1943 Endocrinology XXXIII. 407 The use of -trophic as in gonadotropic... reverses and confuses a clear, practical pre-established usage in the broad field of biology... -Trophic, even if not perfectly apt, is close enough in meaning and is free from confusion. 1950 Lancet 2 Dec. 708/2 It is becoming current practice to speak of the action of a hormone in controlling an endocrine gland as trophic (e.g., thyrotrophic hormone)... This is surely a misuse of words, from a confusion between trophic action... which is concerned with nutrition... and tropism... which connotes control... Is it too late to revert to thyrotrophic... and the like? 1971 Ibid. 25 Sept. 701/2 For good or ill, -trophic is all but universal [in the names of hormones], though I saw corticotrophic recently in a new edition of a student's biochemistry book from the States.

trouse (tru:z, trauz), *sb.*² Now Hist. and arch. [App. taken in 16th c. from Irish (and Sc. Gaelic) triubhas, recorded *c*1500 (see quot.), orig. pronounced trīvās or trīwās, in mod.Irish pronunc. triūs (see TREWS). (The quot. of 1306, from its early date and late form, is doubtful, and may not belong to this word.) The 16th and 17th c. quots. here and under TREWS refer to it as worn by the Celts. It has been held to be derived from OF. trousse TRUSS, etc. q.v., but a careful examination of OF. literature by M. Antoine Thomas shows no trace of trousse in the sense assumed, which appears, later than in English, in Miège's Dict. 1679. The thing is said by Littré to have been worn (? in 17th c.) by young pages and by certain novices, and to survive in certain expressions, as il avait quitté les trouses, and être aux trouses de l'ennemi.

As to the ulterior history, Prof. Bergin of Dublin thinks well of the suggestion in Holder Alt-celt. Sprachsch. II. 1974, that the Celtic triubhas represents OF. trebus 'sorte de chaussure ou de chausse' (13th c., Godef.), from late L. tubrācōs 'tubruco vocatos quod tibias braccasque tegant' (Isidore Orig. XIX. xxii. 30). 'Tubraci quod a braccis ad tibias usque perveniant', which appears later as tribrati.

Miège F. Dict. (1679) has 'Trousse, sorte de chausses, trunk-breeches.'].]

Trouton ('trautən). Physics. [The name of F. T. Trouton (1863-1922), Irish physicist, who published the observation in 1884 (Phil. Mag. XVIII. 54).] Trouton's law or rule: the observation that for many substances the latent heat of vaporization of one mole, divided by the absolute temperature of the boiling point, is a constant (Trouton's constant) equal to approximately 88 joules per kelvin.

1899 J. WALKER Introd. Physical Chem. xii. 124 If the substance is in the state of vapour, the heat of vaporisation must be added to the thermochemical data for the liquid. This correction is often considerable, amounting approximately to one-fourth of the value of the boiling point of the substance on the absolute scale (Trouton's rule). 1901 Jrnl. Chem. Soc. LXXX. 11. 372 The author states that if the heat of fusion is added to the heat of vaporisation for the determination of Trouton's constant, the quotient then obtained agrees with that found for dissociation. 1922 GLAZEBROOK Dict. Appl. Physics I. 561/2 It was shown by Despretz in 1823 that some relationship of the form given above by Trouton held, and later Pictet (1876), Ramsay (1877), rediscovered it independently, but it is now generally referred to as Trouton's law. 1966 [see POLAR a. 3b]. 1982 A. M. LESK Introd. Physical Chem. iv. 71 Enthalpies of vaporization of unassociated substances follow Trouton's rule.

trove, obs. Sc. and north. form of TURF.

trover ('trəʊvə(r)). Law. [subst. use of OF. trover (11th c.), F. trouver pres. inf., to find.] The act of finding and assuming possession of any personal property; hence (in full, action of trover), an action at law to recover the value of personal property illegally converted by another to his own use.

Originally the action was brought for damages against one who had found and refused to give up the goods of the plaintiff on demand; this refusal constituted 'conversion' (CONVERSION 7); hence the action was called trover and conversion. Later, the finding became a legal fiction, and it was only necessary to prove the ownership and detention of the goods.

L. tüber-, supposed to have been altered at an early date to tüfer-, whence tüfre, trüfe, tuffe. The change of gender has been accounted for by supposing the neuter pl. tübera to have been treated as a fem. sing. (cf. tsar, czar (tsa:(r), za:(r)). Also 7 zarr, czaar, czarr, ksar, 8- tzar. [Romanized spellings of Russ. tsar', in Bulg. tsar king, sovereign emperor, Serb. tsar emperor, Croatian, Boh., Pol. car (= tsar, c in the Roman Slavonic orthography = Ц in Cyrillic, being pronounced ts or German z). The Russian form is reduced from earlier (11th c.) ts'isari = Oslav. tsēsari, in oblique cases ts'isar-, 'Cæsar, emperor, βασιλεύς, king', also (in latter senses) tsari. (In Russian, the full form tsesar' is retained in the sense 'Cæsar' and '(ancient Roman) emperor'; cf. Serb. tsesar applied to the German emperor, but tsar to the Russian tsar and the Sultan.

The Slav. word ultimately represents L. Cæsar, but came, according to Miklosich, through the medium of a Germanic lang. in which the word had the general sense 'emperor': cf. Goth. kaisar, OHG. keisar, OLG. kēsar, ON. keysari, whence also Finnish keisari, Esth. keiser, keisri. For the change of Germanic k to c = ts in Slav., cf. CHURCH. The spelling with cz- is against the usage of all Slavonic languages; the word was so spelt by Herberstein, Rerum Moscovit. Commentarii 1549, the chief early source of knowledge as to Russia in Western Europe, whence it passed into the Western Languages generally; in some of these it is now old-fashioned; the usual Ger. form is now zar; French adopted tsar during the 19th c. This also became frequent in English towards the end of that century, having been adopted by the Times newspaper as the most suitable English spelling.]

a. Hist. The title of the autocrat or emperor of Russia; historically, borne also by Serbian rulers of the 14th c., as the Tsar Stephen Dushan.

In Russia it was partially used by the Grand Duke Ivan III, 1462-1505, and by his son Basil or Vasilii, but was formally assumed by Ivan IV in 1547. According to Herberstein its actual sense in Russian was 'king', but it was gradually taken as = 'emperor', a sense which it had in other Slavonic languages. Peter the Great introduced the title imperator 'emperor', and the official style shortly before the Revolution of 1917 was 'Emperor of all the Russias, Tsar of Poland, and Grand Duke of Finland'; but the Russian popular appellation was still tsar.

tuck (tak), v.¹ Forms: a. 1 túcian, túcigan; 3-5 tuke, 4 touk, 5 touke, 5-6 toke, 7 Sc. towk. β. 5 tokke, 5-6 tukke, tuk, 6-7 tucke, 5-tuck. [The forms of this verb fall into two distinct groups; the development of the senses also offers difficulties. The α-forms (with long vowel or diphthong) belong to senses 1 and 2 and the earlier quots. under 3; the β-forms (with short vowel) to the rest of sense 3 and all the other senses, beginning in 14th c. in senses 4, 7, and occurring in 15th c. in sense 6 (and in one or two later instances in sense 2). The latter appear to correspond to MLG. tucken, tocken to draw, pull sharply or forcibly, MDu. tocken, tucken, OHG. zocchôn, zucchen to move or remove with a jerk, snatch away, pluck, pull, mod. Ger. zucken to jerk, tuck, tug, das schwert zücken, to draw the sword. The shortening of the ū in OE. túcian, early ME. tuke, etc. to u (Λ) in tuck is notable, but is paralleled by that of OE. súcian to suck; cf. also DUCK v. from ME. dúke(n).]

tuft (taɪt), sb. Also 5 toft, tofte, 5-7 tuftt, 6 tufte; 6-7 tuffe, 7-8 tuft. [The derivation presents many difficulties. Supposed to represent F. touffe (in OF. also toffe, tofe), generally referred to L. tūfa, 'a kind of helmet crest', or 'a kind of military standard' (in Vegetius, 386), appearing in Byzantine Greek as τοῦφα (see Du Cange). By some held to be ult. of German origin, ? ad. OLG. top or OHG. zopf. The final t is evidently an Eng. addition: cf. carafe, vulg. craft; also cliff, clift; draff, draft; graff, graft, and vulgar paragraft, telegraft.

The difficulties of this derivation are that F. touffe is not the normal repr. of L. tūfa, but points to tuffa*, whereas the long ū of tūfa is supported by the Greek and by Beda's tuuf; also that tūfa, touffe, answer phonetically neither to Low nor High German. Cf. Pr. chuf, It. ciuffo, a tuft or lock of hair, ad. Ger. zopf. Beside these, the final t in the Eng. word is of minor difficulty.]

1. a. A bulbous plant of the genus Tulipa (NO. Liliaceae), esp. the species T. Gesneriana, introduced from Turkey into Western Europe in the 16th c., and since extensively cultivated in very numerous varieties, blooming in spring, with broad bell-shaped or cup-shaped, usually erect, showy flowers, of various colours and markings; also, the flower itself.

The first mention of it by a Western European is by Busbeck (c 1554), the Emperor's ambassador, on the way from Adrianople to Constantinople, where 'ingens ubique florum copia offerebatur, narcissorum, hyacinthorum, et eorum quos Turcae tulipan vocant'. It was grown by the Fuggers at Augsburg, where it was seen and described by Gesner in 1561. It was introduced successively in Vienna, Mechlin, France, and England; it is mentioned by Lyte in his transl. of Dodoneus.

Origin uncertain; app. not orig. Latin or Romanic.

As the OHG. retains initial t it must have been adopted (from LG. or med.L.) after the HG. sound shifting, i.e. after 700. Some suggest a Celtic source, viz. OIr. toun hide, skin, so that the original sense would be 'wine-skin'; but the Mlr. tunna looks like an adopted word. At present it can only be said that the word appears to be as old or older in the LG. group of langs., including OE., than anywhere else; its occurrence in the Corpus Gloss c 725 is app. the earliest trace of the word in any lang. The later ME. spelling tonne was perh. after F., but prob. largely due to the scribal fashion of writing o for u, in contiguity to m, n, v, etc., as in son, tongue, honey, come, some, above, love etc. From c 1688

|| tunc, tunk. Welsh Hist. Also 4 tung, 7-8 tuncke. [ad. Welsh twng, twnc (pl. ty(n)geu); perh. connected with tyng-u to swear.] A kind of customary rent or payment (analogous to the 'chief-rents' or 'quit-rents' of English Real Property Law), issuing out of certain lands in North Wales, and still until recently payable in respect of Crown Lands.

Commonly explained as the money-commutation paid in lieu of the gwestva (in Latin cena), an entertainment due or tribute-in-kind rendered to the lord of the cymwd or prince, in respect of the free maenols of the cymwds (see COMMOT). Hence translated by Seebohm as 'food-rent'. As to the derivation, the conjecture has been offered that an oath was originally required of inability to render the gwestva in kind, before the tunc-pound was accepted instead.

1905 Water Supply & Irrigation Papers (U.S. Geol. Survey) No. 151. 26 The needs of the Survey were found to be met in a satisfactory manner by the use of a turbidimeter devised by Mr. Daniel D. turbine ('t3:bain, -in). [a. F. turbine, ad. L. turbo, turbin-em: see TURBO.]

1. a. Originally applied to a wheel revolving on a vertical axis, and driven by a column of water falling into its interior, and escaping by pipes, channels, or apertures, so arranged as to press by reaction on the periphery of the wheel, and cause it to revolve in the direction opposite to that of the escaping water. Now applied to any kind of machine in which this principle (sometimes combined with that of direct impact) is used or developed; the modifications and developments are very numerous, many of these being of highly complicated structure, in which neither the horizontality of the wheel nor the motive power is retained.

[1824 BURDIN in Bull. Soc. Encouragem. July 256 Machines rotatoires à grande vitesse nommées turbines hydrauliques.] 1838 Railway Mag. IV. 51 Turbine.—An instrument under this name has lately been invented by M. Fournayron, worked by water-pressure, which is said to have made a great sensation in Germany. Ibid., It is said that a turbine, only thirteen inches diameter, under a vertical pressure of water of 118 yards, revolved 2,300 times in a minute, and... realized a power, which estimated in steam, would be equal to that of sixty horses. 1842 *Civil Eng. & Arch. b. More fully steam-turbine: A steam motor in which rotatory motion is produced by steam impinging directly upon a series of vanes upon the circumference of a revolving cylinder or disk (or, in some types, acting and reacting alternately on moving and stationary elements).

1900 Engineer 2 Feb. 127/3 The main applications of the De Laval steam turbine are:—(1) Turbine motors, driving machinery direct by means of belts or ropes; (2) Turbine dynamos, the dynamos being placed on the second motion shafts or a prolongation of the same; (3) turbine pumps... and (4) turbine exhaust and pressure fans or ventilators. 1900 N. Brit. Daily Mail 30 Jan. 4 That is the whole secret of the turbine. In the modern application of it the steam blows upon the shaft and the shaft turns, and by an ingenious application of blades the steam which enters the first turbine when it leaves the boiler at a pressure of 225 lbs. to the square inch is utilised till the value of the last pound is all used up. 1905 Westm. Gaz. 16 Mar. 10/1 The dynamo is coupled directly to a Parsons turbine, which has introduced great changes and great economies in the driving of huge electrical plants.

c. A centrifugal separator used in sugar manufacture.

turbopause ('tɜːbəʊpəʊz). Meteorol. [f. TURB(ULENCE + -O + PAUSE sb.)] The outer limit of a turbosphere, where the distribution of constituents is due equally to diffusion and turbulent mixing.

1951 S. CHAPMAN in Jrnl. Atmospheric & Terrestrial Physics I. 201 The diffusive tendency becomes increasingly effective at greater heights, and it may be (but it is not certain) that at some level diffusion becomes dominant over the turbulent mixing. The name turbopause is suggested for this level. 1967 R. W. FAIRBRIDGE Encycl. Atmospheric Sci. & Astrogeol. 5/1 Above the turbopause, which [on earth] lies between 100 and 130 km, diffusion is more important than turbulent mixing in distributing the constituents. 1979 Nature 17 May 221/1 The δ-bands, present in the Earth's twilight and night time airglow spectra, indicate a significant population of atomic nitrogen at or below the Venus turbopause.

1951 S. CHAPMAN in *Jrnl. Turing machine (ˈtʃʊərɪŋ). [Named after A. M. Turing (1912-54), English mathematician, who described such a machine in 1936.] A notional computing machine for performing simple reading, writing, and shifting operations in accordance with a prescribed set of rules, invoked in theories of computability and automata.

It is represented as a scanner that has a number of internal states and moves left or right along a tape on which is a sequence of symbols. The symbol read and the state of the scanner determine (in accordance with the rules) what replacement symbol is written, what new state the scanner enters, and what move it makes along the tape before the cycle is repeated.

1937 A. CHURCH in Jrnl. Symbolic Logic II. 43 [Abstract of Turing's paper.] Certain further restrictions are imposed on the character of the machine, but these are of such a nature as obviously to cause no loss of generality—in particular, a human calculator, provided with pencil and paper and explicit instructions, can be regarded as a kind of Turing machine. 1955 Sci. Amer. Apr. 62/1 To understand a Turing machine we need only know its table of commands. 1961 Proc. Symposium Appl. Amer. May 70/1 Beginning with the intuitive idea that a method is an algorithm—a procedure that can be mechanically carried out without creative intervention—he [sc. A. M. Turing] showed how the idea can be refined into a detailed model of the process of computation in which any algorithm is broken down into a sequence of simple, atomic steps. The resulting model of computation is the logical construct called a Turing machine.

Turk (tɜːk), *sb.*¹ Also 4-7 Turke, 5 turque, 7 Turc; 9 Toork (sense 1). [= F. Turc, fem. turque, It., Sp., Pg. Turco, -a, med.L. Turcus, -a, Byz. Gr. Τούρκος, Pers. (and Arab.) turk. A national name of unknown origin. Possibly the same as the Chinese equivalent Tu-kin, applied to a division of the Hiong-nu (identified by Deguigne with the Huns), who occupied the country south of the Altaian mountains c 177 B.C. (In Persian dict. turk is explained as 'A Turk, a beautiful youth, a barbarian, a robber', but the last three definitions are only applications of the national name, not explanations of its original meaning.)]

1. Ethnology. Pl. Turks. The name of a numerous and widely spread family of the human race, occupying from prehistoric times large parts of Central Asia, and speaking a language and dialects belonging to the TURKIC branch of the Ural-Altaic (Finno-Tartar, or Turanian) linguistic family (a primary family of co-ordinate rank with the Indo-European or Aryan, and Semitic). Within this linguistic family the Turks are usually held to stand between the Ugrians and Mongols, having closest relationship to the latter group. The form Toork or Tourk (after Persian) has been used by some (esp. in India) in this wide sense.

From their original home in Central Asia, chiefly from Turkestan, hordes of Turks at various times assailed and conquered other lands. Of these, the best known in the West were those calling themselves, after famous leaders, Seljūk and Osmānli respectively. The former overthrew the Abbasides, or first Muslim caliphs of Baghdad, and founded the Seljūk dynasty in their room; the latter, after embracing Islām, and receiving much Persian and Arab culture, arose on the ruins of the Seljūk empire in A.D. 1300 and became the ancestors of the Osmanli or Ottoman Turks in Asia and south-eastern Europe (see sense 2).

Probably the name Turk appears in English first in connexion with the Third Crusade, 1187-1192. The Turks of that date were Seljūks, not Ottomans. Saladin, the antagonist of Richard I, was a Kurd, originally in the service of the Seljūks. In the wider sense 1, the name is of comparatively late use in English and the European langs. generally, the Turks of Central Asia being unknown in Western Europe.

T. BEALBY in Times Gazetteer 1613/2 Thirty years later [than 1017] the Turks—not the Ottomans (Osmanlis), but their predecessors, the Seljuks—invaded the Byzantine Empire for the first time.

2. a. A native or inhabitant of Turkey; formerly, a member of the dominant race of the Ottoman empire; sometimes extended to any subject of the Grand Turk or Turkish Sultan, but usually restricted to Muslims; in earlier times, a Seljūk; from 1300, an Osmanli or Ottoman; one who was, or considered himself, a descendant of the Osmanlis or other Turks. 2. a. In current use: A well-known large gallinaceous bird of the Linnæan genus Meleagris, the species of which are all American; esp. M. gallopavo, which was found domesticated in Mexico at the discovery of that country in 1518, and was soon after introduced into Europe, and is now valued as a table fowl in numerous countries.

Two races of this, which have been variously regarded as sub-species or species, are found wild, of which one, the Northern wild turkey, which has been variously distinguished as americana, sylvestris, and fera, is a native of the eastern half of the continent, from parts of Canada and the Missouri region to Texas, where it is succeeded by M. mexicana, the Mexican wild turkey. As in the case of many long-domesticated animals, it is doubtful from which of these wild types the domestic turkey has arisen, but the fact that the latter was domesticated in Mexico, and that the northern race shows less adaptability to domestication, favours the opinion that M. mexicana was the source. Some however hold that there may have been two domestic breeds, represented in England by the Norfolk and the Cambridgeshire breeds, or that at least mixture with americana has taken place. Another species, M. ocellata, which inhabits Guatemala, is smaller and much more beautiful; it has not been tamed.

turkey-cock ('tʃɜːkiːkɒk). Also 6–7 Turkicock (e. [f. TURKEY¹ + COCK sb.¹]. In the 16th c. synonymous with Guinea-cock or Guinea-fowl, an African bird known to the ancients (the μελαγρίς of Aristotle, meleagris of Varro and Pliny), the American bird being at first identified with or treated as a species of this. The African bird is believed to have been so called as originally imported through the Turkish dominions; it was called Guinea-fowl when brought by the Portuguese from Guinea in West Africa. After the two birds were distinguished and the names differentiated, turkey was erroneously retained for the American bird, instead of the African. From the same imperfect knowledge and confusion Meleagris, the ancient name of the African fowl, was unfortunately adopted by Linnæus as the generic name of the American bird.]

1. A name given to a sect of heretics in the 14th c., who are said to have maintained that one ought not to be ashamed of anything that is natural.

¶ 2. By Urquhart taken to render F. tirelupin in Rabelais, said by Duchat to be a name given in 1372 to a certain people who imitated Cynics, and lived on lupins which they gathered (tiraient) in the fields.

Cotgrave and Littre (who spells tirelopin) treat this as a separate word. Cotgr. has 'Tirelupin, a catch-bit, or capitious companion; a scowdrell, or scurvie fellow'; 'Turlupin, a grub, mushrome, start-up, new-nothing, man of no value'. Urquhart applied Cotgrave's explanation of turlupin to tirelupin.

[Mod.F. has turlupin in the sense 'buffoon, merry-andrew' (from the name assumed by an actor in French farce a 1630), hence 'a sorry jester, a low punster', and turlupinade a low pun or word-play. Cf. obs. Ital. turlupino (Douce) = 'turluru a foole, a gull, a ninnie, a patch' (Florio).]

turmeric ('tɜ:mərik), sb. (a.) Forms: 6 tarmaret, tormarith, -marthe, tormerik, -ye, turmerrick, 6-7 turmericke (7 turn-merick, turmerocke, -ack, termarcke, tarmanick, tarmaluk), 7-9 turmerick, 8- turmeric. [Origin obscure. The English forms vary greatly, but tarmaret, tormarith resemble a recorded F. terre mérite and med. or mod.L. terra merita 'deserving or deserved earth', a name which the powder is said by Littre to have borne in commerce. The reason and origin of this L. and F. appellation are obscure; but in English the final t appears (by scribal error, or phonetic differentiation, or influence of such words as arsenic) to have become c or k, with the second r sometimes changed to l or n. Some have suggested a corruption of the Persian-Arabic name kurkum 'saffron', whence L., F., and Sp. curcuma; but the change seems too unlikely. The application of the name in Eng. to Tormentil arose apparently from some real or fancied similarity of properties or uses.

(Littre has s.v. Curcuma 'safran des Indes et curcuma, dite terre-mérite, quand elle est réduite en poudre'. Hatz.-Darm. have also, s.v. Curcuma, Du Pinet, 16th c. in Delbœuf Recueil 'La curcuma ou terra merita des apothicaires'.)]
