1. a. One of the well-known metals, nearly approaching silver in whiteness and lustre, highly malleable and taking a high polish; used in the manufacture of articles of block tin, in the formation of alloys, as bronze, pewter, etc., and, on account of its resistance to oxidation, for making tin-plate and lining culinary and other iron vessels.

Tin is rarely if ever found native, but occurs in two ores, the dioxide, SnO₂, called tin-stone or cassiterite, and, less commonly, in tin-pyrites or sulphide of tin, SnS₂. Chemically it is a dyad metallic element, symbol Sn (stannum), atomic weight (O = 16) 119 (Internat. Committee in Jnrl. Chem. Soc. Sept. 1912, 1832); sp. gr. about 7.3. From c 1400 onward also tind and tind (see γ, δ forms). Later with loss of final d from both forms (perh. arising out of shortened pa. pple. tind, tind, teend, taken as = tin-d, tine-d, teen-d, hence inf. tin, tine, teen; but reduction of -nd to -n is found in many other words). In mod. dial. surviving from Scotl. to Cornwall as (tɪnd, taɪnd, tɪn, taɪn, tɪn): see quotes. and Eng. Dial. Dict. Early ME. tenden corresponded to an OE. tendan* (in comp. ontendan, atendan, fortendan, to set fire to, kindle, and in vbl. sb. tendingan, Napier Contrib. to OE. Lexic.), corresp. to Goth. tandjan, Da. tænde, Sw. tända; causal of tindan* str. vb. (ablaut series tind-, tand-, tund-), to be on fire, burn, glow, represented by MHG. zinden str. vb., in same sense. The history of early ME. tiende, tinde, now tind, tind (taɪnd), is more difficult: as no other example is known of OE. and ME. -end becoming later -ind, much less -ind, it is probable that we have here a parallel formation, representing an OE. tyndan* (from the weak ablaut grade tund-), cognate with OHG. zuntan (from zuntjan*—tundjan*), MHG. and Ger. zünden to set on fire, kindle, and OE. tynder TINDER. In that case, tend (teend, teen, teyne) and tind (tynd, tind, tin, tine, tyne) are two distinct but parallel and synonymous formations from the same root verb.]

Etym.* (1872) 684, Skeat Notes on Eng. Etymol. 300, E. Weekley in Trans. Philol. Soc. 1909. Prof. Skeat inclines to take tine as a later shortening of tiné*, afterwards tiny, and tiné* as a sb., possibly a. OF. tinée 'tubful'. But though it is possible that tine was orig. a sb., in sense 'bit', the evidence is that it was always a monosyllable. Prof. Weekley suggests the possibility of tine, tinē, tiny being aphetic for OF. un tantin or tantinet 'a little time or quantity', related to L. tantillus 'so small, so little'. This would suit the sense, but evidence connecting the forms has not been found (cf. TINY a.).]

tinkle ('tɪŋk(ə)l), *v.*¹ Forms: 4 tyncl(e), 4-6 tynkle, 5 -kel, -kyll, 6 -ckle, tinkel, 6-7 tincle, 6-8 tinkle, 6- tinkle. [Tinkle has the form of a frequentative of TINK v. (see -LE 3), which also suits the chronology. In some MSS. of the later Wyclif version, it takes the place of the earlier tink, as said of a cymbal; and it is frequent from 1450 of the sound of bells, etc.

In both Wyclif versions tyncl(e) is also used of the 'ringing' and 'tingling' of the ears; but in some MSS. of the later version tyncl(e) is substituted. In the 16th c. tynckle is said even of the nose. Here it might be thought to represent OE. tinclian 'to tinkle', L. titillare, if there were any trace of that vb. in ME. But it is to be remembered that L. tinnire, which Wyclif rendered tynke and tyncl(e), was used of the ringing both of metals and of the ears, and even in the sense 'tinkle'. In mod. use, tinkle may be said of the ears in the sense 'ring', implying sound objective or subjective, but the 'trilling' nervous sensation is expressed by tingle; 'my ears tingle', like 'my hands tingle': see TINGLE v. Cf. WFlem. tinkelen, to tingle (as the fingers with the cold), also said of the sound of a drop falling into water.]

TINSEY. [The etymology, though certain in its main fact, presents difficulties of detail, owing chiefly to the want of early OF. examples. Evidently tincel, tinsel, arose out of OF. estincelle, mod.F. étincelle 'a sparke or sparkle of fire, a flash', Cotgr. (—pop.L. stincilla* for scintilla spark), and OF. estincelē, mod.F. étincelē 'sparkled, sparked, also powdered or set with sparkles', pa. pple. of OF. estinceler 'to sparke, to sparkle as fire; to twinkle as a starre or Dyamond; to set thicke with sparkles' (—pop.L. stincillāre* for scintillāre to sparkle, glitter). In 14–15th c. Fr., the s of es- had long been mute, and the pronunciation was actually as in mod.Fr. étincelle, -elē; of this the initial e disappeared (app. in Anglo-F. or Eng.) by aphesis, giving tincel(le). Our earliest examples show the word used attrib. or as adj. in tinselle satin, app. representing a Fr. satin étincelē (with -e mute in Eng., as in some other words), or else the Eng. 'tinselled satin' (see TINSELLED) with d lost between l and s. Thence sense 2, tinsel alone = tinsel satin, tinsel cloth, etc. Sense 3, which is later, may represent the Fr. sb. étincelle. Tilsent and tinsin, early popular perversions, scarcely survived the 16th c.; they also were at first attrib. in tylsent satin, tynsyn satten.]

[Note. The normal and regular repr. of OE. tæppet down to 1600 was TAPET; and phonetic development of i out of a would be abnormal; the rare ME. tepet and Sc. tepat are prob. from tipet. The ordinary meaning of the OE. and ME. word, and of the OHG., was 'carpet', as in Latin, but in Ælfric's Vocabulary, tæppet occurs under the heading Vestium Nomina, as if a name of a garment. Yet the gloss 'Sipla an healfhruh tæppet', seems to come from the same source as one in the 15th c. Nominale, under the heading De Lectis et Ornamentis eorum, 'Hec ampicapa est tapeta ex utraque parte villosa. Hec sipha idem est' (Wr.-W. 744/5), where the sipha or tapeta is evidently a bedcover; so that the Ælfric entry is prob. placed under the wrong heading. A change of meaning from 'carpet' or 'bedcover' to the senses above, is very improbable. Derivation of tippet from tip is favoured by the fact that Ger. zipfel, orig. diminutive of zipf 'tip', has the senses 'tip, point, end, lappet, tail', etc.]

tipple ('tip(ə)l), *v.*¹ Forms: 6- tipple. Also 6 type, typpel, typpel(l), typpil, 6-8 tiple, 7 tippel. [Known (in simple tenses) from 1544, in pres. pple. tipping (as ppi. a.), app. before 1500; in vbl. sb. tipping from 1531. But the agent-noun TIPPLER occurs as an established and app. legal term in 1396, and frequently in the 15th c.; so that either the verb must have existed before 1400, though not yet in evidence, or tippler must have originated otherwise, and tipple have arisen from it as a back-formation: cf. PEDLAR, PEDDLE v.

The ulterior history is uncertain; tipple or tippler cannot, from the date, be a freq. deriv. of *TIP v.*¹ in any sense; nor is it easy to connect it with I.G. and Du. tippel 'tip, extreme point' (*TIP sb.*¹). But according to Aasen, Norw. dial. tippla 'to drip slowly', which Falk and Torp derive from tippa to project, to drip, from tip 'point', has also the sense 'to drink in small quantities', 'tipple', evidently related to the Eng. word, though the mode of relationship is not clear. An ultimate connexion with *TAP sb.*¹, *v.*¹ has also been thought possible, but connecting links are wanting.]

[Probably the same word as prec., the tire being originally (sense 1) the 'attire', 'clothing', or 'accoutrement' of the wheel. From 15th to 17th c. spelt (like prec.) tire and tyre indifferently. Before 1700 tyre became generally obsolete, and tire remained as the regular form, as it still does in America; but in Great Britain tyre was revived in the nineteenth cent. as the popular term for the rubber rim of bicycle, tricycle, carriage, or motor-car wheels, and is sometimes used for the steel tires of locomotive wheels. During the twentieth cent. tyre became standard in the British Isles.]

[Note. Thomson's patent (quot. 1845 above) is known as the foundation of the pneumatic tire or tyre (2b), and was largely cited in the great actions for infringement during the 'tyre boom'. T. did not actually use the expression 'elastic tire' or 'tyre', but spoke of an 'elastic band' around the (iron) tire. This 'band' was however exactly what is now termed a 'pneumatic tyre'—a distended inner tube with an outer cover or jacket. (H. V. Hopwood, Dep. Librarian, Patent Office Lib.)]

b. An endless cushion of rubber, solid, hollow, or tubular, fitted (usually in combination with an inner tube filled with compressed air; cf. PNEUMATIC 1 b) on the rim of a bicycle, tricycle, or motor-car; now also often upon the wheels of invalid and baby-carriages, and light horse vehicles. In this sense now commonly spelt tyre in Great Britain (see TYRE); tire is retained in America.

1877 KNIGHT Dict. Mech. III. 2579 At the same time Mr. Dunlop patented a tire of annealed cast-iron, grooved to receive an india-rubber band. Various other patents followed, embracing india-rubber as a material to be used in constructing tires. 1887 BURY & HILLIER Cycling 63 The iron tire was necessarily incompatible with the light iron wheel; rubber tires were introduced. 1905 [see tire-cover in 3]. 1910 *Encycl. [In its current form, f. tiring, pr. pple. of TIRE *v.*¹ + IRON; but tarrying-iron (also tarriour) appears to occur as early, and to have been the more prevalent in the 17th and 18th c. This belongs to TARRY v., in its transitive sense 'to delay, retard, protract, prolong, hold in check' (if not to tarry, TARY v.).

The evidence does not decide whether tiring or tarrying was the original epithet, and as both are descriptive, they may have been independent.]

A popular name of the puzzling rings or ring-puzzle (esp. when made of iron, and of large size), in which a number of rings, usually seven or ten, are placed on an oblong closed wire loop or bow, each being also fastened to a wire within the bow, which passes through the next ring, and is loosely attached by its other end to a thin flat piece of metal or bone of nearly the same length as the loop. The puzzle is to take all the rings thus fettered off the loop or bow.

This perplexing invention is of great antiquity, and was treated on by Cardan, the mathematician [1501-1576] (Boy's Own Book (1828) 420, in which there is a figure and detailed explanation of the moves).

II. 3. intr. To make a rattling noise by turning or moving something rapidly to and fro or up and down. a. In the phr. to tirl at (up)on the pin, to make such a noise on some part of the gate or door, in order to gain admittance; also to tirl at the latch, at the sneck.

An old phrase of ballad poetry, which in the 19th c. was taken up and used by Scott, and others after him. Now generally identified by antiquaries with the use of the appendage called the risp and ring (RISP sb.³ 2), formerly used for this purpose. (Cf. TINKLE v.¹ 3, Bob Norice ix, 'When he came to Lord Barnet's castel He tinklet at the ring'.) But in this identification there are difficulties; a risp is not a 'pin', nor has it any resemblance to a 'pin', in any known sense of the word; the pin of a door was the latch or handle which was 'lifted' or 'turned' to open the door: see quots. under PIN sb.¹ 1 b; whereas the 'risp' was a fixed appendage which could neither be lifted nor turned, having no connexion with the latch or door-handle. Hence it would seem that 'to tirl at the pin' was to make a noise by moving the latch up and down rapidly. It is possible that the 'risp and ring' was a later device, which came to be erroneously considered as the apparatus by which the 'tirling at the pin' was performed.

titanite ('tætənɪt). Min. [ad. Ger. titanit (Klaproth, 1795), f. TITAN-IUM + -it, -ITE¹; named from its containing the metal titanium.]

1. A mineral composed chiefly of calcium titanosilicate, CaO.TiO₂.SiO₂; also called sphene.

Iron is present in varying amounts, sometimes also manganese and yttrium.

1858 DANA Min. (1868) 385 Titanite occurs in imbedded crystals in granite, gneiss, mica, schist, syenite [etc.]. 1879 RUTLEY Stud. Rocks x. 140 Sphene (titanite) crystallises in the monoclinic system.

a. One of the rare metals, never found free in nature, but obtainable as an iron-grey powder with a metallic lustre. It belongs to the same group as zirconium, cerium, and thorium. Symbol Ti; atomic weight 48.1 (O = 16).

Discovered by Klaproth as a constituent of a mineral (now called Rutile) from Boinik in Hungary. The same metal had been previously discovered by M'Gregor in a mineral (now called Ilmenite) found in Manaccan in Cornwall, and had been named by him Menakonit (Cress's Chem. Ann. 1791, I. 119).

Trans.* LXXXVI. 426 note, A new metal, named Titanium, lately announced in the German Journals. 1800 tr. Lagrange's Chem. I. 393 The substance from which titanium is extracted is a red schorl, found chiefly in Hungary. 1812 SIR H. DAVY *Chem. [ad. med.L. Tuti-, Titivillus, in OF. also Tutiville: of unknown origin. Connexion has been suggested with L. titivillitium used once by Plautus, and inferred to mean 'a mere trifle, a bagatelle'.

But in some of the earliest continental instances of the name, it is written Titinillus, or Tutinillus, and in many it is impossible to say whether the middle consonant is n or u (v). At an early date English usage settled on u (later v and f). Titivillus was evidently in origin a creation of monastic wit, but in its English form the name passed from the Mystery Plays into popular speech as a term of the vernacular, still in use after 1600.]

1. Name for a devil said to collect fragments of words dropped, skipped, or mumbled in the recitation of divine service, and to carry them to hell, to be registered against the offender; hence, a name for a demon or devil in the mystery plays. Also found in France and Germany, 13-15th c.

What generally passes as the earliest mention of the name and function of Titinillus or Tutiillus, occurs in a Latin sermon (Wackernagel Gesch. der Deut. Litt. II. 466, note) conjecturally attributed to the Dominican Petrus de Palude, a native of Burgundy and student of Paris, who became Patriarch of Jerusalem, and died in 1342. A very similar and app. equally early account is printed in T. Wright's Latin Stories (Percy Soc. 1842), from a Brit. Mus. MS. (Arundel 506, ff. 46) of German origin, of first half of 14th c. Both these stories cite the verse, so often quoted by later writers, 'Frangina psalmodum Titiuillus colligit horum', the former adding 'Quaque die mille vicibus sarninat ille' (Every day he fills his bag a thousand times). Titiuillus is also mentioned, 1382-85, by Gower Vox Clamantis iv. 864; and in the 15th c., esp. c 1450, references become frequent. The earliest Eng. form is app. Lydgate's Tytyuylly, or ? Tytyuylly, c 1420 (sense 2).

tittle ('tʊt(ə)), sb. Forms: 4 titil, -el, 5 ty-, titylle, -tille, titelle, 5-9 tittle, 6 tittil, -yl, tytle, tyttle, 6-tittle. [ME. titel, -il, orig. the same word as TITTLE, but with a special sense developed in late L. and Romanic (see below), and retaining the short i of L. titulus. The spelling tittle is found 1535; title is occasional after 1600.

For the mediæval and Romanic senses of L. titulus akin to Eng. tittle, cf. a 1286 BALBI Catholicon, 'Titulus etiam dicitur nota quæ causa brevitas apponitur dictionibus'; also a 800 Corpus Chr. L. & Ags. Gloss. (Hessels 1890) E 242 Epigramma, titulum; 243 Epigramma, abreviata scriptura; a 1200 NECKAM De Utensilibus (Wright Vocab. 1857, 117) Glosa enim per abbreviavitatem et compendiosam per apices [Fr. gloss titles] scribi debet. Diez also cites Sp. tilde, Cat. titlla, Pg. til, 'little stroke, accent, esp. the mark over ñ', also Wallachian tittle, 'the circumflex', and Prov. titule, 'the dot over i', as representatives of the L. word in the modern Romanic langs. As apex was used by the Latin grammarians for the accent or mark over a long vowel, titulus and apex became to some extent synonymous; hence Wyclif's use of titil, titel, to render L. apex.]

1. A small stroke or point in writing or printing.

a. Orig. rendering L. apex 'point, tip', applied in classical L. to any minute point or part of a letter, also to the mark over a long vowel, as á, later also to a line indicating an abbreviation. More recently applied also to the Spanish tilde or circumflex over ñ, formerly to the cedilla under ç. By extension, any stroke or tick with a pen.

The literal notion of a point of a letter passed over to that of the smallest point of that which was written or prescribed. This took place already in late Heb. with the word qôts, lit. 'thorn, prick', represented in Greek by κεφαλα 'horn, projecting point', and in L. by apex, in Wyclif translated titil: see the quotes.

A. prep. (in ordinary use, before a sb.)

The OE. prep. tō normally 'governed' or was followed by the dative case, sometimes, idiomatically, by the genitive or the instrumental (esp. in tō þas and to þy), rarely by the accusative. In later Middle and in mod. Eng., to is followed by the ordinary 'objective' case, which in sbs. is formally identical with the nominative, and in pronouns is the dative-accusative, me, him, etc. In Middle and mod. Eng. to not only represents the OE. preposition, but also takes the place of the OE. inflected dative case. Even in OE. the simple dative was often reinforced by tō, or (what came to the same thing) was supplanted by tō and its case. This was very frequent in late OE., and (helped no doubt by the example of French, which had similarly substituted the construction with à (L. ad) for the L. dative) became universal in ME., the simple dative remaining only in pronouns and substantives as the indirect or remoter object, known by its position before the direct object (as in 'give me the book', 'tell John the news'). Both with pronouns and sbs., the prepositional construction may, and in some cases must, be used (e.g. 'give the book to me', 'tell it to John'). In OE. many verbs 'governed' or took a dative object; with the loss of the dative inflexion, this case could no longer be distinguished from the accusative, and such verbs are now treated as ordinary transitive vbs. governing the objective (e.g. sio heord folgað ðæm wordum & ðæm ðeawum ðæs hirdes, 'the herd follows the words and the thews [customs] of the shepherd').

The senses and uses of to may be arranged in various ways, every way having its peculiar difficulties owing to cross-currents of history and usage. OE. and the West Germanic Languages had two prepositions with the sense of modern to, viz. tō and ōþ; the second of these always expressed motion reaching its object; it is therefore probable that tō had originally the sense of 'direction towards', without any implication of reaching; and in a truly historical account of the word, it would perh. be necessary to start with the two main divisions of 'toward' and 'actually to'. But even in the earliest written OE. this distinction had, so far as concerns tō, faded away, and in the various transferred and later senses it could not be successfully carried out. Even the later distinction between to as a preposition implying motion, and to representing the dative inflexion, can, from the falling together of these notions, only be partially exhibited. The arrangement here followed is thus largely tentative and practical, and not in every case historical.

7. At (a time), on (a day) (now dial.); † in, during (a time) (obs. rare). Cf. TODAY, TOMORROW, TONIGHT, TO-YEAR.

This use of to in tōdæg, etc., has been explained as originating in sense 6, through phrases like nu synt to dæg 'now still to this day', shortened to to dæg; but it is doubtful whether this covers the whole ground. The mod. s.w. use of to with expressions of time seems parallel to its use with place in 4.

B. to before an infinitive (or gerund; see 22). History.—Beside the simple infinitive, or verbal substantive in -an (ME. -en, -e), OE., like the other WGer. languages, had a dative form of the same or a closely-related sb., which in OE.

ended in -anne, -enne, in ME. reduced successively to -ene, -en, -e, and was thus at length levelled with the simple infinitive, and with it reduced to the uninflected verb-stem. This dative form was always preceded or 'governed' by the preposition tō 'to'. By many German writers it is called the 'gerund', after the Latin verbal sb. in -ndum. In mod.Eng. the functions of the Latin gerund are more properly discharged by the vbl. sb. in -ing, and it is therefore more convenient to speak of the OE. form in -anne as the 'dative infinitive' or 'infinitive with to'. Originally, to before the dative infinitive had the same meaning and use as before ordinary substantives, i.e. it expressed motion, direction, inclination, purpose, etc., toward the act or condition expressed by the infinitive; as in 'he came to help' (i.e. to the help of) his friends', 'he went to stay there', 'he prepared to depart' (i.e. for departure)', 'it tends to melt', 'he proceeded to speak', 'looking to receive something'. But in process of time this obvious sense of the prep. became weakened and generalized, so that tō became at last the ordinary link expressing any prepositional relation in which an infinitive stands to a preceding verb, adjective, or substantive. Sometimes the relation was so vague as scarcely to differ from that between a transitive verb and its object. This was esp. so when the vb. was construed both transitively and intransitively. There were several verbs in OE. in this position, such as onginnan to begin, ondrædan to dread, bebeodan to bid, order, bewerian to forbid, prevent, geliefan to believe, pencean to think, etc.; these are found construed either with the simple (accusative) infinitive, or with tō and the dative infinitive. There was also a special idiomatic use (sense 13 a) of the infinitive with tō as an indirect nominative, where logically the simple infinitive might be expected. From these beginnings, the use of the infinitive with to in place of the simple infinitive, helped by the phonetic decay and loss of the inflexions and the need of some mark to distinguish the infinitive from other parts of the verb and from the cognate sb., increased rapidly during the late OE. and early ME. period, with the result that in mod.Eng. the infinitive with to is the ordinary form, the simple infinitive surviving only in particular connexions, where it is very intimately connected with the preceding verb (see below). To a certain extent, therefore, i.e. when the infinitive is the subject or direct object, to has lost all its meaning, and become a mere 'sign' or prefix of the infinitive. But after an intrans. vb., or the passive voice, to is still the preposition. In appearance, there is no difference between the infinitive in 'he proceeds to speak' and 'he chooses to speak'; but in the latter to speak is the equivalent of speaking or speech, and in the former of to speaking or to speech. In form, to speak, is the descendant of OE. tō specanne; in sense, it is partly the representative of this and largely of OE. specan.

(The simple infinitive, without ta, remains: 1. after the auxiliaries of tense, mood, periphrasis, shall, will, may, can, do; and the quasi-auxiliaries, must, (and sometimes) need, dare; 2. after some vbs. of causing, etc.; make, bid, let, have, in sense 15 a; 3. after some vbs. of perception, see, hear, feel, and some tenses of know, observe, notice, perceive, etc., in sense 15 b; 4. after had liefer, rather, better, sooner, as lief, as soon, as good, as well, etc.: see HAVE v. 22, RATHER adv. 9 d, and the other words.)

The infinitive with ta may be dependent on an adj., a sb., or a vb., or it may stand independently. To an adj. it stands in adverbial relation: ready ta fight = ready for fighting; to a sb. it stands in adverbial or sometimes adverbial relation: a day ta remember = a memorable day; to a vb. it may stand in an adverbial or substantival relation: to proceed ta work = to proceed to working; to like ta work = to like working.

13. a. with inf. as subject, or as object with complement, introduced by it or an impersonal verb; in quot. c 1205¹ without it.

Here the inf. app. originally depended on the adj. or sb. in the it clause (as in sense 9), or on the impersonal vb., and was therefore put in the form with to. Thus hwilum ða leohtan scylda bioð beteran to forlætenne, 'sometimes the slight sins are better to let alone' (K. Ælf. Pa. C. 457) might also be expressed hwilum hit is betre ða leohtan scylda to forlætenne (cf. hit is god godne to herianne, quot. c 890) 'sometimes it is better to let alone the slight sins'; and this easily passed into the later 'to let alone the slight sins is sometimes better', where the inf. clause becomes the subject as in b.

to-, prefix². Obs. exc. in rare arch. or dial. use. [OE. to-, ME. to- (te-) = OFris. ti-, te- (to-), OS. ti- (te-), OHG. zi-, za-, ze- and zir-, zar- (MHG. ze-, zer-, zir-, Ger. zer-):—WGer. ti-—Oteut. ti- = L. dis-, a particle expressing separation, 'asunder, apart, in pieces'.

The WGer. ti- (= L. dis-) in prehistoric times ran together in form with ti the unstressed prepositional form of tō (see to prep.), with which it had no etymological connexion (being indeed almost opposite in sense); and when the latter was levelled in vowel with its stressed adverbial form tō, ti- (= dis-) also followed it, and appears constantly in OE. as to-. In most grammars and dictionaries this is written tō-, like the stressed form of to adv. and prep. But as it was the unstressed form with which the prefix was formally confounded, and as it was itself always stressless (being sometimes written te as in OS. and OFris.), it seems more in accordance with the facts to spell it in OE. to- with short o, which is therefore done here.

In OE., about 125 compound verbs in to- are recorded; many of these did not survive in ME., where however so many new compounds appear (some formed even on vbs. from French) that their number in Early ME. was not less than in OE. In the 15th c. they rapidly disappeared and only a few are found after 1500. Many of the verbs which took the prefix to- had themselves the sense of separation or division; such were break, burst, deal, melt, scatter, strew, tear, etc.; in these to- added little but force to the notion: cf. burst, burst asunder, tear, tear asunder, etc. This led to the prefixing of to- to verbs which had no sense of partition, merely as a strengthening or emphasizing particle, as in darken, to-darken, swink, to-swink, etc. From an early time to- verbs were further strengthened by the qualifying adv. all (ALL C) in sense 'wholly, completely, altogether'; in later times this became universal. Consequently, the prefix began to be viewed as all-to- or allto-; and (verbal prefixes being very commonly written separate from the vb.) all to or all- began to be treated as itself an adverb with the sense 'altogether, completely': see ALL C. 14, 15. Thus in the Bible of 1611, Judges ix. 53 'and all to brake his scull' was etymologically and historically all to-brake, i.e. 'all to-pieces-broke', but may have been understood as all-to-brake, i.e. 'altogether' or 'completely broke'; Fairfax in 1674 by all-to-be-deckt can only have meant all-to-bedeckt, 'completely bedecked'.]

[Altered from Sp. tabaco, according to Oviedo, the name in the Carib of Haiti of the Y-shaped tube or pipe through which the Indians inhaled the smoke; but according to Las Casas, 1552, applied to a roll of dried leaves which was kindled at the end and used by the Indians like a rude cigar. Even before Oviedo's date the name had been taken by the Spaniards as that of the herb or its leaf, in which sense it passed from Sp. into the other European langs.: Pg. tabaco, It. †tabaco (1578), tabacco (Florio, 1598), F. tabac, whence Du., Ger., Boh. tabak, Du. But Dr. A. Ernst of Caracas, in Amer. Anthropologist 1889, p. 133, criticizes Oviedo's account, citing from the Guarani Vocabolario of Almeida Nogueira (Rio Janeiro, 1879) taboca as the extant Guarani name for such a tube as that described by Oviedo, and used for inhaling through the nostrils not smoke but stimulating powders. He gives some reasons for holding that a Guarani tribe using this may have occupied the northern extremity of Haiti; and suggests that Oviedo, writing 43 years after the event, may have confused the use of this instrument with that of the tubular roll of leaves mentioned by Las Casas as tabacos.

The island of Tobago, after which the herb has been said by some to be named, according to 'Tobago, a Geogr. Description' etc. (c 1750) p. 74, received the name from its resemblance in shape to the Indian pipe; but other accounts have been given: see quot. 1577 in sense 2.]

toby ('təʊbi), *sb.*² Thieves' slang. [app. altered (? through toba, toba) from tobar, the word for 'road' in Shelta, the cant or secret language of the Irish tinkers: see Note below.] the toby: the highway as the resort of robbers; 'the road'; also transf. highway robbery (called also the toby concern, toby lay); hence to ply or ride the toby, to practise highway robbery; the high (or main) toby, highway robbery by a mounted thief; also, the highway itself; the low toby, robbery by footpads.

1807 Sessions' Papers Feb. 133/1 He . . asked me if I had any objection of being in a good thing. . . [Note. For Shelta see J. Sampson in Jrnl. Gypsy Lore Soc. 1890, II. 217, also Kuno Meyer, ibid. 257. The latter holds Shelta or 'Sheldhru' to be 'a deliberate and systematic modification' of Irish Gaelic, of considerable antiquity, the words being altered by reversal, metathesis, substitution and addition of letters or elements. Hence tobar has been viewed as formed by metathesis from Irish boithar 'road';

though, if so, it must either have been formed from the written word, or be very ancient, since medial th has long been mute.]

tod (tɒd), *sb.*² [Known in sense 1 from 15th c.; app. the same word as mod.EFris. (= LG. dial.) todde 'bundle, pack, small load (of hay, straw, turf, etc.)': see Doornkaat-Koolman; also in dial. (Groningen, Guelderland, Overijssel) tod load. With this cf. Sw. dial. todd 'a conglomerated mass, esp. of wool' (Biörkman). Answering in form also (though not very satisfactory in sense) is MHG., Ger. zotte 'tuft of hair, matted or shaggy hair', also 'rag', mod.Du. tod, todde 'rag'. (The ON. toddi does not mean 'tod of wool' as erroneously stated in Vigf., but only 'bit, piece'.]

An original sense of 'conglomerated mass', passing on the one hand into 'load', and on the other into 'bushy mass, bush', would perhaps suit the various senses. Sense 1 may have come to England in connexion with the wool trade with the continent; sense 2, on the other hand, which is a century later, seems to approach the sense 'tuft' or 'tufted mass'.]

The hero, a male or 'ram' cat, bore the name of Tom, and is commonly mentioned as 'Tom the Cat', as 'Tybert the Catte' is in Caxton's Reynard the Fox. Thus Tom became a favourite allusive name for a male cat (see quot. 1791 s.v. TOM sb. 6); and people said 'this cat is a Tom' or a 'Tom cat'.]

b. Applied to a fugue, or a sequence, in which the repetitions of the subject in different positions are all in the same key, and therefore vary in their intervals: opp. to REAL a. 3 c.

1869 OUSELEY Counterp. Canon & Fugue xix. 160 note, In the early days of counterpoint a tonal fugue was one in which the relations of the subject and answer were governed by the old Church modes. 1879 — in Grove Dict. Mus. I. 567 In most cases the answer [to the subject of a fugue] has to be modified according to certain rules to avoid modulating out of the key... An answer so treated is called a 'tonal answer', and the fugue is called a 'Tonal fugue'. 1889 PROUT Harmony v. §138 The intervals... differ in quality according to their position in the scale... Such a sequence is termed a tonal sequence.

JOHANSEN Descr. Petrogr. Igneous Rocks II. 379 Diorites with less than 5 per cent of quartz may be called quartz-bearing-diorites. With more than 5 per cent, they become quartz-diorites (tonalites). 1962 W. T. HUANG Petrology iv. 91 From granite, granodiorite, tonalite to diorite, the proportional amounts of quartz and alkali feldspar decrease, while that of sodic plagioclase increases. 1976 *Earth-Sci. tone (təʊn), sb. Forms: 4 ton, 4- tone; (5) toun, toyn, 5–6 toyne; 6 toone. [Partly a. OF. ton (of voice, 13th c. in Littré) = Prov. ton, Cat. to, Sp. ton, tono, Pg. tom, tono, It. tuono:—L. ton-um, acc. of ton-us; and partly directly f. L. tonus 'stretching, quality of sound, tone, accent, tone in painting', in med.L. esp. as a term of music, a. Gr. τόνος 'stretching, tension, raising of voice, pitch of voice, accent, musical mode or key, exertion of physical or mental energy'; f. strong grade of vbl. ablaut series τεν-, τον-, τα-, in τείν-ειν to stretch. In musical senses, much influenced by med.L. uses of tonus, and in more recent uses, largely influenced by Greek.

The early phonology is far from clear, the obscurity being increased by the changing values of the spellings o, oo, ou, oy, and their ambiguity at certain periods. The normal course of Fr. -on was to become -oun (= -u:n) in ME., and diphthongal -oun, -own (as in soun(d), noun, renown, bounty) in mod.Eng. An example of this appears c 1407 in sense 1, where Lydgate rimes toun, sown. But earlier than this we find tōn, tone (perh. a more learned or technical formation) direct from L. tonus, so well known in mediæval music, which became the prevalent form, and appears c 1325 in sense 2 b, riming with nōn 'noon'. The normal fate of this was to become in 15–16th c. toon (= tun); cf. 1570 in sense 1, where Levins rimes toone with boone, moone, noone, soone, etc. But here again the influence of L. tonus appears to have prevailed, so as to make tone (to:n) the finally accepted form. The sound of toyn, toyne, in c 1460, 1521, is doubtful: -oy-, -oi in Sc. and north. dial. generally meant long ō. The Sc. examples of tone in sense 2 c are also doubtful; they may be precursors of mod.Sc. (tōn, tyn), and more properly belong to TUNE, a divergent form of tone which has finally been differentiated as a distinct word, q.v. Tone, toon, and toun, might thus be viewed as separate words; but as the two latter are obs., and all the forms go back directly or indirectly to L. tonus, they are here treated as one, under the current spelling, but with the quotations separated.]

[Early ME. pe t̃an, pe t̃on, for earlier pet or pat ān, 'the one' (see THAT dem. adj. 5); the t of pet being attached to ān, ōn, when pe became the general form of the definite article. Normally used in antithesis to pe toper, the tother, which had a similar origin: see TOTHER. This usage cannot have arisen until the OE. antithesis of ōðer...ōðer, as in L. alter...alter, gave place to ān...ōðer, as in Fr. l'un...l'autre; nor until pæt (bet, pat) was usable for masc. and fem. as well as neuter, i.e. between 1200 and 1250: see ONE numeral 18, OTHER a. B. 1, 2. Used absolutely or pronominally, the tone is found in literature down to c 1600, and in many dialects to the present day; in Sc. the tane is in ordinary use. But as an adj., preceding a sb., esp. before a consonant, it was reduced at an early date to pe t̃a, pe t̃ō, still in Sc. the tae (see TO a.); although the full the tone...the tother was also frequent, until gradually superseded in literary Eng. by the one...the other, dialectally and colloquially also tone...tother, later sometimes written t'one...t'other. This, in the northern Eng. dialects in which the definite article regularly appears as t̃ē, t̃ā, t', may really stand for t'one, t'other; but elsewhere, where the article is not te, t', it is perhaps rather t'one...t'other, due to the dropping of the from the tone...the tother. In both the tone and the tother, the is omitted after a possessive pronoun or case, as dial. his tone or to hand, Sc. his tae hand = 'one of his hands'. For full illustration of existing dialect use, see Eng. Dial. Dict. s.v. Tone.]

The natural mod.Eng. repr. of OE. tunge would be tung, as in lung, rung, sung (and as the word is actually pronounced); but the ME. device of writing on for un brought in the alternative tonge with variants tounge, tounge; app. the effort to show that the pronunciation was not (tundʒa) led to the later tounge, tounge, tounge, although it is true that these hardly appeared before final e was becoming mute, so that its simple omission would have been equally effective. The spelling tongue is thus neither etymological nor phonetic, and is only in a very small degree historical.]

I. The bodily member.

1. a. An organ, possessed by man and by most vertebrates, occupying the floor of the mouth, and attached at its base to the hyoid bone; often protrusible and freely movable. In its development in man and the higher mammals, it is tapering, blunt-tipped, muscular, soft and fleshy, important in taking in and swallowing food, also as the principal organ of taste, and in man of articulate speech.

In some mammals, as the ant-eaters, it is attenuated, long, and worm-like; in most birds it is pointed, hard, and horny; in fishes, hard and immovable; in snakes and many lizards, cylindrical, slender, and forked, and an important tactile organ; in some amphibia, it is fixed at the front and free at the hinder end, and (as also in chameleons) used in licking up their prey.

II. Carrying capacity, weight, etc., in tons.

4. The carrying capacity of a ship expressed in tons of 100 cubic feet (see TON¹ 2).

Originally the number of tun casks of wine which a merchant ship could carry. Afterwards estimated by measurements and calculations which gave rough approximations to the actual cubic content (Old Measurement). Later arrived at by measurements of breadth and depth at determinate distances, from which by a mathematical calculation (see Merchant Shipping Acts from 1854 onward, and subsequently Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Regulations) the cubic content of the space under the tonnage-deck (under-deck tonnage) is obtained. To this is added the volume of certain specified enclosed spaces above this deck, the result being the gross (register) tonnage. A deduction is made from the latter for those parts of the ship which are deemed to be non-earning, to give the net (register) tonnage or register tonnage, for which vessels are registered, and on which the assessment of dues and charges on shipping is based. Systems of measurement vary from country to country, but there have been moves towards international standardization. The Suez Canal tonnage makes a smaller deduction for engine-space, etc., and approximates more closely to the gross tonnage. dead-weight tonnage represents the ship's carrying capacity, expressed in tonnes. displacement tonnage, the weight of water in tonnes displaced by a fully-laden ship, formerly used to express the tonnage of warships; superseded by standard displacement.

1718 STEELE Acc. Fishpool 170 There is a great difference between a shipwright's and merchant's way of calculating the tonnage of a ship. Ibid., The shipwright's way is to multiply the length of the keel by the middle-breadth, and that product by half the breadth and then they divide the last product by 94, and the quotient is the tonnage. 1748 Anson's Voy. III. vii. 354 The duty . . . paid by all ships . . . according to their tonnage. 1751 LABELYE Westm. Brit. XXIII. 442/2 There are three terms used in respect of the tonnage of ships, — namely, tonnage under decks, gross tonnage, and register tonnage. . . In obtaining the tonnage under tonnage deck, ships are divided in respect of their length into five classes. Ibid. 443 This formula is also applicable for finding displacement tonnage of ships, that is, the external displacement measured by taking transverse areas to the height of the load water-line to find the cubic content, which divided by 35 gives the displacement in tons weight. 1894 Pall Mall Mag. Nov. 388 Gross tonnage means a vessel's actual burthen; . . . registered tonnage is her burthen when the capacity of all the space in which cargo is not carried has been deducted.
