elektra/Nonesuch.)

- "Swanee." 1919. (Lyrics by Irving Caesar.)
Lullaby for String Quartet. 1919.
Rhapsody in Blue. 1924.
Lady, Be Good! 1924. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin, book by Guy Bolton and Fred Thompson.)
Concerto in F. 1925.
"Sweet and Lowdown." 1925. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)
Strike Up the Band. 1927. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin, book by George S. Kaufman.)
"The Man I Love." 1927. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)
An American in Paris. 1928.
"But Not for Me." 1930. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)
"I Got Rhythm." 1930. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)
Of Thee I Sing. 1931. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin, book by George S. Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind.)
Porgy and Bess. 1935. (Lyrics by DuBose Heyward and Ira Gershwin, libretto by Hayward.)
"Nice Work If You Can Get It." 1937. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)
"They All Laughed." 1937. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)
"They Can't Take That Away from Me." 1937. (Lyrics by Ira Gershwin.)

Further Reading

- Bowers, Dwight Blocker, Larry Starr, and Herb Wong. Liner notes. I Got Rhythm: The Music of George Gershwin. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Collection of Recordings, 1995.
- Jablonski, Edward. Gershwin: A Biography. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1987.
- Jablonski, Edward, and Lawrence D. Stewart. The Gershwin Years. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973.
- Kimball, Robert, ed. The Complete Lyrics of Ira Gershwin. New York: Knopf, 1993.
- Rosenberg, Deena. Fascinating Rhythm: The Collaboration of George and Ira Gershwin. New York: Dutton, 1991.
- Schiff, David. Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Schwartz, Charles. Gershwin: His Life and Music. New York: Da Capo, 1973.
- Wilder, Alec. American Popular Song: The Great Innovators 1900–1950. London: Oxford University Press, 1972.

Gilpin, Charles

Charles Sidney Gilpin (1878–1930) began his acting career by performing in saloons and theaters at night, and as a temporary performer for traveling shows, to earn extra money; he also sharpened his talents by working as a singer or dancer at fairs, restaurants, and variety theaters. Even in his early teens, his baritone voice was distinctive.

Gilpin moved with his mother to Philadelphia in the early 1890s. He continued to expand his talent for song, dance, and comedy while working with vaudeville and minstrel companies, including the Big Spectacular Log Cabin Company and Perkus and Davis Great Southern Minstrel Barn Storming Aggregation. After the latter folded in 1896, Gilpin moved back to Philadelphia and worked at several jobs. He joined the Canadian Jubilee Singers of Hamilton, Ontario, in 1903, and stayed with the group for two years.

Gilpin's first significant role arrived in 1905 in "The Two Real Coons," a vaudeville act starring Bert Williams and George Walker based on a scene from their musical In Abyssinia. Gilpin next worked for the Smart Set Company, a black minstrel group. In 1907 he performed with the Pekin Stock Company of Chicago and attracted attention for his work in a three-act musical, The Husbands. Gilpin engaged in blackface comedy and sometimes acted as white characters in white makeup during his tenure with Pekin. He worked sporadically with the Pan-American Octette from 1911 to 1913. Over the next few years he performed briefly in The Girl at the Fort with the Anita Bush Company and was one of the founding members of the Lafayette Players in 1916. Later that year, Gilpin resigned from the troupe, reportedly over a salary dispute. His pioneering work at the Lincoln and Lafayette theaters helped usher in an era of artistic presentations open to black audiences.

In 1920, Gilpin impressed audiences and critics with his spellbinding performance as Brutus Jones—a Pullman porter and former convict who becomes the dictator of a Caribbean island—in Eugene O'Neill's play The Emperor Jones. In this drama, Gilpin appeared alone in six of the eight scenes; and he was the first African American actor to star in a dramatic production in an all-white theater. The play had its debut in Greenwich Village in New York City, at what later became known as the Provincetown Playhouse. Because the audiences were so large, the production then moved uptown to the Princess Theater. On 4 November 1920, Heywood Braun wrote in the New York Tribune that Gilpin "gives the most thrilling performance we have seen any place this season" and underscored Gilpin's power to reduce stereotypes and racist perspectives: "if The Emperor Jones were taken elsewhere we have little doubt that the manager would engage a white man with a piece of burnt cork to play Brutus Jones.” In 1921 Gilpin was received at the White House and was awarded the Spingarn Medal for distinguished achievement by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). In February 1921 he attended the annual awards dinner of the Drama League of New York, despite protests by some whites, after being named one of ten people who had contributed most to American theater the previous season.

During the Harlem Renaissance, Gilpin used his fame to motivate black performers around the United States. In January 1922 he attended a rehearsal of the Dumas Dramatic Club in Cleveland, Ohio. Afterward, he challenged members to create one of the best black theater groups in the world and made a donation of $50. Members recast themselves as the Gilpin Players and began several years of outstanding performances at the distinguished Karamu House.

Artistic differences among O’Neill, the production managers, and Gilpin led to the casting of Paul Robeson as Brutus Jones when The Emperor Jones was revived. Gilpin had changed some lines that he found offensive, and O’Neill was critical of this action and also accused Gilpin of heavy drinking. Gilpin did play the role of Brutus again in a Broadway revival in 1926, however. Also in 1926, he starred in the film version of Ten Nights in the Barroom, produced in Philadelphia by the Colored Players Film Corporation. His final performance of Brutus Jones was in Woodstock, New York, in 1929.

After that, Gilpin was reported to have suffered an emotional breakdown, losing his ability to sing. He died on 6 May 1930, and was buried at Lambertville, New Jersey, in a quiet ceremony. His friends and former coworkers held a second ceremony—for a huge crowd—on 1 June 1930, at Duncan Brothers funeral parlor on Seventh Avenue in New York City. Gilpin’s body was exhumed, and he was reburied in Woodlawn Cemetery.

In 1941, Richmond’s first low-income housing project, Gilpin Court, was named in honor of Gilpin. Five years later, O’Neill delivered a belated accolade. During a reflective interview, he stated, “As I look back now on all my work, I can honestly say there was only one actor who carried every notion of a character I had in mind. That actor was Charles Gilpin.”

Biography

Charles Sidney Gilpin was born on 20 November 1878, in Jackson Ward in Richmond, Virginia, to Peter Gilpin (a laborer in a steel mill) and Caroline White (a nurse in Richmond City Hospital); he was the youngest of fourteen children. Gilpin attended the Saint Francis School for Catholic Colored Children until he quit at age twelve to become a printer’s apprentice; he also performed in saloons, at fairs, and in variety theaters. He moved to Philadelphia in the early 1890s and worked with theatrical companies and at other jobs; over his life he was an elevator operator, printer, barber, janitor, and trainer of prizefighters. In 1897 he married Florence Howard; they had a son, Paul Wilson, in 1903. In 1905 Charles Gilpin had a significant role in “The Two Real Coons”; he next worked for the Smart Set Company, a black minstrel group; in 1907 he performed with the Pekin Stock Company of Chicago; in 1911–1913 he worked with the Pan-American Octette; he then worked with Anita Bush’s company and was a founding member of the Lafayette Theater. He played Brutus Jones in The Emperor Jones (1920) and in some revivals (although the role was to become associated mainly with Paul Robeson). Gilpin was awarded a Spingarn Medal in 1921. In 1926

Charles Gilpin, c. 1920–1930. (Library of Congress.)

Gilpin, Charles

he starred in the film version of Ten Nights in the Barroom. He retired to Eldridge Park, New Jersey, c. 1929 and was cared for by his second wife, Alma Benjamin, until his death on 6 May 1930, at age fifty-one. He was first buried at Lambertville, New Jersey, but was later reburied at Woodlawn Cemetery.

R. JAKE SUDDERTH

See also Anita Bush Theater Company; Colored Players Film Corporation; Emperor Jones, The; Karamu House; Lafayette Theater; Lincoln Theater; Minstrelsy; Vaudeville

Further Reading

- Anderson, Jervis. This Was Harlem. New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1982.
- Beckerman, Bernard, and Howard Siegman, eds. On Stage. New York: Arno with Quadrangle/New York Times Book Company, 1973.
- Bishop, Helen. "Gilpin Wants to Play Comedy." Boston Transcript, 1922.
- Fletcher, Tom. One Hundred Years of the Negro in Show Business. New York: Da Capo, 1954.
- Haskins, James. Black Theater in America. New York: HarperCollins, 1982.
- Johns, Robert L. "Charles S. Gilpin." In Notable Black American Men, ed. Jessie Carney Smith. Detroit, Mich.: Gale Research, 1999.
- Klotman, Phyllis Rauch. Frame by Frame—A Black Filmography. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1979.
- Kneeborne, John D. "It Wasn't All Velvet: The Life and Hard Times of Charles S. Gilpin, Actor." Virginia Cavalcade Magazine, Summer 1988.
- Logan, Rayford W., and Michael R. Winston, eds. Dictionary of American Negro Biography. New York: Norton, 1982.
- Mrocicka, Paul. "Charles Sidney Gilpin." In American National Biography, Vol. 9, eds. John A. Garraty and Mark C. Carnes. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- New York Times*, 7 May 1930, 2 June 1930. (Obituaries.)
- Oppenheimer, Priscilla. "Anita Bush." In The Harlem Renaissance: A Historical Dictionary of the Era, ed. Bruce Kellner. New York: Methuen, 1984.
- Thompson, Sister M. Francesca. "The Lafayette Players, 1917–1932." In The Theater of Black Americans, ed. Errol Hill. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1980, Vol. 2. Who's Who in Colored America. New York: Who's Who in Colored America, 1927.

"Godmother"

See Mason, Charlotte Osgood

God's Trombones

God's Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse is only fifty-six pages long, but this brief book reflects some of the issues that interested participants of the Harlem Renaissance: the preservation and appreciation of African American culture, the role of literature and the arts in shaping attitudes about African Americans, the incorporation of distinctive elements of African American culture into literature and visual art, and the complementary nature of literature and the arts. The main components of the book, published in 1927 by Viking, are an opening prayer and seven sermons transcribed into poems by James Weldon Johnson. But there is also a preface by Johnson in which he explains his intentions for the book, and each poem is accompanied by a black-and-white illustration by Aaron Douglas and a title page lettered by the calligrapher C. B. Falls.

In content, the sermons follow what Johnson identifies as a pattern often followed and innovated on by African American preachers. The cycle begins with an opening prayer, moves from "The Creation" through several Old Testament and New Testament stories, and ends with "The Judgment Day." Johnson, as he explains in the preface, wanted the book to draw attention to the importance of African American preachers as leaders in the African American community and as artists. He used his poems to preserve the sermons they delivered and to demonstrate the manner in which they delivered these sermons; he hoped that the book would increase the respect granted to the preachers.

The book was widely reviewed in the 1920s, attracting attention in Crisis and Opportunity and also in mainstream publications such as Poetry, Nation, and the New York Times Book Review. Reviewers were overwhelmingly positive, praising the quality of Johnson's poems and his tribute to the preachers. Only a few reviewers mentioned Douglas's contributions, but those who did, including W. E. B. Du Bois and Alain Locke, complimented them warmly. Since the 1920s, the book has inspired a range of adaptations, including numerous audiorecordings of performances by preachers and actors, many of them accompanied by music; scores for choral dramas and orchestral performances; and even a claymation video narrated by James Earl Jones and Dorian Harewood. Scholarly attention to God's Trombones has been more limited, but it reveals aspects of the book that deserve further study.

Several literary scholars who have focused on God's Trombones have addressed Johnson's decision not to use dialect in these poems. In his preface, Johnson defends this choice, arguing that his diction reflects the preachers' technique of blending biblical language with black idioms. He also asserts that the conventions and ideas associated with black dialect made it too limited a form to express the complexities of African Americans' experiences, an argument he made repeatedly in the 1920s. Some critics of the book, such as Gates (1987), argue that Johnson's dismissal of dialect was misguided and shortsighted; others, such as Jones (1991), insist that Johnson was able to record a self-affirming black vernacular through his use of the imagery, syntax, and rhythms characteristic of the black preachers.

A related issue worth further exploration involves Johnson's transformation of these oral sermons into written poems. In his preface, Johnson discusses the difficulty of this act of transcription and explains his strategies. For example, he used several poetic techniques, including strategically placed line breaks and punctuation, to indicate the rhythm of the preachers' delivery. But, he admits, his transcripts are clearly unable to fully communicate the experience of hearing these sermons. In fact, Johnson argues that the sermons should be "intoned," rather than read, and he often demonstrated the preachers' delivery style at parties and on radio performances. His consideration of the potential and limitations of his written form and his discussion of his techniques invite consideration of the implications of transcription and of his stylistic choices.

Several art historians mention Douglas's contributions to God's Trombones, but often only in passing. The most extensive consideration of his illustrations is by Ater (1993) and Kirschke (1995). Each of them points out that these illustrations incorporate the posturing and facial features Douglas would have seen in Egyptian art and demonstrate his interest in modernism and cubism; they position these works as steps toward the mature style Douglas would use in the mural series he created in the 1930s.

The collaboration between Johnson and Douglas in God's Trombones also is worth analysis, particularly because it reveals parallels between literature and the other arts. For example, just as Johnson was experimenting with form and language to capture the intricacies of preachers' oral performances, Douglas was developing a style that reflected both African and American aesthetics. Furthermore, Johnson's poetry and Douglas's illustrations also complement one another in content. For instance, Douglas modernized the setting of "The Prodigal Son." In the poem, Johnson describes a young man traveling to Babylon, where he squanders his fortune and becomes involved with women and gambling before returning to his father's house. In Douglas's drawing, dancers wear fashions of the 1920s, and a trombone, gin bottle, and playing card stretch from the corners of the picture. The downfall of Douglas's Prodigal Son could easily have happened in Harlem. By updating the tale, Douglas implicitly demonstrates the relevance of these biblical stories and the preachers' renderings of them to African Americans in the 1920s. Carroll (2002, the present author) analyzes in more depth the relations between the written and visual texts, arguing that they complement one another in important ways and that the implications of the book as a whole exceed those of either its written or its visual elements.

God's Trombones is an important but underappreciated part of both Johnson's and Douglas's oeuvre; it also is an important example of the collaboration between writers and artists during the Harlem Renaissance. God's Trombones was only one of many illustrated books produced during the Harlem Renaissance, and it suggests the value of studying the renaissance as a broad cultural movement involving many different forms of expression.

ANNE CARROLL

See also Douglas, Aaron; Johnson, James Weldon

Further Reading

