More than six million people from around the globe attend Oktoberfest, and around 1,320,860 gallons of beer are consumed.

✿ OKTOBERFEST

Observed in: Munich
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Mid-September–early October

Oktoberfest is an annual beer festival held in the German city of Munich during the months of September and October.

The festival goes back to the royal wedding of King Ludwig I of Bavaria (1786–1868) and Queen Therese von Sachsen-Hildburghausen (1792–1854), on October 12, 1810. The wedding celebrations included a lavish beer party and horse racing for the people. It was so popular that since then Munich has hosted the communal beer parties in large tents.

Munich sports a festive air with musical bands, guests from around the world, and the Bavarians wearing traditional costumes. The ceremonial opening of the festival takes place in September and begins with the arrival of the mayor of Munich in a festive coach, which is followed by a beautifully adorned horse-drawn brewer's cart. A big parade follows at the end of which the mayor taps the first keg of beer and proclaims “O’zapft is!,” which means, “The keg has been tapped.”

After the ceremony, the festival goes into full swing. The most famous beer festival in the world, das Bierfest, also takes place during Oktoberfest and is held in a sprawling 93-acre area in Munich known as die Theresienwiese (named after Queen Therese).

The festival also features a wide variety of activities besides drinking such as amusement park rides, circus shows, food courts, carnival booths, and live bands playing a wide variety of music.

✿ OBERAMMERGAU PASSION PLAY

Observed in: Oberammergau
Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Every 10 years for five months

Oberammergau is a passion play performed for five months during the first year of each decade by the inhabitants of the village of Oberammergau in Germany. In the mid-17th century the villagers promised that, if God spared them from the bubonic plague, they would perform a play about Jesus’ life and death every 10 years. The passion play, which comprises spoken dramatic text, musical and choral accompaniment, and tableaux vivants (“living scenes”; the actors in these scenes remain motionless while a verbal description of what the scene portrays is read).

The tableaux vivants are scenes from the Old Testament including King Ahasuerus rejecting Vashti in favor of Esther, the brothers’ selling Joseph into slavery in Egypt, and Moses raising the bronze serpent in the wilderness. Each scene precedes the part of the play thought to be prefigured by the scene. The play requires seven hours for its performance, so the audience is served a meal during intermission. The play was first performed in 1634, and the most recent performance occurred in 2000.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Until the 1700s, the first name given to most boys in southern and central Germany was Johann, although they were given different second names (middle names). To avoid confusion, they were known mainly by their second names. Similarly, the first name of most girls in the regions was either Anna or Maria, and they each had a different middle name that they were usually known by.

In northern and northeastern Germany in the mid-1800s, there was a tradition of giving a child three to five names, since the number of names reflected the family’s status. People in these regions believed that the higher the status of a family (or a person), the more names should be given to the child.

In the 21st century, German children are relieved from homework or household chores on their birthdays. Also, a special birthday cake is put on the dinner table early in the morning and an elderly member of the family decorates it with the number of candles corresponding to the child's age as well as with one extra candle for good luck. Many families also put a special wooden birthday wreath on their kitchen or dining tables. This wreath has holes that hold the candles as well a special hole to hold a life candle, which is bigger than the others. The life candle is lit every year until the child turns 12.

The candles are lit and allowed to burn the entire day. After dinner, the family gathers around the birthday cake and sings a birthday song for the child. Before blowing out the candles, the child is asked to make a wish. According to tradition, if all the candles are blown out in one try, then the wish will come true. Everyone gives gifts to the child, wishing him or her a year filled with happiness.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Germany people observe the rites of the denomination of Christianity to which they belong when they marry. Most weddings take place in a church and are solemnized in the presence of a priest or minister, family members, and friends. It involves an exchange of wedding vows and wedding rings. In Germany, the couple wears their engagement rings on the left hand. Then, following the ceremony, the same rings are moved to the fourth finger of the right hand. Engagement rings are commonly plain gold bands; rarely, if ever, a diamond.

In northern Germany, friends and family members play tricks on the bride and the groom. While they are getting married in the church, for example, friends of the couple might go to the newlyweds' house, place all the furniture on the roof, and lock the doors to the house. After the couple returns home, they are faced with the challenge of finding a way inside their locked home. After they manage to do that, they have to put all the furniture back inside their house on their own. No outside help is provided, and family and friends watch merrily as the newlyweds are made to work on their wedding day.

In the regions of Rheinland-Pfalz and Idar-Oberstein, friends and family members throw old dishes on the streets, and the bride and the groom have to sweep the streets to clean it. This is an ancient custom, and people believe that if the couple can clean the street then their marriage will be excellent.

After this ritual it is customary for the groom's best man and other wedding witnesses to kidnap the bride and take her to a local restaurant or bar. The groom rescues his bride from the "kidnappers" and also pays for all their feasting and drinking.

These rituals are followed by a wedding reception, which involves a lot of singing and dancing. In accordance with tradition the bride and the groom dance the first dance, traditionally a waltz. Then, the groom and his mother and the bride and her father dance the second dance. Later the groom's father dances with the bride's mother.

At around midnight the bride takes off her veil and hands it to the woman who is next in line to get married.

❁ DEATH

In Germany burial rituals are regulated by law. Cremation along a riverside, scattering of ashes in the rivers, burial in the backyard, and open caskets are prohibited. By law Germans must bury their dead in graveyards after leasing burial plots from the government. Germans have to pay the authorities a substantial amount to obtain these leases, which generally last for a period of 20–30 years. If the lease is not renewed when it expires the family has to remove the headstone from the burial site, and the plot is dug up and leased to another family.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

A people called the Proto-Mande by archaeologists, forced to domesticate cattle in response to ecological pressures in their homeland, migrated from the Saharan highlands in the east to the Atlantic coast in the west. Archaeological research in North Africa documents the movement of semi-sedentary cattle herders from Saharan sites into West Africa. This sedentary economy resulted in a population large enough that the Mande speakers were able to spread throughout northwest and west Africa between 5,000 and 3,000 years ago. In 1471 when Portuguese sailors arrived on the coast of Ghana they were amazed by the highly structured kingdoms they encountered. This initial contact, along with the area's reputation for being wealthy, encouraged Europeans to settle in the region and to trade bronze and manufactured objects for Ghanaian gold and slaves. West Africa is famous for its gold deposits, which gave rise to the British name for this region, the Gold Coast. Gold served as a profitable commodity and helped to expand Ghana's trade with Mediterranean countries.

British explorers and traders followed the Portuguese in the 16th century and established their control along the Gold Coast. Toward the end of the 16th century states such as Dagomba, Gonja, and Mamprusi, known collectively as Mole-Dagbane, came into being in northern Ghana. The Mande-speaking people strongly influenced these states and their people. Many settlers, such as the Sisala, Talensi, and Kasena, did not form states but were organized as clans headed by rulers. Ashanti is the best known of all the states of Ghana.

In the 17th century the Gold Coast (modern Ghana) had several small-scale principalities in which peoples belonging to the Akan cultural group lived. These Akan groups paid tribute to a group called the Denkyira. Although they were connected by trade routes, a shared language, and similar belief systems, these states were separate until the early 18th century, when Osei Tutu (d. 1717) became the Ashanti ruler and began a territorial expansion that united the states as one kingdom. Using guns purchased from Europeans with gold and slaves, Osei Tutu first defeated the Denkyira and then, using the means at hand, convinced the other Akan groups to unite. In 1701 the Ashanti Confederacy was formed, and Osei Tutu was crowned asantehehene, the ruler of the Ashanti.

By 1750 Ashanti was a large empire whose borders were similar to those of contemporary Ghana. Developing an inclusive model of leadership that emphasized points of similarity and adopting traditions from throughout the territory for courtly use, Osei Tutu promoted unity among the peoples over whom he ruled and cultivated a strong national identity that has continued. It flourished as an empire and annexed the neighboring territories of Gonja, Mamprusi, and Dagomba until it came up against British colonial power in the 19th century.

In 1821 the British government took control of the region from the traders and decided to establish a colony. In 1844 the British signed an agreement with the local Fant chiefs (an ethnic group in southern Ghana), lending their efforts to colonize the region some legal status and support from the local chiefs. In 1873 the British ransacked the city of Kumasi after the Ashanti refused to accept British dominance. They captured the city and declared the Gold Coast a crown colony. Because of its wealth and strength Ashanti was one of the few African states capable of resisting the European invaders. Britain fought four wars against the Ashanti between 1826 and 1896. In 1900 the British finally won and renamed the kingdom the Gold Coast. By 1902 they had captured all the Ashanti territories and declared them a British Protectorate.

The British also fought against the Portuguese, captured the town of Cabo Couso, renamed it “Cape Coast,” and made it the capital of the Gold Coast colony.

Although British rule was centralized and authoritarian, it did offer limited powers to the Ghanaians, and the Gold Coast developed rapidly during colonial rule. The British built a new infrastructure, including Takoradi Harbor and new roads, and in 1878 they introduced the cultivation of a new commodity crop, cacao. Cacao flourished and became Ghana’s major export. In 1948 the University College of Gold Coast opened. Western education took roots under the influence of the British and helped Ghanaians find employment in the British administration.

This educated class became increasingly prominent. They were well versed in the country’s social, political, and economic structure. Soon they wanted independence. The great Ghanaian leader Dr. Kwame Nkrumah (1909–72) led the way as a founder of Pan-Africanism (the movement to recognize cultural similarity and commonality and unify all African countries) and in 1949, of the Convention People’s Party (CPP). In the wake of World War II colonies all over the world intensified their demands for independence. Kwame Nkrumah and the Convention People’s Party also increased pressure on the British government to grant independence to the region. The British agreed, subject to the support of the Gold Coast Legislative Assembly.

In 1956 elections were held, and the Convention People’s Party emerged victorious. The British fulfilled their promise and on March 6, 1957, the independent State of Ghana came into existence. The merger of the Gold Coast and the British Togoland Trust Territory led to the formation of the Republic of Ghana on July 1, 1960.

As the first sub-Saharan country to achieve independence in colonial Africa, it enjoyed greater political and economic privileges than other African countries.

Ghana was the leading exporter of cocoa and was rich in minerals, gold, and timber. The country had good foreign currency reserves, excellent transportation facilities, high per capita income, and comparatively low national debt. Its efficient educational and parliamentary system should have helped Ghana become one of the strongest African nations. Unfortunately bad economic policies and planning caused a downslide, and the first 20 years after independence were difficult for the people.

Ghana’s powerful leader Kwame Nkrumah became the prime minister and later the president of Ghana. Dr. Nkrumah borrowed heavily for financing public projects, which included building the Akosombo Dam on the Volta River. However the dam was a financial disaster since it did not provide the promised irrigation and electrification program for more than a decade after it was operational. Moreover there was widespread corruption in the country, which further added to Ghana’s woes. Between 1966 and 1981 the country witnessed several coup d’états, which subjected Ghana to a series of six inefficient governments. Each regime seemed worse than the preceding one, and instead of improving the life of the people, these dictatorial regimes made it worse.

On June 4, 1979, Flight Lieutenant Jerry John Rawlings (b. 1947) and his Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) led a successful coup against the then-president of Ghana Lieutenant General Frederick William Kwasi Akuffo (1937–79) and assumed power as the head of state. After the successful coup Rawlings relinquished power to Hilla Limann (1934–88), who had been elected to head a civilian administration. The economic situation worsened under Limann, provoking nationwide strikes against the government. On December 31, 1981, Jerry Rawlings and a group of military officers led another successful coup against the Limann government and once again assumed control of the nation. Rawlings introduced Ghana to socialist economics and implemented a number of anticorruption measures to stop economic conditions from worsening.

He also introduced various progrowth reforms and later became an advocate of a free-market economy. Jerry Rawlings's government brought Ghana greater stability and economic independence. In 2000 Rawlings stepped down as president and handed the reins of government to John Kufuor (b. 1938).

🌸 GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Ghana is located on the Gulf of Guinea in West Africa. It lies south of Burkina Faso and is flanked by Côte d'Ivoire to the west and Togo to the east. The coastal regions of Ghana have pristine beaches, while the tropical rain forests in the north, known as the Ashanti region, is home to the country's mineral deposits, timber, and cocoa. Farther north bushes and parklike savannahs (grasslands dotted with trees) and grassy plains cover the region.

The country has a mild tropical climate. The rainy season in the northern regions is between March and April. Intermittent rain falls between August and September. Ghana gets around 30 inches of rainfall every year. Temperatures soar in March, whereas August is pleasant when no significant difference is noted between the day and nighttime temperatures.

🌸 ECONOMY

Trade has been important to Ghana since the 13th century. Gold reserves and oil palms were its major sources of wealth. Europeans and North Africans exchanged their products for gold, kola nuts (obtained from native West African trees such as the Cola nitida or Cola vera, they have a high caffeine content and a bitter flavor), and slaves. Gold remained the most significant trade item. The slave trade boomed with the arrival of more Europeans, and African merchants readily exchanged slaves for guns.

The slave trade ended in the early years of the 19th century, and trade in timber, textiles, and palm oil increased. Today cocoa is a major revenue earner. Though Ghana faced an economic depression during the administrations of Dr. Kwame Nkrumah and Jerry Rawlings, a subsequent economic recovery program moved the country toward a more stable economy. Diamonds, manganese, and bauxite have also helped to boost Ghana's economy.

Arts and Crafts of the Ashanti Tribe

The Ashanti people in Western Africa established one of the wealthiest and most modern kingdoms in Africa and are highly skilled artists in many media. They have been able to maintain their culture and traditional dance, music, and art even after centuries of colonization and European influence. Their gold artwork and jewelry, for example, are world famous. The men are skilled weavers and work primarily with cotton and silk. The woven products are called kente. Women may pick cotton or spin materials into thread, but only men are allowed to weave. There are different patterns in weaving, each with its own name. Sometimes the pattern represents social status, a clan, a saying, or the sex of the person wearing it. Patterns are not always woven into the cloth; it can also be stamped with many designs. Pottery, and the many processes involved in its making, is a women's skill, passed down from mother to daughter.

The Ashanti also do wood carving and metal casting, and Asante carvers are famed for their female dolls, known as Akuaba, which measure between 8 and 16 inches in height with a stylized, elongated body and an enlarged circular head. These dolls, blessed by priests, are supposed to enable barren women to conceive and are carried around and treated like children by Ashanti women. Once used they are kept in a shrine in the home. The Fant to the south and the Bono people to the north of the Ashanti also use Akuaba dolls, but the Fant dolls' heads are rectangular, while those of the Bono have a triangular profile.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

A country of 21 million people and 100 different ethnic groups, Ghana has a mix of cultures and traditions. Many of the ethnic groups are tribes from neighboring areas. The Ashanti tribe is the largest tribe in Ghana.

Ghana is home to the largest Christian population in West Africa, although many Ghanaians maintain their traditional beliefs. The latter believe in a supreme deity, yet they reason that the everyday woes of human beings are too insignificant to concern this god. For day-to-day issues lesser deities, more directly concerned with human actions are prayed to and appeased with sacrificial offerings.

Beliefs and traditions in Ghanaian society are handed down orally from one generation to the next; there are no written scriptures.

Highlife is the most popular style of music in Ghana. The term highlife refers to the English style of dancing to music played by native bands. Highlife was initially performed during military functions but evolved, incorporating native songs and rhythms. It is now the most popular form of music in Ghana and is played in Ghanaian pubs and discotheques, as well as in other parts of Africa.

CUISINE

Corn, rice, and the root crops of cassava (manioc) and yams provide the staple diet of Ghanaians. Fufu, made of mashed cassava or yams, is served with every meal. They also consume plenty of meat and vegetables. Shito (a hot spicy sauce) is of Ghanaian origin. Jollof (a rice dish made with spices and tomatoes) is also popular.

Some kind of soup usually accompanies every meal. Groundnut soup (pepe), uniquely Ghanaian, is a widely consumed preparation made with meat and peanut butter. Waatse is rice served with beans, and kenkey, fermented cornmeal wrapped and boiled in plantain leaves, is eaten with seafood in a hot pepper sauce. Efun forowee is a spinach soup made with fish, beef, tomatoes, onions, eggs, and spices. Kelewele is a

Chicken & Peanut Butter Soup

Ingredients:

8 to 12 pieces of chicken
 9 oz. of smooth peanut butter
 1 medium onion, chopped
 2 qt. slightly warm water
 1 tsp. salt
 2 medium ripe tomatoes, peeled, or 2 Tbs. tomato paste
 1 tsp. black pepper
 Diced pimentos or 1 tsp. curry powder, optional

Preparation:

Combine chicken pieces with the chopped onion and seasonings in a large saucepan. Moisten with a little water and cook over medium heat for 15 minutes. Stir once or twice. While chicken is cooking, mix peanut butter with water in a bowl until smooth, then add to chicken. Bring mixture to a boil and allow to boil for 30 minutes. Blend tomatoes until smooth, and add tomatoes to soup. Simmer until the chicken is tender and oil begins to form in soup, about 2½ hours. Continue to stir occasionally. If desired, sprinkle with pimentos or curry powder before serving. Accompany with fufu or boiled potatoes.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Gregorian (Western) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day. In Ghana Revolution Day is celebrated on December 31, and the festivities continue with New Year's Eve. New Year's Day celebrations involve drinking, eating, singing, and dancing in the company of family and friends.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 6

On March 6, 1957, Ghana was granted total independence from Britain. It is a national holiday and thousands of people assemble in the country's capital Accra for the Independence Day celebrations. Flag-raising ceremonies, military parades, and official speeches are followed by dance and music performances.

Traditionally people from different communities circle around the baobab tree, a native tree of Africa that can grow 80 feet high and 25 feet in diameter. There is singing, dancing, drumming, and storytelling. Sometimes the celebrations last up to a week and typically include musical and theatrical performances.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, commemorates the important role played by workers in their societies. The May 1 observance was set by the Socialist Second International in 1889 to coincide with an 1890 general strike in the United States called by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to win the eight-hour workday. Labor Day is a national holiday in Ghana and all public and private institutions are closed.

❁ 1979 COUP ANNIVERSARY

Observed on: June 4

On June 4, 1979, the armed forces of Ghana, under Lieutenant Jerry John Rawlings, staged a coup to overthrow the government of President Lieutenant General Frederick William Kwasi Akuffo. Corruption was rampant and the administrative structure was crippling the nation's progress. Ironically General Akuffo had himself assumed office after leading a coup against the then-president Lieutenant Colonel Ignatius Kutu Acheampong. Rawlings assumed power as the head of state but soon relinquished leadership to Hilla Limann, who had been elected to head a civilian government.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 1

Ghana Republic Day commemorates the establishment of the Republic of Ghana on July 1, 1960. This holiday is marked by official speeches, military parades, and cultural activities. As a national holiday all public and private institutions are closed.

❁ FARMERS' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 2

Farmers' Day is celebrated to recognize and honor the farmers who face hardships like drought and pestilence and produce the crops to feed the country. On this day farmers pray for abundant rain and good harvests. One major challenge that Ghana faces is the movement of farmers to urban areas, as they abandon farming looking for better jobs or employment. This day features meetings with agricultural department officials, who educate farmers about modern agricultural techniques.

❁ REVOLUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31

Revolution Day commemorates the second revolution led by Jerry Rawlings against the administration of President Hilla Limann. After the successful coup of 1979, Rawlings relinquished power to Hilla Limann, who had been elected to head a civilian administration. The economic situation worsened under Limann, provoking nationwide strikes against the government. On December 31, 1981, Jerry Rawlings and a group of military officers led a successful coup against the Limann government and once again assumed control of the nation. A holiday from work and various official functions commemorate this second coup by Jerry Rawlings.

✿ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

The two main celebrations of Muslims are eid days. Eid means “celebration.” Eid al-Adha commemorates the willingness of Ibrahim (Abraham) to sacrifice his son in order to obey God. The observance is also called Festival of Sacrifice and Tabaski. On this day Ghanaian Muslims sacrifice a goat or a sheep and give part of the meat to the poor. During this period Muslims are urged to make a pilgrimage called hajj to Mecca. For every Muslim a visit to Mecca is required once in his or her lifetime. At the end of the pilgrimage it is mandatory for Muslims to shave their heads or cut off a lock of hair. Prayers, social gatherings, and gifts for children mark this day, which is a public holiday.

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates Jesus’ Crucifixion. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent, the austere season of fasting and penitence. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. It has been in the Christian liturgical calendar even longer than Easter has, although no one is sure why it is called “Good” Friday. Some have suggested that the use of good in the name goes back to Old English and means “God’s” Friday, while others interpret good to mean something like “observed as holy.” This observance is also known as Black Friday and Sorrowful Friday, and in Eastern Orthodox Churches it is called Great Friday. On Good Friday in Ghana, devout Christians wear mourning clothes (black) and attend church. Many Ghanaian Christians also abstain from eating meat on this day. Special Gospel theatrical performances depict Jesus’ life and teachings.

✿ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

The breaking of the fast, or Eid al-Fitr, marks the end of Ramadan, during which Muslims fast from dawn until sunset each day. Every year the date of the celebration shifts 11 days behind the Gregorian or Western calendar, as the Islamic calendar is based on the cycles of the Moon. In Ghana this festival is celebrated as a reminder of the good things one has received in life, and prayers of thanks are offered to God. Though it is not compulsory Muslims are requested to give either money or food, which is distributed to the poor to allow them to celebrate this eid.

Celebrants wear new clothes and offer special prayers on this occasion. Prayer services are usually held in big mosques or stadiums. After prayers children receive gifts and money from family members, and most homes have lavish feasts. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas commemorates the birth of Jesus (the founder of Christianity) whom Christians believe to be the Son of God. Europeans introduced Christmas to western Africa, and the customs and traditions of the Ghanaian celebrations are a mixture of African and European. During Christmas children go from one house to another, dancing and singing songs based on African folklore. When children receive gifts or money from their neighbors, they sing in thanks. In Ghana people hang stockings for Santa Claus, organize plays based on the life of Jesus, and dance and perform the plays, typically wearing colorful, traditional masks.

❁ THE DEER-HUNTING FESTIVAL OF GHANA

Observed in: Southern Ghana
Observed by: Simpa tribe
Observed on: May

The Aboakyer Deer-Hunting Festival falls on the first Saturday in May and is celebrated by the Simpa people, who live on the southern coast of Ghana. The festival originated in the ancient sacrificial offering made to Otu, the Harvest God. People would pray to Otu and try to appease him so that he would bless them with a good harvest. In ancient times, if there had been a series of crop failures in the region, a priest asked families to sacrifice the youngest member of their family to please Otu. Taken aback by this practice, people prayed to Otu and requested that he accept the sacrificial offering in the form of a wild cat. However in their attempts to capture a wild cat, many people lost their lives. They once again prayed to their god, and according to traditional accounts, he asked them to sacrifice antelopes. On this day therefore competitions are held that involve catching an antelope without the use of weapons and delivering it to the village chief. The team that presents the first antelope is declared victorious. The antelope is sacrificed. Though a ban prohibits killing these animals, the rules have been relaxed for this festival.

❁ ELIMINA BAKATUE FESTIVAL

Observed in: Elimina
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First week of July

This festival marks the beginning of the fishing season. The word bakatue literally means "opening up of Bengya lagoon in to the sea." For the people of Elimina fishing is the major source of their livelihood. This festival has been observed for centuries, long before the arrival of Europeans. During this week the Bengya lagoon is a riot of color with numerous canoes. There are processions, and people celebrate by drinking and partying. A net-casting ceremony is conducted to welcome the fishing season. The people of this region offer prayers and give the first catch to their local deities, asking them to protect their livelihood and bless them with a good year of fishing.

❁ THE RICE FESTIVAL

Observed in: Vane
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Late November–early December

The Rice harvest festival, also known as the Amu festival, is celebrated by the people of Vane in the district of Ho, attracting people from all parts of Ghana. Usually celebrated at Vane's traditional capital, Avatime, the festivities start at the end of November and last until the first week of December. The people of Avatime migrated from the Ashanti region in Ghana and took up agriculture, which they continue to rely on. The week includes dance performances, a lot of singing and drumming, and eating and drinking.

❁ CHILD-NAMING CEREMONY

In Ghanaian communities child-naming ceremonies are major occasions for celebration. On this day the child is given a name and is taken outside the home for the first time. All ethnic groups practice a similar ceremony, though they have different names for it. The Akan call it abandinto; Ewes call it vibebedego, and among the Dagaries it is called summa. Akans celebrate naming on the eighth day after birth, whereas in the northern regions the naming ceremony takes place on the third day for boys and the fourth day for girls.

The Ga tribe's naming ceremony is called kpodziemo. In their tradition, the paternal and maternal sides of the child's family assemble in the courtyard of the child's father. The purpose is to introduce the child to both sides of the family at the same time. The child is named after his father's lineage, and a blessing ceremony follows. Presiding over the blessing ceremony is an elderly member of the family with an exemplary character. Many believe that children take on the characteristics of the person who performs the blessing ceremony. It involves pouring two libations, consisting of corn oil and gin, which are provided by the father. After the libations water is sprinkled on the face of the child and the ceremony is considered complete. A lavish feast follows.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The Krobo people of Ghana celebrate the Dipo-Krobo Festival every year. It marks the coming of age ceremony for girls of the Dipo tribe, and the girls are dressed in new attire for the ceremony. They wear strands of colored beads, some of which are usually given to them by their mothers. The girl stays in seclusion throughout the Dipo-Krobo ceremony. Coming of age is considered an important step toward marriage, and girls are taught the moral and ethical values of the tribe during their isolation. In earlier times a girl was thought to be ready for marriage soon after the ceremony and might even have been married the same day. The customs are now a little different, although the practice of female cutting (genital mutilation) continues. The practice persists in spite of legislation passed in 1994 that explicitly prohibits it.

❁ MARRIAGE

Various ethnic groups follow different customs in marriage, which consists of a religious ceremony followed by civil registration. Certain matters must be attended to before choosing the spouse. Every family member goes through a check for incurable diseases, criminal background, employment status, and religious background. An individual who is hard-working and respectable is preferred. Inter-marriage is not generally practiced between Christians and Muslims. However converting from Islam to Christianity and vice-versa is encouraged before marriage.

Among the Ashanti marriage is very important to community life. Men can have more than one wife, and many take several wives to advertise their willingness to be generous and their ability to support a large family. Women in the Ashanti culture do not marry unless their parents consent to it, and many women do not meet their husbands until they are married. Even so divorce is very rare in the Ashanti culture, and it is the parents' duty to keep a marriage going.

Fun Fact

In the suburbs of Accra (Teshie/Nungua) coffin-makers are in great demand because they are famous for their coffins shaped like cars, airplanes, and various animals. For a fisherman's body, for example, relatives may ask for a fish coffin. However this can be expensive, affordable only for the wealthiest Ghanaians.

❁ DEATH

The Ga tribe believes that people should be buried in a coffin that identifies the occupation or lifestyle of the person. Also they believe in an afterlife and that failure to bury the deceased with the proper rituals means that his or her spirit will haunt the living members of the family and bring death and disease. Therefore proper funerals are conducted with the rites properly executed under the supervision of an experienced and elderly person who is well versed in all the burial rituals.

Muslim burial rituals involve cleansing the body and draping it in a white shroud. Then the body is carried in a procession to the local graveyard and buried with the proper Islamic rites.

After the burial the neighbors and other villagers extend their support to the family members of the deceased. A 40-day mourning period, during which she is not allowed to come out of her hut, is mandatory for a widow.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

During the Bronze Age (4000–3000 B.C.E.), there were three powerful and developed civilizations in Greece: the Cycladic, Minoan, and Mycenaean civilizations. The people during this time were constantly at war with each other over trade rivalries. Around 2200 B.C.E. the Achaeans, and Indo-European group, invaded Greece, bringing with them the Greek language, and founded Mycenae. In 1450 the Mycenaeans destroyed the Minoan civilization, only to be overrun in 1100 by the Iron Age Dorians from the north, also speakers of Greek. Greece entered a period of stagnancy made worse by a civil war, and the period from 1100 to 800 is called the Greek Dark Ages.

Then between 900 and 700, which archaeologists call the Geometric period, startling innovations and changes in Greek society occurred. The population began to increase at an alarming rate and proto-urban life reemerged, causing overcrowding and political tensions. Some of these tensions had begun lessening around 1000 when some Greeks moved into other territories to the east and west and started commercial trading posts and colonies. Around the same time written language, which had disappeared when the Mycenaean civilization collapsed, was revived by the adoption of the Semitic alphabet, acquired from the Phoenicians. And the Greek city-states of Athens, Thebes, Megara, Corinth, and Sparta took shape. It is thought that Homer's epic poems the Iliad and the Odyssey, which had been orally preserved, were recorded during this period. It was also during this period that the Greeks began to codify their religious practices and to build temples where their gods were worshipped, and in 776 the first Olympic games were held.

The Early Archaic period, roughly 700 to 600, laid the foundations for the flowering of Greek civilization. The Greek city-states, the polis, became increasingly powerful although tyrants ruled many of them. In 640 Sparta adopted a militaristic style of government. Athens became an oligarchy in 632, but by 621 Dracon had formulated the first Athenian

The Olympics

According to Greek mythology Hercules challenged his brothers to a race in front of the gods. The race was held in the fields of Olympia. In this tradition the Greeks hosted a festival of sports every four years for about 1,200 years, until the Roman emperor banned the event claiming it to be vulgar and corrupt.

The warring Greek city-states declared a temporary truce during the period the Olympics were held. It is recorded that athletes competed in various events completely nude. Women were not allowed to participate in or watch these athletic contests.

Olympic games were not held in the Roman Empire or during the Ottoman rule. Centuries of earthquakes and floods buried all evidence of the games until 1870 when German archaeologists found remains of the Temple of Zeus and statues of Olympic athletes in Greece. This finding inspired the idea of resuming this event on an international scale, and the first modern Olympics was held in Athens in 1896. Fourteen nations participated, and the Greeks won the most medals. Athens also hosted the 2004 Olympics.

code of law. Abroad the Greek colonies flourished, and new ones were settled, especially around the Black Sea and Mediterranean, bringing the Greeks into prolonged hostilities with the Persians. Trade with highly developed cultures in Egypt and Anatolia was improved and brought in eastern imports, which the Greeks imitated. They also adopted minted coinage for commercial exchange at this time, and the architectural styles known as Doric and Ionic appeared in the construction of temples. The Persians, under Cyrus (c. 585–c. 29), attempted to extend their control over the Greeks in Asia Minor and successfully defeated individual Greek city-states there. In the end the Greeks triumphed over the Persians, and this victory was celebrated in Greek art and literature as a symbol of the triumph of civilized peoples over the forces of barbarism.

The most powerful among the Greek city-states were Athens and Sparta. After a series of wars known as the Peloponnesian Wars (431–04), the Spartans, who were known for their military prowess, defeated Athens. Soon afterward, however, Sparta was annexed by the kingdom of Macedonia. Macedonian rule continued through three dynasties and ended with the untimely death of Alexander the Great (356–23). Under Alexander the Macedonian Empire had expanded into parts of Asia Minor, Persia, Egypt, Afghanistan, and India. This era (776–323) is known as the Hellenic Period and saw the great flowering of classical Greek civilization whose incredible accomplishments in philosophy, art, music, mathematics, science, medicine, and architecture form the very foundation of Western civilization. Although the renowned philosopher Sophocles was tried, found guilty of heresy, and chose to commit suicide (399), his pupil Plato founded the first university (388), and in 375 wrote The Republic. By 367, Aristotle, one of the greatest thinkers of all time, was a student in Plato's academy.

Between 200 and 196, parts of Greece came under Roman rule and were declared Roman provinces. However in spite of limited political and economic freedom, the Greek areas largely retained their identity. The Roman Empire moved its capital to Constantinople (which was then located within Greek borders) and evolved into the Byzantine Empire, which included Greece. The power of this empire was considerably weakened during the Crusades (a series of military campaigns fought to extend the control of the young Christian Church), and when Turkey captured Constantinople, Greece came completely under Turkish control. This ushered in the era of the Ottoman Turks in Greek history. Under the Turks Greece was reduced to the status of yet another territory that the empire exploited. There were many notable Greek statesmen and merchants during that time, but the majority of Greece was impoverished. Greece remained an integral part of the Ottoman Empire until the 19th century C.E.

The eventual independence of Greece was the result of a cultural revival during the 18th century. In 1821 the Greeks rebelled against Turkish domination, and both Russia and England were major players in the Greeks' efforts to obtain independence. Noted writers such as Lord Byron, Shelley, and Goethe supported the Greeks in their battle against Turkey. The War of Greek Independence ended in 1832, and the European powers of that time helped a monarchy assume control in Greece. The Greek king became a ceremonial head of state, however, and democracy prevailed when the new constitution was enacted in 1864.

Since Greek independence, the relationship with Turkey has remained volatile. In 1912, again with support from European countries, Greece fought the First Balkan War against Turkey. As a result some areas of Macedonia became part of Greece, and Albania became a newly liberated nation. The Greeks supported the Allied forces during World War I. Greek troops, encouraged by the Allies, attacked Turkey and occupied Thrace. In 1922 Greece proceeded to occupy the region of Asia Minor but was defeated by Turkey this time. Under the supervision of the League of Nations, millions of Greeks from Asia Minor were resettled in Greece.

Fun Fact

No place in Greece is more than 62 miles away from a beach.

Greece was neutral when World War II began. Italy nonetheless tried to invade Greece in 1940, but the country successfully resisted. Germany, too, had plans for Greece. In 1941 when German troops entered the Greek mainland, the Greek government sought political asylum in Egypt and operated from there. Political unrest continued to haunt the nation, when in 1943 a civil war broke out between Communists and Royalists. In 1949 the civil war finally ended with the Communists' defeat. The new Greek government was highly unstable, however, and there was continued friction with Turkey. Further conflict resulted in the independence of Cyprus in 1960.

In 1967 a military coup overthrew the constitutional government in Greece. A new constitution drastically restricted the monarchy's powers, and Greece's military government attempted, without success, to regain power over Cyprus. In 1973 after yet another military coup, a new government came into power, but in July 1974 the country was returned to civilian government.

In the 21st century, Greece's relationship with Turkey has improved following devastating earthquakes that struck both nations at separate times in 1999. Both Greece and Turkey sent each other generous aid during this time of crisis. Greece is a member of the United Nations (UN) and the European Union (EU). The Euro was adopted as the official currency in 2002.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Greece is a peninsula surrounded by about 1,400 islands. Located in the Balkan region in southeastern Europe, the country shares borders with Albania, Macedonia, Turkey, and Bulgaria. Greece has coastlines on the Mediterranean Sea, the Ionian Sea, and the Aegean Sea. The numerous Greek islands are divided into six groups: the Cyclades, Ionians, Sporades, Saronic Gulf islands, Dodecanese, and the Northeastern Aegean Islands. The largest Greek islands, however, are not part of any of the six groups. These are Crete and Evia.

The most prominent relief feature of Greece, apart from the extensive island chains that surround it, is the country's mountainous terrain. Mt. Olympus (1,813 feet) is the highest mountain in Greece. The Aliakmon is its longest river.

Greek summers are extremely hot and dry, and the temperature can soar as high as 104°F. Strong winds from the north blow across the country during July and August and provide some relief during the hot summers. The winters are normally cold, and the northern parts of the country experience snowfall. Winters are mild in the southern parts and on the islands.

❁ ECONOMY

Greece has a primarily agricultural economy, and agriculture is the main contributor to the nation's gross domestic product (GDP). Crops, such as corn, barley, wheat, olives, citrus fruits, wine grapes, potatoes, and cotton are grown. Fishing and tourism are also thriving industries in Greece. Apart from hosting world-famous events like the Olympics, Greek festivals and holidays contribute significantly to the tourism industry. Greece manufactures tobacco, textiles, chemicals, processed food items, metal and construction materials, and petroleum-based products. The country is also rich in raw mineral resources, including iron ore, bauxite, zinc, and lignite. As a member of the EU, Greece receives considerable economic aid from that organization.

Greece continues to be a destination country for women, men, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor, with most victims brought in from eastern Europe and the Balkans (although some are moved on to other EU countries). The number of identified Roma (gypsy) and Albanian child victims has decreased, but various sources report a possible new trend of African women trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Greek culture can be traced back thousands of years, long before the Roman civilization came into being. However over the course of time, the Romans had a major impact on Greece. Influences from the Ottoman and Byzantine eras as well continue to affect everyday Greek life. Greece itself is world famous for the artistic and architectural influences it had on the rest of the world, and the remains of ancient and medieval Greek architecture draw tourists to the country.

Much of the evidence of Greek art and architecture was destroyed during the many wars fought there over the centuries. However some Greek art has been preserved in the form of coins and pottery, in sculpture, and in buildings, such as the Parthenon. Greek developments in the fields of philosophy, mathematics, science, and medicine are the basis for many modern achievements. In 310 B.C.E. the Greek mathematician Euclid wrote the Elements of Geometry: Astronomy, literature, and music are other fields of Greek achievement. The Greek scientist Aristarchus was the first to propose that the Earth circles the Sun in 300 B.C.E. Greek works have had a profound influence on Western and Eastern civilizations alike. The poems of Sappho and Homer are still read all over the world. And Greece does not rest on the laurels of its past glory. The works of recent Greek Nobel laureates, such as Giorgos Seferis (1900–71) and Odysseas Elytis (1911–96), are translated and widely read.

the Greek Orthodox Church. But the ancient Greeks had a unique polytheistic religion, which is known to us today through Greek mythology. The Greeks worshipped a large pantheon of deities. Gods from the Roman culture were also absorbed into Greek culture. Though the ancient Greek paganism is no longer practiced, a small number of Greeks have attempted to revive the religion of ancient Greece.

❁ CUISINE

Greek cuisine is typically Mediterranean with an identifiable Turkish influence. The food mainly consists of salads, citrus fruits, meat, and seafood. The use of olive oil, as in most Mediterranean countries, is generous. Appetizers made of yogurt, pickled octopus, and squid are very popular. Favorite dishes include moussaka (eggplant baked with lamb and sauce), grilled seafood, and stuffed tomatoes. The Greeks also enjoy sweet desserts, such as baklava and loukoumade, both pastries filled with nuts and covered with honey.

Greece makes many good wines, including the unique retsina, made from sap extracted from pine needles. The local brandy is known to be very fiery, while Greek beer is light. Known as Greece's national drink, the fiery alcoholic drink ouzo is made from a combination of pressed grapes and herbs.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar January 1 is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. For the Greeks January 1 is also known as St. Basil's Day. This saint is an important figure in the Greek Orthodox Church. He was known for being generous and helpful to the needy. It is on St. Basil's Day that gifts are traditionally given rather than Christmas.

On this day, Greeks bake a special cake (called a vasilopitta) with a gold or silver coin inside. The oldest member of the family cuts the cake and distributes it to the other members. It is believed that the person who finds the coin will be the luckiest in the year ahead. On this day people also visit friends to exchange gifts and enjoy elaborate feasts. Because January 1 is a national holiday, schools and offices are closed in Greece.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 25

On March 25, 1821, Germanos, the bishop of Patra, began an uprising against the Ottoman Empire. This sparked the War for Independence that

Fun Fact

Greeks revere bread and consider it a gift from God. This belief is based on the story of how Jesus fed 5,000 people with just five loaves of bread and two fish. As a mark of respect the Greeks do not waste bread, and housewives make the sign of the cross before slicing it.

ended after nine years, when a small part of modern Greece was liberated. The Greeks celebrate this day with parades in every town and city in the country. The armed forces also conduct parades in Athens. Independence Day coincides with the Christian Feast of the Annunciation. All schools, government offices, and commercial establishments remain closed.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. The holiday is also called Workers' Day and May Day.

In addition to celebrating the contributions of workers, in Greece May 1 is a day for celebration of fertility and spring, an observance that goes back to the pre-Christian pagan spring festivals. Greek families take time out for picnics, and children collect wildflowers, the first blooms of spring. These flowers are then used to make wreaths to decorate homes. The wreaths remain on front doors until August 29, the Feast of St. John, when they are burned in bonfires.

Greek schools and workplaces remain closed on this day.

OXI DAY

Observed on: October 28

Oxi Day (meaning “no” day, and pronounced “ochee”) commemorates Greek resistance to Italian efforts at domination, backed by Hitler, during World War II. It is the anniversary of General Ioannis Metaxas’s (1871–1941) refusal to give Mussolini permission to invade Greece. It is said that the war would have been prolonged had it not been for this resistance. The Greeks celebrate this day with great pride, hanging the national flag out their windows. Military parades, naval parades, special church services, and other celebrations are held. Government offices, schools, and most businesses remain closed on this holiday.

Religious Holidays

EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

The Christian Feast of Epiphany, known as Theofania in Greece, celebrates the Three Wise Men from the East who came to Jerusalem looking for the newborn Jesus. Greeks attend church services and prepare an elaborate feast for the occasion. Priests visit the households in their parish holding a cross and the branch of a basil plant, which they use to bless the home. On the same day, priests lead processions of followers to the seaside. A ceremonial baptism is performed there, and the priests throw crosses into the water. Youngsters, ignoring the cold, dive into the sea to retrieve them. Greeks believe that those who return the crosses will be lucky for the rest of the year.

SHROVE MONDAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Last Monday before Lent

Shrove Monday, or Green Monday, is the Monday before Ash Wednesday, the first day of the Lenten season. It precedes the 40-day period of fasting and abstinence from milk, meat, and dairy products. The Greek Orthodox community adheres strictly to this fast.

Before the fast begins, however, they prepare for the Lenten season with a feast. Special dishes served for the occasion are typically made with octopus, squid, olives, lettuce, and radishes. Greek families often enjoy their pre-Lenten feast by having picnics in the countryside. In some areas, they also hold kite-flying contests.

THE ANNUNCIATION

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: March 25

This Christian feast day commemorates the appearance of the Archangel Gabriel to Mary, the mother of Jesus, announcing the news that she would bear a child whom she should name Jesus. Gabriel informed Mary that the child was divine and would be a king.

This is an important holiday for members of the Greek Orthodox Church. Special prayer services are held in all churches. Believers celebrate this day with dances and feasts. The Feast of the Annunciation also coincides with the Greek Independence Day holiday.

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Palm Sunday begins Holy Week and falls on the Sunday before Easter. It commemorates Jesus' return to Jerusalem a few days prior to his execution. In those days it was customary to cover the paths of people who were considered highly honorable as a mark of respect. It is believed that on his arrival in Jerusalem, Jesus was greeted with palm fronds laid in his path as he entered Jerusalem. Thus the day came to be known as Palm Sunday.

In Greece Palm Sunday is celebrated with a solemn procession in which church priests lead devout Orthodox Christians with palms in their hands. The procession is followed by a special Palm Sunday service.

✿ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Maundy Thursday, also known as Holy Thursday, commemorates the day when Jesus washed the feet of all his disciples before sharing a meal now called the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. It is called Maundy Thursday because maundatum (a Latin word that means "commandment") is the first word that Jesus spoke before he began washing the feet of his disciples. It was reported that Jesus said, "Mandatum novum do vobis," which translates as "A new commandment I give to you."

In Greece all Orthodox churches conduct special solemn prayer services. The priest, while celebrating the Divine Liturgy, recalls scenes from the Last Supper and washes the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did. The mood is somber, and the faithful pray on this day.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

The Christian holiday of Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. Observed as a solemn, sad occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence). In Greece Orthodox Christians observe a fast on Good Friday and perform a ritual called "Stations of the Cross," visiting scenes that represent Jesus' final journey as he carried the Cross to Golgotha.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast celebrating Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent. The name of Easter is actually the name of the fertility goddess Eostre worshipped by the Germanic tribes, and the symbols and activities associated with the Christian holiday were originally pagan in spirit.

On Easter in Greece, families attend special church services to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection. Children receive decorated chocolate Easter eggs from their parents and grandparents. Feasts and the exchange of greetings and Easter eggs continue on the next day, which is referred to as Easter Monday and is the first Monday after Lent.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty Days after Easter

Both the Sunday and Monday of this Christian holiday celebrate the Holy Spirit's descending upon Jesus' disciples. Alternate names Whitsunday and Whitmonday refer to the white garments worn by those who were baptized during the disciples' vigil. Whitsunday and Monday have been celebrated since the third century. Many of the traditions and celebrations now associated with Pentecost were taken from pagan celebrations of the arrival of spring.

On this day, also called Day of the Holy Spirit in Greece, Orthodox Greeks attend special prayer services in churches.

✿ TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: August 6

The Christian Feast of the Transfiguration of Christ celebrates the moment when Jesus revealed his divinity to the world. It originated with a biblical account in which Jesus revealed his true identity as the son of God and was transfigured in front of his disciples. In Greece, this day is celebrated mainly on the islands of Ikaria and Leros, where the people enjoy messy food fights using eggs, flour, and squid ink.

ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: August 15

The Christian Feast of the Assumption commemorates the elevation of Mary, Jesus' mother, into heaven. The Assumption is an important feast for the Greek Orthodox because it reaffirms their belief in Jesus as the Christ, who said that all devout Christians would find a place in the glory of heaven. On this day the faithful attend special church services.

FINDING OF THE TRUE CROSS

Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: September 14

According to legend St. Helena traveled to Palestine in search of the Cross on which Jesus was crucified. It is said that she found three crosses. To identify the original she touched an ailing woman with each of them. The true Cross is said to have healed the woman on this day in 326.

The Finding of the True Cross, also called Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, is one of the last summer festivals in Greece. It is celebrated most enthusiastically in the town of Halki, where believers attend church services and sing hymns.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian holiday of Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus. In Greece Christmas celebrations begin on December 24 (Christmas Eve) and last until December 26. On December 24 children go from house to house singing Christmas carols and receive sweets and coins as gifts. Families attend church and offer prayers in a special midnight service. At home families sit down to a special feast, a highlight of which is a traditional Greek sweet bread, known as christopsomo (Christ bread), which is baked specially for the occasion.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services. Churches are decorated for the holiday with a manger scene containing figures of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts on this day. Afterward they gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate with a special meal that traditionally features spit-roasted lamb or pork. Traditionally children receive gifts on St. Basil's Day (January 1) rather than on Christmas.

Although they are becoming more common Christmas trees are not a part of the traditional Greek Christmas. Instead the most recognizable symbol of the season in Greek homes is a wooden bowl with a piece of wire suspended across the rim from which hangs a sprig of basil wrapped around a wooden cross. A small amount of water is kept in the bowl to keep the basil from wilting. Each day for the 12 days of Christmas, the cross and basil are dipped into some holy water, which is then sprinkled in each room of the house to keep the Killantzaroi (evil spirits) away from the house.

CARNIVAL

Observed in: Patra, Athens, and other areas
Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Three week before Ash Wednesday

Carnival starts three weeks before the onset of the Lenten season, which is a period of fasting and abstinence. Many parts of Greece celebrate this event and enjoy a last chance for frivolity and merriment before Lent. The revelers parade through the streets wearing colorful costumes.

The drinking and dancing that are an integral part of these festivities have roots that can be traced back to pre-Christian times in Greece. This festival is said to have been associated with Dionysus, also Bacchus, the Greek god of wine.

FEAST OF AGIOS GEORGIOS

Observed in: Arahova and Crete
Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: April 23

This day is the Feast of St. George, the patron saint of shepherds. St. George, a knight, is often depicted in paintings killing a fearsome dragon. Three-day feasts are held in Arahova to honor this saint. The Greeks also have sheep-shearing contests on this day.

Greek weddings are usually week-long affairs, in which the prenuptial ceremonies take place throughout the week. On the wedding day a procession of the priest, the groom, and his family approach the bride's house bearing a flag. The bride's mother offers the groom wine, which he accepts. Then the bride's male relatives escort the bride to the church.

In Greek weddings the best man, called the koumbaros, plays an important role. He places gold crowns or wreaths of orange blossoms on the heads of the couple. The crowns symbolize the beginning of a new family together and are exchanged by the bride and groom three times. The best man then invites the couple to the altar. The wedding service is performed in Old Greek, the language of the Greek Orthodox Church. The priest blesses the couple and asks the couple to exchange wedding bands. These rings are exchanged three times between the bride and the groom.

An all-night party follows the wedding ceremony. Guests form two circles around the bride and perform the famous Greek circle dance. During this dance dishes are smashed, and money is thrown at the musicians for good luck. The guests are given candy-coated almonds called bom bom yara as party favors.

Fun Fact

The bride normally wears a yellow or red veil for her wedding. This color signifies fire and is supposed to protect the bride from evil spirits.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Inuit were the first people to come to Greenland from what is now northern Canada. By 900 C.E. the Thule (wandering whale hunters from Alaska) had arrived in Greenland. During the 10th century, Icelandic Vikings, the first Europeans to arrive in Greenland, settled on the southwest coast. Eric the Red, a Viking who was exiled from Iceland after committing a murder, established a colony in Greenland in 985.

This colony soon grew to include 3,000 to 5,000 people. It relied on trade with Europe, exchanging ivory from walrus tusks as well as rope, sheep, and seal and cattle hides for iron and timber. In 1126 a diocese was founded at Garl; it was subject to the Norwegian archdiocese in Trondheim. The population accepted the authority of the Norwegian king as well although it continued to have its own laws. In 1380 Greenland entered into a union with Denmark.

In 1536 Denmark and Norway were officially merged, and Greenland came to be seen as a Danish dependency rather than a Norwegian one. This was acknowledged by the inclusion of a polar bear in the Danish Coat of Arms in the 1660s. Although the whaling trade of the 17th century brought English, Dutch, and German ships to Greenland, where whales were sometimes processed ashore, no permanent settlement was made. Gradually Greenland was opened to Danish trading companies and closed to those from other countries. This new colony was centered at Godthab ("Good Hope") on the southwest coast.

When Norway separated from Denmark in 1814 Greenland remained under Danish rule. The 19th century saw increased interest in the region on the part of polar explorers and scientists. At the turn of the 19th century northern Greenland was sparsely populated. During that period Inuit families emigrated from Canada to settle there. The last group from Canada arrived in 1864. In 1953 Greenland officially became a part of Denmark. An autonomous government was formed in 1979 with Denmark, currently ruled by Queen Margrethe II (b. 1940), retaining control of defense and foreign affairs.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The country dominates the North Atlantic Ocean between North America and Europe. Greenland has the world's second largest ice cap and its gradual slope covers all but a narrow, mountainous, barren, rocky coast. Most of Greenland's terrain is flat. The sparse population is confined to small settlements along the coast, and nearly one-quarter of the population lives in the capital, Nuuk. The climate varies from arctic to subarctic with cool summers and extremely cold winters.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy remains critically dependent on exports of fish and substantial support from the Danish government. The public sector, including publicly owned enterprises and government offices, plays a dominant role in the economy. Several hydrocarbon and mineral exploration activities have produced coal, cryolite lead, molybdenum, uranium, and zinc, some of which is exported. Tourism has potential, but it is limited due to a short season and high costs.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Although modern life has caught up with the Inuit in the form of warm climate foods, computers, luxury cars, and outboard motors, as little as 40 years ago Greenlanders were still practicing a traditional way of life that revolved around the hunt. Harmony with the land and respect for the dead were the hallmarks of a good hunter.

Tupilak, originally carved out of bone, skin, and chunks of peat, are small grotesque figurines characteristic of Greenland. They were originally intended as talismans to ward off misfortune and death. These days tupilak are sold as souvenirs and are carved from caribou antler, soapstone, driftwood, narwhal tusk, and walrus ivory and bone.

The language of the Inuit belongs to the Eskimo-Aleut family of languages that construct sentences consisting of long strings of polysyllabic words. Inuit has 17 phonemes (units of the phonetic system of a language) and 3 vowels. Conversation is complicated by the habit of spontaneously abbreviating the very large words to a more manageable length.

Christianity is the religion followed by present-day Greenlanders. On Christmas and New Year's, carolers go from house to house singing carols and hymns, and are usually invited in for refreshments after their performances. In North Greenland the end of the polar night and the commencement of the sunny phase is a big occasion for celebration.

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Greenlandic food featured meat from freshly killed animals: walrus, seal, and whale.

The Thule

Originally from Alaska the Thule people developed hunting technology well suited to hunting large marine mammals. Using open boats in the Alaskan coastal waters, they perfected the use of a float harpoon and could kill enough whales in the summer to provide food throughout the winter. These people followed the whales eastward as they migrated through the open waters of the Canadian Arctic. Over the course of only a few generations, the Thule had migrated to the coast of Greenland.

According to convention the meat is distributed according to social status, with the tastiest parts (the eyes, kidney, and heart) reserved for the lead hunter. Every part of the animal is consumed. One traditional delicacy, described by Jean Malaurie (b. 1922) in The Last Kings of Thule (1982), consisted of narwhal fat and water, mixed with walrus brain and digested grass from the first stomach of a reindeer. Despite the trend toward global cuisine, it would be a challenge for visitors to adjust to traditional Greenland fare. These days supermarkets have replaced the game hunt and even tropical fruits are available, but prepackaged whale steaks and seal meats are still stocked generously.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Eve celebrations in Greenland are a welcome break in the long dark winter. There are non-stop dancing, musical concerts, and dazzling fireworks throughout the night. People tend to welcome the new year in the company of family and friends. Traditionally rural people enjoy playing pranks on this night. Another ancient belief is that piles of broken dishes at the doors of houses bring good luck, so people save their old dishes all during the year to throw them at the front doors of close friends.

On New Year's Day speeches by the queen and diplomats of Denmark are broadcast on television and radio. Celebrations include parties and the ringing of cathedral bells and fireworks.

Fun Fact

The term Inuit, which means "the people," is the preferred name for the indigenous peoples of Canada and the Arctic region. They are also referred to as Eskimos, which is the preferred term in Alaska.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day is celebrated all over the world to recognize the contributions of workers and laborers to the socioeconomic development of nations. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Greenland government offices, business establishments, and schools remain closed. People from all over the country assemble in cities to recognize this day with union meetings, seminars, and rallies.

National Day is also known as the official Flag Day of Greenland, and Ullortuneq, the Longest Day. The flag features white and red horizontal bands with a disk, the red semicircle of which symbolizes the midnight sun and the white semicircle symbolizes ice. Flags are flown from every public building across the country. The longest day of the year is celebrated with seminars, cultural activities, musical shows, and community dinners.

Religious Holidays

EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

This Christian festival, also called Three Kings' Day, commemorates the arrival of the Three Wise Men (or the Magi) in Bethlehem to behold the infant Jesus. Children and men dressed as the kings throng the streets, honoring the biblical story, and churches lead colorful religious processions. It is customary for Greenlandic children to leave hay by their bedsides the night before Epiphany as a treat for the camels of the Three Kings, and in return they expect to find presents the following morning.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

This day, also called Holy Thursday, commemorates the Last Supper of Jesus, a few hours before his trial and Crucifixion. As a gesture of humility and love Jesus washed the feet of his 12 apostles, thus setting an example of his preaching: universal love and brotherhood. In Greenland on this day churches change the color of the draperies on the walls and windows from dark shades to brighter ones. Special prayers and Gospel services are held in churches across the country.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

This Christian holiday, also called Holy Friday, Black Friday, and Sorrowful Friday, commemorates the agony and death of Jesus on the Cross. It is a solemn occasion rather than a joyous one. But it is also a symbol of hope and eternal life, because the Crucifixion precedes the Resurrection, which is celebrated a few days later on Easter. Churches in Greenland hold special prayer services on Good Friday with readings from the Gospel concerning the life and Jesus' Crucifixion.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). It celebrates the emergence of Jesus from his tomb after his Crucifixion. This event symbolizes hope and eternal life. Easter church services in Greenland begin before daybreak. The celebrations continue on Easter Monday and include egg-rolling competitions and dousing other people with holy water. Holy water is also sprinkled in homes and over foods to sanctify them.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

The Feast of Pentecost takes place over a two-day period, also called Whitsunday and Whitmonday. It marks the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles and about 120 early Christians, 50 days after Jesus is said to have risen from the dead. The Christian holiday is believed to be related to the Jewish festival of Pesach (Passover). Observant Christians typically attend special Pentecost church services on one or both days.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christian missionaries brought Christianity to Greenland at the beginning of the 18th century. Christianity spread across the country rapidly, and a large segment of the population embraced the celebration of Christmas. Homes and Christmas trees are decorated with kamiks (boots sewn from seal-skin), traditional Danish Christmas hearts, tinsel, and Greenlandic crafts.

On Christmas Eve it is traditional for children in church choirs to perform selections from the Gospels. The next day Christian Greenlanders gather with family and friends in private get-togethers, where they dance around their Christmas trees, exchange gifts, and enjoy lavish meals.

✿ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day, historically celebrated as a day when churches distributed the contents of the poor box to the poor and service people went from door to door for Christmas “bonuses,” is also celebrated as St. Stephen’s Day. St. Stephen was the first Christian martyr. He was made a deacon of the early Christian Church by the apostles when dissatisfaction arose over the distribution of alms, but he was ultimately stoned to death for his allegiance to Christianity.

The charitable aspects of this holiday date back to the Middle Ages when wealthy landowners presented gifts of food to the peasants on the day after Christmas. In Greenland today people customarily offer tips to deliverymen and other tradespeople who perform services for them throughout the year. As a public holiday it also extends the Christmas holiday an extra day.

✿ NUUK SNOW FESTIVAL

Observed in: Nuuk

Observed on: March 19–22

The brainchild of architect and ice sculptor Peter Barfoed, the first Nuuk Snow Festival in Greenland was held in 1994. The highlight of the festival is a competition for the best statues and figures sculpted out of large blocks of compressed snow. Teams from Greenland and other countries compete for the best figurative and nonfigurative sculptures. Every year during the month of March, when the dark Greenland winter seems interminable, the residents of the capital city of Nuuk turn out for this event.

✿ GREENLANDIC VIKING/INUIT FESTIVAL

Observed in: Narsarsuaq

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July

Descendants of Vikings from Europe and Iceland and native peoples from Greenland come together during the Greenlandic Viking/Inuit Festival held in July to reenact the everyday life of 1,000 years ago. There are demonstrations of Viking and Inuit cooking, domestic crafts, archery, combat, music, and dancing. The name Viking is derived from the native Scandinavian term for the Norse sea-faring warriors who raided the coasts of Scandinavia, Europe, and the British Isles from the late 8th to the 11th century. The term Inuit, which means “the people,” is the preferred name for the indigenous peoples of Canada and the Arctic region, previously referred to as Eskimos.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

In Greenland the birth of a child is often looked upon as the revival of a dead soul. Following Norse tradition the father is expected to be present at the time of birth to provide moral support to the mother, who is experiencing labor pains. There is an old, long preserved tradition wherein the midwife lays the newborn on the floor or ground after birth and the father picks it up, affirming its legitimacy. In many Norse regions this has been incorporated into the naming rite held on the ninth day. Following the feast the parents host a short symbel in the baby's honor.

A traditional Anglo-Saxon and Scandinavian drinking ritual practiced by the Norse tribe, symbel is associated with accessing divinity by drinking alcohol to excess. After a birth friends and family sit together and drink alcohol in cups made of horns, raising toasts in honor of the newborn.

DEATH

The Inuit and other Greenlandic tribes believe that the soul stays in the body for three days after death. Silence is observed after a death has taken place, so that the ghost is not tempted to return to the house. Self-mutilation and silent weeping are traditional forms of mourning and lamentation.

Introduction

🌸 HISTORY

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) was the first European to land on the Island of Concepción, later known as Grenada, in 1498. The oldest inhabitants of Grenada are the Carib Indians, who successfully resisted early European colonization attempts. Finally an expedition from Martinique (a colony of France) invaded Grenada in 1650–51 and established imperial French rule.

For almost 90 years France managed to keep the British away from the territories of Grenada. Fort George and Fort Frederick, near the St. George's harbor, date from the period of those battles between the French and the British. In 1783

France entered into the Treaty of Versailles, whereupon the Island of Grenada was legally and permanently acquired by the British. Soon the British set up sugar plantations in the country and started importing slaves to work on the plantations. In 1795 a black planter named Julian Fedon was inspired by the ideals of the French Revolution to challenge British authority in Grenada. Violent rebellions ensued, with the local Grenadians and the planters working together to shake off the supremacy of the British. Though these rebellions were ultimately unsuccessful, they acted as a springboard for the abolition of slavery, which finally came about in 1834 in Grenada and throughout the British West Indies.

Between 1885 and 1958 Grenada was part of the British Windward Islands. In 1967 it became a self-governing state and in 1974 gained its independence and adopted a modified parliamentary system based on the British model. A governor general was appointed by, and represented, the British monarch (head of state). A prime minister, who is both leader of the majority party and the head of government, is elected. Sir Eric Gairy (1922–97) was Grenada's first prime minister. While Gairy headed the nation through the latter half of the 1970s, he was opposed by many in Grenada who accused him of being corrupt.

In 1979 Gairy was ousted in a bloodless coup, and the Marxist-Leninist People's Revolutionary Government (PRG) (sometimes called the "New Jewel Movement") came to power, headed by Prime Minister Maurice Bishop (? 1944–83). Soon thereafter, Grenada aligned itself with Cuba and other Soviet-bloc countries. This situation alarmed the United States as well as many Caribbean nations. In 1983 the PRG split, and the faction opposed to Bishop had him arrested. A showdown ensued in the capital city of St. George's, and many of Bishop's supporters were killed. Bishop himself was executed by a firing squad.

U.S. President Reagan dispatched a joint U.S.–Caribbean force to Grenada. They took control of the island, bringing an end to Grenada's revolutionary government. The incident is known on the island as "the intervention." After the U.S. troops withdrew, elections in 1984 installed the first post-revolutionary government. Aid and technical assistance programs sponsored by the United States have strengthened the country's economy. The country has attempted to increase tourism in recent years, a task made easier by the completion of the international airport in 1984.

The Quadrille

As immigrants and travelers arrived in the Western Hemisphere, they brought with them goods as well as the popular European dances of the day. The French quadrille, which began in the French court ballet, became hugely popular in France, then jumped the channel, catching on in the British Isles, before finding its way across the Atlantic in the mid-19th century. As the name quadrille implies, it is a drill done in a quadrangle formation. This has not changed, and it is remarkable how many of the original movements have also remained unchanged.

Quadrilles were originally divided into five sections with four brief breaks to catch one's breath and flirt a bit. That was then reduced to three sections. The least experienced couples would take the "side" positions and have an opportunity to watch the first as the prompter called a series of "changes" for the head couples. The "sides" then did exactly the same thing.

The New National Party, headed by Dr. Keith Mitchell (b. 1946) came forward to assume power in 1995 and moved to a better position in the 1999 elections.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Grenada is a three-island state, made up of Grenada, the largest island, Carriacou, and Petit Martinique.

Grenada is 12 miles wide and 21 miles long and boasts Mt. Saint Catherine, with a height of 2,713 feet. The island of Carriacou is much less mountainous than Grenada and possesses many wonderful sandy beaches. Average temperatures range from 75°F to 86°F, tempered by the steady and cooling trade winds. The lowest temperatures occur between November and February. Because of Grenada's remarkable topography, the island also experiences climate changes related to altitude. The driest season is between January and May. During the rainy season from June to December, it rarely rains every day, and even when it does, the rains do not last for more than an hour at a time.

ECONOMY

Agriculture is the primary driver of Grenada's economy. Unfortunately, much of the economy was brought to a near-standstill by Hurricane Ivan in September 2004. Thirty-seven people were killed, and approximately 9,000 people were left homeless. Ninety percent of the buildings on the island were damaged or destroyed, including some tourist facilities, which are also important sources of foreign exchange. Reconstruction is under way but will require time and substantial resources; the United States has committed itself to ongoing participation in the reconstruction effort.

Grenada is a member of the Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM). Most goods can be imported into Grenada under open general license. Goods that are produced in the Eastern Caribbean receive additional protection.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

While many countries boast about their "cultural fusion," Grenada is a living symbol of it. Groups from the West Indies and other Latin and Caribbean countries coexist with British, Creole, and French influences. The African Creole influences are widespread among the Grenadian communities and are especially evident during Carnival, which highlights these diverse dance forms, music, and rituals. Traditional European dances like the quadrille are also performed during festivals and holidays. Carriacou has an especially popular folk festival featuring the African Big Drum Dance.

❁ CUISINE

Some of the great dishes from these islands feature Creole cuisine and seafood. Most Grenadian cuisine is enhanced by the wide variety of spices grown on the island, including nutmeg, cinnamon, vanilla, and ginger. For example, nutmeg, which is the island's principal spice, is infused into everything from candy to ice cream. Grenada's more exotic dishes include oildown (the national dish), which is a stew made with salted meat, breadfruit, onion, carrot, celery, dasheen (a root vegetable grown locally), and dumplings, all slowly steamed in coconut milk until the liquid is absorbed. Seafood of all kinds is very popular; Grenadian caviar (roe of white sea urchin), conch, and a fish dish called "stuffed jacks" are among the favorite attractions.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Grenadians bid farewell to the old year and welcome the new one with renewed hopes and new resolutions. Special church services mark the day. New Year's celebrations are generally family affairs, but a number of people celebrate with lavish parties as well as grand balls.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 7

Independence Day celebrations are marked by a national rally and a military parade in the capital city of St. George's. Outstanding contributors in their respective fields are honored at public ceremonies. Grenadians wear their national colors of yellow, green, and red on this day and celebrate with music, fireworks, and beach parties.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, celebrates the working class and emphasizes the principles of equality and social rights. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Workers in Grenada take a day off and hold massive rallies and discussions at Queen's Park, St. George's. Trade union gatherings are held across the island.

❁ CARICOM DAY

Observed on: July 5

This day commemorates the founding of the Caribbean Community in 1973. CARICOM Day is of great significance for most of the islands located in the Caribbean, that belong to this organization. Grenada became a member of CARICOM on May 1, 1974. This is an occasion to celebrate the dynamic efforts of countries that share a common history, culture, origins, and language and come together for the common good of their peoples. In Grenada CARICOM Day is marked by official gatherings and public speeches delivered by important public figures from Grenada and other countries in the Caribbean Community.

❁ EMANCIPATION DAY

Observed on: August 1

Commemorating the abolition of slavery in 1834, Emancipation Day (or Abolition of Slavery Day) in Grenada brings together people from all walks of life. International and local authorities debate historical, cultural, and political aspects of race relations and civil rights. Musical concerts feature a mix of gospel, calypso, jazz, and classical music, promoting the themes of peace and harmony. Caribbean and Creole culture dominate offerings at the book and craft exhibits. Many charitable efforts and volunteer projects are organized on this day as well.

❁ THANKSGIVING DAY

Observed on: October 25

This day commemorates the intervention of the American troops on the islands. Relations with the United States were strained when Maurice Bishop (1944–83) took power in a bloodless coup and suspended the 1974 Constitution. Following another coup in which Bishop, among others, was executed, the United States invaded Grenada on October 25, 1983. They were accompanied by troops from Jamaica, Barbados, and other countries. The following year the constitution was reinstated, and elections were held. On this day a military parade is held at the Queen's Park in St. George's (the capital city). This park is also the venue for various cultural events and religious services.

CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: The week before Lent

Carnival is a time of unrestrained revelry before the onset of the austere Lenten season. Carnival is known for its profusion of color, creativity, and culture. The festival begins with the National Calypso Monarch Competition in which the calypso poets, old and young alike, recite their poems amid colorful celebrations. People participate in the masquerades dressed in Arabian-style headgear, quarter-length baggy trousers, batwing sleeves, large sleeves that resemble the wings of a bat, and jumbo collars that represent the carefree customs of the Creole people. All through the night people can be seen moving around, clad in flamboyant attire, waving fluorescent torches, and enjoying the music, food, drink, and dancing in the streets.

Pentecost is a religious observance that recalls the visitation of the Holy Spirit to about 120 early Christians, including the Apostles and followers, after the Resurrection of Jesus. This festival is often celebrated over two days. They are also referred to in many countries as Whitsunday and Whitmonday, the seventh Sunday and Monday after Easter.

Modern scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations now associated with Pentecost were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring. Whitsunday is usually spent in leisure activities. Christians dress in formal clothes and take part in processions led by young girls clad all in white. The day concludes with a public feast. During this weekend most establishments and government offices remain closed on the islands.

CORPUS CHRISTI

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Sixty days after Easter

Corpus Christi commemorates the institution of the Eucharist. The Feast of Corpus Christi was established for the entire Catholic Church in 1261 by order of Pope Urban IV (r. 1261–64). It also marks the beginning of the planting season. In Grenada a special procession moves through the streets of St. George's (the capital city) with participants singing and dancing along the route.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

The day after Christmas is known as Boxing Day. The name Boxing Day refers to the old British custom of opening donation boxes placed in churches for the poor on this day. In Grenada the day continues to be one devoted to charity and donations. It is also the Feast of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr. As a public holiday, it is a day for spending time with family and friends.

❁ FISHERMAN'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATIONS

Observed in: Coastal villages
Observed on: June 29

St. Peter, the patron saint of fishermen, is revered by the fishing community of Grenada, so Fisherman's Birthday Celebrations is considered a holy day in many fishing villages and coastal areas in Grenada. There are morning services and prayers in churches, and in the evening fishermen seek blessings for the tools of their trade (their boats and nets). This is fol-

The Big Drum Dance

The Big Drum Dance is West African in origin. The bulk of people who inhabit Grenada and its sister islands originally came from Nigeria, Ghana, Sierra Leone, Dahomey, Congo, and Guinea. On the islands the intermarriage among members of the various tribal backgrounds led to a great deal of cultural cross-pollination. Communal gatherings of the various tribal peoples were known as Big Drum ceremonies. The name Big Drum has nothing to do with the size of any musical instrument; it refers, instead, to the size of the gathering. When members of all the different tribes living on these islands come together to celebrate a social event, such as a wedding or the memory of an ancestor, this dance is performed.

lowed by community sports events such as boat races, various fishing displays, and late evening parties. This holiday is also called Feast Day of Sts. Peter and Paul.

The traditional Grenadian wedding ceremony includes several ceremonies and feasts held throughout the wedding festivities. In order to get married the groom first needs permission from the bride's family. About two months before the wedding, flags are flown on the rooftops of the homes of both the bride and the groom, announcing the proposed wedding to the entire community.

Friends and close relatives attend the Parents' Plate, a feast hosted by the two families two or three weeks prior to the wedding. A separate saraca table is set for the ancestors of the families. A variety of foods, cakes, and fruits are laid out and candles are lit in the evening. The next morning the children from the village are invited to eat the food, which is known as "scramble" or "grap-pay." Flag dances are performed before the wedding day; the flags are removed the day of the wedding. A procession from the groom's home leads up to the bride's with the dancer from the bride's side accepting the hand of the dancer from the groom's side. After the church wedding there is a reception at the bride's parents' home, complete with the Big Drum Dance. Two weeks later the families host a thanksgiving celebration, called the "return thanks," to express gratitude to the guests and to seek their blessings.

Fun Fact

Saraca is a peculiarly Grenadian rite in which food is offered to the deceased as well as to the guests.

☼ DEATH

A person is buried one day after death. Initially a wooden marker is erected over the grave, usually because of lack of money. The family collects and saves money over the next few years and then erects a marble tombstone. Prayer nights or meetings are held on the third, ninth, and 40th nights after the death in remembrance of the deceased. The tombstone feast is the last of the death rites and is held on the second or third death anniversary.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) reached the islands of Guadeloupe on November 4, 1493. Though they were originally called Karukéra (Island of Beautiful Waters) by the native Carib Indians, he renamed them after the famous sanctuary of Santa María de Guadalupe de Estremadura in Spain.

Since this region lacked gold and silver, Europeans did not take much interest in it until the 17th century. For a brief period, the Spanish tried to establish themselves in Guadeloupe, but they were discouraged by the armed resistance of the Carib Amerindians. Three decades later, French colonists, sponsored by an association of French entrepreneurs, established the first European settlement on the islands. The party landed on the southeastern shore of Basse-Terre in 1635 and claimed Guadeloupe for France. The French forced the Caribs from Guadeloupe, imported slaves, planted crops, and, within a decade, had built the first sugar mill. By the time

France officially annexed the islands in 1674, a slave-based plantation system was already functioning in the area.

Between 1759 and 1763, the British launched several invasions. They succeeded in developing Pointe-à-Pitre into a major harbor and opened profitable English and North American markets for Guadeloupe in sugar, in exchange for which the local planters were allowed to import cheap American lumber and food. Since the economy expanded rapidly, many French colonists also grew wealthier under the British occupation.

The situation changed with the Treaty of Paris (1763) when France abandoned its territorial claims in Canada in return for British recognition of French control of Guadeloupe. However, in a bid to take advantage of the chaos ensuing from the French Revolution, Britain invaded Guadeloupe in 1794. The French recaptured the island under the command of Victor Hughes, however, a black nationalist, and they succeeded in freeing the slaves from their owners, who controlled the sugar plantations. Then followed a period of unrest and turmoil. As a consequence of Hughes's attacks on U.S.

Original Inhabitants

The first inhabitants of Guadeloupe (around 300 B.C.E.) were the Arawaks, a peaceful Amerindian tribe that relied on fishing for their livelihood. Around the ninth century C.E. the Arawaks were supplanted by the Caraïbes (Karibs or Caribs), who were the island's inhabitants when Christopher Columbus's fleet landed on the island on November 3, 1493.

ships, the United States declared war on France. Alarmed, Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821), the French emperor, sent a general to Guadeloupe to quell the uprising and restore slavery.

Throughout the 19th century, Guadeloupe was the most prosperous territory in the French West Indies. Although the British continued invading and occupying the islands for most of the period between 1810 and 1816, the Treaty of Vienna (1816) restored the islands to France, and it has maintained sovereignty over them ever since.

Following a campaign led by French politician Victor Schoelcher (1804–93), slavery was finally abolished on these islands in 1848. Schoelcher is honored with a holiday by Guadeloupians for his great vision and persistence. In the years that followed, planters brought laborers from Pondicherry, a French colony in India, to work in the cane fields in Guadeloupe.

Since 1871, Guadeloupe has had representation in the French parliament. It became an overseas department of France on March 19, 1946. This department also comprises the northern portion of the island of Saint Martin, which France shares with the Netherlands.

🌸 GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Guadeloupe is an archipelago of nine inhabited islands, including Basse-Terre, Grande-Terre, Marie-Galante, La Desirade, Îles des Saintes (two islands), Saint-Barthelemy, Île de la Petite Terre, and Saint-Martin (the French part of the island of Saint Martin). Its subtropical climate is tempered by trade winds, but the humidity is moderately high. Their topographies distinguish the islands from each other. The terrain of Basse-Terre is volcanic in origin with interior mountains, while Grande-Terre is a low limestone formation. Most of the seven other islands are volcanic in origin. A narrow channel, the Rivière Salée, divides the entire territory into two sections: the larger, western Basse-Terre and the smaller, eastern Grande-Terre.

Guadeloupe's weather is warm throughout the year with daily highs near 81°F. There is only a 5°F difference between summer and winter temperatures. From December to March, the early mornings and late evenings are somewhat cooler. Guadeloupe, like all other Caribbean islands, is subject to occasional hurricanes between July and October, and moderate rainfall is commonplace during this period.

🌸 ECONOMY

Guadeloupe's economy depends on agriculture, tourism, light industry, and services as well as France for large subsidies and imports. Tourism is a key industry, with most tourists arriving from the United States on the large number of cruise ships that visit the islands. The traditional sugarcane crop is slowly being replaced by other crops such as bananas (which now supply about 50 percent of export earnings), eggplant, and flowers. Other vegetables and root crops are cultivated for local consumption although Guadeloupe is still dependent on imported food, mainly from France. Light industry features sugar and rum production. Most manufactured goods and fuel are imported. Hurricanes periodically devastate the economy. Unemployment is high, especially among the youth.

🌸 CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The region of Guadeloupe is a melting pot of diverse cultural currents and cross-currents—French, African, East Indian, and West Indian. In spite of these diverse origins, however, the people are united by language (99 percent speak French) and religion (95 percent are Catholic). The blend is visible in the architecture, which ranges from French colonial to Hindu. In terms of intellectual attainments, its most renowned representative is Alexis Léger (whose pseudonym is Saint-John Perse). He was born in Guadeloupe in 1887 and won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1960 for the evocative imagery of his poems. One of his noted works is Anabase (1925), which was translated into English by T. S. Eliot.

Guadeloupe has a rich repertoire of music including zouk (a blend of African, reggae, calypso, and electronic rhythms), calypso, reggae, and the beguine, which derives its name from the French word beguin, which means “flirtation.” This highly popular dance of the islands of the French West Indies (including Saint Lucia, Martinique, and Guadeloupe) somewhat resembles the rumba. The people of Guadeloupe claim that the beguine originated in their country and not in Martinique as is generally believed.

🌸 CUISINE

Guadeloupe is considered one of the true culinary capitals of the Caribbean. Its cuisine has been influenced by the circumstances of its history, and the cuisine reflects its many cultures. Fresh seafood is consumed in large quantities. The specialties include shellfish, smoked fish, and stuffed land crabs. To the typically Creole dishes have been added the subtle nuances of French cuisine, the spice of African cook-

Red Snapper Seviche

Ingredients:

1 lb. snapper filet
 3/4 c. lime juice
 3/4 c. lemon juice
 1/2 medium Scotch bonnet chili, seeded and diced
 1/2 c. fresh cilantro, chopped
 1 c. avocado, chopped
 1 c. fresh tomatoes, chopped
 1/2 c. shallots, chopped
 1 Tbs. salt
 1 tsp. fresh ground black pepper

Preparation:

Cut the filets into even diced pieces about 1 inch long and 1/2 inch wide to ensure that they “cook” evenly—so the acid in the citrus juices penetrates the each piece evenly.

In a large stainless steel bowl, marinate the snapper in the lime and lemon juices. Cover and let sit for one hour. Add the scotch bonnet chili, cilantro, avocado, tomato, shallots, salt, and pepper. Mix well, cover, and refrigerate for one hour before serving.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The New Year's celebration is probably the oldest of all holidays in Guadeloupe. To its residents, this festival symbolizes rebirth and a fresh lease on life with renewed hope. In Guadeloupe, people commonly celebrate New Year's Day with music, dances, and parties. It is also a time when flowers bloom and for planting new crops. Many people resolve to get rid of their bad habits and cultivate good ones for the coming year.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, honors workers throughout the world and highlights the successes and challenges of the labor movement. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, set aside May 1 as a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Guadeloupe it is a day of rest for most people, while workers participate in parades and attend labor union meetings.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 8

Victory Day celebrates the victory of the Allied Powers in World War II (1939–1945). In Guadeloupe the people pay homage to the Guadeloupean soldiers who died in the war. After the Nazis occupied France Guadeloupe at first supported the French Vichy collaborators, but in 1942 it signed an accord with the United States and fought with the Allies (France, Great Britain, the United States, and Soviet Russia).

❁ ABOLITION OF SLAVERY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 27

Slavery was abolished in Guadeloupe in 1848, following a campaign under the leadership of French politician Victor Schoelcher (1804–93). Every year, cultural events, picnics, and parties are organized to celebrate this event. The celebration often begins with church services, followed by a parade through the streets of the capital, and then by picnics in the park. Speakers deliver stirring speeches throughout the day. Abolition of Slavery Day is also called Emancipation Day.

❁ BASTILLE DAY

Observed on: July 14

Bastille Day, which is the primary French national holiday, is celebrated annually on July 14. It is called La Fête Nationale in France, where it has great significance because it commemorates the end of the French monarchy and the beginning of the First Republic after the French Revolution. As a part of the celebrations in Guadeloupe French flags are hoisted over government buildings and public houses. Schools and public offices remain closed, while the evenings are packed with cultural events, music, dances, races, and gastronomical exhibits across the country. These activities begin early in the evening and continue until the early morning hours.

❁ VICTOR SCHOELCHER DAY

Observed on: July 21

The inhabitants of Guadeloupe observe the birthday of the former French Minister of the Colonies Victor Schoelcher and pay tribute to his successful opposition to slavery. Born in Paris on July 21, 1804, Schoelcher was a businessman by profession. He traveled to the Americas in quest of clientele, but instead of clients he discovered the shocking working and living condition of the slaves. Thereafter he was actively involved in the movement for the abolition of slavery, which finally came about in 1848. In his honor several events and public meetings are held in the streets of Guadeloupe (many of which are named after him).

❁ ARMISTICE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

The people of Guadeloupe remember the historic agreement that marked the end of World War I on this day. The armistice that ended World War 1 was signed at the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month.

Like the residents of mainland France and other French outposts, in Guadeloupe veterans' organizations hold parades, and the president of Guadeloupe places a ceremonial wreath on the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, also called Three King's Day or, in French, Fête des Rois, commemorates the visit paid by the Three Wise Men (three kings from the East named Balthazar, Gaspar, and Melchior), to the infant Jesus at Bethlehem. The event was believed to have occurred on January 6, though there is no mention of specific dates in the scriptures. As in France the traditional dishes served at dinner on this day in Guadeloupe include a cake known as galette des rois ("the cake of the kings"). A lucky charm (une fève), traditionally a bean, is baked into the cake. Whoever finds the charm in his or her slice of cake becomes the king or queen and gets to wear a paper crown. The king or queen then has to choose his queen or her king, by dropping the lucky charm into another's glass. Children dressed as the Magi go from door to door, singing for a slice of the galette des rois.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Last Tuesday before Lent

In Guadeloupe Carnival, also known as Mardi Gras (Fat Tuesday) in French-speaking countries, or Shrove Tuesday in English-speaking countries, unofficially begins on the first weekend in January after Epiphany. Groups that will participate in Carnival parades begin their rehearsals then, especially on the weekends. The Sunday before Carnival there are dancing, masquerades, and a good deal of excitement in the streets. On Shrove Tuesday, masqueraders parade, dressed in pajamas, and dance all day long. The theme of the parades changes every year.

What makes the festivities in Guadeloupe unique are the events of the following day, Ash Wednesday. The streets are filled with revelers dressed in black-and-white as he- and she-wolves. Carnival comes to a close on Ash Wednesday evening with the cremation of King Carnival, an effigy known as Vaval, accompanied by loud wails from the assembled crowd. Dining and dancing follow.

On Guadeloupe, Carnival is also revived for one day—on Mid-Lent Thursday—which is midway between Carnival and Easter. On this day revelers dress up as devils in red and black costumes.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Because it celebrates the Christian belief in the Resurrection of Jesus after his Crucifixion, Easter is the central holiday in all Christian calendars. Prayer services begin before daybreak all over Guadeloupe. Parades and banquets are held to mark this special day across the country. Girls and women make it a point to wear festive Easter bonnets on the occasion.

✿ EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Day after Easter

Easter Monday, or Holy Monday, comes immediately after Good Friday and Easter. The holiday is celebrated on Guadeloupe with egg-rolling competitions for children. In addition Guadeloupians drench each other with perfumed water (which originally symbolized the holy water blessed during the Easter sacrament) on Easter Monday. Parades and banquets are also organized across the country.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost, also known as Whitsunday and Whitmonday, is observed to mark the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the twelve apostles and about 120 other early Christians. In Guadeloupe people attend church on Sunday. On Monday they again dress in their best clothes to take part in parades, which are led by young girls dressed entirely in white. There is also a country fair that features special types of food and drink.

✿ THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

The Immaculate Conception of the blessed Virgin Mary, is a time to recognize Mary and her important role (as Jesus' mother) in the celebration of Christmas and Jesus' birth. It also celebrates the Christian belief that Mary was chosen by God to be born free from sin so that she would be a suitable mother for his Son. This day is one of a handful of days the Catholic Church calls "holy days of obligation." As the label implies all the adherents of the church are obligated to attend Mass on this day. In Guadeloupe this celebration is marked by services at local churches, fireworks displays, and a grand parade, in addition to food and dance festivals.

Fun Fact

Blood sausages are eggplant-colored sausages made of pig's blood mixed with fat, a filler such as bread crumbs, and other flavorings that vary from region to region. They are usually sold pre-cooked, but most people heat them before serving.

Origin of Gwo Ka

During the era of slavery, blacks from various regions of the African continent were found in the Caribbean. However no matter what their languages were, they had something in common—their music. In Guadeloupe in particular, African slaves lived under very difficult conditions. Gwo Ka became popular during that dark period of the Guadeloupien history.

Gwo Ka is not just music but everything that revolves around it—dance, plays, jokes, a certain manner of being—in a word, a whole way of living. Although its roots are African, the basic elements of Gwo Ka underwent several changes when they were adopted by Guadeloupians. Due to the influence of the slave masters, Creole replaced the African languages that were originally used in the music, and barrels replaced "excavated wood" for the drums because the slaves were forbidden to fell trees.

✿ SAINT PATRON'S DAY

Observed in: Vieux
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 5

On this day the residents of Vieux build altars for their patron saints (especially St. Joseph, who is considered the patron of many trades), as an act of gratitude for answering their prayers and for providing good crops. Over time, this tradition has evolved into a very large public event. Special food items, linen, flowers, and statuettes adorn the altars of St. Joseph. The bread made for this day is often shaped like a scepter or a beard. The guests of honor include villagers dressed as the young Jesus or Mary and Joseph, as well as orphans, widows, and beggars.

✿ GWO KA FESTIVAL

Observed in: St. Anne
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Early June

Gwo Ka refers to the drums originally fashioned in slave quarters of the islands and the music that evolved from them. For an entire week concerts are held in the town square of St. Anne. Each night a distinctly different style of music is performed. The music ranges from reggae to zydeco to Afropop, among others. Flame trees, which thrive in Guadeloupe and are ablaze with bright red blossoms from May to August, are a major attraction of this event.

✿ FESTIVAL OF THE WOMEN COOKS

Observed in: Pointe-à-Pitre
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August

Festival of the Women Cooks, or Fête des Cuisinières, is a spectacular culinary event held in early August each year. The festival features a five-hour banquet to which everyone is invited. There is a colorful ceremony that precedes the banquet: Clad in Creole dresses and carrying baskets of traditional food items, women parade through the streets of Pointe-à-Pitre to the cathedral, where they are blessed by the bishop. Afterward the much-awaited banquet and dancing take place.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Catholic children are often given two names, one of which is that of a saint. It is commonplace to send flowers, cards, or a small gift for the baby. Among Guadeloupians baptism usually takes place during the first few months of the child's life. The ceremony of baptism is held in a church either on a Sunday afternoon or at a regular Sunday liturgy.

✿ MARRIAGE

Marriage customs in Guadeloupe are rooted in Roman Catholic tradition. The bride wears an elegant white gown, while the groom dresses in formal attire. The rituals include the exchange of wedding vows and rings. It is traditional to hold the wedding ceremony at high noon. The bride may place a bouquet at the shrine (or statue) of Mary, and the newlywed couple may light a large unity candle from two smaller ones to signify their new life together.

✿ DEATH

When a Guadeloupien dies, the body is washed thoroughly to cleanse him or her of all worldly sins; on the second day after a loved one has passed away, friends and family hold a visitation, or wake, usually at the home of the deceased or a funeral home.

The funeral service may stand alone or be part of a Mass. A funeral reception can also be held after the services, where food and drinks are often served, depending on the deceased's family's wishes. In later years a Mass may be held on the anniversary of the death of Catholics.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Mayan civilization, which dominated Central America from before 2000 B.C.E. until about 1000 C.E., had a profound and lasting impact on the society and culture of Guatemala. During the Mayan era fishing and farming communities thrived along the Pacific coast of Guatemala. Between 600 and 900 C.E. the center of power moved toward the El Petén lowlands. Thereafter the Mayan civilization declined swiftly as the result of natural disasters such as drought and famine, as well as inept leadership.

The weakened and divided Mayans were defeated in 1523–24 by the Spanish conquistador Pedro de Alvarado (1485–1541), who became captain general of Guatemala. The first colonial capital was Ciudad Vieja, or Santiago. The conquerors found very little gold in the area but, with the use of forced labor, cultivated cacao and indigo. The Central American Union, a political confederation (1825–38) of the republics of Central America united under a captaincy general in Spanish colonial times—Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Salvador—gained independence in 1821. For a brief time Guatemala, along with the other Central American republics, was annexed to the Mexican Empire. Guatemala became an independent and separate nation in 1839.

Jorge Ubico Castañeda (1878–1946), who became president in 1931, greatly improved the nation's economic position but also ran a politically repressive regime. After Guatemala declared war on the Axis powers (Germany, Italy, and Japan) in 1941, the large German-owned coffee holdings were seized by the government. Popular discontent with his repressive regime led to Ubico's overthrow in 1944. His successor Juan José Arévalo (1904–90), launched a series of labor and agrarian reforms, and Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán (1913–71), who succeeded him in 1951, continued the reforms.

In 1954 U. S.-backed rebels, calling themselves anticommunists, overthrew the Arbenz government and placed Colonel Carlos Castillo Armas (1914–57) in power. When Castillo Armas was assassinated in 1957, Miguel Ydígoras Fuentes (1895–1982) became president. Guatemalan bases were used to train anti-Castro guerrillas in the early 1960s; around that time dissident leftist military officers and students commenced a guerrilla movement.

Violence continued during the 1970s and 1980s; in 1977 the United States cut off military aid to Guatemala. After three supposedly fraudulent elections General Ríos Montt (b. 1926) assumed power in a 1982 coup, only to be deposed in 1983 by General Óscar Mejías Victores (b. 1930). During the early 1980s leftist guerrillas formed the Guatemalan National Revolutionary Union (URNG) and began an insurgency against the government.

In 1996 Álvaro Arzú Irigoyen (b. 1946), a former mayor of Guatemala City and foreign minister, won the presidency. He conducted a purge of top military officers, and in December 1996 his government signed a UN-sponsored peace accord with the URNG guerrillas, who subsequently regrouped as a political party.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

More than 66 percent of the country is mountainous, while 62 percent is under forest cover. Guatemala can broadly be divided into four topographical regions: the Pacific coast with a tropical savannah plain and lagoons; the high plateau and mountain systems, which include the Sierra Madre, Sierra de Chaucús, and Sierra de las Minas, among others (this region also contains around 30 volcanoes); the Continental Divide and Caribbean Lowlands, which include three deep river valleys—the Motagua, Polochic, and Sarstun; and the El Petén, a rolling limestone plateau covered with dense tropical forests. Eighteen short rivers flow

Marimba

The marimba is a musical instrument that originated in Africa but was modified in Central America, where it became immensely popular. It consists of a set of graduated wooden bars, often with resonators beneath to reinforce the sound. It is played by striking the wooden bars with mallets.

from the highlands to the Pacific Ocean. The region abounds in lakes, the most famous of which are Lake Atitlán, Lake Amatitlán, Lake Izabel, and Lake Peten Itza.

ECONOMY

Coffee, sugar, and bananas are the leading commercial and export crops in Guatemala's principally agricultural economy. The United States, Mexico, El Salvador, Venezuela, Germany, and Japan are Guatemala's major trading partners.

Guatemala is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children from Guatemala and other Central American countries trafficked internally and to the United States for the purposes of sexual and labor exploitation.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Guatemala has a rich and varied cultural heritage. The indigenous Mayan groups were never completely subjugated by the colonizing Spaniards, and the descendants of the Maya have preserved some of their indigenous culture. Guatemala's culture today reflects two distinct heritages: Western and Mayan. While the former is found primarily in Guatemala City, a modern, cosmopolitan hub, the latter thrives in the highland villages. In these villages the colorful dress, handicrafts, and celebration of religious, cultural, and social festivals preserve many Mayan traditions.

Each community in Guatemala has its own characteristic motifs, patterns, and designs that are particular to that area. Music and dance are integral aspects of most Mayan religious festivals. The marimba is the favorite national instrument, and it is played on all-important occasions. Semana Santa (Holy Week, or the week preceding Easter) is Guatemala's biggest festival, and the Antigua region is home to the largest Easter celebration in the world. The colorful processions, dating from 1543 and originally modeled on Spanish processions, attract large numbers of tourists who throng the streets along with the faithful.

CUISINE

Corn is the staple food of the Guatemalans. It is the basic ingredient for dishes such as tortillas, tamales, and enchiladas, among others. The indigenous contributions to Guatemalan cuisine include beans, squash, chocolate, and plantains, and chili-based sauces are an important part of the local diet. The Spanish influence is evident in soups, stews, and special dishes such as fiambre (a mixture of meat, fish, sausage, and vegetables). Melons, mangoes, and papayas, along with honey, nuts, and cinnamon, are the main ingredients of desserts. The most popular drink of the Guatemalans is coffee, which is also the country's principal export item.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Most Guatemalans celebrate New Year's Eve at home with their families. It is increasingly common in the cities for people to go out to restaurants and nightclubs. They celebrate New Year's Day with vibrant music, colorful costumes, and fireworks displays; on this occasion boj (cane alcohol) flows freely. People wear new clothes, which are believed to usher in good fortune throughout the year.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Guatemala, Labor Day, also known as May Day (Primer de Mayo) and Workers' Day, celebrates the contributions of all Guatemalan workers and laborers to the economic and social development of the country. It is observed with processions, meetings, and parades.

❁ ARMY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 30

On June 30, 1871, a revolt for agrarian reforms took place in Guatemala in which Justo Rufino Barrios (1835–85), an army general in charge of the western command, overthrew the incumbent Conservative president Vicente Cerna (1810–85). Barrios later became the president of Guatemala for some time and his sweeping innovations earned him the nickname "the Reformer." On this day the president of Guatemala addresses the armed forces, and a military parade is held in the capital city.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 15

On this day in 1821 Guatemala secured its independence from Spanish colonial rule. To celebrate the occasion, banners of blue and white (the colors of the national flag) are draped over all government buildings in the capital city. There is a parade with military bands, and an air force precision display. People turn out in large numbers to wave flags and watch the parade.

❁ REVOLUTION DAY

Observed on: October 20

This day is observed in remembrance of the October Revolution in Guatemala. On October 20, 1944, a coalition of democratic forces that included armed workers and students overthrew the government of General Jorge Ubico Castañeda (1878–1946). He was the last of a series of liberal dictators who had ruled Guatemala since the 1870s. The October Revolution and the Counterrevolution a decade later established the political terrain for the ensuing decades of armed conflict. Every year on this day an air of patriotic fervor prevails. Political demonstrations, marches, music, and fireworks displays are held throughout the country.

Religious Holidays

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

In Guatemala people traditionally celebrate Maundy Thursday (also called Holy Thursday or Sheer Thursday) with religious feasts and processions. Some people stay up all night decorating the alfombras (carpets), which are laid on church floors and along the cobblestone streets where the effigies of saints are carried in slow, swaying processions accompanied by bands of musicians.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Alfombra

The word alfombra is Arabic in origin and means "carpet." The mixing of plants with sawdust, sand, and other materials into design patterns is actually a Moorish custom that was passed on to Spain and thence to the Americas. As used in Guatemala it reflects a mixture of Spanish and indigenous customs. In the Mayan culture when important dignitaries passed by, flowers were laid down to announce their presence.

Good Friday, also known as Holy Friday or Mourning Friday, and Great Friday in Orthodox Churches, memorializes the Crucifixion of Jesus. Christians in Guatemala observe this day as a day of fasting. The reenactment of the last journey of Jesus to the place of his Crucifixion is an important annual ritual in Guatemala. The largest procession is in the Antigua region of Guatemala, where people choose to spend the entire day in devotional settings, attending church, public readings of the Gospels and the Psalms, and singing hymns.

✿ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday, also called Grand Saturday, the Angelic Night, or the Vigil of Easter, is the seventh and last day of week before Easter and the third and final day of the Easter triduum (the last three days before Easter). On this day many of the churches in Guatemala perform baptism ceremonies. Devout Catholics are required to fast and abstain from meat on this day.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter commemorates the Resurrection of Jesus after his Crucifixion. For the devout Jesus' Resurrection symbolizes eternal life and the resurgence of hope.

In Guatemala worship services begin quite early in the morning. Guatemalans celebrate the day by participating in parades and later enjoying the many parties that are held. Villagers clad in traditional Mayan attire carry statues of Jesus in processions.

In certain regions of Guatemala, such as Antigua, the Easter celebrations are widely renowned for their colorful ceremony. Along cobblestone streets, intricately designed carpets painstakingly made of colored sawdust and other natural materials are laid down. Later a solemn procession of Roman centurions marches over the carpets, carrying an image of Jesus hanging on the cross. The delicate carpets, which are created to be sacrificed on this day, are destroyed as they are trod on. These processions attract large numbers of participants and tourists.

Assumption Day marks the day when Mary, the mother of Jesus, was received into heaven. Devout Christians consider this a vindication of Jesus' promise to faithful Christians that they too will be received into paradise. The people of Guatemala celebrate the festival with prayers and visits to their churches. In the town of Jocotenango, a special fair is organized on this day for the sale and purchase of horses, mules, and other goods.

✿ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day, also known as the Day of the Dead in Guatemala, is celebrated as All Souls' Day in other countries. It's an important holiday in Guatemala. On this day people visit cemeteries, where they pay homage to their relatives and friends who have died by decorating their tombstones and graves with flowers and candles. In the village of Santiago Sacatepéquez, near Guatemala City, it is traditional for people to fly huge colorful kites in the cemetery. The kites, which represent souls rising to Heaven, often have notes addressed to the dead and to God attached to the strings. People traditionally eat fiambre—a mixture of vegetables and many kinds of meat—on this day.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

On Christmas Eve a figure of the infant Jesus is added to the nacimiento (Nativity or Christmas manger scene) as part of an elaborate ceremony. When the clock strikes midnight, an abrazo de navidad (Christmas hug) is exchanged among relatives, friends, and neighbors, symbolizing unity and love.

The custom of las posadas is another important element of Guatemalan Christmas celebrations. (The Spanish word posada means “inn.”) This is the reenactment of Mary and Joseph’s search for lodging on the evening of Jesus’ birth. During the posada actors portraying Mary and Joseph make stops at three inns (usually people’s homes or business establishments) to ask if there is room for them to spend the night. They are symbolically turned away from the first two places and finally given lodging at the third. Midnight Mass and a lavish supper follow las posadas.

For Christmas Day Guatemalans decorate their homes with small colored lights and other ornaments. In almost every home a nacimiento (Nativity scene) is set up, and Christmas trees are decorated.

Tamales (made with pork or chicken) are the most popular dish during Christmas in Guatemala. People also enjoy a variety of different punches (which make abundant use of dried fruit, including raisins, prunes, and dates, cinnamon, milk, and/or rum) on this occasion.

❁ FESTIVAL OF THE BLACK CHRIST OF ESQUIPULAS

Observed in: Esquipulas

Observed by: Roman Catholics, Mayans

Observed on: January 8–15

The border town of Esquipulas (138 miles east of Guatemala City) hosts one of the largest religious festivals in Central America. A fine blend of Christian and Mayan rituals the week-long festival culminates on January 15 every year. More than 100,000 pilgrims come to pray before the statue of the Black Christ, which is enshrined in the Basilica de Esquipulas and appears black because it was carved from a variety of dark woods. Pilgrims and visitors to the shrine often have to wait in a long line; the wait affords a chance to savor traditional foods, offered by vendors, and to observe the colorful native costumes.

❁ VIRGEN DE CANDELARIA

Observed in: Huehuetanango

Observed on: February 2

The origin of the Virgen de Candelaria festival, also called Virgen of the Candlemas and Purification of the Virgin, lies in the ancient Jewish purification rites followed after childbirth. These required the mother of a male child to observe a period of segregation that lasted for about 40 days after his birth. When this period was over it was mandatory for the mother to take her newborn to offer prayers at the synagogue. According to the Bible Mary adhered to this custom and took the infant Jesus to the synagogue for prayers. Because the Catholic Church fixed Jesus’ birth date on December 25 (although it is not known when he was actually born), the 40-day period of segregation (for Mary) would have ended on or around February 2 of the following year.

The city of Huehuetanango, where this festival is celebrated, has a famous silver image of the Virgen de la Candelaria. The image is so heavy that it cannot be moved out of the church for religious processions. Worshippers sing folk songs, light candles, and make floral offerings before the Virgin. Traditional Guatemalan cuisine is served at the large street parties organized for the occasion.

❁ DAY OF THE DEAD

Observed in: Santiago Sacatepéquez

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: November 1

During the Day of the Dead (Día de los Muertos) observances in the Santiago Sacatepéquez region of Guatemala, people use kites of all shapes and sizes to communicate with the spirits of the deceased. According to local beliefs the dead communicate with the mortals through the whistling winds and fluctuations in the movements of the kites. Hordes of people gather in the cemeteries nearest to them to fly gigantic, colorful paper kites in an attempt to send messages to their deceased loved ones. Guatemala’s Day of the Dead falls on what is generally observed as All Saints’ Day in other countries.

❁ GARÍFUNA DAY

Observed in: Livingston

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 26

Garífunas are the largest black ethnic group in Central America. During the European exploration of the Americas, West African explorers and runaway slaves commingled with the native islanders of Yurumein (St. Vincent) in the Eastern Caribbean. The offspring of these unions were the original Garifunas. They were a unique community, with the distinction of never having been enslaved; at least this is what Garifuna parents tell their children about their shipwrecked African ancestors, whose intermarriage with indigenous Caribbean people created a fiercely independent American ethnicity. The European colonialists called the Garifunas “black Caribs.” Because the Garifuna refused to accept enslavement as an alternative to death, they were exiled to the uninhabited Island of Roatan, off the coast of Honduras. From the Bay Island of Honduras, they migrated to the Atlantic coasts of Belize, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua.

Garifuna Day, or Settlers’ Day, has a special significance for the people of Livingston because on this day in 1802 the first boatload of Garifuna settlers landed in the Río Dulce region of Guatemala. On this occasion there is a soccer tournament in which Garifuna teams from Guatemala, Honduras, and the United States compete against one another. Some of Central America’s most popular Garifuna dancers and musicians also perform on this holiday.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Mayan traditions and beliefs dominate Guatemalan birth rituals. The most important ritual is the burying of the detached placenta. This act of burial is very important because it signifies that the individual is now firmly planted in his or her native soil, which he or she must respect and honor throughout his or her life. It is expected that the person will not become individualistic or self-centered; rather, he or she will remain a part of the community and a true son or daughter of the soil.

✿ COMING OF AGE

The coming-of-age ceremony, known as the quinceaños, is an important family event in Guatemala. It refers to a party hosted to celebrate a girl or boy’s 15th birthday, which is considered the year when children become adults. Both boys and girls wear special jewelry for the occasion, which is later symbolically removed. The boy wears white beads in his hair, and the girl a red shell in her belt, representing her virginity. After this ceremony, the parents may begin contemplating and making plans for the marriage and future life of the child.

When a potential match between a young man and woman is found, the prospective bridegroom’s family hires the services of a professional atanzabab (matchmaker) to study and match the couple’s horoscopes and names to ensure their celestial and earthly compatibility. The matchmaker also negotiates between the couple’s families to fix the dowry (the price the groom will have to pay to the bride’s family) and the period of time for which the groom would have to work for his parents-in-law. This period may vary from five to six years and depends largely on the atanzabab’s negotiating skills.

Once the date of the wedding is finalized, the mother of the bridegroom weaves and embroiders a loincloth decorated with parrot feathers for her son and a skirt and brocaded blouse for her future daughter-in-law. For the guests a meal of turkey, tamales (steamed cornmeal dumplings), beans, potatoes, and tortillas is prepared. During the wedding ceremony the couple prays and receives a blessing from the priest. Traditionally the couple does not exchange a single word until the ceremony is over.

✿ DEATH

As their Mayan ancestors did the Guatemalans treat death as their final journey to heaven. The death of a Mayan woman, however, is treated differently from that of a man. Women approaching middle age start preparations for this final journey long before their actual death. They weave their own burial dresses, which are then carefully stored away until the time of the funeral.

The family and friends of a dying man stay with him throughout his last hours. As soon as he passes away, his children inform all the relatives. Thereafter only the male members of the house join together to make preparations for the funeral, while the women raise the funds for it. The dead person is attired in his finest jewelry and clothes for his final journey to heaven, away from this world. Coffee and aguardiente (alcohol) are served to the guests who come to offer their condolences.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The Republic of Guinea is a former French colony that was granted independence in 1958. In Africa the name guinea is generally used to refer to the west coast of the continent, which lies north of the Gulf of Guinea and south of the Sahara desert. In Berber guinea means “land of the blacks.” Berber is the language of the Berber ethnic group, which is a predominantly Muslim tribe.

Guinea has a long history of foreign rule. Between the 10th and 15th centuries, the region was a source of conflict among many rulers and became a part of the empires of Ghana, Songhai, and Mali, successively. The domination of the Mali Empire lasted for almost 200 years, from the 13th to the 15th centuries. Toward the end of the 15th century, Fulani herders began settling in the region, and they brought with them the teachings of Islam. In 1725 after an Islamic holy war, the region came under Fulani rule.

The Portuguese also made their presence felt in the region about this time and opened the doors for other European powers, principally France and Britain, who turned the region into a major slave-trade center. The Europeans profited immensely by selling black Guineans as slaves.

In 1849 the French declared the region a French protectorate, thus becoming another foreign ruler and adding yet another chapter to Guinea's colonial history. The Guineans, however, made it difficult for the French to maintain control over their country. Samory Touré (c. 1830–1900), a Malinke warlord and great freedom fighter, led his army against the French and fought for Guinea's independence. When he was defeated and captured in 1898 French domination was finally assured. However voices of dissent continued to echo in the Fouta Djallon region.

In the 19th and 20th centuries France entered into negotiations with the British for Sierra Leone and with the Portuguese for their Guinea colony (which is present-day Guinea-Bissau), in order to clarify the boundaries of Guinea. After negotiations the territory of Guinea came into existence, and a governor-general was appointed for administrative purposes.

After World War II the independence movements in Islamic Holy Wars

The growing European presence and intensification of the slave trade in the region sowed the seeds for an Islamic holy war or jihad as Muslim militancy grew in the western desert and Senegambia. Muslims were opposed to foreign domination of the slave trade and the support that some African rulers gave the Europeans. One of the clerics, Nasir-al-Din (d. 1674), wanted to impose an Islamic theocracy on the region and launched a jihad against foreign rulers. Inspired by al-Din's teachings, a Wolof wise man and warrior by the name of Maalik Sy next launched a jihad in 1690 against Europeans in Senegambia and founded the kingdom of Bundu. In 1725 Sy's victory inspired the Muslim revolution in Fouta Djallon against the atrocities of the Jallonke aristocracy. Under the leadership of a devout Muslim named Karamaxo Alfa (d. 1751) the powerful theocratic Islamic state of Fouta Djallon was established.

other African countries inspired the people of Guinea and gave impetus to their own struggle for freedom. Ahmed Sekou Touré (1922–84), a descendant of the famed freedom fighter Samory Touré, became the head of the People's Democratic Party (PDP) and won overwhelmingly in the territorial elections held in 1957. A plebiscite took place in September 1958, and the people of Guinea voted against the proposed membership in the French Community. France withdrew its forces from the region and on October 2, 1958, the independent and sovereign Republic of Guinea came into existence.

Under Ahmed Sekou Touré the country became a one-party dictatorship; all opposition parties were banned. There was widespread corruption, and the economy was soon in a shambles. Human rights violations were rampant, and there was no freedom of expression. Ethnic violence also increased since preference was given to the Malinke people (Touré was of Malinke origin) in hiring, while candidates of other ethnic groups were rejected.

Opposition leaders were imprisoned and dissent was brutally crushed. In 1970 after the Portuguese-led invasion of the Republic of Guinea failed, Sekou Touré became obsessed with the idea that people, both within Guinea as well as in foreign countries, were trying to displace him. As a result relations with both European and other African countries suffered a setback, and Guinea was completely isolated. Sekou Touré's oppressive policies continued, and he displayed an utter disregard for human life. Millions of Guineans were forced into exile, and those within Guinea suffered at the hands of the repressive regime.

On March 26, 1984, Sekou Touré died, and on April 3, 1984, a military junta, led by Lieutenant Colonel Lansana Conté (b. 1934), assumed control of the Republic of Guinea.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the western part of Africa, the Republic of Guinea is flanked by Senegal, Mali, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Côte-d'Ivoire, and the North Atlantic Ocean. Conakry is the capital of the Republic of Guinea.

The Republic of Guinea has a temperate climate, lofty mountains, and high plateaus. Topographically, Guinea is divided into four main regions: Lower Guinea, the narrow coastal belt region; Middle Guinea, which is mostly pastoral highlands; Upper Guinea, characterized by the northern savannah (grasslands dotted with trees); and Forest Guinea, the southeastern rain forest region.

As one of the wettest countries on the African continent, the region's climate is mostly tropical. The coastal regions have substantial rainfall. April and May are the hottest months with temperatures averaging 90°F.

ECONOMY

The Republic of Guinea is richly endowed with minerals, and it is estimated that the country has one-third of the world's bauxite reserves (including substantial deposits of iron, as well as gold, diamonds, and undetermined uranium deposits). Mining is the main source of Guinea's foreign trade, and bauxite alone accounts for 80 percent of the country's foreign revenue. The only hindrance to the country's economic growth is its poor infrastructure, which has proven a major obstacle to attracting foreign investment.

Although the economy suffered immensely under Ahmed Sekou Touré's regime, the economic reforms of the late 1980s provided the much-needed impetus for the economy to get back on track. There is immense potential for agricultural and fishing activity, and if developed properly the revenue from these industries could provide a major stimulus for Guinea's economy.

Guinea is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. Guinean girls are trafficked internally as domestic servants and boys for shoe shining and street vending. Women and girls are trafficked to Côte d'Ivoire, Benin, Senegal, Nigeria, South Africa, Spain, and Greece for sexual exploitation.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In Guinea there are three prominent ethnic groups: the Fulani (also known as Peuhl or Fula), who inhabit Fouta Djallon; the Malinke (also known as Madingo), who inhabit the savannah and forest regions; and the Soussous, the people of the coastal areas. Other ethnic groups of the forest include the Toma and Gerze.

French is the official language of Guinea, but people prefer to speak their native languages.

Malinke is widely spoken in the north while Fula is spoken in the Fouta Djallon region. Sou is spoken in the region south of Conakry.

Almost 85 percent of the Guinean population is Muslim, and 8 percent is Christian. However in the rural areas, ethnic groups still adhere to indigenous beliefs and continue to observe their ancient traditions and spiritual beliefs.

Music is an integral part of Guinean culture. The traditional music is enormously popular, and Guinea has adapted Western musical instruments to play traditional tunes. Western music is also popular. Drumming is the most popular form of music among the tribesmen. Drums are played in all important ceremonies, including those involving rites of passage.

❁ CUISINE

As in most West African countries, rice and maize (corn) are the staples of the traditional Guinean diet. It is often combined with grilled fish or chicken and served with a spicy sauce. Guinea hens are usually seasoned with paprika and cayenne pepper, stewed with plantains, tomatoes, or yams, and served with rice. Pastries, cakes, pizzas, and hamburgers are a part of the urban diet, and French-style patisseries are found all over Conakry.

After the death of Sekou Touré on March 26, 1984, Lt. Col. Lansana Conte led a military coup and seized control of the Republic of Guinea. The Second Republic Anniversary commemorates this change of leadership that ended the oppressive policies of Ahmed Sekou Touré.

After assuming power in 1958 Sekou Touré became a dictator and banned all political parties. Due to poor economic policies and widespread corruption, Guinea's economy deteriorated. Worse, the practice of ethnic discrimination led to ethnic violence all over Guinea. The entire country essentially became a war zone, where human rights violations were the norm, and opponents of the dictatorial regime often met with a cruel end. International relations suffered as a result, and the country was in chaos.

The Second Republic Anniversary pays tribute to all those proponents of democracy who risked or gave their lives to help restore political and economic stability in Guinea.

Cayenne Pepper

Cayenne is a hot red spice derived from the dried fruits of the chili Capsicum frutescens. Cayenne pepper adds zing to recipes, because it contains the substance capsaicin, which is also said to have numerous health benefits including pain reduction, improved blood flow, and the prevention of ulcers. Capsaicin also effectively opens and drains congested nasal passages, and provides a high level of vitamin A to a diet.

The Anniversary of Women's Revolt commemorates a historic revolt led by the women of Guinea in 1977. This event is also known as the "market women's revolt." The year it occurred, President Sekou Touré had passed a law mandating that all agricultural produce be delivered to state-run cooperatives. These corrupt cooperatives were a threat to the livelihoods of many. The new law was a severe blow to small farmers as well as to small vendors of fruits and vegetables. The market women in Conakry were the first to protest this presidential decree, which led to a riot. The revolt quickly spread around the country, culminating in the deaths of the governors of the provinces of Boke, Kindia, and Faranah. It also forced Sekou Touré to legalize small-scale trade.

On August 27, special demonstrations and marches are held by women's organizations in the Republic of Guinea to commemorate the important role played by women in the country.

REFERENDUM DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 28

This holiday commemorates the historic vote by the people of Guinea to expel its French colonizers. Official speeches and military parades mark this historic day.

In order to pacify the freedom fighters in the region the French government held elections in Guinea in 1957. The People's Democratic Party (PDP) won the elections, and Ahmed Sekou Touré became the president of the territory. The French then sent a proposal to the newly elected government, asking them to join the French Community. However the people of Guinea were not willing to settle for anything less than absolute freedom from French rule. When a plebiscite was held on September 28, 1958, the people of Guinea unanimously squashed all French hopes of retaining Guinea by voting in favor of independence. A turning point in Guinea's history, this referendum spelled out the Guinean intentions clearly to the French government. On October 2, 1958, the Republic of Guinea came into existence.

REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 2

The Republic of Guinea came into existence on October 2, 1958. Thus, this day is celebrated as Republic Day or Independence Day in Guinea. Guinea had been under French rule since the middle of the 18th century. The legendary fighter Samory Touré was a warlord of Malinke descent who led the first war for Guinea's independence. He made a brave attempt to oust the French rulers but was captured by them in 1889. His legend inspired millions of Guineans, and the voice of freedom echoed in different parts of the country. At the end of World War II, the French could no longer ignore the voices of dissent and tried to pacify the Guineans by holding elections in 1957. However, in 1958, the French proposal to join the French Community was unanimously rejected by the people of Guinea. Finally, after years of struggle, Guinea was granted its independence on October 2, 1958.

INVASION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 22

Invasion day commemorates the Portuguese-led invasion of the Republic of Guinea on November 22, 1970. The African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde Islands of Guinea (PAIGC) supported the war for independence in Portuguese-controlled Guinea (now Guinea-Bissau). The Portuguese were very displeased with the support given by the Republic of Guinea to these movements.

In 1969 and 1970 attempts were made to assassinate President Sekou Touré, and he accused the Portuguese extremists in neighboring Portuguese Guinea of plotting to kill him. He believed that Portuguese Guinea wanted to bring the Republic of Guinea under its control. This led to the arrest of many Portuguese living in Guinea as well as Guinean political leaders suspected of involvement in the conspiracy.

In retaliation Portuguese Guinea sent its forces to invade independent Guinea and overthrow its president. The Invasion Day holiday commemorates the day these forces entered Conakry and began burning buildings, killing people, and freeing political prisoners. Sekou Touré appealed for UN support; the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and other members of the international community responded by sending in troops and denouncing the invasion. Later evidence revealed that the attack was led by a group of Guinean dissidents and white Portuguese forces.

On this day people pay homage to those who lost their lives in the invasion and to the armed forces of the independent Republic of Guinea, who fought against the invaders.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called Tabaski and the Festival of Sacrifice, is celebrated in honor of (Ibrahim's) Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his own son at God's command and honors his selfless devotion to Allah. On Tabaski Guinean Muslims wake up early and dress in new clothes. Then they accompany their friends and family to the local mosque, where prayers to Allah are offered. Sheep are also sacrificed in commemoration of Abraham's great sacrifice. Elaborate feasts follow.

The holy pilgrimage for Muslims, the hajj, also takes place this month. The Koran, the holy book of the Muslims, has made it mandatory for every Muslim to undertake this journey at least once in his or her lifetime if it is physically and financially feasible.

Tabaski is a national holiday in the Republic of Guinea, and all government, private, and public institutions are closed.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

In remembrance of Jesus' Crucifixion Christians celebrate Good Friday all over the world. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is a day of sorrow and silent prayers. For this reason it is also called Mourning Friday and Black Friday.

Christians in Guinea attend Good Friday services and recall the legacy of Jesus. Plays based on his life and processions reenacting his final journey to Golgotha are also performed on Good Friday.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday following the 40-day period of fasting called Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over as a time of hope and rebirth.

Easter is the most important holiday in the Christian calendar. On Easter special prayer services are held. In Guinea this is an occasion of joy and hope. People bring home-cooked food to Easter Sunday services and have it blessed by the priest.

❁ EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Monday after Easter

The first Monday after Easter is Easter Monday, reinforcing the joyous spirit of the season. Formerly, it was celebrated as a part of Easter Week, but was reduced to a one-day celebration during the 19th century. The events that take place on this day are essentially fun-filled and include egg-rolling competitions and drenching other people with water. Originally holy water, which was used to bless homes and food, was also used for these pranks.

❁ MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

The birthday of Muhammad is celebrated all over the Muslim world as Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi. It falls in the third month of the Islamic year and is an important day for the followers of Islam.

On this day Muslims in Guinea, with their friends and family, offer prayers in honor of the great prophet. His life and teachings are also part of the special inspirational speeches delivered by the imam (a Muslim cleric). The day is festive; cities and towns are beautifully decorated and people greet each other. A traditional meal of meat dishes and sweets is prepared for this occasion, and the evening skies are lit with fireworks.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

Ascension Day is a day of special celebration for Christians all over the world, because it commemorates Jesus' Ascension to heaven 40 days after he rose from the dead on Easter. Devout Christians in Guinea attend Ascension services to pray and greet the day with joy and enthusiasm.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

Assumption Day commemorates the Virgin Mary's Assumption into heaven. According to legend, when she was dying at the age of 73, long after Jesus had ascended to heaven, all the apostles visited with her before her death, all, that is, except St. Thomas, who arrived too late to speak with her. When he did arrive her body could not be found, because she had been raised into heaven. Christians believe that her soul and body were united at Jehoshaphat (Mary's Tomb), and St. Gabriel took Mary's soul to heaven.

On August 15 Guinean Christians attend church and offer prayers to Mary. They thank God for her and celebrate the day with feasting and dancing. This is a legal holiday in Guinea; schools and government offices remain closed.

ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast honoring all the saints of Roman Catholicism, both known and unknown. It is an annual religious celebration that takes place on November 1. It is believed that All Saints' Day celebrations began after Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15) rededicated the Pantheon in Rome to the Blessed Virgin.

The Feast of All Saints' Day has been celebrated on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne (742–814). Later it was declared a “day of obligation” (a required observance for all Catholics) by Louis the Pious (788–840) at the instance of Pope Gregory IV (r. 827–44). In Guinea the devout attend church services and light candles for their favorite saints.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

During the holy month of Ramadan, which precedes Shawwal, a month-long fast is observed each day from dawn until dusk by all Muslims. During the fast the consumption of water and food is strictly prohibited.

Eid al-Fitr means “celebration,” and it is one of two eid festivals in the Islamic religious calendar. (The other is Eid al-Adha.) It marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan, and fasting on this day is strictly forbidden by the Koran.

For Muslims in Guinea, Eid al-Fitr is one of their most important holidays. On this day they rise early, dress in new clothes, and pray at their local mosques. The mood in Guinea is festive as Muslims visit friends and family to greet them and join in celebratory feasting.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians throughout the world because it marks the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe was the Son of God and the savior of humanity. In Guinea Roman Catholic families attend a special Mass on Christmas Eve and celebrate by singing and dancing all night. Christian homes are decorated with balloons and ribbons. On Christmas Day worshippers attend a special prayer service at which the life and teachings of Jesus are remembered. Guineans also visit their friends and relatives and exchange gifts and greetings.

FESTIVAL DE GUINÉE

Observed in: Conakry

Observed by: Guineans

Observed on: April

Festival de Guinée is an annual cultural festival held in the capital city of Conakry. Of recent origin (it began in 2004), this heritage and cultural festival takes place the last week of April. The purpose of the festivities is to highlight the rich cultural heritage of Guinea and to educate and create awareness among Guinean youth about their ancient customs and traditions.

The week-long festivities include traditional dance and music performances, some by Les Ballets Africains, Africa's foremost touring dance company. Having performed all over the world for the past 50 years, the troupe is considered Guinea's goodwill ambassador. There are also exhibits and workshops on traditional Guinean artwork, sculpture, and crafts, as well as tours to some of the most beautiful places in Guinea. Some of these tours visit a tropical paradise called the Loos Islands, an archipelago located near the capital city of Conakry. It consists of three main islands—Kassa, Room, and Fotoba—famous for their white sand beaches.

BIRTH

The birth of a baby is celebrated with great joy and happiness, since a child is considered a gift from God in Guinean society. Although there are no special rituals a lavish feast is prepared, and all the members of the extended family, as well as friends and villagers, are invited to celebrate. Guinean women trust midwives to ensure safe and less painful births.

COMING OF AGE

Female genital mutilation (FGM), or female “circumcision,” continues to be widely practiced in the Republic of Guinea even though it is illegal. Between 70 and 90 percent of Guinean women undergo this ritual either willingly or forcibly, without distinction as to ethnicity, religion, or region. A highly controversial practice, FGM is banned in many countries.

Boys are circumcised either at birth or as a part of an initiation ceremony, with less physical risk and long-term side effects than female genital cutting. Among the Soussou and the Malinke tribes the coming of age ceremonies for male initiates take place during harvest time. A special dance ceremony is arranged, and the initiates, along with the village men, dance joyfully. Their dance movements are inspired by nature and include movements of birds and animals. The dance must reflect grace, strength, beauty, and intelligence since these are the most preferred qualities in African cultures.

❁ MARRIAGE

Bride-price is an integral part of marriage in most West African nations, including Guinea. In most parts of Guinea, it is customary to offer kola nuts, as well as money, as part of the bride price. No negative connotation is attached to this practice. In fact it is believed that the groom's family pays a bride price to the bride's family as a token of appreciation for having brought up and nurtured the bride with affection and care.

A marriage is initiated when the suitor's family sends kola nuts to the bride's family. This serves as a proposal. If the bride's family accepts the nuts, and the bride and her female relatives agree to the proposal, the groom and his family (mostly men from the extended family) are invited to the bride's home. After snacks and beverages are served to welcome the guests, negotiating the bride-price begins. If the suitor's family agrees to pay the price, the couple is officially engaged. If not then the proposal is rejected. After the marriage ceremony the husband can take his wife home, but only if the bride-price has been paid. The bride price, however, is returned to the groom's family after marriage in many parts of the region.

Among the Baga tribe, the bride sits in a hammock after the wedding. It is carried by four men above their heads during the journey from her parent's house to her husband's. People dance in front of the hammock, leading the bride to her new life.

For the 85 percent of the population that is Muslim, the laws of Islam govern their marriages. Free consent of the couple is required under Islamic law, and the marriage ceremony is presided over by an imam. Then in the presence of the fathers of the bride and groom, the priest asks the bride and groom separately if they are willing to accept each other as husband and wife. If the bride and groom agree, then the marriage is deemed legitimate.

Polygamy is practiced in the region and divorce laws favor men.

❁ DEATH

Since most Guineans are Muslims, they bury their dead according to Islamic law and traditional practice. The dead body is washed and draped in a white shroud and taken to the mosque. Prayers are offered for the departed soul and his family. Then villagers bury the dead in the local cemetery. Belief in Allah and reincarnation help Guinean society accept death more easily.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The early history of Guinea-Bissau (prior to its colonial era) is lost in the mists of antiquity, but there is evidence that some of the major ethnic groups of the region, namely the Balanta and Papel, had a conspicuous presence in the area by the 12th century C.E.

A Portuguese traveler named Nuño Tristão (d. 1446) landed in Guinea-Bissau in 1446 from the neighboring colony of Cape Verde. After his arrival Gabu, the largest town in eastern Guinea-Bissau, became a center for facilitating slave trade that was copied from its neighbor Cape Verde. A Portuguese post was established at Bissau in 1687, but the Portuguese claim was disputed by the French and the British; in 1792 the British briefly had a settlement at Bolama. In 1879 the region was constituted as a Portuguese colony. Border disputes with the French were settled by treaty in 1886, but the Portuguese were unable to exercise effective control over the country until 1915.

In 1956 both the neighboring Portuguese colonies got back together to form the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau, while guerilla warfare for attaining independence was on the rise. In 1974 these rebels formed their own government, which some countries recognized, though not Portugal. By April of the same year, a military coup in Portugal increased the chances of freedom for both the colonies. In August the Portuguese government made Guinea-Bissau an independent republic, with Luís Cabral (b. 1931) as president. Premier João Bernardo Vieira (b. 1939) ousted him in a military coup in November 1980. Vieira is known to have accepted the help of the Republic of Guinea and Senegal to suppress a rebellion before his ouster. However he too was eventually overthrown in 1999 for unsatisfactory leadership and his failure to end poverty in the country. After about a year of military rule a former teacher and the opposition leader Kumba Ialá (b. 1953) of the Social Renovation Party (PRS) was elected president. Ideally this democracy should have lasted, but it did not. Ialá is said to have become very authoritative.

In 2003 the chief of defense General Verríssimo Correia Seabra (1947–2004) led the army in a coup to depose Ialá, who “volunteered” his resignation simultaneously. While Ialá was kept under house arrest a 25-member Committee for Restoration of Democracy and Constitutional Order was created. A popular businessman Henrique Rosa (b. 1946) was elected president in September 2003, and Artur Sanha (b. 1965; president of PRS) was made the prime minister. Following legislative elections held in March 2004 under international observation, Carlos Gomes Júnior (b. 1949) became the prime minister. After six months ex-president Kumba Ialá was freed from house arrest in March 2004. He vowed to return to active politics, much to the dismay of the ruling party.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Bordering the Atlantic Ocean, Guinea-Bissau shares borders with Guinea to the south and Senegal to the north. The mainland part of the country is a low-lying region of rain forests, swamps, and mangrove-covered marshlands with the savannah (tropical grasslands) toward the east. The Bijagos Islands (a group of 25 islands), which stretch 30 miles into the Atlantic Ocean, are considered an extension of the main landmass. One-third of Guinea-Bissau has been washed away by floods, while the lowest areas have been covered by high tides.

Guinea-Bissau has a hot and humid tropical climate. Rains last from June to November along with southwesterly winds, while the dry season lasts from December to May, accompanied by the northeasterly Harmattan winds.

❁ ECONOMY

As one of the 10 poorest countries of the world, Guinea-Bissau has paid a heavy price for its civil wars and internal political disturbances. For instance during the 1998 civil war, the gross domestic product (GDP) dropped by a drastic 28 percent, though it was partially recovered in the following years.

Perhaps the biggest problem of the country's economy lies in its extremely unequal income distribution. The country is making use of the African Development Bank debt relief and the World Bank to solve its economic problems. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) and other international agencies have also been trying to reshape the economy by energizing the private sector.

Most of the land is state-owned, limiting growth prospects for entrepreneurs. Utilizing offshore oil reserves would help the country's economy in the long run. However, petroleum, mineral, and phosphate deposits remain unexplored due to high costs involved in exploiting them.

Farming and fishing are the two major com-

Bijagos Islands

The Bijagos archipelago can be safely assumed to be Guinea-Bissau's most precious ecological zone. It is actually a biosphere reserve of international recognition and protection efforts. Draped in mangroves and tropical beaches, these 25 islands are some of Guinea-Bissau's most visited spots. The island of Bolama will also be extended into the biosphere under UNESCO's World Heritage List. The Orango island group forms a national park that harbors saltwater crocodiles, hippos, birds in palm trees, and woodlands. The islanders do not venture out much, so the wilderness has retained its pristine form, although Caravela has an airstrip for travelers' benefit.

mercial activities of the country, with cashew nut exports providing the bulk of foreign exchange earnings. In fact Guinea-Bissau is the sixth largest cashew exporter in the world. During the 1998 political disturbances, the country's cashew export had declined by 30 percent, damaging the economy drastically. Fish, seafood, peanuts, timber, and palm kernels constitute the other important exports. Rice, beans, corn, cassava (manioc), and cotton are the domestically consumed crops.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The country has been divided into nine administrative zones. Bissau is the largest city and also the capital. Cacheu, Oio, Gabu, and Bolama are the major towns. Most people are farmers with traditional religious beliefs (animism) with about 45 percent Muslims and a few Christians.

The basic ethnic groups of Guinea-Bissau include the Fulani, the Mandinka (Muslims inhabiting the north and northeast), the Balanta, and the Papel (residing in the southern coastal regions), the

Harmattan Winds

The Harmattan winds blow over the Sahara desert, picking up fine dust particles during the months of December, January, and February. Blowing over the Sahel region (that semi-arid section of Africa between the Sahara to the north and the savannahs to the south that encompasses Niger, Burkina Faso, Mauritania, Chad and other grassland-rich areas in their vicinity), these winds greatly reduce visibility. These winds are common in many other African countries. They are hot, dry, and dusty and often reduce visibility to less than 50 feet. In fact air traffic comes to a halt until these winds have ceased.

Manjaca, and the Mancanha, who occupy the central and the northern coastal regions. The official language is Portuguese, while Crioulo (or Kriolu, a mix of Portuguese and local words) is widely spoken along with other African languages.

❁ CUISINE

The staple foods here are cassava, yams, and maize, all an integral part of every meal. Additionally, almost any kind of meat, fish, vegetable, or spice can be added. Guinea Bisseau's specialties include Jollof Rice (a festive one-pot dish served with a variety of ingredients throughout West Africa), chicken, and fish dishes. There are many regional variations of Jollof Rice, depending on where it is cooked. However, the common basic ingredients are rice, tomatoes and tomato paste, onion, salt, and red pepper.

Imported brews and drinks are easily available, though the local flavors like caña (120-proof rum) made from palm tree sap and caña de cajeu (cashew rum from cashew nut fruit pulp) are widely consumed.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Families and friends get together to celebrate New Year's Eve. This is the time for making New Year's resolutions. New Year's Day brings joy and cheer to people and is one of the most popular public holidays in the world. Most people take a day off and spend time with family and friends. Guineans celebrate it with lots of good food and dance, whether indoors or on the beaches.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

Women have to play an effective role in each sphere of life. This day celebrates the strength and the increasing need for active women in many countries of the world. There are seminars and meetings held on this day in Guinea-Bissau to underscore the importance of women in society. Discourses and discussions take place on the role of women and their rights in all areas of society.

❁ LABOR DAY

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called Feast of Sacrifice and Tabaski, commemorates the end of the holy pilgrimage called hajj (mandatory for every Muslim, if possible, once in his or her lifetime) along with Ibrahim's (Abraham's) sacrifice. Abraham unquestioningly agreed to sacrifice his son because God commanded him to. And God rewarded Abraham's faith by substituting a ram for the boy. Celebrations of this day in Guinea-Bissau are quite similar to those practiced by Muslims elsewhere and include sacrificing lambs and other cattle, praying at the mosques, and exchanging sweets and feasting.

Observed in: Bissau

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Monday and Tuesday before Lent

During this two-day, high-spirited festival, the Guineans wear fantastic multicolored masks and costumes and dance to the accompaniment of some modern popular tunes. Sharks, hippos, bulls (made with real horns), and sawfish are the most common shapes for the masks. The celebrations are of the pre-Lenten type, most commonly seen in Latin cultures and exhibit an interesting mix of African and Catholic rituals and beliefs. Although the biggest show is at the capital, Bissau, Carnivals are also held at other towns on a much smaller scale.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Guinea-Bissau about 50 percent of the women undergo the coming-of-age operation of genital cutting (or female genital mutilation, FGM), and both clitoridectomy and excision are widely practiced, although the practice has decreased to between 20 and 30 percent in urban areas. FGM is widespread among the Fulani and Mandinka. There is no legislation specifically prohibiting the practice, and in 1995 a proposal to outlaw FGM was defeated. The Guinea-Bissau Assembly, however, approved a proposal to hold practitioners criminally responsible if a woman dies as a result of FGM.

❁ MARRIAGES

The Balanta are one of the major ethnic groups of Guinea-Bissau. The people of this tribe are basically hunters who raise cattle for beef. When it comes to their rites of passage, these groups organize big dance parties. They wear fantastic costumes and colored masks. There are a number of activities associated with such occasions: For instance there is a Sunungal ballet that describes the wedding of the prince of Mini-Ndame (a kingdom). All the villagers bring their daughters to the wedding. They dance and vie for the prince's attention. The prince then chooses his bride and the celebration continues.

The masks are of utmost importance when it comes to such occasions in terms of spiritual and family connections. Here for instance the dance masks are large and laden with cowry shells. There is an old woman's mask, a young girl's mask, and a young man's mask. In the Balanta tradition, after the marriage the bride remains in her house for an entire month. Seven days after the marriage the newlywed woman has to be washed. It is a ritual that takes place at dawn, and it begins with a woman's ululations (a high-pitched sound made while simultaneously moving the tongue rapidly from side to side) waking up the entire village, followed by the beating of drums. This is a sign that all the men and male teenagers must leave the village until sundown, because the women are gathering for sacred rites.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The original inhabitants of Guyana were Carib Indians. The Dutch East India Company arrived in Guyana in 1615, followed by the English and the French. Although all of them made their own colonies in the region, the Dutch settlements were originally more dominant. Eventually, however, Britain managed to seize control of the Dutch colonies, and Guyana was renamed British Guiana in 1831. The British established sugar and tobacco plantations west of the Suriname River, but when slavery was abolished in 1834, many plantations were abandoned. So the British, looking for another cheap source of labor, shipped workers in from India, and almost 250,000 laborers from India were sent to Guyana from 1846 to 1917.

British Guiana became a crown colony in 1928 and was granted home rule in 1953. In 1950 under the leadership of Dr. Cheddi Jagan (1918–97), an Indo-Guyanese, the colony's first political party, called the Progressive People's Party (PPP), was formed; its aim was to liberate Guyana. In 1961 the British granted partial autonomy to Guyana, and Dr. Jagan became the prime minister of the country. In 1966 Guyana achieved independence. Four years later in February 1970, it became a cooperative republic within the Commonwealth and thereby cut all ties with the British. Once independent, British Guiana was renamed Guyana.

After independence the first few decades saw racial unrest and disturbance between the Indians and the Africans of Guyana. Although the Guyanese are largely a peace-loving population, racial conflicts between the Indo-Guyanese and the Afro-Guyanese erupted in 1962–64 and then again after the elections in 1997 and 2001. Racial tensions are still a sensitive issue in Guyana.

Guyana was engaged in territorial and border disputes with Venezuela and Suriname in 2000. The dispute between Suriname and Guyana over the ownership of an oil-rich coastal area remains unresolved.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Guyana is flanked by Suriname, Venezuela, Brazil, and the Atlantic Ocean. In terms of area Guyana is the third smallest country in South America. The terrain of Guyana consists of rolling highlands, marshy coast, low-lying plains, thick rain forests, and savannah (areas dotted with trees). The highest point of Guyana is Mount Roraima, which stands 9,220 feet high. The longest rivers that flow through Guyana are the Berbice, the Demerara, the Essequibo, and the Corentyne.

Guyana enjoys a tropical climate and remains hot and humid throughout the year. There are two rainy seasons in Guyana: from May to mid-August and from mid-November to mid-January. Average temperatures range between 75°F and 88°F. In terms of flora Guyana is home to thick forests of trees like bamboo and mangroves, and flowering plants like yellow hibiscus and ginger lily flowers. Fauna are represented by a wide variety of birds, reptiles, and mammals such as ocelots, tapirs, and monkeys.

❁ ECONOMY

Guyana has a moderate economy that is struggling with chronic problems such as lack of skilled labor and inadequate infrastructure. Agriculture is the backbone of its economy; the main crops include wheat, rice, sugar, vegetables, and fruits. The fishing industry is another significant contributor to the nation's gross domestic product (GDP). In addition Guyana has rich deposits of mineral resources like gold, diamonds, and bauxite, and many deposits remain untapped. Some of the major export items of the country are gold, diamonds, and bauxite, as well as rum, timber, shrimp, rice, sugar, and molasses.

Another problem that the country must confront is the trafficking of human beings for sexual exploitation and forced labor. Guyana is a country of origin, transit, and destination for young women and children trafficked primarily for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

Guyana has begun to make good progress recently through the enactment of antitrafficking legislation, improvements in government coordination, and aggressive public awareness campaigns. With the help of international organizations, the government of Guyana has also introduced a number of progrowth economic policies that are focused on the development of agriculture and mining activities.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Guyana has a diverse cultural heritage that is influenced by various ethnic groups and is home to East Indians, Amerindians, Chinese, blacks, whites, and people of mixed race.

It is a multilingual society; some of the languages that are widely spoken in Guyana include English, dialects of Amerindian languages, Creole, Hindi, and Urdu. Over 50 percent of the Guyanese population follows Christianity, but the country is also home to Hindus and Muslims as well as people of other faiths.

The Guyanese love sports, and beach cricket (an informal version of the game) and football (soccer) are favorite outdoor games. Dominoes and boxing are equally popular indoor games.

Queh Queh songs are traditional Guyanese folk songs that are sung during weddings—usually the night before the wedding—by older people. Other folk songs sung by the ethnic Guyanese include boat songs, love songs, Amerindian songs (emphasizing the hunting skills of ethnic tribes), and “ring play songs” that are sung by children, usually in the rural areas on nights when the Moon is full. They are referred to as “ring play songs,” because the singers sit in a circle, and the lead singer sits in the middle of the circle. Sometimes even adults sing these songs during wakes or weddings.

Many Guyanese enjoy Caribbean music and dance, while the East Indian community enjoys their traditional folk songs and dances like the kathak (a classical dance that narrates the stories from religious literature), the bhangra (a folk dance of the Indian state of Punjab performed at the time of harvest), and the giddha (a folk dance performed by the women of Punjab’ they also sing about the woes, happiness, and loves of their life while dancing).

Some noted Guyanese literary figures include the poet A. J. Seymour, novelist Wilson Harris, and historian Walter Rodney.

❁ CUISINE

The Guyanese diet is greatly influenced by Indian and Chinese cuisine. It features a wide variety of Indian curries, a soft flat bread known as roti, seafood, garlic pork (a traditional Portuguese dish), meat, vegetable stew, and cooked vegetables, mashed potatoes, and pepper pot, a spicy stew that is cooked in the juice extracted from cassava (manioc). Popular beverages include wine, beer, rum, whisky, brandy, and fruit punches.

Fun Fact

Guyana is the only South American country in which English is the official language.

Fun Fact

In Guyana, there is little friction between Muslims and Hindus because neither attempts to convert the other's members, and Christians and Muslims take part in the other's festivals in some rural areas.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 designates the beginning of the Western (or Gregorian) calendar and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world with revelry that often begins the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Guyana on New Year's Eve, parties are organized throughout the country to usher in the new year with great joy and enthusiasm. Singing, dancing, feasting, and champagne are integral to these celebrations. As the countdown begins for the arrival of the new year, people pour champagne in their glasses and as the clock strikes 12, they raise a toast for the coming year and wish each other happiness and prosperity. After partying until the wee hours on New Year's Eve, people spend New Year's Day at home with the family.

REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 23

Guyana declared itself a republic on February 23, 1970, after gaining independence from the United Kingdom. This date also begins Mashramani, the Arawak name for "celebrations after successful cooperative effort." Previously Mashramani was celebrated on May 26, in conjunction with Guyana's Independence Day. However heavy rains in May interfered with the celebrations, so the government decided to combine Mashramani with Republic Day.

On February 23, the president presides over Republic Day celebrations that include flag-raising ceremonies and speeches in the capital city. Then an elaborate parade of people dressed in colorful costumes and accompanied by steel bands, string bands, and costumed bands sing joyful songs as they march through the streets of Georgetown. Finally a spectacular display of fireworks, greeted with loud cheers and applause, concludes the Republic Day celebrations.

Mashramani is observed throughout the country with week-long festivities. The major highlight of Mashramani is the Miss Mash Contest. This takes place at the regional level during the week and culminates on February 23, when the regional winners of the beauty contest assemble in the capital of Georgetown for the final judging.

Musical events are an integral part of this carnival-like celebration, and a number of competitions like calypso competitions (for adults and children), sports events, street-band competitions, and musical talent searches are also held. Masquerade bands play nonstop music during the festivities, displaying their dancing and musical skills in competitions held at the National Park in Georgetown. Finally a spectacular display of fireworks, greeted with loud cheers and applause, concludes the Republic Day celebrations.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in their nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

On Labor Day trade unions organize workers' rallies throughout Guyana to express their concerns about issues affecting the workforce in the country. In the capital of Georgetown workers and leaders of trade unions gather at Kaieteur National Park; often the president of Guyana, along with the union leaders, addresses the nation's workers. After the rally the workers are treated to special music and refreshments, either at their places of employment or at the labor union headquarters.

INDIAN HERITAGE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 5

After slavery was abolished here in 1834 Britain began encouraging the emigration of Indians and other people from Asia in order to have access to cheap labor. This day celebrates the first arrival of East Indians in Guyana on May 5, 1838, and is also known as Indian Arrival Day. It honors the immense contribution the Indian community has made to the development of Guyana.

On this day Guyanese Indians hold a variety of cultural events and celebrations presided over by the prime minister. These begin with a ceremonial lamplighting and singing devotional songs. Some of the highlights of the celebrations are performances of Indian classical and folk dances including the kathak, bhangra, and the ghidda. The celebrants also sing folk songs from other parts of India. Cultural troupes from India and Guyana entertain the audience with their performances and renditions of classical and popular Indian music.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 26

On May 26, 1966, Guyana obtained its independence from British rule. Since 1831 the region, formerly known as British Guiana, had been under British domination, and ethnic tribes such as the Arawak and the Carib were enslaved and forced to work on British plantations. Britain abolished slavery here in 1834, so it was not until the early 1950s that Guyanese political parties started nationwide protests and demonstrations protesting British rule and demanding independence. The British forces tried to crush the voices of protest, but they could not dampen the Guyanese's desire to obtain total independence.

On this historic day the president of Guyana raises the national flag in the capital of Georgetown and gives a ceremonial speech. People share stories about the period of enslavement during British rule and about the struggle for freedom. They emphasize the importance of freedom and honor all the patriots who lost their lives during the independence struggle.

❁ CARICOM DAY

Observed on: July 4

CARICOM Day commemorates the signing of the Treaty of Chaguaramas on July 4, 1973, which established the Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM). The goals of CARICOM are to protect the cultural heritage of the Caribbean region and provide an economic link among English-speaking countries in the Caribbean.

Guyana was one of the four signatories of the original treaty (the other three were Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago, and Jamaica), so CARICOM Day has been celebrated here ever since. Holiday observances include official gatherings, speeches, and cultural events that represent the Caribbean way of life. On this day, the prime minister of Guyana participates in celebrations organized by the government in honor of CARICOM Day. Other events include performances of Caribbean music and dance.

❁ LIBERTY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 1

Liberty Day, also known as Freedom Day or Emancipation Day, commemorates the abolition of slavery throughout the British Empire (including Guyana, which was known as British Guiana) on August 1, 1834.

Religious Holidays

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called the Feast of Sacrifice and the Greater Bairam, is a very important festival for Muslims all over the world. It was on this auspicious day that Ibrahim (Abraham) submitted to God's will and agreed to sacrifice his young son. At the last minute God spared Ibrahim's son and substituted a ram for the sacrifice. Muslims honor Ibrahim for his willingness to do God's will.

On this day Muslims in Guyana go to their local mosques to greet each other and pray. Also goats that are defect-free are sacrificed, and some of the meat is distributed among family members, neighbors, and poor people. The bones of the animal are buried, and the skin is disposed of in the manner dictated by the Koran. Also a sewain (a sweet noodle casserole) is prepared on this day and shared with friends and relatives.

The month in which this holiday is celebrated is also the time when many Muslims undertake their annual pilgrimage (or hajj) to Mecca. It is the aspiration of every Muslim to go to the sacred city once in his or her lifetime if it is physically and financially possible to do so.

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: March–April

Holi, or Phagwah, the Hindu Festival of Colors, is celebrated over a two-day period either in March or April, depending on the Hindu lunar calendar. The origin of the festival is traced to a Hindu myth that tells the story of a demon king named Hiranyakashipu and his young son Prahalad. Hiranyakashipu was granted a boon by Lord Brahma (the Hindu god regarded as the creator of the universe) who made him almost invincible. Assuming that he would never be killed and would live for eternity, he proclaimed himself God and banned worship of any other deities. He also forced his subjects to worship him as God, and any defiance met with a gruesome fate. However his young son Prahalad was an ardent worshipper of Lord Vishnu (the caretaker of the universe), and although Prahalad respected his father, he refused to worship him as God. This angered Hiranyakashipu, and so he sentenced his own son to death. However his attempts to kill his son failed, as Lord Vishnu came to Prahalad's rescue each time.

Eventually Hiranyakashipu sought the assistance of his sister Holika, who was granted a favor by Lord Brahma that made her immune to fire. But Lord Brahma also told her that if she used this favor for any evil purpose, the fire would destroy her. Holika did not pay attention to Lord Brahma's instructions and decided to use her special powers to help her brother get rid of Prahalad. On full Moon night in spring Holika sat on a pyre with Prahalad in her lap and asked Hiranyakashipu's soldiers to set the pyre on fire. But Lord Vishnu's blessings protected Prahalad, and he escaped unhurt, while Holika perished. Since then Holi has been celebrated among the Hindus as the victory of good over evil.

There is great enthusiasm for this festival among Hindus in Guyana. On the night of the full Moon before Holi, they gather around a huge bonfire that symbolizes the burning of Holika (or evil), and they sing traditional songs. They also invite non-Hindu Guyanese to join in the festivities by throwing colored powder on them. Music is an integral part of the celebrations. Guyana's Hindus dance

Hindu and Muslim holidays were not officially recognized in Guyana until the 1970s.

Fun Fact

In Guyana some Muslim and Hindu religious observances are public holidays—Eid al-Adha, Eid al-Fitr, Mouloud, Diwali, and Holi, respectively—although both are minority religions.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Black Friday, falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent, a 40-day period of fasting and abstinence. It is observed in most parts of the world to commemorate the trial and Crucifixion of Jesus. This is a day of mourning and sorrow throughout the Christian world. On Good Friday in Guyana Christians attend a prayer service and take part in readings from the Bible that narrate the events related to Jesus' Crucifixion. Many devout Guyanese Christians observe the fast that starts on Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent) and lasts until Good Friday); others observe a partial fast on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days following his death on the Cross, so it is sometimes called Resurrection Day. This day is central to the Christian liturgical calendar because the fundamental teaching of Christianity maintains that Jesus, through his death, freed all his followers from the penalty of sin.

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Both the name of the observance and many of its symbols were taken from ancient European pagan festivals, which celebrated the return of spring and the rebirth of nature. The holiday's name is based on the Germanic fertility goddess Eostre, and both eggs and rabbits were symbols of fertility linked to her observances.

In Guyana devout Christians attend a special Easter service and celebrate Jesus' rebirth with great joy and enthusiasm. Thousands flock to Bartica, Guyana, where various events take place including speedboat racing, music, and a rodeo. During the rodeo, vaqueros (aspiring matadors) test their skills on wild bulls and horses amid cheers from the crowd.

EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Monday following Easter Sunday

The first Monday after Easter is Easter Monday. In Guyana skies are filled with colorful kites of all shapes and sizes, and people compete to fly their kites higher than others and for a longer period of time. As the day nears an end people tie wishes or prayers to their kites; as the kites fly higher, they cut the strings, hoping that the kites will carry their messages to God.

MOULOUD

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, third month of the Islamic calendar

The birthday of Muhammad, the holy prophet of the Muslims, falls in the third month of the Islamic year and is known as Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi, and in Guyana, as Yaum an Nabi. For Muslims all over the world, this is a day of great joy and celebrations as Muhammad is the most revered prophet. On this day Guyanese Muslims offer special prayers in honor of Muhammad and thank Allah for his benevolence in sending them his messenger. Also people read about the life of Muhammad and seek inspiration from his unwavering faith in Allah.

DIWALI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Five days from the 13th of the waning half (Krishna Paksha) of the lunar month Asvina to the second of the waxing half (Shukla Paksha) of Karttika

Diwali, also called Deepawali and Divali, is the Hindu Festival of Lights. It commemorates the coronation of Lord Rama (a Hindu god and one of the ten incarnations of Lord Vishnu), the king of Ayodhya, on his return to his kingdom after 14 years in exile. It also celebrates his victory over the evil forces represented by Ravana, the king of Lanka. According to the Hindu epic, Ramayana, the people of Ayodhya were so happy about Rama's return that the entire kingdom was lit with beautiful lamps to greet Lord Rama, his wife Sita, and his brother Lakshmana on their return and also to show them the way to the palace in the darkness of the night.

Diwali falls in the Hindu month of Karttika, which corresponds to either October or November in the Western calendar. Among northern Indians it also marks the beginning of the Hindu new year.

In Guyana, Hindus and non-Hindus alike celebrate Diwali enthusiastically. Hindus make special sweets and distribute them among friends. They also exchange gifts and greetings, wear new clothes, and decorate their homes with traditional clay lamps and electric lighting to dispel darkness. After offering prayers to the goddess Lakshmi (the goddess of wealth and prosperity), Hindus celebrate Diwali by lighting firecrackers.

However the most anticipated events are the annual Diwali motorcade and the illumination of thousands of clay lamps known as diyas along the streets of Georgetown. Diwali literally means “row of lamps,” and the light produced symbolizes the elimination of spiritual darkness.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, also called the Lesser Bairam, designates the end of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan. During Ramadan Muslims all over the world observe a month-long fast. The fast lasts from dawn until dusk every day. The consumption of food and water is strictly forbidden during this period.

Both Muslims and non-Muslims celebrate Eid al-Fitr with joy and enthusiasm in Guyana. Devout Muslims wake up early in the morning and enjoy a light meal. Muslim homes are decorated with beautiful lights, and little children also receive money. Then they put on new clothes and go to their local mosques to pray. They greet each other at the mosque and make donations of money. They also distribute food and clothing to the needy.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they regard as the Son of God. In Guyana, official celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24) and last until Boxing Day (December 26). However businesses start decorating their offices in mid-November, while homeowners begin cleaning and decorating their homes in early December.

On Christmas Eve Guyanese decorate their Christmas trees and get the presents and cards ready for Christmas. Roman Catholics in Guyana attend a Midnight Mass and celebrate Jesus’ birth with devotional hymns and carols. On Christmas Day people visit friends and family members and exchange gifts and greetings. It is commonly believed in Guyana that Santa Claus visits Guyanese children and gives them gifts, sweets, and candies. A lavish meal is prepared for Christmas that includes pepper pot, cakes, candies, and puddings, along with wine and other beverages. Children love a sweet beverage prepared from the fruits of the sorrel plant.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day is celebrated the day after Christmas. Most of the countries that were formerly under British rule continue to observe this holiday. The name Boxing Day is probably derived from the age-old tradition of distributing the money from church collection boxes to the poor on the day after Christmas. Another possibility is that the name refers to the British practice of presenting servants with their gifts the day after Christmas.

In Guyana, people either visit friends or family members or spend the day at home.

❁ BARTICA REGATTA

Observed in: Bartica

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Easter Week

During Easter Week, the city of Bartica plays host to a wide variety of events to celebrate Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead. Every year thousands flock here to take part in the festivities.

The regatta transforms Bartica into a huge amusement park, complete with games, food stalls, and exciting activities. For adventure lovers Bartica offers speedboat racing, while for sports enthusiasts there are cricket and boxing matches. The Miss Bartica Beauty Pageant attracts thousands of young and beautiful women from all over Guyana. The most awaited event is the rodeo, where vaqueros (would-be matadors) test their skills on wild bulls and horses to the cheers of the crowds.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Ethnic Guyanese are extremely superstitious. They believe that when a bird called a belly-mema whistles, it means that there is a pregnant woman in the village. They also believe that two pregnant women should not walk together unless one of them is carrying a piece of stick in her hand or their babies will die. Nor should a pregnant woman walk past a fire because her baby will be born cockeyed.

In order to ward off evil spirits after the birth of a child, the mother must keep a Bible and a pair of scissors under the child’s pillow. To protect the child from the evil eyes of people, a blue cloth with asafetida (a gum made from the resin of Asian plants) wrapped inside it should be tied around the child’s hand. Care must be taken while breast-feeding since any breast milk that falls on a boy's penis will make him impotent.

MARRIAGE

Queb Queb songs are traditional Guyanese folk songs that older people sing the night before a wedding. These songs discuss the bride and groom's suitability for marriage, advise them on matrimonial affairs, and make jokes about their sexual skills.

Christians in Guyana solemnize their marriage in a church. On the day of the wedding, an elderly relative of the woman bathes her and dresses her in an ordinary dress. The bride is then escorted to a friend's house to elude evil spirits that might try to possess her. At her friend's place the bride changes into her wedding gown and gets ready for her wedding. Tradition dictates that the bride avoid looking back while leaving the house lest she catch the attention of any wandering evil spirit. Before the bride drives away, rice and old shoes are thrown over her car to protect her from any harm and to wish her prosperity in her married life. The bride is driven straight to the church without stopping anywhere.

At the church the groom and his wedding party greet the bride, who is escorted to the altar by her father or guardian. When the couple is invited by the priest to exchange their wedding vows, the bride rises before her husband. The Guyanese believe that the person who rises first will die first, and every Guyanese bride hopes to protect her husband's life at any cost. Once the couple has exchanged wedding vows and rings, they are united in matrimony and are congratulated by the assembled family members, friends, and guests.

A big reception follows the wedding. Singing, dining, drinking, and dancing are all part of the celebrations. After the reception the bridesmaid who receives the bride's handkerchief is believed to be the one who will marry next. The couple is expected to leave the reception hall before their guests. The bride is supposed to dance her way to the exit of the reception hall either with the groom or one of her male relatives. Elderly relatives of the bride do the household chores for her for the first three days after marriage.

DEATH

When someone dies in Guyana, all the paintings and pictures in the house are covered with cloth or are turned toward the wall. The house is not cleaned until the coffin of the deceased is taken to the cemetery. Most Guyanese bury their dead in a solemn ceremony. However to prevent the soul of the deceased (known as the jumbie) from wandering and haunting people, mourners either put mustard or corn seeds inside the coffin or place an object that the deceased liked the most when living in its hand. The needle that was used to stitch the white shroud of the deceased is also placed in the coffin.

After burial people stop at unfamiliar places to mislead the jumbie and prevent it from following them home. To confuse the jumbie if it follows them, people leave their shoes at the entrance of their homes and enter the house barefoot. To keep the jumbie of their husbands away, widows wear blue napkins for 40 days and nights.

Hindu Guyanese cremate their dead.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

On December 6, 1492, Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) discovered Hispaniola, the island referred to as Quisqueya (name in use even now) and Aytí or Hayti (“land of mountains”) by its Taino and Carib inhabitants, related to the Arawak Indians. Columbus renamed it La Isla Ispanola (“the Spanish Island”), which was subsequently abbreviated to Hispaniola.

Columbus’s expedition had established a settlement, but when the Spaniards returned they found it destroyed by the Caribs, the native people. Hispaniola was finally colonized in the late 15th century, and the spread of new diseases introduced by the Spaniards, in conjunction with the harsh treatment the Spanish meted out, led to the near-annihilation of the Carib population within 25 years. The menace of French and British pirates in the 1630s, however, led the Spanish to cede the western third of the island to France in 1697. Spain had named the entire island Santo Domingo, and the French adapted it to Saint-Domingue (present-day Haiti).

Under French rule the country was known as the “pearl of the Antilles,” and it flourished with sugar and coffee plantations as well as logging. The labor for these ventures was made possible by the large number of African slaves brought to the island. Between the white colonists and the African slaves, there was another social stratum—the mulattos, the offspring of the two. People of mixed African and European ancestry have remained a minority, and Africans continue to dominate the population mix.

News of the French Revolution of 1789 inspired revolts by the slaves when they realized that the new rules of equality being promoted in France would not apply to them. Free Africans on the island, however, were able to claim French citizenship under the Revolution’s Declaration of the Rights of Man. Dutty Boukman, a Vodun priest and a slave, was the hero of the major slave revolt of 1791, even though the French decapitated him hoping, thereby, to discourage the rebels. In 1793 slavery was abolished, largely to enlist the slaves’ help in fighting off British invaders.

Once the British had been turned back, there were indications that slavery was about to be reenforced. The ensuing rebellion culminated in the declaration of independence in 1801 by Pierre-Dominique Toussaint l'Ouverture (1745–1803), a Haitian revolutionary, and the defeat of French forces by troops led by Jean-Jacques Dessalines (? 1758–1806) on November 18, 1803. Dessalines declared Saint-Domingue independent and renamed it Haiti on January 1, 1804. This was the world's first black republic and the first to be led by a person of African ancestry. Jacques Dessalines's assassination in 1806 triggered major political unrest in Haiti, and the country has never enjoyed a stable political climate.

Throughout the 19th century Haiti was politically isolated and left to its own resources except for the economic interest shown by Western capitalists. Since its independence early in the 19th century, a succession of opportunistic dictators has left the populace destitute and without direction. This isolation provided a pretext for the U.S. invasion of Haiti in 1915, and the country became a colony again, if not in name certainly in practice. Jean Vilbrun Guillaume-Sam (d. 1915), for example, the fifth president in as many years, lasted only six months as president of Haiti. Guillaume-Sam had led the revolts that brought assassinated President Cincinnatus Leconte (1854–1912) to power and the one that brought down President Oreste Zamor (1861–1915). He became president when his predecessor Joseph Davilmar Théodore (1847–1917), was forced to resign when he could not pay the cacao workers of his militia in the overthrow of Zamor.

In his turn, Guillaume-Sam faced a revolt led by Rosalvo Bobo (1873–1929), but reacted so violently that he enraged the wealthier mulatto population, who revolted. Guillaume-Sam fled to the French embassy, but the rebels seized the embassy and found him hiding in a toilet. They threw his limp body over the embassy's iron fence, where it was impaled. His body was then ripped apart, and the pieces were paraded through the capital. When news of the murder reached Washington, President Woodrow Wilson (1856–1924), with the United States embroiled in World War I, ordered the Marines to seize the capital, claiming that the turmoil could provide Germany with an opportunity to gain a foothold in the hemisphere. The U.S. occupation of Haiti lasted 19 years, and the country was governed by U.S. Marines. Representatives from the United States wielded veto power over all governmental decisions in Haiti, and Marine Corps commanders served as administrators in the provinces. Local institutions, however, continued to be run by Haitians, as was required under policies put in place during the presidency of Woodrow Wilson.

In the 1950s François "Papa Doc" Duvalier (1907–71), a medical doctor, teamed up with a powerful union leader Daniel Fignolé (1914–86) to form the Mouvement Ouvriers Paysans (MOP) party. Both men wanted to be president, but Fignolé was elected in 1957. He occupied his office, however, just 18 days, before Duvalier overthrew him and began his nearly 30-year reign. By 1964 Papa Doc was Haiti's dictator. When he suddenly died in 1971, his 19-year-old son Jean-Claude Duvalier ("Baby Doc") took over. Although there was some easing of government control, there were no radical changes, and Haiti muddled along as an isolated nation.

In 1986 with increasing public dissatisfaction and unrest, Baby Doc fled to France in 1986, leaving the country still impoverished and without commercial development. The United States installed a military regime after Duvalier's departure, with General Henri Namphy (b. 1932) at its head. Once again, however, the promised constitution failed to materialize and the process of democratization was never begun. When Namphy stepped down in 1990, Jean-Bertrand Aristide (b. 1953) became president, the first to be elected in a free democratic election. After proposing an increase in the minimum wage, starting a vigorous literacy campaign and reducing human rights violations, a military coup funded by Haiti's wealthy elite succeeded in overturning the Aristide government.

Again the United States intervened, and Aristide was returned to the presidency in 1994. But there was not much of a country remaining. There was no infrastructure, the economy was in chaos, and more than 4,000 people had been killed. Unable to run immediately for reelection, Aristide stepped aside and started a new political party, Fanmi Lavalas (the Family Lavalas Party; FLP). Although the FLP won more than 50 percent of the vote in 2000, the opposition parties protested the results and refused to take part in runoff elections. Aristide won easily again, but the opposition refused to grant legitimacy to his administration.

Aristide took office again in 2001, but he was overthrown in 2004 in a coup supported by the United States, France, and Canada and driven into exile again. An interim coalition government then took over, but the political climate remains volatile. A UN peacekeeping force has failed to mediate the situation, and human rights activists point to what seems, by now, permanent features of the Haitian landscape—violence, rape, and extortion—that continue to mar Haiti's international image.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The beauty and the contrasts of the land seem perfectly matched to the country's checkered history. It shares the West Indies island of Hispaniola with the Dominican Republic. Haiti is a country of many contradictions—river valleys where the rivers are not navigable; the black sands and gingerbread houses of Jacmel, the white sands of Port Salut, and the ruined English fort on the tiny river island at Aquin; a fertile sunny tropical climate and a cloud forest at Macaya National Park; mountains that block the trade winds, resulting in the arid eastern part.

Haiti's share of Hispaniola consists of two peninsulas separated by the Gonâve Gulf, and five mountain ranges cross the country: the Chaîne du Haut Piton; the Massif de la Selle, where Pic la Selle, the highest point in Haiti, reaches a height of 8,793 feet; the Massif de la Hotte at the western end of the southern peninsula; the Massif des Montagnes Noires; and Chaîne des Cahos. In spite of these mountainous regions, several large inland plains—the Plaine du Nord, the Artibonite River valley, and the Cul-de-Sac Plain—provide Haiti with its most productive agricultural terrain.

Haiti's climate is tropical but variable due to its geographical contrasts. The average temperature at Port-au-Prince, located at sea level, is 81°F, one of the highest average annual temperatures in the West Indies, but Kenscoff, just south of Port-au-Prince, at 4,700 feet, averages 60°F. The country lies in the hurricane belt, making it vulnerable to severe storms between June and October as well as occasional flooding. In September 2004 Jeanne, a category 4 hurricane, struck the cities of Gonaïves, Port-de-Paix, and the area of Chansolme, leaving the affected areas devastated and more than 3,000 people dead. There are also occasional droughts, and the area is also prone to earthquakes.

❁ ECONOMY

Haiti is the least-developed country in the Western Hemisphere and the second poorest country in the world. Eighty percent of the population lives in abject poverty, and almost 70 percent depends on subsistence farming. There has been virtually no commercial development since the mid-1990s, and the country's inability to agree with international sponsors has resulted in a lack of much-needed economic assistance.

Extreme poverty has created a situation of desperation, and Haiti is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor. But the majority of trafficking in Haiti involves the internal movement of children for forced domestic labor, called restaveks. The restavek tradition is widespread in Haiti, and involves situations in which poor mothers give custody of their children to more affluent families, hoping that this will give them access to an education and economic opportunities. The reality though is more a situation of severe mistreatment, abuse, and long hours of uncompensated hard labor. The interim government estimates that 90,000 to 120,000 children live and work in coercive conditions as restaveks, but UNICEF's estimate is much higher: between 250,000 and 300,000.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Spanish and French influence resulted in Roman Catholicism becoming the major religion although half the population continues to believe in Vodun, which was declared an official religion of Haiti in 2003. Before its official recognition Vodun was practiced clandestinely and the imposed Catholicism simply meant that Christian symbols were grafted onto traditional beliefs. Holidays like Christmas and All Saints' Day coexist with Vodun festivals like Casse Canarie, Papa Ogou, and Simbi Blanc.

Spirituality permeates everyday Haitian life. It is an integral part of the culture, and satisfying the iwa (nature spirits and the souls of ancestors) is central. While offerings often include toys and sacrificial animals, there are also the wonderful veve—patterns that represent a particular iwa and function as a symbol of him or her. Each spirit (iwa, or loa) has its own symbol or symbols and colors. These patterns can be painted on the walls of the prayer room or created on the altar with flour, cornmeal, charcoal, ash, gunpowder, chalk, or powdered red brick before a ceremony. These patterns get wiped away by the ritual dancing. The spectacular prayer flags, known as Drapo Art, are spiritual flags worked with sequins and beads in veve patterns. They are stored in the altar rooms of temples when not in use and taken out

Vodoun (Voodoo)

An ancient spiritual religion based on the Yoruba religion of West Africa, Vodoun combines Christian and Arawak traditions and beliefs. The word vodoun is from the Fon (of Benin) word voudon, which means “the power” or “the creator.” The predominant note remains African and the basic belief is in an unknowable, remote Creator, whose various aspects are personified by some 400 orisha, and the iwa, who can be alternatively understood as spirits, souls of the dead, guardian spirits of some aspects of nature, or personifications of human concepts. The iwa are believed to mediate between humans and the orisha. Vodoun is a complex culture, and there are many interpretations of the identity and roles of the iwa.

The Voodoo often shown in Hollywood movies starting in the 1950s bears little resemblance to the African Traditional Religions (ATRs) as practiced in Africa and in other parts of the world by African descendants.

One thing is certain: slaves had to practice their African traditions in secret and the identification with Catholic saints was as much an attempt to appease their Catholic masters as it was a natural outcome of two highly ritualistic religions. The rites can be positive (Rada), or aggressive and quite negative (Petro), or only negative (Secta Rouge), and extremely negative (Zobop).

for Vodun ceremonies and processions. They rank as the country's finest form of art.

The music, drumming, and dancing associated with Vodun rituals have become an important part of Haitian culture. Percussion instruments, such as the rada and petro drums, are integral to Vodun rites: Rada is the gentle, healing, positive aspect of Vodun while petro represents the negative, aggressive aspect. Vodun songs continue to be sung in Kreyol and Langai, the languages of the ancestral religions. Even the curiously named Vodun Jazz employs these ancient melodies. Traditional Rara music, which is played during Carnival, shares the drumming techniques and possession trances of Santería, and those possessed by guédés (members of a particular family of nature spirits) can reprimand spectators as they see fit.

CUISINE

Haiti's cuisine is varied, ranging from seafood, as in accrats (breaded and fried codfish) and conch (a gastropod mollusk), to fresh seasonal vegetables, including pumpkins, the main ingredient in soupe au joumou. Haitian cooking uses many herbs, particularly basil. The more common dishes include riz djon-djon (rice and black mushrooms) and the legume (vegetable and meat stew) that can feed a family at very low cost.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 1

Haiti gained its independence on November 18, 1803, when Jacques Dessalines defeated the French General Rochambeau (1725–1807). Dessalines proclaimed independence on January 1, 1804, and restored the original name of the country Haiti, thus making it the first independent black country in the world.

The presidential address and military parade in Port-au-Prince reflect the solemnity of the occasion while cultural events, food fairs, photography exhibitions, and music lend a celebratory mood to the day. Independence Day is also known as Soup Joumou Day, Haiti day, and Jour de l'Indépendance. Before 1804 Haitian slaves were not allowed to touch joumou, a delicious, aromatic pumpkin that was a favorite of their white French masters. After Haitian independence joumou soup was prepared as a mark of celebration and freedom. This soup is intrinsic to the celebrations of Independence Day and New Year's Day.

The sounds of bonjour la maisonnée (“hello the household”) resonate in every home, because this is New Year's Day as well. Haitians welcome the new year by cleaning the house, wearing new clothes, and exchanging gifts. People sit down to a traditional dinner with family and friends, complete with the special soupe au joumou (“pumpkin soup”).

HEROES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 2

Ancestors are highly revered in Haiti, and Heroes Day is set aside expressly to honor one's ancestors—heroic or not. On this day, which is also called Ancestors Day, Ancestry Day, or Jour des Aieux (Day of the Forefathers), Haitians offer flowers and food at the graves of their ancestors. Across the nation there are various cultural and folk events and special parades for children.

FLAG DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 18

Flag Day, Jour du Drapeau, commemorates the historic event of 1803 when a group of slaves fighting for the freedom of Haiti tore the white strip out of the French flag to signify their separation. They created a new flag from the remaining blue and red strips, and declared independence on New Year's Day.

Flag Day is a major national holiday that is celebrated with great fanfare. The origin of Haiti's flag is closely linked to the history of its freedom struggle. As a mark of respect, teenagers carry the flag through the streets for an entire week. A Haitian community parade is organized on this day in Port-au-Prince, and participants, dressed in traditional Haitian costumes, march from Southwest Fourth Street to Merritt Park.

BATTLE OF VERTIÈRES DAY

Observed by: Defense Forces

Observed on: November 18

Armed Forces Day, Jour des Forces Armées, commemorates the Battle of Vertières (November 18, 1803) that saw the historic victory of forces led by Jacques Dessalines over the French troops of Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821), led by Rochambeau. Official ceremonies include military parades, performances by military bands, and speeches by the chiefs of military contingents. Soldiers are honored at awards ceremonies.

DISCOVERY OF HAITI DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 5

Christopher Columbus was the first European to discover the island of Hispaniola in 1492. The first Spanish settlement in the New World La Navidad was on present-day Haiti. The original inhabitants of the island the Taino and Carib Indians called the land Quesqueya and Ayti (land of mountains). Columbus called it “La Isla Hispaniola,” which was eventually abbreviated to Hispaniola.

To celebrate Discovery of Haiti Day, also called Columbus Day, Haitians across the country hold parades and feasts with singing, dancing, and revelry. Traditional cuisine is served at public gatherings.

Religious Holidays

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians and Vodun Followers
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, also known as Tirer Gâteau, Les Trois Rois, or Three King’s Cake Festival, is a Catholic holiday that commemorates the arrival of the Three Kings or Magi at Bethlehem to pay homage to the infant Jesus. Guided there by the stationary star over Bethlehem, they brought gifts—frankincense, myrrh, and gold—said to symbolize Jesus’ divinity and his Crucifixion.

This is a day to bake the tirer gâteau (“three kings’ cake”) and place the decorative crown on it to signify remembrance of these gifts. In Haiti the celebration is a blend of Catholic and Vodun traditions. People wear white dresses (a symbol of purification and spirituality) and pray to the powerful Vodun deities. In churches, devotional songs and hymns are sung in honor of the Three Kings, and family elders pray for their children.

❁ NORRITURE RITUELLE DES SOURCES TÊT D’ L’EAU

Observed by: Vodun Followers
Observed on: February 25

Vodun is a spiritual system in which natural forces are personified as spirits, and Vodun rituals center around human interaction with these powerful spirits. Norriture Rituelle des Sources Têt d’ l’Eau (Feeding the Springs) is dedicated to the spirit Simbi, a guardian of water sources and the lwa (spirit) of rivers, springs, and marshes, as well as the sources of these. He is also believed to be the healer of diseases of supernatural origin. According to Vodun beliefs, the spirits have to be fed if they are to be strong enough to protect the community. They imbibe the life force of the offering, making animal sacrifices necessary.

Speckled roosters are the favorite food of this lwa (or loa, “spirit”) and thus the appropriate sacrifice for this day. This is the “feeding” that the festival name refers to. Vodun practitioners express their devotion to Simbi by wearing green clothes.

Rara Celebrations

After the end of Carnival and throughout the 40-day fasting period of Lent rara celebrations are held every weekend. These travel from the countryside into the towns. Rara bands with brightly costumed dancers and musicians move slowly through the streets, picking up people along the way. The musical instruments—drums, trumpets, horns, and shakers—are all homemade. The chaos is only apparent as strict codes govern the dancing. The gaiety and colors can be explained by one word—iwa (Vodun spirits). The iwa of one group protects it from the iwa of another group, and the vitality and wealth of each group is seen as an expression of its iwa.

CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Tuesday before Lent

The word “carnival” is derived from the Latin carne lev (“the removal of meat”). The celebration traditionally takes place on the days leading up to the austere 40-day fasting period of Lent. Carnival ends on Mardi Gras (translated “Fat Tuesday,” in English, also called Shrove Tuesday), the Tuesday before Lent begins.

Carnival, the most anticipated festival in Haiti, takes place in Port-au-Prince, the capital city. Three days of masquerades (costume parades), zouk music (music inspired by kompas, a Haitian adaptation of European ballroom dancing), and a lot of dancing, Carnival is of Catholic origin, but the Haitian version is definitely African. Rara music (Vodun music) is prominent at the Carnival parades and features strong percussion and spirit-possession. Participants who are possessed by spirits will frequently chastise onlookers.

ST. JOSEPH EXPRESSION DE LA JURIDICTION LEGBA

Observed by: Vodun Followers
Observed on: March

Legba is the most powerful of the Vodun iwa (spirits) and guards the gate between the material world and the spiritual plane. In other words the communication, or the interaction between the spirits themselves and with Vodun practitioners, is not possible without the permission of Legba. For this reason he is the first spirit called upon and, because of his seniority, the first receiver of offerings. He is associated with Jesus and St. Peter and symbolized by both the Sun and the cross. The cross is a traditional symbol of the crossroads, the meeting point of the spiritual and material worlds. On this day Vodun followers sacrifice animal bones and marrow, particularly of roosters and goats, to please Legba.

LEGBA ZAOU

Observed by: Vodun Followers
Observed on: Mid-March

On Legba’s feast day, Feast of Legba Zaou, altars with his representative veve pattern are erected indoors, near the entrance to the home. Legba is invoked by chanting and sprinkling rum on the ground, and a black goat is sacrificed to him. Other appropriate offerings include candy, smoked foods, palm oil, green bananas, toys, rice, cassava (manioc), molasses, candles, rum, roosters, chickens, and cigars. In addition to offerings on his feast day, offerings are made on Mondays and on the third of every month, seeking Legba’s blessings of protection and healing.

LOCO DAVI

Observed by: Vodun Followers
Observed on: March 16

Vodun is a spiritual system based on natural forces, presided over or represented by spirits (iwa or loa), who mediate between the Creator and humans. Rituals are for invocation purposes, to acquire the blessing and protection of these supernatural forces. The French word manger means “to eat,” and the festival is about feeding (offering sacrifices to) the forest spirits. Hence this holiday’s alternate name Manger du Bois Rituel (“To Eat Ritual Wood”).

Loco is an aspect of Legba, the most powerful of the iwa spirits. Loco is the spirit of vegetation and the guardian of sanctuaries, the patron of healers and of herbs and other plants. He protects worshippers against negative magic and is symbolized by a butterfly. Vodun practitioners always invoke Loco before embarking on a healing treatment. Offerings are placed in straw bags, which are then hung on the branches of a ceiba tree (the Antillean silk-cotton tree).

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Holy Friday, Great Friday (in the Orthodox Churches), or Mourning Friday, is the Christian holiday in remembrance of the crucifixion of Jesus. It is a day of mourning but also holds the promise of the miracle of Easter, when Jesus rose from the dead. In Haiti the day is one of special prayers, readings from the Gospels and the Psalms, and singing hymns detailing Jesus’ life and deeds. Every year thousands of pilgrims from all parts of Haiti and the world arrive at Calvaire Miracle (Miracle Calvary) hill above the town of Ganthier, where they pray at the crucifix on top of the hill.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter commemorates the Resurrection of Jesus after his Crucifixion and is considered the most important Christian holiday. After rising from the dead, Jesus traveled in various parts of the Holy Land for 40 days before ascending to heaven. The devout attend early church services. Kite flying is a Haitian Easter tradition.

One of the most important pilgrimages in the Vodun religion coincides with Easter. Vodun adherents dressed in white flock to the town of Souvenance, where they dance, chant, and sacrifice goats, reaffirming their faith in the principles of Vodun.

✿ DANBALA WEDO

Observed by: Vodun Followers

Observed on: April 27

This festival honors the iwa Danbala Wedo (identified with St. Louis Cleimeille). He is the oldest of the iwa, a father figure, and symbolizes the knowledge that forms the basis of Vodun. He is the force that sustains the world. The feeling of comfort and peace experienced by all present at the ceremony (or nearby) signifies his presence. He is so sacred that he does not speak but expresses himself only through the hissing sounds made by someone possessed by him. Danbala's symbol is the snake, and a possessed person will slither, dart his or her tongue, hiss, and climb trees.

Danbala brings the rain and, thus, a good harvest. His blessings are sought through a special dance and the offering of white or near-white foods such as eggs, bananas, rice, and melons.

✿ CASSE CANARIE

Observed by: Vodun Followers

Observed on: April 29

Ancestors occupy a special place in the Vodun religion. They protect and act as intermediaries between humans and the Creator. To this end the souls of the dead must leave this world and abide in the city of Ife in Ginen, the realm appropriate to them. Govis are sacred clay pots that temporarily hold the souls of the recently dead. In order to ensure that they depart for Ginen, the pots in which their souls are temporarily kept must be broken to release them, hence the alternate name, Breaking of the Jugs. They become part of the iwa (supernatural forces or spirits) and are revered as such. Govis on the altars of white magic practitioners of Vodun are believed to be the resting places of iwa until they are invoked.

Govis and Black Magic

Govis are the lidded pots in which loa are kept when their help is not sought, and they are kept on altars. But they are also used by bokors, the practitioners of Vodun negative magic, to hold the ti-bon-ange—one-half of the soul of a person who has been dead for more than a month but less than a year. In this way they can create a zombie (the walking dead). The gros-bon-ange is trapped in the body. To release the soul, certain rituals have to be performed, and these include breaking the pot and performing the Casse Canarie ritual. Simply breaking the govi will not release the soul. The ti-bon-ange (the other half of the soul) needs to be reunited with the gros-bon-ange and then sent to the appropriate abode for souls.

ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

Ascension is a Christian holiday celebrating Jesus' Ascension to heaven, 40 days following his rising from the dead. In Haiti there are special Masses, prayers, and processions. There are reenactments of scenes from the Gospels and of Jesus being welcomed at the gate of heaven.

✿ GRANDE ALOUMANDIA

Observed by: Vodun Followers

Observed on: May 18

Grande Aloumandia is a time to get rid of bad luck, unwanted spirits, and to dismiss vampirelike entities. The festival has gradually evolved into a day of honoring ancestors. Thousands participate in ceremonies and events that include religious dances, cockfights, horse races, and lavish parties.

✿ CORPUS CHRISTI

Observed by: Roman Catholics and Vodun Followers

Observed on: Thursday after Trinity Sunday (May–June)

Corpus Christi, or Fête Dieu (Feast of God), commemorates the institution of the Eucharist on the Thursday (Maundy Thursday) before Jesus' Crucifixion. During his last supper Jesus offered bread and a cup of wine to his disciples, presented as his body and his blood, proclaiming their consumption to be a sacred covenant. This day became a separate holiday due to the efforts of St. Juliana of Liege, who felt that this momentous event was being lost in the other incidents of that Thursday.

This is a national holiday in Haiti, made beautiful by the altars set up at roadsides by churches. Believers stop to pray at these altars, holding crosses and family photographs, and looking heavenward while praying. Many churches also organize processions.

AGOU

Observed by: Vodun Followers

Observed on: August 30

Agou is the Vodun spirit of the sea and the patron of fishermen and sailors. He is represented as a fair-complexioned mulatto with green eyes, and his symbol is a boat. This observance is called Feeding the Sea. At his feast day ceremonies, Agou is invoked by sounding conch shells. Offerings of champagne and other items are loaded on specially crafted small rafts and set out to sea. If the raft sinks it is believed that the sacrifice has been accepted, and Agou will protect the interests of the person.

ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians and Vodun Followers

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day, also known as La Toussaint or All Hallows' Eve, is a Christian holiday dedicated to all saints, both known and unknown. In the eighth century Pope Gregory III (r. 731–41) consecrated a chapel to all the Christian saints because there were too many for there to be individual days for each. This chapel is at the Basilica of St. Peter in Rome. November 1 was the anniversary of this consecration. Pope Gregory IV (r. 827–44) assigned this day for observance.

This is a public holiday in Haiti with schools, government offices, and businesses closed. Haitian families gather in cemeteries to honor their ancestors. They offer food, clothes, and other items to the departed souls. It is also traditional to trim the grass in the graveyard, whitewash the graves, and paint the cemetery fences. At twilight, people light candles and place flowers around the graves.

ALL SOULS' DAY

Observed by: Christians and Vodun Followers

Observed on: November 2

All Souls Day, also called Defunct's Day, Day of the Dead, Fête Guédé, or Jour des Morts, is a Christian day of prayers for the dead. It is believed that souls are not totally free of sin when they leave the body, and need the help of our prayers to be purified. The day was first observed by the Benedictine monks in the sixth century when they prayed for the deceased monks of their order.

The Haitian spirit Baron Samedi is also invoked on this day by followers of Vodun. He guards the passage between the worlds of the living and the dead and is the most powerful of the Guédé family (spirits or guardians of matters relating to life and death, and of cemeteries) of iwa. His symbol is a cross (signifying the crossroads at which the spiritual and material worlds meet) and the coffin. People visit cemeteries and lay offerings at the tombstones. Many people wear lacy white robes and go around the cemetery burning handmade candles and dripping coffee and liquor on the graves. People remove their clothes, rub hot pepper juice on their bodies, and dance. It is also celebrated as Confession Day, and people visit the church to confess their sins.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus, the founder of Christianity. Interestingly this is not one of the early Christian festivals but was originally the pagan season of renewal, rebirth, and the return of the light, celebrated at winter solstice. Christmas was celebrated in Alexandria, Egypt, in the second century, but on May 20. Even as late as the fourth century, the birth of Jesus was celebrated, along with Epiphany, on January 6. The December 25 celebration was observed in a few places, such as Antioch at the end of the fourth century, but the practice spread from the fifth century on.

In Haiti Christmas celebrations begin a week in advance. The first sign of Christmas is carolers singing in the streets. On Christmas day homes, streets, and whole towns are lit up with tiny lights, and Christmas trees are decorated with bright ornaments and lights. There is a great deal of singing and feasting, and people attend church services and Christmas plays in the evening.

ST. JEAN'S DAY

Observed in: Port-au-Prince

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: June 24

June 24 celebrates the Feast of St. John the Baptist and is known as St Jean's Day in French-speaking countries. Christians regard John the Baptist as the precursor of Jesus, representing the light of the world, which explains the link to the summer solstice, bonfires, and the longest day of the solar year. This day is celebrated with bonfires, dancing, and leaping over fires. At midnight wreaths with burning candles are cast into the river. Boat parades, dances, and fireworks are also organized.

❁ PAPA OGOU

Observed in: Plaine du Nord

Observed on: July 25

The Vodun pantheon holds a number of iwa (spirits) who represent the dynamic forces of the universe as well as human ideals. Ogou was initially the iwa of blacksmithing but later, when this profession ceased to be important, he was made the warrior iwa. He is the interpreter of Dumbala's messages and the iwa of lightning and storms and of politics and victory as well. In his aspect as Ogoun Faraille he symbolizes strength. Ogou is also believed to have inspired the slave revolts of the Haitian independence struggle. He shares his feast day with Jacques Le Majeur (St. James), who is the patron saint of Haiti and depicted as a soldier on a white horse, bearing a flag marked with the cross.

Vodun priests (houngans) and priestesses (mambo) conduct ceremonies to ensure strength and freedom for all. The ritual includes shaking the religious rattle and beating Vodun drums that have been cleansed and purified.

❁ GRAN DÉLAI ET GRAN ALOUMANDIA

Observed in: Aloumandi

Observed on: July 26

Gran délai et Gran Aloumandia celebrates Erzulie (or Ezili), the Vodun spirit of beauty and love. Erzulie is symbolized by the Moon and is portrayed as a beautiful dark-skinned woman. She is seen as loving and kind but temperamental. In this aspect she is called Erzulie Ge-Rouge and portrayed with her knees drawn up to her chin and her fists clenched, weeping fiercely as she mourns the life's brevity and love's imperfection. In spite of these tantrums Erzulie is lavish with her love and with her gifts, and her altars reflect this luxury: Champagne, perfumes, jewelry, makeup, roses, and beautiful clothes are appropriate offerings. On her fingers she wears three wedding rings, one for each of her husbands: Damballa, the serpent god (Erzulie is represented as a water snake); Agwe, god of the sea; and Ogoun, the warrior hero.

July 26 is also the Feast of St. Anne (although Erzulie is identified with the Virgin Mary), the mother of the Virgin Mary and the wife of St. Joachim. They were an elderly couple and childless.

Joachim and Anne both appealed to God, separately, for a child. An angel appeared to each and told them that their child would be considered blessed the world over. St. Anne was canonized in 1584, but her feast day was first celebrated in the fourth century.

In Haiti the day usually starts with a Catholic Mass, after which an effigy of St. Anne is taken from each village church and placed in a shrine. This is followed by rituals and dancing, and at the end of the day the effigy is returned to the church, marking the end of the festival.

❁ BIRTH

When a child is born in a Haitian family, the parents try to please Hestia, the Greek goddess of the hearth. The house is her symbol, and it is traditional for the newborn to be carried around the house before being received into the family. Food, animal sacrifices, and gifts are offered to the goddess following the birth of a child. In return she is expected to provide health, protection from evil spirits, and good fortune to the newborn.

❁ MARRIAGE

Haitians have to register with the ministry of Religious Affairs before solemnizing a Vodun marriage. After a ceremony before a civil judge the wedding ceremony is conducted by a Vodun practitioner. Music and dance are key elements of any Vodun marriage, and people wear white clothing. The ceremonial dance is an expression of spirituality and of connection with the divine and the spirit world. Guests present gifts to the couple, but gifts of money are not appropriate. The wedding cake is cut at the couple's home. Food at the reception includes conch, fried pork, and black rice prepared in the Creole style.

❁ DEATH

Haitian beliefs do not consider death to be the end of life but the beginning of a new phase. Death rituals accomplish a number of functions in the Vodun religion. The most important is to send the gros-bon-ange (one part of the soul, understood as the life force) to Ginen (the cosmic community of ancestral spirits), after which family members can worship it as an iwa. If the journey is not completed the gros-bon-ange can be trapped on Earth and bring misfortune to the family members. To avoid the hovering of the ti-bon-ange (the second part of the soul) on the dead body, a ritual called the nine nights is performed to ensure that the ti-bon-ange stays in its grave.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Present-day Honduras was once part of the Mesoamerican civilization. Western Honduras was part of the Mayan Empire that flourished from the fifth century to the early ninth century C.E., but earlier sites date back to at least the second century. Copán was the site of a major Mayan kingdom of the Classic Era named Xukpi (“Corner-Bundle”). The magnificent ruins of Copán remain, and the last dated hieroglyph goes back to 800 C.E. Other pre-Columbian sites, at La Travecia and the Ulua Valley for example, have provided evidence of other pre-Columbian civilizations.

After the Maya other indigenous people arrived in Honduras—tribes related to the Toltec people of Mexico, and the Lencas, Chibcha, Sumu, and Jicaque from Colombia—and the descendants of these indigenous peoples remain. The most prominent groups claim Lencas and Garifuna ancestry, but the majority of the population is Mestizo, of mixed European-Amerindian ancestry.

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) landed on mainland Honduras (near modern Trujillo) in 1502 and called it Honduras (which means “depths”) referring to the deep coastal waters. Spanish colonization of the highland areas of the country began in 1524. Some local tribes resisted the Spanish colonizers well into the late 1530s. One of the native leaders who stood proud and was successful in resisting the Spaniards was Lempira (? 1499–1537). He was a member of the Lenca nation and is still celebrated as a national hero.

Spanish settlements proliferated along the coast, and Honduras came under the control of the Captaincy General of Guatemala. Under Spanish rule Honduras was a major mining center for gold and silver. In the 16th century slaves

Lempira

A national hero of Honduras, Lempira was chief of the Lenca tribe and one of the few to resist Spanish control successfully. His name means “gentleman of the mountain.” In the 1530s he organized the native tribes against the Spanish and turned back the Spanish forces led by Captain Alonso de Cáceres, who was en route to govern the Congolón area. This area is known as the Department of Lempira. The Honduran currency, named after Lempira, honors his heroic efforts.

were brought in. In the 17th century, because gold and silver deposits were dwindling, the Spanish largely abandoned Honduras.

In 1821 Honduras, along with other Central American territories, gained independence from Spain. After being briefly annexed by Mexico, it joined the newly formed United Provinces of Central America in 1823. Honduran-born General Francisco Morazán (1792–1842) was the last president of the Central American federation and its most ardent defender. Despite his efforts to maintain Central American unity, however, Honduras broke away to declare itself a sovereign nation in 1838. Morazán is considered a national hero in Honduras, and a day for honoring him is celebrated throughout the country.

Since then upheavals, foreign interventions, and short-lived governments have caused chronic instability. There have been 300 internal rebellions, civil wars, and changes of government in Honduras, more than half of which occurred during the 20th century.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

A Caribbean nation bordered by Guatemala, Nicaragua, and El Salvador, Honduras is a mountainous country with narrow coastal plains. The climate ranges from temperate in the mountains to subtropical in the lowlands. Honduras is home to the largest tropical rain forest in the Western Hemisphere, with three different zones: Río Plátano Biosphere Reserve, Tawahka Anthropological Reserve, and Patuca National Park, the largest structurally intact forest in Mesoamerica.

ECONOMY

From the late 19th until the mid-20th century, foreign capital, plantation life, and conservative politics dominated Honduras. The power of the banana plantation owners gave rise to the term “banana republic.” During the 1980s Honduras, surrounded by political turbulence in Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala, depended on strong U.S. influence, aid, and military assistance to maintain stability relative to its neighbors.

Honduras has been designated one of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries eligible for debt relief by both the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Honduras is one of the poorest countries in the Americas. Although the economy somewhat improved under President Ricardo Maduro (b. 1946), the distribution of wealth continues to be extremely polarized, and the average wages of the population are still very low. Many people live below the poverty line.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion of the country. The indigenous tribes practice their own religions, often combining Christian elements with African and Amerindian traditions. Catholic saints are important in the life of Hondurans, and Catholic homes always have pictures or statues of saints. Not only do individuals and families pray to saints for help with problems, but whole towns and villages celebrate the feast days of their patron saints. The blend of traditional customs with Roman Catholicism is best exemplified by the Guancaco ceremony, a peace ceremony that includes folk dances and is celebrated between neighboring towns or villages on the days of the patron saints.

Latin Americans love soccer, and Hondurans are no exception. The Honduran soccer team is exceptional, and outstanding players are national heroes. However soccer remains a male-dominated sport in Honduras.

The conch is very much a part of life here: The conch shell has been a popular musical instrument since pre-Columbian days, and modern musicians often play the conch accompanied by a guitar or accordian.

CUISINE

Conchs figure prominently in the cooking of Honduras, and conch soup (made of the gastropod that lives in the shell) is a favorite dish. Other popular

The Soccer War

In 1969 Honduras and El Salvador entered into a brief war known as the Soccer War. This took place during a World Cup qualifying soccer match between the two countries. Games were played in both countries, and the hostilities were sparked by the mistreatment of supporters of the visiting countries. The real cause, however, was the immigration of 300,000 El Salvadorans into Honduras during the previous 20 years. This war lasted for 100 hours.

foods include fried plantains, tacos, tortillas, and tamales—all featured dishes throughout Central America. A typical Honduran meal consists of at least two of the above, served with rice and beans.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

On New Year's Eve Hondurans wear their best clothes. At midnight everyone who has been able to stay awake goes out to wish his or her neighbors a happy, prosperous new year. As with many other Honduran holidays, music and dancing are important features of the celebrations.

❁ AMERICAS DAY

Observed on: April 14

Honduras celebrates Americas Day, or Pan-American Day, in a manner similar to that of several other Central and South American countries (Belize, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic). There are parades and cultural events to celebrate Pan-American culture. Pageants, competitions, and cultural programs are held in schools to make school children aware of the different cultures and customs that exist in the various American countries.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

On Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, workers from all over the country gather in Tegucigalpa, the capital city, to take part in the Labor Day parade. Rural workers travel long distances by bus or on foot to take part in peaceful demonstrations of solidarity in the city.

Observed on: June 9

The Pineapple in Honduras

Hondurans eat their pineapple and have it too. The flesh is used for pies, juice, and jam; the skin for tea and vinegar; and the top is soaked in water until it grows roots and can be replanted.

June 9 is the day set aside for Hondurans to honor José Trinidad Cabañas. They remember Cabañas (1805–71) for his efforts to keep the Central American federation together. He served as president of Honduras during the 1850s and tried to make his dream of a railway in Central America a reality.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 15

Independence Day commemorates the declaration of independence from Spain of the Central American provinces of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica in 1821. These nations formed the United Provinces of Central America in 1823, but this federation disintegrated, and Honduras proclaimed itself independent in 1838.

Firecrackers typically mark many Honduran celebrations, and this day is no exception. There are parades, music, fireworks, food, and parties.

SOLDIERS' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 3

Soldiers' Day, also known as Francisco Morazán Day in Honduras, marks the birthday of General Francisco Morazán, a national hero who led the struggle to free Honduras from Spain. In 1829 he led the revolt that ousted Manuel José Arce (1786–1847). He was made president of the Central American Federation in 1830, but his efforts to maintain unity were unsuccessful, and the federation was dissolved in 1838. In 1842 Morazán became president of Costa Rica, but his continued attempts to restore Central American unity led to his betrayal and his death at the hands of his own party on September 15, 1842. His name was suggested for use on Honduran currency, but supporters of Lempira, the other national hero, won by six votes. Nevertheless once a year Hondurans pay homage to this great leader with parades and fireworks.

COLUMBUS DAY

Observed on: October 12

Christopher Columbus was the first known European navigator to reach the Americas and the Caribbean islands. He arrived in Honduras on his fourth and last voyage in 1502 and named the country Honduras, referring to the deep coastal waters. October 12 is celebrated as Columbus Day in English-speaking countries, where the celebrations include civic parades, parties, and fireworks. In many Caribbean and Central and South American countries, including Honduras, however, this day has more recently been renamed Día de la Raza, Day of the Race, by indigenous peoples. They have designated it a day to also celebrate the cultures that were jeopardized by the actions and influences of the Europeans who followed Columbus.

ARMED FORCES DAY

Observed on: October 21

Armed Forces Day commemorates the revolt of 1956, which ousted the dictator Lozano Diaz. This annual celebration recognizes and honors the Honduran military, and military installations are usually open to the public on Armed Forces Day.

Religious Holidays

SUYAPA DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: February 3

Suyapa Day, also called The Feast of Virgin Suyapa, honors the Virgin of Suyapa, the patron saint of Honduras. She protects the capital city of Tegucigalpa and provides food and shelter for the people of her country. Her feast day has been celebrated here for more than 250 years.

The holiday begins with a nine-hour pilgrimage from El Piliguin to the cathedral in the capital city. Here believers assemble to venerate a small statue of the virgin. This three-inch high wooden statuette was discovered at El Piliguin in the 18th century by a poor farmer. Miracles have been attributed to this figurine, which is now in the Santuario de Suyapa in Tegucigalpa.

This is one of the most important holidays in the country, and there are processions, ceremonies, Masses, and concerts to celebrate the day. The discovery of the tiny statue is reenacted. In the capital the festivities continue from February 3 to 10. In Suyapa, a nearby village surrounded by lush mountains and plantations, the holiday is observed from February 1 to 3.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, or Holy Thursday, is a Catholic commemoration of the day on which Jesus washed the feet of his apostles before the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. If falls during Holy Week, which was the last week of the mortal life of Jesus. Christians believe that Jesus is the son of God, the embodiment of the second person in a Holy Trinity comprising the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In recognition of Jesus' simple action, Hondurans celebrate this day as a day of humility and thankfulness.

The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word maundatum, which means "command," because, during the Last Supper Jesus commanded his apostles to observe the ritual now called Communion. The Easter Triduum officially begins after the Communion at the Maundy Thursday evening service and concludes with the evening service on Easter Sunday.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday observes the day on which Jesus, believed by Christians to have been the Messiah, was crucified by the Romans. Christians also believe he was the Son of God, embodying the second being of the Holy Trinity. The day is a part of Holy Week, or Passion Week, the last week of Jesus' mortal life. He died after three hours on the Cross. His Crucifixion occurred at the same time that the paschal lambs (for the Jewish feast of Passover) were being slaughtered (between noon and 3 P.M.). Out of this synchrony came the symbolism of Jesus as the sacrificed lamb, the “true paschal lamb.” His death is believed to have redeemed the world, and the name “Good Friday” expresses the Christian belief that even death cannot overshadow God’s love for humanity. This is a day of sorrow, and so it is also called Black Friday and Mourning Friday. It is an aliturgical day in the Catholic Church, so there is no Communion. At 3:00 in the afternoon, the lights in churches are dimmed, and no bells ring.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

In Honduras prayer services are held on Easter, and there are parades, feasts, dances, and parties. Traditionally colorful Easter eggs are purchased or decorated at home. The eggs are given as gifts, while the children of the family engage in Easter Egg Hunts. The winners are those who find the most eggs that the adults have hidden, and they receive a prize. The day is associated with new life, and draws much of its symbolism from pagan spring rituals in celebration of Eostre, the Germanic fertility goddess. Eggs and hares, both of which are powerful symbols of rebirth, were sacred to Eostre.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

A few days before Christmas, Nativity scenes are set up in homes, and the infant Jesus is covered with a blanket. On Christmas Eve the blanket is removed to reveal the baby. Christmas Eve Mass is a widely attended event by Catholics, and afterward there are parties and gifts exchanged. Hondurans usually spend the rest of Christmas Eve with relatives, feasting far into the night.

Homes have Christmas trees decorated with strings of small lights and ornaments. Christmas Day is a time for family celebrations, followed by get-togethers with neighbors and friends. Traditional foods include pork, eggnog, beer, and tamales—baked cornmeal with meat and a sauce, wrapped in plantain leaves. Children are given their Christmas presents, and the family may then attend a fireworks display.

❁ GUANACO FESTIVAL

Observed in: Intibucá, Francisco Morazán, Lempira

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December–January

Guanaco is a peace ceremony practiced between Lencan towns and villages, or in regions the Lencas used to inhabit. Elaborate and colorful, the ceremony includes folk dances and the paisanazo, a dance inspired by both the Moorish (Spanish Arabic) and Christian cultures. The traditional ceremony involves intense drumming, chanting, marimba music, and dancing, including the paisanazo. It is performed on the day dedicated to the patron saints of the participating towns and villages.

While most villages share their Guanaco with just one or two other villages, some villages, like Chinacla and La Paz, take part in many. The most important celebrations are in Intibucá, Francisco Morazán, and Lempira. The Guanaco between Mejicapa and Gracias in Lempira is held December 12–16; in Mejicapa it takes place on the feast day of St. Lucia; and in Gracias from January 19 to 25, on the feast of San Sebastián.

Fun Fact

The original name of this holiday may well have been God’s Friday because, in Early Modern English, good meant “holy.” Also the two words were often interchangeable as in, “God be with you,” now elided and spelled “good-bye.”

❁ FIESTA DE SAN ISIDRO

Observed in: La Ceiba

Observed on: Third week of May

The Fiesta de San Isidro is one of the greatest of Honduran carnivals. It honors La Ceiba’s patron saint Isidro. The original European settlers called the town La Suiza de San Isidro, because it reminded them of Switzerland. Born at the end of the 11th century, Isidro was a poor, hardworking farm laborer devoted to God and to prayers who never missed the Santa Missa in the mornings, even if it meant being late for work. When his coworkers complained to their boss Juan de Varga, he went to investigate and saw in the fields the oxen working by themselves, as if guided by unseen hands. This miracle was reported far and wide, as were other miracles that followed. Isidro was canonized in 1622. His feast is celebrated with a week of costume parades, dawn-to-dusk music, and dancing.

In small villages parents select a local girl for their son after he turns 20. Next they seek the blessing of a priest and ask for an auspicious day for the marriage ceremony. The groom's family offers the bride's parents gifts in order to secure their consent. The marriage ceremony includes a gala feast. The new husband then moves to his father-in-law's house to work for him for seven years, after which time the young couple is allowed to move to their own home.

✿ DEATH

Funerals are held 24 hours after someone dies. Relatives and friends of the deceased get together to offer condolences to the family. The traditional wake is usually held before the Catholic Mass and burial.

It is customary to have a large drum party a year and a day after the death of a family member. The family of the deceased saves money throughout the year for this party and may seek financial help from relatives living in other parts of the country and abroad. The house is cleaned and decorated, and vast quantities of food are prepared days in advance of the party. Drummers are hired, and family members arrive from far and wide. The drumming continues as long as the food, drink, and money last.

Introduction

HISTORY

There is strong historical evidence that the region known as Hong Kong has been inhabited by humans since the Stone Age. Until it was occupied by the British, the area was a neglected portion of the Qing Empire (1644–1911 C.E.); its population was made up of farmers, fishermen, and pirates. In 1841 the British took control of Hong Kong after the Opium Wars.

A series of conflicts between Hong Kong and Britain followed Britain's assumption of control over Hong Kong, during which the British had backing from French, Russian, and American interests. The British and the French forces combined to invade China in 1859, and the Chinese were forced to agree to the Convention of Beijing, under which the Kowloon Peninsula and nearby Stonecutters Island were ceded to the British. In 1898 the British signed a 99-year lease on a part of Hong Kong called the New Territories.

A civil war in China during the 1920s and the Japanese invasion in the 1930s led Chinese capitalists to flee from the mainland to the safer haven of the colony. During this period Hong Kong started moving away from trade to manufacturing. However in the 1950s, in the wake of a U.S. embargo on Chinese goods during the Korean War, Hong Kong was compelled to increase its manufacturing capacity and develop service industries, such as banking and insurance. When the Communists came to power in China in 1949 and during the Cultural Revolution there in the 1960s, Hong Kong's existence was threatened once more by mainland China's desire to bring Hong Kong under its control.

In 1984 the British decided to withdraw from the entire colony at the end of the lease period in 1997 rather than maintain a fragmented colony comprising Kowloon and Hong Kong Island. In 1997 the Chinese government designated Hong Kong a Specially Administered Area. During the ensuing period Hong Kong underwent many hardships as a result of economic crises in Asia in the late 1990s. In the early years of the 21st century, it experienced near-zero growth as well as rising unemployment and falling property values.

Opium Wars

The Opium War, also known as the Anglo-Chinese War, was the most humiliating defeat that China has ever suffered and, perhaps, among the most sordid events in European history. By the 1830s, the English had become the largest drug-trafficking criminal organization in the world. Growing opium in India, the East India Company shipped tons of opium into Canton, which it traded for Chinese manufactured goods and tea. This trade produced a society filled with drug addicts, as opium parlors proliferated throughout China during the early 19th century. British traders generously bribed Canton officials in order to keep the opium traffic flowing freely.

The effects on Chinese society were devastating. A key player in the shady business was a young idealistic official named Lin Ze-hsu. Deeply concerned about the opium menace, he maneuvered himself into the position of imperial commissioner at Canton. He was imbued with the idea of disrupting the opium market by hunting corrupt officials and cracking down on the British trade. Within two months of taking charge, he had taken action against Chinese merchants and Western traders and shut down all the traffic in opium. He destroyed all the existing stores of opium and wrote to Queen Victoria of England requesting that the British call a halt to this nefarious trade.

The English, despite Lin's powerful letter, refused to stop the opium trade. In response, Lin threatened to cut off all trade with England and expel all English from China. This led to the first Opium War. It began when Chinese junks attempted to turn back English merchant vessels in November of 1839. Although this was a low-level conflict, it inspired the English to send a fleet of warships in June 1840. The Chinese, with old-style weapons and artillery, were no match for the British gunships, which moved up and down the Chinese coast shooting at forts, besides fighting on land. The Chinese were stunned by the technological superiority of the British land armies and suffered repeated defeats. Finally in 1842, the Chinese were forced to accept an ignominious peace under the Treaty of Nanking. The second Opium War in 1856 pitted the Chinese against the British and French. The second defeat of the Chinese ended in the Treaty of Diantsin in 1858.

China's official policy toward Hong Kong is that of "one country, two systems." In other words, Hong Kong is part of China, but Communist-ruled China has agreed to allow Hong Kong to continue as a capitalist center. As a result the European Commission has described Hong Kong as one of the freest societies in Asia, regardless of the lack of full democracy.

Most experts believe that as long as Hong Kong continues to make money (and avoids any kind of dissent) this special status is relatively secure. However recent interference in Hong Kong's affairs by Chinese authorities shows that there is no autonomy in the real sense of the term.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Hong Kong is made up of a peninsula jutting out from the southeastern part of China and hundreds of islands scattered off the coast. On the peninsula are Kowloon and the New Territories. The New Territories is the area of land in Hong Kong, north of the Kowloon peninsula, south of Shenzhen and the Shum Chun River and Hong Kong's outlying islands (including Lantau Island, Lamma Island, Zheng Chau, and Beng Chau). They were leased from Qing China to Britain in 1898 for 99 years under the provisions of the Second Convention of Peking.

The other portion of the country includes Hong Kong Island and other remote islands. Hong Kong Island is located slightly south of the Tropic of Cancer. There are approximately 234 outlying islands. Lantau Island is the biggest of Hong Kong's islands, but the island of Hong Kong is the most famous and most populated.

The ocean around Hong Kong is quite deep. With its wide harbors protected by mountains located to the north as well as to the south, the area is ideally suited to function as a transit corridor for ships. Its geographical location between the Taiwan Straits, the South China Sea, and the Pacific Ocean make it a strategic channel for maritime traffic between the Asian continent and the rest of the world.

Hong Kong stands on a volcanic terrain, with its landscape dominated by hills and mountains. Hong Kong's backbone is a crest running from the northeast to the southwest. Both the Kowloon Peninsula and the northwestern New Territories are mainly flat. Three percent of Hong Kong's total land area is under cultivation, and this lies mostly in the New Territories' large alluvial plains.

Although Hong Kong rests on volcanic plains, there is only minor seismic activity, occasionally causing tremors. No major earthquakes occurred during the 20th century; the last one, which had a magnitude of 5.75 on the Richter scale, was back in 1874, but it caused only minor damage.

Hong Kong has a subtropical climate. Hong Kong's location falls within the tropics, but its seasonal changes are far greater than most places at similar latitudes. Monsoons and seasonal alternation of winds regulate and modify the climatic system of the country.

❁ ECONOMY

Hong Kong's position as one of the world's most valuable economic centers is due to several factors. It is located midway between Japan and Singapore and lies on the main shipping and air routes of the western Pacific. It also has long served as a major port of entry and trade for China, which uses Hong Kong as a primary link to the world economy.

Hong Kong has a congenial atmosphere for the pursuit of trade and commercial activities. Hong Kong's economy has always hinged on commerce, trade, and shipping, Hong Kong vies with Singapore as the world's largest container port. Industry and tourism also enjoy considerable importance. Agriculture provides a large portion of Hong Kong's food and flower supplies, but Hong Kong must still import the majority of its foodstuff.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Hong Kong enjoys a stimulating, highly dynamic, cosmopolitan lifestyle. It also has a tranquil side to it with lush green countryside and remote beaches accessible only from the sea. Approximately 40 percent of Hong Kong has been set aside as Country Park and is shielded from development. Botanists and zoologists are still uncovering hitherto undiscovered species of flora and fauna here.

Hong Kong's embrace of both oriental and occidental culture is evident in its art centers, museums, and libraries. The annual arts festival and cultural events held throughout the year feature top performers from all over the world. Hong Kong's image as a metropolis belies a unique heritage, a fine blend of ancient Chinese traditions and British colonial influence.

❁ CUISINE

Hong Kong's cuisine is a fusion of Eastern and Western flavors. Its cultural blend, proximity to mainland China, and its emphasis on quality have made Hong Kong a gourmet's paradise. A diversity of Asian culinary arts can easily be found in Hong Kong. These include spices from Thailand, rich aromatic flavors from India, and the delicacies of Japan and Korea, among others.

Although this former British colony embraces the Western New Year's celebration, the Chinese New Year is the bigger of the two celebrations. In Hong Kong people begin celebrating the Western (Gregorian) New Year's on December 31 with parties for friends and family. They exchange gifts and greeting cards to celebrate the day.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, honors the workers of every nation. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Hong Kong all the government offices, businesses, and schools are closed. The day is commemorated by a large number of labor union rallies, meetings, and speeches.

❁ THE CHINESE DRAGON BOAT FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifth of the fifth lunar month in the Chinese calendar

The Chinese Dragon Boat Festival is one of the most significant holidays celebrated in Hong Kong. Competing teams row boats shaped like dragons to the rhythm of drumbeats, in a frenzy to reach the finish line first.

The boat races on this day are connected with a tragic incident that took place in ancient times. A renowned patriotic poet Chu Yuan had drowned himself on the fifth day of the fifth lunar month in 277 B.C.E. In anguish the Chinese citizens who witnessed the incident threw bamboo leaves filled with cooked rice into the water so that the fish would eat the rice and not harm the poet's body. This later turned into the custom of eating zingzi (rice dumplings filled with ham or bean paste), which is in vogue even today.

This racing festival is a time to ensure protection from evil and disease for the rest of the year, and people hang healthy herbs on their front door, drink nutritious concoctions, and display portraits of evil's nemesis, Zhong Guei, a protective spirit. If one manages to stand an egg on its end at exactly 12:00 noon, the following year will be lucky. This holiday also marks the beginning of hot weather, and people are heard to say, "Don't put your warm clothes away until you have eaten dragon boat rice dumplings."

Origin of Mid-Autumn Festival

The origin of the Mid-Autumn Festival is not very clear. It is said that the festival originated in ancient times, when people held ceremonies to honor the Moon Goddess, or to celebrate the mid-autumn harvest. However another version says that the Mid-Autumn Festival commemorates the uprisings in China against Mongol rulers in the early 14th century. Unlike the Chinese Mongols did not eat Moon cakes, so the rebels hid a small piece of a note detailing their plans inside each Moon cake, which were then smuggled to compatriots.

ESTABLISHMENT DAY

Observed on: July 1

This day marks a milestone in the political history of Hong Kong. On this day in 1997 the British relinquished control of Hong Kong to China, and Hong Kong attained the status of a Specially Administered Region (SAR) of China. This day is celebrated by civic ceremonies and a brilliant display of fireworks in the evening.

MID-AUTUMN FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Fifteenth of the eighth month of the Chinese calendar

For this traditional Chinese festival the full Moon is supposed to be at its roundest and brightest. To the Chinese the full Moon symbolizes family unity and togetherness. On this occasion family and friends come together to visit scenic spots, marvel at the beauty of the Moon, eat Moon cakes (a salty and sweet pastry), and *bomeluo*s (“grapefruit”) together. Children carry brightly lit lanterns for the occasion. Farmers celebrate the end of the agricultural season and the harvest on this date.

ZHONG YEUNG

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Ninth of the ninth month of the Chinese calendar

Zhong Yeung, or Autumn Remembrance, is a much-beloved holiday in Hong Kong; people usually enjoy the day hiking and visiting high places such as the hills and plateaus around the city. It is believed that long ago a family living in this region had gone out on an excursion to a nearby hill. When they came home, they found all their animals had mysteriously died. Out of this legend developed the belief that going to a high place would save one from similar disasters.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 1

This day commemorates the founding of the People's Republic of China (PRC) in 1949. This most important of official PRC holidays was first celebrated in Hong Kong in 1997 following the transfer of control from Great Britain to the PRC.

In Hong Kong this day is observed through a series of official and community activities such as a flag-raising ceremony, which is attended by a large number of guests, including the chief executive of Hong Kong, senior government officials, members of the consular corps, dignitaries, and community leaders. Activities include a sea parade and an air force fly-over, a variety show, and a display of fireworks in the evening.

❁ CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Starts with the second new moon after the winter solstice and ends two weeks later with the full Moon

The most exciting festival in Hong Kong is the Chinese New Year, which usually occurs between January and February of the Gregorian (Western) calendar and lasts two weeks. New Year's Day festivities focus on lavish feasting and family gatherings. This period is highly anticipated by the Chinese since this festival brings bright new hope for the coming year. This holiday is also known as the Spring Festival, the Lunar New Year, and Tet in Vietnam.

In preparation for the holiday, it is traditional to clean one's house from top to bottom. Children, youth, and unmarried people receive red packets (ang baws) containing money as a token of blessings and good wishes from their elders and other married relatives. (The color red predominates because it symbolizes good fortune for the Chinese.)

During a typical Chinese New Year dinner, a variety of dishes are served, most notably, the nin gou. This resembles pasta, drenched in soy sauce and mixed with bamboo shoots, cabbage, pork, and Chinese straw mushrooms. Another important seasonal dish is abalone (a gastropod mollusk) with cabbage drenched in oyster sauce. Other dishes enjoyed during Chinese New Year include ru youk (stewed pork), goose giblets, jellyfish, and soup with egg dumplings and vermicelli.

While the festivities may go on for the full two weeks, only the first three days are actual holidays for schools, businesses, and government offices. The last day of the celebration period is considered to be "everyone's birthday" (and the Chinese do not celebrate their actual birth dates) although this day is not an official holiday.

❁ JING MING FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: One hundred and sixth day following winter solstice according to the Chinese calendar

This festival is also known as Remembrance of Ancestors Day or Grave Sweeping Day (also transliterated as Qing Ming). It celebrates the beginning of spring and is observed on the 106th day following winter solstice and is celebrated in April of the Western (Gregorian) calendar. Literally, the name means "Pure Brightness" (jing, which means "pure or clean," and ming, which means "brightness").

The worship of one's ancestors is the only religion indigenous to China. On Ching Ming families visit the graves of their ancestors and relatives. They carry incense sticks and paper offerings (paper money, paper clothes, or any other paper items), which are placed on the graves. All paper offerings are burned because the people believe that the deceased can receive the gifts, including money, in this manner. Special food items like roasted suckling pig and steamed chicken, along with fruit and wine, are offered during the ceremony. Some people carry willow branches with them or hang them on the sides of their front doors. It is believed that willows help them to get rid of evil spirits, since Ching Ming is one of the days that ghosts and spirits roam the earth freely.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Full Moon day of fifth or sixth month of Buddhist calendar

Vesak, or Wesak, the Buddha's Birthday, commemorates three major events in the life of Gautama Buddha (the founder of Buddhism): his birth, enlightenment (nirvana), and his mahaparinirvana (quitting of the worldly body, or salvation). In Hong Kong, which has a sizable Buddhist population, followers show their devotion throughout the day by bathing Buddha's statues. Celebrations center on the major temples and monasteries of Hong Kong. Po Lin Monastery on Lantau Island, which houses the world's largest, seated, outdoor bronze Buddha, is the hub of activity on this day. The people carry gifts of food items and flowers to the temples and monasteries, where they pray for good fortune and prosperity throughout the coming year. Everyone enjoys the sumptuous Chinese vegetarian dishes cooked by the monks at Po Lin Monastery.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day, also known as Christmas Bank Holiday and St. Stephen's Day, commemorates a medieval English custom of giving servants and the poor Christmas gifts the day after Christmas, which is on December 26. On this day church boxes used for collecting money for the poor are also opened, hence the name, Boxing Day. Gifts are given to those who render useful services throughout the year. Boxing Day is also the feast day of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr.

Because of Hong Kong's long association with Britain, this day is an important holiday in the region. Hong Kongers traditionally celebrate Boxing Day with picnics, excursions, and other outdoor activities. It is also an official holiday.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Hong Kong society, affluent families have traditionally sought brides who are able to manage household finances efficiently and above all produce sons who will inherit the family wealth. In contrast poor families have traditionally sought simple homely brides who could work hard in the fields and produce sons who would grow up to become helping hands.

In earlier days marriages were arranged, and it is still common for the parents to dominate the bride-seeking process. Traditionally all communication regarding marriage is carried out through formal letters. Therefore letters play an important role at various stages of traditional marriages even today. Three letters are involved in the process.

1. Request Letter: Confirms the formal arrangements of an impending marriage. It is sent by the groom's family to that of the bride. It is customarily presented with the initial gifts for the bride's family.

2. Gift Letter: Accompanies the formal gifts for the bride's family. In reality this is a checklist that records the description and quantity of the gifts.

3. Wedding Letter: This letter is presented to the bride's family on the day of the wedding. It confirms the act of absorbing the bride into the groom's family.

The Chinese definition of the word etiquette includes both customs and gifts. The following steps comprise the Six Etiquettes:

1. Request for Marrying the Bride—After the groom's family has selected a girl whom the groom wants to marry, the family hires a spokeswoman to communicate its wishes to the prospective bride's family. (In the old days, elderly women were hired as spokeswomen for the grooms.) This spokeswoman persuades the potential bride's family to accept the offer from the groom's family. Both sides will negotiate the terms. If they can come to an agreement, they proceed to the next phase.

2. Request for Bride and Groom's Birth Dates—In the second phase the groom's family will request the bride's "letters" through the spokeswoman. After obtaining the letters of the groom and bride, an astrologer will be hired to determine whether the two are compatible. If all is fine with the bride's birth date, the groom's family will proceed to the next step. Otherwise communication between the two families will cease, and the groom's family may look elsewhere.

3. Initial Gifts for the Bride's Family—If the potential bride's birth date is acceptable the groom's family will request the spokeswoman to send some initial gifts, accompanied by the gift letter.

4. Formal Gifts for the Bride's Family—The groom's family will select a good day and send the bride's family the bridal gifts: cash, cakes, food, and items of sacrifice for worshiping the ancestors. This act confirms the marriage pact between the two families.

5. Selecting the Wedding Date—The astrologer will select a good day according to the birth dates of the bride, the groom, and their family members. After the groom's family has agreed to the good day as the wedding day, a man who is known to have experienced good fortune all through his life will be employed to set up and decorate the conjugal bed and move it to the appropriately designated place. Next, a lucky woman (one who has a healthy husband and many sons) will decorate the bed more and place a few tokens of good fortune (such as food and fruits) on it. After the nuptial bed is decorated, it is to be left untouched until the time the marriage is consummated.

The bride's gifts for the groom will reach the groom's house a couple of days before the wedding day or, if she lives very far off, she will bring gifts (carried by her maids) to give to the groom when she arrives at his home on the wedding day. The bride's gifts usually consist of gems and jewelry, kitchen utensils, bed linens, and clothes.

6. Combing of the Hair—The night before the wedding both the bride and the groom have to find a lucky person (a woman for the bride and a man for the groom) to comb their hair in their respective homes. The bride and the groom each bathe, change into fresh new lingerie, and burn incense in their rooms. It is customary for the bride to sit next to a window from which the Moon is visible. Her hair has to be combed ceremonially four times, and each step has a special meaning:

The first round symbolizes from beginning till the end.

The second round symbolizes harmony from the present to old age.

The third round symbolizes many sons and grandsons.

The fourth combing symbolizes wealth and a long-lasting marriage.

The whole ritual also symbolizes the attainment of adulthood by the couple. If either has been married before, then the combing event is skipped.

On the day of the wedding, both the bride and the groom's homes will be decorated predominantly in red. The groom's family sends a procession of servants, musicians, and a litter (palanquin), which is carried by four servants to the bride's family to bring the bride to the wedding ceremony.

When the groom's procession arrives at the woman's home, the groom's spokeswoman enters the bride's house and carries the bride on her back until she reaches the carriage. By no means should the bride's feet touch the ground before she arrives at the groom's house. In some regions it is customary among the bride's relatives to throw handfuls of rice into the air, so that the chickens nearby will eat the rice instead of pecking at the bride. In many cases a red umbrella is used to shield the bride; the opening of the umbrella symbolizes her bringing many children to the groom's family. The parents and relatives bid her farewell as she sits in the carriage to depart to her new home.

After the bride reaches the groom's house, the two of them will take part in the marriage ceremony, which will be witnessed by their relatives and friends.

The bride and groom will worship the heavens and the Earth, as well as the groom's ancestors, and then they will serve tea to all senior members in the family. Thereafter the elders will give them red packages (lai see) containing monetary gifts and wish them health, wealth, and happiness. If they can afford it the groom's family will also throw a huge feast for their friends and relatives. The groom's spokeswoman will oversee the whole process and repeatedly toast the couple.

When the ceremonies are over the couple drinks and toasts each other; the spokeswoman offers sweets and fruit to the couple, thereby wishing them a long and happy married life with lots of children. After the meal the newlyweds proceed to the bridal chamber. As soon as the couple is left alone the groom takes off the red veil that covers the bride's face.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Throughout its history Hungary has been a great survivor. It survived the onslaughts of the Tartars and Turks, the Habsburgs and Russians in the Carpathian Basin, and the enormous devastation of two world wars. The difficulties faced by the Hungarians have even been integrated into their national anthem, which describes Hungarians as “people torn by fate.” At the time of the Roman Empire Hungary was known as the province of Pannonia. After the fall of Rome, it was invaded by a number of tribes around 375 C.E. Prominent among them were the Huns (a Mongolian-Turkish nomadic tribe) who expanded into Eastern Europe. This marked the beginning of the Great Migration Era (migration of Germanic, Turkish, and Slavic tribes from Eurasia and their settlement in Europe). The Huns founded their empire in the region of Hungary in the fifth century. For a time it was led by Attila, who was considered the greatest king of the Huns. It is likely that the name Hungary is derived from the name of the Huns.

Apparently contemporaries mistakenly referred to the peoples living in the Carpathian Basin as Hungari, believing that they were descendants of the Huns.

After the empire of the Huns disintegrated Germanic tribes ruled Hungary for about 100 years; they were followed by the Avars, a nomadic Eurasian tribe. During the 200-year supremacy of the Avars, various tribes, including the Slavonic tribes, Moravians, Bulgars, Croato-Serbian, and Poles, tried to establish control in the region, but none of them could stand up to the might of the Avars. Near the end of the ninth century, a confederation of seven nomadic tribes, calling themselves Magyars (ethnic Hungarians), migrated to Hungary from the Eurasian plains and, finding the basin ideal for their pastoral-agrarian way of living, began establishing settlements. Unlike other tribes migrating into Europe at the time, they did not speak an Indo-European language such as Germanic or Slavonic. The Magyars arrived speaking a language that incorporated traces of Turkish and Iranian influences that linguists have classified as Finno-Ugric.

The Magyars fought many battles with the Avars and ultimately defeated them, gaining power over the region. Árpád (c. 850–907), the elected leader of the Magyars and the six other tribes, led his army to victory against the ferocious Avars. His successors founded the kingdom of Hungary. Stephen I (997–1038), a descendant of Árpád, became chieftain when his father, Geza (c. 940–97), died, and consolidated his power by ousting rival clan chiefs and taking their lands. Pope Sylvester II (c.950–1003) agreed to recognize Stephen as king, and he was crowned the first king of Hungary on Christmas Day in 1000.

Árpád's descendants continued to rule the country until 1301, after which a series of weak rulers and uprisings among the peasants in the Pannonian lowlands and parts of Transylvania resulted in the disintegration of central rule. The resulting chaos set the stage for the next empire to rule Hungary, the Habsburgs, who reigned as kings of Hungary from 1526 to 1918, and pursued a resettlement of ravaged areas with new immigrants from Austria and Germany, Slovakia, Romania (Wallachia and Moldavia at the time), and Serbia. The Habsburgs also ruled numerous hereditary lands in central Europe, collectively named the Austrian Empire in 1804, and the Hungarians constantly struggled against absorption into the homogenized Habsburg Empire.

The Revolution of 1848 began on March 15 with mass demonstrations against Habsburg rule throughout the kingdom. Taking advantage of the uprisings, Hungarian reformers declared Hungary's autonomy within the Habsburg Empire. Following this Austria came to power in Hungary. Amid rising resistance to Austrian rule within the Hungarian kingdom, the Compromise of 1867 was signed, and a dual monarchy came into existence in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. The compromise provided that Austria and Hungary would maintain essentially separate governments under the same monarch. Foreign policy, the military, and the economy remained unified, but the Hungarian government became an equal partner in the administration of the empire.

In June 1914 seven conspirators armed by the Black Hand (a secret society of Serbian officers) assassinated Austro-Hungarian Archduke Franz Ferdinand in Sarajevo, Bosnia, the spark that ignited the Great War, now known as World War I. The assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand brought into play the tangled alliances of Europe. Although Hungary and the Archduke shared a mutual dislike of each other, the Austro-Hungarian military dragged Hungary into the punitive war against Serbia. Russia, which had long had designs on Hungary, came to the aid of Serbia, Germany allied with Austro-Hungary against Russia, and France and England allied with Germany against Russia. The result was disastrous for Austro-Hungary.

In 1918 as a result of its defeat in World War I, the Austro-Hungarian monarchy collapsed. An interim government foolishly disbanded the weary army. The Romanians, Czechs, and Serbs seized the opportunity and quickly occupied huge areas of Hungary. In March 1919 Leninist Bolsheviks joined the government, and in April Bela Kun (1886–1939), a leading Hungarian Communist, Attila the Hun was a great warrior and the most powerful king of the European Huns. During his reign European Huns led a series of invasions into neighboring countries and annexed them. He was known as Attila the Conqueror, and his empire stretched from the Danube River to the Baltic region and covered all of central Europe, as well as the region around the Black Sea. He died in a battle with Germanic tribes in 455 C.E., marking the end of the European Hun Empire.

Attila the Hun

proclaimed the Hungarian Soviet Republic and took over the remaining unoccupied areas. This government proved to be short-lived because the Romanian army invaded Hungary. The Communist forces were defeated, and the Soviet Republic was brought down on August 6, 1919. For the first time in its history the Carpathian Mountains no longer protected Hungary, and the winners of World War I awarded more than two-thirds of Hungary, along with millions of Hungarian speakers, to Serbia, Romania, and the new country of Czechoslovakia.

Led by the former Austro-Hungarian Admiral Miklos Horthy (1868–1957), rightist military forces entered Budapest in the wake of the defeat by Romania and filled the power vacuum. Horthy made an alliance with Nazi Germany in the 1930s, in the hope of reversing the territorial losses that had followed World War I. Hungary was rewarded by Germany with the return of historically Hungarian territories that had been absorbed by Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Romania. Hungary took an active part in World War II. Following the fall of Nazi Germany Hungary fell under the Soviet sphere of influence and was converted into a Communist state following a short period of democracy in 1946–47.

After 1948 Communist leader Matyas Rakosi (1892–1971) established a Stalinist regime in the war-ravaged country. On October 23, 1956, hundreds of thousands of Hungarians rose up against the government in what came to be known as the Hungarian Uprising, and within days millions of Hungarians had come out to support it. The Stalinist regime was deposed and reform-minded Communists took control of the country. When the rebels announced their intention to withdraw from the Warsaw Pact (a treaty in which eight Eastern European Communist states pledged to defend one another if any one was attacked), the Soviet Union intervened with overpowering military force. Reform-minded Communist Prime Minister Imre Nagy (1896–1958) was arrested and executed. In the end 50,000 Hungarian rebels and 7,000 Soviet troops were killed. Thousands more were wounded in the fighting.

In the late 1980s Hungary led the movement to dissolve the Warsaw Pact and shifted toward a multiparty democracy and a market-oriented economy. Following the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, Hungary developed closer ties with Western Europe, joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in 1999, and the European Union (EU) on May 1, 2004.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

East of the Alps, the Carpathian Mountains form a crescent of snow-capped peaks, enclosing an alluvial plain where, tens of thousands of years ago, a huge inland lake had existed. The mountains, interspersed with rolling hills, protect the open spaces on its north, east, and southeast sides. Shaped like a kidney, Hungary lies in the center of Europe, sharing borders with seven other countries: Austria, Slovakia, Ukraine, Romania, Serbia and Montenegro, Croatia, and Slovenia.

Although Hungary is predominantly flat, the landscape ranges from the low-lying regions of a great plain in the east, called the Great Hungarian Plain, to mountain ranges and hilly regions in the west and southwest. The country is divided into three large regions by the Danube (Duna) and Tisza Rivers. The highest peak in Hungary is Mount Kekes at 3,330 feet in the Matra Mountains along the country's northern border.

Hungary has over 1,000 lakes. The largest among them is Lake Balaton, the major attraction of Hungary's resort area, and the largest freshwater lake in western and central Europe. There are also a number of thermal lakes, among which Lake Hévíz (Hévíz Spa) is said to be the largest in the world; it is also reputed to have curative effects.

The climate of Hungary is continental (a climate typical of the interiors of the large continents of the northern hemisphere): The winters are cold, cloudy, and humid, and the summers are warm to hot. The coldest month in the country is January and the hottest, July. The average annual temperature is 50°F, with temperature extremes of approximately 81°F in the summer and 22°F in the winter. The country enjoys an average yearly rainfall of approximately 24 inches.

ECONOMY

From the beginning agriculture has played a significant role in Hungary's economic system, but the history of the nation has often led to drastic changes. The Habsburgs enjoyed a feudal system in which the peasants toiled to increase the wealth of the nobility. Under Soviet domination the forced collectivization of farms impoverished the nation, and the final decades of the 20th century were economically tumultuous. Following World War II the peasants were given land rights, but between 1949 and 1963 the farms were forcefully collectivized. However the system, based on centralized instructions without productive incentives, meant that agricultural production in the 1960s was unable to match the levels recorded in 1938. Since 1975 the Hungarian agricultural and food industries have managed some recovery, especially in some sectors of production and attained internationally recognized high standards.

A member of the European Union (EU) since 2004, Hungary has steadily made the transition from a centrally planned economy to a demand-driven market economy. It has made tremendous strides and now boasts a per capita income close to one-half that of the Big Four European nations (Germany, Italy, France, and Great Britain). But the citizens of Hungary have paid a price for these economic successes: a high level of inflation (still in the high- to mid-teens), an unemployment rate that continues at well above 10 percent (more in eastern areas of Hungary), and a painful decrease in the real earnings of workers, especially those in the public sector—teachers, medical personnel, and civil servants—as well as those living on fixed incomes, the elderly in particular.

The major industries in Hungary include mining, metallurgy, agriculture, construction materials, processed foods, textiles, chemicals (especially pharmaceuticals), and motor vehicles. Most of the country's trade is conducted with Germany, Austria, Italy, and Russia. The principal import items include fuels, raw materials, and semifinished products, agricultural and forestry products, and light industrial goods. The main exports are agricultural products, pharmaceuticals, bauxite, machine tools, and lighting equipment.

Although the ongoing privatization process has caused a drop in agricultural production, the disrupted balance is being restored to a realistic level of supply and demand since its realignment based on actual market conditions. Since 1997 Hungary has enjoyed steady economic progress, with growth rates around 4 percent a year. Despite the worldwide economic slowdown, Hungary's gross domestic product (GDP) growth—at a little over 5 percent in 2000—was the highest in the world, mainly pushed by increased exports. The nation has made progress dealing with inflation and unemployment, both of which have substantially declined since 2001. In the midst of technological advances and restructuring, Hungary is taking great care to make sure that its natural resources are not depleted or destroyed.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The culture of Hungary is rich and colorful, a reflection of the country's history, which has brought together a variety of traditions: Magyar, Roman, German, Slovak, Croatian, Serbian, and Romanian. Home to great folk art traditions, producing beautiful items of embroidery, pottery, and carving, Hungary is also known for great architecture, music, and literature. Violinists and pianists from Hungary are celebrated worldwide, and the country has given the world great composers such as Franz Liszt, Bela Bartok, Zoltan Kodaly, and Ferenc Erkel, who com-

Hungarian Suicide Song

The music for “Gloomy Sunday” (Szomorú Vasárnap)—the notorious Hungarian Suicide Song—was written in 1933 by Rezső Seress (1899–1968), a Hungarian pianist and composer. (Seress did actually commit suicide in 1968 by jumping out of a window.) The crushing hopelessness and bitter despair that characterized the two stanzas penned by Seress were superseded by the even more mournful, melancholic verses written by Hungarian poet László Javorka. When the song received public attention, it quickly earned the dubious reputation of being a “suicide song.” Hungarian reports tell of people who took their lives after listening to the haunting melody, or who left the lyrics with their farewell letters. Many radio stations, including the BBC, banned “Gloomy Sunday,” saying it was too depressing for the airwaves. To alleviate the pessimistic tone of the song, a third stanza was added, giving the song a dreamy twist, but the suicide reputation has remained. The English version of the song became very popular and many artists have covered it since Billie Holiday’s interpretation in 1941, including Sarah Vaughan (1961), Genesis (1968), Ray Charles (1969), Sinéad O’Connor (1992), Björk (1999), and Venetian Snares (2005).

posed the Hungarian national anthem and the first Hungarian opera. Literature has been inspired by the monumental events of the nation’s history, giving rise to odes, inspiring poems of independence, and producing gritty tales of realism.

The Roman, Gothic, Baroque, and Art Nouveau periods have all influenced Hungarian art and architecture. Thermal baths and spas are an important part of modern life in Hungary. The tradition is an old one as archaeologists have unearthed Roman baths in Hungary.

Because they have been the primary breadwinners in the home, men have traditionally dominated Hungarian families. But as more and more women have become wage earners, the traditional family roles have changed dramatically, and women have come to play more significant, high-profile roles within the family and the larger community as well.

In traditional Hungarian society, games and sports competitions have played an important role, especially for children, and the nation is well known for water sports such as swimming, canoeing, and water polo.

❁ CUISINE

Hungarian cuisine tends to be heavy and meat-centered because traditional recipes reflect the importance of agriculture, especially the family farm, and provide directions for preparing flavorful and unforgettable peasant dishes. Many popular dishes from Hungary took advantage of the bounty of the land and required slow cooking while the farmers worked in the fields. These are stick-to-the-ribs, clog-your-arteries food, many of them pork and beef dishes, particularly goulash (a beef soup) and a stew called porkolt. Basic dishes consist of fatty meat (pork is generally preferred) or overcooked fish, a quantity of starch, and a garnish of pickles. The main dishes often contain potatoes, and are flavored with paprika, black pepper, and onions. Sausages, sauerkraut, and a variety of dumplings are also popular family meals.

In addition to porkolt and goulash, popular Hungarian delicacies include balaszle (spicy fish soup cooked with paprika), jokai bablèves (bean soup), bideg gyümölcsleves (cold fruit soup made from sour cherries), and palacsinta (stuffed crepes).

❁ NEW YEAR’S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 1

The first day of the Western or Gregorian calendar January 1 is celebrated as New Year’s Day throughout the world. In a Hungarian ceremony to usher in the New Year (Ujev), the priest uses salt and water to bless the parishioners’ houses and marks the initials of the three biblical kings (Gaspar, Balthazar, and Melchior) who came to visit the infant Jesus on the doorstep.

On New Year’s Eve (Szilveszter), the effigy of Jack Straw, a puppet signifying the bad luck of the outgoing year, is burned after being paraded through the village. This ancient tradition symbolically destroys the misfortunes of the old year, clearing the way for good luck in the new year. On the streets of Budapest masks and noisy paper trumpets are sold in stalls.

of the reactionary and incompetent Habsburg monarchy in Vienna. This war of independence against Austrian rule aimed at abolishing feudalism, modernizing the economy and infrastructure, and establishing a modern constitutional state with civil liberties. Lajos Kossuth (1802–94), the leader of the Hungarian Revolution, based many of his ideals on the U.S. Declaration of Independence.

Hungary very nearly achieved independence in a series of military victories. When Austria enlisted Russian military assistance, however, the Hungarian Revolution was crushed, and many of its leaders were hanged or shot.

Observed on: October 23

On October 23, 1956, Hungarian students rose up against the Stalinist government in what came to be known as the Hungarian Uprising. Millions of Hungarians came out to support the Hungarian Revolution of 1956 (Az 1956-os népfelkelés emléknappja). The Stalinist regime was deposed, and Communists bent on reform took control of the country. When the rebels threatened to withdraw from the Warsaw Pact, the Soviet Union intervened, and the prime minister Imre Nagy was arrested and executed. Tens of thousands were killed or wounded in the fighting. From the beginning of the uprising on October 23, the revolt lasted just 18 days.

October 23 is also the anniversary of the declaration of a multiparty democracy in Hungary in 1989.

Religious Holidays

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter (Husvet) is a Christian feast celebrating Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. This holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent. In Hungary Easter eggs, a traditional symbol of life and rebirth, of all styles and colors are painted the day before. For Hungarian Christians the eggshell symbolizes the Old Testament portion of the Bible, and the inside represents the New Testament. Moreover, these symbols of rebirth allude to Jesus' resurrection.

Early Sunday morning, children awake to find small gifts of candy and toys beside their beds. A traditional breakfast of Easter eggs, ham, braided cake bread, horseradish, and hot chocolate follows. Many families attend church on Easter morning.

Easter Monday, the first Monday after Lent, is a national holiday and extends the Easter celebration. In earlier days young men would pour buckets of water over young women's heads, supposedly to ward off evil and protect them from harm; in return the women would reward the men with kisses and eggs painted red for passion. Today, instead of pouring water, they spray perfume, and painted eggs as well as chocolate ones are exchanged.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

In Hungary many pregnant women place their trust in midwives for a safe delivery. Some Hungarians believe that cutting the baby's cord less than six or seven inches from the body would mar the baby's physical appearance.

MARRIAGE

Traditional Hungarian weddings are three-day events. All of the guests are personally invited either by the best man or the bride and the groom.

In earlier times the bride wore a tricolor wedding dress along with a headdress embedded with wheat, which symbolized fertility. In the villages the entire village would escort the bride, seated in a decorated cart, to the church or the groom's house, where the wedding would take place. There was also a custom of kidnapping the bride by a group of relatives before the wedding, and the groom had to rescue the bride from her alleged kidnappers.

When she reached the groom's house, the bride was offered a glass of wine by the groom's parents. After drinking the wine, she was required by tradition to toss the glass over her shoulder. Then she would break an egg, a symbol of fertility, on the floor, indicating her desire to have healthy children. Another ritual involved breaking plates on the floor and tossing coins among the shards. Hungarians believed that the more pieces created when the plate broke, the more successful married life would be. The bride was then required to separate the coins from the pieces of plate as a test of her industriousness.

Prior to a church ceremony Hungarians are married in a civil ceremony to legalize the marriage. In the presence of two witnesses and a legal authority, the bride and the groom are declared husband and wife under Hungarian law after confirming that they have freely chosen to get married and signed their names in the marriage registry. The couple then goes to a local church for a Catholic wedding ceremony where their friends and family join them.

During the church service the couple sit on a platform in front of the altar, while friends and relatives express their good wishes for the couple through poems and songs or share fond memories of the bride and the groom. After exchanging wedding vows, the bride and groom move their rings to their right hands from the left, where they had worn them from the time of their engagement. The priest pronounces them husband and wife, and the wedding guests congratulate the newlyweds. After the wedding ceremony the bride presents her husband with three or seven handkerchiefs (three and seven are considered lucky numbers by Hungarians); the groom gives her a small bag of coins.

A wedding reception with much feasting, singing, and dancing follows the church service. A custom called the "money dance" is observed: The guests have to "pay" money to earn the right to dance with the bride. They either pin the money on her wedding gown or drop it into her wedding shoes. The money is used by the bride to set up her new home, as well as to meet the expenses of the honeymoon trip. Dancers are accompanied by the violin, the traditional musical instrument for weddings.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The first inhabitants of Iceland were Irish monks who stayed on the island during the late ninth century C.E. About 30 years after they left, Norwegian Vikings arrived and became the first permanent settlers in Iceland. There are vivid descriptions of these Viking adventurers, who came from Norway in long-boats, in the Landnámabók (Book of Settlements), an Icelandic genealogical record from the 13th century. The period between 870 and 930 is known as the Age of Settlement, when conflict in Scandinavia forced many people to seek refuge in Iceland. It is thought that the Vikings were escaping from their tyrannical King Harald Haarfagri (Harald Fairhair, Harald I; c. 848–c. 931) who wanted their lands in southern Norway.

The settlers decided to adopt a parliamentary form of government because they had experienced the drawbacks to monarchy in their native country. A district assembly and a state assembly, or Althing, were created in 930, and a code of law was drawn up. The Althing is considered to be the oldest functioning legislative body in the world. Iceland was declared a Christian country in 999, and this helped to unite the country. Over the course of the next century, Iceland developed an agrarian economy.

Iceland enjoyed 300 years of independence until the first half of the 13th century when a period of great turmoil and political wrangling called the Sturlung Age began. A Norwegian king named Hákon Hákonarson (Hákon IV or Hákon the Old; 1204–63), invaded the country and ruthlessly plundered it. At the same time, Mt. Hekla (4,890 feet), Iceland's most active volcano, erupted in 1300, 1341, and 1389; many lives were lost and property destroyed. On top of the invasion and volcanic eruptions, epidemics, including the Black Death (bubonic plague), raged through the country between 1348 and 1350.

Danish rule was imposed on Iceland at the end of the 14th century. Religious conflict between church and state in Europe culminated in the Protestant Reformation of 1550 when the Lutheran faith became Denmark's official doctrine.

Iceland had endured many centuries of domination by foreign powers. It continued to suffer from exploitation by the Danes on the one hand and natural catastrophes on the other.

Mighty Explorers

Many explorers in the North Atlantic used Iceland as their base. Among them was Eric the Red, the son of a Norwegian who settled in Iceland. Eric colonized Greenland in 982 C.E., and his son Leif Eriksson is considered to be the first European to have explored the North American coast. He christened it “Vinland the Good,” because of its pleasant climate and wealth of natural resources. In one of the Icelandic sagas, Eriksson is said to have heard about Vinland from another Icelander named Bjarni Herjolfsson, who had come across it 14 years earlier. These explorations are the main subject of the literary sagas of this period.

Pirates were another source of trouble. Icelanders began to feel the need to assert their right to self-rule. In the early half of the 19th century, the independence movement gained momentum with a nationalist named Jon Sigurdsson (1811–79) as its leader. He took the demands of the Icelanders to Denmark and pressured the Danish government to give partial independence to Iceland. In 1874, Denmark allowed Iceland to draw up its own constitution. Iceland was permitted to decide its domestic issues and, in 1918, was given partial freedom, with the status of an independent state within the Danish kingdom. But Denmark still controlled Iceland’s defense and foreign affairs.

During World War II Germany invaded and occupied Denmark in 1940. Even though Iceland had previously maintained a position of neutrality, British forces invaded and took control of the region on May 10, 1940. Iceland quickly responded by agreeing to fight alongside the occupying forces.

In 1941 responsibility for the defense of Iceland passed to the United States, which took control of the region from British forces. During the U.S. occupation a plebiscite was held in Iceland in which the people voted unanimously in favor of independence from Denmark. Iceland declared its independence on June 17, 1944.

In 1949 Iceland became a charter member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) under the stipulation that it would not participate in any kind of offensive action against another nation.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Geologically a relatively young country, the main island of Iceland is made up of desert plateaus, sandy deltas, volcanoes, lava fields, and glacial landscapes. About half of the country is above 1,312 feet and the highest point, Hvannadalshnúkur, is about 6,952 feet.

Less than 1 percent of Iceland is fit for agriculture, and this area is located in the southwest between the capital of Reykjavik and the town of Vik. Due to frequent volcanic activity and earthquakes, there are practically no trees, but the island has grasslands, bogs, and barren deserts in addition to a number of hot springs and geysers.

In Iceland summers are mild, and winters rather cold. The southern and western coasts receive a lot of rainfall, and July and August are the warmest months. The northern and eastern parts of the country have better weather. The deserts in the interiors are prone to blizzards and sandstorms. The climate is very changeable in Iceland and during the course of a single day one can experience rain, sunshine, drizzle, and snow. The air is clean and relatively free of pollution.

Iceland can be divided into the following regions: Reykjavík and the capital area, west Iceland, Westfjords, north Iceland, east Iceland, the central highlands, and south Iceland, each having its own charm and unique terrain. In west Iceland the glaciers and waterfalls are spectacular. The Westfjords has a sparse human population but plenty of wildlife in the form of seabirds and Arctic foxes. There are small, scattered fishing villages that still make their living from the sea. In north Iceland, which is part of the Arctic Circle, most people live close to the coast in communities that are sheltered from the elements.

East Iceland is made up of mountains, plains, highlands, and glaciers. In south Iceland there are moss-covered lava fields that are a couple of centuries old. There is a lot of geothermal activity that produces several hot springs, which are very popular with visitors. In the central highlands, the landscape is barren, with glaciers and deserts of black sand, springs, and active and spent volcanoes. There is also the occasional outcrop of vegetation that has managed to survive despite its inhospitable sub-Arctic surroundings.

ECONOMY

Iceland’s capitalist economy is supplemented by a well-developed welfare system. Unemployment rates are low, and there is little disparity in income. The main source of revenue is the fishing industry, which employs almost 12 percent of the population. Due to the almost constant darkness, business slows down in winter. Although Iceland has good reserves of hydrothermal and geothermal power, it is dependent on fishing for 70 percent of its export income. Its other chief exports are aluminum and ferrosilicon.

The government plans to boost the economy by

Fun Fact

Icelanders have a storytelling tradition that dates back to the 9th century. Up until the 12th century, these stories took the form of poems composed on heroic themes. In the late 12th and early 13th centuries, known as the Saga Age, poetic expression was replaced by epic tales of the early settlers: romance, conflict, and the growth of the country.

privatizing state-owned industries and diversifying the economy. It is not eager to join the European Union (EU) because it does not want to lose control over its fishing industry. Many new areas of development are being explored, such as software production, biotechnology, and financial services. The tourism sector has also grown, and ecotourism and whale-watching have become popular.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Warriors and farmers are the ancestors of present-day Icelanders. They had to build a new home for themselves in harsh conditions, and the traits that this required have forged a nation of people who are tough and independent. Icelanders have a rich literary heritage with their famous sagas recounting historic struggles, battles, and heroic exploits. Icelandic sagas are considered among the most noteworthy of all medieval writing. Iceland has also produced modern writers such as Halldór Kiljan Laxness (1902–98), who won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1955.

Traditional Icelandic music is deeply rooted in religion. Most of the songs are Protestant hymns and are sung during religious celebrations. Besides the traditional lullabies, Iceland is also known for cowboy songs, brought into the country by the American soldiers who have been posted in the region since World War II. However, the most recognizable face of Icelandic music today is that of former Sugarcubes lead singer, Björk (b. 1965).

Icelandic, the official language, has hardly changed since the Vikings settled Iceland in the ninth and 10th centuries. It has rejected foreign words, preferring instead to form its own new words derived from ancient Viking words. Thus, the word for computer becomes bolva, made up of the ancient words for number and prophetess. English and Danish are also widely spoken in Iceland.

Icelandic women retain their names after marriage because Icelanders use patronyms or matronyms instead of surnames. The society and culture are “woman friendly,” and women enjoy positions of leadership in both government and business. Homosexuals are also accepted and treated equally. In July 1992 all discriminatory criminal laws were done away with and in 1996 an antidiscrimination law was passed that prohibits discrimination in the provision of merchandise or services as well as actions intended to humiliate, degrade, or defame lesbians and gay men. Although there is no right to adopt, a Registered Partnership Law was also passed that allows lesbians and gays to confirm partnership in a civil ceremony. Though small, there is a gay scene in Reykjavik, and on the first weekend of August, lesbians and gay men hold a two-day Gay Pride celebration that culminates in a parade through the capital city.

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Icelandic cuisine tends toward the “exotic.” One such preparation is bákari, shark meat that has been buried for six months in the ground to allow it to decompose sufficiently. Rútsprungur is ram’s testicles that have been pickled in whey and shaped into a cake; svie is charred sheep’s head, with the eyes intact, which is cut in half and then boiled and eaten, either fresh or pickled. Another dish is slatur, a mixture of sheep leftovers tied up in the stomach and cooked.

Fish is a mainstay of the Icelandic diet; chicken, duck, turkey, and lamb are also common. Other traditional dishes include bar_fiskur (haddock), bleikja (char), lundi (puffin), whale blubber, whale steaks, seal meat, and skyr, a yogurtlike preparation made of skimmed milk and a bacteria culture. Thorramatur are salted, pickled, or dried meats and fish commonly consumed during the winter months. Coffee is a favorite beverage, while beer, wine, and spirits are available but expensive. A traditional Icelandic brew is brennivín, made from potatoes and flavored with caraway.

Fun Fact

Since 874, Mt. Hekla has erupted more than 20 times. During the Middle Ages, Icelanders called the volcano the “Gateway to Hell.”

Fun Fact

Among all the members of NATO, Iceland is the only country that does not have its own military force. It has only a small fleet of ships and a police force. American military forces have been stationed in the country since World War II.

The Cod Wars

The United Kingdom aroused Iceland’s anger when it refused to recognize Iceland’s expanded territorial fishing rights in the 1970s. For a few years there were clashes between Icelandic gunships and British warships in what came to be referred to as the “Cod Wars.” The cod is a common fish that is the basis of the Icelandic fishing industry, and the main issue was the amount of cod caught by fishermen from the two countries. There were three Cod Wars in all.

The first Cod War took place in 1958, when Iceland increased its fishing territory from 4 miles to 12 miles off its coast. The second war occurred between 1972 and 1973, when Iceland wanted to expand its fishing rights to 50 miles off its coast. The third war (1975–76) was sparked when Iceland declared its fishing territory to extend 200 miles off the coast of Iceland. With NATO intervention the two countries were finally able to reach an agreement in June 1976.

Skate Hash

Thorláksmessa, St. Thorlákur's Day, is celebrated on December 23, so it is also the day when Icelanders hope to be finished with their final preparations for the coming Christmas holidays. Closely associated with St. Thorlákur's Day in the western fjords of Iceland is an odiferous skate hash that smells like ammonia. It is said to be so repellent that it makes other holiday dining a treat, no matter how bad. The custom of eating fish on St. Thorlákur's Day began when it marked the end of the Catholic Christmas fast, a period when people weren't permitted to eat meat. After Iceland's conversion to Lutheranism people still needed a meal that was simple to prepare during the last-minute rush of pre-Christmas activities. Not everyone necessarily eats his or her serving.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of May Day are ascribed to the pagan celebrations of farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. The May 1 observance of Labor Day, now also called May Day or Workers' Day, was declared in 1889 by the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. On May 1 in Iceland, trade unions and workers participate in outdoor meetings and demonstrations commemorating the valuable contributions made by workers as well as to discuss the needs and demands labor.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 17

On June 17, 1944, Iceland obtained full independence from Denmark. Iceland had been under the rule of the Kingdom of Denmark since the 14th century. In 1918 Denmark established the Act of Union, which recognized Iceland as a sovereign state united with the kingdom under the rule of the king of Denmark. In 1940 during World War II, Nazi forces invaded Denmark. Although Iceland had previously maintained a position of neutrality, British forces took control of the country on May 10, 1940. Iceland quickly responded by agreeing to fight alongside the Allied (British, French, and U.S.) occupying forces. In 1941 responsibility for the defense of Iceland passed to the United States, which took control of the region from British forces. Under the U.S. occupation a plebiscite was held in Iceland in which the people voted unanimously in favor of independence from Denmark. Thus on June 17, 1944, Iceland declared its independence from Denmark. The day was chosen because it marks the birthday of a great freedom fighter, Jón Sigurðsson, who was born on June 17, 1811, and was the leader of Iceland's first independence movement.

On June 17 celebrations are held throughout Iceland, but the biggest celebrations are in the capital of Reykjavik. The president of Iceland presides over the Independence Day celebrations and unfurls the national flag. There are official speeches, sporting events, outdoor concerts, and a spectacular display of fireworks in the evening. A carnival atmosphere pervades Reykjavik as people throng the streets, enjoying a day off from work and school.

✿ LABOR DAY WEEKEND

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First weekend in August

In addition to May Day (or Workers' Day), Icelanders also celebrate Labor Day Weekend, a holi-

Because the weather in Iceland is already turning cold in September, Labor Day, also called Verslunnarmannahelgi, is celebrated a month earlier than it is celebrated in the United States and people traditionally head for the outdoors for two days of relaxation.

✿ DAY OF ST. THORLÁKUR

Observed in: Iceland
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 23

Day of St. Thorlákur, or Thorláksmessa, commemorates the anniversary of the death of St. Thorlákur (1133–93), the bishop of Skalholt, who is also one of the three Catholic saints of Iceland. He died on December 23, 1193 and, although the Iceland parliament canonized him in 1198, the Roman Catholic Church has not. Until 1500 two feasts of St. Thorlákur were celebrated—one on July 20, as well as one on December 23. However after Iceland became a Protestant country, the date of the Feast of St. Thorlákur was fixed on December 23.

This is the last day for Christmas preparations, including decorating the Christmas tree, buying last-minute presents, and cleaning the house. St. Thorlákur's Day is also the day on which the traditional smoked mutton (hangiket) for Christmas was cooked. Shops stay open until 11 P.M. In the western fjords, the ancient tradition of consuming cured skate hash on this day has spread across Iceland.

Fun Fact

Iceland has an interesting naming system, which at one time was the norm in the Norse countries. Last names are derived from the father's name, with -arson ("son of") or -dottir ("daughter of") added as a suffix.

throughout Europe people sought some expression involving pranks, frolic, and good cheer. In Greece it is called Clean Monday.

But there was also a more practical aspect of the Shrovetide festivities, and that was using up all the foods that would otherwise go bad during the fast, such as eggs and butter. In Iceland Bun Day refers to two practices associated with the day. First people are hit on the buttocks with a stick before they have gotten out of bed. Second and more pleasantly, it is also a day for eating sweet buns with whipped cream, and throughout Iceland, homes, restaurants, and some bakeries offer large quantities of delicately made cream puffs, or “buns,” which are eaten with great pleasure. This event is thought to have been introduced to Iceland by Norwegian and Danish bakers who migrated there during the 19th century.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, or Holy Thursday, is a Christian holiday commemorating Jesus’ washing of his disciples’ feet before sharing a meal known as the Last Supper. The holiday falls on the Thursday before Easter and is called Maundy Thursday because maundatum (a Latin word meaning “commandment”) is the first word that was spoken by Jesus before he began to wash the feet of his disciples. It was reported that Jesus said, “Mandatum novum do vobis,” which translates to “A new commandment I give to you.” On this day, devout Lutherans in Iceland attend church services.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Christian festival of Easter celebrates Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. The night before Easter Icelanders attend a special midnight church service. Easter egg hunts do not take place in Iceland because the land is generally covered with snow during Easter, and the weather is extremely cold. Instead, children receive chocolate-filled Easter eggs and fortune cookies on Easter. Easter dinner usually consists of pork, peas, carrots, jelly, and red wine. In Iceland feasting and the exchange of greetings continue even on Easter Monday, which is a national holiday.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

The Christian festival of Christmas, also called Jól (Yule) and Jóladagur in Iceland, celebrates the birth of Jesus. In Iceland Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (Yule Eve, or Athfangadagur) and last until December 26. On Christmas Eve celebrations commence at 6 P.M. Children gather around the Christmas tree to open presents. Many Icelanders attend special Christmas Eve services in their local churches and sing devotional hymns and carols.

On Christmas, Icelanders visit their extended families to celebrate. Gifts and greetings are exchanged, and people enjoy a special Christmas meal that includes dishes such as hangikjot (leg of roasted lamb), rjúpa (rock ptarmigan), and jólagrautur, a rice porridge with raisins. It is an old Scandinavian tradition to hide a lucky almond in the jólagrautur: Laufabrauth, a thin deep-fried wheat bread, is also served. Traditionally, laufabrauth was delicately cut with intricate designs but it is now available, already cut, in Iceland's grocery stores. Cut into thin strips, it also replaces nachos or potato chips.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Celebrations here continue on the second day of Christmas, which is known as Annar Jóldagur. Since Iceland was under British rule for a brief period of time during World War II, December 26 is also celebrated as Boxing Day in Iceland. Boxing Day is observed in the United Kingdom as a day for giving gifts to service workers (like postal workers) and those who render useful service throughout the year.

❁ THIRTEENTH DAY OF CHRISTMAS

Observed in: Heimaey Island

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 6

The last day of Christmas, conventionally celebrated by Roman Catholic and Orthodox Churches as Epiphany (the day when the Three Wise Men brought gifts to the newborn Jesus in Bethlehem), is called The Thirteenth in Iceland. On Heimaey Island the day is celebrated with great style and imagination based on Iceland's Nordic heritage. A procession of 13 Icelandic youth (jólasveinar) carry flaming torches, along with Gryla and Leppalúthi (their troll parents) and an assortment of other terrible trolls, through the town. The procession makes its way finally to a huge bonfire where elves, fairies, and other magical creatures dance. In this way Christmas is bid goodbye with an impressive fireworks display at midnight.

❁ PJODHATID

Observed in: Heimaey Island

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Early August

Fun Fact

Archaeologists have found a well in Iceland from the Norse era. The well had dozens of skeletal remains that belonged to infants who were condemned to death by exposure.

Pjodhatid is an independence day festival held in the Vestmannaeyjar region of Iceland, on Heimaey Island, one month later than independence celebrations in the rest of Iceland. In 1874 when Denmark agreed to grant Iceland partial independence, the island's inhabitants were unable to reach the mainland to celebrate Iceland's new status as a republic because of bad weather, so they held their own celebration.

Today Pjodhatid is a huge annual event with many attractions, and the island is filled with campers from the mainland who have come to join in the festivities. Many of Iceland's most popular bands perform. There are impressive firework displays, a huge bonfire, and a communal sing-a-long, and people sing, eat, and party until dawn.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Iceland in ancient times, a newborn child was accepted in the family only after the performance of certain rituals. The mother would show her acceptance of the child by breast-feeding. The father performed a ritual called vatni ausinn, which involved taking the child on his knee and sprinkling water on him or her. Only after the performance of these rituals did the child earn the right of inheritance and other special rights within the family under Norse law. An infant that did not gain acceptance, usually due to some kind of deformity and the economic hardships of the family, was condemned to death by exposure to the elements.

Norse tradition allowed well-to-do families to entrust the upbringing of their children to families of lower social status. The less well-off families were paid a certain amount in exchange for their services. This tradition helped develop social bonds between the upper- and lower-class families.

❁ MARRIAGE

In modern Iceland couples are encouraged to have long engagements in order to develop trust and to bond before finally getting married. In ancient Iceland, on the other hand, it was traditional for weddings to take place within a few days of the engagement.

In contemporary Iceland weddings are very much patterned on U.S. and European weddings with bridal showers, bachelor parties, tossing rice at the couple for good luck after the ceremony, and a reception following the church ceremony.

❁ DEATH

The ancient Norse believed that, with the exception a few privileged people, most of the dead remained in their graves and did not move into the afterlife. Depending on the status and geographic location of the deceased, they were buried with either the daily necessities they might need should they reach the afterlife or with a model of a ship, suggesting they would continue their journey even in the afterlife. Poor people were generally buried with very few things, while the extremely rich were buried along with horses, servants, and material goods.

Cremation was the preferred funeral rite, and warriors were cremated with their broken shields and bent swords as a mark of respect.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Believed to be one of the earliest civilizations of the world, India boasts Stone Age rock shelters at Bhimbetka in Madhya Pradesh that contain paintings that are, so far, the earliest known traces of humans in the area. The first known permanent settlements appeared some 9,000 years ago and became the Indus Valley Civilization, which peaked between 2600–2000 B.C.E. It was followed by the Vedic Civilization. Archaeologists have found evidence of the existence of two great cities of that era called Mohenjodaro and Harappa. They are located in what is now Pakistan.

Starting around 500 B.C.E. a spate of independent kingdoms emerged, and India came to be made up of many small kingdoms that were often overrun by numerous invaders from Central Asia. The rulers of these states encouraged the growth of art, science, literature, astronomy, and philosophy, which flourished under their patronage. The territory governed by the Maurya Dynasty was the most significant of these kingdoms and under the rule of Ashoka (273–32 B.C.E.; pronounced a-shok), the greatest Mauryan king, was the first ruler of ancient Bharata (India). Under him the region prospered and flourished.

Ashoka ruled a vast territory, much larger than the present Republic of India. It encompassed the territory from Afghanistan to Bengal and south to Mysore. Ashoka was also a supporter of Buddhism, and he had several monuments built that marked important locations in Gautama Buddha's life. In Sanskrit his name means "without sorrow."

A Portuguese explorer named Vasco da Gama (1460–1524) sailed to India in 1498, and the Portuguese took control of some coastal parts of India. Goa became the capital of the Portuguese Empire, and the Portuguese established a strong foothold in the region. The Indian Army eventually drove them out in 1961, and their 450-year rule came to an end. The French and the Dutch also visited India, but their stays were short-lived, and they ruled only small areas.

Fun Fact

The Himalayan Mountains are the highest mountain chain in the world where all 14 of the highest peaks are found.

In 1526 Babar, also Babur (1483–1530), a descendant of the famous Genghis Khan (1162–1227), invaded India and established the Mughal Dynasty. The Mughals were Muslims and spread Islam over a large part of northern India. The Mughal Empire lasted till 1857, when the British deported the Emperor Bahadur Shah Zafar to Rangoon. The British set up the East India Company in 1612. They had come to India with the primary intention of establishing trade relations but, seeing the lack of unity within the country, took advantage of the situation and colonized it.

Nationalist sentiment in India increased in the first half of the 19th century, and this led to an uprising in 1857, but it was firmly suppressed by the British. However the Indians were determined to overthrow the British, and in the 20th century, a new phase of the struggle for independence began. Led by Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948), a lawyer from South Africa, who went on to become the father of the nation, the Indians embarked on a prolonged struggle for independence from the British. Eventually in August 1947, India gained independence from the British and was granted the status of a secular democratic republic in 1950.

However at the same time, members of the Muslim minority of India, who were numerous, became apprehensive that Hindus would dominate the country after independence. This increased partisan feelings, causing a split between the two religious groups. Muhammad Ali Jinnah (1876–1948) became the leader of the Muslims, while Jawaharlal Nehru (1889–1964) led the Hindus. When the Muslims pressed for their own territory, political tensions reached a peak, leading to widespread riots. Ultimately the country was divided into India and Pakistan.

After the division the Hindus moved from Pakistan to India, and Jawaharlal Nehru became the prime minister of India. The Muslims moved to Pakistan, and it is estimated that more than 2,500,000 people lost their lives in the wave of par-tianship that swept the region at that time. Post-independence, border disputes with Pakistan occurred leading to wars in 1948, 1965, and 1971. A dispute over the occupation of Kashmir, a region in north India, remains unresolved.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the southern part of Asia, India is flanked by Pakistan, Nepal, Myanmar, Bhutan, China, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, the Arabian Sea, the Indian Ocean, and the Bay of Bengal. Some of the most striking geographical features of India include the Himalayan mountain range to the north, the fertile Indo-Gangetic plains that cover the northern and eastern parts of the country, the Thar Desert in the west, and the Deccan plateau in the southern region.

The highest point in India is Mt. Kanchenjunga in the Himalayan range. It stands 28,156 feet high.

India is also a land of mighty rivers. Some of the most prominent are the Ganges (Ganga), Yamuna, Godavari, and the Krishna.

The climate in India varies from temperate in the northern parts of the country to tropical monsoon in the southern parts. The average temperature during summer can reach as high as 120°F, especially in the southeastern state of Andhra Pradesh, while during winter the temperatures can dip as low as -26°F in Ladakh in the northern states of Jammu and Kashmir. Monsoon winds blowing from the southwest provide rain during the monsoon season, which lasts from June to September.

India is home to a wide variety of trees such as sandalwood, deodhar (cedar), poplar, banyan, palms, oaks, spruce, bamboo, and extensive mangrove forests. India accounts for almost 6 percent of the world's flora and has more than 45,000 species of plants (33 percent are native species), which includes 15,000 species of flowering plants.

More than 5,000 species of large animals are found in India. Leopards, lions, tigers, monkeys, elephants, snakes, crocodiles, jackals, rhinoceros, kingfishers, peacocks, parrots, and pygmy hogs are all part of the rich Indian fauna.

❁ ECONOMY

In 1991 the Indian economy entered a phase of liberalization after economic reforms were introduced, and it is one of the fastest growing economies in the world. It is the fourth largest in the world in terms of purchasing power parity and the tenth largest in terms of currency conversion. The official currency of India is the Indian rupee.

Although agriculture contributes 25 percent to the nation's economy, industries such as information technology (IT), textiles, mining, petroleum, handicrafts, and film have become the driving forces. In recent years India has become one of the largest IT players in the world due its expertise in software and the booming business-process out-

Royal Bengal Tigers

Bengal tigers, also known as Royal Bengal tigers, are an endangered species found in the Sunderbans, a beautiful forest region of West Bengal. This species belongs to the feline, or cat, family (Felidae) and is its largest living member.

Bengal tigers are faced with the threat to their survival due to a loss of natural habitat and poaching. They are hunted for their fur and to serve as ingredients for traditional East Asian medicines.

sourcing (BPO) industry.

Some of the major export items of India are gems and jewelry, handicrafts, leather products, software services and technology, agricultural products, chemical products, and engineering goods. The most imports are machinery, fertilizer, and crude oil.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

India is ethnically diverse, multilingual, and a culturally rich secular society. In terms of ethnicity, India is dominated by Indo-Aryans, who constitute 72 percent of the nation's population and occupy most of the northern regions of the Indian subcontinent. They are closely followed by the Dravidians, who reside mainly in the southern parts of the country. The northeast is dominated by Mongol descendants.

Freedom of religion and communal harmony are the cornerstone of Indian society. India is home to all the prominent religions of the world, including Hinduism, Islam, Christianity, Sikhism, Buddhism, Jainism, Zoroastrianism, and various other faiths, as well as being the place where several originated. There are so many religions, and so many rituals and observances, that it is possible to travel in India for a year and participate in a different festival every day (if the timing is just right).

Hindi, spoken by 30 percent of the nation's population, is the national language of India, but English is widely used in business, by government departments, as the medium of instruction for post-graduate education, and as the language of communication among Indians of other linguistic backgrounds. In addition to Hindi, official status has been granted to at least 20 Indian languages. Most Indians speak at least three languages: Hindi, English, and their mother tongue.

India has a rich traditional folk culture. Indian music can be broadly categorized into Hindustani (in the north) and Carnatic (in the south). Traditional folk songs are an integral part of Indian society, and every region has songs related to the different stages of life. Folk songs also provide a way of perceiving the daily occupations of people living in different regions.

Traditional Indian dance forms include bharatnatyam, kathak, kathakali, kuchipudi, manipuri, mobiniattam, and odissi. Most of these traditional Indian dances depict great Indian epics in narratives that combine the stories with spiritual elements.

Indian astrology is one of the most ancient practices in the world. Similarly, ayurveda, which was developed by Charaka over 2,500 years ago, is one of the earliest schools of medicine and is now accepted worldwide.

Epics like the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, the scriptures (Puranas, Vedas), which are all thousands of years old, testify to India's rich culture. The Indian film industry is the biggest in the world, and Indian cinema is appreciated worldwide.

India's architectural wealth is reflected in its hundreds of temples, forts, palaces, and tombs. The Taj Mahal, built of white marble, is considered to be one of the Seven Wonders of the World.

Even though hockey is the national game of India, cricket is the more popular game. Football, which Indians call soccer, is extremely popular. Golf is also gaining popularity among the urban elite.

❁ CUISINE

Indian cuisine is as diverse as its culture. Every region in India has its own specialty, which gives rise to an amazing number of vegetarian and nonvegetarian dishes. Most of these are spicy and delicious. Besides spices, clarified butter (ghee) and yogurt are used extensively in cooking.

Rice and wheat (in the form of various kinds of bread) are the staples of the Indian diet. Among the most popular breads are a flat unleavened bread called roti, a fried bread called puri, and bread baked in a clay oven called naan. Tea and coffee are the preferred beverages of India.

A traditional Indian meal consists of rice, curries, a variety of breads, a vegetable, and a meat or fish side dish, yogurt, pickles, chutney, and salad.

Fun Fact

The Baily Bridge, located in the Ladakh Valley between the Dras and Suru Rivers in the Himalayan Mountains, is the highest bridge in the world.

Fun Fact

The densest human population belt in the world is located along the 1,558-mile length of the Ganges River.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

In India the New Year traditionally falls in the month of Chaitra, the first month of the Hindu lunar calendar, but India has readily adopted the festivities of the Western celebration. Although New Year's Eve and New Year's Day celebrations on these dates are new to India, the observances in India resemble those shared around the world. Some people celebrate with huge parties that last late into the night, while others prefer to spend a quiet evening at home with friends and family. As in other parts of the world, fireworks are used to mark the end of the year.

People in India have also adopted the practice of making a New Year's resolution to change and improve their life in some important

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 26

Republic Day, or Ganatantra Diwas, commemorates the adoption of the first constitution of the independent republic of India on January 26, 1950. This is the date India truly became a sovereign state. Republic Day is a national holiday in India, and there are a variety of celebrations in the capital city of New Delhi. The president of the country confers awards for bravery on those soldiers who have shown their valor on the battlefield and also presents awards to those civilians who have shown exceptional courage and valor in challenging situations. These ceremonies are followed by a parade in which all the regiments of the Indian armed forces march and give the entire world a glimpse of India's defense capabilities. A pageant of floats that depict the daily lives of every region, as well as their songs and dances, showcases India's rich cultural heritage. In the evening Rashtrapati Bhawan (the residence of the president) and other government buildings are beautifully illuminated.

The governors of all the states preside over celebrations of a more limited but similar type in their capitals.

Fun Fact

India is the second most populous country in the world, after China.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 15

At the stroke of midnight of August 14, 1947, the first prime minister of India, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, declared India's independence from Britain. The country had been under British rule for more than 150 years.

Fun Fact

Chess was invented in India.

Despite misunderstandings between Hindus and Muslims, every Indian fought during the independence struggle using violent and nonviolent means. They were led by freedom fighters like Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel (1875–1950), Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose (1897–1945), Bhagat Singh (1907–31), Veer Savarkar (1883–1966), and Chandrashekhar Azad (1906–31). Eventually, after several rounds of talks with British representatives, the leaders obtained freedom for India. A price was paid, however, when the territory was split into Hindu India and Muslim Pakistan.

On Independence Day (Swatantrata Diwas), the major highlight of the day is the current prime minister's announcement of new plans for the improvement of the country. The national flag is raised and cultural events take place in all the state capitals as well as towns of India. Another interesting activity on Independence Day is flying kites. Children all over India fly kites designed with the Indian national colors. The sky seems ablaze with the color of the hundreds of kites that symbolize the happiness and joy this day has brought to millions of Indians.

❁ MAHATMA GANDHI'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 2

This day, also known as Gandhi Jayanti, commemorates the birth of Mahatma Gandhi, a peace-loving leader of India who inspired Indians in their fight against British rule and helped them achieve independence. He was born on October 2, 1869, and Indians consider him the father of their nation. His teachings of nonviolence and its role in helping obtain India's independence inspired many colonized nations around the world to fight against colonial rule and achieve independence following the path of nonviolence.

On this day, prayer meetings are held at Rajghat in New Delhi. This is the monument where Mahatma Gandhi was cremated and which still serves as a memorial to this great leader. Politicians and average citizens unite in bringing floral tributes to Gandhi's tomb to remember his life, legacy, and teachings.

Religious Holidays

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha (also called Feast of Sacrifice, Eid al-Zuha, Id ul Juha, Tabaski, and Bakrid) is celebrated on the 10th day of Duh al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar. It is an important festival for Muslims all over the world because it was on this day that Ibrahim (Abraham) agreed to sacrifice his young son only because God commanded him to do so. Muslims honor Ibrahim for his unquestioning willingness to do God's will.

In India Eid al-Adha is also known as Bakrid. On this day devout Muslim men get up early in the morning and go to their local mosques, along with friends and family members, to offer prayers. People wear new clothes, and a festive atmosphere rules in every Muslim household. It is believed that any Muslim who has wealth equal to, or more than, 14 ounces of gold or who can afford two meals a day must sacrifice an animal on this day. Hence, each family or a group of families sacrifices one goat in honor of Ibrahim's sacrifice. In addition they give children gifts and money.

During the month this holiday is celebrated, many Muslims also undertake a pilgrimage, or Hajj, to Mecca. It is the hope of all Muslims to go to the sacred city once in their lifetime, and the Koran requires it as long as it is both physically and financially feasible for the individual to do so.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

El am Hejir, also called the Islamic New Year, is celebrated in the first month of the Islamic calendar. Muslims celebrate the first day of Muharram not only to usher in the year, but because they believe that, on this day in 622 C.E., Muhammad fled from Mecca to Medina and formed the first Islamic state.

The word mubarram means "mourning," and many Muslims observe a mourning period for at least the first 10 days of this month. Shiite Muslims even observe mourning throughout the month in remembrance of the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, the grandson of Muhammad, who was killed in the Battle of Karbala. This observance is also called Ashura and the Mourning of Karbala.

In India the mourning period is also known as Muharram, and on the 10th day of the month, Shiite Muslims may repent for their sins by inflicting wounds on their bodies with sharp knives in order to experience Hussein's pain. They also parade glittering replicas of Hussein's tomb called tazias. Generally a white horse beautifully decorated for the occasion is also included in the procession to mark the empty mount and horse, Dul Dul of Hazrat Imam Hussein, after his martyrdom. Since Muharram is a sad occasion, everyone in the procession laments by chanting "Ya Hussein" with loud wails. The tazias of Hyderabad and Lucknow are renowned for their special decorations.

Women forsake all adornments on these days. During these 10 days, people clad in black recite incidents from the Battle of Karbala. Everybody then drinks a sweetened cold drink to remind themselves of the terrible thirst that Imam Hussein and his family had to suffer. During the procession, wrestlers and dancers enact scenes depicting the Battle of Karbala.

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: The full Moon of the Hindu month of Phalgun

Holi, or Phagwah, the Festival of Colors, is an annual Hindu spring festival that is celebrated for a two-day period starting on the full Moon day in the month of Phalgun, or in February or March of the Gregorian (Western) calendar. This celebration is also known as the Festival of Colors since people put colors on each other to celebrate this festival.

Holi celebrations take place in many parts of India, but the most elaborate take place in the northern parts of the country.

According to Hindu mythology, there was a demon king in India named Hiranyakashipu, who wanted to avenge the death of his younger brother, also a demon, who had been slain by Vishnu (one of the trinity of gods in Hinduism). Having been granted a boon by Brahma, the king felt omnipotent and ordered all the people to worship him.

But the king's young son Prahalad was a devotee of Vishnu. Going against his father's wishes, Prahalad constantly prayed to Vishnu. Unable to make Prahalad change his ways, the demon king decided to kill him. The demon king asked his sister Holika (from whom the name of the festival is derived) to help him because she was supposedly impervious to fire. They planned to burn Prahalad to death, so Holika sat on a burning pyre with Prahalad on her lap. But Prahalad emerged unharmed by the flames and Holika, the demoness, was burned to death. The bonfire on the eve of the festival celebrates that event.

On the night before Holi, Hindus light huge bonfires symbolic of the burning of the evil Holika. On the day of Holi people throw colored powder on each other. Children shoot colored water with water pistols (pichkaris) and even throw water-filled balloons on people to celebrate. The Holi celebrations in the city of Mathura include traditional folk dancing, singing, and the distribution of sweets.

❁ MAHA SHIVRATRI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Thirteenth or 14th of the dark half of Phalgun in the Hindu calendar

Maha Shivratri (Night of Lord Shiva) is an annual religious celebration that honors Lord Shiva, one of the trinity of Hindu gods. Hindus believe that on this day Lord Shiva performed a cosmic dance called tandav (also known as the dance of destruction) and destroyed the evil in the world. They also believe that on this day Lord Shiva redeemed the world from all sin and that those who pray to him on this day will be absolved of all their sins.

Fun Fact

Although India is the birthplace of Hinduism, one of the ancient religions of the world, the country is also home to over 100 million Muslims, making it one of the non-Islamic nations with the largest population of Muslims in the world.

Fun Fact

There are more than 330 million deities in the Hindu religion.

The festival is celebrated with great devotion throughout India in the Hindu month of Phalgun (spring). Devout Hindus get up early in the morning and visit their local Shiva temple. Milk, flowers, and leaves of the bel tree (bel patra) are offered to Lord Shiva and poured on the Shiva Lingam (a stone that represents Shiva).

Many devotees participate in night-long vigils on this moonless night and sing devotional songs dedicated to Shiva. Many also observe a day-long fast. Young girls who fast and pray to Lord Shiva will marry the man of their dreams.

❁ RAM NAUMI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: April

Ram Naumi, Sri Rama's Birthday, commemorates the birth of Lord Rama, a Hindu god, believed to be one of the incarnations of Vishnu and king of the ancient Indian state of Ayodhya. The life and legacy of Rama is found in the Indian epic Ramayana, which was written by a revered Indian sage Valmiki.

Hindu legends tell how, during the Tretayuga (the second subperiod in a caturyuga and the second age of Earth, calculated at around 3000 B.C.E.), Ravana, the demon king of Lanka (modern Sri Lanka), had been creating havoc on Earth. Because of a boon that Brahma had given him, no god or goddess could kill Ravana. So Vishnu assumed a human form in order to redeem humanity and was born into this world as the son of King Dasharatha and his first queen, Kaushalya, who ruled over the kingdom of Ayodhya. Lord Rama is regarded as the seventh incarnation of Vishnu. As was preordained, Rama annihilated Ravana.

Ram Naumi is celebrated with great joy and enthusiasm throughout India. Eight days before his birthday, readings of the epic Ramayana take place. Chanting, traditional folk songs, devotional music, and ballads based on the life of Rama are also important to the Ram Naumi festival. Many Hindus fast for nine days before Ram Naumi, getting by only on fruit or on one meal without a grain a day. Some live as vegetarians for these nine days.

❁ MOULoud

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, the birth anniversary of Muhammad, the Muslim prophet, is also known as Mawlid an-Nabi; it falls in the third month of the Islamic year, Rabbi al-Awwal. For Muslims all over the world this is a day of great joy, since Muhammad is the most revered prophet among the Muslims. However Muhammad is known to have urged his followers not to make a show of his birthday, and so celebrations are rather low-key. In fact to abide by this directive, many Muslims, especially those who are very conservative, do not celebrate at all.

In India Muhammad's birthday is called Id ul-Milad. Devout Indian Muslims go to their local mosques to pray and listen to readings from the Koran. After worshipping, they visit friends and family members.

is regarded as the protector of the universe). The Hindu festival of Janmashtami (sometimes called Krishna Janmashtami) celebrates the birth of Lord Krishna, arguably the most venerated god in Hinduism. Hindus believe Krishna to be an avatar (incarnation) of Lord Vishnu, the creator of the universe and the second deity, as the Preserver, of the Hindu trinity; the first deity is Lord Brahma, the creator, and the third is Lord Shiva, the destroyer. Krishna is a hero, teacher, warrior, and philosopher in Hinduism. He is also regarded as the eternal platonic lover, devoid of carnal lust. Hindus believe that it was Krishna who delivered the deeply philosophical message of the Bhagavad Gita (The Divine Song), one of the world's religious classics.

On the day before Janmashtami, Hindus observe a day-long fast and offer prayers in Radha Krishna temples to the Lord Krishna and his consort Radha. They also participate in night vigils. At midnight after the birth of Lord Krishna is announced, everyone rejoices and dances with happiness. In many parts of the country people sing devotional songs dedicated to Krishna and attend plays based on the events of his life.

❁ DUSSEHRA

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: First through 10th of the month of Asvina, the seventh month of the Hindu calendar

Dussehra, also called Durga Puja, Vijaya Dashami, or Victorious Tenth Day, is a popular Hindu festival, observed with great fervor by Hindus throughout the world and second only to Diwali, the Festival of Lights, which it precedes. It celebrates the victory of Lord Rama, one of the most revered deities in Hinduism and the main character of the epic Ramayana, over the demon king of Lanka Ravana. The period prior to this day is known as Nine Nights (Navratri). Wakes (jagrans) are organized on these nine consecutive nights, and devout Hindus spend the night singing devotional hymns. During the days they observe a fast and worship the goddess Durga and her nine forms. Prayers and devotional songs dedicated to this Hindu goddess are also sung.

During the 10-day festival, Ramleela (the story of Rama) is performed by professional dance groups and amateur troupes. On the final day of the festival, men, young and old, dressed as Rama, Lakshmana (Rama's brother), Ravana, and other actors in the drama, walk through the main roads and streets of the cities and towns. Ravana and Rama engage in a fight and Ravana palpably is defeated. Spectacular displays of fireworks light the night skies as everyone celebrates the victory of good over evil.

Observed on: Lasting for five days from the 13th of the waning half (Krishna Paksha) of the lunar month Asvina to the second of the waxing half (Shukla Paksha) of Kartika in the Hindu calendar (October–November in the Gregorian calendar)

Diwali, also called Divali, Deepavali, and the Festival of Lights, celebrates the coronation of Lord Rama, the king of Ayodhya, after his return from 14 years of exile. Hindus believe Rama was the seventh reincarnation of Lord Vishnu. Diwali is a festival of lights. Its name literally means “row of lamps,” and refers to the Ramayana, which states that the people of Ayodhya were so happy on the return of Rama that the entire kingdom was decorated with lamps, or diyas, to greet Lord Rama, his wife Sita, and brother Lakshmana, on their arrival and to show them the way to the palace in the darkness of night as well.

This festival is celebrated all over India. Religious ceremonies are held in offices as well as homes by Hindus who decorate them with colorful diyas and flowers. However the major highlight of the festivities is the spectacular display of fireworks and the deafening noise of firecrackers that echoes throughout Diwali night all over India. The light that is associated with the celebrations symbolizes the elimination of spiritual darkness.

On Diwali Hindus wear new clothes and offer prayers to the goddess Lakshmi (goddess of wealth and prosperity). Special sweets are prepared for the occasion. Diwali is also celebrated as Narak Chaturdashi since Hindus also believe that Lord Krishna killed a demon named Narakasura on this day.

Taj Mahal, the monument of love, was built by the Mughal Emperor of India Shahjahan in memory of his beloved wife Mumtaz Mahal. Taj mahal means the “crown of all palaces.” The Taj Mahal is made entirely of white marble, stands on a platform, is surrounded by beautiful ornamental gardens, and overlooks the Yamuna River. On nights when there is a full Moon, the Taj Mahal shines in all its glory, and its ethereal beauty mesmerizes people.

Construction on the Taj began in 1630. It took 23 years of labor and more than 22,000 laborers to complete this glorious monument. Construction material from all over India and Asia was used to build it. It is believed that the emperor had the thumbs of all the workers cut off after its completion so that its beauty could not be duplicated. It is estimated that approximately US$921,276 was spent to construct the Taj Mahal. Every year thousands of tourists flock to Agra to see this monument to eternal love.

❁ PONGAL

Observed in: Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh, and Karnataka

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Four days in Magha, the tenth month of the Hindu calendar

Pongal, while historically a secular harvest festival where it is celebrated, is also called Makar Sankranti in northern India, where it is the second major Sankranti (transit) of the solar calendar. Pongal is celebrated by all people in Southern India for four days. On the first day Bhogi, old clothes and objects are thrown out and burned, marking a new start. The second day, the Pongal day, is celebrated by boiling rice with fresh milk and unrefined sugar (called jaggery) early in the morning. This mixture is allowed to “boil over,” which is what pongal means in Tamil. It symbolizes plenty. People also prepare savories and sweets, visit each other’s homes, and exchange greetings.

The third day, Mattu Pongal, honors cows and bullocks because they plow the land. The cows and bullocks are fed pongal, then decorated and led in a procession to the beat of drums and music. On the fourth and final day, Kanum Pongal—kanum means “to view”—young people customarily gathered along river banks to view and select their future life partners, although this is no longer done.

Other celebrations held at this time include the annual kite-flying day in Maharashtra and Gujarat, and the harvest festival celebrated in Punjab and Haryana, where it is called Lohri.

❁ FLOAT FESTIVAL

Observed in: Madurai

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January–February

Madurai's Float Festival is celebrated on the night of the full Moon between mid-January and mid-February every year. A splendid procession that starts at the Meenakshi Temple features heavily ornamented icons of the god Sundaresha (the incarnation of Lord Shiva) and the goddess Meenakshi (the incarnation of the goddess Parvati) with pearl crowns on their heads and riding on a golden bull. The occasion celebrates the marriage of Sundaresha to Meenakshi when Lord Alagar (the incarnation of Lord Vishnu) gave away his sister (Meenakshi) amid a lot of rejoicing.

Followers dressed in red and yellow finery dance and throw colored water on each other. The icons are then floated around the temple tank (Mariamman Teppakulam in Vandiyur) on a special raft, which is beautifully decorated with flowers and flickering lamps, with traditional music playing in the background. This festival attracts pilgrims from all over the country.

Observed on: June–July

The sacred coastal town of Puri in the Indian state of Orissa wears a festive look when Rath Yatra, the chariot festival of Lord Jagannath, takes place. Lord Jagannath is an incarnation of the Hindu god Krishna. He is accompanied by his brother Balabhadra (Balaram) and sister Subhadra when they go to their birthplace of Gundicha Ghar riding in their chariot, known as Ratna Sinhasan.

On the day of the journey, three chariots—the yellow Nandighosa and the Taladwaja and Deviratha, both blue—are lined up in front of the Jagannath Temple in Puri. Then the deities are brought out to their respective chariots. The former king of Puri, believed to be the living symbol of Lord Jagannath, sweeps the road in front of the chariots with a golden broom and sprinkles scented water while pilgrims pull the chariots to Gundicha Ghar.

After a stay of nine days, they return to Puri. The return procession is called Ulta Rath.

❁ ONAM

Observed on: August–September

Onam, a harvest festival, is the most important observance in Kerala. It is celebrated for anywhere from four to 10 days during the month of Chingam, the first month of the Malayalam solar calendar. According to legend Onam celebrates the memory of King Mahabali, an ancient king of Kerala who cared well for his people. Onam represents the happy time of King Mahabali's rule, and the people of Kerala believe that he comes back to visit during the Onam celebrations.

Onam celebrates a bountiful harvest following a year of hard work, and a variety of activities are associated with the Onam celebrations including worship, music, dances, sports, boat races, and lots of good food. People prepare for the festival by cleaning their houses and decorating them. Women create beautiful, intricate flower mats called pookalam in front of their homes to welcome the return of King Mahabali. Everyone wears new clothes bought especially for the public festivities.

During Onam people participate in traditional rituals and everyone attends a grand feast. Delicious sweets, such as payasam, a sweet porridge, and favorite dishes are prepared and served on banana leaves for everyone's enjoyment. Two of the featured events of Onam are the fantastic procession in Thrissur, a major city in Kerala, and the Great Boat Race, called Vallamkali, on the Pampa River. Hundreds of men row their boats to the beat of drums and cymbals; hanging from red silk umbrellas over every boat are gold coins. The rowing motion shakes the umbrellas, making their color flash and the coins tinkle as they collide. There are many kinds of boats, but the most beautiful to watch are the *chundan*s, the long boats shaped like snakes, as they skim swiftly over the water.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In India every religion has its own set of ceremonies pertaining to birth, and even within the same religion the rituals vary from region to region. In the seventh month of pregnancy in many parts of the country, the pregnant woman is showered with gifts, blessings, and wishes for the safe delivery of a healthy child.

After the birth of a Hindu child, both mother and baby have to remain indoors for a period of 40 days to protect them from evil. At the end of this period, in some regions a naming ceremony is held to which friends and family members are invited. The priest performs a religious ceremony in which offerings to God are made, and then the father's sister whispers the name chosen for the child in its ear. The priest announces the name, and assembled guests come forward to give their blessings and good wishes to the infant.

Other ceremonies related to children include: the first solid food ceremony (annaprasana), when the child is fed sweet rice; head-shaving (mundan), which is generally performed in temples; ear-piercing (karnavedha), which is done to both boys and girls and is meant to bring good health and wealth to the child; and the commencement of formal study, or vidyarambha, which is celebrated by writing the first letter in a tray of rice.

❁ COMING OF AGE

When a Hindu boy reaches puberty he participates in a ceremony known as upanayana sanskara. Most prevalent in Brahmin families, it formalizes the transition from boyhood to adulthood. During this ceremony the boy is made aware of his duties and responsibilities as a human and as a Hindu. Amid Sanskrit chants, the priest invests the boy with a sacred white thread that he must wear on his left shoulder for the rest of his life.

Male circumcision is prevalent among the Muslims of India, though it is not compulsory. Most Muslims believe that by undergoing this ritual a boy becomes a man. Trained elders use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments to perform the circumcision on boys aged 10–12, without administering any anesthetic. Huge celebrations follow this coming-of-age ritual since the entire community takes great pride in it.

Indian Parsis refer to their coming of age ritual as Navjote. It is a new light ceremony similar to the Jewish bar mitzvah and the Hindu thread ceremony. The child is blessed and inducted into the Zoroastrian community by putting on a sacred chord (kusti) and a soft muslim undershirt (sudreh or sudra). He or she is initiated into the faith through prayers and community blessings.

Marriage ceremonies in India vary from religion to religion and from region to region. Arranged marriages are prevalent even today in Indian society. A relative or a mutual friend delivers the marriage proposal, and then the families of the prospective bride and groom meet each other.

If the proposal is accepted the families consult their family priests and, using astrological charts, they decide on a marriage date. Providing a dowry continues to be an integral part of wedding ceremonies in many parts of India.

A Hindu marriage generally involves week-long festivities with a special ceremony on each day. Some of the important ceremonies include: a musical evening (sangeet sandhya) during which the guests dance and sing traditional folk songs; the ceremony called mehendi, in which professional mehendi artists are hired to apply a decorative pattern of henna to the hands and feet of the bride; and the actual marriage ceremony, or vivaha, when the groom, riding a white horse or in a car, comes to the venue of the wedding, followed by his wedding party (baraat), who dance their way from the groom's house to the scene where the wedding is to take place. Then, the bride's family welcomes the groom and the wedding party, and in front of the holy fire the bride and groom exchange their wedding vows and solemnize their wedding in the presence of God, family members, and friends.

There is also a lavish reception in honor of the bride and the groom. The wedding guests congratulate the newlyweds and extend their good wishes for their married life. After the reception a farewell ceremony (bidai) ceremony takes place. It gives the bride the opportunity to bid farewell to her family members, friends, and relatives.

❁ DEATH

After the death of a Hindu, family members cleanse his or her body, anoint it with sandalwood paste, and drape it in new clothes. Then mourners pay their final respects and drape flowers over the body of the deceased. In accordance with tradition a dija, a small lamp, is lit and placed near the body. Then male family members and friends carry it to the nearby crematorium for the final rites. Hindus believe that women should not accompany the body because they are too sensitive to see their loved ones cremated. Often during the funeral procession, mourners engage in religious chants dedicated to Yama (the Hindu god of death) and Lord Rama.

At the crematorium the body of the deceased is placed on a funeral pyre with the head positioned at the north, in the direction of the realm of Kubera (the god of wealth) and the feet at the south, in the direction of the realm of Yama. The eldest son or male member of the family performs the last rites and lights the funeral pyre. The ashes of the deceased are immersed in Hindu holy rivers such as the Ganges, since Hindus believe that doing this will absolve the deceased of all his or her sins. Also as an expression of sorrow, male members of the family shave their heads.

Donations to the poor and to other charities are made in honor of the deceased. During special memorial services, rice balls (pinda) are prepared and offered to the soul of the deceased. Also on the 11th or 13th day after the death, family members feed the poor in the deceased's honor.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Historians and geologists believe that what is now Indonesia probably existed as long ago as four million years ago and was part of mainland Asia. The famous Java Man (Pithecanthropus erectus), whose fossil remains have been discovered on the island of Java, might have been among the first inhabitants of the region. From the start the islands of Indonesia have experienced various waves of peoples, and their cultures, languages, and spiritual beliefs have merged gradually.

Between 3000 and 500 B.C.E. Indonesia was inhabited by sub-Mongoloid migrants from Asia who married and intermingled with the indigenous people. The earliest settlers from India, who migrated to the islands during the first century C.E., were primarily from the coastal regions. During the Saka period in Indonesia the Sanskrit language and the Pallava script (metrical Sanskrit) were introduced by the Indian Prince Aji Saka (78). The adapted language and script were called the Kawi language; words and phrases from the Javanese language were incorporated into it.

The Greek astronomer and geographer Ptolemy of Alexandria (fl. second century) referred to Indonesia, which he called Abadiou in his writings. In 144 the Chinese traveler Fa Xian (c. 337–c. 422) visited and stayed in Java. At that time the northern part of the island was ruled by an Indonesian Hindu king named Kudungga, the first king of Indonesia.

Buddhism came to Indonesia between the first and second centuries. Of the two sects, Hinayana and Mahayana, the latter became more prominent in the eighth century. In the seventh century, trade relations flourished between the southern parts of India (including Orissa) and Indonesia. Sumatra was then named Suvarna Dwipa (“island of gold”), while Java was called Java Dwipa (“island of oats” or “millet”). The Indian settlers continued to pour into Indonesia up until the seventh century, and the Hindu religion gradually and peacefully spread throughout the entire region. The local people from all strata of society were influenced by the tenets of Hinduism.

Around the seventh century the kingdom of Srivijaya, centered in the Palembang region of Sumatra, controlled major parts of Sumatra, western Java, and a large portion of the Malay Peninsula. Dominating the straits of Malacca and Sunda, this kingdom played a key role in the trade and commercial activities of the region. As a bastion of Mahayana Buddhism Srivijaya attracted pilgrims and scholars from all over Asia. A famous Buddhist kingdom in Central Java was ruled by the Sailendra Dynasty. During their regime (between 750 and 850), the world-renowned Borobudur temple was built. The Sailendra kingdom was also famous for its flourishing arts and culture as well as its naval strength.

The kingdom of Singasari emerged in East Java under King Dharmawangsa (911–1007). He codified the laws of the land and got the Mahabharata and the Bhagavad Gita translated into Javanese. The Singasari Kingdom was succeeded by the Majapahit Kingdom, whose first ruler was Prince Wijaya. During the reign of King Hayam Wuluk (1334–89) this empire emerged as the most powerful kingdom in Indonesia. It acquired and maintained dependencies in North Vietnam, Kampuchea (Cambodia), and the Philippines during the years 1331–64. This golden era produced major literary works.

In the 13th century Muslim merchants from India and Persia arrived in Indonesia to engage in trade. They propagated Islam among the Indonesian people, particularly in the coastal areas of Demak on Java. The influx of Muslims eventually caused the decline of the Majapahit kingdom (1293–1520). During the decades that followed Islam spread rapidly throughout the entire archipelago.

The Portuguese arrived in Indonesia in 1511, after conquering Malacca on the Malay Peninsula. They were followed by the Spaniards. The two colonial powers began propagating Christianity and were successful in their endeavors, particularly in Molucca. Later, in 1651 the Dutch invaded Kupang in Western Timor. Despite the presence of the Dutch in Timor a formal and clear-cut demarcation of the territories held by Holland and Portugal did not take place until almost 200 years later. On April 20, 1859, the Dutch signed a treaty with Portugal to divide Timor into two portions. The Dutch occupied the western part of the island, and Portugal the eastern part. Portugal held sway over East Timor until 1975.

The Indonesian movement for independence began in the early part of the 20th century. The Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) was founded in 1920. In 1927 the Indonesian Nationalist Party (PNI) gained prominence under the leadership of Sukarno (1901–70). In August 1945 after the Japanese surrender, Sukarno and Muhammad Hatta (1902–80), another nationalist leader, declared the country an independent republic. The Dutch strongly resisted the upsurge of nationalism, which resulted in four years of intermittent, often heavy, fighting. Finally under UN pressure, an agreement was reached in November 1949 for the creation of an independent republic of Indonesia. A new constitution was drawn up to provide a parliamentary form of government and Sukarno was elected president. Sukarno's administration was marked by inefficiency, corruption, and chaos. The mass expulsion of Dutch citizens (during the 1950s) and seizure of their property for public use adversely affected the economy. A populist revolt, springing from a desire for greater autonomy, began on the island of Sumatra early in 1958, spreading to Sulawesi and several other islands of the archipelago; in retaliation Sukarno tightened his authoritarian rule. The parliament was dissolved and the constitution of 1945 reinstated.

In early 1962 Sukarno sent paratroopers to Netherlands New Guinea, forcing the Dutch to agree to transfer that area to the United Nations with the understanding that it would come under Indonesian control by May 1963 following a referendum. Meanwhile Sukarno in 1963 declared Indonesia's opposition to the newly created Federation of Malaysia and initiated guerrilla raids into Malaysian territory on Borneo; the ensuing conflict lasted three years.

Sukarno began increasingly to tilt toward the left and made overtures to Communist China. About this time there was an aborted Communist coup sparked by the assassination of six high officials of the Army. The coup was quelled by the armed forces, which gradually assumed power under the leadership of General Suharto (b. 1921), while retaining Sukarno as de jure leader. The following weeks and months witnessed the bloody massacre of Communists as well as other innocent people. Chaos and anarchy prevailed. Gradually General Suharto ceased hostilities against Malaysia, banned the PKI, fostered close ties with the United States, and in 1966 rejoined the United Nations. In 1967 Indonesia became a founding member of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). In March 1967 Sukarno was voted out of power and General Suharto became acting president.

Suharto was elected president in 1968 and reelected in all subsequent elections through 1998. Under his rule the government reinstated an earlier Dutch colonial policy of "transmigration," by which farmers from the overpopulated islands of Java and Bali were moved to the underpopulated areas of Kalimantan, Sumatra, and Papua. During Suharto's regime his family held sway over much of Indonesia's economic life; corruption became rampant. In October 1997 the country was plunged into a crisis when the value of its currency plummeted. Struggling under crushing foreign debt and Suharto's reluctance to implement the reforms prescribed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), Indonesia's economy continued to worsen.

Fun Fact

The Sakas were Central Asian nomads, probably Indo-Europeans whom Herodotus called Scythians, who moved into northwestern India during the second and first centuries B.C.E.

In 1998 student protests and riots over skyrocketing prices spread across the country. In May 1998 Suharto stepped down and his vice president B. J. Habibie (b. 1936), assumed the presidency, promising reforms and honest administration, among other things. Around this time there was a major crisis related to Indonesian-controlled East Timor, which sought independence. The rebellion was brutally suppressed, but East Timor eventually won independence after UN peacekeepers established order. In the June 1999 parliamentary elections, the Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle, led by Megawati Sukarnoputri (b. 1947; daughter of Sukarno), topped the list with 34 percent of the vote; President Habibie's Golkar party came in second, with 22 percent. In the presidential elections of October 1999 Abdurrahman Wahid (b. 1940), of the National Awakening party, became the country's first democratically elected president. Megawati failed to build the coalition needed to win; nevertheless she was chosen by the parliament as vice president. Indonesia's economy began to revive in 2000, though the currency (rupiah) again experienced a sharp loss in value. Indonesia still faces many problems, including rising Islamic extremism (and religious conflict generally), military insubordination, official corruption, a fragile democratic process, and separatist movements.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Indonesia is the largest archipelago in the world. It comprises five major islands and 30 smaller groups, bringing the total number of islands to approximately 17,508. The archipelago is located between the Pacific and the Indian Oceans; it bridges the continents of Asia and Australia. Its sea area is four times its land area, which is about 1.2 million square miles. The five main islands are: Sumatra (284,285 square miles), Java/Madura (82,087 square miles), Kalimantan (355,204 square miles), Sulawesi (117,572 square miles), and Irian Jaya (262,206 square miles).

The land is covered by lush tropical rain forests, and the fertile soil is regularly replenished by volcanic eruptions such as those on the island of Java. Indonesia is predominantly mountainous with 400 volcanoes, out of which 100 are still active. Some of the highest peaks are Mt. Leuser and Mt. Kerinci (Sumatra), Mt. Gede, Mt. Tangkubanperahu, and Mt. Ciremai (Java). Several rivers flow through the country, and they are used extensively for transportation. Many of the islands also possess beautiful, placid lakes.

Indonesia experiences two tropical seasons, which are influenced by the equatorial and the meridian air circulations. The climate changes every six months. The dry season (June to September) is influenced by the Australian continental air masses, while the rainy season (December to March) is affected by the Asian and Pacific Ocean air masses. The country's tropical areas get rain all year round. The transitional periods are April–May and October–November.

Temperatures vary due to the large number of islands and mountains. The average temperature on the coastal plains is 82°F; and in the inland and mountain areas it is 79°F. In the higher mountainous areas, it hovers around 73°F, depending on the altitude. Because of Indonesia's location in the tropical zone, the relative humidity regularly tops 70 percent.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of Indonesia is predominantly market based, but the government plays a key role in it. In fact the government owns and controls most of the large-scale enterprises and determines the prices of fuel, rice, and electricity. Indonesia exports large quantities of coal, crude oil, gas, wood, and wooden products, along with pottery and ceramics. Imports include machinery and equipment, chemicals, fuels, and food.

In the aftermath of the economic crisis that shook the country in 1997, the government took over many private sector assets. During the 1980s the incumbent government began to take steps to stimulate employment and growth in the non-oil export sector. Annual real gross domestic product growth was as high as 7 percent between 1987 and 1997. International analysts confirmed that Indonesia was emerging as a newly industrializing economy and also a major international market.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Indonesian society is made up of diverse ethnic, cultural, and religious groups, but mass education, the mass media, and the nationalistic policies of the government have helped foster a distinct Indonesian identity and culture, with Bahasa Indonesia serving as the lingua franca.

The national craft of Indonesia is batik, the art of applying wax to cloth followed by tie-dyeing in colorful and dramatic designs. The center of batik is Yogyakarta on the island of Java. Other artistic crafts include ikat, a distinct style of weaving with tie-dyed threads, songket, a kind of silk cloth with gold or silver threads woven into it; and kris, artwork embellished with jewels.

Javanese wayang (puppet) plays and gamelan (complex improvised rhythms created by groups of percussion players) are some of the well-known and popular elements of Indonesian culture. Indonesia is a polyglot nation in which the myriad communities continue to speak their distinct languages and dialects.

Islam is the predominant religion of the archipelago. In Indonesia social and religious norms, etiquette, and duties are largely governed by Islamic law. The code of ethics is familiarly called adat. However religious practices are influenced by elements of Hinduism and Buddhism, as well as animism. In spite of a long period of colonialism, Christian missionaries succeeded in converting only small pockets of the Indonesian population to Christianity.

❁ CUISINE

Indonesians usually have their main meal in the middle of the day. The food cooked in the morning is used up, and nothing is saved for the next meal. Family members help themselves, serving each dish with a spoon and using the right hand only.

A system of communal cooking and a strict hierarchy determine an individual's role and behavior at the table. The centerpiece of each meal is a huge mound of long-grain polished rice. The main meal consists of soups, salads, and different types of curries. Each meal is invariably accompanied by at least one or more sambals, or spice relishes, that are mixed with the food.

Indonesian gastronomy uses a good deal of coconut milk, which goes into the making of beverages, sauces, soups, and even rice. Traditional spices include coriander, pepper, garlic, turmeric, cassia (similar to cinnamon), bay leaf, star anise, ginger, tamarind, galangal (related to ginger), cardamom, lemon grass, shallots, peanuts, and so on. The Indonesians also eat lots of dried anchovies and prawns as part of their meals. Many Indonesian dishes are influenced by Chinese culinary arts, but dishes such as padang (a heavily spiced style of cooking, which is native to Sumatra) are totally indigenous.

On the streets of the cities and towns, vendors selling potato-based snacks, sweet nuts, biscuits, and fruit are a common sight. Nasi goreng (fried rice) is one of the most common dishes, while sate (skewered meats with a spicy peanut sauce), gado-gado (made with bean sprouts and vegetables in peanut sauce), and seafood items are also favorites. Indonesia boasts a great variety of tropical fruits—indigenous ones such as durians and rambutans—along with custard apples, guavas, papayas, mangoes, starfruit, and jackfruit, to name a few.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's celebrations in Indonesia begin on New Year's Eve. The occasion is enjoyed with parties, music, dancing, and the exchange of greetings and gifts. This is a public holiday in Indonesia.

❁ KARTINI DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 21

Kartini Day celebrates the life of Raden Ayu Kartini (1879–1904), the Indonesian heroine of women's emancipation. Her father, Raden Mas Adipati Arlo Soroningrat, was a mayor. He had 12 children from several wives, so Kartini was fortunate to receive a

Durians and Rambutans

Known as the “king of fruit,” the durian is a native of the tropical region and rarely seen beyond Southeast Asia. The name durian is derived from an Indonesian word meaning “thorny.” The fruit resembles an unripe coconut with spines covering its thick, green rind. Notorious for its foul smell, the flesh of this fruit is nevertheless sweet and delicious.

The rambutan is closely related to the lychee fruit. Its fibrous outer husk, covered with thick hairlike spines, encases a soft and fleshy fruit. The fruit of the rambutan tastes like a mellow grape with a syrupy flavor.

Dutch education. At age 12, however, she was forced to end her education because of the old Javanese tradition of pinjit, which required women to remain at home until they were married.

Although Kartini disliked her forced imprisonment and the ways in which women's lives were constrained, at 24 she obeyed her father and married the mayor of Rembang, Raden Adipati Joyodiningrat, a man of 50 who already had three wives and dozens of children. She had had a scholarship to study in Europe, but her hopes to study abroad were dashed. Instead she established a special school for local girls. She died at only 25, in childbirth. Kartini Day is a school holiday.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 17

On this day in 1945 Indonesia won its freedom from centuries of Dutch colonial rule. This occasion is celebrated with public ceremonies throughout the country, especially in the capital city of Jakarta. There is a ceremonial gun salute, followed by the raising of the national flag and the inspection of an honor guard by the president. Patriotic songs are sung by school-

Sambal

Sambal is used as a daily condiment and plays a part in every Indonesian meal. Sambals have numerous variations depending on the ingredients—garlic, shallot, coconut, meat, seafood, and vegetables—added to it. The most common of them all, sambal ulek, is made by chopping fresh red chilis and grinding them to a paste (along with the seeds) on a flat stone, using a hard rock to ensure that the seeds are thoroughly pulverized. Brown sugar and salt are added to the paste. Another kind of sambal is made of sliced green chilis with peteh beans.

Religious Holidays

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha—also called Eid ul-zuha, Bakr-Eid, and Idul Adha—commemorates the unwavering faith in God that the patriarch Ibrahim (Abraham) showed by his willingness to sacrifice his young son at God's command. In Indonesia on this day each family that can afford it sacrifices sheep (or goats or cattle) in the name of God. This meat is then shared with friends and family and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival devout Muslims undertake a hajj, or pilgrimage, to Mecca, the center of the Islamic faith.

❁ CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: Chinese

Observed on: First of the first month of the Chinese calendar

Among Chinese festivals, the New Year's celebration is the most elaborate and colorful. It is the time to ring out the old and to usher in the new year with processions, fireworks, music, dancing, and feasting. The holiday also stresses the importance of family ties; it is a time for family reunions and visiting friends and relatives.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic calendar is based on the revolutions of the Moon and has only 354 days. El am Hejir, the Islamic New Year, is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month. Compared to Western calendars, the Islamic year goes backward 11 days every year, so the date of the new year varies from one year to the next in the West.

The beginning of the Islamic New Year is usually quiet, unlike New Year's celebrations associated with other calendars. In Indonesia Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday is the recounting of the incident of the Hijrah—Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina. Muslims also reflect on the passage of time and their own mortality.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: Balinese

Observed on: Vernal Equinox

For weeks before New Year's Eve (Ngerupuk) much noise is made. People paint their faces and bodies and run through the streets banging tins and setting off firecrackers to frighten away the evil spirits from Bali. The people believe that when spring begins and, with it, the rainy season, Yama, the God of Hell, sweeps the devils from hell, and they all fall on Bali. This inundation requires the purification of the entire island.

On New Year's Eve a ritual called Tawur is performed in order to give something back to nature. The Balinese believe in balance: If one takes, one should also give back; otherwise balance is lost. In Ubud Tawur is performed at the crossroads, which is considered tenget, a place highly charged in a supernatural way. The ceremony also takes place where there are Hindu communities in other parts of Indonesia, such as Kalimantan, Sulawesi, Sumatra, and Jakarta.

In the evening grotesque statues made of wood and bamboo frames covered with papier-mâché and Styrofoam™ and garishly painted, some almost 10 feet high, are paraded through village streets accompanied by loud gamelan (percussion orchestra) music. These statues represent demonic spirits (Ogoh-Ogoh). A ceremony is held before the parade to purify the Ogoh-Ogoh, and they are then usually burned when the parade ends. Many cockfights are also featured on New Year's Eve because it is believed that blood purifies the Earth.

On New Year's Day (Nyepi), the noise is stilled and silence prevails. There are four basic restrictions, the four brata: no fire, no work, no travel, and no leisure activities. Bali must appear to be deserted so the demons will be convinced to leave. The ports close. Shops are closed. Cars are forbidden, and no one leaves his or her compound. Turning on electricity, cooking, or lighting fires for any purpose is forbidden. Balinese radio does not broadcast, and people fast for 24 hours. Men from the banjar, the village guards, the pecalang, patrol the streets to make sure the brata are obeyed. Anyone caught engaging in a forbidden activity is fined.

❁ MOULoud

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi, celebrates the birthday of Muhammad, who was born in 570 C.E. On this day Muslims reflect on Muhammad's life and teachings. They sing songs, utter special prayers, and recall how the prophet forgave even his worst enemies. On this day Muslims also give alms to the poor. Muhammad urged his followers not to make a show of his birthday, and many Muslims, especially those belonging to conservative sects, do not celebrate this day at all.

❁ MESH SANKRANTI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Ninth of Shukla Paksh (the bright fortnight) of Chaitra, the first month of the Hindu calendar

Mesh Sankranti, also called the Hindu Bali Day of Silence or Nyepi, is the most important Sankranti (solar transit) because the solar year begins when the Sun moves into Chaitra, the zodiacal sign of Aries, the Ram, at the vernal equinox, one of the two times in a year when the day and night are equal in length. The Hindu community in Indonesia celebrates the Hindu New Year according to the lunisolar calendar. By far the biggest celebrations are held in Bali, although celebrations also take place in other parts of the country. In preparation for the holiday, cooking begins two days in advance, villages are cleaned, and on the eve of the new year, people create a hula-baloo in order to scare away devils and evil spirits. The actual day, however, is characterized by absolute silence and stillness. Hindus in Indonesia do not leave their homes, cook, or engage in any activity. The streets of towns and cities are deserted.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: First full Moon day in May (except in a leap year, when the festival is held in June)

Vesak, also called Tri Suci Waisak (Three Holy Events) in Indonesia, commemorates the birth, enlightenment, and salvation of Gautama Buddha, the founder of Buddhism. Each of these events is commemorated on the day of a full Moon (Purnama Sidhi). On this occasion devout Buddhists make offerings of fruit, flowers, and candles at shrines and monasteries. To Buddhists the candles symbolize life and enlightenment. Large-scale celebrations take place in the areas with large concentrations of Buddhists—Jakarta, Riau, North Sumatra, and West Borneo. Traditional celebrations of Vesak take place in the most renowned Buddhist monasteries, which are located in Sunter (North Jakarta) and Pacet (West Java).

lims. They believe Muhammad traveled from Mecca to Jerusalem, ascended into the seven heavens, and returned, all in the course of a single night. The official name of the holiday is Laylat al-Isra wa al-Miraj, which means “the night journey and ascension.” During his sojourn in the seven heavens Muhammad was commanded to establish the five daily prayers (namaaz), and met other spiritual beings such as Abraham, Moses, Aaron, Adam, the Archangel Gabriel, and Jesus.

On this day devout Muslims of Indonesia gather in mosques or at one another’s homes and listen to recountings of the story of Muhammad’s journey. They share food and sweets to celebrate the night.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, also called Lebaran or Feast of the Breaking of the Fast, is the second eid, or festival, of the Islamic religious calendar. It marks the start of the festivities and celebrations that end the month-long fast during Ramadan, the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. Indonesian Muslims begin the day with morning prayers, generally in mosques or idgabs, open spaces created for such important observances. This is followed by social visits, the exchange of greetings and gifts, and the enjoyment of such delicacies as sewiyen (vermicelli), which is specially prepared for this occasion.

Eka Dasa Rudra

The long and complex Balinese ceremony of Eka Dasa Rudra is performed only once every hundred years. According to tradition there must be a balance in the world between the forces of good and evil; when the balance favors evil, the ceremony must be performed. The preparations for the most recent Eka Dasa Rudra began in 1963 at the request of President Sukarno. Shortly after, however, the volcano Gunung (“Mount”) Agung erupted and almost 2,000 people died. The preparations were halted because of this disaster but were resumed again 16 years later in 1979. The rituals and accompanying sacrifices involved take place at Pura Besakih in Bali, the 1,000-year-old mother temple, which houses around 30 different temples dedicated to Balinese and Hindu gods.

When the ceremony of Eka Dasa Rudra is performed the entire population of Bali participates. Basically, the 11 demons, of which Rudra is the most powerful, must be transformed so that they are less threatening to the world balance. Such an undertaking requires much time and labor, and all of the ceremonies, which number about 30, last for 11 weeks. In 1979 Eka Dasa Rudra went on from late February to early May.

Eka Dasa Rudra begins by carrying the images of the gods down to the sea to be washed. The procession takes three days, and the populations of whole villages line the route. The climax of the rituals is the sacrifice of a buffalo whose horns have been covered in gold to the sea demons. A heavy stone is tied around the neck of the buffalo as it is forced into the swirling ocean. There are various chants and prayers by pemangku (spiritual leaders) and pedanda (priests), and dance rituals are performed, the most important one being the war dance, baris (literally “war formation”), which is danced by men.

Once the initial sacrifice and rituals are over, virtually everyone in Bali leaves for the mother temple at Besakih. Every path and road in Bali is filled with worshippers bringing offerings to Pura Besakih. Then the climax of Eka Dasa Rudra begins, the Taur purification sacrifices. The pedanda send their prayers in all 11 directions of Balinese “space,” in accordance with ancient rituals written on lontar palm scripts. (On Bali the lontar palm is the tree of life.) While these prayers are being sent, two dozen or so priests sacrifice many animals and birds in an effort to appease Rudra, the demonic manifestation of Bali’s supreme being.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a new child is a time of great rejoicing in the Indonesian Muslim community, since children are considered a token of Allah’s compassion. Children are often referred to in Islam as “wealth.” Immediately after birth the baby is thoroughly washed. According to Islamic tenets the first sound that a baby ought to hear is the sacred name of Allah. This is customarily uttered by its father (or a male relative), who whispers the call to prayer, or adhan, first into the child’s right ear and then into its left ear. The idea is to make the child aware of Allah’s omnipresence and his power over the lives of mortals.

When the child is between three and seven days old, its head is shaved to remove the natal impurities. This ceremony is known as the aqiqah, and it symbolizes the removal of misfortune and evil so that the child can embark on a good and trouble-free life. The hair is collected and weighed, and the equivalent weight in silver is given to the poor. Then the hair is buried. Some Muslim families also sacrifice an animal on such occasions and distribute the meat to the people in their neighborhoods.

Muslim children are not named at birth. The choice of name is believed to have a direct bearing on the character and behavior of the child during its lifetime. The local imam is often consulted on the naming. On the day of purification the child is also given a proper name.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Muslim boys generally experience a major change in status through circumcision (khitān) after they have recited the entire Koran. In Islamic countries where this procedure is followed, the boy undergoes the operation between the ages of 10 and 12. This is a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and introducing him to adult status. In Indonesian Muslim families this occasion is accompanied by a good deal of festivity, including music, special foods, and many guests.

❁ MARRIAGE

The majority of the population in Indonesia is Muslim. Most Muslim marriages are decided by the two sets of parents. According to Islamic tenets, however, the prospective bride and groom are free to refuse the spouse that has been selected by their parents or elders.

Prior to the actual wedding the two families decide on a specific amount of money, or articles in kind, that the groom's family must give to the bride. This sum of money is in reality a security deposit for the bride in case the marriage fails. Muslim weddings in Indonesia take place in the bride's home. The rites are conducted by an imam.

The bride and the bridegroom sit in separate rooms during the marriage ceremony. Two guests—one from the bride's family and one from the groom's family—witness the bride's consent to the marriage and inform the imam. The ceremony begins with the imam reciting relevant passages from the Koran. The imam then speaks about the duties of marriage and asks the bridegroom whether he agrees to the marriage. Once the bridegroom has assented, the bride, bridegroom, and two witnesses sign a marriage contract.

The Koran says that a man may marry up to four wives but only if he can treat them all equally. If a marriage does not work out, the Koran says that couples may get divorced but only as a last resort. First the couple must try to resolve its problems. If this does not work, each spouse must choose a friend or relative for counseling. If this too fails, they must wait four months before they can end their marriage.

❁ DEATH

All religions accept death as a part of human life. Since death is unpredictable but inevitable, Muslims are exhorted always to be prepared. They bury their dead, unlike Hindus and Buddhists, who are cremated. Islam prohibits cremation. Muslims are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. In Indonesia (as in all Islamic societies), it is customary for Muslims to wash the dead body, perfume it, and drape it in a fresh new white cloth before burial. The burial is supposed to take place as soon as possible after death. The dead person's face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs straightened out, and the mouth and eyes closed. A baby who dies at birth, or even a stillborn child, must have a name.

The friends, relatives, and acquaintances of a deceased person come together for prayers. Then the men carry the corpse to the graveyard. Religious laws forbid Muslim women from attending burials. Some women, however, do break this rule. The men attending a funeral form a double line facing each other and pass the bier on their shoulders toward the grave. In the case of a child, the bier is carried in the arms of a relative. The wrapped body is customarily laid directly at the bottom of the grave, on its right side with its face turned toward Mecca. Although graves are dug by professional gravediggers, the task of filling it with earth is carried out by the relatives and all those present, who throw handfuls of dirt into the grave as a token of solidarity and remembrance. Attendants at funerals cover their heads as a mark of respect for the deceased.

The grave is sealed and then marked by a small elevation to differentiate it from the level ground nearby. After the funeral a wake is held for both men and the women, usually on the same day.

Fun Fact

The Balinese believe that the shape of the teeth distinguishes gods and humans from animals and ogres. Gods and humans have flat teeth, whereas animals and ogres have pointed ones. Because people cannot fulfill their karma if all their teeth are not flat, the Balinese have their children's canine teeth and incisors filed down, called matatah, usually when they are between 16 and 18.

This procedure removes impurity by reducing the Balinese six deadly sins (Sad Ripu): lust, greed, anger, intoxication (as a result of drink or passion), sadness, arrogance, and jealousy. If children die before their teeth have been filed flat, the procedure is performed on the corpse.

Fun Fact

Balinese religious practice, called Agama Tirtha (the holy water religion), is a blend that includes Hinduism.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

According to historians and scholars, the earliest people to inhabit the Iranian plateau were the Elamites, who founded the city of Shush in the southwestern part of the country. The city was situated on the east side of the Tigris River about 150 miles to the north of the head of the Persian Gulf. The Indo-Europeans came into the region of Iran in the second millennium B.C.E., bringing with them agricultural as well as domestic skills. In the sixth century the Achaemenian king Cyrus the Great (c. 585–c. 29) ruled the region, and it was during this period that the history of Persia began to be documented.

In the fourth century, Alexander the Great (356–23) invaded Persia. Despite the efforts of King Darius III (c.

380–30) to negotiate peace with Alexander, Alexander destroyed most of Persepolis, the capital of the region. After Alexander's death in 323 his empire was torn asunder by feuds and factions, and Persia came to be controlled by the Macedonian Seleucids. Seleucus I (358/54–281) was the Macedonian general who, as one of Alexander's successors, acquired the vast eastern section of the empire centered on the territory of the old Babylonian Empire. It was from him that the Seleucid Dynasty was established which lasted for 225 years. The Seleucids ruled Persia from 312 to 247, but they had a hard time controlling the ethnic minorities.

Among these ethnic minorities were the nomadic Parthians who controlled most of the territory of Persia until the third century C.E. Next came the Sassanians. They hailed from the central regions of Persia which were not under the Parthians' control. They were Zoroastrians by faith and very

The Elamites

The Elamites established one of the first recorded civilizations (2700–539 B.C.E.) in the far west and southwest of what is now Iran, following what is called the Proto-Elamite period (3200). Ancient Elam, called Haltamti, Atamti in later Elamite, by its people, lay to the east of Sumer and Akkad (modern-day Iraq). The Akkadians called the region Elam, which means “highland,” and they were called the offspring of Elam, the eldest son of Shem, in the Hebrew Torah. Much of the Elamite civilization occupied what is now Khuzestan, but it extended into Fars in prehistoric times. (The name Khuzestan is derived from Hujij, the Old Persian root for “Elam.”)

Not much is known about Elam aside from what has been gleaned from various Mesopotamian sources. Elam’s capital, Susa, was founded around 4000, before the Proto-Elamites occupied it. During excavations conducted in 1978, the earliest levels contained pottery found nowhere else in Mesopotamia, but the material found in the following level has been identified as Sumerian of the Uruk period. Proto-Elamite influence appears around 3200, and texts in the still undeciphered Proto-Elamite script continue to be present until about 2700. The Proto-Elamite period ends with the establishment of the Awan dynasty. The earliest known historical figure of Elam, mentioned in the Sumerian king list, is King Enmebaragesi of Kish (c. 2650). Elamite history, however, is only attested in records contemporary with the beginning of the Akkadian Empire, around 2300 onward.

hardworking. They went on to promote trade and urban development but were overrun by the Arabs in 637, who ruled until 1050.

The Arabs converted most of the population to Islam and were instrumental in introducing the new Persian script and Islamic culture. They in turn were overpowered by a Turkish dynasty that captured Isfahan, an important city in central Iran, in 1051. Isfahan had served as the capital of both the Seljuk and Safavid Dynasties and was the cultural hub of the eastern Islamic world in terms of language and art.

Under the rule of the Safavid Dynasty (1502–1722) the Persian Empire reached the pinnacle of glory and power. The noted ruler Shah Abbas I and his successors made strenuous efforts to promote Shiism and let it flourish. Moreover they also restored the city of Isfahan, which had been ravaged by invaders and plunderers.

The Safavids were succeeded by Afghans in the early 18th century. Unfortunately the Afghans could not hold onto power for long and hence followed a period of utter chaos, virtual anarchy, and frequent change of rulers. In 1779 Agha Muhammad Khan (1742–97), chief of a Turkish tribe, the Ghajars, established a capital in Tehran, at the time a mere village. The Ghajars introduced an era of peace to Iran until 1921. Though Iran remained neutral during World War I, it was unable to prevent partial occupation by the British forces that were keen to maintain an uninterrupted supply of oil.

One of the later Ghajar kings supported the idea of elections and a legislative assembly (majlis), but the idea took a concrete shape when Reza Khan (1877–1944), a military chief, made his political debut in 1923. Reza became prime minister and undertook the challenging task of upgrading and modernizing the country. In 1925 Reza Khan adopted the title of pahlavi and claimed himself to be the shah (emperor) of Iran. The country made a fair amount of progress during his rule.

The name Iran was officially adopted in 1934. During World War II Britain and Russia established spheres of influence in the country to successfully thwart Germany’s advance. In 1941 Reza was forced into exile in South Africa and was succeeded by his son, Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlavi (1878–1944). After the war, the United States persuaded the Russians to vacate the country; Mohammad Reza regained absolute power.

Over the next 30 years, discontent brewed with regard to Shah Mohammad Reza’s regime of repression and modernization. With gradual deterioration of the economy (due to the shah’s post-boom mismanagement), the growing opposition expressed its resentment through sabotage and massive demonstrations. The shah retaliated by enhanced brutality and suppression. The U.S. support for the shah wavered, and the latter finally fled the country in January 1979. Two weeks later Ayatollah Khomeini (1900–89), the leader of the growing opposition, returned from exile to a hero’s welcome. The ayatollah’s supporters helped to establish a clergy-dominated Islamic Republic. Shortly afterward, the ayatollah was proclaimed imam, or leader. Around this time Iraqi President Saddam Hussein made an attempt to grab land in

It was once thought that Zoroaster’s name (also Zarathushtra, or Zardost) meant “[bringer of the] golden dawn,” but that pleasant notion has been replaced and it is now believed that the name is an Avestan compound: zareta- “feeble, old” and ustra “camel,” which means “owner of feeble camels.”

Khuzestan province. It was a disastrous move that resulted in a war that killed innumerable people before a ceasefire was negotiated in 1988.

On June 4, 1989, Ayatollah Khomeini died, plunging the country into chaos. Two months later, in August 1979, Hashemi Rafsanjani was elected president, and Khomeini's position as supreme leader was occupied by the former president, Ayatollah Hojjatoleislam Ali Khamenei.

Following the 1997 landslide election of the moderate Iranian President Mohammad Khatami, people expected relations with other countries to improve. However relations with Germany (and most of Europe) reached a nadir in 1997 after a German court gave the verdict that the Iranian government had been involved in the assassination of Iranian Kurds in Germany.

Khatami's re-election encouraged Iranian reformers, but real power still remained with the Islamic clerics. In the early years of the 21st century, Iran has come under international pressure regarding its nuclear ambitions.

In 2003 the country was hit with one of the severest earthquakes in living memory. With its epicenter near the city of Bam in southeastern Iran, it killed 40,000 people and left the city utterly devastated. In the 2004 elections the conservatives won control of parliament in a process marred by controversy. At present the spiritual leader of Iran is Ayatollah Ali Hosseini-Khamenei, while the head of the government is President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Iran's interior region is fringed by a chain of huge, heavily eroded mountains. Most of the country lies above the 1,500-foot level. Outside the mountain ring in the north, the 400-mile strip of coastal plain along the Caspian Sea is never more than 70 miles wide (frequently narrowing to 10 miles). It falls sharply from the 1,864-foot altitude to 17 miles below sea level. In the south the land drops away from a plateau to meet the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman.

The Zagros range stretches from the border with the Republic of Armenia in the northwest to the Persian Gulf and onward into Baluchistan. The Alborz mountain range runs along the southern shore of the Caspian Sea to meet the border ranges of Khorassan situated in the eastern part of the country. The snow-covered Mt. Damavand (18,606 feet) is the highest peak in Iran. On the border of Afghanistan the mountains gradually fall away to merge into sand dunes. The vast desert tracts of the country stretch across the plateau from the northwest, close to Tehran and Qom, for a distance of about 400 miles to the southeast and beyond the frontier.

Approximately one-sixth of the total area of Iran is barren desert. The largest desert areas are Kavir-e-Lut and Dasht-e-Kavir or Great Salt Desert. The Caspian Sea, which is the largest landlocked body of water in the world, is 385,000 square miles and lies some 85 feet below sea level. Its salt content is considerably less than that of the oceans; hence it abounds in an unusual variety of fish. The important ports on the Caspian coast are: Bandar Anzali, Noshahr, and Bandar Turkman.

Along the Iran-Afghanistan border are several marshy lakes that expand and contract according to the season of the year. Freshwater lakes are rare in Iran. There are several large rivers—the Sefidrood, Karkheh Mand, Karun, and Qara-Chay Atrak; but the only navigable one among them is Karun.

Iran has a complex climate, ranging from subtropical to subarctic. In winter a high-pressure belt, centered in Siberia, sweeps over the central Iranian Plateau, while low-pressure systems develop over the Caspian Sea, the Persian Gulf, and the Mediterranean Sea. These result in wet spells and a phase of very cold weather coupled with frost and snow. The area adjacent to the Persian Gulf has very high temperatures during summer though winters may be quite cool at the northwestern extremities. Dust storms and haze are common features during summer.

In the summer temperatures vary from a high of 122° F in Khuzestan province (known as Arabistan to locals and Iraqi Arabs) near the Persian Gulf to a low of 34° F in the northwest. Rainfall varies from less than 2 inches in the southeast to about 77 inches in the Caspian region. The annual average is about 14 inches. The rainy season occurs in the winter.

☼ ECONOMY

Iran is OPEC's (Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) second largest oil producer and holds 10 percent of the world's known oil reserves. It possesses the world's second largest natural gas reserves after Russia. Iran's economy relies heavily on oil export revenues, which comprise approximately 80–90 percent of total export earnings.

In March 2004, the incumbent American President George W. Bush renewed the sanctions originally imposed by his predecessor (President William J. Clinton) in 1995 by another year, arguing that Iran posed "unusual and extraordinary threat" to the U.S. The sanction prohibits U.S. companies and their foreign subsidiaries from conducting business with Iran, while banning any "contract for the financing of the development of petroleum resources located in Iran."

The bulk of the country's crude oil reserves are located onshore in the southwestern Khuzestan region in the vicinity of the Iraqi border as well as the Persian Gulf. Iran has 32 producing oil fields, of which 25 are onshore and seven located offshore. Iran exports around 2.5 million bbl/d (barrels per day), with major customers being Japan, China, South Korea, Taiwan, and Europe.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam

The Rubaiyat is a collection of Persian verses usually called The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

Omar Khayyam (1048–1123) was born in Nishapur, Persia (Iran). His full name was Abu ol-Fath ebn-Ebrahim Omar ol-Khayyami. (Khayyam means “tent maker”.) Although he is known to most people for his beautiful verses, he was also a mathematician, philosopher, scientist, and astronomer. He created the Jalali calendar, which is more accurate than the Gregorian, and astronomical tables, as well as contributing the geometric solution of cubic equations to the field of algebra.

The term rubaiyat also refers to the verse form that Edward Fitzgerald (1809–83) used in his famous translation of Khayyam’s poetry. The musical quality of the verses derives from the aaba rhyme scheme. The rhyme scheme is often extended so that the unrhymed third line becomes the rhyme for three of the four lines in the following verse, aaba, bbcb, ccde, and so forth. This rhyme scheme is called interlocking rubaiyat. The following example comes from Fitzgerald’s translation:

Then to this earthen Bowl did I adjourn
My Lip the secret Well of Life to learn:
And Lip to Lip it murmur’d—“While you live, Drink!—for once dead you never shall return.”

Robert Frost (1874–1963), the winner of four Pulitzer prizes, used the interlocking rubaiyat in his well-known “Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening.”

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Traditional religious fervor is the most outstanding feature of Iranian culture, and it deeply permeates all aspects of people’s lives; the most visible expressions are the modest dress code and etiquette observed at the mosques. In Iran (as in all Islamic countries), the nature of art is nonrepresentational and stylized. Persian carpets are Iran’s most famous cultural export, dating back to the fifth century B.C.E. They are very much an integral part of both religious and cultural activities.

Persian poetry first made its debut in the ninth century C.E. and slowly grew into a vast anthology of epic poems and nonrhyming couplet poems, which are still intact. Other notable Persian crafts include metalwork, glassware, and woodwork.

The traditional folk art of Iran has been preserved by the ethnic minorities like the Turkmen, Azaris, Kurds, and Lors. The exquisite Persian painting style dates back to the Seljuk period (1040 to 1220); it disappeared until the 16th century, when it was revived and flourished again, along with calligraphy, across the country, but especially in the region of Shiraz.

In June 2004 Iranian officials prohibited by law the smoking of the water pipe (bookab, narguileh, or bubble-bubble) in all restaurants and other public places. Interestingly water-pipe smoking has been a traditional Middle Eastern practice and an integral part of Iranian culture through the centuries. The official ban is in response to concern about the health of the Iranian youth, among whom there has apparently been rising addiction to the water pipe.

CUISINE

Rice is the staple food of the Iranians, who take pains to cook it superbly. The meat used in cooking is usually lamb or mutton minced or cut into small chunks. Meat is rarely the dominant ingredient, except in kebabs. Fresh vegetables and herbs also form an integral part of Iranian gastronomy. Well-known dishes include chelo kboresh (rice topped with vegetables and meat in a nut sauce), polo chele (pilau rice), polo sabzi (pilau rice cooked with fresh herbs), polo chirin (sweet and sour saffron tinged rice cooked with raisins, almonds and pieces of orange), chelo kebab (rice with skewered meats cooked over charcoal), kofte (minced meatballs), kboresh badinjan (mutton and eggplant stew), and mast-o-khier (cold yogurt-based soup flavored with mint, chopped cucumber, and raisins) among others. Iranians eat their meals with a spoon and fork

Fruit and vegetable juices are popular, and tea is widely enjoyed and drunk in the many teahouses (ghahve khane). The Iranian chay (tea) is always served hot, black, and strong. The consumption of alcohol is strictly forbidden for the Muslims in Iran.

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First of Farvardin, the first month of the Jalali calendar

The official calendar of Iran is the Jalali, or Persian, solar calendar, and the first day of the Persian New Year is the first of Farvardin (March 21–24 of the Gregorian calendar). Navruz (or Norouz), which means “new day,” is the celebration of the Persian New Year. Although celebrated in a number of Islamic countries, Navruz, is not regarded as a religious holiday in Iran. It is in fact the celebration of the vernal equinox. According to scholars it originates from the customs of Ancient Mesopotamia. In Babylon the New Year was celebrated on the 21st day of Nissanu (March–April) with festivities lasting 12 more days, each commemorated with individual rites, amusements, and performances. Navruz is believed to have been celebrated even in pre-Islamic times. It is a major festival of the Zoroastrians whose ancestors hail from the region that is present-day Iran.

For Iranians Navruz heralds the advent of the glorious spring season, the commencement of agricultural activities, and the gradual onset of warm weather. This is also the day when conflicts and hostilities are forgotten and forgiven. On this day Iranians greet each other and also partake of lavish feasts. An atmosphere of bonhomie and brotherhood pervades everywhere.

❁ SIZDAH BEDAR

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Thirteenth of Farvardin, the first month of the Persian calendar

This day marks the end of the Navruz vernal equinox celebrations. From ancient times the Iranians have observed the tradition of spending the 13th day of the month of Farvardin out of doors. The word sizdah means “13,” and the phrase “sizdah bedar” translates as “getting rid of 13.” It is customary for Iranian families on this day to go to parks or the countryside and enjoy picnics. This is done in order to purge the minds and hearts of all evil.

Sizdah Bedar is also a special day to ask for rain. In ancient Iran the 13th of Farvardin was devoted to the angel of rain Tir, who is depicted as a horse. Siz-dah Bedar is also devoted to competitive games—many involving horses—and tournaments. The victory of a horse represented the victory of the angel. Another ritual observed on this day is the knotting of blades of grass by spinsters in the hope of finding a suitable husband. The knotting of the grass represents the bonds of matrimony.

❁ ISLAMIC REPUBLIC DAY

Observed on: April 1

With the victory of the Islamic revolution the people of Iran went to the polls for the first time in April 1979 and voted in favor of an Islamic republican system. There was an overwhelming majority of 99 percent. A team of experts subsequently began to formulate the constitutional law of the Islamic Republic of Iran. This constitutional law was then approved by the vote of the Iranian nation. In Iran Republic Day is marked by civic ceremonies and cultural activities.

❁ DEATH OF IMAM KHOMEINI (LITERALLY, HEART-RENDING DEPARTURE OF THE GREAT LEADER OF THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF IRAN)

Observed on: June 4

The mastermind behind the Islamic Revolution of Iran, Ayatollah Khomeini, died on this day in 1989, more than a decade after he shot into limelight due to the revolution. Hence this is a solemn and somber occasion for the Iranians. On this day the public pays homage to their departed leader. The occasion is marked by speeches and processions. All public and government institutions are closed.

❁ MAGNIFICENT VICTORY OF THE ISLAMIC REVOLUTION OF IRAN

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First of Esfand, the 12th month of the Jalali calendar

The Iranian Revolution in 1979 was an epoch-making event that transformed Iran from an autocratic pro-West monarchy and a liberated society under Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi to an orthodox Islamic theocracy under the reign of Ayatollah Khomeini. In Iran this day is observed by processions and marches and public speeches by well-known personalities. This is an official holiday and all government and public establishments are closed.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

The day marks the depiction of Abraham the patriarch's unflinching faith in God by his willingness to sacrifice his young son, just because the Almighty commanded him to do so. In Iran on this day it is mandatory for each family to sacrifice a sheep, goat, ram, or cattle in the name of God; this meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival, devout Muslims may, if they so desire, undertake a hajj or a pilgrimage to Mecca—the bastion of the Islamic faith.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Islam has a calendar based on the revolutions of the Moon. Thus, the year is only 354 days long. The Sunni Islamic New Year is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month. Compared to Western calendars, the Islamic year goes 11 days backwards every year. Hence the date of the Islamic New Year, according to the Gregorian calendar, varies from year to year.

The beginning of the New Year is usually quiet, unlike New Year's celebrations associated with other calendars. In Iran Sunni Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday is spent recounting the incident of Hegira—Muhammad's flight from Medina to Mecca. Muslims also reflect on the passage of time and their own mortality.

❁ ASHURA

Observed by: Mainly Shia Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Ashura, also called the Mourning of Karbala, actually consists of two days of fasting and prayers for forgiveness, celebrated mainly by the Shia sect of Muslims. On this day Shia Muslims remember the martyrdom of Hussein, a grandson of Muhammad, in 680 C.E. For them this is a somber occasion. The devout reenact the events leading to the martyrdom. As in other Islamic countries, in Iran Ashura is marked as a day of mourning, which honors Hussein and 72 other martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Karbala. As a part of the celebrations the devout Shia men practice self-mortification and flagellate themselves in order to relive the agony of the martyrs.

Ashura is also known as a day of fasting for Sunni Muslims since it marks two historical events: the day Nuh (Noah) left the Ark, and the day that Musa (Moses) was saved from the Egyptians by Allah.

❁ ARBA'EEN AL-HUSSEINI

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Forty days after Ashura

The word Arba'een denotes “forty” in Arabic. This is a religious holiday observed by the Shia Muslims and occurs 40 days after Ashura, the celebration of the martyrdom of Hussein bin Ali, a grandson of the Prophet Muhammad. This marks the end of the traditional period of mourning, which for Muslims is 40 days. The occasion reminds devout Muslims about the inherent significance of this martyrdom: Establishment of justice and fighting injustice, no matter what its manifestation. On this day Iranian Muslims congregate at mosques, offer prayers, and pay homage to the martyrs.

❁ MARTYRDOM OF HASSAN

Observed by: Iranians

Observed on: Twenty-eighth of Safar, the second month of the Islamic calendar

Imam Hassan was a grandson of the prophet Muhammad. On the issue of the claim to the seat and the powers of the Caliphate, his adversary, the governor of Syria, Muawiyah conspired with the Imam's disloyal wife Jadah (the daughter of Ashath) to eliminate him. She was made to administer some poison to Imam Hassan, which affected his liver. Thus Hassan unwittingly fell victim to Muawiyah's fatal mischief. On this day devout Muslims offer prayers at the mosques in memory of the martyr. An atmosphere of serious reflection pervades all.

❁ MARTYRDOM OF FATIMA

Observed by: Iranians

Observed on: Third of Jumada al-Awwal, the fifth month of the Islamic calendar

After the demise of her father, Prophet Muhammad, Hazrat Fatima was very sad and melancholy. In spite of her loss Fatima persisted in glorifying Allah and living a virtuous life. Disunity and tensions cropped up among the followers, adding to her distress. Leaders of the community met to choose a Caliph (or Khalifa) (religious and spiritual leader who would also deal with the affairs of the Muslim subjects in general). Instead of unanimously selecting Ali ibn Abu Talib the husband of Fatima, the only surviving child of the Prophet, who had been perceived by the majority of Muslims as the rightful candidate, their eventual choice was Abu Bakr (father of Muhammad's second wife Aisha), to whom they pledged allegiance.

According to written records many followers objected to Abu Bakr's seizure of power. Fatima was enraged when the rights of the Caliphate were snatched from her husband, and she was denied her right to inherit Muhammad's property, which included lands in Medina, Khaibar, and the village of Fadak.

Fatima opposed these decisions and was brutally attacked during a scuffle that ensued. She put up a valiant resistance but was grievously injured and ultimately succumbed to her injuries. She died barely three months after her father's death. In Iran this day is observed by the people through prayers and processions. The masses pay homage to this brave woman who laid down her life for her husband as well as for the sake of her religion.

❁ BIRTH OF IMAM ALI

Observed by: Iranians

Observed on: Thirteenth of Rajab, the seventh month of the Islamic calendar

A cousin of Prophet Muhammad, who also later married the Prophet's daughter Fatima. Hazrat Ali was born in the sanctum sanctorum of Islamic faith the Holy Kaaba (Mecca) on Friday, the 13th of Rajab 23 years before the beginning of the Hegira Era. In the entire history of Islam, Imam Ali is the only mortal to have been born inside the sacred shrine. Hence this unique event is celebrated by the devout Muslims in Iran by means of prayers and religious processions.

❁ LAYLAT AL-ISRA WA AL-MIRAJ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Rajab, the seventh month of the Islamic calendar

This is a very special event for Muslims. The official name of the holiday is Laylat Al-Isra wa Al-Miraj, which means "the night journey and ascension." Prophet Muhammad is believed to have gone from Mecca to Jerusalem, ascended into the seven heavens, and returned, all in course of a single night. Muhammad is believed to have ascended into the seven heavens from a rock, which is now the focal point of the Dome of the Rock, a sacred building in Jerusalem. During his sojourn in the seven heavens, Muhammad was commanded to establish the five daily prayers (Namaz). He is also believed to have met luminaries like Abraham, Moses, Aaron, Adam, Archangel Gabriel, and Jesus. On this day devout Muslims of Iran gather in mosques or at one another's homes and listen to the story of Muhammad's journey. They share food and sweets to celebrate the night.

❁ BIRTHDAY OF IMAM MAHDI

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Shaban the eighth month of the Islamic calendar

Muslims believe that a messiah-like figure (Imam Mahdi or The Mahdi) is going to appear at a critical period of the world's history (for instance, the present) to restore people's faith in, and ensure the ultimate triumph of, Islam. Varied descriptions of the Mahdi occur in several Muslim literary works. One of them is the Bihar al-Anwar (Ocean of Light, a metaphor for God) by the 17th-century Iranian scholar, Muhammad Baqir al-Majlisi (1628–99). It should be noted that although the Sunni and the Shia agree in principle on the prophecy about the appearance of the Mahdi, only the Shia believe that he will manifest himself as the 12th imam (there has been a succession of 11 imams in the past centuries).

The 12th Holy Imam Al-Mahdi, is believed to have been born to the 11th Imam Hassan Al-Askari and his wife Sayyidah Nargis in the year 225 of the Hegira Era in what is now northern Iraq. He is believed to be still living incognito and waiting for God's divine command to make him known to the world. His mission is to fight against injustice and establish justice, law, and order for the benefit of humanity. With him the line of succession from the Holy Prophet will draw to a close. The devout believe he has remained incognito and invisible but steadily monitors the lives and fortunes of the faithful.

❁ MARTYRDOM OF IMAM ALI BIN ABI TALIB

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-first of Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar

Imam Ali Bin Abi Talib, the cousin of Prophet Muhammad and also his son-in-law (husband of the Prophet's daughter Fatima) became his successor and also one of the 12 imams. However the clerics in those days were involved in quarrels and bickering over the assumption of supreme religious powers. Since Ali was related to the Prophet and also enjoyed the latter's favorite, many people became his foes. While Imam Ali was saying his morning prayers at the mosque of Al Kufah on the 19th of Ramadan the year 40 of the Hegira Era he was attacked by an assailant who pierced his body with a poisonous sword. He died two days later and was buried in al-Najaf al-Ashraf (in modern Iraq). In Iran on this day people take part in prayers and processions and pay homage to the noble soul who sacrificed his life for the sake of the faith.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

This marks the celebration at the end of the fasting month of Ramadan, which is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. It was during this month that the Prophet Muhammad observed austerity and fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him. Iranians commemorate this day by waking up early in the morning and taking part in a morning prayer along with their Muslim brethren. The site of these prayers is generally mosques and idgahs (prayer grounds.) This is followed by social visits, an exchange of greetings and gifts, and the enjoyment of delicacies chiefly sewiyān, especially prepared on this occasion. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

❁ MARTYRDOM OF IMAM JAFAR AL-SADIQ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-fifth of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

The sixth Holy Imam Jafar Al-Sadiq is famous in the Islamic world as the most intellectual and learned of all the imams both before and after him. He was also a highly religious man, endowed with unlimited knowledge, profound wisdom and a strong sense of justice. His other qualities included truthfulness and simplicity. Owing to the internal feuds and factions within the Islamic theocracy in that turbulent era, Imam Sadiq was poisoned by his enemies. His body was buried in the Baggea Cemetery in Medina, Saudi Arabia. In Iran this occasion is marked by prayers and religious ceremonies as people remember the noble deeds of this imam.

❁ BIRTH ANNIVERSARY OF IMAM ALI IBN MUSA AR-REZA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Eleventh of Dhui al-Qidah, the 11th month of the Islamic calendar.

Imam Ali ibn Musa ar-Reza the eighth imam was born in Medina in the year 148 of the Hegira Era. In the year 183 of the Hegira Era, he became the imam after the martyrdom of his father, Imam Musa Kazem. In 201 of the Hegira Era he was forced to leave Medina and go to the city of Merv in Khorasan on the orders of the wicked Abbasid caliph, Mamoun. The caliph thought that Reza's departure from Medina would greatly demoralize his followers. But not only did he retain his following in Medina, his presence transformed Khorasan into a center of divine blessings. Piety, modesty, and simplicity were the outstanding attributes of Reza. He is still remembered for his kindness and generosity to the poor and downtrodden. On this holy occasion the Iranians offer prayers and pay homage to the memory of the Imam.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

The birth of a new child is a time of great rejoicing in the Iranian Muslim community, because children are considered a token of Allah's compassion. Children are often referred to in Islam as "wealth." Immediately after the birth the baby is thoroughly washed in order to remove all impurities. According to Islamic tenets the first sound that a baby ought to hear should be the sacred name of Allah, customarily uttered by the baby's father or male relative. The father whispers the adhan, or call to prayer, into the child's right ear and then the left. The idea is to make the child aware of Allah's omnipresence and his power over the lives of mortals.

When the child is between three days and seven days old, the head is shaved to remove the natal impurities. This ceremony is known as the aqiqah, and it symbolizes the removal of misfortune, evil, and dross, so that the child can embark on a good and trouble-free life. In earlier times the hair used to be collected and weighed and the equivalent weight in silver was given to the poor. Nowadays the hair is generally buried. In some Iranian families an animal is sacrificed on such occasions, and the meat distributed to neighbors and friends.

On the day of purification the child is also given a proper name. Muslim children are not named at birth. The local imam is often consulted, and one particular name is picked from among the numerous names of Allah for a male child. Girls are often called Fatima after Muhammad's daughter.

✿ COMING OF AGE

Muslim boys generally experience a major change in status—circumcision (khitān in Arabic or khatneh in Persian)—when they have recited the entire Koran once thoroughly. In Iran, as in all other Islamic countries where this procedure is followed, the boy undergoes the operation between 10 and 12 years of age. This is a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and introducing him to his new status as an adult. In Iranian Muslim families there is a good deal of festivity, music, special food, and many guests on such occasions.

✿ MARRIAGES

Most Muslim marriages in Iran are conducted in a traditional manner with the matches being finalized by the parents on both sides. However according to Islamic tenets, both the individuals (the bride and the groom) are free to refuse the spouse that has been selected by their parents or guardians or elders. Prior to the actual wedding the two families involved decide upon a specific amount of money or articles in kind that the groom's family must give to the bride. This sum of money is in reality a security amount for the bride in case the marriage breaks up. As in all Islamic societies weddings in Iran take place in the home of the bride. The rites are conducted by an Imam, who also leads the prayers in the mosque.

✿ DEATH

All religions accept death as a part of human life. Since death is unpredictable and can happen at any time, anywhere, Muslims are exhorted to be always prepared for the inevitable. Muslims are always buried, unlike Hindu and Buddhists who are cremated. Cremation and other modes of disposal are prohibited. Muslims are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. In Iran (as in all Islamic societies) it is customary for the Muslims to ritually wash the dead body, perfume it, and drape it in a fresh new white cloth before burial. Also the burial ought to take place as soon as possible after death. When an individual is breathing his last, he or she is encouraged to recite and declare his or her faith. The dead person's face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs straightened out, and the mouth and eyes closed. Babies who die at birth, including the stillborn child, must be given a name.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

What we know as Iraq today in ancient times was Mesopotamia, which witnessed the rise and fall of many civilizations—Sumerian, Akkadian, Aramean, Babylonian, and Assyrian. Subsequently the region of Mesopotamia passed into oblivion and remained under the rule of Persian and Seleucid Dynasties for a few hundred years. The region came back into prominence with the advent of Islam. Muslim Arabs invaded Mesopotamia in 656 C.E. By 762 the Abassid Caliphate had established its center in Baghdad, which would become world-famous as a center of political power, religion, knowledge, and the arts.

Baghdad remained a site of conflict for quite some time. The area was dominated during the late 13th and early 14th centuries by the Black Sheep Turkmen, who were defeated by their adversaries, the White Sheep Turkmen, in 1446. The Turkmen were displaced by the Ottomans, who in 1534 incorporated this area into their empire, centered in Istanbul.

Britain gained control over Iraq after the collapse of the Ottoman Empire. In phases spread over nearly two decades, Iraq gained its freedom, ultimately emerging completely independent in the year 1932. On July 14, 1958, the monarchy was overthrown in a military coup, and Iraq became a republic. The next 10 years or so were marked by conspiracies, political intrigues, and a series of coups. In 1967 the effects in the region of the Arab–Israeli conflict led Iraq to seek help from the Soviet Union. Shortly afterward, on July 17, 1968, in a highly dramatic and bloodless coup by the Baath Party, a secular socialist party (founded in Syria in 1942) placed General Ahmad Hassan al-Bakr (1914–82) in power.

Black Sheep Turkmen

The Black Sheep Turkmen were a federation of tribal Turkmen who held sway over the regions of present-day Azerbaijan and Iraq between the years 1375 and 1468. They suffered a humiliating defeat at the hands of Timur Lenk (Tamer Lane, 1336–1405) around 1400.

The 1970s witnessed a period of stability for Iraq. In 1975 Iraq and its neighbor Iran agreed to iron out their differences and a boundary was drawn down the middle of the Shatt al-Arab waterway. During this period there was also a semblance of rapprochement between the Kurds and Iraqi authorities, between whom there had been simmering conflict since the 1960s.

In 1979 Saddam Hussein (b. 1937) replaced Al-Bakr as president. An autocratic ruler, Saddam used intimidation and torture to secure his power. Meanwhile also in 1979, the Islamic Revolution took place in Iran. As a result relations between the two countries reached their nadir, and Iraq reignited the earlier dispute over the Shatt al-Arab waterway. The Iraqi government, which had heavy Sunni leanings, was apprehensive about an Iranian-style revolution (the Shia-majority seizing control) in Iraq.

Full-scale war broke out on September 22, 1980, when Iraqi forces entered Iran. The eight years of war that followed were gory and brutal. Many ships carrying oil and other provisions were destroyed on the waters of the Persian Gulf. Hostilities ceased in August 1988. In the eight years of war, Iraq's economic burden escalated to more than US$100 billion. As Iraq started to rise from the ashes, relations with neighboring Kuwait began to turn sour. In July

Shatt al-Arab

The Shatt al-Arab (also known as the Shatt al-Arab waterway) is a river flowing through southwest Asia. It is some 124 miles in length and is formed by the confluence of the Euphrates and the Tigris Rivers in the southern part of Iraq. The southern end of the waterway constitutes the border between Iraq and Iran right up to its mouth, where it flows into the Persian Gulf. Conflicting territorial claims and disputes over navigation rights down the Shatt al-Arab were among the factors that sparked the Iraq–Iran War between 1980 and 1988, when the pre-1980 status quo was restored. The city of Basra, Iraq's major port, is located along this river.

1990, Hussein accused the Kuwaitis of waging economic warfare against Iraq by trying to cut the price of oil artificially and of stealing oil from the Iraqi portion of an oil field located on the border between the two countries. Mediation by other Arab countries failed, and on August 2, 1990, Iraq invaded Kuwait, assuming that the United States would not intervene. Though the United Nations condemned the move, Iraq annexed Kuwait as its 19th province. Western countries, led by the United States, imposed a trade embargo on Iraq, and about half a million troops from 27 countries poured into Saudi Arabia as the diplomatic stand-off over Kuwait deepened.

Despite frantic attempts by international leaders to strike a deal, the January 15 deadline set by the United Nations for the withdrawal of troops passed without any movement on the part of the Iraqis. A series of Tomahawk cruise missiles (unleashed by the United States) signaled the onset of the Gulf War. Allied (mostly U.S.) aircraft began a five-week bombing campaign over Iraq and Kuwait. The subsequent ground offensive lasted only 100 hours. While there were relatively few casualties on the Allied side, the civilian and military deaths on the Iraqi side were somewhere between 10,000 and 100,000. A ceasefire was announced on February 28, 1991. The UN Security Council demanded the eradication of all weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and WMD-development programs as a condition for lifting the UN sanctions.

Though there were some internal problems, including skirmishes with the Kurds and the Shiite Muslims, Iraq faded out of the focus of the world media until the terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11, 2001. The United States attacked Afghanistan, whose Taliban rulers shielded the perpetrator of the September 11 attacks, but soon Iraq emerged as a new target. Although UN inspection teams found little to indicate a weapons of mass destruction program, Washington believed otherwise. The United States and its allies invaded Iraq on March 20, 2003. The Iraqi forces capitulated. On April 9, 2003, U.S. forces took control of Baghdad, toppled Saddam's statue, and brought his regime to an end. This incident brought in its trail a power vacuum, anarchy, and chaos.

As the transition to a new Iraqi government proceeded, fighting persisted, causing considerable destruction of property, death, and instability, despite efforts by U.S. forces to quell the insurgency. An interim government took charge in June 2004, and in 2005 elections raised some hopes. Sheikh Ghazi Ajil al-Yawar (? b. 1958) became president, Iyad Allawi (b. 1945) was chosen to be the prime minister, and Iraqi leaders struggled to write a constitution. Meanwhile the U.S. occupation continued.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Iraq is located in the Middle East, bordering the Persian Gulf, between Iran and Kuwait on the east, Turkey in the north, Syria and Jordan to the west, and Saudi Arabia on the west and south. The terrain consists primarily of broad plains and reedy marshes (along the borders with Iran and Turkey), and vast tracts of Iraq are desert.

Iraq experiences mild-to-cool winters with dry, hot, cloudless summers. However the northern mountainous regions experience cold winters with occasional heavy snowfall. The snow melts in early spring, sometimes causing floods in central and southern Iraq. The average temperatures in Iraq range from higher than 118°F in July and August to below freezing in January. The bulk of the rainfall occurs from December through April. It rains abundantly in the mountainous region, reaching an annual rate of more than three feet in some places. During the summer months, weather is determined by two wind systems: the southern and southeasterly sharqi, a dry, dusty wind with occasional strong gusts, which occurs from April to early June and again from late September through November. The shamal, a steady wind from the north and northwest, begins to blow in mid-June and lasts until mid-September. Shamal is accompanied by very dry air, which causes intense heating of the land surface but also provides some cooling effect. Dust storms often accompany these winds.

❁ ECONOMY

Iraq's economy is dominated by the oil sector, which provides about 95 percent of foreign exchange earnings. The financial problems caused by massive expenditures in the eight-year war with Iran and the physical damage to oil export facilities compelled the government to adopt austerity measures, borrow heavily, and reschedule foreign debt payments. After hostilities with Iran ended in 1988, oil exports gradually increased with the construction of new pipelines and restoration of damaged facilities. But Iraq's seizure of Kuwait in August 1990 brought international economic sanctions and ultimate intervention by an international coalition in 1991 that defeated Iraq and caused economic as well as social and political devastation.

In December 1999, the UN Security Council authorized Iraq to export as much oil as required to meet humanitarian needs. The drop in gross domestic product (GDP) between 2001 and 2002 was due to the global economic slowdown and lower oil prices. Per capita food imports increased significantly, while medical supplies and health care services steadily improved. Invasion of Iraq by the United States and its allies in March–April 2003 resulted in the shutdown of sizable sections of the central economic administrative structure. From the year 2004 on, the rebuilding of oil, electricity, and other production has been progressing slowly, aided by the United States occupation and international grants but hampered by ongoing hostilities in the country.

Kurds

Ethnically related to the modern-day Iranians, the Kurds were originally nomadic herdsmen. They are mostly settled or seminomadic and live not only in northern Iraq but in Iran, Turkey, and Syria as well. Through the ages Kurds have resisted domination by other groups and tribes and have suffered terrible discrimination. Promised their own state in the Treaty of Sèvres in 1920 (a promise that was not fulfilled), many Kurds still long for a separatist Kurdistan. The majority of Kurds are Sunni Muslims. Kurdish dialects belong to the northwestern branch of the Iranian languages.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Iraq is a country with a rich and varied cultural heritage. Many important landmarks of the ancient and medieval world, including ruins, monuments, and museums, are situated around the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers. These include Nineveh, the capital of King Assurbanipal I (r. 669–27 B.C.E.); the famous Sumerian city of Ur (third millennium B.C.E.); the birth place of Abraham, the desert city of Hatra, included on UNESCO's list of World Heritage Sites; Assur, the capital of the Assyrian kingdom and site of the legendary Ishtar Temple; and the legendary Hanging Gardens of Babylon, one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world.

Iraq also has a rich musical heritage. According to archaeological evidence, a large number of instruments were in use in the region as long as 3,000 years ago. Sumerians had evolved a music notation system 2,000 years ago.

Contemporary music in Iraq consists of a melody with rhythmic accompaniment. No harmony or chords accompany the highly ornamented melodies. Many pitches are “bent” or adorned with trills and glissandos (short secondary notes) to heighten a single straightforward pitch. This ornamentation gives the music a distinctly Middle Eastern feel in addition to having an emotional impact on the listener. Complex rhythms and mixed meters are some of the salient features of this music.

❁ CUISINE

Iraq's cuisine is an amalgamation of diverse culinary styles—Arab, Turkish, Kurdish, Ottoman, Persian, and Jewish, to name a few. Iraqi cooking uses some spices typical of Arabic cooking, namely saffron and mint. The Sunni commentators suggest that Sheikh Ghazi Ajil al-Yawar is held in low esteem by Iraqis, pointing to the nickname they have given him al-Baqara al-dhahika, which translates roughly as “the laughing cow.”

Fun Fact

Baklava

Baklava is a very rich dessert common to Turkish, Greek, and Middle Eastern cuisines. It is made with thin pastry leaves and nuts. The flour-and-water dough is stretched into thin sheets, cut, and layered in a large oven tray. Each sheet is generously brushed with melted butter; then, chopped walnuts and pistachios are spread between the layers and it is baked. After it turns golden brown, the pastry is soaked in a thick syrup of sugar, honey, and lemon juice.

commonly preferred meats in Iraq include lamb, beef, goat, mutton, and poultry. Muslims abstain from eating pork or its products. Some of the specialties include kebabs, quzi (stuffed and roasted lamb), kubba (minced meat with nuts, raisins, and spices), as well as masgouf (grilled fish). Flat bread (samoons) is present at every meal. For sweets and desserts, people eat fruit, rice pudding, sesame cookies, and baklava. Amba is an essential item of the typical Indian platter, and its popularity is evidence of the close trade and cultural links between Iraq and India; as a natural corollary, many other food items have passed from the subcontinent to Mesopotamia.

Coffee, tea, fruit juices, and soft drinks are the most common beverages. For Muslims alcohol is prohibited. A highly popular Iraqi condiment is amba (mango pickle).

During the first half of the 20th century, Jews were the single largest community living in Baghdad. A good number of what are considered typical Baghdadi dishes are actually Jewish. Some classic examples are tabit (slow-cooked rice, tomato, and chicken, classically stuffed in sheep's intestine), karil (rice, lentils, and yellow squash, often served with yogurt during the festivals of Rosh Hashanah and Shavuot), salon (fish cooked with sweet peppers and tomatoes and generally served cold), and kuba shwandry (dumplings stuffed with meat and cooked with beets to give them a rich reddish-purple color).

Public/Legal Holidays

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

As in other parts of the world, the people of Iraq welcome the New Year on January 1. Since this is an official holiday, all educational, commercial, and government organizations remain closed. People devote the day to leisure and recreational activities shared with their loved ones.

ARMY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 6

On this day Iraq marks the anniversary of the formation of its army in 1921. There are ceremonies held across the country to recall the army's past service and sacrifices. This is also an opportunity to showcase the army's current and future capabilities. The ceremonies in the capital are attended by the minister of defense, the chief of staff of the army, and numerous army generals. Dignitaries also place floral tributes at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Baghdad. This is a public holiday in Iraq with schools, businesses, and government offices closed.

REVOLUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February 8

On this day in 1963 the Arab Socialist Baath Party (ASBP) ousted Brigadier Abd-al-Karim Qassim (1914–63) from power. He had earlier deposed the reigning monarch King Feisal II (1939–58), in 1958 and had been instrumental in the establishment of the republic in Iraq. It is interesting to note that this coup took place during Ramadan, when it is mandatory for Muslims to observe dawn-to-dusk fasting and abstain from all kinds of vices and evils, including conspiracy, hatred, and political intrigues. In Iraq the day is marked by speeches and processions. Since Revolution Day, also called Ramadan Revolution Day, is a public holiday, all public and government establishments remain closed.

DAY OF SADDAM HUSSEIN'S DOWNFALL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 9

This holiday is of quite recent origin. On this day in 2003 the Iraqi president Saddam Hussein was deposed from power by U.S. forces and went into hiding. Hussein's downfall marked the end of an era of brutal dictatorship and military rule sustained through torture and intimidation. On this day in Iraq the people (those who are anti-Saddam) organize marches, shout slogans, and participate in processions. This is a public holiday in Iraq with schools, stores, and government offices closed.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, originated with the international socialist party. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of Socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Iraq all government offices, businesses, and schools remain closed. The day is observed with labor union activities, meetings, and speeches.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 14

During World War I Iraq, which had been a part of the Ottoman Empire, was occupied by Britain; in 1920, it was declared a League of Nations mandate under the governance of the United Kingdom. During the next decade Iraq attained its independence as a kingdom. Then on July 14, 1958, the monarchy was overthrown in a military coup, and Iraq became a republic. This event is commemorated mostly by government ceremonies. It is also an official holiday in Iraq with schools, businesses, and government offices closed.

❁ PEACE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 8

This holiday, only a few decades old, commemorates the end of the conflict between Iraq and neighboring Iran that occurred between 1980 and 1988. This war resulted in the heavy loss of life and property on both sides. A ceasefire was enacted on August 8, 1988. Since then the day has been celebrated as Peace Day. On this day Iraqis recall the sacrifices of those who died during this war; many families lost loved ones in the brutal extended conflict. Parades and public speeches mark the day.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, also known as Eid ul-Zuha and Bakr-Eid, recalls Ibrahim's (Abraham's) unflinching faith in God, evidenced by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because the Almighty commanded him to do so. In Iraq on this day each family that can afford it is expected to sacrifice sheep, goats, rams, or cattle in the name of God; this meat is then shared with friends and family and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival devout Muslims also undertake a pilgrimage, or Hajj, to Mecca if they can, the holy city of the Islamic faith.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Islam employs a lunar calendar, made up of 12 months of 29 or 30 days, based on the cycles of the Moon. The Islamic year thus amounts to only 354 days. Muslims do not make adjustments to anchor particular holidays or months in particular seasons, unlike the Jewish lunar calendar. Therefore compared to Western calendars, the Islamic year cycles 11 days backward every year and Muslim holidays, such as El am Hejir, the Islamic New Year, shift in their placement in the Western solar calendar. Hence the date of the New Year observance varies from year to year.

The Islamic New Year is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month. The beginning of the New Year is usually quiet, unlike New Year's celebrations associated with other calendars. In Iraq, Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday is the recounting of the incident of the Hegira—Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina. Muslims also take this time to reflect on the passage of time and their own mortality.

❁ ASHURA

Observed by: Shia Muslims, some Sunni Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

In Iraq, the Muslim holiday of Ashura, also called Mourning of Karbala, is marked as a day of mourning, honoring Hussein, a grandson of Muhammad, and other martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Karbala. Observed primarily on the 10th day of Muharram, it consists of two days of fasting and prayers for forgiveness.

Shia Muslims in particular observe this holiday in remembrance of the martyrdom of Hussein in 680 C.E. In Shia communities this is a solemn day; plays reenacting the martyrdom are often staged, and many men participate in mourning rituals, walking in processions through the streets and flagellating themselves with sharp objects or scourges.

Interestingly, Ashura has been a day of fasting for Sunni Muslims since the days of early Islam. The Sunni commemorate two historical events on this day: the day Noah (Nuh) left the Ark, and the day Moses (Musa) was saved from the Egyptians by Allah.

Iraqi Kurdish women dance during the Navruz celebrations in Dukan near the city of Suleymaniya, in the Kurdish dominant northern Iraq. Navruz, the Farsi-language word for “new year,” is an ancient Persian festival, celebrated on the first of spring in countries including Iraq, Turkey, Afghanistan, and Iran. The festival is mainly a Kurdish event in Iraq and Turkey. The festival is a symbolic opportunity to purify the soul for the new year and symbolizes revival and is marked by spring cleaning, buying new clothes, and planting trees. (AP Photo/Murad Sezer)

❁ MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, known also as Milad ul-Nabi and Mawlid al-Nabi, marks the birthday of Muhammad in 570 C.E. It is celebrated on the 12th day of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar. On this day Iraqi Muslims focus on the life and teachings of the prophet and his virtue of forgiving even his worst enemies. Prayers and special songs are part of the observance. The poor are given alms on this day.

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: March 21

Navruz, or Nowruz, is not a religious festival but a celebration of the vernal equinox. According to scholars, it originated in ancient Mesopotamia and was celebrated widely in pre-Islamic times. In Babylon, for example, it was tied in with the New Year, which was celebrated on the 21st day of Nissanu (March–April) with festivities lasting 12 more days, each day commemorated with special rites, amusements, and performances.

Navruz heralds the advent of spring, the resumption of agricultural activities, and the gradual onset of warm weather. This is also the day when conflicts and hostilities are supposed to be forgotten and forgiven. On this day the people of Iraq greet each other and partake of lavish feasts. An atmosphere of good-naturedness rules the day.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, the Feast of the Breaking of the Fast, marks the start of festivities and celebrations at the end of dawn-to-dusk fasting during the month of Ramadan. Ramadan is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. It was during this month that Muhammad observed austerity and fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him.

Iraqis celebrate this day by wearing new clothes and taking part in the morning prayer with other Muslims, generally in mosques and idgabs, open spaces set aside for prayers on special occasions. This is followed by social visits, the exchange of greetings and gifts, and the consumption of delicacies, such as sweets and desserts, along with other items specially prepared for this occasion.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a new child is a time of great rejoicing in the Iraqi Muslim community, since children are considered a sign of Allah's compassion. Children are often referred to in Islam as "wealth." Immediately after the birth, a baby is thoroughly washed in order to remove biological impurities. According to Islamic tenets, the first sound that a baby ought to hear should be the sacred name of Allah. This should be uttered by its father (or a male relative). The male relative whispers the call to prayer, or adhan, first into the child's right ear and then into its left. The underlying idea is to make the child aware of Allah's omnipresence and his power over the lives of mortals.

When the child is between three and seven days of age, its head is shaved to remove remaining natal impurities. On the day of purification, the child is also given a proper name. The local imam is often consulted in selecting the name. For a male child it is taken from among the numerous names for Allah and Muhammad; girls are often called Fatima, after Muhammad's daughter.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and introducing him to his new status as an adult. In the Islamic countries where this procedure is followed, including Iraq, the boy undergoes the operation between the ages of 10 and 12. In Iraqi Muslim families the occasion is celebrated with a good deal of festivity, music, food, and many guests.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Iraq most marriages are conducted in the traditional Muslim manner. The matches are created by agreement between the two sets of parents. However according to Islamic tenets, both the bride and the groom are free to refuse the spouse selected by their parents, guardians, or elders. Prior to the actual wedding the two families decide on a specific amount of money or articles in kind that the groom's family must give to the bride. This sum of money is in reality security for the bride in case the marriage breaks up. As in all Islamic societies weddings in Iraq take place in the bride's home.

The wedding rites are conducted by an imam, who also leads the prayers in the mosque. Iraqi tradition requires that, while the nikah (wedding contract) is being recited by the priest, the bride has to read the surat al fath (verse 48) from the Koran. The imam asks her whether she gives him permission to marry her to the groom upon payment of the specified amount. The Iraqi Muslim bride customarily wears a white dress for the wedding and puts her feet in water (symbolizing tranquility), while her kinsmen place in front of her a sufra, which consists of fruits, six candles, different types of sweets, bread and cheese (colloquially known as khubz al abbas), rice, honey, and yogurt. These items symbolize plenty and prosperity.

❁ DEATH

All religions accept death as a part of human life. Since death is unpredictable and can happen at any time, anywhere, Muslims are exhorted always to be prepared. When Muslims are faced with death, they are encouraged to recite prayers and declare their faith. Muslims believe that a baby who is born dead or stillborn must nonetheless have a name.

Muslims are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. In Iraq (as in all Islamic societies), it is customary for Muslims to ritually wash the dead body, perfume it, and drape it in a fresh new white cloth before burial. A dead person's face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs are straightened out, and the mouth and eyes closed. The burial is supposed to take place as quickly as possible following death.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

During the last Ice Age Ireland was mostly ice-covered and joined by a land bridge to Britain and Europe. The island has been inhabited for about 9,000 years. The earliest inhabitants, probably hunters, reached Ireland via a land bridge (from what is now Scotland) during the Middle Stone-Age period (c. 12,000 years ago). The culture gradually progressed from Mesolithic to high Neolithic culture during the next three or four millennia. Then around 5,000 years ago, a farming people arrived. These Neolithic people left behind numerous megalithic tombs including those at Newgrange and Knowth, both in the Boyne Valley. Newgrange, built in 3200 B.C.E., is what archaeologists call a passage-grave or passage-tomb. This site predates the Giza Pyramids in Egypt by 600 years and is 1,000 years older than its more famous neighbor, Stonehenge. On winter solstice, the light of the rising Sun reaches the roofbox at Newgrange and illuminates the space for just 17 minutes. Knowth, the oldest chambered structure in the world (5600–3800), on the other hand, is a gallery of megalithic art, with a quarter of all the known European megalithic art. Archaeologists spent 40 years excavating Knowth, and it is now open to the public.

Around 2000, Bronze Age metal workers and prospectors reached Ireland and began to produce axe heads and jewelry of bronze and gold as well as ceramics. The Milesian Genealogies, compiled over a four-year period in the 17th century by Franciscan monks, are said to trace Irish genealogies back to one of the three sons of Mil Espáine (or Milesius), a Gaulish warrior. Some historians believe Irish lineages are fairly accurate at least as far back as the sixth century, maybe even the fifth.

Irish mythology begins somewhere between 4,000 and 3,000 years ago. Around 1200 B.C.E. yet another group settled in Ireland, bringing with them very different weapons and other objects from those left by the preceding peoples. Their dwellings, called crannog, were built on artificial islands out in the middle of lakes. Six hundred years later, the Celtic-speaking members of the Bronze Age La Tène culture reached Ireland and took over. No records have been found of the peoples displaced by the Celts, so their language, probably non-Indo-European, remains unknown.

The Celts shared a common dialect and culture, but the area they controlled consisted of about 150 mini-kingdoms, called tuath, ruled by minor chieftains. The tuath was the most basic political unit. These chieftains, in turn, answered to a king who controlled a group of tuath, who was subject to one of five provincial kings. This hierarchy ruled an agrarian society of numerous fine, or “extended families” divided into distinct classes. There were no towns, and cows were the medium of exchange. These Celts ruled Ireland for 1,000 years.

Around 100, the Gaels began to populate Ireland, and by 200 C.E. the high kingship at Tara in County Meath had started. The Gaels, speakers of Goidelic Celtic, are still an ethnic group living in Ireland, Scotland, and the Isle of Man. The word Gael (or Goidelic) was first used as a collective term to describe the Irish, although it may derive from the Welsh word gwyddel, which means “raiders.” At the beginning of the Christian period in Ireland, when the monks were compiling whatever records of Irish history they could find, the Gaels claimed to be descended from Mil Espáine (from the Latin miles Hispaniae, meaning “soldier of Spain”); the “sons of Mil” (Milesians), who represent the Goidelic Celts.

Around 300, the Romans recorded about 300 attacks by the Dalriada Scots (in Latin, Scotti), from the east of the modern-day province of Ulster, and their Pictish allies from Caledonia (the Roman name for the region). (The Romans called Ireland Scotia, and raiding bands of Irish were called Scotti, although the principal Latin name for the island was Hibernia. However this sense of the word Scot lasted well into the Middle Ages.) In 432 Pope St. Celestine I (r. 422–32) sent St. Patrick (387–493, other sources say 460/61) to Ireland to convert the Irish to Christianity.

In 500 under King Fergus I, the Dalriadans of Ireland invaded Argyll and established the Scottish half of the realm known as Dál Riata (Dalriada) in the Pictish lands, called Caledonia by the Romans. As long as the Romans represented a common enemy, the Picts and Scots were allies. Once the Romans had left, the two sides fought each other intermittently between 300 and 840, with the Picts winning more often than not.

Around the ninth century the Vikings began to plunder the monasteries and towns along the Irish coast. They established a number of towns in Ireland, one of which became Dublin.

In 1172 King Henry II of England (1133–89) took control of Ireland, and the pope called him the Lord of Ireland. In the 13th century English law was introduced in Ireland. Although initially English rule was limited to areas around Dublin, by the 17th century England ruled almost all of Ireland.

The 1800 Act of Union created the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Later in the 19th century, the English started replacing the Irish language. The issue of self-government did not come up until 1870, when the debate increased tensions between Irish nationalists and those who favored union with Britain. About five-sixths of the

The Sons of Mil

Mil Espáine never set foot in Ireland. His given name was Golam. While serving in the military in Scythia and Egypt, Mil remembered a prophesy that his descendants would rule Ireland. So he headed west and got as far as Spain, where he died. But his wife Scotia and his uncle Íth sailed to Ireland where the the Tuatha Dé Danann killed Íth. When Mil’s eight sons and Íth’s nine brothers saw Íth’s body, they invaded Ireland and defeated the Tuatha Dé. Like their ancestors at the start of the Christian era, contemporary Gaels of Scotland and Ireland still believe that they are the descendants of Mil’s sons, and many, if not most, clan leaders in both countries claim descent from their predecessor, back to famous historical kings all the way back into prehistory.

island was largely nationalist, while one-sixth was unionist. The Irish republicans led a series of rebellions. The Easter Rising in Dublin in 1916 increased the nationalist feeling, and in the general elections of 1918 Irish republicans won a large majority of seats in the legislature. They declared Irish independence, which led to the Anglo-Irish War (1919–21). Finally the Anglo-Irish Treaty of 1921 granted independence to 26 Irish counties, while Northern Ireland remained part of Great Britain.

In 1937 a new constitution was enacted and Ireland was proclaimed a democratic state. Although thousands of Irish soldiers volunteered to join the British forces during World War II, Ireland remained neutral. Finally in 1949, Ireland was formally declared a republic and left the British Commonwealth.

Although initially a poor country, after its independence, Ireland made efforts to revive its economy and encourage foreign investment. It joined the European Community (EC) in 1973. The EC was the precursor to the European Union (EU). The per capita gross domestic product (GDP) of Ireland is the second highest in the EU, behind that of Luxembourg.

Fun Fact

What is called the Milesian Genealogies is held to trace the generations all the way back to Adam, and some believe that the monks’ original list of the generations between Adam and Mil Espáine will eventually be found.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Western Europe, Ireland lies in the North Atlantic Ocean. Great Britain lies to the east of the island, across the Irish Sea. Sea cliffs and low mountains characterize Ireland’s terrain. The central part of Ireland, however, has raised bogs (swampy areas or marshlands) and flat farmlands. The highest point in Ireland is Carrauntoo Hill, a peak that stands 3,513.8

Ogham

The Ogham (Old Irish Ogam) alphabet flourished between the fifth and sixth centuries and was used to carve boundary markers and memorials in the Gaelic languages. These inscriptions are found in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, England, and the Isle of Man. There are 25 distinct symbols (letters) in Ogham, the fedá. The first 20 are the primary letters, while the last 5 are supplementary (forfedá). The letters themselves are a specific number of lines etched along the edge of a stone, the stemline, and they are distinguished both by the number of lines and their relation to the stemline. The first five letters, for example, represent n, s, f, l, and b. All five letters in this first set were carved on the right side of the stemline at a 45-degree angle. They differ only in the number of parallel lines used to represent each one. Thus five straight lines is n, four lines is s, three is f, and so on. In the second set all the lines were carved to the left of the stemline, and these letters, like the first five, are distinguished by the number of parallel lines used to represent them. Thus, q, which has five straight lines, is distinguished from c, which has four lines, but is distinguished from n because its five lines point left, not right, from the stemline. The fourth set of five letters contains the vowels i, e, u, o, a, differentiated from each other by the number of lines in the character and from the consonants because the parallel lines cross the stemline to either side. An Ogham text is read from the bottom left-hand side of the stone, then upward, then across the top and down the right-hand side.

feet high. The longest river in Ireland, the Shannon River, divides Ireland into two parts.

Ireland enjoys a maritime temperate climate characterized by cool summers and mild winters. The average daily temperature in summer is 66°F, while the average daily temperature in winter is 39°F. Oak, birch, yew, elm, holly, hazel, ash, whitebeam, and alder trees, as well as shrubs such as bird cherry, blackthorn, gorse, and rowan, are among the Irish flora. As far as fauna, Ireland is home to bats, bumblebees, red squirrels, wasps, humming bird-hawk moths, Irish hares, hedgehogs, salmon, trout, and brent geese.

ECONOMY

Ireland has a trade-dependent economy. It is a member of the European Union (EU) and in January 1999, along with 10 other member nations of the EU, Ireland adopted the Euro (the common currency of many members of European Union) as its national currency. Due to the growth-oriented economic policies of the Irish government, Ireland is ranked second among EU nations in terms of per-capita GDP. The industrial sector is the driving force of the economy, contributing 80 percent to Ireland's export revenues and employing 28 percent of the workforce. Recently the government has introduced economic reforms that encourage foreign investment, reduced government expenditures, and controlled price and wage increases. It has also made it possible for the nation's laborers to improve their skills.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The main ethnic groups of Ireland are Celtic and English. English and Irish are the official languages of Ireland, although Gaelic (or Gaeilge) is spoken in the western parts of the country. A predominantly Roman Catholic country, Ireland is also home to followers of the Church of Ireland and people of other faiths as well.

Ireland is known for its rich musical heritage. Traditional Irish musical instruments include fiddles, goatskin drums, pipes, and tin whistles. Looheen is a popular traditional song in Ireland in which every singer tries to improvise on the verses of the song, and then everyone singing joins in the chorus and sings the verses again.

One of the most popular forms of folk dance is called set dancing, a dance for groups of varying sizes. A fast dancing style, it involves rhythmic foot stomping to the tune of folk music. Another popular folk dance is Irish step dancing, which can be performed solo or by a group. Step dancing is a dance style in which the dancers keep their upper bodies stiff while moving their feet in a quick and precise manner as dictated by the rules of the dance. Competitive step dancing has grown rapidly since the appearance of Riverdance, a musical show performed worldwide by a troupe professional step dancers. An organized step dance competition is referred to as a féis (pronounced "fesh"), which means "festival" in Gaelic.

The Irish also enjoy playing a wide variety of sports and Gaelic (ancient Celtic games) games such as hurling (a Celtic game played with sticks and a ball), Gaelic football, handball, and Camogie (a team game played by women with sticks and a ball) are extremely popular sports in Ireland. Irish rugby and boxing also have many fans in Ireland.

Ireland has produced some very well-known literary figures, including the playwright George Bernard Shaw, the dramatist and poet W. B. Yeats, and the playwright, novelist, and poet Samuel Beckett.

❁ CUISINE

The Irish enjoy pork, lamb, and beef, and most of their dishes are meat-based. Some of the traditional Irish dishes include: Irish meat cobbler, roast chicken, roast pork loin, Dublin Coddle (made from bacon and sausage), smoked salmon, lamb, stew, and whisky-baked ham.

The Irish prefer tea to coffee and beer over wine, although fruit juices and whisky are also consumed.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. Each year a festive spirit reigns as people hold parties and celebrations beginning on New Year's Eve. In Ireland on New Year's Eve, the Irish attend parties thrown at local bars and pubs and usher in the new year with lots of beer and music. At the stroke of midnight, fireworks light up the night sky in the bigger cities and towns of Ireland.

A number of interesting customs are associated with Irish New Year's celebrations. At midnight on New Year's Eve, many Irish walk in through the front doors of their houses and then go out the back doors since they believe that doing this will bring good luck in the new year. Also many Irish preserve the Christmas bread and bang the walls of their homes to chase out bad luck and pave the way for good spirits and good luck to enter the house. The tradition of a New Year's swim is widely practiced in the southern parts of Ireland. On New Year's Day people swim in the cold water of the sea for a few minutes.

The modern custom of standing under a sprig of mistletoe to be kissed at the stroke of midnight is derived from the reverence of the ancient Celts for this poisonous parasitic plant. When the leaves fell from its host trees, the leaves and white berries of the plant could be seen; it was believed that their visibility at this time promised the return of the Sun. Specifically mistletoe was thought to be the sperm of the solar deity Taranis, a promise of the Sun god's rebirth. At winter solstice branches were cut from the trees on a day sacred to the Moon, and cattle

New Year's Day Superstitions

Many superstitious beliefs are associated with New Year's Eve and New Year's Day in Ireland:

- Wearing shoes with holes in them on New Year's will bring financial losses in the coming year;
- Washing clothes on this day is unlucky because throwing out water on New Year's Day brings bad luck;
- Making money deals on New Year's Day is unlucky since people in earlier days believed this brought traders misfortune.

Fun Fact

James I was the last Catholic king to rule over England, Scotland, and Ireland.

were sacrificed in thanks for the precious gift. Belief in the magical powers of mistletoe has long outlived the ancient Celts. In medieval times, the plant was called allheal because it was credited with great healing power and believed capable of curing almost anything, from epilepsy to cancer. In England, because people believed that as long as some mistletoe was kept in the home love would also be sustained, they made sure that a fresh sprig was brought in every year, and this may be the source for the modern New Year's ritual.

❁ ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 17

St. Patrick's Day commemorates the death of the patron saint of Ireland St. Patrick, who died on March 17, 461 C.E. In honor of their patron saint, Ireland celebrates March 17 as its national day. St. Patrick's Day is celebrated with great enthusiasm. Beginning March 15, a special four-day festival is organized in Ireland that lasts until March 18. Big parades, spectacular fireworks (known as skyfest), street theater, and musical bands are integral parts of the festival. In addition, a variety of events such as fun fairs, visual and art exhibits, and games such as treasure hunts create a carnival atmosphere. People often wear a bunch of shamrocks (an indigenous Irish plant) on their caps on this day. It is believed that St. Patrick used shamrocks to explain the Holy Trinity to those people whom he hoped to convert to Christianity.

In the town of Downpatrick, where it is believed that St. Patrick is buried, residents participate in colorful parades. The girls wear green ribbons in their hair, and most children proudly wear a tri-color badge displaying the colors of the Irish national flag (green, white, and orange).

Fun Fact

The Hill of Tara (Temair, in Gaelic) was the seat of power in pre-Christian Ireland, and it is said that 142 kings reigned there. There are countless monuments and earthen structures on the Hill of Tara, with the earliest settlement built during the Neolithic, and the Mound of the Hostages constructed around 4,500 years ago. According to legend the most famous of Tara's monuments, Ireland's ancient coronation stone, was placed there by the godlike people, the Tuatha Dé Danann. The stone was said to roar when touched by the rightful king of Tara.

❁ BANK HOLIDAYS

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May, June, August, October

Bank Holidays are traditional holidays that trace their origins to earlier times when banks remained closed on specific days, preventing other businesses from functioning. Ireland celebrates five bank holidays, and all are public holidays. This means that all private and public institutions remain closed, and everyone employed in nonessential services gets the day off.

In addition to St. Patrick's Day, the bank holidays are celebrated as follows: The early May bank holiday falls on the first Monday in the month of May; the June bank holiday falls on the first Monday in the month of June; the summer bank holiday falls on the first Monday in the month of August, and the Halloween bank holiday falls on October 31.

❁ BATTLE OF THE BOYNE DAY

Observed on: July 12

Battle of the Boyne Day, also known as Orangemen's Day (or Orange Day), celebrates the historic victory of the Protestant William of Orange (1650–1702; he became King William III of England, Scotland, and Ireland) over his father-in-law and Catholic King James I (1650–1702, at the Battle of Boyne in 1690).

King James I was the king of England and Scotland (where he was known as King James VII) and Ireland. However, his dictatorship and lack of regard for Catholic beliefs angered his subjects, and he was ousted from the throne by his nobles. Instead of his son James Francis Edward (1688–1766) succeeding to the throne, his Protestant daughter Mary (1662–94) and her husband, William of Orange, assumed power. This led to a series of wars between King James I and William of Orange, in which James I was defeated in the Battle of Boyne on July 12, 1690.

Celebrations begin on the evening of July 11, when the men of each community assemble around huge bonfires and in pubs to remember this historic victory and discuss celebrations to be held the next day. On July 12, parades are organized all over Ireland. Families gather together for a nice meal that consists of roasted potatoes and a variety of vegetable dishes; the children feast on pastries.

❁ HALLOWEEN

Observed on: October 31

Halloween, also known as All Hallow's Eve and Day of the Dead, is celebrated on the night of October 31, now also the eve of the Roman Catholic festival of All Saints' Day (November 1). Halloween celebrations can be traced to the Samhain celebration practiced by the Celts during the pre-Christian era in Ireland. The Celtic new year began with Samhain and, like the Roman Saturnalia, it was a time for rowdiness and misbehavior. The Celts believed that during Samhain the barrier between their world and the otherworld became so thin that the dead were able to return and warm themselves at the fires of the living. Likewise some of the living, especially poets, could enter the otherworld through the doorways of the sidhe, such as that at the Hill of Tara in Ireland. (A sidhe was a place where the door between the world of mortals and the otherworld was always open.)

To celebrate the beginning of the winter season, Celtic tribes slaughtered cattle and made huge bonfires out of their bones. It is believed that the word bonfire is derived from the term bonefires (bones of cattle used as sacrificial offerings by the Celts). In the rural areas of Ireland, huge bonfires are still lit on this day.

Contemporary Halloween observances are more parody than anything else. It is common for this holiday to be celebrated by children who dress up in fancy costumes, visit their neighbors, and shout “trick or treat.” The neighbors give them candies and other sweets. After the children return from collecting candies from their neighbors, the entire family attends a special Halloween party with friends and neighbors where a number of games are played. The most popular game is snap apple in which players try to bite a coin out of a suspended apple. Treasure hunts are also very popular. Parents hide sweets and pastries hooked to strings tied around the high branches of trees, and children are given hints as they look for them.

Barnbrack (a fruitcake) is traditionally eaten on Halloween in Ireland. It is usually baked with a small treat inside it. The Irish believe that a person’s fortune can be predicted by the treat. For example if a person finds a ring inside the fruitcake, it indicates that the person might soon be married.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, also known as St. Jordan’s Day, Woman Christmas, or Little Christmas, is celebrated to remember the Christian legend of the Three Wise Men from the East (or Magi) who came to Jerusalem looking for the newborn Jesus. This is one of the most important Christian holidays. In Ireland, it is marked by church services with special prayers and the reading of psalms. Because water is considered a symbol of life, it is blessed and sprinkled on the congregation to absolve them of all their sins. The observance is also marked by lighting 12 candles in honor of Jesus’ 12 disciples and by baking pastries and cakes.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus’ mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe he was the Son of God incarnate and the second personage of the Holy Trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Palm Sunday is as much about Jesus’ triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. When they attend Mass on this day, Catholics are given small twisted loops of dried palm frond.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians Easter is considered the most important festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. Apart from its religious aspect, the Resurrection symbolizes the resurgence of hope and a fresh lease on life for all human beings. Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

On Easter, a special Easter Mass is held in local churches that is attended by all devout Irish Catholics. Also children enjoy decorating hard-boiled Easter eggs. A number of competitions, such as the egg-eating contest, in which people compete to see who can eat the most eggs, are organized throughout Ireland. Before the egg was taken and linked with the Christian festival of Easter, it was closely associated with various spring festivals. The Romans, Gauls, Chinese, Egyptians, and Persians all regarded the egg as a symbol of the universe. In pagan times the egg represented fertility and the rebirth of the Earth. After the long, harsh winter, the Earth burst forth with signs of new life just as life emerges from eggs. Ireland is a nation of Celts, and the Celts, who dominated pre-Christian Europe well into the Roman era, had a full calendar of festivals connected with the Earth, its beings, and seasonal cycles.

✿ EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: The day after Easter

Easter Monday is a Christian holiday celebrated on the day after Easter Sunday. Formerly, it was celebrated as a part of Easter Week, but was reduced to a one-day celebration during the 19th century. The events that take place on this day are essentially fulfilled and include egg-rolling competitions and drenching other people with water. Originally, holy water, which was used to bless homes and food, was also used for these playful pranks. In Ireland Easter games and festivities continue on Easter Monday.

The practice of drenching everyone with water may be traced to the Irish goddess Boann, a fertility goddess as well as a water-goddess. According to legend, there was a sacred well (Sidhe Nechtan) that contained the source of knowledge. No one was allowed to approach this well, with the exception of the god Nechtan (Boann's husband) and his servants. Boann, ignoring the warnings, walked up to the sacred well and violated the area's sanctity. For this transgression she was punished; the waters of the defiled well were transformed into a raging river that pursued her. In some versions she was drowned; in others she managed to outrun the currents. In either case this water became the river known as the Boyne, and Boann thereafter became the presiding deity.

Easter Monday also commemorates the Easter Monday Rebellion Uprising of 1916. Although it was brutally crushed by British forces, this event began a year of guerilla warfare against the British in Ireland. Eventually, in 1921, Britain signed a peace treaty, and Ireland obtained independence. This day

The Celtic Lunar Calendar

The Coligny calendar, now held in the Palais des Arts at Lyon, is the earliest-known Celtic calendar, dating back to the first century B.C.E. The calendar is in pieces—bronze fragments, once a single huge plate—and is inscribed with Latin characters but in the Celtic language. It is a lunisolar calendar with a 30-year cycle, five individual cycles of 62 lunar months (plus one of 61 months); each year has 13 months, not 12. Each month starts with the full Moon, and each month is divided into fortnights, not weeks.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of the Roman Catholic Church. For Roman Catholics, and, to some degree, Anglicans, the event is a day to remember the saints and to thank God. It is also a day to honor and give thanks to the saints for fulfilling the believers' wishes. It is a common practice among Catholics to honor and pay homage to the better-known saints on days designated as their feast days, but there are many unsung or lesser-known saints who have been forgotten or are given little recognition. On All Saints' Day, Christians remember such nearly forgotten saints and request their intercession in mundane matters. In Ireland on All Saint's Day, huge bonfires are lit on hills in the countryside.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. In Ireland, Christmas celebrations begin on December 24 (Christmas Eve) and last until St. Stephen's Day on December 26. During the Christmas season, the Irish decorate their homes with candles, holly, and ivy and also hang beautiful wreaths on their front doors. They decorate the Christmas trees with candles, ribbons, and other adornments.

On Christmas Eve the youngest child in each family gets the honor of lighting candles kept on the windowsill to welcome the baby Jesus and his parents to the home. Also families attend Midnight Mass on Christmas Eve. Then children return home and open their presents that have been placed under the Christmas tree. On Christmas Day people attend church in the morning; afterward, they visit their friends and families to exchange gifts and greetings.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

The Feast of St. Stephen, also called Boxing Day, is observed on December 26, the day after Christmas. It honors St. Stephen, the first martyr of Christianity, who was stoned to death by the Romans for speaking in favor of Jesus and his disciples. Boxing Day is thought to be based on the custom of opening the alms boxes the day following Christmas and distributing the money collected to the poor.

On this day the tradition of Wren boys is still prevalent even in modern-day Ireland. Carrying poles with wrens tied at the top in their hands, young boys go from door-to-door singing carols and are paid in exchange for their songs. Also in many parts of Ireland, people dress themselves in colorful, strange costumes (mostly as birds) and take part in the St. Stephen's Day parades.

According to legend the reason that the wren is the focus of St. Stephen's Day is that St. Stephen's hiding place was given away by the call of a wren while he was hiding from the Roman soldiers. As a result he was caught and stoned to death. Thus the wren continues to be punished for its unpardonable crime. Another version states that, while Irish forces were launching an attack during the Viking era, a wren awoke the sleeping Vikings by tapping on a drum. As a result the Vikings were quickly spurred into action, and the Irish soldiers were massacred. In ancient times wrens were killed and tied to the poles, but today they are released in the wild again after St. Stephen's Day is over.

❁ PAN-CELTIC INTERNATIONAL FESTIVAL

Observed in: Kilkenny

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April

The Pan-Celtic International Festival is an annual cultural festival. Started in 1971, the main objective of this cultural event is to foster a spirit of oneness among Celts and the Celtic nations of Ireland, Scotland, Brittany, the Isle of Man, Cornwall, and Wales. The main highlights of the six-day festival include: a fiddle-playing competition, a traditional song competition, a pipe-playing competition, a traditional costume competition, an international Celtic song competition, folk dances, parades (with people in traditional costumes), and dance parties.

However the most awaited spectacle is the girl's hurling match. It is known as camogie, and the final match takes place on the last day of festivities. In this game two teams armed with curved sticks try to take control of a small, hard ball. It is a no-holds barred contest, in which even punching and kicking are allowed.

Observed in: Dublin

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June–July

Ireland is one of the few countries where gays and lesbians have attained general social acceptance and are not persecuted. Every year in the months of June and July, Dublin plays host to the annual Dublin Pride festival that celebrates the gay and lesbian way of life. As in other countries, along with the patronage of social organizations, the community, and corporate promoters, many straight men and women show their solidarity with gays and lesbians by participating in the celebrations.

Some of the major highlights of the Dublin Pride festival include the Lesbian and Gay Holistic Day, the night of poetry, the Pride Ceili, a beach party, and a special Mass in honor of the festival. The event ends with a Pride Parade in which Irish gays and lesbians walk through the streets of Dublin and are cheered by the people. A pride party is the grand finale of the festivities and is marked by singing, dancing, and feasting.

❁ BIRTH

Fun Fact

Birthday bumps are an integral part of birthday celebrations in Ireland. Friends hold the person by the hands and legs and gently bump him or her on the floor. The birthday boy or girl receives birthday bumps equivalent to his or her age plus an extra bump for good luck.

In Ireland after a child is born, he or she is introduced into the community through a Celtic ritual that takes place in the church. On the appointed day the child and its relatives gather at the Holy Well (an integral part of most churches in Ireland). There in the presence of the priest and holding the child in their arms, the parents walk around the Holy Well, which is considered by Celts to be the womb of the goddess Earth. This ritual acknowledges the fact that every person comes from a divine source. Then parents announce the name of the child and may also explain the choice of the name. Next the child is presented to every assembled guest, who blesses the child. The godparents (anam-chairde) are introduced, and the reason for choosing them is explained. Godparents also share their feelings about this opportunity and discuss how they intend to fulfill their responsibilities as godparents. Many guests volunteer to sing songs and devotional hymns and relatives shower the child with love, gifts, and blessings.

Then, prayers are said regarding the four elements of life—fire, earth, water, and air. For example, a bowl filled with earth (mud or soil) is rubbed on the soles of the baby's feet, and a small prayer is said to ensure a safe, long walk (journey of life) on Earth. Afterward the priest puts oil on the crown of the child's head and acknowledges his or her calling by divine forces. Then water is sprinkled around the child, which symbolizes the circle of protection against any misfortune (illness, accidents, and abuse). At the end of the ceremony, people join hands and thank God for the gift of the beautiful child. Singing, dancing, and feasting follow.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Among Irish Catholics, an important religious initiation is the First Holy Communion, which takes place at the age of seven. Dressed in a traditional white Communion dress or suit, children receive Holy Communion from the priest and they are welcomed into the community as Roman Catholics.

“Communion” is a term that means “to be united,” and Catholics believe that, by receiving Holy Communion, they share in the oneness of Jesus. Holy Communion is also known as the Eucharist, a Greek term meaning “to give thanks to.” It refers to the ritual of the Christian sacrament of taking bread and wine and the Mass that takes place as part of the ritual.

The Eucharist involves readings from the Gospels and the four lives of Jesus as described by the apostles Mathew, Luke, John, and Mark. The priest also leads the Eucharist prayer, narrating the events of the Last Supper when Jesus is supposed to have asked his disciples to take the bread as his body and the wine as his blood. Irish Catholics believe that the child should know about Jesus, as well as his life and teachings, since from this day on they will be sharing a unique oneness with him.

Bread (kept in baskets) and wine (in a goblet) are kept at the altar and are blessed by the priest. After the priest distributes the bread and wine, the vessel used in the ceremony is washed in a special basin known as the sacrarium, which is connected to the ground. This is done to ensure that if any particle of the Eucharist is left in the cup it will return to earth.

When an Irish Catholic reaches puberty, he or she becomes a member of the local church and is expected to be confirmed. Confirmation is always performed by a bishop, who represents the wider church and confirms people by laying his hands on their heads and praying for them. Before people are confirmed they usually attend confirmation classes, where they are taught about the important beliefs of Christians. Confirmation usually takes place when a person is old enough to make his or her own decisions. A person being confirmed will say that he or she believes in God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and asks for strength and courage to live as Jesus would want the faithful to and to tell other people about their faith.

The actual ritual of the sacrament of confirmation takes place during the Mass, after the priest completes the sermon. The priest reads aloud the name of all those individuals who will be confirmed. Each individual whose name has been called goes to the bishop and, after the candidate asserts that he or she has total faith in Jesus and promises to reject evil in totality, the bishop lays his hands on him or her. The hand symbolizes the strength and power of the Holy Spirit that will come to the candidate. Then the bishop calls out the confirmation name of each candidate, which can be either his or her real name or the name of a saint. Using the oil of chrism, he makes the sign of a cross on the candidate's forehead, thereby indicating that the candidate is now a child of God.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Ireland St. Patrick's Day is considered to be the most auspicious day to get married. The bride is generally dressed in blue, since the Irish consider it a lucky color. Also the bride braids her hair, which, according to Irish beliefs, helps preserve her power as a woman and ensures good luck. Irish women wear a special ring known as a claddagab (a wedding ring, for many) that has a heart (symbol of love) held by two hands (hands of faith) with a crown (honor). If a woman wears the ring with the hands pointing outward, it indicates that she is single; when the hands are turned inward, it signals that she is married.

Ancient Irish tradition requires the bride and groom to walk to the church for their wedding. As the bride and groom pass through the streets on their way to the chapel, they are showered with rice by the onlookers. Rice is considered to be a blessing; in previous eras pots and pans were also banged on the ground to wish them good luck.

The concept of the honeymoon is known as mi na meala ("month of honey") in Ireland. In ancient times the newlyweds had to spend an entire month in isolation and had to drink a honeyed wine during their period of seclusion.

❁ DEATH

In the 21st century Irish funerals are conducted in strict conformity to Catholic rites. However in ancient times, the Irish put more emphasis on the power of nature and buried their deceased with ornaments, weapons, and food to assist the soul in its migration to the otherworld, a small island beneath the sea, where they believed people went after death. The Irish believed that there was no sickness, old age, disease, or death in the otherworld, which was also known as the Delightful Land or Land of the Young. They believed that happiness lasted in the otherworld for eternity and each day was equal to a hundred years.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Israel as a Jewish state traces its origins back to Abraham, the biblical patriarch who propounded the concept of monotheism (a belief in one god). According to the Bible Abraham, his son Yitzhak (Isaac), and grandson Jacob (later changed to Israel) lived in the region of Canaan, which later became known as “the land of the children of Israel” or simply “the land of Israel.” From Jacob’s 12 sons arose the 12 tribes that combined to form the Israelites, the precursors of the Jewish nation. The name Jew is derived from Yehuda (Judah) who was one of Jacob’s progeny.

Archaeology and history tell us that the people who became the Hebrews, the Israelites, and ultimately the Jews were indigenous to the region west of the Jordan River. The Bible tells their story in details that are sometimes difficult to verify but nonetheless powerful to those who believe the Hebrew Bible as a historical account. The rule of the Israelites in the land of Israel, according to biblical accounts, began with the conquests of Joshua, the successor of Moses, credited with leading the Israelites out of slavery in Egypt.

The period from 1000 to 587 B.C.E. is known as the “Period of the Kings.” The greatest among the legendary kings was David (1010–970), who unified Israel and Judah, two related but independent nations, combining them into the kingdom of Israel. David made Jerusalem the capital of Israel, and his son Solomon (970–31) built the first temple there. In 587 the army of the Babylonian ruler Nebuchadnezzar (c. 630–562) captured Jerusalem, destroyed the Temple, and drove the Jews into captivity. They went to Babylon (present-day Iraq), and the area was subsequently ruled or controlled by a number of powerful empires.

Following the Persian conquest of Babylon the Emperor Cyrus (c. 585–c. 29) allowed the Jewish exiles to return to their homeland, and in 516 they rebuilt their Temple in Jerusalem, which they called the Second Temple. The Jewish people reestablished themselves but eventually found that they were caught between expanding powers, Egypt and Syria. The land came under Syrian rule, causing revolt and civil war and ultimately resulting in subjugation by Rome.

The Roman Empire seized Israel in 63 B.C.E., placing it under the control of a series of consuls, including Herod the Great (73 B.C.E.–4 C.E.) and Pontius Pilate (d. after 36 C.E.). This was around the time when Jesus is believed to have been born, grown up, and provided the inspiration for the foundation of Christianity. The malpractices and misrule of the Emperor Caligula (who lived between 12 and 41) led to a Jewish revolt. It lasted four years but was finally crushed, and the Temple in Jerusalem was again razed. After a second revolt Jerusalem itself was devastated, and a new city (Aelia Capitolina) built in its place. At this time the province of Palestine was created. This bitter defeat marked the end of the ancient Jewish state and the beginning of the Diaspora, the scattering of the Jewish people across the world.

In 331 the Emperor Constantine (306–37) converted to Christianity and gave the religion official status. But Christianity's hold over the country was short-lived. In 638 Jerusalem fell to the Caliph Omar (c. 581–644) and was declared a holy city of Islam on the grounds that Muhammad had ascended to heaven from the Temple Mount. This enraged Christians around the world, and by the year 1099, in what became known as the Crusades, they had raised an army, occupied Jerusalem, and started nearly 100 years of Christian rule.

By the year 1187, however, the Muslims had regained control of the region. After decades of conflict the Islamic Mamluks gained control of the last crusader stronghold in 1291. Mamluk is the Arabic word that is usually translated as “owned.” The Mamluks were slave soldiers deployed by the Muslim caliphs and the Ottoman Empire and who, on more than one occasion, seized power for themselves.

During the next 500 years empires rose and fell. In the 16th century the Ottoman Empire took control, and Suleyman the Magnificent (1491/95–1566) rebuilt Jerusalem's city walls. By the mid-19th century the Ottomans' grip over Israel had loosened considerably, and other countries began to take an interest in the region. The United Kingdom opened a consulate in Jerusalem, and in 1839 Sir Moses Montefiore (1784–1885), a British Jew, proposed the idea of an independent Jewish state. By the 1880s when a devastating series of anti-Semitic pogroms (massacres of Jews) swept through the Russian Empire, and a new ideology of Jewish nationalism (Zionism) emerged, European Jews increasingly turned their attention to the land of Israel, where they hoped to realize their new dream of self-determination in their ancient homeland. Jews poured out of Europe to the United States, South America, and British dominions, but they also immigrated to Palestine in the First Aliyah (or “ascension”) between 1881 and 1903. Continued anti-Semitism, particularly the Dreyfus affair in France, in which a Jewish officer was unjustly convicted and imprisoned for treason in the 1890s, also inspired Zionism. The first Zionist Congress met in Basel, Switzerland, in 1897.

While Jewish settlement increased in Ottoman Palestine, the Arab population of Palestine was developing its own nationalist consciousness. Hostil-

The Crusades

The Crusades were a series of military campaigns initiated by zealous European Christians, which usually had the sanction of the pope in Rome. These took place between the 11th and 13th centuries and were carried out with the intention of recapturing the Holy Land from the Muslims.

ity between Jews and Arabs increased; meanwhile the Ottoman Empire disintegrated.

During World War I Britain issued the Balfour Declaration (1917), which declared its support for the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. Britain similarly promised Arabs that it would support Arab independence in the Middle East. When the war ended Britain was given a mandate to rule the country, and it sought to balance various claims with its own colonial self-interests. Jewish immigration increased, national aspirations expanded, and Arab hostility and resistance grew.

Following World War II British control of the situation in Palestine eroded. By 1947 the conflict among Arabs, Jews, and British colonial authorities had reached a crisis point, and Britain withdrew from its mandate. A United Nations partition plan, Resolution 181, which was passed in November 1947, sought to create two new states in Palestine, one Arab and one Jewish. Reaction to the Holocaust (the systematic genocide of millions of European Jews by the Nazis prior to and during World War II) was a major impetus in the creation of a Jewish state, which world powers supported as a place of refuge for the surviving remnants of European Jewry.

On May 14, 1948, the country of Israel came into being and was immediately plunged into war, as Arabs rejected the prospect of sharing Palestine and attacked. Egypt, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon invaded Israel but were pushed back. By the time a cease-fire was declared in May 1949, Israel had secured and extended the territory under its control. Citizenship was offered to any Jewish individual who chose to immigrate, and the country welcomed an influx of new arrivals.

The next few years witnessed continued skirmishes between Israel and Egypt, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon. On June 5, 1967, Israel reacted sharply to the threats it faced from its Arab neighbors and launched attacks on Arab troops gathered along its borders. During the Six-Day War Israel extended its territory into the Golan Heights, the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, and the Sinai Peninsula. The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), founded in 1964 and reconstituted under the late Yasser Arafat (1929–2004), emerged as the principal representative of the Palestinian people and vowed to regain their lost territories and destroy the Israeli state.

In 1979 after failing to regain the Sinai from Israel in the Yom Kippur War (1973), Egypt signed a mutual recognition pact with Israel, and the Sinai was handed back. Relations with Lebanon and Syria worsened. In 1981 Israel invaded Lebanon, and the Golan Heights were formally annexed. Israeli troops withdrew in 1985, but the area along its border in south Lebanon remained an occupied security zone until 2000, when a peace agreement with Jordan was signed.

In 1987 a Palestinian uprising, known as the Intifada, tried to put an end to the encroachment of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. To this end it employed guerrilla warfare against Israeli forces. In 1993 the Oslo Peace Accord advocated mutual recognition between Israel and the PLO. It also offered limited Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank and Gaza. The chances of success were diminished when, in 1995, Israel's prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin (1922–95) was assassinated by an extremist, ultra-Orthodox Jewish law student, Yigal Amir (b. 1970). Rabin's successor Benjamin Netanyahu (b. 1949) proved unsympathetic to the peace process. During his time Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza spread, and terrorist activity increased.

In 1999 Ehud Barak (b. 1942) came to power in Israel promising to withdraw from the security zone in southern Lebanon, where Israeli troops and Hezbollah guerrillas had been fighting each other. Israeli forces unilaterally withdrew in May 2000, and hope grew that Israel might achieve peace both with its neighbors and with the Palestinians. Yet talks between Prime Minister Barak and Chairman Arafat broke down, and in 2001 hard-liner Ariel Sharon (b. 1928) replaced Barak as prime minister. Previous to his election Sharon made a controversial visit to the al-Aqsa/Temple Mount Complex in Jerusalem, which seemed to ignite a second, more bitter Intifada (uprising), along with a tougher, more resistant Israeli policy toward the Palestinians.

The September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States further toughened the Israeli mood. Both sides hurled accusations and blamed each other for unleashing violence and anarchy. As Palestinian suicide bombers killed or wounded myriad civilians, the Israelis swooped down on the Palestinians, attacking suspected terrorist cells and tightening their grip on the West Bank. However Sharon's policies did little to check the waves of suicide bombings by the Palestinians.

During this time the day-to-day living conditions in the Palestinian territories deteriorated. The aging and feeble leader Arafat resisted attempts to loosen his grip on power but was increasingly isolated. Israeli settlers on Palestinian land continued to swell. Construction of a security fence was declared illegal by the United Nation's judicial branch. Yet despite the constant threat of violent acts of terror, life went on. Restaurants and shopping malls were still visited by the local inhabitants, especially the young. Tourist attractions remained open. Industry and factories functioned normally. Whatever the political environment, Israeli society continued to grow and develop.

With the passing of Yasir Arafat in November 2004, the election of Mahmud Abbas (b. 1935) as the new Palestinian leader in January 2005, and an initiative by Prime Minister Sharon to withdraw from the Gaza Strip, new hope emerged that peace might be possible.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The terrain of Israel is divided into four general areas: the coastal plain, which is fertile, humid, and thickly populated, stretches along the Mediterranean Sea; the central highlands, including the hills of Galilee in the north, have the country's highest elevation at Mt. Meron (3,963 feet) and the arid Judean hills in the south; the Jordan Rift Valley with its lowest point (1,309 feet below sea level) at the Dead Sea; and the Negev Desert, which occupies about half Israel's area.

Israel has a Mediterranean climate characterized by long, hot, dry summers and short, cool, rainy winters, as modified locally by altitude and latitude. The climate is determined by Israel's location between the subtropical aridity characteristic of Egypt and the subtropical humidity of the Levant, or eastern Mediterranean. January is the coldest month, with temperatures ranging from 41°F to 50°F, and August is the hottest month, with temperatures from 64°F to 100°F.

Al-Aqsa: The Temple Mount Complex

The Temple Mount (or Noble Sanctuary) Complex is one of the most sacred sites in the world, because it is venerated by the followers of three major religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. This complex houses the Dome of the Rock and the al-Aqsa Mosque. The Dome of the Rock (or Qubbat as-Sakhrah) is one of the most famous Islamic mosques. It was built by a caliph who wanted to honor Allah and create a mosque that would rival those in Mecca with its splendor.

The al-Aqsa Mosque is the largest mosque in Jerusalem, with a capacity of 5,000 worshippers. Its architectural style is a mixture of old Islamic and Crusader designs. At the center of the dome is a rock that is believed by Muslims to be the place of Muhammad's ascension to heaven. Christians and Jews believe this rock was the altar where Abraham was supposed to sacrifice his son. The Jews also believe that this was the location where Jacob saw a ladder rising into heaven. At the base of the Mount is the Western Wall, sacred to Jews as the only remnant of their ancient Temple left standing.

About 70 percent of the average rainfall in the country falls between November and March; the months of June through August are often rainless. Rainfall is unevenly distributed, decreasing sharply as one moves southward. In the north the average annual rainfall is 44 inches; in the extreme south, rainfall averages less than 4 inches annually. The areas of the country where agriculture is practiced receive about 12 inches of rainfall annually, and about one-third of the country is arable. Rainfall varies from season to season and from year to year, particularly in the Negev Desert. Precipitation is often concentrated in violent storms, causing erosion and flooding. During January and February it may take the form of snow at the higher elevations of the central highlands, including Jerusalem.

❁ ECONOMY

Israel has the most diversified economy in the Middle East, with a high level of modernization and a record of technical innovation. In recent years the Israeli economy has experienced an upswing, much of it due to a decreasing need to divert funds to the military. Much of the strength of Israel's economy, however, comes from a politics that has allowed high deficits on state budgets and foreign trade balances.

Mining is an important activity for the Israeli economy, and a lot of minerals are extracted from the Dead Sea. Oil drilling exists in Israel but on a very small scale. Agriculture in Israel is very effective since it is able to cover about 75 percent of domestic needs, despite the limited land available. However agriculture contributes only 3 percent of Israel's gross national product (GDP). Mainly citrus fruits and eggs are exported. Water, critical to agriculture, is a valuable resource and a source of conflict between Israel, the Occupied Territories, and Israel's neighbors.

Israel has a large income from tourism (especially religious tourism), as well as from donations from individuals and organizations around the world. The United States aids the Israeli economy at the level of $3 billion annually, of which $1.8 billion is allocated to military expenses; the balance goes to the civilian economy. Since the Israeli economy still runs with heavy deficits, the country cannot do without this help, even though recent governments have declared economic independence as a major objective.

Israel has the highest average standard of living in the Middle East, but many, particularly immigrants and Israel's Arab citizens, do not benefit from the country's wealth. The cost of living in Israel is high, and for many their wages never manage to cover more than their basic costs. A large portion of the population lives under very modest conditions, often surviving only on aid from the government.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Probably one of the most familiar aspects of Israeli culture to outsiders, although occupied by only about 7 percent of the country's population, is the kibbutz

(singular, kibbutz), Israel's collective communities. Other countries have attempted communal enterprises, but no other country has been as successful in their implementation. For one thing communal groups in other countries, for example, in the former Soviet Union, were not voluntary; they were imposed by the government. In Israel, in contrast, the kibbutzim are voluntary, intentional collective communities, and they have played a vital role in Israel's economic success; indeed the kibbutzim have played an essential role in the creation of Israel, especially as the world beyond its borders perceives it. Though the kibbutz movement never accounted for more than 7 percent of the Israeli population, it did more to shape the image Israelis have of their country, and the image that foreigners have of Israel, than any other Israeli institution. During the six decades of its existence Israel has emerged as a world power, owing to the ambitions, hard work, and creativity of its citizens, and the kibbutzim have provided many of Israel's military leaders, intellectuals, and politicians.

The Jewish community that inhabits Israel has always been diverse, drawing on the traditions of the wide range of Jews who have returned there from the worldwide Diaspora. Some practice an Orthodox Judaism, while many are secular. Israelis display artistic brilliance in music, literature, dance, and architecture wherever they live, but Israel's musicians have created a diversified musical tradition. During the first few years of Israel's existence, an attempt to forge a unique Israeli cultural identity by combining its constituent musical cultures failed because the disparate musical traditions did not blend well. After 1948 explicit government policy encouraged Hebrew language songs instead of Ladino or Yiddish ones, and Hebrew gradually became the language of choice for most Israeli musicians, though many occasionally include a song or album in Yiddish or Ladino. Into the 1950s most of the musical stars were Yemenite Jews because Yemen had long been a center for the preservation of Jewish traditions. For this reason Yemenite Jews remain popular and some performers have achieved international popularity. Sephardic Jews, for example, Haim Louk and Ruth Yaakov, have also had a major role in the development of Israeli popular music.

During the decades of the 1980s and 1990s wave of roots revival and fusion musicians arose, fusing Iranian, Turkish, Greek, and Moroccan traditions with rock and roll, pop music, and jazz. Habrera Hativiet, influenced by musical traditions as varied as American blues, African folk music, and Hassidic song, is perhaps the most influential of these groups. Even more recently hip hop has made some inroads into mainstream Israeli musical audiences. Israel is also one of the leading sources for Goa trance and psychedelic trance music. The most popular artists are Astral Projection, Infected Mushroom, and Skazi.

Israel is also at the forefront of science and technology in disciplines that range from agricultural innovations to medical breakthroughs. Israeli scientists have contributed in the areas of genetics, medicine, agriculture, computer sciences, electronics, optics, engineering and other high-tech industries. Israeli science is known for its military technology, from simple submachine guns like the Uzi to advanced anti-ballistic defense system. Israel is also one of the few nations capable of launching satellites into orbit. Israel's scientists have also pioneered in important areas such as energy-conserving methods of crop irrigation, cancer research, and theoretical physics.

CUISINE

Israel's cosmopolitan society is reflected by the diverse cuisines available there. The Jewish culinary arts mirror the various places that the Jews have lived through the centuries. Jewish cooking is a fusion of Middle Eastern, Mediterranean, Spanish, German, and Eastern European gastronomies. For instance, stuffed cabbage is common in eastern Europe. Blintzes (cheese wraps) and knishes (buns stuffed with meat or potatoes) are German in origin; couscous originated in North Africa, falafel is Egyptian, and shishlik comes from Turkey.

At the same time Jewish food is the food of an agrarian people, who in earlier times barely subsisted. This reality led to the evolution of a style of cooking that valued everything and wasted nothing. The dishes are based on readily available ingredients that were also fairly cheap.

Basically one can divide Israeli cuisine into two genres: Ashkenazi and Sephardic. Ashkenazi refers to Jewish people (immigrants) from eastern and western Europe, while Sephardic Jews come mainly from the Mediterranean and Spain. Ashkenazi cooking tends to be heavier and sweeter; Sephardic food is full of aromatic spices and herbs. The latest trend is to combine both traditions.

Orthodox Jews at home, as well as many Israeli restaurants, observe the laws of kasbruth, the Jewish dietary laws that dictate what is kosher—which foods may be eaten and which may not—as well as how meals must be prepared and eaten. Kosher means “fit to eat” and encompasses a whole code of rules that originate in the Hebrew Bible's book of Leviticus. When dining kosher, for instance, pork and shellfish are trayf and cannot be eaten at all, and meat and dairy products cannot be mixed and must be eaten on separate sets of dishes.

HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE DAY

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: 27th of Nisan, the first month of the Jewish calendar

Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day, is an annual Jewish observance on the 27th day of Nisan, in the Jewish calendar, in remembrance of the approximately six million Jews who died in the Holocaust during World War II. Originally it had been suggested that the holiday be observed on the 15th of Nisan, the anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising (April 19, 1943), but this idea was rejected because it is also the first day of Passover. Instead, the 27th was chosen, being eight days before Yom Ha Atzmaut, Israeli Independence Day. Yom HaShoah was established by Israeli law in 1959 and the decree signed by David Ben-Gurion and Yitzhak Ben-Zvi, then prime minister of Israel and president of Israel, respectively.

At 10 A.M. on Yom HaShoah the air-raid sirens throughout Israel sound for a full two minutes. Public transport (including virtually all highway vehicles) is halted for this period.

People stop where they are and remain silent. All flags on public buildings are flown at half staff. During Yom HaShoah many public entertainment and other business establishments in Israel are closed by law. Israeli television and radio channels transmit mourning songs and documentaries about the Holocaust without commercial interruptions. Also tens of thousands of Israeli high school students hold a memorial service in Auschwitz, in what has become known as “The March of the Living,” in remembrance of the Holocaust death marches. This service is financed by the government and regarded as an important part of Israeli students' education.

MEMORIAL DAY

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Fourth of Iyyar, the second month of the Jewish calendar

Yom Hazikaron Memorial Day (Israel Fallen Soldiers and Victims of Terrorism Remembrance Day) is observed on the fourth of Iyyar of the Jewish calendar. It always precedes the next day's celebrations of Israel Independence Day, or Yom Ha Atzmaut, celebrated on the fifth of Iyyar, the annual observance of the creation of the state of Israel in 1948. The sequence in which these holidays are observed is appropriate, because Yom Hazikaron honors veterans and fallen soldiers of the state of Israel and the Israel Defense Force who died in the modern Arab Israeli conflict. But it also commemorates civilians murdered by Palestinian acts of terror.

The day includes many national ceremonies for the fallen soldier at which senior public officials and military officers are present. The day opens the preceding evening at 20:00 (8 P.M.), because days in the Jewish calendar always begin at sunset, with a one-minute siren during which most Israelis stand in silence, remembering the dead and showing respect. Many religious Jews say prayers for the souls of the fallen soldiers at this time as well. A two-minute siren is heard the following morning, at 11:00, which marks the opening of the official memorial ceremonies and private remembrance gatherings held at each cemetery where soldiers are buried. The day officially ends between 19:00–20:00 (7–8 P.M.) with the official ceremony of Israel Independence Day on Mount Herzl, when the flag of Israel is raised to the top of the pole.

Scheduling the Memorial Day immediately before Independence Day reminds people of the price that's paid for independence and of what the soldiers gave with their sacrifice. This juxtaposition demonstrates the importance attached to this day in Israel, where many people have served in the armed forces and where almost everyone has a connection to people who were killed during their army service.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Fifth of Iyyar, the second month of the Jewish calendar

Israel's Independence Day Yom Ha Atzmaut is celebrated on the fifth day of the month of Iyyar in the Jewish calendar. It was on this day in the year 5708 (May 14, 1948) that the state of Israel was created. Long before the actual day the streets are decorated with Israeli flags and lights. The residents hang Israeli flags from their balconies and spruce up their homes for the occasion.

The day preceding Independence Day is Yom Hazikaron, Remembrance Day, devoted to the memory of those who gave their lives for the achievement of the country's independence and its continued existence. It is a day of personal and collective grief mixed with awe and gratitude for the sacrifice of those who died in the service of their country.

Independence Day Eve ceremonies begin with the traditional torch-lighting at Mt. Herzl. The next day, as the mood shifts from sorrow to joy, the Israeli president receives the distinguished soldiers of the year in his residence, an International Bible Contest is held, and the Israel Prizes are awarded. Special thanksgiving prayers are recited in many synagogues throughout the country and the world, and festive meals and celebrations are held to commemorate the reestablishment of the Jewish state in the land of Israel after 1,900 years.

With the arrival of the evening, firecrackers and fireworks are set off. The fireworks displays continue until late into the night. The atmosphere is festive and joyful, and dance and musical programs are conducted in many cities and towns.

❁ PESACH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Begins on the 15th of Nisan, the first month of the Jewish calendar, and continues for seven days

Passover, or in Hebrew, Pesach, begins on the night of the 15th day of the month of Nisan, and lasts for seven days (eight days outside of Israel). It celebrates the liberation and departure of the Israeli nation from Egypt, which is chronicled in the Bible as the Exodus. This is, in fact, a celebration of the Jewish people's spiritual freedom as well as freedom from the bonds of slavery. The highlight of Pesach is the observance of the seder (which means "order"), a ritual meal and ceremony performed on the first evenings of Passover (the first two evenings in the Diaspora). At the seder the guests eat special kinds of food, listen to narratives about the exodus from Egypt and freedom from slavery under the pharaoh, sing songs, and offer special prayers giving thanks to God. Passover is also a celebration of spring, marking rebirth and hope.

During Pesach Jews eat only matzah, unleavened bread, symbolic of the haste required in their escape from Egypt, when they did not have time to allow their bread to rise. Jews see Passover not simply as a commemoration, but as an event in which they participate. They are commanded to observe three rituals: to tell the story of the exodus; to eat matzah; to refrain from eating hametz (leavened bread).

The central ritual of Passover, the seder, is observed not in synagogues, but in homes. It is a time to ask questions, to discuss one's faith, as well as to enjoy an elaborate meal with family and friends. It is widely observed, even among secular Jews.

❁ LAG B OMER

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Begins on the 16th of Nisan, the first month of the Jewish calendar

In the Torah (the book of Leviticus), Jews are commanded to count the days from Passover to Shavuot.

Seder

This special service is unique to Pesach (Passover) and is conducted in every home on the first night of the festival (and often on the second night as well) throughout the Jewish Diaspora. The word seder literally means "order," and the seder is called such because it is indeed an ordered ceremony that narrates the Exodus story of Jewish liberation and rehearses the central tenants of Judaism.

There are a number of steps that must be followed, which are detailed in the Haggadah: an ordered collection of sacred passages, related praises, blessings, stories, songs, and psalms centering on the story of the Exodus from slavery in Egypt. A seder is also a great meal, which is sumptuous even though it excludes all hametz, food made with leavened grain products, which are prohibited during Passover.

Every night, from the second night of Passover to the night before Shavuot, Jews recite a blessing and enumerate the omer in both weeks and days. An omer is a unit of measure. During the days of the Temple, an omer of barley was cut down on the second day of Passover and brought to the Temple as an offering. This grain offering was called the Omer. This period of calculation is called the Counting of the Omer, or Lag b Omer. This counting of omers reminds Jews of the link between Passover, which commemorates the exodus, and Shavuot, which commemorates the giving of the Torah. The end of the Hebrews' slavery was not complete until they had received the Torah.

Lag b Omer is a time of partial mourning. Weddings, parties, and dinners with dancing are not scheduled in remembrance of a plague that occurred during the lifetime of Rabbi Akiba (fl. second century). Haircuts are also forbidden. On the 33rd day of the Omer (the 18th of Iyyar) a break in the plague is celebrated with a minor holiday Lag b Omer, when the mourning aspects of the omer period are lifted. Lag is the number 33 in Hebrew.

SHAVUOT

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Sixth of Sivan, the third month of the Jewish calendar, 50 days after Passover

Shavuot, also known as Pentecost or the Feast of Weeks, celebrates giving the Torah to the Jewish people. It is also a harvest festival or a first fruits holiday, marking a new agricultural season. The name shavuot means “weeks,” relating to its dating, which comes 50 days after Passover.

Many of the traditions and customs of Shavuot can be traced back to the diverse experience of the ancient Jewish people at Mount Sinai. According to various legends and parables, the Israelites actually overslept on the morning of God's visit. To compensate for this negligence, Jews hold a vigil on the eve of Shavuot. They stay awake from dusk to dawn, keeping themselves busy with readings from the Torah and the Talmud. (The Talmud is a body of Jewish literature composed of two parts: the “Mishna,” a rabbinic commentary on the Torah, and the “Gemara,” an additional, lengthy commentary.) Another Shavuot custom is eating dairy foods. One plausible explanation for this comes from a passage in the Torah: “And He gave us this land, a land flowing with milk and honey.”

Another explanation is found in a legend that claims that, prior to the visitation from God, Jews did not observe kashruth (dietary) laws. On this first Shavuot they discovered that their utensils were nonkosher and thus unfit for use. Finding themselves without kosher utensils and food items, the Israelites resorted to eating only dairy products. This is still practiced carefully. Another interesting legend tells the story of the Israelites finding Mount Sinai with lush greenery and a profusion of flowers.

From this is derived the custom of decorating homes and synagogues with branches and flowers. In some Jewish temples people decorate the scrolls of the Torah with lots of flowers, especially roses.

TISHA BE-AV

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Ninth of Av, the fifth month of the Jewish calendar

Tisha Be-av is observed on the ninth day of the Hebrew month of Av. As the anniversary of the most tragic events in Jewish history, including the destruction of the First and Second Temples in Jerusalem (586 B.C.E. and 70 C.E., respectively) and the expulsion of 100,000 Jews from Spain in 1492, this is a major fast and day of mourning in the Jewish year. Like Yom Kippur it begins at sundown and continues until the next sundown, a full night and day. Tisha Be-av now commemorates all the tragic events in Jewish history that occurred on this day and represents for Jews the beginning of galut (exile), physically in the Diaspora until the creation of the state of Israel, and figuratively as a state of spiritual alienation in an imperfect world.

The devout are forbidden to eat or drink anything, wash leather shoes or wear them, or indulge in physical pleasures for the entire period. Marital relations are forbidden. People must not read the Torah on this day because the study of Torah brings joy. On the night of Tisha Be-av and until noon of the following day, people sit on the ground or on low stools, and during the prayer services in the synagogues the book of Lamentations and Kinnot are read. As a gesture of sorrow, the worshippers sit on the floors during the service.

ROSH HASHANAH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: First and second of Tishri, the seventh month of the Jewish calendar

In Hebrew rosh hashanah means “head of the year” or “first of the year.” Since it occurs on the first two days of the seventh month of the Jewish calendar, this observance is commonly known as the Jewish New Year. The Jewish New Year is a time for introspection, looking back at the mistakes of the past year and planning the changes one wants to make in the new year. Rosh Hashanah commences the Jewish High Holidays or yamim noraim (“days of awe”), which focus on repentance, judgment, and atonement, culminating after 10 days in Yom Kippur. The Bible refers to the holiday as Yom HaZikaron (the “day of remembrance”) or Yom Teruah (the “day of the sounding of the shofar”). The shofar is a ram's horn that is blown like a trumpet. The Bible gives no explanation for this practice. It is commonly believed that the shofar's sound is a call to repentance. The shofar is not blown if the holiday falls on a weekend or day of rest (Shabbat).

In modern Israel no work is permitted on Rosh Hashanah. People spend most of the day in synagogues, where prayers are conducted. Another common holiday custom is the eating of apples dipped in honey, symbolizing the wishes for a pleasant new year. Also popular is the practice of casting off (Tashlikh). People walk to creeks or rivers on the afternoon of the first day and empty the contents of their pockets, symbolically casting off their sins. This practice is not discussed in the Bible but is a long-standing custom. On this day people meet and wish each other a happy new year. The traditional greeting is, "May you be inscribed for a good year [in the Book of Life]."

✿ YOM KIPPUR

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Tenth of Tishri, the seventh month of the Jewish calendar

Yom Kippur, the most solemn of Jewish festivals, falls on the 10th day of the Hebrew month of Tishri (September or early October of the Gregorian calendar). It closes the 10-day period of repentance begun at Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year. The first Yom Kippur took place after Moses returned from his second trip to Mt. Sinai with a replacement set of tablets containing the Ten Commandments. He had broken the original set when he returned the first time to discover the children of Israel worshipping a golden calf rather than the one God who had delivered them from slavery in Egypt. Moses earnestly pleaded with God to have mercy on the Jews; subsequently, on the first of Elul (the sixth month in the Jewish calendar), he ascended the mountain to procure a second set of tablets. In his absence the people fasted from sunrise to sunset. Moses descended the mountain on the 10th of Tishri to find his followers truly repentant; whereupon he announced that God had forgiven them. He decreed that the 10th of Tishri would remain a day of atonement for all generations to come.

Yom Kippur is a time for profound examination of one's life. Jews are urged to consider their shortcomings, seek forgiveness and redemption, and repair themselves and the world. It is customary to eat heartily on the day before Yom Kippur. Toward the evening people eat their final meal before the fast, which begins at sundown. It is a tradition to dip bread in honey (as is done during Rosh Hashanah). People must also eat only food which is easily digested, such as fowl. Fish is not eaten at this meal but is generally eaten earlier in the day. The meal must be completed before sunset.

On Yom Kippur, people not only refrain from eating and drinking, but they also do not bathe, anoint themselves, wear leather shoes, or have sexual relations. People dress humbly, and men wear a white kittle, besides the large prayer shawl, the tallith, during the day and also at night. This is done to create a solemn and prayerful mood.

Candles are lit in homes before sunset. Moreover yartzeit, the traditional candle lit in memory of the deceased, continues to burn for 25 hours. Parents bless their children before they go to the synagogue, imploring God to grant the children a good life, health, prosperity, and peace. Some people seek blessings from the rabbis (holy men) for the new year.

✿ SUKKOT

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Fifteenth through 21st days of Tishri, the seventh month of the Jewish calendar

This seven-day festival originated in ancient times when Jews made pilgrimages to the Temple in Jerusalem. It derives its name from the sukkah, or booth, a temporary structure in which people found shelter, so it is also called Festival of Tabernacles/Booths or Hag ha Asif, Festival of the In-Gathering. Sukkot commemorates God's protection of the children of Israel during their 40 years of wandering in the wilderness. Sukkot is also an agricultural festival. The sukkah built during the holiday also recalls the practice of ancient farmers, who constructed temporary huts near their fields during the harvest.

Sukkot is a joyful holiday that celebrates the successful harvest as well as recent completion of the process of repentance during the Days of Awe (Rosh Hashanah through Yom Kippur). In biblical times, Sukkot was the most important Jewish festival and was the occasion for the consecration of the Temple by Solomon.

During Sukkot, Jews must fulfill three mitzvot ("commandments"): living in the sukkah; gathering together the four species; and rejoicing during the holiday. The four species refers to four kinds of growing things (citron, myrtle, palm, and willow) that are carried around the synagogue as a part of the prayer service. The seventh day of Sukkot, called Hoshana Rabbah, is marked by many recitations of "help us, we pray" (hosannas) by worshippers carrying bundles of twigs from willow trees (which grow along river banks) as they circle the synagogue seven times. This practice is related to the belief that on this the Almighty decides the amount of rainfall to be sent down on the Earth to ensure good harvests.

✿ SHEMINI ATZERET

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Twenty-second and 23rd days of Tishri, seventh month of the Jewish calendar

The term atzeret means “concluding gathering.” The word shemini means the “eighth day.” Hence Shemini Atzeret is also known as the Eighth Day of Solemn Assembly or the Celebration of Renewal and Thanksgiving. Observed the day after Sukkot, in Israel Shemini Atzeret actually marks the completion of the annual cycle of the ritualistic reading of the Torah. It also signifies the beginning of the rainy season in Israel, which lasts until spring. Therefore on Shemini Atzeret the Jewish people hold a special prayer for an abundance of rain. The recital of memorial prayers for the dead, called yizkor, also takes place on this day.

In Israel Shemini Atzeret is also the holiday of Simchat Torah. Outside of Israel, where extra days of holidays are held, only the second day of Shemini Atzeret is Simchat Torah: Shemini Atzeret is Tishri 22 and 23, while Simchat Torah is Tishri 23.

❁ SIMCHAT TORAH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Twenty-third of Tishri, the seventh month of the Jewish calendar

Each week in the synagogues, the devout chant a particular passage (parshah) from the Torah (the first five books of the Hebrew Bible). There are 54 parshahs, one for each week of a leap year, so that, in the course of a year, worshippers manage to read the entire Torah. During non-leap years, there are 50 weeks, so they double up on some of the shorter portions. Simchat Torah, or Rejoicing the Law, joyously celebrates the completion and the beginning of the annual cycle of Torah reading, which takes place in September or October, a few weeks after Rosh Hashanah (the New Year). On Simchat Torah devout Jews read the last portion of the Torah and then proceed to begin again with the first paragraph of Genesis, thereby symbolizing that the Torah is a circle and can never come to an end. Simchat means “joy.” In synagogues celebrants dance and sing as they joyously circle with the Torah.

❁ HANUKKAH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Twenty-fifth of Kislev, the ninth month of the Jewish calendar

In Hebrew the word Hanukkah also known as Chanukah and Hanukah, means “dedication.” This festival is celebrated for eight days and nights, starting on the 25th of Kislev in the Jewish calendar. This holiday commemorates the rededication of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem after the Jews’ 165 B.C.E. victory over the Hellenic Syrians. Earlier Antiochus IV (215–164), the Greek king of Syria, had prohibited Jewish rituals and ordered the Jews to worship Greek gods. In 168 he seized the Holy Temple of the Jews and dedicated it to the worship of Zeus.

Under the leadership of Judah Maccabee (d. 161) the Jews defeated the Greeks after three years of relentless fighting. When Judah Maccabee and his soldiers entered the Holy Temple, they were aghast to see its pitiful condition. After they had cleaned and renovated the Temple, they decided to hold a grand dedication ceremony. But for the celebration they wanted to light the menorah (a seven- or nine-branched candelabra). They managed to find a small flask of oil, but it contained only enough to light the menorah for just one day. Miraculously, however, the oil lasted eight days. This gave them enough time to obtain a fresh supply of oil to keep the menorah perpetually lit.

On the first night of Hanukkah, a single candle is lit by the worshippers in every home. On each successive night, another candle is added until the final night, when all the lights are lit. The candles are placed in the menorah from right to left, but lit from left to right. The tallest candle, known as the shamash (“servant”) is used to light the other candles. Blessings are recited each night before the lights are lit.

Hanukkah has no special ritual meal, but it is traditional to have parties, invite friends to light candles, exchange small gifts, play dreidel (a top), and eat foods fried in oil, such as sufganiyot (a kind of doughnut) or potato latkes (“pancakes”).

❁ TU BSHEVAT

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Fifteenth of Shevat, the 11th month of the Jewish calendar

Tu Bshevat, the 15th day of the Jewish month of Shevat (in Hebrew, tu means “fifteen”), is also called the New Year for Trees. From ancient times Tu Bshevat has been used to calculate the age of trees for tithing. One of the laws given in Leviticus states that fruit from trees cannot be eaten during the first three years; the fourth year’s fruit is for God. From the fifth year on it is permissible to eat the fruit. On Tu Bshevat each tree is considered to have aged a year, so trees planted on Shevat 14 are already a year old by this reckoning, and the trees begin their second year the next day. A tree planted two days later on Shevat 16, however, is not two years old until the next Tu Bshevat.

This holiday does not have many customs associated with it, but one custom is to eat a new fruit on this day. According to Jewish tradition, there are four different kinds of fruit: (1) fruits and nuts with tough inedible exteriors and soft edible flesh, such as oranges, bananas, walnuts, and pistachios; (2) fruits and nuts with soft exteriors but hard pits inside, such as dates, apricots, olives, and persimmons; (3) fruit that can be eaten completely, such as figs and berries. A fourth type of fruit, according to kabbalistic tradition, does not belong to this world.

❁ PURIM

Observed by: Jews

Dates: Fourteenth of Adar, the 12th month of the Jewish calendar

Purim, the Feast of Lots, commemorates the salvation of the Jews during their Babylonian exile. King Ahasuerus (probably the Persian king Xerxes I, r. 485–65) had an advisor named Haman, who plotted to kill the Jews. His plans were foiled by the efforts of the righteous Mordechai (the principal ally of the queen) and the beautiful Jewish Queen Esther.

Purim is celebrated on the 14th of Adar, the anniversary of the day the Jews were saved from being massacred by a hapless king manipulated by his cruel vizier. Like all Jewish holidays, it begins after sunset and ends the next night. The day before Purim is a taanit, “day of fasting,” and Taanit Esther recalls the three-day fast by Persian Jews at Esther’s request. Taanit Esther is considered a minor fast and is not widely observed outside of traditional circles.

On Purim Jewish people customarily read aloud from the Megillah (a scroll containing the story of Esther). The reading takes place once at night and once by day on this holiday. Before the Megillah is read, the reader gives three blessings; from that point on it is forbidden for listeners to speak until the reader finishes the whole Megillah and gives the final blessing. It is customary to create a commotion when the name of Haman is mentioned during the reading. It is very important for the reader to stop reading while the noise is being made and not continue until the noise ends. This gesture merely symbolizes the devout’s hatred for the vile, mean, despicable character.

It is also customary to give three half-shekels in charity before Mincha (afternoon prayers) on the day before Purim in memory of the Machatzit Hashekel (half-shekel) that was given by every Jew in the month of Adar during the times of the Beit HaMikdash (Holy Temple). Every Jew is required to give a minimum of two gifts to two poor people on Purim. Ideally the gifts should be food or money that the poor can use for Purim.

Seudab means “feast.” It is customary to observe the Purim seudab after Mincha (the afternoon prayers). The bulk of the Purim seudab must be eaten before nightfall. It is appropriate to recite from the Torah before beginning the meal. Part of the mitzvah (“holy act”) of the Purim seudab is to drink until the devout are unable to distinguish between Arur Haman (“Cursed is Haman”) and Baruch Mordechai (“Blessed is Mordechai”). This is in memory of the miracles of Purim, which were all associated with the drinking of wine. This is an extraordinary mitzvah because drunkenness is usually strongly discouraged by Jewish law. The prayer called “Al HaNissim” (“For the Miracles”), which commemorates the salvation of the Jews, is combined with the “Shmoneh Esrei” (“Amidah”) and the “Birchas Hamazon” (“Grace after Meals”).

Finally Purim is a time of frivolity and farce. It has a Mardi Gras or Halloween character, as celebrants dress up in costumes, indulge in masquerades, and stage plays and parodies.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The ceremonies of naming infants can either take place in the synagogue or at home, and relatives and friends are welcome to attend the naming. During the ceremony one chair is traditionally left empty (for Elijah, the prophet, to witness the occasion). The Jewish equivalents of a child’s godmother (kvaterin) and godfather (kvater) are involved in the ceremony.

Among the Ashkenazim (Jews from Western European backgrounds) names are usually chosen to honor deceased members of the family (it is forbidden to name a child after a living person). On the other hand among Sephardic Jews (of Eastern heritage), children are named after esteemed individuals still living, to honor them during their lifetimes. It is customary for each child to be given a Hebrew name (by which they will be addressed when in the synagogue) as well as a secular name. The Hebrew name may be simply a translation of the secular name or a completely different one.

Jewish boys are circumcised in a ceremony performed on the eighth day after birth called the bris-mile or bris (bris, in Yiddish, means “covenant”). The bris represents, or reenacts, the original covenant between God and Abraham. Blessings and prayers accompany a naming ceremony, which is followed by the circumcision itself. Girls are named in the synagogue on the Sabbath closest to their birth. The ceremony is called the brit babat and involves only blessings, prayers, and the naming. Both naming ceremonies are followed by a traditional meal and often a party.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The Hebrew expression for “responsible male” is bar mitzvah, which literally means “son of the commandments.” According to Jewish law, a boy becomes a bar mitzvah at age 13. This means he is eligible to be counted in a prayer quorum (minyan), to wear the tefillin, to lead prayer services, and to testify before a religious court. Many families organize a festive meal to celebrate the occasion.

The equivalent for girls, meaning “responsible female” or “daughter of the commandments,” is a bat mitzvah. According to Jewish law, a girl becomes a bat mitzvah at age 12, based on the belief that girls mature earlier than boys. The bat mitzvah may be celebrated by the girl blessing and/or reading the Torah in addition to leading part of the prayer service. Festive meals and lavish parties in honor of a girl becoming a bat mitzvah are common in non-Orthodox communities. In Orthodox communities, the bat mitzvah is more of a family celebration than a religious ritual. If a girl wants to celebrate her bat mitzvah by reading Torah or leading a prayer service, then this is generally done in the presence of women only.

The Hebrew word for engagement kiddushin means “to make holy or sanctify,” and the term for the actual wedding nissuin means “to elevate or lift up.” Thus the public ritual that has developed around Jewish marriage reflects the creation of a holy and uplifting bond between the bride and groom. Jewish law requires very little official ceremony, and the presence of a rabbi or other cleric is not mandatory. Jewish law (halachah) requires only that two witnesses who meet certain criteria be present. The wedding ceremony often takes place out of doors under a bridal canopy (chuppah), usually a cloth covering held aloft on four poles; it symbolizes the home the couple will build together. The tradition of being married under the open sky says that “our home is subject to nature,” and reaffirms the couple’s faith in God’s protection.

The bride is the last to join the wedding party under the chuppah. Upon arrival she walks in a circle around the groom seven times. This symbolizes the seven revolutions the Earth made during the seven days of creation. The rabbi then recites the blessing over the wine and the prenuptial blessing (birkat erusin), after which the bride and groom drink from the wine goblet. The groom recites, “Haray at mekudesbet li betaba’at zu kedat Moshe v’Yisrael” (“Behold, you are consecrated to me with this ring according to the laws of Moses and Israel”) and places the ring on the bride’s finger. The marriage contract (ketubah) is then read.

Exchanging vows is not a Jewish tradition. The Sheva Brachot, or seven blessings, are recited either by the rabbi or a guest. Following the reading, the couple drinks a second cup of wine. The groom then smashes a wine glass. The smashing of the glass recalls the destruction of the Beit HaMikdash, the Temple in Jerusalem. In Jewish society no celebration or social occasion (simcha) is deemed complete without thinking of the ancient shrine, its sanctity, and its key role in the lives of the people. As the devout Jewish individuals are about to build a new home, it is mandatory to recall the tragic destruction of the Temple. Usually greeted by a chorus of mazel tovs and joyous singing, the couple is escorted to a private room for the yibud, a short period of time for them to be alone together. The yibud does not call for the consummation of the marriage. Instead it is a chance for the couple to enjoy some privacy as they begin a new life together. Later they join the cele-

Tefillin

Tefillin consist of two leather boxes: one is worn on the arm and is called shel yad; a second is worn on the head and is called shel rosh. They are made out of the skins of kosher animals. (A kosher animal must be killed in one stroke.) According to tradition the boxes should be square. Their height should be about the same as the length or the width, and they should be black in color. The measurements of the boxes are not given, but it is recommended that they should not be smaller than the width of two fingers. The width of the straps should be equal to the length of a grain of oats. The strap that is passed through the shel rosh should be long enough to encircle the head and to allow for the knot. The two ends, falling in front over either shoulder, should reach the navel or just above it. The strap that is passed through the shel yad should be long enough to encircle the whole length of the arm and then to be wound three times around the middle finger and knotted. Each box contains several biblical passages—Exodus 13:1–10, Exodus 11:16, Deuteronomy 6:4–9, and Deuteronomy 11:13–21—that are inscribed with black ink in Hebrew square characters on parchment specially prepared for the purpose from the hides of kosher animals.

bratory dinner—the first in a chain of six. Traditionally the newlywed couple is feted for seven days. Each night a lavish dinner is held in the couple's honor, often hosted by a relative or close friend.

❁ DEATH

At the time of a person's death, whoever is present at the place he or she dies is not supposed to leave the room. This is done in order to pay last respects to the departed soul. The eyes and mouth of the deceased are shut, and a sheet is drawn over the deceased's face. His or her feet are arranged so that they point toward the doorway. Until the time of burial the deceased is never left alone. However immediate members of the family should not be present while the body is prepared for burial.

As part of the preparation the deceased is draped in a shroud. For rich and poor alike this is a simple white garment that is without pockets. He or she is then wrapped in a prayer shawl with one of the fringes cut off to symbolize the loss and mourning period. Devout Israelis do not use caskets at all; the body is put into the ground in the prayer shawl.

Since the deceased's soul has already returned to God, it is considered proper to "return" the body as well. The deceased must therefore be buried in the earth; cremation and embalming are forbidden. There should be a natural decomposition of the body. The burial should be done as soon as possible.

The pallbearers are usually family members and close friends, and they are the first ones to shovel the dust into the grave. A prayer called the "Kaddish" is recited for the deceased at this time. All those present at the funeral must wash their hands afterward as a cleansing process.

There are three situations in which mourners may rend their garments: upon hearing of the death, at the funeral chapel, or at the cemetery. The mourner's act of rending his or her garment is a mark of separation. It also provides psychological relief. The garment is torn for a mother, father, son, daughter, brother, sister, or spouse.

There are five stages of mourning in Judaism:

1. between death and burial
2. the first three days following burial
3. a seven-day mourning period following burial called shivah
4. thirty days after burial, or shloshim
5. the twelve-month period

The mourning period for all relatives ends with shloshim (30 days after burial). Mourning from day 31 to the end of the 12 month is to be observed only by children for their parents. Leaving the house of mourning is allowed only for a limited period of time. All mirrors in the house are covered. One reason for this is that a mourner should not improve his or her appearance during this time.

Mourners sit on low stools. Leather shoes are prohibited (because leather shoes were a symbol of wealth and comfort in ancient times). Greetings in any form by mourners and visitors are prohibited. Wearing new clothes and enjoying carnal pleasures are also forbidden. The Sabbath bathing and washing of clothes is prohibited. Dirt may be removed locally with soap and water. Haircuts, shaving, and clipping of nails are prohibited.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The Etruscans were the first people to move into the region now known as Italy, and they ruled Rome from about the twelfth to the eighth centuries B.C.E. Although archaeologists are uncertain about their origin, these people are said to have come from the eastern Mediterranean region, possibly Asia Minor (southwest Asia). Eventually they contributed to forming the Roman Empire, but little evidence of their existence remains today.

The first Republic of Rome was founded in 509 B.C.E. Victories over Carthage (at the time a North African country near the present-day state of Tunis) and Hellenic Macedonia between 264 and 164 paved the way for further expansion of the Roman Empire into Britain, Spain, northern Africa, and present-day Iraq. The spreading empire became so large that it had to be divided into eastern and western sectors.

Christianity was officially embraced by Constantine (d. 337) in 313, and the capital city of the eastern empire moved from Rome to Constantinople (Istanbul). The western part of the Roman Empire disintegrated due to plague, famine, and tribal incursions (from the north), while the eastern empire continued to prosper in fits and starts until the Turks took over in 1453.

Ending the Middle Ages and marking the transition to the Modern Age was the Renaissance, spreading through the 14th to the 16th centuries. The Renaissance, or Rinascimento (in Italian), marked a change in the intellectual and cultural ideas of Italians. It was a cultural movement, which was attributed to the growing aristocratic urban city-states within northern Italy. The Renaissance eventually spread from Italy to the rest of Europe.

In the centuries post-Renaissance first Spain and then Austria took over Italy, followed by Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821) for a brief while. Napoleon utilized the French armies for fulfilling his imperialist designs in Europe. Later there was a drive for the unification of Italy led by King Victor Emmanuel II (1759–1824, of the Savoy Dynasty). The Kingdom of Italy was declared in 1861. The peninsular region of Italy, along with the neighboring states of Sardinia and Sicily, also formed a part of the Italian nation. The 1920s brought Benito Mussolini's (1883–1945) dictatorship in Italy, ending an era of parliamentary rule. His alliance with Nazi

The Etruscans

Frustratingly little is known of the Etruscan civilization (Etruria) that preceded the Gauls' arrival and flourished in the Po valley of what is now northern Italy. Although Herodotus (400 B.C.E.) speculated that they came from Lydia (now western Turkey), Etruscan culture apparently is indigenous to the Italian peninsula and developed in northern and central Italy after 800 B.C.E. with no discontinuity between it and the Villanovan culture that preceded it. Around the seventh century the Iron Age Villanovan culture was increasingly influenced by the Hellenic culture of Greek traders and Greek neighbors in southern Italy. The Etruscans probably spoke a non-Indo-European language, a possibility supported by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (c. 100 B.C.E.) who said they were indigenous to Italy, called themselves Rasenna, and described them as unrelated to any other people in their language, way of life, or customs. Until the discovery of the bilingual Phoenician–Etruscan Pyrgi Tablets in 1964, nothing was known about the Etruscan language, but it remains largely a mystery.

Germany during World War II led to Italy's defeat and major economic setbacks for the country. After the end of World War II, Italy became a democracy in 1946.

In the 1950s Italy became a member of North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the EEC (European Economic Community), now the European Union (EU). The Euro was introduced in 1999.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Shaped like a boot afloat in the Mediterranean Sea, the Italian peninsula is surrounded by smaller water bodies like the Adriatic Sea (northeast), Ionian Sea (southeast), Tyrrhenian Sea (southwest), and the Ligurian Sea on its northwestern side. Switzerland, France, Slovenia, and Austria touch Italy on its northern border. The larger islands of Sicily and Sardinia also form a part of the country politically. Both are about 9,650 square miles in size. Italy is mountainous, with the Alps (one of the biggest mountain chains in Europe) in the north and the Apennine Mountains forming the backbone of the remaining peninsula. The Alps stretch for 600 miles from east to west with the famous peaks of Monte Rosa, and Cervino.

Alpine vegetation (trees and shrubs growing in cold climates) covers the foothills of the mountains, which are marked by occasional large lakes like Maggiore, Como, Garda, and Iseo. The triangular Po River basin has the Alps to its north and the Apennine Mountains to its south, forming the lowest and most densely populated land area in Italy. The Po River is the longest river, about 390 miles in length, and it flows into the Adriatic Sea in the east through a magnificent delta formation (the point at which a river breaks up into distributaries before emptying into the sea). The Corno Grande (Gran Sasso d'Italia) is the highest mountain peak of the Apennine Mountains at almost 10,000 feet. The country has three dangerous active volcanoes—Vesuvius near Naples, Stromboli in the Aeolian Islands, and Etna in Sicily. The climate depends on the altitude of a region and its proximity to the sea. Winters are severe in the Alps, with snowfall beginning every September. It gets warmer on the lower altitudes. Summers are hot and dry in the interiors. Summers next to the sea are cooler, and pleasant in the Alps and Apennine mountains.

Italy has a number of natural parks. The largest is Parco Naturale dei Monti Sibillini, located in Marche. It is spread over 25 miles of mountain peaks and is noted for its exotic birds. There are a variety of salamanders found in Italian seas.

The Italian town of San Remo (also called the Town of Flowers) is famous all over the world for its many varieties of tropical flowers (roses, carnations, begonias, camellias). The town of Tuscany (located in central Italy) is one of the most beautiful places in Italy. It has 120 protected nature reserves as well as a rich traditional heritage, accessible to the public in dozens of museums. Tuscany houses more than 100 species of plants that have medicinal value, especially for veterinary ailments.

❁ ECONOMY

Italy has a diversified industrial base with a profit-based capitalist economy in the north, rendering the north more prosperous than its southern counterpart. The southern part has an economy based on welfare and agriculture with unemployment levels up to 20

Leonardo da Vinci

Leonardo da Vinci (1452–1519) was a famous Italian Renaissance artist. He is universally accepted as a genius, having excelled as an artist, painter, anatomist, philosopher, sculptor, engineer, and inventor. His most famous paintings are The Last Supper and Mona Lisa. His inventions have contributed to studies in anatomy, astrology, and civil engineering. From creating designs of the human body's anatomy (after dissecting dead bodies in a hospital) to designing helicopters and hang gliders, Leonardo da Vinci's cultural contribution has been exemplary. He was a visionary, far ahead of his time.

Lampedusa: The Southernmost Point of Italy

Lampedusa (Isola di Lampedusa in Italian) is an island lying 127 miles away from Sicily (Italy) and 70 miles from Tunisia (Africa). Geologically it is a part of Africa (the sea being 394 feet deep between both landmasses), but politically and administratively it is under Italian control. The total land area is 8 square miles with a population of 5,300. The people here thrive on fishing, agriculture, natural rainfall (for drinking water), and tourism.

The island is of historic importance, especially since World War II; with other islands, Lampedusa was an important island in the Allied invasion of Sicily. Operation Corkscrew was the name given to the Allied invasion of this island, which cleared the way for their conquest of Sicily during World War II.

percent. Sectional tensions arise from this economic disparity. The per capita income, however, is similar to other developed European nations. Italy hardly has any natural resources of its own. About 75 percent of its energy requirements are imported.

Italy is a destination and a transit country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual and labor exploitation. Estimates provided by PARSEC, a social research institute in Italy, indicate that 2,000 to 3,000 new trafficking victims—largely from Nigeria, Romania, Moldova, Ukraine, and Albania—entered Italy in 2004. The country has a strong tourism sector, along with rapidly evolving small to medium enterprises (SMEs). Trade is mostly done with the developed members of the European Union (EU) and the United States.

Fun Fact

Romulus (771–17) and Remus (771–53), the legendary founders of Rome, were said to be the twin sons of the priestess Rhea Silvia, fathered by Mars, the god of war. Supposedly abandoned to die of exposure, the twins were raised by a she-wolf and fed by a woodpecker. Romulus was believed to have founded Rome on the Palatine Hill.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Italy is rightly referred to as the world's living art gallery. Whatever the medium, Italians have significantly contributed to its development. The European Renaissance (cultural and scientific revolution) began in Italy in the 14th century. Italian authors of poetic classics that continue to be read include Dante, Tasso, Petrarch, and Ariosto while Machiavelli, Boccaccio, and Castiglione exerted a lasting influence on European culture through their prose. Giants like Leonardo da Vinci, Filippo Brunelleschi, Michelangelo, Raffaello, Botticelli, and Fra Angelico made significant contributions in architecture, painting, anatomy, and sculpting. Tommaso Geraci is a modern-day Italian sculptor of repute.

Composers Vivaldi, Palestrina, Monteverdi, and Corelli influenced the musical sensibilities of people all over the world well into the 19th century, while the compositions of Giacomo Puccini, Gioacchino Rossini, and Giuseppe Verdi made Italian romantic opera famous. The world owes the piano and the musical notation system to Italy. Contemporary Italian artists, writers, composers, architects, filmmakers, and designers continue to contribute to the growth of Western culture.

Football (or soccer) is the national game. Italy has won the Football World Cup three times: 1934, 1938, and 1982.

CUISINE

The Italian system of meals is quite different from the American or English. Colazione, or breakfast, is light. There is usually a cappuccino (coffee and milk) or an espresso (strong black coffee) coupled with a brioche (a sweet pastry). Pranzo, or lunch, is the bigger meal. It begins with an antipasto (starter) that might include bread, cheese, and fresh vegetables. Then comes the first course of rice, peas, pasta, and soup, called primo piatto. The secondo piatto has meat or fish with salad and vegetables (contorno) and frutta (fresh fruit). The lunch might end with an espresso or amaro (a strong digestive liquor). Dena (dinner) is similar to lunch.

These days, people prefer a lighter lunch and make dinner the bigger meal of the day. People enjoy gelato (“ice cream”), which is available in a plethora of flavors any time of the day, and also enjoy having granita, crushed ice soaked with flavored syrup. The food is rich and creamy in the north while southern Italians prefer spicier food. The famous Italian red wine called Chianti is made in Tuscany. It can be easily identified, because it is kept in squat bottles covered with straw baskets, or fiaschis.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western (Gregorian) calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world. Celebrations usually begin the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Italy boys and girls get money and gifts on this day. People go to church the first thing in the morning and spend the day visiting relatives and close friends. Lunch is often a special event on New Year's Day. A special snake-shaped cake is eaten. This is symbolic of a new life in the new year, just as a snake sheds its old skin after growing a new one.

❁ LIBERATION DAY

Observed on: April 25

Italian Liberation Day is celebrated on April 25 to commemorate the country's liberation from German occupation following World War II and the remnants of former dictator Benito Mussolini's Fascist government. It is an occasion to honor the Italian soldiers who fought the battle and those who were victims of Fascist atrocities.

The president of the country leads the activities on this day by placing a wreath in honor of Italy's war dead at the towering white stone memorial in central Rome. The prime minister leads a march through the streets of Milan usually attended by thousands, including aging former partisans and politicians. This march in the streets of Milan commemorates an uprising in the northern city that began on April 25, 1945, and soon spread to the whole of German-occupied northern Italy. Various parties and groups also organize various rallies and demonstrations on this day.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies.

While the earliest celebrations of May Day are ascribed to the pagan rites that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, conflicting opinions exist about its connection to the labor movement. Some claim it was established in 1889 by the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, when they designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Although the strike was postponed, the day for the observance remained May 1.

In Italy political parties hold processions on the streets and protest their various causes. The atmos-

Fun Fact

The Seven Hills of Rome lie east of the Tiber and form the heart of Rome. The Seven Hills of early Rome were the Cermalus, Cispius, Fagatal, Oppius, Palatium, Sucusa, and Velia. The Seven Hills of later Rome are the Aventine Hill (Collis Aventinus), the Capitoline Hill (Collis Capitolinus), the Quirinal Hill (Collis Quirinalis), the Viminal Hill (Collis Viminalis), the Esquiline Hill (Collis Esquilinus), Palatine Hill (Collis Palatinus), and the Caelian Hill (Collis Caelius).

Republic Day, Festa della Repubblica, celebrates the day Italy chose to become a republic, after being a monarchy, through a popular referendum on June 2, 1946. The House of Savoy (kings who ruled Sardinia before) ruled Italy when the referendum for change was passed. The public had become hostile toward the royal family and had therefore exiled them from Italy as retribution for supporting the Fascists and Mussolini.

A grand military parade through central Rome is one of the highlights of this day. The president, prime minister, and leaders of political parties watch this parade and flag-waving crowds cheer the soldiers. The president opens the ceremony by laying a wreath at the tomb of the unknown soldiers in Rome's Piazza Venezia. The jets of the Italian Air Force also fly overhead, leaving plumes of red, white and green smoke—the colors of Italy's flag.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

The Feast of Epiphany is a Christian feast that celebrates the birth of Jesus, the arrival of the Magi (the Three Wise Men of ancient Persia, Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior) in Bethlehem to see the infant Jesus, and his life up until John the Baptist baptized him in the river Jordan.

In Rome Epiphany has evolved into a celebration of the end of the Christmas season, around the 12th day after Christmas. On this day according to popular notions, Befana, the Italian equivalent of Santa Claus, flies on a broomstick to give gifts to children. Befana is said to drop toys and candy through chimneys into the stockings hung up by the children. There are street fairs where families end up buying more gifts, usually earthenware. There is a belief that animals can talk on the day of Epiphany, so they are fed well on this day.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection three days after he died on the Cross. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

Many of the symbols and beliefs, indeed, even the English name for this holiday Easter goes back to prehistoric pagan spring religious festivals. The holiday was named after Eostre (or Eastre), the Mother Goddess of the Saxon tribes of northern Europe; she was also the goddess of fertility. The Germans knew her as Ostara. After the harsh dreary winters of northern Europe, she brought the warmth of spring, fertility, and abundance. The ancient deities in all civilizations had patron animals, and the rabbit, an obvious symbol of fertility, is the companion animal of Eostre. The deity was believed to preside over conception and birth in both animals and humans and pollination, flowering, and the ripening of fruit in the plant kingdom.

The date of the Christian celebration of Easter is linked to the ancient Jewish celebration of the Passover. The Jewish people followed the Persian/Babylonian calendar and their new year commenced with the spring equinox. Most of the pagan societies settled in the Mediterranean region also had a major religious celebration at or following shortly after the spring equinox. A common element in these spring observances was a god whose own death and rebirth symbolized the death and regeneration of life during this time of the year. Toward the end of the first century C.E., the early Catholic Church, eager for converts, systematically made its own use of the rituals and symbols attached to the pagan observances, often building its churches on top of their sacred ground.

On Easter Italian families gather together to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection. Italian Catholics attend Mass wearing their best clothes, visit the cemetery, and have the traditional day-long banquets. Children receive specially decorated Easter eggs.

Consuming a glass or two of wine is a must, and it is an occasion for people to visit with their family and friends and enjoy themselves. A carnival of parades, masks, and pageants precedes Lent and the Easter celebrations in Italy.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

On Ascension Day Christians celebrate their belief that Jesus rose to heaven 40 days after his Resurrection from the dead on Easter Sunday. According to the Bible, during the time between Jesus' Resurrection and his Ascension into heaven he appeared to his disciples numerous times, eating, drinking, and conversing with them about the kingdom of God. Christians also believe that Ascension Day was the last time Jesus was seen on Earth and that his second coming will coincide with the end of days or Armageddon. Doctrinally the Ascension of Jesus is important to Christians. Along with his Resurrection, it is proof for Christians of Jesus' legitimacy as a prophet and the Son of God. According to Christian belief the Ascension was his ultimate triumph over Satan's powers.

In Florence, Italy, residents do not go out to the country but spend the holiday outdoors in their own unique ways. There is a picniclike atmosphere as parents pack lavish lunch boxes, gather up their children, and assemble in Cascine Park to celebrate the Festa del Grillo, or Festival of the Cricket. It is a colorful day filled with children carrying cages; stands with balloons of different hues, and food stalls replete with sweets, ice cream, and drinks. Every child must have his or her own cricket, since tradition holds that if it still sings when carried home the cricket will bring good luck. In the past children caught their own crickets, but in contemporary Florence vibrant woven or wire cages, holding prisoner hundreds of crickets caught in the park, hang in vendors' stalls.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of Christianity. It is an annual religious celebration that takes place on November 1. It is believed that All Saints' Day celebrations began after the consecration of the Pantheon at Rome to the Blessed Virgin by Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15). The Feast of All Saints' Day has been celebrated on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne (742–814). Later it was declared a day of obligation by Louis the Pious (778–840) at the insistence of Pope Gregory IV (r. 827–44). In Italy this day is celebrated as a memorial day to reflect on those who have passed away.

❁ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

The Feast of the Immaculate Conception commemorates a Roman Catholic belief that states that at the time of her birth, God had protected Mary from all sin and filled her with his grace. It is believed that, since God wanted Mary to be the mother of Jesus, she had to be totally free of any kind of sin. Mary led a sinless life and became a source of inspiration for her son, Jesus. This day is also called the Day of Holy Obligation. Italian Catholics attend Mass to celebrate Mary's Immaculate Conception.

Archaeological sites at Etruria, Latium, and Campania contain high percentages of pig bones, indicating that pork was a favorite meat in western central Italy. In the north, sites in the Arno and Po valleys have been found to have more cattle bones, while sites in the south, which were influenced by the western Greek diet, have higher percentages of sheep and goat bones.

❁ EXPLOSION OF THE CART

Observed in: Florence

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Easter Sunday

Explosion of the Cart, or Scoppio del Carro, is celebrated by exploding a cart full of firecrackers declaring another successful harvest. During the Mass a dove-shaped rocket, called the colombina, flies out of the famous Duomo (dome) and ignites a huge wooden cartlike structure in Florence's Piazza del Duomo. Though some people say that the idea of this festival was conceived during the war for purposes of entertainment, the history of this event combines religious artifacts with pyrotechnic machinery in a really strange way. The ultimate purpose of this (as a pagan ritual) is to celebrate a good harvest.

On this day a carro ("cart") pulled by two white oxen leaves for the Piazza del Duomo accompanied by revelers in traditional costumes and clerics. The fire is traditionally started with the historical shards of the Holy Sepulcher in the Church of SS Apostoli and transported to the Duomo where the archbishop lights the sacred colombina rocket with it during the Easter Mass. This rocket travels along a wire, sets fire to the firecrackers on the carro, and returns to the church the way it came. It is believed that if this complex ritual is completed without problems a good harvest and good luck is ensured for the people.

❁ ROME'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

Observed in: Rome

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 21

Celebrating the birth date of Rome is a big event in Italy. Legend has it that twin brothers, Romulus and Remus, who were brought up by a she-wolf, founded the city of Rome on April 21, 753 B.C.E. The city-run museums and archaeological sites offer free entry for the entire day. Public speeches are made, and the roads are full of people in parades. As dusk approaches candles are lit on the Aventine Hill, one of the seven hills of Rome, before fireworks light up the Tiber River, providing a spectacular scene.

❁ BIRTH

Having more children is considered an economic asset in Italian households. When a child is born, a feeling of friendliness fills the entire family. Godparents are chosen from friends and family to rear the children in case the real parents are unable to do so. The godfather can be the best man present at the child's parent's wedding or a good friend of the family (called compare or padrino). The godmother is chosen in a similar fashion. The birth of a new family member is marked by a christening ceremony, which relatives from far and wide attend to bless the newborn. The baby is given a single name, usually derived from a saint's name such as Maria, Giovanna, and so on. A boy is named after his grandfather.

Traditionally the family arranges weddings in Italy. The groom's (or bride's) family contacts the father or uncle for marriage. After both families agree, the couple gets officially engaged. Sometimes a masciata, a matchmaker, is sent to the prospective bride's house to arrange a marriage. Before the wedding, the bride prepares a trousseau that includes new clothes, household items, and sometimes clothes for the future husband. Friends and family give money and gifts to the newlywed couple. The groom's family also contributes resources for the wedding.

The sposalizio, the actual wedding, is officiated by a civil authority or a priest. Weddings on Sunday are considered luckiest. Weddings during Lent (a 40-day fast), May (veneration of Virgin Mary), and August (believed to bring ill health and bad luck) are considered improper.

According to folklore men are supposed to carry pieces of iron in their pockets to ward off the evil eye. Sometimes a vase or a glass is broken at the end of the ceremony, and the number of pieces it breaks

The Roman Domestic Goddesses

The Romans, like the Greeks, had festivals to honor numerous gods and goddesses, many of them responsible for the welfare of women at various stages of their lives. Some of their names live on in English words.

Alemonia	Goddess who fed unborn children	Fornax	Goddess of bread baking and ovens
Bona Dea	Goddess of fertility, healing, virginity, and women (Festival, May 1)	Libera	Goddess of fertility
Candelifera	Goddess of childbirth	Lucina	Goddess of childbirth and midwifery
Carmenta	Goddess of childbirth and prophecy (Festiva Carmentalia, January 11 and 15)	Mena	Goddess of menstruation
Cinxia	Goddess of Marriage	Mutinus Mutunus	God of fertility
Cloacina	Goddess of the Cloaca Maxima, the Rome sewer system and protector of sexual intercourse in marriage	Nona	Goddess of pregnancy
Cunina	Goddess of infants	Nundina	Goddess of the ninth day, when newborns were given their names
Decima	Goddess of childbirth; with Nona and Morta she forms the Parcae, the Three Fates	Orbona	Goddess of parents who lost their children
Deverra	Goddess of women in labor and the patron of midwives	Potina	Goddess of children's drinks
Fauna (Bona Dea)	Goddess of the Earth; Mother Goddess	Prorsa Postverta	Goddess of women in labor
		Pudicitia	Goddess of modesty and chastity
		Quiritis	Goddess of motherhood
		Rumina	Goddess of nursing mothers
		Stimula	Goddess who incites passion in women
		Suadela	Goddess of persuasion, especially in matters of love
		Trivia	Goddess of the crossroads
		Viriplacaa	Goddess of marital strife
		Vitumnus	God who gave life to children in the womb
		Volumna	Goddess who protects the nursery

❁ DEATH

Despite being relatively poorer in the south, the people there can be said to be death oriented because they save a lot of money in order to ensure their loved ones proper funerals. In a bid to calm the soul, the favorite things of the deceased are buried with him or her in a strongbox. If some things are forgotten, then they are sent in the casket of another deceased villager on the assumption that both souls will meet after death. To keep the soul of the deceased from finding its way back into the house, his or her body is taken with the feet coming out first so that the door used to exit cannot be seen. Lamenting and wailing are forbidden to enable the soul to reach its destination without confusion. To prevent the soul from coming back, frequent turns are made on the way to the cemetery and different routes are taken returning home after the funeral.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The Arawak Indians were the first to settle on the island of Jamaica around 700 C.E. Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) was the first European to see Jamaica, in 1494. The Spanish colonized the island in 1510. After their arrival, the indigenous population of the island drastically declined due to epidemics and ill treatment by the Spaniards. The Spanish settlers set up sugar plantations on the island and imported slaves from Africa to work on them.

There were some among those Africans who preferred to take a chance on freedom in the mountains rather than bear the burden of slavery, and they fled into the wilderness of the island. These runaway slaves were branded as Maroons. As the number of African slaves brought to Jamaica increased so, too, did the number of Maroons. They were further joined by the slaves of the retreating Spanish. The Maroons had frequent skirmishes with the British.

England defeated the Spanish and took control of the island in the mid-17th century. In 1739 England granted autonomy to the Jamaicans—but only to the small minority of white colonial rulers—who continued their lucrative plantation economy based on slavery.

The American War of Independence (1775–83) and the French Revolution (1789) stepped up the frequency and pitch of the local slave rebellions that had been going on since the early 1700s. These rebellions, however, were mercilessly suppressed. The Christmas Rebellion of 1831 is the best known and was led by a Creole slave named Daddy Sam Sharpe (1801–32). He was born in 1801 in Montego Bay, Jamaica, and unlike other slaves he had learned to read and write. He learned from various newspapers that a number of people in England were opposed to slavery.

Sam Sharpe joined the Baptist Church, which preached that slavery was immoral. He learned that the Bible says that all men are equal and that “no man can serve two masters.” All this encouraged him to work toward freedom for slaves. Sharpe convinced other slaves to participate in a peaceful plan for people to refuse to work unless they were paid. Some slaves, who were followers of Sharpe but in favor of more radical action, rejected Sharpe’s peaceful protest and instead, just after Christmas in 1831, they burned down Kensington Estate in St. James. Sharpe’s Christmas Rebellion, which ultimately failed, got out of control and turned violent. Sharpe surrendered, was sentenced to death, and was executed in Market Square in Montego Bay in 1832.

The British government took the slave rebellion seriously. Public opinion in England favored abolishing slavery. Finally on August 1, 1834, slavery was abolished in Jamaica. Subsequently the Jamaican parliament introduced the concept of wage labor. This caused economic turmoil in Jamaica, since the former slaves considered the wages too low and opted to work independently.

The American Civil War (1861–65) cut off vital supplies to the island, causing a rapid deterioration in economic conditions. This resulted in the Morant Bay Rebellion led by the Black Baptist deacon, Paul Bogle (? 1820–65). On October 11, 1865, Paul Bogle led about 300 black men and women into the town of Morant Bay in the eastern part of Jamaica. They came armed and hoped that by challenging the power of the European plantation owners they would ultimately precipitate a general rebellion throughout the island. The rebels met with little resistance and soon took control of the town. In the days that followed, some 2,000 rebels roamed the countryside, killing plantation owners and forcing others to flee for their lives. The Morant Bay Rebellion turned out to be one of the defining points in Jamaica's struggle for both political and economic freedom as power shifted decisively toward the black majority.

The economy of Jamaica developed and strengthened during World War II, as it supplied food and raw materials to Britain. In 1944 all Jamaicans were granted voting rights. Virtual autonomy was achieved in 1947. In 1962 Jamaica gained full independence after a referendum dissolved the West Indies Federation. Alexander Bustamante (1884–1977), founder of the Jamaican Labor Party (JLP), and his cousin Norman Manley (1893–1969), founder of the People's National Party (PNP), dominated post-independence politics in Jamaica.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Jamaica and the other islands of the Antilles evolved from a chain of ancient volcanoes that rose from the sea billions of years ago. The country is divided into three landform regions: the eastern mountains, the central valleys and plateaus, and the coastal plains. The coastline of Jamaica presents many contrasts. The northeast shore is severely eroded by the ocean. There are many small inlets in the rugged coastline, but no coastal plain of any extent. A narrow strip of plains along the northern coast offers calm seas and white sand beaches. Behind the beaches is a flat raised plain of uplifted coral reef.

There are two types of climate in Jamaica. An upland tropical climate prevails on the windward side of the mountains, whereas a semi-arid climate predominates on the leeward side. Warm trade winds from the east and northeast bring rainfall throughout the year but primarily between May and October. Temperatures are constant throughout the year, aver-

The Original Maroons

Before finally departing from Jamaica, the Spanish freed their slaves, leaving them behind in the mountains to harass the English until they could amass a force to reconquer Jamaica. These freed slaves later became famous as the Maroons. Christoval Arnaldo de Ysasi organized them into a fighting force before he escaped to Cuba. The name maroon is probably derived from the Spanish (esclavo) cimarrón, which means “fugitive.”

aging 82°F. The island receives, in addition to the northeast trade winds, refreshing onshore breezes during the day and cooling offshore breezes at night.

❁ ECONOMY

The Jamaican economy is heavily dependent on its service sector. The global economic slowdown, particularly after the terrorist attacks in the United States on September 11, 2001, stunted economic growth. The economy rebounded moderately in 2003, with one of the best tourist seasons on record. However the economy faces serious long-term problems that include spiraling interest rates, foreign competition; an exchange rate under tremendous pressure, unemployment; and a growing internal debt. Depressed economic conditions have led to increased civil unrest, including gang violence fueled by the drug mafia.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Jamaican society is predominantly Christian with various denominations, such as Methodist, Catholic, Seventh-day Adventist, Anglican, and Mormon. The Rastafarian religion is also widely practiced. Its followers believe that the former head of Ethiopia Haile Selassie (1892–1975) is their leader. The spiritual consumption of marijuana is prevalent among this group. The followers of this unique folk religion (Rastas) wear their hair in dreadlocks, eat saltless food, and wear vivid colors (red, gold, and green). Jamaican Creole, a patois, is the language of the people in Jamaica. Reggae music, an important part of Jamaica's cultural heritage, is derived from a form of Jamaican music called dancehall. Jamaicans love to celebrate whenever possible, and festivals take place throughout the year. Many of these celebrations commemorate the important historical events of Jamaica. Others have been adopted from neighboring regions.

Carnival is new to Jamaica and is an import from the eastern Caribbean. The celebrations last an entire week. There are street dances and parades leading up to a grand finale at the Jamaican National Stadium in Kingston. The processions feature colorful floats, and people in colorful costumes participate in street dances and parades.

Jerk

The most widely known and beloved of Jamaican foods is jerk, which is prepared by a particular method of grilling meats that originated with the Arawaks. It involves cooking marinated meat over a fire of pimento wood. The pimento tree is the source of allspice, a popular Jamaican flavoring. Allspice finds its way into most jerk recipes.

🌸 CUISINE

Jamaican cuisine incorporates a multitude of influences from around the world. The Arawak Amerindians, who made use of native products and meats, did the initial cooking on the island. Cassava root, ackee (a fruit used as a vegetable), and callaloo (a green similar to spinach) were mainstays of the Arawaks' diet. With European colonization and the introduction of slavery, English pudding, along with African yams and okram, entered Jamaican cuisine. When the British brought over indentured servants from India, various curries became popular. Chinese immigration and influence introduced an array of sweet-and-sour dishes. Other popular ingredients of Jamaican cuisine include bananas, breadfruit, chocho (or chayote, a type of squash), bok choy, butterbeans, papaya, lime, and avocados. Pork, chicken, fish, and shellfish are the meat bases of many dishes, and the extra hot Scotch bonnet pepper adds a punch to almost everything. The vegetarian cooking of the Rastafarians is also an important part of Jamaican food. Blue Mountain coffee, grown in the interiors of Jamaica, is a world-famous export.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

On Maundy Thursday, also called Holy Thursday, Jamaican Catholics attend special Masses. This was the last week of the mortal life of Jesus. Christians believe that Jesus is the Son of God, the embodiment of the second person in a holy trinity comprising the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Christians also believe that Thursday was the day Jesus had his last meal with his disciples, the Last Supper, which is thought to have been a ritual meal called a seder, a part of the Jewish feast of Passover (Pesach). The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word maundatum, "command," via French mandé, because Jesus commanded his apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

Jamaicans eat no meat during Holy Week, which begins on the preceding Sunday, Palm Sunday, and ends on the following day, Good Friday.

Fun Fact

Granny Nanny of the Maroons is the only female national hero in Jamaica. Originally born in Ghana and a member of the Ashanti people, she was brought to Jamaica as a slave. She is remembered for the inspiration she gave to her people when they were fighting the English in the early 18th century. Both the Maroons and the British settlers recognized her as an outstanding military leader. She played a particularly important role in the fierce fight with the British during the First Maroon War, which lasted from 1720 to 1739.

Junkanoo

The origin of the word junkanoo is obscure and highly controversial. It may come from the French l'inconnu (meaning “the unknown”), in reference to the masks worn by the paraders; or it may have originated with junk enoo, or “junk enough,” as the Scottish settlers referred to the parades. The most likely explanation is that the word was derived from John (or Johnny) Canoe (Jonkonnu), the name of an African tribal chief who demanded the right to celebrate with his people even after being brought to the West Indies as a slave.

It is believed that this festival began during the 16th and 17th centuries. Junkanoo, an early traditional dance form of African origin, links music and dance and mime and symbol. Masks have a central and unique function in African religions, and it may be that John Canoe, a masquerade form, and myal, a possession-healing form of religion, were closely allied in their early forms in Jamaica, as they are allied in the two powerful male secret societies of West Africa, Poro and Egungun.

The slaves were given a special holiday during Christmastime, when they could leave the plantations to be with their families and celebrate the holidays with African dances, music, and costumes. Even after emancipation, they continued these traditions. Today, junkanoo has evolved from its simple origins to a formal, organized parade with sophisticated, intricate costumes, theme music, and prizes.

Junkanoo went through three stages in Jamaica: the early years of introduction and adaptation; the addition of a European feature, the set girls, in the 1770s; and, after emancipation, the addition of masquerade, which may be the consequence of British influence.

Christmas carols, mostly in their reggae versions, is very popular. Christmas dinner is enjoyed in the company of friends and relatives, and it includes gungo (peas), chicken, oxtail, curried goat, roast beef, and pork as well. The favorite drink of this season is sorrel. Sorrel is a dark red drink made from soaking sorrel leaves in hot water and adding sugar, ginger or lime, and rum. The sorrel plant blooms only at Christmastime. The arrival of Santa Claus and the performances of the junkanoo bands are the highlights of the Grand Market, a community fair held on Christmas that includes food, street dancing, crafts, and music.

ACCOMPONG MAROON FESTIVAL

Observed in: Accompong in St. Elizabeth

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 6

This day is celebrated with traditional crafts, dances, feasts, choral performances, and ceremonies commemorating the birthday of the great Maroon warrior Captain Cudjoe. Cudjoe, one of Granny Nanny's brothers, defeated the British army during the war of 1729–39 and provided the Maroon people with their land and freedom by signing a peace treaty with the British. The abeng (Maroon war horn) is sounded at 10 A.M. to mark the beginning of the celebrations. Participation in this festival is very competitive and only the best are selected in the fields of visual and performing arts, culinary skills, and crafts. Many foreigners, too, take part in these celebrations. There are many parties and events that include narration of folk tales and history and performances of war dances and treaty songs of the Accompong Maroons.

Rites of Passage

Jamaican weddings take place in a church. The bride's father leads her down the aisle, and a flower girl carries her train. All the villagers line up to see the bride. Only her husband can lift the bride's veil. After the ceremony the couple go to the church office or the rectory to sign the wedding register.

The bride may change from her wedding gown into a formal dress before the reception that follows the church ceremonies. Curried goat, rice, and rum punch are served at the wedding banquet, along with champagne and wine. The newly married couple cut the wedding cake.

❁ DEATH

Funerals in Jamaica are important events for which people turn out in their best clothes to comfort the bereaved family and pay their last respects to the deceased. Burial takes place the day after the death. Some towns and churches have their own cemeteries, but most of the rural people maintain their family graves in their yards. Normally the body is brought to the church about an hour before the service so that it can be viewed. After the graveside service the coffin is lowered into the ground. Wreaths are then placed on the coffin, and the workers fill the grave with earth and seal it with concrete slabs.

Many funeral customs are based on African traditions or beliefs. For instance it is considered important to say goodbye to the corpse to ensure that the dead person does not return. People do not normally leave before the last shovel of sand is tossed onto the grave or the last hymn is sung.

Family and friends assemble for wakes for several nights after the burial. Funeral rituals end nine nights following the death. On the ninth night after the burial the spirit of the dead is given a final farewell. Refreshments are served, and hymns, accompanied by beats of a drum, are sung. This ritual continues until the following morning and also involves dancing. Additional singing takes place 40 nights later. This is the time when the soul is supposed to have ceased roaming.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

It is believed that early humans inhabited Japan almost 600,000 years ago. During the Ice Age Japan was connected to Asia by land bridges facilitating the migration of humans from Korea and China to Japan.

Around 11,000 B.C.E. hunters and gatherers occupied the area, and excavations have revealed that pottery existed during that time. By around 300 C.E. the area was largely inhabited by the Yamato Kingdom. Irrigation, rice farming, iron, and bronze-making were introduced during that period. The period from 300 C.E. to 600 C.E. is called the Yamato Era, or the Kofun period.

In the mid-sixth century, the Chinese introduced Buddhism to Japan, and along with it Chinese culture also crept in.

Shinto was the traditional religion of Japan at that time. However the clash between Buddhism and Shinto was prevented by presenting the Shinto deities as manifestations of Buddha.

According to Japanese mythology the first Emperor Jimmu was a descendant of the Sun goddess Amaterasu. He founded Japan in the seventh century C.E. A succession of emperors followed. But the real power has always been in the hands of the military and the prime ministers.

During the medieval era a ruling class of warriors called samurais emerged. In 1185 the Minamoto family came to power. Their leader Yoritomo established himself as the shogun (general) and set up his headquarters in Kamakura. After his death a warrior clan the Hojos took control. In 1274 and then again in 1281 Japan resisted an invasion by the Mongols.

The next few centuries saw the samurai fighting with each other for control over the region. The period was marked by chaos and civil wars. Eventually the Tokugawa family unified the country and moved the capital from Kyoto to Edo (now called Tokyo).

The period from 1600 to 1867 is called the Tokugawa Period. During this time fear of the influence of Catholic missionaries prompted the government to prohibit Japanese from traveling overseas or even indulging in trade.

By the beginning of the 19th century, corruption was rampant in the Tokugawa government. Famine and poverty were playing havoc, and the country was in decline. In 1867 the leader of the Tokugawa clan Yoshinobu resigned, and Emperor Meiji came to power. Under his rule, Japan prospered and began to reap the benefits of industrialization and modernization. Japan became a world power. It defeated China in the Sino-Japanese War in 1894–95 and Russia in the Russo-Japanese War in 1904–05. By 1910 Japan controlled Taiwan, Korea, and half of Sakhalin Island.

During World War I Japan sided with the Allies but did not involve itself completely in the fighting. In 1926 Emperor Hirohito came to power. Japan invaded Manchuria in 1931, and it entered into hostilities with China as well in 1937.

In 1940 Japan allied itself with Germany and Italy and launched a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941. In the beginning of World War II Japan took the initiative and was victorious. However when the United States counterattacked, the Japanese navy suffered, and by 1945 Japan was rapidly losing its initial gains. Hiroshima and Nagasaki were struck with nuclear bombs, and Japan eventually surrendered. From 1945 until 1952 the Allied forces (the United States, Great Britain, and France) occupied Japan.

Japan recovered from its defeat in the war at an amazing rate, and over the next few decades it became one of the strongest economies in the world, with unprecedented advancements in electronics, computing, car production, and robotics. In the 1990s Japan's growth slowed a little. However despite the downturn, Japan remained a global economic power.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Japan is surrounded by the sea on all sides and is strategically located in northeast Asia. Japan is made up of a series of islands, which stretch for about 1,864 miles from north to south. There are four main islands: Hokkaido, Honshu, Shikoku, and Kyushu.

The Japanese landscape is largely rugged and mountainous. The tallest mountain is Mt. Fuji (12,388.5 feet). Japan is the most seismically active region of the world. Most of the mountains are volcanic in nature, and the threat of earthquakes and tsunamis is ever present. The country gets almost 1,000 earthquakes a year. To counter this, all the buildings in Japan are quake resistant, and the latest equipment is used to track the activity of storms and typhoons precisely.

Japan has a temperate climate with four seasons. The climate varies from region to region. The climate of the northern island of Hokkaido is the coldest, and snowstorms occur frequently during winter, while the southern areas are subtropical. There is a rainy season from late June until early July, and in the late summer and early autumn, typhoons often bring heavy rain to the region.

Japanese pine and cedar, respectively called matsu and sugi in Japanese, are the most common plants found. The favorite plant of the Japanese is the sakura, or the cherry tree, which blossoms in spring.

Japan has very diverse fauna as well. Corals, turtles, and sea snakes are abundant off the coast of the islands, especially near the Ryukyu Islands. In the sea near Honshu sea lions, fur seals, and whales are common. On the mainland the Japanese dormouse, the Japanese macaque (a variety of monkey), the giant salamander, and the dragonfly are the most common species.

❁ ECONOMY

Japan's economy is one of the strongest in the world. Japan main exports are electronics, cars, and computers. While the United States is its largest trading partner, the country also trades extensively with Taiwan, Hong Kong, South Korea, China, and Singapore. The main imports are raw materials and fuels. The industrial sector of Japan is the most advanced. The primary industries are manufacturing, construction, and distribution.

Only 15 percent of the land area of Japan is arable, and agriculture accounts for only 2 percent of the Gross National Product (GNP). Rice is the most important agricultural product. However, Japan has to import 50 percent of its requirements for grain and crops. Minerals like iron ore, copper, and bauxite are also imported.

Although the 1990s was a period of recession, led by sliding stock and real estate prices, the economy seems to be making a quick turnaround, and in 2004 it experienced the highest rate of growth since 1990.

❁ CUISINE

The traditional Japanese diet is very high in protein and low in calories. Japanese cuisine is mainly composed of fish, seafood, rice, and soybeans. In addition to rice the Japanese also eat bread, noodles, and pasta with their meals.

Main dishes are usually accompanied with miso soup, which is made from fermented soybeans and fish broth. A traditional breakfast is rice served with miso soup and a side dish. Nowadays many people have a Western breakfast, such as toast and coffee, instead.

One of the most popular rice dishes is sushi (raw or cooked fish served with rice). Shabu-Shabu is another favorite dish, prepared from boiled meat

Japanese Tea Ceremony

Drinking tea is more of a ritual ceremony than a daily activity in Japan. The Japanese tea ceremony (cha-no-yu, chado, or sado) is a traditional ritual that has been influenced by Zen Buddhism. The mood is serene during the ceremony, which lasts between one and five hours. Incense fragrance fills the air, and conversation is minimal.

This ceremony takes years of study to perfect. This ritual requires a skilled person to prepare powdered green tea or matcha. Even a guest has to be well versed in the correct customs of gestures and responses. As part of the ritual the guest has to wash his or her hands and rinse the mouth using a small stone basin. Another part involves cleaning the crockery used for tea, which is done in front of the guests.

The tea ceremony is regarded as an art form in its own right. It has also influenced other forms of arts and crafts and promoted the development of Japanese porcelain manufacturing.

and vegetables. Another all-time favorite dish is tempura, which is batter-fried seafood and vegetables, served with a dip.

The most popular Japanese beverage is tea (niboncha), which is generally served cold and without milk. Tea-drinking is a ritual in Japan. Other favorite beverages are sake (rice wine) and Japanese malt beer.

The Japanese eat with chopsticks. Pointing the chopsticks at another person, chewing on them, or waving them around when talking is considered rude. However slurping soup is acceptable and is considered as a sign of appreciation.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Japanese culture has been influenced by both the traditional Asian culture and Western culture.

Classical music came to Japan from the West and it is very intense. Many distinct kinds of folk music are also common. Rock, electronic music, hip-hop, and country music are particularly popular among younger fans.

The oldest form of theater in Japan is called No. The plot of the drama is narrated through singing and is accompanied with music and dance. The actors wear masks to depict the characters they are playing. Puppet theater, called bunraku, is very popular among the children and is one of the world's most renowned forms of puppetry.

The kimono is the traditional dress of Japanese women. It is a robe made of almost nine meters of cloth and tied with a sash around the waist. Wearing a kimono is an art in itself, and special classes are held to train people. In the olden days, kimonos were worn every day, but due to Western influences, this trend has been declining. Today, kimonos are worn mainly for weddings and special occasions.

Other Japanese traditions, however, are still observed conscientiously. For instance people always take off their shoes before entering the house. They also consider pointing an index finger at someone very impolite. Tipping is not a common custom, and it is rare that a bartender, waiter, hairdresser, or cab driver is given a tip.

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is widely observed as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world that often start the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve).

In Japan, all shops and businesses remain closed from January 1 until January 3. Special greeting cards are sent out to friends and family members for New Year's.

The Japanese clean their houses and wash their clothes especially for New Year's Eve. They also decorate their homes with branches of plum, pine, and bamboo trees. Special parties known as bonenkai (year forgetting) parties are held where people gather to celebrate the New Year. Also, a traditional meal is served that consists of toshikoshi soba (buckwheat noodles) symbolizing longevity.

New Year's Day is also known as Oshogatsu or Shogatsu. On New Year's Day people wake up early in the morning to catch a glimpse of batsubinode (rising Sun), because it brings good luck and prosperity in the coming year. Many Japanese visit temples and offer prayers on Shogatsu. They also, take part in fun activities such as takoage (kite flying), hanetsuki (Japanese badminton), and karuta (a card game) on New Year's Day.

COMING OF AGE DAY

Japanese men and women who have reached 20 years of age participate in these ceremonies, which mark their transformation from childhood to adulthood. The Japanese consider the age of 20 the beginning of adulthood, and young people get the right to vote, drink, and smoke when they reach this age.

The ceremonies are organized throughout Japan by state authorities. The males wear suits, while many women prefer to wear a furisode, which is a traditional type of kimono that is meant for unmarried women and has extra long sleeves with elaborate designs on them.

❁ NATIONAL FOUNDATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February 11

It was on this date in 660 B.C.E. that the first emperor of Japan was crowned. He was Jimmu Tenu, a semi-legendary figure who was supposed to have descended from the Sun goddess.

Throughout Japan there are grand celebrations and a wide variety of cultural events. These include traditional dancing, songs, plays, and demonstrations of ancient martial arts. Prayers are offered at local temples.

❁ HINA MATSURI

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 3

Hina Matsuri is a day for families with young daughters to wish them a happy and prosperous life and offer prayers in temples for their future. They decorate their homes with a display of dolls and peach blossoms. It is an ancient belief that dolls act as charms, that they help in warding off evil forces, and that, if any evil has entered the house, then the dolls will embrace it and thus protect the members of the family from its effect.

Many families take beautiful collections of dolls out of their closets and quickly return them at the end of Hina Matsuri. This is because there is a Japanese tradition that families that are slow to place their dolls back will have trouble marrying off their daughters. At the end of the festivities, others release their dolls in the rivers, because they believe that all evil, signs of sickness, and misfortune that might befall the family are carried away along with the dolls by the flowing water.

❁ SPRING EQUINOX

❁ NATURE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 29 (May 4, starting in 2007)

Nature Day is a day dedicated to nature appreciation. Until 1988, April 29 was celebrated as the birthday of Emperor Showa. However after his death in 1989 it was decided to celebrate the date as Nature Day to honor the late emperor's love of plants and nature. It was inspired by the U.S. celebration of Arbor Day.

On Nature Day the Japanese plant trees and contribute toward nature conservation and preservation. Other integral parts of the celebrations are walkathons, educational and awareness programs, exhibits, visiting parks, and participating in environment-related discussions.

✿ LABOR DAY

✿ CONSTITUTION MEMORIAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 3

On May 3, 1947, the constitution of Japan came into effect after the end of World War II. To commemorate this event special programs are held throughout the country. Among the activities featured are lectures on the vital role played by the constitution in Japan and tours of the National Diet Building in Tokyo, where both houses of the Diet—the House of Representatives and House of Councilors—are situated.

✿ PEOPLE'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 4

Japanese law stipulates that a day that falls between two national holidays is also a holiday unless the day is a Sunday. Since May 3 is Constitution Memorial Day and May 5 is Children's Day, May 4 has also been declared a national holiday and is celebrated as People's Day.

Starting in 2007, however, the Japanese government has moved Nature Day (now celebrated on April 29) to May 4.

✿ CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 5

On Children's Day, also known as Kodomo Hi, the Japanese pray for the health and happiness of their children. In order to be blessed with good health and to ward off evil, Japanese families bathe in water mixed with iris leaves and roots on this day.

They also celebrate the ancient festival known as Tango-no-Sekku (Boy's Festival) on this day. Families who have sons put up a display of dolls and puppet warriors inside their homes and also fly koinobori (carp-shaped streamers) outside their homes. The carp is considered a symbol of strength and success.

✿ DAY OF THE SEA

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Third Monday in July

In June 1941 this day was designated Marine Commemoration Day to celebrate the return of the late Emperor Meiji to Port Yokohama from Hokkaido in 1876. This day is also called Umi No Hi to honor of the ocean.

It is Japan's newest holiday. It was only declared as a national holiday in 1995 after a number of marine-related organizations rallied together and demanded a holiday for the sea, an idea which garnered a lot of public support.

Cultural programs and special lectures are conducted at the Tokyo University of Mercantile Marine to celebrate this day. The Meiji-Maru, the lighthouse service steamship used by Emperor Meiji for his voyage, is also opened for public viewing. This is Japan's oldest surviving iron ship and was conferred the status of "Important Cultural Property of Japan" in 1978.

Japanese fishermen celebrate this day by making offerings to the sea and seeking its blessings. In addition they pray for a good fishing season and prosperity.

✿ RESPECT FOR THE ELDERLY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Third Monday in September

On the third Monday in month of September the Japanese pray for the good health and longevity of the elderly members of their families. Also awareness programs are held to educate and inform people about the issues and problems faced by their elderly. In schools children make handicrafts or draw pictures to give to their grandparents. Cultural and athletic programs for the elderly are also organized on this day.

✿ AUTUMNAL EQUINOX

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 23

On the day of the autumnal equinox, the Sun rises exactly in the east and sets exactly in the west, so that the day and night are of equal length. It also marks the movement of the Sun across the equator from the Northern to the Southern Hemisphere.

More than the changing seasons, however, the Japanese honor the dead on this day. They celebrate by visiting the graves of their relatives. They also offer obagi (sweet rice balls covered with soybean paste), flowers, burn incense sticks, and pray for the souls of the deceased.

❁ HEALTH AND SPORTS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Second Monday in October

This celebration was started in honor of the Tokyo Olympic Games in 1964. Since then Health and Sports Day has been observed to encourage the Japanese to indulge in physical activities that will help them attain healthy minds and bodies.

The day is celebrated with a number of sports events in which Japanese of all ages and from all walks of life actively participate. Schools and colleges schedule their field events on this day. Workshops and awareness programs are also held to inform and educate people about various health-related problems and about the advantages of physical fitness. They also get health tips and free medical check-ups.

❁ CULTURE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 3

This day was originally celebrated as Emperor Meiji's birthday, but it was renamed Culture Day when his reign ended. It also commemorates the official announcement of the constitution of Japan on November 3, 1946. In 1948 the government decided to spread the message of love and peace as communicated in the constitution through a wide variety of cultural activities.

On this day cultural fiestas are organized throughout the nation to promote Japanese culture and to instill a sense of pride among the younger generation of Japanese about their cultural heritage. Schools and colleges organize cultural activities that include the performance of folk dances, folk songs, and folk theater. At the Imperial Palace in Tokyo the emperor presents the Order of Culture Awards including the Bunka Kusho (the highest culture award) to those individuals who have made significant contributions in the fields of art, science, and culture. Several other awards instituted by public and private organizations are also conferred on Japanese individuals on this joyous day.

❁ LABOR THANKSGIVING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 23

In Japan a special holiday dedicated to its workers is known as Kinro Karshan-no-Hi or Labor Thanksgiving Day. The Japanese people express their heartfelt gratitude to the workers of the nation and honor them on this special day. They also thank each other for the work done and honor the fruits of the labor of the past year.

In the city of Nagano the annual Labor Thanksgiving festival is arranged and supported by local labor organizations, since it focuses on issues related to the environment, peace, and human rights. Also people express gratitude to police officers, postal employees, firefighters, and others for their services provided throughout the year.

Many schoolchildren present paintings to these people to honor them on this special day.

Traditionally the emperor also makes the first offering of the fresh rice harvest to God on this day and then eats some of the rice himself. This is because this day coincides with the ancient harvest festival in Japan.

❁ EMPEROR'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 23

The Emperor's Birthday is a national holiday in Japan. Its date changes depending on the person who sits at the Japanese throne.

This day commemorates the birth of the present Emperor Akihito, who was born on December 23, 1933. The streets of Tokyo are decorated with lights, flowers, and colorful ribbons, and people assemble in front of the Imperial Palace to wish the emperor well on his birthday. The emperor delivers an annual birthday message to the people of Japan that is televised live throughout Japan.

There are celebrations at the palace, and a festive atmosphere envelops the entire nation. A wide variety of cultural events such as dance performances and folk concerts, as well as special songs written in honor of the emperor, are part of the celebrations. People also offer prayers in local temples in honor of their emperor and pray for his long and healthy life.

Fun Fact

According to Japanese meteorological records, November 3 has the highest probability of having the best weather in the country. This has been the trend for the past 100 years. It is also the time when chrysanthemums are in full bloom.

Religious Holidays

❁ OBON

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Mid-August

Obon is the annual Buddhist festival of the dead. Buddhists believe that ancestral spirits return to the world to visit their living relatives during Obon.

According to tradition people light beautiful lanterns outside their homes in order to guide the ancestral spirits. They also visit cemeteries, clean the graves of their loved ones, and put flowers on them. Food offerings are made to the souls of the deceased in temples and at home altars.

Fun Fact

December 25 is not a national holiday in Japan. Unless it falls on Sunday, offices, commercial establishments, and schools are open on this day.

At the end of the festival, floating lanterns are put in rivers or in the ocean to guide the ancestral spirits back to the world of the dead.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus Christ, whom Christians regard as the Son of God.

In Japan Christmas is not a major celebration since Christians constitute only 0.7 percent of the nation's population. However in Tokyo and other urban areas, shopping malls and stores are decorated with Christmas trees, and Santa Claus is seen distributing sweets to little children. Thus it is more of a commercial event than a religious one.

Christians in Japan attend midnight services in local churches on Christmas Eve (December 24) and sing Christmas carols and hymns. On Christmas Day gifts and greetings are exchanged within the close-knit Christian community.

SETSUBUN FESTIVAL

Observed in: Nationwide
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February 3 or 4

The main objective of the Setsubun Festival is to drive away evil before the onset of spring as established by the lunar calendar. In ancient times people drove away evil by beating drums, burning wood, and drying sardine heads. But today people throw roasted beans all over their homes, in temples, and shrines across the country to keep the evil forces away. While throwing the beans, people shout "Oni wa soto! Fuku wa uchi!" or "Demons out, fortune in!" Then they pick up and eat the number of beans that corresponds to their age. Also many people tie fish heads or holy tree leaves at the entrance of their homes to keep the evil spirits at bay.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

In the fifth month of pregnancy the pregnant woman and her family visit a holy shrine and pray for the safe birth of the child. Then, in a ceremony known as annZan, the priest presents a white sash to the pregnant woman. The sash, which has the picture of a dog on it, is tied around the pregnant woman's belly. The Japanese believe that a dog symbolizes safe and easy birth.

COMING OF AGE

In Japan coming of age ceremonies takes place on Seijin No Hi, which falls on the second Monday in the month of January. All Japanese men and women who have reached 20 years of age participate in this ceremony, which marks the transformation from childhood to adulthood. This is because in Japan, people consider the age of 20 as the beginning of adulthood and the youth get the right to vote, drink, and smoke when they reach this legal age.

Throughout Japan state authorities organize special ceremonies. Males wear suits while many women prefer to wear furisode, which is a traditional type of kimono that is meant for unmarried women and has extra long sleeves with elaborate designs on them.

After a prayer ceremony in a Shinto temple, the day is filled with celebration.

MARRIAGE

Traditional Japanese weddings take place in Shinto shrines. On the day of her wedding the bride paints herself white and wears a white kimono and an elaborate headpiece that is adorned with beautiful ornaments. The Japanese believe these ornaments will bring her good luck in her married life. Also the kimono is attached to a white hood that serves as a veil and which the Japanese believe helps in hiding her "horns of jealousy" from her mother-in-law, who now officially assumes the position of the head of the family. Grooms wear black kimonos for their wedding.

During the wedding, while the couple is exchanging wedding vows, their families sit facing each other. To complete their wedding the bride and groom drink nine cups of sake (the rice wine that is Japan's national beverage). In honor of the couple and to wish them eternal bonding, friends and family members also drink sake. Then a formal introduction of the two families takes place. The groom's father introduces his family members, and then the bride's father does the same. Before or after the wedding ceremony, guests give gosbugi (an envelope filled with money) to the newlyweds.

A lavish reception is thrown in honor of the newlyweds. The bride changes into a red kimono and later into a Western-style gown. Wedding guests dance, play games, and perform skits and karaoke during the celebrations.

❁ DEATH

Japanese funeral services follow the principles of Buddhism. Buddhist monks preside over the funeral ceremony. Mourners pay some amount of money to the family of the deceased and receive a small gift from them.

The body of the deceased is cremated on the funeral day, and all the participating mourners take their first meal at the crematorium in honor of the deceased. Then the bones are picked from the ashes, passed on from one mourner to the other with the help of chopsticks, and placed in an urn.

Tradition requires placing the urn on the family altar for 35 days, where incense sticks (osenko) burn around the clock. People who visit the mourning family pay their respects by bowing in front of the altar and lighting an incense stick in honor of the deceased. The urn is buried in a Buddhist cemetery at the end of the 35-day period.

The Japanese pay their respects to the dead and regularly visit cemeteries on special days throughout the year.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Until the early part of the 20th century, Jordan had been a part of Palestine, most of which is now the state of Israel. The area is the site of one of the oldest civilizations in the world. Archaeological findings from the west bank of the Jordan River indicate traces of human habitation from around 9000 B.C.E. From 3000 B.C.E. the area was under the control of the Canaanites and Amorites, as well as Sargon (722–05), king of Sumer and Akkad.

Around 1800 Abraham led the Israelites to the mountains of Canaan (roughly corresponding to present-day Israel). By 1023 the Israelites had formed a kingdom, ruled successively by Saul and David (r. c. 1005–965), who made Jerusalem the capital. The Roman Empire annexed Israel in 63 and placed it under the control of a series of consuls. Christians later dominated the area, but in 638 C.E. Jerusalem fell to Caliph Omar (c. 581–644), who declared it a holy city of Islam on the grounds that Muhammad had ascended to heaven from atop the Temple Mount.

The Crusades followed, which asserted Christian control, but the area remained contested terrain and then fell under the domination of the Ottoman Empire. In the wake of that empire's decline after World War I, Britain took control of Palestine and created the state of Transjordan, under the rule of King Abdullah (1921–46). Contemporary Jordan is still a stronghold for Bedouins (primarily nomad Arab peoples of the Middle East).

DEAD SEA SCROLLS

Since their original discovery the Dead Sea Scrolls have fascinated scholars and the general public, but the more scholars find out about the tantalizing fragments and scrolls, the more questions arise. For example the story of their discovery seemed at first straightforward. In 1947 a Bedouin shepherd reported the first find in a cave near Qumran. The shepherd, named Mohammed Ahmed el-Hamed (nicknamed edh-Dhib, “the wolf”), was seeking a lost sheep. When he tossed a rock into a cave hoping to flush the sheep, he heard the sound of pottery shattering and decided to investigate. What he found was not his sheep, but old jars stuffed with scrolls wrapped in linen. It was an important find, and the area has since yielded more clay jars containing still more scrolls and fragments in numerous caves throughout the area around the Dead Sea.

More than 50 years later, nothing is certain. Did “the Wolf” make his find in 1947 as reported? Maybe, maybe not. Alternative dates for the original find go back as early as the 1930s or 1940s. Was the shepherd searching for a sheep or was it a goat? Was there only one shepherd who made the find, or were there two, or more? Did he immediately collect the scrolls and remove them or did he (or they) come back the next day, or even later? The conflicting information is the result of numerous interviews with Bedouin shepherds, all saying his name is Mohammed edh-Dhib, and each with a different version of the events.

Here is what is known early in the 21st century: There are about 850 documents discovered between 1947 and 1956 in 11 different caves in and around the Wadi Qumran (near the ruins of the ancient settlement of Khirbet Qumran, on the northwest shore of the Dead Sea). Some of the scrolls were written on papyrus, but many were written on a brownish animal hide that appears to be gevil. (Gevil, or gewil, is unsplit hide prepared according to Talmudic prescription with flour, salt, and specific resins.) According to the Talmud the scroll placed in the Holy Ark was written on gevil, and scrolls written on gevil are held to be authentic and in accordance with Jewish law. Furthermore the documents have been carbon-dated, and most were apparently written between the second century B.C.E. and the first century C.E. At least one was written between 21 B.C.E. and 61 C.E. These dates make the Dead Sea Scrolls of vital importance in both their religious and political contexts. The only Hebrew document as old as the scrolls is the Nash Papyrus from Egypt, on which the Ten Commandments were written.

In 1948 Arabs and Jews were preoccupied in a war over territories. Taking advantage of the turmoil, Transjordan occupied the West Bank and part of Jerusalem and renamed it Jordan. In 1952 King Hussein (1935–99) assumed power, and Jordan enjoyed a period of economic prosperity with a rise in tourism and substantial aid flowing in from the United States. The Six-Day War of 1967 devastated the country’s tourist industry when Israel captured the West Bank and Jerusalem. Thousands of Palestinians poured into Jordan from the Occupied Territories. By the 1970s, the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) began to pose a threat to King Hussein’s regime; an internal war began, ending with the exodus of the radicals to Lebanon.

In 1994 Jordan and Israel signed a peace accord, promising to drop economic barriers and cooperate with each other on issues of security and water. This made Palestinians apprehensive that they would be evicted with the two nations sharing the spoils. Jordan, however, had been forging close links with Yasser Arafat’s (1929–2004) Palestine National Authority (PNA) and working toward agreements with Palestinians.

Jordan also restored its relations with Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. King Hussein had launched his country on the road to democracy, prosperity, and modernization. After a protracted illness King Hussein died in February 1999, naming his eldest son King Abdullah II (b. 1962), as the successor to the throne. Under Abdullah’s reign Jordan has moved closer to Israel with recent agreements to pipe water from the Red Sea to the shrinking Dead Sea and to develop a desert science center on their common border. Ties with Egypt and Syria have also been strengthened. However there were some setbacks too. In October 2002 a senior U.S. diplomat was assassinated in Amman, and the Jordanian embassy in Baghdad was bombed in August 2003, killing 11 people. In the first independent elections, conducted in 2003, the majority of the seats were won by independent royalist candidates.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Jordan is bordered by Israel on the west, Syria to the north, Iraq to the northwest, and Saudi Arabia to the east and south. The central spine of the Jordanian territory, comprising the highland plateau and hilly regions running from north to south,

Fun Fact

The Copper Scroll, found by archaeologists in 1952 where it had been hidden for 2,000 years, actually provides directions to what it describes as vast amounts of buried treasure.

includes the main cities and towns, such as Amman, Irbid, Jerash, Madaba, and Kerak. To the west the Great Rift Valley runs down the entire length of the country, and includes the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, the Wadi Araba, the Aqaba area around the Gulf of Aqaba, and the Red Sea.

The eastern desert area is a semi-arid steppe (vast, usually level and treeless tracts like those in southeastern Europe or Asia) with scanty rainfall. Jordan is part of the eastern Mediterranean weather system, so it has one of the world's most pleasant climates. Summers are dry and warm-to-hot and winters are wet and cool-to-cold, with occasional snowstorms. In the highlands there are often strong, cool breezes on summer nights and the low-lying areas enjoy pleasant, moderately cool winters. In winter the windswept plateau of Maan, lying between 3,000 and 5,000 feet, is bitterly cold. January is the coldest month and, although below-freezing temperatures are not unknown, the average winter temperature is above 45°F. The hottest month is August, when temperatures may reach 118°F in the Jordan Valley. In Amman the average summer temperature is a pleasant 79°F. Rain falls mostly during the winter months and ranges from 26 inches in the northwest to below 5 inches in the east.

Amman and its nearby areas enjoy sunny, cloudless weather from May to early November, with warm days and cool evenings. Winters can be cold and wet, with rain falling regularly between late November and early April, and temperatures ranging between 46°–59°F. In Jordan there is a diverse range of fauna in different zones, including foxes, hares, badgers, porcupines, hyenas, jackals, gazelles, and camels. There are innumerable species of birds, especially during springtime, since the territories of Jordan and Israel are on the main migration routes from Africa to Europe and Asia.

❁ ECONOMY

Jordan has a strong and stable currency, and even though the gross national product (GNP) per capita is low, the country has experienced strong economic growth in the last few years. Jordanian dinars have long been the strongest currency in the Middle East. Unfortunately after the Gulf War in 1991 Jordan encountered economic problems, and the exchange rates for the dinar plummeted.

Major export products of Jordan are phosphates and fruits. Increasing tourism is helping the Jordanian economy, with the influx of about 2.5 million visitors a year. Jordan has always had to import foodstuffs, but now the internal demand is higher than what can be produced or supplemented by imports.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Despite the Arab region's rich repertoire of music, literature, and arts, the fairly modern nation of Jordan does not have much to boast of in terms of traditional literature, fine arts, or music. Jordan's emergence as a center of contemporary arts, however, was recognized during the 1980s by UNESCO, which chose Amman as its Arab Cultural Capital for 2002. Islamic law forbids consumption of pork products and alcohol; this law is generally adhered to throughout Jordan. As in other Islamic countries, Jordan practices segregation of the sexes, and men control the nation politically, socially, and economically.

The population of Jordan also consists of a sizable population of Circassians (also known as Cherkess), who originally were from the Caucasus. The Circassian diaspora is found in diverse metropolitan areas of the old Ottoman Empire. There also exists a community of Cherkess in the Holy Land, on the road from Kfar Tavor to the Sea of Galilee.

In Jordan there is an interesting hybrid music with Arab-style singers backed up by orchestras using both Western and traditional instruments. The Bedouins cling to their musical traditions: groups of men singing to accompany solitary belly dancers. Hospitality is a cornerstone of the Arab lifestyle and etiquette. Jordanian families (especially desert dwellers) are wont to welcome strangers into their homes for meals or light refreshments.

❁ CUISINE

A typical Jordanian meal consists of mezzeh, or starters, followed by the main meal. Unleavened bread (khobz) is eaten with every dish. The other staple items are falafel, deep-fried chickpea balls, shwarma, skewered sliced lamb, and fuul, a paste of fava beans, garlic, and lemon. Mensaf is a Bedouin specialty, which consists of a whole roasted lamb (head included), placed on a bed of rice and pine nuts.

The Arab nomads of Jordan have traditionally eaten lightly and without much variety—wheat-flour bread, beans and rice, lentils, spinach, and cakes sweetened with honey for important occasions. The meat is usually mutton or camel. Gazelle meat, hare, and ostrich eggs have also been popular among the nomadic and Bedouin tribes.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

As in other parts of the world the people of Jordan welcome the new year with joyous celebrations. Although Jordan is a predominantly Muslim country, and Islam follows a lunar calendar, its embrace of the solar New Year (January 1) may be ascribed to Jordan's long-standing interactions with European powers. It being an official holiday, all educational, commercial, and government organizations are closed. People devote the day to leisure and recreational activities.

❁ KING ABDULLAH'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 30

This day celebrates the birthday of the present ruler of Jordan King Abdullah II. When the former monarch Hussein died in 1999, after a prolonged battle with cancer, the young prince, who was 37, and supreme commander of the armed forces, was crowned king in accordance with the last wishes of his father. Like his father Abdullah is also a popular and progressive ruler. This day is marked by civic ceremonies and is also a public holiday.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 as a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Jordan, the day is marked by processions and trade union activities. Labor Day is also called May Day and Workers' Day.

This day has dual significance in the history of Jordan. It marks the formation of the full-fledged Jordanian army. It also memorializes the clarion call given in June 1916, by Sharif Hussein bin Ali—the Emir of Mecca and King of the Arabs—to protest British control as well as to foster unity among all Arab nations. This is a public holiday in Jordan. The day's activities include processions and inspirational speeches extolling Arab unity.

Arab Revolt Day

In March 1915, Britain attacked Gallipoli, located south of Istanbul, in an attempt to foil the Ottoman Turks' support for Germany. The campaign was a disaster for the British Army, which incurred tremendous losses. But the debacle generated the idea of bringing the vast Arab-speaking areas of the Ottoman Empire under British control after the war. The British government called on its agents who had contacts in the Arab-speaking regions to try to detach the Arabs from the Turks. This led to a preliminary agreement between Hussein and McMahon (a British representative). In a dramatic move on June 5, 1916, Sharif Hussein launched the "Arab Revolt" and in October declared himself "King of the Arabs." Sharif Hussein bin Ali (1853–1931), Emir of Mecca and King of the Arabs, was the last of the Hashemite Sharifian Dynasty, which ruled over Mecca and Medina continuously from 1201 to 1925. His objective in undertaking the Great Arab Revolt was to establish a single independent and unified Arab state stretching from Aleppo (Syria) to Aden (Yemen)

❁ KING HUSSEIN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 14

This holiday commemorates the birthday of the former ruler King Hussein, who was born on this day in 1935. King Hussein is hailed as the architect of modern Jordan. He was instrumental in its progress and development. In Jordan, especially in the capital city Amman, public speeches by eminent personalities and processions with portraits of the late king are organized. This is also a public holiday.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Muhammad fled from Mecca to Medina (about 200 miles north of Mecca) on the first day of the Muslim month of Muharram in 622 C.E. This is the day on which the Muslim lunar calendar starts. It commemorates Muhammad's Hegira (migration) from persecution in Mecca and his acceptance in Medina. In Jordan this holiday is a time for good food and is also considered a good time to make important decisions.

❁ MOULLOUD

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi, marks the birthday of Muhammad, who entered the world in 570 C.E. It is celebrated on the 12th day of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar. On this day Jordanian Muslims focus on the life and teachings of Muhammad. They sing songs and say special prayers. They also recollect how the prophet forgave even his worst enemies. On this day devout Muslims give alms to the poor. Muhammad urged his followers not to celebrate his birthday in an ostentatious manner, so this festival is a low-key affair.

❁ SHAB-E-MIRAJ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Rajab, the seventh month of the Islamic calendar (August–September of the Gregorian calendar)

Shab-e-Miraj, or Isra Meiraj, is a very special night for Muslims. The official name of the holiday is Laylat Al-Isra wa Al-Miraj, which means “the night journey and ascension.” On this night Muhammad is believed to have gone from Mecca to Jerusalem, ascended into the seven heavens, and returned, all in the course of a single night. During his sojourn in the seven heavens, Muhammad was commanded to establish the five daily prayers (Namaaz). He is also believed to have met luminaries such as Abraham, Moses, Aaron, Adam, the Archangel Gabriel, and Jesus. On this day the devout Muslims of Jordan

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar (November–December of the Gregorian calendar)

This Muslim holiday marks the celebration at the end of the fasting month of Ramadan, the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. During Ramadan Muslims must fast from dawn to dusk every day. It was during this month that Muhammad observed austerity and fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him.

Jordanians mark this day by first taking part in a morning prayer, generally in mosques or idgabs, open spaces reserved for prayers on special occasions. This is followed by social visits, exchanges of greetings and gifts, and enjoying delicacies especially prepared for this occasion. According to the Koran, no Muslim may fast on Eid al-Fitr.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Duhl Hijja, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, is also called Eid ul-zuha and Bakr-Eid. This is the second eid festival (eid means “celebration”). It marks Ibrahim's (Abraham's) unflinching faith in God, demonstrated by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because the Almighty commanded him to do so. When the time came for the sacrifice, God is said to have substituted a ram for the child. On this day in Jordan it is mandatory for each family that can afford it to sacrifice a sheep, goat, ram, or cattle in the name of God; this meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Muslim communities newborn babies are viewed as tokens of Allah's mercy. Immediately after birth the baby is thoroughly washed in order to remove all biological impurities. According to Islamic tenets the first sound that a baby ought to hear should be the sacred name of Allah. This is customarily uttered by its father (or a male relative), who whispers the call to prayer or adhan, first into the child's right ear and then into the left. The underlying idea is to make the child aware of Allah's omnipresence and his power over the lives of mortals.

When the child is between three days and seven days old, its head is shaved to remove remaining natal impurities. On the day of purification the child is also given a proper name, since Muslim children are not named at birth. The followers of Islam firmly believe that the choice of name has a direct bearing on the character and behavior of the child during his or her life.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Muslim boys generally undergo circumcision between 10 and 12 years of age. This is a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and introducing him to his new status as an adult. In Jordanian Muslim families, there is a good deal of festivity, music, special food, and many guests on such occasions.

❁ MARRIAGE

Islamic marriage customs in the countries of the Middle East and West Asia follow more or less the same pattern. Traditionally the matches are fixed and finalized by the parents of the individuals. However according to Islamic tenets, both the bride and the groom are free to refuse the spouse selected by their parents, guardians, or elders. Prior to the actual wedding the families of the bride and groom decide upon a specific amount of money or articles in kind that the groom's family must give to the bride. This sum of money is a security amount for the bride in case the marriage breaks up. As in all Islamic societies weddings in Jordan take place in the home of the bride. The rites are conducted by an imam, who also leads the prayers in the mosque.

The bride and the bridegroom sit in separate rooms during the marriage ceremony. Two guests—one from the bride's family and one from the groom's family—witness the bride's consent for marriage and inform the imam. The imam begins the ceremony by reciting relevant passages from the Koran, then talks about the duties of marriage and asks the bridegroom if he agrees to the marriage. Once the bridegroom has agreed to the marriage, the bride, the bridegroom, and the two witnesses sign a marriage contract that confirms their agreement. The Koran says that a man may marry up to four wives but only if he can treat them all equally. If a marriage does not work out, the Koran says that couples may get divorced, but only as a last resort. First the couple must try to resolve their problems. If this does not work each spouse must choose a friend or relative for counseling. If this still fails, they must wait for four months before they can end their marriage.

❁ DEATH

All major religions of the world accept death as a part of human life. Keeping in mind the ephemeral quality of life, Muslims are exhorted always to be prepared for the inevitable. When death is imminent, an individual is encouraged to recite and declare his or her faith. They are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. In Jordan it is customary for Muslims to ritually wash the dead body, perfume it, and drape it in a fresh new white cloth before burial. Also the burial ought to take place as quickly as possible following death. The dead person's face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs are straightened out, and the mouth and eyes closed; a baby who dies at birth or is stillborn has to have a name.

The loved ones of a deceased person come together for prayers. Then the corpse is solemnly carried to the graveyard. After the burial a "wake" is held for both men and women, usually on the same day as the burial.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The region of what is now Kazakhstan has been an important cultural crossroad for several hundred thousands of years. Archaeologists have excavated ancient settlements dating back to the Lower Paleolithic Age in Southern Kazakhstan. Central and Eastern Kazakhstan were settled during the Middle and Upper Paleolithic Ages. During the Bronze Age roughly 4,000 years ago, the region was inhabited by the agrarian Andron and Begazy-Dandybai tribes, who were outstanding warriors known for their battle chariots. The Sun god, to whom their hymns were devoted, was believed to be the warriors’ protector.

Around 2000 Aryans, perhaps the ancestors of the Medes and Persians, entered the region. (The Assyrians mention them in the ninth century.) Between the ninth and seventh centuries the region was dominated by groups of nomads known for their skill with horses and breeding cattle. Between the seventh and third centuries the Persians mention groups they called Saks, probably the same tribes known to the Greeks as Scythians, renowned for their deadly accuracy with the bow and arrow while riding a horse at full speed. The Scythians dominated the Eurasian steppes from Siberia to the Black Sea. The Scythians fought several wars with the Achaemenids, and Cyrus the Great (c. 585–c. 29) was killed in one of them in 530. Tomiris, the Scythian queen, ordered his head put into a wineskin filled with human blood.

In the sixth century the region was finally subdued by the Achaemenid Empire of Persia. Then, in 330, Alexander the Great (356–23) conquered the entire area, reaching Kabul and the Hindu Kush mountain range by 328. The aftermath of Alexander’s short-lived central Asian empire led to an increase in cultural exchange between Europe and Asia. This region came into the limelight once again as a part of the legendary Silk Road, through which the highly coveted Chinese silk traveled from China to Europe and down into Africa during the Han Dynasty (206 B.C.E. to 220 C.E.).

For the next thousand years Central Asia (including Kazakhstan) witnessed countless shifts of power. The Huns, the Western Turks, Arabs, and the Chinese all ventured into and held sway over the region during these centuries. Starting in the year 1219 C.E., armies of Mongols, under the leadership of Genghis Khan (1162–1227), swept through most of Eurasia (Central Asia bordering Europe). The ravages inflicted on the region took centuries to heal. The feuds, factions, and bickering that cropped up after Genghis Khan's death led to the fragmentation of the Mongol Empire and the rise of the ruthless Timur the Lame (Timur Lenk or Tamerlane, 1336–1405), toward the end of the 14th century.

The 15th century saw the emergence of Kazakhs as a distinct people for the first time in history, and by the middle of the 16th century they had developed a common culture, language, and commercial system. Originating from the descendants of Mongols, Turkic, and other ethnic groups, the Kazakhs evolved as the world's last great nomadic empire, with their domains stretching across the steppes and desert north, east and west of the Syr-Darya (a river in Tajikistan and southern Kazakhstan). The Kazakhs were eventually vanquished by the Oyrads, a fierce group of Mongolian people who captured the eastern part of Kazakhstan, the Tian Shan, and parts of Xinjiang to form the Zhungarian Empire during the 1630s. The Kazakhs were brutally and repeatedly defeated by the Oyrads between 1690 and 1720. In the 19th century the Russian Empire began to expand its reach into Central Asia and gained control of the region formerly ruled by the Kazakh Khanate. Then in the early 20th century, the Russian Bolsheviks made their debut, swiftly bringing the Central Asian nomads (including the Kazakhs) under their control, and in 1920 the region of Kazakhstan became an autonomous republic within Russia.

Though there were rumblings of discontent, these were quickly put down by the Soviet Communists. Meanwhile a dynamic young Turkish leader named Enver Pasha (1881–1922) convinced the Soviet leader Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (1870–1924) that he could win for Russia all of Central Asia as well as British India. His ulterior motive was to gain control of the region with Soviet aid. But the former Soviet Union (USSR) managed to outmaneuver him and thwart his plans. This eventually resulted in the waning of Pasha's prowess and the revival of Moscow-centered power over the Kazakhs. Kazakhstan became a Soviet Republic in 1936.

Kazakhstan's medley of tribal divisions located in various regions across the territory were largely ignored and neglected by the Soviets. The republics of Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Tajik, Turkmen, and Uzbek were created in the 1920s, each designed to contain pockets of diverse nationalities with long-standing claims to the land. Central Asia (including Kazakhstan) was a testing ground for Soviet Russia, which tried converting the steppe (the temperate grassland of Eurasia, consisting of level, generally treeless plains) into a giant cotton plantation and using Kazakhstan as a secret nuclear testing zone, among many other experiments. As a consequence of decades of suffering political, social, economic, and ecological disasters, these republics declared their sovereignty in 1991 when the USSR was on the verge of disintegration.

Later they teamed up with other former Soviet states to form the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) in 1991.

At the start of the 21st century Kazakhstan was struggling with problems related to the introduction of a free-market economy and a brand of deregulation that unfortunately has tended to lead to anarchy. The incumbent president Nursultan A. Nazarbayev (b. 1940), a former Communist, continues to experiment with democracy as a part of his plans to turn his country into a major economic and political power in Central Asia. Nazarbayev's victory in the 1999 elections was partially achieved by banning major opponents on questionable grounds. The nascent country's capital city was shifted from Almaty in the south to Akmola in the north and then renamed Astana.

Fun Fact

Herodotus wrote of a tribe of women warriors he called "Amazons" in 450, but few believed his story. After five years of excavating kurgans (burial mounds) left by the nomadic Sauromatian and Sarmatian cultures of 600 to 200 B.C.E. near Pokrovka, Kazakhstan, archaeologists report that 7 of 40 female graves contained bronze arrowheads and armor, and the women's legs were bowed from a lifetime spent on horseback. Although the site is 1,000 miles east of where Herodotus located the Amazons, the archaeologists think these women were the Amazons' contemporaries.

Enver Pasha

Ismail Enver, known to the European powers (during his political career) as Enver Pasha, was born in Istanbul, Turkey, on November 22, 1881. He was a military officer and a leader of the Young Turk revolution in the final days of the Ottoman Empire. He was a vociferous supporter of the campaign to eliminate the non-Turkish population of the decadent Ottoman Empire. Enver was killed in action against the Bolshevik Red Army on August 4, 1922, near Baldzhuan, situated in Turkistan (modern Tajikistan).

Fun Fact

The Silk Road was an interconnected series of routes through Southern Asia traversed by caravan and ocean vessel. It connected the trade center of China with Antioch, Syria, and other regions. A northern branch passed through the Bulgar–Kypchak zone into eastern Europe and the Crimean Peninsula, and from there across the Black Sea, the Marmara Sea, and the Balkans to Venice. A southern route passed through Turkistan–Khorasan into Mesopotamia and Anatolia, and then through Antioch on the Mediterranean Sea, or through the Levant into Egypt and North Africa.

There are 8,500 large and small rivers in Kazakhstan. The largest ones are the Ural and the Emba, which flow into the Caspian Sea, while the Syr Darya empties into the Aral Sea. Pik Pobedy (Victory Peak), at 24,406 feet, is the highest peak of the Tian Shan range and is also the highest peak in Kyrgyzstan. (Pik Pobedy is on the border shared by Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and China.)

Fun Fact

The suffix -stan that ends the names of several new countries in Central Asia goes back to the Proto-Indo-European root sta*, which means “to stand,” also the source of the English word stand. In Sanskrit it means “place,” in Persian (Farsi) “home of,” and in Bulgarian “camp,” referring to the temporary camp of a nomadic group.

south, and the Caspian Sea and part of Turkmenistan in the west. It has a 1,177-mile coastline on the Caspian Sea. Kazakhstan is twice the size of Texas. The terrain is mostly steppes with hilly plains and plateaus. Since it is far removed from the ocean, the climate is continental (characterized by winter temperatures cold enough to support a fixed period of stable snow cover each year and low precipitation, which occurs mostly in summer). The precipitation in the eastern mountains is approximately 24 inches per year (mainly snow), but the rest of the country receives only 4 to 8 inches per year. The average winter temperatures are 26°F in the north and 64°F in the south, while the summer temperatures average 66°F in the north and Kazakhstan possesses abundant mineral resources, vast farming areas, as well as a competent, trained labor force. In the early years of the 21st century more than 2,700 enterprises were involved in industrial production, employing nearly 812,000 people. Kazakhstan possesses reserves of high-quality copper, lead, zinc, and cadmium, which are in high demand in world markets.

In terms of oil reserves, Kazakhstan has forged ahead of several oil-producing countries. As of 2005 the Republic boasted more than 170 oil, 40 condensate, and 90 gas fields with explored and recoverable resources of oil. Of late an international project for construction of pipelines for exporting oil has been launched that would export Kazakhstani oil to the world markets. Oil production is expected to grow exponentially in the future.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The country is split in terms of religion between Islam and Eastern Orthodox Christianity. Although religious expression was suppressed during the Soviet era, religious observances are returning, though many holidays are still not widely celebrated in the early years of the 21st century. Kazakhstanis still managed to retain some of their religious customs, albeit with specific sorts of change. St. Nicholas, for example, the ancestor of Santa Claus, came into being in Myra, in the province of Lydia, when the area was primarily Greek. Under the Soviets St. Nicholas became Grandfather Frost (Ded Moroz), the Russian spirit of winter, who became responsible for delivering presents on New Year's. Grandfather Frost's helper was Snyegurochka, the Snowmaiden.

Peter the Great (1672–1725) brought the custom of decorating Christmas trees (yolka) back to Russia after a visit to Europe in the 1700s. The Soviets banned this tradition and, to keep the custom alive, people decorated New Year's trees instead. Because ornaments were either very costly or unavailable during those years, family trees were trimmed with homemade decorations and fruit.

Kazakhstan is home to a great variety of handicrafts. The art of embroidery is well known and has been practiced in Kazakhstan since ancient times. Other well-known crafts are made out of stone, bone, ceramic, metal, clay, wood and leather. Carpet weaving has long been a skill of the Kazakhs. For centuries, right up until the present, symaks, traditional handmade carpets, have adorned the interiors of Kazakh buildings and homes.

Another hallmark of Kazakh arts and crafts is the yurt, a portable dwelling. It consists of a wooden framework covered with felt. The framework (kerege) forms the walls of the dwelling. Uyuk (long wooden poles) serve as a cover for the upper spherical portion of the yurt; shanrak comprises the topmost open part of the yurt, which functions as a ventilator and a source of lighting for the interior. Depending on the season and the weather, the yurt can be covered with two or more layers of felt for insulation.

CUISINE

Kazakh dastarkhan (which refers to hospitality and cuisine, as well as a table full of food) has a rich heritage. Interestingly any Kazakh meal (especially a banquet) starts with an elaborate ceremony of tea drinking. The host welcomes his guests and invites them to the table, where girls and young women pour the tea. The women must be alert to ensure that the guests' drinking bowls are always full and that there are no remains of tea leaves on the edges of the bowls. Tea is normally accompanied by cream, dried and fresh fruit, or nuts.

For the main meal Kazakhs serve mostly meat-based appetizers using horseflesh or mutton. There is also an array of smoked, semismoked, and boiled meats. Other prominent items include flat cakes and milk tonics such as koumyss, shubat, and katyk. Kuyrdak is a roast meat prepared with liver, kidneys, heart, lungs, and the tail fat of sheep or goats; samsa (meat filled patties), puktermet (patties stuffed with by-products), belyasbes, and kausyrma all prepared in much the same way.

The highpoint of any banquet is besbarmak, a large round or oval dish with small, round flat boiled pieces of pastry scalded with hot broth and accompanied by small strips of boiled horse meat or mutton. The platter is typically garnished with onion rings and a green mixture of fennel, parsley, and dill. The guest of honor is usually treated to koy-bas (a boiled sheep's head). The guest is expected to dress it and distribute it among the other guests sitting around him.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Though Islam is the religious faith followed by a majority of Kazakhs, by and large they are liberal, unorthodox, and secular in their attitudes and outlook on life. New Year's Day in Kazakhstan (calculated according to the Western, Gregorian, solar calendar, not the lunar Islamic calendar) is accompanied by big celebrations. People join friends and family for parties, feasts, and more casual get-togethers. This is a public holiday in Kazakhstan with government offices, schools, and businesses closed for the day.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

On this day women are honored for the important roles they play in all cultures. On International Women's Day in Kazakhstan, the streets are decorated with colorful tulips, and the men offer bouquets of flowers to the women in their lives. Men usually take charge of running the household for this day.

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 21

Navruz, or "new days" in Persian, also known as the Persian New Year, is Kazakhstan's most popular public holiday. For two days in late March, people take a break from work to celebrate the first day of spring, the vernal equinox. Festive dishes prepared on this occasion include a sugared wheat porridge called sumalakb (eaten only by women) and cinnamon-spiced veal called khalem (eaten only by men). During this festival people participate in a variety of games and sports matches, attend parties, and enjoy dance, drama, and music festivals.

Amu Darya

This 1,603-mile-long river is formed by the joining of the Vakhsh and Pandj Rivers, which rise in the Pamir Mountains of Central Asia. The Amu Darya flows generally northwest, forming much of the northern border of Afghanistan with Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, and Turkmenistan before flowing through the Kara Kum Desert of Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, thereafter entering the south Aral Sea through a delta. In ancient times the Amu Darya was called the Oxus and figured prominently in the history of Persia as well the campaigns of Alexander the Great.

Kazakhstan. This day is also International Labor Day (alternatively called May Day or Workers' Day), which is of tremendous importance for former USSR Communist regions. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 as a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

This observance was particularly honored by the Soviet Union and its satellite republics. It is a public holiday in Kazakhstan, and the workers organize parades and public speeches to celebrate the occasion.

VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 9

This day celebrates the end of World War II, which had raged for six years in the European theater. This day was celebrated in the former Soviet Union, which had fought on the side of the Allies during the war. Since Kazakhstan was formerly a part of the Soviet Union, the practice has continued.

CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 1

This day celebrates the adoption of the new constitution in 1995. This day is marked by civic ceremonies, including speeches by politicians and flag-raising ceremonies. Since it is a public holiday, all government and public establishments are closed.

REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 25

This holiday commemorates Kazakhstan's decision to declare its independence from the USSR in October 1991. Businesses and schools are closed on this day. People throng the main squares in villages and cities to enjoy music, dancing, athletic contests, and feasting. On this occasion the Kazakh women generally wear traditional clothing: a long robe with a high collar, a bright velvet vest, heavy jewelry, topped with a headdress adorned with fur and plumes. The men often wear robes and skullcaps or tall, tasseled felt hats.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 16

This day celebrates Kazakhstan's independence from the Soviet Union in 1991. The celebrations on this day are very much along the lines of Republic Day celebrations with people gathering in the main squares of villages and cities to enjoy music, dancing, athletic contests, and feasting. This is also an official holiday in Kazakhstan with schools, businesses, and government offices closed.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Russian Orthodox Easter, called Holy Paschal, celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus. It is observed on the second Sunday in April of the Julian calendar, which is currently 13 days behind the Gregorian calendar. In Kazakhstan on the eve of Easter people cook special dishes, bake rich Easter cakes, such as kulich, and paint Easter eggs. The egg is the main Paschal symbol of resurrection. When people give each other the Paschal greeting, they also exchange red eggs. When Mary Magdalene came to the Emperor Tiberius, she brought him a red egg and greeted him by saying, "Christ has arisen!" The eggs are red because that color symbolizes the blood that Jesus shed to atone for the sins of the world. On Easter the eggs are brought to the church to be consecrated.

All Paschal Week (also known as Holy Week) people feast on meat, eggs, and other rich foods that were not allowed during the 40-day Lenten fast days, and their celebratory tables burst with many different dishes. There are a lot of different Easter cakes.

On Easter Russian Orthodox Christians in Kazakhstan attend special church services and bake an Easter bread called kulich.

RAMADAN

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar

The first day of the month of Ramadan in the Islamic calendar begins a month of daytime fasting, called Uraza in Kazakhstan. The fast is observed as a way of thanking God for one's blessings as well as gaining social empathy, feeling the pain of those less fortunate. Ramadan (also Ramzaan) begins with the actual sighting of the new Moon. (Authorities in Saudi Arabia determine the exact moment of the official sighting.) For the entire month of Ramadan, devout Muslims fast from dawn to dusk every day; this fast is the fourth of the Five Pillars of Islam. Billions of Muslims around the world dedicate their time and energy to self-expression and self-control through prayer, sacrifice, and fasting during Ramadan. The Fast of Ramadan ends when the new Moon is again sighted and a new lunar month begins. This fast is observed more by southerners than it is by northerners in Kazakhstan.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr (also Id al-Fitr), the Festival of Fast-Breaking, or the Lesser Feast, marks the end of the fasting and austerity that characterize the month of Ramadan and the beginning of a three-day feast on the first day of Shawwal. It is called Kurban in Kazakhstan, and is a day of thanksgiving for devout Muslims when they must give to a special charity and ask everyone to pardon them for wrongs they may have committed during the past year. They attend a special community prayer at the masjid (mosque) in the morning, then organize big feasts and celebrate with family and friends. New clothes are worn, and gifts are exchanged.

Observed on: January 6–7

Thirteen days after Western Christmas, on January 7, the Russian Orthodox Church celebrates its

Movable Feasts Associated with Easter

The Russian Orthodox ecclesiastical calendar for each year is based on the date of Easter, which is arrived at using an algorithm. Once the date for Easter has been established, most of the remaining religious observances can then be set.

Sunday of Orthodoxy	42
Saturday of Lazarus	8
Good Friday	2

Christmas, in accordance with the old Julian calendar. It is a day of solemn ritual as well as joyous celebration. After the 1917 Revolution Christmas was banned throughout Russia, along with other religious celebrations. It wasn't until 75 years later in 1992 that the holiday was openly observed. In the 21st century it is once again celebrated in grand fashion, with the faithful participating in an all-night services in incense-filled cathedrals surrounded by the painted icons of saints.

On Christmas Eve it is traditional for all family members to gather to share a special meal. The various foods and customs surrounding this meal differed from village to village and from family to family, but certain aspects remained the same. An old tradition with its roots in the Orthodox faith, is the Christmas Eve fast and meal. The fast typically lasts until after the evening worship service or until the first star appears in the evening sky. The dinner that follows is very much a celebration, although meat is not permitted. Kutya (or kutia), a type of porridge, is the primary dish. The recipe includes various grains that are symbolic of hope and honey and poppy seeds for happiness and peace.

Once the first star has appeared in the sky, the festivities begin. Although all of the food served is strictly Lenten, it is served in an unusually festive and anticipatory manner and style. The meal is called "The Holy Supper." The family gathers around the table to honor the impending arrival of Jesus. A white tablecloth, symbolic of Jesus' swaddling clothes, covers the table. Hay is brought forth as a reminder of the poverty of the cave where Jesus was born. A tall white candle is placed in the center of the table, symbolic of Jesus, called by Christians "the light of the world." A large round loaf of Lenten bread, called pagach, symbolic of Jesus as the “bread of life,” is placed next to the candle. The meal begins with the Lord’s Prayer, led by the father of the family. A prayer of thanksgiving for all the blessings of the past year is said, and then prayers for the good things in the coming year are offered. The head of the family greets those present with the traditional Christmas greeting: “Christ is Born!” The family members respond: “Glorify him!” The mother of the family blesses each person present with honey in the form of a cross on each forehead, saying: “In the Name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, may you have sweetness and many good things in life and in the new year.” Following this everyone eats the bread, dipping it first in honey and then in chopped garlic. Honey is symbolic of the sweetness of life, and garlic of the bitterness. The holy supper is then eaten. After dinner no dishes are washed, and everyone opens their Christmas presents. Then the family goes to church and returns home between 2 and 3 A.M. On the Feast of the Nativity, neighbors and family members visit each other, going from house to house, eating, drinking, and singing Christmas carols all day.

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July–August

During the months of July and August, seasoned mountaineers from all over the country come together near the mountains in the eastern part of Kazakhstan. The mountaineers attempt to climb the formidable peak commonly known as Khan Tengri or King Mountain. Being able to climb this steep mountain peak is a heroic feat in itself. The mountaineers who scale the peak successfully are honored.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a Kazakh child is steeped in folk beliefs. As soon as a pregnant woman begins to experience labor pains she calls for her soothsayers, or baks, whose presence and predictions are meant to provide relief from the pain. When the time of delivery comes, a female relative or a companion hugs the expectant mother, pressing her hard on the abdomen to accelerate the birth of the baby. If the force exerted by one woman is not enough, a few others are invited to press harder. Relatives entering the tent customarily strike the pregnant woman’s skirt and say: Chik (“Go out child”).

The first precondition for a traditional Muslim Kazakh marriage is deciding the amount of the bride-price and the terms and conditions regarding its payment. When the terms are settled, a mullah sanctifies it after asking the fathers or relatives of the groom and bride whether they agree to let their children enter into this lifelong bond. This arrangement is celebrated with a feast.

Until the bride-price has been paid, the wedding cannot take place; however, the groom is allowed to visit the bride. Before the departure of the groom to the bride’s house, his father invites the mullah to pray for the health and well-being of his son. The groom is dressed in a splendid robe, given a new saddle and harness, a strong horse, and is sent on his way.

For the ceremony the groom and bride are shown into a special tent prepared for the occasion. The mullah asks them to sit in the middle of the tent, places a cup of water before them, and covers it with a cloth. He then reads a prayer and asks both of them whether they willingly enter into matrimony or not. They are given water to drink three times. Some mullahs dip an arrow containing hair from the mane of the groom’s horse (bound to the arrow by a ribbon belonging to the bride) into the water.

After this ritual the groom leaves, and the bride changes into a new headdress symbolizing her married status. She is then seated in the middle of the tent where the women gather around her to sing songs. The new husband comes up to the door and asks the bride’s permission to enter but is allowed in only after being made to wait. Finally he rushes in, grabs the bride, and puts her on his horse; then together they ride to their new home to enjoy some privacy.

Afterward they return to the bride’s home, and prior to the formal departure of the newly married couple the entire village gathers. The bride’s father solemnly presents to the son-in-law the dowry, which has been loaded on the backs of camels and horses. He exhorts his daughter to be devoted, virtuous, and loyal to her spouse. As a gesture of farewell he settles her on a horse and hands over its harness to her husband. The couple departs accompanied by the crying and wailing of the assembled women.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Kenya, a former British colony, was granted independence on December 12, 1963.

The name Kenya derives from Mount Kenya. The indigenous Kiyuku people called the mountain Kerenyaga or Kirinyaga, which means “mountain of whiteness,” because of the mountain’s snow-clad peaks. Since the British were unable to pronounce the name correctly, Kerenyaga eventually became Kenya.

Although not much is known about Kenya’s ancient history, evidence shows that people have inhabited this region since the prehistoric era. Kenya has also served as a migratory path for millions of people from all over Africa and the Middle East, who passed through the region while seeking new farmland, hunting grounds, trade, or simply a new life. But each one has left an indelible impression on the Kenyan culture. This is evident from the fact that by the 10th century C.E., the Kenyans had developed their own hybrid language Swahili, which is a Bantu language and incorporates many Arabic words.

The European influence in the region began with the arrival of the Portuguese in the 15th century. In 1729 Arab rulers forced the Portuguese out of the region and established their supremacy. By the end of the 18th century the Arab reign in the region ended when Kenya became a British colony.

Kenya’s struggle for independence began after World War II, and vehement protests led by leaders such as Jomo Kenyatta were a cause of concern for the British. Nationwide demonstrations were held, and the British imprisoned many of the protestors. Despite British attempts to quell the demands for independence, on December 12, 1963, after centuries of colonization, Kenya achieved independent nationhood.

Jomo Kenyatta, the great freedom fighter, became the first president of Kenya and continued to preside over the country until his death in 1978. After that another influential Kenyan Daniel Toroitich arap Moi was appointed president of the nation and dominated Kenyan politics for 24 years. For much of the 1980s the Kenyan African National Union (KANU) was Kenya's main and only political party, because in 1982 President Moi banned all other political parties in the country.

But handling the mounting international pressure and violence in the country proved to be an increasingly difficult task for President Moi. In violent demonstrations protesters demanded restoration of democracy in Kenya. In the 1990s the multi-party political system was restored, and Kenya was finally heading toward political stability. The KANU continued to dominate for another decade until 2002, when its winning spree was brought to a sudden halt by opposition leader Mwai Kibaki, who became president after a landslide victory in that year's elections.

In the early years of the 21st century Kenya is considered one of the most politically stable countries in Africa. Kenya regularly contributes its troops for peacekeeping missions in troubled areas of Africa.

In spite of political stability the country has its huge public health problems. The increase in the number of AIDS/HIV victims and the spread of cholera and other water-borne diseases is a cause of great concern. The government has taken steps to help contain the diseases and is working to educate people regarding the deadly nature of AIDS/HIV.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in eastern Africa Kenya is flanked by Uganda in the west, Ethiopia in the north, Sudan in the northwest, Somalia in the east, the Indian Ocean in the southeast, and Tanzania in the southwest. The equator passes through Kenya, dividing the country into two equal halves.

Although the country has a warm climate year-round, climatic conditions vary from region to region. While western Kenya and the eastern coastal regions have very hot and humid weather throughout the year, the semi-desert region has hotter days and cooler nights. The Great Rift Valley has pleasant weather throughout the year. In the arid and semiarid regions, although the day temperature can reach as high as 104°F, the night temperature is as low as 68°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Agriculture makes up about 25 percent of the country's gross domestic product, with tourism making up the next largest sector. The government announced liberalization policies in 1993, which included the removal of import licensing and price controls, and removal of foreign exchange controls. Due to poor economic policy, the once booming economy passed through a period of stagnation in the early 21st century. International organizations

Kenya—Cradle of Humanity

In 1931 Dr. Louis Leakey, a Kenyan of British origin discovered 400 skull fragments of a pre-hominid, Zinjanthropus boisei (who were capable of carving stone tools) in Olduvai. In 1961 the age of these pre-hominids was determined at 1.75 million years. In 1960 the remains of Homo habilis (who were capable of carving stone axes), whose age was estimated to be 1.4 million years, was also discovered by Leakey. This established the presence of pre-hominids in East Africa.

such as the World Bank and the IMF have provided economic assistance to the government to help revive the Kenyan economy.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Kenya does not have one distinct or dominant culture that can be identified as typically Kenyan. The country is home to many ethnic tribes; prominent among these are the Kikuyu, Luhya, Luo, Kalenjin, and Kamba. Each tribe has its own distinct culture and set of customs and traditions. The British and the European missionaries were successful in undermining the indigenous culture of the region and initiated mass conversion in the region. More than 75 percent of the population is Christian, while 10 percent adhere to the Islamic faith and another 10 percent to indigenous beliefs.

Today, most of the 70 tribal groups of Kenya reside in urban areas, fighting an uphill battle to retain their cultural identities. Although English and Swahili are the official languages of Kenya, many tribes still use their native languages.

The people of Kenya love to party and enjoy themselves. Benga, which is the contemporary dance and music style, is extremely popular in Kenya. It is believed to have originated among the Luo tribe living in the western region of Kenya. Masai and Som-buru are both popular traditional dances.

❁ CUISINE

One of Kenya's most popular dishes is nyama choma, which is barbecued meat (usually mutton). Other common dishes include ugali (cornmeal), kuku na nazi (chicken with coconut milk), and roast chicken with peanut sauce. Kenya is a haven for beer lovers as the local brewing industry and Kenya's love for drinking and partying provide the perfect atmosphere to drink and be merry.

Fun Fact

The word safari is a Swahili word, which means travel.

NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed by: General public
Observed on: January 1

Fun Fact

Recently, a new language known as Sheng has become popular in the urban areas. It is a mixture of Swahili and English.

The first day of the Gregorian calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day. In Kenya people look forward to the New Year with great hopes and aspirations and believe in bidding farewell to the departing year in a grand manner.

Special parties are held where liquor flows freely, and a lavish feast awaits the partygoers. People dance and sing all night long and usher in the New Year in a joyous manner. At the stroke of midnight, fireworks light up the sky, and people greet one another enthusiastically. In Kenya government offices, businesses, and schools remain closed on New Year's Day.

MADARAKA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 1

After four decades of violent armed struggle Kenya finally attained internal self-rule from Great Britain on June 1, 1963 (independence was finalized six months later on December 12). This day is commemorated as Madaraka (Swahili for self-governance) Day in Kenya and is a major holiday.

On this day Kenyans all over the world recall the violent struggle and the lives lost to help Kenya attain its freedom. Official speeches and parades mark this special day. Children are reminded of the freedom movement and the courageous deeds of the freedom fighters who courted arrest and even laid down their lives.

Official speeches pay special tribute to all those who participated in Kenya's freedom struggle, and because it is a national holiday all public and private institutions remain closed.

MOI DAY

Moi Day commemorates the historic day in Kenya's history, when President Daniel arap Moi assumed power. He was sworn in as the president of Kenya on October 10, 1978, after the death of the then-president of Kenya, Jomo Kenyatta. Moi remained president of Kenya till 2002, when he voluntarily stepped down as president.

Moi Day is celebrated with great pomp and enthusiasm in Kenya. This special day is marked by military parades and cultural activities such as speeches and essay-writing contests. Throughout the country, special celebrations are planned to honor the tenure of this great Kenyan leader.

KENYATTA DAY

Observed on: October 20

Kenyatta Day commemorates the arrest of the great freedom fighter and first president of independent Kenya, Jomo Kenyatta, on October 20, 1952, after a state of emergency was declared in Kenya by the newly appointed British governor, Sir Evelyn Baring. His arrest triggered nationwide protests and demonstrations throughout the country, as well as an intensified demand for complete independence.

Kenya had been under British rule from the 18th century and had a long history of being colonized by foreign rulers before that. After World War II colonies all over the world were fighting their own wars for freedom, and Kenya was among them. The British tried every means possible to crush the protest, but Jomo Kenyatta and other freedom fighters continued their struggle for independence. Thousands of Kenyans were killed in the process, but ultimately, their sacrifice was not in vain.

Kenyatta Day pays tribute through lectures and symposia on Kenyatta's life and beliefs to all freedom fighters who fought for Kenya's independence.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

In remembrance of Jesus Christ's Crucifixion Christians observe Good Friday all over the world. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent, the 40-day Christian period of austerity and fasting. In Kenya Protestants and Catholics attend special prayer services in church and remember the life and teachings of Christ. Church choirs sing devotional songs, and theatrical productions based on the life of Christ serve as a reminder of the great sacrifice made by whom Christians see as the Son of God.

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus Christ's Resurrection. Celebrating victory over death and the resurrection of life, it falls on the first Sunday after the 40-day period of austerity and fasting known as Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

Easter is celebrated with great joy by Christians in Kenya. On this day Kenyans attend church and offer prayers. Easter celebrations include religious and cultural activities sponsored by churches all over Kenya. Dancing, singing, and feasting are the hallmark of Easter celebrations in Kenya. Because Kenyans believe that Easter marks new beginnings, wayward people in Kenyan villages receive special counseling from elders on this day and are encouraged to take the right path.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday and is a popular Christian holiday in Kenya. Egg rolling competitions (a game played with decorated Easter eggs) are a part of Easter Monday celebrations.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar; the first day after the month of Ramadan

Eid al-Fitr marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan. The date is based on the Islamic calendar, which has 354 days and so moves backward 11 days per year in relation to the solar or Gregorian calendar. During Ramadan Muslims worldwide observe a month-long fast beginning from dawn until dusk in order to build a stronger spirit. Consumption of water and food is strictly prohibited during the daytime fast. After sunset the entire family breaks the fast with a special family meal called fa-tur.

Most Kenyan Muslims reside on the east coast. Eid al-Fitr is the most important holiday for them. On this day they get up early, and wearing new clothes, offer prayers in the local mosque and exchange greetings with family and friends. The afternoon is filled with music, food, and dancing. Because the day is a public holiday, all schools, colleges, and public and private institutions remain closed.

The Maralal International Camel Derby is held in the second week of August every year at Maralal in Kenya's Samburu district. It began as a sporting event in 1990 to create awareness among the pastoral communities about the usefulness of camels and to combat the problem of environmental degradation in Kenya.

Today, this event has gained international exposure and attracts participants from all over the world.

Dugong and Greek Mythology

Dugong or sea cow (a manatee-like animal) finds mention in Greek mythology and is related to the legend of the sirens. Sirens of myth are essentially mermaids whose upper body was that of a woman and the lower that of a fish. It is believed that they seduced sailors with their singing, luring them to their death in the sea. The dugong belongs to the family of Sirenia, which was named after the sirens of Greek legend.

In Homer's Odyssey Greek warrior Ulysses is warned by Circe the Sorceress about the dangers posed by the sirens and their enchanting song. She even instructs him to fill the sailors' ears with wax to prevent them from hearing their songs.

The most important events in the Maralal International Camel Derby are an amateur camel race, a semi-professional race, and the professional camel race.

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May

Every year the residents of Lamu, a historical island town with distinctive Arab architecture, located off the east coast of Kenya, organize a festival called the Lamu Dugong Festival. It is held in May, and the donkey race is the major highlight. Donkeys are the sole means of transportation in Lamu and are found in great numbers in this region. Thousands of people from all over Kenya, as well as tourists, visit Lamu during these festivities and enjoy the race.

The festival came to be known as the Lamu Dugong Festival to create awareness among the local people about conservation of dugong (sea cow, a manatee-like creature), an endangered marine mammal, which is found along the coasts of Kenya. Dugongs are being killed for their meat in various parts of the world, including Kenya.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child in Kenya is usually cause for a big celebration. As the news of the birth spreads, relatives from all over the country travel to the birthplace for a big feast. The child is given a name that reflects the family lineage.

Among the Akamba tribe, there is a special naming ceremony. The child is given a Christian name as well as an African name. This is followed by narration of old folktales that reflect ancient African glory.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Female circumcision or female genital cutting is an ancient custom still followed in Kenya. It is performed when girls reach puberty. The procedure is a painful and non-anesthetic surgery. Maendeleo Ya Wanawake (MYWO), a non-profit, non-government organization, has initiated a drive to put an end to this practice. It has proposed an alternative rite, which is followed among many African tribes. It involves taking the girl to a secluded place by the women of the community and teaching her about family life, which includes lessons on womanhood and sexual education.

Male circumcision, which is much less painful and harmful than female genital cutting, is an integral part of Kenya's culture and takes place when the boy is on the threshold of manhood.

Marriage is a grand occasion in Kenyan society. Each tribe has its own specific marriage rituals. Generally a marriage in Africa is not considered complete until a child has been conceived.

An interesting, ancient Kenyan wedding ritual involved symbolic fighting between the bride's family and groom's family. Among the Masai tribe the wedding ritual also involved the female relatives of the groom verbally abusing the bride. It was done in good faith and was considered essential to ward off evil. A lavish feast followed the ritual and people would, eat, drink, and dance. The couple was blessed and wished a happy married life. In some tribes offerings were also made to the ancestors, seeking their blessings.

❁ DEATH

When a person dies the family and clan members gather to celebrate the life the person led. Ancestors are revered and stories of their lives are told to children and grandchildren in order to develop a bond between the youngsters and their ancestors.

Among the indigenous tribes in the countryside, the cause of death is usually attributed to supernatural forces. Special rituals are held to pacify the dead to prevent them from rising as ghosts.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Austronesian-speaking people inhabited the lands of Kiribati in the first century C.E. Islanders from Fiji and Tonga found the archipelago almost 700 years ago and therein introduced the final ingredients that were to result in the I-Kiribati society.

The 19th century saw the introduction of British rule. The islands were the site of intense battles as part of the Pacific Theater in World War II.

Independent since 1979, Kiribati faces ongoing challenges, including a high rate of HIV infection. The prospect of rising sea levels due to global warming is no distant issue to the I-Kiribati, who have implemented the Kyoto Protocols and take umbrage at those who have not. The highest point in Kiribati is 257 feet above sea level.

✿ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Kiribati, formerly known as the Gilbert Islands, is made up of three widely separated main groups of southwest Pacific islands: the Gilbert Islands on the equator, the Phoenix Islands to the east, and the Line Islands farther east. Ocean Island, with its rich deposits of phosphates (until the reserves were exhausted in 1981), is also included in the two million square miles of ocean. Most of the islands of Kiribati are low-lying coral atolls built on a submerged volcanic chain that is encircled by reefs. Banaba Island has an unnamed location that is considered the highest point in Kiribati at 265.7 feet.

Kiribati enjoys an equatorial maritime climate (with uniform temperatures, high humidity, and variable rainfall). The temperatures during the day and night and for a major part of the year show little variation, with an average of approximately 82.4°F. There is a constant balmy breeze from the eastern side.

The country does not experience tropical cyclones but does experience strong gales and rain during the rainy season, which occurs between December and March. Rainfall is sometimes irregular leading to long periods of drought. The islands to the north and south are more tropical. The trade winds blow between March and October, thus making it the most pleasant part of the whole year; while the highest rainfall (December to May) is concentrated on the northern islands.

November to February is wetter and more humid than the rest of the year. None of the islands supports much vegetation, because soil is scarce. Though there are no rivers, most of the islands possess freshwater lagoons.

The local fauna is limited to the Polynesian rat, a variety of seabird, and a few species of lizard. Marine life encompasses coral and many species of fish. Seaside scrub, mangroves, and pandanus grow on some islands, in addition to epiphytes and ferns. Coconut trees have been planted widely across the islands in protected, or closed, areas.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of Kiribati has witnessed wide fluctuations in recent times. Overall economic development is hindered by a shortage of skilled workers, weak infrastructure, and remoteness from international markets.

Kiribati has few natural resources. The commercially viable deposits of phosphates were depleted by the time of independence in 1979. Currently copra and fish compose the bulk of production and exports.

Tourism provides more than 20 percent of the nation's gross domestic product (GDP). Foreign financial aid from the United Kingdom, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and China equals 25 to 50 percent of GDP. I-Kiribati working abroad send home each year $50 per islander. The major trading partners are Australia, Japan, Fiji, New Zealand and the United States.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Kinship is central in the life of the I-Kiribati. Living in extended families, the I-Kiribati commonly adopt the children of relatives. This can occur through bubuti, a verbal agreement or request that must be granted. Couples without children or who want more can make a bubuti to adopt from within the larger circle.

Large families are highly valued because most people are dependent on subsistence agriculture. Families also need help with fishing, gathering coconuts, and working in the babai (a taro-like starchy root crop) pits. Women are responsible for housework, cooking, and child care. Additionally they often help men with their chores. The oldest male is the head of the household; the elderly are treated with great respect. The women and girls of Kiribati wear their traditional kilt made out of grass that reaches from hip up to the kneecap and greatly accentuates the suppleness of their figures. The old men still tend to wrap beautifully textured mats around their waists, which are fastened with the girdles that are nothing but plaited pieces of their wives' hair. Nowadays young men wear printed loincloths in the same fashion as kilts.

Most I-Kiribati live modestly, never making an ostentatious display of their wealth and resources.

Kyoto Protocol

The Kyoto Protocol is an amendment to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), an international treaty on global warming. It also reaffirms sections of the UNFCCC. Countries that ratify this protocol commit either to reducing their emissions of carbon dioxide and five other greenhouse gases or to engaging in emissions trading if they maintain or increase emissions of these gases. A total of 141 countries have ratified the agreement. (Two important exceptions are the United States and Australia.)

The formal name of the agreement, which reaffirms sections of the UNFCCC, is the Kyoto Protocol to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. It was negotiated in Kyoto, Japan, in December 1997, opened for signature on March 16, 1998, and closed on March 15, 1999. The agreement came into force on February 16, 2005, following ratification by Russia on November 18, 2004.

The pragmatic aspect of their nature becomes rather obvious in the way that they carefully use every inch of the coconut tree. The fronds are used for making mats, the midribs for building houses, the sap to make alcohol or for sweetening, the nut to make copra or for culinary purposes, while the oil is used to make soap or refined for use as body oil.

A typical I-Kiribati home has a thatched roof, stick walls, and floor made out of coral rocks. Mats fabricated out of coconut fronds are used to cover the floor, while mats made with pandanus leaves are used for sleeping. There is usually a separate house for cooking.

❁ CUISINE

Coconut and all its products form an integral part of I-Kiribatis' diet. The I-Kiribatis use a lot of grated coconut, even mixing it into their tea. They use coconut milk to sweeten breadfruit soup or combine it with curry powder to marinate raw fish. Coconut sap, or toddy, is rich in vitamin C, and the coconut trees are cut twice daily to release the sap, which is collected by young boys. Boiled over a low flame, toddy forms a thick, sweet molasses called kamaimai. This is used instead of sugar to sweeten drinks; it can also be made into a hard candy. Fermented, toddy becomes an alcoholic drink known as kakioki.

The I-Kiribati eat locally caught fish, breadfruit, pandanus, papaya, and babai. Imported rice and flour are also staple foods. Pork and chicken are usually eaten only on festive occasions. In the urban areas more and more people are eating canned foodstuffs. Traditionally, meals are cooked over an open fire and are either fried or baked. Since few of the people own refrigerators, salt is used as a preservative, and fish are dried in the Sun. Salt and sugar are two common flavorings, in addition to curry powder, which is used almost exclusively with raw fish.

The breakfast of an I-Kiribati is light and may be made up only of bread with a cup of tea or fresh toddy. Lunches and dinners are more sumptuous and include fish, rice, and coconut. Fish is served in a variety of ways—fried, baked, in soup, or may even be consumed raw. The local fruits and vegetables on the menu include coconut, taro, and sweet potato.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 1

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is widely observed as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world that often start New Year's Eve (December 31).

I-Kiribati Christians gather in maneabas (meetinghouses), where they celebrate New Year's Eve with community meals, speeches, singing, and indoor games. At the stroke of midnight they conduct prayers, say farewell to the old year, and welcome the new year. All educational and government establishments are closed on New Year's Day.

❁ NATIONAL HEALTH DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 8

On this holiday the government of Kiribati tries to improve awareness of the importance of health among its citizens. It usually introduces new programs for improving the country's health conditions, which in turn will contribute to the country's progress. The holiday is also celebrated with such fun-filled activities as theatrical and dramatic performances, and sports competitions and contests, including weight lifting, races, basketball, volleyball, and table tennis.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 12

Kiribati won its independence from British colonial rule on this day in 1979. It celebrates the event with a colorful parade and a review of troops, followed by various field events such as soccer, basketball, tennis, and volleyball matches, as well as marathons and canoe races. All educational and government establishments remain closed.

❁ NATIONAL YOUTH DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 7

This day highlights the very important role the youth of Kiribati play in the current and future plans for the country. Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) registered in Kiribati have contributed substantially to the welfare and development of Kiribati's youth. From time to time these NGOs organize workshops and other activities, targeting the youth of various churches in order to provide experiences and skills that will contribute to the prosperity of Kiribati.

❁ HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 10

The day honors the United Nations (UN) General Assembly's adoption and proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, on December 10, 1948. This was the first-ever global proclamation of human rights. The commemoration was implemented in 1950, when the UN General Assembly invited all states and interested organizations to celebrate the day in any manner they saw fit. This day is designed to celebrate the dignity of human beings all over the world and to work for their betterment. In Kiribati several churches organize singing and indoor games as well as special dinners. All educational and government organizations remain closed.

Religious Holidays

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday commemorates the agonies of Christ and his death on the Cross. As in other Christian communities around the world on this day in Kiribati religious services are conducted. This is a solemn occasion and after the morning church services the devout spend the entire day attending public readings of gospels, psalms, and singing hymns from scripture.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The origin of Easter celebrations can be traced to the end of first century C.E. It is a Christian feast that celebrates the belief in Jesus Christ's Resurrection from the dead. It is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Christ through his death freed humankind from the penalty of sin.

The word Easter is derived from the name of a Greek Goddess Eostre or Eastre. She was the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people who lived in northern Europe.

Easter eggs have become associated with the festival. They are considered the symbol of new life. Easter thus signifies resurgence of hope and a fresh start for all.

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Since Kiribati is a Christian country this holiday assumes great importance. On Easter Sunday (as also on Christmas Day) The I-Kiribati attend a religious service and then a feast in the maneaba (community hall), where a number of families also perform local dances. No gifts are exchanged on this holiday, but the spirit of joyfulness and festivity spills over to the following day, which is known as Easter Monday.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus Christ, whom Christians see as the Son of God.

In Kiribati native Christians celebrate this momentous day by attending a religious service followed by a dinner in the maneaba (community hall), where various individuals and their families present local dances. However no gifts are exchanged on holidays.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

This holiday originated in England where it was a practice in earlier times to give cash or durable goods to servants the day after Christmas. Since Kiribati was under British rule for a fairly long time, this practice was adopted locally.

Rites of Passage

Though the natives of Kiribati have converted to Christianity, there are some groups of natives in certain pockets of the islands who have tended to adhere to their age-old rites and rituals.

❁ MARRIAGE

Among the I-Kiribati, marriage is arranged. In the ceremonial betrothal negotiation, called te-amata-mata, a representative of the groom's family approaches the prospective bride's family, bearing customary gifts such as food. If the match is agreeable, the bride's family invites the family of the groom to visit the dowry land, where the couple will make their home if the site is agreeable. The groom's family expresses its acceptance of terms by again sending a male of the family to pay another call on the household of the bride, this time summoning her to live among her in-laws until the wedding.

Nuptials vary by island. Potions of local plants are used to anoint the couple. The traditional house has an upper floor, where, on their wedding day, the newlyweds consummate their union, with family gathered below.

❁ DEATH

During the three nights following a death the ceremony of bo-maki is performed. All the people known to the deceased gather together in the darkness at the southern end of the village with sticks of pan-danus wood and the butt ends of coconut leaves in their hands. They line up abreast of each other from east to west, slowly advancing northward, beating the ground and trees before them with their staves. Not a word is uttered. When the line has swept through the settlement from south to north, it stops, and the participants disperse in silence. This gesture is meant to encourage the soul of the dead to leave the neighborhood and also to drive away any evil spirit that might wish to possess the corpse.

The immediate family of the deceased begins to mourn by wailing loudly and howling continuously for three days without interruption (by relays), except when the ceremony of bo-maki is being performed. The women have the privilege of attending to the corpse. Their first duty is to anoint the body from head to toe with coconut oil, scented with flowers of the uri tree (Guettarda speciosa), or with a handful of desiccated pith of the almond trees. Wild almond is considered the favorite tree of the ancestral goddess Tituaa-bine, who supposedly resides in Matang, a realm of departed souls.

The body, after being dressed, is placed on its back with the head to the east and feet to the west, arms beside it and open palms upward. Two waea, or small shriveled coconuts, are placed in the open palms. These are supposed to prevent the soul from returning to harangue the family. The body is kept for three or nine days, to be buried on the fourth or 10th day, as the case might be. On the third night after the final performance of the bo-maki ceremony, one of the female relatives of the deceased comes to utter the final spells, which will straighten the path of the soul to the land of ghosts. She is called te tia-tabe-atu (the lifter of the head), because she holds the deceased person's head in her lap while muttering the spell. If she does her work well it is believed that the body begins to shine like fire (possibly with the phosphorescence of decay). The night before burial, assistants dress the body in a new waist mat and lay it on a fresh sleeping mat with wreaths of scented flowers around its neck. Everything that had hitherto come into contact with the dead is then turned, except the shriveled coconuts, which remained on the upturned palms.

The grave is generally dug in the floor of the house, though it is sometimes dug outside; its depth is between 18 inches and 2 feet. The body, wrapped in its sleeping mat, is laid in the hole; over it is drawn a coarse screen of coconut leaves, which is again covered with a finer mat. The grave is then filled in with sand, and its limits demarcated with a rectangle of small white stones; for three days after the burial, some of the family members indulge in dining and dancing, while a few others fling themselves on the grave and wail loudly. Many mourners compose songs or dirges for the occasion, the most memorable of which remain in the family for generations.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The ancient history of the entire Korean peninsula can be said to have started with the Neolithic Age, when groups of Turkic-Manchurian-Mongol people migrated into the region from China. The first agriculturally based settlements appeared in the region around 6000 B.C.E. During this era other communities made their appearance along the Han-gang River near modern-day Seoul (the capital of South Korea), and others in the vicinity of Pyongyang (the capital of North Korea) and Pusan. According to ancient legend Korea's earliest civilization, known as Choson, was founded in 2333 B.C.E. by the mythical figure Tan-gun.

In the 17th century, Korea was transformed into a vassal state of China and in the process was cut off from the rest of the world until the beginning of the Sino-Japanese War of 1894–95. As a result of Japan's victory Korea was granted independence. But it was short-lived and by 1910 Korea had been annexed by Japan, which developed the country but failed to win over the Korean nationalists, who continued to agitate for full independence.

After Japan's capitulation at the end of World War II the Korean peninsula was partitioned into two occupation zones, divided at the 38th parallel. The Soviet Union controlled the north, while the United States took charge of the south. In 1948 the division was made permanent with the establishment of the separate regimes of North and South Korea.

Kim Il-sung (1912–94), officially known in North Korea as the Great Leader and named "eternal president" in the country's constitution, ruled North Korea from 1948 until his death in 1994. An absolute and ruthless Communist dictator, he fostered a cult of personality that portrayed him as a virtual god.

In a bid to unify the two Koreas under a single Communist government, the North launched a surprise attack on

The Legend of Tan Gun

According to legend Hwan-ung, the son of Hwan-in (God and the ruler of Heaven), yearned to live on Earth among the valleys and the mountains. His father sent him and 3,000 helpers to rule Earth and provide humans with great happiness. Hwan-ung descended to Mount Taebaeksan on the border of Manchuria with North Korea and renamed the place Shinshi (City of God). Along with his ministers of clouds, rain, and wind, he instituted laws and moral codes and taught humans art, medicine, and agriculture.

A tiger and a bear living in a cave together prayed to Hwan-ung, yearning to become human. Deeply moved, Hwan-ung called them to him and gave them 20 cloves of garlic and a bunch of mugwort. He commanded them to eat only this sacred food and stay out of sunlight for 100 days. The tiger shortly gave up and went away. The bear, however, remained steadfast, and after 21 days it was transformed into a woman. The bear-woman was very grateful and made offerings to Hwan-ung. However lacking a companion, she soon became sad and prayed beneath a sandalwood tree to be blessed with a child. Hwan-ung, impressed by her prayers, married her, and soon after she gave birth to a handsome son. They named him Tan-gun, meaning "Altar Prince" or sandalwood.

Tan-gun grew up to be a strong and dynamic leader and in 2333 B.C.E. moved to Pyongyang and established the Choson (Land of the Morning Calm) Kingdom. Finally, at the age of 1,908, he returned to Taebaeksan, where he became a mountain god.

South Korea on June 25, 1950. The attack was strongly condemned by the UN Security Council, which demanded an immediate withdrawal. U.S. President Harry S. Truman ordered his country's air and naval units into action to enforce the UN order. The British government followed suit, and soon a UN multinational command was dispatched to help the South Koreans.

North Korean forces captured Seoul and surrounded the allied forces in the peninsula's southeast corner near Pusan. In a desperate move the UN Commander General Douglas MacArthur (1880–1964) ordered a landing at Inchon on September 15 and routed the North Korean Army. MacArthur's forces pushed north across the 38th parallel, approaching the Yalu River. At this point Communist China entered the war, forcing the UN troops into a headlong retreat. Seoul was lost and then regained. Ultimately the war stabilized near the 38th parallel but dragged on for two years while negotiations took place. An armistice was finally agreed to and signed on July 27, 1953.

Kim Il-sung's death on July 8, 1994, plunged the country into a period of uncertainty, as his son, Kim Jong-Il, assumed his father's mantle. Of great concern internationally was North Korea's suspected nuclear weapons program, in addition to its massive army and long-range missile development. Negotiations over the country's suspected atomic weapons seemed to achieve some success with an agreement reached in June 1995, which included a provision for providing the North with a South Korean nuclear reactor that would be used only for peaceful purposes.

In September 1998 North Korea launched a test missile over Japan, claiming it was simply a scientific satellite. This move alarmed Japan and the rest of the world about North Korea's intentions regarding reentry into the nuclear arms race. In 1999 North Korea agreed to allow the United States to conduct ongoing inspections of a suspected nuclear development site, Kumchangri, which North Korea admitted had been devised for "a sensitive military purpose." It was agreed that in return the United States would enhance the supply of food, in addition to starting a program of potato production in the country.

Antagonism between North and South Korea escalated between 1998 and 1999. But tension with South Korea surprisingly decreased in June 2000, when South Korea's President Kim Dae Jung met with North Korea's President Kim Jong-il in Pyongyang. However efforts toward reconciliation failed and were followed by minor military skirmishes.

In July 2002 North Korea began a series of radical economic initiatives aimed at reforming the devastated economy and introducing free-market policies. The country devalued its currency, raised food prices by as much as 50 percent, and increased wages. In October confronted with U.S. intelligence, North Korea admitted that it had violated a 1994 agreement regarding the freezing of its nuclear weapons; instead it had been developing nuclear bombs.

North Korea officially withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) in January 2003. Nuclear proliferation is a source of perpetual tension between Korea and other powerful nations such as the United States, Japan, and China. A modest breakthrough occurred when officials from the United States, North Korea, China, Russia, South Korea, and Japan met in August 2003 in Beijing, although the talks bore no fruit. Yet in February 2005 North Korea candidly admitted that it was in possession of nuclear weapons and declared that it would not engage in further disarmament talks.

Fun Fact

Although the government of North Korea is characterized as a totalitarian dictatorship, exactly how the country is governed remains unclear to outsiders.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Korean Peninsula extends approximately 621 miles south from the northeast Asian continental landmass. The main Japanese islands of Honshu and Kyushu are located some 124 miles to the southeast across the Tsushima Strait, the southeast part of the Korea Strait. The Korean Peninsula's west coast is bordered by the Yellow Sea. The 5,257-mile-long coastline of Korea is highly irregular, with North Korea's half of the peninsula having 1,550 miles of coastline.

The northern land border of Korea is formed by the Yalu (or Amnok) and Tumen Rivers, which originate in the region around Paektu-san (Mount Paektu or White Head Mountain), an extinct volcano and Korea's highest mountain peak (9,003 feet). The Yalu River flows into the Yellow Sea, and the Tumen River flows east into the Sea of Japan. The total land area of the Korean Peninsula, including islands, is 84,943 square miles, of which 55 percent, or 46,451 square miles, constitutes the territory of North Korea.

Located between latitudes 38° and 43° north, North Korea has a continental climate with four distinct seasons. Long winters have bitterly cold and clear weather interspersed with snowstorms as a result of northern and northwestern winds blowing in from Siberia. The daily average high and low temperatures for Pyongyang (the capital) in January are 27°F and 9°F. Average snowfall is 37 days during the winter. The weather is even harsher in the northern mountainous regions. Summer tends to be short, hot, humid, and rainy because of the southern and southeastern monsoon winds that blow from the Pacific Ocean. The daily average high and low temperatures for Pyongyang in August are 84°F and 68°F. Nearly 60 percent of all precipitation occurs from June to September. Typhoons affect Korea at least once every summer. Spring and autumn are pleasant seasons, with mild temperatures and variable winds.

❁ ECONOMY

A few decades ago Korea had vast timber resources; the major species of trees were larch, oak, alder, pine, spruce, and fir. However, the forests were depleted due to excessive harvesting of trees during the Japanese occupation (1910–45), illegal logging around 1945, and the devastating Korean War (1950–53). Recently reforestation programs have helped to remedy the loss.

North Korea has great mineral wealth, comprising five major minerals—gold, iron ore, coal, tungsten, and graphite. Before the country was divided in the aftermath of World War II, the colder and less fertile northern region relied heavily on the south for food. When the country split, agricultural self-sufficiency became a major national goal of North Korea. Mechanized methods were introduced; the government expanded irrigation facilities, constructed numerous dams, and initiated land-reclamation projects.

Due to the mountainous and rocky terrain, less than 20 percent of Korean land is fit for agriculture. Rice is the major crop, with wet paddies constituting about half of the total farmland. The paddies lie along the coasts, in reclaimed tidal areas, and in river valleys. Barley, wheat, corn, soybeans, and grain sorghums are also cultivated on a large scale; other crops include cotton, tobacco, fruits, potatoes, beans, and sweet potatoes. The long coastline and numerous islands, inlets, and reefs provide excellent fishing grounds, and the presence of warm and cold currents attracts many varieties of fish.

The Korean economy was shattered by the war of 1950–53. Post-war reconstruction was boosted by huge amounts of foreign aid (from Communist countries such as China and the USSR), in addition to intensive government economic development programs. Large-scale industrial advances were made during the 1960s. At the start of the 21st century the major products of North Korea included iron, steel, and other metals; machinery; military products; textiles (synthetics, wool, cotton, silk); and chemicals.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Traditional Korean clothing dates back to the Three Kingdoms Period (57 B.C.E.–668 C.E.), as depicted in the wall paintings that adorn the tombs of that period. The Korean dress is known as the hanbok. The top part, or jeogori, is blouselike with long sleeves, with the men's version being longer, stretching down to the waist. Women wear skirts (chima) and men wear baggy pants (paji). In earlier times commoners wore white, except during festivals and special occasions such as weddings. Clothes for the upper classes used a lot of bright colors to indicate the wearer's social status. Accessories include foot gear, jewelry, and head-dresses and hairpins to hold the tresses in place.

The traditional Korean family was large, and three or four generations usually lived together. Since infant mortality was high, a big family was thought to be a blessing and having many children was highly desirable. Such practices came to an end due to the rapid industrialization and urbanization of the country, which were accompanied by effective birth-control drives. Due to a long-standing Confucian tradition, which directed that the eldest son takes over as head of the family, a preference for sons was prevalent in Korea. To tackle the problem, the Hangul, the Korean writing system, was invented in the 15th century by King Sejong the Great (1397–1450) to replace the system of Chinese characters, called Hanja in Korea.

Fun Fact

South Korean Christians report having met with members of underground Christian churches in North Korea.

Song to General Kim Il-sung

A North Korean marching song composed during the Korean War, the “Song to General Kim Il-sung” was sung by both the North Koreans and their Chinese allies.

Changbai Hills roll, stained with blood
 Yalu River meanders, soaked in blood
 These holy stains throw light over the bouquet of free Korea today.
 Vast snowy fields of Manchuria, please tell me
 Endless night deep in the Taiga, please tell me
 Immortal guerrilla warrior, who is he?
 Outstanding patriot, who is it?
 He is the benefactor who released the laborers.
 He is the great Sun for new democratic Korea.
 All people gather to the 20-clause political program.
 New spring comes everywhere in North Korea.
 Refrain
 Oh, what a sweet name, General Kim Il-sung!
 Oh, what a glorious name, General Kim Il-sung!

government has revised family-related laws and ensured equality for daughters in terms of inheritance. In 21st-century Korea, young married couples choose to live separately; therefore nuclear families with few children are on the rise.

A Korean name consists of a family name plus a given name. The family name comes first. A Korean woman does not adopt her husband’s family name, but the children do take on their father’s family name. The most common family names in North Korea are: Kim (about 21 percent of all Koreans), Yi (14 percent), Park (8 percent), Choi, Jeong, Jang, Han, and Lim.

A traditional North Korean dwelling is known as a hanok. The underlying principle of a hanok is to create a living space based on the coexistence of nature and human beings. A unique feature of traditional houses is their special design for cooling the interior in the summer and heating the interior in the winter. Since North Korea has very hot summers and bitterly cold winters, the ondol gudeul, a floor-based heat-

Fun Fact

Kimchi, a popular Korean dish in the United States, may have meant “steeped/submerged vegetable” originally. At a traditional North Korean table, all the dishes are served at the same time. In earlier times the number of side dishes varied from three for the lower classes to 12 for royal family members. Table arrangements can vary depending on whether a noodle dish or meat is served. Koreans eat with chopsticks. Compared with China and Japan, however, a spoon is used more often, particularly when soups are served.

ing system and daecheong, a cool wooden-floor style hall, were developed over centuries to help the common people survive the extremities of temperature. These primitive heating and air-conditioning systems are so effective that they are still used in many homes even today.

Prior to the Communist regime many North Koreans had been Confucians or Buddhists. The North Korean government, however, has effectively suppressed religion in favor of Marxist principles. Korean is widely spoken, with a smattering of English.

❁ CUISINE

Korean cuisine includes a wide variety of meat and fish dishes along with wild greens and vegetables. Fish remains the chief source of protein in the North Korean diet. Various fermented and preserved items such as kimchi (fermented spicy cabbage), jeotgal (fermented seafood with salt), and doenjang jeotgal (fermented soybean paste) are common items at meals.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

As with most of the world, North Korea celebrates New Year’s Day on January 1 in accordance with the Gregorian calendar. It is a public holiday, and all government and commercial organizations are closed. People enjoy this day in the company of their loved ones.

❁ KIM JONG-IL’S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 16–17

Born February 16, 1942, Chairman Kim Jong-il has been the uninterrupted ruler of North Korea for more than a decade. He succeeded his father, Kim Il-sung, who had ruled the country ever since its founding in 1948. Familiarly hailed as the “Dear Leader,” Kim occupies the positions of chairman of the National Defense Committee, as well as the general secretary of the Korean Workers’ Party. His birthday is a two-day public holiday in North Korea.

❁ KIM II-SUNG’S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 15

This holiday commemorates the birthday of Kim Il-sung, the father of the current dictator, who ruled North Korea from 1948 until his death in 1994.

During his years as dictator he fostered a cult of personality that raised him to the status of near god. He is known as the Great Leader and was enshrined in the constitution as “eternal president.” He was born in the village of Mangyongdae on the outskirts of Pyongyang, the capital city. On this day the people of North Korea customarily place wreaths and floral offerings at one or more statues of the great leader or pay homage by visiting his native village. Since it is a public holiday all educational and business institutions are closed.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

North Korea celebrates Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers’ Day, on May 1 to honor the contributions of workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

This is a public holiday in North Korea with government offices, schools, and businesses closed for the day. The holiday is observed with speeches and parades.

✿ FATHERLAND LIBERATION WAR DAY

Observed on: June 25

Fatherland Liberation War Day, or Start of Korean War, marks the day in 1950 that North Korea went to war against its southern counterpart South Korea. Although the underlying reason for the outbreak of the Korean War was the ongoing cold war between the two superpowers the United States and the USSR, there were also growing tensions between the governments of North and South Korea. The superpowers used these tensions to fight each other without actually engaging in a direct war, which would have proved disastrous for both. This war should be understood within that larger geopolitical struggle.

Every year on this day the leaders of North Korea, as well as the general public, visit war memorials to place floral wreaths, paying homage to the people who lost their lives during this war. This is a public holiday in North Korea with government offices, schools, and businesses closed for the day.

✿ VICTORY DAY

1953. Since North Korea has always insisted that the war was started by South Korea, aided by the United States, the Pyongyang regime describes the outcome as a victory, implying that the alleged “invaders” were repelled. On this occasion leaders of the ruling Communist Party and the military, along with workers and people from all classes of society, offer their respects at the Tomb of Revolutionary Martyrs, the Victory Tower, and the statue of the late leader Kim Il-sung. This is a public holiday in North Korea with government offices, businesses, and schools closed for the day.

❁ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 15

This holiday celebrates a turning point in the political history of North Korea. On this day in 1945, the country won its freedom from decades of Japanese rule. Japanese rule was often harsh and was fought by Korean guerrilla groups, particularly in the North. Korean antipathy toward the Japanese continues to this day. Civic ceremonies mark the holiday, and government offices, schools, and business are closed.

❁ DPR KOREA FOUNDATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 9

It was on this day in 1948 that the Supreme People’s Assembly in Pyongyang proclaimed the foundation of a Communist state in the northern part of the Korean Peninsula. In North Korea this day is marked by parades, processions, and speeches by public figures. This day is also observed as a public holiday with schools, businesses, and government offices closed.

❁ CHUSOK

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 17–18

Chusok, the Harvest Moon Festival, is a two-day festival celebrated in North Korea. During this observance, the people give thanks for a good harvest, attend family reunions, and hope for another prosperous year. Families make offerings of food to their ancestors, called a tsbare, or memorial offering, and visit their ancestors at the cemetery. The songp yen, a rice cake shaped like a half Moon, is a traditional Korean pastry eaten during this holiday. It is usually stuffed with beans, chestnuts, or sesame seeds with honey. Literally, Chusok means “Festival of Autumn Night.”

❁ PARTY FOUNDATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 10

According to the official history of North Korea, it was on this day that the ruling Korean Workers Party was founded by Kim Il-sung in 1945, in the aftermath of World War II. This event is commemorated with processions, speeches, and shouting of slogans. Since this is a public holiday all government and commercial institutions remain closed.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 27

This day celebrates the adoption of a new constitution in 1972—the first revised constitution since the original one in 1948. The 1972 constitution created the positions of president and vice president as well as the Central People’s Committee. This day is celebrated with civic ceremonies. It is also a public holiday.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Since ancient times, Korean women have been encouraged to produce male children. In the past an individual’s prosperity was judged by the number of male offspring. The absence of a male child on many occasions led to divorces; men often took concubines in the hopes of fathering a son. The preference for a son is rooted deeply in the Confucian patriarchal system, according to which it was the woman’s duty to produce a male heir, ensuring the continuation of her husband’s bloodline and enabling him to perform important ancestral rites.

The birth of a male child is considered the result of blessings by various spirits. Hence many prayers and rituals are undertaken by women during pregnancy with the hope of receiving these blessings. The deities and spirits to whom such prayers are traditionally offered include samshin halmoni (grandmother spirit), the Big Dipper, mountain spirits, and the Buddha, in addition to certain sacred rocks and trees. These shrines are usually visited in the dead of night or at dawn.

Of these spirits samshin halmoni is the most important because the Koreans believe that this spirit plays a key role in childbirth and cares for the child’s growth and well-being. In every house a makeshift shrine is made for the deity so that women may conveniently pray and make offerings. It is believed that only with the grace of samshin halmoni can an easy childbirth and the woman’s speedy recovery take place.

Even in today’s Korean society, there are many restrictions and taboos that must be observed to ensure a healthy child and a safe delivery. The woman must not approach or do anything unclean, must not kill anything, must be careful where she urinates, must not step over a straw rope, and must refrain from theft or other kinds of mischief. There are many food items such as rabbit, squid, crab, eggs, and peaches that are considered harmful if eaten during pregnancy.

As the time of the delivery approaches, there should not be any repairs to fireplaces or holes in paper doors, and the family should not see a burning house as these are considered ill omens and harbingers of bad luck. To ensure an easy delivery, all doors are kept open. The husband's clothes are used as quilts, and the clothes of a woman who has experienced easy childbirths are borrowed to cover the woman when labor starts.

Various methods are employed to guess the gender of the unborn child. These may involve the physical appearance of the pregnant woman or dream interpretation. If the mother dreams of horses, oxen, dragons, tigers, and bears, she will deliver a male child. If, however, she dreams of flowers or toys, she will deliver a female child.

Upon the birth of a child, a straw rope (kumchul) is hung across the gate of the house to ward off evil spirits and notify people not to enter the premises because a child has recently been born. The rope, twisted in a leftward spiral, is intertwined with pine branches and red peppers to signify a male or with pine branches and charcoal, indicating a female. The kumchul is usually posted for 21 days. If more children are desired, the placenta and afterbirth are burned under the eaves of the house. If no more children are desired, these are burned some distance from the house, usually in a clean, sunny place on the side of a mountain. The ashes are often scattered to the winds or in a river.

For seven days after childbirth, rice and seaweed soup are offered to the samsbin halmoni twice a day. These items are then eaten by the mother to help her recover. Special offerings are made on the 14th and 21st days after birth. Family members avoid expressing their happiness over the birth of a child and do not make any personal remarks about the newborn, lest any harm befall the child. To fend off evil spirits, children are often given grotesque nicknames like Dog's Dung, Strawbag, and Stonehead.

❁ MARRIAGE

Koreans consider marriage the most important event in an individual's life. Thus divorce is regarded as a disgrace not only for the couple, but also for their families. Wedding ceremonies of the 21st century differ greatly from those in the past. A Western-style ceremony is held at a wedding hall or a church, with the bride wearing a white dress and the groom wearing a tuxedo. Later in the day the bride and groom have a traditional ceremony at a different room in the venue in colorful traditional costumes.

In earlier times Korean boys and girls, from the age of seven onward, were not even allowed to sit in the same room, minimizing the chances for the development of mutual attraction, friendship, and love. In a Confucian society the ability to repress one's emotions was regarded as a sign of good upbringing and education. The young couple had little or nothing to say in the matter since marriages were arranged by the parents with the help of a matchmaker. The couple generally did not meet until the day of the wedding.

Times have changed, and nowadays there are two paths leading to marriage. The first, yona, involves the meeting, falling in love, and marriage of two people without the involvement of a third party. The second, chungmae, involves the arranged meeting of two people by a go-between and leads to marriage, provided both parties consent to it.

Since the year, month, day, and hour of birth are thought to influence one's destiny, these aspects of the bride and groom require careful investigation. These factors are referred to as the four pillars (saju). A thorough examination of the four pillars is required to determine whether or not the couple can live harmoniously together. And even if the four pillars of the couple are good, a prediction (kunghap) by a fortune teller indicating difficulty or misfortune may lead to the two parties canceling the marriage plans.

If the four pillars and the kunghap are found to be acceptable, the couple becomes engaged. At the engagement ceremony, the two families get together at the girl's house or any convenient place, but never at the boy's house. The two young people exchange gifts, and a piece of handmade white paper on which the man's four pillars have been written is ceremoniously presented to the girl's family. A discussion follows, and the marriage date is selected.

A few days before the marriage, the groom's family sends a box (ham) containing gifts (yemul) for the bride. These comprise yards of red and blue fabric for a traditional dress, and jewelry, carried by servants or friends of the groom. The box is usually delivered at night, and upon approaching the house the carrier, jokingly shouts, "Buy a ham! Ham for sale." The ham is not handed over to the bride's mother until the family has offered wine, food, and a sum of money to the carrier.

The traditional wedding ceremony normally takes place either in the front room or in the courtyard of the bride's house. It begins with the bride and groom exchanging bows and drinks as they face each other across the wedding table. On the table are placed red and blue threads, lighted candles, red beans, rice, jujubes, chestnuts, dried persimmons, rice cakes, and the figures of a pair of ducks (symbolizing lasting bondage). During the rituals the bride is assisted by an elderly female servant or a couple of women well-versed in wedding procedures.

At night the couple retires to a room that has been decorated, set apart, and lit with a candle. There the bridegroom takes off the bride's headpiece, unties her coat string, and removes only one of her socks. Then it is customary for him to put out the candle, without blowing at it, since doing so would bring bad luck. He extinguishes it with a stick prepared for this purpose. The couple is not supposed to leave the room until sunrise. Later in the day the newly married couple, accompanied by the bride's father or uncle and a small procession carrying various articles and gifts, travels to the bridegroom's home. In earlier times the bride rode in a palanquin, while the bridegroom led the procession (shinhaeng) on horseback.

At the groom's house the bride's first interaction with her in-laws takes place. This is called the pyebaek. During this ceremony, the bride has to bow to her husband's parents, who are seated before a table on which is placed cooked chicken, jujubes, chestnuts, and fruits. Additionally, the bride has to present the groom's parents with silken items and exchange greetings with them. After staying a few days at the groom's house, the couple returns to the bride's home. On this occasion, a party is organized to familiarize the groom with the bride's family, friends, and relatives.

❁ DEATH

Koreans believe that a person's spirit will roam aimlessly to eventually become a ghost, or kaekkwī, if he or she succumbs to illness or any other natural death outside the confines of the home. To ensure that this does not happen, families take precautions. For example they try to be present during the last moments of a dying person, or even try to transport the weak back to their homes when death becomes imminent.

After death it is customary for the family members present during the last moments to wail (kok). Mourners don simple garb appropriate for the somber occasion. The men wear a sleeveless coat; women shed all their jewelry and accessories and refrain from combing their hair. The corpse is laid with its hands and feet bound tightly together. One of the relatives takes a coat of the deceased to the roof of the house and calls out his or her name three times. Then the coat is taken back into the house and used as a cover for the corpse. This ritual is called chobon, or kobok.

On the day following the death, preparations for burying the corpse are made. The first of these preparations is cup, or bathing the corpse with perfumed water and dressing the corpse. This is followed by combing his or her hair and clipping the fingernails and toenails. Bathed and combed, the corpse, clad in suui, the traditional death dress (made from either hemp or silk) is laid in the coffin. Fallen hair and nail clippings are placed in five small pouches called choballang. Later the choballang are placed in the coffin along with the corpse. With a wooden spoon made from a willow tree, three spoonfuls of rice are fed to the corpse. As the first spoonful is fed, a person close to the deceased calls, "rilchlonsogiyo" (meaning "one thousand bushels of rice"). At the second spoonful "oicheonsogiyo" is called out (meaning "two thousand bushels"); lastly, "psamchconsogiyo" is called out (meaning "three thousand bushels of rice"). Then metal coins are placed in the coffin. The rice and money are thought to facilitate the soul's journey to the next world.

The corpse is then wrapped in a quilted cloth (yampo) made of hemp and bound with ropes seven times before the coffin's lid is tightly sealed. The coffin is placed carefully in a dry and secure place within the house. A makeshift shrine is set up where photographs and written documents about the deceased are placed. It is here that the mourners receive guests. The family members of the deceased dress in the appropriate mourning attire, called sangbok, which vary in length according to the individual's relationship with the deceased. The mourning period can last three days or even a month. Those who carry the bier out of the house stop before the gate and lower the coffin three times as a ritual bow to signal the deceased's final departure from the household.

The transportation of the bier to the grave site is traditionally done with much fanfare. At the grave site, a shaman performs a ritual to exorcise the evil spirits from the grave. The eldest male member of the family (usually the deceased's son) sprinkles handfuls of earth over the grave; he is followed by the others present. Often a tombstone is erected at the grave site.

Upon returning home from the funeral, the family places a picture and an ancestral tablet on a wall at the front of their house for three consecutive days. After the third day mourners visit the grave with food and drink for the deceased, placing them in front of the grave, where they again make a deep bow. Another memorial service, called the cholgokche, is performed shortly after the second visit to the grave. On this day family members put away all the funeral paraphernalia, and mourning symbolically comes to an end.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

It is believed that many Asian tribes inhabited Korea as early as 30,000 B.C.E. These tribes joined together to form a kingdom called Goguryeo in the first century C.E. Over the next few centuries three kingdoms dominated the landscape of Korea: Goguryeo in the north, Baekje in the southwest, and Silla in the southeast. Culture, art, and architecture flourished and prospered during this period. By 700, the Silla Kingdom was at the peak of its culture, and many palaces and pagodas were built there.

In the 13th century, the Mongols arrived from China. In an effort to conquer Korea, they waged a 30-year war and destroyed the ruling Goryeo Dynasty. However in the 1340s the Mongol Empire declined rapidly due to internal struggles, and the Goryeo Dynasty regained control. Then the Choson Dynasty, the last imperial dynasty of Korea, took over the region in 1392 after a coup d'état that overthrew the last ruler of the Goryeo Dynasty King Kongmin (r. 1351–74). In 1592 Japan made an attempt to invade Korea but was ousted by the Koreans with the help of the Chinese. Subsequently the Manchu Dynasty of China stepped in and ruled the region for the next few centuries.

In 1904 the Japanese attacked Korea. They declared it a virtual protectorate in 1905 and finally annexed the country formally in 1910. Japan ruled Korea until World War II. After World War II in 1948, two separate states were formed: the Republic of Korea in the south, which was occupied by the United States, and the Democratic People's Republic in the north, which was taken over by the Soviet Union. In 1950 North Korea initiated a war against South Korea that came to be known as the Korean War. It lasted until 1953. By the end of the war more than two million people had been killed, and the countries were formally divided. Major political upheavals followed. Finally in 1961, Maj. Gen. Park Chung Hee (1917–79) emerged as South Korea's leader after several military coups.

Fun Fact

In the 10th century the new kingdom of Goryeo succeeded Silla.

Goryeo (a shortened form of Goguryeo) was translated into Italian as Cauli, the name Marco Polo used to refer to the country in his Travels. Cauli may have come from the Mandarin Chinese name Gaoli; from Cauli the English name Corea and the now more commonly used spelling, Korea, were derived.

Fun Fact

The largest single church in the world, Yoido Full Gospel Church (a Protestant sect), is found in Seoul.

South Korea achieved rapid economic growth over the next few decades under Park Chung Hee's authoritarian rule. After his assassination in 1979 there were widespread protests and strife, culminating in a declaration of martial law in 1980. This sparked a series of protests, and the next 15 years were a period of internal strife and political tensions. Eventually when the country was on the brink of civil war, elections were held in 1988, and a military figure Roh Tae Woo (b. 1932), was elected president. South Korea reestablished its relations with China and the Soviet Union. In 1992

Kim Young Sam (b. 1927) was elected to the presidency, and this triggered an era of corruption during which the economy suffered. In 1998 Kim Dae Jung (b. 1925) became the president of South Korea.

The economic crisis in the Asian markets in 1998 affected the South Korean economy too, but the economy started reviving in 1999. Meanwhile the tensions between North and South Korea had been increasing and in June 2000 President Kim Dae Jung initiated a move to meet with the president of North Korea seeking some way of achieving peace and reconciliation between the two countries. President Kim Dae Jung was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 2002.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

South Korea is bordered by North Korea to the north, the Yellow Sea to the west, and the Sea of Japan to the east. The Korea Strait and the South Sea lie to the south of the region. South Korea is a largely mountainous area, with mountains and uplands constituting almost 70 percent of the total land area. The tallest mountain is Mount Halla (3,445 feet), an extinct volcano. The principal rivers are the Nakdong and the Han.

The winters in South Korea are long, cold, and dry, while summers are short, hot, and humid, with late monsoon rains brought in by typhoons. In Seoul the average temperature in January ranges from 19° to 34°F, while the average temperature in July ranges from 72° to 84°F. The wettest season is between June and September, and the southern coast of the country is prone to typhoons consisting of strong winds and heavy rain.

The series of wars that have plagued South Korea over the centuries have wreaked havoc on its environment. The Japanese deforested South Korea completely in order to support their military costs. South Korea has now recovered a lot of its green due to a serious reforestation campaign. The northern part of the country has an alpine environment with beech, fir, and pine trees being very common. This region is also home to South Korea's native wildlife like the black bear and deer. Along the southern coast of the country the vegetation is tropical, and this is where South Korea grows its ginseng, an herb used extensively for medicinal purposes.

South Korea boasts 20 national parks, the most popular ones being Soraksan, Hallasan, and Chirisan parks.

❁ ECONOMY

Since South Korea is a very mountainous region, only 20 percent of the land is arable, and the agricultural sector employs approximately 12 percent of the total population. A large majority of the workforce is employed in the services sector. The main industries are electronics, automobile production, chemicals, shipbuilding, steel, textiles, clothing, and footwear.

South Korea trades mainly with the United States and Japan. It primarily exports textiles, clothing, electronic and electrical equipment, footwear, machinery, steel, ships, automobiles and automotive parts, rubber tires and tubes, plywood, and fishery products, while the main imports are machinery, petroleum and petroleum products, grains, transport equipment, raw materials, chemicals, raw cotton, and cereals.

A seaweed product called agar is one of the country's chief export items. It is a polymer obtained from the cell walls of some species of red algae or seaweeds. It is mainly used for microbiological purposes and also in jellies, ice creams, soups, and as a clarifying agent in brewing.

❁ LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

Korea has always been influenced by Chinese culture, and the Koreans have adopted many forms of Chinese art. Painting and sculpture are two well-developed forms of art in South Korea. The traditional music of South Korea resembles that of China and Japan, and the two main forms of music are chongak (entirely musical) and minsogak (the traditional folk music of South Korea). Drum dances are also very popular. Mugo is a lively court dance in which the participants wear drums around their necks while they dance.

In South Korea, the family is the most important part of life. The father is the head of the family, and he makes all the decisions. His prime responsibility is to provide food, clothing, and shelter. The home is regarded as a sacred space. When entering someone's house guests are expected to remove their shoes, and a place for the shoes is usually found near the entrance of the house.

The number four is considered unlucky in South Korea. Also writing someone's name in red ink is akin to saying that the person will die soon or has died. Exchanging gifts is very popular in South Korea, but people usually do not open the gifts in public.

❁ CUISINE

South Koreans have a simple cuisine and tastes. Their meals are usually well balanced and low in calories. Rice is the staple food and is cooked in a variety of ways. It is teamed with vegetables, which are either boiled or stir fried. No meal in South Korea is complete without kimchi. It is prepared by preserving an assortment of vegetables like cabbage, radish, or cucumber in a mixture of salt, chili peppers, and other ingredients.

Grilled fish or meats are also very popular. Pulgogi, or Korean barbecues, are thin slices of beef marinated in soy sauce, sesame oil, and other spices. South Korea's passion for canine cuisine has earned it a lot of flak from animal-lovers. However South Korean dog meat eaters feel that canine cuisine is a national custom, and the more painful the death of the dog, the tastier its meat is. Many Koreans feel eating dog meat also leads to virility and stamina. The practice actually originated due to a scarcity of food during its days as a colony under first China and then Japan.

Most dishes are served at room temperature, while some are boiling hot. The diners sit and eat at a low table, and all the dishes, except hot soups, are served together. Chopsticks and spoons are used for eating. South Korean chopsticks are made of metal instead of wood.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, with revelries that often begin the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). On New Year's Eve in South Korea, elaborate celebrations are held in the capital of Seoul, and everyone sings and dances all night. At the stroke of midnight, Seoul's night skies come alive with a spectacular display of fireworks as people wish each other well on this joyous occasion.

New Year's Day is also known as Sinjeong, and January 1 and January 2 are public holidays in South Korea.

❁ INDEPENDENCE MOVEMENT DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 1

On March 1, 1919, the Korean people initiated action to achieve independence from Japan. Japan had invaded Korea in 1910 and established its dominance in the region. Koreans were deprived of their basic rights and were brutally oppressed by the occupying forces. There was growing resentment against the Japanese forces and people began taking to the streets, demanding their freedom. On March 1, 1919, more than two million Koreans participated in a peaceful demonstration against Japan in Seoul. During this rally the Declaration of Independence was read at Pagoda Park in Seoul. In retaliation, the Japanese forces killed 23,000 Korean protestors and arrested thousands more for participating in the rally.

This historic day is observed mournfully in South Korea as Samiljeol (which means "three-one," the first day of the third month).

❁ ARBOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 5

This is a day dedicated to conserving and preserving the environment. During the Japanese occupation of South Korea, trees were cut indiscriminately and forests were devastated. Thus, after independence, the South Korean government launched a massive reforestation program according to which every South Korean must plant a tree on April 5.

The observance of Arbor Day, also called the Day of Trees, originated in the United States. On this day, people from all walks of life—teachers, students, workers, businessmen, and even political leaders—plant a tree and contribute toward achieving the dream of a greener South Korea.

❁ CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 5

South Korea celebrates Children's Day on May 5 every year. This holiday was instituted by children's book author Pang Chong-hwan in 1923 to instill a sense of national pride and independence among Korean children. The objective of the celebration is to emphasize a child's need for love, care, and understanding as well as to honor those adults who have

Fun Fact

Although kimchi is probably one of South Korea's best-known dishes, chili peppers were not introduced in Korea until the 17th century, and it may have been as long as 200 years before they were used to make kimchi.

Tae Kwon Do

The national sport of South Korea, and the best-known of its martial arts, is tae kwon do, recently added as a competitive sport in the Olympic Games. Tae kwon do combines combat techniques, athleticism, exercise, entertainment, and philosophy. In general, grappling and close contact do not figure in tae kwon do, in which the emphasis is on kicks including jump kicks, spinning kicks, shuffle/skip kicks, drop kicks, and various combinations of these. Tae means “to kick or destroy with the foot,” kwon means “to punch with the fist,” and do means “way” or “art,” so the name can be loosely translated as “the art of kicking and punching” or “the way of the foot and the fist.” A variety of tae kwon do styles exists, but all have in common an emphasis on disabling one’s opponent using high, far-reaching kicks executed from a mobile position.

helped make lives better for children in South Korea.

Children’s Day is celebrated with great joy and enthusiasm throughout South Korea. Some of the major highlights of the celebrations include a demonstration of ancient Korean martial arts (Tae-Kwon-do), parades, and free admission for children to movie theaters, visits to zoos, museums, and exhibits. Children receive gifts from their parents on this day, as well as from the stores they visit.

CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 17

On July 17, 1948, the independent Republic of Korea adopted its first constitution.

LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 15

This day commemorates the liberation of Korea from the occupying Japanese forces on August 15, 1945, as well as the inauguration of the Republic of South Korea on August 15, 1948. Japanese forces annexed Korea in 1910; since that time, Korea had been under Japanese domination. Koreans were treated brutally by the Japanese armed forces; dissent was ruthlessly silenced. Koreans remained unafraid and continued to oppose Japan’s occupation. In 1945, after the unconditional surrender of the Japanese forces in World War II, Korea was declared independent. However, the ideological differences between the communist north and the democratic south resulted in the division of Korea into North and South Korea in 1948.

On this day, South Koreans pay homage to those freedom fighters who were killed by the Japanese. It is a patriotic day filled with celebrations in the capital of Seoul. Carrying South Korean flags, people attend Liberation Day celebrations that are presided over by the president of the country. The main highlights of the festivities include a flag-raising ceremony, tributes to the fallen war heroes, and cultural events.

Since 2000, civic groups in North and South Korea have also been celebrating the holiday jointly. Pro-unification activists cross the border to take part in celebrations that include tours to historic sites, cultural events, and seminars addressing the issue of unification.

NATIONAL FOUNDATION DAY

Observed on: October 3

This day commemorates the founding of Korea in 2333 B.C.E. South Koreans believe that they are of heavenly origin and that they are descended from a legendary man-god named Tan-gun. On this day, a wide variety of cultural activities are planned throughout the country. At Mount Mani on the Kanghwa islands in South Korea, religious ceremonies are held at the Altar of Tan-gun, and people bring floral tributes to this mythical first Korean.

Observed on: First of the first month of the Korean lunar calendar (February of the Gregorian calendar) and 31st of the 12th month of the lunar calendar

Seollal, Lunar New Year’s Day, is the first day of the first month of the lunar calendar, the day of the second new Moon after the Winter Solstice, usually in early February of the Gregorian (Western) calendar. Seotdal Geumeum, New Year’s Eve, is celebrated on the 31st day of the 12th lunar month. South Koreans stay up all night and leave all their doors open so their ancestral spirits can come in. On New Year’s Eve, they eat mixed rice with vegetables (bibimbap), bean powder rice cakes (injeolmi), and traditional biscuits (hangwa).

South Koreans celebrate with family members since this day is dedicated to honoring ancestral spirits and strengthening family ties. To ward off evil spirits, straw shovels or rakes are placed at the doors of houses on the eve of Seollal. The next day, Koreans adorn themselves in their traditional dress—hanbok—and perform charye, the practice of waking early and setting a table to honor the past four generations of ancestors.

Ceremonial food is prepared and placed on the charye sang, or ceremonial table, in a particular order. Then, incense sticks are lit and family members take turns bowing before their ancestors. The eldest member of the family bows twice in front of the ancestors and then, after making a shallow bow, offers drink and food to the ancestral spirits. The rest of the family follows suit in order of seniority. Then the living members turn away from the offerings to allow the ancestral spirits to enjoy their food. After some time, the table is cleared.

The living members of the family show their respect toward their elders by performing sebae (a formal bow of respect) before all the elders of the family and wishing them bok, or good fortune, in the coming year. In return, the elders give money, gifts, and advice to the younger generation.

A traditional meal of ttok-guk (rice cake soup with thick beef broth) is served to the family members. South Koreans believe that in order to grow a year older one must consume ttok-guk on New Year's Day. Other popular foods eaten on the lunar new year are chapchae (noodles with meat and vegetables), yakshik (sticky sweet rice), pindaettok (bean pancakes), shike (rice punch), and sujonggwa (cinnamon-flavored persimmon punch). The new year period ends with the Lantern Festival, the 15th day of the first month.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: First full Moon day in May, except in a leap year when the festival is held in June

This day is the holiest day for all Buddhists. It marks Buddha's birthday, his day of enlightenment (nirvana), and also the day of his death. In South Korea, Buddhism is the dominant religion and this day is celebrated with great joy and devotion. People visit Buddhist temples to offer prayers.

The occasion is made memorable by music and chanting by devotees, which is inspired by Buddha's teachings and goes on throughout the day. In the evening, a lantern parade takes place all across South Korea. In this parade, people hold lanterns and walk through the streets in a peaceful manner. Also, the streets in Seoul are decorated with beautifully designed lotus-shaped lanterns.

❁ CHUSOK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Fifteenth day of the eighth month of the Korean lunar calendar (September of the Gregorian calendar)

Chusok, or the Harvest Full Moon Festival, is the second largest festival in South Korea. Chusok is also known as Han gah wee, which means "the great day that falls in the middle of the eighth month of the lunar year." On Chusok, a ceremony dedicated to ancestors called Charye is performed. This ritual involves preparing food from the new harvest and offering it to the ancestral spirits. After it is completed, Koreans visit the graves of their ancestors.

A traditional meal is also prepared on this day. One of the main dishes is shongpyun, crescent-shaped rice cakes stuffed with beans, chestnut paste, and sesame seeds. Other specialties are freshly picked fruit, toran-tang (taro soup), and song-i (mushrooms).

A number of cultural activities take place on Chusok. One of these is Kanggangsouwollae (an ancient circle dance performed by 10 or 20 women singing traditional folk songs). Another is talchum (dancers wearing masks perform to traditional folk songs).

Shamanism in Korea

Because so little land in Korea is arable, Korean shamanism, with its close connections to the seasonal cycle and farming activities, is no longer as widely practiced as it once was. Nevertheless, a number of shamanistic practices continue. The purpose of shamanism is to resolve human problems by mediating between humans and spirits. In Korea a shaman is known as a mudang, and women typically take on the intermediary role of shaman, performing a gut to seek the spirits' help.

A gut is a ritual in which a shaman asks the spirits to intervene in the situation for which someone has come seeking help. Wearing a colorful costume, the shaman sings and dances and offers a sacrifice to the spirits. During her performance of a gut the shaman will change her costume several times. There are large guts in which several shamans participate, usually on behalf of an entire village, and smaller regional guts, performed to ask for an abundant harvest (for farmers) or catch (for fishermen), initiation rites for shamans, and rituals performed to ease the soul's journey to the land of the dead.

and gifts are placed beneath the trees. South Korean Roman Catholics attend Midnight Mass in local churches and celebrate Jesus' birth by singing carols and devotional hymns.

On Christmas day, South Koreans throw special dinner parties and invite friends and family members to celebrate the spirit of Christmas and exchange gifts and greetings. They also stage plays based on the life and teachings of Jesus in various parts of the country.

❁ MUJU FIREFLY FESTIVAL

Observed in: Muju
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June

The Muju Firefly Festival is an annual event that takes place in the town of Muju in the month of June. Muju is a breeding ground of fireflies (insects that glow at night) and the local people have great respect for these insects. During this festival, bright lights are banned in the town of Muju in order to create an opportunity for fireflies to light up the region.

In order to catch the fireflies in action, platforms are created near the habitats of these incandescent insects to allow people to get a better view. Other important events of the festival include parades organized by the people of Muju and a special prayer session conducted in honor of the fireflies. Educational programs and awareness campaigns are also held to inform and educate people about the importance of fireflies and the role they can play in scientific research.

Fun Fact

A large number of fireflies are kept captive in huge tents so that children can complete their homework. Then the fireflies are released back into the wild.

❁ PUSAN CHAGALCHI FESTIVAL

Observed on: October

The Pusan Chagalchi Festival is an annual event that takes place during the month of October at the Chagalchi Fish Market in Pusan, South Korea. The Chagalchi market is the largest market in South Korea. After the Korean War, it came to be used exclusively for selling fish. Every year special celebrations are organized in the market in honor of the fishing community of the region. Some of the major highlights of the celebrations include: a Chagalchi cooking contest in which the wives of the fishermen participate, preparing special fish delicacies; annual parades in which people of the fishing community actively participate; and offerings to the sea goddess, Yeongdeungsin, who protects fishermen and provides abundant catches. Ceremonial rituals are performed to ensure the well-being of the fishermen as well as to pray for a good fishing season in the forthcoming year.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Special celebrations, known as paegil, take place on the 100th day after the birth of a child. Friends and family members are invited for a lavish meal. Traditionally, the first offering of soup and rice is made to the grandmother of the child. Also, to share the joy in the birth of the child, plates of rice cakes are sent to neighbors and friends who return the plates with money, rice (wishing the child a prosperous life), or a long thread (wishing the child a long and healthy life).

❁ MARRIAGE

Although young couples are allowed to date in South Korea, parental consent is required. Often, young men date women who have been chosen by their parents. The services of matchmakers are also crucial; they bring proposals to prospective brides for a negotiated fee.

In an earlier era, the groom would ride on his horse to the bride's house and present her with a pair of geese. Geese symbolize fidelity since they are known to mate for life. After the wedding, he would bring the bride to his parental house in a palanquin (a kind of covered litter).

In a traditional South Korean wedding, the bridal dress consists of chogori (a short jacket with long sleeves) with two long ribbons that are neatly tied, a chima (a high-waisted, full-length, wrap-around skirt), boat-shaped silk shoes, and white socks. The groom wears a chigori (jacket), paji (trousers tied with straps at the ankles), and a turumagi (overcoat). As in courtship, it is traditional to include a pair of geese or ducks in the wedding ceremony as a symbol of fidelity.

After exchanging wedding vows, the bride is formally introduced to her in-laws by the groom. His father might throw red dates on the bride to wish her good luck and fertility. A lavish reception is thrown in honor of the bride and groom, and the marriage is celebrated with singing, dancing, and dining.

❁ DEATH

It is traditional for Koreans to die at home rather than in a hospital. Those who die in a hospital cannot be returned home since it is considered bad luck to bring a dead body into the house. However, the bodies of those who die in their homes are kept inside the house so that others can pay their final respects. Moaning and wailing loudly is considered an accepted way of expressing grief and sorrow. It is imperative for the eldest son to sit beside the body of the deceased and express his grief outwardly for everyone to see. He must hold a cane tightly in his hand to demonstrate his need for emotional support after the loss of a loved one.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Prior to the 18th century the region of present-day Kuwait was scantily inhabited by nomadic Bedouin tribes. At that time the Arabs founded a town called "Kuwait." The current ruling dynasty was founded by Sabah abu Abdullah (1756–72), who established a sheikhdom. In the late 18th and early 19th centuries, the sheikhdom, nominally a province of the erstwhile Ottoman Empire, was frequently threatened by the Wahhabis. In 1897 Kuwait became a British protectorate. Finally in June, 1961, the British ended their protectorate, and Kuwait became an independent sheikhdom. Nevertheless in July 1961, the British stepped in to help with military power at the request of the sheikh, when Iraq claimed sovereignty over Kuwait. Later the British forces were replaced by detachments from the Arab League, of which Kuwait is a member. In October 1963, Iraq officially recognized the nation of Kuwait.

In 1961 Kuwait also became a founding member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). The country's oil revenues have been used to aid other Arab countries. Kuwait became a supporter of Palestinian causes. In 1981 Kuwait became a founding member of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC).

Kuwait backed Iraq during the eight year-long Iran-Iraq War, and because of this the country's oil industry suffered. In 1982 a Kuwaiti oil refinery and tankers in the Persian Gulf were attacked by Iran. There was an assassination attempt on Sheikh al Sabah in May 1985. In panic Kuwait sought U.S. protection for its oil tankers, since U.S. forces were patrolling the waters of the gulf between 1987 and 1988.

In 1989 Iraqi President Saddam Hussein accused Kuwait of flooding the international oil market and causing a cut in prices. On this pretext Iraq invaded Kuwait on August 2, 1990, and Saddam declared Kuwait annexed to Iraq. Native Kuwaitis, including the royal family, fled. The U. S.-led Western and Arab coalition forces expelled Iraqi forces from Kuwait. Unfortunately Iraqi forces devastated the country and set fire to Kuwaiti oil wells before retreating. Over 80 percent of the wells were destroyed or damaged, resulting in enormous environmental hazards. The sheikh returned to Kuwait from Saudi Arabia in March 1991.

In the aftermath of the war Kuwait concentrated on revamping and reconstructing its oil industry and the economy. Parliamentary elections in 1992 resulted in the victory of opposition candidates; despite promises of democratic reform, the al Sabah family continued to dominate the government. In October 1994, Iraq gathered elite troops along its border with Kuwait but removed them when Kuwait and the United States moved forces into the area. Fresh elections held in July 1999 witnessed the victory of Islamist and liberal candidates. In the July 2003, parliamentary elections Islamists won 42 percent of the seats, while liberals retained only a handful; government supporters won 28 percent of the seats. Kuwait took an important step toward greater democracy in 2005, when it extended the right to vote to women.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Roughly triangular in shape, Kuwait borders the Persian Gulf to the east. Its territory includes nine islands located in the gulf. To the south and west Kuwait shares a border with Saudi Arabia that is about 155 miles long. The third side of the triangle is 149 miles of controversial border to the north and west that Kuwait shares with Iraq.

Kuwait's most conspicuous geographic feature is Kuwait Bay, which indents the shoreline for about 25 miles, providing natural protection for the port of Kuwait.

Kuwait has a hot, dry desert climate. Rainfall varies from three to six inches or more in a year across the country. In summer, average daily high temperatures range from 107.6°F to 114.8°F. The summers are long and cruel, with frequent dust storms.

In the months of June and July northwesterly winds spray the cities with sand. In late summer, which is more humid, there are occasional thunderstorms. By November the cold winter weather sets in, with temperatures dropping to as low as 37°F at night, while the daytime temperature remains in the upper 80° range.

❁ ECONOMY

Kuwait is a virtual desert with a few fertile patches on the coast bordering the Persian Gulf. Agriculture is almost nonexistent. Prior to 1946 Kuwait's traditional exports were pearls and hides. However modern-day Kuwait can boast of possessing the third largest oil reserves in the world (after Saudi Arabia and Iraq). The petroleum industry accounts for more than 90 percent of Kuwait's export revenues. The country's major trading partners are the United States, Japan, the European Union (EU), and Singapore. Food, construction materials, vehicles, and clothing are its major imports.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In the Arabic language the word islam denotes submission. The word muslim signifies one who bows to God's will. Though the Islamic code of conduct that governs Kuwaiti lifestyle is not as stringent as Saudi Arabia's, it is not liberal either. The bulk of Kuwaitis are Sunni Muslims, but there is also a strong Shiite minority. The official language of Kuwait is Arabic, but English is widely spoken and understood.

The original inhabitants of Kuwait were the Bedouins—the archetypal Arabs who herd camels and travel across the desert in search of food. While their numbers have greatly dwindled, they have left a deep impact on the life and culture of the Kuwaitis. This is reflected in the cuisine as well as handicrafts and various types of garments made from sheep's wool, hand dyed, and then skillfully woven on Bedouin looms called al-sadu.

❁ CUISINE

In Kuwait one may find many dishes common throughout the Middle East. Best known among them is humus, cooked chickpeas ground into a paste and mixed with garlic and lemon. Fuul, a paste made from fava beans, garlic, and lemon, is usually served swimming in oil. Felafel, deep-fried balls of chickpea paste with spices, served on a piece of kbobz (Arabic flat bread) with pickled vegetables or tomato, is also popular. Since bread is the pivotal point of all Arabic meals and is eaten with almost everything, it is familiarly called aish, which means “life” in Arabic. Other commonplace dishes are chicken, kebabs, and meat or vegetable stews.

In the tabeehb (Bedouin) style of cooking, the whole meal is cooked in a single large pot over charcoal. Meat or fish, vegetables, and spices are first deep fried in oils in open pots. Rice or wheat and water are then added, and the pot is covered and left to simmer for some time. This method is still used in many Kuwaiti homes to make meat porridges, as well as prawn and vegetable dishes.

The second method known as marag is more complicated. Here too, the meal is cooked in a large pot, but the ingredients are first fried or boiled separately, before being combined and steamed together. Various kinds of fish and meat marags are very popular both in homes and public eateries. An outstanding feature of Kuwait is the use of babarat, a permutation and combination of cardamom, cinnamon, cloves, coriander, cumin, ginger, nutmeg, black pepper, and paprika.

integrated into the local culture. Kuwaitis spend the day enjoying dance and music performances, as well as gathering with friends and family to feast and party. New Year's is a public holiday in Kuwait with schools, government offices, and many businesses closed.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February 25

This day commemorates the emergence of Kuwait as an independent nation in 1961. In the decades since, the day has come to be associated with national and civic celebrations, including public meetings, get-togethers, displays of fireworks, and a pervasive spirit of fellowship. Public buildings are brilliantly illuminated for the occasion. Kuwaiti's young and old wear their national costumes to participate in the festivities. This is a public holiday in Kuwait.

❁ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February 26

This day marks the liberation of Kuwait on February 26, 1991, by a United States-led multi-national force, ending seven months of Iraqi occupation. Since then this occasion is observed every year with public gatherings and get-togethers. This day has a poignant touch to it as the Kuwaitis remember and honor the loyal citizens who lost their lives fighting Iraqi occupation. This is a public holiday in Kuwait.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

On this day Muslims remember Ibrahim's (Abraham's) unflinching faith in God evidenced by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because the Almighty commanded him to do so. Sacred texts explain that Abraham was spared the sacrifice of his son and a ram was offered in his place. In Kuwait on this day, also known as Eid-al-Zuha, Bakr-Eid, it is mandatory for each family that can afford it to sacrifice a sheep, goat, ram, or cattle in the name of God; this meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival, the devout Muslims may, if they so desire, undertake a hajj or pilgrimage to Mecca—the bastion of Islamic faith.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic calendar is based on the revolutions of the Moon. Thus the year is only 354 days long. Relative to the Western calendar, it loses 11 days every year. The Islamic New Year is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month.

Unlike New Year celebrations associated with other calendars, the beginning of the Islamic New Year is somber. In Kuwait Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. A major part of the holiday is devoted to the recounting of the story of the Hegira—Muhammad’s flight from Medina to Mecca. Muslims also reflect on the passage of time and their own mortality on New Year’s Day.

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic Calendar

This day celebrates the birthday of the Prophet Muhammad in 570 C.E. It is often called Mawlid an-Nabi and is celebrated on the 12th day of Rabbi al-awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar. On this day Muslims focus on the life and teachings of Muhammad. They sing songs and utter special prayers. They also recollect their prophet’s qualities of mercy and forgiveness and often give alms to the poor.

❁ ASCENSION OF THE PROPHET

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twenty-seventh of Rajab, the seventh month of the Islamic calendar

This is a very special night for the followers of Islam. The official name of the holiday is Laylat Al-Isra wa Al-Miraj, which means “the night journey and ascension.” The holiday reflects the Muslim belief that the Prophet Muhammad went from Mecca to Jerusalem, ascended into the seven heavens, and returned, all in the course of a single night. During his sojourn in the seven heavens, Muhammad was commanded to establish the five daily prayers (namaaz). He is also believed to have met luminaries such as Abraham, Moses, Aaron, Adam, Archangel Gabriel, and Jesus. On this day devout Muslims in Kuwait gather in mosques or at one another’s homes and listen to the story of Muhammad’s journey. They share food and sweets to celebrate the event.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

This Muslim holiday marks the celebration at the end of the month-long, dawn-to-dusk fasting during the month of Ramadan. Ramadan is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar because it was during this month that the Prophet Muhammad observed austerity and fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him. Kuwaitis start the day by putting on new clothes and participating in morning prayer at mosques. This is followed by social visits, the exchange of greetings and gifts, and the enjoyment of delicacies and sweets, specially prepared on this occasion.

The highlights of this event include shopping, carnivals, nature walks, raffles, and contests.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Since earliest times, Muslims have regarded children as tokens of Allah’s infinite compassion and benevolence. Kuwaitis share in this tradition. As soon as is possible after the birth, a Kuwaiti baby is thoroughly washed in order to remove all biological impurities. According to Islamic tenets the first sound that a baby ought to hear is the sacred name of Allah. The name has to be customarily uttered by its father (or a male relative). Consequently the male relative whispers the call to prayer or adban first into the child’s right ear and then into its left. The underlying idea is to make the child aware of Allah’s omnipresence and his infinite power over the lives of mortals.

When the child is between the ages of three days and seven days, its head is shaved to remove the peri-natal impurities. This ceremony is known as the aqiqab, and it symbolizes purging of misfortunes, evil, and dross, so that the child can embark on a good and trouble-free life.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Circumcision is not mentioned in the Koran, but Muslims everywhere regard it as a sine qua non. Hadith records it as a practice enjoined by all the prophets.

Muslim boys generally undergo circumcision between the ages of 10 and 12, although it has been known to take place as early as the seventh day after birth. When done later, it assumes the role of a puberty rite, separating the boy from childhood and introducing him to a new status. In many Muslim families in Kuwait, there is a good deal of festivity, music, special foods, and many guests present on this occasion.

❁ MARRIAGES

It is universally accepted that Islamic juristic schools allow a Muslim man to marry a Jewish or Christian woman; but they prohibit a Muslim woman from marrying a non-Muslim man. Moreover, Shia men are forbidden from marrying their ascendants, descendants, the ascendants or descendants of their wives, or the wives of their ascendants or descendants.

In Kuwait as in other Islamic nations, Muslim marriages are arranged by both sets of parents. However according to Islamic tenets, both the individuals (the bride and the groom) are free to refuse the spouse that has been selected for them. Prior to the actual wedding the two families involved decide on a specific amount of money or articles in kind that the groom's family must give the bride. This sum of money is in reality a security deposit for the bride in case the marriage breaks up.

After the couple has unofficially agreed to marry, they get engaged in an Islamic court under Islamic law. Both names are registered, usually by two males or by two females and a male. (The accepted formula is that two females equal one male.) Thereafter the bride and groom are allowed to interact with each other on a limited basis. However in certain extremely old-fashioned Bedouin families, the bridegroom may not see the face of his wife-to-be until after they are married.

The actual marriage is testified to and legalized in a similar manner. As in other Islamic societies weddings take place in the home of the bride. The rites are conducted by an imam or qazi or mullah, who also leads the prayers in the mosque.

The bride and the bridegroom sit in separate rooms during the wedding ceremony. Two guests—one from the bride's family and one from the groom's family—witness the bride's consent for marriage and inform the imam. The ceremony begins with the imam reciting relevant passages from the Holy Koran. The imam then speaks about the duties of marriage and asks the bridegroom if he agrees to the marriage. Once the bridegroom has agreed to the marriage, the bride, the bridegroom, and the two witnesses sign a marriage contract that confirms their agreement. This is traditionally followed by a sumptuous wedding banquet. In accordance with tradition the male and female family members often conduct their celebrations completely separately, and rarely do the two fraternize.

The Koran says that a man may marry as many as four women but only if he can treat them all equally. If a marriage does not work out, the Koran says that couples may get divorced but only as a last resort. First the couple must try to resolve its problems. If this does not work, each spouse must choose a friend or relative for counseling. If this fails, they must wait for four months before they can end their marriage.

❁ DEATH

All the major religions of the world focus on the transitory quality of human life. Since death is unpredictable and can happen at any time, Islam exhorts devout Muslims to always be prepared for the inevitable. When an individual is dying, he or she is encouraged to recite and declare his or her faith.

Muslims are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. In Kuwait (as in all Islamic societies), it is customary for Muslims to ritually wash the dead body, perfume it, and drape it in a fresh new white cloth before burial. The dead person's face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs straightened out, and the mouth and eyes closed.

The friends, relatives, and acquaintances of a deceased person come together for prayers.

Then the corpse is solemnly carried to the graveyard. Religious laws forbid Muslim women from attending the burials of their loved ones. The underlying belief is that women are frail and therefore might easily break down. However, some women do flout this rule. Those attending the funeral form a double line facing each other, and the bier is passed on the shoulders along this line toward the grave. In the case of a child the bier is carried in the arms of a relative. The wrapped body is customarily laid directly at the bottom of the grave, on its right side with its face turned toward Mecca. Although graves are dug by professional gravediggers, the task of filling it with earth is carried out by the relatives (and all those present) who throw handfuls of dust into the grave as a token of solidarity and remembrance.

Guests at funerals cover their heads as a mark of respect to the deceased. The grave is sealed and then marked by a small elevation to differentiate it from the level ground nearby.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Human habitation in present-day Kyrgyzstan goes back hundreds of thousands of years, and archaeologists have unearthed tools and excavated caves. The Kyrgyz are thought originally to have inhabited the valley of the Yenisei River (a river originating in Siberia).

Petroglyphs (designs etched on rocks) and other traces of material culture make it possible to reconstruct the lives of the early inhabitants of Kyrgyzstan, a land which has sometimes been referred to as the "Pearl of Central Asia." The first traces of humans have been dated to the Paleolithic Ashel epoch (400,000–100,000 years ago). Artifacts and relics belonging to the Middle Paleolithic Mousterian epoch (100,000–40,000 years ago), the Upper Paleolithic (40,000–12,000 years ago), and Mesolithic (10,000–6,000 years ago) indicate fairly continuous human occupation of this Central Asian region, and Neolithic (6000–4000 B.C.E.) tools and weapons have been found throughout the area. Some of the most significant sites include Issyk-Kul, Tien Shan, as well as the Chu, Talas, Alai, and Ketmentyobin valleys.

During the Bronze Age (between 4,000 and 3,000 years ago) herders and farming tribes populated the Kyrgyz lands, while other farming tribes lived in the valleys of southern Kyrgyzstan. The relics of this period include sepulchers, items relating to daily life, and the decorations found in them. More than 2,200 years ago the first recorded reference to the Kyrgyz groups was made by a Chinese emperor. Around 1,000 written references concerning the inhabitants of Kyrgyzstan occur in the Avesta, the sacred writings of Zoroastrianism (written in the oldest attested Old Persian, which at that time had not diverged significantly from Sanskrit, to which it is related), where the inhabitants are called Suks. Herodotus (c. 484–d. between 430–20), writing around 450 B.C.E., called them "Scythians," making it likely that these people can be identified with the nomadic Sauromatian and Sarmatian cultures of 600–200, in which women excelled at the art of war. The archaeological sites of the Suk epoch are represented by burial mounds (kurgans) and stone inscriptions (petroglyphs). The most impressive petroglyphs, which depict animals and daily life among the Suk, have been found in the Issyk-Kul Basin, the Ketmentyobin Valley, and Saimaly-Tash Virgin Land. The kurgans contain things for everyday life, arms, harnesses, and decorations. The Suks bred cattle, worshipped fire, and revered heavenly bodies. They formed a tribal union, but it had disintegrated by the third century.

Between the third century B.C.E. and the sixth century C.E., the Usun (or Kushan), also nomadic cattle breeders, moved in from what is now Afghanistan and settled in the region; their capital was located on the southern coast of the Issyk-Kul lake. During this period trade relations between tribes developed, and a caravan trail developed across Kyrgyzstan, making commerce between the West and East possible. (In Europe this way was named the “Great Silk Road.”) Trade attracted other nomadic tribes to the region, and the resulting wars had destroyed the Usun confederation by the middle of the first century C.E.

In the fifth and sixth centuries Nestorian Christian missionaries first introduced Christianity to the peoples of Central Asia. For the next five centuries or so the Nestorian Church remained conspicuous in the region. Subsequently the role of the church declined, due to the Mongol invasion led by Genghis Khan (c. 1162–1227), though the great Mongol conqueror Hulegu (c. 1217–c. 65), a grandson of Genghis Khan, later acted favorably toward the Nestorians. Formerly known as the Kara (“black”) Kyrgyz to distinguish them from the Kazakhs (who at one time also called themselves Kirghiz or Kyrgyz), the Kyrgyz migrated to Kyrgyzstan around the 17th century. The area came under the rule of the Kokand Khanate in the 19th century and was gradually annexed by Russia between 1855 and 1876.

The nomadic Kyrgyz resisted being conscripted into the czarist (imperial Russian) army in 1916 and also fought the establishment of Bolshevik (pre-Communist) control from 1917 to 1921. As a result of these wars a famine broke out in the country during 1921–22 in which more than 500,000 Kyrgyz died. The area was knitted into the Kara-Kirghiz Autonomous Region within the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic in 1924. Kyrgyzstan became an autonomous republic in 1926 and a constituent republic in 1936.

In 1990 Askar Akayev (b. 1944), president of the Republic’s Academy of Sciences and a non-Communist, was elected president by the legislature. After warding off an attempted coup in 1991 the government declared Kyrgyzstan independent of the former USSR. Later Kyrgyzstan was incorporated into the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), an association of former Soviet republics, and a new constitution was approved.

Akayev, who retained his presidential position, fostered friendly ties with China and other neighboring countries and launched an ambitious program of free-market reforms. He retained his post in the 1995 elections, which were denounced by opposition leaders. In the same year Kyrgyzstan, along with Belarus and Kazakhstan, signed a pact with Russia to ensure mutual close economic cooperation. In 1996 a referendum on amending the constitution to increase the presidency’s powers went Akayev’s way, but he still had to contend with many

The Nestorian Church

Nestorius (c. 386–c. 451) was a pupil of Theodore of Mopsuestia (c. 350–428; a lifelong friend of St. John Chrysostom, c. 347–407) in Antioch, Syria, and later became patriarch of Constantinople. Nestorians questioned the divinity of Christ, which made them heretics according to Roman and other Orthodox Christian sects. Nestorius argued that God could never have been a helpless child or have suffered on the Cross during Crucifixion. He preached against the use of the title “Mother of God” (Theotokos) for the Virgin Mary, calling her instead Mother of Christ (Christotokos). Nestorius’s opponents accused him of dividing Christ into two persons: God the Word and Jesus the man. Nestorius was opposed by Cyril of Alexandria (827–69) and finally condemned at the Council of Ephesus in 431 C.E., which proclaimed the oneness of Christ and affirmed that the Virgin Mary was, indeed, the Mother of God. In response to this condemnation, the Assyrian Church of the East formed, splitting from the Byzantine Church. The Assyrian Church had many zealous missionaries who traveled and preached throughout Persia and Central, and East Asia in the seventh and eighth centuries. “Nestorian” Christianity had reached China by 635. Its relics are present in Chinese cities such as Xian. About the same time Nestorian Christianity penetrated into Mongolia, eventually reaching Korea. The great 13th-century Mongol conqueror Hulegu (c. 1217–c. 65), the grandson of Genghis Khan (c. 1162–1227), had a Nestorian mother, was educated by a Nestorian Christian priest, and had a Nestorian as his principal wife. Though never a convert himself, Hulegu became a champion to Nestorian Christians while being a scourge to Middle Eastern and Central Asian Muslims.

problems. For instance in 1999 Islamic militants seized several towns near the border with Tajikistan (where a civil war had begun in 1992). In 2000 Kyrgyzstan forces fought Uzbek guerrillas based in Tajikistan that had infiltrated into the Fergana Valley. Akayev was reelected president in October 2000 in a contest marred by alleged corruption. In February 2003 a referendum approved constitutional changes and affirmed Akayev's term in office.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The climate of Kyrgyzstan is influenced chiefly by the mountains and its position almost in the middle of the Eurasian landmass. Although the mountains collect clouds and tend to block the sunlight, especially in the narrow valleys, the country is by and large sunny, receiving nearly 2,900 hours of sunlight per year in some areas. The temperatures vary greatly from place to place. In January the warmest average temperature, 25°F, occurs in the city of Osh and around Lake Ysyk Köl ("hot lake" in Kyrgyz), located in eastern Kyrgyzstan in the Alatau Mountains. At an altitude of 5,300 feet and with an area of about 2,400 square miles, it is one of the largest mountain lakes in the world. It reaches a depth of 2,303 feet, is slightly saline, and does not freeze in winter.

The coldest temperatures are in the mountain valleys, where they fall to -22°F and sometimes lower. The average temperature in July varies from 81°F in the subtropical Fergana Valley, where the record high is 111°F, to a low of 14°F on the highest mountain peaks. Annual precipitation varies from 79 inches in the mountains above the Fergana Valley to less than 4 inches per year on the west bank of Ysyk-Köl.

Kyrgyzstan is located at the junction of two major mountain systems of Central Asia (the Tien Shan and the Pamirs). The Trans-Alai Range, which is the northernmost part of the Pamirs, forms part of Kyrgyzstan's southern border with Tajikistan. The highest peak in Kyrgyzstan is Pik Pobeda (24,406 feet) which is part of the Tien Shan range. The Naryn River, Kyrgyzstan's largest, originates in the mountains of the northeast and flows westward through the middle of the country. Flowing through the Fergana Valley, it crosses into Uzbekistan, where it joins with another river to form the Syr Darya, one of Central Asia's principal rivers. The Chu River in northern Kyrgyzstan flows northward into southern Kazakhstan.

❁ ECONOMY

Kyrgyzstan is a poor, largely agricultural country. It has vast rich pastures ideally suited for rearing goats, sheep, cattle, and horses. Cotton, potatoes, sugar beets, tobacco, vegetables, fruit, and grapes are the main crops; sericulture (the rearing of silkworms for the production of raw silk) is also practiced. The Kyrgyz have traditionally been masters of wood carving, carpet weaving, and jewelry making. Kyrgyzstan's terrain has vast deposits of antimony, gold, molybdenum, tin, coal, tungsten, mercury, uranium, petroleum, and natural gas. The country's industries include food processing, sugar refining, nonferrous metallurgy, as well as the manufacture of agricultural machinery, textiles, building materials, appliances, furniture, and electric motors. Kyrgyzstan's leading exports are cotton, wool, meat, tobacco, metals (particularly gold, mercury, uranium, and steel), hydropower, and machinery; its chief imports

Manas

The central plot of the epic Manas, thought to be about 1,000 years old, unfolds around historic events in the history of the Kyrgyz people from ancient times into the 18th century. The epic describes the different features, ideas, customs, and traditions of the Kyrgyz during different eras, but it is also a record of every aspect of the people's daily life, their social, economic, and political situation, as well as their relations with other countries and their struggle for independence. The Manas has been compared to Homer's great works, The Iliad and The Odyssey, because of its historical sweep and the grandeur of its language.

Manas, the longest epic poem in the world, was passed down orally from one generation to the next by manaschy, the storytellers of the Kyrgyz people. It was not written down until the 19th century, but about 60 different versions are known to exist. The poem has three parts. At the center of the story stands batyr-khan Manas, the legendary leader of the Kyrgyz people who led them in their struggle against various invaders. The first part of the trilogy describes his courage and the feats he performed on behalf of the Kyrgyz. The second part, Semetey, narrates the life and deeds of Manas's son Semetey, while the third part revolves around the deeds of Seitek, the son of Semetey, who realizes the visions shared by his father and grandfather.

In the Talas Valley there are many relics associated with the Manas including what is said to be his mausoleum, which was built in the 14th century. Other relics found in the Talas Valley are linked to other events and protagonists of the epic. For example a camp once occupied by Manas's army where his son Semetey is believed to have been born, the plane tree of Kanikey, Manas's wife, and Chachikey's gorge. Chachikey was the wife of Semetey.

include grain, lumber, industrial products, ferrous metals, and fuel. The main trading partners are other former Soviet republics and China. In 1998 Kyrgyzstan became the first former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization (WTO).

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Kyrgyz are predominantly a Sunni Muslim, Turkic-speaking pastoral people, though the country includes a variety of minorities, including Russians,

Uzbeks, Ukrainians, and Germans. About two-thirds of the population lives in rural areas. The Kyrgyz people place great importance on education. The Kyrgyz State National University was established in 1951, and the Kyrgyzstan Academy of Sciences in 1954; more than 20 universities had been opened in the country by the 1990s. Central Asia's composite culture (including that of Kyrgyzstan) has a rich repertoire of songs, poems, and stories told by wandering minstrels, known as akyn. The Kyrgyz are also famous for an entire cycle of oral legends, at 500,000 lines longer than any other comparable epic poem, about a heroic figure named Manas.

Traditionally the Kyrgyz are a very hospitable people. If a Kyrgyz family invites someone for a meal, then the guest is supposed to bring a small gift such as fruit or flowers. Shoes are to be taken off before entering a house. The hosts and the guests sit around the holiday table, or dastarkhan, with their feet either to the side or away from the dastarkhan. Even if someone drops by unexpectedly, the Kyrgyz women are expected to “whip up” a tasty meal to feed everyone.

Food is eaten only with the right hand, as is the custom in countries that lack bathrooms. At the end of a meal it is customary for people to bring both hands up to their face and drag them down as if washing the face, while uttering “omin” (the Muslim equivalent of “amen”). In many households people freely partake of alcoholic drinks (except in certain extremely orthodox Muslim families).

✿ CUISINE

Meat (mainly mutton or horse meat) is central to Kyrgyz cooking because the nomadic way of life provided no opportunity for cultivating fruits and vegetables. The meals are served on a dastarkhan, a large cloth laid out on the ground around which the people sit. One of the outstanding features of Kyrgyz cuisine is that dishes should preserve their taste and appearance. For example there are hardly any dishes made with puréed, minced, or chopped meat.

Also Kyrgyz dishes tend to have a plain taste; sauces and spices are used only in small quantities. In fact sauces are intended only to bring out the taste of the dish, not to change it.

Some of the principal dishes are shashliks, or kebabs—meat cubes on skewers cooked over burning embers. The meat is usually mutton, beef, chicken, or liver. The meat is either freshly sliced or marinated overnight. Shashlik is usually served with a sprinkling of raw onion, vinegar, and lepeshki (round pizzalike breads made with eggs, flour, sour cream, milk, salt, almonds, and so on). Oromo (“roulade”) may be prepared either with meat or with vegetables. Potatoes, onions, and carrots are shredded and spread onto a mat of rolled-out pastry, which is then rolled into a roulade and steamed in a special pan called a kazgun. Plov is rice mixed with boiled or fried meat, onions, carrots, and sometimes raisins, all cooked in a semihemispherical metal vessel called a kazan (like a wok) over a fire. Ashlan-foo is a spicy dish made with cold noodles, jelly, vinegar, and eggs. Pirojki (pierogi, or dumpling) is flat dough filled with meat, potatoes, and cabbage, which is sold by street sellers. Tea is drunk usually without milk. Despite their Muslim heritage, most Kyrgyz drink alcohol, at least with guests. Another popular drink is koumiss, a mildly intoxicating drink made of fermented mares' milk. (It is available only in spring and summer, when mares are foaling.) Bozo, a thick, yeasty concoction made from fermented millet, is available year-round.

✿ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Though the bulk of the population in Kyrgyzstan adheres to Islam, there is no official or state religion. The Kyrgyz populace is quite secular in its outlook, and the Gregorian celebrations associated with New Year's Day on January 1 are popular in Kyrgyzstan. Orthodox Christians decorate Christmas trees in their homes, since Orthodox Christmas is just around the corner. Fireworks displays at midnight on New Year's Eve usher in the new year. People enjoy parties, feasts, and get-togethers. This is a public holiday in Kazakhstan.

✿ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

This holiday honors women, celebrates their social contributions, and advocates justice and equality for women worldwide. On International Women's Day in Kyrgyzstan, the streets are decorated with flowers. The men offer flowers and gifts to the women in their lives and take charge of running the household for this day.

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 21

Navruz, also called Nowruz, Norouz, or the Persian New Year, is the most revered holiday in the greater Persian world because it begins the Persian year. It occurs on the spring equinox and celebrates the renewal of nature after the cold days of winter. Navruz was an ancient festival of Sun worship practiced by the inhabitants of Mesopotamia, who were well aware that nothing could grow on Earth without sunlight. Therefore at the beginning of spring the people paid homage to the Sun, lighting fires to banish winter and welcome the fragrant spring season.

This festival, whose name Navruz literally means “new day,” is a popular religious holiday in Kyrgyzstan. On March 21, Kyrgyz households fumigate their homes with smoke made by burning archa (mountain juniper) twigs, whose smoke is believed to drive away evil spirits. The main dishes prepared on this occasion are pilaf, shurpa (boiled mutton), and kok-samsa (pies filled with spring greens and the young sprouts of steppe grasses). Traditionally people attempt to load their tables (dastarkban) with as many dishes and sweetmeats as possible, in the hope of attracting prosperity and plenty in the coming year. The holiday is marked by national singing and storytelling contests, as well as horseback combats and competitions.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers’ Day, to celebrate the important role played by workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

This day is very important in Kyrgyzstan, once part of the former USSR, a Communist nation ruled by workers, in theory if not in practice. Labor Day is a public holiday in Kyrgyzstan, and the public takes this opportunity to honor and show their gratitude to workers. The day is marked by parades, official speeches, and labor meetings.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 5

This day commemorates the adoption of the constitution of Kyrgyzstan in 1993, an important occasion for the Kyrgyz people. It is a public holiday in Kyrgyzstan, marked by street festivals and celebrations.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 31

This day celebrates Kyrgyzstan’s achievement of independence from the former Soviet Union. This is an official holiday in Kyrgyzstan, celebrated with flag-raising ceremonies, public speeches, and parades.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar (January of the Gregorian calendar)

The festival of Eid al-Adha, also called the Feast of Sacrifice or Kurban Ait, commemorates Ibrahim’s (Abraham’s) unflinching faith in God as shown by his willingness to sacrifice his young son just because the Almighty commanded him to do so. Ibrahim’s son was spared, and a ram was provided to be sacrificed in his stead. On this day, therefore, each Muslim family in Kyrgyzstan that can afford to is expected to sacrifice a sheep, goat, ram, or cattle in the name of God. This meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor. During this entire month devout Muslims may, if they are physically and financially capable of doing so, undertake the hajj or required pilgrimage to Mecca, the holy city of Muslims.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar (November–December of the Gregorian calendar)

Eid al-Fitr, also called the Feast of Fast-Breaking or Orozo-Ait, celebrates the end of the fasting month of Ramadan. Ramadan is considered the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. It was during this month that Muhammad observed austerity and fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him. The Muslims in Kyrgyzstan acknowledge this day by first taking part in morning prayers, generally at the local mosque. This is followed by social visits, exchanges of greetings and gifts, and enjoying delicacies prepared especially for this occasion. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6–7

Christmas commemorates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe to be the Messiah promised in the Old Testament. The Russian Orthodox Church (which has a sizable following in Kyrgyzstan) celebrates Christmas on January 7. The Orthodox Church calculates Christmas using the Julian calendar and so celebrates it on January 7. On this day the Russian Orthodox Christians in Kyrgyzstan attend prayer services in local churches and exchange greetings and gifts with their family and friends. They also prepare and partake of a festive midday meal. The counterpart of Santa Claus, known as Grandfather Frost since the former USSR banned all religious observances, is believed to bring gifts for the children on Christmas.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

There are several unique traditions associated with the birth of a child in Kyrgyzstan. To introduce the child to the community, the parents provide a huge feast called Djengek Toi, held to celebrate the child's birth, and invite neighbors, friends, and relatives to see the newborn for the first time. This tradition is known as koroonduk. The parents slaughter a sheep and set out great quantities of food for everyone. Immediately after children are born, they are bathed and fed; a bit of melted butter is placed in the baby's mouth. This custom is known as oozantuu ("feeding"). Following this the remaining melted butter is mixed with sugar and oatmeal and added to the food prepared for the feast. It is customary for the invited guests to give money to the parents for the child.

Another interesting custom is known as Tyshu Kussu, or Cutting the Binds. After a baby has taken its first steps, its feet are tied with a black-and-white string. Then a race is held among the young children who have been invited for the occasion. The child who wins the race is allowed to cut the baby's strings. Once the baby's feet have been freed, the Kyrgyzstani believe the child will live a healthy life.

Perhaps the most significant Kyrgyzstani tradition connected with birth is how the child is named. According to sharia (Muslim code of law), a newborn's name must be announced loudly to everyone gathered for the toi (feast), a ritual called asan chakyruu. Once a child has been named Kyrgyzstani Muslims believe that, if a child's name is changed, Allah's blessings will go to other children with the same name. Although naming a newborn by asan chakyruu is still thought to be the right way of doing this, more recently babies are being named in gatherings of close relatives.

Men in Kyrgyzstan have been kidnapping women for a long time, with the willing assistance of their family and friends, including the women, and forcing them into marriage. The custom is called ala kachuu, which means "grab and run," and that is exactly what is done. The tradition has been illegal for years, first under the former Soviet Union and more recently under the 1994 Kyrgyz criminal code, but the law is rarely enforced. Such abductions are common, and more than half the married women in Kyrgyzstan were forced into marriage. While Kyrgyz men defend their actions by claiming to abduct women they love, if they cannot find a woman who returns their affection they roam the streets until they find a woman they can grab. In Kyrgyzstan the phrase that some might translate as meaning "marriage," kelin aluu, actually means "the marriage of the son." The woman does not figure importantly in the process.

Technically a kidnapping groom is still obligated to pay the kalym (bride-price) to the girl's family, usually livestock (sheep, horses, cattle), as well as other useful articles. Sometimes the bride-price can be as expensive as five horses, depending on her family's financial and social status. But the abductions are often rationalized as a way of avoiding this payment. Kyrgyz men say they snatch women because it is easier than courtship and cheaper than paying the standard bride-price, which can be as much as $800 cash, plus a cow. However one Kyrgyzstani man admitted to what may be closer to the truth of the matter and the most important reason for the longevity of this custom: “Men steal women to show that they are men.”

When an abducted woman arrives in her new husband's home, she is met by her future in-laws, specifically, the women, who try to calm her and start immediately trying to place a white shawl on her head. The abducted woman is taken to a room set aside in the house in which one corner has been curtained off (koshego), and this is where most of the struggling occurs as the man's female relatives wrestle and argue with her, still trying to get the shawl on her head. This activity may go for three or four days, but eventually 80 percent of the women finally give in, often at the urging of their own parents. Once that shawl (jooluk) has been successfully placed on her head, the woman's options have run out, no matter how long or how fiercely she resisted. The shawl symbolizes her submission. If all has gone well (about 20 percent of time it does not), the marriage rites are followed by the Otko Kirgizish, initiation into the family hearth. Family members invite the young couple to the hearth, and the young wife becomes a part of the family after she puts some grease into the pot.

The 20 percent who manage to escape without being forced into submission leave the house as tainted women, because they have refused the family's “generosity.”

❁ DEATH

Before a corpse can be buried, it must be ritually purified in accordance with the Islamic law of sharia, sookko kiruu (“washing the body”). The body must be washed twice. First the three closest relatives of the deceased wash the corpse. This ritual is called mayram suuga aluu, “the last purifying washing.” Next another seven family members wash the body again in a ritual called suuga aluu, “washing the body.” To protect themselves against contamination, they wear a kerchief over their mouths and wear gloves made from white cloth. While this procedure is performed, an imam makes a shroud from white cloth (kepin), which he stitches using white needles.

The deceased is then placed on the left side of the yurt if it is a man, and on the right side if it is a woman. Then the relatives and friends of the deceased stay up all night discussing the individual's values and what he or she did during his or her lifetime. The next day the women sing a song of mourning (koshok) in which the person's virtues are celebrated. On the third day only men carry the body to the grave and bury it because women are considered too delicate to attend the actual burial. Those who performed the ritual cleansing, and other relatives are given the dead person's clothes, but they must read the Koran before they can wear them.

While the men are burying the body, the women cook a special meal, called kara ash (“black dinner”), for the men and other people who came to mourn with them. A horse is slaughtered for this occasion, and its meat is served. The meal is followed by readings from the Koran. Forty days after the person's death another feast is prepared, but this time a sheep is killed. The spouse of the dead person is expected to mourn during this period.

A year after death a monument can be set up for the person, and the relatives of the deceased provide a dinner every day for a week. This feeding is done to satisfy the dead person's soul. Before the guests sit down to eat, the Koran is read and the female relatives sing koshok again. This final mourning ritual is called ash.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

According to historians, the ancestors of the present-day Lao people moved into the region of modern Laos from the southern parts of China starting in the eighth century. In the 14th century the first Laotian state came into being. It became famous as the Lan Xang kingdom, which ruled the territory of Laos until it eventually split into three separate kingdoms in the early 18th century.

The three kingdoms subsequently came under the rule of Siam (modern Thailand). In 1893 they were incorporated into a French protectorate and became a part of the union of French Indochina. A strong nationalist movement developed in the region during World War II, but France reestablished control, giving the king of Luang partial autonomy in 1949, and then, under the influence of the Viet Minh rebellion in Vietnam, granted Laos full-fledged independence within the French Union in 1950.

In 1951 Prince Souphanouvong (1909–95), a son of the vice-king of Luang Prabang, founded the Pathet Lao, the Laotian branch of a Communist independence movement that originated in North Vietnam.

Together with the Viet Minh forces, the Pathet Lao attacked central Laos, provoking a civil war. In accordance with the Geneva Agreement of 1954 and an armistice of 1955, authority over two of the northern provinces of Laos was transferred to the Pathet Lao, while the monarchy remained in control in the rest of the country. The Paris agreement of December 29, 1954, gave the kingdom full sovereignty. In 1957 Souphanouvong and his half-brother Prince Souvanna Phouma (1901–84), the royal premier, agreed to the idea of establishing a unified government. Pathet Lao officials joined the government, and its forces were integrated into the royal army. In 1959 this agreement broke down, and armed conflict began once more.

In 1960 a third party entered the struggle, when General Phoumi Nosavan (1920–85), a rightist leader who controlled the majority of the royal army, set up a pro-Western revolutionary government headed by Prince Boun Oum (1912–80) in southern Laos. General Phoumi captured Vientiane in December, driving Souvanna Phouma into exile in Cambodia.

Lan Xang

Lan Xang (or Sisattanakhanahut in the Pali language, the language of Theravada Buddhism) was a famous Lao kingdom established in 1354 by Prince Fa Ngum (1316–93). Exiled as an infant to Cambodia, the Lao prince eventually married one of the Khmer king's daughters and in 1349 set out from Angkor (modern Cambodia) at the head of a 10,000-man army. Fa Ngum organized the conquered principalities into provinces (muang) and reclaimed Muang Sua from his father and elder brother. He was crowned king in 1353. Vientiane became the new capital of Lan Xang in June 1354. The name Lan Xang, which translates into “million elephants,” alluded to Fa Ngum's formidable prowess. The Lan Xang territory extended from the border of China to Sambor below the Mekong rapids at Khong Island and from the Vietnamese border to the western end of the Khorat Plateau. It was one of the largest kingdoms in Southeast Asia in its time.

However Souvanna Phouma received support from the Soviets. In 1961 a cease-fire was arranged and all the royal personalities agreed to a coalition government under the stewardship of Souvanna Phouma.

The countries of North Vietnam, the United States (in the form of CIA personnel), and China remained active in Laos even after the settlement. In fact North Vietnam maintained a supply line (known as the “Ho Chi Minh Trail”) running down the mountain valleys of eastern Laos into Cambodia and South Vietnam until a U.S.–South Vietnamese incursion into Cambodia in 1970 stopped the arrival of supplies via Cambodian seaports.

An agreement was reached in 1973 to revive the coalition government. The Communist group seized absolute power in 1975, installing Souphanouvong as president and Kayson Phomvihane (1920–92) as premier. After that the non-Communist parties and political groups started to decay; most of their leaders took asylum in other countries. The Pathet Lao succeeded in abolishing the monarchy on December 2, 1975, when the coalition government was toppled, and King Sisavang Vatthana (1907–78) abdicated.

The 1980s saw close ties with Communist governments including those of Vietnam and the Soviet Union. The economy suffered tremendously, however, and by 1989 when the USSR disintegrated, Laos began moving toward a private free-market economy. In August 1991 the Supreme People's Assembly adopted a new constitution that eliminated even the slightest reference to the concept of socialism but retained the one-party state. In addition to implementing market-oriented policies, the country passed laws governing property, inheritance, and contracts. During the 1990s Laos also began making more diplomatic overtures toward neighboring countries. In 1995 the United States announced the elimination of its ban on aid to the nation.

Since March 2000 Vientiane has been rocked by a series of mysterious blasts. These activities have been mainly attributed to a group of Hmong tribesmen based in the north. This anti-Communist rebel group has been protesting the government's failure to introduce democratic reforms. In June 2003 two foreign journalists and an American pastor of Lao descent were sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment for obstructing police officers and possessing illegal weapons and explosives. However the defendants and human rights groups active in Laos firmly believe they were punished for covering the Hmong rebellion, which the government has refused to acknowledge. Encountering international criticism, the Lao government was forced to release the prisoners later in the same year.

The Viet Minh

In 1941 Ho Ngoc Lam and Nguyen Hai Than founded the League for the Independence of Vietnam, more familiarly known as the Viet Minh, for two reasons: to achieve Vietnam's independence from France and to get rid of the Japanese who occupied French territories in Southeast Asia during World War II. The league was later led by Nguyen Tat Thanh, famous as Ho Chi Minh. Ho Chi Minh, Le Duan, Vo Nguyen Giap, and Pham Van Dong gradually assumed key positions in the league, which, because of its opposition to Japan, had the support of both the United States and China. At the end of World War II, Ho Chi Minh, now in control of the Viet Minh, declared Vietnam's independence from France, and there ensued a decade-long war between France and the Viet Minh.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The People's Democratic Republic of Laos is situated in southeastern Asia. The mighty Mekong River in the west and the Annamite Mountain range in the east form natural borders with Thailand and Vietnam, respectively, while Laos also shares borders with China in the north, with Burma (Myanmar) in the northwest, and Cambodia in the south. This landlocked country has a territory of 91,429 square miles. Seventy percent of the terrain is mountainous, and about half of the land is densely forested. The country's highest peak, Phu Bia (9,252 feet high), is located in the mountainous ranges of northeastern Laos in the Xiang Khouang province. The Khammouanne and Bolaven plateaus dominate the areas in the vicinity of the Annamite range.

The rivers and streams in Laos eventually merge into the Mekong River, creating a total of 1,491 miles of waterways that are used by Laos for transportation. Laos has a tropical climate with two distinct seasons—the rainy season, which runs from early May to the end of September, and the dry season, from October to April. The yearly average temperature is about 82°F, rising to a maximum of 100°F in April and May. In Vientiane minimum temperatures are often around 66°F in January. In mountainous areas, however, temperatures drop to 57–59°F during the winter season, and on cold nights often reach the freezing point. The average precipitation is highest in southern Laos, where the Annamite Mountains receive over 118 inches of rain annually. In Vientiane rainfall is about 59 to 78 inches, while in the northern provinces it is only 39 to 59 inches per year. The country is home to a profusion of over 1,200 species of rare flora and fauna.

❁ ECONOMY

Laos is one of the 10 poorest countries in the world. It has an agricultural economy, with 50 percent of total gross domestic product (GDP) and approximately 80 percent of the workforce focused in the agriculture sector. Subsistence farmers comprise 80 percent of the population; they have been plagued with alternating floods and droughts since 1993. Agricultural output growth has tended to be quite erratic as a result, but has averaged 6.5 percent per annum over the last decade. Rice is the largest agricultural commodity produced. The industrial sector (including construction and mining) accounts for 25 percent of total GDP and is largely made up of light industry and handicrafts. The industrial sector has been growing by an annual average of 10 percent over the last decade. The main export items are electricity (all sold to neighboring Thailand), garments, wood products, and coffee.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Traditional culture in Laos has been deeply influenced by the Cambodian, Vietnamese, and Thai cultures. The lowland Lao share a common ancestry and cultural affinity with many Thai tribes. This is evident in Lao sculpture, classical music, dance-dramas, and cuisine. Lao folk music is based around the khaen (a double row of bamboo reeds fitted into a hardwood sound box). The music is often accompanied by dancing or bawdy theater. The Lao people are skillful carvers and weavers; however, traditional silversmithing and goldsmithing have nearly passed into oblivion. The main motifs of Lao traditional art include wats (temples), stupas, and distinctively Lao representations of the Buddha. There exists a secular literary tradition based on themes of the Hindu epic, which have been transmogrified into popular language. However, Laotian literature is linked mainly to Buddhist traditions.

First introduced by Mon Buddhist monks, Buddhism became widely popular in Laos during the 14th century. The Theravada form was promoted by Fa Ngoum (a famous Lao prince; 1316–93) who introduced the palladium (a sacred symbol of safety and well-being) and the golden Phrabang Buddha image.

The majority of the population practices Theravada Buddhism. Animism is practiced by the Lao-Theung ethnic groups, and a small percentage of the population is Christian. Mahayana Buddhism and Confucianism are observed by the Chinese and Vietnamese minorities.

Lao is the official language of Laos; English, Vietnamese, and French are also spoken by the urban elite. A member of the Tai-Kadai language group, Lao is tonal, strongly resembling its Thai cousin. In fact, there are more speakers of the Lao language in Thailand's northeastern border areas than there are in Laos. The two languages resemble each other so much that Thai television and radio have become very popular among the Lao people.

The Lao people greet each other with folded hands, a gesture called a noap. Younger persons or persons of lower status are supposed to greet their elders or superiors. Backslapping, public displays of affection, shouting, and wild gesticulation are all considered impolite. The head is considered the highest part of the body, while the feet are considered the lowest; touching someone's head or pointing at people or things with the feet are, therefore, considered extremely rude. Footwear is removed before entering temples or people's homes.

❁ CUISINE

The typical Laotian meal has a strong forest orientation; a good deal of the food is hunted or collected from the forest tracts of the country. A deer shot in the mountains is carried back to the village, where it is divided into many portions for preparing laap (a basic curry) and consumed by the family as well as by neighbors and friends. The entire deer is consumed at once because there are no refrigerators in the villages to keep the meat fresh.

Sticky rice, or kao niao, is the main ingredient in Lao cuisine. It is served mainly with fermented fish and a fish sauce called nam pa. Chicken and pork dishes are also popular, but beef is quite expensive in Laos. Laap is the most characteristic dish of the Lao. It is made with fish, chicken, duck, pork, beef, buffalo, or freshly hunted game; both meat and innards are finely chopped and spiced with onion, chilies, and mint. Pa daek is a highly pungent fermented fish sauce. Klao Poun is rice vermicelli served cold with a variety of raw chopped vegetables, over which one pours coconut milk sauce flavored with meat and chilies. It is particularly served at weddings or other major social occasions. Or lam is similar to a stew. Lemon grass, dried buffalo meat (as well as its skin), chilies, eggplant, crisp-fried pork skin, sweet basil, and, of course, pa daek are its basic ingredients. The Lao people prepare a variety of soups and serve them with noodles, bamboo shoots, and fresh vegetables that can be found everywhere. A highly popular ordinary meal eaten by the Lao is feu (a dish of Vietnamese origin). This is an economical combination of vermicelli in hot soup filled with meatballs. It is served with a dish of vegetable leaves that must be torn up and stirred into the dish according to individual taste. Plenty of aromatic herbs and spices such as lemon grass, chilies, ginger, and tamarind are used to flavor the dishes.

When Lao peasants go to work in the fields, they carry a supply of sticky rice and a small quantity of fish or meat in little woven baskets. This is their midday meal. At a Lao meal each person takes a small handful of rice, which he or she rolls into a ball and then dips into one of the dishes. These rice balls are also eaten plain. Beer, coconut water, and strong Laotian coffee (either hot or iced) are the usual beverages.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

Although Laotians have their own ethnic New Year's celebration (see Boun Pimai, below), they also observe the New Year's Day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar. This is one of the lingering influences of the decades of French colonialism. January 1 is a public holiday with government offices, schools, and businesses closed. Laotians spend the day with friends and family.

❁ PATHET LAO DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 6

The Pathet Lao was a powerful left-wing nationalist group that was ultimately victorious in the Laotian civil war of the mid-1950s. The name was first used in 1950 by Lao forces after they joined the Viet Minh's revolt against the French. It eventually became the generic term for the Laotian Communists. In 1956 an official party, the Neo Lao Hak Sat (Lao Patriotic Front) was formed. In the 1960s and early 1970s, the Pathet Lao fought the United States-supported government.

On this date in 1975 the Pathet Lao took control of Laos. The day is celebrated with parades and public speeches. It is a national holiday with government offices, schools, and businesses closed.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day is an event observed around the world. The women of Laos assemble on this day to make their demands known and to express their aspirations. At rallies and seminars, women's rights activists address the struggle for equality, justice, peace, and development.

❁ BOUN PIMAI

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 13–16

The Lao New Year, Boun Pimai or Pee Mai Lao, is celebrated in the fifth month of the Buddhist calendar, beginning on the sixth day, even though the first month of the Lao New Year actually occurs in December. Since 1975 the date has been fixed to April 13 to 16. Festivities are delayed until April when days are warmer and longer than nights. This is common practice in most Asian countries, where the lunar New Year is celebrated in mid-April. The Lao New Year is known as the Water Festival, or Koudsongkhane, and is the biggest traditional festival throughout the country.

In Laos the entire country nearly comes to a standstill, and the occasion is celebrated with great enthusiasm. Houses are cleaned, Buddha images are washed, and people wear new clothes. In the wats (temples) offerings of fruit, flowers, and votives are made. Later the citizens take to the streets and douse one another with water. The festival is a unique combination of revelry and meditation. It is particularly picturesque in Luang Prabang, where it includes elephant processions.

The festival is also an occasion to invite the rains. In Luang Prabang statues of the Buddha (in the calling-for-rain posture) are ceremonially doused in water, which is then poured into an intricately decorated trench (bang song nam pha). The small temporary stupas of sand, decorated with streamers (which are made by the people in the wat compounds) symbolize people's earnest pleadings for health, happiness, and prosperity during the coming year. This festival is celebrated with traditional Lao folk singing (mor lam) and the circular dance known as ram wong. This is usually a three-day public holiday.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, Workers' Day, or May Day in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

The Communist government in Laos emphasizes this holiday. The day is marked with speeches and processions organized by trade unions.

INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 1

This holiday commemorates the passage of the Geneva Declaration Protecting Children in 1925, which focused on eradication of poverty, prevention of child labor, promotion of education, and other issues related to the welfare of children around the globe. Although the date may vary from one country to another, June 1 remains the most popular day for its celebration in 21 countries.

In Laos children's seminars and workshops are held by children's welfare organizations and social workers who are working toward the betterment of the country's children.

LAO NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 2

Lao National Day, or Republic Day, commemorates the 1975 victory of the Communist Pathet Lao Party and the end of the monarchy. The general public marks this day with parades and speeches. The Lao national as well as Communist red flags (embossed with the hammer-and-sickle) are flown all over the country. Since the celebration of this day is mandatory, the poor people of Laos defer the traditional celebration of Bouk Khao Phansa (which falls on the full Moon day in October) until this day, thus saving themselves considerable expense.

Religious Holidays

VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Fifteenth of the sixth lunar month of the Buddhist calendar

Vesak, or Visakha Puja, is the most important Buddhist festival. It celebrates all the major events of the Buddha's life—his birth, enlightenment, and death. Vesak falls on the 15th day of the sixth lunar month. On this day the activities and celebrations are centered on the shrines and temples (wats), with non-stop chanting, sermons, and gorgeous candlelit processions at night. The Boun Bang Fai (rocket festival) coincides with Visakha Puja celebrations in Laos. Parades, songs, dances, and parties culminate in the launching of massive, elaborate homemade bamboo rockets, which are blessed and fired into the skies to invite the rains.

BOUK KHAO PHANSA (BEGINNING)

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Full Moon of the eighth lunar month of the Buddhist calendar until the full Moon in the 11th lunar month of the Buddhist calendar

The "rain retreat" implied in this Buddhist festival starts with the full Moon in June or July and continues until the full Moon in October. It is the time when young men are ordained as monks, a status they hold for a short time before they marry. It all ends with the Kathin ceremony in October, when the monks receive gifts from the general public.

Buddhist monks chant prayers at Wat Si Muang in Vientiane during the July "rain retreat" also known as Buddhist Lent. Observed by Buddhists throughout Southeast Asia, it lasts through the rainy season. (AP Photo/David Longstreath)

Throughout this three-month long retreat from the rains, Buddhist monks are expected to reside in a single monastery. The custom originated in a bygone era. During the year, monks were allowed to travel from one place to another freely. After farmers complained to him that the monks were trampling their crops, the Buddha forbade them to wander around during the rainy season lest they cause damage to the rice paddies or other crops.

❁ BOUK KHAO PHANSA (CULMINATION)

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Full Moon in the 11th lunar month of the Buddhist calendar

This festival marks the end of the Buddhist three-month long rain retreat. The faithful take offerings to the temples, and the monks are presented with robes, alms bowls, and the other requisites of daily life. Then they are allowed to leave the monasteries and travel freely again.

On the eve of Bouk Khao Phansa, many people carve out small banana-leaf boats carrying candles, incense, and other offerings, which are set afloat on the rivers. This ritual is known as Lai Hua Fai. The next day, boat races take place on the Mekong River with crews of 50 or more men and women.

❁ VIETNAMESE TET AND CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed in: Vientiane, Pakse, and Savannakhet

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Second new Moon after the winter solstice

Laos is inhabited by sizable populations of Chinese and Vietnamese who have lived there for centuries. These festivals are celebrated by the respective communities in the capital city of Vientiane, as well as Pakse and Savannakhet, with parties and deafening, nonstop fireworks. The devout pay visits to Vietnamese and Chinese temples. All business establishments owned and run by Vietnamese and Chinese citizens remain closed for three days.

❁ THAT LUANG FESTIVAL

Observed in: Vientiane

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Full Moon of the 12th month of the Buddhist calendar

This week-long festival takes place at That Luang, a temple located in Vientiane. Early in the morning on the first day, marked by the full Moon, hundreds of monks assemble to receive alms and floral votives. They form a colorful procession, marching from one important temple, Wat Si Muang, to another, the Pha That Luang. The celebration lasts six more days and includes fireworks and music. It culminates in a candlelit circumambulation (wien thien) of That Luang.

❁ BUN PHA WET

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: December–January

This is a temple-centered festival in which the jataka, or anthology of Prince Vessantara (the Buddha's penultimate life), is recited. It is also a time for Lao males to be ordained as monks. The scheduling of Bun Pha Wet is varied and is held on different days in different villages. This is so that relatives and friends living in different villages can invite one another to their respective celebrations.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

It is common for young Buddhist men between the ages of eight and 20 to be ordained as novice monks (Samanera) and live in a monastery for several months. This brief monastic experience is a coming of age ritual for many Laotian Buddhists after which they return to civilian life. The ordination ritual involves the shaving of the head and eyebrows and uttering of vows. Before a monk shaves the whole head, each member of the novice's family cuts a lock of hair. The ordination is a great honor for the entire family and the event is accompanied by great joyous feasting.

❁ MARRIAGE

The marriage ceremony is called the sou kbouan. On the wedding day, the festivities begin with a procession led by the groom accompanied by his family and friends. It proceeds from the groom's home to the bride's. After the groom has entered the bride's house, a happily married member of her family seats the groom beside the bride and next to two pha kbouan, ceremonial floral arrangements. Pha kbouan are made out of fresh banana leaves, which are cut and folded into cone shapes and filled with fresh flowers. Next ensues the sou kbouan, which is conducted by a venerated Buddhist elder of the community. He offers chants and food stuffs to the couple and binds their wrists together with white cotton, while blessing the couple. When all have had a chance to bless the newlyweds, everyone sits for a festive meal, followed by dancing.

❁ DEATH

Buddhists believe that a funeral provides an opportunity for both the deceased and the mourners to work toward being reborn into this world at a higher social status. The most virtuous individuals among the ordinary people can hope to attain nirvana. According to the Theravadin school of Buddhism (the form practiced in Laos), physical suffering, like giving birth, disease, aging, and death, is fundamental to human life. Since the present life is only a link in the chain of deaths and rebirths, weeping and wailing or mourning loudly is frowned upon at a Buddhist funeral. Family members are clad in white during the mourning period. The eldest son has to shave his head and wear colorful garments for the funeral ceremony. Other individuals who attend the funeral are supposed to wear black. The family of the deceased invites Buddhist monks to recite prayers for the dead throughout the days leading up to the funeral. The monks' prayers in honor of the dead are the crux of the funeral services. Family members offer food to the monks so that the dead person's soul may achieve tranquility.

The climax of a Buddhist funeral is the cremation, when family and friends carry candles and flaming torches to light the pyre that gradually engulfs the corpse. Buddhists cremate the dead in memory of the Buddha himself, whose body was cremated in a similar fashion after he renounced the world around 477 B.C.E. Buddhists believe pregnant women should not attend cremation services as the spirit freed from the body might enter the unborn child. The ashes of a Laotian Buddhist are customarily preserved in an urn. About 100 days after the funeral (three months or so), family members burn the favorite material possessions of the deceased so that he or she might enjoy them in the next life.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The earliest settlers of the area now known as Latvia were Finno-Ugric Livonians or Libiesi, who inhabited Latvia in approximately 6000 B.C.E. The Letts, who were Indo-European Balts and the ancestors of the modern-day Latvians, arrived around 2500 B.C.E. In the fourth century C.E. Latvia was carrying on trade with Germanic tribes and the Roman Empire. Subsequently they traded with the Vikings and the Russians when they were not at war with them. By the 12th century the Finno-Ugrics and the Balts had split into various tribal groups, with pagan beliefs and practices. Taking advantage of their disunity, a German order of crusaders called the Knights of the Sword forcibly began converting these tribes to Christianity. Under these German conquerors the Letts were relegated to a life of servitude and oppression. Thereafter for the next 600 years, Latvia was subjected to a series of invasions and foreign regimes.

Sweden occupied Latvia for 84 of the 92 years between 1629 and 1721. Under Swedish rule the Latvians were liberated from servitude. Universal education was made available, and the Latvians slowly progressed into professions, trades, and crafts. However, Russia had begun making inroads into Latvia and, in 1721, Latvia fell into Russian hands. This again unleashed a reign of terror and oppression against the Latvian populace.

Despite being subjected to massive suppression during this period of Russian rule, Latvia saw rapid industrial growth and large-scale development in the latter half of the 19th century. Riga, the capital of Latvia (situated on the Gulf of Riga, an inlet of the Baltic Sea) emerged as the third largest port in the Russian Empire. World War I saw the collapse of Russia and Germany, and Latvians seized this opportunity to end Russian dominance and declared their independence from the Russian Empire in 1918. The Latvian Republic was proclaimed on November 18, 1918. However, it was not until 1920 that all hostilities ceased, and foreign armies were withdrawn from Latvian territory. Latvia signed a peace treaty with Russia on August 11, 1920, and became a member of the League of Nations in 1921.

Despite a flourishing economy the Latvian republic was adversely affected by political instability in the region. The republic gave way to the authoritarian and autocratic government of President Kārlis Ulmanis (1877–1942), who took the reins of power in his own hands in 1934.

In accordance with the clandestine Ribbentrop–Molotov pact signed between Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia in 1939, which effectively divided Eastern Europe into Nazi and Soviet spheres, Latvia was handed over to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), along with Estonia and Lithuania, and the Russians reoccupied Latvia in 1939. Elections ensued, and Latvia was declared a constituent republic of the USSR in 1940, much against the wishes of the Latvians. Latvia was forced to accept occupation by 30,000 Russian troops. What followed was ethnic cleansing and mass genocide; 35,000 Latvians were killed or deported. In 1941 Germany invaded the USSR and occupied Latvia. During this time 95 percent of Latvia's Jews were exterminated. When the Soviets invaded Latvia in 1944, another large number of Latvians fled to the West to avoid annihilation. Nevertheless, more than 100,000 Latvians were killed or deported under Soviet rule.

Soviet rule in Latvia extended for another 50 years thereafter. In the late 1980s Mikhail Gorbachev (the last president of the USSR, b. 1931) started to promote glasnost (openness) and perestroika (restructuring), which led to the resurgence of a desire by Latvians to reclaim their lost independence and to reinstate the Latvian constitution of 1922. Following major demonstrations and public rallies, the USSR finally gave in. Latvia declared its full independence from the USSR in May 1990, and was recognized as an independent republic on August 21, 1991. It joined the United Nations (UN) two weeks later. Russian troops finally vacated Latvia in 1994.

Latvia has a parliamentary democracy. Parliament is called the Saeima. Guntars Krasts (b. 1957) became prime minister in 1997, and in June 1999 Vaira Vīke-Freiberga (b. 1937) was elected president, becoming the first woman to hold such a post in Eastern Europe. In 2004 the country became a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the European Union (EU).

The rights of the Russian-speaking population are a sore political issue in Latvia. Although a third of the Latvian population speaks Russian, strict citizenship rules have made it mandatory to know Latvian to become a citizen.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Latvia lies on the eastern coast of the Baltic Sea between Estonia to the north and Lithuania to the south. Russia and Belarus lie to its east. It is a land dotted with forests and lakes, river valleys and sandy beaches. The country is mainly a landscape of fertile

Kārlis Ulmanis

Until 1934 Latvia had a democratic system of governance. With the threat of a coup Kārlis Ulmanis took over the existing government in May 1934 and turned Latvia into a virtual dictatorship. Ulmanis had been one of the founders of an independent Latvia and had been elected prime minister several times. After the Soviet occupation in 1940, he was deported to the Soviet Union, where he died in captivity in 1942. In spite of his bloodless coup in 1934 and his authoritarian regime, Ulmanis remains a popular, if also controversial, figure in Latvia today.

and low-lying plains, with the highest point being the Gaizinkalns at 1,024 feet. The main river is the Daugava, a major trade route. The chief cities, apart from the capital city of Riga, are Liepāja, Daugavpils, Cēsis, and Jelgava.

The Latvian climate is maritime and temperate, with cool summers and wet, moderate winters. Its primary natural resources are peat, limestone, dolomite, amber, hydroelectric power, wood, and arable land. Strategically located in the center of the three Baltic states, it serves as a major transportation route for trade and commerce for the Baltic region.

❁ ECONOMY

Latvia's predominantly coastal location has contributed a great deal to its economic activity. Since regaining independence it has rapidly restored its dwindling economy and established flourishing trade with its erstwhile partners like Russia, Germany, and Sweden. The inflation rate has seen a steady decline over the years.

Latvia's major exports are oil products, wood and timber, metals, buses, and processed food. Its major imports are fuel and electric power, machinery, natural gas, and automobiles. Although Latvia has three hydroelectric power plants on the Daugava River and two thermal power plants near Riga, it still relies on energy imports for its industries.

Its trading partners include its neighbors Lithuania, Estonia, and Belarus as well as Russia, Germany, Finland, Sweden, the Netherlands, and Great Britain. Since Latvia has very liberal trade laws, foreign investment is easy. This has encouraged trade with a majority of the countries in the EU. Latvia became a member of the World Trade Organization (WTO) in 1999.

Fun Fact

Well into the Middle Ages amber, translucent fossilized resin used to make gems, was valued more than gold in many places, and Latvia's coast was famous as a place where amber could be found.

Daina

The daina is a traditional form of poetry in the Baltic regions; the form features pre-Christian legends, using a monophonic music style to the accompaniment of zithers, a stringed instrument. Dainas are short, unrhymed verses of one or two stanzas about pre-Christian deities like the Sun goddess and the Moon god, as well as the important events of life—namely, birth, marriage, and death.

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

After years of suppression under foreign dominion, post-independence Latvia saw a revival of its cultural heritage. Latvian culture is a strong mix of folklore, ancient customs, and art influenced by pagan symbols.

Folksongs called dainas form the essence of Latvian music. In addition, one of the largest and most famous organs in the world can be found in Riga's Dome Cathedral.

Present-day Latvian music has seen a cultural upheaval, and rock music has now become an integral part of the Latvian music scene. Latvia also has a rich heritage of literature and art, with many fine art galleries in Riga.

A traditional Latvian costume as it is worn today comes from the 19th century. The Latvian woman's costume is a long-sleeved, tunic-shaped linen shirt worn with a linen skirt. A sash, or josta, is used to secure the skirt. A shawl, or villaine, usually made of wool, is draped over the shoulders, and a head covering or headscarf is tied to signify a woman's marital status. Jewelry is added for good measure. Brooches are used to fasten the shirts and shawls. Pastalas, simple footwear made from a single piece of leather and tied with laces, are worn by both men and women. The men wear a tunic-style shirt, with trousers and a jacket. The Latvians make generous use of color and geometric patterns in their costumes. Red is a predominant color in the Latvian national dress.

✿ CUISINE

Due to the agrarian nature of early Latvian society, Latvian cuisine primarily consists of farm produce; local homegrown farm products form a major part of

Pierogi

The practice of baking pierogi, pirāgi in Latvia, is a tradition more than a thousand years old. After a rich harvest, farmers would use the wheat to make the dough, stuff it with bacon and ham, and make the combination into rolls. This custom showed off the farmer's prosperity.

the Latvian diet. Essentially food on a Latvian table would include potatoes (boiled, fried, or mashed) and boiled black peas, combined with pieces of bacon, vegetables, meat, and eggs. The coastal dwellers have fish as an integral part of their diet. Bread is also an essential part of a Latvian's diet.

Latvian food is largely bland, devoid of strong spices, and is very high in fat and calories. Since there is no source of salt in Latvia, it has been obtained through trade or barter historically and used very sparingly. Spices have been imported and have been at a premium for the Latvian peasant. Due to the multiple regimes that have ruled Latvia, its cuisine has been influenced by Russian, Swedish, and German food styles.

Latvian celebrations are incomplete without the inclusion of their traditional bread called pirags (pierogis). Pirags, stuffed with bacon, ham, and spices to form a snack-sized roll are called pirāgis.

Another traditional dish of the Latvians is J[am]acron]ncedilla]i cheese, an important part of the Jāņi celebration. Jāņi celebrates the summer solstice and includes serving Jāņi cheese, accompanied by fresh caraway cheese, beet soup, rasols (potato salad), sauerkraut, and beer.

Latvians consume many dairy products: milk, r[um]acron]gu[scaron]piens (plain curdled milk), kefir (cultured milk), cheese, cream, and butter are traditionally eaten in every household. Kvass (a nonalcoholic drink made from yeast), fresh or fermented birch juice, and beer are popular traditional Latvian drinks.

✿ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western (Gregorian) calendar and is celebrated all over the world. Revelries begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). It is one of the most spectacular annual events and people look forward to celebrating it. They stay up all night to ring in the new year, toasting each other with champagne and wishing everyone a happy New Year.

✿ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Latvians observe May 1 as Constitution Day, also called Convocation of the Constituent Assembly of the Republic of Latvia; it was on this day in 1920 that the first democratically elected parliament of the Republic of Latvia convened and undertook the task of drafting and passing the constitution of the republic. The day coincides with Labor Day celebrations.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest origins of May Day are ascribed to the pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, conflicting opinions exist about the origins of the modern occasion.

The most plausible source is the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, which declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world in 1889 and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Latvia, May 1 is a national holiday and all government and private institutions are closed.

✿ PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 4

On May 4, 1990, the Supreme Council of the Latvian Socialist Soviet Republic, composed of democratically elected Latvians, adopted a declaration for restoring Latvia's independence. After World War II Latvia was under the domination of the USSR. Latvian languages were banned and the Russian language was imposed throughout Latvia. There was growing discontent regarding Soviet rule, fueled by the large number of Russians who immigrated to the industrially developed Latvia in the 1980s. By the end of that decade, the number of ethnic Latvians remaining in Latvia had been reduced to 50 percent of the population.

Also, the liberalization policy of the Russian president, Mikhail Gorbachev, made it possible for several ethnic Latvian political parties to press for independence from the USSR. As a result, after the first democratic elections for the Supreme Council in Latvia, the Latvians seized the opportunity to adopt a declaration for restoring Latvia's independence. This day is also called Declaration of the Republic of Latvia.

✿ LĪGO AND JĀŅI

Observed by: Latvians

Observed on: June 23–24

Līgo and Jāņi are traditional festivals of the Latvian people, and are celebrated by Latvians all over the world. The Līgo festival, midsummer's eve, is held on June 23, just after the Summer Solstice, and Jāņi, midsummer's day, is celebrated the following day, June 24. For this reason the celebrations are also called Midsummer's Eve and Midsummer's (Solstice) Day. These festivities are traditionally celebrated with the gathering of wildflowers and making wreaths of oak leaves and flowers.

Jāņi celebrates the day of the Summer Solstice, the longest day of the year. It marks the day in Latvia when the short Latvian summer has reached its height. For the farmer, plowing, sowing, and weeding work has to be done before midsummer; with the beginning of midsummer, crop harvesting starts with the mowing of hay. All the herbs and flowers gathered at midsummer are known as Jāņi herbs. Women and girls make wreaths for all the celebrants to wear. Women traditionally wear flower wreaths while those worn by men are made of oak leaves or twigs. Rooms, wells, mills, and other places important in the farmer's life are decorated with Jāņi herbs. The livestock and fences are adorned with wreaths. Birch, oak, and rowan boughs are used to decorate both gates and rooms.

Legend has it that, on Midsummer's Eve, the mythical blossoming fern opens its golden petals. It is considered very lucky to spot this blossom. For the midsummer celebration, the women make Jāņi cheese, and the men brew beer. With the cheese wheel and the beer mug come the blessings of nature and God. The songs, dances, and rituals of Jāņi bring blessings to every aspect of life.

The highlight of Jāņi is the singing of the ligotne songs, midsummer folk songs sung around a ceremonial bonfire with the refrain līgo, līgo. The fire is lit atop a hill, before sunset on the eve of Jāņi, and is kept going until sunrise the next day. The Jāņi fire is believed to purify the land and drive away evil.

✿ COMMEMORATION DAY OF GENOCIDE AGAINST THE JEWS

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 4

This day is observed in remembrance of the mass genocide carried out by the Nazis against the Jews in Latvia. On July 4, 1941, soon after the Nazis occupied Latvia, Riga's main Jewish synagogue was razed to the ground, burning alive all those who were trapped inside. It is estimated that almost 90 percent of Latvia's Jews were killed in Nazi concentration camps. On this day, Latvians pay homage to the victims of Nazi atrocities.

✿ LĀ ČPLĒ SIS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 11

Lāčplēsis Day, or Latvian Freedom Fighters' Remembrance Day, commemorates the victory of Latvian forces against the invading German–Russian armies after the end of World War I. On this day in 1919, they won a decisive battle in their fight for independence. Foreign troops were permanently evicted in January 1920. On Lāčplēsis Day people remember the sacrifice made by those who laid down their lives for the integrity and sovereignty of Latvia. Also, families of those brave soldiers place flowers on their graves and take pride in the life and legacy of their deceased relatives.

❁ PROCLAMATION OF THE REPUBLIC OF LATVIA

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 18

This date is by far the most important date in the history of Latvia, for it was on this date in 1918 that the Republic of Latvia was proclaimed an independent state. Seizing an opportunity during the collapse of Russia and Germany during World War I, political parties in Latvia declared its independence from Russia.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Mourning Friday, Holy Friday, or Great Friday in Orthodox Christian churches, falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to commemorate the crucifixion of Jesus. Christians observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent, 40 days before Good Friday) and Orthodox Christians continue to observe a partial fast until Easter Sunday. Christians fast on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after the end of Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. The origin of Easter celebrations can be traced back to pre-Christian pagan festivals welcoming the return of spring. When the early Christian Church decided to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection, it adopted the name of the Germanic fertility goddess Eostre, as well as rituals and symbols associated with her festival, in order to win pagan converts.

In ancient times, eggs were symbols of life associated with fertility observances and in Latvian vernal equinox celebrations they were given a special place. Prior to Easter, eggs were colored with onion-skins, rye shoots, chamomile, or hay cuttings. On Easter day, hanging up swings and swinging on them is an important ritual, but it is considered bad luck to stop its motion without allowing it to stop on its own. Girls give boys eggs in return for pushing their swings for them. Eggs are also knocked together and the one whose eggshell survives cracking is believed will live the longest.

In Latvia, paska (a sweet, molded cheesecake) is the traditional Easter dish, which is eaten with sweet saffron bread called kulich. Feastings and celebrations, including playing Easter games, continue on Easter Monday, which is the first Monday after Lent.

❁ ST. JOHN'S DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: June 24

This day marks the birth of St. John the Baptist and is celebrated as St. John's Day. This is the Christian midsummer festival and is one of the "quarter days," signaling the beginning of each quarter of the year and welcoming each of the four seasons. The other quarter days are Christmas (December 25), Lady Day (Annunciation Day, March 25), and Michaelmas (September 29). St. John the Baptist is believed to be Jesus' cousin. The date chosen by the early church to celebrate the birth of Jesus (December 25) falls close to the winter solstice. Even though the day of Jesus' birth has never been determined, the Bible indicates that John was born six months before Jesus, so his birth celebrates the summer solstice. John had prophesied the coming of Jesus, and had prepared the way by baptizing people in the River Jordan.

This day is also known as the Midsummer's Day and is celebrated to welcome summer and offer prayers for a rich harvest. Commonly celebrated as Jāņi in Latvia, it is one of the country's most elaborate festivals.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of Christianity. It is believed that All Saints' Day celebrations began after the consecration of the Pantheon at Rome to the Blessed Virgin by Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15). The Feast of All Saints' Day has been celebrated on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne (742–814).

In Latvia, people visit the graves of their deceased relatives on All Saints' Day, as well as on All Souls' Day (November 2), and place flowers and candles near their graves. Families of soldiers who laid down their lives for Latvia's freedom visit their gravesites at the Riga Military Cemetery and light candles.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration when Christians all over the world celebrate Jesus' birth. Although Jesus' date of birth remains a mystery, the early church established December 25 for the observance. As a result, virtually all of the symbols and activities associated with Christmas—decorating trees, Santa Claus, holly, mistletoe, the yule log, and so forth—can be traced back to pagan winter solstice festivals.

During Christmas Latvians decorate their homes with three-dimensional straw or reed ornaments. Natural materials like wood-shavings, evergreen branches, or colored rags are also used in the decorations. Christmas is accented with the traditional custom of mumming, for which grownup men dressed in costumes and masks enact scenes from the Bible and travel from village to village, conveying blessings and driving away evil spirits. Christmas in Latvia has a tradition of dragging the Yule log. This is symbolic of gathering and burning of the past year's misfortunes.

An integral part of Christmas used to be a generous banquet where the food included a pig's head that had been boiled with barley mashed with a pestle. This food was called kukšis, koča, or kiķas. Christmas Eve is still sometimes called kukši evening. Other traditional foods were peas, beans, and barley sausage, which, because of their round, curved appearance were seen as symbols of the Sun or the year. (Winter solstice celebrations welcome the return of the light because the days, which start to grow shorter at the summer solstice, begin to grow longer again.)

Present-day Latvians bake gingerbread cookies and celebrate Christmas in a more contemporary manner by decorating a fir tree with lighted candles.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

The Feast of St. Stephen, known elsewhere as Boxing Day, is observed on December 26, a day after Christmas. St. Stephen is considered to be the first martyr of Christianity; he was stoned to death by Roman rulers for speaking in favor of Jesus and his disciples. In Latvia this day is reserved for visiting friends and family.

Observed on: April 21–25

The International Baltic Ballet Festival is an annual event that takes place in the month of April in the capital city of Riga. The festival aims at popularizing ballet by staging classical and contemporary forms of ballet and by bringing together dancers and choreographers from its Baltic neighbors. This festival was originally scheduled to coincide with the International Day of Dance, but it has now become a regular event on the Latvian national calendar.

A popular event, it not only attracts performers from the Baltic region but also first-rate ballet performers from around the world. Special awards and certificates are awarded to the best ballet performance and lovers of ballet make it a point to be in Riga to witness this spectacular event.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Latvia expectant mothers as well as young married women pray to Mara (Mother Earth) or Mary for a healthy baby. They believe that Mara rules over the human body and through her blessings helps ease labor pains. Many young women who are not even pregnant offer gifts and flowers to Mara and seek her blessings. After the birth of a child women hope that Lamia, the goddess of fate, will smile on the child and bestow him or her with health, wealth, and happiness.

In ancient times women would deliver children in a small building called a pirt, which was designed to be used for sauna baths. Midwives were entrusted with the safe delivery of a healthy baby. Three days after the birth of the child, the midwife, mother, and child would return to the pirt for the ceremonial bath called Pirtizas. After the ceremony the mother would keep aside a special gift for Mara as a token of thanks for her blessings. Also a lavish feast was held, and families, friends, and neighbors were invited.

Nine days after a child is born a traditional naming ceremony takes place. For the ceremony the parents choose three adults (mostly their relatives) who will be the godparents of the child and, thus, care for it along (with the biological parents) and encourage it to follow the path of Christianity. These godparents are chosen after careful consideration since Latvians believe that children tend to inherit the qualities of their godparents. Traditionally for a male child there are two male and one female godparents, while for a girl child, it is the reverse.

At the time of the ceremony the godmother dips the child in the water, while the priest asks the godparents if they accept the child. After receiving a positive reply, the godmother lifts the child from the water and holds it in front of the cross. The godparents reiterate their commitment to take care of the child. Then the name of the child, as selected by the godparents, is announced by the priest and the child is welcomed as a full-fledged member of the family, and gifts and blessings are bestowed on him or her. A ceremonial feast takes place, and the godparents perform a ceremonial dance to welcome their godchild.

On the following day the godparents lead a group of people to the forest to collect wood for making a cradle for their godchild. A special basket is prepared to hold the infant. After the cradle is ready, the godmother gently places the baby in it. The godparents and the invited guests place gifts around the cradle. Then members of the family thank Mara for blessing them with a healthy baby, and the naming ceremony concludes.

MARRIAGE

On the day of her wedding a Latvian bride wears a traditional white wedding dress, along with a white veil. She is expected to wear the attire until midnight. After the reception the bride removes her veil and hands it to one of her younger sisters or to a female relative who is expected to marry soon. She is given a white kerchief or a wedding cap to cover her head, marking her transformation from a girl to a wife.

In many parts of Latvia the tradition of kidnapping the bride during the reception takes place. In order to rescue his bride from her alleged kidnapers (his relatives), the groom is expected to pay a ransom in the form either of a song or by footing the bill for a round of drinks that the kidnapers will consume.

DEATH

Latvian death rituals are defined in great detail in the dainas (traditional Latvian poetry). According to the dainas death is the last celebration of life. The body is cleansed and draped in new clothes and placed in a coffin. The relatives and friends arrive with special food for a feast organized in honor of the dead. It is believed that the astral body of the deceased, the velis, participates in the feast and is the guest of honor. The deceased is offered beer and morsels of food and questions relating to his or her departure are asked. Songs expressing sadness over the death of the person are also sung.

The burial ceremony takes place the next day, and the coffin is placed on a carriage drawn by three horses, standing one behind the other. Only the young male members of the family escort the coffin while the wife and parents (if alive) of the deceased remain at home. The funeral party leaves the house at noon as it is believed that Veiu Mate (Mother of Shades) closes the gates of her realm in the afternoon. The body is laid to rest after proper feasting by the funeral party. Weapons, tools, and other items of daily need are buried along with the body of the deceased.

Gravediggers and pallbearers are given gifts as tokens of appreciation for their help during the hour of crisis and sorrow. The wishes of the deceased regarding disposal of his or her property are honored when it is distributed among the surviving relatives.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

According to historians and research scholars Lebanon is believed to be the homeland of the ancient Phoenicians, whose culture and civilization flourished there for more than 2,000 years. The fragments of this civilization are to be found in Tyre, Sidon, and Beirut, among other places. The Phoenicians were a civilized nation, with urban centers and sophisticated arts and crafts. Its inhabitants traveled throughout the Mediterranean and had flourishing trade relations with other countries. The area was added to the empire of Alexander the Great (356–23 B.C.E.) when he conquered Tyre, and it became a part of the Seleucid Empire after his death. Subsequently the area was conquered by the Roman Empire in the first century B.C.E. and remained so until the advent of the Caliphate (632–1258). A series of rulers, called caliphs, ruled Muslim lands following the death of Muhammad.

Christianity was introduced into Phoenicia from neighboring Galilee soon after the death of Jesus of Nazareth. Centuries later, after the death of Muhammad, the Islamic prophet, the Arabs brought Islam with them during their invasions. The Muslim influence increased greatly in the seventh century when the Umayyad capital was established at nearby Damascus (capital of modern-day Syria). The Umayyad clan established a powerful caliphate that lasted from 661 to 750.

During the Middle Ages Lebanon became quite involved in the Crusades. The southern half of modern-day Lebanon formed the northern boundary of the Kingdom of Jerusalem. The Islamic control of Lebanon was reestablished in the late 13th century under the Mamluk Dynasty of Egypt. Various Muslim rulers vied for control of Lebanon until the Ottoman Empire fortified its authority over the eastern Mediterranean. Ottoman rule was rarely challenged during the early modern period, but the Lebanese coast remained strategically important due to its contacts with the Christian territories, through

Baalbeck Temple Complex

At Baalbeck, a city in eastern Lebanon, a cluster of well-preserved Roman temple ruins remains. The temple complex of Baalbeck is made up of the Jupiter Temple and the Bacchus Temple adjacent to it. Nearby is a circular structure, called the Temple of Venus, and part of a staircase belonging to a fourth temple that was dedicated to Mercury.

A Phoenician city until the Greeks took it over in 331 B.C.E., in 16 C.E. the Roman Emperor Augustus seized it. During the next 300 years the Romans incorporated some of the largest stones ever used to construct a huge group of three temples, three courtyards, and an enclosing wall on a hill thought to be nearly 5,000 years old. The quarry where the stones were cut can be found at the southern entrance of Baalbeck. One huge block, probably the largest hewn stone in the world and estimated to weigh 1,000 tons, remains where it was cut almost 2,000 years ago. The Greeks identified the god of Baalbeck with the Sun god and called the city Heliopolis (“City of the Sun”). Apparently intending to build a temple there of their own, the Greeks enlarged the ancient courtyard, and this is where the Romans later began construction of the Great Court of the Temple of Jupiter in the first century C.E. In the final years of Nero’s reign, 37–68, the Great Court Complex of the Temple of Jupiter was built in the second century and what is known as the Temple of Bacchus was begun around the same time.

When Christianity became an official religion of the Roman Empire in 313, the Byzantine Emperor Constantine closed the Baalbeck temples. Then near the end of the fourth century, the Emperor Theodosius tore down the altars of Jupiter’s Great Court and used the stones and architectural elements to build a basilica. In the years that followed, Baalbeck came under the control of the Umayyad, Abbasid, Toulounid, Fatimid, and Ayyoubid Dynasties.

which trade and commerce flowed to Italian city-states such as Venice.

During the 19th century the capital city of Beirut became the most important port in the country because the region known as Mount Lebanon became a center of silk production for export to Europe. This silk industry made the region wealthy and prosperous. Since the bulk of the silk produced went to Marseille, the French and their ways began to influence the region culturally.

In 1788 Prince Bashir II became emir. Elected emir when his predecessor abdicated, he ruled under Ottoman authority and was appointed wali, or governor, of the Mount Lebanon district, the Biqa Valley, and Jabal Amil. He reformed taxes and attempted to destroy the feudal system. In 1822 the Ottoman wali of Damascus became involved in a war with Acre, which was allied with Muhammad Ali, the pasha of Egypt. During this war one of the worst massacres in history occurred: the massacre of Maronite Christians by the Druze forces allied with Damascus. Bashir Jumblatt (an adversary of Emir Bashir II) represented the disgruntled Druze (an Islamic sect) who resented the Maronites’ cordial ties with Bashir II, who was a Maronite Christian.

In 1825 Bashir II defeated his rival and killed him after the battle of al Simqaniya. Bashir II subsequently repressed and disarmed the Druze, and allied with France. He governed on behalf of the Egyptian Pasha Muhammad Ali, who entered Lebanon and formally took power in 1832. For the next eight years the Druze-Maronite conflict was intensified by the economic isolation of the Druze, vis-à-vis the increasing wealth of the Maronites.

When the simmering hostility flared into open rebellion, Bashir II fled Lebanon.

The decades of feuds and factions ended in 1858, with the overthrow of the feudal system and its burdensome system of taxation. The situation was unstable, however, because the Maronites lived in the large towns, but they were often surrounded by the Druze, who lived in villages and were extremely poor. Fortunately the last few years of the 19th century witnessed a period of comparative stability and calm as Islamic, Druze, and Maronite groups focused on economic and cultural development of Lebanon, which led to the founding of the American University of Beirut and a spurt of literary and political activity—the result the attempts to liberalize the Ottoman Empire.

Prior to World War I Beirut became the center of various reforming movements and sent delegates to the Arab Syrian conference and the Franco-Syrian conference held in Paris. During these years an array of solutions to the hostilities, such as Pan-Arab nationalism, separatism for Beirut, and many status-quo movements, sought to bring stability to the Ottoman government. After World War I France was given a League of Nations mandate over Lebanon and its neighbor Syria. France divided them in 1920 into separate colonial administrations, drawing a border that separated predominantly Muslim Syria from the diverse religious communities in Lebanon. After 20 years under the French, Lebanon’s independence was proclaimed on November 26, 1941, but full independence came in stages. Under an agreement between representatives of Lebanon and the French National Committee of Liberation, most of the powers exercised by France were transferred to the Lebanese government on January 1, 1944. The evacuation of French troops was completed in 1946.

Civil war broke out in Lebanon in 1958, when Muslims, led by Kamal Jumblat (1917–77) and Saeb Salam (d. 2000), revolted against the Lebanese government headed by President Camille Chamoun (1900–87), a Maronite Christian in favor of close ties to the West. At Chamoun's request President Eisenhower (1890–1969) sent U.S. troops to Lebanon to reestablish the government's authority.

During the civil war that broke out in 1975, approximately 40,000 Lebanese were estimated to have been killed and 100,000 wounded in only 18 months. At the behest of a Syrian-dominated Arab Deterrent Force (which intervened at the request of the Lebanese) the fighting came to a halt. Then in March 1978 the Israelis entered the country and withdrew three months later, after the UN Security Council created a 6,000-man peacekeeping force for the area, called the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL). As they departed the Israelis turned their strongholds over to a Christian militia that they had organized, instead of to the UN force. The second Israeli invasion came on June 6, 1982, after an assassination attempt by Palestinian terrorists on the Israeli ambassador in London. As a base of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Lebanon became the Israelis' primary target.

This extreme state of affairs prompted the return of a multinational peacekeeping force whose aim was to support the central Lebanese government; sadly enough it soon found itself drawn into the struggle for power between different Lebanese factions. The country was highly unstable and chaos was predominant. During their stay in Lebanon 241 U.S. Marines and about 60 French soldiers were killed, most of them due to suicide bombings. The multinational force withdrew in early 1984. In 1985 the majority of Israeli troops also withdrew from the country, but Israel left some troops along a buffer zone on the southern Lebanese border, where they became involved in ongoing skirmishes with Palestinian groups.

The Palestinian terrorist group Hezbollah, or "Party of God," was formed in the 1980s during Israel's second invasion of Lebanon. With financial backing from Iran, it has continuously launched attacks against Israel for more than 20 years. In July 1986 Syrian observers took a position in Beirut to monitor a peacekeeping agreement. The agreement broke down and fighting between Shiite and Druze militia in West Beirut became so intense that Syrian troops were mobilized in February 1987 to suppress the conflict. Again in 1991 Lebanon signed a treaty of friendship with Syria, which gave Syria control over Lebanon's foreign relations. In 1991 the Lebanese government, backed by Syria, regained control over the south and disbanded various militias, thereby ending the 16-year civil war but not before it had badly damaged the economic infrastructure of the country. In June 1999 Israel bombed southern Lebanon. In May 2000 Israel's new Prime Minister, Ehud Barak (b. 1942), withdrew Israeli troops after 18 consecutive years of occupation.

In the summer of 2001 Syria withdrew nearly all of its 25,000 troops from Beirut and nearby areas. About 14,000 troops, however, remained in the countryside. With the continuation of Israeli-Palestinian violence in 2002, Hezbollah again began building up forces along the Lebanese-Israeli border. In August 2004 Syria insisted that the pro-Syrian president of Lebanon, Émile Lahoud (b. 1936), remain in office beyond the constitutional limit of his six-year term, which was drawing to a close. Despite outrage around the country the Lebanese parliament allowed Lahoud to serve for three more years.

A UN Security Council resolution in September 2004 ordered Syria to remove its troops, which had been stationed in Lebanon for the past 28 years. Syria responded by moving about 3,000 troops from the vicinity of Beirut to eastern Lebanon, a gesture most people believed was superficial. As a result of the crisis, Prime Minister Rafik Hariri (1944–2005), who was largely responsible for Lebanon's economic rebirth in the past decade, resigned. On February 14, 2005, he was killed by a car bomb and many suspected Syria's involvement. Vehement protests demanding Syria's withdrawal from the country followed. After two weeks of protests by Sunni Muslim, Christian, and Druze parties, pro-Syrian Prime Minister Omar Karami (b. 1934) resigned on February 28. Several days later, Syria made a vague pledge to withdraw its troops but failed to announce a stipulated time period.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Lebanon is a small country with an area of 4,016 square miles; from north to south it extends 135 miles and from east to west it spans 50 miles at its widest point. The country is bound by Syria on both the north and the east and by Israel on the south. Lebanon's landforms lie in parallel belts running from northeast to southwest with a narrow coastal plain along the Mediterranean shore. The country's name is derived from the old Semitic word laban, which means "white" and refers to the country's snow-capped mountains. The towering Lebanese Mountains (often referred to locally as Mount Lebanon) rise steeply from the plain to dominate the entire country before dropping to the east. There is also a fertile intermountain basin called the Bekaa Valley (Al Biqa) and the ridges of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains, which are shared with Syria. Lebanon's highest mountain peaks are Qurnat as Sawda (10,131 feet) in the country's north, and the volcanic Mount Hermon (9,232 feet) at the southern end of the Anti-Lebanons.

Lebanon has a Mediterranean climate marked by a long, hot, dry summer and a cool, rainy winter. Fall is a transitional season with a gradual decrease in temperature and some rain; spring appears when the late winter rains revive the vegetation. Topographical variations create local changes in the climatic pattern. Along the coast, summers are hot and humid, with little or no rain. Heavy dew formation takes place, which is conducive to agriculture. The average temperatures may reach above 100°F in the daytime and below 60°F at night. Winter is the rainy season, with major precipitation coming in December. Rainfall is generous but is concentrated during only a few days and falls during heavy cloudbursts. The amount of rainfall varies greatly from one year to another. Occasionally there are frosts during the winter, and about once every 15 years a light powdering of snow falls as far south as Beirut. A hot wind blowing from the Egyptian desert, called the khamsin (Arabic for “fifty,” since the winds blow for about 50 days, from late March to early May), provides a warming trend during the fall but more often occurs in the spring. Bitterly cold winds may blow in from Europe in winter. Along the coast the sea provides a moderating influence on the climate, making the range of temperatures narrower than it is inland, but the temperatures are cooler in the northern parts of the coast where there is also more rain.

Although Lebanon has no navigable rivers or major natural lakes, springs in the Bekaa basin feed two small noteworthy rivers: the Liṭāni, which flows south, where it is used for irrigation and hydroelectric-power generation before it moves on westward, finally flowing through a gorge into the Mediterranean; the Orontes, which flows north and across Syria into Turkey. Many major springs can be found along the western slopes of the Lebanese Mountains. Throughout the country, many streams flow only during the winter rainy season. Combined with runoff from the melting snow, they supply the country with plenty of water.

The Lebanese mountains were once thickly covered with cedar trees. However, only a few clusters now remain in the mountains, where they are under protection. The slopes are now home to Mediterranean brush vegetation, as well as scattered patches of stone pine, Aleppo pine, and ornamental cypress. Colorful spring wildflowers are found in abundance. During migration season, thousands of birds pass through the Bekaa basin.

☼ ECONOMY

Lebanon was for a long time the distribution center for the Middle East, and a flourishing commercial center; Beirut, a free port, was the region's financial and commercial hub until the economy was almost completely destroyed by the civil wars between 1975 and 1990. By the 1990s the economy was partially revived. Banking, insurance, food processing, and the manufacture of textiles, cement, chemicals, and metal products have emerged as major sectors of the economy. Oil refining is also an important industry. Other significant sources of income are a revived tourism industry, remittances from Lebanese working abroad, and international aid. The illicit narcotics trade (opium, hashish, and heroin) also has a considerable impact on the economy.

Farm products contribute only a small portion of the gross domestic product (GDP). The main crops are citrus fruits, vegetables, olives, tobacco, and grapes. The annual cost of Lebanon's imports is much greater than its earnings from exports. Lebanon exports paper and paper products, foodstuffs, textiles, jewelry, metals, electrical equipment, and chemicals, mainly to the Arab countries. The imports include machinery and transport equipment, grain, and other foodstuffs, consumer goods, machinery, and fuels, chiefly from Italy, the United States, Germany, and France.

☼ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Lebanon may well boast of one of the best educational systems in the Middle East. The literacy rate is more than 75 percent, one of the highest in the Arab world. Beirut has important universities that attract students from major Arab countries seeking postgraduate study. The most notable is the American University of Beirut (AUB); other institutions of repute are the American Lebanese University (ALU), Beirut-Arab University, and the Lebanese Maronite University.

There are 18 officially recognized religious groups in Lebanon, with the Muslim majority subsidized by the government. Their ecclesiastical and demographic patterns are extremely complex. Divisions and rivalries between groups date back many centuries and remain a significant factor in the country's stability. Christian numbers continue to dwindle compared to Muslims, who are not, by any means, homogeneous. The main branches of Islam are Shia and Sunni, but there has been a sizable Druze presence since the 11th century, although it is concentrated in the rural, mountainous areas east and south of Beirut. The smallest Muslim minorities are the Alawites and the Ismaili (“Sevener”) Shia sect. The “Twelver” Shia, Sunni, and Druze each have state-appointed clerical bodies that administer family and personal status law through their own religious courts, which the government subsidizes.

The Maronites are the largest Christian group. Although they have had an ongoing association with the Roman Catholic Church, they have their own patriarch, liturgy, and customs. The second largest Christian group is the Greek Orthodox Church (composed of ethnic Arabs who continue to adhere to a Greek-language liturgy). Other Christians are divided among Greek Catholics, Armenian Orthodox (Gregorians), Armenian Catholics, Syrian Orthodox (Jacobites), Syrian Catholics, Assyrians (Nestorians), Chaldeans, Copts, Latins (Roman Catholic), and evangelicals (including Protestant groups such as the Baptists, Seventh-day Adventists, and Friends).

The traditional lifestyle of the Lebanese revolves around the family, socializing, and hospitality. Western influences, mainly French and American, have given the country a cosmopolitan outlook that predominates in urban areas. Beyond the cities, especially in the mountains, the people cling to old customs and traditions. The Lebanese people, despite being ethnically and religiously diverse because of the country's long history of conquest and assimilation, are friendly and hospitable. The country has a fairly high level of cultural achievement in the arts, with a popular form of poetry being zajal, in which poets enter into a witty dialogue of improvised verse. The national dance of Lebanon is the dabke, which is performed throughout the country by dancers wearing traditional Lebanese costume. The theme of the dance relates to village life. Local crafts include glass making, weaving, pottery, embroidery, and brass and copper work.

❁ CUISINE

The cuisine of Lebanon is the epitome of the Mediterranean culinary arts. It includes an abundance of starches, fruits, vegetables, fresh fish, and other varieties of seafood; animal fats are consumed sparingly. Poultry is eaten more often than red meat (the red meat is usually lamb). It also includes lots of garlic and olive oil. Generally food is grilled, baked, or sautéed in olive oil; butter or cream is rarely used, except in desserts. Vegetables are eaten raw, pickled, or cooked. Lebanese cuisine focuses on herbs, spices, and the freshness of ingredients; the assortment of dishes and combinations are unending. The meals are full of robust, earthy flavors to a great extent dictated by the seasons.

In Lebanon drinks are seldom served without being accompanied by food. An interesting aspect of Lebanese cuisine is the manner or custom in which food is often served. Called mezze, it is an array of small dishes placed before the guests that create a delightful mix of colors, flavors, textures, and aromas. Though simple fresh fruits are often served toward the end of a Lebanese meal, there is also dessert and coffee. Baklava, usually associated with Greece, is a popular Lebanese dessert. The main difference between the Lebanese variety and its Greek counterpart is that Lebanese baklava often contains pistachio nuts and is drizzled with rosewater syrup; the Greek variety usually contains walnuts and honey. In Lebanon coffee is served throughout the day, at home and in public cafes. Lebanese coffee is strong, thick, heavily sweetened and often flavored with cardamom.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Though most of the Lebanese population are Muslims and observe the Islamic New Year, they also celebrate the New Year's Day that begins the Gregorian calendar year. This custom may be ascribed to Lebanon's remaining under French influence for a considerable length of time. This is a public holiday. As in the rest of the world, Lebanese spend the day in parties and get-togethers along with friends and family members.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Although the earliest origins of May 1 celebrations are ascribed to the pagan celebrations practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, contemporary observances of Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, began in 1889 when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Lebanon the day is celebrated by processions, public speeches, and trade union activities.

❁ MARTYRS' DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 6

Martyrs' Day, or Press Day, recaptures the gory episode of May 6, 1916 (during World War I), when Lebanese journalists were executed by the Ottoman authorities in Martyrs' Square in downtown Beirut. In Lebanon May 6 is still commemorated annually as Press Day. The activities on this day include processions and public speeches.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 22

This day holds tremendous significance for the people of Lebanon. On this day Lebanon finally won its freedom from French rule in 1943. It is a public holiday, and all public and government institutions are closed. The day is commemorated with flag raising ceremonies, parades, and public speeches.

Religious Holidays

❁ ARMENIAN CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

In Lebanon Christmas is popularly known as "Armenian Christmas." It is a culmination of celebrations of events related to Jesus' incarnation. Theophany, or Epiphany (Astvadz-a-baytnootyoon in Armenian) means "revelation of God," the central theme of the Christmas season in the Armenian Church. During the Armenian Christmas season, the major events celebrated include the Nativity of Jesus in Bethlehem, followed by his Baptism in the river Jordan. Christmas, a major feast in the Armenian Church, is celebrated on January 6.

In Lebanon, which has a sizable population of Armenian Christians, the day is observed with prayers and colorful processions outside the churches, where the clergy and the common people mingle together, chanting and listening to band music.

❁ ORTHODOX CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 7

Orthodox Christmas is celebrated by Ethiopians, Russians, Lebanese, and Ukrainians on January 7 according to the Julian calendar. By following this calendar Orthodox Christians remain true to the traditions of their ancestors.

Orthodox Christmas, also known as the Feast of Epiphany and the Feast of Nativity, celebrates the visit of the three wise men from the East to the newborn Jesus. There is a great deal of preparation, including a 40-day fasting period, although some Orthodox Christians observe this just a week before the event.

In Lebanon on Christmas Eve, observant Orthodox Christians fast until late evening, when the first star appears. When the star is seen, people lay the table for their Christmas supper. On Christmas Day the devout take part in a divine liturgy, after which many walk in procession to seas, rivers, and lakes. Everyone comes together for outdoor ceremonies to bless the water. Some take water home to bless their houses. Then a great feast is held indoors where people eat, drink, and enjoy themselves.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also known as Eid ul-Zuha, Bakr-Eid, and the Feast of Sacrifice, marks Ibrahim's (Abraham's) unflinching faith in God, demonstrated by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because the Almighty commanded him to do so. In Lebanon (as in other Islamic countries) on this day it is mandatory for each family to sacrifice sheep, goats, rams, or cattle in the name of God; this meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor. Prior to this festival, the devout Muslims may, if it is physically and financially feasible, undertake a hajj,

The Julian Calendar

The Julian calendar is 13 days behind the Gregorian calendar, which is used by most of the world. It dates back to January 146 B.C.E. when the Greek astronomer Sorsigenies established the length of the solar calendar for Julius Caesar. He found it to be 365 and a quarter days. Every fourth year an extra day was added to keep the quarter days accurate. This resulted in a 10-day gap in the solar calendar by 1528. In March 1582 Pope Gregory XIII (r. 1572–85) rectified this by removing 10 days between March 11 and 21. As a result in Roman Catholic countries March 12–20, 1582 never existed.

St. Maroun

Saint Maroun (d. 1003) was raised in the city of Kouroch, located northeast of Antioch, in Turkey. It is believed that Maroun chose a very high location at the Semaan Mountain (formerly called Nabo Mountain after the pagan god Nabo). Geographically Semaan Mountain is located between Antioch and Aleppo. People had abandoned the mountain for years, and the area was completely deserted.

The ruins of an historic pagan temple that existed on the mountain attracted Maroun. He moved to this mountain and took up the life of a hermit. He made the ruined temple his residence after purging it of devils, but used it only for masses and offerings of the Eucharist. He used to spend all his time in the open air, praying, fasting, and depriving his body of all means of comfort. He became famous in the whole area for his faith, holiness, and power of healing. Thousands of believers came to him seeking help and advice.

He was a mystic who started a new ascetic-spiritual method that attracted many people. He was a zealous missionary with a passion to spread the message of Christianity. He sought not only to cure the physical ailments that people suffered, but also wanted to nurture and heal the “lost souls” of both pagans and Christians of his time. Maroun’s holiness and countless miracles made him famous throughout the Antiochian Empire.

ST. MAROUN’S DAY

Observed by: Maronite Christians

Observed on: February 9

St. Maroun’s Day is a Maronite Christian observance that honors the founder of the Maronite Church, St. Maroun. Maroun was a Jacobite recluse who retired to the top of Mt. Nabo to meditate and pray. He was also renowned for his power to heal the sick. On the ninth of February, Maronite Christians remember what they have been exposed to, since the fourth century, both tranquil and turbulent times. They recollect their past, examine the present, and contemplate the future. They also pray for peace, democracy, and freedom on this day.

EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Islam’s calendar is based on the revolutions of the Moon, so it has only 354 days. The Islamic New Year, El am Hejir, is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first Islamic month. Compared to Western calendars, the Islamic year is 11 days shorter every year. Hence the Western date for this holiday shifts from one year to next. The beginning of the new year is usually quiet, unlike New Year’s celebrations associated with other calendars. In Lebanon Muslims gather in mosques for special prayers and readings. They recount the story of the Hegira, Muhammad’s flight from Mecca to Medina. Muhammad’s flight marked the beginning of the Islamic era.

ASHURA

Observed by: Shia Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Along with other Islamic countries with a sizable Shia (or Shiite) population, Lebanese Muslims observe Ashura, also called the Mourning of Karbala, as a day of mourning in honor of Hussein, Muhammad’s grandson, and other martyrs who sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Karbala. Observed primarily on the 10th day of Muharram, it consists of two days of fasting and prayers for forgiveness. Shia Muslims in particular use the day to commemorate the martyrdom of Hussein.

In Shiite communities this is a solemn day: Plays reenacting the martyrdom are often staged and many take part in mourning rituals. Shia, however, end their 10-day observance with a large procession that reenacts Hussein’s funeral. Some of the Shia men flagellate or ritually cut themselves. They believe that inflicting bloody wounds on themselves will connect them with Hussein’s suffering and guarantee their salvation on the day of judgment.

For Sunni Muslims, Ashura has been a voluntary day of fasting because it also commemorates two historic events: the day Nuh (Noah) left the Ark, and the day that Musa (Moses) was saved from the Egyptians by Allah.

❁ HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last week of Lent

In Lebanon on every Friday evening during Lent, a special church service is performed that reenacts the stages of Jesus' progress to Mt. Calvary. These services end on Good Friday, when the statue of Jesus is taken down from the altar, placed in a coffin, and carried around the church or even into the surrounding neighborhood. The statue is left in the coffin during Easter Saturday and the church is in mourning until the Easter service held at midnight on Saturday or on Sunday morning. In addition, Lebanese fast during Lent, and on Good Friday no one eats meat or other animal products.

On Easter Saturday people visit seven churches to be blessed at each. Some people place dough outside in a tree on Saturday night, believing it will be blessed by Jesus. On Sunday evening they also place small pieces of this dough in other food containers so that these too become blessed.

On Easter Sunday and Monday, people feast and take sweets such as chocolates to friends and family. Easter, or Pascha, is a solemn occasion, celebrating the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. On Easter Sunday all families hold a special lunch at which turkey or chicken (stuffed with nuts) is served with rice. An important practice during Easter is the preparation of the maamoul. Maamoul are little cakes, made with semolina, covered with icing, sugar, and filled with walnuts or dates. Each household has the maamoul laid out on a big plate with other delicacies such as chickpeas covered with sugar and sugared almonds.

During Lent the children of the villages collect eggs that they color and then use for egg-cracking games at Easter. Traditionally the eggs were dyed in colors of brown, green, yellow, and red. The afternoon is spent visiting family and friends. Easter visits often extend to weeklong holidays for visiting friends and relatives in distant places.

❁ MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the fifth month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi, is celebrated on the 12th day of Rabbi al-Awwal, the fifth month of the Islamic calendar, to mark the birthday of Muhammad, who entered the world in 570. On this day Muslims focus on his life and teachings, sing songs, and say special prayers. This is a low-key affair because it is believed that Muhammad urged his followers not to make a spectacle of his birthday.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

The festival symbolizes the final journey of the Blessed Virgin (the mother of Jesus) to heaven. The Christian population of Lebanon celebrates this day with traditional prayers and visits to local churches. Mary's passage into heaven is called the Assumption of Mary by Catholics and the Dormition of the Theotokos by the Eastern Orthodox Church. It is also known as the Feast of the Dormition, which means "falling asleep," emphasizing the belief that Mary did die a mortal death before her Assumption.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, or Festival of Fast-Breaking, this festival marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan, the holiest month of the Islamic calendar when the Koran requires Muslims to observe a month-long fast from dawn to dusk of every day. It was during this month that Muhammad fasted for 40 days, after which the Koran was revealed to him.

Lebanese Muslims mark this day by wearing new clothes and taking part in community prayers with their Muslim brethren in mosques. This is followed by social visits, exchanges of greetings and gifts, and partaking of delicacies, in particular maamoul, which the women have prepared for this occasion.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian festival that honors and remembers all Christian saints, both known and obscure. This day is meant to remember, thank God for, and also to venerate the saints in heaven for their various acts of kindness and charity. In Lebanon on this day people pay homage to the respective patron saints of each village by decorating the local church and holding processions that include statues of the saints.

Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

A Muslim nikah ("wedding") can be scheduled for any time convenient to both parties. Once the date has been set, the boy's father sends a cash present to the girl's father. This custom is called Legan-Chir. Before the wedding some ceremonies are usually held in both the girl's and the boy's homes. The day before the wedding, the groom's father sends mebendi, body artists, to the bride's house to color her hands and feet. On the day of the wedding the bridegroom, wearing a turban with a floral veil (sebra) tied on his forehead, leads a procession to the bride's house.

The structure of the ceremony is left to the judgment of the qazi (the person who solemnizes the wedding). The most common matrimonial service is one in which the qazi, the bridegroom, and the bride's attorney, accompanied by the witnesses, assemble in a convenient place. This is the point at which arrangements are made regarding the amount of the dowry (mehr). The bridegroom then repeats various lines after the qazi and finishes by repeating kabul three times. The ceremony concludes with the marriage contract, the nikah-nama, being signed by the newlyweds and two witnesses.

The wedding is followed by a huge reception hosted by the bride's parents. The groom's family also throws a reception to welcome and honor the new bride. This feast is called the Dawat-e-walima.

Lebanese Christian weddings take place in a church. When the groom-to-be sets out for the church, accompanied by his a best man (usually a brother or friend), the women standing around shower them with rice, while chanting blessings and making a shrill whistling noise. Usually people go all the way to their family's original village to get married. The couple enters the church together. After the vows have been made, musicians play and dancers perform a traditional dance (dabke). The troupe engages the couple in dancing along with them in front of the guests. Sabers are brought for the newlyweds, who dance while holding them above their heads, a reminder of the saber dance that was traditionally performed in the villages by professional dancers. Thereafter the couple and their families line up for kisses and blessings. The assembled guests shout congratulatory messages to the newlyweds; they also wish good luck to the couple's young unmarried siblings and cousins who may hope to be married in the near future. The bride then throws her bouquet, champagne bottles are opened, and the wedding cake is cut.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Present-day Lesotho was formerly called Basutoland and has been inhabited by Sotho-speaking people since the 16th century. The Qhauique people inhabited Lesotho before the Sothos supplanted them. The Dutch East India Company came to Cape Town in the 17th century in a bid to supply passing ships. The company settled down to practice agriculture and began expanding with the help of African slaves. By the late 18th century about 435 miles from Cape Town, colonialists had to wage long wars with Bantu-speaking chiefdoms for control and power. At the same time in areas that were beyond European colonial control, a strong Zulu state emerged under their leader Shaka. The descendants of the original colonial Dutch settlers, the Boer Voortrekkers (Afrikaans for pioneers, literally “those who move ahead”), began expanding too.

Moshoeshoe (1786–1870), the Basotho leader, brought together the people of Basutoland, which later came to be called Lesotho. Moshoeshoe came to be known as Moshoeshoe the Great because he was the first one to organize the people of his group, forging a strong Basotho identity. The Boers threatened Moshoeshoe's kingdom in 1834 while advancing toward the northern Orange Free State. Moshoeshoe sought refuge with the British, and his kingdom was made a British protectorate in 1868. In 1871 it became a part of Cape Colony and, in 1884, a separate British colony. Basutoland subsequently became a high commission British territory in South Africa (along with Bechuanaland Protectorate and Swaziland).

Modern party politics began in 1952 when the Basutoland Congress Party (BCP) was formed. In 1955 the BCP started a military campaign and demanded freedom, which was subsequently achieved. Basutoland received limited self-governance from the British with King Moshoeshoe II (1938–96; of the BCP) winning the 1960 elections. In the 1966 elections Chief Leabua Jonathan (1914–87) of the Basutoland National Party (BNP) defeated him, becoming the first prime minister of independent Lesotho. Chief Jonathan was defeated in the 1970 elections, but he banned the opposition, suspended the constitution, expelled the king, and ruled until 1986 in a one-party Lesotho state.

In 1993 constitutional government was restored after 23 years of military rule. Ntsu Mokhehle (1918–99), leader of the majority Basotho Congress Party, became the prime minister. In 1998 South Africa and Botswana, representing the Southern African Development Community, intervened on the Lesotho government's behalf to quell mutinies and rebellion. In the 2002 elections the Lesotho Congress for Democracy (created from the BCP) won again but had to declare an emergency after a three-year drought in 2004. In the month following the declaration of emergency, the Lesotho Highlands Water Project, which was infamous because of a corruption scandal, finally became functional, supplying much-needed water to the people. With unemployment rising as high as 40 to 50 percent, the functioning of the project was a sign of economic promise as well.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Lesotho is rightly called the “Kingdom in the Sky” because the major portion of the country lies on a highland (Karoo Basin). The terrain is mostly hills, plateaus, and mountains. These mountains separate the country from South Africa, though they completely enclose the country.

Lesotho is also called the “Mountain Kingdom,” with tourists thronging to the region for its crystal clear waters and the greenery on the mountainsides. Geographically most of Lesotho is a high mountain plateau carved out by river valleys. The Maluti Mountains extend to the north and south, forming a plateau of 9,000 to 10,000 feet in height. Thabana Ntlenyana, at 11,425 feet, is the highest point in the nation. These mountains are famous for the rich volcanic soils deposited in their foothills as well as for their remarkable landscape. The sources of the two important South African rivers, the Orange and the Tugeld, are found in these mountains. The Caledon River, whose tributaries flow along the western border, also originates here. Lesotho is an alpine country. It has the highest low point of any country in the world.

The climate is greatly influenced by the highland position of Lesotho in the Karoo basin. Winters are generally dry and cool during the day, and cold during the night. There is heavy snowfall at least once annually. Skies are particularly clear and beautiful during this time. The summers are hot and humid. In fact the country gets 85 percent of its showers during summer. This can be attributed to the fact that Lesotho lies both in the Inter-Tropical Convergence Zone (ITCZ) and the Kalahari low-pressure area. The summer days are usually cloudy with strong winds and hailstorms a normal occurrence.

❁ ECONOMY

Water is referred to as “white gold” by the Basotho people; it is Lesotho's key natural resource. Others include agricultural and grazing land, diamonds, and minerals. The Lesotho Highlands Water Project (LHWP) placed Lesotho among the top 10 gross domestic product (GDP) earning countries in Africa in 1995 and 1996. According to the LHWP Treaty between Lesotho and South Africa, Lesotho earns royalties from the sale of water to South Africa without incurring any cost toward transporting the water, thus adding substantially to the national income. The tourism industry also has a major share in the country's GDP. Most small-scale industries are related to animal husbandry and agriculture. These include food processing, footwear, clothing, textiles, and construction.

Agriculture is perennially challenged because of the short farming season. A major problem of the economy is unemployment and the extreme inequality of income distribution. Lesotho is party to the International Monetary Fund's Interim Poverty Reduction and Growth Facility. Increasing importance is being given to the private sector, globalizing trade and production in Lesotho. This emphasis aligns Lesotho with South Africa and other members of the Southern African Development Community (SADC), and with the larger world economy.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Basotho are rich in traditions and animist beliefs. The kingdom had originally united under the leadership of Moshoeshe the Great to preserve its identity and cultures from colonizers and the Zulu leader Shaka. They continue their efforts in preserving and promoting their art forms and cultural heritage.

From birth until death, music and dance are included in all important ceremonies. Herding boys are known to play a flutelike instrument called the lekulo; women play the thomo, a stringed instrument, while men play the setolo-tolo, an instrument that resembles and functions much like the Jew's harp, using their mouths to move its strings. Cattle play an important role in the society as they serve as sacrifices and also as a status symbol in village culture.

Fun Fact

More than 80 percent of the country is situated at a height of 5,906 feet (more than a mile) above sea level.

Fun Fact

There is an old tradition in Lesotho of controlling the weather and crops by performing sacred rituals such as rain dances and animal sacrifices.

Fun Fact

Lesotho is a cool mountainous country, and the people have developed clothing well suited to that environment. Dressing in brightly colored woolen Basotho blankets keeps the rain off and wards off the chill.

CUISINE

The hotels in the capital city of Maseru serve international food, and European and Indian cooking styles have both influenced cooking in Lesotho. Though much of the country's food is imported from South Africa, freshwater fish is found in abundance. Traditional food items include corn, pumpkin, sugar beans (a side dish made of beans and legumes), and wild spinach. Corn is eaten ground or as kernels in porridge with sour milk. Some dishes of the Basotho (or Sotho) people include one made with greens like spinach and potatoes called moroko (morogo), a rice dish called nyekoe, and traditional Sotho sour maize porridge, which is prepared from fermented corn. It can be served with meat and/or morogo. Sadza and nshima are similar dishes. Homemade alcoholic drinks or beer are known as bojoala, joala, or letting.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Day is one of the most celebrated days in the world. In Lesotho people gather to enjoy music, dance, and feasting. The various tribes of Lesotho welcome the new year with their own traditional dances and feasts.

MOSHOESHOE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 11

This day commemorates the death of the founder of the nation, the Great Moshoeshoe, in 1870. The day's festivities begin with the sitting king's inspection of the honor guard of the Lesotho Defense Force members. He then receives a message and a gleaming torch from a runner, who comes from Moshoeshoe's fort in Thaba Bosiu, a place of great significance in the country's history located about 180 miles away from the capital city of Maseru. After delivering the message of peace to the nation, the king lights the ceremonial flame to mark the beginning of the ceremony. Most leaders of King Letsie III underwent five years of painful struggle to find the right woman to marry. He appealed to leaders such as Nelson Mandela of South Africa to help in his search. Finally after a lot of searching, the would-be queen was found in the house of a common family. Thirty-three cows are usually given as bride-price (labola), but because it was the royal family, they decided to give the bride's family 40 instead.

Lesotho are then led by the king to place garlands at the Moshoeshoe I monument in the capital city, Maseru. Public institutions remain closed on this day.

NATIONAL TREE PLANTING DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 21

The soil of Lesotho is of very poor quality. Only 1 percent of the total land area has tree cover. The rising population is further taxing the existing per capita availability of land. In light of these concerns, on March 21 trees are planted all over the nation to curb soil erosion. Individuals, communities, and associations plant trees along with the forestry department. Some 1.2 million trees have been planted by the forestry department on various occasions, most prominently on National Tree Planting Day.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, was established in 1889 by the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, as a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world. The first demonstrations and celebrations were scheduled for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. On this day, public as well as private offices in Lesotho are closed.

FAMILY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 4

Family Day was initiated in 1991 by the African Union to draw attention to the rising number of destitute children due to poverty, HIV/AIDS, and divorce. This day especially focuses on orphans and their welfare in African countries.

KING'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 17

The birthday of the reigning King Letsie III (b. 1963) is celebrated in different districts each year so that more people can appreciate the king and his achievements. The king's birthday is also always celebrated at Matsieng, his hometown. He wears his traditional red regalia with white stripes and receives a 21-gun salute. The national anthem is sung, and the king inspects the honor guard. This is followed by a prayer reading session sponsored by the Christian Council of Lesotho, which is responsible for the spiritual well-being of the nation. Celebrants recite parts of Psalm 21, offer prayers, and wish the king a long and prosperous life. These ceremonies culminate with traditional dances and music. In Lesotho banks are closed on July 17.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 4

October 4 marks the day Lesotho received its official freedom from British rule in 1966. Since that day Lesotho has continued as a constitutional monarchy with the king as its head. Independence Day celebrations in Lesotho involve developmental initiatives in different parts of the country. For instance, in the 2002 Independence Day celebrations, King Letsie III led the public to the Sekoati village for a tree-planting campaign. This village was chosen because it faces an intense soil erosion problem. The king, the queen, the prime minister, his cabinet, all the heads of diplomatic missions, and general public were all present to mark the occasion.

Religious Holidays

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

This day, also called Black Friday, Holy Friday, or Great Friday (in the Orthodox Church), is observed in remembrance of the Crucifixion of Jesus. Christians in Lesotho attend church, sing hymns, and pray. The life of Jesus is remembered through enacting plays and singing devotional songs. People also conduct processions to reenact Jesus' last journey to Calvary. Most Basotho observe a partial fast.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection on the third day following his death on the Cross. It celebrates the victory over death and the regeneration of life. It falls on the first Sunday after the fasting period of Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. Easter Monday, the day after Easter, is a public holiday in Lesotho, with government offices, schools, and many businesses closed.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Having been a part of the British Empire, Lesotho's Christmas celebrations are largely influenced by British traditions. Christians celebrate the birth of Jesus on this day by attending church services and singing hymns during the midnight services on Christmas Eve. It does snow in Lesotho, but not in December. Therefore the white color of Christmas celebrations is missing, though not the enthusiasm and joy of getting together with friends and family on this Christian holiday.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day, celebrated in some Christian countries as St. Stephen's Day, derives from a medieval British custom of giving servants and peasants Christmas gifts the day after Christmas. On this day boxes used for collecting money for the poor were also opened, hence the name, Boxing Day. Also gifts are given to those who render service to the community throughout the year.

A former British colony, Lesotho is a part of the Commonwealth group of nations. The Commonwealth of Nations is an association of independent nations, most of which are former colonies of the British Empire. They share some common cultural links, which were influenced by the British, and Boxing Day is one of them.

❁ THE MORIJA ARTS AND CULTURAL FESTIVAL

Observed in: Morija
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Late September or early October

This annual festival is celebrated in Morija in late September or the beginning of October. It highlights the varied arts, dance forms, singing styles, films, and dramatic forms that have come to be an integral part of the people of Lesotho's lives. It is an attempt to preserve and promote their diverse culture. Through 40 events in eight venues of Morija, Lesotho invites people to cherish the art and craft displays at Thabeng Football Ground (the main venue), attend jazz concerts, and eat traditional meals or light snacks from the tearoom. This festival is also meant to promote the tourism industry in addition to cultivating the cultural pride of the people of Lesotho.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In a village there are several ways of celebrating a child's birth. The village chief can give away young girls to spiritual leaders, entrusting them with bringing these girls up to follow their path. As a ritual the father is usually welcomed to see his newborn daughter, and water drops are splashed on him. Another birth ritual involves wrapping the baby in a special blanket, which can later be used by the mother to tie the baby on her back.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Basotho teenagers are sent for lebollo, that is, the practice of initiation into adulthood, at a lebollong, or the initiation places, for a month or two. Ideally they emerge mature and courageous enough to handle a family, able to fight (if they are boys), and able to cook and raise children (if they are girls). Mokorotlo is the initiation ritual dance for boys. Circumcision of boys is prevalent in Lesotho. A young male is sometimes circumcised under unscientific and unhygienic conditions, which can lead to infection and even death. He is also given a special blanket as a symbol of adulthood.

❁ MARRIAGE

Traditionally, the groom gives a herd of cattle to the bride's father and includes a special blanket among his gifts (bokali). Women from the bride's family chase away the cattle using sticks and rocks, while the groom has to round them up and bring them back. This ceremony takes place on the day of the wedding. The wedding party arrives at the church blowing horns and singing, while those who have already arrived join in with more music and clapping. The groomsmen wear black, while the bridesmaids dress in silver gowns. The bride's brother and the groom's sister escort the couple into the church. Older women sweep the ground in front of the groom, waving a cloth and singing. People gather around to watch them and enjoy the ceremony. Once inside, rings are exchanged and the wedding cake is cut. Usually a preacher is asked to give a sermon about life. When he has finished, everyone moves into the reception tent where there is major feasting and merrymaking.

❁ DEATH

There is a Basotho belief that the spirit hovers around the body after death. If someone were to cut the dead person's tongue or drive a peg through his head, the spirit could be turned into a ghost. Because of this belief, the dead body is carefully protected before being safely buried. The belief that the ancestors' spirits look after the family is widespread, though spirits can also induce illness in some family members so that they will have their company after death. To avoid this condition, a traditional healer, called ngaka, contacts the evil spirit and restores good relations between the spirit and the family. Traditional religious healers are also called if the person has died suddenly.

A man shaves his head and wears a black scarf as a sign of mourning on the death of his father. If an important member of the Mosotho tribe dies, the hut is dropped over him, and that place is never visited again. This act symbolizes the complete end of the deceased.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Republic of Liberia has the distinction of being the oldest republic on the African continent. The word Libéria was derived from the Latin word for “freedom” and means “land of the free.” It was founded in 1820 by freed American slaves. Eighty-six Americo-Liberians (as they called themselves) came to Liberia and on February 26, 1820, established their first settlement in Christopolis. Later, in 1824, the main city, Christopolis, was renamed Monrovia in honor of the president of the United States of America James Monroe (1758–1831). Thus Liberia owes its origin to slavery or the, “peculiar institution” as it came to be known in 19th-century America.

Although not much is known about the history of Liberia before 1820, it is believed that the Bassa, Malinke, and Gó tribes were the main inhabitants of the region. The Portuguese were the first Europeans to arrive in the region in 1461.

West Africa generally had been at the center of the European slave trade since the 15th century. Yet until the arrival of the Americo-Liberians in 1820, no Western powers had established an outpost in the region. Thus Liberia was neither a colony nor an independent country. Following the American Revolution, as the United States grappled with the question of slavery, some reformers sought to solve the problem by encouraging emancipation of slaves with the promise that freed slaves would be removed from the country and resettled in Africa. Although most free blacks rejected the proposal, as did later white abolitionists, initially the idea attracted prominent support. The American Colonization

The American Colonization Society

The American Colonization Society (ACS; more formally the National Colonization Society of America) was founded in 1816 by Reverend Robert Finley, a Presbyterian minister. The first president of the organization was a Virginian, former U.S. President James Monroe, and Henry Clay from Kentucky was its president from 1836 to 1849.

Because prominent Southerners were involved in the ACS, U.S. abolitionists attempted to discredit its colonization project as a “slaveholders’ scheme.” Although it is popularly believed that the ACS was established to buy the freedom of slaves and pay their passage to Liberia, this was not the case. In fact the ACS tried unsuccessfully to persuade the U.S. Congress to provide funds to colonize Liberia, but it had better luck with several state legislatures including those of Virginia, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

An early leader of the ACS, Jehudi Ashmun (1794–1828), envisioning an American empire in Africa, began leasing, annexing, or buying tribal lands, but he was also prepared to use force if necessary to expand the colony’s territory, and his aggressiveness quickly intimidated Liberia’s African neighbors. In an 1825 treaty Ashmun convinced King Peter and several other tribal kings to sell their land to him for 500 bars of tobacco, three barrels of rum, five casks of powder, five umbrellas, ten iron posts, and ten pairs of shoes, among other items.

The ACS controlled Liberia’s development until 1847 when, afraid that the British intended to annex the colony, Liberia declared itself a free and independent state, and enacted a constitution that closely followed its U.S. model. By 1867 the society had sent more than 13,000 emigrants to Liberia. By the end of the U.S. Civil War in 1865, President Lincoln was one of the few advocates of colonization in the U.S. government, and the project was abandoned after he was assassinated, although the ACS was not officially dissolved until 1964. In 1913, and again when it formally dissolved in 1964, the society donated its records to the Library of Congress.

Society (ACS) emerged in 1816 and later chose this region in West Africa to begin the resettlement program for freed slaves.

While the colonization plan failed to end slavery in the United States, some 19,000 freed slaves did find their way to West Africa, along with some 5,000 others recaptured from slave ships. For them Liberia was a “Promised Land.” As American freed slaves arrived in Liberia, they brought with them American ideas and culture. The Americo-Liberians formed the dominant group within the population and founded the Republic of Liberia on July 26, 1847. Joseph Jenkins Roberts (1809–76), an Americo-Liberian who was born and brought up in the United States, became the first president of independent Liberia.

Following the foundation of the country Americo-Liberians dominated Liberia, establishing themselves as an elite class and causing resentment and tension with the indigenous Africans they ruled. Escalating economic difficulties weakened the state’s dominance over the coastal indigenous population. As conditions worsened, Liberia attempted to modernize its economy with little success. By 1909 the government was bankrupt and forced to borrow, particularly from the United States. Liberia leased large areas of land on favorable terms to American companies such as Firestone, which developed a massive rubber plantation. With the complicity of the government, these companies exploited Liberia’s landscape and people. By 1930 the League of Nations substantiated charges that they employed “forced labor . . . hardly distinguishable from slavery.” The government collapsed, and the new president Edwin Barclay (1882–1955) introduced increasingly repressive laws to maintain control.

If Liberia established some political stability and economic success in the middle decades of the 20th century, by the 1980s ethnic hostilities had reemerged and conditions deteriorated. In 1980 Master Sergeant Samuel K. Doe (1950/51–90), an indigenous Liberian of the Krahn ethnic group, staged a military coup against the then-president of Liberia, William R. Tolbert (1913–80), and ordered the execution of the president and several government officials of Americo-Liberian descent. He formed the People’s Redemption Council (PRC) and assumed power in Liberia. Ethnic tensions led to violent protests and killings in different parts of Liberia. All political parties were banned until 1984. Elections resumed in 1985 and, despite allegations of fraud, Samuel Doe’s political party, the National Democratic Party of Liberia, was declared victorious. The situation worsened as ethnic violence engulfed the country, and there were reports of widespread corruption and human rights abuses.

On December 24, 1989, an invasion led by Charles Taylor (b. 1948), a former procurement chief of Doe’s brigade, received the overwhelming support of the Liberian people, who were tired of Doe’s oppressive regime. Taylor and his National Patriotic Front reached Monrovia within six months of their first attack. This marked the beginning of a civil war in Liberia that engulfed the region for almost 14 years. It is estimated that more than 200,000 Liberians were killed, and millions forced into exile, making it one of the bloodiest civil wars in the region. Although Charles Taylor was declared president of Liberia in 1997, the lives of Liberians failed to show any sign of improvement.

In August 2003, under mounting international pressure, President Taylor resigned and was exiled to Nigeria. A comprehensive peace agreement was signed between different warring factions in the region, and the National Transitional Government of Liberia (NTGL), comprising rebels, civil groups, and government, was placed in charge of Liberia. By 2004 the United Nations had completed the task of disarming former combatants. The country is slowly and steadily moving toward stability and trying to establish a normal life for its people, but the memories of a dark and bloody civil war remain fresh in the minds of Liberians.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in western Africa, the Republic of Liberia is flanked by the North Atlantic Ocean, Sierra Leone, Côte d'Ivoire, and the Republic of Guinea. Liberia's forests cover 60 percent of the country's area, and it is also home to 40 percent of the rain forests of western Africa. While the savannah (grasslands dotted with trees) covers 20 percent, farmland occupies 6 percent, leaving 14 percent of the land area for human habitation. Mount Wuteve is the most striking geographical feature of Liberia. The largest rivers in Liberia are the St. Paul, St. John, and Cavalla.

Liberia has extensive tropical trees such as mahogany, ironwood, and fig and is also home to a wide variety of animals such as monkeys, chimpanzees, buffalo, and endangered pygmy hippopotamuses. Liberia has a hot, tropical climate, with little variation in temperature. The winters are dry with hot days and cool, sometimes cold, nights, whereas the summers are cloudy with frequent showers. The wet season runs from May to October. The dry dust-laden harmattan wind blows from December to March, making the coastal belt particularly arid. The average mean temperature in Monrovia is 79°F in January and 75°F in July.

❁ ECONOMY

The civil war in Liberia crippled most of the economy from 1980 until the early 21st century. Businessmen fled the country during the war and took their wealth and expertise with them. Three-quarters of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture.

Liberia has favorable climatic conditions for agricultural activities, and in the past it has been a major producer and exporter of rubber and raw timber. Also the region is blessed with mineral resources, which can serve as an excellent revenue generator for the country. The unemployment rate nationally is estimated to be as high as 85 percent.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

When Americo-Liberians arrived in Liberia, they brought American culture and prejudices with them. They considered the word "tribal" derogatory since they believed they were more refined than the indigenous people. Accordingly, Liberians who were freed American slaves called themselves Americo-Liberian, while they referred to black Africans who were captured and forced into slavery, but who never reached the West, as Congo. The Congolese, also called African-Liberians, were treated as second-class citizens. Everything that came from the qui, or West, commanded great respect in the region. But as Christianity spread among the indigenous people, ironically the Americo-Liberians also began showing keen interest in animistic beliefs. Many of them participated in the secret rituals held by secret societies such as the poro for men and sande for women.

English is the official language of Liberia, although the different ethnic groups prefer to speak their own languages. The Kpelle, the Bassa, the Grebo, the Gio, the Vai, and the Kru are the main ethnic groups in Liberia, with the Kpelle being the largest among them. Among the Kpelle, the division of labor is clear and defined. Women shoulder the responsibility of gathering, fishing, weaving nets, and baskets, while men, who are mainly farmers, also engage in clearing brush, making furniture, and weaving mats.

Music is an integral part of Liberian culture. The country is home to indigenous folk music as well as Christian and Americo-Liberian music. Call-and-response, voice repetitions, and polyrhythmic tunes figure prominently in traditional Liberian music. Highlife music, which originated in Ghana, is also popular in Liberia.

Highlife Music

Highlife music originated in Sierra Leone and Ghana, where it was nurtured, and had slowly spread through different parts of West Africa by the 1920s. This unique style of music showcases jazz horns and multiple guitars, which provide the characteristic instrumentation of the bands. In the 1980s reggae was becoming popular worldwide and inspired a growing worldwide audience for other forms of world music that were easy to dance to. In Germany Ghanian immigrants to that country developed a distinctive type of highlife called “burger highlife.” Highlife music, which was often fused with reggae, reached a wider European and U.S. audience during this decade. More recently the style has begun to be more synthesizer-driven and to sound more uptempo.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day. However, since the beginning of the civil war, New Year's Day celebrations have been suspended in Liberia. All public and private institutions are closed on New Year's Day.

ARMED FORCES DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February 11

Armed Forces Day honors the personnel of the armed forces of Liberia. Awards and military honors are conferred on this day. Parades by all branches of the armed forces, in full regalia, and inspections of guards of honor take place in the capital of Monrovia.

DECORATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Second Wednesday in March

This was originally a legal holiday observed annually on the last Monday in May in the United States, in honor of the nation's armed services personnel killed in war. The holiday was initially known as Decoration Day because it is a time for decorating graves with flowers and flags. On this day the people honor and pay floral tributes to all those who laid down their lives for their homeland. Decoration Day is a national holiday in Liberia. On this day Liberians also visit the graves of their loved ones and pay their respects.

J. J. ROBERTS'S BIRTH ANNIVERSARY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 15

J. J. Roberts's Birth Anniversary commemorates the birthday of the first president of the Republic of Liberia Joseph Jenkins Robert. He was born on March 15, 1809, in Virginia. He migrated to Liberia with his family in 1829 and became a merchant and a leading exporter. In 1838 the Americo-Liberian settlers decided to form a Commonwealth of Liberia and asked the American Colonization Society (ACS) to appoint a governor for the region. During the Commonwealth period (1839–47) he became the first African governor of the region. When the Republic of Liberia came into existence, he was appointed its first president.

Liberia prospered under his leadership. Among his achievements was the establishment of the Liberia College to spread education in the region. After his death he willed a considerable portion of his estate to a trust that would help improve Liberia's educational facilities. Official speeches and parades by the armed forces used to mark the celebrations before the outbreak of civil war. Celebrations have been suspended since the war began.

NATIONAL REDEMPTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 12

National Redemption Day commemorates the military coup led by Samuel Kanyon Doe on April 12, 1980, that led to the ouster and execution of President William R. Tolbert Jr. Since its inception Liberia had been governed by the True Whig Party, which was composed exclusively of freed American slaves or their descendants, known as Americo-Liberians. There was resentment among many indigenous native Africans regarding this state of affairs since they suffered years of repression by the Americo-Liberians.

Samuel Doe, a member of the indigenous Krahn ethnic group, led the coup that overthrew the Americo-Liberian regime. He then became the first native African to assume the presidency of the Republic of Liberia. The day commemorates the return of power of the Republic of Liberia to the indigenous inhabitants displaced by Americo-Liberians.

❁ SAMUEL KANYON DOE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 6

Samuel Kanyon Doe Day commemorates the birth anniversary of former president of the Republic of Liberia Samuel Kanyon Doe. Born in 1951, he was an ethnic Krahn, part of a rural impoverished tribe residing in inland Liberia. The Krahn were part of the large majority of the Liberian population of native African descent who had long been repressed by the Americo-Liberian elite, the progeny of the emancipated slaves-turned-colonists from America, the founders of Liberia in 1847. Doe joined the army after 11th grade and was trained by the American Green Berets; he soon rose to be a master sergeant.

On April 12, 1980, Doe successfully led a military coup and assumed the presidency of Liberia, killing President William R. Tolbert Jr., and establishing a military regime, the People's Redemption Council. Thus he became the first indigenous African to become the president of the republic. Doe was the president of Liberia from 1980 to 1990. His regime was an ethnically based dictatorship that suppressed political opposition and produced turmoil, civil war, and widespread misery.

May 6 commemorates the birthday of Doe. Because Doe is not universally admired, this day is marked by low-key civic ceremonies restricted mainly to his place of birth, Turzon in Grand Gedeh County. The lack of general celebration underscores his lack of popularity and discontent with his policies of blatant ethnic discrimination.

❁ UNITY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 14

Unity Day, also called Unification and Integration Day, is an annual Liberian celebration that occurs on May 14. This day commemorates the Unification and Integration Policy introduced by President William Tubman on May 14, 1944. This policy aimed to integrate the native inhabitants of Liberia into mainstream Liberian politics.

Prior to this the indigenous African tribes were not allowed to participate in or contest elections. Moreover there were frequent fights between the Americo-Liberians and the ethnic tribes because the indigenous people were treated as second-class citizens in their own homeland. Through this policy, President Tubman aimed to give a fair representation to the ethnic tribes of Liberia and, in the process, help foster unity and camaraderie between Americo-Liberians and African-Liberians.

❁ AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 25

Africa Day is celebrated to commemorate the formation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on May 25, 1963, at Addis Ababa in Ethiopia. This day salutes the efforts of all African nations to form a unified Africa as well as recognizes their desire to help each other in matters relating to trade and development of the continent as a whole.

The OAU has been instrumental in negotiating and ending disputes, conflicts, and wars within Africa. At present, there are 53 member countries in the OAU. Africa Day is a national holiday in Liberia, marked by lectures and meetings where matters of interest and concern to African nations are discussed.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 26

The Republic of Liberia declared its independence on July 26, 1847. Although Liberia was never ruled by a colonial power, its declaration of independence from the American Colonization Society was an important milestone in its history. It is one of the oldest independent nations of Africa, one which has endured despite great odds. In 1820 freed American slaves were sent to Liberia as a part of an African colonization or resettlement program. These Americo-Liberians, as they were known, established their first settlement in Christopolis (modern-day Monrovia).

With the backing of the United States, on July 26, 1847, the Republic of Liberia came into existence, and Joseph Jenkins Roberts became the first president. Independence Day used to be celebrated on a grand scale and with a great deal of patriotic fervor in Liberia prior to the civil war. The president still presides over the Independence Day parade and pays tribute to the founders of the nation but on a much-diminished scale.

❁ NATIONAL FLAG DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 24

The 11 stripes in the Liberian Flag represent the 11 signatories of the Liberian Declaration of Independence, and the colors red and white signify courage and moral excellence. While the blue square represents the African mainland, the white star stands for the freedom granted to the slaves by the United States. Flag-raising and other civic ceremonies mark the day in Liberian towns and cities.

❁ THANKSGIVING

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Thursday in November

In Liberia the first Thursday in November is observed as Thanksgiving day. All public and private institutions remain closed on this day. After Liberia became an independent nation, its legislature acknowledged “Liberia’s dependence on the great arbiter of events and established a Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the many good and loving kindnesses shown toward us as a people.” A law to that effect was passed in 1870; since then Thanksgiving has been celebrated in Liberia. Thanksgiving is a very important holiday in the United States, where many of Liberia’s citizens had come from.

Observed on: November 11

Remembrance Day, also called Veterans’ or Armistice Day, marks the official end of World War I on November 11, 1918. On this day the people of Liberia, together with their counterparts in other nations, observe a minute of silence at 11 A.M. as a mark of respect. Veterans’ organizations hold parades to pay homage to the soldiers who laid down their lives during this war. Over the years it has become an occasion for honoring and remembering the dead of later wars as well.

❁ PRESIDENT W. V. S. TUBMAN’S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 29

This day commemorates the birth anniversary of one of the most popular presidents of Liberia William Vacanarat Shadrach Tubman. He was born on November 29, 1895, and served as president from 1944 until his death in 1971. The hallmark of his presidency was the Unification and Integration Policy, which changed the course of history in Liberia.

Prior to the introduction of this policy, indigenous tribes were denied the basic right of representation in Liberia. The political system was dominated by the Americo-Liberians of the True Whig Party, while the native ethnic groups were not allowed to participate in Liberian elections. His landmark policy introduced the ethnic groups to Liberia’s politics and gave them a platform to voice their problems and grievances.

Throughout his presidency, he worked tirelessly to foster unity among Liberians. On this day, Liberians pay homage to the legacy of President Tubman and remember his political initiatives and his life. During his lifetime, his birthday celebrations were marked by cultural activities, music, and dance performances. Since his death, and particularly since the civil war, celebrations have been muted.

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world because it marks the birth of Jesus. It is one of the most important holidays for Christians in Liberia. Simplicity is the hallmark of Liberian Christmas celebrations. On Christmas Eve devout Christians attend a special evening service and usher in Christmas with carols. Singing and dancing are an integral part of Christmas celebrations.

Before the civil war era, Christians and non-Christians in Liberia celebrated Christmas together. They would pray for peace and prosperity of the country. The government would also participate in the celebrations. All public and private institutions

Fun Fact

Unlike most countries in the world, decorated Christmas trees and exchanging gifts are not elements of traditional Christmas celebrations in Liberia. Feasting on Christmas is the Liberian way of celebrating this important religious occasion.

Secret Societies

In Liberia life is centered around the village and tribal community, and village elders usually have the last say in important decisions or ending disputes. Secret societies, such as the poro (for men) and the sande (for women) exercise control, not only of specific rituals and ceremonies, but are also capable of providing community stability during periods of upheaval. It is thought that as many as half of Liberia's population belongs to one secret society or another, including past presidents such as William Tolbert.

One of the crucial social functions of secret societies is initiating young people into the customs and rituals of the tribal community. When the youngsters in a tribe become teenagers, they attend bush schools set up by secret societies. Although the specifics of what is taught in these schools cannot be repeated, their purpose is to teach young people the values of their tribe and its traditions and to prepare them for adulthood. These bush schools can last from a few months to three years, a period of time organized by the town elders who are also leaders of the secret societies responsible for passing on esoteric information. When they graduate, the young adults emerge into the outside world covered in white body paint, which is believed to make them invisible to evil spirits.

The esoteric information controlled by Liberian secret societies cannot be given to outsiders, and the penalties for such breaches of trust range from banishment to death.

❁ KARAMU FEAST

Observed by: Africans and African-Americans

Observed on: December 31

Kwanza is an African American celebration of life, and the penultimate day of Kwanza festivities is celebrated as the Karamu Feast. Beginning on December 26 Kwanza is a weeklong festival that coincides with Christmas celebrations. Kwanza is a Swahili word that means "the first fruits." Although it is an African-American holiday inspired by the traditional African festivities after the first harvest of crops, Kwanza is celebrated by people of African origin in different parts of the world.

Founded by noted African-American Dr. Maulana Karega, each day of Kwanza is dedicated to one of the seven principles that form the core of African culture. These include: umoja ("unity"), kujichagulia ("self-determination"), ujima ("collective work and responsibility"), ujamaa ("cooperative economics"), nia ("purpose"), kuumba ("creativity"), and imani ("faith"). During the seven-day Kwanza festivities, family members light seven candles in a kinara ("candleholder") at the end of each day. People also exchange gifts.

Most African-Liberians wear their traditional clothes while joining in the Kwanza celebrations. The feast is structured with the host at the center of it all. It begins with extending a warm welcome to the elders and all those invited, sharing traditional stories or dancing and singing traditional songs by forming a unity circle, reviewing the year gone by, and making commitments for the coming year; performing rituals and ceremonies to honor ancestors, and rejoicing with traditional music and dance performances. A feast composed of traditional African delicacies is the highlight of the Karamu celebrations.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child calls for a big celebration in Liberia. Friends and family members are invited from all over the country, and a lavish feast is prepared to celebrate the birth of a child.

❁ MARRIAGE

Among many tribes in Liberia, polygamy is the preferred marital arrangement. The payment of bride-price is an integral part of the marriage structure and has to be paid outright. The Kpelle tribe lives in a patrilocal society; that is, after marriage the couple lives with the husband's family or clan. In lieu of bride-price, some Kpelle also accept bride-service, which means that the suitor will have to work for the bride's family and help them in their daily chores, as well as fulfill their needs, be it money or food.

❁ DEATH

Indigenous Liberians accept death as a part of life and treat it as an occasion to celebrate the life that has passed on to another world. Thus, when a person dies, a special ceremony is held that involves dancing and singing for the departed soul. Liberians believe that after people die, they join the ancestral spirits. There is great regard for ancestors in Liberia's indigenous societies.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, or Libya, attained its independence from Italy in 1951. The name Libya is derived from the name of an ancient Berber tribe and was a term used by the ancient Greeks to denote the entire northern region of Africa.

Libyan history has witnessed a spate of invasions by Vandals and Turks in the ancient past and in modern times, by Italy. The influence of these incursions can be seen in the culture of the region and of Libya. Though predominantly an Arab nation, Libya is home to a mix of diverse ethnic groups such as sub-Saharan Africans, Turks, Tuaregs, and Berbers.

Tripolitania, Fezzan, and Cyrenaica constitute the three distinct regions of Libya, each having a rich cultural and historical identity of its own. The Tripolitanian city of Tripoli served as an important center on the Saharan trade route and was also a haven for pirates and those involved in slave trading. In the seventh century, the Arab Muslims captured the Roman colonies of Tripoli and Cyrenaica. By the 19th centure, the region had been transformed into an independent Ottoman province. In 1911 it fell to the Italians.

In 1951 after the Italians were defeated by the Allied Forces in World War II, Libya was granted independence from Italy by the United Nations General Assembly. The joy of independence increased exponentially when the nation discovered oil in 1959. A decade later the ailing monarch was overthrown in a bloodless coup led by young Colonel Muammar al-Gaddafi. As of the early years of the 21st century, Muammar Gaddafi was the Arab world's longest serving leader.

The coup and Colonel Gaddafi's policies plunged the nation into an era of uncertainty with the international community stopping just short of labeling Libya a terrorist nation. In 1992 the United Nations blamed Gaddafi for the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, and imposed economic and political sanctions on Libya. Although the country claims to be a socialist state, it has no constitution, and Gaddafi's The Green Book is the law of the nation.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in North Africa Libya is flanked by Sudan and Egypt

The Green Book

Colonel Gaddafi is the author of The Green Book, wherein he has put forth his ideas and aspirations for Libya. Although Libyans follow a traditional Muslim lifestyle, their adherence to Islam has a slight “Gaddafi twist” for Libyans have their own calendar based on the death of Muhammad rather than the Islamic norm of counting it from the Hegira or the migration of the prophet and his followers from Mecca to Medina. The book offers Gaddafi’s interpretation of Koran and Islamic values as well.

in the east and Tunisia and Algeria in the west, while Niger and Chad border it in the south, and the Mediterranean Sea forms its northern boundary. Libya is the fourth largest country in the African continent.

Agriculture is dependent on the limited rainfall received by the narrow coastal strip, where the Libyan capital of Tripoli is located. Ninety percent of the country’s population resides in this region. Primarily a desert nation, Libya enjoys a touch of the verdant in the Jebel Akhdar region, also known as the Green Mountains, in the northeast. Libya is also home to sand seas, which are vast expanses of shifting sand dunes. While the east boasts of Calanscio Sand Sea, the west takes pride in the Ubari and Murzuk Sand Seas.

Instead of perennial rivers, Libya has wadis or watercourses, which owe their existence to the infrequent rainfalls. The discovery of fossil aquifers in the southern and southeastern part of the nation inspired the government to provide water to the coastal areas and thereby assist in agricultural and industrial development. The project has been named the Great Man-Made River project and is touted as one of the world’s largest and most expensive engineering endeavors.

ECONOMY

Oil exports are the backbone of Libya’s economy. Besides oil, textiles and food processing are the other main industries in Libya. The primary crops are dates, olives, citrus fruits, and wheat. Due to the harsh climatic conditions, the nation imports 75 percent of its food requirements. Although the economy has suffered greatly due to the sanctions imposed by the international community, Libya is slowly but steadily concentrating on improving economic conditions. Privatization of industries is a major step in this direction, and with the lifting of sanctions and with business-friendly economic policies, businesses in Libya were beginning to flourish in the early years of the 21st century.

One of the preferred styles of the Bedouin poets was called huda or the “song of the camel driver.” It is said that the rhythm of this musical piece resembled the sound produced by the camel’s feet while walking.

LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

Libya has a predominantly Arab population. However, in terms of ethnicity, the country is home to sub-Saharan Africans, Berbers, Tuaregs, and Turks. The nomadic way of life has given way to a more settled lifestyle but not at the cost of tradition. In smaller towns tribalism remains a powerful force in every aspect of life.

Libyans are Sunni Muslims who follow a traditional Muslim lifestyle and are guided by Gaddafi’s The Green Book. They are conservative but not fundamentalist and are more accepting of the modern way of life than many other Arab nations. The official language of Libya is Arabic, although English is spoken in major business centers.

Libyan fine art has experienced a revival in the early years of the 21st century with private galleries holding painting and art exhibitions. In addition folk culture is alive both on Libyan soil as well as on the international stage.

Folk music with a distinctly Arabic flavor is popular in Libya. Instruments such as the flute, zokra (similar to a bagpipe), and oud (similar to a lute) are important in the Libyan Arab music scene. “Complication clapping” is a folk music form that involves rhythmic clapping by a group of people to create a melodious percussive sound. In Ghadames and the southern part of Libya, the people favor Tuareg folk dance and music. The great popularity of Libyan folk songs is attributed to the Bedouin poets who spread them all over Libya.

CUISINE

Libyan cuisine is sprinkled with Mediterranean, Arabic, and Italian flavors. The staple diet of Libya consists of chicken, beef, lamb, nuts, beans, dried apricots, and unleavened bread. Shakshouka (chopped vegetables in tomato sauce with an egg on top) and vegetable and meat stew are some of the most popular Libyan dishes.

Libyans typically have a light breakfast that consists of tea and a roll of bread or couscous (granular pasta) sweetened with milk and honey. Lunch, the biggest meal of the day, is eaten between 1:00 P.M. and 3:00 P.M. during which time all shops and businesses close. Libyans prefer to have a light dinner.

Before and after each meal Libyans say a prayer of thanks. Before eating they dip three fingers in a bowl of water as a ritual cleansing. People do not use knives and forks but prefer to eat using their right hand. Libyans consider the left hand to be unclean.

Libyan tea consists of mint and green tea leaves with plenty of sugar in it. In addition Libyans enjoy a thick, black, and extremely sweet coffee.

Italians after Colonel Gaddafi came to power. After Libya gained its independence in 1951, around 30,000 Italians continued to live in Libya and owned farms and property there. In 1960 a law was passed that prohibited Italians from purchasing additional land or property. After the coup in 1969 Colonel Gaddafi proclaimed that all the land taken by the Italians would be restored to the people of Libya. Fearing violence, the Italians quickly left Libya, although a small group did return.

❁ MARRIAGE

In pre-modern Libya arranged marriages were the norm, since young men and women were not permitted to meet socially. Professional matchmakers and even relatives were enlisted to find a suitable match among young people. Marriage between children of brothers or close relatives, and even within people of the same tribe, was preferred. The Tuareg tribes and other nomads were exceptions to the norm and allowed courtship prior to marriage.

In accordance with Islamic law, prior consent of the couple is required for a marriage to take place. A predetermined amount of money in the form of meber or dowry has to be provided to the bride by the groom's family. A husband can easily divorce his wife by repeating the word talaq or "I divorce you" in front of witnesses. However, a wife does not have this right and is expected to stay with her husband irrespective of her wishes. In case of a divorce the custody of the children will rest with the husband's family.

Islamic law allows a husband to take up to four wives, subject to certain conditions, while a woman is expected to be faithful to only one man. Polygamy, though legal in modern Libya, is not the norm. Only 3 percent of Libyans have more than one wife. Monogamy continues to be a preferred way of life in modern day Libya.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Compared to other European countries, the Principality of Liechtenstein has a relatively brief history. It was founded in 1719 and has only been independent since 1866.

Liechtenstein is named after the Liechtenstein Dynasty, which originated in Lower Austria. The family lived in Castle Liechtenstein between the 12th and 13th centuries. Although it acquired large areas of land and increased in power, it wanted a seat in the imperial government and toward that end eventually purchased a small county called Schellenberg in 1699 and then Vaduz in 1712, from the Habsburg Dynasty of Austria.

In January 1719 the purchase was considered complete and legal. Emperor Charles VI gave the two countries the name "Liechtenstein" after the name of his loyal servant, Anton Florian of Liechtenstein. Liechtenstein became a sovereign state of the Holy Roman Empire. In 1806 the French, led by Napoleon, invaded the Holy Roman Empire and the empire dissolved. The French occupied Liechtenstein for a few years; from 1815 to 1866, it was a member of the German Confederation and did not become fully autonomous until 1866.

Liechtenstein was closely linked to Austria until the end of World War I. After the war, the country was forced to seek help from another neighbor, Switzerland, which administered its external affairs. During World War II Liechtenstein remained neutral; after the war it gained popularity and became an important financial center. The country's economy improved rapidly, and today the standard of living of the people of Liechtenstein is one of the highest in the world.

In 1978, Liechtenstein became a member of the Council of Europe (COE). It joined the United Nations (UN) in 1991, and became a part of the European Economic Area (EEA) and the World Trade Organization (WTO) in 1995.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Principality of Liechtenstein is located in central Europe and is flanked by Austria to the east and Switzerland to the west. It is the fourth smallest country in Europe after Vatican City, San Marino, and Monaco.

Geographically Liechtenstein can be divided into three distinct regions: The lowlands in the north, the Rhine valley in the west, and the Tirolean Alps in the southeast. The country has a mountainous terrain; Grauspitz is the highest point in Liechtenstein and stands at 8,527 feet high. The Rhine

Fun Fact

The principality of Liechtenstein is one of only two doubly locked countries in the world. A doubly locked country is a country that is surrounded by landlocked countries. Uzbekistan is also a doubly locked country.

River forms the nation's western boundary with Switzerland.

Around 20 percent of Liechtenstein is covered with forests. The remaining land is used for cattle-grazing as well as the cultivation of crops such as wheat, potatoes, grapes, and vegetables.

Liechtenstein enjoys a continental climate, characterized by cold winters with frequent snowfall or rain, and warm and humid summers. Also a warm, southerly wind known as a foehn blows across Liechtenstein during the summer.

❁ ECONOMY

The Principality of Liechtenstein is one of the most prosperous and highly industrialized nations in Europe. In accordance with the Customs Treaty of 1924, signed between Switzerland and the Principality of Liechtenstein, the country uses the Swiss franc as its national currency, and Swiss customs authorities shoulder the responsibility of securing Liechtenstein's border with Austria. The industrial and service sectors of the economy are the main sources of employment. Almost 5 percent of the country's revenue is spent on research and development activities, but these also generate substantial revenue for the country. Relatively few Liechtensteiners engage in agricultural activity.

Liechtenstein is often used as a tax haven because of its low tax rates (the maximum tax rate is 20 percent) and a tradition of bank secrecy. The country's specialization in financial services has made it one of the most important financial centers in the world.

Liechtenstein is a member of the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) and the European Economic Area (EEA), an organization that acts as a bridge between the European Union (EU) and EFTA.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Approximately 86 percent of Liechtenstein's population consists of ethnic Alemmanics. However, the country is also home to people of other nationalities, including Turks and Italians.

Almost 76 percent of the country's population are Roman Catholic, while about 7 percent are Protestant. German is the official language of Liechtenstein, although Alemmanic, a Germanic dialect, is also spoken in some parts of the country.

Liechtensteiners are great music lovers, and concerts are held throughout the year. From classical music to rock and roll, from opera to rap, Liechtenstein enjoys a wide variety of music. There are many festivals and competitions featuring soloists, bands, and choirs.

Liechtensteiners have many traditions and customs related to holidays as well as to daily life. Despite the advent of Christianity, a number of pre-Christian rituals survive to this day.

Some of the most interesting traditions are observed during religious festivals such as Fat Thursday, when people try to blacken each other's faces using soot from scorched corks in a ritual known as ruassla (sooting). Also, in many parts of the country, on this day, people follow the tradition of stealing soup bowls.

An interesting ritual that originated in the Middle Ages is called kubberzle (little cow hearts). It is practiced in Oberland (Liechtenstein Upper Country) and takes place at the end of autumn when shepherds return from the Alps to the valley along with their herds. According to tradition a kubberzle is carved out of wooden boards, and helpers tie it around the brow of the cow that gives the best quality milk. Huge bells are tied around its neck, and a milking stool is secured firmly at the back of its neck. If there is any accident during the journey from the Alps to Oberland, then the wooden hearts are not tied to express loss and sorrow. People of Oberland also welcome the herders with great joy and decorate the villages with multicolored cloth ribbons and artificial flowers.

❁ CUISINE

Typical Liechtenstein dishes include crostini di mozzarella (ham, mozzarella cheese, and white bread), wurst (sausage), abbacchio brodetto (lamb cooked in sauce), rösti (fried shredded potatoes), and banana cuts (a dessert made from bananas). Wine is the favorite beverage and generally accompanies meals.

❁ CANDLEMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: February 2

Candlemas (Blessing of the Candles) is the last religious festival in the Christian liturgical calendar. It marks the end of the Christmas and Epiphany season and falls on February 2 in the Western churches (February 15 in the Orthodox Church). It is also known as the festival of the Purification of the Virgin or Presentation of Jesus in the Temple, since it was on this day that the Virgin Mary underwent a purification ritual in accordance with Jewish religious laws and Jesus was presented at the Temple in Jerusalem.

In Liechtenstein, devout Christians take special wax candles to church to get them blessed on Candlemas. Then they light candles near each window (or in every room) of their homes, seeking divine blessing for their family.

PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

In Liechtenstein, the Feast of Pentecost is celebrated on both Sunday and Monday. Pentecost, in Greek means "the fiftieth day." The feast celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles. Scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring.

Since the third century C.E., this holiday has also been called "Whitsun." This is because of the white garments worn by those who were baptized during the vigil.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas, a day of celebration for Christians all over the world, marks the birth of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. About two weeks before Christmas Liechtensteiners bring Christmas trees (pine trees) into their homes. Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24) and last until St. Stephen's Day on December 26.

On Christmas Eve the celebrants decorate their trees and place neatly wrapped presents around them. Many Christians attend a special Christmas Eve service in their local churches and celebrate the birth of Christ by singing Christmas carols and hymns. Children go to bed and wait for Christkindli (Father Christmas, or Santa Claus) to bring them gifts. Many families open their gifts on Christmas Eve, while others wait until Christmas Day.

On Christmas Day, Liechtensteiners visit their friends and family and exchange gifts and greetings. Many Liechtensteiners living in the urban areas travel to the countryside to celebrate Christmas with their extended families.

The Feast of St. Stephen is observed on December 26, the day after Christmas. St. Stephen is considered to be the first martyr of Christianity who was stoned to death by Roman rulers for speaking in favor of Christ and his disciples. In Liechtenstein his feast day is a national holiday, with schools and businesses closed for the day, extending the Christmas holiday. In other countries it is sometimes celebrated as Boxing Day.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Liechtenstein couples prefer to get married in a church in a solemn wedding ceremony. The bride and groom exchange their wedding vows and rings in the presence of the priest, family members, and friends. After the wedding the bride and groom are wished happiness and good luck in a special ceremony called Kranzna. In this ceremony a garland of pine brushwood, decorated with colorful paper flowers, is placed at the front door of the bride's home.

The wedding ceremony is followed by a lavish reception, characterized by dancing, singing, and feasting. Before the wedding dinner, it is traditional for the man who gives away the bride in marriage to stage a fake "kidnapping" of the bride, taking her to a nearby inn or restaurant. The groom has to "find" his bride—as well as foot the bill incurred as a result of the eating and drinking done by the kidnapper and his friends during the fake kidnapping.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Republic of Lithuania, an independent nation in northeastern Europe, obtained its independence from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) on March 1, 1990. Vilnius is the capital.

Not much is known about the early culture of Lithuania. It is believed that an ancient ethnic group known as Balts (Baltic people) were the original inhabitants of the region. The Balts are thought to have lived along the Baltic Sea since the third millennium B.C.E. and to have been made up of several tribes. They mainly spoke languages that belonged to the Indo-European group of languages. The inhabitants of the modern-day nations of Lithuania and Latvia are the descendants of the Balts.

The written history of Lithuania began in the 11th century. There were three dominant tribes in Lithuania at the time: the Samogitians, who ruled over the western parts; the Aukstaičiai, who exercised control in the eastern area; and the Yotvingians, who inhabited the southwestern parts of Lithuania and northern parts of Poland. Besides these three, there were other, smaller tribes scattered around the region. However, there was no unity among these tribes, and they were constantly engaged in tribal warfare.

In the 11th century, taking advantage of this lack of unity, the Ruthenians (people speaking east Slavic language) and the Danes (ethnic group of Denmark) carried out a number of raids on Lithuania. They defeated various tribes in the region and in exchange for peace, extracted exorbitant annual tributes.

In the early 13th century, a major portion of Latvia, Estonia, and some parts of Lithuania were conquered by the Teutonic Knights (German warriors who were part of a Roman Catholic crusade) and the Livonian Brothers of the Sword (German warrior-monks).

In response to these attacks, a number of tribal groups formed a united front led by the Aukstaitiai tribal leader Mindaugas against the invading forces, and they defeated the Livonians in the Battle of Sauliai in 1236. Mindaugas signed a peace agreement with the Teutonic Order in 1250 and embraced Christianity. He was crowned king of Lithuania on July 6, 1253.

The Baltic people, who held strongly to their pagan beliefs, led a strong army against King Mindaugas. In 1260 the pagan forces successfully defeated Mindaugas, and he was forced to renounce Christianity to keep his crown. He was killed in 1263 by his nephew Tretonia, who gained control of the region as the grand duke of Lithuania.

In 1377 Jogaila (Jagiello), a descendent of Tretonia, became the grand duke of Lithuania and signed a secret treaty with the Teutonic Order to end conflicts in the region. He embraced Christianity and came to be known by his Christian name, Ladilaus Jagiello. He married the monarch of Poland, Jadwiga, and on February 2, 1386, he was declared the king of Poland. On July 1, 1569, by the Treaty of Lublin, the kingdoms of Lithuania and Poland merged to form a single state, which came to be known as Rzeczpospolita (Republic of Both Nations) and Polish became the official language of Lithuania.

Lithuania became a vital center of Jewish life in Europe in the 14th century. Jews first arrived at the invitation of the Grand Dukes Augustus II and Augustus III, who recognized the utility of the merchants, artisans, and traders to the development and livelihood of their country. Jews soon played important diplomatic and strategic roles as well. In return Lithuanian Jews appreciated the tolerance and protection of the Lithuanian dukes. Vilnius, the Lithuanian capital, won a reputation as the Jerusalem of the north; it became a great center of Jewish scholarship, education, literature, art, and theater.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century, conflicts between Rzeczpospolita and Russia began, and by the beginning of the 19th century a major portion of Lithuania and Poland came under Russian dominance. Lithuania and Poland revolted twice (1831 and 1863) against Russian forces but were unsuccessful. Catholics in Lithuania were persecuted by the Russian armed forces, and the use of the Polish and Latin languages was banned in Lithuania.

During World War I Russian forces in Lithuania were defeated by Germany in 1915, and the region came under German occupation. But Germany could not sustain its control. On February 16, 1918, when the defeat of German forces became imminent in World War I, and the Russian Empire was on the verge of collapse, Lithuania declared independence from Russia. On July 12, 1920, a peace treaty was signed between the newly formed Soviet Union and Lithuania, under which the Soviet Union officially recognized Lithuania's independence.

However, during World War II, in accordance

Teutonic Order

The Teutonic Order was a German military order under Roman Catholic religious vows that was formed at the end of the 12th century in the Palestinian city of Acre. It mainly consisted of German Christian forces, who were referred to as Teutonic Knights, distinguished by their white coats and the black cross they carried. Their main objective was to provide medical aid to pilgrims in holy places.

They were headed mainly by the German nobility and even participated in World War I. Even today the Teutonic Order exists in Germany as a charitable organization.

with the non-aggression pact (Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact) signed between Germany and the Soviet Union in 1940, Soviet forces once again invaded Lithuania and took control of the region. In 1941 Germany violated the non-aggression pact, invaded Lithuania, and established its control over the region. The Soviet Union joined hands with the Allied forces, attacking Germany. By 1945 Lithuania was freed from German occupation.

The war had a devastating impact on Lithuanian Jewry. On the eve of World War II there were about 160,000 Jews in independent Lithuania and another 60,000 in Vilnius and the surrounding area (about half of the city's population was Jewish), which had been transferred to Lithuania after the Soviet conquest of eastern Poland. That population expanded further as Jewish refugees poured in from German-occupied Poland. During the German occupation and with the help of ethnic Lithuanians, 90–95 percent of Lithuanian Jewry, some 200,000, were killed (a greater percentage than in any other community in Europe). There are some 6,000 Jews in Lithuania today, most of whom immigrated there from Russia during the Soviet era; fewer than 200 Holocaust survivors remained in the

Livonian Brothers of the Sword

Founded by the prince-bishop of Riga Albert von Buxhovden in 1202, the Livonian Brothers of the Sword, also known as the Militia of Christ of Livonia, was a military order composed of warrior monks of German descent, who were also referred to as knights.

In 1218, along with the Danish King Valdemar II, the brothers successfully conquered the northern parts of Estonia and also carried out raids in Lithuania. In 1237 they were absorbed in the Teutonic Order after their defeat in 1236 by the unified Lithuanian tribes

Fun Fact

Forests are featured in many Lithuanian folktales, and during times of war, they have served as a haven for refugees. During pre-Christian times oak trees were worshipped as they were looked upon as a symbol of longevity and endurance. Even today oak trees command great respect in Lithuania, and on every special occasion Lithuanians plant oak trees.

country in the early 21st century.

After the war, an agreement was signed between the Soviet Union, Britain, and the United States. Under its terms Lithuania became part of the Soviet Union and remained under its domination until 1990. The administration of the region was controlled by a pro-Soviet party, known as the Lithuanian Communist Party (LCP).

In 1988 a group of Lithuanian intellectuals formed Sajudis, a Lithuanian reform movement. They began propagating ideas of democracy and national rights and actively supported Russian President Mikhail Gorbachev's social and political reforms, also known as policies of perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness).

In the 1990 elections of the Lithuanian Supreme Soviet (Supreme Council of Lithuania), candidates backed by Sajudis won the elections; on March 11, 1990, Lithuania declared its independence from the USSR. Vytautas Landsbergis, one of the founders of the Sajudis, was sworn in as the first president of the Republic of Lithuania.

In response to this act of defiance, the Soviet Union tried to intimidate Lithuania into relinquishing its claim to independence by imposing political and economic sanctions. When that failed, Soviet forces entered Lithuania and captured strategic buildings in the country. After Mikhail Gorbachev was ousted in a military coup in August 1991 and Boris Yeltsin was sworn in as the new president, the USSR changed its stance on Lithuania and on September 6, 1991, officially recognized Lithuania's independence. On September 17, 1991, Lithuania became a member of the United Nations (UN).

In the fresh elections held in 2003, Rolandas Paksas was sworn in as the president of Lithuania but was thrown out of power for his alleged links with the Russian mafia. In 2004 Valdas Adamkus, a leading Lithuanian politician, won the elections and became president. In the same year Lithuania became a member of the European Union (EU) as well as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in northeastern Europe, the Republic of Lithuania is flanked by Belarus in the southeast, Latvia to the north, the Baltic Sea to the west, and the Russian territory of Kaliningrad and Poland to the southwest. Lithuania is the largest of the three Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia.

Topographically, a major part of Lithuania is flat land, although there are a number of small hills in the western uplands and eastern highland areas. Its highest point is Juazapines, which is 964 feet. The most striking feature of Lithuania is the Curonian Split, which is a sandbar that lies along the Baltic Coast and is 61 miles long, less than 2.5 miles wide, and 216 feet high. The water between the mainland and the Curonian Split is known as the Curonian Lagoon. Numentas River and its tributaries, and Lake Zuvintas are the major source of water in Lithuania.

Lithuania has a temperate climate, which is marked by cold winters and warm, wet summers. During winter the temperature can be lower than 14°F, while during summer, the temperature can be as high as 72°F and there are occasional showers as well.

Lithuania is home to a wide variety of flora such as oak trees, pine trees, raspberries, strawberries, cranberries, and mushrooms.

❁ ECONOMY

Until 1998 Russia was the main trading partner of Lithuania, and the Russian financial crisis in the same year had a great impact on Lithuania's economy. However, the government immediately swung into action and implemented a number of economic measures to revive the economy.

Today, due to pro-growth economic policies and market-oriented monetary and fiscal policies, Lithuania has been able to reduce deficits and enjoys a thriving economy. Privatization of industries has been encouraged, and direct foreign investment has also increased.

Almost 50 percent of the country's population is employed in the service industry, while 30 percent is employed in the industrial sector, and almost 20 percent is engaged in agricultural activities.

chemicals, textiles, mineral products, food products, and clothing to European countries.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Lithuania today is a country with a largely homogenous Baltic culture. More than 80 percent of the inhabitants are native Lithuanians, while the country is also home to a significant number of Poles, Russians, and Belarusians. Lithuanian is the official language of the country, and different dialects of the language are spoken in different parts of the country. While High Lithuanian is spoken in major parts of the country, a dialect known as Low Lithuanian is spoken in the western parts.

Lithuania has a predominantly Roman Catholic population, although many Lithuanians are Lutherans and followers of the Russian Orthodox Church. The country has a small number of Muslims and Jews.

Today almost 68 percent of the country's population lives in cities, but some maintain their contact with the rural areas by owning small cottages in the countryside, where they grow fruits and vegetables. In former times women acted as homemakers, while men performed salaried work outside the home. However, as in most western countries, women today work alongside men in the labor force.

Lithuania has a rich folk music tradition, and folk songs reflect on every aspect of the daily lives of Lithuanians. While work songs speak about activities such as harvesting, grinding grains, spinning and weaving, there are songs about death known as raundos (lamentations), which are sung at funerals. Whether the subject is life, death, war, or love, Lithuanian folk music has a song for every occasion.

Some of the traditional musical instruments used in Lithuania include the skrabalai (small wooden bells), the kankles (a kind of stringed instrument), skudueiai (wooden panpipes), and daudyte (long wooden trumpets). Lithuania is known for an ancient tradition of carving images of the Sun, large wooden crosses, and figures of holy saints on poles as well as weathercocks. The region of Hill of Crosses in the Lithuanian city of Siauliai is renowned for its craftsmanship.

❁ CUISINE

Lithuania boasts a wide variety of delicacies, and every region in the country has its own specialties. While the highlanders (Aukstiatii people) who live in the northeastern region feast on cottage cheese dishes and pancakes, the people in the southeastern region include mushroom, potatoes, and buckwheat in their diet. The Bemaieiai (people who live in the lowland regions of Lithuania) take pride in their porridges and herbed dips, and people in the southwest part of Lithuania love skilandis (smoked meats), cepelinai (minced meat filling in potato dumplings), and vedarai (potato sausages). While pork is the preferred meat, Lithuanian dishes also make use of vegetables and potatoes.

During summer cold beet root soup is a favorite, while during winter barsciai borscht (hot beet soup) is preferred.

Some favorite Lithuanian beverages include milk, coffee, tea, and beer. Sula (beer made from sap of birch tree), midus (a honey-based mild alcoholic drink), and gira (nonalcoholic fermented drink made from bread) are popular beverages in Lithuania.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Fortune-telling and predictions play a central role in New Year's Eve celebrations. Predictions relating to marriage, death, life, career, and even weather for the coming year are made on New Year's Eve. For example, if it snows heavily on New Year's Eve, it implies that the weather will be bad for the entire year. But if it is sunny and the day is clear, it implies that there will be a good harvest in the new year.

Lithuanians believe that the nature of the coming year can be predicted on the basis of the events of New Year's Day. Thus children are on their best behavior in order to avoid upsetting elders. People try to be very helpful to each other on this day and smile a lot, hoping the coming year will be filled with happiness for them.

Fun Fact

Bread plays a vital role in Lithuanian society. At dinnertime bread is always placed in the center of the table, in front of the head of the family. Also at the time of laying the foundation of a new house, a piece of bread is placed at the site. Newlywed couples are offered bread, salt, and wine as a symbol of the sweet and salty nature of life.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY (1918)

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 16

Prior to the German occupation of Lithuania during World War I, the nation was under the rule of the Russian Imperial forces. In 1915, however, Germany invaded Lithuania and established control over the region. By 1918 the Allied forces had defeated Germany, and with the Russian Empire in decline, Lithuanians seized the opportunity to declare their independence on February 16, 1918. Antanas Smetona, a prominent Lithuanian freedom fighter, was sworn in as the first president of Lithuania (1919–20). He also had the distinction of being the last president of Lithuania (1926–40), until the Soviet occupation during World War II.

On this day celebrations are organized in different parts of Lithuania, including official speeches, cultural programs, and patriotic songs. Lithuanians come together to celebrate the independence of the nation as well as the progress made by the country since its independence.

❁ RESTORATION OF LITHUANIA'S STATEHOOD

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 11

On February 24, 1990, while still under Soviet rule, the political parties in Lithuania conducted free and fair elections in Lithuania, and Sajudis, a popular political party, won the majority of seats.

On March 11, 1990, Lithuania declared its independence from the Soviet Union and Vytautas Landsbergis, one of the founders of the Sajudis, was sworn in as the first president of the Republic of Lithuania.

On this day huge celebrations are held in different parts of Lithuania. In the capital city of Vilnius, the president presides over the celebrations. All those who lost their lives during Lithuania's quest for independence, are remembered, and the achievements of the republic are also acknowledged on this day. Besides the official speeches, a cultural festival is organized which celebrates the rich cultural heritage of the country.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day, in many parts the world to commemorate the important role played by workers.

The earliest celebrations of May Day are ascribed to the pagan observances that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. The May 1 designation of this date as Labor Day was decreed by the Socialist Second International in 1890. Because it is a national holiday, all public and private institutions are closed in Lithuania on May 1.

❁ ST. CASIMIR DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: March 4

On March 4, Lithuanians commemorate the death anniversary of St. Casimir, the country's patron saint.

St. Casimir was the prince of Poland and Lithuania and was a devout Christian from a very early age. He participated in the fight against the Ottoman Turks to defend Christianity and the Holy Cross. He died on March 4, 1484, at the age of 26.

After a number of miracles were reported to have taken place around his tomb in Vilnius, the Vatican canonized him as St. Casimir, and he became the patron saint of Lithuania. On June 11, 1948, St. Casimir Jagiello was proclaimed the patron saint of all youth by Pope Pius XII.

In Vilnius St. Casimir's fair, which is also known as Kaziuko Muge, is organized and is attended by thousands of people. Vilniaus verbos, a neatly braided decorative piece made from dried grass and flowers, used for decorating homes and muginukas, specially baked heart-shaped cookies with names of people inscribed on them, are the favorite items sold during this fair.

Lithuanians also celebrate St. Casimir Day by visiting their friends and family. They discuss the life and legacy of the benevolent saint and draw inspiration from his pious life.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Christian festival of Easter celebrates Jesus Christ's Resurrection three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after the month of Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter Lithuanians attend special Resurrection services in their local churches.

The Easter morning procession is attended by devout Christians and is marked by devotional hymns sung by the congregation as well as the choir. At the end of the service, the priest blesses the Easter food brought by families. Afterward people return to their homes to enjoy a special Easter breakfast.

The woman of the house shells a blessed Easter egg and after breaking it carefully, hands a piece to each family member. Sharing of this egg implies that there will always be love and peace in the family. Besides the blessed egg a number of dishes such as meat, sausages, and cakes are also consumed. Bunny cookies are extremely popular among children. Children hunt for colored eggs, which are hidden by Velyku Senele (the Easter Granny).

Children are told that Velyku Senele travels across Lithuania and stops at homes and places decorated eggs and sweets either in the yard or in special Easter baskets. However, only those children who have behaved well are rewarded with sweets and brightly colored eggs, while those who have been bad receive a single white egg.

✿ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

The Christian Feast of the Assumption commemorates the death of Mary, mother of Jesus Christ, when she was raised up to heaven.

In earlier eras people carried herbs, cabbages, and garden flowers for the special church service held in honor of Mary to get them blessed and to ensure a good harvest. Homes were decorated with the blessed herbs to protect the house from being struck by lightning. In the Dzukija region of Lithuania, the blessed herbs were placed under the head of the deceased to act as his pillow in the coffin.

In Lithuania another tradition is observed whereby mothers of deceased children cannot eat apples on this day, which they call Herbal Holy Day, unless they are blessed in church. This tradition stems from the belief that on this day, the Virgin Mary distributes apples among the children in the Kingdom of Heaven, and those children whose mothers have consumed unblest apples do not receive these apples from Mary.

In southern parts of Lithuania, food made with crops from the new harvest is offered to dead ancestors as a token of respect. The remaining food is placed on the table, and the entire family sits around it. The head of the house lights a candle and passes it to all the members of the family. When the candle is handed back to the head of the house, he gets up and walks three times around the food, which is kept aside for the ancestors. Then he returns to his seat and takes the first bite of food with the others following suit. Any leftovers are given to the poor.

✿ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast, which honors all the saints (known and unknown) of Christianity. It is an annual religious celebration, which takes place on November 1.

On the eve of All Saints' Day people living in small towns and villages do not leave their homes, as it is believed that the roads are filled with the souls of the deceased, and one may encounter a mean soul if they step outside. It is also believed that if the Sun does not shine on All Saints' Day, then the coming year will be filled with misfortunes.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25–26

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world and marks the birth of Jesus Christ, whom Christians regard as the Messiah. In Lithuania Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve and last until St. Stephen's Day on December 26.

On December 24 Lithuanians fast throughout the day and break their fast with a meatless meal after the first star appears in the evening sky. The meatless meal consists of 12 courses, which, during the pre-Christian period, symbolized the 12 months in a year; today they symbolize the 12 apostles of Jesus. Also, if appropriate, a special place is kept at the table in memory of a family member who has died during the year.

After the meal the family gathers around the Christmas tree to exchange gifts, play games, and engage in fortune-telling. Families attend Christmas services either on Christmas Eve or on Christmas Day. It is believed that the weather during Christmas will determine the weather at Easter. If it snows heavily on Christmas, it implies Easter will be warm and sunny. However, if there is no snowfall on Christmas, then Easter will be snowy.

The Feast of St. Stephen is observed on December 26, the day after Christmas. St. Stephen is the first martyr of Christianity who was stoned to death by Roman rulers for speaking in favor of Christ and his disciples. In other countries, this day is also celebrated as Boxing Day.

❁ KIRMELINE

Observed in: Various regions and especially the countryside

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 25

On January 25, Lithuania celebrates Kirmeline. It is also known as the Day of the Serpents.

Fun Fact

In parts of Lithuania people visit the gravesites of their ancestors and decorate the graves with flowers and candles. Also bread rolls are baked especially for the day, and each roll is assigned a name of the deceased. Then these rolls are handed to beggars, who are asked to pray for the soul of the deceased.

This unique festival celebrates the symbolic awakening of the snakes, which have traditionally been considered deities in Lithuania. It is believed that on this day, snakes come out of the forests and visit the homes of their followers. On the eve of Kirmeline, people prepare special dishes and lay them on the table. They also pray for serpents to visit their homes and bless their food. If on Kirmeline serpents visit the home and taste the food, it is believed that the year will be filled with good luck.

However, if the serpents do not pay a visit, then it is implied that the year will be filled with bad fortune.

In ancient times, people believed that if the apple trees were shaken on this day, they would be more fruitful.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Lithuania, birthdays are marked by elaborate celebrations. While children celebrate their birthdays, elders celebrate their name days (for example, a person named Casimir will celebrate his birthday on St. Casimir's Day).

On birthdays, a special garland is placed on the door of the birthday boy or girl. The birthday celebrant also typically sits on a specially decorated chair, which is then lifted in the air three times.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Lithuania, when a girl gets her first menstrual period, she and her mother participate in a private ritual rite in which the mother slaps her daughter on the face and utters words such as "be beautiful" or "bloom like a rose." The mother also reveals the mystery of birth to her daughter. After this, the girl is deemed fit to be married.

In ancient times a girl's initiation rites required the baking of bread. In accordance with the ritual, the girl would bake her first bread on Saturday, which is the day for taking baths so that close female relatives of the family, who had assembled in the pirtis (a Lithuanian bathhouse), could be offered the bread.

Also on this day, the father of the girl declared the girl's share in the property and communicated this information to the assembled female relatives; the girl was thus declared ready for marriage.

For boys, the initiation ceremony included getting inducted in youth communities formed by other boys sharing the same age and interests. Member of such groups participated in collective work assignments, such as cutting rye or hay. The behavior of this collective community reflected on the status of the village. Hence if the youth community behaved badly, then the village would be disgraced, and other villages would be hesitant to get their daughters married in such a disgraced village.

In northeastern Lithuania, the induction into the community was marked by a ritual public dance by the initiates, while in eastern Lithuania the name of the initiate was inscribed in a book, which was followed by ritual drinking.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Lithuania marriages are arranged by families with the help of matchmakers. Even if the couple know each other and have expressed their desire to get married, the families still hire matchmakers to negotiate and fix the dowry.

After the dowry is set, the couple is considered engaged, but the period of engagement varies from region to region.

The marriage ceremony is simple. On the wedding day the bride bids farewell to her family and her home amid sad songs sung by her female relatives. She then heads to her husband's house, where she is formally introduced to his family. Before the arrival of the bride, the kraitveziai, or carriers of dowry chests, reach the groom's home. The chests are usually filled with towels, sashes, bedsheets, fabrics, and other household basics promised by the bride's family.

For the formal introduction of the bride to the groom's family, the bride and groom proceed to the church. The bride wears a wreath of rye, which is symbolic of her childhood days. Then, at the time the vows are exchanged, the bride's matron of honor replaces the wreath of rye with the headdress that belongs to a mature woman, symbolizing the transition of the bride from girlhood to womanhood.

After the traditional vows the couple exchange rings, and the marriage is considered complete. A number of rituals are also performed to ward off the evil and to protect the couple's fertility. In some parts of Lithuania the couple consume wine, salt, and bread, which symbolize the three vital elements of life; joy (wine), tears (salt), and work (bread). Also the newlyweds are showered with water and grains to wish them a life filled with happiness and prosperity (good harvest).

After the wedding the bride and groom visit the bride's family in a ceremony called atgriztai. It generally takes place one week after the couple's honeymoon. During this ceremony the bride returns to her home and is treated, not as a family member, but as a guest, thus completing her transition from a maiden to a married woman and her journey from her old home—her parents—to her new home—her husband's.

❁ DEATH

In ancient times Lithuanians looked at death as a continuation of life and celebrated the passage of the soul to the afterlife. Many Lithuanians cremated their dead after keeping the body of the deceased frozen for a considerable period of time and indulged in feasting and dancing prior to the cremation. They placed the ashes in urns and buried them underground. However, after the advent of Christianity, Lithuanians began burying their dead.

Lithuanians also believe that death makes its presence felt through ominous signs, such as bread breaking inside the oven, honeycombs shaped in the form of a cross or a coffin, or dreams involving visits by dead relatives.

Since Lithuanians believe that at the time of death, the soul separates itself from the body, after the death of a person, all the doors and windows in the house of the deceased are kept open to enable the soul to meet with the souls of his or her dead relatives and to move about freely with them. Then relatives, friends, and neighbors are informed, and they participate in mourning the deceased.

For the burial, Lithuanians dress the deceased in his or her best clothing or specially sewn clothing called "funeral wedding garb" after cleansing the body. Many Lithuanians also wrap the body of the deceased in white shrouds, since many consider white to be the color of mourning and death. Although today Lithuanians wear black clothes and women carry black handkerchiefs to the funerals, women formerly wore white during the period of mourning as well as to funerals.

After the burial the ancient tradition of hosting a funeral dinner in memory of the deceased is still practiced in Lithuania. At the funeral dinner, the living relatives share food with the soul of the deceased as well as with souls of other dead relatives. Then they politely ask them to leave the house and the family without causing any harm, and they seek God's blessing and protection for the family members.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The recorded history of Luxembourg dates back to 963 C.E. In that year Siegfried, Count of Ardennes (c. 922–98), and founder of the Luxembourg Dynasty, acquired the ruins of an old Roman fort from the monks of the Abbey of St. Maximin in Trier and built a castle, located at what is now the present-day capital of Luxembourg. The castle was called Castellum Lucilinburhuc, which means “little castle”). With time it was steadily strengthened. It became one of the strongest fortresses in Europe and came to be called the “Gibraltar of the North.”

Until 1354 Luxembourg enjoyed an independent status within the Holy Roman Empire. In 1437 the castle was taken over by the Habsburgs of Austria and was then captured by Burgundy in 1443. King Louis XIV of France (1638–1715) annexed Luxembourg in 1684. A bloody war followed at the end of which France was forced to return Luxembourg to the Habsburgs, and it became a part of the Austrian Empire. After the French Revolution, however, France regained control over Luxembourg and kept it under its control until 1815, when Napoleon (1769–1821) was defeated, and Luxembourg was given the status of a grand duchy. Thereafter the Netherlands ruled Luxembourg.

During World War I Germany conquered neutral Luxembourg; U.S. and French troops had to intervene to liberate it from German rule in 1918. In 1940, despite its neutrality, Luxembourg was again attacked and conquered by the Germans. Germany placed the country under military rule and announced that Luxembourgers would now be German citizens. In addition Germany conscripted 13,000 Luxembourgers into German military service. Many died while fighting in the German army, and others were deported to concentration camps. In 1944 the United States again liberated Luxembourg from Germany, and the Germans finally withdrew in 1945, following their defeat. Luxembourg became a charter member of the United Nations (UN) in 1945. In 1948 it ended its neutrality and joined the Benelux Customs Union; in the following year it joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). In 1957 Luxembourg became one of the six founding countries of the European Economic Community (which evolved into the European Union [EU]).

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, a landlocked country located in Western Europe, is surrounded by Germany, France, and Belgium. Luxembourg has a hilly terrain, and the northern parts of the country (known as Oesling or Eisleck) are home to the Ardennes, a stretch of forests and rolling hills that pass through Belgium, Luxembourg, and France. The highest point of the country is Buurgplaat, which stands at 1,834 feet and is located in the Ardennes. A major part of the southern region is known as Gutland (good country); Luxembourg's farmlands are found in this region. The southernmost end of the country is referred to as Minette or Land of the Red Earth, because of the red soil found in the region.

Rivers Moselle, Our, and Sauer (Sure) form the eastern border of Luxembourg, while the Alzette River is one of the important rivers flowing through Luxembourg. Luxembourg enjoys a continental climate characterized by cool summers and mild winters. In summer the average daily temperature during the day is around 68°F, while at night it is around 50°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Luxembourg has a strong economy characterized by growth, stability, low inflation, and a low unemployment rate. More than 83 percent of the population is employed in the service sector, while agriculture employs only about 3 percent of the population.

This highly industrialized nation has an export-oriented economy; its major export items include finished steel products, aluminum, chemicals, glass, rubber, and other industrial products.

Luxembourg is a member of the EU, and since January 1, 1999, it has used the common European currency, the Euro, as its national currency.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The culture and lifestyle of Luxembourg is greatly influenced by Germany and France. This is reflected in the fact that German and French are widely spoken for administrative purposes, although Lëtzebuergesch (also known as Luxemburgish), which is a German-Frankish-Moselle dialect, is the national language of Luxembourg. Luxembourg is ethnically diverse and is home to Italians, Portuguese, Slavs (from Kosovo, Albania, and Montenegro), as well as other Europeans. Almost 87 percent of the country's population is Roman Catholic, while 13 percent are Protestant, Jewish, or Muslim. Luxembourgers enjoy a wide variety of music, including jazz, classical, pop, reggae, and rock and roll.

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Luxembourg dishes include: the national dish judd mat gaardebounen (broad beans and smoked

Grand Duchy

A duchy is a territory or a domain ruled by a duke or a duchess. A grand duchy is a principality whose head of state is a grand duke or a grand duchess; he is ranked in honor below a king but higher than a sovereign duke. The title of grand duke or grand duchess is mainly used in Slavic, Baltic, and Germanic countries. Luxembourg has been a grand duchy since 1815, when King William I of the Netherlands (1772–1843) established the independent Kingdom of the Netherlands, and the Congress of Vienna handed over Luxembourg to him. He was given the title of Grand Duke Guillaume I of Luxembourg.

neck of pork); quenelles (dumplings made with calf's liver), which are generally served with sauerkraut (white cabbage) and boiled potatoes; treipen (black pudding); bouneschlupp (green bean soup); sausages; and fried fish. Wine and beer are the favorite beverages, and the Moselle region, renowned for its white wines, has a history of wine making that dates back to the Roman era.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar. In Luxembourg on New Year's Eve, a festive spirit envelops the entire country as people attend parties and celebrate with friends and family. Special bals (dance parties) are also organized, and people sing and dance through the night to usher in the new year. When the clock strikes midnight a spectacular display of fireworks lights up the night sky amid cheers from the crowd. Feasting, dancing, singing, and drinking continue until the early morning hours of New Year's Day.

On New Year's Eve people feast on raclette, a traditional dish made from boiled potatoes and melted cheese, and generally served with vegetables. Meat dishes and fondue (melted Swiss cheese eaten with chunks of bread) are also popular New Year's Eve dishes.

Fun Fact

The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg is the sixth smallest country and the only grand duchy in the world.

Fun Fact

Almost one-third of Luxembourg's labor force consists of foreign laborers who come from Italy, Portugal, Belgium, Germany, and France to work in Luxembourg.

Fun Fact

Luxembourg has the highest per capita national income in the world: USD$43,940 in 2003.

Fun Fact

In 1993 it was estimated that Luxembourg had the highest per capita consumption of alcohol in the world, with an average of three beers a day for every man, woman, and child.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, to commemorate the important role of workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Luxembourg huge demonstrations and rallies are held by trade unions throughout the country, and workers participate with great enthusiasm. In many towns and villages people go to the woods and gather branches (from trees and bushes), which have the first green leaves of the spring season. They use these branches to make Meekranz (May wreathes) and place them outside restaurants, churches, pubs, and town halls.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

The Christian festival of Easter celebrates Jesus' Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent. For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere).

The English name for this celebration, Easter, was almost certainly pagan in origin. According to the Venerable Bede (672–735), a renowned Christian scholar, Easter was named after Eostre (or Eastre), the Mother Goddess of the Saxon tribes of Northern Europe; she was also the goddess of fertility. The Germans knew her as Ostara. After the harsh winters of Northern Europe, she brought the warmth of spring, fertility, and abundance. The ancient deities in all civilizations had patron animals, and the rabbit, an obvious symbol of fertility, is the companion animal of Eostre. The deity was believed to preside over conception and birth in animals and human beings as well as the pollination, flowering, and the ripening of fruits in the plant kingdom. When the Catholic Church decided to celebrate Jesus' Crucifixion the end of first century C.E., they chose to take the goddess's name and the symbols associated with her festival to convert pagans to Christianity.

In Luxembourg Easter is known as Ouschteren. The devout attend Easter church services. But it is a particularly special day for children. On Easter Sunday children get up early in the morning and start hunting for Easter eggs left by the Easter bunny. Armed with small baskets, they begin their search for Easter eggs and carefully look in every nook and corner of their yards. Besides the colorful decorated Easter eggs, children also receive egg-shaped chocolates from their parents.

On Easter Sunday girls give boys they like egg-shaped boxes that have been decorated and filled with candy. The traditional Easter dessert is either cake or ice cream. Easter Monday is a national holiday in Luxembourg, with schools and businesses closed for the day.

❁ OKTAVE

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Third through fifth Sundays after Easter

The Oktave is an important Catholic festival in Luxembourg. It begins on the third Sunday after Easter and ends on the fifth Sunday after Easter. The Oktave of Notre Dame la Consolatrice des Affliges is celebrated on the fifth Sunday after Easter in honor of the patroness of Luxembourg, the Virgin Mary, also known as Mary of Consolatrice.

It is believed that in 1624 the statue of the Virgin Mary was discovered by some Jesuit students in Consolatrice inside the hollow of an oak tree. They took the statue to their Jesuit College and displayed it there. That same night, however, the statue mysteriously disappeared despite the locked doors, and when an intensive search was conducted, the statue was once again discovered inside the hollow of the oak tree where it had been initially found. Thus a special chapel was built around the area in 1624. And in 1625, when a devastating plague engulfed the region, many people began attributing miraculous cures to the statue. Since then Consolatrice has become a center of pilgrimage for believers. On September 26, 1666, the Virgin Mary was declared the patroness of the city of Luxembourg.

For the celebration of Oktave pilgrims from all over the country flock to Consolatrice to seek the blessings of the Blessed Virgin. The city of Luxembourg is decorated with fir trees and flowers. Also the royal family of Luxembourg, the grand ducal family, always attends the special Mass that takes place in honor of the Virgin Mary.

Celebrations begin in the afternoon after a huge procession, which includes brass bands, boy scouts, girl guides, and religious heads, as well as countless people who walk toward the cathedral. Then the first communicants, known as "Children of Mary," carry her image underneath a beautifully adorned canopy. The image is neatly wrapped in a dark-blue velvet cloth embroidered with gold and jewels. She holds the infant Jesus in one hand and a scepter (sword of state) in the other. A rosary, golden heart, and keys of the Luxembourg-Ville are tied around the wrist of her right hand. The image is carried through the city of Luxembourg in a solemn procession.

Every day during Oktave, Place Guillaume (named after King William II of the Netherlands and grand duke of Luxembourg) becomes a market of religious artifacts and souvenirs and is thronged by believers and tourists alike. The traditional dish of fried fish is also served during the Oktave.

During Oktave different parishes organize their own pilgrimages to the cathedral and take part in special Masses.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost, a two-day religious observance, also called Whitsunday and Whitmonday, begins 50 days after Easter. In Greek, pentecost means the "fiftieth day." It celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles. However, a number of scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations were borrowed from pagan celebrations of the return of spring. Whitsunday and monday have been celebrated since the third century C.E. Whitsunday is named for the white garments worn by those who were baptized during the disciples' vigil.

In the town of Echternach an annual dancing procession and a handkerchief pageant are held on Whittuesday in honor of St. Willibrord, who founded the abbey in the town in 698 C.E. His body was laid to rest in the abbey, and people visit the basilica and pay their respects to the beloved saint.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world. It marks the birth of Jesus and falls on December 25. On Christmas Eve (December 24) in Luxembourg people decorate Christmas trees with glittering, colored balls, stars, and wax candles. Beneath the branches of the Christmas tree they place a traditional Nativity scene, which consists of wooden figurines of Joseph, Mary, and the infant Jesus in the crib, along with the Three Wise Men. These figurines are frequently family heirlooms, passed from one generation to another.

St. Nicholas is known as Kleeschen in Luxembourg. His traveling companion, Houëker (Black Peter), wears coarse black clothes and carries a stick with which he is said to chastise naughty children. During the night of December 5 (St. Nicholas's Day), children place their shoes on windowsills or outside their bedroom doors in hopes that Kleeschen will bring them presents and candy. The gifts on Christmas are said to be brought by the baby Jesus.

On Christmas Eve the candles are lit around seven in the evening and the family gathers around the Christmas tree to sing Christmas carols. Children open their presents while parents and other adult family members continue singing carols or indulge in conversation. Around midnight the entire family goes to the local church to attend midnight services.

After the service on a traditional supper, which consists of roasted sausages and black pudding or a roast turkey generally accompanied by boiled potatoes and white cabbage. Wine and beer are the favored beverages. For dessert a bûche de Noël (a cake decorated as a log) and stolen (fruitcake with rum) are served.

❁ DANCING PROCESSION

Observed in: Echternach
Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: May–June

In the town of Echternach, Luxembourg, an annual dancing procession and handkerchief pageant are organized on Whittuesday in honor of St. Willibrord (c. 657–739), who established the abbey in 738 and died there as well. The date has no connection with St. Willibrord, however; he died on November 7. There are a number of stories related to the origin of the procession. According to one, a local thief named Veidt was condemned to death by execution in the town square, and in accordance with the law of the land he was asked for his last wish. Veidt desired to play his fiddle. Legend has it that Veidt's fiddle playing so mesmerized all those assembled for the execution that he was able to make a quick escape and cheat death. Catholic historians are reluctant to ascribe any pre-Christian antecedents to the dancing procession and claim only that its origin cannot be stated with certainty. A neutral observer can, however, recognize elements of pagan cults, such as the ones that were criticized by St. Eligius in the seventh century.

The story is a good one, but many historians believe that the pilgrimage to Echternach began in the 14th century when the region was invaded by the great plague, and people sought divine protection against it by praying in the chapel. Even today many of the faithful flock to the region in May or June to participate in the procession to avert epilepsy, St. Vitus's dance, or convulsions. Before it starts a priest gives an open-air sermon in front of the holy cross. Then in the courtyard of the abbey, pilgrims start assembling, and the procession begins after the bell at the abbey rings. Emperor Maximilian (1459–1519) donated this bell to the abbey to commemorate his pilgrimage to the region in 1512.

The procession is headed by the clergy, followed by the youth, and then the elderly. The dancing procession begins while musicians play an ancient melody, and the pilgrims take three steps forward, then two back, so that five steps are required in order to advance one pace. The result is that it is well after midday before the last of the dancers has reached the church. At one time the pilgrims would stop and fall to their knees every time Maximilian's bell rang, then move forward a few more steps. At another time they crawled under a stone facing the cross of St. Willibrord. A "cattle-bell dance" was also performed in front of the cross on the marketplace, but this dance was prohibited in 1664.

The procession passes through the streets of Echternach and then climbs the staircases that lead up to the basilica. The pilgrims enter the church, dance around the crypt, which contains the remains of St. Willibrord, and offer prayers to the saint.

❁ SCHUEBERFOUER FAIR

Observed in: Luxembourg

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: End of August–mid-September

The Schueberfouer fair is a two-week annual event, which takes place in Luxembourg in late August through mid-September. The word Schueberfouer is derived from the name of the town, Scadeburg (located at the plateau du Esprit) where the event was first held. It is a major attraction, and people from all over Luxembourg visit the Schueberfouer to enjoy beer and food as well as carnival rides such as roller-coasters, carousels, bumper cars, and a Ferris wheel.

The festival begins with the march of the sheep, known as Hämmelesmarsch. Shepherds lead their flocks of sheep, adorned with colorful ribbons, through the streets of Luxembourg, accompanied by musicians playing a traditional playful tune. The origin of the tune is unknown, but the same melody has

The annual dancing procession at Echternach has undergone a number of changes over the centuries. At one point the pattern of dance adopted for the procession had earned it the name motionless procession because the pilgrims participating in the procession would stop dancing at the sound of the abbey's bell and would move forward slightly and fall on their knees. Then they would get up and resume dancing until the bell rang again. The "crawling procession" was traditional at another time, when pilgrims would crawl under the stone that was placed in front of the cross of St. Willibrord.

been played during the festival for more than 200 years. The shepherds collect money from houses along the way. A special marketplace is also set where skilled artisans and weavers sell their products.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Evidence of the Chinese presence in Macau goes back almost 5,000 years. It was part of both the Qin Dynasty (221–06 B.C.E.) and the Lin Dynasty (265–420 C.E.). Although it became a stopover for seafarers in the 5th century, there were no permanent settlers until the 13th century when some members of the Song Dynasty arrived there, fleeing from Mongol invaders attacking the mainland. The Chinese continued to immigrate to the peninsula through the years until the arrival of Portuguese traders, who first traveled to the south China coast in the early 1500s. Jorge Álvares (d. 1521) landed in south China in 1513, and this visit was followed by the establishment of Portuguese trading centers in the Pearl River Delta. These were eventually consolidated on Macau as the first European settlement in the Far East. Serving as a vital base for merchants as well as for Christian missionaries to China and Japan, the settlement prospered along with the trade. Initial misgivings on the part of the Chinese were soon ironed out, and Portugal obtained a lease to Macau. The understanding was that the Portuguese were to pay a ground rent and in return would be the administrators of the territory; sovereignty would remain with the Chinese, and the citizens were to be subject to Chinese law. The Chinese government however, did not formally recognize Portuguese control of Macau until 1887.

In 1974 a military coup in Portugal brought a socialist government to power that was sympathetic to the independence movements in Portugal's overseas territories. Although there was no strong local demand for independence in Macau, Portugal and China signed an agreement on April 13, 1987, on the future status of Macau. From April 1991 to December 1999, Governor General Vasco Joaquim Rocha Vieira was the head of Macau's government, with a 10-member consultative committee representing the interests of the Chinese community. Half of the 10 members were from Macau, and the other half from mainland China.

After the Portuguese handed over the country to the Chinese on December 20, 1999, it became the Macau Special Administrative Region (SAR) of China under the formula of "one country two systems," a formula which also governs China's administration of Hong Kong. By this formula Chinese socialist economics will not be practiced in Macau until 2049, and Macau will enjoy a high degree of autonomy in all matters except foreign and defense affairs.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Macau is officially known as Macau Special Administrative Region (SAR). The local long form is Aomen Tebi Xingzhenggu (Chinese) or Regiao Administrativa Especial de Macau (Portuguese). Macau is located on the southeast coast of China on the Pearl River. It consists of the Macau Peninsula and the two southern islands of Taipa and Coloane. The islands are hilly, rocky, and largely uninhabitable. The peninsula features low, flat land of which about 90 percent is urbanized.

The city of Macau, which is built on the peninsula side, is linked with the nearest island of Taipa by two bridges (1.5 miles and 2.8 miles long, respectively), and Taipa is linked with the island of Coloane by a 1.4-mile-long causeway. On the western side of the peninsula, one of the main channels of the West River (Xi He) empties into the South China Sea.

Macau has a hot and humid summer, a cool and dry autumn, and a relatively mild and dry winter with no frost. Most rainfall occurs during the summer months. Typhoons in summer and early autumn produce heavy rainfall and floods, which frequently cause serious damage to crops and property.

❁ ECONOMY

The country's economy is based mainly on tourism and gambling. About 63 percent of government revenues come from taxes on gambling. Macau has an excellent transportation network that continues to

A-Ma or Ling Ma

Macau's name comes from that of the Chinese goddess who protects seafarers and fishermen, A-Ma, Ling Ma, or Mazu in Macau. According to legend, a junk sailing across the South China Sea found itself in a furious storm, and everyone on board gave up hope of living. But a young woman who had boarded the junk at the last minute stood up and ordered the elements to calm down; miraculously, the gale stopped. The ship arrived at the port of Hoi Keang, where the young woman got down, climbed up the nearby hill and, with a halo of light and perfume, ascended to heaven. At that very spot the temple of A-Ma was built in her honor.

According to legend, Lin Mo was a young girl who became the goddess A-Ma after performing numerous miracles during her short life. She was born on the island of Meizhou off the southeastern coast of China in 960 C.E. Because of her spiritual powers, Lin could predict weather changes and tell sailors and fishermen when it was safe for them to set out to sea. At 28 Lin bade farewell to her family before she was carried into the heavens in a glow of light. Lin's story is still remembered by many seafarers along the Pacific Rim, and there are as many as 14 million faithful devoted to her in modern-day Taiwan.

The 500-year-old A-Ma Temple, known as Ma Kok Miu by residents, is the oldest temple in Macao. The goddess A-Ma is worshipped as the guardian who protects fishermen from danger. On March 23 of the Chinese lunar calendar, believed to be the birthday of A-Ma, the temple is crowded with her followers. Among the attractions in the temple are a pair of 300-year-old stone lions and a 400-year-old stone carved with an ancient sea chart.

When Portuguese sailors landed here in the 16th century and asked the name of the place, the reply was "A-Ma-Gao" ("the Bay of A-Ma"). The Portuguese renamed the peninsula Amagas, but over time it was shortened to Macau.

improve rapidly. Links with China and nearby countries have led to millions of tourists visiting Macau every year. Macau's economy after its return to China remains one of the most open in the world. Export of goods and services accounts for 39 percent of gross domestic product (GDP), with tourism and textile exports as the mainstays. The economy was hit hard by the Asian financial crisis in 1998, but a rapid rise in tourism, including that from mainland China, led to a quick recovery and economic growth. Fireworks manufacturing businesses have grown in Macau and so have small industries such as those manufacturing toys, artificial flowers, and electronic items.

Macau depends on mainland China for most of its food, fresh water, and electrical supply.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Most people in Macau are ethnic Chinese; either they, or their ancestors, came from the Guangdong Province of China. But Macau had been a Portuguese colony and trading center for more than four centuries and reflects a distinctly Portuguese influence in its culture, lifestyle, and festivals. The people with mixed Portuguese and Chinese ancestry in Macau are known as Macanese.

Most ethnic Chinese in Macau are from the Guangdong Province and are Mahayana Buddhists. Macau has two official languages: Cantonese, the dominant regional language spoken by most of Macau's residents, and Portuguese. Many Macanese, however, have facility with both Cantonese and Portuguese. Many Macanese also speak Putonghua (Mandarin Chinese) and English.

The easygoing nature of Macau's residents, combined with their strong sense of culture, and the mild year-long climate supports great festivals and celebrations throughout the year, although recently some of the specifically Portuguese celebrations have been eliminated, and a few Chinese festivals added.

CUISINE

A combination of Portuguese, Indian, African, Malay, and Chinese foods make up Macanese cuisine, which is one of the most unusual in the world. The Portuguese learned from Africa and India how to use spices in their popular dishes such as African and Goanese chicken and piquant prawn, served baked or grilled with pepper and chilies. Traditional dishes from Portugal include bacalhau, Portuguese dried cod, served baked, grilled, stewed, or boiled, and soups such as caldo verde and sopa a alentejana, both rich with vegetables, meat, and olive oil. Some popular dishes in Macau are seafood curry with papaya, Portuguese duck rice, and pork casserole flavored with tamarind and shrimp paste.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Although the first day of the year in the Gregorian calendar is January 1, the real celebrations to welcome the new year and mark the end of the old in Macau are held during the Chinese New Year. January 1 is observed only as an administrative holiday.

CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: Chinese and Macanese

Observed on: First day of the First Moon of the Lunar Calendar

Like its Western counterpart, the Chinese New Year celebrates change. In Macau people prepare for the New Year by cleaning their homes, decorating them with bright colors, paying debts, resolving differences with friends and family members, and buying new clothes. The elaborate preparations and rituals, in addition to the color and excitement that go with them, make the Chinese New Year's celebrations, also known as the Chinese Spring Festival or the Lunar New Year, the most important festival in Macau. On the 16th day of the 12th month of the lunar year the mini spring festival begins, a two-week period during which people in Macau are busy preparing for the New Year's celebrations. It is particularly important to offer sacrifices to the Kitchen God (Zao Jun) to ensure that, when he is summoned by the Jade Emperor, the God of heaven, he will have nice things to say about the family. Sugar-cane must be offered to the Kitchen God, which is meant to sweeten his mouth. Rice straws cut in pieces are also included for the Kitchen God's horse because Zao Jun cannot go to the Jade Emperor riding an unfed horse.

The house must be thoroughly cleaned, and all the useless odds and ends discarded to drive out the evil and usher in good luck for the new year. At midnight on New Year's Eve, people open their doors and windows to let the old year go. Fireworks usher in the new year.

The most important event on the eve of the Spring Festival is the family reunion dinner. Everyone in the family tries to return home in time for the occasion. For someone unable to return, a seat is kept at the dinner table and a pair of chopsticks and a bowl are placed in front of it as if he or she were present.

When the bell rings on the first day of the new year, people flock to the Temple of A-Ma and other temples, so that they can be the first to burn incense and obtain the blessing of the Buddha. They also bring home sticks of longevity incense because they believe it will bring them good fortune. Stuffed dumplings and new year cakes, all made of sticky rice flour, are served for breakfast to ensure family happiness. After lunch the whole family takes a leisurely walk or visits relatives.

In addition to practices that must be observed in order to live happily in the coming year, there are also things that people should avoid doing during the Spring Festival. For example no one should sweep the floor New Year's Day because good fortune might be swept out with the dirt. If it's absolutely necessary to clean the floor, the sweeping should be done inward so as to keep good fortune in the house.

In addition to the customs and rituals observed to bring in the new year, there are also many cultural activities during the Spring Festival in Macau, including Cantonese opera, theatrical performances, concerts, numerous exhibits, martial arts contests, a parade of floats, lion dancing, and the dragon lamp show.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF PORTUGUESE REVOLUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 25

This holiday commemorates the day in 1974 when a seven-man junta under General António de Spínola (1910–96) was installed in Portugal by a group of Portuguese army officers after overthrowing the repressive government of Marcelo Caetano (1906–80). The new Spínola government promised democracy at home and peace for the overseas territories ruled by Portugal. Since Macau returned to Chinese rule as an SAR, this day has been observed modestly here.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, commemorates the important role played by workers in their societies. The May 1 observance of Labor Day was set by the Socialist Second International party in 1889. It was planned to coincide with a general strike that the American Federation of Labor (AFL) scheduled for 1890 to win an eight-hour workday in the United States. In China, Russia, and other socialist countries, this day is observed each year as May Day, and workers and peasants stage huge rallies. The May Day celebration in Macau is a recent development since its change of status from a Portuguese territory to a Chinese SAR.

The Lusíads

The Lusíads, an epic poem completed in 1572 by Luís de Camões (c. 1524–80) is considered Portugal's national epic. The personal life of Camões was one of high adventure, and he wrote The Lusíads while he was traveling and fighting in India, Macau, and Mozambique before returning to Lisbon in the 1560s.

The poem tells the story of Vasco da Gama's (c. 1460–1524) voyage to India. It is a lively narrative and makes nostalgic reference to other events in Portuguese history. The word lusíads, that is, sons of Lesus, refers to the Portuguese people. The epic is written in 10 cantos in ottava rima, patterned after the Latin epic The Aeneid by Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.).

❁ CAMÕES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 10

In 1952 the Portuguese government made this date an official public holiday to be celebrated as National Day, or Day of Portugal, in honor of those who had died in overseas wars. Later persons of exceptional achievement also came to be honored on this day. In 1977 the government redefined the holiday to focus the tribute on Luís (Vaz) de Camões, one of Portugal's greatest poets and adventurers, who had died in Lisbon on this day in 1580. The Lusíads is his most famous work. During his military career Camões traveled to India and Macau but was sent back to Portugal, accused of extortion. Although this is still one of Macau's official holidays, the celebrations take place on a much reduced scale since the country was returned to Chinese rule. This holiday was celebrated for the last time in 1999.

❁ TUEN YANG

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifth day of the fifth month of the Buddhist calendar

Tuen Yang, or Dragon Boat Festival Day, is observed on the fifth day of the fifth Moon of the Chinese calendar in remembrance of the heroic poet Qu Yuan, (339–278 B.C.E.), who protested against governmental corruption by drowning himself. He lived during the Qi Dynasty (or Spring and Autumn period). On this day people eat zongzi, a pyramid-shaped dumpling of glutinous rice wrapped in bamboo leaves, and specially made zongzi are sold in restaurants in Macao on this occasion. In the 21st century all celebrations are concentrated on the Dragon Boat Races, which in Macau take place on the Sai Van Lake. Many local and foreign teams take part in this colorful boat race.

MID-AUTUMN FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifteenth day of the eighth month of the Buddhist calendar

When the Moon is said to be at its fullest and brightest, on the 15th day of the eighth Moon of the Chinese calendar, Macau's residents gather in the beaches and parks for the Feast of Mid-Autumn. Earlier in the day they pay their respects to their ancestors, then prepare or purchase festive moon cakes to be given to friends. Since the full Moon symbolizes completeness and family harmony, giving and receiving moon cakes is considered good luck. In the Macau peninsula, Coloane, and Taipa, hundreds of families gather at the shores of lakes, beaches, and hilltops to appreciate the beauty of the Moon. Traditional celebrations include lighting candles and paper lanterns and setting them afloat in open water or rivers.

NATIONAL DAY OF THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 1–2

October 1 is the anniversary of the day Mao Zedong (1893–1976), the chairman of the Chinese Communist Party, proclaimed the People's Republic of China in 1949. After the surrender of Japan in World War II, a civil war broke out in China between the Chinese Kuomintang (KMT) government of Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Communist Party led by Mao. The KMT lost the war, and Chiang Kai-shek left mainland China to seek refuge on the island of Taiwan. In China itself, October 1 and 2 are celebrated with massive processions and rallies, but they are commemorated more soberly in Macau.

MACAU SPECIAL ADMINISTRATIVE REGION ESTABLISHMENT DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 20

This day is observed to commemorate Macau's return to Chinese administration in December 1999. Prior to that date (starting in the 15th century), Macau had been a Portuguese colony, even though the government of China did not formally recognize Portuguese control of Macau until 1887. Macau was returned to Chinese administration in 1999, when it became a Special Administrative Region or SAR, with a status similar to that of Hong Kong after its transfer from Great Britain to China. Flag-raising ceremonies, processions, and public speeches mark this holiday.

WINTER SOLSTICE

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 21

On this date the Earth is at the farthest point from the Sun in its orbit in the Northern Hemisphere. This is the shortest day of the year, and each subsequent day gets longer until the following June 21, the date of the summer solstice. In Macau the festivities end with the winter solstice feasts on December 21.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also known as Black Friday, Holy Friday, or Mourning Friday, is observed in remembrance of the Crucifixion of Jesus. Church services are held to commemorate his suffering on the Cross. During the day in Macau there are processions in which people take to the streets carrying crosses. Hymns on the life and deeds of Jesus are sung, and there are readings from the Gospels. In the evening service candles are put out, lights dimmed, and the premises darkened.

The Passion of Jesus

On Good Friday Christians participate in a solemn procession through the streets of Macau in a reenactment of Jesus' carrying the Cross to his Crucifixion. Starting from the Church of St. Augustine, an image of Jesus carrying the Cross is carried in procession to St. Paul's Cathedral, and the image is left there overnight. The next day worshippers dressed in purple robes carry the image on a platform back to the Church of St. Augustine. Along the route they pause to say the Stations of the Cross, recalling the tragic events that took place, from the condemnation of Jesus to the placing of his body in a tomb after his death on the Cross.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after he was crucified. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. In Macau people attend Easter church services celebrating the Resurrection. Egg-rolling competitions are a popular Easter tradition for children in Macau.

Easter Monday is the first day of Easter Week and is generally regarded as a continuation of Easter Sunday. The day was once part of a week-long celebration but was later changed to a one-day holiday. It is a day for playing pranks and telling jokes.

✿ CHENG MING

Observed by: Chinese

Observed on: April 5

Cheng Ming or Tomb Sweeping Day, falls on the 106th day after the winter solstice. Cheng Ming is a family holiday when people visit their ancestors' graves, tidy up the tombstones, burn incense, and place fresh flowers and three glasses of wine before them in the belief that the dead will receive these offerings on "the other side." Some people also offer roast pig, fruit, and other food to the dead. The food does not go to waste, however, since it ends up on the dinner table for a family feast at the end of the day.

✿ PROCESSION OF OUR LADY OF FATIMA

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: May 13

In the early 1900s three shepherds from Fatima in Portugal saw a huge flash of light and a vision of Mary, the mother of Jesus. The devout Catholics of Macau show their appreciation of the Virgin Mary in an annual procession on May 13. Her likeness stands in a bed of colorful flowers, and worshippers carry this platform from the Saõ Domingo Church through the streets, up a steep incline to the Penha Chapel. People (mainly Catholics) line the streets and crowd the courtyard of Penha Chapel, where an open-air mass is then held.

✿ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: April or May

Gautama Buddha was born on a full Moon day about 2,500 years ago in Lumbini, an Indian kingdom.

Today his birthday, also known as Buddha's Anniversary, is celebrated in either April or May, depending on the Moon's cycle.

Followers of Lord Buddha in China, Japan, India, and other parts of the Far East observe this day by going to temples and pagodas to pray.

✿ ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 24

Residents of Macau celebrate two holidays on June 24: Roman Catholics observe it as the feast day of St. John the Baptist. For all residents, it commemorates the victory of a small contingent of Portuguese soldiers, numbering only 150, over 800 Dutch invaders in 1622. For this reason, the holiday is also called City Day of Macau. Since the Portuguese believed it was John the Baptist who helped them win, they proclaimed him the guardian of Macau. Since then, a memorial Mass has been held on this day at St. Paul's Cathedral. In earlier times a 21-gun salute and procession carrying the figure of St. John also marked the occasion. Although this is still an official holiday, there are no longer public celebrations.

✿ ALL SOULS' DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: November 2

All Souls' Day or Day of the Dead, is a holiday established by the Roman Catholic Church to honor the dead so they will "rest in peace." According to popular belief, the spirits of the dead return to commune with the living on this day. In Macau families clean and decorate the graves of deceased family members, leave offerings for their spirits, and attend open-air festivals in fancy-dress costumes.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas marks the birth of Jesus although it is not actually the date on which he was born. Earlier celebrations of his birth were observed on different dates, but the Catholic Church, beginning in the fifth century, has observed Christmas starting on the evening of December 24. In the fourth century the Roman Emperor Constantine reformed the Julian calendar and introduced the seven-day week, thereby changing the way the months were subdivided. Also during that century a calendar was established that emphasized Christian festivals that gradually took over the dates and seasons of pagan celebrations and rituals.

The latter part of December was one such period. On December 17 (by the Julian calendar) the Saturnalia, a seven-day festival honoring the Roman deity Saturn, the god of agriculture, was observed. This festival included the winter solstice, which usually occurred around December 25. During the Saturnalia, the Romans feasted well, put aside all business and matters of war, exchanged gifts, and freed their slaves for the festival's duration. December 25 was also celebrated as the date honoring the rebirth of the Invincible Sun God of the Romans (Natalis Solis Invicti), and rituals were performed to honor Mithra, the Persian god of light. Both celebrations welcomed the return of the light and the lengthening days. As the days grew longer the winter festivities stretched to include January 1, the festival of Kalends, the day of the new Moon and the first day of the month and year of the Julian calendar.

Christmas is celebrated in Macau with prayers in churches and feasts. Families attend midnight services on Christmas Eve and join in the joyous Christmas celebrations afterward. People exchange gifts and cards and also decorate Christmas trees in their homes.

FEAST OF THE DRUNKEN DRAGON

Observed by: Fishermen of Macau
Observed on: May 13

This is the most unusual festival in Macau. It dates back to the days of the Qing Dynasty (1644–1911) in Kangxi Kingdom when there was a terrible plague. The villagers decided to carry a statue of the Buddha to the river to bless the water, but a giant python blocked their path. A Buddhist monk killed the monster python by slicing it into pieces. The pieces were thrown back into the river, and immediately the villagers started to recover from the plague. Even the soil where the python's blood was spilled became fertile. The villagers concluded that they had been saved by a divine dragon, and they had a carving made in its image. Each year on Buddha's birthday, the villagers drank and danced with the carved figure of the dragon.

In Macau the fishermen's association organizes this festival, which starts in the morning at the Kuan Tai Temple. Men wearing red bandannas and shirts with Chinese characters painted on their chests perform dances while carrying portions of the dragon (head, body, and tail). When the long day of dragon dancing is over, everyone joins in a huge feast prepared by the nondancers during the day.

CHUNG YEUNG

Observed by: Chinese
Observed on: October 21

The Chinese in Macau share the Chung Yeung Festival of Ancestors, also referred to as Ascending Heights, with their relatives on the mainland. The Chinese believe that long ago a family living in this region went on an excursion to a nearby hill. When they returned home they found that all their animals had died from some unknown disease. Consequently they came to believe that going to a high place would save their lives from similar disasters. To celebrate this holiday they climb hills after offering prayers for their departed relatives at family graves.

Rites of Passage

MARRIAGE

Wedding celebrations in Macau are colorful, whether they are Chinese or Western; indeed, some people combine features from both cultural traditions. When a Chinese-style wedding is held, the bridegroom goes to the bride's home to pick her up. When a wedding is planned according to Portuguese (Western) tradition, the newlyweds go to the church for their wedding ceremony. Some Macanese hold Western-style weddings, while others have weddings that combine Chinese and Western styles. In the latter case, the bride and groom have a Western wedding ceremony at a church in the morning, and then proceed to Coloane Island where they ride in a flower-decorated car. Then the bridegroom takes the bride back to her home. After lunch she removes her white wedding gown and changes into a Chinese wedding dress. The bridegroom, now also in appropriate Chinese wedding garb, comes to take her back. Back home the newlyweds perform the formal Chinese wedding ceremony by bowing to the Heaven and Earth, to the ancestors, and to their parents. After the wedding ceremony the newlyweds and their relatives and friends go to a Chinese restaurant for an extravagant wedding dinner to celebrate.

DEATH

The majority of the population of Macau is Roman Catholic, owing to the missionary zeal of its former Portuguese rulers. Devout Christians in Macau adhere to the basic tenets of the Catholic Church. A traditional Catholic funeral consists of three main parts: the vigil (sometimes called the wake), the Requiem Mass, and the burial and informal after-burial gatherings. During the vigil the family gathers around the dead one to pray for the person, to remember his or her life, and to console each another. If the wake takes place in a funeral home, funeral cards are usually present. On one side they have a Catholic image and, on the other, a prayer, and the name, birth date, and heavenly birth date of the deceased.

The day after the vigil a Requiem Mass is performed. The body is moved from the place of the vigil to the church or chapel. The priest who will perform the Mass, dressed in a black cope (a large mantle worn by priests), greets the coffin at the church door and sprinkles it with holy water while intoning the De Profundis (Psalm 129) and the Miserere (Psalm 50). The body is then carried toward the altar and placed outside the sanctuary with the feet toward the altar if the body is that of a layperson, and head toward the altar if a priest. Requiem Masses are usually much like other Masses.

Traditionally, at least in Catholic cemeteries, the bodies of laypeople are buried with their heads facing east, symbolizing their awaiting bodily resurrection by Christ. Priests are buried in the opposite direction to the laity, symbolizing their need to confront the effects of having to minister to the souls entrusted to them by God.

Following funerals it is customary for friends and relatives to gather at the house of the one closest to the departed, to eat, drink, remember, console one another, and pray. At this time bringing food and drink is usually appreciated by those who are grieving, because it is after everyone else has departed that the survivors begin to face the sad reality of their temporal loss. It is the days after a funeral, when all the distractions of funeral arrangements and greeting people have been performed, that are the most painful.

Funerals for baptized children who have not yet reached the age of reason are quite different and joyful because children go straight to heaven, not having had the opportunity to commit a mortal sin. For children's funerals, the priest wears white, and the Mass performed is either a Votive Mass of the Angels or the Mass of the day if a Votive Mass cannot be performed on that particular day.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The Republic of Macedonia formally called the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM), is in the heart of the Balkan region. Greece lies to its south and Bulgaria to its northeast. Although this republic is in its infancy, its history reaches far back in time.

According to ancient Greek mythology, Makedon was the name of the leader of the Makedones—a tribe of Makednoi that spread throughout western, southern, and central Macedonia. The name Makedon comes from Makednos, derived from the Greek makos, which means “high.” The Makedones (or Macedonians) were extremely tall people, and it is probable they received their name because of their height.

In 2002 archaeologists working at the Tatihev Kamen site in north Macedonia announced that the site once functioned as an ancient observatory as well as a ceremonial site. About 4,000 years ago the site was used to monitor the stars and the Sun, and holes were used to record the motions of the Sun and Moon. The discovery documents the vitality of a previously unknown Balkan civilization with a developed culture and sophisticated religious ceremonies. Other ongoing excavations in the Balkans may provide additional information regarding this culture and its people.

The territory of ancient Macedon included present-day Macedonia, large parts of northern Greece as it is today, and southwestern Bulgaria. Argos Orestikon, a city located in the southwestern Macedonia region of Orestis, was the birthplace of the Macedonian Argeadae Dynasty between the eighth and seventh centuries. The settlement at Archontiko whose original name is unknown, was the most important urban center in the northern part of the province of Bottiaia during the prehistoric and historical periods until the end of the fifth century, when Pella became the new capital of the Macedonian kingdom.

Recent excavations at an ancient settlement near Pella, located in what is now northern Greece, are also providing more concrete information on Macedonia's historical period, which began with the reign of Caranus, its first known king (808–778 B.C.E.). To date, less than a hundredth of the of the nearly 50-acre site has been explored. Finding intact burial sites that have escaped the ravages of time and thieves is rare, and archaeologists expect the 3,000-year-old cemetery to produce even more treasures that will further enhance our understanding of the wealth, heroic culture, commerce, and burial ceremonies of the ancient Macedonians. So far, archaeologists have found 396 unlooted tombs that have yielded 5,000 objects from between the seventh and fourth centuries. Recent finds include 80 pit graves that date back to the second half of the sixth century B.C.E. The graves hold the remains of warriors carrying weapons and richly clothed in gold. Nearby lay their wives also richly adorned with gold.

Alexander I Philhellene, who reigned between 498 and 454, expanded the kingdom and, by the fifth century B.C.E., the Macedonians had created a unified kingdom. King Alexander I was the first king to play a major role in Greek politics. His reign was followed by those of his son Perdiccas II (r. 453–13), and his son Archelaus (r. 413–399), who focused the political organization of the Macedonian kingdom and developed it into as a significant economic power.

Macedonian rule extended to northern Greece during the reigns of Alexander II and Perdiccas III, the sons of Amyntas III who ruled Macedonia between 393 and 369. When the brothers died, Phillip II, the third son of Amyntas III, took over the reins of the Macedonian kingdom.

The assimilation of Greek culture and character intensified during the reign of Phillip II of Macedon, during the fourth century B.C.E., when Macedon extended its territory across northern Greece. Under his rule Macedonia was liberated and unified; he made it the most powerful European state with a common national ideal. In 336 Alexander III (356–23), the Great, the 20-year-old son of Phillip II, succeeded his father, and the Macedonian kingdom reached its height during his reign. Alexander the Great pushed the borders of the Macedonian Empire across Turkey, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, and parts of the territory that was formerly Russia, reaching as far India.

Following Alexander's death in 323 serious infighting between his generals splintered the empire. As a result the Macedonian Empire gradually declined, and Rome, which was expanding eastward, defeated the Macedonian army. In 168 Macedonia became a province of the Roman Empire.

Macedonia prospered under Roman domination and soon attracted colonists from Asia and Italy. Jewish communities also entered Macedonia during this period. In 324 C.E. Byzantium became the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire. This promoted further development of Macedonia and particularly that of its capital, Thessaloniki, which soon grew to be the second most important city in the Byzantine Empire. In the 13th and 14th centuries Byzantine control was punctuated by periods of Bulgarian and Serbian rule in the north. In spite of several rebellions and Slavic incursions Macedonia remained a Byzantine territory until the Ottoman Turks conquered it in 1389. For the next five centuries the Archelaus (413–399) made Macedonia a significant economic power. He built roads and fortresses and reorganized the Macedonian army. He moved the Macedonian capital from Aigae to Pella and founded the Macedonian Olympic Games in Dion (the holy city of the Macedonians), primarily because the Greek Olympic Games were forbidden to barbarians (non-Greeks), which included the Macedonians.

Archelaus

Ottomans maintained a firm grasp, not only in Macedonia but also in adjoining regions as well.

The first significant resistance movements against the Turkish occupation were the Mariovo–Prilep Rebellion (1564–65) and the Karposh Uprising in 1689. After Greece, Serbia, and Bulgaria freed themselves from Turkish rule in the 19th century, all three had ambitions regarding the Macedonian territory. The 19th century was a period of growing national awareness among the Macedonians as well, and they began organizing themselves for the fight against the Ottomans at the same time. In 1893, led by Goce Delchev (1872–1903), the Macedonian revolutionary organization known as the Internal Macedonian Odrin Revolutionary Organization (VMORO) was founded in Salonika, with the declared aim of wresting control from the Turks and establishing an autonomous Macedonian state. On August 2, 1903, the VMORO launched the Ilinden Uprising against the Ottoman rulers and declared Macedonian independence. The revolutionaries liberated the town of Krushevo, and established the Republic of Krushevo with its own government.

In 1912 Greece, Serbia, and Bulgaria joined forces, defeated the Turks in Macedonia, the country was territorially divided among its three new rulers. After World War I Serbia joined the kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes and in 1929 this new kingdom was officially named Yugoslavia. The People's Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was established at the conclusion of World War II, and the People's

Ilinden Uprising

For the Macedonian people and the neighboring Balkan states, the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century were full of armed insurrections aimed at overthrowing Turkish political domination and forming national states. The first wave of insurrections (1804–30) spread over Serbia, Greece, and Romania, and the second, over Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Albania (1876–89).

Fun Fact

The name Macedonia is the oldest surviving name of a country on the continent of Europe.

Republic of Macedonia became one of the six republics of the Yugoslav Federation. When the federation was renamed the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1963, the People's Republic of Macedonia was likewise renamed the Socialist Republic of Macedonia. The republic renamed itself the Republic of Macedonia in 1991 and peacefully seceded from Yugoslavia. The flag of Macedonia was adopted on October 5, 1995. Soon after its declaration of independence, however, a conflict erupted with Greece over its official name because Macedonia is also the name of a northern province of Greece. The dispute continues to this day.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Surrounded by Albania to its west, Greece to its south, Bulgaria to its east, and Yugoslavia to its north, the Republic of Macedonia is a landlocked country, embedded in the Balkan region. It has a mountainous terrain with deep basins and valleys. The major river of Macedonia is the Vardar, which geographically bisects the country. The highest point of Macedonia is Golem Korab, at 9,032 feet. Lake Orhid in the Republic of Macedonia is the oldest lake in Europe and is an oligotrophic lake, which means it has low levels of plant nutrients.

The republic's largest city is its capital Skopje with an estimated 600,000 inhabitants. The other major cities are Bitola, Kumanova, Prilep, and Tetovo. Macedonia has warm, dry summers and very cold winters with heavy snowfall. The average annual temperature in Macedonia is 53°F. The country experiences a lot of seismic activity and has been subject to destructive earthquakes in the past.

Macedonia has a wide variety of flora that includes pine, oak, beech, poplars, white willows, weeping willows, elms, ash, and sycamore trees. The nation's fauna include wolves, squirrels, foxes, lynxes, deer, wild boars, and chamois (a small, goatlike ruminant) as well as the imperial eagle, blackcap, grouse, and forest owl.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of Macedonia has seen many upheavals in the past years since its independence in 1991. When Macedonia gained independence in September 1991, it was the least developed of the Yugoslav republics. The collapse of Yugoslavia further damaged the economy, because it ended the transfer payments from the center. Other influences that hindered economic growth until 1996 included: the lack of proper infrastructure; UN sanctions on Yugoslavia, which was Macedonia's major trade partner; and an additional economic and trade embargo instituted by Greece over a dispute about the country's constitutional name and flag. The war in Kosovo in 1999 and the 2001 Albanian conflict shattered the economy of Macedonia due to constant border closures, increased deficit spending on security needs, and investor uncertainty, which decreased trade during that period.

The nation has made a sluggish recovery since 2002, and the extent of unemployment and the gray market are areas of concern. Macedonia is rich in natural resources the most important of which are chromium, lead, zinc, manganese, tungsten, nickel, low-grade iron ore, asbestos, sulfur, timber, and arable land. While Macedonia exports food, beverages, tobacco, iron, and steel, it has to import machinery and equipment, chemicals, fuels, and food products. Its major trading partners are Germany, Italy, the United States, Croatia, Greece, Bulgaria, Slovenia, Turkey, Ukraine, and Austria.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Republic of Macedonia is a predominantly Orthodox Christian nation, with 70 percent of the population adhering to the Christian faith. However, 17 percent of the nation's population is Muslim. Ethnic Macedonians comprise a little more than 64 percent of the Macedonian population, but the country is also home to Albanians, Turks, and Roma (gypsies) as well as Serbs.

Macedonian, a South Slavic language with varying dialects (eastern and western), is the official language of Macedonia. St. Clement of Orhid (who worked in that city between 886 and 916) and other disciples of Sts. Cyrilus and Methodius spread the Slavic language in Macedonia. However, Albanian, Turkish, and Serbo-Croatian languages are also spoken in the region.

Macedonia has a rich musical heritage. Traditional musical instruments include the gajda (bagpipes), the kaval (flute), the zurla (large pipes), and the tapan (a big cylindrical drum). Among Macedonian folk dances, the most popular is known as teskoto (the hard one). Macedonian men adorn themselves in traditional costumes and perform this dance to the music of the tapan and the zurla.

❁ CUISINE

Macedonian cuisine boasts a wide variety of delicious dishes. Some of the traditional dishes include soups, breads, lamb kebabs, stuffed vegetables, burek (meat pie), gravce na tavce (beans), kjebapchinja (minced meat), and tarator (yogurt and cucumber salad), to name a few. Meat (chicken, lamb, beef, and pork) is generally served with rice, vegetables, and pasta. Macedonians also love desserts and puddings; cakes, pies, pastries, and fruit salads are also very popular. Among beverages, Turkish coffee, wine, and beer, as well as soft drinks, are preferred.

Fun Fact

The unit of currency of the Republic of Macedonia is the Macedonian denar (MKD).

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year's Day in many countries. Celebrations take place all over the world, with revelries that often begin on New Year's Eve (December 31). On New Year's Eve Macedonians attend parties and sing and dance their way into the new year. On New Year's Eve and on New Year's Day, both, the Macedonian Philharmonic Orchestra holds a traditional New Year's concert in which renowned Macedonian sopranos participate and enthrall the audience with their captivating performances. Traditional Macedonian folk songs and dances are part of the concert.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day commemorates the social, economical, political, and cultural achievements of women throughout the world and also pays tribute to the contributions of women toward building a better and safer world. In many parts of Macedonia, women activists and organizations take part in street marches; special lectures and discussions on issues concerning women are also organized on this day. Plays encouraging women to fight domestic abuse are also staged.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Macedonia trade unions organize rallies and demonstrations all over the country with banners displaying the slogan, "Long Live the First of May." Workers enthusiastically take part in these rallies and show their solidarity.

❁ ILINDEN UPRISING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 2

This day commemorates the armed rebellion of 1903, which was started by Macedonians to liberate their nation from Turkish rule. It is known as the Ilinden Uprising since it took place on August 2, which is celebrated as St. Elijah's Day, or Ilinden. Starting in 1389 Macedonia had been under the dominance of the Ottoman Turks. However, local Macedonians dreamed of an independent state and staged many unsuccessful uprisings against the Turks. On August 2, 1903, the Internal Macedonian Odrin Revolutionary Organization (VMORO), under the leadership of Goce Delchev, called for an armed uprising against the Ottoman Turks and were determined to realize the dream of independent Macedonia. The Macedonians fought valiantly against the powerful Turkish forces and were successful in liberating many parts of Macedonia. Although the revolt was brutally crushed by the Turks, Macedonians take pride in remembering the uprising in which their predecessors fought for the integrity and sovereignty of their nation.

On this day a special memorial service is held in Macedonian Orthodox churches across the country to honor the freedom fighters who lost their lives while defending Macedonia; floral wreaths are laid at their graves. Paintings and photo exhibits depicting the important events during the uprising are put on display in different parts of Macedonia. The president of the nation also gives a commemorative speech on this historic day and reminds Macedonians to safeguard the sovereignty of their nation.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 8

Until 1991 Macedonia was a part of Yugoslavia. However in a referendum on September 8, 1991, Macedonians voted overwhelmingly in favor of independence, and the independent state of Macedonia came into existence. On this day in the capital city of Skopje, the president presides over the Independence Day celebrations. The unfurling of the national flag is followed by a parade of the armed forces. Patriotic songs, folk songs, and dance performances are also part of the celebrations.

❁ ANTIFASCIST UPRISING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 11

This day commemorates the Macedonians' historic uprising against Italian fascist forces on October 11, 1941. During World War II Italian forces, in alliance with Germany, occupied a major part of Macedonia.

More than 60,000 Jews in Thessaloniki were sent to extermination camps in Poland. The Macedonians fiercely opposed Italian occupation. On October 11, 1941, one of the revolutionary parties of Macedonia, Prilep Partisan Detachment, launched an attack on the Italians in the city of Prilep, and started the antifascist uprising.

On this day special prayer services take place in Macedonian Orthodox churches in memory of those freedom fighters who laid down their lives while fighting an oppressive and unjust regime.

✿ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice or Kurban Bajram, commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim (Abraham) in Allah and his willingness to sacrifice his son to obey Allah's command. On this day Muslims in Macedonia offer prayers at their local mosques and exchange greetings. Children sing kasida and ilabia (religious songs). Then a ram is sacrificed and its meat is distributed among friends, family members, and the poor.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6–7

Most Orthodox churches follow the Julian calendar instead of the Western (Gregorian) calendar. Because there is a difference of 13 days between the Julian and the Gregorian calendars, Orthodox Christmas is celebrated on January 7, not December 25. In Macedonia celebrations begin on January 5, which is known as Koelde. On this day Macedonian children go from door to door singing Christmas carols. They receive candies, sweets, nuts, and toys from their neighbors. In the evening a huge bonfire is made, and elderly people assemble around it to discuss the events of the past year and renew their hopes for the coming one.

On Orthodox Christmas Eve (January 6) homes are decorated with pine and oak branches, which symbolize the wishes of the family for a long and healthy life. (The oak tree is symbolic of longevity and endurance.) People also bring a badnik (oak log) home. While the traditional Christmas Eve dinner is being laid on the table, the father and the eldest son of the family cut the badnik into three pieces, symbolizing the Holy Trinity. Then the father brings in the pieces of the wood, and family members place them on the fire. Next father and son greet each other. Children in the family bring bundles of straw into the dining room and spread it on the floor to give the feel of the manger in which Jesus was born. The family then sits down to dinner. Baked fish is the traditional dish consumed on Christmas Eve. Pogacha (homemade bread) is part of the Christmas dinner, and one of the breads is baked with a coin hidden inside it. It is believed that whoever receives this coin will have a successful year. Christmas candles are also lit, and family members sing hymns.

On Christmas Day (January 7) families attend Christmas liturgy in their local churches early in the morning. After the divine liturgy the family returns home and welcomes the guests who arrive at their home on this auspicious day. The hosts greet their guests by kissing them three times on the cheeks and exchanging greetings. Then each guest shakes the burning oak log and, as the sparks fly, he or she expresses good wishes to the family.

The traditional Christmas dinner consists of roasted meat and other traditional dishes and, since it marks the end of Winter Lent as well as the beginning of the three-day festivities of Christmas, meat is considered an essential part of the Christmas dinner.

✿ ORTHODOX NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 14

Most Orthodox churches follow the Julian calendar instead of the Gregorian (Western) calendar. There is a difference of 13 days between the Julian and the Gregorian calendars. Hence Orthodox New Year's Day is celebrated on January 14, instead of January 1. On Orthodox New Year Macedonians visit their friends and families and exchange greetings.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Orthodox Easter is celebrated to commemorate the Christian belief in Jesus' Resurrection three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Orthodox Easter family members and guests are offered Easter eggs and greetings are exchanged. These Easter eggs are dyed and beautifully decorated on the preceding Thursday (known as Holy Thursday). Most eggs are colored red, which symbolizes happiness about Jesus' Resurrection, and many people use the ancient Slavic Orthodox style of making designs on the eggs by scraping the surface with a sharp instrument. According to tradition the first dyed egg is kept separately from the rest and is preserved until the next Easter. It is referred to as the chuvarsko jajce ("protector of the house"), and on the next Easter the mistress of the house secretly buries it in her garden.

The game of tapping Easter eggs is also played: Two people hold Easter eggs in their hands and tap each other's egg with the tips. The one whose egg does not break is declared the winner and receives his or her opponent's egg.

Easter dinner consists of lamb soup, lamb, salads, sarma (stuffed cabbage), and cakes.

❁ ST. CYRILUS AND ST. METHIDIUS DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: May 24

In Macedonia the Feast of Saints Cyrilus (d. 869) and Methodius (d. 885) is celebrated on May 24 by Orthodox Christians. Sts. Cyrilus and Methodius were brothers and devout Christians who belonged to a renowned family in Thessalonica. The saints introduced Christianity in Bulgaria and convinced the king of Bulgaria, Boris I (d. 907), to embrace Christianity along with his subjects. It is believed that St. Cyril invented the Glagolitic alphabet, in which 24 letters out of 38 resembled symbols used in Greek script. Both the brothers began teaching the Slavonic language in the region. Disciples of these saints spread the use of Slavonic languages in other Slavic countries.

The late Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) declared St. Cyrilus and St. Methodius co-patrons of Europe on December 31, 1980.

Winter Lent

In the Eastern Orthodox Church (including the Macedonian Orthodox Church), Winter Lent, also known as the Christmas Lent, Small Lent, or the Nativity Fast, marks the beginning of the holy season and is considered a period of preparation before Nativity, or Christmas. It lasts for 40 days, beginning on November 28 and lasting until Orthodox Christmas on January 6. It is known as Advent in Western Churches.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, also known as Ramazan Bajram, marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan. Muslims all over the world observe a month-long dawn-to-dusk fast during Ramadan. The fast ends after the sighting of the new Moon, and Ramazan Bajram is celebrated on the very next day. Fasting on Eid al-Fitr is strictly forbidden in the Koran.

On Eid al-Fitr devout Macedonian Muslims get up early in the morning and eat a light meal. Then they offer prayers along with friends and family members in their local mosques, thanking Allah for his benevolence.

People dress in new clothes, and children sing religious songs and receive special gifts on this day. Macedonians exchange greetings and celebrate Eid al-Fitr by dining lavishly with their families.

❁ SKOPJE INTERNATIONAL JAZZ FESTIVAL

Observed in: Skopje
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October

The Skopje International Jazz Festival takes place in the capital city of Skopje. The festival is renowned for diverse performances and for inviting artists with varying backgrounds to perform. During the festival renowned jazz artists from all over the world perform and thrill audiences with their captivating music. Jazz legends like B. B. King, Ray Charles, and Herb Hancock have all participated in this festival. The festival also provides a platform for new jazz musicians to show their talent to the world.

Thousands of jazz music fans flock to Skopje in October to enjoy a musical treat and hear their favorite jazz musicians perform live.

On this day Macedonian Orthodox Christians attend a special prayer service in their local churches in honor of the holy saints. The life and teachings of the holy saints are remembered. The prime minister of the country also participates in the special church service held in the Macedonian Orthodox Church in Skopje.

Rites of Passage

MARRIAGE

In Macedonia on the day of the wedding, the bride's guards (a group of relatives) come to her home to escort her to the church accompanied by an orchestra or a band. Before going to church the bride and groom are allowed to see each other for some time and assembled relatives raise a toast in their honor. Then they leave for the church, while the band continues to play traditional Macedonian wedding songs.

During the wedding ceremony the entire wedding party, including the bride and groom, go toward the altar and a brief engagement ceremony follows in which the bride and groom exchange rings. Then the wedding party moves toward the center of the church, where they find a table with the Bible, two crowns, a cross, and a cup filled with wine.

Next an instructive sermon is given by the priest, and the couple is asked if they are getting married at will. On receiving an affirmative answer, the priest takes the hands of the bride and groom and ties them together, symbolizing the spirit of oneness. Then he places the two crowns on their heads, which symbolize the coronation of glory and the blessings bestowed on the newlyweds for their future. A reading from the Gospels follows, after which the bride and groom drink the wine from the cup. Then the priest leads the wedding party and walks three times around the table, symbolizing the eternal path of life.

A lavish reception follows. People sing songs, perform traditional dances, and toast the newlyweds, wishing them happiness throughout their lives. Instead of gifts Macedonians give money to the couple so they have a good financial beginning for their married life.

After the reception the bride meets little children and gently kisses their cheeks three times. This symbolizes her desire to have children. Then the bride receives a cup of wine and bread from her mother-in-law, which symbolizes her good wishes for happiness and harmony in their new life.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

A former French colony, the Republic of Madagascar occupies the fourth largest island in the world. Not much is known about Madagascar's prehistory, but stone artifacts discovered on the island indicate that the people of an ancient culture once lived here. Around 2,000 years ago Malay-Polynesians from Southeast Asia and people of African and Arab descent began settling in Madagascar.

Archaeologists have found chlorite schist ceramics, along with imported and locally produced pottery at a settlement on Nosy Mangabe, Madagascar, an island in Antongil Bay. The manufactures made with chlorite schist indicate that the settlement, dated between 670 and 980 C.E., had active trade connections with the Near East because that substance was widely used in the Islamic world. The earliest settlement on Nosy Mangabe dates to about the fifth century. Imports discovered at the Manambovo and Linta River mouths suggest that these artifacts were brought to the island by southern sea routes, apparently from the nearby African mainland of present-day

Zimbabwe and Mozambique, not overland from northern Madagascar as one might suppose. This possibility indicates that southern Madagascar's Manda civilization had direct links with the Late Iron Age civilization of the Swahili coast.

In 1500 the islands were noted by a Portuguese adventurer following the new trade route to India, but more than a century passed before Portuguese missionaries attempted to win converts to Christianity in the 17th century. Shortly thereafter both England and France began taking notice of the region and the vast potential it offered in terms of the slave trade. France had more success than the English had and managed to maintain a fort on Madagascar for 30 years, but a massacre in 1674 quickly eliminated them, although France continued to claim rights to the island.

Frequent tropical storms prevented any colonial power from settling along the coasts, making long-term control over the islands impossible. Moreover during the 17th century, the east coast of Madagascar was used by pirates as a refuge and served as a convenient base from which they could launch attacks on ships traveling around the Cape of Good Hope.

During the same period many competing rulers began to establish kingdoms, and by the middle of the 17th century a dynasty forged by the Sakalava tribes controlled almost half

Robert Drury's Ordeal: Fact or Fiction?

In 1705 a young man appeared at the London docks identifying himself as Robert Drury and claiming that he was the lone survivor of a shipwreck off the coast of Madagascar. According to a newspaper account of Drury's story, he said that the ship had sprung a leak, forcing everyone to seek safety on the island. No sooner had they landed, however, than the natives said they would resupply the stranded sailors if they turned over their weapons, and the sailors obliged. Once the Europeans were defenseless, according to Drury, the natives killed all the men, with the exception of himself.

The story might have ended there, but 24 years later, in 1729, Drury published a book describing his experiences on Madagascar entitled Madagascar; or Robert Drury's Journal, during Fifteen Years' Captivity on that Island. In it Drury provided what he claimed was a true account of the shipwreck, the massacre of his shipmates, and his subsequent 15 years on Madagascar during which he was enslaved, fought in wars among the various peoples, married, and finally managed to return to England on a slave ship.

It was a captivating tale and, with an apparently credible preface affirming the authenticity of Drury's story, its 18th-century readers regarded it as a trustworthy source of information about Madagascar. In the late 19th century, though, two authors raised questions regarding the truth of Drury's Journal, and identified the novelist Daniel Defoe (1660–1731) as the skilled perpetrator of a hoax. This theory about the origin of the Journal was followed in 1939 and 1943 by the research of a Professor J. R. Moore, who identified numerous sources that Defoe might have used to produce such a credibly detailed account of Madagascar.

Then in 1996, an archaeologist at Sheffield University, Mike Parker Pearson, published evidence that, not only was Drury's book authentic, but its author had provided minute details about life and culture on Madagascar that had proved useful to him in his recent excursion to the island to identify the earliest stone tombs in Androy. One of Pearson's excavations revealed the remains of ancient Ambaro, the likely location of the royal capital of Fenoarivo that Robert Drury claimed to have visited in 1703. During Pearson's next trip to Madagascar, he plans to seek the remains of other royal villages in Androy, including the one where Drury said he was kept as a slave, and discover the ancient Mahafaly capital described by Drury.

the island. In the 18th century however, Sakalava dominance had already begun to decline, and the Merina clan from the central plateau had become dominant by the late 18th century. To counter the constant threat of invasion and colonization posed by European powers, Merina King Radama I (c.

1793–1828) signed a treaty with the British governor of Mauritius in 1820. The treaty provided that the Merina king would accept the British demand for abolition of the slave trade. In exchange for this compliance, the British recognized Madagascar as an independent nation under Merina rule, agreed to provide military and financial support, and the London Missionary Society arrived bringing Jesus' message to the Malagasy peoples.

This happy state of affairs ended abruptly when Radama died in 1828. He was succeeded on the throne by his queen Ranaivalona I (d. 1861), who reversed all his policies. Almost all of the Europeans were forced to leave, the newly converted indigenous Christians endured persecution (some 200 were killed), and in 1835 Ranaivalona formally outlawed Christianity. This political seesawing continued through a succession of queens until the 1880s, when European colonialism became more aggressive.

By the end of the 19th century French influence in the area had increased and in 1883, in a strategic move, Britain recognized France's sole authority over the country in exchange for French recognition of British sovereignty in Zanzibar. In 1895 French forces invaded Madagascar and proclaimed it a French colony. By 1897 the Merina monarchy had been abolished, and Queen Ranaivalona III (1861–1917) was exiled to Algeria, where she died. French was declared the official language of Madagascar, and attempts were made to outlaw the Malagasy language. The French exploited the local people, introducing forced labor in lieu of slavery.

After World War II the independence movement in the islands gained ground, and unrest increased among the local people. The French were not inclined to leave Madagascar, however, and instead resorted to oppressive measures to crush the freedom movement. A revolt in 1947 resulted in more than 80,000 people being killed all over the country by the French.

When Charles de Gaulle (1890–1970) became president of France in 1958, a plebiscite was held in Madagascar. The Malagasy voted to make Madagascar an autonomous republic within the French community of overseas nations. Madagascar became an independent nation on June 26, 1960, when France granted full independent status to the Republic of Madagascar.

Philibert Tsiranana was sworn in as the first president of independent Madagascar. He remained its president until 1972, when he was forced to resign by antigovernment demonstrators who demanded an end to his oppressive rule, which had claimed many innocent lives and mismanaged the country's economy. In June 1975 Admiral Didier Ratsiraka (b. 1936) took over the reins of government and began the difficult task of reviving Madagascar's failing economy. Banks and businesses were nationalized, without any compensation to their former owners. As a result the French businessmen left the country.

Ratsiraka introduced a "red book" in which he laid down his own theories and policies for the functioning of the government. He also began establishing diplomatic ties with Communist nations such as North Korea. But some of his pro-growth reforms resulted in a large international debt, and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) intervened. In addition, protests against Ratsiraka's government increased after his security guards killed peaceful demonstrators in 1991. Meanwhile the governor of Antananarivo Marc Ravalomanana (b. 1949) had acquired considerable popularity. In the December 2001 elections, both he and Ratsiraka claimed victory. Ravalomanana asserted his claim by declaring himself president of Madagascar in February 2002. By the end of 2002 Ratsiraka had fled to Paris, and fresh elections were held in Madagascar.

Ravalomanana was the clear winner of the second election and was sworn in as president of Madagascar. Under his leadership economic reforms were initiated, and his efforts to obtain international support for the development of Madagascar's economy bore fruit with the IMF, the United States, and the World Bank pledging sizable sums for the region's development.

The development plans suffered a huge setback, however, after the east coast of Madagascar was hit by a deadly tsunami in December 2004. The infrastructure in the coastal region was destroyed, and more than 1,000 people were left homeless.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Madagascar, South America, Africa, Antarctica, India, and Australia formed the southern supercontinent of Gondwana 160 million years ago. It took between 160 and 150 million years for Madagascar, India, Antarctica, and Australia to break away as a tectonic whole from eastern Africa. Madagascar and India split off together from Antarctica and Australia around 120 million years ago and, around 90 million years ago, India broke off from Madagascar and headed north for its merger with what is now southern Asia. This geological fragmentation left Madagascar in the isolation until relatively recently, with the result that 85 percent of the island's flora and fauna are found nowhere else in the world.

Madagascar is located in the Indian Ocean, off the east coast of Mozambique in southern Africa. The fourth largest island in the world, 1,000 miles long from north to south, volcanic mountains dominate the northern part while the southwest is mostly desert. Madagascar experiences seismic activity and is also vulnerable to the consequences of distant seismic events, as was demonstrated when the island was struck by the tsunami that traveled across the Indian Ocean on December 2004.

Geographically the region can be broadly divided into six distinct parts: the east coast, the west coast, the central highlands, the Tsaratanana Massif, the Mahafaly Plateau, and the desert region in the southwest. The country has varied climatic conditions. While the coastal areas enjoy a tropical climate, the inland areas are temperate, and the southern region is arid. In the central part the rainy season brings thunderstorms, but the east coast receives the most rainfall. Cyclones are common during the rainy season and cause widespread destruction. The worst cyclone to hit Madagascar was Cyclone Geralda, which ravaged the island in 1927, claiming thousands of lives.

❁ ECONOMY

Agriculture, fishing, and forestry form the backbone of Madagascar's economy. Subsistence farming is the primary occupation of most Malagasy even though only 5 percent of the island is suited to agriculture. In the post-independence era, the economy suffered greatly due to the massive strikes staged as antigovernment protests as well as the failure to make economic reforms. Mounting foreign debt, the absence of a good infrastructure, and rampant corruption stunted the country's economic growth. However, the financial support of international organizations such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund has helped shore up Madagascar's failing economy. In addition the government has set up several Export Processing Zones (EPZs) in different parts of the country and obtained increased private investment in many sectors. But the country still faces the challenge of reducing poverty and environmental problems, particularly deforestation and erosion.

Although the country is emerging as a leader in the struggle to end the illegal trafficking of humans on the African continent, Madagascar still has a serious problem to confront.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Madagascar is home to more than 18 ethnic groups, most of which are of Asian and African descent. While the Merina and the Betsileo, who dominate the central highlands, have Asian features, the people living in the coastal regions have a predominantly African look. The Besimisaraka are the dominant tribal group in the coastal areas, followed by the Sakalava and the Tsimihety tribes. These tribal groups maintain their traditional beliefs and rural lifestyle, existing at a subsistence level.

Fun Fact

Just how and when the ancestors of Madagascar's unique animals arrived remains one of the unsolved puzzles for students of natural history.

French and Malagasy are the official languages of Madagascar. Of late the government has undertaken efforts to popularize the English language by making it a part of the school curriculum. Forty-one percent of the Malagasy are Christians and 7 percent are Muslims, but more than 52 percent have managed to maintain their indigenous beliefs. The worship of ancestral spirits and their powers is an integral part of Madagascar's culture. Special ritual offerings are made to these ancestral spirits to appease them.

The most striking feature of traditional Malagasy attire is the lamba, a printed wraparound sheet imprinted with scenes from daily life. Straw hats also figure prominently in Malagasy dress. The design and style of the hats vary from region to region—from cone-shaped, to broad-rimmed, to brimless. Some are even tight fitting.

Music and dance play a vital role in Madagascan culture, and Asian and African influences are evident in the rhythms of traditional Malagasy dance and music. The dance rhythms are accompanied by whistle, flute, and valiba—a 28-stringed instrument, resembling a bassoon (a woodwind instrument with a double reed) but played like a harp. Other popular instruments include the lokango voatavo (chordophone) and kabosy (guitar). A popular rhythmic style is the vaky soava, a form of singing accompanied by clapping.

Kabary, or traditional oratory, originated in the 1930s when speakers displayed their speaking skills in political assemblies. The tradition evolved into an entertainment that has become part of the hira gasy, a popular spectacle held on Sunday afternoons in the capital of Antananarivo. Hira gasy includes storytelling, music, and dance performances.

CUISINE

Vary, or rice, is the staple food of Madagascar. Vary can be accompanied by fish, poultry, or beef. Stews, including romazava (vegetable and beef stew) and ravitoto (pork stew with manioc), are Malagasy favorites. Achards (hot pickled curry) is also popular. People love to eat fruit; mangoes, pineapples, bananas, and lychees are available throughout the year.

Reflecting the French influence, coffee is more common than tea in Madagascar. The locally made Three Horse Beer, and gris (a gray-colored locally produced wine) are extremely popular. Distilled rum called roma, litche (an alcoholic-fruit drink made from lychees) and toaka gras (crude rum made from rice and sugarcane) are also widely drunk in Madagascar.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Gregorian (or Western) calendar, January 1, is widely celebrated as New Year's

Day. The Malagasy usher in the new year with great enthusiasm. On New Year's Eve large parties are held in urban areas, and people dance and sing through the night. Bountiful food and free-flowing alcoholic beverages are an integral part of the New Year's Day celebrations in Madagascar.

MEMORIAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 29

Memorial Day also called Commemoration Day or Martyr's Day, is celebrated in honor of the people killed by the French during the national revolt of 1947. On March 29, 1947, nationalist tribesmen of Madagascar rose up against the French forces in the region and began widespread demonstrations. The French were forced to bring reinforcements as the uprising spread throughout the country. More than 80,000 people were killed by the French forces. Every year on March 29 the Malagasy people pay homage to those who died for Madagascar's freedom.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, commemorates the important role played by workers in their societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

As in France, the government of the Republic of Madagascar observes May 1 as a national holiday, and all public and private institutions are closed on this day.

AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 25

Africa Day commemorates the formation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on May 25, 1963, at Addis Ababa in Ethiopia. The celebrations recognize the efforts of all African nations to form a unified Africa, as well as their decision to cooperate with each other in matters relating to trade and development of the continent as a whole. The OAU has been instrumental in negotiating and ending disputes, conflicts, and wars within Africa. At present there are 53 member countries in the OAU.

Africa day is a national holiday in Madagascar. On this day the Malagasy recall their struggle for independence and pay tribute to freedom fighters. Special seminars and workshops on African culture and heritage are organized to help Africans keep in touch with, and take pride in, their heritage and culture.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 26

The Republic of Madagascar was granted complete independence by France on June 26, 1960. Although it was an independent nation until the late 19th century under the Merina rulers, the region lost its sovereignty and was declared a French colony after the French invasion in 1885. French rule was marked by oppression, and voices of protest met with swift suppression. After World War II, the struggle for freedom intensified, and demonstrations were held all over Madagascar. But the French increased their brutality toward the demonstrators. An uprising in 1947 was crushed, and more than 80,000 people died. However, even this incident failed to suppress Malagasy demands, and finally the French granted Madagascar independent status.

On this day grand celebrations are held all over Madagascar. The president presides over the Independence Day celebrations in the capital of Antananarivo. Special tribute is paid to the freedom fighters. Official speeches, a parade by the armed forces, dances, and musical performances are other highlights of this day.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas, a day of celebration and rejoicing for Christians, is the day chosen by the early Christian church to mark the birth of Jesus, whose teachings were compiled in the New Testament. In Madagascar Christmas Eve belongs to the children and features their programs, including theatrical plays about the life of Jesus. Christmas trees are not part of the celebrations due to the problem of deforestation in the region, and there are minimal decorations in churches and homes. Christmas is the day when baptisms are performed in Madagascar. Christmas is also the time to visit elders in the family and important people such as pastors, teachers, and civic leaders. Since December is a summer month in Madagascar, many families also plan a trip to the nearest beach on Christmas Day.

❁ FAMADIHANA

Observed in: Madagascar
Observed by: Betsileo and Merina
Observed on: June–September

The Famadihana or the “turning of the bones” is an important custom celebrated in Madagascar. It involves reburying the remains of deceased ancestors, or razana. It generally takes place between the months of June and September.

This is one of the most important festivals for the Malagasy, and families save money for performing the ritual, which takes place anywhere between two and seven years after the performance of the last Famadihana, after the mourning period for the family of the deceased has ended. Friends, relatives, and neighbors are invited to participate in these rituals. On the day of the ritual, the relatives of the razana are expected to wear new clothes, and the tomb as well as the home of the razana should be clean and well decorated. A large procession heads toward the burial site of the razana. The remains are exhumed and neatly draped in a hand-woven silken shroud, called a lambabena.

Mpibira gasy is the term used to refer to the traditional performers of bira gasy, a traditional spectacle involving storytelling, dance, and musical performance. The performers play the razana's favorite songs and dances, and cows (or zebus) are sacrificed for the traditional feast. The remains are then returned to the beautifully decorated tomb.

A Kabary is the custodian of the family and village history. He is responsible for welcoming the guests and talks about the life of the razana. He also thanks God for his kindness and recites a prayer before and after the main ritual. The Kabary usually belong to the lower stratum of society but command immense respect for their oratorical skills and their ability to remember the history of their village and its people.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child is celebrated with great joy in Madagascar. Relatives and friends from all over the island participate in a lavish feast hosted by the newborn child's family and welcome the child with songs and dances.

In Madagascar there exist various fadys, or beliefs, related to pregnancy. One states that a pregnant woman should not sit in open doorways because they are the doorways to life, and she can easily fall prey to evil eyes. This could cause complications during delivery or harm the unborn child. Among the Antanosy (“the people of the island,” a Malagasy ethnic group), a pregnant woman is forbidden from conversing with men, and people who do not have children are not allowed to sleep in her house.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is an important ritual in rural Madagascar and is performed at the onset of puberty. It is widely believed that without undergoing this ritual the transition from boyhood to manhood remains incomplete. Among the rural people, a man who is not circumcised is subject to banishment from his clan and condemnation by the society at large.

Along the east coast of Madagascar, the Antambahaoka tribe practices a collective circumcision ritual, known as Sambatra. This ritual lasts for four weeks and takes place every seven years. During the first three weeks of the month, the clanspeople assemble in the main village to prepare for the ceremony. Except on the taboo day, which is Thursday, the elders and the wise men of the village gather at the hut of the village chief (or king) at sunrise and sunset, while the women perform traditional dances to please the ancestors and seek their blessings.

During the last, or holy, week, men carve wooden pigeons and place them on the king’s hut, while the women make dresses and bonnets for the boys who will be circumcised. The king performs his regal dance during this week. On the Friday of the holy week, other young men from the village, who themselves have undergone the initiation ceremonies, demonstrate their virility to the fathers of those to be circumcised. They stage a symbolic attack by pushing the fathers, without causing any real harm. This gesture indicates that after the initiates undergo the circumcision ceremony, they develop endurance and attain the strength of a man, thereby completing the transition into adulthood. Cows are sacrificed, and the boys are led by the villagers to the mouth of the river for a sacred bath. Then the initiates proceed to the king’s hut, where skilled and experienced tribesmen perform the circumcision; thus, the journey from boyhood to manhood is deemed complete.

❁ MARRIAGE

According to Malagasy tradition, engagement, or fanateram-bodiondry, is the first step toward marriage. The families of the couple throw a lavish engagement party, and friends and relatives are invited to take part in the celebrations. The groom

Fadys

In Madagascar, the everyday life of people is influenced by a complex system of beliefs, often referred to as fady. These fadys vary from tribe to tribe and even from family to family. For example, in the eastern region of Madagascar, a fady suggests that the living should not use the door to the east of the house. This is used only to take the deceased out for burial rituals. Among the Merina, according to local fadys, burial rituals do not take place on Tuesdays since this might cause another death in the family. Another fady restricts access to burial sites unless a local guide accompanies the visitor.

and his family bring special gifts for the bride and her family as tokens of appreciation for raising a wonderful daughter as well as to honor them. The groom brings the engagement ring, and a ring ceremony takes place.

Between the 17th and the 19th centuries, the engagement ceremony was considered the couple’s actual wedding. However, traditions evolved, and today the engagement and wedding ceremonies are held on different days.

Among the Zafimaniry tribe, who inhabit the eastern highlands of Madagascar, the wedding ritual involves building a house for the new couple. The first step toward solemnizing the marriage requires the groom’s family to bring timber to the bride’s family. This timber is used to build the central posts of the house and, therefore, should be strong, durable, and of good quality. Then, after obtaining more wood, a site near the house of the groom’s parents is selected. Three posts are erected, and wooden mats are spread throughout the house. A hearth (fireplace) is set up, and a ring of stones placed around one of the posts. This will be the bride’s special area; the central post will be the husband’s special place.

On the appointed day for the marriage, the groom’s family leads a procession to the bride’s house and escorts her to her unfinished future home. The bride takes her trousseau, wedding gifts (especially a wooden cooking pot), and other gifts given by her parents to equip her new house. Then she cooks a family meal on the hearth using the cooking pot. Everyone enjoys the meal, before leaving the bride and groom in their house.

When the couple has children and is considered settled in society, carved wooden boards replace the wooden mats. These symbolize the strong bond between the husband and wife.

Fun Fact

In some parts of Madagascar, a cow is slaughtered during the traditional marriage ceremonies, and everyone present at the wedding has to drink the cow’s blood.

Death Rituals among the Mahafaly

The Mahafaly tribe has a unique burial ritual. Before the body of the deceased is placed in a specially carved tomb, the mourners wait for it to decompose. A new name, which always begins with the word andria, is given to the deceased. The tombs prepared by the Mahafaly are carved out of stone and are rectangular in shape. They rise three feet above the ground and are beautifully decorated with aloalo and horns of the cattle, or omby, slain during the funeral feast. The aloalo are specially sculpted wooden posts, placed upright on the tomb, that depict important moments in the life of the deceased.

DEATH

In Madagascar people believe in an afterlife and ancestral spirits, so the dead are treated with great respect. The Malagasy believe that after death the deceased joins the rank of divinity and even in the afterlife cares for the living. Every effort is made to appease the dead. Offerings are made, and the ancestral spirits are called upon to bless the living. If the living believe that their rituals have failed to please the dead (in case of illness or a death in the family following the appeasement ritual), more rituals are performed.

Among the Betsileo and Merina, the reburial practice of famadibana, literally, “turning over the dead,” is quite prevalent. In this ritual people visit the graves of their relatives and remove their remains, wrap them in a new silk shroud, and, after performing religious ceremonies to honor them, they are replaced in their tomb.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Malawi, formerly called Nyasaland, is a small landlocked country in the south of Africa, east of Zambia. Malawi was first inhabited between 2000 and 800 B.C.E. Evidence suggests that around 2,000 years ago, during the Stone Age in Africa, Malawians were displaced from their settlements by the Bantu-speaking tribes, who migrated into Malawi from the Congo region.

In the 19th century the native inhabitants, who had taken refuge in the highlands of southern Malawi, were captured and forced into slavery by the Yao tribe of western Mozambique. Arab traders supplied arms to the Yao tribe in return for slaves. Around the same time the Zulus from modern-day South Africa also entered Malawi from the south and began conquering local tribes and annexing their kingdoms.

Although the Portuguese had reached Malawi in the 16th century, they did not establish a trading post or military base. The European revival of interest in the region was triggered by the expeditions of Scottish explorer David Livingstone (1813–73) in the 1850s and 1860s. Livingstone was the first European missionary to explore Malawi, but more British and Scottish missionaries soon followed. They introduced the native people to Christianity and led the fight to end the slave trade in the region. In 1878 a group of traders from Glasgow extended their support to these missionaries and formed the African Lakes Corporation to supply goods and services for them. The British began taking an interest in the region as well and forged ties with the local chiefs. In 1889 the British declared the Shire Highlands of Malawi a British Protectorate, and by 1891 the regions lying to the west of Lake Malawi were controlled by Britain. This led to the establishment of the Nyasaland Protectorate. The word nyasa means “lake” in Chichewa, the language of the Malawi Bantu.

British colonial powers faced stiff opposition from the local people. There was a heavy influx of white traders, missionaries, planters, and hunters in the region, and the locals feared that they might soon be outnumbered by the “white rulers.” In the early 20th century the local inhabitants launched a number of revolts against the British. However, none could stand the might of the well-armed British troops, who suppressed dissent.

In 1944 the Nyasaland African Congress (NAC) was formed, and Dr. Hastings Kamuzu Banda (1898–1997), a medical doctor and an active Malawian politician, was elected its president. In 1953 the British merged the territories of Nyasaland and Northern and Southern Rhodesia to form the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. This move was not acceptable to the local inhabitants, who wanted complete freedom from British rule. Widespread demonstrations, protests, and rioting followed.

In 1959 Banda, who himself had led many demonstrations, was imprisoned for his political activities, but the freedom struggle continued to intensify. In 1960 the British began to respond to Malawian demands for independence. They released Banda from prison and asked him to participate in a constitutional conference in London.

In 1961 Banda renamed the NAC the Malawi Congress Party (MCP), and it won the legislative elections that were held in Nyasaland on April 15, 1961. The pressure on the British government to grant total independence increased, and on December 31, 1963, the federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was dissolved. On July 6, 1964, Nyasaland became an independent nation within the British Commonwealth, and the country was renamed Malawi.

In 1966 the country adopted a republican constitution, and Dr. Banda became the first president of Malawi. He declared Malawi a one-party state. Then in 1971, he made constitutional changes that gave him the title “president for life.”

Dr. Banda led an authoritarian regime and enjoyed the full support of the country’s armed forces. However, he came under sharp criticism from other African nations for his alleged support of the white government of South Africa, which was internationally censured for the brutal treatment of its black population. On the domestic front as well, there was growing discontent regarding Dr. Banda’s rule. In the early 1990s violent protests and demonstrations within the country and mounting international pressure to introduce multiparty democracy in the region forced Dr. Banda to hold a referendum. On June 14, 1993, the people of Malawi voted in favor of a multiparty democracy; as a result, the first free and fair elections were held in Malawi on May 17, 1994.

In the elections of 1994, a coalition government, formed by the United Democratic Front (UDF) and Alliance for Democracy (AFORD), came to power, and Bakili Muluzi (b. 1943), the leader of the UDF, was sworn in as president of Malawi. In 1996 the alliance between UDF and AFORD fell apart, and fresh elections were held in 1999. Muluzi was reelected president of Malawi after his party won a landslide victory over the MCP-AFORD alliance. Bingu wa Mutharika (b. 1934) was elected in May 2004 but struggled to assert his authority against his predecessor, who sought to amend the constitution to prolong his own rule. Malawi continued to face great challenges in the early 21st century, including corruption, population growth, pressure on agricultural lands, and HIV/AIDS. It has one of the lowest life expectancy rates at birth in the world—a mere 37 years.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Malawi is a landlocked country almost as large as the U.S. state of Pennsylvania. Situated in southeast Africa, its neighboring countries are Mozambique, Zambia, and Tanzania. Lake Malawi, located at the eastern border, is very important economically because it provides fish. The smaller lakes in south Malawi are Malombe, Chiuta, and Chilwa. Mount Mulanje is Malawi’s, and Central Africa’s, highest peak at 1,006 feet.

Malawi’s climate changes as one ascends. Shire Valley, with temperatures averaging 74°F and 78°F, experiences hot and humid weather. The highlands have a more temperate climate. Malawi receives rain from November to April. The average rainfall in Malawi is almost 6 feet in the highlands and 3 feet in the lowlands.

❁ ECONOMY

Malawi is one of the poorest and least developed countries of the world. The economy is primarily dependent on agriculture, and almost 90 percent of the population lives in rural areas. In 2001, Malawi received 88 percent of its export revenues from agriculture. The tobacco industry in Malawi accounts for more than 50 percent of these exports.

Malawi survives on the economic help provided by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank, and other donor countries. The country was granted a relief fund in 2002 under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) program. In the same year, the World Bank sanctioned a $50 million loan to Malawi for drought relief.

Malawi faces numerous obstacles to stabilizing its wavering economy. The country has poor educational facilities, numerous environmental problems, and rapidly increasing numbers of HIV/AIDS cases.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Gule Wamkulu is a popular form of dance performed by the native Chewa people. The dance represents the sect’s belief in spirits and is associated with a secret society. Dancers perform Gule Wamkulu wearing animal skins and sometimes standing on stilts and wearing masks. All ethnic groups have their own traditions and languages, but the Chewa language predominates. English, the official language, is mainly spoken in towns and some rural areas.

❁ CUISINE

Nsima, a porridge made from cornmeal or cassava (also known as manioc or tapioca), is the staple food of Malawi. Chambo, a species of fish caught in Lake Malawi, is an important ingredient in Malawian cuisine. Also Malawians catch trout from streams on the Zomba, Mulanje, and Nyika plateaus. Fried white ants (termites) are said to taste a lot like popcorn and are a favorite snack.

Malawians are known for having a sweet tooth. They feast on mbatata (sweet potato) and love cookies and biscuits made from mbatata. They also relish desserts such as nthochi (banana bread), mtedza (peanut puffs), and zitumbuwa (banana fritters).

Dairy products and poultry are abundantly available, as are seasonal fruits. Malawians are fond of the local beer, soft drinks, and Malawi gin, a popular and cheap drink that is widely available.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout much of the world. New Year's Day festivities in Malawi are quite different for urban and rural residents. In the towns and cities, citizens dine in restaurants and hotels to enjoy the occasion. The 90 percent of the Malawian population living in rural areas does not usher in the new year as lavishly as the urbanites. Instead rural Malawians have simple family dinners with music and dancing.

❁ JOHN CHILEMBWE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 15

This day honors the memory of John Chilembwe, the rebel who led protests against British rule in Malawi. It was on this day in 1915 that Chilembwe initiated a revolt against the British. The uprising ended when Chilembwe was killed only a few weeks after starting the demonstrations. Malawians have great respect for Chilembwe, and as a token of this regard the Reserve Bank of Malawi printed his photograph on currency notes in the 1990s.

Ritual Healing Music of Malawi

The music used for healing is a traditional form of Malawian music. It comes from northern Malawi and involves a ritual in which the healer is possessed by a spirit; the possession is achieved through dancing, clapping, and singing to the beat of drums in the background. Malawians believe that drums can be used to summon gods and spirits, whom they associate with the healing process, a common practice in shamanistic cultures.

MARTYRS' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 3

Martyrs' Day commemorates those who died in an uprising against the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1959. It was on this day that 40 people lost their lives fighting the British. Martyrs' Day is a public holiday, and Malawians honor the sacrifice of these patriots. All public and government institutions are closed on this day, and no business or trade takes place.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, is celebrated to honor workers and the contributions they make to their societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by

Banana Fritters

Ingredients:

- 3 ripe bananas
- 1 tsp. sugar
- $\frac{1}{8}$ tsp. salt
- $\frac{1}{2}$ c. cornmeal (ufa)
- oil for frying

Preparation:

Mash bananas with sugar and salt. Stir in the cornmeal flour and drop spoonfuls of batter into hot oil. Fry until golden on both sides, remove from oil, and drain on paper towels. To satisfy that Malawian sweet tooth, roll the fritters in sugar.

The Reverend John Chilembwe

The Reverend John Chilembwe is a revered hero and martyr, who died fighting for the cause of Malawi's freedom. Originally Chilembwe believed that, if the Africans adopted European-style etiquette and propriety, they would earn the respect of their rulers. He founded the Providence Industrial Mission, which operated seven schools in the region and taught the principles of equality and morality. It placed great emphasis on values such as self-help, hard work, and personal hygiene.

However, in 1913 Nyasaland was struck with famine. Many of the peasants suffered hardships and starvation, and the brutal manner in which the white plantation owners exploited them angered Chilembwe greatly. During World War I Chilembwe protested against the recruitment of black Africans for the British Army. When he confronted the ire of the white rulers, they burned down many of his schools to punish him. This further infuriated Chilembwe, and he began planning an attack on a plantation that treated its workers in an especially brutal manner. In 1915 he led a group of 200 followers that succeeded in killing three plantation managers. Within days Chilembwe was captured by the colonial forces and shot dead. Even though Chilembwe was killed, his legacy lived on and inspired an entire generation of Malawians to fight for their freedom.

REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 6

Fun Fact

On New Year's Day in 2005, Malawian President Bingu wa Mutharika pardoned 651 prisoners who were suffering from AIDS.

Republic Day in Malawi is a national holiday and, perhaps, the country's most important holiday observance. It is the day on which Malawians honor the nationalist activities and sacrifice of lives that resulted in Malawi's independence from the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Ultimately, it was this same spirit that caused Britain to grant Malawian independence on July 6, 1964.

Republic Day celebrations begin with the unfurling of the national flag by the president of Malawi and are followed by military parades and a host of cultural activities. Gule Wamkulu, a traditional Malawian dance performed by the Chewa tribes wearing heavy masks and feathers, is also part of the Republic Day celebrations.

NATIONAL TREE PLANTING DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 13

National Tree Planting Day, also called Arbor Day, reflects a conscious effort by the people of Malawi to reconstruct and revive the damaged environment of their country. Since 90 percent of the population is engaged in agricultural activities, it has become imperative to conserve and restore the environment. Many have come to regard deforestation as a serious threat to the quality of life. The public holiday is intended to encourage residents to plant trees.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Friday of Lent

This Christian holiday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. Observed as a somber, solemn occasion, it falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (a 40-day period of fasting and penitence observed by devout Catholics). On Good Friday devout Malawian Christians visit their local churches and offer prayers to Jesus. The day is marked with processions in which people carry crosses on their backs to reenact Jesus' final journey to Calvary.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a joyous Christian feast celebrating Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent. The name Easter is derived from the name of a Germanic mother goddess, Eostre or Eastre, a fertility deity worshipped during spring festivals. In Malawi devout Christians attend church services of their choice, and their houses of worship are decorated with flowers for the occasion. They pray and listen to biblical readings. Easter Monday, the day after Easter, is a national holiday in Malawi, and schools, businesses, and government offices remain closed.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe came to redeem their souls. After Easter Christmas is the most significant occasion for Malawian Christians. Roman Catholic Churches hold special midnight Masses on Christmas Eve. Christmas Day features a lavish feast with fish and meat dishes, and a special Christmas cake. Santa Claus brings gifts for the children. Dancing and singing are also part of the festivities.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

In earlier times young boys and girls were taken to different camps for their initiation ceremonies, where they were taught about the duties and responsibilities they would have as adults. They were also given specific instructions about their adult life, which were to be kept a secret from the opposite sex. Male circumcisions and female clitoridectomies were part of the initiation ceremonies. After the end of the initiation ceremonies, young boys were encouraged to have sex with a partner of their choice to demonstrate their adulthood. However, due to the rise in the number of HIV/AIDS cases in Malawi, this sexual practice has been removed from the initiation ritual. Instead the elders of the community use the initiation as an opportunity to create awareness about HIV/AIDS, safe sex, and the use of condoms.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

There is no recorded evidence connected with the ancient history of Malaysia. However, historians are firm in their opinion that Homo sapiens (earliest human beings) have inhabited Malaysia for a considerable period of time. This idea was strengthened by the discovery of a human skull, dated to 40,000 years ago, at the remote Great Cave of Niah in the rain forest of coastal Sarawak during the mid-20th century. The Niah Cave Project, a collaborative dig involving experts from universities in Britain, Australia, Sarawak, and the United States, is reinvestigating the archaeological stratigraphy of the huge cave.

On the Malaysian peninsula several tools belonging to the Stone Age (around 10000 B.C.E.) have also been discovered; apparently they belonged to the predecessors of the Negrito aborigines, one of the earliest groups of human beings to inhabit the Malaysian peninsula. Around 2500, a fairly advanced group migrated from China to Malaysia. They were known as the Proto-Malays and were primarily seafarers and farmers. Soon after another group the Deutero-Malays arrived. They comprised Indians, Chinese, Siamese, Arabs, and Proto-Malays as well. They had mastered the use of iron. Along with the people of Indonesia, the Deutero-Malays formed the racial basis for the group commonly known as Malay.

In ancient Indian literature and scriptures there are many references to a place called Suvarnadvipa, the "Land of Gold." This mysterious kingdom beckoned adventurous sailors to the land now identified with the Malaya peninsula. Traversing the Bay of Bengal and taking advantage of the favorable climatic factors (including the southwest monsoon), these people reached the region of Kedah sometime around 100 B.C.E. Thereafter hordes of Indian traders arrived in the region seeking gold, fragrant wood, and spices.

The Indians brought with them Hinduism and Buddhism. The temples and other elements of Hindu culture swept through the land very quickly. The local rulers, who had links with the Indian subcontinent, were so impressed by the efficiency of the Hindu courts that they began to call themselves rajahs (the Indian name for “king”).

Until the 15th century, the Hindu kingdoms of peninsular Malaysia were eclipsed by powerful kingdoms in Cambodia and Indonesia. The strongest of them all was the Malay kingdom of Srivijaya, which had the reputation of being the best trading port in the region. With the gradual emergence of other kingdoms, Srivijaya’s influential position declined, and the once glorious kingdom was reduced to the region around the port city of Malacca.

In the succeeding period Malacca reached the acme of its glory and power and emerged as the most influential port in Southeast Asia. Traders from neighboring countries traveled there for commercial purposes. Among them were the Arabs, who brought in Islam. Malacca’s rulers now came to be known as sultans. These sultans established well-organized municipal governments to take care of all aspects of trade and commerce. Attacks by pirates were curbed. Moreover a regional maritime fleet was organized to guard the seawaters nearby and escort friendly vessels to the ports.

In time Malacca extended its control over the entire west coast of the Malay peninsula, the kingdom of Pahang, and major portions of Sumatra. But with the arrival of the colonial powers, its glory passed into oblivion. The decline started in 1511, when a Portuguese fleet led by Alfonso de Albuquerque (1453–1515) sailed into Malacca’s harbor firing cannonballs and capturing the city. Later the Portuguese constructed a massive fort in Malacca called A Famosa. It was captured by the Dutch in 1641. This gave the Dutch almost exclusive powers to control the spice trade in the region until 1785, when the British East India Company became active here. France captured the Netherlands in 1795; in a bid to avoid handing over Malacca to the French, the Dutch government in exile allowed the British to oversee the port on a temporary basis. The British returned Malacca to the Dutch in 1808, but the Dutch gave it back to them in return for Bencoleen, Sumatra. In 1819 Britain sent Sir William Raffles to establish a trading post in Singapore. Three British colonies—Penang, Malacca, and Singapore—came to be known as the Straits Settlements.

After Malacca passed into the hands of the colonial rulers, a new Muslim trading center was established in Johor. Johor is the southernmost state of the

The Malay People

The Malay belong to Malaysia’s largest ethnic group, comprising over half of the population, and the national language can be traced back to them. Being the oldest indigenous peoples of the country, they form a huge category known as bumiputera, which means “sons or princes of the soil.” Most of the Malays are Muslim, though the Islam practiced here is less severe than that found in the Middle East. Traditional Malay culture centers on the kampung, or village, though nowadays a good number of Malays live in urban areas.

Malaysian peninsula and is also known as the southern gateway to Malaysia. It is linked to Singapore via a causeway. Johor is now one of the most developed states in the country with a flourishing economy and a number of places of tourist interest. Later, another trading center was built in the area known as Perak, one of the 13 states of Malaysia. The ruler of the state is a sultan, who is assisted by the executive and administrative arms of the state government. Minangkabau immigrants from Sumatra and the Bugi people from Celebes immigrated to the peninsula in large numbers, thereby making strong cultural impacts.

During the 1860s many Malay kingdoms began fighting with each other in order to gain control of the throne of Perak. The British intervened and forced the Malay rulers to sign a peace treaty known as the Pangkor Agreement in 1874. The treaty gave Britain a stronger hold in the region, which helped it to maintain its monopoly over the mining of tin in the peninsula. Along with White Rajahs in Borneo, Britain ruled over what was then known as the region of Malaya until the Japanese invaded the peninsula and drove them out in 1942. During this time, hordes of Chinese fled to the jungles and organized an armed resistance.

White Rajahs of Borneo

Around 300 years ago the territory of Sarawak, located on the northwestern shore of Borneo, came under the control of the Sultanate of Brunei. In the 1840s an English trader and adventurer James Brooke arrived on the island and helped the sultan of Brunei suppress a rebellion. As a token of gratitude, the then-ruler of Brunei ceded to James Brooke a portion of his territory and made him rajah of Sarawak in 1846. Brooke founded a dynasty that ruled independently and lasted until 1941. Thus, Sarawak became an independent country ruled by a white monarch. The “white rajahs” were in fact British citizens.

After World War II ended, this became the basis for a Communist uprising. In 1945 Britain regained control over the area again, but in the meanwhile Malaya's independence movement had gained tremendous strength and organized itself as an alliance under Tunku Abdul Rahman (1903–90). The British had to yield, and in 1957 Tunku became the first prime minister of Malaya. In 1963 Sabah, Sarawak, and Singapore joined Malaya to establish Malaysia, but in 1965 Singapore withdrew from the confederation.

The formation of Malaysia was opposed by the Philippines and Indonesia, both of whom had territorial claims on East Malaysia. In 1963 Indonesian troops began crossing Malaysia's borders but were defeated by Malaysian and Commonwealth forces. In 1969 there were violent riots between the Malays and the Chinese. The United Malays National Organization (UMNO) has been in power since 1974. Dr. Mahathir Mohammad (b. 1925) was the prime minister until 1997, during which time the economy enjoyed a temporary boom; but slipping Asian currencies caused the Malaysian ringgit to crash, too.

In September 1998 the country hosted the Commonwealth Games. Around that time students and citizens vehemently protested against the allegedly unfair ouster and later imprisonment of Deputy Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim (b. 1947). There followed a long phase of political unrest and turmoil. This, coupled with the economic fluctuations, tarnished Malaysia's image as one of the prosperous and progressive countries of the region. The controversial Dr. Mahathir Mohammad remained in power until October 2003. His successor Abdullah Ahmad Badawi (b. 1939) won a massive popular mandate in the 2004 elections. In August 2004 Anwar Ibrahim was liberated after the country's highest court upheld the appeal against his sentence.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Malaysia is located on the South China Sea in the center of Southeast Asia. The country is shaped like a crescent, starting with Peninsular Malaysia (West Malaysia), and extending to Sabah and Sarawak (East Malaysia), which is located on the island of Borneo. The total area of Malaysia is a little less than 127,500 square miles, with most of it located on the island of Borneo. Peninsular Malaysia only forms 40 percent of the total area.

Malaysia's climate is hot and humid; the relative humidity ranges from 80 to 90 percent, except in the highlands. The average temperature ranges from 68° to 86°F throughout the year. The rainy season on the west coast lasts from September to December, while the east coast receives rains from October to February. The eastern parts of Malaysia get up to 200 inches of rain annually while western Malaysia gets "only" about 100 inches. Forest tracts cover more than half of Malaysia.

The Sungai Pahang River is the longest river on the Malaysian peninsula (295 miles), followed by the Sungai Perak (249 miles). One of the major mountain chains in Sabah is the Crocker Range, separating the narrow lowland of the northwest coast from the hinterland. The highest peak is Gunung Kinabalu (13,450 feet).

The common vegetation in the region includes casuarinas (Australian hardwood), coconut palms, mango, and jackfruit trees as well as coral (thorny trees with red or yellow flowers) and gardenia (yielding sweet-scented flowers) trees. The local fauna includes squirrels, monkeys, (rare) bearded pigs, and pangolins (scaly anteaters). The birds found here include white-bellied sea eagles, pied hornbills, green herons, sandpipers, pink-necked green pigeons, bulbuls, babblers, flycatchers, swiftlets, and sunbirds. Reptiles include the huge monitor lizards and snakes.

ECONOMY

Malaysia boasts of having one of the highest standards of living in Southeast Asia, mainly because of its expanding industrial sector, which created an 8 to 9 percent annual growth rate during the 1987–97 period. Malaysia is a major producer of rubber and tin; the other important industries of the country include palm oil, crude petroleum and petroleum products, electronics, logging, and textiles. Since the 1980s, the Malaysian government has made efforts to privatize large industries that had hitherto been under state control, and these changes have resulted in increased foreign investment in manufacturing.

Subsistence agriculture is the main occupation for about 20 percent of the population, and agriculture provides about 15 percent of the country's gross domestic product (GDP). On the peninsula the major crops are rubber, palm oil, and rice; Sabah's most important products are rubber, timber, coconuts, and rice, while in Sarawak the main crops are rubber, pepper, and timber.

Penang city is the chief port of the country. The major cities on the Malay Peninsula are all connected by railroad to Singapore. The main trading partners of Malaysia are Japan, the United States, and Singapore. The travel and tourism industry in Malaysia is also heavily reliant on the overall growth and development in the global economy, particularly that of the United States, Japan, and Singapore. These countries account for more than half of the tourist activity in Malaysia and indirectly affect its economy. The effects of SARS (Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome) and the war in Iraq adversely affected the country's tourism industry throughout 2003, but this sector is quickly recovering.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Though the bulk of the population is Muslim and adheres to the Islamic lifestyle, music and dance are an integral part of Malaysian culture, which has been influenced by diverse cultural components. Traditional music is centered on the gamelan, an orchestra of percussive instruments from Indonesia. The spirited, rhythmic beats of Malaysian drums are improvised in a rich communal performance. The drums have always been a part of the daily lives of the people.

In earlier times rebana ubi, or giant drums, were used to communicate messages across hills and meadows. Wedding and other important announcements, such as danger signals, were transmitted by using different beats on the drums. The Giant Drum Festival is held in Kelantan in May or in June every year.

Silat, a Malaysian dance form, originated as a martial art. This weaponless form of self-defense reduced fighting to a bare minimum. Silat performances are still common at weddings, festivals, and other social events. Another dance is the candle dance. It is breathtakingly beautiful. Dancers hold candles on small plates in their hands while performing. The dancers' graceful movements create wonderful light and shadow designs, entrancing spectators. The popular joget is a lively dance with a gradually increasing tempo. Performed by couples who combine fast, graceful movements with humor, the joget can be traced back to Portuguese folk dances introduced in Malacca during the colonial era. The datun julud is the centuries-old tradition of storytelling through the medium of dance. The sape, a musical instrument, accompanies this dance. Mak Yong is an ancient classic court entertainment that combines romantic stories, opera, and an abundance of humor. Malaysia is also famous for its batik art form.

❁ CUISINE

Malaysia's culinary arts, like its other art forms, have been influenced by diverse cultural currents—Chinese, Indian, Malay, Indonesian, and Thai, to name a few. The basic features of its cuisine are fresh tropical fruits, seafood, chilies, and curries from India and Thailand. Coconut milk is the central feature of Malaysian cuisine; it imparts a delicious, sweet taste to all kinds of dishes. Rice is the staple food item of the Malaysians. At each meal everyone eats rice accompanied by a number of dishes—fish, seafood, vegetables, and poultry. Though the basic ingredients may be similar, the method of cooking and type of accompaniments differ from one state to another because of the availability of some local items. Roadside food stalls are popular and provide all the local delicacies.

Breakfast is the major meal of the day. Nasi kandar is a fish curry that is served, along with meat in chili sauce and boiled eggs. Nasi dagang is glutinous rice cooked in coconut milk and served with fish curry, coconut sambal (spicy, hot chutney), and pickled cucumber. Satay is the most popular dish of Malaysia. To prepare it, small pieces of beef, mutton, or chicken are marinated in spices, skewered with thin bamboo strips, and barbecued over a charcoal fire. Satay is served with ketupat (rice cake) and a raw

Batik

Though it originated in Indonesia, batik has now become an integral part of Malaysian culture. Malaysian batik, purported to be the best in the world, is created by one of four methods: block-printed, drawn freestyle, silk-screened, or tie-dyed. The basic fabrics are either cotton or silk. Batik cloth is produced by drawing a design with wax and dyeing the material. The wax is then melted away by boiling the cloth, and a second wax design is etched on it. This lengthy process creates an intricately beautiful, colorful design.

salad of cucumber, pineapple, and onions. A sweet and spicy peanut sauce customarily accompanies the dish. Yet another well-known dish, nasi lemak, is rice cooked in coconut milk and served with ikan bilis (anchovies), sambal, boiled eggs, fried peanuts, and cucumber slices. This is a favorite breakfast item.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

As in many other countries around the globe, both New Year's Eve and New Year's Day are celebrated enthusiastically by Malaysians in every community. New Year's Eve is welcomed with great fanfare and rejoicing in the public squares of cities and towns, luxury hotels, and upscale restaurants, especially in Kuala Lumpur, the capital. New Year's Day is a public holiday in Malaysia, and most people spend the day with their loved ones in a lingering spirit of festivity.

❁ CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: Chinese

Observed on: The second new Moon after the winter solstice

Malaysia has a sizable Chinese population, for whom the most important festival is the New Year, a two-week holiday that begins on the second new Moon after the winter solstice (December 21 of the Gregorian calendar). A two-day public holiday in Malaysia, it is ushered in by the lighting of firecrackers at midnight on New Year's Eve.

Long before the actual day, however, hordes of shoppers can be seen buying all kinds of essential items: among them oranges for good luck and flowers and kumquat trees to beautify their homes. Kumquats have been hailed as "the little gems of the citrus family." The name means "gold orange" in Chinese. The kumquat tree is a slow-growing, shrubby plant. It produces a small, round edible fruit with a golden yellow, reddish-orange skin; the outer layer is spicy, and the inner layer is sweet.

It is mandatory for all Chinese people to settle their debts and clean their homes before the onset of the new year. On the eve of the new year, family ties are renewed by means of special reunion dinners. Younger members of the family visit their relatives to pay their respects and seek blessings; in return they are customarily given red packets containing money (called ang paws). A festive atmosphere prevails on the streets with stilt walkers, lion and dragon dancers, acrobats, and colorful floats, all accompanied by the clanging of cymbals and the beating of gongs and drums.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

In many parts of the world May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day. Also known as May Day or Workers' Day, it commemorates the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Malaysia the day is celebrated with processions and rallies, inspiring public speeches by trade union leaders and other union activities. On this

✿ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 31

On this day in 1957 Malaysia attained its freedom from centuries of colonial rule. This historic occasion, also known as Malaysia Day or Independence Day, is celebrated with great pomp and show in various parts of the country, including Kuala Lumpur. In Putrajaya the administrative capital (in the vicinity of Kuala Lumpur), spectacular parades and displays of fireworks after sunset form a part of the national celebrations. Young students perform traditional Malaysian, Indian, and Chinese dances in the city's squares. Such public functions are often attended by royal personages, the prime minister, and other conspicuous political personalities.

✿ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called Eid ul-Zuha, Bakr-Eid, or Hari Raya Hajji, recalls Ibrahim's (Abraham's) display of unflinching faith in God by his willingness to sacrifice his young son because the Almighty commanded him to do so. In Malaysia devout Muslim families customarily sacrifice sheep, goats, rams, or cattle in the name of God; this meat is then shared with friends, family, and distributed among the poor. During the entire month prior to this festival, devout Muslims who are physically and financially capable undertake the hajj, a pilgrimage to Mecca, one of the Five Pillars of the Islamic faith.

✿ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

El am Hejir, also called the Islamic New Year, is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar. Islam's calendar is based on the revolutions of the Moon. Thus it is only 354 days long. Compared to Western calendars, the Islamic year is 11 days shorter, so the Western date of the New Year varies from year to year. The beginning of the new year is a fairly low-key affair in contrast to the mad revelry and hullabaloo associated with the calendars of other faiths.

In Malaysia devout Muslims attend services in their local mosques for special prayers and readings from Islamic scriptures. The Muslim, or Hajji, era dates from July 15 or 16, 622 (Julian). This was the beginning of the Arab year in which Muhammad and his followers made their withdrawal (Hegira) from Mecca to Medina. On this day the faithful recount this momentous event.

❁ MOULoud

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, also called Mawlid al-Nabi, marks the birth of Muhammad, the prophet of Islam, in 570. It is a well-known fact that Muhammad exhorted his followers not to make an ostentatious display on his birthday. Hence in Malaysia (as in other parts of the world) this is a very low-key affair. In Malaysia on this day devout Muslims focus on the life and teachings of Muhammad and offer special prayers. These recall the prophet's qualities of compassion and mercy. Alms are also given to the poor.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Full Moon of Vesak, the sixth month of the Buddhist calendar

This is the most important festival for Buddhists all over the world because it celebrates all the major events of Buddha's life: his birth, enlightenment (moksha or nirvana), and death. On this day in Malaysia Buddhist practitioners through the temples throughout the country where they offer prayers and release doves (symbolizing peace). On this occasion the devout offer alms to monks in addition to feeding the poor and the hungry.

❁ DIWALI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Five days from the 13th day of the waning half (Krishna Paksha) of the lunar month Asvina to the second day of the waxing half (Shukla Paksha) of Karttika

The famous Hindu Festival of Lights Diwali, Divali, or Deepawali, is celebrated during the seventh month of the Hindu calendar. In Malaysia Hindus observe the occasion by decorating their homes with dozens of lights or oil lamps, locally known as vikku. Nearly a month before Diwali people clean their homes and arrange for the whitewashing and painting of their houses. They also buy jewelry and new clothes for this festival and exchange gifts and sweets with their family and friends. Hence, during the countdown to Diwali, there is a flurry of activity: shopping sprees, placing orders for jewelry and ornaments, preparation and packing of dry fruits and sweets (major gift items), and so forth. For quite a few days prior to the main day of the festival there are crowds of people on the streets, all in a frenzy to finish distributing their gifts, causing frequent traffic jams in all the larger towns and cities.

This ritual is highly philosophical and celebrates the triumph of good over evil and of light over darkness. Diwali was first celebrated to commemorate the triumphant return of King Rama of Ayodhya (the seventh manifestation of Vishnu, the Protector), Sita (his wife), and his brother Lakshmana to the capital city Ayodhya, after 14 years of exile. During the exile, Lord Rama had vanquished the demon Ravana, the king of Sri Lanka. As night had already fallen before the arrival of the royal trio, the people, delighted to have their king back in their midst, lit clay lamps along the way to dispel the darkness and illuminate their path. People visit their friends and relatives and exchange good wishes. They also give large dinners. There is an overall atmosphere of camaraderie, gaiety, and mirth.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, the second eid ("festival") of the Islamic year, is also called Hari Raya Puasa in Malaysia. This is a major Islamic festival signifying the end of Ramadan, the austere Islamic month of fasting and abstinence. In Malaysia Hari Raya Puasa officially begins with the sighting of the Moon (by the moulvis, or priests) on the day before the commencement of the month of Shawwal (or Syawal). The festival begins the following day with early morning prayers in the local mosques, then people visit local cemeteries to pray for their deceased friends and relatives. The rest of the day is spent enjoying lavish meals and general rejoicing. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

KUCHING FESTIVAL

Observed in: Kuching, the capital of Sarawak

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July–August

Kuching, the Cat City, probably so named after the cats-eye trees that grow there, comes alive during the months of July and August. Originally a celebration of the arts of the Sarawak region, the Kuching Festival has come to include food fairs, handicraft exhibits, and a host of sporting events for the local people as well as visitors. The food stalls, more than 200 of them, serve a variety of Asian delicacies, such as barbecued stingray, as well as ostrich or camel burgers and fried ice cream. The Kuching Festival has also been extended to include shopping, garden shows, and a variety of activities for the fun-loving townsfolk and their families. The festival begins with a huge fireworks display, and the street parade at the end of the first week of August is the highlight of the festival.

Rites of Passage

COMING OF AGE

In the view of many Malaysian Muslims, the circumcision of the male is an act of purification. The rite is held sometime between 12 and 15 years of age. Favorite times for conducting the procedure include the sacred months of Islam or when the youth has completed a study of the Koran.

MARRIAGE

In Malaysia, bride and groom are considered “king and queen for a day.” Their wedding culminates a courtship of many milestones. When the couple gets engaged, the amount of the dowry and date of the wedding are determined. The signing of the marriage contract, or Akad Nikah, is presided over by a kadbi, an official of the religious Muslim court.

The mas kabwin, a small sum of money, seals the contract. Children attired in traditional dress noisily proceed to the bride’s house carrying gifts from the groom, which include abundantly heaped trays of food and currency folded into animals and flowers. Prior to the wedding, the bride-to-be has her palms and feet decorated with henna vegetable dye in a berimai ceremony. Guests receive decorated hard-boiled eggs that symbolize fertility.

Among Malaysian youth there is a trend emerging to hold weddings in mosques. In this culturally diverse nation, weddings frequently draw from the Hindu traditions of southern India.

DEATH

Like Muslims elsewhere and followers of some other faiths, Malaysian Muslims tend to bury their dead as soon as possible, preferably before sunset on the day of death. Before burial the body is cleaned by someone of the same sex as the deceased. Then the body is shrouded in a white cloth. As mourners carry the corpse through the streets to a mosque for prayers or to its final resting place, prayers are chanted. As the procession passes, onlookers join the chanting and help carry the coffin a short distance. The body is laid in the grave on its right side with the face turned to Mecca. For several days after death, it is customary to recite prayers in memory of the deceased. In the course of the prayers, when a dead person’s name is mentioned, the words rahimahu Allah (for a man) or rahimaha Allah (for a woman) are uttered. This phrase entreats God to show mercy towards deceased.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Maldives is one of the smallest countries in the world. It is located in the Indian Ocean, 419 miles southwest of Sri Lanka. Formed as a result of intense volcanic activity almost 150 million years ago, the islands are, in fact, coral deposits resting on underwater mountains.

Archaeological findings indicate that the Maldives islands were inhabited as early as 1500 B.C.E., but it is generally thought that permanent settlements did not exist until about 500 B.C.E. with the arrival of Aryan immigrants from India. The early Maldivians were probably immigrant Hindus from India, as well Buddhists who came from Sri Lanka for the purpose of preaching Buddhism.

According to local folklore the first king to establish a dynasty (the Theemuge Dynasty) in pre-Islamic times was named Koimala. He sailed to the islands with his bride, the daughter of the Sinhalese king, from Kerala in southwestern India. The kings of the Theemuge Dynasty managed to bring the entire country under their rule. They were Buddhists who remained in power until the arrival of Islam.

Because the Maldives are located along the ancient east-west trade route, early travelers used to stop here for supplies and were sometimes forced to land as a result of shipwrecks on the coral reefs. Among the visitors to these islands were the famous Arab traveler Ibn Batuta (1304–77). Ma Huan (b. c. 1380), a Chinese historian who spoke fluent Arabic also traveled here. In addition, the Maldivians used to venture out far beyond their shores.

As trade grew along this sea route, the Maldives became an important stop for Arab traders. The islands held two main attractions for them. Maldives were famous for the small seashells called Cypraea moneta, which were used as a currency in India and the Middle East, and so Maldives was sometimes called “The Mint of the Region.” Traders would collect shiploads of these shells in exchange for rice, spices, and other goods. Secondly, the Maldives islanders used to catch and process high-quality tuna by boiling, smoking, curing, and drying the fish. This proved to be an ideal food for long sea voyages and was regarded as a delicacy in Sri Lanka and many parts of the world.

Arab traders also brought Islam to the islands. Some credit Abu Barakat Yusuf, a Moroccan, for converting the Maldivians to Islam, while others credit Sheikh Yusuf Samsuddin, a scholar. According to legend the Maldivians were plagued by a sea-demon that had to be supplied with young girls every so often to keep him from devouring the rest of the populace. Abu Barakat rid the islanders of this menace by dressing as a girl and reading the Koran (the Islamic Holy Book) to the monster, who then departed forever. This impressed the king so much that he and his subjects converted to Islam. After the death of the king Barakat became the first sultan of the Maldives.

Unlike most Islamic countries, Maldives has had a number of women rulers. The most famous of them was Sultana Khadeeja Rehendi (r. 1342–80). In all there have been 84 sultans and sultanas from six dynasties.

The tranquility of these islands was at times disturbed by the sea powers of the day. In 1558 the Portuguese invaded and captured the Maldives. They were overthrown by a local chieftain, Muhammad Thakurufaanu Al-Azam, also known as Al-Sultan Ghazi Muhammad Bodu Thakurufaanu, who used a military strategy now known as “guerilla tactics” in 1573. In the 17th century the islands became a Dutch protectorate. Later, with the expansion of the British Empire and growing British influence, the islands became a British protectorate in 1887. An arrangement was reached whereby the sultan would run the country, but the British would ensure the defense of the islands. During World War II, military bases were set up here. A Royal Air Force (RAF) base was established in Gan in 1957 but was closed in 1976.

The first constitution of the Maldives was framed in 1932, after which the sultans were elected and did not inherit the throne. This continued until 1953, when the islands were proclaimed a republic, and the sultanate was abolished. Mohammed Amin Didi (b. 1910) became the first president, but he was ousted in less than a year owing to public discontent arising out of persistent food shortages and the ban he had imposed on all tobacco products. The sultanate was once again reestablished with the return of the son of the former sultan Mohammed Farid Didi (b. 1901), the 94th and last sultan of Maldives.

In 1957 the British succeeded in obtaining a 100-year lease for building and operating an air force base on Gan in the southern Addu atoll. This was unpopular and led to the resignation of the then prime minister Ibrahim Ali Didi. Former foreign minister Ibrahim Nasir (b. 1926) became the next prime minister and immediately set about changing the terms of the agreement, reducing the lease period and placing other restrictive terms on the British, particularly with respect to the hiring of locals.

Soon the island nation was facing a secessionist revolt from the three southernmost atolls (whose inhabitants were most affected by Nasir’s policies). The movement was crushed swiftly and brutally. At the same time negotiations opened with the British to gain Maldivian independence and to reduce the length of the lease on Gan. It was decided that the lease would run until 1976. On July 26, 1965, the Maldives was granted its independence by the British. Ibrahim Nasir became the first prime minister of an independent Maldives. Then after three years, as the result of a referendum in 1968 that did away with the sultanate once more, the Maldives became a republic for the second time, with Ibrahim Nasir emerging as the first president of the Second Republic.

In 1978 Maumoon Abdul Gayoom (b. 1937) was elected president. He was subsequently reelected to a second term and survived coup attempts in 1980, 1981. Again in 1988, a coup attempt by Tamil mercenaries from Sri Lanka was foiled with the help of Indian troops who had been asked to help.

Maldives has been a member of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) since 1985 and a member of the United Nations since 1965, the year of its independence.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Maldives is an archipelago, 511 miles long and 81 miles at its widest point, but the total land area is only 116 square miles. There are 26 natural atolls and 1,192 islands, of which 200 are inhabited. Each of the atolls is surrounded by a coral reef and is like a small, protected island. There are neither rivers nor mountains nor hills on the islands, and the only sources of fresh water are aquifers, which are quickly being depleted. The atolls are totally coral-based, and the soil is not suitable for cultivation. Some vegetation is present; the coconut, banana, and some other tropical trees are the main plants of the islands. In 1985 the coconut palm and the yellow rose were declared the national tree and the national flower of Maldives.

The climate of Maldives is warm and humid. The temperatures on the islands remain in the range of 75° to 86°F all year round. The southwest monsoon brings rain from April to October, and the northeast monsoon brings more rain from December to March. The islands are located away from any seismic zone, but Maldives was seriously affected by the tsunami of December 2004, started by an earthquake in the Indian Ocean. The highest point in the country is less than eight feet above sea level, making the islands vulnerable to any increase in sea level.

ECONOMY

Currently, tourism dominates the economy of the country. Tourism alone accounts for 60 percent of the country's foreign currency income. The atolls and the sea attract international tourists to the Maldives year-round. Besides tourism, fish processing, ship and boat building, coconut processing, garment manufacturing, woolen mat and rope making, handicrafts, coral mining, and the mining of sand are other major economic activities. The service sector, including tourism, constitutes 62 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP). The shares of industry and agriculture in the GDP are about 20 percent each. About 60 percent of the total employment, too, is in the service sector.

A major concern of the country is possible global warming and the resultant rise in sea levels, since 80 percent of the land area is only about three feet above sea level.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Maldives has a proud heritage and a rich culture adapted and assimilated from the people of various countries who came for commerce or to spread their religion. The main center of daily life and culture is

A fisherman walks on his traditional fishing boat at a port, which brings goods to and from the nation's remote atolls in Malé, the capital of the Maldives. The sea is at the center of culture and daily life for this nation of islands. (AP Photo/Ed Wray)

Dhoni

A dhoni is a traditional boat built and used by the Maldivians. The Raa atoll is famous for its craftsmen, who have been building dhonis for generations. The hull of the boat used to be made from the trunk of a coconut tree, but now dhoni hulls are usually fabricated from imported wood. Customarily the boat is painted with fish oil to prevent corrosion from seawater. Earlier these boats were fitted with sails to take advantage of favorable winds, but most of these boats now have motors. It is said that a dhoni ride is a great experience, especially on a gentle sea on a starry night. The boat is steered by the helmsman with his legs, according to his captain's commands.

the surrounding sea. Maldivians love the sea. A marine school has been set up at Malé to teach diving and scuba diving to tourists and local residents. Boat racing and wind surfing are also popular water sports in Maldives. The local fishermen use a locally built traditional boat for fishing, called a dhoni.

Traditional Maldivian handicrafts include mat weaving, embroidery work on traditional dresses, lacquer work, and making products out of coir (a stiff coarse fiber from the outer husk of the coconut). Each of the handicrafts requires specialized skills and is confined to specific atolls or islands. For example, Ribudhoo in the atoll of Dhaalu is famous for its gold and silver work. The island of Gadhdhoo in Gaafu Dhaalu atoll is famous for its handwoven prayer mats made of dried hau (a resilient grass).

Among the local people, poems and songs in the Dhivehi language (Indo-European in nature containing Sanskrit, Tamil, Sinhalese, Persian, Urdu, and Arabic words) and group dances are popular.

Some of the islanders believe in myths and supernatural forces, such as evil spirits, which they fear. Rituals, such as group dancing at night, are

Kadhaa Maali

This is a dance from the Kulhudhuffush Thiladhummatt atoll located in the northern part of the Maldives. Percussion is provided by drums and kadhaas, which are copper plates struck with rods. The name of the dance is derived from these copper plates, which are called kadhaas. The Kadhaa Maali is a group dance in which 25 men, dressed in traditional costumes, seek to drive away evil spirits, collectively called maali, in order to cure sickness. The dance is generally performed in the evening.

performed on some of the islands in order to drive off the evil spirits.

🌸 CUISINE

The Maldives are constrained by limited land for growing crops and a shortage of domestic labor. Fish and rice are the staple foods of Maldivians; beef and chicken are eaten only on special occasions. The staple diet of the islanders consists of fish, coconut, breadfruit, and honey made out of coconut toddy (fermented sap of the coconut palm). A typical traditional Maldivian meal may have a fish broth mixed with smoked tuna (garud-biya), tubers, millet, or breadfruit, with coconut, green chilies, and lime added to the broth. National dishes include fried fish, fish curry, and fish soup. Rice is imported but has become a staple of local meals. Curries with spices and unleavened bread are also popular. Areca nut (an oval nut chewed with betel leaf, cloves, and lime) is the Maldivian equivalent of an after dinner mint. Alcohol is only available in tourist resorts. The local brew is raa, a sweet and delicious toddy tapped from the crown of the palm. Apart from coconuts, there are very few fruits and vegetables grown on the islands, so most of the food served at tourist resorts must be imported.

🌸 NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

Even though the Maldives is a Muslim country and generally follows the Islamic lunar calendar, January 1, which is New Year's Day on the Gregorian calendar, is still observed as a public holiday in Maldives. There are no public celebrations, which is in keeping with prevailing Islamic sentiments, but all offices and institutions are closed.

🌸 NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 9

Maldives came under Portuguese rule in 1558, when the Portuguese invaded the islands and murdered Sultan Ali VI. Their brutal colonial rule lasted for 15 years. It was ended in 1573 (on the first day of Rabbil-Awwal, 981 A.H.) by Muhammad Thakurufaanu (d. 1585), who, along with his brothers, killed the Portuguese and liberated Malé in 1573. This was the night before the day when the Portuguese planned to force all the Maldivians to convert to Christianity or be killed. Parades and marches are held on the streets of Malé and other islands to commemorate this day.

🌸 HURAVEE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 8

In 1752 invaders from South India attacked Malé, destroyed the palace, and carried off Sultan Mukarram Muhammad Imadudheen (Safar 13, 1166 A.H.). But some of the invaders stayed to rule Malé. Within a few weeks, on Jumad Awal 3, 1166, Malé was liberated by Muleege Hassan Maniku, who was from a clan known as Hurra, in the Malé atoll. Later Maniku became Sultan Hassan Izzudheen of Malé. He is revered as a national hero and honored on Huravee Day in Maldives.

🌸 INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 26–27

The Maldives remained a British Protectorate for 78 years, gaining independence from British rule on July 26, 1965. Maldivians observe July 26 as Independence Day. Special celebrations held on this occasion include military parades and parades by schoolchildren. The next day, July 27, is also a public holiday.

🌸 MARTYRS' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 4

When the Portuguese fleet invaded Malé in 1558, the ruling Sultan Ali VI was not supported by his countrymen and was killed while fighting. Later he was recognized as a hero and was declared a martyr. The sultan was killed on the first day of the month of Shaban in 965 A.H., and this day is observed as Martyrs' Day in the memory of Sultan Ali VI.

🌸 VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 3

A Tamil terrorist group from Sri Lanka attacked Malé and tried to overthrow the government in 1988. The attempt was foiled and the terrorists fled from islands. In memory of this event, Victory Day is celebrated on November 3 in the Maldives.

🌸 REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11–12

The Maldives first became a republic on January 1, 1953. It was short-lived, however, and the sultanate was restored within the same year. A second republic emerged on November 11, 1968, three years after the country's independence from Britain in 1965. Republic Day is a two-day celebration, and parades and other street events are held at Malé and other islands.

❁ MOULLOUD

Observed by: Sunni Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi, the birthday of the prophet Muhammad, is celebrated on the 12th of Rabbi al-Awwal by Sunni Muslims. Shia Muslims celebrate it five days later, on the 17th. Muhammad told his followers not to imitate Christians by reveling on his birthday, so this is usually a reverent observance in the Maldives. Arabic verses in praise of the prophet are sung, special prayers are offered in homes, and special foods, including aweli, a noodle dish, are prepared for the occasion.

❁ RAMADAN

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar

During the month of Ramadan, devout Muslims observe day-long fasts and stay away from any kind of food and even water. The fast is broken only after sunset on each day. Ramadan is the holiest month of the Islamic calendar because Muslims believe that Allah began to reveal the Koran to Muhammad on the 27th day of Ramadan. The first day of the month of Ramadan, when the fasting season begins, is observed as a holiday in Maldives.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, also called Fithru Eid or Kuda Eid in Maldives, marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan with the sighting of the new Moon. The appearance of the Moon is announced by the imam (priest) of Malé via television, and celebrations start that same evening with grand feasts to mark the end of a month of dawn-to-dusk fasting. The following day features a mass prayer after which people greet one another saying “Eid Mubarik” (greetings). Feasts are shared among relatives and friends. People wear new clothes. Money and food are given away to the poor. Malé adopts a festive mood on this day, and people fill the streets in the afternoon to watch parades with colorful bands playing. In villages celebrants play traditional drum music (on a boduberu, meaning “big drum”) and hold sports competitions to mark this day.

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha is known locally as Bodu Eid or Azhaa Eid and is celebrated after the completion of the annual hajj pilgrimage to Mecca on the previous day. Of the two eids celebrated by Muslims (the other is Eid al-Fitr), this three-day event is the more significant. This is also the Festival of Sacrifice, when animals are sacrificed to remember that Ibrahim (Abraham) was willing to sacrifice his son because he was ordered to do so by God. The Maldives has been an Islamic country since 1153 and special prayers, games, and feasts are held on this day on Malé and other islands of the archipelago.

Even in the days of the monarchy, special customs characterized this major eid including the use of drums to announce special events and the official procession of the sultan, accompanied by bands and military displays, to the eid prayer. People wear new clothes and are in a festive mood.

People travel from one island to another to participate in the festivals. Cultural events differ from island to island, and visitors who want to see traditional customs should visit one of the smaller islands. In some islands, water is splashed on people as part of the fun.

Over the centuries the customs associated with celebrating the eid have changed, and performances of Western and other kinds of contemporary music can be seen on Malé and other islands. Brass bands and squads of cadets from various schools parade through the streets.

❁ HAJJ DAY

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Last of the month of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Officially the hajj begins on the eighth day of Dhu al-Hijjah when pilgrims stream out of Mecca

Fun Fact

The entire city of Mecca is an Islamic holy site and non-Muslims cannot enter it.

(Makka) toward Mina, to meditate and pray as Muhammad did. Every able-bodied Muslim must make the pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca at least once in his or her lifetime if he or she can afford it. The hajj is the fifth of the Five Pillars of Islam in Sunni Islam and one of the 10 Branches of Religion in the Shia sect. Ordinarily women must make the hajj with a male relative (father, husband, or brother); or, if she cannot do so for some reason, the Saudi government will allow her to enter if she is traveling in a group with other women and has written permission to do so from a male relative.

When pilgrims from the Maldives leave on or return from the hajj, people crowd the Malé airport to see the pilgrims off and to welcome them back from this physically demanding journey. The concluding day of the annual hajj in Saudi Arabia is observed as Hajj Day, and it is a holiday in Maldives. This is also the eve of the Islamic new year.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

In the Maldives, where Islam is the state religion, all rites are performed according to the tenets of that religion. Immediately after the birth, a baby is thoroughly washed in order to remove biological impurities. According to Islamic doctrine, the first sound that a baby ought to hear should be the sacred name of Allah. This should be uttered by its father (or a male relative). The male relative whispers the call to prayer, or adhan, first into the child's right ear and then into its left. The underlying idea is to make the child aware of Allah's omnipresence and his power over the lives of mortals. A baby is

Bodu Beru

A bodu beru is a big drum, as well as the name of the best-known Maldivian traditional music and dance. Both the music and the dance reflect a strong African influence. An ensemble usually consists of four to six drummers. The dancers' movements follow the rhythm set by the drummers, beginning with a slow, gentle swaying and swinging of the arms, then becoming livelier as the tempo increases, and ending in a rhythmic frenzy. Local rock bands sometimes incorporate elements of bodu beru in their music, featuring lots of percussion and extended drum solos when they perform at clubs and resorts.

given his or her Islamic name on the seventh day following birth. This is an important family celebration. Relatives and friends are invited for a banquet, and food is also given away to the poor. In some of the islands, the week-old baby's head is shaved on this occasion.

COMING OF AGE

In Islamic practice, all boys are circumcised between the ages of four and eight years, usually during the annual school holidays. While in Malé the operation is generally performed by doctors, on other islands a bakeem, or local medicine man, does it. This event is an occasion for joy and celebration in a family. Houses are decorated, and local dancers and live bands are hired to entertain guests. Many people stop by during the festivities, mainly to enjoy a game of carrom (or carrom) or join in a bodu beru, a uniquely Maldivian form of music and dance. Friends and relations visit the house on the day of the circumcision and for a week or so afterward too, until the boy recovers. Every visitor brings some gift for him. Various delicacies are offered throughout the week to the visitors and guests.

MARRIAGE

In the Maldives, most marriages are conducted in the traditional Muslim manner. The matches are created by agreement between the two sets of parents. However, according to Islamic tenets, both the bride and the groom are free to refuse the spouse selected by their parents, guardians, or elders. Prior to the actual wedding, the two families decide on a specific amount of money or articles in kind that the groom's family must give to the bride. This sum of money provides security for the bride in case the marriage breaks up. As in all Islamic societies, Maldives weddings take place in the bride's home.

The wedding rites are conducted by an imam. Iraqi tradition requires that, while the nikah (wedding contract) is being recited by the imam, the bride has to read the "surat al fatb" (verse 48) from the Koran. The imam asks her whether she gives him permission to marry her to the groom upon payment of the specified amount. Muslim brides customarily wear a white dress for the wedding and place their feet in water (symbolizing tranquility), while kinsmen place a sufra in front of her, which consists of fruits, six candles, different types of sweets, bread and cheese, rice, honey, and yogurt. These items symbolize plenty and prosperity.

DEATH

All religions accept death as a part of human life. Since death is unpredictable and can happen at any time, anywhere, Muslims are exhorted always to be prepared. When Muslims are faced with death, they are encouraged to recite prayers and declare their faith. Muslims believe that a baby who is born dead or stillborn must nonetheless have a name before it is buried.

Muslims are taught to treat the dead body with gentleness and respect. A dead person's face is turned toward Mecca, the arms and legs are straightened out, and the mouth and eyes are closed.

In the Maldives (as in all Islamic societies), it is customary for Muslims to ritually wash the dead body, perfume it, and drape it in a fresh white cloth before burial. The burial is supposed to take place as quickly as possible after death.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Not much is known about the region's prehistory, but it is believed that the Dogon, based around the Niger River Valley, were the original inhabitants of Mali. Mali has the distinction of having been an integral part of all three great African Empires, Ghana, Malinke, and Songhai. The Ghana Empire ruled the region from 770 until 1075. A powerful state, it controlled the trans-Saharan trade route from the 4th until the 11th century. The Ghana Empire came to an end as a result of the invasion of Muslim Almoravids, and Mali, too, fell to the invaders. In the early 13th century, the region became part of the Malinke Empire after the conquest of Timbuktu and Gao by the legendary Mali king Sundiata Keita (c. 1190–c. 1255), the Lion King.

This was the beginning of Mali's golden era as trade expanded to other parts of West Africa and the entire trans-Saharan gold trade came under the control of the Malinké. Timbuktu became the fabled city of untold riches and the most famous gold trading post.

Internal and external conflicts led to the fall of the Malinke Empire in the 15th century, and the region was overtaken by the Songhai Empire. The Songhai Empire came to power in 1435 and dominated the region until 1530. It finally crumbled after the Moroccan invasion in 1539.

The French military began showing interest in the region in 1880. It was not until 1890, however, that the French established a colony. Moreover French ambitions met with stiff resistance on the part of the great Malinke warrior Samory Touré (c. 1830–1900), and the French were strategically challenged in their advance.

By 1893 the French had succeeded. The region was renamed French Sudan and placed under the rule of a civilian governor. Touré and the other tribal leaders were determined to drive the foreigners out. But after the arrest and killing of Samory Touré in 1898, the French army was able to crush the rebellion.

French Sudan later became part of the Federation of French West Africa. After a French constitutional referendum was passed on October 4, 1958, the République Soudanaise became an integral part of the overseas French Community and was granted autonomous status.

The French Community

The French Community was established in 1958 and consisted of the French Republic (which included metropolitan France, or continental France, Corsica, Algeria, and the Sahara), the overseas territories (Comoros, French Polynesia, the Territory of the Afars and the Issas, New Caledonia, Saint Pierre and Miquelon, the French Southern and Antarctic territories, and the Wallis and Futuna Islands), the overseas departments (French Guiana, Guadeloupe, Martinique, and Réunion), and six independent African republics (the Central African Republic, Chad, Congo-Brazzaville, Gabon, the Malagasy Republic, and Senegal). Though self-governed, the member states were represented in matters of common interest such as foreign policy, defense, economic and financial policy, policy on strategic raw materials, supervision of courts, higher education, and communications—at first through the institutions of the Community and later through bilateral agreements between the French Republic and other members. Gradually, as the former French African possessions evolved their own political and economic structures, the French Community ceased to function as an entity, although it still exists in principle.

In January 1959 Senegal and French Sudan came together to form the Mali Federation. On July 20, 1960, the Mali Federation was granted independent status within the French Community. However, the federation collapsed after Senegal withdrew in August 1960. On September 22, 1960, French Sudan declared itself a republic and changed its name to the Republic of Mali.

Modibo Keita (1915–77) was elected the first president of independent Mali. He was the leader of the popular pre-independence party Union Soudanaise du Rassemblement Démocratique Africain (US/RDA). After assuming power he declared Mali a one-party state and followed a socialist economic policy based on extensive nationalization. But the policy failed, and the economy suffered. There was also growing discontent among the people. On November 19, 1968, a bloodless coup by a group of young people ousted Keita, and a Military Committee for National Liberation (CMLN) was formed to look after the nation's affairs. Lieutenant Moussa Traore (b. 1936) was sworn in as the new president. But internal political conflicts, lack of sound economic policies, and the great Sahelian drought, further crippled the economy.

In 1974 a new constitution was adopted, and Mali was once again declared a one-party state. In 1976 a new political party, the Democratic Union of the Malian People (UDPM), was established based on the principle of “democratic centralism.” Moussa Traore won the single-party presidential elections held in 1979 and was reinstated as president of Mali.

In the early 1990s the demand for multiparty democracy increased in Mali. Student riots broke out in different parts of the country, and the idea even received support from government workers. On March 26, 1991, President Traore was arrested by 17 military officers, and the constitution was suspended. The first multiparty National Assembly elections were held on June 8, 1992, and the candidate of the Association for Democracy in Mali (ADEMA), Alpha Oumar Konaré (b. 1946), became president of the Republic of Mali.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Republic of Mali is the largest country in West Africa. A landlocked nation, Mali is flanked by Burkina Faso in the southeast, Niger in the east, Senegal and Mauritania in the west, Guinea in the southwest, Algeria in the north and northeast, and Côte d'Ivoire in the south. Bamako is the capital of the Republic of Mali.

Topographically, Mali is divided into three natural zones: Saharan in the north, semi-arid Sahelian in the central parts (Sahel refers to the central region of West Africa), and cultivated Sudanese in the south. While the northern plains are flat and covered with desert sand, there are rugged hills in the Air Massif (also known as the Air Mountains) marked with faults (cracks in the Earth's crust leading to seismic activity that includes earthquakes) and the Djado Plateau in the northeast, and savannah grasslands in the south.

The Niger River is the country's lifeline. The source of sustenance and transportation for the country, it is also referred to as “the Nile of Mali.” On the whole, Mali has subtropical to arid climatic conditions. The daytime temperature is usually around 75°F, while during the extremely dry winter season, the temperature exceeds 89°F. Also during the winter season, harmattans blow across the northeast at a very high speed.

Fun Fact

According to the epic Sundiata, Sundiata Keita was born unable to walk.

Democratic Centralism

A political concept, the term democratic centralism refers to the internal governance of political groups and parties. It means that the members of the political parties are free to discuss and debate on matters of policy, but once the party makes a decision, all members must abide by the decision.

Sahelian Drought

The central region of western Africa is referred to as the Sahel, which means “central.” This region has a history of droughts. The worst of the Sahelian droughts lasted for more than a decade, beginning in 1972 and continuing until 1984, claimed over 100,000 lives, and left almost 750,000 people at the mercy of others for food. The people suffered as did the economy. Mali, Niger, and Mauritania bore the brunt of the worst Sahelian drought to hit the region in recent times.

ECONOMY

Although the government has started implementing the International Monetary Fund’s structured plan to help revive the country’s failing economy, the Republic of Mali is one of the poorest countries of the world. More than 80 percent of its population is engaged in farming and fishing, while 10 percent lead a nomadic life. Processing of farm-based commodities forms the core of industrial activity in Mali. Cotton and gold are the major exports.

Because more than 65 percent of the country’s land is covered by desert or semi-desert, all economic activities, including agriculture, are restricted to the areas irrigated by the Niger River. The economy suffered immensely from a series of droughts in the late 20th and early 21st centuries.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Mali is home to many indigenous ethnic groups. The Dogon are believed to have been the original inhabitants of the region. The Bambara tribe is now the dominant group in Mali, followed by the Dogon and the Tuareg. The Dogon live in the inland delta areas and refer to their territory as Pays Dogon. They are industrious farmers and are also famous for their artistic masks. Pays Dogon has been declared a United Nations World Heritage Site because of its rich, well-preserved cultural heritage.

The Tuaregs, an ancient nomadic tribe, are often referred to as “the blue men of the desert” because of their indigo-colored dress and turban. They still lead a nomadic life in the desert regions.

Although French is the official language of Mali, Bambara is the most popular language. It is spoken by more than 80 percent of Malians. Almost 90 percent of the population is Muslim, while 9 percent adhere to indigenous beliefs. Christians make up only 1 percent of the Malian population.

The traditional music of Mali is preserved by the jalis and the griots, professional storytellers who preserve the history of kings and villages. Accompanied by a 21-string harplike instrument, they narrate through their songs the detailed history of the empires as well as the genealogies of the villages and villagers.

Fun Fact

Mali derives its name from the ancient empire of Mali. The word mali means “land of wealthy people.”

❁ CUISINE

In Mali, classic dishes include riz yollof (meat or vegetables cooked in a sauce made from tomato and oil), couscous, and poulet yassa (grilled chicken made in chili sauce). Along the Nile fish is the staple food. The most popular fish is Nile perch (capitaine), which can be either grilled or baked. Tea is a popular beverage and is drunk out of small glasses.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world. In Mali on New Year's Eve, people gather in public places for mass celebrations with food, music, and dancing. At midnight the skies light up with fireworks, and people greet their friends and neighbors with good wishes for the coming year. In Mali all government offices, schools, and many businesses are closed on January 1.

❁ DAY OF DEMOCRACY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 26

Day of Democracy commemorates the bold move taken by 17 military officers who arrested President Moussa Traore on March 26, 1991. President Traore had declared Mali a one-party state and banned all political parties, just like his predecessor Mobido Keita. However, by the early 1990s there was growing demand among Malians to restore multiparty democracy. Traore was opposed to this and brutally crushed demonstrations challenging his authority. But the struggle against Traore's regime persevered and intensified, leading to widespread student riots. The military siding with the popular protesters, arrested President Traore on March 26, 1991.

This day celebrates the establishment of democracy in the country. People pay tribute to those who died for the cause of democracy and honor the military officers who rescued the nation from Traore's tyranny.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, May Day, or Workers' Day in many parts of the world. On this day the contributions and achievements of workers are honored. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

International Labor Day on May 1 has always been more radical than the U.S. holiday celebrated in September. As it is a national holiday in Mali, all government and private institutions are closed on May 1.

❁ AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 25

Africa Day commemorates the formation of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on May 25, 1963, at Addis Ababa in Ethiopia. The idea of a unified African organization was the brainchild of the president of the Independent State of Ghana Kwame Nkrumah (1909–72) and the Emperor of Ethiopia Haile Selassie (1892–1975). Kwame Nkrumah was a Marxist-Socialist who, after studying at U.S. universities, returned to Ghana and joined the independence movement. He was a champion of the nonviolent movement against British rule in the region. When Ghana was granted independence, he was sworn in as the first president of the independent nation.

Haile Selassie was the emperor of Ethiopia who led his country to victory against Italian occupation in World War II, and he worked along with Kwame Nkrumah to foster a spirit of unity among all African countries. As more and more colonies in Africa were gaining independence from colonial rule, Nkrumah and Selassie believed that it was critical to bring together different African nations to form a unified continent. This vision became reality when 32 African countries confirmed their commitment to build a united Africa. Today there are more than 53 member nations in the OAU.

Since its inception, the OAU has been instrumental in ending colonial rule in Africa and has also acted as a peacemaker and negotiator in solving regional disputes, internal conflicts, and wars throughout Africa. The stated goals of the OAU are to promote peace, human rights, and unity among all African nations.

In Mali, Africa Day is a national holiday, and all public and private institutions are closed. Seminars and workshops on Africa are held in Bamako.

Fun Fact

The nomadic Tuareg created the fabled city of Timbuktu in the 12th century. The city was built around a well (tim in the Tuareg language), and the female caretaker of this well was named Buktu. Hence, the city was named Timbuktu, which means "Bktu's well."

Fun Fact

Harmattans are dry dust-laden winds that irritate the eyes.

Fun Fact

The Tuaregs are called "the blue men" because the indigo used to dye their clothes also dyes their skin.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 22

The Republic of Mali came into existence on September 22, 1960. Mali had been under French rule since the late 1800s and was part of French Sudan until World War II. On October 4, 1958, after a French constitutional referendum, the République Soudanaise became a part of the French Community and was granted autonomous status. In January French Sudan joined Senegal to form the Mali Federation. Independent status was granted to the Federation on June 20, 1960. In August, however, Senegal withdrew from the federation and declared its independence. On September 22, 1960, Mali declared its independence and severed ties with the French Community.

Fun Fact

In Mali, tea is drunk in three rounds; with each round the tea gets sweeter.

The president presides over Independence Day celebrations in Mali. Besides parades by the country's armed forces and patriotic speeches, the day is celebrated with cultural festivals that include traditional dance and musical performances.

❁ ARMY COUP DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 19

Army Coup Day, or Liberation Day, commemorates the bloodless coup led by a group of young Malians on November 19, 1968. After Mali became an independent republic in September 1960, Modibo Keita was elected president of the nation. Later, the power-hungry Keita declared Mali a one-party state and banned all other political parties. His dictatorial handling of economic issues crippled the country. There were widespread demonstrations demanding Keita's ouster. A group of young Malians led a bloodless coup against Keita and gave power to the Military Committee for National Liberation (CMLN), under the leadership of Lieutenant Moussa Traore.

This day is celebrated all over Mali by official speeches, military parades, and cultural activities.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Muslims all over the world observe a month-long dawn-to-dusk fast during the holy month of Ramadan. Eid al-Fitr also known as Korite, or the Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of Ramadan. It is a day of celebration for Malian Muslims. In every village, town, and city, people dress in new clothes or their best attire to participate in the festivities. Women adorn themselves with silver and bronze jewelry. Mass prayers are held at different locations, presided over by the imams of the local mosques. After prayers, people greet each other and exchange gifts. According to the Koran, fasting is strictly forbidden on this day.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called Tabaski or the Festival of Sacrifice, is celebrated in honor of Ibrahim's (Abraham's) willingness to sacrifice his own son at God's command. After offering prayers at a local mosque, the head of each Muslim family in Mali sacrifices a male sheep in honor of Allah. The meat of the sacrificed sheep is distributed among friends, family, and poor neighbors.

The holy pilgrimage or hajj to the holy city of Mecca also takes place this month. The holy book of the Muslims, the Koran, requires that every Muslim should undertake this journey at least once in his or her lifetime if physically and financially capable of doing so.

❁ FÊTE DES MASQUES

Observed in: Dogon villages

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April–May

Fête des Masques is an annual cultural festival held in April and May. This five-day event showcases the traditional Malian art of making masks. The famous Dogon masks are donned by artists during the performance of ancient Dogon rituals that have been performed for more than 1,000 years. Dogons also narrate their history through special dances performed with their masks.

One of the rituals performed is called Sigi. It is based on an agrarian calendar and is traditionally performed only once every 60 years. The Dogon agrarian calendar is based on the orbital cycles of a “white dwarf star,” which is invisible to the naked eye.

❁ CROSSING OF THE CATTLE

Observed in: Diafarabe

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December

The Crossing of the Cattle is an important annual event that takes place in December at Diafarabe, a small village on the banks of the Niger River. A tradition that started in the 1840s, it celebrates the traditional crossing of the river by the herders and their cattle to enter the grasslands of Diafarabe.

This has long been a practice of the local Fulani tribes. Since the region gets flooded during the rainy season, these tribes take their cattle toward the north to protect them from the floodwaters. In November and December, when the water recedes, they return to Diafarabe with their cattle.

Prior to the event the village elders and chiefs discuss the order of the crossing so that the herdsmen and their cattle are treated in a fair and democratic manner. This is done to ensure that no injustice is done to any ethnic group or tribe, and the cattle of each group get a fair share of grass in Diafarabe.

As December approaches Diafarabe gears up to face the heavy influx of herders and cattle that assemble on the banks of the river. These herders return to their village in Diafarabe after spending months in the desert region. Following the order of crossing decided in the meeting of the elders, the herders and their cattle cross the river and enter Diafarabe.

This is a day of great joy for the herders and their families because it celebrates their reunion after months of separation. Special competitions such as judging the fattest, best bred, and best cared-for cattle are part of the festivities. The first day after the crossing of the cattle is called Promenade des Jeunes (“Walk of Youth”), and unmarried young men and women dress in their best clothes in order to be attractive to one another.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Among the Tuareg tribe in Mali, the naming ceremony of a newborn child takes place a week after the birth. The night before the actual ceremony, the elderly female relatives of the newborn give him or her a secret tamacheq (local language) name. On the day of the naming ceremony, the father of the child refers to the Koran and whispers an Arabic name in the child’s right ear. At the same time the presiding priest cuts the throat of a ram, and the festivities begin. Friends and family celebrate the birth with a huge feast.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The circumcision of males at puberty is traditional. Malians believe that by undergoing this ritual a boy becomes a man. The ritual is performed by trained older men who use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments. They perform the circumcision without anesthetic. This practice enjoys social backing, and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations also follow this coming-of-age ritual.

❁ MARRIAGE

Among the Fulani tribe in Mali, a wedding is an elaborate affair involving dancing, singing, and feasting. One interesting wedding ritual requires the friends of the bride-to-be to take her to the forest. Here, the friends of the groom-to-be must find the bride, chase her, and then carry her back to the groom’s house. The bride must cry her heart out on her way back, to show her emotional self. Then the bride and groom sign in a book that has, “Do you Love (name of the bride or groom)?,” written inside.

Guests are expected to give gifts to thine bride and groom. Cooking pots are favorite gifts at most Fulani weddings.

❁ DEATH

The Dogon believe in the power of the supernatural and ancestral spirits. They have three main cults: that of Lebe (worship of the Earth god), Binu (a totemic practice), and Awa (worship of the dead). The Lebe cult involves rituals related to agriculture, and the chief priest of its practitioners is called the hogon. The cult of Binu has a complex association with the sacred beliefs of Dogon. The Binu shrines are home to the mythical ancestors who lived in the legendary realm before death made its appearance in the world.

The Awa cult is the custodian of ancestral spirits and has the responsibility for placing the spiritual forces in order. It is believed that the order of the spirits has been disturbed since the death of a mythological Dogon ancestor named Nommo. It is widely believed among the Dogon that the mythical Nommo lived alongside several others who inhab-

The term nommo also refers to amphibious beings that were sent to live on Earth by Sirius for the benefit of humanity. Nommos are often called “monitors” or “masters of the water” or “teachers.”

The Awas wear ceremonial masks and perform dance rituals on the occasion of death or death anniversaries. Through their ceremonial dance, it is believed that the Awas lead the souls of the deceased to their eternal resting place and also sanctify their journey into the ranks of ancestors.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

It is believed that a prehistoric civilization existed in Malta starting around 5200 B.C.E. The Phoenicians colonized Malta about 800 B.C.E. and named it Malat (which means "safe haven"). In 400 B.C.E. Malta came under the control of the Romans and prospered under their rule.

In 870 C.E. the Arabs conquered the island of Malta. Their rule lasted until 1090, after which it was taken over by the Sicilian Normans. After the Sicilians the islands passed to the Knights of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, who strengthened the defense of the islands just in time to defend them from the Turks, who invaded in 1565. The Maltese and the knights fought and defended the islands successfully. The knights were called "the saviors of Europe" due to their bravery.

Napoleon (1769–1821) conquered the islands in 1798. The Maltese despised French rule, especially because of the rigid stance on religion enforced by the French, and the Maltese revolted against it. To assist Malta, Great Britain sent its navy, munitions, and other aid. Eventually France was forced to withdraw, and their forces surrendered in 1800. Malta then became a British protectorate. The Treaty of Paris, signed in 1814, officially made Malta a part of the British Empire. Malta's proximity to the Suez Canal was a big advantage to Britain. During World War I Malta played an important role because of its strategic location. In 1930 the British Mediterranean fleet was moved to Alexandria through Malta, since it is located close to Italy.

During World War II Malta was bombed by Germany and Italy. The island endured the heaviest bombardment. To honor the contributions of the Maltese people in this war, King George VI (1895–1952) awarded the George Cross to the "Island Fortress of Malta" in 1942. The cross appears today on the Maltese flag.

Malta was granted independence in September 1964. However, a fully independent status was not granted, and British forces still controlled the harbors, airport, and postal services of Malta. On December 13, 1974, Malta became a

Phoenicians

The Phoenicians were a group of people who lived on the Mediterranean coast in what is now Lebanon around 1350 B.C.E. These people were originally called Canaanites but were renamed Phoenicians. They emerged as great sailors and traveled all over the Mediterranean engaging in trade. As they became stronger they started their own colonies, the most important of which was called Carthage. In 539 the Phoenicians were conquered by the Persians and became part of the Persian Empire. In 332 B.C.E. Alexander the Great (356–23) attacked Persia, and the Phoenicians became a part of his empire. Some of the Lebanese, Syrians, Maltese, Tunisian, and a small percentage of Somalis still consider themselves to be descendants of the Phoenicians.

separate republic within the Commonwealth, and this day is celebrated as Republic Day in Malta.

Malta joined the European Union (EU) in May 2004. It is the smallest of the EU member countries.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Southern Europe, the Republic of Malta is an archipelago in the central Mediterranean Sea. Three of the five islands in the Republic of Malta are inhabited: Gozo (Ghawdex); Malta Island (Malta), which is also the largest island; and Commino (Kemmuna). The islands have indented coastlines that provide them with a number of good harbors. Low hills and terraced fields characterize the terrain of the islands.

Malta enjoys a Mediterranean temperate climate, which is characterized by hot and dry summers and mild winters with frequent showers. In summer the average daily temperature is around 86°F, while in winter it is around 59°F.

Malta is home to a wide variety of Mediterranean flora that includes trees like the holm oak (a Mediterranean evergreen tree), the carob tree, the white poplar, the bay laurel, the gharghar (araar) tree (a species of cypress), the Judas tree, the common myrtle, and the orange tree. Flowers like the bumblebee, the acanthus, the spider orchid, the buttercup, and the lesser chickweed abound.

Malta also has diverse fauna including the zring (painted frog), serpiswed (black whip snake), gremuxla tamalta (Maltese wall lizard), and the Moorish gecko, as well as the endangered white shark. The Maltese government has declared three species of Mediterranean sharks endangered.

Fun Fact

Zring, painted frogs, are the only amphibians found in Malta.

❁ ECONOMY

Malta has a relatively stable economy that is dependent on tourism, manufacturing (textile and electronic products), and foreign trade (it is an important freight transshipment point). Malta has a huge deposit of limestone. However, the islands have limited freshwater resources and produce only 20 percent of their food requirements. The nation's workforce is highly productive, with more than 71 percent employed in the service sector, while agriculture employs only 5 percent.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Almost 98 percent of the nation's population is Roman Catholic, and the Catholic Church is the custodian of Malta's rich cultural heritage. Maltese are devoted to their religion and celebrate the feasts of various Catholic saints extravagantly. Some feasts are celebrated over a period of three days and are marked by religious services in local churches in honor of the saint, along with band processions and amazing fireworks. On the final day of many celebrations, the statues of saints are carried around the streets.

Malti and English are the official languages of Malta.

Traditional Maltese music is known as L-ghana, and the most popular style of L-ghana is known as spirtu pront, a singing duel between two or three singers (ghannejjas). It requires the participants to come up with rhyming lyrics while playing with words in a light-hearted manner. Brass band music is extremely popular during annual festivals in villages and towns. The tambourine and guitar are the most common musical instruments used in Maltese music.

Malta is renowned all over the world for its expertise in handcrafted products such as handwoven fabrics, silver filigree, blown glass, and hand-made lace.

❁ CUISINE

Maltese cuisine is heavily influenced by its Sicilian neighbor. It boasts a wide variety of ethnic dishes that include timpana (macaroni, egg pie, and cheese), fenek (a dish made from rabbit meat that is either fried or baked into a pie), brungjel mimli (stuffed eggplant), braggoli (beef rolls), stuffat tal-qarnit (octopus stew), stuffat tal-fenek (rabbit stew), and pastizzi (cheese pastries). Having been a British protectorate, many British food items (like grilled chops and roasts) are also featured on Maltese menus. Wine is the preferred beverage in Malta.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Gregorian, or Western, calendar year and is celebrated as New Year's Day in many countries. Revelries begin New Year's Eve (December 31) for celebrations that take place all over the world. In Malta people greet the new year with special parties that celebrate the occasion. They usher in the new year by singing, dancing, feasting, and drinking champagne and wine. At midnight people wish each other well and honk the horns of their cars as well as those of boats in the harbors to announce the arrival of the new year.

❁ FREEDOM DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 31

Freedom Day also called National Day or Jum il-Helsien, commemorates the departure of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and British forces from Malta on March 31, 1979, marking the end of British rule in the region. At the War Memorial at Floriana a special commemorative service is held on this day to honor all those who lost their lives to uphold the integrity and sovereignty of Malta. At the Grand Harbor in Malta there is a traditional boat race in the afternoon. Since it is a national holiday, all public and private institutions are closed.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In Malta May 1 is a public holiday and all public and private institutions are closed.

❁ SETTE GIUGNO

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 7

This day commemorates the violent uprising in 1919 by the already impoverished Maltese population against the British administrators because of the increase in the price of bread. In 1814 Malta became a part of the British Empire. However, despite taking advantage of the Maltese harbors and making it a prominent naval base, British administrators totally neglected the needs of the Maltese people. As a result people were living in dire poverty. There was growing discontent regarding British rule, and a decision by the British administration to increase the price of bread in 1919 triggered a violent reaction. Many people lost their lives as British police brutally tried to crush the voices of dissent.

On this day a commemorative service is held at the Palace Square in Malta, and everyone remembers the protestors who lost their lives fighting British injustice.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 21

On September 21, 1964, Malta obtained total independence from the United Kingdom. Malta had been a British colony since 1815, and its strategic position gave British traders a competitive edge after the opening of the Suez Canal. However, the Maltese lived in an impoverished state and the British administration did nothing for their betterment. This resulted in the Uprising of 1919, when the Maltese people began demanding independence from British rule. The British pacified the local people by establishing the Maltese parliament in 1921 and gave more representation to the native Maltese. After World War II, despite a British promise to grant the Maltese the right of self-governance, the people univocally expressed their desire for total independence. Eventually the British government relented, and an independent Malta came into existence on September 21, 1964.

To commemorate this event, the president of the country presides over the Independence Day celebrations in the capital city of Valetta. Military parades, official speeches, and a host of cultural activities, as well as the Independence Day soccer match (played by regional teams to win the coveted Independence Day Cup), mark the Independence Day celebrations in Malta.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 13

According to a special resolution passed by the House of Representatives in the Maltese parliament, Malta was declared a republic on December 13, 1974. This event is celebrated with great enthusiasm on Republic Day. In the city of Marsa a horse race is organized on this day.

❁ FEAST OF ST. PAUL'S SHIPWRECK

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: February 10

In the Bible, the Acts of the Apostles reports that a ship carrying St. Paul, one of the prominent Christian saints, to Rome was wrecked at the island of Malta around 60 C.E. St. Paul came ashore and preached Christianity in the region for a while, and soon the local inhabitants embraced the religion. On this day devout Maltese Christians go to church and pray to St. Paul. They also thank God for the shipwreck that sent St. Paul to Malta and for communicating his message of love and peace through his disciple.

❁ ST. JOSEPH'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: March 19

Roman Catholics consider St. Joseph (the father of Jesus) the patron saint of workers, and they observe the Feast of St. Joseph on March 19. If the feast falls during Holy Week (Easter Week), then it is observed eight days after Easter or is observed on the Monday after Low Sunday (the first Sunday after Easter). Also if it falls on a Sunday, then it is observed on the previous Saturday (March 18).

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Mourning Friday, Black Friday, or Holy Friday, commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. Thus it is observed as a somber, solemn occasion. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penance). Many churches across Malta are splashed with red-colored water, which symbolizes Jesus' blood. In addition, Jesus' life, Crucifixion, and Resurrection are reenacted in plays that are performed in local churches. Many people participate in huge Good Friday processions and carry statues representing different scenes from the life of Jesus; some even dress as biblical characters like Adam and Eve, Noah, Mary, Joseph, and Jesus. As a form of penance for their sins, they walk barefoot or carry heavy stones on their backs.

In Malta, and especially in the city of Rabat, devout Roman Catholics abstain from eating meat, since the Catholic Church forbids the consumption of meat on this solemn occasion.

A special prayer service is held that includes the Adoration of the Cross as well as other religious ceremonies. However, no Masses are held because this is an aliturgical day in the Roman Catholic Church. In many churches across Malta, a wooden rattle called a cuqlajta takes the place of church bells on this day.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates a belief in Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after the 40-day period of fasting called Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. In Malta Easter celebrations begin in complete darkness. Then at an appointed hour, church bells break the silence of the night, and the churches are illuminated with chandeliers, candles, floodlights, and bulbs announcing Jesus' Resurrection. On Easter a huge procession is organized in which pallbearers carry the statue of Jesus through the streets to symbolize his Resurrection. This tradition is carried out mainly in the cities of Valletta, Senglea, Vittoriosa, and Cospicua.

Families exchange gifts (especially chocolate-shaped eggs and rabbits, symbols of fertility taken from ancient pagan spring rites) and figolli, a special pastry shaped like a human, dove, fish or basket. It is filled with marzipan and coated with icing or chocolate. Over the next few days priests visit the homes of their parishioners and bless the inhabitants. Everyone receives olive leaves. In ancient times they would burn these leaves in order to ward off evil spirits.

❁ FEAST OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: June 29

The Feast of St. Peter is observed on June 29 to commemorate his death. St. Peter was one of the original 12 disciples and the first pope. Christians believe that he holds the “keys to heaven” and that devout Christians who have not sinned will meet him after death at the gates of heaven.

The Feast of St. Paul is also celebrated on this day. St. Paul is considered the best interpreter of Christ’s teachings. In Malta the feast is known as Mnarja, a name derived from the Maltese word luminarja (which means “illumination”), which refers to the huge bonfire built in Mdina, the medieval capital of Malta, as part of the feast. On the eve of Mnarja traditional folk concerts and other musical events take place until early the next morning. Fried rabbit is the traditional dish for the occasion.

In the city of Buskett an agrarian exhibition and band marches commemorate this special feast, while a traditional horse race is organized in Rabat, the capital of Gozo, an island in the Maltese Archipelago. Rabat, also known as Victoria, has no connection with the Moroccan city of the same name.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

Assumption, also known as Virgin Mary’s Day, commemorates the Assumption of Mary, the mother of Jesus, into heaven. In Malta devout Catholics attend a special prayer service in Mary’s honor and ask her to continue to bless them. On the island of Gozo, Catholics attend a Mass in the cathedral dedicated to Assunta, the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

❁ OUR LADY OF VICTORIES DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: September 8

Our Lady of Victories Day commemorates the birth of Mary, the mother of Jesus, believed to have been born on September 8. It is a day for the Maltese to offer special prayers to Mary, the patron saint of Malta. Additionally on this day the Maltese celebrate various victories recorded in the history of Malta, including the lifting of the Turkish siege from Malta in 1565, the defeat of France in 1800, and the defeat of the Axis (Germany, Italy, and Japan) by British forces in 1943 in Malta. In the capital city of Valetta, a commemorative ceremony is held to celebrate these historic victories on Maltese soil, and there is a traditional boat race at the Grand Harbor.

❁ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

The Immaculate Conception celebrates the Roman Catholic belief that Jesus’ mother Mary was born free from all sin and was filled with God’s grace, unlike other mortals. On the island of Gozo, worshippers go to the cathedral dedicated to Assunta (the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin) and participate in a special Mass held on this day.

More elaborate celebrations are held in the small Maltese village of Qala, which has a national shrine dedicated to the Immaculata (Immaculate Conception). On the morning of December 8, a special Mass is attended by thousands of the faithful in the cathedral. The priest addresses the congregation, praising the life of the Blessed Virgin Mary and exhorting worshippers to have unwavering faith in the immaculate mother of Jesus. Church choirs sing hymns as people offer prayers to Mary. In the evening, a huge procession takes place.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the son of God. In Malta Christmas is the most important of all the religious festivals. On Christmas Eve, homes, streets, and churches are adorned with multicolored lights (festuni) while families decorate Christmas trees (is-sigra tal-Milied) with ribbons, colorful balls, and candles. In almost every home a crib (preseppi) is placed beneath the tree along with clay figurines (pasturi) representing the infant Jesus, Mary, Joseph, donkeys, cows, and other objects from the Nativity scene.

People attend the Christmas Eve Mass and in many parts of the country young children recite the sermon regarding the birth of Jesus during Mass. On Christmas Eve in the St. John Co-Cathedral in the capital city of Valletta, a special candlelit carol service is held. Special processions are held in different towns and villages in which children sing Christmas carols while carrying small statues of the infant Jesus.

On Christmas Day the Maltese visit their friends and families, and gifts and greetings are exchanged. Children open their presents, which they believe have been delivered by Santa Claus. The traditional Christmas meal consists of qagħaq tal-ghasel (a kind of honey treacle rings), timpāna (macaroni with crusty pastry), il-pudina tal-Milied (pudding), and id-dundjan (turkey).

❁ FIREWORKS FESTIVAL

Observed in: Valletta

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 29–30

The Fireworks Festival is one of the most spectacular events held in the capital city of Valletta. The festivities take place near Grand Harbor, where fireworks factories light up the evening skies through spectacular pyro-musical (synchronized fireworks and music) displays. The festival authorities use an innovative technology called “Fire One” to showcase the superiority of Maltese fireworks. The Fire One uses a sophisticated firing technology that employs a computer-controlled system to orchestrate the entire event. Fireworks manufacturers and experts enthusiastically participate in this festival and display their products. Thousands of people from all over Malta flock to the capital city to take part in the festivities.

❁ MALTA INTERNATIONAL CHOIR FESTIVAL

Observed in: Valletta

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 8–12

The Malta International Choir Festival is an annual musical event that takes place in the capital city of Valletta. The main objective of the festival is to provide a platform for the best choirs in the world. Its aim is to enthral its audiences while fostering a spirit of camaraderie among the choirs. This event was first organized in 1989 and has enjoyed increasing popularity ever since.

Choirs are attracted to this prestigious event by a variety of awards and cash prizes. A commemorative silver plaque is also given to every participating choir. During the festival each choir is required to perform a repertoire that should include one national song as well as songs from at least three different periods of musical history (such as classical, baroque, romantic, and modern).

On the night of the semifinals the selected choirs are required to perform a test piece selected by the organizers of the event. An international jury judges the semifinals and final acts on the basis of set criteria.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In ancient times the Maltese believed that a marriage is truly blessed only if the couple has children. Most marriages took place in the months of January, April, and August, since they also believed that these were the months that women were most fertile. In addition it was believed that a woman would have a safe delivery if the couple got married during days known as stilla, or “star.” On the Maltese calendar there are six such auspicious days in a year, three of which are: St. Ursula’s Day (October 21), St. Catherine’s Day (November 23), and St. Lucy’s Day (December 13).

Maltese parents seek the blessings of a number of saints to ensure a safe delivery and even make votive offerings such as infant dresses and flowers as tokens of thanks for ensuring a safe and easy delivery of a healthy infant. The Shrines of St. Blaise, St. Raymond, and St. Ludgarda are visited before and after the birth of the child.

In addition, in different parts of Malta different religious practices have been associated with childbirth. At Naxxar pregnant women tried to ensure an easy delivery by drinking water mixed with a special powder believed to be made from the bones of an 18th-century saint St. Victor, the patron saint of pregnant women.

The date of one’s birth was also very significant in Malta. The Maltese believe that a person born on August 15, the Feast of the Assumption, might grow up to be a jockey and participate in horse races, since horse racing was one of the major activities associated with the Assumption. December 24 was considered the most inauspicious day for birth since there is a Maltese superstition that people born on Christmas Eve were doomed to be transformed into ghosts, called gewgaws and would frighten others by their horrifying appearance at least once a year throughout their lives.

❁ MARRIAGE

In ancient Malta parents never consulted their daughters about marriage, and, as a way of communicating that their daughter had reached marriageable age, parents would place a pot filled with sweets on the outer wall of their house. Interested suitors sent their proposal through a buttab, or elderly marriage broker, to the girl's parents. If the proposal was accepted and the amount of dowry determined, then the suitor attached a gold ring to the mouth of a fish and sent it to his bride-to-be's family.

Next a feast of engagement, known as ir-rabta, was celebrated. During the feast the bride introduced her fiancé to her parents and other family members. Then a ring in the form of two joined hands was presented to the woman by her fiancé, while she presented a handkerchief with beautiful lace to him.

On the day of the wedding, a troupe of musicians and singers accompanied the bride and groom to the church and sang special songs of praise and happiness for the couple. After a solemn church wedding, they were showered with wheat, grains, and nuts by the guests. A lavish wedding feast followed, and the bride received gifts from the guests.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

According to historical findings, eastern Micronesia, including the Marshall Islands, was occupied by the Melanesians and people from western Micronesia around the second millennium B.C.E., but little is known about the Islands' prehistory. Artifacts found on the Majuro Islands have yielded carbon dates of 30 B.C.E and 50 C.E.

There are conflicting histories regarding the European colonization of the Marshall Islands. According to one version Spanish navigator Alonso de Salazar was probably the first European to notice the Marshall Islands on August 21, 1526. Another version claims that a total of seven Spanish navigators encountered the islands sometime between 1529 and 1568 and credits another Spaniard, Alvaro Saavedra, with the first sighting of the islands in 1529. The seventh Spanish captain in the sequence, Alvaro de Mendana, is said only to have "passed" the Marshall Islands on a return trip to Acapulco, Mexico. But as far as is known none of these navigators actually attempted a landing.

The first version delays actual European contact for several centuries following de Salazar's passing notice in 1526, until the arrival of the English navigator John Marshall in 1788. The alternative history mentions a gap of merely 200 years and credits Britain's sea captain Samuel Wallis (c. 1720–95) with the next European sighting. It claims he accidentally found the Rongerik and Rongelap atolls while sailing from Tahiti to Tinian in 1778. Both versions agree that mapping of the islands began in 1788 with John Marshall (1748–1819), for whom the islands are named. However, one history omits any reference to a certain Thomas Gilbert, who is mentioned, in the second account, as Marshall's companion.

Proas

In all probability many, if not all, of the Pacific island groups were settled by Southeast Asians whose primary mode of ocean travel was the proa, a type of canoe. Far from the primitive vessel that one might imagine, the proa was among the fastest sailing craft in existence well into the 20th century, and many modern boats built for speed-sailing competition continue to borrow design features from the proa. The traditional proa consists of two unequal, parallel hulls, much like an outrigger canoe in appearance, with very sharp keels. The hulls are painstakingly carved out of breadfruit trees and joined by skillful patching and shaping. The main hull, called the vaka, is generally larger than the windward hull, which is called the ama. The vaka and the ama are connected by crossbeams called akas. The sails, made of woven strips of pandanus leaves, are still used on traditional proas and are called crab-claw sails because of their shape.

Micronesian proas were designed in different sizes for different purposes. The smallest proa is the riwut, often used by children for racing. The kor-kor is also a small paddling outrigger, similar to the canoe, averaging about 15 feet in length, used for short distances inside lagoons and sometimes rigged with a sail. The tipnol is a medium-sized boat, with hulls averaging between 20 and 30 feet. Used primarily as a fishing vessel and capable of ocean travel, it is faster than the largest size proa the walap. The latter is the design best adapted for long sea voyages. It can reach up to 100 feet in length and carry 40 people and their supplies. Although proas may differ in their design features, their chief characteristic is their ability to switch direction as they change tack: The bow becomes the stern and the stern becomes the bow. This feature, called shunting, enables sailors to keep the same hull to windward, providing ballast. In a strong wind the weight of the crew also provides ballast, counteracting the wind's force on the sail. A gentle breeze would be a one-man wind, whereas an extremely strong wind would require four men.

The Micronesians recorded the swells of the sea. They also used stick charts to teach navigation skills. There are two basic kinds of stick chart: Mat-tang is used to teach recognition of oceanic swell patterns; the rebbeli shows the relative position of islands in the group or one of its chains. Cowrie shells are used to represent islands on stick charts. The maps are constructed from strips of coconut midrib or pandanus root attached to a frame. The curved strips indicate the direction taken by swells when deflected by an island, and island currents are represented by short straight pieces.

Moving into the early 19th century, the details become somewhat clearer. The mapping project started by Marshall was apparently continued by Russian expeditions under Adam Johann Krusenstern (1770–1846) in 1803 and Otto von Kotzebue (a Russian naval officer who accompanied von Krusenstern on his voyages; 1787–1846) in 1817 and 1823.

U.S. whalers were frequent visitors to the islands in the 1820s. American missionaries who landed at Jaluit in 1857 embarked on the process of converting the islanders. In 1878 Germany established a coal-loading station at Jaluit Atoll and signed a commercial treaty with its chiefs. In 1885 with the sanction of Great Britain, Germany declared the Marshall Islands a protectorate, and it remained a German possession until 1914. Germany chose Jaluit as the administrative center of the Marshall Islands, a decision maintained under the Japanese when they seized the islands in 1914.

In 1920 along with neighboring islands, the Marshall Islands were incorporated into the League of Nations Mandate administered by Japan. Japan embarked on an aggressive economic development program that promoted immigration, and the original islanders were quickly outnumbered by Japanese, Okinawan, and Korean immigrants. Strategic battlegrounds in World War II, these islands were liberated from Japanese occupation by U.S. forces in 1944 and came under U.S. administration when the war ended. On April 2, 1947, the Marshall Islands, along with their Pacific neighbors, became the UN Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands administered by the United States. The Trust Territory covered roughly three million square miles of the Pacific Ocean, but the actual land-mass was only about 600 square miles.

Soon afterward the island of Bikini (known before World War II as Escholtz Atoll) became the venue of a vast scientific-military experiment to determine the effects of atomic bombs on naval vessels. The islands of Bikini and Eniwetok were the site of 66 confirmed nuclear test explosions between 1946 and 1958. The United States relied on

Fun Fact

There are an estimated 20,000 to 30,000 islands in the Pacific Ocean, but the precise number is unknown. The Pacific island nations are grouped into three more encompassing categories: Melanesia, which means “black islands”; Micronesia, which means “small islands”; and Polynesia, which means “many islands.”

Fun Fact

Two atolls in the Marshall Islands, Rongerik (“small cheeks”) and Rongelap (“large cheeks”), are said to have been named after two brothers. The Islands’ version of the legend has not been recorded, but other stories about them and their seafaring family abound throughout Oceania.

appointed officials to administer the region. During the 1950s criticism from the UN Trusteeship Council and also from within the United States initiated a movement toward autonomy for the islands. In 1965 the peoples of the Trust Territory elected the Congress of Micronesia, which had genuine legislative powers. Thus the process of self-determination began. The Marshallese preferred to maintain strong but autonomous ties with the United States. They eventually chose to become a sovereign nation in free association with the United States.

In 1978, after voting to separate from the other units of the Trust Territory, the Marshall Islands drew up a constitution. The voters approved it in 1979, thus forming a republic and bringing about internal self-government. Under the constitution, the republic is headed by a president elected by a unicameral 33-member parliament (nitijela). The council of chiefs (iroji) has a consultative function with regard to traditional laws and customs. The first president of the republic of the Marshall Islands was Amata Kabua (1928–96), who held office for four consecutive terms

The formal signing of the compact by the United States and the Republic of the Marshall Islands on June 25, 1983, came as the finale to 13 long years of negotiations. In a plebiscite on September 7, 1983, the Marshallese approved the compact by a margin of 58 percent. In 1986 the nitijela approved the compact in accordance with the constitution.

On May 28, 1986, the UN Trusteeship Council noted that the Marshallese had freely exercised their right of self-determination. Without the technical approval of the UN Security Council, the United States unilaterally declared the end of the trusteeship. Finally on December 22, 1990, the Security Council confirmed the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Republic of the Marshall Islands. The Marshall Islands became a member of the United Nations on September 17, 1991.

Meanwhile the compact had been enforced on October 21, 1986 (subsequently amended and renewed as of May 1, 2004, until 2023). Under the compact the Marshall Islands became a sovereign nation with full internal self-government, as well as full authority to engage in international relations in its own name and right. As laid down in the compact, the United States is required to provide defense and external security for the republic, as well as financial assistance. The compact entitles the United States to maintain and use various military bases on the islands, including the key space-tracking station on Kwajalein.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Republic of the Marshall Islands consists of 5 islands and 29 atolls, each comprising many islets in the central Pacific between 4° and 14° north and 160° and 173° east. The islands and atolls are situated in two chainlike formations, called, respectively, the Sunrise (Ratak) and Sunset (Ralik) groups. They look so much like rich strings of pearls that visitors have named them the “Pearl of the Pacific.” The total number of islands and islets in the whole republic is approximately 1,225, spanning an area of over 750,000 square miles. The total land area is about 117 square miles. The mean height of the land is less than 7 feet above sea level, with the highest point being an unnamed location on Likiep Island (approximately 33 feet).

The weather in the Marshall Islands is tropical—hot and humid—but cooled by trade winds that blow throughout the year. The average temperature hovers around 81°F, without many fluctuations. As elsewhere in the Pacific, the skies are quite cloudy although tropical storms are very rare. The waters near the island abound in numerous species of coral, 250 species of reef fish, and all the major species of turtles. Whales, dolphins, and porpoises are also attracted by the islands’ warm waters. Around 70 bird species live on the islands, and other fauna include the Polynesian rat, lizards, blind snakes, and coconut land crabs.

The coconut palm is Micronesia’s most important plant. Copra (the dried flesh of the nut from which coconut oil is made) is a major export item. Local edible flora are breadfruit, pandanus, taro, arrowroot, yams, pumpkins, tapioca (manioc), and bananas. Most of the land is privately owned by families or clans, so there is little scope for developing national parks or reserve forests for providing a safe haven for animals.

ECONOMY

U.S. government assistance is the mainstay of the island nation’s economy, and the Marshallese use U.S. currency. Agricultural production, primarily for subsistence, is concentrated in small farms; the most important commercial crops are coconuts and breadfruit. Small-scale industry is limited to handicrafts, tuna processing, and copra. Although the

Blind Snakes

Blind snakes are often called “worm snakes” because of their resemblance to earthworms. Although they have black spots where the eyes would be, they are blind and are only able to distinguish between light and darkness. However, they are able to track ants and termites to their nests by following their scent trails.

tourist industry is a source of foreign exchange, it employs less than 10 percent of the labor force. The islands have few natural resources, and imports far exceed exports. Under the terms of the Amended Compact of Free Association, the United States will provide millions of dollars per year to the Republic of Marshall Islands (RMI) until 2023, at which time a trust fund made up of U.S. and RMI contributions will begin perpetual annual payouts. Government downsizing, drought, a drop in construction, declines in tourism and foreign investment due to Asian financial difficulties, and less income from the renewal of fishing vessel licenses have held the growth of gross domestic product (GDP) to an average of 1 percent over the past decade.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Marshallese are maintaining their cultural values and customs, known as manit, which make their society unique. Land is the focal point of social life. All Marshallese possess land rights as part of a clan, or jowi, that owes allegiance to a chief (iroij), supervised by the clan head (alap), and supported by the workers (rijerbal). The iroij have supreme control over land tenure, resource use and distribution, and dispute settlement. The alap supervises the maintenance of lands and daily activities. The rijerbal are responsible for all daily work on the land including cleaning, farming, and construction activities. The Marshall Islands' social structure is matrilineal, and land is inherited through the women's side of the family. Marshallese belongs to the Austronesian language family, of the Malayo-Polynesian subgroup.

The Marshallese are mainly Protestants, although the Catholic Church has also established a strong presence in the islands. Sundays are set aside for rest and relaxation and attending church services. The Marshallese are known throughout the Pacific and the world for their friendly, peaceful nature. Among their outstanding qualities are sharing their resources and possessions with family and friends, showing a warm and friendly attitude toward strangers, and care and consideration for others.

Family and community are inextricably entwined in Marshallese society, and the people live in large close-knit families, counting grandparents, aunts, uncles, cousins—even distant relatives—among their close kin. The strong family ties contribute to communities similarly sustained.

Marshallese handicrafts are known throughout the central Pacific region for their high-quality workmanship and originality, as well as for their judicious use of natural products. The handicrafts (amimono) include a broad range of durables and utility items such as woven baskets, fans, hats, wall hangings, purses, mats, and coasters. These utilize raw materials like coconut, pandanus leaves (maan), and shells. Also commonly available is an array of coconut oil products ranging from handsoaps to laundry detergents. Not only are these products good for the skin but they are eco-friendly as well.

❁ CUISINE

Two-thirds of the nation's population is concentrated in Majuro, the capital, and Ebeye. Because of the limited space available for agriculture, the urban dwellers are heavily dependent on rice as their staple carbohydrate. Although the outer islands are not as densely populated (because there is little gainful employment), their life remains comparatively traditional and their diet is generally better than that of many city dwellers because it is fresh.

Nevertheless, the people of the Marshall Islands have an austere diet, mostly limited to seafood, breadfruit, pandanus, and swamp taro, in addition to the ubiquitous coconut. In the north, where rain is scarce, arrowroot is cultivated for its starch. The plant needs little looking after. In its natural state the roots are bitter. To obtain flour these tubers are scrubbed, macerated, pounded, and sieved repeatedly until a lump of pure carbohydrate is produced, which is then dried in the sun. By this stage, the bitterness disappears, and the dried flour can be stored for an indefinite period.

Fun Fact

A Marshallese story explains that their traditional greeting, lokwe yuk (literally, "love to you"), used as both "hello" and "good-bye," is derived from iakwe, literally, "you are a rainbow," because rainbows are frequently seen in Majuro.

Fun Fact

Micronesian bogymen are cannibal spirits or ogres whose singular features are their brute strength and stupidity.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, starting on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In most parts of the world, New Year's Day is enthusiastically celebrated by everyone regardless of ethnic or religious affiliation. The Marshallese joyously welcome the new year with the ringing of church bells. All educational and commercial organizations remain closed.

❁ MEMORIAL AND NUCLEAR VICTIMS' DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 1

This day commemorates a significant event in world history. During the period from June 30, 1946–August 18, 1958, the United States conducted 67 nuclear tests in the Marshall Islands. The most powerful of those tests was the Bravo Shot, a 15-megaton device detonated on March 1, 1954, at Bikini atoll. Bikini was denuded, along with the neighboring atoll of Eniwetok. That test alone had 1,000 times the force of the atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima. Altogether, six of the Marshall Islands were vaporized by the surface detonation of 67 atomic and hydrogen thermonuclear bombs. These tests brought in their wake untold sorrow and misery for the Marshall Islanders. Many of them lost their lives in the aftermath of the explosions. Others were maimed, diseased, and crippled for life. This day is therefore a somber and sorrowful occasion. On this day the Marshallese honor those who lost their lives and pray for the health and well-being of those who survived the devastation. All public and government offices remain closed on this day.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Constitution Day, or Proclamation of the Republic, is a major public holiday in the Republic of the Marshall Islands. It has dual significance. On this day the proclamation of the republic status of the Marshall Islands was followed by the adoption of the constitution. Both of these events took place in 1979. These very important occasions are celebrated with parades, public speeches, and processions.

❁ FISHERMAN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 4

With its 29 coral atolls, spanning an area of 750,000 square miles across the tropical Pacific Ocean, the Marshall Islands may well be considered a fishermen's heaven. More than 1,000 species of fish (860 inshore/reef, 7 freshwater/brackish, 67 open water, and 125 deep sea fish) provide a unique opportunity for angling and large-scale fishing within the lagoons and on the reefs, as well as in the vast ocean waters. It is easy to understand why this country became the venue for this annual event, which includes two days of fishing and attracts participants from even neighboring Pacific Island countries. All public and government offices are closed on this day.

❁ RIJERBAL DAY (WORKER'S DAY)

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Friday in September

Reflecting the Marshall Islands' history of U.S. administration, Riberjal, or Worker's Day, occurs in early September to honor the contributions of the society's workers, called riberjal in the Marshall Islands.

Marshallese commemorate the day with public speeches, processions, and other activities.

See also Volume III: LABOR DAY

❁ MANIT DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 24

Manit Day, or Customs Day, has been set aside by the Marshallese to celebrate their rich heritage of cultural traditions and customs (manit). This official holiday upholds, showcases, and promotes the culture of the Marshall Islands among the indigenous peoples as well as to the entire world. All the public schools participate and set up booths at the Alele Museum (a cultural museum) to sell handicrafts, food, and other local products.

❁ PRESIDENT'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 17

This day commemorates the birthday of Amata Kabua, who was elected the first president of the Republic of the Marshall Islands in 1979. Subsequently, he occupied the post of president for four consecutive terms, having been elected in 1983 and reelected in 1987, 1991, and 1996. On this day Marshall Islanders recollect the significant contributions of President Kabua to the nation and pay homage to him.

❁ THANKSGIVING

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Last Thursday in November

Because the Marshall Islands was under U.S. administration for a considerable period of time, the country adopted the practice of celebrating the U.S. Thanksgiving holiday, which is known locally as Kamolol Day. As in the United States, the festival is observed with church services, family reunions, and a customary turkey dinner.

❁ GOSPEL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Friday in December

When Protestant missionaries from southern denominations of the United States brought Christian doctrine to the Marshall Islands, they also introduced the joyful, celebratory style of Gospel music. Perhaps because it is a physically active kind of religious music, the indigenous people readily adopted it along with Christianity. This happy meeting of different cultures is celebrated annually on the islands on the first Friday in December.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Black Friday, Holy Friday, or Mourning Friday, commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus. Good Friday is a day of mourning in memory of Jesus' Crucifixion, even though it contains within it the miracle of the Resurrection, and some churches are darkened to symbolize this sad event. This Christian festival has been in the Roman Catholic liturgical calendar even longer than Easter, but many Protestant churches also hold special services from noon until three in the afternoon on this day to symbolize Jesus' last hours on the Cross. Many of the faithful fast on this day; at any meals served fish is preferred over meat.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians, Easter is the most important holiday of the year, and the numerous celebrations and observances associated with it—Fat (or Shrove) Tuesday, Ash Wednesday, Lent, Palm Sunday, Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, Holy Saturday, Pentecost, and Ascension Day—form the core of the liturgical year. It begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere).

This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. The agonizing and gory Crucifixion of Jesus took place on what is now called Good Friday. In the early morning of the third day after the Crucifixion, which happened to be Sunday, some of Jesus' disciples went to the cave (tomb) where the body had been laid. They were astonished to find that the heavy rock that had covered the mouth of the tomb was moved and the body had vanished. They learned that Jesus had been resurrected, or raised from his dead. Grief turned into celebration following this amazing occurrence, and Easter is a joyful Christian holiday.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe to be the Son of God. Christmas has been celebrated in the Marshall Islands since the 1850s, when the first U.S. Protestant missionaries arrived and gradually converted the majority of the natives. This festival is the most eagerly awaited holiday in the Marshall Islands.

The Christmas season in the Marshall Islands is celebrated by lively music and foot-stomping dances, as well as such traditional activities as religious services, carol singing, exchanging gifts, tree-trimming (for better and more effective illumination on this festive occasion), family gatherings, and a general spirit of goodwill.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

One of the significant family events among the Marshallese is the kemem, or the first birthday of a child. On this occasion the relatives and family friends of the child's parents come together to celebrate with eating and singing.

✿ COMING OF AGE

Prior to the advent of missionaries to these islands, tattooing was a highly popular and common practice among the Marshallese. It was an integral part of the rite of passage to man- or womanhood. Considered the sole attribute to be carried to the grave, it also served to confirm ties of family and birth. Facial tattooing was practiced, but this was not part of the coming-of-age rituals. It was done to conceal the onset of wrinkles and was the sole prerogative of the chiefs of the various clans.

✿ DEATH

The pre-Christian mythology of the Micronesian peoples who settled the Marshall Islands apparently took for granted that the gods intended for humans to be mortal. There is no single heroic cultural figure who attempts to steal the secret of immortality for human beings. The souls of the dead must travel north or west to a "leaping place" that sends them to an island of the dead, or into the heavens, or underground. Among some Marshall Islanders it is believed that the dead have to swim a channel to the island of Nako, where the spirit food is everlasting. But not every spirit reaches Nako:

Those that are made heavy by their many sins sink instead.

Funerals on the Marshall Islands comprise the ilomij, or wake, the kallib, or burial, and the araek, or feast—held six days later.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

When Columbus (1451–1506) discovered the island of Martinique in 1502, it was inhabited by the Carib Indians, who called it Madinina, or the Island of Flowers. More than a century after Columbus's voyage, the first party of French settlers, led by Pierre Belain d'Esnambuc (1585–1636), landed on the northwestern side of this island in 1635. They built a small fort in 1635 and established a settlement that became the island's first capital city Saint Pierre. The primary purpose of the colony was to produce sugar using slave labor. The indigenous Caribs were expelled from the island and forbidden to return in 1660.

Between 1794 and 1815 the British also attempted to establish their control over the island. This period witnessed a continuous shuffling of power between Britain and France until 1802, when the Treaty of Amiens handed Martinique back to France. Finally in 1848, slavery was officially abolished for good.

In 1946 Martinique became an overseas department (state) of France. In 1958 when they were given the choice between independence and integrating with France, they opted for the latter. French currency, stamps, and the French flag are used in Martinique. Its administrative and political structures have been identical to those of the other French departments since 1946. It was granted the status of a region in 1974. Fort de France is the administrative and commercial capital of the island.

❧ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The climate of Martinique is tropical and largely humid, though trade winds moderate the humidity. The rainy season lasts from June to October. The entire island is vulnerable to devastating hurricanes that occur approximately every eight years. The island's average temperature remains around 79°F. The terrain is dominated by Mount Pelée, a volcano that last erupted on May 8, 1902, completely destroying the city of Saint Pierre and killing 30,000 inhabitants.

ECONOMY

The economy of Martinique is based on sugarcane, bananas, tourism, and light industry. Sugar production is in decline, with most of the sugarcane now being used for the production of rum. Banana exports are increasing, with France as the principal market. The bulk of meat, vegetables, and grain required for the local population has to be imported, contributing to a chronic trade deficit that requires considerable monetary aid from France to counterbalance it. Tourism, which employs more than 11,000 people, has become more important than agricultural exports as a source of foreign exchange.

Fun Fact

Josephine, the wife of Napoleon Bonaparte, was born on Martinique.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Martinique is a young society formed with contributions from a variety of social groups: Caribbean, West African, French, and East Indian (mainly Tamil). While French remains the official language, Creole is the everyday language used by the people. Such a bilingual society, in which the vernacular tongue remains in active use without an official status, has encouraged the emergence of a parallel culture based on oral tradition. The use of Creole, notably in public contexts, has become an important symbol of identity for the people of Martinique, culturally differentiating them from France.

The island's population of approximately 432,000 is comprised largely of the descendants of West African slaves and their métissages (mixed-race descendants, mainly with the French and later with the Tamils). Like other Creole areas, the island is markedly multicultural, and its musical practices are complex and drawn from multiple sources, old and new. Martinique is famous for the musical style called zouk, which became popular in the 1980s.

CUISINE

Martinique's cuisine reflects its many cultures. The local Creole specialties combine the finesse of French cuisine with the spices of African cooking and the flavors of East Indian and Southeast Asian recipes. Fresh seafood appears on most menus.

Skeet Shoots

A round of skeet consists of 25 shots fired at clay targets thrown from either a high house to the left or a low house to the right. Normally five shooters compete at one time and shoot alternatively from eight different positions (stations). Each shooter aims first at a target falling from the high house, then at one thrown from the low house.

Some specialties include shellfish, smoked fish, stuffed land crabs, stewed conch, and curry dishes. The meals are preceded by local rum drinks and accompanied by imported French wines. Le déjeuner, or lunch, is often the main meal of the day.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

In Martinique New Year's Day is celebrated with family reunions and festivities centered on the home. The first day of the new year is considered an ideal time to reflect on abandoning bad habits and changing one's life for the better. The New Year's buoyant mood is ushered in by the festivities on New Year's Eve. On December 31 families throughout the island take part in traditional midnight suppers, dancing, and putting up decorations. Parties are also held in hotels and restaurants. Cultural events, such as arts and crafts exhibitions, concerts, and dance performances, are a part of the celebrations held across the island. People greet each other with good wishes for the coming year and exchange gifts.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, is celebrated throughout much of the world to honor and recognize the contributions of workers to economic development and progress. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL) demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Martinique the day features parades, skeet shoots, which are organized throughout the island. Boat races are also popular on this day.

BASTILLE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 14

On July 14 the people of Martinique celebrate Bastille Day, which commemorates the end of the French monarchy and the start of the French Revolution. Bastille Day is the most important French holiday; because of its close ties to France, Martinique also observes the holiday. Most people on the island celebrate on both July 13 and 14. On this joyous occasion people enthusiastically take part in balls held at various places. There are also fireworks displays, parades, and concerts.

❁ ARMISTICE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 11

Armistice Day, also known as Remembrance Day or Veteran's Day, commemorates the official end of World War I on November 11, 1918. On this day the people of Martinique observe a minute of silence at 11:00 A.M. as a mark of respect.

Veterans' organizations sponsor parades to honor the soldiers who died during this and subsequent wars.

Religious Holidays

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, also called La Fête des Rois or the Festival of Kings, celebrates the visit paid by the Three Wise Men (the three kings of the East—Balthazar, Gaspar, and Melchior), to the infant Jesus at Bethlehem. The event was believed to have occurred on January 6, though there is no mention of a specific date in the Scriptures. As in France the traditional dishes served at dinner on this day in Martinique include a cake known as galette des rois (the cake of the kings). These cakes start appearing in the island's bakeries and stores immediately after Christmas. A lucky charm (une fève), traditionally a bean, is baked into the cake. Whoever finds the charm in their slice of cake becomes the king or queen and gets to wear a paper crown. The king or queen then has to choose his queen or her king by dropping the lucky charm into the glass of the person they choose.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February

In Martinique Carnival is both a religious and a public holiday. The official beginning of Carnival is Samedi Gras (Fat Saturday, preceding Fat Tuesday, or Mardi Gras), when people attend parties and dance all night. King Vaval, a giant mannequin, is the king of Carnival and is featured, along with beautiful floats and revelers, in the big parade on Dimanche Gras (Fat Sunday). Lundi Gras (Fat Monday) is the day of the red devils. On this day everyone wears red devil costumes adorned with shimmering silver and glittering embellishments.

❁ ASH WEDNESDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: First day of Lent

Ash Wednesday, also called Day of the She-Devils in Martinique, is the first day of Lent. The name originated from the age-old custom, practiced by the Catholic faithful, of smearing the forehead with ash in the shape of a cross. In Martinique it is considered a time for prayers as well as celebrations. Drinking of locally brewed rum, reputedly among the world's best, is common on this day. People customarily dress in black and white, and revelers mourn the end of the Carnival season.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also known as Holy Friday, Mourning Friday, Great Friday (in the Eastern Orthodox Churches), and Vendredi Saint in Martinique, is a solemn observance that recalls Jesus' agony and death on the Cross. In Martinique on this occasion, Christians remember the original events of this day with public reading of the Psalms and Gospels, and with singing hymns about Jesus' death. Religious processions are also held on this occasion.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, also called Dimanche de Pâques ("Easter Sunday") in Martinique, celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus on the third day after his Crucifixion. Easter is both a solemn and a joyous occasion. In Martinique prayer services and worship begin before daybreak. These early services symbolize the empty tomb that was found in the morning of the day of Resurrection and of Jesus' arrival in Jerusalem before sunrise on the same day. Parades and get-togethers are held to mark the special day across the island. Martiniquais prepare a special dish, matoutou of crab (rice mixed with crab), on Easter Sunday.

Fun Fact

The armistice that ended World War I was signed at 11 a.m. on the 11th day of the 11 month.

Martinique is one of three countries in the world where Carnival does not end on, or before, Ash Wednesday. In fact it ends in the early morning hours after Ash Wednesday.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: November 1

In Martinique on All Saints' Day (La Toussaint in French), the faithful honor and recognize the patron saints of all the villages on the island. Masses are held in every cemetery, and the graves are illuminated with candles in the evening.

Observed on: November 2

On All Souls' Day, also known as Defunct's Day in Martinique, the people remember the souls of their ancestors and loved ones, and they clean and decorate the graves and tombs of their relatives in the local cemeteries. Special prayer services for the dead, especially those who may be in purgatory, are also held on this occasion.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

On Martinique Christmas celebrations commence on Christmas Eve (December 24). Catholics attend a Midnight Mass and then return home to le réveillon (a very late supper), which consists of warm pâtés, boudin creole (spicy black pudding), and pork stew, accompanied by fine rum drinks. Singing and dancing are also important parts of the festivities.

People in Martinique celebrate Christmas day mainly in the company of family and friends. They decorate their homes with garlands and Christmas trees. In Martinique the Christmas tree is called fil à eau. Because pine trees do not grow on Martinique, they are imported. Crèches (Nativity scenes) are made to symbolize the birth of Jesus. In the evening people gather for chantes noëls, singing Christmas songs all night long. At midnight people drink champagne and open gifts.

The Gommier Race, also known as the Fête du Gommier, is a popular event held annually in the region of Sainte Luce in Martinique. The local fishermen enter their newly made gommiers ("fishing boats") in intensely competitive races. Dance and music competitions are also held on this occasion.

❁ MARRIAGE

For weddings in Martinique white is the predominant color—whether flowers, dresses, or decorations are being considered. On the wedding day the groom meets the bride at her home and accompanies her to the church in a procession. After the ceremony the couple head for their reception. Laurel leaves are scattered on the path outside the church for the couple to tread on. At the reception the newlyweds raise a toast, using a special two-handled cup called the coupe de mariage, which is passed from generation to generation.

After the reception close friends of the couple tease them and play pranks by banging pots and pans and singing loudly outside the nuptial chamber. It is customary for the groom to invite the pranksters in for refreshments.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

It is believed that the Bafours (ancestors of the famed Soninke tribe) were the original inhabitants of Mauritania. They were also the first Saharan tribe to forsake their nomadic lifestyle in favor of settling down and practicing agriculture. Between the third and the seventh centuries, the nomadic Berber tribes of North Africa migrated to Mauritania and displaced the Bafours.

The Berbers established their own empire in the northern part of the region, and the Arab-Berber territories spread across the Mediterranean into Portugal and Spain. Meanwhile, however, the Bafours also gradually grew in numbers, and by the 11th century they had established the powerful Soninke Empire in Ghana. The empire's territories included the present-day Mauritania, Senegal, and Mali.

In 1076 Islamic warrior monks (Almoravid, or Al Murabitun) launched an offensive against the empire of Ghana and quickly brought the region under Islamic domination. During the next 500 years, the Muslims struggled against pockets of resistance by local Berber and non-Berber tribes. Ultimately, the Islamic armies proved superior to the Berbers and, after the Mauritanian Thirty Years' War (1644–74), the regime of the Yemeni Maqil Arabs, led by the Beni Hassan tribe, was successful in silencing all voices of dissent in the region.

Descendants of the Beni Hassan warriors formed the upper strata of Moorish society. Moors, or Maures, as this North African ethnic group is referred to, are medieval Muslims who lived in Al-Andalus (the Arabic name for the Iberian Peninsula) and the Maghrib (a region in North Africa).

In the territory of modern-day Mauritania, society was divided into nobility and servant classes. The three main groups were the White Moors (the nobility), the Kewri (the indigenous people, who were never enslaved), and black Moors or Haratins (the ones who were formerly enslaved). The Arab-Berbers tried to maintain their dominance by producing the largest number of marabouts, or religious leaders who preserve and teach Islam. Hassaniya, an Arabic dialect Mauritania was named after the ancient kingdom of the Berbers, Mauretania.

French influence in the coastal region of Mauritania began in 1814. However, the Moorish factions did not allow the French to establish dominance over the country until 1904. The French and Moors fought several battles for Mauritania and, in the end, the French army was successful in defeating its opponents. French rule in the region was relatively benign, since Mauritania did not have anything substantial (gold, minerals, or slaves) to offer to the colonizers. A major part of the population led a nomadic lifestyle under colonial rule.

After World War II the voices of dissent and a demand for independence that were common in most African colonies were less violent than in other countries. Nevertheless, when France began granting independent status to its colonies in the region, it extended that opportunity to Mauritania as well.

On November 28, 1960, the French government ended its rule, and the Islamic Republic of Mauritania came into existence. Moktar Ould Daddah (1924–2003) was sworn in as the first president of Mauritania. Members of previously displaced indigenous tribes (including the Soninke) who had been educated in France, returned to Mauritania to take the most coveted jobs in the country.

The Moors were disturbed by the return of the indigenous people and tried to introduce Arab influence in every aspect of Mauritanian life. They sought to portray Mauritania as an Islamic state, a concept that did not find favor with the indigenous tribes. This led to growing tensions and violent skirmishes, which eventually escalated into full-fledged fighting in April 1989. At the behest of the government and members of both communities, a political dialogue was initiated. The two factions sought to resolve their disputes peacefully and amicably, and the violence subsided. But in the early years of the 21st century, ethnic tensions between the black minority and the Maures (Arab-Berber) were still strong.

After leading a coup in 1984, which resulted in the ouster of then-President Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidallah (b. 1940), Maaouya Ould SidAhmed Taya (b. 1941) assumed power. Another coup was instigated in July 2003, this time against President Taya; but Islamic clerics were imprisoned in the wake of the U.S.-led Iraq War, and the coup was unsuccessful.

 GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

While a major part of Mauritania (60 percent) is covered by desert, with many areas featuring prominent shifting sand dunes, the verdant region includes grazing land in the north and a fertile region in the Senegal River Valley to the south. Thus a major part of the population is concentrated in the northwestern cities of Nouakchott and Nouadhibou and along the Senegal River Valley.

The Senegal River is Mauritania's most important natural feature, providing water to the region through its tributaries: the Karakoro, Gorgol, and Faleme. The Ras Nouadhibou Peninsula (formerly known as Cap Blanc) forms the Dakhlet Nouadhibou (formerly known as Levrier Bay) to the east, which is the largest natural harbor in West Africa. The peninsula is 31 miles long and 8 miles wide. Cape Timiris is the only promontory (cape) in Mauritania and is 23 feet high.

Mauritania has an extremely hot, dry climate. From June to October, the hottest season, the temperature reaches 104°F. November is pleasant, with daytime temperatures reaching a high of 86°F, while at night the temperature can dip down to 55°F. The sirocco, a strong southeasterly dry and dust-laden wind, blows across the desert areas of Mauritania.

 ECONOMY

The export of iron ore is the driving force of the Mauritanian economy since it constitutes 40 percent of total exports. However, agriculture and animal husbandry are the main occupations of more than 50 percent of the population of Mauritania and also make important contributions to the nation's gross domestic product (GDP). Dates, millet, corn, sorghum, and rice are the main crops.

Mauritania's economy suffered a major setback when the country witnessed a series of droughts in the early 1980s, and the country has been faced with a mounting foreign debt ever since. Mauritania qualified for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative. Mauritania has also received generous donations and financial support from nations around the world.

Exploration activities have resulted in the discovery of oil exploratory tracts almost 50 miles offshore and have paved the way for foreign investment in the country. In the meantime, the Mauritanian government is working with the International Monetary Fund to formulate an effective fiscal policy that will help revive the country's economy.

 CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Citizens of an Islamic republic, Mauritians are nearly all Sunni Muslims. As established by the Constitutional Charter of 1985, Islam is the state religion, and the laws of the land are governed by sharia (traditional Islamic law) in combination with French civil law, a legacy of Mauritania's colonial past. The residents observe the Mailiki rite, which is one of the four schools of law or fiqh within Sunni Islam. It is the second largest school of law followed and is practiced by 25 percent of Sunni Muslims in different parts of West and North Africa.

There are three main ethnic groups in Mauritania: Mixed Moors and Black Moors, who constitute 40 percent of the country's population; White Moors, who account for 30 percent; and Black Africans, who constitute 30 percent of the country's population. Religion is the unifying factor between the Moors and Black Africans.

Although Mauritians have traditionally lived as nomads, the series of droughts that plagued the country in the 1980s and continuous desertification of the region have severely affected these people, and many of them have given up their nomadic lifestyle in favor of a more settled and stable life in the cities and larger towns of Mauritania.

Arabic is the official language of the Republic of Mauritania, while Wolof is its national language. Other native languages, such as Soninke, Pulaar, and Hassaniya, are also widely spoken.

Lineage plays an important role in traditional Mauritanian society. Like most African countries, Mauritania follows patrilineage, which traces descent through male ancestors. Elders meet frequently to discuss lineage concerns, ways to preserve the group, defining the rules of etiquette, and finding amicable ways for resolving disputes within the lineage. Lineage exerts an incredible influence in the day-to-day life of Mauritians. It provides the individual's identity and governs every aspect of his or her life, including birth, marriage, and death. Every lineage has its own set of rules and regulations, which are scrupulously adhered to by its members.

Marriages between members of the same lineage are given preference in Mauritanian society. Polygamy is the norm, and the laws of divorce favor men.

Some rural Mauritanian families from the Pulaar, Wolof, and related tribes send their sons to work, study, and live with a marabout (religious master). They do so knowing that their sons will spend a large amount of time begging to pay for their education. Talibes, as these boys are locally known, sometimes beg in the streets for up to 12 or more hours a day. While most marabouts do provide comprehensive Koranic instruction to their charges, others do little more than run networks of child beggars.

Mauritania has a rich musical heritage in which musical instruments such as the tidnit (a four-stringed lute) and ardin, or harp, figure prominently. These instruments accompany the wailing voice of a singer, which forms the crux of a traditional musical performance. The elite Moors are patrons of entertainers, poets, musicians, and singers since patronizing these artists is a status symbol in Mauritanian society.

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Relief

The Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Debt Relief is a landmark initiative that was endorsed by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 1996. This debt-relief is aimed at reducing the external debts faced by the poorest and most heavily indebted countries around the world. It is seen as an important means of reducing poverty in extremely poor countries. In the absence of this initiative these countries would probably not be able to break out of the vicious cycle of poverty in which they are trapped. This initiative has the support of all nations in the world, most of whom encourage the World Bank and IMF to provide financial aid to these debt-ridden nations.

CUISINE

Some of the favorite local dishes include mechoui (roasted lamb), spiced fish, rice, and dates. Rice is also eaten along with fish balls, dried fish, dried meat, vegetables, and couscous.

Because Mauritania is an Islamic nation, the consumption of alcohol is strictly forbidden in line with Koranic doctrine. Instead, zrig, or camel's milk, is a favorite beverage, along with the traditional Arab tea.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (or Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout much of the world. It is a national holiday in Mauritania, and all government offices and private and public institutions are closed. Private parties and social gatherings are held on New Year's Eve and New Year's Day but are kept simple as is appropriate for an Islamic nation.

Traditional Arab Tea

Arabs have a tradition of drinking mint-flavored tea. The tea-drinking process is divided into three phases and spans more than an hour. In every phase a traditional glass of tea is offered, and as each phase progresses the tea becomes stronger and sweeter. Every sip is relished as people discuss domestic and international issues over cups of tea.

Fun Fact

The Islamic Republic of Mauritania is the only country in West Africa governed by people with a nomadic heritage.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, originated with the Socialist Second International. In 1889 it set the date for an international observance in 1890 to coincide with a general strike in the United States organized by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to win the eight-day workday. The United States made efforts to discourage the May 1 commemoration because of the radical socialist connotations, and so it celebrates Labor Day in September.

In Mauritania Labor Day is a national holiday, and marches and union demonstrations are a part of the celebrations. Speeches by union leaders, who reflect on the achievements of the workforce and take this opportunity to voice their grievances, are the major highlights of Labor Day.

AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 25

Africa Day, also called Organization of African Unity (OAU) Day, commemorates the historic decision of 32 African nations announced on May 25, 1963, to coordinate their efforts to unite the continent.

The idea of forming a unified African organization was conceived by the president of the independent state of Ghana Kwame Nkrumah (1909–72) and the emperor of Ethiopia Haile Selassie (1892–1975). In the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa, 32 countries of the African continent came together in 1963 to form the Organization of African Unity (OAU). This day marks the commitment of African nations to foster a spirit of camaraderie and to work together for the overall development of the continent.

As of the early years of the 21st century, there were 53 member nations in the OAU. The OAU promotes peace, human rights, and unity among all African nations. It has been instrumental in ending colonial rule in Africa and has also played a key role in resolving regional disputes and internal conflicts in Africa.

Africa Day is a national holiday in Mauritania. Special conferences and seminars are organized in different parts of the country, where problems faced by Mauritania and the entire continent of Africa are discussed.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 28

On November 28, 1960, the Republic of Mauritania was granted independence by its French rulers. The region had come under French control in 1904 and was governed by the French until 1960. Each year Mauritania celebrates their independence on November 28. The president of the country presides over the Independence Day celebrations, which are marked by an official parade led by the armed forces of the nation, followed by official speeches and cultural activities such as traditional dance and song performances. All government offices and public and private institutions are closed on November 28.

Religious Holidays

EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The first month of the Islamic calendar is Muharram, and El am Hejir is observed on the first day of that month. It is believed that on this day in 622, the prophet Muhammad fled from Mecca to Medina and formed the first Islamic state there. For this reason the Islamic calendar began in that year, and this day is celebrated as the start of the new year. Muslims refer to their calendar as the Hegira (or Hijrah, meaning “emigration”) calendar, since it began with the prophet’s emigration to Medina. The first day of the year is celebrated in a low-key manner in the Muslim world.

MOULOU

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud, which commemorates the birthday of the prophet Muhammad, falls in the third month of the Islamic year. Muslims believe that Muhammad was chosen by Allah to be his messenger and reveal God’s message to the world. This is stated in the Koran, the holy book of the Muslims, which was revealed to Muhammad by God.

Mouloud, or Mawlid al-Nabi, is the most important festival for Muslims in Mauritania. It is celebrated by offering prayers to Allah and the prophet as well as by discussing Muhammad’s life and teachings. The prophet’s life and his unwavering faith in Allah are sources of inspiration for the entire Muslim community. Mauritania is enveloped in a festive air during Mouloud. People greet each other warmly on this day, and a special meal is prepared in every Muslim household in honor of Islam’s great prophet.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

For Muslims the month of Ramadan is holy, and they observe a dawn-to-dusk daily fast for the entire month. Consumption of water and food is prohibited, as is sexual intercourse, during the daylight hours. Eid al-Fitr, also called Korite and the Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of the month of Ramadan, and fasting on this day is strictly forbidden by the Koran. On this day Muslims wake up early, put on new clothes, and offer prayers at mosques along with their friends and relatives. They also share special meals prepared for the occasion. A festive spirit prevails in Mauritania as people exchange gifts and greetings.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called Tabaski, the Festival of Sacrifice, and Festival of Sheep in Mauritania, is an Islamic holy festival that commemorates Ibrahim's (Abraham's) readiness to sacrifice his own son at God's command. As a Muslim country Mauritania holds Islamic principles in the highest regard, and the preparations for Eid al-Adha begin a week in advance. People buy new clothes, and goats are fattened for the ritual sacrifice.

On Tabaski Mauritians get up early in the morning and wear new clothes. They go to their local mosques with their friends and family and offer prayers to the Almighty, thanking him for his benevolence. Abraham's selfless sacrifice is remembered, and the Muslim clerics remind all the faithful to follow his example. Goats or sheep are sacrificed all over the country, and their meat is the highlight of the lavish feast that is an integral part of Eid al-Adha festivities.

Tabaski celebrations can last from two to 10 days in Mauritania. Also the holy pilgrimage, or hajj, takes place this month. Each Muslim is directed by the Koran to undertake this journey at least once in his or her lifetime if it is physically and financially possible.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Mauritania the birth of a child is greeted with great joy and calls for a big celebration. After the birth two rituals are performed: the naming ceremony, and the shaving of the baby's head. In Muslim families, the child's father whispers "Allah is great!" in the child's right ear during the naming ceremony. This is because Muslims want their children to hear Allah's name before they hear anything else. Then a Muslim name is given to the child.

During the tonsuring ceremony, the hair of the newborn child is shaved, and a goat is sacrificed in the name of Allah. Then the infant's hair is buried along with the bones of the sacrificial goat.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male and female circumcisions hold a central place in Mauritanian society. Circumcision is considered an important ritual, since Mauritians believe that the transition from childhood to adulthood is complete only after the circumcision ritual is performed. It is considered a matter of pride and great honor and is endorsed by the family members of the initiates.

❁ MARRIAGE

The laws of Islam govern marriages in Mauritania. The couple should belong to the same clan; marriages within the same lineage are the norm. (Islamic tradition gives first preference to marriages within the same lineage and then to marriages on one's social level.) In line with Islamic custom, marriage between first cousins is encouraged, but there is also a list of relatives with whom intermarriage is forbidden. The free consent of the couple is a prerequisite for Islamic marriage. Polygamy is an accepted practice in Mauritania.

As in most African societies a bride-price is negotiated prior to the actual ceremony. Among the Fulbe, a marriage can be consummated only after the payment of the bride-price. However, marriage is not legalized until the birth of a child, underscoring the extreme importance of procreation in Mauritania.

Force-Feeding of Girls in Mauritania

Mauritania is one of the few African nations where girls get more food than boys. Obesity is revered among the White Moors of Mauritania, because obesity is linked with wealth and prosperity. The fatter the person, the more affluent he or she is. A fat wife is traditionally looked upon as a sign of wealth. Girls who are thin are looked down upon as poor and are not respected in the society. Force-feeding is an accepted norm in White Moorish society.

Starting in childhood, children in general and girls in particular, are force-fed to attain a particular weight. Girls are forced to eat dates, sweets, and other fattening food to make them fatter.

❁ DEATH

The laws of Islam govern every aspect of life among Muslims in Mauritania. The Koran stipulates that, when devout Muslims are dying, their faces should be turned in the direction of the holy city of Mecca, and they should be encouraged by those present to recite the holy shabada. If anyone is unable to recite it, someone else can recite it for the sick person. After an individual has passed away, incense sticks are burned to help keep his or her spirit at bay. Then the Muslim cleric performs the ritual cleansing of the corpse with perfumed water.

In accordance with the laws of Islam, the body is buried before sunset and as soon following death as possible. Mourning is considered essential since it is a mark of respect for the deceased. Loud wailing and wild gesticulation are part of mourning for the dead, and this continues for days after burial. Depending on the region widows have to abide by a defined mourning period, during which they eat only enough to maintain themselves and cease all other activity.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Arab seafarers from the 10th century, perhaps earlier, probably knew about Mauritius. The Portuguese visited early in the 16th century but did not settle on the island. The Dutch took possession of the island from 1598 to 1710. They called it Mauritius, after Prince Maurice of Nassau (1567–1625). After the Dutch left, the island was taken over by pirates. In 1721 the French East India Company occupied Mauritius and renamed it Île de France. Then in 1810 the British took control of the island. While French influence remained in the island's customs, laws, and language, the Dutch name "Mauritius" was restored.

Mauritius was a slave society; indeed slave revolts played a role in undermining Dutch control of the island, explaining (at least in part) their departure. Slavery was abolished by the British in 1835, though forms of indentured servitude continued.

Since its independence in 1968, Mauritius has been a stable democracy with regular free elections and a good human rights record, factors attracting considerable foreign investment. In 1992 the country became a republic within the British Commonwealth. Because of its stability the citizens of Mauritius earn one of Africa's highest per capita incomes.

Mauritius is one of the most densely populated countries of the world, and almost a third of the population is under 15 years of age.

❧ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The island nation of Mauritius, together with Réunion and Rodrigues, is part of the Mascarene Islands, lying about 500 miles east of Madagascar in the Indian Ocean. The Mascarene archipelago, of which Mauritius is a part, was formed 8 to 10 million years ago, after a series of undersea volcanic eruptions caused by the drift of the African tectonic plate over the Réunion hotspot. The volcanoes are no longer active. The highest peak in the region is Pitón de la Rivière Noire (2,717 feet). In northern Mauritius a plain forms a plateau ranging in height from 900 to 2,400 feet above sea level. The island has two major rivers: Grand River South East and Grand River North West. These rivers are major sources of hydroelectric power. Mauritius's capital and largest city is Port Louis. Rose Hill, Curepipe, Quatre Bornes, and Vacoas are other important towns.

The climate of the island is tropical. Winters (from May to November) are dry and warm; summers (from November

Fun Fact

When Mark Twain visited the island country in 1897, he declared, “God created Mauritius first and then paradise was copied after it.”

to May) are hot, wet, and humid. Cyclones normally hit the country between November and April. Mean temperatures vary from 74°F at sea level to 67°F on the plateau. Annual rainfall varies from 35 inches on the west coast to 60 inches on the southeast coast and about 200 inches on the central plateau. Sugarcane is the main crop.

The local fauna include samber (a long-tailed, dark brown deer), tenrec (a spiny mammalian insectivore), and the mongoose, as well as a variety of birds and insects. When Mauritius was discovered by Europeans, it was home to a previously unknown species of bird. Going by its dull appearance, the Portuguese named the bird “dodo,” which means “simpleton.” Weighing up to 50 pounds, the dodo was a welcome source of fresh meat for the sailors, who killed the bird in large numbers. The Dutch became infamous for eating all the dodos (down to the last bird!), and by 1681 the entire population of dodos was gone.

ECONOMY

Fun Fact

In 1847 Mauritius became the fifth country in the world to issue postage stamps. Two of the world’s rarest and most expensive stamps—the Red Penny and the Blue Penny—are Mauritian.

At the time of its independence in 1968, Mauritius depended mainly on what was a poor agriculture-based economy. However it has since developed an increasingly robust economy with burgeoning industries and a booming tourism sector. The agricultural sector, which employs one-sixth of Mauritius’ workforce, accounts for one-eighth of the country’s gross domestic product (GDP). Sugarcane accounts for 25 percent of the total export earnings. Imported petroleum is used to generate power.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Mauritius’s mixed colonial past is reflected in its culture. Sega (pronounced say-gah) is perhaps Mauritius’s richest contribution to the world of music. The sega, a dance invented by the Mauritians, is of African origin and has become synonymous with high spirits.

Architecture

Mauritius’s local architecture, reflecting its European colonial past, has been finely adapted to suit the sunny, humid climate. The traditional Créole houses have sharp roofs, balconies with geometric glass panes, metal handrails, and a painted canopy on the roof.

The instruments that accompany traditional sega are the ravanne (a small circular drum), the maravanne (a rattle made of bamboo and sugarcane stems), and the triangle. The sega is performed by shuffling one’s feet back and forth, just as the African slaves performed it on the sandy beaches at the end of a hard working day. The rest of the body supplies the real zest and emotive movement and when danced with passion, the sega is genuinely erotic. It is similar to the Caribbean calypso and the Latin American salsa, and all three dances have the same African roots. Sega parties are regularly organized at the larger hotels and are usually well-choreographed productions. Nowadays, however, the musical accompaniment is often played with modern instruments. Although this dance has been influenced by contemporary music, sega remains distinctly Mauritian, with its characteristic foot-rubbing, hip swaying, and Créole lyrics. There are now several versions of the dance form on Mauritius.

The two official languages of Mauritius are English and French. The latter is still the more widely spoken, but English is used as the lingua franca. Mauritius has also developed a unique patois, the French-based Créole language that incorporates elements borrowed from English, Portuguese, and Hindi. Since the late 1960s, a written Créole language has been evolving. It does not resemble French and has been exclusively an oral tradition until recent attempts to codify it. Hindi and Urdu are among the several other South Asian languages spoken.

Among contemporary Créole writers, René Asgarally and Ramesh Ramdoyal are perhaps the best known. Mark Twain (1835–1910) and Joseph Conrad (1857–1924) visited the island and wrote about their experiences in the 19th century. Charles Baudelaire’s (1821–67) very first poem, “À une Dame Créole” (“To a Créole Woman”), was written in the Mauritian town of Pamplemousses.

CUISINE

The eating habits of the Mauritians reflect the ethnic diversity of its people. Créole rougailles, Indian curries, Muslim biryanis, Chinese sweet-and-sour pork, French delicacies, English bacon and eggs—you name it; Mauritians have it, and they eat it. The basic ingredients of Créole cuisine are tomatoes (known as pommes d’amour, or “love apples” in French), onions, ginger, garlic, and chilies. Palm hearts and camarons (giant prawns), venison, and wild boar are favorite ingredients used in French cuisine on the island. Fresh fish and seafood are the main ingredients of Chinese cooking. The traditional blends of home-crushed spices are the sauce base for spicy Indian curries.

Lassi, a refreshing and healthy yogurt drink, and alouda, a syrupy brew of agar, milk, and flavorings, are the favorite local beverages. They are available everywhere—from street vendors to posh restaurants. Locally produced beer and rum are also abundantly available. They are strong and cheap. Wines, usually imported from France or South Africa, are expensive.

Observed on: January 1–2

The new year of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar is celebrated all over the world. The festivities generally begin on December 31, the last day of the Western calendar. In Mauritius, however, January 1 is celebrated as New Year's Eve, while January 2 is regarded as New Year's Day. Perhaps this difference from other countries can be attributed to differences in time zones. Whatever the day, the celebrations are both solemn and joyful because the end of one year and the beginning of another is a time for reflection and making changes in one's life. At the same time, the opportunity for starting again is something to be welcomed.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 12

After centuries of foreign rule—first by the Dutch, then the French, and later the British—Mauritius finally became independent on March 12, 1968, and Independence Day celebrates that event. The Mauritian constitution was based on the British parliamentary system, but the country officially changed its status to that of a republic on March 12, 1992. For this reason the holiday is also called Republic Day or National Day. The national ceremony is held at the Champ de Mars in Port Louis, where the prime minister delivers his message to the people of Mauritius, and members of the police force parade.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, is celebrated in many countries around the world to pay tribute to workers. The Labor Day observance has a tenuous American origin but is associated more prominently with international socialism. The first Labor Day occurred in 1890, established in 1889 by the Socialist Second International to coincide with an American Federation of Labor (AFL) general strike in the United States to win the eight-hour day. Thereafter, international Labor Day became more radical than the U.S. Labor Day observed in early September.

Mauritians observe Labor Day by participating in public meetings and seminars on current conditions and hopes for the future of workers. All businesses, government offices, and educational institutions remain closed.

❁ THAIPOOSAM CAVADEE

Observed by: Hindus
Observed on: January–February

Hindu Tamils (Hindu refugees from Sri Lanka) celebrate the major Thaipooosam Cavadee in January or February at temples all over the island. This observance is mainly an event to purify one's soul. Devotees conduct processions carrying flower-covered wooden arches (cavadees) and pots of purification milk. The faithful, having pierced and skewered their tongues and cheeks and bodies, walk in a trance, paying homage to Muruga, the second son of the god Shiva. They also walk barefoot over hot coals. The wooden arches are placed at the feet of the statue of Muruga. In spite of the scorching Sun and the long arduous walk, the milk should neither spill nor curdle. Around the same time, the resident Tamils mark the end of the harvest season by feeding rice pudding to decorated cows in the festival of Pongal.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, also called Pascha in many countries, is a celebratory Christian holiday. Easter is the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the Son of God, and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. Apart from its religious aspect, the Resurrection symbolizes the resurgence of hope and a renewal of life for all human beings. Christians on Mauritius attend special Easter church services and then spend the day with family and friends.

Chinese Origins

Sino-Mauritians are primarily of two groups—the Hakkas, who constitute the majority of the Chinese community of the island, and the Cantonese. Both groups practice Buddhism. These Sino-Mauritians attach a great deal of value to ancestral cultures and values and embrace traditional Chinese celebrations.

❁ ASHURA

Observed by: Shia Muslims and some Sunni Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

After the two eids, Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha, Ashura is the third most important Islamic festival. It falls on the tenth day of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic lunar calendar. The day marks the martyrdom of Hussein bin Ali (d. 680), Muhammad's grandson, and the third Shia imam, at the Battle of Karbala in 680 C.E. Ashura means "ten" in Arabic; the festival's name means "the tenth day." The Battle of Karbala was a watershed in the history of Islam because it was fought between Sunni and Shia Muslims over who was Muhammad's legitimate heir to the leadership of Islam.

This important Muslim festival is called Yamsey in Mauritius, where its celebration features figures and towers called gboons. These figures are carried in procession through the streets in commemoration of the death of the grandson of Islam's prophet.

❁ MAHA SHIVRATRI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Thirteenth or 14th of the dark half of Phalgun, 12th month of the Hindu calendar

Shiva is one of the gods in the Hindu trinity, comprised of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Shiva, or Mahesh, the destroyer and reproducer of life. Shivratri means "the great night of Shiva." Thus all the ceremonies take place chiefly at night. This is a festival observed in honor of Shiva, and it is believed that on this day Shiva was married to the Hindu goddess Parvati. Maha Shivratri, also called Shiv Chaturdashi, also marks the night when Shiva danced the tandav, a violent, furious dance. Shiva is the most sought-after deity among the Hindus. Devotees pray to him for his compassion and believe that he will grant them their wishes.

In Mauritius following an all-night vigil, faithful Hindus, clad in white, carry light wooden arches beautifully decorated with flowers, paper, and small mirrors, called the kanwar, in pilgrimage to Grand Bassin (the crater of an extinct volcano) in the Savanne district, to fetch holy water from the lake to be poured over a statue of Shiva. This ritual reenacts Shiva's need to have his throat cooled off after he drank poison from the sea in order to save humanity. Grand Bassin is regarded as holy by Hindus, and they take water from it to bless their local temples. Pujas, ritual worship with food, are observed that night in temples along the lake's banks, and devout Hindus place small lights on banana leaves, which they set afloat in the belief that their offerings will reach the Ganges River. This observance of Maha Shivratri is thought to be the largest celebration of its kind outside of India.

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: The full Moon day of Phalgun, the 12th month of the Hindu calendar

It is widely believed that Holi, also called Phagwa, marks the day when Bhakt Prahalad, a devotee of Vishnu, was saved from the demoness Holika. According to Hindu mythology there was a demon king in India called Hiranyakashipu, who wanted to punish Vishnu for killing his brother, also a demon. The arrogant king ordered everyone in his kingdom to worship him instead of God. But the king's young son Prahalad was a devotee of Vishnu. Going against his father's wishes, Prahalad constantly prayed to Vishnu. Unable to make Prahalad change his ways, the demon king decided to kill him. He asked his sister Holika (from whom the name of the festival is derived) to help him because she was supposedly impervious to fire. They planned to burn Prahalad to death, so Holika sat on a burning pyre with Prahalad on her lap. Yet Prahalad emerged unscathed by the flames and Holika, the demoness, was burned to death. The bonfire on the eve of the festival celebrates that event.

There is another legend, which says this day is marked to celebrate the slaying of Putana, the demoness, by Krishna, another Hindu god. Some link the festival with the worship of Kama, the Hindu god of pleasure and destiny.

This festival falls in the Hindu month of Phalgun and is the most colorful of the Hindu festivals. Essentially, it is a festival of revelry. Men and women spray colored water and smear everyone with colored powder. There is singing, dancing, and lots of music. It is a time for festive rejoicing. In the evenings, people visit each other's homes and exchange greetings.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: August 15

The Feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary on August 15 has a double focus: the departure of Mary from this life, and the assumption of her body into heaven. It is Mary's principal feast. On this day Catholic Mauritians bake and eat special Marie cakes. Traditionally, all Catholic women bearing the name of Mary, or a name derived from it, keep open house in her honor and welcome all who come on this day.

❁ GANESH CHATHURTHI

Observed by: Marathi Hindus

Observed on: Fourth of the month of Bhadrapada, the sixth month of the Hindu calendar

Ganesh was Shiva's younger son. He is worshipped by Hindus as the god of wisdom who can remove all obstacles. In Mauritius Hindus of Marathi origin celebrate Ganesh Chathurthi, the birthday of Ganesh.

❁ FATHER LAVAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 9

Father Jacques Desire Laval (known on Mauritius as Père Laval) died on September 9, 1864, and on the anniversary of his death pilgrims, irrespective of their faith, gather at the priest's grave in St. Croix, Port Louis, to honor him on Father Laval Day. Father Laval, born in France in 1803, qualified as a medical doctor before he became a priest. After arriving in Mauritius in 1841 he converted thousands of recently freed slaves to Catholicism. He became known as the Apostle of the Blacks. He is the national saint of Mauritius, a status recognized by the Vatican. He has become a symbol of compassion and love, and Mauritians attribute healing powers to this holy man. His grave is known as the Lourdes of the Indian Ocean because of its importance as a pilgrimage site.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians; also Hindus

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast that honors and remembers all Christian saints, both known and unknown. In Western Churches and especially among Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Anglicans, it is observed on November 1. The Orthodox Churches observe it on the first Sunday after Pentecost. The dead are honored on the following day, which is All Souls' Day. In Mauritius, Hindus too observe the holiday.

❁ GANGA ASNAN

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: In Karttika, the eighth month of the Hindu solar calendar

Ganga Asnan, observed during the month of Karttika (usually in November of the Western calendar) is the time when devout Hindus purify themselves by ceremonial bathing in the sea. They do this because they believe the holy water of the Ganges will be able to reach them through its waters. Special lifeguards work at the beaches of Albion, Belle Mare, Baie du Tombeau, Blue Bay, Flic-en-Flac, Mont Choisy, Perebere, Pointe aux Roches, Pointe aux Sables, and Tamarin in order to ensure the safety of bathers.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr marks the end of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting. This day is also called the Feast of Fast-Breaking because it marks the end of the month-long period when Muslims are required to observe a daily dawn-to-dusk fast. The Koran forbids fasting on this day. Though the date varies from year to year, it is always a public holiday.

Mauritian Muslims celebrate Eid al-Fitr with great enthusiasm, decorating their local mosques for the occasion. Muslims wear new clothes on this day to pay visits on their friends and relatives. Big feasts are planned, and there is a lot of food and sweets. Special prayers are offered in the mosques in the mornings. Wealthy Muslims also give gifts to the poor on this day.

❁ DIWALI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Lasting for five days from the 13th day of the waning half (Krishna Paksha) of Asvina, the seventh month of the Hindu calendar, to the second day of the waxing half (Shukla Paksha) of Karttika, the eighth month of the Hindu calendar

Diwali, the Hindu Festival of Lights, also called Divali or Deepavali, is celebrated to mark the return of Rama the king of Ayodhya after slaying the demon Ravana, the rescue of Goddess Lakshmi from King Bali, by Vishnu, and Krishna's victory over the dreaded demon Naraksura. Diwali comes from two Hindi words: deepa, which means "light," and avali, which means "row," as in a row of lights. This feast celebrates the triumph of good over evil, and lasts for five days.

Diwali is the most spectacular of all Hindu festivals in Mauritius. Hindus illuminate their homes, shops, and offices with rows of diyas (oil lamps), candles, and electric lights. Buildings are freshly painted and decorated to welcome the gods. Both children and adults set off fireworks. Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity, is worshipped on this day. The day also marks the end of the Hindu calendar.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas, which marks the birth of Jesus, is one of the two most important festivals for Christians. (Easter is the most important observance.) Christianity in general, and Roman Catholicism in particular, were introduced to Mauritius by the French. For Christmas Mauritians decorate their living rooms with Christmas trees adorned with lights, and gifts are given to the children. Santa Claus makes his appearance in shopping centers everywhere, and shops are decorated for the festive season. The celebrations continue until the end of year.

CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed in: Chinese Communities

Observed by: Sino-Mauritians

Observed on: The second new Moon after the winter solstice

The Chinese New Year, also called the Spring Festival, is a huge, noisy event on Mauritius. It falls on a different day each year because the lunar calendar is out of sequence with the solar calendar used throughout the Western world. Preparations for New Year's include a thorough house cleaning. The Chinese do not use scissors or knives on this day, since they are considered bad luck. Red, which is believed to ward off evil spirits, is used extensively—especially in the paper lanterns and decorations hung in homes and streets. Elaborate feasts are prepared to symbolize hoped-for abundance for the coming year. The traditional honey cake (also known as a wax cake because of its texture) is distributed to relatives and friends. To ward off evil spirits, firecrackers are set off at the turn of the New Year, and traditional dragon dances are performed around the island.

The Chinese community on Mauritius tends to celebrate the day at the beach, in leisure activities, or visiting pagodas to pray.

Rites of Passage

COMING OF AGE

Mauritian Hindu girls wear a phuli, or nose ring, when they come of age, a sacred custom observed for generations. The phuli is significant for a girl who has come of age and is connected with the worship of Saraswati, the goddess of learning. Bejeweling the left nostril pays homage to this deity and is said to enhance the positive energies latent in this area. Mauritians believe that there are seven chakras in the body, and the fifth chakra (adi-chakra) is located in the nose. (In yoga, a chakra is one the seven centers of spiritual energy in the human body.)

MARRIAGE

Although Mauritians traditionally marry at age 18, those between 16 and 18 years of age may marry with their parents' consent. Mauritius is a complex mixture of cultures with influences from three continents. In light of this, interethnic marriages are becoming more common. Before the 1960s, however, they were not very common at all.

Family bonding remains an integral aspect of Mauritian society and, until a few years ago, most young people would not marry outside their community for fear of offending their parents. Kinship is very important in the society, and most of the employment opportunities rely on family connections. For these reasons young people did not make marital decisions without parental or community consent. In the early 21st century, the concept of marrying for love is replacing the traditional arranged marriage. Parental consent, however, is still required in most Hindu as well as Muslim communities.

Hindu marriages are extremely elaborate and colorful. Traditional marriage rituals used to last for a week. In modern times, however, the festivities have been shortened to four days. The rituals usually start on a Friday with a musical ceremony known as the sandhya rites. The bardi ceremony takes place the following day. The actual wedding takes place on a Sunday. The fourth day of the nuptial feasting—chowthari—takes place the next day, Monday.

DEATH

Christians and Muslims bury—and do not cremate—the dead because they believe that on Doomsday (or Judgment Day) all the dead will be resurrected from the grave. On Doomsday according to Christian and Muslim teachings, the deeds of the dead will be weighed on a scale and, if the good deeds outweigh the bad, then the soul will be sent to heaven. However, if the bad deeds outweigh the good, the soul will languish in hell for eternity. It is because of this belief in resurrection and redemption that cremation is forbidden.

Unlike Hindus everywhere else in the world who cremate the dead, Mauritian Hindus quite often bury the dead in cemeteries. These Hindus also participate in the Roman Catholic observance of All Souls' Day, which is held on November 2 (All Saints'

Day is November 1). This is the day when Catholics pay homage to their deceased friends and relatives. They gather at their tombs and graves and offer floral tributes. Similarly many Hindus also go to the cemetery on this day to pay respects to their relatives and friends who are dead.

Jewish Citizens

One little-known cemetery at Bambous has a burial ground with Muslim and Jewish sections. Jewish refugees from Eastern Europe, particularly from Poland, in their attempt to escape Nazi persecution, tried to reach Palestine in the early 1940s. Introduction

❁ HISTORY

It has generally been thought that the first people to inhabit Mexico were probably hunter-gatherers who had worked their way south from the Beringia landbridge during the last Ice Age about 13,000 years ago. However, in the early 21st century archaeologists announced the recovery of the bones of three skeletons—two extremely well preserved—that are over 13,000 years old. Found in a submarine Caribbean cave off Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula, their radiocarbon date is the oldest in the Americas yet obtained from a human bone. Nothing is known about the culture of these people because no artifacts were found with the skeletons. The research of a British archaeologist, however, promises to push the date for human habitation in the Americas even further back into prehistory.

A Liverpool archaeologist has said that humans occupied a site near Puebla, east of Mexico City, 21,000 to 28,000 years ago.

Between 9,000 and 6,000 years ago, teosinte, the ancestor of modern corn was first domesticated in southern Mexico. Early horticulturists morphed teosinte into a more useful crop by cultivating those plants that had desirable characteristics so that by 3500 B.C.E. the corn kernels were significantly larger. Only 1,100 years later, the gene variants found in modern corn could be found in crops grown in Mexico.

For more than 3,000 years, several Mesoamerican civilizations rose and fell in what is now Mexico: the Aztec, Olmec, Teotihuacan, Toltec, Mixtec, Zapotec, and Maya. These indigenous civilizations are credited with many inventions, including towering pyramid-temples, mathematics, astronomy, medicine, writing, highly accurate multiple calendars, fine arts, sophisticated agriculture, engineering, an abacus, a complex theology, and the wheel.

Archaic inscriptions on rocks and rock walls all over northern Mexico (especially in the state of Nuevo León) demonstrate that numbers and counting became extremely important at an early time in Mexico. Since a system was developed to track astronomical activities, such events were clearly important in the lives of indigenous Mexicans early on. These petroglyphs prefigure the role of astronomy in succeeding Mexican civilizations when their cities and ceremonial centers would be built in accordance with astronomical events.

At a unique site, also in southern Mexico, archaeologists have been able to trace the evolution of religion over a 7,000-year period. Like similar sites found in other parts of the world, the site is unique because the stratigraphic record allows scholars to “read” the relationship between an evolving social structure—from foraging to settlement to an archaic state—and how religion also changed structurally to pace the changes in society. Around 7000 the pre-Zapotec people inhabiting the area were nomadic hunter-gatherers; their religious ceremonies were performed on a plain dance floor, its area defined by stone borders, and the ritual dances were probably performed by all the people.

Around 1500 the so-called Oaxacans were living in villages throughout the year. Four dwellings from this period have been excavated, and all of them are oriented toward the same direction. Archaeologists think that the orientation could have been determined by the path of the Sun at the spring equinox. If this hypothesis is an accurate interpretation, the now sedentary Oaxacans had formalized the ad hoc rituals of their ancestors and were so advanced in astronomical observation that they were able to schedule their ceremonies at fixed times based on the position of the Sun or stars. Furthermore this elite may have been a priestly caste who performed rituals open only to initiates.

During the third stage of development, around 1150, a social hierarchy had begun to develop; there was now a social elite who lived in houses larger than most other dwellings, so large that they served as temples. These “temples” were all oriented in the same direction (like those of the second phase), and a complicated system for marking the passage of time had developed: There was one calendar that consisted of 260 days and another of 365 days. These two calendars synchronized with each other every 52 years, a number that figured importantly in the later Mayan calendar.

Then in 500, a populous and warlike society developed at Monte Albán, which archaeologists are calling the Zapotec state. By the time this state appeared, the temples were more complex and had special rooms for a new elite, the priests. Religion was now controlled by a special caste of men who, in their priestly role, also controlled the people and thereby the society. In its first stages religion may have served a cohesive function, bringing communities together for shared rituals. By the time that elite castes—the priests and nobility—appear, religion was a system of social control used to justify power and its uses. Religion and its attendant rituals had become the means for controlling masses of people by teaching them to fear supernatural punishment for their social transgressions. In this way elites consolidated, justified, and maintained their privilege through omnipotent, moralistic gods.

At different times, three Mexican cities were the largest in the world: Teotihuacán (capital of the Tōltec Empire), Tenochtitlán (capital of the Aztec Empire and now Mexico City), and Cholula. These cities, and others, were once centers of commerce, ideas, ceremonies, and theology, and by their greatness influenced other early cultures. The first of Mexico’s ancient civilizations, the Olmec, established themselves in the states of Veracruz and Tabasco around 1000 B.C.E. They gradually spread across central and southern Mexico until the civilization mysteriously vanished around 400. Later a series of successful civilizations (the Tōltec, Mayan, and Zapotec) flourished and made significant contributions to Mexican history. The Aztecs, who settled in Mexico in the early 14th century, were the successors of this series of empires.

The Aztecs, so-called because their city Aztlán was where their wandering had begun, considered themselves latecomers to the central plateau of Mexico, the heirs of the arts, sculpture, architecture, engraving, and the invention of the calendar created by the Tōltecs. (The Tōltecs’ civilization had peaked in the 10th and 11th centuries.) The Mexica, an Aztec tribe, were the first people in the world to provide mandatory education for all people, regardless of gender, rank, or station. The Mexica educational system had two educational channels: the telpochcalli, which provided practical and military studies, and the calmecac, which provided advanced learning in writing, astronomy, statesmanship, theology, and other areas.

The underlying concept of the Aztecs’ religious system was that only constant human sacrifices could keep the

Fun Fact

Several of the famous and mysterious crystal skulls that have been found in Mexico in the ancient ruins of Maya and Aztec civilizations are believed to be between 5,000 and 36,000 years old. These are made of solid chunks of quartz, except for those with detachable lower jaws, and it is now possible to determine their age using an electron microscope. One skull is held by the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C. One of the skulls, now in Canada, was examined by Hewlett-Packard in California. However, no one has been able to determine who made them or what their purpose was.

universe working, a belief prevalent in all Nahuatl communities. In order to secure enough humans to keep the universe going, when the Aztecs waged war their goal was to return with live enemies who could be sacrificed. To achieve this their weapons were made to injure enemies, not to kill them. When the Spanish conquistadors arrived in Mexico in the early 16th century, this kind of warfare left the Aztecs unprepared to fight the Spanish, who fought to kill.

After the Spaniards had conquered the Mexica in 1521, with considerable help from other indigenous tribes seeking an end to the Aztecs' insatiable need for sacrifices, Mexico became a Spanish colony. The Spanish conquerors exploited the mineral wealth of the land, using the native population as laborers. This created the Mestizo class (persons of mixed race, especially of European and Amerindian ancestry). During the colonial period (1521–1821), Mexico was known as Nueva España, or New Spain, and included, in addition to present-day Mexico, the Spanish Caribbean islands, Central America, and part of what is now the southwestern United States.

Mexico's long War of Independence, led by Miguel Hidalgo (1753–1811), started on September 16, 1810. Hidalgo was a priest of Spanish descent with progressive ideas. The war lasted for 11 years; the liberating troops finally entered Mexico City in 1821. Although Mexican independence had first been proclaimed in 1810, it was not achieved in the true sense until August 1821, when Augustín de Iturbide (1783–1824) proclaimed himself emperor. His reign lasted only one year. He was overthrown by a revolt in 1823, and the Republic of Mexico was established. In 1824 Guadalupe Victoria became the first president of Mexico. A continuous change of governments in the 19th century caused a long period of political instability in the country.

Benito Juárez (1806–72), known as the Abraham Lincoln of Mexico, became president in 1861.

During his tenure of more than 30 years, the infrastructure improved, and large-scale foreign investments were made. In 1910 another civil war broke out in Mexico. After a 20-year struggle for control over Mexico's government, President Lázaro Cárdenas del Rio (1895–1970) assumed power in 1934 and transformed Mexico completely. He nationalized the oil and gas industry and introduced land reforms as well as a free education system in Mexico. But in 1976 the country suffered a severe economic crisis. Until 2000 the end of each presidential term was followed by devaluation and a period of recession. In the early 21st century Mexico was still grappling with problems of economic control and development, especially in the petroleum sector and the evolution of trade relations with the United States. Civil unrest, corruption, and violence have spawned other associated problems.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Mexico is bordered by the United States on the north, the Pacific Ocean on the west, the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea on the east, and Guatemala and Belize to the south. It is characterized by an extraordinary diversity in topography and climate. Two major mountain chains, the Sierra Madre Occidental and the Sierra Madre Oriental, run north to south the length of the country.

High temperatures and moderate to low rainfall are the dominant influences on Mexico's weather. The highland climates vary considerably with elevation, but the central plateau generally has a moderate climate with few extremes.

ECONOMY

Mexico has a free market economy with a mixture of modern and outmoded industry and agriculture, increasingly dominated by the private sector. Mexico faces many structural problems as it strives to modernize its economy and raise living standards. Income distribution is very unequal, with the top 20 percent of income earners accounting for 55 percent of the nation's income. Trade with the United States and Canada has nearly doubled since the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) was implemented in 1994. In the early 21st century Mexico was pursuing additional trade agreements with most countries in Latin America and with the European Union to decrease its dependence on the United States.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Mexican culture reflects a complex blending of pre-Hispanic, indigenous civilizations, and Hispanic culture, later followed by influences from France, Germany, and the United States. African and Asian influences are also clearly visible in Mexican culture. The vast majority of Mexicans are nominally Christians—95 percent. The most striking example of this fusion of diverse traditions is the widespread veneration of Our Lady of Guadalupe. The Day of the Dead is yet another example in which the Catholic Feast of All Saints is fused with the indigenous rites of ancestor veneration.

Mexico has many different holidays and regional festivals. Such festivals usually feature visual arts exhibits, storytelling for children, museum tours, arts and crafts activities, and games. Because food is important in Mexican culture, many celebrations incorporate food-related activities, including hunters' feasts (the hunters prefer to consume the game that they have freshly killed) and theme dinners, honoring Mexico City's distinguished chefs and fine cooks.

According to the Maya Long Count calendar, several cycles will end in 2012: the completion of a Galactic Year (the time it takes for the Milky Way galaxy to complete one rotation); the end of a 26-million-year Earth cycle, a 78,000-year Earth cycle, and the termination of the 26,000-year Mayan calendar.

❁ CUISINE

The blending and fusion of very different cultures have contributed significantly to the development of Mexican culinary arts and eating habits. Corn has been the staple food of this region for more than 4,000 years. The corn kernels are softened in water and lime and then ground and fashioned (most commonly) into tortillas (thin pancakes). Protein-rich beans and a seemingly infinite variety of chilies are integral to Mexican cuisine. The Spanish, who liked the array of indigenous foodstuffs, added a few elements of their own such as European meats, sugar, and cheese. Mexican cuisine is further enhanced by a rich variety of fruits and vegetables: tomatoes, squash, sweet potatoes, avocado, coconut, pineapple, papaya, and prickly pear cactus, to name but a few. Herbs and spices including cinnamon, clove, anise, cumin, cilantro, thyme, marjoram, and the pungent epazote are used freely.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

On New Year's Day (Año Nuevo) most business establishments and schools are closed in Mexico. People meet their relatives and friends to wish them a happy New Year. The celebrations feature concerts, street performances, theater shows, and displays of fireworks.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 5

Constitution Day (Día de la Constitución) is observed in remembrance of the finalization of Mexico's new constitution in 1917. Toward the end of 1916, the revolutionaries had met in Querétaro to reform the constitution of 1857. They finally decided to draw up a new one since circumstances in Mexico were very different from those when Benito Juárez had created the original. Accordingly the new constitution was enacted on February 5, 1917.

It embodied the ideas of all the revolutionary groups and provided for the liberties and rights of citizens, in addition to incorporating the democratic and federal concepts of the 1857 constitution. It recognized social rights, such as the right of workers to strike and to organize themselves into unions, the right to education, and the right of the nation to regulate private property in accordance with the common good. To celebrate this highly significant and historic occasion in Mexico, people exchange greeting cards and attend public speeches during the day. In the evening they participate in various cultural events, such as musical performances.

Fun Fact

People in Mexico consider it good luck to wear colorful underwear on New Year's Day. Different colors denote good luck, charm, fortune, and love, and people choose the color of their underwear on the basis of what they want or need in the coming year.

Wearing red underwear, for instance, means that the wearer hopes to find his or her true love in the coming year.

❁ FLAG DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 24

On Flag Day (Día de la Bandera), public festivities and civic ceremonies are held in front of the monument dedicated to the memory of General Don Vicente Guerrero, the first Mexican military leader, who swore to the flag in the famous agreement of Acatempan on March 12, 1821. It is common for people on this day to wear the colors of the national flag: green (hope and victory), white (purity), and red (bravery). Cities and towns are decorated with lights and flowers. Special TV and radio programs highlight this historic event.

❁ BIRTHDAY OF BENITO JUÁREZ

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 21

This occasion marks the birthday of Benito Juárez, known as Día del Natalicio de Benito Juárez or Day of the Indian Chief, an Amerindian by birth who held a variety of political posts and became the president of Mexico in 1861. All government offices, banks, and schools remain closed on this day. Celebrations begin with children's parades on March 20. On the next day military and civilian parades are held across the country. Speeches by eminent personalities and cultural programs are also held.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

On Labor Day (Día del Trabajo), or Primero de Mayo (May Day), Mexicans celebrate the accomplishments and struggles of workers. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Mexico trade unionists and workers gather at the zócalos (town squares or plazas) nearest to them, where meetings and speeches are held. This is followed by parades of workers and schoolchildren.

❁ CINCO DE MAYO

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 5

In Spanish Cinco de Mayo means the "fifth of May." It is a national holiday that honors the small army of farmers who defeated the better trained French invaders in the Battle of Puebla under the leadership of General Ignacio Zaragoza on May 5, 1862. This was a strategic battle, fought in the small town of Puebla during an important phase of the French invasion of Mexico. Puebla lies midway on the road leading from the landing sites at Vera Cruz to Mexico City. Cinco de Mayo is celebrated by reenacting the Battle of Puebla; drumming, swordplay, games, food stalls for hungry participants, mariachi bands, and bullfighting are also popular events on this day. The celebrations culminate with a display of fireworks. This holiday is also known as Batalla de Puebla, "the Battle of Puebla." Cinco de Mayo is also celebrated in the United States by Mexican Americans with big parades, mariachi bands, fireworks, and barbecues, and Yankees (Anglos) also join in the festivities.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

The Independence Day celebrations remember the courage of the Mexican people called to arms by Catholic priest Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla in Dolores, Guanajuato. In the early hours of September 16, 1810, Hidalgo roused his congregation with the first

What Is Mariachi?

Mariachi, a Mexican folk music, is a variation of the French word mariage, which means "wedding" or "marriage." For a while mariachi was believed to go back to the 19th century when Maximilian, a Frenchman, was emperor of Mexico. But this explanation was recently discredited when a use of the word was found that predated the French arrival in Mexico. Scholars now believe that the word mariachi has native roots. One theory is that it comes from the name of the wood used to make the platform on which the performers danced to the music of the village musicians. Whatever its source, mariachi remains one of the most exciting and enchanting musical ensembles found anywhere in the world. The complete mariachi ensemble is composed of six to eight violins, two trumpets, and a guitar—all standard European instruments. There is also a high-pitched, round-backed guitar called the vihuela, which, when strummed in the traditional manner, gives mariachi its typical rhythmic vitality; a deep-voiced guitar called the guitarrón, which serves as the bass of the ensemble; and a Mexican folk harp, which usually doubles the base line, but also ornaments the melody. While these three instruments have European origins, in their present form they are uniquely Mexican.

grito (“cry”) and the ringing of the church bell. Hidalgo exhorted his congregation to fight against hundreds of years of oppression and brutality at the hands of the hated gachupines, the Spanish ruling elite. The call spread far and wide across the land, sparking the Mexican War of Independence. In Mexico the celebrations start on the previous night when the president of Mexico rings the historic liberty bell and then shouts, “Mexicanos, viva Mexico” (“Mexicans, long live Mexico”). This is an imitation of the cry of independence given by Father Hidalgo on that night in 1810. The president waves the flag, and the national anthem is sung. The next day is marked with civic ceremonies, a military parade in the capital city, and the decoration of the statue of Father Hidalgo in Mexico City with flowers. There are rodeos, banquets, fireworks, dances, bullfights, and horseback-riding competitions in different regions of Mexico. This observance is also known as Dieciséis de Septiembre, “September Sixteenth.”

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF THE REVOLUTION OF 1910

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 20

The Anniversary of the Revolution of 1910, also known as Revolución Mexicana (“Revolution Day”), is celebrated on November 10. The Mexican Revolution arose from, among other factors, tremendous popular discontent that had been simmering during the 31-year dictatorship of President Porfirio Díaz. Francisco Madero, a supporter of democracy, led the movement to topple Díaz. Madero promised to return all land that had been confiscated by Díaz, to guarantee universal voting rights, and to limit presidents to a single term. Madero’s call for an uprising on November 20, 1910, marked the beginning of the Mexican Revolution. People celebrate this important day with military parades, children’s parades, musical performances, and fireworks.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, also called La Día de los Tres Reyes (Three Kings Day), or Day of the Wise Men, originated as a celebration of the Three Kings (or Wise Men) from the East who came with gifts to behold the infant Jesus in Bethlehem. It is a local belief that on this day Papa Noel visits Mexican children who have conducted themselves well during the previous year and leaves gifts and sweets for them while they are asleep. Adults celebrate the day with rosca (a ring-shaped fruitcake).

❁ DÍA DE LA CANDELARIA

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: February 2

Día de la Candelaria, in English called Candlemas, relates to the purification of Mary, the mother of Jesus, following his birth according to ancient Jewish custom. Candlelit processions and dances mark the end of Mexico’s Christmas celebrations on this day, and statues of Jesus are carried through the streets. Also, whoever got the baby Jesus in the Rosca de Reyes at Christmas plays godparent to the Christ and holds a Christening party. Families buy scenes that depict Bethlehem and the infant Jesus for good luck. Musical events, parades, and dances are organized in many regions (especially at Veracruz, and in the neighboring areas of Tlacotalpán).

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

In Mexico the region of Iztapalapa (including the eight districts of La Asunción, San Ignacio, Santa Bárbara, San Lucas, San Pablo, San Miguel, San Pedro, and San José) is famous for its pre-Easter celebrations on Maundy Thursday. White and purple shades adorn the streets while actors ready themselves for the performance, and the jail where Jesus will end up is filled with fruit and flowers. An angel and a child lead the procession; they are followed by virgins, Jesus, the Nazarenes (residents of Nazareth as depicted in the Bible), the priests, and the Roman dignitaries, flanked by soldiers. The procession goes through the streets of the eight districts and arrives at the Church of El Señor de la Cueva, where they touch an urn and offer their thanks. Hundreds of Nazarenes, who form a part of the procession, wear crowns of thorns and flowers on their heads. Finally the Last Supper is reenacted in the Cuitláhuac Garden followed by Jesus’ washing of the Apostles’ feet, his arrest, and the prayer in the orchard. (The words do not follow those of the Scriptures. They have been adapted over the years according to the tastes of the participants.) Maundy Thursday is also called Holy Thursday or, among Orthodox Christians, Great Thursday.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday is a somber observance for Christians around the world because they mourn Jesus' death on this day. In Mexico on this occasion, Christians recall the events of Jesus' Crucifixion by attending public readings of the Psalms and Gospels and by singing hymns about Jesus' death. Good Friday is also called Holy Friday, Mourning Friday, or, among Orthodox Christians, Great Friday.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Mexican Christians, like others around the world, the religious festivities culminating with Easter are the most important of all Christian festivals. Mexican Easter is not confined to a single day or a weekend. On the contrary it comprises an entire week of holy days. This is collectively known as Holy Week or Semana Santa. Maundy Thursday and Good Friday are also integral to the Semana Santa. In Mexico the Easter festivities begin on Palm Sunday (the day Jesus victoriously rode into Jerusalem and the common people, waving palm fronds, hailed him as the king of Jews). In parts of Mexico there are elaborate celebrations with people reenacting scenes from Jesus' life. On Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, young people gather outside the churches and in public places to reenact the events that took place during the last few days of his worldly life: his betrayal, his bearing the burden of the wooden Cross to Calvary, his trial, and his enemies crowning him with thorns. Such vivid enactments help to drive home the message as to how Jesus died to save humanity from sin and evil.

On Easter Sunday in Mexico, prayer services and worship begin quite early in the morning. The day memorializes the empty tomb that was found on the morning of Jesus' Resurrection and his arrival in Jerusalem before sunrise on the same day.

DAY OF THE DEAD

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: November 1–2

The Day of the Dead (Día de Muertos) is one of the major celebrations in Mexico. Although observances differ among regions, it is nearly universally celebrated in this Catholic country. The holiday is a melding of indigenous ancestor worship and the Catholic holidays of All Saints' Day (November 1) and All Souls' Day (November 2). In general, November 1 is for honoring dead children and infants and November 2 is for honoring dead adults. For weeks before the holiday, stores are filled with statues, toys, candies, and foods in the shape of skeletons, tombstones, coffins, and other macabre shapes. Families clean and decorate family graves and gather in cemeteries for family reunions that involve much eating and drinking and often fireworks. The Day of the Dead is celebratory rather than solemn and reflects the comfortable relationship with death that is prevalent in Mexico.

DAY OF OUR LADY OF GUADALUPE

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 12

According to a Mexican legend, the Virgin Mary appeared to Juan Diego (a Mexican Indian) in 1531 on the Cerro de Tepeyac in the north of Mexico City. She appeared three times in the guise of an Indian princess and commanded that a church be built in the area where the Basilica de Guadalupe now stands. Moreover she imprinted her image onto Juan Diego's cloak (as evidence of her appearance, so that other people would believe him). This cloak is now preserved and set in gold and on display at the shrine. From early December on Mexicans celebrate the day of Our Lady of Guadalupe. The pilgrimage to the Basilica de Guadalupe ends on December 12. This pilgrimage is a huge affair with about five million Mexicans making the journey to the Basilica, which holds round-the-clock services to cater to the throngs of worshippers. The Virgin de Guadalupe is depicted as an Indian "dark Madonna," and this has helped assimilate the indigenous people and their traditional spirituality into the Roman Catholic Church.

This festival is also called Día de la Virgen de Guadalupe ("Virgin of Guadalupe Day").

LAS POSADAS

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 16–24

Christmas celebrations begin nine days before December 25 with Las Posadas in Mexico. This ritual is performed on each of the nine nights preceding Christmas. Many Mexicans take part in candlelight processions as they reenact Joseph and Mary's frustrating search for accommodation on the night of Jesus' birth. It is customary for households to take turns refusing lodging to the wandering family; finally they are symbolically offered shelter for the night. In addition huge processions carrying sacred figures and statuettes crowd the streets. These images are used to re-create the Nativity scene at the town's church. A big fiesta is organized, which lasts until December 31. People spend most of their time enjoying parties, fireworks, and loud celebrations. Breaking piñatas adds an element of fun for the children.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

In Mexico Christmas, called Navidad ("the birth") in Spanish, celebrations are not confined to a single day. Rather actual Christmas celebrations commence with Las Posadas, which continues for about nine days leading up to Christmas and continues well past the new year. In Mexico devout Catholics attend Misa de Noche Buena ("The Mass of the Good Night"), which is conducted at midnight on Christmas Eve. After the Mass, everyone goes home to have dinner with family and friends. Anyone who does not have a family is always welcome to be part of a family celebration and, most important of all, to ceremonially place the baby Jesus in the manger in the Nativity scene set up in every home on this occasion. Mexicans greet each other with "Feliz Navidad!" ("Merry Christmas").

An interesting departure from Christmas observances elsewhere is that in Mexico presents are not exchanged on Christmas but a few days later. On the night of December 31 a Misa de Gallo ("Rooster's Mass") takes place at midnight, and families attend to give thanks for the blessings they received during the year.

The presents for Christmas are finally given on January 6, el Día de Reyes, the Day of the Kings, or the Wise Men's Day. It is the Magi (the Three Wise Men from the east) who brought gifts to the infant Jesus; hence, they are believed to bring gifts for all the boys and girls who have been well-behaved during the year. The children place their shoes by the window in order to receive the gifts.

El Día de Reyes is celebrated with a Merienda and the Rosca de Reyes. La Merienda is the meal enjoyed any time in the early evening. (It is more like a high tea than a heavy meal.)

Made of egg bread and decorated with dried fruit and sprinkled with sugar, the Rosca de Reyes conceals a little Jesus doll. Whoever gets it in his or her slice plays godparent to Jesus on Día de Candelaria.

Piñatas—large brightly colored hollow cardboard containers shaped like rabbits or reindeer and filled with gifts and candies—are hung in the streets on Christmas Day. Children are blindfolded and take turns trying to break these piñatas to collect the gifts and candies inside. Santa Claus, known as Papa Noel in Mexico, brings gifts for children.

❁ AMARANTH FESTIVAL

Observed in: Xochimilco

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 16–18

Amaranth, the legendary pre-Hispanic grain, was the staple diet of the pre-Columbian Aztecs, who believed that it had supernatural powers and incorporated it in their religious ceremonies. The Amaranth Festival, celebrated in Xochimilco, located 10 miles south of Mexico City, features amaranth in its many forms. These include not only cereals and noodles (as one would expect), but also wonderful moles, hot drinks, and alegrías (sweet snack bars). A large crafts market is a permanent feature of this festival, which is also known as Festival del Amaranto.

❁ XOCHIMILCO FESTIVAL

Observed in: Xochimilco

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Two weeks before Easter

The Lakeland area of Xochimilco, a city situated south of Mexico City, with its famous canals, colorful barges, and beautiful floating gardens, provides the backdrop for this annual festival honoring the ancient Aztec deities of flowers (Xochipilli) and dance (Macuilxochitl). A lucky girl is chosen as La Flor Mas Bella del Ejido (The Most Beautiful Flower of Ejido), and she leads a floating parade of flower-bedecked barges through the canals. The four-day festival includes canoe races and horticulture contests.

Amaranth

The name amaranth is derived from the Greek for “never-fading flower.” The plant is an annual herb and is a relative of pigweed, a common wild plant also known as lamb’s-quarters, and the common garden plant known as cockscomb. There are approximately 60 species of amaranth, and there is no distinction between amaranth grown for the leaf (vegetable) and the seed (grain). Amaranth is a bushy plant that grows 5 to 7 feet in height, with broad leaves and a showy flower head of small, red or magenta cloverlike flowers, which are profuse and constitute the plant’s exquisite, feathery plumes. The seed heads resemble corn tassels but are somewhat bushier. The seeds are tiny ($\frac{1}{32}$ of an inch), lens-shaped, and a golden to creamy tan color, with some occasional dark colored seeds. Each plant is capable of producing 40,000 to 60,000 seeds. The leaves of ornamental varieties, such as Joseph’s Coat, resemble the coleus plant and are quite striking. Their coloring can range from deep red, purple-red, orange, pink, green, to white. The sight of a full-grown amaranth field with its vividly colored leaves, stems, and flower or seed heads is an amazingly beautiful and unforgettable sight.

Observed in: Guadalajara
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 1–31

During the month of October Guadalajara, the second-largest city in Mexico, jumps into party mode for the grand Fiestas de Octubre. It becomes the venue for more than 300 cultural, social, and sporting events spanning five weeks. The range of activities includes live performances by leading Mexican musical stars, traditional cockfights, romantic musical performances, and carnival rides for youngsters. Shops and stands offer typical crafts, jewelry, shoes, clothing, and other locally produced merchandise. For the gourmet there is a vast spread of international and regional Mexican food. Painting, sculpture, graphics, and photography exhibitions are also part of this festival.

❁ NIGHT OF THE RADISHES

Observed in: Oaxaca
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 23

There is an interesting story behind the Night of the Radishes. When the Spanish invaded Mexico, they brought with them the radish, which grew well in the fertile Mexican soil. Around 250 years ago, a particularly abundant harvest produced more radishes than could be sold, and some were left in the ground. A few days before Christmas, the local friars pulled some up and were astonished by their size—up to 2 feet long and perhaps 4 inches in diameter—and by their strangely misshapen forked roots, which resembled monsters or demons. They took the roots to the market by the cathedral and displayed them to a highly amused public. After a while the idea came to improve on nature by carving these giant roots. Traditionally the carvings were mainly Nativity scenes, but now others are common, including figures drawn from local life and the traditional Zapotec and Miztec religions. Parades and traditional dances accompany this annual festival held in the city of Oaxaca. Local artisans and sculptors set up stalls around the main square to display giant radishes that have been carved and sculpted into imaginative shapes. Buñuelos (a tortilla-like dessert, whose plate is broken after it has been used, is commonly eaten on this occasion. This celebration is also called Festival de los Rábanos, La Noche de Rábanos, or Radish Festival.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Children are highly valued and protected in Mexican society. Many women in Mexico believe that motherhood is the most important achievement of their lives. The news of pregnancy in a family is a joyous occasion, often celebrated with a banquet. The purpose of the banquet is to thank God for the unborn baby and to seek blessings for the mother-to-be.

At the moment of birth the midwife lets out a cry to greet the newborn and to honor the mother. After the birth the midwife washes the bodies of both the mother and child, which on a symbolic level is meant to cleanse and purge them of spiritual and worldly evil. The cleansing begins with the chant: “O child, receive the water of the Lord of the World, which is our life.” Each new birth is celebrated with a lavish dinner. On such occasions Mexican families invite all their friends, relatives, and often elderly people in their neighborhood to join in. After the partying is over, each of the older family members makes a wish for the baby and mother.

❁ MARRIAGE

On the day of a traditional Mexican wedding, the parents of the groom come to the place where the bride waits to welcome them into her family. An old woman then wraps the already dressed bride in a black blanket and carries her off on her back through the streets to the couple's new home. The people of the village come out in the streets to greet the new bride.

When they enter the house, the bride and groom are made to sit on the hearth. The mother of the bride gives the groom a cloak, and the mother of the groom gives the bride a skirt and a blouse. When the cloak and the blouse are tied together, the couple is formally married. The couple then feed each other tamales. The priestess then leads the couple to a room and stands guard in front of the door. Later the couple is blessed by a priest, who sprinkles holy water over them.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The various islands, atolls, and volcanic crests that make up what is now known as the Federated States of Micronesia were probably settled at different times, starting with Yap. The first settlers canoed from the Philippines and Indonesia to Micronesia, pulling their outriggers up on the sands of Yap between 4000 and 2000 B.C.E.

Much later voyagers from Melanesia worked their way from Kosrae to Pohnpei, Chuuk, and Yap. Yet no Micronesian people have legends telling of their life before they reached the islands. The early settlers had no metals and worked mainly with stone, leaving many impressive carvings. They were also superb ocean navigators and had a rich oral history that did not survive the later European invasions.

Ferdinand Magellan (c. 1480–1521) sailed past Micronesia on his way around the world in 1521. In the decades that followed ships used the islands as a stopover on the way to the Spice Islands. Because they apparently had nothing that the Europeans valued, the islands were relatively safe during this period. But in 1817 Europeans began to chart Micronesia, and soon British whalers began to arrive, followed quickly by U.S. whalers. The whaling crews, not known for observing social niceties, often harassed and killed islanders, who then replied in kind. Whalers brought venereal diseases, as well as other scourges like the flu and measles, and in 1854 a smallpox epidemic killed 50 percent of Pohnpei's population. The whaling crews were followed by Protestant missionaries, equally untutored with respect to unfamiliar traditions, and they imposed Western clothing, language, and laws along with their religious beliefs.

In 1899 Germany tried to catch up with the other European imperialists by purchasing Micronesia from the Spanish, hoping to make a profit from the production of copra (dried coconut meat). Micronesians were “encouraged” to plant coconuts and work for the new colonists; some were forced to move from their islands to the German plantations, while communally held land was seized and given to private investors.

When World War I began, the Germans abandoned Micronesia. The Japanese eagerly replaced them and set about developing the infrastructure and administration necessary to annex Micronesia. The Japanese intended to make Micronesia a look-alike of their homeland and built Buddhist temples and Shinto shrines, geisha houses, and public baths. Their administrative centers were merely smaller versions of Tokyo. In 1920 the League of Nations gave Japan a mandate over the islands. Eventually the Japanese population reached 100,000, while the indigenous population was only around 40,000. The islands’ social infrastructure was remade to meet Japanese needs, while Micronesians were second-class citizens. Although Micronesia was largely a resource for the Japanese, the colonial power created a strong economy and a high level of agricultural activity. During this period sugarcane production, mining, fishing, and tropical agriculture emerged as the major industries.

On December 7, 1941, Japan bombed Pearl Harbor and seized Guam. In February 1944 the United States finally retaliated and attacked Chuuk Lagoon, Japan’s most important naval base in the central Pacific. Over 200,000 tons of equipment was sunk in two days, and the United States succeeded in neutralizing the base. The fighting was heavy in Micronesia and the surrounding islands during the months that followed, and particularly long and brutal battles occurred in the Marianas, to the north, and Palau, to the west. Almost all the infrastructure built up by the Japanese was destroyed, and many Micronesians were caught in the crossfire, although history glosses over their misery.

When the war ended the occupation continued, and the United States took over from Japan. The U.S. Navy wasted no time taking over the islands and sealed them off to visitors. The Yanks had plans for Micronesia. The Marshall Islands, for example, in Micronesia’s eastern region were given the cruel task of serving as a guinea pig for the nuclear ambitions of the U.S. military. Between 1946 and 1958, 67 bombs were exploded in the region, seriously damaging the Marshallese gene pool. In 1947 the United Nations set up a Trust Territory in the Pacific that included Truk (now Chuuk), Kusaie (now Kosrae), Ponape (now Pohnpei), and Yap, and gave administrative rights over the islands to the United States. In its role as trustee the United States’s responsibility was to “promote the economic

Nan Madol

Nan Madol was the ceremonial and political center of the Sau Deleur Dynasty that united Pohnpei’s estimated 25,000 people in late prehistoric times. The oral history of the islanders supported by archaeological evidence substantiates Nan Madol’s position as Pohnpei’s political and religious center until the 1500s, when the centralized system collapsed. Nan Madol was occupied for at least 2,000 years with a 1,000-year span of major construction between 500 and 1500 C.E. Nan Madol covers almost 7 square miles including the stone architecture on a coral reef flat along the shore of Temwen Island, several other artificial islets, and the adjacent Pohnpei main island coastline.

The stone walls of the site’s central area enclose a space almost 1 mile long and 1/3 mile wide. Within the walls are nearly 100 artificial islets—stone and coral-filled platforms—bordered by tidal canals. One investigator has estimated that between 490,000 and 738,000 tons of building material had to be moved across differing distances to the site.

Although several thousand artifacts have been recovered at Nan Madol including shell tools and ornaments, pottery, and stone tools, questions remain about the purpose of Nan Madol and how it fits in the broader Pohnpeian sociopolitical system.

advancement and self-sufficiency of the inhabitants.” Instead the United States immediately constructed a series of military bases, effectively preventing another country from doing the same. Micronesia was under the control of the U.S. Department of Defense until 1951, when it was transferred to the Department of the Interior.

Although the United States was supposed to be grooming the Micronesians for self-government, it chose instead a combination of neglect and increasing dependency. Micronesia’s economy relied entirely on government services and money from the United States, and there was no industrial or agricultural basis to replace it. In 1965 America agreed to form a Congress of Micronesia, a body elected by islanders empowered to determine the islanders’ future, but executive control remained with the U.S. High Commissioner. Just to be sure nothing would come of the plan, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) bugged the Congress’s offices.

In 1966 the arrival of a bunch of idealistic young Peace Corps volunteers did nothing to improve the U.S. cause. They were supposed to spread the word about the wonders of U.S. society; instead the volunteers began to educate the Micronesians about their legal and social rights, encouraging serious agitation for independence. On July 12, 1978, following a constitutional convention, the people of four of the former districts of the Trust Territory—Chuuk, Yap, Pohnpei, and Kosrae—voted to approve the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia (FSM). UN observers certified this referendum as a legitimate act of self-determination.

With the implementation of the FSM Constitution on May 10, 1979, the former districts became states of the federation, and, in due course, adopted their own state constitutions. Nationwide democratic elections were held to elect officials of the national and four state governments. Tosiwo Nakayama (r. 1979–87), the former president of the Congress of Micronesia, became the first president of the FSM, and a judicial system was established.

Under a 15-year compact signed with the United States in 1982, and put in force on November 3, 1986, Micronesia agreed to continue allowing the United States to control its relations with other countries and maintain its exclusive military access to the islands. In turn the United States guaranteed to continue annual funding to buoy the Micronesian economy. In 1991 the FSM was admitted to the United Nations. In 1997 President Bailey Olter (1932–99) suffered a stroke, and vice president, Jacob Nena (b. 1941), replaced him for the remaining two years of his tenure. In May 1999 Leo Falcam (b. 1935) was elected president for a two-year term.

Recently the Federated States of Micronesia has been seeking different ways to boost the productivity of its economy because it remains heavily dependent on U.S. money. Current sources of income are fishing fees, selling its Internet domain name (.fm) to radio stations, and producing sakau (kava) crops.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

In an area of Oceania known as Micronesia is a conglomeration of different countries that are islands in the western Pacific, about 2,500 miles southwest of Hawaii, located just above the equator. They are united in their history by having been at some point in time part of the U.S. Trust Territory of Micronesia. Of these, Guam is still a U.S. territory; the Republic of Palau and the Marshall Islands are independent nations; the Mariana Islands are a commonwealth associated with the United States; and Pohnpei, Yap, Chuuk, and Kosrae are the largest of the islands that make up the Federated States of Micronesia (FSM).

FSM includes a total of 607 islands. Although they occupy a total land area of only 271 square

El Niño: Southern Oscillation (ENSO) Event

El Niño was first identified by fishermen off the western coast of South America when unusually warm water appeared in the Pacific Ocean near the beginning of the year. El Niño means “The Little Boy” or “Christ child” in Spanish, and the phenomenon was so named because it tends to show up around Christmas. In normal, non-El Niño conditions the trade winds blow toward the west across the tropical Pacific, piling up warm surface water in the west Pacific, causing the sea surface to be a little more than $\frac{1}{2}$ foot higher at Indonesia than it is at Ecuador. The sea surface temperature is about 46°F higher in the west, whereas the upwelling of cold water from deeper levels causes the temperatures off South America to be cooler. This cold water is rich in nutrients and supports high levels of primary productivity, diverse marine ecosystems, and major fisheries.

El Niño disrupts the ocean atmosphere system in the tropical Pacific, with important consequences for weather around the globe. These worldwide effects cause changes in tropical rainfall, which then influence wind patterns over much of the world. Dense tropical rain clouds distort the air flow aloft (5–10 miles above sea level) on a horizontal scale of thousands of miles. The waves in the air flow, in turn, determine the positions of the monsoons and the storm tracks and belts of strong winds aloft (the jet streams) that separate warm and cold regions at the planet’s surface. In El Niño years, when the rain area usually centered over Indonesia and the far western Pacific moves east into the central Pacific, the waves in the flow aloft are affected, causing unseasonable weather around the world.

Every two to seven years, off the western coast of South America, ocean currents and winds shift, bringing warm water westward, displacing the nutrient-rich cold water that normally wells up from deep in the ocean. The invasion of warm water disrupts both the marine food chain and the economies of coastal communities that are based on fishing and related industries. The eastward displacement of the atmospheric heat source overlaying the warmest water results in large changes in the global atmospheric circulation, which in turn force changes in weather in regions far removed from the tropical Pacific. Rainfall follows the warm water eastward, with associated flooding in Peru and drought in Indonesia and Australia.

miles, they occupy more than one million square miles of the Pacific Ocean, ranging 1,700 miles from east to west. Pohnpei occupies nearly half of the country's land area, and the balance is almost equally divided among the other three states.

The islands of Pohnpei, Kosrae, and Chuuk are volcanic islands, while Yap is an elevated portion of the Eurasian plate. These islands are similar to the volcanic islands of Hawaii, with fertile soils, lush vegetation, and an abundance of water.

The Federated States of Micronesia have a tropical oceanic climate that is consistently warm and humid, with uniform temperatures (varying between 81°F and 90°F, sometimes dropping as low as 70°F). Rainfall is quite heavy; Pohnpei actually has the reputation of being one of the wettest places on Earth since it receives up to 330 inches of rain annually. During the typhoon season (August–December) the low-lying atolls are often hit by tropical typhoons. The wettest months are April and May. Drought conditions also occur periodically throughout FSM, especially when El Niño conditions develop over the western Pacific. At that time groundwater supplies dwindle drastically.

Due to the heavy rainfall in the area these islands are crisscrossed by a number of rivers, such as the Nanpil on the island of Pohnpei. The highest point on the islands is Dolohmwar (Totolom) at a height of 2,595 feet.

Apart from a few Asian sambar deer left on Pohnpei, the only land mammals that inhabit the Federated States of Micronesia are bats. Fruit bats, with wingspans of up to 3 feet, can be seen at dusk on most of the islands. There are also plenty of monitor lizards (up to 6 feet long), geckoes, and skinks (a type of lizard). Marine life includes hard and soft corals, anemones, sponges, whales, porpoises, and shellfish (including the giant tridacna clam). Some species of sea turtles lay their eggs on the local beaches, and there are more than 200 species of birds in Micronesia. The surrounding coral reefs abound in colorful tropical fish, turtles, and manta rays. The ocean waters house lots of game fish like marlin, mahi-mahi, tuna, barracuda, sailfish, and assorted bottom fish (literally, fish from the bottom of the ocean).

FSM offers a diverse range of natural ecosystems, ranging from mangrove swamps to verdant tropical rain forests and pristine coral reefs. A wild profusion of tropical shrubs, flowers, and more than 600 species of trees grow in the FSM states. These include hibiscus, Hong Kong orchids, ironwood, eucalyptus, Honduras mahogany, papaya, bananas, coconuts, and plumeria (Frangipani) trees.

❁ ECONOMY

In FSM economic activity consists primarily of subsistence farming and fishing. The fishing industry is very important. Foreign commercial fishing fleets pay over US$20 million annually for the right to operate in FSM territorial waters. These licensing fees account for nearly 30 percent of the islands' domestic revenue. Additionally exports of marine products, mainly re-exports of fish to Japan, account for nearly 85 percent of export revenue. Other than high-grade phosphate, the islands have few mineral deposits worth exploiting. There is tremendous potential for the tourism industry to boom, but the remote location and the lack of basic infrastructure and facilities are major hindrances.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

It is believed that the people of Micronesia arrived here from Asia thousands of years ago. With the arrival of Europeans, Micronesian cultural traditions were eroded over the decades of colonial rule. In the 21st century Micronesians are earnestly trying to preserve and promote what remains of their culture.

Micronesian societies are made up of clan groupings, with descent traced through the mother (except on Yap, where descent is patrilineal). The clan groupings extend across islands. Extended families are prevalent, and most households include grandparents, cousins, children, and adopted hangers-on.

In the traditional music of Micronesia singing always predominates. It is accompanied by few instruments except for conch shell horns, sticks, and a box beaten by a multitude of hands to provide the rhythm. With no written language, the traditional music of Micronesia is a rich repertoire of the spirituality and culture of the Micronesian people. Micronesian chants have a haunting, mesmerizing quality about them that reflects the resilience of ancient seafarers who sailed by the stars, the wave patterns, movements of the birds, and distinct cloud formations. These chants are highly spiritual in nature; in fact they invoke mythological gods or ancestors for their blessings and favor in any venture about to be undertaken.

Traditional dancing is highly valued throughout Micronesia, but especially so on the island of Yap, which is averse to Western culture and lifestyle. The shuffling and the shaking of the bodies are performed by groups, with members of the two sexes dancing separately. The dance is accompanied by chanting in unison.

Community buildings in Micronesia were generally constructed with planks of mahogany, while the roofs were thatched by the leaves of Nipa palm. Though Western architecture has left its mark, there are still a number of examples of traditional architecture to be seen in Micronesia.

Micronesia also has a rich tradition of canoe-building that can be traced back to the first sailors who reached the islands.

Fun Fact

Chuukese lovesticks—slender, dagger-shaped wooden rods carved on each side—are now sold in handfuls to tourists looking for “exotic” souvenirs, but in the past island men carved their personal notches on a lovestick. At night, lovestick in hand, a would-be suitor would kneel beside the thatched wall opposite the position where a woman slept, poke the stick through the wall, and entangle her hair, hopefully waking her without also waking her family. The wordless language of the lovestick would begin when the girl felt around the shaft’s notches and identified its owner.

Fun Fact

One of Yap’s outer islands Woleai Atoll illustrates how serious the Yapese are about preserving their traditions: On the atoll there are rules against wearing T-shirts, pants, baseball caps, and other Western clothing. Although tourists are not required to observe the clothing regulations, they are more readily welcomed if they wear traditional outfits.

☼ CUISINE

Breadfruit and seafood are staple ingredients of the cuisine on all the islands, although Pohnpeians are especially fond of yams and sakau, a narcotic drink made from the roots of pepper shrubs. In addition these islanders use both turtles and eggs for food.

Micronesians habitually chew burw (betel nut), mixing it with mineral lime, which keeps the active ingredient in its freebase or alkaline form, enabling it to enter the bloodstream via sublingual absorption. Its effects are often further enhanced by the addition of plain tobacco, or tobacco soaked in vodka, to the nuts. Betel nut juice dyes the teeth of Micronesians red.

Public/Legal Holidays☼ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is widely celebrated as New Year’s Day. Celebrations take place all over the world starting on the evening of December 31 (New Year’s Eve). In FSM, as in most parts of the world, New Year’s Day is the harbinger of new hopes and aspirations. It is celebrated in the company of one’s family, friends, and acquaintances with dance and musical programs, as well as parties and get-togethers.

☼ FSM CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 10

This official holiday commemorates a significant event in the history of FSM. On this day the FSM adopted a new constitution, thereby becoming a sovereign state. This event is observed with speeches and parades.

☼ MICRONESIAN DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 12

This day is very important to the people of Micronesia. Whether by accident or design, several historic events took place on this day, though in different years. On July 12, 1965, the Congress of Micronesia met for the first time; then the first Micronesian Constitution Convention opened on this day in 1975. Next FSM citizens approved the constitution by a plebiscite on July 12, 1978. Finally the Supreme Court of the Federated States of Micronesia assumed its official duties on July 12, 1981.

☼ KOSRAE LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 8

Though celebrated throughout all of UFM, this is one of the chief holidays in Kosrae. It commemorates the defeat of the Japanese on the islands by American troops toward the end of World War II. Celebrations include canoe races and other sports competitions.

☼ POHNPEI LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 11

Following immediately after Kosrae Liberation Day, this official holiday marks the end of the Japanese occupation of the island of Pohnpei during World War II. It is preceded by a week of sports and traditional events.

✿ UNITED NATIONS DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 24

This is one of the epoch-making events in the history of the modern world. In the aftermath of World War II, a centralized world organization known as the United Nations (UN) was founded to control, monitor, and supervise the maintenance of peace and harmony around the world. All major nations were represented. In FSM on this day people recall the significant contributions of the UN to maintaining global peace continuously for the past six decades. This day is observed by means of religious prayers for peace, UN flag-raising, and parades. All educational and public institutions remain closed.

✿ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 3

The Federated States of Micronesia (FSM) gained its independence on this day in 1986, after over 400 years of foreign domination—by Spain, Germany, and finally the United States.

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity, made up of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Palm Sunday is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross. After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature for a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

✿ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during the meal Jesus had with his Apostles. First Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist: a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as communion in Christian churches.

In the Roman Catholic Church, Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Mourning Friday, Holy Friday, or Great Friday, falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world when Christians contemplate the meaning of Jesus' Crucifixion. Some Micronesians observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent), for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. On Good Friday people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings.

The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, "command," because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

☼ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus was laid in the tomb. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday), the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. This is the final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday. It marks the threshold between death and Resurrection and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

☼ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire extended families gather to celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

In Micronesia people attend midnight prayer services for Easter and celebrate Jesus' Resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit envelops churches as people sing devotional hymns.

☼ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Date: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe to be the Son of God. In FSM on Christmas day, Protestant Christians attend their local churches and spend the major part of the day there. Every minister, lay preacher, and missionary in the area delivers a message during an elaborate worship service. Worshipers spend a good deal of time singing hymns and carols. Christmas on Kosrae is much livelier. There are formation marches, singing competitions, and a grand feast, open to all.

☼ YAP DAY

Observed in: Yap
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 1

Yap Day is celebrated every March by the four islands of Yap; it is an official holiday. The festivities are an authentic expression of the rich culture of Yap, which has only recently been opened to visitors. It is primarily a way of celebrating dance by holding competitions among Yapese villages. Each year a different village hosts the Mit-mit, providing free traditional and Western food and drink to those who attend. Traditional Yapese dances are performed including sitting dances, kneeling dances, standing dances, and stick dances. Female dancers attired in richly colored grass skirts and men in loin cloths (thuwis) perform sitting and standing dances. The most popular and exciting, however, are the stick dances, and crowds gather to see how well each village performs and to cheer for their favorite.

The villages spend most of the previous year choreographing their dances and practicing them. Villages prepare and rehearse as many as 12 dances, and each dance tells a story. However, after all that effort, Yap Day dances can only be performed once in public and then once in the village before they have to be retired.

Competitions in traditional tattooing are also held. Farmers exhibit fresh produce with contests for the largest and best local offerings. The children also participate in traditional games and tests of skill in spear throwing, fishing, and making handicrafts.

On the last day of the festival, the Yap Visitors Bureau hosts a welcome reception to honor guests and the visitor who traveled farthest to get there. Most guests at the Yap Day festivities come from neighboring islands. Only a small number of tourists is allowed, making it a privilege to attend.

☼ POHNPEI CULTURE DAY

Yap Currency

Yap consists of four islands joined inside a coral reef and part of an uplift of the Eurasian plate. An outer barrier reef surrounds the islands and encloses a lagoon between fringing reefs and the inner edge of the barrier reef. Twelve thousand people live in Yap. The people of Yap speak five languages, including English, and their society is divided into seven distinct social classes. As the center of a huge sea empire, Yap once controlled most of the trade in the Pacific.

No one knows why the Yap islanders began to use stone currency, especially a currency so cumbersome and difficult to obtain. The coins of Yap are huge stone rounds called vai (or fe). They are often made of aragonite, a mineral that is not found on Yap. That is why they had to be brought by sea from the island of Palau, almost 500 miles away. Transporting the stones would have required at least five days over the rough Pacific, and men often died in the process. The value of individual coins is based on two factors: the diameter of the coin (some are 12 feet in diameter) and how many men died bringing it to Yap. The more casualties, the more the coin is worth.

The vai is not currency as this term is defined in the West; it is a symbol of prestige and wealth. When the need arises, the coin can be carried from one place to another by inserting a sturdy pole through the hole in the middle of the coin. While small coins can be managed by only two men, the larger ones may require as many as 20 strong men. Moving the stones is not always necessary either. Sometimes a coin can change hands but remain stationary because everyone can remember who it belongs to.

In 1929, 13,821 stone rounds of different diameters were counted on the island, but only about half of them remain. The decrease in their numbers, is their “bank value.” The Bank of Hawaii buys them at the ordinary exchange rate, which is calculated by their diameter and the number of men who died bringing them from Palau. A vai that measures 1 inch in diameter is worth about US$72, so a vai 7 feet in diameter represents a fortune for Yap islanders.

A number of indigenous traditions have survived two centuries of colonial rule by the Spanish, Germans, Japanese, and Americans and still influence Pohnpei's social and political character strongly. Of these, Pohnpei's cultural dances and the local brew, sakau, have become popular attractions for visitors to the island.

One of the highlights of this holiday is a sakau-making ceremony. It is an elaborate ritual that dates back to Pohnpei's prehistory and is a regular feature of any cultural performance.

❁ KOSRAE ARTS FESTIVAL

Observed in: Early September

The Kosrae Arts Festival is an annual week-long celebration of the Kosrae people, culture, and traditions. The arts festival is held early in September to commemorate the September 8, 1945, liberation of Kosrae, marking the end of World War II and the suffering it caused.

Visitors who want to see more of Kosrae should take a break and hike to the Menka ruins, one of Kosrae's greatest treasures. This is where the temple of the goddess of breadfruit Sinlaku is located. She spent her last days on Kosrae before fleeing to Yap when the first Christian missionaries arrived in 1852. According to legend, an islander heard a strange voice from Sinlaku one night, describing a light coming in from the horizon, a very strong light that this goddess was afraid of. This occurred on the night before the missionaries arrived on the SS Morning Star. This is one reason that it was easy for locals to be converted to Christianity.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In the Federated States of Micronesia there are no ceremonies before childbirth, although certain customs are strictly followed by expectant mothers. Micronesians believe that a pregnant woman should not go out at night. If she does she will become very weak and sick when her child is born. The woman is encouraged to do exercises and swim in saltwater. There are also many restrictions regarding the food she can eat.

Responsibility for the pregnant woman is usually her mother's, but other women familiar with delivering babies may be asked to assist. After the delivery and the severing of the umbilical cord, the husband buries the cord and plants a coconut tree to mark the place. The new mother is given healthy food and local medicine to help her regain her strength. The baby is kept warm with a large leaf that is warmed up and placed on its body.

According to Kosraean custom, the husband stays in a different room or house for a fairly long time after a child is delivered. This ensures that the mother or the child will not contract any diseases or infections and enables the new mother to devote her full attention to the newborn child.

The main celebrations following childbirth take place a year after the child is born. Plans for the occasion are made well in advance, and the child's father is expected to assume all the responsibilities and expenses. Early in the morning on this day, the mother feeds and bathes the child and dresses it in its finest clothes. The preparations for the feast begin quite early in the day and include items such as breadfruit, taro, pigs, and chicken. Cooking takes place at the houses of the relatives of both the husband and the wife. Most of the festive cooking is done by men. On this occasion the female visitors bring gifts for the baby. After the cooking is done, the food is brought together, and the father of the child selects several men to distribute it. The child's mother is responsible for keeping track of the gifts and the food.

✿ MARRIAGE

Traditionally two young people willing to get married must get to know each other's feelings before they marry. They usually make arrangements to meet each other secretly outside their homes. These meetings will continue until they both want to get married. After they make up their minds, both the young man and his future wife inform their parents. If the boy's parents agree, then a date is fixed for visiting the bride. On this occasion the boy carries with him the ingredients for making the Pohnpeian drink called sakau and is accompanied by a number of relatives. When they arrive at the young lady's house, they cut the root of the sakau plant and pound it into a drink. Then they squeeze the liquid into coconut shell cups and offer it to the relatives of the young woman. When the groom-to-be offers the drink to the prospective father-in-law, he explains the purpose of his visit. After an agreement is reached, the young man and woman are asked if they are willing to marry each other and live together for the rest of their lives. If both say "yes," the wedding date is set. Finally, on the wedding day, the boy's family organizes a large party to entertain all the friends and relatives who attend the ceremony.

✿ DEATH

Funerals in Micronesia still follow indigenous traditions. When a person dies, the family notifies the leader of the community, as well as the individual's relatives. It is customary for those who attend the funeral to bring rice, biscuits, coffee, canned meat, and other edible items. These will be given to the family and served during their period of mourning. Stationed near the coffin, there is always a woman who awaits new arrivals. When someone approaches to greet her, she cries and wails. At night groups of men and women place themselves by the coffin to sing and pray aloud. At daybreak, the male relatives of the dead return to their homes to gather yams, pigs, dogs, and breadfruit to prepare a meal that they cook in an underground oven called an ubmw. This is the most important aspect of the funeral. All kinds of food items go into the ubmw. A massive feast takes place in the traditional Pohnpeian feast house (nabs) before the body is taken to be buried. A high-quality sakau (an intoxicating drink made from the roots of pepper shrubs) is brought before the chief (nabm-warki) and pounded to extract the liquid. Only after the chief has drunk the liquor will the other guests drink it.

Meanwhile, the family members prepare for the burial. People approach the coffin to weep and say their last words in prayers and songs, in addition to donating money. Before burial a priest or minister recites a prayer. After the prayer the women and children weep ceremonially. Then the men come to take the corpse to the burial site. On the way to the burial ground people sing and cry. At the burial ground the priest completes the prayers. After the prayers are over one by one all those who have assembled throw handfuls of soil on the coffin, and the grave is sealed. After the burial those of higher rank take their share of the food and go home, while others stay on at the nabs to drink sakau.

From the fifth to the ninth day after the funeral, members of the immediate family and some friends get together to drink sakau, dine together, and fondly recall the deceased. Some relatives remain at the house of death until the 10th day. On the 10th night the immediate family hosts a farewell party for the deceased. A number of visitors come to the deceased's home where they are presented with floral garlands, oil, loincloths (lavalawas), and many more gifts. Then they drink sakau together. This marks the end of the funeral.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Moldovans and Romanians are both descended from the Dacians, an Indo-European tribe of Thracian lineage, who inhabited a large area of Central Europe, roughly as big as present-day Moldova and Romania, in ancient times. Dacia's capital was Sarmizegetusa. Dacia existed at least as early as the third century B.C.E., and in the second century it was ruled by a king named Oroles. Certainly by the time the Romans encountered them, the Dacians had already attained a high level of social organization. There were two basic social classes: the aristocracy (tarabostes) and the common people (comati). Only aristocrats were permitted to cover their heads. Because they wore felt hats, the Romans called them pileati.

Dacians spoke an Indo-European (I-E) language, but linguists cannot agree about its characteristics because there is little archaeological evidence and very little linguistic evidence. Some scholars think it belonged to the Satem branch of Indo-European.

Traces of the Dacian language are believed to have been preserved in modern Romanian, some scholars have argued that Albanian is descended from a dialect of Dacian. (This would be hard to prove since linguistic scholars do not agree on the most basic features of the Dacians' language.)

The Dacians were an agrarian people and were primarily farmers, although they also raised bees and grapes, tended herds, and created objects of clay and knew metallurgy. They also worked the gold and silver mines of Transylvania.

Since Moldova is strategically located between Russia and Romania, it has suffered from innumerable disputes and invasions over the centuries. The country of Moldova was part of the Principality of Moldavia, a prosperous nation until the 14th century, but the Turks invaded Moldavia, and the country was controlled by the Ottoman Empire until 1711, when the Russians stepped in and fought to lay their claim over the territory. During the 18th century the Turks and the Russians fought intermittently to gain control of Moldova.

Eventually Russia and Turkey signed the Treaty of Bucharest in 1812, according to which the eastern half of the region (current Moldova) went to the Russians, who named it Bessarabia. Then in 1918, the Bessarabian legislature voted to become part of Romania. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), however, signed an agreement called the Molotop-Ribbentrop Pact with Germany in 1940, one result of which was that the USSR occupied Bessarabia. Their rule was short-lived. In 1941, the Romanians regained control of the territory and held it until 1944, when they found themselves on the losing side in World War II. Moldova was ceded back to Moscow when hostilities between the USSR and Romania ended. The boundary between Moldova and Romania established in 1947 is still in effect.

After the collapse of the USSR in August 1991, Moldova declared its independence. In March 1992 the Republic of Moldova became a member of the United Nations. Although Moldova became independent, there are still traces of internal tension and strife. After independence the minorities in the region of Transnistria wanted to retain their ties with Russia and still do not consider themselves a part of Moldova. Sporadic fighting between the rebels and the Moldovan military occurs, and the issue was still unresolved early in the 21st century.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Eastern Europe, the Republic of Moldova is a landlocked nation between Romania and Ukraine. Moldova has a hilly terrain with grasslands in the northern and central parts of the country; the region has rolling plains. The two most striking geographical features of Moldova are the Dniester River and the Prut River, which form natural boundaries with Ukraine and Romania, respectively. The highest point of Moldova lies in the northern part of the country, Dealul Balanesti, which is more than 1,410 feet high.

Moldova enjoys a temperate continental climate characterized by mild winters and warm summers. The average temperature in summer is 77°F, while in winter it averages around 25°F. The climatic conditions and its fertile black soil make Moldova a prime area for farming and ideal for growing a wide variety of fruits and vegetables.

In terms of flora, Moldova is home to trees such as the oak, elm, beech, fir, and hornbeam, while its fauna includes badgers, roes, stags, wild boar, carp, salmon, bream, and a wide variety of reptiles and birds.

ECONOMY

In terms of per capita gross domestic product (GDP), Moldova is the poorest country in Europe. The nation's economy is weak. It depends on agriculture, namely vegetables, fruits, wine, and tobacco. Around one-third of the nation's labor force is employed in the agriculture sector. Extensive vineyards are found all across Moldova, and it produces good wines that are exported throughout the world. Moldova is also known for its champagne and liqueurs.

Moldova is dependent on the Russian Federation to meet its needs for raw materials and energy. Thus the devaluation of the Russian ruble in 1998 had a serious impact on Moldova's economy. Also a severe drought and poor climatic conditions in recent years have diminished Moldova's agricultural production and aggravated its economic woes.

At present the government of Moldova is working with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank to introduce economic reforms to revive its ailing economy.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Moldova's society reflects its ethnic diversity. Only 65 percent of its citizens are ethnic Moldovans (or Romanians); the country is also home to Russians, Ukrainians, Jews, Germans, Greeks, Bulgarians, and Gagauz (an ethnic group of Turkey). It is a predominantly Christian society. Around 98 percent of the nation's population adheres to Eastern Orthodox beliefs. Moldovan, similar to Romanian, is the national and official language of Moldova, although Russian and Gagauz (a Turkish dialect) are also spoken in different parts of the country.

Although there are regional differences in how Moldovan holidays are celebrated, common threads run through them. The traditions and customs of the country include both Christian and non-Christian holidays, which originated during the pre-Christian era. Since Moldovan is now mainly an Eastern Orthodox country, this form of Christianity permeates the spirit of the holidays, with other themes such as the seasons or common trades being blended within Christian motifs.

In the expression of popular customs there are the living and the ancestors who preceded them. Moldova culture carefully preserves the memory of ancestral peoples. The focus of their popular spirituality differs from one village to the next.

Traditionally Moldovans continue to live much as their ancestors, the Dacians, did. They are farmers who work the land, keep vineyards, raise cattle, or live as shepherds, and their spiritual expression reflects these pursuits. Spring and summer are devoted to working the land. Autumn is the time for harvesting the fruits of one's labor, and winter is the time for artistic creativity and spiritual growth. Delicate, graceful, and sober, the popular art of Moldova has been kept alive by the villages. Village leaders assumed the task of guarding the originality, individuality, and permanency of artisans' work.

In a Moldovan house, the most important part is the living room, also known as casa mare (house of happiness). The walls of the room are covered with portraits of family members (parents, children, grandparents, and grandchildren) and homespun towels. All important feasts and celebrations take place in the casa mare. Also, Moldovans do not dig wells in their courtyards but along the streets so that thirsty people can quench their thirst easily.

Especially during winter, men and women gather together to sing, dance, and practice traditional handicrafts. These social meetings are known as sezatorile.

Moldovans are known for their expertise in traditional folk art forms such as pottery, carpet-making, weaving, and wood and stone carving. Folk songs and dances are an integral part of Moldovan society, and an ancient ballad, “Miorita” (“The Little Ewe Lamb”), which belongs to the country’s pastoral folklore, is extremely popular. Traditional musical instruments include the flute, bagpipes, the violin, and panpipes.

❁ CUISINE

Some of the traditional dishes of Moldova include mamaliga (maize porridge), tochitura moldoveneasca (pan-fried pork cooked in spicy pepper sauce), chicken soup, fried meat, cabbage rolls, mangea (chicken sausages), sorpa (spicy ram soup), pelmeni (rolls stuffed with meat), noodles, jelly, pies, biscuits, and cakes. In addition, fruits, vegetables, and milk products are integral foods in Moldovan cuisine.

Traditional drinks include wine, fruit juices, tuica (plum brandy), and stewed fruits.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year’s Day all over the world. Celebrations and revelry begin the evening of December 31 (New Year’s Eve). In Moldova special parties are held on New Year’s Eve, and people sing and dance their way into the new year.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 14

Because Orthodox Churches follow the Julian calendar, there is a 13-day difference between the traditional New Year’s and the celebration of Orthodox New Year’s. Moldovans consider New Year’s Eve auspicious. They believe it should not be spent alone since it marks the birth of a child (the new year) and the departure of a tired, old man (the past year). A Moldovan folktale also claims that, on New Year’s Eve, the sky opens for a moment so that God can view his people on Earth, and the faithful can catch a glimpse of him.

The well-wishers are expected during the afternoon of New Year’s Eve, groups who extend wishes for a happy life, prosperity, and fertility in the coming year. The children, who symbolize purity and hope, usually receive apples, nuts, and home-baked bread. The old fertility rite is a poem describing, in a mythical manner, the labors to be performed by the plowman, ranging from sowing to bread-making, and including reaping the harvest. These events are celebrated with festive parties throughout Moldova, and everyone rejoices and ushers in the new year with great enthusiasm. People feast at a traditional New Year’s Eve dinner that consists of turkey and then leave to attend social gatherings where they will celebrate the new year. Friends and family members visit each other and exchange greetings with wishes for a happy, healthy, and prosperous new year.

On New Year’s Day Moldovans recite an old fertility rite poem that narrates the labor of a plowman (or farmer) since they consider wheat a symbol of prosperity and wealth. Folk songs expressing the desire for good fortune, good weather, a good harvest, good health, and happiness are sung. Folk dances too are an important part of the New Year’s Day celebrations. Many dances are performed by dancers wearing costumes such as sheepskin and masks. Children receive gifts of apples, breads, and nuts on this day because these are all considered symbols of purity.

Moldovans see no conflict in celebrating two new years, one right after the other. On the contrary they regard themselves as twice blessed.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN’S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women’s Day is celebrated on March 8. It commemorates the social, economic, political, and cultural achievements of women throughout the world. It is a time for reflecting on the past and contemplating the future. It began in 1909, to honor the women of the New York garment worker’s strike the year before. Since 1977, it has had the official backing of the United Nations.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers’ Day, in many parts of the world, commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

May 1 is a public holiday in Moldova and all public and private institutions remain closed on Labor Day.

❁ NATIONAL HEROES' DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 9

National Heroes' Day, or Victory Day, commemorates the victory of Allied forces over Nazi Germany in World War II, on May 9, 1945. On this day people all over the country remember those Moldovan soldiers who fought against the Nazis and defeated them in World War II. On this day in the capital of Chisinau people gather at the War Memorial and lay floral tributes at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Also the head of state and senior government officials, as well as foreign diplomats and ambassadors, lay wreaths on the tomb and join the entire world in honoring the brave soldiers of World War II.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 27

On August 27, 1991, Moldova declared its independence from the USSR and proclaimed its sovereignty. Since 1945 Moldova had been under the dominance of the United Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) and was known as the Soviet Socialist Republic of Moldova. The Soviet practice of deporting ethnic Romanians from Moldova and the migration of Russian workers into the region created a lot of discontent. After the collapse of the USSR in August 1991, Moldova got the opportunity for independence it was seeking.

On this day Independence Day celebrations are organized in the capital of Chisinau. The president presides over the celebration, which is marked with military parades, official speeches, musical concerts, and Independence Day parties. Every region also holds its own special Independence Day celebrations.

❁ LIMBA NOASTRA

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 31

Limba Noastra ("Our Mother Tongue"), or National Language Day, is celebrated in honor of Moldovan, the national language of Moldova. On this day Moldovan literary figures such as poets, novelists, dramatists, and playwrights are honored in special ceremonies throughout the country. In the capital of Chisinau, there is an open-air concert where many go to hear the sound of traditional Moldovan music and watch folk dances and performances by Moldovan and international pop stars and bands. "Limba Noastra" is also the title of Moldova's national anthem.

Religious Holidays

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 7

Most Orthodox Churches follow the Julian calendar instead of the Gregorian, or Western, calendar. There is a difference of 13 days between the Julian and the Gregorian calendars, so Moldovan Orthodox Christians celebrate the birth of Jesus on January 7.

Orthodox Christmas also marks the end of the six-week fast—called Little Lent, Nativity Fast, Winter Lent, or the Christmas Lent—undertaken by Orthodox Christians to honor the Virgin Mary for carrying Jesus in her womb. (It is called Little Lent to distinguish it from Great Lent, which precedes Easter.) During the fast Moldovan Christians abstain from eating any animal product, including meat, eggs, milk, cheese, or fish. Christmas marks the end of this fasting period (also known as Orthodox Lent or Advent in Western churches) and is celebrated with great fanfare.

On Christmas Eve (January 6), Christmas trees are decorated and carol singers go from door to door singing beautiful Christmas carols in the afternoon and evening. A traditional family dinner is prepared where two of the most favorite traditional dishes, beef salad and pigs-in-the-blanket (cabbage rolls), are served. Children also love to feast on walnut and raisin cakes. Families attend midnight liturgies in their local churches. Children believe that Santa Claus will leave a present under their Christmas tree on Christmas Eve, and, as in many parts of the world, adults dressed as Santa Claus visit them on Christmas Eve and give them their presents. There are also some interesting traditions and symbols of Christmas Eve associated with the hope for a prosperous New Year. These include folk dances, masked plays, folk theater, and performances of the plowman's song (about sowing seeds and reaping a good harvest).

On Christmas Day (January 7), Moldovans visit their friends and family members and exchange gifts and greetings. Visits and celebrations continue the second day of Christmas (January 8) in Moldova.

❁ HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Begins on Palm Sunday and ends on Easter

In the Eastern Orthodox Church 100 days are dedicated to Easter, 50 before it for preparation, and another 50 after it for commemorating the glorification of Jesus. The 50 days before Easter, known as part of the period called Triodion (“three” + “odes”; the Triodion is the book that contains services for the movable feasts from the 10th Sunday preceding Easter through the Great Saturday of Holy Week.) are the period for strengthening one’s faith. The means are repentance, prayer, and self-control. This preparation is necessary before entering Holy Week.

The Saturday before Palm Sunday is celebrated as the Morning of St. Lazarus because Jesus had raised Lazarus from the dead, thereby earning the respect and faith of the people, but also the hatred of the fanatics. The church calls this day the Saturday of Lazarus to remember the resurrection of Lazarus and its promise of universal resurrection for all.

As in other Christian Churches, Holy Week is the center of the church’s liturgical calendar. Also called Great Week or Passion Week for the triumphant entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem until Easter, the Resurrection, remembers events in the final week of Jesus’ life, linking prophecy with its fulfillment.

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday celebrates the glorious and brilliant feast of the entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem. Zechariah had prophesied the entrance of the Messiah into Jerusalem, and the contemporary Jews associated this prophecy with the expected Messiah. The news that Jesus was in Bethany provoked indignation among the high priests, who had decided to kill him. The multitudes, with palm branches in their hands, spread their cloaks on the road as a show of respect. The custom of giving branches of palms to the people in the church commemorates the victory of Jesus over evil.

The Sunday before Easter Sunday is called Flowers’ Sunday in Moldova. On this day a special celebration takes place for all who have names associated with flowers. Fish may be eaten that day.

✿ HOLY THURSDAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

On Thursday in Holy Week the Orthodox Church celebrates four events: the washing of the disciples’ feet, the institution of the Holy Eucharist, the Marvelous Prayer, and Judas’ betrayal. These were the closing moments of Jesus’ life. After the washing of the Apostles’ feet, he identified his betrayer, initiated the Eucharist, and pronounced the new commandment to love one another.

In the Eastern Orthodox Church, the evening service on Holy Wednesday is the evening of repentance, confession, and remission of sins, preparing the faithful to receive Holy Communion, usually on Holy Thursday morning.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday celebrates the passion of Jesus. After the reading of the Fifth Gospel a cross is carried around the church. During this service, the removal of Jesus’ body from the cross is reenacted with a sense of mourning for the terrible events that took place. The priest removes the body of Jesus from the cross, wraps it in a white cloth, and carries it to the altar. The priest then carries the cloth on which the body of Jesus is painted or embroidered around the church before placing it inside the sepulcher, a carved bier that symbolizes the Jesus’ tomb. Devout Christians observe Good Friday with fasting, prayer, cleanliness, self-examination, confession, good works, and repentance. On Good Friday, devout Moldovans offer prayers in their local churches and remember the life and teachings of Jesus.

✿ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

On Holy Saturday, the day before Easter and the celebration of Jesus’ Resurrection, Psalms are read and resurrection hymns are sung that relate Jesus’ descent into hell and subsequent triumph over death.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is the “Feast of Feasts.” The dates on which most of the holidays will be celebrated are determined on the basis of the date on which Easter is celebrated.

In the Orthodox Church, what is called Easter in Germanic countries is called Pascha in most others and connects the events of Holy Week with the Jewish celebration called Pesach (Passover) because it is believed that the Last Supper (Christ’s last meal with his Apostles) was a seder. Easter Eve is marked by total fasting. Before midnight the Odes of Lamentation of the previous day are repeated. A midnight liturgy takes place with a remarkable candle procession as part of the ceremony. The service begins in complete darkness. The priest takes light from the vigil light and gives it to the faithful, who are holding candles. From this moment, every Christian holds the Easter candle as a symbol of deep faith in Jesus' Resurrection. In many churches the priest leads the people outside the church. All believers exchange greetings on this joyous occasion that marks Jesus' Resurrection. The first Easter meal takes place that night after the Divine Liturgy. Expressing good wishes through dance is present in most Moldovan/Romanian customs.

Easter Sunday afternoon the faithful gather again for prayer with lighted candles and again greet one another joyously, saying: "Christ is Risen," the Easter salutation, which is answered, "Truly He is Risen." In addition to the Easter celebrations, there is a spring celebration in which, before the shepherds leave for the mountains, all who plan to send their sheep along with them gather on a particular Sunday. Each person milks a sheep and afterwards, a meal, songs and dances take place.

Because a six-week fast precedes the Easter holiday, the rituals of traditional food preparation resemble those of Christmas. Lamb, cheese cake, colored eggs, and feta cheese appear on every Easter table. The egg as a symbol represents the miracle of creation. A ritual coloring of the eggs takes place to express this symbolism, copied from the pagan spring festivals in Old Europe and reinterpreted by the early church. The first egg colored for Easter belongs to the children and it must be colored red. It is placed in the children's room to protect them from evil. The second egg colored is blue, representing the "love of young women." It is meant to bring good luck in a marriage. On the first day of Easter, one egg is placed in a pot of water. A silver coin and some fresh basil are added to the water. All household members will wash their faces with this water.

Easter Monday falls on the first Monday after Lent.

RISE OF THE HOLY CROSS

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: September 14

In September, when the year gradually becomes autumn, the Rise of the Holy Cross is celebrated. In the Orthodox faith the deep meaning of the cross was its ability to produce miracles. The frail and elderly particularly prayed for their own well-being on this day. The harvest is also celebrated by each family, as well as by the entire community.

MARTISOR DAY

Observed in: Moldova

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 1

In Moldova the first day of March is celebrated as Martisor. It marks the end of the winter season and the beginning of spring. On this day Moldovans tie knitted red-and-white ropes on their collars. The red color symbolizes spring, and the white color symbolizes winter. People give small presents to each other such as flowers, shells, animals, and even snowmen, as tokens of good luck for the season and the coming year. Young girls and women are also given red-and-white ribbons on this day.

Musical concerts and cultural dance programs are part of the grand Martisor day celebrations organized in the capital city of Chisinau. The president of the country is the chief guest at the celebrations.

WINE FESTIVAL

Observed in: Chisinau

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: October

The annual Wine Festival in Moldova takes place in October in the capital city of Chisinau. The government of Moldova organizes the festival, and the president presides over the celebrations. The objective of the festival is to encourage and promote the winemaking industry and the standard of viticulture in Moldova. It is also intended to popularize Moldovan wine among tourists who come to Moldova especially for this festival.

The main highlights of the festival are the parade of the wine makers; tasting sessions (by industry professionals and the general public) to prove the authenticity and superior quality of Moldovan wines; wine fairs, where wine products are displayed; promotional programs; competitions, lotteries, business meetings, consultations with specialists over the quality of the wines, and cultural programs such as folk songs and folk dances.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

In Moldova a number of rituals are observed after the birth of a child. It is traditional for the "first bath" ceremony of the child to take place under the guidance of the eldest female relative of the child's father. In a ritual performed only by women, clean water is mixed with milk, honey, money, and flowers and then used to bathe the child. The child is handed to his mother by the eldest female relative with wishes that the child should grow up to be an adult with moral and spiritual integrity and also be blessed with a happy, healthy, and long life. Also she expresses her wish that the child be respectful toward his or her parents, have patience in abundance, and grow up to be a hardworking person. The child is also wished a happy married life. Moldovans believe birth to be a transition from blackness (an unknown world) to whiteness (the known world).

Another important ritual involves the christening of the child in a local church. Godparents play a vital role in the ceremony, and the child is named after one of the godparents or a close and respected relative.

❁ MARRIAGE

A Moldovan wedding ceremony includes colorful costumes, poetry, songs, and dance. It is traditional on the day of the wedding for a representative of the bridegroom to go the bride's home to escort her to the ceremony. Around the same time the groom's best men go around the village, distributing invitations among the men of the village. Then everyone joins the representative of the bridegroom, who narrates the story of a young emperor (used metaphorically to describe the bridegroom) who went hunting in the forest along with his warriors (the best men) and caught a glimpse of a fairy. The emperor instructed the warriors to find the whereabouts of the fairy, and in the process of following the trail of the fairy, they arrived at the bride's house. He also tells them that they have a flower (in this case, the bride) in the garden, which cannot bear fruit due to the soil. However, according to the story the flower would blossom and bear fruit if planted in the emperor's garden. The representative then hands the bride over to them, and they promise to escort her to the emperor's garden.

In many parts of Moldova, in order to win the bride and demonstrate his readiness to get married, the bridegroom has to pass a test of his cleverness. Generally this involves solving a number of riddles to prove his worthiness.

For her wedding the bride wears a ceremonial dress and flowers. As a married woman she is expected to wear a different hairstyle, and so a group of married women cover her head with a scarf in a special song-filled ceremony during the wedding. Thus the bride is accepted into the community of married women.

At the wedding reception after the ceremony everyone sings, dances, and feasts.

❁ DEATH

Moldovans believe every person is represented by three stars and a fir tree. They believe that after someone dies the stars fall from the sky. Young men go to the woods to bring the branches of a fir tree. A group of women receives them at the entrance to the village and sing songs about the link between the life of the deceased and the fir tree. They also express the grief of the fir tree, since it is destined to be laid near the head of the deceased person (considered brother or sister of the fir tree since their lives are linked) and eventually rot away.

Also at dawn between the two days that separate the death and the funeral, a group of elderly women sing the "Dawn Song," also known as the Bocetul (or "Great Song"). Moldovans believe this song serves as a guide to the soul of the deceased and describes the path he or she must take to reach the land of ancestors in the afterlife. The women also pray to the Sun asking it to rise later to allow the grieving family time to make preparations for the funeral.

The body of the deceased is never left alone, and there is a wake held at which friends and family members share their memories of the deceased. For the funeral the family of the deceased makes arrangements for the coffin, the shroud to cover the body, the bull-carriage for taking the body to the cemetery, and the food that will be served after the burial.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Although the recorded history of this principality is only available from the late 1200s, stone-age relics provide evidence of prehistoric habitation in the area. The earliest inhabitants of this region are believed to have been the Ligures (or Ligurians), who came from the coastal area of Liguria in Italy through Provence in France.

The sector was also visited by the ancient Phoenicians and other seafarers of the time. Controlled first by the ancient Greeks and then the Romans, the land was laid waste subsequently by the so-called barbarians and the Saracens. These tumultuous times continued until the 10th century.

A Genovese dynasty has ruled Monaco since the 13th century. In 1297 Francois Grimaldi, the leader of the Guelphs—a faction of the Holy Roman Empire—seized control of the fortress protecting Monaco and assured the rule of the House of Grimaldi over the country.

From 1524 to 1642 Monaco was under Spanish protection; thereafter it became a French protectorate. However, it has remained an independent state almost continuously since the Grimaldi's came to power. During the French Revolution France annexed Monaco in 1793, but the Grimaldis were returned to power by the Congress of Vienna in 1814, which placed them under the protection of the kingdom of Sardinia. This status remained in effect until 1860. Eventually, a treaty called the Franco-Monegasque treaty was signed in 1861, according to which Monaco again became a French protectorate but still continued to be independent. Another treaty signed with France states that, if the ruling member of the Grimaldi Dynasty dies without a successor, Monaco will become an autonomous region of France.

In the 20th century, Prince Rainier III (b. 1923–2005) assumed the throne in 1949, when King Louis II (1870–1949), his grandfather, died. Under Prince Rainier's rule Monaco became a modernized country. In May 1993 Monaco was admitted to the United Nations. Its visibility on the international stage was also advanced when Prince Rainier married Grace Kelly (1929–82), a glamorous Hollywood star whose family was quite prominent in Philadelphia society.

The 700th anniversary of the Grimaldi reign was celebrated in Monaco in 1997. In 2002 Prince Rainier revised the

The Ligures

The area of northern Italy and southern Gaul once inhabited by the Ligures (also called Ligurians) is now northern Tuscany, Piedmont, part of Lombardy, and parts of southeastern France. Classical references and place names suggest that the Ligurians may have lived farther south, perhaps as far as central Italy.

This ancient group has so far eluded positive identification. They may have been a pre-Indo-European people related to the Iberians, a separate Indo-European branch related to the Italic and Celtic groups, or perhaps a Celtic tribe. It has also been suggested that the Ligures may have been related to the Lepontii, a people who once inhabited Rhaetia in the Alps between modern-day Switzerland and Italy.

Before the Ligures were assimilated by the Romans they had been assimilated by the Gauls even earlier, producing a Celto-Ligurian culture.

constitution, abolished capital punishment, provided for women's suffrage, and established a supreme court to guarantee fundamental liberties. He also passed a law contravening an earlier treaty with France, stating that the Grimaldis will continue to rule Monaco even if the reigning monarch dies without an heir.

In March 2005 when Prince Rainier III became too ill to perform his royal functions, his son Prince Albert (b. 1958) took over the royal duties. After the death of Prince Rainier on April 6, 2005, Prince Albert succeeded him as Albert II of Monaco. Albert's elder sister HRH Caroline, Princess of Hanover acquired the title of Hereditary Princess of Monaco and follows him as heiress-presumptive in the line of succession to the Monegasque throne.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Principality of Monaco is located in Western Europe and is flanked by France on two sides. It is a little over 11 miles east of Nice, on the Mediterranean Sea, bordering the western coast of Italy. With less than 1 square mile of land area Monaco is the second smallest independent state in the world. (Vatican City is the smallest.)

Monaco has a hilly, rocky terrain. The highest point of the principality is Le Rocher at Mont Agel, which stands 459 feet high.

Monaco enjoys a Mediterranean climate characterized by wet winters and hot, dry summers. The average minimum temperature in Monaco is 46°F, while the average high temperature is 79°F. In terms of flora Monaco is home to trees such as pine, olive, aloe, and agaves.

❁ ECONOMY

Monaco has a booming economy with tourism as its main source of revenue. A pleasant climate, relaxed lifestyle, and picturesque architecture make Monaco a preferred travel destination. The casinos in Monaco are also a major tourist attraction. Monaco is a tax haven as well. The residents of Monaco do not pay any income tax, and in the past this has made Monaco a hotspot for wealthy businesspeople, who conduct business operations around the world while enjoying Monaco's tax advantages.

Monaco is not a member of the European Union (EU), but it shares a customs union with France, which is a member of the EU. This enables it to participate in trade activities with the member nations. The official currency of Monaco was the franc (French national currency) until France converted to the Euro. On January 1, 1999, Monaco too adopted the currency that is used by most member nations of the EU. However, the country has also continued using Monacan coins, which are minted and circulated by the government authorities.

❁ LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

In terms of national origins, Monacans constitute only 16 percent of Monaco's population, while the French community dominates with 47 percent. Monaco is also home to Italians and other foreigners, since businesspeople prefer to embrace the tax-free status that comes with Monacan citizenship. French is the offi-

Fun Fact

No one has positively identified the Lepontii, either. Recent archaeological discoveries indicate a possible Celtic relationship, but it is also possible that they were a mixed people with both Rhaetian and Celtic blood. (The Rhaetians were an Etruscan group.)

Monaco

Monaco derives its name from the nearby Greek colony Monoikos founded in the sixth century by the Phoceans (people from the Greek district of Phocis). According to local legend Hercules passed through the Monaco area, so the Phoceans built a temple there called the temple of Hercules Monoikos, which means "single house or temple."

Monaco is also the Italian word for “monk.”

cial language of Monaco, although English, Italian, and the local Monegasque (a mixed dialect derived from Italian and French) languages are also widely spoken in Monaco.

The Principality of Monaco is a predominantly Christian state with more than 90 percent of the population adhering to Roman Catholic beliefs.

The House of Grimaldi has been patrons of art and music and has instituted a number of competitions and awards to honor musical talents in Monaco. The late Prince Rainier III started a musical competition known as the Prince Rainier III Prize for Musical Compositions to encourage new musicians in Monaco as well as to provide them a platform to showcase their musical talents; under the patronage of his consort Princess Grace of Monaco Les Ballets de Monte Carlo blossomed. It continues to enthrall audiences across the globe with its theatrical performances.

Monaco is also the venue of the high-profile motorcar race the Formula One Grand Prix held in May every year and attended by many international celebrities.

❁ CUISINE

Some of the traditional Monacan specialties include: brandamincium (salted cod cooked with garlic, curd, and oil), barba-Giuan (a crisp pastry, filled with herbs and cheese), stocafi (dried cod stewed in tomato sauce), fougasses (crisp biscuits sprinkled with red and white aniseeds and flavored with rum), socca (a thin pancake), and cardu (cardoon, related to the artichoke) with white sauce.

Wine, beer, and martinis are the preferred beverages in Monaco.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Gregorian, or Western, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year's Day in many countries. Celebrations take place all over the world with festivities that begin on New Year's Eve (December 31). In the Principality of Monaco, special parties and gala events are held in restaurants and pubs throughout the country on New Year's Eve. People are also treated to the music of local and U.S. bands, choirs, and orchestras in special concerts that usher in the new year. The highlight of the celebrations is the performance by Les Ballets de Monte Carlo at the Opéra de Monte Carlo. At the stroke of midnight Monaco's skies light up with a spectacular display of fireworks, and people greet each other on this special occasion.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world. It is a day of recognition to acknowledge the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In the Principality of Monaco, Labor Day is a public holiday, and all government and private institutions remain closed.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 18–19

In Monaco, National Day celebrations take place over a period of two days. The official launch of National Day celebrations occurs on the eve of the National Day (November 18) with a well-orchestrated display of fireworks at Port Hercule. The next day members of the House of Grimaldi, the royal family of Monaco, attend a special Thanksgiving Mass at the Cathedral of Monaco and thank God for his benevolence.

A festive atmosphere envelops the entire nation, and special events are planned throughout the country. The Knights of Malta (a militant monastic order, recognized by the pope), distinguished diplomats, consuls, and state officials dressed in their medal-laden uniforms assemble at Place St. Nicholas in Monaco where state officials and citizens of Monaco receive medals of honor. Then the royal family goes to the prince's palace, where they wave to the crowds and greet them. Also Les Ballets de Monte Carlo captivates its audience with a powerful theatrical performance at the Opera de Monte Carlo.

Because late Prince Rainier III of Monaco was named after St. Rainier, whose feast is observed on November 19, National Day is also known as Prince of Monaco Day.

❁ ST. DEVOTE'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: January 27

St. Devote was a pious woman who dedicated her life to the service of God. She lived on the Island of Corsica, which was under Roman control. The Romans persecuted Christians and tortured them if they did not comply with Roman orders to renounce Christianity. For proclaiming herself a Christian and for her refusal to renounce her faith, the government imprisoned St. Devote, and Roman soldiers tortured her to death. Christians believe that in hopes of getting her a Christian burial the faithful sent Devote's body on a boat to Africa. They also believe that early one morning during the voyage, a storm arose, and a dove appeared from Devote's mouth that guided the boat toward Monaco. On January 27, 312 the boat reached Monaco where the Monacans received Devote's body and gave her a proper burial. As a result she became the patron saint of Monaco.

Charles III (1856–89) built a cathedral in honor of St. Devote near the site of her burial. On St. Devote's Day, worshippers flock to St. Devote's Church, and in the evening they take part in a torchlight procession. A special prayer service is held in honor of the saint, and then a boat decorated with pine, olive, and laurel branches is set on fire. The Monacans do this to reenact the burning of an ancient boat and wipe out the traces of an unpardonable crime committed by a man who tried to steal the relics of St. Devote so that he could sell them (for their magical powers) to traders from another country. However, Monacan fishermen caught him, and his boat was burned to ashes.

Later that night, people enjoy a special display of fireworks at the Monaco harbor.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Tuesday before Lent

Carnival, also known as Mardi Gras (in English, Fat Tuesday or Shrove Tuesday) falls on the Tuesday before Ash Wednesday, which is the first day of Lent. The word shrove means "to absolve oneself from sin," and in ancient times people absolved themselves of their sins by confessing them to a priest, who was also known as a shriner (absolver of sins).

In Monaco on this day there is an elaborate Carnival. Monacans clad in colorful attire and wearing masks parade through the streets of the principality. Musical bands play music nonstop, and singing, dancing, and feasting takes place throughout Shrove Tuesday.

In ancient times people dressed themselves in old clothes and indulged in mock fights using rotten eggs, chickpeas, lemons, and oranges. Revelers threw dummies stuffed with straw and rags on unsuspecting passersby. At the end of Carnival the dummies were burned, and people would sing and dance in merriment to the sound of carnival music.

❁ MI-CARAME

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Middle Thursday of Lent

The festival of Mi-Careme (which means "mid-Lent") takes place on the middle Thursday of Lent. It celebrates the end of the first half of the period of abstinence and fasting observed by Christians during Lent. Monacans celebrate this day with carnivals and masked parties. They adorn themselves in costumes and fancy masks and sing and dance their way through the night. There are special balls held on this occasion, the biggest of which is at the Théâtre des Variétés.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature for a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday, also called Holy Thursday, are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter. The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, “command,” because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to remember the Crucifixion of Jesus. Some Monacans observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent), for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. On this day devout Monacan Christians participate in the Procession of the Dead Christ that takes place in the evening and starts from the Chapel of Monaco-Ville. Armed with torches, people reenact the final moments in the life of Jesus and many even carry crosses to feel his pain and agony during his final journey (the Stations of Cross).

HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus was laid in the tomb from which he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. It was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus through his death freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. On Easter most Monacans attend a special Easter Mass that takes place at the Cathedral of Monaco. They offer prayers and celebrate Jesus' Resurrection by greeting each other on this joyous occasion.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday.

✿ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

Immaculate Conception is a celebration of the Roman Catholic belief that Jesus' mother, Mary, unlike ordinary people, was born free from all sin. The Cathedral at Monaco is dedicated to the Immaculate Conception. On this day a special Mass is said at the cathedral in honor of Mary, and most Monacans attend to pay their respects and seek blessings from the Virgin Mary.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It is the day chosen by the Roman Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, although no one knows when Jesus was actually born. This day was selected because the time was also a major pagan festival celebrating winter solstice, or the return of the light (Yule).

In earlier days family members assembled at their parent's house on Christmas Eve (December 24), to perform a traditional olive branch ritual before dinner. This rite required the oldest or youngest member of the family (or a guest) to take an olive branch, soak it in wine, and approach the fireplace where pine and laurel branches were already burning. Then, tracing the sign of a cross, the individual would speak about the virtues of the olive tree (considered to be a source of all good things, as is evident from its use). Next all the members of the family would wet their lips from the glass of wine that was served. The traditional dinner was brandamincium, barba-Giuan (which means "Uncle John"), fougasses, and cardu. In addition a Christmas loaf baked with four walnuts (symbolizing the cross), surrounded with olive twigs and called u pan de Natale was placed on the Christmas table.

Many people continue to celebrate Christmas the traditional way, starting by attending a Midnight Mass at the Cathedral of Monaco. On Christmas Day they visit their friends and family members to exchange gifts and greetings.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

Because most Monacans are Roman Catholics, their children are baptized in the local church shortly after birth. Baptism is one of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church. John the Baptist baptized Jesus, and people believe that after baptism the child will grow up to be a devout follower of Jesus.

The baptism of a child in Monaco is a family event and is considered essential in order to welcome the child into the community where it will be showered with love. At the time of baptism two or three relatives are chosen by its parents to be the godparents of the child. Parents make a careful choice since Monacans believe that the child may inherit the qualities of the godparents. Along with the biological parents godparents share the responsibility of caring for children as well as encouraging them to follow Christianity. It is traditional for a female child to have two godmothers and one godfather, while for a boy, the opposite is true.

Before the actual ritual, the priest confirms with the parents and godparents of the child that they will bring up him or her as a devout Christian. After this affirmation the ritual begins. The priest calls out the name of the child while tracing the sign of the cross on the child's forehead. After reading verses from the Bible, the priest prays for the child, the parents, and the godparents. Since water is the sign of new life, it is used extensively in the ritual of baptism. After the priest anoints the chest of the child with the oil of catechumens, he brings the child near the altar and pours water three times over the child's head. During baptism one of the godparents holds a baptismal candle, a symbol of parental hope that the child will be a Christian. After the ritual the priest and everyone present says the Lord's Prayer.

MARRIAGE

In accordance with Monacan law couples get married in a civil ceremony in the presence of the state authorities and two witnesses. They sign the registry of marriage and are declared husband and wife under the law.

The civil ceremony is followed by a church wedding in which friends and relatives of the couple participate in the celebrations. After a sermon that emphasizes the duties and responsibilities of a husband and wife, the wedding ceremony begins. The bride and groom exchange wedding rings and recite their wedding vows in front of the entire community. The priest solemnizes their marriage, and the newlyweds are congratulated by friends and family members.

After the wedding a lavish reception is held in honor of the bride and groom, characterized by singing, dancing, and feasting.

DEATH

In Monaco the funeral ceremony takes place in a church where family members and friends share their memories about the deceased and celebrate his or her life and legacy. The body of the deceased is cleansed, draped in new clothes, and laid to rest in a coffin. Family members pay their final respects, and in a solemn ceremony the body is laid to rest.

On death anniversaries and religious occasions such as All Saints' Day, people visit the graves of their loved ones where they leave flowers and candles.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Situated between China and Russia, Mongolia is an ancient nation. Relics and human remains dating back approximately 500,000 years have been found in the Gobi Desert and other areas of Mongolia. As early as the 10th century Mongolian tribes inhabited eastern central Asia and parts of northern Manchuria (now China).

The earliest known political system in the region that is now Mongolia belonged to the Xiongnu, or Hun, state. The Huns lived in this Central Asian territory under the rule of a monarch called the shanyu; they practiced shamanism and worshipped various spirits and demons.

In 209 B.C.E. Shanyu Modun (or Maodun; d. 174) defeated neighboring nations to create a domain comprising most of Mongolia and some portions of Central Asia, which provoked ongoing conflict with China for supremacy in the region. The Huns had an efficient administrative system and a superb military. Though Modun's army was outnumbered by the Chinese, he managed to defeat them, and the Chinese emperor had to recognize Modun and the Hun state.

Eventually the ruling house of Modun began to stagnate, and princes spent their time feuding and defending themselves against factional power plays. In 90 Chinese Emperor U-di launched a massive attack on the Huns, and the Battle of Yangjjan was the last great victory of the Hun state. After that the Hun princes once again became immersed in struggles for power. Instigated by Chinese emissaries, the non-Hun subjects began to secede, and the kingdom declined considerably. In 48 C.E. the Hun state disintegrated into northern and southern parts, and the southern Huns came under the rule of the Chinese emperor. The northerners had their own share of problems. Continual attacks by the Chinese and other tribes

Fun Fact

In Neolithic times (9000–8000 B.C.E.) small groups of hunters, reindeer breeders, and nomads roamed what is now Mongolia.

The Turkics, who also practiced shamanism, left behind stone monuments with inscriptions written in an ancient Turkic alphabet. These inscriptions tell much about their lifestyle and religion.

forced the northern Huns to migrate westward in 150 C.E. Some moved to China and central Asia, while others traveled as far as Europe under their leader Attila (? 406–53), whose empire disintegrated when he died.

The years from 250 to 550 were filled with political turmoil, social chaos, and violent clashes. In Mongolia the Joujan Kingdom emerged. It subjugated the neighboring tribes. However, in 545 the Turkic leader Bumin Khan (d. 552) rejected Joujan dominance and drove the Joujans into China, where they either perished or assimilated with the natives. (Although the Turkic people are related to the Turks, they are not the same.) Bumin and his partner Istemi created a truly Eurasian empire that stretched from the Yellow Sea to the Urals. Bumin also defeated the Avars, another tribe of Turkic people, and founded the Kokturk state, which expanded, in less than one century, to cover much of Central Asia. He died, however, in the same year he founded his state. Between 555 and 590, the Turkic army reached the Caspian Sea and occupied Byzantium and Iran.

Internal strife and political intrigues, however, weakened the Turkic Empire, and it disintegrated. The following centuries saw the rise to prominence of the Uighurs, a Turkic-speaking nomadic nation also of Central Asia. They were succeeded by the Kidans, who were of Mongolian stock. The Kidans had an elective monarchy. The representatives of eight Kidan clans elected a single ruler for three years. In 907 a triumphant ruler named Elui Ambagan (d. 927) refused to relinquish his position after three years and claimed the title of emperor. Subsequently Elui Ambagan conquered the neighboring nations and strengthened his position in Central Asia. After Elui Ambagan died, his son Deguan became king. During the decades that followed, Deguan gradually conquered parts of China, subjugating many tribes, including the Tatars and the Tzibus. He went on to found the Liao Dynasty. The next group to gain prominence was the Jurchens—a Manchu-speaking community that acknowledged the supremacy of the Liao Dynasty. Witnessing the gradual decline of the Liaos, due to mounting expenses and internal bickering, the Jurchens rebelled and toppled the Liaos from power in 1125.

But the Mongolian rulers by and large failed to defend their land properly due to disunity among the various clans. In 1162 Temujin (“the ironsmith”) was born. When he was 10 years old, his father was poisoned by the Tartars, and his family was abandoned by their relatives. By the time he turned 20, Temujin had successfully gathered a band of loyal and brave followers. In 1185 at the grand assembly of Mongolian noblemen, Temujin was proclaimed khan (ruler) of Mongolia, and the name Genghis (or Chinggis) Khan (which means “universal ruler”) was unanimously bestowed upon him.

Though most of the warlords recognized his supremacy, there were some who opposed him and took up arms against him. Genghis suffered defeats and even exile, but around 1193 he had regained considerable power in Central Asia. He routed his foes, succeeded in uniting the dozens of tribes into a single Mongolian nation, and managed to build a huge Eurasian empire stretching from Beijing to the Caspian Sea.

After his death, the empire was divided into several powerful Mongol states. Kublai Khan (1215–94), the grandson of Genghis Khan, conquered China and established the Yuan Dynasty.

Tibetan Buddhism gained ascendancy in Mongolia in the 16th century, and in 1650 the son of Mongol Khan of Uрга (now Ulaanbaatar) was named a living Buddha (Bogdo gegeen). An alliance of Buddhist theocracy and secular Mongol aristocracy ruled the country from 1691 until the 20th century, under the Manchu Dynasty of China.

After the Chinese revolution of 1911 Mongolia

Genghis Khan

Genghis Khan was born as Temujin in 1162. He was a Mongol ruler who was given the title of Genghis Khan, which means “universal ruler.” In the history of the medieval world he is credited with unifying the numerous independent Mongol tribes under him by the year 1206 and founding the Mongol Empire. He is venerated by Mongols (as well as people of Mongolian origin) as a dynamic conqueror and leader who wiped out centuries of discord and chaos and ushered in political and economic stability in the region of Eurasia (comprising sections of Europe as well as Asia). This was achieved, however, at the cost of tremendous bloodshed, wanton loss of life, and destruction of property. The reason was that Genghis ruthlessly annihilated anyone and everyone who dared to oppose him.

Genghis is believed to have died on August 8, 1227. Many famous rulers and conquerors claimed to have been descended from him. His grandson and successor the legendary Gublai Khan was the founder of the Yuan Dynasty (1271–1368) in China. Also claiming kinship with Genghis are Timur (Lenk) and Babur, founders of India’s Mughal Dynasty.

declared its independence from China, though China did not recognize it until 1946. In 1920 a military force financed by Japan and anti-Bolshevik Russia set up a puppet government in Mongolia after seizing the capital of Urga. In 1921 the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party, formed by Russian-trained Mongols, defeated the Japanese-Russian forces and established an independent provisional government. Then followed a terrible period in the country's history, when thousands of Buddhist monks were killed, and countless monasteries destroyed.

The Communist party was the sole legal party in Mongolia until 1990. This was the second Communist government founded after the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). In 1990 the Mongolian constitution was amended to allow opposition parties and to institute a presidential system of government. The first free presidential elections were held in Mongolia in 1993, but they served only to bring the old Communist leaders to power again.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Mongolia is bounded on the north by Russia and on the east, south, and west by China. The topography of Mongolia consists mainly of a plateau between 2,952 feet and 4,921 feet in elevation, broken by mountain ranges in the north and west. The Altai Mountains in the southwest rise to above 13,123 feet. The Gobi Desert covers a wide and arid tract in the central and the southeastern areas. The important rivers in Mongolia are the Selenge River and its tributary and the Orhon Gol. There are large lakes such as Har-Uvs, Hyargas, Uvs, and Hovsgol.

The Mongolian climate is harsh, with temperatures ranging in winter from 6°F to a low of -22°F. In summer the temperature stays between 50°F to 81°F. Winters are dry, and in summer there is some rainfall in the mountain and desert areas.

❁ ECONOMY

Traditionally farming wheat and raising livestock have been the basis of the Mongolian economy. Manufacturing has also been largely devoted to the processing of agricultural and livestock products. Mongolia, however, has extensive mineral deposits, such as copper, tin, tungsten, gold, and coal, which have created new manufacturing activities. The country used to receive economic assistance from the USSR, but, with the disintegration of the USSR in 1990-91, the support disappeared overnight, leaving Mongolia in a deep economic crisis. Finally the government had to embrace free-market policies, ease price controls, undertake privatization programs, and invite foreign investment. The economy started improving in 1999, and the growth in gross domestic product (GDP) in 2002 and 2003 was 4 and 5 percent respectively.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Mongolians believe they are descendants of Grey Wolf and Beautiful Deer. The traditional religion in Mongolia is Lamaist Buddhism, which the Communist government had kept suppressed since the 1920s. Many Mongolians are now nonreligious or atheistic as a result of the longtime suppression of religion. In 1992 the country adopted a democratic constitution that established the separation of church and state, and there has been a slow return to Buddhism. However, there are still no religious holidays celebrated officially. But this should not be taken to mean that Mongolians have no holidays.

Mongolia's ethnic minorities maintain the pace of Mongolia's festivals with celebrations of their own at different times of the year. The Buriat peoples, for example, divided between Northern Mongolia and southern Siberia, celebrate their common heritage with cross-border celebrations during the summer. The Bayan-Olgii, the Kazakh peoples, enjoy an active calendar of Muslim festivals according to the Islamic lunar calendar.

About 60 percent of the Mongolian population lives in urban areas. The rest are mostly nomadic herders who tend large herds of cattle, sheep, goats, camels, and horses that graze on the rich prairie land in the north-east and northwest. Hospitality remains an important custom in Mongolia, where so many people are still nomads, and a complicated and dignified ritual still accompanies the traditional offering and acceptance of hospitality. Likewise the seating arrangements in the yurt (cabin) are carefully arranged. When talking to someone, Mongolians customarily put their right palm on the left hand of the other individual, a symbol of mutual esteem; the

Fun Fact

Genghis Kahn called himself "the ruler of those who live in felt tents."

Fun Fact

Genghis Khan ruled most of the five million square miles, of the civilized world, that included China, Iran, Iraq, and Burma, as well as most of Korea and Russia, ruling an empire that stretched from Poland down to Iran in the west, and from Russia's Arctic shores south as far as Vietnam in the east.

Fun Fact

In 1281 Kublai Khan tried for a second time to conquer Japan. In order to approach from the sea (no Mongol had ever fought a sea battle), he had his men build a fleet of 400 ships, and the Mongol army of 45,000 from Korea joined an armada with 120,000 men from southern China. The invading fleet attempted a landing at Hakozaki Bay, but a typhoon destroyed the armada, leaving the soldiers to death or slavery.

The Altaic Languages

The Altaic group of languages is spoken by nearly 130 million people who occupy the territory stretching from eastern Europe across the central Asian republics of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Turkmenistan to the Pacific Ocean. Altaic languages fall into three categories: Turkic, Mongolian, and Tungusic. The Tungusic category has the lowest number of speakers. It includes Manchu (spoken in Manchuria, a part of China) and Tungus, spoken by the people living in eastern Siberia. The Altaic languages are characterized by vowel harmony and the use of suffixes one after the other in a single sentence. With vowel harmony, the vowel in a suffix corresponds to the vowel of the root to which the suffix is added. In addition the Altaic languages lack grammatical gender.

same gesture, with a light bow, expresses gratitude, greeting, or good-bye.

Mongolians speak an Altaic language. Other languages in this group include Korean, Turkic, and Fin. The written language of Mongolia dates back to the 11th century, but the script has changed a few times. Since 1940 Cyrillic script has been in official use for transcribing the Mongolian language.

Music is important in the cultural life of Mongolians; it is also a means of communication. Mongolian music is predominantly vocal and is divided into two genres: tuuli (epic songs) and ardyn duu (folk songs). Tuuli are mainly narrative, whereas in ardyn duu the essential element is variations in vocal tones. The folk song tradition is also old, and it has two principal forms: urdyn duu ("long songs") and bogino duu ("short songs"). There are many kinds of traditional Mongolian literature, including epics, legends, tales, yuroi (the poetry of good wishes), and magtaal (the poetry of praise), as well as numerous proverbial sayings.

The Cyrillic Alphabet

The Mongolian language is very old and has been in existence at least since the 11th century, but the written alphabet has changed over the last 900 years. Cyrillic script is the alphabet used by most Mongolians today. Cyrillic script was adopted after the 1921 revolution, on the basis of the Khalkha dialect, which is the official language of Mongolia. The script was introduced in 1940 in order to modernize the Mongolian language and as a result of Russian influence. Thirty-five alphabets use Cyrillic script.

❁ CUISINE

The Mongolian diet depends on where one is in Mongolia, and what time of the year it is. In the south a diet of mutton and camel dairy products is common. In the mountains beef is more common. The Mongolian climate demands a higher caloric intake in the winter months than in summer, and a Mongolian will often eat boiled animal fat in winter.

The Mongolian people regard cooked mutton as a delicacy. It is only prepared for important occasions such as offering sacrifices to gods or ancestors, wedding ceremonies, or celebrating an elder's birthday. It is customary among the Mongolian people to cut a piece of meat from the fat tail first and taste it. Roast lamb is a traditional Mongolian food, but it, too, is reserved for special occasions, such as a dinner party to honor distinguished guests or a great celebration. Roast lamb, a beautiful golden red color with a delicious flavor, is served on a square wooden platter. Boodog, a preparation made from goat, or the meat of marmot (a large rodent, the size of a house cat, that lives in burrows in the steppes) is another traditional Mongolian dish. Vegetables are a recent addition to Mongolian cuisine.

Generally, the Mongolian people drink their milk sour, preferring its taste to that of fresh milk. Milk tea is the traditional hot drink of Mongolians. It is made by boiling the water with brick tea and fresh milk. Mongolians usually put a little salt into the milk before drinking it. Sometimes butter or stir-fried millet is also added to the milk tea.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1, the first day of the new year according to the Gregorian, or Western, calendar, is one of the few public holidays observed in modern-day Mongolia.

❁ TSAGAAN TSAR

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: End of January to early March (lunar calendar)

The lunar new year celebration depends on the cycles of the Moon and can fall anytime between the end of January and early March. Tsagaan Tsar, which means "the white month," is a spring festival celebrated at the same time as the Chinese New Year. (The people of Mongolia say that this is coincidence, and there is no connection between the two holidays.) The color white stands for purity, happiness, wealth, and well-being. Tsagaan Tsar is the start of the lactating and breeding period of cattle. and the people anticipate that spring will bring an abundance of dairy products. Families start planning for the holidays a month in advance, preparing plenty of food and gifts. Houses, gers (tents), and sheds are all given a thorough cleaning before the new year. On Tsagaan Tsar, as on other Mongolian holidays, people sing songs and play games.

The New Year's Eve corresponding to Tsagaan Tsar is called Bituun—the last dinner of the old year. The following morning, everyone awakes early to greet the rising Sun, then family members exchange greetings and gifts. The value of the gift is not important; often it is merely some socks, a pack of cigarettes, or a bottle of drink. Mongolians celebrate the new year for three days full of eating and drinking fermented mare's milk, airag, and arkhi, vodka. In the past people went to an ovoo, an arrangement of stones on a hilltop, with trays of food and other offerings to show their gratitude to nature.

Maidari observances occur every day in various seasons, and there are also special holiday celebrations that accompany other religious and seasonal festivals. During the 16 days of the New Year celebrations, a number of rites devoted to the 12 miracles of Buddha are performed, and fire plays a very important part. One of these rituals, called Sor, is observed during the lunar new year celebrations. When the fire, sora, gains strength, its sparks fly high into the cold winter sky, and the participants toss lumps of red dough, which symbolize enemies of the faith, into the blazing fire. This ritual is one of the final episodes of Sagaalghan—the holiday of the White Moon—the most spectacular ritual of Lamaism. In another new year ritual, people burn their misfortunes in the fire and make wishes for the coming year: May the fire in the hearth burn (may it be warm at home) and may everybody enjoy good health.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day (IWD) celebrates the economic, political, and social achievements of women. In February 1908 a group of working women in the United States, supported by a declaration of the Socialist Party of America, initiated the first Women's Day when large demonstrations took place demanding the right to vote for women and other political and economic rights. This movement grew, and the first IWD was held on March 19, 1911, in Germany, Austria, and Denmark. Since 1975 the United Nations has sponsored the event. Mongolia observes IWD like most other socialist and former socialist countries with meetings and workshops highlighting women's issues.

Bogino Duu

As a result of leading a nomadic life for several centuries, the Mongolians have developed their own special way of handling livestock. Bogino duu ("short song") is a type of folk song that uses, repeatedly, some special coaxing word, which is called toig. For example, when a ewe is being coaxed into accepting a rejected lamb, a Mongol will sing a specific bogino duu for such a situation. He or she will sing gently, over and over again, until the ewe suckles the lamb.

❁ DAY OF CHILDREN AND MOTHERS

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 1

This day is observed to emphasize the need for providing the nation's children with care and protection and for ensuring their welfare, as well as to glorify motherhood and a mother's role in the family and society. This holiday is common in most socialist and former socialist countries. In Mongolia seminars, workshops, and health check-up clinics for children and young mothers are held on this day.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 11–13

July 11, 1921, was the day on which the Mongolian People's government, a limited monarchy, was formed. Before that Mongolia had broken away from Chinese rule and established an autonomous theocratic government, which led to a 10-year period of internal disagreements and political and social conflict.

The Naadam Festival, which is two centuries old, is celebrated on the same day. Naadam was originally associated with religious ceremonies: the worship of spirits of the mountains, rivers, and other beauties of nature. The founder of the people's government changed the tradition in 1922 by holding the national athletic competition in July to coincide with the first anniversary of the new People's Republic Independence Day.

The major events of the festival are scheduled for the first two days, beginning with an opening ceremony early on the morning of the first day,

The Mongolian style of chess is a traditional game of long standing. Called shatar, the king is a stern khan, a dog—the cattle breeder’s traditional devoted friend—is the “queen,” and a camel is used as a bishop.

when men on horseback present the flags of Genghis Khan in the main square of Ulaanbaatar. The entry of the processional chariot of the Maidari (the future Buddha) is a high point of the Tsam. It is a great honor to be asked to pull the Maidari chariot, which features a horse’s head covered in green velvet. Tradition has it that those who participate in the procession are assured of rebirth as his disciples when the Maidari Buddha returns to Earth.

The opening ceremony also involves music, a variety of performances, and speeches. During the Naadam Festival, the sports of wrestling, horse racing, and archery—called the Three Main Games of Men—are the primary attractions. The Mongolian style of wrestling is similar to Sumo. The wrestlers are required to wear a traditional costume of knee boots with upturned toes, tight pants, and a silk vest that covers the shoulder and arms, but not the chest. This strange requirement is intended to ensure that all the contestants are male.

Before beginning contestants perform a special eagle dance, which the winner performs again at the end; the loser passes under the winner’s “wing” so as to indicate submission.

Unlike wrestling, in which women are forbidden to compete, archery is a contest in which both men and women compete. At one time the contest required the archers to hit a live marmot (a creature similar to the groundhog) from a distance of 110 yards, but modern competitions can be stationary or performed on horseback, where the archers must hit small leather targets 75 to 110 yards away. Contestants usually wear traditional attire: pointed hats and long robes tied with brightly colored silk sashes. The archers often use traditional bows made of reindeer bone and sometimes entertain the spectators by doing a brief song and dance of praise when they hit the target.

The horse race is the highlight and the grand finale of the Naadam Festival. It involves as many as 200 horses racing at top speed over rugged terrain for about 20 miles, a distance set when Genghis Khan ruled. Originally adults raced on wild, untamed horses, but now children, aged from 4 to 12 years ride bareback or in saddles. The horse race has just as much ceremony as other aspects of the festival. The race follows a parade of all the participants, the singing of the traditional hymn, “Tumnii Ekh,” and the chanting of the Buddhist mantra, Giingoo, which is done to help the riders concentrate. Prizes are given to the winner of the race and the rider who comes in last. A Mongolian proverb says, “Better to break one’s spine than one’s spirit.” Awarding a prize to the loser encourages the children to race again the next year instead of giving up.

❁ CELEBRATION OF THE REVOLUTION

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 21

This holiday commemorates the victory of the Mongolians, trained and equipped by the new Soviet army, over Chinese invaders who captured Ulaanbaatar a few years after Mongolia had established an autonomous theocratic government.

❁ PROCLAMATION OF MONGOLIA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 26

The country of Mongolia was proclaimed the Mongolian People’s Republic on November 25, 1924, and a Soviet-style, state-oriented constitution was adopted. On the same day the name of the country’s capital was changed to Ulaanbaatar from its earlier name Niyslel Huree.

The annual commemoration of this event is marked by a presidential address to the nation and the laying of wreaths at the memorial at Sukhbaatar Square in Ulaanbaatar.

❁ FESTIVAL OF MAIDARI

Observed by: Lamaist Buddhists
Observed on: At various times

The Festival of Maidari (Mongolian for Maitreya, the Buddha of the Future) was first held in Tibet in 1049 and introduced into Mongolia in 1656.

The appearance of Maidari, the Buddha of the future, will signal the beginning of a new age; he awaits his final rebirth as Buddha in his Tushita, “heaven of joy.”

❁ TSAUL-KHURAL

Observed by: Lamaist Buddhists

Observed on: Twenty days after the first winter Moon

Tsaul-khural is celebrated in the fall of the 20th day following the first winter Moon. This observance combines the teaching of reincarnation and the ancient spiritual cult of animals and ancestors. During the celebration candles are lit because the people believe that their light causes the devout to repent of treating animals badly. Treating animals well is not only important to people whose lives depend on their animals, but also because they believe that people’s souls can be reborn (reincarnated) into other living things.

Fun Fact

Mongolian wrestling is thought to be about 7,000 years old. In Mongolian wrestling (which is different from wrestling in Inner Mongolia [northern China]), there are no weight classes or time limits.

Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

The traditional Mongolian wedding is an agreement between two families. The bride’s family provides a dowry of jewelry, clothing, and home furnishings, and the groom’s transfers bride-wealth in livestock. The wedding ceremony is not really a religious ceremony, and for the wedding feast as many relatives of the bride and the groom are invited as the two families can afford to feed. The bride moves to the camp of the husband’s family, and a new tent (ger) is provided for the couple.

Nowadays, urban marriages often take place between schoolmates or coworkers. For a modest fee the couple has a civil ceremony and a wedding certificate. They rent wedding attire, a reception hall, the services of a photographer, and a car service to carry them to their new home. Colleagues and fellow workers attend as guests and bring gifts that contribute toward setting up the married couple’s new household.

Introduction

HISTORY

The history of Morocco is the history of two cultures: Berber and Arab. The Berbers have lived in Morocco since the second millennium B.C.E. The Arabs brought Islam to Morocco when they invaded the region, around 685 C.E.. The Berbers willingly embraced Islam and even welcomed Arab rule in the region. But the Arabs treated the Berbers as inferiors, never as their equals. This resulted in constant skirmishes between the two cultures.

As much as the Berbers and Arabs of Morocco have been at odds with each other, they united against a common external enemy, becoming serious about unification when Portuguese and Spanish forces attacked the country.

In 1660 Morocco came under the rule of the Alawite Dynasty, which still controls it in the 21st century. In the 17th and 18th centuries the country also became a haven for pirates who plundered ships sailing in the Mediterranean. Due to its rich reserves of minerals, such as phosphate and iron ore, Morocco attracted more European invaders in the 19th century. In 1840 both France and Spain annexed Morocco, leading to conflicts between those two nations. After reaching an agreement in 1844 they divided Morocco between them, with France acquiring almost the whole country and Spain colonizing the southwest portion, which was later known as Spanish Sahara.

Morocco was the flashpoint for another clash of European powers when Germany tried to annex the country in 1905. In 1906 the Algeciras Conference gave the sultan of Morocco the right to govern the nation, but in 1912 the sultan allowed the country to become a protectorate of the French.

During World War II Morocco took up the cause of nationalism. To secure their position the French overthrew Sultan Mohammed V (1909–61) in 1953 and placed his uncle Mohammed Ben Aarafa on the throne. However, the whole nation revolted against the move, and the sultan was reinstated in 1955. In March 1956 France and Spain recognized

Berbers

Berbers are non-Arabs who settled in North Africa around 3000 B.C.E. and now make up a large part of the population there. Since their arrival they have mixed with the ethnic groups of these areas. Berber, the language of the Berbers, belongs to the Afro-Asiatic linguistic family.

Nearly 40 percent of Morocco's population is Berber. Berbers have traditionally engaged in cattle and sheep raising. Many Berbers still live in tents and huts in the rural areas of Morocco. However, the Berber culture is being transformed since the Berbers are gradually adopting the culture and traditions of the Arabs.

Morocco's independence. When Sultan Mohammed V died in 1961, his son Hassan II (1929–99) was crowned king. On the death of King Hassan II in 1999, his son King Muhammad VI (b. 1963) succeeded him.

King Muhammad VI entrusted more powers to representative government and stressed women's rights and the education of Moroccan youth. He also encouraged foreign investment in the country and was more open to economic reform than his predecessors.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Kingdom of Morocco is flanked by the Mediterranean Sea on the north, Algeria on the east and southeast, the Western Sahara on the south, and the Atlantic Ocean on the west. Spain possesses numerous small islands off Morocco's northern coast. On the Mediterranean coast are the Spanish enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla.

Morocco experiences a wide range of climatic conditions. The weather of the coastal region is mild, while the rest of the north can be wet and cool. The temperatures vary from 24°F in winter to 75°F in summer. In the desert area the daytime and nighttime temperatures are at two extremes due to the lack of moisture in the air.

Among the North African nations, Morocco

Er Rif

Er Rif is a mountain range in northwestern Africa that extends along the coastline of Morocco. It runs from the city of Tangier to the western frontier of Algeria. Er Rif is a range of the Atlas Mountains, a line of steep cliffs with a few harbors. The highest point in the country is Mt. Toubkai at 13,665 feet in the mountains south of Marrakech.

boasts the broadest plains and the highest mountains. Er Rif, an area of highlands, runs parallel to the Mediterranean coast. In addition the Atlas Mountains extend across Morocco in a southwesterly to northeasterly direction.

ECONOMY

Morocco's economy is mainly dependent on agriculture, although only 22 percent of the land is under cultivation. Agriculture is adversely affected by regular droughts. The principal crops are sugar beets, sugarcane, wheat, barley, and potatoes. The people living in the highlands raise sheep and poultry.

Morocco has a booming tourist industry and a low rate of inflation.

Lately, Morocco has been encouraging investment by foreign companies, but both unemployment and the population growth rate are high.

LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

Lifestyles vary widely in the different regions of Morocco. Moroccans hailing from different parts of the country wear different styles of dress. Architecture and crafts also differ from region to region. Famous for its traditional arts and crafts, Morocco boasts wonderful leatherworks, jewelry, and carpets.

The Berbers of Morocco have musical storytelling traditions. Modern composers use a fusion of African, French, pop, and rock. Another type of music called rai, which originated in Algeria, is also becoming popular in Morocco.

Due to the dominance of Islam, Morocco does not emphasize dance as some African nations do. The exception, however, is an ancient Berber dance called the abidous, which, with the abouach, is the most complex example of the musical and dance traditions of the Berber-speaking Berbers of the Middle Atlas regions. It is performed on various occasions during the calendar year, especially during harvest rites, and the entire community participates. It is a circle dance consisting of alternating men and women; the musicians occupy the center.

Melodic instruments are sometimes used, particularly flutes, but the traditional instrumental group consists only of bandirs. A bandir is a single-headed tambourine without "jingles," a circular frame covered with goatskin on one side. It is held in the left hand (with a thumb-hole cut in the wood) and played with the right. The Berbers call it a tagnza (in the Grand Atlas) or allun (in the Middle Atlas). The bandir comes in various sizes with skins more or less taut (tension is determined by placing the drum near a heat source) to obtain different timbres.

The abidous begins with an invocation (tama-wouet) by a soloist and the vocal part is then developed by way of an antiphonal pattern. The melody, based on short, strongly rhythmic and repeated phrases, is chromatic. The basic rhythm, also characteristic of the abouach, is three-eighths and three-quarters.

Moroccans are passionate about soccer. Morocco's soccer team qualified for the 1994 World Cup held in the United States. Hicham El-Guerrouj, world-renowned middle distance runner, holds the world record in the 1500 meters and mile and was a double gold-medal winner at the 2004 Olympics (1500 and 5000 meters—a rare double).

❁ CUISINE

In Morocco eating is an important social ritual. The Moroccans' main meal is a midday dinner, which starts with hot and cold salads or stew. These are followed by lamb or chicken. Next a platter of piled couscous (made from the coarsely ground grains of durum wheat) is served topped with meats and vegetables. The people living along the Atlantic coast eat seafood in abundance.

Moroccan cuisine has a distinctive Arab flavor, but it has also been influenced by Jewish culture (at one time the Jewish population in Morocco was sizable). Characteristics of the Arab and Jewish traditions are found in Morocco's couscous, bisteeya (a pie made of alternating layers of phyllo dough, shredded chicken, ground almonds, and spices), mechoui (roasted leg of lamb), and djej emshmel (chicken with lemons and olives).

While Moroccans import many spices, there is no dearth of homegrown condiments such as mint, olives, and oranges. In Morocco people are fond of sipping cups of sweet mint tea. It is a common practice to eat with the first three fingers and to use bread as a utensil.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 begins the new year of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar. Families and friends gather to celebrate the start of the new year with a sumptuous meal, wishing each other a joyous and prosperous year ahead. All businesses, government offices, and educational institutions are closed on New Year's Day.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, to commemorate the important role played by workers. The May 1 observance of Labor Day (as opposed to the September holiday in the United States) has its origins in the international socialist movement, which declared the day in 1889 to coincide with an 1890 general strike in the United States called by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to demand an eight-hour workday. International Labor Day has always been more radical than the September observance in the United States. In Morocco it is a public holiday and all government, commercial, and educational institutions are closed.

❁ THRONE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 30

Throne Day, or Feast of the Throne, is a national holiday in Morocco, marking the accession of King Mohammed VI to the throne on July 30, 1999. Mohammed VI became the new king of Morocco after the death of his father, the former king Mohammed V. On Throne Day King Mohammed VI delivers a speech to his subjects. The speech generally focuses on recent reforms and the nation's progress. It is a national holiday on which government offices and schools are closed.

❁ REVOLUTION OF THE KING AND PEOPLE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 20

The Revolution of the King and People Day (or Anniversary of the King's and People's Revolution) commemorates the exile of the sultan of Morocco Mohammed V by the French in 1953. Mohammed V, a proponent of Morocco's struggle for freedom, was dethroned by the French in an attempt to stem the growing tide of nationalism in the country. In his place the French installed his uncle Mohammed Ben Aarafa as the new sultan, sparking widespread protests and demonstrations against the French regime and Aarafa. Giving in to pressure from the Moroccans, France allowed Mohammed V to return to Morocco and reclaim his throne in 1955. He received a tumultuous and joyous welcome, and in 1956 he began negotiations with the French to gain independence for Morocco.

On this day people remember the legacy of Mohammed V and pay homage to a great leader and visionary. The day is marked by speeches given by the ruling monarch of Morocco as well as prominent government officials, honoring the late sultan as well as the people of Morocco.

Fun Fact

On March 21, 2002, King Muhammad VI married Salma Bennani (b. 1978), a computer engineer. She was given the title of princess. It was the first time that a Moroccan ruler's wife was so prominently acknowledged.

❁ KING'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 21

On August 21, 1963, the reigning monarch of Morocco King Mohammed VI (Mohammed Ben al-Hassan) was born. He is the eldest son and the second child of the late King Hassan II and his second wife, Lalla Latifa Hammou. Mohammed VI ascended the throne on July 23, 1999, after the death of King Hassan II.

Every year a lavish dinner is organized in honor of the king at the royal palace; special guests include royalty and diplomats from around the world. Moroccans take pride in their traditions and culture as they wish King Mohammed VI a long and healthy life. This day is also celebrated as Young People's Day.

❁ GREEN MARCH DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 6

Green March Day, also called Anniversary of the Green March, is celebrated to honor the 350,000 Moroccans—young and old, men and women—who marched into Western Sahara in 1975 to claim the territory for Morocco. Green March Day is one of the most important holidays in Morocco since it is viewed as a reunification of the country.

A final resolution of Western Sahara's status has not yet been determined. A guerrilla war with the Polisario Front contesting Rabat's sovereignty ended in a 1991 UN-brokered cease-fire; a UN-organized referendum on final status has been repeatedly postponed. Reunification Day is celebrated in Morocco on August 14 with parades and processions to commemorate the occasion.

Independence Day celebrates Morocco's independence from European domination. It was achieved after a long struggle on the part of the Moroccans against Spanish and French forces. Independence Day also marks the return of Mohammed V to power. The day is celebrated with civic ceremonies such as flag-raising, military parades, and public speeches. It is public holiday on which government offices and schools are closed.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also Eid al-Kebir or the Feast of the Sacrifice, commemorates the willingness of Ibrahim (Abraham) to sacrifice his own son at God's command. Eid al-Adha is widely celebrated by the Islamic community in Morocco and is marked by sacrifices and devotion. The day falls at the end of the hajj (the traditional pilgrimage to Mecca), which, according to the Koran, every Muslim must undertake at least once in his or her lifetime if it is physically and economically possible. The pilgrimage to Mecca is the fifth of Islam's Five Pillars of the faith.

In Morocco Eid al-Adha is a public holiday, and citizens celebrate it with lavish feasts and charitable gestures. On this day Moroccan families slaughter sheep. A third of the sacrificial meat is consumed by the family; another third is given to relatives and friends; and the final third goes to the poor and needy.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month in the Islamic calendar

Because the Muslim calendar is based on the phases of the Moon, the date of the Muslim New Year each year occurs 11 days earlier than in the previous year. In Morocco families and friends get together to wish each other a joyous new year, and even the poorest of families partakes of some meat dishes on this day.

❁ MOULoud

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

Mouloud falls in the third month of the Islamic year and is celebrated throughout Morocco to commemorate the birthday of the prophet Muhammad. On this day Moroccans offer prayers and remember the life and teachings of the prophet. Evenings are made spectacular by a display of fireworks, and special dishes are prepared in every home.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, or the Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan, a holy month for Muslims all over the world. During Ramadan, Muslims fast from sunrise to sunset every day. Eating, smoking, drinking, and even physical intimacy are prohibited during daylight hours.

Moroccans celebrate Eid al-Fitr by wearing new clothes, preparing sweets and sweet dishes, and visiting their kinsmen and family members. Children receive money and gifts from their elders. All government, educational, and commercial establishments are closed on this day. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

❁ ALMOND TREE BLOSSOM FESTIVAL

Observed in: Tafraoute

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Second week of February

The Almond Tree Blossom Festival attracts throngs of people to the beautiful valley of Tafraoute every year during the second week of February. Tafraoute is home to Morocco's best almond trees, which bloom in February. Tourists from other parts of Morocco and abroad flock to watch the blushing pink almond trees. There is dancing, singing, and storytelling. A colorful souk (market) also springs up during this time. These activities give a festive atmosphere to this otherwise sleepy village.

❁ WAX CANDLE FEAST

Observed in: Salé

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May

The Wax Candle Feast is held on the Bouregreg estuary in the town of Salé in May. The wax lantern procession, or Mawkib Esh Shomouaa, is held on this occasion. The event began in the Barbary period in Salé when the town's patron Sidi Abdallah Ben Hassoun had embarked on a long voyage. (Barbary is a 19th-century term used by Europeans to refer to the coastal regions of Tunisia, Libya, Morocco, and Algeria.) A procession of wax lanterns was carried out to appeal to Allah for Ben Hassoun's protection. Since then the procession has been held annually.

❁ IMILCHIL FESTIVAL

Observed in: Imilchil

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: August

Imilchil is a tiny village located at 8,430 feet in the Atlas Mountains. The festival that takes place here in August centers on a courtship ritual. It evolved from an ancient Berber custom in which young men and women got married on the day of the Mousseem (a day when people assemble to celebrate and feast and take a break from their busy lives). It is believed that a holy man used to bless the couples, ensuring their future happiness.

The Imilchil Festival is celebrated to honor that holy man at the site of his tomb in the high Atlas Mountains. At this betrothal fair, matchmaking is sacred. During the festival approximately 3,000 men gather in tents for three days along with their flocks, horses, and camels. They wear djellabas, outer robes, and embellish themselves with silver daggers as a demonstration of their status and wealth. The young women wear silver jewelry and fine dresses and dance day and night. It is the woman's responsibility to make the first move while the men just sit and wait. If a woman likes a man, she asks him to accompany her for a walk. During the walk she asks him many important questions, and if she is satisfied with his answers and decides that he is the man for her, they go to a tent where scribes marry them.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The tribal women in Morocco apply henna when expecting a child and dress like brides before going into labor. They also apply makeup such as kohl and swak. Kohl is a black eye makeup made of antimony, while swak is a dark lip stain made of walnut root. Moroccans believe that, by doing this, they are shunning unwanted spirits and also preparing women for the possibility of dying during delivery. They believe that, if a woman dies while delivering a child, she will enter paradise, so she should be dressed appropriately. At the time of delivery the expectant mother is made to sit in a hole in sand inside a tent. Women move around the expectant mother, performing a belly dance to help her bear the labor pains. Men are not allowed to enter the tent.

Moroccans dig a shallow hole in the center of the tent where the child is placed after birth. Once the child is born, it is cleaned with soft white tufts of lamb's wool and placed in the hole. The umbilical cord is cut with a silver knife and is buried in the hollow in which the child was placed after birth.

❁ MARRIAGE

Weddings are gala affairs in Morocco. They have both social and religious importance and are generally celebrated on a large scale. The marriage negotiations start with the khutba, a sermon given at the midday prayer in the mosque on Fridays. During khutba the family of the groom visits the bride's family and asks for her hand. If the proposal is accepted, then the date of the marriage is set.

Next the adouls (Islamic notaries) ask the bride and the groom whether they consent to the union. If both say "yes," then the adouls sign the marriage contract, and the couple is to all intents and purposes married. The next day the bride goes to the nekachat (a group of henna artists), who paint her hands and feet with henna. The nekachat hand the bride to the next group of women who are called negafat. These women are responsible for the attire, makeup, and other aspects of the bride's grooming and preparations. They also escort her on the day of the wedding celebration.

After noon prayers the women and girls, dressed in their traditional caftans and jewelry, gather around the bride and share the joy of the family in a ceremony called lambita. During this ceremony, the bride has to wear a number of traditional dresses given to her by her future husband and by her mother as per the shoura (list of gifts given to the bride by her parents). This ceremony ends at sunset when the bride and her relatives wait for the arrival of the groom and his relatives.

The groom and his family arrive at the bride's house accompanied by music. The groom's family presents a wide array of gifts to the bride's family in the ritual called labdya. The bathing ritual follows in which the bride-to-be is bathed by unmarried girls and her friends. The bathing ritual is intended to purify the bride. At night the groom will once again come with his friends and family to take the bride to her new home.

The next day the bride's family bids her a last farewell by bringing her breakfast in her new home. The newly wedded couple share this breakfast. Then the groom hosts the bride's relatives for the wedding feast to celebrate the beginning of their new life.

The couple's entire family attends the wedding feast, which is prepared with care and precision. Marriages in rural areas are celebrated on an even larger scale, since the whole village comes together to participate in the celebrations. This is evidence of the community pride and solidarity in the rural areas of Morocco.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Archaeological evidence shows that humans inhabited Mozambique as early as two million years ago. As far as is known, San hunters and gatherers, ancestors of the Khoisani peoples, were the first to move into what is now Mozambique.

Between the first and fourth centuries C.E., Mozambique witnessed an influx of Bantu-speaking tribes, migrating from the northern parts of Africa, moving down through the Zambezi River valley. The Bantus, mainly farmers and ironworkers, established their settlements on the plateau and coastal regions of Mozambique. The Bantu also established ports in the coastal areas and carried on trading activities with the Middle East, India, and other African countries. The Arab traders introduced the Bantu to Islam. Gradually the Arabs began dominating the trade (mainly gold and ivory) as well as political power in the region through a number of local rulers known as sultans.

Vasco da Gama (c. 1460–1524), the famed Portuguese navigator, was the first European to reach Mozambique, landing there in 1498 while seeking a sea route to India. The flourishing trade in the region caught his eye, and around 1500 the Portuguese began establishing ports and forts in the region.

Initially the name Mozambique referred to a small coral island situated at the mouth of Mossuril Bay. The Portuguese constructed forts and towns on the island, and over time the name Mozambique came to encompass the Portuguese colonies along the east coast of Africa. In 1510 the Portuguese built a square fort in the northernmost part of the island of Mozambique.

Between 1580 and 1640, after the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal were unified, investments were diverted from the

San Tribe

The San, formerly called Bushmen, are considered to be the first inhabitants of southern Africa. The Bushmen were mainly hunters and gatherers and led a largely peaceful existence until they were displaced by Bantu-speaking tribes.

The San are known for their silent hand-signal communication, which they use during hunting. The manual communication involves using the hands, body language, gestures, and facial expressions to communicate a message to another person.

The word san means “outsider,” and the tribe was given this name by its ancient rivals, the Khoikhoi (meaning “men of men”) tribe. The Khoikhoi and San both belong to the Khoisan ethnic group. Since san was considered a derogatory term by its own tribesmen, many preferred to be called Bushmen.

coastal colonies of Mozambique to the growing trade with India and the Far East, as well as to the colonization of Brazil. Lack of sufficient funds adversely affected the Portuguese settlements in the region, and in order to raise funds land was leased to other Europeans. In the 19th century the European leaseholders also served as tax collectors in each district and took on the responsibility for collecting taxes from native farmers, either in the form of agricultural produce or labor.

In 1891 the Portuguese government handed over control of the region for 50 years to a large private company Companhia de Moçambique, which was financed and controlled by the British and had its headquarters in the Mozambican city of Beira. It was mainly involved in issuing postage stamps and building railroad lines to the neighboring countries.

Traditional Trade Route of Mozambique

In an ancient coastal guide, called the Periplus of the Erythraean Sea, written in the first century C.E., the flourishing trading ports of Mozambique lay on the southernmost end of the trading world at that time. According to this guide the traditional trading world included the Red Sea, the Hadhramaut (part of modern-day Yemen), the coast of Arabia, and the Indian coast. The Periplus of the Erythraean Sea takes its title from the Greek word periplus, which means “going around.” Although Erythraean is generally considered an ancient name for the Red Sea, the Greeks used it to refer to an area encompassing the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and the Indian Ocean.

In the early 20th century under the Companhia de Moçambique, slave trade flourished in the region as cheap African labor was being provided to the white settlers in Mozambique as well as to British colonies in other parts of Africa. Mozambican men were forced to go to neighboring South Africa and Rhodesia to work as laborers. The slave trade had long since been banned by the British and other Europeans, but it continued under the guise of forced labor and indentured servitude.

In 1932 when Antonio de Oliveira Salazar (1889–1970) was sworn in as prime minister of Portugal, things got worse for the Mozambicans. After the expiration of the lease held by the Companhia de Moçambique, Mozambique once again came under the direct jurisdiction of the Portuguese. During his tenure as prime minister of Portugal from 1932 to 1968, Salazar introduced cash crops like rice and cotton in Mozambique and made it compulsory for all males over the age of 15 to work in rice and cotton plantations for at least six months. The men were subjected to brutal treatment; besides being made to work long hours in terrible conditions, they were chained to prevent them from escaping. Thus many Mozambican men, after completing their mandatory six months’ work on the plantations, used every means possible to escape from Mozambique.

There was growing resentment among native Mozambicans about the oppressive Portuguese rule, which often manifested itself in the form of protests and demonstrations. In 1960 during one of the peaceful demonstrations led by the people of Mozambique, Portuguese police opened fire and killed more than 600 people. This massacre launched a full-fledged independence movement in Mozambique. In 1962 several anti-Portuguese political groups combined forces to form the Front for Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO). In September 1964 under the leadership of Eduardo Mondlane (1920–69), a leading Mozambican freedom fighter, FRELIMO launched an armed campaign against Portuguese colonial rule. Mondlane was murdered in a bomb blast in 1969.

The war lasted 10 years until 1974, when FRELIMO led a successful coup against Portuguese rule, establishing its control in the capital of Maputo. The Portuguese, who had already incurred heavy losses due to a war in Angola, lacked the will to fight. By 1975 all Portuguese colonists had either been expelled from Mozambique or left the country out of fear. And on June 25, 1975, Mozambique declared its independence from the Portuguese. FRELIMO established a one-party state in Mozambique, and Samora Machel (1933–86), a prominent leader of FRELIMO, was sworn in as the first president of Mozambique.

Post-independence Mozambique was economically dependent on South Africa and its apartheid government. Machel, however, allowed members of the African National Congress (ANC) and Rhodesian rebels to train in Mozambique and continue their freedom struggle in South Africa.

In 1982 Resistência Nacional Moçambicana, or Mozambican National Resistance (RENAMO), an anti-Communist rebel group led by Mozambican rebel Afonso Dhlakama (b. 1953) and sponsored by South Africa and the United States, initiated a civil war in Mozambique by attacking schools, hospitals, and transportation routes all over the country. In 1984 Machel signed a peace accord with the South African government. According to this agreement (the Nkomati Accord), Mozambique had to expel all ANC members, while South Africa agreed to withdraw support from RENAMO.

South Africa, however, did not keep its promise and continued to supply arms and ammunition to RENAMO. In 1986 Samora Machel was killed in an airplane crash, and Joaquim Chissano (b. 1939) was sworn in as the president of Mozambique.

In 1990 after the fall of the apartheid government in South Africa, support to RENAMO quickly dried up, and a peace move was initiated by the Mozambican government. Multiparty democracy was reinstated in Mozambique in November 1990, thanks to a new constitution that promised a free and democratic Mozambique. Peace finally prevailed in Mozambique after a UN-negotiated peace agreement was signed between the Chissano government and RENAMO leader Afonso Dhlakama on October 4, 1992, in Rome. The agreement took effect on October 15, 1992, and a UN peacekeeping force called United Nations Operations in Mozambique (ONUMOZ), oversaw Mozambique's transition to democracy over a period of two years.

In 1994 the first free and fair democratic elections were held, and Chissano was reelected president of Mozambique, while Afonso Dhlakama became the leader of the opposition.

Chissano remained president of the country until 2004 but decided not to run for reelection, explaining that he wanted to give young leaders a chance. He appointed the country's first woman prime minister Luisa Diogo (b. 1958) in 2004. FRELIMO enjoyed an overwhelming victory in 2004, and Armando Guebuza (b. 1943), a prominent leader of FRELIMO, was sworn in as president of Mozambique.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Republic of Mozambique is located in the southeastern part of Africa and is flanked by Swaziland, South Africa, Zambia, Malawi, Zimbabwe, Tanzania, and the Indian Ocean. Madagascar is located across the Mozambique Channel, while Comoros is situated offshore to the northeast. The southern part of the country is characterized by coastal plains that rise and become mountains and plateaus in the northern and western parts of Mozambique. At 8,081 feet, Mt. Binga is the highest mountain in Mozambique. Two of southern Africa's longest rivers, the Zambezi (which divides Mozambique) and the Limpopo, flow through Mozambique. Other rivers include the Save and the Rovuma, which forms the northern border with Tanzania. Lake Malawi (also known as Lake Nyasa) forms Mozambique's boundary with Malawi.

Mozambique has tropical to subtropical climatic conditions. The dry season lasts from April to September, with average daily temperatures reaching 80°F along the coastal areas. The rainy season lasts for the rest of the year, with average daily temperatures reaching as high as 88°F.

Mangrove swamps and woodlands cover a large part of Mozambique. The mangrove swamps serve the population along the coast by providing them with insect-resistant wood for buildings and furniture. Also, they provide natural protection against erosion as well as serving as nurseries for many varieties of fish.

Mozambique is home to a wide variety of animals including elephants, wildebeests, and zebra. Many mammals were killed during the civil war that gripped the region from 1982 to 1992; as a result, the number of animals has significantly declined in Mozambique.

The coastal waters of Mozambique are home to several species of turtles and dolphins as well as the nearly extinct sea cow (also called the dugong or manatee), an endangered marine mammal that is being mercilessly killed for its meat.

Fun Fact

In 1995 Mozambique joined the British Commonwealth and became the only member country in the Commonwealth that was never ruled by the British. The Commonwealth is an association of independent nations, most of which are former colonies of the British Empire.

Fun Fact

Two islands—Likoma and Chizumulu—are maritime enclaves. They belong to Malawi but lie entirely within Mozambique's Lake Nyasa (Lake Malawi) territorial waters.

The Dugong and Greek Mythology

The dugong, also called manatee or sea cow, is mentioned in Greek mythology in connection with the legend of the sirens. Sirens were said to be maidens whose upper bodies were those of women and the lower, those of a fish (mermaids). It was believed that their songs lured sailors who listened to them to their deaths at the bottom of the sea. The dugong belongs to the family of Sirenia, which was named after the Greek legend of the sirens. In Homer's Odyssey Circe the sorceress warns Odysseus about the dangers posed by the sirens and their enchanting song. She even instructs him to fill his sailors' ears with wax to prevent them from hearing the sirens' song.

Fun Fact

According to some reports there were only five engineers in the whole of Mozambique at the time of independence in 1975.

ECONOMY

Throughout their colonial rule, the Portuguese adopted a policy of not investing in the development of the infrastructure (transportation routes, schools, hospitals, and other social niceties) of their colonies. They rented out resources such as land and skilled human labor to other Europeans. Due to the labor practices of the Portuguese and the Companhia de Moçambique, many Mozambican men were forced to work in British colonies and other parts of Africa. Also, during the reign of Portuguese Prime Minister Salazar, Mozambicans fled the country to escape the brutal treatment meted out to them in the rice and cotton plantations.

After independence, Mozambique was economically dependent on South Africa, its main trading partner. In 1982, the country was forced into a civil war, which further drained the economy. It was only after multiparty democracy was established in Mozambique that the government began initiating pro-growth reforms to revive the economy. Both the successful resettlement of war refugees and economic reform have led to a high growth rate: between 1993 and 1999 the growth rate averaged almost 7 percent, and between 1997 and 1999 it averaged better than 10 percent a year. Destructive floods in early 2000 slowed the growth of the gross domestic product (GDP) to a mere 2 percent, but the GDP fully rebounded in 2001, with growth of nearly 15 percent.

The government's ability to control spending and the money supply, combined with financial reform, successfully reduced inflation from a high of 70 percent in 1994 to less than 5 percent in 1998–99. However, economic disruptions stemming from the floods of 2000 caused inflation to jump to almost 13 percent that year, and it was 13 percent again in 2003. The government expects the economy to continue to expand in the early years of the 21st century.

Rapid expansion in the future, however, depends on several major foreign investment projects, continued economic reform, and the revival of the agriculture, transportation, and tourism sectors.

Agriculture is the driving force of the economy, and almost half of the country's population is dependent on farming for its livelihood. Fishing is also pursued along the coast of Mozambique. The country exports aluminum, prawns, shrimp, cashews, cotton, sugar, citrus, timber, and bulk electricity. It is also exploring titanium extraction and processing and garment manufacturing. It imports machinery and equipment, vehicles, fuel, chemicals, metal products, foodstuffs, and textiles.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Mozambique is home to almost 16 major ethnic groups that account for 99 percent of its population. The Makua, the dominant ethnic group, live in the northern parts of Mozambique. Other prominent ethnic groups include the Makonde (also in the north), the Sena (in the central region), and the Shanagaan (in the south). The Portuguese, along with other Europeans and Asians, make up the remaining 1 percent of the population.

Portuguese is the official language of Mozambique, although the ethnic groups prefer to use their own languages. There is also overlap in religion; a majority of Mozambicans hold some animist beliefs, while two-thirds of the population follow Christianity or Islam.

Traditional medicine is an important part of Mozambican culture, and healers called curendeiras are much sought after. They combine traditional medicines with Western medical practices to cure disease. In the rural areas they are often the only medical help available due to lack of hospitals and trained doctors. Mozambicans also seek the help of religious healers like profetas (spirit mediums) and feticiceiros (religious healers) to solve their problems.

Mozambique is well-known for its artistic sculptures, masks, and wall-paintings.

Traditional music and dance form an integral part of Mozambican culture. The mapika dance is a popular traditional dance. Although its exact origins remain unknown, it deals with relations between the sexes, attempting to define the relationship between a man and woman and also exploring the male urge to dominate women. For the mapika dance, a man dons a wig and wears a specially decorated mask, which has drawings made from dyes. He also wears five pieces of cloth that cover his entire body except the fingers and toes. The dancer assumes the role of the spirit of a dead person. The purpose of the dance is to instill fear among the women and children and convince them that men are their only saviors.

Marrabenta is the most popular form of music. It is very urban. The word marrabenta is derived from a Portuguese word rebrantar, which means "to break," referring to the low-quality guitars, whose strings snap easily while playing. Other musical instruments used by Mozambicans include the lupembe, a wind instrument used by the Makonde tribe and the marimba, a type of xylophone used by the Chope tribe in the southern parts of Mozambique.

CUISINE

Cornmeal, millet, rice, and hot stews, so common in the diet of other African peoples, are mainstays of Mozambique's cuisine as well.

Fun Fact

The largest and most famous mural in Mozambique is 311 feet long and is located near the airport in the capital city of Maputo. It reflects the images and captures the stories of the independence struggle against the Portuguese.

Mozambique is known for its wide variety of seafood, which many believe to be the best there is. Delicacies made from crab, shrimp, prawns, and lobsters are preferred. The food is generally cooked in coconut sauce or a special red-pepper sauce called piri-piri.

Piri-piri can be used either as a sauce or as a marinade. Galinha piri piri, for example, is a favorite dish that consists of chicken cooked in piri-piri sauce.

Charcoal grilling is the most popular method of cooking in Mozambique. Another popular recipe is frango a cabrial, which means “chicken, the African way.” Chickens heavily rubbed with piri-piri are roasted over charcoal—so peppery that few tourists even dare try them.

Curries are called caril, and they are also served very “hot,” along with manga achar, a mango chutney served in one of the (several) small dishes that accompany the curry. Chopped peanuts, coconut, cucumber, bananas, and other foods that can be added to the main dish are served in small bowls.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day. Because this is a public holiday in Mozambique, all public and private institutions are closed on January 1.

❁ HEROES' DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 3

This day honors Eduardo Mondlane, the leader of the Front for Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO), who was killed in a bomb blast on February 3, 1969. He is considered the father of the Mozambican independence struggle. In 1962 Eduardo Mondlane was elected president of the newly formed FRELIMO, a coalition of anti-Portuguese political parties that had united in order to free Mozambique from Portuguese rule. For the safety of the organization, the FRELIMO headquarters were based in Dar-es-salaam, Tanzania.

Under his leadership, FRELIMO launched a guerilla war against the Portuguese; he was supported in this effort by the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and several Western countries. The Portuguese took heavy casualties as a result of this guerilla warfare and made several attempts to eliminate FRELIMO leaders. In 1969 a bomb placed underneath Mondlane's chair in the FRELIMO headquarters exploded, killing him instantly.

oppressive forces in Mozambique culminating with independence in 1975. On Heroes' Day the president lays a wreath at the Mozambican Heroes' Square in the capital city of Maputo. Huge rallies, attended by the general public as well as members of FRELIMO, are held all over the country.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

On this day Mozambican trade unions organize large demonstrations throughout the country. Labor Day, also called Worker's Day or May Day, provides them with a platform to voice their opinions and express their grievances concerning government policies and the labor laws. In recent years Mozambican workers have been protesting against privatization programs, as well as the companies that have taken over key industries, causing low wages and mass unemployment in Mozambique.

by the Front for Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO) and the Portuguese government on September 7, 1974.

Mozambique had been under Portuguese rule since the early 1500s and, throughout that period, had been treated brutally. The actual freedom struggle, however, did not begin until 1962, when anti-Portuguese political groups combined to form FRELIMO. In 1964 FRELIMO launched a 10-year guerilla war against the Portuguese colonists. They received popular support as well as the support of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Western countries. After suffering heavy casualties at the hands of FRELIMO for 10 years, the Portuguese signed a peace agreement and granted independence to Mozambique on June 25, 1975.

On this day people in Mozambique pay homage to the freedom fighters who died to liberate Mozambique. Independence Day celebrations take place all over the nation. In the capital city of Maputo, the president unfurls the national flag of Mozambique to start the celebrations. Parades by the armed forces and cultural programs are highlights of Independence Day celebrations in Mozambique.

LUSAKA AGREEMENT DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 7

Lusaka Agreement Day, also known as Victory Day, marks the historic peace agreement signed between FRELIMO and the Portuguese government on September 7, 1974. In accordance with the treaty, Portugal agreed to grant independence to Mozambique in exchange for ending all hostilities against the Portuguese by FRELIMO.

On this day the president of Mozambique lays a wreath at the Monument of Mozambican Heroes in the capital of Maputo, where FRELIMO leaders Eduardo Mondlane and Samora Machel are buried. Presidential speeches, military parades, and music and dance programs mark the Victory Day celebrations. Since this is a national holiday, all public and private institutions are closed.

ARMED FORCES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 25

Armed Forces Day, also known as Revolution Day, commemorates the beginning of the armed struggle led by FRELIMO (Front for Liberation of Mozambique against Portuguese in Mozambique) on September 25, 1964. FRELIMO's guerilla warfare tactics helped Mozambique win its freedom from the Portuguese.

The occasion is celebrated with huge rallies throughout the country that recall the sacrifices of the freedom fighters. In the capital of Maputo the president presides over the events, calling on Mozambicans to protect the integrity and sovereignty of Mozambique as well as to work together to develop a stronger and more self-reliant nation. Military parades are a major highlight of Revolution Day celebrations in Maputo.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, is celebrated on the 10th day of the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca (Hajj). It is a three-day festival, also called Eid al-Kabir, the Great Feast. The pilgrims, having returned from Arafat (another Muslim observance associated with the hajj), slaughter cows, rams, lambs, or similar animals. The sacrifice is performed in remembrance of alaih is salaam (Ibrahim's act of obedience to God—his willingness to sacrifice his son). According to tradition, family members consume one-third of the slaughtered animal, one-third is distributed among friends and relatives, and the rest is given to the poor. This act of giving symbolizes the willingness of Muslims to give up things important to them. On this day people also visit friends and relatives and exchange gifts.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

For Christians Easter is considered the most important Christian festival, and its numerous celebrations and observances form the core of the liturgical year, which begins around the time of the vernal equinox in the Northern Hemisphere (the autumnal equinox in the Southern Hemisphere) and stretches out into summer in the Northern Hemisphere (winter in the Southern Hemisphere). This occasion celebrates the resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion. Christians believe Jesus was the son of God and died on the Cross to redeem humanity from sin. This is a day for celebration among all Christians, and Mozambicans join in the festivities, wearing their best clothes to attend special Easter services in their local churches.

Determining the date of Easter determines when many of the Christian holidays associated with it will occur. Early on, the Catholic Church decided to impose Easter on the pagan spring festivals held at the vernal equinox. The usual statement—that Easter Day is the first Sunday after the full Moon that occurs next after the vernal equinox—however, is not an accurate statement of the actual ecclesiastical rules. The full Moon involved is not the astronomical full Moon but an ecclesiastical Moon (determined from tables) that keeps, more or less, in step with the astronomical Moon.

The ecclesiastical rules are:

- Easter falls on the first Sunday following the first ecclesiastical full Moon that occurs on or after the day of the vernal equinox;
- this particular ecclesiastical full Moon is the 14th day of a tabular lunation (new Moon); and
- the vernal equinox is fixed as March 21.

The result of these calculations is that Easter can never occur before March 22 or later than April 25, which, in Mozambique, is celebrated in the fall because the nation is in the Southern Hemisphere.

❁ MOULLOUD

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Twelfth of Rabbi al-Awwal, the third month of the Islamic calendar

In Mozambique the celebration of Mouloud, the birthday of the prophet Muhammad, is celebrated by Muslims across the country. This date is also called Mawlid al-Nabi, Mawlid al-Nabi, Maulid-ud-nabi, or Birth of the Prophet Muhammad. Speeches on the life of Muhammad, the embodiment of Islam, and public feasts are typical on this day. These stories also recall his suffering, his leadership, and his spirituality. Conservative Muslim sects, the Wahhabis, for example, disapprove of celebrating any human, including Muhammad. They believe that such celebrations interfere with the unwavering worship of Allah, although other sects consider this a great holiday and celebrate it with enthusiasm.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas celebrates the birth of Jesus, who Christians believe was the Son of God. In Mozambique the most important celebrations take place on Christmas Eve services. Most Mozambicans living in urban areas travel to the countryside to join their friends and extended families for the festivities. On December 24, Christians attend church for the Christmas Eve services. Church choirs sing Christmas carols and devotional hymns. After church people sing and dance through the night.

Mozambicans prefer to celebrate Christmas simply. Friends and family exchange greetings only. Exchanging gifts is not part of traditional Christmas celebrations, and no special Christmas meal is prepared. The menu consists of the daily diet of corn porridge, seasonal fruit, and boiled vegetables.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male and female circumcision ceremonies are an integral part of Mozambican culture. Circumcision is considered an essential ritual that helps complete the transition from childhood to adulthood. Among the Makonde tribe, trained elders perform this ceremony using knives or razor blades, and no anesthesia is administered. The initiates are expected to endure pain and are discouraged from showing any sign of discomfort during the ceremony.

❁ DEATH

Among the Tsonga tribe in Mozambique, death is associated with the passing of a person into the spirit world. After the death of a person the family members cleanse the body and perform rituals to ease his or her passage into the next world. Also it is believed that the death of a family member renders the family unclean, so special purification rituals are performed for the survivors over a period of a few months following the death. During these ceremonies the family members gather at a special place and pay tribute to their ancestral spirits. They also offer food and drink to the spirits as a token of thanks for having provided for the family and to seek their protection from evil spirits in the future.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Archaeological findings reveal that parts of Myanmar were inhabited some 5,000 years ago. Many of the diverse groups now living in Myanmar (formerly Burma) migrated south from Tibet and China, down the Irrawaddy River. The Mon tribe is thought to have arrived as early as 3000 B.C.E. from what is now Cambodia and established settlements in central Myanmar, in the Irrawaddy delta, and along the eastern coast of the Bay of Bengal. They constructed irrigation systems and developed commercial and cultural contacts with India.

Around 100 the Pyus, the first Tibeto-Burman group, moved south along the western side of the Irrawaddy and established their capital near what is now called Prome. The Burmans arrived later, entering the Irrawaddy valley in the ninth century. They assimilated with the already settled Mon and Pyu communities. Both the archaeological record and epigraphic evidence indicate that Buddhism was already well established in lower Myanmar by the fifth century. In 832 the Pyu Kingdoms were conquered by the state of Nanchao, and the Pyus again assimilated, this time with the Mons and the second wave of Tibeto-Burmans, the Bamars (Burmese). In 849 King Pyinbya founded Bagan (also Pagan) as a walled city with 12 gates and a moat.

Still later waves of immigration brought in the Shan, Karen, and Kachin tribes from the Yunnan Province of China; these peoples played a significant role in the development of the country. The first unified Myanmar state, the Pagon Kingdom, was founded by King Anawrahata (1047–77 C.E.) in upper Myanmar. The internal structure was similar to that of a Hindu kingdom. Kingship was legitimated by both Hindu ideology and Buddhist faith. During the 250 years of their rule the religious kings built many pagodas, places of worship for Buddhists, throughout Myanmar. In 1287 the Pagon Kingdom was conquered by the Mongols under Kublai Khan (1215–94).

In the 16th century a new Burmese dynasty (the Taungoo Dynasty) emerged in central Myanmar. However, after the death of their third king, a series of encroachments and raids by the Portuguese and the neighboring Thais and Manipuri horsemen (from the state of Manipur in northeast India) brought about the decline of the Taungoo Dynasty. It was finally toppled by a Mon rebellion in 1752.

By the early 19th century political friction arose between the British and Burmese over an Arakanese independence movement based in Bengal, which later came under British rule. The situation was exacerbated by the military successes of the Burmese general Maha Bandula in Assam, also under British rule. The British responded with a naval attack on Burma, thereby starting the first Anglo-Burmese War (1824–26). The British ultimately captured Burma and brought administrative and social modernization to Burma. They moved the capital from Mandalay to Rangoon in 1886 and annexed Burma to India.

During World War II, the temporary British retreat from Burma before the invading Japanese military forces provoked a nationalist movement in Burma for separation from India and independence from British rule. On January 4, 1948, Burma gained independence and became the Union of Burma, a democratic state.

Democratic rule in Burma ended in 1962 with a military coup led by General Ne Win, who initiated harsh reforms during his 26-year rule. After the resignation of Ne Win (? 1910–2002) in 1988, free elections were held again in 1990 (the last free elections had been held some 30 years earlier). Despite the landslide victory of the NLD (National League for Democracy), the party led by Ms. Aung San Suu Kyi (b. 1945), the military refused to relinquish political power and instead maintained its repressive regime. It was still in control of Myanmar in the early years of the 21st century.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Myanmar is about 1,295 miles long from north to south and about 575 miles wide from east to west. The coastal region of Upper Myanmar, a horseshoe-shaped mountain complex and the Irrawaddy River Valley, are the country's main geographical features. The 19,295-foot-high Hkakabo Razi is the highest peak in Myanmar. The Arakan Yoma range of mountains form a natural barrier between Myanmar and the Indian subcontinent, and the Bilauklaung range lies between Myanmar and Thailand. The deltaic plains, covering about 18,000 square miles, are extremely fertile and are the most important economic region of Myanmar.

The climate of Myanmar follows a monsoon pattern similar to other South Asian countries. There are three distinct climates:

- hot and wet—tropical monsoon: cloudy, rainy, very hot, humid summers (southwest monsoon, May to October);
- cold—lower humidity (northeast monsoon, December to April);
- the rest of the year—less cloudy, scant rain fall, mild temperatures (November)

Aung San Suu Kyi

Aung San Suu Kyi is the daughter of General Aung San, the founder of the NLD (National League for Democracy) party in Myanmar. In the 1990 election in Myanmar the NLD won 83 percent of the seats, but Ms. Suu Kyi was prevented by Myanmar's military leaders from becoming prime minister. Since then Ms. Suu Kyi has earned international praise as an icon of democracy, freedom, and world peace. She has repeatedly been placed under house arrest by the military rulers but has fought tirelessly for the restoration of democracy in her country. Ms. Suu Kyi was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1991.

❁ ECONOMY

Before the Second World War, Myanmar was the world's most important rice exporting nation. Farmers used to grow rice mainly in the fertile Irrawaddy delta region with the help of floodwaters. Since the war, although total arable land in Myanmar has increased, rice production has not kept pace with population growth, resulting in the decline of rice exports. Nevertheless Myanmar remains an important rice producer in south Asia. In Myanmar the economy revolves around agriculture, with 73 percent of the total workforce engaged in cultivation and only about 10 percent in industry. It is also the world's second largest producer of illicit opium (Afghanistan is first).

Although forestry was once a major export earner—Burmese teakwood was famous all over the world for its quality—deforestation and inadequate reforestation efforts have caused exports to decrease. Presently tourism is the main source of foreign-exchange income for Myanmar, although it is not among the top tourist destinations in south Asia.

During the 26 years' military rule of General Ne Win (1962–88), most major industries were nationalized. The policy was a failure, however, and led to an economic decline. Subsequently the economy was opened up to attract foreign investments, but due to ongoing losses by state-owned industries, heavy government spending on defense, and a high rate of inflation, as well as the withdrawal of international assistance after Myanmar's suppression of democracy, the economy remained weak. In 1997 the United States imposed economic sanctions against Myanmar, and in the same year the entire south Asian region suffered from an economic downturn.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Myanmar was earlier known as Burma. On gaining independence in 1948, the country became the Union of Burma. But in 1989 the ruling military

The Burmese Script

Three-fourths of the Myanmar population, numbering close to 30 million, use the Burmese language. The Burmese alphabet consists entirely of circles or portions of circles. This circular pattern evolved long ago when the Burmese used to write on leaves (such as the palm leaf) with a stylus, not a modern-day pen or pencil. Straight lines were impossible, because they would cause the leaf to split. There are 42 letters in the Burmese alphabet—32 consonants and 10 vowels.

government renamed the country the Union of Myanmar. The change of name has been opposed both outside and within the country. The name Union of Myanmar has been recognized by the United Nations but not by the United States, Great Britain, and other countries, which do not recognize the legitimacy of the military government.

Myanmar's official language is Burmese, which belongs to the Tibeto-Burman group of languages. These languages are spoken in the terrain covering the eastern parts of Bangladesh in the west to Vietnam in the east, in addition to Nepal, Bhutan, parts of Thailand, and the Yunnan and Sichuan provinces of China. Burmese is spoken by 75 percent of the population in Myanmar.

After Buddhism was introduced it spread rapidly, and by the 11th century Myanmar was a major center of the Buddhist religion, philosophy, and practices.

Myanmar is one of the least westernized countries because of its isolation from the rest of the world. It is a land of Buddhist people and is considered a major cultural and religious center of Buddhism, with many monasteries and pagodas throughout the country. The daily village life in Myanmar begins with the monks (pongyis) making their rounds in the morning with their begging bowls. The monks, forbidden by their religion to

Shinphyu Ceremony

Of the major ceremonies of the Myanmar Buddhists, the ceremony of Shinphyu is among the most important. Young boys of Buddhist parents are ceremoniously paraded on their fathers' shoulders under golden umbrellas to reenact the childhood of Prince Siddhartha (the birth name of Buddha) 2,500 years ago. Parents, friends, and relatives from all over the country participate in this unique ceremony. It is held on the full Moon day of the month of Tabaung (March of the Gregorian calendar).

work for a living, go from door to door, and the villagers earn spiritual merit by donating food to them. Festivals, central to the practice of Buddhism, are held on the full Moon day of every month, and there are many pagoda festivals as well. The influence of Indian culture on Myanmar's sort of Buddhism can be seen in the Buddhist Festival of Lights; it is much like the Hindu festival of Diwali, in which small lamps are lit to welcome Rama home after his 14-year exile.

❁ CUISINE

Myanmar food in taste and presentation is somewhere between Chinese and Thai. It is richer than Chinese food but less spicy than Thai. Rice is the staple carbohydrate and is normally eaten with fish, chicken, or pork. Some popular Myanmar dishes include fish steamed in banana leaves, Nga Baun Doke (Burmese Fish), Kyether Susie Kyawo (stir-fried chicken with chili), Moat Hin Car (rice noodles in fish soup), Kyauk Swe Pyoke (crab meat and noodles), Khow Swé (rice noodles in a broth, usually nonvegetarian).

A Myanmar favorite is lephet, green tea salad, made of pickled green tea leaves. These tea leaves are largely grown in the Palaung Hills in the north-east region of Myanmar because the tea leaves like cool weather and thrive at 4,000 feet high above sea level. The tea sprouts are harvested between April and October every year. Only two leaves and a sprout at the top of the tea plant are plucked. Tea leaves plucked before April are the best.

Lephet is served to welcome guests to one's house, as a peace offering after an argument, as a snack in front of TV, as an appetizer or last course, a palate cleanser after a meal, and as a stimulant to ward off sleep during all-night Myanmar opera performances. Other popular Myanmar snacks are variations of pancakes made of a batter of ground rice and glutinous rice. Beimoun is a small fried pancake with poppy seeds and coconut flakes sprinkled on top. Mounpyathalet, honeycomb pancakes, have steamed garden peas, roasted sesame powder, and onion added to the batter. Similarly kbaukmounpyu, a white folded pancake, is made by adding tomato, coriander, cabbage, green chilies, and curry powder to the batter. These snacks are available at food stalls in the cities.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 4

On January 4, 1948, the country won its independence from British rule to become the independent and sovereign Union of Burma. This is a national holiday, and it begins with flag-raising ceremonies. The army parades in the capital Yangon (formerly Rangoon) passing in review before the military rulers of the country.

❁ UNION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 12

This day commemorates the conference held on February 12, 1947, that led to the formation of the independent Union of Burma. This day is also known as Pyidaungsa Day.

❁ PEASANTS' DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 2

On March 2, 1962, a military coup in Myanmar, led by General Ne Win, toppled the democratically elected government and seized control of the country. General Ne Win's rule lasted for 26 years and was marked by harsh measures. Peasants' Day is observed on March 2 to commemorate the military coup he led.

❁ ARMED FORCES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 27

During the Anglo-Burmese war (1824–26), the British general Willoughby Cotton, who attacked the Burmese forces led by General Bandula at Danubyu, had to retreat after facing stiff resistance from Bandula's defending forces. This setback occurred on March 27, 1825, and the day is observed in Myanmar as Armed Forces Day, a public holiday marked by parades and other functions organized by the military.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Mid April

Myanmar's New Year's celebration usually falls on April 13, and the festivals (including the Thingyan Water Festival) last for three or four days, beginning on New Year's Day. The people of Myanmar usher in their new year with the Thingyan Water Festival, observed since the Tagaung era, but more important since the Bagan Dynasty. The Burmese splash water on friends and even strangers on the streets because water symbolizes purity and cleanness. According to legend Thagyarmin, the king of the celestials, comes down to Earth to bring in the Myanmar new year. New Year's was also the time when people washed the hair of their elderly relatives with tayaw, a shampoo made with acacia.

❁ THINGYAN WATER FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Mid April

Myanmar is known to be a land of festivals, and the year begins with Thingyan, the four-day Water Festival, which welcomes the new year and usually falls in April. During the festival, water is splashed and thrown on friends as well as strangers and even on the police officers on duty. Symbolically, sprinkling of water washes away the bad luck and sins of the previous year.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, is an international holiday that honors the workers of every nation for their contributions to their society. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Myanmar observes Labor Day with massive rallies by workers and peasants. In the capital of Yangon, the leaders of the ruling military government give speeches during the Labor Day rallies.

❁ MARTYRS' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 19

One of the principal figures of modern Myanmar history was U Aung San, the first prime minister of British Burma after the Anglo-Burmese war (1824–26). Aung San was a student turned activist, and he devoted himself to the struggle to free Myanmar from British rule. He fled to Japan in 1940 and returned with the invading Japanese army as head of the Burma Independent Army.

After the war General Aung San negotiated Burma's independence from British rule but was assassinated on July 19, 1947, before the country had gained full independence. The people of Myanmar observe Martyrs' Day to commemorate U Aung San's supreme sacrifice for the nation.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Late November

National Day is observed on the 10th day of the waning Moon in the lunar month of Tazaungmon, in late November or early December of the Western calendar. In 1920 the British colonial government passed the Yangon University Act. There was great public outcry against it because it was perceived as supporting colonial education, designed only to train Burmese youth to become servants of the British colonial administration.

The act was resisted, and people set up a council for national education to open a national college as well as schools throughout the country. The British government finally gave in, recognizing the national schools and giving them financial aid. The success of this boycott empowered the people's freedom struggle. This day of boycott is commemorated as the National Day of Myanmar.

❁ KAREN NEW YEAR

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December or January

Karen New Year is a national holiday, although it is mainly celebrated by the Karen community, which makes up 7 percent of Myanmar's population. On this day the Karen people, wearing their ethnic costumes, dance in groups with their friends and families. Sports activities, such as boxing matches, are held at Innsen, a suburb in Northwest Yangon where the Karen community is concentrated. However, the grandest New Year celebrations are held in Pa-an, the capital of the state of Karen.

Religious Holidays

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists
Observed on: Late April or early May

Vesak, the holiest of Buddhist festivals, is celebrated to mark the birth, enlightenment, and death of Lord Buddha on the full Moon day of the month of Kason. All of these events in the life of Lord Buddha are believed to have taken place on the same day (but in different years) beneath a bo (banyan) tree. This is why people carry scented water pots in procession, chanting verses and hymns in praise of Lord Buddha in Pali, the language of the ancient Buddhist scriptures. Bo trees, which are found in all pagodas, are watered on this day. Watering the trees is regarded as a holy service and a symbolic preservation of the sacred trees. The procession, as usual, is attended by music troupes. Burmese folk music troupes consist of simple instruments, namely, the drum, cymbals, bamboo clappers, and flute with one or more dancers.

It is the season of the Nyaung Yethun Festival. The water in all ponds, lakes, and creeks reaches its lowest level. During the month of Kason the days are longer and the nights are shorter. The seasonal flower of Kason is the sagar. On the full Moon day of Kason Buddhist devotees celebrate not only the water-pouring ceremony at the bo tree but also perform meritorious deeds by meditating and offering flowers, lights, water, and incense to the images of Lord Buddha.

❁ BUDDHIST LENT

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: July

The full Moon of Waso in July heralds the start of the three-month Buddhist Lent (or Rains Retreat), the date of Lord Buddha's first sermon about 2,500 years ago. After this day Buddhist monks are forbidden to travel and must spend the entire period in their monasteries. This is a period of meditation, self-restraint, and abstinence, and weddings are forbidden during this time. This period of confinement coincides with the rainy season, during which traveling is difficult. People in Myanmar observe this day by offering robes to monks.

❁ MAHA DOK FESTIVAL

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: August

The Maha Dok Festival is celebrated on the full Moon day of Wagaung, the month of August of the Western calendar. The festival is named for a very poor man who became rich overnight after he made offerings to Kassapa Buddha.

A tent large enough to hold as many alms bowls as there are monks (bikkhus) in the sangha (a community of ordained Buddhist monks or nuns) is set up, and passersby put their contributions in the bowls, whatever they can afford. Once the bowls are full they are distributed to the sangha by the drawing of lots.

❁ FESTIVAL OF LIGHTS

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: September or October

Thadingyut, the seventh-month of the Burmese calendar, is the end of the Buddhist Lent (Rains Retreat). This three-day celebration, which is similar to the Hindu festival of Diwali, starts on the day before the day of the full Moon, and ends the day after the full Moon. The lights celebrate the Buddha's return from the celestial abode where he had spent Lent delivering a discourse called Abhidamma, or higher teaching to the celestials. Among the gods was the Buddha's mother, who had been reborn there. On the full Moon day of Thadingyut Buddha returned to Earth. He and his disciples were attended by a host of celestials who made a star ladder for his descent. Buddhists on Earth illuminate their homes and streets to welcome Buddha's return with his disciples.

Many prefer to visit small towns and villages because they find the festival celebrations more enjoyable than they are in the cities. In small towns earthen saucers are filled with sesame oil and pieces of cotton serve as wicks. The streets are filled with amateur dancing groups, music troupes, stalls with food, and spectators enjoying all the free entertainment. On the festival day groups of young people can be seen walking with candles and gifts in their hands to pay respect to their elders. In Burmese this is called kadarw, but it is more than just paying respects or doing obeisance. The Buddha taught that parents and teachers are the first to be served; next come those who are older and those to whom we are grateful.

This is also a time when lovers plan their wedding ceremonies, which were not allowed during the Rains Retreat.

❁ TAZAUNGMON FULL MOON DAY

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: October or November

Tazaungmon is the first month of the cold season in Myanmar. This festival is held on the full Moon of Tazaung to welcome the cool season ahead. On this day Buddhists illuminate the Sulamani Pagoda, where celestial beings are said to live. The pagoda is festooned with lamps and paper lanterns, and hot air balloons are released to pay homage to the deities in the pagoda. Food stalls are also set up near the pagoda.

In Taunggyi, capital of Shan state, this festival is very colorful, with candlelit processions accompanied by traditional Shan and Pa-Oo dances and music, along with fireworks and hot air balloons.

❁ KACHIN MANAO FESTIVAL

Observed in: Kachin state
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 10

This is a colorful annual festival, which is celebrated by the Kachin tribe. Animal sacrifices are made to the traditional home gods. Community feasts are held and traditional home-brewed Khaung Yay wine (made from millet) is drunk throughout the day. This is followed by all-night group dancing, in ethnic costumes, on the sacrificial ground. Food stalls are set up for the dancing crowd.

❁ NAGA TRADITIONAL NEW YEAR'S FESTIVAL

Observed in: Sagaing Division, Northwest corner of Myanmar
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 14–15

Most of the Naga people of Myanmar live in Sagaing Division, close to the Indian border, in the northwest corner of Myanmar. They belong to the Tibeto-Myanmar group, and their traditional New Year's festivals have always been community celebrations when friends from far and near came to join in. Hoping to expand the scope of their New Year's observances, the Naga elders decided in 1990 to make the event a regional celebration rather than a local one. At that time they also decided to schedule their traditional New Year's on the same date every year January 15. The location for the festivities will rotate among four Naga towns of Khamti, Leshi, Namyung, and Lahe.

On New Year's Eve, January 14, the New Year Festival pole is put up, and everyone gathers for the opening ceremony. A huge bonfire is lit to celebrate a good harvest, and everyone enjoys a traditional feast.

This provides Naga farmers a chance to share their farming experiences, and this exchange also gives them renewed energy for the work of the coming year. Then on January 15, hundreds of tourists and about 10,000 local people gather to enjoy traditional Naga music and dancing along with traditional cooking and rice wine.

All of the singing and dancing is about health, wealth, happiness, and another good harvest in the coming year. There are usually at least 29 dance groups representing the local towns, and the dancers wear beautiful costumes decorated with hornbill's feathers and plumes, elephant tusks, the canine teeth and paws of tigers, bears, and boars, buffalo horns, shells, and horse's and goat's tails. The dancers also adorn themselves with silver and bronze beads, bangles, bracelets, pendants, and eardrops.

Shwedagon is a world-famous pagoda located in Yangon. The Pagoda Festival begins on the full Moon day of the month of Tabaung, which falls in March of the Gregorian calendar and lasts for several days. Stalls and shops selling food items and other local products are set up at the foot of the hill for the festival crowd. In the evenings theatrical shows are performed by various dance troops of Myanmar.

❁ PINDAYA CAVE FESTIVALS

Observed by: Buddhists in Shan state
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February or March

The Shwe Oo Min Pagoda cave, located at Pindaya in Shan state, is noted for its centuries-old Buddha images, numbering over 8,000. The Pagoda Festival is celebrated on and around the full Moon day of Tabaung (March). Thousands of Buddhists from Shan and other places in Myanmar visit the cave during the festival and pay homage to Lord Buddha. A shopping mall springs up at the foot of the hill to sell food, seasonal fruits, and other local products.

❁ WASO CHINLON FESTIVAL

Observed in: Mandalay
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June or July

Mandalay, the second capital city of Myanmar, takes pride in maintaining ancient Myanmar traditions. One such event is the Waso Chinlon Festival, which has been held annually for more than 70 years. (In 2003 the diamond jubilee of the festival was celebrated.) Chinlon is the national sport of Myanmar, but it's about more than athleticism: While the players play chinlon, the Myanmar Orchestra plays music to accompany the activity on the field, and the tempo is synchronized to follow the players' grace and agility. Chinlon can be played by anyone—women and men, old and young, citizen or tourist.

Chinlon is played using a ball made of woven rattan. The ball has 12 pentagonal holes in it and is usually four inches in diameter. The area is usually a circle 22 feet wide in which six players strive to keep the ball in the air. In formal games, such as those played during festivals, each player has to keep the ball aloft using only six areas on the feet and legs for five minutes for each play. He or she has to use 30 different techniques and receives one point for each kick. Points are subtracted for losing the ball or using the wrong body part. The players must not stop or move out of the area during the specified time. Variations in style and methods are accepted, however, as long as the basic principles are adhered to.

At the end of the Waso Chinlon Festival the players make offerings of flowers, lights, and Waso robes to the Maha Myat Muni Buddha Image Pagoda with the money they get for playing Chinlon.

❁ TAUNGBYONE NAT FESTIVAL

Observed in: Taungbyone, Mandalay state

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Late July to mid August

Taungbyone (or Taungpyone) is located about 12 miles north of Mandalay and is famous for its annual Spirit Festival, which is held in memory of the Taungbyone Brother Lords. The Taungbyone Brother Lords were accidentally killed when the king ordered that they be subjected to some mild form of punishment. The remorse-stricken king had a shrine built to honor them and placate their spirits, and gave the Nats the surrounding area as a province of their own. This promise has been honored since the Bagan Dynasty in the 11th century. In Myanmar it is commonly believed that Nats, or spirits, must be ceremonially mollified or they will cause immense misery and chaos in peoples' lives. This festival is meant to appease the Nats.

Wooden figures representing the brothers are given a ceremonial bath and then paraded through the thousands of people gathered for the occasion. There is a great rush as people try to touch each wooden figure at least once for good luck, prosperity, and the fulfillment of their wishes. An enormous bazaar is set up so people engage in a lot of eating and gambling. Other events include ritual offerings, ceremonial spirit dances, and consultations with shamans during the Spirit Festival.

❁ POPA CEREMONY IN YADANAGU PAGODA

Observed in: Amarapura

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August

This popular festival takes place in August, just one week after the end of the Spirit Festival, and is another of those held to appease the Nats. This one is held at Yadanagu village in Amarapura State. The festival, held to honor Popa-Madaw (Mother of Mount Popa), celebrates the kinship between human beings and spirits. A special kind of music is played in the ceremony, compelling people to dance as if they are possessed by the spirits.

❁ PHAUNG-TAW-OO PAGODA FESTIVAL

Observed in: Inle Lake

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August

The Phaung-Taw-Oo Pagoda Festival is an 18-day event that ends with leg-rowing boat races. Four Buddha images from the Phaung-Taw-Oo pagoda are placed on a royal barge and ceremoniously towed around the lake from one village to another by the leg-rowing boats.

Fun Fact

The Intha, one of Myanmar's minority groups, live along Inle Lake. They are renowned for their silversmithing and weaving.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

Buddhism is the center of an individual's life in Myanmar. A rite of passage for every adolescent Buddhist boy is the Shinphyu, in which the boy briefly relives the princely life of Siddhartha Gautama, who would later become the Buddha.

A Buddhist boy enters a monastery as a novice monk of his own free will. After a few years he usually returns to his family, gets married, cultivates his land, and carries on a nondescript family life. In later years he may again return to the monastery to be a monk. But if he is married, he has to seek permission from his wife in order to leave the family life to become a monk.

❁ MARRIAGE

The Buddhist religion, which is followed by the majority of the people in Myanmar, favors chastity in marriage, and in fact it does not advocate matrimony, since marriage violates the principle of abstinence from worldly desires. Thus no religious ceremony is held to solemnize a marriage, nor is it considered necessary under law. In fact common-law marriage (living together as husband and wife without getting married) used to often be the only option available to couples in traditional Myanmar society.

Nowadays, especially in urban areas, people feel the need to host some sort of ceremony and reception for their families and other guests. As these ceremonies are completely secular, there are no priests or religious functionaries. Instead a master of ceremonies, or Beitheik Saya, conducts the ceremony. The Beitheik Saya leads the bride and groom to the stage, reads the vows, delivers the benediction, and oversees certain marriage rites, such as garlanding the couple with a four-foot long chain, placing the bride's scarf around both of them, putting their palms together while they face each other, and immersing their joined hands in scented water contained in a silver bowl.

The ceremony is followed by music and refreshments. The newlyweds go around greeting the guests and thanking them for attending. Then the couple goes back to the dais where they have their first meal together before the assembled guests, in keeping with an important Myanmar custom, which is a condition for being recognized as a couple. Afterward the young couple approaches their parents and the elders, bowing and making kadaw ("obeisance"), seeking their blessings and instructions for leading a happy and pious life.

After a round of visits to a few well-known local pagodas, where they offer prayers for a blissful marriage in this and successive lives, they return home, where friends and relatives are waiting, ready to play pranks on them. One common prank involves barring the entrance to their nuptial chamber with a gold chain and demanding payment (known as gare-boe, "stone-money") for entry. This harks back to the traditional custom of the youth of the locality threatening to throw stones at the house of a newly married couple unless they were paid some money.

In rural villages and among the urban poor, elopement is the favorite practice for marriages, since it saves both families considerable expense.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Although it is thought that Namibia has been inhabited for about one million years, the archaeological record is piecemeal until about 30,000 years ago, when a relatively consecutive record of habitation is evidenced by stone tools, beads, and other artifacts. Namibia was formerly the land of the Bushmen, a group of people referred to as San or Sans. (The term Bushman is now considered derogatory.)

The San have the oldest surviving culture in the world. They have been hunting and gathering in sub-Saharan Africa for over 100,000 years. The remaining San (around 95,000 people) live in and around the Kalahari Desert, which stretches across South Africa, Botswana, and Namibia, but many San are compelled to live in permanent settlements because the land they hunted and gathered on is now privately owned. Many people are familiar with the traditional lifestyle of the San from the popular movie The Gods Must Be Crazy (1980)

Namibia's archaeological importance is due to the numbers and quality of its rock art. Maack's Shelter in the Brandberg, Twyfelfontein, and Piet Alberts Kopjes are three sites in western Namibia that have been given the most attention. Maack's Shelter, a granite overhang in the Tsisab ravine, is filled with an immense number of paintings.

Twyfelfontein is probably the most densely engraved site in southern Africa. There are at least 2,500 engraved figures on the sandstone boulders at Twyfelfontein, and a few paintings, making it one of the few sites in southern Africa where paintings and engravings have been found. Piet Alberts Kopjes (hillocks) contains hundreds of engravings carved out of

Dr. Reinhard Maack discovered the so-called White Lady on the Brandberg Massif in 1918.

In 1918 Abbé Henri Breuil described the painting as that of a “white lady,” but the figure is neither a woman nor a European. It is now thought to represent a male shaman in white body paint.

hard granite with great difficulty. These three sites are remarkable because they are less than 100 miles apart.

Twyfelfontein is Namibia’s most famous rock art site, much of it easily accessible. What appears to observers is a gallery of local wildlife, images of giraffe, lion, oryx, zebra, rhino, springbok, wildebeest, and steenbok. There are also geometric patterns and designs, as well as humans, usually what appear to be hunters. It is estimated that there are over 2,000 paintings and engravings, all fragile because of their exposure to weather, the years, and man. Researchers speculate that the Twyfelfontein rock art was probably created by the San and may date from about 6000 B.C.E., although some estimates think it may go back as far as 25,000. Several painted slabs found in a Namibian cave had fallen from their original location on the ceiling, and the layers the slabs were found in have been dated to 27,000 years ago, making them the oldest rock art in Africa.

The Hungorob Ravine is only one ravine removed from the more famous Tsisab Ravine in the Brandberg of Namibia, but it is reputed to have better rock art than the Tsisab. The sites with paintings began to be occupied around 4,500 B.C.E. by hunter-gatherers. Then around 2,000, although pottery was introduced, the people appear to have remained hunter-gatherers. Finally around 500 B.C.E., stock was introduced, and the residents apparently became herders. Rock art continued into the pottery phase, but it becomes engravings of four rows of dots, without any other subject matter.

It was only in the years just prior to World War I that the English and Germans colonized the area.

Skeleton Coast

The Skeleton Coast is the coastline between where the Kunene and Ugab Rivers flow out into the Atlantic. However, the name is used to refer to the entire desert coastline, even as far south as Lüderitz. The coastal parks in this area are huge, almost 7,720 square miles of dunes and gravel plains. It is one of the world’s bleakest and savagely inhospitable waterless areas. Shipwrecked sailors who were washed up on this shore had almost no chance of survival, making it a maritime graveyard for unwary ships over the centuries. A misty fog that hangs in the air for much of the year gives this barren coast its unusual name and also its eerie feeling.

The country, formerly known as South-West Africa, was occupied by the British during World War I. In 1920 the League of Nations gave South Africa a mandate to administer the country. Succeeding the League after World War II, the United Nations (UN) sought to continue South African trusteeship, but South Africa annexed the territory instead. In 1966 the UN revoked the trusteeship, and a war for independence was launched by the Marxist guerrilla group, the South-West Africa People’s Organization (SWAPO).

South-West Africa was renamed Namibia in 1968, but it was not until 1988 that South Africa, harried by years of guerrilla warfare and pressure from the UN, agreed to end its control and governance of Namibia. Namibia became independent on March 21, 1990. Multiparty elections and the framing of a constitution followed. In November 2004 after a landslide victory, Hifikepunye Pohamba (b. 1935) replaced Sam Nujoma (b. 1929), who had headed the country since its independence.

CLIMATE AND GEOGRAPHY

Namibia is a vast country, which ranks 31st in the world in terms of area but is relatively sparsely populated. South Africa borders Namibia in the south, while Angola and Zambia border it in the north and Botswana and Zimbabwe in the east. To the west are the Atlantic Ocean, with a coastline hundreds of miles long, and the Namib Desert, the oldest desert in the world. The Kalahari Desert runs along the southeastern border with Botswana. Namibia’s highest mountain is the 8,400-ft. Brandberg in the southern Kunene region, where some of the finest ancient rock art in the world is found.

Namibia has a semidesert climate—hot days and cool nights. The cold Benguela current cools the temperate desert coast, which is also known as the Skeleton Coast. However, it also causes fog and hinders rainfall. It is a sunny land with 300 days of sunshine on average every year. There is rain only during the summer months and then only thunderstorms. January and February are the hottest months. Winter days in some areas can be frosty, but in most parts of the country, they are sunny and clear.

ECONOMY

Namibia is abundant in natural resources. It has a good infrastructure and access to markets, but in spite of its potential, the country’s economy is not very strong. It is heavily dependent on the export of minerals. Mining accounts for 20 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP). Namibia is one of the world’s main sources of gem-quality diamonds. It is also the fourth largest producer of non-fuel minerals on the African continent. This mineral-rich country also produces vast quantities of uranium, lead, zinc, tin, silver, and tungsten. However, only 3 percent of the population is employed in the mining sector.

More than half the population depends on subsistence farming. Namibia has to import more than 50 percent of its foodstuff, and still there are serious supply shortages in drought years.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Ovambos and Kavango are Namibia's two main tribes; they make up 60 percent of the population. The other tribes are the Hereros, Damaras, Namas, and the Caprivians. The original inhabitants of the country, however, were the San, who lived in this territory for thousands of years. The Basters, who settled in the Rehoboth area in 1870, are a product of the union between the European farmers and Khoi women in the cape. Immigrants from South Africa, called the Cape Coloureds, live primarily in the urban areas. Among the whites, 50 percent are South Africans, 25 percent are of German descent, 20 percent are Afrikaners (South Africans of European ancestry, primarily descendants of 17th-century Dutch settlers), and a small minority are British.

With so many tribes, Namibian culture is quite varied. The Afrikaners are the descendants of Dutch and French Huguenots who settled in southern Africa. (The people are known as Afrikaners, their language is Afrikaans, sometimes referred to as Taal.) They are also commonly known as the Boer, which means "farmer" in Afrikaans. The Afrikaners have also been called the white tribe of Africa. Their culture is completely different from that of the German-speaking community or the Creole culture. The Rethbother tribes have a culture similar to that of the rural Afrikaners of the mid-20th century. The Namas are more similar to the other pastoral black communities. The Cape Coloureds (modern-day descendants of slaves imported into South Africa by Dutch settlers) have an urban culture with a fusion of black and European elements. The San culture suffered from serfdom and exploitation during the colonial wars. Concerted efforts to revive the culture have been largely thwarted by limited knowledge and resources and the hindrance of self-appointed guardians.

Sports are popular in Namibia in both the black and European communities. Soccer is the favorite sport of the blacks. The Namibian government owns broadcast stations as well as a newspaper. In spite of government ownership, the media has considerable intellectual and operational freedom.

Although Namibia's literature is still in a nascent stage, other forms of art, such as music and dance, have been a part of the country's cultural history for a long time. The San were the earliest musicians; they imitated the sounds of animals to accompany dancing and storytelling. Among the instruments introduced by the early Namas are drums, flutes, and thumb pianos. They also used stringed instruments. The Bantu—an ethnic and linguistic group that composed the main inhabitants of the African continent—introduced instruments such as the marimba and gourd rattle. They also made trumpets out of animal horns. The Christian missionaries introduced the concept of the religious choir.

Traditional Namibian dances are performed at community events such as festivals and weddings. The Caprivi Arts Festival is a showcase of the country's various dance forms.

❁ CUISINE

Each Namibian group has its own preferred dishes. The Ovambos generally eat a carbohydrate-rich meal of mielie pap, or cornmeal porridge. It is eaten with meat sauce, or mahango—millet cooked as a porridge or soup. Both these dishes are eaten with a meat stew. Pumpkins, peppers, and onions are primary ingredients in Namibian cuisine.

The Namas, who inhabit the deserts, not only eat the spiky Nara melons, but also revere them, as they have for thousands of years. The annual harvest of these melons is a significant event. These fruits, which are a common sight in the desert, are a principal source of nutrition in the Namib Desert. The Herero tribes are dependent on dairy products like curds and butter. The influence of German food also remains as a vestige of Namibia's colonial past. The most prominent dish is boerewors, an assortment of sausages. The German influence may also be seen in baked goods such as cakes, pastries, and bread. Mataku (watermelon wine) and walende, a distilled palm spirit that tastes like vodka, are the traditional beverages.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

New Year's Day is the first day of the year in the Gregorian calendar. It is the oldest and most universal holiday. The Romans were the first to observe January 1 as New Year's Day in 153 B.C.E. In 1582 Pope Gregory XIII (r. 1572–85) instituted the Gregorian calendar, now used widely, designating January 1 as the first day of the new year. Before this many countries celebrated the new year on March 25, because it was related to the Feast of the Annunciation. In England and New England this did not change until 1752. From its earliest days New Year's was celebrated very much the same way it is today with parties and dancing into the late hours of the night.

In Namibia New Year's celebrations are primarily an urban phenomenon. Namibians, especially in Windhoek, hold big parties to welcome the new year. Fireworks and musical performances are organized by the city.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 21

Namibians observe March 21 as their Independence Day to commemorate the day they became a free country. Locals celebrate the day with feasts and festivities. Namibians raise their national flag and sing their national anthem, "Namibia, Land of the Brave."

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The Namibian Constitution very clearly addresses the rights of workers. Hence, workers enjoy many liberties in the country. There is also an organized trade union movement in the country with more than 20 trade unions, representing about 90,000 workers.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Even though the AFL demonstration was cancelled, the international holiday was still observed.

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, is observed with huge rallies and processions. There are also efforts to remind workers of their rights and liberties. It is a public holiday and all government, commercial, and educational institutions are closed.

❁ CASSINGA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 4

Namibians observe Cassinga Day on May 4 to commemorate the 1978 airborne attack by South African forces on a South-West African People's Organization (SWAPO) base in the old mining town of Cassinga in Angola. Hundreds of Namibians died in the military operation. Conducted as part of Operation Reindeer by South Africa, it was the first of three major operations intended to destroy the Namibian Marxist guerrilla movement. This was at the height of the anti-apartheid struggle. Most of the victims of this massacre were women, children, and the elderly. The camp was used by SWAPO as a transit center for people crossing from Namibia into Angola.

Namibians observe this day with solemn ceremonies in which Cassinga survivors speak of the ordeal and their experiences. In Namibia Cassinga Day is a time to remind people of the sacrifices made by patriots both within the country and in exile for the nation's liberation. Forgiveness and reconciliation are the dominant themes of the day.

❁ AFRICA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 25

Africa Day or Africa Liberation Day is observed to commemorate the founding of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on May 25, 1963. (The OAU was disbanded on July 9, 2002, and the African Union [AU], modeled on the European Union [EU], took its place.) On this day, many African nations celebrate their hard-fought and hard-earned freedom from European colonial rulers. Africans pay tribute to the leaders who had a common vision of unity and the wisdom to seek a joint solution to the problems facing the continent in the 1960s. This inter-African organization of independent states was formed to lead the continent on the path of decolonization, liberation, equality, justice, and progress.

Africa Day recognizes the achievements made by the African leaders and looks toward the goal of making the 21st century the African century. The Namibian government celebrates this day by organizing cultural activities such as poetry readings and music and dance performances. Namibians of different tribes come together to celebrate this important day.

❁ HEROES' DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 26

Heroes' Day in Namibia commemorates the beginning of the South-West African People's Organization's (SWAPO) armed struggle against the South African regime and those killed in the struggle. The nation unites to pay tribute to the brave men, women, even children who suffered and fought for the liberation and independence of the country. They fought not only on the battlefield, but also on the political and diplomatic fronts. On Heroes' Day Namibians take a pledge that they will never allow their country to be subjugated again and also rededicate themselves to the service of the nation.

The Namibian government has constructed a multimillion dollar memorial and remembrance ground in Windhoek in memory of the heroes. Previously most of the celebrations were held at Omugulugombashe in Ongandjera, the site of the first clash between SWAPO combatants and South African forces. A 21-gun salute and a religious ceremony performed by the bishop of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Namibia are some of the highlights of Heroes' Day celebrations. The local tribes, many of them wearing traditional dress, gather to commemorate the dead. There are processions to celebrate the tribes' martial glories and traditional dances are performed.

❁ HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 10

Human rights, according to the UN, are those inherent rights without which we cannot live as human beings. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was signed on December 10, 1948, by UN members in New York. Canadian John Humphrey was the main author of the declaration, which was intended to serve as a universal code of conduct to govern human and national behavior and to avoid the horrors of war.

Human Rights Day is observed in Namibia to remember those killed in 1959, when residents of a black township near Windhoek resisted being forcibly driven out to the present-day Katutura. Namibians proudly celebrate this day, reinforcing their commitment to the moral principles on which their nation was founded.

Religious Holidays

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday is a sad, somber observance because it marks Jesus' Crucifixion. Devout Christians fast on Good Friday. They offer prayers from noon to 3:00 p.m. to commemorate Jesus' hours on the Cross. Some congregations also enact Jesus' carrying of the Cross, known as Stations of the Cross. In Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Anglican traditions, church services involve worship of the cross and retelling of the Passion narrative.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, the most important Christian observance, is celebrated to mark the Resurrection of Jesus on the third day after his death. Easter is celebrated on the first Sunday after the full Moon, which is seen on or following the vernal equinox on March 21. The date falls between March 22 and April 25.

In Namibia Catholics flock to church for the Easter Vigil. Churches are beautifully decorated for this special occasion. Hymns, accompanied by drums, are heard everywhere. After the Mass is over, the faithful perform traditional dances in the churchyard. They then return home for food and revelry. In some parishes celebrations continue into the night.

Easter is not only a religious festival in Africa. It also has a social aspect. It is an opportunity for families to gather and dine together. Non-Christians also join the celebrations and share the special meal of boiled or roasted rice with meat.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

The 40th day after Easter Sunday is celebrated as Ascension Day to commemorate the Ascension of Jesus into heaven. It is believed that, by ascending to heaven, Jesus completed the task of redeeming humankind.

In Namibia, Roman Catholics and Lutherans celebrate Ascension Day by attending church. This feast always falls on a Thursday. Ascension is one of the most solemn feasts of the Christian calendar, along with those of Easter and Pentecost. There are certain customs associated with this feast, which include the blessing of the new harvest and the first fruits, and torch-lit processions outside the churches. All of these celebrate Jesus' entry into heaven. The scene of the Ascension is also dramatically reenacted in some churches.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

The festival of Pentecost commemorates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the twelve Apostles 50 days after Jesus' Resurrection. (Pentecost means "fifty" in Greek.) Faithful Christians attend church services on this day.

Christmas marks the birth of Jesus. In Namibia this period is called the Festive Season. Since the country lies in the Southern Hemisphere, it is the peak of summer, and most business establishments close down to avoid the sweltering heat. People generally head for cooler destinations. In the rural north of Namibia, everyone walks for miles to reach the nearest church to attend Christmas service, which sometime starts at 3:00 a.m. It is a joyous time and Christmas is celebrated with great enthusiasm. It is also an ideal time for family gatherings and feasts.

WINDHOEK CARNIVAL

Observed in: Windhoek

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March–April

Namibia hosts as many as six carnival societies of which the Windhoek Carnival Society of 1952, commonly known as Wika, is the oldest. The Carnival was first celebrated in 1953 and has since then become one of the highlights of the local cultural calendar. The Windhoek Carnival is based on a carnival celebrated in Germany's Rhine Valley. However, over the years it has acquired a distinctly Namibian identity.

Stage programs consisting of art, dance, music, and political satire are held. There are events in English, too, for the non-German-speaking community. There are programs for children and youth as well. It is a joyous event in which people of all colors, races, and creeds participate.

Since the country's independence, the Carnival has been expressly promoted as a multicultural affair. Artists from foreign countries like South Africa, Germany, Canada, and the United States come and perform in the Windhoek Carnival. The festivities stretch over a period of two weeks beginning with the traditional Biwak. During this event the reigning royal couple, crowned the previous year, addresses the revelers as everyone enjoys the sunny day, live music, beer, and good food. The Royal Ball that follows is the high point of the event. The newly crowned royal couple leads a long procession of beautiful floats along Windhoek's Independence Avenue.

MAHERERO DAY

Observed in: Okahandja

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Last week of August

Maherero Day, also called Okahandja, is observed over the weekend nearest to August 26 to commemorate the slaying of two Herero tribal chiefs Kahimunua and Nikodemus by Germans in Gobabis. The two are buried at the Bantu Kirche, off Martin Nieb Street, Okahandja. On this day thousands of Hereros come to Okahandja to pay tribute to their heroes. The Hereros wear their traditional garb, adorned with bright motifs and participate in a grand procession to Okahandja. From the heroes' graves they move on to a site on the other side of the main road, where a great tribal banquet and celebration is held.

OKTOBERFEST

Observed in: Windhoek

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October

Oktoberfest, one of Germany's best known regional festivals, began with a Bavarian royal wedding in 1810. King Ludwig I (1786–1868) wanted the whole city of Munich to celebrate his marriage to Maria Teresa of Saxonia (1792–1854), so he proclaimed a state fair and dedicated it to the autumn harvest and to beer, Bavaria's most famous product. German tradesmen and merchants came from all over the country to participate in the revelry. They examined the crops, made merry, and tasted the first beer of the season. So successful was the festival that it prompted King Ludwig to issue a royal decree making the month of October a festive time in Munich.

In Namibia a former German colony, Oktoberfest, with its traditional beer drinking and sausage eating, is celebrated throughout the country in late October.

BIRTH

Namibians believe that the infant comes from heaven and is born into the community for the community's benefit. They believe that the child has a fixed purpose and that it has been sent to deliver a message to them. The family members and community elders feel it is their duty to initiate the child and make a birth chart to guide the child on its journey through life. The infant is also given a name that reflects its mission.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Circumcision of young boys when they attain puberty is a common practice in Namibia, especially among the Herero tribes. While most of the tribes are now letting go of this practice, the Hereros have vowed to retain their tradition. According to their beliefs if a boy is not circumcised he cannot be regarded as a man. They also feel that circumcision is hygienic. Most black males are initiated when they reach 15 or 16. After the circumcision, the boy is recognized as a man. Young initiates are often taken away from the community and kept in seclusion. During this period they are taught about what will be expected of them as adults, including their social responsibilities and the rules of society.

❁ MARRIAGE

Marriage in Namibia is more about the union of two families and societies than of two individuals. Thus the wedding rites are performed not only for the bride and groom, but also for the unity of the two families. The bride or groom's personal choice and looks are considered less important than the interests of the two families and the betterment of the larger community.

If the groom is already married, then the consent of his first wife, or wives, is mandatory. Polygamy in Africa is not encouraged unless a man is wealthy enough to support his wives comfortably. In earlier days polygamy was seen as a way of reducing infidelity. Taking a girlfriend in addition to having several wives was not accepted. Lobola, or a bride-price, is paid in many African societies.

Namibian women slather themselves with red ochre and butterfat mixed with herbs and resin on their wedding day. Upon arrival at her new husband's house, the bride is told her duties and given instructions on the expectations of her new family, who show their acceptance by anointing her arms, breasts, and belly with butterfat from the cows belonging to the groom or his father. This is a rural practice not common among urbanites.

❁ DEATH

The majority of death rituals are concerned with the transition of the soul and laying of the dead person to rest. These rituals sometimes stretch over a period of years. There is a lot of thought given to the selection of burial places. Some Namibian families bury their dead in private or community compounds, while others bury the body at a distance. Each community has its specific laws regarding burial of the dead, what they should wear, and what food they should be offered for their transition. Belief in life after death figures importantly in the funeral rites.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Nauru was first settled by Polynesian and Melanesian navigators. There is very little information available about the history of Nauru before Captain John Fearn (a whale hunter) arrived in 1798, during his voyage from New Zealand to China. He must have noticed a good number of dwellings on the island and on landing found the general conditions suitable because he named it Nauru (which means "pleasant island" in the local dialect). During the next three or four decades the island was frequented and used by other European whale hunters and pirates.

Nauru remained an independent society, ruled by a king (the most widely known being King Auweyida). However, the 12 tribes who originally inhabited the island were almost eradicated by the firearms and alcohol that European voyagers introduced. The population further declined due to wars and diseases, also introduced by the foreigners. Gradually the inhabitants of Nauru amassed so many guns that the Germans who had come there for commercial purposes were scared and sought protection from their government. Germany invaded Nauru in 1888. Subsequently Nauru was incorporated into the German Marshall Islands and remained part of that federation until 1914.

In 1899 a British prospecting company stumbled upon vast deposits of phosphate on Nauru. Mining began, and Australia's first action during World War I was to seize Nauru from Germany. After the war Nauru became a British-mandated territory under Australian administration, and the mining of phosphate continued unabated. In December 1940, heavy shelling by Germans destroyed several Australian and British vessels anchored offshore during a cyclone. The Japanese invaded Nauru in 1942 and shipped nearly half of the population (1,200 people) to Truk Island (now Chuuk) in Micronesia as forced labor.

Nauru Government

Nauru's governmental structure is based on its parliament, made up of 18 legislators elected every three years. The president is elected from the parliament's members, and he in turn appoints a cabinet made up of five or six people. The president functions as both Nauru's head of state and its head of government. While a loose multiparty system exists, the major parties are the Democratic Party and the Nauru Party (informal).

Because of several "no-confidence" votes between 1999 and 2003, two men, René Harris (b.

1948) and Bernard Dowiyogo (1946–2003), ended up alternating with each other as president. Dowiyogo died while in office following heart surgery on March 10, 2003, in Washington, D.C. Ludwig Scotty (b. 1948) was elected president on May 29, 2003, but in August 2003 another "no confidence" vote resulted in René Harris being reelected president. Scotty regained his seat in parliament in 2004. On October 1, 2004, Scotty declared a state of emergency and dissolved parliament after it failed to pass a national budget.

After World War II Nauru remained under Australian administration as a UN Trust Territory. The British Phosphate Commission offered to resettle Nauru's inhabitants on Curtis Island, off the Queensland coast of Australia, but the Nauruans rejected the offer.

By 1951 the Local Government Council was established, granting a small measure of self-determination to the natives. Nauru was granted full independence in 1968 and accorded special member status in the British Commonwealth. In 1970, Australia, New Zealand, and Britain handed over their former joint control of the phosphate operations to the Nauru Phosphate Corporation.

In 1989 Nauru lodged a claim against Australia demanding compensation for the depletion of mineral resources that occurred before independence. Australia and Nauru signed an out-of-court settlement in 1993 for Australian $66,000,000. New Zealand and Britain each agreed to contribute nominal sums.

Since independence the Nauru Phosphate Royalties Trust has invested some of the revenues from the sale of phosphate and has extensive investments in Australia, the state of Hawaii, and other countries as insurance for the day when the phosphate deposits in Nauru are exhausted. It also pays the natives holding land in mined areas half a penny for each ton of phosphate shipped; the annual amount shipped is generally between one half and two million tons.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Nauru, the world's smallest non-European country, is a coral atoll located in the Pacific, west of Kiribati and 26 miles south of the equator. It is surrounded by a reef that is exposed at low tide. A century of phosphate mining has eroded four-fifths of the land area and has left the central plateau, which rises to 213 feet, infertile and devoid of population. There are no rivers in Nauru. The island has a fertile coastal strip, anywhere from 492 to 984 feet wide, covered by coconut palms and pandanus trees.

There are also indigenous hardwood trees such as the tomano. Bananas, pineapples, frangipani, and vegetables grow near the Buada lagoon, and there is some secondary vegetation to be found near the coral pinnacles that dot the island's beaches. Native seabirds throng the area in large numbers. The climate is tropical with temperatures ranging between 76°F and 93°F, but the climate is kept temperate by sea breezes. Most of Nauru's land vertebrates are birds. The Reed warbler, also known as the Nauru canary, is native to the island. Rats, cats, and mice were brought by European ships.

❁ ECONOMY

The people of Nauru have traditionally subsisted on exports of phosphates, but the resource is now almost depleted. Few other resources exist. Most items are, of necessity, imported, mainly from Australia, its former owner and more recently, a major source of support. The rehabilitation of mined land and the replacement of income from phosphates are serious long-term problems facing the country. To cut costs the Pandanus tectorius is a small tree that grows up to a height of about 20 feet. It is supported by prop roots that firmly anchor the tree to the ground and has long leaves with sawlike edges.

Fun Fact

Frangipani

Frangipani, also known as plumeria or the lei flower, is a native of the warm tropical regions of the Pacific islands, the Caribbean, South America, and Mexico. The widely spaced, thick, succulent branches of this tree are round or pointed, and have long fleshy leaves in clusters near the tips of the branches. It has intensely fragrant, lovely, spiral-shaped, reddish blooms. The leaves tend to fall in early winter since they are deciduous and sensitive to cold.

government has launched a freeze on wages, a reduction of overstaffed public service departments, privatization of numerous government agencies, and the closure of some overseas consulates. Of late Nauru has encouraged the registration of offshore banks and corporations.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Nauru's citizens rank among the wealthiest in the world in terms of per capita income. Most people possess cars, refrigerators, and other gadgets. The diseases of affluence—diabetes, obesity, and cardiac ailments—are rampant here.

Fun Fact
Nauru is the only country in the world without an official capital city.

When the Germans annexed Nauru in 1888, they imposed a blanket ban on the local tribal styles of dancing. Since then many traditional cultural practices have passed into oblivion. The islanders' lives today revolve around the television programs broadcast from Australia and New Zealand. English and Nauruan, a unique Pacific language with recognizable elements of Melanesian, Polynesian, and Micronesian, are spoken. English is the language used for both official and commercial purposes.

❁ CUISINE

There is no indigenous local cuisine in Nauru. Some vegetables and tropical fruits do grow on the island. However, since the island is an environmental disaster area (due to decades of phosphate mining), there is little possibility for agriculture. Nauru is heavily dependent on imports for its food and water. A small chicken farm produces the poultry on the island. The rest of the meat and most vegetables are imported from Australia. Most of the restaurants serve standard Western and Southeast Asian foods. Junk food is common.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western (or Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. Since Nauru is located in the Southern Hemisphere, the weather is hot and sunny at this time of year. Because New Year's is a public holiday residents tend to spend the day with their loved ones at beaches or outdoors.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 31

This day commemorates the achievement of Nauru's independence in 1968 from the UN trusteeship administered by Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom. This is a public holiday marked on the island by civic ceremonies.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 17

This holiday commemorates the adoption of the new constitution of Nauru in 1968, a few months after the island country obtained its independence. This is a public holiday in Nauru, and all government and public institutions remain closed.

❁ ANGAM DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 26

This day commemorates the various times in the history of Nauru when the Nauruan population reached 1,500, the number thought to be the minimum necessary for survival. Nauru experienced its worst drop in population in 1920 due to an influenza epidemic. The total number of Nauruans decreased terrifyingly, reaching a level of only 1,068 people, and this raised fears about the survival of the community. The health situation was in a precarious state: In addition to the loss of people, those who had escaped death were seriously debilitated. After this catastrophe it took 12 years for the population to reach the level of 1,500 once again. It was not until October 26, 1932—when a baby girl named Eida ruwo was born—that the population of the island again reached 1,500. There was great jubilation, and the event was commemorated by declaring the day a public holiday. The day is called Angam Day (which means “homecoming”) because the baby girl brought with her a ray of hope for the survival of Nauruans. This is a public holiday.

Religious Holidays

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Holy Friday, Great Friday, or Mourning Friday, commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus and his suffering on the Cross. Hence it is a sad, somber occasion. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence). As in other Christian communities around the world, religious services are conducted on this day in Nauru. They are solemn services, and afterward the devout spend the day attending public readings of the Gospels, listening to the Psalms, and singing hymns from the scriptures.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday and Monday after Lent

Easter, also called Resurrection Day, is a Christian feast that celebrates belief in Jesus' Resurrection from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after the end of Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. This day is central to the Christian religious calendar because so many other observances are scheduled on the basis of the date on which Easter falls. On Easter Sunday (and Easter Monday), the Roman Catholics of Nauru attend a special Easter Mass, while other Christians attend prayer services.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. On Christmas Day in Nauru residents attend church services early in the morning. People wear new clothes and exchange gifts and greetings with each other. Homes are gaily decorated, and everyone prepares and partakes of special meals on this occasion.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Neolithic tools found in the Kathmandu Valley provide some evidence that sections of Nepal have been inhabited for tens of thousands of years. The shrines of Swayambhu and Changu Narayan, located on hilltops, suggest that people may have worshipped there as much as 200,000 years ago, while a primordial lake covered the valley floor.

The recorded history of the kingdom of Nepal, high in the Himalayas, may have begun with the reign of the Kiratis, who arrived in the seventh or eighth century B.C.E. from the east. It was around this period that Buddhism was introduced to the country. The Buddha (?563 B.C.E.–?483 B.C.E.; né Siddhartha Gautama), a prince from the Shakya clan, which ruled from Lumbini (a city in Nepal), was a native of Nepal. However, by 200 C.E. Buddhism had yielded to Hinduism, brought by the Licchavis, who entered Nepal from northern India and deposed the last Kirati king. A few stone inscriptions—the earliest, dated 464 C.E., can be seen at Changu Narayan—provide much of what is known about the Licchavis, but their historical accuracy is dubious. The Hindus also introduced the caste system, which still predominates, and ushered in the classical age of Nepalese art and architecture.

By 879 C.E. the Licchavis had been replaced by the Thakuri Dynasty. There followed a period of instability and invasion, known as the Dark Ages. However, the strategic location of the Kathmandu Valley ensured the kingdom's survival and growth. In 1200 Arideva, a Thakuri king, founded the Malla Dynasty; he is noted for ushering in a renaissance of Nepali culture that lasted from 1201 to 1768. King Jayasthiti Mall (1354–95) provided a centralized stable period, but his most lasting contribution to Nepal's social structure may have been to force his Buddhist subjects into a Hindu hierarchy of 64 castes, a rigid social stratification that remained in place until 1964. In spite of earthquakes, invasions, and feuds between the independent city-states of Kathmandu, Patan, and Bhaktapur, the dynasty flourished, reaching the pinnacle of its glory in the 15th century under King Yaksha Malla (1428–82).

The rulers of Gorkha, the easternmost region of the country, coveted the Mallas's prosperity. Under the leadership of Prithvi Narayan Shah (1769–75), the Gorkha launched a campaign to conquer the valley. In 1768, after 27 years of fighting, they won and shifted their capital to Kathmandu. From this new base the kingdom's power expanded, aided by a strong army, until progress was hampered by a brief war with Tibet in 1792. Around 1814 there was a dispute with the British over territorial issues. The British prevailed and compelled the Nepalese to sign the Sugauli Treaty of 1815, which established Nepal's present eastern and western boundaries. A British "resident" was also installed to look after political affairs in the country.

The Shah Dynasty continued in power throughout the first half of the 19th century, until the gruesome Kot Massacre of 1846. Taking advantage of the intrigue and assassinations that had plagued the ruling dynasty, Jung Bahadur (r. 1846–77) seized power, slaying hundreds of the politically important personalities while they assembled in the Kot courtyard. He assumed the prestigious title of rana, declared himself prime minister for life, and made the office hereditary. For the next century the ranas and their progeny enjoyed luxurious lives in Kathmandu's palaces, while the majority of the population lived in poverty.

The ranas' regime ended shortly after World War II. In 1948 the British withdrew from India and with them vanished the ranas' primary support. Around this time several rebellious movements, intent on reshaping the country's politics, began to emerge. When the sporadic fighting spilled into public places, the ranas reluctantly agreed to negotiations. King Tribhuvan (1906–55) was anointed ruler in 1951 and set up a government comprising the ranas and members of the newly formed Nepali Congress Party. In 1960 the Nepali Congress, under its leader B. P. Koirala (1914–82), headed the first popular government. His policies, however, were opposed by King Mahendra (1920–72), who dismissed Koirala, banned all political parties, and took over direct control of the government. During the period that followed and up until 1989, cronyism, corruption, and financial malpractices were rampant throughout Nepal. The Nepalese populace, fed up with years of hardship, coupled with a trade embargo imposed by India, revolted in what is known as the Jana Andolan or the "People's Movement." In the aftermath of this uprising, detention, torture, and violent clashes left hundreds of people dead. To curb the turbulence, King Birendra (1945–2001; the incumbent ruler who succeeded his father in 1972) dissolved his cabinet, legalized political parties, and invited the opposition to form an interim government.

The Licchavis

In the late fifth century a clan of rulers calling themselves Licchavis gained prominence in Nepal. The Licchavis were known in early Buddhist legends as a ruling family in India in Buddha's time. In all probability some members of the Licchavi family married members of a local royal family in the Kathmandu Valley. The Licchavis of Nepal were a strictly local dynasty based in the Kathmandu Valley and were responsible for the growth of the first truly Nepalese state.

The changeover to democracy proceeded in an orderly, albeit leisurely, manner. In the May 1991 elections, the Nepali Congress Party and the Communist Party of Nepal shared most of the votes. Girija Prasad Koirala (b. 1925) of the Nepali Congress assumed office as the first popularly elected prime minister in 30 years.

In July 1994 Koirala resigned after being defeated in a parliamentary vote sparked by differences within his party. Then followed a long phase of political instability and frequent breakdowns of the weak coalitions. In 1996 Maoist rebels began a guerrilla war aimed at abolishing the monarchy and establishing a people's republic. In January 1999 King Birendra dissolved the parliament. Elections took place in May 1999 under heavy security on account of Maoist unrest.

The fragile political scene in Nepal was shattered in June 2001 with the massacre of the entire royal family, including King Birendra, by his son (also the crown prince) Dipendra, who allegedly shot his family members to death while in a drunken state after a brawl; later Prince Dipendra fatally shot himself. Civil unrest erupted in Kathmandu, with a curfew imposed to quell violence and arson. In the absence of an heir, the brother of the late king, Prince Gyanendra (b. 1947), was crowned king. About a month later (July 2001) the Maoist rebels unleashed renewed violence across Nepal. Sher Bahadur Deuba (b. 1946) became the prime minister, leading the 11th government in 11 years. He succeeded Girija Prasad Koirala, who resigned over the violence. Later that month Deuba initiated a truce with the rebels. About four months later (November 2001) the Maoists attacked army and police posts, ending the so-called truce with violence and bloodshed, killing at least 45 people. King Gyanendra had to declare a state of emergency and branded the Maoists a "terrorist organization." In March 2004 Nepali troops killed 500 Maoist rebels in a prolonged 12-hour battle, which was probably the goriest incident since the revolt began in 1996. Citing the need to defeat the Maoist rebels, King Gyanendra assumed direct political power in early 2005.

Fun Fact

Nepal is the only Hindu kingdom in the world today.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Nepal may well possess the world's most imposing and breathtaking mountains. Though the country is only 54,363 square miles in area, 80 percent of its territory is occupied by the Himalayan peaks. Nepal has gradually emerged as a popular destination for travelers, who flock there in quest of mountaineering thrills and adventures as well as spiritual solace. Mt. Everest, the highest mountain peak in the world (29,035 feet), is located near Nepal's border with China and Tibet. The other world-famous peaks located in Nepal are Annapurna (26,545 feet) and Dhaulagiri (26,820 feet). There are three categories of rivers in Nepal: The first category includes the Koshi, Gandaki, and Karnali Rivers, which originate from glaciers and snow-fed lakes. The rivers that originate from the Mahabharata mountain range comprise the second category; these include the Mechi, Mahakali, Bagmati, Kamala, and Rapti. The third and final category of river includes those that have their sources in the Chure Mountains. They flow during the monsoon and remain dry during the remainder of the year.

The land of Nepal can be broadly divided into three geographical regions, each stretching from east to west across the country. The southernmost strip of land, the Terai, is bordered in the north by the foothills of the Himalayas and stretches in the south to the Gangetic Plain of India. The Terai is famous as the breadbasket of Nepal. The central section of Nepal is formed by the Mahabharata Mountains, with peaks 6,500 to 9,800 feet high. Terraced farming is an important activity in the area, yielding rice, corn, and wheat. The Kathmandu Valley, located in the middle of the Mahabharata range, is the site of Nepal's capital and other historic cities. The Great Himalayas (higher than about 14,100 feet) form the northern part of the country.

The climate varies considerably with the altitude of a particular place. The monsoon season is between May and October, when heavy rains lash the Terai region and there is snowfall on the high mountain peaks. The mid-October to mid-December period is the ideal time for mountaineering, while the months of March and April are suitable for trekking. At Pokhara the temperature ranges from 39°F in January to about 100°F at the peak of summer, just before the onset of monsoon. In winter temperatures during the day rise to around 70°F, providing warm days and cool nights.

On the lower slopes of the mountains, pines flourish amid oaks and wildflowers. Firs and shrubs thrive in the higher regions, most notable among them being the rhododendron, Nepal's national flower, which blooms from March to April. Smaller plants, such as mosses and grasses, grow at elevations above 12,140 feet; above the snow line of the Great Himalayas there is no vegetation.

The Terai region of Nepal abounds in wildlife: tigers, leopards, deer, and elephants. The Royal Chitwan National Park, located in the Terai, is a haven for several endangered species such as the rhinoceros, tiger, sloth bear, gaur (a large, dark-coated wild ox), and Ganges River dolphin. Wild goats, sheep, and wolves are found at higher elevations.

❁ ECONOMY

The primary occupation in Nepal is agriculture, which contributes about 40 percent of the country's gross domestic product (GDP). In the Terai region the farmers grow rice, pulses, wheat, barley, and oilseeds. Other important crops include tobacco, cotton, indigo, and opium. The forests of the Terai provide sal wood as well as bamboo and rattan, which are used for making furniture. Medicinal herbs are grown on the Himalayan slopes and sold in markets worldwide. Animal husbandry is the second largest occupation in Nepal. Cattle, yaks, sheep, goats, and poultry are found in abundance. Substantial quantities of mica and small deposits of ochre, copper, iron, lignite, and cobalt are found in the hills of Nepal. Hydroelectric power is the main source of electricity in the country; plans are in the works to further harness the country's rivers. Tourism is the major source of foreign exchange for Nepal and makes a large contribution to the country's economy.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The capital and main city of Kathmandu is fairly congested and consists of crooked streets and by-lanes bordered on both sides by irregular, multi-roofed pagodas, a multitude of stone sculptures, and stupas (dome-shaped monuments used to house Buddhist relics or to commemorate significant facts of Buddhism). The shops and stores in the bazaars are full of grotesque well-chiseled masks, colorful thangkas (wall hangings with Buddhist motifs), and Tibetan carpets. The air is heavy with the echoes of chants and hymns; also audible are strains of folk music played on the saringhi (a stringed instrument) or flute. There are a lot of restaurants and food stalls located in cities and towns that cater to the many tourists, offering all kinds of international cuisines and snacks. Traditional folk musicians (gaines), gather in the evenings for singing and socializing; classical dancing and masked dances enthrall both visitors and residents of Kathmandu Valley and the Bhaktapur regions; while the slightly hoarse music made by the damais (tailor community, which also makes music during social ceremonies) is a regular feature of Nepali weddings.

The Hindu Bikram Era calendar is Nepal's official calendar. This solar calendar was started by King Bikramditya.

❁ CUISINE

Nepali meals center on rice, wheat, corn, and lentils combined with fresh vegetables and meats. A typical Nepali meal includes dal (lentil soup), bhat (steamed plain rice), and tarkari (curried vegetable or meat preparation). Typical dishes include bhutuwas (stir-fried meat or vegetables), sekuwas (grilled meat or vegetables), chewayalas (grilled meat marinated in mustard oil), rotis (unleavened bread), momos (stuffed dumplings), thukpas and chow-chows (Himalayan stewed and stir-fried noodles), and sukutis (crispy and spicy meat slices).

Public/Legal Holidays

SAHID DIVAS

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February

Sahid Divas, Martyr's Day, is a solemn occasion when the people of Nepal pay homage to their former ruler King Tribhuvan (1906–55) and to the numerous martyrs (both known and unknown) who died for their country. King Tribhuvan, with the support of the military, finally ended the rana's despotic rule in Nepal and initiated the beginnings of democratic government in Nepal. On the Nepalese calendar, it occurs on the 16th day of Magha, the 11th month.

PRAJATANTRA DIVAS

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: February

This day is officially observed in Nepal as Rastriya Prajatantra Divas, or National Democracy Day. It commemorates the People's Revolution, which took place in 1950–51. This day is also observed as King Tribhuvan's official birthday. It was on this day that King Tribhuvan, considered the father of Nepal, brought about epoch-making changes in Nepal's political landscape by putting an end to the rana regime. The day is marked by processions and public speeches. The seventh day of Phalgun, the 12th month of the Nepalese calendar, is the local date for this observance.

HIS MAJESTY KING GYANENDRA BIR BIKRAM SHAH DEV'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July

Nepal is the only Hindu kingdom in the world today. For the loyal Nepalese their king is second only to God and, therefore, held in high esteem. In Nepal the citizens celebrate the birthday of the reigning monarch (presently King Gyanendra) and pray for the long life and good health of their ruler.

The Nepalese follow their own calendar, which is quite similar to the Hindu calendar. The official date for this holiday currently is the 23rd of Ashadh, the third month of the Nepalese calendar. However, the date changes, depending on the actual date of the current king's birth. Since it is a public holiday, all educational institutions and government and commercial organizations are closed.

Observed on: November

This day has great significance in the political history of Nepal. The new democratic constitution became the law of the kingdom on this day in 1990. Since then the Nepalese have celebrated Constitution Day with processions, parades, and speeches by public figures. This is a public holiday in Nepal, with schools, government offices, and commercial establishments closed. On the Nepalese calendar, it falls on the 23rd day of the eighth month of the year, Kartik.

MAHA SHIVRATRI

Observed by: Hindus
Observed on: March

Lord Shiva is the third deity of the Hindu Trinity (Brahma the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Shiva the destroyer). Hindus believe that Maha Shivrati is the day Shiva performed the Tandav, his heavenly dance of the cycle of creation, preservation, and destruction. Shiva is one of the most popular gods in Nepal. Nepalese celebrate this holiday on the 13th or 14th day of the waning half of Falgun, the 11th month of the Nepalese calendar. The day before the Night of Shiva, his followers eat only once, and share stories about him. On the night of Maha Shivaratri, the Nepali Hindus, along with their counterparts across the Indian subcontinent, worship the deity. Devotees from across the country flock to the Pashupatinath Temple (near Kathmandu) to worship Shiva, also known as Pashupatinath (lord of all animals and living creatures), and to bathe in the Bagmati River. A number of mendicants or ascetics, dressed up as Lord Shiva—with matted hair, ash rubbed all over their bodies, and clad only in loincloths made out of tiger skins—wander through the streets of cities and towns, where the devout pay obeisance to them. Bonfires are lit and people gather with their neighbors, friends, and relatives for celebratory feasts. Devotional songs, dance, and music continue throughout the night.

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: March

Originally a spring festival, Holi (also Falgu Purnima, the Festival of Colors), named for Holika, is one of the most colorful and exuberant Hindu festivals. Holika was the evil sister of an arrogant king who tried to kill his good son Prince Prahlada numerous times because he was jealous of Prahlada's reverence for the Lord Vishnu. Holika—who believed she was immune to fire—held the boy on her lap in the middle of a huge bonfire. Prince Prahlada, however, came out of the fire unscathed, while his aunt burned to death.

Nepalese celebrate Holi on the 23rd of Falgun, the 11th month of the Nepalese Hindu calendar. In Nepal this weeklong holiday is called Rung Kelna, or “playing with color.” The night before Holi begins, on the night of the full Moon, festival-goers light huge bonfires to burn images of Holika to cleanse the city of evil spirits and to symbolize Holika's death.

On the first day of the festival the chit pole (a greased pole decorated with colorful flags) is erected at Durbar Square in Kathmandu to mark the beginning of the festival. People wear old clothes because old and young alike throw water balloons and colored powder at each other throughout the day.

A variation of this is the building of a three-tiered umbrella 25 feet high. At its base people light sticks of incense and leave flowers and red powder. They toss water-filled balloons out of upper windows instead of squirting each other, a method of getting someone else wet without exposing oneself to the same treatment.

On the last day of the festival, certainly the wildest one, young men cover themselves with red powder, making themselves willing targets as they roam the streets of the city. They do this, it is said, because one day Hanuman, the monkey god, swallowed the Sun, leaving the people in utter darkness. The other gods, pitying the miserable people, suggested they rub color on each other and laugh. When they mixed the color in water and squirted it on each other, Hanuman laughed loudly, thereby spitting out the Sun. Yet another tale is that the Mongol Emperor Akbar thought that everyone would be equals if they were all the same color and ordained the holiday to do away with castes.

❁ RAM NAVAMI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: April

This Hindu festival marks the birth of Lord Rama (the seventh of the 10 incarnations of Vishnu). On this day Vishnu's devotees fast, recite stories from the Ramayana, the epic poem of which Rama is the hero, and fill the temples dedicated to him to pray for release from the cycle of birth and death. This festival is celebrated with great enthusiasm at Janakpur (in southern Nepal), which is believed to be the birthplace of Lord Rama's consort Sita.

❁ NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: April

The Hindu Bikram Era calendar is Nepal's official calendar. This solar calendar was started by King Bikramditya. The year 2060 of the Bikram Era corresponds to 2003–04 of the Western calendar. This official holiday in Nepal begins on the first day of the first month of the Hindu calendar, Baisakh (April 14). Hindu faithful visit the Pashupati Temple to bathe in the holy waters of the Bagmati River, which flows nearby. Pilgrims also visit other religious spots and spend the day picnicking. On this day the young are particularly respectful of the elders in their families and society, seeking their blessings and good wishes for the coming year. It is a day to seek blessings from family priest and one's elders as well.

❁ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: May

Prince Siddhartha, who later became the Buddha, was born in Nepal. Buddhism, the religion founded by him, is the second most popular faith in the kingdom. Vesak, which is also called Buddha Jayanti, or Buddha Purnima, commemorates the three major events in the life of the Buddha—his birth, enlightenment, and death. It is observed on the full Moon day in Jestha, the second month of the Nepalese calendar. In preparation for the festivities the monasteries, stupas, and shrines are cleaned; the images and statues are polished, and the neighborhoods are decorated with prayer flags, which flutter gaily in the breeze. On this day the people awake very early, visit sacred shrines to make offerings, and pray before the images of the Buddha and his various incarnations.

❁ JANMASHTAMI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: August

This Hindu festival, which Nepalese call Shree Krishna Janmashtami or Krishnaashtami, celebrates the birth of Lord Krishna (the frivolous cowherd king), one of the 10 incarnations of Lord Vishnu. It is celebrated on the second of Bhadra, the fifth month of the Nepalese calendar. On this day impressive, highly elaborate prayer ceremonies and rituals take place at the Krishna Temples in Patan and Changu Narayan, to which zealous devotees flock in large numbers.

❁ DASHAIN

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: October

Also called Durga Puja, this celebration comprises 10 days of festivities centered around Durga (the Mother Goddess, or vital creative force). Nepalese celebrate it on the tenth to 20th of Asoj, the sixth month of their calendar. It is by far the longest and the most important Hindu festival celebrated in Nepal, and it is Nepal's most thrilling and memorable festival as well. The Nepalese worship Durga in her various manifestations because of her victory over Mahishasura (an evil, demon king who had assumed the form of a buffalo). The devout offer animal sacrifices, usually buffalos, ducks, and goats, to appease the mother goddess.

Before puja (Sanskrit for “worship”) begins, artists build figures made of straw and bamboo covered with clay, many of them representations of Durga riding a lion. Some of the figures are 10 feet high. After people have been able to view the statues for four days, they are carried on bamboo stretchers, accompanied by the music of bagpipers and other musicians, to the Hooghly River and thrown in. Once in the river, the figures lose their form and dissolve once more into straw, bamboo, and clay.

People wear new clothes and fly kites during this 10-day festival. On Dashami (the 10th day), young people wear new clothes to pay their respects to elders and senior members of their families. As a token of blessing and good wishes, the elders mark the youngsters' foreheads with large red tika (a long mark made with vermilion paste). During the next few days, families and friends enjoy lavish feasts and exchange greetings and gifts. Meat, a luxury for poor and lower-middle-class people, is a big part of Dashain feasts. Often animals are bought live from markets and sacrificed at home or in temples, after which the whole family helps to cut up and prepare the meat.

❁ DIWALI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: November

Diwali, or the Festival of Lights is known as Tihar (also Panchak Yama, or “the five days of the underworld lord”) in Nepal. It is among the most dazzling festivals of the Hindus. It is a five-day festival (observed on the tenth to 15th day of Kartik, the seventh month of the Nepalese calendar) focused on life and prosperity, replete with candlelight illuminations, tinsel decorations, and consumption of sweetmeats and other delicacies. Each day of the festival a different animal is honored, beginning with the worship of crows (Kag tihar, “crows' day”)—messengers from Yama, the god of death—on the first day, and dogs on the second (Kukur tihar, “dogs day”). Early on the third day cows, sacred to Lakshmi and Nepal's national animal, are worshipped. That night, Lakshmi (Hindu goddess of good fortune, wealth, and beauty) will visit every home, so floral garlands are hung and oil lamps lit around every home to welcome her in hopes of enjoying prosperity and affluence during the coming year.

The fourth day most Nepalese worship oxen and bullocks (Guru puja), but others devote the day to Goverdhan puja (worship of Lord Krishna and his herd of cows). Those who live in the Newar community perform Mha puja, worshipping themselves, and their New Year begins. (Many Nepalese communities have their own calendars; Newar is one of them.)

On the fifth and last day of Diwali, the women observe Bhai tika: Sisters make offerings to their brothers and pray for their long life, good health, and happiness. In order to protect their brothers from Yama, sisters break walnuts, place floral garlands around the necks of their brothers, and encircle them with rings of mustard oil. When the brothers and sisters meet, each puts a red dot of sandalwood paste, called tika (symbols of good luck), on the other's forehead, and this ritual is performed throughout Nepal at exactly the same time.

MANI RIMDU

Observed in: Chiwong
Observed by: Sherpas
Observed on: November

Mani Rimdu (or Mani Rimdu) is a noisy, colorful festival celebrated among Sherpas (a Nepalese community regarded as expert mountaineers) during the fall season at the Tengboche and Chiwong monasteries in the vicinity of Mt. Everest. It occurs on the full Moon of Kartik, the seventh month of the Nepalese calendar or the full Moon of Mangsir, the eighth month. For five days, the lamas (Buddhist monks) and Sherpas, many of whom walk for many days to participate, gather for “the good of the world.” The festival features plays, masked dances, prayers, and feasting. The demons are symbolically quelled, and the pious rewarded. The days are full of colors, fanfare, and many activities. Around this time trips to the Everest peak are launched; these generally attract large crowds.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

Nepalese society is traditional, orthodox Hindu, and male-dominated. Therefore the birth of a male child is welcomed with great happiness and enthusiasm. Like the Hindus in India, the Nepalese celebrate Annaprashan (initiation of solid food) of each infant before he or she cuts the first tooth. This implies that the ceremony must take place when the teeth begin to emerge. After this ceremony the infant is allowed to eat solid food regularly apart from breast-feeding. On this occasion relatives come together, and a prayer ceremony is held, followed by a lavish feast.

COMING OF AGE

In the villages of Nepal when a girl begins to menstruate, she has to spend the entire period alone in the stables. She is not allowed to enter the house, and, although she may be permitted to work in the fields, she cannot fetch water or do any cooking. After she has stopped menstruating, she thoroughly washes her body and hair, as well as her clothes, bedclothes, and the utensils used during this period in the nearby stream. Then the floor of the house is plastered with a solution of mud and cow dung (the Hindus consider all products and derivatives of the cow as sacred). The young woman is also supposed to purify herself by drinking a few drops of cow’s urine and to sanctify the house by sprinkling some of the cow’s urine around it.

MARRIAGE

In traditional Nepalese society, marriages are usually arranged by the parents of the bride and the groom. Both families consult astrologers to determine an auspicious day for the wedding and other ancillary rites and rituals. The Nepalese generally marry quite young. The actual marriage is preceded by the betrothal ceremony. The wedding rituals usually take place at the bride’s home. The bride wears a rich, resplendent sari, red in color because red is considered auspicious by all Hindus. The bridegroom generally dons a loose pajamalike suit with a very short kurta (tunic or shirt) and a waistcoat. Bridegrooms also wear the typical Nepali cap.

The groom arrives at the wedding venue in a procession along with his family and friends, where the bride’s family members and relatives receive him. The priest (a Brahmin) conducts the ritual under a canopy, specially made and decorated for the ceremony. The priest invokes the blessings of God for the couple. The bride accepts her change of status from an unmarried woman to a wife by spreading

The Sherpas

The Sherpas are a Tibetan ethnic group that arrived in Nepal about 450 years ago from the eastern province of Tibet, called Kham. The name Sherpa, which they pronounce sher-wah, comes from a central Tibetan word sharba, meaning “easterner.” No one knows why they left Kham and traveled 1,250 miles to settle in Nepal. They now live in the high mountain region of the Himalayas and continue to live in a traditional manner, growing most of their food and herding yaks. About 3,000 of Nepal’s 10,000 Sherpas live in the Khumbu Valley, famous to mountaineers because it provides access to the southern side of Mt. Everest.

Although some Sherpa villages have modern conveniences such as telephone service and energy for lighting and cooking, Sherpas continue to live much as their ancestors did. Potatoes, introduced in the 1800s from British gardens in Kathmandu and Darjeeling (in India), provide a staple of the simple Sherpa diet because they grow well at altitudes up to 14,000 feet. Although only 1 percent of Khumbu can be farmed, other areas of the valley are good pastureland, allowing the Sherpas to herd yaks, which provide wool for clothing, leather for sturdy shoes, dung for fuel and fertilizer, in addition to food staples such as milk, butter, and cheese.

The Sherpas are Buddhists, of the Nyingmapa sect, the most common and oldest sect of Tibetan Buddhism.

turmeric powder on her hands. Kanya Dan (kanya means “young girl” and dan means “to give in charity”) is performed by the father (or an uncle or a male guardian) of the bride in the presence of all guests, friends, and relatives.

The couple exchange floral garlands as a symbol of mutual acceptance. Then the bride and the groom make offerings of puffed rice and clarified butter (ghee) to Agni, the Hindu god of fire, who is supposed to be the prime witness to bless and sanctify the marriage. The groom holds the hand of his bride, and together they walk seven times around the sacred fire, while the mantras (hymns) are being chanted. During the rounds, the couple utters the sacred vows of loyalty, devotion, fidelity, responsibility, and honesty, among others. Toward the end of the ceremony the groom smears the bride’s forehead and the part in her hair with sindoor (vermilion), signifying his acceptance and authority over her. At the conclusion of the ceremonies and the wedding feast, the bride departs from her parental home to take up residence in her husband’s house along with his extended family.

A Hindu married woman in Nepal must wear bangles on her wrists, a bindi (circular dot) on her forehead, and sindoor in the part of her hair. Widowhood is regarded as a curse, and widows are generally ostracized from social and religious functions. In the Sherpa community of Nepal polyandry (having more than one husband at one time) is commonplace; however polygyny is nonexistent. Divorce is uncommon in Nepal. The various ethnic groups inhabiting Nepal are clan-based; hence marriages are generally exogamous; that is, the groom and the bride are not even remotely linked by blood.

❁ DEATH

In Nepal, as in other Hindu communities around the world, people cremate their dead. The oldest son of the deceased (and in his absence any other male relative) performs the funeral rites. A wake or vigil is generally not held; after the friends, relatives, and acquaintances have taken a last look at the body and paid their homage, the body (draped in a shroud and profusely decorated with flowers, incense, votives, and other symbolic ornaments) is carried on a makeshift cot or bamboo structure to the cremation ground by the pallbearers, typically the sons and close male relatives of the deceased. Women generally do not accompany the body to the cremation ground. After the body is laid on a pile of firewood, the eldest son lights the pyre with a flaming torch. Because it is the son’s duty to liberate his father’s soul by shattering all ties and bonds to this world, it is customary for him to smash an earthen pot filled with water (which is brought from the deceased’s home). The pot filled with water symbolizes the world and earthly attachments.

After the cremation is over, the family members return home to observe an 11-day mourning period during which they are prohibited from eating salt, certain vegetables, and nonvegetarian food of any kind. It is customary for the family members to wear only white clothes and abstain from using objects made of leather, such as shoes, handbags, belts, and wristwatch bands.

On the 10th day, Hindu priests visit the home to perform an elaborate ceremony in which numerous Hindu deities are invoked and worshipped on behalf of the deceased. An array of special dishes is prepared and offered to the departed soul so that it may be appeased. On the 11th day, the priests perform the rite of absolution, thereby freeing everyone from the austerities and restrictions of mourning. Thereafter the family members are free to return to their normal lives.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Archaeological research to date indicates that the prehistory of the Netherlands began at least 8,000 years ago with the Bog People, so-called because their bodies (or parts thereof) have been found in bogs in Denmark, the Low Countries, and England and Ireland. Over the centuries hundreds of such bodies have been dug out of the peat in these countries, most of the remains indicating some sort of violence connected with their deaths. The oldest skeletal part found in the Netherlands is the skull of a woman estimated to be about 8,000 years old, around 6000 B.C.E.

Numerous dolmens have also been found in the Netherlands; 54, 52 of them have been identified in the province of Drenthe. (A dolmen, called hunebedden in Dutch, consists of two or more upright stones supporting horizontal stone slabs.) Around 4000, Neolithic (New Stone Age) peoples settled in what is now the Netherlands. They were early farmers, but around 3450 they began to build dolmens to mark their burial sites, using huge boulders left behind by the last glacial period. (There are no “native” rocks in the Netherlands as large as these; many of them weigh several tons.) Most of them are actually passage graves (true dolmens have no entryways), burial sites with an opening that allowed entry, associated with the European Funnel Beaker culture (5300–2000).

For much of its historic period, the Netherlands was associated with Belgium and Luxembourg. Collectively these three countries were known as the Low Countries, because so much of the territory is at or below sea level, making it vulnerable to flooding. It was not until the 16th century that the Netherlands defined its boundaries.

In the 16th century, Philip II (1527–98) of Spain tried to annex the Netherlands. The Protestants of the northern region united to fight the Spanish, and this led to the Eighty Years' War, which began in 1568. Eventually in 1648, the Spaniards were expelled, and the Netherlands became an independent nation.

After its independence, the Netherlands' economy went through a major revival. The country prospered, and the Dutch East India Company was formed in 1602. Ships were sent to the Far East for trade, and the Cape of Good Hope, Indonesia, Suriname, Antilles, and New Amsterdam (modern-day New York) were colonized. Toward the close of the 17th century, the Netherlands was one of the major colonial powers of Europe. The colonies were administered by the Dutch East India Company and later by the Dutch West India Company. Finally in the 19th century, the Dutch government took over control directly, and the colonies were officially annexed.

The Netherlands stayed neutral during World War I, but in World War II Germany invaded the country and, although the Dutch resisted them, the Germans claimed the lives of over 100,000 Dutch Jews.

After the war the economy made a quick revival, and the country prospered again. The Netherlands joined NATO in 1949, and in 1958, the European Economic Community (EEC), which evolved into the European Union (EU).

In 1949 the Netherlands granted independence to the Dutch East Indies, which became the Republic of Indonesia. Suriname attained its independence in 1975. The Antilles, off the coast of Venezuela, are still a colony but are largely self-ruled.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in western Europe, the Netherlands is flanked by the North Sea, Belgium, and Germany and is located at the mouth of three major European rivers—the Rhine, the Meuse (also known as Maas), and the Schelde. The Netherlands is still considered one of the Low Countries. Scattered hills are found only in the southernmost parts of the region and the highest point of the country is Vaalserberg. It stands 1,053 feet tall and is located in the southeastern part of the country. The vast majority of the terrain is flat, and almost 50 percent of the nation's surface is a little over three feet above sea level, while the other half is below sea level.

In the 17th century the famous Dutch windmills were developed to drain the water from the lowlands; in addition they were used to grind corn and saw lumber. These windmills, though not much in use now, are the most visible element of the Netherlands and are symbolic of the ingenuity of the Dutch.

Nowadays, a large number of water pumps in the pumping stations placed throughout the country monitor the level of the groundwater. Also, a series of dunes and dikes (a long wall that protects the land from the sea water) protect the country from flooding. In 1916 Flevoland (a province of the Netherlands) was severely affected by a flood. However, by constructing dams, and with the help of the pumping stations, the region was reclaimed from the sea along with other parts of the country. These areas are known as polders, which are low-lying areas of land that form an artificial water body. Dikes surround them, and the water is drained with the help of water pumps, thus maintaining the level of the water table.

The Netherlands enjoys a temperate, maritime climate characterized by mild winters and relatively

Low Countries

The name Low Countries generally refers to the region of de Nederlanden (region under Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V [1500–58]). This includes the countries located in the low-lying delta region at the mouth of the rivers Rhine, Meuse, and Scheldt: the Netherlands, Luxembourg, and Belgium. These countries were not centers of trade in ancient times but were developed as trading centers during the 12th century.

cool summers. The average temperature in the coastal regions varies from 34°F to 41°F in winter and 57°F to 70°F in summer; in more populated regions, the average temperature varies from 34°F to 39°F in winter and 55°F to 72°F in summer.

The Netherlands is home to trees such as oak, pine, beech, and ash, as well as tulips (famous all over the world), while the fauna includes rabbits, deer, and migratory birds.

❁ ECONOMY

The Netherlands has a strong, prosperous, and open economy. It is home to global leaders like Philips (electrical machinery), Unilever (food-processing industry), Shell (petroleum refining), and Dutch State Mines (chemicals).

Around 73 percent of the Dutch labor force is employed in the service sector, and even though the agricultural sector employs only 4 percent of the labor force, it generates large surpluses for export as well as for the food-processing industry. In terms of the value of agricultural exports, the Netherlands ranks third in the world (behind the United States and France). Major export items include cheese,

Delta Project

In order to end the threat of flooding from the ocean, the government of the Netherlands started the Delta project in 1958. The project involved the construction of 6,214 miles of inner dikes, and 1,864 miles of outer, canal, and river dikes. These were elevated to the height of the delta, thus closing the estuaries along the Zeeland province in the Netherlands.

As a result of the construction, the risk of flooding in the Netherlands was reduced to once in 10,000 years. This project has been touted by the American Society of Civil Engineers as one of the seven wonders of the modern world since it is considered to be the largest construction effort undertaken in human history. By 2002 a major part of the construction work was complete.

Fun Fact

The Netherlands is often called Holland, but that name actually applies to only two of the country's provinces, North and South Holland.

potatoes, sugar beets, beer, fruits, vegetables, and grains as well as commodities such as chemicals, fuels, machinery, and equipment.

Amsterdam has been a center for the diamond industry for over 400 years. The industry expanded when diamonds were found in South Africa in 1867, and the largest diamond monopoly, located in the Netherlands, has recently bought into the diamond mines just opened in Canada's Northern Territories, where kimberlite tubes (where diamonds are created) have been found.

The Netherlands is a member of the European Union (EU) and on January 1, 1999, it adopted the Euro (common currency of many member nations of the European Union) as its national currency.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Netherlands has an open and liberal society where people of different religions and beliefs coexist in peace and harmony. Both the Baptist and Congregationalist churches were founded in the Netherlands. The Dutch are the dominant ethnic group in the Netherlands, but the country is also home to other ethnic groups such as Antilleans (an ethnic group from the islands in the Caribbean), Surinamese (an ethnic group of the Republic of Suriname in South America), Turks, Moroccans, and Indonesians.

Around 52 percent of the Dutch are Christians while 8 percent follow Islam or other faiths. However, 40 percent of the population does not follow any religious faith.

Dutch and Frisian (a Germanic language spoken along the North Sea) are the official languages of the Netherlands. The Netherlands does not have a national dress, but it has a wide variety of traditional costumes that vary from region to region. Wooden shoes are an integral part of the traditional attire and are popular among farmers as working shoes. In ancient times leather shoes were expensive and were worn by the elite. The common people wore wooden shoes because they were more affordable and durable. People who live in the countryside still wear clogs since they find them more comfortable in the warm weather than rubber boots.

The Dutch enjoy a wide variety of music ranging from traditional Frisian folk songs, Interpol (pop music of the Netherlands), Indo-rock (music by Indonesian immigrants), rap, punk, and jazz.

Many famous artists were Dutch including Rembrandt van Rijn, Jan Steen, Vincent Van Gogh, and M. C. Escher; the Netherlands has also produced philosophers like Erasmus and Spinoza as well as the famous astronomer and mathematician Christian Huygens, the inventor of an accurate clock and discoverer of Titan, Saturn's largest Moon. The Diary of Anne Frank (1947) was also written in the Netherlands.

In 2001 the Dutch government approved same-sex marriage and legalized euthanasia, reaffirming the Netherlands' liberal and progressive approach to social issues.

CUISINE

Dairy products form an integral part of traditional Dutch cuisine.

A typical Dutch meal consists of potatoes, meat, boiled vegetables, and a wide variety of dairy products, including cheese, buttermilk, and vela (thick milk pudding).

Patat (potato chips) is the national fast food of the Netherlands and is generally served with mayonnaise. Some traditional Dutch delicacies include stamppot (mashed potatoes with varied vegetables), snert (pea soup), watergruwel (berry soup), bacon, rookworst (roasted sausage), karnemelk (buttermilk), advocaat (Dutch eggnog), kroket (meat croquette), vlaai (sweet pies), and pannekon (pancakes).

Beer is the traditional drink and is extremely popular.

The Diary of Anne Frank

During World War II a German Jewish girl, Annelies Marie Frank (Anne Frank; 1929–45), wrote a diary while she was hiding with her family (from the Nazi forces) in Amsterdam. Her family had moved to the Netherlands when the Nazis took over Germany and began killing Jews. However, after German forces occupied that country, they had to go into hiding for two years, during which Anne wrote about her experiences in a small diary presented to her on her 13th birthday.

The book provides an in-depth view of the life of a teenager during Nazi occupation. Events related to her life from June 12, 1942, until August 1, 1944, are well-documented in the diary. After two years, Nazi forces discovered the family's hideout, and they were sent to concentration camps. Anne died of typhus in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. She was only 15. However, her father Otto survived the camp, and on his return to Amsterdam after World War II, he discovered Anne's diary and got it published.

It is one of the most widely read books in the world and has inspired operas and theatrical productions.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Gregorian (or Western) calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day in many countries. Celebrations usually begin on New Year's Eve (December 31). In the Netherlands people attend special parties on New Year's Eve and dance and sing their way into the New Year. However, many Dutch stay home and celebrate the occasion with friends and family members. As the clock strikes midnight, they raise a toast to the new year and greet each other. Then they go out into their backyards and light up the night sky with fireworks. After exchanging greetings with their neighbors, they either visit pubs or attend parties and dance until the early hours of New Year's Day. Wine and beer are an integral part of Dutch New Year celebrations.

Koninginnedag, or the Queen's Day, commemorates the birth of the present queen of the Netherlands Beatrix (b. 1938), as well as her ascension to the throne on April 30, 1980. Actually Beatrix's birth date is January 31; April 30 was the birthday of her mother the late Queen Juliana, Queen Mother of the Netherlands (1909–2004). However, when her mother abdicated, permitting Beatrix to ascend the throne on April 30, 1980, Queen Beatrix decided to celebrate Queen's Day on April 30 as a mark of respect for her mother. Also, this permitted outdoor celebrations that her real birthday, falling in January, could not.

Celebrations begin on the night before Queen's Day. Many people paint the national flag on their faces, wear clothes in the national color (orange), and walk through the streets of Amsterdam drinking beer and having a good time.

The next day fairs and open-air markets are part of the Queen's Day celebrations. These celebrations are held throughout the country. In addition Amsterdam plays host to an elaborate celebration, complete with fairs, flea markets, and musical bands that play Dutch music and songs especially written for the queen.

Also, Queen Beatrix visits at least two Dutch towns every year on her birthday. The selected towns and villages celebrate the visit of the queen with great joy and enthusiasm. The streets are decorated with ribbons and flowers as well as huge portraits of the queen, and the monarch is welcomed to the town amid great fanfare. While she visits the village in her special carriage, people dress themselves in their best attire and try to catch a glimpse of their queen.

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during the last meal Jesus ate with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter. The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, “command,” because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, Paas in Dutch, is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. For this reason it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin.

The Dutch celebrate Easter Sunday (Paas Zondag) and Easter Monday, which falls on the first Monday after Lent. On Easter devout Dutch Catholics attend Mass in their local churches and greet each other. A beautiful Easter wreath hangs on every door, and homes are decorated with spring flowers. In the rural areas, almost every village celebrates Easter by lighting an Easter bonfire on a hill or a high point. Each village tries to outdo the others with as big a bonfire as possible, and people start collecting wood for this well in advance.

On Easter families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

Easter eggs also play a part in Easter celebrations. Parents generally hide beautifully decorated Easter eggs all over the courtyards of their homes. On Easter children go egg-hunting and collect the eggs, which they believe have been put there by the Easter bunny. Paasbrood is a delicious sweet bread stuffed with raisin and black currants served on Easter, and a favorite among old and young alike.

Feasting and celebrations continue even on Easter Monday. While the younger children hunt for colored Easter eggs, the older people participate in Eiertikken, an egg-cracking game.

Ascension Day commemorates the Christian belief that Jesus rose to heaven 40 days after his Resurrection on Easter. The Eastern Orthodox Church has recorded Ascension Day as one of the 12 Great Feasts.

Ascension Day is known as Hemelvaart in the Netherlands. On this day devout Catholics attend the Ascension Day Mass, offering prayers to God and thanking him for sending Jesus to Earth to spread the message of love and peace. The Dutch believe that the dew on Ascension Day has healing properties. Thus, in many parts of the Netherlands, teenagers embark on dauwtrappen, which means “dew-kicking” on Ascension Day. This requires them to get up as early as 5:00 in the morning and ride into the country on their bicycles. It is called dauwtrappen because it involves kicking the pedals in the wee hours of the morning while the dew is still in the air. Families also go for walks on the dewy grass in gardens and parks and pick spring flowers.

FEAST OF SINTERKLAAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 5

This day commemorates the death of St. Nicholas, the bishop of Myra (a place in modern-day Turkey), who died on December 6, 343 C.E. St. Nicholas (who is popularly called Santa Claus) is known as Sinterklaas in the Netherlands.

Many Roman Catholic countries celebrate St. Nicholas's Day primarily as a feast for small children on December 6. However, like most of the other Low Countries, the Netherlands observes the holiday on December 5. In addition the feast is observed by adults as well as children, and by non-Christians as well as Christians.

Dutch poems and songs relate that Sinterklaas lives today in Spain (although why the Dutch chose Spain as the home of Sinterklaas remains unclear). Dutch children also believe that through the year Sinterklaas keeps track of their behavior in a special red book, and Zwarte Piet (Black Peter) helps him by wrapping gifts for those children who have behaved well. Then in the first week of November, Sinterklaas fills his sack with the presents, and with his white horse and Piet embarks on his trip to the Netherlands aboard a steamship. The children look forward to their arrival, because they believe the three will visit them and give them the presents they want.

In the Netherlands this magical trip comes alive on national television in the form of a special staged arrival of Sinterklaas in the country. In mid-November Sinterklaas and his companions are portrayed as reaching one of the Dutch harbors (a different one every year), where they are welcomed by the mayor and the people of the town. Then a parade follows, with Sinterklaas and the mayor in the lead, and people welcome Sinterklaas and his companions with deafening cheers. This marks the beginning of the Sinterklaas season in the Netherlands and the arrival of Sinterklaas is shown live on national television.

Dutch children believe that throughout this season Sinterklaas and Zwarte Piet travel throughout the Netherlands; at night the children leave hay or a small carrot in their shoes for the white horse on which Sinterklaas rides. On the night before the Feast of Sinterklaas, Piet takes the hay and leaves a small candy or a gift for the child if he or she has behaved nicely in the past year.

The Feast of Sinterklaas is a day of fun and frolic in the Netherlands. Many Dutch hide gifts in the house, and the recipient has to embark on a treasure hunt (armed with clues) to find the gifts. Gifts are hidden in potato bins and puddings as well as inside pillows. Sinterklaas and Zwarte Piet also give presents to children at schools and hospitals and even shopping malls all over the country. People traditionally camouflage their gifts in an innovative and creative manner, and an appropriate poem is supposed to accompany every gift.

A special dinner table is set. Each family member is presented with a large chocolate letter that is the first initial of the person's name, and every family member takes a turn opening his or her presents and reading their poems aloud. Gingerbread men and women share the table with the family. It is a Dutch tradition to refer to these guests as lovers.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The Dutch do not celebrate birthdays in an elaborate way, but gift certificates are popular birthday gifts in the Netherlands. Parties are rare and, if held, will involve celebrating the birthday over a cup of coffee.

❁ MARRIAGE

Dutch weddings generally take place in the church in the presence of family members and friends. A day before the wedding, the families of the couple host a party in honor of them. It is traditional for the couple to sit under the trees on a beautifully decorated throne so that all the guests can come to them and give them their blessings.

During the wedding the presiding officiant introduces the couple to the community as husband and wife after the exchange of rings and wedding vows. Friends and family members greet the newlyweds, and a banquet follows.

Dutch weddings are known especially for the amazing quantity of food served. Two traditional menu items that are an integral part of every Dutch wedding are a sweetmeat (known as "bridal sugar") and a special spiced wine known as "bride's tears."

It is also traditional for Dutch couples to plant flowers—mainly lilies-of-the-valley—around their houses. These symbolize the return of happiness. The Dutch believe that, just as the flowers will bloom with every passing year, in the same way the couple will renew their love and their relationship.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The Netherlands Antilles is a collection of five islands, divided into two groups: the Leeward Islands, which include Saba, St. Eustatius, and St. Maarten; and the Windward Islands, Bonaire and Curaçao. It is believed that the earliest inhabitants of these islands were the Arawaks and the Caribs. However, little is known about these islands prior to colonization.

The Leeward Islands are believed to have been discovered by Columbus (1451–1506) in 1493, and the Windward Islands by Alonso de Ojeda (1466–1516) in 1499. The initial colonists were the Spanish, but the Dutch West India Company sent settlers to the area in the 17th century to start a base for their slave trade. Saba was colonized by the Dutch in 1640. The island where St. Maarten is located was divided between the Dutch and the French. The island St. Eustatius is found on has a colorful history of being colonized by the Dutch, French, and Spanish.

In 1845 the Leeward Islands united with the Windward Islands, plus the island of Aruba, to form the Netherlands Antilles. Aruba was a part of the federation until 1986, at which time it was granted independent status. Although the issue of independence from the federation for the other islands comes up now and then, the Dutch government has resisted any change, maintaining that these islands cannot support their own governments, banks, military, and police forces.

✿ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The five islands that make up the Netherlands Antilles are of volcanic origin and are not suitable for intensive agriculture. The highest point in the Netherlands Antilles is Mt. Scenery (536 feet), situated on the island of Saba. The country has tropical climatic conditions marked by warm weather throughout the year. The Leeward Islands of Bonaire and Curaçao are prone to hurricanes in the summer.

The flora and fauna of these five islands are typically tropical in nature, with a variety of flowering plants and thick shrubs. Exotic birds and animals also live on these islands, and reptiles are abundant.

❁ ECONOMY

When slavery was abolished, the economy of these islands was badly hit. Matters improved in the 20th century, however, with the construction of oil refineries to service the oil fields of Venezuela. Tourism, petroleum refining, and offshore finance are the major contributors to gross domestic product (GDP) in the Netherlands Antilles. Crops such as aloe, sorghum, peanuts, vegetables, and some tropical fruit are also cultivated. The country exports petroleum products, while importing crude petroleum and manufactured goods. Almost all the consumer goods used in the country are imported, mainly from the United States, Mexico, and Venezuela.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The different origins of the population and the location of the islands give the Netherlands Antilles a diverse culture. The Dutch influence is evident in every area of life, but at the same time African, Caribbean, Spanish, Indian, and East Asian influences are obvious. A huge influx of tourists is seen here during the Carnival season.

This region is famous for the unique musical genres found here, and the carnivals that feature these musical forms are world famous. Other art forms, such as woodcarving, fabrics, paintings, sculptures, crafts, and jewelry reflect the diverse Caribbean culture of this region.

The most noted personality of this area is the famous poet and artist Christiaan Engels (c. 1838–1912). He was born in the Netherlands, but after he arrived in Curaçao in 1936, Engels became instrumental in bringing about major changes in the cultural life of this country. He founded Willemstad's Curaçao Museum in 1948.

John de Pool was another famous personality who wrote the satirical lament "Del Curaçao Quese Va" ("That's How Curaçao Was"), which catalogued the country's old customs and traditions.

❁ CUISINE

Dutch influence is seen in the cuisine as well as lifestyle of the people of the Netherlands Antilles. The favorite recipes on the islands include a variety of seafood and meat dishes. Piska kora (red snapper), karko (conch meat), shrimp, lobster, and kabritu stoba (goat meat) are some of the specialties found here. Plantains (fried bananas), keshi yena (filled cheese), and funchi (cornmeal mush) are other indigenous items served on the islands. French fries, rice with beans, white rice, and baked potatoes are often featured as side dishes.

This day commemorates the birth of Queen Beatrix (b. 1938), the present queen of the Netherlands, as well as her ascension to the throne on April 30, 1980. Her actual birth date is January 31; April 30 is the birthday of her mother the late Queen Juliana (b. 1909), the queen mother of the Netherlands. Queen Beatrix decided to retain the celebration of Queen's Day on April 30 as a mark of respect for her mother, who abdicated in her favor. Another reason for keeping this date was that Juliana's birthday falls in one of the coldest months of the year, precluding outdoor celebrations. As a result in 1980 Queen Beatrix decided to celebrate her birthday along with her mother's on April 30.

All the islands of Netherlands Antilles hold celebrations on this day. Fairs and open-air markets are held as part of the celebrations. The streets are decorated with ribbons and flowers as well as huge portraits of the queen, while musical bands play Dutch music and songs specially written for her.

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus was laid in the tomb; the next day he rose from the dead. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday), and Christians regard it as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. They usually attend special Easter services and enjoy a special meal together.

Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. In the Netherlands Antilles Easter also signifies the advent of spring.

Festivities on the islands continue into the next day, Easter Monday, the first Monday after Lent. This day is often set aside for musical performances and other such activities.

✿ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Lent

The Ascension is a day of special celebration for Roman Catholics all over the world because it celebrates Jesus' Ascension to heaven 40 days after his Resurrection on Easter. The Catholic Church has recorded Ascension Day as one of the 12 Great Feasts, and the people of the Netherlands Antilles celebrate this day by attending special prayer services. The period from Easter Sunday to Ascension Day is often seen as a suitable time in this region for Catholic children to receive their first Holy Communion.

❁ ST. NICHOLAS DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 5

On the eve of the Feast of St. Nicholas, the children of the Netherlands Antilles put out a bucket of water and a shoe filled with hay to feed St. Nicholas's horse. It is believed that children who have been good throughout the year will awake to find their shoes filled with gifts the next morning. Children who were mischievous, on the other hand, will be put in a sack and carried away to Spain by a scary goblin named Zwarte Piet (Black Peter). Special church services are held in the saint's honor on this day.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world because it is the date selected by the Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe to be the Son of God. In the Netherlands Antilles Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24), and last until Boxing Day (December 26). Christmas decorations are often prepared well in advance. A manger with figures of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men, are placed in all churches and homes.

On December 24, Catholic families attend special Masses held before Christmas. They return home to have a meal during which they slice a cake specially made for the occasion. Then they gather around the Christmas tree and light candles. Children sing carols and are rewarded with small sums of money.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services and special family meals where Christmas delicacies are served. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts. Children open presents left for them by Santa Claus.

❁ CURAÇAO SALSA FESTIVAL

Observed in: Curaçao

Observed by: General public

Observed in: Early August

The Salsa Festival held in Curaçao is a world-renowned international event. This is a two-day event. On the first day various dance and musical performances take place in the Curaçao Festival Center; on the second day, the festivities take place in the streets. These include live band performances, workshops, dance exhibits, and parties. This event also features salsa instructors from Puerto Rico, New York, Los Angeles, Amsterdam, and Miami.

Tumba

Tumba is one of the most important musical genres of Curaçao. This music is originally African, but the word tumba comes from a 17th-century Spanish dance. In an earlier time, tumba lyrics were famous for being scandalous in nature. For this reason, tumba music was played at parties but rarely sung.

✿ BIRTH

Fun Fact

Even though same-sex marriage is recognized in the Netherlands, it is illegal in the Netherlands Antilles.

The population of the Netherlands Antilles is predominantly Roman Catholic. For this reason a newly born child is baptized in the church according to Catholic tradition. The godparents are the child's spiritual guides and have some financial obligations toward the child as well. They are chosen months before the birth. On the day of the christening the family hosts a small party. The godmother often sponsors the party, while the godfather is supposed to give jewelry to the godmother. The dinner served later on this day is lavish. Goat soup, goat stew, rice, beets, and green peas are served.

✿ COMING OF AGE

The religious sacrament of the first Holy Communion is generally perceived as the coming of age rite in Catholic countries like the Netherlands Antilles. On this day the child in question is dressed in its best clothes and accompanied by its godparents to the church. During a special Mass, the child receives Holy Communion for the first time.

The preparations for this day start off well in advance. The house is repainted, and white curtains, draped in red and blue ribbons, are hung. A goat is fattened for the coming family feast. After the Mass, the communicant's family hosts a lavish party for friends and relatives. The child is seated on a small throne decorated with crepe paper. Different cakes and other delicacies, such as lèter (s-shaped peanut cookies), sunchi (meringues), panlefti (sponge cake), and tèrt (pie) are served on this occasion.

✿ MARRIAGE

In earlier times slaves were not allowed to marry; so the right to marry was a symbol of social status in the Netherlands Antilles, and it is still a big affair there. The wedding ceremony normally takes place two years after a couple's engagement. In the interim both of their families save money for the function. The civil marriage takes place without much show, but the church wedding is elaborate. The bride's father and the groom's mother are the godparents of the wedding couple during the ceremony. The bride wears something old, something new, something borrowed, and something blue on her wedding evening.

The wedding reception has an air of cheerfulness and hospitality. There is a lot of food and drink, as well as singing and dancing on the occasion. The traditional wedding cake is cut, and various delicacies such as the bolo pretu (dark fruitcake) are served.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

One of the last major land masses to be inhabited by human beings, New Zealand was discovered by navigators from Polynesia, who arrived in their canoes (waka) between 800 and 600 years ago to become the indigenous Maori culture.

The Maori adapted to eating the local marine resources, plants, and animals for food. They hunted the giant flightless moa (which was soon extinct) and ate the Polynesian rat (kiore) and sweet potato (kumara), which they brought with them.

Settlement of the Chatham Islands to the southeast of New Zealand produced the Moriori people, but it is uncertain whether they moved there from New Zealand or Polynesia.

It is thought that around 1350 a mass exodus of people from Kupe's home island of Hawaii headed for the region of New Zealand. The newcomers either overpowered or intermingled with the indigenous people, resulting in a new culture that was mainly hierarchical and based on ties of blood and kinship.

The first European to reach New Zealand was the Dutch explorer Abel Tasman (1603–59), in 1642; if he had plans, they were thwarted by hostile natives who killed and ate some of his crew members.

In 1769 British Captain James Cook (1728–79) circumnavigated the two main islands of New Zealand. His initial contact with the Maoris also proved unpleasant, but he was impressed by their bravery and fierce spirit. Realizing the potential of this newly found area, Cook grabbed it for the British crown before leaving for Australia. Between 1839 and 1841 the country was under the jurisdiction of New South Wales, Australia.

Since the influx of European settlers continued unabated, a policy was urgently required regarding land deals between the settlers (pakeha) and the Maori. In 1840 the Treaty of Waitangi was signed, with the Maori handing over the sovereignty of their land to the British in exchange for protection and guaranteed possession of their lands. But relations between the Maori and pakeha were soon estranged. The Northland War of 1844 disrupted the treaty, and by 1860 a war ensued between the two groups that continued for most of the

Moa

The descendants of the original ratites, moas were the tallest birds ever known in the world's history. Ratites were a group of early birds that lacked a ridge (keel) on their sternum (breast bone) to which wing muscles could be attached so the birds could fly. They proliferated and developed distinctively for 80 million years in splendid isolation in New Zealand until the arrival of humans. The moas' sole natural predator was the Haast's eagle (Harpagornis moorei), the largest eagle ever known, with a wing span of 10 feet and talons as big as a tiger's claws. After the arrival of human beings, the moas quickly ended up as food, and much of their habitat was destroyed by fire.

decade. By the late 19th century, however, there was a semblance of peace. The discovery of gold generated prosperity, and large-scale sheep farming helped to make New Zealand an efficient and self-reliant country.

During this period there were social changes and liberalization, including women's suffrage, social security, and the introduction of child-care services. New Zealand was involved, along with the then-Australian colonies, in a constitutional convention that took place in 1891 in Sydney. Its underlying purpose was to consider a constitution for the proposed federation between the two British colonies, but New Zealand lost interest in federating with Australia after this convention.

In 1907 New Zealand was given dominion status in the British Empire, and in 1931 it was granted autonomy. Full-fledged independence was proclaimed in 1947. The country's economy continued to prosper until the time of the global recession of the 1980s, when unemployment began to rise.

General elections are held every three years. Eight parties are represented in the House of Representatives, which since 1990s has been elected by a form of proportional representation called Mixed Member Proportional (MMP).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

New Zealand consists of two major islands—North Island and South Island—plus several smaller ones including Stewart Island, which is often referred to as “third island.” North and South Islands are separated by the 20-mile-wide Cook Strait. To the north and east lies the Pacific Ocean, and between New Zealand and Australia is the Tasman Sea.

New Zealand is just about the size of Italy, the United Kingdom, or the state of Colorado in the United States.

Although less mountainous than South Island, North Island is volcanically active, with a central plateau. South Island has the high snow-covered mountain peaks and glaciers of the southern Alps, a mountain range running almost 310 miles that divides the island. The highest point is Mt. Cook on South Island (12,316 feet). Over 75 percent of New Zealand's terrain lies 656 feet above sea level.

New Zealand has a largely temperate climate and mild temperatures, moderately high rainfall, and unlimited sunshine throughout most of the country.

The climate is dominated by two geographical features—the mountains and the sea. The extreme north has subtropical weather during summers while the inland alpine areas of the South Island can experience lows of 14°F in winter. Since New Zealand lies in the Southern Hemisphere, the average temperature decreases toward the south. The extreme north of the country has an average temperature of about 59°F, while the south has an average of 48°F. January and February are the warmest months of the year, and July is the coldest. New Zealand's average rainfall is high, between 24 and 59 inches, which is evenly spread throughout the year.

Between 80 and 100 million years ago, New Zealand drifted away from the massive super-continent of Gondwanaland into the South Pacific. This isolation led to the evolution and development of unique flora as well as fauna. Large forests and bushes supported a variety of bird life. As these birds evolved, their wings became vestigial since there were had no natural predators to fly away from, and many of the native birds became flightless. They include the Kakapo parrot, the kiwi, the endangered takahe (a member of the rail family), and the world's largest (now extinct) bird, the moa.

The other well-known native birds include the kea (native parrot), weka, tui, and morepork owl. The native tuatara, a living fossil, is a reptile with evolutionary links to the dinosaur. The tuatara is found mainly on islands around New Zealand's coast, the only beak-headed reptile left in the world. Every species of this reptile family, except the tuatara, died out around 65 million years ago. Tuatara can live for over 100 years and were once found throughout New Zealand. Now they can be found only on protected offshore islands. New Zealand has an abundance of marine life, and whale-watching and swimming with dolphins are two of New Zealand's highly popular tourist activities.

New Zealand's heavy rainfall and profuse sunlight produce a large variety of plant life including shrubs, a range of ferns, moss, and lichens, the native rimu and totara, the Kauri forests of the north and the beech forests and alpine tussock of the Southern Alps. The bright yellow flowers of the kowhai tree are a feast for the eyes. So is the pobutukawa tree, which bursts forth with scarlet flowers during the Christmas season, earning it the title of New Zealand's Christmas tree.

❁ ECONOMY

With the progress of the 20th century, the character of New Zealand's population began to undergo radical changes. In the early part of the century New Zealand's economy was largely dependent on agriculture and the export of primary produce. After World War II more and more people moved to the cities, and manufacturing and tertiary industries were established. In the 1970s large numbers of Pacific Island immigrants settled in New Zealand, followed in the 1980s and 1990s by Asians and Europeans. These new arrivals contributed greatly to technological and economic change. During the last two decades New Zealanders have embraced the global economy and the latest technology.

New Zealanders are among the highest mobile phone and Internet users in the world. They are also readers of the most newspapers. The farming sector has diversified and embraced technology, making New Zealand one of the most productive and efficient agricultural producers in the world. The nation still has a sizable rural population, and farming continues to account for a lot of the country's exports. While its traditional exports are wool, meat, and dairy products, new products, including New Zealand venison (cervena), flowers, fruit, biotechnology, and wine now contribute substantially to its export revenues.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

New Zealand has a unique and dynamic lifestyle. The culture of its indigenous Maori people affects the language, the arts, and even the accents of all New Zealanders. The Maori are the indigenous people of New Zealand (Aotearoa). A bold and courageous race, they had voyaged thousands of miles across the vast uncharted oceans to reach these territories. In the process they had mastered the skills of using the stars and the ocean currents to develop a full-fledged navigation system. The Maori comprise 14 percent of the population.

Their language and culture has a major impact on all facets of New Zealand life. Traditional arts such as carving, weaving, group performance (kapa haka), oratory (whaikorero), and tattooing (moko) are

Fun Fact

Many historians believe that the first people to discover New Zealand were Kupe, a Polynesian navigator, and his wife Hine-te-aparangi who found it around 800 C.E. According to legend Hine-te-aparangi named it Aotearoa, which means "Land of the Long White Cloud."

Fun Fact

On a world map of 1645–46, the islands were labeled Zeelandia Nova, Nieuw Zeeland, perhaps to match New Holland, as Australia was then known.

Tane Mahuta

New Zealand's most famous tree is a member of the kauri species and is called Tane mahuta. (It is named after the Maori god of the forest.) The Tane mahuta stands over 167 feet high, has a girth of over 42 feet, and is believed to be more than 2,000 years old. Its location is on the west coast of Northland.

practiced throughout the country. Maori culture also includes art, film, television, poetry, and theater. The Maori costume, called kakahu, is woven from the fibers of the flax plant. An ornament called a tiki is generally worn by men and women as a pendant around the neck. It is made of green stone or New Zealand jade and is in the shape of a fetus. The women also wear mako, or shark-tooth, earrings.

The European settlers who arrived in New Zealand at different points in time were also matchless in their bravery and their spirit of adventure. Since they lived in utmost isolation on these islands, braving all the natural elements, these New Zealanders gradually evolved as a hardworking and multi-skilled community. These qualities have contributed substantially to the national character of

New Zealand. The qualities are amply evident in the present generation of young Kiwi (another name for New Zealanders) business executives, computer software professionals, filmmakers, fashion designers, and athletes.

In addition to New Zealand's official public holidays, there are also numerous provincial anniversary days to celebrate the founding or landing days of the first colonists of the various colonial provinces. The observance of such anniversary days can vary even within each province due to local custom, convenience, or the proximity of seasonal events or other holidays. The celebration of these holidays can also differ from the historical observance day and can vary by several weeks from the historic date of the events being commemorated.

Fun Fact

Although the Maori language Te Reo Maori had almost disappeared from use, it has begun to thrive once more because the government actively supports the use of the language in public schools and a Maori language television channel.

New Zealanders are the masterminds behind the tranquillizer gun, seismic "base" isolators (rubber and lead blocks that minimize earthquake damage), electric fences, the fastest motorbike in the world, freezer vacuum pumps, stamp vending machines, wide-toothed shearing combs, and the electronic gas pump. The idyllic environs of the islands of New Zealand have lured many film directors from Hollywood (as well as Bollywood) to shoot scenes for their movies in these breathtaking and panoramic locales. This in turn has led to an increase in tourism.

A large number of New Zealanders enjoy all kinds of outdoor sports such as hiking, mountaineering, and kayaking. The world-famous adventurer and mountaineer Sir Edmund Hillary (b. 1919), who conquered Mt. Everest, the world's highest mountain, in 1953, was a New Zealander.

❁ CUISINE

The cuisine of New Zealand is a fine blend of British influences and native Maori dishes. A vast range of native fruits and vegetables are available in New Zealand, including the kiwifruit and the kumara, a root vegetable resembling a sweet potato. Fish and shellfish are plentiful, and New Zealanders who have a penchant for fish also enjoy muttonbird, a native bird that tastes like fish. A Maori specialty is the hangi, a pit in which meat or fish are cooked with vegetables. The pavlova, a meringue filled with whipped cream and fresh fruit, named in honor of the world-famous Russian ballet dancer Anna Pavlova, is a popular dessert invented in New Zealand.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, January 1 is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. In New Zealand New Year's falls in midsummer (in contrast to countries in the Northern Hemisphere, which are in the grip of winter during this part of the year). Since this is a part of the holiday season (just after Christmas), people tend to go to the beaches with their families to swim, surf, or simply relax. This is an official holiday in New Zealand.

❁ WAITANGI DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 6

Waitangi Day commemorates the signing of a historic treaty at Waitangi in 1840 by a group of Maori chiefs and the British government, which was represented by Lt. Gov. Hobson. The treaty has never been officially ratified by the New Zealand Parliament (although it did pass a Treaty of Waitangi Act in 1975 that sought to honor the terms of the agreement) and has been a perpetual source of discontent and discord so far as land rights are concerned. The importance of this historic document lies in the fact that it seeks to clarify the rights of the Maori people and the European settlers. Moreover it helped pave the way to nationhood for the people of New Zealand.

On this day the New Zealand navy raises the New Zealand flag, Union Jack, and White Ensign on the flagstaff in the treaty grounds. The other ceremonies held during the day include a church service and dancing and singing shows. Several waka and a navy ship also reenact Hobson's landing to sign the treaty. The day closes with the flags being lowered by the navy in a traditional ceremony. During recent times communities throughout New Zealand have taken to celebrating Waitangi Day in a number of ways including public concerts and festivals. This is an official holiday in New Zealand.

❁ ANZAC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 25

On this day every year New Zealanders observe ANZAC Day; ANZAC is an acronym for Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. The name was established in 1914 (during World War I) to represent the grouping of the Australian Imperial Force and New Zealand Expeditionary Force stationed in Egypt. On April 25, 1915, the ANZACs began their combat at Gallipoli, located off the Aegean Sea in Turkey, where hundreds of ANZAC soldiers were killed or wounded. This day is celebrated by placing floral wreaths at the heroes' memorials. Marches by war veterans are held in the capital as well as other cities and towns. The ANZAC Day parade from each state capital is televised live with commentary. This is also an official holiday and all offices, businesses, and educational institutions are closed.

❁ QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Monday in June

This holiday celebrates the birthday of Queen Elizabeth II (b. 1926), who rules Australia and New Zealand as well as Great Britain and Ireland. The Queen's Birthday is not celebrated on the actual date in New Zealand (or Australia) because it falls too close to ANZAC Day (four days later) and the long Easter weekend. Because New Zealand's climate tends to be colder than Australia's, this holiday usually opens the country's winter season.

On the occasion of the Queen's Birthday, New Zealanders enjoy the extended weekend in a variety of ways. An honors list is released on the Queen's Birthday. People who have contributed in significant ways to New Zealand are recognized and honored with various titles such as "knight" and "dame" and with awards like the Queen's Service Medal (QSM) and the Queen's Service Order (QSO), among others.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 28

Labor Day, also called Eight-Hour Day in New Zealand, commemorates the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. A unique feature of New Zealand is that its Labor Day celebrations take place in October instead of the usual observance on May. 1

The first Labor Day in New Zealand was celebrated on October 28, 1890, when crowds of trade union members and supporters attended parades in the main centers across New Zealand. Government employees were given the day off to attend. It celebrated the struggle for an eight-hour working day, a right that New Zealand workers were among the first in the world to claim, when in 1840 Samuel Parnell (a carpenter) had won an eight-hour day in Wellington. Nowadays, New Zealanders enjoy an extra day off from work and a nice long weekend for picnics and recreational activities.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 26

Since New Zealand was a part of the British Empire, some of its customs have been incorporated in local traditions and culture. The origins of this holiday are found in an ancient practice (particularly among the British) of giving cash or durable goods to those of the lower classes the day after Christmas. While gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, servants were given gifts the day after. New Zealanders celebrate this day with their loved ones, generally by taking part in outdoor activities, since the holiday occurs during the peak of the summer season.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates belief in Jesus' Resurrection from the dead. It is preceded by Lent, a 40-day period of austerity and atonement. In New Zealand people abstain from eating rich foods during Lent.

The actual Easter ceremonies commence on the night of Holy Saturday. There is a special service held in the churches on Easter Sunday. People light large candles (symbolizing hope) and pass them from hand to hand. In New Zealand it is also customary to eat chocolate eggs; the parents hide them in their houses or their gardens for the children to find after the Easter services are over. People also enjoy a special cake called simnel, prepared with dried fruits and whisky or brandy.

A spirit of festivity, joy, gaiety, and mirth carries over to Easter Monday. Beginning with Good Friday (the Friday before Easter) and continuing up to the following Tuesday, New Zealanders enjoy a five-day holiday. Therefore they sometimes use this time for traveling or spend it at their family homes or farms in the countryside.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a time of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. Since people from the Northern Hemisphere now live in New Zealand, it has become a tradition to celebrate Christmas twice—once on December 25 and again in July, which is mid-winter.

In New Zealand there is a tree known as a Christmas tree (also called a pobutokawa) that bursts into blossom during the Christmas season. Since Christmas in New Zealand occurs in summer, the tradition of snow and ice is conspicuous by its absence. That, however, does not deter the lovable Santa Claus from visiting homes in the cities and towns. Smaller towns and suburban areas have Santa parades, where community groups proudly display brightly decorated floats. Many people in New Zealand adhere to the English traditions of eating turkey and plum pudding, which are often accompanied by cold salads. Many times the Christmas dinner is cooked on a barbecue outside. Christmas in New Zealand is incomplete without the pavlova, a dessert prepared with whipped egg whites and sugar cooked in a slow, low-temperature oven and then decorated with fruit, such as kiwifruit and strawberries, and piled high with whipped cream.

For many people in New Zealand, this is also an occasion to prepare the traditional hangi. A big hole in the ground is lined with heat-resistant rocks. Then covered baskets containing food are placed on the rocks and a fire is lit nearby. Next the hole is covered so that the foodstuffs cook underground. The hangi is generally served in the late afternoon or early evening. After the meal the assembled diners sit around and sing carols as the shadows of the evening lengthen.

❁ DEATH

Among the Maoris the tangi, or tangihanga, includes the funeral rites accorded a person before the body is finally interred. They believe that the tupapaku (the corpse) should not be left on its own at any time following death, so people will gather to take the tupapaku to the community meeting ground used for social occasions (marae) or place it where it can be looked after until it can be buried. All relatives, friends, and acquaintances arriving for a tangi have to undergo the routine rituals of call of welcome (karanga) and greeting (mibi). The mourners hold small twigs of green leaves in their hands, a symbol of sorrow and grief.

The coffin is left open, and the people respectfully touch the tupapaku. Those who have assembled directly address the tupapaku and deliver speeches, firmly convinced that the spirit does not leave the vicinity of the body until it has been buried. The significance of the tangi held at the marae is to seek fulfillment of the wairua, or spiritual being, of the Maori. It is believed that those who have died always hover around the marae; moreover those who have died recently are placed in the care of those who died a long time ago. It is therefore imperative that all the dead (new or old) be brought together to be greeted, respected, and given a proper farewell. Some of the people remain at the tangi for a few hours while others may remain overnight and some others for a couple of days. The Maori establish the cemeteries or burial places (urupa) in such a way that each family can take care of the place where their loved ones have been buried. A visit to the urupa is important if one is returning home after a long absence to reinforce family ties and bonds. At the urupa, places are reserved for the family members in terms of their hierarchy. On leaving the urupa, its sanctity or sacredness (tapu) is to be removed by washing one's hands in water. Many urupa have containers of water placed outside their gates for this purpose. In case there is no water available, home-cooked bread (rewana) is crumbled and used to "wash away" any traces of the tapu. This symbolic action restores the state of noa, or freedom to socialize normally with other people.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The earliest traces of human habitation in Nicaragua are the 10,000-year-old footprints preserved under layers of volcanic ash—huellas de Acabualinca—of people and animals in the vicinity of Lago de Managua (Lake Managua). Around the 10th century C.E. (some 9,000 years later) Aztecs from Mexico migrated to Nicaragua's Pacific lowlands. When the Aztecs again moved south during the 15th century to establish a trading colony, much of Aztec culture was adopted by the indigenous groups. The country probably takes its name from Nicarao, the leader of an indigenous community that inhabited the shores of Lake Nicaragua. He was defeated in 1522 by Spanish invaders.

In 1524 conquistador Francisco Hernández de Córdoba (d. 1526) founded the first Spanish permanent settlements in the region, including two of Nicaragua's principal towns—

Granada, on Lake Nicaragua, and León, east of Lake Managua. Settled as a colony of Spain in the 1520s, Nicaragua became a part of the Mexican Empire, then gained its independence as a part of the United Provinces of Central America in 1821, and finally emerged as an independent republic in 1838.

Much of Nicaragua's politics since independence has been characterized by a rivalry between the liberal elites of León and the conservative elites of Granada. In 1855 the liberals invited William Walker (1824–60), a military adventurer from Tennessee intent on taking over Latin American territory, to help seize power from the conservatives based. Walker, a proslavery maverick from the U.S. Confederacy, and his band of mercenaries took Granada easily, and he proclaimed himself president of Nicaragua. One of his first moves was to institutionalize slavery. He was soon overthrown and exiled from the country. Walker, however, showed great tenacity by repeatedly trying to invade the country; his efforts set a precedent for ongoing U.S. interference in Nicaragua's affairs.

On November 18, 1909, U.S. warships were sent to the area after 500 revolutionaries (including two Americans) were executed by order of President José Santos Zelaya (1853–1919). The United States justified its intervention by claiming it essential to protect the lives of U.S. nationals and their property, and U.S. Marines occupied Nicaragua until 1933. From 1927 until 1933, liberal General Augusto César Sandino (1895–1934) led a sustained guerrilla war, first against the conservative regime and subsequently against the U.S. marines as well.

When the Americans left in 1933, they set up the Guardia, a combined military and police force trained and equipped by the United States and designed to be loyal to U.S. interests. In 1934 General Somoza (1896–1956), head of the U.S.-trained National Guard, engineered the assassination of Sandino and, after fraudulent elections, became the president in 1937. Somoza ruled Nicaragua as a dictator for the next 20 years, amassing huge personal wealth and landholdings nearly the size of El Salvador. Although General Somoza was shot dead in 1956, his sons upheld the regime in a Somoza dynasty until 1979.

Two groups were set up to counter the regime: the Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional (FSLN), also known as the Sandinistas, and the Democratic Union of Liberation (UDELA), led by Pedro Joaquín Chamorro (1924–78), publisher of La Prensa, a newspaper critical of the dictatorship. In 1990 the Sandinistas, who seized power through a violent rebellion, voluntarily handed over the power to Chamorro's widow, the democratically elected Violeta Chamorro (b. 1929) and peacefully relinquished power. Violeta Chamorro's failure to revive the economy and her increasing reliance on Sandinista support, led to U.S. threats to withhold aid. The ex-mayor of Managua, anticommunist Liberal Alliance candidate Arnoldo Alemán (b. 1946) was sworn in as president on January 10, 1997.

In January 2000 the National Assembly approved a series of amendments to the constitution that appeared to concentrate power in the hands of the two largest political parties. Drafted by the Liberal Party and the Sandinistas, the amendments limit seats in the National Assembly to candidates whose parties receive at least 4 percent of the vote. The two largest parties also won the power to appoint members of the previously independent Supreme Electoral Council, which supervises voter registration and elections. In the 2001 elections Liberal Party candidate Enrique Bolaños Geyer (b. 1928) was elected president, defeating Daniel Ortega (b. 1945), who ran as the Sandinista candidate. In the National Assembly the Liberal Party won a majority of seats, followed closely by the Sandinistas.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Nicaragua is the largest country in Central America. Geographically it boasts the largest freshwater lake in Central America, the Lago de Nicaragua. The country's terrain comprises extensive Atlantic coastal plains rising to central interior mountains and narrow Pacific coastal plains interrupted by volcanoes. The climate is tropical in the lowlands and relatively cooler in the highlands. Nicaragua frequently experiences natural catastrophes such as severe earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and landslides; it is extremely vulnerable to hurricanes.

❁ ECONOMY

Nicaragua is one of the poorest countries in the Northern Hemisphere. Low per-capita income, massive unemployment, and huge external debts are some of the country's chronic problems, while distribution of income is among the most unequal in the world. While the country has made progress toward macroeconomic stability over the past few years, the annual growth has been far too low to meet the country's needs, but the government has undertaken significant economic reforms expected to help the country qualify for more than $4 billion in debt relief. Donor nations have made aid conditional on the openness of government financial operations, the alleviation of poverty, and human rights.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In Nicaragua the majority of people, including mestizos, Europeans, and mulattoes, share a Hispanic heritage. Only a small percentage of the population, living on the Caribbean coast, is non-Spanish-speaking and non-Catholic. Nicaraguans are much more divided by the lingering effects of the Sandinista Revolution of 1979 and the subsequent civil war of the 1980s than by their ethnic origins. Peace has been restored, but the people continue to grapple with their national identity. The majority of Nicaraguans are Catholics, and their religious calendar features many festive parades honoring various local patron saints.

As with many Central American countries, the coastal culture of the Caribbean lowlands varies from that of the more westerly, majority groups. In Nicaragua the coast is inhabited by the descendants of Africans and indigenous peoples (Miskito, Rama, and Sumu), who in the past preferred to deal with the British rather than the Spanish. These indigenous groups, dominated by the Miskito, are clustered near the northern border with Honduras. Blacks are concentrated in the southeastern town of Bluefields, where their cultural traditions are manifest in such celebrations as Mayo Ya, which combines English Maypole traditions with Caribbean folklore and African music and dance. Bluefields is also home to a lively reggae community.

❁ CUISINE

A typical Nicaraguan meal consists of eggs or meat, beans and rice, salad (cabbage and tomatoes), tortillas, and seasonal fruits. The most common Nicaraguan food is gallo pinto, a blend of rice and beans, with the stock from the beans used to color the rice. Other traditional dishes include bajo (a mix of beef, green and ripe plantains, and yucca, or cassava) and vigorón (yucca served with fried pork skins and coleslaw). Street vendors sell drinks like tiste, made from cacao and corn, and posol con leche, a corn-and-milk drink. Nicaragua claims to have the best beer and rum in Central America.

Public/Legal Holidays

✿ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

On this day in Nicaragua, people say farewell to the old year with some sadness, renewing their resolutions to give up bad habits and adopt good ones. People mainly celebrate the day in the company of friends and family.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, is an annual holiday that pays tribute to the workers and laborers for their contributions to the socioeconomic development of the country. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Nicaragua this day is marked by parades in which local politicians often participate. Labor unions also organize speeches and rallies. Schools, government offices, and businesses remain closed on this day.

✿ LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 19

Liberation Day, or Day of National Liberation, is observed in remembrance of the 1979 uprising when Nicaraguans rebelled against the dictator Anastasio Somoza. On this day the streets are beautifully decorated and a festive atmosphere prevails. Colorful parades by costumed marchers, spectacular floats, music, and fireworks displays are organized on this occasion.

✿ BATTLE OF SAN JACINTO DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 14

San Jacinto Hacienda came to prominence on September 14, 1856, when it was the site of an historic battle. In this international conflict Nicaragua's General José Dolores Estrada bravely led his men against the powerful forces of William Walker and his mercenaries (from the United States), who sought to take over Nicaragua (and ultimately all of Central America). The triumph of the Nicaraguan soldiers in this battle signaled Walker's impending defeat and is celebrated every year as a national holiday. The battle's heroes and brave soldiers are honored and remembered on this day. Students also participate in parades.

✿ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 15

This date commemorates the independence of all of the countries of Central America (Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica) from Spain in 1821. It was not until 1838 that Nicaragua achieved true independence, emerging as an independent sovereign nation (no longer part of a federation). This significant day is marked by parades of schoolchildren, cultural events, beauty pageants, and agricultural exhibitions.

Religious Holidays

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.
