The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Nicaraguans observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion. In Nicaragua every church holds a Procession of the Carpets. A path of elaborately crafted "carpets" made from multicolored sawdust is laid out for the procession, which symbolizes Jesus' path to Calvary. This day is also a national holiday.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus was laid in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Catholics.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

It is a day for wonderful celebrations throughout Nicaragua. Churches celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus with fireworks and joyous processions. During this time of the year people across Nicaragua tend to pack up and head for the beaches. This is also a national holiday.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday.

❁ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 7–8

The celebration of the Immaculate Conception, called La Gritería or La Purísima in Nicaragua, is one of the most important holidays in Nicaragua. It is a day dedicated to Mary, mother of Jesus, also known as the Virgin of the Immaculate Conception. In honor of Mary, the Catholic Nicaraguans observe holidays on both December 7 and 8. Families build altars inside their homes, close to the entrance, so that when the door is left open the altar is visible from the street. Guests are invited to come in and worship at the altar, and they are offered sweets made from sugarcane.

An especially large-scale celebration takes place in León, attended by Catholics

Fun Fact

The adoration of the Blessed Virgin Mary is an ancient Catholic tradition, but Nicaragua is one of the few countries in the world that continues to practice it.

❁ SANTO DOMINGO DAY

Observed in: Managua
Observed on: August 1

Santo Domingo Day, also called St. Dominic's Day, is a two-day celebration held in honor of St. Dominic, the patron saint of Managua. The decorated statue of Santo Domingo is taken out from Las Sierritas de Santo Domingo Church in a procession followed by worshippers and ornately adorned purebred horses. The streets along the procession route are lined with white and yellow flags symbolizing the Vatican (where the pope resides). Crowds of people follow the statue bearers, shouting praise of their patron saint. The statue is placed in a small boat adorned with colorful flowers—even though there are no waterways along the procession route—so that the tiny statue can symbolically “sail” through the city. Finally the ceremonies culminate in bursts of firecrackers. This is also a national holiday.

Masaya Volcano

The Masaya Volcano, called Popogatepe, which means the “mountain that burns” in the language of the indigenous Chorotega tribe, is the most active volcano in the area. Before the arrival of the conquistadors, the volcano was worshipped by the Chorotega, who believed its eruptions were signs of the Gods' anger. To appease the gods they often sacrificed small children and young women. When the Spaniards arrived, they named the volcano “La Boca del Infierno,” or “The Mouth of Hell.” Then they proceeded to plant a cross on the crater's lip, “La Cruz de Bobadilla” (after Father Francisco Bobadilla) in order to exorcise the devil.

Masaya is an unusual basaltic volcano in that it has had explosive eruptions. Its eruption in 4550 B.C.E. was one of the biggest on Earth in the last 10,000 years. Since the arrival of the Spanish, Masaya has erupted at least 19 times. The most recent eruption was in 1993. Pyroclastic eruptions have constructed three main cones: Masaya, Nindiri, and Santiago. Santiago was formed in 1850–53. Unlike the strato-volcanoes that characterize subduction zones, Masaya has a shieldlike structure. Sometimes the volcano emits large amounts of sulfur dioxide gas: In 1981 the Santiago crater was releasing 500,000 tons of sulfur dioxide a year.

ities, beginning on September 20 and ending the first week of December, last 80 days. In Masaya the celebration commences with el Día de la Bajada, the day when the statue of the saint is brought down from the church altar into town. The tremulous sound of the marimba, the rhythmic bands known as chicheros, the lavish flower arrangements, the ecstatic worshippers, and the traditional dances such as El Torovenado and the Noche de Ahuizotes are all part of the festivities honoring San Jerónimo in Masaya.

In León cathedral parishioners carry a baroque image of the saint to the Church of St. John the Baptist. People celebrate with music, dance, and food. Because the image of San Jerónimo that is kept in the Catholic Church in Bluefields is not taken out in procession as in Masaya, families who possess figurines of the saint carry it into the streets as part of their celebration.

❁ TOROVENADO DEL PUEBLO

Observed on: October 22

The Torovenado dance uses masks and costumes representing farm animals that are now commonly found in the Americas, though they were introduced by Europeans. Since these dances are organized almost exclusively during religious festivals, many of the participants “pay tribute” (pagando promesas) to the Virgin Mary, the patron saint of the locality, for fulfillment of their wishes.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The baptism ceremony for the newborn is of utmost importance in Nicaragua. When an infant is baptized, the parents choose a madrina (godmother) and padrino (godfather) for their child. Though this practice is common among Roman Catholics around the world, in Nicaragua it assumes greater social significance because the godparents are responsible for the baptism ceremony and the festivities that follow. They are also expected to concern themselves with the well-being of the child throughout his or her life.

❁ DEATH

In Nicaragua a person is buried within a day of his or her death. The family gathers together to mourn, and branches of trees with flowers on them are laid around the door of the house. Other rituals include a novena for the Catholic deceased and, of course, the funeral ceremony. The novena—a prayer lasting nine consecutive days—is usually performed at home. An altar is built in the house on which a photograph of the deceased is placed. With offerings of flowers, candles, and memorabilia, it often remains there for a month or so. Special prayer ceremonies are held a month, and then again a year, after the individual's demise.

Fun Fact

Francisco de Bobadilla was appointed in 1499 to succeed Christopher Columbus as the governor of Spain's new territories in the Americas. When he arrived in 1500, de Bobadilla confirmed the accusations of mismanagement against Columbus and sent him back to Spain. However, when de Bobadilla was returning to Spain, his ship was caught in a hurricane, and he drowned.

Animal Power

In certain traditional Nicaraguan dances, performers dress as animals such as horses, pigs, and mythical creatures. Significantly the animals represented are not native to Nicaragua but were introduced into the country by Spaniards; the choice of animals symbolizes Spanish colonial power. The dancers wear pink-colored masks to look like Europeans, rounding out the satire of the European conquerors.

The Torovenado (bull-deer dance) characters powerfully depict the diverse segments of Nicaraguan colonial society. Originally the music that accompanied the dances was a combination of drumbeats and whistles. Torovenado is a melding of native traditions (drums and whistles) and the imported culture (European-inspired costumes). The marimba is currently the main instrument used in the dances.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Archaeological excavations have amassed considerable evidence that about 600,000 years ago humans inhabited what is now the desolate Sahara of northern Niger. Because of its interior location, Niger was an important economic link along the lucrative trans-Saharan trade route that linked the Saharan regions to the Middle East, making it a bone of contention among many rival empires; the empires of the Songhai, Mali, Gao, and Kanem-Bornu, as well as a number of Hausa states, have claimed control over portions of the area during its long history.

The Kanem-Bornu Empire was the first recognized empire to rule the region between the 10th and 13th centuries. Around the 14th century, the Hausa clan began migrating from Nigeria to Niger and established their settlements in the southeastern parts of the country. In the 16th century the Djermses, who were relatives of the Songhai, also began settling in the region; the Songhai were the dominant ethnic group of the Songhai Empire. The Djermses established their supremacy over the bend of the Niger River where Niger and Burkina Faso are now situated. In the 19th century the Fulani entered Niger and claimed most of the Hausa colonies and states. This led to constant conflict between the Hausa and the Fulani, since both wanted to control the lucrative Niger. Over a period of time, however, the nomadic Tuareg, who were mainly traders and merchants, became the dominant population of Niger. They sided with the Hausa states and helped them resist the Fulani Empire. During the rule of the various empires, Niger became an important player in the slave trade. The region's rulers catered to the demand of the market, supplying slaves in large numbers.

The first contacts with the Europeans came in the 19th century when two explorers Mungo Park (British; 1771–1806) and Heinrich Barth (German; 1821–65) were searching for the mouth of the Niger River. Around the same time the French established a foothold in the region because they hoped to share in the flourishing slave trade. In 1896, using both force and diplomacy, the French began the long and ultimately successful process of establishing their control in Niger. There was intense resistance from the local ethnic groups, especially the desert Tuareg, who led violent uprisings against growing French dominance. It was only in 1922 that the French forces managed to silence these voices of dissent, and Niger was officially declared a French colony. A French governor was appointed to look after the administrative matters of the region.

In 1946 the French government conferred French citizenship on the inhabitants of Niger and began delegating powers to the local people. On December 4, 1958, Niger was granted autonomous status within the French Overseas Community. Hamani Diori (1916–89), a prominent Niger politician, was sworn in as the first prime minister of Niger.

But the Nigerien people wanted more than just autonomy and favored complete independence from French rule. As a result on August 3, 1960, Niger relinquished its membership in the French Community and declared its independence. After independence Hamani Diori was sworn in as the first president of independent Niger. He administered the country through a single-party civilian regime from 1960 until 1974.

In the early 1970s Niger was severely affected by droughts, which crippled the economy. Also around 1974, reports of widespread corruption in the government started surfacing. In 1974 a successful military coup, led by Colonel Seyni Kountché (1931–87), led to the ouster of the Diori regime. Kountché became president of Niger and ruled the nation with the help of a small group of trusted military officers. During his regime all political parties were banned, and any voices of dissent against his autocratic rule met with a gruesome fate. During Kountché's tenure the people of Niger suffered untold human rights violations.

Kountché remained the president of the country until his death in 1987. He was succeeded by his cousin and chief of staff Colonel Ali Saibou (b. 1940), who was more liberal than he. Immediately after assuming power, Saibou released all political prisoners and liberalized the laws and policies of Niger. However, his reluctance to install a multiparty democracy in Niger led to nationwide protests and demonstrations. In 1990 Saibou, yielding to public demand, convened a national conference in July 1991 to decide the framework of a new constitution as well as the date for holding free and fair elections in the country.

In 1993 the first multiparty democratic elections were held in Niger. Saibou was defeated, and a coalition government came to power. Mahamane Ousmane (b. 1950), a leading Nigerien politician, was sworn in as the first democratically elected president of Niger. Disagreements within the coalition that brought him to power led to the dissolution of the legislative government in 1994, but Ousmane continued to serve as president. After fresh legislative elections were held, Hama Amadou (b. 1950) was chosen prime minister.

Around the same time, there were growing problems with the nomadic Tuareg and Toubou groups that had rebelled against the Niger government in 1991. The Tuareg and Toubou had been severely affected by the droughts of the 1970s, as well as by the devastating drought of 1985, which killed a large number of their livestock. They blamed the government for treating them unfairly, neglecting their condition, and not providing them with central government resources for development purposes. They decided to unify all Tuareg in Mali and Niger to form an independent state of Tuareg. However, in April 1995, a peace agreement was signed between all warring Tuareg and Toubou groups and the government of Niger.

On January 27, 1996, Colonel Ibrahim Baré Maïnassara (1949–99) led a successful coup against the government of Niger. This led to the ousters of President Ousmane and Prime Minister Hamadou. In June 1996, Maïnassara ordered new presidential elections in which he and Ousmane competed, along with two other candidates. However, before the results could be declared, Maïnassara dissolved the national electoral committee and established a new one that declared him the winner.

The economy of the country was in trouble, and despite an international embargo on Libya Maïnassara asked Libya for funds to aid in redevelopment. On the domestic front his regime resorted to ruthless means to suppress the opposition parties and political leaders. Journalists were brutally beaten, and independent media offices that voiced concerns over his policies were looted and destroyed.

In April 1999, Major Daouda Malam Wanké (d. 2004) led a successful coup against Maïnassara. In October and November 1999 fresh legislative and presidential elections were held that were deemed free and fair by a committee of international observers. A coalition government, headed by Tandja Mamadou (b. 1938), a prominent Nigerien politician, was voted into power.

Since 1999 Niger has been politically stable, but the government of President Mamadou has been faced with the daunting task of reviving Niger's failing economy. Niger also came under criticism when the United Kingdom and the United States alleged that Iraq wanted to buy "yellowcake," enriched uranium, from Niger in order to build nuclear weapons. This was presented as proof that Iraq was building up its nuclear program to justify the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in April 2003, though the charges, based on a forged document, were shown to be fraudulent.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Niger lies in western Africa's Sahara region. It is almost twice as large as the U.S. state of Texas, or about four-fifths the size of Alaska. Mali, Algeria, Libya, Chad, Nigeria, Benin, and Burkina Faso surround Niger. Niger's land is fertile only in patches; the arable land is concentrated in the southwest where the Niger River flows.

Niger River

The Niger River is the primary river of Niger. The Niger, along with its tributaries, flows over an area of approximately 745,645 square miles. It rises in Guinea and flows for 2,600 miles to drain into the Gulf of Guinea. Upstream, the Niger is easy to navigate all through the year and is navigable in patches at other places. The Niger's main tributary is the Benue, which meets it at Lokoja. The Niger Delta, which forms a coastline of 14,000 miles, is the largest delta in Africa.

Niger is primarily hot and dry throughout the year. The average yearly temperature in Niamey, its capital, is about 85°F. Rainfall occurs from June to October, but is almost nonexistent in the north.

Scattered acacia, palm, tamarind, mahogany, silk-cotton, and baobab trees (an indigenous African tree), represent the flora of Niger. The country aggressively pursues tree-planting activities to counter the problem of desertification. Niger is home to buffalos, elephants, hippos, giraffes, and leopards.

ECONOMY

Niger's economy centers on agriculture and animal husbandry. In January 1994 the West African franc was devalued by 50 percent. This increased Niger's exports of livestock, cowpeas, onions, and cotton products. At one time uranium was also a major source of income for Niger.

The country's economic condition is still very poor. Niger had been dependent on foreign aid, but it was banned after the 1999 coup d'état. Reforms were difficult to enact due to the government's poor financial condition. In 2000 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) sanctioned a $73-million poverty reduction and growth facility loan for Niger, along with $115 million in debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative.

Mineral Resources

Niger, although a poor country, holds diverse mineral resources. Uranium has been a major factor in the country's development and has been a principal export item for years. Niger has huge deposits of uranium. This high-quality uranium is mined in the north at Arlit and Akouta. Other minerals, such as phosphates, are mined in the Niger Valley, and coal and tin ore deposits have also been exploited lately. Salt is produced on a large scale. Niger also has reserves of iron ore, copper, diamonds, and tungsten. Due to financial constraints, many mineral resources have yet to be exploited in this mineral-rich country.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Republic of Niger is an ethnically diverse country. The ancient culture of the Hausa began in the heartland of Niger before spreading across the country. The Hausa are now the dominant ethnic group in Niger, constituting almost 56 percent of the population. The Hausa language is the most widely spoken language in Niger. However, French is the official language, and other ethnic languages such as Djerma are also spoken in different parts of the country.

Among the other prominent ethnic groups are the Tuareg, Inadans, Fulani, Kanouri, and Toubou. The nomadic Tuaregs speak a Berber language called Tamashek and generally reside in the arid areas of the north and central parts of Niger. The Inadans are skilled artisans who are an integral part of the Tuareg family system. They are not paid for their work and often act as servants for the Tuareg even though they are highly respected by the Tuaregs for their silversmithing abilities. They also make saddles, utensils, tools, camel bags, and talismans (amulets believed to have mystical powers).

The Tuareg are also known for informal love poems that are recited by men and women. These poems are accompanied by clapping, drumming (for women), and one-stringed viols (for men).

The Bororo Fulani, also known as Wodaabe, are often referred to as "people of the taboo." This is because every aspect of this ethnic group's life is subject to a predefined set of taboos, moral codes, and traditions.

Almost 80 percent of the Nigerien population is Muslim, while 20 percent adhere either to indigenous beliefs or Christianity. The Hausa Muslims of Niger have adopted the kulle tradition of Islam, which means that they keep their women in seclusion. It does not translate to total seclusion; the women are free to meet other women in the evening as well as go on extended visits to their relatives. Due to the seclusion they need not work for long hours in the fields, and they focus entirely on their homes.

Some of the musical instruments used by the various ethnic groups of Niger include viols, lutes, flutes, kakati (trumpets), and alghaita (an instrument belonging to the woodwind family).

CUISINE

Niger is not known for its food. In the north the food may consist of a combination of yogurt, mutton, and rice. In the south, the main ingredients include rice, couscous, and ragout (stew). Traditionally Nigeriens also enjoy eating locusts.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day throughout the world. Dancing, singing, and dining characterize the New Year's Eve (December 31) celebrations in the urban areas of Niger, including the capital city of Niamey. Because it is a national holiday, all government offices and private institutions are closed on January 1.

❁ NATIONAL CONCORD DAY

Observed on: April 24

National Concord Day commemorates the signing of the peace agreement between the government of the Republic of Niger and the Armed Resistance Organization, made up of Tuareg and Toubou militants, on April 24, 1995.

In 1991 the nomadic Tuareg and Toubou groups initiated a joint rebellion against the central government. These ethnic groups had suffered immensely, both as the result of natural disasters and government policies. Primarily nomads, their lives were severely affected by the droughts of 1970 and 1985, which took a heavy toll on their livestock. Also the Nigerien government appeared to have ignored their situation and did not offer any kind of support or rehabilitation for the benefit of these ethnic groups. Eventually they united to fight for an independent Tuareg nation in Mali and Niger.

With the mediation of France, the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria, and Burkina Faso, a peace accord was brokered between the government of the Republic of Niger and the warring Tuaregs and Toubous. Niger agreed to induct the ethnic Tuaregs and Toubous into the armed forces and to provide rehabilitation for their territories with the help of the French.

This historic day, which marked the end of ethnic war in the region, is a national holiday in Niger.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, is celebrated to recognize the contributions workers make to their respective countries. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Niger observes a national holiday on May 1, and all public and private institutions remain closed.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 3

It was on the third day of August in 1960 that Niger gained freedom from the French after decades of colonial rule. Since becoming independent Niger has experienced many coup d'états, but a democratic form of government was finally realized with the election of Tandja Mamadou as president in 1999.

Independence Day celebrations take place all over the country. In the capital city of Niamey the president presides over the celebrations, which begin with the unfurling of the national flag. Then after military parades, there are cultural and dance programs that show off the rich and diverse cultural heritage of Niger.

❁ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 18

Throughout Niger the institution of republican government is commemorated with various parades on December 18 every year. The most notable Republic Day celebrations take place in the southern city of Dosso. In the cavalry parade, horses and riders are attired in colorful dress. It is a public holiday and all public and private institutions are closed.

Fun Fact

Tuaregs are famous for making talismans, amulets believed to have mystical powers that provide protection against evil. The most widely used of these talismans is the Croix d'Agadez, a silver filigree cross that protects the Tuaregs against the evil eye. The Croix d'Agadez is extremely popular among the locals as well as foreigners.

❁ BIRTH

Among Nigerien Muslims, a woman's genitals cannot be touched by anyone except her husband. Hence, at the time of delivering a child, the midwife does not actually perform the delivery but only aids the woman in labor by giving her herbal drinks to stimulate the muscular contractions. She may also apply herbs over the woman's abdomen and recite prayers for the safe and speedy birth of a healthy child. The birth of a child is celebrated with a lavish feast after the child's naming ceremony.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The most prevalent form of female genital mutilation (FGM) in Niger is excision, and it is estimated that 20 percent of the country's female population has been subjected to it. While there is no legislation specifically prohibiting FGM, in 1990 a government decree established the Niger Committee against Harmful Traditional Practices (CONIPRAT), which has studied the prevalence of FGM and organized sensitization seminars and workshops.

Among the dominant Muslim population, boys are circumcised as a matter of course although there is nothing in Islamic scripture that requires the practice.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Bit by bit, new discoveries force archaeologists to reexamine their assumptions about the antiquity of African cultures and the development of various technologies. In 1987 a Fulani herdsman found a dugout canoe made of African mahogany in the village of Dufuna in northeastern Nigeria. Although information on the period when it was made is skimpy, several radio-carbon tests have dated it as belonging to the Later Stone Age, roughly 8000 B.C.E., making it about 10,000 years old. The canoe is not only Africa's oldest boat discovered to date, but also the third oldest in the world. Only boats found in the Netherlands and France are older, but the boat's existence and its fine workmanship, said to be superior to that of the Netherlands canoe, have already required rethinking what is known about African water transport in prehistory. The high quality of the Dufuna canoe—its thin sides and carefully pointed bow and stern—contrasts sharply with the craftsmanship of the canoe from the Netherlands, which has blunt ends and thick sides. The difference in skill indicates that artisans in Africa had been making boats for an extended period of time without the European and Middle Eastern influences previously assumed. The find suggests that the beginnings of water transport in Africa lie even further back in time. Prior to this the oldest boat found in Africa was in Egypt and was determined to be 5,000 years old.

Earlier in the 20th century, in 1928, archaeologists found artifacts—sculptures of people and other animals made of terra cotta—from a culture that apparently flourished for around 700 years, between 500 B.C.E. to 200 C.E., near the village of Nok, which, like Dufuna, is in northeastern Nigeria. What is amazing is that the Nok culture seems to have made a sudden leap from the Stone Age to the Iron Age, skipping the intermediate phase of copper and bronze smelting that so many other cultures went through. The ability to fashion tools and weapons of iron would have given the Nok people a distinct advantage over their neighbors.

Subsequently other inhabitants including the Kanuri, Hausa, and Fulani migrated to Nigeria. The Kanem-Bornu Empire, situated near Lake Chad, controlled northern Nigeria for over 600 years, flourishing as the intermediary in north-south trade between the Berbers of North Africa and the forest people to the south. To the southwest the Ife and Oyo kingdoms and Benin in the south—perhaps better known for their artistic accomplishments with ivory, wood, bronze, and brass—also evolved complex political systems over the course of the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries. In the southeast, the heavily populated village networks of the Igbo and other egalitarian cultures (like the Ibibio) were organized around indigenous African democratic ideas. Although the artwork discovered in this area remains among the oldest yet found in West Africa, the Igbo-Ukwu bronze sculptures are among the most renowned for their beauty and detail.

Beginning in the 17th century European traders began to settle in coastal ports in order to take advantage of the increasing traffic in slaves headed for the Americas, but by the mid-19th century trade in commodities was replacing the slave trade. Although Islam had been introduced into Nigeria in the 13th century, by the early 19th century Usman dan Fodio (1754–1817), a Fulani Muslim writer, had succeeded in bringing much of the northern region of Nigeria under his Islamic empire, headquartered in Sokoto.

The Niger River, the closest major river and source of water to the Sahara Desert, was strategically positioned along the Saharan trade route and therefore the focal point of trade in the Western Sahara. Sir George Taubman Goldie (1846–1925), a British administrator, wanted to bring the lucrative trade route of the lower and middle regions of the river under British control. With this in mind, he brought chartered companies into the region that negotiated some 400 separate treaties with the local chiefs and conducted trade with them. In 1879 he formed the United African Company, which merged British commercial interests into one company. Around the same time, French traders had firmly established themselves in the lower regions of the Niger, with the result that there was constant conflict between the French and British traders as each sought to establish dominance over the region.

In 1886 the British government chartered the Royal Niger Company, with Goldie at its head. In 1900 the company's territory came under the control of the British government, which moved to consolidate its position in modern Nigeria; both northern and southern Nigeria became British protectorates in 1901 and were combined in 1914 as the Colony and Protectorate of Nigeria. However, Nigeria remained divided administratively. Western education and the development of a modern economy proceeded more rapidly in the south than in the north, with consequences felt in Nigeria's political life ever since.

In response to the growth of Nigerian nationalism following World War II, the British moved the colony toward self-government on a federal basis. After it gained independence in 1960, Nigeria became a member of the Commonwealth of Nations and the United Nations (UN), but independence did not bring peace to the country. From the start its ethnic, regional, and religious differences were magnified and aggravated by the disparities in economic and educational development between the south and the north. Its political parties reflected the makeup of the three dominant ethnic groups: The Nigerian People's Congress (NPC) represented conservative, Muslim, largely Hausa interests, and controlled the northern region; the National Convention of Nigerian Citizens (NCNC) was Igbo- and Christian-dominated, and was in control of the eastern region; and the leftist Action Group (AG) controlled the Yoruba west.

Conflicts among Nigeria's 250 ethnic groups led to riots in 1966. The military leaders of the Igbo (an eastern ethnic group) took control of Nigeria by assassinating the federal prime minister and the premiers of the northern and western regions. But the military government failed to soothe ethnic tensions or formulate a constitution capable of uniting the rest of the country. Its failures led to another coup by primarily northern officers in July of that year, which established the leadership of Maj. Gen. Yakubu Gowon (b. 1934). The massacre of thousands of Igbo in the north prompted hundreds of thousands of them to flee back to the southeast, where strong Igbo secessionist sentiment began to develop.

As coup followed coup without significant improvement in Nigeria's situation, in May 1967, the military governor of the eastern region, who had emerged as the leader of increasing Igbo secessionist sentiment, declared the independence of the eastern region as the Republic of Biafra. Civil war broke out and continued until January early 1970, ending in Biafra's defeat.

With the civil war over, reconciliation was rapid and effective, and Nigerians turned to improving their economic situation. The rapid increase in oil prices in 1973–74 helped greatly with this project, and the country's foreign exchange earnings and revenues increased.

In 1975 in yet another coup, a Muslim military officer Muritala Rufai Mohammed (1938–76) came to power, accusing the government of corruption and delaying the promised return to civilian rule. Gen. Mohammed announced a timetable for the resumption of civilian rule by October 1, 1979, but he was assassinated on February 13, 1976, in an aborted coup. His chief of staff became head of state and adhered meticulously to the schedule for return to civilian rule, streamlining and updating the military and using oil revenues to diversify Nigeria's economy. In 1978 a new constitution was published and the Second Republic was born.

The military leadership was interrupted in 1979 when Alhaji Shehu Shagari (b. 1925) was elected president. Under his leadership the Nigerian economy boomed, mainly because of oil revenues. Beginning in December 1983 when the Supreme Military Council (SMC), under the leadership of Maj. Gen. Muhammadu Buhari ousted the democratically elected government of Alhaji Shehu Shagari, the leader of the National Party of Nigeria, the country was plunged into chaos by ambitious military leaders who wanted to rule the country. Buhari was ousted by Army Chief of Staff Maj. Gen. Ibrahim Babangida in August 1985. However, the change of leadership failed to improve the country’s economic problems. Moreover, there were widespread human rights violations and, with a deepening economic crisis, growing discontent among the people. Babangida promised that he would restore democracy and even conducted farce elections.

Through fraud and rigging of ballots, he managed to retain his hold on the country. However, with growing protests against his regime, he was forced to step down as president in favor of Ernest Shonekan, a nonpartisan businessman, who would be the caretaker president of the country until fresh elections could be held in February 1994.

With the country sliding into chaos, Defense Minister Sani Abacha (1943–98) seized power and forced Shonekan’s “resignation” late in 1993.

Promising to yield to civilian control eventually, Abacha proceeded to dissolve all democratic political institutions and to replace elected officials with military officers.

Although many initially welcomed Abacha’s takeover, their disenchantment rapidly intensified. Abacha’s reign was also marked by human rights violations and widespread protests led by opposition leaders. Voices of protest against his government were brutally crushed and opposition party leaders imprisoned. His autocratic rule led to mass rioting in the country.

In June 1994 another businessman (who had previously been elected president in the 1993 elections M. K. O. Abiola [? 1937–98]) went into hiding after declaring himself president. When he reemerged, he was promptly arrested. With Abiola in prison, petroleum workers called a strike, demanding his release, bringing economic activity in the southwest to a standstill. Although the union workers returned to work after several labor leaders were arrested, Abacha had his opponents arrested and suppressed all dissent.

Late in 1994 the government established a special tribunal to try those accused of killing four prominent politicians; the accused included prominent author and Ogoni activist Ken Saro-Wiwa (1941–95) and eight others. Although all pled not guilty to the charges, they were hanged on November 10. Throughout his regime, Abacha’s government used the nation’s security forces to commit similar human rights abuses including restricting freedom of speech, press, assembly, association, and travel; allowing violence and discrimination against women; and perpetuating female genital mutilation (FGM).

Abacha, expected by many to succeed himself as a civilian president in 1998, died of heart failure in June of that year. Gen. Abdulsalami Abubakar (b. 1942) succeeded him. Under Abubakar, a new constitution was adopted in 1999 and a peaceful transition to civilian government was completed when Yoruban general Olusegun Obasanjo (b. 1937) was elected president.

After 16 years of coups and military rule, Nigeria must still cope with the legacies of corruption, mismanagement, and an underperforming economy. Nevertheless, it is still considered a local superpower in West Africa, and oil remains the biggest asset for its economy. Poverty still reigns in the country, which is also afflicted with ethnic and religious conflict. Religious clashes between fundamentalist Muslims and Christians have resulted in violence. Despite some irregularities, in April 2003 Nigerian elections represented the first successful civilian transfer of power in the country’s history.

Saro-Wiwa

Saro-Wiwa (1941–95) was a Nigerian playwright and novelist who was hanged by the Nigerian government after he protested against corruption among government officials. Saro-Wiwa was best known for his television programs, satirical novels, children’s stories, and plays. He was imprisoned in 1994 when he protested against Sani Abacha (1943–98). He played a major role in defending the rights of the Ogoni people and opposed the government’s oil policy with Royal Dutch/Shell. He was hanged in public on November 10, 1995, with eight other dissidents. This event was widely condemned by the international community.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Nigeria, whose name is derived from the Niger River, has the largest population in the whole of Africa. Situated on the Gulf of Guinea, it lies in West Africa with Benin, Niger, Cameroon, and Chad as its neighbors. The Niger flows through western Nigeria into the Gulf of Guinea. The southern coast of Nigeria is covered with swamps and mangrove forests, while the hinterland comprises hardwood forests. The country has two different climatic zones. The coastal region has high humidity and heavy rainfall, while dry and dusty winds from the Sahara envelop the northern region. The temperature and amount of rainfall vary with the seasons.

Yoruba Festivals

Although Christianity and Islam now overshadow the ancient indigenous religions, the Yoruba continue to observe the festivals of their ancestors. Yoruban festivals are held primarily to honor the pantheon of gods and mark the installation of a new oba. The obas are the leaders of the Yoruba. Most still live in palaces, but they were once more powerful and governed with the help and advice of a council. Today the position is mainly honorary, and the oba's most significant function is overseeing festival observances.

The Eyo Festival occurs only in the Lagos area and on Eyo Day the main highway that passes through the heart of the city is closed to traffic so that the long procession can proceed without hindrance. The festival is held whenever the occasion or tradition demands, but it is usually held as the final burial rite for a highly regarded chief, a time when the people all pay homage to the oba of Lagos.

The Engungun (pronounced en-GOON-gun) Festival, which honors the ancestors, lasts 24 days. Each day a different engungun (in the person of a masked dancer) dances through the town, possessed by one of the ancestors. On the last day a priest goes to the shrine of the ancestors and sacrifices animals, then pours their blood on the shrine. The sacrifices are gathered up, because they will provide the meat for the feast that follows.

The Shango, or Sango, Festival celebrates the god of thunder, an ancestor who is said to have hanged himself. This festival goes on for almost three weeks, and many sacrifices are made at Shango's shrine, located in the compound of the hereditary priest. On the last day people believe that Shango possesses the priest and gives him magical powers enabling him to eat fire and swallow gunpowder without harming himself. The Festival concludes with a long procession that wends its way to the oba's palace. Then a grand feast begins, accompanied by palm wine, roast meat, and dancing.

In earlier days, Shango's priest would have been a very rich and powerful man. But times have changed. The power of the obas has declined, and many people have abandoned worship of their ancestral gods, leaving the priests of the Yoruba much poorer and less powerful than they used to be.

ECONOMY

Although Nigeria has large oil reserves, internal conflicts and political instability have severely affected its economy. The oil sector is the only positive aspect of Nigeria's economy. It provides 20 percent of gross domestic product (GDP), 95 percent of foreign exchange returns, and approximately 65 percent of budgetary revenues. The large agricultural sector has not been able to keep up with the rapidly growing population, and Nigeria now has to import food.

In recent years the Nigerian government has tried to reform the economy. In 2000 the Paris Club (a financial institution based in Paris that gives credit to underdeveloped countries, especially those that are under military rule) gave Nigeria a debt-restructuring deal and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) provided a $1 billion credit for economic reforms. In 2002 Nigeria had a 3 percent growth in foreign investment in oil production, but the government has failed to implement practices suggested by the IMF as imperative for market-oriented growth. These include: renovation of the banking system, restraining inflation by resisting unnecessary wage demands, and resolving internal conflicts focused on how returns from the oil industry are to be shared.

LIFESTYLE AND CULTURE

There are more than 250 ethnic groups in Nigeria, but the three prominent ones are: the Hausa (northern Nigeria), the Igbo (eastern Nigeria), and the Yoruba (western Nigeria). While Muslims dominate the northern region, Catholics and animists dominate the east and the west, respectively. Nigeria's population also includes innumerable smaller sects that are a mixture of two or more religions.

Many Nigerians practice animism. They believe that ancestral spirits play a role in conserving their land and taking care of them. They perform many sacrificial ceremonies to contact the spirits of dead people, which make use of animal skulls, dried insects, and other materials considered sacred. They also use charms such as ibej or twin dolls to promote good luck.

Among the musicians of Nigeria Fela Kuti (1938–97) was the most famous until his death. He was globally renowned for his eclectic fusion of Yoruba call-and-response chanting with jazz, called Afrobeat. Some of the other popular musicians of Nigeria are King Sunny Ade (b. 1946), Sonny Okosun, and Sade (b. 1959). Nigeria, known for its writers more than any other African nation, has produced writers of high caliber such as Wole Soyinka (b. 1934; 1986 winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature), Chinua Achebe (b. 1930), and Ben Okri (b. 1959).

Fun Fact

Many people think that the spectacular modern Carnival celebrations held in Brazil and other Catholic countries originated in the Eyo Festival.

Yoruba

The Yoruba are a Sudanic-speaking people of southwest Nigeria. They once ruled the kingdom of Oyo, but they scattered after Nigeria became a colony of Britain.

Nigerians began making exceptional masterpieces of woodcarving and bronze casting as early as the 13th century. The Yoruba are especially famous for their trade and craftwork.

The Yoruba have a history of being town dwellers, and they remain so. In modern Nigeria they constitute about 21 percent of the total population.

Like many other Nigerian ethnic groups, a majority of Yoruba adhere to the Christian faith, while a minority follow Islam or traditional beliefs. However, Yoruba spirituality is animistic, and the people worship several gods.

CUISINE

Nigerians usually consume a variety of grains in their food. South Nigerians commonly prepare peppery stews, while North Nigerians thrive on grains and beef. Tuwo, a stew made from corn, rice, or millet, is very popular among Nigerians. Other popular stews are egusi and isi-ewu. Nigerians like to have fried yam chips, meat pastries, and fried plantain for snacks. They also enjoy drinking palm wine, fermented sap extracted from palm trees.

The Yoruba are said to produce the most esteemed writers of Nigeria.

Boxing Day is a British custom started during the Middle Ages when servants and peasants were given Christmas gifts the day after Christmas. On this day church boxes used for collecting money for the poor are opened, which is believed to be the reason for the name Boxing Day. In addition, gifts are given to those who render service to the community throughout the year.

Because Nigeria is a former British colony and a member of the Commonwealth group of nations, Boxing Day celebrations are a part of the festive season that begins at Christmas. The Commonwealth of Nations is an association of independent nations, most of which are former colonies of the British Empire. They share some common cultural links as a result of British colonial influence, and Boxing Day is one of them. No special celebrations take place on Boxing Day in Nigeria. It is a holiday spent either picnicking on beaches or staying at home.

December 26 is also celebrated by Christians as the feast day of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr.

The Muslim festival of Eid al-Adha, also called Eid al-Kabir, commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim (Abraham) in Allah. Muslims believe that God visited Ibrahim in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his most valued possession, his son. When Ibrahim told his son about the dream, the boy asked his father to follow God's command. However, as Ibrahim was about to perform the sacrifice, he was surprised to find a ram on the altar instead of his son.

Nigerian Muslims offer the customary morning prayers in their local mosques and then exchange gifts and greetings. To commemorate Ibrahim's sacrifice, goats are sacrificed, and the meat is distributed among family, friends, and the poor. Special celebrations include the Durbar Festival of martial skills and music.

❁ DURBAR FESTIVAL

Observed in: Nigeria

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Dhu al-Hijjah and Shawwal

The Durbar festival is an integral part of two important Muslim celebrations in Nigeria—Eid al-Adha and Eid al-Fitr—and its roots can be traced back to the glorious period of the emirate when the region was largely untouched by Western influence. During those times various regiments of the army used to meet for the Durbar once or twice a year. The Durbar was a military parade hosted by the military chiefs for the emir (king) and chiefs. In the Durbar the regiments displayed their prowess with swords and horsemanship skills. Today, Durbar festivals are part of celebrations honoring visiting heads of states or the Islamic festivals of Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Kabir. The modern-day Durbar festival includes a traditional colorful parade whose participants include flamboyantly dressed horsemen, wrestlers, emirs (kings) in their ceremonial dresses, and lute-playing musicians.

After offering the morning prayers, the Fulani Hausa horsemen lead a procession to the public square in front of the palace of the emir. Every village group is assigned a place in the public square, and they take their positions before the emir arrives. Then as the emir appears, the horsemen gallop toward him with their swords drawn and salute him. The emir and other village chiefs then retire to the palace while dancing, drumming, and dining continue throughout the day and into the night.

❁ BIRTH

After the birth of a child, Nigerians wait for the baby to be pronounced healthy before they start celebrating and feasting. The names for babies are selected on the basis of the context in which they were born. For example, if a child is born during rains, his or her name would be associated with rain. Most Nigerian names have a clear and definite meaning. The child may also be named after his or her ancestors. The naming ceremony is held anywhere from three days to a week following birth.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Female genital mutilation (FGM) is a widespread initiation practice throughout Nigeria and among all ethnic and religious groups. No Nigerian law specifically prohibits FGM. The National Association of Nigerian Nurses and Midwives (NANNM) has been active in the fight against FGM, and nurses and pediatricians have campaigned throughout the country, conducting educational activities at the state and community levels.

Among the Muslim population, boys are circumcised as a matter of course although there is nothing in Islamic scripture that requires the practice.

❁ MARRIAGE

Modern-day weddings in Nigeria have been influenced by Western traditions. The bride dresses in a white gown, while the groom wears a suit, and the ceremony is held in a church. For receptions held after weddings, the newlyweds wear traditional dress and savor the traditional dishes of Nigeria. Both U.S. and Nigerian music can be heard playing in the background.

Before the wedding ceremony the groom's family visits the bride's family to ask for her hand. The bride's family prepares for the visit and welcomes the groom's family. Both families wear traditional dress. When the groom's family enters the house, his father prostrates himself before the bride's parents, while the groom's mother kneels.

Before a wedding, the bride is looked after in a "fattening room," where she is provided with plenty of food to make her gain weight. She is also given lessons on how to be a good wife. Before she goes to her husband, the bride is bathed. According to tradition the bride arrives at the groom's house before he does. When he gets there, she washes his feet and welcomes him. After the wedding she washes her own feet before she goes to her husband. After the couple's marriage, the bride lives in the groom's house.

According to Yoruban culture, both the bride and groom are supposed to be virgins on their wedding night, unless the groom has been married before.

Nigerian Muslims observe Islamic traditions: The free consent of the bride and groom is essential, and parents cannot force their children into marriage. On the day of the ceremony the imam meets the bride and groom in separate ceremonies and asks them if they willingly agree to marry each other. If both answer “yes,” he signs the marriage certificate, and the marriage is considered official. The amount of meber, or dowry, to be paid to the bride is specified in the certificate. In case of divorce the amount of meber should be paid to the bride and her family. Feasting and celebrations follow but, unlike Christian weddings, no wine or any kind of alcohol is served because drinking alcohol is prohibited in Islam.

Introduction

🌸 HISTORY

Toward the end of the last Ice Age, about 10,000 years ago, hunters and gatherers settled in Norway. Evidence amassed from archaeological excavations attest to continuous human habitation as the glaciers withdrew. More than 100,000 items from the Stone, Bronze, and Iron Ages, the oldest dated to 9000 B.C.E., have been found in southern Norway, including 12 fireplaces from the early part of the last post-glacial period. In north-central Norway Norwegian archaeologists made a rare discovery: bone fragments from a child who must have lived in the area around 6,000 years ago.

Ancient settlements in the region have been excavated, and several thousand items have been recorded. In Finnmark, a county where many of the Sami live, the foundations of an ancient longhouse, believed to be 4,000 years old, could have housed 10 to 12 people. The longhouse had two fireplaces and other artifacts, including flint knives, axes, and daggers.

The seafarers who emerged from these ancient groups, popularly known as Vikings, also resided in Denmark and Sweden, and were the first Europeans known to have crossed the Atlantic Ocean, and the period from 800–1050 C.E. has been romanticized as the “Viking Age” since the 18th century. However, a majority of Scandinavians were farmers, not pirates. Harald Fairhair, or Finehair (c. 850–c. 933), is credited with unifying Norway during this period.

Oslo, the capital of Norway, flourished as a power hub in the first half of the 14th century, but the Black Death and other plagues in the latter half of the 14th century resulted in the loss of many lives and economic deterioration. As a result the country went through a severe economic depression. To improve its situation Norway entered into a union with Denmark in 1397. Danish governors ruled Norway for the next four centuries.

During the Napoleonic wars in 1814 Denmark-Norway was defeated and lost to Sweden, which then took control of

Fjords

Fjords are glacial valleys, usually narrow and steep sided, extending below sea level and filled with saltwater. A fjord is formed when a glacier retreats, forming a U-shaped valley. The sea fills in the resulting valley floor. Fjords are excellent natural harbors and benefit Norway's fishing and shipbuilding industries. They also provide breathtaking scenery with deep canyons covered in greenery.

Some of the world's largest coral reefs are also found among Norway's fjords. The marine life there is spectacular and memorable. There are thousands of types of plankton, coral, fish, and sharks. Most life forms found there are equipped to live under the great water pressure and total darkness of the deep sea. Researchers are still studying this area for new forms of marine biology. The Sognefjorden (Sogne Fjord) is Norway's longest and deepest fjord; it extends 120 miles inland and reaches 4,291 feet below sea level.

Norway under the Treaty of Kiel, signed on January 14. Throughout the 19th century, nationalism grew in Norway, and relations between Sweden and Norway became increasingly strained. Eventually in 1905, Norway declared its independence and was free of Swedish rule.

Norway tried to remain neutral during both world wars, but the government yielded to pressure from Britain during World War I, and the Norwegian fleet assisted Britain by delivering essential supplies. In return Britain supplied coal to Norway, which became known as the "Neutral Ally." During World War II, despite Norway's neutral position, Germany launched a surprise attack on Oslo and some major Norwegian ports on April 9, 1940, and nearly the entire country was soon under German control. The naval fleet of Norway continued to assist the Allies throughout the war. German troops

Aurora Borealis

The aurora borealis is an optical phenomenon seen in the northern polar region at night. Auroras, also called northern lights, are celestial displays of streaks of light sometimes accompanied by light sparkling sounds. They occur due to the effects of the solar wind (streams of ions flowing out from the Sun) on the Earth's atmosphere. Sometimes the intensity of the light produced is so high that one can read a book at night without additional lighting. This phenomenon, first noted by Galileo (1564–1642), has been listed as one of the seven wonders of the natural world.

stayed in Norway until the war ended in May 1945. By the end of the war nearly half of the Norwegian fleet had been destroyed. Norway was counted as one of the victorious nations in World War II and was one of the founding members of the United Nations (UN), and the UN's first secretary-general was a Norwegian Trygve Halvdan Lie (1896–1968).

In 1949 Norway became a member of NATO. In 1960 Norway joined the European Free Trade Association. Norway has not joined the European Union (EU), though the country enjoys a concession according to which it has been granted some trading privileges.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Norway is one of the three countries that occupy the Scandinavian Peninsula, along with Sweden and Finland. Norway shares international borders with Russia, Sweden, and Finland, and it is a close neighbor of Denmark, situated across the straits that connect the North Sea and the Baltic Sea. The country has one of the world's longest coastlines with maritime borders with the North Sea, the Atlantic Ocean, and the Norwegian Sea.

Norway has a generally rugged terrain, with Galdhopiggen (8,100 feet) in the Jotenheimen Mountains being the highest point in the country. The landscape is punctuated with rivers and lakes, the River Glama being Norway's longest. Most of northern Norway lies above the Arctic Circle and is covered in ice for the greater part of the year. The rough coastlines are often glaciated, and there are 5,000 islands away from the mainland of Norway. The most outstanding feature of the Norwegian coastlines is its beautiful fjords.

Most of the Norwegian land is forested, and only 3 percent is arable. These forests are home to reindeer, wolves, musk oxen, and lemmings. A wide variety of fish and whales are also found in the surrounding seas. Commercial fishing and whaling provide substantial contributions to the Norwegian economy. The southern areas of Norway are low-lying lands with warm summers and cold winters, where daytime temperatures can reach 72°F. The farther north one goes, the colder it gets, and the far northern regions of Norway experience subarctic temperatures. Winters are harsh, and summers are not uncomfortably warm. Norway, like other Scandinavian countries, experiences the unique phenomenon of the midnight Sun. During summer months the Sun does not dip very far below the horizon, and it is still sunny at 11 p.m.

ECONOMY

Norway enjoys a prosperous free-market economy. The people are known to have a high quality of life, and the crime rate is among the lowest in the world. Crude oil and fisheries are the major contributors to the Norwegian economy. The country ranks third in worldwide oil production, behind only Saudi Arabia and Russia. Norway enjoys good trade relations with neighboring European nations including the EU members, in spite of its not being a member of the organization. The country is rich in natural resources, such as petroleum, hydropower, fish, forests, and minerals. The major industries here comprise oil, natural gas, computers, high technology, fishing, forestry, shipping and shipbuilding, and paper production.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Norway adheres staunchly to its many cultural traditions. This is evident in the many festivals and cultural events. Traditional folk dance forms and songs, along with storytelling, are always popular. Both men and women wear a traditional outfit called a bunad, a typically rural costume worn for special occasions and weddings. The men's bunad consists of a white silk shirt, short pants, stockings, a vest, and topcoat, and is covered with colorful designs. The women's bunads are more varied, and the embroidered designs are typically elaborate, with scarves, shawls, and handmade silver or gold jewelry accessories. Sunglasses or common jewelry are never worn with the bunad. The designs on bunads are unique and distinctive to different districts of Norway, and it is thought there may be as many as 200 different bunads. Even the jewelry should be related to the district, unless inherited from family in another district.

The country has been home to talented artists, such as the painter Edvard Munch (1863–1944), composer Edvard Grieg (1843–1907), sculptor Gustav Vigeland (1869–1943), author Knut Hamsun (1859–1952), and playwright Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906).

The Sami are the indigenous people of Norway. They were traditionally nomadic and lived in the northern mountainous region of Norway, herding reindeer, hunting, and fishing. Today the Sami live in the county of Finnmark and have their own parliament.

The people of Norway are predominantly Christian. Before the advent of Christianity, Norse mythology formed the basis of the country's belief system.

CUISINE

Norwegian cuisine is known for its wide variety of fish dishes. Salmon, trout, cod, monkfish, and halibut are just a few kinds of fish consumed available. Herring, shrimp, and shellfish are also very popular. Norwegians also eat meat of reindeer, moose, and red deer. A special variety of goat's milk cheese known as brunost is unique to this country and is served with almost every meal.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. The earliest origins of May Day celebration are ascribed to the pagan festivals that were held by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, but its modern political observance owes to a history of worker indignation over the abuses of capital in the Industrial Age and early-20th century.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the prediction of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature for a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist: a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

In Norway churches conduct special prayer services. The priest, while celebrating Mass, washes the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did. The mood is somber and the faithful pray on this day.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also known as Mourning Friday, Black Friday, and Holy Friday, falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to remember the Crucifixion of Jesus. Some Norwegians observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent), for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. In Norway Christians perform a ritual called the Stations of the Cross, a reenactment of Jesus' final journey to Calvary. This is a day of fasting and abstinence in Norway.

HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). Christians also regard it as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

On Easter in Norway, the entire family gathers to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection. Norwegians often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Children decorate eggs with colorful strips of paper and candies. (Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.) Many Norwegians go for skiing holidays during the Easter holidays. Feasting and exchanging greetings and Easter eggs continue even on the next day Easter Monday.

ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Lent

Ascension Day is a day of special celebration for Lutherans in Norway because it celebrates Jesus' Ascension to heaven 40 days after his Resurrection on Easter. Norwegians celebrate this day with special prayer services in churches, and singing contests are held in many villages.

PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Lent

Both Pentecost Sunday and Monday, also called Whitsunday and Whitmonday, are a celebration of Pentecost, which in Greek means the "fiftieth day." Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter and celebrates the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus' Apostles. Whitsunday is so called from the white garments worn by those who were baptized during the Easter vigil service. On these days Norwegians attend special church services.

ST. OLAV'S DAY

Observed by: Lutherans

Observed on: July 29

Olav Haraldson was a Viking pagan prince who converted to Christianity. During his rule he led the people of Norway into the Christian faith. He died on July 29, 1030. He is venerated as the country's patron saint. To honor him, the people of Norway commemorate the date of his death and special church services are held all over the country. In open-air pageants chapters out of the saint's life are also performed.

Fun Fact

Fun Fact

The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, "command," because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist. It is the first word spoken by Jesus before he began washing the feet of his disciples, saying: "Mandatum novum do vobis" which means "a new commandment I give to you."

 CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world because it marks the birth of Jesus, believed by Christians to be their messiah. In Norway, celebrations begin weeks before Christmas. As early as November pigs and calves are slaughtered, and the preparation of the meat begins because no animals can be killed during the Christmas Peace in December. A special dish of lutefisk, or Christmas cod, is a specialty of this season. Sweets, gingerbread, and fancy animal-shaped cookies are made for Christmas. These items are often used to decorate the Christmas tree.

In Norway Christmas celebrations officially begin when the church bells ring at four in the evening on Christmas Eve (December 24). The entire family gathers to prepare the molje, a broth of Christmas meats. This broth is served with wafer-thin Norwegian bread. The people wear colorful traditional costumes on this day, and wish each other “Christmas peace.”

Norwegians attend church services and prepare an elaborate feast for their Christmas Eve supper. A special rice porridge, risengrynsgrøt, is prepared with a single almond in it. This porridge is served during the feast. It is said that the person who finds the almond will be lucky and the first one to marry. After dinner the Christmas tree, normally decorated away from the sight of children, is revealed to the entire family. The head of the family reads portions of the New Testament, and all of them join hands and circle the tree singing carols. Children open gifts that they have received from Julenisse, the Norwegian equivalent of Santa Claus.

The second day of Christmas is traditionally known as St. Stephen’s Day (called Boxing Day in some English-speaking countries) in Norway. In the olden days contests of horse racing on icy roads were held on this day. Nowadays workplaces host Christmas parties for their employees on St. Stephen’s

The Norwegian groom dresses in a splendid traditional costume called a bunad. The bride is normally dressed in white or silver, and also wears a crown with special spoon-shaped danglers hanging from it. These danglers are believed to keep away evil spirits. Often the bridesmaids and the bride dress in similar, but not identical, costumes. This is done so as to confuse any evil spirits who may try to harm the bride.

The wedding ceremony normally takes place in a church, and vows and rings are exchanged. The prayer service is followed by a lavish reception, and the guests and family members offer their good wishes and blessings on this occasion. Music and dancing are integral parts of Norwegian wedding parties. A special wedding cake, known as brudlaupskling, made of bread and topped with cheese and cream, is cut by the couple. At the end of the function, the couple plant two fir trees in front of their house to symbolize their future children.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Located on the Arabian Peninsula, Oman has always been a strategic trade center in the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean because of its location. Archaeological evidence suggests that civilization existed in Oman as early as the third millennium B.C.E. The Sumerians referred to the region of Oman as Magan, and it was known for its copper resources. Migrants from Yemen and northern Arabia came and settled in the region.

Around 563 B.C.E. northern Oman became integrated with the Achaemenid Persian Empire and Southern Oman flourished because of its gum trees. The country prospered until the sixth century C.E. In the seventh century Oman adopted Islam, and a form of that religion called Ibadhism became the country's dominant religion. In the middle of the eighth century tribes from northern Oman entered Arabia and conquered Medina. However, they were suppressed and overthrown by the Abbasid Dynasty. Nevertheless Oman managed to remain relatively free of Abbasid control, and the Ibadhi imamate (a country ruled by an imam) survived until well into the 20th century.

In 1507 the Portuguese invaded Oman and conquered the coastal regions, including the city of Muscat, from which they eventually were driven in 1650. By the dawn of the 18th century, Oman had established naval control of the Indian Ocean. In 1741, when the present line of sultans began with Ahmed ibn Said of Yemen. The present royal family is descended from bin Said.

By the end of the 18th century Oman was a large empire under Sultan Said bin Sultan (1790–1856). It controlled African Zanzibar, the southern coast of Iran, and the area between Pakistan and Iran. It was the most powerful country of Arabia. However, when the sultan's sons split the empire, Oman's prosperity began to stagnate, and a succession of sultans came to power; but they did little to change the country's feudal structure or the country's isolation from other parts of the world.

Ibadhism

Ibadhism is a form of Islam quite distinct from the Shia or the Sunni sects. It was founded by Jabir bin Zaid Al-Azdi from Nizwa in Oman. Ibadhism is practiced in Oman, East Africa, the Mzab valley of Algeria, the Nafus mountains of Libya, and the island of Jerba in Tunisia. Ibadhi Muslims are regarded as moderately conservative. Unlike other sects of Islam, they do not believe in the qunut, in which enemies are cursed while praying.

In 1970 Sultan Qaboos bin Said (b. 1940) ousted his father Said Bin Taimur (1910–72) and seized power. One of the first things he did was to rescind many of his father's harsher laws. Since then Oman's economy has entered a new phase of modernization and an era of prosperity. Roads, hospitals, and schools have been built and the tourism industry is being promoted.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Sultanate of Oman is situated in the eastern corner of the Arabian Peninsula and shares borders with the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen to the southwest. The geographical features of this country include coastlines, beaches, mountains, salt marshes, oases, and deserts. The northern coastal area lies along the Gulf of Oman. This region is separated from the rest of the country by the Hajar Mountains. The highest peak of Oman, Jebel Akhdar (9,775 feet), is situated in these mountains. There are two regions in Oman that are covered with salt marshes. The largest desert in Oman is in the west, extending into Saudi Arabia. It is called the Rub Al Khali (Empty Quarter). This desert is one of the least explored regions in the world.

The Sultanate of Oman has made concerted efforts to increase the greenery in this region. The Omani government spends huge sums of money for this purpose. Grasses, shrubs, and trees like acacia

Umm al Samim

The Umm al Samim (which means “mother of poisons” or “mother of worries”) is a famous salt marsh area in Oman. A salt marsh is a coastal grassland that is frequently covered by rising tides. These marshes are found in places where rivers flow into the ocean. Because the water flow is very slow, sedimentation builds up a muddy environment where plants and small animals thrive.

The Al Samim looks solid and crusty but can break easily, so it is considered dangerous. Sir Wilfred Thesiger, the explorer, was the first European to see Umm al Samim in the 1940s.

grow naturally in Oman. Grapes, apricots, and coconut palms are cultivated in the mountainous regions. The north of Oman is well known for its frankincense trees.

The animal life of Oman consists of a fascinating variety of species. The Arabian oryx (a white antelope found in Arabian deserts), giant sea turtles, Arabian tahr (a wild goat), Arabian wolf, leopard, striped hyena, and the sooty falcon are some of the animals found in this region. Oman boasts rich fishing grounds where tuna and sardines are the main varieties found. Goats, sheep, camels, and cattle are reared in Oman. Several species of birds, lizards, snakes, and scorpions are also found in this country.

The coastal areas of Oman are hot and humid in the summer, whereas the interior regions are hot and dry. Rainfall is scanty, although the southern region is known to experience heavy monsoons from June to September. The temperature is slightly lower in the higher altitudes of Oman.

ECONOMY

The Sultanate of Oman boasts a flourishing economy due to the crude oil reserves found in its deserts. The oil industry mushroomed in this region over the past 25 years, generating large-scale employment and improving the general quality of life. Petroleum and petroleum products account for 90 percent of export revenues and are also major contributors to the gross domestic product (GDP). Agricultural activities are carried out at a subsistence level throughout the country.

Oman may not be as rich as the other Middle Eastern nations, but the country enjoys a substantial trade surplus and low inflation rates. The Omani government aims to increase employment for the local population and to decrease its dependence on foreign nationals. The government encourages the replacement of expatriate workers with local people, a process known as “omanization.” Training in specialized skills, business management, and the English language has been undertaken to support these objectives.

The people of Oman lead a conservative and traditional lifestyle, even though the nation exudes a cosmopolitan air. Day-to-day life has not changed significantly for centuries. Most Omanis still wear their traditional dresses on a daily basis. The men wear loose shirt-dresses known as dishdashas, while the women wear bright, colorful loose dresses and shawls. The black veil is not compulsory for women in Oman.

The use of perfumes and jewelry is common among Omani men and women, to demonstrate a good quality of life. Heavy gold rings and bangles almost always adorn the henna-dyed hands of Omani women. They enjoy comparatively more freedom than their other Arab counterparts. Most women in the cities are educated and are employed.

Oman is noted for its traditional craftsmanship in shipbuilding and metalworking. Omani craftspeople produce fine silver jewelry and beautiful ornamental daggers called khanjars. These curved knives are a part of the well-dressed Omani male's wardrobe. Omani architecture reflects Persian and Indian influences. This is evident in the mosques built in the region.

Omani literature, music, and dance are well known. Even though the conservative Ibadhi sect of Islam has limited musical expression, the music of this region puts a strong emphasis on rhythm and relies heavily on stringed instruments. Traditional Arab stringed instruments, such as the tanbura and oud are indispensable to the country's music.

❁ CUISINE

Omani cuisine is a blend of flavors from different parts of the Middle East, Africa, and the Far East. The cuisine stands out for its liberal use of a variety of spices, such as cinnamon, cardamom, cloves, black pepper, onion, ginger, garlic, and lime. Dishes made of meat and fish may be preferred over completely vegetarian dishes. Indian-style curry is a favorite among Omanis. Smoked kebabs, barbecued, grilled, or curried meats, chicken, fish, and rice are the mainstays of Omani cuisine. At the same time green leafy vegetables and lentils are not totally avoided. Omanis love to eat salads made of fresh vegetables, eggplant, tuna, dried fish, and watercress. A variety of soups are also consumed on a daily basis.

Omanis prepare special dishes for festivals such as Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha. Some of the mouth-watering foods prepared for such observances are ruz al mudbroub, a dish of rice served with fried fish and maqdeed (specially dried meat), sharqiya muqalab (a dish made of tripe and duck-flavored spices), and arisia (lamb cooked with rice). During the holy month of Ramadan, Omanis break their fast (iftar) with sakbanka, a thick sweet soup made of wheat, date molasses, and milk, and fatta (a meat and vegetable dish), along with kbubz rakbal (Omani unleavened bread).

Omani coffee (kabwa) is world renowned. The rich and aromatic kabwa is normally prepared by brewing roasted and ground coffee beans with water and spices. This concoction is served in tiny cups without sugar, along with halvah, a dessert made with sesame seeds or almonds, tahini, and honey.

Frankincense

Frankincense plays an indispensable role in Omani culture and lifestyle. It is the gum of a tree. No special event is complete without the burning of frankincense. Ancient Oman was one of the main centers for producing frankincense. Legend has it that the Queen of Sheba acquired great wealth by trading in frankincense with the Romans and the Greeks.

There are souks (markets) in Oman that sell nothing but frankincense, whereas others stock incense, perfumes, and other traditional Omani goods to cater to local, as well as overseas, needs. The method of preparation of incense and perfumes is kept secret from outsiders. These exotic scents are sought by people throughout the world.

Shuwa

The main dish served during festivals is called shuwa. The preparation of shuwa is a complicated affair in which the entire village may sometimes take part. The first step is to marinate an entire cow or a goat with a variety of dried spices. This meat is then wrapped in leaves and placed inside an underground clay oven. The oven is covered from the top. The meat may be roasted for over 48 hours at a low temperature. Omanis make use of this time to dance, sing, and have a good time.

Eid al-Adha is celebrated on the 10th day of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar; it is also called the Feast of Sacrifice. Like Eid al-Fitr, it is a very important festival for Muslims all over the world because it was on this day that the prophet Ibrahim (Abraham) agreed to sacrifice his young son in order to obey God's command. Muslims believe that God appeared to Ibrahim in a dream and commanded him to sacrifice his son, but just as Ibrahim was about to kill his son, God substituted a ram for the sacrifice.

In Oman this festival is celebrated for four days. A lamb, sheep, or goat is slaughtered, and an elaborate dinner is prepared to be shared with friends, family, and the poor. Special prayer services are conducted in mosques all across the sultanate.

Next the bride is brought inside the wedding tent and seated on a large chair. A traditional dance, accompanied by singing and clapping, will be performed for her. In earlier times this dance was performed by slave women. In the meantime the groom, along with his relatives, gathers inside a tent erected near the groom's house. Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The part of the Indian subcontinent that is now Pakistan was first inhabited by people during the Stone Age. Around 6500 B.C.E. the first farming cultures appeared in south Asia, in the hills of what is now called Balochistan, west of the Indus Valley. The early farmers had domesticated wheat and animals, including cattle. By around 5500 pottery was in use. From this culture's technological base, the Indus Valley civilization developed.

By 4000 B.C.E., a distinctive regional culture, called pre-Harappan, had emerged in this area. Evidence that this culture was involved in far-reaching trade networks is found in artifacts such as beads made of lapis lazuli and other materials that were not available locally. These people had domesticated numerous crops, including peas, sesame seeds, dates, and cotton, and a variety of domestic animals, including the water buffalo, which remain an important element in the region's agriculture.

Several towns of the pre-Indus period (c. 3300–2800 B.C.E.) have been found in Pakistan, one of which is located at Kot Diji in Khairpur, in the country's northern region. Six cultural periods for Kot Diji have been identified, and some scholars have concluded that the Kot-Diji cultural artifacts belong to an early phase of the culture that followed it, the Harappan, or Indus Valley, civilization that flourished from the 25th to the 18th centuries B.C.E. Some linguists believe that the Harappans may have spoken Dravidian because there is a Dravidian substratum to Indo-Aryan dialects.

The Indus Valley Civilization

One of the oldest civilizations in the world was once established in the Indus Valley, and Pakistani history is incomplete without mentioning some of the wonders of those times. The civilization was at its zenith from the third until the second millennium B.C.E., represented most spectacularly by three great city-states: Mohenjodaro (discovered in 1922), Harappa (discovered in 1923), and Kot Diji (discovered recently in Baluchistan).

In 3500 B.C.E. Harappa was only a village, but archaeologists have discovered what is, so far, the earliest known writing, various symbols etched onto jars. No one has been able to decipher the script, so their meaning is unknown, but the symbols resemble what developed into Indus script. The symbols may have indicated the contents of the jar or be signs associated with a deity. In 1998 clay tablets with primitive words inscribed on them were found at the tomb of an Egyptian king, and they have been carbon-dated to 3300–3200, slightly earlier than the primitive writing developed by the Sumerians around 3100.

Mohenjodaro, which means “mound of the dead,” was one of the world’s first urban centers and boasted some of the most spectacular urban features of the ancient world, including a palace, a citadel, a college for priests, brick-walled houses, a sophisticated drainage system, and a state granary.

In 2000 the first wave of Indo-Aryans had arrived in the region and by 1800 the Indus Valley civilization had fragmented, and Mohenjodaro had been abandoned. About 1400 the second wave of Indo-Aryans, who would become dominant, arrived and their language, Sanskrit, spread across northern India and what is now Pakistan. (The language of the first wave, called Dardic, remained in Pakistan’s Pamir Mountains.)

The Indo-Aryans brought with them Sanskrit, the caste system still observed in India (hierarchical social divisions determined by the type of labor performed), and their religion, which became Hinduism. Sanskrit remained in use as the language of the elite until the conquest by the Umayyad Dynasty of Arab Muslims in 712 C.E. The Prakrits, the dialects spoken by the lower classes, were regarded with contempt by those who spoke Sanskrit, but the Prakrits live on in the dialects of modern-day Pakistan, and the elite’s language is dead.

Pakistan marks the farthest region conquered by Alexander the Great in 327. He did not remain long, and soon this area was to become the famous Silk Road that carried trade goods back and forth between India, China, and the Roman Empire. Following Alexander’s death, the Seleucids briefly controlled the region until Chandragupta Maurya (r. 322–298) came to power. Ashoka (r. 273–32) was one of the great proselytizers of Buddhism.

After the overthrow of the last ruler of the Mauryan Dynasty in 185 (thought by some historians to be the greatest empire to control the territory), Demetrius of Bactria (r. c. 200–180) seized the opportunity and established an Indo-Greek kingdom in 184 that lasted nearly two centuries, until around 10 B.C.E. Menander (342–292), one of the most famous of the Greco-Bactrian kings, may have converted to Buddhism. Petty Greek kings ruled into the beginning of the first century. At this time Central Asian tribes conquered the region. The most significant of these was the Kushan tribe of China, thought by some to be related to the Tocharians, another of the Indo-European groups that had migrated east.

The Kushans were merchants (silk traders), practiced Buddhism, and had constructed hundreds of stupas (dome-shaped worship structures) and monasteries by the second century C.E. The capital of their Gandhara Kingdom was Peshawar, and this soon became the holy land of Buddhists as well as an important trading center. The Kushans were followed, over centuries, by the Sassanians, the Gupta Dynasty, the Hephthalites (or White Huns from Central Asia), Turkic, and Hindu Shahi Dynasties. Eventually in 1526 the Mughals invaded the territory and introduced wonderful art forms, sweeping reforms, and their religion, Islam, setting the stage for what would become modern-day Pakistan.

The Mughal rulers increasingly suppressed the Sikhs (an indigenous religious sect), and the Sikhs began to rise up against their oppressors. The late 18th century produced one of the greatest leaders of Punjab, Ranjit Singh (1780–1839; also called the Lion of Punjab/Lahore), who created a unified Sikh kingdom in northern Pakistan-India for the first time. Ranjit Singh’s power threatened the colonial British, however, who were also expanding their territories in Asia. A treaty called the Amritsar Treaty (1809) was put into place, limiting the areas of occupation by both. This was a measure to ensure peace in the area as both were consolidating their positions in Asia. But when Ranjit Singh died in 1839, his successors were no match for the British onslaught. Eventually the Sikh army was defeated in the Anglo-Sikh War in 1845–46, and they lost Kashmir, Baltistan, Ladakh, and Gilgit. The British renamed them the State of Jammu and Kashmir. The Sikh Empire crumbled under British pressure. Soon the British controlled the entire subcontinent, and it was only in the late 19th century that resistance to the British gained any momentum.

The All-India Muslim League was created in 1906 to ensure a Muslim voice in the independence struggle against the British. A group of Muslim exiles based in England coined the term Pakistan, the “Land of the Pure,” which would soon become a demand for a totally Muslim nation. After the British ceded to the pressure for independence from within the Indian colony, the new viceroy Lord Louis Mountbatten (1900–79) declared that independence would become official by June 1948, but only after dividing British India into West Pakistan (now called Pakistan), India, and East Pakistan (which broke off in 1971 to become the Republic of Bangladesh). Although Lord Mountbatten’s role was to facilitate the smooth transfer of power by June 1948, his announcement that the country was to be partitioned was met with mass outrage and violent incidents. The British bungled the partitioning of India so badly that it resulted in the worst riots ever witnessed in the region, perhaps in modern history. Somewhere between one and five million Muslims, Sikhs, Hindus, and others lost their lives as a result, and millions more became refugees in the new Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

The United Nations (UN) tried to declare a ceasefire after Pakistan invaded and occupied a large part of Kashmir (which had voluntarily joined the Indian Union) in 1949. However, it was and remains a bone of contention between India and Pakistan. Muhammad Ali Jinnah (1876–1948) became the first governor-general of Pakistan and was known as their Quaid-e-Azam, or “Great Leader.” Liaquat Ali Khan (1896–1951) became Pakistan’s first prime minister. When Jinnah died in 1948 his friend and associate Liaquat Ali Khan succeeded him. After only three years in office, however, he was assassinated, and numerous military coups followed.

In 1956 a formal official constitution gave Pakistan the status of an Islamic republic. In 1958 President Iskandar Mirza (1899–1969) declared martial law, annulled the constitution, and banned all political parties. The next two decades brought two wars with India (over control of Kashmir) and a third civil war that led to the formation of the Republic of Bangladesh in 1971.

In 1973 a new constitution was enacted, whereby the country adopted a federal parliamentary system of governance. Under the new government the presidency became merely ceremonial, with real power in the hands of the prime minister. The popular prime minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto (1928–79) was overthrown by Gen. Muhammad Zia ul-Haq (1924–88; Bhutto’s chief of staff) in a bloodless coup in 1977. It became more bloody when Bhutto was hanged in 1979. Zia ul-Haq allied Pakistan with the United States and brought about major developments. He died in an air crash in 1988 and was followed by Benazir Bhutto (b. 1953), Zulfikar Ali Bhutto’s daughter, who was elected as the first woman leader of this Muslim country.

Nawaz Sharif (b. 1949) won the elections in 1997. Two years later military chief Pervez Musharraf (b. 1943) overthrew Nawaz Sharif, citing the devastated economy of Pakistan as his justification for interference. Then Musharraf declared himself president in June 2001 and in the 21st century maintains a tenuous hold on power. Pakistan plays a pivotal role in an unstable and dangerous region of the world, particularly because, like its neighbor and rival India, it possesses nuclear weapons.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

With Iran to the southwest, Afghanistan to the northwest, China to the northeast, and India to the east, the Pakistani mainland touches the sea only on its southern side. The southwestern part of the country is mostly mountainous or barren and therefore unfit for agricultural purposes. The remaining parts form an alluvial plain (about one-third of the land) that is the heart of the country. The Indus River descends from the mountains of Tibet (a country toward its east) and flows through Pakistan to empty through a magnificent delta into the Arabian Sea. The climate in Pakistan depends on the altitude and the proximity to the sea. The area close to the Arabian Sea remains warm most of the year, whereas the temperatures atop the northern mountain ranges are extremely low. Broadly the seasons are of three kinds: the hot season (March–June), the wet season (July–September), and the cool season (October–February). The temperatures can range from an average of 36°F in January to 104°F in June in the capital city of Islamabad, while the country receives an annual average of 10 inches of rainfall. Hailstorms are a common occurrence during late summers in Islamabad.

Vegetation in the lowlands is patchy and restricted to stunted woodlands and scattered clumps of grass. On higher altitudes, especially of the north, the mountainsides are covered with coniferous trees and a wide variety of multicolored flowers. The area also abounds in jackals, deer, snow leopards, and bears. Marsh crocodiles are also found in a good number in the marshy areas of the Indus River delta, while the Pakistani coastline is home to a variety of shellfish, turtles, fish, and sharks.

since winning its independence in the late 1940s. Due to the policies approved by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and enacted by the government, foreign assistance, and an improved access to global markets since 2001, Pakistan has established a stronger economic base, increased its gross domestic product (GDP), and shown promise in its ability to create new jobs and reduce poverty.

The country's exports have steadily increased in the last few years, along with improved worker compensation. The industrial sector has successfully expanded into the textile, vegetable oil, sugar, carpet, and steel industries. Pakistan trades most heavily with the United States, Japan, European countries (Germany, the United Kingdom), Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Pakistan is a Muslim nation, and Islam is its official state religion. Christians form the biggest minority group, followed by Hindus and Parsis (descendants of Persian Zoroastrians). Pakistanis, both men and women, typically wear a shalwar kameez (a nonrevealing long and loose two-piece outfit). Though a Muslim state, Pakistan's culture is mixed with strong Indian Hindu influences in festivals and ceremonies, which can be seen clearly in the Basant Festival (celebrating the arrival of spring) and marriage rites. The family of the bride incurs huge expenses (including a dowry and trousseau) in Hindu weddings, and this has become the practice in Pakistani Muslim weddings as well.

English is one of Pakistan's official languages, although Urdu (also an official language) is the language of the people. Pakistani society is run by and for the benefit of men. The head of the family is the oldest male, who guides other family members in all matters. The country is rich with craftsmen: potters, woodworkers, glassblowers, ceramicists, and jewelers. There is a rich tradition of Sufi, ulema, and mushaikh poetry in Pakistani culture. (Sufism is a religion derived from Hinduism, Judaism, and Christianity; mushaikhs are Sufi spiritual leaders; Ulemas are the orthodox Muslim scholars of the Sunni sect.) Cricket is an obsession with Pakistanis, especially when the opponent is India.

CUISINE

Pakistani food, rich in spices and curry-based, is strongly influenced by the Middle East and northern India. The main components of a typical Pakistani meal are flat bread (roti), vegetables (sabzi), rice (chawal), and meat (gosht). People commonly consume snacks such as samosas (cone-shaped pastries filled with stuffing), and tikkas (spicy, barbecued marinated mutton, beef, or chicken pieces on skewers). The most common sweet is barfi, which is made from milk solids and is available in many flavors. Gulab jamuns (cottage cheese dumplings in sugar syrup) are everyone who has a sweet tooth. Chai (tea) and lassi (a yogurt drink) are favorite beverages. Officially Pakistan is a "dry" country, but imported beer and spirits can be bought in special bars.

PAKISTAN DAY

Observed on: March 23

Pakistan Day commemorates the Pakistan Resolution passed by the Muslims of South Asia in Lahore on March 23, 1940. Minto Park (Lahore) was the venue for the annual session of the All India Muslim League, which met from March 22–24, 1940. At this time a resolution was passed under the guidance of Quaid-e-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah (the founder of Pakistan), who urged people to seek a separate state for Muslims instead of seeking an alliance with the Hindus of India. The 1946 demand for a separate Muslim nation, now divided into Pakistan and Bangladesh, was based on this resolution. Also on this date in 1956, Pakistan officially became an Islamic republic. The day is marked by military parades in Lahore, Peshawar, Karachi, Quetta, and in the capital city of Islamabad.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, May Day, or Workers' Day in many parts of the world to recognize the important role played by workers in the economic stability of their nation. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

The PTUDC (Pakistan Trade Union Defense Campaign) regards May Day as a day to emphasize the ongoing struggle between the working classes of Pakistan and the rich capitalist classes. In Lahore the celebration features seminars on labor-related issues.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Pakistan has the distinction of being one of the largest Muslim nations in the world. It was initially a part of India, but due to irreconcilable conflicts between Muslims and Hindus, two separate nations were formed in 1947, the year that India achieved independence from British colonial rule. To celebrate this occasion, there are meetings, rallies, and demonstrations celebrating the formation of Pakistan.

❁ DEATH ANNIVERSARY OF QUAID-E-AZAM, MUHAMMAD ALI JINNAH

Observed on: September 11

This day commemorates the death of the father of Pakistan, Muhammad Ali Jinnah, who died in 1948. Called Quaid-e-Azam ("the Great Leader") by the people, Jinnah was the most revered leader of Pakistan. It was Jinnah who first expressed the idea of forming a separate Muslim state of Pakistan in the 1940s. According to him the Hindus and the Muslims had distinct irreconcilable identities. So that these distinct sects of people could live harmoniously, the Two-Nation Theory was developed to segregate Indian Hindus and Indian Muslims following independence.

On this day special prayers are held in mosques, with people from all walks of life visiting the great leader's mausoleum, offering wreaths in his memory. His birthday is celebrated on December 25.

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Islamic New Year, called El am Hejir, is celebrated on the first day of Muharram, the first month in the Islamic calendar. (The Islamic calendar is based on the phases of the Moon and has fewer days than the Western, solar calendar. As a result Islamic holidays gradually migrate through the seasons.) In mosques Muslims celebrate in a subdued manner with special prayers and readings. An important part of the day is devoted to telling the story of the prophet Muhammad's flight from Mecca to Medina with his family and followers in 622 C.E.

❁ ASHURA

Observed by: Shia Muslims

Observed on: Ninth and 10th days of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Ashura means the "tenth day" in Arabic. In the Islamic calendar Ashura falls on the 10th day of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar. This day commemorates the martyrdom of the grandson of Muhammad Hussein bin Ali, the third Imam of the Shia, who was killed in the Battle of Karbala in 680 C.E. in Iraq.

In Pakistan there is mourning for two days to mark Imam Hussein's death. There are processions and prayer meetings on this day but they are very solemn and there is no music. The death scene of Hussein is enacted as boys and men indulge in self-flagellation by striking themselves repeatedly with whips, chains, and other sharp objects to share Hussein's agony before his death. This is done in order to demonstrate their religious commitment.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim (Abraham) in Allah and his willingness to sacrifice his son to obey Allah's command. Muslims believe that God visited Ibrahim in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his most valued possession, his son. When Ibrahim told his son about the dream, the boy asked his father to follow God's command. However, just as Ibrahim was about to make the sacrifice, God replaced his son with a ram on the altar.

Pakistani Muslims reenact this scene by sacrificing a goat, sheep, or camel on this day. One-third of this meat is given to the poor, another third to neighbors and relatives, and one-third is consumed by the family. This act signifies a willingness to give up cherished things. Special collective prayers are said after sunset. Also the holy pilgrimage, or hajj, is undertaken in this month. The hajj is the fifth pillar of Islam's Five Pillars of the faith, and each able-bodied Muslim is directed by the Koran to undertake this journey at least once in his or her lifetime.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Azan is the first ritual conducted after a baby is born. It is the traditional Islamic prayer whispered into the right ear of the infant by the grandfather or other senior male family member because Muslims believe that the first word a baby should hear is the name of Allah. This ritual is followed by the distribution of sweets among those present for the occasion. Kajal or surma (kohl) is used to line the eyes of the newborn in addition to making a black mark on his or her face to ward off the evil eye. There is another ritual of tying a black string on the arm or wrist of the child so that evil spirits will leave the child alone. A child is usually given a nickname before it is officially named by the grandparents at a ceremony called Aqeeqa, usually held within 40 days of its birth. A barber shaves the newborn's hair to ensure a thick growth later. Sacrifices are made on this day, and the meat is distributed among the family and the poor. The first garment a child wears is made from an old shirt that belonged to its grandfather. Some of the special things owned by the grandfather are passed on to the child after he or she grows a little older.

When the baby is six or seven months old, there is a ceremony celebrating the first eating of solid food called kbeer chattai. Family members gather around the child and put small quantities of rice pudding, or kbeer, in its mouth; later they feast on kbeer and other food.

The next occasion in the infant's life is when it is four years, four months, and four days old. Considered fit to read and write, male children are made to wear an achkan (a long-sleeved coat-like garment buttoned in the front and reaching down to the knees or lower) and to sit on a stool in front of the priest (maulvi). The boy is made to write and read out bismillah (the first word of the Koran) loudly; this is followed by feasting and distribution of alms by the family. When the boy is about 10 years old and has finished his first reading of the Koran, then comes the Amin ceremony. The maulvi, who has taken pains to make the child learn Arabic script while guiding him through the verses of the Koran, is given a robe (called a poshak) and a turban while the boy is given sweets and gifts. The child celebrates his birthday, or saalgirah, with friends each year. The occasion of roza kushai celebrates his breaking of the first fast during the holy month of Ramadan. This occurs by the age of 12, when fasting becomes an obligation.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Pakistan a girl is considered eligible for marriage once she reaches puberty, since people believe that her sexual urge should not be ignored. Boys are circumcised at birth and are considered fit to get married when they can work and hair begins to grow on their upper lips. Both sexes are segregated once they have matured physically. According to the Muslim Family Law Ordinance, young people are obliged to get married shortly after puberty (16 and 18 years for girls and boys, respectively) and enter the next stage of life.

❁ MARRIAGE

Shaadi, which means "weddings" in Hindi, are long affairs in Pakistan, consisting of at least six major ceremonies, which require elaborate planning. The first ceremony is the mehendi ceremony. Mehendi (henna) is an herb that leaves an orange-brown color when applied to skin. The married women of a family usually apply mehendi to a bride's hands and feet in elaborate designs the night before the marriage ceremony. Henna designs are also painted on the groom's hands. Nikah, the actual wedding, is the next ritual. On this day the couple solemnizes their marriage by signing papers in the presence of their religious leader, usually the imam or maulvi. Valima is a reception thrown by the groom's family the next day, celebrating the wedding. Family members and friends are invited for merrymaking and feasting.

DEATH

People in Pakistan do not discuss death openly because of the belief that it might become a reality. Even when a doctor speaks about illness, the elders fear that he must be evoking the ailing person's death. Therefore a great deal of tact and sensitivity is used while talking about such matters. When a loved one passes away, the body is washed with holy water. The fakir (a Muslim mendicant monk who is regarded as a holy man) reads out the Koran into the ears of the person who is dying. His or her body is made to face Qibla, in the direction of Mecca. Qibla is an Arabic word referring to the direction that should be faced when a Muslim prays. The family members also recite the verses from the Koran. This is their way of reassuring the person of their love and

Fun Fact

Originally the Qibla was toward the Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem (and it is therefore called the First of the Two Qiblas). In 624, during Muhammad's exile in Medina, the Qibla was changed to point to the Kaaba, where it has remained ever since. The Kaaba (meaning "cube" in Arabic) is the central stone structure, covered by a black cloth, within the Great Mosque in Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Republic of Palau, or Belau, comprises over 300 islands divided into six groups, and more than 1,000 cultural sites have been found in the archipelago. Archaeological evidence indicates that Babeldaob (or Babelthuap), the largest island of Palau, was settled more than 3,000 years ago, and radio-carbon dating reveals cultural activities at several terraced locations around 1439–1110 B.C.E. at Ngiwal; 1131–811 at Ngatpang; and at the village of Ngerdubech around 1414–998.

Of particular archaeological interest are the stone megaliths found at Badrulchau, which means “the rocks of Ngerulchau,” where 37 standing basalt stones are scattered over a field. Dated to be about 2,000 years old, archaeologists think they may have been the foundation posts for a large structure. Six of the stones bear carved faces.

The former name of this site was Bai er a Ngerulchau. According to legend several gods decided to build a bai, or a meetinghouse, for themselves located at Ngerulchau, but they could only work at night gathering rocks to serve as supporting posts for the bai. One night one of the gods decided to play a practical joke on his friends. He took a piece of coconut husk and set it afire, then threw the flaming husk to the ground, where it turned into a rooster and crowed. When the other gods heard the rooster's crow, they thought it was daybreak, and they left without finishing the bai.

The strategic location of the Palau islands on the western border of Oceania, coupled with their proximity to Southeast Asia, have given rise to a mixed population derived primarily from Malay, Melanesian, Filipino, and Polynesian groups. These islands were explored by the Spanish navigator Ruy Lopez de Villalobos (c. 1500–44) in 1543 and remained under nominal Spanish ownership for more than 300 years. In 1899 Spain sold them to Germany.

Chuab

Chuab was one of two daughters of Latmikaik's three children; she had a sister named Tellebuu and a brother Ucherrarak. (Latmikaik is a Micronesian creation goddess.) Ucherrarak went to dwell in heaven, but Chuab and Tellebuu were blown to Ngebeanged and went to the house of Ngetelkou, where they lived and were fed. Soon, however, Chuab began to grow taller and taller, and she kept growing. The people kept feeding her anyway, and she grew so tall that they were unable to reach her mouth. So the people built ladders and climbed up to feed her until even the ladders could no longer reach her mouth.

Finally, Chuab reached the clouds, and no one could care for her. The people finally decided to buy soil from Uchelianged (the god of heaven) and pile it up until they could feed Chuab. Even this measure proved useless, however, so they decided to end the situation by burning her and began to gather firewood. When she saw the people collecting firewood, Chuab asked why they were doing it. The people replied that the firewood was for cooking more food to feed her. When they had enough firewood, they arranged it around her feet and set it on fire. As the fire burned Chuab fell down, and parts of her body parts became Belau (Palau).

When Chuab fell into the sea, her body formed the islands, and her head became Ngarchelong, hence geographically and historically Ngarchelong is the head of Babeldaob. The expression, melengmes era Ngarchelong, reminds everyone to respect the people from Ngarchelong because they live in a place formed by an important part of the body.

The people believe that Chuab knew all along what they were planning to do and sacrificed herself for their welfare. Local gods created the forest and reefs to protect Chuab's body, and people came out of her flesh. As time passed, other gods appeared out of the sea and brought to Belau special knowledge of agriculture, the proper way of family life and childbirth, and political practice.

During World War I Japan occupied Palau and received a mandate over them from the League of Nations in 1920. These islands remained under Japanese control and served as an important naval base until the United States seized them during World War II. After the war they became a UN trusteeship (1947) administered by the United States. When the United States began to rule over Palau after the war, it hoped to merge Palau with the rest of Micronesia into a single political entity. Palauans preferred complete freedom and in 1978 voted against becoming a part of the Federated States of Micronesia, opting instead for a separate identity. In 1979–80 Palau adopted its own constitution, and the country's first president Haruo Remeliik took office in 1981. Koror was named the provisional capital.

The transition to self-governance, however, was not easy: In 1985 Remeliik was assassinated, and his successor Lazarus Salii committed suicide in 1988. (Apparently his suicide resulted from an investigation into alleged political payoffs.)

The next president Ngiratkel Etpison a successful businessman and part-owner of the Palau Pacific Resort, was the first president to complete his term in office.

On October 1, 1994, Palau officially became an independent nation, ending 47 years as a UN Trust Territory (administered by the United States) and also joined the United Nations. The post-independence period has been rather difficult, affected adversely by political power struggles, the Asian economics crisis, and the lack of basic infrastructure within the country.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The most important islands in the Palau republic are Angaur, Babeldaob, Koror, and Peleliu, which lie together near the same barrier reef. About two-thirds of the population lives on Koror. North of these islands lies the coral atoll of Kayangel, while the uninhabited Rock Islands are situated to the west of the main island group. A remote group of six islands, known as the Southwest Islands and located some 373 miles from the main islands, is also a part of Palau.

Palau enjoys a tropical climate all year with an average temperature of about 81°F. Rainfall occurs throughout the year; the annual average is a little less than 150 inches. The average humidity is 82 percent; though maximum rain falls between July and October, there is no dearth of sunshine. Typhoons are rare as Palau lies outside the typhoon zone. Tropical forests cover much of the islands, the commonest trees being ironwood (a very hard wood used for furniture rather than buildings), banyan, breadfruit, coconut, and pandanus. Mangrove forests and grassy savannahs also form a part of the vegetation. Palau's highest point is Mt. Ngerchelchuus on Babeldaob Island with a height of just under 705 feet above sea level.

The islands' underwater biodiversity comprises 1,500 species of fish and 700 species of coral and anemone, besides giant tridacna clams, sea turtles, manta rays, gray reef sharks, sea snakes, chambered

Fun Fact

The name Belau comes from the aibebelau ("indirect replies") the people gave Chuab about the activity to burn her down.

Chambered Nautilus

The chambered nautilus is a living fossil. It has remained unchanged for over 400 million years. During prehistoric times there were about 10,000 different species of nautilus, but only two are known to have survived into the modern era. It is a mollusk and a member of the cephalopod family. Like most cephalopods it can use jet propulsion to attain speeds of over two knots. A small tube near the animal's tentacles, known as a siphon, expels water under pressure. This propels the nautilus away from potential threats at high speeds.

The shell of the nautilus comprises many chambers. Each chamber is sealed and contains a certain amount of gas that provides buoyancy. The nautilus can regulate the density of its body by injecting fluid or removing fluid from these chambers through a system of tubes. The hard shell protects the animal's soft body. When a young nautilus first hatches from the egg, it is about an inch in diameter and has a shell with seven chambers. As the nautilus grows bigger, it adds new chambers to its shell. Each new chamber will be a little larger than the last, allowing the opening of the shell to enlarge. A unique feature of the nautilus is the fact that its eye is merely a tiny hole that operates like a pinhole camera. Nautili are found throughout the Pacific and Indian Oceans, at depths of about 1,800 feet. At night these creatures swim to the coral reefs in search of food.

nautilus, fruit bats, and dugongs (manatees); crocodiles and monitor lizards occupy the estuarine areas. Numerous species of birds, fruit bats, monkeys, and nonpoisonous snakes also inhabit the islands.

ECONOMY

Palau ranks among the wealthiest of the Pacific Island states, and tourism drives its economy. Tourist activity focuses on scuba diving and snorkeling in the islands' rich marine environment, including the Floating Garden Islands located to the west of Koror, the capital city. The bulk of the tourists come from Japan, Taiwan, and the United States. The service sector is important in the Palauan economy, contributing more than 80 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) and employing three-quarters of the workforce. The governmental sector employs nearly 26 percent of the working population. Agriculture is mainly at a subsistence level, the principal crops being coconuts, root crops, and bananas. Fishing is a potential source of revenue, but the islands' tuna output dropped by over one-third during the 1990s. Under the terms of the Compact of Free Association with the United States, Palau has been receiving a substantial amount of financial aid from the United States since 1994.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The people of Belau (the local name for Palau) may appear to be a highly westernized and cosmopolitan community (compared to the other Micronesians), clad in American shoes and baseball caps and attaining a fairly high standard of education. Nevertheless they have retained their traditions and customs. An important aspect of the culture is the friendly and gregarious disposition of the local population. At the same time Palau's social organization is highly complex and competitive. The race for money, prestige, and power has always been the focus of most events, such as sports competitions and even wars.

Palau is a matriarchal society, and Palauan villages have always been organized around 10 matrilineal clans. A council of chiefs from the 10 ranking clans governs each village, and a parallel council of their female counterparts holds a significant advisory role in the control and division of land and money. In earlier times men and women had strictly defined roles to play in the day-to-day life of the village. The men's duties included harvesting from the ocean waters, administering the villages, and waging wars. Women ruled the homes, grew vegetables, and harvested shellfish and sea cucumbers from the shallow reefs.

Until the late 1800s Palauans tattooed their bodies; women of higher clans wore more ornate and intricate designs. Men wore their hair in tight buns, while the chieftains (rubak) wore bracelets carved out of the bones of large sea mammals called dugongs. Most Palauans are Christians; the Catholic and Protestant churches are well established. Palauan is spoken at home, while English is more common in business and government operations. Schools teach both languages, so most Palauans become bilingual at a very early age. The Southwest islanders speak Sonsorolese and Tobian dialects. The Palauan islanders have borrowed the Hawaiian term haole, which refers to people who are not descended from the indigenous people, to refer to foreigners. A majority of Palauans chew betel nut, which, when mixed with lime powder, produces huge quantities of bright red spit. It is still a common practice to remove one's footwear before entering private residences and public buildings, and visitors must ask villagers to identify sacred sites for them so they do not accidentally break a taboo.

Fun Fact
Palau is a dialect of the language Brao, spoken in parts of Vietnam.

Bai

In ancient times, every village in Palau had a meetinghouse called a bai. At the beginning of the 20th century more than 100 bai remained in Palau, but most of them were completely destroyed in the fierce fighting that took place on Palau during World War II. There were several basic types of bais, constructed of various materials depending on what the bai was to be used for, and the primary tools available were adzes made from clam shells. The dimensions for a bai are very specific: It must be 80 feet long, 20 feet wide, and 40 feet high.

In the village square was the meeting hall for governing elders (rubak). Called the bai er a rubak, it was also used as the community center or bai er beluu. Fine hardwoods were used to build this style of bai, and it was elaborately decorated with traditional designs and colors. The bai er a cbeldebechel, or men's club—used by the men's organization to protect the village from enemies—was usually located near the entrance of each village. The quality of the building materials and design were usually inferior to those used for the elders' meeting hall.

The seating arrangements along the walls of the bai for the governing elders were determined by their rank and title. The bai was not divided by walls or furnishings, and the expanse of naturally polished hardwood floor was broken up only by two fireplaces, making the great hall worthy of the dignified group that met there.

❁ CUISINE

The staple, traditional diet of the Palauans includes coconut milk and its meat (copra), tapioca (cassava), sweet potatoes, and all sorts of fish and seafood (including shellfish and sea cucumbers). Japanese and U.S. influences are quite prominent in the local cuisine.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 is the first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, starting on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). The residents of Palau say goodbye to the old year and joyously welcome the new one, because it is the harbinger of new hopes and aspirations. In Palau, as in most parts of the world, New Year's Day is celebrated in the company of one's family, friends, and acquaintances. The day is marked by dance and musical programs, as well as partying and get-togethers. On this day all educational and public institutions remain closed.

❁ YOUTH DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 15

This particular holiday is set aside to honor the youth of Palau. The activities concerned with the observance of this day are mainly sponsored by the Palau

National Youth Congress (a body comprising youth that takes an active part in all the major national events and happenings). Festivities enjoyed by youth, such as concerts and sports competitions, are held on this day.

❁ EARTH DAY

Observed on: April 22

This holiday is of fairly recent origin. The first Earth Day was observed in the United States in 1970 and is now celebrated by many countries around the world. On this special occasion numerous educational organizations and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) declare that they are part of a worldwide movement to protect the planet, children, and the future. Many promises are made, and many schemes are launched to protect the natural resources and biodiversity of the planet and thus ensure a secure future for posterity.

❁ SENIOR CITIZENS DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 5

This is a special occasion on the Palau islands, when the residents pay tribute to all the senior citizens inhabiting the islands and recall with gratitude their significant contributions to the society and the nation. Public activities and events on this occasion are sponsored by the Ministry of Community and Cultural Affairs and the State Unit Agency/Area Agency on Aging and include dance competitions (for the aged) and the exhibition and sale of handicrafts.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 9

On this day in 1979 the constitution of an independent Palau was implemented, so this is a significant event in the history of Palau. This day is marked by civic ceremonies.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Monday in September

Palau celebrates Labor Day on the same date as the United States instead of May 1 as is the case in most countries of the world. This may be ascribed to the fact that Palau was under U.S. administration for a considerable period of time. The holiday is observed with public speeches.

Observed on: October 1

In Palau this happens to be the most celebrated holiday of the year. ❁ UNITED NATIONS DAY

Observed on: October 24

This date marks one of the epoch-making events in the history of the modern world, the ratification, in 1945, of the charter that created the United Nations (UN). Emerging from the ashes of world War II, the centralized world organization, in which all major nations were represented, was founded to control, monitor, and supervise the maintenance of peace and harmony around the world. In Palau on this day people recall the significant contributions of the UN to maintaining global peace. This day is observed by raising the UN flag, parades, floats, music played by the navy band, and sports events. Educational and public institutions are closed.

❁ FLAG DAY

Observed on: November 4

This official holiday is of great significance for the people of Palau because on this day the country's national flag was legally adopted.

❁ THANKSGIVING

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Fourth Thursday in November

This is a holiday that originated in the United States. It commemorates the first harvest of a group of English immigrants in the Plymouth Colony on the east coast of the United States. The celebrations in Palau may be attributed to the fact that Palau was under U.S. administration for a considerable period of time. As in the United States the festival is observed with church services, family reunions, and the customary turkey dinner.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day chosen by the Roman Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe to be the son of God.

Since a majority of Palauans profess Christianity, Christmas is celebrated there with great enthusiasm, but it is celebrated on December 26 instead of December 25 (as is done in the rest of the world).

This festival is observed with a Mass or prayer service in the local churches, an exchange of greetings and gifts with friends and family, and enjoying delicacies specially prepared for the occasion.

One of the highlights of Christmas in Palau is the traditional parade. As early as 9 A.M. children and their parents eagerly await the parade and the shower of sweet treats from the float riders. The dazzling spectacle of decorated floats starts from the Palau International Airport and takes about two hours to reach Meyuns, the end of the parade route. Blowing horns signal the arrival of the parade, and float riders greet the crowds with "Merry Christmas!" More than 100 people, including enthusiastic children, line the streets to watch. The children bring plastic bags to the parade and scramble for sweet treats thrown to them by the float riders.

Fun Fact

No one knows when Jesus was actually born, and the Catholic Church says that every month and various dates have been suggested as possibilities. They chose late December for the celebration because it was the time of year when pagans celebrated winter solstice and the return of the light, festivals that have provided many of the symbols and ceremonies now cherished by Christians.

According to Palauan custom, it is mandatory for a young man to discuss his plans with the woman he wants to marry. If she agrees, then he approaches his relatives to help him obtain the formal permission of her parents. If either set of parents opposes the alliance, then the talks will fizzle out. If the talks are to continue, the groom-to-be visits the woman's home accompanied by a male relative. When the relative and the young man enter the house, they seat themselves close to the doorway. The prospective groom sits on the left. If the discussion is concluded successfully, the relative departs, leaving the groom-to-be at the home of his future bride.

After a couple of months the woman's parents prepare foodstuffs that are then sent to the groom's house. Prior to this the parents of the young man are notified so that they can inform the other members of their family. With the acceptance of the food, the marriage alliance is agreed on, and a date will be set.

For the wedding ceremony friends and relatives on both sides come together. Unlike other communities, there is no singing or dancing. People merely sit and chat, while the groom's parents and sisters give (Palauan) money to the bride's parents. This action signifies that the couple is married.

For the marriage feast, the bride's relatives cook a huge feast and even slaughter a pig for the occasion. For this ceremony the relatives of the groom collect money and present it to the bride's relatives. The food from the bride's relatives and the money from the groom's relatives must necessarily be of equal value. After the marriage the young woman is no longer considered a part of her own family; she has to live with her husband at his home or with his parents.

In Palauan society the husband is expected to take on certain financial responsibilities for his wife. He has to contribute money on his wife's behalf if and when her male relatives buy property. He also has to provide money for his father-in-law if and when he engages in business ventures. The wife needs to contribute food when a relative of hers dies. The husband has to provide some money as a dowry in the event his wife's relatives get married.

✿ DEATH

When an individual dies on Palau, the head of the clan to which he or she belonged informs all relatives and kinsfolk who, along with other members of the community, undertake the task of building a coffin. Meanwhile the deceased's sister(s) prepare the body for burial. The body is then taken away from the family dwelling and placed in the center of the community house (bai).

The sister-in-law of the deceased is in charge of the food that has to be prepared and served to all the visitors. In this task she is assisted by female relatives from both sides of the dead person's family. The female visitors contribute gifts of cloth, soap, fine woven mats, and Palauan money to the deceased's sister-in-law.

The burial ceremony takes place a couple of days later. While the body is at the community house, the sister of the deceased sits at a spot especially designated for her, while the other relatives sit opposite each other. The sister(s) sits at the head of the coffin, placing her face close to the deceased's face and wails loudly. In sharp contrast the wife has to mourn and grieve silently. Food is served to mourners at this time. According to protocol the chief is served first. Then the women who sit around the coffin are served, followed by everyone else present at the venue as well as the individuals who did the cooking.

The burial site is usually selected by the chief of the clan, the father of the deceased, and his or her closest relatives. There are different cemeteries for people belonging to different levels of the society. After the grave has been dug, the time of burial is decided by the elders. The dead are generally buried between 3 and 5 p.m. All the children of the deceased catch the very last glimpse of the body before the coffin is closed.

The coffin is carried from the community center head first, cradled in a rope sling between bamboo poles, to the burial ground. The bier will be followed by the sisters, who carry two woven mats with them. The other mourners follow the sisters. Upon arrival at the cemetery, one mat is placed in the grave. The coffin is placed on this mat, and the other mat covers the top of the coffin. After the coffin is lowered into the grave, the mourners walk by, each dropping a handful of soil onto it.

After the burial, everybody returns to the community house, and more food is served to all those who are present. After the meal, they are free to return to their homes. One week after the burial, the relatives visit the grave and have it paved with cement. When this is done, the official mourning period is over.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Rock carvings five thousand years old have been found in Panama. Possibly, they were left by Panama's original inhabitants, the Coclé and Cuevas. The Spanish first settled in Panama along the Caribbean coast, near the mouth of Río Chagres. From there, the Spaniards plundered the Caribbean basin, spawning pirate raids throughout region by those who sought to loot the ill-begat gains.

With Spain divesting of its New World interests, Panama became a province of Colombia in 1821. A generation later, in 1846, it signed a treaty with the United States allowing for the construction of a railway across the Panamanian isthmus—the narrowing between North and South America that separates the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. A canal had long been the dream of Western interests (the French had earlier tried and failed to construct a canal), but the conditions would prove costly in dollars and lives for those who tried.

In 1903, with U.S. support, Panama secured its status as an independent nation and the United States obtained Panama's approval of the Panama Canal Treaty. In 1914, the first ship traveled the canal. Colombia's grievance over the history of U.S. involvement in the affairs of Colombia's former province was partly assuaged by its North American neighbor's paying Colombia $25 million in 1921—at which time Colombia extended official recognition to Panama. Nevertheless, U.S. administration of the canal continued to stir regional and national resentments. Emblematic of the tensions was the January 1964 incident in which several high school students were killed after a scuffle ensued over their raising Panama's flag at the site of the canal. The day is remembered as Martyrs' Day in Panama.

U.S. President Jimmy Carter (b. 1924), who later won the Nobel peace prize, in 1977 negotiated the handover of the canal, which occurred in 1999.

Panamanian internal politics have not always run smoothly. Perhaps the political face most associated with Panama at the end of the 20th century is that of Manuel Noriega (b. 1934). A violent leader with training by the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States and a background in Panama's own secret police, Noriega came to power in 1984. His tenure was marked by cronyism and political assassinations. He also kept a hand in the regional drug trade, principally coca.

In the aftermath of a presidential campaign in Panama in which the winner was popularly considered to be Guillermo Endara (b. 1936) and whose results Noriega disputed, the United States invaded Panama. Afterward, in the U.S., Noriega was convicted of money laundering and sentenced to a 40-year prison term.

Endara was sworn in to office and served until 1994 when Ernesto Pérez Balladares (b. 1946) won the decision of the people. Balladares' leadership saw the advancement of privatization initiatives as well as improvements to critical infrastructure. Balladares' successor, Mireya Moscoso (b. 1940), was elected under the mantle of the conservative Arnulfista Party (PA), named for her late husband, Arnulfo Arias (1901-1988), who was president of Panama. She pushed the government to investigate past abuses and current issues of corruption. She was followed in office by a man 23 years her junior, Martín Torrijos, whose pro-business, anti-corruption platform found resonance with Panamanians and whose military father is well remembered as the man who negotiated Panamanian control of the canal with Carter.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Panama's two coastlines are referred to as the Caribbean (or Atlantic) and Pacific. To the east and west lie Colombia and Costa Rica, respectively. The country has two international boundaries, one with Colombia and the other with Costa Rica. The Caribbean coastline is marked by several good natural harbors. The major port on the Pacific coastline is Balboa. The dominant feature of the topography is the central spine of mountains and hills that forms the continental divide. The mountain range of the divide is called the Cordillera de Talamanca near the Costa Rican border. Farther east it becomes the Serranía de Tabasará, and the portion of it closer to the lower saddle of the isthmus, where the canal is located, is often called the Sierra de Veraguas.

The highest point in the country is the Volcán Barú (formerly known as the Volcán de Chiriquí), which rises to a height of almost 12,000 feet. Nearly 500 rivers flow through Panama's rugged landscape.

Mostly unnavigable, many originate as swift highland streams, meander in valleys, and form coastal deltas. Of these the Río Chepo and the Río Chagres are sources of hydroelectric power.

In Panama rainfall is much heavier on the Caribbean than on the Pacific side of the continental divide. Although thunderstorms are common during the rainy season, the country is outside the hurricane track. Panama's tropical environment supports an abundance of plants. Dense forests are interrupted in places by grasslands, scrub, and crops. Mangrove swamps occur along both coasts, with banana plantations occupying deltas near Costa Rica.

In Panama the days are rather hot, the nights relatively cooler; temperatures range from 90°F during the day to 70°F in the evening, almost throughout the year, with high humidity. The rainy season occurs between October and November. The climate is less tropical at higher altitudes. In mountainous regions the average annual temperature ranges from 50°F to 66°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Panama's economy is based primarily on a well-developed service sector that accounts for three-fourths of its gross domestic product (GDP). Services include the Panama Canal, banking, the Colon Free Zone (the largest free-trade zone in the Americas), insurance, container ports, flagship registry, and tourism. A slump in the Colon Free Zone and agricultural exports, the global slowdown, and the withdrawal of U.S. military forces held back economic growth between 2000 and 2001. In order to stimulate growth, the government plans public works programs, tax reforms, and new regional trade agreements.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

There are six different Indian cultures in Panama, and each of them practices its own ancestral customs. Each province of Panama has its own unique folklore reflected in its dances, music, and cuisine. In the deeply Catholic provinces of Coclé, Herrera, and Los Santos, churches are found on the main town square (plaza), as was the Spanish tradition. Nata, one of the oldest colonial cities, boasts the oldest church on the American continent. One of the highlights of the festival calendar is Carnival, which is celebrated throughout the country every February.

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Panamanian food is hot and spicy. There are many dishes prepared with fish, the most popular among them being seviche (fish marinated in onions, peppers, and lime juice). A typical Panamanian dinner often includes sancocho, a stew made with chicken, meat, and vegetables.

ETHNIC GROUPS IN PANAMA

Broadly speaking, Panamanian society is composed of three principal groups: the Spanish-speaking, Roman Catholic Mestizo majority; the English-speaking, Protestant Antillean blacks, and tribal Amerindians. Small numbers of those of foreign extraction—Chinese, Jews, Arabs, Greeks, South Asians, Lebanese, West Europeans, and North Americans—are also present. There is a smattering of Hispanic blacks, blacks (playeros), and Hispanic Indians (cholos) along the Caribbean coast lowlands and in the Darién. Their settlements, dating from the end of the colonial era, were concentrated along coasts and rivers.

The Antillean blacks were laborers from the British West Indies who came to Panama in large numbers during the first half of the 20th century to work on the country's banana plantations and the construction of the Panama Canal. They formed the nucleus of a community separated from the larger society by race, language, religion, and culture. The Amerindians, according to the 1980 census, Panama's indigenous population, numbered slightly over 93,000, or 5 percent of the country's total population. Censuses showed Amerindians to be a declining proportion of the total population; they had accounted for nearly 6 percent of all Panamanians in 1960. However, the figures are only a rough estimate of the numbers of Amerindians in Panama.

The Guaymí Amerindians are concentrated in the more remote regions of Bocas del Toro, Chiriquí, and Veraguas, while a majority of the Cuna inhabits the San Blas Islands, with an estimated 3,000 additional Cuna living in small scattered settlements in Darién and in Colombia. Mestizo Amerindians, also called American Indians, First Peoples, or Native Americans, are the indigenous peoples who were living in the Americas before European colonization, and who have managed to survive. (Canadians use the term First Nations to refer to Native Americans.) Native Americans officially make up the majority of the population in Bolivia and Guatemala and have significant presence in most other Latin American countries, including Panama.

For snacks, Panamanians enjoy placones de plátano (fried plantains) and tamales, a dish popular in many Central American countries. However, while in most countries tamales are prepared by wrapping corn husks around seasoned pies, in Panama banana skins are used as wrappings. Rice is included in most meals. The national dish is arroz con pollo (rice with chicken)

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany celebrates the arrival of the Magi (the Three Kings, named Caspar, Melchior, and Balthazar) at the site of Jesus' birth, so it is also called El Día de los Reyes Magos ("Three Kings' Day") in Spanish-speaking countries such as Panama. The day also commemorates his divinity as manifested to the Magi, who brought him gifts. On this day Panamanian families awake to open the gifts left by the Three Kings, and families and friends gather for the celebrations. While the children play with their new toys, the adults busy themselves preparing a grand dinner including a special dessert, known as La Rosca de Reyes or "Three Kings Bread." This crown-shaped, glazed bread is traditionally made with walnuts, grated orange peel, raisins, and candied cherries. A tiny doll representing Jesus and a coin are also put inside the bread. Whoever gets either the coin or the doll in their portion of the bread is supposed to have good luck during the new year.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Four days preceding Ash Wednesday

The underlying idea of Carnival is to enjoy one last round of exuberant partying before the onset of the somber 40-day period of Lent, during which all faithful Christians spend their days in austerity, abstinence, prayers, and penance. For Panamanians Carnival, which begins four days before Ash Wednesday, is an eagerly anticipated event. The main streets of Panama City are filled with parades, floats, masked people, and confetti. Women and girls dress in polleras, Panama's national costume. The pollera is a beautiful costume that originated in the rural homes of Panama's interior. This typical dress of the Panamanian woman is composed of two pieces: a shirt, called a camisilla, and a full skirt, gathered, with two or three ruffles, called el polleron. The dress is usually white and embellished with lace, edging, embroidery, and appliqué. Panamanian parades include comparsas (Cuban music and dance style) and tunas (cheerful groups of musicians and dancers).

The three days preceding Easter—Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday—all have important religious significance for Catholic Panamanians. Holy Saturday, also called Grand Saturday, the Angelic Night, or the Vigil of Easter, is a day of intermingled joy and sadness since it is the end of the season of Lent and penance and the beginning of paschal time, which is one of rejoicing. Some churches in Panama still use Holy Saturday as a traditional time for baptisms. Many rural Panamanians celebrate Holy Saturday night by attending a midnight vigil or going to dances. In many cases Holy Saturday is a day when families get together and have day-long feasts. It is also common for commercially organized events such as beach gatherings, bullfights, cockfights, concerts, and rodeo-like competitions to take place on Holy Saturday.

ORIGIN OF THE MAYPOLE

In various parts of Europe, May Day was traditionally greeted with joyous dancing around a garlanded pole, called a maypole, from which streamers hung. Each dancer would hold the end of a streamer, and the dancers wound the streamers into a pattern as they moved around the maypole, singing and dancing. The English have observed May Day since medieval times. Flowers, fruits, and other sweets, and a maypole with streamers constituted important components of the festival. All classes of people would rise at dawn to go “a-maying.” They would return laden with flowers and branches of trees to decorate their homes. A May queen was crowned to reign over the games, dancing, and festivities.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child is celebrated as an important event. The sacrament of baptism, which symbolizes the baby's entry into society and incorporates him or her into the church community, is a major family event. The selection of padrinos (godparents) is an important decision that has a pronounced influence on the child's welfare and future. It results in a quasi-kinship relationship that carries with it moral, ceremonial, and religious significance and broadens family ties of trust, loyalty, and support.

In the cities church facilities are readily available, but in rural areas families often have to travel some distance to the nearest parish center for the ceremony. The trip is considered of great importance and is willingly undertaken. In fact baptism is generally considered the most important religious rite. Blessings are recited, and the family hosts a private dinner to celebrate the occasion. Grandparents, uncles, aunts, and cousins faithfully gather to join in the celebration.

Black Christ

The Christo Negro is a black statue of Jesus. There are several versions of the story of how the Christo Negro statue arrived in Portobello in 1658. One popular version tells of a ship that, while attempting to leave during severe weather conditions, dumped the statue overboard. When the statue washed up in Portobello, the people brought it to the San Felipe Cathedral where it has remained ever since.

❁ MARRIAGE

A formal marriage ceremony often represents the culmination of a life together for many Mestizo and Antillean couples. It serves as a mark of economic success. A formal marriage is usually conducted by a priest in church. There is probably some expense involved, which is why it is more common to postpone the actual ceremony. Marriages factor importantly in a family's wealth and status.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

From the human remains that have been found on New Guinea, it has been established that human beings first inhabited the area some 60,000 years ago. Historians opine that these ancient inhabitants, probably from Southeast Asia, were apparently a simple agrarian civilization. Once regarded by western archaeologists as a Neolithic “backwater,” Papua New Guinea is one of the few places where agriculture developed independently. About 10,000 years ago (c. 8000 B.C.E.) the people were definitely growing plants, especially taro (still central to the islanders’ diet) at Kuk Swamp in the Wahgi Valley, and they knew how to cultivate bananas around 4950 to 4440. These dates predate the earliest Southeast Asian contact by 3,000 years.

Although European navigators had discovered the island in the 16th century, little was known about it until the 19th century, when the country was named. Papua is derived from a Malay word that describes the frizzy Melanesian hair, and a Spanish sailor called it New Guinea because he thought the people resembled those living in Guinea, in Africa.

The northern section of the island was part of German New Guinea from 1884 to 1914, when it was called Kaiser-Wilhelmsland. Papua, the southern section, was annexed by Queensland, Australia, in 1883, and the following year it became a British protectorate called British New Guinea. In 1905 it became part of Australia as the Territory of Papua. During World War I the German territories were occupied by Australian forces, and these were passed on to Australia by the League of Nations in 1920. The region then became known as the Territory of New Guinea.

During World War II the northern islands fell to the Japanese, who advanced south until they were stalled by the

Fun Fact

Papua New Guinea does not conform to models in which agriculture, the beginning of civilization, and the development of social and political classes are linked in cause-and-effect relationships. New Guinean societies have remained more or less egalitarian, although men lead communities, or parts of communities, through skillful persuasion and their superior ability in particular activities such as talking, fighting, and maintaining exchange relationships.

Allied forces. By 1945 the mainland (New Guinea) and the island of Bougainville had been recaptured by the Allies, but the Japanese were virtually invincible on the islands of New Ireland and New Britain, where they dug over 300 miles of tunnels. They were not compelled to surrender these strongholds until the end of the World War II.

Australian rule in these islands was reconfirmed by the United Nations in 1947. In 1949 the territories of Papua and New Guinea were merged administratively, but they remained constitutionally distinct.

They were combined in 1973 as the self-governing country of Papua New Guinea. Full independence came in 1975.

In 1988 the island of Bougainville was rocked by a violent nine-year secessionist movement. In 1989 guerrillas of the Bougainville Revolutionary Army (BRA) shut down the island's Australian-owned copper mine, a major revenue-earner for the country. In 1990 the BRA declared Bougainville's independence, as a sequel to which the government blockaded the island until January 1991, when a peace treaty was signed. In 1997 Papua New Guinea's government hired South African mercenaries to fight on Bougainville in a bid to terminate the long drawn-out crisis, but this step caused mass demonstrations, following which the mercenary contract was withdrawn. In April 1998 a cease-fire was declared.

On July 17, 1998, a tsunami off the northern coast of Papua New Guinea killed at least 1,500 people, leaving thousands more injured and homeless. In July 1999 Prime Minister Bill Skate (1953–2006) resigned, owning responsibility for having created diplomatic trouble by recognizing Taiwan as a separate political entity distinct from mainland China. Sir Mekere Morauta (b. 1946) became prime minister that same month and tried, without results, to bring about reforms in the military. In 2002 following an election marked by violence and massive fraud, Sir Michael Somare (b. 1936), a professional journalist, took over the reigns of power.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Papua New Guinea lies south of the equator and north of Australia. It comprises the eastern half of the island of New Guinea and a collection of surrounding islands. The country is dominated by a central spine of mountains, the Owen Stanley Range, with many peaks over 13,000 feet.

The highest point on the islands is Mt. Wilhelm (14,793 feet). Three-fourths of the territory of Papua New Guinea is covered by tropical rain forests, and the remainder is made up of delta plains, flat grassland, and mangrove swamps. The principal rivers include the Fly, the Sepik, and the Ramu. Beautiful coral formations abound near the islands of New Ireland, Bougainville, and New Britain. There are nearly 9,000 species of plants in Papua New Guinea, most of which occur in the lowland areas. Around 250 species of mammals inhabit the islands including bats, rats, the tree kangaroo (a heavy-bodied marsupial that lives mainly in trees), and echidnas (spiny anteaters). The island's bird species include parrots, pigeons, and kingfishers, giant cassowaries (flightless birds related to the emu), kokomos (hornbills), and cockatoos.

The climate of Papua New Guinea is hot, humid, and wet year-round. The wet season occurs between December and March, while the dry season lasts from May to October, with some regional variations. Rainfall varies tremendously: Port Moresby may experience an annual rainfall of 39 inches, while Lae gets around 177 inches. The temperatures on the coast are reasonably stable all year (hovering between 77°F and 86°F), but humidity and winds are variable. At higher altitudes the temperatures tend to be cooler, sometimes making it rather chilly in the highlands.

❁ ECONOMY

Papua New Guinea produces and exports agricultural, timber, and fish products. Agriculture currently accounts for 30 percent of the nation's gross domestic product (GDP) and supports more than 85 percent of the population. The major cash crops are coffee, oil, cocoa, copra, tea, rubber, and sugar. About 40 percent of the country is covered by trees that are being felled to obtain good quality timber, and a domestic woodworking industry is developing slowly. A number of Southeast Asian companies are active in the local timber industry. The World Bank, along with other donors, has withdrawn support because of the issue of unregulated deforestation and environmental damage.

The economy of Papua New Guinea is heavily dependent on imports of manufactured goods. Small-scale industries produce beer, soap, concrete products, clothing, paper products, matches, ice cream, canned meat, fruit juices, furniture, plywood, and paint. The small domestic market, relatively high wages, and high transport costs are among the constraints inhibiting industrial development.

Australia, Singapore, Japan, the United States, and the European Union are the principal trading partners of Papua New Guinea. Petroleum, mining machinery, and aircraft are imported from the United States, and Papua New Guinea exports gold, copper ore, cocoa, coffee, and some agricultural products to the United States.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

In Papua New Guinea there are four regional, cultural, and political groups: Papuans (from the south), Highlanders, New Guineans (from the north), and Islanders. There are over 700 languages spoken in Papua New Guinea (about one-third of the world's indigenous languages). This has led to the development of a pidgin lingua franca (or Neo-Melanesian). It is primarily based on English and German, but only has a vocabulary of about 1,300 words. Another popular language is Motu (or Police Motu), which is widely spoken in the Port Moresby coastal area.

The Christian churches have remained highly influential. The largest denominations are Catholic, Lutheran, and Presbyterian. Pantheistic beliefs as well as traditional rites and rituals are widespread. Placating the spirits of ancestors is an important activity, while sorcery and witchcraft are widely feared. The extended family is the center of social and family life. Members of the extended family generally prefer to live in the same locality or in nearby areas, forming minuscule community groups; they share food and other resources, work and live together, and help each other in times of need. People place great emphasis on obligations and duties toward their families. In Papua New Guinea the average nuclear family has six children. In sharp contrast to Western societies Papuan children regard their aunts, uncles, and cousins as parents and siblings. As an act of compassion, sterile or childless couples are often given a child to be raised as their own. The sons and daughters generally care for their aging parents.

Food for small families is cooked in pots or hollow pieces of bamboo over an open fire. Food for larger groups is cooked in a mumu, a fire pit dug in the ground and lined with rocks that have been heated over a fire. Food is placed on leaves in the hole and covered with a mound of mud or leaves; water is then poured in to steam the food.

By and large, the local people eat only two main meals with several snacks thrown in throughout the day. Some people also eat lunch (kaikai bilong belo). Spoons, tin plates, bowls, cups, and spoons are commonplace. Large leaves are often used as plates in rural areas. Food is carefully divided by a senior and prominent member among those present. The guests may not eat everything, but it is important to eat a part of what is on the menu; the rest can be carried home or distributed among those present. A second helping is suspect because it can be interpreted to mean that one's hosts have not provided enough. Though tables are used in urban areas, most people sit on the ground or floor during meals.

The majority of family structures are patriarchal; men usually handle construction activities (building houses or boats or clearing land). They are responsible for defending tribal honor and possessions; women take care of cooking and look after the children, domestic animals, and the garden. Boys and men hunt birds and wild game with slingshots and bows and arrows. Traditional musical instruments include the kundu (an hour-glass-shaped drum covered with lizard skin) and the garamut, a log with a small, hollowed-out portion, struck with one or two wooden beaters. In the cities both men and women may work outside the home.

❁ CUISINE

The cuisine of Papua New Guinea is rich and varied, ranging from fresh barramundi cod cooked in a wrapping of banana leaves to roasted chestnuts and mouthwatering fresh fruits to Unu bona boroma, a dish made of boiled, sliced breadfruit in a sauce of fried bacon, onions, and chicken stock. Unu means "breadfruit," an extremely popular item throughout the South Pacific.

In the highlands of Papua New Guinea the staple food is kaukau, a kind of sweet potato. On the coast and in the lowlands saksak, a starchy extract from the sago palm, is the staple. The other major food items include taro, fruits, and vegetables (from bananas to yams). In the coastal areas seafood and coconuts feature prominently in the cuisine. Throughout the country, pigs are raised and eaten at feasts. Small marsupials, wild pigs, birds, and eggs are additional sources of protein. Bats, eels, and tree kangaroos are eaten in some areas. Packaged foods such as rice and canned fish are popular among more affluent people.

Fun Fact

The islanders of Papua New Guinea who still live a hunter-gatherer lifestyle rarely suffer from heart disease.

In most parts of the globe, the New Year's Day of the Gregorian, or Western, calendar is enthusiastically celebrated by people of many nationalities. In a largely Christian country like Papua New Guinea, this day assumes greater importance.

The people of Papua New Guinea welcome the new year with the ringing of church bells. All educational and commercial organizations remain closed.

Papua New Guinea was under British rule for a considerable period of time and is still an associate member of the British Commonwealth. Thus its citizens celebrate the Queen's Birthday as a public holiday.

❁ REMEMBRANCE DAY

Observed on: July 23

This official holiday commemorates an epoch-making event in the political history of both Papua New Guinea and Australia. This day proved to be the turning point in the long drawn-out battle between the Japanese and the Australian troops that were defending the country. The venue of the battle was the Kokoda Trail in the vicinity of the Owen Stanley mountain ranges. A large number of teenaged Australian soldiers lost their lives in this encounter. On this day Papua New Guineans pay homage to those soldiers who died in the Australo-Japanese engagements. People offer floral wreaths at the Bomana War Cemetery (on the outskirts of Port Moresby), where these soldiers lie buried.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 16

This day commemorates a significant and historic event in the history of the islands. It was on this day that Papua New Guinea won complete independence from UN trusteeship under Australian administration, an administration that had lasted decades. This day is marked by flag-hoisting, public speeches, and parades.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

The origins of Boxing Day are found in an old English practice of giving cash or durable goods to those of the lower classes. Gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, but the less fortunate were given their gifts on the day after. Since Papua New Guinea was at one time under the influence of Britain as well as Christianity, British customs and practices were incorporated into local traditions. Papua New Guineans generally prefer to take part in outdoor activities and sports to enjoy the day.

Christians also celebrate the Feast of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr, on this day.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

This festival recalls Jesus' agony and death on the Cross. As in most other countries of the world, in Papua New Guinea this solemn occasion is marked by readings from the Psalms and the Gospel, the singing of hymns, and church services.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is also called the "day of the entombed Christ" for on that day Jesus' body lay in the tomb. It may well be considered a period of suspense between two realms: Between darkness, sin, and death, and resurrection, rejuvenation, and divine illumination. For this reason no services are held until the Easter Vigil that Saturday night. This day between Good Friday and Easter Day symbolizes the end of darkness and gloom and the dawn of a new era of salvation and the promise of a new life.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates the belief in Jesus' Resurrection from the dead. It is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is central to the Christian liturgical calendar because so many related observances cannot be scheduled until the date on which Easter will fall in the year is known.

The usual account, that Easter is celebrated on the first Sunday after the full Moon that occurs next after the vernal equinox, is not completely accurate. The ecclesiastical calculations hold that Easter falls on the first Sunday following the first ecclesiastical full Moon that occurs on or after the day of the vernal equinox; this particular ecclesiastical full Moon is the 14th day of a new Moon; and the vernal equinox is fixed as March 21. As a result Easter can never occur before March 22 or later than April 25.

Easter is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers and attend special Easter services. The name Easter belonged to a Germanic goddess called Eostre or Eastre, the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people in northern Europe. Eggs, long a symbol of rebirth and fertility among pagans, have become associated with the festival.

Since Papua New Guinea is a Christian country this holiday has great significance. Early in the morning, devout Catholics attend Mass and prayer services in their local churches. The rest of the day is spent in outdoor activities and sports. The spirit of joyfulness and festivity spills over to the following day, sometimes referred to as Easter Monday.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the date established by the Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe to be their Messiah. Since the majority of the Papua New Guinea population professes Christianity, Christmas is celebrated there with great enthusiasm and fervor. This festival is marked by Masses and prayer services in local churches and, later, the exchange of greetings and gifts with family and friends.

❁ GOROKA SHOW

Observed in: Goroka, Papua New Guinea

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Every other year in mid-September

The Goroka Show was started in the mid-1950s by the first missionaries who came to Papua New Guinea. In order to stop the fighting among the many tribal groups, they thought that regular public displays and competitions might diffuse hostile tribal relations. The highland town of Goroka is the venue for the show that brings the indigenous tribes together to celebrate their shared culture. In even-numbered years only, the Goroka Show usually takes place on the weekend nearest Independence Day (September 16).

The Goroka Show is now partly a tourist event, providing a rare opportunity for travelers to experience first-hand the customs of more than 100 tribes that populate the Papua New Guinea highlands. During the course of the weekend, the tribes gather for music, dancing, parading, and extraordinary displays of tribal ceremonies.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Papua New Guinea, the rites of initiation for boys are known as kovave. The word kovave refers to the spirits believed to dwell in the trees. Traditionally they were (and still are) summoned into the center of a particular village to initiate the boys. Kovave is also used to describe the traditional headdress worn by the local shaman. The conical kovave bark masks (made out of bark sheets) were prepared in the boys' houses. The first part of the ceremony involves dressing up in a conical hat with long strands of leaves hanging off the edge that reach down below the boy's waist. The effect is both humorous and frightening.

These kovave masks are put on young initiates in an ambush. Next they are taken to a clearing where their maternal uncles trim the bark fibers to a suitable length. They then take part in athletic and sports contests (held on the beaches) against rival unmasked men from neighboring villages.

These boys patrol the beach for about a month during this period, looking both fearsome and comical; they are allowed to kill pigs with their bows and arrows. At the end of the ceremonies the kovave spirits are believed to vanish into their forest dwellings, after which the masks are burned, and the boys are allowed to return home.

❁ MARRIAGE

On the islands of Papua New Guinea, a marriage ceremony may last for days or weeks and involve a great deal of feasting, all-night singing, and the exchange of gifts and food. In some communities the members of the groom's extended family contribute to a bride-price that must be paid to her family. This may include several pigs, money, and food, which are then shared and enjoyed by the extended family of the bride.

❁ DEATH

Funeral customs and rites vary from one island to another in the Papua New Guinean cluster. To consider an example, the funeral ceremonies on the island of New Ireland involve a lot of communal effort because great preparation and expense are involved, including feasting and gift-giving. (This implies that the ceremony can occur several months or even years after a death has occurred.) The ceremony remembers the dead individual and is supposed to help his or her soul move safely into the afterlife.

The Malanggan ceremony has a dual purpose: It bids farewell to the dead and also demonstrates the strength and vitality of the community because it is capable of organizing such an ostentatious display.

Fun Fact

The people of New Ireland believe each person has three souls.

During the Malanggan ceremony a special dance called the tatanua is performed. There is a song that accompanies the dance, but it is imperative that once the dancers don the tatanua (helmetlike) masks they remain totally silent. Malanggans fear that, if there is too much noise, a mishap or calamity might befall them or their families. The people believe that if the ceremony is performed in a proper manner, then the ancestral spirits will be pleased, and no harm will befall anyone in the community.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Not much is known about Paraguay's prehistory, but many think that the Tupi-Guaraní, who made their way into the region from the right bank of the Amazon River, are the original indigenous people of Paraguay. One hypothesis holds that they are of Mongolian ancestry and reached the Americas from Asia by crossing a temporary bridge across the Bering Strait. The other hypothesis postulates that they were originally Polynesian, Oceanic, or Pacific Islanders who arrived in South America in boats made of rush. A Guaraní legend supports the second hypothesis: According to the legend, in the far distant past the Guaraní's ancestors crossed a great and spacious ocean from a far land to settle in the Americas.

Paraguay is geographically divided into two regions by the Río Paraguay: eastern Paraguay, settled by the seminomadic Guaraní tribes, and western Paraguay, known as the Chaco. There were four Guaraní tribes, and all of them spoke a dialect of Guaraní: the Guaraní Pai Tavytera Fluke, Cario, Guayaní, and Tupis.

The Guaraní lived in the forest and believed in a supreme being. They were animists, with strong beliefs in nature, and a constructed mythology of supernatural goblins alongside natural manifestations. They were organized in egalitarian communities of multilineage clans with tribal chiefs and shamans, united by the principles of cooperation and mutual help.

In western Paraguay several hunter-gatherer groups, known as the Guaycuru, lived in the Chaco. There were approximately 13 tribes representing five language families. The tribes of the Chaco were more warlike and better able to

An ancient Guaraní legend tells the story of the Guaraní and how they came to live in the forests of Paraguay: At some time in the very distant past the ancestors of the Guaraní crossed a great and spacious ocean from a far land to settle in the Americas. They found the land wonderful but full of dangers. Even so, through diligence and effort they subdued the land and started a new civilization.

They worked the land and became excellent craftsmen. They looked forward to the coming of a tall, fair-skinned, blue eyed, bearded god Pa i Shume (perhaps derived from Pachacamac, an ancient creator deity of Peru), who descended from the skies and expressed his pleasure with the Guaraní. This god gave them religious knowledge and taught them agricultural practices that would help them to survive times of drought and pestilence as well as on a day-to-day basis. Significantly he unlocked the secrets of health and medicine and revealed the healing qualities of native plants. One of the most important of these secrets was how to harvest the leaves of the yerba maté tree and prepare a beverage that would ensure health, vitality, and longevity.

The Guaraní were seminomadic peoples who practiced slash-and-burn agriculture. They would clear part of the forest and plant manioc and corn. But four or five years later the soil would be worn out, and the tribe would have to find another place to live where the soil was still fertile. Tired of such moving, an old man refused to go on and stayed where he was. The youngest of his daughters the beautiful Jary had her heart split: to go on with the tribe's youths, or remain isolated, helping the old man until death took him to Ivy-Marae's peace.

Despite her friends' pleas, she ended up staying with her father. Jary's devoted gesture deserved a reward, and one day an unknown shaman arrived and asked her what would make her happy. She asked for nothing, but the old man said: "I want new energy so I can proceed and take Jary to the tribe that went away." So the shaman gave him a very green plant, perfumed with kindness, and told him to plant it, pick the leaves, dry them with heat from a fire, grind them, put the pieces in a gourd, add cold or hot water, and sip the infusion. "In this new beverage, you will find healthy company, even in the sad hours of the cruelest solitude." After that the shaman departed.

The old man did as the shaman had instructed him, and sipping the green sap, he recovered, gained new strength, and was able to resume the long journey to reunite with their people, who received them with great joy. The whole tribe adopted the habit of drinking the green herb, bitter and sweet, that gave strength, courage, and comfort during their sad hours of utmost solitude.

Maté became the most common ingredient in household cures of the Guaraní and remains so to this day. In Argentina and Paraguay maté tea is made from the leaves steeped in hot water. Actually a large quantity of ground leaf is first soaked in cold water, then the hot water is added, over and over again, until all the essence has been extracted. Between each addition of hot water the tea is ingested through a special wood or metal straw, called a bombilla, that filters out the leafy material. Maté is also used as a cold beverage.

From the time the Iberian invaders set foot in Paraguay, the indigenous culture was diluted. Inevitably cultural contact drastically altered the lifestyle, customs, and beliefs of the indigenous peoples. The Spaniards took concubines, whose offspring came to be known as mestizos, and an Hispanic-Guaraní culture was born. In the Chaco the Amerindians adopted the horse, and after sheep were introduced, they learned to weave and make textiles.

In 1526 and then again in 1529, Sebastian Cabot (? 1476–1557), an accomplished mapmaker, navigator, and son of John Cabot (c. 1450–? 99), (the Italian explorer who discovered Canada) sailed up the Paraguay River and explored the region, but he did not establish any settlements in the area. Five years later in 1534, Pedro de Mendoza (1487–1537), a Spanish conquistador, led an expedition to Paraguay and brought settlers with him. The Amerindians accepted the Spaniards, and the region flourished as a result of Spanish colonization. Jesuit missionaries were sent to Paraguay in 1610 to "civilize" the indigenous peoples. They educated the Amerindians and helped them learn how to build churches, paint, and sculpt. All of the artwork that decorates Paraguay's Catholic churches was done by the Amerindians.

Compared to the way Amerindians were treated in other parts of South America the groups in Paraguay were treated very well. The Jesuits even taught the Indians how to defend themselves from the slave hunters, who were called bandeirantes. The bandeirantes detested this and encouraged the Spanish authorities to expel the Jesuits in 1767.

and declared its independence. For 60 years after independence, three dictators governed the country. José Gaspar Rodríguez Francia (1766–1840) was followed by Carlos Antonio López (1790–1862). During López's rule Paraguay moved toward becoming a modern state. López was succeeded by his son Francisco Solano López (1826–70), who triggered the War of the Triple Alliance in 1864. The war—against Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil—lasted six years, during which time more than half the male population of Paraguay was killed.

From 1870 to 1932 numerous political groups fought for control of the country. During this period more than 30 presidents held office as the government changed hands on a regular basis.

In 1932 Bolivian troops invaded Paraguay to gain control of the Chaco Boreal region. This area was considered strategic because it provided easy access to the Atlantic Ocean through the Paraguay River (Río Paraguay). The Chaco War lasted until 1935, when Bolivia was defeated. A ceasefire was signed on June 12, 1935.

Although political infighting still erupts in Paraguay from time to time, regular presidential elections are held in the country. Corruption, however, is widespread.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in South America, the landlocked country of Paraguay is surrounded by Brazil, Argentina, and Bolivia, although the Paraguay River provides access to the Atlantic Ocean. The country is divided into two parts by the Paraguay River. Topographically Paraguay's terrain is characterized by low, marshy plains in the Gran Chaco region to the west of Río Paraguay; wooded hills and grassy plains to the east of Río Paraguay, while thorny scrubs and dry forests are found scattered in some parts of the country. The highest point of the region is Cerro San Rafael at almost 2,789 feet in height.

Paraguay enjoys a subtropical to temperate climate and humidity lingers on throughout the year. During summer the temperature can get as high as 95°F, while during winter it can fall as low as 41°F.

Paraguay is home to palms, water hyacinths, palo borracho (also known as bottle tree or drunken tree due to its ability to store water in its bulbous trunk), ferns, hardwood trees, spiny bushes, and pink lapa-cho trees (Tabebuia impetiginosa).

Paraguay has a wide variety of fauna that includes the anaconda, boa constrictors (both large snakes), caimans (crocodiles that resemble alligators), Chacoan peccaries (large, furry piglike animals), the hyacinth macaw (large birds with cobalt blue feathers), parakeets, wood storks, wolves, Brazilian tapirs (heavy-bodied nocturnal animals related to the horse and the rhinoceros), jaguars, and giant anteaters.

ECONOMY

Paraguay has a stable export-oriented market economy dependent on the export of products such as cotton, grains, soybeans, sugar, cattle, timber, and power. Brazil is Paraguay's primary trading partner and meets all the country's import needs.

Since 1995, Paraguay has been a member of the MERCOSUR, or Mercado Común del Sur, a free-trading zone shared among Uruguay, Brazil, Argentina, and Paraguay. Also the region of Ciudad del Este in Paraguay is the third largest tax-free commercial zone in the world (after Hong Kong and Miami).

The Itaipu Dam, built jointly by Brazil and Paraguay, meets around 20 percent of the energy requirements of Brazil and also serves as a major revenue generator for Paraguay. Agriculture is the primary occupation in Paraguay, employing more than 45 percent of the population. The most important agricultural exports include sugarcane, cotton, maize, wheat, tapioca, soybeans, and tobacco.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Paraguay is a predominantly Christian country with more than 90 percent of its population adhering either to the Roman Catholic or the Protestant faith. In terms of ethnicity mestizos (people of mixed Spanish and Amerindian heritage) are the dominant ethnic group in the region. Spanish and Guaraní (the language of the Guaraní tribes) are the official languages of Paraguay, and almost half of Paraguay's population is bilingual.

Paraguayans love European music, and the harp and the guitar are extremely popular instruments. Other forms of music such as classical, rock, rap, and reggae are also popular. Paraguayans enjoy

Fun Fact

In addition to providing a means of gaining access to the Atlantic, the Chaco Boreal was mistakenly thought to be rich with oil resources.

War of the Triple Alliance

Paraguay was involved in boundary disputes with Argentina and Brazil for a long time. At the same time, Uruguay also felt threatened by these countries, particularly Argentina. In 1864 Brazil helped Uruguay solve its internal political issues by enabling the leader of the Colorado Party to defeat his opponent from the Blanco Party. Feeling threatened with this meddling in the internal affairs of a smaller country by a larger one, the then-dictator of Paraguay Francisco Solano López began a war with Brazil. To counter this attack Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay formed an alliance and declared war on Paraguay.

For centuries Spanish was the only official language of Paraguay, but in the 1992 Constitution Guaraní was finally recognized as an official language of the country, at the same level as Spanish, and elementary and secondary education is now bilingual.

a particular style of dancing known as the bottle dance in which performers dance vigorously while balancing one or two water-filled bottles on their head.

Paraguay is also known for its traditional handicrafts, especially a lace known as nanduti—a traditional spiderweb lace. Designers draw inspiration from nature and from their observations create designs of flora and fauna in the lace. Another traditional handicraft is homespun, hand-embroidered cotton cloth.

Dueling is legal in Paraguay as long as both parties are registered blood donors.

CUISINE

Paraguay's cuisine offers meat delicacies complemented by tropical and subtropical fruits and vegetables. Manioc (cassava) is a staple of the Paraguayan diet. Some traditional dishes include sooyosopy (a soup made from ground beef and cornmeal), chipas (maize bread with cheese and eggs), boribori (soup made from diced meat, maize dumplings, cheese, and vegetables), albondiga (meatball soup), and sopa paraguaya (soup made from mashed corn, milk, cheese, and onions). Also dishes made from surubi (fish found in the Paraná region of Paraguay) are extremely popular.

An alcoholic drink made from distilled sugarcane juice and honey, known as cana, is the national drink of Paraguay. Mosto (sugarcane juice) and red wine are also popular, along with other alcoholic beverages.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day (in Spanish, Año Nuevo) all over the world. Celebrations and revelries begin the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve) when special parties are held throughout Paraguay. Everyone participates enthusiastically as music fills every corner of the country, and they dance their way into the new year.

On New Year's Day Paraguayans start referring to the infant Jesus as niño del año nuevo (baby of the new year), and families rearrange the figures depicting scenes from the Nativity that they keep in their homes. (Until then Jesus is referred to as niño del navidad [baby of the nativity]).

BATTLE OF CERRO CORA DAY

Observed on: March 1

Battle of Cerro Cora Day, also known as Heroes' Day (in Spanish, Día de Heroes) and National Defense Day, memorializes the death of the former president of Paraguay Francisco Solano López, who died valiantly while defending his country. He was the president of Paraguay from 1862 until his death on March 1, 1870, in the Battle of Cerro Cora. This was an important battle in the War of the Triple Alliance between Paraguay and the Triple Alliance (Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina), which began in 1864. Paraguayans consider López their national hero, and his fight against the Triple Alliance is viewed as symbolic of the heroic struggle of smaller sovereign nations against the aggression of powerful neighboring countries.

On this day Paraguayans remember the valor of their great leader. They also pay homage to the less celebrated heroes who died to safeguard Paraguay's liberty, integrity, and sovereignty.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day (in Spanish, Día del Trabajador), in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Paraguay trade unions organize rallies and demonstrations throughout the country. The country's politicians participate in these rallies and acknowledge the contributions made by workers. In a show of solidarity and to voice their demands, workers in Paraguay turn out in large numbers to make these rallies and demonstrations successful.

Paraguay overthrew the local Spanish authorities on May 15, 1811. Ever since the founding of the city of Asunción in Paraguay by Spanish explorer Juan de Salazar in 1537, the region had been under Spanish control and was administered as a Spanish colonial province. Under a number of the governors, Spanish rule became oppressive. Finally, the local populace revolted and rid themselves of their colonial masters.

On this day, the president presides over Independence Day celebrations in the capital of Asunción. The major highlights of these events include a presidential speech, a parade of the armed forces, and cultural exhibitions such as folk dances and folk music concerts. The festivities generate a high level of patriotic fervor throughout the country.

❁ CHACO ARMISTICE DAY

Observed on: June 12

The Chaco War, which Paraguay fought against Bolivia between 1932 and 1935, ended with a ceasefire agreement on June 12, 1935. The Chaco War was fought between the two countries over control of the Chaco Boreal region, which was strategically important since it provided easy access to the Atlantic Ocean via the Paraguay River that ran through it. This access was deemed essential by the leaders of both the landlocked countries. In addition the territory was erroneously thought to be rich in petroleum resources; speculation about the discovery of oil promised great future riches to whoever controlled the region. This sparked off a war between the two nations. Italian and French forces provided tactical support to Paraguay, and that ensured the defeat of the Bolivian forces.

On this day, Paraguayans celebrate their victory and pay homage to all those who lost their lives during the war.

This victory at Boquerón inspired Paraguayan forces eventually to win the Chaco War against Bolivia.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Paraguayans, having enjoyed the festivities of Carnival until the previous day, begin a fast on the first day of Lent (Ash Wednesday) for 40 days. Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus’ mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus’ journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus’ last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

On Maundy Thursday, Paraguayans who are devout Catholics attend prayer services in their local churches in the morning and evening.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Paraguayan Catholics observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

Paraguayans attend a prayer service in local churches on this day and remember the sacrifice Jesus made for the salvation of humanity. In many parts of the country, huge processions take place in which people reenact his final journey before Crucifixion. Many also carry wooden crosses on their backs in order to experience Jesus’ agony.

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Catholics.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

In Paraguay, devout Christians attend a midnight vigil on Holy Saturday and participate in a candlelight procession. As the priest announces Jesus' Resurrection, all the candles are lit, and people exchange greetings on this festive occasion.

❁ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 8

Since the earliest times of Christianity, Roman Catholic theologians have maintained that the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus, was born with a soul free from original sin. Finally in 1854, the pope issued a solemn decree declaring the Immaculate Conception to be a dogma essential to the belief of the universal church. Under the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, the Virgin Mary was invoked as the patron saint of Portugal, Brazil, and the United States.

On the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, Paraguayans go to the Basilica of Our Lady of the Miracles of Caacupé, the capital of the department of Cordillera, to offer prayers in Mary's honor.

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it the day chosen by the Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus. In Paraguay Christmas is the most important religious festival. Since in Paraguay it falls during summer because the country is located in the Southern Hemisphere, homes are decorated with flowers that bloom in the region at that time of year.

An integral part of Christmas celebrations are the figures depicting the nativity scenes found everywhere, in homes as well as in churches during Christmas. The manger holding these figures is decorated beautifully with tropical fruits such as mangoes, pineapples, papaya, and the flowers from the evergreen cacao tree. Between Christmas and New Year's Eve, Paraguayans address Jesus as niño de la navidad (baby of the Nativity).

On Christmas Eve (December 24), Catholics attend Midnight Mass, known as the La Misa del Gallo (the Mass of the Rooster). Choirs sing carols in honor of this auspicious day. On Christmas Day people visit friends and family members and exchange gifts and greetings. A traditional Christmas meal consists of roast pork, potatoes, salads, and apples.

❁ FESTIVAL DE SAN JUAN

Observed in: Paraguay

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: June

The Festival of San Juan is an annual midsummer festival that takes place in the month of June throughout Paraguay. It commemorates the birth of St. John of the Cross, a Spanish saint who was born on June 24, 1542. (San Juan is the Spanish name of St. John.)

Fire walking and fortunetelling are two important events of the Fiesta de San Juan in Paraguay. Some fortunes are predicted on the basis of the shapes formed by melting wax in a pan filled with water. On the eve of the fiesta, young girls perform a number of rituals that include placing a cross-shaped laurel leaf under their pillows because they believe they will eventually marry the men they see in their dreams on this night. Also, they plant beans and corn since they believe doing so will help them determine whether their husband will be Paraguayan (if the bean grows first) or a foreigner (when the corn grows first). Another Paraguayan tradition is to throw a shoe over the house. If it lands on the heel, then unwed women will get married in the coming year.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In an earlier era, the tribal women of Paraguay gave birth in the forests. Elderly women helped them in the process of delivery. However, contemporary women prefer giving birth in local hospitals.

Infants are baptized in the local church. Parents carefully select their closest relatives as godparents, or compadrazgos, because they will share equal responsibility for the child with the birth parents. Also compadrazgos are considered an integral part of the family. In the event of the death of the birth parents, responsibility for the child's upbringing passes to his or her godparents. Ideally compadrazgos are a married couple since people believe that such a union will provide more stability in the life of the child, especially if the responsibility to raise it falls on them. The ritual of baptism is performed in accordance with Roman Catholic beliefs and takes place in the presence of compadrazgos, parents, close family members, and friends. The priest makes a cross on the child's forehead, pouring water on the child's head (to cleanse it of all sins), anointing its forehead with the holy oil and thus, formally welcoming the child into the Catholic community. The cost of baptism is borne by the godparents. Also like parents, they are expected to give gifts to the child on birthdays and other special occasions.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Paraguay the ritual of confirmation usually takes place when people are old enough to make their own decisions. Through this ritual a baptized child confirms its belief in Christianity and is welcomed as a full member in the Catholic community. Before people are confirmed, they attend confirmation classes where they are taught about the important beliefs of Roman Catholicism. Confirmation is always performed by a bishop, who represents the wider church and confirms people by laying hands on their heads and praying for them. The actual ritual or sacrament of confirmation takes place during the Mass, after the bishop completes the sermon. The bishop reads aloud the names of all those who will be confirmed. Those being confirmed will say that they believe in God, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit and ask for strength and courage to live as Jesus would want them to and to actively proselytize their faith.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Paraguay it is mandatory for a grand feast to follow both civil and church marriages. Therefore in earlier times, Paraguayan peasants opted for consensual unions because the festivities surrounding civil and church marriages were too expensive. In modern Paraguay most people choose between civil and church marriages. Even though church weddings continue to be expensive affairs, many Paraguayans opt for them. In the presence of God the priest, family members, and friends, the bride and the groom exchange marital vows and rings and promise to love each other for the rest of their lives. The church ceremony is followed by a lavish reception with singing, dancing, and feasting.

Often, the church wedding is preceded by a civil ceremony to give legal status to the marriage.

Some Paraguayans prefer to have only a civil marriage and enter into matrimony by signing a legal document in front of state authorities and two witnesses. Parents usually accompany the couple, and after the ceremony a small party is held with close family members and friends to celebrate the occasion.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Of all the countries in South America, Peru may be the most excavated and, therefore, the best understood (although much remains unknown). Peru's total prehistoric sequence spans 15,000 years, beginning about 13,000 B.C.E. when the first hunter-gatherer peoples left their traces in highland caves. Thereafter, according to archaeologists, a succession of cultures evolved, starting in 9500 B.C.E. and ending with the arrival of the invading Europeans in 1534. The sequence is roughly divided into two "eras," the Pre-ceramic (9500–1800/1500) and the Ceramic (1800/1500 B.C.E.–1534 C.E.) There were times when indigenous cultures coexisted, and archaeologists postulate that the decline of these societies was connected with extended periods of severe drought or flooding, perhaps as a result of large-scale Los Niños.

The earliest pre-Incan people so far identified were the Oquendo, who lived in the region around 9500 (Period I). They were followed by the Lauricocha, who inhabited Peru for close to 5,000 years. Coexistent with them were the Chivateros I (9500–8000), the Chivateros II, Playa, Arenal, and Puyenca (8000–6000), succeeded by the Lauricocha II, Luz, Ambo, and Canario (6000–4200). Between 4200 and 2500 yet a third period of the Lauricocha has been identified, contemporaneous with the Honda and Viscachani. The last Pre-ceramic societies were the Casavilca, Culebras, Viscachani, and Huaca Prieta (Period VI, 2500–1800/1500).

The Initial Period of the Ceramic era (1800/1500–900) saw the rise of the Early Chiripa, Kotosh, and Toril cultures and the construction of the Cumbe Mayo Aqueduct, which survives at an elevation of 11,000 feet and stretches for about five miles. Constructed between 1500 and 1000, it may be the oldest structure made by human hands in all of South America. There are also petroglyphs on the aqueduct and in surrounding caverns.

Between 900 and 200 C.E. alongside the Late Chiripa and Paracas, the Chavín culture, known for its metallurgy, textiles, and ceramics, developed and flourished along the Pacific coast. By 900, the Chavín had developed agriculture, a trade network, and religious observances (perhaps shamanistic), and laid the foundation for the highly sophisticated Andean societies that would follow. Abstract designs on their pottery indicate the possibility of an Olmec influence.

In the hills of Peru’s southern coastal desert near Palpa, archaeologists have found approximately 50 giant figures scraped into the Earth. The figures are thought to have been made by the Paracas people between 600 and 100, predating the world-famous Nazca lines by about 500 years. One figure may represent a deity commonly found on textiles and pottery of the same period, suggesting a religious purpose for the figures.

In the next period the Early Intermediate (200–600), the Moche, Nazca, and Tiwanaku cultures developed and would survive into the Middle Horizon period, until about 700. Another civilization known for its warriors was the Sechins. Around the fifth century the Chevín and Sechins gradually declined, and several other cultures emerged. Both the Nazca (or Ica-Nazca) and the Moche built extensive irrigation systems.

The Moche, who settled in northern Peru, are known for their exquisite ceramics. They used molds to produce their designs in large quantities, although the colors are limited, primarily red and white. Several Moche ruins can still be seen near Trujillo, Peru. Huaca del Sol, a pyramidal structure, was used for religious ceremonies and burials for the social elite, and was probably the largest pre-Columbian structure in Peru until it was destroyed by Europeans looking for gold. The nearby Huaca de la Luna is smaller and contains colorful murals. In 2004 it was being excavated.

The Tiwanaku may have been the builders responsible for the megalithic structures at Tiahuanaco, including the Akapana pyramid and the Kalasasaya compound.

The next period, the Late Intermediate (1000–1476), saw the rise of the Huari, Chimú, and Chíncha cultures. The Kingdom of Chimor—the political grouping of the Chimú culture—ruled the northern coast of Peru, from about 850 to 1470. The Chimú developed from what remained of the Moche culture but were also strongly influenced by both the Cajamarca and the Huari cultures. According to Chimú legend their capital at Chan Chan had been founded by Taycanamo, who came to the coastline from the sea.

The Chimú were the last culture that might have stopped the invasion of the Inca. The Inca conquest began in the 1470s by Túpac Inca (r. 1471–93) and was nearly complete when his son Huayna Capac (r. 1493–1527) assumed the throne in 1493, becoming Sapa Inca, or ruler of the empire. By the early 15th century, the most prominent civilization was that of the Incas. At their peak from 1438 to 1533 they controlled a territory of almost 621,371 square miles, centered in what is now Peru. During that period the Inca used conquest and peaceful assimilation to incorporate a large portion of western South America, centered around the Andean mountain ranges. Huayna Capac, the sixth Sapa of the Hanan Dynasty, extended the empire as far south as Argentina and Chile and was fighting to add northern territories in what is now Ecuador and Colombia when he and his successor Ninan were stricken by what may have been smallpox in 1527. Atahualpa, one of Ninan’s several brothers, was already consolidating his position when he heard that both Huayna and Ninan were dead.

In the early 16th century Spanish conquistador Francisco Pizarro (1475–1541) came to Peru and explored the coastal areas. The capital of the Inca Empire Cuzco was the richest city in the Americas when the Spanish conquistadors arrived. After seeing the wealth and power of the Inca Empire, Pizarro went back to Spain to raise money and prepare a team for another expedition to Peru.

The Inca Empire was short lived. On Pizarro’s second trip to Peru, his men were well armed and easily overpowered the Incas. In 1533 Atahualpa, the last Incan emperor, was killed on Pizarro’s orders, marking the beginning of Spanish rule. Cuzco was conquered, and many Indians were forced to adopt Christianity.

Pizarro founded the city of Lima in 1535. Over the next 200 years Lima became an important social and political center. Although the Spaniards’ exploitation of Amerindians led to an uprising in 1780, it was short lived, and most of the Incas were executed. In 1821 Peru declared its independence from Spain, but independence was only formally achieved in 1824. Chile invaded Peru in 1879, and this resulted in the War of the Pacific, as a result of which Chile acquired part of Peru’s territory.

The 20th century saw an upheaval of the Peruvian economy. Peru gradually moved from a rural to an urban society. The population increased from about 7 million in 1950 to about 20 million in 1985. At the same time an open economic system was adopted with few restrictions on either imports or foreign investment. Because the government did not intervene in the economy much, it was not equipped to absorb the rapid population increase, and the result was mass unemployment. Since 2001 the government has taken more action to create new jobs in the industrial sector, and there has been steady economic growth of approximately 4 percent a year for the past four years. Nevertheless the problem of unemployment persists.

Machu Picchu

This legendary place, known as the Lost City of Machu Picchu, is undoubtedly the most important tourist attraction in Peru and one of the world's most impressive archaeological sites. This city was built by the Incas on the summit of Machu Picchu (Old Peak), a mountain overlooking the deep canyon of the Urubamba River, 75 miles from the city of Cuzco.

Sitting on a mountain site of extraordinary beauty, in the middle of a tropical mountain forest, Machu Picchu was probably the most amazing urban creation of the Inca Empire. Its architecture includes giant walls, terraces, and ramps, which appear as though they have been cut naturally in the continuous rock escarpments. The building style is late imperial Inca, and the city is thought to have been a sanctuary inhabited by high priests and the Virgins of the Sun (chosen women). Out of the 135 skeletons that were found, 109 were of women.

The mysterious Machu Picchu is also one of the Incas' best-kept secrets, since they did not leave any written records about it, and Spanish chronicles make no mention of the citadel. It was discovered only in 1911 by the U.S. professor Hiram Bingham of Yale. There are many causes attributed to the fall of the city, but the truth is still a mystery.

The site has been designated a UNESCO World Heritage Site.

Ecuador. Even though Peru is a diverse country—with hot deserts, dry forests, humid savannahs, plain rain forests, cold plateaus, cool steppes, and icy mountains—the topography can be divided into three distinct zones: the coastal region, the Andes Mountains, and the Amazon Basin. The Amazonian plains are drained by the Marañon and Ucayali Rivers. The highest peak in Peru is located in the western Andes. This peak, called Huascarán, is 22,211 feet high.

The Andes, which run longitudinally, break the country in two parts: the desert coast and the Amazon jungle. The mountain range acts as a natural barrier between the two and creates a new region by itself. Winds from the jungle are unable to reach the coast, keeping it dry. On the border with Bolivia lies Lake Titicaca, the world's highest navigable lake at 12,536 feet.

The Humboldt is a cold current that comes from the southern seas. In the north of Peru it mixes with the warm current called El Niño, creating temperature and climatic variation. The weather on the coast is generally temperate and dry.

With three distinctive topographical zones, Peru is rich in flora and fauna; of the 104 life zones identified in the world, 84 of them are found in Peru. It is home to the Polylepis forests, an ever-green member of the rose family, which provide habitat for three of South America's endangered birds: great colored parrots, toucans, and the Royal Cinclodes. Bird and marine life is also abundant in the Peruvian coastal deserts, where sea lions, the Humboldt penguin, the Chilean flamingo, the Peruvian pelican, the Inca tern, the brown booby, the Andean condor, the puna ibis, and the hummingbird are found. Peru is also home to the llama, alpaca, guanaco, vicuña (all these animals are wild or domesticated mammals found only in the South American continent), jaguar, bear, and tapir

Peru is blessed with abundant mineral wealth and excellent fishing grounds. Natural resources such as copper, silver, gold, petroleum, iron ore, coal, phosphate, potash, hydropower, and natural gas are found in this region. The major industries of Peru are pulp, paper, coca leaves, fishmeal, steel, chemicals, oil, minerals, cement, auto assembly, steel, and shipbuilding. Even though only 3 percent of the total land area is arable, the country cultivates coffee, cotton, sugarcane, rice, wheat, potatoes, corn, plantains, and cocoa. Poultry, beef, dairy products, wool, and fish are other contributors to the economy. Peru shares good trade relations with the United States, China, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Japan, Chile, Spain, Colombia, Brazil, Venezuela, and Argentina.

Peru is famous for the variety of its musical genres. Spanish and African influences are evident in the folk music produced in this region and the instruments used. Andean music is popularly known as música folklórica.

Modern music is also popular in Peru. Various genres of music such as rock, pop, blues, reggae, hip-hop, and punk are all produced and enjoyed. Latin American dance forms, such as salsa, cumbia, and the cha-cha are popular in Peru.

Peruvian literature is rich and full of inspirational prose and poetry. One of the most renowned Peruvian authors is Mario Vargas Llosa (b. 1936). His novels deal with various aspects of Peruvian society including politics and culture. Other noted Peruvian writers are José María Arguedas (1911–69), Ciro Alegría (1909–67), Julio Ramón Ribeyro (1929–94), and Alfredo Bryce Echenique (b. 1939).

Fun Fact

The Incas' imperial city of Cuzco (which means "navel of the Earth") was laid out in the form of a puma, the Inca Empire's symbolic animal. The puma's belly formed the main plaza, the river Tulumayo formed its spine, and the hill of Sacsayhuaman, one of the most imposing architectural works of the Incas its head.

Before the Spaniards occupied Peru, the art of this region was expressed in pottery, metalwork, stone craft, and textiles. Since the conquest Peruvian art and architecture have become a mixture of Spanish culture and Amerindian styles, called mestizo. The best examples of mestizo architecture can be found in the churches around Puno and Arequipa.

CUISINE

Peruvian cuisine is known as one of the best in South America. The national dish of Peru is seviche, a delicacy made of indigenous lime and fish. The fish is marinated and cooked in lime juice. A variation is seviche de corvina (made with white sea bass and served with potato).

Seafood and the Incan delicacy of roast guinea pig are some of the more popular dishes found in Peru. Other dishes include lomo saltado (chopped steak with onions) and sopa a la criolla (noodle soup with beef, egg, milk, and vegetables). The national drink of Peru is called pisco. It is a strong alcoholic beverage made of grapes and is served alone or mixed with lime juice, egg white, and sugar. The word pisco is Incan in origin and means "bird."

Fun Fact

On the coast of Peru archaeologists found kernels of popcorn more than 1,000 years old. The Peruvian Indians' methods of preservation were so advanced that the corn still pops after a thousand years.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. The tradition began in 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Peru, workers hold marches all over the country.

BATTLE OF ANGAMOS DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 8

This holiday commemorates a naval battle fought between Chile and Peru in 1879 during the War of the Pacific. A Peruvian armored naval vessel, or ironclad, named the Huáscar was surrounded and captured by the Chilean Navy in October 8, 1879. The captain of the ironclad, Adm. Miguel Grau, was killed in combat. After this battle Peru was unable to prevent the invasion of its territory, and the seas were cleared for the invasion of both Peru and Bolivia. It was a decisive Chilean victory, and the people of Peru remember with sadness the people who died in this battle.

Although the Peruvian sailors tried to scuttle the Huáscar, the Chileans were able to save it and added it to their navy. (Chile celebrates this battle annually as the Glorias Navales, when Chile won dominion of the seas.)

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans. Devout Catholics who attend church services on Palm Sunday receive a cross made from a piece of dried palm frond.

✿ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Peruvians observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion. In Peru on Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over.

Fun Fact

The Inca used a "computer," called a quipu, made of colored knotted cotton cords to keep numerical records. The colors of the cords, the way the cords are connected, the relative placement of the cords, the spaces between the cords, the types of knots on the individual cords, and the relative placement of the knots all record specific numerical information. The complexity and number of knots on a quipu could indicate the contents of a warehouse, the number of taxpayers in a province, and census figures.

Fun Fact

St. Rose and St. Martín of Porres, both born in Lima, Peru, were good friends.

On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus. On Easter Sunday in Peru church bells are rung to announce the Resurrection of Jesus. They start the day by attending special prayer services. It is important for them to carry a huge image of Jesus in a procession traveling all over their neighborhoods.

For most Peruvians this is a day of relaxation to be spent with their families, and they usually prepare special dinners on this day.

❁ INTI RAYMI

Observed in: Cuzco

Observed on: June 24

Inti Raymi, the Sun Festival, was one of the most important Incan festivals. After the conquest of the Inca Empire it was suppressed by the Spanish and was not revived until 1944. Today it is the second biggest festival in Latin America, after Carnival in Rio.

Originally three days in length, this festival was observed by the Incas to honor their most important deity, the Sun god. It celebrated the marriage between the Sun god and his human sons, the Incas. On the day of the summer solstice the Incas began chanting at sunrise. Their voices would grow steadily louder until the Sun was high in the midday sky, then taper off as dusk approached.

Now the festival lasts for a week around the time of the Southern Hemisphere's winter solstice, culminating the last week of June. On this day men and women wear excessive amounts of gold and silver as a sign of respect for the ancient Incan Empire. Parades, dancing, singing, exhibits, and other activities take place on this day.

Tourists throng to Cuzco in June to observe the procession, led by ceremonial virgins carrying sacred offerings through the city's winding streets. The procession arrives at the ruins of Sacsayhuaman overlooking the city, where rituals are performed and the entrails of a slaughtered llama are examined to divine what the coming year will bring.

Fun Fact

Sacsayhuaman was the site of the final battle, a very bloody encounter, between the Spanish and the Incas. In the end the Spanish cavalry overcame Manco Inca's men.

Rose helped the people in many ways and alleviated their sufferings. After her death many people claimed to have witnessed miracles.

Since the time of the early church, Roman Catholic theologians have maintained that the Virgin Mary (the mother of Jesus) was born with a soul free from original sin. Finally in 1854, the pope issued a solemn decree declaring the Immaculate Conception to be a dogma essential to the belief of the universal church. Under the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, the Virgin Mary was invoked as the patron saint of Portugal, Brazil, and the United States.

In Peru people go to church to attend special prayer services conducted in Mary's name.

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day chosen by the Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Messiah. In Peru Christmas celebrations begin on December 24 (Christmas Eve) and last until December 26. On December 24, families attend church and Catholics offer prayers in a special Midnight Mass. The nativity scenes of Peru are famous all over the world. In earlier times priests would travel extensively to preach their faith and they often carried an altar with them. These altars were modified into small boxes with pictures of saints above the altar and scenes from everyday life beneath it. These painted boxes were called retablos. For Christmas the retablos depicted Mary, Joseph, and the baby Jesus, with local people crowding around.

The main highlights of Carnival in Peru are

History of Carnival

Carnival is a time to celebrate life and rejuvenation. Parties, music, and dances, along with wild, boisterous, colorful parades of people in costume fill the streets. This event, held in most predominantly Catholic countries, is a celebration that precedes the Lenten season of fasting and abstinence.

Carnival traces its roots to pre-Christian Roman times. It is derived from the ancient festival of Saturnalia, when the Romans burned the effigy of the ugly king of ancient Saturnalia. This celebration also marked the end of the battle between summer and winter. The traditional masks worn during Carnival represent the dead or spirits from the netherworld that come in close contact with humans during this period of seasonal change. The colorful costumes represent the coming spring.

water fights and various contests held on different days. A queen of the Carnival is also elected on this occasion. There are singing contests and colorful parades in which people wear magnificent masks. A lot of dancing, feasting, drinking, and night-long parties mark this event, and Peru's cities are crowded with visitors during this season.

PUNO JUBILEE WEEK

Observed in: Puno

Fun Fact

The hit song by Simon and Garfunkel, “If I Could (El Cóndor Pasa),” was adapted from an Andean song.

Puno is the folkloric center of Peru. This city was founded in 1868 by the Spaniards and gained popularity because of the silver and gold mines located in its vicinity.

The city of Puno celebrates its founding during the first week of November.

Even though there are celebrations held in this city throughout the year, the Puno Jubilee Week, also called Puno Days, is the most well known event in the city. During this 10-day celebration, processions and masked dancers celebrate the beginning of the Inca Empire by enacting scenes from the Incan legends.

A handicrafts fair, instrumental and vocal musical shows, sports competitions, various special exhibits, lectures, dancing, and feasting are all part of the fair, and the people of Peru party throughout Puno Days. The city enjoys media coverage.

BIRTH

When a child is born in Peru, the mother takes special care to cover the baby's head with a hat. Peruvians believe that the baby's head is very fragile and can split open easily. The baby wears this hat, made of lamb wool or cotton, for a month. It is said that the child is out of danger after this time period.

Like many other Latin Americans, Peruvians also believe in evil spirits and the evil eye. Mothers tie a tiny piece of wood, a bean, or a string of garlic around the child's wrist or they hang one of these around the child's neck. In case the evil eye has already been cast on the baby, Peruvians tie the child up in tight cloths, and the mother wears a loose blouse. The child is then passed through the blouse three times to represent the process of childbirth as well as the Christian symbol of the cross.

Peruvian wedding traditions are predominantly Catholic. However, there are some rituals unique to the country. For instance, some interesting rituals precede the cutting of the wedding cake. The Peruvian wedding cake is unique: There are colored ribbons attached to each layer of the cake. One of the ribbons has a ring attached to it, hidden in the cake. Single women attending the wedding party are made to pull one string each. The one who pulls the ribbon with the ring is believed to be the next person to be married.

Smashing an earthen jar is another tradition. After the church ceremony, while the newlyweds walk out of the church, the priest smashes an earthen jar to confirm their marriage.

DEATH

Most Peruvians are given a Catholic burial after death. It is customary to bury the dead person's most prized possessions along with his or her body. (In earlier days, a dead man's best-loved women were also buried along with him!)

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

There are several theories about the prehistoric period in the Philippines. But because archaeologists depend heavily on artifacts and other finds, with less than 10 percent of artifacts excavated, it is difficult to find a single theory that accounts for what is known. Regardless of the theories, the facts do not change: The earliest traces of human habitation in the Philippines have been found in Palawan, at the mouth of the South China Sea. The Tabon Caves, where some of the oldest artifacts have been found, may be what every archaeologist hopes for—tools from different periods in prehistory in several different well-defined levels.

At one time the Philippine Islands and Borneo were connected by the Palawan bridge. Looking at Palawan's geographical location and physical appearance, it is not difficult to visualize it as a bridge to nearby islands. Located on the southwest coast of Palawan, Tabon Caves revealed a habitation level dated to 30,000 years ago, predating the arrival of people in the Americas.

The first people to cross the land bridge were hunter-gatherers who arrived in the Philippine archipelago during the Middle Paleolithic era (300,000–30,000 years ago). Among the tools found in the Tabon Caves are chert (a rock resembling flint) and river pebbles broken off at one end and used as hammers and choppers that date back to between 50,000 and 9,000 years ago.

When the ice melted and the land bridges sank, the Neolithic era began, bringing dramatic changes to how people traveled and the tools they made and used. These were superior to the simple pebbles of the Paleolithic hunter-gatherers. Axes and gouges made by flaking were now capable of Ferdinand Marcos's wife, Imelda, also known as the Steel Butterfly of the Philippines, is notorious for her extravagant lifestyle and the illegal wealth she amassed during her husband's 21-year tenure. She owned large walk-in closets with huge collections of designer clothes, jewelry, and over 1,200 pairs of shoes. She even opened a museum to display her shoe collection.

falling trees and clearing land for cultivation. Shell adzes, made from giant clams, were also in use in Palawan, just as they were in Micronesia at the same time. Charcoal samples estimate the artifacts to be 5,000 years old, coinciding with the period when people first sailed into the Pacific. Neolithic people were mobile, and those who arrived in the Philippines probably traveled by sea, finding the Philippines in the Late Neolithic.

In 500–400, people in the islands started to use gold, silver, and bronze.

Along with the development of bronze, which was not made locally (the islands have no source of tin), was the arrival of glass and jade ornaments. Similar artifacts found in South China and Northern Indochina prompt investigators to suggest major movements from the south of China toward the south of mainland Asia, eventually reaching the Philippines by boat, indicating that the Philippines have close cultural ties with South China. Agriculture, introduced during the Neolithic period, improved and settlements were established along coasts, bays, or rivers.

Extensive trade apparently began in the 11th century. The earliest traders to find their way to the Philippines may have been Arabs. The Chinese came during the 13th century and traded porcelain for stoneware and local pottery. Trade potteries represented formal trade relations between the two countries. Altogether, 40,000 pieces of porcelain have been recovered in the Philippines, 80 percent of it from South China. The earthenware vessels and jars produced locally were gradually being replaced by jars with dragon designs.

The first of the Europeans to arrive in the Philippines was Ferdinand Magellan (c. 1480–1521), a Portuguese navigator who set sail from Spain in search of new territories in the 15th century. He attempted to stake Spain's claim to the Philippines but was put to death by local chiefs.

Ruy López de Villalobos (c. 1500–44), another Spanish navigator, followed him in 1543. He named the islands "Las Islas Filipinas" in honor of King Philip II of Spain (1527–98). The Spanish occupied the islands in 1565, and most of the country was under Spanish rule by 1571. Christian missionaries arrived with the Spanish soldiers, and Roman Catholicism was immediately introduced. The majority of Filipinos were converted.

While Spain was occupied in the Seven Years' War (1756–63), the forces of the British East India Company captured the Philippines in 1762 and introduced the English language to the islands. However, the 1763 Treaty of Paris forced Britain to return control of the islands to Spain, and the British left the Philippines in 1764. Britain's brief occupation, however, considerably weakened Spain's grip on the Philippines.

The Filipino independence movement gained momentum in the 19th century. The Filipinos fought on the side of the United States in the Spanish-American War in 1898. With the defeat of the Spanish the Filipinos hoped that they would be given their freedom. Instead the United States decided to buy the islands, along with Cuba, Guam, and Puerto Rico, from the Spanish for US$20 million.

Over a period of time the United States acknowledged the Filipino right to independence, and in 1935 Manuel L. Quezon (1878–1944) became the interim president of the Philippine Commonwealth while the transfer of power was taking place. In 1942 the Japanese invaded and ruled over the Philippines for two years during World War II, and the United States invaded the country for the second time. However, this time the Philippines were granted full independence in 1946.

In 1965 Ferdinand Marcos (1917–89) was elected president of the Philippines. He announced martial law and ruled with an iron fist until 1986. In 1986 Corazón Aquino (b. 1933), the wife of slain opposition leader "Ninoy" Aquino (1932–83), started a movement against Marcos's rule that forced him to leave the country. She set up a democratic form of government and was able to survive numerous coups during her tenure. In 1992 she was succeeded by her defense minister Fidel Ramos (b. 1928). Subsequently in 2004 she was elected to a second term in office.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Philippines is an archipelago of 7,107 islands located between Taiwan and Borneo. The country lies in the Pacific Ocean's so-called Ring of Fire, a zone that is prone to earthquakes and volcanic activity. Being volcanic in origin, the terrain of the islands is mountainous. Almost 10 percent of the total land area is covered with tropical forests.

The highest point of the country is Mont Apo, standing tall at 9,692 feet.

The Philippines has a hot and humid tropical climate and the annual average temperature is close to 80°F. There are three main seasons: tag-ulan, the rainy season (June to November), taglamig, or winter (December to February), and summer, or tag-init or tag-araw (March to May).

In terms of flora and fauna, the Philippine Islands are home to the palm and bamboo as well as over 10,000 species of ferns, trees, and shrubs and more than 1,000 species of fauna including mouse deer, dwarf buffalo, pythons, crocodiles, the Philippine eagle (the largest eagle in the world), and the Philippine tarsier (the smallest mammal in the world).

❁ ECONOMY

The Philippines economy is dependent on agriculture, light manufacturing, and the services industries. Agriculture employs 45 percent of the nation's population, while the services sector employs 40 percent. In 1998 poor weather conditions and the Asian financial crisis affected the economy greatly. However, the government has introduced a number of fiscal and economic reforms to undo the damage done by the crisis. These include increasing investment in infrastructure development, overhauling the tax system, finding a means of improving government revenue, and the deregulation and privatization of various industries.

Major export items of the Philippines include coconut products (the Philippines is the largest producer of coconuts in the world), machinery and equipment, garments, electronic and transportation equipment, and chemicals.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Philippines is a predominantly Christian country with 83 percent of the people practicing the Roman Catholic faith and 9 percent belonging to Protestant sects. The country is also home to Muslims, Buddhists, and people of other faiths.

In terms of ethnicity the Philippines is composed primarily of Malay and Chinese. English and Filipino are the official languages of the country, but eight dialects are also widely spoken in the country including Tagalog, Cebuano, Ilocan, Hiligaynon or Ilonggo, Bicol, Waray, Pampango, and Pangasinense.

The Philippines has a rich literary culture and some of the prominent literary figures include José Rizal (1861–96), Pedro Paterno (1858–1911), and Claro M. Recto (1890–1960).

Filipino music is known for its diversity. Some of the popular musical styles include barana, which is part of a courtship ritual performed by men singing underneath a woman's window; kundiman, which is lyrical music that speaks about love; and American folk, blues, rock and roll, and pinoy rock (a genre of rock music with Filipino lyrics).

❁ CUISINE

Filipino cuisine has been greatly influenced by Chinese, Spanish, and Malay cooking. Some traditional Filipino foods include barbecued meat, lechon (roasted pig), balat (crispy pig skins) chicken, meat stew, seafood, fermented fish, rice, vegetables cooked in garlic and vinegar, noodles, papaya, liver soup, and a wide variety of other soups.

Halo-halo is a traditional dessert made from sweet preserved beans (red beans, chick peas), coconut meat (macapuno), jackfruit (langka), pounded dried rice (pinipig), sweet yam (ube), cream flan (leche flan), shreds of sweetened plantain (saba) filled with crushed ice, milk (or coconut milk), and topped with ice cream. The halo-halo basically is a sweet, creamy, and filling dessert.

Some of the favorite beverages of the Philippines include tuba (the fermented sap of palms), tea, coffee, beer, and wine.

bay. At the stroke of midnight families gather for the sabulong (welcoming the New Year) and light firecrackers or beat pans and drums to make loud noises.

Many people attend a traditional Midnight Mass in local churches and pray for a prosperous new year. Then they dine on a traditional meal, referred to as the Media Noche (family midnight meal) and during which it is customary to serve 12 types of round fruits representing each month of the year.

People wear new clothes, preferably red and gold, since these colors are associated with prosperity. These should also have deep pockets, which should be filled with coins and new bills. At the stroke of midnight everyone shakes their pockets vigorously to produce noise by clanking the coins for good luck.

Also Filipinos believe that on New Year's Eve all the lights in the house should be kept lit throughout the night, and coins should be scattered around doorsteps and even on windowsills to invite prosperity into one's home.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. The tradition started in 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor, demanding an eight-hour workday. On this day trade unions in the Philippines organize huge gatherings and rallies throughout the country, and workers march in processions through the streets.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

On Maundy Thursday, Filipinos visit as many churches as possible and seek God's blessings. This practice is known as visita iglesia. Also they attend church services where passion plays are staged throughout the country.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Many Filipinos observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion.

In the Philippines, on Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings. Jesus' Crucifixion is a much more important event here than his Resurrection. In many parts of the Philippines including Manila, San Fernando, and Antipolo, many worshippers try to feel Jesus' pain by crucifying themselves on a Cross in the same manner as he was. For the Crucifixion two-inch stainless steel nails dipped in alcohol are used. Also many indulge in self-flagellation with whips that have sharp objects attached to them.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

In the Philippines people attend midnight prayer services for Easter and celebrate Jesus' Resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit envelops churches as people sing devotional hymns. On Easter in different parts of the Philippines, statues of the resurrected Jesus and his grieving mother, Mary, are taken through the streets in long processions.

Observed on: Good Friday

The Cutud Lenten Rites take place as part of the Good Friday observances in the region of Pampanga. During this religious ritual, enactment of the Vin Crucis (Crucifixion) takes place, with many people dressed in the attire of Roman soldiers and peasants of the biblical era. Early in the morning there is a procession, and many people flog themselves with whips that have glass-spiked leather thongs attached to them. They follow a penitent, who represents Jesus and carries a wooden cross throughout the trek. On reaching their destination, women kneel in front of the procession and wail a version of the Gospel of the Seville Passion. Every year three or more penitents are nailed to makeshift crosses.

Rites of Passage

* BIRTH

In the Philippines in order to ward off the evil eye after the birth of a child, the placenta is placed in a bamboo tube and tied on a tree beside the house or on rafters.

* COMING OF AGE

In ancient times the initiation ceremony for boys involved a circumcision ritual, which was known as pagtutuli, and an expert manunuli (traditional surgeon) performed the surgery. Circumcision was considered an important ritual that helped a child in completing his transition from boyhood to manhood.

* MARRIAGE

Filipino marriage customs include a mix of Spanish influences, Roman Catholic traditions, and local customs. One of their beliefs is that it is unlucky for a bride to be closely involved in the final planning and preparations of her wedding, or kasalan.

It is up to the groom to convince not just the woman, but her family and her entire village (barangay) that he is the appropriate choice. After the proposal is accepted, a ring or a treasured family heirloom is given to the bride. This officially engages the couple. Then follows the pamanbikan—a formal occasion when the bride's parents invite the groom and his family to a meeting where they formalize the wedding date. The groom's family generally brings a gift for the bride's family on this occasion. After this panimilbihan—an age-old tradition that requires the groom to run errands for the bride's family in order to prove his worth—takes place. Nowadays the groom's ritual performance can be satisfied by shopping for the bride's family and replacing lightbulbs!

A send-off party is held close to the wedding date in honor of the bride-to-be. This celebrates her family's consent to the marriage and the bestowal of their blessings. The groom, his family, close friends, relatives from both sides, and the wedding entourage are invited to meet and get to know one another before the ceremony. Then a few days prior to their wedding, the couple confesses their sins to a priest since they will eat the bread and drink the wine (the ritual of the Eucharist) during the wedding ceremony.

Finally on the wedding day, a Mass is held that everyone involved attends. This is followed by a church wedding. A common and honored tradition is for the bride to hold a family heirloom rosary during the nuptial Mass. The bride and the groom cup their hands together, and the priest drops 13 silver coins into the groom's open palms, which pass from his palms to the bride's and into a plate held by an acolyte. The trickling of the coins, or arrhae, is a sign of fidelity and completes the marriage contract.

After the wedding the couple often releases a pair of white doves to signify a peaceful and harmonious marital relationship. Then a money dance is held during which guests pin paper money on the bride or groom in exchange for a chance to dance with them.

* DEATH

In the Filipino culture death is a spiritual event. Filipinos believe that illness is due to a punishment from God or from an angry spirit. Religious medallions, rosary beads, scapula, and religious figures are kept at the bedside of the dying. Among the Filipinos children often take care of the sick and elderly, since a sense of kinship is felt strongly in their culture.

Filipinos do not believe in cremation. In the period after death and before the burial (between three and seven days) the family stops all personal business. During funerals it is customary for Filipino women to grieve openly. This involves sobbing publicly, swooning, fainting, and/or hugging the casket of the dead person. Men, however, are typically more reserved. As a rule the casket is open, and it is normal for people to touch the body of the dead person. The deceased also has to be blessed by the priest so the soul can go to heaven.

Filipinos hold rosary sessions for 30 days to help the passage of the soul to heaven. The grieving period can last up to a year and often beyond. Male relatives of the deceased wear a black ribbon, and women dress in black to indicate they are in mourning.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

During the first half of the Neolithic period there were at least three archaeological cultures in this region of Poland: the Linear Pottery culture (c. 4400–4000 B.C.E.), the Lengyel culture (c. 3500–3200), and the Funnel Beaker culture (c. 3200–2600). (Little is known about the period between the Linear Pottery culture and the Lengyel.)

The Linear Pottery people settled along the stream channels created by meltwater as the glaciers retreated at the end of the last Ice Age. They usually lived in small settlements, food-producing communities that identified what might be likely locations for settlements and performed the work of initiating forest clearance to make space for agriculture.

The contemporary settlements at Brzesc Kujawski and Oslonki were quite large during the Lengyel period, because more land was cleared and its uses were more diversified. There are also more diverse species' bones found at the sites, including birds, sheep, and goats. As more species were incorporated into the survival system, land use gradually became more sophisticated, and exploitation was more intensive. Around the longhouses, for example, methods of disposing of waste and rubbish had to be developed, and more forest was cut to supply timber for building the longhouses as well as for fuel, the manufacture of tools, and maintenance of the houses. Because Brzesc Kujawski and Oslonki were quite close to each other, there was doubtless a lot of contact between the two groups, creating more disturbance of wildlife habitat.

Following the end of the Lengyel settlements at Oslonki, then at Brzesc Kujawski, the Funnel Beaker people in this area used quite different sites, settling farther away from the stream channels, and their system of land use was quite distinct from that of the Lengyel culture. Nevertheless, although the evidence of the Linear Pottery and Lengyel settlements may not have been apparent, the networks of use between Brzesc Kujawski and Oslonki must have remained in use to some extent.

There is another gap in the historical record between the later Funnel Beaker people and the migration of Slavic tribes into the region following the collapse of the Western region of the Roman Empire in 476 C.E.

A Polish legend ascribes the origins of the Slavic nations to three brothers: Lech, Czech, and Rus. In the forests of Eastern Europe they parted company, each going in a different direction. Lech founded Gniezno, the first capital of Poland; Czech founded Bohemia; and Rus founded Russia. While the story of Lech, Czech, and Rus is probably a folktale without historical basis, it accurately describes what is known about the westward movement and gradual dispersal of the West Slavic tribes after the Roman Empire's collapse. Most of the Slavs were agrarian, and they may have wandered west looking for more fertile soil. This would have pitted them against the Germanic tribes already inhabiting the region. They may also have moved west in order to avoid the constant attacks on Eastern Europe by successive waves of people and armies of the Huns, Avars, Magyars, and later the Mongols, Tatars, and Turks.

Perhaps as many as 20 distinct tribal groups established small states between 800 and 960: Vistulans, Obodrites, Lendians, Lekhites, Goplans, and others as well. The most prominent turned out to be Polanes (also Polans or Polanie, "people of the plain"). These people settled in the plains that would eventually become the central region of Poland and gave their name to the country.

The beginnings of Poland as an identifiable nation-state can only be traced back to the 10th century. Prior to this time Poles had been a part of the Czech people. Great (north) Poland was founded in 966 by Mieszko I (c. 932–92), who belonged to the Piast Dynasty. Later the tribes of southern Poland united and formed Little Poland. In 1047 Great Poland and Little Poland united under the rule of Casimir I (1015–58), the Restorer. Poland was split into several smaller states in the 12th century, which were later ravaged by the Mongol armies of the Golden Horde in 1241. In 1386 Poland was merged with Lithuania by way of a royal marriage. The grand duke of Lithuania Ladilaus Jagiello and the monarch of Poland Jadwiga married on February 2, 1386, and Ladilaus Jagiello was crowned Ladilaus II, King of Poland. Thus began the "golden age" of the Polish-Lithuanian Union (Lublin Union). This union withstood the ravages of war and foreign invasions for 400 years. Between the 14th and 16th centuries this Polish-Lithuanian alliance reached the zenith of its power, scoring victories over the (Germanic) knights of the Teutonic order, the Russians, and the Ottoman Turks.

However, in the mid-17th century, Bohdan Chmielnicki (c. 1595–1657) led a rebellion of Ukrainian Cossacks that ushered in turbulent times for the Polish-Lithuanian state. It was called the Potop, or the Deluge, for the magnitude of the hardships it entailed. Subsequent wars with the Ottoman Empire, Russia, Sweden, Transylvania, and Brandenburg-Prussia destroyed the fabric of the union and weakened the nation, leading to its dependency on Russia. Between 1772 and 1795 Poland was fragmented, and portions were divided among Russia, Prussia, and Austria. For more than a century thereafter, the Poles continued their rebellions against Russian, Prussian, and Austrian dominance in their efforts to regain their independence.

During World War I U.S. president Woodrow Wilson called for the restitution of an independent Poland endorsed by the Allied coalition. In November 1918 Poland regained its independence after 123

Holocaust

The Nazi extermination of the Jews took its most vicious form in Poland. Hitler considered Poland an integral part of his concept of German domination of Europe and reduced the Poles to a life of slavery, imposing severe restrictions on them. The Holocaust wiped out nearly the entire population of the three million Jews living in Poland. The most lethal death camps including Auschwitz, Majdanek, and Treblinka, with their infamous gas chambers, were all operated on Polish soil. Six million Poles perished under the German occupation.

years. However, this independence was short-lived. Despite a 10-year nonaggression pact signed in 1934, Hitler attacked Poland on September 1, 1939. Soviet troops invaded from the east on September 17, taking Poland by surprise. On September 28 a German-Soviet agreement divided Poland between the Soviet Union and Germany. Both occupiers conducted large-scale subjugation of the Polish population, Nazi Germany's primary focus being the annihilation of Polish Jews.

The German and Soviet invasions created a diminishing Poland as its borders were pushed westward. Following the migration of millions of Poles, Germans Jews, and Ukrainians, Poland emerged an ethnically unified country. Soviet rule established a Communist government in Poland, and a new constitution in 1952 made Poland a "people's democracy," the People's Republic of Poland. Poland saw a lot of liberalization in 1956 under the leadership of Wladyslaw Gomulka (1905–82) of the United Worker's (Communist) Party. People were freed from prison, personal freedoms were expanded, and the press became freer.

Over the years a dwindling economy and public resentment over increasing prices led to labor turmoil. Solidarity, an independent trade union formed by Lech Walesa (b. 1943), launched a drive for liberty and improved conditions. Over a period of time, Solidarity, under its founder-leader, became a political force, and in 1989 it swept the elections, taking almost all the seats in the senate. Efforts to uplift the Polish economy led to economic difficulties, however, and widespread discontent. In the second democratic parliamentary election of September 1993, voters returned power to ex-Communists and their allies.

In 1999 Poland became part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and it joined the European Union (EU) on May 1, 2004.

Poland is situated in the center of Europe covering an area of 120,728 square miles, including 328 square miles of coastline along the Baltic Sea. The country is largely a plain with no natural boundaries except the Carpathian Mountains in the south and the Oder and Neisse Rivers in the west. Poland shares its borders with seven countries. To the north Poland is bordered by Russia, to the east by Lithuania, Belarus, and the Ukraine. The Czech Republic, Slovakia, and the Sudeten and Carpathian Mountains lie to the south of Poland. Apart from the Oder and Neisse Rivers, the rivers Vistula, Warta, and Bug are important for trade and commerce. The highest point in Poland is at Rysy, at 8,199 feet in height. The capital city, Warsaw, is the country's largest city; other major cities of Poland are Lodz, Kraków, Wrocław, Poznan, Gdańsk, and Szczecin.

The climate in Poland is temperate, characterized by cold and cloudy winters and moderately severe summers with frequent showers and thunderstorms. Ocean air currents from the west, cold polar air from Scandinavia and Russia, and warmer, subtropical air from the south largely influence Poland's climate. Winter may last one to three months and brings frequent snowstorms but relatively low total precipitation.

In Poland a wide variety of flora is found including trees such as pine, oak, beech, fir, and rowan. As far as fauna is concerned, Poland is home to wild boar, beavers, lynx, roe deer, cranes, eagle owls, spotted and golden eagles, black woodpeckers, and whooper swans.

ECONOMY

Through the 1990s Poland steadfastly pursued a policy of economic liberalization and epitomizes a successful transition economy. However, the unemployment issue remains unresolved. While privatization of small and medium-sized state-owned companies and liberalization of laws have encouraged entrepreneurs, facilitating the development of the private business sector, legal and bureaucratic obstacles and incurable corruption are hampering its further progress. Poland's agricultural sector remains handicapped by surplus labor, inefficient small farms, and lack of investment. Reforms in health care, education, the pension system, and state administration have resulted in unprecedented fiscal pressures.

Poland joined the EU in May 2004, and surging exports to the EU contributed to Poland's strong growth in 2004. Farmers have already begun to reap the rewards of membership via higher food prices and EU agricultural subsidies. The natural resources found in Poland are coal, sulfur, copper, natural gas, silver, lead, salt, and amber. The country's primary industries are machine building, iron and steel, coal mining, chemicals, shipbuilding, food processing, glass, beverages, and textiles. The land is arable.

Poland exports mostly machinery and transport equipment, intermediate manufactured goods, and miscellaneous manufactured goods. Food and live animals make up a small portion of its exports. Its major imports are intermediate manufactured goods and chemicals. Germany, Italy, France, the United Kingdom, the Czech Republic, Russia, and the Netherlands are its major trade partners.

The monetary unit of Poland is the zloty. It is estimated that between 2009 and 2010, Poland will introduce the Euro (the common European currency for many member nations of the EU).

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Ethnic Poles constitute 97 percent of Poland's population, although a small percentage of Germans, Belarusians, and Ukrainians also live in the country. Polish is the country's national language. Poland's official name in Polish is Rzeczpospolita Polska. It has, for centuries, been a bridge between the East and West.

Poland is an overwhelmingly Roman Catholic country with more than 90 percent of the population adhering to that faith. It is also home to a small number of Protestants, Eastern Orthodox Christians, and people of other faiths.

Poles enjoy many kinds of music including classical, folk, rock, hip-hop, and rap. Poland even has one musical genre that sets poetry to music, as well as disco polo, a musical genre that is a perfect blend of folk tunes and italo disco (electronic dance music). Disco polo was previously known as piosenka chodnikowa.

The polka is a popular genre of dance music as well as a style of dance. The mazurka and the polonaise are the favorite traditional folk dances of Poland. The mazurka is generally performed by four or eight couples and includes stamping feet and the tapping of heels; the polonaise is a slow Polish dance. The violin and cello are the musical instruments traditionally used to play folk songs. Most folk songs center on the Polish hero Juraj Jánošík (1688–1713).

Polish cuisine has been greatly influenced by neighboring countries including Russia, Austria, Germany, and Hungary. The Polish like meat dishes,

Origin of the Name Poland

Poland is officially called Rzeczpospolita Polska in the Polish language. The name of the country and its people are of Slavic origin. It is commonly believed that the name Polska has its origins in the Slavic Polanie tribe who established the Polish state in the 10th century. Their name may have been derived from the Slavic word pole (field) or it may have come from the tribal name Goplanie—people living around Lake Goplo. Conventionally the ethnic name of the Poles relates it more widely to the Polish word polanie, or “dwellers of the field.”

with ham, pork, and kielbasa (sausage) among their favorites. These are served with dumplings, noodles, rye bread, and vegetables. Bigos (hunter's stew) is the national dish of Poland. It is made from five or six kinds of wild game. Soups, stews, and salads are also favorites and are generally made from beetroot and cabbage. Barszcz (beetroot soup) is an integral part of the typical Polish meal.

Lemon tea and vodka are preferred beverages in Poland. Other beverages include coffee, wine, and beer.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day in many countries. Each year, a festive spirit reigns over the whole world as people plan parties and celebrations beginning on December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Poland New Year's Eve is also known as Sylwesterabend (St. Sylvester's Day), and a carnival atmosphere infects the entire nation. According to folklore an evil dragon named Leviathan was killed by St. Sylvester in 1000.

Many Poles celebrate New Year's Eve with kulig (sleigh rides). In ancient times people would go in a big cavalcade of horse-pulled sledges and sleighs from one place to another, where they celebrated the New Year with dancing, singing, feasting, and drinking. In the 21st century New Year's Eve parties and balls are the most awaited events of the year, and the Polish start preparing for the celebrations months in advance. People buy new clothes and aspire to be a part of the most talked-about parties in Poland. Prices of tickets for balls and parties increase as New Year's Day approaches. The carnival atmosphere climaxes with a huge ceremonial bonfire, and the new year is brought in amid loud cheers.

New Year's Day is a holiday, allowing people to recover from the previous night's excesses.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day is celebrated on March 8. It commemorates the social, economical, political, and cultural achievements of women throughout the world.

Poland began celebrating International Women's Day in 1948 after an arbitrary imposition of the holiday by the occupying Soviet forces. During Soviet rule (1948–56), working women were encouraged to improve their work efficiency, and

Juraj Jánošík

Jánošík was an 18th-century Slovak bandit, who was also referred to as the "Slovak Robin Hood." According to legend Jánošík (which means "son of John") was a former soldier of the imperial army, who became a bandit in 1711 in reaction to the atrocities of the nobility. He would rob the nobles and distribute the money among the poor and needy. He was eventually captured and hanged in December 1713. But his legend lives on, and he continues to be one of the most celebrated heroes of Poland.

portraits of exceptional women workers were hung on the walls of the factories. Later on, Polish men and children honored women in society (including homemakers, coworkers, teachers, and doctors) by presenting flowers as a token of appreciation for their contribution to the greater society.

In the 21st century many Polish women's organizations as well as the government continue to celebrate International Women's Day on March 8. Since it is a public holiday, both women and men enjoy a holiday on Women's Day. However, in the early 1970s, in an attempt to remove all signs of the Communist regime and a desire to adopt Western culture, Women's Day celebrations lost their popularity, and Valentine's Day became the preferred holiday because it has no feminist political content and merely upholds women's traditional domestic roles.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. This tradition began in 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL) demanding an eight-hour workday.

The leftist parties in Poland hold workers' rallies throughout the country, and political and trade union leaders give commemorative speeches emphasizing the contributions made by Polish workers to shaping the Polish economy. Because it is a public holiday, all public and private institutions in Poland remain closed on May 1.

It was the first democratic constitution in Europe and the second democratic constitution in the world (the U.S. Constitution was the first). On May 3, 1919, the Polish government declared May 3 a national holiday in honor of the first constitution of the nation since it was the symbol of Poland's integrity and sovereignty.

On Constitution Day celebrations are held in different parts of Poland to commemorate this historic day. In the capital of Warsaw the holiday is marked with military parades and a procession of people wearing colorful costumes and holding the national flag of Poland aloft.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed on: November 11

On November 11, 1918, at the end of World War I, Poland declared itself an independent republic. Austria, Russia, and Prussia had established their dominance in different parts of Poland, and the country was divided between these three powerful kingdoms until the late 1800s. As a result, Poland was erased from the map of the world. But Poles wanted to establish an independent state of Poland, and many brave Poles lost their lives trying to liberate their country.

During World War I, the forces occupying Poland were all at war, and most of their battles were fought on Polish territories. After the war, the October Revolution of 1918 resulted in the disintegration of the Russian Empire and the victorious Allies voted in favor of the independence of Poland. Eventually, on November 11, 1918, the Republic of Poland came into existence. Józef Piłsudski (1867–1935), a prominent Polish freedom fighter, was sworn in as the first president of Poland.

On Independence Day many schools in Poland present plays in which children act out famous events from the country's history. Also the president of Poland presides over the Independence Day celebrations in the capital city of Warsaw. Military parades and patriotic songs are part of the Independence Day celebrations.

Fun Fact

An ancient tradition of sprinkling water on women, Earth, and cows is still followed. The origin of this custom is not known, but many consider this part of a rite of purification that was performed to ensure fertility.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

On Palm Sunday, devout Polish Catholics attend a special Mass and receive small crosses made of dried palm fronds.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

Polish Catholics observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. In Poland on Good Friday people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. In Poland devout Catholics attend a Resurrection Mass on Easter in their local churches and celebrate the victory of life over death.

A special Easter dinner is prepared that includes the food (bread, salt, eggs, baked lamb, smoked meat, and so on) blessed on Holy Saturday (the day before Easter) by the priest. Christians believe that bread is a symbol of Jesus' body, and the Polish people also consider it to be a symbol of good fortune. On the other hand the egg is a symbol of rebirth, while smoked meat ensures good health as well as fertility. Favorite Easter dishes include ham, white sausage, smoked bacon, and cheesecake, as well as a lamb-shaped cake, and a wide variety of poultry dishes.

Decorating Easter eggs is an ancient Polish tradition, and on Easter dyed eggs are presented to family members, godchildren, and guests. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. If a boy gives an Easter egg to a girl, it is looked on as a token of affection.

Easter Monday is the first day of Easter Week and is generally regarded as a continuation of Easter Sunday. The day was once part of a weeklong celebration but was later made a one-day holiday. In Poland it is known as Smigus Dyngus.

In Kraków the ancient festival of Emmaus is celebrated with great enthusiasm. It commemorates the meeting of the risen Christ with two of his disciples while they were on their way to Emmaus. In ancient times young men fought each other with sticks, trying to show off their strength to young women. Many men also courted women by gently hitting them with willow twigs. A religious procession is held, and holy pictures are carried throughout the city. This procession is accompanied by music played by a band and the songs of the church choir. Children are given sweets and toys on this day.

Observed on: August 15

The Feast of the Assumption commemorates the Christian belief that Mary, the mother of Jesus, ascended directly to heaven after her death. On the Assumption, also called Virgin Mary's Day, a special prayer service is held in churches all over Poland to honor Mary.

More than 150,000 pilgrims flock to the religious city of Jasna Gora in southern Poland to take part in a special prayer service to commemorate the Feast of the Assumption. People seek blessings of the Virgin Mary. Devotional hymns and songs are also part of the ceremony. Jasna Gora is home to the painting of Our Lady of Czestochowa (Mary with the infant Jesus in her arms), which is believed to have been painted by the Apostle Luke the Evangelist, making this town one of the sites of pilgrimage for worshippers of Mary. Every August tens of thousands of people journey to Jasna Gora, some walking hundreds of miles. The painting is also referred to as "The Black Madonna" because of the skin tones of Jesus and Mary in the painting. The painting was made on a wooden panel around 2,000 years ago, and since crude oil was used for making the image, the color darkened over a period of time and became dull. The painting has hung on the same spot since 1384, and evidence of the Modonna's healing powers are attested by the offerings lining the walls of the chapel, gifts from grateful pilgrims she has cured.

All Saints' Day is a Catholic feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of the Roman Catholic Church. It is an annual religious celebration that takes place on November 1. All Saints' Day is a holiday in Poland. Even during the Communist era the tradition continued to be observed as the Day of the Deceased. In Polish towns and cities this day is notorious for roads clogged with traffic as people head toward cemeteries to pay tribute to their deceased loved ones. In Poland people visit the graves of their deceased relatives to decorate them with flowers (especially chrysanthemums) and colorful lanterns. All graves have a lantern burning throughout the night on All Saints' Day. If a grave does not have one, other people voluntarily buy a lantern and place it on the grave. Sweets, flowers, and lanterns are available at the entrance of the cemetery for the convenience of the mourners.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day chosen by the Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was their Messiah. The Polish believe that events on Christmas Eve will determine the course of the coming year. Hence on this day, people are kind to each other, and they avoid getting into arguments with anyone.

They adorn their Christmas trees with ribbons, stars, and candles. They place gifts around the trees that are meant to be opened only on Christmas Day. Also a small bunch of hay is placed on the tablecloth to remind people that Jesus was born in a manger. Many people include money and even fish along with the hay to ensure a prosperous new year. When it is time for dinner, an extra set of plates is set for unexpected guests as well as for loved ones who passed away during the year.

Christmas Eve dinner begins only after the appearance of the first star in the evening sky. The entire family sits at the dinner table and says a short prayer. Often verses from the Bible that describe Jesus' birth are also read before dinner. Then family members wish each other a happy Christmas and share a special Christmas wafer known as oplatek, which symbolizes the holy bread. Orthodox Christians eat unleavened bread known as proskura or proskofera on Christmas Eve.

Dinner consists of 12 courses, symbolizing the 12 months of the year and the 12 disciples of Jesus. However, it is a Polish belief that the more numerous the food items on the table on Christmas Eve are, the more prosperous and auspicious the coming year will be. (Meatless dishes are featured.) After dinner, Catholic families sing traditional carols and then attend a Midnight Mass known as the Shepherd's Mass or Pasterka.

During Christmas many groups stage the jaselka, or the Nativity play, while many carolers, dressed in colorful costumes, go door to door singing Christmas carols, receiving small amounts of money as tokens of appreciation. Many carolers dress themselves as biblical characters like angels, devils, death, and so on.

LAJKONIK FESTIVAL

Observed in: Krakow
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Thursday after Corpus Christi feast

Lajkonik is an annual festival that takes place in Old Town Street in the city of Krakow. On the first Thursday after the feast of Corpus Christi every year, the inhabitants of the city of Krakow celebrate the brief victory of Polish forces over the Tatars (Mongols) in a battle fought in 1241. On this day, a Lajkonik, a man disguised as a Tatar warrior, with a beautifully decorated hobbyhorse fastened around his waist, tries to chase away people on the street to symbolize the manner in which Tatar forces tried to scare away the Poles.

Dancing and partying are part of the celebrations. A grand procession starts from the Convent of St. Norbet, passes through the streets of Krakow, and ends at the Main Market Square. The procession lasts for three hours, and people sing and dance their way through the procession and celebrate the victory over the Tatars. Most participants wear folk costumes or eastern dresses.

BIRTH

In ancient times Polish children were named after saints whose feast was near the date of their birth or baptism (within three weeks). After the birth of a child parents consulted the local priest or the Roman calendar to help determine the name of their child. Instead of birthdays children celebrated the anniversary of their baptism or the feast day of the saint after whom they were named. Many children were also named after one of their godparents.

MARRIAGE

A formal engagement is the first step in getting married in Poland. It is a small ceremony that takes place in the home of the parents of either the bride or the groom and is attended by very close family members and friends.

Polish weddings are generally held in churches. Traditionally single women in Poland wear a single braid. On the night before the wedding, the bride's mother and her friends, while singing wedding songs, redo her single-braid hairstyle and change it to the traditional wedding hairstyle of two braids.

The wedding ceremony is solemnized by a pastor in the presence of family members and friends. After the traditional exchange of vows, the priest pronounces the couple husband and wife. Later, a lavish reception awaits the newlyweds.

The traditional veil-removing ceremony takes place at the beginning of the reception and is referred to as oczepiny. During the ceremony as the bride enters the reception hall, her bridal veil is removed to symbolize the end of her maidenhood and the beginning of her married life. At the same time, a funny cap is placed on the groom's head, which makes everyone laugh, communicating the wishes of all the wedding guests that the life of the newlyweds be filled with untold happiness and good health.

Singing, dancing, music, feasting, and drinking wine are part of the celebrations. If during the reception, the bride drinks wine from her cup without spilling a single drop, tradition states then she is considered to be very lucky. The money dance is another part of the reception after many Polish weddings. Generally each guest desirous of dancing with the bride buys the dance by pinning money on her wedding gown and asking her to dance with him. After the wedding guests have danced with the bride, they form a circle around her, and the groom has to break through the circle to reach his bride. Guests give him a hard time and form a tight lock. Eventually once the groom has broken through the circle, he carries his bride away from the reception.

Fun Fact

A godfather was called kmotr or kumoter, while a godmother was referred to as kumoszka.

In another variation, while the father of the bride is enjoying the first dance with his daughter, her bridesmaid holds an apron and collects money from guests who want to dance with the bride. After a while the groom throws his wallet (which according to belief has more money than has been offered by other guests for a dance with the bride) and takes his wife away from the reception.

Another important tradition of a Polish wedding involves the sharing of wine, bread, and salt. The newlyweds are offered rye bread sprinkled with salt and wine by their parents. The bread is symbolic of the wish that the couple never go hungry, while the salt symbolizes the ability to cope with difficulties in life. With wine, the parents wish that the newlyweds never go thirsty and also wish them happiness and health for all eternity.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The known history of Portugal dates back to the first millennium B.C.E., when waves of Celts began moving down from central Europe into the Iberian Peninsula, intermarried with the indigenous people, and settled there. The Celts were followed by the Greeks, who called the area Ophiussa, which means "land of serpents," because the people they encountered worshipped serpents. The Greeks were followed by the Carthaginians in 238, who remained primarily along the coasts. The first Romans to invade the Iberian Peninsula arrived in 219. Beginning in the south, they expelled the Carthaginians and gradually moved north, expanding their sphere of influence.

In 194 a group called the Lusitanians, who may also have been Celts, rebelled, recaptured some of the territory held by Rome, and sacked Conistorgis, the Conii capital, because they had allied themselves with the Romans. In the eighth century the Islamic Moors invaded Portugal and took control of the territory. Portugal's struggle for independence gradually started in the ninth century and became stronger over the years. Finally in the 13th century, the Portuguese were able to drive out the Moors.

The Portuguese Empire started expanding in the 15th century, led by Prince Henry (1394–1460), a navigator whose interest was in exploring routes to other countries. The Ceuta region of North Africa was the first to be conquered. Consequently new trade routes were discovered, and Portugal invaded India, some regions in the Far East, Brazil, and Africa. By the 16th century Portuguese expansion was at its peak.

In 1578 the Portuguese king Sebastian (1554–78) died at a very young age, without leaving an heir to the throne. Since Prince Philip II (1527–98) of Spain was the son of a Portuguese princess, the Spanish ruler became Prince Philip I of Portugal in 1580. The first two Spanish kings were popular, and the country thrived under their rule. But Prince Philip III (1605–65) wanted to make Portugal a Spanish province. A war followed, and Portugal lost many of the regions that it had conquered over the centuries.

Toward the end of the 18th century the French Emperor Napoleon (1769–1821) sent his army to conquer Portugal, but

Vasco da Gama was a famous Portuguese navigator. In the 15th century he became the first European ever to set foot in India. He was responsible for transforming Portugal into one of the earliest colonial powers in Europe. He was also instrumental in acquiring land in the African continent and in South India. The Portuguese epic, the Lusíadas of Luíz Vaz de Camões, is largely about Vasco da Gama and his voyages.

Portugal and its Anglo alliances forced the troops to retreat. In the 19th century, Portugal's economy declined. The monarchy was abolished in 1910, and a democratic republic was founded called the First Republic. However, it came to an end in 1926 when a military coup resulted in the start of the Second Republic, which lasted for a period of almost 50 years. Although Portugal flourished and became economically stronger, the Portuguese Empire and its annexed lands began to diminish. Independence movements in India, Angola, Mozambique, and Portuguese Guinea led to the end of Portuguese control of those regions.

By 1975 all the colonies under Portugal had become independent, and the Portuguese Empire was effectively ended. In 1986 Portugal joined the European Community (EC), which evolved into the European Union (EU).

Portugal is located to the west of Spain on the Iberian Peninsula with a coastline on the Atlantic Ocean.

The Portuguese islands of the Azores and Madeira are situated in the Atlantic. The mainland of Portugal is mountainous and rocky in the north, becoming flatter and plainer toward the south. The physical features of Portugal are diverse and characterized by rivers, forests, mountains, plateaus, and valleys.

Portugal is one of the warmest and sunniest countries in Europe. Southern parts of the country are warmer and drier than the cooler and wetter north. Portugal's climate is classified as Atlantic-Mediterranean. The temperatures dip to below 41°F during winters, and there is snowfall in the high altitudes. Portuguese summers can be uncomfortably hot, with the mercury reaching 113°F.

Fun Fact

The Portuguese introduced Far East spices, such as coriander, pepper, ginger, curry powder, saffron, and paprika to the European palate. They also introduced rice, tea, coffee, peanuts, and pineapples from their colonies in Asia, South America, and Africa.

ECONOMY

Portugal has a service-based economy. The Portuguese enjoy a comfortable standard of living and are known for being technologically advanced. The main industries in the country are textiles, footwear, wood products, metalworking, oil refining, chemicals, fish canning, wine, tourism, and agriculture. The weather is conducive to the cultivation of wine grapes, corn, potatoes, and rye. Olive groves, vineyards, orchards, fig trees, and almond blossoms are regular sights in Portugal.

Portugal enjoys good trade relations with other members of the EU, but Spain is its main trading partner, apart from the United States. Portugal imports manufactured goods such as machinery, transportation equipment, and chemicals. The country also imports food, beverages, and petroleum. The major exports from Portugal are textiles, clothing, footwear, machinery and transport equipment, and forest and agricultural products.

In spite of having a sound economy, Portugal is struggling with an inefficient educational system that hinders growth in productivity levels.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Portuguese culture has rich influences from African, Brazilian, Latin, and Asian cultures. This is evident in Portuguese cuisine, music, dance, architecture, and traditional customs. At the same time, a strong Catholic influence and a history of political repression have encouraged Portugal to remain traditional and conservative.

Portugal has given the world famous personalities such as the great 15th-century navigator Vasco da Gama (c. 1460–1524). The literary tradition of this country is profound and goes back to the 16th century. Dramatist Gil Vicente (c. 1465–c. 1536), poet Luíz de Camões (c. 1524–80), and Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935) are some renowned names.

Portuguese dance forms are unique, and performances are frequently part of the festivities of weddings and carnivals. The nation's best-known musical form is the melancholic fado, believed to have originated among 16th-century sailors.

The Portuguese are fanatics about all outdoor games, but soccer undoubtedly ranks above all other sports. The Euro Cup tournament was held in Portugal in 2004 and provided a major boost to the nation's tourism revenue.

CUISINE

Portuguese food is delicious and often served in huge portions compared to other European cultures. Classic Portuguese meals often include sardinhas assadas (charcoal-grilled sardines) or pastéis de bacalhau (codfish balls) and cannot be complete without caldo verde (a soup of cabbage and potatoes). Seafood occupies a central place in Portuguese cuisine. A variety of fish and other marine food items are consumed in different parts of the country.

Meats, prepared in various flavorful recipes, are also popular in Portugal. Apart from beef, veal, and mutton, pork is a favorite among the Portuguese. Smoked ham and roasted piglets are also considered delicacies here. Tripas à moda do Porto (tripe with beans) is a popular Portuguese dish.

Portugal is also famous for its cheeses. Queijo da Serra, for example, is made from sheep milk and is renowned for its smooth consistency and delicate flavor. Portuguese wines—among which port wine may be the most famous—are the preferred alcoholic beverages among the people. Wines are also exported to neighboring countries.

Carnival, called Shrove Tuesday in English-speaking countries and Mardi Gras (Fat Tuesday) in French-speaking countries, marks the beginning of the Lenten season in Portugal. This day is celebrated on the day before Ash Wednesday, usually with colorful carnivals and parades featuring beautiful floats. It is an important holiday in all nations that are predominantly Catholic. On this day people consume meat and other nonvegetarian items. Traditionally they also try to use up all the butter, eggs, and other fatty items in the house because these cannot be consumed during Lent.

Liberation Day commemorates the Revolution of the Carnations that took place on the same day in 1974. On that day the Portuguese revolted against an oppressive government and succeeded, with the help of a bloodless revolution, in establishing a liberal government. The people held carnations in their hands and convinced the soldiers not to resist them. The soldiers, in turn, placed the carnations in their guns and did not use force against the demonstrators. In this way they helped topple the dictatorship.

Port wine is probably the thing Portugal is most famous for after soccer. This alcoholic beverage is named after the city of Porto in Portugal. Port is a fortified wine that has grape brandy (20 percent) added to it after it has fermented for a few days.

There are several types of port wine, priced according to their color, sweetness, and quality. Tinto, Tawny, and Branco are a few varieties of port wines produced in Portugal.

This tradition began in 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.  PALM SUNDAYObserved by: ChristiansObserved on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

In Portugal all Catholic churches conduct special prayer services on this day. The priest, while conducting the Mass, reenacts the scenes from the Last Supper. He washes the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did. The mood is somber, and all the faithful pray earnestly on this day.

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Portuguese Catholics observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion. In Portugal, a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed, a reenactment of Jesus' final journey to Calvary when he carried the Cross on which he would be crucified. This is a day of fasting and abstinence in Portugal.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

The Portuguese have a feast on this day and invite relatives and friends to share the meal with them. In Portugal the celebrations continue on the next day, Easter Monday, which is the first Monday after Lent.

CHRISTMAS

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day chosen to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was their Messiah. In Portugal Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24) and continue until December 26. Christmas decorations are often prepared well in advance. A manger with figures of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men are set up in all churches.

On December 24 Catholic families attend church and offer prayers in a special Mass. Then they return home and gather around their Christmas trees and light candles. Children often go from door to door singing carols (called janeiras) and are rewarded with small sums of money. Most Portuguese children write letters to the baby Jesus asking for presents, rather than to Santa. The dinner table is filled with special dishes for their Christmas Eve supper, and a special fruitcake—known as bolo rei—is eaten on this occasion. This ring-shaped cake (symbolizing the Magis' crowns) has a charm hidden in it—a bean. The person who finds the bean is expected to buy the fruitcake for the next Christmas celebration.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services and social visits. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts. Families gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate Christmas with a special feast where stuffed turkey and special Christmas delicacies are served.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Prenatal care is crucial for Portuguese women. In earlier days expectant mothers were not allowed to reach up for objects or wear necklaces because people believed that this would cause the umbilical cord to tighten around the neck of the unborn child, thereby risking strangulation. Some women ate certain food items because they thought that would guarantee their child would be of a particular gender. Old women say that round fruits, such as apples and grapes, produce girls, while long vegetables such as carrots and cucumbers produce boys. Mothers were not allowed to touch furry animals lest the child become hairy. Most of these superstitions are not believed anymore.

Portuguese babies are baptized in churches and the ceremony is followed by a lavish banquet. Godparenting is prevalent in Portugal as in most other Catholic countries.

August is the month when most Portuguese weddings take place because this is the time when those who were away on vacation return. Most Portuguese are over 30 by the time they get married. Portuguese weddings take place in church. The bride usually follows tradition and wears a white tunic decorated with jewels while the groom wears a dark suit. Once the couple has exchanged wedding bands, the priest covers them with his stole. Family and friends throw candies and flowers at the newlywed couple as they leave the church after the ceremony.

The wedding reception is fun filled and lavish. Music, traditional dances, food, and plenty of drinks are the highlights of the party. In Portugal the wedding party has what is called a money dance: Men attending the reception dance with the bride. At the same time the bride's shoe is passed around and filled with money to help the couple start their new life together.

✿ DEATH

When a person dies, the body is placed in a casket. The mourners place the casket on a hearse and walk through the streets. This procession is led by a priest. A prayer service is held at a chapel, and the body is taken to the cemetery, where it is placed either in a vault or in the family grave.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Historically the peninsula of Qatar has figured importantly in civilizations from the Neolithic (Stone Age) on. Finds at a sixth millennium site at Shagra in southeastern Qatar suggest the central role of the sea in the lives of Shagra's inhabitants; and the presence of ceramics and flint tools in excavations in northeastern Qatar indicates the country's relationship with the Al-Ubaid culture located in the region of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers between the fifth and fourth millennia.

For most of its history the arid climate allowed only short-term settlements by nomadic tribes. But Qatar appears on ancient maps, so travelers and explorers must have known of settlements there. Some historical texts claim that the first inhabitants of Qatar were the ancient Canaanites, a group known for their trade and navigation skills.

The peninsula of Qatar emerged as one of the richest places for trade in the Persian Gulf during the third and second millennia, helping to spread Bronze Age cultures from Mesopotamia to the Indus Valley of India. Fragments of Berber pottery found in excavations at Ras Abaruk suggest something of the extent of this commercial network. Qatar also attracted seasonal migrants during the Bronze Age.

The Kassites, who may have originated in the Zagros Mountains of southeastern Iran, spoke a non-Indo-European, non-Semitic language. They conquered Mesopotamia, assuming power in Babylon in the middle of the second millennium and spreading their influence throughout the gulf region. Ceramics of Kassite manufacture found in Al-Khore north of Doha indicate the close links between Qatar and Babylon during this period.

Qatar's strategic location on the Arabian Gulf was also convenient for the seasonal migration of Arab tribes from the Arabian Peninsula, particularly from the Nejd desert. Clans such as the al Khalifa and the al Saud (which would later control the thrones of Bahrain and Saudi Arabia, respectively) swept through the Arabian Peninsula and camped on the coasts in small fishing and pearling villages.

These clans battled each other for the region's lucrative oyster beds and lands, frequently forming and breaking coalitions with one another as they tried to establish territorial supremacy. At a time when the ancient Mediterranean had several thriving civilizations, the Arabian Gulf area enjoyed commercial prosperity. Many fishing centers that encouraged pearl trading, like Al Bida, Al-Khore, Al Wakra, and Al Zubara, appeared.

Around 140 the Arabian Gulf figured prominently in Greco-Roman trade between Europe and India. Archaeological evidence of Greek and Roman influences in the peninsula, particularly at Ras Abaruk, consists of several stone structures, including a dwelling, a cairn (a stone landmark), and a hearth. Excavations at Ras Abaruk suggest that the site was a temporary fishing station where seafarers stopped briefly to dry fish during this period. In fact pearls and dried fish were major trade items from Qatar during the Greco-Roman period.

All of the Arabian Gulf functioned as the vital commercial link between the West and the East during the time of the Persian Sassanid Empire in the third century C.E., and Qatar played a prominent role in that commercial activity. Cargoes of copper, spices, sandalwood, and teak from the East were exchanged for shipments of purple dye, clothing, pearls, dates, gold, and silver. Qatar merchants contributed at least two of these commodities to the Sassanid trade: purple dye and pearls.

In the seventh century Islam swept through the Middle East, crushing any who opposed them. With the spread of Islam in Qatar, Muhammad (c. 570–632) sent an envoy to the ruler of Bahrain in 628, inviting him to accept Islam. He accepted the invitation and announced his conversion to Islam, whereupon all the Arab inhabitants and some Persians of Qatar also became Muslim. During this early phase of Islam Qatar was famous for the robes it exported, and Muhammad is said to have worn a Qatari robe.

In 1515 the Portuguese conquered Qatar and established themselves at the Strait of Hormuz, the most strategic point in the Gulf. The Portuguese commercial empire used Qatar and other Gulf ports to move gold, silver, silks, musk, cloves, pearls and seed pearls, amber, and horses. In 1538 the Ottomans overthrew the Portuguese and gained control of Qatar. They maintained control of the region for four centuries. The Ottoman sovereignty, however, was mostly a formality, and the real power stayed with local sheikhs.

In the middle of the 18th century the Al-Khalifa family ruled Al-Zubara, until the Al-Thani family arrived and established their capital at Doha in the early 19th century, becoming the ruling dynasty of Qatar. Their leader Sheikh Mohammed bin Thani (r. 1850–78) signed an agreement with Britain to protect his people from the Al-Khalifas. (The Al Khalifa family again rules in the 21st century, and tension between the two families continues.)

For most of the 19th century and at the start of the 20th century, Qatar was a poor country. To avoid direct British rule—which existed in the other Gulf States—the Al-Thani family very tactfully played the British against the other formidable force, the Turks. In 1872 Qatar's emir signed a treaty with the Turks and allowed them to place a garrison in Doha. But this move seemed more destabilizing than protective when the Turks went on a spree of opening garrisons. After Turkey entered World War I on the German side, the emir thought it wiser to side with the British, since they ruled most of the Gulf region. This also protected them from Saudi Arabia's expansionist designs. When the war ended and the Turks had been expelled, Qatar's emir entered into an agreement with the British, in which Britain agreed to protect Qatar in exchange for a promise that the Qatari ruler would not have any dealings with other foreign powers without British permission.

In 1971 the British decided they would leave the region. In the hopes of forming other alliances, Qatar initiated dialogues with Bahrain and the Trucial states (now the United Arab Emirates). But when Bahrain withdrew from the talks, Qatar followed, declaring its independence on September 1, 1971. Even so, Qatar still has close ties to Britain.

The discovery of oil in the 1940s quickly boosted Qatar's economy and significantly raised the living standards of its citizens. In 1995 Sheikh Hamid bin Khalifa Al-Thani came to power. His reforms further improved the economy of Qatar, and the country entered a new era of modernization.

Fun Fact

The land of Qatar has risen almost seven feet relative to sea level in the past 400 years. Qatar and Bahrain were once joined, but over the centuries the two landmasses drifted apart.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The state of Qatar is a thumb-shaped peninsula that projects into the Persian Gulf. The country shares a border with Saudi Arabia. Qatar also includes Halul, an island about 50 miles off its east coast. The Hawar Islands off the west coast are territory that is disputed with Bahrain. Most of the terrain of Qatar is flat and rocky. However, in the deserts there are sand dunes as high as 131 feet above sea level. The highest point, Qurayn Aba al Bawl, situated in the western part of Qatar, in the Jebel Dukhan region, is only 272 feet high.

The Qatari climate is marked with hot summers and mild winters. Summer extends from May to September, when the temperature can soar to 113°F, even 122°F. Qatar, because it is a peninsula, is extremely humid, which makes the summer heat harder to bear. The months of December to February are milder. There is also some rainfall in winter, and sudden storms are common in December and January. As in the other countries in this region, sandstorms are frequent.

The low amount of rainfall does not favor natural vegetation in Qatar, and there is almost no land suited to agriculture. Efforts have been made to make the country greener by irrigating. Even a brief shower transforms the dry and bare deserts of this region into a light green carpet of grassland with desert flowers. This shows that the land is fertile but suffers from an inadequate water supply.

Natural wildlife is sparse in Qatar. Grasshoppers, crickets, scorpions, lizards, geckos, bats, sand cats, camels, Arabian oryx (a species of antelope), and birds such as the houbara are found in this country.

❁ ECONOMY

The State of Qatar boasts a flourishing economy due to the crude oil reserves found in its deserts. The oil industry in this region generates large-scale employment and has improved the general quality of life of the people. Petroleum and petroleum products account for 80 percent of export revenues and are also a major contributor to gross domestic product (GDP). Qatar generates one of the highest per-capita incomes of any nation in the world. Its major industries are oil production and refining, fertilizers, petrochemicals, steel, and cement. Qatar has good trade relations with Japan, Singapore, South Korea, and the members of the European Union (EU).

An important government objective is to increase employment for the local population and to decrease Qatar's dependence on foreign nationals. It encourages the replacement of expatriate workers with local residents—a process known as “Qatarization.” Training in specialized skills, business management, and the English language have been undertaken to implement this objective.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The original Qatar lifestyle was Bedouin (nomadic) and that influence is still evident in Qatari culture. Poetry, song, dance, and storytelling take precedence over art and architecture in Qatar as in most other countries of the Gulf region. The traditional Qatari ardab dance is a form of stylized martial art. It is performed by two rows of male dancers facing each other, waving sticks and swords in a mock battle and singing challenges to the tune of drumbeats, cymbals, and the rhythmic clapping of hands.

Qatar was once well known for its weaving. This craft involves dyeing and weaving the hair of goats, sheep, and camels to produce items such as tents, rugs, cushions, carpets, and saddlebags. Elaborate Qatari embroidery with gold thread is also renowned. Qatari jewelry is famed for its intricate metalwork and designs. Gold jewelry is favored over silver and other metals.

Qatari architecture incorporates elements of traditional Arabic style and decoration. City mosques, the national museum, and the royal palace are examples of Qatari architecture. Qatari culture is influenced by the major religion of the country Islam. Most people belong to the conservative Wahhabi sect, so Mouloud (or Mawlid an-Nabi), the birthday of the prophet Muhammad, is not celebrated because the sect holds that celebrating birthdays, even Muhammad's, distracts one from absolute devotion to Allah.

However, the people are not as strict and conservative as the Wahhabis of Saudi Arabia, and the women enjoy more freedom compared to their sisters in Saudi Arabia. They are educated and are not prohibited from driving vehicles. While most women wear the traditional Islamic veil and the long black loose dress, many of the younger women wear stylish Western clothes beneath their black robes. They are conscious of the clothing trends of the rest of the world and give importance to makeup, perfume, and accessories. Qatari men wear a thobe (a long shirtlike dress) over loose pants. They also wear a loose white headdress called a gutra.

The people of Qatar are sports enthusiasts. They enjoy sailing, auto racing, horse and camel races, and soccer. Qatar hosts a variety of international sporting events including tennis, golf, and squash championships, as well as the Qatar International Desert Marathon.

❁ CUISINE

Qatari cuisine still carries the strong influence of the nomadic life that its nomadic people enjoyed in earlier times. The traditional cuisine consists of rice, dates, and the meat of sheep and camels. These were foodstuffs that could be carried easily by the nomads while they wandered in the desert.

Qatari cooking also reflects the influence of Indian, Pakistani, Iranian, and Lebanese cuisines. Various fish and seafood—including lobster, crab, shrimp, tuna, kingfish, and red snapper—are a part of daily cooking in Qatar. Milk is usually consumed in the form of laban (yogurt) or labneh (a Lebanese cream cheese made with yogurt). Specialties include hummus (a paste of chickpeas and sesame oil), tabouleh (a Lebanese salad made with cracked wheat, tomatoes, parsley, mint, onions, lemon juice, and olive oil), ghuzi (roast lamb with rice mixed with pine nuts), wara enab (vine leaves stuffed with rice), koussa mahshi (zucchini stuffed with mince), and shawarma (a sandwich made with grilled shavings of lamb or chicken, mixed with salad, and rolled inside bread, often pita).

Falconry in Qatar

Qatar is one of the few places in the world where falconry is still an important sporting activity, and it is a popular sport among the wealthy Qataris. Traditional nomads appreciated the stamina and hunting instincts of the falcon and enjoyed training these birds to hunt the houbara. This fast-flying desert bustard, the size of a heron, is the falcon's chief prey. Falcons enjoy tracking down a bustard and may cover a distance of 2 to 3 miles before finally capturing the prey. An experienced falconer normally follows the falcon in a jeep or on horseback to witness the moment it captures the houbara.

Some favorite desserts of Qatar are umm Ali (a type of bread pudding), esh asaraya (sweet cheesecake with cream topping), and mebalabiya (pudding sprinkled with rosewater and pistachios). Qatari Muslims do not eat pork or drink alcohol. They consume balal meat (animals that are slaughtered according to Islamic law).

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

After childbirth Qatari women must rest and recover for the next 40 days. During this period other women relatives and friends tend to the new mother and assist her with her daily chores. Fresh bread, butter, honey, and porridges made with fenugreek (an Asian herb) are fed to the mother. Visitors who have come to see the new baby often present the child with money and gifts.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is a part of Qatar's tradition and is carried out at puberty. The Muslims in Qatar believe that by undergoing this ritual a boy becomes a man. Trained elders use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments to perform the circumcision without administering any anesthetic. This practice enjoys social backing and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations also follow this coming-of-age ritual.

❁ MARRIAGE

Virtually all marriages in Qatar are arranged, and Qatari weddings are elaborate affairs that last for several days. Before the wedding the groom provides plenty of silver and gold jewelry to the bride's family, as well as cash as part of an agreed-upon bride-price (mehr). The couple also signs a marriage contract called a milka. After the signing of the contract, the couple is legally married even though they may not consummate the marriage until the night of the wedding party.

On the wedding day the bride dyes her hair with henna and wears a white wedding gown. All the women who have come for the wedding are dressed in finery and gather inside the bride's house or a tent erected outside it. The bride is brought inside the tent and is seated on a large chair. A traditional dance accompanied with singing and clapping is performed for her.

The groom and his relatives gather inside another tent erected near his house. From there they make a procession to the bride's tent to pick her up.

The bride and groom spend the night at the groom's house. The celebrations continue throughout the following week.

❁ DEATH

When there is a death in a Qatari family, the deceased is washed, shrouded in white cloth, and buried immediately. The following three days are spent in mourning. Friends, family, and well-wishers come, offer their condolences, and help the family accept the death.

Snacks are prepared by neighbors and served to visitors. The mourning period for the widow is four months and 10 days, during which time her family and friends visit her often.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

For a long time the island of Réunion was largely uninhabited. Although Arab, Malay, and European sailors stopped there, they never settled there. The Arabs called it Dina Morgabin, which means "western Island." The archipelago comprising the islands of Réunion, Mauritius, and Rodrigues was discovered by Portuguese navigator Pedro Mascarenhas (1470–1555) in 1513 and was later named the Mascarenes after its discoverer.

Réunion's location was in the path of the trade route to the East Indies, and the island became an important stopover for ships. Realizing the potential of the island and the fact that it was uninhabited, in 1642 the French East India Company (La Compagnie des Indes Orientales) entered Réunion and began establishing settlements on the island. King Louis XIII (1601–43) named it Île Bourbon.

Around 1685 the region became a base for pirates operating in the Indian Ocean. Prior to 1715, the French East India Company had only catered to its own trading needs and those of passing ships. However, with the introduction of coffee cultivation on the island, the economy boomed, and by 1730 coffee had become the main cash crop. Due to the intensive labor required for coffee cultivation, the French East India Company brought African, Indian, and Indo-Chinese slaves to work on the plantations. Grains, spices, and cotton were also introduced and soon became secondary cash crops.

In 1764, the French government led by King Louis XV officially took control over the region, and the French East India Company was abolished in 1769.

After the French Revolution, the island was renamed Réunion and fell under the jurisdiction of the Colonial Assembly of France. In the late 18th century the region witnessed a number of slave revolts and, taking advantage of the turmoil in mainland France resulting from the French Revolution and lack of governance on the island, many slaves escaped to the interior parts of the island. There they organized themselves into small villages and elected their chiefs democratically.

In the early 19th century the coffee plantations of Réunion were completely destroyed by a series of cyclones. In

French East India Company

The French East India Company was founded in 1664 to compete with the Dutch and British East India Companies and to protect French commercial interests in the Eastern Hemisphere. The company was chartered by King Louis XIV (1638–1715) and was planned by Jean Baptiste Colbert (1619–83), the king's finance minister. The French East India Company managed to establish colonies on Île Bourbon (Réunion) and Île-de-France (now Mauritius). By 1719 it had established itself in India, although due to the mismanagement of funds and ineffective policies, it was near bankruptcy. After the decline of the Mogul Empire in India, the company began interfering in the domestic politics of the region like the British, who were gaining a strong foothold in India about the same time. To counter the British presence in the region, the French began establishing ties with rulers in the south of India and offered them protection against the British and other Indian rulers. Beginning in 1741 the French East India Company started adopting aggressive policies against the British and Indians, and this led to a series of Anglo-French wars in India in which the French forces suffered immensely at the hands of the British.

Financially weakened and defeated, the French East India Company was abolished by the French Government in 1769.

1810 during the Napoleonic Wars, fought from 1804 to 1815 between the French and the British, the reigning emperor of France, Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821), lost the island to British forces. The British ruled the region from 1810 to 1815. They introduced sugarcane to the islands, and it became the primary cash crop. Small farmers were forced to sell their lands to those who had enough capital to invest in the sugarcane crops. These small farmers began resettling in the interior parts of the island and carried on their agricultural activities.

After the defeat of Napoleon in the Battle of Waterloo in 1815, a treaty was signed between the French and the British, which came to be known as the Treaty of Paris. According to the treaty, France had to relinquish all its rights in all territories captured by the armies of the French Revolution between 1790 and 1792. The island of Réunion, which was captured by the British forces, was returned to France. However, the French islands of Rodrigues, Mauritius, and Seychelles remained under British control.

In 1819 the French introduced vanilla orchids, which boosted the economic prosperity of the region. The golden age of trade and economic development lasted until 1870, when Réunion faced severe competition from sugarcane and sugar beet production in Cuba and European countries. Moreover the island of Réunion lost its importance as an important stopover along the East Indies sea route after the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869, which helped traders to travel from Europe to Asia without circumnavigating Africa.

During World War I, however, due to a global increase in demand for sugarcane, the economy of Réunion boomed once again. On March 19, 1946, Réunion was proclaimed an overseas department of France, called a Département d'Outre-Mer (DOM).

Since World War II there has been a low-key but persistent demand in Réunion for independence from French rule. In February 1991 antigovernment riots took place in St.-Denis, the capital city, and more than 10 people lost their lives.

In 2004 Réunion became a member of COMESA, or Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa, and is trying to build better ties with the African mainland.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The island of Réunion is located in the Indian Ocean and lies to the east of Madagascar. The most striking geographical feature of the island is the Piton de la Fournaise (Peak of Furnace), which is a shield volcano (a wide volcano that has shallowly sloping sides). It is located on the eastern part of Réunion and erupted as recently as August 13, 2004.

The highest point of the island is Piton des Neiges (Snow Peak), an extinct volcano that lies to the west of Piton de la Fournaise and is 10,069 feet above sea level. It is surrounded by three huge cirques (amphitheater-like valleys formed by erosion at the head of a glacier): Cirque of Cialos, Cirque of Mafate, and Cirque of Salazie. The Cirque of Salazie is famous for its beautiful waterfalls, prominent among them being Le Voile de la Mariée (The Bride's Veil). The high plains, valleys, and central and coastal plains lie between Piton de la Fournaise and Piton des Neiges. The slopes of both volcanic mountains are covered with thick forests, while most of the population and cultivated land lies along the surrounding coastal lowlands. The aroma of nutmeg, cinnamon, cloves, and vanilla envelops most parts of Réunion, and banana and sugarcane plantations are a regular feature in most villages.

The country has a tropical climate, and the temperature varies with altitude. The climate is characterized by dry and cool months (May–November) and hot and wet months (November–April). Besides the volcano Réunion also faces the destructive fury of cyclones. On February 13, 1987 (known as Black Friday because of the devastation and because it was Friday, the 13th), the island of Réunion was hit by Cyclone Clotilde. It caused widespread destruction of crops, roads, and buildings.

ECONOMY

Agriculture is the driving force of Réunion's economy. Sugarcane is the primary cash crop and contributes 85 percent of the country's exports. The major industries of Réunion include rum, cigarettes, sugar, flower oil, and handicraft items. Its main trading partners are Libya, Comoros, Bahrain, Japan, and France.

It is estimated that almost one-third of the island's population is unemployed. For this reason the government is trying to develop the tourism industry to help create more employment opportunities. In the meantime Réunion is dependent on financial assistance from the French government.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Réunion is a mix of many cultures. It is home to people of French, Malagasy, Indian, Chinese, Pakistani, and African descent. Although French is the official language, Creole is widely spoken in many parts of the island. Eighty-six percent of the population is Roman Catholic, while the rest adhere to Hinduism, Islam, or Buddhism. There are many Catholic shrines throughout the island, and Christian holidays are celebrated extensively.

Freedom of religion on the island allows non-Catholics to celebrate their respective festivals and to build mosques and Hindu temples. Hindus perform their religious rites such as pandiale or teemeedee (which involves walking on hot coals) and cavadee (which involves piercing one's cheeks using silver needles in order to demonstrate one's unwavering faith in God).

The traditional dance is sega, which is accompanied by an evolved combination of music from Mauritius, Réunion, and Europe. It was performed by slaves in ancient times. African slaves adapted dances such as the polka (a genre of music and style of Czech folk dance) and quadrille (a dance that involves four couples who stand in a square in such a manner that each couple faces the center of the square) to African rhythms and created interesting variations of the original dances. Maloya is a fusion of strong African rhythms with European instrumentation that incorporates work songs and slave chants.

CUISINE

The cultural diversity of Réunion is reflected in its cuisine. People can satisfy their adventurous taste buds with French, Indian, Chinese, and Creole delicacies. Graines (red or white beans, lentils, and peas) are the chief ingredients of many Creole dishes and are generally served as a creamy side dish. Rougail (spicy and hot chutney made from tomato and vegetables) and bredes (a leafy spinachlike vegetable) are also part of Creole cuisines. Piments (chillies) are often served along with the main course.

Curried goat, crayfish curry, stuffed crab, fritters, cod, pork, and chicken are some of the main course delicacies that combine traditional French, Indian, and Creole recipes. Mauritian rum is the favorite beverage of the island of Réunion.

Maloya Music

Maloya music reflects Réunion's African heritage. The origin of maloya can be traced to the chants of enslaved African laborers who sang them mainly while they worked on plantations in Réunion. The chants spoke of their hard labor, their sorrows, and their desire to revolt. Songs of maloya are sung in the Creole language and, until recently, this music was mainly reserved for men because these chants were originally composed by male African slaves. However, the performance of maloya by women, such as Christine Salem, is gaining acceptance among the natives of Réunion.

vances may have made May Day an attractive choice, the observance of Labor Day on May 1 originated with the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, that designated it as a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Since this is a national holiday in Réunion all public and private institutions remain closed on Labor Day

This day is celebrated as the National Day of Réunion and is commemorated with all-day celebra-

❁ CELEBRATION OF THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 20

In 1845 France passed legislation abolishing slavery. However, on the island of Réunion, the actual abolition did not take place until December 20, 1848. At that time the island of Réunion had a large number of Indo-Chinese, Indian, and African slaves working on coffee, vanilla, and sugar plantations. After the abolition of slavery, the French began resettlement programs for the slaves, and while many were sent back to their native countries, most of the former slaves chose to stay in Réunion.

On this day, the descendants of the former slaves celebrate their liberation. The day's festivities include art exhibits and other cultural activities, including performances of traditional dances and music.

Fun Fact

The devotion of Catholics on the island of Réunion is reflected even in the names of the cities and towns; most of them are named after Christian saints. Some examples include: St.-Denis (the capital of Réunion), St.-Paul, St.-Joseph, and St.-Expedit.

❁ FIRE-WALKING

Observed in: Hindu temples all over Réunion

Observed by: Tamils (Indian ethnic group)

Observed in: January

The Fire-Walking ritual, also called Pandiale or Teemeedee, is a sacred, ancient Hindu ritual performed by the Tamil population living in Réunion. The Tamil are an ethnic group from India.

For this sacred ritual, the participating devotees take a ritual bath in a nearby lake or pond. Then in a procession they pull a cart to a nearby temple. The cart carries several Hindu religious icons on it. The worshippers carry the religious icons from the cart and place them on a temporary altar, which has been set up near a huge fire pit. Three of the devotees carry carlons on their heads. The carlons are tall, colorful flower cones. They symbolize three Hindu goddesses: Kali (goddess of death and destruction), Mariyamma (goddess of rain), and Draupadi (wife of Hindu mythological warriors, collectively known as the Pandavas). Mariyamma, the goddess of rain, is the most popular goddess of farmers of Indian origin in Réunion.

After the icons are placed on the altar, the priest blesses the pit by sprinkling holy water on it, and the devout start walking on the red-hot coals laid in the pit. Those who participate in the ritual are surrounded by their family and members of the community, who continuously chant religious prayers during the ritual. While walking on the burning coal, they cannot show any sign of pain or suffering. After the fire walk is over, they put their feet in a small pit filled with milk, which was dug earlier near the pit of burning coals. Hindus believe that a person walking over burning coals feels no pain because Draupadi saves them from pain by laying her long hair over the burning coals.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The early history of present-day Romania saw the Greeks, Dacians, and Romans settle in the region. The earliest people to dwell in what is now Romania were the Getae, or Dacians; they had already developed a complex culture when the Romans first encountered them. According to Strabo (63/63 B.C.E.–after 23 C.E.), the Greek geographer, the original name of the Dacians was daoi, possibly cognate with Phrygian daos, which means “wolf.” This hypothesis is supported by the fact that the standard carried by the Dacian military had a wolf head.

In 513 Darius (550–486) defeated the tribal confederation of the Getae during his campaign against the Scythians. Over 500 years later the Getae were defeated by the Roman emperor Trajan (53–117 C.E.) in two campaigns between 101 and 106, and their kingdom became the Roman province of Dacia. (Some Romanian historians claim that the Dacians are the ancestors of modern Romanians.) In 271 Dacia became the Kingdom of the Goths until the end of the fourth century, when the Hunnic Empire subsumed it. The Gepids, a Germanic tribe, and the Avars, a proto-Mongolian Turkic group of nomads from Eurasia, ruled Transylvania until the eighth century, when the Bulgars (possibly originally a Turkic, Iranian, or Ugrian culture of Central Asia) claimed Romania as part of their empire until 1000. The Pechenegs (a semi-nomadic group from the Central Asian steppes) and the Cumans (a west Turkic tribe that lived north of the Black Sea), also inhabited parts of Romania until the founding of the Vlachian principalities of Wallachia by Basarab I (c. 1310–52), and Moldavia by Dragoș (r. 1351–53) during the 13th and 14th centuries, respectively.

In the 14th and 15th centuries, the Ottoman Empire tried to gain control over Wallachia and Moldavia, but its efforts were thwarted. Although the Ottoman Empire succeeded in taking over Transylvania in the 16th century, Wallachia and Moldavia continued to remain autonomous. In 1600 the three states were reunited under the prince of Wallachia and tried to expel the Turks but failed. The Habsburgs eventually took over Transylvania.

Austria-Hungary annexed Bucovina, the northern part of Moldavia in 1775, and the Russians occupied Bessarabia, the eastern part of Moldavia, in 1812.

At the end of the 18th century the Austrian Habsburgs incorporated Transylvania into the Austrian Empire, and under Austria-Hungary between 1867 and 1918, Romanians in Transylvania experienced terrible oppression when the Hungarian government attempted to impose a Hungarian identity on them. Ottoman rule in the region ended after the Russo-Turkish War of 1828–29. In 1862 Moldavia and Wallachia were reunited and given the name Romania. Romania was declared a kingdom in 1881, and Carol I (1813–1914) became king. His nephew Ferdinand I (1865–1927) succeeded him. He entered World War I on the side of the alliance of the United Kingdom, France, and Russia, resulting in a much-enlarged Romania when Bessarabia, Bucovina, and Transylvania were added to the country in 1918.

At the beginning of World War II, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) occupied northern Bucovina, and Bessarabia and Hungary occupied Northern Transylvania. This was followed by widespread agitation and in 1940, Carol II (1893–1953), then king of Romania, was forced to abdicate by General Marshall Ion Antonescu (1882–1946), who made Carol II's 19-year-old son Michael (b. 1921) the king (Michael I) but then set up a Fascist dictatorship with himself at the head. In 1941 the General Marshall joined Hitler's anti-Soviet war.

The Antonescu regime actively participated in the Holocaust and followed Hitler's policy of genocide of the Jews and, to a lesser extent, the Roma. According to a report released by the Romanian government in 2004, the Romanian authorities were the main perpetrators in the planning and implementation of the killing of at least 280,000 to 380,000 Jews, and some say the figures may be higher. But with the Soviet Union approaching its border, Romania switched sides and joined the Allies. Consequently, in 1947 Romania became a Communist state under the USSR until 1958.

In the late 1950s Romania started following its own independent foreign policy. Despite political unrest in the 1980s and a period of economic stagnation, Romania strove for economic and political reforms. After 1990 the democracy was reformed, and the parliamentary system was reinstated in Romania. In 1991 the new Constitution of Romania was adopted. Romania joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in 2004 and expects to join the European Union (EU) in 2007.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in southeastern Europe, Romania is flanked by Bulgaria, Ukraine, Moldova, Serbia and Montenegro, Hungary, and the Black Sea. It is the third largest country in Eastern Europe. Topographically, hills, mountains, and plains characterize the Romanian terrain. Almost one-third of the country is covered by the Carpathian Mountains, while tablelands and small hills cover another one-third and are covered with vineyards and orchards. Highly fertile plains, known as the Baragan Plains, cover the remaining one-third and crops such as grains, fruits, and vegetables are grown there in abundance.

The highest point of Romania is the Moldoveanu, which stands 8,346 feet high. Besides the Danube River, which is the country's lifeline, a large number of rivers like the Prut, Barcau, Barlad, Almas, and Jiu, to name only a few, flow across Romania.

Romania enjoys a temperate climate that is characterized by sunny summers with thunderstorms and frequent showers, while winters are cold and cloudy with frequent snow and fog. The annual average temperature is 36°F in the mountains and 86°F along the coast and in the south.

Romania is home to a wide variety of flora including trees like beech, birch, maple, poplar, and sycamore, and more than 1,350 species of flowers such as the Transylvanian columbine, yellow poppy, edelweiss, and saxifrage.

The Dacian Draco

The Dacian Draco was a standard made up of a bronze wolf's head, with its mouth open, and a snake's body. It was originated by the ancient Dacian military. They carried it secured on top of a rod, and when they held it aloft while galloping, it made a whistling sound as the air passed through the wolf's mouth. It was thought that the noise must have terrified enemy soldiers.

The Sarmatians and Alans, a warlike nomadic Iranian confederacy, developed the Draco. The earliest evidence of the Draco in Dacia was found on fourth century B.C.E. pottery in Romania. The only copy of the Draco was found in Germany, which was probably kept as a trophy when the Romans defeated the Dacians. Following the Dacian wars the Roman cavalry adopted the Draco as their standard.

Lynx, bears, wolves, wild boars, stags, foxes, deer, badgers, green woodpeckers, gray owls, jays, white-tailed eagles, red-breasted geese, and pygmy cormorants represent the fauna in Romania.

❁ ECONOMY

Following King Michael I's forced abdication in 1947, Romania was part of the USSR until 1958. What little of Romania's scarce resources remained after World War II were drained by sham "SovRom" agreements, mixed Soviet-Romanian companies, set up to disguise the looting of Romania by the USSR. To this systematic pillaging were added excessive war reparations paid to the USSR. During this oppressive period, hundreds of thousands of people were imprisoned for political reasons, as well as thousands of deaths and incidents of torture against political dissidents. After the fall of the Communist regime in 1989, Romania was left with an obsolete industrial infrastructure. Due to the introduction of new economic reforms by the new government, backed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the economy is heading toward stability. Privatization of industries, growing direct foreign investments, and the adoption of a policy of liberalization has benefited the economy and helped reduce inflation and unemployment. At present Romania enjoys one of the lowest rates of unemployment among European nations.

Agriculture is the primary occupation of Romanians with more than 41 percent of the workforce engaged in some agricultural activity. Crops such as maize, wheat, barley, potatoes, oilseeds, sugar beets, and fruits and vegetables are grown extensively throughout the country.

Romania is expected to join the European Union (EU) by January 2007.

Romania is a predominantly Christian country with more than 87 percent of the nation's population adhering to Eastern Orthodox beliefs. Romania is an ethnically diverse country, and, although ethnic Romanians enjoy a dominant presence, the nation is also home to Hungarians, Ukrainians, Roma (gypsies—a label with negative connotations), Russians, Germans, Turks, and other nationalities. Romanian is the official language of Romania, although German and Hungarian languages are also spoken among the ethnic minorities.

Although Romanians residing in urban areas prefer Western attire, the traditional dress of Romania is worn extensively in rural areas. The attire for boys and men consists of loose shirts, wide white pants, jackets (or a white long-haired cloak), leather belts, boots, and tall hats (made from curly wool in either black or gray). Girls and women wear white flowered skirts, stiff white embroidered blouses with puffy sleeves, headscarves, beautifully embroidered black woolen vests, knee-high socks, and opinci (shoes).

Romania has a rich folk culture that is aptly reflected in its handicrafts, folk songs, and dances. Romanians are known for their mastery of weaving, woodcarving, ceramics, artistic decorations for homes, and embroidery. Professional Roma musicians play the traditional folk music of Romania. The folk dances of Romania generally involve couples dancing in a circle, semicircle, or a line. Folk poems and theater are also an integral part of Romanian society, and the most popular poem in Romania is the "Miorita." This is an old Romanian ballad based on the most important aspects of their folklore.

❁ CUISINE

Some of the traditional dishes include mamaliga (maize porridge), sarmale (minced pork with vine leaves or cabbage), ciorba (Romanian sour soup), pork sausages, poale-n-brau (a dish made from eggs, salt, and cheese), minced meat cooked with beef, onions, salt, and pepper, toba and coltabos (made from a variety of pig parts) as well as desserts such as clarite (crepes), saraille (almond cake), and placinta (turnovers).

"Miorita" ("The Little Ewe Lamb")

"Miorita" ("The Little Ewe Lamb") is one of the oldest and the most popular of Romanian poems. "Miorita" narrates the story of a magical black sheep named Miorita and a young shepherd. According to the poem, Miorita warns the Moldovan shepherd about an alleged plot to murder him and snatch his flock of sheep. This plot was hatched by his fellow shepherds namely, a Vrancean from Tara Romaneasca (Romanian country) and an Ungurean (Hungarian) from Transylvania. However, instead of trying to escape his fate, the shepherd accepts it and instructs Miorita to bury him near the sheep's pen. Also, he asks Miorita to communicate to the two shepherds that he has, in fact, married a princess, and the entire universe was in attendance to witness their marriage. Finally, he requests the magical ewe that if she ever meets his mother again, she should tell his mother that he has married a princess in a far-away land.

The message expressed through the poem is that death is not the end of life, but the beginning of a long and beautiful journey, thus reinforcing Romanians' belief in an afterlife.

Wine and tucia (plum brandy) are the traditional drinks of Romania.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 2

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western (or Gregorian) calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world; revelries begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Romania New Year's Day (January 1), called Anul nou in Romania, and the second day of the new year (January 2) are public holidays.

In Romania New Year's Eve is usually spent with family and friends because it symbolizes the birth of a child, the new year, and the departure of an old person, the old year. In the countryside on New Year's Eve, villagers carry a plow from door to door and wish everyone happiness and prosperity in the year to come.

On New Year's Day people celebrate with traditional songs and dances. The songs express the desire for good weather, harvest, health, and happiness. Children go from door to door, throwing grains of rice and wheat over every threshold. Romanians believe that this custom will ensure prosperity and a good sowing season in the coming year. Singing and dancing continue on January 2, the second day of the new year, which is also a public holiday in Romania. All public and private institutions are closed on this day.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day (IWD), observed annually on 8 March, is a major day of global celebration for the economic, political, and social achievements of women. The proposal to have a special day on which to recognize women and their many achievements was first suggested at the turn of the 20th century, when rapid industrialization and economic expansion led to workers' protests over dangerous working conditions. Women who worked in clothing and textile factories held one such demonstration on March 8, 1857, in New York City, protesting what they saw as very poor working conditions and low wages.

The first IWD was observed on February 28, 1909, in the United States following a declaration by the Socialist Party of America. International Women's Day was declared the following year at the first international women's conference in Copenhagen, organized by the Socialist International. On March 25, 1911, the infamous Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire in New York City killed over 140 women. A lack of safety measures was blamed for the high death toll. In the West, International Women's Day was commemorated during the 1910s and 1920s, then lapsed into obscurity until the second wave of feminism revived it in the 1960s. In 1975 the United Nations (UN) began to sponsor International Women's Day.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest May 1 celebrations are often ascribed to the pagan rites that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, the political significance of the day has changed substantially. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Romania, which is a Communist state, May 1 continues to be a public holiday, called Ziua muncii, and all public and private institutions are closed on this day.

❁ UNION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 1

Union Day, called Ziua națională or Ziua unirii in Romania, commemorates the historic Proclamation of Union of the Alba Lulia that resulted in the unification of Transylvania, Basarabia, Bucovina, and Cadrilater with the Old Romanian Kingdom, which also included the principalities of Moldavia (modern day Moldova) and Wallachia, on December 1, 1918. The country was named Greater Romania after all Romanians were united under a single state.

On this day Romanians from other parts of the country, including the president of the Republic, assemble in the town of Alba Lulia where the proclamation took place and a special liturgy is held in the Orthodox cathedral. A carnival atmosphere envelops the town, and the streets are crowded with numerous stalls selling Romanian flags, badges, T-shirts, toys, and traditional handicrafts.

Bram Stoker (1847–1912) based his novel Dracula on Vlad Dracul, the 15th-century prince of the Wallachia province of Romania.

Performances of folk dances and songs are an integral part of the celebrations. In the evening people eagerly await the parade of the armed forces, and after the presidential speech the day ends with a spectacular display of fireworks.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

The Feast of the Epiphany, called Boboteaza in Romania, is a Christian feast that celebrates the birth of Jesus, the arrival of the Magi (the Three Wise Men—Caspar, Balthazar, and Melchior) in Bethlehem to see the infant Jesus, and Jesus' life until his baptism in the Jordan River by John the Baptist. The word epiphany means “to reveal” or “to make known,” and this celebration is called Epiphany because the Magi revealed Jesus to the world. Devout Romanian Christians celebrate this day by offering prayers in their local churches and singing carols.

In ancient times girls stole basil from the priest's garden and slept with it under their pillows so they would dream about their future husbands on Epiphany. Another ritual performed during Epiphany involved carrying a cross to the Danube River or any other body of running water. The entire village attended a special service at the church and then headed toward the bank of a river, where the water was blessed. If there was no river nearby, the ceremony took place in the church courtyard where a huge pot was filled with water. Then the priest threw the cross in the river and young boys would jump in the river to recover it. Later the boys would strut around the village to be rewarded with meat, sausages, wine, and money.

❁ HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday of Lazarus–Easter

In the Eastern Orthodox Church, as in other Christian sects, Easter is the central observance of the liturgical year, and the date of most church holidays is determined by the date on which Easter falls. Every Sunday is dedicated in the Eastern Orthodox Church to Jesus' Resurrection, and 100 days are dedicated to Easter—50 before it in preparation, and 50 after it for glorifying him. Easter is the feast of feasts. The 50 days prior to Easter are a part of the period of Triodion, the period for strengthening one's faith. The means are well known: repentance, prayer, and self-control. The 50 days following Easter are the Pentecostarion (from the Greek pentikonta, meaning “fifty”).

Holy Week begins with the phrase: “Six days before the Passover, Jesus came to Bethany.” His arrival coincided with the Jewish Passover (Pesach). The church relates preparation and redemption to the events of this week.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday celebrates Jesus' Passion on the Cross. To take away our sins he willingly endured the Cross and death. On this day Romanians attend a special service in their local churches, offer prayers to God and remember the suffering and death of Christ. The confession from the Cross of the penitent thief, crucified with Christ, is celebrated. During the procession, the faithful kneel and pray for their spiritual welfare, then reverently kiss the crucifix.

The Vespers of Friday afternoon are a continuation of the royal hours. During this service the removal of Jesus' body from the Cross is commemorated with a sense of mourning for the terrible events that occurred. As the priest reads the Gospel, he removes Jesus' body from the cross, wraps it in a white cloth, and takes it to the altar. The priest then carries the cloth on which the body of Jesus is painted or embroidered around the church before placing it inside the sepulcher, a carved bier that symbolizes the tomb, reminding the faithful that during Jesus' entombment he descended into Hades to free the dead of the ages. After several hymns are sung, the priest sprinkles the sepulcher and the whole congregation with fragrant water.

Christians observe Good Friday with fasting, prayer, cleanliness, self-examination, confession, and good works, in humility and repentance. Psalms are read and resurrection hymns are sung that tell of Jesus' descent into Hades. Most of the readings of this day are from the Old Testament prophecies promising the conquest of death. On this day the Divine Liturgy of St. Basil is officiated.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

In Eastern Orthodox Churches what is called Easter in English-speaking countries is called Paștele in Romania, after the Hebrew observance Pesach (Passover). On Easter Sunday (Saturday midnight) Jesus' Resurrection is celebrated. Before midnight the Odes of Lamentation of the previous day are repeated. The Orthros of the Resurrection begins in complete darkness. The priest takes light from the vigil light and gives it to the faithful, who are holding candles. In many churches the priest leads the people outside the church, where he reads the Gospel that refers to the angel's statement: "He is risen; he is not here." Then the people wait breathlessly for the priest to start the hymn of Resurrection. From this moment the entire service takes on a joyous Easter atmosphere.

Fun Fact

A Romanian legend attributes Dragoș's founding of Moldavia to an aurochs (an extinct long-haired wild ox) hunt, during which Molda, his hound bitch, was killed. In remembrance of his beloved dog, Dragoș named the river "Moldova," which was later extended to the country.

Orthodox Easter is one of the most important religious celebrations in Romania. It is looked upon as a day of new beginnings and involves cleaning the house, taking a ritual bath, and dressing oneself in new clothes before attending Easter midnight services in local churches. During the service candles are lit for every person in the community, and they remain lit throughout the night. Romanians believe that the light of the candle protects people against being struck by thunder and lightning on their way home.

After reaching home, people dine on traditional Easter dishes such as cozonacul (lamb roast), pasca (spicy minced lamb), sponge cake, and cheese. Dyed eggs are also an integral part of Easter celebrations in Romania, since they are considered symbols of revival and rebirth. Traditionally eggs are dyed red with elaborate designs.

Easter Sunday afternoon the faithful gather once more for prayer with lighted candles and greet one another joyously, saying: "Christ is risen." The fruit of faith in the Resurrection is love, so this day is called Sunday of Agape ("love feast"), a day dedicated to Christian principles, especially forgiveness and charity. At this time Christians seek to end misunderstanding and arguments among those with whom they may be at odds.

Easter is an official holiday in Romania, and schools, businesses, and government agencies are closed. Bright Week follows Easter, during which there is no fasting, even on Wednesday and Friday.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world and is celebrated on December 25 every year, the date selected by the early church for Jesus' birthday. In Romania Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24) and last until St. Stephen's Day on December 26. In Romania where this holiday is called Crăciunul, devout Christians attend midnight services on Christmas Eve and celebrate the birth of Jesus by singing Christmas carols.

In many parts of Romania children carry a wooden star through the streets or carry pictures of important scenes from the Bible. The leader among the children holds a stout pole with a beautifully decorated wooden star, known as steua, which is covered with shiny paper, adorned with bells and ribbons and has a portrait of the Nativity in the center of the star. Young children also go from door to door singing Christmas carols and reciting poems about the joy of Christmas. People exchange greetings and visit their friends and families on this auspicious occasion.

The Feast of St. Stephen is observed on December 26, the day after Christmas. St. Stephen, who was stoned to death by Roman rulers for speaking in favor of Jesus and his disciples is considered to be the first martyr of Christianity. In some English-speaking countries this day is called Boxing Day.

Christmas is an official holiday in Romania, and schools, businesses, and government agencies are closed.

❁ MĂRȚIȘORUL

Observed in: Romania

Observed on: March 1

The spring festival celebrated in Romania, called Mărțișorul, is celebrated on March 1. More than 8,000 years old, the modern shape of this pagan festival probably originated with the Romans, who celebrated their New Year's Eve on the first day of March, because that month (Martius) was the month of the war god Mars, who was also the god of agriculture. This duality remains in the colors traditionally associated with Mărțișorul white and red. (Bulgarians have an almost identical festival celebrated on March 1 called Martenitsa.) In ancient Romania Marsyas-Silen was the god of vegetation and the land, and all nature celebrations were consecrated to him.

In early times people painted small river rocks in white and red and wore them round their neck. Red was associated with blood, Sun, and fire and symbolized women and the principle of fertility. White symbolized clear water, the sky, and men. On this day people held huge feasts and drank lots of wine.

In some ways Mărțișorul resembles the Western holiday Valentine's Day. In Romania men offer women a small decorative object, also called Mărțișorul, tied to a red and white string. This gift symbolizes the arrival of spring, and women may wear it pinned to their blouses for as long as two weeks. Sometimes women also give such gifts to men.

Observed on: December

Sfantu Gheorghe is an annual winter customs festival that takes place in the town of Sighetu Marmatiei during the month of December. Thousands of Romanians and tourists flock to this small town to participate in the festivities. During the festival the streets of the small town are crowded with people and masks hang on lampposts throughout the town. Young men wearing masks (featuring demons, monsters, and animals), with cowbells tied around their waists, run through the streets with great enthusiasm. Amid music and carols (known as colinde), a grand parade passes down the main street with representatives of every village in the Maramures region wearing their traditional dresses and carrying a large black-and-white bag filled with rice or grain. As they walk through the streets, they throw the rice or grain on the crowd. Rice (or grain) is a symbol of prosperity and happiness, so the gesture means that the villagers wish the onlookers happiness and protection from any misfortune.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

Romanians believe birth is a transition from blackness (an unknown world) to whiteness (the known world). In Romania a number of rituals are observed after the birth of a child. The “first bath” ceremony of the child takes place under the guidance of the eldest female relative of the child’s father. A ritual performed only by women, clean water mixed with milk, honey, money, and flowers is used to bathe the child. Then the child is handed to its mother along with wishes that the child grow up to be an adult with moral and spiritual integrity and blessed with a happy, healthy, and long life. The elder expresses her wish that the child be respectful toward its parents, have patience in abundance, as well as grow up to be a hardworking person. She also wishes the child a happy married life.

Another important ritual involves christening the child in a solemn ceremony in the local church. Godparents play a vital role in the ceremony, and the child is named after one of the godparents or a close and respected relative. After the priest performs the baptism ritual, the godparents have to bathe the child immediately. They place money, rice, and basil leaves in the water used for the ritual bath, which symbolize their wishes for the child: prosperity, abundance of food, and a “sweet” life.

Seven months after the birth of a child, a fortune-telling ritual takes place. An egg, a pencil, and a book are placed in front of the child, and the object he or she chooses helps determine his or her future. Thus if the child takes the book, it implies he or she will grow up to be an intellectual; a pencil symbolizes his or her artistic inclinations, and the one who chooses the egg will desire materialistic things.

A Romanian wedding ceremony is marked by colorful costumes, poetry, songs, and dancing. On the day of the wedding a representative of the bridegroom arrives at the home of the bride’s parents to pick her up. Around the same time the groom’s best men go around the village distributing invitations among the men. Then everyone joins the representative of the bridegroom who narrates the story of a young emperor (used metaphorically to describe the bridegroom) who went hunting in the forest along with his warriors (the best men) and caught a glimpse of a fairy. The emperor instructed the warriors to find the whereabouts of the fairy and, in this process, following the trail of the fairy, they have arrived at the bride’s house. He also tells them that they have a flower (in this case, the bride) in the garden that will not bear fruit due to the soil. In the story, the flower, once transplanted in the emperor’s garden, blossomed and bore fruit. Then the representative asks that the bride be handed over to them, and they promise to escort her to the emperor’s garden.

In Bhior, Transylvania, in order to win the bride and demonstrate his readiness to marry, the bridegroom has to pass a test of his cleverness. Generally the bridegroom has to solve a number of riddles to prove his worthiness.

For her wedding the bride wears a ceremonial dress and flowers. She is expected to change her hairstyle, and a group of married women cover her head with a scarf in a special musical ceremony during the wedding. This signals her acceptance into the community of married women.

Singing, dancing and feasting are part of the wedding reception, and the ceremony ends with a traditional dance of masks.

✿ DEATH

Romanians believe that three stars and a fir tree represent every person. When the person dies, the stars fall from the sky. Young men go to the woods to bring the branches of a fir tree. A group of women receive them at the entrance of the village and sing about the link between the life of the deceased and the fir tree. They also express the grief of the fir tree as it is destined to be laid near the head of the deceased person (considered to be related to the fir tree since their lives are linked) and rot.

Between the two days that separate the person's death and the funeral ceremony, at dawn, a group of elderly women sing the "Song of the Dawn," also known as "Bocetul" ("Great Song"). It is supposed to guide the soul of the deceased on the path that he or she must take to reach the land of the ancestors in the afterlife. It also announces the death of the person to the villagers.

After the singing the women pray to the Sun asking it to rise later so that the grieving family can prepare for the funeral.

The body of the deceased is never left alone, and people share their memories of the individual during a special get-together organized in memory of the deceased. A lavish feast is also part of the wake, known as a deathwatch in Romania. Romanians believe that even after death the life of the deceased should be celebrated.

For the funeral the family of the deceased makes arrangements for the coffin, for the shroud, for the bull carriage or truck to take the body to the cemetery, and for the food that will be served at the feast held in memory of the deceased. The body is carried in an open casket placed on a truck or bull carriage, and family members and villagers accompany the deceased to the cemetery.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

If Western Siberia was the jumping-off point for the migrations across the Bering Strait (Beringia) that brought at least some of the Amerindians to the Americas about 15,000 years ago, and given what is known at the present about human populations in Europe 200,000 years ago, then it is reasonable to expect to find evidence of human habitation in the region now called the Russian Federation. So far, however, the territory to be covered is immense, and the archaeological evidence is piecemeal. For example, archaeologists working in a region south of Moscow found an object of prehistoric art carved from mammoth's tusk about 17,000 years ago. Discovered at what is thought to have been a Stone Age campsite, one of the ends resembles the torso of a horse with a well-detailed mane.

Near a burial mound in the basin of the Aksai River, several gigantic stones have been found. The construction, a long alley stretching from east to west, is made up of vertically erected massive rocks (menhirs). These megaliths are apparently much older than other European megaliths. The site has been dated to approximately 9,000 B.C.E. Although Russia is so far known to have about 3,000 megalithic structures, including menhirs and dolmens, this is the first discovery of megaliths in the European part of Russia. Previously similar stone monuments had been discovered only in the Caucasus and Siberia.

At an early Neolithic burial place in the Ulyanovsk region on the Volga, southeast of European Russia, archaeologists found a skeleton, which was apparently that of a young woman who lived in the eighth millennium. The skeleton lacks the skull. This suggests that it may have been the practice to bury heads separately from bodies.

A 4,000-year-old megalithic structure was uncovered at a site in the central Russian region of Ryazan. This structure, which archaeologists believe was built as a sanctuary, sits on a hill overlooking the confluence of the Oka and the Pron Rivers. The site is a circle 23 feet in diameter, marked with standing stones 1.5 feet thick and evenly spaced one from each other. There is a large rectangular hole and a standing stone in the center of the circle. Along the edges of the site there are two more holes. Originally there may have been four of them, but the bank there is being destroyed by a ravine, so the temple has caved in partially. It has been suggested that this megalithic site may have served an astronomical purpose similar to that of Stonehenge.

A group of children, led by a local geologist, found evidence of a 4,000-year-old culture that occupied three islands in the Vuoksa River region near Leningrad: a series of paintings that resemble a fish, a dog, and a prehistoric symbol of the Sun. The Leningrad region, Karelia, and Scandinavia were all densely settled by tribes who built sculptures and painted petroglyphs throughout the region. The Vuoksa region resembles Onega Lake in Karelia, where many petroglyphs as old as 4,000 years have been found.

Beginning in the second millennium B.C.E., various groups occupied Russian territory (Indo-Europeans, Ural-Altai), but they left no written records, so not much is known about their cultures or activities. To the south, Greeks and Iranians, also Indo-Europeans, established settlements, but again little is known about these groups. Between the fourth and ninth centuries C.E. Huns, Goths, Magyars, and Avars passed through the region but with no lasting (or discernible) effect on the East Slavs, who had begun to spread south and east. From the late eighth century to the mid-ninth century merchants from the Middle East and Germanic commercial groups began to move into the regions inhabited by Finns and Slavic tribes, but these latter groups seem to have offered scant resistance to these activities.

In the ninth century Scandinavian traders set up a center near what is now Ryazan, and mention of the first ruler of Rus is found in Western and Islamic writings. This ruler, called a khagan, controlled what can be regarded as the beginning of the Kievan state. With other Scandinavian raiders, the Varangians, the Rus moved down the major rivers toward Baghdad and Constantinople. Rurik of Jutland, the head of one of the Scandinavian tribes, founded the dynasty that would rule various regions of East Slavic territory until 1598. Written sources describe Rus raids on Constantinople and the northern Caucasus in the early 10th century.

From 930 to 1000 the Varangians gained control of the trade route from the Baltic to the Black Sea, creating what became the basis of Kiev's economy and set the pattern for its political and cultural evolution. While the Varangian Rus could not have thought of themselves as "Scandinavians," they were not East Slavs either; yet they played a central role in organizing the land that would come to be named for them.

From its beginning with Prince Svyatoslav (d. 972), the new East Slavic political power was torn between the impulse to centralization and the impossibility of controlling the sprawling territories. In spite of his victories against other Varangian rulers, the Khazars, and the Bulgars, Svyatoslav was not a unifier. That task was left to his son, Vladimir (c. 980–1015), who would establish the political system that would rule the widespread state, and he invited the patriarch of Constantinople to create an Episcopal see in Rus. Vladimir successfully increased his territories, destroyed or assimilated the remaining Varangian clans, and endeavored to establish peaceful relationships with nearby dynasties.

The inherent contradictions between the desire for autonomy, on the one hand, and the need for centralized control and unity on the other, set the stage for what would become the political history of Rus. By the middle of the 12th century, the major territories, because of the prosperity of Kiev, had become autonomous political and economic units. The strands of continuity were everywhere strained, if not broken, in the period following the decline of Kiev. The distinctiveness of the character and historical events of the major East Slavic regions was clear during the Kiev period and persisted into the 20th century.

Following the longest civil war in Russian history, Vasili II (the Blind; 1415–62) became the Grand Prince of Moscow (Muscovy). His son Ivan III (1440–1505), also known as Ivan the Great and the first to call himself "grand duke of all the Russias," succeeded his father after serving with him as co-regent. Sometimes also referred to as the "gatherer of the Russian lands," he sought to unify the various territories and established what would become the Russian autocracy. His son Vasili III continued the effort to unify the vast territory, but it would be his son Ivan IV the Terrible (1530–84), who would succeed. By incorporating all the surrounding areas, including the Kazan and Astrakhan Khanates to the east and parts of Siberia, he created the Russian Empire. He was called Ivan the Terrible because he was considered the most ruthless tyrant of his times. When the last tsar of that dynasty died without leaving an heir, Sweden and Poland claimed the throne. Finally in 1613, 16-year-old Michael Romanov (1596–1645) of the Romanov Dynasty was elected, and the Romanovs ruled Russia for the next four hundred years. During this time, Russia became a major European power. A member of the same dynasty, Peter the Great (1672–1725), who ruled from 1689 until his death, transformed Russia. He wanted to make Russia more modern militarily, economically, and socially. He traveled a lot

Tsar

The word tsar (or czar) is derived from the Latin caesar, which means "emperor." It was the title used for the autocratic rulers of the First and Second Bulgarian Empires starting in 913, for the rulers of Serbia in the middle of the 14th century, and for Russia's rulers from 1547 to 1917.

and learned about European trade, culture, and warfare. Soon Russia was every bit the equal of England, France, and Germany.

When World War I began and Austria declared war on Serbia, Russia went to war to defend the Serbs but was ill prepared for the battle. The ruler Tsar Nicholas II (1868–1918) was not very strong, and the Russian army was defeated. Riots broke out and the Romanovs were overthrown in 1917. Consequently the Bolshevik wing of the Communist Party came to power and formed the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). Joseph Stalin (1879–1953) came to power and the Russian Empire strengthened. Under his reign, the USSR fought against Germany in World War II and won. After the war the USSR, United States, Great Britain, and France divided Germany into four zones to be governed by each of the four countries. The USSR's dominance increased, and hostilities between the world's two superpowers, the United States and USSR, continued for the next 45 years. While there was no actual fighting, both sides spent enormous amounts of money “fighting” what is known as the “Cold War.”

On March 11, 1985, Mikhail Gorbachev (b. 1931), a member of the Soviet Communist Party, was elected as the General Secretary of the party. From 1985–88 Gorbachev radically changed the course of the USSR's foreign policy when he introduced the policies of glasnost (“political openness”), perestroika (“economic restructuring”), and uskorenie (“quicken economic development”). In 1990 he was elected president.

However, Gorbachev's policies to create more political openness reawakened long-suppressed nationalist and anti-Russian feelings in the USSR's constituent republics. Toward the end of the 1980s, the process of openness and democratization was beyond control. One by one the Soviet republics declared their sovereignty. In September 1991 the USSR recognized the independence of the three Baltic states—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Ukraine declared its independence from the USSR in December 1991. In the same month the leaders of the Russian, Ukrainian, and Belarusian Republics issued a declaration that the USSR was dissolved and was to be replaced by the Commonwealth of Independent States.

On December 25, 1991, Mikhail Gorbachev resigned as president of the USSR, and Boris Yeltsin (b. 1931) succeeded him. After the dissolution of the USSR, Russia faced a multitude of problems. The gross domestic product (GDP) of the country fell, and poverty increased. In the early years of the 21st century, however, Russia's economy was stabilizing and the country's GDP is now about one-third of that of the United Kingdom.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Russia, even after the disintegration of the USSR, remains the largest country in the world in terms of area. The country spans both Europe and Asia, stretching from the Baltic Sea in the west to the Pacific Ocean in the east, and the Arctic Ocean in the north to the Black Sea in the south. Russia shares land boundaries with Norway, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Belarus, Ukraine, Poland, Lithuania, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, China, and North Korea.

The Russian landscape is mostly flat and low lying and consists of plains—a region called Siberia. Most of Siberia lies within Russian territory, but some parts belong to Mongolia. These plains are heavily forested toward the north and remain grassy in the southern parts. The relatively low Ural mountain ranges (the highest point is 6,234 feet) are centrally located, acting as a divide between Europe and Asia. The three main rivers of Russia are the Dnieper, Don, and Volga. To the south Russia has the Caucasus mountain range where Mount Elbrus (18,510 feet), Europe's highest peak, is located. Eastern Russia also has the Verkhoyansk range, and the peninsula of Kamchatka has 160 volcanoes, 29 of which are still active.

The vast expanse of Russia accommodates a great variety of landscapes and climates. Most parts of Russia remain under snow at least six months of the year. The average temperature found across the country is 32°F, and the average is even lower in Siberia. However, the coastal regions are much warmer during the summer months. The climate in Russia can be classified as temperate to Arctic continental.

Forests of pine, spruce, deciduous trees, coniferous forests, steppe grasslands, and even deserts are to be found in Russia. Animals, such as snow leopards, cheetahs, porcupines, gazelles, wild goats, chamois, reindeer, wolves, brown bears, deer, lynx, and the Siberian tiger are also found here. Currently the flora and fauna of Russia are endangered due to poaching, pollution, and fur hunters, but efforts are under way to preserve the remaining wildlife. There are over 140 state nature reserves and several breeding programs to ensure the continued welfare of animal species in Russia.

❁ ECONOMY

Even though Russians cultivate food grains, sugar beets, sunflower seeds, vegetables, fruits, and obtain beef and milk from livestock, agriculture is not a major contributor to the economy. Russian soil is unsuitable for extensive agriculture (only 10 percent of the land is arable) and, as a result, the major GDP contributors are industries and services. Tourism has emerged as an important source of foreign exchange.

Fun Fact

Three weeks after being crowned Russia's first tsar at the age of 17, Ivan IV—known in history as Ivan the Terrible—married, having chosen his bride from among virgins over the age of 12 paraded before him in the Kremlin.

Fun Fact

Leo Tolstoy's novels War and Peace (1865–69) and Anna Karenina (1877) have both been made into successful films.

The major industries of Russia include mining and coal production, oil, gas, chemicals, metals, machine building, aircraft, space vehicles, shipbuilding, road and rail transportation equipment, communications equipment, agricultural machinery, electric power generating and transmitting equipment, medical and scientific instruments, consumer durables, textiles, foodstuffs, and handicrafts.

Russia is rich in minerals and natural resources. Deposits of oil, natural gas, coal, minerals, and stands of timber are abundant. The country also enjoys good trade relations with Germany, Italy, Netherlands, China, United States, Ukraine, Belarus, Switzerland, Kazakhstan, and France. Russia exports petroleum and petroleum products, natural gas, wood, metals, chemicals, and civilian and military goods. The major imports are machinery and equipment, consumer goods, medicines, meat, sugar, and metal products.

The Russian economy suffered major setbacks after the disintegration of the USSR in 1991. The country is now working to reduce the unemployment rate and the economic disparity seen among various regions in Russia itself. Moscow is the hub of economic activity, while there are some regions in Asian Russia that are very backward and underdeveloped.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Russia's different ethnic groups together form a rich cultural background for the country. The Orthodox Church, along with the Soviet regime, influenced Russian art forms in many ways. Russia has enjoyed rich cultural growth and development for a major part of its turbulent history. The Soviet regime undoubtedly stifled freedom in various fields such as literature, music, religion, and other media of expression. In spite of that, there emerged a new Soviet-characterized style in all these fields.

Russian literature has produced famous writers (some of whom won Nobel prizes for literature) including Alexander Pushkin (1779–1837), Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910), Fyodor Dostoevsky (1821–81), Ivan Turgenev (1818–83), Anton Chekhov (1860–1904), Nikolay Gogol (1809–52), and Maxim Gorky (1868–1936) during different periods in Russian history. Apart from these contributions, some world-famous fairy tales, like The Frog Princess, are of Russian origin.

Russian music was tightly monitored during the Soviet era. However, Russian folk, rock, and pop music survived the regime and have now become the most popular musical forms. The 200-year-old Moscow State Circus and the unique Russian Bolshoi Ballet have all contributed to Russian culture.

When one thinks of Russian architecture, the onion-shaped domes familiar from the Kremlin come to mind. The architecture found in this country has been predominantly religious in nature, with churches having Greek crosses and huge domes. After the dissolution of the USSR there has been a renewed interest in restoring ancient and traditional Russian art forms that are visible in these buildings. The traditional art form of iconography originated here during the medieval period. These were paintings of religious images, often with favored saints shown in the presence of God. This practice, frowned upon by Catholics as a form of idolatry, is very popular in the Russian Orthodox Church.

Russians are known for their technological prowess, especially in the field of aeronautics and space research. The Russians launched Sputnik, the first artificial satellite. The first human to go into space was the Russian Yuri Gagarin (1934–68) and the first woman to go into space was Valentina Tereshkova (b. 1937).

CUISINE

Russian cuisine consists of a wide variety of soups, fish, cereal, and drinks. Vegetables, meats, fruits, mushrooms, berries, and herbs are used in Russian cooking. Russia is a country with very cold winters so the foods consumed there are rich in carbohydrates and fat rather than proteins. Fresh fruits and vegetables are rarely used in cooking. Russian products, such as caviar, buckwheat, and rye flour are widely used in international cuisine.

The main meal is normally eaten at dinnertime and may include beef, chicken, fish, or vegetables. Russians also enjoy a variety of soups during different meals. They have some national soups like shchi (cabbage soup), oocha (fish soup), rassolnik (kidney and pickle soup), botvinya (cold soup made from beetroot leaves and spinach), and okrosbka (cold vegetable soup).

Russian beverages such as vodka or mors (a berry drink) are popular even among non-Russians. The beer found in Russian areas is relatively stronger than in most of the European countries. Russians also consume large amounts of coffee and tea.

Caviar

Caviar is the processed, salted roe (eggs) of various species of fish, but primarily sturgeon. This delicacy is marketed all over the world as a favorite garnish on hors d'oeuvres. Caviar is often highly priced and is associated with haute cuisine. The world's best caviar comes from the Russian coastal regions. The word caviar comes from the Persian word khag-avar, which means "roe-generator," to denote the fish as well as its roe. Vegetarian caviar, a soy-based delicacy, is marketed for the vegetarian gourmet market.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 2

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world. Celebrations begin on December 31 (New Year's Eve) and continue through January 2. In Russia the New Year's celebrations have largely replaced Christmas as the major holiday of the season. On New Year's Eve people decorate fir trees, called yolka, and place gifts for family and friends under them. It is a time spent rejoicing with family members. Russian children receive presents from Grandfather Frost (Dyed Moroz, the Russian equivalent of Santa Claus) and the Snow Maiden (Snyegurochka), and take part in special functions in their schools.

Russians also cook a special meal to celebrate the New Year; it includes smoked fish, caviar, roasted meats, and other goodies. Many cakes and other sweets are served, but two of the very special cakes are babka, a round yeast cake, and kulich, a fancy three-tiered fruit bread. (The three layers symbolize the Christian Trinity.) A lot of liquid refreshment is served as well.

Muscovites listen to the bells chime in Red Square and wait for the country's main clock in the Kremlin to strike midnight. Then they drink champagne, greet each other, and make personal resolutions. The second day after New Year's is also a public holiday, and schools and workplaces are closed.

❁ OLD NEW YEAR'S DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 13

Even though the term "Old New Year" sounds like an oxymoron, the Russians are only too glad to celebrate New Year's twice a year. This day was the beginning of the new year according to the Julian calendar, which was followed in Russia until February 1918. This is not an official holiday in Russia anymore, but festivities are held all across the country. It is a day set aside for family, and most Russians stay at home.

❁ DEFENDER OF THE MOTHERLAND DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 23

This day was declared a public holiday only in 2001. During the Soviet era, February 23 was known as the Day of the Soviet Army and Navy.

Now it is called the Defender of the Motherland Day. This is usually a day off from work. It is treated as the male equivalent of International Women's Day in Russia, and women present men with flowers and gifts.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day (IWD), observed annually on March 8, is an important day of global celebration for the economic, political, and social achievements of women. The proposal to have a special day on which to recognize women and their many achievements was first suggested at the turn of the 20th century, when rapid industrialization and economic expansion led to workers' protests over dangerous working conditions. Women who worked in clothing and textile factories had held a demonstration on March 8, 1857, in New York City, protesting what they saw as very poor working conditions and low wages.

The first IWD was observed on February 28, 1909, in the United States, following a declaration by the Socialist Party of America.

International Women's Day was declared the following year at the first international women's conference in Copenhagen, organized by the Socialist International. On March 25, 1911, the infamous Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire in New York City killed over 140 women. A lack of safety measures was blamed for the high death toll. In the West, International Women's Day was observed during the 1910s and 1920s and then lapsed into obscurity until the second wave of feminism revived it in the 1960s. In 1975 the United Nations began sponsoring International Women's Day.

On this day in Russia, men present women with gifts and flowers. Traditionally the men take over all domestic tasks and give the women a day off from chores. This day is also considered and celebrated as the advent of spring in Russia.

Fun Fact

Santa Claus was the name given to St. Nicholas (c. 270–345/352), a real person born in Asia Minor at the Greco-Roman city of Myra in the province of Lycia (now in Turkey), when the entire culture of the region was Greek. St. Nicholas was the patron saint of Russia. When the Soviet government suppressed religious observances, St. Nicholas was replaced by Dyed Moroz, or Grandfather Frost, the Russian spirit of winter who brought gifts on New Year's.

✿ LABOR DAY

Celebrated by: General Public

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. The earliest origins of May Day celebrations are ascribed to pagan rituals that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, and this is one of the reasons the day is also called Spring and Labor Holiday in Russia. The radical politics underlying the observance, however, go back to 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Russia Labor Day celebrations last for two days, when the traditions of "making subbotnik" are observed; people wash, clean, and place everything in order. This activity is often done in small groups at the workplace or in schools and back yards. On these days there are festive parades through Moscow's Red Square and St. Petersburg's Palace Square. May 1 was known as Day of the International Solidarity of Workers during the Soviet regime, and Communist demonstrations were held on Russian streets on this day.

✿ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 9

Victory Day commemorates the defeat of German Fascists by the Soviet allies during World War II, which ended in 1945. This is one of the most celebrated national holidays in Russia. People go to see military parades and other demonstrations. War veterans visit the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier and honor their fallen comrades. The national media broadcast patriotic programs and songs. War memorial services are held in places such as the Piskaryovskoye Cemetery in St. Petersburg. There are numerous concerts, fireworks displays, and other entertainments in city parks. Russia wears a patriotic look with banners everywhere that salute the soldiers. On this day all Russian schools and offices are closed.

Fun Fact

Orthodox Christians call the pre-Christmas fast "Lesser Lent" to distinguish it from the more important fast that precedes Easter, called "Great Lent."

✿ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 12

Independence Day marks the anniversary of the end of the Soviet era in Russia. On this day in 1993 the first president of the new Russia was elected, subsequently ending the "Iron Curtain" policy of Soviet Russia. This is a recently declared national holiday, and not all Russians have welcomed the move. This holiday also commemorates the adoption of the Declaration of Sovereignty of the Russian Federation in 1991.

People may get to see a few demonstrations on this day in Russia, but generally this public holiday is a quiet affair.

✿ ACCORD AND RECONCILIATION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 7

This day is celebrated in memory of the October Revolution that took place in 1917. The October Revolution was the second phase in the Russian Revolution that occurred the same year. It is also known as the Bolshevik Revolution. According to the Gregorian calendar, this revolution took place on October 25. This holiday has been renamed and celebrated as the Day of Accord and Reconciliation. Russians conduct parades on this day.

✿ CONSTITUTION DAY

Religious Holidays

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 7

Christmas, called Sochelnik in Russia, is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world and marks the birth of Jesus. As in most other Orthodox Christian countries Christmas in Russia is celebrated on January 7 to conform to the Julian calendar and not December 25, the official holiday of the Gregorian, or Western, calendar. Following the 1917 revolution, Christmas was banned in Russia, along with other religious celebrations. It was not until 75 years later in 1992 that the holiday was openly observed again. It is once again celebrated, with the faithful attending an all-night liturgy. However, Christmas is a quiet affair, unlike the Russian New Year, which is a much bigger event and is celebrated all across the country.

In Russia Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (January 6), when Orthodox Christians break a 39-day-long fast with a 12-course dinner, each course in honor of an Apostle of Jesus. The fast for Christmas continues until someone spots the first evening star on Christmas Eve. The 12 courses include: mushroom soup (or sauerkraut soup) with zaprashka (a brown sauce); a Lenten bread (pagach); grated garlic; a bowl of honey; baked cod; fresh apricots, oranges, figs, and dates; nuts; kidney beans with shredded potatoes seasoned with lots of garlic; peas; parsley potatoes; bobalki (small biscuits combined with sauerkraut or poppy seed with honey); and a lot of red wine. Russians make a traditional dish called kutya on this day; it is a porridge of various grains, honey, and poppy seeds.

One of the many ceremonies associated with the Christmas Eve is called Kolyadki. During this ceremony people wish each other wealth and happiness. Like many other Russian celebrations, this is a pagan ritual that has been assimilated and continued as a Christmas activity. People used to pray to the ancient solar goddess Kolyada to make the days grow longer.

As a part of the ceremony people make a snow lady, called Lady Kolyada, with a carrot nose, prunes for eyes, and green beans for teeth. It is believed that Lady Kolyada joins groups of people carrying decorated stars, to visit and greet people during this season. People sing and dance around the snow lady with torches of fire and push a festive wheel. Children also dress up as animals usually shown as part of Christmas nativity scenes (sheep, cattle, and donkeys), sing Christmas carols, and pray to Baby Jesus.

Families also attend church and offer prayers in a special liturgy before Christmas.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services, followed by dining on special Christmas delicacies, such as fish, borscht, cabbage stuffed with millet, and cooked dried fruit. People sing carols and gather around the Christmas tree to exchange gifts on this day. Children open gifts that they have received from St. Nicholas. Russian families gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate Christmas with a special meal that usually features a roasted goose and pork dishes.

❁ ST. TATIANA DAY

Observed on: January 25

St. Tatiana Day, also called Students' Day or Tatiana's Fête, commemorates the feast of St. Tatiana, who lived in Rome from 223–35. She practiced Christianity at a time when the Romans were persecuting Christians. As a result, she and her fam-

Babushka

Babushka is a traditional Russian Christmas figure who distributes presents to children. The word babushka means "grandmother" in Russian. According to legend Babushka refused to accompany the Three Wise Men to see the baby Jesus because the weather was too cold. However, she soon changed her mind, filled her basket with gifts for the baby, and tried to catch up with the Three Wise Men. But Babushka never found her way to the baby and so, to this day, she visits Russian homes, leaving toys for good children.

ily were tortured and put to death by the Roman emperor Alexander Severus. The Russians honor and pray for St. Tatiana on this day. This is also seen as the beginning of the winter holidays in Russia. The students of Russia have another special reason to celebrate this day. In 1775 on this day, the Empress Elizabeth signed a decree to establish Moscow University. Russian students rarely get to celebrate New Year's Day because they are busy preparing for exams. On Students' Day they make up for that loss by partying and having fun.

❁ BLINI DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: One day before the beginning of Lent

Blini Day, or Maslyanitsa (Butter Festival), is the eve of Lent, and Russians celebrate this day by eating special pancakes served with honey, fresh cream, and caviar. Some people celebrate the occasion by breaking holes in frozen lakes and rivers and swimming in the icy water. There is a traditional Russian carnival held on this day and the week preceding it. This day is celebrated by wearing masks and costumes, dances, songs, children's events, as well as by consuming hot tea and pancakes, generally served outdoors.

Blini Day has a pagan origin. Long ago, Russians celebrated the arrival of spring on this day. They burned a scarecrow to signify the end of a harsh winter. People made round yellow pancakes that resemble the Sun, in the Sun's honor. When Russians embraced Christianity, they modified this festival and began celebrating both the beginning of Lent and the end of winter simultaneously. On this day all food items that are to be avoided during Lent (namely butter, cheese, cream, and meat) are eaten. These practices have given the celebration other names—Pancake Week and Cheese Week; in French-speaking countries the day is known as Mardi Gras, and in English-speaking countries it is known as Fat Tuesday or Shrove Tuesday.

HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: March

In the Eastern Orthodox Church, as in other Christian sects, Easter is the central observance of the liturgical year, and the date of most church holidays is determined by the date on which Easter falls. Easter is the feast of feasts. Although every Sunday in the Eastern Orthodox Church is dedicated to Jesus' Resurrection, 100 more days are dedicated specifically to the events of Easter—50 before it in preparation, and 50 after it for glorifying Christ. The 50 days prior to Easter are a part of the period of Triodion, the period for strengthening one's faith. The means are well known: repentance, prayer, and self-control. The 50 days following Easter are the Pentecostarion (from the Greek pentikonta, meaning fifty).

Holy Week begins with the phrase: "Six days before the Passover, Jesus came to Bethany." His arrival coincided with the Jewish Passover (Pesach). The church relates preparation and redemption to the events of this week.

In Russia the observances of Holy Week begin on the Saturday Morning of St. Lazarus, the day before Palm Sunday. On this day the raising from the dead of St. Lazarus, the friend of Jesus, is celebrated.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday celebrates Jesus' Passion on the Cross. According to Christian belief, to take away sins he willingly endured the Cross and death. The confession from the cross of the penitent thief, crucified with Jesus, is celebrated. During the procession, the faithful kneel and pray for their spiritual welfare, then reverently kiss the crucifix.

During Good Friday services the removal of Jesus' body from the Cross is commemorated with a sense of mourning for the terrible events that occurred. As the priest reads the Gospel, he removes Jesus' body from the cross, wraps it in a white cloth, and takes it to the altar. The priest then carries the cloth on which the body of Jesus is painted or embroidered around the church before placing it inside the sepulcher, a carved bier that symbolizes the tomb, reminding the faithful that during Jesus' entombment he descended into Hades to free the dead of the ages.

After several hymns are sung, the priest sprinkles the sepulcher and the whole congregation with fragrant water.

Christians observe Good Friday with fasting, prayer, cleanliness, self-examination, confession, and good works, in humility and repentance. Psalms are read and Resurrection hymns are sung that tell of Jesus' descent into Hades. Most of the readings of this day are from the Old Testament. On this day the Divine Liturgy of St. Basil is officiated.

Easter Eggs

Russian Easter eggs are red because this was the color of the blood Jesus shed for his people. It is also believed that when Mary Magdalene visited Emperor Tiberius, she handed him a red egg and proclaimed, "Christ has risen!"

Russian Easter eggs are dyed red by boiling eggs with onion skins. Onion peels are gathered for this purpose in the weeks that precede Easter. Depending on the color of the peels, Easter eggs can be bright red or dark brown. These eggs are used for different Easter games. In one such game, one person holds an Easter egg firmly in his or her hand, while others try to crack it by hitting it with their Easter eggs. Whoever eventually has an unbroken Easter egg emerges as the winner.

There are special Easter eggs known as pysanky in Russia. These masterpieces are impressively painted and decorated with jewels and stones and are often kept for public display. Some of the most famous Easter eggs were made by court jeweler and artist Peter Karl Fabergé (1846–1920), who was commissioned in 1884 by Tsar Alexander III (1845–94) to make a special Easter present for the tsar's wife.

RED HILL DAY

Red Hill Day, known in Russian as Krasnaya Gorka, is celebrated on the first Sunday after Easter to welcome the advent of spring. Russians consider this day to be ideal for weddings. On this day, people gather at St. Petersburg to sing Easter songs, play Easter games, and take part in other traditional Russian festivities. In the past people welcomed spring during this holiday, as if "inviting" it to their lands. The appearance of the first green leaves on the trees after winter was usually celebrated by singing and dancing around the trees.

FEAST OF ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST

In Russia this day is known as the Day of Ivan Kupala. Ivan Kupala is the Russian name for John the Baptist. It is associated with St. Andrew as well. It is a holiday that has its roots in pagan times with the celebration of the summer solstice, the longest day of the year. (The winter solstice, when the longest night of the year is celebrated, is called Korochun.) Originally a time when pagan fertility rites were observed, it has been adopted into the Orthodox Christian calendar.

It was believed that on this day the Sun was forced to sink, and a young girl helped the Sun rise again by washing it with the dew collected from

Fun Fact

St. John's Night on the Bald Mountain, Modest Mussorgsky's (1839–81) first orchestral work, was inspired by Gogol's (1809–52) short story about a peasant who sees a witches' sabbath on the Bald Mountain near Kiev on St. John's Eve. In Russian, Ivanova noch' na Lisoy gore, this work is commonly known as Night on Bald Mountain.

On this day, youngsters collect plants and herbs that are believed to have curative powers, such as medvezhye ushko ("bear's ear"), bogatenka ("rich people's grass"), and razryv-trava ("love-break-grass"). These herbs are then put under the pillows of people who are ill. During earlier times young boys and girls would swim in the river late at night and jump over bonfires in pairs. If after the jump they were still holding hands, it was considered a good sign, indicating the couple would marry soon.

On Moscow's Day, or Day of the City, the city celebrates its birthday with a series of patriotic events and other official ceremonies. The Russian president and other administrative officials take part in the festivities. The national television and radio channels broadcast special programs on this day. The streets are colorfully decorated, and there are parades held on the streets of Moscow. Music, street performances, and dances are the highlights of this day.

FESTIVAL OF THE NORTH

The Festival of the North is an annual event that has been held in the Kola Peninsular region of Russia since 1934. The largest celebrations take place in the city of Murmansk, the capital of the beautiful but isolated Kola region. (Murmansk is the largest city in the world north of the Arctic Circle!) This event, which lasts 10 days, celebrates the end of "polar nights," the time when the Sun does not shine at all, which is most of December and January.

Sporting events such as ice hockey, skiing, and reindeer racing take place during this time. Some people go for a swim in the icy waters of Lake Semyonovskaya. During this festival the ethnic Sami people hold reindeer contests, celebrate with singing, dancing, drinking, and feasting. They celebrate their culture because it has survived adverse conditions for thousands of years.

DAY OF MEMORY AND GRIEF

This day is marked to commemorate the events that occurred in Khabarovsk in 1941 during World War II. The Japanese Imperial Army invaded Khabarovsk but soon met with resistance from the Russians. Some claim that the Japanese army used biological weapons in Khabarovsk during this war. In any event, the severe weather conditions made fighting difficult anyway, and many soldiers from both sides perished in the war.

On this day the administrators of the territory of Khabarovsk and war veterans lay garlands at the Eternal Flame in Slava (Glory) Square. The guards of honor salute the dead, while everyone observes a moment of silence. Meetings of veterans are held with the youth at the city's schools.

BIRTH

Even though Russians may not follow this ritual today, the bania (sauna) birth is worth mentioning. Russians, like the inhabitants of the frigid Scandinavian countries, considered sweat baths to be a cleansing ritual, and elaborate arrangements for steam saunas were made in Russian households. Since these places were considered the most hygienic place in the house, women often gave birth inside banias. The midwife assisted the mother during the process, while also trying to protect her from evil spirits.

After the birth occurred, both the mother and child were lightly beaten with birch twigs to purify them.

❁ MARRIAGE

Russian couples have two wedding ceremonies: civil and religious. The church wedding is not considered legal or official even today. However, if a couple lives together for two consecutive years, they are considered legally married. The civil wedding is barely attended by any relatives or friends, but the church wedding is a big affair. The Russian Orthodox Church has its own set of unique rituals and traditions. The rings and the couple are blessed by the priest. They couple then walk around a table on which the Bible and a crucifix have been placed. Next the couple are crowned as king and queen of their domestic kingdom. They drink wine from a common cup during the ceremony to symbolize unity and the sharing of joys and sorrows.

After the ceremony the guests throw coins on the couple to wish them unbounded wealth and fortune in their life together. The couple then takes a small tour around the city visiting historic sites and laying flowers at the Grave of the Unknown Soldier. When they return to the banquet hall, a feast is held in their honor. Food, drinks, dancing, singing, and toasting are a part of all Russian wedding parties. Some feasts are known to go on for two days.

❁ DEATH

When a Russian dies, the body is placed in an open casket and kept in a funeral home for the mourners to grieve. The mourners wear dark clothes and bring an even number of flowers for the dead. No one in Russia gives an even number of flowers to their loved ones, unless that person is dead. After the funeral service, the family members have a memorial dinner or a “mercy meal” in the honor of the deceased. If the deceased leaves behind a widow, she wears black for two years.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Twa forest people inhabited the area called Rwanda starting in the 11th century; they were followed by the Hutu and then by the Tutsi, who came to rule over the majority Hutu in the 16th century. The Tutsi rule was authoritarian and feudalistic. The mwami, or king, dominated the Hutus totally, even deciding their land rights—an important source of power in those days.

Living conditions in Rwanda remained fairly constant until the arrival of European colonizers in the 19th century. First the Germans took over Rwanda and Burundi. Following Germany's defeat in World War I, the Rwandan state came under the control of Belgium and was called Ruanda-Urundi, an area that included Burundi. The new colonial rulers supported the Tutsi desire for power until the Hutu began rebelling against their exploitation at the hands of the Tutsi in the 1950s. In 1959 Tutsi massacred Hutu leaders, and the Hutu retaliated with an uprising, killing about 100,000 Tutsi. Rwanda's official independence from Belgium was recognized under the majority Hutu leadership on July 1, 1962.

In 1972 the Hutu began the wholesale slaughter of the Tutsi ruling minority in the neighboring state of Burundi. In the aftermath of the uprising in neighboring Burundi, the Rwandan prime minister was ousted by his army chief Maj. Gen. Juvenal Habyarimana (1937–94). There were more massacres of Tutsi in the 1970s, but nothing like what the country would experience beginning in 1990, when the country was ripped apart by a new wave of ethnic violence. The immediate cause was a slump in the economy due to prolonged bad weather conditions and acute food shortages. The Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), a rebel group of exiled Rwandan Tutsi, who had been driven out of the country after earlier ethnic conflicts and were led by now-President Paul Kagame (b. 1957), came out in open warfare against the Hutu of Rwanda in October 1990.

The RPF was an organized group made up largely of Tutsi, many of whom had been exiled for more than 30 years. The Hutu retaliated, and what followed was the worst human rights situation since 1945 (when World War II ended). More than one million Tutsi and a smaller number of Hutu were killed. This tragedy is said to have been the brainchild of Hutu extremists in the government and the army, with the killings carried out by Rwandan soldiers and Hutu gangs. The killing subsided only when the UN Security Council sent international troops into Rwanda. By 1994 the RPF had taken control of the country by force and nearly two million Rwandan Hutu, fearing reprisals, fled the country. In 1994 a National Unity government was installed by the RPF to deal with the problems of ethnic violence and the millions of refugees in the border camps.

Rwanda has been called the “land of a thousand graves” because of the innumerable deaths caused by ethnic conflict. As of the early 21st century, the International Criminal Tribunal (based in Tanzania) was still bringing the perpetrators of the violence to justice while trying to relocate refugees and reestablish the Rwandan economy. Parliamentary elections were held in 2003, with Paul Kagame of the RPF winning a 95 percent majority. Meanwhile extremist Hutu insurgents across the border in the Democratic Republic of Congo, who are committed to retaking Rwanda, continue to destabilize the entire region.

Rwanda is also known as the “land of a thousand hills.” It is a landlocked country surrounded by Uganda, the Democratic Republic of Congo (formerly Zaire), Burundi, and Tanzania. The Rwandan terrain is essentially hilly and mountainous, with the altitude decreasing from west to east. The country is situated at the western edge of the upheaval-prone Great Rift Valley, and the volcanic Virunga range is situated in its northwest. The highest peak is the snowcapped Mt. Karisimbi (14,869 feet).

Most of the population inhabits the grassland areas of the central highlands, the riversides, and swamps on the eastern side of Rwanda. The population density in Rwanda is one of the highest in Africa; deforestation and excessive farming are significant problems. Lake Kivu, 4,700 feet above sea level, provides half of the country’s water resources; the river systems of the Nile and the Congo pass through the country.

Due to its altitude, Rwanda has a temperate climate despite its proximity to the equator. The average temperature ranges between 64 and 84°F, with intensive rainfall from mid-March to mid-May. The rain forests around the mountains of the northeast get more rainfall than the rest of Rwanda. Snowfall is found on the mountain peaks.

❁ ECONOMY

Rwanda is a war-torn country with ongoing internal ethnic conflict. The economy is supported by agriculture, which accounts for 40 to 50 percent of gross domestic product (GDP). The industrial sector is small, contributing 17 percent of GDP. It is based on the processing of agricultural products. Tea and coffee account for nearly 90 percent of Rwanda’s exports.

Food shortages became acute during the ethnic violence of the 1990s, since most people got uprooted from their homes. Farming, primarily of the subsistence kind, became impossible in the perpetual warring conditions. As a result food items now constitute Rwanda’s main imports, and residents are almost entirely dependent on foreign aid. The main problems facing the economy include: the absence of an effective infrastructure; the lack of necessary cash crops; wide-scale looting; and poor health conditions. In 1990 the World Bank initiated a structural adjustment program for Rwanda, and the government is trying hard to rehabilitate and stabilize the economy.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Rwanda is populated by three tribes: the Hutu, Tutsi, and Twa. The Tutsi, who are nomadic herders, became Rwanda’s rulers in the 16th century. Since then, and with the support of the Belgian colonial authorities in the 20th century, they have practiced ongoing discrimination against the majority Hutus. What has resulted is continual ethnic strife between the two groups.

Kinyarwanda, only spoken in this part of Africa, is their common language. French and English vie for second place. Swahili is also spoken in parts of the countryside. Due to the influx of colonists and missionaries in the 1900s, Christianity became the

Before becoming known to the outside world for the 1994 Rwandan genocide, when up to one million people died, Rwanda was best known to the outside world as the home of mountain gorillas.

1994 Genocide

It was on April 6, 1994, that the Hutu Rwandan president Juvenal Habyarimana was killed when his plane was shot down at Kigali airport. This sparked a rampage of indiscriminate killings of Tutsi and moderate Hutu by the extremist Hutu militias. The United Nations, France, and the United States were criticized internationally for not being able to prevent or stop the genocide in spite of having substantial information regarding the horrors being committed. The Tutsi Rwandese Patriotic Army ended the genocide by seizing power while hundreds of thousands of people fled Rwanda to escape death and destruction. A National Day of Mourning is observed each year in Rwanda on April 7.

Comparing the Hutu and the Tutsi

Both the Hutu and the Tutsi belong to a common Bantu-speaking group. Hutu tend to be bigger in size, both in height and build, than the Twa, but smaller than the Tutsi. Around 80 percent of the people of Rwanda are Hutu. The Hutu are responsible for converting the Virunga forests into farms and pastures. Work gets equally divided between men and women among Hutu, and the hardworking ones are prized within the group.

The Tutsi account for between 9 and 14 percent of the Rwandan population. They tend to be physically bigger than both the Hutu and the Twa of Rwanda. They are also generally fairer and thinner in build compared to the Hutu. These physical stereotypes, however, proved deadly during the 1994 genocide and other occasions of ethnic violence when hundreds of people perished because of mistaken ethnic identity.

The Tutsi herd cattle and emphasize power and control, which stems from their traditional monarchical order. As soon as they arrived in the Virunga forest region, they subjugated the Hutu and formed small kingdoms. In fact their influence has been so strong that the tradition of owning cattle remains a status symbol, even though the Hutu overthrew their Tutsi rulers some time ago.

religion of a majority of Rwandans. About 25 percent, however, still follow their traditional religious beliefs, and 10 percent are followers of Islam.

The traditional local festivals and celebrations are enriched by music and art with seven- to nine-drum bands a ubiquitous presence. Ikinimba is the most distinctive dance form of Rwanda. It is a courtship dance ritual in which men (unmarried or married) and women (unmarried) participate. Another dance for men only is the intore (which means “chosen”). This dance is performed with warlike movements to the accompaniment of drums. In earlier days Rwanda’s best dancers were selected to perform this dance for the kings in the royal courts. The dance movements tell the stories of kings and Rwandan heroes. They are accompanied by drums and instruments such as the inanga, a stringed instrument similar to a violin.

Rwandans have different songs for different occasions: hunting songs, humorous songs, and songs touching various other aspects of life. Despite the intense ethnic violence of the 1900s, Rwanda has produced a number of musicians known nationally and internationally. It also has several famous rock bands.

There are many traditional arts and handicrafts made in Rwanda; these include ceramic baskets, sculptures, and paintings.

Rwanda is a source country for children trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. In addition, some children of Rwandan background have been trafficked over the past decade for forced labor and child soldiering within Democratic Republic of the Congo (D.R.C.). In the mid-1990s, many Rwandan children living in refugee camps in D.R.C. became separated from their families after these camps were destroyed. Some of these children, surviving on their own in conflict-prone, militia-controlled territories, fell prey to recruitment, both forcible and voluntary, by various armed rebel groups. Over 200 former child soldiers have been returned to Rwanda from D.R.C. and demobilized; the government expects more to be repatriated in the future.

❁ CUISINE

The diet of the Rwandans is composed of locally grown grains, vegetables, and fruits, though with farming interrupted by the ethnic violence many Rwandans must rely on foreign aid. Beans, corn, sweet potatoes, peas, millet, and fruits are favorite foods. Whereas urban Rwandans enjoy tea (with lots of milk and sugar) and bread for breakfast, rural Rwandans eat porridge (made of corn, sorghum, or millet mixed with milk) with sweet potatoes for breakfast. The bigger meals of the day are served with bananas, sweet potatoes, beans, and cassava. Dishes such as umutsima (corn and cassava), isombeo (eggplant and spinach with cassava leaves), and mizuzu (fried plantains) are commonly prepared. Dinner is the largest meal.

Snacks are common between meals. These include fruits such as bananas, mangoes, avocados, and papayas. Street vendors sell barbecued meat and roasted corn. Urban residents consume more beef and chicken. In the rural communities, possessing cattle is a status symbol; so slaughtering them for food is uncommon. As a result, rural children tend to suffer protein deficiencies.

Although there is a big commercial brewery in Rwanda, Rwandan men drink homemade brew. They prepare ikigage, a beer made from dry sorghum and urwarwa (plantains). It is traditionally sipped from a single large container using a straw. Among some Rwandans, flavored beers such as primus and mulzig are also popular.

They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor, demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Rwanda all government offices and educational institutions are closed on Labor Day.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 1

On this date in 1962 Rwanda won its freedom from Belgian control. Prior to independence there had been widespread ethnic tensions between the Tutsi Union Nationale Rwandaise (UNAR) and the Hutu Party for the Emancipation of the Hutu People (PARMEHUTU). The Belgians had helped nurture the PARMEHUTU as an alternative to the Tutsi elite, who were increasingly demanding freedom from Belgium. By late 1961, however, the Hutu had turned against Belgium, declared Rwanda a republic, and destroyed the Tutsi monarchy. There was widespread rejoicing in Rwanda, especially among the Hutu, when on July 1, 1962, Belgium bowed to the mounting popular calls for freedom and granted the country its independence. This day is also called National Day.

❁ LIBERATION DAY

Observed on: July 4

On July 4, 1973, a Hutu army officer named Juvenal Habyarimana came to power in a bloodless coup and founded the Second Republic. He ruled the nation single-handedly for the next 20 years through his party the National Revolutionary Movement for Development (MRND). Tutsi were systematically excluded from powerful positions and jobs. Under Habyarimana the army and bands of thugs wantonly massacred Tutsi with unspeakable brutality.

In April 1994, Habyarimana died in a plane crash, leaving in control the genocidal former Rwandan Army, which Habyarimana had reorganized as the Forces Armées Rwandaises, or FAR. On July 4, 1994, the Rwandese Patriotic Army (RPA) overthrew FAR, liberating the capital city of Kigali, and ultimately all of Rwanda from ethnic hatred and conflict. The day was first officially celebrated at the Amahoro Stadium in Kigali in 2000. Many official dignitaries from neighboring countries and Britain joined the Rwandan leaders. A football match was played between Uganda and Rwanda to commemorate the occasion.

In the 21st century the day is celebrated with an address to the nation by the president. In most parts of the country, bands, parades, dancing, singing, and music concerts also mark the occasion. In Kigali the celebrations include an official state reception.

❁ KAMARAMPAKA DAY

Observed on: September 25

On September 25, 1961, the Rwandans (dominated by the Hutu) passed a referendum in which they abolished the ruling minority Tutsi monarchy. Kamarampaka Day, or Republic Day, marks the day in 1961 when Rwanda voted to become a republic.

Some traditional Rwandan artists use dried cow dung to create spiral paintings and to decorate the interiors of houses.

✿ BIRTH

In Rwanda the child and the mother are kept in seclusion for eight days after the birth. At the end of that time, the baby is presented to the family, and the parents receive gifts from family and friends. A naming ceremony takes place within three or four months of birth.

✿ MARRIAGE

To be allowed to marry, Rwandan males have to pay a bride-price. The marriage can later be dissolved if both partners wish, but then the bride-price must be returned. Recently men have been getting married at an older age since they need to save up for the bride-price.

A sad perversion of traditional practices arising from the war involves kidnapping the bride (when she is between 16 and 22 years of age) and marrying her later. According to this custom the chosen woman is stolen from a street or marketplace by the interested boy and his friends and sometimes beaten and raped on the way to the boy's home to break her resistance. Later the boy asks for her hand and offers a cow as a gesture of apology. The deal is sealed with some sorghum or banana beer. The man has complete power in such relationships. Most men do not make the marriages legal, and their children do not have a legitimate status. One out of every three of these couples breaks up, and the wife is abandoned. Such women do not marry again.

This practice is illegal in Rwanda and punishable with prison sentences up to 20 years. The youth, however, prefer this way of marrying since it is cheaper than a legitimate marriage would be.

✿ DEATH

Traditionally Rwandans believe in a life force called imana that leaves the body at the time of death to become the abazimu. Troubled abazimus, which might cause sickness or crop failure, need treatment from traditional healers, who are called umufumu. Over time these spirits become honored spirits and are worshipped. In parts of Rwanda the belief is that special round stones have the powers of the good imana spirits, and they also bring good luck. Therefore these stones are collected and kept outside family compounds in huts (called ndaro), and given offerings everyday. When a family member dies, his Funeral rituals are very important to Rwandans. Women shave their heads as a sign of grief, and neighbors help by doing their household chores. No life-giving activities such as planting crops are done during the mourning period. Families stop eating meat too. Mourning continues for several months in Rwanda. Since death is considered to be “hot,” umufumus (traditional doctors) are usually called to “cool” the house where death has taken place.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The awe-inspiring Tia Seu Ancient Mound in Savai'i, a step-pyramid, is believed to be the largest prehistoric monument (at 39 feet high) made by humans in all of Polynesia. The history of Samoa is believed to have begun more than 4,000 years ago with a migration of people from the west (the East Indies, the Malay Peninsula or the Philippines) who then settled the rest of Polynesia farther to the east. The oldest known site of human occupation in Samoa is Mulifanua on Upolu, dating back to about 1000 B.C.E. Samoa attracted a gradual migration from Southeast Asia (the East Indies, the Malay Peninsula, or the Philippines). Although many early structures have been lost over the centuries, historical remains can still be found throughout the islands of Samoa.

Yet another theory claims they came from the Malay Peninsula. But the indigenous Samoans think they originated from Samoa itself. They believe their land to be the cradle of Polynesian culture, and its people, a race created by the deity Tagaloa while he was shaping the world.

The earliest contact between Samoans and Europeans in the mid-17th century took place in the islands that now comprise American Samoa. Ships frequently anchored here for a while before sailing away along the spice route to explore the seas in their search for the Great Southern Land, then called Terra Australis (which means "southern land" in Latin). These early encounters were often violent. On the islands now part of Independent Samoa, the European sailors, mostly whalers, pirates, and escaped convicts unleashed fatal diseases in addition to violence. The first recorded contact with Europeans came in 1722 when Jacob Roggeveen, in charge of the Dutch Three Ship Expedition, reported sighting the Samoan islands. The next European to visit the area was Louis-Antoine de Bougainville (1729-1811), the French navigator, in 1768, who named Samoa the Navigators Islands. In 1787 a French party—from the La Pérouse Expedition—went ashore on Tutuila to get water, only to be attacked by natives. When Captain de Langle, the commander of the

Tagaloa

Because of separation by time and distance, the mythologies of Polynesia, Oceania, and Micronesia contain different, sometimes conflicting or contradictory legends about the same deity. Tagaloa is the Samoan ocean god and the supreme god of Tahiti, Taaroa.

In Polynesian mythology Tangaroa (Tagaloa) is the deity who created the world and was the son of Rangi and Papa. According to legend Tagaloa separated Rangi and Papa by force, whereupon Papa's water-filled body burst and became the seas. Tagaroa is not only the ocean deity, but the creator of all sea creatures, including the mermaids, from whom human beings were born. His shadows are the whale and the blue shark. His breathing causes the tides.

In another story Tangaroa is the first of all beings, and created Atea and Atanua. In the stories of the Marquesas, a variation says that Atea was born from primeval chaos, Tanoa (also Tangaroa/Tagaloa). Tanoa made room for the dawn goddess Atanua to appear, and the son of Atanua and Atea was the first man, called Tu-Mea. Ta'aroa gestated inside the cosmic egg and developed himself in solitude, without father or mother. He cracked the egg, emerged, and stood on the broken pieces. Realizing that he was alone, he created the world from the pieces of the egg. In Polynesian myth Atea is the oldest god, who split and became Rangi and Papa. Tane is the god of trees and light, and the first son of Rangi and Papa.

Astrolabe, ordered his men to fire over the heads of the natives, the natives responded with a shower of stones that fell on the Frenchmen's boats and all around them. When the confrontation ended, Captain de Langle, M. de Lemanon, a geologist, and ten of his men were dead.

By the time the British attempted to settle there, the Samoans had become hostile; consequently many violent skirmishes took place between the British and the Samoans, resulting in a large loss of life. When missionaries began arriving in the 1830s, however, few hostilities arose; on the contrary there were mass conversions to Christianity. This may well be ascribed to the fact that Samoan beliefs were rather similar to Christianity and that the Samoan deity Nafanua, the goddess of war, had informed the people that a new faith would come to the islands, one more powerful than their ancestral animistic faith.

In 1836 John Williams (1796–1839) and Charles Barff became the first two men to take up missionary posts in Samoa. Williams converted a large number of Samoans before being consumed by native cannibals. The demise of the Reverend Williams did not deter other missionaries, and their influence proved to be permanent.

By the late 19th century Britain, Germany, and the United States became engaged in a tug-of-war over Samoa. Motivated primarily by commercial considerations, not the possibility of some benefit to Samoans, ships of the three countries competed for space in the small harbor of Apia, the capital. However, all their plans went awry when a terrible cyclone hit Samoa and caused extensive damage, forcing the rivals to negotiate. The outcome was disastrous for Samoa. The foreigners carved up the country: Western Samoa went to the Germans, and Eastern Samoa to the United States, which annexed Eastern Samoa in 1900. That region, although having achieved limited autonomy, remains under U.S. control to this day.

While under German control, the Western Samoans formed a resistance force called the Mau Movement, which was aimed at preserving the Samoan culture and obtaining independence. World War I diverted Germany's attention from Samoa, giving the British an opportunity to reestablish their dominance in the islands. As part of the war effort Britain asked New Zealand to take charge of the radio station in Western Samoa. By means of a clever machination, New Zealand took complete control of Samoa and succeeded in pushing the Germans out. However, the Mau Movement followers and the majority of Western Samoans continued to clamor for independence. Finally in 1961 a proposal was put before the United Nations, and independence was granted in January 1962.

Unfortunately, Samoans faced other challenges: Labor disputes, increasing dependence on foreign aid, and yet another cyclonic attack added to their woes. The country changed its name to the Independent State of Samoa in 1995. It is still grappling with a major economic crisis from which it has yet to recover. A new tourism policy and financial laws designed to attract offshore capital have been put in place to decrease the pressure.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Independent Samoa comprises nine volcanic islands located halfway between Hawaii and New Zealand, 373 miles east of Fiji. The two major islands Upolu and Savai'i make up an area slightly smaller than Rhode Island and constitute most of the dry land. Upolu is cigar-shaped with the capital Apia situated on its northern coast. Savai'i (which is a few miles west of Upolu) is shaped like a squashed cigar. Some tiny uninhabited islands and a few lonely atolls make up the remainder of the country.

Samoa faces a major environmental threat from deforestation. Fortunately concerted efforts have recently been made to develop eco-friendly industries and conserve the beauty and biological diversity of the rain forests that abound in the area. These rain forests are a major source of food as well as medicinal compounds. The flora also includes montane scrub, pandanus scrub, littoral scrub, montane swamp forests, and summit scrub. The local fauna include flying fox, Polynesian rats, geckos, skinks (both lizard species), and the Pacific keel-scaled boa. The tallest mountain is on Savai'i (6,096 feet), and the second tallest is on Upolu (3,661 feet).

Samoa's climate is tropical, with an average temperature of 73°–86°F. The islands receive about 79 inches of rain annually. Though hot and humid during the major part of the year, the region is cooled by the easterly trade winds blowing from April to October. The wet summer season occurs between November and April, while the dry winter season comes between May and October. Independent Samoa lies in the cyclone belt and is hit periodically by cyclones, especially between November and April. The soil, formed from eroded basalt and ash deposits, is of poor quality.

✿ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The people of Independent Samoa are steeped in culture and traditions that emphasize social hierarchies, courtesies, and customs. These govern their social, religious, and political lives. The country's system of government is called faamatai. It relies on a network of extended families (or aigas), each of which is governed by a chief (matai). Wealth and food are distributed on the basis of need; honor and social standing are shared equally by all members of the aiga. The matai represents the family on the village council, delivers justice, and ensures that all customs are properly observed. The matai is also responsible for remembering the ancient folklore, family genealogies, and the stories of the old gods and passing them onto posterity.

Thousands of years of Samoan culture are still passed down through poems, genealogies, and mythologies. Dancing and singing also play a very important part in Samoan culture. The fiafia is a vil-

The Art of Tattooing

According to one legend, the art of tattooing was brought to Samoa by two sisters Tilafaiga and Taema. While visiting the daughter of King Tuimanua of Fiji, the sisters were given a tattooing instrument as a gift from the royal family. While they were swimming home, they held onto the precious gift and sang the chant the Fijians had taught them: "Women are tattooed, and men are not."

But the sisters were tired after their long swim and stopped at Savai'i, where they were taken into the high chief's guesthouse and treated like royalty until they had recovered from their exhaustion. Before continuing their swim home to Manua, they gave the tattooing instruments to the chiefs and the people of Savai'i. But when they taught the chant to the people of Savai'i they reversed the chant, and its meaning, and sang the first part last, so the Savai'ians learned the chant backward: "Men are tattooed, and women are not."

The people of Savai'i began to tattoo the young men in accordance with the erroneous chant the sisters had taught them, and tattooing became a mark of distinction among the young men of Samoa, except on Manua, where the king banned the practice. In Samoa tattooing is called pea.

Unlike the rest of Polynesia, Samoa retained traditional tattooing, and the practice is an integral part of initiation into Samoan culture primarily for men, but also for women. Some motifs used in Samoan tattoos are for women while others are used only on men's bodies.

Only Samoans born into a family with ancestors who belonged to a tattoo guild are allowed to become tattoo artists. It is a privilege that can only be inherited, and apprentice tattooists must work under the supervision of an experienced artist before they can work independently. Wives of tattoo artists are called meanai (which means "artist's helper") and are also honored because they wipe the blood off the person being tattooed. While someone is undergoing the process, relatives and friends of the family come from far and near and bring food, robes, and tapa cloths to help pay the artist and his wife for their labor.

The process of pea is undergone when children reach adolescence. It is highly ritualized with songs to be sung and taboos for those who undergo the ordeal. There are numerous tools used to make the tattoos including several combs for making lines of different widths, a pot that holds the combs, and a mallet made from the central rib of a palm leaf that is used to strike the combs. There are five stages in the tattooing process, which can take up to several months to finish because of the pain and inflammation of the skin. Young women sometimes hold down a man being tattooed to keep him from moving around too much and damaging the tattoo. They also sing a song to distract him and keep his mind from focusing on the pain. It is considered disgraceful for a man to complain about the pain involved.

lage play or musical presentation performed by a number of villagers. Both the siva (a dance performed by women acting out impromptu stories with their hands) and the sa sa (a dance performed to the beating of a wooden mallet) are performed.

Tattooing is another significant rite in Independent Samoa. When they are about 12 or 13 years of age, Samoan males visit the tattooist (tufuga) and get tattooed from their waists to their knees. The tattoos represent the strength of a man's heart and his spirituality.

Samoan, a language related to Tongan and other Polynesian languages, is the language of Samoa. English is also spoken by many people. Most Samoans are devout Christians, and the Sunday church service is the most important event of the week.

Because of its long relationship with the United States, American Samoa continues to observe many U.S. holidays including Martin Luther King's Birthday (January 17), Presidents' Day (February), St. Patrick's Day (March 17), Mother's Day (second Sunday of May), Memorial Day (last weekend in May), Father's Day, Independence Day (July 4), Labor Day (first weekend of September), Halloween (October 31), and Thanksgiving (fourth Thursday of November). Some of these observances are public holidays in Samoa.

❁ CUISINE

In Samoa the basic food is derived mainly from tropical crops, root vegetables, coconut products, fresh fruit, pork, chicken and, above all, seafood. The traditional Polynesian meal involves cooking in a raised earthen oven (umu). The traditional Sunday meal is nearly always cooked in the umu.

At ceremonial gatherings and village meetings the juice of the ava plant is consumed in a ritual called the ava ceremony. The drink serves as a mild tranquilizer, an analgesic, an antibacterial and antifungal agent, a painkiller, and a diuretic; it is high in fiber and low in calories.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

As in many other countries around the globe, New Year's Day in Samoa is celebrated enthusiastically by people of all communities. Festivities start on the last day of the departing year (New Year's Eve). This occasion is celebrated with parties, get-togethers, and banquets. Everyone usually spends the next day with their loved ones in a lingering spirit of festivity. They look forward with great hopes to a pleasant year.

❁ NATIONAL WASTE AWARENESS DAY

Observed on: February 4

This is a holiday of fairly recent origin that is celebrated under the aegis of the United Nations. Its underlying purpose is to create awareness in the minds of the public about the significant amount of waste that is being created around them in the course of their day-to-day activities. Reducing future waste and recycling existing waste (if feasible) is extremely important here. These themes are emphasized in speeches and talks organized by the government and environmental organizations.

Related public holidays and special observances organized to emphasize the ongoing degradation of the environment, and its consequences, are Chemical Awareness Day (March), Biological Diversity Day (May), Climate Change Day (July), Ozone Day (September), and Arbor Day (November), the culmination of Environment Week.

❁ FLAG DAY

Observed on: April 17

Flag Day in American Samoa is one of the year's biggest island events. The Independent State of Samoa now commemorates more than a century under the U.S. flag with Samoan dances and singing, colorful parades, and the famous Fautasi Long Boat Race festivities.

❁ ANZAC DAY

Observed on: April 25

ANZAC is an acronym for Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. The name was created in 1914 (during World War I) to represent the grouping of the Australian Imperial Force and New Zealand Expeditionary Force stationed in Egypt. On April 25, 1915, the ANZACs began their combat at Gallipoli, located off the Aegean Sea in Turkey, where hundreds of ANZAC soldiers were killed or mortally wounded.

Because of their long association with New Zealand, Samoans observe ANZAC Day as a legal holiday.

Fun Fact

Sailors keep a piece of brain coral in their ships because they believe its power will protect them at sea.

Fun Fact

In the past only women of rank were entitled to have their bodies tattooed. The association between high rank and being tattooed made the practice popular among Samoan young men, who interpreted tattoos to be a sign of their manliness.

Fun Fact

Samoa is called the Bible Belt of the Pacific.

The highlights of this day in Samoa are homage to and remembrances of all those who laid down their lives at Gallipoli as well as in other major battles.

❁ MOTHERS OF SAMOA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First Monday in May

The origin of Mother's Day can be traced back to the spring celebrations of ancient Greece in honor of Rhea, the Mother of the Gods. During the 17th century people in England celebrated a day called Mothering Sunday on the fourth Sunday of Lent (the 40-day period leading up to Easter) to honor all the mothers of England.

In Samoa Mother's Day is celebrated to honor all mothers, young and old, for their invaluable gifts of life and love. The governor of Samoa delivers a special address that pays tribute to motherhood. There are special religious services, and mothers everywhere on the islands are showered with flowers, candies, hugs, kisses, and greeting cards galore.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed on: June 1–3

Though Samoa actually became independent from the rule of New Zealand on January 1, 1962, the people decided to postpone the main celebration of their freedom until a later date because New Year's Day was already a public holiday. The result was three days of widespread celebration with singing, dancing, and feasting. There are also canoe races and many other competitions.

❁ CHILDREN'S FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Second Monday in October

The Children's Festival, or White Monday, formerly called Lotu a Tamaiti, is celebrated the day after White Sunday, which is a very special day for all Samoan children and young people. The children dress all in white and wear crowns of white frangipanis in their hair. While their parents wait inside the church for them, the children line up and walk to church as they sing hymns. Instead of listening to a sermon, the assembled adults listen as the children recite verses from the Bible and perform skits based on biblical stories. (Visitors are welcome as long as the proper attire is worn.) After the church service families return home to a feast of roast pig, coconut, taro, bananas, and cakes. On this one day the parents do not sit down to eat first, and children are allowed to eat as much as they like.

❁ ARBOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Second Friday in November

For more than a decade Samoans have observed Environment Week during the last week of October and the first week of November. The Ministry of Natural Resources and Environment (MNRE) organizes public activities to focus attention on the environment, to improve community awareness, and to foster public participation in natural resource management and sustainable development.

Environment Week has a different theme each year that reflects global environmental issues such as the sustainable management of natural resources, climate change issues, biodiversity, and projects managed and implemented by MNRE. The week culminates by celebrating Arbor Day, a world event that focuses attention on the importance of reforestation at the global, national, and community levels. Because of Samoa's rapid loss of its rain forest, Arbor Day is a public holiday and schools, government offices, and some businesses are closed.

Religious Holidays

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Samoans observe a fast only on Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Public gatherings where special prayers, readings from the Gospels and Psalms, and singing hymns are features of Good Friday in Samoa. By its nature, this is a somber day for Samoan Christians.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Catholics.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers.

In Samoa Christians often buy new clothes for this special day and go to early church services to pray. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration, like the name Easter itself, taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. The gaiety and festivities of Easter spill over to Easter Monday, which is mainly devoted to sports and outdoor activities.

❁ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

This is a religious event that commemorates the visitation of the Holy Spirit (or Holy Ghost) to about 120 of the first Christians, including Jesus' disciples as well as other followers, 50 days after his crucifixion and resurrection. Pentecost is derived from the Greek word pentekoste, which means "fiftieth" and originally referred to the Jewish festival of Shavuot, observed on the 50th day after Passover (Pesach). Modern scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring. This holiday is spread over two days, alternatively known as Whitsunday and Whitmonday. On Whitsunday everyone puts on their best white suits and dresses and attends church services. Most businesses and government offices remain closed.

Fun Fact

The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, "command," because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

Fun Fact

In other Polynesian languages the deity Tagaloa has different names; he is Tangaroa in Maori, Tanaoa and Takaoa on the Marquesas Islands, and Taarua, Tangaloa, and Kanaloa in Hawaiian legends.

In Samoa this holiday honors children, and the entire holiday weekend is usually spent in leisure activities.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe to have been the Son of God. On Christmas Day Samoans attend church services early in the morning. Everyone dresses in new clothes and exchanges gifts and greetings. The holiday is also celebrated with family get-togethers and special dinners prepared for the occasion.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Since Samoa was under the influence of New Zealand (a part of the British Empire) for a considerable period, some British customs and practices were incorporated into the local traditions. The British celebrate Boxing Day the day after Christmas. The name Boxing Day may be derived from the practice of opening church alms boxes used for collecting money for charitable purposes on this day. The origins of this holiday are also attributed to a former British tradition of giving cash or durable goods to servants for Christmas. In Britain gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, but the less fortunate were given gifts the day after. Samoans generally prefer to take part in outdoor activities

In 2005 scientists announced the discovery of a submarine volcano growing in the crater of a larger underwater volcano, called Vailuluu. They named the new volcano Nafanua after the ferocious Samoan goddess of war. In 2002, the last time this hot spot was monitored, Nafanua did not exist. Growing at least eight inches a day, the volcanic cone has rapidly emerged since 2001, and Nafanua is now nearly 1,000 feet high. Researchers also described a unique biological community surrounding the eruption site, hundreds of eels in motion.

❁ RISING OF THE PALOLO

Observed in: Savai'i Island

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October–November

Palolo are blue-green worms that resemble vermicelli, a thin type of pasta. They emerge from the coral reefs surrounding the Samoan islands to mate during the months of October and November sometime after midnight on the seventh day after a full Moon. This happens once in October and again in November. People from nearby areas flock to the reefs to witness this unique natural phenomenon. They also gather the palolo worm's egg and sperm packets, which are considered delicacies on Samoa.

On Samoa, the marriage customs of the nobility are quite different from those practiced by ordinary people. In either case, however, a marriage contract is not formalized until the boy and girl have reached puberty. For the nobility courtship rituals start with the selection of a number of girls from each village to live together in the high chief's guesthouse as members of a group of women attendants known as the aualumua. The aualumua personally assist the village virgin (taupou), who is the daughter of the highest-ranking family, in receiving guests from the village. It is customary for elderly women of the village chief's house to guard and chaperone these young women of rank. This practice is intended to preserve the maidens' chastity.

Most of the guests in the high chief's guesthouse are young men who try to gain the favor of the taupou's attendants. These guests bring food and gifts with them. After the evening prayers are over, the taupou and her attendants dine together with their guests, after which they spend the rest of the night dancing and singing popular love songs. It is expected that they will exhibit their best of manners at such times.

A young woman of high rank is hardly ever consulted about her future husband. She considers it a great honor to marry the man who has been chosen for her by the village council. Any instance of marriage among relatives or between a commoner and a member of the nobility is frowned on. In this way the purity of the lineage is kept intact.

The taupou is seldom formally courted by her chieftain-fiancé. However, he gives her presents of food and other goods over a period of time. During a final visit the suitor, together with other chiefs of his village, meets the taupou in her village to obtain the formal consent of her parents and village council. Immediately after receiving this assurance in the chief's guesthouse, the chiefs and other visitors shout the formal marriage shouts (tigi) at the tops of their voices. Tigis are the traditional means used for pronouncing a chief and his bride man and wife. They are shouted only for nobility and are not heard during the marriage of commoners. In reality the tigis are an exclamation of tribute to the bride and bridegroom.

The bride usually wears the royal robe that was made especially for her by her family on this occasion. This wedding robe is called the ie avaga. The last nights the taupou spends in her village are devoted to feasting and riotous dancing. If the guests plan to return with the newly married couple to the groom's home on foot, it is customary for them to keep shouting the tigis as they pass through the adjacent villages.

The climax of the marriage ceremonies is the performance of the nunu (dowry exchange), which is usually held after the birth of the couple's first child. Relatives and villages of the bride and bridegroom come together from all over the islands, bringing food, merchandise, money, and labor. This ceremony is held in the open air at the public ground (malae) in front of the chief's guesthouse. The bridegroom's side displays, for exchange and to match the bride's collection, money, merchandise, yardage, goods, and roasted pigs. These huge quantities of goods include contributions from friends, relatives, and acquaintances that it will take several days to distribute and exchange.

For many generations it was customary for a chief's wife not to live with her husband for more than a few months. She was honorably released and returned home to clear the way for another marriage. The village chiefs would take the matter in their own hands and look for another match in a well-to-do family. At one time custom sanctioned a dozen or more wives and concubines for a chief.

Elopement of the taupou with a suitor often happens when the village council disapproves of her desire to marry a man they regard as undesirable. Such a marriage is considered illegal. The eloping couple is liable to pay for their action with their lives if they happen to get caught. They are on dangerous ground until they reach the boy's village.

Marriages of common people are quiet and regarded as insignificant. Usually the boy proposes to the girl's parents. When the parents give their consent, the girl and boy are united as man and wife and live in the home of either the bride or bridegroom's parents. After the couple receives a legal marriage certificate from the government, they exchange their vows in a church before a minister.

Polygamy has now been outlawed in Samoa by both the church and the government. As in other countries many practice common-law marriage illegally. However, Samoan women as a whole prefer legal marriage for the sake of their children.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

San Marino is believed to be the world's oldest republic. It was founded in 301 C.E. by a Christian stonemason named Marinus, who had moved to the region to avoid Roman persecution. By the 12th century San Marino was an independent state ruled by its own statutes and consuls. This small country had to defend itself constantly from being overrun by its neighbors for over 200 years until its sovereignty was acknowledged by the pope in 1631. Later popes upheld this decision. By the end of the 15th century the country was governed and ruled by a grand council of 60 members. This system, or base on an assembly of the heads of families and known as the Arengo, is still in existence.

Over the centuries the country has been able to retain its independent status. In 1797 Napoleon (1769–1821) recognized its sovereignty and even offered to extend its territory, but the Arengo refused his offer. After the Napoleonic Wars, the Congress of Vienna recognized San Marino's independent status in 1815.

During World War II, San Marino allied with Italy but declared itself neutral after Italy surrendered to the Allies. Although San Marino is not a member of the European Union (EU), it has always been an active part of the European communities. It joined the United Nations in 1992.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

A country in the Apennines near the Adriatic Sea, San Marino is the world's third smallest republic. It is rectangular in shape and is surrounded by Italy, with a maximum length of eight miles, northeast to southwest. The rugged and mountainous landscape of San Marino consists of the huge central limestone mass of Mt. Titano (2,385 feet) with its three peaks and a castle on each peak.

San Marino enjoys a Mediterranean climate with mild cool winters and warm summers. Vegetation is typical of the Mediterranean zone, and olive, pine, oak, ash, poplar, fir, elm, many kinds of grasses and flowers thrive there. Animals such as moles, hedgehogs, foxes, badgers, martens, weasels, and hares, and many species of birds also inhabit the country.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of San Marino is mainly based on agriculture and the service sector. The country is not rich in mineral resources and relies on imports for needed raw materials. The main industries include wine, tourism, commerce, agriculture, and crafts. Items such as building materials, paints and varnishes, paper, metalwork, textiles, clothing, furniture, rubber and leather footwear, ceramics, china, food and confectionery products, liqueurs, cosmetics, and sanitary articles are also produced. The agricultural products San Marino produces include wheat, corn, barley, dairy products, and livestock. Fine printing, particularly of postage stamps, is a useful source of revenue in San Marino. The country is listed as the fourth richest country in the world based on gross domestic product (GDP) per capita, just behind the United States and ahead of Switzerland.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The tiny country of San Marino is a cultural and tourist center. It is known especially for its musical heritage. Some of the finest musical compositions were produced here by 17th-century composers like Francesco Maria Marini di Pesaro.

The people of San Marino are sports fanatics. They love to play football (soccer) and to watch Formula One races. The San Marino national football team has participated in the World Cup even though the country has yet to make its mark in football history.

❁ CUISINE

San Marino is essentially Italian in lifestyle. Everything Italian typifies the indigenous cuisine. Courses of homemade pasta (tortellini, passatelli, tagliatelle), oven-baked lasagna, ravioli, cannelloni, strozzapreti, and cappelletti in broth are as integral to San Marino's cuisine as much as they are to Italy's.

Dishes of meat, rabbit, chicken, and quail are popular here. The San Marino cake, cacciatello (made with milk, sugar, and eggs), and bustrengo (the traditional Christmas cake) are some of the popular desserts relished in this country.

San Marino is famous for its wines and cheese products. Among the better known wines are Moscato San Marino, Biancale, and the local Sangiovese.

LABOR DAY

Celebrated by: General Public

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Worker's Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest origins of May Day celebration can be ascribed to the spring pagan rituals that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, conflicting opinions exist about the origins of the occasion, depending on the country and its labor policies.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In San Marino workers celebrate Labor Day by holding marches in the streets.

ST. MARINUS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: September 3

St. Marinus Day, also called Foundation of the Republic Day or National Day of the Republic, commemorates the founding of the Republic of San Marino in 301 C.E. According to legend a Christian deacon and stonemason, while working on an aqueduct in Rome, was erroneously accused by a woman of being the husband who had abandoned her. He fled into the mountains but she followed him, so he hid in a cave until she gave up. Marino lived the rest of his life as a recluse on Monte Titano, and it is believed that San Marino was built on the exact location where his hermitage was.

The day is marked with festivals, cultural events, and theatrical productions all across San Marino. These events attract large crowds and enjoy extensive media coverage. This is a public holiday in San Marino and all schools, government offices, and many businesses are closed.

FESTIVAL DAY OF ST. AGATHA

Observed on: February 5

This day is celebrated as the Feast of St. Agatha, a third-century Christian martyr. It is believed that Agatha wanted to dedicate her life to Jesus and remain celibate. However, a cruel nobleman fancied the pretty young Agatha. When she refused his advances, he tortured her in the most unimaginable method possible: He cut her breasts off. She is therefore often portrayed carrying her excised breasts on a platter. In the memory of her suffering, special pastries or nougats, shaped like breasts and called St. Agatha's breasts, are eaten on her feast day.

St. Agatha is the patron saint of nurses and is invoked for protection from diseases of the breasts. Her feast day is celebrated with poetry contests, fireworks, music, confetti, and processions.

Three people are chosen to represent Jesus, Mary, and Joseph. Before starting the meal the family says special prayers to St. Joseph. The special dishes that are prepared for the feast are then served to each of the three “representatives” who take a small bite of each dish. Leftovers from this feast are then given away to the poor in the village.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans. Devout Catholics who attend Mass on this day receive small crosses made of dried palm fronds that they take home and save.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Sammarinese observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Others fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

In San Marino on Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings and a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed. This is a reenactment of Jesus' final journey as he carried the cross to Calgary. This is a day of fast and abstinence in San Marino.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

Fun Fact

The San Marino Grand Prix is named after the state, although it does not actually take place there. It takes place in the Italian town of Imola.

In San Marino people attend midnight prayer services for Easter and celebrate Jesus' Resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit envelops churches as people sing devotional hymns. Then on Easter the Catholics of San Marino attend Mass attired in their best clothing, visit the cemetery, and participate in the traditional day-long banquets. Children receive specially decorated Easter eggs made of chocolate from their parents and grandparents. Feasting and exchanging greetings and Easter eggs continue even on the next day. ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast day that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of the church. It is believed that All Saints' Day celebrations began after the consecration of the Pantheon at Rome to the Blessed Virgin by Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15).

The word Halloween is a contracted version of the phrase "All Hallows Eve," which refers to the night before All Saints' Day. The Catholic Church established both November 1 and November 2 (All Souls' Day) in an effort to convert Irish pagans to Christianity. In the fifth century B.C.E., in Celtic Ireland, summer officially ended on October 31. The holiday was called Samhain (pronounced sow-en) and was the Celtic New Year's celebration.

According to legend, on Samhain the disembodied spirits of all those who had died during the preceding year would come back in search of living bodies to possess for the coming year because it was their only hope for the afterlife. The Celts believed all laws of space and time were suspended during this time, allowing the spirit world to intermingle with the living.

In San Marino on All Saints' Day, the devout place flowers on the tombs of their deceased relatives and also offer prayers to all the saints.

to mingle with the living on this day, which is why the living do everything to make the deceased feel content. During the family meal food is offered to the deceased to appease them, and prayers are said for the souls to rest in peace. The Sammarinese also offer special prayers for souls that may still be in purgatory.

❁ SAN MARINO ETNOFESTIVAL

Observed in: San Marino
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July

San Marino Etnofestival is a special cultural festival to showcase the rich cultural traditions of the region. The event features a lot of singing and dancing. Various musical genres are highlighted during this festival. There are numerous performances and workshops that are attended by a large number of visitors, most of whom are tourists.

In 2004, for example, the focus was on percussion instruments of Francophone countries including Guinea (the djembe drum), Algeria, France, Martinique, and Madagascar.

Fun Fact

No one knows the actual date of Jesus' birth, and at least one date in every month has been suggested as a possibility. The Church fathers chose the end of December for the observance because it is close to the winter solstice, an important pagan festival that welcomed the return of the light. Many of the symbols and traditions now associated with Christmas can be traced back to their pagan origins, such as the Yule log, the Christmas tree with all its lights, and the customs associated with mistletoe.

Rites of Passage

When a child is born in San Marino, it is baptized according to Roman Catholic traditions. Close friends or relatives are chosen as the baby's godparents. It is their responsibility to give the child spiritual guidance during the course of its life. The family throws a lavish party after the christening ceremony in the church attended by friends and relatives. The baby is given a single name derived from a saint's name, such as Maria or Giovanna. A boy is usually named after his grandfather.

Traditionally the family arranges weddings in San Marino. The groom's (or bride's) family contacts the father or uncle of the bride (or prospective bridegroom) with a proposal of marriage. After both families agree, the couple gets officially engaged. Sometimes a matchmaker is sent to the prospective bride's house to arrange a marriage. In preparation for the wedding, the bride puts together a trousseau that includes new clothes, household items, and sometimes clothes for the future husband. Friends and family give money and gifts to the newlywed couple. These days the groom's family also helps to pay for the wedding. The actual wedding is presided over by a person from the civil authorities or a priest. Weddings on Sunday are considered the luckiest.

Men are supposed to carry pieces of iron in their pockets to ward off evil on this day because the ill will of some people might cause supernatural harm to the newlyweds. Sometimes a vase or a glass is broken at the end of the ceremony, and the number of pieces it breaks into is considered the number of years the couple will live happily together.

❁ DEATH

When a death occurs in San Marino, care is taken to give the person a proper burial according to the Catholic faith. People often bury the deceased's favorite items along with the body. If some things are forgotten, then they are sent in the casket of another deceased villager, because it is assumed that both souls will meet after death. In order to prevent the soul of the deceased from finding its way back into the house, his or her body is taken with the feet exiting first so that the door used for the exit cannot be seen. Lamenting and wailing are forbidden to prevent confusing the soul about reaching its destination. To prevent the soul from coming back, frequent turns are made on the way to the cemetery, and different roads are traveled to return home following the burial.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Uninhabited when the Portuguese discovered them in 1485, these islands were initially settled in 1493, and the islands soon became the biggest exporters of sugar to the world. The Portuguese forced Africans from Cape Verde, Mozambique, and Angola to work on the plantations here. Even though slavery became illegal in 1875, the Portuguese continued using forced labor on large-scale tea and coffee plantations (called rocas) they developed and ended up dominating the cocoa industry of the world. Eventually coffee exports began declining as the dissatisfaction of the international community reached a new high due to the forced labor conditions in São Tomé and Príncipe. All through the 20th century, there were revolts and protests by the slaves that were violently crushed. The worst case was in 1953, when 1,000 forros (descendants of freed slaves) were massacred by the Portuguese because they refused to continue to work on the plantations as forced laborers.

The national liberation movement gained momentum. By December 1974 a transitional government was formed, and in July of the following year independence was declared. This upheaval in the islands can be linked with the Communist takeover of Portugal and Communist governments taking over many African nations as well. Most of the Portuguese had fled São Tomé and Príncipe by then, leaving behind illiteracy levels as high as 90 percent, a shattered infrastructure, barren plantations, and only one doctor on the islands. There was political instability on the islands until democratically elected President Miguel Trovada (b. 1936) and Prime Minister Guilherme Posser (b. 1953) came to lead the country toward stability in 1992. There were coup attempts in both 1995 and 2003, but the country has largely stabilized now. President Fradique de

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located at the equator, São Tomé and Príncipe (STP) is made up of two islands, São Tomé in the south and Príncipe to the north, off the coast of Gabon in the Gulf of Guinea. Together, São Tomé and Príncipe make up the smallest country in Africa.

São Tomé Island is 31 miles long and 20 miles wide, while Príncipe is smaller, only 19 miles by 4 miles. Both islands are a part of an extinct volcanic mountain chain. São Tomé is more mountainous, with the highest peak, Pico de São Tomé, at 6,640 feet.

The areas at sea level have average yearly temperatures of 81°F, whereas toward the interior (higher altitudes) the average annual temperature is 68°F. There is one rainy season, from October to May. The southwestern slopes record 197 inches of annual rainfall, and the northern lowlands record 39 inches of rainfall per year. Swift streams smooth the mountainsides, glisten in the Sun, and disappear quickly into the thick foliage below. Both islands have abundant natural beauty with crystal clear waters and white sandy beaches. Any kind of sea or seaside activity (swimming, scuba diving, water sports, deep-sea fishing, and the like) is most suitable in such environs. There are big sea turtles to be seen on the beachside with whales (sometimes the humpback whales migrating from Antarctica to the Gulf of Guinea at the end of summer) and dolphins passing the coast. Some endangered species of turtles (five out of seven in the world) are found in São Tomé and Príncipe.

❁ ECONOMY

Cocoa comprises 95 percent of total exports, though droughts and post-independence mismanagement have adversely affected cocoa exports. Copra, coffee, and palm kernels are the other important export items. The country has to import most food products, manufactured goods, consumer goods, and all fuel. It has had to depend on external aid and debt rescheduling. Under the HIPC program (Highly Indebted Poor Countries program), São Tomé and Príncipe received aid amounting to $200 million in debt relief in 2000. The government is trying to stabilize the economy through privatization of its industrial sector. It is also attempting to develop the tourism industry and to explore the potential of oil production in the Gulf of Guinea. Some plantation houses are being maintained to assist the tourist industry as places of colonial legacy. São Tomé and Príncipe's major trading partner is Portugal.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The culture and lifestyle of São Tomé and Príncipe were greatly influenced by the Portuguese colonial presence. Portuguese is the main language spoken on the islands along with Creole (a mix of Portuguese and a local language). Each island is rich in culture, a blend of both African and European. The islanders are mainly Roman Catholics. Sãotomese music, like other forms of art in São Tomé and Príncipe, is not completely African. It sounds similar to the music of Cape Verde and Brazil, which were also occupied by the Portuguese.

Gilberto Gil Umbelina (b. 1916) is an artist of repute from this country. São Tomé has highly regarded theater activities such as the Tchiloli performances, which are especially popular famous in Príncipe. The traveling European comedians of the 16th century left their mark in the drama Tchiloli in Príncipe. Enacting Tchiloli, or the Tragedy of the Marquis of Mantua has become an integral part of São Toméan culture since then. Fathers pass on the roles to their sons; women are merely spectators.

The dance forms in STP are the popular bulaué dance (influenced by Angola), the Danço Congo (inspired by the Congo), the puíta, taken from Cape Verde, the samba, brought in from Brazil, and socopé, formerly a dance of the Portuguese colonial elite. There are other acoustic traditional bands such as Sangazuza, whose song lyrics are written in the local Creole, the lingua franca of the islands. The architecture is vividly Portuguese with high ceilings and typical wooden houses on stilts, especially in the countryside. São João dos Angolares, a town in the island of São Tomé, as well as a gallery called Teia

Flora and Fauna

There are many endangered species of plants and animals found on the islands of STP. The commonly found turtles include the tatô (Lapidochelys olivacea), sada (Eretmochelys imbricata), ambó (Chelonia mydas), bobô (Caretta caretta, or Loggerhead Sea Turtle), and ambulância (Dermochelys coreacea). Of these turtle species the most common are the ambó and sada. The unusually big birds of these islands are the São Tomé olive pigeon (Columba thomensis), and the São Tomé giant sunbird (Nectarinia thomensis). Among its plantlife is found the giant begonias (Begonia crateris and B. baccata). The unusual dwarf olive ibis (Bostrychia bocagei) is a species much smaller than other members of its genus.

❁ CUISINE

The people of São Tomé and Príncipe would love to eat turtle meat, but the local turtle species have been declared endangered. So, while the turtles are being preserved in incubators on the beach, the popular diet on the islands includes smoked fish (smoldered on a low flame for a day or two) and vegetable stew. The country's diet is rich in fish (salted, fresh, sun-dried, or smoked), meat, pork, or chicken. These main courses can be accompanied by beans, bananas (green, ripe, grilled, mashed, fried, or boiled), rice, breadfruit, and manioc flour (derived from the roots of tropical cassava). Usually palm wine is served with the food. Preparation of the local dishes usually takes a long time. Molho de fogo (a vegetable stew with smoked fish) and calulu (fish or chicken in a vegetable stew with herbs and breadfruit) are among the famous dishes of São Tomé and Príncipe. The staple breadfruit grows on trees, and its pulp can be eaten after being cooked. In each family traditional cooking styles are passed on from mother to daughter.

Labor Day is an international holiday that honors workers locally and worldwide. It is also known as May Day or Workers' Day in some countries. In STP, where Portuguese is the official language, it is called Dia do Trabalhador. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Dom Carloto asked the prince to leave his horse behind and join him on foot, which the prince did unsuspectingly. It is said that the prince was killed by Carloto, and this story of deceit and the following judgment is enacted in Tchiloli. This European tale has come to be enacted by African dancers, blending both cultures.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 12

On July 12, 1975, São Tomé and Príncipe obtained their independence from the Portuguese. Manuel Pinto da Costa (b. 1937), secretary-general of the MLSTP (Movimento de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe, or Movement for the Liberation of São Tomé and Príncipe), was sworn in as the first president of independent São Tomé and Príncipe.

Since the early 1950s the demand for independence from colonial rule had been voiced all over Africa. In São Tomé and Príncipe there was growing unrest among the people against the oppressive rule of the Portuguese. A group of São Toméans came together and formed MLSTP, thereby initiating the country's struggle for independence. They organized demonstrations and protests all over São Tomé and Príncipe. After a change of regime in Portugal in 1974, Portugal began heeding the requests for independence from its colonies. Portuguese officials met representatives of MLSTP in Algiers and signed an agreement to ensure a smooth transfer of sovereignty to the people of São Tomé and Príncipe. On July 12, 1975, the independent nation of São Tomé and Príncipe came into being.

Since this is a national holiday, all public and private institutions are closed on July 12 in the islands of São Tomé and Príncipe.

☼ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans. Devout Catholics in STP receive a small cross made from a dried palm leaf, which they take home with them after Mass.

☼ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

☼ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, called Sexta-Feira Santa in STP, falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. Alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, it is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. São Toméans observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion. In STP, on Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Catholics.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, called Páscoa in STP, is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate. São Toméans often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers.

In STP Catholics attend midnight Masses for Easter and celebrate Jesus' Resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit envelops churches as people sing devotional hymns. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. São Toméans exchange beautifully decorated Easter eggs and visit friends and family members.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday.

❁ SÃO TOMÉ DAY/ST. THOMAS'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: December 21

The Feast of St. Thomas (in Portuguese, São Tomé) falls on December 21 and celebrates the life of St. Thomas, one of the Apostles of Jesus. He is known as "doubting Thomas" because he was one of the last Apostles to express belief in Jesus' Resurrection and was not convinced until he saw Jesus with his own eyes. December 21 is also the day of winter solstice (shortest day and longest night of the year).

The Portuguese discovered the island of São Tomé on St. Thomas Day in 1470 and named the island after this saint. This Roman Catholic feast simultaneously celebrates the island country of São Tomé.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas, called Natal in STP, is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world. It falls on December 25, the date chosen by the Roman Catholic Church to mark the birth of Jesus. In São Tomé and Príncipe, it is also celebrated as Family Day since the entire family celebrates Christmas together.

Devout Catholics in São Tomé and Príncipe attend Christmas Eve (December 24) Mass in their local church. Christmas carols and devotional hymns are sung during the Mass by the church choir. On Christmas family members gather for a traditional dinner of salted codfish and potatoes, washed down with Port wine. Then they exchange gifts and greetings, which are followed by singing, dancing, and feasting.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Nomadic Semitic tribes occupied Arabia for thousands of years. The Nabataeans ruled over a vast, but loosely connected, trade network that had spread to Damascus by the first century B.C.E. Saudi Arabia is home to Islam's two most important sites, Mecca and Medina.

In 1932, King Ibn Saud (1876–1953), follower of the Wahhabi sect of Islam, created modern-day Arabia by uniting it under Wahhabism.

Starting in 1902 he set out to defeat local rulers and annex different areas of the region such as the Nejd, Al Hasa, and the Hejaz. In 1932 he declared himself the king of a unified area called Saudi Arabia. His eldest son Saud (1902–69) succeeded him in 1953. Faisal (1905–75; Saud's younger brother) deposed him in 1964, because of what he perceived as his elder brother's spendthrift nature and ineffective rule.

King Faisal proved to be an effective leader who initiated reform policies to modernize the nation. From programs for educating girls to improving defense and the economic situation of the country, King Faisal accomplished a lot for his country. For example in the Arab–Israeli War of 1973, he suggested and supported the threefold price hike in oil prices, enabling his country (which owns one quarter of known world oil reserves) to earn a lot of foreign exchange. In 1975 his deranged nephew, Prince Faisal Ibn Musad Abdel Aziz (1944–75) assassinated Faisal. Abdel Aziz was later beheaded.

The next to assume power was Crown Prince Khalid (1913–82) as de facto prime minister with his two brothers, Aziz al-Saud (b. 1924) and Abd al-Aziz al-Saud (b. 1928). These brothers implemented several programs for social welfare and industrialization. Throughout his tenure Khalid was a moderating force. He initiated the stabilization oil price policies of the OPEC (Oil Producing and Exporting Countries) among whom Saudi Arabia clearly had the decision-making monopoly; and he maintained friendly relations with Israel, as well as the United States, so that Saudi Arabia's interests were protected. King Khalid died in 1982 and was succeeded by King Fahd.

By 1989 Saudi Arabia had to sever diplomatic ties with Iran due to differences on oil policies, military issues, and rioting Iranian Muslim pilgrims in the holy city of Mecca. Iran, which had the largest single national group of pilgrims, considered it a religious right and obligation to engage in political demonstrations during the hajj. These demonstrations led to the massacre of 400 Iranian pilgrims in Mecca in 1987.

King Fahd (1923–2005) joined the coalition forces that rallied against Iraq's annexation of Kuwait in 1990. In 1992 he installed a new constitution that made provisions for the establishment of a national council with the power to question (not overrule) government decisions. Due to Fahd's ill health, his half-brother Abdullah ascended the throne in 2005. He signed a treaty with Yemen, ending a border dispute that had dragged on since the 1930s. Under his rule people could openly demonstrate against the United States for its support of Israel. The Saudi Arabian government also restricted the number of U.S. army bases in the country while it attacked Afghanistan (2001) and Iraq (2003). By September of 2003 all U.S. forces had to be withdrawn from Saudi Arabia. The king authorized the Shura (a consultative council nominated by the king himself) to propose new laws without his prior permission. This decision came after the public began pressuring the government for reforms in its structure.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

With the Indian Ocean to its south, the Arabian Sea to the east, the Red Sea to the west, and the Persian Gulf to the northeast, Saudi Arabia covers four-fifths of the landmass of the Arabian Peninsula. Kuwait, Iraq, and Jordan surround the kingdom in the north while its eastern side is flanked by the Persian Gulf, Qatar, Bahrain, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE). Yemen and the Sultanate of Oman surround the kingdom on the southern front. Saudi Arabia has two neutral zones, one with Kuwait and the other with Iraq. An arrangement has been reached whereby all three have divided the areas they wish to rule.

A long mountainous chain marks western Saudi Arabia while the remaining area is mostly plains. The highest mountain is the Jebel Abha, at 10,278 feet. Out on the plains a large area is occupied by the biggest desert of the Arabian Peninsula, called the Rub al-Khali, or Empty Quarter, in English. Measuring 225,000 square miles, it is also the largest sand desert in the world. This desert may be the most forbidding place on Earth. Some sand dunes can be over

The Great al-Hasa Oasis

Nearly a hundred varieties of world-famous dates are grown in this region of eastern Saudi Arabia, which was under Turkish rule until 1914. These include khlās, gharr, bukayyirah, khunaizi, shaishi, and ruzaiz. If somebody visits Saudi Arabia and does not eat these dates from al-Hasa (Hajar of the past), the trip is said to be futile.

1,000 feet high. Summer temperatures can reach 140°F by noon, yet plunge to below freezing at night.

The Nafud (or Nefud) is the second largest sandy desert and spreads toward the northwest of the country. It is connected to the Rub al Khali, by a corridor called the Dahna, a region of gravel plains and sand dunes.

Salt flats, or sabkhas, cover the eastern area, in which the great al-Hasa Oasis (a place in the desert with enough water for agriculture) is located. Salt flats are regions in which the soil is hypersaline and, as a result, mostly devoid of vegetation.

The climate of Saudi Arabia is hot, reaching 113° F in many areas in summers, though the coastal regions tend to have accentuated humidity as well. Winter peaks in December and January with average temperatures of 59°F. Apart from the regular rains in the mountainous regions of Saudi Arabia, most of the country gets less than 8 inches of rainfall per year.

Some shrubs and tamarind plants grow well. There are also a large number of camels, the “ships of the desert.” There are some varieties of baboons in the forested area of mountainous Asir. Overall the climate is not well suited to animal and plant life.

❁ ECONOMY

The Saudi Arabian economy is an oil-based economy. Saudi Arabia is said to have one-fourth of the world's known oil reserves. Around three-quarters of the budget revenue, about half the gross domestic product (GDP) and 90 percent of the nation's export earnings, come from the petroleum sector. Other exports include steel, cement, and wheat. The nation's strategic location surrounded by sea and land gives it an edge in trading and shipping activities. The government controls major economic activities, though it has tried priva-

It has been trying to allocate funds toward increasing educational standards in the country and improving the water (a scarce resource) and sewage system. Almost any reform in the country gets slowed down because Saudi Arabian society is very conservative, socially and politically.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Considering that it is the birthplace of Islam, it is not a surprise that Saudi Arabia features a culture that is centered around religion. Islam is the basic element of the constitution and the legal system of Saudi Arabia. The sharia (Islamic law) is based on the Koran.

About 95 percent of the population follows the Sunni Wahhabism form of Islam (instituted by the Ibn Saud family of rulers) and a patriarchal (male-dominated) system of society. According to their holy book, the Koran, people are required to pray five times a day. Mosques and minarets dot the landscape. Friday is considered to be the day for peace, tranquility, and rest.

The garments of Saudi Arabians are loose, long, and free flowing, in keeping with the desert climate and the Islamic requirement of covering up the whole body. Men wear a long ankle-length shirt (called a thawb) with a square cotton cloth tied to the head (called a ghutra). When it gets cold (which is rarely), they wear the bisht (a cloak made of camel hair) while the women are obliged to wear the niqab (veil) and burka or abaya (black coat) throughout the year.

The national dance of Saudi Arabia is called the ardha. A drummer lays down a beat, while a poet sings to its rhythm. The male dancers move to the music and carry swords. It is also sometimes referred to as the warrior dance. There is al-sibba folk music

It is made in a pot with meat (sometimes chicken), spices, and rice. Women do most of the cooking in Saudi homes.

The treatment meted out to guests is a direct indication of the host's social standing in Saudi Arabia. Being able to retain the guest for another meal is considered to be an honor in Saudi Arabia.

It is considered impolite if a large portion of food is left after a guest has finished a meal. This implies that the guest has not eaten enough. In fact an extra portion is supposed to be cooked to feed an unexpected guest.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar, the month after the month of Ramadan

Eid al-Fitr marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan. Muslims all over the world observe a month-long dawn-to-dusk fast during the holy month of Ramadan. It is believed that Allah himself revealed the Koran to Muhammad during this month. Hence Ramadan is the holiest month for devout Muslims, and the month-long period of abstinence is the fourth of Islam's Five Pillars of the faith. If someone is caught smoking, drinking, or eating in public during Ramadan in Saudi Arabia, he can be sent to prison until Ramadan is over.

The fast ends after the sighting of the new Moon, and Eid al-Fitr is celebrated on the very next day. For this reason it is also called the Feast of Fast-Breaking.

Fasting on Eid al-Fitr is strictly forbidden in the Koran. Muslims dress in their best clothes on this day and also pay zakat, or alms, to the poor and needy on this day. Festivities often continue on the following days; in this country, Eid al-Fitr is celebrated for 10 more days.

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, or the Feast of Sacrifice, is the second of two celebrations in the Islamic calendar. It commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim (Abraham) in Allah and his willingness to sacrifice his son to obey God's command. God visited Ibrahim in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his most valued possession, his son. When Ibrahim told his son about the dream, the boy asked his father to follow God's command. However, as the blindfolded Ibrahim was about to make the sacrifice, he was instructed by a divine voice to remove his blindfold. To his surprise, instead of his son, a ram lay on the altar.

The holy pilgrimage or hajj is undertaken during this month. Each able-bodied Muslim is directed by the Koran to undertake this journey at least once in his or her lifetime. In Saudi Arabia the occasion is marked with tremendous fervor and rejoicing. Muslims feast, exchange sweets, and give gifts to children. Eid al-Adha is celebrated for 10 days in Saudi Arabia.

In case the family lives 31 miles away from the city, they have a grace period of 30 more days to report the birth. The parents are supposed to carry their iqama (residence permit), passport originals, and their marriage certificates when they go. In case the parents want a divorce, the mother is entitled to the physical custody of the child until it becomes independent.

Although it is not required by the Koran, boys are circumcised at the age of six or seven. This ceremony is accompanied with celebration and feasting. Circumcising girls (also called female genital mutilation or FGM) is a pre-Islamic custom and is still practiced in some parts of the country.

❁ MARRIAGE

The foremost requirement for a girl to get married in Saudi Arabia is that she should be a virgin. There is no concept of dating or falling in love since the two people usually meet on the day of their wedding. Polygamy is not uncommon in Saudi Arabia. Parents arrange the wedding when their children are very young. Girls are married off between the ages of 10 and 15 while men tend to be older. For instance, for a fourth wife, her husband might be 30 to 35 years older than the bride. The groom gives mahr (the bride-price) along with a dowry (containing money, gifts, and jewelry) to the bride's family. The girls have a henna party before the wedding night, and henna (a plant dye) is applied to their hands and feet giving them an orange-brown color. Girls leave their parents and stay with their husbands immediately after marriage. A typical Islamic wedding party involves separate celebrations for the men and women.

Fun Fact

A woman does not change her name after marriage in Saudi Arabia.

❁ DEATH

In preparation for burial, the deceased's body is washed to make it pure before burial. The face is turned toward the holy city of Mecca while prayers are recited for bringing peace to the person's soul. The bereaved carry the body on their shoulders for burial. Women, however, are not allowed to attend funeral ceremonies in Saudi Arabia.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Present-day Senegal was a part of the kingdom of Ghana in the eighth century. In the 11th century the Takrur (or Tekrur) people of the Fulani tribe occupied the lower Senegal Valley.

Takrur was followed by the rise of the Jolof Empire between the 12th and 14th centuries. The 15th century saw the arrival of Portuguese traders on the Senegal River estuary; in the 16th century, the Dutch established a slave port on the island of Gorée, a small 45-acre island located off the coast. French entry into Senegal in 1659 for slave trade did not, however, transform the country into a French colony, since there was resistance from both the Dutch and British. While the year 1677 saw the French take over the island of Gorée from the Dutch, it was only after a long series of battles between the French and the British (such as the Seven Years' War between 1756 and 1763) that Britain ceded its holdings in Senegal to the French in 1816. By the late 19th century France had control over the whole of Senegal.

Senegal became part of French West Africa in 1895 and sent its first African deputy, Blaise Diagne (1872–1934), to the French Parliament in 1914. In 1946 it became a part of the French Union. Senegal formed its first National Assembly in 1956, and by 1960 it had become an autonomous republic within the French Community. This process took place in two phases. In the first phase, Senegal attained independence in June 1960 as part of the Mali Federation, which was a short-lived union between the autonomous territories of the Sudanese Republic and Senegal in West Africa. On August 20, 1960, Senegal pulled out of the Mali Federation to become a separate republic with Léopold Senghor (1906–2001) as its first president.

Léopold Senghor's Socialist Party ruled the country for 40 years, until March 2000. Senegal enacted its first constitution in 1963 and introduced a three-party political system in 1978. When Senghor voluntarily stepped down in 1981, his prime minister of 10 years, Abdou Diouf (b. 1935), became Senegal's next president. The period between 1982 and 1989 may be seen as the era of the Senegambian Confederation experiment. During this time Senegal and Gambia tried combining their military and security forces. The idea did not work out, however, and the confederation had to be dissolved. Diouf won both the 1988 and 1993 elections. In March 2000 opposition leader Abdoulaye Wade (b. 1926; of the Senegalese Democratic Party) won the presidential elections and also the April 2001 parliamentary elections. The one significant political event after 2000 was the adoption of a new constitution on January 7, 2001.

In the 21st century Senegal is a republic under multiparty democratic rule and perhaps the only country in Africa that has not been afflicted with military coups. (The only one this country has experienced was in 1962, when the then-prime minister Mamadou Dia [b. 1910] attempted a coup against Léopold Senghor but ended up being imprisoned.) Administratively Senegal is divided into 11 regions: Dakar, Diourbel, Fatick, Kaolack, Kolda, Louga, Matam, Saint-Louis, Tambacounda, Thies, and Ziguinchor.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Situated on the western bulge of Africa, the Republic of Senegal shares its borders with Mauritania in the north and northeast, Mali in the east, and Guinea and Guinea-Bissau toward the south. Senegal surrounds Gambia on three sides. It is, however, not landlocked. On its western coast lies the Atlantic Ocean. Senegal's landscape is primarily a mixture of semi-desert and savannah (grasslands). The semi-desert portion lies to the northwest. Savannah grasslands cover the central and most of the southern portion. Casamance, a forest region, is also in the southern portion.

The lowest point in Senegal is its Atlantic coast, and the highest point is an unnamed feature near Nepen Diakha at 1,906 feet. The Futa Jallon foothills (maximum altitude 1,601 feet) lie toward the southeast while the major rivers flow from east to west. The Senegal River flows through the north, the Gambia River flows through the center, and the Casamance makes the southern soils fertile and the forest rich.

Senegal has two main seasons. The rainy season between May and November is characterized by a hot, humid tropical climate and strong eastward winds. The Casamance forest region may receive rainfall as high as 80 inches, while northern Senegal might receive only 20 inches of rainfall in a season. The dry season lasts for five months, from December to April. Harmattan winds blow frequently during this dry season. These are dry, dusty winds blowing off the Sahara desert region, capable of reducing visibility to only 150 feet. During the dry season, water is often scarce, especially in eastern and central Senegal. In fact the scarcity is often so severe that the country suffers from occasional droughts. Temperatures correspond to the seasons and vary accordingly. The average range is approximately 75°F to 100°F.

❁ ECONOMY

Senegal is primarily an agricultural country, but agriculture contributes only 17 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP). The main agricultural products are peanuts, millet, corn, sorghum, cassava (manioc), rice, cotton, pulses, tomatoes, and green vegetables. Of these, peanuts are the chief cash crop. They are grown primarily on small farms in the region between the Siné and Saloum rivers near Kaolack and Diourbel and are an important export. Animal husbandry, including cattle, sheep, and goats, is quite common, even though intermittent drought conditions often reduce their population. The coastal areas boast a sizable fishing industry, and fish processing is a major industry that contributes to the export earnings of Senegal. Petroleum products, the result of offshore operations in the coastal areas, are also exported, and the oil industry is an important contributor to the GDP of the country. Other natural resources that support the economy are phosphate rock, limestone, high-grade iron ore, and gold. The service industries, of which tourism is the most important, are responsible for approximately 57 percent of GDP. Full Internet connectivity in Senegal was realized in 1996.

Fun Fact

Takrur was a minor Iron Age state in West Africa; located in the Senegal Valley, it flourished roughly parallel to the Kingdom of Ghana. It was primarily a trading center specializing in gold, salt, Sahel grain, and slaves from the south. As early adherents of Islam, Takrur was significant in the introduction of that religion into West Africa. Later Islamic Takrur kingdoms are often sometimes referred to as Toucouleur, a French corruption of Takrur.

Islamic Brotherhoods in Senegal

In Senegal the Islamic brotherhood consists of three main branches: the Tidjanés, the Mourides, and the Khadirs. The Khadir brotherhood was founded in Mauritania and is one of the smallest but oldest brotherhoods in Senegal. The Tidjane brotherhood, which is rooted throughout West Africa, originated in Algeria. One of the most influential brotherhoods the Mouride was founded in Senegal by Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba Mbacke, a Senegalese saint. Each brotherhood follows the decrees of its religious heads (marabouts), who are expected to teach the principles of Islam as well as counsel their followers. In Senegal the Tidjanés and the Mourides are the most prominent brotherhoods and enjoy large followings.

Senegalese Drums

In traditional Wolof life music, especially drumming and dance, plays an important role in every major event. The central feature of Wolof music is rhythm, and not surprisingly the most common Wolof instrument is the drum. The performance of music is the realm of specialists, the griot caste (gewel). Apart from the griots, the blacksmith caste (tegg) is master of the drums, especially the talking drum. But, as in any oral culture, the performance of music demands a response and participation from the audience. So the Wolof respond with their own type of frenetic dancing, clapping, chanting, and, sometimes, singing.

Through songs the Wolof store their history, teach adolescents the secrets of adulthood, and praise important figures. Religious chanting frequently goes on all night and is often heard blasting from loudspeakers on public transportation. Modern popular singers have combined the traditional Wolof rhythmic base with various contemporary modes of music to produce something that is distinctively Senegalese.

Tabala Wolof is the ritual drum music of an African Sufi order, the Qadiriya of Senegal. Led by a massive bass drum during nighttime worship, the drummers inspire ecstatic singing by playing interlocking rhythms on tuned drums.

And then there are the unique instruments of West Africa. The truly Wolof instruments are xalam, a five-stringed lute; the tama, an hourglass-shaped talking drum with an iguana skin at both ends laced together by strings along the length of the drum; and the sabar drum ensemble, a set of seven different drums, made from Dimba wood. Senegalese music has also been influenced by other instruments of the region: the kora, the West African harp; the single-string viola, called a riiti, of the Fulani; the flute of the Fula, the balafon. The Senegalese have also adopted the tabala drums of the Maures, hand-carved tympani-type drums used by the Qadiriyya Sufi brotherhood in their religious music.

The tabla is a Wolof Sufi ceremonial drum, played mainly at nighttime religious services by groups of five or more players in various pitches. They are closed at the bottom and played with two thick wooden sticks. A large tabla can weigh almost 50 pounds.

The tama is also called the talking drum because it can imitate the inflections of the human voice by regulating the pitch. The tama used to be a court instrument, used by kings and chiefs to call people together. Tightening the drumhead raises the pitch. Some rhythmic patterns have actual verbal meanings, but most Senegalese regard the tama as simply an instrument, now used primarily to accompany dancing or griots' chants.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Senegalese have maintained their traditional ethnic tribal culture despite the colonial experience with France. Although French is the official language, languages such as Wolof, Pulaar, Jola, and Mandinka are among those commonly spoken. The Wolof group is the biggest indigenous group in Senegal. People of this group are divided into strata by birth. The upper class is made up of the warrior and noble families, followed by farmers, traders, and craftspeople, such as blacksmiths, weavers, woodworkers, and leather workers, with the griots and the slaves at the lowest level. The griots are respected since they constitute a class of people who preserve oral traditions and literature through the ages by reciting family and village histories through music or public speaking. In earlier eras the griots entertained the royal courts. They recite their histories to drumbeats.

Traditionally Senegalese women wear colorful beads in their hair.

Apart from beads, metallic jewelry is an important part of Senegalese dress. Senegalese people wear the bubu, a long Muslim gown, with trousers for men and cloth wrappers (called sar) for women worn under it.

Senegalese music is traditional with modern influences. The father of modern Senegalese music was Ibra Kassé, who founded the Star Band de Dakar in the early 1960s. Youssou N'Dour represents the latest art form. He plays traditional Senegalese mbalax or sabar music with some Western influences. The traditional music known as mbalax uses musical instruments such as the tama (a drum placed under the arm), the djembe (another drum variety), and the kessing kessing (metal shakers mounted on top of the djembe forto that provide a better rhythm sense for the drummer). These days, modern instruments such as the guitar, the trumpet, and the flute have also been incorporated. Touré Kunda and singer Baaba Maal are two traditional Senegalese artists of international repute.

Mbalax or sabar drumming is native to Senegal and is practiced commonly at births, marriages, funerals, and on holidays. Sabar drumming (with its unique beat) is also popular and is even played at wrestling matches.

The Senegalese are also gifted at glass painting and woodcarving, and they are famous for their sand paintings. Animal skins (of crocodiles, snakes, and iguana) are used to make handbags, shoes, belts, and other accessories.

Approximately 92–94 percent of the population in Senegal are practicing Muslims, primarily Sufi, and only 2–5 percent are Christian (mostly Roman Catholic). The rest of the population practices indigenous beliefs. Out of the three forms of Senegalese Islamic brotherhood—the Tidjanes, the Mourides, and the Khadirs—the first two are the more important ones.

The Sufi Muslims of Senegal have their own holy men who are believed to connect them to Allah. They are called marabouts (dervishes), and most big decisions require their advice. A Moroccan marabout named El Hadj Umar Tall (1797–1864) who came to Senegal in the 19th century initiated many Wolofs into the Tidianism Muslim brotherhood. Originally they joined him as a cultural protest against the French colonialists. El Hadj Malick Sy, another great proponent of Tidianism, established the headquarters of this Islamic brotherhood in Tivaouane, a town in Thies near the capital city Dakar.

❁ CUISINE

Despite the influence of French culture, Senegalese food has an identity of its own. Seafood is an important element in the diet, followed by beef, lamb, and chicken. Since Senegal is predominantly Muslim, pork is not sold there. Rice is the main starch. Peanuts are used in Senegalese dishes. Mafé, a peanut-based stew, is common. Another local delicacy is peanut-based ice cream. Dishes from other parts of Africa and the world are often adapted to suit local tastes. The couscous of northern Africa (grainlike pasta mixed with meat or some vegetable) is one example. Senegalese beer is of good quality; the most popular brands are Gazelle and Flag.

In Senegal, at the coastal town of St. Louis, locals have fireworks displays at night to celebrate the occasion.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

A Typical Senegalese Meal

When guests enter the dining area of a Senegalese home, they are expected to follow the custom of pouring water over their hands and then wiping them on a common cloth. The first course usually served is a special chicken stew with rice, known as thiou au poulet. The alternatives are mate aux arachid, a meat stew with groundnuts, or a fish dish called the bouidiennne. Food is served in deep enamel bowls, and diners are expected to dip in the first three fingers of their right hands while eating. (Using one's left hand is worse than rude; it is regarded as unhygienic.) Fruits may be served as dessert, followed by coffee or tea. The famous cinq centimes, or five-cent cookie, may also be served after dinner.

first month of the Islamic calendar. It is believed that on this day Muhammad fled Mecca for Medina with his family and followers.

In Senegal the celebrations start at sunset the night before, with a special meal of couscous with chicken, beef, or lamb, along with grapes and tomato sauce. Toward the end of the meal, when only grains are left in the dish, some milk is poured on it before it is finished.

People eat as much as they can and then invite the poor to share their food. This is done to ensure one's own prosperity.

The underlying feeling in Muslim households on this occasion is that nobody should be left hungry on this festive day. This feeling is supposed to bring a prosperous new year ahead. A wish is made at the end of the meal when the couscous bowl is broken. A verse from the Koran is recited 1,111 times seeking forgiveness for sins.

For the youngsters of Senegal, the Islamic New Year is a time for "trick or treat." Boys dress up as girls and vice versa, and go from house to house dancing and singing for gifts and sweets.

The Prophet Muhammad's birthday is celebrated on the 12th day of the third Muslim month. In Senegal, where the holiday is known as Gamou in Wolof, prayers continue throughout the previous night as thousands of pilgrims pour into the town of Tivaouane. The Tidjanes celebrate the prophet's birthday with a pilgrimage to their holy town of Tivaouane.

EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

The Muslims of Senegal, where Eid al-Fitr, or the Feast of Fast-Breaking, is called Corritay (or Korite), celebrate the end of Ramadan, the holy month of fasting, on this day. During Ramadan, devout Muslims must fast daily between dawn and dusk, as required by the Koran.

The celebration starts in the morning after the sighting of the new Moon. Men from every family go to the mosque in the morning for prayers. When they return, they eat laax, a dish made of curdled milk and millet. After a huge midday meal people visit friends and relatives. Gifts and wishes of dewenati (a wish meaning "may God grant us life for the next year") are exchanged. The women and girls dress up in their best attire, and the children frequently go asking for gifts (usually money) from their neighbors.

EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, also called Tabaski, Eid al-Kebir, or the Feast of Sacrifice, is celebrated in honor of Ibrahim's (Abraham) readiness to sacrifice his own son at God's command. On this day sheep (or goats) are offered as sacrifices in Senegal by all those who can afford to. The animals are slaughtered and left to stand until all their blood drains into a hole dug in the earth. The meat is then grilled and divided among family members and neighbors as well as shared with the poor. Islam emphasizes that it is important for every Muslim to be honest, fair, and generous. The women of the house prepare a grand feast with the remaining meat. People try to buy new clothes to wear on this day.

Also the holy pilgrimage, the hajj, to Mecca may be undertaken around this time. Each Muslim is directed by the Koran to make the journey at least once in his or her lifetime. It is the fifth pillar of Islam's Five Pillars of the faith. In Senegal Muslims try to arrange their hajj so that the end will coincide with Tabaski. Families save as much money as possible for the trip as well as for buying the goats or rams that will have to be slaughtered for the holiday.

The Magal of Touba is a very important Mouride (an Islamic Sufi Brotherhood) festival. It is celebrated annually during the lunar month of Safar, the second month of the Islamic calendar. This festival commemorates the return of the Sheikh Ahmadou Bamba Mbacké (1853–1927) from exile and is marked by a mass assembly of the faithful (approximately one million) at his tomb. This is an occasion for the caliph general (grand marabout, the head of the brotherhood) to exhort the faithful, and for the faithful to touch the ground where Bamba walked. Most of the transport in Senegal is requisitioned for this immense prayer gathering, leaving the streets of Dakar virtually deserted. Even brotherhood members from Europe and the United States come to Touba for the Magal.

It is also celebrated in the Tambacounda region of Senegal, which is situated near the border of Senegal and Mali and is known for its rich djembe (dance and drumming) culture and tradition. This festival features dancers who wear masks of various animals that a hunter might encounter in the bush while hunting, and a drummer provides the rhythm for these dance performances. It represents one of the fading art forms of Senegal and is held to educate youngsters about ancient Senegalese traditions.

Fun Fact

Senegal uses the Islamic calendar, which began with the migration (hegira) of Muhammad and his companions from Mecca to Medina on Monday, the first of Rabbi al-Awwal, corresponding to September 13, 622 C.E. The hijrah year has 12 lunar months and consists of 354 days. As a result, Islamic holidays are celebrated on different dates of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar every year. For example, 1 Muharram 1417 H. corresponds to May 18, 1996, but 1 Muharram 1418 H. corresponds to May 7, 1997.

spitting on its face and kissing it. According to this tribe saliva has the power to retain words of blessing. The male elders convey their blessings by spitting in the baby's ear and rubbing some saliva on its head. Sometimes a knife is placed near the baby's head to protect it from evil. Also the baby's nails are not cut while it is being breast-fed because it might grow up to be a thief if its nails are cut. Wolofs choose the baby's name a week after birth.

COMING OF AGE

The Bassarri ethnic group of Senegal initiates young boys into adulthood over a period of one month by leaving them in peer groups to travel and fend for themselves in the wilderness. That way, it is thought, they face so many challenges and hardships that they will return as mature adults. The elders of the village decide the day when the boys are to be brought back. After their return they are declared reborn as adults whose responsibilities are now clearly defined.

MARRIAGE

A Senegalese bridegroom must give 22 pounds of nuts (with additional kola nuts) to the bride's father before seeking a woman's hand in marriage. Marabouts (dervishes, the spiritual leaders of the Muslims of Senegal) are consulted about potential marriages, usually by both families.

The day before the wedding, there is dancing and singing in the bride's house. On the day of the wedding, the groom's family comes with gifts for the bride's family. The hands of the bride are dyed with henna, while her hair is tied in braids ornamented with beads or coins. She wears a white dress for her wedding, which is complete with a pagne (cloth) or white veil. On the day of the wedding, a holy woman (griot) performs for the women celebrating the wedding.

Drumming, singing, and feasting go on until the early hours of the next morning. Then the bride leaves with her husband to go to their new home. Here, a sheep or a cow is sacrificed and a lavish feast is prepared. Festivities continue until late the next night at the groom's home. Over the next few days the bride is officially welcomed in the house and slowly apprised of her duties and responsibilities in the groom's family. A week after the wedding (which is considered the honeymoon period for the couple), the bride and her friends participate in a ritual called the jour de linge, or laundry day. Following tradition the bride and her friends collect the family's laundry for the entire week and go to a nearby well to wash it. The clothes are purposely soiled by the groom's family members and friends to tease the bride. The day is celebrated with feasting and dancing, because it marks the end of the honeymoon period for the couple.

DEATH

The Senegalese believe in the existence of heaven and hell. They bury their dead under their huts and cover them with sand. Wolof widows carry knives during the mourning period to ward off evil.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Illyrians inhabited the region followed by the Scordiscs, a Celtic tribe, in the fourth century B.C.E. Little is known about the origin of the Illyrians but they are generally accepted to be the ancestors of modern Albanians. The Romans annexed the region 100 years later. In the sixth century, the Slavs occupied large areas of the Balkan Peninsula, which included present-day Serbia and Montenegro. Slavicization of the territory was a long and erratic process.

In 1389 the Ottoman Turks invaded Serbia and remained there for the next 500 years. The Serbs finally overthrew the Ottoman Empire in 1878 and became independent.

In 1912 Serbia took part in the First Balkan War and joined with Greece, Bulgaria, and Montenegro to liberate Macedonia from the Turks. After Macedonia was freed, Bulgaria initiated the Second Balkan War in 1913 against Greece and Serbia to gain control over Macedonia. It lost, and Serbia took over control of some parts of northern and central Macedonia.

Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria (1863–1914) was assassinated in Sarajevo on June 28, 1914, by a Serb, Gavrilo Princip (1894–1918), a member of the Serbian nationalist group known as the Black Hand. As a consequence Austria and Hungary tried to invade Serbia, and their action was the catalyst for World War I. After the war Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes joined with Montenegro, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and some parts of Macedonia to form Yugoslavia in 1929.

In 1941 the Nazis invaded Yugoslavia, and thousands of Serbs lost their lives. Yugoslavia retained its independence even after the war, and Josip Broz Tito (1892–1980), a member of the Communist Party, came to power in 1945. The monarchy was abolished, and Yugoslavia was declared a federal republic. In 1953 Tito became the president of Yugoslavia. In 1963 a clause was introduced in the constitution that stated that the president of the country would be elected for life.

After Tito's death in 1980, the presidency became rotational. In 1987 Slobodan Milošević (b. 1941), a member of the Serbian Nationalist Party, became president. The Slovenes and the Croats demanded their independence, and to avoid a civil war the European Community imposed sanctions. The deteriorating condition of the country forced the European Community to grant independence to the Croats and the Slovenes. Following this, Macedonia and Bosnia-Herzegovina also demanded independence. Eventually, after a bloody war, the Security Council of the United Nations intervened, and Bosnia-Herzegovina got their independence. After that, only Serbia and Montenegro remained part of Yugoslavia.

In 1998 in the autonomous province of Kosovo, ethnic Albanians demanded their independence, and the federal army of Yugoslavia tried to suppress the agitation. Hundreds were killed, and thousands fled from the region in the struggle that followed.

Fun Fact

This scenic coastline in Montenegro has the only fjord in southern Europe. A fjord is a narrow and steep-sided glacial valley, formed when a glacier retreats, forming a U-shaped valley. The sea fills in, resulting in a deep valley floor that makes an excellent natural harbor and provides breathtaking views of deep canyons covered in greenery.

Although the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) did not intervene at first because Kosovo was a part of Yugoslavia, that organization launched air strikes and started bombing Belgrade when no compromise was in sight.

In 2000 the people of the country demanded Milošević's resignation, and Vojislav Kostunica (b. 1944) was elected president. In February 2003 the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was dissolved, and the state of Serbia and Montenegro was established.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The state of Serbia and Montenegro consists of Serbia, Montenegro, and the autonomous provinces of Vojvodina and Kosovo. Serbia and Montenegro is made up of most of the territory formerly known as Yugoslavia; it was named Serbia and Montenegro in 2003. The country's neighbors are Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Albania. The Serbian territory is landlocked, while Montenegro has a coastline that is roughly 125 miles long with no islands off the coast.

Most of the land in Serbia is flat and low lying with some hilly terrain in the Kosovo region. The southern Montenegrin regions of the country are mountainous. The highest point is Daravica at 8,714 feet. The major rivers are the Danube, Drina, Lim, Morava, Sava, and Tara. Climatic conditions vary in the country according to the physical features of the different regions. The northern region of Serbia experiences continental climatic conditions with harsh, dry winters and hot, wet summers. Some areas there also experience heavy snowfall. The southern regions have a Mediterranean climate with wet and humid summers and mild winters.

ECONOMY

Agriculture and industry contribute to Serbia and Montenegro's economy. The Serbs cultivate crops such as grains, fruits, vegetables, tobacco, and olives. They also raise cattle, sheep, and goats. The major industries include machine building, metallurgy, mining, and consumer goods like textiles, footwear, foodstuffs, and appliances. Electronics, petroleum products, chemicals, and pharmaceuticals are other industries. The country is also rich in natural resources such as oil, gas, coal, antimony, copper, lead, zinc, nickel, gold, pyrite, chrome, and hydropower. The major trading partners of the country are Italy, Germany, Greece, Austria, France, Slovenia, Bulgaria, and Romania. The people here import machinery and transport equipment, fuels and lubricants, manufactured goods, chemicals, food and live animals, and raw materials.

The economy of Serbia and Montenegro has suffered severe blows as a result of the recent wars in the region. The country's economic condition remains volatile, in spite of efforts at reparation. The smaller republic of Montenegro has severed economic ties with Serbia. Both the republics now have separate central banks, different currencies (Montenegro uses the Euro, while Serbia uses the Serbian dinar), different customs tariffs, state budgets, police forces, and governments.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Serbia and Montenegro are known for the folk motifs and the modern surrealist art forms found in the country. The literary scene is also rich in tradition and has been deeply influenced by the political turmoil in this region. The country has come a long way from reciting folk songs and epics by rote and has produced talented authors such as Ivo Andrić (1892–1975), who won a Nobel Prize for his book Na Drini Cuprija (The Bridge on the Drina, 1945), about Bosnian history from the 16th century (when the bridge was built) to World War I. Modern Serbian literature came into being when Serbia gained independence from the Ottoman Empire.

Serbian music and dance forms are based on strong folk traditions and share similarities with

Vampires and Serbia

The word vampire entered the English language in 1732 through an English translation of a German report of a vampire -staking in Serbia. In East European countries, such as Serbia, people feared vampires so much that even government officials went out hunting and staking vampires. The myths about vampires go back thousands of years and are found in most of the important cultures of the world.

The Serbs believed that vampires were most active during a full Moon, on the eves of St. George's Day (May 4) and St. Andrew's Day (November 30). Vampires are said to be immortal. If bitten by a vampire, the victim is believed to become a vampire as well.

Bats are often associated with vampires due to the similarity between the feeding habits of bats and vampires. Over the centuries this association became stronger and was made famous by many authors of vampire books, such as Bram Stoker.

those of Bulgaria. The Turkish influence is also evident. Indigenous folk music (narodna muzika) is a popular musical genre throughout Serbia and Montenegro. Rock, jazz, pop, and other musical genres are also prevalent here. Brass bands, a tradition passed down from gypsy musicians, are extremely popular, especially in southern and central Serbia.

Serbs and Montenegrins are big fans of outdoor sports such as soccer. They avidly follow every tournament played by the country's national soccer team, both within the country and abroad.

The official language spoken in Serbia and Montenegro is Serbian. This language was developed by the philologist and language reformer, Vuk Stefanovich Karadzich (1787–1864).

❁ CUISINE

Serbs have three meals a day—breakfast, lunch, and dinner. They consume large amounts of wheat bread made with or without yeast. Special bread without yeast, pogaca, is made for special occasions. Cheese, cream cheese (kajmak), boiled eggs, and ham (smoked or dry) are served as hors d'oeuvres. Serbs also love soups (such as backa soup made with four kinds of meat). Vegetable dishes made of string beans, potatoes, and cabbages are also popular. Meat is used in many forms in dishes of pork, beef, mutton, or chicken. Fish is also popular.

On feast days Serbs cook different dishes, at least 12 types of small cakes, and several large cakes. These are often accompanied by brandy slivovica (plum brandy), local wines, homemade fruit juices, and coffee.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, depending on the country, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest celebrations of May Day are ascribed to the pagan rituals that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, conflicting opinions exist about the origins of the occasion. Although Labor Day in some countries, such as Australia, has local origins, the most plausible source for the international observance is the Second International.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Serbia and Montenegro workers hold marches and demonstrations on the streets.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 6–7

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world; in Serbia and Montenegro, Christmas is celebrated on January 6 and 7 according to the Julian calendar (named for Julius Caesar), as in other Orthodox Christian countries.

On the morning of Christmas Eve, the head of the family goes into the forest and cuts a young oak tree. This is then blessed by the local priest and, after stripping off the branches, is burned in the fireplace. This ritual is called the burning of the badnjak (oak tree) and has pagan origins. Pagans used to burn the tree as a sacrifice to appease their gods and to ensure an abundance of food, happiness, and wealth in the coming year. Modern Serbs do not go to the forest to cut an oak tree. They only take tiny parcels made of oak wood to church, have them blessed, and burn them. Serbs cover the floors of their homes with hay, reminiscent of the manger in which Jesus was born. Families eat a meal of meatless foods, such as a Christmas Eve cake, baked beans, and walnuts at dinnertime.

On Christmas Day the Serbs celebrate with an elaborate dinner that features roasted piglet, sweet cakes known as koljivo, and česnica, a special kind of bread. Česnica is baked with a coin inside it; during the meal, whoever finds the coin is considered lucky and is said to have a happy year ahead.

St. Sava became the first Archbishop of Serbia at age 70 and was the founder of the Serbian Orthodox Church. His father was a king of Serbia but relinquished everything to set up a monastery along with his son Sava. St. Sava was instrumental in spreading Christianity in Serbia. He opened many educational academies and promoted peace in the region.

HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday of Lazarus–Easter

In the Eastern Orthodox Church, as in other Christian sects, Easter is the central observance of the liturgical year, and the date of most church holidays is determined by the date on which Easter falls. Every Sunday is dedicated in the Eastern Orthodox Church to Jesus' Resurrection, and 100 days are dedicated to Easter—50 before it in preparation, and 50 after it for glorifying him. Easter is the feast of feasts. The 50 days prior to Easter are a part of the period of Triodion, the period for strengthening one's faith. The means are well known: repentance, prayer, and self-control. The 50 days following Easter are the Pentecostarion (from the Greek pentikonta, meaning "fifty").

Holy Week begins with the phrase: "Six days before the Passover, Jesus came to Bethany." His arrival coincided with the Jewish Passover (Pesach). The church relates preparation and redemption to the events of this week.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday celebrates Jesus' Passion on the Cross. To take away our sins he willingly endured the Cross and death. On this day the faithful attend a special service in their local churches, offer prayers to God and remember the suffering and death of Christ. The confession from the cross of the penitent thief, crucified with Christ, is celebrated. During the procession, the faithful kneel and pray for their spiritual welfare, then reverently kiss the crucifix.

The Vespers of Friday afternoon are a continuation of the royal hours. During this service the removal of Jesus' body from the Cross is commemorated with a sense of mourning for the terrible events that occurred. As the priest reads the Gospel, he removes Jesus' body from the cross, wraps it in a white cloth, and takes it to the altar. The priest then carries the cloth on which the body of Jesus is painted or embroidered around the church before placing it inside the sepulcher, a carved bier that symbolizes the tomb, reminding the faithful that during Jesus' entombment he descended into Hades to free the dead of the ages. After several hymns are sung, the priest sprinkles the sepulcher and the whole congregation with fragrant water. On this day the Divine Liturgy of St. Basil is officiated.

In Serbia and Montenegro, a ritual called the Stations of the Cross is performed. This is a reenactment of Christ's final journey when he carried the cross before his crucifixion. Orthodox families observe a strict fast and attend church, where they kiss the Grave of Christ (Plastanica). Fish and oil are not used on Good Friday, and only nuts, fruits, and vegetables are eaten.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

In Eastern Orthodox Churches what is called Easter in English-speaking countries is called Paștele in Romania, after the Hebrew observance Pesach (Passover). On Easter Sunday (Saturday midnight) Jesus' Resurrection is celebrated. Before midnight the Odes of Lamentation of the previous day are repeated. The Orthros of the Resurrection begins in complete darkness. The priest takes light from the vigil light and gives it to the faithful, who are holding candles. In many churches the priest leads the people outside the church, where he reads the Gospel that refers to the angel's statement: "He is risen; he is not here." Then the people wait breathlessly for the priest to start the hymn of Resurrection. From this moment the entire service takes on a joyous Easter atmosphere.

On Easter in Serbia and Montenegro families gather together to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection, and color Easter eggs and paint beautiful designs on them. These intricate designs are unique to Serbia. Some eggs are dyed red to symbolize Jesus' Resurrection. It is a tradition here that the very first egg that is colored is kept aside for the head of the family. This egg is called cvarkuca (protector of the house).

Easter Sunday afternoon the faithful gather once more for prayer with lighted candles and greet one another joyously, saying: "Christ is Risen." The fruit of faith in the Resurrection is love so this day is called Sunday of Agape (brotherly love), a day dedicated to Christian principles, especially forgiveness and charity. At this time Christians seek to end misunderstanding and arguments among those with whom they may be at odds.

A traditional Serbian Easter meal consists of lamb soup, roast lamb, salad, and delicious cakes. Feasting and exchanging greetings and Easter eggs continue even on the next day Easter Monday.

❁ VIDOVDAN

Observed by: Serbian Christians

Observed on: June 28

The festival of Vidovdan is of national importance and symbolizes death and resurrection, despair and hope, to the people of Serbia. It originated with the peasant community who used to practice many customs and rituals that have pagan origins related to the pagan god Svevid or Vid. Young girls soaked an herb called vidovica, in water and washed their faces with it.

The day has been also celebrated as St. Vitus's Day or the Feast of the Holy Prince Lazarus by the Serbians ever since Christianity was introduced in the region. Saint Vitus was an Italian Christian saint.

In addition Vidovdan is the anniversary of the Battle of Kosovo. Prince Lazarus (Lazar Hrebeljanovic, fl. 14th century) was a virtuous ruler who led the Serbs in many wars. He raised a multinational force on this day in 1389 to engage the Turks in the Battle of Kosovo Polje on St. Vitus Day. During the battle Prince Lazarus was killed, and the Serbs were badly defeated while defending their homeland. On this day special prayer services are held in all churches of Serbia. Memorial services are also held for the Serbian heroes. It is believed that on this day the rivers turn red, colored by the blood of Kosovan heroes. In Montenegro women used to wear black scarves on their heads, and the men's caps were embroidered with black to mourn the loss in the Kosovo Battle.

Towels

Apart from being valuable gifts, towels are part of the Serbian dress code. Women and girls wear towels tied to belts as a part of their clothing. Girls wear them on their right while women wear them on their left side. Towels have a very old association with the people of Serbia and are used on numerous occasions like births, weddings, and funerals. They are used to decorate the house, and the way a towel is used is said to reflect the artistic ability of the women.

The Agricultural Fair is one of the most popular events held in the country, and also provides a sound platform for the cultivators to showcase their skills as well as their products.

✿ MARRIAGE

In a traditional Serbian wedding, the bride is escorted into the church by the groom's brother. Other people who are important to the couple, like their parents and the godparents, will be present throughout the ceremony. During the wedding service, the priest binds the couple symbolically with a cloth. This white binding cloth is called the pesbkir, and this tradition signifies that the couple is now bound together for life.

A traditional towel is an important wedding gift presented to the Serb couple by close friends and relatives. It symbolizes the closeness they share with the couple. Towels are also given to the friends and relatives of the couple. The size, quality, and patterns on the towels vary. For instance, the groom's brother and the best man are given specially decorated towels that are more luxurious compared to the towels others receive.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The Seychelles (pronounced say-shelz or say-shel) were apparently uninhabited islands when Arab and Indonesian traders first stopped there, but a Portuguese sighting of them was the first documentation of their existence in 1505. They were ideally located for sailors and became an important transit point for traders between Asia and Africa. But this made them a convenient spot for pirates as well.

In 1742 the French governor of Mauritius, Le Visconte Bertrand-François Mahé de La Bourdonnais (1699–1753), in the service of the French East India Company, sent Lazare Picault on expedition to the Seychelles for a second time with the Elizabeth. Picault landed on Mahé in November 1742 and was so impressed that he christened the island Ile d' Abondance. He stayed only four days, and when he left he took 300 giant tortoises and 600 coconuts. In 1756 this territory was formally annexed by France. In 1756 the French began to take control of the islands and named them for the French finance minister Jean Moreau de Sechelles (1690–1760).

Great Britain and France vied for control of the Seychelles from 1794 to 1811, but the French finally yielded, and the British gained complete control of the territory in 1814. In 1903 the Seychelles were separated from Mauritius and became a crown colony. In 1974 Britain annexed Seychelles and placed it under the administration of Mauritius. Internal government was recognized in 1975, and independence followed a year later, although the Seychelles joined the British Commonwealth.

James Mancham (b. 1939) was the first prime minister of independent Seychelles. He concentrated on tourism and off-shore financial services to boost the country's economy but faced strong opposition from the Seychelles People's United Party. While he was attending the Commonwealth conference in 1977, armed men of the opposition staged a coup. Albert René (b. 1935), the party leader, took power and controlled Seychelles throughout the 1980s.

Facing criticism from England and France, René was forced to form a real political party, the People's Progressive Party and hold elections. He created the office of president who is the chief executive while legislative power is in the hands of the National Assembly. Elections are conducted every five years. The 1979 constitution declared a Socialist one-party state, which lasted until 1992. The 1993 elections were a complete victory for René over Mancham

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Situated in the Indian Ocean, the Republic of Seychelles is about 1,000 miles east of Kenya. The Seychelles are an archipelago consisting of about 115 islands, but only 33 are inhabited. Mahé, the largest island, is surrounded by 42 granite islands and is home to the country's capital city Victoria and about 80 percent of the population. The Seychelles' highest point, the Morne Seychellois (2,969 feet), is also on Mahé. The outer group of islands is mostly small coralline atolls that are flat with elevated coral reefs. Habitation on these islands is very difficult because there is no fresh water.

The country has a tropical-marine climate with steady temperatures throughout the year. The hottest months are March and April. July and August are the coolest months in Seychelles. From May to September, when the southeast trade winds blow continuously, is considered the best time of year. From November to April humidity is relatively high, though the northwest wind blows lightly. The wettest months are December and January.

❁ ECONOMY

Since its independence in 1976, development in this Indian Ocean archipelago has been led by the tourist sector. Employment, banking, and commerce are dominated by tourism-related industries. Tourism employs 30 percent of the country's labor force. It was only after the collapse of its economy due to the 1991 Gulf War that Seychelles began seriously to diversify its economy. The tuna fishing industry is another factor in the country's economy. The significant imports are petroleum products, machinery, and foodstuffs; the main exports are canned tuna, copra, frozen fish, and cinnamon.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Most Seychellois are descendants of French settlers and African slaves. In the 19th century the British freed Africans from slave ships along the East African coasts and took them to Seychelles. Other permanent groups include Chinese and Indians. The Seychelles culture is a mix of English, French, and African influences. Ninety-two percent of the people speak Creole. It was made the first official language of the Seychellois in 1981 followed by English and French, but English dominates as the language of the government and commerce and is also the language of the National Assembly. The René regime had discouraged French because it was the language of the colonists. The Roman Catholic Church, however, uses French, and many older people still communicate in French. In Seychelles nearly half of the television programs are in French, and most people can read and write French. In order to restore the culture and tradition of the Seychellois, the government has provided the National School of

The Double Coconut

The coco de mer is unique to Seychelles. Native to Praslin, it is also called the double coconut. It bears one of the largest fruits in the plant kingdom, which weighs up to 49 pounds. According to local folklore, the male palm mates with the female palm at night, and anybody who sees them moving during the night will die.

Music and the National Cultural Troupe for nurturing the country's identity.

Seychellois society is essentially matriarchal in the sense that mothers tend to control the household, overseeing most expenditures, and providing for the interests of the children. Men are important for their earning ability, but their domestic role is relatively peripheral. Older women can usually count on financial support from family members living at home or contributions from the earnings of grown children.

Social class is very much a factor in Seychelles, and wealth and material acquisition are considered marks of "success." The relative lightness or darkness of one's skin is also a consideration, the lighter the better. This bias is doubtless a leftover from the plantation era when the "bosses" were white men.

❁ CUISINE

Of all the islands in the Indian Ocean, Seychelles is reputed to offer the best Creole cuisine. The staple food of the people is rice and fish. The varieties of fish include shark, barracuda, kingfish, octopus, squid, jack fish, red snapper, parrotfish, and grouper. Daube (a sweet sauce or stew), rougaille (a tomato-based sauce used with fish), carii coco (a mild meat or fish curry with coconut cream), and fish marinated in lemon are other classic Creole dishes. The use of spices, coconut milk, and breadfruit has been borrowed from Indian, African, Chinese, English, and French traditions.

PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Origin of the Creole Festival

The Creole Festival dates back to the 1980s when academics of Creole societies from the Indian Ocean as well as the Caribbean proposed that October 28 be celebrated as International Creole Day. The idea was to raise awareness of Creole languages and cultures. It helps to bring together the Creole communities scattered around the world. All the events are open to the public, and the community welcomes all participants.

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Seychellois observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion. Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

On Easter in Seychelles, the entire family gathers to celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. In Seychelles people attend midnight prayer services for Easter and celebrate Jesus' Resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit envelops churches as people sing devotional hymns.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday.

It follows All Saints' Day and shifts the focus from those in heaven to those whom Christians believe are waiting in purgatory. Three Masses are conducted on this day: one for the celebrant, one for the departed, and one for the pope.

Seychellois believe that the soul of the dead return on this day to have a meal with their family members. Candles are kept on the windowsills to help them find their way home, and an extra place is set at the table for their return.

Rites of Passage

MARRIAGE

A distinguishing feature of Seychelles society is the acceptance of sexual relationships without the institution of marriage. Nearly three-quarters of the children are born out of wedlock, though the fathers do legally recognize most of these children. Many people choose to live en ménage, as it is known in the Seychelles, because it is cheaper. The unpopularity of legal marriages is related to the cost of weddings, trousseaus, household furnishings during and after marriage, the unwillingness of mothers to part with their sons' earnings, previous marriage by one partner, expenses related to divorce, and the expectation of sexual fidelity in marriage. Women from the more socially prominent families often get married because it is expected of them, and it ensures a conventional transfer of wealth of one generation to the next.

Fidelity in men is not an important concern in Seychelles's society.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The area on the west coast of Africa, now known as Sierra Leone, was first inhabited by unknown tribes from the interior of Africa more than 600 years ago. They are believed to be the ancestors of the oldest ethnic group of modern-day Sierra Leone, the Limbas. When Europeans arrived in the region, it consisted primarily of several distinct kingdoms ruled by chieftains.

Portuguese sailor Pedro da Cintra discovered Sierra Leone in 1462 while he was exploring a new sea route in the Atlantic Ocean. He named the region Serra Lyoa, which means "Lion Mountains," after the mountain ranges in the country.

By the end of the 15th century (1495), the Portuguese had built a fort as a trading post for gold, spices, ivory, and slaves. Following the Portuguese, the British and the French also set up bases in Sierra Leone. In the 17th century the British negotiated with tribal chiefs to set up warehouses for their merchandise. Thousands of West African slaves were transported to the Americas from Sierra Leone beginning in the 1650s. In 1672 the Royal African Company was founded, and trading posts were established on Bunce and York Islands.

The slaves transported to North America from Sierra Leone and other parts of West Africa were particularly valuable to white colonists because of their skills as farmers, especially their experience in cultivating rice, which became an important cash crop in South Carolina and Georgia.

Beginning in 1787, following the American Revolution, British officials established in Sierra Leone a Province of Freedom, a colony of free, expatriated former slaves at Freetown, near the site of the original Portuguese fort. The colony consisted of slaves who had escaped white masters in America during the turmoil of the revolution and who had been resettled in Nova Scotia and Britain. Periodically the British settled other Africans liberated from slaving ships or who were otherwise displaced in the Freetown colony. Still British colonization in Sierra Leone, even when it included freed slaves, provoked resistance among indigenous Africans.

Britain and France signed a treaty in 1812 that assigned each specific zones of influence in the area. In the 1890s Britain sought to thwart French ambitions in the territory by

Freetown

Freetown is the capital, chief port, and the largest city of Sierra Leone. It lies on the rocky Sierra Leone Peninsula at the seaward tip of a range of wooded hills. By the mid-17th century, the increased activity of British, French, Dutch, and Danish trading companies ended Portuguese control over trade on the west coast of Africa. In 1787 an English abolitionist named Granville Sharp (1735–1813) selected this site south of the mouth of the Sierra Leone River as a haven for African slaves, freed and destitute in England.

In 1792 the Sierra Leone Company took over responsibility and helped settle slaves from Nova Scotia who had fought for the British in the American Revolutionary War, the Maroons (runaway slaves of Jamaica), and others from captured slave ships.

declaring all of Sierra Leone a British Protectorate. During World War I (1914–1918), Sierra Leonean soldiers fought in Cameroon against the Germans.

Sierra Leone became known as the West African white empire because key administrative posts were held by the light-skinned Europeans and the authority of the Krios (Creoles) declined. These developments sparked opposition from the native population. After the British levied taxes on tribal huts, the tribes in the north and south of Sierra Leone revolted, though they were unable to match the might of British forces at that time.

Following World War I the British began to exploit the mineral wealth of Sierra Leone (including diamonds, bauxite, gold, and iron ore), and by 1926 more than 16,000 people worked in the mines, toiling long hours in unhealthy working conditions. The workers protested, but dissent was quelled.

During World War II (1939–45), Freetown was a significant base for the Allies, and as many as 17,000 Sierra Leoneans fought alongside the British. When the war ended, new colonial policies ensured that a majority of natives occupied positions of power. In 1951 elections for the legislative council were held in Sierra Leone, and the Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP), formed in 1949 by Sir Milton Margai (1895–1964), was declared victorious. The constitution of 1951 provided the framework for decolonization, and elections were the first step in this direction. In 1953 ministerial powers were handed to the elected representatives, and a group of elected representatives ran the affairs of the country.

Finally on April 27, 1961, Sierra Leone became an independent nation within the British Commonwealth. Sir Milton Margai was sworn in as the first prime minister of independent Sierra Leone, and he remained the prime minister until his death on April 28, 1964. On his death his brother Sir Albert Margai (1910–90) was sworn in as the new prime minister. Around this time the opposition party, the All People's Congress (APC), gained ground and fiercely opposed Albert's claim to the position. In the elections held in March 1967, APC won a decisive majority in Sierra Leone, and Siaka Stevens (1905–88), the leader of the party, was appointed the new prime minister of the country. However, the nation was thrown into turmoil after Brig. David Lansana (1922–75), the Commander of Republic of Sierra Leone Military Forces (RSLMF), a Mende related by marriage to Margai, ousted Stevens a few minutes after he took the oath of office. Lansana's rule lasted a mere two weeks, ended by a group of senior military officers who arrested him on March 23 and took control of the government. They formed the National Revolutionary Council (NRC) and made Brig. Andrew Juxon-Smith their chairman. After the "sergeant's revolt" led by the Anti-Corruption Reformation Movement (ACRM) in April 1969, Stevens finally resumed power as the prime minister of Sierra Leone. The sergeant's revolt was led by a group of rebel soldiers who wanted to restore multiparty democracy in the country. Stevens's first act when he resumed office was to convict Lansana of treason and have him hanged.

In 1985 APC leader Maj. Gen. Joseph Saidu Momoh (1937–2003) was elected to succeed Stevens as the prime minister of Sierra Leone. In 1991 the government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front (RUF), a rebel group, became engaged in a civil war. The war, which lasted from 1991 to 2002, killed thousands of people, maimed and crippled thousands more, and displaced more than two million (over one-third of the population). Many of them are now refugees in neighboring countries.

Finally the RUF and Civil Defense Forces (CDF) combatants were demobilized and disarmed. This was achieved with the support of a UN peacekeeping force (UN Mission in Sierra Leone, UNAMSIL) and contributions from the World Bank and international community.

National elections took place in May 2002, and Alhaji Ahmad Tejan Kabbah (b. 1932) was elected president of Sierra Leone. Through 2004 and early 2005, most UNAMSIL peacekeepers were withdrawing from the country. Slowly and steadily Sierra Leone was moving toward peace and stability, but the wounds of the civil war will take a long time to heal.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Sierra Leone is located on the western coast of Africa, on the North Atlantic Ocean between Guinea and Liberia. The terrain ranges from a coastal belt of mangrove swamps in the west, wooded hills, upland plateau, to mountains in the east. The highest mountain is Loma Mansa (also known as Mt. Bintumani) at 6,391 feet.

The main rivers of Sierra Leone include the Little Scarcies, Jong, Moa, Rokel, and Sumbuya. The northern parts of Sierra Leone are home to shrubs and savannah (grasslands dotted with trees), while in the southeastern parts of the country varied species of trees such as mahogany, teak, and palms are found. Porcupines, hippopotamus, crocodiles, chimpanzees, and a wide variety of monkeys live in Sierra Leone. In fact the Kilmi National Park, located in the northern part of Sierra Leone, has the largest concentration of chimpanzees in West Africa.

The climate is tropical. A hot and humid rainy season lasts from May to December. Sierra Leone is one of the wettest countries on the west coast of Africa. The winter season, which lasts from December to April, is dry. From December to February, dry, sand-laden harmattan winds from the Sahara blow across the region. This land of diverse natural environments has experienced pressure due to rapid population growth, overgrazing, deforestation as a result of slash-and-burn cultivation, overharvesting of timber, and overfishing. A decade-long civil war has also taken its toll on the ecological resources of the land.

❁ ECONOMY

Sierra Leone is a poor country. Lack of social infrastructure, not lack of natural resources, has hampered economic development, and the long civil war reduced the economy to shambles. About two-thirds of the population is involved in subsistence agriculture, and rice, coffee, cocoa, palm kernels, palm oil, and peanuts are the main agricultural products. Animal husbandry in Sierra Leone includes poultry, cattle, sheep, and pigs as well as fish. Natural resources include diamonds, titanium ore, bauxite, iron ore, gold, and chromite. Diamonds are the major source of income. Plans are in place to reopen bauxite and rutile (titanium dioxides) mines.

Manufacturing mainly involves processing of raw materials, as well as petroleum refining and light manufacturing for the domestic market. The main products of the manufacturing sector include beverages, textiles, cigarettes, and footwear. The country's export partners include Belgium, Germany, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Sierra Leone imports food and machinery from Germany, the United Kingdom, Côte d'Ivoire, France, the United States, the Netherlands, and Ukraine.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The national symbol of Sierra Leone is a giant cotton tree that grows in the capital city, Freetown. According to popular belief, the tree was a young sapling when settlers came to Freetown in 1787.

Although English is the official language of Sierra Leone, the native people prefer to speak their own languages, which bear the same names as the tribes that speak them. These include Mende, Kono, Sousou, Limba, and Temne. The everyday language of the people is a mix of French, English, Portuguese, and some of the African languages. Krio is a mix of Pidgin English with French influences from neighboring Guinea.

While 60 percent of the nation's population is Muslim, almost 10 percent are followers of Christianity. Christianity reached Sierra Leone from America and the West Indies at the end of the 18th century. The city has many mosques and more than 70 churches, notably the Anglican St. George's Cathedral, which was built in 1852. The majority of Christians are either Anglicans or Catholics.

Islam was established long before Christianity by the Fulahs (an ethnic group) and Mandikas (an ethnic group) from Muslim countries to the north. It is the predominant religion in the interior parts of Sierra Leone, but more than 30 percent of the population still adheres to animism and ancestor worship. In villages people live in square or round earth and bamboo huts, depending on their traditions, and an entire family lives under one roof. A village chief, who also acts as a judge and healer for the entire village, governs each village. Since the civil war, houses with tin roof and modern brick walls are replacing the traditional huts.

In the capital, the Sierra Leone National Ballet holds performances accompanied by different types of drums, such as sangbori, poro, or bundu, along with instruments such as the balangi (a type of xylophone). Carving ivory, bone, and wood has been a tradition for craftsmen for more than 500 years.

❁ CUISINE

The Sierra Leonean diet relies on rice, meat, fish, roots such as cassava (tapioca), and local lentils, greens, and fruits. Ginger beer (made from ginger and lemon juice) is a favorite nonalcoholic beverage of Sierra Leone.

January 1

The first day of the Western (Gregorian) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day. A festive spirit reigns all over the world as people attend parties and celebrations that begin on New Year's Eve (December 31). New Year's is a public holiday in Sierra Leone; government offices, schools, and businesses are closed.

Fun Fact

Scholars cannot agree on what it was about the mountains that caused da Cintra to associate them with lions: their shape or the thunderous rainstorms.

De Ruyter Stone

Among the most interesting exhibits in Sierra Leone's National Museum is a copy of the De Ruyter Stone, which was proclaimed one of Freetown's oldest monuments in 1948. It is inscribed with the names of famous sailors of the African west coast. It is buried six inches underground, above the high water level at King Jimmy's Watering Place (now known as Jimmy's Market Place). This was the spring known to all mariners as one of the best watering places on the west coast of Africa.

REPUBLIC DAY

Observed on: April 19

This day commemorates the founding of the new Republic of Sierra Leone on April 19, 1971. Siaka Stevens was the first president of the Republic. After elections in March 1967 in which Siaka Stevens was declared victorious, two consecutive coups kept him out of power until 1968. Brig. David Lansana led the first coup in March 1967; he was quickly ousted by the National Reformation Council (NRC) on March 23, 1967, which placed Brig. Andrew Juxon-Smith in charge of the country. In April 1968 the Anti-Corruption Revolutionary Movement ousted the NRC, and Siaka Stevens once again assumed power. Political unrest continued in the region until 1971. On April 19, 1971, Sierra Leone adopted a constitution and officially assumed the status of a republic. Siaka Stevens was sworn in as the first president of the Republic of Sierra Leone. It is a national holiday, and all public and private institutions are closed on April 19.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 27

On April 27, 1961, Sierra Leone became an independent nation within the British Commonwealth. Sierra Leone had been under British domination since the early 19th century and even fought alongside Britain during World War II. Post-World War II Britain began relaxing its control in the region and allowed greater autonomy and democracy. A constitution was adopted in 1951 with British approval, which paved the way for decolonization. In 1953 more internal political powers were given to local political parties and Sir Milton Margai was sworn in as the first chief minister of Sierra Leone. He conducted talks with British authorities about granting complete independence to Sierra Leone, and on April 27, 1961, Sierra Leone became an independent country within the British Commonwealth. Sir Milton was sworn in as the first prime minister of an independent Sierra Leone. Unfurling of the national flag by the president, official speeches, and a military parade are highlights of the Independence Day celebrations.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Sierra Leoneans join workers worldwide in celebrating May 1 as Labor Day. In other countries it is also called May Day or Workers' Day. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Trade unions, which have been in existence since the British started a mining industry in the region, organize demonstrations and other pro-union activities on this day.

BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day originated with a medieval British custom by which servants and peasants were given Christmas gifts the day after Christmas, that is, on December 26. On this day, boxes used for collecting money for the poor in churches are opened, thus the name, Boxing Day, and gifts are given to those who render useful service to the community throughout the year. December 26 is also the feast day of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr.

The Commonwealth of Nations is an association of independent nations, most of which are former colonies of the British Empire. They share some common cultural links, which were influenced by the British, and Boxing Day is among them. As a former British colony, Sierra Leone is a part of the Commonwealth group of nations and celebrates Boxing Day. Traditionally business owners present gifts in the form of money to their employees on this day.

God's intervention, however, at just the right moment, allowed the substitution of a sacrificial ram for Ibrahim's son.

A festive spirit rules the day as Muslims in Sierra Leone begin the day by offering special namaz (prayers), thanking God for his benevolence. Then they greet each other, and the festivities begin. Goats and sheep are sacrificed, and the meat is distributed among family, friends, and poor people. This celebration often marks the end of the hajj, the

Fun Fact

No one knows when Jesus was born and dates in every month of the year have been put forward as possibilities. The late December date was chosen because it overlaps with pagan celebrations of the winter solstice in the Northern Hemisphere.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

When a woman becomes pregnant, a ritual of purification is performed. It includes praying to God and making an offering of rice flour and kola nuts (a native fruit of Africa used in making of cola drinks) to the ancestors. This is done to seek the blessings of God and the ancestors, who it is hoped will grant prenatal and postnatal protection to the mother and child.

In Sierra Leone a pregnant woman is expected to abstain from sexual intercourse during pregnancy, since Sierra Leoneans believe it will harm the development of the fetus. Assistance of trained and experienced midwives is sought at the time of childbirth.

After the birth of the child, the placenta is buried under a banyan tree by the female relatives of the woman. The end of the placenta, which connected the child to the mother, is placed in an upright position before it is buried. This is done to safeguard a woman's fertility; if it is buried in a downward position, it is believed the mother will become sterile.

Until the day of the naming ceremony, the child and the mother lead a life of seclusion inside their house. The naming ceremony takes place on the eighth day after the birth of the child, when its umbilical cord has completely fallen off. Until this happens, the child is considered to be attached to its mother and not considered an individual. For the naming ceremony relatives from both sides of the family are invited and the child's head is shaved. Prayers—Christian or Muslim—are offered to God, and kola nuts and rice flour are offered by an elderly member of the family to the ancestors.

Then elderly women chew and spit kola nuts in the mouth of the newborn child as a sign of longevity and prosperity. Next they chew and spit alligator pepper (a pod with hot and spicy seeds) into the child's mouth to help it face life with courage and bravery. Then the name of the child is publicly announced, and feasting and celebrations follow. It is also customary for relatives to shower gifts on the newborn child.

COMING OF AGE

Male and female circumcision rites are an integral part of Sierra Leone's society, essential to complete the transformation from childhood to adulthood. Traditional practitioners perform male circumcision without the use of anesthesia. The initiates are encouraged to endure the pain silently during the ceremony, and shouting and shrieking are considered signs of weakness.

The tribes in Sierra Leone follow female circumcision rites. This practice is highly controversial in the Western world, where it is referred to as female genital mutilation (FGM). It has been banned in many countries.

UNAMSIL

On October 22, 1999, the UN's Security Council established the UN Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) to cooperate with the government of Sierra Leone and the other parties in implementing the Lome Peace Agreement and to assist in implementing disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration in the country. UNAMSIL's mandate was revised on February 7, 2000, and expanded further in May of 2000 and March of 2001.

MARRIAGE

The Krio in Sierra Leone have a ceremony before the wedding wherein the intended bride is kept hidden when her fiancé comes to see her. As he calls for her, her family presents a much older woman to him. The prospective groom keeps calling out for her, however, and the bride is eventually brought forward amid much excitement. A bride-price, or lobola, is paid in many parts of Sierra Leone. The entire family of the groom contributes to pay the bride-price in addition to the cost of the wedding.

DEATH

Although Muslims and Christians in Sierra Leone believe that death occurs according to God's will, many native people never attribute death to natural causes. Instead the death of a person is associated with a curse placed on the person's life by another person. After the death of a person, the older women of the family take care of the body. They cleanse it and drape it in a shroud. If the family of the deceased has adequate funds, they place the body in a coffin; otherwise the body is wrapped in a mat. No embalming takes place, as dead bodies are buried as soon as possible after death.

In Sierra Leone each village has a number of clubs or societies to which the people belong. Each group is provided a designated area for burial. Accordingly the body of the deceased is carried to the appropriate burial ground, and a grave is dug. If a coffin is provided, then it is buried; otherwise the body is buried wrapped in a mat. Members of the community, in a show of support for the family of deceased, offer them food and money. Widows have to observe a 40-day mourning period during which they are not allowed to change their clothes. At the end of the mourning period elderly women accompany the widow to a nearby river for a ritual purification bath. Her mourning clothes are discarded, and she is now considered free to marry another man.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The early history of the area now known as Singapore is rather hazy, though it is believed to have been inhabited for the last 2,000 years at least. It was earlier called Sea Town or Temasek, and the Chinese referred to it as Pu luo zhong, which means "island at the end (of the peninsula)." The name Singapore is a corruption of the Sanskrit word singapura, which means "lion city." It is supposed to have been given to the city by Sang Nila Utama (or Sri Tri Buana, as he was more popularly known), a ruler of Palembang (in present-day Indonesia), who was forced to land at Temasek during a storm. There he caught sight of an animal he thought was a lion. Taking this to be a good omen he decided to establish a settlement with this name. This story is contained in the Sejarah Melayu, or Malay Annals. By the end of the 14th century the island was commonly known as Singapura.

In the 14th century Siam (now Thailand) and the Mahajapit Empire of Java (in present-day Indonesia) fought for control over this area as well as over the Malay Peninsula.

Later Singapore became an important outpost of the Malacca Sultanate that was centered in Muar on the Malay Peninsula; by the beginning of the 19th century it came under the Sultan of Johor, who ruled from the Riau-Lingga archipelago.

Sir Stamford Raffles (1781–1826), who was an employee of the British East India Company, is credited with founding Singapore in 1819. The British established a port in Singapore, and soon Singapore became a strategic port for free trade and immigration, and Indians, Arabs, Europeans, Chinese, and Thai traders used it. Over the next 50 years the city-state prospered and flourished as a major seaport. In 1826 the British grouped Singapore, Penang, and Malacca into a single administrative unit called the Strait Settlements Division controlled by the British East India Company.

After the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869, Singapore's position as an important trade center grew stronger. In the beginning of the 20th century, Singapore developed as an industrial center. However, the divide between the working classes and the ruling classes widened. Despite the flourishing trade, Singapore was essentially a lawless country, and the population was still largely uneducated in the late 19th century.

Singapore was not affected by World War I, but during World War II the Chinese population of Singapore supported China against the Japanese. The Japanese defeated the British in 1942 and took over control of Malaya and Singapore. They ruled the region until 1945, when the Allies defeated them, and the British regained control of the Strait Settlements and the British military took over administration of them. Like people in the rest of the world at this time, the residents of Singapore yearned for freedom and protested British authority with strikes and demonstrations.

In 1946 the period of military administration came to an end, and the Straits Settlements were dissolved. Penang and Malacca became part of the Malayan Union (and in 1948, the Federation of Malaya). Singapore was declared a Crown Colony.

Elections were held in Singapore for the first time in 1948. However, barely three months after the elections, groups of Communist Malays revolted against British occupation demanding self-government. The British took strong measures and suppressed the Communists. In 1953 limited autonomy was attained, which stipulated that the British would be responsible only for matters pertaining to foreign affairs and security.

In 1954 Singapore agitated for independence, and the People's Action Party (PAP) was formed under Lee Kuan Yew (b. 1923). In 1959 Singapore became self-governing. However, foreign affairs and defense were still handled by the British. Lee became the prime minister of Singapore. In 1963 Singapore merged with Malaya to form Malaysia, but after two years of strife and political tensions, it separated from Malaysia and became an independent nation in August 1965.

The government made efforts to strengthen the industrial sector of Singapore, and reforms were passed to attract foreign investment. By the 1980s Singapore was world renowned for shipping, air transport, and oil refining. Although the economic depression in the Southeast Asian countries in the late 1990s affected the economy of Singapore as well, the economy is bouncing back and is well on its way to regaining stability.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Singapore is a diamond-shaped country situated in the narrow point of the Strait of Malacca. It consists of a group of islands, one large one and 50 small ones. The country is connected to the mainland of Malaysia by causeways. Most of the terrain of Singapore is low lying. At 538 feet Bukit Timah, located in the central region, is the highest point in Singapore.

Singapore enjoys a tropical climate year-round. The temperatures range from 74°F to 93°F; the lowest temperature ever recorded was 69°F. The mostly pleasant temperatures are offset by the typically high humidity, around 90 percent. Rainfall is common all year round but is heaviest from November to January.

❁ ECONOMY

Singapore boasts a highly developed free-market economy. The nation depends heavily on exports, especially electronics and manufacturing. Major industries include electronics, petroleum refining and petrochemicals, machinery, shipbuilding, and ship repair. Singapore imports machinery and electronic components, chemicals, fuels, and foodstuffs. The nation shares cordial trade relations with the United States, Japan, Malaysia, and the members of the European Union (EU).

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The population of Singapore is a mix of Malay, Chinese, Indian, and Arab immigrants. There also exists a community called Peranakan, a mix of people of Chinese and Malay descent. With such a diversity of inhabitants, the culture of Singapore is very rich and cosmopolitan.

Officially Singaporean English is based on British English, and the local dialect is commonly called Singlish. It is quite similar to Manglish, the English dialect of Malaysia. In addition to their mother tongue, children learn English in school.

Due to its diverse population, Singapore has many ethnic localities like Little India and Chinatown. Although the population is not uniformly distributed in such neighborhoods, these areas do adhere to the culture of their forebears. In Little India one can enjoy Indian cuisine, and the atmosphere on the streets will make one feel as if one is in India.

The settlements along the Singapore River are the most modern part of Singapore and are full of commercial buildings. Theaters on the Bay, a center for the performing arts, is the cultural hub of Singapore.

Singaporeans celebrate a variety of festivals related to their respective religions. The Chinese are largely followers of Buddhism and Shenism, while the Malays are mostly Muslims.

❁ CUISINE

Singapore is often called the food capital of Asia. The country draws on a wide variety of cuisines—Chinese, Indian, Malay, Indonesian, and Western. A popular type of cooking is called nonya, which uses a blend of Chinese and Malay food.

Coconut milk, used extensively in the preparation of Malay and Indonesian dishes, is the basis of most dishes containing vegetables, fish, beef, or prawns. These are served with white rice.

Of the Asian delicacies, Korean bulgog, thinly sliced beef marinated in soy sauce, garlic, and sesame, then grilled, is very popular. Chinese dim sum (steamed or fried dumplings stuffed with meat, seafood, or vegetables) are widely eaten for lunch. Indian cuisine is also quite popular in Singapore, due to its spicy flavors.

At home Singaporeans usually place dishes in the center of the table so that everyone around the table can help themselves. While Chinese families eat together, in Muslim Malay families the women eat after the men.

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

✿ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

✿ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Singaporeans observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion.

In Singapore, Catholics fast on Good Friday and perform a ritual called the Stations of the Cross, a reenactment of Jesus' final journey carrying his Cross to Calvary.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

Among Singaporean Christians the entire family gathers together to celebrate Easter, which is marked by feasting and exchanging greetings and Easter eggs. Children receive specially decorated chocolate Easter eggs from their parents and grandparents.

❁ DIWALI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: October or November

Diwali, also called Deepavali or Divali, is the Hindu Festival of Lights. It starts on the night of the new Moon in October or November and lasts for five days. On the Hindu calendar, it occurs from the 13th day of the waning half (Krishna Paksha) of the seventh lunar month Asvina to the second day of the waxing half (Shukla Paksha) of Karttika, the eighth month. It celebrates the victory of light over darkness and of good over evil. In northern India the first Diwali was celebrated to commemorate the triumphant return of King Rama of Ayodhya (the seventh manifestation of Vishnu, the Protector), Sita (his wife), and his brother Lakshmana to the capital city Ayodhya, after 14 years of exile. During the exile Lord Rama had vanquished the demon Ravana, the king of Sri Lanka. As night had already fallen before the arrival of the royal trio, the people, delighted to have their king back in their midst, lit clay lamps along the way to dispel the darkness and light up their path. It also signifies the commencement of the Hindu New Year.

Singaporeans believe that departed souls come to visit their relatives during this time of year. Rows of tiny earthen oil lamps are lit to guide these souls on their return journey to the next world. Diwali is one of the main festivals of Singapore and is celebrated on a large scale.

Traditionally, oil lamps are also lit to decorate Singaporean Hindu homes. Temples and streets are also lit up with elaborate lighting arrangements during this festival. Special delicacies and sweets are prepared in Hindu homes to celebrate this occasion.

Rites of Passage

In Singapore many couples opt to have two ceremonies: a civil ceremony as well as a traditional wedding. Arranged marriages are very common and so are interracial marriages since Singaporeans are of many different races.

Malay weddings in Singapore are elaborate. Prior to the wedding, the parents of the boy and the girl meet to decide the amount of the dowry that will be given to the bride. Before the wedding, the bride's hands and feet are decorated with henna. On the day of the marriage a religious official from the court, called a kadhi, presides over the ceremony. The bride's father gives a small amount of money to the groom to symbolize the sealing the marriage. There must be at least three witnesses present at the time the vows are solemnized. After the wedding, the guests are invited to a large meal, and a lively and informal party.

❁ DEATH

Among the Chinese population of Singapore, burying the dead is taken very seriously. It is believed that, if the funeral arrangements are not properly made, ill fortune will befall the family of the deceased.

In the Christian community a church service is usually held. Biblical verses are read and prayers said. The head of the church presides over the ceremony. After the ceremony, many Christians in Singapore are cremated these days since there is an acute shortage of land for burial. However, in case of burial, the family members go to the graveyard and pay their final respects before the burial takes place.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

In the fifth century B.C.E., ethnic Slavic tribes occupied the present-day state of Slovakia. King Samo (d. 658) was the first known Slavic ruler. He was the founder of what came to be known as King Samo's Empire (623–58), which ruled over the region around the seventh century C.E. King Samo was a merchant, a Frank born in the Senonian country (Senonago) of France. His empire, while the first known organized community of the Slavs, was more a kind of supra-tribal union, not a true nation-state.

His descendants increased their territory and controlled Slovakia, Moravia, and major parts of modern-day Austria, known then as Great Moravia. They ruled the region between the eighth and tenth centuries. King Svatopluk I (c. 830–94) was the most powerful king of the empire, and it was he who brought Saints Cyril and Methodius to Great Moravia to preach Christianity in the Slavic language.

After Svatopluk's death the empire was divided among his sons, and in 907 Hungary attacked Great Moravia and established its domination in the region. Between the 11th and 14th centuries, Slovakia remained an integral part of the Kingdom of Hungary. In the early 16th century, the onslaught of the Ottoman Turks against the Kingdom of Hungary shook the entire realm, and the Hungarian forces fought a series of battles. Hungary was forced to shift its capital from Budapest to Bratislava in Slovakia. In the end Hungary successfully defeated the Ottoman Turks and had expelled them from the Hungarian region by 1686.

After the establishment of the dual monarchy and the formation of the Austro-Hungarian Empire by the Ausgleich (compromise) during the period of 1867–1918, Slovakia underwent brutal oppression as Hungary imposed its way of life on the Slovaks, and the entire region was under its sway. Only the Hungarian language was taught in schools and used in businesses, and the use of the Slovak language was totally banned. During this period Slovaks developed close ties with the Czechs, who were facing a similar fate under Austrian domination.

After the defeat of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in World War I, in October 1918 Slovakia declared its independence, and with Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia, joined the independent Republic of Czechoslovakia (formed on May 1, 1918), and Prague was declared its capital city. However, there were growing disparities related to religion, government policies, and style of governance between the Czechs, who were a majority, and the Slovaks, who were clearly outnumbered.

Eventually on March 14, 1939, Slovakia declared its independence from Czechoslovakia, but the government formed in Slovakia became a puppet controlled by Nazi Germany, and Slovakia declared its alliance with Germany in World War II. In 1944 after its government allowed the willful occupation of Slovakia by Nazi forces, more than 60,000 Slovaks fought against the government and Nazi forces in August 1944, and this came to be known as the Slovak National Uprising. The uprising was brutally crushed by German forces, but it failed to dampen the people's desire to be completely independent.

After the defeat of German forces in World War II and the liberation of Prague in 1945, Slovakia once again decided to be part of Czechoslovakia but enjoyed an autonomous status. Elections held in 1946 brought a Communist regime to power. However, in 1968 when the government decided to introduce some liberal political reforms in the country, the Soviet Union invaded Czechoslovakia in August of that year and appointed a staunch Soviet-supporting Slovak, Gustav Husak (1913–91), to lead the nation.

There was growing discontent among people in the Czech Republic and Slovakia against the Communist government because of widespread human rights violations. On November 17, 1989, students protested against the Soviet Union and the Communist government in the country, which marked the beginning of the Velvet Revolution and the end of Czechoslovakia.

In 1990 the first free and fair elections were held in Czechoslovakia, and the issue of Slovakian autonomy became a major hurdle. However, in 1992, the Czechs and Slovaks peacefully agreed to the division of Czechoslovakia and on January 1, 1993, the independent state of Slovakia was established. Vladimír Mečiar (b. 1942), a prominent Slovakian politician, was sworn in as the first prime minister of Slovakia.

Due to sound economic and fiscal policies, Slovakia has become a stable economy and one of the most preferred foreign investment destinations among international investors. Slovakia is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and European Union (EU).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Central Europe, Slovakia is a landlocked country flanked by Poland, Austria, Ukraine, the Czech Republic, and Hungary. The country has a rugged and mountainous terrain. While the Carpathian Mountains run through its northern regions, the High Tatra alpine ranges pass through the northeastern parts. The highest point is Gerlachovský štít (Gerlachov Peak), at 8,711 feet high. Lowlands are found in the southern and southwestern parts of Slovakia. The three most important rivers of Slovakia are the Danube, Hron, and Vah.

Slovakia enjoys a temperate climate characterized by cold and cloudy winters and cool summers. During the summer the maximum temperature is 90°F, while in winter the temperature dips as low as 5°F.

In terms of fauna Slovakia is home to minks, wolves, otters, bears, lynxes, marmots, geese, storks, pheasants, ducks, eagles, and vultures. Extensive forests of mainly beech and spruce trees represent the major flora.

ECONOMY

Slovakia has a stable economy. Foreign investors, especially Germans, consider Slovakia to be one of the safest places to make investments. Due to good economic policies and sound fiscal reforms introduced by the government, Slovakia has completed its transformation from a centrally planned economy to a modern and liberal economy. Privatization of banking and other sectors, business-friendly policies, development of the infrastructure, and increased foreign investment have all provided a boost to the economy.

On May 1, 2004, Slovakia became a member of the EU.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Slovakia is an ethnically diverse nation. Although ethnic Slovaks are the dominant group, the country

Velvet Revolution

The days after the November 17, 1989, demonstration have come to be known as the Velvet Revolution because there were no casualties or major bloodshed. It ended almost 42 years of Communist rule peacefully, and once again there was a call to reform politics and return to a democratic form of government. The Slovak nationalist movement arose toward the end of 1991, demanding independence for Slovakia. When it became clear that the general elections of June 1992 could not solve the problems of the two republics, Czech and Slovak leaders decided to split their states into two fully independent nations. On January 1, 1993, the Czechoslovakian Federation was dissolved, and two separate independent countries were born: the Czech Republic and Slovakia. The phrase velvet divorce was widely used in the media to describe the separation of Czechoslovakia into two independent countries.

is also home to Czechs, Moravians, Hungarians, and Roma (Gypsies), Silesian, Ukrainian, Ruthenian, German, and Polish ethnic groups as well. Slovak is the national language of Slovakia although the Hungarian language is also spoken in different areas. A predominantly Christian society, approximately 60 percent of the nation's population is Roman Catholic. Slovakia is also home to Protestants, Orthodox Christians, and atheists.

Traditional musical instruments include gajdy (bagpipes), konkavka (shepherd's flute), and fujara (flute). Although folk music is popular in Slovakia, the younger generation prefers Western pop, reggae, jazz, punk, rock, and rap. Also Slovakian music is immensely influenced by Hungarian music, and a Hungarian folk dance music known as czardas is extremely popular. In the countryside this dance is performed by the Roma men and women, wearing wide red skirts; as they whirl to the tune of this fast tempo music, their skirts take distinctive shapes.

CUISINE

Some of the traditional Slovakian dishes are polievka (bean soup), kapustinica (cabbage soup), smoked pork, potatoes or rice with a thick sauce, cheese, which is often fried, goulash (meat stew), fried bacon, fried (grilled or skewered) chicken, halusky (potato dumplings with sheep cheese on top), fried turkey stuffed with ham, salad, omelets, and bread. Caraway seed, bacon, and lots of salt are the preferred flavorings.

Slovakians have a sweet tooth, and some of their desserts are palacinky (crepes), with the most popular being chocolate crepes and sweetened noodles sprinkled with poppy seeds and melted butter.

Wine is the preferred beverage of Slovakia, with wine from the Tojak region near the Hungarian border being a favorite.

SLOVAK REPUBLIC ESTABLISHMENT DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the year on the Gregorian calendar marks a double celebration in Slovakia since it is both the anniversary of the establishment of the Slovak Republic and New Year's. For this reason the day is celebrated as Slovak Republic Establishment Day. It was on January 1, 1993, that the independent Slovak Republic (or Slovakia—both are correct) came into existence after the former state of Czechoslovakia was dissolved and divided into the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic.

On this day elaborate celebrations are organized all across the country, and a patriotic fervor grips the nation. Presidential and official speeches, military parades, and cultural programs are the main highlights of the celebrations. People greet each other on this historic occasion and also share New Year's Day greetings.

Parties are also held on New Year's Eve in different parts of the country and people usher in the new year with great joy and enthusiasm. On New Year's Day, people eat pork and lentils for good luck and prosperity in the coming year. It is considered bad luck to consume fish or poultry on this day because it is believed that one's good luck will swim away if one eats fish and fly away if one eats poultry.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest celebrations of May Day are ascribed to the pagan rituals that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, conflicting opinions exist about the origins of the occasion. The most plausible origin is 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Slovakia, rallies and demonstrations are organized by trade unions in the country, and workers turn out in large numbers, expressing solidarity with the unions. Many Slovaks spend the May Day holiday at their weekend homes.

LIBERATION OF THE REPUBLIC

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 8

This day commemorates the victory of the Allies over Nazi Germany and the end of World War II on May 8, 1945. Earlier, like the Soviet Union, Slovakia too celebrated Victory Day on May 9, but after the establishment of the Slovakia Republic in 1992, the date of the holiday was changed to May 8 to conform to the celebrations in most of the Western countries.

It was on May 8, 1945, that Soviet troops entered Prague (part of former Czechoslovakia and the capital of the Czech Republic) and liberated the city from Nazi occupation. On this day special memorial services are held throughout Slovakia in memory of all those soldiers and victims who lost their lives during World War II. Also the president and other dignitaries lay floral wreaths at the war memorials and participate in grand celebrations to commemorate this historic victory. Slovakia has also declared Liberation of the Republic or Victory Day as the country's national day to honor those Slovaks who fought alongside Soviet forces against Germany and helped liberate the country.

❁ SLOVAK NATIONAL UPRISING DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 29

This day commemorates the historic uprising launched by the Slovaks in Czechoslovakia against the government that favored Germany and had allowed the occupation of Slovakia by Nazi forces in 1944. After the occupation was announced, the Slovaks formed a rebel Czechoslovak armed force and fought against the occupying German forces. Although Germany crushed the uprising, the valiant effort of the Slovaks to defend their country against foreign occupation inspired other Slovaks to continue their struggle against injustice and also inspired them to fight for their liberty and sovereignty.

On this day special prayer services are held in different parts of Slovakia, and people pay homage to those valiant heroes who laid down their lives for the freedom of Slovakia.

❁ FREEDOM AND DEMOCRACY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 17

This day commemorates the anti-Nazi demonstrations held on November 17, 1939, in which nine Czechoslovaks were killed by occupying German forces as well as the anti-Communist demonstrations held on November 17, 1989, in the capital city of Prague.

On November 17, 1989, the peaceful demonstrators protesting against the corrupt Communist government in Czechoslovakia were brutally injured by the police who wanted to silence the voices of democracy and dissent against Communism. This historic event paved the way for widespread demonstrations in the country against the oppressive Communist regime and also marked the beginning of the end of Communist Czechoslovakia. The days after November 17 came to be known as the Velvet Revolution.

On this day, people participate in special prayer services in local churches that are organized in memory of all those brave students who lost their lives at the hands of Nazi forces (1939) and Communist forces (1989).

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

The Feast of the Epiphany is a Christian feast that celebrates the birth of Jesus, the arrival of the Three Wise Men (or Magi, members of the priestly caste of ancient Persia: Caspar, Balthazar, and Melchior) in Bethlehem to see the infant, as well as the life of Jesus until his baptism in the Jordan River by John the Baptist. The word epiphany means “to reveal” or “to make known” and is used to name this day because it was the Magi who revealed Jesus’ birth to the world.

On this day in many towns and villages throughout Slovakia, three young children, dressed as the Magi, visit every home in the village and, with chalk blessed by the local priest, they write C+B+M (the initials for Caspar, Balthazar, and Melchior) on the doors. Slovaks believe that writing the initials of the Magi will protect the home and its inhabitants from any evil throughout the year. It is the custom to leave the letters in chalk until they are replaced by fresh writing on the next Epiphany. The Christmas tree is also taken down on Epiphany.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus’ mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus’ journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some Slovaks observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Special prayer services are held on this day with readings from the Gospel narrating the events leading up to the Crucifixion. In Slovakia on Good Friday people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals.

Slovaks attend the Easter Midnight Service on Holy Saturday, which continues until the early morning of Easter. In accordance with tradition the entire community walks three times around the church tree with the cross bearer, the priest, and the choir leading the way. This is done in honor of the three women who are believed to have been the first ones to come in search of Christ's tomb. Readings from the Bible follow, and the priest announces Christ's Resurrection.

After Easter Mass a blessing of Catholic Easter baskets takes place in which the priest blesses the food to be eaten during the holiday. People go to the graves of their deceased relatives and symbolically share the Easter food with them. Celebrations in the form of singing, dancing, exchanging Easter eggs, and feasting on the Easter meal that consists of mazanec (a sweet loaf of bread with almonds and raisins) and roasted lamb takes place. Decorating kraslice (Easter eggs) is an ancient Slovakian tradition and is still observed today.

EASTER MONDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Monday after Easter

Easter Monday falls on the first Monday after Lent. Easter Monday is also known as Sprinkling Day in Slovakia, because young men and boys are welcomed on this day, and they are free to pour water on young maidens and married women alike.

Easter Monday is also celebrated as the day of pomlázka, or willow branch whip (withies), a ritual that goes back to the pagan era and involved the whipping of women, girls, and livestock by men with bundles of eight, twelve, or even twenty-four withies. The purpose was to chase away evil and bad spirits and ensure a healthy, prosperous, and fertile year ahead. The whipped girl gives a colored egg to the boy or man as a sign of her thanks and forgiveness.

❁ ST. CYRIL AND ST. METHDIUS DAY

Observed by: Greek Orthodox

Observed on: July 5

This day marks the arrival of the brothers Saints Cyril and Methodius to Great Moravia on July 5, 863. Saints Cyril and Methodius were brothers and devout Christians who belonged to a renowned family in Thessalonica. As instructed by St. Ignatius, they began spreading Christianity and the Slavonic language in the Slavic countries, including Bulgaria and Greater Moravia. Prince Borivoj I (852/853–88/89) of the Premysl Dynasty was introduced to Christianity by St. Methodius, who was the bishop of Great Moravia (Moravia) in 874 C.E.

It is believed that St. Cyril invented the Glagolitic alphabet, which had 38 letters (24 letters resemble those used in the Greek language). Both the brothers began teaching the Slavonic language in the region. Many believe that St. Cyril's disciple St. Clement of Ohrid (ca. 840–916) simplified the Glagolitic alphabet and created the Cyrillic alphabet, naming it so in honor of his teacher. Disciples of these saints spread the use of Slavonic languages in other Slavic countries too.

The late Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) declared brothers St. Cyril and St. Methodius copatrons of Europe on December 31, 1980. On this day special prayer services take place in churches throughout Slovakia, and people offer prayers in honor of these patron saints.

❁ OUR LADY OF SORROWS

Observed on: September 15

The feast of Our Lady of Sorrows, Stabat Mater Dolorosa, is observed on September 15, set there in 1913 by Pope Pius X (r. 1903–14). Earlier this feast (which began in 1239) was observed on the last Friday before Palm Sunday, the date Pope Benedict XIII (r. 1724–30) had specified when adding it to Roman calendar in 1727.

Our Lady Mary of Sorrows is the patron saint of Slovakia, and big celebrations take place on this day. Churches throughout the country hold wakes to pay homage to Mary, and people attend special services organized in her honor. They pray to their patron saint to protect them against evil and reiterate their commitment to lead lives without sin.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Christian feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown). It is an annual religious celebration that takes place on November 1. It is believed that All Saints' Day celebrations began after the consecration of the Pantheon at Rome to the Blessed Virgin by Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15). The Feast of All Saints' Day has been celebrated on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne (742–814).

On All Saints' Day Slovaks visit the graves of their deceased relatives in cemeteries and offer flowers and candles at the grave. They also symbolically share a meal with them and relive memories of their loved ones.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world and falls on December 25 every year, the date selected by the Roman Catholic Church to mark the birth of Jesus. In Slovakia Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24), and last until St. Stephen's Day, December 26.

Many Slovaks fast until 6 or 7 P.M. on Christmas Eve, and the day is mainly reserved for decorating the Christmas tree with ribbons, balls, and other adornments. Presents are neatly laid under the tree along with figurines that portray the Nativity (birth of Jesus). According to custom, the Christmas tree is not to be seen by other family members until after dinner, so generally one of the parents decorates the tree, while the other takes the children skating or to enjoy some other activity. The Christmas meal mainly consists of carp (for good luck), potato salad, cabbage soup, garlic (to ward off evil), and opekance (dough with poppy seeds and almonds).

After dinner children are told that infant Jesus, known as Ježisek in Slovakia, has arrived at their homes. Then they are led to the Christmas tree, where they are allowed to open their gifts and feast on Christmas cookies, fruits, and candies. Christmas carolers also visit homes and sing carols. Later Catholic families attend Midnight Mass in their local churches.

On Christmas day Slovaks invite friends and family members over to share Christmas dinner and spend the day singing Christmas carols.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

During her pregnancy and for six weeks after childbirth, a Slovak woman is considered marime (unclean), so a child should not be born at home, lest it become impure. All children are born in hospitals.

Immediately after the birth of a child, the mother performs certain rituals. This involves wrapping the child in a piece of cloth and putting some paternal blood on it. Some Slovaks wrap the child in a piece of clothing that belongs to the father. In another interesting ritual, the mother places the child on the floor, and the father picks it up (thereby acknowledging that the child is his) and ties a red string around its neck.

In Slovakian weddings, before the couple exchanges wedding vows, an infant is placed on their bed to bless them with children in the future. Also the bride is given three covered dishes: the first one contains wheat, a symbol of fertility; millet mixed with ash is in the second dish, so the bride has to sift through the mixture in order to display her patience; and the third dish contains a sparrow hidden under the lid for good luck.

The wedding ceremony takes place in a local chapel in the presence of friends and family members. After the wedding the bride changes her wedding veil and puts on a matron's bonnet, thus completing her transformation from a single woman to a married one. Traditional Slovakian songs are sung, and this ritual is followed by a big reception. Singing, dancing, dining, and rituals are an integral part of the reception.

As is customary the bride has to cover her head with a handkerchief and, taking up a broom, has to sweep the area near the reception hall to the tune of a polka, a lively dance that originated in Bohemia and spread to many countries in the region.

❁ DEATH

In Slovakia after a death has occurred, the body of the deceased is kept in his or her house, then taken to the house of grief, where the body is preserved until the funeral service. Among the Roma, the deceased are dressed in new clothes, placed in expensive coffins, and buried along with wine bottles inside the coffin.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The earliest inhabitants of present-day Slovenia are believed to have been Illyrians and Celtic tribes. In the sixth century C.E., ancestors of the Slovenians settled in the area. The region became a part of the Holy Roman Empire in the ninth century, with the Habsburgs of Austria gaining control of the region in the 14th century. Eventually when the Austro-Hungarian Empire collapsed after World War I, Slovenia declared its independence. On December 4, 1918, it joined the kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, which was renamed the Kingdom of Yugoslavia in 1929.

During World War II Germany annexed Yugoslavia and subsequently Slovenia was divided among Germany, Italy, and Hungary. The Slovenians resisted and fought against the invaders. Finally Slovenia joined the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1945.

Since 1945 Slovenia had been a constituent republic of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia led by Josip Broz Tito (1943–80). While Yugoslavia remained Communist after Tito's death, Slovenia decided to embrace democracy and pressed for autonomy. In September 1989 it expressed its desire to separate, and by making an amendment to the constitution of Slovenia the General Assembly of the Yugoslav Republic of Slovenia declared the country's right to secede from Yugoslavia. In December 1990 a referendum was held in which people voted overwhelmingly in favor of independence, and on June 25, 1991, Slovenia declared its independence. A 10-day bloodless war between the Slovenian armed forces and the Yugoslav People's Army followed. Eventually after the Slovenians made their intentions clear by stiff resistance to threats and coercion, the Yugoslav forces peacefully withdrew to Belgrade.

The European community recognized Slovenia's independence in 1992, and Slovenia joined the European Union (EU) as well as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in 2004.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in Central Europe, Slovenia shares its boundaries with Austria, Croatia, Hungary, Italy, and the Gulf of Venice. Within Slovenia four major European geographical regions converge, namely: the Dinaric area (also known as the Dinaric Alps or Dinarides; a chain of mountains), the Alps, the Mediterranean Sea, and the Pannonian Plains. Triglav is the highest peak in Slovenia at 9,396 feet. Some of the prominent rivers in Slovenia include the Krka, the Mura, the Sava, the Drava, the Soca, and the Kolpa.

Climatic conditions in Slovenia vary from region to region. The coastal region enjoys a Mediterranean climate characterized by warm summers and cold winters. The mountains enjoy Alpine weather, moderately warm summers and cold winters. The eastern parts of the country enjoy continental weather—hot summers and cold winters. The average temperature during winter is 28°F and during summer the average temperature is only 70°F.

Almost half the Slovenian territory is covered with forest, and it is the third most forested European country after Finland and Sweden. Slovenia is home to more than 2,900 species of plants.

The Slovenian region of Kras (Karst in English) on the Kras plateau refers to a limestone region with sinks, underground streams, and caverns. The Karst

Olm: The Human Fish

Olm or Proteus (Proteus anguinus), or the human fish, is an endemic amphibian creature found in the Kras region of Slovenia. It is referred to as the “human” fish due to its light coloring. It is between 10 and 12 inches long, is pink or white in color, has external gills, three toes on the forelegs, and two toes on the hind legs. Its eyes are covered by skin, a degenerative effect of its subterranean lifestyle.

One of the common myths associated with the olm is that, when placed in daylight or in water where the temperature is 50°F above that of its natural habitat, the olm dies. However, in reality the olm can live in water with temperatures up to 86° F. When exposed to light, the olm changes its color to black or brown; when placed in darkness its color changes back to pale white or pink.

caves are home to one of the most mysterious creatures in the world the olm (Proteus anguinus), also known as the “human fish.” Boar, deer, bear, chamois (an extremely agile goat antelope, rupicapra), hedgehog, lynx, moor tortoise, and scarab beetle are among the more common fauna.

ECONOMY

Slovenia enjoys a stable economy with a high standard of living. Among all the former Communist European nations of the world, Slovenia enjoys the highest gross domestic product (GDP).

Growth-centered economic and fiscal policies of the government have succeeded in privatizing banking, telecommunications, and public utility systems and encouraged direct foreign investments.

Some of the major export items of Slovenia include machinery and transport equipment, food, chemicals, and manufactured goods. Its important trading partners include Croatia, Austria, Italy, Bosnia and Herzegovina, France, and Germany.

Slovenia became a member of the European Union on May 1, 2004 and is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the Council of Europe, an international organization of 46 European nations.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Slovenia is a predominantly Christian society, and about 58 percent of the nation's population is Roman Catholic. However, religious tolerance is a major highlight of Slovenia, and people of different faiths are all free to practice their religion. In terms of ethnicity, Slovenes are the dominant ethnic group but Slovenia is also home to minorities of Hungarians, Croats, Serbs, Bosniaks, and other ethnic groups. Slovenian is the official language of Slovenia although Serbo-Croatian languages are also spoken in some regions.

In Slovenian literature the most renowned personality is France Preseren (1800–49), a renowned Slovenian poet whose work was acclaimed all over Europe. (His name is sometimes germanized as “Franz Prescheren,” especially in older documents from the time Slovenia was ruled by Austria.) His poetry spoke of Slovenian culture, and his poems aroused national consciousness among the Slovenians. His work, “Zdravljica” (“A Toast”), is the national anthem of Slovenia.

Slovenia is home to the most renowned Slovene architect Joze Plecnik (1872–1957), who is considered to be the pioneer of modern European and Slovene architecture.

Folk music is an integral part of Slovenian culture and includes rural harmonic singing, a type of jazz orchestra music known as velike goslarije, and music played with traditional panpipes. The younger generation in Slovenia prefers punk and pop music.

❁ CUISINE

Slovenian cuisine is heavily influenced by its neighboring countries. Also Slovenia offers a wide variety of traditional dishes based on venison (edible flesh of a game animal, especially deer), fish, and dumplings. Some of the most popular dishes include: potica (pastries), krofci (marmalade doughnuts), rizota (risotto), paprikas (beef or chicken stew), golaz (goulash), njoki (potato dumplings), klobasa (sausage), and struklji (cheese dumplings). Vegetables, cheese, buttermilk, yogurt, and butter are also part of the Slovenian diet.

Slovenia is known for its “slow food culture,” and a traditional Slovenian meal spans eight to twelve courses, often with a different wine served as an accompaniment to each course. Wine and beer are the preferred beverages in Slovenia.

Ancient Music

With the discovery of several broken Neolithic instruments in Divje Babe, a cave in Slovenia, the music of a prehistoric flute has been heard after lying in silence for 50,000 years. These flutes, made with only two holes, are believed to be the world’s oldest musical instruments. Carved from the leg bones of bears, they were unearthed along with Neanderthal tools and an ancient fireplace. A musician–archaeologist reconstructed the flute using a genuine 50,000-year-old bear bone. Some have suggested that Neanderthal males used music to charm women, but the flutes might also have been used to hunt birds or to accompany dancing.

long ago as 1945 Slovenia designated the poet’s death anniversary as Slovene Culture Day in recognition of his invaluable contribution to Slovenian culture. In 1991 the government of Slovenia adopted his poem “Zdravljica” (“A Toast”) as the national anthem. The government has also instituted scholarships in honor of the great poet.

On this day art and cultural activities are organized all over the country, and special readings of Preseren’s poems take place. Even in small towns and villages, a wide variety of cultural programs take place that include folk dances, folk songs, and folk theater. Also artists and literary figures who have made outstanding contributions to Slovenian culture receive the prestigious Preseren Award. It is the highest award in the cultural field in Slovenia.

❁ CELEBRATION OF THE UPRISING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 27

Celebration of the Uprising Day, also called Resistance Day, commemorates the historic uprising of the Slovenian people on April 27, 1941, against the occupying German forces. Although the uprising was brutally crushed by the Nazis, the act of a few brave men and women who dared to fight against unjust forces and knowingly risked their lives inspired millions of Slovenians to fight for the nation’s liberation.

On this day people pay homage to those brave Slovenians who lost their lives fighting against oppression, and prayer services are held in honor of those freedom fighters. State officials observe this day by delivering commemorative speeches emphasizing its importance and acknowledging the determination and valor of all Slovenians.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1–2

Fun Fact

When Slovenia was a part of Yugoslavia, although Slovenes represented only 8 percent of Yugoslavia's population, Slovenian exports constituted one-third of its total exports.

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day (depending on the country), in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. Although the earliest celebrations of May Day are ascribed to the pagan rituals practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, the political character of the day began in 1889. The Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated

May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Slovenia May Day celebrations last for two days, May 1 and May 2. During May Day celebrations, the president of Slovenia presides over rallies in the capital city of Ljubljana. In his speech he emphasizes the important role of workers in modern society and recognizes their role in shaping the Slovenian and world economy. Military parades are an integral part of these celebrations. Politicians also participate in the rallies and demonstrations organized by trade unions.

In the evening traditional bonfire parties, known as kresovanje, are held throughout the country. Drinking beer and feasting are the major highlights of the celebrations. Musical concerts are also organized on both days.

Proclamation Day commemorates the declaration of independence of Slovenia from the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on June 25, 1991. On this day celebrations take place throughout the country, and the president of Slovenia presides over the elaborate Independence Day events in the capital city of Ljubljana. Celebrations begin at Republic Square (Trg Republike) in Ljubljana, where the official declaration of independence was made in 1991. Two of the symbols of that historic day include the first flagpole to bear the Slovenian national flag and the national tree of Slovenia, the linden, which was planted there on June 25, 1991.

A guard-of-honor ceremony takes place, and the president pays tribute to the armed forces and police as they march by, followed by his or her speech. A wide variety of cultural and theatrical performances as well as art exhibitions, reflective of the rich cultural heritage of Slovenia, also take place later in the day.

✿ INDEPENDENCE DAY

The Slovenian government decided to celebrate this historic day as Slovenia's Independence Day. On this day a special session is held in the Slovenian parliament, followed by a ceremonial speech by the prime minister. A host of cultural programs are held at the Cankarjev Dom Arts and Conference Center. Celebrations are also organized throughout the country, and people enthusiastically sing patriotic songs.

✿ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago. Some devout Slovenian Catholics observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent), for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Others, however, fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. On Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings. There is no Communion on this somber day.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Catholics.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason, it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus in Slovenia.

Slovenians often buy new clothes for this special day and Catholics attend a special celebratory Easter Mass. On Easter the entire family gathers for a traditional Easter meal that includes ham, potica (nut cake), Easter eggs, horseradish, bread, and other regional specialties.

Pirhi, decorated Easter eggs, an ancient pagan symbol of rebirth and spring's promise of fertility and renewal, are an integral part of Easter celebrations in Slovenia. A week before Easter young girls and women decorate the Easter eggs with beautiful designs and adornments.

On both Easter Sunday and Easter Monday, Slovenians play a wide variety of games with Easter eggs. The most popular game involves an egg-fight between two people in which each one has to break the opponent's egg in order to win.

Some Christian fundamentalists reject the Western customs associated with Easter, believing them to be irretrievably tainted with paganism and idolatry. Others, like the Church of God, say they follow a more primitive form of Christianity, and keep a Christian Passover that lacks many of the practices or symbols associated with Easter and is closer to the Jewish observance of Passover (Pesach).

Easter Eggs and Slovenian Beliefs

A number of superstitious beliefs are associated with Easter eggs. In the southern and northeastern parts of Slovenia peasants make a circle with decorated Easter eggs because they believe it will bring good luck. In many parts of the country Easter eggs are fed to hens because people believe that this will cause them to lay more eggs. While some Slovenians stick eggshells on the ceilings to drive cockroaches away, Styrian (from Styria Province in Austria) Slovenians scatter Easter eggshells around their homes to keep snakes away.

Fun Fact

In Anglo-Saxon, Eostre (Easter) was the goddess of the dawn, whose festival was observed at the vernal equinox. Her festival is believed to be the source of the tradition of including bunnies, chicks, and Easter eggs in the celebration of this holiday.

✿ PENTECOST

Pentecost Sunday, also called Whitsunday, takes its name from the Greek word pentékosté, which means “the fiftieth.” Pentecost takes place 50 days after Easter and celebrates the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles. Some scholars believe that many of the traditions and celebrations associated with this holiday were borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring.

The Feast of the Assumption commemorates the assumption into heaven of Mary, the mother of Jesus. According to one legend, when Mary was on her deathbed, all the Apostles visited her, except St. Thomas, who was delayed. When he did arrive, Mary’s body was nowhere to be found because she had been taken up to heaven. It is believed that her soul and body were united at Jehoshaphat (her tomb) and St. Gabriel took Mary’s them to heaven.

In Slovenia devout Catholics attend their local churches to take part in prayer services and a Mass held in honor of the Virgin Mary.

✿ REFORMATION DAY

Observed on: October 31

This day commemorates the posting of the 95 Theses (written by German theologian Martin Luther, 1483–1546) on the doors of Castle Church at Wittenberg on October 31, 1517. Luther challenged the traditions of the Roman Catholic Church headed by the pope and asked Christians to return to the teachings of the Bible. He led the Protestant Reformation, which aimed to reform the beliefs and practices of the Roman Catholic Church.

Protestants all over the world celebrate this holiday, and red is considered to be the liturgical color of the day. It is symbolic of the Holy Spirit who descended on the Apostles of Christ on Pentecost Sunday. Protestants believe that the same Holy Spirit inspired Luther to nail his theses on the church door and start the Reformation movement.

On this day Protestants in Slovenia attend a memorial service in honor of Martin Luther.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world because it is the day chosen to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe was the son of God. No one knows the actual birth date of Jesus, and dates in all 12 months have been suggested as possibilities.

In ancient times the Slovene tribes (Indo-Europeans who spoke a Slavic dialect) celebrated the birth of a Sun God around December 25 with great festivity (probably on or near December 21, the winter solstice). According to old Slovene beliefs, Dies natalis Solis invicti (the invincible Sun God), dies around winter solstice and is then reborn, an event celebrated as the new year, or the start of a new seasonal crop cycle. But after the advent of Christianity, people began celebrating the birth of Jesus on December 25, as the Catholic Church dictated.

Christmas celebrations in Slovenia include sending greeting cards to loved ones, singing Christmas carols, decorating fir trees, fortune-telling, baking, preparing a loaf with rye, buckwheat, or wheat, and exchanging presents. Slovenians believe the Christmas loaf assumes magical powers and brings strength, health, and energy to those who partake of it. Slovenians believe that carol singers bring good luck in the coming year.

Santa Claus is known as Miklavž in Slovenia, and children believe he gives presents to those children who have been good throughout the year.

The word shrove is the past tense of an archaic English verb, “to shrive,” which means “to absolve someone of his or her sins.” A priest used to be known as the “shriner” (absolver of sins). This holiday also marks the beginning of spring and the end of the winter season.

In Slovenia a riotous atmosphere grips the entire nation as people dress in colorful costumes to celebrate the day before the beginning of the Lent. Krof (a marmalade doughnut) is an integral part of Pust celebrations and is popular among children. In the Cerknica region people dress as witches or monstrous characters and participate in daylong parades.

Children feast on candies, sweets, and sausages and enjoy the fun-filled atmosphere. An integral part of the carnival is kurent—a Pust figure with a long red nose, dressed in a hedgehog skin with a staff in his hand—who, according to Slovenian belief, brings a good harvest and abundant crops in the coming year. It is also believed that kurent drives away the winter and ushers in the beautiful spring weather.

Rites of Passage

✿ DEATH

In ancient times, before the advent of Christianity, after the death of a person the doors and windows of the house were kept open to enable the soul to leave the house. After the family had cremated the body of the deceased, the ashes were kept in an urn, and then the urn was buried. Much later they began burying their dead (with the head facing eastward) along with items of daily use such as food, clothing, drinks, and even some coins. This is because the Slovene tribes believed in the afterlife and transmigration of souls (a kind of reincarnation). Among certain Slovene tribes, there existed a belief that the soul has to cross the “wise sea” (a mythical sea in the afterlife) to reach the underworld. Thus, many tribes either cremated their deceased in boats or buried them in boat-shaped coffins to enable them to undertake the journey successfully in their afterlife.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

According to historians and archaeologists, the earliest inhabitants of the Solomon Islands arrived there from the northwest nearly 30,000 years ago, although an organized society based on agriculture commenced only around 4000 B.C.E. Gradually these people mastered the skill of sailing, as well as crop cultivation and animal husbandry. From that period until 1600 C.E., the ongoing westward migration by Polynesians and the arrival of the Lapita people from the east resulted in the creation of an amalgamation of cultural influences in the region.

Since the main islands were already occupied by Melanesians, the newcomers settled on the smaller isolated islands. For the next 400 years, these outlying areas became the focus of aggression on the part of Tongans and Tokelauans (inhabitants of a group of three atolls in the South Pacific Ocean, about halfway between Hawaii and New Zealand), resulting in a natural fear of intruders and trespassers and making the settlers rather hostile and formidable.

Around this time Spanish explorers based in Peru were scouting around for new lands to conquer. In 1568 Don Alvaro de Mendaña y Neyra (1541–95) led an expedition and chanced upon a large island he called Santa Isabel; he explored other landmasses as well, giving them all Spanish names that remain to this day. Neyra called these islands the Western Islands. By 1570 they were being referred to as Yslas de Salomon (Islands of Solomon). A few years later Neyra and one of his captains made futile attempts to come back to these islands, and their efforts marked the end of Spanish interest in the Pacific.

Due to flawed mapping no other Europeans found these islands for the next 150 years or so. In 1767 British captain

RAMSI

The Regional Assistance Mission to Solomon Islands (RAMSI) is a partnership between the government, the people of the Solomon Islands, and contributing countries of the Pacific region. Eleven countries have contributed manpower and funding for RAMSI: Australia, Cook Islands, Fiji, Kiribati, Nauru, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, Samoa, Tonga, Tuvalu, and Vanuatu.

RAMSI has been operating in the Solomon Islands since July 2003. Much of RAMSI's early work focused on restoring security and law and order, and stabilizing government finances. Now the focus is on restoring the work of government and promoting economic recovery.

RAMSI is helping the government and the people to help themselves. RAMSI's mission is to help the Solomon Islands to grow and develop. RAMSI is creating the conditions for Solomon Islanders to resume control of their country, their lives, and their future. It does not control the government or make decisions on behalf of the Solomon Islands. The parliament, the government, constitutional officeholders, and the public service all remain responsible for exercising their respective functions and are ultimately answerable to the people of the Solomon Islands.

Philip Carteret (1733–96) was the one who rediscovered the Solomon Islands. An influx of British, French, and U.S. explorers, whalers, and traders followed. The indigenous people became hostile and killed any white person they encountered. Gradually, the Solomon Islands became notorious as probably the most inhospitable place in the Pacific, so much so that even the most zealous and eager missionaries preferred to stay away.

During the late 19th century Britain signed land deals with Germany and gained control of the island group, renaming it the British Solomon Islands Protectorate. The first resident commissioner Charles Morris Woodford remained in charge from 1896 to 1915.

In April 1942 the Japanese captured the Shortland Islands (which were part of the protectorate) before moving on to Tulagi (another island of the group). This island soon turned into a battleground for fierce fighting between the Allies and the Axis powers—the United States and Japan, specifically. Throughout the conflict, the islanders remained loyal to the Allies. Eventually the United States gained the upper hand and slowly retook the islands for the Allies.

After the war, a nationalist, pro-American movement sprang up in the island of Malaita, vehemently opposing British rule. In 1947 and 1948 mass arrests weakened the movement. It finally died out with the withdrawal of the United States in 1950. To quell dissent and unrest further, Britain introduced local government, regional assemblies, and an elected governing council in 1970. In July 1978 the Solomon Islands were granted independence. However, racial unrest led to a state of emergency in June 1999, partly caused by the mass relocation of residents from the island of Malaita to nearby Guadalcanal. It ended in street violence and, finally, a coup in June 2000.

The situation became extremely chaotic, and the islands came close to a state of anarchy: civil servants went unpaid for months and cabinet meetings were held in secret so that local warlords could not interfere with governmental processes. Attempts to use security forces failed, largely because many police and security personnel were associated with one of the rival gangs. In June 2003, the governor general of the Solomon Islands officially requested international help, and an international security contingent of 2,200 police and troops (primarily from Australia and New Zealand, but with representatives from about 20 other Pacific nations) arrived the next month. Civil order was much improved thereafter.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Solomon Islands, a scattered archipelago comprising mountainous islands and low-lying coral atolls, stretches about 900 miles in a southeasterly direction from the Shortland Islands to the Santa Cruz Islands in the South Pacific Ocean. There are six major and 992 smaller islands, atolls, and reefs. The archipelago covers an area of about 249,000 square nautical miles; the land area is 10,985 square miles. The six biggest islands are Choiseul, New Georgia, Santa Isabel, Guadalcanal, Malaita, and Makira. Their common geographical features include thickly forested mountain ranges intersected by deep, narrow valleys. The Marovo Lagoon in the Western Province is the Earth's largest tropical coastal lagoon. The highest point on the islands is Mt. Makarakomburu at a height of 8,028 feet.

The climate of the islands is tropical; the temperatures are never extreme due to cooling winds blowing from the surrounding seas. Daytime temperatures are normally between 77° and 90°F, going down to between 37° and 41°F at night. From April to October, the southeast trade winds blow. The wet season is between November and March.

Some of the birds and animals found here cannot be found anywhere else in the world. Lake Tengganu on Rennell Island supports an exotic freshwater ecosystem, surrounded by the sea, with a

Fun Fact

The Lapita People

The Lapita people were the first to discover the Polynesian Pacific, and there is a single unbroken cultural sequence from their first settlement to modern times. The Lapita were therefore the ancestors of the present Polynesian population of the Solomon Islands. In addition, the chronology of the Lapita sites between the Bismarck Archipelago in the west and Tonga and Samoa in the east shows that the Lapita people expanded into the Pacific from west to east. This means that the ancestors of the Polynesians originally came from somewhere on the Asian coast, setting out on colonizing voyages from Indonesia about between 3,000 and 4,000 years ago.

plethora of bird life, including some unique parrot species and jungle fowl. Other fauna include wild pigs, huge rats, lizards, snakes, turtles, and crocodiles, many kinds of fish, sharks, dugongs (large gray sea mammals), and whales. Also, there are more than 4,500 plant species (which includes 230 varieties of orchids) on the islands. A good number of these plants and trees are used by residents for building, food, medicine, and clothing.

❁ ECONOMY

The bulk of the population of these islands depends on agriculture, fishing, and forestry for their livelihood. Most manufactured goods and petroleum products are imported. The islands are rich in mineral resources such as lead, zinc, nickel, and gold. Prior to the arrival of the Regional Assistance Mission to the Solomon Islands (RAMSI) from nearby countries, severe ethnic violence, the bankruptcy of key businesses, and a nearly empty treasury culminated in economic collapse. RAMSI has restored law and order and introduced a new period of economic stability and moderate growth.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Papuans, Melanesians, and Polynesians live together on the Solomon Islands. Though their languages and customs differ, their music shares many similarities. The islanders are fond of music especially that played on a variety of bamboo pipes. These pipes are played either in sets or singly as wind instruments. Hitting lengths of bamboo with a rubber thong produces sounds ranging from the twang of a ukulele to a double-bass boom. Solo and group vocal music are both popular; these reflect the indelible impact the European missionaries left on the country's choral tradition before abandoning the country due to threats of violence.

Despite the predominance of Christianity, traditional practices are still followed to a great extent, especially by the people living in villages. The traditional decorative crafts and woodcarvings of the Solomon Islands are famous throughout the world. Dances, songs, and stories depicting the past are also highly popular. These are the most common ways to celebrate wars, hunts, and harvests, among other things.

On these islands the term "custom" (kastom) refers to traditional beliefs and land ownership. Some of the islanders believe in various forms of magic. In some parts of Melanesia the people believe that everyone has two souls: One goes to an afterworld located on an island or underground; the other takes various forms and passes into sharks, fish, birds, animals, men, stones and trees. As people age their companions watch for animals or objects that reveal themselves as possible future incarnations. These creatures thus become temporarily sacred, and it is forbidden (taboo) to eat them. Should it happen that nothing presents itself as a possible vehicle for an individual's next incarnation, upon death the person's head is placed in a hollow carved wooden shark and floated out to sea. Then the soul is believed to pass into the first sea creature that approaches it.

In many areas, it is deemed inappropriate for a woman to stand higher than a man, and men must not deliberately place themselves below women. For example a man must not swim under a woman's canoe, or else it may have to be destroyed and a fine paid. Each sex also has its own bathing area in most villages.

Each of the nine provinces of the Solomons has its own Province Day. In the event that the date should fall on a Sunday, the holiday is celebrated on the following Monday.

❁ CUISINE

The island cuisine is tropical, including fresh vegetables, fruit, fish, and limited meats. The latter are mostly imported from Vanuatu since the local meat is not of a very good quality. The best local delicacy is the mud crab. The water from green coconuts, fresh from the tree, is the most popular drink. Some notable dishes include tapioca pudding, a starchy substance extracted from the root of the cassava plant. It is available in several forms including granules, flakes, pellets, flour, or starch. The flour is used as a thickening agent in soups, fruit fillings, glazes, and the like.

Poi is another native dish. It is made from cooked taro root. Taro is grown in tropical areas, and its roots are an important starchy food on the island. Taro roots range in length from about five inches to a foot or more. The root has a nutlike flavor when cooked. It is also extremely easy to digest. It should be noted, however, that some varieties are highly toxic unless thoroughly cooked. The taro plant has large edible leaves that islanders prepare and eat like mustard or turnip greens. The roots are eaten following boiling, frying, or baking.

Poi is made by pounding the taro root into a smooth paste and mixing it with water, the amount of which depends on how the poi is to be served. Since poi is eaten with the fingers, its consistency is measured accordingly and ranges from “one-finger” (the thickest) to “three-finger” (the thinnest). Poi is generally fermented for several days, which gives it a sour, acidic taste. It can be eaten by itself, mixed with milk, or as a condiment for meat and fish.

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' last meal with his Apostles. First Jesus washed their feet; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist—a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

☼ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, alternatively known as Mourning Friday, Sorrowful Friday, or Holy Friday, is a somber day for Roman Catholics and other Christians all over the world and is observed on the Friday before Easter. It commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus more than 2,000 years ago.

Some Solomon Islanders fast from Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent) for 40 days up to Good Friday, and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. On Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings. There is no Holy Communion on this somber occasion.

Good Friday is a public holiday, and all schools, government offices, and banks are closed on this day.

☼ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb and the day before he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. This was the Jewish Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Catholics.

☼ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. For this reason it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter the entire family gathers to celebrate. Solomon Islanders often buy new clothes for this special day and go to a special Easter service to celebrate Jesus' rising from the dead.

In the Solomon Islands people attend midnight prayer services for Easter and celebrate Jesus' resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit envelops churches as people sing devotional hymns. Easter eggs have become associated with this observance because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. Solomon Islanders exchange beautifully decorated Easter eggs and visit friends and family members.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday. Easter Monday is a public holiday, and all schools, government offices, and banks are closed on this day.

☼ PENTECOST

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost, also called Whitsunday and Whitmonday, is observed on the seventh Sunday after Easter. It commemorates the descent of the Holy Spirit in the shape of tongues of flame on the 12 disciples and the early Christians (as recorded in the New Testament), and is called Pentecost because the word pentekosté means "fiftieth" in Greek. This festival continues on the Monday that immediately follows it. On the Solomon Islands the activities on this day include a parade of war veterans along with general festivities.

☼ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day chosen by the Catholic Church on which to celebrate the birth of Jesus. On the Solomon Islands this festival is celebrated in a traditional manner. Celebrations start with a Christmas Eve service, followed by family meals that invariably include fruitcake served together with wine. Many families exchange gifts after dinner, though some do not engage in this practice at all. On the next day friends and families go visiting carrying souvenirs and gifts.

Rites of Passage

❁ COMING OF AGE

There was a time when circumcision was fashionable among adolescent boys on the Solomon Islands “because the white man (Araikwao) did it,” regardless of whether the churches complained or not. Nowadays most of the men on the Solomon Islands do not undergo circumcision at all.

A variety of methods are used in the regions where it is still practiced. One is called fō-kona, which means “four corner.” Four fore-to-aft cuts are made, on the top, bottom, and sides of the penis. If the procedure is performed before puberty, the outcome looks similar to conventional circumcision.

The most bizarre method is that practiced on the western Solomon Islands. In this ritual a cut is made across the top of the foreskin at the back, and the glans is threaded up through it. As the penis grows, unthreading it becomes impossible. The foreskin then forms a little wrinkled bunch under the glans, about the size of a pea. This is, of course, done with the idea of improving heterosexual intercourse.

A conventional marriage is not, and cannot be, kept secret among Solomon Islanders. Everyone in the respective villages, in addition to friends and relatives, are informed. Immediate and extended families and even neighbors are told. Nowadays the boy and girl are probably seeing each other and later ask and receive the sanction of their parents.

Common features of a traditional marriage include an exchange of bride-price, food, and other items. In the past and even now, the marriage contract is negotiated by the father or a male relative of the boy. Acceptance or refusal on the part of the girl’s family is done by the girl’s father or male relative. In practice the girl’s consent is sought by her father, except in cases where the girl may have to be persuaded if she refuses to accept. Often the girl accepts the proposal out of respect for her father and elders. In some church communities, the girl can marry without the payment of bride-price, although the exchange of food will still take place. In some cases the exchange of food may be scaled down to the point that it merely involves both sides eating together to signify the union. There are even instances when the token bride-price has been paid by the boy’s parents without the customary exchange of food.

The only point is that the parties have decided to live together as husband and wife, with the agreement of their families and relatives. All the ceremonies and rituals can be done away with if the circumstances so demand. However, under the Islanders Marriage Act the parties do have to marry in a church.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Somalia differs from other African nations in that it is made up of a single ethnic group. Somalis have the same language, religion, and culture and are descendants of a common ancestor, though there may be small differences among them in their day-to-day lives. It is believed that the original inhabitants of the region were ethnic Cushites, who had migrated to Somalia from the lake regions of southern Ethiopia.

Archaeological evidence also suggests that coastal regions of Somalia were explored before 100 C.E. by Arab traders who traveled extensively on the Indian Ocean and Red Sea, and came into contact with Somalia and its inhabitants in the ensuing centuries. Then during the Middle Ages, persecuted Muslims from all over Arabia fled to Somalia. They introduced Islam in Somalia, and many of them married native inhabitants.

In the 14th century there were friendly relations between Christian Ethiopia and Muslim Somalia. And although jihad (a holy Islamic war) was being fought in different parts of the Muslim world, Somalia promised it would never attack its neighbor Ethiopia. However, in 1414 an Ethiopian king Yeshaq I (r. 1414–29), who wanted to expand his empire, disregarded the friendly relations shared by Somalia and Ethiopia and launched a religious war against Somalia and Djibouti. After his successful conquest Ethiopians ruled Somalia for almost a century.

In 1530 under the leadership of a Muslim Somali Ahmad Gragn (c. 1503–43), the Somalis launched an attack on the Ethiopians. He assembled an army of Somali Muslims and entered Ethiopia. Employing scorched earth tactics, they destroyed anything that could be useful to the enemy and killed every Ethiopian they came across. The total annihilation of Ethiopians was stopped only by the timely intervention of Portuguese explorer Pedro da Gama, the son of the famed explorer Vasco da Gama (1460–1524). The Portuguese, who needed help to carry on their trading and exploration activities in the Indian Ocean region, struck an alliance with the Christians of Ethiopia and fought against the armies of Ahmad Gragn. In the final battle, known as the Battle of Wayna Daga, Ahmad Gragn was killed, and his army, defeated. Then, the Portuguese established an economic colony in Somalia that was primarily engaged in textile manufacturing.

Cushites

The Cushites belong to the Cush civilization, which inhabited the Nubia region in the southern part of ancient Egypt. They are also looked upon as the first civilization to develop in sub-Saharan Africa but not much is known about this early civilization. The Egyptians reported that the first Cushite state was called the Kingdom of Kerma (a state in Nubia) and was established around 2600 B.C.E.; it ruled some parts of Egypt and all of Nubia. However, around 2500, for some unknown reason, they began migrating south.

Some historians state that they ruled over the Kingdom of Napata (a place in Egypt) around the 11th century and even successfully invaded Egypt. However, the Assyrian (indigenous people of Iraq) invasion of 671 forced the Cushites to withdraw from Egypt. They began migrating south of Napata and eventually spread to different parts of Africa.

In 1728 the Ottoman Turks, who exercised control in some parts of Somalia through local governors, following a series of wars, successfully drove the Portuguese away and established total control over the Horn of Africa (which includes the present-day countries of Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia, and Djibouti). However, by 1850 Turkish power was on the decline, paving the way for Europeans to establish their colonies in the region.

The European colonization of Somalia started in the 19th century. Djibouti was colonized by the French, northern Somalia was colonized by the British (who called it British Somaliland), and southern Somalia was controlled by the Italians (whose territory was referred to as Italian Somaliland). Ethiopia ruled over the inland area known as Ogaden, and Kenya governed the region along Somalia's northern border known as the National Frontier District (NFD).

Among all the colonial powers, Italy took best care of its colonies in the southern part of Somalia. Through various economic initiatives, they brought prosperity to the region and won the hearts of the native inhabitants who showed little resistance to the occupying forces. In comparison to the developments in the south, the territories under the French, British, Ethiopians, and Kenyans lagged far behind in terms of development. By 1936 Italian forces dominated the entire southern part of Somalia.

During World War II Italy wanted to put all its might against the Allied forces and began withdrawing its troops from the region. Taking advantage of this opportunity, British forces captured the Italian-controlled region of Somalia in 1941. A large number of Italians, however, were allowed to stay in the region after the unification of Italian Somaliland and British Somaliland.

In 1945 after World War II, Britain relaxed its military control in Somalia and for the first time tried to pave the way for democracy in the region. Political parties sprang up in different parts of Somalia eagerly welcoming democracy, self-determination, and ultimately independence. The Somalia Youth League (SYL) was the first and most powerful party in Somalia. The region remained a British Protectorate until 1949 when the United Nations (UN), after assessing the economic developments made by the region during Italian rule, decided to grant Italy a nominal trusteeship in Italian Somaliland for a period of 10 years. It also decided that Somalia would be granted total independence in 1960.

Somalia enjoyed prosperity during the decade-long Italian rule with development initiatives in its infrastructure as well as education sectors. In 1960 as promised by the UN, total independence was granted to Somalia. The civilian government that came to power at this time allied itself with the Soviet Union. In 1969 after a successful coup, Gen. Mahammed Siad Barre established himself as the president and set up a socialist military type of government. Initially Barre's government was popular with the people, but over a period of time they began to rebel against his oppressive rule. Also during the Ogaden War (1977–78) between Somalia and Ethiopia, the economy of Somalia was reduced to shambles, and the country became dependent on foreign aid to meet its requirements.

Militias representing various clans arose in a bid to seize power from Barre. This resistance to Barre's rule continued through the 1970s and 1980s. Full-scale civil war broke out between 1988 and 1991, and Barre was forced to go into exile in January 1991. From 1991 into the early years of the 21st century there was continuous unrest and turmoil in the country as the various militias fought among themselves. Without a government in place, the people endured great hardship and suffering as a result of violence and famine. Food supplies were manipulated for political gain. In 1992 the United States and the UN interceded in a bid to end the crisis. However, after suffering major casualties in the region, the UN withdrew from Somalia on March 3, 1995. Somalis fled in large numbers to neighboring countries and other countries overseas such as the United States, Germany, Switzerland, Finland, and England. About one million Somalis live in Ethiopia, Kenya, Djibouti, Yemen, and Burundi.

In the early years of the 21st century, fighting continued among warring factions for control of the capital city and southern parts of the country. How-

The Ogaden War (1977–78)

The Ogaden War was fought between Ethiopia and Somalia over the issue of dominance in the Ogaden region. Siad Barre had propagated an ideology of Greater Somalia, a vision of bringing all the regions of the former Horn of Africa under the unified governance of Somalia. According to this vision, all regions of Djibouti, eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya, and Somalia were to be part of Greater Somalia. The Ogaden War took place in 1977–78 after Ethiopia resisted the Somali demand to allow Somali-dominated regions of Ethiopia to join Greater Somalia. In a classic example of Cold War alliances, Somalia—formerly a Soviet ally—began receiving aid from the United States while Ethiopia—a former American ally—began receiving support from the former Soviet Union. The war ended with a resounding Somali defeat, and a truce was reached between the two warring nations.

ever, ongoing discussions between Kenya and former government officials resulted in the election of Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmad (b. 1934), the president of Puntland (a region in northeastern Somalia that declared its autonomy from Somalia amid fighting in 1998), as the next president of Somalia. In September 2004, after many delays, a 275-member parliament was convened in Kenya under the new charter. The president and the parliament were to serve for five years.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Somalia is located on the Horn of Africa and borders the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. Its neighbors are Djibouti to the north, Ethiopia to the north and northwest, and Kenya to the southwest. It has the longest stretch of coastline among all the countries in Africa but has no natural harbors because of coral reefs. The northern part of the country has mountains, while the inland areas consist of dry plateaus that range from 2,251 to 2,486 feet in height. The Juba and Shebeli Rivers originate in Ethiopia and flow toward the Indian Ocean. However, the Shebeli generally dries up before it reaches the sea.

The country has two rainy seasons (gu and day) and two dry seasons (jiilaal and hagaa). The gu rains that last from April to June transform the arid landscape of the plateaus into fertile grazing land. This season of plenty is followed by the hagaa drought from July to September and then by the day rains in October and November. Jiilaal from December to March is looked upon as the worst season for grazing. Rainfall varies from light showers to heavy downpours. The maximum temperatures range from 86° to 104°F, while the mean daily temperatures vary from 67° to 86°F.

The landscape of Somalia comprises coarse grass, thorn, and acacia trees. On the mountain slopes sweet-smelling plants producing frankincense and myrrh can be found. Eucalyptus, euphorbia, and mahogany trees grow in profusion in southern Somalia. Somalia is home to a variety of wildlife including crocodiles, elephants, giraffes, leopards, lions, zebras, and several species of venomous snakes.

❁ ECONOMY

Somalia is one of the poorest and most underdeveloped countries in the world. The country has few natural resources, and its civil war has further damaged the economy. The main occupation of the Somalis is livestock-rearing, followed by agriculture. A large portion of the population is nomadic or seminomadic. The Somali people are dependent on animals to make a living. Agriculture is confined to the southern part of the country.

Livestock, hides, fish, charcoal, and bananas are the main exports of Somalia. The products for the domestic market are sugar, sorghum, corn, fish, and khat (or qat, a shrubby plant whose leaves are dried and used to make tea). Industry accounts for only 10 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP), and it is based on the processing of agricultural products. The civil war has also affected its growth adversely and the country depends heavily on foreign aid.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Though the Somalis trace their roots to a common ancestor (the Cushites), they are divided into a number of clans and subclans that form clan families. The clan families living in southern Somalia are the Rahanwayn and the Digil; together, they are referred to as sab. Other clans include the Ogaden, the Hawiye, the Isaaq, Dir, Tunni, and the Bagunis. Population counting in Somalia is complicated by the large number of nomads and by refugee movements in response to famine and clan warfare.

Somalis enjoy poetry, folk dancing, plays, and singing, especially in the rural parts of the country. They enjoy these activities on family and religious occasions as well as on state occasions. Traditional Somali culture still occupies pride of place in the rural areas, and traditional costumes are usually worn on special occasions. While men wear two lengths of cloth wrapped around them as a skirt and shawl; they also wear macaawis, a bright-colored cloth worn like an Indonesian sarong. They cover their heads either with Western hats and caps or by wearing a Somali cap called benadirya kufia. Women wear guntiino, a full-length cloth wrapped around the body, usually red and white in color.

In the cities, modern entertainment and pastimes in the form of television and videotapes, cinema, and bars and restaurants are popular, and the Western influence can be seen in the choice of dress worn by urban Somalis. Belief in the supernatural is a part of traditional Somali society, particularly in the rural areas.

The main themes in Somali music are love, life before the civil war, and uniting and rebuilding Somalia. One of the native instruments is the batar drum. The center of Somali music is in Toronto, Canada, due to the presence of a sizable Somali population there and the ongoing civil war in Somalia. London, Minneapolis, Minn., and Columbus, Oh., are other places where the Somali music industry has a strong presence. Waaberi is a band that has found an audience outside the country. Another band, known as Maryam Mursal, combines traditional Somali music with rock, bossa nova, hip hop, and jazz. The Skyhigh Family is a band from Somalia that produces hip hop music.

❁ CUISINE

Somalis eat flat bread called canjero or laxoo, goat liver, and either cereal or porridge made of millet or cornmeal for breakfast. At midday rice or noodles with sauce and perhaps meat is the norm. Pasta became a popular dish during Italian rule. The midday meal is the heaviest meal of the day. At the end of the day Somalis partake of a light meal that consists of beans, muffo (patties made of oats or corn), or a salad with more canjero. Spiced tea is a favorite, but Somalis are also fond of drinking the milk of sheep, goats, and camels.

In the countryside the nomads favor milk and may drink almost three gallons a day. The milk is kept in a pitcher called a haan or a wooden bucket. Fermented camel milk, or jino, resembles yogurt. The diet of rural Somalis includes corn, millet, sorghum, beans, and some fruit and vegetables. Millet is made into porridge or mixed with milk to form cakes. Beans are usually served with butter or mixed with corn, while sorghum, a type of grain, is ground to make flour and bread.

Somalis also enjoy a kind of homemade bread called anjara that resembles a large, spongy pancake. Black tea with milk and sugar, and sambusas, deep-fried triangular-shaped dumplings with a filling of meat or vegetables, are also popular.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Gregorian, or Western, calendar, January 1 is celebrated as New Year's. While there are celebrations all over the world, beginning on the evening of December 31, in Somalia no celebrations take place on New Year's Eve in accordance with a resolution passed by the sharia courts (ultra conservative Islamic judiciaries) that declared participation in these celebrations a punishable offense. In some parts of the country, this threat has taken a serious turn as masked men execute people who dare to challenge the sharia laws. Since New Year's Day is considered a Western festival, extremists who are opposed to Western influences look upon the celebrations as an unacceptable corruption. For most Somalis it is simply a day when all offices and institutions are closed.

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers. The May 1 observance of Labor Day was declared by the international Socialist party in 1889 to coincide with a general strike in the United States called for 1890 by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to win the eight-hour workday. This is a national holiday in Somalia with most businesses, schools, and government offices closed for the day.

Fun Fact

The notion of the "evil eye" is a popular belief in Somali society. A person can either deliberately or unknowingly cause another person misfortune by directing praise at them. Most Somalis tend to avoid compliments to keep the "evil eye" at bay.

Fun Fact

After his victory over Somalia, Ethiopian King Yeshaq, or Isaac, asked his minstrels to compose a song in honor of his victory.

The very first mention of the word somali in written history has been found in one of these poems composed to commemorate Yeshaq's victory over that country.

On June 26, 1960, in accordance with the UN mandate of 1949, total independence was granted to British Somaliland. The northern part of modern-day Somalia had been a British Protectorate since 1886. During World War II Italian Somaliland was also captured by the British with the help of its forces in British Somaliland. However, it was only after World War II in 1945 that Britain began relaxing its military presence in the region. It encouraged democracy and the formation of political parties. The United Kingdom granted total independence to the northern part of Somalia on June 26, 1960. And on July 1, 1960, British and Italian Somaliland merged to form the independent state of Somalia.

Observed on: July 1

On July 1, 1960, in accordance with a 1949 UN mandate, the southern part of Somalia, which was also known as Italian Somaliland, was granted independence by Italy. The region had been an Italian colony since the 1880s and had prospered under Italian rule. Economic initiatives by Italians ensured that money kept flowing in the region, and the people of southern Somalia were generally happy with the colonial presence. However, in 1941 during World War II, after Italy decided to withdraw its troops from their colonies to strengthen their attacks on Allied forces, Britain invaded Italian Somaliland and established its control over the region.

In accordance with the UN mandate of 1949, Italy was made a nominal trustee of Italian Somaliland and assigned the task of granting total independence to the region by 1960. Thus on July 1, 1960, Italian Somaliland was granted complete independence, and it merged with British Somaliland to form the independent state of Somalia. This day, also celebrated as the day of the Foundation of the Somali Republic, is marked with grand celebrations, singing, and fireworks. People gather in the capital city of Mogadishu and witness the unveiling of the national flag by the president of Somalia. Celebrations continue throughout the night, and in many places electric signboards proclaim "Long Live Independence."

Dissatisfied with the state of affairs, Siad Barre led a coup against the Igaal government and captured Mogadishu on October 21, 1969. He formed the Supreme Revolutionary Council and assumed power as the president of Somalia.

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, the Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of the month of Ramadan during which Muslims all over the world observe a daily dawn-to-dusk fast. It is believed that Allah revealed the Koran, the sacred book of Muslims, to Muhammad during this month; thus, it is the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. During the month of Ramadan Somali Muslims break their fast at sunset by eating a light meal called afur, which consists of dates and barley soup. Then they visit the mosque to offer a special prayer called Tawarih on each night of the holy month. Before sunrise, they take another light meal called suburs, again consisting of dates and soup. Drummers are assigned the special task of waking local people before the fast begins at sunrise to take subur.

Eid al-Fitr is an important and joyous festival for Somali Muslims and is marked by huge family celebrations. Gifts are given to children, and people also visit their friends and family on this day. Depending on the economic status of the family, sacrificial offerings are made. Goats, cows, and camels are killed, and special dishes are made with their meat. Other dishes like cake, rice, juice, hawud (a dessert made from ginger and sugar), and sampus (beef) are also prepared. Donating money is also part of the Eid al-Fitr celebrations.

Instructed to sacrifice his most valued possession his young son, Ibrahim was about to do so when, to his surprise, he found that a ram lay on the altar instead of his son.

After the customary prayers in the local mosques, Somali Muslims greet each other and exchange gifts. It is a day of enjoyment for the children because, apart from getting monetary gifts, they get a chance to enjoy rides in the amusement parks and fairs that are set up in different parts of the country during Eid al-Adha celebrations. These fairs also have stalls that sell toys, clothes, and sweets. Those Somalis who can afford it sacrifice a sheep or goat on this day.

This is also the month during which Muslims undertake the annual pilgrimage to Mecca, between the sixth and thirteenth, required by the Koran and the fifth pillar of Islam's Five Pillars of the faith.

❁ BIRTH

In Somalia a marriage is only considered complete after the birth of a child. Somalis do not attempt to limit family size, and it is considered normal for families to have seven to eight children. On the other hand, in Somalia infant mortality is extremely high, and average life expectancy at birth is a mere 48 years. A pregnant woman is taken care of not only by her immediate family but the entire community. Other women in the community hold a special party (like a baby shower) for the pregnant woman and extend their support and care.

Midwives play a vital role during birth because Somali women trust them more than doctors and consider the home to be an ideal place for childbirth rather than hospitals. The newborn is treated with extra care, including warm water baths and special oil massages (using sesame oil), and for seven days after birth a special herb called malmal (a traditional African medicinal plant) is used to massage the umbilicus. In accordance with traditional beliefs, the mother and the newborn infant should remain indoors for 40 days after birth to protect them from the evil eye. It is customary for the mother to wear earrings made out of string and a number of garlic cloves, while the baby wears a string with malmal attached to it in order to ward off evil. This period is known as afantabb, and family members take care of the mother and child with special teas, soup, and porridge. Incense (myrrh) is kept burning in the house during this period in order to protect the child from the ordinary smell of the world that may cause sickness. At the end of the 40-day period, a big celebration is organized and the naming ceremony takes place in the presence of friends and relatives. A lavish feast is prepared, and after a small ritual prayer, a goat is sacrificed to mark the occasion.

Fun Fact

Somalis do not have surnames. Thus the full name of a Somali man or woman consists of a nickname given at birth, the father's name, and the grandfather's name. Also after marriage, women do not surrender their maiden names.

Fun Fact

Birthdays are not celebrated in Somalia. Instead death anniversaries are celebrated in a grand manner in honor of the deceased.

✿ COMING OF AGE

Male and female circumcision is performed either at birth or between birth and five years of age. The circumcision ceremony is performed either by trained elders or by a trained doctor (for boys) or nurse (for girls) affiliated with a hospital. In some areas the female relatives of the girl's family perform the circumcision.

✿ MARRIAGE

In Somalia both arranged and love marriages have social acceptance. In arranged marriages the prospective groom offers a suitable bride-price as well as a small token to the girl's parents to finalize the engagement. If the token is accepted, then the couple is considered engaged.

Before the actual date of marriage, the prospective groom is expected to give some property to the girl's parents as the yarad (bride-price). In case the girl dies before marriage, the yarad is returned to the suitor. In case the suitor dies before marriage, then one of the brothers or male relatives of the groom should offer a marriage proposal along with a small payment to the girl's parents. In case the girl refuses to marry this new man, a suitable groom is found for her or the yarad is returned to the deceased suitor's family. In case of acceptance of the proposal, the bride's family will pay a substantial amount known as dibad, or dowry, to the groom's family.

The wedding ceremony is presided over by the sheikh or kathi (priest). Mebr, a second kind of bride-price, is promised by the groom's family in the form of gold, gift, cash, or property and is noted on the marriage certificate. It is payable to the bride in case of divorce or dissolution of the marriage. Dancing and celebrations follow the ritual marriage, although customs and traditions vary from region to region.

✿ DEATH

When people are dying, their family members read aloud a special part of the Koran, called yasin. After they die a sheikh is called to clean the corpse and to ready it for burial. A male sheikh looks after the men, while a female sheikh looks after the women. The sheikh cleanses the body, applies a perfumed herb, drapes it in a white shroud, and recites the appropriate prayers. Then the family members of the deceased take the body for burial to the local cemetery and dig a grave for the body. After offering prayers to Allah and thanking him for the life of the deceased, the body is buried.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The origins of humanity may have to be rewritten again after the discovery of fossil remains at Makapansgat, Kromdraai, and Sterkfontein caves in South Africa, one a near-complete skeleton of an Australopithecus, thought to be three million years old on the basis of the age of the limestone in which it was buried. If this tentative date is confirmed, the remains at Sterkfontein are 500,000 years older than anything previously found south of Tanzania. The sex of the hominid could not be determined, but the ankle joint confirmed that it was already bipedal, and a divergent big toe showed that it was still capable of climbing trees.

In the Walker Bay Nature Reserve southeast of Cape Town, a region known for its many archaeological sites, there are caves in the Pliocene limestone cliffs including Die Kelders Cave 1 (Klipgat) used and lived in by people for at least 70,000 years. The stone technology and dating suggest that the cave was occupied during the Middle Stone Age, about 60,000 to 85,000 years ago. In addition to thousands of stone artifacts and animal bones, remains of hearths, ash dumps, and burned marine shells were recovered. Later explorations found additional human teeth, a phalange, and a small fragment of the jaw of a five-year-old child, all typical of early-modern or near-modern people.

The Later Stone Age cultural material is rich in bone artifacts and ornaments made from marine shell, ostrich egg shell, and bone, primarily beads and pendants. Many grindstones and red and black pigment have also been found. The occurrence of ochre staining on many of the ornaments indicates its use in body ornamentation. Ochre was stored or used in shells of tortoises, mussels, limpets, and abalone.

In 2004 archaeologists in KwaZulu-Natal have found human bones in what may have been a shallow grave, bones that may provide evidence of South Africa's first permanent agricultural community. The two arm bones, a leg bone, and a shoulder blade were discovered at a site in Salt Rock, one of the richest Iron Age coastal sites to be excavated in KwaZulu-Natal. They obviously used the site to cook, because the rocks had been shattered by fire. The first discovery of ancient human remains—about 100,000 years old—in South Africa was at Border Cave in the Lebombo Mountains, north of KwaZulu-Natal near Swaziland.

KwaZulu-Natal is also the site of the largest and most concentrated collection of rock paintings—40,000 paintings in 500 caves and rock shelters—in sub-Saharan Africa. Created by the San people about 3,000 years ago, many of the paintings show the use of sophisticated red, orange, white, and black pigments to portray animal and human scenes including hunts in progress and close-ups of various animals. One of the most fascinating portrayals is a procession of half-human, half-animal figures: Although they have human bodies, their hooves, faces and hair are animals'.

The San and the Khoikhoi tribes have inhabited this area for many thousands of years. It is believed that the nomadic San tribe have lived in Southern Africa since 100,000 B.C.E. but came to the Cape of Good Hope only 3,000 years ago. Marriage between these tribes was common, and they came to be called Khoisan. The San were gradually wiped out by the steady expansion of European settlers across South Africa during the 1800s through a combination of disease, war, and starvation. During the 15th century C.E. the pastoral Bantu tribe settled in the region, and most of the arable land was under their possession.

In the history of South Africa, the Cape of Good Hope is of prime importance. It was the favorite stop for European navigators and traders alike. In 1498 the famous Portuguese adventurer, Vasco da Gama (1460–1524), was exploring a sea route to India, whose highly valued spices promised great wealth for the European traders if they could find a way to avoid the Muslims who controlled the Silk Route. His journey took him to the Cape of Good Hope, and subsequently he traveled eastward and discovered the sea-route to India.

Among the Europeans Dutch settlers had a

Shaka (1787–1828)

A Zulu chief Shaka, or Chaka, was a brilliant commander and tactician who embarked on an ambitious mission to unite all the Zulu clans to form a unified Zulu kingdom. He transformed the Zulu tribe from a small clan into a nation, but his ambition plunged the region into a full-fledged war. He was assassinated in 1828 by two of his half-brothers.

dominant presence in the Cape colony. They initiated a number of wars, termed Cape Frontiers Wars or Kaffir Wars against the Xhosa tribe. They even indulged in the slave trade and employed slaves from India, Madagascar, and Indonesia. Many descendants of these slaves intermarried with the Dutch and were referred to as “Cape Malay” or “Cape Colored.” The region also witnessed tribal conflicts during the Zulu War (1818–28). The era is referred to as mfeqane, a Zulu word that means “crushing,” or difaqane, a Sotho word that means “forced migration.” It was a period of terror unleashed by Shaka, the Zulu chief.

The war caused a violent upheaval as many tribes were completely wiped out of existence, and many others were forced into slavery. The British too fought the Zulu, and one of their showdowns included the famous Battle of Rorke's Drift, January 22–23, 1879. The British had acquired the Cape of Good Hope in 1814 and over time increased their territorial holdings to include Swaziland, Rhodesia, Natal, Bechuanaland, and other Bantu tribal lands. The Dutch farmers had already settled much of the land, however, and took great exception to British rule.

At around this time the Boers (Dutch farmers who had settled in Africa) undertook The Great Trek, or Groot Trek. Trek is an Afrikaans term that originally meant “a journey by ox wagon.” The Boers, fleeing from British rule, finally settled in the north and east sections of what would become South Africa. Fierce battles between the British and the Boers were known as the Boer Wars (1899–1902).

By 1900 most of the region was under British rule. In 1910 the British created the Union of South Africa. The racist attitudes of South Africa's white supremacists became codified in a system of laws designed to separate European and black people and to keep the white minority in economic and political control of the country. These laws were known collectively as apartheid. Essentially blacks were made prisoners in their own land, and any kind of resistance to the rule of the white minority regime was quickly and often brutally suppressed.

During the late 20th century the struggle against apartheid intensified and received international support when the South African police killed more than 69 people in Sharpeville on March 21, 1960. Nelson Mandela (b. 1918), along with many leaders of the African National Congress (ANC), was imprisoned. The international community condemned the South African government and imposed economic sanctions.

The struggle continued, and in 1989 a white reformer F. W. de Klerk (b. 1936) was elected to power and ended the apartheid system. Nelson Mandela and other leaders of the opposition were released from prison and fresh multiracial elections took place in a truly independent South Africa.

A year later in 1994, the African National Congress (ANC) came to power, and Nelson Mandela

Apartheid

White supremacists, who assumed power after the Union of South Africa came into existence in 1910, laid the foundation of apartheid. The word means “separation” or “apartness.” Apartheid encouraged racial discrimination because people were classified based on their race and the color of their skin. People’s race decided their fate, and they had little say in the matter. The place of work, the location of one’s home, and even the play-area and school were dependent on one’s race. The black community suffered the most as they were haphazardly segregated into 10 tribal groups, regardless of their places of birth. The government forcibly took their property and condemned them to live in the “homelands,” isolated areas in rural backwoods with no infrastructure. Indiscriminate killing of blacks was also the norm. Apartheid finally ended in 1994.

became the first black president of the Republic of South Africa.

The Republic of South Africa prides itself in being the most stable democracy on the African continent. Leading by example, modern South Africa is the face of peace in war-stricken Africa. After suffering immensely during the period of apartheid that ended in 1990, the people of South Africa embarked on a mission to make their country a peaceful and prosperous nation.

South Africa is a proud nation. The development of a robust infrastructure in South Africa has laid the groundwork for progress, and the country has some of the most advanced transportation and communication systems on the continent. The economy is booming, with resulting improvement in people’s lives. Peace prevails in South Africa, and South Africans, regardless of their color or race, are working together to build a better and brighter future for their country. South Africa has the largest military force in Africa and actively participates in regional peacekeeping missions.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located at the southernmost tip of the African continent, South Africa shares its northern border with Swaziland, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Botswana, and Namibia. Topographically the country is divided into three distinct parts: a narrow coastal plain, the Kalahari basin, and the vast interior plateau. The Orange and the Limpopo are the two main rivers of South Africa.

ECONOMY

The abundance of natural resources (gold, diamonds, platinum, and copper) is the driving force behind South Africa’s economy. The country has a robust infrastructure with well-developed transportation, communication, financial, legal, and energy sectors. South Africa is a fast emerging market with immense potential and one of the largest stock exchanges in the world. Despite all the good intentions behind pro-people economic policies, the rate of unemployment remains high. The country is also facing a health crisis with increasing numbers of HIV/AIDS cases.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

South Africa is home to a multiethnic and tolerant society. From the indigenous Xhosa to Afrikaners, British, and Indians, South Africa is a mix of cultures. “Afrikaners” is a term used to refer to the descendants of the first Dutch settlers of South Africa. As one might deduce, South Africa is also a multilingual nation. Languages spoken include English and Afrikaans as well as native languages such as Xhosa, Zulu, Swazi, and Sindebele. There are eight major and 11 official languages in the country.

Apartheid destroyed much of the traditional customs of blacks in the urban areas. Rural South Africa, however, still maintains many traditional beliefs. The old rituals related to marriage and taboos differ from region to region and are based on beliefs in the power of ancestral spirits, masculine deity, and supernatural forces. Cattle are an integral part of society. In some cultures cattle symbolize wealth; in others they are primarily sacrificial offerings. White South Africans lead a lifestyle similar to that of many Western countries.

Stories, songs, and poetry have always been a part of South African culture. South African indigenous art has been in existence for centuries. Cave and rock paintings, dating back at least 3,000 years, reflect the artistic talents of the San tribe. The famous “coded” beadwork of the Zulus continues to this day.

CUISINE

South African cuisine reflects the diversity of its culture. While Indians introduced South Asian delicacies, the Dutch brought in baked dishes. Boerewors (boere means “farmer” and wors means “sausages”),

Fun Fact

Coded beadwork is an ancient Zulu art. By arranging the beads in a particular manner, special messages (coded love messages, the wearer’s age, status, area of residence, etc.) are expressed in symbolic language. Beads of different colors are used to symbolize particular emotions. For example, white stands for purity, while blue signifies loneliness.

Fun Fact

The largest diamond in the world, the Cullinan diamond, weighing 3,106 carats, was discovered in South Africa in 1905. It was broken into several pieces and the Star of Africa, weighing 530 carats, is a piece of the original diamond. It adorns the British Crown Jewels.

droewors (salted dried meat), and biltong were special dishes prepared by farmers or Boers to serve as provisions during the Great Trek. The indigenous South African diet consists of African salads, baked corn, and maize porridge. Favorite beverages include wine and local beer.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

The first day of the Gregorian (Western) calendar, January 1, is celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations are held all over the world, and revelries typically begin the evening of December 31. People party all night long to welcome the new year.

New Year's Day is celebrated with great enthusiasm in South Africa. The air is filled with sounds of ringing church bells and fireworks. The Cape Province area has a carnival atmosphere on New Year's Day and into the following day. Dressed in colorful costumes, and with their faces painted, people dance to the sound of drums and greet the new year.

❁ HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 21

Human Rights Day commemorates the brutal killing of 69 protestors in Sharpeville on March 21, 1960. They were protesting the unjust laws being passed against blacks, primarily the Native Laws Amendment Act of 1952. According to this law the passbook, which was a document issued to blacks in order to serve as a proof of entitlement to enter European areas, was abolished. The law made it mandatory for all black Africans to carry a reference book instead. The law was seen as more restrictive, in that the passbook only had to be carried if a black African was entering or was in a European-only area, but under the new system the reference book had to be carried all the time. The police were authorized to arrest those black Africans who failed to produce it. During the demonstrations at Sharpeville a section of wire fence was trampled, enabling the crowd to surge forward. The police opened fire on the protestors, apparently without orders, killing 69 people and wounding more than 180. In the aftermath of Sharpeville, many political leaders including Nelson Mandela, were imprisoned, and black political parties were banned. This day was referred to as Sharpeville Day during the apartheid era.

The South African Human Rights Commission organizes weeklong public awareness and education programs (Human Rights Week) throughout South Africa to inform and educate South Africans about their basic human rights.

❁ FREEDOM DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 27

Freedom Day commemorates the first nonracial and nondiscriminatory democratic elections that were held on April 27, 1994. After years of colonial rule and suffering under racial discrimination, South Africans, regardless of their color and race, got their first taste of freedom in the true sense of the word. This day celebrates the sacrifices made by thousands of South Africans to help realize their dream of a truly free South Africa. It honors the tireless efforts of leaders like Nelson Mandela who continued to protest the oppressive regime despite being subjected to atrocities in jail. It remembers those South Africans who laid down their lives for the cause of freedom.

The African National Congress observes this day as a day of liberation from racial discrimination, hatred, and inequality. On this day South Africans embrace patriotism. Military parades, traditional music and dance, and marching bands mark celebrations all over South Africa.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

Worker's Day, also called Labor Day or May Day, is celebrated to honor the contributions made by workers around the world. During the apartheid era South Africans celebrated Worker's Day in defiance of a regime that did not recognize the day officially and divided the workers based on race and color. Worker's Day in South Africa thus honors in particular the struggle of black workers against oppression, inequality, and exploitation.

In the early 21st century, workers in South Africa have a relatively nondiscriminatory work environment and have the right to fair labor practices. They are free to form or join trade unions and have the right to strike as well. Huge rallies are organized by trade unions all over South Africa with speeches emphasizing the importance of workers in society.

❁ NATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 9

This day honors the achievements and contributions made by black South African women for women's rights in South Africa. National Women's Day commemorates the historic protest by black South African women in Pretoria. According to a law passed by the Union government, it was mandatory for black African women to carry passes that served as "proof" that they were entitled by law to enter European areas. On August 9, 1956, more than 20,000 black women from different parts of South Africa assembled in Pretoria and fearlessly marched toward the Union building to protest the law. It was just the beginning of a seven-year-long struggle; women all over South Africa were arrested and intimidated by the government to give up their fight. Eventually the oppressive regime banned the entry of rural black women in urban areas and forcibly implemented the law. This anti-pass movement was the largest demonstration organized by black African women.

❁ DAY OF RECONCILIATION

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 16

Under apartheid, the day was known as day of the Vow, in commemoration of a promise Voortrekkers made to God to build a church should they be granted victory against attacking Zulus, but under democracy the day is used to foster reconciliation and national unity.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

In remembrance of Jesus' Crucifixion, Good Friday, also called Black Friday, Holy Friday, or Mourning Friday, is observed in many parts of the world. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. In South Africa people attend special church prayer services at which the life and teachings of Jesus are remembered. Choirs sing devotional songs and theatrical plays based on his life are performed on Good Friday.

Most Catholics fast on Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent) and Good Friday, the only "total fast" days for them.

On Good Friday South African families break their fast by sharing a special home-cooked lunch. Although the menu varies according to the region and preferences, the black Anglican community prefers a light lunch consisting of salads and pickled

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus Resurrection from the dead. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. In South Africa the children hunt for colorfully dyed and designed eggs supposedly hidden by the Easter bunny and are treated to sweets and candies. People wear new clothes and attend church. For Easter the entire family gets together for a special meal.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Fortieth day after Easter

Ascension Day celebrates the Christian belief that Jesus rose to heaven 40 days after his Resurrection from the dead on Easter Sunday. According to the

Tribal Dances

During apartheid, the black workers in the mines would perform tribal dances since it helped them stay in touch with their roots and gave them the strength to survive in the harsh working conditions.

Merry Christmas

South Africa is home to many languages. The country has 11 official languages. Here's how to say "Merry Christmas" in four of them:

Afrikaans: Geseënde Kersfees

Swazi: Sinifisela Khisimusi Lomuhle

Sotho: Matswalo a Morena a Mabotse

Zulu: Sinifisela Ukhisimusi Omuhle

Bible during the time between Jesus' Resurrection and his Ascension into heaven he appeared to his disciples numerous times, eating, drinking, and conversing with them about the kingdom of God. Christians also believe that Ascension Day was the last time he was seen on Earth, and that his second coming will coincide with the end of days, or Armageddon. In South Africa Ascension Day is spent with families and church visits. For many people it is a day for enjoying picnics and other pleasures. A few years ago the government dropped this holiday from the calendar of official holidays, leading to a mild outcry. In 2003 there were reports of government schools closing and parents removing their children from school on Ascension Day.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Contrary to the snowy Christmas celebrated in the Western countries, South Africa has a sunny Christmas, because the celebrations take place during summer in the Southern Hemisphere, where South Africa is located. December is a month of glorious sunshine, and people spend a lot of time at the beach.

On Christmas Eve caroling by candlelight is very popular, especially in big cities. Homes are decorated with Christmas trees underneath which are placed wrapped gifts for children. On Christmas children wake up early in the morning and rush to the Christmas tree to open their gifts. In the afternoon it is common for families to spend time in the countryside or at the beach. A special dinner is prepared on Christmas day with roast beef, turkey, vegetables, mince pies, and plum pudding. Some South Africans prefer to eat this meal outdoors.

It was a Christmas day in 1497, when Vasco Da Gama saw the coast of Kwazulu-Natal for the very first time. He named the land Natal, which means "Christmas" in Portuguese. The word Kwazulu, or "land of the Zulu," was added much later. Thus, the province got its name.

✿ KAVADI FESTIVAL OF PENANCE

Observed in: Durban

Observed by: Devotees of the God Muruga

Observed on: January–February

In Hinduism Karttikeya (also called Skanda, Subrahmanya, Kumara, Arumugan, Shanmugan, Murugan, Guha, Saravana, Swaminatha, Velan, Velavan, or Senthil) is a god born out of a magical spark created by Shiva. The name Karttikeya means "he of the Pleiades." Devotees of Muruga perform penance and carry the kavadi (a basket float decorated with flowers) to a temple in the city. The penance involves the individuals working themselves into a trancelike state and then piercing their bodies with hooks or inserting miniature spears through their tongue. Some pull wagons with hooks in their backs while others carry the kavadis suspended from their skin by an elaborate selection of hooks and spears.

The faithful experience very little pain because they fast, meditate, and enter a deeply trancelike state weeks before the festival begins. Many rub holy ash on their skin, which seems to prevent bleeding. There is very little evidence of blood or pain during this ceremony, and it is considered an esoteric art.

This is the most important festival among Indians in South Africa.

The Hindus worship Muruga for his youth, virtue, healing skills, and ability to dispel misfortune. Kavadi is a time for purifying one's body and mind as well as an opportunity to seek Muruga's love, mercy, and forgiveness.

✿ CAPE TOWN FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed in: Cape Town

Observed on: March

The Cape Town Festival is the most celebrated annual event for South African art. Held in the city of Cape Town, the festival provides the perfect opportunity to enjoy South African culture. From the visual to the performing arts, the festival spans several days. Dance and musical performances, a film festival, and craft fairs are some of the highlights of the event.

Fun Fact

Durban actually has the largest number of Hindus outside India.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Children are highly valued in South Africa. Without procreation a marriage is considered incomplete. Relatives, neighbors, and the society at large treat a pregnant woman with special love and care, which continues even after childbirth. Barrenness is considered a curse in South African society, and abortion is considered a sin.

The birth of twins or triplets is considered a sign of great fertility and the joy of the fortunate family increases exponentially. However, in ancient times the birth of twins or triplets spelled doom for the mother and the child. It was looked upon as an unnatural event, and either the children or mother and children were killed.

✿ COMING OF AGE

Among the indigenous people of South Africa, when a young boy is at the threshold of manhood, he undergoes an initiation ceremony. As part of the ceremony the young boy or initiate has to lead a secluded life for days, sometimes even weeks. In accordance with the rituals, white ochre is used to smear the initiate, and he begins his life of seclusion. After staying away for the stipulated time, the initiate heads toward the river for a ritual bath. Standing on one bank, the young initiate burns everything that he had worn as a boy and enters the river. He washes off the white ochre during the ritual bath and emerges on the opposite bank, thereby completing his transition from boy to man.

Male circumcision also takes place at puberty among the Xhosa, Zulu, and other indigenous tribes of South Africa. Skilled tribal surgeons perform this ritual, and boys willingly undergo this ritual since it is considered the most important step toward manhood in South African society.

Girls belonging to the Zulu clan in South Africa also have to undergo a traditional initiation ceremony. All the initiates lead a life of seclusion for a stipulated period during which elderly women impart lessons of womanhood, tribal history, duties, and the responsibilities of women in their society.

The government of South Africa has passed the Children's Bill, which states that female circumcision (Female genital mutilation, or FGM) is an unconstitutional act. However, male circumcision is permitted. For the boys, though, the bill grants them exclusive rights to refuse to be circumcised or initiated under unhygienic conditions. Female circumcision, though officially banned in South Africa, is still practiced in rural areas.

Marriage customs in South Africa differ according to tribe. In South Africa marriages are broadly categorized into civil marriages and customary marriages. A civil marriage ceremony can take place in a public office, place of worship, or even at home. After submitting the necessary documents, the couple, witnesses, and the marriage officers sign the marriage register, and the marriage officer issues a marriage certificate.

The customary marriages take place in accordance with the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act of 1988 and are inclusive of African Customary Law and Hindu and Muslim marriage rituals. The Ndebele marriage ceremony consists of three stages, which often span many years. The first stage involves negotiations related to payment of a lobola, or dowry, for the bride. The payment, in the form of money and livestock, is made in installments. The second stage requires the bride to spend a two-week period with other women who will teach her the nuances of being a good wife. The third and final stage is completed only after the birth of a child. It is only after childbirth that the marriage is said to be complete.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Megalithic structures—menhirs (standing stones), dolmens, and stone structures—abound in Spain, dating back to the Upper Paleolithic, although such structures have also been found that were built in the Neolithic, Chalcolithic, and the Bronze and Iron Ages. Only the British Isles and France have as many. In addition, as in France, there are many sites where petroglyphs and rock paintings are found, engraved or painted works on open air rocks or on the floors, walls, and ceilings of caves, some of them in deep and almost inaccessible crannies. Like megalithic structures, these works of art were created during the Upper Paleolithic period (40,000–10,000 B.C.E.), and the best were produced by people called the Magdalenians (from the name of a site in France), peoples who inhabited Europe from 18,000 to 10,000. The Magdalenian Era was also the longest, lasting for more than two-thirds of the time people have been creating visual art.

It is probable that the art called Magdalenian was the work either of the Neanderthals, Homo sapiens, or both. For this reason alone the Magdalenian system must occupy a place of importance in any history of art. When the 20th century ended, scholars had agreed that there were 277 European rock art sites, and no less than 108 of them have been identified in Spain. These works of art are very delicate, and when a cave is opened deterioration sets in almost immediately. For example the exquisite cave paintings found in the Pyrenees Mountains during World War I had utterly disappeared within six months of the cave's opening. Even the Altamira Cave in Spain, unquestionably the finest of them all, is open only for brief periods.

The next people to inhabit Spain were a mix of a number of tribes, generally known as Iberians, who arrived on the Iberian Peninsula from northern Africa. This peninsula had, it seems, always been the target for various invaders. Around the ninth century B.C.E., the Celts arrived and settled along with the Iberians. The Phoenicians came and founded trading colonies in the coastal region, followed by the Greeks in the eighth century.

The Romans invaded the Iberian Peninsula in the second century B.C.E. In 408 C.E. the Roman Empire started disintegrating as the Gothic tribes arrived and established control. The Gothic tribes ruled until 711 C.E., when the Islamic Moors from North Africa invaded the region and ousted the Goths.

Gradually Muslim Spain became politically independent, and the region of Córdoba became an important cultural center. In the meantime Christianity was spreading in the northern regions, which the Muslims had not conquered. What is known as contemporary Spain began forming during the Reconquista, the struggle for supremacy that developed between the two religious factions. (The Reconquista, Spanish and Portuguese for “reconquest,” was the military conquest of the Iberian Peninsula by Christian rulers, led against the Moors from 718 to 1492.) By the end of the 15th century all of Spain was Catholic, and three states had emerged as prominent: Portugal, Aragon, and Castile.

The marriage between Isabel of Castile and Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469 was the beginning of a royal dynasty, and by 1512 they had brought the entire country under their rule. It was during this time that the infamous Spanish Inquisition (1478–1834) began. In the 15th century Spain was a confederation of realms, and King Ferdinand wanted to consolidate his empire and unify his subjects as Roman Catholics. He also intended to drive the Jews and Muslims from the country. Consequently some Jews and Muslims converted to Christianity, but it was suspected that they were secretly practicing their old religions. The king then proclaimed that he would purify his nation of heretics, and the Spanish Inquisition was his method of achieving this aim. Tribunals were set up for examining the guilt or innocence of those accused of dissension and most of them were severely punished.

Some accounts suggest that the pope was not in favor of the Inquisition, but he did little to stop it, and Ferdinand took extreme measures to enforce it. This violent state of affairs continued for almost four centuries. It was not until Napoleon (1769–1821) conquered Spain that the Inquisition ended, but it was reinstated when Ferdinand VII (1784–1833) came to the throne. The Inquisition eventually ended in 1834.

During the 16th century Spain became a world power and controlled most of South and Central America, much of Pacific Asia, the Iberian Peninsula, parts of southern Italy, and areas in North America. A series of wars and revolts led to a gradual decline of the Spanish Empire in the 17th century. The beginning of the 18th century was marked by internal conflicts for the throne among the royal families, ending with the formation of a new dynasty, the French Bourbons. The Spanish state was centralized, and the head of state was renamed the king of Spain.

Napoleon occupied Spain in the early 1800s, but the Spaniards met this with strong resistance. The war of independence was fought between 1808 and 1814, followed by three civil wars. Eventually

Phoenicians

The Phoenicians were a group of people who lived on the Mediterranean coast in the territory that is modern Lebanon around 1350 B.C.E. These people were originally called Canaanites, but were renamed Phoenicians. They became great sailors and traveled and traded all over the Mediterranean. As they became stronger, they started making their own colonies, the most important of which was Carthage. In 539 C.E. the Phoenicians were conquered by the Persians and became a part of the Persian Empire. In 332 B.C.E. Alexander the Great attacked Persia, and the Phoenicians became a part of his empire.

Spain was declared a republic in 1873. By this time Spain had lost many of its colonies in the Caribbean and the Pacific region.

In the 20th century Spain tried to colonize the Western Sahara, Spanish Morocco, and Equatorial Guinea. The second Spanish Republic was declared from 1923–31, but the Spanish Civil War in 1936 ended the republic, and Spain languished under the dictatorship of General Francisco Franco (1892–1975) from 1939 until Franco’s death.

After World War II Spain was isolated and was kept out of the United Nations until 1955. Then the U.S. president Dwight D. Eisenhower (1890–1969) wanted to establish a military presence in the region, and Spain was granted entry into the United Nations. In the 1960s Spain’s economy experienced a revival and finally became a modern industrial economy in the years following General Franco’s death. Juan Carlos I (Juan Carlos Alfonso Víctor María de Borbón y Borbón; b. 1938), usually addressed as His Majesty King Juan Carlos, became king in 1975, and Spain became a constitutional monarchy. (Juan Carlos also claims the title of king of Jerusalem as the successor to the royal family of Naples.)

Spain joined NATO in 1982 and became a member of the EEC (now the European Union) in 1986. In 1992 Spain hosted the Olympics in Barcelona, and Madrid was declared the European cultural capital.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Spain shares the Iberian Peninsula with Portugal in southwestern Europe. Spain is bound by the Atlantic Ocean in the west, the Mediterranean Sea in the east and south, and the Bay of Biscay in the north. The Canary Islands, off the coast of the Bay of Biscay, is an autonomous Spanish territory.

Most of Spain is made up of vast plateaus known as mesetas. The country also has five major mountain ranges. The long Mediterranean coastline is rocky

Fun Fact

In Spain when the clock strikes midnight on December 31, even stage shows and cinemas are stopped for some time for the people to eat the customary 12 grapes!

while the Atlantic coast is sandier. Wet grasslands with alluvial soil, Andalusian deserts, and the snow-capped Pyrenees mountains are all found within the Spanish territory. The highest point in mainland Spain is Mulhacén in the Pyrenees at 11,411 feet. Pico de Teide, at 12,188 feet on Tenerife in the Canary Islands, is the highest point in all of Spain. For the most part Spanish rivers are not navigable but have been harnessed to provide electricity. The major rivers are the Duero, the Mino, the Tajo, the Guadiana, and the Guadalquivir.

The climatic conditions found in Spain can be divided into four distinct types: the Mediterranean regions have hot and humid summers and mild winters; the inner regions of Spain have temperate conditions with harsh snowy winters and very hot summers; the North Atlantic region experiences mild summers with cold winters; while the Canary Islands have subtropical weather throughout the year.

ECONOMY

Spain enjoys a soundly balanced economy in spite of recent slumps. Spain is one of the world's most important producers of citrus fruits, olive oil, vegetables, and wine. The country is rich in mineral deposits such as coal, iron ore, uranium, mercury, copper, and lead, as well as some petroleum and natural gas deposits.

Agricultural products are one of the major exports of Spain, while raw materials, chemicals, cars, and trucks are the other items shipped. The major industries found in Spain are textiles, apparel, footwear, beverages, metals, chemicals, shipbuilding, and tourism. Spain imports consumer goods and fuel.

Spain's major trade partners are France, Germany, Italy, Portugal, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Spain is a member of the European Union.

Flamenco

Flamenco is a 200-year-old folk art that originated with the Andalusian gypsies. (In the 21st century, the preferred term for these people is Rom.) Flamenco dance has complex patterns of rhythm and sophisticated footwork, with emphasis on graceful upper body movements and postures. It blends song, dance, and guitar into passionate rhythms that are often spontaneous. It is characterized by the firm and quick stamping of the feet (zapateado) and clapping of the hands (palmada).

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The culture of Spain distinguishes the country from the rest of Europe. Latin, Catholic, and Moorish Islamic influences have played an important role in shaping the modern Spanish culture. In spite of the dictatorial oppression Spain suffered under General Franco, the culture continued to flourish. The Spanish are a highly religious people; most of their festivals center on the church.

The Spaniards gave the world flamenco, the first guitar, and Cervantes's Don Quixote, which occupies a unique position between medieval chivalric romance and the modern novel. Euskara, the language spoken by the Basque population, is said to be one of the oldest living languages in the world. The guitar was invented here in the 1790s by adding a sixth string to the Arab lute. Spanish music has now emerged to become an international genre, further popularized by other Spanish-speaking countries in Latin America. Artists such as Julio Iglesias, Ricky Martin, and Santana have internationalized Spanish music.

Spanish art and architecture are also very distinct and famous. The art world in the early 20th century was influenced by a remarkable group of Spanish artists including Pablo Picasso, Juan Gris, Joan Miró, and Salvador Dalí. Prehistoric Spanish monuments in Menorca, the Roman ruins of Mérida and Tarragona, the decorative Islamic Alhambra in Granada, Mudéjar buildings, Gothic cathedrals, castles, and palaces, and other modern monuments are distinctly Spanish.

Bullfighting is the national sport and spectacle of Spain. Spaniards are also fanatics about soccer. The country is famous for teams such as the Real Madrid. Being mountainous in its terrain, Spain is also an ideal skiing resort for adventure sports enthusiasts. Cycling and golf are other popular sports in Spain.

CUISINE

Spanish cuisine is known for the liberal use of spices and olive oil, at least by European standards. Most Flamenco songs are sometimes serious and profound and, at other times, happy, light, and humorous. The themes of flamenco can range from recent events, politics, love, history, and humor. The costumes worn by flamenco dancers are well known for the flowing and frilly long skirts, and the numerous underskirts beneath it. The women wear flowers in their hair, drape themselves in fringed shawls, and carry lacy hand fans. They also tie their hair in elaborate buns and wear large earrings to complement the flamenco dress.

Spaniards love nonvegetarian food items, although vegetables are not totally avoided. Salads without dressings and a wide range of seafood are unique to Spanish cooking, and no meal is complete without them. Distinct influences of Arab and Moorish cooking are also apparent in Spanish cooking, including the use of almonds, egg yolks, and honey. In Spanish cuisine a number of organ meats and other uncommon cuts of meat are prepared in an elaborate manner as delicacies; among these are ox tongue (lengua) and pig's knuckles. Squid is also cooked (usually, in its own ink) and served with rice. Spaniards enjoy eating rice spiced and colored with saffron and garnished with shrimp. Another rice-based dish called paella that is very popular may contain crabmeat, prawns, fried eggs, sausage, fried pork, beef, chicken, or lamb.

The most well-known Spanish red wine is a sweet, heavy wine called Madeira.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year's Day, Año Nuevo, all over the world. Celebrations begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Spain many cities have fireworks on New Year's Eve (Noche Vieja, the Old Night). There are parties on the streets and in clubs and hotels, with people waiting for the clock to strike midnight. At midnight, Spaniards traditionally eat 12 grapes to bring them good luck throughout the year. They also celebrate with a bottle of Cava, a sparkling white wine made by the traditional champagne-making method but using Spanish grape varieties.

New Year's Day is a national holiday, and schools and offices are closed. According to Spanish tradition, the luck of the entire year depends on New Year's Day. If Spaniards have gold coins in their pockets, there will be plenty of gold during the next 12 months, while empty pockets mean a lean year ahead. If good food and good wine are consumed on January 1, one is assured of an abundance of food and drink the whole year round. Meeting a rich man is a propitious sign, but coming face to face with a beggar is bad luck!

❁ LABOR DAY

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest May Day holidays are ascribed to the pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, there are many conflicting stories about the origins of the political occasion. The evidence indicates that the worldwide labor movement initiated the observance in 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

❁ NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 12

National Day, Día de la Hispanidad, commemorates the beginning of democracy in Spain in 1492. Spain's National Day also celebrates the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) in the same year. On this day the people gather to watch elaborate military parades and other colorful festivities in the streets of Spain, especially in Madrid.

In 1913 a wealthy Spanish businessman declared that this day would be celebrated in Spain and Latin America to honor and celebrate the Spanish race, their culture, values, and traditions. The feast was called Fiesta de la Raza—literally Festival of the (Spanish) Race. This day was declared a national holiday in 1918. The name of the festival was changed to Día de la Hispanidad to include the diversity of South and Central American cultures as well. In the 21st century, most elderly Spaniards celebrate this day rather than their own birthdays.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 6

This day is celebrated to commemorate the Spaniards' decision to draft a constitution for themselves in 1978. The celebratory events held on this day are mostly formal and not many people take part in them. Nevertheless this is a national holiday, and all schools and workplaces are closed in Spain.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, Día de los Reyes Magos ("Three Kings Day"), is celebrated to remember the Three Wise Men from the East (the Magi) who came to look for the newly born Jesus. In Spain processions and parades are held all over the country. Colorful floats featuring people throwing sweets from them are the highlights of these parades.

On Epiphany Spanish children wake up to find that Los Reyes Magos (the Three Magi) have left gifts for them. They believe that it is one of the Wise Men—Balthazar, who rides a donkey—who is in charge of delivering their gifts. People dressed as the Three Wise Men are often seen distributing gifts and candies to children in hospitals and other places.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and begins a seven-day period known by Christians as Holy Week, or Semana Santa, a series of observances that chronicle Jesus' final week on Earth, from his triumphant entry into Jerusalem to his death on Good Friday, his lying in the tomb on Holy Saturday, and his Resurrection on Easter Sunday. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. His arrival in Jerusalem was the way to the Cross. Palm Sunday is as much about the beginning of Jesus' journey to the Cross as it is about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. Then they cut branches and covered the path before him, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, as the Old Testament prophet Zechariah had predicted. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they hoped for a worldly king who would defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during Jesus' final meal, thought to have been a seder. First Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist: a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in some Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church, Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals that follow on Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

In Spain all churches conduct special prayer services on Maundy Thursday. The priest, while celebrating Mass, reenacts the scenes from the Last Supper. He washes the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did. The mood is sober, and all faithful pray during this day.

Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to remember the Crucifixion of Jesus. In Spain Christians observe a fast on Good Friday, and a ritual called the “Stations of the Cross” is performed. This is a reenactment of Jesus’ final journey as he bore the Cross on his way to Calvary. It is a custom for Spanish women to wear traje de mantilla, black costumes, on Good Friday to show their state of mourning. In the Spanish town of Seville a huge procession occurs on Good Friday. The crowd shouts “Viva la Macarena,” as La Macarena, the Virgin of Good Hope, Seville’s most sumptuously decorated image, appears on Good Friday night. The crowd sometimes goes into a trancelike state and women weep emotionally. Now and again a saeta—an impromptu walling song of sorrow and repentance—pierces the darkness. The procession stops when the saeta begins and resumes after it ends. This kind of interruption occurs many times during the slow march through the city.

Fun Fact

The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, "command," because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday). It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between Jesus’ death and Resurrection and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus’ Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. The origin of Christian Easter celebrations can be traced back to the end of the first century C.E. According to the Venerable Bede (672–735), a renowned Christian scholar, the English name for this celebration, Easter, was taken from the name of Eostre (or Eastre), the Mother Goddess of the Saxon tribes of Northern Europe; she was also the goddess of fertility. The Germans knew her as Ostara. After the harsh dreary winters of Northern Europe, she brought the warmth of spring, fertility, and abundance. The ancient deities in all civilizations had patron animals, and the rabbit, an obvious symbol of fertility, is Eostre’s companion animal. The deity was believed to preside over conception and birth in human beings and other animals, and pollination, flowering, and the ripening of fruit in the plant kingdom.

Holy Week Traditions

The observance of Holy Week can be decidedly nontraditional. In the village of San Vicente the sect known as the Religious Brotherhood of Holy Penitence carries out a form of severe penance on Maundy Thursday and Good Friday. The brothers dress in white robes with holes cut out exposing their backs. They apply wax sprinkled with glass dust on their backs and whip themselves. This flagellation, which produces deep cuts, is viewed as a form of penance for all their past sins.

On the eve of Easter in some Spanish villages people walk in a funeral procession led by a woman dressed in black mourning clothes with a veil covering her face. She poses as the grieving Blessed Virgin Mary.

On Easter Sunday some of the faithful in Spain make an effigy of Judas out of straw and burn it. A child dressed as an angel is lowered by a rope and removes the veil covering Mary’s face. This is to signify the descent of an angel upon Mary after her son’s Resurrection that the Bible claims. Spanish families then gather to celebrate Jesus’ Resurrection and sing traditional Easter hymns. Children decorate Easter eggs and play special Easter games. A big meal is served in every house, and people spend time with their families on this day. There are also colorful parades (cofradía) with magnificent floats. Feasting and enjoyment continue on Easter Monday, which is the first day after Easter. People eat chocolate buns and cakes on this day. Easter egg decoration contests are held, and many musicians perform.

❁ FEAST OF CORPUS CHRISTI

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Sixty days after Easter

The Feast of Corpus Christi is a religious feast celebrated by Catholics all over the world to commemorate the institution of the Holy Eucharist (the sacrament of bread and wine representing the body and blood of Jesus). It is celebrated 60 days after Easter and falls on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, the first Sunday after Pentecost. Cities all over Spain celebrate this solemn feast in a big way, but the one in the city of Toledo is noteworthy. Solemn processions and mystery plays held on this feast day have been a specialty of this city since 1317. People dressed as noblemen and knights lend a medieval look to the processions in this region. Corpus Christi celebrations in Granada last for more than a week and are distinguished by bullfights.

❁ ASSUMPTION

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: August 15

The Feast of the Assumption commemorates the elevation of Mary, the mother of Jesus, into heaven. According to one legend, when Mary was on her deathbed, all the Apostles visited her, except St. Thomas, who arrived late. When he did arrive, Mary's body was nowhere to be found because she had been raised. It is believed that her soul and body were united at Jehoshaphat (Mary's Tomb), and St. Gabriel took Mary's body and soul to heaven.

On this day in Spain the people attend special church services and watch traditional plays that depict the life of the Virgin Mary and her entry into heaven.

❁ ALL SAINTS' DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: November 1

All Saints' Day is a Roman Catholic feast that honors all the saints (known and unknown) of the church. It has been celebrated annually on November 1 since the time of Charlemagne (742–814). It is believed that All Saints' Day celebrations began after the consecration of the pantheon at Rome to the Blessed Virgin by Pope Boniface IV (r. 608–15).

In Spain on All Saints' Day the faithful place flowers on the tombs of their deceased relatives and pray for all saints. In earlier days on All Saints' Day la castañada was celebrated after the family evening meal. It evoked memories of ancient funeral meals. After the usual family supper chestnuts were roasted in the open hearth; the chestnuts were then placed on the table where everyone could eat their fill. Pannellets (small, tasty almond cakes) and other sweetmeats were also eaten accompanied by a sweet, white wine. The panellets were small cakes that godfathers offered to their godchildren. Rarely were these cakes purchased at bakeries; more often than not, they were baked at home. They symbolized the days when offerings were placed in the graves with the dead.

❁ IMMACULATE CONCEPTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: December 8

The concept of the Immaculate Conception is a Roman Catholic belief that, at the time of her birth, God had protected Mary from all human sins and filled her with his grace. It is believed that, since God wanted Mary to be the mother of Jesus, she had to be totally free of any kind of sin. In Spain the Feast of Immaculate Conception is celebrated with a ceremony known as los seis, or the "dance of six." This dance is performed in front of the Cathedral in Seville by a group of 10 (not six!) boys.

In some areas of Spain people celebrate this day with a procession in Mary's honor. A special Mass is held in every church in Spain. In some towns youngsters wrap themselves in emerald-studded green sheets and gallop through the streets, while the townsfolk cheer and fire gunshots into the air.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world. It falls on December 25 and marks the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe to be their savior.

In Spain Christmas celebrations begin on December 22, the day of Lotería de Navidad ("Christmas Lottery"), and many Spaniards buy tickets for this lottery. It is a big event that is covered by the national media channels. On Christmas Eve (December 24), called Nochebuena, the "Good Night," Spaniards set up elaborate Nativity scenes with miniature figurines of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds, and the Three Wise Men. The Christmas tree is decorated, and when the first evening star appears in the sky, people light oil lamps. They prepare an elaborate dinner for this night but do not consume it until they return home from Midnight Mass which is held in all the churches. The main items on the Spanish dinner table are pavo trufado de Navidad (Christmas turkey with truffles), seafood, besugo (a kind of fish), cod with cauliflower, and a wide array of traditional desserts. After the meal, families gather around the Christmas tree and sing carols.

On Christmas day (Navidad), the festivities continue with more dining at noon. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts on this day. Swings are set up throughout the country in courtyards and youngsters swing to the rhythm of music. There is more drinking too. Christmas pastries are proffered along with a glass of sweet anise liqueur. Another favorite drink at this time of year is Cava, a sparkling wine produced in many regions of the country but mostly in Catalonia, near Barcelona.

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed in: Santa Cruz, Cadiz
Observed by: General Public
Observed: Before Lent

Carnivals (carne + levare, "cessation of meat") are held in almost all towns in Spain just before the start of Lent. However, the carnivals held in Santa Cruz and Cadiz are the most famous and they attract a huge number of visitors to the country every year. The carnival season begins two weeks before Lent, the traditional 40-day Christian fast that precedes Easter. Carnival is primarily a Roman Catholic tradition and, to a lesser degree, it is observed in Christian Orthodox communities as well, where it precedes their Great Lent. Carnival is known for its exuberance, color, creativity, and culture. Usually there are street dances and parades leading up to a grand finale.

Carnivals began in the 17th century when crews of Spanish galleons brought back gold and silver to Cadiz from the colonies. They also brought back a variety of musical influences. African and Creole rhythms, sambas, and Colombian tunes are often heard in the carnivals, even today.

Bullfighting

Spain is often identified with bullfighting. The very first bullfight took place in 711 C.E. during the coronation of King Alfonso VIII. This sport became popular over the years among the aristocrats and later on with the rest of the country. It is said that at least a million Spaniards go to watch bullfights annually.

During the bullfight a wild charging bull is let into the ring. An assistant of the chief matador (bullfighter) waves a yellow and magenta cape in front of the bull. The other assistants (picadors) weaken the bull by thrusting spears into the animal. At the sound of another trumpet the matador removes his black hat and dedicates the death of the bull to the

❁ SAN FERMIN FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed in: July

Every year the city of Pamplona hosts the weeklong celebration called the San Fermin Festival or the Running of the Bulls. This event is held in honor of St. Fermin, the patron saint of Pamplona. He was the son of a third-century Roman senator in Pamplona. Fermin, who converted to Christianity, was martyred by the pagans. He was tied to the leg of a bull that dragged him to his death. When the relics of this saint were brought to Pamplona in 1196, the city began to celebrate this occasion with the bull-running festival.

The day begins with the runners gathering at a starting line and singing a song dedicated to St. Fermin, asking for his blessing. A rocket is then fired, and a number of fighting bulls are let loose into the street. The bulls charge toward the bullring, with the runners dashing across or down the street in front of them. They run as close as possible to the bulls, teasing them, but at the same time trying to avoid getting gored by the animals' horns!

During this world-famous annual event, the residents of the Spanish town of Bunol throw more than 240,000 pounds of tomatoes at each other and celebrate the La Tomatina Festival, also called the Valencia Tomato Fight Festival. The festival begins with a ham-on-a-stick contest in which competitors climb up a pole to retrieve a smoked ham. Once the president or the crowd. During the skillful fight session, the matador proves his courage. He carries a muleta, a crimson-colored cloth draped over a stick. The cloth is also draped over an espada, the killing sword. The sword is held in the right hand while the muleta is in the left. The fight with the charging bull is over when the matador drives the espada into the animal's body. The matador is awarded trophies, and the crowds cheer him by hurling flowers and waving white handkerchiefs.

Bullfighting is a very risky sport that can result in the death of the matador. His movements in the ring should be precise. If he falters at any point, he can be impaled on the horns of the frustrated and enraged bull.

ham has been cut down, people rush to grab handfuls of tomatoes where truckloads of them have been dumped onto the village streets and pelt each other with them relentlessly, in the world's biggest food fight.

This festival, held on the last Wednesday of August, began in 1945 when a fight erupted between two youngsters in a carnival crowd. They hurled tomatoes that they had picked up from a nearby vegetable stall at each other. One year later more youngsters met at the same place, but this time with their own tomatoes. Another food fight started but was soon halted by the police. Authorities banned the event, but due to popular demand it was given official recognition in 1959.

Visitors also get to taste Spanish cheese and paprika during this seasonal festival.

Spanish weddings are big affairs, where the extended family and often the entire village come together to celebrate. The wedding ceremony is solemnized by a priest in the church. The groom is accompanied by his mother down the aisle. Before the couple exchange their wedding vows, the groom presents his bride with 13 coins. These symbolize his commitment to support her. The bride carries these coins in a little bag during the wedding ceremony.

After the church service Spaniards celebrate the event with a reception party. These normally begin around 7 P.M. and go on until the wee hours of the morning. Firecrackers and loud singing and dancing are part of all Spanish weddings. The guests traditionally dance a sequidillas manchegas and present the newlyweds with a gift. Men are offered cigars, and the women, a small present at the end of the celebration.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Sri Lanka has been known by many names in various languages over the millennia. Sri Lanka, which means “resplendent land” in Sanskrit, is a modern adaptation of Lanka, the name used for the island in the Indian epic, the Ramayana, where the story is told of how Lord Rama had vanquished the demon Ravana, the king of Sri Lanka, during his 14-year exile. It was also known as Lankadeepa, affixing the word for “island.” Subsequently, the island was known as Sinhala, from the Pāli sibalam (pronounced silam), from the Sanskrit sinhala (“dwelling place of lion”), with sinha (“lion”) as its root.

It is said that the relatives of Yakkas (or demons) called Veddahs first occupied Sri Lanka. These people were nomadic and were conquered by the Sinhalese in the fifth or sixth century B.C.E.

A nearly continuous written history of the island can be found exists in the Mahavamsa, which chronicles the growth and development of the Sinhalese kingdom from the days of King Vijaya and his followers.

The Mahavamsa also describes how a minister of Vijaya, Anuradha, established the village of Anuradhagamma, which would later become Anuradhapura, and then the capital of Sri Lanka a few centuries later. Archaeological evidence, however, indicates that there was continuous human settlement in the Anuradhapura area from the 10th century on, and that these people, whoever they were, were familiar with agriculture, metallurgy, and livestock breeding.

Buddhism arrived from the Indian subcontinent in the third century B.C.E. with the arrival of Arahath Mahinda Thero, the son of Indian Emperor Ashoka. With four other monks, Mahinda preached the teachings of the Buddha to King Devanampiyatissa (247–07), the first Buddhist Sri Lankan king. After that, Buddhism spread rapidly throughout Sri Lanka. Buddhism reached its peak during the third century under King Devanampiya Tissa (307). Classical Sinhalese civilization (200–1200 C.E.) flourished in the north-central region of Sri Lanka, with capitals at Anuradhapura (from c. 200 B.C.E. to c. 1000 C.E.) and Polonnaruwa (c. 1070 to 1200). When the Polonnaruwa era came to an end, the capital was moved frequently, and the island was rarely unified. Parakrama Bahu IV (r. 1325–6), who ruled from Kotte, was the last Sri Lankan king to rule over the entire island.

Because there are no lions on Sri Lanka, sinhala must be taken as a figurative reference to a lion-like man—a hero—perhaps Prince Vijaya, said to have arrived in Sri Lanka in 543 B.C.E. from Orissa, on the eastern coast of India.

How the Tamil came to Sri Lanka is unclear, but the island is so close to South India's coastline that it is likely people have traveled back and forth between the Indian subcontinent and Sri Lanka throughout human history. It is known that South Indian rulers attacked Sri Lanka several times, and that the Tamil controlled the island for extended periods when such invasions were successful. Several Sinhala kings are famous for having repulsed Tamil invasions and securing the capital.

When the Portuguese first arrived in 1505, the Island consisted of three independent kingdoms: the Yarlanam (Tamil) kingdom in the north, the stronger Kotte (Sinhala) kingdom in the southwest, and the Kandy (Sinhala) kingdom in the central highlands. In 1517, the Portuguese established a fort and trading post at the present capital, Colombo, and successfully defeated both the coastal kingdoms (Yarlanam and Kotte) in the 16th century. In the 17th century the Dutch replaced the Portuguese. While both the Portuguese and the Dutch managed to control the coastal regions, the interior, hilly region of the island remained independent, with its capital in the city of Kandy. Great Britain replaced the Dutch in 1796, and the coastal areas became a crown colony in 1802. After the fall of Kandy kingdom in 1815, the British unified the three kingdoms for administrative purposes in 1818.

English became the official language, and infrastructure (such as the rail and road networks) was built to facilitate large-scale trade in coconuts, cinnamon, and coffee. The Sri Lankan economy was based on coffee plantations until they were completely wiped out in the 1870s due to a plant disease. Since then tea has become the backbone of the Sri Lankan economy, making it the second largest producer of tea in the world. Unable to force Sri Lankans to work on their plantations, the British brought in Tamil workers from the neighboring country that was also their colony—India.

The period between World War I and II saw political stirrings in the country against foreign rule, in both Ceylon and India, beginning in the 1930s. India achieved independence in 1947, and on February 4, 1948, Ceylon became a dominion within the British Commonwealth. The flag was also changed in 1948: orange and green vertical bars were added to symbolize the Tamil and Muslim minority populations. Solomon West Ridgeway Dias Bandaranaike (1899–1959), representing the majority Sinhalese, became the prime minister in 1956. He attempted to revive the past glory of Buddhism and made Sinhala the language to be used for all administrative purposes instead of English. In 1959, a Buddhist monk assassinated Bandaranaike because he felt that the prime minister had failed to do enough for the Buddhist cause. Sirimavo Ratwatte Dias Bandaranaike (1916–2000), the wife of the assassinated prime minister, became the next prime minister in 1960 and the first woman prime minister in the world. She succeeded in translating many of her late husband's dreams into reality.

In 1972, the country became a republic, changed its name to Sri Lanka, and made Buddhism the state religion, thereby ridding itself of the last vestiges of colonial subjugation. In 1982 the legislative and judicial capital was moved from Colombo to nearby Sri Jayewardenapura Kotte. The new government opted for socialist policies while promoting Sinhalese interests through developmental arrangements (providing the best jobs, etc.) for the majority of Sinhalese. This was necessary to strike a balance between the minority English-speaking elite Christians, who had been trained by the colonialists, as against the oppressed majority of Sinhalese people, who practiced Buddhism.

Civil unrest in the Tamil regions provoked by discrimination against Tamils in university education and employment opportunities, led to a vicious cycle of ethnic strife that continued throughout many successive governments. Junius Richard Jayewardene (1906–96) was elected in 1977 as the prime minister and went on to become the president of Sri Lanka the following year. He promoted Tamil to the status of a national language in Tamil regions while arranging for greater controls over the Tamils. Tension between the Sinhalese majority and the Tamil minority (which had become a political force through the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam [LTTE]) reached a point of no return in 1983, when secessionists of the LTTE massacred 13 army soldiers in Jaffna. In response, Sinhalese mobs killed hordes of Tamils, many of whom became refugees. The violence between the two groups simmers and still erupts occasionally.

Chandrika Bandaranaike Kumaratunga (b. 1945), head of the People's Alliance coalition, became the prime minister in 1994 and president in 1995. Her mother, Sirimavo Bandaranaike, became prime minister for the second time under her. Chandrika won a second term in office in 1999 as the president. Days before voting, she became the target of an LTTE suicide bomber attack, which cost her an eye. Ranil Wikramasinge (b. 1949; leader of United National Party) was elected as the prime minister in December 2001. The desire for peace has kept both party leaders together. Sri Lanka continues its turbulent struggle for peace with talks being initiated at international levels. The tsunami of December 2004 devastated the coast of the country and caused extensive damage to the island republic.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Referred to as the “teardrop of India” and a “pearl upon the brow of India” by poets, the pear-shaped island lies separated from the Indian landmass by the 31-mile-wide Palk Strait and the Gulf of Mannar. There are a number of islets connecting the two landmasses, forming a bridge called Adam’s Bridge. Colombo is the commercial and administrative capital of Sri Lanka while Kotte (Sri Jayewerdenapura) houses the Parliament.

The island of Sri Lanka is 217 miles long and about 93 miles wide. Lying in the Indian Ocean, and flanked by the Bay of Bengal in the northeast, Sri Lanka is essentially a land of hills and plains. Mountains are found only in the south-central part, with the famous Adam’s Peak and the Pidurutalagala, the latter being the highest, standing at 8,281 feet above sea level.

The longest river is the Mahaveli, which travels through the central portion of the country and flows into the Indian Ocean at Trincomalee. The southern coast has the best beaches of Sri Lanka. The climate in Sri Lanka varies marginally with altitude and distance from the sea. It is mostly equatorial and tropical throughout the year. Average temperatures at sea level are 77°–82°F, while that on hills can be a cool 57°–60°F. The monsoon season begins in mid-May and lasts until mid-October (southwest monsoon), then again from December until March (northeast monsoon). The southwest portion of Sri Lanka can be called the wet zone because precipitation there can reach 98 inches per year, while the entire remaining “dry zone” receives between 47 and 75 inches a year.

Sri Lanka has 11 national parks, 23 reserves and sanctuaries, and 33 protected areas. These places shelter the nation’s rich animal and plant heritage. Of the 86 mammal varieties, 16 are commonly found on the island. Elephants, buffaloes, anteaters, squirrels, jackals, leopards, deer, boar, and many varieties of monkeys live there. The commonly seen monkeys are the Gray Langurs, Red-faced Macaques, Shaggy Bear-monkeys, and Purple-faced Leaf Monkeys. There are 34 fish varieties (rainbow and brown trout being the most famous) and 38 species of amphibians. Reptiles like lizards, pythons, turtles, and crocodiles add up to 75 different varieties. Snakebites from five of the 83 snake species can be fatal. The vipers, cobras, Indian krait, and Ceylon krait are the common snakes. There are 339 bird species in Sri Lanka, a population increased periodically by 160 migrant bird species. There are also 242 species of butterflies, which usually migrate from March to April, providing a spectacular show.

Adam’s Bridge

According to Hindu mythology, Lord Rama built Adam’s Bridge to travel to Lanka to rescue his wife Sita from the demon king Ravana. Stressing the natural beauty of the island, Christians maintain that this is the place where Adam and Eve lived in exile after being expelled from the Garden of Eden, though now the bridge stands mostly submerged with only a couple of limestone shoals visible. This natural highway was partially destroyed after the area was hit by a violent storm (probably a cyclone) in 1480.

since its independence, for the last 20 years, the government has gone in for privatization, so the economy has become more export-oriented. This strategy meant that, in a bid to become self-sufficient, the country has tried to produce domestically what it might otherwise import; hence the name, import substitution. Rubber and tea remain important export items, but food and beverages, food processing, textiles and apparel, insurance, telecommunications, and banking are commercial activities that contribute significantly to the gross domestic product (GDP). The economy bounced back from slower growth around the turn of the century, but 2001 saw its lowest phase ever. This performance can be attributed to the continued violence between the Sinhalese majority and the Tamil minority, power shortages, budgetary shortcomings, and a global slowdown. The situation improved after the LTTE agreed to sign a ceasefire in 2002. During the year 2003, Sri Lanka reported its highest growth and one of the highest per capita incomes in the Asian continent. Then, in December 2004, a devastating tsunami caused about 40,000 deaths and the economy of the country was shaken up yet again.

Fun Fact

The Mahavamsa (in Pali, “great chronicle”) is a historical record of the Buddhist kings of Sri Lanka, from the arrival of Vijaya in 543 B.C.E. to the reign of King Mahasena (334–61 C.E.). It was written in the sixth century C.E. by Mahanama, a Buddhist monk, who took much of his information from the Dipavamsa, written five centuries earlier, close to the time of the historical events it describes. The Culavamsa (or Chulavamsa, “lesser chronicle”), is a companion text compiled by Sinhala Buddhist monks, and covers Sri Lanka’s history from the fourth century to the British takeover in 1815. The two volumes, sometimes referred to together as the Mahavamsa, provide a continuous historical record covering over two thousand years.

❧ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Though Sri Lanka has been marked by strife due to ethnic differences, its culture is a rich blend of traditional art and architecture, especially when it comes to the thousands of stupas (a dome-shaped monument, used to house Buddhist relics or to commemorate significant facts of Buddhism) and images of Buddha dot the entire landscape. Weaving, wood carving, metalwork, and pottery are the highly developed arts of Sri Lanka. It is especially famous for gems (including sapphires, rubies, and moonstones) and the gem trade at Ratnapura, the gemstone capital, located about 60 miles from Colombo. Sri Lankan masks are also famous and can be found at Ambalangoda or Colombo. Kandy (in central Sri Lanka) is a good place to see modern Sinhalese dances, while the Devil Dance (a type of mask dance) can be enjoyed in Colombo. Karnatic music of south India is prevalent in the northern part of the country. The culture of Sri Lanka is a fine blend of Buddhist, English, Hindu, and some Islamic cultures, and the traditions and rituals of Sri Lanka reflect all of these influences. In some places the worship of deities and animism is still practiced, ancient spiritual beliefs indigenous on the island since before the arrival of Buddhism.

Being a Buddhist country, most of the festivals in Sri Lanka are based on the lunar calendar, and the full Moon day of each month is called Poya and is a holiday. Because the Buddha encouraged his followers to undertake spiritual practices on full Moon days, Buddhists in Sri Lanka meditate and pray on these days. On full Moon days, all public places of entertainment are closed and the sale of alcohol is not permitted. Each Poya day symbolizes something of importance, either about Buddha or related to events in Buddha's life.

❧ CUISINE

Sri Lanka has been famous for its spices since ancient times. It grows the best cinnamon, cloves, and other spices, so it naturally ended up developing culinary traditions to suit them. The Europeans arrived and also left their influences on the cooking styles of Sri Lanka. The Dutch and Portuguese influences have especially been strong.

Rice and curry form the staple diet of Sri Lankans. This dish can be eaten with smaller side dishes of vegetables, fish, or meat. Kool (a boiled and fried vegetable combination) and biryani (a rice dish) are very popular. Appa, or hoppers (similar to pancakes), are served with honey, egg, or yogurt as snacks. People of the coastal towns mostly eat tuna fish.

Fun Fact

Legend has it that Adam put his foot on Earth at Adam's peak!

Fun Fact

Most foods in Sri Lanka tend to spoil very fast due to the climate. Because of this reality, most dishes are gravy-based to ensure that all the ingredients have been cooked well.

The tea has an incredible taste and can be enjoyed any time of the day.

The British introduced tea in Sri Lanka in the 19th century. It was only afterward that it became the second largest exporter of tea in the world. Dinner in Sri Lanka is usually a feast. The curry is generally cooked with at least 13 spices that are ground beforehand. Garlic, lime, turmeric, curry leaves, and coriander are some of the famous spices used. These are said to not only enhance the flavor of the food, they also add to the ayurvedic effect. Ayurveda (ayur means "life" and vedic means "wisdom") has been incorporated in the lifestyle of most Sri Lankans, including in the choice of ingredients used for cooking. According to ayurvedic beliefs, one's health is a blend of food habits and lifestyle.

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world; the celebrations begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). Sri Lankans bring in the new year with enthusiasm and joy at parties organized privately or at hotels and clubs.

❧ NATIONAL DAY

This holiday celebrates the day Sri Lankans achieved independence from their British rulers in 1948. It is officially celebrated by military parades, pageants, national games, and dances in various parts of the country.

❧ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies.

While the earliest origins of May Day can be ascribed to the pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, the contemporary holiday has an explicitly political origin. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor, demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Sri Lanka, there are processions and rallies by the labor unions to mark the day.

❁ TAMIL THAI PONGAL

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: January 13–14

Tamil Thai Pongal is one of the most popular Hindu festivals of Sri Lanka. The festival is dedicated to the Sun god, who ushers in a prosperous harvest. The date has been made to coincide with the first day of the auspicious month of Thai, the first month of the Tamil calendar. This family festival involves rituals such as letting a pot of rice and sweetened/spicy milk boil over (pongal means “boiling over”) at the doorstep during sunrise. The direction in which the milk flows after boiling over foretells whether the family will have good or bad luck in the coming year. People also visit the temple on this day.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Muslim Feast of Sacrifice, commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim and his willingness to sacrifice his son to obey God’s command. Muslims believe that God visited Abraham in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his most valued possession, his son. When Ibrahim told his son about the dream, the boy asked his father to follow God’s command. However, as the blindfolded Ibrahim was about to make the sacrifice, he was instructed by a divine voice to remove his blindfold. To his surprise, instead of his son, a ram lay on the altar. On this day devout Muslims kill a sheep or goat and share it with family, friends, and the poor. This festival is also called Eid al-Kebir and Tabaski.

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

The Sinhala and Tamil New Year’s Eve is celebrated a day before Avurudu, the Tamil-Sinhala New Year, also known as El am Hejir. In 622 C.E. Muhammad was forced to flee from Mecca to Medina with his family and followers. His flight is called the Hegira.

By this day, usually in mid-April, the store-houses are full of grain, as the crops have been newly harvested, and the trees are full of fruits and flowers. Naturally, such bounty calls for celebration. Astronomers calculate the date of the New Year and inform the public by ringing temple bells. On New Year’s Eve, people attend functions and concerts, forgiving those who have harmed them and celebrating a new beginning. All activities on Avurudu have to be performed at the nakatha (“prescribed time”) and in the prescribed way because mid-April is the time for planetary transition in Sri Lanka (from Pisces to Aries). It is considered inauspicious for performing birth and other rituals.

All Sri Lankans take a customary bath at the prescribed time. Before bathing, they anoint their body with an herbal oil massage for its soothing and beneficial effects. There is plenty of time to have fun with relatives and friends on New Year’s Day, eating sweets and other good things. People exchange gifts and an occasional betel leaf is also given. Betel is symbolic of good health and is an herb of high medicinal value. Chewing it freshens the breath and cures many oral problems. There are poetry contests and contests between drummers of adjacent villages, for example, testing one’s skill at playing the rabana (one-sided drum). Traditionally, people cook rice with milk (kiribath) in chutties, earthen pots, on New Year’s Day to ensure a bountiful year ahead.

❁ MAHA SHIVRATRI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Thirteenth or 14th of the month of Phalguna, the 12th month of the Hindu calendar

The Maha Shivratri festival is dedicated to the Hindu God, Lord Shiva, the Destroyer of the universe and the third deity of the Hindu trinity. Maha Shivratri falls on the 13th or 14th day of the month of Falgun (February–March). The name Maha Shivratri means “the great night of Shiva,” and the celebrations of this festival occur mainly at night. During this time, the planets are aligned in such a way that they foster spiritual balance. Sri Lankan Hindus usually fast on this day and remain awake at night for the celebrations. They say that on this night Shiva unites with his spiritual consort, the Goddess Parvati. The devotees stay awake and chant sacred stories and songs of devotion for Lord Shiva. They pour various liquids on the Holy Lingam (or phallic symbol of Shiva). By morning Shiva and Parvati are considered married.

❧ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Friday of Lent

Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter, the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world in remembrance of the Crucifixion of Jesus. Because this is a day of mourning for Christians, it is also known as Mourning Friday, Black Friday, and Holy Friday.

Some Christians observe a 40-day fast from Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent, through Good Friday. Orthodox Christians, who call this day Great Friday, continue to observe a partial fast until Easter. Other Christians fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

❧ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark the day on which Christians believe Jesus rose from the dead, three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. At the end of the first century C.E., the Catholic Church decided to celebrate the resurrection of Jesus on the vernal equinox in an effort to convert pagans to Christianity. The Church believed that, by appropriating the festivals, rituals, and symbols sacred to the pagans, and establishing churches and monasteries on pagan sacred ground, pagans would be easier to convert in familiar contexts.

The English name for this celebration, Easter, was almost certainly taken from the name of the pagan deity, Eostre. According to the Venerable Bede, (672–735), a renowned Christian scholar, Easter was named after Eostre (or Eastre), the Mother Goddess of the Saxon tribes of Northern Europe; she was also the goddess of fertility. The Germans knew her as Ostara. After the harsh dreary winters of Northern Europe, she brought the warmth of spring, fertility, and abundance. The ancient deities in all civilizations had patron animals, and the rabbit, an obvious symbol of fertility, is the companion animal of Eostre. Eostre was believed to preside over conception and birth in both animals and human beings and pollination, flowering, and the ripening of fruit in the plant kingdom.

In other countries the name for this holiday is derived from Pesach, the Jewish Passover observance, which was also celebrated around the time of the vernal equinox.

❧ VESAK

Observed by: Buddhists
Observed on: Full Moon of the sixth month of the Buddhist calendar

Vesak is a blessed occasion for Buddhists the world over. Prince Siddhartha, or Buddha, was born, attained nibanna (nirvana) or Supreme Enlightenment, and also died on this day. This day also celebrates the first day of the first month of the Buddhist New Year, that is, Vesak. The day is marked by charity and devotion to the teachings of peace by Lord Buddha. The devout visit temples wearing white clothes, and meditate there in tranquility. People are supposed to abstain from solid foods after midday as a way of keeping the body free of impure habits and thoughts. This is similar to saying that fasting once in a while is good for health. Fasting, it is said, brings people closer to their spiritual side or makes them more introspective or inward looking.

In the evening the houses stand colorfully decorated and illuminated by special lamps (called vesak lamps) made for this purpose. People gather in the evening around a monk who recites chapters from the Buddha’s life. There are plays and roadside stalls distributing refreshments to pilgrims.

Observed on: Full Moon of the seventh month of the Buddhist calendar

This day is celebrated with religious observances because it marks the arrival of Buddhism in Sri Lanka in the third century B.C.E. The festivities are held mostly in Mihintale (near Anuradhapura) where Arahat Maha Mahinda (son of the great Indian king Asoka) preached Buddha’s sermon to Sri Lanka’s ruler for the first time. The occasion calls for decorations, processions, and illuminations in different parts of the island.

❁ DIWALI

Observed by: Hindus

Observed on: Lasting for five days from the thirteenth day of the waning half (Krishna Paksha) of the lunar month Asvina to the second day of the waxing half (Shukla Paksha) of Karttika Diwali, also called Deepawali or Divali, is the Festival of Lights, usually a five-day holiday that marks the victory of the Hindu God Lord Rama over the evil forces manifested through King Ravanna, the king of Lanka. This finds mention in the Hindu epic, the Ramayana, where Lord Rama returned from a 14-year exile and the people welcomed him and lit lamps to show him the way. In Sri Lanka, illuminated roads, houses, and marketplaces mark the festival. Deepawali literally means “a row of lamps,” and the light produced symbolizes the lifting up of spiritual darkness. The Hindus generally make clay and misiri (sugar crystal) figures to mark the occasion. However, there are no firecrackers, games, singing, or dancing on Diwali, in Sri Lanka as there are among Indian Hindus.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First day of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, also known as the Feast of Fast-Breaking or Korite, marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan, during which devout Muslims all over the world observe a month-long dawn-to-dusk fast. This fast is required by the Koran, and it is the fourth of Islam’s Five Pillars of faith. Sri Lankan Muslims end their fast when the new Moon is sighted, and Eid al-Fitr is celebrated on the next day. Fasting on Eid al-Fitr is strictly forbidden in the Koran. Sri Lankans dress in their best clothes on this day, children get sweets or money, and women receive special gifts from their loved ones. It is also a time of reconciliation.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world, because this was the day designated by the early Church for celebrating Jesus’ birth. No one knows when Jesus was actually born, so December 25 was chosen because it is the time of year celebrated by pagans as the winter solstice, the longest night of the year, and also the return of the light, when days begin to grow longer once more.

On Christmas Day, the festivities continue with church services and enjoying special Christmas deli-ciacies. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts, and children open gifts they received from Santa Claus. Families gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate Christmas with a special feast.

In Sri Lanka, even though only about 7 percent of the people are Christians, Christmas is an elaborate celebration and spread over many days. The bursting of firecrackers on the first day of December begins the Christmas celebrations in Sri Lanka. It is said that the Portuguese, the Dutch, and the British introduced Christmas celebrations to this island. The shopping centers are decorated and so are the Christmas trees to mark the occasion. The cathedrals and churches are thronged by devout Catholics who gather for Midnight Mass on Christmas Eve. Even non-Christians end up enjoying themselves. They are invited to parties thrown by their Christian friends. Wine and cakes mark the occasion and the celebrations continue into the new year.

❁ KANDY ESALA PERAHERA

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: Mid August

Kandy Esala Perahera, or the Festival of the August Moon, is a 10–12 day festival held in Kandy (in central Sri Lanka), which turns out to be an unforgettable experience for those who participate in it and for those who watch it. It is, in fact, one of the most spectacular events on the continent of Asia. The festival begins on the full Moon day of August. It originated as an occasion for paying respects to the Relic Tooth of Lord Buddha. This is the left canine of Lord Buddha that was recovered after his cremation. The sacred tooth is carried around in a colorful procession of decorated elephants, Kandy dancers, torchbearers, trumpeters, acrobats, and whip-crackers. The onlookers pay respects to the Tooth, which,

The Legendary Sinharaja Forests

The symbol of the lion on the flag of Sri Lanka has been attributed to the legend of sinha (“lion”) raja (“king”), which lived in deep, thick evergreen forests located in the southwestern region of Sri Lanka. They say that the original Sinhalese people who occupied Sri Lanka came from the union of a lion king who ruled this forest and a princess. This forest was declared the International Man and Biosphere Reserve by UNESCO in 1978 and, 10 years later, a National Wilderness Area under the National Heritage Site program.

apart from religious reasons, is also symbolic of national unity and sovereignty. Losing it would mean that the Sinhalese have lost their power or majority in Sri Lanka. The sacred relic is retained in a Tooth Temple Complex (called Dalada Maligawa).

❁ SINHALA-TAMIL CULTURAL FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October

The Tamils and the Sinhalese (two major ethnic groups of Sri Lanka) often indulge in conflict with each other. It is in literary and cultural festivals such as the Sinhala-Tamil Cultural Festival that artists from both groups bury their differences for a while and participate together concerning the contemporary developments of Sri Lanka. A committee of about 150 (with about 145 being Sinhalese) organizes this festival for fostering peace in Colombo every year in October. There are reports that the festival tends to be disrupted by extremists from both sides.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Sri Lanka the first ritual performed after a child is born is rankiri kata gema: The lips of the child are touched with breast milk that has already been touched with gold. The next important event after childbirth is that astrologers cast the child's horoscope after getting the exact time and date of its birth from the parents. The belief is that the planets have the power to influence the newborn in good and evil ways. Knowing the horoscope will help them to devise remedies for the difficult times in the child's life.

The naming ceremony, called the batkavapu nama, takes place a few months after the child's birth. It is the most important childhood ritual in Sinhalese culture. This is the day when the infant is fed grains of rice for the first time. In certain families this is also the day on which the child is named.

❁ COMING OF AGE

When a girl first starts her menstrual cycle, the exact date and time is noted so the parents can consult with an astrologer regarding her future. The women of the house bathe her from head to toe and dress her in white. Friends and relatives are invited, who give gifts and money to the girl, and there is a lot of celebration and feasting. Intermingling of sexes is kept under close scrutiny.

❁ MARRIAGE

The marriage broker fixes the wedding and commands a lot of power in Sri Lanka. He or she is the one who is a storehouse of information on the prospective brides and grooms of the area. Out of the many matches proposed, the interested family chooses one bride or groom. An "inspection" visit to the selected family's house follows; the prospective bride or groom will be properly presented during another visit. The broker arranges many more inter-family visits, as more emphasis is laid on the intermingling of the two families than the couple getting to know each other. The prospective couple's horoscopes are matched by a local astrologer. He or she decides a wedding date if everything has gone smoothly between the two families. The amount of dowry that will be paid by the bride's family to the groom's is also decided mutually.

As preparation for the wedding, a thorana (a pathway made of palm trunks, leaves, coconut, and other fruit) is usually set up by the roadside. Women begin preparing nonperishable foods many days prior to the wedding day. There is an air of festivity and enthusiasm all around. Firecrackers, loud music, alcohol, and pranks by the youngsters are commonplace.

On the day of the wedding, the groom visits Lord Buddha's temple to seek his blessings. Then he dresses up in the traditional clothing of chieftains, complete with a dagger. The bride wears a sari (a traditional garment made of six to nine yards of cloth) embroidered with gold as well as heavy gold jewelry. As the prescribed auspicious time approaches, wedding vows are taken within a poruva, a stand especially made out of flowers and palm fronds for the occasion. Both exchange wedding rings. Elders exchange gifts. The local registrar is always a guest and he does the necessary paperwork following the ceremony. For the first time, the bride gets to sit next to the husband after the wedding. She leaves her home for her new home where more feasts await her.

❁ DEATH

Death is an important occasion for Sri Lankans and is a reminder of Lord Buddha's teachings. The survivors remember that he taught the impermanence of all things of this world and that all the karmic forces come together at the time of death. Death is, therefore, an important religious event both for the one who died (as the individual's transition into another body has begun) and for the survivors, who remember Buddha's teachings apart from helping the departed soul through the monastic sangha (community). Here, before cremating the body, a white cloth called a pamsukula is offered on behalf of the dead to the monks in a ritual known as matakavastra-puja. One of the assembled monks administers the Five Precepts of Buddha: to refrain from killing living beings and to practice loving-kindness; to refrain from taking anything that is not given and to practice generosity; to refrain from sexual misconduct and to practice contentment; to refrain from lying and harsh speech and to practice truthfulness; to refrain from taking intoxicants and to cultivate mindfulness. The white cloth is cut into pieces (to be stitched into a robe later) and given to the monks. The close relatives of the deceased then sit around a mat and pour water from a common vessel into a cup until it overflows. This is done in the spirit of giving an offering or dakkhina to the deceased. Grace marks this ritual as all pray for the relief of the departed soul. Another rite is matakabana, or sermonizing for the benefit of the deceased. A monk is invited within a week to give a sermon to the family and friends. They recite stanzas as he requests; the ritual is followed by offering a gift to the monk and refreshments for all. Three months later, an almsgiving ceremony, or a sanghika dana ceremony, is held as offerings are made on behalf of the deceased. The reason for this practice is that, if the dead relative has been born as peta (an unhappy spirit), the merit of the living relatives' almsgiving will reduce his or her misery in the other world.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

At the time of discovery by the Europeans, the Caribs inhabited the islands of St. Kitts and Nevis. Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) landed on the larger of the two islands in 1493 during his second voyage and named it after St. Christopher, the patron saint of travelers and his own personal saint. He also discovered Nevis on the same voyage. European colonization of the islands began only around 1623–24, when the English, followed by the French, arrived on St. Christopher's Island. The English eventually shortened its name to St. Kitt's Island.

Settled by Sir Thomas Warner (d. 1648) in 1623, St. Kitts was the site of the first British colony in the West Indies. The following year the French also settled on a part of St. Kitts, a situation that Warner diplomatically tolerated in a bid to gain the upper hand against the native Caribs living on the island. In 1628, Warner sent a party of about 100 colonists to establish a British settlement on the western coast of St. Nevis. Although the original settlement, near Cotton Ground (a town on the western coast of the island), was destroyed in an earthquake in 1680, Nevis went on to prosper as one of the most affluent plantation societies in the eastern Caribbean region. As on St. Kitts most of the island's wealth was built on the labor of African slaves toiling in the island's sugarcane fields. The local tourist industry got its start in the late 18th century on Nevis, where thermal baths made it a popular retreat for Britain's well-to-do.

The Treaty of Paris in 1783, which also formally ended the American Revolution, handed over both islands to Great Britain. In 1816 the British combined St. Kitts and Nevis with Anguilla and the Virgin Islands into a single colony. They remained part of the colony of the Leeward Islands from 1871 to 1956, and of the West Indies Federation from 1958 to 62. In 1967, together with Anguilla, they became a self-governing state in association with the United Kingdom; Anguilla seceded later in that year and remains a British dependency. The Federation of St. Kitts and Nevis attained full independence on September 19, 1983.

In August 1998 a vote in Nevis on a referendum to separate from St. Kitts fell short of the two-thirds majority needed. In late September 1998 Hurricane George caused massive damage totaling approximately U.S. $445 million and crippled economic growth for the year.

In the 21st century Nevis has once again been trying to separate from St. Kitts. Although the two islands share much culture, there is a good deal of rivalry between them, and there are those who suggest that Nevis is moving closer to full independence.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Geologically St. Kitts and Nevis are mountainous and volcanic in origin, representing adjacent peaks in a chain of partially submerged volcanic mountains. Both islands are subject to subterranean seismographic activity, which makes them prone to earthquakes. St. Kitts is the larger of the two islands, covering 65 square miles. Mount Liamuiga, a dormant volcanic cone with an elevation of 3,793 feet, is the highest point on the island.

St. Kitts's fertile soil is well watered, has adequate drainage, and usually requires little or no irrigation. Forested areas cover 11,120 acres of land and include both rain forests at the lower altitudes and evergreen forests above 820 feet. Cone-shaped Nevis is about six miles wide, eight miles long, and has a total land area of 36 square miles. The soil on Nevis is generally less fertile than that on St. Kitts, but water is plentiful in the higher elevations. There is no rainy season on Nevis, but showers can be torrential when it does rain. There are several hot mineral springs on the island (the same ones that were so popular with early British tourists in the late 1700s).

Both St. Kitts and Nevis have a tropical climate tempered by northeast trade winds; there is little daily or seasonal variation. Temperatures average approximately 79°F. Humidity is generally about 70 percent. Annual precipitation varies from 39 to 120 inches. Neither island has the distinct rainy season characteristic of many other Caribbean islands. Winds are predominantly easterly and seldom exceed 12 miles per hour except during the hurricane season, which lasts from July to September.

❁ ECONOMY

Although the sugarcane crop still dominates the agricultural sector, tourism, export-oriented manufacturing, and banking have assumed larger roles in the economy. Since tourism revenues are now the chief source of the islands' foreign exchange, a decline in stopover tourist arrivals following September 11, 2001, eroded government finances. The opening of a 1,000-plus bed Marriott hotel in February 2003 has helped to reverse the situation.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

These two islands—the inhabitants are called Kittitians (Kit-TEE-shuns) and Nevisians (Nee-VEE-shuns)—draw on a mix of European, African, and West Indian traditions. While the local architecture is predominantly British, and cricket is the national sport, the music and dances of the islands are very much West Indian and African. Masquerades, St. Kitts's popular folk dance troupe, performs all kinds of dances, ranging from the traditional French quadrille to the spirited African war dance. The troupe wears colorful costumes with unique West Indian designs.

❁ CUISINE

The cuisine available on St. Kitts and Nevis is a blend of local Caribbean and international influences. Native dishes include Arawak chicken seasoned and served with rice and almonds on a breadfruit leaf, curried mutton, and grilled wahoo (a species of mackerel). There are also plenty of tropical fruits, seafood (including lobster), pork, goat, and jerk chicken.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday in May

St. Kitts and Nevis celebrate Labor Day (also called May Day or Workers' Day) on the first Monday of May and not on the first day of the month. The origins of this holiday lie in the ancient pagan spring festivals practiced by farmers and peasants. For the islanders the holiday is a British legacy. The day is also observed as a tribute to workers, for their contribution to the progress of nations.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, designated May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Public meetings and lectures, reminding workers of their rights, are some of the activities on the islands; for most it is a time to relax.

Modern scholars believe that many of the traditions associated with Pentecost were originally borrowed from pagan celebrations of spring.

This holiday is also referred to in many English-speaking countries as Whitsunday, because of the white robes worn this day by those who are newly baptized. Whitsunday and Monday have been recognized since the third century C.E. On Whitmonday most establishments and government offices remain closed on the islands. This day is usually spent with family at picnics and beach barbecues.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

During the 17th and 18th centuries the French and the British made several unsuccessful attempts to take possession of the island. Britain finally gained control of it in 1814. The country remained a British colony until it gained its independence in 1979. That same year it also became a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

By the mid-1990s, the Banana Trade War between countries of the present European Union (EU) and Latin America had damaged the island's economy. Since then many reforms have been introduced to strengthen it.

Carnival is the most festive time of year in the capital city of Castries. During this holiday the streets resound with calypso music and the city plays host to many activities and cultural events around the clock. These range from religious celebrations and masquerades to yacht races and band competitions. Costume parades add a splash of color to the festivities on land, while bright spinnakers dot the waterfront.

✿ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

St. Lucia is a typical Windward Island, formed out of volcanic rock that came into existence long after the region had already been formed. St. Lucia's physical features are strikingly beautiful. Dominated by high peaks and rain forests in the interior, the small island is known for the twin peaks of Gros Piton and Petit Piton on the southwestern coast, its soft sandy beaches, and its magnificent natural harbors. Mt. Gimie, the highest peak, is located in the central mountain range and rises to 3,143 feet above sea level. The steep terrain also accentuates the many rivers that flow from central St. Lucia to the Caribbean. Fertile farmland, mostly devoted to banana farming, is scattered throughout the island.

The climate on St. Lucia is a tropical and humid one, moderated by northeast trade winds that ensure pleasant weather throughout the year. Hurricanes are the most severe climatic disturbance in this area and have been known to cause devastating destruction.

❁ ECONOMY

St. Lucia's economy depends primarily on revenue from banana production and tourism. Because of the EU's decision to phase out the preferred access to its markets by Windward Island banana growers by 2006, agricultural diversification has become a priority. The government is encouraging the establishment of tree crops such as mangoes and avocados. A variety of vegetables are being produced for local consumption.

The development of the tourism sector still remains a priority. There has been liberal use of public funds to improve the physical infrastructure of the island, and the government has made efforts to attract cultural and sporting events and to develop historical sites.

St. Lucia is a beneficiary of the U.S. Caribbean Basin Initiative and has been a member of the Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM) since 1974. St. Lucia is also the headquarters of the Eastern Caribbean Telecommunications (ECTEL) authority, which is developing the regulations to liberalize the telecommunications sector in the region by the early 21st century.

Fun Fact

A spinnaker is a large triangular sail set on a spar that swings out opposite the mainsail of a boat; spinnakers are used on yachts when running before the wind.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The island's culture has evolved from the intermingling of many different ethnic groups. Each has brought its own beliefs and traditions, which are reflected in the composite lifestyle and culture of the island today.

Although Europeans never settled in St. Lucia in large numbers, they had a lasting effect on the island's history and culture. Although St. Lucia remained under British rule for more than a century, it is the French and Creole cultural heritage that predominated and still prevails. To St. Lucia's exciting cultural mosaic, the British contributed their language and educational system in addition to the legal and political structure. French culture is more evident in the arts—music, dance, and the Creole patois, used alongside the official language, English.

St. Lucia takes great pride in its two Nobel Prize winners: the late Sir W. Arthur Lewis (1915–90), who won the Nobel Prize for Economics in 1979, and poet Derek Walcott (b. 1930), who won the 1992 Nobel Prize for Literature.

❁ CUISINE

The rich cultural heritage of the island is vividly expressed in its cuisine. The fertile, volcanic soil of St. Lucia yields an enormous supply of agricultural products. The island is one of the leading banana exporters in the Caribbean, with six different varieties grown on the island.

Not surprisingly, bananas play a key role in the dishes prepared by St. Lucians. One can find endless varieties of banana bread, banana salad, and boiled green bananas accompanied by salt fish. Other fruits include mangoes, papayas, pineapples, soursops, passion fruit, guavas, and coconuts. Local chefs combine the island's fresh farm products with a wide range of fresh seafood to create intriguing curries, Creole-style entrees, and pepper-pot stews. The local seafood includes lobster, snapper, dolphins, kingfish, and swordfish. Callao soup, made from a leafy green similar to spinach, is the national dish.

St. Rose of Lima

Beloved in St. Lucia, St. Rose of Lima is the patron saint of Latin America and the Philippines. Her real name was Isabel, but she was so beautiful that she was called "Rose," and that name remained. As she grew older, she became more and more beautiful, and one day her mother put a wreath of flowers on her head to show off her loveliness to friends. But Rose had no desire to be admired, for her heart had been given to Jesus. So she put a long pin into that wreath and it pierced her so deeply that she had a hard time getting the wreath off afterward. At another time, afraid that her beauty might be a temptation to someone, she rubbed her face with pepper until it was all red and blistered.

The Roses versus the Daisies

The rose and daisy societies on the island have a unique rivalry. Each group holds weekly meetings, known as séances, at which a designated female singer of each society improvises French Creole tunes (belairs) that blend African and French and are accompanied by violins, banjos, saxophones, and other instruments. The singers typically praise their own flower society while poking fun at the other. These weekly séances build up to the elaborate festivals of each society—roses in August and daisies in October—when the members attend special church services and then parade the streets dressed as royalty, doctors, nurses, policemen, or soldiers.

of Maurgerite Mary Alacoque, the patron saint of polio patients and the sacred heart of Jesus, so it is also called Fete La Marguerite à la Coque. St. Maurgerite was the personification of humility, modesty, and meekness, always mindful of her humble origin. That is why the daisy, the most innocuous of all flowers, is named after her. On this important day St. Lucians attend church services. The much-anticipated celebrations include a grand party replete with music, dances, masquerades, and cultural events that go on throughout the night. On several occasions royal personalities from Britain and other dignitaries have attended as special guests.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

The birth of a child is a special event since it ensures the continuation of the family lineage. It also adds to the respect of the family. Children are usually named after saints (following the Roman Catholic custom). The family hosts a party to celebrate the birth of a child. Guests and relatives bring gifts, flowers, and cards for the newborn.

MARRIAGE

To prepare for a wedding in St. Lucia family members bake a rich, black cake with dried fruits and rum. This custom of preparing a wedding cake can be traced back to Roman times. The cake is a symbol of unity and the couple's willingness to join their lives, sharing mutual joys and sorrows. Many couples prefer a traditional religious ceremony in a church where a priest performs the Catholic rites with readings from the Gospels. There is an exchange of vows, and a candle is lit by the bride and groom, signifying their new life together.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The islands of St. Vincent and the Grenadines were originally inhabited by the Ciboneys. These hunter-gatherers were largely dependent on marine resources and agriculture for their livelihood. The Arawaks (the aboriginal South American Indian tribe of the Greater Antilles) replaced the Ciboneys about 200 B.C.E. Sometime after 1000 C.E. the Arawaks were invaded and replaced by a wandering culture from South America known then as the Kalinga and later named the Caribs by the Europeans. In 1635 a group of African slaves (survivors of a Dutch ship that sank in the channel between Bequia and St. Vincent) also settled in St. Vincent. Their descendants came to be known as the Black Caribs.

By 1498 Columbus (1451–1506) had arrived in St. Vincent, but colonial rule did not come to the islands for another two centuries. Britain and France fought to gain control of these islands, and St. Vincent officially became a British colony under the Treaty of Paris in 1763. The conflict between the British and Black Caribs, who remained hostile to the Europeans, continued until 1796. The defeated natives were later deported to Honduras to work as slaves.

From 1763 until its independence, the British made several unsuccessful attempts to unite St. Vincent with the other Windward Islands (St. Lucia, Martinique, and Grenada). In 1834

Fun Fact

Escoveitch comes from escabeche, the Spanish that means “pickled.” Recipes for main dishes such as escoveitched fish or chicken evolved from a centuries-old Iberian method of preparing seafood and poultry that involves marinating the fish or fowl in a vinaigrette sauce, usually for about 12 hours.

slavery was abolished on St. Vincent and the Grenadines along with the other British colonies in the West Indies. In 1969 St. Vincent became a self-governing state under the British crown. Ten years later it acquired complete independence and also Commonwealth membership. In the early 21st century, a growing dissatisfaction within the leading political parties has led to political unrest. The political instability has resulted in economic losses, only made worse by natural disasters that have played havoc with the country's infrastructure.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

St. Vincent and the Grenadines is composed of 32 islands and cays (or keys). Some of the prominent islands in St. Vincent and the Grenadines are Bequia, Mustique, Palm Island, Canouan, Mayreau, Petit St. Vincent, Union Island, and Tobago Cays. Located in the Caribbean, just north of Trinidad and Tobago, St. Vincent and the Grenadines enjoys a year-round tropical climate with little temperature variation. Soufrière volcano, on the island of St. Vincent, is a constant threat, as are hurricanes.

❁ ECONOMY

Tourism is by far the most important economic force in the country, followed by agriculture, with bananas being the largest crop. Both sectors are seasonal, which is a challenge for the economy. St. Vincent has some offshore banking, which it has sought to bolster by moving toward adopting international regulatory standards. It is also a large producer of marijuana and has become a transshipping center for illegal narcotics from South America.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Though they remained under British rule for over a century, these islands feature a vital mix of cultures, including French and West African influences. The French influence can still be seen in the prevalence of the Creole language as well as the observance of Bastille Day. Most Vincentians are descended from slaves and mix African traditions and beliefs with Christian (mostly Anglican and Catholic). Religious commemorations and masquerades play an important role in all the festivals. Celebrations often last for weeks and involve a great deal of dancing and singing. The African influence is clearly evident in the music of the islands, which includes reggae, calypso, and steel bands. Processions, prayers, street shows, and costume parties are also integral to many celebrations. Hymns, lullabies, ballads, and working and healing songs are also very popular.

❁ CUISINE

The cooking of St. Vincent and the Grenadines, like the cuisine of other Caribbean islands, reflects its diverse history and borrows liberally from both African and European cooking. Seafood of all kinds is readily available, always fresh, and figures prominently in many local dishes such as conch fritters, lobster fritters, and lobster salad, various curries, pepper pots, and escoveitched fish.

Among the fish recommended in escoveitch recipes are kingfish, tilapia, red snapper, monkfish, jack, and dolphin (not the mammal).

A variety of fresh fruits, including bananas, coconut, pineapple, papaya, and mango, are also very popular as snacks or refreshing juice drinks. Because bananas are the most important cash crop of St. Vincent and the Grenadines, they are used in many popular dishes either raw or cooked. In addition to being eaten raw at any time of the day, other fruits are versatile as well and turn up in such dishes as mango chutney or salsa, pineapple chicken, and avocado salad. The very hot hot sauces, lobster and pumpkin soup, and fish varieties including porgy, parrot fish, and snapper are typical Caribbean fare. Rum is the local drink of choice. It can be drunk neat, although it is perhaps more refreshing served with fruit in cocktails and punches.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

In St. Vincent and the Grenadines the beginning of a new year is a time for entertainment, celebrations, and making resolutions. People get together and enjoy this occasion with their families. Special church services are also held to welcome the new year.

❁ ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 22

Christopher Columbus was the first European to discover these islands on January 22, 1498. His discovery coincided with the feast day of St. Vincent, the patron saint of wine makers. He named the islands as a mark of respect to the saint, although there is no recorded history of wine-making on the islands. Both beer and rum are produced.

J'ouvert

The word is derived from the French jour ouvert, which means “daybreak.” It marks the beginning of a raucous two-day street festival. As early as 2:00 a.m. shadowy figures clad only in briefs dip into paint pots and coat themselves in motley colors. Others don masks adorned with long strips of cloth, while still others make a piercing sound with their whips. Soon they will transform themselves into figures associated with African folklore or with local superstitions introduced into the Carnival celebrations by emancipated slaves.

Slaves born in the West Indies had only oral references to connect with a culture with which they had little or no direct contact. In the 18th century freed slaves were not allowed to participate in the celebrations of the Europeans, so they often satirized their former masters and celebrated their freedom by turning to folkloric characters. These influences have now been assimilated into the local Carnival culture.

It is not uncommon to see roving bands of devils painted blue or red or covered from head to toe in thick black grease, beating large tin pans, demanding that you “pay the devil.” Ignoring them can be dangerous.

St. Vincent and the Grenadines Day, or St. Vincent's Day, is still observed in honor of St. Vincent—by the Catholic community and special church services are held. People participate in parades organized by local and national groups, and local musicians and dancers perform at events held on this day.

The French influence has been widespread in St. Vincent since the 18th century, and the ideals of the French Revolution inspired the struggle for independence in this country. Vincentians celebrate Bastille Day by organizing various cultural events, dances, musical shows, and food festivals on the islands. Fireworks displays, grand balls, and masquerades make for festive nighttime celebrations.

❁ EMANCIPATION DAY

Slavery was abolished in St. Vincent and the Grenadines in 1834, when Great Britain emancipated all the slaves in its West Indian colonial possessions. Emancipation Day, or Abolition of Slavery Day, is an important holiday as most Vincentians are descendants of the African slaves who were brought to the islands in the 17th century. Many cultural and political programs are held to commemorate this day. A musical concert featuring an eclectic mix of gospel, calypso, jazz, and classical music is held in the capital city of Kingstown.

Breadfruit

The breadfruit (Artocarpus altilis) tree is native to the East Indian and Pacific islands. The name derives from the fact that the unripe fruit tastes like fresh bread. Captain Bligh (1754–1817) brought the first breadfruit tree to St. Vincent from Tahiti in 1793. His first mission to deliver these trees in 1788 ended in his being cast adrift after the infamous mutiny on his ship, the HMAV (His Majesty's Armored Vessel) Bounty.

Breadfruit, a nutritious starchy melon, was intended to be used as food for the slaves in the plantations of the Caribbean. Initially the slaves disliked the taste of breadfruit and refused to eat it. Years later the descendants of these slaves learned to appreciate the breadfruit and now use it in a number of tasty dishes.

Observed on: Easter weekend

Easterval, a four-day festival held over the Easter weekend, takes place on Union Island (located midway between Grenada and St. Vincent). The origins of this festival can be traced back to the pre-Columbian tradition of praying to the rain god for good rains and a bountiful harvest. Easterval features concerts, sports competitions, pageant shows, parades, and food fairs. The traditional African Big Drum dance is also performed on this occasion.

✿ BIG DRUM FESTIVAL

The Big Drum Festival of Union Island (located midway between Grenada and St. Vincent) marks the end of the dry season. On this occasion people introduce social commentary and satire in their dances and theatrical performances. The Big Drum

Cuatro

As the Spanish colonized the islands of the Caribbean, they brought many things that were peculiar to their native country including musical instruments. Guitars were very popular, and as time passed several new variants developed. At least four different instruments were adapted from the six-string Spanish classical guitar: the requinto, the bordonua, the cuatro, and the triple, each of which produces a unique tone and pitch.

The cuatro (which means “four”) is much like a guitar. Originally it had only four strings, but around 1875 it acquired five sets of double strings.

Dance, influenced by African and French traditions, is performed on the last day of the festival.

The Big Drum dance is common to many Caribbean countries. The term “big drum” has nothing to do with the size of a drum. Rather it refers to a large communal gathering of different tribes for a social reason, whether a wedding or a gathering to show respect for the ancestors. These tribes were originally West African, and the songs and dances are derived from their traditions. The significance may be historical or religious. The songs are mainly in patois, interspersed with many ancient words related to African spiritual beliefs, spirits, or ancestors. Such a gathering and dance is also known as Gwa Tambu.

A Big Drum dance begins with the soloist (the chantwell), who opens with a musical statement and repeats it. The chorus joins in, and the song develops into a call-and-response performance. As the chorus continues, two brass drums (boulas) enter to play a nation theme (of any one tribe) and the solo drum (kata) enters soon after with a quicker tempo. At this point the dancers enter, moving to the drumbeats. It is the flourish and color of the dance, together with the drumbeats, that give this ceremony its distinctive nature.

✿ UNION ISLAND MAROON FESTIVAL

The annual Maroon Festival held at Union Island (located midway between Grenada and St. Vincent) celebrates the culture of the Maroons, who are descendants of escaped slaves. This festival is celebrated three days before or after the full Moon night in May. It marks the beginning of the planting season. An exhibition of traditional foods and crafts is held during this festival.

✿ NINE MORNINGS CELEBRATION

Observed in: Kingstown and Calliaqua

Observed on: Nine days before Christmas

The origins of this festival, unique to St. Vincent, are unclear, although popular belief relates it to the novena of the Catholic Church on the nine days before Christmas. It is believed that in the 1920s a Vincentian member of the Dominican Order (a Catholic order) initiated a tradition of celebrating a Christmas novena in the early hours of the morning. After the early morning church services, some worshippers took to walking back to their homes, while others stopped off for sea baths.

Gradually it became customary for the boom drum bands (musicians playing goatskin drums and wooden flutes) to accompany the walkers. Street dancing followed, and in time, the character of the Nine Mornings' celebration changed. Over the years the number of walkers grew, and with the advent of the steel drum band a carnival-style nine mornings tradition evolved. Street vendors joined the celebration, selling drinks made from ginger and sorrel as well as holiday cakes and sweets. A later addition was the tradition of the carolers, who went house-to-house singing Christmas carols. In Kingstown cyclists decorated their bicycles with lights and joined the walkers. Picking up hot bread from bakeries also became a tradition.

Nine Mornings became particularly popular with young people, because rules and regulations are relaxed on this day, giving them an opportunity to socialize freely with other young people.

The Nine Mornings practice is entirely unique to St. Vincent and provides a wide-ranging view of Vincentian culture. The money collected during this period is used to pay for the revelry on Boxing Day.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

Among the black Caribs of Central America, the most important ritual connected with a birth is the practice of couvade. It marks the resumption of normal life after the birth of a child by the mother while the father symbolically takes to bed as if bearing the child. Baptism of infants is the norm and is performed in a church.

Among upper- and middle-class couples dating is restricted. Girls are married at an early age, usually between 16 and 18. It is customary for an unmarried woman to wear a garter on her right leg; the garter is removed only when she marries.

Marriages follow Catholic tradition with the priest who will conduct the marriage ceremony being consulted before fixing the date for a marriage. On the day of the marriage the bride dresses in a white gown. The bride and groom exchange rings and kiss. Once the ceremony is over, the newlyweds bow to receive a blessing.

✿ DEATH

Vincentian funeral ceremonies, which combine Christian and African traditions and beliefs, begin at night. The family members and friends of the deceased participate in the funeral rites. The men create a sacred space by making a tentlike roof out of canoe sails. Within the shelter they play card games, tell traditional folktales, sing, and dance traditional dances such as the punta and circle dances. Food and beverages made of rum and local roots are served to the family members and close friends.

Everyone stays for the rites through the night because it is said that anyone leaving before dawn may invite the wrath of the dead and be exposed to his or her revenge. In the morning following the wake the body is carried to a church where customary Christian rites are performed. The body is then buried according to Christian custom.

A nine-night wake is observed following the death. The rituals include praying and lighting candles. Vincentians make sure that the wishes of their abari (dead ancestors) are followed. They place food, flowers, traditional costumes, and other items of day-to-day use over the altar to please the departed soul.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The Republic of Sudan is the largest and one of most diverse nations on the African continent. The witness to a string of civil wars that severely scarred the nation, Sudan remains in the shadow of a 21-year civil war that ended in January 2005.

In ancient times, northeast Sudan was known as Nubia, the homeland of Africa's earliest black culture. Its history is well documented by Nubian monuments and artifacts as well as written records from Egypt and Rome from 3800 B.C.E. onward. In antiquity Nubia was a land of great natural wealth, of gold mines, ebony, ivory, and incense, resources that were much envied among her neighbors.

The three earliest Nubian cultures were all Bronze Age, the A-Group (3800–3100), the C-Group (2300–1550), and the Kerma culture. The A- and C-Groups were located in northern Nubia. For a long time anthropologists thought the A-Group people were seminomadic herdsmen, but more recent evidence has found that a line of kings lived in Qustul in northern Nubia as early as, or even earlier than, the first pharaohs of Egypt. The people of the A-Group and the C-Group interred their dead in pit graves lined with stone. Pottery and cosmetic articles were placed in the graves with the bodies, perhaps because it was thought that such objects would be useful in the afterlife.

By 1550 a series of kings with their capital at Kerma ruled Nubia. In contrast to the cultures of the A- and C-Groups, these kings were interred in huge round tombs, and hundreds of their retainers were killed and buried with them, perhaps to serve as companions or servants in the afterlife. The people of the Kerma culture were skilled at metallurgy, and their thin-walled pottery was sought after. Egypt and Cush, as the Egyptians referred to Nubia during this period (c. 2000–1559), were now engaged in more extensive contact.

Egypt controlled various parts of Nubia from about 1950 to 1000. Forts, trading posts, and temples styled after those of the Egyptians appeared in Cush, and the Nubian ruling class began to worship the Egyptian gods and adopt their hieroglyphic writing system. The Egyptians, for their part, significantly increased their material wealth with the gold, ebony, and ivory they took from Nubia, and many of the fabulous treasures found in the tombs of Egyptian kings were made of materials from Nubia.

By 800 the Egyptian Empire had broken down into quarreling petty states. In 747 the Egyptian city of Thebes was threatened by northerners, and the Egyptians sought protection from the Nubian king. The Cushite king Piye marched north from his capital at Napata, rescued Thebes, and reunified Egypt. As often happens the invited Cushite armies decided to stay, and Cushite kings reigned over both Nubia and Egypt for the next century. The armies of Assyria ended this era when they invaded Nubia in 663; the Nubian king fled south to his capital at Napata. By 200 the Nubian capital had been moved even farther south to Meroe. During this period (200 B.C.E.–300 C.E.) the kings were still interred in pyramid tombs and constructed temples dedicated to both Nubian and Egyptian gods in a fused Egyptian-Roman-African style. Sometimes called Nubia’s Meroitic Period, many scholars regard it as the high point of the empire’s history.

By 250 C.E. the culture of Nubia had been radically altered, perhaps because new groups (the X-Group) had moved into the Nile Valley, and the Meroitic era gave way to the Ballana period (250–550). The pyramid tombs previously favored by Nubian kings were replaced by the great tumulus burials of the Ballana kings, who were joined in their death by sacrificed retainers, horses, camels, and donkeys. In the seventh century Nubia was converted to Christianity. Because of the skill of Nubian archers, the people of Nubia were able to resist forced conversion to Islam until 1400.

In 1821 the Egyptian army, sent by Muhammad Ali (c. 1769–1849), crushed the Sudanese resistance, and Sudan was forced give up Coptic Christianity under Islamic Egyptian rule. However, Egyptian efforts to extend their rule into the southern part of Sudan prompted a strong revolt led by Muhammad Ahmad (1844–85), who claimed to be a Mahdi, “the one guided by divinity.” Egyptian moves to penetrate the southern part of Sudan proved futile, and the Egyptians were ultimately forced to abandon their plan to conquer the region. After Mahdi’s death, Khalifa Abdullah, a Sudanese tribal leader, took up the cause of Mahdi’s resistance. A series of battles were fought between the Mahdists and the English, who now controlled Egypt. Eventually, an Anglo-Egyptian force led by Herbert Kitchener (1850–1916) was successful in destroying the power of the Mahdists, and the region fell to the Anglo-Egyptian forces.

After centuries of foreign rule, Sudan gained its independence on January 1, 1956. Post-independence, the country was constantly disrupted with coups by military rulers. The biggest irony of Sudan’s era of coups was the experience of Colonel Muhammad Gaafur al-Nimeiry (b. 1930), who led a bloodless coup in 1969 against the incumbent president. President Nimeiry’s oppressive policies, in turn, generated another revolution, and President Nimeiry was himself ousted in a coup led by the Sudanese People’s Liberation Army (SPLA) in 1985.

The numerous changes of regime took their toll on the people of Sudan. Violent fights between Muslims and Christians occurred frequently, and by the early 21st century Sudan had become a haven for international terrorists. Sudan’s economy had been crippled by the numerous sanctions imposed by world organizations. The country that once suffered at the hands of foreigners continued to suffer at its own hands. The Darfur region suffered tragically. The war there between progovernment militia and

Nubian Queens

Throughout the history of Nubia, women were more important culturally and politically than they were in other cultures of the time. And although the Nubians ended up adopting the gods and goddesses worshipped by the Egyptians, there was one major difference: The Egyptians placed the Sun God Ra at the center of their spiritual universe, but the Nubians were devoted followers of Isis, the queen of all the goddesses. This emphasis on the female element in their spirituality may explain why, in the course of its history, Nubia had 10 queens who reigned in their own right. And there were six others who, although they ruled with their husbands, were still regarded as important figures in the country’s politics. These queens were called gore (“ruler”) and kandake, which means “queen mother.”

The central role of queens in the political structure of Nubia can be traced to early Cushite traditions, and Queen Amanirenas illustrates the power these women wielded. In 24 B.C.E., when Rome ruled Egypt, it was common practice for Nubia to raid Egypt. On one such occasion Kandake Amanirenas joined the party. When the Romans challenged the Nubians, the kandake led the army into battle. After defeating the Romans she showed the low esteem she had for them by vandalizing a statue of Augustus Caesar and carrying the head back to Nubia as a trophy.

rebels killed tens of thousands and displaced some two million more.

A predominantly Islamic nation, Sudan is also home to a significant number of Christians and non-Arabs, who live in the southern part of the country. The decision to make Arabic the official language of Sudan and the imposition of the Islamic Sharia Law by the present government has met with strong opposition from the non-Muslim and non-Arabic speaking population, and plunged the country into an era of more bloodshed.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in North Africa, the Republic of Sudan is bordered on the North by Egypt and the Red Sea; on the east, by Eritrea and Ethiopia; on the south, by Kenya, Uganda, Congo, and the Central African Republic; and on the west, by Chad and Libya. Topographically Sudan is dominated by plains and plateaus. The streams passing through the country meet the two tributaries of the river Nile—the Blue Nile and the White Nile—which flow through Sudan. The confluence of these rivers north of Khartoum forms the river Nile.

The northern part of Sudan receives very little rainfall, and dust storms are common. The central part of Sudan, however, receives enough rainfall to sustain agricultural activities. Nevertheless desert storms and droughts wreak major havoc throughout the region.

❁ ECONOMY

Agriculture is the backbone of the Sudanese economy, and crude oil is a major revenue generator. However, the economy has suffered immensely due to a string of droughts and ongoing conflict in the region. The government is faced with the daunting task of framing sound economic policies that will bring economic stability to the country. Agriculture remains Sudan's most important sector of the economy, employing 80 percent of the workforce and contributing 39 percent of the gross domestic product (GDP). Most farms, however, rely on rain and are thus vulnerable to drought.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Sudan is home to more than 600 tribes and 147 languages. Based on lifestyle and culture, the people of Sudan are classified as Northerners, Westerners, and Southerners. Northerners, who live in the northern part of Sudan, are predominantly Muslim (most of them belong to the Sunni sect), speak Arabic, and adhere to Arab culture. The inhabitants of central Sudan are referred to as Westerners and are also mainly Muslim. Agriculture is their main source of livelihood, and most of them are employed as agricultural laborers or farmers. (The inhabitants of central

Muhammad Ahmad, Mahdi

Muhammad Ahmad lived in Sudan under Anglo-Egyptian rule during the second half of the 19th century. He claimed to be a Mahdi, one graced by divinity, and led an army of believers to fight against the Egyptian occupation. He modified the diktats (harsh decrees) of Islam and called off the pilgrimage to Mecca, which every Muslim is required to undertake once in his or her lifetime, for Sudanese Muslims during the period of the struggle. For the duration of the struggle he said it was every Sudanese Muslim's obligation to stay and fight against the nonbelievers.

Sudan are known as Westerners because they migrated from West Africa.)

The Southerners, as the name suggests, live in the southern part of the country. Mostly Sudanic and Nilotic people, they maintain their traditional indigenous beliefs. Southern Sudan is also home to the country's Christian population. People speak the Nilotic language and are farmers. An ethnic stronghold, the region is home to Bari, Dinka, Shilluk, and other indigenous tribes. Almost 80 percent of the Sudanese population lives in villages and small towns. Women live a life full of restrictions and are expected to perform their traditional duties (raising children, looking after the house, and the like).

❁ CUISINE

A staple of the diet of Sudan is bread called kissra, which is made from corn or durra (a type of sorghum) and is eaten with stew. Niamiya and miris are the favorite stews of Sudan. The basic stew is made of dried onions, spices, dried meat, and peanut butter. Elmaraara and umfitit are the country's favorite appetizers. They are made from parts of the sheep's body such as the liver, stomach, and lungs to which peanut butter, onions, and salt are added. These appetizers are consumed raw.

Soups are important in the Sudanese diet. A special soup made out of the hoofs of sheep or cattle is known as kawari and is very popular. Elmussalaammiya is another popular soup, which is made of flour, spices, liver, and dates. Moukbbaza (banana paste) is the favorite dish in eastern Sudan. Milk and other dairy products play a vital role in the diet of the Westerners.

Fruit beverages such as karkadai, aradaib, gud-daim, and tabaldi are immensely popular in Sudan. During the holy month of Ramadan, bilumur is the preferred drink and is made from corn flour and spices.

Fun Fact

The word sudan is derived from the Arabic word, Bilad al-Sudan, which means, "the land of the blacks."

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: January 1

Fun Fact

The Arabic name for the White Nile River is Bahr Al Abyad, and for the Blue Nile, Bahr al-Azraq. The rivers are so named because of the color of their water.

Independence for the people of Sudan is greatly valued since the country was under foreign occupation for millennia. The Egyptians ruled over Sudan from as early as 2000 B.C.E. After the Egyptians came the British, who made Sudan a British Protectorate in the 19th century. Sudan became a sovereign republic on January 1, 1956, after gaining independence from Egypt and Britain.

On this day, all public and private institutions are closed. The day is marked with official speeches and patriotic songs commemorating the sacrifices made by the people of Sudan during their struggle for freedom.

❁ UPRISING DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: April 6

Uprising Day is celebrated to commemorate the coup that restored power to the people of Sudan.

On April 6, 1985, after suffering for years under the oppressive regime of the then-president Muhammad Gaafur al-Nimeiry, the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) started a popular uprising in Khartoum. A bloodless coup followed, President Nimeiry was overthrown, and an interim government was handed the reins of the country.

❁ MAY REVOLUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 25

Fun Fact

Consumption of pork and shellfish by Muslims is strictly prohibited according to Islamic law, and Sudanese Muslims abide by it.

May Revolution Day is celebrated in commemoration of the successful 1969 coup led by Colonel Muhammad Gaafur al-Nimeiry. After assuming power, he passed a directive banning all political parties and managed a bloodless conclusion to an extremely bloody civil war by signing a peace agreement. Although Nimeiry became a tyrant and was himself overthrown, the May Revolution is still commemorated because it was an important watershed event in the nation's history.

Religious Holidays

❁ EL AM HEJIR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

El am Hejir marks the first day of the Islamic calendar and the first month is called Muharram. It is believed that on this day in 622 C.E., Muhammad fled from Mecca to Medina (which is about 200 miles to the north of Mecca) with his family and followers. The Muslim calendar starts from this date.

Sudanese Muslims celebrate this day by wearing new clothes. People visit friends and family to wish them a happy new year.

❁ MOULOU

Mouloud, also called Mulid al-Nabi or Mawlid al-Nabi, commemorates the anniversary of the birth of Muhammad and falls in the third month of the Islamic year. ❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, or the Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of Ramadan, Islam's holiest month. Muslims worldwide observe a month-long daily fast that begins every day at dawn and ends at dusk. They believe that observing this fast builds a stronger spirit. Consumption of water and food is strictly prohibited during daylight hours for the entire month of Ramadan. After sunset, families break the fast with a special family meal called fa-tur. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijah, the 12th or pilgrimage month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, is celebrated in honor of Ibrahim's (Abraham's) readiness to obey God's command and to sacrifice his own son. Just as Ibrahim was about to kill his son, however, God replaced the child with a goat. On this day sheep are offered as sacrifices, and the meat is distributed among the poor and needy as well as family, friends, and relatives. In addition, the holy pilgrimage, or hajj, takes place in this month. The Koran requires all Muslims to make this journey at least once in his or her lifetime if it is financially and physically feasible to do so. The pilgrimage to Mecca is the fifth pillar of Islam's Five Pillars of faith.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is celebrated all over the world to commemorate the birth of Jesus. Sudanese Christians attend church on Christmas Eve and decorate their homes. Christmas carols are sung, and the life and teachings of Jesus are showcased through special prayer services and theatrical plays. For Christmas families share a special meal.

Before the military junta came to power, Sudanese Christians and Muslims lived peacefully, celebrating each other's festivals. In fact on the birthday of Muhammad (Mouloud) and on Christmas and Easter, special celebrations took place in the streets of Sudan, adding to the festive atmosphere. Special sweets were distributed, and the whole of Sudan wore a holiday look. In the 21st century Christian holidays are low-key affairs while Mouloud is celebrated with the same zest as before.

BIRTH

Midwives are an integral part of Sudanese culture. Sudanese women depend on them for prenatal care as well as ensuring a safe childbirth. Geem, the Dinka tribe's word for "midwife," means "the receiver of the gifts of God."

When a male child is born in Sudan, his father (or another male relative) whispers the adhan (the Muslim call to prayer) in the child's right ear: "There is no God but Allah and the prophet Muhammad is Allah's Messenger." These words resonate with the fundamental belief of every Muslim, making it one of the most important Islamic ceremonies, and one performed religiously by all Sudanese Muslims.

Tabneek is another ceremony of great significance, during which a respected member of the family gently rubs a softened date or honey on the newborn child's upper palate. By doing so, it is believed that the good qualities of the respected family member are passed on to the child. This is the first thing fed to the newborn immediately after birth.

A ceremony called Aqiqah is performed on the seventh day after the child is born. A sheep is offered as a sacrifice to thank Allah for his kindness and for blessing the family with a child. The meat is distributed among the poor and the needy.

COMING OF AGE

Circumcision of males and females, which marks the acceptance of the child as an adult, is customary in Sudan. This age-old practice is still prevalent in modern-day Sudan and is scrupulously followed by Sudanese Muslims. For boys circumcision is performed either at birth or when the child is at the threshold of manhood. Muslims consider this a hygienic practice, and it has deep religious significance throughout the Muslim world.

Female "circumcision," the genital cutting ritual often referred to by critics as female genital mutilation (FGM), is performed to mark a girl's transition into womanhood. FGM, in particular excision and infibulation, is widely practiced in northern Sudan and to a much lesser extent in the south. It is estimated that 89 percent of the women in Sudan have had some form of FGM done to them.

Vigorous attempts have been made to eradicate FGM in Sudan. It was the first African country to outlaw FGM, starting with the 1946 Penal Code, which prohibited infibulation but permitted sunna, the less destructive form of FGM. The law was ratified again in 1957, when Sudan became independent. In 1991 the government affirmed its commitment to the eradication of the traditional form of FGM. The 1993 Penal Code, however, does not mention FGM, leaving its status unclear.

DINKA RITUALS OF INITIATION

The Dinka tribe has its own initiation ceremony. At the onset of youth, the boy becomes a parapuol, “the one who is no longer milking (cattle).” The initiation ceremony begins with the etching of a V-shaped scar on the youth’s forehead after which he is sent to the camp in the plains along with the other initiates. These young initiates are now warrior-protectors, who have to protect their cattle from the wild animals for a stipulated time period.

The initiation ceremony begins in the harvest season and involves singing of the clan’s traditional songs by the initiates on the night before the main ceremony. The next day the boys sit in a row with their legs crossed, waiting for the initiator to engrave the scar pattern of their clan on their foreheads. They are expected to endure the pain of this scarring in silence as screaming is considered a sign of weakness. After the ceremony the boy is proclaimed a man and a warrior, and is deemed ready for marriage. Even today the Dinka tribe follows this tradition.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Sudan different wedding customs are followed in different regions. The most common wedding ceremony is that of the Sudanese Muslims. It begins with the bridegroom ceremony wherein the bride’s mother offers a garland of flowers to the groom in a ceremony called umbul-umbul. She whispers the traditional keris, or secret message, asking him to keep his spirits high while working relentlessly for the betterment of his family. Led by a procession of women holding candles, the groom sits next to the bride under an umbrella, which symbolizes respect. Then, as a mark of respect and expressing gratitude toward their parents, the groom and the bride bend and kiss the knees of their parents, seeking their forgiveness and blessings. They also promise to serve them for the rest of their lives. This ceremony is called sungkem and is performed in front of a fountain to draw a parallel between the perennial flow of love of parents and the continuous flow of water in the fountain.

Then the nincak endog, or the egg-breaking ceremony, takes place in front of their house. The bride waits at the door with her back to the house while the groom stands outside the door, facing her. Their relatives burn seven broomsticks and throw them away to discard the seven bad habits that are believed to ruin a marriage. After the egg is broken, the groom is proclaimed as the rightful master of the house. The bride cleans her husband’s feet using water from the kendi or an earthen jug and then breaks the kendi. She crosses over a log and vows obedience to her husband.

After the marriage ceremony, the bride and groom are blessed by their relatives, and sawer (coins, candy, and turmeric rice) is thrown at the couple to bless them with happiness and good fortune.

❁ DEATH

The Egyptians had a significant influence on burial customs in ancient Sudan. This region was part of the Cushite kingdom ruled by the kings of Meroe. Despite the fall of the Egyptian Empire in the 12th century B.C.E., the ancient Egyptian burial customs continued to be practiced until the third century C.E. Archaeological sites in the ancient city of Meroe include a number of pyramids. However, these lack the grandeur of their Egyptian counterparts.

In modern-day Sudan, which is predominantly Muslim, the dead are buried in accordance with the rules laid down in the Koran.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Virtually all the prehistoric sites excavated in Suriname to date indicate extensive contact and influences moving east from the Venezuela-Orinoco area over long periods of time. Twenty-nine sites in southern Suriname, in the Sipaliwini savannah, have been identified, primarily places where stone tools were made using quartz and rhyolite. The points, knives, and scrapers are comparable to the Las Casitas complex of Venezuela, dated at 9,000 to 8,000 years ago. Both oval and round hammerstones—used to split the artifacts from the cores—were found in the stone debris, evidence that these were stone-working sites. The Sipaliwini people lived on the savannahs in small camps and procured their food by hunting, gathering, and fishing. They hunted small game with bows and arrows. Following the Sipaliwini culture, the archaeological record indicates that no one lived in the region of Suriname for several thousand years, although it is also possible that the inhabitants simply left no evidence that has survived.

Around 4,000 B.C.E., the South American Tropical Forest culture replaced the Hunter-Gatherer culture. Several inter-related developments associated with its appearance happened fairly quickly: The major dietary element was cassava (or manioc), which was produced by shifting cultivation; processing the bitter cassava required a sophisticated ceramics technology to produce pottery containers for storing cassava products (cassiri, cassava beer, for example), a matapí (a plaited press), a grater, and a griddle. The partial conversion to agriculture forced other changes: People lived in villages more permanently; their homes were better constructed than the dwellings of the hunter-gatherers; and these villages were established where the land favored cultivating cassava.

Orinoco River

The Orinoco, 1,330 miles long, is one of the longest rivers in South America. Starting on the Venezuelan-Brazilian border, in the Cerro Delgado Chalbaud, in the Parima range, the Orinoco meanders through Venezuela, making a wide arc, first flowing southwest, then west, north, and finally northeast, where it drains into the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Paria. A notable feature of the Orinoco river system is the Casiquiare Canal: Initially an arm of the Orinoco, the Casiquiare Canal flows into the Rio Negro, a tributary of the Amazon, forming a natural canal between the Orinoco and Amazon Rivers. The river is navigable for much of its length, and archaeologists posit that the canal served as a major cultural link between Amerindians in Venezuela and Suriname. The Orinoco, as well as the Amazon River, is inhabited by the Amazon River dolphin.

Around 1,000 (or perhaps earlier) an agrarian people inhabited the Central Orinoco region of Venezuela. This culture is distinguished by its pottery: red and white painting; characteristic handles; and figures shaped like humans and other animals attached to the pottery (adornos). This culture is called Saladoid after the Venezuelan town where the site is located, Saladero. The Saladoid pottery tradition is found in a vast area stretching from the Central Orinoco to Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic over a long period of time. At sites in Suriname, one a village of slash-and-burn farmers, ceramics characteristic of the Saladoid tradition have been found. Two later pottery styles of the Orinoco-Venezuela region—Barrancoid and Arauquinoid—are also found in Suriname.

The oldest site in Suriname is Kaurikreek, a village situated in West Suriname on a creek with the same name. Kaurikreek is Suriname's oldest ceramic site and evidence that Suriname had a bona fide Tropical Forest culture long before the current era began. The Kaurikreek site has produced two charcoal datings: one about 3,600 years old (c. 2400–1600 B.C.E.) and another about 2,500 years old (c. 800–500 B.C.E.). The pottery has appliqué decorations in geometrical patterns, made by pressing thin strips of clay onto the clay of the vessel wall before it was fired.

Between 300 C.E. and 1000 freshwater conditions occurred in the coastal plain, and a group of Amerindians developed a complex system of permanent agriculture to grow cassava. They built up clay mounds for both their villages and their cassava fields, creating all the elements for permanent cultivation. Around 300 a group raised two mounds for villages in Suriname, where early-Mabaruma pottery of the Barrancoid Tradition has been found. This community remained on these mounds until around 600, when it appears that they either abandoned them or were forced to flee. Both of the mounds were deserted, and new mound-settlements were constructed farther west. A very different Venezuelan pottery style—the Hertenrits style—has been found at these more recent mounds. Hertenrits pottery belongs to the Arauquinoid style, not the Barrancoid.

Although many of the cultures identified in Suriname came from the west, a couple of centuries prior to European colonization (1492) a group arrived in Suriname that came from the southeast, probably around the lower Amazon. These people were slash-and-burn farmers. Their pottery is referred to as Koriabo style and dates to about 1200. The Koriabo people dispersed throughout Suriname, although more of their settlements are found in the northern part of the country than in the southern. Only one area of Suriname was not inhabited by the Koriabo, the western coastal area. Koriabo sites have been found in the interior of western Suriname and along the entire coast of the Guyanas as far as west Suriname. This geographical distribution may mean that the Hertenrits people were so strong that they stopped the westward expansion of the Koriabo people along the coast.

While the prehistory of Suriname is characterized by three food procurement systems—hunter-gatherers, farmers with shifting cultivation, and farmers with permanent cultivation—in colonial times there were only Amerindians who engaged in shifting cultivation, with cassava as their main crop. No pottery of any prehistoric group has been connected with the pottery of the Amerindians from the colonial period, including that of the Koriabo, who arrived in Central and East Suriname a couple of centuries prior to 1492. It seems likely that the permanent agrarian cultures were already declining when the Koriabo people arrived in the 13th or 14th century to displace them.

When the prehistoric period ended and by the time the first Europeans appeared, the Late Hertenrits culture had a relatively powerful position, and the Koriabo people controlled the remainder of the coastal region. The Spanish came to the region in 1593 but did not settle in Suriname, since it did not look like a lucrative prospect to them. The first Europeans to settle in Suriname were the Dutch, around 1602. The Dutch West India Company, which came to control the region and exploit it, was founded in 1621. In 1650 the English entered the region and developed sugar and tobacco plantations along the west bank of the Suriname River. The settlement they established is now Paramaribo. In 1667, the Dutch and British signed the Treaty of Breda whereby the Dutch traded New Amsterdam (New York) to the English in exchange for their territory in Suriname. They named their new colony Netherlands Guiana.

The Dutch brought slaves from Africa to work on the plantations. The slaves were treated brutally, and many fled the plantations and settled in the interior of the country. The Dutch called these Maroon, or Bush Negro, settlements.

When France annexed the Netherlands during the Napoleonic Wars in 1799, the British seized the opportunity and reoccupied Suriname. But when Napoleon (1769–1821) was defeated in 1816, they returned the territory to the Dutch. Finally in 1863 the Dutch abolished slavery and after 1870 brought in laborers from India, China, Portugal, and Java in place of slaves.

In 1948 the region was integrated into the Kingdom of the Netherlands and in 1950, the Dutch granted home rule to Suriname. Finally after a spate of rioting, complete independence was granted in 1975. A coup in 1980 established military rule in Suriname, and Lieutenant Colonel Désiré Bouterse (b. 1945) became the military ruler. In 1982 when soldiers killed 15 journalists and a number of politicians and union officials, however, the Netherlands stopped all aid to Suriname. This decision severely damaged the economy of the newly independent nation.

Eventually in 1988 democracy was restored, and the insurgency decreased. A peace treaty between the government and the guerrilla groups was signed in 1992. A series of presidents followed, but none of their different policies slowed the plummeting currency. Finally in January 2004, Suriname changed its currency from the guilder to the dollar.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the northern part of South America, Suriname is surrounded by French Guiana, Guyana, and Brazil. It is the smallest independent country in South America. The Surinamese terrain is characterized by fertile coastal areas in the north and tropical forests and savannah grasslands in the south. The two important rivers of Suriname are the Marowijne and the Corantijn. The highest point in the region is Juliantop at 4,220 feet above sea level.

Suriname enjoys a tropical climate with no major variations in temperature throughout the year. The temperature ranges from 70°F to 93°F. There are two rainy seasons: from April to July and from November to January. Although hurricanes are not a threat in the region, Suriname is prone to sibibusi (which means “forest broom”), heavy thundershowers.

Suriname has a wide variety of flora including several species of orchids, as well as flowers such as fajalobi (passionate love) and beliconia. Fauna are represented by blue poison frogs, monkeys, hummingbirds, macaws, deer, wild boars, anteaters, armadillos, howler monkeys, and the capybara.

❁ ECONOMY

Suriname is struggling to stabilize its economy, which has been marred by high inflation due to bad ecoomic policies. With the assistance of the Dutch government, the Surinamese government has introduced a number of progrowth fiscal policies aimed at liberalizing the economy, encouraging privatization of industries, and developing the gold and other mining sectors. The bauxite industry is the main revenue generator for the Surinamese economy; it constitutes 70 percent of the country's export earnings and contributes 15 percent to the nation's gross domestic product (GDP). Some of the export items of Suriname include alumina, aluminum, rice, crude oil, shrimp and fish, bananas, and lumber.

Fun Fact

During the English-Dutch negotiations, the English commissioners offered to return New Amsterdam in exchange for getting back their sugar factories on the coast of Suriname. The Dutch, however, declined the offer.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Suriname is a melting pot of cultures, a mixed inheritance from its past as a colony. The nation is home to Hindustanis (Indians who migrated to Suriname in the 19th century), Creoles (people with mixed—black-and-white—ancestry), Amerindians, Maroons (descendants of Africans brought to Suriname as slaves), Chinese, and some Europeans. Dutch is the official language of Suriname, although English is also widely spoken. Hindustani (a dialect of an Indian language), Javanese, Djuka and Saramaccan (both English-based Creoles), and Sranang Tongo (also known as Taki-Taki, a native language of Creoles) are also spoken in Suriname. Around 48 percent of the population is Christian (Roman Catholic and Protestant), while the remaining citizens adhere to Hinduism, Islam, and indigenous religious beliefs.

Suriname is famous for its kaseko music, a fusion of traditional folk and popular styles of music of the Americas, Africa, and Europe. Songs are sung solo or in a choir, and there are also “call and response” songs that require interaction between the main singer and the audience. Musical instruments such as snare drums, trumpets, saxophones, and skratji (a large drum) are used. The Surinamese also enjoy jazz, calypso, rock, and reggae.

Maroon women are very skillful in the art of making bowls and utensils from the branches of the calabash tree, which bears hard-shelled, gourdlike fruit on its trunk and main branches.

❁ CUISINE

Although Surinamese cuisine is primarily African in nature, the influences of Creole, Indian, and Chinese cuisines are also evident. Some of the tradi-

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, beginning on December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Suriname elaborate parties are held on Owruyari (the local name for New Year's Eve) throughout the country. In the capital city of Paramaribo, street parties and cultural events, as well as artistic performances, are organized by the Surifesta Foundation, the body that has been put in charge of arranging New Year's Eve parties by the government of Suriname, and turning them into tourist attractions. Besides good music and great food, people are treated to a colorful display of fireworks to announce the arrival of the new year.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to celebrate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Although the AFL's strike was postponed, the international holiday was celebrated anyway.

❁ EMANCIPATION DAY

Observed by: General public
Observed on: July 1

Emancipation Day, also known as Freedom Day, commemorates the abolition of slavery by the Dutch on July 1, 1863. This day is also known as Ketu Koti ("breaking of the chains of slavery") among blacks in Suriname. Descendants of the slaves celebrate this day with great joy and enthusiasm, and special parties are planned. Exhibits, cultural events, and official speeches are the highlights of Emancipation Day events held throughout Suriname. Many people also share stories with the younger generation that narrate the experiences of their forefathers who were slaves to emphasize the importance and value of freedom.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 25

On November 25, 1975, Suriname obtained independence from the Netherlands and declared itself a republic. Suriname was a Dutch colony that had been called Netherlands Guiana since its occupation by the Dutch in the 1600s. In 1799 British forces occupied the region when Napoleon conquered the Kingdom of Netherlands during the Napoleonic Wars. However, after an Anglo-Dutch Treaty was signed between Britain and the Netherlands in 1816, Suriname once again became part of the Kingdom of the Netherlands and remained a Dutch colony until its independence on November 25, 1975, after peaceful negotiations between the Surinamese and the Dutch government.

Independence Day celebrations are held throughout the country, but the biggest displays take place in the capital city of Paramaribo. The president of the country unfurls the national flag and presides over the celebrations and military parades. He also hosts a dinner for foreign dignitaries who attend the Independence Day celebrations. Cultural events such as folk dances, folk songs, and folk theater are integral parts of the celebrations.

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day, also observed as St. Stephen's Day by Catholics, is celebrated on the day after Christmas on December 26. There are several accounts to explain this tradition. In one version, Boxing Day was first celebrated as the day when Catholic churches opened the alms boxes used to collect money for charitable purposes and distributed the contents to the poor of the parishes. Another version states that, because the household staff in the United Kingdom worked on Christmas Day, they were given the day off on December 26 to celebrate with their friends and families. As the staff was leaving, their masters would put money in boxes and present the boxes to them.

Most of the countries that were once under British rule observe this holiday. Suriname is among them, because it was under British rule for a brief period between 1799 and 1816.

Locally, December 26 is also known as tweede kerstdag (the second day of Christmas). The Surinamese visit family members, friends, and neighbors on this day and exchange gifts and greetings as well.

Observed by: Hindus
Observed on: Full Moon day in Phalguna (or Falgun), the 12th month of the Hindu lunisolar calendar

Holi, the Festival of Colors or Phagwah (also Fagwah), is an annual Hindu spring festival that is celebrated over a two-day period in either March or April of the Gregorian calendar. It is the most exciting Hindu festival and is also called the Festival of Colors because people throw colored paper and water on each other as part of their celebrations.

The origin of the festival can be traced to Hindu mythology. A demon king named Hiranyakashyap was granted a boon by Lord Brahma (one of the Hindu Trinity, the creator of the universe) that made him almost invincible. Assuming he would never be killed and would live for eternity, he proclaimed himself god and banned worship of any Hindu deities. However, his young son Prahlad was an ardent worshipper of Lord Vishnu (the second member of the Hindu Trinity, the caretaker of the universe) and, although he respected his father, he refused to worship him. This angered Hiranyakashyap, who then passed a death sentence on his own son. However, his attempts to kill his son failed because Lord Vishnu came to Prahlad's rescue each time. Eventually Hiranyakashyap sought the assistance of his sister Holika. She had been granted a boon by Lord Brahma that protected her against fire. But Lord Brahma had also warned her that if she used this boon for evil purposes the fire would destroy her.

Holika did not pay attention to Brahma's warning and decided to use her boon to help her brother get rid of Prahlad. On a full Moon night in the month of spring, Holika sat on a pyre with Prahlad in her lap and asked Hiranyakashyap's soldiers to set the pyre on fire. Lord Vishnu's blessings protected Prahlad, and he escaped unhurt, but Holika perished in the flames. Holi is celebrated among the Hindus as the victory of good over evil.

On the night before Holi, a huge bonfire is lit (symbolic of the burning of Holika), and devotees sing traditional songs while moving around the bonfire in circles. On Holi Surinamese Hindus wish each other "Shubh Holi" ("Good Holi") or "Holi Mubarak" ("Happy Holi") and throw colored powder, water, and even balloons filled with water on each other. They distribute sweets among their neighbors on this day and sing traditional songs. Non-Hindus also join in the celebrations

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus Christ was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second person of the Holy Trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The day is as much about Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

After two of his disciples had fetched a donkey for him to ride, they placed their clothes on it to make a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the prediction of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches and strewed garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, the humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Last Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events supposed to have occurred during the final meal on this day. First Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist: a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church, Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rituals associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter. The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, “command,” because Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to remember the Crucifixion of Jesus. Some Surinamese observe a fast from Ash Wednesday (first day of Lent), for 40 days up to Good Friday and a partial fast from then until Easter. Some fast only on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. In Suriname on Good Friday, people visit their local churches and pray to Jesus, taking inspiration from his life and teachings.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday), and he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and Resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus’ Resurrection. For this reason it is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter entire families gather to celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and regeneration taken from the ancient pagan spring festivals. In Suriname people attend midnight prayer services for Easter and celebrate Jesus’ Resurrection by lighting candles. A festive spirit fills the churches as people sing devotional hymns. Surinamese exchange beautifully decorated Easter eggs and visit friends and family members.

The first Monday after Lent is celebrated as Easter Monday.

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, the Muslim Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan and the beginning of much-awaited festivities. Muslims all over the world observe a strict, month-long, sunrise to sunset fast during the holy month of Ramadan, and Eid al-Fitr marks the end of the fast and abstinence. On this day Muslims in Suriname wake up early in the morning and attend local mosques to offer prayers to Allah on this auspicious day. They thank Allah for his benevolence and exchange greetings.

All Surinamese Muslims distribute food, money, or clothing among the poor and needy on this day. Muslims visit their friends and family members and are also greeted by non-Muslims on this day. Children receive gifts and money from their elders and feast on sweets and candies. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world, because it is the day chosen by the Catholic Church to celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. Christmas celebrations in Suriname begin on December 6, when children wait for Goedoe Pa (“Dearest Daddy,” or the Surinamese Santa Claus) to give them presents. Post-independence, children in Suriname are taught that Goedoe Pa is a black man who, along with his black servants, travels throughout Suriname and delivers presents to children if they have behaved well in the past year. Children leave cookies and milk for Goedoe Pa and his servants, and in the morning they find gifts with poems attached to them.

During Dutch rule the legend of Sinterklaas, or Santa Claus, was very much a part of Surinamese culture and a white man dressed as Santa Claus greeted young children and distributed gifts. Children were told that Sinterklaas had a host of black servants who worked for him. However, in an attempt to create a sense of pride among the ethnic black Surinamese, the story was modified, and Goedoe Pa replaced Sinterklaas, although the essence of the celebration remains the same.

On Christmas Eve the Surinamese decorate their Christmas trees and place the presents underneath. Catholic families attend a midnight services and then a special Christmas Mass on Christmas Day to celebrate the birth of Jesus. On Christmas Day children open their presents and dine on Christmas cakes, sweets, and candies. Also, friends, neighbors, and relatives join in the celebrations, and gifts and greetings are exchanged. Special Christmas parties are also held, and Surinamese Christians and non-Christians celebrate Christmas as a united community.

❁ MISS ALIDA BEAUTY PAGEANT

Observed in: Paramaribo

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 30

The Miss Alida Beauty Pageant is an annual African-Surinamese cultural event that takes place on June 30, a day before Emancipation Day, in the capital city of Paramaribo.

The event is dedicated to the memory of a Maroon girl named Alida, who was extremely beautiful. (A Maroon was a fugitive black slave in the West Indies in the 17th and 18th centuries, or the descendant of such a slave.) While working as a slave in the house of a white owner, her beauty caught the attention of the white man. But the jealous white mistress of the house could not stand the insult of being compared to a black slave girl and killed Alida brutally. After independence, a beauty pageant was started in honor of Alida and was aptly named the Miss Alida Beauty Pageant.

Every year African-Surinamese women participate in the pageant. They are judged by a panel of experts based on their dancing skill, creativity in designing a traditional dress, and storytelling skills.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Suriname among ethnic tribes the name of the child is based on the time of birth, the circumstances during birth, and even the place of birth. Also many people name their children after their ancestors to honor them. They believe that, in this manner, their beloved ancestor has come again to live among them as the child.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Bigi jari is a Surinamese ritual that takes place when a person reaches an age that ends with a 0 or a 5 (for example, 10, 20, 25, 35, and so on). Bigi jari is a big party thrown by the birthday person on reaching particular ages; all friends and family members are invited. Feasting, singing, and dancing are part of the celebrations, and guests bring birthday presents and flowers for the birthday person.

Among the descendants of the Javanese Muslims of Suriname, when a boy reaches puberty he has to undergo the ritual of circumcision. This ritual is considered important as it helps the boy complete his transition from boyhood to manhood.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Since the continent of Africa is humanity's first homeland, it should not be surprising that archaeologists continue to find evidence of human habitation far back in prehistory. The first discovery of ancient human remains—dating back 100,000 years—in southern Africa occurred in 1960 at Border Cave in the Lebombo Mountains, north of KwaZulu-Natal near Swaziland. In the eastern parts of Swaziland, archaeologists have also discovered human remains that are more than 100,000 years old.

For the last 1,000 years Swaziland has been home to users of the Sotho and Nguni languages. The Bantu-speaking population began migrating south from the central parts of Africa around the 16th century. One clan of the Nguni tribe (a Bantu-speaking people) moved toward the east coast and settled in areas around modern-day Maputo, now the capital city of Mozambique. It is believed that during this period the Dlamini Dynasty (the ruling family of Swaziland) was founded. Certainly there were chieftains of the Dlamini lineage in the region by the 18th century.

There were frequent clashes between the native tribes and the Nguni, and in the 18th century the Nkosi Dlamini, a subgroup of the Nguni tribe, under the leadership of their chief Ngwane III, were forced to move out of Maputo and eventually settled in the northern parts of Zululand (modern-day South Africa and KwaZulu-Natal Province) in 1750. Between the death of Ngwane III in 1780 and the accession of Sobhuza I Ngwane IV (1795–1836), Ngvudgunye (Zikodze; r. 1780–1815), the father of Sobhuza I, occupied the kingdom's throne. In 1815 Sobhuza I came to power. He faced stiff opposition from the native Zulus and was forced to move farther north, along with his tribe in the 1800s, eventually settling in the Ezulwini Valley. Even today the valley remains the center of Swazi rituals and royalty.

In the 1840s Mswati II (? 1820–68) assumed power as the new paramount king of the Nguni. He was a ferocious warrior but also a gifted diplomat. He dreamed of building a great kingdom for his people and began raising a powerful army. He waged wars with neighboring tribes and overpowered them. He established Swazi rule in the northwest and stabilized the southern boundaries of his kingdom with the Zulus. However, there were frequent skirmishes between the Zulus and Swazi. Around this time the British had also gained considerable ground in South Africa and were fighting the Zulus in that region. Mswati II took advantage of this and sought British assistance in fighting against their common enemy.

This newfound friendship between the British and the Swazi brought white missionaries, traders, and hunters to the region. Mswati II also leased vast amounts of land to the Europeans; slowly and steadily, the British began exercising considerable control over the mineral resources of the region, as well as having a say in the administrative and security matters of the kingdom.

Following the death of Mswati II, the British established total control over Swaziland in 1877. In 1881 the Swazi, the British, and South African governments reached an agreement over issues relating to independence, governance, and control of the mineral resources, as well as security concerns. The agreement provided that the South African authorities would administer the region, which they did until 1902, when South Africa lost the Second Boer War to the British.

As a result of the Boer War Swaziland was declared a British Protectorate. In 1921 after the reign of Queen Regent Lobatsibeni (r. 1899–1921), who had ruled the country for more than 20 years, King Sobhuza II (r. 1921–68) became the ngwenyama (the lion, or king) of Swaziland. In 1944 the British High Commissioner recognized the authority of the king of Swaziland to issue orders that were legally binding for the Swazi.

After World War II the British wanted to make Swaziland a part of South Africa. However, intensification of racial problems in South Africa forced the British to start preparing Swaziland for independence. In the 1960s political parties mushroomed in the urban areas of Swaziland. Prominent among them was the Imbokodvo National Movement (INM), which began pressing for Swaziland's complete independence. In 1964 in response to these demands, the first legislative elections were held in Swaziland, and the INM was voted into power.

Once in office the INM intensified its demands for complete independence, and in 1966 a constitution was drafted that made Swaziland a constitutional monarchy and granted self-governance to its people. Finally on September 6, 1968, the United Kingdom granted full independence to Swaziland.

Fresh elections were held in Swaziland, and the INM candidates were once again elected. King Sobhuza II, however, dissolved the government on April 12, 1973, on the pretext that the constitution was drafted by the British and, thus, did not reflect the Swazi way of life. In 1979 a new parliament was convened that had leaders mostly appointed by the king, and a new constitution was adopted that vested all authority in the king.

In 1982 following King Sobhuza II's death in 1982, Queen Regent Dzeliwe (r. 1982–83) assumed power. According to Swazi tradition, a king was authorized to have more than one wife. Thus, after Sobhuza's death internal conflicts between Queen Regent Dzeliwe and Queen Regent Ntombi surfaced, which led to the displacement of the former. Queen Regent Ntombi's only son, Prince Makhosetive (Mswazi III), was named heir to the throne of Swaziland. Initially the government was administered by Queen Regent Ntombi with the advice of the supreme traditional advisory body, called the Likoqo. The Likoqo had been the traditional advisor of Swaziland royalty since the beginning of the kingdom. Every decision of the royalty was taken only

Boer Wars

The wars between the British and settlers of Dutch origin (the Boers) living in South Africa were termed the Boer Wars. The First Boer War was fought between 1880 and 1881; the Second Boer War was fought from 1899 to 1902.

The First Boer War, also known as the Transvaal (South African Republic) War, was fought between the British and the Transvaal Boers after the region was annexed by the British in 1877. The war began in 1880, and after initial showdowns between the two forces, a truce was signed in 1881 that gave the right of self-governance to Boers in Transvaal under British supervision.

The Second Boer War was sparked by the discovery of the largest gold field in the world in Witwatersrand near Pretoria. British and Boer commercial interests clashed, which culminated in a full-fledged war. More than 75,000 lives were lost before the Boers finally surrendered in 1902. The Treaty of Vereeniging was signed by the British and the Boers on May 31, 1902. It ended all hostilities between the two warring factions.

after discussion with the Liqoqo. In 1982 after the death of King Sobhuza II, the Liqoqo voted to support Queen Regent Ntombi and her son Prince Makhosetive. After Queen Regent Ntombi assumed power, however, internal differences grew between her and the Liqoqo over decisions relating to the administration of the kingdom. In October 1985, due to ongoing disputes and differences of opinion with the Liqoqo, Queen Ntombi exercised her power and dismissed leading members of the advisory council.

Finally on April 25, 1986, after her son's return from England, where he had been studying, Prince Makhosetive was enthroned as King Mswazi III. When the prince assumed power, he immediately abolished the Liqoqo due to internal disputes. The kingdom of Swaziland is still ruled by King Mswazi III and his council of ministers. The Public Order Act enacted by the king prohibits political parties, and police permission is required to hold a meeting in Swaziland.

In the early 21st century the country was facing a huge crisis due to a persistent drought in the region that began in 2002. The UN was providing food aid to Swaziland. At the same time, Swaziland was afflicted with the world's highest known rates of HIV/AIDS infection, and the country's average life expectancy at birth was less than 37 years.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Kingdom of Swaziland (also known as Ngunwane) is a small, landlocked nation, flanked by Mozambique in the east and by the Republic of South Africa to the north, south, and west. The Kingdom of Swaziland is one of the smallest countries in southern Africa. It is named after the Bantu-speaking Swazi tribe, whose members constitute the majority of the population. They derive their name from King Mswazi II, who realized the dream of establishing the kingdom of Swaziland.

Geographically Swaziland is divided into three regions: the Highveld (veld is an Afrikaans word that means "vast open space"; it also refers to the high plateau of South Africa that runs across Swaziland as well), the Middleveld, and the Lowveld. The Highveld has an average altitude of 3,937 feet and is situated along the western borders of Swaziland. The capital city of Mbabane is located in the Highveld. The region is home to mountains, rivers, and deep gorges.

The Middleveld is located 2,297 feet above sea level and is the most densely populated region of Swaziland. The commercial and industrial city of Manzini is located in the Middleveld. The Lowveld is 820 feet above sea level and is sparsely populated because, in the past, the region has experienced severe outbreaks of malaria, which, in turn, affected development. Thorn trees and grasslands abound in the Lowveld region.

Emlembe (the place of the spider) is the highest mountain of Swaziland and is located along the western border of the country in the granite region of Ukhahlamba (the barrier). Piggs Peak is a small town in the northwestern part of Swaziland, which is known for its pine plantations and logging industry. The Lubombo is a mountain ridge that lies along the eastern border. The mountain is broken by the gorges of three rivers. These are the Ngwavuma, the Umbuluzi, and the Usutu, the largest river that flows through Swaziland. The Usutu gorge is also in the lowest point of Swaziland (69 feet above sea level). The Komati, the White Umbuluzi, the Black Umbuluzi, and the Ndlotane are the other important rivers in Swaziland.

The climate of Swaziland varies from region to region. The Highveld region is mainly humid and wet and experiences heavy rainfalls during summer (December–March). The Middleveld and Lowveld are drier and experience tropical to subtropical climates toward the east. The Lowveld has very hot summers with temperatures soaring as high as 104°F. The eastern parts of the Lowveld have a subtropical climate and remain comparatively warm even during winter, while the rest of the Lowveld is subject to a frosty winter.

Swaziland is home to a wide variety of wildlife including zebras, elephants, baboons, warthogs, vervet monkeys (a species of green monkey found in sub-Saharan Africa), leopards, waterbucks, jackals, and numerous species of antelopes. It has a wide variety of flora including lilies, cape primrose, gladioli, ferns, aloes, mahogany, ironwood, and red ivory, to name only a few.

❁ ECONOMY

More than 80 percent of the Swazi population are dependent on subsistence farming, which means that they produce just enough grain to meet the needs of their own families. Wood pulp and sugar are major revenue generators for the economy. The government is also trying to develop the tourism industry and attract foreign investment. Mining activities in the region are restricted to stone quarrying and coal mines. South Africa is the major trading partner of Swaziland.

In the early 21st century the economy of the country was in shambles due to a series of droughts that have affected the region since 2002. More than one-fourth of the country's population was left impoverished, and the country began to depend on food aid from the UN. In 2004 the government of Swaziland declared a major humanitarian crisis and

While Dlamini is the surname of the royal family, the king is also referred to as nkosi, which means "ruler" or "king." The founder of the Dlamini Dynasty is unknown, but the Swazi consider Ngwane III to be their first king. Thus, modern-day Swaziland is also known as Ngwane in honor of its first king.

sought international help. Unfortunately, more than one-third of the country's adult population has also tested positive for AIDS/HIV, which has been a cause of great concern for the government.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The culture and lifestyle of Swaziland is a blend of traditional customs and modern outlook. Although Swazi are the dominant population of Swaziland, the country is also home to a small number of Zulu, Europeans, and Mozambican refugees of African and European descent. English and siSwati (or Swati) are both official languages, but English is the official written language.

Traditionally men and boys wear loincloths made from skins of wild animals. Girls wear grass skirts, but the women prefer cow skin skirts and put their hair up in the style of a bun or a beehive. A married woman traditionally wears a goatskin apron over her shoulders, besides the cowskin skirt. The Swazi live in homesteads called umuti. These are traditional beehive huts made of dry grass. Polygamy is the norm in Swazi society, and each wife has her own hut and yard, which is fenced with reeds for privacy. The umuti is divided into three main parts: the sleep area, the cooking area, and the storage area.

The head of the family is called the umnumzane and is entitled by law to have more than one wife. He is responsible for advising his wives on domestic and social affairs and for looking after the survival of the household. Typically the umnumzane spends time with the other male members of the family, especially his sons, to discuss the duties and responsibilities attached to growing up and manhood. In Swazi society children are expected to help their elders in the daily chores. Young boys are assigned the responsibility of tending the cattle, and the girls either take care of their younger siblings or help their mother with domestic chores. Respect for elders is a core value of Swazi society and is inculcated in every child from a very early age.

The sangoma (traditional diviner) and the inyanga (doctors who specialize in traditional medicine) are an integral part of Swazi society. Every family has a sangoma, who is chosen by the family's ancestors. He is consulted about various concerns, such as illness, death, and crop failures, and he helps diagnose the cause of the problem through kubbula, a process of communication with supernatural powers. The inyanga helps determine the cause of sickness, using an ancient method called kushaya ematsambo, or the bone-throwing skill. The inyanga throws animal bones on the ground in a particular manner, and the pattern formed by the bones reveals the cause of the illness and is interpreted by the inyanga.

Every aspect of Swazi life, from birth to death, is governed by special ceremonies. The two most important are the incwala, or "the first fruits" or "first harvest ceremony," which is held in December; and the uMblanga (or uHlanga), the reed dance ceremony, which is held in August or September. The cultural dance of Swaziland is called sibhaca and is performed by groups of men. Locals and visitors alike admire this vigorous rhythmic style of dancing and the colorful costumes worn by the dancers.

❁ CUISINE

Corn is the staple diet of the people of Swaziland. It is generally eaten as porridge and is served with a wide variety of stews. Historically Swazi are meat-eaters but, due to the increasing poverty in the region, few people can afford meat. The Swazi diet has been reduced mostly to vegetables, milk, and corn.

As a beverage, beer made from sorghum or corn is preferred. Manganu is a kind of beer made from the fruit of the marula, or manganu, tree (a single-stemmed deciduous tree belonging to the mango family), and is also a local favorite.

National Flag Day, celebrated on April 25, commemorates the adoption of the national flag of

Manganu, or Marula, Tree

In Swaziland, the marula tree (a single-stemmed deciduous tree belonging to the mango family) is called manganu or banganu. The manguna fruit has four times as much vitamin C as an orange. It is also high in potassium, magnesium, and calcium. The fruit of the manguna has been used as a cure for scurvy, and manguna oil, derived from the seeds of the manguna tree, is high in anti-oxidants, oleic acid, and vitamin E.

The manganu is so popular in Swaziland that an annual Manganu Festival is held in the Royal Palace. The king and the queen mother are presented with beer by each family, after which all the subjects of Swaziland drink the beer.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

The May 1 observance of Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, was established in 1889 by the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations as a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world. The first demonstrations and celebrations were scheduled for the following year, 1890, and the event was to be coordinated with a strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), to demand an eight-hour workday. The AFL ended up canceling the strike, but the new holiday was celebrated as planned. Labor Day is a national holiday in Swaziland, and all government and private institutions remain closed on May 1.

✿ BIRTHDAY OF KING SOBHUZA II

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 22

King Sobhuza II of Swaziland was born on July 22, 1899. After the death of his father King Bhunu, he was proclaimed the king of Swaziland in 1901. However, due to his youth, his mother, the queen mother of Swaziland Queen Regent Labotsibeni ruled the region in his name.

In 1902 after the Boer Wars, the region was declared a British Protectorate. In 1921 King Sobhuza II assumed power as the king of Swaziland and played a vital role in buying back the land rights in Swaziland from Europeans who had obtained them on lease from King Mswazi II. He continued to rule the kingdom until his death in 1982. He is remembered for upholding traditional Swazi values and for reclaiming the land rights of Swaziland from Europeans. He also played a vital role in negotiating with the British for the independence of Swaziland.

On this day a memorial torch kept at the King Sobhuza II Memorial Park at Lobamba is lit in honor of his birthday. The memorial torch is only lit on special days such as the king's birthday, Independence Day, and during visits by foreign heads of state. People also visit a pictorial exhibit at the Memorial Park to relive the life and legacy of King Sobhuza II.

✿ REED DANCE

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August–September

The uMhlanga, or reed dance, is a special ceremony for unwed girls and childless young brides, who pay their respects to the king and queen mother of Swaziland. It usually takes place in the month of August or September over a period of eight days. During this celebration the king and other suitors select their brides from the countless beautiful young women who participate in the ceremony from all over the country.

To open the festival the girls are segregated into different groups by age. Then they march to vast beds where they cut the reeds with long sharp knives. They use plaited wild grass to tie the reeds together and stack them in bunches. By nightfall they return to the royal kraal. A kraal is a collection of huts and, in this case, it also refers to the royal village, which is Lobambo.

The next day the girls present the stacks to the queen mother as a token of respect. Then they sing and dance, each hoping to catch the eye of a suitor.

Fun Fact

King Sobhuza II, the king of Swaziland, ruled the kingdom for 61 years and is believed to have had more than 70 wives and 250 children.

Fun Fact

The term Boer means “farmer” in Dutch and refers to rural inhabitants, especially of South Africa, descended from Dutch Huguenot colonists.

On the seventh day the king attends the dance ceremony and, if he finds a suitable bride, shows his approval by the touch of his hand. He also orders the slaughter of cattle, and a lavish feast is prepared. On the eighth day the girls return to their villages, and those who have found suitors start making arrangements for their marriages.

INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September 6

Before it gained its independence in 1968, the kingdom of Swaziland had been a British Protectorate. After World War II the British had hoped that the region would eventually become part of South Africa. However, due to the racial problems in South Africa, reflected in the infamous policy of apartheid, the British decided not to pursue that option. In the 1960s political parties were formed in Swaziland, and they voiced the people's demand for total independence. King Sobhuza II also pressured the British government, which eventually relented and granted total independence to Swaziland on September 6, 1968.

This event is commemorated with great celebrations all over Swaziland. The king and queen of Swaziland preside over the Independence Day festivities and unfurl the national flag. Several dance and musical performances highlight the Independence Day celebrations in Swaziland.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is the day designated for Christians to celebrate the birth of Jesus, although this is not the day on which he was born. Because no one knows when Jesus was born, the Catholic Church chose this day because it falls within the period of time when pagan cultures celebrated the winter solstice, the longest night of the year, to welcome the return of the light.

Swazi living in urban areas travel to the countryside to celebrate Christmas with their friends and families. On Christmas Eve devout Catholics attend the Christmas Eve Mass, which is celebrated with Christmas carols and devotional hymns sung by church choirs.

On Christmas Day, friends and family get together to exchange gifts and greetings. Children are allowed to open their gifts, and they join their elders in singing Christmas carols.

BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 26

The day after Christmas, December 26, is celebrated as Boxing Day. The day is also known as the Feast of St. Stephen, in honor of the first Christian martyr. On this day, boxes used by churches for collecting money for the poor are opened and the money they contain is distributed; hence the name, Boxing Day. Also, on this day gifts are given to those who render useful services to the community throughout the year.

Boxing Day is celebrated in most of the countries that are members of the British Commonwealth. The Kingdom of Swaziland was declared a British Protectorate in 1902 and was under British rule until its independence in 1968. Swaziland has retained the British tradition of celebrating Boxing Day the day after Christmas.

The Siyavuka is an annual cultural festival held in Mbabane in Swaziland. Siyavuka, a nonprofit organization that is part of Swaziland's National Council of Arts and Culture, organizes the event. The annual cultural festival provides a perfect platform for Swazi artists, craftspeople, and performers to showcase their talents in the ancient art forms of Swaziland.

The objective of the event is to create a general awareness among the Swazi of their traditions and rich cultural heritage. Through a number of musical and dance performances, as well as art exhibits and workshops, the annual Siyavuka Festival encourages a sense of pride in their work among Swazi artisans and performers.

❁ INCWALA

Observed in: Ngabezweni
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December–January

Incwala, or the Festival of First Fruits, is a sacred annual ceremony that aims to renew the strength of the Swazi king as well as that of the kingdom. It is the most sacred ceremony for Swazi. It is usually performed in December or January. Astrologers decide the exact date after a thorough study of planetary movements. During this period the king goes into seclusion.

In this ceremony, the bemanti (the learned) people, a small clan living in the Manzini area of Swaziland, travel through Mozambique and toward the Indian Ocean to collect the foam of the ocean waves, which is believed to possess medicinal and mystical powers. Their return to Swaziland is called Little Incwala and marks the beginning of the main celebration called Incwala.

Adolescents from all over the country assemble at the royal kraal where the king orders them to collect branches of a shrub called lusekwane (a type of acacia).

The elders build a sacred hut for the king using the branches of the lusekwane shrub collected by the youth. Swazi warriors, wearing ox hides and leopard skins, dance throughout the ceremony and request the king to join in their celebrations.

On the fourth day of the ceremony, the king comes out of his seclusion with his face blackened with medicines. His body is covered with bright green grass and has a silver-colored monkey belt (a belt made from monkey-skin) around his waist. His headdress is made up of large black plumes and feathers from the sakabula bird (a long-tailed widow bird native to the KwaZulu Natal Midlands). The word sakabula is a Swazi word that means “show-off”

Imbokodvo National Movement

The Imbokodvo National Movement (INM) is a political party formed by traditional Swazi leaders, including King Sobhuza II and members of his council. The INM emphasized maintenance of the Swazi lifestyle and avoidance of the “corrupting” influence of Western values. In 1964 the first legislative elections were held in Swaziland by the colonial government, and the INM won all 24 seats in the legislature. The INM, in its talks with the colonial powers, incorporated the demand made by radical parties to grant immediate independence to Swaziland. Swaziland became an independent nation on September 6, 1968.

or “flirt”). He dances with the warriors while the queen mother looks after the guests. The king eats a pumpkin called lusekwa, especially kept aside for this ceremony, and throws it toward his warriors. This signifies that the king has had the first fruit and now the local Swazi people can consume their new crops.

The fifth day is a day of rest, and no activity takes place. However, on the sixth day a huge bonfire is lit and all articles representing the past year are burned. Also, the king, along with his people, prays to the ancestral spirits to extinguish the fire by sending down rains, which will indicate a good beginning for the new year.

Dancing and feasting take place and the ceremony ends after the successful weeding of the king's fields by the youth assembled for the ceremony.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child is marked with elaborate celebrations in Swaziland. Each clan in Swaziland has its own set of animals whose furs are used to make headdresses for the tribesmen of that particular clan. Immediately after birth, the family of the child collects plants and animal furs specific to the child's clan and burns them together. The child is then made to inhale the smoke since the Swazi believe this will ensure his or her good health and well-being.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Swaziland, as in other African countries, payment of lobola, or bride-price, to the bride's family is required from the groom's family. The lobola is generally paid in the form of cattle since cattle are considered wealth. The number of cattle offered by the groom reflects his family's status. Payment of lobola

Fun Fact

Once married, a bride cannot leave the family, unless of course she is thrown out by the groom's family on charges of witchcraft, theft, or adultery.

in phases is also acceptable. However, the marriage ceremony takes place only after the entire payment of lobola has been made.

On the day of the engagement, or kuteka, the bride's side of the family arrives at the groom's home to sing traditional songs and perform ceremonial dances. Then the groom takes his bride into his home. During her stay she is subjected to harsh treatment. She is rudely woken up at odd hours and taken to the cattle shed. Here she is verbally abused by the women of the groom's family until she is reduced to tears. This is done to acknowledge that the bride is an unknown entity in the family, who might be the cause of disputes in the future.

The actual marriage ceremony, which is called umtsimba, also takes place in the cattle shed. During it the bride is introduced to the ancestors of the family. After smearing the bride's forehead with red ochre (red clay), a goat is slaughtered, and its skin is tied around her wrist. Then messengers carry selected portions of the slaughtered goat, umsasane, and deliver the meat to the bride's family and relatives.

In another ceremony, the groom's family hands over a girl child to the bride who is smeared with animal fat. Although the actual parents of the child retain their parental rights, the girl is now considered to be the bride's child, and the bride is put in charge of his or her upbringing.

Swazi men who can afford it are polygamous. In a polygamous homestead, each wife usually has her own huts and yard surrounded by reed fences for privacy. There are at least three beehive huts in each wife's yard: one used primarily for sleeping, one for cooking, and one for storage (brewing beer).

DEATH

The Swazi traditionally bury their dead. The funeral ceremony is a simple affair. After the cleansing of the body of the deceased, he or she is laid to rest next to the homestead. Kings and members of the royal family, however, are buried in mountain caves.

The Swazi believe in ancestral spirits and perform religious ceremonies from time to time to maintain communication with them.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The region now known as Scandinavia has been inhabited by various cultures since the last glaciers receded. After the end of the last Ice Age (c. 9500 B.C.E.), Denmark and Sweden were joined. This period is called the Ancylus Age, after a small mollusk (Ancylus fluviatilis) common at this time. The Ancylus Age was followed by the Litorina Age (named after another common mollusk) around 7500, when the Litorina Sea was formed. The Ancylus and Litorina Ages mark the beginning of the Nordic Stone Age, when people started moving into the region. During the Upper Paleolithic nomadic tribes, called the Ahrensburg culture, wandered over the plains of Denmark and southern Sweden, hunting reindeer.

By about 6000, the reindeer and their hunters had moved into northern Scandinavia to be followed by the Maglemosian culture. North of these people the Fosna-Hensbacka culture inhabited the shores of thriving forests. The Ahrensburg, Maglemosian, and Fosna-Hensbacka cultures were able to survive the cold of northern Europe because they had already mastered fire and knew how to build boats and fashion stone implements. The cultural traditions of these early peoples were much like those of other far northern groups in areas that included modern Finland, Russia, and across the Bering Strait into the northernmost strip of North America.

During the sixth millennium, tribes now called the Kongemose culture hunted aurochs (a species of cattle), wisent (a species of bison), moose, and red deer in the rich broadleaf forests of southern Scandinavia. Nomadic hunter-gatherers, descendants of the Fosna and Hensbacka cultures—the Nøstvet and Lihult—continued to roam the region to the north of the Kongemose people. Toward the end of the sixth millennium the Kongemose people were supplanted by people from the south, the Ertebølle, who had learned the ceramic arts from neighboring agrarian peoples.

During the Neolithic period, between the fifth and fourth millennia, the Ertebølle also took up farming and herding, becoming part of the megalithic Funnelbeaker culture. As the Funnelbeaker tribes pushed farther north in the fourth millennium, the Nøstvet and Lihult nomadic tribes, like the Ertebølle, learned to make pottery—but did not take up agriculture—from the advancing farmers and became the Pitted Ware cultures. Sometime near the end of the fourth millennium, some scholars think the Pitted Ware tribes stopped the advancing farmers and pushed them into southwestern Sweden. Others, however, believe that the farmers were not killed or chased away, but that they were assimilated by the Pitted Ware culture. At least one important settlement, the Alvastra pile-dwelling, may have been mixed.

Ekornavallen, consisting of huge megalithic chambers, was a Neolithic burial site where generation after generation was laid to rest. One of Sweden's most puzzling stone monuments also dates back to this period (c. 3000–2500), Ales stenar (“Ale’s Stones”), one of the largest ship settings, 220 feet long and 62 feet wide. The shape was constructed with 59 carefully selected stones weighing between 1,100 and nearly 4,000 pounds. The reasons for building Ales stenar remain opaque. Most ship settings were burial monuments (for example, Lugnarö Mound, c. 700 B.C.E., where the remains of four burials have been found), containing one or more graves, but no graves have been found at Ales stenar. Some believe that the stones are a monument built to honor a ship’s crew lost at sea, while others think it is an ancient astronomical site used to measure the times of the year.

There are no written records that would indicate the language spoken by the earliest nomadic Scandinavians, but they were overrun by the Battle-Axe culture, patriarchal tribes who probably spoke a dialect of Proto-Indo-European. As the Indo-Europeans advanced into Uppland and the Oslofjord, they brought with them the ancestral language of the modern Scandinavian languages. During the Nordic Bronze Age, an advanced civilization manufacturing bronze weapons and bronze and gold jewelry appeared in Denmark, Sweden, and parts of Norway. This is also the period (2300–500) when most of the many petroglyph carvings in Sweden were created.

By and large these carvings are of an agricultural nature and depict warfare, ships, domesticated animals, and other motifs from daily life. There are also petroglyphs depicting sexual activities at Bohuslän, dated between 800 and 500.

The Roman historian Tacitus (c. 56–c. 120 C.E.) described a people he called Suiones, who had ships with a prow at both ends (the shape thought of as “Viking” ships). The word Suiones is the same as the Anglo-Saxon Sweon, whose country was Sweoland (Svealand).

The historian Jordanes, writing around the middle of the sixth century, mentioned a tribe named Suehans, thought to refer to the Suiones of Tacitus. During this period the kings were actually warlords, or chieftains. They reigned over petty kingdoms in the region that would eventually become Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. Beowulf and the Norse sagas also recount the politics and disputes of these territories in some detail. One of the most powerful of these chieftains was the Swedish king, the king of the Sweon, who is said to have ruled Sweorici. Some historians regard this era as the beginning of Sweden as an autonomous nation.

In the late Iron Age and early Middle Ages, sometimes called the Viking Age, the Norse moved into Sweden. Swedish Vikings, whose name came from a Scandinavian word for the Norse warriors, traveled and traded extensively and accumulated a good deal of wealth and power over the next century. These people spoke Old Norse, an Indo-European language, and used the Proto-Germanic runic alphabet called the Futhark, a name based on the first six letters. Strictly speaking, not all of the Scandinavians are properly referred to as Vikings. The Vikings were seafarers and pirates, who raided up and down the coasts of Europe and the British Isles, including the settlements of other Scandinavians. The Vikings were also the first Europeans that we know of who tried to settle in North America. Runes were already hundreds of years old by the dawn of the Viking Age, and the earliest surviving runic inscriptions have been dated to the second century C.E.

Among the most striking monuments dating to this era are the rune stones. The tradition of raising such stones probably goes back to the old custom of raising menhirs to honor the dead or mark a burial site during the Pre-Roman and Roman Iron Ages. Although runes were known throughout the Germanic-speaking world, they were used more in Scandinavia during the Viking Age than in any other time or place. Somewhere between 5,000 and 6,000 runic inscriptions have been identified in Scandinavia, and more than half of them are in modern-day Sweden. Many of the rune stones in Scandinavia record the names of participants or some who died in Viking expeditions. Among them are around 25 Ingvar stones in the Mälardalen district of Sweden. The Ingvar rune stones commemorate members of a disastrous expedition into present-day Russia in the early 11th century. In the same century Christianity was introduced into Sweden.

In 1389 Norway, Denmark, and Sweden entered into a union called the Kalmar Union and consolidated themselves under a single monarch, while each country maintained its independence and pursued its diverse interests. Following several violent disagreements in 1521 King Gustav I (1496–1560) of Sweden (House of Vasa), often regarded as the “father” of the modern state, removed his realm from the Kalmar Union and established a nation-state. Shortly thereafter he rejected Catholicism, and Sweden became a party to the Protestant Reformation.

Following its military successes in the Thirty Years' War (1618–48) Sweden expanded its boundaries to include Finland and the Baltic countries. During the 17th century Sweden prospered and became a European power. However, in the 18th century, with the rise of Russian imperialism, Sweden lost Finland to Russia, and the Russian Grand Duchy of Finland was formed.

Sweden's recent past has been relatively peaceful. The last war was the campaign against Norway in 1814, which established the dominance of Sweden in a union with Norway, but this union was dissolved in 1905. During World Wars I and II, Sweden remained neutral, which turned out to be advantageous for Sweden. After World War II ended, most of the participating European countries were trying to revive their industry and economy, but Sweden was already a well-established country with a stable economy.

Sweden became a member of the European Union (EU) in 1995 and accepted the Euro as its standard currency in 1999.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Sweden occupies most of the area on the Scandinavian Peninsula and shares its western border with Norway. Most of Sweden consists of low-lying plains, except for a fairly small Scandinavian mountain range (Skanderna) that separates it from Norway. The north of Sweden, generally known as Norrland and comprising nine provinces, lies above the Arctic Circle and is forested. In the east and the southeast, the country has a long coastline with the Baltic Sea and the Gulf of Bothnia. This 4,350-mile-long coastline is regularly cut in with fjords (long, narrow sea inlets).

Sweden has a temperate climate. In the southern parts of the country winters are cold and cloudy, while summers are cool. The climate in Sweden is not as cold as it should be, considering the country's relatively northern position. This is because of the warm currents from the Gulf Stream, which keep the waters warm and the climate temperate. The northern mountains of Sweden, however, have a subarctic climate with chilly winters. Sweden, as in other polar countries, experiences the phenomenon of polar days and nights. In summer the Sun does not sink below the horizon, and there can be daylight for several months. In the same way during winter the Sun does not rise above the horizon, and it remains dark for many months.

The relatively warmer parts of southern Sweden are forested with pine trees and birches. This region is also suited to agriculture. The northern parts of the country remain under snow and are sparsely populated. The tundra vegetation (where tree growth is hindered by low temperatures) is seen here. It comprises grasses, mosses, and lichens. Swedish fauna include the moose, deer, wolf, lynx, and the brown bear. The country also boasts of various species of birds and fish.

Öland

Öland is a tiny scenic island that contains ruins, forts, and around 400 windmills. Öland is a popular place and attracts a huge number of tourists who come there to celebrate Midsummer every year. Öland is reached from Kalmar via a 19,685-foot-long bridge, the longest in Europe.

❁ ECONOMY

Sweden has enjoyed a relatively peaceful and neutral political atmosphere that has been conducive to the growth of its economy. The Swedish standard of living is very high, with minimal unemployment and other such detrimental issues. Apart from excellent internal and external communications, the country has a skilled labor force. The availability of timber, hydropower, and iron ore has been beneficial for development. The agricultural sector is not a major contributor to the Swedish gross domestic product (GDP), compared to the contributions of the industrial and service sectors. The major industries of Sweden are forestry, mining, engineering, high-tech manufacturing, telecommunications, and furniture. Sweden shares good trade relations with the members of the EU and the United States. This is the country that gave us Volvo cars, Ericsson handsets, and world-class furniture from IKEA.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Swedish artists have produced some of the finest works of art in the world. The pioneering work of Mauritz Stiller and Victor Sjöström in the field of cinema is also well-known, while many Nobel Prizes have been awarded to Swedish literature. Sweden ranks third among the countries that have produced the most Nobel laureates.

Swedish music has a long history, and includes many genres of music from folk, to waltz, to pop, to heavy metal. The accordion, clarinet, and fiddle are among the common Swedish folk instruments. In the 1960s, Swedish youth sparked a revival in Swedish folk culture. Many Swedes joined folk musicians' clubs and performed on radio and TV.

Scandinavian death metal bands are mostly based in Stockholm and Gothenburg. Swedish pop bands, such as ABBA, Ace of Base, and The Cardigans, have achieved international success. Meja, Robyn, and Emilia are other successful Swedish singers who have enjoyed worldwide acclaim.

Sweden is well-known for the highly skilled and talented people it has produced. Inventions, such as dynamite and the ATM, are of Swedish origins. Noted scientists, such as Alfred Nobel, who instituted the prestigious Nobel Prize, and Carl Linne, were Swedes.

Swedish Furniture, Phones, and Cars

Among all the major contributions made by Sweden, some are worth a special mention. IKEA, the Swedish home-furnishing retailer, was founded by Ingvar Kamprad in 1943. The name IKEA is made up of the first letters of his name, his property, and his village: Ingvar Kamprad Elmtaryd Agunnaryd. Earlier, IKEA marketed pens, wallets, picture frames, table runners, watches, jewelry, and nylon stockings. The very first furniture was added to the IKEA product range in 1947, and by 1955 the company began designing its own furniture. Today the IKEA products catalogue, showcasing around 12,000 IKEA items, is the second most widely distributed book after the Bible.

Ericsson (Telefonaktiebolaget L. M. Ericsson) is a Swedish telecommunications equipment manufacturer that began in 1876 as a telegraph equipment repair shop owned by Lars Magnus Ericsson. Ericsson is now in a joint venture with Sony, called Sony Ericsson. The company concentrates on supplying infrastructure for all major wireless technologies and modernizing existing copper lines for broadband services.

The Swedish Volvo Group is a leading manufacturer of commercial vehicles, buses, and construction equipment, marine and industrial applications, and aerospace components. The company was founded in 1927, in Gothenburg, as a roller ball bearing maker. The Ford Motor Company, in another joint venture, owns Volvo cars. Volvo is Latin for “I roll,” and was originally a name for the ball bearings that were being developed by the company.

The museums of Gothenburg are famous for the collection of paintings created by renowned artists such as Rubens, Van Gogh, and Rembrandt.

CUISINE

Swedish cuisine is essentially Scandinavian in nature. Fish and meat play a major role. Deer and Moose meat are used in a wide variety of dishes. A typical Swedish day begins with bread and milk. This is supplemented with juice, yogurt, and a bowl of cereal.

The Swedes are heavy coffee drinkers. Other favorite beverages include akvavit, a herbally suffused distillation of potatoes or grain, and glog, a hot, spiced, brandied wine.

Fun Fact

Greta Garbo, Ingrid Bergman, and Anita Ekberg are some of the Swedes who made their name and fame overseas.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world, beginning on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Sweden many cities have fireworks on New Year's Eve. At the stroke of midnight, shivering Swedes wish each other a Happy New Year and toast with champagne and firecrackers. Traditionally Swedes make personal New Year's resolutions and enjoy a special meal on this day, during which salmon, crab, and lobster are usually served. Those who dare venture out in the bitter cold enjoy the displays of fireworks; those who stay at home watch a TV recital of Lord Tennyson's classic poem “Ring Out, Wild Bells” from the Skansen open-air museum in Stockholm. New Year's Day is a national holiday, and schools and offices remain closed.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also as Workers' Day or May Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest celebrations of May Day are associated with the pagan festivals observed by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, the origins of the political occasion are to be found in the unions that fought for decent working conditions. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Sweden, workers hold marches and demonstrations in the streets.

NATIONAL DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 6

June 6 was adopted as the National Day of Sweden, Sveriges nationaldag, in 1980. This day has also been celebrated as the Day of the Swedish Flag, Svenska flaggans dag, since the 1920s. This day was chosen to celebrate National Day because it is also the anniversary of the election of Gustav Vasa as king of Sweden in 1523. King Gustav I is thought to be the person who established modern Sweden and is also considered the father of the nation.

The people of Sweden celebrate this day with strong feelings of patriotism. Every Swedish town is decorated, and there are speeches, music, and the distribution of Swedish flags. The celebrations held in Skansen, an open-air museum in Stockholm, where some 15,000 people gather together with the royal family, is the most noted in the country.

❁ MIDSUMMER'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 24–25 and June 25–26

Midsummer's Eve is an ancient pagan celebration linked to the summer solstice. The importance of this night is to be found in the belief that midsummer plants are at the peak of their miraculous and healing powers, so they are picked at this time. People used to light bonfires to protect themselves from evil spirits said to be roaming at a time when the Sun was turning southward.

Midsummer's Day is one the greatest summer festivals in Sweden. The Swedes celebrate this festival on the longest day of the year (summer solstice). On this day people decorate the front porches of their homes with birches and leafy branches. A majstång ("maypole") is set up in the center of the village square, where all the celebrations take place. The youngsters decorate this maypole and sing and dance around it all night long.

People feast on the year's first potatoes, pickled herring, sour cream, and the first strawberries of the season. On this occasion the Swedish people serve food in the form of a smorgasbord. This is a sort of buffet, where the table is laid with all sorts of dishes, and the diners can choose what to eat. Smorgasbord was earlier used as an appetizer before the main course, but gradually, it has become a complete meal in itself.

The celebration of Midsummer is an old pagan custom, dating back at least to the Viking era. It was a fertility rite: The maypole was a phallic symbol that fertilized mother nature. People prayed for a good harvest in the autumn.

❁ ALL HALLOWS' EVE

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Saturday of November

In Sweden, All Hallows' Eve/Day (Alla Helgons Dag) can be celebrated on any day from October 31 until November 6. This Swedish equivalent of Halloween is a recent phenomenon and is only now catching on with children. On this day schools and offices are closed for either a half-day or a complete day. As in the United States, the children here go door-to-door "trick or treating."

❁ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day is observed on December 26, the day following Christmas, and is only celebrated in a few countries, primarily those that were once British colonies or members of the Commonwealth. It originated in the United Kingdom about 800 years ago as the day when the alms boxes were opened in parish churches, and their contents distributed to poor people. Many churches still have these boxes and open them on Boxing Day.

Servants were also given the day off to celebrate Christmas with their families on Boxing Day. Before World War II it was common for working people (such as milkmen and butchers) to travel around their delivery routes to collect their Christmas boxes or tips, but this tradition is now rarely observed.

December 26 is also St. Stephen's Day. There are two St. Stephen's in history: The first St. Stephen was a very early follower of Jesus and the first Christian martyr. He was stoned to death. The second St. Stephen was a missionary to Sweden in the 800s. He loved all animals but particularly horses (perhaps why there is horse racing on Boxing Day). He was also a martyr and was killed by pagans in Sweden.

Jesus' mortal life. Jesus Christ was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second personage of a holy trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. During Holy Week, weddings, and christenings do not take place in Sweden because such joyous occasions are thought to be inappropriate during such a somber observance.

Palm Sunday is as much about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross. Jesus had already foretold his betrayal and Resurrection to his disciples on the way to Jerusalem from Judea. The day was April 10, 30 C.E., according to some calculations. They stopped at the Mount of Olives, near Bethany, and Jesus sent two disciples to the village of Bethphage to bring a donkey and its foal tied at the crossway of two roads to him. They did so and placed their clothes on the foal to provide a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, a humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

Because palm trees cannot grow in Sweden's climate, some other kind of branches have to take the place of palms; early budding varieties of willow are a common choice. Such branches are brought into homes and offices so that they have leaves on Palm Sunday. These branches have even come to be called palms in many parts of Sweden.

✿ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events that are supposed to have occurred during the meal served on this day. First Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist: a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church, Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rites associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter.

The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, "command," because it is believed to have been the first word spoken by Jesus before he began washing the feet of his disciples: "Mandatum novum do vobis," which means, "a new commandment I give to you" Jesus commanded his Apostles to observe the ritual now known as the Eucharist. Holy Thursday or Maundy Thursday is an important Christian celebration since it also commemorates the Last Supper. It is said that Jesus washed the feet of all the Apostles before the meal, which is believed to have been a seder. In Sweden all churches conduct special prayer services on this day. The priest, while celebrating Mass, reenacts the scenes from the Last Supper. He washes the feet of 12 chosen parishioners just as Jesus did. The mood is somber, and all faithful pray during this day.

In Sweden certain superstitions have been associated with Easter and other major holy days. For example, people once believed that witches were especially active and their black magic especially powerful during this week, and such superstitions (and the fear they arouse) persist even in the 21st century. Many people in Sweden believe that women who practice black magic—Easter hags—are roaming about and practicing witchcraft. In earlier times, they were thought to fly off on brooms to consort with the devil at a place called Blåkulla ("blue hill") on Maundy Thursday, returning the following Saturday. People did everything they could to protect themselves from the evil powers at play on these days. They lit bonfires, shot off firearms into the sky, painted crosses, stars, and other holy symbols over their doors, buried psalters under their thresholds, and hung crossed scythes and axes over their livestock. Hysterical fear of the supernatural even triggered off witch trials from time to time over the centuries, sending unknown numbers of women to the gallows or the stake.

These grim superstitions, however, have a more cheerful legacy in modern times: On Maundy Thursday or Easter Eve Swedish girls (and boys, too) dress up as “hags” and visit their neighbors. Some leave small decorated cards or Easter letters, hoping for a sweet or coin in return. The custom of making Easter letters is especially widespread in western Sweden, where villages vie with each other to see who can make the biggest card. The custom of shooting also lives on in spectacular fireworks displays.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday (Långfredag, “Long Friday” in Swedish) falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to remember the Crucifixion of Jesus. In Sweden Christians observe a fast on Good Friday, and a ritual called “Stations of the Cross” is performed. This is a reenactment of Jesus’ final journey to Calvary before he was crucified. Until relatively recently, all amusement places, including movie theaters, were closed to mark the occasion, and children were not allowed to play. Perhaps that is how this day came to be called Long Friday in Swedish.

HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday) and he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. It is also regarded as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians. On Easter Eve (known as Påskafton in Sweden), many Swedish families get together with friends and eat special foods: eggs are featured, along with pickled herring, lamb; the feast rivals the traditional Christmas smorgasbord. Salted salmon (rimmad lax) is another common dish, a custom that may be traced to the days when Sweden was still a Catholic country and meat was forbidden on Good Friday. This is also the day when children are usually given their Easter eggs, which are usually filled with candy and, sometimes, small toys. Many parents hide the eggs and let the children hunt for them. Children who did not dress up as “hags” on Maundy Thursday usually do it on Holy Saturday.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus’ Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. The origin of Easter celebrations in Europe can be traced back to pre-history, when pagans celebrated the return of spring and honored their Great Mother Goddess Ostara with joyful festivals. It was part of the Roman Catholic Church’s program to convert pagans to Christianity by incorporating and reinterpreting their rituals and symbols, which is how Easter got its name in Germanic countries. The church also incorporated eggs, a well-known symbol of fertility and rebirth, as part of Easter’s celebration. In Sweden Easter is known as Påsk and got its name from the Hebrew holiday known as Pesach. Easter is the central religious observance of Christianity and the entire suite of holidays of the Christian liturgy are scheduled on the basis of the date on which Easter falls. On Easter Sunday people give each other beautifully decorated Easter eggs and play different egg games. The children who get hard-boiled eggs roll them down a roofing-tile, held slanted onto the floor. If the egg hits another egg the child gets to keep both eggs. The dining and exchange of greetings and Easter eggs continue through the next day, Easter Monday, which is the first Monday after Lent. Easter Day (Påskdagen) is a national flag day in Sweden, and both Easter Sunday and Easter Monday (Annandag Påsk) are public holidays.

ST. VALBORG’S EVE

St. Valborg’s Eve, or Walpurgis, is Sweden’s annual feast of the witches. It is the eve of Beltane, believed by medieval Christians to be the occasion of a witches’ Sabbath. People light bonfires to scare them away as they fly overhead toward Germany. The people celebrate around a communal bonfire with fireworks, singing, and dancing all night. For most Swedes though, this festival signifies the end of winter, and they sing special songs of spring that are unique to Sweden. Colorful parades and carnivals are also held all over the country on this day.

St. Valborg’s Eve is also the birthday of the king of Sweden, and flags are raised to salute him. The

✿ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Forty days after Easter

The Feast of the Ascension is a day of special celebration for Christians all over the world. It celebrates the day Jesus ascended into heaven, 40 days after he rose from the dead. In Sweden the day is celebrated by getting up at an extremely early hour of the morning and meeting in a forest glen to hear the birds sing at daybreak. It is also customary for the youth of each parish to visit a nearby parish. They make an excursion together and more often than not end the day with a dance. These outings are called gokotta, or “early cuckoo morning.” It is, however, not a trip free of superstition. If the cuckoo calls from the west, it means good luck; a cuckoo call from the east bodes ill. During the course of the day, the team may indulge in a picnic breakfast that ends with coffee. The festival is generally accompanied by music and song.

✿ PENTECOST

Observed on: Fifty days after Easter

Pentecost, which means “the fiftieth day” in Greek, is usually a two-day observance celebrated by Roman Catholics and some Lutherans in Switzerland. This observance takes place 50 and 51 days after Easter Sunday. On these days, the Swedes attend special prayer services in churches.

The observance is sometimes called Whitsunday and Whitmonday from the white garments worn by those who were baptized during the Easter vigil service. Whitsunday and Monday recognize the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the Apostles and have been celebrated since the third century C.E.

✿ FEAST OF ST. MARTIN OF TOURS

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: November 11

The Feast of St. Martin of Tours, or Martinmas, is celebrated by Swedish Catholics on November 11. This feast honors the Hungarian saint who, as legend goes, hid in a barn when he heard he had been appointed a bishop because he did not believe he deserved the honor. According to the tale, a honking goose exposed his hiding place, so roast goose is the traditional dish associated with Martinmas, along with wine made from the grape harvest. This day has characteristics shared with the Halloween tradition of children marching and carrying homemade lanterns.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas, also known as Julen (Yule) in Sweden, is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world; it marks the birth of Jesus, believed by them to be the Son of God. In Sweden Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24), and last until December 26 (Boxing Day). On December 24 Swedish families perform an old tradition called the “dipping in the pot,” dipping slices of bread into ham broth. The broth is consumed later during the Christmas feast.

Christmas decorations are often prepared well in advance. A manger with figures of Joseph, Mary, and the baby Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men, are placed in all the churches. Decorations are put up and cookies, cakes, and bread are baked. The Christmas tree is decorated with stars, straw animals, spangles, and other items. Then families gather around the Christmas tree and light candles. Children sing carols and wait for Tomte—the Christmas gnome—who is believed to live under the family home’s floor or in the barn and is said to protect the family and its livestock. Tomte is to Sweden what Santa Claus is in other countries. He is believed to bring presents for children in a sack. But, unlike Santa Claus, he does not drop the gifts in stockings at fireplaces but gives them to each child directly.

Christmas Day begins early in Sweden with the families attending the early morning Mass, which is called julottan. The rest of the day is usually spent with family members and a special Christmas feast. A Swedish dish served only on Christmas is lutfisk, or air-dried codfish soaked in a lye solution for several weeks, a process that gives the fish its characteristic gelatinous consistency. It is served with white sauce, salt, and pepper. The dessert consists of boiled rice pudding with milk, sugar, and cinnamon.

Festivities continue into the next day, known as Boxing Day, or the Feast of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr.

✿ LUCIA DAY

Observed in: Sweden
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 13

In Sweden the feast day of Lucia (or Lucy) is celebrated as a festival of lights. It is held on December 13, one of the shortest days of winter, and the lights help to brighten the long winter nights. In the early morning hours of Lucia Day, a young girl, dressed in white, and wearing a red sash and a crown of lingonberry twigs, would go from one farm to another carrying a torch to light her way. She carried baked goods, stopped at each house, returning home by morning. Every Swedish family has its own Lucia, often the youngest daughter in the household. She wakes the rest of the family with a song, and brings along with her a tray of coffee, ginger biscuits, and saffron buns called lussekattor.

This custom began in the richer farming areas of Sweden and is based on the legend of a Sicilian girl who devoted her life to God instead of marrying. She was killed when she refused to marry a nobleman.

Fun Fact

The word aquavit comes from aqua vitae, the Latin for "water of life."

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

The Swedish people like to decorate their homes with the national flag on their birthdays. Birthday cakes in Sweden resemble pound cakes and are decorated with marzipan (almond paste and egg whites).

✿ MARRIAGE

Swedish brides wear a beautiful crown made of ribbons and myrtle leaves. This bridal crown is worn on top of the veil. They normally wear a traditional white dress.

After the church wedding ceremony, there is a lavish reception party held in honor of the newlyweds. Many delicious dishes are served, and there is ample drinking and dancing. Throughout dinner snapsvisor ("drinking songs") are sung and the guests may give speeches in honor of the couple. The bride's father places a silver coin in her left shoe while her mother puts a gold coin in her right shoe. This is to ensure that their daughter is always wealthy and secure. Her shoes are untied to signify that childbirth will be easy for her. The day after the wedding, the bride receives a morgongåva (morning gift).

Fun Fact

Alfred Nobel, the founder of the Nobel Foundation, invented dynamite.

The Nobel Prizes

The Nobel Prizes were instituted by the will of Alfred Nobel (1833–96), a Swedish chemist, industrialist, and the inventor of dynamite. He was shocked to see how his invention of dynamite was used for destructive purposes and wanted the prizes to be awarded to those who served humanity well. In order to accomplish this, in his will Alfred left 94 percent of his assets to the establishment of five prizes (physics, chemistry, physiology or medicine, literature, and peace) for “those who, during the preceding year, shall have conferred the greatest benefit on mankind.”

Because Nobel’s will was incomplete, it took five years before the Nobel Foundation could be established, and the first prizes were not awarded until 1901. Since 1902, the King of Sweden has formally awarded all the prizes, with the exception of the Nobel Peace Prize, in Stockholm. The Nobel Peace Prize is given in Oslo, Norway, by the Norwegian Nobel Committee. The prizes are awarded at a formal ceremony held annually on December 10, the date that Alfred Nobel died. However, different committees and institutions that serve as selection boards for the prizes typically announce the names of the laureates in October. Each award can be given to a maximum of three people per year.

Each individual awarded a prize receives a gold medal, a diploma, and a huge sum of money (about US$1,252,668). This was originally intended to allow laureates to continue their research without the pressure of raising funds.

❁ DEATH

In the event of a death in Sweden, the body is wrapped in a shroud. Normally the undertakers provide the shroud, but some Swedish families prefer to use their own. A majority of Swedes are cremated after death. This is the preferred method of disposing of the corpse in cities. After the cremation the ashes are either buried or scattered in a grove, but they are never scattered on the snow.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Like other countries in Europe, human activities in Switzerland probably began early in prehistory, but most of the archaeological work has been done at sites occupied after the withdrawal of the glaciers at the end of the last Ice Age. For example Thayngen-Weier is an early Neolithic (Cortailod culture) Alpine lake settlement, and Egolzwil, an Alpine Neolithic lake dwelling site on the shores of Lake Wauwil. Occupied about 5,500 to 5,000 years ago, Thayngen-Weier has provided evidence for the use of elm and wild onion as fodder for domestic cattle, and the presence of the elm bark beetle (suggesting elm disease).

Egolzwil is another Alpine Neolithic (late fifth millennium B.C.E.) lake dwelling site in Canton Lucerne. Like many such sites, Egolzwil was very well preserved. Excavations exposed several rectangular timber houses, floored by logs covered with bark and heated by clay platform hearths. The inhabitants made pottery with circular bases, cultivated cereals, kept sheep and goats, and gathered plants and hunted animals. Both humans and animals shared the houses, probably in separate rooms.

A late Neolithic lake dwelling site, located at Saint-Blaise is located in the Neuenburgersees Canton. At least three different occupations have been identified: Horgen (3166–21 B.C.E.), Luescherz (2793–2673), and Auvernier cordé (2640–2451). Like Egolzwil and other lake dwelling sites, Saint-Blaise is well preserved, making it possible to recover cultural material including 360 tons of stone, 400,000 animal bones and bone fragments, 8,500 wood fragments and other paleobotanical remains, and over three tons of pottery.

Yet another lake dwelling site, Cortailod-Est, has been dated to the Late Bronze Age (1009–955). Cortailod-Est was a palisaded village found in a lake. The site was first identified from a 1927 aerial photograph, but it was not excavated until the 1980s by a team of underwater archaeologists. The village was found to have seventeen houses, all built within an eight-year span (1009–01), and containing more than 180,000 potsherds.

By 500 B.C.E. Celtic languages were spoken in Austria, Switzerland, southern Germany, northern Italy, most of France, much of Spain, Britain, and Ireland. These languages completely displaced the earlier languages spoken in the same areas, and we know nothing about these earlier languages. In the first century a group of Celts, known as the Helvetii, left southern Germany and settled in Switzerland. Helvetia was the Roman name for a region of central Europe occupying a plateau between the Alps and the Jura Mountains, the western part of modern Switzerland.

Eventually the Celts encountered the Romans and were pushed back into Switzerland by Caesar's army in 58. The Roman Empire founded its province of Helvetia in what is now Switzerland in 15 B.C.E.

In the fifth century, the Altemanni tribe (ancient Germanic people) came and settled in Switzerland. In 1032 C.E. Switzerland became a part of the Holy Roman Empire. In 1291 in an attempt to become independent, local leaders united and formed the Swiss Confederation. Gradually the Swiss began to expand their territory and gained independence from the Holy Roman Empire in 1499.

The Protestant Reformation started by Martin Luther (1483–1546) in the 16th century affected all parts of Europe and caused upheaval in Switzerland as well. Although central Switzerland remained Catholic, in Zurich relics were burned, and adoration of saints was banned (saintly veneration was a practice favored by Catholics). In 1536 Geneva refused to accept the authority of the Roman Catholic bishop and became the center of the Protestant movement in Switzerland.

The French Republic invaded Switzerland in 1798. Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821) unified the country under the name Helvetic Republic and a written constitution was imposed, an act that was bitterly resented by most of the Swiss. After the British and the Prussians defeated Napoleon at Waterloo, the Congress of Vienna granted independence to Switzerland in 1815.

In 1848 a new federal constitution was set up, and Bern was made the capital of Switzerland. Improving the economic and social condition of the country was a priority, and industries, railways, and roads were developed.

The International Red Cross was founded in Geneva in 1863.

During World War I Switzerland remained neutral and only extended its help in organizing Red Cross camps for the victims of the war. After World War II most European countries were engaged in reviving their economies and repairing the ravages of war, but Switzerland was already a powerful commercial center. In 1948 Switzerland joined the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. It became a founding member of the European Free Trade Association in 1959 and joined the Council of Europe in 1963. For many years Switzerland did not wish to become a member of the United Nations, but in 2002 Switzerland officially joined. As of midyear 2005, Switzerland had not applied for membership in the European Union (EU).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Switzerland is a landlocked territory surrounded by France, Germany, Liechtenstein, Austria, and Italy. This tiny country has mostly hilly terrain, with the Alps and the Jura mountain ranges in the south and the north, respectively. Dufourspitze is the highest point at 15,203 feet. The central parts of Switzerland form a plateau with numerous beautiful lakes, rivers, and plains. The Swiss mountains are world famous for ski resorts and other recreational activities.

The climatic conditions in Switzerland vary from one region to another. The northern regions of the country experience a continental climate with very cold winters and mild summers; precipitation is minimal in this region. The southern parts of Switzerland are more Mediterranean, with warm summers and comparatively mild winters. Rainfall is abundant and in winter it snows in the higher elevations. The Alps act as a divide between the south and the north of the country. The climatic conditions are distinctly different in these two regions. The temperature in Switzerland ranges from 95°F during summer to way below freezing on winter nights.

The vegetation all across the different areas of Switzerland varies depending upon the prevailing climate. Palm trees, alpine forests, coniferous soft-wooded trees, bushes, shrubs, and grassy meadows are all found within the same country. Alpine animals, such as the ibex and the chamois, also live in Switzerland.

ECONOMY

Switzerland is a politically nonaligned nation, and this has enabled the Swiss to make their economy one of the most stable in the world. In spite of having low reserves of natural resources, Switzerland is rich in other resources. The nation's service sector comprises a highly skilled and specialized workforce in the fields of watchmaking, handicrafts, microtechnology, biotechnology, pharmaceuticals, banking, and insurance. Switzerland's banks are known for maintaining absolute secrecy about their customers' accounts, with the result that it is seen as a safe place for investors from all over the world. The banking sector is one of the most important contributors to the nation's gross domestic product (GDP). The other major industries are pharmaceuticals, chemicals, precision instruments, and tourism. Switzerland enjoys good trade relations with the other European nations and has realigned the Swiss economy to improve trade opportunities with EU members. The United States and Japan are its other major trading partners.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Swiss have been known for their neutrality for centuries. Many foreign personalities have adopted Switzerland as their country and lived there, including Voltaire, Rousseau, Byron, Shelley, James Joyce, Carl Jung, and Charlie Chaplin. At the same time many Swiss have left their country and made their name elsewhere. Among them were Charles Le Corbusier, Paul Klee, Albert Giacometti, and Jean-Luc Godard.

Swiss culture is a result of influences from its neighboring countries over the years. A strong sense of regionalism is seen in Switzerland. It is so pronounced that it is hard to believe so diverse a people can stay together as a nation. The Swiss believe in “unity, but not uniformity.” Yodeling, the alp horn, Swiss wrestling, Swiss knives, and watches are an integral part of Swiss culture, and famous all over the world.

❁ CUISINE

Swiss cuisine concentrates on a wide variety of breads, milk, cheese, and other dairy products, meat products, and sweets. Vegetables are used but in lesser quantities compared to sausages and meat. Dishes prepared from veal, pork, beef, chicken, or turkey, are popular in Switzerland. The Swiss enjoy eating locally grown fruits, such as apples, pears, grapes, and various berries including blackberries, blueberries, raspberries, red currants, and strawberries. Swiss chocolate is also world famous and is just as popular as Swiss cheese.

A typical Swiss breakfast is heavy, featuring bread, butter or margarine, marmalade or honey, some cheese or cereals, milk, cold or hot chocolate, and tea or coffee. The Swiss often have light lunches that may just be sandwiches. Dinner can be a full meal made up of bread, cheese, and dried meat. The Swiss consume modern popular soft drinks, beers, local and branded wines, tea, and coffee in different flavors.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar. Celebrations take place all over the world and begin right on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In Switzerland many cities have fireworks. On New Year's Day the Swiss have processions in the streets, wearing costumes and hats that represent good and evil spirits. Swiss followers of the Julian calendar celebrate New Year's Day on January 13 as Old Sylvester's Day.

In Switzerland people also believe that good luck comes from letting a drop of cream land on the floor New Year's Day. This is said to bring a year of overflowing abundance. Traditionally the Swiss make personal New Year's resolutions and have elaborate meals on this day. It is a national holiday and schools and offices are closed.

❁ INSTAURATION DE LA RÉPUBLIQUE

Observed on: March 1

On Instauration de La République, or Day of the Republic, public offices were appointed in 1848 through many regions of the Graubünden canton of Switzerland. However, in the 21st century it is the day of one of the largest children's festivals in the country. Little boys clang bells and parade through the streets collecting money and goodies. They are dressed in long blue overskirts and red scarves. The origin of this custom is unknown.

❁ CONFEDERATION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 1

Confederation Day, or Swiss National Day, commemorates the founding of the Swiss Confederation in 1291. On this day the president of the confederation addresses the nation on national television and radio. The celebrations related to this day vary from place to place in Switzerland, and cultural performances and competitions often mark this day. Fireworks displays and bonfires are held in many parts of the country as well. On this day all schools and workplaces in Switzerland are closed.

New Year's in Laupen

In Laupen New Year's Day is celebrated in a wild and rowdy way. Young boys wearing wooden masks, nightgowns, and pointed hats assemble at the foot of an ancient castle. They carry brooms, inflated animal bladders, and cowbells. This weird procession parades to the village square for all to see. They sing traditional New Year's songs and wish goodwill to all. The boys then disappear, only to make their appearance once again, this time to chase the village girls. What follows is a lot of noisy fun and other festivities. This tradition originated in the early 19th century, but it did not enjoy everyone's patronage. The town officials have time and again tried to suppress and ban this custom, but to no avail.

ST. BERCHTOLD'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: January 2

This holiday is celebrated in honor of Duke Berchtold V von Zähringen, the founder of the city of Bern, the capital of Switzerland. He had vowed to name the city after the first animal he killed on a hunt. This happened to be a bear (bern, in German) and that is how the city got its name in the 12th century. The city of Bern was founded in 1191 and became the eighth member of the Swiss Federation in 1353. Between the 14th and 16th centuries it reached the peak of its power by enlarging its territory and gaining great political influence. Bern was made a free imperial city by the Holy Roman Emperor Frederick II in 1218, after Berchtold V died without an heir.

PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday before Easter

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. Jesus Christ was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe him to be the second personage of a holy trinity that include the Father, Son, and the Holy Spirit. The day is as much about Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

Jesus had already foretold his betrayal and Resurrection to his disciples on the way to Jerusalem from Judea. The day was April 10, 30 C.E., according to some calculations. They stopped at the Mount of Olives, near Bethany, and Jesus sent two disciples to

The Swiss Army Knife, sometimes abbreviated as SwAK, is one of the most unique export items of the country. This small knife has a toothpick, scissors, serrated knife, tweezers, can opener, and screwdriver; in fact, some of the larger models have over 20 tools and blades! There are two Swiss Army knife manufacturers, Victorinox and Wenger. They supply about 50,000 knives to the Swiss army each year. The rest of production is exported to the rest of the world.

the village of Bethphage to bring the donkey and its foal tied at the crossway of two roads to him. They did so and placed their clothes on the foal to provide a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, a humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

The rituals observed by Roman Catholics on Maundy Thursday are based on a sequence of events that are supposed to have occurred during this meal. First Jesus washed the feet of his disciples; then he announced that he had been betrayed by one of them. The traitor Judas left the table. Finally Jesus instituted the Eucharist: a ritual of consuming bread and wine as symbols of his body and blood, also referred to as Communion in Christian churches. In the Roman Catholic Church, Maundy Thursday celebrates the institution of the Eucharist, the oldest of the observances peculiar to Holy Week, and gives priests an opportunity to prepare for the many rites associated with Good Friday, Holy Saturday, and Easter. The name Maundy Thursday may be linked to the Latin word mandatum, "command," because Jesus commanded his apostles to observe the ritual now called the Eucharist.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to remember the Crucifixion of Jesus. In Switzerland Roman Catholics observe a fast on Good Friday, and a ritual called the "Stations of the Cross" is performed. This is a reenactment of Jesus' final journey (carrying the Cross) to Calvary before his Crucifixion. Children march carrying antique lanterns, and elders hold articles that are related to the Passion of Christ, such as candles, ladders, sponges, hammers, nails, and whips. Funeral music is often played during these processions. This is a day of fasting and abstinence in Switzerland. On Good Friday the church bells do not ring; instead a rattling sound is made by clapping pieces of wood to call the faithful for prayer to the church. This custom has been prevalent in Switzerland since the 16th century.

Holy Saturday is the day Jesus lay in the tomb. This was the Sabbath (the Jewish day of rest is Saturday), and he rose from the dead on Easter Sunday. Roman Catholics also regard this day as the second Sabbath after Creation. The final day of Holy Week, which begins with Palm Sunday and includes Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, it marks the threshold between death and resurrection, and is a day of silence and contemplation for devout Christians.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. On Easter in Switzerland the entire family gathers to celebrate the Resurrection of Jesus. Children receive specially decorated Easter eggs made from chocolate from their parents and grandparents. In the mountain valleys of Switzerland, where winter lasts for more than six months, Easter not only signifies the Resurrection but also the reawakening of nature. This rebirth of life is celebrated by sharing wine and blessed bread and donating gifts to the poor—a tradition (called Osterspende) that has been followed since the 16th century. In Switzerland dining and exchanging greetings and Easter eggs continue even on the next day, Easter Monday, which is the first Monday after Lent. The custom of egg cracking, known as Eiertütschen locally, is extremely popular. In the towns of Frömsen, Oberriet, St. Gallen, and Effingen, in the canton of Aargau, the custom of egg throwing takes place every Easter Sunday or Monday. The participants in this game throw the brightly colored eggs at spectators, who eat them right away. This festive day ends with music and dance.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Forty days after Easter

Ascension Day is a day of special celebration for Christians all over the world. It celebrates Jesus' Ascension into heaven, 40 days after his Resurrection on Easter. The Swiss celebrate this day with special prayer services in churches. A group of men on horseback, followed by local people and the clergy on foot, conduct a large and lively procession around the border of their parishes and villages. When the procession enters the church, the bells are rung in celebration. This 15th-century custom, which began as a simple procession of worshippers, has now become a colorful event. Its underlying purpose is to bless the fields and encourage the use of the sacraments. The procession passes through fields, stopping four times for blessings under huge arches made of fir twigs, ribbons, and flowers. The Swiss also decorate their houses and their horses on this day, in order to welcome spring.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 24–25

In Switzerland, Christmas celebrations begin with the “pursuit of St. Nicholas”—Klausjagen—on December 5. Marchers parade on the street carrying tall, decorated cardboard hats (some six feet tall). They light candles and escort someone posing as St. Nicholas through the town. Some strong men march with heavy bells hanging around their necks, while others blow horns and play brass instruments. The people who lead this parade crack whips to announce their arrival. That evening, St. Nicholas rides a donkey to the town square, where he gives a speech about the events of the past year.

On Christmas Eve, a Wienectchind (“Christmas Child”), along with six other girls, walks from house to house carrying a lantern. The children are dressed in rose-colored clothes while the Christmas Child wears white. They sing carols and receive several edible goodies in return.

Swiss families eat homemade doughnuts (ringli) and drink hot chocolate when they return from church after the service. On Christmas Day, the festivities continue with church services and enjoying special Christmas delicacies. Friends and relatives visit each other and exchange gifts on this day.

It is said that Father Christmas gives gifts to little boys, while his wife, Lucy, distributes gifts to the girls. In some parts of Switzerland, Santa visits children in a car and gives them a ride in it. The Christmas traditions in Switzerland vary from place to place because of the mixing of diverse European cultures. Christmas decorations are often prepared well in advance. A manger with figures of Joseph, Mary, and Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men, are placed in all churches.

Lake Geneva, situated in this city, is the country's largest lake. The Geneva Summer Festival is known for its lake parades, where beautiful floats are displayed. There are firework displays and musical performances of various kinds. Children's theater and dancing parades are also held. The Geneva Summer Festival brings big crowds and is a major contributor to Swiss tourism revenue.

The Swiss city of Geneva is so popular that people often mistake it for the country's capital city. Though it is not the capital, picturesque Geneva is the headquarters of many international organizations. The people living in Geneva are also truly international in nature: Every third person one meets in Geneva is not Swiss-born.

Geneva was chosen as the headquarters for the League of Nations in 1919. Known for political neutrality, the city was the chosen venue for signing peace treaties, for setting up the World Health Organization, and the headquarters of the Red Cross. The city is also known for its tourist attractions such as St. Peter's Cathedral and the Water Fountain.

Geneva is often called "the city of parks." Many of the city's parks are situated on the shores of the lake and are known for their exquisite landscaping. The English Garden is home to the Monument National. There is a statue of two young women—one called the Republic of Geneva, the other Helvetia—signifying Geneva's annexation to the Swiss Confederation on September 12, 1814.

❁ TRADITIONAL ONION MARKET FAIR

Observed in: Bern
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Fourth Monday of November

This fair is held on the fourth Monday of every November in Bern. All the farmers in the vicinity flock to the market in Bern to display their produce. This fair is a remnant of the two-week autumn fair, known as Bernese Martinmas Fair, which used to be held in Bern on Martinmas (St. Martin's Day, November 11). Quantities of onions and garlic, as well as other fruits and vegetables, are sold here. In the evenings people don colorful costumes and visit the market, giving it a festive air. Poetry recitations and other events are held in this locality on Onion Market Day. The traditional food served at the fair consists of onion and cheesecake, quiche with steamed onions or grated cheese with batter, and tangy white wine from the canton of Valais.

Fun Fact

On carnival day in Basel, some cafés and restaurants provide a platform for a tradition called Schnitzelbank, in which participants get up and spout satirical verses about a subject of their choice.

Rites of Passage

❁ MARRIAGE

Most weddings in Switzerland take place in a church, officiated by a priest or minister. The bride wears a traditional wreath for the ceremony. This is to signify her maiden status. The wreath is burned after she is married. The faster the wreath burns, it is said, the luckier she will be in marriage.

The wedding guests are then led in procession from the church to the reception venue, where the bridesmaids greet them by distributing colorful kerchiefs. The guests give a coin each, in return. These coins are collected and given to the couple for setting up their new home. At the end of the party, the couple retires to their home, after planting a pine tree in the front yard. This is to symbolize their future children.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

In the early 21st century, archaeologists from many countries have been conducting extensive excavations in Syria and uncovering artifacts that continue to extend further into pre-history knowledge of how ancient humans lived. Syrian archaeologists, for example, have found two firestone axes used for hunting prey some 35,000 to 40,000 years ago. The almond-shaped axes, both just over three inches long, were found a little more than three feet down in al-Wadi's cave, located near the Mediterranean port of Tartous.

Archaeologists from the United Kingdom have spent the past two decades excavating and studying a site near Abu Hureyra, unique for its unbroken sequence of strata from hunter-gatherers to well-developed agrarian activities. At the earlier hunter-gatherer levels they have found, as expected, lots of thin wild cereal seeds; but at higher levels they found what they had not expected, the kind of fat seeds typical of cultivation. The seeds recovered at Abu Hureyra are the oldest cultivated seeds ever found. These early people of Syria were growing their own wheat and rye 13,000 years ago. During this period, called the Younger Dryas by geologists, there was a long drought, causing the wild cereals to gradually die out: The seeds of varieties that require a lot of water were the first to go, followed eventually by hardier types. This suggests that, as the wild grains the people needed disappeared, they began to cultivate grains in order to survive.

Dutch archaeologists, excavating at Tel Abyad, a site that was abandoned because of drastic climate changes toward the end of the seventh millennium B.C.E., report having found ceramics dating back to 6800–6300. At the al-Wadi cave site, stone arrowheads and bone needles used for hunting and making leather items, respectively, have been dated to 6000, and shards of clay jars used to store wine and other liquids were probably used between 5000 and 3000. Additional and spectacular Bronze Age items (c. 3000) have been found at Terqa, a site in the region of al-Ashaara, including pieces of jewelry made with precious stones and bronze knives.

In 1968 Italian archaeologists, excavating what is now called Tell Mardikh, found a statue dedicated to the goddess Ishtar with the name Ibbit-Lim on it, a king of Ebla. Ebla, which means “white rock,” was an important city-state in northern Syria that had two distinct peak periods, the first during the late third millennium, the second between 1800 and 1650, and was known only from Egyptian and Akkadian inscriptions. Over the next 10 years, the team uncovered a palace, dating from around 2500 to 2000. Within the palace they found more than 20,000 tablets with cuneiform script, written in Sumerian and in a previously unknown Semitic dialect labeled Eblaite. The tablets, dating to around 2250, were an archive of governmental and commercial transactions including law cases, trade contracts, and diplomatic materials.

A team of Syrian and French archaeologists has found a city at Rawda, a site in central Syria, dating back to the Early Bronze period, around 2000 B.C.E. They believe that its location, surrounded on three sides by valleys, means that it was an important trade center. They have also found what they believe was a space used for worship; this area includes two smaller chambers, perhaps for the use of priests. One of these rooms had a clay pot filled with beads from Afghanistan and shells, probably from the Syrian coast. At Tel Abyad, in addition to the more ancient pottery artifacts, the Dutch team excavated 37 clay tablets, which date back to 1200, when the Assyrians constructed a fortress along the border. The cuneiform writing on the tablets indicates that this fortress figured significantly in regional politics.

At the town of Gharieh in southern Syria, an ancient cemetery has been excavated. Built of four parallel pillars, its arched tombs resemble those found in the ancient city of Palmyra. Among the items discovered are perfume bottles, glass containers of different sizes (perhaps serving various household functions), and pieces of clay oil lamps. The cemetery was apparently used between 400 B.C.E. and 106 C.E.

Over the millennia Syria has been occupied by a succession of Semitic cultures—the Canaanites, Hebrews, Arameans, Assyrians, and Babylonians—followed by the non-Semitic Persians, Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, then, finally, by Arabs. Damascus is probably one of the oldest inhabited cities of the world. After it came under the rule of Muslims in 636 C.E., it flourished and prospered.

Eventually in 1516, the Ottoman Turks took over the region. For the next 400 years the Ottomans ruled over the region except for a brief period of eight years—from 1832 to 1840—when the Egyptians, under their military general Ibrahim Pasha (1789–1848), occupied the territory. He used the internal rift between the Ottomans to his advantage and gained popularity with his diplomacy and tact. But the people were dissatisfied with some of the laws he enacted. In 1838 war broke out within the country. When the United Kingdom and Austria intervened, Ibrahim Pasha was forced to leave the country, and the Ottoman Empire was reestablished.

The Turkish Empire disintegrated after World War I, and France gained control of the area. In 1920 an independent Arab kingdom of Syria was established under King Faisal (1885–1933) of the Hashemite Dynasty, who later became king of Iraq. However, the Hashemite Dynasty, after ruling for only a few months, was defeated by the French in the Battle of Maysalun in July 1920. Syria was occupied by the French troops later that year after the League of Nations put Syria under French mandate.

The Syrians chafed under French rule and never accepted the constitution proposed by France. The Syrians rose in revolt in 1925–26. France had promised independence to Syria in 1941, but it was finally granted in 1946. Although the economy of Syria underwent rapid economic development after independence, a series of military coups kept the political side always tense. Syria united with Egypt to create the United Arab Republic in 1958. The union was not, however, a success and, after a military coup in 1961, the union disintegrated. The Syrian Arab Republic was formed. In 1963 the Baath Party, an Arab political party founded in Damascus in 1941, which also exists in Iraq, took control of Syria.

After initiating a bloodless military coup in 1970, the minister of defense, Hafiz al-Assad (1930–2000), became prime minister. He ruled the country with an iron fist for 30 years, until his death in 2000, after which his son, Bashar al-Assad (b. 1965), assumed power.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Syria shares land borders with Lebanon, Jordan, Iraq, and Turkey. The major cities of Syria include the capital city of Damascus, Aleppo, and Homs. Apart from the fertile strips of coastal land, mountainous regions, a river basin, and stony deserts, the terrain is generally semi-arid. The Euphrates crosses Syria in the east. The Jabal an-Nusayriyah mountains, parallel to the coastal plain, average close to 4,000 feet in height, the highest peak being Nabi Yunis (over 5,000 feet).

Syria has a Mediterranean climate, with hot, dry summers and wet, mild winters. The climate is continental farther inland. The temperature can range from 50°F in winter to a sweltering 115°F in the summers.

Syria once boasted of abundant mountain forests, but the biodiversity found in this country is dwindling due to many environmental threats. Yew, lime, and fir trees grow naturally in this region. Wolves, hyenas, foxes, badgers, wild boars, jackals, deer, bears, squirrels, polecats, donkeys, goats, and camels are typical fauna found in Syria.

Fun Fact

Damascus has been inhabited for over 4,000 years—beginning a couple of thousand years before Rome was founded in 753 B.C.E.—and this makes it the oldest continuously inhabited city in the world.

❁ ECONOMY

Syria is a middle-income country. Its economy is based on agriculture, industry, and energy. The major industries of Syria are oil, chemicals, cement, food processing, textiles, and agriculture. The main crops cultivated are cotton, wheat, and barley. The production of crude oil may be little in comparison to the other countries of the Middle East, but this resource is an important source of income for the nation.

Syria enjoys good trade relations with Ukraine, Turkey, Lebanon, Iran, the Arab states, Japan, and the members of the European Union. The main export items are crude oil, cotton, and phosphates.

Fun Fact

Claiming he was a prophet, al-Mutanabbi led the Qarmatians in revolt in 932, but the revolt was put down, and he was imprisoned by the governor of Emesa. For his part in this event, he was given the nickname by which he is usually known, al-Mutanabbi, or “he who would be a prophet.”

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Syria is littered with remains of architecture and religious works from various periods in history. The impression of the Muslim caliphs, Romans, and the Byzantines can be recognized throughout Syrian culture.

Syria was once the center of Arab poetry. The most noted poet who lived in this region was Ahmad ibn al-Husayn al-Mutanabbi (915–65). Bedouin artworks, such as silver jewelry, textiles, and metalwork are also legendary.

Syria’s capital Damascus was famous for the quality of textiles produced there. This woven fabric, known as damask, was made from silk, wool, linen, or cotton. There were floral prints with woven gold or silver threadwork. Damask was used for tablecloths, napkins, towels, and wall or furniture coverings. Syrian metalwork, such as the traditional cezve (a long-handled coffee pot), is world famous. Intricate designs of wheat and olive plants cover these coffee pots, which are also adorned with elaborate gold and silver trim.

Syrian music is a blend of Arab and Western styles. Bedouin culture is also evident in the musical traditions of this region. Some of the famous Syrian artists are Mayada El Hennaway, George Wassouf, and Kazem al-Saher.

Syrian hospitality is the mainstay of the culture. Families often invite complete strangers into their homes for a cup of coffee or a meal. This Bedouin tradition of providing food and shelter to desert travelers developed because of the harsh weather in the deserts.

❁ CUISINE

Syrian cuisine has European and Eastern influences. Many dishes prepared in Syria have become so popular in the region that what most people think of as exotic Arab cuisine is originally Syrian. The use of grains, yogurt, cheese, cucumber, eggplants, chickpeas, nuts, tomatoes, and sesame seeds, along with parsley, mint, lemon, onion, garlic, and olive oil, distinguish Syrian cuisine.

Syrians begin their day with a light breakfast of olives, cheese, yogurt, and coffee. Lunch is normally the main meal of the day. A typical Syrian meal begins with mezze—a bowl of salad, hummus, mousaka, tabouleh, or any of 40 to 50 appetizers. Rice or flat bread, meat, vegetables, beans, sweets, and fruits feature in a Syrian meal. A popular item is burghol (steamed, dried, and ground wheat), which is added to many dishes, including the national dish, kibbeh (ground lamb).

Every meal invariably ends with very strong and sweet Turkish coffee or tea. This is accompanied by ice cream, pastries, fruits, or another dessert. Syrian sweets, such as baklava (filo dough baked with nuts and honey) and halawat al-jibna (syrup-topped pastry filled with cream cheese) are very popular.

Hummus (a puree of chickpeas and sesame), baba ghanoush (an eggplant puree), falafel (fried ground chickpeas), and shawarma (shavings of lamb or chicken rolled in flat bread) are popular Syrian dishes. Makkadem (sheep’s feet) is a traditional dish and a delicacy. Syrian Muslims do not eat pork or drink alcohol. They eat meat that is specially prepared according to Muslim traditions.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building their nations and societies.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Although the strike was postponed, the day for the observance remained May 1. The United States made efforts to discourage the May 1 commemoration because of its obvious socialist origin, so Labor Day is celebrated on the first weekend of September there, and most of its political content is forgotten.

In Syria, workers hold marches in the streets throughout the country.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day on which they celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Savior promised by the Old Testament prophets.

In Syria Christmas decorations are often prepared well in advance. A manger with figures of Joseph, Mary, and Jesus, along with shepherds and the Three Wise Men, are placed in all the churches. Christians begin Christmas celebrations on Christmas Eve (December 24), when families attend church and offer prayers in a midnight service. They return home to share a special meal during which they cut a cake specially made for the occasion. Also on Christmas Eve everyone in the family carries a lit candle and stands around an unlit bonfire outside the house. The youngest child, or the youngest son of the family, reads the Christmas story and then lights the bonfire. Syrian Christians believe that the way the flames spread is an omen indicating the luck of the family in the coming year. When the fire burns, psalms are sung; as it dies everyone leaps over the embers making wishes.

On Christmas Day the festivities continue with church services. The image of the infant Jesus is carried in a joyous procession around the church. Afterward friends and relatives visit each other, exchange gifts, and enjoy special Christmas delicacies. Syrian Christian families gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate the holiday with a special feast consisting of chicken, oranges, nuts, and pastries.

In Syria Christmas is not a legal holiday since only 16 percent of the population is Christian.

SILK ROAD FESTIVAL

The historic and famous Silk Road is celebrated during this event. The Silk Road was the major trade route from China through Central Asia, to Europe, around 2,500 years ago. It stretched for about 4,000 miles, from the Great Wall of China to the Mediterranean Sea. With silk and spices, arts, literature, and music were also shared via this route. In ancient times philosophers and preachers used this road to travel to other places to propagate their views. The Silk Road Festival celebrates this transport of ideas, rather than silk, across continents.

During this event many international artists perform musical shows and concerts. Exhibits, lectures, symposia, and workshops that are of cultural relevance are organized in Damascus. Apart from the cultural festivities, exhibits showcasing silk manufacture are also a highlight of this festival.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

Pregnant Muslim women go to their parents' home following the final fertility ritual and remain there until the confinement period ends. Childbirth is an important event in Syrian families. Because Muslims believe that the first word a child should hear is God's name, when a child is born the father or another male relative whispers the summons to prayer (azam) in its ear. On the sixth or seventh day after birth, the child is named. If the child is a son, the mother and father are often identified by the name of their son. If, for example, they name their first son Ali, the father becomes Abu Ali (father of Ali) and the mother becomes Umm Ali (mother of Ali).

After childbirth, Syrian women rest and recover for the next 40 days. During this period, other female relatives and friends tend to the new mother and assist her with daily chores. Fresh bread, butter, honey, and porridges made with fenu-greek are given to her. Visitors who come to see the new baby often leave the child with money and gifts. On the 40th day the child is put in a cradle for the first time. Soon after the child's head is shaved; the hair is placed in a piece of cloth and buried or, alternatively, thrown in a river.

COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is a part of Syrian's tradition and is carried out at puberty. This practice is only performed among Syrian Muslims and the Jewish community. Muslims and Jews believe that, by undergoing this ritual, a boy becomes a man. Trained elders use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments to perform the circumcision without administering any anesthetic. This practice enjoys social backing, and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations follow this coming-of-age ritual.

When a girl reaches puberty she is isolated for seven days and is allowed to eat only butter, bread, and sugar. She is forbidden to eat fish, flesh, salt, or any acidic food. On the final evening of her seclusion she is given a warm bath. Among the lower classes, friends may hold a party.

MARRIAGE

Arranged marriages are common in Syria among Bedouins and in rural villages. Traditional Syrian weddings are elaborate affairs that often last for several days. The groom provides plenty of silver and gold jewelry to the bride's family, as well as cash as part of an agreed-upon bride price (mehr). The couple signs a marriage contract, called a milka. After the signing of the contract, the couple is legally married even though they may not consummate the marriage until the night of the wedding party.

On the wedding day, the bride dyes her hair with henna and wears a white wedding gown. The women guests come for the wedding in all their finery and gather inside the bride's house or in a tent set up outside the house. The bride is brought inside the tent and is seated on a large chair. A traditional dance accompanied with singing and clapping is performed for her.

The groom and his relatives gather inside another tent erected near the groom's house, then make a procession to the bride's tent to pick her up. The night is spent at the groom's house, and the celebrations continue throughout the following week.

While some Syrians consider that marriages between first cousins are the best option, Syrian Christians forbid this practice.

❁ DEATH

On the occasion of a death in a Syrian Muslim family, the deceased is washed, shrouded in white cloth, and buried immediately. The following three days are meant for mourning. Friends, family, and well-wishers come and offer their condolences and help the family accept the death.

Snacks are prepared by neighbors and served to visitors. The mourning period for the widow is four months and 10 days, during which period her family and friends visit her often.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

The first people to settle on the island now called Taiwan arrived 30,000 years ago, but they were probably genetically distinct from any groups now living there. About 4,000 years ago, the ancestors of contemporary Taiwanese aborigines, who are genetically related to Malaysians and Polynesians, settled Taiwan. The language they speak is Austronesian, a linguistic classification that includes languages spoken on the South Pacific islands of Indonesia, Melanesia, Micronesia, and Polynesia.

Linguists and other scholars as well, postulate that contemporary Austronesian language and culture originated on Taiwan approximately 6,000 years ago, because there is a greater diversity of language on Taiwan than in other Austronesian-speaking areas. The linguistic evidence shows that earlier linguistic separations mark the earliest settlements, indicating a lengthy split from its roots in southern Asia.

The indigenous people of Taiwan belong primarily to two groups: the Kao-shan tsu, who live in the high mountains, and the Ping-pu tsu, who inhabit the plains. The government of the Republic of China (Taiwan) recognizes only 12 out of 23 tribes, most of which dwell in the highland mountains and speak archaic Formosan languages that belong to the Austronesian family of languages. In 2004 the total population of these tribes was about 400,000.

Taiwanese aborigines recognized by the ROC government include the following tribes: Ami (Amis; Pangcah), Atayal (Tayal, Tayan), Atayal (proper), Bunun, Kavalan, Paiwan, Puyuma, Rukai, Saisiyat (Saisiat), Tao (Yami), Thao, Tsou (Cou), Northern Tsou, Southern Tsou, Truku (Taroko), and Sediq. Three of these tribes—the Amis, Kavalan, and Tsou—are sometimes regarded as plains tribes. There are 11 aboriginal tribes that the government does not recognize: Babuza, Basay, Hoanya, Ketagalan, Luilang, Pazeh/Kaxabu (Pazih), Popora, Qauqaut, Siraya, Taokas, and Trobiawan. Earlier records suggest that there may be 26 linguistic groups, and 6 of the nonrecognized tribes—the Babuza, Popora, Hoanya, Siraya, Taokas, and Pazeh—were included in Japanese field studies through 1945.

The Bing-bu Zu (aborigines of the plains) lived in settled villages protected by bamboo walls. The most populated villages were in southern Taiwan and sometimes supported as many as 1,500 people. The villages of the Siraya were made of thatch and bamboo and stood on stilts almost six feet above the ground. A watchtower was used to watch for headhunting parties of the highland tribes. The people of the plains hunted spotted deer and muntjac (a small Asian deer) and farmed millet to some extent. They also cultivated sugar and rice, which were used primarily for making wine. Property was held communally, and the Bing-bu Zu villages were surrounded by a series of concentric rings, each with its specific use: The innermost ring was used for gardens and orchards that followed a fallowing cycle around the ring; the second ring was used to cultivate plants; and the third ring provided hunting and deer fields for the tribe. The structure of plains villages was a central concept in the later Qing administration of Taiwan.

A majority of the Bing-bu Zu lived in matriarchal or matrilineal societies. Women could reject as many men as they wanted before deciding to marry, and men married into a woman’s family following the courtship period. Before Dutch Reformed Church missionaries appeared, plains people generally did not marry until they were in their mid-thirties, when they were less capable of engaging in strenuous labor. Women did the sewing, cooking, and farming, and were often priestesses or mediums to the gods. Men were responsible for hunting and taking heads.

According to ancient records, it’s probable that the Han Chinese knew of the existence of Taiwan’s main island of Taiwan since the Three Kingdoms period (third century), because they named some of the smaller offshore islands, such as Greater and Minor Liuqiu (Ryukyu). None of these names, however, have been connected with the main island of Taiwan with any certainty. Han Chinese began to settle in Penghu— islands attached to Taiwan lying in the Taiwan Strait—during the 1100s, but it was only in the 1400s that people other than aborigines, the Chinese, permanently settled the main island of Taiwan.

It was not until 1517, however, that Taiwan was found by European navigators, Portuguese sailors, who named the island Ilha Formosa (“Beautiful Island”), but the Portuguese made no effort to colonize it. The first serious European incursion occurred in 1624, when the Dutch invaded and built a trading post near Tainan. In 1626 the Spanish ousted the Dutch and annexed the region, but the Dutch returned in 1641 and forced the Spanish out. In 1661 after being expelled from China by the ruling Qing dynasty, the Ming dynasty, led by Cheng Cheng Gong, attacked the Dutch settlements, which surrendered a year later. The people of Taiwan accepted Cheng as their leader, and the region did well under his regime. Cheng, however, dreamed of returning to China, but first he had to overthrow the Qing Dynasty. To support his objective, he taxed the people of Taiwan heavily, and this so annoyed the Taiwanese that their resentment to Cheng’s rule steadily grew. But in 1683 the Qing Dynasty invaded Taiwan, forcing Cheng and the Ming Dynasty to surrender. The new regime declared Taiwan a territory of China and kept Taiwan’s population low in order to maintain peace in the region.

In the mid-19th century China’s contacts with the European countries increased, and Taiwan started trading with European countries. After the Sino-Japanese War of 1895 (primarily fought over control of Korea) and China’s defeat, China was forced to cede Taiwan to Japan. Although the local people rebelled against Japanese rule, Japan suppressed the rebellion effectively. However, when Japan was defeated, ending World War II in the Pacific theater, China again seized control of Taiwan.

In 1949 Chinese Communists took control of China and forced General Jiang Jie Shi’s (Chiang Kai-shek’s) government to seek refuge in Taiwan. Jiang Jie Shi had been the leader of the Nationalist Party in China, which was called the Kuomintang (KMT). The Communists of mainland China and the Republic of China (Taiwan) both claimed to be the legitimate government of China, and this led to political tensions that remain unresolved in the early 21st century.

In 1975 Jiang Jie Shi (b. 1887) died and was succeeded by his son Jiang Qing-guo (b. 1910). After the latter’s death in 1988, martial law came to an end and Lee Teng-hui (b. 1923) became the first president of Taiwan. In 2000 Chen Shui-bian (b. 1950) of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) became president, ending more than 50 years of Kuomintang rule. His party, the DPP, has traditionally been supportive of Taiwan independence, and the issue of Taiwan independence remains a sensitive political issue.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Taiwan is an archipelago located in East Asia. It is the largest island of the Republic of China and lies off the mainland of the People’s Republic of China. The Tropic of Cancer passes through this country. Taiwan is separated from China by the Taiwan Strait. The country also has maritime borders with the South China Sea, the Philippine Sea, the East China Sea, and the Pacific Ocean. Taiwan has a mountainous region and a rocky coastline in the east and fertile plains in the west. The highest peak of the country is located at Mt. Yushan, which is close to 13,000 feet high.

The climatic conditions in Taiwan are tropical in nature. The country receives abundant rainfall during the months of June, July, and August, and Taiwan receives close to 100 inches annually. The mountainous regions of Taiwan are cool and snowy during winter, while summers are hot and sticky. Temperatures can range from 68°F to 86°F throughout the year.

The mountains of Taiwan have forests of cypress and camphor trees. This island country is also home to the Formosan black bear and the Sika deer. A wide variety of fish and species of birds are also found in Taiwan. There are 67 reserves and 6 national parks spread around the country.

❁ ECONOMY

Taiwan has a capitalist economy with some of its major investments in mainland China, Thailand, Indonesia, and the Philippines. The main crops are rice, corn, vegetables, fruit, and tea, but agriculture contributes only around 2 percent to the country's gross domestic product (GDP). The nation's main industries include heavy equipment manufacturing, electrical equipment, electronic and computer goods, textiles, and iron and steel. Taiwan has good trade relations with the United States, Japan, Hong Kong, and South Korea. The country exports computer products, electrical equipment, metals, textiles, plastics, rubber products, and chemicals.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The Taiwanese culture is based on many of the same traditions and lifestyles as the Chinese because of the country's long association with mainland China.

Taiwan has at least 23 indigenous tribes, and each one has a style in the various art forms found in Taiwan. A trained eye can easily note the differences in the styles of woodcarving, weaving, and basketry.

Woodcarvings of toys, ornamental objects, religious buildings, furniture, and weapons are notable in Taiwan. Human heads and pairs of snakes are the most widely portrayed subjects. Pottery is important to traditional Taiwanese because pots are closely associated with ancestor worship. The Taiwanese architecture is evident in the indigenous homes of the country. People build homes with stacked slate, and these houses are partly underground in order to withstand typhoons. Handicrafts—paper cutting, knotting, and dough sculpture—and performing arts—puppetry, dragon and lion dances, folk dances, folk opera, and traditional acrobatics—remain vital, receiving special support from the government and other organizations.

The dance and music forms are among the major cultural contributions of the native people of Taiwan. Communal dances, performed at ceremonies and rituals, are mostly simple yet harmonious, accompanied with walking and foot-stomping movements, performed to the sounds of small bells or other metal ornaments. Musical instruments, such as drums, stringed instruments, woodwind instruments, and other percussion instruments are common in Taiwanese music.

❁ CUISINE

Taiwanese cuisine is very similar to that of the Chinese. The people use a lot of seafood and sugar in their cooking but eat simple, light foodstuffs on a daily basis. Pork feet, mushrooms, and shark-fin stew are some of the local favorites. Because it is an island, Taiwan's cuisine features fish and other seafood. Crustaceans, mollusks, and eels are delicacies, while oysters and clams are a regular part of the diet. Oachian (an omelet made of oysters, eggs, and cornstarch, served with sweet and sour sauce) is a very popular dish in Taiwan.

Pork, beef, lamb, goose, duck, and chicken are also important ingredients in Taiwanese cuisine. Rice is widely used to make a variety of snacks. Lopokao is a favorite dish made of rice, radish, and shrimp. Even though Taiwan does not produce wheat, this grain still plays an important role in Taiwanese kitchens.

Fun Fact

In Taiwan, religious and cultural observances are scheduled using the Chinese lunar calendar; the Gregorian (or Western) calendar is used to schedule public and legal holidays.

PEACE MEMORIAL DAY

Peace Memorial Day, or 228 Memorial Day, commemorates the incident that took place on this day in 1947. Often called the "Taiwanese Holocaust," it resulted in the murder of thousands of Taiwanese—by most accounts between 18,000 and 28,000 people—during a protest, and the government has designated this day as Peace Memorial Day. On this

February 28 Incident

When World War II ended, Japan lost control over Taiwan, which then came under Chinese rule. The people of Taiwan were initially very happy with this change of government, but they were soon disillusioned. The Chinese government was corrupt and insensitive to the needs and aspirations of the Taiwanese. In protest on February 28, 1947, thousands of people gathered in Taipei. The Chinese government, under the leadership of Jiang Jie Shi, fired at the demonstrators with machine guns, brutally killing many of them on the spot. More Taiwanese were massacred to curb the uprising. Many teachers and thinkers were detained by the Chinese military. Some of them were released decades later in the 1980s.

Even though in 1995, the Chinese premier apologized to the Taiwanese people on behalf of his government, the wounds from this incident remain fresh for many senior citizens in Taiwan.

On this day in 1910 the founding father of the Republic of China Dr. Sun Yat-sen spearheaded the Canton Uprising to topple the Ching government. During this struggle many young soldiers were killed. They were hailed as martyrs, and this day is observed as Youth Day in memory of these heroes. On Youth Day in Taiwan, the Republic of China's (ROC) president attends the public service at the Martyrs Shrine (a shrine to the martyrs of the revolution), and similar ceremonies are also held at the regional level. Ten outstanding youths are honored for their achievements on this day.

LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as Workers' Day and May Day, in many parts of the world; it recognizes the important role played by workers in building their nations and societies.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. Although the strike was postponed, the day for the observance remained May 1. The United States made efforts to discourage the May 1 commemoration because of its socialist origins, so America celebrates a cleansed, nonpolitical Labor Day in September.

In Taiwan workers hold marches, rallies, and demonstrations on Labor Day.

On this day in 1945 Taiwan was released from Japanese control and became a part of the Republic of China. Taiwan had been a Japanese territory since 1894, and the condition of the Taiwanese people during this period was deplorable. After the transfer the island country's economy and the standard of living improved considerably.

This day reminds the Taiwanese of the hardships they have endured in the past, and various memorial activities are held on Taiwan's Retrocession Day. Families hang the national flag in front of their homes to commemorate this event.

On this day in 1946, the constitution of the Republic of China was passed; it was implemented soon after. In Taiwan this significant day is listed as a national holiday. Government agencies, schools, and families celebrate by raising the national flag to symbolize this historic event.

Confucius (551–479 B.C.E.)

Confucius, the renowned ancient Chinese philosopher and teacher, symbolized the dictum of "educate all without discrimination, and teach according to the abilities of one's students." Confucius used arts, music, archery, chariot driving, reading, writing, and mathematics to bring more than 3,000 disciples under his tutelage. In a class-ridden Chinese society, Confucius never refused any student education because of his class or status. He also played an important role in formulating many of the basic principles that structure Chinese lifestyle and culture, even now. During times of unrest and political tensions Confucius toured China to advise rulers on the ethics of ruling a province.

While his teachings had a great influence on Chinese philosophy, his ideal of equality in education made Confucius one of the foremost educators in Chinese history.

❁ CHINESE NEW YEAR

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: First day of the first month of the Chinese calendar

The Taiwanese celebrate the Chinese New Year, also known as the Lunar New Year and the Spring Festival, with great joy. Around mid-December, weeks before the celebrations begin on New Year's Eve, people in Taiwan start their preparations. There is great excitement because New Year's is a time when entire families gather for dinner, if possible. If someone is unable to make the trip home for the celebration, a place setting is still placed on the table; it symbolizes the person's presence in spirit, if not in body. After dinner youngsters are given cash gifts by their elders and everyone stays up late to see the old year out and to welcome in the new one.

The Chinese New Year is a two-week holiday filled with festivities as well as piety. The Taiwanese begin the next day with prayer and worship. This day is set aside to meet and greet friends and relatives and the streets are filled with throngs of people on their way to reunions or watching dragon dancing, lion dancing, and other traditional forms of entertainment and activities that take place on the streets. Families get together to share special feasts on this day. The streets and homes in Taiwan are decorated with colorful lanterns and elaborate lighting and there are firework displays all over Taiwan.

families return to take up their vigil once more, and most people go back to work after celebrating for four or five days. On the 13th and 14th days shopkeepers are open again, and they hang lanterns out for the Lantern Festival (Yuen Siu). The festivities continue until the colorful Lantern Festival, on the 15th day of the new year, before life again returns to its routine.

Though the traditional festivities associated with the Chinese New Year are millennia old, they still have great importance. Cleaning

❁ LANTERN FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifteenth of the first month of the Chinese calendar

The Lantern Festival, also known as the Shang Yuan Festival, is the climax of a series of springtime celebrations, a "second New Year's" gladly celebrated by the people of Taiwan. It ends the two-week-long festivities of the Chinese New Year's. On the night of the festival decorative lanterns depicting birds, beasts, historical figures, or any of numerous themes are carried by children or adorn temples.

Competitions are held to show off these glowing works of art. The Taipei Lantern Festival, held annually at Jiang Jie Shi Memorial Hall Plaza (and the largest and most famous of these competitions), is attended every year by thousands. The festivities and different customs associated with this festival not only provide celebrants with rich entertainment, like the historical-theme lantern displays and riddles, but the ancient wisdom expressed is also instructive. The lanterns feature different folk art techniques, impressing these arts deep in the hearts and minds of the people. Fireworks light the night skies around the island, and there are also many regional folk activities unique to Taiwan such as Farmer's Day, which is also celebrated on the 15th day of the first lunar month.

One of the most popular features of the Lantern Festival are the customary lantern riddle parties that are held on this night. Lantern riddles are stuck on the surface of lanterns, and people try to guess the answers to them. The keys to riddles may be found in a single word, a line from a poem, or the name of a place or an object. Because guessing the riddles is said to be "as hard as shooting a tiger," these brain-stumpers are called "lantern tigers." Newspapers, magazines, and department stores all make up riddles for festival-goers to puzzle over. There are also lantern riddle parties held at temples.

❁ FARMER'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifteenth of the first lunar month of the Chinese calendar

This day signifies the commencement of spring in the Republic of China. The aim of celebrating this event is to encourage the farmers of Taiwan and to highlight the importance of agriculture to the Taiwanese economy. The main event held during this occasion is the "Whipping of the Spring Ox." The spring ox is a colorful paper cow stuffed with five types of grains to symbolize a good harvest. This ox is then whipped while the grain pours out from it. This is seen as a good omen for the spring, which is a time of regeneration and new beginnings. While the Spring Cow is being struck, the following words are said: "With the first hit comes timely and favorable weather; with the second comes fertile land and warm rains; with the third comes a peaceful start to a new year; with the fourth comes peace through the four seasons; with the fifth comes a harvest of the five grains; and with the sixth comes springtime to the Six Unities or universe."

On this day, the people drink spring wine and worship the spring deity, the Earth god who can bring a plentiful harvest. They also consume foods associated with the spring season such as celery, chives, and bamboo shoots; these represent industriousness, longevity, and prosperity, respectively.

The fifth day of the first lunar month is also celebrated as Tourism Day in Taiwan, while the second day of the month is the Earth god's birthday.

❁ TOMB-SWEEPING DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: One hundred sixth after the winter solstice

Tomb-Sweeping Day, also known as the Qingming or Ching Ming Festival, and Qing Ming Jie, which can be translated as the “Pure Brightness” Festival, is a traditional Chinese festival observed on the 106th day following the winter solstice, which falls early in April on the Gregorian calendar. It signifies the middle of spring and is a sacred day of the dead. For the Taiwanese this day remembers and honors the dead. Families visit the graves of their dead ancestors and clean and tidy the tombs. They offer prayers and food items at the graves and pray for their souls. The most common dish offered is a special type of “grave cake,” although it differs from one region to another. Most cemeteries are located on hillsides outside towns and villages, so Taiwanese families often combine the visit to the cemetery with a family picnic, taking advantage of the fine weather and the time they can spend with their families.

April 5 is also a very significant date in Chinese history. Major events such as the April Fifth Movement and the Tiananmen Incident occurred on this day, albeit in different years. This is also the date when the Taiwanese leader Jiang Jie Shi died.

❁ DRAGON BOAT FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifth of the fifth month of the Chinese calendar

The Dragon Boat Festival, also called Tuono Ng, is celebrated on the fifth day of the fifth lunar month. With the Chinese New Year and Mid-Autumn Festival, it is one of the three major Chinese holidays. Because diseases spread most easily during summers, Dragon Boat Festival was started to drive off evil spirits and disease and to help find peace. The legend of the poet-saint Chu Yuan is a later addition, and the event now also commemorates his death. According to tradition, he drowned himself 2,300 years ago to protest the government’s corruption. Competing teams take part in boat races in specially designed boats with dragon-shaped heads, rowing to the rhythm of drums. People also consume a special dish, tzung tzu (rice balls wrapped in bamboo leaves), in memory of Chu Yuan.

This festival continues its original purpose as a day to ward off evil spirits and pests that cause diseases during the summer season. The Taiwanese hang calamus and moxa (herbs) on their front door. The elders drink hsiung huang wine, and children carry special sachets to ward off evil spirits and bring peace. The Taiwanese also believe that if they consume well water drawn on the afternoon of the festival, it will cure illnesses. This custom is known as “fetching noon water.”

Dragon boat teams paddle through the course on the Keelung River during preliminary races in the lead up to the Dragon Boat Festival in Taipei. According to historians, dragon boats were used as part of a complex shamanistic ritual for supplicating the water gods in order to prevent floods and other watery disasters over 3,000 years ago. The death of poet and respected bureaucrat Chu Yuan in 290 B.C.E., saw the dragon boats become an integral part of Chinese culture. (AP Photo/Wally Santana)

Taiwan celebrates the Ghost Festival to honor the deceased, believed to live in the underworld, by offering sumptuous feasts on the 15th day of the seventh lunar month. It is the custom for families to offer sacrifices of the newly harvested grain to their departed ancestors, as well as freshly slaughtered pigs and sheep and wine. Because the Taoist Ghost Festival and the Buddhist Ullambana (Deliverance) Festival fall on the same day, and both festivals pay homage to the spirits of the dead, the seventh lunar month has come to be known as Ghost Month. It is a time when Taiwanese believe the dead return from the underworld to feast on the food provided for them by the living. The Ullambana Festival and Ghost Festival have combined and are now celebrated as Chung Yuan Putu or “Mid-Origin Passage to Universal Salvation.”

❁ MID-AUTUMN MOON FESTIVAL

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fifteenth of the eighth month of the Chinese calendar

Fun Fact

There are four kinds of mooncakes: ping, su, kuang, and tai. Ping mooncakes were first made in Peking and are similar to sesame cakes, with a crisp and savory crust. Su mooncakes are sweet and have a delicate, layered crust judged on the basis of its tenderness and whiteness. The kuang mooncakes are wrapped in a pastry crust and are well-known for carefully prepared fillings. Tai mooncakes have a sweet potato filling and are sweet, tender, and tasty. They are a tradition in Taiwan and have also been called “Moonlight Cakes.”

The Mid-Autumn Moon Festival has traditionally been a time when Taiwanese families get together. This festival has ancient Chinese origins and is believed to have been a ceremony of sacrifice to the Moon goddess. At some point that ceremony was merged with the tradition of eating mooncakes, and what is now celebrated as the Mid-Autumn Festival became a major event. On this night the Taiwanese gather at picnic spots and parks for “moon appreciation parties,” eating specially prepared mooncakes and praying for a safe year ahead.

This festival also coincides with the fall harvest in Taiwan. People pray to the Earth god (Tu-ti Gong) so that the next year’s harvest will be bountiful, too.

DOUBLE NINTH DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Ninth day of ninth lunar month of the Chinese calendar

The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth month of the Chinese lunar calendar. This Chinese festival is based on the theory of yin and yang, the two opposing, complementary forces of the universe. Traditionally the number nine is associated with the positive principle, yang, so this observance is also known as Chung Yang, or Double Yang Festival. Yin is thought to be the negative and feminine force; yang is the masculine and positive force. On this day, the odd digit nine occurs twice, and, therefore, is an auspicious occasion to celebrate. On this day the people of the Republic of China drink chrysanthemum wine and eat cakes made with chrysanthemums. This plant is viewed as a medicinal herb that cleanses the body and ward off evil spirits.

In Chinese the word for “nine” sounds exactly like the word for “long time,” so nine has become associated with longevity. As a result in 1966, Double Ninth Day was declared Senior Citizen’s Day in Taiwan, and the week that begins this holiday is observed as Senior Citizen’s Week. Since then Double Ninth Day has lost its original significance and is now a time of expressing gratitude to the elderly for their hard work, a new custom that fits nicely with the Chinese tradition of revering the old and one’s ancestors.

SAISIYAT FESTIVAL

Observed in: Miaoli County

Observed by: Saisiyat tribe

Observed on: Fifteenth of the 10th lunar month of the Chinese calendar

The Saisiyat people are one of the aboriginal tribes who inhabited Taiwan before the Chinese arrived. An agrarian people numbering somewhere between 2,500 and 4,000, they have lived on their land for over 400 years. The Saisiyat Festival, known as Sacrifice to the Short People, is a three-day festival that starts on the first full Moon after the fall harvest. It is observed every two years. According to the Saisiyat elders, the ritual is performed to appease the Short People and to correct a great injustice that involved a man of the Short People and a Saisiyat woman, although the details are vague.

Before this tragic event, the Short People and the Saisiyat lived harmoniously, sharing the bounty of their harvests. The woman, who may have been married or, perhaps, a maiden, was raped or assaulted. No one knows. During a harvest while the ceremonials were being prepared, the brother, or maybe the husband, of the offended woman, sneaked away and chopped halfway through the trunk of the Great Tree where the Short People would return to sleep when the ritual was over. Having covered his work with mud, he went back to the village and rejoined his people, behaving as if nothing was wrong. Eventually, the Short People returned to their tree and fell asleep. Then the tree fell over, killing almost all but two old women. When numerous calamities befell the Saisiyat because of the genocide, the remaining old women of the Short People taught them the ceremonies that would placate the angry spirits and atone for the injustice of their ancestors.

At sunset on the first day, the Saisiyat gather in a circle and invite the Short Spirits to come and receive their offering and share in the bounties of the harvest. The meanings of the songs they sing are said to be so sacred that most Saisiyat cannot understand them. Then the dancing begins. Remaining in the large circle, the people link arms and begin to sway, moving slowly the center. The dancing will not stop until dawn, except for prayer. Eventually participants tire, drop out, and fall asleep under the shelters set up at the edge of the site. Others replace them, while others wait, keeping meals warm and pounding rice. Starting at midnight each night, the dancing stops, the circle turns to the east, and everyone supports the ritual leader as he prays. The shaman-priest intones prayers to appease the spirits, then the dance begins again.

❁ CHI HSI

Observed in: Taiwan

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Seventh day of the seventh month of the Chinese calendar

Chi Hsi (Qi Xi) is known by several names in Taiwan, including the Night of Sevens (because it falls on the seventh day of the seventh lunar month), Festival to Plead for Skills, Seventh Sister's Birthday, and Night of Skills; it is also sometimes called the Chinese Valentine's Day. On this day it is traditional for young girls to demonstrate their domestic arts, especially melon-carving, and to wish for a good husband.

During late summer the stars Altair, Vega, and Deneb—the Summer Triangle—are directly overhead in the night sky, and the Chinese tell the tragic story of a young cowherd named Niu Lang (the star Altair) who accidentally found seven fairy sisters bathing in a lake. After stealing their clothes he waits to see what will happen. The fairy sisters choose the youngest and most beautiful sister Zhi Nu (“the weaver girl,” the star Vega) to recover their clothes. In the process, the cowherd sees her naked so she is obliged to agree to marry him. Niu Lang and Zhi Nu are very happy together, but the Goddess of Heaven (in some versions it's Zhi Nu's mother or father or the Emperor of Heaven who wants to separate them) finds out that a mortal has married a fairy girl and becomes enraged. Taking out her hairpin, she scratches a wide river in the sky that will separate the lovers forever (thus creating the Milky Way, which separates Altair and Vega). Zhi Nu sits forever on one side of the river, sadly weaving, while Niu Lang watches her from afar and cares for their two children (his flanking stars). But the magpies of the world take pity on them and annually fly up to heaven and make a bridge across the star Deneb so the lovers can be together for one night, the seventh night of the seventh Moon.

It is the custom on Chi Hsi for a single or newly married woman to put a wreath in the front yard and to make an offering of fruit, flowers, tea, and makeup to Niu Lang and Zhi Nu. When the offering is finished, half of the makeup (face powder) is thrown on the roof, and the other half is shared among the young women. They believe that, by making this offering, they will be bound in beauty with Zhi Nu.

Japan also celebrates this festival, which is called Tanabata there, on July 7, celebrating the meeting of Orihime (Vega) and Hikoboshi (Altair). Other East Asian cultures continue to celebrate the “star-crossed” lovers on the seventh day of the seventh lunar month of the Chinese calendar,

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

After giving birth, a Taiwanese woman is expected to stay indoors and recover. During this period she is not allowed to do any work; she is to recuperate by eating, resting, and sleeping. She is not allowed to eat anything salty or cold. Cabbages, bamboo shoots, oranges, and an assortment of fruits and vegetables are also not considered ideal food for a new mother. Her diet includes eggs, rice, noodles, brown sugar, ginger, chicken, fish, and pig kidneys. Ma-yu chi (chicken stewed in sesame oil and rice wine) and sheng-bua tang (a concoction of peach kernels, ginger, herbs, and rice wine) are two special dishes prepared for her during this period of postnatal care.

In some communities in Taiwan, the birth of the first child is celebrated on a grand scale. The father's family sends gifts to the mother's family to show their joy and gratitude.

❁ COMING OF AGE

The traditional coming-of-age ceremonies of the various groups in Taiwan are no longer observed in modern Taiwan. The young people are aware of such rituals only from stories they hear from their elders and from books. In former times young boys in Taiwan underwent many rituals before attaining manhood. There was an array of rituals such as admonishments and beatings by the village elders to show that the young boy could withstand pain and suffering. Hunting ceremonies, in which boys were required to hunt a deer or catch a monkey, were performed, and drinking sacrificial beer also signified the coming of age of Taiwanese boys.

Taiwanese girls do not have an organized system that formally declares their reaching womanhood. In some areas young girls received tattoos on their forehead to signify that they were women. Married women were tattooed on their cheeks. These practices are no longer followed.

❁ MARRIAGE

Before Taiwanese marriages take place, the horoscopes of the prospective bride and groom are analyzed and matched. If their match proves to be ideal, the families exchange gifts

Fun Fact

Once known in the distant past as Fu-teh, Cheng-shen (the deity of fortune, morals, and righteous deity), Taiwan's Earth god was also known as She-shen (“village deity”) because he watches over matters central to farming and society. He is probably the god most closely connected with the daily lives of the Taiwanese. Countless temples and shrines dedicated to him around the island indicate how much the people depend on his protective power.

Fun Fact

The number four and the color white are often associated with death in Taiwan, and are therefore often avoided. This is similar to the superstition about the number 13 prevalent in the West.

and confirm the marriage. The groom gives the bride 12 gift items including shoes, jewelry, and pagoda-shaped candies. The groom's betrothal letter is read out loud, and the bride's family responds by sending 12 gift items to the groom's family. These items include chopsticks and a goldfish, to signify prosperity and the wish for male offspring in the future. The couple exchanges rings at their engagement ceremony, rather than on the wedding day.

On the wedding day the groom comes to the bride's home to pick her up. He is expected to kneel in front of her parents and vow that he will take care of their daughter. Then the groom is allowed to see his bride and take her along with him. The couple seeks blessings from the bride's parents and grandparents, then she is taken to the groom's home, where she is presented to the new family. The couple seeks blessings from the groom's parents, grandparents, and their dead ancestors. There are no bridesmaids or a best man in a traditional Taiwanese wedding.

The friends of the newlyweds often organize some special wedding games, and the groom is required to show how well he knows his bride. He may be asked questions about her personal belongings. The groom is allowed to meet his bride only after answering the questions correctly.

Most contemporary Taiwanese weddings feature huge banquets held in restaurants, and wedding guests give cash sealed in red envelopes as gifts.

❁ DEATH

The Taiwanese believe in immortality of the soul in spite of death. When a death occurs, they pay their respects to the deceased by holding elaborate funeral ceremonies. A dead person may be cremated or buried in Taiwan. Some Taiwanese ritually remove the bones of the buried after seven years. These bones are then washed and placed in a grave again. Special ceremonies are held to remember the dead even after the official mourning period, which usually lasts for 49 days, and no celebrations are held. If the dead person was a close family member, anyone who was planning to marry must do so within 100 days of the death or else wait an entire year.

The different communities of Taiwan have different death rituals. However, they generally share the idea that there are good and bad deaths. If someone dies at home in the company of loved ones, it is considered a good death. However, if it is a suicide, violent death, death during childbirth, or a death outdoors, it is considered to be a bad death.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Tajikistan, located in the heart of Central Asia, was inhabited by humans as early as 4000 B.C.E., and the nation's prehistory remains visible, if unknown, in hundreds of thousands of petroglyphs (rock drawings) of numerous animals and hunters. The 4,000-mile-long Silk Road, an old caravan route that connected China with nations in the West, traversed Tajikistan: It followed the Great Wall of China to the northwest, going around the Takla Makan Desert, climbed the Pamir Mountains in Tajikistan, crossed Afghanistan, and went on to the eastern Mediterranean where merchandise was then shipped to ports.

Like neighboring modern nations of Central Asia—Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, and Turkmenistan—Tajikistan was ruled by a number of empires. Of these, the Persians controlled the region for the longest periods and probably had the greatest influence. In fact the modern Tajik language is nearly identical to Persian, and they are still mutually intelligible.

In the seventh century C.E., the Arabs gained control and introduced Islam. However, a later Persian dynasty—the Samanids—ruled the region from 819 to 992, and Bukhara became the capital. Turks invaded the region at the end of the 10th century. The Persians and the Turks then lived in relative harmony and absorbed each other's culture. Even so, the Mongols conquered the Tajik territory in the 13th century.

In the mid-19th century, when the British and the Russian Empires were fighting for control over the Asian territories, Russia succeeded in establishing its control over the Tajik territory in the 1880s. The region was economically very weak at that time. After the Russian Revolution of 1917 the Tajik people revolted against the Bolsheviks in a war that lasted four years, but eventually the Russians defeated the Tajiks.

Tajikistan was combined with present-day Uzbekistan and, in 1924, the region was made an autonomous republic within Uzbekistan. During the next few decades attempts were made to improve the condition of Tajikistan. Agriculture was encouraged in the late 1950s, and Tajikistan became a major producer of cotton. In the mid-1970s the Islamic Renaissance Party (IRP) was founded, which gave the nationalist movement an impetus. In 1978 there were anti-Russian riots throughout Tajikistan.

After the collapse of the USSR in 1991, Tajikistan declared its independence and became a member of the Commonwealth of Independent States three months later. A civil war between pro-Islamists and government troops followed, however, and about 20,000 to 50,000 people lost their lives, while almost half a million were made homeless. The war weakened the infrastructure and the economy, making Tajikistan one of the poorest countries of the world. It is heavily dependent on aid and assistance from the Russian military to preserve its security.

Although President Imomali Rakhmonov (b. 1952) and the leader of the Islamic opposition Sayid Abdullo Nuri signed a peace agreement in June 1997, tension between the two factions still exists. Thousands of Tajik rebels have settled in northern Afghanistan; and cross-border raids and smuggling are rampant.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

A landlocked country located in Central Asia, Tajikistan is situated between Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan to the north and west, China to the east, and Afghanistan to the south. The terrain is very mountainous and is dominated by the Trans-Alay range in the north and the Pamirs in the southeast. Two of the principle rivers of Asia, the Amu-Darya and Syr-Darya, flow through Tajikistan, and mountain glaciers feed the rivers. Many canyons and gorges cut across the mountains and form streams. Earthquakes are a common occurrence in the region.

Due to the country's mountainous topography, the climate of Tajikistan varies greatly. Summers are very hot with temperatures often exceeding 104°F during the day. Winters are quite mild, although some valleys do receive snowfall. The climate during spring and autumn is very pleasant.

Tajikistan's mountains are characterized by grassy meadows. During summer, wildflowers (including wild irises and edelweiss) add color to the landscape. The forests are full of spruce, larch, and juniper, and trout can be found in the rivers. The snow leopard, though elusive, can sometimes be spotted. Other animals found are the ibex, lynx, marmots, wolf, wild bear, and brown bear.

❁ ECONOMY

The per capita gross domestic product (GDP) of Tajikistan is the lowest among the 15 former republics of the Soviet Union. It is one of the poorest countries of the world, with more than 60 percent of its population living in abject poverty. Only about 6 percent of the land is arable, and the main agricultural products are cotton, grain, fruits, grapes, and vegetables. The main imported items are fuels, grains, iron and steel, consumer goods, and finished goods, while the main exports are cotton, fertilizers, metals, silk, fruits, and vegetables. The foreign revenue of Tajikistan depends largely on exports of cotton and aluminum. Tajikistan's major trading partners are the Netherlands, Turkey, Russia, Uzbekistan, Switzerland, Hungary, Latvia, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, Azerbaijan, and India.

In the early 1980s, a deposit of gemstone-quality clinohumite, ordinarily found as tiny indistinct grains, was discovered in the Pamir Mountains. Until another deposit of gem-quality clinohumite was found in the Taymyr region of Siberia in 2000, the Pamir clinohumite was the only deposit known. The two deposits, however, are quite different, and the gems found in Tajikistan are harder and less brittle than those of Siberia. Depending on the size of the Pamir deposit and the possibility of other, similar, finds, it could contribute significantly to the nation's GDP.

The economic stability of the country is very fragile, with widespread unemployment and heavy external debt.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Most of the people of Tajikistan are Muslim. Older men dress in the traditional long quilted jackets, knee-high boots, and embroidered caps, while women usually wear colorful, gold-threaded long dresses with trousers and headscarves.

Theater, dance, and drama have a prominent place in the culture. Tajik entertainment art has ancient roots. This can be seen in early rock and medieval wall pictures. The most typical kind of national entertainment art was pantomime, in which the actors performed wearing masks, portraying supernatural creatures, such as the albastibozi (demon), and various animals including the rubobbozi (fox), sberbozi (lion), maimunbozi (monkey), ukkobozi (eagle), and hirsbozi (bear).

Tajik dance is another ancient art, typically depicting everyday domestic life. It is performed at all important events like births, holidays, and so on. These dances are based on ancient rituals, games, and stories from real life. Some of their dances are: pantomime dance, the most ancient type of dance, based on animals and birds; ritual dances like raksboi marosimi, which are performed at funerals; male dances like the shamsberbozi, which is warlike and features strong movements, sharp turns, and sculptural poses, performed with cavalry swords; and dance accompanied by musical instruments.

The Zochabozi puppet theater is also extremely popular. The performances are accompanied by

Fun Fact

The Pamir Mountains, known in China as Congling, are among the highest mountains in the world.

Some say that they dwarf the Rocky Mountains in North America and the Himalayas. The two highest mountains are Ismail Samani Peak (known between 1932 and 1962 as Stalin Peak, and from 1962 to 1998 as Communism Peak), at 24,590 feet and Lenin Peak, 23,508 feet.

music, and clowns may also participate.

The traditional Tajik music is called shashmaqam and is played on a dutar (a two-stringed, pear-shaped, long-necked lute). The hafiz (singer) of the shashmaqam is held in great esteem.

The poetry of Rudaki is very famous and his poems are still read today.

Horsing and games played on horseback are particularly popular in Tajikistan. Another traditional sport is falconry.

❁ CUISINE

The traditional food of Tajikistan is composed of bread, rice, stew, and soups. A popular dish is pilaf, made of mutton, rice, onions, and carrots. Shashlik (grilled mutton on skewers) is also very popular. However, few Tajiks can afford meat every day, and so chickpea samsas, or porridge, is a Tajik favorite, as are soups made from beans, milk, and herbs. Another popular dish is tubum barak, a tasty egg-filled ravioli coated with sesame seed oil. Chakka (curd mixed with herbs) is served with flatbread. Tajiks also make tushbera (steamed dumplings), which are served plain or with vinegar or butter.

The men enjoy going out and having tea in a chaikhana (teahouse). Here men of all ages get together over a cup of tea. After finishing it, they turn their cups upside down to indicate that they do not want any more.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, frequently beginning with parties, parades, and other festivities on New Year's Eve. In Tajikistan it is a national holiday, and schools and offices remain closed.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day (IWD), observed annually on March 8, is a major day of global celebration for the economic, political, and social achievements of women. The proposal to have a special day on which to recognize women and their many achievements was first suggested at the turn of the 20th century, when rapid industrialization and economic expansion led to workers' protests over dangerous

Rudaki

Rudaki, or Rudagi (859–c. 941), was the first literary genius of the Persian language, writing his poems in the (New Persian) Perso-Arabic alphabet script. Born in Rudak, in the ninth century, most of his biographers say he was blind. His accurate references to colors and their properties in his poetry, however, make this very doubtful. Rudaki was the court poet to the Samanid ruler Nasr II (914–43) in Bukhara, but he fell out of favor and died poor.

working conditions. Women who worked in clothing and textile factories held one such protest on March 8, 1857, in New York City, protesting what they saw as very poor working conditions and low wages.

The first IWD was observed on February 28, 1909, in the United States following a declaration by the Socialist Party of America. International Women's Day was declared the following year at the first international women's conference in Copenhagen, organized by the Socialist International. On March 25, 1911, the infamous Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire in New York City killed over 140 women. A lack of safety measures was blamed for the high death toll. In the West, International Women's Day was commemorated during the 1910s and 1920s, then lapsed into obscurity until a second wave of feminism revived it in the 1960s. In 1975 the United Nations began sponsoring International Women's Day. Since then the day has become more of a parody, sort of a combination of Valentine's Day and Mother's Day, even in former Communist nations, when men present women with gifts and flowers. Traditionally the men are supposed to take over all domestic tasks and give the women a day off. In some countries special presentations and lectures regarding improving the role of women are held.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, May Day, or Workers' Day in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest celebrations of May Day were associated to the pagan rituals practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, it is likely that this made May 1 a good date for Labor Day because it was already a popular holiday among the people.

In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Tajikistan, workers hold marches and demonstrate in the streets on this day.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 9

Victory Day commemorates the defeat of German Fascists by the Allies during World War II, in 1945. This is one of the most celebrated national holidays in Russia, and it is still a popular holiday in Tajikistan, which was under Russian domination for over 60 years. People attend military parades and other festive demonstrations. War veterans visit the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier and honor the war dead, while the national media broadcast patriotic programs and songs. This day is a national holiday in Tajikistan and all schools and businesses are closed.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed on: September 9

Independence Day, or National Day, celebrates September 9, 1991, the day when Tajikistan came into being after breaking away from the former Soviet Union. The president of Tajikistan addresses the nation and major celebrations are held in Dushanbe, the capital, and other cities of Tajikistan.

Religious Holidays

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: March 21

Navruz, or Nevruz, marks the first day in the Old Persian calendar and is celebrated as New Year's by Persians on the vernal equinox. Navruz is a Persian word that means “new day” (nev, “new”; ruz, “day”). This celebration marks the beginning of the spring season and the return of warmth and light. When Islam first spread across Tajikistan, the authorities banned it. However, the people continued to celebrate this festival, and eventually the ban had to be lifted.

Because it is a day of new beginnings, Navruz is also a time to reflect on the events of the past year. Tajikistanis prepare for this three-day festival by cleaning and renovating their homes, and women prepare special sweets and dishes for the holiday. During this festival time, people visit their friends and relatives. Music, theatrical performances, fairs, traditional games, beauty contests, sports, poetry nights, and other such festivities are enjoyed across Tajikistan.

Eid al-Fitr, also known as the Feast of Fast-Breaking, marks the end of the holy month of Ramadan and the beginning of much-awaited festivities. Devout Muslims all over the world observe a strict month-long, dawn-to-dusk fast during Ramadan, the holiest month of the Islamic year, in obedience to the fourth pillar of Islam's Five Pillars.

Eid al-Fitr begins on the first day of Shawwal; it is celebrated for three days in Tajikistan. Special prayers and feasting mark the occasion. The Koran forbids fasting during this celebration.

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice, which is called Eid ul Kurboon in Tajikistan, is a very important festival for Muslims all over the world because it was on this auspicious day that Ibrahim (Abraham) agreed to sacrifice his young son in order to obey God's command, and Muslims honor Ibrahim for his willingness to do God's will. In Tajikistan this festival is celebrated for four days. On this, the 10th day of the month, Muslim families slaughter a fattened sheep and prepare an elaborate meal for friends and family members. Special prayer services are conducted in mosques all across the country.

Many Muslims undertake a pilgrimage, or hajj, to Mecca during Dhu al-Hijjah. It is the requirement of all Muslims, when it is financially and physically possible, to go to the sacred city at least once in their lifetimes. The Koran commands it, and it is the fifth of Islam's Five Pillars.

Mothers often play matchmakers when their children are infants or very young. The matchmaking of the infants is called govorabakhsh ("matchmaking") in the cradle or gift in the cradle, and matchmaking of very young children is called domanchok, or shirt-tearing. ❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is a part of Tajikistan's tradition. The operation is performed when boys reach puberty. The Muslims in Tajikistan believe that, by undergoing this ritual, a boy becomes a man. Trained elders use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments to perform the circumcision, without administering any anesthetic. This practice enjoys social backing, and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations also follow this coming of age ritual.

Tajikistani marriages are often arranged by parents or matchmakers. About 10 days after the match has been arranged, the prospective groom and his mother arrive at the woman's house with a dish of pilaf. Relatives, neighbors, and friends are invited for this occasion, when the engagement, called foṭiba, is formalized. The bride-price is then given to the bride's parents, and the date for the wedding is set.

The wedding day (called the nikoh) begins with preparing pilaf. First the men are fed, then the women and children of the village. After the meal, the bride sits behind a curtain near the entrance door. Her girlfriends dance for her in front of the curtained door. The mullah, who officiates at the wedding, performs prayers and rites for concluding the wedding ceremony. Once this is done, the groom is congratulated by all his friends and relatives. He is then led to where the bride is sitting, with the help of torches held by his friends. The groom is expected to jump over a fire that is lit in front of the entrance. This is to signify that he has been cleansed with the fire.

The groom then lifts the curtain

On the way to the groom's home, the couple has to pass fires made by their friends and relatives. The bride is made to jump over a fire in front of the groom's home to signify that she has been cleansed. Her father-in-law then slaughters a lamb at the bride's feet, while the groom's mother welcomes the couple home. Everyone in the groom's house is then treated to some more pilaf.

❁ DEATH

When someone dies in Tajikistan, Muslim prescriptions for burial are followed. Special prayers are said just before the individual dies. Women are not allowed to participate in the funeral services held in the cemetery; rather, they are expected to mourn at home for a prolonged period of time.

In certain parts of Tajikistan the close relatives of the deceased, primarily women, perform special ritualistic dances called raksboi marosimi.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Although many gaps remain in what is known about the early history of Tanzania, it is the location of two of the most famous hominid archaeological sites: the Lower Paleolithic site in Laetoli (excavated by Mary Leakey, Richard Hay, and their group), where the footprints of three hominids were found, and Olduvai Gorge, where hominid fossil remains dated to 2.5 million years were excavated by Louis Leakey. What is known so far indicates that East Africa, specifically the region now called Tanzania, may have been the earliest home of the human species.

The Laetoli footprints were preserved in powdery volcanic ash from an eruption of the Sadiman Volcano; soft rain cemented the ash layer without destroying the prints. The Pliocene hominid prints, dated to 3.7 million years ago, were produced by three individuals, although one was walking in the footprints of another. Because the tracks lead in the same direction, they could have been produced by a group, but there is no evidence that supports the common notion that a nuclear family visited the ancient waterhole.

The Lower Paleolithic site in Olduvai (or Oldupai) Gorge stretches for 30 miles along the Great Rift Valley in northern Tanzania, East Africa, and remains one of the most important prehistoric sites in the world.

Olduvai is an extremely valuable discovery because there the stratigraphy is very deep, and several layers of volcanic ash and stones make it possible to use radiometric dating of the embedded artifacts. Although the earliest artifacts—pebble tools and choppers—have been dated to around 2 million years ago, the fossil remains of hominids go back as far as 2.5 million years.

Bed I, the earliest excavated deposit, contained evidence of campsites and living floors, flaked flint tools, and primitive hominid forms—Australopithecus boisei—and the first remains of Homo habilis to be discovered. Immediately above Bed I, Bed II, dated to approximately 1.5 million years ago, revealed that the crude implements of Bed I were gradually replaced by the more useful Abbevillian hand axes typically produced by H. erectus. Beds III and IV, dated to 600,000 years ago, produced fossilized bones resembling those of Neanderthals in association with Acheulean implements.

The beds above the earliest four strata, still working forward in time, are: the Masek Beds (400,000–600,000 years old), with tools from a Kenya-Capsian industry made by modern humans; the Ndotu Beds (32,000–400,000 years old); and the Naisiusiu Beds (15,000–22,000 years old).

Not much is presently known of Tanganyika's interior history during the later centuries of prehistory. It is thought that it may have been inhabited by ethnic groups speaking a click-tongue language resembling that of southern Africa's Bushmen (San) and Hottentots.

While scattered remnants of these earliest peoples still exist, most were apparently pushed out by Bantu farmers arriving from the west and south as well as Nilotes (the famous Masai) and other peoples from the north. Some of these groups lived in well-developed cultures and controlled large areas by the time the Arab slave-traders, European colonizers, and Christian missionaries first entered the country's interior during the first half of the 19th century.

Foreign influence began in the area along Tanzania's coastline during the first centuries of the modern era. Rhapta, the southernmost marketplace of Azania, was known to merchants of the Roman period, evidence of which has been found at points from Tanga down to the mouth of the Rufiji River. Arab traders were the next to set up posts along the coast, perhaps by the eighth century. By the 12th century traders and immigrants were arriving from Persia (now Iran) and even India. These people built a series of highly developed city and trading states along the coast. The most important was Kibaha, a Persian settlement that controlled the region around it until the Portuguese razed it in the early 1500s.

After the Portuguese explorer Vasco da Gama (1460–1524) arrived in the region while looking for a sea route to India in 1498, the area began attracting Portuguese attention. Recognizing the strategic and commercial importance of the region, the Portuguese launched an attack on the Arab traders and by 1506 had established control along the coastal areas. But they did not colonize the region, nor did they explore it. Arab traders, with assistance from the Omani Arabs (Arabs from Oman), rebelled against Portuguese rule and ultimately succeeded in overthrowing them by the early 18th century. The coastal strip was conquered by Omani Sultan Syed Said (1804–56). This was the beginning of Arab rule in the region. In 1841 the sultan moved his country's capital from Muscat in Oman to Zanzibar.

Meanwhile Tanganyika had attracted attention from other European nations in the 19th century when a number of German and British explorations explored its interior. The region along Lake Victoria was made up of a number of small kingdoms headed by tribal chiefs. In 1884 Karl Peters (1856–1918), the founder of the Society of German Colonization, signed a number of treaties with the local chiefs in which they agreed to accept German rule in exchange for protection. His endeavors were backed by the government of Prince Otto van Bismarck (1815–98) and led to the formation of the German East Africa Company. After a series of Anglo-German wars in Africa, the two sides finally signed a peace treaty that defined the regions under British and German control. According to the treaty Tanganyika would be controlled by Germany, while Britain would establish a protectorate in Zanzibar.

The British, in a bid to end the slave trade in Zanzibar and stake their claim in the local spice trade, signed a number of treaties with Sultan Said. In exchange for protection, the British shut down the slave trade.

In 1891 the government of Germany took control of Tanganyika from the German East Africa Company and appointed a governor in Dar es Salaam, the former capital of the region. However, European rule faced a good deal of resistance in the form of guerilla warfare waged by local tribes. The Maji Maji Revolution (1905–07) was brutally crushed by the German forces, and more than 120,000 Africans lost their lives as a result of fighting and starvation.

After the German defeat in World War I, major territories of Tanganyika came under British dominance in accordance with the mandate of the League of Nations. After World War II Tanganyika became a UN trust territory under British control.

However, by the late 1950s the voice of independence was spreading throughout Africa. The

Fun Fact

The term San was historically applied to this group by their ethnic relatives and historic rivals the Khoikhoi. However, because the term means “outsider” and was intended to be derogatory, many of this group prefer to be called Bushmen, despite the fact that the term is considered an insult by most Westerners.

Maji Maji Revolution

In 1902, the German governor of Tanganyika forced the villagers to grow cotton as a cash crop and appointed a headman in each village to oversee the execution of this order. Even those villagers who had other jobs were forced to become farmers and grow cotton. In addition, villagers were forced to work as laborers, building roads all over the region. This led to widespread protests. In 1905, a spirit medium named Kinjikitile Ngwale claimed that a snake spirit called Hongo possessed him and instructed him to eliminate Germans from East Africa. He also claimed that the spirit had given him a war medicine that would turn German bullets into water. The war medicine was nothing but maji (Swahili word for “water”) mixed with millet and castor oil. He soon had a huge following as the believers increased. Thus began the Maji Maji Revolution. After drinking the war medicine, thousands of Africans marched toward German garrisons armed only with spears and arrows. The German forces, using their superior weapons, had crushed the revolution by 1907.

independence struggle in Tanganyika began under Julius Kambarage Nyerere (1922–99), a school-teacher and cofounder of Tanganyika African National Union (TANU). He pressed the British to grant independence to Tanganyika, and on December 9, 1961, they relented. Julius Kambarage Nyerere was sworn in as the first prime minister of independent Tanganyika.

Meanwhile Zanzibar too was breaking free from Arab-British dominance. Although the region was granted independence under a constitutional monarchy on December 19, 1963, indigenous Africans suffered immensely at the hands of the ruling Arabs. On January 12, 1964, a revolution led by John Okello resulted in the return of power to indigenous Africans in Zanzibar. Abeid Amani Karume (1905–72), a leader of the Afro-Shirazi party was sworn in as the president of Zanzibar.

The leaders of the independent nations of Tanganyika and Zanzibar, to promote political and economic strength, began negotiating the possibility of uniting the two nations to form a single independent republic. On April 26, 1964, these negotiations produced the United Republic of Tanzania. The country was aptly named Tanzania—“Tan” from Tanganyika and “Zan” from Zanzibar. Zanzibar, however, was given semi-autonomous status with the right to elect its own president.

Julius Kambarage Nyerere was chosen as the first president of the United Republic of Tanzania. Unfortunately unsound policies crippled the nation’s economy. Violent ethnic unrest in Zanzibar and political division worsened the problem. After Nyerere took responsibility for the economic downfall of the country and stepped down as president in 1985, new leaders have similarly failed to stem further economic decline.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The largest country in eastern Africa, Tanzania is located along the Indian Ocean between Kenya and Mozambique. There are three main geographic regions in Tanzania: the islands and the coastal plains in the east, a saucer-shaped central plateau, and northern and southern highlands. The Great Rift Valley runs across the central part of Tanzania, goes farther south, and splits at Lake Nyasa. While one branch of the rift valley passes via Lake Nyasa to Mozambique, the other branch runs northwest along Burundi, Rwanda, Tanzania, and the western parts of Uganda.

The salient features of Tanzania’s geography are Mt. Meru and Mt. Kilimanjaro, located in the northeast part of the country, along the Kenyan border. Mt. Kilimanjaro is the highest mountain in Africa, with a height of 19,028 feet.

Lake Nyasa, Lake Victoria (the world’s second-largest freshwater lake), and Lake Tanganyika (the world’s deepest lake) are the prominent sources of water in the region. They are also the three largest lakes on the African continent.

The climate in Tanzania varies from region to region. While the coastal regions have a hot, humid climate, the highland plateau enjoys moderate weather. The mountains in the northeast enjoy a temperate climate and remain pleasant throughout the year.

Fun Fact

The shortest war in history was fought in Zanzibar in 1896. On August 25 within two hours of the death of Omani Sultan, Hamid bin Thuwaini (1857–96), his second son, seized the throne with German support. The British, who feared that this would lead to German control over the island, asked him to step down or face the consequences. On August 27, after requests from the local people, the royal navy had three warships open fire on the palace at nine o’clock in the morning. Forty-five minutes later they had reduced the palace to rubble. The sultan, who had no effective means of retaliation, surrendered, after being granted asylum in the island’s German consulate.

MT. KILIMANJARO

Kilimanjaro is a Swahili word that means “a mountain that glitters.” The highest mountain on the African continent, Mt. Kilimanjaro was once considered highly mysterious in the Western world due to stories of man-eating spirits that were part of Tanzanian folklore. According to the myths, these spirits lived in a huge freestanding and snow-clad mountain in the equatorial region of Tanzania. Mt. Kilimanjaro has the distinction of being the highest freestanding, snow-covered equatorial mountain in the world. A most remarkable aspect of Mt. Kilimanjaro is that, despite its height, it is easily accessible to climbers because it offers a number of routes (from easy to more adventurous) to choose from. As the climb begins, one passes through equatorial rain forests, waterfalls, moorlands (vegetation that grows on a vast expanse of land that has been burned in the past due to fire or volcanic activities), snow, and ice cliffs. The climb requires neither equipment nor any prior experience in mountain climbing. It typically takes five days to climb the mountain and return to the base. Due to its easy accessibility, Mt. Kilimanjaro is also called “Everyman’s Everest.”

ECONOMY

As one of the poorest countries in the world, Tanzania’s economy is an utter shambles. Agriculture is the driving force of the economy and contributes more than 50 percent to the gross domestic product (GDP) as well as 85 percent of exports. More than 84 percent of the country’s population is dependent on agriculture, fishing, and forestry for their livelihoods.

International financial organizations such as the World Bank and International Monetary Fund are assisting the government of Tanzania in restructuring its economy and introducing pro-growth reforms. The government is also focusing on oil explorations and development of the tourism industry to generate revenue. With international support and economic reform, Tanzanian authorities hope to achieve greater stability and prosperity in the early 21st century.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Tanzania is home to more than 120 tribes—from the tall and sturdy Masai warriors to the Hadza Bushmen and Wameru, or Bantu, farmers—and each tribe has its unique identity. Most tribes in the region trace their origin to the Bantu-speaking tribes; exceptions include tribes such as the Masai, who trace their origin to the Nilotic tribes.

Swahili and English are the official languages of Tanzania, and some claim that Swahili is spoken in its purest form in Zanzibar. For students of Swahili, Zanzibar is the “mecca” of learning. Most of the tribes, however, prefer to communicate in their native dialects.

The role of man as breadwinner and woman as homemaker is traditional in Tanzania. Extended family systems composed of uncles, aunts, brothers, sisters, cousins, and even in-laws are prevalent today. Elders and clan members solve disputes through discussion, and their decisions are binding on all.

Christianity, Islam, and indigenous beliefs are the major religions of Tanzania, with Islam having a stronger hold along the coastal regions. Hindus make up a quarter of the population in the coastal regions while many tribes continue to practice their ethnic beliefs and worship the guardian spirit of their tribe. For example, the Masai worship Engai, their rain god, and Engai’s messiah, Kindong’oi. All priests of Engai are believed to have descended from Kindong’oi.

Tanzanian tribes are very particular about their looks and decorate their bodies, often painting their hands, face, and legs. While the coastal dwellers prefer to paint their lips, hands, feet, and nails with henna, the Makonde people file their teeth and tattoo their faces and bodies. The tattoos depict struggle, conflicts, love, passion, good, and evil. Masai women adorn themselves with jewelry made from beads and metal, while the men wear their weapons, such as large knives, spears, and clubs, along with a piece of cloth that barely covers their bodies.

Tanzanians have a rich culture and are famed storytellers. Each tribe in Tanzania has its own folklore, dancing style, and traditional drums called ngomas. The narration of folktales takes place mainly at night. Stories revolve around humans as well as animals, and some feature both of them in a showdown. Animals and birds are endowed with human characteristics, such as greed, honesty, loneliness, and jealousy. Folktales have an underlying message and often serve as social commentary on tribal history, culture, and values, and as a potent means of discouraging antisocial behavior.

Tanzanian music is greatly influenced by traditional African and Arabic styles. Ngoma, the great drums, are an integral part of every tribal event. Other musical instruments include the Swahili udi (lute), flat xylophone, harmonium, and accordion. Taraab, the art of singing poetry, is extremely popular music in Tanzania.

The Masai are known for their “leaping dance,” which is accompanied by deep guttural sounds. Traditional dances performed in the coastal regions include lelemama, which involves clapping in a particular rhythm, as well as a belly dance known as chakacha. Women mainly perform these dances during weddings.

❁ CUISINE

Nyama choma, also known as mishikaki (barbecued meat), is a delicacy in Tanzania, while Zanzibar's coastal regions boast a wide variety of seafood (lobsters, crabs, octopus) that is seasoned with coconut milk and spices. Other favorite dishes in the region include ugali (a dish made from millet flour or tapioca), cinnamon-flavored rice called pilau (pilaf), fish stew, vegetables, and meat. Among the Masai, the traditional meal is comprised of six food items: milk, animal blood, meat, tree bark, honey, and animal fat. In recent times, however, the Masai have begun to include grains in their diet.

Safari Lager Beer (a locally brewed beer) is the national beverage, although people also enjoy konyagi, a white rum concoction. Tea is a favorite beverage while socializing and visiting friends and family. A sweet fried bread called maandazi is served with tea.

Each tribe in Tanzania has its own dining customs and habits. In some tribes women are forbidden to eat eggs or chicken, while in others a man cannot eat at the same table with his daughter-in-law.

❁ CELEBRATION OF THE ZANZIBAR REVOLUTION

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 12

The Celebration of the Zanzibar Revolution commemorates the violent revolution led by African leader John Okello on January 12, 1964. Before the arrival of the British in the region Arabs ruled Zanzibar. Because they oppressed the indigenous black African population, there were frequent violent showdowns between the two groups. obtained independence in 1963 Sultan Jamshid bin Abdullah, the ruler of Zanzibar, became the head of state, while Arab leader Muhammed Shamte Hamadi was appointed the prime minister. Africans were given minimal political representation in the region.

John Okello, a Ugandan, had settled in the Pembe Islands of Zanzibar. He witnessed and experienced the discrimination against the black Africans and led violent protests against the Arabs. He organized groups of black African men, mainly porters, in Pembe and launched a revolt against the existing ruler. Thus on January 12, 1964, the bloodiest revolution in the history of Zanzibar began. More than 17,000 Africans and Arabs were killed, and many more fled the country. Soon Okello and other revolutionaries established their control in Zanzibar, and a new leftist government was formed. Abeid Amani Karume, a leader of the Afro-Shirazi party, was declared the new president of Zanzibar.

This day is celebrated by the people of Zanzibar as the end of oppressive Arab rule and the restoration of power to Zanzibar's indigenous black population. A Revolution Day rally in the Zanzibar national stadium marks the anniversary of the revolution, and people pay tribute to the thousands who died in the course of liberating their land.

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day (or May Day or Workers' Day) to commemorate the important role played by workers in their societies. The May 1 observance was established by the Socialist Second International in 1889. The date was chosen to coincide with a general strike in 1890 in the United States called by the American Federation of Labor (AFL) to demand an eight-hour workday. The event continues to promote workers' pride, solidarity, and interests. Labor Day celebrations take place all over Tanzania. On this day workers assemble at factories and workplaces before participating in demonstrations and parades. The president of Tanzania also delivers a special Labor Day message and acknowledges the important role played by laborers in Tanzania.

🌸 SABA SABA DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: July 7

Saba Saba, also called Industry Day, is an annual festival that commemorates the establishment of the Tanganyika African National Union (TANU). TANU initiated the freedom struggle in Tanganyika, held large demonstrations, and intensified demands for Tanganyika's complete independence. As a result TANU became the most popular party in Tanganyika and, later, in Tanzania.

TANU was officially launched on July 7, 1954, the seventh day of the seventh month. The anniversary of its establishment got its name from the Swahili term saba, which means "seven." Celebrations are held all over the country, especially in Dar es Salaam, where a large trade fair is attended by traders and businessmen from around the world.

Siafu

Driver ants, also known as siafu among the Masai, move from one place to another in extremely long columns fiercely defended by the larger soldier ants, which kill anything that happens to cross their path. The soldier ants take up positions as sentries along both sides of the moving column, establishing a perimeter within which the smaller ants can run safely. Because there can be more than 22 million ants in a single colony, it can take them days to travel from one nest to the next. The siafu are blind and, like most species of ants, communicate using scent pheromones.

Driver ants are extremely dangerous to all forms of life, including much larger animals and humans, and it is believed that some unsuspecting tourists have been the victims of siafu swarms. Their powerful bites and sheer numbers, as well as their habit of swarming into any opening in the body of their prey, including the mouth and nose, make them a threat to be feared. Siafu will attack humans—usually, but not always, the young, sick, or otherwise incapacitated who cannot move quickly enough to escape the swarm—killing and eventually consuming them, completely stripping the flesh from the bones. The victims of driver ants often die of asphyxiation, which is certainly a more merciful death than being eaten alive from the inside out. Their presence, however, benefits some human communities, such as the Masai, because they are highly efficient at removing pests that endanger crops in farming communities, consuming most pests, including insects and large rats. Because they are so useful, the Masai have learned to live with them, always with extreme caution.

Male driver ants are usually called "sausage flies" because of their swollen, sausage-like abdomen and their wings, and were initially believed to be a different species entirely. They leave the colony soon after they hatch, but will seek out a moving line of siafu, which leaves a scent trail after its members have reached sexual maturity. When a "sausage fly" meets up with a colony of driver ants, they tear off its wings and carry it to the nest where it will be mated with the queen.

national event that acknowledges the contributions made by peasants in the development of Tanzania. The celebrations also remind Tanzanians about the importance of crops, livestock, and cooperatives as means of reducing poverty.

The focus of Nane Nane Day is on ways of helping farmers improve their productivity by empowering them with the latest agricultural techniques. The government of Tanzania regularly conducts research and development activities, such as Tanzania Agricultural Research Programs (TARP II), and recruits researchers to work alongside farmers to provide feedback on their activities. On the basis of this research new technologies are developed and new projects are planned and implemented for the benefit of the farmers. As part of the Farmers' Day celebrations, Nane Nane trade fairs are held in different parts of Tanzania that are attended by national and international agriculture-related companies.

He was the cofounder of the Tanganyika African National Union (TANU) and initiated the independence movement in Tanganyika. His persistence helped Tanganyika attain independence in 1961, and he became its first prime minister.

After the establishment of Tanzania, his party merged with Zanzibar's ruling Afro-Shirazi party and formed Chama cha Mapinduzi (CCM), or People's Revolutionary Movement. Nyerere served as the first president of the United Republic of Tanzania. Although he stepped down as president in 1985, the veneration of Nyerere continued. Eid al-Fitr, also called the Feast of Fast-Breaking, Idi, or Sikuku (both Idi and Sikuku are Swahili words that mean “celebration”), marks the end of Ramadan, the holiest month of the Islamic calendar. During Ramadan observant Muslims are required to endure a month-long fast from dawn to dusk. This observance is the fourth of Islam’s Five Pillars. It is believed that Allah revealed the Koran, the religious book of Muslims, to Muhammad during Ramadan. The Ramadan fast ends with the sighting of the new crescent Moon, which marks the beginning of four days of festivities in Tanzania. The Koran forbids fasting during this observance.

On Eid al-Fitr Tanzanian Muslims offer prayers at dawn in their local mosques and then greet each other. Alms, called Zakat al-Fitr, are given to the poor. Tanzanians wear new clothes and visit friends and relatives on this occasion to exchange gifts and greetings. In Zanzibar Eid al-Fitr celebrations include a mock fight between men from the northern and southern parts of the island using branches of banana trees as weapons. Traditional Swahili taraab (art of singing poetry), music, and dance performances are also part of the Eid al-Fitr celebrations.

Eid al-Adha, the Festival of Sacrifice (also known as Eid al-Kebir and Tabaski), commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim (Abraham), demonstrated by his willingness to sacrifice his son to obey God’s command. According to the scriptures, God visited Ibrahim in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his most valued possession, his son. When Ibrahim told his son about the dream, the son asked him to follow God’s command. As Ibrahim was about to make the sacrifice he was surprised to find that, instead of his son, a ram lay on the altar.

Eid al-Adha is one of the major holy days for Muslims in Tanzania. The day is marked with sacrifices of goats and sheep, and the meat is distributed in three equal parts. One part remains with the family, while the other two are given to neighbors and the poor. A festive spirit rules the whole of Tanzania as people visit friends and family after offering prayers in their local mosques. Gifts and greetings are also exchanged. Sauti za Busara is an annual cultural festival centered on traditional Swahili music. It is held on the second weekend of February and lasts for four days. Sauti za Busara is Kiswahili for “songs of wisdom.” The festival is held at Stone Town in Zanzibar. Performers from all over Eastern Africa participate in this festival, representing their cultural heritage through dance and music performances. This festival also brings together the best performers of traditional Swahili music from all over the world. It ranges from taraab (the art of singing poetry) and ngoma (drum) music to more contemporary musical forms, fusing Arab, Asian, and African musical traditions. More than 12,000 people from all over the world join local people in the event, which has helped Tanzania portray itself internationally as a cultural center and an ideal tourist destination.

❁ MWAKA KOGWA

Observed in: Zanzibar

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July

The Mwaka Kogwa is a four-day-long New Year’s festival (based on the Persian solar calendar), which is celebrated in Zanzibar in the month of July. The best celebrations take place in the Makunduchi village located in the southern part of Zanzibar. Mwaka Kogwa has its roots in the Zoroastrian (Persian) religion. It marks the beginning of a new year, also known as Navruz or Nairuzi. The Zoroastrian calendar is one of three calendars followed in Zanzibar. (The others are the Western [Gregorian] solar calendar and the Muslim lunar calendar.) People believe that during this festival God and spirits help them purify the past year and welcome the new one. This festival also reflects on a history of warm relations shared by Zanzibar and the Eastern world (Iran in particular).

The festivities vary from village to village. In some communities burning huts and mock fights are major highlights. During these mock fights, men fight each other with banana tree branches, a symbolic means of letting out grievances to give the new year a fresh start. While the men fight the women stroll alongside and sing songs about love and life; after the fight they taunt the men. Everyone is dressed in his or her best attire to celebrate the occasion.

❁ BIRTH

In traditional African culture, a marriage is considered complete only after a child has been produced. Pregnant women are revered, and being pregnant helps them gain acceptance from their husbands’ families. The emphasis has been embedded in African cultural beliefs since time immemorial.

A number of rituals and ceremonies are associated with childbirth in Tanzania. When a child is born, tribal women usually gather to sing songs dedicated to Mother Africa and glorify her as a compassionate mother or a beautiful maiden. If the new child is a girl, many tribes begin building another house on the same property or add another story to the existing house in order to accommodate the future husband and family of their daughter. Also the birth of a girl is announced by placing a circle of reeds outside the family hut. In this way, communities identify girl children at birth by the role they will be expected to perform as adults. (Traditionally, rings of reeds are worn in place on their heads to balance the heavy loads of food, water, and cooking materials that they must carry to their homes.) The birth of a boy is announced by placing a hunter’s animal-skin pelt outside the family hut. Traditionally, men have been the hunters and food gatherers, and a pelt symbolizes a great hunter.

The Swahili culture has its own beliefs and rituals related to birth. For instance, after a child is born, it should be confined to the hut for at least eight days in order to keep evil spirits away from it. On the eighth day the child is shown the four corners of the house and the Sun, symbolizing his or her position in the social space and the environs where he or she will grow up.

The naming ceremony is another important ritual. After a child is born, the father consults with the wise man of the village regarding a suitable name. Wise men are thought to be able to consult with

The importance of motherhood in Tanzania is reflected in the practice of calling adult women by the name of their child. For example, if a boy has been named Juma, or a girl is named Alice, their mother would be addressed as Mama Juma or Mama Alice.

the ancestral spirits and thereby determine which spirit is willing to lend its name to the child. On the appointed day the grandfather of the child and the village wise man preside over the naming ceremony and bestow a name on the child.

During the naming ceremony, a goat is sacrificed to the ancestral spirits to thank them for their help. In some tribes an akika (a ceremony performed to remove impurity) takes place. It involves cutting the infant's hair, which symbolizes impurity, and burying the hair underground. A lavish meal follows, attended by friends, relatives, and villagers.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male and female circumcision is integral to Tanzanian initiation ceremonies. Initiation ceremonies not only mark a child's transition to adulthood but also initiation into the rituals of the tribe and its way of life.

For male initiation ceremonies, the boy's mother prepares him for the ceremony by shaving the top of his head. All initiates must take an oath of secrecy during the circumcision ritual, which binds them for the rest of their lives. At the time of circumcision, the initiate is pinned to the ground with the help of his fellow initiates who hold his legs apart. Then, a skilled elder surgically removes the foreskin without the use of anesthesia. Initiates are required to endure the pain of the procedure. Any sign of flinching or crying is considered a sign of weakness and brings disgrace to the child's entire family.

The ages of the initiates range between 12 and 18 years. Initiation ceremonies take place during the long school breaks in either August or November and December. Besides enduring the circumcision ceremony, groups of young girls and boys have to spend a mandatory period of seclusion when they are taught about their tribe's glorious past, rituals, way of life, and duties and responsibilities toward their family and their tribe.

❁ MARRIAGE

Among the ancient peoples of modern Tanzania, arranged marriages were the custom. Parents and relatives would consult matchmakers and friends and relatives to find a suitable match for their children. Now, most Tanzanians living in urban areas prefer to choose their own partners. As a result, marriages for love and inter-tribe marriages have become quite commonplace in large cities.

Nevertheless, bride price persists as an accepted custom. Prospective grooms are expected to provide cows, hoes, machetes, sheep or goats, and other material gifts to the bride's family as part of her bride price. Tanzanians believe that bride price is a gesture of thanks given by the groom to the bride's family for the wonderful upbringing of their daughter as well as to compensate them for the loss of a productive member of the family.

A marriage is considered fixed after payment of the bride price. Tanzanian weddings are lavish affairs, and dancing is an important part of the celebrations. Wearing heavily frilled dresses, women perform dances such as unyago, bomu, beni, and lele-mama in separate ceremonies attended only by women. Men, on the other hand, dress in suits. A hallucinogenic nutmeg preparation is also offered to the wedding guests.

❁ DEATH

In Tanzania, people believe that all rites of passages lead to the last rite, which is death. They believe that, after people die, they return to Mother Africa, their true homeland. Although death may be the end of one life it is also the beginning of the afterlife. For this reason, death is not a time for mourning but a celebration of a life that has gone on to the next level. This spiritual belief that life takes the form of a soul, and thus continues its existence in another realm, helps Tanzanians to accept death as a fact of life.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The central area of Indochina from the Mekong River Valley to the Khorat Plateau, a highland area in northeast Thailand, has been inhabited for at least 10,000 years, and linguists have traced the ancient Chinese language to an earlier Thai language. Archaeologists have also provided insight regarding the early development of humans in the region. In the Ban Chiang area of northeast Thailand, they have found evidence that rice was probably cultivated as early as 4000 B.C.E., when China's agriculture was still devoted largely to millet (even though rice was first cultivated in the Yangtze valley about 6500 B.C.E.), and bronze metalworking began sometime between 1700 and 1500. Beautiful bronze instruments from sites near Ban Chiang show sophisticated technological and artistic abilities.

This prehistoric cultural development formed around a nucleus of migrating people. A linguistic map of south China, northwest India and Southeast Asia, as far as the islands of Indonesia, clearly shows the presence of these early Thai migrants. They settled in river valleys from the Red River (Hong River) in south China and Vietnam to the Brahmaputra River in Assam. In the second half of the 13th century C.E. however, increasing pressure from the Mongol hordes under Kublai Khan (1215–94) forced the Thais still dwelling in south China to retrace their path and return to their geographical roots.

The Sukhothai are considered the first identifiable Thais, appearing first in the northern part of Thailand, around Chiang Saen and in some valleys south of the area. Early on they formed principalities, and some of these developed into independent kingdoms. In 1238 the Sukhothai Kingdom declared itself an independent state, no longer a part of the Khmer Empire, and this is regarded as the first Thai kingdom. Other lesser known Thai kingdoms (Lanna, Phayao, Chiang Saen) were also established around this time. Many modern-day Thais look back on the Sukhothai era as Thailand's "golden" age when just kings governed contented citizens living in an ideal state, a land of plenty that developed a unique style of its own.

The first Thai writing system—which became the basis of modern Thai—was created during this era, and the Thai form of Theravada Buddhism became the state religion. Hundreds of stone inscriptions remain from the Sukhothai kingdom, and some of the most important are those of King Ramkamhaeng (c. 1239–1317), called Rama the Brave. Under his rule the Sukhothai Kingdom flourished and spread to Nakhon Si Thammarat in the south, to the upper Mekong River Valley in Laos, and to Bago in Burma.

The southern kingdom of Ayutthaya expanded rapidly by teaching the importance of religion over military might and extended control over the Chao Phya River Valley. With the rise of Ayutthaya the Sukhothai influence declined, and in 1378 the seat of power moved to Phitsanulok. Sukhothai’s population followed, and by 1438 Sukhothai was a deserted city.

Apart from Sukhothai, Chiang Mai and Ayutthaya also became important centers of the region. Ayutthaya began as an ancient settlement named after Rama’s legendary kingdom in India. In 1347 Phya U-Thong (1314–69), then the ruler of the principality of U-Thong (now called Suphan Buri), realized that he would have to move his people because of a cholera epidemic. After three years of preparation, he established his new residence in Ayutthaya and renamed himself King Ramathidibodi I in 1350.

(The Ayutthaya kings, unlike the kings of Sukhothai, were absolute monarchs who called themselves devaraja, the god kings.) Ramathabodi reign united the Khmer rulers of Lopburi, the Tai in the west, and the Chinese and Malaysian merchants dwelling along the coastal areas. The Ayutthaya kings who followed became very powerful and gradually moved east, first taking the Khmer city of Lopburi and then in 1431 seizing Angkor, the Khmer Empire’s capital city and the site of the famous temple Angkor Wat. Eventually the Thais caused Angkor’s collapse, but not before they had adopted the language, culture, and customs of the Khmer.

In both the 16th and 18th centuries, Burmese forces attacked Thailand, capturing Chiang Mai and destroying Ayutthaya. The Thais, however, responded by driving out the Burmese and moving their capital to another town, Thonburi. In the late 18th century (1782) the Chakri Dynasty was founded by King Rama I after his predecessor Taksin (1734–82) was declared mad and removed from the throne by a coup. Rama I moved the Thai capital to Bangkok and established the Chakri Dynasty, which still rules Thailand.

Throughout the 19th century, the Thais resisted European incursions and managed to retain their independence. In 1932 Thailand was declared a constitutional monarchy.

During World War II Japan fought against the United States, and Thailand sided with Japan. By 1945 Japan had been bombed, and Thailand switched its alliance.

In the decades after World War II there was

Taksin the Great

Taksin the Great ruled Thailand from 1767 to 1782. Born in Ayutthaya to a Chinese father and his Thai wife, Sin (the name his father gave him) began his education in a Buddhist monastery. While he and his friend Tong-Duang were priests a Chinese fortune-teller told them they had lucky lines in the palms of their hands and would become kings. Although neither took this prediction seriously, Tong-Duang would become King Taksin’s successor Rama I.

In 1767 when Taksin became governor of the Kamphaeng Phet province and returned to Ayutthaya, the Burmese attacked the city. Before the city was sacked, however, he got away with a small army. Following the sack of Ayutthaya, Taksin, with his old friend Tong-Duang, now Gen. Chakri, drove the Burmese out and reunited the country. On December 28, 1767, Taksin became the new king of Siam, in a new capital Thonburi.

King Taksin spent most of his reign fighting to protect Siam’s independence, but, according to legend, at some point he began to become a religious fanatic. Believing himself to be the reincarnation of Buddha, it is said that he had monks flogged if they refused to worship him. It is also possible that this story was concocted in order to justify the coup that ended his rule. At any rate, Taksin was apparently declared insane. Although he planned to return to monastic life, he was executed shortly after the coup on April 7, 1782. His attackers sealed him in a velvet sack—because tradition required that royal blood should never touch the ground—and beat him to death with a scented sandalwood club. The execution was deemed necessary lest the dethroned king become the center of a possible revolution against his successor.

Although Taksin’s friend, General Chakri was away fighting in Cambodia, he quickly returned when he learned of the coup. The rebels soon surrendered after he returned to Thonburi, and Chakri was crowned King Rama I. Some discredit this story, maintaining that it is merely a way for the winners to defend the coup and the events that followed it.

In 1981 the Thai cabinet passed a resolution to give Taksin the honorary epithet “the Great.”

tension in the neighboring countries of Vietnam and Cambodia, and the United States stationed its forces in Thailand during this time. Eventually, at Thai insistence, the United States withdrew its forces in 1976. In the late 1970s Thailand provided aid and housed the refugees from Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos who had been forced to leave their homelands because of the ongoing warfare in their countries.

In 1980 the National Assembly elected Prem Tinsulanonda (b. 1920) as their leader, and for at least a decade after that, there was peace and stability in the country. He was reelected in 1983 and then again in 1986. Since democratic rule was reestablished in Thailand in 1992, it has been an active member of the Association of Southeast Asia Nations (ASEAN).

Thailand has had one of the strongest economies in Southeast Asia. However, a fluctuating real estate market and growing corruption in government in the 1990s led to a decline in the currency in 1997. This was followed by a crisis in Asian financial markets. As a result, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) decided to provide Thailand with substantial monetary aid, and by 2000 the economy was experiencing a revival.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Divided into 76 provinces, Thailand shares its borders with Myanmar (formerly Burma), Malaysia, Cambodia, and Laos. The Gulf of Thailand touches its eastern coast while the Andaman Sea surrounds the west. The country has four geographic zones: the fertile central plains, the northeast plateau (Khorat Plateau), the rain forests of the southern peninsula, and the mountains and valleys of northern Thailand. The highest peak is Doi Inthanon, at 8,845 feet.

The climate of Thailand is tropical—hot and humid. In the southwest, the rains make the weather warm and humid. They last from mid-May to September, while a cooler breeze touches the northeastern part from November until February. This reduces the humidity and makes visiting Thailand more pleasant during this season. The climate in the southern isthmus (a narrow stretch of land joining larger mainlands) is always hot and humid. The average temperature is around 93°F in the central region, where rainfall can be as much as 12 inches during September.

The rain forests that cover one-fifth of the area of Thailand are rich in bamboo, hardwood, and fruit trees. There are mangrove swamps in the south and pine trees in the northern region. The Ko Phi Phi (southern Thailand, close to Phuket) is made up of two islands, Phi Phi Don and Phi Phi Le, which have been spared excessive tourist travel and traffic. Cliffs enclose the islands on all sides. Fish in vibrant colors are plentiful. The major Thai industries are tourism, computers, garments, integrated circuits, jewelry, and gems. It has to import raw materials, consumer goods, and fuels. Most of the Thai trade is carried on with the ASEAN countries, the United States, and the European Union (EU).

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The cultural traditions of Thailand revolve around Buddhism and the monarchy. Monks wearing yellow, orange, or brown robes are commonly seen in the country. There are numerous statues of Buddha in stone, marble, and even gold to be found throughout the country.

The Theravada School of Buddhism, which teaches that Nibanna (Nirvana) can be attained without the help of from monks or saints, is practiced in Thailand.

The Thais are graceful people who place a lot of importance on etiquette, and they expect the same from their guests. A distinctive Thai custom is the wai, a greeting or acknowledgment of people with one's head bowed and hands folded. It is impolite in Thailand to step on a coin with the image of the king. It is also considered rude to let one's feet face any person while sitting as feet are supposed to be the lowest, dirtiest parts of the human body. This is also the reason that people do not sit with their feet at the level of somebody's head, especially when the latter is of a higher social standing. In fact touching anyone on the head is considered to be an insult. Footwear must be taken off before entering a Thai home or temple.

Thai art, primarily its architecture and sculpture, has been divided into 10 historical periods, with some overlap: Mon (6th–13th centuries), Khmer (7th–13th centuries), Lan Na (13th and 14th centuries), Sukhothai (13th–15th centuries), Lopburi (10th–13th centuries), Suphanburi-Sanghlaburi (13th–15th centuries), Ayutthaya A (1350–1488), Ayutthaya B (1488–1630), Ayutthaya C (1630–1767), and Ratanakosin (19th century on). The visual art is predominantly inspired by images of Buddha. Thai literature shows heavy Indian influence and the most well-known work is inspired by the story of the Hindu King Rama, the seventh avatar of Vishnu and the hero of the epic Ramayana. Thai music is similar to Indian, Chinese, and Japanese music with some Indonesian influences as well. An orchestra is made up of string, woodwind, and percussion instruments.

Popular Thai dance forms are the khon, likhon, and likay. Khon is a more elaborate dance form than the others; likay is the most popular. Nang drama is the popular shadow dance of southern Thailand. Most of the Thai classical dances are connected with dramatizing the epic journey of the Hindu Lord Rama in search of his beloved wife Sita who had been abducted by the evil king Ravana. These performances include masks and elaborate costumes. The poetry of Sonthorn Phu, the great poet of King Rama II (r. 1809–24), is also famous, and a whole statuary theme park is devoted to him in Amphur Klaeng, Jungwat Rayong.

Thai families are close-knit, with the eldest male as the family's patriarch (head). They tend to live in the same house for generations. The youngest daughter inherits the parents' house and she, along with her husband, looks after them.

❁ CUISINE

Thai food is considered very spicy, even pungent at times, due to the liberal use of garlic and chilies in most recipes. Lime juice, coriander, lemon grass (locally called takrai), ginger, peanuts, cumin, basil, tamarind juice, and coconut milk are also popular ingredients. Thai food can be sweet, salty, spicy, or sour, though it tends to be more of the latter.

Fish sauce or shrimp sauce are staple ingredients in the Thai diet. Thais eat rice with almost every meal. The main Thai dishes are noodles, hot and sour fish dishes, green and red curries made with chicken, meat, pork, or vegetables, and soups of different flavors. Thai appetizers and snacks include chopped ginger, fried peanuts, chicken, peppers, and lime slices. There are plenty of fresh and canned fruits. Sugarcane juice and rice whisky are two local favorites. While eating, Thais hold a fork in the left hand and push food onto a spoon held in the right. Knives are not required at the table because most foods are prepared in small bite-size pieces. In northern Thailand people eat rice (steamed and sticky) with their hands.

Chopsticks are used to eat any noodle dish. People usually sit around a table and everyone takes portions of all the dishes they wish to eat. Water is drunk only at the end of a meal.

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, celebrated as New Year's Day around the world. The celebrations and revelry usually begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve).

Even though January 1 marks their official New Year's Day, traditionally Thais celebrate New Year's Day in mid-April (Songkran). In fact the Thai New Year's celebration in April is far more popular than that on January 1, but on New Year's Eve and New Year's Day, people travel to meet family and friends because this is a public holiday and many have the day off. They also exchange gifts and greeting cards to mark the occasion.

Thai Black Sticky Rice

Thai black, or purple, sticky rice is a special type of sweet rice, and the method of preparing it described here is not recommended for other varieties of rice. This kind of rice is a beautiful deep purple color after it is cooked, and adds its unique color and unusual taste to many meals. Thai black sticky rice is most often served as a dessert. It can be topped with sweet coconut milk, mango or coconut ice cream, or rambutan in light syrup. (Rambutan is a delicious sweet fruit with a hairy rind and a fragrant, succulent white flesh.)

Rinse the needed amount of rice two or three times, until the water runs clear. Place the rinsed rice in a bowl and fill it with cool water until the water is about two or three inches above the rice. Let the rice stand in the water for six to eight hours. Drain the rice, wrap the rice in a piece of cheesecloth and put the bundle inside a Thai bamboo steaming basket. Put between six and eight cups of water in a sticky rice steamer and bring to a boil. Then place the bamboo steaming basket inside the sticky rice steamer, making sure that the bottom of the basket does not touch the boiling water. Place a standard eight-inch lid loosely over the wrapped rice. Steam the rice for 45 minutes (or until tender). (Black sticky rice, a special type of cheesecloth used to make sticky rice, and the bamboo steaming basket and sticky rice steamer can be purchased from your local Thai market or online markets.)

The following Monday is declared a public holiday if this day falls on a weekend.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. While the earliest origins of May Day celebrations are ascribed to the pagan rituals that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, it is generally agreed that the current format was initiated in 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world. They scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890, in order to coordinate this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In Thailand this holiday is a low-key affair celebrated only by some factory and office workers.

On this day Thais express their love and loyalty for their king by holding special celebrations throughout the country in honor of his coronation. Folk dances and recitals of poems and songs written in honor of the king are part of the celebrations. On this day the army and navy give the king a 21-gun salute and he gives special awards to Thai nationals who have made significant contributions toward the development of the country.

❁ QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 12

This day commemorates the birth of Her Majesty Queen Sikrit, wife of the king of Thailand Rama IX, who was born on August 12, 1932. On this day people put up huge portraits of the queen, along with royal symbols and the national flag, in buildings, temples, and schools, as well as homes and shops to honor her. Buddhist sermons are part of the civil ceremonies organized to celebrate the birthday of the queen.

Since Thais regard the queen as their mother, August 12 is also celebrated as Mother's Day.

Because Thais associate the jasmine flower with the selfless sacrifice made by mothers for their children, one custom is for mothers to receive jasmine bouquets from their children. Another is for children to touch their mothers' feet to express their love and respect. In some parts of Thailand, either on the day before Mother's Day or on Mother's Day, schools organize functions in honor of mothers. Many Thai nationals visit temples and offer prayers and thank God for their mothers. In addition, they offer the monks food on this special day.

Chulalongkorn Day marks the day on which the former king of Thailand Chulalongkorn the Great, also known as Rama V, died in 1910. He was the fifth king of the ruling Chakri Dynasty and is considered to be one of the most benevolent kings of Thailand. On this day people lay wreaths on the statue of King Rama V at Bangkok's Royal Plaza, and many Thais offer prayers in honor of the late king in local Buddhist temples. Food is also offered to the monks in memory of the king.

Chinese New Year, also known as the Spring Festival, is celebrated by Thai people of Chinese descent for three days. This is the most important event on the Chinese calendar. At the start of the holiday there are dragon processions around towns. People pray for good luck on this day and the time and method of this special prayer is determined by the Lear Yik Tao, or the Chinese book on culture and traditions. After this prayer, some Thai families also offer another prayer for their ancestors. They are nice to each other especially on this day for the fear of inviting bad luck!

There are also lion dance performances, which are believed to ward off evil forces. Firecrackers are lit every day, and children holding red envelopes with gifts of money can be seen running around everywhere.

Magha Puja Day, called Makha Bucha Day in Thailand, is also known as the Fourfold Assembly, Macarpoocha, Dhamma Day, or Sangha Day. This day focuses on the right ways of teaching Buddha's sermons (the way he taught them) and remembering his life. It is observed on the full Moon day of the third lunar month (February–March), and commemorates an important event that happened early in the Buddha's life. Around 3,000 years ago, soon after the first Rains Retreat (Vassa), the Buddha went to Rajagaha city where 1,250 Arahats ("enlightened saints"), disciples of the Buddha, had returned from their wanderings to pay him their respects. This celebration is also called the Fourfold Assembly because this gathering had four significant aspects: (1) all 1,250 of those assembled were Arahats; (2) they had all been ordained by the Buddha himself; (3) they had come together without prior arrangement; (4) they assembled on the full Moon day of the month of Magha.

❁ SONGKRAN DAYS

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: April 13–15

In the Thai language, songkran means "move" or "change place"; the 12 days celebrated as songkrans in the Thai year are days when the Sun changes its place in the zodiac. The songkran celebrated for three days in April, usually April 13–15, is the most significant one in the Thai solar calendar because it is the traditional Thai New Year. It begins on April 13 every year and lasts for 3 days. The Songkran festival, also often called the Water Festival, observed on April 13 is Maha Songkran Day, the day to mark the end of the old year; April 14, the second day, is Wan Nao, the day after the old year has ended; and April 15 is Wan Thaloeng Sok, the day on which the new year begins.

This is one of the most active times for the Thai people. People clean their houses and wash the statues of Buddha with rosewater. Activities such as building sand pagodas (also called stupas; dome-shaped structures that are parts of Buddhist temples), pouring water on the hands of the elderly in order to get their blessing, and throwing water (in a playful manner) over anything and anyone that moves are part of this festival. People also indulge in activities like freeing fish and birds and giving alms to the poor. This is their way of earning merit on the occasion of the new year. Monks talk about dhamma (dharma or religion) and the teachings of Buddha. Temples attract crowds and donations this day. Thais enjoy dousing people with very cold water on this day. Since water is valued for its ability to cleanse and purify, this is a sign of respect. Strangers or tourists are popular targets for water throwing.

The most popular Songkran celebration is held in the northern province of Chiang Mai. People from all parts of the country flock there to enjoy the water festival, to watch the Miss Songkran Contest, and to see the beautiful parades.

Vesak, also called Visakha Puja Day and Buddha Day, is the holiest day for the Buddhists. It marks the Buddha's birthday, his day of achieving enlightenment, and also the day of his death. The occasion is marked by music and chanting of shlokas (his teachings) by devotees during the day. Thousands of people through the temples to participate in the religious ceremonies. In the evening, the faithful carry Buddha's statues in a candlelight procession. The focus of all activities on this day is the greatness and teachings of Lord Buddha.

ASALHA BUCHA DAY

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: July

Asalha Bucha Day commemorates the Lord Buddha's first sermon after his enlightenment. Before they heard him speak, it is believed that his listeners doubted Buddha's credibility; after hearing him, however, one of them named Kondanna asked the Buddha to receive him as a disciple. This first discourse is very important to Buddhists. Not only was it the first structured teaching given by the Buddha after his enlightenment, but most agree that it contains the essence of all his later teachings. Buddhism as an organized practice began with this first discourse. A thorough study of it is considered essential to understanding the Buddhist philosophy, since it puts many of the Buddha's later teachings into perspective. Asalha also marks the beginning of the Asian monsoon season.

Candlelight processions are held in the evening around wats ("temples") throughout the country to commemorate this day.

BUDDHIST LENT DAY

Observed by: Buddhists

Observed on: First day of the waning moon in the eighth month of the Buddhist calendar

Traditionally Buddhist Lent Day, also known as Khao Phansa, or the Rains Retreat, marks the start of the period when monks retreat into their huts (which will be their permanent dwellings for some months) because they fear stepping on and damaging the newly grown crops in this season. It is the first day of the fading Moon in the eighth lunar month.

In the early days of Buddhism, monks and nuns wandered the countryside quite freely. As the order grew and became more established, monasteries were built, and the Buddha said that monastics should take up a scheduled residence for the three months of the rainy season.

The monks vow to stay in one place at this time in order to be protected from sun, storm, and rain. The practice of doing this originated with the Buddhist sages and monks in ancient India, but the tradition was carried into Thailand as well.

In fact this time is of great significance to the general population of Buddhists, because they make a special effort to acquaint themselves with, and practice, the precepts taught by the Buddha during this period. As a result many choose to become monks.

There are also demonstrations of kite flying as an important means to foster team spirit; U.S. stunt kites; kite-making competitions; and spectators can learn the art of making Chula speed kites. When the competition is over, special prizes are awarded to the most innovatively designed kites. The winner of the kite-flying competition also receives awards.

Thousands of people from around the globe travel to Thailand to witness this spectacular event. Besides Thailand more than 20 countries participate and treat audiences to a wide variety of kites in innovative designs as well as demonstrate their kite-flying skills.

that even the spirits and ghosts joined the welcome parade organized in the prince's honor. Since then people have reenacted the welcome procession annually, and many dress up as monsters or wear ghost masks, singing and dancing along the way.

On the second day of the festival, the villagers dance their way to the local temple and mark the end of the procession with bamboo rockets. Special brass plaques are awarded to those judged to wear the best costume and mask. A dancing contest is also organized and the best performance receives other special awards.

On the last day of the festivities, people put away their masks and costumes and listen to monks recite the 13 sermons of Buddha in the local Buddhist temple.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

After a child is born, its parents visit a temple and donate food and flowers to priests to get their blessings for the good karma (luck) of the child. This is believed to help the child during its lifetime.

Thai parents fear the evil spirits of dead childless or unmarried women and feel they must trick these spirits by performing certain rituals. For example, until about the age of one month, children are referred to as though they were animals. The monks give children two-syllable names whereas the parents use one-syllable names. Another way to trick the spirits is by not exchanging any gifts or celebrations before the baby is born. This distracts the spirits and keeps their attention off babies before they are born.

❁ MARRIAGE

August is regarded as the most auspicious month for getting married in Thailand. Arranged marriages are becoming rarer and couples can now decide when they want to marry. A monk then suggests the auspicious date for their wedding. On the wedding day, the khan mark ceremony takes place. In this ceremony, the groom and his close relatives dance to the house of the bride carrying the gifts they wish to present to them. The engagement and the wedding ceremony take place on the same day, primarily to reduce expenses. The usual exchange of rings engages the couple, and that is quickly followed by the sin sod ceremony. In this ceremony the groom gives a sum of money (as demanded) to the family of the bride. On the wedding day both families feed the monks, who chant prayers and bless the couple with holy water in the wat ("temple"). Then they teach the couple the five precepts of Buddha. The couple agrees with these sermons, while the monks continue to pray and chant. To gain merit, the couple then offers gifts to the monks, receives their blessings, and serves lunch to all present. After the meal the bride and the groom are led to a room decorated with roses by an elder of the family.

❁ DEATH

Buddhists cremate their dead and keep their ashes in an urn in the chedis (or stupa)—a dome-shaped monument used to house Buddhist relics or to commemorate significant events of Buddhism. Crying when a person dies is discouraged in Thailand, since that is believed to torture the soul of the deceased, even after cremation. Monks are asked to chant and pray for the deceased, and alms and offerings are made to them in temples to earn merit for the person who has expired. This merit is supposed to give the deceased person a better rebirth.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Historically the land now known as Togo has been alternately ruled by most of the major powers in Europe. Little is known about this region of Africa before the 12th century. During the 12th to 14th centuries, the areas presently known as Togo and Ghana were occupied by the Kwa and Voltaic peoples (two of the six language groups in the region), followed by the Ewe clans from Nigeria and the Ane from Ghana and Côte d'Ivoire.

The Portuguese were the first Europeans to arrive, sometime between the 15th and 16th centuries. The Danes occupied it in the 1700s, and then in 1884 it became a German protectorate. During this period the slave trade flourished in the region, having been started by the Portuguese. In 1914 British and French forces seized Togoland, and in 1921 a mandate of the League of Nations gave Britain the right to administer the western part (British Togoland), while France took responsibility for the eastern area (French Togoland). After World War II the mandate became part of a United Nations (UN) trusteeship, to be administered by the United Kingdom and France, respectively.

In 1957 British Togoland voted to become part of Gold Coast and later integrated with the independent state of Ghana. French Togoland became an autonomous republic within the French Union in 1955 but also retained its UN trusteeship. Elections were held, and on September 10, 1956, Nicolas Grunitzky (1913–69) was sworn in as the first prime minister of the Republic of Togo. Later there were rumors of irregularities in the plebiscite that was held in 1956 to approve the constitution of the country. Thus in 1958, fresh elections were held in Togo, and Sylvanus Olympio (1902–63) was declared victorious. However, there was a growing demand for total independence. Thus on April 27, 1960, under the leadership of Olympio, Togo adopted a provisional constitution, shed its UN trusteeship, and severed ties with France. There was no

The Ewe of Togo

The Ewe people, one of the three largest groups in Togo, moved into the area now occupied by Togo from the east, probably from Oyo in what is now called western Nigeria. When British Togoland voted to become part of newly independent Ghana, hopes for a unified Ewe people were dashed. The Ewe language now spoken in Ghana and Togo by these divided people is a Kwa language. In all it is spoken by around three million people. Ewe is one of several languages often referred to collectively as Gbe and, like other Gbe languages, is a tonal language. The Fon and Aja peoples of Togo also speak Gbe languages.

The Ewe are essentially a patrilineal people, meaning that descent and inheritance is traced through the father's side of the family, not the mother's. Whoever founds a new community becomes its chief and, under ordinary circumstances, will be succeeded by his male progeny.

Ewe religion is organized around a creator deity Mawu, the supreme deity of the Ewe and Fon peoples. With help from Lisa, her husband and the god of the Sun, the sky, and power, she created the universe. Lisa is the twin brother of Mawu and the son of Nana Buluku. Sometimes the two deities are thought of as the androgynous creator deity—Mawu-Lisa—who established order in the universe.

Mawu and Lisa's children include Da, Gua, Gbadu. Da, the great serpent god of the Ewe pantheon, helps Mawu-Lisa to order the universe: Above Earth Da has 3,500 coils and, below the Earth, the same number. Mawu-Lisa's creation is supported by these 7,000 coils. Gu is the spirit power of metal workers and, like other patrons of smiths, is also the god of war. It is Gu's responsibility to make Earth habitable for humans, which is apparently an unfinished, ongoing task. Mawu-Lisa's third child is Gbadu, their daughter. Gbadu is the goddess of fate.

The Ewe are also world renowned for their wood carving, including statuary (characterized by the famous statuettes of the twins—the Ibeji—the orisha of children), sculptures, hunting trophies, and masks. The wood-carvers of Kloto are well-known for their "chains of marriage": two characters connected by rings cut from a single piece of wood.

opposition from France, and Togo finally attained independent status in the true sense of the word.

The first president of independent Togo was Sylvanus Olympio. After a three-year tenure he was assassinated in a military coup on January 13, 1963, and Togo became the first country in Africa in which a successful military coup followed independence. It was only the beginning of what would become an unfortunate trend across the African continent, where there are at least two successful coups a year, plus many more unsuccessful attempts.

Olympio's brother-in-law Nicolas Grunitzky, an important political figure of the 1950s who had gone into exile (1958) in Dahomey (now Benin), returned to Togo and became president. Grunitzky unsuccessfully attempted to unify the country by including several political parties in his government. On January 13, 1967, however, he was toppled in a bloodless military coup led by the head of the armed forces Lt. Col. Gnassingbe Eyadema (1937–2005). Eyadema took office in April of that year. One of Eyadema's first actions as president was to put a halt to all democratic processes, starting with the dissolution of all political parties. Not surprisingly, even though political parties regained legal status in 1991, and a democratic constitution was adopted in 1992, the fruits of an effective democracy still eluded the Togolese. Cheating at elections became the norm, and suppressing opposition, a common practice.

With the death of President Gnassingbe Eyadema, Africa's longest serving head of state—38 years—on February 5, 2005, military rule was on its last legs. The military appointed Eyadema's son Faure as president, and this move was internationally perceived as a coup. Allegations of human rights violations were made by several organizations, including the joint UN–Organization of African Unity (OAU) panel. Forced by international public opinion, Faure finally agreed not only to hold presidential elections, but also to step down. In the first decade of the 21st century, Togo has become a republic in transition to multiparty democratic rule.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The region can be broadly divided into six geographic regions. Inland from the narrow coastal area are tidal flats and shallow lagoons with a number of lakes. The largest is Lake Togo. The Ouatchi Plateau, because of its reddish leached soil (rich in iron), is also known as Terre de Barre. Northeast of the Ouatchi Plateau is another plateau 1640 feet above sea level. The rivers Mono and Ogou drain into this region. A chain of hills, known as the Atkora Mountains, runs through the center of Togo. (These hills extend southwest into Ghana and northeast into Benin.) Mount Agou is Togo's highest elevation with a height of 3,235 feet. The Oti River runs through the northern and western part of the Atkora Mountains, draining into the Volta River, which flows through Ghana. The beautiful savannah country lies to the north of the Oti River Valley; on the southern end there is a plateau that slowly tapers into a coastal plain. Coconut trees are visible all along Togo's coastline, with lagoons and lakes dotting the area. In the northwest is a higher region, characterized by rocks such as gneiss and granite, which features the cliffs of the Dapaong.

Togo has a hot, humid climate. However, it receives less rainfall than the other countries situated along the Gulf of Guinea. The southern part of Togo has two rainy seasons, as opposed to the north, which has one. The two rainy periods in the south are March to early July, and late September to early November. In the northern belt, the rainy season lasts from April until October. However, the heaviest rainfall occurs in the western, southwestern, and central mountains of the Atkora. Lome's annual rainfall is 30 inches and that of Kloto 70 inches annually. On an average the north gets 40 inches, and the south 70 inches. In Togo the average temperature ranges from 72°F to 95°F.

Togo also faces threats from natural hazards. During the winter, hot, dry Harmattan winds reduce visibility in the north. Periodic droughts are another cause for concern.

Added to this are serious environmental issues: deforestation, caused by slash-and-burn agriculture and the use of wood for fuel; water pollution, which has affected the fishing industry; and air pollution, which has become a health hazard for the urban population.

❁ ECONOMY

The Togolese economy is based on both commercial and subsistence agriculture. The main cash crop is cotton. This provides employment for 65 percent of the labor force. Some of the other agricultural products are coffee, cocoa, yams, cassava (manioc), corn, beans, rice, millet, and sorghum. Phosphate mining remains the country's most significant industry in spite of the fact that phosphate prices have plunged on the world market. Togo's other important industries—agricultural processing, cement, handicrafts, textiles, and beverages—have picked up some of the slack. Occasionally supply difficulties occur in one region or another, but, when harvests are normal, Togo is self-sufficient.

Most essential products—like machinery and equipment, foodstuffs, and petroleum products—have to be imported. Togo earns 40 percent of its revenue by exporting cocoa, coffee, and cotton. Even though Togo is the world's fourth largest producer of phosphate, it is only able to produce a small percentage of its total capability on account of severe power shortages and lack of the funds needed to upgrade technology. International aid through the World Bank and International Monetary Fund has not really moved the economy forward because of the political situation in the country. Military rule, in fact, prompted the European Union to impose sanctions at one time, though they have since been lifted.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The majority of Togolese are native Africans. There are as many as 37 tribes; prominent among them are the Ewe, Mina, and Kabye. While the official language of the country is French, many African dialects are used for conducting day-to-day transactions. Ewe and Mina are the two major African languages in the south, and Kabye (sometimes spelled Kabiye) and Dagomba, the two major African languages in the north. These ethnic groups worship the Christian or Islamic God as well as other deities, but ancestral worship is most important. Ancestors are invoked and invited before every major ceremony, especially marriage.

The influence of ethnic cultures is so dominant that it permeates the lifestyles of even those who have adopted Christianity and Islam. This is evident in many of the rituals and ceremonies they observe.

❁ CUISINE

The food habits of the Togolese are greatly influenced by the country's colonial legacy. While most people prefer home-cooked food, there are plenty of roadside stalls and restaurants selling, corn on the cob, peanuts, omelets, brochettes, and prawns, among other items.

Most items are served in a special sauce accompanied by a starchy item like rice, pâté (made with millet, corn, plantains, manioc (cassava), or yams), ablo (made with corn and sugar), monple (made with fermented corn), or fufu. Some of the sauces used are lamounou dessi or sauce de poisson (fresh fish sauce), aglan (crab), gboma (spinach), tomate (tomato), aubergine (eggplant), and épinard (spinach).

Togolese delicacies include abobo (snails cooked en brochette), egbo pinon (smoked goat), koklo meme (grilled chicken with chili sauce), and koliko (fried yams).

Fun Fact

The intertropical front was named "the doldrums" because of the low spirits early sailors experienced after days of having no wind. When navigators depended entirely on wind to propel their ships, finding themselves becalmed in this region in a hot and muggy climate could mean death.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

On Easter Christians mark the day of Jesus' Resurrection, the day they believe he rose from the dead. Easter, called Pascha in many Christian areas of the world, celebrates the victory over death and the renewal of life. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is one of the oldest, and certainly the most important, of Christian festivals. The date for Easter is always scheduled for the first Sunday after the first full Moon after the vernal equinox, and the dates of many Christian observances are, in turn, determined on the basis of the date on which Easter falls. In the Roman Catholic Church, for example, Lent begins 40 days prior to Easter, and Ascension Day falls 40 days after Easter. The vernal equinox was chosen because it was the day on which European pagans celebrated the arrival of spring and honored the mother goddess Ostara (Eastre or Eostre among the northern Germanic peoples).

The Harmattan

The Harmattan is an easterly wind that interferes with the trade winds off the Atlantic coasts of North Africa, across the Gulf of Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands. The intertropical front (IF), also known as the intertropical convergence zone (ITCZ) or the equatorial convergence zone, is a belt of low pressure that surrounds the Earth at the equator. The IF is the convergence zone between the northern wind, called the Harmattan, and the monsoon winds coming from the south. It is formed by the convergence of warm moist air from the latitudes above and below the equator. Within this zone, there are no prevailing winds. Whatever horizontal motion there may be is due entirely to air from the trade winds, which replaces that taken up by convection, a slow, unpredictable process at best. For this reason sailors called this region "the doldrums."

The Harmattan is a winter wind, blowing between November and February. As it passes over the Sahara, it gathers very fine dust particles, which can cause a haze covering large coastal areas and reducing visibility to as little as 50 yards. When the Harmattan blows hard, it can push dust and sand all the way to South America. The Harmattan is sometimes called "doctor" because it is thought to have healthful properties, but these warm, dry winds actually cause damage to the mucous membranes of the respiratory system and have been linked to meningitis epidemics in West Africa.

The word Ayiza is derived from ayi, which means "beans." According to legend, Ayiza, or Festival of Harvest Zio, dates back to 1720, when the founding fathers of the town of Tsevie stopped in Ewe to rest en route to the south from Notse. During this break they planted beans. When the visitors wanted to resume their journey, the local farmers asked them to halt for a while, at least until the crops grew, and they did. Tsevie owes its name to this story, and the festival honors the founders of the town. Tse means "yield," and vie means "small"; Tsevie translates as, "Let it yield small before we leave."

Ayiza is celebrated with gunshots, chicken sacrifices, and dancing. On this occasion people gather at the village square and celebrate the harvest of beans. Prayers are offered to their ancestors for having taken care of the beans. Ayiza is celebrated the second Saturday of August.

✿ BIRTH

Fun Fact

When thinking about making a food offering to the Ibeji, it is important to know that they are particularly fond of popcorn, candy, all kinds of fruit, cakes, and yellow rice.

The birth of a child among the Ewe tribe in Togo has an important spiritual aspect to it. Once the pregnant woman has felt the first pang of labor, a priestess cares for the woman and her child. After the birth of the infant, a babalarwo (priest) arrives to determine which ancestral spirit has been reborn in the infant. The parents of the child have to ensure that the child conforms to the manners of the ancestral spirit.

Nine days after the birth of a boy or seven days after the birth of a girl, the babalarwo returns and sacrifices a cock and a hen to protect the child from unwanted spirits. The entrails of the two sacrifices are put in an earthen pot filled with water, which is then placed before images of the gods.

According to the customs of the Ewe tribe, the child and mother are considered impure after birth, and a purification ceremony is undertaken to purify them. The water placed before the image of the gods is brought back into the house and thrown up on the thatched roof. As the water drips down from the roof, the child and his or her mother have to pass under the falling drops of water at least three times. Then the babalarwo holds the child in his arms, with the child's legs touching the ground, and bathes its head three times with the water of purification, which he himself has prepared. During the process he repeats the name with which the child shall be known three times.

A small fire is kept burning in the house. Once the ceremony is over, the fire is extinguished, and the house is swept clean of charcoal, ashes, dust, and other impurities. Then a new fire is kindled, and the purification ceremony is complete.

Among the Ewe, when a man chooses his wife-to-be, his parents visit hers and make the marriage proposal. If it is accepted, then the groom's family gives the bride's family kola nuts (an indigenous fruit used in the manufacturing of cola drinks) and clothes. Consanguineous unions, especially marriages between cousins, are still prevalent. Such unions have an economic motivation because they ensure that property stays in the family.

A babalarwo (priest) is consulted to determine the wedding date. On the day of the event, a lavish banquet is organized at the bridegroom's house, and the bride is led to the party by a procession of women singing poems written for her. After the wedding, she is led to the bedroom by a female relative of the bridegroom and is put to bed. This relative hides in the room until the bridegroom arrives. Then she collects "tokens of virginity" from the bride and groom and shows them to the people who have assembled for the feast. The test of virginity is of prime importance in those cases when the bride has been engaged to the bridegroom at a very young age because the actual wedding occurs well after the engagement.

The "tokens of virginity" are produced by a member of the bridegroom's family to make sure that there is no deception on the part of the bride's family as to her virginity. These tokens are then carried to the house of the bride's parents, who are not allowed to attend their daughter's wedding feast. Eventually they are hung on a fence as public information.

Visiting special shrines and sacrificing animals in the presence of the babalarwo is also part of some weddings.

❁ DEATH

In Togo a death in the family is marked with loud wailing and other emotional and physical expressions of grief. In the case of a death of an elderly man, the eldest son of the deceased (or his brother if he has no son) will send for the babalawo (priest) to help ascertain whether the death was due to natural causes. The babalawo sacrifices a fowl at the oracle of Ifa (the god of death) and inquires about the cause of death. If the cause of death is natural, then normal burial rituals are performed. If the oracle attributes the death to evil spirits, the babalawo inquires whether the soul of the deceased will be subjected to more problems by the evil spirits or whether any other member of the family faces a similar fate. If the deceased's soul is in danger, then a sheep or goat is sacrificed, and its carcass is sprinkled with palm oil and buried outside the town at a place where two or more paths meet. This ritual ensures that the evil spirits will become confused and run in different directions, not into the town or the village of the deceased.

The corpse is purified by washing it with aromatic herbs; then it is dressed in the individual's best clothes. In the case of a man, the head is shaved, and the hair is buried in the ground behind the house. In the case of a woman, those parts of the body that are exposed are treated with a solution made from the bark of a tree; when applied, it gives a reddish tone to the skin. The body is then wrapped in a cloth and placed on a mat outside the house.

The next day, the male relatives pretend to look for their dead relative in the town and later destroy all his or her belongings. This is an indication that the deceased must leave this world and travel to the next. Before heading to the gravesite, the deceased is called three times by his or her name and, if there is no response, the funeral procession heads toward the burial grounds. The relatives of the deceased are forbidden to comb their hair during the funeral ceremonies, and they shave their heads on the last day of the rituals.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

The first settlers in Tonga came from the Santa Cruz Islands (now part of the Solomon Islands). Their arrival was the result of the Austronesian (Lapita) migration out of Southeast Asia about 6,000 years ago. Tonga is the oldest site in Polynesia where the distinctive Lapita pottery is found, dated between 2,800 and 2,750 years ago. For about 1,000 years the Lapita went about their daily lives before a new generation of explorers sailed east to settle the Marquesas, Tahiti, and, eventually, the remaining Pacific islands. It is for this reason that anthropologists call Tonga, Samoa, and Fiji the “cradle” of Polynesian culture and civilization.

The power of the Tongan monarchy reached the pinnacle of its glory in the 13th century C.E. At that time, the powers of the chieftains of Tonga extended as far as Samoa.

During the 14th century, the king of Tonga delegated much of his political power to one of his brothers and contented himself with retaining only spiritual authority. This form of governing was repeated in the next generation, resulting in three distinct lineages: the Tui Tonga, with spiritual authority, the Tui Haatakalaua; and the Tui Kanokupolu. The latter two oversaw the day-to-day administration of Tonga.

In the 15th century and again in the 17th, civil wars broke out. About this time the first Europeans arrived, beginning with Dutch mariners Willem Schouten (?1567–1625), Jacob Le Maire (c. 1585–1616) in 1616, who stopped on the northern island of Niuaotupapu, and Abel Tasman (?1603–?59), who visited Tongatapu and Haapai in 1643. Regular uninterrupted contact with Europeans did not begin until 125 years later. Captain James Cook (1728–79) visited the islands twice—in 1773 and 1777—and christened the archipelago “the friendly islands” because of the cordiality of the natives whom he had met. In 1789 the famous mutiny on the British ship Bounty took place in the ocean waters between the Haapai and Nomuka island groups.

Shortly after Captain Cook's last visit, war broke out in the islands as the three lines of kings contended for power. Around this time young Tongan nobles serving as mercenaries took Tongan culture to Fiji's easternmost island group the Laus. The missionaries of the London Missionary Society arrived in Tonga in 1747. A second missionary group followed in 1822, led by Walter Lawry of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. They converted Taufaahau (a contender for royal power), and Christianity began to spread throughout the islands.

Taufaahau and his spouse assumed the names of Siaoisi (George) and Salote (Charlotte) respectively, in honor of King George III (1738–1820) and Queen Charlotte of England (1744–1818). For the first time in recorded history, all the Tongan islands were united, with Taufaahau as their ruler. In 1845 he was formally proclaimed King George Tupou I, and the present dynasty was founded. He established a constitution and a parliamentary government based on the British model. In 1862 the king abolished the existing system of semi-serfdom, establishing a system of land tenure under which every male Tongan, upon reaching the age of 16, was entitled to rent—for life and at a nominal fee—a plot of bush land of 8.25 acres, plus a village allotment of about three-eighths of an acre for his home.

In 1900 European settlers and rival Tongan chiefs tried to overthrow Tonga's second king. This resulted in the Treaty of Friendship, which made Tonga one of Britain's protected states. This situation came to an end in 1970 under arrangements established prior to her death by the third monarch, Queen Salote (1918–65). Tonga joined the Commonwealth of Nations in 1970 and the United Nations (UN) in 1999. Tonga is unique in the Pacific because, although it was exposed to colonial influences, it never lost its indigenous governance.

Tonga became fully independent on June 4, 1970. In 1972 Tonga claimed the tide-washed, isolated Minerva Reefs (298 miles southwest of Nukualofa) to thwart attempts by a private Anglo-American group, the Ocean Life Research Foundation, to establish an independent Republic of Minerva on the reefs. In 1998 Tonga recognized China and broke off relations with Taiwan and the United Kingdom.

In the elections of March 2002, seven of the nine popularly elected representatives were chosen under the pro-democratic banner with the remaining two representing “traditionalist” values. The nine nobles and all the cabinet ministers that make up the legislative assembly generally support the government. Tonga is not a democracy; so the people have no right to change their government through elections, although they can elect some members of the legislative assembly.

In 2003 a Tongan newspaper published from New Zealand that criticized the government was banned from circulation in Tonga, but after the newspaper obtained two court orders, it was again distributed freely. In October 2003 thousands of Tongans marched peacefully through the streets of the capital city Nukualofa to protest the government's plans to curb freedom of speech. Despite the protests the Media Operators Bill and constitutional amendment were passed by the legislature.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Tonga is an archipelago in Oceania, situated on the eastern edge of the Indo-Australian Plate, along the Pacific Ring of Fire, and moving east-southeast at a little more than three-quarters of an inch annually. The fault in the Earth's crust that originally raised Tonga, where the Pacific Plate is forcing up the Indo-Australian Plate at the Tonga Trench, has shifted to the northwest over time. The total land area is 289 square miles spread over 270,272 square miles of territorial sea. Tonga consists of 171 islands, 36 of which are inhabited.

Many of the islands are coralline covered with volcanic ash, comparatively flat, and encircled by fringing reefs. The highest point of the country is Mt. Kao, a volcano (3,379 feet), located on Kao Island. The capital, Nukualofa, is located on the main island of Tongatapu.

Tonga is 13 hours ahead of Greenwich Mean Time. The climate is pleasant, slightly cooler, and less humid than most tropical areas. The temperature ranges between 64° and 77°F from May to September and 75° and 90°F between October and April. Trade winds blow year-round. The average annual temperatures in Nukualofa are 77°F, with a mean humidity of 77 percent. Average annual rainfall is 70 inches.

Tonga has a vast treasure trove of tropical flora and fauna. A profusion of heilala, hibiscus, frangipani, and bougainvillea create a riot of colors. Common sights on Tonga are the coconut groves, pandanus, and banana plantations. Located at the Veitongo village at Tongatapu, the Tonga Wildlife Centre/Bird Park is a sanctuary for the rare and endangered birds in the kingdom. The Wildlife Centre also showcases Tongan medicinal trees and plants along with typical Tongan food crops.

❁ ECONOMY

Tonga has a narrow export base in agricultural goods. Squash, coconuts, bananas, and vanilla beans are its main crops, most of which are exported. The country has to import much of its food, mainly from New Zealand. Tourism is the second largest source of revenue after remittances from natives living abroad. The government stresses development of the private sector, especially the encouragement of investment, and is allocating more and more funds for health and education. High rates of unemployment among the young and soaring inflation are major problems presently confronting the government.

Fun Fact

In several Polynesian dialects the word tonga means “south.”

Fun Fact

In Tonga visitors can make the two-hour trek to the summit of Tofua, the most active volcano in the country. Tofua frequently belches smoke.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Fun Fact

Every year more than 100 humpback whales return to Tonga to give birth during the austral winter (June–August).

The tiny country of Tonga is often romantically described as the place where time begins. It has managed to maintain a low profile compared to most of its Pacific neighbors. Tonga is an idyllic holiday resort with breathtaking natural beauty. The only monarchy left in the Pacific has succeeded in keeping developers at bay. The people of Tonga live a tranquil and peaceful existence in a veritable paradise away from concrete jungles and symbols of modernity like five-star hotels and resorts, glamorous shopping malls, and freeways.

Tonga has a rigid two-tier caste system. The king and 33 “nobles of the realm,” along with their families, constitute a privileged class at the top of the social ladder. Everyone else is a commoner. At present Tongan society is conservative in outlook and practice in almost every aspect of life except the sexual lives of bachelors and spinsters.

In a traditional Tongan family the father is considered the head of the family, and the mother, his subordinate. However, brothers are subordinate to their sisters when the age gap between them is small. The eldest daughter (rather than the eldest son) receives the best of the family’s resources. A father’s eldest sister (mebekitanga) is the leader (fabu) of the nuclear family in the highly organized extended family system.

As was the case throughout Polynesia, the Tongans accepted most of the puritanical beliefs taught by the early missionaries but resisted adopting the ideas of strict sexual abstinence. It is illegal for either men or women to appear shirtless in public. As in other countries of Polynesia, Tongan families without enough female progeny bring up boys as they would bring up girls. These boys are known in Tongan as fakaleitis (“like a woman”).

The people of Tonga are notorious for their promiscuity and their penchant for enticing tourists. Marriages are times for great celebration. Ceremonies follow the religious traditions of the families. Festivities after a ceremony may include singing hymns, giving speeches, and eating and drinking. Young couples usually have their own home, but may choose to move in with the bride’s parents.

The dwellings in modern Tonga vary from the traditional coconut leaf and timber fale in rural areas, to the wooden-frame, tin, or cinder-block fale in affluent areas. All families own their homes, though technically the land is owned by the king. Sometimes two generations of a family live in the same house.

Western clothes have become common in recent years, especially among the young, although many Tongans still wear wraparound skirts known as valas. These reach below the knee (on men) and down to the ankles on women. To show their respect for the royal family and to each other, men and women traditionally wear finely woven mats known as ta’ovalas over their valas. Men fasten these with waistbands made out of coconut fiber, while women wear decorative waistbands called kiekies.

❁ CUISINE

Tongans traditionally eat two meals a day. These are made up of yams, taro leaves, sweet potatoes, cassava, fish, or pork. Lu pulu, a popular dish, is cooked taro leaves with coconut cream and corned beef. Pork (especially roasted pig), chicken, and fish (tuna, shark, grouper, and parrotfish) are the most common dishes. The Tongans enjoy fresh fruit and vegetables including mangoes, guavas, oranges, lemons, limes, grapefruit, papayas, and coconuts.

Families eat together as often as possible. In rural areas the people sit on woven mats to eat, but in urban households dining tables are used. The people traditionally eat with their fingers, though there is now more use of cutlery. Conversation is kept to a minimum while eating. When guests are present, they usually eat with a few selected members of the family. Guests are served first, while the person who has done the cooking usually eats last. Children eat separately.

Civil wars during the early 19th century ended when King George Tupou I (1797–1893) established the monarchy, unified the nation, and gave it a constitution (1862), a legal code, and an administrative system. To mark their first king's birthday Tongans attend a flag-raising ceremony in the morning, which is accompanied by a police band playing the Tongan national anthem, followed by a gun salute at the flagpole.

Crowds then gather to participate in marches through Nukualofa, the capital; each group has its own agenda. Some demand that the present king give up his power, others pray for divine intervention, and still others pay homage to the monarchy. Those who are unable to decide which march to join gather with the bystanders.

utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all believers from the penalty of sin.

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. The word easter is derived from the name of the Germanic fertility goddess Eostre or Eastre, the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people who lived in northern Europe. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival because they symbolize new life.

In a country like Tonga, where the people are devout Christians, the festival of Easter assumes even greater importance. Apart from the traditional ceremonial prayers in churches, the people also organize a grand festival, complete with youth choirs, passion plays, concerts, and other cultural performances. Easter Monday, the day after Easter, is a public holiday, and Tongans take advantage of the long weekend to enjoy themselves with friends and family.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world, because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. Christmas in Tonga is unlike Western traditional observances because there is neither snow nor real pine trees. Singing is a major part of Christmas in Tonga. Celebrations begin in the first week of December and continue up to New Year's Day. All the churches in the country get their parishioners together to sing almost all day and night. In Tonga the government closes down all its functions from Christmas Day until New Year's Day. On Christmas Day Tongans cook a number of delicacies that they exchange with or give to their neighbors. The highlight of Christmas festivities in Tonga is the tutukupakanava, for which piles of coconut husks are lined up on the beaches and set on fire. Each island burns its own pile of husks on the seashore, which collectively begins to look like Christmas lights. Moreover people select trees from their backyards and decorate them just as the traditional Christmas trees in northern countries are decorated.

DEATH

In ancient times the Tongans used to build elaborate tombs to hold the remains of their dead. The tombs were made up of massive coral slabs that were brought ashore from the deep seas and nearby islands. Though the tomb-making is no longer in vogue, there still persists the ceremony of the kilikili, which takes place after the initial mourning period of 100 days. Washing the tombstones with water is called the lanu kilikili. Taking them out from the water and washing them with oils is called the bifo kilikili. The oils are made out of fragrant flowers such as the mohokoi, as well as leaves from the siaipasi tree, which also adds to the fragrance. In a bygone age it was also a custom among the Tongans to practice self-flagellation along with other forms of self-mortification and torture to show their grief for the dead.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Both Trinidad and Tobago were originally settled by Amerindians from South America. Trinidad was the first of the Caribbean islands settled by archaic hunter-gatherers at least 7,000 years ago. Crop growers brought with them their knowledge of ceramics when they settled on Trinidad around 250 B.C.E. and then gradually moved up the islands. When Columbus (1451–1506) arrived in 1498, Trinidad was occupied by various Arawakan and Cariban groups including the Nepoya, Suppoya, and Yao, who had named the island Kairi (or Iere), usually understood to mean Land of the Hummingbird. (According to some interpreters, kairi means “land.”) Columbus, however, decided to call the island La Isla de la Trinidad, the Island of the Holy Trinity. Tobago was inhabited by the Island Caribs and Galibi.

The Spanish, who followed in Columbus's wake, seized many of Trinidad's original Amerindian inhabitants to work as slaves in their newly established South American colonies.

Spain, owing to its frenzied desire for gold, initially paid scant attention to the potentials of tapping the natural resources of Trinidad, a lucky turn for the indigenous peoples. But in 1592 Spain decided to establish its first settlement, San Josef, east of the present-day capital, Port-of-Spain. Over the next two centuries unsuccessful attempts were made by Spanish colonizers to establish tobacco and cacao plantations. Crop failures and lack of support from the authorities in Spain thwarted their efforts.

Taking advantage of Spain's inattention, the British managed to wrest the islands from the Spanish in 1797. After slavery was abolished in the 1830s, the British imported thousands of indentured workers, mostly from India, to work in the sugarcane fields and other jobs in the colony. The indentured labor system functioned for more than 100 years.

Tobago, also happened upon by Columbus and claimed by the Spanish, was simply ignored, and no attempts were made to colonize it. During the 17th century Tobago changed hands numerous times as the English, French, Dutch, and Courlanders (present day Latvians) fought for control. In 1704 Tobago was declared a neutral territory,

Fun Fact

Columbus also named Tobago Bella Forma, but this name did not stick and it was later called Tobago (probably derived from tobacco).

which gave pirates (who had become a menace to seafarers in the 18th century) the opportunity to use the island as a base for raiding ships sailing in the eastern Caribbean. Then the British returned to establish a colonial administration on Tobago in 1763. Within two decades 10,000 African slaves had been imported to be used on the island's sugar, cotton, and indigo plantations. Tobago's plantation economy suffered a serious setback after the abolition of slavery. Indian, Chinese, Portuguese, and free African indentured laborers were then imported to provide a labor force in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Later immigration from Barbados and the Lesser Antilles and from Syria and Lebanon would also affect the ethnic makeup of the country. Sugar and rum production continued until 1884, when the London firm that controlled the finances for the island's plantations went bankrupt, plunging the country's economy into chaos.

In 1889 the British made Tobago, which previously had had its own independent legislature, a ward of neighboring Trinidad. Demands for greater autonomy grew following World War I. The Depression of the 1930s led to a series of strikes and riots and the growth of a labor movement on the islands. To counter these disturbances the British granted universal suffrage to the natives in 1946 and took measures to institute self-government. Independence finally came in 1962. In April 1970 the Black Power movement's public demonstrations created a political crisis, leading to an army mutiny, but the government managed to retain power. Just when the country's future appeared bleakest, oil was struck in the region. The oil boom of the 1970s brought immense prosperity to the islands, but the East Indian community became increasingly isolated from political power.

In July 1990 members of the minority Muslim population attempted a coup. They stormed the parliament and took 45 hostages, including the incumbent prime minister A. N. R. Robinson (b. 1926). Since the 1990s the oil business has plummeted, and the government has implemented austerity programs in order to avoid a major crisis. Tourism on the islands is currently being heavily promoted. In 1994 the government introduced stringent anti-crime measures to combat the alarming rise in crime in some localities. Corruption developed as a result of a judicial system bogged down with a backlog of drug-related trials—the country is a stopover in the drug trade. Consequently the death penalty was reintroduced in 1999. More petroleum and natural gas reserves were discovered in the late 1990s, promising a return to prosperity for the nation.

☼ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Trinidad and Tobago are the two largest islands of an archipelago consisting of 21 smaller islands. Once part of the South American mainland, Trinidad, with its bootlike shape, measures 50 miles by 37 miles, and boasts an amazing ecological and geographical diversity unmatched in the region. Gorgeous, sandy beaches are found along the northern coast. Dominated by densely forested peaks, the northern interior offers excellent hiking trails, while low, predominantly agricultural plains make up the central part of Trinidad. The eastern coast is home to protected wetlands and miles of beach frontage lined by groves of coconut palms. The island's industrial capital—San Fernando—lies on hilly terrain, close to the island's modern oil towns. Picturesque fishing villages and calm, deserted beaches dot the coastline.

Tobago is home to the oldest protected rain forest in the Western Hemisphere. This strip of elongated land, just 16 by 5 miles, is the last of the virgin, unspoiled Caribbean. It features palm-lined beaches, lush rain forests, and pristine coral reefs that teem with rich marine life. Contrasts of rolling hills against wave-beaten shores create a stunningly beautiful backdrop for the island. The southern (windward) coast faces the dark green choppy Atlantic and is lined with flourishing fishing villages, while the northern (leeward) coast provides Tobago with some of its finest beaches.

☼ ECONOMY

Trinidad and Tobago has earned a reputation as an excellent investment site for international business ventures. The implementation of successful economic reforms has increased the average economic growth rate, and foreign investment and trade are flourishing. Unemployment—the main cause of the country's socioeconomic problems—is high but has decreased to its lowest point during the early 21st century. The country enjoys a healthy trade surplus of $500 million, yet its heavy dependence on oil and petrochemical prices makes its trade balance vulnerable to sudden shifts. Furthermore, CARICOM (the Caribbean Community and Common Market), Trinidad and Tobago's main market, is saturated, provoking some countries to establish nontariff trade barriers.

☼ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Integral to Trinidad's outrageous Carnival festivities is the music of the Steel Pan (drum), which was born in Trinidad half a century ago, when musicians began to use the hammered-out ends of discarded oil drums. "Pan Yards," where steel drum bands practice in the evenings, abound in Port-of-Spain, the capital. During the weeks preceding Carnival, the sound of the drums reaches a deafening crescendo. Calypso, a medium for political and social satire, also has its roots in Trinidad. It goes back to the days when slaves sang in the local patois, mocking their colonial masters. Mighty Sparrow, the renowned king of calypso, is a Trinidadian native, as are many of the Caribbean's promising and budding calypso stars. The music of original indentured laborers from India is also an integral part of Trinidad's musical heritage.

❁ CUISINE

Trinidadian cuisine is as diverse as the ethnic groups that constitute its population—Indian, Créole, Chinese, Syrian-Lebanese, and Italian. Dishes like salt fish buljol, brown chicken, and choka, or black pudding, are served with fresh hot coconut bake or hop bread. Fried accra and boiled cassava with butter are other specialties. Mangoes, papayas, bananas, pineapples, oranges, tangerines, and watermelons are abundant. Fast foods such as fried chicken, hamburgers, pizzas, and lasagna share the islands' menu with East Indian favorites like curried chicken and potato, shrimp, goat, duck, and beef packages in a roti (Indian unleavened bread) skin. Such dishes are accompanied by curried mango chataigne (pronounced "shatine") channa (chickpeas) as well as pumpkin or mango kuchela. Special potato (aloo) pies are hot favorites. Seafood, including flying fish, kingfish, carite, red fish, and bonito, is best enjoyed when stewed, barbecued, or curried with coconut milk.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

On New Year's Day in Trinidad and Tobago, church bells, horns, and ear-piercing shrieks echo throughout the country. People traditionally make resolutions to eliminate bad habits and adopt good ones in the coming year. Many people spend the holiday on the beaches or at parties.

❁ SPIRITUAL BAPTIST SHOUTERS LIBERATION DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: March 30

Spiritual Baptists Shouters is a distinct sect of Christians, an offshoot of the Baptist community. Founded in the 17th century with the arrival of African slaves, Spiritual Baptists believe in teaching biblical doctrines, spirituality, mourning, and fasting besides moral values.

In the early days of Trinidadian history there were no churches as they exist today. At that time the buildings used by Spiritual Baptist churches for their meetings were thatched huts or shacks, with wooden altars and benches, in the most remote parts of the country. As a result of this there are no parish churches in Trinidad and Tobago, whereas it is common to find eight or nine separate Spiritual Baptist churches in one area. The Spiritual Baptist Shouters emerged much later. Their method of worship, which involves bell-ringing, shouting, chanting, and a loud manner of singing and praying offended the other Christian communities. The sect was banned from the islands, and they experienced considerable antagonism and repression. Finally the ban was lifted, and in 1996 the Government of Trinidad and Tobago granted a public holiday to the Spiritual Baptist faith, to be celebrated on March 30. Known as Spiritual Baptist Shouters Liberation Day, in memory of the struggle and in recognition of the Ordinance of March 30, 1951, which repealed the 1917 act prohibiting the practice of this faith, this day is observed by the Shouters with processions and religious services.

Some Typical Trinidadian Dishes

A "brown down" of stewed chicken, beef, pork, or fish is a popular Créole dish. This is complemented by side dishes such as ochro (or okra) rice, green figs, yam, plantain (a large sweet banana), sweet potatoes, and cassava (manioc) pies. Another common dish, pilaf, is made with rice, pigeon peas, and chicken, beef, and pork. Seasoned crab backs are popular as an appetizer. Curried crab and dumplings is another favorite recipe. A rare delicacy is cascadura—a small freshwater fish. Local legend says that if you eat cascadura you will return to Trinidad again and again.

Buljol

The name of this salad of shredded salt fish comes from the French brûlé, meaning "burned," and geule, slang for "mouth." Since it is served at room temperature, the burning sensation is caused by the Congo pepper, which is one of the ingredients. Traditionally, buljol is served for breakfast or a Sunday brunch. This is a combination of fish with onion, tomato, Congo pepper, and olive oil. The mixture is placed on lettuce leaves and garnished with eggs and avocado.

Fried Accras

These fritters, of West African origin, are popular throughout the West Indies including Trinidad and Tobago. Earlier they were usually made with black-eyed pea flour, but these days wheat flour is used.

Kuchela

A popular condiment from Trinidad, this Caribbean spicy sauce is a must as an accompaniment to all kinds of curry dishes, including curried goat.

✿ LABOR DAY

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day and Workers' Day, is observed to mark the substantial contributions of the workers and laborers of the world to the economic and social developments of nations. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Trinidad and Tobago the day is marked by trade union activities, parades, and processions. Most businesses and government offices remain closed on this day.

Colorful and fantastic costumes and steel band performances are major features.

Birthplace of the Steel Pan Bands

Laventille, a hilly, low-income suburb located east of Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, boasts that it is the birthplace of one of the most popular musical instruments created during the 20th century—the steel drum or “Steel Pan.” Laventille was inhabited in the mid-1800s by freed African slaves. There the African tradition of drumming evolved over the years into rhythm bands of young, often rowdy, men, who paraded through the streets during Carnival and other celebrations pounding skin drums and, when those were outlawed, hollow bamboo drums. In the mid-1930s these bands switched over to metallic objects—garbage can lids, automobile parts, pots and pans, and biscuit tins, which were louder and stronger than bamboo. These evolved into “steel bands” within a decade of their introduction.

Rites of Passage

✿ BIRTH

In Trinidad and Tobago the birth of a child is seen as ensuring the continuity of the family's lineage and enhancing its prestige in society. Owing to the country's long association with Britain, the majority of people follow the customs and practices of the Anglican Church. When a child is born, a church ceremony is conducted to bless the infant; alternatively a christening ceremony is held. A lavish party is held for friends and relatives, who bring flowers, cards, and gifts for the newborn.

✿ MARRIAGE

Wedding ceremonies in Trinidad and Tobago reflect strong European influences on the local culture and traditions. The groom dresses in black and white, sporting a formal three-piece suit, top hat, bow tie, and white gloves. He carries a large umbrella with which to shade the bride. The bride is attired in an 18th- or 19th-century style bustle dress, platform shoes, a wide-brimmed hat trimmed with flowers, and white gloves. In a village the wedding ceremony takes place in the local church, followed by a wedding procession, which winds its way along the streets, with people dancing to the music of tambourines and fiddles. A wedding procession often stops along the way to enjoy cake and wine before moving on to the reception venue. Banquets, speeches, and dances continue throughout the afternoon. The ceremony comes to a close when the bride tosses her bouquet to be caught by one of the guests, which is considered a symbol of good luck.

Several structural and cultural factors have brought about changes in the Indo-Trinidadian family of Hindus. For example, there has been a gradual decline in arranged marriages. When Indians were still indentured, arranged marriages were the statistical norm and were considered the cultural ideal. Increasing educational opportunities and wide-scale urbanization led to changes in attitudes toward arranged marriages. Since the 1940s marriages have not been parentally arranged, and Indo-Trinidadian women have increasingly opted to choose their own mates. Gradually, most Indo-Trinidadian parents have yielded to personal choice as the best method of finding a spouse.

Today arranged marriages are usually frowned upon by the younger generation of Indo-Trinidadians. The norm is for individual choice with parental approval. Particular aspects of marriage customs associated with Indian weddings are still in vogue in Trinidad, however. For example in northern India (where the majority of indentured Indians came from), the payment of a dowry was a common practice. However, in modern Trinidad the system of a dowry has become obsolete. The giving of gifts to both the dulaha (bridegroom) and dulabin (bride) has become the accepted practice.

The muburta (the time when a Hindu marriage is most propitious) has been replaced by a particular day most suited to celebration, or Sunday. The traditional attire worn by Indo-Trinidadian brides has also undergone some changes. Earlier it was customary for the Hindu bride to wear a yellow sari, then a red sari, and finally, a white sari. With increasing Westernization, Hindu brides now wear both the traditional sari as well as the white wedding gown typical of Western Christian weddings. In spite of these transformations and modifications, Indo-Trinidadian marriages continue to have the full force of moral and social authority behind them, and the "Indian" character of the wedding ceremony remains strong.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

The region now occupied by Tunisia has a distinct place in history. It has been fought over by many competing empires because of its strategic position as a thriving commercial center along the Mediterranean.

It is believed that the Berbers were the original inhabitants of Tunisia. However, it was the Phoenicians who ensured Tunisia's place in history by inhabiting the historic port city of Carthage around 1100 B.C.E.

The Phoenicians developed this port city extensively and transformed it into a major trade hub. Around the fifth century B.C.E., the region had become a dominant force in the western Mediterranean region and a rival to the expanding Roman Empire. The rivalry escalated to a full-scale war between the two dominant forces in the region and led to a series of three wars, known as the Punic Wars.

After the Roman conquest of Carthage, the region became a Roman province, and all its original inhabitants were sold as slaves. The city was refounded as a Roman city by the Emperor Augustus in 44 B.C.E. He also made Carthage the capital city of the Roman holdings in Africa, which were known as African Proconsularis. The Romans developed the region extensively, and by the first century C.E. agriculture was the primary occupation of the people of the region.

But conquests of Tunisia did not end with the Romans. Around the fifth century the region was captured by Vandals (an East Germanic tribe) and became the capital of their kingdom. But Vandal rule was short-lived as the region was conquered by the Byzantines of Constantinople in 533; they exercised control over the region for the next 150 years.

In the seventh century, the Arabs proclaimed their dominance in the whole of North Africa and Tunisia, ended the rule of the Byzantines, and moved the capital to Kairouan.

The Berber tribes converted to Islam but were subjected to brutal treatment by their Arab rulers. Responding to this ill treatment, the Berbers staged repeated uprisings against the Arabs. In 909 a group of Berber Shiites, who called themselves Fatimids, launched a full-scale war against the Arabs and, along with other Berber people, reclaimed North Africa. They formed their kingdom and began exercising control over the region. But a Sunni-Shia schism among the Berber Muslims led to internal conflicts that eventually engulfed all of North Africa, devastating it.

Around the 16th century, Tunisia became a source of friction between Spain and the Ottoman Empire. The region finally became an Ottoman territory in 1574. Toward the 19th century, Tunisia enjoyed autonomy under the Ottoman Empire, and in 1861 it became the first country in the Arab world to enact a constitution. Because of the country's poor economy and political unrest within the Ottoman Empire, however, Tunisia's desire to proclaim itself a republic was thwarted. In 1869 Tunisia declared itself bankrupt, and an international financial commission, made up of France, Italy, and Britain, took charge of its economy.

In 1881 France claimed that Tunisian troops had tried to cross the border into the French colony of Algeria. France invaded Tunisia, and on May 12, 1881, Tunisia was declared a French Protectorate. By 1954 Tunisians wanted to break free from French domination. They protested against French rule and began pressuring the French government for independence. Habib Bourguiba (1903–2000), a Tunisian with a pro-Western outlook, led the independence movement.

In response to mounting pressure, on March 20, 1956, France granted independence to Tunisia, which declared itself a constitutional monarchy. Mohammed Al-Amin Bey, the bey (head of state) of Tunis, became the ruling monarch of Tunisia. Habib Bourguiba was sworn in as the first prime minister.

In 1957, however, Bourguiba abolished the monarchy and declared himself the president of the region. He also declared Tunisia a one-party state. He put his pro-Western outlook into practice by promoting women's rights to an extent unmatched by any other Arab nation and by repressing Islamic fundamentalism. He ruled the country for 31 years, until he was ousted in a coup led by his prime minister Zine El-Abidine Ben Ali (b. 1936) on November 7, 1987.

Zine El-Abidine Ben Ali continued to rule as president of Tunisia in the early 21st century, and under his leadership Tunisia adopted a moderate, nonaligned stance in its foreign relations.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The Tunisian Republic is located on the northern coast of Africa and is flanked by Libya in the southeast, Algeria in the west, and the Mediterranean Sea in the east and north. The most striking feature of Tunisia's geography is the Atlas Mountains, which divides the country into two main geographical regions: the well-watered north and the semi-arid south.

The Kroumirie Forest, the Medjerda River Valley, and the coastal city of Bizerte are located in the northern part of Tunisia. This region is further subdivided into three areas: the northwest, home to vast cork forests; the north central, with its fertile grasslands, and the northeast, which is famed for its citrus fruits, garden produce, and livestock.

A central plateau and desert region in the extreme south, which is home to date palms, saline lakes, and oases, are the main features of the semi-arid south. The two important mountain ranges of Tunisia are the Massif Meridional, or the Tebessa Mountains, in the southern part of Tunisia; and the Medjerda Mountains that run from Kroumirie to Bizerte in the northern part of the country. The most important river system in Tunisia is the Medjerda, which originates in Algeria and flows into the Gulf of Tunis.

Tunisia has a Mediterranean climate characterized by wet winters and hot and dry summers. So, while the average temperature in January is around 48°F, the temperature reaches 79°F in July.

The region boasts a wide variety of wildlife including wild boar, gazelles (antelope), hyenas, and jackals, in addition to a number of poisonous snake species such as horned vipers and cobras.

❁ ECONOMY

Tunisia has a relatively stable economy. Mining, manufacturing, fossil fuel production, agriculture, and tourism are the main contributors to the nation's gross domestic product. It has a mixed economy with equal participation from public and private sectors. The largest sectors of the economy include agriculture, services, light industries, and production and export of phosphates and petroleum products. Tunisia is also a recipient of foreign aid from countries such as the United States and Germany. It signed an agreement with the European Union (EU) on March 1, 1998, according to which over the next decade Tunisia will gradually remove trade barriers in its dealings with the EU.

The Punic Wars

The three wars fought between the Romans and the Phoenicians were known as the Punic Wars, after the ancient Roman name for the Carthaginians—Punici. The First Punic War began in 264 B.C.E. and ended in 241 with the Romans victorious. Heavy restrictions were imposed on Carthage by the Romans and were the first step in the city's destruction.

In the Second Punic War (218–02), the famed Carthaginian commander Hannibal crossed the Alps to defeat the Roman Army and compensate for the loss of Sicily to Rome after the First Punic War. The Romans demanded that Carthage surrender Hannibal and, when it refused, Rome declared war on Carthage, which once again resulted in a Roman victory. The Third Punic War (149–46) resulted in the total destruction of Carthage, which was burned by the Romans after they conquered the region.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Although the Berbers were the original inhabitants of Tunisia, the culture of Tunisia has been greatly influenced by the empires that exercised control over the region throughout the country's history. Phoenician, Roman, Vandal, Ottoman, and Arab influences are all reflected in the nation's rich cultural heritage. The indigenous Berber tribes were influenced by the principles of Islam and willingly embraced it. Though Islam is the main religion of Tunisia, it is also home to 20,000 Roman Catholics and a small Jewish community that resides in Tunis and on the island of Jerba.

Arabic is the official language of Tunisia, but French and Berber languages, such as Chelba, are also spoken in parts of the country.

In Tunisian society the best place to unwind and relax are the local hammams or public bathhouses. Hammams are an integral part of Tunisian society and are looked upon not just as a place to clean up but also to socialize. Hammams are a common feature not only in Tunisia but also in many countries in North Africa and in the Middle East.

Compared to other African countries, Tunisia allows women a great degree of freedom, which was largely achieved under the leadership of former President Habib Bourguiba. Polygamy and divorce by renunciation were outlawed, and the marriageable age limit for girls was raised to 17 years. They were also given the right to reject a proposal and could no longer be forced into arranged marriages by their parents.

The influence of the different empires is evident in Tunisian music. Malouf ("normal" or "customary") is a popular musical form that originated in Andalusia (one of the 17 regions that constitute modern Spain) and is believed to have been introduced to Tunisia in the 15th century. The singing of malouf is based on classical Arabic poetry, known as qasidab or ode. Other classical forms of Tunisian music include ngouba (of Andalusian origin), chghoul,

Fun Fact

Dido (also called Elissa), was the founding queen of Carthage in according to legend. Some ancient sources say that Carthage was founded 72 years before Rome.

Hammams

In Tunisia, every town has at least one hammam, or public bathhouse, with separate areas designated for men and women. In many places such facilities are located in separate buildings. A fouta, or towel, is provided for the men at the hammam, but women are expected to bring their own. The entrance fee to the hammam includes access to the steam room and bathroom, and a kassa (a coarse mitten or scrubber used to clean the skin).

and bachraf (Turkish origin). Western notation is used in writing classical Tunisian music.

Tunisia is an archaeologist's paradise. Beautiful floor mosaics, dating as far back as the second century C.E., have been found almost intact in many parts of Tunisia. Architectural marvels dating back thousands of years serve as a window into the architectural genius of a bygone era. Evidence of architectural brilliance can be found all over Tunisia; among the Punic and Roman ruins, among the medinas (the old section of an Arab city in North Africa), among the red-tiled Alpine houses found in Ain Draham, and also among the Berber structures in the southern part of the country.

CUISINE

Tunisians pride themselves on their cuisine. Prominent among Tunisian dishes is mloukbia (beef stew). Lamb, however, is the center of many meat dishes. The national dish is couscous. Essentially a pasta, it is made up of small grains, the main ingredients of which are semolina, salty water, and flour. The word couscous comes from a Berber term, seksou, which means "food." Its variation in Maghrib Arabic (a dialect spoken in Maghrib regions comprising Tunisia, Morocco, Libya, and Algeria) is called kusukusu. Couscous has been part of the Berber diet for nearly 3,000 years. Couscous is mainly used as an accompaniment for vegetable and meat dishes. Harissa is a popular sauce made from a mixture of sea salt, dried red chilies, olive oil, ground coriander, garlic, and caraway seeds.

Although Tunisians like their food to be hot and spicy, they also relish sweets. A typical Tunisian meal begins with shorba frik (a lamb soup flavored with coriander leaves, parsley, tomato paste, and seasonings), which is served with lemon slices. Salad is served in the form of slata mechouia, which consists of tomatoes, finely chopped garlic, and grilled green peppers. Olive oil and spices are added to the salad, and it is garnished with olives, hard-boiled eggs, tuna fish, and capers. The main course consists of roasted lamb, veal or fish, and tajine (chopped meat baked with cheese and vegetables). The meal is completed with fresh salad, custards, pastries, fruits, and tea or coffee.

Polygamy and divorce by renunciation, which were unfair to women, were abolished. The age limit for marriage for girls was raised to 17 years, and they were empowered with the right to refuse a marriage proposal. This reform protected women from being forced into arranged marriages, and it put an end to child marriages.

Thus, with popular support and armed with a medical certificate signed by seven doctors that declared Habib unfit for the presidency, Ben Ali assumed power as the president of Tunisia. As of the early 21st century, he was still Tunisia's president. On this day the government of Tunisia releases prisoners who have a record of good conduct. Eid al-Adha, the Muslim Festival of Sacrifice, commemorates the unwavering faith of Ibrahim in Allah and his willingness to sacrifice his son to obey Allah's command. Muslims believe that God visited Ibrahim in a dream and instructed him to sacrifice his most valued possession, his son. When Ibrahim told his son about the dream, the latter asked his father to follow God's command. However, as Ibrahim was about to make the sacrifice, to his surprise, instead of his son, a ram lay on the altar.

Eid al-Adha is celebrated enthusiastically in Tunisia. After Tunisians offer prayers in the local mosques, they make sacrificial offerings of lambs. In the afternoon they wear new clothes and visit friends and relatives. Greetings are exchanged, and children receive gifts. Streets are decorated with lights and a festive spirit envelops the country. A lavish dinner is shared with friends and relatives. Lamb cuts, or chops are grilled on charcoal and served as a special dish on this occasion.

The hajj, the annual holy pilgrimage, also takes place in this month, and many devout Muslims return from their visit to the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. Before the pilgrims depart for the hajj, every village presents them with carpets and shrouds for their journey in a special ritual called the mabmal.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

Turkey is a land of rich traditions with its roots deep in pre-history, and the modern state has hundreds of archaeological sites that continue to provide new information regarding the movements of ancient peoples and their daily lives. Because of its strategic location, straddling both Eastern Europe and Central Asia, it has been the home of some of the greatest empires and formed part of the ancient trade route, the fabled Silk Road. Even a short list of its ancient cities brings up names that are immediately recognized: Constantinople (Byzantium), Troy, Midas, Antioch, and Halicarnassus. Certainly the controversial Mt. Ararat, said to hold the remains of Noah's Ark, needs no introduction.

The territory currently called Turkey was known formerly as Anatolia (by the Greeks) and Asia Minor (by the Romans).

Major civilizations, with different cultural and linguistic features, settled in or conquered the Anatolian region. They include the Colchians, Hattians, Luwians, Hittites, Phrygians, Cimmerians, Ionian (Lydians, Carians, and Lycians), Persians, Celts, Greeks, Pelasgians, Armenians, Romans, Goths, Kurds, Byzantines, Seljuk Turks, and Ottomans. From recorded history, it is known that Anatolian peoples have spoken Indo-European and Semitic languages and, in addition, many languages whose origins have yet to be identified.

Neolithic settlements excavated during the second half of the 20th century include Cayonu, at the foot of the Taurus Mountains, thought to be where the pig was first domesticated, and Nevali Cori, in the upper Euphrates Valley, where the earliest life-size figures have been found, have begun to fill in significant gaps in our understanding of the development of civilizations and the technologies of early peoples. One of the most famous Neolithic sites in Turkey is Catal Hoyuk ("fork mound") in southern Anatolia, a large town built up of so many layers of human occupation that it became a large mound. There were no streets in Catal Huyuk. Its residents crammed their dwellings up against each other and entered them through holes in the roofs. The lower layers have been dated to around 7500 B.C.E., and constitute one of the most sophisticated Neolithic sites in the world.

Probably the first great civilization that dominated this region was that of the Hittites, a group of Indo-Europeans who controlled Anatolia from the Middle Bronze Age (1680–1180). The Hittites apparently referred to themselves as Hatti, and Hattusa was the center of their culture. The true Hatti, however, were a non-Indo-European people that occupied the same region until the beginning of the second millennium, and the Hittites may simply have adopted the Hattis' name for the area. At its peak the Hittite Empire covered from northwestern Syria to Ugarit and Mesopotamia down to Babylon. Around the end of the 12th century that empire began to crumble, leaving behind several city-states that survived until around the seventh century.

The settlement of Troy began during the Neolithic Age and continued into the Iron Age. So far about 12 occupations have been identified, beginning in the third millennium B.C.E. with Troy, a flourishing Bronze Age settlement that controlled the Dardanelles. Troy VI may have been destroyed by an earthquake around 1300, but no human remains have been found. Troy VIIa, with occupation dating to the mid- to late-13th century, is the most likely candidate for the Troy of the Homeric epics. Archaeologists think it was destroyed by war, and traces of a fire have been found. Not enough of the city has been excavated, however, to make certain identification. Two more recent layers appear to have both been destroyed by fire.

The Persians came along from the East, led by Cyrus, emperor of Persia (550–530). The Persians were followed by the Celts and then the Romans, whose rule produced peace and prosperity for close to three centuries, providing a perfect platform for spreading Christianity. From 250 C.E. the Roman Empire started to weaken but was later reconstituted by Constantine, who established his capital in the great city of Constantinople.

The next major milestone in the formation of Turkey was the emergence of Islamic dynasties. The armies of Islam, led by Muhammad (c. 570–632), having conquered everything from Mecca to Persia and Egypt, threatened the walls of Constantinople (669–78). Until this point most of Turkey's rulers had come from the West, but that changed with the arrival of the Great Seljuk Turkish Empire of the 11th century, the first to rule the area that comprises modern Turkey, Iran, and Iraq. The Seljuks were descendants of the Turkish people of East Asia and followed Islam.

The Mongols, and then the Ottomans, arrived in the region around 1300. The Ottomans ultimately created a new empire, taking Constantinople in 1453 and extending their rule through parts of Europe, the Middle East, and North Africa. Their empire finally crumbled at the end of World War I, when the Allies conquered most of their territory. After World War I the Ottoman general Mustafa Kemal, later known as Atatürk (1881–1938), led a nationalistic movement to oust the Greeks. On September 18, 1922, Turkey was granted liberation under the Treaty of Lausanne. With this the country's modern borders were established, and a secular, democratic government was created. On October 29, 1923, the Republic of Turkey was proclaimed. Atatürk became the first president, and moved the new republic's capital to Ankara.

Modern Turkey, a member of NATO since 1952, is more developed and secular than most of its neighbors to the east. But its aspirations to be a part of the European Union (EU) have been thwarted a number of times with a lot of doubt being cast on how democratic the country really is. This has been primarily due to an internal rift with the Kurds, who have been fighting for decades to attain autonomy. Added to this, the country is still reeling from the aftermath of a financial crisis generated by the lack of sound economic reforms. Turkey is now finally on its way to recovering from these problems and obstacles.

Fun Fact

Early literature often refers to the cities of Byzantium, Troy, and Midas. Homer's epics, The Iliad and The Odyssey, tell the story of the Greek siege of Troy and Odysseus' 10-year effort to return to his kingdom after the war had ended. More modern poets such as W. B. Yeats have used these cities symbolically to call up vast histories of triumph and decay (Sailing to Byzantium). Perhaps the most famous is the city of Troy, immortalized by the Trojan War, fought to retrieve the abducted Helen of Troy.

Turkish Kurds

Turkish Kurds have been at war with the Turkish authorities since the collapse of the Ottoman Empire in 1923. After the independent state of Turkey came into existence, ethnic Turks assumed power in the country, and the growing hatred between ethnic Turks and the Turkish Kurds manifested itself in the form of a separatist policy adopted by the government. Turkish officials asserted that there were no Kurds in Turkey, and the Kurdish language as well as the Kurdish way of life was banned. This sparked a series of guerilla attacks undertaken by separatist Kurds based in Iran, Iraq, and Syria. Since 1980 there have been intermittent clashes between the Kurds and the Turks; these continued into the 1990s. In 2004 there was large-scale Kurdish unrest in Syria.

Noah's Ark

During extensive excavation activities undertaken by archaeologists around Mt. Ararat in Turkey, the region was struck by an earthquake in 1948 and an ark, believed to be the biblical Noah's Ark, was exposed. After thorough investigation and corroborating evidence, such as comparing the length of the boat to the one mentioned in the Bible, it was put forward that Noah's Ark was not just biblical lore but a reality. A visitor's center has been opened near the Ark by the Turkish authorities to deal with the visitors who have been flocking to the region since the Ark's discovery. Turkish authorities affirmed in 1987 that the Ark was indeed Noah's.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Turkey is a large country located between Asia and Europe with three seas bordering it—the Black Sea, the Aegean Sea, and the Mediterranean Sea. Together, they create a total coastline of 5,282 miles. Turkey also shares its borders with Greece, Bulgaria, Georgia, Armenia, Iran, Iraq, and Syria. A land of diverse landscapes, Turkey not only has miles of coastline, but snow-topped mountains, valleys, and huge areas of barren land. The highest mountain is Mt. Ararat (16,916 feet), where Noah's Ark is believed to have rested after the great flood subsided. Turkey also has close to 430 lakes, the largest being Lake Van in Eastern Anatolia.

Although Turkey lies in a geographical region where climatic conditions are quite temperate, there are significant differences in climatic conditions from one region to another, mainly due to the diverse nature of the landscape and the existence of the mountains that run parallel to the coasts. Turkey can be divided into seven areas based on distinct geographic and climatic regions.

The countryside around Istanbul, Edirne, Bursa, and the Sea of Marmara is characterized by low hills and rolling farmland, with temperatures ranging from extremes of 3°F in winter to 104°F during summers. These areas are also quite humid.

The Aegean region, centered in the city of Izmir (formerly Smyrna, with a population close to two million), is full of low hills and higher mountains with fertile valleys full of rich alluvial soil. The summer Sun in this region is good for the crops of tobacco, sunflowers, olives, figs, peaches, pears, and apples grown here.

Turkey's southern shore is surrounded by high mountain ranges that remain very hot and humid in summer.

The center of Turkey is a high plateau (elevation 2,953 feet at Ankara) of rolling steppe framed by mountain ranges, some of which have snow-capped dormant volcanoes. The climate here is temperate with temperatures ranging from 30°F to 73°F.

Turkey's Black Sea coast, about 1,056 miles long, is lush and green. There is heavy rainfall in this region, and it is cloudy most of the time because of the winds crossing the Black Sea that rise into the coastal mountains.

Eastern Anatolia is mountainous, rugged, and chilly. This part of Turkey is an elemental place where temperatures drop to -49°F in deep winter, and rise to 100°F in summer, though the annual average is just 48° F.

Southeastern Anatolia, near Syria on the banks of the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, is hot most of the time. It is very dry, with only 23 inches of rainfall per year, but water from the gigantic Southeast Anatolia Project (GAP) irrigation and hydroelectric power system, centered near Sanliurfa, fulfills its needs.

Wildlife in Turkey is similar to that in the Balkans and most of Europe and consists of bears, deer, jackals, lynx, wild boar, wolves, and rare leopards. Bird life is exotic with squawking eagles, vultures, and storks as well as rare species such as the bald ibis.

❁ ECONOMY

Turkey's economy is a complex synthesis of modern industry and commerce mixed with traditional village agriculture and crafts. The government of Turkey is trying to promote growth and improve its economic scenario through structural reform measures, new tax laws, and accelerating the process of privatization. The most important industry in Turkey and also its largest in terms of exports—the textile and clothing industry—is almost completely controlled by private companies. Other parts of the private sector are also growing rapidly and becoming consistently stronger. However, there are still a lot of industries that are controlled by the state, especially the most basic ones like banking, transportation, and communications.

Another area the government is trying to strengthen is direct foreign investment in the country, which remains low. Some analysts say this is because potential investors are concerned about high inflation and the volatile political situation in Turkey. Although most of the country's trade is still with the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) countries, Turkey is trying to increase trade with other countries in the region as well.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Modern-day Turkey is a crossroads where the Orient meets the Occident. The amalgamation of cultures, beliefs, and ideas can clearly be seen in the country's art, literature, music, and architecture. All reflect the influences of the ancient Hittite civilization, the Romans, and the Byzantine, Seljuk, and Ottoman Empires. Turkish museums reflect the rich life led by the Ottomans. They are full of delicate colored tiles, graceful glass vases, carved wooden mosque doors, glittering illuminated versions of the Koran, intricate jewelry, and opulent costumes.

The Islamic influence on Turkish art and literature is seen clearly from the time of the Ottoman Empire on. Ottoman literature and court music were mainly religious, although both may sound gloomy and ostentatious to Western ears. There are no visual arts such as portraiture in the region, since they were curtailed by the Muslim dictum that forbids representation of any being "with an immortal soul." Therefore Islamic artists tended to favor the nonrepresentational arts. Ottoman arts, such as paper marbling and shadow puppet plays, are now enjoying a new popularity.

During the Ottoman Empire the introduction of a Roman-based Turkish alphabet brought literacy within the reach of many more citizens, and the direct consequence of this was that the use of courtly prose in the Ottoman Empire abated and use of the vernacular took over. Quite a few Turkish writers, including Nazim Hikmet, Yashar Kemal, and Orhan Pamuk have been read and appreciated worldwide. However, while Turkish is a simple and an elegant language, people across the world have found it difficult to learn due to the rules of word order and verb formation, which are very different from the Indo-European languages.

An integral part of Turkish jewelry is bracelets. An ancient form of adornment, they were originally a form of magic charm or talisman. They are made from wood, stone, and various metals including gold, silver, and copper. Carpet weaving is another art for which the Turks are known.

Folk music in Turkey has always been very lively. Turku music, the traditional folk music played with a modern urban slant, is very popular throughout the country. But here too there is a wide variety due to the various cultural mixes. For instance, lively Turkish folk music, which originated in the steppes of Asia, contrasts starkly with the refined Turkish classical music of the Ottoman court. The folk music tradition has been kept alive by the asiklar (troubadours) because, until recently, folk music was neither written nor recorded. It was an oral tradition passed down through generations of asiklar.

Very different from folk music is Ottoman military music, now performed by the mehter takimi (original military band) in Istanbul, which originated in Central Asia. This is played with kettledrums, clarinets, cymbals, and bells. Another form of music is that of the whirling dervishes called mevleviler, which has a mystical, haunting sound and is dominated by the reed pipe or ney. Apart from folk music, each region in Turkey is also known for its own special brand of folk dance and costume.

Ataturk had a lot to do with the change brought about in Turkey's cultural picture as well as its political structures. He encouraged representative painting, sculpture, literature, Western music (especially opera), dance, and drama.

The population of Turkey is 99 percent Muslim, predominantly Sunni with Shiites and Alawites in the east and southeast, so many Turkish customs and practices are derived from Islamic practices. Turkish etiquette demands that one wear modest clothing and remove one's shoes when entering mosques. There are still many conservative Islamic areas where women cover their heads, arms, and shoulders and wear modest dresses or skirts, preferably reaching to the knees, and sometimes the ankles among more conservative groups. Other Turkish customs generally concern manners, to the extent that modern-day Turks complain about how one cannot even get out of the door without going through at least five minutes of a fixed set of civilities.

Traditional sports in Turkey involve a lot of daring, or strength and agility, the most famous ones being yagli gures, or oil wrestling, in which the participants douse themselves with olive oil, and cirit oyunu, a game played with javelins and involving horsemanship and camel fights.

Turkey has a wide variety of folk dances that are performed in different regions of the country. Kasik Oyunu (the spoon dance) is performed in the regions of Silifke and Konya in Turkey. Beautifully dressed men and women perform the dance by holding wooden spoons in their hands and producing the musical rhythm by striking the spoons together. Horon is a dance of the Black Sea region and is performed only by men who dress themselves in black attire with silver trimmings and dance to the tune of the kemence (violin). Another male dance is the kilic kalkan (the sword and shield dance), in which men, dressed as Ottoman soldiers, dance to the tune of clashing shields and swords to celebrate the victory of the Ottoman Turks.

Fun Fact

Cherries originated in Turkey and are still grown in abundance, as are hazelnuts (filberts), of which Turkey supplies half the world's needs.

Turkish Bracelets

It was an ancient Turkish belief that bracelets, apart from their ornamental function, also have medicinal properties. For instance, it was believed that bloodstones embedded on a bracelet helped to stop bleeding, whereas agate, a sacred Turkish stone, protected weavers against the bites of venomous creatures. A copper bracelet was believed to provide relief from joint pains, and many people who suffer from arthritis in the 21st century wear copper bracelets.

Fun Fact

The beautiful Turkish Van cat is found here. It has pure white fur, and its eyes are two different colors—one blue and one green.

One interesting aspect of Turkish culture is that, despite the restrictions of Islam, some scenes stand in contrast to the modesty of women mentioned earlier. Some historians subscribe to the view that belly dancing originated in Turkey and nomadic gypsies later spread it throughout the region. Nightclubs are the most common venues and the dancer is usually a woman with a well-shaped body. Belly dancers are even hired to perform at weddings or other social gatherings. The dancers are usually scantily clad and move around the audience while dancing. During the dance, when the dancer comes close, observers, invariably men, put money into the dancer's costume as a mark of appreciation of the dance. At a social gathering, men from the audience also participate in the dancing sometimes.

☼ CUISINE

Turkey offers a wide variety of culinary delicacies. Dough made from wheat flour forms the crux of Turkish food and is represented by a wide variety of breads, such as ekmek (white bread), pide (flat bread), and simit (sesame seed rings). Other dishes made from wheat dough include borek (pastry) and manti (wheat dumplings stuffed with meat). The latter is served with melted butter, paprika, and garlic-flavored yogurt. Pilaf (also known as pilav; grain cooked in a seasoned broth) is also favored among Turks, and the most popular among them are rice pilaf and bulgur (cracked wheat) pilaf. In Turkey, people cook their vegetables in olive oil. Stuffed vegetables, known as dolma, are very popular; they may be stuffed with either rice or meat.

Fun Fact

Turks refer to raki (aniseed-flavored grape brandy) as the "lion's drink" since they believe that one must be as strong as a lion to drink it. Turks also enjoy bottled fruit juices and boza, a thick fermented drink made from wheat.

Turkey is also famous for kebabs (grilled or stewed plain or marinated meat) and lamb-based kebabs, such as doner kebab (grilled lamb) and sis kebab (lamb pieces skewered and grilled over charcoal) are local favorites. At the end of a meal, muballebi desserts (eggless puddings made with rice flour and starch made without any butter) are often served.

Tea, coffee, raki (anise-flavored drink), beer, and wine are the preferred beverages in Turkey. On special occasions, some people drink alcoholic beverages.

☼ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world and generally begin the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). New Year's Eve celebrations for a typical Turkish family include a special dinner, with close friends and the family getting together to celebrate. People wish each other the best for the coming year and children receive presents. New Year's Day is quieter and a day of rest; all offices, businesses, and educational institutions are closed.

Formerly, Turks spent New Year's Eve at home, but nowadays more and more people can be seen enjoying themselves at open-air parties and as the clock strikes midnight fireworks light up the night sky.

☼ NAVRUZ

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 21

Navruz, also spelled Norouz, Nowruz, or Nevruz, marks the first day of the year in the Old Persian calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day by Central Asian Turks, Anatolian Turks, and Iranians. Navruz is a Persian word that means "new day" (nev, "new," ruz, "day"). This day is also the first day of spring, the vernal equinox, when days and nights are the same length. In ancient times poets presented Navruziye, a collection of ghazal (a Persian verse form of seven couplets written in praise of the emperor) or kaside (an Arabic verse form with rhyming couplets) poetry dedicated to the sultans to mark Navruz.

A number of interesting traditions and customs are associated with Navruz in Turkey. In many parts of Turkey on the night of Navruz, young men who want to get married eat half a tuzlu gyllyk, a special pastry made from salted wheat dough. After eating this salty dough, they do not drink water and go to bed thirsty, believing that they will marry the woman who offers them water in their dreams. On the following day they place the remaining half of the tuzlu gyllyk on the roof or chimney of their homes. If a crow takes the dough and flies away with it to another rooftop to eat it, then the man will marry the daughter who lives in that house. But if the crow grabs the pastry and flies away without stopping, the man will marry a woman from a faraway land.

In the Kars region in Turkey on the evening of Navruz it is the custom for young unmarried men and women to gather at someone's house and send a child to fetch a bucket of water. After the bucket of Which Children's Day?

In 1925, a meeting of the World Conference for the Well-Being of Children, held in Geneva, Switzerland, declared June 1 the day to celebrate International Children's Day (ICD).

Then on November 20, 1954, the UN General Assembly recommended that all nations should observe a universal Children's Day, to promote the welfare of all the children in the world. November 20 also marks the day in 1959 when the assembly adopted the Declaration of the Rights of the Child, and on November 20, 1989, the Convention on the Rights of the Child was adopted. To make the situation more confusing, McDonald's, the fast-food giant, instituted World Children's Day, also observed on November 20, to raise funds for Ronald McDonald House Charities; in 2002 UNICEF agreed to merge Universal Children's Day with McDonald's fund-raiser.

Japan also has a claim: In 1948 Japan declared Children's Day a national holiday to be observed early in May. It is a festive holiday when parents pray for the future health and happiness of their children and take them out to fly kites. In addition Japan celebrates the Children's Festival, now called Kodomo Hi, which was originally the Boy's Festival (Tango-no-Sekku). The equivalent holiday for girls was called the Doll Festival.

There is also an International Children's Day (also ICD) cosponsored by UNICEF and the International Academy of Television Arts and Sciences, celebrated on the second Sunday in December, and an International Children's Book Day. Other countries celebrate some version of Children's Day on different dates and with varying customs. Aotearoa (New Zealand), for example, celebrates the nation's children on October 30.

water has been brought back, the men toss colored threads into the bucket, and the women throw in pins. It is believed that those whose threads and pins become entangled will marry each other.

✿ NATIONAL SOVEREIGNTY AND CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 23

On April 23, 1920, during the War of Independence, Turkey's Grand National Assembly met in Ankara and began deliberations to develop plans for an independent, secular, and modern republic. The founder of the Turkish Republic, Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, dedicated April 23 to the children of the country to emphasize that they are the future of the new nation.

Each year children in Turkey celebrate Sovereignty and Children's Day as a national holiday. Weeklong ceremonies mark this occasion, and events are staged that the entire nation enjoys. On this day children send their representatives to replace state officials and high-ranking bureaucrats. The president, the prime minister, the cabinet ministers, and provincial governors, all turn over their positions to the children's representatives, who sign executive orders relating to educational and environmental policies. Legislators are also replaced in the Grand National Assembly by children and they hold a special session to discuss and debate their issues.

In an effort to internationalize this day, the Turkish government often invited delegates of children from all over the world to participate in the celebrations. Apparently this effort was successful, because there are now many "children's days."

✿ ATATURK COMMEMORATION AND YOUTH AND SPORTS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 19

This holiday marks the beginning of the War of Independence for the Turkish nation: On this date in 1919 Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder and first president of the Republic of Turkey, arrived in Anatolia at the Black Sea Port of Samsun and began agitating to obtain independence for Turkey.

During his tenure as president, Ataturk declared May 19 as the nation's Youth and Sports Holiday. In 1983 the government of Turkey started Youth Week, when youth between the ages of 12 and 24 gather in their cities, towns, and villages to participate in cultural, sports, and artistic activities.

Fun Fact

No one knows why June 1 was chosen as the ICD: One theory claims June 1 was chosen because the Chinese consul-general in San Francisco had invited several Chinese orphans to celebrate the Dragon Boat Festival in 1925, which happened to fall on June 1 that year, coinciding with the Geneva conference.

Fun Fact

In Turkish, bayram means “feast” or “holiday,” and kurban means “sacrifice.”

This is believed to foster a spirit of unity among youth and bring them closer to their culture.

✿ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 30

It was on this day in 1922 that the Independence War was decided in favor of the Turks.

This was the fifth day of the big attack against the invading Greek armies; under the command of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, the Turks defeated the Greeks at Izmir.

The founder of the Republic of Turkey, Atatürk is remembered on this day at a ceremony held at Anıtkabir, where his mausoleum is located. The day is also marked by a number of ceremonies and events organized in Atatürk’s honor, especially at the Atatürk Culture Center in Ankara.

✿ REPUBLIC DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 29

This is the anniversary of the declaration of the Turkish Republic by the Turkish Grand National Assembly in 1923. On this day Atatürk announced the establishment of the Turkish Republic; it celebrates the transformation of Turkey from the Ottoman Empire to the Turkish Republic. The festivities begin with major government bodies like the Land Forces War Academy, the Governor’s Office, and the Turkish Armed Services (TSK) laying wreaths at the Atatürk statues located in Ulus, the parliament, at Sıhhiye, the Atatürk Forestry Farm, and at Atatürk’s Mausoleum.

All state offices display the Turkish flag or Atatürk’s portrait. Local municipality and state officials all over the country also mark the day with celebrations.

Fun Fact

Yaglı gures, or oil wrestling, is the Turkish national sport. Every July, wrestling championships are held in Kırkpınar, where, to make the contest tougher, the wrestlers smear themselves with oil.

God replaced the child with a ram. The day is observed to remember Ibrahim’s willingness to make such a sacrifice and to emulate the virtue of generous giving.

Following this tradition the head of each Turkish household sacrifices a sheep on the morning of the first day of this four-day feast. A lavish meal is made from the meat, which is enjoyed with friends and family, and the excess meat and the hide are given to charity.

It is to be noted that, since the dates of these religious festivals change according to the Muslim lunar calendar, the date of the festival is 11 days earlier on the Western calendar each year.

✿ ASHURA

Observed by: Muslims
Observed on: Tenth of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar

Ashura, also known as Asure Gunu in Turkey, as well as Aashurah or the Day of Judgment, marks the martyrdom of Hussein bin Ali (d. 680), Muhammad’s grandson, and the third Shia imam, at the Battle of Karbala in 680 C.E. The word ashura means “ten” in Arabic; the holiday’s name means “the tenth day.” After the two eids, Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha, Ashura is the third most important Islamic festival because the Battle of Karbala was a watershed in the history of Islam: It was fought between Sunni and Shia Muslims over who was to be Muhammad’s legitimate heir to the leadership of Islam.

Shia Muslims consider Hussein the true successor to Muhammad. For them Ashura is a somber 10-day event, and every evening for 10 days imams whip the faithful into frenzies of guilt and breast-beating. Plays depicting the death of Hussein bin Ali are often enacted, with as much elaboration as can be managed. On the first day of Muharram, men put on their mourning clothes and do not shave or bathe. The culminating events of the 10-day observance are processions of Shia men in which some of the more devout practice self-mortification, and express their grief by beating their chests, flagellating themselves with iron chains, and cutting themselves with swords to show their willingness to sacrifice themselves. In this way they would atone for being too much like the Kufans, who failed to support their would-be leader and allowed him to be butchered by the caliph Yazid.

For some Sunni Muslims, Ashura is also commemorated, but it is observed as only a single day of austerity and fasting because the Sunni mark it as a day to recall important biblical events: the day Nuh (Noah) left the Ark and the day that Musa (Moses) was rescued from the Egyptians by God. They also believe that when the Day of Judgment comes, it will be on Ashura.

❁ HIDRELLEZ DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 6

Hidrellez Day is a religious festival that commemorates the day on which the Islamic prophet Hizir (the most revered Muslim saint in Turkey) met another Islamic (and biblical) prophet Ilyas (Elijah) for the first time on Earth. Both are the patron saints of travelers, and it is believed that during their meeting they identified both the provinces where they would be known as the patron saints of travelers and the specific areas in which they would rescue travelers from any harm at the last minute. Elijah is regarded as the protector of people who travel by land, while Hizir is the protector of people who travel by sea. Following their meeting it is believed they embarked on a pilgrimage to Mecca. This holiday is also known as Hizir-Ilyas Day or Ruz-I Hizir (Day of Hizir).

❁ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

Eid al-Fitr, the Feast of Fast-Breaking, immediately follows the end of Ramadan (or Ramazan), the month when all devout Muslims must fast from dawn to dusk. The fast is the fourth of the Five Pillars of Islam. It brings home to them the pain of hunger and thirst so that they know from firsthand experience what the less fortunate around them endure. The most important night of Ramadan is Lailat al-Qadr—the day Muhammad received his first revelation from the angel Gabriel. Muslims believe that on this night all their prayers will be answered.

Eid al-Fitr is a three-day national holiday in Turkey, also called Seker Bayrami (Candy Festival) or Eid es-Seghir in Arabic. Fasting during this observance is forbidden by the Koran. A period of celebration and thanksgiving, this holiday begins as soon as the new Moon has been sighted in Saudi Arabia. Muslims demonstrate their gratitude for their physical well-being, strength, and the opportunities Allah has given them. Apart from celebrating the end of their fast, they thank Allah for the spiritual strength he gave them to practice self-discipline during the austere month of Ramadan. It is also a time to overlook old bitterness and forgive others.

❁ CAMEL WRESTLING FESTIVAL

Observed on: January

Once a practice prevalent in most of Turkey, camel-wrestling is now restricted to a few regions near the Aegean Sea. Elaborately saddled bull camels wrestle each other in a contest for precedence in the herd and, more importantly, precedence in mating a young cow camel paraded in front of its male counterparts to lure them. Once the defeated camel runs away, the triumphant camel charges toward the crowd, and the spectators must scramble hurriedly out of the way. Both owners and spectators at this event make large bets, even though, for spectators especially, it is difficult to tell which camel will be the stronger contestant.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Turkey after a woman becomes pregnant, she is given a golden bracelet by her mother-in-law. After the birth of the child, family members and well-wishers present gold and other gifts to the mother and the newborn. Traditionally a woman cannot leave her house for 40 days following the delivery; such isolation is thought to protect her from evil eyes. During the first three days after delivery, only family members and close relatives can visit, while friends and neighbors are allowed to enter the house after the end of the three-day period.

In the Anatolia region of Turkey, the planting of a tree marks the birth of a child. At the birth of a girl child, saplings of apple, chestnut, or mulberry trees are planted; on the birth of a baby boy, pine or poplar trees are planted. Turks believe that the planting of trees for boys is an investment that will be used at the time of his marriage (since the trees will be commercially valuable when they mature).

Children's names are generally inspired by the time they are born; for example Safak (dawn), Ramazan (the holy month), or Bahar (spring), or by the events surrounding their birth, such as Tufan (storm) and Yagmur (rain). If parents want the child to be their last, they name him or her Songul (last rose) or Yeter (enough). Some Turks also name their children after a respected elderly family member.

During the naming ceremony, the imam holds the child in the direction of Mecca and reads a passage from the Koran in the left ear of the child. Then he repeats the chosen name three times in the right ear.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is an integral part of Turkey's Islamic society. It marks the official introduction of a boy into the religious community. It is also believed that the ritual completes the transformation of a young boy to an adult. In Turkey licensed surgeons perform the surgery on young Muslim boys between the ages of 2 and 14 years. After the circumcision ceremony special celebrations are planned, including a lavish banquet, and special invitations are sent to relatives, friends, and neighbors to join in the celebrations.

On the day of the ceremony the boy wears a suit, a scepter, cape, and a fez with the message Mashallah ("Allah preserve him") written on it. He embarks on a city tour in a large convoy of cars or horses, along with children of the assembled guests and musicians. On his return he changes into a long white dress and is circumcised. During the ceremony a close relative keeps him company and becomes his kirve (a function similar to that of a godparent). In Turkish society the kirve shares equal rights with the father of the child in making decisions about his life. Also the young boy cannot marry the daughter of the kirve because they are now related.

❁ MARRIAGE

In Turkey legal status is granted only to civil marriages that take place in the presence of state authorities. However, many Turks prefer to have a religious as well as a civil ceremony. Turkish marriage celebrations can last from four to seven days. Elaborate celebrations take place in the homes of the bride and the groom.

Fun Fact

Verbs can be so complex in the Turkish language that they constitute whole sentences in themselves. For example, Afyonkarahisarlılastiramadiklarimizdanmisiniz? can be translated as, "Aren't you one of those people whom we tried—unsuccessfully—to make resemble the citizens of Afyonkarahisar?"

The couple is not allowed to see each other before the wedding ceremony because it is considered bad luck for them to do so.

On the night before the wedding, henna is applied to the hands of the bride-to-be; the event is known as Kına Gecesi (“henna night”). The bridegroom’s family presents the bride with dry henna, which is placed in copper or silver vessels. Then her female relatives place a red veil over the bride’s head and escort her to the center of the room amid folk songs and songs about marriage. Gold coins are placed on her hands before the henna is applied. This is done to bless her with prosperity and good luck. On one hand henna is applied by basi butun, a happily married woman with children (with no history of separation, divorce, or childlessness); a close friend applies henna to the other.

In religious Turkish weddings, the imam presides over the wedding and asks the bride and groom (separately) three times if they are entering into holy matrimony of their own free will. After a positive response from both individuals, the imam and two witnesses from both sides sign the marriage certificate, and the newlyweds are congratulated. On the morning after her wedding, the bride returns to her parental home to meet her family and friends.

❁ DEATH

The Turks follow a solemn burial ritual. After death the body of the deceased is carefully laid on a bed in a separate room with the head facing in the direction of Mecca. According to Islamic belief the burial ritual should take place during the daytime. But if a person expires in the late afternoon, then the burial ritual takes place on the next day. The death is announced from a minaret. A passage from the Koran is read, and the name of the deceased, the hour of the funeral, and the place where it will be held are also announced.

On the day of the funeral, the body of the deceased is cleansed, draped in a white shroud, and placed in a wooden coffin covered with a green cloth. Male members of the family carry the coffin on their shoulders and place it on a table kept in the courtyard of the mosque. Women, however, are not allowed to take part in the burial ritual. After the final prayers are said, the deceased is buried, and a tombstone is placed over the grave.

Special commemorative services marked by mevlit (readings from the Koran) take place on the seventh and 52nd days after death. Many people also feed the poor and needy in memory of the deceased.

Introduction

❧ HISTORY

Archaeological excavations near the Caspian Sea indicate that human civilization existed in Turkmenistan as early as the Stone Age. Tools have been discovered that suggest that the early inhabitants knew the art of pottery and made metal tools. It is also believed that the early tribes traded with other regions of Central Asia. Carbon dating of artifacts and mummies found at various sites along the Silk Road (a major trade route in the ancient world) indicate that this route may have been used for trade between Asia and the West as early as 3000 B.C.E. Turkmenistan, located on the Central Asian steppes, must certainly have been engaged in commerce. The country's location, however, also made it a popular stopover for armies on their way to more enriching conquests.

Alexander the Great conquered the territory in the fourth century B.C.E. on his way to India. One hundred and fifty years later Persia's Parthian Kingdom established its capital in Nisa, an area now located in the suburbs of the modern-day capital of Ashgabat. (Large-scale archaeological excavations have gradually been unearthing Nisa since the last decade of the 20th century, revealing the city's structure and artifacts, including a clay face identified as Mithradates I [c. 195–38] or II [c. 123–88].) In the seventh century C.E. Arabs conquered this region, bringing with them Islam and incorporating the Turkmen into Middle Eastern culture.

The Oguz, the ancestors of modern-day Turkmen, migrated from Eastern to Central Asia and established their empire in Turkmenistan in the 11th century. It was called the Seljuk (or Selçuk) Empire; its capital was at Merv. The tribes lived in the northern region of the Kopetdag Mountains. Over time, they came to be known as Turkmen, derived from the name Turk, which in turn originated from the Gokturks, who had established the first Turkic state around 552 C.E. in Central Asia. In the second half of the 12th century the Seljuk Empire collapsed when the Mongol king Genghis Khan (1162–1227) invaded the region. After his death in 1227 the Mongols lost their hold in the region and, for the next seven centuries, competing empires ruled the Turkmen, and various tribes fought over territories.

The region was devastated by the rampant kidnapping of innocent travelers by the Turkmen in order to feed the slave trade. At the same time the Russian Empire was expanding, and the Czar of Russia sent an expedition to Turkmenistan. In 1716, the Turkmen murdered some of the members of the expedition, and Russia retreated. However, Russia sent expeditions to Turkmenistan again in the second half of the 19th century, and after a conflict, which lasted for five years, Russia finally succeeded in annexing the areas of Bukhara and Khiva in 1868. The people of the western region, who wanted independence from the Muslims, gladly joined the Russians. Although the eastern and southern Turks resisted the invasion, by 1885 Russia had established its control over the entire region.

During World War I an uprising in Turkmenistan in 1916 led to the defeat of the Russians at Khiva. The ensuing unrest and strife over the next few years culminated in Turkmenistan becoming a member of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) in 1924. During the succeeding decades the Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic remained one of the Soviet Union's most isolated republics. In the late 1980s many of the Soviet republics were trying to free themselves from the USSR's domination. After the dissolution of the USSR, Turkmenistan proclaimed its independence in 1991. Saparmurat Nijazov (b. 1940), the former leader of the Communists, became the country's first president, and in 1999 the parliament extended his term indefinitely.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Turkmenistan is bound by the Caspian Sea in the west and the Amu-Darya River in the east. It shares borders with Iran and Afghanistan to the south, Uzbekistan to the north and east, and Kazakhstan to the north. The great Karakum Desert covers over 80 percent of the country. The eastern region is largely a plateau where the terrain is mostly sandy. The Kopetdag range of mountains, with its foothills and plateaus, runs from Turkmenistan into Iran, and is an earthquake-prone area. The highest point in Turkmenistan is Mt. Ayrybaba (10,299 feet).

Turkmenistan has a subtropical climate. Summers last from May to September and are hot and dry, with temperatures hardly lower than 95°F, while in winter the temperatures fall as low as -27°F. Turkmenistan receives hardly any rainfall.

In the southern mountains there are ancient forests of wild walnut and pistachio trees. Turkmenistan's wildlife is composed of leopards, porcupines, gazelles, sand rats, jerboas (small jumping rodents), and crocodiles. The region is also known for poisonous snakes such as vipers and cobras.

❁ ECONOMY

Turkmenistan is largely a desert area and barely 4 percent of the land area is arable. This includes the irrigated oases. In the past one-half of its irrigated land was planted with cotton, and Turkmenistan was the 10th largest producer of cotton. In recent years, however, poor harvests have led to a decline in cotton exports. The other major crops are grains and fodder crops.

The oil and gas industry in Turkmenistan is quite specialized; natural gas and petroleum are principal exports. Other exports include chemicals, processed foods, and minerals. The country's major trading partners are Ukraine, Iran, Turkey, Russia, and Germany. Turkmenistan imports food and beverages, textiles, and machinery. The carpet industry of the country is an important traditional sector that adds to the gross domestic product (GDP).

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Even though Turkmenistan is predominantly a Sunni Muslim country, the people have the freedom to practice other religions if they desire. Most Turkmen holidays reflect ancient traditions brought down to the present day and observe events specific to their way of life and habits that have enabled them to survive.

The most festive holidays are those concerned with various aspects of family life, although many other traditions and rituals related to it are solemn as

Fun Fact

In Turkmen communities, some days are believed to be successful (sehetli gun), for example, the 7th, 14th, and 21st days of each month or unsuccessful (sehetlsiz gun).

Fragi Makhtumkuli

Poet and thinker Fragi Makhtumkuli is regarded as the father of Turkmen literature. He was born in an area southwest of Turkmenistan, which now forms part of Iran. Makhtumkuli was something of a tragic figure, trapped in a loveless marriage. His two young sons died due to illness, and later in life all his work was not only seized by the Persians, but, as he stood watching, the camel on which his precious manuscripts were loaded lost its footing and fell into a river to be swept away. Makhtumkuli based his writing on homespun wisdom, and his works were characterized by their simple language, the main reason for his popularity with traveling bards. His popularity and influence were so great that no other Turkmen writer or poet has managed to come out of his shadow.

Carpet Making

The first thing that comes to mind when one thinks of Turkmenistan's art is fine carpets. Turkmen rugs and carpets are known all over the world and for the Turkmen, carpet making brings as much national pride as the pyramids do for Egyptians. It is one of the oldest arts in Turkmenistan, having begun as early as the sixth century B.C.E., and the designs have more or less remained the same. It took hundreds of years for these designs, which mainly depict the nomadic lifestyle of the Turkmen, to develop. The ornaments are geometric and traditionally deep red in color. As the art of carpet weaving has been passed down from generation to generation, the style has been kept intact. There are five traditional carpet designs and they have been incorporated in the country's state emblem and flag. For Turkmen nomads, the carpets were extremely important because they covered wagon floors and were used to form collapsible walls, protecting them from the cold. Modern technological changes have been adopted into the weaving process but, like their ancestors, the Turkmen carpet weavers still prefer to use natural dyes and Sargin sheep wool (the smoothest).

well. These ancient customs have been preserved in the holidays as they are still observed.

While most celebrations may have some elements of religiosity, they are primarily communal or tribal observances, for example, family holidays that celebrate the birth of a son (ogul toyu) or the construction of a new house or yurt (tam toyu or ey toyu). Turkmen living by rivers or along the shore of the Caspian Sea celebrate the purchase or construction of a new boat, Nav toyu.

Tribal loyalties, some of which are centuries old, are still observed, and tribal practices predominate, especially in the more remote regions. Still, urban Turkmen follow their tribal customs, and each tribe may have its own unique manner of celebrating even those holidays that are nationwide observances, for example, Navruz. Each tribe can be easily distinguished by dialect, style of clothing, jewelry, and the patterns woven into their carpets. Carpets are the essence of Turkmen culture and the art of carpet weaving is centuries old.

Guests have a special status in Turkmen culture. There is a saying that a guest (meeomon) is more honored than a grandfather, and hosts spread out lavish feasts for their guests and insist that the guest eat everything.

Turkmen can be easily identified because of their telpek—big sheepskin hats. Their traditional attire also includes baggy pants, knee-length boots, and a cotton overcoat. Women wear heavy ankle-length dresses of silk with trousers. The women always tie their hair and cover it with a scarf.

Turkmen music is basically nomadic and rural. Nomadic singers, called baksby, are also healers and magicians and sing to the accompaniment of musical instruments such as the dutar (a two-stringed lute). Fragi Makhtumkuli (1770–1840) is called the father of Turkmen literature.

CUISINE

Meat is a vital ingredient in most dishes of the Turkmen. The meat of sheep, camel, mountain goat, quail, and pheasant is consumed. Sometimes the meat is roasted in a clay oven or fried or cooked on skewers over hot coals. Pilaf—made with rice or bulgur (cracked wheat)—is another favorite dish, although the meat of game birds is sometimes used instead of mutton or lamb. Gaynatma is a popular soup made from young camel meat and is served with patyr (dry bread). Turkmen living on the Caspian Sea include fish in their diet. A popular dish is balyk kaurdak, prepared by frying fish in its own fat in a cauldron.

Surprisingly Turkmen cuisine also features quite a few vegetarian dishes like herb-filled pastries and cornmeal pancakes. Porridges made of beans, cornmeal, and pumpkin, or of rice, milk, and yogurt are also popular.

Turkmen use a good deal of milk in their food, including butter and cheese, and the most exotic drink of Turkmenistan, chal, is made by mixing warm milk with a fermenting agent; after sitting for 48 hours it turns into a sour, aerated drink.

NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, starting on New Year's Eve. In Turkmenistan, it is a national holiday, and schools and offices are closed.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 12

This day is observed to remember the southern and eastern Turkmen killed in the 1881 battle with the Russians at Geok-Tepe, near Ashgabat. This was the time when Russia was sending military expeditions to Turkmenistan, and most Turkmen, who desperately wanted to escape from the domination of the Khans and Shahs of Persia, took the side of the Russians. However, the southern and eastern areas resisted the Russian advances. These war heroes fought against Russian annexation for two years. The Russians eventually besieged Geok-Tepe, capturing it as well as Ashkhabad (modern-day Ashgabat).

On this day, the Turkmen remember their war heroes by laying wreaths at war memorials and a patriotic fervor grips the entire nation.

❁ NATIONAL FLAG DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 19

National Flag Day was celebrated for the first time in Turkmenistan in 1997. The country adopted its new flag on this day. This day is celebrated with various concerts and performances, and the leaders of other countries congratulate the head of state. This event is also marked with military parades and other festivities.

Special presentations and lectures about how women's lives can be improved are held on this day.

❁ NAVRUZ

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 21

Navruz, Nov Ruz Bairam, Nevruz, Novruz, or Noruz marks the first day of the Old Persian calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day in many countries. Nevruz is a Persian word, which means "new day" (nev, "new"; ruz, day), and Bairam means "festival." On the Old Persian calendar, this day is also the beginning of the spring season. This holiday has ancient pagan roots and is connected to the worship of the renewal of nature, fertility, and agriculture. This festival is of Zoroastrian origin and dates back thousands of years; the Zoroastrian religion is thought to be the oldest monotheistic religion in the world.

Among Turkmen this ancient spring festival has been celebrated since the early 20th century. Celebrations here are less enthusiastic than in some neighboring countries, and not all groups observe Navruz in the same way. Some Turkmen ignore the holiday altogether, while others go through the motions, thinking of it as a good deed (yulin, sylagi) that may count toward getting them into paradise. The Tekin, Yomud, Ersarin, Salyri, and Saryk tribes, cattle breeders who are now a majority of the country's population, sometimes celebrate Navruz indifferently or not at all, whereas the agrarian tribes—the Alilin, Mahinlin, Murchelin, Nohurlin, Anaulin, and others settled along the Amudarya River—have ancient agricultural traditions and celebrate Navruz with great enthusiasm and festivities. The traditions associated with Navruz have been preserved only in the settled groups of Turkmen who live in northern Khorasan.

In some areas of Turkmenistan, Navruz has become an Islamic version of the ancient vernal equinox celebrations. Those who celebrate it prepare for the three-day festival by cleaning and renovating their homes. Special sweets and dishes are prepared, notably Navruz keje—a millet gruel cereal with meat boiled in huge kettles, and Navruz yarma—a sweet ritual meal of wheat sprouts and sugar. In other regions the holiday celebrations are closely connected to the season. In southern Turkmenistan two winter dates are observed before the vernal equinox: the long 40-day Uly chille, which lasts from December 20 to January 30, and the short 40-day Kichi chille, which lasts only 22 days—from February 1 to 22. (February 22 is considered the last day of winter.) For those living at the Atek oasis, Navruz is a three-day holiday and the last day of the festival, March 23, is known as Ahir Navruzi. In other areas Navruz traditions are determined by the activities of the season.

In the southeast Turkmen observe two distinct Navruz periods: one related to breeding cattle, Charva Navruzi, celebrated on February 22, and a longer one related to agriculture, Ypek Navruzi, which starts on March 17 and lasts until March 22. The Persian-speaking population of south and southeastern Turkmenistan, including the Kurds, celebrates the new year's holiday as Navruzi Eid. People arrange open-air fairs, build swings, cook various dishes, and even paint eggs. On Navruz they boil a meat soup of wheat barley and dress it with yellow raisins and other dried fruits. During this holiday, people visit their friends and relatives and bring food with them. Music, plays, traditional games, sports, beauty contests, poetry nights, and

Eid al-Adha, the Feast of Sacrifice (also called Kurban Bairam or Eid ul-Kurboon in Turkmenistan), is a very important festival for Muslims all over the world because on this day Ibrahim (Abraham) agreed to sacrifice his young son in accordance with God's command. Muslims honor Ibrahim for his willingness to do God's will.

In Turkmenistan this festival is celebrated for four days. Muslim families slaughter a fattened sheep and prepare an elaborate feast for friends and family members, and special prayer services are conducted in mosques all over the country. Turkmen Muslims also visit the graves of their ancestors and pray for them on this day.

In this month Muslims also undertake the pilgrimage, or hajj, to Mecca. It is the duty of every Muslim, when possible, to go to the sacred city at least once in his or her lifetime. It is the Fifth Pillar of Islam's Five Pillars.

❁ CARPET DAY

Observed in: Turkmenistan

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Last Sunday of May

Turkmenistan celebrates Carpet Day on the last Sunday of May. Carpet making is one of the ancient traditions of Turkmenistan. The art of carpet weaving traditionally was passed from one generation to the next. Turkmen carpets were world renowned in the past. Marco Polo (1254–1324), the famous traveler, wrote about the carpets produced in this region.

For the nomadic Turkmen, the carpet was the only piece of furniture worth possessing. Easily transportable, the carpets served not just as floor coverings, but as wall linings for the yurt ("tent"), providing a highly decorative form of insulation. On this day, there are theater performances and carpet exhibitions in Ashgabat. The different handicraft items of Turkmenistan are showcased in several cities of the country. Folk games, rituals, dancing, and music are an integral part of this day's celebrations.

❁ HARVEST FESTIVAL

Harvest Festival, also known as Harman toyu or Hasil toyu, is normally celebrated on the last Sunday of November. This important agricultural festival celebrates the harvest of the grain crop, and entire villages participate. Members of the farming community collectively cultivate the land and sell a portion of cereals from the harvested amount.

The Turkmen bake flat cakes from the freshly harvested grain to mark the occasion. They pay their respects to the wind god Mirhaidar as they thresh the grain, by placing a stick with donkey or horse dung attached to the edge on the windward side of the barn (the animals are used to thresh the grain).

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

On the 40th day after the birth of a Turkmen child, the baby is given a ritualistic bath using 40 wheat grains and 40 bits of ram's droppings. At one time, due to the lack of medical facilities and unhygienic conditions, very few Turkmen infants survived after they were born. Hence big celebrations are held 40 days after a child is born and considered to be a survivor and a healthy baby. Bakshy—traveling folksingers and shamans, who are also healers and magicians—are summoned to perform during the celebrations.

All Turkmen children use a special triangular-shaped talisman made of cloth (doga) to protect them

Fun Fact

It is easy to differentiate an unmarried woman from a married one in Turkmenistan by seeing her hairstyle. Unmarried women have two braids and a small scarf; married women have one braid and a big kerchief.

Fun Fact

In each Turkmenistan village there are women whose profession is performing wedding songs.

Turkmen Deaths and Trees

Turkmens believe that there is a tree in heaven on which every leaf belongs to someone on Earth. When the leaf falls, the person dies. They also believe that, when an old tree dies, it corresponds to the death of an old man; if the tree was young, then a young person must have died somewhere. Turkmens also believe that when people die, their spirits reside in trees. Small babies are viewed as creatures completely belonging to nature. If they die babies are wrapped in birch bark, and their bodies are hung on trees.

from evil spirits. Salt, camel hair, seeds, earth, and paper pieces inscribed with prayers are carried in these dogas. These talismans are sewn onto the child's clothing.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision, a ritual performed at puberty, is a Turkmenistan tradition. The Muslims in Turkmenistan believe that by undergoing this ritual a boy becomes a man. Trained elders use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments to perform the circumcision, without administering any anesthetic. This practice enjoys social backing, and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations follow this coming-of-age ritual.

❁ MARRIAGE

Turkmen marriages are often arranged by parents or matchmakers. A suitable date is fixed for the wedding ceremony. People are not invited personally for Turkmen weddings; instead the village crier announces the event to the whole village and invites them all. One important custom still practiced is the ransom for the bride, or kalom. Depending on the region and the family's wealth, the bride's family demands huge sums of money from the groom in return for the bride's hand in marriage.

On the wedding day, the bride is dressed by her girlfriends and female relatives. They also sing and dance for her. A beautifully decorated caravan laden with sweets and flat cakes carries the bride to the wedding venue, which is usually a vast open space. The bride brings along with her carpets, bags, pouches, and household goods. The groom is seated on horseback, and the bride is made to sit behind him on a special seat.

The aunts of the bridal couple play an important role in Turkmen marriages. The groom's aunt does not let the caravan proceed until the father of the groom presents her with gifts. The couple is then blessed and sent on their way to the groom's home. The wedding is solemnized with prayers and blessings. The bride is then made to take off the groom's belt, cap, and boots while she is blindfolded. This symbolizes the bride's humility and her willingness to abide by his rules.

After the wedding the bride cannot return to her native home for a period of two months. When this period ends, the husband accompanies her when she visits her home. He is welcomed into her home with gifts and sweets.

As in other Central Asian countries, Turkmen also follow the custom of marrying their deceased brothers' widows.

❁ DEATH

When a person dies in Turkmenistan, the body is handled in accordance with Muslim burial rituals. Special prayers are said just before the person dies. Women are not allowed to participate in the funeral services held in the cemetery, but they are required to mourn at home for a prolonged period of time.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Tuvalu's earliest known inhabitants were probably Polynesian settlers from Samoa and Tonga who first set foot on the islands nearly 2,000 years ago.

The first European to locate Tuvalu was Alvaro de Mendaña y Neyra (1541–95) of Spain in 1568, who was actually looking for Terra Australis. He reached the island of Nui but was unable to land. Peruvian slave traders (also known as "blackbirders") combed the Pacific between 1862 and 1864, and Tuvalu was one of the Pacific island groups most affected by their activity. More than 400 of the inhabitants of Funafuti and Nukulele were forcibly taken away, never to return.

During the late 1800s, a handful of European traders began to live on the islands, hoping to profit from whatever local resources were available. Unfortunately, the Europeans brought diseases hitherto unknown in the area, leading to many deaths in Tuvalu. In 1865 the London Missionary Society, Protestant Congregationalists embarked on a mission to evangelize Tuvalu; the conversion of the inhabitants to Christianity was complete by the 1920s.

In 1892 the islands became part of a British protectorate that also included the Gilbert Islands. They christened Tuvalu the Ellice Islands. The protectorate became a British colony in 1915.

In 1943 Tuvalu was selected as an operations base for Allied forces that were fighting the Japanese in the Pacific, and thousands of U.S. marines were stationed there until December 1945.

In 1974 ethnic differences within the Gilbert and Ellice Islands colony caused the Polynesians of the Ellice Islands to vote for separation from the Micronesians of the Gilbert Islands (now known as Kiribati). In 1975 the Ellice Islands became the British colony of Tuvalu; independence followed on October 1, 1978. However, the country has remained a member of the British Commonwealth and recognizes Queen Elizabeth II (b. 1926) as its sovereign.

In 1997 Tuvalu's government adopted a strong stance on the need to control emissions of greenhouse gases in order for the low-lying island nation to survive. (Tuvalu's highest point is just 16 feet above sea level.) In 2000 Tuvalu became a member of the United Nations.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Tuvalu is part of Polynesia and consists of nine tiny atolls in the western Pacific Ocean. The total land area is only 10 square miles but the islands occupy over 800,000 square miles of ocean between Kiribati and Samoa. Five of the islands are low-lying coral atolls. On most of the islands there are many reefs and saltwater ponds, although the island of Nanumea boasts a freshwater pond, something rarely found on an atoll.

Tuvalu has poor quality soil, no streams or rivers whatsoever, and few remaining outcrops of forest undergrowth.

Fun Fact

In 2000 Tuvalu negotiated a contract with a Canadian entrepreneur to lease its Internet domain name ".tv" for $50 million in royalties over the next dozen years. Unfortunately the Canadian was unable to raise the $50 million within the required time period, and the contract went to someone else. These royalties could have tripled the Tuvalu GDP during the life of the contract, but the sum is unlikely to reach the big numbers Tuvalu hoped for.

Coconut palms grow in abundance across all the islands; but there is only enough soil to support subsistence agriculture for about three-quarters of the population. All other food must be imported. Water needs are met by catchment and storage facilities since the porous, low-lying atolls do not hold groundwater. The only land animals are the Polynesian rat, poultry, dogs, and pigs, all introduced by the European settlers.

The climate is pleasantly tropical with the temperatures ranging from 60°F to 96°F; the heat is moderated by trade winds blowing from the east for most of the year. The area receives about 138 inches of rain annually, with the wet season occurring between October and March. Even though cyclone activity is rare, cyclones Gavin and Hina eroded an estimated 7 percent of the total surface area in 1997.

The Funafuti Conservation Area (FCA), made up of six uninhabited islets with native broadleaf forests and coral sand beaches, covers 21 square miles of water and land on the western side of the Funafuti atoll. Located within the protected area are coconut crabs, nesting seabirds, and turtles. A variety of colorful fish are also visible through the clear waters of the blue lagoon.

❁ ECONOMY

Tuvalu is the fourth smallest country in the world. Its land is unsuitable for agriculture on a large scale, and there is almost no potable water. In 2001 Tuvalu's government announced that the islands, whose highest point is barely 16 feet above sea level, may need to be evacuated in the event of rising sea levels that might deluge the islands.

Tuvalu has hardly any natural resources, and its main sources of income are foreign aid and fishing. Tourism is limited due to the geographical remoteness of the islands. Other sources of revenue include the sale of stamps and coins and remittances from Tuvaluans employed in the phosphate-mining industry of Nauru. Unfortunately Nauru is repatriating Tuvaluans because its phosphate resources are almost exhausted.

Tuvalu is heavily dependent on financial aid from other countries. It receives a lot of its annual income from an international trust fund established in 1987 by Australia, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom; Japan and South Korea also support the fund. Due to good investment strategies and conservative use, the fund has grown from $17 million to over $35 million in just 12 years. The U.S. government is a major source of revenue as well, having paid Tuvalu around $9 million in 1999 in accordance with a 1988 treaty on fisheries, and that total will probably continue to rise in the years to come.

Copra is the nation's only export. Pork and poultry are produced only for local consumption.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The highlights of Tuvalu's culture are adherence to traditional ways, friendliness to strangers, and a relaxed lifestyle. A traditional community system is prevalent on Tuvalu. Each family has its own set of specific tasks, or salanga, for which it is responsible to the community such as fishing, construction, defense, and so on. The special skills of a family are handed down from father to son.

The traditional music of Tuvalu consists of a number of dances, including fakanau and fakaseasea. The fakanau was performed by people standing and gently swaying their bodies. But the European missionaries perceived the swaying motion as erotic, and this traditional dance was eventually forbidden. The fakaseasea, performed to slower songs and less restrictive rules, is performed only by elders. Tuvalu also had a tradition of funeral singing called kupu.

The women wear a distinctive traditional dress, made from hand-dyed pandanus leaf strips with traditional patterns and colors. Men and women wear floral wreaths in their hair on special occasions. Banquets, coupled with traditional dancing and music, are often held at the Maneapas (meeting houses), the focal points of community and social life.

The Church of Tuvalu

There are usually friendly relationships among the various religions in Tuvalu, and government policy and practice contribute to the prevalent atmosphere. The dominant religion is the Church of Tuvalu, historically connected to the Congregational Church, which has the largest number of members. While there are no official figures on religious membership, the government estimates that 91 percent of the population belongs to the Church of Tuvalu. Other religions and Protestant sects are far behind: 3 percent of Tuvaluans are Seventh-day Adventists, 3 percent belong to Bahai, 2 percent are Jehovah's Witnesses, and 1 percent are Catholic. Also present are small numbers of Muslims, Baptists, members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons), and atheists. Most followers of other religions or denominations live in Funafuti, the capital, except for the relatively large number of followers of the Bahai Faith on Nanumea Island.

Although Tuvalu's constitution provides for freedom of religion, and there is no state religion, in practice government functions at the national and island council levels—such as the opening of Parliament—often include Christian prayers, clergy, or perspectives. Members of the Church of Tuvalu dominate most aspects of social and political life in the country, not surprising given that they make up such a high portion of the population. Moreover all nine traditional chiefs of the islands are members of the Church of Tuvalu.

However, a degree of social intolerance for non-Church of Tuvalu activities, particularly on some outer islands, has been reported. Unidentified persons have alleged that some residents of Nanumanga were stoned by fellow islanders when they left the Church of Tuvalu to start the Tuvalu Brethren Church, and the island council subsequently voted to ban the new church group in July 2003. The head of the Tuvalu Brethren Church filed a complaint against the island council, but the outcome is unknown.

Each Maneapa is unique in terms of decor and architecture. Christianity has had a strong influence on the lives of the people and is the predominant religion. Sundays are devoted to resting and attending church.

❁ CUISINE

The cuisine of Tuvalu is simple but quite good, and consists primarily of fuaga mei (breadfruit), coconut, and taro (a high-starch tuber grown in the Western parts of Africa). Though it has an acrid taste while raw, taro emits a pleasant nutlike flavor when cooked, and it is very useful because it can be boiled, fried, or baked. It is also used in soup, pulaka (swamp taro), plantains (cooking bananas); it is quite good served with cooked or raw fish, crayfish, pork, chicken, and local vegetables such as laulu (spinach). Foodstuffs are normally steamed, boiled, or roasted in underground ovens.

Many dishes are prepared with lolo (coconut cream). Tuvaluans also enjoy drinking pi (coconut milk). Other popular drinks include the twin K's: kaleve and koa, sour and very strong toddies of fermented coconut.

Tuvaluans eat tropical fruits, including oolesi (papaya) and bananas. Imported items such as flour, sugar, rice, salt beef, corned beef, and tea are gradually growing popular, especially among those who can afford them.

In most parts of the world, New Year's Eve and New Year's Day (the first day of the year of the Gregorian calendar) are enthusiastically celebrated. In a staunchly Christian country like Tuvalu, this day assumes religious overtones, and the people of

Tuvalu attend church services and welcome the new year with the ringing of church bells. This is a public holiday in Tuvalu.

❁ COMMONWEALTH DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: Second Monday of March

Fun Fact

Tuvalu is one of the smallest and most remote countries on Earth, and only Vatican City has a smaller population.

Commonwealth Day is an annual celebration of the Commonwealth association and its members (most of which are former colonies of Britain). In some countries this day is also observed as the birthday of Queen Victoria (1819–1901), a former Queen of England. The occasion is marked by a interdenominational service in Westminster Abbey attended by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, the present head of the Commonwealth, and several other dignitaries. The queen delivers an address to the Commonwealth that is broadcast throughout the world by the BBC. This is a public holiday in Tuvalu, and all schools, government institutions, and many businesses are closed.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It is sometimes called Resurrection Day. This day is of utmost importance because the Christian liturgical calendar is based on the date on which Easter falls each year.

The holiday is celebrated by Christians the world over on the first Sunday after Lent. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. The word easter is derived from the name of the Germanic fertility Goddess, Eostre (or Eastre). She was the revered mother goddess of the Saxon people of northern Europe. Easter eggs, once associated with Eostre and symbolic of new life, are now associated with the Christian festival.

Easter observances emphasize the resurgence of hope and a renewal of life. Being a staunchly Christian nation, Tuvalu holds many ceremonies and celebrations on this major Christian festival. In Tuvalu, as in other parts of the world, prayer services and worship begin quite early in the day. It is also a public holiday in Tuvalu and is largely celebrated by families and local villages with traditional songs and dancing

Tuvalu has two places where crafts made by local women can be found: the Women's Handicraft Centre (near the airport) and the Funafuti Women's Craft Centre.

❁ QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 12

This is a common holiday observed by nearly all the former, as well as the present, colonies and dependencies of Britain. Since H.M. Queen Elizabeth II is the British sovereign, the countries that owed allegiance (and still do) to Britain celebrate her birthday. This happens to be a movable festival, celebrated on different dates in various countries. Tuvalu is a former protectorate that subsequently became a colony of Britain. Since it is still an associate member of the British Commonwealth, the Tuvaluans celebrate the Queen's Birthday as a public holiday.

❁ INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 5

International Children's Day (ICD) is celebrated by many nations. This holiday began in 1925, when the World Conference for the Well-Being of Children met in Geneva, Switzerland. It is usually (but not always) celebrated annually on June 1, although why this date was chosen remains uncertain.

June 1 has since been observed as the ICD by numerous countries, especially by Communist countries. For this reason Western nations usually celebrate the ICD on other days of the year (if at all), and there is often little or no awareness about these celebrations.

In Tuvalu this day is devoted to honoring all the country's children because they are the future of every nation. This holiday is in keeping with an old Polynesian tradition according to which each community honors its progeny. On this day Tuvaluan children lead their respective villages in celebrations and are treated to a traditional sumptuous feast. This is a public holiday in Tuvalu.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: October 1

This day is of great significance in the history of the island nation. It was on this day in 1978 that Tuvalu became independent from British rule. (The country had been a protectorate and subsequently a colony of Britain.) This is a two-day public holiday in Tuvalu, and all public and government organizations remain closed. The people celebrate this day with great fanfare, processions, dancing, and music. An air of gaiety and mirth surrounds the islands.

❁ PRINCE OF WALES'S BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: November 13

The present Prince of Wales, H.E. Charles (son of H.M. Queen Elizabeth II) was born on this day in 1948. Tuvalu was once a protectorate and colony of Britain, and the inhabitants are still loyal to the British Crown. Like other members of the British Commonwealth, the Tuvaluans celebrate the birthdays of British royalty, including the Prince of Wales, as official holidays.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a term derived from Old English Christes mæsse (meaning, "Christ's mass"). It refers to a holiday filled with great joy for Christians all over the world because it is the day on which they celebrate the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God and the Messiah promised in the Old Testament. Being staunchly Christian, Tuvalu also holds ceremonies and celebrations on this important festival. The people of Tuvalu, like many devout Christians, attend special church services and visit friends and relatives. This is a public holiday and schools, government offices, and most businesses are closed.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, sometimes called Holy Friday, Great Friday, or Mourning Friday, recalls Jesus' agony and death on the Cross. In Tuvalu devout Christians recall the sorrowful events of this day by gathering to read from the Psalms and Gospels, and to sing hymns about Jesus' death. There are also religious processions in some villages on this occasion.

❁ BIRTH

In Tuvalu preparations for childbirth begin about five or six months into a pregnancy; the actual delivery is usually performed at the home of the woman's parents. Her mother gets things under way by choosing a midwife (tufuga faka fanau) who will care for her daughter until the child is born. If she cannot find a midwife, then she will do the job herself. In Tuvalu midwives are highly respected professionals. They are usually paid for their care with items of barter such as mats and food. The midwife's "tools of the trade," which she always has at the ready, include: an abdominal binder of pandanus leaves, called a noa; a suspensory belt, made from the te fou tree's (faka fafine) bark; a pad made out of the dried pith of the pulaka's leafstalk, called a pulu; coconut oil; a few fresh yellow breadfruit leaves; and a knife or scissors, to cut the umbilical cord.

The tufuga visits the expectant mother two or three times a week to massage her abdomen, a procedure thought to keep the fetus in the correct position. During this preliminary period, the women of the mother-to-be's family make mats for her, and her husband's female kinsfolk make mats for the baby. Both families share the responsibility of preparing food for the ceremonial feasts that will follow the birth.

When the labor pains start, the midwife and her assistant get ready by having their tools at hand. Babies are customarily delivered with the mother in one of two positions: lying prone, on her back or sitting and reclining backward. Either position is believed to ease the delivery of the fetus. Once the placenta has been expelled, the midwife measures the cord to the side of the infant's waist, then ties and cuts it. Next she cleans the mother up, wraps the abdominal binder around the woman's waist, and attaches one end of the suspensory belt. The other end of the belt is then brought forward under the woman's buttocks and fastened at the front of the binder. This holds a vaginal pad, wrapped in a breadfruit leaf covered with coconut oil, securely in place.

In Tuvalu, once a man has chosen the woman he wishes to marry, it is customary for him to ask his parents' approval. Although others among his relatives may express their opinions regarding his choice, his parents have the last word in the matter. Should his parents disapprove of the match, they may make their own choice. As in many cultures, tradition requires boys and girls to respect their parents' wishes.

In some communities, courting is forbidden, so males and females often meet through the offices of a third person, called a fai fekau. A more dangerous courting practice is known as moetolo ("sleep crawl"): The suitor sneaks into the woman's home when everyone else is fast asleep. Although such nocturnal visits are prearranged, the intruders are often punished if they are caught in the act. When a girl's family has decided the suitor is unworthy of their daughter, punishment is almost certain. Young people brave enough to flout tradition frequently elope.

Another device used to get married is the potu lama, a torch made of coconut leaves. Each young man has his own potu lama. Sometimes a village undertakes the task of marriage negotiations by lighting the potu lama for one or more young men. The young men tell the village elders about the women they would like to marry. The older men then visit the woman's parents and ask their approval for the proposed marriage. If the woman's parents agree to the marriage, the young man's potu lama is lighted. If his proposal is rejected, his potu lama is not lighted, and the elder men approach the parents of other women that the young man admires.

For a marriage brokered in this fashion, the village that sponsored the lighting of the potu lama is responsible for the wedding ceremony and the wedding feast too. Everyone from that village contributes food, mats, clothing, or money (as decided by the leaders) for the occasion. For a traditional marriage ceremony, the two families begin to plan their contributions several weeks before the wedding. Each family must prepare a laulau avaga, a bed, for the couple. After the bride's family has made her bed, they present it to the bridegroom at the wedding feast. At the same time the bridegroom's family presents their bed to the bride. Both families are also expected to prepare food for the wedding feast, and they frequently compete to see which of them can provide the most food. The prepared foods, like the beds, are exchanged between the two families.

❁ DEATH

In Tuvalu church bells announce a death on the island. When people hear the bells tolling, they know that someone has died. As soon as the identity of the deceased is known, his or her acquaintances and relatives gather to mourn the individual's passing. The body is dressed and placed on new mats in the center of the house. Relatives can pay tribute to someone by donating money or cloth or by praising the achievements and contributions made by the individual to his or her family and the island community. The grave is usually dug by members of some volunteer or philanthropic organization such as the Boy Scouts or Boys' Brigade. Caskets are usually made from one of the family's canoes.

When it is time to bury the deceased, a pastor visits the relatives of the dead person. The coffin is then taken to the place where it is to be buried, and the pastor conducts the funeral service. The night of the funeral, the immediate family and other relatives gather to pray. Having prayed for the dead person, they sit down together for supper. The period of mourning, faganoa, can last anywhere from a few days to a few weeks. When the mourning period is over, a big feast, called the aitagi, is enjoyed by everyone.

Rising Sea Levels

The nine small islands that make up Tuvalu will be endangered should global warming continue to melt arctic glaciers. Low-lying Tuvalu, with barely 16 feet above sea level on average and no surrounding shelf, is extremely vulnerable to any rise in sea level caused by climate change, and any future sea level rise will likely destroy the atolls and the people who live on them.

During the last 10 years, Tuvalu's tiny atolls have lost 10 feet of beachfront. To make matters worse, the severity and frequency of storms has simultaneously increased. The people are concerned that the islands may eventually be submerged, and they are leaving the islands in growing numbers.

In 2001 the government announced that the islands' inhabitants will probably need to be evacuated if the oceans continue to rise. Plans are already in place to begin evacuating the nation's population during the next decades to New Zealand or Niue, a small autonomous Pacific island associated with New Zealand that isn't threatened by sea-level rise. New Zealand has already agreed to accept an annual quota of 75 people. Australia, on the other hand, has refused the Tuvaluans' requests, presumably because of its rejection of the underlying basis of the Kyoto Protocol.

In 2002 then-prime minister Koloa Talake said he planned to sue the United States and Australia in the International Court of Justice at the Hague because those countries are responsible for the disproportionate production of carbon dioxide emissions. However, the suit was never filed because he was not reelected.

Unusually high tides in 2004 caused seepage that transformed much of Funafuti's interior into a salty lake, destroying already insufficient root crops.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Uganda's rich cultural past extends back at least into the Paleolithic era, and the region now occupied by the nation is known for its relatively long record of human habitation. The earliest evidence is stone tools found in the Kagera River Valley and in gravel deposits near Parra and Mweya, dated to between 100,000 and 50,000 years ago. Of particular significance are hand axes associated with the Acheulean culture, stone tools used by prehistoric hominids including the Neanderthals, Homo erectus, and early H. sapiens, and found in many other places such as Britain, France, Korea, Algeria, and India. Sometimes said to be the "signature tool" of the Lower Paleolithic age, such hand axes were a considerable improvement over earlier hand tools because the stone was chipped on both sides. This innovation made these early people at least as dangerous as the predators they often hunted. The people who used the hand axes are thought to have been hunter-gatherers who lived in the open or in rock shelters. Many archaeologists and anthropologists believe they had already begun to use fire as well, at least 50,000 years ago.

The continent of Africa did not experience the long Ice Ages that occurred in Europe. The Wurm Glaciation, which covered Europe between 70,000 and 10,000 B.C.E., produced a cooler and wetter East Africa and a cooler and drier West Africa. The development of the Sangoan culture with its distinctive stone tools represents the most prevalent type of early human culture in Africa. Stone tools of the Sangoan culture, named after the Sango Bay on Lake Victoria (the type site), have been found in western Uganda along the Kagera River Valley and on hills around Mbarara. The Mousterian culture, also during the Stone Age, followed the Sangoan culture between 35,000 and 8,000.

The Magosian culture—evidenced in deposits of small stone tools—was named for the site at a water hole in Karamoja in northeastern Uganda; it flourished 7,000 to 5,000 years ago and is also known from Kalambo Falls, on the border between Zambia and Tanzania. Many beautiful quartz tools, similar to those of the Stillbay Stone Age culture found in Somaliland, have been found near Moroto, also in northeastern Uganda. Agriculture apparently reached Uganda between 2,000 and 3,000 years ago, then rapidly spread through western Uganda. At the same time, a hunting and food-gathering people, known for tools like those of the Wilton Stone Age culture, lived in caves and rock shelters near Lake Victoria. Some were eventually assimilated by the more settled Bantu farmers, while others retreated to the mountains.

During the 1960s archaeological work was concentrated on Bigo forts, village sites, and painted pottery, as well as on legendary associations with a mythical peoples known as the Bachwezi. Excavations at Bigo showed a two-phase occupation, one associated with the Bahima Bachwezi, the other with the Babito. In 1961 a rock shelter at Nsongezi, once used by Stone Age survivors, was reexcavated and dated to about 1,000 C.E. These people, thought to be related to present-day Bushmen, may have been responsible for the rock paintings found in Teso, at Kakoro in Bukedi, and on Lolui Island in Lake Victoria. At some as yet undetermined point during the last 1,200 years, ironworking came into Uganda, perhaps from the north. In 1957 the site at Bigo was found to have defensive ditches—cut 12 feet into solid rock, almost certainly made with metal tools—that stretch across nearly four miles. Excavations were also carried out at Kantsyore Island in Ankole and near Suam in Sebei, where dimple-based ceramics, early Iron Age pottery, and hut foundations were discovered.

Bantu-speakers near the shores of Lake Victoria developed the banana as a staple food about 1,000 years ago. Between 600 and 700 years ago the Chwezi, a Bantu subgroup, established settlements at Bigo in western Uganda. The Chwezi were depicted in legends as supernatural but probably were the ancestors of the region's present-day Hima and Tutsi herders. When Arab and European explorers first set foot in Uganda in the 19th century, the region had three main kingdoms: the Buganda, Karagwe, and Kitara. While the Bantu tribes migrated from West Africa and settled in major parts of Uganda thousands of years ago, the Nilo-Hamitic tribes arrived in eastern Uganda only 250 years ago. In modern Uganda the Bantu, Nilotics, Nilo-Hamitic, and Sudanic are the main tribes in Uganda.

There is an interesting legend behind the name Uganda, which was documented by a European, John Hanning Speke (1827–64), during his visit to the country with a group of Europeans in 1857. According to the legend a remarkable hunter named Uganda lived in a place called Unyoro. He was extremely poor and started hunting in order to feed his family. Soon he became a skilled hunter and was able to feed his entire community. Acknowledging

Kingdom of Buganda

The kings of Buganda did not value the lives of their subjects, and the royal family dictated the rituals practiced in the kingdom of Buganda. Burying people alive, torture, and mutilation were the norm. An Englishman who visited Buganda while Mutesa was king, John Hanning Speke, witnessed Mutesa's lack of regard for human life. As tokens of goodwill Speke and other Europeans had given some rifles to the king. As a live demonstration, Mutesa ordered a court page to fire at a random person outside the court, without giving it a second thought, much to the horror of the visitors.

his valuable and selfless service, people called him Kimeru, and he became the first king of Buganda.

European influence began to be felt in Uganda in the 19th century when an Italian Giovanni Miani (1810–72), who was working for the Egyptians, became the first European to enter Uganda. Other Europeans and Arabs followed. During this time Mutesa was the king of Buganda. Many Europeans, such as John Hanning Speke, documented their experiences in the kingdom of Buganda, which made for fascinating reading in the West.

In 1893 Uganda was declared a British protectorate and the British controlled it for the next 69 years. The independent state of the Republic of Uganda did not come into existence until 1962. The joy of freedom, however, was short-lived since civil wars in neighboring countries raised concerns related to national security with the sudden influx of refugees into Uganda. Also the kingdom of Buganda and its ruler, or kabaka, was promised autonomy by the first president of Uganda Milton Obote (1924–2005), at the time of independence. Obote did not keep that promise, however; he abolished the Bugandan monarchy and rewrote the constitution of Uganda.

In 1969 Idi Amin (1928–2003), following a successful military coup, came to power and unleashed an era of terror in Uganda. Shoot-at-sight orders were issued to silence the voices of protest, and more than 80,000 people lost their lives as a result of Amin's orders. In 1972 the Asian community in Uganda—third-generation descendants of workers brought to Uganda by the British colonial administration—were ordered to leave the country within 90 days, taking with them only the clothes they were wearing. At this time, while Uganda's economic situation was also steadily worsening, Amin forced the country into a war with Tanzania. Uganda lost, and Amin fled to Libya. Many human rights organizations put the death toll in Uganda under Amin's rule at about 300,000, possibly as high as 500,000.

The coups continued, and the country suffered under its dictatorial leaders until 1986, when the National Revolution Movement–National Resistance Army seized power, and an interim government was established. President Yoweri Museveni (b. c. 1944) won free elections in 1994, 1996, and 2001. Under his leadership Uganda pulled out of the bloody Congo War and slowly began to improve its economy.

In the early 21st century, however, Uganda still faces grave challenges. The country must defend itself from antigovernment factions such as the Lord's Resistance Army and the West Nile Bank Front. Human trafficking is a cause for great concern. Also, the number of AIDS/HIV patients has increased at an increasingly devastating rate. In the villages it is estimated that one out of every four people is infected with the virus.

☼ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the eastern part of the African continent, the Republic of Uganda is flanked by Kenya in the east, Democratic Republic of Congo in the west, Sudan in the north, Tanzania in the south, and Rwanda in the southwest. A major part of Lake Victoria lies within Uganda, and the capital city of Kampala is located in this area. Uganda is a landlocked, fertile, and well-watered country. Topographically the country has three distinct features: desert, swampy lowlands, and a fertile plateau with an average elevation of 4,000 feet.

Uganda's equatorial climate provides a lot of sunshine, moderated by the relatively high altitude of most areas of the country. The mean annual temperatures range from about 61°F in the southwestern highlands to 77°F in the northwest; but in the northeast, temperatures exceed 86°F about 254 days every year. Daytime temperatures average about 8–10 degrees warmer than nighttime temperatures in the Lake Victoria region, and temperatures are generally about 14 degrees lower in the southwest.

Except in the northeast rainfall is well distributed. Uganda's southern region has two rainy seasons, usually beginning in April and again in October. Little rain falls in June and December. In the north occasional rains occur between April and October, while the period from November to March is often very dry.

☼ ECONOMY

Agriculture is the backbone of the Ugandan economy and the primary occupation of 80 percent of the population. Coffee is a major revenue generator. Uganda is also home to substantial natural resources with vast deposits of copper and cobalt. The economy has suffered, however, primarily due to the four-decade civil war. The country has mounting foreign debts, but the government has made efforts to improve economic conditions.

☼ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Uganda has a diverse culture. While the Arabs brought Islam to the nation, the Europeans introduced Uganda to Christianity, and Christians now make up two-thirds of the population, while the remaining one-third follows either Islam or traditional animist spirituality. English is the official language of Uganda, although Lagunda, a native language, is widely spoken by the general public and is taught in schools. Uganda is also home to many tribes that speak different languages and follow different customs and traditions. The four main ethnic tribes of Uganda are the Bantu, the Nilotics, the Sudanic Cushites, and Nilo-Hamitic Hamites.

Each tribe has its distinct culture and customs, but a shared love of dance and music has been passed on from one generation to the next. Some of the commonly played musical instruments are the ndigindi, a kind of lyre, the amadinda, or xylophone, the lukeme, a thumb piano, and the entongoli, an instrument much like the harp.

The center of Ugandan music is Kampala, which is famous for its kadongo kamu, an ancient African tradition of teaching that involves narrating stories in the form of songs; a guitar or a drum usually accompanies the sung narrative.

Ntandi is the home of the Pygmy people, who are famous for their artistic handicrafts. The Ankole people have preserved their cultural heritage by creating the Lake Mburo cultural village.

The people of Uganda generally prefer the Western style of dress, and traditional garb is worn mostly during special ceremonies. However, the men belonging to the Ganda (Baganda) tribe, the largest ethnic group in Uganda, and the Soga tribe, the fourth largest ethnic tribe, wear the traditional kanzu, which is a white robe, under their sport coats. The women of these tribes wear the busuti, a beauti-

The Pygmies

The Pygmies, who are also known as the people of the rain forest, live in some of the most inhospitable forests of Eastern Congo. These forests are located through Equatorial Africa, Cameroon, and Western Zambia. The Pygmies have been known to the world ever since Homer wrote the Iliad in the eighth century B.C.E. They are dark skinned and average less than 59 inches in height. The majority of the Pygmy people in Uganda belong to the Batwa, who live mainly in the mountainous Kabale, Kisoro, and Rukungiri districts of the southwest. As a result of colonialism and commercial development, much of their native rain forest has been destroyed, and they are now a dispossessed people. The dominant peoples of Uganda regard the Pygmies as outsiders. Without land and the ability to farm, they now find themselves forced to beg for their livelihood.

ful long dress, introduced by Christian missionaries in the late 19th century.

❁ CUISINE

Matoke (cooked banana) is a popular dish in Uganda. Most of the other Ugandan delicacies consist of beef or mutton with ugali, or maize (corn), as a starch. To make the ugali, cornmeal is added to boiling water and cooked into a thick porridge; it is later served on a flat board or plate. Mkate mayai (bread and eggs) is a favorite snack of Arab origin. It is a thin pancake made out of wheat dough filled with raw eggs and minced meat then fried on a hot plate after being folded. Beer is a favorite beverage in Uganda. Pombe (fermented banana beer) and waragi (a millet-based alcohol) are particularly popular.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The people of Uganda bid farewell to the old year and joyously welcome the new one, which embodies new hope and aspirations. In Uganda New Year's Day is celebrated in the company of one's family, friends, and acquaintances. All public and many private facilities are closed.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF THE GOVERNMENT NRM-NRA

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 26

In 1986 Yoweri Museveni assumed power after a revolution led by the National Revolution Movement–National Resistance Army (NRM-NRA). Prior to the revolution Uganda had suffered under the oppressive regime of Idi Amin. The economy had collapsed, and the entire country was in a state of war. In the coup of 1986 Idi Amin was overthrown, and Museveni became the president.

Under Museveni Uganda began to build a solid economy. The government also took stock of human rights issues and worked alongside international human rights organizations to put an end to human trafficking and child labor.

Since this is a national holiday, all government offices, private institutions, schools, and colleges remain closed. Official speeches and military parades provide the focus for anniversary celebrations.

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: March 8

International Women's Day honors the contributions of women all over the world and highlights their human rights issues. It also pays tribute to the contributions women make to their societies. In Uganda the National Association of Women has initiated a drive to create awareness of women's issues and to stop violence against Ugandan women.

On this day government offices and schools remain closed. Special events take place all over the country, led by those in Kampala. Official speeches, exhibitions, and theatrical plays are highlights. Also, an official parade, consisting of women working in the police and armed forces, takes place in Kampala.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

Labor Day, also called May Day or Workers' Day, is celebrated in many countries of the world as a tribute to workers and to recognize their achievements and contributions to society.

Labor Day is marked in Uganda with rallies and meetings on workers' rights and liberties. The day is used to educate the people about their rights. All government, educational, and commercial establishments are closed on this day.

❁ MARTYRS OF UGANDA DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 3

Martyrs of Uganda Day commemorates the killing of 32 African Roman Catholics and Protestants between the years 1885 and 1887 by Mwanga, the then-ruler, or kabaka, of Buganda. The kabaka wanted to eliminate all signs of Christianity from the kingdom.

In 1920 Pope Benedict XV (r. 1914–22) beatified the martyrs collectively and Pope Paul VI (r. 1963–78) canonized them as saints on October 18, 1964. June 3 is their feast day and is celebrated as Martyrs of Uganda Day. It is one of the most important holidays in Uganda.

On this day thousands of Ugandans flock to the site of the killing in Namugongo. For many Ugan-

Fun Fact

Europeans used the racially motivated Hamitic hypothesis, started by John Hanning Speke, to justify their ongoing exploitation of the African continent. These ideas were still in wide circulation until the 1950s, when Joseph Greenberg (in The Languages of Africa) introduced the use of geographical rather than racial terms for Africa's language families. Greenberg effectively ended the term's linguistic use, but the term Hamitic is still used in some anthropological nomenclature.

dans it is an important annual pilgrimage so they use any means of transportation available to reach Namugongo. Special prayers are offered in honor of the martyrs, and choirs sing songs in Luganda to the sound of drums. Special plays are held, reflecting on important events in the life of Jesus.

☼ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 9

Every year the people of Uganda celebrate their independence from the United Kingdom on October 9, 1962, when its days as an exploited colony were finally brought to an end. It is a day for joyful celebration as well as an opportunity to take stock of the country's progress toward becoming a true democracy. On this day members of Uganda's government give speeches, parades and huge fairs are held, and the nation's flag flies high.

One of the largest of the fairs is organized by the Uganda Manufacturer's Association (UMA). The week-long international fair attracts tens of thousands of people, including schoolchildren from different parts of the country. One of the many booths at the 2005 fair was that of the United Wildlife Education Centre, whose mission is educating citizens about the importance of conserving Uganda's biodiversity. The activities included snake shows, quizzes, and games for schoolchildren, and the sale of herbal medicines. A display of animal skulls at the show was intended to inform the public about wildlife poaching and the need to stop the destruction of our wildlife.

Because October 9 is a national holiday, all schools, government offices, and many businesses are closed.

☼ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics and some Protestants

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Mourning Friday, Holy Friday, or Black Friday, falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent, a 40-day period of fasting and repentance. On this day Christians recall the Crucifixion of Jesus. In Uganda people attend prayer services in church and reflect on Jesus' life and teachings. Choirs sing devotional songs, and plays based on the life of Jesus are performed as part of the solemn Good Friday observance in Uganda. In some parts of Uganda Christians walk in huge processions, some carrying crosses, reenacting Jesus' final journey to Golgotha.

☼ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is celebrated to mark Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over because it is the most important holiday of the liturgical calendar and a time for great rejoicing. Many other Christian holidays are scheduled according to the date on which Easter falls every year such as Pentecost, Ascension Day, and Good Friday.

In many parts of Uganda Protestants and Roman Catholics celebrate Easter jointly. Huge feasts are prepared and dishes made from goat meat are very popular. Many Ugandans visit their extended families in the countryside since Easter is a day of celebration for the entire family. In church, prayers and the narration of Easter stories from the Bible are a part of the Easter observance.

☼ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

In the West Christians celebrate Jesus' birth on December 25, although no one knows the exact date of his birth. The weather in Uganda is hot during Christmas because Uganda is an equatorial nation where December is a summer month. In the week preceding Christmas, people buy new clothes and special gifts for those they love. The people in urban areas also send Christmas cards to their friends and loved ones. It is traditional for Ugandans to congratulate each other for being fortunate enough to add one more Christmas to their age. Families attend church on Christmas Eve and celebrate the joyous occasion by singing and dancing through the night.

Huge Christmas trees are beautifully decorated in many Ugandan cities, and the whole of Uganda echoes with the sound of carols that are sung throughout Christmas week. All public and private institutions remain closed on Christmas. A lavish feast is prepared for this special day and goat meat is a Christmas favorite.

☼ BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

The day after Christmas is known as Boxing Day, after an old British tradition of giving gifts to one's servants on the day after Christmas. The name Boxing Day is thought to come from the church alms boxes in which donations for the poor were collected throughout the year. On the day after Christmas these boxes were opened, and the contents distributed to the needy. Uganda's observance of Boxing Day, an additional day off following Christmas, is a remnant of its colonial ties to Great Britain. This day is also celebrated as Family Day or the Feast of St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr.

❁ WORLD BIRD FESTIVAL

Observed in: Ngamba Island

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: A period in October, every two years

Since 2001 an international event called the World Bird Festival on Ngamba Island has been held in Uganda every other year. The objective of the festival is to draw people closer to nature, and it is the largest bird festival in the world. Ngamba, a beautifully forested island in Lake Victoria near Kampala, the capital of Uganda, is the perfect venue for the event as it is home to a large number of birds.

A month-long treat for bird lovers, the festival offers a wide variety of events, including bird watching and cultural activities connected with the lives and habits of native birds. In 2001 the event was attended by more than 300,000 bird lovers from around the world, and more than 88 countries participated in the 1,400 events. During the festival people attend lectures, seminars, and workshops, as well as participate in guided nature walks. Children and adults alike enjoy screenings of films on birds and nature. Other events include painting exhibitions, poetry readings, music, and theater.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

In Uganda the birth of a child is celebrated with great joy once it has been determined that the baby is safe and healthy. Women in particular rejoice during these celebrations. It is believed that the child does not belong only to its mother but is in fact the child of the entire village. The child receives special treatment and is showered with love by all the people. Nature plays an important role in the name given to a newborn child. For example, if a child is born on a rainy day, his or her name would be related to rain.

❁ COMING OF AGE

In Uganda the initiation ceremonies for boys and girls take place when they reach puberty. At that time they are taken away from the community for a period of

Imbalu Dance of the Bagishu People

The imbalu dance is a part of the initiation ceremonies of the Bagishu boys. The Bagishu believe boys cannot make the transition to manhood unless they have been circumcised. The Bagishu initiation ceremony also requires each initiate to dance for 21 days to achieve spiritual powers and become a man. Without undergoing this ceremony, even an elderly man is not regarded as a man and is looked down on by other people.

weeks and instructed about adult life. In some tribes dancing is an important part of a boy's initiation ceremony. The imbalu (ceremonial initiation dance) is the highlight of the mass initiation ceremonies of the Bagishu tribe, which is part of the Bantu ethnic community. This dance is meant to celebrate life, adulthood, and the longevity of the family.

During the girls' initiation ceremony, it is customary for old women to beat the drums. These elderly women also shoulder the responsibility of narrating morality stories to the girls. They assume the role of teachers and help girls to understand the complexities of womanhood.

About 5 percent of the women in Uganda have undergone female genital mutilation (FGM) practiced in the Kapchorwa district. Although the government publicly condemns FGM, there is no law specifically prohibiting FGM at this time.

❁ MARRIAGE

Marriage is the most respected institution in Uganda. But it can also be an expensive affair since lavish weddings are important for maintaining or raising one's social status. The wedding customs and traditions vary from tribe to tribe. Polygamy is permitted in most traditions. Women are responsible for taking care of the home and raising children, while men are the breadwinners of the family. In marriage ceremonies the negotiating and payment of the lobola (dowry) plays a vital role.

In the Acholi region prospective grooms gather to perform a ceremonial dance (called the larakaraka) in the presence of young women of marriageable age. This event serves as a meeting place for prospective couples. However, if the prospective groom hopes to win a wife, it is imperative that he perform a flawless dance. That is because in Acholi people believe that, if one is a bad dancer, then he will most likely die a bachelor. Similarly the girls perform a dance number called the ding ding to attract handsome men.

During the marriage ceremony a chorus of women sings wedding songs. These songs are filled with good wishes for the bride, congratulating her on becoming a selfless and true community member.

❁ DEATH

The Baganda tribe of Uganda starts preparing graves for its people while they are still children. In Uganda women are given the sacred right to sing the dirge, or dirje, following a death in the family. A Bantu tradition, this is a duty they must perform for several days after a family member dies. The Bantu also believe that after death the soul becomes a ghost and retains the personality of the deceased. If the soul is not pleased, he or she will make life unbearable for surviving family members and bring disease and death to them. It is also believed that the ghost will be reborn into the same family two years after death.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

What is now the Ukraine occupied a prime location along the fabled Silk Road, a region traversed by various cultures. The Ukraine's history began during the late Neolithic period, sometime between 4500–3000 B.C.E. Called the Cucuteni (in Romania) or Trypillian culture (after the Ukrainian Trypillia village) it was an agrarian urban culture—perhaps the first in Europe—located in the countries now known as Romania, Moldova, and Ukraine, and has been identified from 2,000 sites. The sites range in size from small villages to huge settlements with hundreds of structures. Although locations in Romania and Moldova have been suggested as the cultural center, one at least was apparently what is now the village of Trypillia in the Ukraine. The people raised crops and cared for livestock, mostly cattle (but also including goats, swine, and sheep). That they were hunters too is attested to by the remains of wild animals. Whether they were Indo-Europeans is uncertain, but the ceramics found indicate that the culture was at least influenced by the Indo-Europeans.

Between 700 and 200 Scythian nomads from the area now called Iran occupied the southern and eastern parts of present-day Ukraine.

Much of what is known about the Scythians is based on Greek histories, because it is currently believed they had no system of writing. (However, this may not be true. A silver dish found in the Ziwiye hoard, a treasure of gold and silver metalwork and ivory [dated 680–25] has as yet undeciphered inscriptions that may be some type of Scythian writing.) They were described by the Greeks as skilled archers and were also widely renowned for their horsemanship. It was further reported that they buried their important people in kurgans, a type of burial mound found in Eastern Europe and Siberia. Excavations of kurgans have revealed that Scythian women and men wore the same clothing and fought side by side. One burial site contained the skeletons of a Scythian man and woman, each with weapons including axes and arrowheads.

From about the third or second century the Zarubintsy culture, now known from about 500 separate excavations, occupied an area that stretched from north of the Black Sea west toward the Vistula Basin. The Zarubintsy culture, like the Trypillian culture, and its successor, the Chernyakhov culture, was a mixture, combining elements of the the Celtic La Tène culture with the those of the nomadic Scythians and the Sarmatians, particularly in ceramics and weapons. These people raised crops and kept livestock in addition to hunting. They cremated their dead and buried the ashes in urns or pits. This culture was overrun by the Goths in the third century C.E., becoming what archaeologists call the Chernyakhov culture.

Beginning in the second century the Bulgars, a Central Asian people, began moving into the Ukraine region, and by the fourth century had assimilated what remained of the Sarmatian culture. A beautiful goblet made of gold, discovered in the Poltava region of Ukraine, is a fine example of Bulgar metalworking. When some Bulgar groups became embroiled in a civil war, they fell to the Khazars, a seminomadic Turkic people, in 568. In 882 the Rus moved in from Scandinavia and founded a state known as Kievan Rus with its capital at Kiev. At the end of the 10th century Kiev was already a significant center of culture. A series of internal wars divided the people of Kievan Rus, making them easy prey for invading Mongols and Turks, and in 1520 the Ottoman Empire controlled Ukraine.

By the middle of the 17th century eastern Ukraine was part of Russia, and by the end of the 18th century Austria controlled the western region of Ukraine. Following the Russian Revolution in 1917 Ukraine was briefly an independent country, but Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) divided it between them in 1922, and much of central and eastern Ukraine became a republic of the USSR.

During World War II Ukrainian forces fought both the Nazis and the Soviet army, and Kiev was recognized as a “hero city” at the end of the war. At this time the USSR–Ukraine border was extended to include most of Ukraine. Then when Ukraine was on the brink of an economic and social recovery, it suffered a serious setback, caused by the terrible Chernobyl disaster in 1986. Chernobyl, just 110 miles north of Kiev, was the site of a nuclear power station. In April 1986 a chemical explosion at the nuclear station resulted in an uncontrollable fire that released radioactive smoke over the skyline of Europe.

Fun Fact

Many English-speaking people used to refer to “the” or “The” Ukraine, which suggests a region, not a nation. Just as it is now incorrect to say “The Sudan,” “the” Ukraine is considered incorrect, and some find it offensive.

Thousands of people lost their lives and millions developed severe health problems, including cancer. Ukraine has still not recovered from this disaster.

With the collapse of the USSR in the early 1990s, Ukraine regained its independence in 1991. The country is a founding member of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Ukraine is the second largest country in Europe after Russia. It shares borders with Russia, Belarus, Poland, Slovakia, Hungary, Romania, and Moldova. The Black Sea and the Sea of Azov form its maritime borders. For the most part, Ukraine consists of fertile plains and low hills. The western region of the country is mountainous and contains the Carpathian range, the highest peak of which is Mount Hoverla at 6,762 feet. The Crimean peninsular region is also mountainous. There are around 3,000 rivers that flow through Ukraine.

Ukraine enjoys a temperate continental climate. Winters are mild with snowfall occurring everywhere except the southern region. All rivers and lakes freeze during winter. Summers are quite hot and dry, with occasional rainfall. Ukraine has rich and fertile soil, and large tracts of land are used to cultivate food crops. More than half of Ukraine is covered with fields of wheat, barley, rye, oats, and sugar beets, as well as poppies, mustard, and sunflowers. The forests of Ukraine have oak, maple, linden, and ash trees. Willow and aspen, silver fir, beech, and spruce are also abundant here.

Ukraine is an ideal habitat for animal life such as wolves, foxes, martens, and gazelles. There are also 350 species of birds and 200 species of freshwater fish.

ECONOMY

Prior to the disintegration of the USSR, Ukraine was an important agricultural and industrial center. Currently the country depends on Russia for many factors that affect its economy, such as the supply of energy and natural gas. The nation is working toward rebuilding and stabilizing its economy, and has undertaken a series of economic reforms to this end.

The major industries of Ukraine consist of coal, electric power, ferrous and nonferrous metals, machinery and transport equipment, chemicals, food processing, grain, sugar beets, sunflower seeds, vegetables, beef, and milk. Ukraine conducts trade with many nations including Russia, China, Turkey, Germany, Belarus, the United States, Poland, and Italy.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Ukraine, even though it was merged with Russia for a long time, has a distinct culture and a separate language. The country is the birthplace of borscht (or borsch), a hearty soup usually made of beets, as well as painted eggs, and Cossack song and dance traditions. The Ukrainian language more closely resembles the original ninth-century Slavonic language than Russian and Belarussian.

Ukrainian literature can be traced back to the 12th century. The mid-18th century wandering Ukrainian philosopher Hryhorii Skovoroda (1722–94) is world famous. He was known as the Ukrainian Socrates and authored both poems and philosophical tracts. Ukrainian writers were an important factor in dismantling USSR rule in the country, and the Union of Ukrainian Writers in Kiev was said to be instrumental in bringing about independence from the USSR in 1991.

Ukrainian music is centuries old and began as oral bylyny (epic narrative poems) and dumas, long ballads glorifying the exploits of the Cossacks. Ukrainian folk music was developed by the kobzar, wandering minstrels of the 16th and 17th centuries. During the 18th century, bandura (a stringed instrument resembling a lute) choirs became popular, and the Ukrainian Bandura Chorus from Kiev still performs worldwide. Mykola Lysenko (1842–1912) and Nina Matvienko, renowned singer and songwriter, are among noted musical names from Ukraine.

Ukrainian architecture is dominated by church buildings, which have been greatly influenced by the Orthodox Church. Unique wooden churches, with wooden onion-shaped domes, held together without nails, are a Ukrainian specialty. The USSR authorities, in a bid to crush Ukrainian identity and nationalism, destroyed many such churches. Ukrainian painting and iconography are also popular forms of expression for the people. Most of the early paintings have religious themes. Church murals, mosaics, and frescoes are evidence of the nation's artistic style.

❁ CUISINE

Ukrainian cuisine is famous for its diversity and flavor. The most popular Ukrainian meal is called borscht (borsheb, or borscht), a thick soup made primarily with beets, but also prepared with meat, mushrooms, beans, and prunes. Borscht is the country's national dish. Other soups made of mushroom, bean, and pea, and soups with dumplings are also popular. Ukrainians consume generous amounts of dairy products, such as cottage cheese pancakes, riazhanka (fermented baked milk), and nalysnyky (cheese-filled crepes). Meat is typically boiled, fried, or stewed.

Desserts are usually laden with honey and fruit, mainly cherries and plums, and often baked into sweet breads. Some of these desserts are pampushky (a fritter), baba (a rich cylindrical cake soaked with a rum and sugar syrup), and honey cakes. For special occasions such as Christmas, the Ukrainians make kutia, a mixture of cooked wheat, poppy seeds, and honey, served cold. Ukrainian meals are considered incomplete without plenty of vodka.

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world. Celebrations and revelry begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). Even though the start of the new year on the Julian calendar continues to be celebrated in mid-January in Ukraine, people observe the Western holiday as well, since Ukraine adopted the Western, or Gregorian, calendar in 1917. They decorate their new year tree, cook festive dinners, buy presents, and go to parties. This day is usually spent with family and close friends. Ukrainians believe that Ded Moroz (Santa Claus) comes on New Year's Eve and puts gifts under the tree. They also make their new year resolutions and feast on this day. It is a national holiday and schools and offices are closed.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 13–14

According to the Julian calendar, January 14 is New Year's Day. Although Ukraine adopted the Gregorian calendar in 1917, this day continues to be a celebrated holiday cherished by Ukrainians and other members of the Eastern Orthodox Church. On New Year's Day, the Orthodox Church celebrates both the Feast Day of St. Basil and commemorates the Circumcision of Jesus.

❁ UKRAINIAN DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: January 22

On this day, which is also called Unity Day, Ukraine was first declared independent from the USSR in 1922. The celebrations are relatively quiet. Government authorities begin this day with wreath-laying ceremonies at Taras Shevchenko and Mykhailo Hrushevsky monuments. There is also an elaborate celebration at the Kiev National Opera House in the evening. People commemorate this day with rallies, musical performances, and forming "human chains" in the streets.

Fun Fact

The word vodka comes from voda (which means "water") and can be loosely translated as "a wee drop."

❁ INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: March 8

Fun Fact

The height of Scythian power in Ukraine coincided with the lives of mathematician Pythagoras (582–496), Gautama Buddha (c. 563–483), Confucius (551–479), and Aeschylus, the Greek playwright (525–456).

As with Labor Day, there are conflicting stories about the origins of this holiday. Some say that International Women's Day was established after the Second International Conference of Socialist Women of 1910, held in Copenhagen. Others believe that it started in other countries sometime between 1900 and 1910. Women workers staged protests as early as 1857 in New York City for better working conditions and better pay. Since 1913, however, this day has been dedicated to the appreciation of women around the world.

On this day in Ukraine, men present women with gifts and flowers. At home it is customary for the men to take over all domestic tasks and give the women a day off from chores.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to recognize the important role workers play in building nations and societies. While the earliest celebrations of May Day are ascribed to pagan holidays observed by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, the more recent origins of the holiday can be attributed to a declaration in 1889 by the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, which declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday. In Ukraine workers hold marches on the streets and organize special meetings. This day is also signifies the commencement of spring holidays in the country. People relax and enjoy this holiday.

❁ VICTORY DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 9

Victory Day commemorates the 1945 defeat of German Fascists by the Soviets and their allies during World War II. This is one of the most celebrated national holidays in Russia and the other countries that were a part of the USSR. People go to see military parades and festive demonstrations. They lay wreaths and flowers on the graves of soldiers and those who died in the war. Family and friends congratulate veterans who wear their uniforms and medals on this day.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 28

Constitution Day, also called St. Vladimir Day, celebrates the signing of the Ukrainian Constitution in 1996. Concerts of popular Ukrainian singers are held in various venues, and the national media broadcast special patriotic shows. Since this is a relatively new holiday in Ukraine, there are not yet any traditions associated with this observance. This day also commemorates the feast day of St. Vladimir, or King Volodymyr, Grand Duke of Kiev and all of Russia, who introduced Christianity to Russia in 988.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: August 24

On this day in 1991 Ukraine became independent from the USSR and was declared a sovereign state. This day is celebrated all over Ukraine with festivals, military parades, and performances by military orchestras.

Religious Holidays

❁ CHRISTMAS EVE/DAY

Observed by: Orthodox Christians
Observed on: January 6–7

Christmas is a day of celebration for Christians all over the world because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, although no one knows when he was born. In Ukraine Christmas is celebrated according to the Julian calendar, as in other Orthodox Christian countries, on January 7. Ukrainian Christmas customs are based not only on Christian precepts, but primarily on those of the pre-Christian pagan culture and spirituality, elements of which survive to this day, hidden by a veneer of Christianity. When Christianity was brought to Ukraine in 988, the pagan religion and the traditions

Sviata Vecheria (Holy Supper)

Sviata Vecheria, or Holy Supper, was once a pagan feast that has been transformed into a Christian ritual, symbols and all. First, before anyone can be seated, two tablecloths cover the table: one is for the ancestors of the family, because Ukrainians believe that their souls visit the family on Christmas Eve to share the Holy Supper; the second is for the family's living members. Pagans believed that ancestors were benevolent spirits who, when shown proper respect, would bring good fortune to the living. A bit of hay is spread under the table and both tablecloths to remind those gathered that Jesus was born in a manger. There is always an extra place setting for the family's ancestors. Three braided, circular loaves of bread, called kolach, are stacked in the middle of the table, and a candle is placed in the center of the one on top. The three rings of bread symbolize the Holy Trinity; their circular shape is symbolic of eternity.

One of the most important Ukrainian customs is placing a sheaf of wheat, or mixed grain, stalks under the icons kept in the house. The stalks are called didukh (which means "grandfather") because they represent the family's ancestors, and Ukrainians believe that the spirits of their ancestors will reside in the stalks during the Christmas holidays.

Once the didukh has been positioned in the place of honor, the father (or head of the household) places a bowl of kutia (boiled wheat mixed with poppy seeds and honey) beside it. Kutia is the most important food of the Sviata Vecheria; it is known as God's food. A jug of uzvar (a mixture of 12 different stewed fruits), called God's drink, is also served.

Once the preliminary rituals have been performed, the father offers each member of the family a piece of bread dipped in honey, previously blessed by a priest, and the family prays. After the prayers, the father extends his best wishes to everyone with the greeting, "Khrystos razhdaietsia" ("Christ is born"), and everyone sits down to enjoy their 12-course meatless Holy Supper. The first course served must always be kutia because it is the main dish of the feast. Next, borscht (a hearty soup of beets or other vegetables) accompanied by vushka (boiled dumplings filled with chopped mushrooms and onions). The third course is some variety of fish, which can be prepared in a number of ways: baked, broiled, fried, served cold in aspic, fish balls, or marinated herring. The fourth course is varenyky (boiled dumplings filled with cabbage, potatoes, buckwheat grains, or prunes). Holubtsi (stuffed cabbage) is also one of the courses, and the meal concludes with uzvar.

associated with it were too deeply rooted in the people for the church to wipe them out utterly. It was more efficient, and prudent, to adopt a policy of converting most of the ancient customs and incorporating them. In this way many Christian holidays began. The ancient pagan feast associated with the winter solstice and those associated with fertility are now Christian Christmas customs.

In Ukraine, the Christmas festivities begin on Christmas Eve (January 6) and end on the Feast of the Epiphany. The Christmas Eve supper, or Sviata Vecheria (Holy Supper), brings the family together to share dishes prepared especially for the occasion and to begin their holiday with customs and traditions that reach back to antiquity. The rituals of Christmas Eve are dedicated to God, to the welfare of the family, and to the remembrance of ancestors. When the first star appears in the night sky, thought to be the star of Bethlehem, the family gathers for Sviata Vecheria (Holy Supper), a 12-course vegetarian meal. The pagans considered the meatless dishes sacrifices to their deities, and the 12 courses represented the 12 full Moons of the year. Orthodox Christians have continued the tradition of meatless dishes because the Church requires a fast before Christmas, which is called the Little, or Lesser Lent, to distinguish it from Great Lent, the 40-day fast observed before Pascha. The number of courses have been adapted to symbolize Jesus' 12 Apostles.

The traditional dishes served include kutia, vushka, some type of fish, vareniki, holubtsi, and three loaves of kolach (a special Christmas bread).

On Christmas Day, the festivities continue with church services and special Christmas delicacies. Traditionally families gather at lunch or dinner to celebrate Christmas with a special feast. A variety of meat items are served, especially goose and pork.

❁ FEAST OF JORDAN

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: January 19

On the eve of Jordan (January 18), families gather to share another vechera ("supper") similar to the Sviata Vechera enjoyed on Christmas Eve. This night is called Schedrij Vechir, which, loosely translated, means "bountiful night."

Jordan Day, also known as Epiphany Eve or Jordan Day, commemorates Jesus' Baptism by John the Baptist in the river Jordan, and falls on the eve of the Feast of Orthodox Epiphany. On this day special

Caroling in Ukraine

Many Ukrainian Christmas Eve traditions are solemn events, but caroling is a joyful and merry custom. The Christmas carols of Ukraine are of pre-Christian origin, as are many of the traditions enjoyed during the Christmas season, and there are two main varieties: the koliadky, sung on Christmas Eve and Christmas Day; and the shchedrivky, sung during the Feast of the Epiphany. Both the koliadky and shchedrivky are the most ancient Ukrainian folk songs, and reflect the country's pagan past, but many have been Christianized. One pagan carol is about a landowner awakened by a swallow (a herald of spring) and told to get ready to receive three guests: the Sun, the Moon, and the rain. In the Christian version the three guests have become Jesus, St. Nicholas, and St. George.

Ukrainian carols cover a wide range of subjects; though many have been rewritten to deal with Jesus' birth and its attendant festivities, others remain purely pagan and contain mythological elements from Ukraine's ancient past. The content of another group is focused primarily on Ukrainian history between the ninth and 12th centuries and relate the heroic deeds of the people's favorite. Most of the carols, however, are songs that glorify the country's agrarian past and its people.

In the Ukraine caroling is not a simple matter and requires a great deal of planning and thought. For example, each group must have a leader, someone to carry a bag and collect the gifts people give the group; another holds a stick to which a six-pointed star, with a light at the center, is attached to a long stick; this symbolizes the star over Bethlehem. And one person must be dressed as a goat. Some groups carry musical instruments with them including violins, a tsymbaly ("dulcimer") or the trembita (a wooden pipe between eight and ten feet in length, an instrument used in the Carpathian Mountains by the Hutsuls).

And carolers cannot simply stroll from house to house singing. It is actually a demanding performance. First the carolers must ask permission to sing. If the people of the household say "yes," then they enter the house and sing carols for everyone in the family, including the smallest children. Then the carolers perform a funny skit involving the goat. The goat that accompanies every caroling group originated in pagan fertility festivities. The goat represented the god of fertility; in the skit the goat dies and is then resurrected, following a common mythological motif. The goat's death also symbolized the death of winter and the birth of spring. Both of these pagan celebrations fit neatly into Christian mythology.

prayer services are held in all the churches in Ukraine, and blessed water is distributed to all parishioners, who then keep it in their homes throughout the year. Ukrainian families celebrate this day with a special feast.

❁ HOLY WEEK

Observed by: Orthodox Christians

Observed on: Begins on Lazarus Saturday

Easter, called Pascha in Eastern Orthodox Churches (because it is thought that the Last Supper shared by Jesus and his disciples was a Seder), and all of its related observances are known as "movable feasts" because the date of Pascha is recalculated every year based on the lunar calendar. The exact date each year is set to be observed on the Sunday after the first full Moon on or after the day of the vernal equinox. The Paschal cycle includes approximately 10 weeks before and seven weeks following Pascha. The 10 weeks before Pascha are sometimes called the period of the Triodion, which includes the three weeks preceding Great Lent (the "pre-Lenten period"), the 40 days of Lent, and Holy Week. (The 50 days after Pascha are known as the Pentecostarion.)

Devout Orthodox Christians observe the Great Lent—the six weeks (40 days) preceding Palm Sunday—and Great Week (Holy Week), which precedes Pascha (Easter). Lazarus Saturday begins Holy Week, or Great Week, eight days before Pascha. On this day, Orthodox Christians remember how Jesus raised his friend Lazarus from the dead. According to the Bible, he waited four days, until Lazarus was dead, before answering Martha and Mary's call. Jesus knew that his own death on the Cross was near. He knew that his own death was approaching and raised Lazarus from the dead so that the disciples would believe that he had power over life and death and was indeed "the resurrection and the life." This was the miracle that prepared the way for Jesus' triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

On Lazarus Saturday believers often prepare palm fronds by knotting them into crosses in preparation for the procession on Palm Sunday. In the Russian Orthodox Church, the custom developed of using pussy willows instead of palm fronds because palm fronds are not readily available. Since the kind of branches to be used is not established, some Orthodox believers use olive branches.

Palm Sunday, or the Triumphant Entry of Jesus into Jerusalem, falls on the last Sunday before Pascha. Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. The first three days of Holy Week recall Jesus' last teachings to his disciples. These teachings inspire the readings and hymns. The Gospels are read at Matins and Liturgy, and the entire Psalter and the four Gospels up to the point of the Lord's Passion are read during services on the first three days of Holy Week. Jesus was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe he was the Son of God incarnate and the second person of the Holy Trinity: the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Palm Sunday is as much about Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

Jesus had already foretold his betrayal and Resurrection to his disciples on the way to Jerusalem from Judea. The day was April 10, 30 C.E., according to some calculations. They stopped at the Mount of Olives, near Bethany, and Jesus sent two disciples to fetch a donkey and its foal that were tied at the crossway of two roads. They did so and placed their clothes on the foal to provide a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the prediction of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, a humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

Great and Holy Monday is observed six days before Pascha. On Holy and Great Monday the parable of the barren fig tree is repeated because the fig tree symbolizes those who think only of the external appearance of goodness, not what comes from the heart. The Gospels relate Jesus' prophecies about the fall of Jerusalem, wars and tribulations, and the end of the world.

Great and Holy Tuesday, five days before Pascha, emphasizes the seriousness of God's examination of our lives and the account we will have to give of ourselves. Orthodox Christians attend to Jesus' answers to the questions of the Pharisees and scribes and how he rebuked their envy and deceit. The Gospel tells of Jesus' prophecy of his second coming and the final judgment, and ends with the warning that Passover will be observed in two days, and Jesus will be betrayed and crucified.

On Great and Holy Wednesday, which falls four days prior to Pascha, Orthodox Christians remember the two women, one a harlot, the other virtuous, who anointed Jesus with myrrh. They also remember Ukrainian women dressed in multicolored traditional folk costumes, with small bells in their hands, smile as they approach the St. Michael Cathedral to attend Easter services in downtown Kiev. Judas' betrayal on this day because both occurred two days before the Passover, on Wednesday. Because the betrayal took place on Wednesday, Orthodox Christians fast on Wednesday throughout the year.

On Great and Holy Thursday, which falls three days before Pascha, known as Maundy Thursday in English-speaking countries, Orthodox Christians recall that this is the day on which Jesus and his disciples arrived in Jerusalem to celebrate what would be his last feast of the Passover, how Jesus washed the Apostles' feet, and his introduction of the Holy Eucharist.

Great and Holy Friday, known as Good or Black Friday in Western Churches, is observed two days before Pascha. It is a solemn observance and a day of mourning because it is the day Jesus was crucified. Orthodox Christians recall that Jesus was handed over to the soldiers, stripped of his clothing, crowned with thorns, was spat upon, and struck on his face and head. After this, carrying the Cross, Jesus came to Golgotha, and about the third hour was crucified between two thieves. They believe that Jesus died on the day when the Moon was full, at the time when Jewish law required the sacrifice of the Passover lamb.

Great and Holy Saturday is observed one day before Pascha, and recalls how Jesus is believed to have descended into hell to defeat death. It also commemorates his entombment. In Ukraine, Orthodox Christians begin to celebrate Pascha, the day on which they believe Jesus was resurrected from the dead, very late Saturday night (usually around midnight) when people go to church to attend the Easter vigil service. This day, usually known as Easter in English-speaking countries, is the most important

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Great Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. Pentecost, also called the Feast of the Holy Trinity or Radunitsa in Ukraine, celebrates the descent of the Holy Spirit on the Apostles of Jesus 50 days after his Resurrection. In English-speaking countries this may be a two-day observance called Whitsunday and Whitmonday. On this day people decorate their homes with greenery to signify new life. Wildflowers are believed to possess special spiritual powers, and people have them blessed by their priest, then dry them and place them behind the icons kept inside many homes. On this day young girls make garlands and throw them in rivers or lakes to foresee the future, an ancient Ukrainian pagan ritual.

✿ BIRTH

Godparents play an important role in the life of a Ukrainian child. The child’s first birthday is normally celebrated with an ancient custom called postryzhyny. The family prepares a big feast for this occasion. The godparents hold the child and position themselves near the feast on the table. One of the godparents places a coin inside a soup bowl and passes the bowl to the rest of the family. All of them drop coins in the bowl, which are collected and saved for the baby. Next the baby is made to sit on a high chair, and all the godparents cut off tiny locks of its hair. After this some vodka is poured into the bowl full of coins. The baby’s feet are then dipped into this bowl. This symbolizes that the child dominates over alcohol and money in his or her life. This alcohol is then drunk by the godparents. The rest of the day is spent partying with a lot of food, drinks, music, and dancing.

❁ MARRIAGE

A traditional Ukrainian wedding begins with a formal engagement. The groom and some elders visit the home of the bride and ask her parents for her hand in marriage. Both parties then exchange loaves of bread. If she wishes, the woman can reject her suitor by giving him a pumpkin instead of a loaf of bread. But if all goes well, the preparations for the wedding begin.

On the day before the wedding, many guests, along with the bride or groom, may walk through the village announcing the wedding. The bride usually has a farewell party where she, along with her friends, makes the biltse, a ritual tree, which will be used as a decorative piece during the wedding.

After a church wedding, both the bride's and groom's houses serve meals separately. A special bread, called a korovai, is baked for this occasion. After their meal the groom and his entourage go to the bride's house, where he pays a "ransom" for his wife. The couple then joins the bride's family at the dinner table. After the wedding cake is cut, the guests exchange gifts with the couple for drinks and the cake. Later the couple visits the groom's home, where the merrymaking continues. The next morning, the couple has a ceremonial breakfast.

❁ DEATH

Ukrainians have combined many traditional beliefs from pre-Christian times with the Christian traditions they follow. For example, they believe that good people die easy deaths while the bad suffer agonizing pain during their last hours. When a death occurs in a Ukrainian family, the windows and doors are opened to let out the soul. The body may be bathed with certain flowers or herbs. Funerals are held in the morning. Male voices are traditionally associated with Ukrainian funeral services to render an emotional farewell to the departed soul.

In Eastern Orthodox Churches, heaven is not a place or a static state. Rather, the Orthodox believe

Ukrainian Weddings

At a Ukrainian wedding following the solemn ceremony, guests often have great fun teasing the newlyweds by playing mischievous pranks. Sometimes they steal chickens and other small foodstuffs from other villagers and force their way into the groom's house. Or they visit other homes and take gates off their hinges or hide equipment. During Soviet times such good-natured pranks were discouraged.

humanity will be made perfect again, as God intended us to be, without hate, greed, and other negative characteristics. People who do not accept God's love and mercy will experience painful torment, but as the devout acquire a more profound sense of God's love and wisdom, they know heavenly bliss.

Dying alone is considered terrible in Ukraine because there would be no one to light the candle (held by a dying person), or to hear the person's last words. "May God prevent a death without people!" and "May God prevent a sudden death!" are two common exclamations heard in this country.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Over the past 10 years archaeologists working in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) have excavated numerous sites, including some on the more than 200 islands off the Emirates' Persian Gulf coast. In 2001 archaeologists completed a survey of 51 sites on Abu Al-Abyadh, the largest of the islands, where hearths, structures, and middens are found, in addition to pottery shards and flint tools and points. The sites there, as well as excavations on numerous islands and the mainland, indicate four primary periods of human activity: the Late Stone Age (c. 5500–4000 B.C.E.), the middle Bronze Age (c. 3000–2000), Late Pre-Islamic or Early Islamic (400–700 C.E.), and Late Islamic (1400–1950).

Of special interest are three flint “teeth,” the crescent-shaped blades of a kind of sickle found at other sites in the Near East but unknown in the UAE until now. These microliths (small pieces of worked stone), found at a site at the Abu Dhabi Airport Golf Club, would have been set in a wooden or bone handle and used to cut grass or grain. Even such small artifacts can tell part of a much larger story: The Late Stone Age people who inhabited the area were pastoral, not hunter-gatherers, although research has not yet revealed whether they were harvesting crops or wild plants. Other finds indicate the existence of trade routes that might have stretched across the Arabian Peninsula during the same period, evidence that the community enjoyed a broader economic base than one might think. It is believed that these inhabitants were Arab tribes.

In the medieval era the Arabian Gulf was a crucial route between Europe and Asia. The Portuguese captured this land in the early 1500s and occupied the areas of Sukatra, Muscat, Sahar, Khor Fakkan, and the Hormuz Strait. The Portuguese stayed until 1633 and were followed by the British who wanted to establish their control over sea routes to promote their trade with India. The Qawasim tribal confederation of UAE, a seafaring clan whose influence extended to the Persian side of the Gulf, resisted the British invasion. They had a fleet of about 900 vessels and were called pirates by the Europeans. By 1820, however, the British had destroyed all the ships of the Qawasims and burned down the coastal towns.

Over time the Persian Gulf gained in importance while the oil industry was developing at a rapid pace. Boundaries between the seven ruling sheikhs of the time had to be divided but this was a mammoth task as the sheikhs could never come to a consensus on their own. It was left to the British to demarcate the borders. Between World War I and World War II (1917–39), Saudi Arabia, Iran, and Iraq also claimed some of the Gulf region.

In 1968 the British announced their decision to leave the Gulf by 1971. They planned to create a single state consisting of Bahrain, Qatar, and the Trucial coast, and it would be called the United Arab Emirates. Qatar and Bahrain refused to join the union and became independent states when the British left in 1971. The United Arab Emirates was formed in 1971, and six of the sheikhdoms joined the union. The seventh, Ras-Al-Khaimah, joined the UAE in 1972. Over time, the UAE has emerged as one of the most developed and stable countries of the Arab world.

The United Arab Emirates sent troops to assist Kuwait in the Gulf War in 1990–91, strengthening the country's ties with the West.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is a federation of seven emirates: Abu Dhabi, Ajman, Dubai, Fujairah, Ras al-Khaimah, Sharjah, and Umm al Qaiwain. The country shares borders with the Sultanate of Oman, Qatar, and Saudi Arabia. The UAE is located on the Arabian Peninsular region and projects into the Persian Gulf. Most of the terrain in the Emirates' region consists of featureless, sandy deserts, with a hilly region located in the east of the union. There are no rivers or lakes in any of the states. The highest point is the Jabal Yibir at 5,010 feet. The northern and the eastern areas of the UAE are scenic with abundant greenery. The government of the United Arab Emirates has made concrete efforts to increase the greenery in this region and spends huge sums of money for this purpose. Apart from grasses, shrubs, and trees like acacia that grow naturally in the UAE, date palms are also found. Not many animals inhabit the UAE apart from the Arabian leopard, ibex, camel, and wild goat.

Summers are generally humid and breezy, lasting from May to September, when the temperature can soar beyond 104°F. The winters are relatively wetter and cold, especially in the desert regions.

❁ ECONOMY

The United Arab Emirates has one of the most liberal economies of the Gulf region. The UAE has an open economy with a high per capita income due to the crude oil reserves found in the deserts of this region. The oil industry generates large-scale employment and has drastically improved the general quality of life of the people during the last 30 years. Petroleum and petroleum products account for 73 percent of export revenues and are also major contributors to the country's gross domestic product (GDP). The major industries of the nation are oil production, petrochemicals, and fishing. The United Arab Emirates has good trade relations with Japan, India, South Korea, the United States, and the members of the European Union.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The states of the United Arab Emirates have an essentially Bedouin (nomadic) culture, still evident in the lifestyle of the people. Poetry, song, dance, and storytelling take cultural precedence over art and architecture in the Emirates as in most other cultures of the Gulf region. Emirati architecture incorporates elements of traditional Arabic style and decoration. The city mosques, national museum, and the royal palace are examples of Emirati architecture.

Emirati culture is influenced by the major religion of the country Islam. Most people belong to the

Pearl Diving

The Arabian Gulf was famous for producing some of the finest pearls in the world. The United Arab Emirates, along with the other countries in the Gulf region depended on the ancient pearl industry to provide the only real income for the people. As this industry flourished many families abandoned their nomadic lifestyle and began to settle in the coastal regions of Abu Dhabi and Dubai. These areas gradually grew into flourishing cities.

Pearl diving was a communal activity: A group of fishermen who were able to dive to as much as 130 feet without equipment worked in unison. Divers remained underwater for nearly a minute and a half, and they descended about 30 times in a day! The empty shells were thrown back into the sea because the divers believed that raindrops caught by those oysters would form pearls in the night. Many traditional songs have been written in their honor, and these songs were sung while the fishermen went out into the sea in search of precious pearls.

Wahhabi sect. However, the Emirati are not as strict and conservative as the Wahhabis of Saudi Arabia. The women enjoy more freedom compared to their counterparts in Saudi Arabia. They are educated and are not prohibited from driving vehicles. Most women wear the traditional Islamic veil and the long black loose dress. Some of the younger women wear stylish Western clothes beneath the black robe. Emirati women are conscious of the clothing trends of the rest of the world and give importance to makeup, perfumes, and accessories.

The people of the Emirates are sports enthusiasts. They enjoy auto racing, horse racing, camel racing, and soccer. Emirati literature, music, and dance are also well enjoyed in this region, and the music lays a strong emphasis on rhythm and features traditional Arab string instruments such as the tamboura and oud.

Singing and dancing are indispensable during celebrations. Young girls perform their characteristic dance by swinging their hair from side to side and by swaying their bodies in tune to the music. Men perform the traditional dance of al ardab, a stylized martial arts form: Two rows of male dancers face each other, waving sticks, rifles, and swords and singing challenges accompanied by drumbeats, cymbals, and the rhythmic clapping of hands.

☼ CUISINE

Emirati cuisine still carries the strong influence of their earlier nomadic life and consists of a good measure of food items such as rice, dates, and the meat of sheep and camels. These were foodstuffs that could be carried easily by the nomads while they wandered in the deserts of the region. Emirati cuisine also reflects the influence of Indian, Pakistani, Iranian, and Lebanese cuisines in its liberal use of a variety of spices such as cinnamon, cardamom, cloves, black pepper, onion, ginger, garlic, and lime. Good measures of sesame oil, pine nuts, walnuts, almonds, and parsley are also used.

A variety of fish and seafood, including lobster, crab, shrimp, tuna, kingfish, and red snapper are a part of daily meals in the Emirates. Milk is usually consumed in the form of laban (yogurt) or labneh (cream cheese). Specialties include hummus (a paste of chickpeas and sesame seeds), tabbouleh (crushed bulgur wheat, chopped tomatoes, onions, parsley, and mint); ghuzi (roast lamb with rice mixed with nuts), wara enab (grape leaves stuffed with rice), koussa mahshi (stuffed zucchini), and shawarma (grilled shavings of lamb or chicken, mixed with salad and rolled inside Arab bread). Emirati Muslims do not eat pork or drink alcohol, because both are forbidden by their religion.

Arab coffee (kabwa) is an important part of Emirati hospitality. The rich and aromatic kabwa is prepared by brewing roasted and ground coffee beans with water and spices. This concoction is served in tiny cups without sugar or milk.

❁ BIRTH

After childbirth Emirati women are allowed to rest and recover for 40 days. During this period female relatives and friends tend to the new mother and assist her in the daily chores. Fresh bread, butter, honey, and porridge made of fenugreek—a clover-like plant having white flowers and pleasantly bitter, slightly sweet seeds—are given to the mother. Visitors who have come to see the new baby often present the child with money and gifts.

❁ COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is a part of the Emirate's tradition and is carried out at puberty. The Muslims in the United Arab Emirates believe that, by undergoing this ritual, a boy becomes a man. This practice enjoys social backing and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations also follow this coming-of-age ritual.

Most marriages in the United Arab Emirates are arranged. Emirati weddings are elaborate affairs that last for several days. The bride is generally not seen by anyone except her family for 40 days before the wedding. She devotes this time to her preparations for the wedding and beauty care. She is lavished with all sorts of oils and perfumes to prepare her for her big day. The groom provides plenty of silver and gold jewelry to the bride's family, as well as cash as part of an agreed-upon bride-price (mebr). The couple signs a marriage contract called a milka. After the signing of the contract the couple is legally married, even though they may not consummate the marriage until the night of the wedding party.

During the week that precedes the wedding, traditional music, continuous singing, and dancing take place, reflecting the joy shared by the bride and the groom's families. Laylat al Henna, or the night of the henna, which takes place a couple of days before the wedding, is a very special women's night. On this night, the bride's hands and feet are decorated with henna. The bride also applies the traditional Arabian kohl or eyeliner. The groom has a henna night separately. On the wedding day the bride dyes her hair with henna and wears a white wedding gown. All the women who have come for the wedding are dressed in finery and gather inside the bride's house or a tent erected outside the house. The bride is brought inside the tent and is seated on a large chair. A traditional dance accompanied with singing and clapping is performed for her.

The groom, with his family, gathers inside a tent erected near the groom's house. They come in a procession to the bride's tent to pick her up. The night is spent at the groom's house. The celebrations continue throughout the following week.

In 1992 under the directives of His Highness Sheikh Zayed Bin Sultan Al-Nahyan (1918–2004), a Marriage Fund was set up in order to limit overspending on weddings and celebrations. This fund was intended to encourage Emirati men to marry Emirati women only; it helps cover the expenses of the wedding, setting up a family, thereby increasing the birth rate, and discouraging men from marrying foreigners.

❁ DEATH

On the occasion of a death in an Emirati family, the deceased is washed, shrouded in white cloth, and buried immediately. The following three days are spent in mourning. Friends, family, and well-wishers come, offer their condolences, and help the family.

In the United Arab Emirates women are not allowed to stay near a dying person and do not stay long near a dead body alone. The Emirati also believe that the dead body should not be left alone as the lonely dead become the prey of Satan. It is also a custom to buy the shroud and make funeral arrangements with the property of the dead person only. The body is buried without a coffin, facing Mecca.

Food snacks are prepared by neighbors and served to visitors. The mourning period for a widow is 4 months and 10 days, during which period her family and friends visit her often.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Although Britain was largely unlivable during the Ice Age, it has been inhabited for at least 500,000 years. Early Stone Age hunter-gatherers were eventually replaced by agrarian Neolithic settlements. Then a sophisticated megalithic culture arose in western England about 4,000 years ago. There are several types of structures called megaliths, which are usually made with extremely large stones, including menhirs (standing stones), dolmens (two or three standing stones that support a huge slab, thought to be burial sites), and stone circles. The British Isles and the European continent have numerous megalithic sites, the most famous of which is Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain in Britain.

Stonehenge was constructed in four distinct phases: pre-Stonehenge, between the ninth–eighth millennia B.C.E.; Stonehenge 1, c. 3100; Stonehenge 2, c. 2550; and Stonehenge 3, c. 2100. Other important megalithic sites in Britain include Avebury, which covers 28 acres, the largest stone circle in the world; Long Meg and Her Daughters, a Bronze Age structure and the third largest circle in Britain; and Stanton Drew near Bristol, a huge megalithic complex with three stone circles and two stone avenues.

With the exception of Stonehenge's earliest phase, these megaliths were built by Celtic tribes, known as Britons, that crossed the Channel from Western and continental Europe, mainly from France, around 2500. Apparently Phoenician traders gave these tribes their name, which indicates that, even this early, the island was already involved in a European trading network.

The name Briton (or Britain) may have been derived from Pritani, a Celtic word that means “painted.” In the 4th century B.C.E. the Celts’ influence and territories covered the length of Europe and stretched from Britain to Asia Minor. They were famous throughout much of the Western world because they painted and tattooed their bodies. It is also possible that the name Britain was derived from the goddess Brigid, the threefold goddess of the Celts. (In one of her aspects she is the goddess of poetry.)

The Greek explorer Pytheas of Massalia visited a group of islands in 325 B.C.E. that he called Pre-taniké; the two major ones he called Albion (Albion) and Ierne (Erin), which may indicate that Pythias’s information came from the Celtic-speaking inhabitants of the islands themselves. The Britons were significant players in continental politics and supported their allies in Gaul militarily during the Gallic Wars with the Roman Republic. This prompted the Romans to invade and subdue the island, first with Julius Caesar’s raid in 55 B.C.E., and then with the Emperor Claudius’s conquest in the following century. In 43 C.E. after an ousted tribal ally appealed to him, Claudius sent Aulus Plautius with four legions to Britain. Because the island was a safe haven for Gallic rebels and the like, it would have been unwise for Rome to continue to ignore it. Moreover, it was an attractive target for Rome because of its mines and because it had promise as a source of slaves. In fact, Claudius made a trip to the island after it had been subdued, bringing reinforcements and elephants. During this second invasion, the Romans brought Christianity with them to the Celtic tribes—the Irish, Cornish, Welsh, Scottish.

When Rome withdrew its armies early in the fifth century C.E. Germanic tribes were happy to occupy the power vacuum created by the Romans’ departure. Exactly how, or why, the Anglo-Saxons immigrated to the British Isles remains unclear, and historians disagree about whether they came as invading conquerors or as mercenaries in response to a plea for help from Vortigern, a fifth-century Briton warlord. Wherever the truth may lie, archaeologists agree that Britain was in sad shape after the Roman withdrawal: the roads were in disrepair and the manufacture of goods was cruder.

The Anglo-Saxons were originally several different Germanic tribes—the Angles, Saxons, Jutes, and Frisians (and, perhaps, some Franks)—from the peninsula of Angeln, which protruded into the Baltic Sea, and what is now Lower Saxony, on the northwest coast of Germany. These several tribes became dominant in southern Britain beginning around the mid-fifth century. Eventually these became a single people around the ninth century, the Anglo-Saxons, and became, for the most part, the basic genetic stock of modern England, its people, and their language and culture.

According to the venerable Bede (c. 672–735), Vortigern granted Thanet in Kent to the Jutish warrior leader Hengist (or Hengest) in return for his help in repelling the invading Picts and any other enemies. Vortigern’s subsequent refusal to pay the Saxon mercenaries led to Hengest’s rebellion and the conquest of England during the next 200 years. Archaeological explorations have indicated that Anglo-Saxon kingdoms were established in Kent, Sussex, Middlesex, and Essex in the latter part of the fifth century, as well as East Anglia, Lindsey (now Lincolnshire), Deira (now East Yorkshire), and the Isle of Wight. Archaeologists have found the remains of several Saxon warriors buried around 600 in Suffolk, and one of them was interred with his sword, shield, and horse. The Britons resisted and fought the invaders, possibly led by the legendary King Arthur, and successfully stopped further incursions.

But the Britons were eventually unsuccessful in their efforts to discourage the Germanic tribes. By the end of the seventh century Anglo-Saxons controlled most of what is now England and the victorious tribes established kingdoms that were later combined and called the Heptarchy.

The terms England and English, used to refer to the territory, its people, and their language, were derived from the name of one of the Germanic tribes, the Angles. Genetic research on the modern-day populations of the United Kingdom supports history as it was recorded by Bede and others: Apparently the Germanic tribes wiped out between 50 and 100 percent of the Romano-British Celtic population. Twenty-first-century genetic studies support the traditional story that a Saxon conquest, and genocide did occur. Only the Welsh seem to have escaped the slaughter. The English, as well as the Scottish and Cornish, are the descendants of the Anglo-Saxons and Vikings. The Welsh, on the other hand, are genetically related to the Irish (not including Ulster), the Highland Scots, and the Basques.

Starting in the early ninth century, Vikings began raiding the coastlines of Britain, and invaded northern Scotland, Cumbria, and Lancashire. These marauders were eventually followed by waves of settlers, and the Vikings rapidly expanded their areas of control. These incursions, however, resulted in the consolidation of the various Germanic groups, leading to unification under Alfred the Great (849–99), the first king of England. Following Alfred’s defeat of the Vikings at the Battle of Edington in the late ninth century, he established the Danelaw in the Treaty of Wedmore. The Danelaw was an area of England

Missionaries Christianized Brigid, making her the foster-mother of Jesus, and called her St. Brigit.

Fun Fact

In 601, St. Gregory I (the Great) (r. 590–604) instructed Abbot Mellitus to build Christian churches wherever he found pagan stone circles because he thought the Celts would more readily embrace Christianity in familiar surroundings.

Fun Fact

The Lady of the Lake, a figure sometimes associated with Brigid because one of her aspects was connected with fire and metalworking, was said to have forged Excalibur, King Arthur's sword.

still under the control of the Viking leader Guthrum, but the long-term result was a consolidation of power for Alfred. Guthrum would eventually become a Christian, and the Danelaw was destroyed by ongoing Anglo-Saxon attacks. Finally, the region was assimilated into the new kingdom called England by Eadweard I, or Edward the Elder (c. 874–77–924).

Then in 1066, yet another invasion from across the English Channel occurred, when William of Orange (c. 1028–87), a French Norman, landed on the southern coast. King Harald II (c. 1022–66), the last Anglo-Saxon king of England, had just returned from fighting off an invading army of Norwegians, but he hurried south with his army and engaged William at the famous Battle of Hastings. Harald was killed during the encounter, and William became the new ruler of England.

The Anglo-Norman nobility took over administration and government at every level and changed the English language forever. The nobility, speaking proto-French for the next 300 years, ruled over English commoners, who continued to speak Anglo-Saxon (or Old English). The result was a Romance-Germanic hybrid of Middle English widely spoken in Chaucer's time, and Modern English retains the class distinctions. Because the Normans ruled England and constituted the elite class, virtually all of the words associated with government, law, religion, and commerce still used in the 21st century came from Norman French. While the nobility chatted amiably in French, the peasants were eating and swearing in Anglo-Saxon. The result is clear: The cost of one's table and what one could afford to eat on it left behind pairs of competing Anglo-Saxon and Norman French words for meat: deer/venison, sheep/mutton, ox/beef, swine/pork.

The Middle Ages (fifth century to 1517 in Europe) were characterized by internal disputes between the ruling kings and civil war and strife. Over the centuries, England was in conflict with the remaining Celtic strongholds, Ireland, Wales, and Scotland repeatedly. There were constant clashes between the nobility and the monarchs, and this led to a civil war in the middle of the 17th century. Eventually though the United Kingdom was formed by a number of Acts of Union, which led to the unification of the kingdoms of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. In 1536–43, England and Wales were joined; Scotland and Ireland were added later, in 1707 and 1800, respectively.

During the 16th century Britain went through a colonial period, although its attempts to gain a foothold in France were continually frustrated. The Spanish and Portuguese monarchs were also enriching their regimes with the wealth of their new colonies in the Western Hemisphere. So England began colonizing the east coast of North America. At the same time the East India Company was formed, which soon exceeded its trading purposes and started acquiring various states in India. Later, all these acquisitions were taken over by the Crown, and soon England was in possession of all of Burma, Ceylon, and even a part of Afghanistan, as well as many countries in Africa and Asia. In the 1770s the American colonies challenged British rule and became independent after the American War of Independence (also known as the Revolutionary War). Nevertheless it has been said that "the Sun never set" on the British Empire under Queen Victoria (1819–1901). Britain became extremely wealthy and powerful as a result of its territorial control.

At roughly the same time while the nation was extending its reach around the world, the late 18th and the beginning of the 19th centuries witnessed a period of economic and social upheaval and modernization called the Industrial Revolution, and London became the major social and cultural center of England.

The end of World War I was followed by widespread unrest. The United Kingdom had not yet recovered from the effects of World War I when the Great Depression occurred in 1929. Even though the country had financed itself during the war, there was a major slump in foreign investments and this led to an economic crisis. Some areas of the United Kingdom had begun to recover during the 1930s while others remained depressed. Unemployment and poverty were prevalent.

By 1936 the possibility of yet another war had also become evident. Britain entered the war (along with France) two days after Hitler invaded Poland in 1939. During the Second World War England was heavily and frequently bombed by Germany and, despite the eventual victory of the Allies (primarily the United Kingdom, the United States, and the USSR), the country lost many resources by the end of World War II.

Following the end of World War II in 1945, many European colonies, including those of the United Kingdom, began to demand their freedom, and the dismantling of the British Empire began. In 1947 one of Britain's prime Asian colonies India gained independence. This was followed by Malaysia in 1957, then Kenya in 1963. As Asian, African, and Western Hemisphere colonies demanded, and got, their independence, colonialism ended. This also served to hasten the process of rebuilding the United Kingdom into a modern and prosperous European nation.

The United Kingdom is a member of the Commonwealth of Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and is also a permanent member of the UN Security Council. Although it is a member of the European Union (EU), it has not adopted the Euro currency.

Fun Fact

Ironically the Norman French were also Norse-men, or Northmen, descendants of the Vikings.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The United Kingdom is situated in Western Europe. It lies between the North Atlantic Ocean and the North Sea and is separated from France by the English Channel. It is made up of the island of Great Britain (shared by England, Scotland, and Wales), the northern one-sixth of Ireland, and several other smaller islands. The United Kingdom's Northern Ireland shares a 224-mile international land boundary with the Republic of Ireland. The Channel Tunnel (chunnel), dug under the English Channel and finished in 1994, now links the United Kingdom with France.

The landscape of the United Kingdom is quite varied. One can enjoy the chalk cliffs of Kent and Dorset, the hills of southeast England, Cornwall's granite cliffs, the Welsh mountains, the highlands of the Peak District and the Pennines, Cumbria's lakes and mountains, Scotland's lowlands, uplands, and islands, and the breathtaking fields, lakes, and mountains of Northern Ireland, all in one country.

The 10 highest mountains of the United Kingdom are all found in Scotland, the highest being Ben Nevis (4,409 feet). The highest point in Wales is Snowdon (3,560 feet), while that of England is Scafell Pike (3,209 feet); Northern Ireland's highest point is Slieve Donard (2,795 feet). The longest river in the United Kingdom is the Severn River, which flows through both England and Wales. Other important rivers are the Thames (England), Tay (Scotland), Bann (Northern Ireland), and Towy (Wales).

The United Kingdom is estimated to be made up of 1,098 small islands, some natural and some manmade, built of stone and wood and made bigger by natural waste accumulation.

The noted 18th-century English writer and lexicographer Samuel Johnson (1709–84) said, “When two Englishmen meet, their first talk is of the weather.” This may be because of the country's highly unpredictable weather. In general the climate can be classified as temperate with warm summers, cool winters, and an abundance of rain throughout the year. However, it is situated at the junction between the warm tropical air to the south and the cold polar air to the north. This temperature variation creates instability and is the main cause of the notoriously unsettled weather the United Kingdom experiences in a single day. Winters are generally cool, wet, and windy, with the mercury dipping to 50°F on average, and it is much lower farther upland. Summers, on the other hand, are generally dry with the maximum temperature reaching 86°F.

At one time the United Kingdom was heavily forested, but deforestation has wreaked havoc over the years, reducing the tree cover to the second lowest in Europe (after the Republic of Ireland). Alders, birches, cherries, oaks, plums, hawthorns, hazels, pines, poplars, and willows are some of the native trees. About 25 percent of the land is arable. During springtime lovely flowers like snowdrops, daffodils, bluebells, primrose, buttercups, and cowslips add color to the English countryside.

The United Kingdom has an abundance of red deer, which is also the largest mammal in England. There are also fox, badgers, hedgehogs, rabbits, squirrels, and many varieties of small rodent. England's only poisonous snake, the adder, is rare and protected.

❁ ECONOMY

The United Kingdom has a prosperous economy and is one of the world's important centers of trading and finance. Agriculture is intensive, highly mechanized, and efficient by European standards, producing about 60 percent of the nation's food needs while requiring only 1 percent of the labor force. The United Kingdom is also naturally blessed with large supplies of coal, natural gas, and oil, so energy production contributes 12 percent to the country's gross domestic product (GDP). The service sector, particularly banking, insurance, and business services, is the largest contributor to the country's GDP. The industrial sector employs 25 percent of the workforce and contributes 21 percent to GDP. The United Kingdom is Europe's largest manufacturer of cars, armaments, petroleum products, personal computers, televisions, and mobile telephones. It also exports manufactured goods, fuels, chemicals, food, beverages, and tobacco, and its main trading partners are the United States, Germany, France, the Netherlands, Ireland, Belgium, Spain, and Italy. In 1973 the United Kingdom joined the European Economic Community (EEC), which evolved into the European Union (EU).

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The United Kingdom is the birthplace of such cultural giants as Sir Isaac Newton, Charles Darwin, William Shakespeare, Stephen Hawking, and the Beatles. It is also home to the world's largest foreign exchange markets, the world's richest football (soccer) club Manchester United, the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the inventors of the steam engine, locomotive, television, telephone, submarine, the three-piece suit, and the World Wide Web.

William Shakespeare is probably the most famous writer in world history. Other famous writers that this country has produced are Chaucer, Sir

Fun Fact

During his gambling days, the Earl of Sandwich considered eating meals to be an unwelcome interruption of the time spent gambling, so he invented a kind of meal that did not require him to leave the gaming tables. He would ask for two slices of bread with layers of a meat and cheese between them. Soon this became a favorite item, and the name was shortened from “whatever the Earl of Sandwich has” to “sandwiches”!

Cricket

It is difficult to determine the origins of cricket, though there is a reference in the household accounts of King Edward I in 1300 of a game like cricket being played in Kent. It is also known that this game originated in the sheep-rearing country of the southeast United Kingdom, where the short grass helped bowling a ball at a target, usually the wicket-gate of the sheep pasture, which was defended with a bat in the form of a shepherd's crooked baton. The game had become quite popular by the 17th century, particularly in Kent, Sussex, and London. By the middle of the 18th century, cricket, which started as an elite game, was being played at every level of society.

However, the game lacked a coherent set of rules. The first and most influential cricket club in United Kingdom was at Hambledon, Hampshire, in the 1760s. It was the Hambledon Club, which established techniques of batting and bowling that still hold today, and Hambledon is credited with being the birthplace of cricket. The game then shifted its base to London, notably with the formation of the Marylebone Cricket Club (MCC), which had its headquarters at Lord's ground. In 1835 the MCC gave cricket its first rules, which still stand largely intact today. The game spread to the colonies of the United Kingdom, especially the Indian subcontinent, South Africa, and Australia.

Walter Scott, the Brontë sisters (Charlotte, Emily, and Anne), Jane Austen, Thomas Hardy, Agatha Christie, Virginia Woolf, D. H. Lawrence, J. R. R. Tolkien, Charles Dickens, and J. K. Rowling. Important poets include John Donne, Lord Byron, John Keats, Samuel Coleridge, William Wordsworth, Robert Burns, Robert Browning, Alfred Lord Tennyson, Gerard Manley Hopkins, Matthew Arnold, William Blake, T. S. Eliot, and Dylan Thomas.

The stately homes, castles, and cathedrals of the United Kingdom are overwhelming. The architecture has a diverse history from Stonehenge to Buckingham Palace to Big Ben and the notorious Tower of London. One of its most famous architects is Christopher Wren.

The British are said to be reserved in their manners, dress, and speech. They are famous for their courtesy, self-discipline, and wry sense of humor. England does not have a national costume, but that of Scotland is the kilt, which is worn around the waist. In Wales the women wear long skirts with petticoats and shawls.

Bird-watching is very popular in the United Kingdom, as is gardening. Sports are another favorite pastime of the people in the United Kingdom. The national sport is cricket and other sports are football (soccer), rugby, tennis, net ball, golf, horse racing, polo, and foxhunting. The world's oldest and most famous tennis tournament, Wimbledon, started at a small club in south London in the 19th century. The tournament begins on the Monday nearest to June 22. It is traditional for visitors to eat strawberries and cream while watching the game. The Derby originated here, as did the Grand National, which is the most demanding horse race in the world. Ascot, a small town in the south of England, becomes the center of the horse-racing world for one week in June. It is called Royal Ascot because the Queen always goes to Ascot. The Ascot race is also famous for the designer hats that ladies wear.

The United Kingdom is also noted for its achievements in the world of classical music. English composers William Byrd, John Taverner, Thomas Tallis, Henry Purcell, and, more recently, Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Arthur Sullivan, and Benjamin Britten, have made significant contributions in classical music.

The United Kingdom, with the United States, has been the main contributor to the development of rock and roll music. It is the home of the Beatles, Queen, the Rolling Stones, Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, Deep Purple, Oasis, and the Spice Girls. Colonial influences are manifested in the bhangra (music from the Indian state of Punjab) and Jamaican reggae.

Scottish folk music includes many kinds of songs, the most famous being ballads and laments, sung by a single singer to the accompaniment of bagpipes, fiddles, or harps. Traditional dances include waltzes and jigs. Wales is a Celtic country that features folk music played at twmpathau (communal dances) and gwyl werin (music festivals).

Fun Fact

London has the largest nonwhite population of any European city, and over 250 languages are spoken there.

CUISINE

Although the British culture does not stand out for its culinary excellence, it has made its contribution to world cuisine by introducing the steak culture and sandwiches (attributed to the Earl of Sandwich, 1718–92).

British cuisine has been greatly influenced by its numerous former colonies. From eastern Asia the British acquired a love for tea, and from India, curry and spices. Nowadays most towns in the United Kingdom have Indian restaurants serving curries, but the dish threatening to become the British national dish is chicken tikka masala (barbecued chicken in spicy gravy).

Fish and chips is a British institution in itself. This deep-fried battered fish served with deep-fried potato fingers is one of the most class-defying dishes in Britain—eaten anywhere and everywhere by everyone. It is also the most dominant takeout food item in the United Kingdom.

Another traditional dish of the United Kingdom is Yorkshire pudding. It is a savory dish, which is made from batter and most often served with roast beef. It is also eaten with sausage or other dishes, or on its own accompanied by gravy. Steak and kidney pie is another typical British dish with a filling of diced beefsteak and beef kidneys in a thick sauce. Most often it is a single-crust pie, which means that the filling is covered but not completely enclosed by the pastry. As far as desserts are concerned, the British love puddings, and the famous Christmas pudding is made in every kitchen.

Tea is not only a drink in the United Kingdom, it is also the name of two meals: tea (served between 3:30–5 P.M.) and high tea (served around 6 P.M.). But most British drink tea throughout the day. On average, the British population drinks more than 200,000,000 cups of tea every day! Tea is generally served with scones, sandwiches, biscuits, and assorted cakes. The British are also fond of beer, gin, and whisky. And who has not heard of the famous Scotch whisky?

Public/Legal Holidays

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is widely celebrated as New Year's Day. Celebrations take place all over the world, and revelries begin the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve). In London the British gather in Piccadilly Circus and Trafalgar Square. As the clock strikes midnight, they listen to the chimes of Big Ben (a world-famous clock), cheer the New Year, and sing "Auld Lang Syne" (an old English song written by Robert Burns [1759–96]). Also the British believe that on New Year's Day the first person entering the house (whom they call a first-footer) should be a healthy and handsome young man with dark hair carrying coal, money, salt, and bread in his pocket. The British believe that this will bring good luck to the members of the family, and their New Year will be filled with good health, happiness, and wealth. Also, it is considered unlucky if the first-footer on New Year's Day is a woman or anyone with red hair.

In Scotland, preparations for New Year's Day involve cleaning the house and preparing a traditional meal consisting of black buns, shortbread, oatcakes, cheese, wine, and whiskey. Here, New Year's Eve is also known as hogmanay (a term derived from the traditional Scottish oatcake). Scots celebrate by burning an effigy of "auld wife" (the old year) since they believe that it is evil and should be banished so that the new year can arrive. They make a dummy called "auld wife" with the help of rags, twigs, and straw, and drag it through the streets of the city or town. The effigy is drowned, burned, or buried. As in England, the first-footing superstition is prevalent in Scotland.

In Welsh villages on New Year's Day, young boys go from door to door around four in the morning and perform a small ritual in every house in the village to bring them good luck in the coming year. It involves sprinkling water with evergreen twigs on the inhabitants and in each room of the house.

❁ MAY DAY BANK HOLIDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday in May

Early May Bank Holiday falls on the first Monday in May. May 1 is celebrated as May Day, also known as Labor Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. Although Labor Day is not observed in the United Kingdom, on this day special parties and parades are organized throughout the nation. The main highlights of the celebrations include the coronation of a May Queen (a teenager who inaugurates the May Day celebrations), the celebration of the legend of the Green Man (a man with foliage as hair and green leaves as his beard and moustache who symbolizes the spirit of nature), and ritual dancing around a tall, wooden pole decorated with colorful ribbons at the top, popularly known as the maypole.

Fish and Chips

Fish and chips used to be eaten separately. The original dish of fried fish was introduced in the United Kingdom by Spanish and Portuguese Jews in the 17th and 18th centuries. Potatoes were also introduced in Europe in the 17th century. While the fish dish became tremendously popular in London and the southeast of Britain (even Charles Dickens mentions a "fried fish warehouse" in Oliver Twist), deep-fried potatoes known as "chips" were becoming increasingly popular in northern England. It is not clear when the two dishes were joined, but the earliest known fish and chips shop was opened in London in 1860. The dish became so popular that during World War II, fish and chips was the only dish that was not rationed in the United Kingdom. The most preferred fish for this dish is the cod, though other white fish are also used. The dish is traditionally served with salt and vinegar; other popular dressings are ketchup and tartar sauce.

Fun Fact

Bank Holidays in England are traditional holidays and trace their origins to an earlier era when, on specific days, banks remained closed and most businesses were unable to function. A special law was passed in 1871 recognizing bank holidays. In England and Wales there are six bank holidays: New Year's Day, Easter Monday, May Day (not necessarily May 1), Spring and Late Summer Holidays at the end of May and August respectively, and Boxing Day. January 2 is a Bank Holiday only in Scotland.

The maypole continues to play a key role in many May Day and Beltane festivities and rites. (Beltane is an old Gaelic celebration. It one of the eight solar holidays of the Wiccan religion and is a cross-quarter day—one falling midway between a solstice and an equinox—celebrated in the Northern Hemisphere on May 1 and in the Southern Hemisphere on November 1.) Maypoles several centuries old in the United Kingdom are usually erected on village greens, and events are often supervised by local Morris dancing groups. Ribbons were not added to maypoles until the 19th century, when John Ruskin (1819–1900) came up with the idea. Pairs of boys and girls (or men and women) stand alternately around the base of the pole, each holding the end of a ribbon. They weave in and around each other, boys going one way and girls going the other intertwining the ribbons around the pole until the merrymakers meet at the base. Sometimes a crown of flowers is situated atop the maypole, supported by the ribbons, so that it gradually descends the pole as the ribbons are woven together more and more tightly, finally falling to the ground. There are also more complex dances for set numbers of (practiced) dancers, involving complicated weaves and unweaves, but many of them have been forgotten.

☞ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Last Sunday of Lent

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus' mortal life. He was the prophet of Christianity, and Christians believe he was the Son of God incarnate and the second person of the Holy Trinity (the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit). The day is as much about his triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. Jesus' arrival in Jerusalem was, indeed, the path to the Cross.

Jesus had already foretold his betrayal and Resurrection to his disciples on the way to Jerusalem from Judea. The day was April 10, 30 C.E., according to some calculations. They stopped at the Mount of Olives, near Bethany, and Jesus sent two disciples to the village of Bethphage to bring him a donkey and its foal, tied at the crossway of two roads. They did so and placed their clothes on the foal to provide a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches on the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, a humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches and the laying of garments in his path because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans.

☞ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, usually referred to as Holy Thursday outside English-speaking countries and in the Roman Catholic Church, is the Thursday before Easter, the day on which the Last Supper is said to have occurred, and Jesus created the ritual of the Holy Eucharist. The Middle English word maundy, used only in this context, is derived from Old French mandé, which came from the Latin mandatum novum do vobis, "a new commandment I give unto you," the words reported to have been those spoken by Jesus to his disciples after washing their feet in preparation for the Last Supper. Foot washing is increasingly popular as a part of Holy Thursday liturgies in many churches.

This day is also called Sheer Thursday because it is the day of cleaning (schere) and because the churches themselves changed liturgical colors from the dark tones of Lent. In the United Kingdom, it is the custom for the reigning monarch to distribute Maundy money.

GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday commemorates the Crucifixion of Jesus, so it is observed as a somber, solemn occasion. It falls on the Friday before Easter and is the last Friday of Lent (an austere season of fasting and penitence). In the United Kingdom devout Christians attend a service in their local churches at around 3 o'clock in the afternoon, since they believe that Christ was crucified around this time. They offer prayers and remember his life and teachings. Also a reading of passages from the Holy Bible that narrate his journey to the Cross takes place in many parts of the United Kingdom.

Since this is a day of mourning for Christians, churches are devoid of any decorations, and even portraits and pictures inside the church are covered with a cloth. An interesting Good Friday tradition involves eating hot cross buns and fish. Tradition maintains that hot cross buns baked on Good Friday have magical powers and will not spoil for a year.

A number of superstitious beliefs are associated with Good Friday. Fishermen do not catch fish on this day, and farmers do not plant crops, since it is believed that iron should not enter the ground on this day. Also sailors used to take hot cross buns with them on their sailing ventures, since they believed that these buns would protect them from shipwrecks.

EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. This day is of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his followers from the penalty of sin. The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have become associated with the festival. They are considered the symbol of new life.

In the United Kingdom on Easter, special Easter services are held to celebrate Jesus' Resurrection. Easter eggs and gifts (usually chocolates) are exchanged. Easter bunnies are another favorite Easter toy and are extremely popular in the United Kingdom. Children participate in Easter bonnet-tying and basket-making competitions. The winners receive beautifully decorated Easter eggs. Children

Poppies

The poppy is the flower worn on Remembrance Day in many parts of the world. The poppy came to symbolize Remembrance Day because it was the only flower that continued to bloom in Flanders, despite the mayhem in its surroundings, during World War I. During the war in the same area, buildings, ports, roads, and trees were completely destroyed. Farms and buildings were razed to the ground, the region was covered with mud and bodies, and only a few men survived. Thus the poppy was practically the only the sign of life. Since then the poppy has become a symbol of hope and assurance.

A traditional Easter meal consists of Easter biscuits (also known as cakes), boiled eggs, and roast lamb. Children and adults alike love to eat chocolate eggs, which also serve as excellent Easter presents for children.

Easter Monday is the first day of Easter Week and is generally regarded as a continuation of Easter Sunday. The day was once part of a weeklong celebration but was later made a one-day holiday. It is a day filled with fun and frolic. Egg-rolling competitions are extremely popular in England. This involves rolling hard-boiled eggs down slopes and grassy banks. The rules of the game vary from region to region, and the person judged the winner might be the one whose egg rolls the farthest or survives the roll down the hill.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

This is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom Christians believe was the Son of God. In the United Kingdom Christmas celebrations begin on Christmas Eve (December 24) and last until Boxing Day on December 26. Weeks before Christmas people start buying cards and gifts as well as decorative items to adorn their homes and Christmas trees. It has long been an old Christmas tradition in England for children to hang up their stockings on Christmas Eve. They expect a visit from Santa Claus who is supposed to come down the chimney bringing them gifts. They leave out a carrot for the reindeer and mince pie and brandy for Santa. Children also believe that Santa will bring them a special Christmas present if they were good during the past year.

Christmas Day is celebrated with great joy and enthusiasm in England. Children wake up early in the morning and are delighted to see their stockings stuffed with presents brought by Santa Claus. People attend church in the morning and offer prayers on this special day. In the afternoon the entire family gathers around the Christmas tree, open their Christmas presents, and sing Christmas carols. A major highlight of the celebration is the Queen's annual Christmas speech. Her address is broadcast live on television and radio throughout the United Kingdom.

Hot Cross Bun Ceremony

A traditional Hot Cross Bun Ceremony takes place at a London pub called "The Widow's Son" on Good Friday. The tradition began in the 19th century when this place wasn't a pub but the home of a widow whose son was a sailor away at sea. He was expected to return for Easter, and she had baked a hot cross bun for him. Although her son never returned, she kept on baking hot cross buns every year on Good Friday, hoping for his safe return. After her death successive landlords have continued the practice in memory of the widow.

In general, the British spend Christmas with friends and family. Their traditional Christmas dinner consists of roasted stuffed turkey, roasted vegetables and potatoes, cranberry juice, bread sauce, and furmenty (Christmas plum pudding). An interesting custom related to Christmas is mummering. Mummers are people who get dressed up in colorful costumes and masks, march in procession, and often perform plays that depict biblical stories. Mummering is staged in many towns and villages throughout England.

BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

Boxing Day is celebrated on the day after Christmas. This day is also celebrated as St. Stephen's Day; St. Stephen was the first Christian martyr. In earlier days servants in the United Kingdom worked on Christmas Day and took a day off on December 26 to visit their friends and family. It is believed that, as they were leaving, their masters would put some money, food items, clothing, and other gifts in boxes and present them to their servants. Also the church boxes meant for collecting money for charitable purposes were opened, and the money distributed among the poor.

In the 21st century, people give small gifts or tips to milkmen, newspaper boys, and other tradespeople on Boxing Day. It is also a day of foxhunting in the United Kingdom. Riding a horse, preceded by a pack of dogs that sniff out the foxes and chase them, hunters enjoy Boxing Day. However, wildlife activists have strongly opposed this cruel tradition and have started a campaign to place a ban on foxhunting throughout the year.

ST. GEORGE'S DAY

Observed in: England

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: April 23

St. George is the patron saint of England, and every year on April 23 St. George's Day is celebrated to mark the birth of this Christian saint. It is also the national day of England. St. George was an accomplished warrior in the Roman Empire who had earned the title of centurion due to his courage, loyalty, and sense of honor. He was also known as George the Victorious, in recognition of the innumerable battles he won. With the advent of Christianity he was influenced by the religion and took a vow to protect Christians. But his support of Christianity invited the ire of the Roman Empire, and he was asked to denounce Christianity. When he refused he was tortured to death.

No elaborate celebrations take place in England on this day. It is observed in a solemn manner. In some parts of England scouts and guides organize a ceremonial parade on the Sunday nearest to April 23 and attend prayer services held in honor of St. George to pay their respects to their patron saint. Also people throughout England wear red roses, the national flower of England, on this day.

❁ GUY FAWKES NIGHT

Observed in: England

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 5

Guy Fawkes Night, or Bonfire Night, commemorates the Gunpowder Plot hatched by a group of Roman Catholics (including Guy Fawkes) to blow up the English Parliament and kill King James I of England. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth I of England (1533–1603), certain laws had been passed against Roman Catholics. When King James I (1566–1625) ascended to the English throne after her death, Catholics had hoped that he would treat them fairly, but he continued to uphold the laws passed by Queen Elizabeth I. So a group of Roman Catholics, led by Robert Gatesby, hatched a plot that involved assassinating King James I and blowing up Parliament on the opening day of the parliamentary session, November 5, 1605.

To accomplish this they bought the house next to Parliament that had a cellar connected to parliament's. They hoped to sneak barrels of gunpowder into the cellar of Parliament and blow up the entire building with everyone inside it. Guy Fawkes was given the charge of the barrels and the task of lighting them at the correct moment. However, he was captured and imprisoned the day before. After days of torture and brutal treatment, he told the soldiers about the alleged plot and named all those involved in the conspiracy.

On this day the British celebrate the fact that the conspiracy was foiled. Throughout the country huge bonfires are lit in towns and villages, followed by spectacular displays of fireworks. An effigy of Guy Fawkes is set on fire. Also people cook hot potatoes (wrapped in foil), have hot soup, and enjoy a night out on November 5. A sticky cake known as Parkin cake is eaten on this day as well. In many parts of the country children blacken their faces with soot and wheel around a figure representing Guy Fawkes, chanting "Remember, remember the fifth of November, gunpowder, treason, and plot." The figure is stuffed with cloth, straw, and fireworks and burned in the evening.

❁ REMEMBRANCE DAY

Observed on: November 11

Remembrance Day commemorates the end of World War I on November 11, 1918, after an armistice treaty was signed between the Allies and Germany in a railway carriage at Compiègne in France. Ferdinand Foch (1851–1929), a French marshal, was the commander-in-chief of the Allies and led them to victory against the German forces.

Remembrance Day, also known as Armistice Day, was originally observed in memory of all those men and women who lost their lives during World War I. Over the years it has come to include the dead of other wars as well.

In the United Kingdom people observe a minute-long silence at 11 A.M. on Armistice Day as a mark of respect for the brave soldiers who lost their lives in various wars. Remembrance Sunday is held on the second Sunday of November (nearest to November 11). Special prayer services are organized at war memorials and at churches across Britain, and people pay homage to the victims and soldiers who died during the war. A national memorial service is organized at the Cenotaph (War Memorial) at

✿ BIRTH

The rituals of the Anglican Church are quite similar to those of the Roman Catholic Church. The head of the Anglican Church (or Church of England) is the King or Queen of England. In the United Kingdom, there are no specific rituals associated with the birth of a child. However, parents may choose to baptize their children or christen them when they are infants. Through the ritual of baptism, an infant is welcomed into the church. The ritual involves sprinkling water or immersing the infant in water to wash away its sins and welcome it into its new life as a Christian.

Baptism or christening is performed in a church. The parents choose relatives or friends to be the godparents of their child. As godparents, these individuals share in the responsibilities of parenthood. They are expected to contribute significantly in shaping the personality of the child and to help him or her become a better Christian. During the baptism ritual, parents and godparents issue a declaration on behalf of the child to turn away from everything evil and sinful and to completely dedicate the child's life to Jesus and his teachings. Although most children are baptized in infancy, the Church of England believes that there is no age limit for baptism.

The baptism ceremony takes place in the morning in the presence of the community. The priest makes the sign of a cross on the child's forehead, pours water on the child's head (to cleanse him or her of all sins), and anoints the forehead with holy oil, thereby formally welcoming the child into the community.

Fun Fact

The Green Man is a pagan fertility figure or nature spirit, perhaps related to the woodwose, the wild man of the woods, who was able to survive as a symbol of pre-Christian pagan religious traditions despite the efforts of the Christian Church to eradicate or transform the customs. Early Christian missionaries often adopted and adapted local gods, sometimes turning them into obscure saints. The Green Man continued to appear frequently, carved in wood or stone, in churches, chapels, abbeys, and cathedrals, as recently as the 11th century.

✿ COMING OF AGE

A coming of age ritual performed for young girls and boys (at age seven or eight) in the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches is the first Communion. Jesus initiated the ritual of Holy Communion at the Last Supper when he shared bread and a cup of wine with his disciples. As he broke the bread, Jesus said, "This is my body, which is broken for you"; with the cup of wine, he stated, "This is my blood, which is shed for you." In many Christian churches, the priest reenacts the Last Supper by blessing and distributing bread and wine.

The sacrament of the first Holy Communion is an initiation ceremony during which a Christian child is allowed to have the blessed bread and wine for the first time. The church allows this practice only after the child understands the meaning of the ritual. Another Christian rite often associated with coming of age is confirmation. Confirmation usually takes place at a later age (12 or 13), when the individual is old enough to make his or her own decisions. Through this ritual, a baptized child completely confirms a belief in Christianity and is welcomed into the Christian community as a full-time member. A bishop always performs the confirmation by laying hands on the person's head and praying for him or her. Before people are confirmed they usually go to confirmation classes where they are given instruction in the important beliefs of Christians. The actual ritual of the sacrament of confirmation takes place during the Mass, after the priest completes the sermon. The priest reads aloud the names of all those individuals who will be confirmed.

The individuals whose names have been called out go up to the bishop and, after asserting that they have total faith in Jesus and promise to reject evil, the bishop lays his hands on each of the candidates. It is a Christian belief that the hand symbolizes the strength and power of the Holy Spirit that will come to them. Then the bishop calls out the confirmation name of each candidate. This can either be his or her real name or the name of any saint. Using the holy oil, he makes the sign of a cross on the candidate's forehead, thereby indicating that the candidate is now a child of God.

✿ MARRIAGE

There are a variety of rituals, symbols, and superstitions associated with marriage in the United Kingdom. While some of these have fallen into disuse, others are still popular in the UK and many other countries. For example the English believe that rain on a wedding day is a sign of good luck. In addition to ward off evil and ensure good luck, English brides traditionally carried horseshoes strung with ribbons or sewed silver horseshoes in the hem of their wedding gowns. Their bridesmaids wore clothes that were identical to the bride's to create confusion in the mind of any evil person who might want to curse the bride at the beginning of her married life. Finally a small girl scattered flowers along the route to the chapel where the couple was to be married before the bride and her wedding party. This ritual symbolically wished good luck and happiness to them in married life.

Traditionally also, English couples exchange their wedding rings and vows at the chapel doorway so that anyone could witness their marriage. However, most weddings take place inside the church in the presence of friends and family members only. The modern wedding ceremony is followed by a lavish reception complete with singing, dancing, and dining. It is customary for a three-tier fruitcake to be an integral part of the reception. It contains raisins, ground almonds, marzipan, and cherries. The top-most layer of the cake is kept aside for the baptism of the couple's first child and is called the christening cake. This fruitcake is served along with a chocolate cake, known as the groom's cake.

A week before a modern Scottish wedding, the mother of the bride holds a show-of-presents ceremony for her friends and relatives to see the gifts the bride has received. The guests add to these by bringing gifts for the bride that will help her in setting up her new home. All the presents are opened and shown to everyone, and the bride's mother also treats the guests to tea and cakes.

The day before, the groom and his male friends hold a stag party that usually involves a great deal of eating and drinking. On the wedding day the bride wears a white gown, while the groom wears traditional dress, which consists of a highland kilt, a sporran (a pouch usually made of skin worn in front of the kilt), and a jacket. They enter the chapel to the music of the bagpipe or traditional Gaelic hymns.

A Scottish couple exchanges vows either in English or the Gaelic language, as they prefer, and then the groom welcomes the bride as a member of his clan by pinning a strip of his clan's tartan colors on her wedding gown. A ritual Scottish reception follows in which the bride and the groom are welcomed by the sound of bagpipes and are taken to the wedding cake. Here, one of the bagpipers gives a dirk (a long-bladed knife) to the bride who cuts the cake guided by her husband. After a traditional meal the Scottish groom carries his wife off to their new home.

❁ DEATH

The Church of England permits Christians to be buried or cremated, depending on their wishes. At the time of death the dying person or his relatives may ask the priest to bless him or her, a ritual that involves anointing with holy oil. A dying person may also wish to confess his or her sins and receive Holy Communion, a ritual that involves taking the Christian sacrament of consecrated bread and wine. Prayers are also said for the dying person, and they continue after death. A memorial service is usually held in church, followed by a small meal (like a high tea, but solemnly observed). Christians believe that, after death, the righteous spend eternity in heaven with God and Jesus, while sinners spend eternity in hell.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

For millennia the land that is now the continental United States was covered with forests, prairies, and deserts, and millions of native people called Amerindians, Native Americans, or American Indians lived here. While it is likely that navigators or those lost at sea from other continents, including Africa, Europe, Asia, and Australia had found their way to the Western Hemisphere, archaeologists know from their artifacts and dwellings that peoples from Asia had crossed to the North American continent on a land bridge called Beringia before the end of the last Ice Age, around 12,000 to 13,000 years ago. By the time Europeans began to investigate the western continents in earnest, the Native Americans had populated the continents from the Arctic to the tip of South America and from the Pacific to the Atlantic Oceans, and had founded numerous civilizations, including the Olmec, the Toltec, the Maya of Central America and Mexico, the Aztec of Mexico and southwestern North America, the Inca of western South America, the Anasazi, the Mound Builders, the Sioux Nations (Lakota, Dakota, and Nakota), and the Six Nations, or Iroquois Confederacy.

The first Europeans were probably Norsemen (sometimes confused with the Vikings, who were pirates) led by Leif Eriksson (? b. 980), who worked their way south from Greenland and Iceland, following the North Atlantic coastline, and made at least three landings around 1006.

The Iroquois Confederacy

One of the strongest political forces in 17th- and 18th-century New England was the Iroquois Confederacy, more properly the Haudenosaunee (or League of Peace and Power, Five Nations, or Six Nations), a group of First Nations/Amerindians who lived in present-day upstate New York when they had contact with the first colonists. According to tradition, two prophets, the Great Peacemaker (in Mohawk, Skennenrahawi) and his student, Hiawatha, urged the squabbling tribes to stop their infighting and join together in peace. At first there were five nations—the Seneca, Onondaga, Oneida, Cayuga, and Mohawks—until a sixth nation, the Tuscarora, of what is now North Carolina, joined them in 1720. The Haudenosaunee had a constitution, recorded with wampum, beads with their own spiritual value, and said to have influenced the framers of the U.S. Constitution (although this is disputed).

Haudenosaunee, in addition to being the name of the Six Nations, is how the people refer to themselves and to the combined leadership of the nations. It means “people building a long house,” and was provided by the Great Peacemaker when the group came together. The word Iroquois is thought to be derived from a French version of a Huron (Wendat) or Algonquin name that means “black snakes,” and is regarded as an insult. (The Huron and Algonquin were enemies of the Iroquois because they were also involved in the fur trade.) The Seneca were symbolically the guardians of the western door of the “tribal long house,” while the Mohawk were guardians of the eastern door.

After a protracted period of reconnaissance and unsuccessful colonization begun in the 16th century, colonists from England, Holland and Sweden settled along the Atlantic coast beginning in the early 1600s. By the middle of the 18th century, British North America encompassed mature colonies from New England to Georgia and a colonial population of 2.5 million.

Following the French and Indian War, in which Britain defeated France and in 1763 claimed a great deal of French North American territory, tensions began to rise between Britain’s colonists and their government. Colonists resented being asked to pay higher taxes to support the British military, especially as they had no representation in the mother country’s government. They also sought to expand their settlements across western borders Britain had agreed to respect in treaties with Native Americans.

In 1775 these tensions erupted at Lexington and Concord in the area that is now the state of Massachusetts, and on July 4, 1776, the rebels declared the independence of “the United States of America” from Great Britain. That event is celebrated as Independence Day in the United States. The new nation’s freedom was won in the American Revolutionary War, which officially ended in 1783. In 1787 a new government structure was drafted in Philadelphia and then ratified by the states. The new nation’s Constitution established it as a democratic republic with powers balanced between the three branches of the federal government—executive, legislative, and judicial—and the individual states. In 1791 the first 10 amendments to the Constitution were approved. Commonly known as the Bill of Rights, these amendments further establish the basic rights and principles of liberty and justice in the United States—among them, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, protection from unreasonable search and seizure, the right to due process, trial by jury, and protection from cruel and unusual punishment.

The new nation grew rapidly and began stretching beyond its colonial borders past the Appalachian Mountains and into territory held by Native American tribes and foreign powers. The Americans would gradually push these groups off their land, through battle or treaty. Today Native Americans remain but are a small minority, many living on land reserved for them by the federal government. In 1803 the United States acquired the vast Louisiana territory from France, which had colonial holdings throughout North America, and following a war with its southern neighbor Mexico in 1848, the continental United States had nearly expanded to its current borders. Alaska was acquired from Russia in 1867, and Hawaii became a U.S. territory in 1898. As the nation expanded westward, and as commercial and industrial development produced burgeoning cities, immigrants from around the world rushed to the United States seeking economic, religious, and political freedom and opportunity.

However, the thousands of Africans who came to America between the 17th and 19th centuries came unwillingly, in chains, as slaves, crowded together in the filthy holds of the ships that transported them. Through importation and natural increase, the slave population of the United States stood at nearly 4 million by the mid-19th century. Eventually the largely free states of the North and the “slave states” of the South split over the issue of slavery’s expansion to the nation’s western territories. Eleven southern states seceded from the union and went to war with the North. The Civil War (1861–65) was the most traumatic event in the country’s history, but victory for the North restored

President Lyndon B. Johnson (1908–73) declared October 9 Leif Eriksson Day in the United States in 1964.

Vinland

As he worked his way south along the North Atlantic coast, Leif Eriksson's first landing is thought to have been at what he named Helluland ("Land of the Flat Stones") because there were so many flat rock slabs (Old Norse hellr), which has been tentatively identified as present-day Baffin Island. He described his second stop as a flat, wooded region with white sandy beaches, which he called Markland ("woodland"), thought to have been present-day Labrador. At their third landfall, which Leif named Vinland because the grass was green year-round (Old Norse vinja means "meadow" or "grazing area"), he and his men decided to attempt a settlement and built some houses. Because it was pleasant, with a mild climate and lots of salmon in the river, they remained for the winter.

Like many other ancient stories once discounted as legends, fables, or myths, Leif Eriksson's story, recorded in the Icelandic sagas, is probably essentially factual although, perhaps, embellished to some degree. In the 1950s and 1960s explorer Helge Ingstad and his wife and archaeologist Anne Stine may have found the remains of the Vinland settlement at the tip of present-day Newfoundland, later known as L'Anse aux Meadows (from French L'Anse-aux-Méduses, which means "Jellyfish Cove"). The first recorded conflicts between Europeans and indigenous peoples may have occurred around 1006 at that site. The Norse sagas report that the indigenous people whom Eriksson and his men encountered were insurmountably fierce and that the explorers decided to leave. Those inhabitants of Newfoundland and Labrador, who called themselves Beothuk (which meant "the people"), were probably the natives called skraelings, or skraelingars, by the Norsemen. (By the 19th century they were extinct.)

In 1957, a map called the Vinland Map turned up, purportedly a 15th-century Mappa Mundi, redrawn from a 13th-century original. If it is authentic (and some scholars think it is a fake) its importance would be that, in addition to showing the continents of Africa, Asia, and Europe, the map depicts a body of land across the Atlantic called Vinland and describes it as having been visited in the 11th century. Should the map be confirmed as genuine, it would add further support to the archaeological evidence that Viking explorers found and mapped the Western Hemisphere before Columbus did.

the union and ended slavery, although it would be decades before the achievements of the civil rights movement would bring a measure of freedom to African-Americans.

United States victories in World War I and World War II left it the most powerful nation in the world, militarily and economically. In the 21st century it remains so, although it faces numerous challenges, including the continued threat of terrorism following the attacks of September 11, 2001, the strains of its ongoing wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the decline of its economic strength, its failure to confront the dangers inherent in global warming, and the ineffectiveness of its international diplomacy.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The United States is bordered by the Atlantic Ocean to the east, the Pacific Ocean to the west, Canada to the north, and Mexico to the south. Alaska sits to the northwest, bordered by Canada to the east, the Arctic Ocean to the north, and the Pacific Ocean to the west and south. Hawaii lies in the South Pacific. The United States is the world's third largest country, after Russia and Canada. As befits a nation that stretches across a continent, the United States enjoyed a diverse geography for many years. When the first Europeans arrived, the territory featured large rivers and plentiful water, abundant natural resources, and some of the world's most productive farmland. The eastern United States is home to the Appalachian mountain ranges as well as forests, wetlands, and popular beaches along the Atlantic Ocean. The nation's largest river, the Mississippi, bisects the country as it runs from the world's largest group of freshwater lakes, the Great Lakes, in the North to the Gulf of Mexico in the South, creating fertile farmland as it flows. The vast plains environment of the Midwest supports forests in the north and crops and livestock in the nation's midsection. The Rocky Mountains of the West form North America's largest and youngest mountain system, and a region dominated by lumber and mining interests. The landforms of the dry Southwest are some of the most unusual in the world, including the natural wonder of the Grand Canyon. The western coast features evergreen forests to the north and, to the south, California's craggy coastline and fertile agricultural valleys.

The nation's climate ranges from the arctic chill of the Alaskan winter to the dry heat of the Southwest and the tropical South Pacific conditions of Hawaii. Most of the continental United States is moderate and temperate. The Northeast and Midwest have cold winters and hot summers, while the South has longer summers and milder winters. The Pacific region has a generally mild climate year-round, except for the desert areas of the West and Southwest. The mostly favorable climate has influenced population shifts, most recently toward the Sunbelt region in the South, but the eastern and western coastlines remain more densely populated than much of the country's center. In 2005 one of the worst hurricane seasons since records have been kept, New Orleans, Louisiana, once a vital U.S. port, was devastated by Hurricane Katrina, and its population scattered across the country.

❁ ECONOMY

The United States has the world's largest economy. Its gross domestic product (GDP), or the value of all goods and services produced each year, is $11.75 trillion. It is an economy based on a free-market, capitalist system, leaving most decisions to individuals and businesses, although the government imposes various regulations to maintain competition in important industries, to protect consumers from unsafe products, to ensure environmental health, and to protect workers from dangerous workplace environments. The country has enormous natural resources, yet it still imports more supplies, including oil, to meet its needs. The country has large deposits of coal, iron, oil, and natural gas, as well as wide expanses of fertile farmland, and forests that once covered nearly a third of its total area. Fish is plentiful off the Pacific coast, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic coast.

Still service industries account for the largest share of the nation's GDP, spread among such industries as health care, tourism, banking, insurance, and retail sales. The largest stock exchange in the nation is the New York Stock Exchange, and the Chicago Board of Trade is the world's leading commodities exchange. The country's largest trade partners include Canada and Mexico, its partners in the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), as well as Japan and China. The government itself purchases a fifth of all goods and services produced in the United States. U.S. companies have long been world leaders in technological fields including computers, medicine, and military equipment. Other major exports include cars and airplanes, manufacturing equipment, paper, metal ores, and chemical products. The nation's farmers and ranchers produce all the food its people need, with enough left over to export grain, fruit, and other products. Beef is the nation's most valuable farm product although the threat of bovine spongiform encephalopathy (mad cow disease) may change that. As a center of world business and trade, the United States has four of the world's five busiest airports, as well as leading ports such as New York City; Miami, Florida; Houston, Texas; and Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Long Beach, California.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The United States was once called a “melting pot” because it is, and has always been, a nation of immigrants. The nation was founded by settlers from Western Europe, but over the years people from all over the world have come together to form a diverse, distinctive culture. Today, about one in ten Americans was born outside the country. Recent immigrants come from Mexico and other Latin American countries; Canada; central Europe; and the Philippines and other Asian nations. Many immigrant populations retain the traditions of their homelands, seen most clearly in the nation's large cities, where various ethnic groups have tended to settle in the same neighborhoods, with shops, restaurants, and celebrations reflecting their distinct cultures.

Almost all Americans can speak English, but many Hispanic immigrants, especially in the Southwest, speak only Spanish, by far the second most widely spoken language in the country. Some states have passed laws declaring English the only official language for their governments, but in many cities, public documents and important signs are produced in both English and Spanish. Just as immigrants are drawn to U.S. cities, so are native-born citizens. Three out of four Americans now live in urban areas, and Americans from rural areas continue to move to larger cities for the range of educational, professional, and cultural opportunities available there.

However, in a recent shift, more people now live in the suburban areas surrounding big cities than in the city centers themselves. In the nation's rural areas, only one in ten adults actually works on farms. Major advances in technology have eased the labor involved with maintaining crops and left much of the work to machines and agribusiness. For some Americans the quality of life is among the highest in the world. However, poverty both in cities and rural areas, and an increasing chasm in wealth between the nation's richest and poorest citizens, remain major challenges for the nation. The United States has long considered itself to be a meritocracy based in large part on educational achievement. About three-quarters of U.S. children attend public elementary and high schools, although private secular and religious schools are available in most communities as well. About one in five Americans completes at least four years of college.

Americans are a mobile people and have had a long love affair with the automobile. Of all modern inventions, the automobile is the one Americans say they could least live without. Today 60 percent of American households own two or more cars, and 20 percent own three

Although one of the sagas specifies that Eriksson name the land Vinland because one of his men Tyrkir (a German warrior) had found grapes, the name has nothing to do with grapes or wine.

Fun Fact

Unlike baseball, which is based on the older game, cricket, basketball was invented by an individual, Dr. James Naismith, who was a Canadian-born U.S. minister, in 1891. After considering and rejecting several ideas as inappropriate for playing in walled-in gymnasiums, he wrote the basic rules, and nailed a peach basket up on the gym wall. The first official game was played on January 20, 1892. One of Naismith's students suggested the name "basket ball."

or more. Americans from all walks of life are able to experience high culture at some of the nation's thousands of museums, including world-class art collections in cities like Boston, New York, Washington, D.C., Chicago, and Los Angeles.

Religion has always been an important part of American culture. The nation was built in part by people escaping Europe to find religious freedom, and the Constitution guarantees religious freedom to all while prohibiting the government establishment of any particular faith. More than half of all Americans belong to various Protestant denominations, but Catholics are the largest single religious group.

Most Americans have leisure time and disposable income available to invest in it, and they pursue a wide range of interests, including sports. Major spectator sports include wrestling and auto racing, and games invented in the United States, such as football (not to be confused with soccer or rugby), basketball, and baseball.

Many Americans also regularly exercise in fitness centers, run, or participate in team sports like soccer or basketball. For entertainment, almost every U.S. home has at least one television, and millions of people see a movie in a theater each week. The United States is the world leader in movie production, with major films premiering simultaneously across the globe.

When Americans go on vacation, they may travel around the world, although the beaches and national parks of the United States remain leading destinations. America's cultural legacy includes the musicians who created jazz and modern musical theater, sometimes referred to as Broadway after the street where many of the theaters are located. American authors, architects, singers, and painters are widely respected around the world.

Americans annually gather to celebrate national holidays based on their history and culture. When they shoot off fireworks on the Fourth of July, they celebrate "the great experiment" that has drawn a diverse people together to form a world power.

❁ CUISINE

Food in the United States is influenced by two factors: Its historically diverse immigrant population, which has introduced a wide variety of dishes; and the nation's abundance of meat and fish, dairy, and produce, which offers a wide range of possibilities for cooks.

Breakfasts are drawn from a wide range of fruits, juices, breads, cheeses, or cereals. Eggs and bacon or sausage are also popular. Sandwiches are a popular lunch item, often made with meat, cheese, or peanut butter. Meat and potatoes with salad or vegetables remain a typical dinner for many families, who can choose from beef, chicken, ham, or turkey. Fish is also popular as a main course, especially in fishing regions, as are pizza and pasta. Cookies, ice cream, pies, and cakes are popular desserts. Soft drinks such as colas are the nation's most popular beverages.

Coffee, milk, and beer are also widely popular. The U.S. is known for its wines as well, especially those produced in California and the Northwest. Families eat out often, and the nation's restaurants offer popular dishes from nearly every spot on earth. Chinese, Italian, Mexican, and French food have long been mainstays, but in recent years Japanese, Indian, Vietnamese, Thai, and Middle Eastern food have all gained in popularity. Various regions of America have their own distinct cuisines, such as Pennsylvania Dutch country (German), Louisiana (Cajun), and Hawaii (Polynesian).

The creativity of U.S. cooks should not be underestimated, because Americans have invented some of the most popular foods in the world, especially those that are quick, portable, and cheap, such as hot dogs, hamburgers, ice cream cones, and iced tea.

Sometimes the story of how a food was created is as well known as the food. Although other countries, in particular Hamburg, Germany, have claimed the hamburger as their own invention, what is called a hamburger probably originated in the late 19th century in the United States. Inventing the hamburger sandwich, a flattened patty of ground beef, is perhaps attributable to Charlie Nagreen of Seymour, Wisconsin. In 1885 he was selling fried meatballs at the Outagamie County Fair, but his customers found it hard to eat them while walking, so Nagreen flattened the meatball between two slices of bread and called it a hamburger. The distinctive hamburger bun is said to have been invented by a short-order cook J. Walter Anderson in 1916, who went on to found the White Castle restaurant chain in 1921.

The invention of the hot dog, like the hamburger and ice cream cone, is often attributed to the 1904 Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis, Missouri, but similar sausages were made in Germany as early as 1864; the earliest appearance of a hot dog bun dates back to New York City in the 1860s. The summer favorite, a hot dog at the baseball game, also predates the 1904 Exposition: The owner of the St. Louis Browns Chris von der Ahe was selling them at his ballpark in the 1880s.

Like the hot dog and hamburger, the ice cream cone is popularly believed to have been invented in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1904 at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, although there are other claimants. According to legend a Syrian pastry maker Ernst Hamwi was selling zalabia, a crisp pastry cooked in a hot folding waffle-patterned press and dribbled with syrup, and came to the aid of an ice cream vendor, perhaps Arnold Fornachou or Charles Menches, who had run out of dishes. By rolling a still-warm zalabia into a cone, Hamwi created a pastry that could hold ice cream. And people could eat their ice cream as they strolled around the Exposition.

Tea, usually served hot, has been a favorite drink in many cultures, but iced tea, which is how most people drink the beverage in the United States, is also said to have originated in 1904 at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition held in St. Louis, Missouri.

Potato chips, not to be confused with British “chips,” are believed to have been invented by Native American George Crum, when he was chef at the Moon Lake Lodge in Saratoga Springs, New York. On August 24, 1853, a customer—by some accounts Cornelius Vanderbilt—kept sending his fried potatoes back because, he said, they were too thick and soggy. To silence the man, Crum sliced the potatoes so thin that it was impossible to eat them with a fork. Crum was amazed when, instead of being angry, the guest was ecstatic about the thin fried chips, and they became a regular item on the lodge’s menu, where they were called Saratoga Chips.

❁ NEW YEAR’S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

Most Americans celebrate the first day of the calendar year (according to the Gregorian solar calendar), as do people in countries around the world. In the United States, banks, schools, and businesses are closed. On the night of December 31, or New Year’s Eve, many Americans gather in cities to celebrate the start of the new year at midnight. The largest such event is in New York City’s Times Square, where hundreds of thousands of people watch a large ball drop down the side of a building at exactly 12:00 midnight. In some cities fireworks are set off at midnight. Celebrations continue on New Year’s Day at events like the Mummers Parade in Philadelphia, featuring marchers in colorful costumes, or the Tournament of Roses Parade in Pasadena, California, which precedes college football’s annual Rose Bowl game. Privately many Americans make resolutions on New Year’s Day to improve themselves in some way or to break bad habits.

❁ MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.’S, BIRTHDAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Third Monday in January

Civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr., was born on January 15, 1929. After his assassination in 1968, a campaign to turn his birthday into a national holiday began. In 1983 Congress made his birthday a federal holiday, first celebrated on January 20, 1986. The day commemorates King as an African-American hero and as a great American crusader for equality and social justice. The holiday is observed in all the states on the third Monday in January. Government offices and schools close for the day, although many businesses remain open.

Fun Fact

At New Year’s Eve parties, many Americans drink a toast of champagne, toot noisemakers, and sing “Auld Lang Syne,” or “old long since,” a traditional Scottish song of friendship.

❁ PRESIDENTS’ DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Third Monday in February

George Washington (1732–99) became the commanding general during the American Revolution and almost immediately assumed mythic status, embodying the new nation itself. Under the new federal Constitution, Washington was elected the first president of the United States and served from 1789 to early 1797. Americans began celebrating Washington’s birthday (February 22) during his lifetime; in the early 19th century, with the exception of Independence Day, it was the country’s only national holiday.

The day was renamed Presidents’ Day and moved from February 22 to the third Monday in February 1971 when the Monday Holiday Law of 1968 took effect. Many states also honor President Abraham Lincoln, who was born on Feb. 12, 1809, and is sometimes considered the greatest U.S. president for his role as the Great Emancipator during the Civil War. After his assassination in 1865, many states designated Lincoln’s birthday as a holiday. Celebration of Washington and Lincoln’s birthdays are now combined into Presidents’ Day, or Washington-Lincoln Day. Banks, government offices, and schools are closed. In many areas the day is the

❁ MEMORIAL DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Last Monday in May

On Memorial Day Americans honor the men and women who have died fighting for the United States. The holiday emerged through grassroots efforts in both the North and South as Americans struggled to assuage their grief following the Civil War, the most devastating event in U.S. history, which cost more than 600,000 lives. Some credit Waterloo, New York, with the first official observance on May 5, 1866. In the 21st century the holiday honors those who died in all American wars.

The holiday is also known as Decoration Day, because tradition calls for decorating the graves of servicemen with flowers and flags.

Banks, schools, and government offices are closed. Many U.S. towns hold parades and special programs that often include a reading of Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. Volunteers sell small artificial red poppies to raise money for disabled veterans. To honor naval dead, miniature boats filled with flowers are set afloat from some U.S. port cities.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 4

On July 4, 1776, the Second Continental Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence, in which "the thirteen united States of America" declared their independence from their colonial ruler Great Britain. The Congress actually resolved to declare independence on July 2, but the Declaration was officially adopted on July 4. John Adams correctly predicted that Independence Day, also called the Fourth of July, would "be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great Anniversary Festival," although he thought July 2 would mark the nation's birthday. The Declaration of Independence is among the most cherished U.S. documents, particularly for its statements that "all men are created equal" and all are entitled to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Traditional Independence Day celebrations featured readings of the Declaration and inspired Americans to pursue and achieve equality, even those—such as millions of slaves before the Civil War—who did not yet possess the freedom to which they were entitled. Government offices, banks, and businesses are closed. In many cities, the day is marked with concerts, parades, and public fireworks displays. One of the largest is in Boston, where the Boston Pops orchestra has performed before fireworks on the Charles River since 1974. Many individuals also set off fireworks, although the sale of fireworks is illegal in many parts of the country. Like the United States, many countries celebrate the day they became independent from oppressive regimes or colonial rulers.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: First Monday in September

Labor Day, also celebrated as May Day or Workers' Day in other countries, was created to honor working people and their contributions to their countries. The first Labor Day parade took place in New York City on September 5, 1882, and was followed by a big picnic. The event was not sanctioned by employers but was, instead, a huge, festive, one-day general strike to assert labor's power, build solidarity among workers, and advocate better wages and working conditions. Many recognize as its founders two men, machinist Matthew Maguire of New Jersey and carpenter Peter McGuire of New York. Oregon became the first state to make Labor Day a legal holiday in 1887, and it became a national holiday in 1894.

Many countries celebrate Labor Day on May 1, a holiday with a more radical meaning and agenda. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world, and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In the United States banks, government offices, and schools are closed. While labor groups still organize parades and events in many areas, for most Americans the holiday marks the end of summer and a time for leisure. Families often take a last long vacation weekend before the start of the school year, which traditionally takes place two or three days after Labor Day.

Western Hemisphere in 1492. Some cities hold parades on Columbus Day, but for many Americans it is simply part of a long weekend. The first Columbus Day celebration was in New York City in 1792, the 300th anniversary of Columbus's voyage. In the 19th century Irish, Italian, and later, Hispanic American immigrants promoted the holiday in celebration of Columbus—a Catholic, non-English hero—to declare their own legitimacy as Americans. Columbus Day has been a federal Monday holiday, observed on the second Monday in October, since 1971; it is an official holiday for federal employees and residents of Washington, D.C., but it is not observed by every state or private businesses, and many people work on Columbus Day. Hawaii celebrates the day as Discoverers' Day, honoring Pacific and Polynesian explorers as well as Columbus. In Alabama American Indian Heritage Day is marked on the same day as Columbus Day.

❁ HALLOWEEN

Observed in: United States

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 31

While it is not an official holiday anywhere in the United States, Halloween is one of the country's most popular celebrations, and Americans spend nearly $3 billion on Halloween-related goods each year. Millions of children put on costumes and go door-to-door in their neighborhoods, "trick-or-treating" for candy, or to raise money for the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), which aids needy children around the world. Adults gather for costume parties, and decorate their homes and offices with carved pumpkins known as jack-o-lanterns, as well as witches, ghosts, and other symbols of the holiday. The holiday has its roots in the ancient Celtic festival Samhain, when it was believed the souls of the recent dead roamed the land, and worshippers honored the lord of death. In the eighth and ninth century, western European Christians replaced Samhain with All Saints' Day, celebrated on November 1, but retained many of the old holiday's customs. The night before the new holiday was called All Hallow's Eve, and later, Halloween. The holiday gained popularity in the United States throughout the 19th century, as Irish immigrants popularized its customs. Today's secular Halloween is far removed from its pagan origins, but the holiday is highly controversial in many parts of the United States, where a range of religious groups actively protest public schools holding Halloween-themed events.

❁ VETERANS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 11

Veterans Day honors the men and women who have served in the U.S. military. It is a federal holiday observed nationwide and takes place on November 11, the day of the armistice that ended World War I in 1918, on the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month. In France, Belgium, and other European countries, the holiday is still known as Armistice Day. In Canada, the United Kingdom, and elsewhere, it is called Remembrance Day and honors all those who died in war. President Woodrow Wilson (1856–1924) first declared the holiday in 1919. In 1954 its name was changed to Veterans Day. From 1971–77, it was celebrated as a Monday holiday, on the fourth Monday in October, but the change of date was unpopular among veterans, who believed the timing promoted leisure rather than solemn remembrance, so Congress moved Veterans Day back to November 11. In many U.S. cities veterans march in parades, and a special ceremony takes place at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington National Cemetery in Arlington, Virginia.

❁ THANKSGIVING

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Fourth Thursday in November

Thanksgiving is a day set aside for people to give thanks for their families and whatever prosperity they may enjoy. The holiday has its origins in fall harvest festivals held throughout history by farming societies, traditions that the European colonists brought with them to America. Thanksgiving observances are nearly universal, and other harvest festivals no doubt preceded the "first Thanksgiving" in Plymouth Colony in 1621. Nonetheless that event remains the holiday's charter, as it celebrated the Pilgrims' endurance, toleration, cooperation, abundance, and generosity and marked a long-term peace between them and their Wampanoag allies, who outnumbered the colonists at the three-day feast. Many Americans celebrate Thanksgiving with their families, typically sharing a turkey dinner. Some attend church services to give thanks to God, or volunteer to feed the hungry. The Thanksgiving tradition evolved informally and spread into the West and South from New England in the 19th century. It became a national holi-

❁ EID AL-ADHA

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: Tenth of Dhu al-Hijjah, the 12th month of the Islamic calendar

One of the two most important celebrations on the Muslim calendar (in addition to Eid al-Fitr), Eid al-Adha, or the Feast of the Sacrifice, commemorates the patriarch Ibrahim’s (Abraham’s) willingness to sacrifice his son because God commanded it. According to the biblical account, Ibrahim was asked to sacrifice his son (in Muslim tradition, the son to be sacrificed is Ishmael—Isaac in the Judeo-Christian tradition), but God intervened, and an angel stopped the sacrifice, directing Ibrahim to sacrifice a lamb instead. As part of this day-long festival, an animal is sacrificed, and one-third of the meat is given to the poor. Muslim families exchange gifts and enjoy a feast. The holiday occurs on the last day of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca, in the 12th month of the Islamic lunar calendar. In the United States, this date varies because the Islamic lunar calendar makes no corrections to align it with the Gregorian, solar calendar used there.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also known as Mourning Friday, Black Friday, or Great Friday (in Eastern Orthodox Churches), marks the day that Jesus died on the Cross and is observed on the Friday before Easter, the central holiday on the Christian calendar. Many Christians attend a special service mourning Jesus, which traditionally lasts from noon until 3 P.M., representing the three hours that Jesus suffered on the Cross. Some Christians observe Good Friday, especially Roman Catholics, as a fast day in mourning for Jesus. This day is an aliturgical day in the Catholic Church, so Communion is not observed. Church bells are silenced, and lights in churches may be dimmed.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter, which celebrates the Resurrection of Jesus three days after his Crucifixion, is the most important holiday on the Christian calendar, and the culmination of the Christianity's Holy Week. Easter also marks the end of the 40-day fasting period of Lent. The date of Easter is based on the lunar calendar. The exact date each year is set to be observed on the Sunday after the first full Moon on or after the day of the vernal equinox. Depending on the denomination, churches hold services on Saturday evening, at sunrise on Sunday, or on Sunday morning. Families gather on Easter Sunday for a festive meal, often featuring lamb, a symbol of Jesus, who is sometimes called "the Lamb of God." Symbols of the holiday include lilies, candles, and rabbits (or hares).

Easter is also a celebration of spring, and Easter eggs and Easter bunnies, while having no direct connection to the story of Jesus' death and Resurrection, are both symbols of fertility appropriate to the season. According to the Venerable Bede (672–735), a renowned Christian scholar, Easter was named after Eostre (or Eastre), the Mother Goddess of the Saxon tribes of Northern Europe who was also the goddess of fertility. The ancient deities in all civilizations had patron animals, and the rabbit, an obvious symbol of fertility, is the companion animal of Eostre. The deity was believed to preside over conception and birth in animals, including humans, and pollination, flowering, and the ripening of fruit in the plant kingdom. After the harsh dreary winters of Northern Europe, she brought the warmth of spring, fertility, and abundance. The Germans knew her as Ostara.

Many families paint the shells of hard-boiled eggs and hide them for children to find in an Easter Egg Hunt. Some people also wear new clothes on Easter, another symbol of the new life symbolized by Jesus' Resurrection. In some communities, people put on their finest clothes and march in an Easter parade.

✿ PESACH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Begins on the 15th of Nisan, the first month of the Jewish calendar

Pesach, or Passover, is an eight-day festival celebrating the Exodus of the Jews from slavery in Egypt, probably around 1200 B.C.E. As with other Jewish holidays, the date is based on the Jewish lunar calendar and varies from year to year, but always takes place in March or April. Passover is celebrated in the home with a feast called a seder, in which families retell the story of the Exodus from a book called the Haggadah. Some families hold seders on each of the first two nights of Passover while others have a seder only on the first night. During Passover, many Jews eat matzo, unleavened bread, which symbolizes the bread that did not have enough time to rise as the Jews fled Egypt.

✿ ROSH HASHANAH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: First two days of Tishri, the seventh month of the Jewish calendar

Rosh Hashanah is the Jewish New Year, observed over two consecutive days during which Jews attend synagogue services marking the beginning of 10 days of penitence, or repentance and spiritual renewal, which culminate on Yom Kippur. The name means "head of the year." The date of the holiday, which like all Jewish festivals begins on the previous evening, is based on the Jewish calendar, a lunar calendar, and can vary widely (but always occurs in September or October of the Western calendar). In Jewish tradition, Rosh Hashanah begins God's annual judging of all human beings, when he decides who will live and die in the year ahead, a judgment concluded on Yom Kippur. During services, a ram's horn (called a shofar) is sounded, as it was in ancient times to announce important events. When families gather to share a meal on the holiday, many dip apples in honey, a tradition symbolizing hope for a sweet year ahead.

One unusual Independence Day tradition is the annual Nathan's Hot Dog Eating Contest at New York City's Coney Island. Residents say the contest began on July 4, 1916, when four European immigrants, debating who was the most American, decided to settle it by seeing who could eat the most hot dogs. Irishman James Mullen was the winner, downing 13 franks in 12 minutes.

The date of the holiday is based on the Jewish lunar calendar and can vary widely, although it always occurs in September or October of the Gregorian calendar. Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are sometimes called "the high holidays" because of their importance. In some U.S. cities, schools are closed on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, and few Jews work during the holiday.

☼ EID AL-FITR

Observed by: Muslims

Observed on: First of Shawwal, the 10th month of the Islamic calendar

During the holy month of Ramadan, the ninth month on the Islamic calendar, many Muslims do not eat or drink between sunrise and sundown, focusing their attention on study of the Koran. In Islamic tradition, the prophet Muhammad received the first of the revelations that make up the Koran during Ramadan. The joyous Feast of Fast-Breaking (Eid al-Fitr) takes place on the first day following Ramadan and signals the end of the month-long dawn-to-dusk fast. The date is based on the Islamic calendar, which is lunar and not aligned with the Western solar calendar, so the date varies and can occur in any season. On the first day of Eid al-Fitr, children dress in new clothes and receive gifts, while families share a special meal, often featuring sweet foods made with dates and honey. The Koran forbids fasting on this day.

☼ HANUKKAH

Observed by: Jews

Observed on: Twenty-fifth of Kislev; the ninth month of the Jewish calendar

The eight-day holiday of Hanukkah commemorates a victory for religious freedom. In about 165 B.C.E., a successor to Alexander the Great (356–23) turned away from the religious freedom Alexander had extended to the lands he conquered by banning Judaism and desecrating the Jewish Temple in Israel. A Jewish military revolt succeeded in restoring the Temple, and religious freedom. According to tradition, when the Temple was liberated, there was only enough oil available to provide light for one day, but it lasted for eight days. That miracle is what Jews celebrate on Hanukkah. They light an additional candle on an eight-branch candleholder called a menorah in their homes each night. Hanukkah, which is not the most significant holiday on the Jewish calendar, receives a great deal of attention in the United States due to its proximity to Christmas, and its adopted custom of giving gifts to children each night. The holiday's date is based on the Jewish lunar calendar but usually takes place in December. Fried potato pancakes called latkes and a children's game played with a top called a dreidel are also part of the celebration for many Jewish families.

☼ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 24–25

Christmas, which celebrates the birth of Jesus, has been the most important religious festival in Western countries for at least 1,000 years. It is the only religious holiday that is an official holiday in the United States; businesses close, and Christian families attend church services, before returning to their homes to exchange gifts and enjoy a festive meal. No one knows the exact date of Jesus' birth, but it has been observed on December 25, replacing pagan festivals that celebrated the winter solstice, since at least the fourth century. It is the happiest and busiest holiday of the year for many Americans. Most families purchase a large Christmas tree (typically a fir or other evergreen) to decorate and assemble gifts for each other around its base. Many cities also put large Christmas trees on display. Some families decorate their homes with Christmas lights and hang wreaths on their front doors; inside, mistletoe and stockings hung for Santa Claus to bring presents for children. Some children write letters to Santa Claus, telling him what gifts they want to receive. Groups of people stroll from house to house singing traditional Christmas carols, some dating from the 17th and 18th centuries. Some of the most popular songs in U.S. history also have Christmas themes, including "White Christmas" and "Jingle Bells."

☼ KWANZAA

Observed by: African-Americans

Observed on: December 26–January 1

Some African-Americans follow their observance of Christmas with the holiday of Kwanzaa, an African-American holiday that borrows some of the traditions of African harvest festivals. Kwanzaa is the Swahili word for “first fruits.” The holiday was developed in the United States in 1966 and has steadily gained in popularity. Kwanzaa lasts seven days, from December 26 through January 1. On each night families light a candle on a seven-branched candleholder called a kinara. Each candle stands for one of seven principles: unity, self-determination, responsibility, cooperation, purpose, creativity, and faith. Some families exchange homemade gifts, and on one night during the holiday many families share a festive meal called kamaru, featuring traditional African foods.

❁ MARDI GRAS

Observed in: Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: Day before Lent

Nearly a million tourists from around the world descend on New Orleans, Louisiana, each year for the celebration of Mardi Gras, held on Shrove Tuesday, the day before Ash Wednesday and the start of Lent, when Christians make confession and receive forgiveness. The event dates back to Roman traditions of holding a celebration before a fast, and Mardi Gras, a French phrase meaning “Fat Tuesday,” marks the end of a Carnival season that begins on January 6, or the Twelfth Night of the Christmas season.

French colonists introduced the custom to New Orleans in the early 1700s, and it is now a holiday in parts of four states. While similar celebrations take place in Biloxi, Mississippi, and Mobile, Alabama, the biggest party is in New Orleans, where colorful parades begin winding through the city’s streets a week before Mardi Gras. Local groups called *krewe*s organize the parades, in which masked riders on floats toss necklaces, toys, and candy to spectators.

❁ VALENTINE’S DAY

Observed in: United States

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 14

Valentine’s Day, an annual celebration of romance, is not an official holiday anywhere in the United States, but it is a celebration of enduring popularity for children and adults in almost every community. Americans exchange 200 million Valentine’s Day cards, or “valentines,” annually, and spend billions on flowers and candy. Children traditionally exchange small valentines and candies with each other in school, and classrooms and offices are decorated with images of hearts and cupids. Scholars trace the holiday’s origins to the Roman festival Lupercalia, which had a fertility theme and whose customs were widely adopted in Rome’s British outpost. Other sources include early Christian commemorations of saints, of which at least two were named Valentine. A third-century priest with that name is said to have conducted secret weddings in defiance of the Roman emperor’s orders forbidding clergy from marrying young men fated to be soldiers. A different Valentine is said to have befriended many children before he was imprisoned for refusing to worship Roman gods, and so youngsters slipped loving notes between the bars of his cell. In 496, February 14 became Valentine’s Day by papal dictate. The British have celebrated the holiday since at least the 15th century, and brought its customs to America.

Hawaiians have marked King Kamehameha Day since June 11, 1872. By 1810 he had done just that, creating the kingdom of Hawaii, and ruling it until his death. June 11 is believed to be the king’s birthday, although the date cannot be confirmed. Kamehameha Day celebrations include parades on every island, as well as fairs, sports events, and an international hula-dancing competition. Residents also cover the giant statue of Kamehameha on the main island of Hawaii with floral garlands called leis.

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 19

During the course of the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln (1809–65) issued the Emancipation Proclamation, freeing all slaves in the states of the Confederacy, on January 1, 1863. However, news of the proclamation spread slowly in some parts of the South, as did news of General Robert E. Lee’s (1807–70) surrender at Appomattox, Virginia, that ended the war, with the result that many Texas slaves did not find out they had been emancipated until June 19, 1865, when Union general Gordon Granger (1822–76) read the proclamation to them in Galveston. That day is now the holiday of Juneteenth (a shortening of “June nineteenth”). The day has been marked by Texas’s African-American community since 1865, but the contemporary state holiday began in 1980. Communities in Texas and elsewhere mark the date with church thanksgiving services, picnics, and family reunions. One of the largest Juneteenth events outside Texas is in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The observance is also called Emancipation Day or African-American Emancipation Day and is celebrated on different dates, depending on the region.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

The birth of a child is a celebrated event in U.S. families. Parents of different faiths welcome their children into their religions in different ways. Roman Catholics and other Christian faiths christen infants in the church through the ritual of baptism, a symbolic washing with water that signifies the child’s entry into the religion. At christening ceremonies children are also formally named, although in practice most children receive their names before the ceremony. Other denominations, such as Baptists, do not baptize infants because they believe that baptism must always involve a public statement of faith by the person to be baptized.

Jewish boys are circumcised, usually on their eighth day of life, in a ceremony known as the brit milah. The ceremony can take place in a synagogue, but it often occurs in a family’s home and is performed by a person called a mohel. The circumcision is considered a sign of the covenant between God and the Jewish people established with the patriarch Abraham. Muslim families also circumcise infant boys.

❁ COMING OF AGE

When Jewish boys reach the age of 13, many take part in a ritual known as a bar mitzvah. Some denominations hold a similar ceremony for girls called a bat mitzvah. The name literally means “son (or daughter) of the law,” and it marks a young person’s entry into the adult community, including his or her responsibility for following all of the commandments of the religion. While no ceremony is required, many young people spend months studying a passage from the Torah that they will read in Hebrew in the synagogue on the day of their bar or bat mitzvah. Families typically throw a large party after a bar or bat mitzvah. Some Jews believe that these parties have become a conspicuous display of wealth that overshadows the spiritual aspects of the day.

Many Christian young people take part in a ceremony called a confirmation. For Roman Catholics, confirmation brings the grace of the Holy Spirit; for Protestants, it reinforces the entry into the faith promised at baptism. In many churches confirmation for young people also represents the culmination of several years of religious study.

❁ MARRIAGE

Weddings are important legal and religious events for U.S. heterosexuals. Approximately 2.3 million weddings are held in the United States each year, although about 800,000 heterosexual couples end their marriages each year through the legal process of divorce. While some immigrant cultures retain the practice of arranged marriage, almost all heterosexual Americans choose their own spouse.

Americans have debated whether to extend the right to marry to same-sex couples so that they can enjoy the legal benefits and privileges accorded to heterosexual relationships. States set most rules for marriage in the United States, because marriage licenses are issued by the state governments. As of 2005 only the state of Massachusetts allowed same-sex couples to marry legally. Hawaii, California, and Connecticut allow such couples to enter into partnerships in which both members receive many of the legal benefits of marriage, including access to a partner’s workplace benefits and inheritance rights. Vermont’s “civil unions” offer all of the state’s marriage benefits to same-sex couples but do not legally call the relationship a marriage. Several states and cities recognize the legal unions entered into in other states and extend similar benefits to couples joined in them.

Some Americans get married in civil ceremonies, typically in front of a judge, but for most couples, marriage is an important religious ceremony. Christian and Jewish couples are married by a priest, minister, or rabbi, and both faiths’ ceremonies involve a public declaration of commitment to the marriage, the presence of witnesses, and the exchange of rings, the latter a custom

The president of the United States hosts the annual White House Easter Egg Roll on the day after Easter. Children age three to six gather on the South Lawn to roll and hunt for eggs, hear stories, and play games. The event is canceled in inclement weather, and often during wartime as well. The first Washington Easter Egg Roll is believed to have been the idea of Dolley Madison (1768–1849), wife of President James Madison (1751–1836). For many years, the event was held at the United States Capitol building. It was first hosted at the White House by President Rutherford Hayes in 1878.

dating back at least to Roman times. Many couples write their own vows as substitutes or additions to the traditional wedding liturgy. Roman Catholic weddings take place during Mass, and the couple receives Communion.

❁ DEATH

American death customs share many elements with customs in other countries such as the public announcement of a death, a funeral ceremony, and a burial. These long-standing customs are designed to show respect and pay tribute to the dead, and to offer comfort to grieving survivors. Funeral directors usually prepare bodies for burial using the embalming process because funerals often take place several days after a death. However, Jewish funeral preparation differs as tradition requires burial no more than two nights after a death and forbids embalming.

In advance of a funeral, many families hold an all-night vigil beside the corpse. This is the Christian custom called the wake, although other religions have similar practices. Most funerals involve a public ceremony at a funeral home followed by the public burial of the deceased in a coffin at a cemetery. Many families, however, opt for cremation, which is the traditional practice of Buddhists and Hindus, although Judaism and some Christian denominations discourage it. In the case of burials, a second, shorter ceremony is typically held at the graveside immediately before burial, after which many families return to a relative's home to share a meal.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Before the arrival of Europeans in what is now called Uruguay, the region was inhabited by the Charrua, who were primarily hunters and gatherers. Few full-blooded Charrua remain. They were either gradually exterminated or “assimilated” by the European colonizers. Said to have been a dark, stocky group, physical traces of them are sometimes noted in the mestizos of their former territories, especially among the gauchos of Uruguay. The Charrua are thought to have killed the Spaniard Juan Díaz de Solís (1470–1516) when he ventured up the Río de la Plata in 1516.

The Spaniards arrived in Uruguay in 1516. The Charrua fought this intrusion valiantly, and their determined resistance, with the absence of gold in the region, discouraged the Spaniards from further incursions. However, when the Portuguese arrived in Uruguay and started developing their settlements, Spain reassessed the possible utility of Uruguay and wrested it from the Portuguese in 1778.

During the early 19th century, the people of Uruguay started agitating for independence. A revolt led by José Gervasio Artigas (1764–1850), a chieftain, won them independence from the Spanish in 1811. Artigas is regarded as the hero of the independence movement, even though formal independence was not achieved until 1828, when the Republic of Uruguay was finally recognized as an independent state. Until the end of the 19th century, Uruguay was plagued with civil wars and invasions. Uruguay also participated in, and fought in, the War of the Triple Alliance against Paraguay to maintain independence and control of its region.

During the first two decades of the 20th century, Uruguay's social, economic, and political conditions dramati-

The War of the Triple Alliance

The War of the Triple Alliance (1864–70), also known as the Paraguayan War, was fought between Paraguay and the allied countries of Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay. Paraguay had had boundary and tariff disputes with its more powerful neighbors Argentina and Brazil for years; the Uruguayans, although they had also struggled with the same nations, found it more useful to ally with them. The war began when Brazil intervened in Uruguay's civil war on behalf of the leader of the Colorado Party and helped to expel his Blanco Party opponent. This act was interpreted as a threat by the dictator of Paraguay Francisco Solano López (1827–70) because he supported the Blanco Party. So he invaded the Brazilian province of Mato Grosso. When López asked Argentina's president Bartolomé Mitre (1821–1906) for permission to go through Argentina in order to get at the Brazilian army in Uruguay, Mitre refused and instead declared an alliance with Brazil and Uruguay, and the three countries declared war on Paraguay in 1865.

In 1868 Brazilian armored ships broke through the Paraguayan defenses at the river fortress of Humaitá, then bombarded Asunción, Paraguay's capital. By December of 1868 the Paraguayan army had been annihilated. López fled north and engaged in a guerrilla war until he was finally killed on March 1, 1870. Unfortunately, the Paraguayan people—fanatically committed to López and the war effort—fought to the point of dissolution, and when the war was over in 1871 Paraguay was utterly prostrated. Its prewar population of approximately 525,000 had been slashed to about 221,000, of whom only about 28,000 were men. During the war the Paraguayans had suffered not only from the enemy but also from malnutrition, disease, and the domination of López, who tortured and killed countless people. Argentina and Brazil took about 55,000 square miles of Paraguayan territory: Argentina took much of the Misiones region and part of the Chaco between the Bermejo and Pilcomayo Rivers; Brazil enlarged its Mato Grosso Province by claiming territories that had been disputed with Paraguay before the war. Both countries demanded a large indemnity (which was never paid) and occupied Paraguay until 1876. Meanwhile the Colorados had gained control of Uruguay, and they retained it until 1958.

The War of the Triple Alliance was the bloodiest conflict in Latin American history and the second bloodiest war fought in the Americas. López is held by many to be responsible for its devastating consequences.

cally improved after José Batlle y Ordóñez (1856–1929) became president (1899; 1903–07; and 1911–15). Although his successors were not as effective as he had been, the process of modernization continued. In the 1950s and 1960s, Uruguay's relations with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) strengthened, but political tensions within the country increased. An urban guerilla group called the National Liberation Movement-Tupamaros (MLN-T) was formed. The members robbed banks and distributed the money among the poor. Over the next 10 years, they graduated to kidnapping and assassinating politicians. The Uruguayan military, in spite of savage campaigns to catch the guerillas, failed.

Unable to bring an end to the chaos, in 1973 the president of Uruguay Juan Maria Bordaberry (b. 1928), agreed to let the military control the administration of the country. Although the military had succeeded in bringing the country under control by the end of the year, it continued to control the affairs of the government even after the crisis was long past. Civilian rule, however, was eventually restored in 1985.

Since 1998, Uruguay has been suffering from a period of recession. The tourism industry has been deteriorating, and the public debt has been increasing at an alarming rate. The national currency, the peso, has also weakened in the international market. However, the country's economy has been showing some signs of improvement since 2004, when the government changed in the last elections.

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the southern part of South America, Uruguay shares borders with Brazil and Argentina; the South Atlantic Ocean forms a coastline on the east. It is the second smallest independent nation in South America after Suriname. Uruguay's terrain is characterized by rolling plains, low hills (cuchillas), and fertile coastlands. Cerro Cathedral is the highest point in Uruguay at 1686 feet. Two of the main rivers of Uruguay are Río de la Plata and Río Negro.

Uruguay enjoys a temperate climate, enjoying warm, pleasant weather throughout the year. Average temperatures range between 70°F and 82°F during the summer, while in winter the average temperature ranges between 50°F and 61°F.

The terrain is characterized by palm savannahs (trees that are scattered over an extensive area) and grasslands. Fauna is represented by the rhea (an ostrichlike bird), but wild animals are rare.

❁ ECONOMY

Uruguay has a stable, export-oriented economy. Some of the major export items include rice, leather products, wool, electricity, meat, dairy products, and vehicles. Between 1999 and 2002, the Uruguayan economy suffered due to a fall in the demand of export commodities by two of its major export partners—Brazil and Argentina. Also, the withdrawal of Argentinean dollars from banks in Uruguay resulted in a major bank crisis and added to the nation's economic troubles. However, with the help of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), Uruguay has introduced a number of economic reforms and has successfully undone most of the damage caused by that economic crisis.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Uruguay is a Roman Catholic country, with more than 66 percent of the nation's population practicing that religion. The country is also home to Protestants and Jews, but more than 30 percent of the population remains unaffiliated. In terms of ethnicity, European Uruguayans are the dominant group, followed by the mestizos (people of mixed race), and blacks. In addition to Spanish, Portuguese and Brazilerio (both mixtures of Portuguese and Spanish) are widely spoken.

Uruguayans love music, dance, and theater. One of the traditional forms of Uruguayan music and dance is the candombe, which is performed by dancers who dance to the beat of traditional drum ensembles known as cuerdas. This form of music originated with the African slaves who were brought to South America to work on plantations.

Diablada (dance of the devils) is performed during religious festivals such as Virgen de la Candelaria, which is held in February.

Murga is a Uruguayan musical theater performed during Carnival. Three percussionists and a chorus form a traditional murga group. They sing songs to the tune of the percussionists, and every song is characterized by an opening song (saludo) and an exit song (retirada, or despedida). The Uruguayan tango, classical music, rock, reggae, and rap are also extremely popular.

Uruguayans are known for their handmade woolen items and leather products such as belts, purses, shoes, and hats. Also, the tradition of gauchos (or South American cowboys) is prevalent even today. They enthrall audiences during rodeo shows by performing daredevil stunts and demonstrating their horseback-riding skills.

❁ CUISINE

Beef is the staple diet of Uruguay, although dishes made from other meats, such as chicken and fish, are also popular. Some of the traditional dishes of Uruguay include: medias lunas mixtas (a croissant filled with cheese and ham); panchos (sausages); burgaras (spicy sausages); milanesas (veal cutlets); chivitos (steakburgers); churrasco (grilled steak); costillas (lamb chops); and asado (barbecued beef). Meat stews, pies, and roasted meat are also popular.

The favorite beverage of Uruguay is a traditional herb tea known as yerba maté. In the past maté was poured into a gourd and people drank it

Candombe

Candombe, a unique style of musical performance created by the Afro-Uruguayan people of Montevideo, developed from the Kings of Congo ceremonial processions (the slave version of the Three Wise Men processions celebrated on Epiphany, January 6) during the period of African slavery in South America. Based on the Bantu drumming style, it has connections with other musical forms of African origin found in the Americas.

Candombe is performed by groups called cuerdas, and each cuerda has between 50 and 100 parading drummers. They carry several different sizes of barrel-shaped drums (tambores) made of wood, with animal skins stretched tightly over the top. Performers carry their tambores at the waist with the aid of a shoulder strap, and play them with one hand and a stick. Each type of drum has a specific function in the music: The chico, the smallest drum, has a high tone and keeps the rhythm); the repique is a medium-sized drum used mostly for improvisation; the piano is large, with a low pitch, and carries the melody. A fourth, larger drum, called the bajo or bombo, has the deepest tone, and provides the accent on the fourth beat. Although once common, the bajo is now rarely used in candombe.

Candombe can be heard on any Sunday evening in Montevideo's streets, but the cuerdas perform on many other occasions, especially when important holidays are celebrated, including January 6 (Epiphany), December 25 (Christmas), and January 1 (New Year's). But the most extravagant and intense candombe performances are to be seen during Carnival, when all the cuerdas (there are somewhere between 80 and 90 in Uruguay) join in a huge parade and compete for prizes.

Origin of the Landing of the 33 Patriots

This day commemorates the arrival of Juan Antonio Lavalleja (1784–1853), a renowned Uruguayan revolutionary and 33 volunteers (the Treinta y Tres, or Thirty-Three Immortals) from Argentina to fight against the Portuguese forces in Uruguay on April 19, 1825. Lavalleja's brave attempt sparked a rebellion in Uruguay and paved the way for Uruguay's independence.

Early in the 19th century, there was a constant struggle in South America between the Portuguese, the Spanish, and other colonial powers over control of the area. The Spanish began settling in the area in the 16th and 17th centuries and established their domination in the region. In 1811 a Uruguayan revolutionary, José Gervasio Artigas, launched a revolution against the occupying forces and eventually was successful in driving them out. In 1821 Portuguese forces in neighboring Brazil began a series of attacks on Uruguay. They eventually defeated the Uruguayans and annexed the region, making it part of Brazil. A series of wars were fought between Uruguayan revolutionaries and Portuguese forces, and the revolutionaries fought valiantly to rescue Uruguay from the Portuguese. The attack Juan Antonio Lavalleja and his 33 men launched against the Portuguese was one of the bravest attempts in the history of Uruguay, and it inspired other Uruguayans to intensify their efforts to gain their independence.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar and is celebrated as New Year's Day all over the world. Celebrations and revelries usually begin on the evening of December 31 (New Year's Eve), when special parties are held in different parts of Uruguay. Singing, dining, and dancing are an integral part of the celebrations, and Uruguayans usher in the new year with great joy and enthusiasm.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day or Workers' Day, in many parts of the world. It commemorates the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. ❁ BATTLE OF LAS PIEDRAS

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 17–18

This day commemorates the conflict between Uruguay and Brazil in the Battle of Las Piedras, which ended on May 18, 1828. Brazil, which was under Portuguese domination, had annexed Uruguay in 1821, much to the displeasure of the Uruguayans. In an attempt to free their nation, the Uruguayans launched a series of attacks against Brazil. This started a series of wars between Uruguayan revolutionaries and Brazilian forces. After the battle of Las Piedras, British forces intervened and helped the warring factions reach an agreement. A peace treaty was signed between the two sides, and eventually Brazil recognized Uruguay's independence.

❁ BIRTHDAY OF JOSÉ ARTIGAS

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: June 19

José Gervasio Artigas was a renowned Uruguayan revolutionary. He was born on June 19, 1764, and led Uruguayans in their fight to victory against the Spanish and Portuguese occupying forces in the region. He is known as the father of Uruguayan independence.

Uruguay has declared June 19 a public holiday in honor of the great Uruguayan hero. Uruguayan patriotism is very much in evidence on this day, and plays based on the life of Artigas are staged in different parts of the country.

❁ CONSTITUTION DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 18

This day commemorates the adoption of the first constitution of Uruguay on July 18, 1830, and is great cause for celebration on the part of its citizens. Important politicians make patriotic speeches in Montevideo, and the national flag is proudly flown in every city and town.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: August 25

On August 25, 1830, Provincia Oriental del Río de la Plata (modern-day Uruguay) proclaimed its independence from Brazil. The region had been made a part of Brazil in 1821, when Provincia was annexed by occupying Portuguese forces. However, Uruguayans staged numerous revolts against the occupying forces, eventually defeating the Portuguese forces and driving them out of Uruguay.

On this day, there are big celebrations in the capital of Montevideo, and the president of the nation presides over Independence Day events. In his ceremonial speech he asks Uruguayans to take inspiration from the revolutionaries and to protect their sovereignty. A number of cultural activities such as folk dances, folk songs, and folk theater are an integral part of the celebrations.

❁ COLUMBUS DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: October 12

Columbus Day was originally a European holiday to commemorate the arrival of Christopher Columbus in South America on October 12, 1497. Now, however, it is also celebrated as Día de la Raza (Day of the Race) since the Spanish who followed Columbus to South America married into the native communities, and thus a new race of people was born. This race came to be known as Mestizo (people of mixed race—Spanish and the indigenous natives of South America).

In Uruguay, although this day is an official celebration, many indigenous and Native American people organize nationwide demonstrations against Columbus because they believe he opened the door for the colonization of Uruguay and other countries of the region and, as a result, robbed the indigenous people of their freedom. They were forced to work as slaves in mines and were subjected to brutal treatment by colonial rulers.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: January 6

The Feast of Epiphany, also known as Three King's Day, is a Christian feast that celebrates the arrival of the Magi (the Three Wise Men of ancient Persia—Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior) in Bethlehem to see the infant Jesus. The word epiphany means “to reveal” or “to make known.” The word was applied to this holiday because it celebrates the fact that the Magi revealed Jesus to the world as a king. On this day Uruguayans visit friends and family and exchange gifts. This is the second

❁ CARNIVAL

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Two weeks before Lent

Carnival is a period of celebration that takes place for two weeks prior to the start of Lent, ending on Shrove Tuesday, the day before Lent. The word shrove is derived from the verb “sbrive” (meaning “to absolve oneself from sin”). In earlier times people absolved themselves of their sins on this day by confessing them in front of the priest, who was also known as a “shriner” (“absolver of sins”).

During Carnival Uruguay is transformed into a big party. People wear masks and colorful costumes and play pranks on each other. Also a wide variety of events, including comical skits and water fights, are common. Candombe is one of the popular dances performed during the festival. It originated with the African blacks brought to work as slaves in Uruguay. A band of 50 musicians and candombe dancers are major highlights of Carnival. Murga bands (steel bands) play nonstop music during the Carnival procession.

❁ PALM SUNDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Last Sunday of Lent

Palm Sunday is the sixth Sunday of Lent and the first day of Holy Week, commemorating the last week of Jesus’ mortal life. The day is as much about Jesus’ triumphal entry into Jerusalem as it is about the beginning of his journey to the Cross. His arrival in Jerusalem was indeed the way to the Cross.

Halting at the Mount of Olives, near Bethany, Jesus sent two disciples to the village of Bethphage to bring the donkey and its foal, tied at the crossway of two roads, to him. They did so and placed their clothes on the foal to provide a comfortable seat. The disciples then cut branches and covered the path, and Jesus rode into Jerusalem, fulfilling the words of the Old Testament prophet Zechariah. People welcomed him by waving palm and olive branches, and strewing garments and branches along the road. There were different perceptions at work: Jesus rode in on a donkey, a humble entry of a peaceful nature by a spiritual king; the people of Jerusalem welcomed him with palm and olive branches because they wanted a worldly king to defeat the Romans. A special Mass is held in Catholic churches and participants are given a looped strand of dried palm frond, a symbol of this day.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, or Holy Thursday, is an important Christian celebration because it commemorates the day on which Jesus washed the feet of all his Apostles before the Last Supper. It falls on the Thursday before Easter. It is called Maundy Thursday because mandatum (from the Latin verb mandare, “to command”) was allegedly the first word that Jesus spoke as he began washing the feet of his disciples: “Mandatum novum do vobis,” which means, “A new commandment I give to you.”

On this day people attend prayer services in local churches to offer prayers.

❁ GOOD FRIDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Friday before Easter

Good Friday, also called Holy Friday, Mourning Friday, and Great Friday (in Eastern Orthodox churches), is the Friday before Easter and the last Friday of Lent. It is observed in most parts of the world to commemorate the Crucifixion of Jesus. Like other Roman Catholics, Uruguayans observe Good Friday as a day of sorrow and mourning. People offer prayers in local churches, and plays based on the life of Jesus are staged on Good Friday. Fasting is also associated with Good Friday in Uruguay. Uruguayans begin a fast that starts on Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent) and lasts for 40 days until Good Friday. They also observe a partial fast until Easter Sunday. This day is a nonliturgical day in the Catholic Church, so no Communion is administered. Church bells are silenced for this day of mourning, and the Tenebrae (“darkness”) service is held to symbolize a world without God.

❁ HOLY SATURDAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: Saturday before Easter

Holy Saturday, the day after Good Friday, is the day before Easter. This day, known as Sabbatum Sanctum in Latin (“Holy Sabbath”), commemorates the day on which Jesus’ body lay in a tomb. Catholics believe that on this day, he arose in spirit and rescued those who were held captive in hell and sent them back to paradise. Holy Saturday is an important observance because it symbolizes the end of one world and the beginning of the era of salvation, represented by Jesus' Resurrection.

On Holy Saturday, devout Uruguayans attend an evening prayer service and participate in an Easter night vigil. During the vigil they carry candles, and when the priest announces Jesus' Resurrection, the candles are lit and greetings are exchanged.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus' Resurrection from the dead on the third day following his Crucifixion. This day is the most important observance in the Christian calendar because the dates of so many other church holidays are scheduled on the basis of the date on which Easter falls, which depends upon the date of the vernal (spring) equinox. Christians believe that Jesus, through his death, freed all his followers from the penalty of sin.

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers. Easter eggs have also become associated with the festival because they are symbols of rebirth and fertility originally associated with the Germanic mother goddess called Eostre.

Uruguayans enjoy a weeklong holiday throughout Holy Week. In Montevideo, the week is also celebrated as La Semana Criolla ("Rodeo Week"). Gauchos (Uruguayan cowboys) entertain the crowds with their stunts and horseback riding skills. On Easter, Uruguayans visit their friends and family members in the countryside and exchange greetings.

Observed on: November 2

All Souls' Day is a Roman Catholic festival on which the deceased are remembered. It is celebrated on November 2 unless that date falls on a Sunday, in which case All Souls' Day is celebrated on the following Monday. On All Souls' Day in Uruguay, three Masses are conducted—one for the priest, one for the departed, and the last one for the pope. Then people visit local cemeteries and put flowers on their relatives' graves.

✿ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, although no one knows the actual date on which he was born. The Catholic Church chose the month and date familiar to us because many pagan groups celebrated a holiday related to the winter solstice and the return of the light at this time.

Christmas Eve is known as Noche Bueno ("the good night") in Uruguay. After dinner, children are allowed to open their gifts that have been placed under a beautifully decorated Christmas tree. Then Catholic families attend Midnight Mass in local churches.

On Christmas Day Uruguayans visit friends and family members and exchange gifts and greetings. Christmas is also known as Family Day since it is a religious celebration that is celebrated by the entire family.

✿ VIRGEN DE LA CANDELARIA

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: February 2

The festival of Virgen de la Candelaria is an annual religious celebration that takes place in the city of Puno on February 2. Some of the major highlights of the festival include religious ceremonies and cultural events such as concerts and dances, colorful costumes, and parades. During the festival the performance by a group of dancers known as "devil dancers" (due to the devilish attire they wear during the dance) is truly remarkable.

The procession leaves the Chapel of the Virgen de la Candelaria in a strict hierarchical order, with the priests and altar boys in the lead, followed by Christians, pagans, and then the general public and tourists.

During the procession, devil dancers perform the diablada ("dance of the devils"), which was conceived by a group of black slaves working in the mines while they were trapped inside the shaft. Just when they thought they were going to die, they decided to entrust their souls to the Virgin Mary. However, they were rescued, and they believed it was due to the blessings of the Virgin Mary.

Dressed as devils and wearing monstrous masks, horns, and costumes, they dance through the streets to the music of panpipes and drums. A portrait of the Mammacha Candelaria, or Virgin Mary, is paraded, and people make offerings to her. She is also revered as Pachamama, or Mother Earth. At the end of the festivities, the devil dancers go to local cemeteries and offer prayers at the graves. The day is ended by a spectacular display of fireworks that light up the night sky.

❁ MINNESOTA RIVER REVIVAL

Observed in: Montevideo
Observed by: General Public
Observed on: September

The Minnesota River Revival is an annual festival aimed at the preservation of the Minnesota River that flows through the capital of Montevideo. This annual fiesta was begun here recently, although similar celebrations have been taking place in Montevideo, Minnesota, for some time. The relationship between the two Montevideos began in 1905 with the exchange of flags. Over the years the two cities have exchanged several tokens of goodwill. In 1949 the citizens of Montevideo, Uruguay, presented the people of Montevideo, Minnesota, with an 11-foot-high bronze statue of José Artigas, Uruguay's Father of Independence. In the same year Montevideo, Minnesota, began celebrating this historic day as a tribute to its sister city.

For the Uruguayan festival a wide variety of cultural and educational activities are held to create awareness and educate people about the advantages of water conservation. Fireworks, sports, and cultural events are also part of the celebrations.

Rites of Passage

❁ BIRTH

Cakes are an integral part of birthday celebrations in Uruguay. Surrounded by friends and family members, the birthday boy or girl is greeted with loud cheers and applause as he or she blows out the candles on the cake. Also the elders touch the shoulder or head of the birthday boy or girl to bless him or her.

When a girl reaches the age of 15, she puts on a formal dress on her birthday and is allowed to dance the waltz with possible suitors.

❁ MARRIAGE

To abide by tradition, a Uruguayan man who wants to marry must seek the approval of the bride's parents. Most marriages take place in a church, and friends and family members extend their love, blessings, and good wishes to the newlyweds. A reception is held for close family friends and relatives after the wedding and singing, dancing, and dining are an integral part of the celebrations. However, the newlyweds do not stay long and sneak out of the party while the guests celebrate until the early hours of the next morning.

Introduction

HISTORY

Although Uzbekistan is a landlocked country, archaeological and historical evidence show that it was connected with many of the ancient civilizations of both Europe and Asia and was a significant link in the commercial networks. The country's claim to deep historical roots was corroborated in 1938, when an entire cranium of a child's skull was found in a cave in the Baisun region, proving that the area known as Uzbekistan was inhabited during the Paleolithic by Neanderthals.

Some 200 Neanderthal sites indicate that Homo neanderthalensis had an established presence in the Caucasus and Western Asia, but the Baisun discovery set an eastern boundary for the Neanderthal range in Uzbekistan and linked the manufacture of Mousterian implements from the region to this hominid group. Other important Uzbek sites span the Lower to Upper Paleolithic periods, but the collapse of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) halted further archaeological research in most Central Asian republics.

Then in 2002, when excavation again became feasible, the Uzbek–American Stone Age Project discovered Anghilak cave in the region of Kashkadariya, a new Middle Paleolithic cave in southeastern Uzbekistan. The varied raw materials used to fashion tools include flint, quartz, siliceous limestone, and quartzite. The similarities between these Mousterian artifacts and those excavated from the Zagros-Taurus, Trans-Caspian, and Altai areas clearly indicate a sustained presence of H. Neanderthalensis. However a number of confounding factors make it unclear just how far east the Neanderthals traveled or whether there were other hominid groups in Central Asia at this time.

For 2,000 years the Silk Road, a 4,000-mile-long network of caravan tracts was the major highway for transporting material goods and knowledge between the four major centers of civilization: Europe, the Near East, India, and China. During this time exotic and commercial goods, including silk, skills, knowledge, and religion crisscrossed the Eurasian continent and determined to a large extent the course of European and Asian histories and cultures. Three of Uzbekistan's cities—Samarkand, Bukhara, and Khiva—were doubtless

The Stone Age Diet

There are people living on this planet who are stronger, faster, and healthier than those of us living in modern “civilizations.” They have straight teeth, perfect eyesight, and their lives are not limited or cut short by arthritis, diabetes, hypertension, heart disease, stroke, depression, schizophrenia, and cancer. They are the last 84 tribes of hunter-gatherers in the world. Why are they healthier than those of us who think our lives are more “civilized” or less “barbaric”? Their diet. They still eat pretty much what the first humans ate two million years ago, and what their ancestors ate about seven million years ago, the diet compatible with our genetic development. It is not a “civilized” or “modern” diet.

This diet is often called the “Paleolithic Diet,” the “Stone Age Diet,” the “Cave Man Diet,” or the “Hunter-Gatherer Diet.” Its basic concepts are simple because it contains only those foods consumed by early humans during their evolution, yet it addresses all the major dietary components we are only beginning to understand including vitamins, fats, protein, carbohydrates, antioxidants, and so forth.

For millions of years, humans ate meat, fish, fowl and the leaves, roots, and fruits of many plants. The problem these people faced was how to obtain more calories from their environment because many plants—grains, beans, potatoes—are inedible and toxic when they are raw. At the end of the Paleolithic, about 10,000 years ago, humans found out that cooking such foods made them less toxic and, therefore, edible. The heat destroyed enough of their natural toxins to enable us to eat them without apparent ill effects. Grains include wheat, corn, barley, rice, sorghum, millet, and oats. Foods based on grain include products such as flour, bread, noodles, and pasta. These foods are now sometimes called Neolithic foods.

In addition to doubling the calories humans could derive from cooked plant foods, the Neolithic diet had additional advantages: its foods could be stored for long periods; for their light weight, they provided a lot of calories, making it easy to carry them; the edible part of the plant was its seed, making it possible to cultivate the grains. With this discovery the basis for civilization was set. Food could be set aside for winter, when agriculture was impossible, and nomads could carry more food because of its light weight. Agriculture required a more settled life; our ancestors had to stay in one place at least long enough to harvest the crops. Food storage meant that surpluses could be saved, and this freed some people who became specialists in other areas of life such as builders, priests, warriors, writers, accountants, and rulers. Civilization had begun, but our genes have never adapted our systems to the carbohydrates—grains, beans, and potatoes.

The Neolithic diet, with grains, beans, and potatoes at its center, has the following characteristics: It is toxic to some extent, even when cooked; it is high in carbohydrates that are quickly converted to sugar by our bodies; it is a poor source for vitamins, especially A, the B-group, and C, plus minerals and antioxidants. Its foods certainly provide humans with more calories, but they are “empty” calories.

The Paleolithic diet, the one our genetic development enables us to tolerate best, includes the following “dos” and “don’ts”: Do eat meat, chicken, fish (including organ meats); eggs; vegetables, especially “root” vegetables (carrots, turnips, etc.); fruits; nuts, with the exceptions of peanuts (which is a bean) and cashews; lots of berries, of all kinds. Avoid: grains, including bread, pasta, noodles; beans, including string beans, kidney beans, lentils, peanuts, snow peas, and peas; potatoes; dairy products, including milk, cheese, butter, and sour cream; sugar; salt; chemical preservatives.

important stops along one of the Silk Road’s southern routes.

The earliest settlements in the region of Uzbekistan were the encampments and gathering places of seminomadic tribes. These Eurasian peoples left physical evidence of their religious beliefs in the ubiquitous petroglyphs. These drawings, found all over Central Asia, are primarily horned animals such as ibex and mountain goats (frequently including hunters as well). At many sites they are over 3,000 years old. Another type of evidence connected with the ancient nomads’ religious beliefs are the stone figures called balbals found scattered across the steppes and pastures of inner Asia. Each tribal group also had its own burial site, usually set on an elevated location such as a hill. These sites reveal an interesting combination of traditional nomadic, Islamic, and modern Western burial customs.

Present-day Uzbekistan was a part of the Persian Empire for thousands of years, until the Turks invaded the region. This period also saw the arrival of Islam in Uzbekistan, via the Silk Road. Timur Lenk (1336–1405), more familiar as Timurlane, the great Mongol warrior, took over Uzbekistan in the 14th century and made the Uzbek city of Samarkand his capital. During this period Central Asian ancient shamanic spiritual practices gradually became mixed with Islamic religious traditions and rituals.

The region saw increasing prosperity and development until the 19th century, when the Russian Empire developed an interest in the region. The first major efforts to bring Uzbekistan under Russian control took place in 1839. Even though this effort was met with firm resistance, 25 years later the Russian Empire had successfully annexed this territory. While resistance movements emerged during the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Uzbekistan remained under Russian control. Eventually when the Soviet Union was established, this territory became a part of the new Communist country the USSR. Not all Uzbeks were happy with Soviet rule, but their efforts to resist were largely unsuccessful.

During the Soviet era, Uzbekistan was known as the land of “white gold” (cotton) and became an important asset of the USSR. Uzbekistan was also important to the USSR because of its rich mineral resources. The first noncommunist movement began in Uzbekistan in 1989, while the USSR was declining in power, control, and influence. The movement popularized the use of the Uzbek language and attempted to make the people familiar with their heritage and aware of their ethnicity. These efforts eventually paid off. Uzbekistan proclaimed itself independent on September 1, 1991; the USSR was officially dismantled on December 31, 1991.

President Islam Karimov (b. 1938) came to power in this new republic and continues to rule, almost as a dictator. There is strict military oppression in Uzbekistan, and opposition parties are not allowed to contest elections. In 1999 attempts made by Islamic groups to overthrow the current government were foiled. Violence and unrest continue in modern-day Uzbekistan.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Uzbekistan is a doubly landlocked country (surrounded entirely by other landlocked countries) that shares borders with Afghanistan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan.

Most of the area of Uzbekistan is covered with sandy deserts. The eastern region is made up of hilly and mountainous terrain. The highest point in Uzbekistan is Adelunga Toghi at 14,111 feet. The southern end of the Aral Sea is located in the west of the country; it was once the fourth largest landlocked body of water in the world. However, now the Aral Sea is shrinking due to overuse and diversion of rivers that used to drain into it.

Uzbekistan has a desert-continental type of climate. The temperature can range from 21°F to 90°F. The weather is generally dry throughout the year with sparse rainfall. A drought-prone area, the countryside presents a composite of arid grasslands and mountain meadows. Animal life is varied. Giant lizards, snow leopards, and rare species of mountain goats are found here.

❁ ECONOMY

Uzbekistan was one of the poorest regions that formed the former USSR. After separating and declaring independence, this country has been following the road to economic reforms and reparation. However, political instability has proved a deterrent to many of these efforts. In spite of such difficulties, Uzbekistan has emerged to become the third largest producer of cotton in the world. The country is also a major producer of gold, natural gas, and chemicals.

The country is rich in minerals and natural resources such as natural gas, petroleum, coal, gold, uranium, silver, copper, lead, zinc, tungsten, and molybdenum. Only 9 percent of Uzbekistan’s total land is arable. The major crops grown are cotton, vegetables, fruits, and food grains. The major industries of Uzbekistan are textiles, food processing, machine building, metallurgy, natural gas, and chemicals.

Uzbekistan has good trade relations with Russia, Ukraine, Italy, Tajikistan, Poland, South Korea, Kazakhstan, the United States, Germany, China, and Turkey. The major exports are cotton, gold, energy products, fertilizers, ferrous metals, textiles, food products, and automobiles. The major import items are machinery and equipment.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Uzbekistan is known for the fine architectural styles and structures found in cities like Bukhara, Khiva, and Samarkand. The monumental mosques, minarets, mausoleums, and monasteries of these cities are world renowned. Uzbek art is seen in handicrafts, clothes, arms, jewelry, weaving, embroidery, and rugs. The Uzbeks used to have a seminomadic lifestyle. Because of this, the people of this region concentrated on art forms that are portable, such as weaving and handicrafts. Calligraphy and painting are other art forms found in this region.

The classical music of this region is known as shashmaqam. This musical genre developed in the late 16th century and is similar to Persian music. This musical form has been widely influenced by Sufi poetry. Koshuk is a dance performed to a lilting melody. Lapar is a dialogue-song. Ulans are duets and yallas are songs accompanied by dance. A special place in Uzbek musical heritage is occupied by dastans, which are epic legends with lyric heroic content.

Fun Fact

The suffix -stan that ends the names of several new countries in Central Asia goes back to the Proto-Indo-European root sta, which means “to stand,” and is also the source of the English word stand. In Sanskrit it means “place,” in Persian (Farsi) “home of,” and in Bulgarian “camp,” referring to the temporary camp of a nomadic group.

Uzbek men wear light-colored robes that are closed with colorful sashes tied in the front and white skullcaps. Women dress in colorful clothes consisting of knee-length shirts with trousers made of the same material. Uzbek women braid their hair. If they make one or two braids, it indicates they are married. Single women make multiple braids.

🌀 CUISINE

Uzbek cuisine is known to be hot, spicy, and flavorful. Spices like black cumin, red and black peppers, barberries, sesame seeds, and herbs like cilantro (leaves of coriander or Chinese parsley), dill, parsley, celeriac, and basil are regularly used in most of the dishes prepared in this region.

Uzbek food consists of bread, rice, stews, thick soups, noodles, and dumplings. Meat is popular and is consumed by most people of this country. Although mutton is preferred, lamb and chicken also form part of the diet. Dairy products such as katyk (yogurt) and suzma (similar to cottage cheese) are eaten in salads or added in soups. Vegetables like eggplant, cabbage, carrots, cucumbers, onions, peas, peppers, potatoes, pumpkins, and tomatoes, and fruits like apples, cherries, dates, grapes, melons, and pomegranates are also enjoyed. Fried nuts and sweets, such as halvah (a pudding made from sugar and spices and flavored with sesame seeds or almonds), are popular among. Pilaf, or pilav, a favorite dish in this region, is prepared with rice, meat, vegetables, spices, dried fruits, and nuts. There are many variations of this dish in different regions of Uzbekistan.

Fun Fact

The Paleolithic, or Old Stone Age, period was the longest period in human history, lasting from 2.5 million years ago to about 10,000 years ago.

The people of Uzbekistan love to drink tea, be it green, black, or sugarless. Offering tea is considered part of the hospitality of the region. Tea is often served with snacks like samsa (fried dumplings with stuffing), bread, halvah, and various fried foods. Even though Islam is the predominant religion in Uzbekistan, wine, brandy, beer, and vodka are available for public consumption.

Tashkent and Samarkand

Tashkent, Uzbekistan's capital, is a 2,000-year-old city that was one of the most important commercial centers in Central Asia. This city is a major exporter of silk, cotton, textiles, oil, coal, copper, sulfur, rice, and manufactured products even in the 21st century. The word tashkent means "stone fortress." The city was once highly developed and had all the characteristics of a modern metropolis, but little remains of those glorious days. The old city of Tashkent was destroyed in a massive earthquake in 1966. The famous Silk Road passes through Tashkent and other famous Uzbek cities, Samarkand, Bukhara, and Khiva.

Samarkand was a center for trade and economic activity. In the 14th century Timur Lenk (sometimes Timur, Tamburlaine, or Timur the Lame; 1336–1405) made this city the capital of his empire (which covered most of present-day Central Asia). The carpets woven in this city reflected Persian and Turkish culture and have always been world renowned.

Rites of Passage

BIRTH

When a baby is born in Uzbekistan, it is an occasion for celebration. Beshik Tuyi is a ritual that is celebrated on the seventh, ninth, or eleventh day after a baby's birth. During this ceremony the baby's grandfather hands a decorated cradle to the father of the child, who in turn takes it to the mother of the newborn infant.

The child, in the presence of all the invited relatives, is placed in a cradle and rocked. Ornate wooden cradles, used for this ceremony, are normally given by the mother's family. There is a lot of music, food, and merrymaking on this occasion. Special sweets and flatbreads are prepared, and the child is presented with toys and clothes that are placed near the cradle.

COMING OF AGE

Male circumcision is a part of Uzbekistan's tradition and is carried out at puberty. The Muslims in Uzbekistan believe that, by undergoing this ritual, a boy becomes a man. Trained elders use knives, razors, and other sharp instruments to perform the circumcision, without administering any anesthetic. This practice enjoys social backing, and families take great pride in it. Huge celebrations also follow this coming-of-age ritual.

MARRIAGE

Uzbek marriages are often arranged by parents, aunts, or matchmakers. The wedding date is finalized during the betrothal ceremony (fatikha tuyi). Following the engagement ceremony the matchmakers are each gifted with a dasturkhan (ornamental tablecloth), along with two flat breads and sweets. Many days prior to the wedding, the ceremony of qiz oshi ("wedding shower") is held in the bride's home, which is attended by her close relatives and friends.

On the wedding day the groom's family cooks a special delicacy called pilaf (or pilav) and sends it to the bride's home. The groom, along with his friends, comes to collect her. The bride's friends sing traditional songs and bid her goodbye. The imam, who officiates at the wedding ceremony in the groom's house, recites the "Khutbai Nikoh" (a marriage prayer) and explains to the couple their responsibilities and obligations. He then declares them married. Usually Uzbek couples go to the registrar's office after the ceremony and register the marriage according to civil law.

The wedding party is a lavish affair with lots of special dishes, music, and dancing. At the end of the party the couple is led to their nuptial home, where they spend the night. The next morning, the ceremony of kelin salomi (bride's greeting) takes place. All the relatives of the groom gather in the front yard, where they will greet and bless the bride in turns. The bride greets them back by bowing from the waist.

❁ DEATH

When a person dies in Uzbekistan, the body is buried according to Muslim rites and as soon as possible. Special prayers are said just before the person dies. Women are not allowed to participate in the funeral services held in the cemetery; rather, they mourn at home for a prolonged period of time.

Introduction

✿ HISTORY

According to historians and archaeologists the first settlers, coming from New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, might have landed in Vanuatu approximately 3,000 years ago. It is likely that they used sturdy, seagoing canoes for the journey. The first European to discover Vanuatu was the Spanish explorer Captain Pedro Ferdinand De Quirós (1565–1615), in 1605. He named the islands Tierra Australis del Espíritu Santo (“Southern Land of the Holy Spirit”), assuming that he had discovered the southern continent of Australia. The island on which he had landed still bears the name Espíritu Santo.

The French explorer Louis Antoine de Bougainville (1729–1811) landed in Vanuatu in 1768. He came ashore and traversed the islands of Aoba, Pentecost, and Maewo, which he renamed Cyclades after the famous Greek Islands. He named the strait between the islands after himself. In 1774 Captain James Cook (1728–79) sailed through the island chain from north to south. He explored many of the islands and renamed the archipelago the New Hebrides after the islands off the coast of Scotland. After Cook the islands were repeatedly visited by French explorers.

By 1895 both the French and English had settled here. In 1902 both nations appointed resident commissioners. In October 1906 Britain and France signed an agreement resolving their various claims to the country and establishing joint sovereignty. This condominium was the only government of its kind in the world. Apparently as occurred in other places where Europeans had contact with the indigenous peoples, the native people of Vanuatu contracted diseases brought in by the missionaries and traders and died in large numbers.

The population fell from over a million in 1800 to less than 50,000 in 1935. In late 1978 the condominium arrangement ceased, and elections were held in November 1979. Vanuatu became independent on July 30, 1980, and joined the UN on September 15, 1981.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

The land area Vanuatu is approximately 5,675 square miles, and the territorial waters stretch over 173,750 square miles. When the very first islands sprang up from the sea, they had little or no vegetation. They were gradually overrun by plants from neighboring countries, brought in by the birds, wind, sea currents, and human beings. The plants initially brought in by people served as sources of food as well as building materials for houses, canoes, fences, and so forth. Vanuatu is now covered with an immense variety of plants, trees, and shrubs. Close to the sea, the commonly found trees include mangroves, coconut palms, casuarinas, pandanus, burao (a small tree growing up to a height of 30 feet, often forming dense thickets), and namele (a species of fern and used on the national flag) among others. In the interiors of the islands the vegetation becomes denser with a profusion of melek trees, kauri trees, banyan trees, ferns, wild orchids, and vines. The local fauna includes insects, worms, lizards, snakes, bats, birds, and domesticated species such as pigs, chickens, cows, and horses.

There are more than 100 species of birds in Vanuatu. The country also has many varieties of colorful butterflies, some of which are known as “good news” butterflies. The most commonly seen reptiles are the gecko, the green lizard, the Pacific boa, and crocodiles. The sea skirting the islands is home to a wide variety of fish such as yellowfin tuna, barracuda, swordfish, marlin, and shark.

The climate of Vanuatu is tropical in the north and tends to be subtropical in the southernmost parts. The average midday temperature in the capital of Port-Vila is 84°F in summer and 77°F in winter; rainfall is about 93 inches annually. The archipelago lies between two sides of a fault in the Earth’s crust that rub against each other, causing volcanic eruptions and earthquakes. Vanuatu has both extinct and active volcanoes. The Ambrym and Lopevi volcanoes are permanently active. Lopevi was dormant for many years but became active about 50 years ago. On the southern island of Tanna is located Yasur, which can easily be reached by travelers and explorers. There are no rivers on the island, and its highest point is an unnamed location on Banaba at 266 feet.

❁ ECONOMY

The economy of Vanuatu is based on small-scale agriculture, the source of livelihood for 65 percent of the total population. Fishing, offshore financial services, and tourism are other important industries. Mineral deposits are negligible, and there are no petroleum deposits. Tax revenues come mainly from import duties. Economic development is hindered by dependence on relatively few commodity exports (the island of Espiritu Santo produces the bulk of Vanuatu’s exports including cocoa, coffee, coconuts, and high-quality beef), vulnerability to natural disasters, and long distances from major markets. In mid-2002 the government stepped up its efforts to boost tourism. Australia and New Zealand are the main sources of tourists as well foreign aid. Agriculture, especially animal husbandry, is a second target for growth.

Kava

Kava is a beverage consumed on most Pacific Islands. It is prepared from the roots of the plant with the same name (Piper methysticum). Kava is usually planted in a field far away from the village, making it difficult to transport kava roots from the fields to the village. For preparing the drink, kava roots are first chopped into very tiny pieces. Then the pieces are ground and twisted by both hands. A little water is added to the mashed kava roots, and the doughlike stuff is kneaded well. A certain quantity of liquid comes out as a result of the squeezing of the kneaded roots. The liquid is then filtered through a sheet of coconut fiber and served in a coconut cup.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

The social fabric of Vanuatu is recognized as a highly cosmopolitan one. On Vanuatu small communities of French, British, Australians, New Zealanders, Vietnamese, and Chinese live in peaceful coexistence.

Up to the 1980s Vanuatu (formerly known as the New Hebrides), was jointly administered by France and Britain as a condominium. Most of Vanuatu’s islands have very thick vegetation and forest cover. Some of the islands are uninhabited. Among the inhabited ones the Malekula and Ambrym are home to groups of primitive people who live in inaccessible areas. Tanna Island is famous for the John Frum Cargo Cult as well as the Toka ritual dance. During this dance men wear tasseled skirts, paint their hair in different hues, and leap in a frenzy trying to trap women in their dance circles. Catching one, they toss her up and down, fondle, and pinch her. This continues all night. In the morning: pigs are slaughtered, followed by feasts.

On the island of Pentecost, the famous land-diving ritual takes place during April and May: Men jump off towers (constructed with bush and shrub materials) with dried-up vines tied to their legs. This is a highly risky practice because the jumpers' heads may be grazed by the solid earth and cause accidents or injuries.

It is customary on Pentecost for local people to communicate with their eyebrows and facial expressions. If someone raises his or her eyebrows, it can mean "hello" or "yes." What is more, one can even flag down a bus with the appropriate facial expression. It is also a common practice among the islanders to hiss at each other in order to get someone else's attention.

🌸 CUISINE

The intermingling of cultures and racial groups in Vanuatu is strongly reflected in its cuisine, which is a delicious fusion of Melanesian and European styles. Some interesting dishes are warm chicken salad laced with marinated feta, sun-dried tomatoes, and balsamic dressing sweetened with honey; tuluk (minced beef sealed in a manioc pastry) is served piping hot in cabbage jackets. Poe is the highly popular dessert (made of baked pumpkin mixed with manioc until it forms a smooth dough, to which are added sugars, a vanilla pod, and coconut cream). Coconut crabs, wild pigeons, and flying foxes (bats) are traditionally cooked in ground ovens and said to be highly palatable.

Pork is the mainstay of the local diet, and roast pork is a common dish. Raw ingredients include cabbages, bananas, pink grapefruit, skewered nuts, coconuts, fish and seafood (including squid, mussels, baby octopus, coconut crabs, and lobsters). French dishes served in Vanuatu's restaurants have a local touch, such as la tarte a l'oignon (onion tart). The men of Vanuatu drink kava at local kava bars. The rich, tropical soil in the vicinity of the active Yasur volcano on the island of Tanna is conducive to the cultivation of coffee beans, and coffee is also a highly popular beverage.

Public/Legal Holidays

🌸 NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

The people of Vanuatu say good-bye to the old year and joyously welcome the new one, which brings new hopes and aspirations for everyone. In Vanuatu, as in most parts of the world, New Year's Day is celebrated in the company of one's family, friends, and acquaintances. The day is marked by partying and get-togethers, dance and musical programs, and general gaiety and mirth. This is a public holiday.

🌸 LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: May 1

The earliest origins of Labor Day are sometimes ascribed to the pagan spring celebrations practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages. Their customs may have influenced the choice of May 1 to celebrate the contributions made by workers to their societies. In 1889 the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world and scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890. They coordinated this observance with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

Cannibalism

Among the Ni-Vanuatu, cannibalism was long a tradition in their tribal cultures, with the exception of the islands of Banks and Torres, where it was never practiced. The last recorded act of cannibalism was in 1969 among the Big Nambas tribe on Malekula, said to have been the last tribe to become Christians. There are also unconfirmed reports of cannibalism in Efate as late as 1987. Accurate information is hard to come by because the government has suppressed the subject of cannibalism; it is a sensitive issue because there are still people alive who once ate human flesh.

Why eat other human beings? Some tribes believed that eating human flesh endowed them with magical powers. For other groups it was a practical solution: If pigs weren't available, they sacrificed a person and then ate him or her. The meat was said to taste better and to be more tender than pork. A majority of such main courses were slain specifically to be eaten; only on Tanna were people who died of natural causes consumed. In spite of such exceptions cannibalism was usually the result of tribal warfare, though some missionaries were also served up. Europeans, however, weren't generally considered tasty because they were too salty. According to those who know the best parts were the buttocks, the inner upper arms and thighs; the palms of the hands and women's breasts were regarded as delicacies.

In Vanuatu on this occasion, the government draws up plans and implements several schemes for the amelioration of the workers' conditions and their general welfare. This day is marked by speeches, processions, and other trade union activities. This is a public holiday. This day is also celebrated as May Day or Workers' Day.

❁ INDEPENDENCE DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: July 30

In Vanuatu July 30 is celebrated as Independence Day. It is a day of festivities, and the waterfront in town is crowded with people from the outer islands who have come to join their relatives for the party. In some years the government adds another day or two to the celebration, depending on the mood of the people and whether it falls close to a weekend.

❁ UNITY DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: November 29

On this day in 1977 a civil uprising took place on the main island demanding liberation from foreign control. (Freedom came in 1980.) A number of people were injured while others hid themselves after an encounter with the armed police. This incident threw the entire region into chaos and disorder.

On this occasion every year the president of Vanuatu addresses the nation. Medals are awarded to those citizens who have made significant contributions to their society and the country at large. The general public prays for lasting peace and the unity of their nation. Some people also go on picnics and enjoy group amusements on this day. This is a public holiday and schools, businesses, and government offices are closed.

❁ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates the Christian belief in Jesus' Resurrection from the dead three days after his Crucifixion. It is sometimes called Resurrection Day. This is a day of utmost importance because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin.

The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to pray. The word easter is derived from the name of the Germanic mother goddess Eostre. She was the revered fertility goddess of the Saxon people who lived in northern Europe. Easter eggs, fertility symbols, once associated with the goddess, are now associated with the Christian festival. They are symbols of new life.

Easter signifies the resurgence of hope and a fresh lease on life for all humanity. Early in the morning the people attend Mass and prayer services in the local churches. The rest of the day is spent in outdoor activities and sports. The spirit of joyfulness and festivity spills over to the following day Easter Monday.

❁ ASCENSION DAY

Observed by: Christians

People of Vanuatu celebrate the festival in the traditional way with prayers and visits to churches.

Fun Fact

People were not really boiled in huge pots full of water. They were cooked in underground ovens.

John Frum Cargo Cult

The island of Tanna is home to the John Frum Cargo Cult, reputedly one of the world's most enigmatic religions. When Presbyterian missionaries came to the Pacific Islands during the late 19th and early 20th centuries, they brought with them Western ideals and material goods that began to erode the Vanuatu traditional, or kastom ("custom"), way of life. During the 1930s several reports of sightings of John Frum spread like wildfire through the island. He was believed to be a spiritual messiah who had come to lead the people back to their traditional ways. The actual character and traits of John Frum are still shrouded in mystery. The Ni-Vanuatu believe that he is the Son of God who may take the form of a black Melanesian, or even a white man. According to popular beliefs, he lives in the crater of the Yasur volcano with an army of 20,000 men.

CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the son of God, and the messiah promised in the Old Testament. In Vanuatu a strongly Christian country, the day is marked by prayers in churches, feasting, giving and receiving of gifts, and general festivities. Both in rural and urban areas, groups of people wander from house to house throughout the night, singing until the inhabitants waken, come out of their homes to listen, and finally donate small gifts of cash or food. Christmas launches the festive Bonane season (pronounced bone-AN-nay, from the French Bonne Année, which means "good year"). The celebrations continue right up to New Year's.

BOXING DAY

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: December 26

The origins of Boxing Day are uncertain but may be based on the ancient practice (particularly among the British) of giving cash or durable goods to public servants and those of the lower classes on the day after Christmas. Gifts among equals were exchanged on or before Christmas Day, but the less fortunate were given gifts the day after. Since Vanuatu was under the influence of Britain for a fairly long time, this practice has become a local custom. In some countries this day is also observed as St. Stephen's Day. St.

Stephen was the first Christian martyr. In Vanuatu the day is also called Christmas Bank Holiday.

Rites of Passage

COMING OF AGE

In Vanuatu the young boys undergo circumcision between ages five and seven, but the ritual is not performed for religious or cultural reasons. It originated in a tribal legend about a woman who was married to two brothers. After one brother had accidentally circumcised himself as he passed by a low bamboo branch while out hunting, his wife told him that she enjoyed making love with him more than she did with his uncircumcised brother. On hearing this bit of intimate information, the other brother was circumcised and everyone lived happily ever after. Because of this happy ending, circumcising men became customary on some islands. While all men on Tanna are circumcised, those living on Espiritu Santo are not.

For this important rite of passage they are quarantined or segregated from their families, before and after the actual act, for a total period of nearly three months. Circumcision is often performed by qualified doctors. During this period the female relatives of the boys cannot cook for them or pay them a visit. It is the paternal grandfathers of the boys who are given the task of looking after them. On the actual day of the circumcision the boys don traditional skirts, get their faces painted, and wear colorful feathers as headdresses. On this occasion the maternal uncles of the boys enjoy a great deal of importance, because traditionally they are responsible for the milestones in the lives of their nephews: circumcision, beard shaving, and getting married. The fathers of the boys prepare food and drinks (especially kava) and offer it to the guests who come together to celebrate the occasion. In the evening traditional dances are performed to which the public is invited.

In Vanuatu, a traditional marriage ceremony is spread over many days. Prior to the marriage in the villages of the bride and the bridegroom respectively, the families prepare for the wedding by collecting gifts and other belongings that the couple will use in their new life. Traditional dances also take place in the man's house. Thereafter the relatives and kinsfolk of the bridegroom come and take away the bride (along with her belongings) to the village of the groom. The bride's people pretend to cry. As the bride leaves the house her parents unfold a big red mat over her head so that she is not visible to the bystanders. In earlier days the bride customarily killed a tusked boar at this point; now she merely taps the head or skull of the tusked pig with a walking stick. (In Vanuatu a boar or pig is a symbol of wealth, prosperity, and affluence.) All those who plan to attend the wedding throng the village of the bridegroom.

The bride, led by her paternal aunt, moves to the middle of the ceremonial ground (sara) in the village. The bride and groom stand by huge packages containing the bride's belongings. Some of the members of the groom's family then walk over to the bride; her aunt and her father (who join them later) walk in circles around them, and touch the hem of the bride's father's clothes. This gesture shows acceptance of the gifts as well as the bride. Then the mothers of the couple each bring a sack of raw yams to the spot where the ceremonies are being conducted. A sister of the groom gnaws a bit of the raw yam and spits it out. This symbolizes that her brother (the bridegroom) will spit out his semen into the bride. This yam is cooked and eaten only by the sisters of the bridegroom.

An extravagant wedding feast follows in the groom's village, where guests are entertained with lots of kava and special dishes (vwavwaligi) cooked in earthen ovens. Vwavwaligi involve a process of baking in a casserole. They require heating up many stones, a lot of firewood with which to heat them, and leaves of heliconia in which the raw food items are wrapped. The relatives and kinsfolk of the bridegroom are assigned the tasks of fetching firewood, the stones, and the leaves in addition to managing the entire banquet. In traditional societies of Vanuatu there are two commodities that play key roles in all weddings: red mats and pigs. Bwana, or a big red mat (made with pandanus leaves), is a kind of traditional money. Bari, small red mats, are used to supplement the big red mats in case of exchange or payment. Small red mats are also used as traditional clothing. Women once used them as G-strings and men as loincloths.

Introduction

❁ HISTORY

Long before the beginnings of Christianity, the area where Vatican City is now located was called Vatican Hill, Vaticanus Mons in Latin. It is situated on the side of the Tiber River across from the legendary Seven Hills of Rome. Even before Christianity was introduced, it was considered a very sacred spot.

The concentration of the Catholic bureaucracy on Vatican Hill evolved gradually. In the first century C.E. it was home to a circus and a cemetery. Around 65 the Romans were slaughtering Christians, and it is thought that St. Peter (who is believed to be the first pope) was among those put to death. A small tomb was built at the spot where he lost his life. In 326 on the orders of Emperor Constantine, a basilica was built over St. Peter's tomb. Afterward the area became more populated.

Vatican Hill has been within the walls and city limits of Rome for more than 1,000 years. Vatican City was included within the city limits of Rome during the reign of Pope Leo IV (847–55), who expanded Rome's walls to protect St. Peter's Basilica and the Vatican between 848 and 852. Until the 14th century, however, the administrative headquarters of the church (called the Holy See) was at the Lateran Palace in Rome.

In the 14th century, Pope Clement V (a Frenchman named Bertrand de Got whose papacy started in 1305) chose to make his residence Avignon in France. From 1309 to 1377 Avignon was the seat of the papacy. Rome did not have a pope for more than 70 years, and the popes were under the influence of French rulers. Consequently Rome suffered financially and socially, having lost much commercial traffic and prestige. When the papacy returned, the country began to revive. Following the Avignon Captivity the papal palace and church administration moved to Vatican Hill. Around the same time, since St. Peter's Basilica was around 1,000 years old, a new one was designed. The interior of the basilica can hold approximately 60,000 people.

Until the mid-19th century the popes exercised civil as well as spiritual authority over the papal states, which included the present regions of Latium, Umbria, Marche, and eastern Emilia-Romagna. At their maximum size in 1859, the papal states comprised some 16,000 square miles of territory. In 1870

The Etruscans

In the seventh century B.C.E. what is called the Villanovan culture, the first Iron Age culture known in central and northern Italy, was eclipsed by Greek traders and the Hellenic civilization of southern Italy. The rich, and somewhat mysterious, Etruscan culture developed out of the Villanovan culture in northern and central Italy after c. 800. The civilization of the Etruscans flourished in Etruria and the Po Valley in the northern part of what is now Italy before the Gauls arrived and the Roman Republic began. The Etruscans are thought to have spoken a non-Indo-European language.

Early on the Catholic Church saw itself as the guardian responsible for preserving the world's antiquities, and one of the several museums of Vatican City is devoted entirely to Etruscan art and culture. It is located over the Vatican's Egyptian museum where a succession of 19th-century popes was responsible for its creation: Gregory XVI (r. 1831–46) built the foundation, Pius IX (r. 1846–78) provided many of the treasures that it houses, and Leo XIII (r. 1878–1903) saw to its decoration and the systematic arrangement of the artifacts. The first artifacts that necessitated the museum were discovered during excavations carried out in Western Etruria between 1828 and 1836 and include statues, sarcophagi, bowls, vessels of every shape and function, mosaics, lamps, and many other items of every description. Like all of the Vatican's five museums, their arrangement and the artifacts themselves provide an extremely detailed mosaic of the art of ancient Italy and the culture of the Etruscans.

the newly unified kingdom of Italy seized the papal states. The papal soldiers tried to resist the invasion but failed. Rome was annexed, and the pope's powers were taken away.

In 1928 the Fascist leader of Italy Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) started the process of restoring the authority of the papacy. In 1929 he established the independent state of Vatican City and granted it full autonomy.

❁ GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Vatican City is situated on Vatican Hill within the city of Rome. The country consists of 13 buildings in Rome and Castel Gandolfo (the pope's summer residence), which enjoys extraterritorial rights. The wall built around Vatican City constitutes its boundaries.

Vatican City enjoys temperate weather with wet and mild winters and warm and dry summers.

❁ ECONOMY

Vatican City has a noncommercial economy that is supported financially by contributions from Roman Catholic dioceses throughout the world. The sale of postage stamps, coins, medals, and tourist mementos is another source of revenue. This state has some small-scale industries for printing and production of mosaics and staff uniforms.

❁ CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Vatican City is famous for its magnificent architecture. Its buildings, such as St. Peter's Basilica and the Sistine Chapel, house some of the world's most beautiful art masterpieces, and visitors can admire works by Botticelli, Bernini, and Michelangelo. The Vatican Library and the collections at the Vatican museums are of historical, scientific, and cultural significance.

The population of Vatican City is predominantly male, although two orders of nuns live within the country. The laypersons and others who work in Vatican City normally live outside its walls.

The Great Schism

In the 11th century the Great Schism between Rome and Constantinople occurred, an event that led to the separation of the church of the West, the Roman Catholic Church, and the churches of the East. Although there were doctrinal issues, such as the filioque controversy (a disputed part of the Nicene Creed concerning the nature of the Trinity) and the authority of the pope involved in the split, these were considerably aggravated by cultural and linguistic differences as well as the personalities of the religious figures involved in the dispute.

The final schism is thought to have been caused by the sacking of Constantinople by the Fourth Crusade in 1204, which directly involved the Latin Church in a military assault against the Byzantine Empire, Constantinople, and the Orthodox Patriarchate. In fact among the Orthodox there is still anger regarding both the sacking of the Church of Holy Wisdom and the establishment of the Latin Empire in 1204. In 2004 Pope John Paul II (r. 1978–2005) formally apologized for the assaults of 1204, and Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople (b. 1940) formally accepted the apology. However many precious items—including relics, riches, and other items of great value—were stolen during the attack and are still kept by various Catholic churches in Western Europe.

The Eastern Orthodox Churches continue to use the Nicene Creed as revised in 381, without the filioque clause.

❁ NEW YEAR'S EVE/DAY

Observed by: General Public

Observed on: December 31–January 1

January 1 marks the beginning of the Western, or Gregorian, calendar, which has been followed by the Roman Catholic Church since Pope Gregory XIII (r. 1572–85) decreed its adoption on February 24, 1582. Up to that point most of the Western world had followed the Julian calendar (introduced by Julius Caesar); the Eastern Orthodox Churches continue to use the Julian calendar. The calendar was changed because the mean year in the Julian calendar was a little too long, which caused the vernal equinox (the date used to calculate when Easter should be observed) to drift slowly backward in the calendar year.

In Vatican City, this day is also celebrated as the World Day of Peace. The pope conducts a special Mass on this day. Millions of Catholic followers wait to hear the pope's special New Year's message. The pope also prays for world peace on this day.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF LATERANENSI PACTS

Observed by: Roman Catholics

Observed on: February 11

This day commemorates the signing of three treaties with Italy in 1929. These treaties acknowledged the full sovereignty of the Vatican and established the country's territories formally. The pope conducts a special Mass for Vatican City on this day.

The Lateran Treaties

The treaties signed on February 11, 1929, recognized the then-kingdom of Italy and Vatican City. The Lateran treaties were negotiated between Cardinal Secretary of State Pietro Gasparri on behalf of Vatican City, and Benito Mussolini, the Fascist leader, as Prime Minister of Italy. There were three treaties: The first treaty recognizes the independence and sovereignty of Vatican City. The second treaty defines the civil and religious relations between the government and the Church within Italy. The third treaty was to provide Vatican City with compensation for its losses in the earlier disputes that took place in 1870.

According to the treaty, the pope also agreed to submit the candidates for bishop and archbishop to the Italian government, and the bishops had to swear allegiance to the Italian state. The clergy were also prohibited from participating in politics. The Roman Catholic Church was granted the status of the established church in Italy.

❁ ANNIVERSARY OF THE POPE'S ELECTION

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: April 19

This day commemorates the anniversary of the election of the pope. A special Mass is held in St. Peter's Square to honor him.

❁ LABOR DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: May 1

May 1 is celebrated as Labor Day, also known as May Day and Workers' Day, in many parts of the world to commemorate the important role played by workers in building nations and societies. Although the earliest origins of May Day are ascribed to the pagan celebrations that were practiced by farmers, peasants, and villagers in Europe well before the Middle Ages, the modern observance goes back to 1889, when the Second International, a consortium of socialist organizations, declared May 1 a day to recognize the importance of workers around the world. At that time the group scheduled the first demonstrations and celebrations for the following year, 1890, and coordinated it with the strike called by the U.S. labor union, the American Federation of Labor (AFL), demanding an eight-hour workday.

In St. Peter's Square in Vatican City, nuns, the clergy, and thousands of pilgrims wearing the yellow scarf of Italy's Catholic trade union celebrate this day with a special Mass conducted by the pope. For Catholics this day also marks the Feast of St. Joseph the Worker, having been so designated by Pope Pius XII (r. 1939–58) in 1955; many believe that this feast was initiated in response to the May Day celebrations for workers sponsored by Socialists. Special prayers are made to St. Joseph on this day.

❁ EPIPHANY

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: January 6

Epiphany, historically observed on January 6, is celebrated to remember the Three Wise Men from the East (the Magi, Caspar, Melchior, and Balthasar) who came to see and pay their respects to the newly born Jesus. The observance originated in the Eastern Christian Churches and celebrated the birth of Jesus, the visit of the Magi, and all of Jesus' childhood events up to his baptism in the Jordan River by John the Baptist.

In Vatican City, the center of the Catholic world, this feast day is celebrated with a special prayer service conducted by the pope. He blesses the entire Catholic community on this occasion.

❁ ST. JOSEPH'S DAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: March 19

St. Joseph's Day honors St. Joseph, the earthly father of Jesus. On this ecclesiastical feast day, a special Mass is conducted by the pope, and prayers are offered to St. Joseph. St. Joseph is also the patron of the universal church. His other feast day is on May 1, the Feast of St. Joseph the Worker, having been so designated by Pope Pius XII in 1955; many felt that it was in response to the May Day celebrations for workers sponsored by the Socialist International.

❁ MAUNDY THURSDAY

Observed by: Roman Catholics
Observed on: Thursday before Easter

Maundy Thursday, also called Shere Thursday or Holy Thursday, derives its English name from the Latin word mandatum, the first word of the office of the washing of the feet, the central rite of the day and the oldest of which there is explicit evidence. On Holy Thursday church bells stop ringing, the altar is stripped following vespers, and the night office is celebrated as Tenebrae ("darkness"), which symbolizes a world without God.

In Rome all the observances are performed during the day, whereas in Africa the Eucharist is celebrated after the evening meal on Holy Thursday, because this conforms to the circumstances of the Last Supper.

✿ EASTER

Observed by: Christians

Observed on: First Sunday after Lent

Easter is a Christian feast that celebrates Jesus’ Resurrection from the dead the third day after he was crucified. It is sometimes known as Resurrection Day. This day is the central observance in the Catholic liturgical calendar, and many of the Church’s holy days are scheduled around the date on which Easter falls during the year. It is also important because the fundamental teaching of Christianity is that Jesus, through his death, freed all his believers from the penalty of sin, and his Resurrection was the triumph of life over death.

When the Catholic Church decided to add an observance of Jesus’ Resurrection to its holy days in the first century, it chose the date of the vernal equinox, the day celebrated among pagans as the arrival of spring and the Earth’s renewed fertility. The holiday falls on the first Sunday after Lent and is celebrated by Christians the world over. They often buy new clothes for this special day and go to church to offer prayers.

On Easter, the pope gives his Easter blessings to all Catholics around the world. He appears in the papal window at St.

Peter’s Square and waves to the thousands who wait outside to see him. On Easter Monday the pope declares the official end of the Holy Week celebrations.

In Vatican City the pope leads the celebrations of the Immaculate Conception. The country plays host to a variety of events attended by followers of Mary from all over the world. Participants join the pope for a commemorative mass in St. Peter's Basilica. Other events, such as a special Concert for Immaculate Mary, are usually held in the Vatican's Audience Hall, showcasing many hymns written in her honor.

❁ CHRISTMAS

Observed by: Christians
Observed on: December 25

Christmas is a day of great joy for Christians all over the world, because it celebrates the birth of Jesus, whom they believe was the Son of God. No one knows the date of Jesus' birth, and many dates have been suggested as possibilities. During the fourth century a calendar was established that emphasized Christian festivals that gradually took over the dates and seasons of pagan celebrations and rituals.

The latter part of December was one such period. On December 17 (according to the Julian calendar) the Saturnalia, a seven-day festival honoring the Roman deity Saturn, the god of agriculture, was observed. This festival included the winter solstice, which usually occurred around December 25. During the Saturnalia the Romans feasted well, put aside all business and matters of war, exchanged gifts, and freed their slaves for the festival's duration. December 25 was also celebrated as the date honoring the rebirth of the Invincible Sun God of the Romans (Natalis Solis Invicti), and rituals were performed to honor Mithra, the Persian god of light. Both celebrations welcomed the return of the light and the lengthening days.

As the days grew longer the winter festivities stretched to include January 1, the festival of Kalends, the day of the new Moon, and the first day of the month and year of the Julian calendar. Many of the rituals and symbols now associated with this Christian holiday are directly derived from winter solstice celebrations including mistletoe, the yule log, the Christmas tree with all its lights, feasting, and exchanging gifts.

Introduction

🌸 HISTORY

Some early inhabitants of Venezuela are believed to have been people from the present-day regions of Guyana, Brazil, and Antilles, but artifacts, including both practical and decorative objects, indicate that the inhabitants of northern South America drifted south from Mexico and Central America, and there was contact between people living on the eastern slopes of the Andes and the great Incan civilization. There were three main groups of people when the Europeans arrived: the Caribs, Arawak, and Chibcha, and members of these tribes eventually migrated and settled many of the Caribbean islands. These peoples lived primarily in small groups and, while all of them practiced farming to some extent; it was not always necessary because the land provided amply for their needs. The Chibcha, living on the eastern side of the Andes Mountains, were probably the most technologically advanced. They ter-rored parts of the Andes and constructed irrigation canals to bring water to their crops.

Christopher Columbus (1451–1506) arrived in Venezuela in 1498. Many indigenous tribes inhabited the region at that time. A year later, when Amerigo Vespucci (1454–1512) arrived he named it Venezuela, which means “Little Venice” in Spanish, because the Añu natives had built their homes on stilts (palafitos) over the water, and the scene reminded him of Venice, Italy. In 1521 the first Spanish settlement was established at Cumana in Venezuela. The Spanish were interested in Venezuela because they wanted to exploit the region's gold, silver, pearls, and precious stones. Venezuela also became well known for its cocoa plantations. Due to the increasing need for laborers to work on these plantations, slaves were brought in from Africa.

The indigenous people fiercely resisted the Spaniards, but because of the diseases the Spanish brought with them, including smallpox and plague, a large part of the indigenous population died, making it impossible for them to drive the invaders out. Centuries later, under the leadership of the revolutionary Simon Bolívar (1783–1830), Venezuela eventually gained independence from Spanish rule in 1821. Bolívar was also called El Libertador, “The Liberator,” and went on to free Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia as well. He is worshipped in Venezuela, and the major plaza of almost every city of Venezuela is called Plaza Bolívar.

Following its independence in 1830, José Antonio Páez (1790–1873) became the first president of an independent Venezuela.

However, over the next few decades, Venezuela suffered from a series of political coups, and the economy was very unstable. In the beginning of the 20th century, huge oil reserves were discovered in the Maracaibo region of the country, and by the late 1920s Venezuela was one of the world’s largest oil exporters. The economy suffered a setback when world oil prices drastically dropped in 1988.

In December 1998, Hugo Chávez (b. 1954), an army colonel who had led a failed coup a few years earlier, was elected president. Although he promised to improve incomes and eliminate corruption, poverty and unemployment rates have actually increased since Chávez took office. He was reelected in 2000, but the political situation is very tense.

Of the more than 1,000 rivers flowing through Venezuela; the largest and most important is the Orinoco, the second largest river in South America (and eighth largest in the world).

GEOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Located in the northern part of South America, Venezuela is surrounded by Guyana, Brazil, Colombia, and the Caribbean Sea. In many ways its coastal region is decidedly Caribbean in atmosphere. Topographically Venezuela is divided into three regions: the Guiana Highlands in the southeast, the central Orinoco Plains (Ilanos), and the Andes Mountains and the Maracaibo lowlands in the northern areas of the country. The highest point in the region is Pico

The High Cost of Poverty

The poverty of large segments of Venezuela’s population has made its people vulnerable to sexual exploitation and forced labor, something the government has failed to address adequately. Venezuela is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for both sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Bolívar (La Columna) at 16,427 feet. The most striking topographical feature of Venezuela is Gran Sabana in the Guiana Highlands. Gran Sabana is an extensively eroded and large plateau that rises as high as 2,625 feet from the surrounding cliffs. On the flat surface of the plateau, several tepuis, or bluffs, emerge that are of a considerable height.

Climatic conditions in Venezuela vary from tropical to alpine depending on the elevation, topography, and wind conditions. In regions below 2,625 feet, a tropical climate exists, and the average temperatures range from 79°F to 82°F. Between 2,625 and 6,562 feet, the climate is temperate, and the average temperature ranges from 54°F to 77°F. Between 6,500 and 9,800 feet, the climate grows colder, and the average temperature ranges from 48°F to 52°F. In the high mountains, above 9,800 feet, permanent snowfields and pasturelands called paramos are found and the average temperature is below 46°F.

Flora are represented by orchids, bromeliads, flowering shrubs, ferns, bamboo trees, frailejon plants, and the rare red-trunked coloradito trees, which hold the record as the tree growing at the highest altitude in the world. Venezuela is home to fauna such as babas (fox, jaguars, small alligators, and pumas), cunagueros (small tigers), honey bears, tapirs, palm tree bears, raccoons, limpets, weasels, and the capybara, a semi-aquatic rodent of tropical Central and South America, that has short limbs and a vestigial tail and often grows to more than four feet in length—the biggest rodent in the world.

ECONOMY

Venezuela has an oil-based economy. The petroleum sector constitutes 80 percent of the nation’s total export earnings and accounts for more than 50 percent of the government’s revenue. Venezuela is the largest foreign oil supplier to the United States. Other export items include coffee, bauxite, aluminum, rice, cotton, iron ore, and cocoa. Venezuelan rivers are a significant source of hydroelectric power, which helps in the functioning of the numerous industries in Venezuela.

Because the country is endowed with natural resources such as gold, iron ore, diamonds, and nickel, the government has passed a new mining law that will increase participation of the private sector in the mining industry and provide a boost to the nation’s economy. The government is also investing a large amount of money in infrastructure development.

However, even with recent advances, there is still extensive poverty in Venezuela, and the government is trying to introduce other new policies that will benefit the poor directly.

CULTURE AND LIFESTYLE

Venezuela is a predominantly Roman Catholic country with about 96 percent of the nation’s pop-

The Cult of Maria Lionza

Little is known about the history, development, and practices of the Maria Lionzan religion because there is no dogma, no official beliefs and practices, and historians cannot even agree about when and where it started. Whereas some Afro-Caribbean syncretistic religions have developed a system of beliefs and practices, the Maria Lionzan religion appears to be mainly a matter of participation, perhaps even casual or occasional. At this time most marialionceros (those who follow the Maria Lionzan religion) live in the province of Yaracuy in Venezuela, but their numbers are increasing in other cities such as Caracas, Maracaibo, and Barquisimeto. Moreover the cult is spreading to other countries including Colombia, Panama, the United States, and as far north as Canada.

Until the 1950s most Venezuelans apparently ignored such religious practices and beliefs, although there may have been some vague idea that there was a story about a goddess who lived in the mountains of Yaracuy. It is possible that the cult may go as far back as the colonial era. Even so the cult was only one among many. But this situation changed radically when the beginning of the oil industry in Venezuela attracted masses of the rural population seeking work to urban centers, and migrants from Yaracuy brought the cult with them to the cities.

The cult of Maria Lionza is a syncretistic religious construct. While its attendant rituals and practices are undoubtedly indigenous, its practitioners have incorporated parallel elements from Roman Catholic and African animistic traditions and, from these three sources, produced a new religion. It is hard to estimate how many marialionceros there are in the Venezuelan population, because they consider themselves Catholics as well, perceiving Maria Lionza's cult as only another legitimate way of approaching Jesus and the Virgin Mary.

Although there is no established dogma or central organization, there does seem to be a core of beliefs that all the disconnected spiritualist groups share. Starting with its central concept, the divinity of the goddess Maria Lionza herself, marialionceros believe she dwells in the mountain of Sorte in Yaracuy. But she is not alone. Rather, she appears to be the most powerful deity in a trinity that includes Guaicaipuro, an Indian chieftain killed by Spaniards, and el Negro Felipe, "the Black Philip," an African slave who was also murdered by his European masters. These three figures seem to be the most significant of a larger pantheon composed of many other lesser deities.

ulation nominally claiming this faith. Although most of the native population has embraced Christianity, many people in the rural areas still adhere to indigenous beliefs and actively practice their religion. Also, a group named the Cult of Maria Lionza enjoys a good following in the interior and preaches a religion that is a mix of pre-Hispanic indigenous creeds, Christian religious practices, and African voodoo rituals.

Spanish is the official language of Venezuela although more than 25 languages and dialects are spoken widely among many tribes in the rural areas. English is spoken, though it is restricted primarily to urban areas.

Venezuelans love their music, which is a mix of indigenous rhythms, African, and European music. Also, they love literature and theatrical performances and share a penchant for the visual arts and handicrafts. Traditional music known as gaita consists of improvised rhyming vocals over four-stringed guitars, harps, and maracas (rattle). Gaita is the folk music of the Zulia region. Joropo is the national dance of Venezuela with a rhythm that is performed over improvised vocals, harps, small guitars, and maracas.

❁ CUISINE

Traditional Venezuelan dishes include pabellón criollo (shredded beef, rice, black beans, cheese, and fried bananas) the national dish of the country; empanadas (deep-fried cornmeal turnovers with fillings of ground meat, cheese, beans, or baby shark), cachapa (a sweet corncake with cheese), sancocho (fish stew served with vegetables), parillada (barbecued meat), and cachito (a bread roll stuffed with ham).

Some of the popular beverages of Venezuela include café con leche (coffee with milk), guayoyo (espresso), chicha (fermented rice beverage), and papelón con limón (lemonade).

✿ BATTLE OF CARABOBO DAY

Observed by: General Public
Observed on: June 24

Battle of Carabobo Day, also called Army Day, commemorates the historic victory of South American patriots led by the great Venezuelan leader, Simon Bolívar, against Spanish forces stationed in Venezuela on June 24, 1821. Although Venezuela had declared its independence from Spanish rule in 1811, Spanish forces fought back and forced the ruling South American patriot, Francisco Miranda, to surrender Venezuela in 1812. Since then, Bolívar had been fighting the battle to regain Venezuela's freedom. From 1813 until 1821, he fought relentlessly alongside several South American patriots for liberation and, after successive victories over a period of time, the crucial battle for Venezuela's independence was fought at Carabobo. His strategic planning and acumen ensured the victory of the South American forces against the Spanish army and, thus, paved the way for Venezuela's independence.

From 1821 until 1830, Bolívar remained the president of Gran Colombia—a republic formed by Venezuela, Ecuador, Colombia, and Panama—until his death from tuberculosis in 1830.
