and ME., deciple was gradually conformed to the L. spelling as disciple; ME. had occasional variants in -il, -yl, -ul.]

1. One who follows or attends upon another for the purpose of learning from him; a pupil or scholar.

It has not been at any period in English the ordinary term for scholar or pupil, as discipulus was in Latin; but has come into use through the New Testament versions, being applied chiefly to the Twelve Disciples of Jesus Christ, and used in similar Scriptural applications or later extensions of them. Hence the sense-development in Eng. is not that of Latin, where the order of sub-senses was d, c, a, b.

a. One of the personal followers of Jesus Christ during his life; esp. one of the Twelve.

Rare in OE. the word in Ang. Gospels being leorningcniht, in Lindisf. Gl. usually deign.

c950 Lindisf. Gosp. Matt. xxvii. 57 Summ monn... 6e discipul was 6es hælendes. c1200 Trin. Coll. Hom. 101 Ure louerd stod among his disciples. a1225 *Ancre. b. Also applied in the N.T. to the early Christians generally; hence, in religious use, absol. a professed follower of Christ, a Christian or believer. (Hence sense 3.)

c1380 WYCLIF De Dot. Eccl. ii. Sel. Wks. III. 433 Crist seip þat noo man may be his discipul biþ if he renunce alle siche þingis. 1388—Acts xi. 26 The discipulis weren namyd first at Antioche cristen men. 1526-34 TINDALE Acts xx. 7 The disciples came to geder for to breake breed. 1607 HIERON Wks. I. 384 If a true discipule, a true Christian; if but a formall discipule, surely but a hollow Christian. 1853 ROBERTSON Serm. II. xix. 244 To the true discipule a miracle only manifests the Power and Love which are silently at work everywhere. 1890 J. HUNTER Devot. Services, Dedic. Serv., You are gathered here... to take upon yourselves the obligations of Christ's disciples.

c. A personal follower or pupil of any religious or (in more recent use) other teacher or master. (This passes almost imperceptibly into sense 2.) (Rare in OE.; see a.)

This could regularly happen only in the case of a feoffment to a stranger by a tenant in tail in possession. The heir in tail had then no right to enter upon the land and turn out the intruder, but had to resort to the expensive course of asserting his title by process of law (Sir F. 2. Commerce. a. A deduction (usually at a certain rate per cent.) made for payment before it is due, or for prompt payment, of a bill or account; a deduction for cash payment from the price of an article usually sold on credit; any deduction or abatement from the nominal value or price.

Hunter* (1863) 252 Draw all the profits without discount or percentage. Mod. A retail bookseller who gives twopenny in the shilling discount. A discount of 5 per cent. is offered for payment of this account before the end of the month.

b. The deduction made from the amount of a bill of exchange or promissory note, by one who gives value for it before it is due, this deduction being calculated at a defined rate per cent. for the time the document has to run; practically, the interest charged by a banker or bill-discounter for advancing the value of a bill before it is due.

This is the common form in which banks and discount-houses advance money to persons engaged in commerce; the banker or discounter having thus purchased the bill at a discount keeps it till maturity, when he realizes the full amount. In practice, discount is calculated as the interest on the amount of the bill for the time it has to run; this is more than what arithmeticians call the true discount, which is reckoned as interest on the present worth (i.e. that sum which if invested at the given rate for the given time would amount to the face value).

BROOK-SMITH Arith. (ed. 6) 323 With bankers and bill-discounters, discount is the interest of the sum specified, whereas, properly speaking, it is the interest of the present worth of that sum. And as the present worth of a sum due at a future time is less than the sum itself, the true discount is less than the banker's or mercantile discount; and therefore the banker obtains a small advantage.

discreet (dɪˈskri:t), a. (adv. and sb.). Forms: 4-6 discret, 4-7 discrete, 6-7 discretee, 5- discretet, (5 discretet, dyscrete, 5-6 Sc. discretit, 6 discretee). [ME. discret, discrete, a. F. discret, -ète (12th c. in Littré), 'qui se conduit avec discernement', ad. L. discretus, in late L. and Rom. sense: cf. It. and Sp. discreto 'discreet, wise, wary, considerate, circumspect' (Florio), 'discreet, wise to perceive' (Minsheu). A doublet of DISCRETE, differentiated in sense and spelling.

In cl. Lat., discret-us had only the sense 'separate, distinct', as pa. pple. of discernere, whence the corresponding mod. F. sense of discret, and Eng. DISCRETE. The late L. sense, which alone came down in popular use in Romance, seems to have been deduced from the cognate sb. discretiō-em, originally the action of separating, distinguishing, or discerning, and then the faculty of discernment; hence the adjective may have taken the sense 'possessed of discernment'.

In Eng., discrete was the prevalent spelling in all senses until late in the 16th c., when on the analogy of native or early-adopted words in ee from ME. close ē, as feet, sweet, beet, the spelling discrete (occasional from 1400) became established in the popular sense, leaving discreet for the scholastic and technical sense in which the kinship to L. discretus is more obvious: see DISCRETE. Shakspeare (1st Folio) has always discreet.]

Exclusion is not, therefore, due to the disjunctive form of proposition.

3. Gram. Applied to conjunctions that express an alternative or imply some kind of adversative relation between the clauses which they grammatically connect.

With the earlier grammarians the division of Conjunctions into Copulative and Disjunctive was made a main one. It is, however, of grammatical importance (see quot. 1824) only in the Coordinative Conjunctions, of which and is Copulative, while the Alternative or, nor, and the Adversative but, yet, are Disjunctive. Of the Subordinative Conjunctions, the Causal lest, the Hypothetical unless, and the Concessive although, are also disjunctive in sense; but in their grammatical use these do not differ from the Copulative that, if, because, as, since.

b. In French Grammar, sometimes applied to the indirect nominative (and objective) case of the personal pronouns (moi, toi, lui, eux) as distinguished from the direct nominative (je, tu, il, ils), called in this nomenclature conjective.

[Mentioned in 1256 as the English or Anglo-French name for Fr. les mals jours; whence it appears to be OF. dis mal = L. dies mali evil days, unlucky days. It was thus originally a substantive of collective meaning; when 'day' was added, making 'dismal days', (cf. 'summer days', 'winter days'), its attributive use passed into an adjective, and, its original application being obscured, it was finally before 1600 extended from day, days, to be a general attribute. See Note at end of this article.]

A. *sb.*¹ (The original use.)

† 1. The dies mali, evil, unlucky or unpropitious days, of the mediæval calendar, called also dies Ægyptiaci, 'Ægipcian daies' (see EGYPTIAN 1b); hence, by extension, Evil days (generally), days of disaster, gloom, or depression, the days of old age.

The dies mali were Jan. 1, 25; Feb. 4, 26; March 1, 28;
April 10, 20; May 3, 25; June 10, 16; July 13, 22; Aug. 1, 30;
Sept. 3, 21; Oct. 3, 22; Nov. 5, 28; Dec. 7, 22. They are said to have been called 'Ægyptian days' because first discovered or computed by Ægyptian astrologers; though some mediæval writers connected them with the plagues of ancient Egypt (cf. the Chaucer quot. 1369, where the word appears to be treated as OF. dis mal, ten evils, or plagues, plāga; see Prof. Skeat's note, Chaucer I. 493); some, still more fancifully, associated them with the gloom of 'Ægyptian' darkness.

[Note. As to the identity of dimal with OF. (= AF.) dis mal—L. dies mali, see Professor Skeat in Trans. Philol. Soc. 1888, p. 2. Already in 1617, Minshew (whose own memory doubtless recalled the time when dimal was used only to qualify days) derived it from 'L. dies malus, en euill and unhappie time'. Early corroborative evidence comes from OF. and Icelandic sources. (1) The Anglo-French Art de Kalender of Rauf de Linham, 1256 (MSS. at Glasgow, Oxford, Cambridge; extracts printed by M. Paul Meyer in his official Rapport on Documents Manuscripts de l'ancienne littérature de la France, Paris 1871, pp. 127-9), has a passage of sixty lines on the Dies mali, beginning 'Ôre dirrai des jours denietz, Que vous dimal (Bodley MS. dimal) appelletz' [Now shall I tell of the forbidden days, Which you call dimal], and further on 'Dimal les appellent plousours, C'est est a dire les mals jours' [Dimal several call them, That is to say the evil days]. Here dimal is given as the equivalent of 'mali jours', evil days.

(2) A short Icelandic treatise in a Copenhagen MS. (Arna-Magnæan 350, written 1363, ff. 148a), begins 'Her greinir um dimala daga. Tveir ero þeir dagar i huerum manadi er at bokmali kallaz dies mali. enn þat þydz illir dagar' [Here tells of the dimal days. There are two days in every month that in the book-language (Latin) are called dies mali, and that is interpreted 'evil days']. The word dimal is not Norse, and must have been learned from England before 1363. In dimala daga, it is probably an adj. accus. pl., but may be a sb. gen. pl., 'days of the dimalis'. Both the AF. and the Icelandic treatises give a list of the dimal or dies mali, identical with that given by various mediæval writers, and computable by the mnemonic distich given by Du Cange s.v. Dies Ægyptiaci: see sense 1 above.]

disown (dis'əʊn), v. [f. DIS- 6 + OWN v.: cf. disclaim.]

(In some recent dictionaries, this and the simple own have each been improperly split up into two verbs, sense 3 being erroneously assumed to be derived from OE. unnan to grant, with which it has no connexion: see OWN v.)

†1. trans. To cease to own, to relinquish one's possession of; to give up, part with, renounce.

c 1620 H. ANDERSON Bidding World Farewell in Farr S.P. Jas. I (1848) 304 The hour is set wherein they must disown The royal pomp, the treasure, and the throne.

A. adj.

1. Essentially different or diverse in kind; dissimilar, unlike, distinct. In Logic, used of things or concepts having no obvious common ground or genus in which they are correlated. Hence distinguished from contrary, since contrary things are at least correlated in pairs, e.g. good and bad. Also distinguished from disjunct, since disjunct concepts may all be reduced to a common kind.

Disparātus appears first in Cicero De Inv. Rhet. 28. 42, applied to the mere separation expressed by sapere, non sapere, or A is not B, as against the opposition of hot and cold, life and death; it is used by Boethius, De Syll. Hyp. (ed. Bas.) 608, to denote things which are only different, without any conflict of contrariety (tantum opposita, nulla contrarietate pugnancia). It reappears in 14-15th c. with the school of Occam, e.g. in Rud. Strobus and Paulus Venetus, and is retained in modern transformations of the scholastic logic. According to Ueberweg Logic §53, disparate conceptions are those which do not fall within the extent of the same higher, or at least of the same next higher conception. (Prof. W. Wallace.)

(1860) I. 224 Notions co-ordinated in the whole of comprehension, are, in respect of the discriminating characters, different without any similarity. They are thus, pro tanto, absolutely different; and, accordingly, in propriety are called Disparate Notions, (notiones disparate). On the other hand, notions co-ordinated in the quantity or whole of extension... are only relatively different (or diverse); and, in logical language, are properly called Disjunct or Discrete Notions. 1865 GROTE Plato i. vi. 249 Other creeds, disparate or discordant. 1883 F. HARRISON in Pall Mall G. 3 Nov. 1/2 The questions are so utterly disparate as not to be reducible to the same argument.

dispart (di'spɑ:t), sb. [Derivation uncertain.]

There appears to be no related name in any other language. An obvious suggestion is that the appellation was derived from DISPART v., from the mode of ascertaining the dispart, by disparting (dividing in two) the difference between the two diameters. But it is to be observed that the term with its own verb (DISPART v.) appears earlier than any known occurrence of DISPART v., and that the particular sense 'divide into parts' is not known to us before 1629.]

dispatch, despatch (di'spætʃ), v. Also 6 dispatch(e, dyspatch(e, -patch; 8-9 despatch. [Found early in 16th c.: ad. It. disacciare 'to dispatch, to hasten, to speed, to rid away any work' (Florio), or Sp. despachar to expedite, 'to dispatch, to rid out of the way' (Minsheu). The radical is the same as in It. impacciare to entangle, hinder, stop, prevent, Sp., Pg. empachar to impede, embarrass. Not related to F. dépêcher, which gave the Engl. dépêche, DEPEACH, common in 15-16th c., rare after 1600, and app. superseded by dispatch before 1650. The uniform English spelling from the first introduction of the word to the early part of the 19th c. was with dis-; but in Johnson's Dictionary the word was somehow entered under des- (although Johnson himself always wrote dispatch, which is also the spelling of all the authors cited by him); though this has, since c. 1820, introduced diversity into current usage, dispatch is to be preferred, as at once historical, and in accordance with English analogy; for even if this word had begun in ME. with a form in des- from OF. (which it did not), it would regularly have been spelt dis- by 1500: see DES-, DIS-, prefixes.

The notions of impede, expedite, are expressed by different roots in the northern and southern Romanic langs. The radical of F. empêcher, dépêcher (Eng. IMPEACH, DEPEACH), OF. empeschier, despechier, is taken to be a L. pedicāre* (extended form of im-, ex-pedire, or deriv. of pedica 'fetter, gin'); cf. prêcher, PREACH, OF. prechier:—L. prædicāre. This also occurs in Pr. empedegar. But Sp. empachar, despachar, Pr. empaitar, point to a L. type -pactiāre (f. pactus, 'fastened, fixed, fast', pa. pple. of pangere). The radical of It. im-, dis-, pacciare, Pr. empachar (with which perh. are to be taken dial. OF. empachier, ampauchier, dapachier: see Godef.), have been referred to a cognate L. type -pactiāre (cf., for the phonology, It. tracciare, docciare, succiare:—tractiāre, ductiāre, suctiāre). Thus, these words are quite distinct from F. empêcher, dépêcher, in 16th c. also despecher, which gave Eng. impeach, and depeach, also despeche, in Caxton dépêche, Sc. despeche. Dispatch, therefore, could not be of French origin. The date of our first quot., 1517, is early for a word from Italian, and still more so for a word from Spanish; but the active intercourse with the Papal Court and with Spain at that date may have facilitated the introduction of dispatch as a diplomatic word. Tunstall, our first authority for dispatche, was Commissioner to Spain in 1516 and 1517.]

II. The action of administering, ordering, or managing; the system by which things are administered.

[This group of senses originates in the L. use of dispensatio to render Gr. oikonomia in N.T. and patristic writers. The latter is used in 1 Cor. ix. 17, Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 25 for the 'office of an administrator' (see sense 4 below); but in Eph. i. 10, iii. 9, for 'a method or system of administration' (specifically that which involved the Incarnation). From this latter arose various theological uses: (1) Tertullian (Adv. Praxean II, iii, iv.) uses dispensatio = oikonomia to denote the Trinity as an administrative arrangement, i.e. a system of distribution and apportionment of functions designed by the Father for administrative purposes. This is known as an economical as distinguished from an essential Trinity: in the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will. (See the distinction between DISPENSATIVE, DISPENSATORY, and essential.) (2) It was applied to the Incarnation (dispensatio assumpti corporis, d. susceptæ carnis, or simply dispensatio) as the basis or organ of the redemptive system under which mankind now live (August. Serm. 264 §5). (3) The evangelical system is termed dispensatio gratiæ in opposition to the Law or system of works (August. Ep. 82 §20), while the method of salvation by means of the Incarnation is dispensatio salutis nostræ (August. Serm. 237 §1). Hence, in the Latin version of Irenæus, Christ is called dispensator paternæ gratiæ (iv. 20. 7). (4) Dispensatio was applied to the divine purpose or decree which established the system, and determined its mode of action (Tertull. Adv. Marc. vi. 18, Hilar. Pict. De Trin. ix. 66, xi. 13); also, by Hilary, to the Passion, as the supreme mystery of Redemption.]

An extension of the patristic use of the word as applied to the evangelical system based on the Incarnation (see note under II above); the patriarchal and Mosaic 'dispensations' being conceived as prophetic of the Christian, all being one in substance though differing in form. This use became common in the theology of the 17th c.

II. from med.L. dispensāre in eccles. use.

[In later med.L. (by 1200 or earlier) dispensāre was used absol. or intrans. (= agere dispensatorie or dispensative), in the sense 'to make an arrangement in the character of a steward (οικονόμος), administrator, or manager, to deal administratively', especially in reference to the practical application of a law or rule to a particular case; first, apparently, in the way of relaxing a punishment or penance, which, according to strict law, had been already incurred, but in the particular case ought to be remitted for special reasons; thence, in the remission of a punishment not yet incurred, which amounted in fact to a licence to break the legal rule; and thus, in the general sense of granting relaxation, exemption, indulgence, etc. The chief constructions were dispensare in tali casu, circa jus, circa aliquem or aliquid, and esp. cum aliquo (ut possit), etc. (to dispense in such a case, in reference to a certain law, or a certain person or matter, with a person that he may do something, etc.). (Prof. F. W. Maitland, LL.D.)

These intrans. uses passed into English, esp. dispense with, which became a combined verbal phrase, with indirect passive, to be dispensed with, and has had a wide development of sense: see branch III. By elision of the preposition or other processes, the verb has also become trans. in the sense 'to grant dispensation to, for, or from.' Transitive senses are found also in French from 15th c.]

4. intr. To deal dispensatorily, to use dispensatory power; to grant dispensation or relaxation of the strict letter of the law in a special case; to make a special arrangement (with any one) whereby the penalty of a law is remitted in his case. a. simply, or with in. Med.* III. 380 When the displacement is very considerable, the functions of the heart may be much embarrassed. 1863 KINGLAKE Crimea (1876) I. xv. 354 Occasioned by some accidental displacement of words. 1880 HAUGHTON Phys. Geog. II. 46 note, A vertical displacement of the strata.

b. Physics. The amount by which anything is displaced; the difference or geometrical relation between the initial position of a body and its position at some subsequent instant.

1837 WHEWELL Hist. Induct. Sc. (1857) I. 150 The displacement of the sun by parallax is so small that [etc.]. 1879 THOMSON & TAIT Nat. Phil. I. i. §90 We may consider the whole motion as made up of successive elementary displacements.

c. Thermometry. (See quot.)

1871 B. STEWART Heat §22 It is found that thermometers are liable to an alteration of their zero points, especially when the bulb has been filled not long before graduation... This displacement may in the course of years amount to about 1° C.

d. Electr. (See quotes.)

1873 J. C. MAXWELL Electr. & Magn. I. i. 60 The electric polarization of an elementary portion of a dielectric is a forced state into which the medium is thrown by the action of electromotive force, and which disappears when that force is removed. We may conceive it to consist in what we may call an electrical displacement, produced by the electromotive force. 1885 WATSON & BURBURY Electr. & Magn. I. §258. 1895 SYLVANUS THOMPSON Electr. & Magn. §57 Displacement. Whenever electric forces act on a dielectric, tending to drive electricity in at one side and out at the other... the quantity of electricity which has apparently been transferred... was called by Maxwell 'the displacement'. Ibid. §516 Experiment proves that displacement-currents, while they last, set up magnetic fields around them; just as connexion-currents and conduction-currents do.

e. displacement law, any of three laws in Physics: (i) that the wavelength at which a black body radiates most energy is inversely proportional to its absolute temperature; (ii) (see quot. 1922); (iii) that when an atom emits an alpha particle its atomic number decreases by two, and when it emits a beta particle its atomic number increases by one.

1904 T. PRESTON Theory of Heat (ed. 2) vi. 600 This important equation expresses the fact that if radiation of a particular wave-length corresponding to a definite temperature is adiabatically altered to another wave-length, then the temperature changes in the inverse ratio. This is known as Wien's displacement law. 1922 Encycl. Brit. XXXII. 561/1 Perhaps the most comprehensive connexion of spectra with the periodic table is established by the 'displacement law' of Kossel and Sommerfeld... The displacement law states that, when an element is ionized, the enhanced series take on the same type of complexity as the arc series produced by the element to the left (i.e. in the preceding group) in the periodic table. 1926 R. W. LAWSON tr. Hevey & Paneth's Man. Radioactivity xiii. 114 In this way we obtain the following 'displacement law': The emission of a particles by an element results in the production of an element situated two places lower down in the natural sequence of the elements, whereas when the disintegrating element emits β-rays, an element is produced which is situated one place higher in the system. 1927 RUTHERFORD in Proc. Physical Soc. XXXIX. 360 This generalisation, known as the Displacement Law, first put forward in general form by Russell, Fajans and Soddy, gives us at once the nuclear charge and mass of each element in the radioactive series, and thus fixes the ordinary physical and chemical properties of each radioactive element, as well as its atomic weight. 1968 M. S. LIVINGSTON Particle Physics II. 16 Soddy and others established the displacement law.

f. Psychol. The substitution of one idea or impulse for another, as in dreams, obsessions, etc.; the unconscious transfer of intense feelings or emotions to something of greater or less consequence; also = SUBLIMATION 5c.

1913 A. A. BRILL tr. Freud's Interpr. Dreams vi. 286 The result of this displacement is that the dream content no longer resembles the core of the dream thoughts at all. Ibid. vi. 402 The dream activity makes use of the displacement of psychic intensities up to the transvaluation of all psychic values. 1955 H. C. ABRAHAM tr. K. Abraham's Clin. Papers 111. vii. 189 We should be straining the facts if we attempted to make an artificial separation between displacement and secondary elaboration. 1962 HENDERSON & GILLESPIE Text-bk. Psychiatry (ed. 9) vii. 128 Displacement consists in the transfer of the emotional setting of one idea to some other apparently insignificant idea. 1964 GOULD & KOLB Dict. Social Sci. 204/1 'Fiddling' with objects such as pencils is a masturbation substitute or displacement. Ibid. 204/2 In social psychology the concept displacement has been used with respect to the hostility expressed toward minority groups.

g. Applied attrib. to an activity or behaviour pattern occurring outside its normal context and arising from a conflict of impulses (see quots.).

1947 E. A. ARMSTRONG Bird Display & Behaviour ii. 36 Toying with odds and ends may be regarded as... providing emotional outlets. They are 'displacement' or substitute activities, common enough in human life. Ibid. viii. 106 'Displacement' activities will be regarded as a special type within the larger class of false activities. 1951 N. TINBERGEN Stud. Instinct v. 114 It is a striking fact that displacement activities often occur in a situation in which the fighting drive and the drive to escape are both activated. Ibid. 116 Herring gulls and many other birds... feed their mates during courtship; it is not at all improbable that this... is displacement feeding. Ibid. 117 If male sticklebacks are forced to nest very closely together, they will show nearly continuous displacement digging. Ibid. viii. 210 In man learned patterns, like lighting a cigarette, handling keys or handkerchief, &c., often act as displacement activities. 1957 New Scientist 26 Sept. 42 Displacement activities usually result from a conflict between two strongly activated but antagonistic drives, or from strong motivation, usually sexual, in the absence of the necessary stimulus required for the release of the consummatory act. 1962 LUTENER 2 Aug. 169/1 Many such irrelevant actions are known in animals. Dr Tinbergen has called them 'displacement activities'. They are seen in conflict situations, where an animal's automatic behaviour mechanisms cannot work smoothly in its current environment. Ibid. 169/2 Human displacement activities are not easily catalogued.

3. a. Removal of a thing by substitution of something else in its place; 'replacement'.

dissociation (dɪ'səʊʃi'eɪʃən, -sɪ'eɪʃən). [ad. L. dissociation-em, n. of action f. dissociāre to DISSOCIATE: cf. F. dissociation (16th c. in Littré).]

1. The action of dissociating or the condition of being dissociated; severance; division; disunion.

Rev.* 276 It will add infinitely to the dissociation, distraction, and confusion of these confederate republics. 1877 E. CAIRD Philos. Kant i. 141 The association or dissociation of one feeling from another.

2. Chem. The direct separation of compound substances into their primary elements, or into less complex compounds; decomposition, spec. by the action of heat. Hence dissociation-point, the temperature at which such decomposition takes place; dissociation constant, the product of the concentrations of the dissociated ions in a solution divided by the concentration of the undissociated molecule when equilibrium has been reached.

Applied usually to the separation of a compound into its elements by the action of heat alone, without the intervention of any substance which breaks up the combination by its greater chemical affinity for one of the elements; but sometimes restricted to such a partial separation of the elements, that they reunite when the temperature is lowered below the dissociation-point. Others have used it in the wider etymological sense of direct separation of elements by any force, and applied THERMOLYSIS to dissociation by heat, as distinguished from ELECTROLYSIS or decomposition by electricity.

[1857 Nov. 23 H. STE. CLAIRE DEVILLE in Journal de l'Institut (title), De la dissociation, ou décomposition spontanée des corps, sous l'influence de la chaleur.] 1869 C. A. The degree of dissociation is expressed in terms of the dissociation constant.

3. Psychol. a. The process or result of breaking up associations of ideas.

1890 W. JAMES Princ. Psychol. I. 506 What is associated now with one thing and now with another tends to become dissociated from either... One might call this the law of dissociation by varying concomitants. 1890 J. M. BALDWIN Handbk. Psychol. (ed. 2) 218 The part played by dissociation is evident. If there were no such breaking up of representations, imagination would be simply memory. 1925 E. & C. PAUL tr. Janel's Psychol. Healing I. xi. 676, I regard a memory, and especially a fixed idea... as a system comprising a number of associated psychological phenomena... I have attempted to break up this system, to demolish it stone by stone; this is what I call the dissociation of a fixed idea. 1969 S. H. BARTLEY *Princ.
